How to Use This Encyclopedia

Volumes I and II of this encyclopedia are organized by country, and volume III lists major internationally observed holidays and religions. Volumes I and II feature countries of the world arranged in alphabetical order. Each country entry offers introductory material about the nation's origin, history, political system, economy, geography and climate, lifestyle and culture, and cuisine. The heart of each country entry is its description of the country's chief holidays—public/legal, religious, and regional—and its significant rites of passage, or major transitional events (birth, coming-of-age, marriage, and death) that mark an individual's life journey from cradle to grave. Public/legal holidays are those officially recognized by the country's government; schools, businesses, and public offices are generally closed on these days. Religious holidays include those that are either religious in nature and officially recognized by the government or are observed by the country's majority religions. Regional celebrations are often large gatherings that are unique to a particular area of the country, ethnic group, or religious minority.

The encyclopedia includes entries for those nations commonly accepted as sovereign by organizations such as the United Nations and other international bodies, as well as some overseas territories and dependencies, such as Greenland, Bermuda, the Cayman Islands, and French Guiana.

Given the complexity and sheer enormity of the subject, the encyclopedia must make some accommodations, and no such work could be or remain definitive, given the multifarious and ever-changing world we inhabit. No individual country entry can be exhaustive. Not all religious, ethnic, or language groups can be included, particularly in those nations that are most diverse socially and culturally. Nor can every festival or holiday observance be recorded, even though such events may be enormously important to those who observe them. But the encyclopedia does strive to include those ethnic or religious groups who live in the greatest numbers or prominence in each country and to list and describe their most important and representative public, religious, and regional holidays and rites of passage.

Each country entry distinguishes between “public” and “religious” holidays. This division is designed to accommodate the complexity of holidays as they function in the real world. In the United States, for example, Christmas (December 25) is a federally authorized public holiday; yet it is simultaneously a Christian religious festival. It is not one or the other but is, rather, both a religious and a public holiday. And while some observe Christmas in a secular, if festive, fashion, or treat it simply as a day off, others continue to vest it with great religious meaning. In this encyclopedia we have chosen to include Christmas under religious holidays. In other cases—St. Valentine's Day (February 14), for example—the religious content of the “religious” holiday has become even more tenuous or remote; so we have placed these holidays in the public/legal category.

At times religion suffuses social and political affairs in ways that in essence transform secular holidays into holy days. Memorial Days around the world, for example, frequently employ prayers and devotions even though commemorating non-religious events. Memorial Days can be found under the public/legal category. On the other hand, religious holidays, even as they retain their religious significance, fulfill important political functions, as when, for instance, a saint's day functions as a national holiday. These holidays have generally been placed under the religious heading. In nations that do not separate church and state, distinctions between public (secular) and religious holidays can be particularly weak. In these cases, holidays have been categorized according to whether the religious or secular aspect is more prominent in the way people observe it.

Volume III contains overview entries on major religions, festivals, or particular holidays observed broadly or even worldwide. These topics transcend national boundaries. Because the country entries focus on national customs and observances, helpful cross-references direct the reader to the overview entries for detailed background and analysis. Cross-references may be found in “See also” sections following many of the holiday subentries in volumes I and II. The relevant overview articles are listed in small capital letters.

For the sake of clarity, we have standardized holiday names, which often vary by country, language, and the way they are transcribed into English. Alternative names for holidays have been included in the description of the holiday.

Among the organizational challenges for an encyclopedia of holidays is accommodating the different ways that time is reckoned worldwide. Calendar systems, not merely individual holidays, vary greatly. In the West, a solar calendar (itself revised over time) controls the calculation of days and years. But Muslims and Jews, among others, employ lunar schemes to organize their liturgical calendars. And Christians, though they use a solar calendar, nonetheless peg key religious festivals to the Moon, situating holidays within seasons but not anchoring them to a single, consistent date in the Gregorian calendar. Christians—like others—celebrate some holidays as “moveable feasts.” Easter, for example, can fall on any day between March 22 and April 25, depending on the year (it is celebrated on the first Sunday after the first full Moon after vernal equinox, which occurs on March 21). Making matters even more complicated, Eastern Orthodox Christians use the much older Julian calendar, and celebrate their holidays 13 days after other Christian sects.

The encyclopedia generally employs the Gregorian calendar as the basis of its dating and organizational scheme. We do this for clarity and consistency, while recognizing that many in the world mark and experience time differently. For the myriad moveable feasts, we supply the official dates of observance within the relevant liturgical or cultural calendar of the celebrants. Appendices at the back of volume III explain the origins as well as the similarities and differences among solar, lunar, and lunisolar calendar systems in use throughout the world. The appendices also provide equivalent dates in the Gregorian calendar.

Introduction

by Matthew Dennis

Holidays help us mark time. They are the extraordinary events that give shape and meaning to our everyday existence. Throughout human history the vast array of nations and peoples have punctuated their calendars with special days to celebrate, commemorate, memorialize, or trace the passage of their lives. Individually and as communities, we set aside times to reflect on the past and future, to rest and renew our bodies and souls, and simply to have fun. In the English language we call these extraordinary moments “holidays,” a contraction of the term “holy day.” Sometimes holidays are literally holy days—the Sabbath, Easter, or Eid al-Fitr, for example—but they can also be secular occasions that serve local or national political purposes, address the social needs of communities and individuals, or indulge the whimsies of celebrants. This encyclopedia explores the fascinating and complex world of holidays, offering a guide to holidays and rites of passage worldwide, country by country, and thematically in essays on important transnational celebrations and religions that cross national boundaries. Its numerous entries show both the distinctions among the peoples of the world and what they have in common—the need to commemorate, to organize and measure the passage of time, and to infuse their ordinary lives with meaning, purpose, or joy.

Holidays are “times out of time”—moments when time seems to stand still. Regular time stops. We put work aside, alter normal activities, assemble in different ways with family and friends, eat special foods, and allow our minds to become more reflective or, often, less practical and more carefree. Holidays cast shadows. As they approach, we anticipate and prepare for them, and in their wake we recover from them, pay their toll, or bask in their afterglow. If holidays are ephemeral or transient, they are nonetheless like guests who visit often and profoundly affect our lives. We anticipate their arrival, remember them when they leave, and greet them regularly in cycles. As these entries show, we can learn much about a people or nation by the holidays they keep. What do the people believe, hold dear, or revile? What religious faiths or systems of belief hold sway, giving meaning and order to their lives? How uniform or diverse are they religiously, culturally, or socially? How rich or poor are they, and how do they invest their lives with value that is not monetary but psychic, emotional, or moral? What sorts of bonds unite them, and what differentiates them or pulls them apart? How are they governed, and how deeply are they invested in the officials or systems that govern them? What triumphs or traumas have they experienced, and how does the past weigh on their present? The celebration, commemoration, or observance of holidays gives us insight into such questions, informing us about the countries and peoples of the world, both on their own terms and in comparison to one another.

Yet if holidays seem to make time stand still, we recognize in another aphorism that “time waits for no man.” The world and our lives are in flux, and despite the patterns and cycles we impose, time races on. Calendars and holidays reflect such change, recording it and marking the passage of time. At the very least, in our modern world, they chronicle that things were different in the past and are destined to be different in the future. Traditional holidays take us “back to the future”—linking us with if not physically returning us to the past. If cycles of religious holidays or ancient seasonal festivals often seem timeless, social and political calendars regularly incorporate new holidays or expunge old ones that have become obsolete, inexpedient, or embarrassing. And as we celebrate or commemorate, festivals evolve and are themselves transformed. New governments or political systems replace old ones, and supporters erect new holidays to celebrate and legitimize new political orders and to persuade, educate, or promote the allegiance of citizens or subjects. Religious calendars can change as well in nations that undergo transformation, as new religions arise or older faiths gain new followers and compete with established religions for ceremonial space in the calendar. Paradoxically, then, time and the holiday calendars that mark time seem to move both forward and in cycles. Our holidays are forces, not merely of tradition but of innovation. They help us to preserve who we are and to reinvent ourselves over time.

Globalization versus Local Identity

Is the world becoming more or less diverse? The notion that the world is “shrinking” might be a cliché, but development and increasing economic integration of the globe certainly do lend greater uniformity to the ways we calculate time across countries and continents. In some cases disparate nations separated by thousands of miles celebrate the same holidays. Nationally specific holidays pose challenges to international businesses. They must coordinate their operations worldwide to avoid “bad business days”—days when government offices, banks, and businesses are closed in observation of local holidays. In 1999 an American financial publisher compiled and began to sell an international holiday calendar, which attempted to identify all the holidays that would occur in more than 100 countries over the next 100 years! It will be a challenge to maintain the calendar’s accuracy. Societies and political regimes change, cultural and religious traditions wax and wane, and holidays are shifted in national calendars, sometimes to form three-day weekends.

In 2005, for example, the South Korean government announced that April 5 that year would be the last time that Koreans had the day off for Arbor Day. Koreans created the holiday in 1946 to encourage tree planting in response to the wartime devastation and deforestation the country had suffered. But by the early 21st century, officials believed that country’s calendar contained too many holidays and that Arbor Day had lost its meaning and had become simply a day off.

Russia similarly sought to purge its calendar in November of 2004 when its parliament moved to abolish the annual November 7 observance commemorating the Bolshevik Revolution of 1917, a discomfiting festival in the post-Communist era. But apparently unconcerned about any surfeit of holidays, the parliament voted to replace the abandoned one with a new festive day on November 4 to celebrate a more historically distant, but more acceptable, event, the Russian uprising against Polish domination in 1612. While they were at it, legislators proposed cutting two other holidays but extending the New Year’s holiday season to five days (from two), expanding the overall number of holidays from 11 to 12 days.

Japan presents a final example among many of the flux typical in national calendars. In 2007 Japan will begin celebrating Showa Day each April 29. It honors Emperor Showa (1926–89), known during his reign as Emperor Hirohito. Though a revered figure in Japan, Hirohito is regarded by many as a symbol of Japanese militarism and aggression in Asia. April 29 has been a national holiday for years, marking the emperor’s birthday, but since his death in 1989 it has been called Greenery Day, to avoid controversy and emphasize the emperor’s (and Japan’s) love of nature. With the passage of time and a rebirth of Japanese nationalism, however, the holiday has reemerged in a new fashion. Greenery Day will now move to May 4 and remain a national holiday, sandwiched between Constitution Day on May 3 and Children’s Day on May 5.

As these examples show, despite globalization, local and national communities retain their distinctions. Holidays can be tools to resist homogenization, to stem the internationalizing tide, and to assert particular ethnic, cultural, religious, or national identities. Through celebration or commemoration, people can make the case—to themselves and to others—that they are unique, authentic, and worthy. Paradoxically, then, holiday celebrations can be both engines of international integration and a means of affirming and defending particular localized identities. Readers of this encyclopedia can find in each entry evidence of national distinctiveness as well as similarity or commonality with other countries and peoples of the world.

International Holidays

Many countries share holidays and festivals with other nations because their people share religious beliefs and practices. Christmas and Easter, for example, are pervasive among those nations with substantial Christian populations (some 2 billion worldwide). Ramadan is observed broadly in every hemisphere in Muslim countries and wherever the world’s 1.3 billion Muslims reside. One billion Hindus celebrate Holi, the springtime festival of color, creation, and renewal, and Diwali, the autumn festival of lights marking the new year, not merely in India but in Nepal, Myanmar (Burma), Malaysia, Suriname, and even Great Britain. Some 350 million Buddhists, in China, Japan, Thailand, Tibet, and elsewhere celebrate Vesak, which commemorates the birth, enlightenment, and salvation of Gautama, or Buddha, the founder of Buddhism. Yet the names and particular means of celebrating these occasions vary, inflected by local customs and traditions.

Colonialism and the spread of peoples throughout the globe, especially since the 16th century, has also functioned to distribute holidays worldwide, secular as well as religious ones. If for a time the “sun never set on the British Empire,” then British holidays were celebrated around the clock and around the globe. Today, for example, many former British colonies continue to observe Boxing Day on December 26, and commonwealth nations still celebrate the Queen’s Birthday. They do not, however, do so on the same date. Even in the United Kingdom, Britons do not mark Queen Elizabeth's birthday on the anniversary of the day she was actually born (April 21, 1926), but on the second Saturday in June. (Official birthdays became separated from actual birthdays in Britain during the reign of King Edward VII [r. 1901–1910], who, though born in November, held his birthday celebrations in the summer.) Yet residents of the Falkland Islands celebrate the actual date of April 21 (because it's summer and more salubrious in the Southern Hemisphere then). Canadians mark the event on the Monday on or before May 24 in honor of Queen Victoria's birthday. In Australia, except in the state of Western Australia, it is celebrated on the second Monday of June. In New Zealand the first Monday in June is the queen's official birthday. On the Caribbean Island of Saint Kitts, it's observed, as in Australia, on the second Monday in June, as Kittisians have been doing since the reign of the former King George V (1910–1936), who was born in June. Surprisingly, Fiji also celebrates the Queen's Birthday (as well as the Prince of Wales's Birthday) as a national holiday (in June), even though Britain's monarch ceased to be the head of state in Fiji in 1987. On the other hand, the Queen's Birthday lapsed as an official holiday in Hong Kong after the United Kingdom handed back the territory to China in 1997. Such holidays come and go and shift their place in the calendar. They leave traces of a country's historical experience and inform us about that people's national life and culture.

Transnational holidays have also emerged and entrenched themselves in national calendars worldwide in other ways. Labor Day, for example, arose in the United States in the 1880s and then took a more radical course (and found a different day in the calendar—May 1) internationally. From Sweden to South Africa, from Madagascar to Martinique, from Kazakhstan to Korea, Labor Day is observed to honor workers, build solidarity nationally and internationally, and improve the conditions of laborers. Here, too, differences in observance lay behind the appearance of global uniformity. In September 2004 Labor Day in the United States was, as usual, an occasion to pursue leisure during the three-day weekend that marked the end of summer. Few thought of work, and most were able to avoid it. A lack of ceremonial seriousness and reflection among Americans might seem to compromise the purpose of the holiday, but a major objective of organized labor had been to win shorter hours and a reduced work week. Thus a holiday focused on leisure might be considered a valuable prize, worth celebrating on its own terms. Elsewhere around the globe, however, on May Day 2005 workers staged massive rallies, sometimes in defiance of their governments, which officially sanctioned Labor Day. In Moscow radical Communist activists clashed violently with riot police; in Zimbabwe, an umbrella group of trade unions held numerous rallies without police interference, though they feared repression; and thousands of Bangladeshis marched to demand the country's first-ever minimum wage ($50 per month).

International Women's Day (March 8) is another holiday that has achieved worldwide acceptance, but it would be easy to overstate its impact in celebrating women and promoting equal rights internationally. The same holiday can mean different things in different countries—in places, it reflects women's actual achievement of rights, in places it merely voices the aspiration to such rights, and in places it serves as window dressing for societies or regimes hostile to women. In Kyrgyzstan, for example, International Women's Day is a public holiday, the streets are decorated with flowers, and men relieve women of some basic tasks. Yet the country is also home to the practice of ala kachuu (meaning “grab and run”), in which men kidnap their brides. Such abductions are common; more than half of Kyrgyzstan's marriages begin in this fashion. The Kyrgyz have a saying, “Every good marriage begins in tears.” Kyrgyzstan is clearly a world apart from Australia, France, Great Britain, or the United States, where the holiday was initiated in 1909 by women activists in the Socialist Party of America. The Central Asian nation of Kyrgyzstan, in contrast, provides a different environment and different challenges to those hoping to advance the cause of women's rights. Ironically, the United States does not recognize the day as a public holiday. In such holidays, set in their local contexts, we can learn much about the countries of the world, about what they share as well as how they are distinctive or unique.

What could be more common among countries yet forcibly indicative of their individuality and autonomy than national or independence days? While these festivals celebrate the birth or independence of nations, they do so in strikingly varied ways, exhibiting the particular character and experience of the countries they glorify. The Fourth of July in the United States, marking the adoption of the Declaration of Independence in 1776, for example, is today a boisterous, blissful, midsummer fête, more known for picnics and fireworks than serious reflection. In dramatic contrast, Finland's Independence Day is held on December 6, in the midst of the cold and dark of the Finnish winter. It is a serious, even somber, affair reflecting the heavy price Finns paid to secure their independence through revolution, civil conflict, and world war. Israel's Independence Day is celebrated on the fifth day of the Hebrew month of Iyar, commemorating the creation of the state of Israel on this day in the Hebrew year 5708 (May 14, 1948). While the occasion explodes with joyous celebration, it is inconceivable to Israelis apart from the solemn holiday that precedes it by one day, Yom Hazikaron, Remembrance Day. Remembrance Day is devoted to the memory of those who gave their lives for the achievement of the country's independence and its preservation. If Independence Day is ecstatic, its companion Remembrance Day is grave, a time to express personal and collective grief mixed with awe and gratitude.

Ironically, some powerful and well-established nations have no Independence Day. England has existed as an independent kingdom since the 10th century. It incorporated Wales in the 13th century, joined with the kingdom of Scotland in 1707 to become Great Britain, and in 1801, with its union with Ireland, became the United Kingdom. Great Britain rose to unprecedented global power in the 19th century; in the 20th century and beyond, despite the dismantling of its empire, it remains a worldwide political and economic leader. Yet it has no particular national day. Is this absence a sign of national self-confidence and powerful international presence? On the other hand, some countries have more than one national day. The Seychelles—an archipelago nation in the Indian Ocean—has been independent since only 1976, yet it has both an Independence Day (June 29) and a National Day (also known as Constitution Day), celebrated each June 18 to hail the advent of multiparty democracy. The Central Asian nation of Azerbaijan has a Republic Day (May 28), an Independence Day (October 18), and a Constitution Day (November 12), not to mention a Salvation Day (June 15), a Revival Day (November 17), and a Day of Azeri Solidarity (December 31). Commemoration and the public calendar can become complicated as a nation struggles not only to establish but also to maintain its independence.

Such commemorative events can be serious, even dangerous. India celebrates Independence Day on August 15, while rival Pakistan marks its independence on August 14, though both emerged as independent nations at the same moment, when the British Empire relinquished its hold on the Indian subcontinent in 1947. In both countries wild celebrations, filled with firecrackers, patriotic songs, honking horns, and other revelry erupt amid heightened security measures and concerns about terrorism. In 2005 Indian Prime Minister Manmohan Singh delivered his celebratory remarks in Delhi from behind a screen of bulletproof glass. In the disputed region of Kashmir—a province of India but disputed by Pakistan and populated by many who would prefer autonomy from both—August 14 and 15 raise more serious worries and threats. Independence Day brings fear in Kashmir, of Indian security forces as well as militant Islamic groups. Many Kashmiris believe they have no independence to celebrate, and they reel from the thousands of casualties suffered in the long tug-of-war. Independence Day events in Kashmir's capital, Srinagar, are typically confined to heavily guarded Bakshi Stadium, and few attend (out of concern for their safety). In 2000 a militant strike depressed attendance, for example, and a state police spokesman acknowledged, "Who would want to attend anyway? . . . People are afraid to die." In 2005 a grenade attack rocked the Independence Day venue an hour before the Kashmir chief minister was set to arrive. No one was hurt in the blast, but Islamic militants killed five Hindus and injured nine others in an attack on a remote village. Shops and businesses in Kashmir were shut tight, not so that Kashmiris could celebrate, but so that they might protect their lives and livelihoods.

As a people spread across national boundaries, Assyrians in Turkey have no national day. But they express their ethnic identity as a people through celebration of their new year, or Akito. Long prohibited as a threat to Turkish nationhood, Akito was suppressed, but in 2005 Turkey (concerned about its entry into the European Union) allowed its Assyrian minority population to observe their new year openly.

Nationalist celebration can be problematic—and dangerous—when nations (defined ethnically or religiously) and nation-states are not exactly synonymous or completely overlapping. Kurds in Turkey—part of an ethnic or national group spread over Turkey, Syria, Iraq, and Iran, but without their own nation-state—face similar restrictions and cause greater consternation among authorities in Turkey. But in 2005, expedience, perhaps a sense of atonement, and reduced fear of the Assyrian minority's objectives pushed Turkey to permit Akito, which began on March 21 and culminated on April 1. Turkey's misgivings are not without some basis. A pan-Assyrian (or even more, a pan-Kurdish) movement would pose a challenge to established states, and holidays such as Akito can give voice to such national aspirations. As Emanuel Khoshaba, an Iraqi Assyrian in Damascus, Syria said, "Protecting our national days is as important to us as preserving the soil of our nation. Whether they live in Iraq or Syria or Turkey, our goal is to bring Assyrians together as a nation."

Significance of Holidays

Throughout the world, holidays matter. They can be matters of life and death, requiring observance as a patriotic or religious obligation or necessitating avoidance to preserve life and limb. In Darfur in April 2005, for example, the relentless assault on the province's Muslim tribespeople by marauding Sudanese Janjaweed militia forced fleeing people to give up any celebration of the prophet Muhammad's birthday. They were afraid to come together for ceremonies, to drum or dance or to call attention to themselves and their whereabouts. The victimized tribes similarly are unable to hold weddings or other festive events, not only because of the threat of the Janjaweed killers, but also because they have no dowries to provide or food to offer celebrants.

Yet in other places and circumstances, holidays and rites of passage are affairs of fun and frivolity, times to let loose and indulge fancies. What could be more exuberant, more joyous, more filled with fantastic pleasure than Carnival, celebrated widely in Catholic countries in the days before Lent, the austere ritual period that precedes Easter? Carnival is at its most extravagant in the Caribbean. Culminating in Mardi Gras (Fat Tuesday), the day before Ash Wednesday that commences Lent, Caribbean Carnival explodes with excitement and abandon. In Martinique the celebration even extends beyond Mardi Gras into Ash Wednesday itself. In Saint Lucia Carnival is the island's biggest festival, and revelers fill the streets with parades, colorful costumes, and the pulsating beats of soca and calypso music. Carnival in French Guiana turns things topsy-turvy, as revelers don outlandish attire and break normal social rules with relish. Among the most spectacular festivities are those in Trinidad and Tobago, influenced by African traditions remade in the Caribbean, and overflowing with drinking, dancing, and the percussive intensity of steel bands. Moving to South America, Brazil virtually defines Carnival, and Carnival defines Brazil, with its whirling celebration set to the rhythm of samba. Holidays are thus times of joy as well as sadness, moments that can be bitter or sweet.

Holidays matter to us even when they have little "meaning." The Canadian calendar, for example, is filled with Monday bank holidays, which construct three-day weekends and stand for nothing other than the benefits of leisure. Holidays tell us much about a society, whether they are bottom-up celebrations created and maintained by common people or top-down festivals constructed or imposed by leaders on sometimes unenthusiastic masses. Holidays are both the medium and the message: they are a crucial means through which people communicate, and they offer complicated but critical messages about the lives of those they envelope with festivity.

The Encyclopedia of Holidays and Celebrations surveys this rich and varied festive terrain. It invites browsing as well as more intense examination or comparative study of individual entries. It cannot be all-inclusive or the last word on so vast a subject, but it can offer a vital first step for those eager to learn more about the diverse, fascinating, and vibrant cultures of the people of the world, on their own terms, through the festivity that gives expression, order, and meaning to their lives.

Introduction

✿ HISTORY

Archaeological evidence indicates that there were probably well-developed prehistoric civilizations in southern Afghanistan as far back as the Stone Age (50000–20000 B.C.E.). Plant remains found in the foothills of the Hindu Kush Mountains suggest that people living in the region were among the first to develop agriculture and domesticate animals. Certainly the course of the nation's history has been determined by its location at the crossroads of Central, West, and South Asia, attracting conquerors one after the other. Starting around 500, when the Persian king Darius the Great (c. 550–486 B.C.E.) conquered the region, to the USSR's failed takeover, Afghanistan has risen from the rubble of one war, only to be reduced to rubble by yet another. Alexander the Great (356–323 B.C.E.) conquered the region on his way to India, and Genghis Khan (1162–1227 C.E.) swept through the area between 1220 and 1223, razing Balkh, Herat, and Bamiyan. Yet no conqueror has been able to gain control of its people, and the resulting bloody revolts have become the nation's hallmark.

Religion has been closely connected to the successive conquests. Zoroastrianism, a monotheistic religion and one of the world's oldest, was introduced by Zoroaster in 628 B.C.E. in northern Afghanistan in what was then the capital, Bactria. Afghanistan remained under its influence for a considerable length of time until people from the east, the Yuechi, founded the Kushan dynasty early in the second century C.E., and introduced Buddhism into the Bamiyan Valley, where it held sway up to the 10th century. Islam arrived in Afghanistan in the seventh century C.E. when the Muslim conquest began. It has flourished since then.

The rich cultural and political history of Afghanistan as a nation extends over a little more than two centuries. Ahmad Shah united the country in 1747 and founded the Durrani dynasty, which lasted until 1818. The name Afghanistan is mentioned officially for the first time in the Anglo-Persian peace treaty of 1801. The Durrani were the first Pashtun rulers

Fun Fact

Mujahideen is a plural form of Arabic mujahid, meaning “struggler” or someone who engages in jihad or “struggle,” but it is often translated as “holy warrior.” In the late 20th century the Western media began to use the term to describe various armed fighters who subscribe to Islamic ideologies.

of Afghanistan, and it was under the leadership of Ahmad Shah that Afghanistan began to take shape as a nation-state after centuries of fragmentation and exploitation.

In recent times Afghanistan has seen a great deal of war and civil unrest. The country’s last period of (relative) stability occurred between 1933 and 1973 under King Zahir Shah (b. 1914). He was responsible for introducing programs of political and economic modernization, establishing a democratic legislature, encouraging education for women, and other much needed changes. These reforms, however, did not endear him to the religious militants who opposed him. In 1973 his brother-in-law Sardar Mohammed Daoud (1909–78) staged a coup while Zahir Shah was abroad. Then in 1978, when the communist People’s Democratic Party of Afghanistan took over the government, his whole family was killed.

In 1979 the Soviet Union invaded but was forced to withdraw 10 years later by anti-Communist mujahideen forces financed by the CIA, Pakistan, and Saudi Arabia. The Communist regime in Kabul collapsed in 1992. Fighting that subsequently erupted among the various mujahideen factions eventually led to a feudal situation that ultimately resulted in the advent of the Taliban, an ultra-fundamentalist Islamic group. Clerics of the ferociously devout Pashtun, a tribe of both Pakistan and Afghanistan, formed the Taliban in the early 1990s.

The black-turbaned clerics’ aim was to end Afghanistan’s civil war, which they achieved with help from Pakistan’s Inter-Services Intelligence (ISI) agency. The Taliban seized Kabul in 1996 and managed to capture most of the country outside of Northern Alliance strongholds, primarily in the northeast.

The Taliban was overthrown by the United States in 2001 in the wake of the terrorist attacks of September 11. In late 2001, under sponsorship of the United States, prominent opponents of the Taliban and Afghans living in exile met in Bonn, Germany. They agreed on a plan to form a new government. This led to the appointment of Hamid Karzai (b. 1957) as the chairman of the Afghan Interim Authority (AIA) on December 22, 2001. When national elections were held in June 2004, Karzai was elected as the first president of Afghanistan. The change in government marked a revival of celebrations and religious festivities that the Taliban had forbidden.

❁ GEOGRAPHY AND CLIMATE

Afghanistan is bordered on the north by Turkmenistan, Uzbekistan, and Tajikistan; on the extreme northeast by China; on the east and south by Pakistan; and by Iran on the west. The terrain comprises mostly rugged mountains with plains in the north and southwest. The country is divided east to west by the Hindu Kush mountain range, which forms a rough border between Afghanistan and Pakistan. Damaging earthquakes occur in the Hindu Kush. In the east the mountains may reach 18,000 feet; farther west peaks rise to heights of 24,000 feet. The highest peak Tirich Mir is over 25,000 feet high. Except in the southwest most of the country is covered by high, snow-capped mountains and is traversed by deep val-

Northern Alliance

Many of the men now identified as Northern Alliance fighters began as mujahideen, the Muslim fundamentalists who fought against the Soviets after they entered Kabul at the end of 1979. This started the 10-year war between the Soviets and the mujahideen resistance, which was financed largely by the U.S. Central Intelligence Agency, Pakistan, and Saudi Arabia. Prominent among the mujahideen as an organizer and financier was a wealthy Saudi named Osama bin Laden. With the support of the American, Pakistani, and Saudi governments bin Laden funneled money, arms, and Muslim fighters from around the world into Afghanistan.

In 1989 the Soviet Union withdrew its troops but continued to support the Communist government, led by Mohammed Najibullah (1947–96), former chief of the Afghanistan secret police. Likewise, the CIA and Saudi Arabia continued to provide massive amounts of financial support for the mujahideen. After the collapse of the Soviet Union the Najibullah government was overthrown in 1992, when Abdul Rashid Dostum (b. 1954) mutinied and allied himself with Ahmed Shah Massoud (1953–2001). Together they took control of Kabul and declared the Islamic State of Afghanistan.

The Northern Alliance ruled Afghanistan for the next four years, a period marred by civil war between the Northern Alliance and Pashtun leaders, and infighting among Alliance factions. Some of the prominent members of the Alliance were Tajiks, Uzbeks, and Hazaras, ethnic minorities in Afghanistan. In 1996, the Taliban swept to power, driving the Northern Alliance into a small corner of northwest Afghanistan.

leys. The climate of the country is arid to semi-arid, with cold winters and hot summers. Afghanistan is also prone to frequent droughts and flooding.

❁ ECONOMY

Afghanistan is one of the world's poorest countries. The average life expectancy is 45–47 years; men have a slightly higher life expectancy than women. Centuries of war and the resulting political instability have ravaged the country and left it in shambles. Landlocked and poor, Afghanistan is dependent on foreign aid and has a national debt of US$8 billion, most of it owed to Russia. Agriculture accounts for 60 percent of the nation's gross domestic product (GDP) although only 12 percent of the land is arable. The major food crops are poppies, corn, rice, barley, wheat, dry fruits, nuts, and grapes. Other cash crops include tobacco, madder, castor beans, and sugar beets. Sheep farming is also extremely profitable. The major sheep exports are wool and the highly prized skins of young Karakul, a hardy breed of sheep native to Central Asia. Afghanistan is rich in natural resources. There are numerous deposits of minerals—coal, and precious and semi-precious stones—as well as natural gas. Only some of these have been explored. The country's petroleum resources have not yet been exploited. Industry, which includes small-scale production of textiles, soap, furniture, shoes, fertilizer, cement, and hand-woven carpets, accounts for only 10 percent of the country's GDP.

❁ CULTURE AND LIFESTYLE

The history of art in Afghanistan goes back to the very beginnings of the culture, although much has been destroyed by war and civil strife. Probably the most famous Afghan art is known as Gandhara, named for an area now located in northern Pakistan, where the Greek and Buddhist cultures met and flourished (250–130 B.C.E.). The monumental Buddhas in the Valley of Bamiyan were survivals of this rich interaction. Carved directly from the sandstone cliffs in which they were sheltered, the Buddhas had watched over the valley for 1,500 years, before being destroyed by the Islamist Taliban government in 2001.

Afghanistan's violent history has not been kind to its other arts either. During the 1990s, the Taliban banned instrumental music and public music making was suppressed. In spite of arrests and the destruction of instruments, Afghan musicians have sustained their art into the 21st century. Although Kabul has long been considered the cultural capital of the country, Europeans have paid more attention to the city of Herat, perhaps because its music is closely related to that of Iran.

The two forms of poetry for which Afghanistan is famous are ghazal and charbeiti; both were originally unique to the Dari language, a form of Persian, but they are now popular forms in other languages as well. The ghazal (an Arabic term that means “speaking with women”) consists of couplets, called sher, that rhyme and share a refrain, called a radif. The charbeiti is an oral form based on four lines, usually describing love, youth, and war.

Afghans celebrate holidays (especially religious ones) with their families and relatives. Holidays in post-Taliban Afghanistan are also marked by revelry and rejoicing. Men dye their beards with henna, and women adorn their hands with intricate henna designs, especially for social occasions. Houses and streets are lit up, and special foods are shared among friends and families. Children dress up in new clothes and are given gifts or cash by their elders. Oral renditions and recitations from the Koran, in praise of Allah (as well as Muhammad and Hazrat Ali), are given. The Koranic recitations take place in local dialects, as well as in the traditional Arabic.

Navruz, the Zoroastrian (Persian) New Year, remains a significant holiday in Afghanistan, where it is celebrated on the first day of the month of Fardardin, the first month of the Persian (Jalali) calendar. It is celebrated in different countries on different dates, depending on the calendar used in each country. Navruz is celebrated on March 21, the vernal equinox, in countries that follow the Gregorian calendar. The Muslim observance of El am Hejir is also

Buzkashi

Translated literally buzkashi means “goat-grabbing” or “goat-killing” and probably evolved from hunting mountain goats on horseback. According to legend, the game of buzkashi was originally played in the Oxus River Basin in Central Asia, during the time of Genghis Khan and the Mongols, with a prisoner of war, not a goat. It is the national sport of Afghanistan, a dangerous game, played fiercely and swiftly by two opposing teams of several hundred horsemen (chapan-daz) each. Both sides try to snatch the headless carcass of a goat or calf from a pit, carry it to the scoring area, and then back to the pit.

This deceptively simple task is in reality almost impossible to achieve, given the brutal nature of the game. Women are not allowed to watch. Only a few rules apply. It is an unwritten rule that no one can tie the dead goat to his saddle or try to snatch it by hitting an opponent. The use of a rope to trip an opponent is also forbidden. To most Afghan men it is a way of life, more than a mere sport. Teamwork, communication, lightning reflexes, and superb horsemanship as well as specially trained horses are essential for success in this sport.

Fun Fact

The people of Afghanistan practiced Zoroastrianism, a Persian religion, long before the advent of Islam.

celebrated around that time, but its date is set by the lunar Islamic calendar, so it falls on the first day of Muharram, the first month of the Islamic calendar.

Afghanistan Independence Day, celebrated on August 19, is also an important national holiday. Afghans celebrate this day by dressing up in colorful clothes, setting off fireworks, and participating in parades, buzkashi matches, and dances.

Afghanistan, like Iran, uses the Persian (or Jalali) calendar, a solar calendar. Although the Persian calendar is virtually unknown in the West, it is one of the most accurate calendars in use. Whereas the Gregorian calendar, introduced by Pope Gregory in 1582 C.E., errs by one day every 3,226 years, the Persian calendar requires a one-day correction only every 141,000 years. The current calendar has been used in Afghanistan since 1957, except for 1999–2002, when the Islamic calendar was used. National holidays (such as Independence Day and New Year's Day) are observed according to the solar calendar and consistently fall on the same date. However the dates of Islamic holidays and observances will usually be given according to the Islamic calendar, which is a lunar calendar. This means that Islamic holidays occur 11 or 12 days earlier each year on the Persian and Gregorian calendars than they did the previous year.

❁ CUISINE

The key ingredients of Afghani cuisine include walnuts, pine nuts, pickles, and spices. Like other facets of Afghan culture, its cooking style has been strongly influenced by the cuisines of Persia (modern Iran), India, and Mongolia. Some of the characteristic dishes include Afghan naan (a round, flat leavened bread), Kabuli palow (rice pilaf), kebabs (lamb, beef, and chicken), sambosa (crispy triangular fried pastries filled with ground beef and chickpeas), mantu (steamed dumplings with minced onion and beef), sabzi (sauté spinach flavored with onion, salt, and garlic), buranee-e-kadu (chunks of eggplant topped with creamy white yogurt and a light meat sauce made with oil, chopped onion, ground beef, and tomato purée).

❁ NAVRUZ

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: March 21

The festival of Navruz (also called Norouz, Noh Ruz, Now Roze, Persian New Year, or, in Afghanistan, Nauroz and Farmer's Day) marks the first day of spring and the beginning of the new year. This ancient celebration originated with Zoroastrianism, a religion widely practiced in the Middle East before the advent of Islam. It was probably a pastoral observance. Traditionally this is the day when farmers take their decorated cows to the nearest city for the annual agricultural fair, hoping to win a prize.

On Navruz in Afghanistan a black-faced character known as haji firuz plays the tambourine and sings, "Haji firuze, sali ye ruze" ("It is haji firuz time. It happens one day a year.") People gather around such haji firuzi figures to listen to the drums, saz (a stringed instrument), and kamancheh (bowed spike fiddle). They throw coins and paper money at the performers. In Kabul families follow a tradition of serving haft mewa (literally, "seven fruits"), a compote made up of walnuts, almonds, pistachios, dried apricots, red and green raisins, and sanjet, seeds of the mountain ash. A dessert called samanak, made of wheat and sugar, is also a favorite.

Khane tekani ("cleaning of the home"), carried out on this day, has a symbolic meaning. It shows that friends and family members are willing to entertain the spirits of their ancestors. Some Afghans believe that Ajuzak, a threatening old woman, roams the countryside on Navruz. Rain on New Year's means that Ajuzak is washing her hair, a sign that the harvest of the coming year will be a rich one.

In northern Afghanistan, a standard—jandab bala kardan—is raised at the tomb of Hazrat Ali in Mazar-I-Sharif, and thousands of people visit the shrine hoping to touch the staff in order to gain merit or, for the sick and lame, to be healed. The standard remains for 40 days and is not removed until a specific red tulip blooms.

El am Hejir is also celebrated on this day by Muslims. It is the anniversary marking Muhammad's flight (Hegira) from Mecca to Medina in 622 C.E. In addition the Bahai faithful, who number about 23,000 in Afghanistan, end a 19-day sunrise-to-sunset fast that reminds them of their spiritual nature.

❁ REMEMBRANCE DAY FOR MARTYRS AND DISABLED

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: May 4

This event commemorates the martyrs and those who were wounded in the Soviet-Afghan War, which lasted 10 years. The people of Afghanistan pay homage to soldiers who died fighting for the country, and family gatherings are held to honor loved ones who died in the war.

❁ INDEPENDENCE DAY

States-backed fighting forces ousted the USSR-backed Communist government in 1992. Subsequently the continuous civil war among various competing groups restricted the celebrations. Since the end of the Soviet occupation, however, Independence Day has once again been officially recognized. Government and business offices, as well as schools, remain closed for three days. In post-Taliban Afghanistan people celebrate this day by dressing in colorful clothes, setting off fireworks, and enjoying parades, buzkashi matches, and dances.

❁ PASHTUNISTAN DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: August 30

Pashtunistan Day is an annual reminder that the border dispute between Pakistan and Afghanistan, involving the world's largest group of tribes, some 30 million people, variously referred to as Afghans, Pashtuns, or Pakhtuns, remains unresolved in the 21st century. In the 19th century when the British ruled India, they were forced by two costly military losses to negotiate with Afghanistan. In order to placate Afghanistan the British negotiator, Sir Mortimer Durand (1850–1924), agreed to a boundary between Afghanistan and what was then British India cut through Pashtun territory. This boundary, known as the Durand Line, was in effect from 1893 to 1949 when it was declared invalid by Afghanistan. From its inception, this boundary perpetuated a region of permanent instability between eastern Afghanistan and western Pakistan.

Pashtunistan Day is celebrated every year to reaffirm the resolution adopted by Afghanistan's parliament in 1949 that it "does not recognize the Durand or any similar line." While an argument could be made that many national holidays are the result of geopolitical strife, the survival of Pashtunistan Day underscores this aspect of national celebrations.

Symbol of Freedom

During the Independence Day celebrations in 2002 a pigeon landed on the table in front of Hamid Karzai, Afghanistan's new president, and remained there until the celebrations ended, when Karzai set it free to fly again. The audience applauded this symbolic spontaneous act of their new president, underscoring Afghanistan's newfound freedom.

Religious Holidays

ASHURA

Observed by: Muslims

Observed on: First 10 days of Muharram, the first month of the Islamic calendar

In Afghanistan, Ashura, or the Mourning of Karbala, is a major festival among the Shia Muslims; they celebrate it for 10 days and, on the first day, dress in mourning and do not bathe or shave. For Sunni, however, it is a voluntary day of fasting. Ashura means “ten,” referring to the day on which it is observed. It is a day of public mourning that honors Muhammad’s grandson Hussein and other martyrs who sacrificed their lives in the Battle of Karbala. Shia Muslims consider Hussein the true successor to Muhammad. The conflict took place in what is now Iraq in 680 C.E. between Sunni and Shia Muslims. The Umayyad caliph Yazid overwhelmed Hussein and his followers. Hussein was decapitated, and his severed head was carried back to Damascus on a spear.

Ashura is the defining religious event for Shia Muslims, who strive to live and, if necessary, to die like Hussein. Shia believe that a model life can revive Islam and banish tyranny and oppression from the world.

Observed primarily on the 10th day of Muharram by Sunni, it consists of two days of fasting and prayers for forgiveness. Shia, however, end their 10-day observance with a large procession that reenacts Hussein’s funeral. Some of the Shia men flagellate or ritually cut themselves. They believe that inflicting bloody wounds on themselves will connect them with Hussein’s suffering and guarantee their salvation on the Day of Judgment.

MOULOU

Observed by: Muslims

Observed on: Twelfth of Rabbi al-Awwal, the third month of the Islamic calendar

In Afghanistan the celebration of Mouloud, the birthday of the prophet Muhammad, began in the 13th century and is now observed across the country. This date is also called Mawlid al-Nabi, Mawlid al-Nabi, Maulid-ud-nabi, or Birth of the Prophet Muhammad. Speeches on the life of Muhammad, the founder of Islam, and public feasts are typical on this day. Meetings and conferences are held in Kabul, Qandahar, and Herat to dramatize stories about the birth, preaching, and other aspects of Muhammad’s life. These stories also recall his suffering, his leadership, and his spirituality. Conservative Muslim sects, such as the Wahhabi, however, disapprove of celebrating any human, including Muhammad. They believe that such celebrations interfere with the unwavering worship of Allah (God), although other sects consider this a great holiday and celebrate it with enthusiasm.

RAMADAN

Observed by: Muslims

Observed on: First Friday of Ramadan, the ninth month of the Islamic calendar

This is one of the most important holidays for people of the Muslim faith. Ramadan (also Ramzaan) begins with the actual sighting of the new Moon. (Authorities in Saudi Arabia determine the exact moment of the official sighting.) Ramadan lasts for an entire month, and the fourth of the Five Pillars of Islam requires day-long fasts during Ramadan. Over a billion Muslims around the world dedicate their time and energy to self-expression and self-control through prayer, sacrifice, and fasting. The fast of Ramadan ends when the new Moon is again sighted, and a new lunar month begins. The end of Ramadan is marked by the holiday of Eid al-Fitr. In Afghanistan a public holiday is observed on the first Friday of the month of Ramadan.

EID AL-FITR

Observed by: Muslims

Observed on: First of Shawwal, the 10th month of the Islamic calendar

Eid al-Fitr (also Id al-Fitr), the Festival of Fast-Breaking, or the Lesser Feast, marks the end of the fasting and austerity that characterize the month of Ramadan and the beginning of a three-day feast on the first day of Shawwal. It is a day of thanksgiving for Muslims, when they must give to a special charity and ask everyone to pardon them for wrongs they may have committed during the past year. They attend a special community prayer at the masjid (mosque) in the morning and then celebrate the occasion with their families and by visiting friends and relatives. Gifts are exchanged and new clothes are worn.

EID AL-ADHA

Observed by: Muslims

Observed on: Tenth of Dhu al-Hijjah, the 12th month of the Islamic calendar

Eid al-Adha, the Feast of Sacrifice, is celebrated on the 10th day of the annual Muslim pilgrimage to Mecca (hajj). It is a three-day festival, also called Eid al-Kabir, the Great Feast. The pilgrims, having returned from Arafat (another Muslim observance associated with hajj), slaughter cows, rams, lambs, or similar animals. The sacrifice is performed in remembrance of alaibis salaam (Ibrahim's [Abraham's] act of obedience to God—his willingness to sacrifice his son). According to tradition family members consume one-third of the slaughtered animal, one-third is distributed among friends and relatives, and the rest is given to the poor. This act of giving symbolizes the willingness of Muslims to give up things important to them. On this day people also visit friends and relatives and exchange gifts.

❁ TAKHT-E-SAFAR FESTIVAL

Observed in: City of Herat
Observed by: General Public
Observed on: July–August

Takht-e-Safar (or Takhte-Safar) is one of the most beautiful gardens of Herat, located on the slopes of the majestic Parapamisos Mountains on the northern bank of the Herat River. The garden is constructed around the grave of Imam Shish Noor (a Sufi saint). A festival that begins at the end of winter, and lasts through the spring season is held here each year. Every spring the faithful gather to pay homage to the saint. People sing hymns in his memory and give alms to the poor. The entire city of Herat takes on a festive air, and musical concerts are held during the festival.

❁ RED FLOWER FESTIVAL

Observed in: Cities of Kabul and Mazar-e-Sharif
Observed on: March 21

During Navruz the Red Flower Festival is held in Mazar-e-Sharif (which means “the tomb of a noble/holy man”) to welcome and celebrate the spring season. This festival was originally celebrated by the Aryans who settled in northern Afghanistan. On the first day of spring the pastures of Afghanistan are covered with wild red tulips—which give the festival its name—as well as poppies, daisies, and violets. Against the backdrop of the Asa-Mayee and Shair Darwaza Mountains, which divide the Kabul Valley, everyone gathers to enjoy picnics and kite-flying contests. Many believers visit the shrine of Hazrat Ali, the fourth caliph of Islam, at the foot of Asa-Mayee. On the night of Navruz the Kabulis eat sabzi chalau, made with chicken, and samanak, a traditional dish made especially for the New Year that requires elaborate preparation: Two to three weeks before Navruz wheat is planted in small pots; from this wheat a sweet pudding is made on the eve of Navruz by young women. Through this observance the Afghans celebrate a good harvest and the beginning of a new year. The festival symbolizes happiness, peace, friendship, and reconciliation around the country.

Rites of Passage

❁ BIRTH

In Afghanistan, a ceremony for a newborn child is held six days after birth. Among the people of Pash-tun tribes, the birth of a male child is announced with gunshots because they consider this the birth of a new warrior. During the celebration either the religious head or an elder of the family names the child. Names usually refer to Islamic heroes. Guests and relatives offer gifts to both the child and the mother.

❁ COMING OF AGE

Circumcision (khitān) is performed on boys in Afghanistan when they have recited the entire Koran once through. As a common practice the boy undergoes the operation when he is between 10 and 12 years of age, making it a puberty rite. Circumcision separates the boy from childhood and introduces him to a new phase of his life. This is a major change of status, anxiously awaited, because the young male is increasingly aware of his own sexuality. In some cases the event is semi-public, although it is more often performed in a clinic or hospital. The occasion is marked by festivity, music, special foods, and many guests. While the actual event takes place, one may hear praise of God, partly, as some observers have suggested, to muffle the boy's cries. But the procedure is relatively safe, and those who perform it are usually trained and experienced. Circumcision is not mentioned in the Koran, but Muslims everywhere regard it as an essential ritual.

❁ MARRIAGE

There is no such thing as “dating” in Afghanistan, since the sexes are segregated at puberty. Premarital sex is strictly forbidden and, if it is discovered, the penalty for the woman is death. Marriages based on love do not occur in Afghanistan. Instead most marriages are arranged by parents and are between cousins, because marriages made within a family are thought to strengthen family ties. After the parents of both the would-be bride and would-be groom have met and come to an agreement, they ask the girl and boy if they are willing to marry each other. Usually both parties agree to the marriage, but this should not be confused with consent. Children are extremely obedient and loyal to their parents, so the idea of refusing to marry the person chosen by one's parents probably would not occur to them. And the parents on both sides expect their children to agree to the partner chosen for them.

The legal age for marriage is 18 for males and 16 for females. Men often marry in their late teens, but despite the law girls are often sold into marriage when they are still children, particularly in rural areas. Once they have agreed to marry each other the boy and girl can meet, but they do not go out on dates, and they must follow certain rules. The boy can visit the girl in her home in order to get to know more about her and her family. A month or two after the parties have agreed to the marriage, an engagement ceremony is held, either in the boy's house or in a hotel. All the relatives of both families are invited, and many foods and desserts are served. The boy's family is expected to pay for the engagement ceremony.

Traditionally Afghan girls are expected to wear a dark green dress for their engagement ceremony because the color green is believed to ensure peace and happiness in one's future life. Boys can wear whatever they want to, but it must be suitably formal attire such as a suit and tie. Usually the boy and his parents greet everyone who attends the ceremony; once all the guests have arrived the engagement ceremony begins. The boy puts the engagement ring on the third finger of the girl's left hand, and she puts a ring on the third finger of his left hand. Then both read something from the Koran. Once the rings have been exchanged and the Koran has been read from, the engagement is official.

The date for the marriage ceremony is determined by the boy and his parents, usually five or six months after the engagement occurs. While the marriage ceremony is similar to the engagement, the wedding lasts for three days, with some of the festivities being held in the bride's home and others held in the groom's. Both families can invite anyone they know to the ceremony, and they provide many different kinds of food for all the guests. For the marriage ceremony the bride wears a white dress, and the bridegroom usually wears a suit and tie. As with the engagement the groom and his parents are expected to go around and greet everyone who attends the wedding.

If possible famous Afghan singers are hired to sing at the wedding. First they sing a traditional song called "Ho-esta Boro" ("walk slowly"), and the groom and bride sit together, joined by their families. Then both the bride and the groom are given copies of the Koran, and each reads a few lines from it. Next the bride says that she accepts the groom as her husband, and the groom says that he accepts the bride as his wife, and everyone comes and offers their congratulations to the newlyweds. Once the wedding ceremony is over, the new wife goes around to everyone in her family and hugs them, and the new husband takes his wife home with him.

Divorces in Afghanistan are extremely rare but very simple: a man has only to announce his wish for a divorce publicly three times, and the marriage is ended.

❁ DEATH

In Afghanistan elderly people from neighboring villages, along with the bereaved family, gather to grieve for the dead person. Traditionally funeral rites are assigned to youngsters, while the women and elderly mourn. The dead body is positioned with the eyes closed, toes tied, and the face turned toward Kaaba (Kaaba is situated at the heart of the Holy Mosque's central courtyard in Mecca). The body is placed on a cot in the courtyard of the house, where the women encircle the body and grieve over the departed. Wailing and gesticulating wildly are considered natural ways of expressing sorrow. Even passersby may join the funeral procession to attain sawab (a pious act). When the body of the deceased is buried, the mourners offer janaza (recitation of the burial service by an imam). Mourning generally continues for a minimum of three days, but sometimes it may go on for weeks or up to 40 days. The deceased's close relatives are not allowed to marry until the first anniversary of the death is observed.

Introduction

❁ HISTORY

Throughout its history Albania has been ruled by foreign powers, beginning with the Romans, and later the Byzantine and Ottoman Empires. It did not become an independent nation until 1912, when Turkish rule ended. From 1944 to 1990, the Albanian government was completely controlled by the Communist Party, known locally as the Albanian Party of Labor (APL). In 1991 Albania began its transition to a democratic state and in 1998 it became a multiparty parliamentary republic.

Having ended 46 years of Communist rule, the transition has proven difficult as successive governments have had to deal with high unemployment, widespread corruption, an infrastructure in shambles, and powerful organized crime networks with links to high government officials. The president is the head of state and shares control of the armed forces with the prime minister. The president is elected by the People's Assembly (Kuvendi Popullor) for a five-year term and appoints the prime minister with the approval of the nominated party.

❁ GEOGRAPHY AND CLIMATE

Albania is situated on the eastern shore of the Adriatic and Ionian Seas, along the western edge of the Balkan Peninsula, with Serbia and Montenegro to the north, Macedonia to the east, and Greece to the south.

Albania is a mountainous country with 70 percent of the land lying above 1,000 feet; its lowest point (sea level) is the coast along the Adriatic Sea, while its highest point is Mount Korab (Maja e Korabit) at 6,562 feet. Rising from the coastal plains, its mountains run northwest to southeast. The coast is less mountainous and is a densely populated area. The region experiences destructive earthquakes and tsunamis along the southwestern coast, as well as floods and drought.

Albania's longest river is the Drin, which is 175 miles in length. Other major rivers are the Seman, Shkumbin, and Vjose, but they are virtually unnavigable. The rivers have cut deep gorges with vertical walls as high as 300 feet in the mountains. These deep gorges make irrigation difficult, but they are well suited for enormous dams that enable Albania to generate cheap hydroelectricity.

Fun Fact

Between the 16th and 20th centuries, Turkish and Greek Orthodox stories and myths played an important role in Albanian folklore. During this period Albania also played a role in European theater. Shakespeare set his comedy Twelfth Night in Illyria, the name by which Albania was known in earlier times. In Mozart's opera Così fan Tutti, two principal male characters, Ferrando and Guglielmo, appear as two "Albanian noblemen" involved in a clever scheme to test the love of their fiancées.

Fun Fact

Albanian is the only modern representative of a distinct branch of Indo-European languages.

Albania has a reputation as a land of great natural beauty and romantic remoteness. The country has been referred to as the "Switzerland of the Balkans" and as "the rock garden" of southeastern Europe. On the other hand the country's isolation from the world, arising generally from its rugged mountains, has also led foreigners to speak of it as the "Tibet of Europe."

ECONOMY

Compared to other European nations, Albania is quite poor, with a low-performing economy. The country has mineral resources such as chromium, copper, nickel, iron, coal, phosphates, crude oil, and natural gas. It is the world's third largest producer of chromium. Electrification of the country was completed only in the early 1970s, and within two decades Albania was exporting electricity. But the system of a collective economy that prevailed until late 1990 did not lead to economic growth. In 1992 the new government introduced a program of economic reform with an emphasis on privatizing economic sectors, and the economy rebounded in 1993–95. Between 1997 and 2000 the country achieved a 7 to 8 percent annual growth rate. Albania is increasingly active in the movement of Southwest Asian opiates, hashish, and cannabis into Europe but engages to a limited extent in the production of opium and locally grown cannabis. The government's current priorities are energy (more can be exported) and improvement of the national road network for maintaining sustained economic growth.

CULTURE AND LIFESTYLE

The official language is Albanian, a member of the Thracio-Illyrian group of languages. There are two ethnic groups in Albania—Tosks and Ghegs—identified by which dialect they speak. Most of the Tosks live south of the Shkumbin River, while most of the Ghegs live north of the river. Tosk is the official dialect of Albanian.

The traditional Albanian dress consists of colorfully embroidered shirts and dresses and, in some regions, loose-fitting pants for women. Traditional costumes are still worn in many rural and highland areas, particularly by women.

Today, traditional dances are also widely practiced in rural areas. Traditional dances in the south are accompanied by songs and music played on the flute, bagpipes, drums, and lebute. In the north the common instrument is the ciftelia, a small mandolin with a long, thin neck and two strings. Due to Islamic influences, especially in the south, men and women generally do not dance together in public. Albanian music is deeply rooted in ancient Illyria. However there is a marked difference between the northern and southern musical traditions. In the north songs are usually sung by a single individual on themes of honor, loyalty, courage, and heroic struggle against the Turks. In the south, music and songs are presented by several performers on varied themes.

In spite of the Communist government's rigorous efforts to suppress religious observance (religious leaders have estimated that 95 percent of all mosques and churches were razed or gutted during Communist rule), Albanians held onto their religious identities, marrying within their faiths and covertly observing religious holidays. Since the end of Communist rule, the practice of Islam and of Orthodox Christianity has begun to reemerge in Albania. In addition to recognizing the major Muslim and Christian holidays, the Albanian Parliament declared October 19 Mother Teresa Day in 2003. Mother Teresa (1950–97), who was born to Albanian parents, was beatified by Pope John Paul II on October 19, 2003. Albanians observe the Persian spring festival of Navruz on March 21, a remnant of the country's period under Ottoman rule. Following the dissolution of the Ottoman Empire, Albania adopted the Gregorian calendar in 1912.

CUISINE

The staples of the Albanian diet include milk, cheese, vegetables, and bread. A coarse white cheese called djathe I bardhe is common, and so is feta cheese. Eggplants, peppers, olives, tomatoes, and meat are frequently used in Albanian dishes as well.

Albanian cooking has been influenced by Turkish cuisine. Shish kebab, quoftë (meatballs), romstek (beef patties), pilaf, and faszle (white bean soup) are popular foods. Hoshaf, a dessert made of figs, is also popular. The midday meal is the main meal for Albanians, and it usually includes soup, salad, meat, and vegetables. People will normally finish the meal with fresh fruits or nuts, instead of a sweet dessert. Akullorë ("ice cream") is quite popular in the summer. Citizens of the city of Kruja like boza, a thick drink made of cornmeal, sugar, and water. A guest in an Albanian home may be offered Turkish coffee and raki, a brandy made from grapes.

Flag-raising, ceremonial parades, and official gatherings mark the day.

❁ NAVRUZ

Navruz is not a religious holiday but a celebration of the vernal equinox. It heralds the beginning of spring, the commencement of agricultural activities, and the gradual onset of warm weather. Navruz is believed to have been celebrated even in pre-Islamic times. According to scholars it originated in ancient Mesopotamia. In Babylon the New Year began with the first new Moon after the vernal equinox. Festivities lasted 12 more days, each observed with specific rites. Today this holiday is celebrated for only one day, with elaborate feasting and general rejoicing.

In Albania Navruz is celebrated on the same day as the Muslim holiday of El am Hejir.

It was scheduled to coincide with a general strike called by the American Federation of Labor in the United States to demand

The Lehute

The lehute is a stringed musical instrument resembling the Medieval and Renaissance lutes of northern Europe. It is one of the most ancient instruments still used in Albania and in some other parts of Europe. The lehute was played by ancient oral poets to call the attention of audiences to the poets' recitations.

❁ MOTHER TERESA DAY

Observed on: October 19

Mother Teresa, the founder and head of the Missionaries of Charity in Calcutta, India, who won the Nobel Prize for peace, was born to Albanian parents. On this day in 2003 the head of the world's Catholics, Pope John Paul II, formally beatified Mother Teresa. This was a major step toward formally naming her a saint of the Catholic Church. As a gesture of respect and honor to Mother Teresa the Albanian Parliament ratified this as a special day and an official holiday in Albania, where it is called Dita e Nene Terezës.

❁ INDEPENDENCE DAY

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: November 28

Four hundred years of Turkish rule over Albania ended with the early 20th-century Balkan War, after which Albania proclaimed its independence on November 28, 1912. The Republic of Albania (Republika e Shqipërisë) observes this day, called Dita e Pavarësisë in Albanian, as a national holiday.

Navruz

Navruz is a feast celebrated in the Persian and Turkish world with great enthusiasm. It marks the rebirth of nature and renewal. Navruz is a Persian word that means "new year." The holiday is observed on March 21, when day and night are equal in length. It heralds the advent of spring, after a struggle between spring, symbolic of goodness, and winter, symbolic of evil. It is a day of feasting for peace, friendship, and togetherness. Navruz is celebrated by the people living in a vast area, from the Balkans to the wall of China and up to Siberia.

✿ LIBERATION DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: November 29

Liberation Day, Dita e Clirimit in Albanian, which is similar in tone and content to Independence Day, is significant in the political history of Albania. On November 29, 1944, at the end of World War II, the Soviet Army liberated Albania from occupying German and Italian troops. This is an official holiday, and civic ceremonies such as speeches and parades are highlights. Because Independence Day occurs on the previous day, Albanians enjoy a two-day holiday.

Mother Teresa

Mother Teresa was born in August 19, 1910, in Skopje, Macedonia, as Goxhe Bojaxhiu, of Albanian parents. Her father was a well-known contractor, and her mother, a housewife. They were devoted Catholics. By the age of 12 Mother Teresa realized that her vocation was aiding the poor. She decided to become a nun and traveled to Dublin to join the Sisters of Loreto. After about a year in Ireland, she left for the Indian town of Darjeeling, where she spent 17 years teaching in a convent school. On September 10, 1946, she said that she received a calling from God "to serve Him among the poorest of the poor." She got permission to leave her order and moved to Calcutta to set up her school; in 1950 she created a religious order of nuns known as the Missionaries of Charity. Mother Teresa received the Nobel Peace Prize in 1989. Due to her declining health she stepped down as the head of the Missionaries of Charity in March 1997. She passed away on September 5 of the same year at the age of 87. Mother Teresa was beatified by the pope in 2003.

✿ EL AM HEJIR

Observed by: Muslims

Observed on: First of Muharram, the first month of the Islamic calendar

El am Hejir, also called al-Hijra, is the Islamic New Year. It is celebrated on the first day of Muharram, the first Islamic month. The Islamic calendar, based on the revolutions of the Moon, has only 354 days. On Western calendars the Islamic year loses 11 days every year. The beginning of the Islamic New Year is fairly low-key, unlike the frivolities and revelry associated with the New Year's celebrations in other countries. In Albania Muslims gather in mosques for special prayers and readings. A major activity on this occasion is the recounting of the Hegira, Muhammad's flight from Mecca to Medina in 622. On this day Muslims also reflect on the impermanence of human life and the fleeting nature of time. In Albania Navruz is celebrated on the same day.

At the end of the meal each person leaves a spoonful of food on his or her plate to show gratitude to God. Thereafter all the dinner guests stand up and swing the table back and forth while singing, "May there be plenty in this house. May the time for a wedding be near."

Fun Fact

In the mountains of Albania announcements of a death, birth, or marriage are passed from house to house by a gunshot or a shout that echoes through the mountains.

In Albania marriages are usually arranged by the boy's parents, with the help of a matchmaker, sometimes when the boy and girl are still children. The most popular time for weddings is August, when immigrants working abroad return on vacation. Engagement parties and weddings are important social events in Albania.

A wedding is an occasion for families and friends to eat and drink together, play music, tell stories, and dance, and they are typically very noisy. Every weekend wedding celebrations go on far into the night, and Sunday church services are punctuated by blowing car horns as wedding processions move down the main streets. Marriage feasts are prepared using recipes handed down from generation to generation.

At weddings, people may wear the traditional Albanian dress, which varies according to region. In the northern region women's traditional dress is a black dress and a short jacket with fringe on the shoulders. Because the color red has traditionally been believed to protect against evil influences, Albanian brides still wear a red veil occasionally. A wide apron is worn over the skirt, and black or wine-colored velvet, gold thread, or black beads decorate the outfit. Men's traditional dress includes a white kilt called a fustan. It is worn with a full-sleeved shirt and a white felt hat. A red and white scarf may be tied around the forehead.

Introduction

❁ HISTORY

Ancient peoples, including Neanderthals, inhabited North Africa for hundreds of thousands of years. The Berbers, a mixture of peoples living in North Africa, eventually became a distinctive group. They were the original inhabitants of the region in North Africa occupied by Algeria. For much of the last 3,000 years they have been under the rule of foreign powers. The Phoenicians, Romans, and Vandals preceded rule by the Byzantine and Ottoman Empires. Between 642 and 669 C.E. sporadic Arab military incursions into the Maghrib (the western Islamic world, as distinguished from the Mashriq, or eastern Islamic world, the Middle East) brought Islam to the region. Literally, the Arabic word maghrib means “the time and place of the sunset—the west.” For its Arab conquerors, the region was the “island of the west” (jazirat al maghrib), and Algeria has traditionally been included in this designation. (Other North African nations included in the Maghrib are Morocco, Tunisia, and Mauritania.)

A series of Islamic caliphates followed, beginning with the Umayyads (661–750), then the Abassids and Aghlabids (750–909), followed by the Fatimids (909–972), the Zirids (972–1148), the Hammadids (1011–1151), and the Zayyanids. Until the Ottoman Turks conquered the Maghrib in the 16th century, for 300 years the Zayyanids maintained tenuous control. These in turn were followed by a series of privateer merchant captains whose power reached its height in the 16th and early 17th centuries. These privateers, from their base in Algeria, preyed on many vessels, including those of the United States and other Western nations. France, preoccupied with the Napoleonic wars and their aftermath in the early 19th century, was not in a position to act. However in 1827, enraged by an alleged insult to the French consul by the dey (local ruler), France put in place a three-year blockade of Algiers. This incident led to a full-scale French invasion of Algeria in 1830 and the imposition of French rule, which lasted until Algeria obtained its independence in 1962.

During the colonial days discontent on the part of the Algerians led to several uprisings, the most prominent occurring in 1871. Heavy violence also broke out on Victory in Europe (V.E.) Day in 1945, in response to which the French military killed more than 1,500 Algerians and detained more than 5,400. The growing French authoritarian rule and Algerian nationalism led to the creation of the National Liberation Front (Front de Libération Nationale [FLN]) and a military network throughout Algeria, the National Liberation Army (Armée de Libération Nationale [ALN]) by Ahmed Ben Bella (b. 1916) and his colleagues in 1954. The War of Independence was launched by the FLN on November 1, 1954, and all Algerian Muslims were urged to support it. A bloody war ensued, killing as many as 30,000 Algerians and ending only when Algeria attained independence on July 5, 1962.

The French reluctantly gave the reins of Algeria to its people. The country's strategic location at the crossroads of the Mediterranean, Arab, and African worlds was the main reason for the delay in granting it freedom. After independence Algeria saw a number of regimes and military coups. Ahmed Ben Bella appointed himself the president in 1962 and was then elected as the first president of the Algerian Republic in 1963. Ben Bella formed his government from the ranks of the military and close personal and political allies, indicating that the factional infighting was far from suppressed. He drafted a constitution, steered his country toward a socialist economy, and strengthened the power of the presidency.

Ben Bella was overthrown by Houari Boumedienne (1932–78) in a bloodless coup on June 19, 1965. The latter suspended the 1963 constitution, disbanded the militia, and abolished the Political Bureau, which he considered an instrument of Ben Bella's personal rule. Eleven years after he took power, in April 1976, Boumedienne set out, in a draft document called the "National Charter," the principles on which the long-promised constitution would be based. He died on December 27, 1978, and was succeeded by Chadli Benjedid (b. 1929). Ben-did began to liberalize Algeria's economy, shifting from investment in heavy industry to concentration on agriculture and light industry. He also disbanded a number of large-sized government enterprises and state farms.

The economy suffered from high unemployment and food and housing shortages, resulting in social discontent. The unrest culminated in a series of widespread strikes in 1988. The strikes were repressed by the military with considerable force and a loss of life estimated in the hundreds. To counter this unrest and the rising appeal of the Islamists, Benjedid cut back on the reforms and encouraged private agriculture and small businesses. In 1989 the president also instituted political reforms, including a new constitution that eliminated the term socialist ushered in by Ben Bella, separated the FLN party from the state, and granted freedom of expression and association.

Algeria's repressive policies had made such a big impact on the economy that Benjedid's reforms failed to show results immediately. Moreover, the control of one party, the FLN, between 1962 and 1980 had led to an authoritarianism that was difficult to reverse and that had resulted in the rise of Islamists, particularly the Islamic Salvation Front (Front Islamique du Salut [FIS]).

In January 1992 a conservative military coup overturned four years of significant political and economic liberalization undertaken by Benjedid in the late 1980s. The coup took place only days before the second round of the first free national elections, which were likely to usher in a new government dominated by Islamists. Since then the virtual elimination of constitutional government and the resurrection of military authoritarianism have returned Algeria to the familiar situation of placing power in the hands of a small, elite group, nullifying almost all democratic freedoms and many of the free-market reforms of the preceding few years.

The Islamic insurgency saw intense fighting between 1992 and 1998, which resulted in over 100,000 deaths. Many were attributed to indiscriminate massacres of villagers by extremists. The government had gained the upper hand by the late 1990s and FIS's armed wing, the Islamic Salvation Army, disbanded in January 2000. However small numbers of armed militants persist in confronting government forces and conducting ambushes and occasional attacks on villages. The army placed Abdelaziz Bouteflika (b. 1937) in the presidency in 1999 in a fraudulent election but claimed neutrality in his 2004 landslide reelection victory.

Fun Fact

Maghrib (or Maghreb) is also the name of one of the five daily Islamic prayers, performed just after sunset. During Ramadan it signals the end of the daily fast.

Fun Fact

Frantz Fanon (1925–61), the FLN's most important theorist, provided intellectual justification for the violence required to end the French occupation of Algeria.

Berbers

North Africa served as an important route for people traveling to Europe from the Middle East. Thus, the region's inhabitants have been influenced a good deal by different cultures. The Berbers—the indigenous people of Algeria—developed out of this mix. Their language, traditions, and culture dominated most of the country until the spread of Islam and the arrival of the Arabs.

❁ GEOGRAPHY AND CLIMATE

Algeria is the 10th largest country in the world and the second largest in Africa (after the Sudan). This mineral-rich country is also one of the wealthiest in Africa. Algeria is bordered by Mauritania, Morocco, and Western Sahara on the west, the Mediterranean Sea on the north, Tunisia and Libya on the east, and Niger and Mali to the south. The nation is divided by the Atlas Mountains into a coastal lowland strip and a semiarid plateau. The Sahara, which is much larger but arid and sparsely populated, lies in the south. Algeria's highest peak, Mount Tahat (9,540 feet) is located in the Ahaggar Mountains, about 930 miles south of the capital of Algiers.

Algeria's geography ensures that its climate is also diverse. While the coastal areas are endowed with a Mediterranean climate, the southeast is semiarid, and the south is dry. Algeria's coastal areas experience mild and wet winters with hot, dry summers.

The high plateau is dry and has extremes of climate, with chilly winters and very hot summers. Summer temperatures are very high throughout the country; they can reach 130°F during the day in the Sahara. High humidity is a common phenomenon in the northern cities, which are cooled by sea breezes. The southern oases become a major tourist attraction in winter due to the pleasant weather. Nighttime temperatures drop dramatically in the desert, to below freezing in places where it had been over 100°F during the day. The temperatures between September and May in the north of the Sahara are very mild, and there is little variation between night and daytime temperatures. South of the desert, temperatures are pleasant between October and April, but there are tremendous differences between night and daytime temperatures. Coastal areas are regularly hit by sea storms. Rainfall is low throughout the country.

Fun Fact

A common feature of Algerian summers are siroccos, hot dust- or sand-laden winds.

❁ ECONOMY

The Algerian Sahara is richly endowed with natural and hydrocarbon resources. This sector, the lifeline of the economy, accounts for 60 percent of budget revenues, 30 percent of gross domestic product (GDP), and over 95 percent of export earnings. Algeria has the seventh-largest reserves of natural gas in the world and is also the second-largest gas exporter. It also has rich oil reserves.

Algeria is one of the few developing countries with iron and steel industries, as well as petrochemical, mechanical, electronic, and processing industries. Almost 80 percent of the country has electricity. Before independence, agriculture played a strong role in the economy. However, after the French left, this sector was critically handicapped by the sudden loss of skilled labor and foreign managers. Moreover, after independence, the government started focusing on the profitable hydrocarbon sector, neglecting the agriculture sector. Natural factors, such as insufficient rainfall and drought, also took their toll. Algeria today has to import food for its people. Principal food crops include grains, vegetables, and fruit; sheep and cattle are the principal livestock. Fishing also plays an important role in the economy.

❁ CULTURE AND LIFESTYLE

Islam is the dominant religion in Algeria. The number of foreigners was reduced dramatically after independence; in 2003, there were only 2,500 Christians remaining in Algeria. Nevertheless there has been tremendous Western influence on Algeria's culture and learning. Islam is a major force not only as a religion, but also in the political arena. Sunni Muslims are the largest group within the Islamic population.

Algeria is dominated by Gallic traditions as a result of more than a century of French rule. Roman, Spanish, Arab, and indigenous influences are also very much present in Algerian architecture, music, and literature. Algeria's interest in a national Arabic literature, which had been suppressed by the French during the 1950s, was raised again during the War of Independence. Even before independence, local artists and intellectuals had been striving to revive national interest in their Arab-Berber heritage. This movement has steadily gained national support since 1962. Kateb Yacine (1929–89), Mohammad Dib (1920–2003), and Malek Haddad (1927–78) are some of the noted 20th-century Algerian writers who wrote in French. French novelist Albert Camus (1913–60), famous for his existential novels including L'Étranger (The Stranger) and La Peste (The Plague), was born and educated in Algeria. Assia Djebar (b. 1936), a famous Algerian woman writer, has described the lives of women in books such as So Vast the Prison (2001) and A Sister to Scheherazade (1988).

After independence, the government established handicraft centers to encourage local artisans to use traditional methods in rug-making, pottery, jewelry, and brassware. The National Institute of Music promotes traditional music, dance, and folklore. Algeria also has a rich architectural heritage with strong Roman and Turkish influences. There are beautiful Arab mosques decorated with mosaics. The old towns and cities are full of historic buildings built around courtyards. Narrow and winding streets are a main feature in these areas, called medina, which are usually the native quarters of the city. Most Algerian houses have domes to ease the intense heat. El Oued, an oasis town, has earned the title of the “Village of a Thousand Domes” because of its many domed houses.

In Algeria local festivals and celebrations are called moussems. Moussem Taghit celebrates the harvest of dates in an oasis in western Algeria at the end of October. Similarly, there is a cherry moussem in Tlemcen during springtime and a tomato moussem in Adrar.

❁ CUISINE

Algiers and certain popular coastal towns, which are the main tourist haunts, have an array of good restaurants, serving mainly French- and Italian-style food. However the food is much spicier than their European equivalents. Even classic European dishes have a unique Algerian touch. The coastal areas boast a multitude of fish dishes. A typical Algerian three-course menu consists of a soup or salad to start, roasted meat or fish as a main course, and fresh fruit for dessert. Ubiquitous street stalls sell kebabs in French bread, topped with a spicy sauce, the local version of the hamburger. For ordinary meals, Algerians generally cook roasted meat, usually lamb, couscous (a dish of steamed semolina) with a vegetable sauce, and fresh fruit to finish.

Public/Legal Holidays

❁ NEW YEAR'S DAY

Observed on: January 1

New Year's Day is the first day of the year in the Gregorian calendar. Although Algeria is an Islamic country, and Islam follows the lunar calendar, European influence remains in the January 1 New Year's celebration. It is a public holiday with government offices, schools, and businesses closed.

❁ LABOR DAY

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: May 1

May 1 is celebrated as Labor Day to commemorate the important role played by workers in national economies. The May 1 observance of Labor Day was first decreed by the international socialist movement in 1889. The date was set to coincide with a general strike called by the American Federation of Labor (AFL) in the United States to win an eight-hour workday. Labor Day is a national holiday in Algeria, and all government, commercial, and educational institutions are closed.

Marabouts and Turuqs

A significant feature of Sufi Islam in North Africa was the cult of holy men (maraboutism). The marabouts (“dervishes”), for whom the cult was named, were believed to have baraka, or divine blessing, and they were also widely believed to be able to perform miracles.

Turuq, which are Sufi brotherhoods, have been another unique feature of Islam in North Africa since the Middle Ages. They were prevalent mainly in Algeria's rural and hilly regions. The turuq leaders were often marabouts or sheikhs. In urban areas orthodox Sunni Muslims dominated the turuqs.

❁ COMMEMORATION DAY

Observed on: June 19

Commemoration Day, also known as National Day or Historical Readjustment Day, is observed on June 19. It marks the anniversary of the day in 1965 when Colonel Houari Boumedienne came to power by overthrowing Mohammed Ben Bella in a bloodless coup d'état. Boumedienne remained Algeria's leader until his death in 1978. Algerians remember him for broadening the people's access to education, health facilities, medical care, and other services.

❁ INDEPENDENCE DAY

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: July 5

Algerians celebrate July 5 as their Independence Day to mark the day in 1962 when the country became free from French rule after a bloody seven-year war. On this day musicians in traditional dress crisscross the streets of Algiers reminding the people of their hard-earned freedom. Concerts by famous rai stars like Khaled (b. 1960), Cheb Mami (b. 1966), and Rachid Taha (b. 1958) are held on

Rai

Spanish, Moroccan, and Algerian traditional music have fused, primarily in western Algeria, to produce a new form of music called rai (pronounced “rye”). This music has traditionally been performed at festivals and weddings. Rai has become world famous and is often accompanied by modern instruments. This simple music is rhythmic, and the lyrics, in the local dialect, are often repetitive.

Fun Fact

World famous Parisian fashion designer Yves St. Laurent was born in Oran, Algeria, in 1936. He completed his education in Algeria, before moving to Paris to pursue a career in fashion.

the eve of Independence Day. Flag-raising ceremonies are also part of the day's festivities. It is a national holiday, with government offices, schools, and many businesses closed.

❁ REVOLUTION DAY

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: November 1

Algerians observe Revolution Day to mark the anniversary of the start of the country's revolution against French colonial rule. It is an official national holiday. People gather in huge crowds in Algiers, the capital, to celebrate the day, marking the founding of the National Liberation Front (Front de Libération Nationale [FLN]), and the beginning in 1954 of a War of Independence led by the FLN that ended with Algerian independence in 1962.

Religious Holidays

❁ EL AM HEJIR

Observed by: Muslims
Observed on: First of Muharram, the first month of the Islamic calendar

North Africa was completely transformed by the introduction of Islam and the Arabic language in the seventh century. The new religion and language ushered in various changes in social and economic relations. It helped the region establish links with a rich culture and also paved the way for greater political discourse and organization. From the great Berber dynasties of the Almoravids and Almohads to contemporary militants seeking a fundamentalist Islamic state, there has been a recurrent call for a return to Islam's true values and practices.

Muhammad fled from Mecca to Medina (about 200 miles north of Mecca) on the first day of the Muslim month of Muharram in 622. This is the day on which the Muslim calendar starts. It commemorates Muhammad's Hegira (migration) from persecution in Mecca and his acceptance in Medina. In Algeria, however, this holiday is more civil than religious. It is a time for good food and is also considered a good time to make important decisions.

Fun Fact

Though Algeria produces some very good wines, much of it is not served in the country. Sale of alcohol is not encouraged in this predominantly Muslim country. It is only available in the upscale restaurants and hotels and is very expensive.

❁ ASHURA

Observed by: Shia Muslims, some Sunni
Observed on: Tenth of Muharram, the first month of the Islamic calendar

Ashura is a significant holiday for Algerian Muslims. On this day Muhammad's grandson Hussein was killed in the battle of Karbala by Yazid, the Umayyad caliph. For Shia Muslims Ashura is a day of great mourning, and this strong emotion is reflected in the many rituals connected with it. The most visual Ashura ritual is self-flagellation. Men use whips, often with sharp ends, or even small knives, to make their backs bleed. The reason for this ritual is the Shia belief that only physical pain can truly reflect the pain of the Muslim world when Hussein died. Sunnis also observe Ashura but not with the same intensity as Shia. Sunni, the majority sect in Algeria, usually fast through the day, though this is not mandatory. Muslims also visit the graves of their deceased family members, and the poor are given gifts.

❁ MOULOUD

Observed by: Muslims
Observed on: Twelfth of Rabbi al-Awwal, the third month of the Islamic calendar

Mouloud (or Mawlid al-Nabi) commemorates the birth of Muhammad. This day is very important in the Islamic calendar. As strict monotheists Muslims do not consider Muhammad to be God, but rather a prophet of God. He is highly revered as the prophet of Islam who received revelations from the archangel Gabriel (Jibril). Conservative Muslims do not celebrate birthdays, even Muhammad's, because they believe it detracts from the worship of Allah. However all other Muslims enjoy the holiday. Algerians mark the day by wearing their best clothes and decorating the streets and their homes. People meet their friends and relatives and exchange sweets.

❁ EID AL-FITR

Observed by: Muslims
Observed on: First of Shawwal, the 10th month of the Islamic calendar

Eid al-Fitr, the most important Islamic holiday, marks the end of the month-long fast of Ramadan. During the month of Ramadan, all Muslims fast from dawn to dusk. During this holy month Muslims have to restrain themselves, not only from food and water during the day, but also any sexual activity or impure action.

In Algeria, Eid al-Fitr is a three-day feast. The entire community prays together and asks for forgiveness for any wrongs that they might have committed during the past year. Celebrations include giving presents to children and visiting family and friends. There are carnival-style festivities in the village squares.

❁ EID AL-ADHA

Observed by: Muslims

Observed on: Tenth to 25th days of Dhu al-Hijjah, the 12th (or pilgrimage) month of the Islamic calendar

The Islamic holiday of Eid al-Adha, the Feast of Sacrifice, commemorates the readiness of Abraham (Ibrahim) to obey Allah and sacrifice his son. The day is observed not merely to remember Abraham's supreme sacrifice, but to encourage others to emulate the virtues of generous giving and to stress the importance of making sacrifices. In Algeria, as in other Islamic countries, each family makes a sacrifice, usually a goat or a sheep. The sacrifice is made either by the town butcher or by the head of the family. The women cook the sacrificial meat, while the men go to the mosques to offer a special prayer. The sacrificial meat is then partly consumed by family and friends and partly given to the poor. This is also the time when Muslims may make a pilgrimage, called Hajj, to Mecca, in Saudi Arabia. Islam requires that Muslims make this pilgrimage at least once in their lifetime.

Muslims who cannot make the pilgrimage encourage the pilgrims by decorating the streets with colored lights and giving them carpets and kafan (shrouds), which the Muslims believe carry them from the grave to the next world. Pilgrims sacrifice a goat or a sheep at the end of their journey and shave their hair, or at least cut a lock. This time of the year is also considered an auspicious time for marriages.

Regional Holidays

❁ TAFSIT

Observed in: Tamanrasset

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: April

During the colonial era, tribal traders from Algeria, Libya, Niger, and northern Mali would meet in the Algerian town of Tamanrasset for a great festival. The principal attraction was the camel race, and each clan would contribute its best mebarist (camel rider). The festival continues but has been modernized and is now also called Tafsit, or the Festival of Spring. The festival takes place in April; its slogan is "friendship discovered." Algerians love this festival, and the different tribes exchange music, culture, and trade here. The camel race, however, remains the main attraction.

❁ SBIBA

Observed in: Djanet

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: May

Every year in May the town of Djanet celebrates the pact of peace. Sbiba (or "Peace Celebration") is a local Berber tradition. It commemorates the end of a bloody fratricidal war that took place more than a thousand years ago. Djanet is a hub for musicians and painters. During this festival, a war simulation is enacted, and men dressed as warriors perform a war dance. The women sing war songs and encourage the men. They play tambourines, and their songs pay tribute to the warriors. This reenactment of an ancient war culminates with the signing of a peace treaty.

Weddings are organized with great pomp and show in Algeria. The celebrations may last from one day to several, depending on the financial status of the family. Sometimes men and women celebrate separately. An Algerian Muslim is forbidden to marry a non-Muslim under the Islamic Sharia law. Marriages, which are mostly arranged, are primarily a contract between two families in which the elders negotiate the terms and conditions of the union.

The bride has a very important role in planning the wedding. She is the one who decides the venue of the wedding party, which is usually a big hall. According to custom the bride has to carry a lot of clothes to her husband's home, so shopping is important. Brides must also decide on the wedding day menu and select the caterers. Algerian weddings are known for their sumptuous food, which usually includes couscous, soup, and meat, often served with tomato sauce. The groom has only to buy a new suit.

The wedding celebration generally lasts two days. The bride celebrates the wedding with her family and friends on the first day. This is called the henna ceremony: Women decorate the bride's hands and feet with beautiful motifs using henna dye. At the same time some of the groom's relatives pay a visit to the bride, carrying her trousseau and other presents. They also bring with them one or more sheep, along with the necessary ingredients for a big party at the house of the bride's father. The bride's family then gives a bowl of henna to them, which is used to decorate the groom. The next day is the big day groom. The next day is the big day when the bride leaves her parental house for her new home.

In Algeria it is easy to distinguish a woman who has been betrothed from one who is married. During the engagement, the groom gives a ring of white gold; after the marriage ceremony he gives her a yellow gold ring to wear.

❁ DEATH

In Algeria's urban areas bereaved families are assisted by professional morticians in arranging funerals, which are usually held at the local mosque. The burial generally takes place in the community graveyard. Algeria has no custom of cremation, and Islamic law forbids it. In the desert region, onion-shaped mosques known as white kuppa can be seen near residential areas. In these mosques religious leaders of the Berber and Maragut are enshrined. These kuppa can be seen throughout the Maghrib countries of North Africa.

Introduction

❁ HISTORY

Not much is known of Andorra's history prior to Charlemagne (742–814), who is credited for wresting the region from the Muslims in 803. Charlemagne, king of the Franks (a Germanic tribe) and the first Holy Roman emperor, created the March states, also known as Marca Hispanica ("Spanish Mark" or "March"), as barriers against the advance of the Moors toward the French mainland. Of these Andorra is the only surviving independent nation. Charlemagne promised to reward the people of Andorra with a charter if they helped him in his fight against the Muslim Moors.

Fulfilling the promise made by Charlemagne to the people of Andorra, his son Louis the Pious (778–840) granted a charter of liberty to the Andorrans in the early 800s. In 843 Charles the Bald (840–77?) also known as Charles II, son of Louis the Pious, granted the lordship of Andorra to Sunifred (834–48), the Count of Urgell (a Spanish town, also known as Urgel). By the Act of Consecration, which dates back to 860, all the towns of Andorra came under the jurisdiction of the count. Later one of the descendants of Sunifred Ermengol IV (1052–92) passed the lordship of Andorran townships to the Diocese of Urgell, which was headed by the bishop of Urgell.

Many neighboring lords wanted to establish their rule in Andorra. The bishop of Urgell sought and secured protection against probable hostilities from a Spanish nobleman the lord of Caboet. Subsequently the French count of Foix (the county of Foix is located in the modern French département of Ariège) became the heir apparent to the property of the lord of Caboet, after marrying his daughter. However the Count of Foix began interfering in the administration of Andorra, which was legally still under the jurisdiction of the bishop of Urgell. This led to constant conflict over ownership issues, which were resolved only after the Acts of Joint Overlordship, known as the Pareatges, or Paretages (meaning "agreements signed between two parties"). These were signed between the count of Foix and the bishop of Urgell in 1278 and 1288, giving joint ownership and right of governance to both warring claimants.

For the next three centuries French and Spanish rulers exercised control over Andorra at different times. However Andorra's first constitutional documents, the Paretages, over 700 years old, are among the oldest such documents remaining in force.

Fun Fact

when the French reclaimed the region from Spanish control in 1607, under the leadership of the French monarch King Henry IV, he signed a proclamation according to which the bishop of Urgell and the French king were declared the joint rulers of Andorra.

After the French Revolution (1789–99), in a desire to eliminate all signs of absolute monarchy, the French government abolished the right of the head of state of France to exercise joint ownership of Andorra, along with feudal rights to the region. However at the behest of the people of Andorra, who feared a Spanish invasion in the absence of French rule, Napoleon reinstated the feudal rights as well as joint rule by France in 1806.

During the two world wars Andorra was neutral and thus escaped much of the brutality and destruction. However in 1933 Andorra was taken over by a Russian explorer Boris Skossyreff (1898–?), who declared war on the bishop of Urgell, with the support of some Andorrans, and declared himself King Boris I, the new king of Andorra. But his reign, which began on July 6, 1933, was brought to an end on July 14, 1933, by French military forces that reclaimed the region and restored peace in Andorra.

The feudal system in Andorra was modified in 1993 when the titular heads of state were retained, but the government was transformed into a parliamentary democracy. Andorra became a member of the United Nations in 1993 and a member of the Council of Europe in 1994.

❁ GEOGRAPHY AND CLIMATE

The tiny state of Andorra is situated on the southern slopes of the Pyrenees. It is just 16 miles from north to south and 20 miles from east to west. It shares its 78-mile border with France and Spain. Andorra la Vella, the capital, is situated in the southwest of the country at the confluence of the Gran Valira, the Valira del Oriente, and the Valira del Norte Rivers. Most of Andorra's 40 or so towns and hamlets—some with fewer than 100 people—are situated in a group of mountain valleys whose streams join to form the Gran Valira, the country's main river. The principality's highest point is Pic de Coma Pedrosa (6,562 feet), on the Spanish border in northwestern Andorra.

Fun Fact

Because Andorra was a neutral country, its people engaged in smuggling French goods to Spain during the Spanish Civil War and Spanish goods to France during World War II. Out of these endeavors Andorra's modern role as a center for duty-free shopping developed.

Andorra enjoys a temperate climate, with snowy winters and warm summers. The country's mountain peaks often remain snowcapped until July.

❁ ECONOMY

Tourism generates the economy and constitutes more than 80 percent of Andorra's gross domestic product (GDP). The duty-free policies of Andorra also boosts its tourism industry. The banking sector of Andorra, with its "tax haven" status (there is no income tax levied in the country), also contributes significantly to the economy. Little more than 2 percent of the land is arable, and agricultural production is limited to tobacco. This means that most food items must be imported.

Among the main items manufactured are cigarettes, cigars, and furniture. Timber, mineral water, lead, hydroelectric power, and iron ore are some of the other important mineral and natural resources found in Andorra. Due to lower taxes on imported items these goods are available at cheaper prices than in neighboring countries. Andorra is not a full member of the European Union (EU) but enjoys a privileged relationship with that organization. While trading in manufactured items Andorra is considered a member of the EU, but it enjoys non-EU status in trade related to agricultural products.

Andorra's population was around 6,000 until the 1950s. The population has increased but is still sparse compared to other countries. Only a quarter of the population—almost two-thirds of whom live in the capital of Andorra la Vella—are Andorran nationals. The remainder are primarily Spanish, French, and Portuguese. Catholicism is widely practiced here.

Catalan (Català), a Romance language related to Provençal, also spoken in parts of Spain, Italy, and France, is the official language of Andorra. In addition to Catalan, Andorrans commonly converse in Spanish and French.

The culture of Andorra is essentially Catalan. La sardana is a traditional Catalan dance in which performers hold hands while dancing, reminding many of similar dances in ancient Greece. Others insist that la sardana was not introduced until the 15th-century Catalan occupation of Sardinia, hence the name. Whatever its origins, la sardana emerged during the Renaixença (the 19th-century Catalan renaissance).

Andorrans are extremely fond of all varieties of music and, though very small, the country has a chamber orchestra. Every September a Festival of Classic Music is held. An annual international jazz festival, held every July in the parish of Escaldes-Engordany, is the most important musical event in Andorra and attracts renowned local performers as well as international stars like B. B. King and Miles Davis.

❁ CUISINE

Andorran cuisine is mainly Catalan, which is rich in taste and diversity, with strong French and Italian influences, such as the use of mushrooms and snails. Sauces are generally served with meat and fish. Pasta is also common. Local dishes include cunillo (rabbit cooked in tomato sauce), xai (roast lamb), trinxat (bacon, potatoes, and cabbage), and escudella (a stew of chicken, sausage, and meatballs). Whole vegetables and especially tomatoes, eggplant (aubergine), onions, and peppers are very popular. Dried beans and rice form the base for cooking during the winter. Pork is the meat used in most daily meals; lamb is usually reserved for special occasions. Herbs and spices are an integral part of Andorran cooking, with mint, anise, rosemary, saffron, cinnamon, parsley, and basil considered indispensable.

French desserts are very popular and are savored with dry fruits such as nuts, almonds, and figs. Fresh fruits such as red currants, raspberries, blackberries, oranges, and lemons are eaten abundantly. These are mainly found in the province of Lleida. Butter from the towns of La Seu d'Urgell, Sort, and Puigcerda in the Pyrenees of Catalunya is famous. A popular Andorran appetizer is pa amb tomaquet (tomato toast)—toast scraped with a garlic clove, rubbed with half a tomato, sprinkled with olive oil, and topped with sea salt. It is sometimes embellished with ham or cheese. When served in restaurants it is usually offered without charge. This is also the traditional workers' breakfast.

❁ NEW YEAR'S EVE/DAY

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: January 1

The first day of the Western Gregorian calendar January 1 is celebrated as New Year's Day. In Andorra New Year's celebrations begin on New Year's Eve. Tourism is the lifeline of the country, and hotels, as well as shopping malls, throw big parties to lure customers and revelers. Fireworks fill the night sky, while confetti and streamers add a riot of color to the snow-covered surroundings.

❁ CONSTITUTION DAY

Observed on: March 14

In 1991 Andorran leaders drafted the nation's first written constitution. It was approved by a referendum on March 14, 1993, and came into force on May 4 of that year. By authority of the constitution Andorra is a sovereign parliamentary democracy, and the head of state of France and the bishop of Urgell continue to enjoy the status of co-princes as well as heads of state. Andorrans celebrate their democracy on Constitution Day. It is a public holiday, and all administrative, educational, and commercial organizations are closed on this day.

❁ LABOR DAY

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: May 1

May 1 is celebrated as Labor Day, also known as May Day or Workers' Day, in many parts of the world. The holiday commemorates the important role played by workers in building nations and societies. While the earliest origins of May Day are ascribed to the pagan celebrations that were practiced by farmers, peasants, and villagers in Europe well into the Middle Ages, the May 1 observance of Labor Day dates back to 1890 when it was established by the Second Socialist International. In Andorra everyone has the day off, and workers assemble at factories and workplaces before participating in demonstrations and parades organized by trade unions.

❁ NATIONAL DAY

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: September 8

Since 1730 September 8 has been celebrated as Our Lady of Meritxell Day (Mare de Deu de Meritxell), in honor of the patron saint and protector of Andorra, Our Lady of Meritxell (the Virgin Mary). Although this is a public holiday it is steeped in religious tradition. On this day thousands of Andorrans flock to the church in Meritxell to pay respect to their patron saint.

It is believed that on the day of the Epiphany (January 6) in 1278, which was also celebrated as the Three Wise Men's Day, a group of residents of Meritxell were traveling to Canillo to attend Mass. However, the sight of a rosebush (or, some say, an almond tree) in full bloom in the harsh winter months took them by surprise. On further investigation they found a beautiful picture (or statue) of the Virgin Mary, took it along with them to the church at Canillo, and placed it at the altar. Miraculously the picture disappeared from the altar the next day. Initially the residents of Canillo considered this an act of theft. However a pilgrim noted that he had seen a similar picture in Meritxell. Everyone concluded that perhaps the Virgin Mary preferred to stay in the church of Encamp (Meritxell is situated in Encamp), so the picture was placed on the altar of the church of Encamp. Once again,

Fun Fact

Andorra's typically heavy snowfall lays perfect ground for a number of winter sports, most notably skiing.

however, the picture disappeared the next day and was found near the same rosebush, where it was initially found.

Honoring the desire of divinity, the residents of Meritxell built a church where the rosebush grew. Since then people visit the church at Meritxell and pay their respects to Our Lady of Meritxell.

On this holiday Andorrans attend a special Mass in the honor of Our Lady of Meritxell and make a pilgrimage to her sanctuary in Meritxell, four miles northeast of Andorra la Vella. At the end of the Mass the faithful kiss the medal on the statue of the Virgin Mary. To celebrate this day there is a spectacular display of fireworks; people eat lamb grilled on slabs of slate and dance all night long.

❁ EPIPHANY

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: January 6

The Feast of the Epiphany is a Christian feast that celebrates the arrival of the Magi (the three Wise Men, or astrologer-priests, of ancient Persia: Caspar, Balthasar, and Melchior) in Bethlehem after the birth of Jesus to see the infant, as well as the life of Jesus until his baptism in the Jordan River by John the Baptist. The feast of Epiphany is widely observed in Andorra. A special dinner that includes all kinds of delicacies is prepared on this occasion. Families enjoy a cake known as a galette des rois (“three kings cake”), which has a special ritual attached to it: A bean or charm is hidden inside the cake, and the person who finds it is given a gilt crown to wear and declared king for the day.

❁ MAUNDY THURSDAY

Observed by: Roman Catholics

Observed on: Thursday before Easter

Maundy Thursday, or Holy Thursday, is a Catholic commemoration of the day on which Jesus washed the feet of his apostles before the Last Supper. It falls on the Thursday before Easter. On Holy Thursday church bells stop ringing, and no Mass is celebrated until the proclamation of Jesus’ Resurrection on Easter. The church bells are once again rung on Easter. On this day Roman Catholics also celebrate the institution of the Holy Eucharist, the ritual Christian sacrament of taking bread and wine. Andorrans, who are all Roman Catholics, embrace the religious spirit of Holy Thursday. People throng to the churches; afterward families gather for a special supper.

❁ GOOD FRIDAY

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: Friday before Easter

The Christian festival of Good Friday falls on the Friday before Easter. According to Christian doctrine it is the day when Jesus was crucified. It has been in the Christian liturgical calendar even longer than Easter Sunday. No one is sure why it is called Good Friday. Some have suggested that the use of good in the name goes back to Old English and means “God’s” Friday, while others interpret good to mean something like “observed as holy.” This observance is also known as Black Friday and Sorrowful Friday, and in Eastern Orthodox Churches it is called Great Friday.

It is a day of mourning, fasting, and abstinence for all Catholics. Catholics are also supposed to meditate and pray between the hours of noon and three o’clock in the afternoon, because it is believed that Jesus hung on the Cross during this period.

In many parts of the world a ritual called the Stations of the Cross is performed, which is a reenactment of Jesus’ final journey. In Andorra Good Friday starts out on a solemn note. Church bells do not ring for three days (from Holy Thursday until Easter Sunday) as a sign of mourning.

❁ HOLY SATURDAY

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: Saturday before Easter

The Christian observance of Holy Saturday, Sabbatum Sanctum in Latin, commemorates the day on which Jesus’ body lay in the tomb. Catholics believe that on this day Jesus arose in spirit and rescued those who were held captive in purgatory and sent them to heaven. Holy Saturday is an important festival because it represents the end of life in one world and the beginning of the era of salvation symbolized by Jesus’ Resurrection. Andorrans observe Holy Saturday with solemnity.

❁ EASTER

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: First Sunday after Lent

The Christian festival of Easter is celebrated to mark Jesus’ rising from the dead. It falls on the first Sunday after Lent and is celebrated by Christians the world over. In Andorra the church bells that had stopped ringing on Maundy Thursday begin to ring again, telling people that Jesus has risen. Children awake on Easter Sunday to find colorfully decorated eggs scattered about their rooms. They also search for Easter eggs in the gardens.

Christians sometimes call Jesus “the Light of the World,” so candles are part of an Easter vigil and midnight services held before Easter. In Andorra the lit candles are extinguished on Good Friday to signify Jesus’ passing away. Then on Easter a special candle is lit once again to signal his Resurrection, and the candle is lit every day for the next 40 days until Ascension Day, when it is finally extinguished.

❁ EASTER MONDAY

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: First Monday after Easter

Easter Monday is an extension of the Easter festivities and is celebrated on the Monday after Easter Sunday. Andorrans celebrate Easter Monday by telling jokes, playing pranks, and feasting on lamb. People add fragrant oil or perfume to the Easter holy water they have brought home from church and then use this water to sprinkle on and bless their food, pets, gardens, and homes.

❁ ASCENSION DAY

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: Forty days after Easter

Ascension Day is a day of special celebration for Christians all over the world. It commemorates Jesus’ ascent into heaven, 40 days after his Resurrection from the dead (Easter). In Andorra the scene of the Ascension is vividly reproduced in churches by elevating the figure of Jesus above the altar through an opening in the roof of the church. In some churches the figure is made to ascend, and that of the Devil is made to descend. The day is generally meant to celebrate the completion of the work of humanity’s salvation and Jesus’ entry into heaven.

❁ PENTECOST

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: Fifty days after Easter

Pentecost takes place 50 days after Easter. The holiday celebrates the descent of the Holy Ghost on the disciples. This was considered a great miracle: Parted tongues of fire accompanied by a strong gust of wind descended on the apostles, marking them as fit preachers of the Gospel to all corners of the world.

Many scholars believe that many of the traditions and celebrations associated with this holiday were borrowed from pagan celebrations of spring in Western Europe. Homes are often decorated with green branches and flowers. In Christian tradition this is the 50th day after Easter and has been celebrated since the first century. (Pentecost in Greek means “fiftieth.”)

In many countries, including Andorra, this is a two-day holiday. Whitsunday and Whitmonday are the names used locally to celebrate the event. The name Whitsun originated in the third century C.E. and was derived from the white garments that were worn by those who were baptized during the vigil of this feast. In Andorra it is customary to blow trumpets during the worship service to recall the sound of the mighty wind that accompanied the descent of the Holy Ghost.

❁ ST. JOHN’S DAY

Observed on: June 24

This day is the feast day of St. John the Baptist, celebrated nearly six months before the birth of Jesus (December 25). Thus while John the Baptist’s feast day falls near the summer solstice, the birth of Jesus is celebrated close to the winter solstice. In Andorra huge communal bonfires are prepared in every village, and each house contributes fuel. As evening approaches the entire village assembles at the site; then an elderly man prays for a good harvest and lights the bonfire. While reciting prayers people walk clockwise around the huge bonfire. Many people dispose of broken or damaged blessed items in the bonfire, including rosaries and statues.

The festivities that follow include storytelling, dancing, playing musical instruments, and singing. Men light torches from the bonfire and walk across their fields. It is believed that this will help them protect their crops from damage and ensure a good harvest in the next year. After the bonfire has gone out people sprinkle the ashes across the four corners of their fields to bless their harvest. Single young men and women jump over the remains of the bonfire and sing and dance.

❁ ASSUMPTION

Observed on: August 15

Assumption Day commemorates Mary’s Assumption into heaven. It is an important festival for Catholics because it reaffirms their belief in Jesus, who said that all devout Christians would find a place in the glory of heaven. On Assumption Day Andorrans attend church to offer prayers to the Virgin Mary. Picnics, feasts, garden parties, excursions, and get-togethers also mark the day.

ALL SAINTS' DAY

Observed on: November 1

All Saints' Day is a Christian feast that honors all the saints (known and unknown) of Christianity. The Feast of All Saints has been celebrated on November 1 since the time of Charlemagne. King Louis the Pious declared it a Day of Obligation (a day that all devout Christians must observe) at the request of Pope Gregory IV. On All Saints' Day in Andorra, some people visit the graves of their relatives, bringing flowers and candles and spending time tidying up the gravesites. It is said that this eases the spirits of the dead, especially those who did not die in peace.

IMMACULATE CONCEPTION

Observed by: Roman Catholics
Observed on: December 8

The Immaculate Conception refers to a Roman Catholic belief that at the time of her birth Mary was protected by God from original sin and filled with his grace. It is believed that since God wanted Mary to be the mother of Jesus, she had to be free from sin of any kind. On this day devout Andorrans visit churches and offer special prayers in honor of Mary. Roses are kept at the feet of the Mother's image, and candles are lit.

Christmas Eve in Andorra

In some parts of Andorra there is a belief that on Christmas Eve the dead rise from their graves and kneel at the foot of the cemetery cross where they are awaited by a former parish priest who wears a white surplice and golden stole. The priest says the prayers for the Nativity aloud, and the departed respond reverently. Once the prayers are finished, the dead rise, look longingly at the village and the houses where they were born, and then silently return to their coffins. There is another belief that animals have the power of speech on Christmas Eve, and whatever they say is supposed to come true.

CHRISTMAS

Observed on: December 25

Christmas falls on December 25 and marks the birth of Jesus. In Andorra homes are decorated with multicolored lights and a Christmas tree. It is believed that Santa Claus brings gifts to good children on Christmas Eve (December 24). Andorrans attend Midnight Mass on Christmas Eve and then go outside to drink hot wine and eat sausages, baked ham, roast fowl, salads, fruit, pastries, and coca (a home-made cake).

The traditional Andorran Christmas feast consists of turkey and turrons, which are Christmas sweets. Turrons are like nougats and come in different flavors such as chocolate, coffee, and almond. Originally from Alicante in Spain turrons are extremely popular with Andorrans.

SANT JULIÀ DE LÒRIA

Observed in: Sant Julià de Lloria
Observed by: General Public
Observed on: July

Andorra is famous for its village festivals, held primarily during the summer months, when locals gather to enjoy music, dancing, wine, and feasts. One of the best known is the three-day festival held in Sant Julià de Lòria in July. There are cultural and sporting events, with activities for everyone. Children enjoy special competitions, games, and clowns. There are musical and street theater shows for teenagers and jazz, as well as theater, for adults.

BIRTH

Andorrans are primarily Roman Catholic. When a child is born it is baptized in the local church. Baptism is one of the seven sacraments, or essential transformative rituals, of the Catholic Church. At the time of baptism at infancy, parents choose two or three adults who will be the godparents of the child and who will take care of it, along with the biological parents, and encourage it to follow the path of Christianity. Traditionally for a male child, there are two male and one female godparent, while for a girl it is the reverse.

Before the actual ritual the priest confirms that the parents and godparents will bring up their child as a devout Catholic. The priest calls out the name of the child while tracing the Sign of the Cross on the child's forehead. After reading a short passage from the Bible, the priest prays for the child, his parents, and godparents. Then with holy oil he anoints the child and later brings the child near the altar and sprinkles water three times over the child's head.

❁ COMING OF AGE

When an Andorran reaches puberty he or she becomes a member of the local church and has to be confirmed. Confirmation is performed by a bishop, who represents the church and confirms people by laying his hands on their heads and praying for them. Before people are confirmed they usually go to confirmation classes, where they are taught about the important beliefs and practices of Christians.

The actual ritual of the sacrament of confirmation takes place during the Mass. After the priest completes the sermon he reads aloud the names of all those individuals who will be confirmed. Each individual whose name has been called goes up to the bishop. After he or she asserts a total faith in Jesus and promises to reject evil completely, the bishop lays his hands on the candidate. According to Catholic belief the hand symbolizes the strength and power of the Holy Spirit. Then the bishop calls out the confirmation name of the candidate, which can be the individual's given name or the name of a saint. Using the oil of chrism the bishop makes the Sign of the Cross on the candidate's forehead, thereby indicating that the candidate is now a child of God.

In Andorra the permissible age for marriage is 16. Andorrans may choose whether to get married in a civil ceremony or in a church. Civil marriages are conducted by the mayor in the town hall and in the presence of at least two witnesses. Andorrans who get married in a religious ceremony generally do so in the churches in which they are members. The marriage service is led by a priest who reads from the Bible. The bride, who wears a white wedding gown and a veil, is ushered into the church by her father. Only close relatives and friends attend the service, lending it an intimate tone. The bride also has bridesmaids, who are generally her sisters, cousins, or friends. The father of the bride "hands over" his daughter to her future husband. The bride and groom exchange rings as a symbol of their marriage and commitment and sign a church register along with the witnesses. The priest and family members then bless the couple. Songs are sung, and sacred passages on love and marriage are read. After the marriage service a reception is held where there is a feast organized for the guests. Friends and family members of the couple raise a toast and say a few lines in honor of the newly married couple. Gifts are generally given to the newlyweds.

❁ DEATH

According to the Christian Bible all devout Christians will find a place in the glory of heaven after they die. To prepare for the passage the dead body is cleaned, dressed, and placed in a coffin. Then the coffin is taken to the church, where a service is held in the deceased's honor. Family and friends read passages from the Bible at the funeral. The body is buried in the local cemetery, and flowers are placed at the gravesite.

Introduction

❁ HISTORY

Before the arrival of European colonists small groups of hunter-gatherers had spread over most of southern Africa for thousands of years, and they lived well in even the driest and wettest areas of the subcontinent. Some 2,000 years ago the domestication of sheep, cattle, and goats led to the emergence of nomadic herders, primarily in the wetter coastal areas and the nearby interior. These early inhabitants of the subcontinent have been known as the Khoisan people.

The European colonists who arrived during the 17th century called the herders (who referred to themselves as Khoekboen) Hottentots, and the hunter-gatherers (called Sonqua, Obiqua, or San by the Khoekhoen), Bushmen. Both of these terms at first referred to differences in their ways of life but acquired narrower racial meanings in the late 19th and early 20th centuries. Because of their pejorative uses the terms Bushmen and Hottentot have been dropped in favor of San and Khoekboen. The Khoisan people, however, were diverse, and each group had its own name and language or dialect. Despite these differences in language and ways of life, the Khoisan shared common patterns of kinship, territorial organization, rituals, and religious beliefs.

The European colonization of southern Africa between the 18th and early 20th centuries had disastrous consequences for the Khoisan population, leading to their loss of control over the natural resources crucial to an independent existence. Many Khoisan people were killed in warfare with European colonists and with other African people. An unknown number also died from imported diseases, such as smallpox. This was a common effect of colonization. The survivors were forced into colonial society at its lowest levels as domestic servants, farm laborers, and industrial workers. In the western and northwestern parts

The Slave Trade

In Angola the slave trade had a significant impact between the 15th and 19th centuries, when black natives were taken as captives and exchanged for arms, gunpowder, glassware, and shells. Because Angola's rivers—the Zaire, Kwanza, Cunene, Cubango, and Queve—flow into the Atlantic Ocean, they were used to help the captors move the slaves from the interior to the Atlantic coast. Agents known as pombeiros combed Angola's interior to find slaves. Most of the slaves were chained and had to walk long distances before they reached Luanda, the main port for slave traders during the 16th century. There they were fed and made ready to cross the Atlantic. The Atlantic crossing used to take five to eight weeks. The ships were overcrowded, and there was no proper sanitation, so many captives died on the way. As many as two million slaves were taken from Angola. In the 1830s the Portuguese appointed a new prime minister Marques de Sá da Bandeira. It was he who was responsible for abolishing the slave trade. In 1858 slavery was legally abolished in Angola.

of southern Africa, some Khoekhoen people settled around mission stations, where they managed to maintain a semi-independent pastoral existence until as late as the 1950s. By then, however, there were only a few Kalahari San groups remaining in the central areas of the subcontinent who could still depend on hunting and gathering for a livelihood.

The Portuguese influence in West Africa began in the late 15th century when King John II of Portugal (1455–95), keenly interested in finding a sea route to India around the southern tip of Africa, sent Diogo Cam (or Cão; fl. 15th century), who reached the northern part of Angola in 1482. The northern region was then ruled by King Afonso (d. 1543) of the Kongo state and Queen Nzinga (1583–1663) of the southern Mbundu kingdom of Matamba. (Her royal title in the Kimbundu language was ngola, and it was from Queen Nzinga's title that the Portuguese took the name for the colony of Angola.) Since the slave trade was a thriving business and promised great wealth, the Portuguese decided to establish their colony in the region. After building their first settlements in Luanda in 1576, the Portuguese began to exercise their control in the region.

The Catholic Portuguese brought Christian missionaries with them, and King Afonso I embraced Christianity. Queen Nzinga, in contrast, fiercely resisted the Portuguese and punished those who formed alliances with whites. The Matamba queen also understood that the practice of converting Africans to Christianity was a European psychological tactic to separate them from their culture and renounced the name given to her by the Catholic missionaries.

The Portuguese encouraged slavery in the region and profited handsomely from it. King Afonso cooperated with them, hoping that by doing so he could provide his people with the skills and education found among Europeans. But the Portuguese were insatiable in their appetite for slaves and the wealth they brought, and Afonso's efforts to end the slave trade proved futile. People from Angola were captured and forced to work as slaves in the sugar plantations in Brazil, São Tomé, and Príncipe. Between 1516 and 1539 Kongo was supplying 4,000 slaves a year to the Portuguese planters in South America, and by 1540 that number had increased to 7,000. When King Afonso died in 1543 the king of Portugal did not even notice. By 1830 Angola was deemed the largest source of slaves who were sent to Brazil and the United States.

Portugal was not without competitors for the rich potential of the region. The Dutch had South African interests and took over Luanda in 1641. While they held it for seven years the Portuguese recaptured the city in 1648 and undertook a systematic conquest of the Kongo and Ndongo states. In 1671 the Portuguese victory was complete. The British, who were also interested in the thriving slave trade of the region, refused to acknowledge the Portuguese right to Angola at first. Only after an Anglo-Portuguese Treaty was signed between the two countries in 1894 did England concede Angola to the Portuguese, and complete Portuguese control of the interior was not achieved until the beginning of the 20th century.

Until the early 20th century dictatorship and forced labor were the hallmarks of Portuguese rule in the region. After World War II the Portuguese also encouraged white migrants to settle in the region. In 1951 Portugal changed the colony into a province and called it Portuguese West Africa. This led to racial violence. Also around the same time, voices of independence were being raised in most colonies of West Africa, and the Angolans demanded their freedom from the Portuguese, who turned them down. Because Portugal continued to refuse to decolonize the region, three liberation movements emerged: the Popular Movement for the Liberation of Angola (Movimento Popular de Libertação de Angola, or MPLA), which had connections to Communist parties in Europe; the National Liberation Front of Angola (Frente Nacional de Libertação de Angola or FNLA), with links to the United States and the Mobutu government in Zaire; and the National Union for Total Independence of Angola (União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola, or UNITA). Although all these groups fought for the same goal—the independence of Angola—they differed in ideologies and were unable to manage a unified war against the Portuguese.

In 1974 after a military coup in Portugal that brought a military government to power, Angola was handed over to the coalition government formed by the MPLA, UNITA, and FNLA. But their internal conflicts plunged the nation into a civil war. The region became an international military intervention hotspot with the UNITA and FNLA backed by the armed forces of the United States, Zaire, and South Africa. Cuba, on the other hand, supplied forces in support of the MPLA and had the backing of the Soviet Union in this endeavor. By November 1975 the MPLA had crushed the UNITA and FNLA; on November 11 Angola declared its independence from Portugal, and the MPLA came to power. Agostinho Neto (1922–79) became the first president of Angola.

However the remnants of UNITA continued its fight with the MPLA, and the civil unrest in the region continued until 2002, when a cease-fire was signed between the MPLA and UNITA. In August of the same year UNITA disbanded its forces and became a democratic political party. Finally after a period of great turmoil and uncertainty, Angola found peace. However the country has a long way to go since its economy was virtually destroyed during the civil war.

❁ GEOGRAPHY AND CLIMATE

The coastal lowland, rising inland, and a high plateau form the three principal regions of Angola. The edge of the plateau region of Angola is marked by a chain of mountains. Prominent among them is Chella (5,250 feet), Tala Mugongo (4,400 feet), and Vissecua (6,500 feet). The volcanic mountain Caculo-Cabaza lies to the south of Kwanza, while Mt. Elonga (7,550 feet) and Mt. Loviti (7,780 feet) are the highest peaks in the Benguela region. The uneven topography of Angola has produced many

Ovimbundu Social Structure

In Ovimbundu society agriculture has traditionally been the main occupation, although many also work as wage earners. Until the 20th century this society was neither patriarchal nor matriarchal; while one's mother's side controlled economic matters such as property rights, the father's side controlled all political matters. But the arrival of the Europeans and their subsequent colonization of the region ensured that local political and economic controls were both taken away from the Ovimbundu. As the tribes grew in strength, the Portuguese spread them out into large villages in order to control them. Moreover the UNITA insurgency disrupted these villages, and the Ovimbundu began to flee, abandoning both their homes and work. They lost their culture and many of its traditions too. Eventually, since UNITA gained control over southeast Angola, the Ovimbundu have tried to recover and preserve some of their culture and ancestral traditions.

rapids and rainfalls. The Cuanza and Cunene are the two major rivers of the country. Angola experiences both dry and wet climates like other African regions. Heavy morning mists are the main feature of the dry season. Rainy seasons can last up to seven months (September–April) in the northern parts of Angola, while in the south the rainy season begins in November and lasts until February. July and August are the coolest months. The mean annual temperature is 72°F at São Salvador Congo, while at Caconda it is 67°F.

❁ ECONOMY

After attaining Angola's independence in 1976, the main concern of the MPLA leadership was to stabilize the economy of the country and repair the extensive damage to the infrastructure caused by the civil war. Influenced by Marxist-Leninist policies, the country survived on oil exports, although agriculture was given some prominence as well.

Agriculture is the main means of livelihood for the majority of Angolans. The two important cash crops are sugarcane and coffee. Angola also produces cassava, cotton, bananas, sisal, and tobacco. Fishing is also common. In the savanna regions, cattle, pigs, and sheep are raised. However since 1975 foodstuffs have to be imported.

The country is also rich in mineral resources and hydroelectric power. Oil is available primarily from offshore reserves and contributes 50 percent of the country's gross domestic product (GDP). Due to overspending on the military and widespread corruption, however, progress has been limited. Diamond mining is another industry that flourishes in Angola. Deposits of iron, gold, copper, and many other metals are also found here.

The country's infrastructure is badly in need of repair, its railroads and roadways damaged by the frequent civil wars. Luanda and Lobito are the chief shipping ports of Angola. An active member of the Southern African Development Community, the United States, Portugal, and Brazil are Angola's main trading partners.

❁ CULTURE AND LIFESTYLE

Angola has a rich cultural history derived from the traditions of its tribal groups. The Ovimbundu of the central highlands of Angola constitute 37 percent of the population and are the largest ethnolinguistic group. Umbundu is their mother tongue. In the past Ovimbundus played a major role as intermediaries in the slave and ivory trades and controlled the well-knit Angolan community in the 1940s. The Mbundu tribe, the second largest ethnolinguistic group (25 percent), settled just north of Ovimbundu territory. Their language is Kimbundu. Although most of the boundaries of Mbundu territory have remained fairly firm, the social and linguistic boundaries of the category have shifted. Some of the peripheral groups have been variously influenced by neighboring groups, and the groups closest to the coast have been more strongly influenced by the Portuguese than the groups living in the interior.

The Bakongo people constitute 15 percent of the total Angolan population. They speak Kikongo. Lunda-Chokwe, Nganguela, Ovambo, Nyaneka-Humbe, and Herero were the other prominent indigenous communities of Angola. Although Christianity has many adherents in Angola, Angolans also continue to observe their traditional rituals.

In the 1980s Marxist-Leninist policies influenced a large number of Angolans. Efforts made to develop a more systematic and friendly political structure by the MPLA party were based on the Soviet model, forcing many tribes to leave their tribal communities in rural areas and search for new methods of livelihood in cities. Due to this displacement, many tribal groups lost their ethnic identities.

Even with the difficult socioeconomic system in the country, people are drawn to music and art. Their traditional music influenced the popular music of modern times. Batuque—a lively type of circle dance, a mix of African and Brazilian styles—and drum music, are also extremely popular in Angola.

❁ CUISINE

The staple foods of Angola include corn, vegetables, meat, and palm oil. Funge, a cornmeal porridge, is a staple food and it is the base for many preparations. A popular Angolan recipe, called calulu, is a rich stew of okra, tomatoes, greens, garlic, and palm oil with chicken, dried beef, or fish. Chicken muamba, which contains onion, palm hash, garlic, and okra, is equally delicious. Muamba can be served with rice, funge, or palm oil beans. Piripiri, a fixture of Portuguese cuisine, originated in Angola. It is a paste of dried red chili peppers, garlic, chopped fresh parsley or cilantro, sea salt, lemon juice, and peanut or vegetable oil, and makes an excellent marinade or sauce for chicken, pork, beef, or fish.

Angola, Louisiana

Angola, Louisiana, is the Louisiana State Penitentiary, the largest prison in the United States. Located near Baton Rouge, the area was originally a slave plantation manned with slaves from Angola, Africa. The government began sending prisoners to the area in the late 1800s. Known as the "Bloodiest Prison in the South" in the 1960s, the prison became a model of prison reform in the 1970s. Today it hosts the popular Angola Prison Rodeo and its inmates produce the nation's only non-censored inmate produced magazine, The Angolite.

❁ MEMORIAL DAY

❁ LIBERATION DAY

Observed on: February 4

Liberation Day, also called the Beginning of Armed Uprising, commemorates the rebellion against Portuguese rule that paved the way for Angola's independence. It began on February 4, 1961, and was staged in a prison at Sambizanga, a Luandan suburb. Although the uprising was brutally crushed by Portuguese forces, it sparked the independence movement in Angola. Widespread demonstrations against the brutality of the Portuguese regime took the form of violent protests, and every act of suppression was countered with intensified protests. In the end the freedom fighters were successful in ousting the Portuguese from Angola, and the nation achieved complete independence on November 11, 1975.

On Liberation day Angolans remember those who fought against the military strength of Portugal and helped Angola attain its independence.

✿ PEACE DAY

Observed on: April 4

Peace Day represents the end of an era marked by internal violence, civil wars, bloodshed, and death in Angola. April 4 is the date in 2002 on which the Angolan Army signed a memorandum of understanding with UNITA, the warring dissident group, in order to end 27 years of civil war. The memorandum was the outcome of two weeks of secret meetings between the warring groups held at Luena, located southeast of Luanda, the nation's capital. The discussions were the result of a peace initiative undertaken by the army in order to unify of the country. Envoys from the United States, the United Nations, Russia, and Portugal attended.

The formal cease-fire marked an important event in Angolan history. Military leaders of both sides came together and embraced after signing the agreement. The two groups pledged to put an end to the ongoing warfare in Angola, and UNITA's army was disbanded.

Angolans pay tribute to the thousands of innocent people who were killed during the long, drawn-out war by attending solemn memorial meetings.

✿ LABOR DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: May 1

May 1 is celebrated as Labor Day or May Day by many nations because it is an occasion to honor workers and laborers for their invaluable contributions to the social and economic development and prosperity of their countries

The holiday is celebrated on May 1, because in 1889 the Second International declared this a day to recognize workers around the world. They coordinated this observance with the strike called by the U.S. labor union the American Federation of Labor (AFL) demanding an eight-hour workday.

In Angola May 1 is celebrated as Workers' Day. The government of Angola has declared the day a public holiday, so all public and private institutions are closed. Trade unions and workers' groups attend meetings and rallies.

✿ ORGANIZATION OF AFRICAN UNITY DAY

Observed by: Africans

Observed on: May 25

The Organization of African Unity (OAU) was organized in 1963. The visionary behind the group's formation was Libyan leader Muammar al-Gadhafi (b. 1942). Unhappy with the Arab world he gave up the ideology behind Arab nationalism and encouraged the formation of a union of African states.

The OAU has 63 members including Angola. It is modeled on the European Union (EU) and has many general bodies, including the Pan-African Parliament, the African Commission, the Executive Council, the Assembly, the Peace and Security Council, and the Economic Social and Cultural Council. The OAU encourages the use of African languages. Other languages used are Arabic, French, and Portuguese.

In Angola flag-raising ceremonies are held to mark the unity and solidarity of the African Union.

✿ WORLD CHILDREN'S DAY

World Children's Day is celebrated on June 5 in Angola and on different days in more than 120 nations. First observed in 1953 Children's Day recognizes the principle that children should come first. In accordance with the UN Convention on the Rights of the Child, children have been declared a national priority, and member nations are required to initiate programs to protect children and to make their education, sanitation, health, and welfare priorities.

Angola is a signatory to the United Nation Convention on the Rights of Children. Hence special welfare programs have been instituted by its government to safeguard the interests of Angolan children. In its efforts to stop child abuse in the country, Angola, along with UNICEF, has initiated stricter laws and has organized special task forces to protect Angolan children from exploitation. The government, with the help of international organizations like UNICEF, organizes seminars and conferences where child-related issues are addressed.

Official speeches and floral wreaths laid on their graves mark the National Heroes Day celebrations as all honor the nation's patriots.

❁ INDEPENDENCE DAY

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: November 11

At the time that other African nations were gaining their independence Angola was still in a state of chaos. The heads of the FNLA and MPLA parties had united in 1972 to create a council and work toward the liberation of Angola. In the same year the Portuguese government changed the status of Angola to an autonomous state, limiting its control to matters of defense and foreign relations. Elections were held in 1973. In 1974 and in 1975, however, there was a military uprising. The Portuguese government was overthrown, and Angola became a free nation.

On November 11, 1975, the nation gained its freedom from the Portuguese, and the Movimento Popular de Libertação de Angola-Partido do Trabalho (the Popular Movement for the Liberation of Angola-Labor Party, or MPLA) came to power. It declared the country independent and officially named the country the Republic of Angola.

To commemorate this, November 11 is celebrated as Independence Day.

Religious Holidays

❁ CARNIVAL

Observed by: Christians
Observed on: Last Tuesday before Lent

Carnival, also known as Mardi Gras or Shrove Tuesday, is a Christian religious festival; it is a last chance to feast and party before the austere fasting period of Lent. Mardi Gras is its French name and means "Fat Tuesday."

In Angola Carnival is a long-awaited event. The capital of Luanda comes alive at this time of the year. Traditionally processions of people wearing masks and colorful dresses, accompanied by drums and whistles, have been known to pass through the streets of Luanda. However, the civil war in Angola has devastated the country's economy, and, with inflation steadily increasing, the people are finding it difficult to pay for masks and dresses for Carnival.

❁ GOOD FRIDAY

Observed by: Christians
Observed on: Friday before Easter

Good Friday commemorates the Crucifixion of Jesus and is observed by Christians all over the world. It falls on the last Friday in Lent, the Friday before Easter.

For many years Good Friday was primarily a Catholic observance, but many Protestant Churches now hold special services from noon until three in the afternoon on this day to symbolize Jesus' last hours on the Cross. Many of the faithful fast on this day; when they eat, they generally choose fish instead of meat.

Christians in Angola attend a special service in local churches, where choirs sing devotional hymns dedicated to the glory of God. In some parts of the country, plays based on the life of Jesus are also part of the Good Friday celebrations. Good Friday (as well as Ash Wednesday) is a day of fasting for Angolan Christians.

❁ ALL SOULS' DAY

Observed by: Roman Catholics
Observed on: November 2

This is a Roman Catholic festival commemorating the dead. It is usually celebrated on November 2, unless it falls on a Sunday, in which case All Souls' Day, also known as the Day of the Dead, is celebrated on Monday in Angola. It follows All Saints' Day and shifts the focus from those in heaven to those whom Catholics believe are waiting in purgatory. Three Masses are conducted on this day: one for the celebrant, one for the departed, and one for the pope.

Angolans believe that the soul of the dead return on this day to have a meal with their family members. Candles are kept on the windowsills to help them find their way home, and an extra place is set at the table for them.

❁ CHRISTMAS

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: December 25

Christmas celebrates the birth of Jesus, whom Christians regard as God's son. Christmas Day is the most important holiday for Angolan Christians. Plans for special Christmas celebrations begin weeks in advance. People buy gifts for family and friends and organize parties on Christmas.

Christmas festivities in Angola begin on December 24, Christmas Eve, and continue until the New Year. On Christmas Eve Angolans attend evening services and share a traditional feast with family and friends afterward. Eating grapes and wishing each other a merry Christmas is a part of the festivities. Friends and family exchange gifts and attend Christmas parties. Angolans also stage plays and sing gospel songs during Christmas.

Masks have an important place in Angolan and other African cultures during Christmas. Children make various kinds of masks—sad, happy, or scary—so they can wear a different one each day. The masks are decorated with beads, tissues, and feathers. The children dramatize Christmas stories by using different masks to portray different characters. Adults too join in the fun. These celebrations last a week.

❁ LUANDA CITY DAY

Observed in: Luanda

Observed by: General public

Observed on: January 25

The capital of Angola Luanda was created on January 25, 1576. It was founded by the Portuguese, although the status of city was conferred much later. Luanda City Day commemorates the historical events that gave Angola its present-day capital. Prior to the arrival of the Portuguese, Luanda was called Loanda, which means “flat land,” and was part of the kingdom of Kongo. It was one of the first places the Portuguese settled; they renamed it São Paulo de Loanda. In 1605 the then-governor of the region Manuel Cerveira Pereira designated Luanda a city. Thus Luanda went down in history as the first city to be founded by the Europeans on the west coast of sub-Saharan Africa.

On this day the capital city is beautifully decorated, and official programs are organized in which homage is paid to the founding fathers of the region. The government also unveils its latest plans for the city's development. Traditional dances and musical performances enhance the celebration.

Rites of Passage

❁ BIRTH

The birth of a child is generally celebrated with joy in Angola. The people of the Ovimbundu tribe do not take the child outside their home for the first seven days after birth. They fear that bad luck may befall the child, because it is fragile and susceptible to evil spirits.

❁ COMING OF AGE

In Angola coming of age is celebrated with singing and dancing. During a special ceremony, birth and death are emphasized. Name changes can also happen at this time.

In ancient Angola the initiation ceremony for girls included leading a secluded life for a particular period of time. Female relatives would teach them about life as an adult and their responsibilities toward their ethnic group. Female circumcision is not practiced in Angola. The male circumcision ceremony takes place at puberty and is of great importance in Angola because the people believe that after circumcision a boy completes his transition from boyhood to manhood.

Masks play an important role in the initiation ceremonies. For example the male dancers in most tribes wear a female mask called mwana pwo, which means “young woman,” during initiation ceremonies. Also during the circumcision ceremony, men wear a polychromatic mask called a kalehwa, which means “protective spirit.”

❁ DEATH

In Angola people believe that they move on to a new dimension after death. Referred to as the “cult of ancestors,” the traditional belief is that the spirit lives on after the body is buried. Children are kept away from burial rituals. Only when their parents die are they allowed to participate.

Angolans believe that those who do not have a proper burial turn into harmful spirits and end up disturbing their own families, often causing diseases and death. Because the civil war in the country has claimed many lives and prevented many from having traditional burials, the people believe that there are many angry spirits that want to cause trouble. In order to avoid the harm such spirits can cause, Angolans perform other traditional rituals for their loved ones to pacify the ancestral spirits and protect the living from their wrath.

Introduction

❁ HISTORY

The remains of the first inhabitants, the Siboneys (or Ciboneys, called “the stone people”), were discovered at Jolly Beach, Deep Bay, and North Sound. Their shell and stone tools have been excavated as well. These hunter-gatherer-fishers settled on these islands about 2400 B.C.E. About the time the Siboneys disappeared, the Tainos, migrating north from South America (35–1100 C.E.) arrived and named the island Wadadli, a name still popularly used. Finally the Calinago arrived, also migrants from South America.

Tainos and Calinagos inhabited the islands when Christopher Columbus (1451–1506) happened upon them in 1493. He named the country after Santa Maria de la Antigua, the patron saint of Seville, Spain. The Spanish conquerors called the Calinagos Caribs, from whom the Caribbean Sea got its name. The Caribs were a disciplined and highly independent people, far from the “savages” described by the conquistadores, and they fiercely resisted the European invaders. Spanish and French settlements did not fare well because of the resistance of the Caribs and the lack of fresh water, still a problem on the islands in the 21st century. In 1632 English settlers arrived from St. Kitts to settle in Antigua. Other English arrivals established a settlement in Barbuda in 1666. There was a short-lived French annexation of the islands in 1667.

In 1684 Sir Christopher Codrington (d. 1710) landed in Antigua and was the first to cultivate sugarcane there. Sir Christopher and his brother had leased land in Barbuda from Britain from 1685 to 1870 and paid a rent of “one fat pig” a year. They set about growing agricultural produce using enslaved natives. Sugarcane proved a lucrative product, and by the mid-18th century there were numerous large sugar plantations, each with its own cane-processing windmill. A total of 150 windmills dotted the island.

By the end of the 18th century Antigua had become an important strategic port as well as a valuable commercial colony. Known as the “gateway to the Caribbean,” its location offered control over the major sailing routes to and from the region’s rich island colonies. Slaves were brought in from Africa as well as other Caribbean islands to work on the sugar plantations in Antigua. When Great Britain’s Emancipation Act of 1834 abolished slavery, Antigua and Barbuda was the only country exempted from the apprenticeship clause that, in other countries, bound the freed slaves to their former masters for four additional years before they were truly emancipated.

The trade union movement of the 1940s, led by V. C. Bird (d. 1999), proved an important step toward independence. In 1967 Antigua became an Associated State of the Commonwealth, with Barbuda and Redonda as dependencies. Antigua achieved independence on November 1, 1981, again with the two smaller islands as dependencies of Antigua. There was opposition in Barbuda, however, to this status.

❁ GEOGRAPHY AND CLIMATE

The country of Antigua and Barbuda consists of three islands, bounded on the west by the Caribbean Sea and on the east by the North Atlantic Ocean. St. John’s, the capital, is on Antigua, the largest and the most populated of the three. Barbuda, the other main island, is located 25 miles north of Antigua. Lying southwest of Antigua is the uninhabited, tiny island of Redonda. Redonda is a dependency of Antigua and Barbuda, but it is also a micronation called the Kingdom of Redonda.

Antigua and Barbuda is part of the Leeward Islands in the Lesser Antilles archipelago and has a tropical climate with relatively constant temperatures and sunshine throughout the year. The land is primarily low-lying limestone and coral islands, with some higher volcanic areas. Antigua has an uneven shoreline that provides many natural harbors and beaches. Barbuda has a large harbor on its western (Caribbean) coast. The natural beauty of the islands makes this a popular tourist destination, but the country is also prone to drought. Antigua and Barbuda, because of its location, is also vulnerable to hurricanes between July and October.

Nelson and Antigua

In 1784 the English naval hero Lord Horatio Nelson (1758–1805), came to Antigua to develop the naval facilities at English Harbor and to impose strict shipping laws. Nelson’s Dockyard was the result of this endeavor, but his stern attitude earned him no admiration. The future King William IV (1765–1830) was serving under Nelson at the time, and it was during his reign that slavery was abolished.

❁ ECONOMY

Tourism is Antigua and Barbuda’s major industry. Both islands are known for their pink and white sands, palm trees, and coral reefs. Antigua has 365 beaches or, as Antiguanians like to say it, one beach for each day of the year. One hundred sugarcane-processing windmill towers remain in Antigua, and visitors through Betty’s Hope, Antigua’s first sugar plantation, for its completely restored sugar mill. The waters around Barbuda boast the remains of interesting shipwrecks, and the island’s fauna, particularly the beautiful fallow deer and a large population of frigate birds (Fregata magnificens) draw naturalists from around the world. The Bird Sanctuary is home to more than 170 species, and tourists can visit numerous historical landmarks.

❁ CULTURE AND LIFESTYLE

Most Antiguanians are descendants of slaves, and they retain many West Indian traditions, including a love of calypso and reggae music. This permeates not just the celebrations but also everyday life. Festivals and religious holidays (both Protestant and Catholic) are known for their exuberance. These celebrations, which sometimes continue for weeks or even a full month, include beauty pageants, masquerades (parades of people in masks and costumes) and dancing in the streets to calypso, as well as cricket and other sports competitions.

Antiguanians are also passionate cricket fans. Cricket season lasts from January to July, and the country has given the West Indies team four of its greatest players: Andy Roberts, the bowler, (b. 1951); Ritchie Richardson, batsman (b. 1962); Curtley Ambrose, bowler (b. 1963); and Vivian Richards, batsman (b. 1952).

❁ CUISINE

The cooking of Antigua and Barbuda reflects its diverse history. Seafood of all kinds is readily available, always fresh, and figures prominently in many local dishes, such as conch fritters. A variety of fresh fruits, including bananas, coconut, pineapple, papaya, and mango, are also very popular as snacks or refreshing juice drinks. In addition to being eaten raw at any time of the day, fruits are versatile and turn up in such dishes as papaya pie. The national dish of Antigua and Barbuda is called fungi and pepper pot, a thick stew made with squash, okra, aubergine (eggplant), spinach, and pumpkin, served with salted meats and cornmeal dumplings. Fungi (pronounced “funjee”), an African dish, is a cornmeal and okra preparation. The hot sauces, lobster and pumpkin soup, and fish varieties that include porgy, parrotfish, and snapper are typical Caribbean fare. Rum is the local drink of choice. It can be drunk neat (straight, or unmixed) although it is perhaps more refreshing served with fruit in cocktails and punches.

❁ LABOR DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: May 1

Labor Day is celebrated in many countries of the world as a tribute to workers. Most countries observe Labor Day, also known as May Day or Worker's Day, on May 1, but some countries, like the United States, Canada, Puerto Rico, and the Virgin Islands celebrate Labor Day on the first Monday in September. The May 1 observance of Labor Day has its origins in the international socialist movement.

The first International Labor Day was called by the Second International in 1889 to coincide with an American Federation of Labor general strike in the United States to demand the eight-hour workday. Thereafter International Labor Day became and remained more radical than the U.S. version observed in September.

In Antigua and Barbuda government offices, business establishments, and schools remain closed. People assemble in large numbers to commemorate Labor Day by participating in public meetings and lectures on labor and social issues.

CARICOM Day commemorates the institution of the Caribbean Community and Common Market (CARICOM) on August 1, 1973, under the Treaty of Chaguaramas. The purpose was for the countries of the Caribbean to band together on development issues and improve the lives of the people in the region. The first four signatories were Jamaica, Barbados, Guyana, and Trinidad and Tobago. Currently there are fifteen members and five associate members. The treaty was revised in 2001 and created the CARICOM Single Market and Economy (CSME). Although many CARICOM nations observe this holiday on the first Monday of July, the date varies.

Antigua and Barbuda joined CARICOM on July 4, 1974. In Antigua official gatherings and political meetings are convened for discussions, presentations, and analyses of the development efforts and future plans of member countries.

❁ CARNIVAL

Observed on: July/August

Carnival is one of the biggest annual festivals in Antigua and Barbuda, where it has been celebrated for the last 40 years. In contrast to many other countries where Carnival is a pre-Lenten holiday, in Antigua and Barbados, it commemorates Britain's Emancipation Act of 1834, which freed approximately 670,000 slaves in the West Indies. This is the only country where the four-year mandatory apprenticeship of former slaves was not imposed. In other countries they had to continue to work for their former masters despite their official freedom.

This is a 10-day event that takes place in late July and culminates in a parade on the first Tuesday of August. Concerts, food fairs, parades, and other cultural shows are organized throughout the islands, but the most spirited celebrations take place in the capital city. The Antigua Recreation Ground in St. John's is the venue for this extravaganza. These grounds are tended by staff provided by the local prison, and two of the viewing stands are named for the legendary cricket players Vivian Richards and Andy Roberts.

Calypso, soca, reggae, and steel bands make this a rich musical experience. There are masquerades (parades in which people wear special masks and costumes) as well. The main events are the Parade of Costumed Bands, Miss Antigua Pageant, Caribbean Queen, Calypso Monarch, and Party Monarch.

Reggae, Soca, Calypso, and the Steel Bands

Reggae is of Jamaican origin and was created by Jackie Mittoo (1948–1990) in 1963. He was asked by Coxson Dodd (1932–2004), a well-known Jamaican record producer, to compose original music, and Mittoo did so by building on the traditions of ska (Jamaican music, which originated in the 1950s). Reggae is characterized by the chops on the backbeat; the rhythm guitarist is vital to this music. The music associated with Bob Marley (1945–1981) is known as “roots reggae,” a spiritual type of reggae. Soca is a blend of slower soul music beats and the quick rhythms of calypso. It was introduced in the 1970s and became an essential part of Carnival within a decade. Calypso was originally a means of communication between the slaves working the fields, because they were not allowed to speak to one another while working. The soloist (calypsonian) is the main artist who has to combine the different sounds of different cultures (tribes) into one lyrical piece. The first percussion instruments were made of bamboo. These were replaced by steel pans cut from oil drums. The steel pan originated in Trinidad, but the steel band was an indigenous effort, inspired by the iron bands that played at Christmas. Antigua is known for having the best steel bands of the Caribbean.

Parade begins at 8:00 A.M. on November 1 and proceeds down Independence Drive in Antigua. This is followed by the Independence Banquet at 8 P.M. The Independence Day Parade in Barbuda is followed by the Grand Picnic at Martello Tower beach.

Celebrations on both islands commence two weeks before the actual day of independence. People start decorating homes, businesses, and government buildings for the best-decorated competitions. Cricket matches, dance festivals, youth rallies, arts and craft exhibitions, food fairs, and kite-flying contests are some of the events that make up the celebrations. On both islands, apart from other activities, there is National Clean-Up Day, about a week before Independence Day.

GOOD FRIDAY

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: Friday before Easter

Good Friday commemorates Jesus' Crucifixion. The day is sometimes known as Holy Friday or Mourning Friday, and became an important Christian holiday in the fourth century. (Epiphany was the major festival celebrated before this.) Good Friday has been in the Christian liturgical calendar even longer than Easter has, although no one is sure why it is called Good Friday. Some have suggested that the use of good in the name goes back to Old English and means “God’s Friday, while others interpret good to mean something like “observed as holy.” This observance is also known as Black Friday or Sorrowful Friday, and in Eastern Orthodox Churches it is called Great Friday.

For many years Good Friday was primarily a Catholic observance, but many Protestant Churches now hold special services from noon until three in the afternoon on this day to symbolize Jesus' last hours on the Cross. Many of the faithful fast on this day; when they eat, it is generally fish instead of meat. Church services follow tradition: The evening service, known as Tenebrae (meaning “darkness” or “shadows”), is marked by a darkening of the premises as candles are put out and lights dimmed. During the day there are processions in which thousands of people take to the streets carrying colorful flowers and sawdust to be thrown on the penitents carrying the cross. There are readings from the Gospels and the Psalms. Hymns on the life and deeds of Jesus are also sung.

EASTER MONDAY

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: First Monday after Easter

Easter Monday is the first day of Bright Week or Easter Week, and it is regarded by many as a continuation of Easter Sunday. The day was once part of weeklong celebrations, but in the 19th century it was changed to a one-day holiday.

Egg-rolling competitions are the traditional way of celebrating, as is dousing with perfumed holy water. This holy water is given to worshippers on Easter for use at home, and people add perfume to it. Easter Monday is also a day for playing pranks and telling jokes.

✿ PENTECOST

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: Fifty days after Easter

Pentecost takes place 50 days after Easter. The holiday celebrates the descent of the Holy Ghost on the disciples. This was considered a great miracle: Parted tongues of fire accompanied by a strong gust of wind descended on the apostles, marking them as fit preachers of the Gospel to all corners of the world.

Many scholars believe that many of the traditions and celebrations associated with this holiday were borrowed from pagan celebrations of spring in Western Europe. Homes are often decorated with green branches and flowers. In Christian tradition this is the 50th day after Easter and has been celebrated since the first century. (Pentecost in Greek means “the fiftieth day.”)

In many countries, including Antigua and Barbuda, this is a two-day holiday. It is referred to locally as Whitsunday and Whitmonday, names that have been used to celebrate this holiday since the third century C.E. The name “Whitsun” was derived from the white garments that were worn by those who were baptized during the vigil of this feast. It is customary here for the devout to attend church services on Whitmonday. The Antigua Christian Council organizes cultural and religious events to promote mutual understanding and tolerance among different Christian denominations.

✿ CHRISTMAS

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: December 24–25

Christmas is a major Christian holiday, marking the birth of Jesus. The earliest celebrations of Jesus’ birth were in Alexandria, Egypt, in the second century, and they took place on May 20. Before Christmas was established, most countries observed Epiphany and Jesus’ birth on January 6. December festivities were established in the church by the fifth century.

In earlier times a day was considered from sunset to sunset, and any festival began on the evening of what we now understand to be the previous day. Christmas began on the evening of December 24.

In Antigua and Barbuda families attend Christmas Eve services. Christmas is celebrated with traditional dinners and public feasts hosted by the church and by individuals and families. People decorate their houses with Christmas trees and exchange gifts and cards. There are many activities to look forward to: musical performances, comedy acts by children, visits to wine cellars, wine tastings, and lavish parties.

There is also a Christmas Day Champagne Party at Nelson’s Dockyard on the island of Antigua. This festivity begins at noon, when people start arriving, and continues late into the night. A steel band performs and the champagne, kept in large ice-filled containers, is available at a reasonable price.

✿ BOXING DAY

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: December 26

Boxing Day, also called St. Stephen’s Day, is an old custom with its roots in the Middle Ages, when wealthy estate owners in England gave gift boxes to their employees on the day after Christmas. In addition, the church opened its charity boxes on this day, and ships setting out on long journeys carried a charity box to be filled with donations for the church. The sailors believed this would ensure a safe journey. St. Stephen was the first Christian martyr, and Christians honor his memory by collecting for the poor in charity boxes and donating the funds.

In Antigua and Barbuda the day is one of giving gifts and money to the poor and needy. Families and friends gather at the public performances of folk dances and music programs performed by local talent. Regional cuisine is an integral part of these events.

This is an event of international standing. It features Jamaican reggae, Brazilian samba, and African djembe rhythms, along with Latin salsa and Haitian zouk. Thousands of brilliantly costumed masqueraders (people in masks and elaborate costumes) and dozens of trucks carrying soca, calypso, steel pan, reggae, and salsa artists jam the roads to the delight of hundreds of thousands of onlookers.

Other keynote events include the King and Queen of the Bands Competition and the two-day Olympic Island Caribbean Arts Festival. Outdoor concerts of Caribbean music, Calypso Harbor cruise parties, and glamorous dance parties are held throughout the month.

✿ MARRIAGE

A traditional Antiguan wedding is marked with several parties held before and after the wedding ceremony. Customarily once the groom chooses his bride-to-be, he writes a letter to her parents declaring his love and seeking their permission for the marriage. Once parental consent has been received from both sets of parents, the engagement begins. This is the official courtship period and typically lasts four to six months. During this time both families prepare for the wedding.

As a part of the wedding ceremony several animals, such as pigs, sheep, and chickens are slaughtered as offerings to God. The Ground Wetting ceremony is performed—wine or wine and water is poured on the ground as a thanksgiving gesture to God and as an invitation to dead ancestors. This rite is accompanied by prayers prior to the slaughtering of the animals. Once the wedding ceremony is solemnized at the church, a reception party is held at the bride’s residence, where the food to be served at the wedding feast is usually cooked. The reception is followed by a big drum dance. A party known as “return thanks” is held two weeks later for close relatives and friends who attended the wedding.

✿ DEATH

Family and community members hold a wake after a death. Funeral observances continue for several days, often with hundreds of visitors. Several prayer nights or prayer meetings are observed for the deceased on the third, ninth, and 40th nights following the death. The big drum dance is performed on either the ninth or the 40th night after death.

The first death anniversary for Catholics is marked by a Mass in the morning, followed by refreshments and snacks. In the evening a table is set—it is laid before 6 P.M. and cleared before 6 A.M.—covered with linen and filled with a variety of foods for the ancestors. Neighborhood children are invited to partake of this meal.

Big Drum Dance

The term big drum has nothing to do with the size of any drum. It refers to a large communal gathering of different tribes that come together for a social reason, whether a wedding or show of respect for the ancestors. The tribes were originally West African, and the songs and dances derive from their traditions. The songs are mainly in a patois, interspersed with many ancient words related to African spiritual beliefs, spirits, or ancestors.

Such a gathering and dance is also known as gwa tambu. A big drum dance begins with the soloist (the chantwell, who formerly used calypso to tell a story), who opens with a musical statement that is then repeated. The chorus joins in for a call-and-response. As the chorus continues, the two brass drums (boulas) enter to play a nation theme (of any one tribe), and the solo drum (kata) enters soon after with a quicker tempo. This is followed by the dancers whose movements complement the drum beats. It is the flourish and color of the dance, together with the drumbeats, that give this ceremony its distinctive nature.

Introduction

❁ HISTORY

The oldest remains of human settlement in Argentina, found in the Piedra Museo settlement in Santa Cruz province, date back 13,000 years. The Los Toldos settlement, situated 62 miles north of Piedra Museo, is at least 12,000 years old. Archaeological evidence suggests that these early people were nomadic hunter-gatherers.

At the beginning of the 16th century at the time of the arrival of the Spanish, Argentina was home to various indigenous groups including the Tehuelches, Araucanians, Rehuelches, Guaranis, Rampas, Matacos, Guaycures, Charruas, Huerpes, Diaguitas, and Mapuches. The Diaguitas and Guaranis were primarily farmers, engaged in the cultivation of maize. The Diaguitas were also excellent fighters and had successfully defended themselves against Incan incursions. In 1516, the Spanish navigator Juan de Solís (1470–1516) sailed up the Río de la Plata (which he named; “river of silver”) and went ashore but was allegedly killed by Charrua or Guarani warriors. (Some, however, believe this story was made up to hide the fact that he was killed in a mutiny.)

In 1527 rivals Sebastian Cabot (1476?–1557) and Diego García sailed into the Plata estuary and established a settlement. Apparently this too was wiped out by the local populace. Finally in 1536 Pedro de Mendoza (1487–1537) led a well-equipped force and succeeded in setting up a lasting settlement, which later became Buenos Aires, the capital city. Many expeditions were launched from this settlement, and gradually the entire area came under Spanish rule. This was formalized in 1776 with the creation of the Viceroyalty of Río de la Plata. The viceroyalty had its capital at Buenos Aires and covered what is today Chile, Paraguay, Argentina, Uruguay, and part of Bolivia.

On May 25, 1810, a segment of the population started a revolution against Spanish rule and drove out the viceroy, but the struggle dragged on until 1816. On July 9, 1816, representatives from various provinces met at the city of Tucumán and declared independence from Spain. Subsequently, however, the new nation had to contend with internal power struggles, which culminated in civil war in 1819 between the Unitarists (known as Azules, “Blues”) and the Federalists. Eventually, the Uni-

Unitarists and Federalists

Seething regional disparities, which Spanish rule had obscured, became vividly apparent once independence was achieved. The early years after independence in Argentina were marked by a bitter struggle between two political groups—the Unitarists and the Federalists. The Unitarists wanted a strong central government, while the Federalists wanted local control. The Federalists of the interior (conservative landowners, supported by the gauchos and the rural working class) advocated provincial autonomy, while the Unitarists of Buenos Aires (cosmopolitan city dwellers who welcomed the infusion of European capital, immigrants, and ideas) upheld Buenos Aires's central authority.

But a country as vast as Argentina could not be ruled easily from Buenos Aires, and a civil war broke out between the Unitarists and Federalists. This led to the installation of the country's first dictator Juan Manuel de Rosas, a Federalist who ruled from 1829 c.e. until he was ousted in 1852. The Unitarists instituted a liberal constitution in 1853 and encouraged trade, so that prosperity grew during the following decades.

Initially this resulted in some prosperity, but a combination of factors, including excessive foreign interference in commerce and industry, weakened both the economy and the government. This continued until 1943, when a series of upheavals, including a military coup, culminated in Juan Perón (1895–1974) taking over as virtual dictator in 1946.

Perón ruled until 1955, initiating a series of economic measures to boost self-reliance and domestic production. He was deposed in a military coup, which marked the beginning of a 30-year period of almost uninterrupted, and uniformly disastrous, army rule. Perón returned to power in 1973 and died in office in 1974, after which his third wife Isabel, took over. The fall of Isabel's government in 1976 ushered in another period of military rule.

Argentina's spell under martial rule was finally broken in 1983. The previous year General Galtieri (1926–2003) had attempted to divert attention from his inept governance by invading the Falkland Islands in 1982. (Known in the Spanish-speaking world as Islas Malvinas, these islands had been held by Britain.) The resulting military debacle merely sealed Galtieri's fate. Galtieri was succeeded in office by President Carlos Menem (b. 1930), who instituted a series of wide-ranging economic reforms, selling off state-owned industries, and opening up the economy to foreign investors. These measures helped curb inflation but also brought in their wake rising unemployment and recession.

Menem was replaced in 1999 by a center-left alliance led by Fernando de la Rúa (b. 1937). The recession only intensified, however, and Argentina defaulted on a series of international debt repayments. Following a brief interval with Eduardo Duhalde (b. 1941) at the helm, Nestor Kirchner (b. 1950) took over as president in 2003. To his credit, he managed to stabilize the economy to a degree not thought possible.

ECONOMY

Argentina's inherent economic strengths are many. It has a literate workforce, abundant natural resources, and a well-developed industrial sector. Its agricultural economy is forward-thinking and export oriented. Its major agricultural exports include soybeans, peanuts, grapes, sunflower seeds, corn, tobacco, wheat, and livestock. Its industrial exports include motor vehicles, textiles, chemicals, steel, petrochemicals, and consumer durables. Its chief imports include machinery, motor vehicles, chemicals, and plastics. In the last few years, Argentina has posted growth rates of about 11 percent per year. Nevertheless, poverty remains a problem, and large international debts have undermined investor confidence.

CULTURE AND LIFESTYLE

From the time of the Spanish invasion Argentina's economy and culture have been divided among various immigrant groups, mainly European in origin. For instance the Basque and Irish communities controlled sheep-rearing; farming was a mainstay of the Germans and Italians; and the emigrant British population played a crucial role in the development of the nation's infrastructure.

Indigenous groups became marginalized a long time ago and remain so today. The main indigenous peoples include the Quechua of the northwest, the Mapuche of Patagonia, and the Matacos and the Tobas of the northeastern regions. Argentina also has strong Jewish and Anglo-Argentinean communities, as well as small groups of Japanese, Chileans, Bolivians, and Paraguayans.

Almost 90 percent of the population lives in urban areas, with Buenos Aires alone accounting for more than one-third of the population. Spanish is the official language and, as such, is widely spoken, but many indigenous and immigrant groups take

Both the music and dance grew out of the brothels of Buenos Aires and were initially disparaged as vulgar. Today tango music and dance are inextricably associated with Argentina and are enjoyed throughout the world.

❁ CUISINE

Argentinean beef is famous the world over. Asado, different cuts of meat grilled or cooked on an open fire, is Argentina's version of barbecue and it is a traditional dish. People who have grills may prepare asado at least once a week. A meal of grilled meat, called parrillada (parilla means "grill"), may consist of steak, sausages, pork, lamb, goat meat, and various organs, which are served first. Often, meat is seasoned only with salt before grilling, but it is also marinated or served with a sauce called chimichurri, made of chopped parsley, garlic, salt, oregano, pepper, and chili, combined with oil. Italian food is also popular, and pasta and pizza are favorite street foods.

Indigenous food cultures, dating back to pre-Columbian times, remain in provincial areas. Maize, beans, gourds, and pumpkin are popularly eaten here. Locro is a labor-intensive stew made out of beef, beans, pumpkin, sweet potato, and pork.

Argentina grows fine coffee and also some tea; both are important elements of the nation's lifestyle. Mate is a tea-like drink made from yerba, the leaves of an evergreen tree. Wine and beer are also extremely popular in Argentina, and the country produces some of the finest wines in the world.

❁ NEW YEAR'S EVE/DAY

Observed on: December 31–January 1

New Year's Eve celebrations in Argentina begin in earnest on the evening of December 31 after sundown. For the people of Argentina the New Year (Año Nuevo in Spanish) is an exuberant occasion with music, dancing, and street processions. Spectacular fireworks displays are customary, especially just after the clock strikes midnight. In addition, people customarily make resolutions to become better in the coming year than they were in the preceding year. Food and drink figure prominently in the celebrations. Two sweets traditionally associated with the occasion are pan dulce (sweet bread) and turrón (nougat made of almonds, honey, sugar, and egg yolks).

❁ MALVINAS DAY

Observed on: April 1

Las Islas Malvinas, known to the English-speaking world as the Falkland Islands, are a group of islands in the South Atlantic Ocean, situated to the east of the southern coast of Argentina. Discovered in 1592 by an English navigator, they have traditionally been a source of conflict. First the French established a settlement in 1764; then they turned over the islands to Spain two years later. This sparked a dispute between Britain and Spain. Then in 1833, Britain laid claim to the islands and established a naval garrison, provoking a dispute with Argentina.

On April 2, 1982, General Galtieri, head of Argentina's military government, mounted a surprise invasion of the Falklands. Initially, he was successful, but after seven weeks of fierce fighting, the Argentine forces were repulsed by the British, and the islands returned to British rule.

Even though Galtieri was deposed for his incompetence, and a civilian government took over in 1983, Argentineans still officially recognize the invasion of the islands as Malvinas Day. The occasion is also celebrated as Veterans Day or Memorial Day, and the country recognizes those who fought and died in the battle for the islands. Veterans of other wars and old soldiers are also honored.

❁ REVOLUTION DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: May 25

Until 1810 Argentina, like much of South America, was a Spanish colony. In the early 1800s, Napoleon Bonaparte (1769–1821) defeated and imprisoned the Spanish king. This sparked revolutions all over South America, and Argentina was no exception. On May 25, 1810, the criollos (indigenous residents) rejected the authority of the Virreinato del Río de la Plata (Spanish viceroy) and began their struggle for independence. This uprising is known as the Revolución de Mayo (“May Revolution”), and the Plaza de Mayo in Buenos Aires was named for this event.

Like other days commemorating Argentina’s struggle against colonial forces, this day is an occasion for celebration. Pageants and processions abound, as do music and dancing, and the cathedral in Buenos Aires holds special religious services.

❁ FLAG DAY

Observed on: June 20

Manuel Belgrano (1770–1820) was a key figure in Argentina’s struggle for freedom. Born in Buenos Aires, he studied in Spain and became a lawyer. After practicing law for several years, he returned to Argentina and joined its freedom struggle. One of his most significant contributions to the movement was the Argentinean flag, which he designed and which was officially adopted on February 12, 1812. Belgrano chose a design that would represent white clouds parting to reveal the blue sky, since he apparently observed just such a phenomenon on May 25, 1810, the day the liberation movement began. The yellow emblem in the center of the flag, which represents the “Sun of May,” was added in 1818.

Belgrano died on June 20, 1820, and the anniversary of his death is observed in Argentina as Flag Day, when it is customary for residents to wear small badges or flags pinned to their clothing.

❁ INDEPENDENCE DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: July 9

Argentina’s independence movement began in earnest on May 25, 1810, which is celebrated as Revolution Day. That date marked the beginning of a long, protracted military struggle, fought under the leadership of the revolutionary and military strategist General José de San Martín (1778–1850). He is regarded as the father of his country.

July 9, 1816 was an important turning point. On this day, the Congress of Tucumán passed a resolution declaring the independence from Spain of the Provincias Unidas de América del Sur (United Provinces of the South), which also included Uruguay, Paraguay, Bolivia. Juan Martín de Pueyrredón (1816–19) was declared supreme director.

On both Independence Day and Revolution Day, special services are held at the cathedral in Buenos Aires, and dramatic performances take place in the Colón Theater.

❁ ANNIVERSARY OF THE DEATH OF GENERAL SAN MARTÍN

Observed on: August 12

General José de San Martín (1778–1850) is one of the greatest revolutionary and military heroes South America has produced, and he is considered one of the most important liberators of Argentina. His upbringing and schooling were completed in Spain, after which he joined the Spanish army. After fighting for Spain against Napoleon and rising to the rank of lieutenant colonel, he resigned from the army in 1811 and joined the revolutionary forces committed to South America’s independence. It was primarily due to his astute strategic and tactical thinking that the revolutionaries were able to score decisive victories against the royalist forces and achieve independence in 1816.

Subsequently San Martín campaigned for the liberation of other South American nations, notably Chile and Peru, and achieved considerable success. His Chilean campaign included a spectacular march across the Andes Mountains, 15,000 feet above sea level.

In spite of his successes, however, he found himself politically sidelined. Coupled with his growing disillusionment with the factionalism in South American politics, in 1824 he immigrated to France. He returned to Argentina for a visit in 1828 and made a futile attempt at mediating between different political factions. In 1829, however, he went back to France, never to return. General San Martín remains a hero to the people of Argentina and, indeed, much of South America.

✿ GOOD FRIDAY

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: Friday before Easter

This Christian festival commemorates the Crucifixion of Jesus. It has been in the Christian liturgical calendar even longer than Easter has although no one is sure why it is called Good Friday. Some have suggested that the use of good in the name goes back to Old English and means “God’s” Friday, while others interpret good to mean something like “observed as holy.” This observance is also known as Black Friday and Sorrowful Friday, and in Eastern Orthodox Churches it is called Great Friday.

For many years Good Friday was primarily a Catholic observance, but many Protestant Churches now hold special services. Many of the faithful fast on this day; when they eat, it is generally fish instead of meat. On Good Friday (Viernos Santo), many churches hold mourning services from noon until three in the afternoon to commemorate Jesus’ last hours on the Cross. Some congregations perform a ritual known as the Stations of the Cross, a reenactment of Jesus’ procession to the cross.

✿ CHRISTMAS

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: December 24–25

Argentina celebrates Christmas (La Navidad, or the birth of Jesus) with boisterous revelry. Houses are decorated with red and white garlands, and Father Christmas’s boots are hung by the front door. Christmas trees—any kind of live or artificial tree can be used to celebrate the holiday—are decorated with colored lights and ornaments, and a figure of Father Christmas is placed on top of it. In addition to the tree, a nativity scene can be found in many homes. Late on Christmas Eve the family gathers to eat, and, at midnight, the presents that have been placed under the tree are opened.

In Argentina Christmas falls during the summer, and many families hold picnics or barbecues. Christmas dinner in Argentina is an elaborate affair. One of the traditional dishes prepared is niños envueltas: Steak is cut into three-inch squares, stuffed with a spicy mixture of minced meat, onions, and hard-boiled eggs, shaped into rolls, then browned, baked, or simmered until tender. Other traditional dishes include roast turkey, roast pork, stuffed tomatoes, mince pies, and special Christmas breads (pan dulce, or “sweet bread”), and puddings. Toasts are raised with a drink made of juices, cider, and chunks of fruit. Beer, cider (sidra), and wine are also consumed in quantity. On Christmas Eve, people attend church and then gather with their families at home. Midnight is marked by champagne toasts and fireworks displays. The adults usually go out and dance. The next morning, people open the presents that sit under the Christmas tree.

❁ CARNIVAL

Observed in: Northern Argentina
Observed by: General Public
Observed on: First Sunday before Lent

In northern Argentina Carnival, a festival that has pagan roots, is still observed by people of the Andes Mountains. It begins when the algarroba (carob) beans have ripened. Singing—accompanied by charangos, related to the guitar and ukelele—can be heard throughout the village. On the Thursday before Lent, women form two lines—one for mothers, the other for grandmothers—and meet under an arch of fruit, cheese, tiny lanterns, and sweets. There, the women exchange a doll that is touched on each woman’s forehead. This ceremony unites the women in an eternal bond.

Carnival reaches its high point on Sunday, when women wear traditional clothes: wide ruffled skirts, colorful ponchos, and white hats. They mask their faces with starch and water. Riding on horseback and singing folksongs, they arrive at the dance in honor of Pukllay, the spirit of Carnival in pre-Incan times. When the celebrations end, a rag doll that represents Pukllay is buried, symbolizing the end of Carnival.

They participate in the cult of Pachamama—giving thanks to Mother Earth for making the corn grow and livestock multiply. They sing and dance to the rhythm of Andean instruments: charangos (a stringed instrument), queñas (flutes), siku (panpipes), cajas (snare drums), and bombos (drums). Before people drink chicha, a drink made from fermented corn, they sprinkle a few drops onto the ground for the Earth goddess Pachamama. This blessing ritual is called cha’lla and is thought to guarantee a good harvest.

Introduction

✿ HISTORY

Armenia is situated in a strategically important region, at the crossroads of the Great Silk Road, the major trade route that linked the East and the West. Because of its geographical position, many empires have sought to control the region.

The country is formerly known as Hayq or Hayastan (“Land of Haik”), and Armenians claim descent from Haik, the great-great-grandson of Noah. There are several accounts of how Armenia got its name. Some claim that the modern name may have been given to the country by its neighbors. According to this story, it is derived from the name of the strongest tribe in the history of Armenia, the Armens, who may have gotten their name from Armenak or Aram, a descendant of Haik and a powerful leader of Hayastan, also said to be the father of all Armenians.

Still other accounts suggest that the name Armenia was derived from Nairi, the Assyrian name for the people of the Armenian Plateau. The word meant “land of rivers,” but it referred to the people as well as the region, which was home to some 60 different tribes, several small kingdoms, and about 100 cities, according to contemporary Assyrians. Nairi was also the name used by Greek historians around 1000 B.C.E., the first recorded inscription with the name, the Behistun Inscription in Iran, dates from around 400 B.C.E.

The earliest information about the area comprising the states of Armenia, Georgia, and Azerbaijan indicates that it was ruled over by the Shulaveri-Shomu (early inhabitants of the Caucasus region) around 6000–4000. Farming and animal husbandry were their main occupations. According to recorded history, around 800–600 B.C.E., the Indo-European group called Armenians moved into what was then the ancient kingdom of Urartu or Van (present-day Turkey), which ruled over the Caucasus region, and the two groups merged.

Later Armenia was made part of the Seleucid Empire, one of the political states formed after the death of Alexander the Great, and it was governed by the Seleucid Dynasty from

Fun Fact

A structure in Armenia known as Zorats Karer or Karahunj may be older than the United Kingdom's Stonehenge, and it suggests that its builders had contact with the megalithic cultures of Atlantic Europe (Brittany, Ireland, and Britain).

323 B.C.E.–60 C.E. The Seleucid Empire was destroyed, however, due to internal conflicts between different dynasties within the empire over the right to rule the kingdom.

In 190 B.C.E. while the Seleucid Empire was in decline, the first Armenian state was formed. It covered a large expanse of land including the Caucasus Mountains, and part of modern-day Syria, Turkey, and Lebanon. Armenia soon became one of the most powerful states in the region. At about the same time the Roman Empire was expanding its territories. Around the year 66 powerful Roman forces invaded Armenia, and it eventually became part of the Roman Empire.

In a bid to rule over the Caucasus, Persia fought a series of wars with the ruling Romans. As a result Armenia fell into the hands of the Sassanid Persians (the ruling dynasty of Persia), and, although western Armenia remained part of the Roman Empire, eastern Armenia was ruled by the Persians.

In 301 Armenia became the first nation in history to adopt Christianity as the state religion. Between the 4th and the 18th centuries various invaders—the Persians, Arabs, Mongols, and Turks—ruled the region. In the early 19th century the Russians annexed the region along the Yerevan and Lake Sevan, which was part of the ancient Persian Empire and an area that was part of modern-day Turkey. This triggered Russian-Turkish Wars in the 1870s, which led to the indiscriminate killing of Armenians in Turkey.

The situation for Armenians worsened after Russia and Turkey fought on opposite sides during World War I. Turkey concluded that the Armenians were supportive of Russian forces, and this sparked a systematic killing of the Armenian people in those territories under Turkey's control. On April 20, 1915, the Armenians of Van revolted against the Muslim rule of the Turks, killed local Muslims, and established control over the region. On April 24, 1915, they handed the control of Van to Russian forces. This triggered another series of atrocities against Armenians by the Turkish government that became known as the "Armenian genocide." As many as 1.5 million Armenians may have been killed.

In 1917 Ottoman Armenia (eastern Armenia) was returned to the Turks when Russia suffered a defeat during World War I. The local Armenians quickly formed an independent state, the Transcaucasian Federation, that was independent of Russia. However, conflicts within the ruling factions resulted in the split of eastern Armenia into the states of Armenia, Georgia, and Azerbaijan. In 1922 after the establishment of the Soviet Union, the three territories were reunited by the invasion of the Red Army (the army of the former Soviet Union) and the Transcaucasian Federation of the Soviet Socialist Republic was formed.

In 1936 the USSR dissolved the Transcaucasian Federation of Soviet Socialist Republics, and the regions of Armenia, Georgia, and Azerbaijan became individual republics of the Soviet Union. There were ongoing border and religious disputes between Azerbaijan and Armenia, but the Soviets controlled the situation and prevented its escalation into a war between Christian Armenia and Muslim Azerbaijan. In 1988 the ethnic tensions between the two republics led to war after the Nagorno-Karabakh region of Azerbaijan, which was largely inhabited by Armenian Christians, voted to unify with Armenia. Nagorno-Karabakh had untapped oil reserves worth billions of dollars, which made Azerbaijan even more unwilling to part with its territory. Historically Nagorno-Karabakh had been part of the Armenian state, but, as the result of borders defined by the Soviet Union under Stalin, it was made part of Azerbaijan. Armenia, whose 10-percent industrial capacity was destroyed by a devastating earthquake in 1988, was more than willing to reintegrate Nagorno-Karabakh as an Armenian state.

The dispute over Nagorno-Karabakh sparked the mass killing of Armenians and Azerbaijanis on both sides of the border, and the Azerbaijan Popular Front (PF), then an opposition political party with its own militia, unleashed a reign of terror in the region. The mass killings came to a temporary halt after Soviet military intervention, but the fighting resumed in 1990. During the disintegration of the Soviet Union, the Armenians in Azerbaijan and Armenia passed a referendum calling for independence from Soviet rule, and on September 21, 1991, the independent state of Armenia came into existence.

Levon Ter-Petrossian (b. 1945), a prominent Armenian leader, was sworn in as the first president of Armenia in 1991. He continued the war over the Nagorno-Karabakh region and eventually defeated the Azerbaijan forces. By May 1994 the governments of Azerbaijan and Armenia had declared a ceasefire. By this time Armenia had established its control over the Nagorno-Karabakh region and some other parts of Azerbaijan as well.

The war took a heavy toll on the Armenian economy, which worsened after Turkey and Iran imposed economic sanctions as a consequence of the ethnic war. In 1998 Levon Ter-Petrossian resigned as president, accepting responsibility for the economic and political problems of Armenia. Fresh

The Behistun Inscription, created to record the triumphs of King Darius I of Persia (reigned 521–485), is to cuneiform what the Rosetta Stone was to Egyptian hieroglyphics in that it unlocked the meaning of an extinct language. The text is presented in three different languages: Old Persian cuneiform, Elamite (Akkadian), and Babylonian. Both Elamite and Babylonian are Semitic languages.

Armenian Genocide

On April 24, 1915, after Russian forces successfully took control of the Van region in Armenia (with the support of local Armenians), Turkey committed a series of atrocities against Armenians living in their territory. The Turks sent thousands of Armenians, including women and children, to camps along the Iraqi and Syrian borders, and massacred many Armenians (mostly men). It is widely reported that children were separated from their parents in the camps and either distributed among the childless Muslim population by the Turkish government or sent to the mezzanine floors (intermediate floors between the main floors of a building) under the pretext of letting them have a bath. Instead the children were killed by poisonous gases and buried in mass graves. An estimated 1.2 to 1.5 million Armenians were killed as part of the systematic extermination. Turkish authorities denied authorizing these acts of violence and to prove it even conducted military trials in Istanbul in 1919 to punish the perpetrators. Many of the military officers who were in charge of the concentration camps were either imprisoned or sentenced to death by Turkish authorities.

elections were held in March 1998, and Robert Kocharian (b. 1954) was elected president of Armenia. He was reelected at the end of his five-year term in 2003, though his reelection was marred by allegations of election fraud.

❁ GEOGRAPHY AND CLIMATE

Armenia is located in the southern Caucasus between the Black and Caspian Seas in southwestern Asia. It is a landlocked country, with Georgia to the north, Azerbaijan along its eastern border, Turkey along its western border, and Iran and a small enclave of Azerbaijan to the south.

The Lesser Caucasus mountainous range Maly Kavkaz, which extends through the northern parts of Armenia, moves southeast and passes through Lake Sevan and Azerbaijan and eventually crosses the Armenian-Azerbaijan border to Iran. The Armenian Plateau lies in the southwestern part near the Aras River, which forms Armenia's border with Iran and Turkey. The plateau has a number of small mountain ranges and extinct volcanoes. Mount Aragats, the highest mountain in Armenia (13,419 feet), lies along the Armenian Plateau.

Lake Sevan, with the Debed and Aras Rivers, and a tributary of the Aras River the Razdan are the main sources of water in Armenia.

Armenia has a highland continental climate characterized by hot summers (June to September) and extremely cold winters. During summer, the temperature ranges from 71°F to 96°F. However, in winter, temperatures vary from 14°F to 23°F. A rainy season lasts from spring into early summer, with a second rainy season in October and November.

❁ ECONOMY

Under Soviet rule Armenia was a major exporter of machinery, tools, textiles, and manufactured goods to other Soviet republics. However, postindependence Armenia's economy was shattered by the war with Azerbaijan over Nagorno-Karabakh. In addition, the devastating earthquake that killed more than 25,000 Armenians in 1988 also destroyed 10 percent of the country's industrial capacity.

Huge investments are required for the development and upgrading of infrastructure facilities. Since 1994 the government of Armenia has taken significant steps in the form of growth reforms and economic liberalization programs, which are backed by the International Monetary Fund (IMF). The economy is gaining stability, but Armenia continues to depend on foreign investment and international aid.

Agriculture remains the primary occupation of Armenians. The main crops include potatoes, vegetables, berries, grapes, tobacco, figs, cotton, olives, and sugar beets. Armenia also has small mineral deposits (including bauxite, copper, and gold).

In 2003 Armenia became a member of the World Trade Organization (WTO).

❁ CULTURE AND LIFESTYLE

Armenia has a diverse cultural heritage that reflects its geographical location and tumultuous history. The country has contributed to many of the arts, but it is perhaps best known for its music and dance,

Apostolic Christianity

Two of Jesus' apostles Thaddeus and Bartholomew were the first to preach to the Armenians, probably as early as the second half of the first century C.E. In the early fourth century St. Gregory the Illuminator (c. 240–332) formally established the church in Armenia, when King Tiridates III (286–344) was baptized and proclaimed Christianity the official religion of Armenia. The Armenian Apostolic Church is considered to be one of the oldest national churches in the world. The head of the Armenian Apostolic Church is the apostolic catholicos in the Mother See of Holy Echmiadzin, in Echmiadzin, Armenia. The church rejects the authority of the pope and the doctrine of purgatory.

especially its liturgical and folk music. Although the country has often been conquered, the roots of its music can be traced to pre-Christian Armenia. Ancient friezes on the walls of buildings show singers with various musical instruments, and the country used to have traveling musicians who entertained royal audiences.

Mesrop Mashtotz (c.361/62–440) and the Parthian Sahak I (388–439) may be the first Armenian composers. In addition to creating the Armenian alphabet, they composed the first monophonic liturgical songs—chants, composed in one of eight modes, in which several notes are sung on the same syllable—used in the Armenian Church. In the Middle Ages 1,200 hymns called sharakans (or sharagans) were composed. Even though they are still regularly sung in the divine liturgy, sharakans were probably not written after the 13th century.

Early church music was composed using kbaz, invented in the ninth century, an Armenian musical notation that permitted variation within a set modal structure. Eventually the system became so complicated that even church musicians were unable to interpret it, and the system was revised early in the 19th century by Hambardzoum Limondjian (1768–1839). Musicologists at the Armenian Academy of Sciences in Yerevan are trying to decipher kbaz with the help of computers.

Legends of Armenia’s pre-Christian past were probably known to fifth-century writers in some form, either as ballads or in written form; these became the folk music of Armenia. Wandering minstrels, called gusans or asbughs, preserved these ancient stories in their songs, passing them down from one generation to the next. The kamancha, a stringed instrument played with a bow, was certainly one of the instruments played by the gusans. Other popular instruments include the kanon, a type of hammer dulcimer; the davul, a hand drum with two heads; oud (a type of lute); tar (a lute with a short neck); and the zurna (also shawm), a woodwind instrument and the predecessor of the oboe. These instruments are familiar among the peoples of this region and are still used, although with different names, in the folk music of Turkey, Iran, and Azerbaijan, for example.

Dance, like music, is an integral part of a culture, and Armenians enjoy dancing. Armenian dances are usually classified by region; the Armenian word for “dance” is bar. A traditional Armenian dance from the northern region of Speetak, called Jo Jon or Zhora Bar, is a line dance performed only by the men. They stand in an open circle, with their hands at shoulder level, and interlock their little fingers. Their dance steps are small and restrained, while their bodies maintain an erect relaxed stance. The leader (bar bashi), whoever is standing at the right end, often waves a white handkerchief. Other popular Armenian dances include the Tamzara and Ghosh bilezik, line dances from western Erzerum (now in Turkey), where the Armenian kings had their summer residence; and the Laz, a fisherman’s dance from the Black Sea region, in which the movements of the dancers imitate the fish’s movements as it is pulled out of the water. Kurdish influences are strong in several dances from Van, the ancient home of the Armenians (now in Turkey), including the Papouri, Khumkhuma, Tenn, and Halay, all line dances performed with tightly linked arms. These dances are called babd (“wall”) or pert (“fortress”) dances.

❁ CUISINE

Lamb is a staple in the Armenian diet, and a special dish called kasblama, made with boiled lamb and potatoes, is one of the country’s specialties. Some other favorite Armenian dishes include soujoukh (spicy dried sausage), kebabs, and salamorah toursbi (pickled green peppers stuffed with chopped vegetables). Basterma, dried slices of beef soaked in spicy chaman, may be for the adventurous. Chaman is named for its main ingredient, fenugreek (a clover-like Eurasian plant), but the mixture also contains ground red pepper, minced garlic, ground black pepper, ground allspice, ground cumin, and worm water (made from worm castings).

A traditional Armenian meal consists of rice, lamb, yogurt, eggplant, and a sweet dish called paklava or baklava, which is made with thin pastry. For making baklava, pastry is rolled into long, thin sheets of reddish-brown color. These are then rolled into cylindrical shapes and served with nuts such as walnuts. Armenians eat bread with most of their meals, and two traditional favorites are lavash and matkanash. Lavash is used, like many Middle Eastern flatbreads, as a wrap for cheese or meat with onions, greens, and peppers, but especially for the Armenian version of barbecue.

Armenians also include lots of vegetables in their diet such as cauliflower, celery, tomatoes, onions, and carrots. Dishes made from chickpeas, yogurt, beans, and eggplant are very popular as well. A local brandy called konyak and coffee are the preferred beverages, but Armenians have been brewing beer since they arrived in Urartu.

❁ NEW YEAR’S EVE/DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: December 31–January 1

The first day of the Western or Gregorian calendar, January 1, is celebrated as New Year’s Day throughout the world. In Armenia New Year’s Day is a very important holiday, and the celebrations begin on New Year’s Eve (December 31). It was on March 8, 1848, that the king of Prussia promised to grant women the right to vote. International Women's Day has been celebrated in Armenia since the Soviet occupation. It commemorates the social, economical, political, and cultural achievements of women throughout history. It also honors all the women who fought for justice and equality for their sex and pays tribute to women's contributions to a world in which justice is the common law. In Armenia men give presents to women, and the streets are decorated with flowers, but it is primarily an occasion for Armenian men to extol the traditional female virtues of motherhood, beauty, and tolerance. All government ministers in Armenia are men, and only a handful of women are members of parliament. Many Armenian men still regard housekeeping as the primary mission of women.

❁ MOTHERHOOD AND BEAUTY DAY

❁ ARMENIAN GENOCIDE MEMORIAL DAY

Observed on: April 24

Armenian Genocide Memorial Day, also known as Martyrs' Day, is observed in memory of the killing of over a million innocent Armenian men, women, and children by Turkish forces. On April 24, 1915, during World War I, the Armenian people handed over the region of Van to Russian forces (Turkey's archrival). The Turks, believing that the Armenians were sympathetic to Russia, against whom it had been struggling to dominate the region for decades, began the systematic execution of Armenians. Armenians were also sent to concentration camps along the country's frontiers with Iraq and Syria. It is estimated that between 1.2 million and 1.5 million were killed during the Armenian Genocide, which continued until 1917. It was the first genocide of the 20th century.

Holy Echmiadzin

For more than six million Armenian Christians, Holy Echmiadzin is the spiritual seat of authority. It is believed that, after Christianity was adopted as the state religion, St. George, one of the proponents of Christianity in Armenia, had a vision in which Jesus came to Earth and pointed to a site where the first church in Armenia was later built, in 303. St. Gregory became the first spiritual Armenian catholicos. Since then, Echmiadzin—the place Armenians believe Jesus chose—has been the residence of the Armenian supreme patriarch and catholicos.

On April 24 Armenians all over the world come together and pay tribute to those who perished during this genocide. Armenians walk to the hills of Tsitsernakaberd, which houses a memorial complex dedicated to the victims of this genocide, pay their respects to the victims and grieve for them. The complex has a 130-foot-high obelisk that symbolizes rebirth, boldness, and the Armenians' peace-loving nature.

❁ PEACE DAY

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: May 9

Peace Day, or Victory Day, commemorates the victory of Russian and Armenian forces in World War II. On this day World War II veterans, who command immense respect and are revered as war heroes, lead processions in different parts of Armenia. While children offer them flowers and kisses, the elderly offer these heroes vodka or their local brandy called konyak. Cultural and music festivals are also part of Peace Day celebrations in most parts of Armenia.

❁ RESTORATION OF ARMENIA'S STATEHOOD DAY

On May 28, 1918, after breaking free from Turkish dominance, Armenia temporarily restored its lost sovereignty and declared itself an independent state. Although Russian forces quickly reclaimed the entire region, this day marks the beginning of a new quest to restore the country's independence.

Also known as First Republic Day, May 28 is a national holiday in Armenia, and all public and private institutions are closed on this day.

Fun Fact

Armenian brandy has won many renowned admirers, including the former prime minister of Britain Sir Winston Churchill. Churchill is said to have preferred Armenian brandy to the French variety.

Fun Fact

In Armenia Santa Claus is called Dzmer Papik. Children write him and send him their lists of toys and other gifts before New Year's Eve, then he surprises them with gifts on New Year's Eve.

❁ CONSTITUTION DAY

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: July 5

This day commemorates the referendum of July 5, 1995, in which the Armenians unanimously voted in favor of the first constitution of the Republic of Armenia. The referendum promised to safeguard the rights of every Armenian and reflected the will and determination of Armenians to live in a free and democratic society. The constitution that was approved in 1995 is still in effect. On May 25, 2003, Armenians unanimously rejected amendments that the government proposed. Since it is a national holiday, all government and private institutions remain closed on July 5.

❁ INDEPENDENCE DAY

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: September 21

This day commemorates the historical referendum that took place on September 21, 1991, in which the Armenians voted unanimously in favor of independence from the Soviet Union. After elections were held in October 1991 Levon Ter-Petrossian, a prominent Armenian leader, was chosen as the first president of the Republic of Armenia.

On this day, the president presides over the Independence Day celebrations in the capital city of Yerevan. The day's events include a flag-raising ceremony, a speech by the president, a display of the defense capability of the Armenian armed forces, featuring the latest arms and ammunitions acquired by the country, as well as cultural activities. A spirit of patriotism prevails throughout the nation as Armenians all over the country participate in local Independence Day celebrations. It is also called Referendum Day.

❁ EARTHQUAKE VICTIMS' MEMORIAL DAY

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: December 7

This day memorializes the devastating earthquake that struck Armenia on December 7, 1988, killing more than 25,000 Armenians. Almost 10 percent of Armenia's industrial capacity was destroyed, and millions of Armenians were left homeless. The cities of Gyumri (formerly known as Leninakan) and Vanadzor (formerly known as Kirovakan) were severely affected.

On this day people solemnly remember those Armenians who lost their lives and family members to the destructive forces of nature. Families of the deceased visit the graves of their loved ones to pay their respects.

Religious Holidays

❁ CHRISTMAS

Observed by: Christians
Observed on: January 6

Although the Eastern Orthodox Church celebrates Christmas on January 7, Armenian Orthodox Christians prefer to celebrate Jesus' birth on January 6, because the Armenian Church gives more importance to the Feast of Epiphany, which also falls on January 6. Epiphany is a related Christian feast that recalls a visit to the infant Jesus by the Magi—three astrologer-priests of ancient Persia named Caspar, Balthasar, and Melchior.

In Armenia Christmas is a very important religious holiday, marked by rituals of baptism, which include a blessing of water. During this ritual water is blessed with the holy chrism, symbolic of Jesus' baptism by John the Baptist. Devout Armenian Christians attend church services on Christmas Eve (January 5), as well as on Christmas Day.

Armenians visit their friends and families during three days of greeting. They do not have Christmas trees or exchange gifts. A traditional Christmas dinner of fish and rice is prepared and served with wine.

❁ EASTER

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: First Sunday after Lent

Orthodox Easter, called Surp Zatik in Armenia, is one of the most important religious festivals in Armenia because it is celebrated as the day Jesus rose from the grave. During the 40-day fasting period that precedes Easter, Armenian families place lentils and other sprouting grains in a tray, which is then covered with a thin layer of cotton. They keep the tray in the house, and by the time Easter arrives the lentils and grains have sprouted, symbolizing the awakening of nature or the arrival of spring. The sprouted grains also serve as grass, which is placed on the Easter table under colored Easter eggs.

Armenian Christians believe that, after Jesus' Crucifixion, his mother Mary took some eggs and bread wrapped in a shawl to where the Cross stood. Grief-stricken at the sight of her son's body and the blood streaming from his wounds, she knelt down and wept bitterly. Her tears and the blood from his wounds dropped on the shawl and eventually on the eggs and bread, coloring them both. Mary then covered her head with the shawl. It is believed that this event gave rise to the tradition of coloring eggs and explains why women cover their heads while visiting church.

Attendance at a church service on Easter morning is followed by a traditional Easter meal consisting of wheat, chicken or lamb, and butter. Armenians also visit friends and relatives. After greetings have been exchanged, people gather in open spaces to wrestle and play games.

❁ VARDAVAR FESTIVAL

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: Fourteen weeks after Easter

The Vardavar (or Vartavar) Festival, also called the Transfiguration of Summer or the Feast of Water, was initially celebrated to recognize the annual pilgrimage undertaken by young and old Armenians to the temple of the pagan goddess of love Astghik. It is celebrated all over Armenia. The word vardavar has two meanings: "to sprinkle with water" and "the flaming of the rose." According to Armenian legend, a pagan goddess named Astghik spread the message of love all over Armenia by presenting roses and sprinkling rose water across the country. The pagan god Vahagn, who fought against all evil, safeguarded the love that was spread by Astghik. After Armenia adopted Christianity this celebration was transformed into the Feast of Water to celebrate peace and love.

On this day Armenians wake up early in the morning and start pouring water on each other, drenching everyone they meet.

Observed on: September 14

This holiday (known locally as Targmanchats ton) is dedicated to the creators of the Armenian alphabet Mesrop Mashtots and Sahak I in 404 C.E. The Armenian alphabet was invented in order to translate the Bible into Armenian and paved the way for the first golden age of Armenia. Over the centuries Armenian writers, philosophers, mathematicians, and scientists have been inspired by the translators' legacy to achieve excellence in scholarship, creativity, and world acclaim in spite of long periods of devastation, attack, conquest, and subjugation.

❁ TIARNNDARAJ

Observed on: February 13

According to some, Tiarndaraj (or Terndez) originated in Jewish law and celebrates the day Mary and Joseph took Jesus, who was just 40 days old, to the Temple to meet an old man, named Simon, who eagerly awaited the arrival of the Messiah. Others say it originated in pagan times, when fire was believed to have cleansing powers. During the celebration the fire of Terndez symbolizes the arrival of spring, a rich harvest, and a blessing of newly married couples. In some celebrations the fire is permitted only on holy ground, but elsewhere families with a recently engaged daughter or a newly married offspring light the fire in their yards. In such instances the couple collects the firewood. If held on holy ground, the firewood is blessed by a priest.

People gather around the fire, believing that the direction in which the smoke blows points to the most fertile land for planting crops. Couples then jump through the fire, followed by any children in attendance. Next people suffering from illness or infertility jump through the fire, along with pregnant women or those who have just given birth. If some part of their clothing burns, it is believed it will protect them from the bites of snakes and the stings of scorpions.

Once the fire has been extinguished everyone begins to dance; some take what remains of the fire to burn in their homes. The ash is also saved, to be prepared as a drink for the sick or pregnant women. Some spread the ashes across their fields and cattle sheds, or place it in tonirs, where lavash ("thin bread") is made.

The festival is observed on February 14 by Armenians who live in other countries.

❁ MARRIAGE

Armenian marriages are solemnized in church. Many Armenian couples get married on Tiarndaraj (Terndez) and incorporate the observances of the festival into their wedding ceremony.

On the wedding day, the bride wears a red silk gown and a headpiece made of cardboard that has been shaped into wings and decorated with feathers. The wedding ceremony is presided over by a priest who sanctifies the marriage in the presence of the couple's families. Traditionally two white doves, symbolizing love and happiness, are released during the marriage ceremony.

After the ceremony the bride and groom attend a reception given by their families. At the site of the reception the bridesmaids and the friends of the groom hold flowers aloft to make an arch. The bride and groom enter the reception by walking under the arch. During the reception guests throw coins on the wedding couple to bless them with prosperity.

Mom bar, the candle dance (so-called because it is performed with lit candles), is the last dance of the wedding ceremony. It originated in Maroon, a village near Lake Sevan in Armenia. At the end of the dance the candles are extinguished, indicating to the guests that the festivities are over, and it is time to go home.

❁ DEATH

Armenians bury their dead. Friends and family members take part in the funeral procession. A day after the burial a remembrance ceremony is held, and they all gather again to share their memories and celebrate the deceased's life. Thereafter, every year on the anniversary of the person's death, it is customary for Armenian families to visit the graves of deceased family members.

Introduction

✿ HISTORY

The first inhabitants of Aruba—the Caquetio—were probably related to the Arawaks. Various 16th century sources indicate that the Caquetio spoke Maipuran, an Arawak language. Basic information about the earliest Indian settlements has been gleaned from ancient painted symbols still visible on limestone caves found at Fontein, Ayo, and a few other places. These sites date back to about 1000 C.E. as do the pottery remnants, which have been preserved at the Archaeological Museum of Aruba in Oranjestad.

In 1499 the Spanish navigator Alonso de Ojeda (c.1466–c.1515), made his way to this remote corner of the Caribbean Basin and laid claim to the territory for Queen Isabella. According to one tradition he christened the place Oro Hubo (“golden hub”), implying that gold was to be found there. The name Aruba, however, was possibly derived from the Arawak word oibubai, which means “guide.” The Spanish made little use of the island, finding the climate too arid for cultivation and discovering little evidence of gold.

Spain's belief that Aruba had nothing it could exploit and its consequent abandonment opened the way for the notorious slave hunters (indieros), and in 1515 Diego Salazar took about 2,000 Indians from the three islands and put them to work in the gold and silver mines in Hispaniola. For the most part, however, the Spanish abandoned Aruba to the Caquetios for the next 150 years and devoted themselves to more lucrative conquests. Their lack of interest in Aruba probably spared the Caquetios some of the more hideous and cruel practices for which the Spaniards became known. Gradually the island became a clandestine hideout for buccaneers, who raided ships transporting Indian treasures back to Europe. At Bushiribana on the northeast coast, the ruins of an old pirate castle still stand.

In 1636 about the time of the conclusion of the Eighty Years' War between Spain and Holland, the Dutch, who had been expelled by the Spanish from their base in St. Maarten, set out looking for another place to establish their colonial presence. They captured the islands of Aruba, Curaçao, and Bonaire from the Spanish without much resistance. Curaçao became the administrative capital for the Dutch West India Company in the Netherlands Antilles (Aruba, Bonaire, Curaçao, and Suriname), with Aruba operating as one of its chief satellites. The Dutch controlled Aruba for nearly two centuries.

Poor soil and aridity saved the island from plantation economics and the African slave trade. Instead the Dutch left the Arawaks to graze livestock on the parched landscape, using the island as a source of meat for other Dutch possessions in the Caribbean. During the Napoleonic Wars the English briefly took control of the island in 1805 but returned it to the Dutch in 1816.

In 1826 Aruba’s first economic boom occurred when gold was discovered near Balashi. Hordes of gold-hungry immigrants arrived from Europe and Venezuela, and mining continued until 1916. When the mines became unproductive Aruba turned to oil refining on a large scale. In 1929 the world’s largest refinery was built on the southeastern tip of the island.

Things went smoothly until the 1940s, when Aruba became resentful about playing a secondary role to Curaçao in the Netherlands Antilles. Aruban calls for autonomy increased over the next few decades, and in 1986 Aruba finally became an autonomous state within the Kingdom of the Netherlands. The queen of the Netherlands is the head of state, and a governor general, appointed for a six-year term, represents her locally. The Netherlands is responsible for all matters relating to defense, judicial appointments, applications for citizenship, and foreign affairs.

Aruba has its own constitution, however, based on Western democratic principles. Legislative, executive, and judicial powers are vested in the parliament, which has its seat in Aruba’s capital, Oranjestad. The Aruban Parliament consists of 21 members elected by universal suffrage. Matters such

Buccaneer

A buccaneer is a pirate, someone who robs at sea or plunders the land from the sea without having the approval of any sovereign nation. The first recorded use of the French word boucanier (borrowed into English during the 17th century) referred to a person on the islands of Hispaniola and the Tortugas who hunted wild oxen and boars and smoked the meat in a barbecue frame called a boucan in French. The French word is derived from the Tupi word meaning “a rack used for roasting or for storing things, or a rack-like platform supporting a house.” (The Tupi were people who lived along the coastal areas of Brazil.) The original barbecue makers are believed to have gradually adopted a more remunerative way of life—piracy—which accounts for the new meaning given to the word.

as aviation, customs, immigration, communications, and other internal matters are handled autonomously by the Aruban government. All laws are written in Dutch, and the highest court is the Dutch Supreme Court in The Hague.

❁ GEOGRAPHY AND CLIMATE

Aruba lies at the center of the southern Caribbean, 15 miles north of Venezuela. The island is 19 miles long and 6 miles wide, with a total area of nearly 75 square miles. Aruba enjoys a dry, sunny climate, which is kept pleasant and temperate all year due to the cooling effects of the trade winds. The average annual temperature is 81°F, and the meager rainfall amounts to just 17 inches a year. Most of this occurs during the months of October and November. Aruba is located well below the hurricane belt.

The island is characterized by a flat landscape dominated by Mount Jamanota (617 feet). Hemmed in by calm blue seas, with visibility up to a depth of a hundred feet in some places, the island’s south and west coasts consist of miles of white beaches. The eastern coast of the island is a desert. Inland Aruba presents a unique but unlikely landscape of cactus, aloe plants, and dramatic rock formations that resembles a desert.

❁ ECONOMY

Tourism is the mainstay of Aruba’s economy, although offshore banking, and oil refining and storage also enjoy considerable importance. The rapid growth of the tourism sector over the last few decades has resulted in the expansion of other related activities. Construction has boomed, with hotel capacity reaching five times the 1985 level. The reopening of the country’s oil refinery in 1993—a major source of employment and a foreign exchange earner—further helped economic development. Aruba’s small labor force and low unemployment rate have led to a large number of unfilled job vacancies, despite sharp rises in wages in recent years. Early in the 21st century the government faced a budget deficit and a negative trade balance.

❁ CULTURE AND LIFESTYLE

Aruba’s population is made up of people from South America and Europe, as well as from Asia and other Caribbean islands. The lingua franca, spoken by 200,000 people in Aruba, Bonaire, and Curaçao, is a Creole dialect called Papiamentu (also spelled Papiamentu) that came from the neighboring island of Curaçao. It developed during the 1500s so that African slaves could understand and be understood by their owners. Most of the countries that have used the island in the past have contributed to Papiamentu. In addition to the contributions of various African languages, Portuguese and Spanish missionaries, Dutch merchants, South American traders, and Indians added additional words, creating a mixture of Dutch, Spanish, English, French, Portuguese, and African languages as well as the Arawak language Maipuran.

Although a majority of Aruba's citizens would identify themselves as Roman Catholic if asked, it is likely that a large number of them also practice the Afro-Caribbean religion called Santería. The term Santería was originally a very negative word used by the Spanish to speak of the religious practices of their slaves. Over the years, however, as the word has come into widespread use, its sense of disapproval has been neutralized, and many practitioners have begun to use it themselves.

Its origins date back to the slave trade when African peoples were caught and forcibly transported to the Caribbean. Typically, the new slaves were baptized by Roman Catholic priests as soon as they arrived, and their native beliefs and practices were suppressed. Santería incorporates the worship of the orisha (Yoruba deities; literally "head guardian") and beliefs of the Yoruba and Bantu people in Southern Nigeria, Senegal, and the Guinea Coast. These are combined with elements of worship from Roman Catholicism.

In order to keep their old beliefs alive, the former slaves equated each Yoruba deity (santo) with a corresponding Christian saint. For example Babalz Ayi became St. Lazarus, patron of the sick; Eleggua (or Elegba), the guardian of crossroads, became identified with St. Anthony, who protects travelers; Shango, who controls storms, thunder, lightning, and fire, was identified with St. Barbara; Ogun, the orisha of war, was identified with St. Peter; and Oshun, thought to be very wealthy, became Our Lady of Charity.

Tambu, muzik di zumbi, seú or simadan, and tumba are the Afro-Caribbean forms of music typically performed during celebrations in Aruba, Bonaire, and Curaçao. The lyrics to these forms of music are sung in Papiamentu.

Oranjestad, Aruba's capital since 1797, takes its name from the Dutch Royal House of Orange-Nassau. Its architectural designs are mainly Dutch with an occasional touch of Spanish styles. The second largest city, San Nicholas, is a fairly modern township, which gained prominence with the island's oil boom. It is the venue of Aruba's Carnival, third only to those held in Brazil and Trinidad.

❁ CUISINE

The confluence of divergent cultures has lent a distinct flavor to the island's cuisine. The typical local menu contains an array of freshly harvested seafood. International menus, including Indonesian, Japanese, Chinese, Dutch, Italian, French, and Cantonese cuisine, are easily available in Aruba. Some famous local dishes include arepas, cornmeal griddlecakes (of Venezuelan origin) stuffed with ham, eggs, chicken, okra, cheese, and other ingredients; pastechis, small pastries stuffed with spicy meat, okra, or fish, an ideal dish for parties; ayaca, a spicy dish prepared with pork, chicken, and dried fruits, all tightly packed in banana leaves and steamed in a pan of boiling water; and bolo pretu, a dark fruitcake, which is a popular dessert that keeps for six months or more if refrigerated. Elaborately decorated, bolo pretu is the wedding cake of preference.

Fun Fact

Some Yoruba say there are 401 orisha, or deities, but others believe there are probably more.

❁ CARNIVAL

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: Last three days before Lent

Carnival is a three-day festivity that signals the beginning of the 40-day period of Lent. It is over at midnight on Mardi Gras (which means "Fat Tuesday" in French), right before Ash Wednesday starts. The name of this popular celebration is derived from the Italian carne vale, which means "farewell to meat."

In Aruba preparations and events begin months in advance with a calypso competition at the end of January; a steel band competition follows to determine which bands will participate in the Oranjestad parade. There is also a contest for tumba bands. (Tumba is the indigenous music of the Netherlands Antilles.)

The Carnival festivities culminate with the main event the Grand Carnival parade, which is always the Sunday before Mardi Gras. It begins at 11 A.M. in Oranjestad and takes about eight hours to make its way through the streets of the city. The Old Mask Parade is lead by King Momo, the symbolic straw figure who reigns over Carnival in many countries. When King Momo (symbol of the flesh) is burned, he takes the sins of the village with him, leaving the island pure. The burning of King Momo must take place before midnight, signifying the end of Carnival and the start of Lent. Symbolically Momo's ashes are used on Ash Wednesday.

Dande

On New Year's Eve in Aruba small groups of musicians go door-to-door singing and wishing family and friends a happy New Year. This custom, thought to date back to 1880, is called dande (or dandee) in Papiamentu; dande is derived from dandara, which means "to revel, carouse." It is also called the paranda sweep; parandea also means "to revel." As the group members move from house to house singing, they collect money in a hat. Some Arubans believe that they will have bad luck in the coming year if the dande musicians do not serenade them on New Year's Eve.

Typically, the musical format is call-and-response, with one singer and a chorus. The violin, tambu ("drum"), guitar, wicharo or wiri ("metal grater," "rasp"), and occasionally a small accordion are the musical instruments usually used to accompany the singer. The song's rhythm is monotonous, with little variation in tone, and, at the end of each phrase, the chorus responds "ai nobe" (or ana nobo, meaning "new year").

This custom, and its music, can be found around the Caribbean with local variations. In Puerto Rico groups of musicians also go from house to house singing. There it is a Christmas tradition called paranda.

❁ GOOD FRIDAY

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: Friday before Easter

Good Friday, also called Holy Friday or Mourning Friday, is a solemn occasion for Christians. This holiday commemorates the Crucifixion of Jesus. It has been in the Christian liturgical calendar even longer than Easter has although no one is sure why it is called Good Friday. Some have suggested that the use of good in the name goes back to Old English and means “God’s” Friday, while others interpret good to mean something like “observed as holy.” This observance is also known as Black Friday and Sorrowful Friday, and in Eastern Orthodox Churches it is called Great Friday.

For many years Good Friday was primarily a Catholic observance, but many Protestant Churches now hold special services from noon until three in the afternoon on this day to symbolize Jesus’ last hours on the Cross. Many of the faithful fast on this day; when they eat it is generally fish instead of meat. In Aruba public readings of the Psalms and Gospels are performed, and the participants sing hymns about Jesus’ death. There are also religious processions through the streets.

❁ EASTER

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: First Sunday and Monday after Lent

Easter Sunday celebrates the Resurrection of Jesus on the third day following his Crucifixion. Easter is at once a solemn and a joyous occasion. In Aruba church services begin before daybreak. These early services recall the empty tomb that was found on the morning of the day of Resurrection and of Jesus’ arrival in Jerusalem before sunrise on the same day.

Easter Monday is a Christian holiday often celebrated the day following Easter Sunday. Events include egg-rolling competitions and playful practices such as dousing other people with water that has been blessed by a priest. In the religious context, the rolling of eggs symbolizes the rolling away of the stone placed at the mouth of Jesus’ tomb. Ideally this day is to be devoted to the teachings of the Bible and its message of humanitarianism. Easter processions and special novenas or prayers take place on this day.

❁ ST. JOHN’S DAY

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: June 24

St. John’s Day (Día di San Juan), also called Dera Gai on Aruba, is a colorful religious celebration. The day honors St. John the Baptist, who baptized Jesus on the banks of the River Jordan. He is venerated as the precursor of the Jesus.

Dera Gai (which means “the burying of the rooster”) came to Aruba from Mexico and has been an annual festival since 1862. Originally the holiday was celebrated to give thanks to various gods for a successful harvest and to seek their blessings for the next year. In an effort to convert the native people to Christianity, priests combined the burying of the rooster with the feast of San Juan.

Although St. John’s Day is celebrated in many countries Aruba is the only country in which it is celebrated with dancing and singing. Arubans, wearing bright red and yellow costumes, participate in folk dance competitions and sing special festive songs. The red and yellow clothing worn by women and men represents fire. A live rooster used to be buried up to its neck, and a hollowed gourd was placed over its head and covered with sand. Then the blindfolded person who managed to find the bird won it. In addition to the burying of the rooster, leftover crops and disposable items were buried to symbolize cleansing of the soul. In modern times the rooster

This gift-giving occasion, celebrated several weeks before Christmas, is a Dutch tradition.

❁ BOXING DAY

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: December 26

This festival can be traced back to an old custom (particularly among the British) of giving cash or durable goods to those of the lower classes on the day after Christmas. Those who performed public services and tradespeople would go around collecting tips or bonuses in small pottery boxes. The alms boxes in churches were also opened, and their contents distributed among the poor. Gifts among equals were exchanged on or before Christmas Day, but the less fortunate received their gifts the day after. This is an official holiday in Aruba, with all educational, commercial, and government organizations remaining closed.

❁ MARRIAGE

In Aruba it is believed that a young, unmarried woman who wishes to attract a man should devote herself to San Antonio. She should purchase an icon of this saint and worship him by lighting scented candles. If this fails to work the saint is punished; the icon is turned to face the wall, with a lit candle at the icon’s back.

Practitioners of Santería (an Afro-Caribbean mystical religion) recommend taking baths with sweet scented salts, oils, and potions to attract a husband. Rose petals, honey, cinnamon, sandalwood, and musk will increase a woman’s chances of getting married. Once a woman has married she must domesticate her new husband to ensure that he doesn’t wander. This is accomplished by stealing his right sock and burying it before midnight on the third Monday of the month, on the right side of the main entrance to the house. Thereafter, during the last week of every month, she puts five drops of a special potion in his morning coffee.

Bolo pretu, a dark fruitcake, thickly iced and aglitter with tiny silver balls, is the Aruban wedding cake. Keepsake slices, placed in small white boxes inscribed in silver with the initials of the newlyweds, are distributed to guests at the wedding reception. Without the trimmings, bolo pretu is a popular everyday dessert that keeps for six months or more if refrigerated.

❁ DEATH

Because death is a significant event in both Caribbean and Roman Catholic cultures, numerous beliefs and superstitions have grown up around it. In Aruba it is believed that people’s spirits begin to roam when they are terminally ill, visiting friends and relatives before their actual death. According to legend many omens foretell death, such as black butterflies entering the house. When the deceased is laid out in the coffin in the church prior to the funeral, the nose is touched or pulled. Should bad luck result from this practice it is promptly washed off by consuming one or several alcoholic drinks, a custom referred to as laba man (“washing the hands”).

Introduction

❧ HISTORY

The Aborigines were the first people to live in Australia. How long they were there before the first Europeans arrived is uncertain. Various factors make certainty about how long Australia has been inhabited, whether there were one or more waves of migration, and whether they came from island or mainland Asia impossible. The most commonly given estimate is between 48,000 and 50,000 years ago. Discoveries of Aboriginal art engravings in the Kimberley region of Western Australia, however, indicate Aborigines may have inhabited Australia for more than 116,000 to 176,000 years, crossing the sea from Indonesia to the Australian landmass. (The word aborigine means “the people who were here from the beginning.”) We may not yet know, however, how long Australia has been inhabited by hominids; new fossil evidence indicates that the history of humans in Australia may go back as far as 500,000 years.

Fossilized skulls found at Bathurst, New South Wales (NSW), have been identified as being of two distinct late Homo erectus types unrelated to the Aborigine. Some anthropologists now think that two distinct races of people inhabited Australia at the same time, during the last ice age and that these two races interbred to produce the modern Aborigine. The robust Kow Swamp race appears to be descendants of the Java Man (Homo erectus) of 500,000 years ago, while the smaller Lake Mungo race came to Australia from China, probably descendants of the Peking Man (Homo erectus pekinensis) and later Java type, Wadjak Man. An earlier cranium from Katoomba, NSW, is believed to be as much as 500,000 years old.

Although probably the oldest landmass in geological terms, Australia was the last to be visited by European adventurers. There are several reasons why, even though the existence of a large southern landmass had been postulated in the late Middle Ages. Europeans had failed to find what they called Terra Australis, in spite of active trade routes between Asia and Europe. Perhaps the most likely reason for their failure is its location. First, the continent was positioned off the oceanic-island trading corridor of the Indian and South Pacific Oceans, so there was no lucrative incentive to search for it. Second, Australia was hard to reach in the sailing ships of the day. The winds in the Southern Hemisphere have a tendency to veer north toward the equator west of Australia, and east of the continent strong headwinds discourage sailing into them.

The Dutch were the first European explorers to reach the continent. In 1616 the Dutch sailor Dirk Hartog (1580–1621) followed a new southern route across the Indian Ocean to an island off the coast of Western Australia. In 1688 William Dampier (1652–1715), an English pirate, landed in the north-west of what he called New Holland. After his return to England he published a book about his travels, entitled Voyages, and persuaded the naval authorities to finance another expedition to search for the continent's wealth. His report on the second expedition (1699–1700), however, criticized the land and its people in such discouraging terms that the British lost interest in Australia for almost 70 years.

In 1768 Captain James Cook (1728–79) left England on a three-year expedition to the Pacific, in the course of which he visited Australia. Cook landed first at Botany Bay on the eastern coast of Australia, and at Possession Island in the north where he named the region New South Wales and claimed it for England. Cook's two additional voyages in the 1770s added to the information available about the Australian landmass and strengthened Britain's claims to the continent. Australia was generally seen as a remote and unattractive land unfit for European settlement.

After the American Revolution ended in 1783, and Britain could no longer ship British convicts to America as it had done, it decided to establish its first settlement in Australia to solve the problem of overcrowded prisons. In 1788 Arthur Phillip (1738–1814), a naval officer, arrived at Port Jackson with his cargo of prisoners, where he found a near-perfect harbor.

On January 26 (now commemorated as Australia Day) the first permanent European settlement in Australia was founded on January 26, 1788, and named Sydney for Lord Sydney (1733–1800), who had issued the charter for the colony.

By the mid-1800s Britain had two flourishing penal colonies in New South Wales and Western Australia, with nearly 150,000 prisoners. Among them 30 percent were Irish, 20 percent were women, and the majority hailed from Britain's poorer classes. Unskilled British officers were granted large tracts of land, and convicts, many of them poorly educated or illiterate, were assigned to them as laborers. Later land grants were also extended to the prisoners who had been released after completing their sentences. In 1793 free settlers began arriving from England.

During the period between 1820 and 1880, Australia witnessed several major developments: the establishment of new colonies along the coast, the expansion of sheep- and cattle-rearing in the interior, and the discovery of gold and other minerals in the eastern colonies. With the influx of immigrants and the growth of the cities and ports, the Australian colonies began to agitate for more democratic government. By the mid-1850s all four eastern colonies had instituted new systems that vested power in a cabinet or council of ministers responsible to a popularly elected assembly.

At the time Europeans began to arrive on the continent, it is estimated that the indigenous Australians numbered about 350,000, but the population steadily decreased over the next 150 years. Initially there were only a few confrontations between the settlers and the Aborigines around Sydney, even though there were many Aborigine campsites nearby. The causes of the declining Aboriginal population were infectious diseases to which the natives had no immunity and colonial government policies that included forced removal from their lands and separating children from their parents. It would be 1967 before the Europeans began to understand that their treatment of the indigenous people was wrong.

Australia's Name

Australia's name is derived from the Latin word for "southern," australis. There were legends about an "unknown southern land" (in Latin, terra australis incognita) as early as Roman times, and such legends were popular in geographies of the Middle Ages. Still no one actually knew that the continent called Australia existed. As early as 1638 Dutch officials used the adjective Australische ("Australian" in the sense "southern") to refer to the land after its discovery. Alexander Dalrymple (1737–1808) was the first writer in English to use the word Australia (in his book An Historical Col- lection of Voyages and Discoveries in the South Pacific Ocean, 1771), but he used it to refer to the entire South Pacific area. In 1814 Matthew Flinders (1774–1814) used the word in his book A Voyage to Terra Australis, and because Flinders's book was popular the word became widely used to refer to the new continent. The governor of the colony of New South Wales Lachlan Macquarie (1762–1824) then began to use it in his messages to England, and in 1817 he suggested that "Australia" be formally adopted as the continent's name. Finally in 1824 the British Admiralty determined that the continent would be called Australia.

Once Britain established a penal colony on Van Diemen's Land in 1803 (which they renamed Tasmania in the 1850s), the indigenous population that had inhabited the island for about 35,000 years was almost eradicated. Although the people had numbered about 5,000 when the British arrived, there were soon merely a few mixed race survivors. On the continent the story was much the same, and Aboriginal communities were destroyed on a large scale. In spite of the official British policy of protection, as the European population of Sydney continued to expand, and as the ranchers sought larger expanses of land for their sheep, Aboriginal communities retreated into the drier interior.

The official colonial policy of Britain throughout the 19th century was to treat the Aborigines as equals, with the intention of converting them to Christianity. Governor Macquarie established a school for Aboriginal children. Such gestures, however, underfinanced and generally unsupported in practice, were the exception. In fact change from a policy of protection to one of punishment was the usual direction in the colonies.

A number of Aboriginal people were assimilated into white settlements, while others assisted settlers as guides, trackers, and stockmen. But clashes, enmity, and sporadic violence were common as the settlers moved into the center of the country, encroaching on Aboriginal lands. Some Aborigines were employed on sheep stations, and others were used for police patrols. The colonists' real attitude toward Aborigines is revealed by the fact that they were systematically hunted and poisoned. Aboriginal women were abducted and raped, and children were taken from their parents. While exceptions to the European hostility existed, it was the general assumption among the whites that Aboriginal culture would die out. On the local and colonial levels the active destruction or neglect of Aboriginal culture was often accompanied by the practice of segregation: The indigenous population was herded onto reserves and denied participation in the world of the colonists.

Forced to survive on increasingly meager supplies of food, the Aborigines' numbers continued to decrease. By the 20th century those Aboriginal communities capable of sustaining their culture were mostly confined to the Northern Territory, Queensland, and New South Wales. Not until the 1950s did the colonial government begin to reconsider the inhumanity of its policies toward the Aboriginal population and attempt to reverse the consequences of Europeans' past treatment of them. Then the Aboriginal population began to creep back to its pre-European level, but it required a 1967 referendum for the federal government to begin to initiate policies that would actually benefit the Aborigines. It would still be years before Australia's high court would recognize the Aborigines' title to their land.

During the 19th century the European population continued to grow, primarily along the coastline, where the capital cities of the six original colonies were located. Dense settlement of the continent's interior was simply impossible. As gold mining in Victoria and New South Wales declined in the 1860s, even prospectors moved to the cities. By the beginning of the 20th century Sydney and Melbourne were among the world's largest cities, even though the continent itself was sparsely populated.

In spite of rapid urbanization the six capitals were engaged in intense rivalry, making unification and the necessary standardization difficult. Furthermore the individual colonies regarded their connections to each other as secondary to their ties with Great Britain. Victoria and New South Wales, for example, used different gauges for their railways, making rail travel between them impossible, and the project of standardization did not begin until the 1960s.

As a result of urbanization the capital cities dominated in all the colonies. In the 1850s, for example, merchants and professionals were the ones who demanded political reform and new constitutions. After 1850 it was the small urban manufacturers and the growth of mass trade unionism that made possible democratic governments, ensuring the passage of legislation that favored urban populations. It was Victoria's workers, for example, who pioneered the eight-hour workday in 1856. Although the production of wool and new mineral discoveries continued to be the major economic supports in the colonies, their political systems managed to keep the large ranch owners and other wealthy families from dominating them.

Development of the Australian colonies into a single nation lacked the passionate nationalism of similar struggles in other colonies. Earl Grey (1764–1845), the colonial secretary of Britain, had considered unification of the colonies back in 1847, and John Dunmore Lang (1799–1878), a Scottish Presbyterian cleric in New South Wales, had formed the Australian League to work toward uniting Australia. With the formation of the Dominion of Canada in 1867, however, British officials rejected the idea of a similar arrangement for Australia. Eventually Australia adopted its constitution in 1901. Based on British parliamentary traditions; it incorporated some features of the United States' governmental system as well. The British sovereign is Australia's head of state, and the Australian prime minister, accountable to the Australian parliament, is the head of the government. The states exercise all powers not specifically given to the federal government.

In the course of the 20th century Australia began to develop both a national government and a national culture. Commonwealth governments, led by such Australians as Alfred Deakin (1856–1919), quickly moved to declare a protective tariff on imports to foster the new government's economic base, established consistent ways of determining minimum wages, and retained the white immigration policy. In spite of such advances Australians wanted to retain their individual colonial identities, so national political parties were only loosely organized.

It was World War I, however, that transformed Australia into a unified state with a distinct identity. Australia sent more than 330,000 volunteers when the Allies asked for help; more than 60,000 perished, and 165,000 were wounded. With a casualty rate higher than most of the Allies, Australia became increasingly conscious of its contribution to the war effort. When the Australian and New Zealand Army Corps (ANZAC) attacked the Ottoman (Turkish) forces in the Dardanelles on April 25, 1915, Australians forged an identity as a nation. In numerical terms Gallipoli may have been a minor engagement, but it acquired considerable national and personal importance to the Australians who fought there.

ANZAC Day remains the country's most significant day of public recognition.

Between World War I and World War II, in an effort to sustain the wartime levels of production and expansion that had enriched Australia's economy, the government tried to expand some basic industries, but the Great Depression of the 1930s severely damaged the Australian economy, and public and private debt increased dangerously during a period of massive unemployment. Recovering from the depression proved to be an uneven effort in Australia. Economic policies such as price cuts and limited credit made the post-depression years harder in Australia than they were in other countries.

When World War II began in 1939 Australia sent its armed forces to support Britain. Then in 1941 the Pacific war between Japan and the United States began. Because Great Britain could not provide enough support for defending Australia, the government allied itself with the United States, and until the Philippines were freed General Douglas MacArthur (1880–1964) and his staff based their operations in Australia. Although Australia's casualties were not as heavy as they had been in World War I, Australians were more psychologically affected because of the proximity of Japanese forces.

Australian industry was, however, improved as a result of the war. The economy had been reoriented toward manufacturing, and heavy industries now surrounded the capital cities. Postwar development continued to expand the possibilities created during the war.

In 1949 when Robert Menzies (1894–1978) became Australia's prime minister, a long period of stability began. While he maintained a sentimental link with Great Britain, he also paid more attention to Pacific and South Asian affairs. Soon Asians were attending Australian institutions, and by 1966 the white Australia immigration policy was inconsequential. It was formally discarded in 1973, and immigration has since been based on criteria other than race.

In 1967 a national referendum gave the federal government a mandate to implement policies and make laws that would start to reverse the harm caused to the Aboriginal people during European colonization. In 1970 Harold Thomas, an artist and an Aborigine, designed the Aboriginal flag. It was intended to be an eye-catching rallying symbol for the Aboriginal people and a symbol of their race and identity. It is divided horizontally into two sections of equal size, one black (top) and one red (bottom). Centered on the line between the black and the red is a solid bright yellow circle. The black represents the Aboriginal people, the red, the Earth and the Aborigines' spiritual relationship to the land, and the yellow, the Sun, the giver of life.

During the second half of the 20th century Australia's alliance with the United States continued to gain strength, and the country followed the United States into the Korean War, joined the Southeast Asia Treaty Organization (SEATO), participated in it from 1954 until its dissolution in 1977, and fought alongside U.S. troops in Vietnam. During the same period Australia's ties with Japan continued to develop, and the country adjusted its domestic and foreign policies accordingly.

Australia's involvement in Vietnam was as controversial as it was in the United States. By 1967 as many as 40 percent of Australians serving in Vietnam were conscripts. The civil unrest caused by conscription and being sent to fight an unpopular war, helped the Australian Labor Party gain power in 1972, with Gough Whitlam (b. 1916) at the helm. Whitlam acted immediately to quell the civil disturbance by withdrawing Australian troops from Vietnam, abolishing national service and fees for higher education, establishing a system of free and universally available health care, and supporting the land rights of Aboriginal people. On June 3, 1992, Whitlam's sensibility was confirmed when Australia's High Court rejected the European claim of terra nullius ("empty land") in Mabo and others v. Queensland (No. 2) in proceedings begun in 1982 and confirmed the Aborigines' native title.

After a period of recession and high unemployment in the early 1990s, the electorate lost faith in the Labour government, and in early 1996 the Conservative coalition, led by John Howard (b. 1939), defeated Labour leader Paul Keating (b. 1944). In the last years of the 20th century, placing the government in the hands of an Australian president instead of the British queen was a major issue, because some felt that the rule of a distant monarch was archaic. In 1999 a national referendum was held to decide the issue. A majority of the population voted to retain the status quo.

Australia is the largest island and the smallest continent in the world. Its coastline is 16,007 miles long. It is situated in the Southern Hemisphere, between the Indian Ocean and the South Pacific Ocean in an area sometimes referred to as Oceania. Australia's borders lie beyond its landmass. East Timor, Indonesia, and Papua New Guinea lie to the north of Australia; the Solomon Islands and Vanuatu are northeast of it; and New Zealand is off the southeast coast. The shortest border, 93 miles, is between Australia and Papua New Guinea, but Boigu Island (with two smaller islands), the northernmost inhabited island in Australian territory, is only three miles from Papua New Guinea. This geographical anomaly has necessitated an unusual border arrangement that allows people of Papua New Guinea and Torres Strait Islanders access to the waterway across the border.

Australia consists of six states and several territories. The six states, which began as separate British colonies, are New South Wales (capital, Sydney), Queensland (capital, Brisbane), South Australia (capital, Adelaide), the island of Tasmania (capital, Hobart), Victoria (capital, Melbourne), and Western Australia (capital, Perth). The two most important territories are the Northern Territory (capital, Darwin) and the Australian Capital Territory (or ACT; national capital, Canberra), located within the state of New South Wales. ACT also includes Jervis Bay Territory, which serves as a port and naval base for the national capital. Australia has several inhabited external territories that include Norfolk Island, Christmas Island, and the Cocos (Keeling) Islands, as well as several largely uninhabited external territories.

The climate in Australia is arid to semiarid. The country has a temperate zone in the south and east and a tropical climate in the north. The tropical zone (40 percent of Australia's landmass) has two major seasons—wet (summer) and dry (winter)—while the temperate zone has four seasons. Because of its location Australia's summer begins in December, its fall, in March, its winter, in June, and its spring, in September.

Uluru (known as Ayers Rock until 1986), which is located in central Australia, is the second largest monolith in the world; the largest, located in Western Australia, is Mount Augustus. The highest mountains in mainland Australia are situated in an area known as the Snowy Mountains in the province of New South Wales. These form a part of the Great Dividing Range that separates the central lowlands from the eastern highlands. The highest peaks are Mount Kosciuszko (7,310 feet), Mount Townsend (7,247 feet), and Mount Twine (7,201 feet). The largest coral reef in the world, the Great Barrier Reef, extends for 746 miles along Australia's northeast coast.

The main rivers in Australia are the Murray River and its tributary, the Darling River, which flow in the Murray-Darling River Basin. This drainage basin comprises the major part of the interior lowlands of Australia, covering more than 386,102 square miles, about 14 percent of the continent.

Australia's most distinctive fauna are the marsupials and monotremes. These animals are found nowhere else on Earth. The marsupials, including kangaroos and koalas, give birth to partially developed offspring, which they suckle and keep in a pouch.

The monotremes, including platypuses and echidnas, lay eggs but also nurse their young.

ECONOMY

Except for the area around Perth in Western Australia, most of Australia's rich farmland and good ports are found in the east and the southeast. Melbourne, Sydney, Brisbane, and Adelaide are the leading industrial and commercial cities.

Australia is highly industrialized as a result of the two world wars, and manufactured goods account for most of its gross domestic product (GDP). The chief industries include mining (most of which is accomplished with Japanese financial aid), food processing, manufacture of industrial and transportation equipment, chemicals, iron and steel, textiles, machinery, and motor vehicles. Australia's mineral resources include coal, iron, bauxite, copper, tin, lead, zinc, and uranium, opals, and diamonds. Some logging is done in the east and southeast.

The country is agriculturally self-sufficient. Sheep- and cattle-raising have long been staple occupations. Agriculture and horticulture (producing citrus fruits, sugarcane, and tropical fruits) are also important; there are a good number of vineyards, dairies, and tobacco farms. Australia's chief export commodities are metals, minerals, coal, wool, and beef (of which it is the world's largest exporter), mutton, grains, and manufactured products. The main imports are manufactured raw materials, capital equipment, and consumer goods.

While the Australian economy fell into a severe recession in the late 1980s, it experienced an extended period of growth beginning in the 1990s. During the last two decades of the 20th century, there was considerable industrial development and an increase in the standard of living.

Fun Fact

The kangaroos in Booderoo National Park are very friendly and approach people to be fed and petted.

Monotremes

Monotremes are classified as mammals, even though they differ from other mammals in some respects. Like other mammals monotremes have one bone in the lower jaw, three bones in their inner ear, a high metabolic rate, hair, and the females provide milk for their young. In other ways their anatomy is unusual: Adult monotremes have no teeth. Moreover, they are considered more primitive because they lay eggs, like reptiles and birds, instead of giving birth to live young. The three living monotremes exist only in Australia and New Guinea—the duck-billed platypus and two species of echidna, or spiny anteaters.

✿ CULTURE AND LIFESTYLE

Australia is a country rich with diverse cultures, traditions, and customs; the major influences include the European, Aboriginal, and Southeast Asian (a large and growing immigrant group in recent years). Although it still has strong ties to Great Britain, Australia also shares a powerful affinity with the United States. Coming out of decades of isolation Australians are gaining prominence in Hollywood; Australian art galleries have been mushrooming in the streets of London and New York; and Australian musicians are performing more and more often on the world's stages. Australian pop singers, from the Bee Gees to INXS, the Little River Band, and Kylie Minogue (b. 1968) have earned global recognition.

In the 20th century Australia could boast several world-famous writers including Nobel Prize winner Patrick White (1912–90) and Booker Prize winners Peter Carey (b. 1943) and Thomas Keneally (b. 1935). Other well-known Australian writers include Thea Astley (1925–2004), Robert Drewe (b. 1943), Helen Garner (b. 1942), Rodney Hall (b. 1935, in England), Christina Stead (1902–83), Elizabeth Jolley (b. 1923), David Malouf (b. 1934), Frank Moorhouse (b. 1938), and Tim Winton (b. 1960).

The Australian film industry is small but growing quickly. Mel Gibson (b. 1956, in the United States), Russell Crowe (b. 1964), and Nicole Kidman (b. 1967, in Hawaii) are the country's best-known actors.

Australian athletes are internationally respected for their skills. British sports such as cricket, rugby, and soccer are very popular. The Australian cricket team is a formidable force. Sir Don Bradman (1908–2001) was a batsman for Australia. Cricket fans consider him the greatest batsman of all time, and he remains one of Australia's greatest popular heroes. In tennis the Australia Open is one of the four tournaments that make up the Grand Slam, and several Australian players are internationally renowned. Evonne Goolagong (Cawley; b. 1951 in New South Wales), the first Aboriginal tennis player and the winner of many championships, was inducted into the Tennis Hall of Fame in 1988.

Australians have also had great international success in swimming, sailing, and yachting, and Melbourne was the site chosen for the 1956 Olympics, where several Australian athletes distinguished themselves in swimming and track and field events. Sydney hosted the 2000 Summer Olympics, where women's water polo, Tae Kwon Do, and the Triathlon debuted. Australia ranked second overall in sailing during the Sydney Olympics and stunned the world in 1983 by winning the America's Cup, the premier race in international sailing competition.

Recently after centuries of brutal treatment, efforts have been made to revive the ethnic Aboriginal folk culture and ethos. Aboriginal culture experienced a revival at the end of the 20th century, as Aboriginal artists began to explore ways to preserve their ancient values and share them with a wider community.

✿ CUISINE

Contemporary European tastes in Australia use the best seasonal ingredients available with a mix of Asian, European, and Indian cuisines. But many food writers ignored the most basic and authentic Australian cuisine, bush tucker food (wild food), the foods made available by Australia's plants and animals until 1975, when the Cribbs published Wild Food in Australia. Since then a small industry has grown up around the sale and distribution of "tucker" ingredients, and average diners have come to view bush tucker as an important part of their culinary repertoire. Andrew Fielke, an award-winning Adelaide chef, has pioneered the use of native foods, and the Aussie dialect of English contains many bush tucker words such as yabby (a freshwater crayfish), billy tea (a billy is a metal can used to make tea over an open fire), floaters (a meat pie floating in soup peas or gravy), and chook (chicken).

Bush tucker food is unique to Australia and is made up of dishes learned from the Aboriginal peoples. These recipes reflect the survival skills of the Aborigines passed from one generation to the next as community knowledge, and they doubtless enabled many Europeans to survive in the Outback. Bush tucker recipes include witjuti (or witchetty) grub and bunya nut soup (a soup that contains grubs found in live wood and the seeds of the bunya-bunya pine tree), pop moths (a combination of bogong moths popped with popcorn in macadamia nut oil), kangaroo tail soup, and mango balmain bugs (balmain are a small type of crayfish found in the waters around Sydney). Andrew Fielke's quandong pie is said to be delicious. (*Quandong*s are fruit similar to peaches but not as sweet.)

Australian Damper

Damper is an unleavened bread that bush settlers cooked in the ashes of a fire. It was originally wrapped around a stick and laid in the coals. It is called damper because the fire has to be dampened (made less intense) before the bread can be cooked.

Ingredients:

- 2 cups of self-rising flour
- 1/2 tsp. salt
- 2 tsp. sugar
- 3 tbs butter
- 1 cup milk

Preparation:

Combine the dry ingredients—flour, salt, and sugar—in a bowl. Add the milk to make a soft dough. Knead the dough on a floured board until smooth. Shape it into a small loaf, brush with milk, and bake at 375°F for 30–40 minutes, or until the loaf makes a hollow sound when tapped.

Among the Europeans, Southeast Asian cuisine is very popular in Australia, as is Chinese, and restaurants serving both cuisines are common in the urban centers. Large cities also have many Indian, Japanese, Thai, and Vietnamese restaurants. Tea is a popular hot drink in Australia, although coffee consumption has soared during the past few decades. Beer, called “amber fluid,” is the most popular alcoholic drink.

Meat is a major part of the Australian diet. Beef is the most popular meat, followed by lamb and mutton, poultry, and pork. Traditionally Australians have preferred plain food to spicy dishes, though the influx of Southeast Asian immigrants and the proliferation of their cuisines have had some effect on the national taste, particularly among the young. Meat is usually grilled or roasted and served with potatoes and a vegetable. Australia’s long, sunny summers and mild winters provide opportunities for picnics and barbecues (barbies) year-round. For a picnic a good possie (position) and an esky (cooler) for sangers or sango (sandwiches) and stubbies (beer) are essential.

Public/Legal Holidays

❁ NEW YEAR’S EVE/DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: January 1

January 1 begins a new year according to the Gregorian solar calendar. On the first of January, it is usually hot and sunny in Australia, which is in the Southern Hemisphere. People often enjoy the holiday season by going to the beach to swim, surf, or simply relax. On New Year’s Eve there are fireworks displays throughout the country and all-night parties.

Over the objections of the Royal Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals, one Australian town has an unusual way of celebrating the New Year. At Pine Creek in Australia’s Northern Territory, there has been an annual wild boar and wild cat hunt organized by locals. The person who kills the most animals receives a cash prize at a New Year’s party, and any method used to kill the animals is acceptable, even blowing them up with dynamite or running over them in a vehicle.

❁ AUSTRALIA DAY

Observed on: January 26

On January 26, 1788, Captain Arthur Phillip raised the British flag at Sydney Cove and proclaimed British sovereignty over the eastern seaboard of Australia. The celebration of a united Australian national day on this date can be traced back to the period after the landing of the first fleet and the subsequent white colonization of the continent. First celebrated in 1817 by the people of Sydney, Australia Day was declared a public holiday in 1838. The Aboriginal peoples regard this as “invasion day.”

This holiday is the biggest nationwide celebration for those of European descent and is observed as a public holiday in all states and territories. Awards for outstanding performances in diverse

Flag-raising ceremonies, honor guard inspections by the state governors, colorful parades, and barbecues mark the day. Each town, city, and even some neighborhoods, all have their own lists of programs. Leading up to Australia Day, schools sponsor activities to instill a sense of national pride in students.

ANZAC DAY

Observed on: April 25

ANZAC Day commemorates the first major military engagement in which Australian and New Zealand soldiers fought, and it remains one of the country's most important holidays. The acronym ANZAC stands for Australian and New Zealand Army Corps. During World War I Australia and New Zealand joined the Allies (Britain, France, Russia, Italy [neutral at first], Japan, and the United States) against the Central Powers (Germany, Turkey [then known as the Ottoman Empire], and Austria-Hungary). In 1915 Australian troops landed on the Gallipoli Peninsula (part of Turkey) only to discover that, having landed at the wrong place, they were surrounded by steep cliffs and in the direct line of enemy fire. Over the next two days 20,000 Australian soldiers landed on the beach to encounter large numbers of well-armed Turkish forces. Eight thousand Australian men died in the battle, which dragged on for eight months before the Allies withdrew. Although it was not a military victory the battle is a source of great pride for Australians, because of the bravery shown by their soldiers in the face of adversity.

On this day Australian veterans take part in a predawn march to local war memorials. Later other citizens join them. Short religious services comprise prayers and hymns (including a poem by Rudyard Kipling [1865–1936], either “The Recessional” or “Lest We Forget,” dedicated to those who died for Australia). These are followed by an address in memory of the dead, which concludes with the last stanza of Laurence Binyon’s (1869–1943) patriotic poem “For the Fallen.”

The “Last Post” is then sounded, after which those assembled observe a minute’s silence. Whereas Reveille began a soldier’s day, the “Last Post” signaled its end. It is believed originally to have been part of a more elaborate routine, known in the British Army as “tattoo,” which originated in the 17th century. The memorial service concludes with a closing prayer and the singing of the national anthem.

Although it began officially as a World War I commemoration in 1916, it has come to include veterans and heroes of World War II, Korea, and Vietnam with the passing years. Another ceremony takes place later in the day when ex-service personnel and war veterans from other wars, displaying their medals, march behind banners or flags. They are joined by the public, including members of the armed forces, the Red Cross, cadets, and veterans from other countries.

THE QUEEN’S BIRTHDAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: Second Monday in June, except in Western Australia, where it is celebrated in September or early October

This holiday celebrates the official birthday of the British monarch (currently, Queen Elizabeth II), who is not only king or queen of Great Britain and Ireland but also of Australia and New Zealand. It was first celebrated on June 4, 1788 (King George III’s birthday) by convicts and colonists soon after they arrived in Australia. Since then the reigning monarch’s birthday has been celebrated on the second Monday in June (except in Western Australia, which moves the holiday to September or early October so as not to conflict with that state’s Foundation Day).

The only notable civic event associated with this day is the release of the Queen’s Birthday Honors List, which specifies who will be inducted into the Order of Australia. This honor recognizes Australian citizens and other individuals for their achievements or meritorious service. The order was established on February 14, 1975; before that Australian citizens received British honors.

LABOR DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: Different dates in different states and territories

Labor (spelled “labour” locally) Day is a public holiday in Australia’s states and territories, but because the states have autonomous governments, with their own parliaments and premiers, each determines the date on which the holiday is observed. It is called Labor Day in every state except Tasmania, where it is called Eight Hours Day. Thus whereas the observance in most countries occurs on May 1 and signals the beginning of spring, it takes on different meanings in the Southern Hemisphere, depending on the season in which it is celebrated.

Australia’s Labor Day holiday has its roots in the eight-hour day movement in Great Britain, which sought a more balanced life for workers: eight hours of work, eight hours of recreation, and eight hours of rest. On April 21, 1856, the stonemasons and construction workers on sites around Melbourne staged a direct action protest: They stopped working and marched from the University of Melbourne to parliament demanding an eight-hour workday. The protest was a success, and they are recognized as the first organized workers in the world to achieve an eight-hour day, inspiring workers around the world to organize similar protests.

In Western Australia, the contributions of workers are celebrated on the first Monday in March; in Tasmania and Victoria, the festivities take place on the second Monday in March. In these states the observance signals the waning of summer and the approach of fall. In Queensland, where Labor Day falls on the first Monday in May, the weather may be more like November in the Northern Hemisphere, so the events that mark the day are more suited to cold or chilly weather.

In the states of New South Wales and South Australia and the Australian Capital Territory, Labor Day is observed on the first Monday in October, and the scheduled events resemble those of the countries in the northern temperate zone.

✿ EASTER

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: First Sunday after Lent

Easter celebrations in Australia are observed primarily by people of Anglo-Irish origin. They attend church services early in the morning and later have hot cross buns for breakfast. These special buns, which have a cross mark in white icing on the crust, originated in a British tradition with pre-Christian origins.

On Easter children receive chocolate eggs, though some are made with sugar and contain little toys. On Easter Sunday many families arrange Easter Egg Hunts in their homes or gardens to see who among the children can find the most eggs. Later they get together for traditional family meals (consisting of roast lamb, beef, or chicken with roasted vegetables such as potatoes, carrots, and pumpkin).

Often Easter bunnies made of chocolate are exchanged. In recent years Easter bilbies (nocturnal burrowing bandicoots) have also become popular. The bilby, an animal native to Australia, is an endangered species. Because of their endangered status, chocolate manufacturers decided to make Easter bilbies and contribute some of their profits toward protecting them from extinction.

✿ CHRISTMAS

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: December 25

Because Christmas takes place at the peak of summer in Australia, people often prefer to spend at least part of the day with their families at the beach. Christmas dinners are usually salads, cold meats, and seafood in addition to the traditional roast turkey and plum pudding. Australian children believe that Santa Claus leaves presents for them under the Christmas tree on Christmas Eve.

✿ BOXING DAY

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: December 26

Australians, like residents of other Commonwealth nations, celebrate the day after Christmas as Boxing Day. On the day after Christmas in England tradespeople and others who provided public services used to carry around small ceramic boxes to collect tips and year-end bonuses, hence the name. The alms boxes in churches were also opened, and the money in them was distributed among the poor.

Boxing Day falls during the peak of summer in Australia, so it is largely devoted to sports and outdoor activities. In Melbourne the cricket test match (a test match is considered a test of strength between national teams) starting on December 26 is called the Boxing Day Test Match and is played at the Melbourne Cricket Ground before a huge crowd. In Sydney the annual Sydney-Hobart Yacht Race, one of the biggest and most prestigious ocean racing events in the world, begins. If December 26 falls on a weekend day Boxing Day is observed on the following Monday or Tuesday.

❁ BIRTH

As they get close to giving birth, Australian Aboriginal women are accompanied by elderly women during their daily chores. The women seldom rest before delivery; what is more, they often walk a mile or two after the infant is born. A newborn Aboriginal child has a light coppery complexion, and after a few hours it is smeared with grease and charcoal to keep its skin soft and protect it from exposure.

There is great excitement among the village women and neighbors, who visit the mother and child as soon as the good news reaches them, bringing gifts of seeds or whatever else they may have.

The baby is usually wrapped and carried in cajeput bark. (The cajeput is a tropical evergreen tree, of the myrtle family, with flowers similar to those of bottlebrush and a spongy bark.)

❁ COMING OF AGE

At the age of fourteen, Aboriginal boys are recognized as young men and are expected to be initiated into manhood by being circumcised. The Aborigines call circumcision buckley. The families of the boys meet at a designated spot, at a date and time determined by the phases of the Moon. When people have assembled the boys are seized by the elders, and cords of spun hair are fastened around their arms, while the coolardie is swung vigorously in front of them. (The coolardie is a flat, carved, wooden shield, with a hole at one end through which a cord of spun hair is fastened. The end of the hair is held in the hand, and when the shield is swung around, it makes a sound that resembles the roar of a bull.)

The elders teach the novices all the ancient traditions in detail and what is expected of them on this occasion. The boys are given about three days to learn the chants and dances associated with the initiation. The novices are also taught hymns called "Nambey" and "Wallawollangoe," which are to be sung on the day of circumcision. During this period they cannot converse with young women or children, and two men acting as guards escort them everywhere. Before the actual ceremony the guards gather as many people as possible for the ceremony and feast that follow.

Only initiated males may attend the actual ceremony. At the spot selected for the circumcision, the men prepare a couch of boughs near a flat stone. The operation is performed with a piece of yellow flint kept for the purpose by each family and known as the candemerrab. The parents do not operate on their own children. The operations are performed by the boys' uncles or any one of their male tribal relatives. The youth are pinned down by four or five men, and the seasoned operators perform the task.

After the ritual is over, everyone gathers to enjoy a feast, an essential feature of this ceremony. The guests are segregated into two groups: one includes only men and elderly women; the other is restricted to younger women and children, who are supposed to have their feast some distance away. The concluding ceremony is performed about a month later when the buckley has healed.

Introduction

❁ HISTORY

The early history of what is known as Austria today was marked by the rule of various tribes such as the Celts, Romans, Vandals, Visigoths, Huns, Avars, and Slavs. These warlike tribes entered the country through the Danube Valley and replaced each other in quick succession. This continued until Charlemagne (742–814), founder of the Frankish Empire in Western Europe, established his rule in an area known as the Ostmark in 803. Gradually the region became Christianized and largely Germanic.

Austria was ruled by the Babenbergs between 976 and 1246. The Babenbergs came from Bamberg in Franconia (now known as northern Bavaria). The Babenbergs were succeeded by a powerful dynasty known as the Habsburgs, who ruled Austria from 1278 right up to World War I. The Habsburgs were one of the major ruling houses of Europe. They expanded their empire through marriage and land purchases rather than war and conquest.

The next challenge was to keep out the Turks, who were intent on invading Europe. Austria accomplished this with the help of the German and Polish armies. With peace restored Austrians began putting up grand and opulent buildings in several cities, and Vienna became a center for music under the patronage of rulers like Emperor Leopold I (1640–1705).

In 1740 Empress Maria Therese (1717–80) ascended the Austrian throne and ushered in a peaceful reign that lasted 40 years. During this period the foundation was laid for the modern Austrian state. This development was halted, however, when the French Emperor Napoleon (1769–1821) defeated Austria in the Battle of Austerlitz in 1805.

After Napoleon Bonaparte assumed the title emperor of France, Francis II (1768–1835), understanding that the old empire was finished, declared himself the emperor of Austria. In 1804 the Austrian Empire was founded and then transformed in 1867 into the Austro-Hungarian Empire. As a compromise between the Hungarian nobility and the Habsburg monarchy, the kingdom of Hungary had self-government and representation in joint affairs such as foreign relations and defense with the western and northern lands of the Austrian Empire, which were still ruled by the Habsburgs.

In 1878 Austria-Hungary occupied Bosnia-Herzegovina, which had been isolated from the Ottoman Empire by the formation of new countries in the Balkans. The territory was later annexed in 1907 and put under joint rule by the governments of both Austria and Hungary, but nationalist struggles would intensify in the following years.

Fun Fact

The name Austria is based on the German term Österreich, which means “eastern realm.” The German is probably a translation of the Latin name for the area, Marcha Orientalis, which means “eastern border.” Austria was at the eastern edge of the Holy Roman Empire.

Finally in June 1914, a Serb nationalist group in Sarajevo assassinated Emperor Franz Joseph’s nephew, the Archduke Franz Ferdinand (1863–1914). As a result, Austria-Hungary declared war on Serbia. When the Russians went to the aid of the Serbians, the conflict escalated into World War I. The countries of Germany, Austria-Hungary, Italy, the Ottoman Empire, and Bulgaria were united in an alliance during World War I, known as the Central Powers because these countries all lay between Russia in the east and France and the United Kingdom in the west. World War I ended with the defeat of the Central Powers in 1918, and this led to the breakup of the Austro-Hungarian Empire. Emperor Karl (1887–1922) of Austria, the last of the Habsburg emperors, was exiled.

After the war Austria became a much smaller country when its territory was divided into the states of Czechoslovakia, Poland, Hungary, and Yugoslavia. The country went through great economic hardships that made it a fertile ground for the growth of fascism and Nazism. Although the Treaty of Versailles and the Treaty of St. Germain had expressly opposed the unification of Austria and Germany, Nazi Germany tried its best to annex Austria during the late 1930s. Austria was finally annexed to Germany by a referendum in 1938. This annexation was called the Anschluss, literally “connection” or “political union.”

With the Allied victory ending World War II in 1945, Austria was freed from Nazi rule by the Allied Forces and divided into zones that were occupied by American, British, French, and Russian troops. They stayed on until Austria declared its neutrality a decade later.

The Austrian Independence Treaty was signed on May 15, 1955. The neutrality clause was incorporated in the constitution on October 26, 1955 and Austrian independence was restored. Its two biggest parties, the Austrian People’s Party (ÖVP) and the Social Democratic Party (SPÖ) formed a coalition led by the ÖVP. The ÖVP was a conservative democratic party based on Christian values that sought to address diverse interests by stressing the importance of expanding economic welfare and educational opportunities for all social groups.

Austria strove to overcome its economic difficulties and established a free trade treaty with the European Community (the EC, which later evolved into the European Union, or EU) in 1972. In January 1995, it formally joined the EU.

When the right-wing Freedom Party (headed by Nazi sympathizer Jörg Haider) formed a ruling coalition with the moderate right People’s Party early in 2000, the leaders of the other 14 EU members decided not to cooperate with Austria. The EU came to understand that its actions were counterproductive, and relations between Austria and other EU countries returned to normal later in 2000. Austria continues to be plagued by issues like restitution for Holocaust crimes, which is a volatile topic of public debate.

GEOGRAPHY AND CLIMATE

Mountains dominate about 60 percent of Austria in the west and south. Located in the Central Eastern Alps, Austria can be divided into the Tirolean Alps, the High and Low Tauern, the Northern Limestone Alps, the Southern Limestone Alps, and the Wienerwald Alps. The Alps have many passes and valleys that are easily traversed and so allow Austria to act as the pivot of central Europe. The country is flat or gently sloping along the eastern and northern borders and has the largest population. Winters are cold with rain and snow in the low-lying areas. Summers in Austria are moderate with short but heavy showers accompanied by thunder. The main river is the Danube. The highest peak is Grossglockner (12,457 feet) in the Central Alps.

ECONOMY

Austria has a well-developed economy, and its people enjoy a high standard of living. It has close relations with other countries in the EU, especially Germany. Between 2001 and 2003, there was an economic slump, but the economy has improved. The government’s aim is to encourage knowledge-based areas of the economy, reduce taxes, deregulate the service industries, and attract more adults to play an active role in the labor market.

In spite of the fact that Austria is a small country that suffered many setbacks as a result of World

The Thirty Years’ War

The Thirty Years’ War took place between 1618 and 1648, mainly in central Europe. Although it was primarily a religious conflict between Protestants and Catholics, the Habsburg Dynasty’s survival also depended on the outcome of the conflict.

In 1571, with religious freedom being granted to them, most Austrians chose to become Protestants. But in 1576, Emperor Rudolph II, who was a staunch Catholic, forced most of Austria to adopt the Catholic religion. In 1618, this attempt to replace Protestantism with Catholicism in Europe sparked the Thirty Years’ War. Peace was finally achieved with the Treaty of Westphalia in 1648.

War II, its economy has managed to grow steadily. It accomplished this by exporting goods such as high-quality machine tools, chemicals, and other manufactured goods to Western Europe, with Germany a major trade partner. Austria is self-reliant in food production and it has achieved this by means of subsidies. It imports fuel, especially oil, coal, and gas, and certain industrial raw materials. However, it has developed its hydroelectric power-generation capacity and, by doing so, has been able to avoid overdependence on importing fossil fuels. Austria attracts a large number of tourists and, thanks to this revenue producer, it has been able to keep its budget balanced despite the trade deficit.

Austria has worked hard to develop trade relations with its neighbors in Eastern Europe and has signed a number of mutually profitable trade agreements. In 1989 Austria sought to become a member of the European Community (EC) and is now a member of the European Union (EU).

❁ LIFESTYLE AND CULTURE

In the region now called Austria, culture goes back at least to 1050 B.C.E. when it was inhabited by the Hallstatt and La Tene cultures. Fine architecture, music, literature, and art are all a part of Austria's rich cultural heritage, which was influenced by neighboring countries including Italy, Germany, Hungary, and Bohemia. Apart from classical music, folk music and folk dance also occupy pride of place. Austria has a variety of dances such as the Schubplattler, Ländler, polka, and waltz that are well known, as well as a number of less familiar dances like the Zwiefacher, which is performed in southern Germany. Although the origins of the Ländler are unknown, it has been known by several names. At some point, it became known as Landl ob der Ens, which was shortened to Ländler. There was a time when the Catholic Church disapproved of the Ländler because it required close contact between partners of the opposite sex. It became popular around 1720 and eventually became what we know as the waltz.

These folk dances are accompanied by such musical instruments as the Styrian harmonica (a type of accordion), the fiddle, the clarinet, the harp, the flute, and brass bands as well as the contrabass or the guitar. Drums are not used, though they may accompany modern Austrian folk-pop music. The most popular form of modern Austrian folk music is Viennese Schrammelmusik. This is played with an accordion and a double-necked guitar. This type of music is a mixture of rural Austrian, Hungarian, Slovenian, Moravian, and Bavarian music.

Vienna has long been a center of musical innovation, and the patronage of the Habsburgs drew large numbers of composers during the 18th and 19th centuries. The presence of such famous composers as Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart (1756–91), Ludwig van Beethoven (1770–1827), and Johann

Adolf Hitler

Adolf Hitler was born in the Austrian town of Braunau on April 20, 1889. When he was three years old, his family moved to Passau on the German side of the border. Germany was going through hard times that paved the way for Hitler's rise to power as the leader of Germany during the 1920s and early 1930s. His attempt to seize power by force in 1923 failed, but he finally became the country's leader after being voted to power as führer and reich chancellor (president and chancellor) in 1934. Hitler tried to wipe out the Jewish race, as well as all opposition to his rule. He wanted Germany to control the world. However he was defeated by the Allies in World War II and ended his own life.

Strauss II (1825–99), among others, made the city the center of classical music in Europe.

Another kind of music for which Austria is famous is Juchizn, a kind of yodeling (throat-singing) developed in the Alps. This was a form of communication across the mountains. From Austria, it spread into Bavaria, Switzerland, and elsewhere.

Austrians have a style of clothing called country estate style. It is popular primarily with farmers, peasants, and other rural people. Girls wear a dirndl (a long skirt with a tight-fitting bodice) and boys wear shirts with lederhosen (leather shorts or trousers with suspenders).

❁ CUISINE

Austrian food has been influenced by Hungarian, Czech, Jewish, and Italian cuisines. Goulash is one such dish, which traces its roots to Hungary. Austrian pastries and sweet dishes are acknowledged for their excellence throughout the world. New regional cuisines that make use of easy methods of cooking are also gaining popularity in Austria.

Meat and dumplings form the core of Austrian cuisine. It is hearty, simple food, and the best-known dish is probably Wiener schnitzel, which originated in Vienna. It consists of a fried cutlet, most often veal, batter-fried with egg and bread-crumbs. Beuschel, which means calf's lights (lungs), is made of thin slices of calf's lungs and heart. The most well-known Austrian dessert is Apfelstrudel (a kind of apple pie), which is made with baked dough filled with a variety of fruits and a sprinkling of raisins and cinnamon. Other dishes include: Topfenstrudel (a cream cheese strudel), Salzburger Nockerln (Salzburg dumpling), which is a meringuelike dish, Palatschinken (a Viennese crêpe, from the Hungarian

The city of Salzburg was the setting for one of the world's favorite musicals, the Oscar-winning film The Sound of Music (1965), with the Alps providing some breathtaking scenery.

The Waltz King

Johann Strauss II (1825–99) was a gifted Austrian composer who popularized the waltz in Vienna during the 19th century. The waltz had been nothing more than a rural folk dance (the Ländler) until Strauss elevated it to a sophisticated, stately dance popular in the courts. He was known as “The Waltz King,” and is especially famous for a waltz titled “The Blue Danube.”

palacsinta), Powidl (a plum preserve), Sacher torte (a chocolate cake named for 19th- and 20th-century restaurant owners), Tafelspitz (boiled oxtail, often served with apple and horseradish sauce), Selchfleisch (smoked meat) with sauerkraut, and Rindsuppe (beef soup). Austrian beer, wine, and coffee are also celebrated for their superior quality.

To round off a meal, Austrians usually have a glass of schnapps or fruit brandy. The latter beverage is made from a variety of plants and fruits including apricots, rowanberries, gentian roots, or various herbs. It is made in small private schnapps distilleries known as Selberbrennter or Hausbrand. There are almost 20,000 such distilleries in Austria.

Between meals, Austrians like to snack on open sandwiches. These are made using a variety of sausages, along with mustard and bread. The sausage is sliced, and rolls are usually used. Other favorites include bosna, a spiced bratwurst in a hotdog roll that can be found at any roadside fast-food eatery.

A Musical Prodigy

Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart was born on January 27, 1756, in Salzburg. Even as a child he was thought of as a musical genius. At the age of six he made his first attempts at composition. Mozart is considered one of the world's greatest composers. He created 24 operas, including The Magic Flute, Don Giovanni, and The Marriage of Figaro, over 50 symphonies, and 17 masses. Apart from Mozart, Austria has given the world other well-known composers including Franz-Joseph Haydn, Franz Schubert, Anton Bruckner, Johann Strauss Sr., Johann Strauss Jr., and Gustav Mahler.

many countries. New Year's Eve in Austria is known as Sylvesterabend, or the eve of St. Sylvester. According to legend, St. Sylvester slew the evil serpent-dragon Leviathan in 1000 C.E. Leviathan, said to feed on other dragons, was so big that its coils surrounded the planet. This monster was expected to appear, devour the land and all the people, and set fire to the heavens, but St. Sylvester slew Leviathan.

Taverns and inns are festively decorated with confetti, evergreen wreaths, and streamers. In St. Sylvester's honor a traditional punch made with cinnamon, sugar, and red wine is drunk, as well as champagne. To rid themselves of evil spirits from the past year, cannons, called Böllers, are fired. People attend midnight mass and trumpets are blown from the church steeple at midnight. The Vienna State Opera and the Vienna Philharmonic perform Die Fledermaus every New Year's Eve and again on New Year's Day. Concerts and grand balls take place all over Vienna in celebration of the New Year.

The elaborate balls held in Vienna and other cities are known all over the world. Soothsayers predict the future by reading the lead shapes (Bleigiessen) created when molten lead is poured into a bucket of water. Pork and carp are among the foods eaten because they are believed to bring good luck, and good luck charms (Glücksbringer), chocolate and marzipan candies shaped like horseshoes, gold coins, pigs, and four-leaf clovers are exchanged.

LABOR DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: May 1

In many parts of the world May 1 is celebrated as Labor Day, May Day, or Workers' Day to commemorate the important role played by workers in building nations and societies. Some claim the observance was started by the International Socialist movement in 1889, and scheduled to coincide with a strike called by U.S. workers demanding an eight-hour workday, but the date and many of the festivities also borrow from the European pagan spring celebrations forbidden by the Catholic Church.

Austrians celebrate Labor Day with parades, and businesses and government offices are closed.

After World War II, Austria was occupied by the Allies (Soviet Union, United States, Great Britain, and France). Though the occupation forces allowed the Austrians to elect their representatives democratically, every law and action had to have the Allies' consent. This occupation came to an end with the signing of the State Treaty. On May 15, 1955, this treaty was signed in Vienna's Schloss Belvedere.

National Day commemorates the withdrawal of the last foreign troops from Austrian territory and marks the emergence of Austria as an independent and sovereign nation. The Austrian parliament also passed a law establishing permanent neutrality since it wanted to maintain a unilateral and independent position. On this day, people like to take long walks in a display of fitness, and it is celebrated as a kind of patriotic "fitness" day. The public is given free access to museums and the parliament building, and all commercial establishments are closed.

❁ GOOD FRIDAY

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: Friday before Easter

This Christian festival commemorates the Crucifixion of Jesus. It has been in the Christian liturgical calendar even longer than Easter has although no one is sure why it is called "Good" Friday. Some have suggested that the use of good in the name goes back to Old English and means "God's Friday," while others interpret good to mean something like "observed as holy." This observance is also known as Black Friday and Sorrowful Friday, and in Eastern Orthodox churches it is called Great Friday.

For many years Good Friday was primarily a Catholic observance, but many Protestant churches now hold special services from noon till three in the afternoon on this day to symbolize Jesus' last hours on the cross. Many of the faithful fast on this day; when they eat, it is generally fish instead of meat.

Fun Fact

Danish pastry is said to be a Viennese creation, and in Denmark it is called wienerbrød (Viennese bread).

Fun Fact

“Silent Night” was sung for the first time in 1818, in the village church of Oberndorf in Austria. On Christmas Eve the priest discovered that the church organ was not working; there were holes in the bellows that pumped air through the pipes. The priest decided to ask the organist, Franz Bauer, to play a Christmas hymn that he had written because Bauer composed music that could be played on a guitar.

Easter is a Christian feast that celebrates Jesus’ Resurrection from the dead on the third day after his Crucifixion. It falls on the first Sunday after Lent and is celebrated by Christians the world over. Since Austria is a staunchly Catholic country, Easter occupies a paramount position among all the religious festivals. It is a family time in Austria. In Vienna and Salzburg Easter concerts featuring classical music are popular. Easter bread is braided and baked for the Easter feast. Easter celebrations extend through Sunday to Monday in Austria. The first Monday after Lent is celebrated as Easter Monday.

❁ CHRISTMAS

Observed by: Christians
Observed on: December 25

Christmas is a day of great joy for Christians because it celebrates the birth of Jesus. On Christmas Eve in Austria, chorale music played on brass instruments can be heard in churches and carol singers go from house to house with blazing torches, bearing a manger. At the end of this ritual, the carolers assemble on the steps of the church. Families enjoy a lavish Christmas Eve meal that usually features carp as the main course.

Austrians believe in treating Christmas as a day of rest, attending church or visiting family. Friends and relatives are usually invited to join in the Christmas dinner, which features a roast goose.

Austrians do not believe in Santa Claus. Children believe that their gifts are brought by a golden-haired baby with wings, called Kristkindl, who represents the baby Jesus. The story goes that on Christmas Eve the baby Jesus comes down from heaven with a group of angels and decorates and distributes Christmas trees. There is a lot of carol singing (several of the world's favorite carols originated in Austria).

❁ ST. STEPHEN'S DAY

Observed by: Christians
Observed on: December 26

St. Stephen's Day is a legal holiday, a day set aside for visiting. It is seen as a day of rest after Christmas. This day honors St. Stephen, the first Christian martyr, who was stoned to death shortly after Jesus was crucified. It is also called Boxing Day in many countries because tradespeople and those who performed services went from door to door with small ceramic boxes, seeking tips and year-end bonuses. It was also the day that alms boxes in churches were opened and their contents distributed among the poor.

❁ AUSTRIAN HARVEST FESTIVALS

Observed in: Nationwide
Observed by: General Public
Observed on: September

The new wine season is ushered in with outdoor wine tastings and picnics featuring music in the background. The season for these festivals, typically celebrated in Heurigen (wine restaurants), begins with St. Leopold's feast day (also called Leopoldstag or Goose Day). St. Leopold III (1073–1136), marquis of Austria, is the country's patron saint. He is remembered for his generosity and humility.

One place Austrians like to celebrate this day is Klosterneuberg Abbey (founded by St. Leopold), where, over the centuries, the monks have produced their famed Leopoldsberg wine. A unique custom on this day is Fasselrutschen, which requires people to climb onto a huge 12,000-gallon cask and slide down the wooden side for luck. The harder the ride, the better the luck. The abbot had this barrel made for the abbey's wine cellar in 1704. People from all classes queue up to try out the "great leveler."

With various venues, the Bregenz Festival adds even more luster to the rich cultural and artistic traditions of which Austria is justly proud.

Rites of Passage

❁ BIRTH

In Austria, families get a lot of help and support from society. It is illegal for pregnant women to work eight weeks before the date their babies are due and eight weeks after birth. During this period they are given leave with full pay. The parents are entitled to two years of maternity or paternity leave and can split the leave time between them.

Baptism, as practiced by Austria's predominantly Catholic population, is a water purification ritual that is performed on children after birth to initiate them into the Church. Baptism is performed in church by a priest. This ritual can be traced back to John the Baptist, who is believed to have baptized Jesus in the Jordan River. Baptism stands for the cleansing of sins and the union of the person with Jesus.

Baptism in the Roman Catholic Church takes place during the Sunday service. The parents choose godparents to help them in the child's spiritual and religious upbringing. The priest usually performs the rites with the family and other guests gathered around him. The baby is carried by either of its parents. The priest blesses the water in the font in front of him. (The font is a fairly big marble container.) He then prays for the child and thanks God for the new life. The parents and godparents are reminded of their own faith and beliefs. The parents are asked to give the child its name. The priest repeats the name. He then holds the baby and pours a little water over its head with the words, "I baptize you in the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit." He takes some holy oil and makes the sign of the cross on the child's forehead. The parents and the godparents are given a candle to hold as they watch the rites being administered and make a promise to bring the child up as a Christian.

✿ COMING OF AGE

For Roman Catholics the First Communion is an important ceremony. It is the time when the body and blood of Jesus, in the form of bread and wine, is received by a child for the first time. It is a sacrament administered to children when they reach the age of discretion, usually from the age of seven on.

The other major coming-of-age ceremony is confirmation. It is a sacrament in which the Eucharist is given to those who have already been baptized. The bishop administers it in church. He prays and anoints the forehead of each child. The confirmation ends with the bishop's blessing.

✿ MARRIAGE

In Austria church weddings are optional but a civil ceremony is mandatory if the marriage is to be considered legal. During the time needed to get ready for the wedding, the couple concerned must be physically present in the country. If only one of them is available, he or she has to get signed permission from the other person on a form known as Ermächtigung. The forms can be obtained from the standesamt (vital statistics) offices. If neither partner can be present before the ceremony, special arrangements can be made to hold the wedding anyway.

After the wedding ceremony the bride and groom compete for the title of head of the household. This privilege goes to the person who is the first to buy something after the wedding ceremony. The bride usually wins by buying some small item—like a pin—from her bridesmaid.

✿ DEATH

In a Catholic burial the body of the deceased is prepared and then laid out in a coffin. The coffin is taken to the burial site, where a priest conducts a prayer service before the coffin is lowered into the grave. However, the body can be laid to rest only after certain formalities have been completed. When death occurs the first formality is to get a coroner's certificate. This is known as a Todesbescheinigung in Vienna and the Totenbeschaubefund in the other Austrian provinces. Only after the coroner's release can the certificate of death be issued by the registrar's office in the district where the person died.

Introduction

❁ HISTORY

Historically Azerbaijan has been occupied by a variety of peoples including Persians, Romans, Arabs, Turks, Mongols, and Russians. The region has been inhabited for at least 3,000 years. Bronze Age settlements have been found in and around the capital of Baku. The first state to emerge in the territory of present-day Azerbaijan was Mannai, in the ninth century B.C.E. It lasted until it was overthrown a century later by the Medes, who were Zoroastrians. They established an empire that included southernmost Azerbaijan. In the sixth century the Archaemenid Persians, under Cyrus the Great (585–29), took over the western part of Azerbaijan when the Persians subdued the Assyrians to the west. In 330, Alexander the Great (356–23) absorbed the entire Archaemenid Empire into his conquests, leaving behind Persian satraps (governors) to rule. According to one account, Atropates (c. 370–221), one of Alexander's Persian generals, whose name means "protected by fire," gave his name to the region when Alexander made him its governor. Another legend explains that Azerbaijan's name derives from the Persian words meaning "the land of fire," a reference either to the natural burning of surface oil deposits or to the oil-fueled fires in temples of the once-dominant Zoroastrian religion.

In the first century C.E. the Romans assumed control, followed by the Persians in the fourth century once again. Arabs had gained control by the eleventh century, only to be replaced by the Seljuk Turks, who laid the foundation of modern Azerbaijan. Overrun much later by Mongols, the region was divided into several principalities after the fall of Taimur Lang (Timur the Lame, 1336–1405), ruler of the Timurid Empire (1370–1405) in Central Asia, which survived until 1506.

Commonwealth of Independent States (CIS)

The Commonwealth of Independent States (CIS) was created in December 1991 after the disintegration of the Soviet Union. In the declaration adopted by the participants, they asserted that sovereign equality would be the basis of their interaction. In the early years of the 21st century, CIS included Azerbaijan, Armenia, Belarus, Georgia, Kazakhstan, Kyrgyzstan, Moldova, Russia, Tajikistan, Turkmenistan, Uzbekistan, and Ukraine. In September 1993 the heads of these states signed an agreement creating an economic union with the following objectives: to provide a common economic platform based on the free movement of goods, services, labor, and capital; to coordinate monetary, tax, price, customs, and external economic policy; to standardize methods of regulating economic activity; and to create conditions favorable to the development of direct production.

Eventually Azerbaijan was acquired by Russia from Persia through the treaties of Gulistan (1813) and Turkamanchai (1828). During the Bolshevik Revolution of 1917 Russian Azerbaijan joined Armenia and Georgia to form the anti-Bolshevik Trans-Caucasian Federation. After that federation was dissolved in May 1918 Azerbaijan proclaimed itself independent; but in 1920 it was conquered by the Red Army and made into a Soviet republic. In 1922 Azerbaijan officially joined the USSR as a member of the Transcaucasian Soviet Federated Republic. It became a separate republic again due to an administrative reorganization in 1936.

During the late 1980s, ethnic Armenians in the Nagorno-Karabakh region pressed for its unification with Armenia, leading to a guerrilla war and violent conflicts between the two republics in 1992. The Armenian side gained effective control of the region and some adjoining Azerbaijani territory by 1994, when a cease-fire was reached with Russian mediation. Approximately one million Azeris were made refugees within Azerbaijan. Attempts to fully resolve the conflict have proved unsuccessful. Azerbaijan has offered the region a high degree of autonomy, but the Armenians there have insisted on independence or union with Armenia.

Azerbaijan declared itself independent of the USSR in August 1991 and became a member of the Commonwealth of Independent States. In 1992 Abulfaz Elchibey (1938–2000), leader of the Popular Front party, was elected president, but he was ousted by the parliament a year later after a military coup. Heydar Aliyev (?1923–2003), leader of the Azerbaijan Communist party from 1969 to 1982, assumed power and was confirmed in office by an election in 1993. Aliyev promoted the exploitation of the country's oil resources in the Caspian Sea through agreements with Russia and several Western oil companies for development. A popular leader Aliyev was reelected twice. However the ailing president withdrew from the October 2003 election in favor of his son Ilham Aliyev (b. 1961), who was elected in a landslide victory.

GEOGRAPHY AND CLIMATE

Azerbaijan is located in the southeastern part of the Greater Caucasus Mountains on the shore of the Caspian Sea. It is divided into two parts: the Nakhichevan Autonomous Republic, which is separated from the main part of the country by about 30 miles of Armenia; and the Autonomous Oblast of Nagorno-Karabakh, which, following a war with Armenia in the early 1990s, declared itself an independent republic. It is now mostly under Armenian control, as is much of the territory immediately surrounding it.

Azerbaijan is surrounded by mountains, except for its Caspian shoreline in the east and some areas bordering Georgia and Iran. To the northeast, bordering Russia's Dagestan Autonomous Republic, is the Greater Caucasus range; to the west, bordering Armenia, is the Lesser Caucasus range. To the extreme southeast the Talysh mountain range forms a part of the country's border with Iran. Baku, the capital, is located on the Apsheron Peninsula, which juts out into the Caspian Sea.

The highest peaks are in the Greater Caucasus, where Mount Bazar-dyuzi rises 15,551 feet above sea level. Eight large rivers flow down from the Caucasus ranges into the central Kura-Aras lowlands through alluvial flatlands and low delta areas along the coast of the Caspian Sea. The Mtkvari ("slow one"), the longest river in the Caucasus region, forms its delta and drains into the Caspian a short distance downstream from the confluence with the Aras, its main tributary. Most of the country's rivers are not navigable. Only about 15 percent of the country's land is suited to agriculture.

The climate of the country varies immensely, from subtropical and dry in its central and eastern parts to subtropical and humid in the southeast. It is temperate along the shores of the Caspian Sea, and cold in the higher mountain regions. Baku enjoys mild weather, averaging 39°F in January and 77°F in July.

Since most of Azerbaijan receives scant rainfall—an average 6 to 10 inches annually—agricultural areas require irrigation. The heaviest rainfall occurs in the highest elevations of the Caucasus and in the Lenkoran lowlands, in the far southeast, where the yearly average exceeds 39 inches.

ECONOMY

Azerbaijan is industrially underdeveloped compared with the neighboring regions of Armenia and Georgia. It resembles the Central Asian states in its majority Muslim population, high rates of unemployment, and low standard of living. The chief commercial products are oil, cotton, and gas. Production from the Caspian oil and gas fields declined during the 1990s, but things have been slowly returning to normal during the last few years. A number of major oil field agreements, worth about US$35 billion, were finalized in the early years of the 21st century.

Azerbaijan, like many of the other former Soviet republics, has gone through a difficult transition from a command- to a market-driven economy. Its considerable energy resources, however, make its long-term prospects look good. A major short-term obstacle to economic progress (including foreign investment) is the continuing conflict with Armenia over the Armenian-dominated region of Nagorno-Karabakh. Trade with Russia and the other former Soviet republics is declining in importance, while trade is increasing with European Union (EU) countries, as well as Turkey, Iran, and the United Arab Emirates (UAE).

❁ CULTURE AND LIFESTYLE

About 90 percent of the Azerbaijani population is ethnic Azeri, supplemented by a smattering of Dagestanis, Russians, Armenians, and Jews. Most Azerbaijanis speak Azeri, (related to Turkish) and Russian. Despite attempts on the part of the Soviet regime to wipe it out, Islam remains the most popular religion with Azerbaijanis, followed by various Orthodox Christian sects. Azerbaijan is one of the most liberal Muslim-majority states.

The Azerbaijani have inherited a unique and harmonious blend of Islamic and European cultures. Around 1050 the country enjoyed a cultural renaissance, as exemplified by its many great architectural and artistic achievements during that time. Azerbaijani architecture has gone through many different stages since then, but the rich legacy of the medieval period has been preserved, as is evident in the Maiden Tower and the palace of the Shirvan Shahs in Baku. The capital's ornately decorated subway stations are more recent architectural accomplishments.

The country has a diverse literary heritage, much of which is derived from an oral tradition of poems and ancient epics. Perhaps the most well-known work is the Book of Dede Korkut, an epic about the Oghuz Turks, a collection of tales that take place in pre-Islamic Azerbaijan and Central Asia. Written around the sixth or seventh century, it is valued both as literature and as an important historical document that provides insights into the language, way of life, religions, traditions, and social norms of the people who once inhabited this region. It has been translated into many languages.

Historically, Nizami Ganjavi (?1140–?1217) has been held up as one of Azerbaijan's greatest poets, although Iranians can also claim him since he wrote in Persian. Perhaps his best-known play concerns Layla and Majnun, two lovers whose story is told as a religious morality play. The Sufis consider Layla and Majnun an especially important parable.

Azerbaijani literature again flourished during the 16th century, when folk literature grew and minstrels and bards developed Ashiglar poetry. It was also during this time that Shah Ismail, using the pen name Khatayi, produced Divani Xetayi, his most famous work. He is also known for developing a unique literary style known as Qoshma, which was further developed by Shah Tahmasp, his successor. In the mid-19th century Mirza Fatali Akhundzada contributed to the beginnings of modern Azerbaijani literature, especially drama.

Azerbaijan is also famous for its embroidered textiles. Artists use colorful threads (often made of gold or silver) and beads to create geometric patterns on a thin wool fabric called tirme. The country's flora and wildlife are featured in many designs and patterns. Other popular Azerbaijani textiles include carpets, veils, shawls, and towels.

The country's musical traditions are preserved by ashugs, or poet-singers, who play the kobuz (a stringed instrument) while singing ballads about their ancient heroes. Another popular form of music in Azerbaijan is mugam, a kind of improvisational music often compared to jazz, in which the voice, and wind and stringed instruments are prominent.

CUISINE

Azerbaijan is often called “the home of long life,” and scientific research attributes the longevity of the Azeri peoples not only to the excellent climate they enjoy, but also to their healthful and nourishing cuisine, which relies heavily on meat, fish, and vegetable dishes made of beets, cabbage, eggplants, and spinach. Many dishes use saffron, along with coriander, fennel, mint, and parsley. Soup is also a staple of Azerbaijani cuisine, often made with meat and sheep fat seasoned with greens and spices. While it resembles the cooking of its neighbors, Azeri food has a character all its own, and each region has its own specialties. As is the case with other Azeri arts, the recipes are refined and require time and practice to prepare correctly.

A salient trait of Azeri cooking is a combination of tart and sweet flavors, produced by mixing pomegranate juice, dried lemons, and sour plums with dried fruits (mainly apricots, quince, and raisins). Chestnuts are used to garnish meat and other dishes, and fresh pomegranate seeds may be scattered across the plate immediately before it is brought to the guests. More familiar items, such as kebabs, dolmas, and baklava reflect the influences of Turkish, Greek, and Lebanese culinary arts. Azeri pilaf has nearly a hundred variations but, instead of being prepared in one pot, the rice and seasonings are cooked in separate pots and then served separately, with melted butter in a jug. Azeri dolma, is usually made of minced lamb meat seasoned with coriander, dill, mint, pepper, cinnamon, and melted butter, and rice wrapped in grape leaves (Yarpag dolmasy), but it can also be wrapped in cabbage leaves (Kyalyam dolmasy). Numerous variations of dolma are also common, and aubergines (eggplants), potatoes, tomatoes, peppers, onions, quince, and apples can also be stuffed with lamb meat. Sour milk can be used as a sauce.

Kingal, a dish made with meat, fried onion, kurut (a dry cottage cheese), and flour, is popular in the northwest, whereas in the Lenkoran region, along the coast of the Caspian Sea, chicken stuffed with nuts, onion, and jelly, and then fried is a favorite recipe. The Apsheron peninsula is famous for its dushpara, small meat dumplings, and kutabs, meat patties wrapped in very thin dough. Bread is served with most meals, the most common being the round loaves called chorek and lavash, a flat bread. Tea (çay), primarily black tea, is central to all social, family, and even business occasions. It is served in small pear-shaped glasses called armuds (literally, “pear”), and is often accompanied with various jams, nuts, or raisins. An unusual tea is also brewed with cinnamon (darchin) and ginger. Kvas (from Russian, “sour beverage”), unknown to most Westerners, is a nonalcoholic fermented drink made from malt. It is sold on the streets and is a refreshing drink on a summer day.

Public/Legal Holidays

New Year's Eve/Day

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: December 31–January 1

In Azerbaijan, the New Year celebration is a family holiday. Traditionally, families decorate a New Year tree (much like a Christmas tree) on New Year's Eve, December 31. It is removed only after the official passing of the old year (January 13). An important feature of the celebrations is the presence of a character resembling Santa Claus, called Ded Moroz (in Russian) or Shakhta Babah (in Azerbaijani), and his granddaughter Snegurochka. They are believed to bring gifts for children on New Year's Eve. It is also a common practice for family members and friends to get together on December 31. They toast the departing year and welcome the new one at the stroke of midnight.

MARTYRS' DAY

of Armenia, which was backed by the Soviet army. To control the protestors the Soviets resorted to violence that led to the death of hundreds of innocent people. On this day Azerbaijanis pay tribute to the patriotism and valor of those who died.

❁ INTERNATIONAL WOMEN'S DAY

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: March 8

International Women's Day is a global event commemorated at the United Nations and observed by women's organizations in many countries. In Azerbaijan, Women's Day is an official holiday. On this occasion the women of Azerbaijan, regardless of their ethnic or linguistic backgrounds, come together in solidarity. At seminars and workshops organized for the occasion, they work toward equality, justice, peace, and development.

❁ NAVRUZ

Observed on: March 21

Although celebrated in some Islamic countries, Navruz, or Nawruz, is not a religious holiday. In fact, it celebrates the vernal equinox, the beginning of spring, when days and night are of equal length. Navruz is thought to have originated in ancient Mesopotamia and to have been celebrated even in pre-Islamic times. In ancient Babylon the New Year was celebrated around the same time, on the 21st day of Nissanu (March–April). Festivities lasted 12 days, each of which was commemorated with individual rites, amusements, and performances.

In addition to being the Azeri New Year, Navruz also heralds the commencement of agricultural activities and the gradual onset of warm weather. It is the day when conflicts and hostilities are forgotten and forgiven. On this day the people of Azerbaijan greet each other and enjoy lavish feasts. An atmosphere of friendliness prevails.

❁ LABOR DAY

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: May 1

Labor Day, also called May Day or Workers' Day, is the international workers' holiday observed on May 1 by former Communist countries and many socialist states. Since the Second Socialist International first declared a strike to demand an eight-hour workday in 1889, this day has been set aside to honor laborers and workers of the world for their contributions and to raise awareness of workers' rights. All the government offices, business establishments, and schools in Azerbaijan are closed. The day is observed with labor union activities, including marches, meetings, and speeches.

❁ VICTORY DAY

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: May 9

On this day, also known as Celebration of War Veterans' Day, the Soviet Union scored a decisive victory over their Fascist enemies (Germany and Italy) toward the end of World War II. Though the Soviet Union and Azerbaijan's membership in it no longer exist, Victory Day is still an official holiday. It was, indeed, a turning point in the history of the region. Azerbaijanis spend the day in leisure activities.

❁ REPUBLIC DAY

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: May 28

It was on this day in 1918 that the first independent Democratic Republic of Azerbaijan (ADR) was formed. Two years later it was invaded by the Red Army and annexed to the Soviet Union as the Azerbaijan Soviet Socialist Republic. The historic formation of the ADR is considered the most important national holiday in Azerbaijan. It is celebrated by Azeris with parades and public speeches, flag-raising, and parties.

❁ SALVATION DAY

Observed on: June 15

In the political history of Azerbaijan, Salvation Day, or Day of National Salvation, has great significance. It was on this day in 1993 that the country's parliament invited the Communist-backed leader Heydar Aliyev to Baku to assume the stewardship of the nation's political future. All government offices, schools, and educational institutions are closed. There are some public events, though people generally spend this holiday quietly with their families.

❁ ARMY AND NAVY DAY

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: October 9

This is a day when Azerbaijanis celebrate the courage of their armed forces. Baku hosts a magnificent military parade, with different contingents wearing the colors of their regiments. Impressive displays of tanks and other weaponry are also part of the parade. In other towns and regions celebrations take place on a more modest scale. Military awards and honors are conferred on this day, and fund-raising events for veterans are held.

INDEPENDENCE DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: October 18

On October 18, 1991, the parliament of Azerbaijan adopted the Constitutional Act of Independence, later approved by referendum on December 30 of the same year. This is a landmark in the history of Azerbaijan because it took place shortly after the disintegration of the Soviet Union, which had included Azerbaijan as a federated republic. This day is an official holiday in Azerbaijan, marked by flag-raising, speeches, and parades.

CONSTITUTION DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: November 12

This day marks the adoption of the Constitution of independent Azerbaijan in 1995. The event is remembered by every citizen of Azerbaijan with pride and solemnity. The Constitution, drawn up under the supervision of President Heydar Aliyev, is based on the centuries-old principles of lawmaking and judicial traditions of the country. On this occasion parades and public speeches take place in the capital as well as other areas. This is an official holiday when all business transactions and commercial activities come to a standstill.

REVIVAL DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: November 17

Revival Day, also known as Day of National Revival, commemorates the first uprising of the Popular Front in Azerbaijan in 1988. The group was protesting Moscow's policies toward Azerbaijan, particularly in the context of the Nagorno-Karabakh conflict, ignited by separatist Armenians wishing to merge their region with Armenia. This is an official holiday, and all public establishments are closed. There are official government ceremonies with speeches; the people spend this day in leisure and recreational activities.

DAY OF AZERI SOLIDARITY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: December 31

When Russia acquired Azerbaijan from Persia in the early 1800s, a sizable portion of the country had been retained by what is now Iran. Azeris still claim this as a rightful part of their country, since approximately 25–30 million Azeris are thought to be living in Iran. In 1989, while the Soviet Union was still in existence, some spirited Azerbaijanis broke down the international borders separating them from the territory of Iran. The commemoration of this event originated at the initiative of President Heydar Aliyev. It is a day when Azerbaijanis promote their culture and seek to foster feelings of friendship and belonging with Azeris outside of Azerbaijan. Cultural programs and speeches by prominent personalities highlight this occasion, which is also known by the name Azerbaijani Solidarity Day.

Religious Holidays

EL AM HEJIR

Observed by: Muslims

Observed on: First of Muharram, the first month of the Islamic calendar

The Islamic New Year is celebrated on the first day of Muharram according to the Islamic calendar. Its corresponding date on the Western (Gregorian) calendar is different every year. This is because Islam uses a lunar calendar based on the revolutions of the Moon and has only 354 days in its year. Thus the Islamic year loses 11 days annually in comparison with the Western year.

The beginning of the new year is usually quiet, unlike New Year's celebrations associated with other calendars. In Azerbaijan Muslims gather in mosques for special prayers and readings. A major part of the holiday is a recitation of the story of the Hegira—Muhammad's flight from Mecca to Medina. Muslims also reflect on the ephemeral quality of life and the fleeting nature of time.

EID AL-FITR

Observed by: Muslims

Observed on: First of Shawwal, the 10th month of the Islamic calendar

Ramadan is considered the holiest month of the Islamic calendar. It was during this month that Muhammad fasted for 40 days, after which the angel Jibril (Gabriel) revealed the Koran to him. Eid al-Fitr, or Ramazon Bayram (from the Turkish, meaning "small feast"), celebrates the end of the month-long fast that devout Muslims observe during Ramadan. Azerbaijanis celebrate by participating in morning prayers, generally in mosques and idgahs (communal open-air places for prayer). These rituals are followed by social visits, exchanges of greetings and gifts, and feasting. Sewiyan, a vermicelli pudding, is a special dish prepared for this occasion.

EID AL-ADHA

Observed by: Muslims

Observed on: Tenth of Dhu al-Hijjah, the 12th month of the Islamic calendar

Eid al-Adha, or Qurban Bayram ("Feast of Sacrifice"), celebrates the patriarch Ibrahim's (Abraham's) absolute devotion to his God, manifested by his willingness to sacrifice his young son because Allah had commanded him to do so. In Azerbaijan on this day every Muslim family that can afford it is expected to sacrifice an animal (a sheep, goat, ram, or cow) in the name of Allah; this sanctified meat is then divided among friends, family, and the poor. Prior to this festival, devout Muslims may undertake a hajj, or pilgrimage, to Mecca, which is the central city of the Islamic faith.

Rites of Passage

❁ COMING OF AGE

In the Islamic countries where circumcision (khitān) is practiced, the boy usually undergoes the operation between the ages of 10 and 12. This is a rite of puberty, separating the boy from childhood and introducing him to his new status and responsibilities as a man. In Azerbaijan's Muslim families, circumcisions are attended by a great deal of festivity, music, food, and many guests.

❁ MARRIAGE

Weddings in traditional Azerbaijan society involve many ceremonies and rites that are intended to protect the couple from harm, disease, and evil forces. Traditionally, the wedding cycle is divided into three stages: the prewedding period, the wedding itself, and the postwedding period. During the prewedding period, the family of a young man chooses a young woman and negotiates the match, securing the consent of the young woman and her family. The engagement (nischān) follows. The engagement ceremony is arranged in the bride's house and the bridegroom's relatives bring her gifts. These gifts include sweetmeats, shoes, silk and woolen stockings (zorabs), and sugar loaves. A ring is given to the bride during the engagement.

The period between the engagement and the wedding can vary from two months to two years. A few days prior to the wedding, the ceremony known as parča bichini (cutting the wedding dress) is observed, when women of both families come together to cut out the fabric for the bride's wedding dress. The day before the bride is scheduled to leave for her husband's home, the bridesmaids anoint her hands and feet (kbna yakhti). This rite symbolizes the maiden becoming a woman. Dancing and singing accompany the bride's last night in her parents' home.

On the actual day of the wedding the bride is brought to the bridegroom's house where she is showered with corn kernels and presented with sweets and coins. She steps over a piece of metal at the threshold of her new home, a symbolic act of tenacity and faithfulness. A little boy is then made to sit on her lap, the hope being that her firstborn will be male.

The postwedding rites include usa chihd, the first time the newlywed appears in public and removes her veil. The guests in attendance present the couple with valuables and domestic utensils. The final stage is the visit of the couple to the bride's father's house, three or four days after the wedding.

Introduction

❁ HISTORY

The first inhabitants of The Bahamas, officially, the Commonwealth of the Bahamas, were the Siboney (also spelled Ciboney), a people who lived off of conch and fish. The shells and jewelry they left behind indicate that they may have lived in the Bahamas as long as 7,000 years ago. The Siboney disappeared and were replaced by the Lucayans—the “island people”—around 900 C.E. The Lucayans, who were related to the Taino, left the Lesser Antilles to avoid their enemies, the Caribs. They were a peaceful people, farmers who lived in thatch huts and used stone tools. There may have been as many as 50,000 Lucayans when Christopher Columbus (1451–1506) arrived (it is believed he landed at San Salvador, although some historians think he landed at Cat Island.) But they had been completely annihilated by 1520 (1507, according to some accounts) because the Spanish slave traders had shipped them to Hispaniola to work in the gold mines. It is largely the descendants of the freed slaves, taken from Africa to replace the enslaved indigenous people, who make up the population of The Bahamas today. Europeans and others compose a small percentage of Bahamians.

In 1647 a group of Bermudan religious refugees arrived at the islands. The next year Puritans from England (the “Eleutheran Adventurers”) were shipwrecked off Eleuthera, settled on it, and named it from the Spanish word for “freedom.” The Bahamas became a British Crown Colony in 1717. Groups of settlers escaping persecution and war—first, British Loyalists from the American Revolution (1775–83), and then later expatriates from the American Civil War (1861–65)—arrived. The United Kingdom outlawed slave ships in 1807, and the Royal Navy abandoned the slaves it freed on The Bahamas, making them the last group of refugees from persecution to make their home there.

The sea routes, islands, and the gold on Spanish ships attracted pirates to The Bahamas, including the more notorious ones such as Blackbeard. However, they were not the only ones plundering Spanish galleons carrying gold to Spain. There were the privateers as well, who worked under the aegis of the British Crown, complete with a Letter of Marquee that effectively authorized their plundering. They soon found British Navy ships as profitable as the merchant vessels. Interestingly it was a former pirate Woodes Rogers (?1679–1732) who became the royal governor in 1718 and cleaned up the islands by granting amnesty to his reformed peers and by hunting down the more recalcitrant ones like Blackbeard and Charles Vane, who escaped. Blackbeard was killed in 1718 in a sea battle.

When the U.S. Civil War ended in 1865, so did The Bahamas' prosperity. In 1919, however, when the United States ratified the 14th amendment banning alcoholic beverages, smuggling became lucrative. So great was the flow of alcohol from The Bahamas to the United States, especially Scotch whisky, that the British government enlarged Prince George Wharf in Nassau to accommodate the smugglers. When Prohibition ended, the Bahama islands went into an economic slump that lasted until World War II, when an air and naval base was built, bringing jobs for many people.

In 1961 when Fidel Castro (b. 1926) took over Cuba and closed its casinos to U.S. tourists, The Bahamas's economic future brightened once more, and tourist dollars began to flow again. In 1964 Great Britain granted the islands limited self-government, and in 1969 The Bahamas joined the Commonwealth. On July 10, 1973, The Bahamas became an independent nation.

❁ GEOGRAPHY AND CLIMATE

The Commonwealth of the Bahamas, or The Bahamas, as the country is popularly known, is located in the North Atlantic Ocean. Composed of about 700 islands and 2,000 cays (pronounced “keys”), the archipelago is situated northeast of Cuba and southeast of Florida. Nassau, the capital city, is located on New Providence Island. This and Grand Bahama are the largest islands in the archipelago. The climate is tropical—hot, sunny, and humid—with waters warmed by the Gulf Stream.

❁ ECONOMY

The scarcity of natural resources that frustrated Spanish settlers has been a major factor in the country's reliance on tourism. There has been a steady shift from the traditional livelihood of fishing to tourism. With its independence secured on July 10, 1973, the country developed into one of the most sought-after tourist destinations in the Caribbean. The Hawksbill Creek Agreement in 1955 established a duty-free zone at Freeport, and the Bahamian Parliament passed legislation in 1993 to extend many of the tax and duty exemptions until 2054. After 1955 free trade flourished. Its banks are well known for accepting the accounts of wealthy individuals and corporations seeking to hide their profits where tax authorities cannot get to them. The Bahamas also became notorious for smuggling, organized crime, and gambling. In 1980 the

A First

Christopher Columbus's first landing in the New World and in The Bahamas was on either Guanahani Island (now known as San Salvador Island) or, possibly, Cat Island, on October 12, 1492. He reportedly said “baja mar” (which means “low water or sea”), and the archipelago was named for this utterance. In fact the 12-foot depth along the coast gives way, suddenly, to a depth of 6,000 feet into what is known as the Tongue of the Ocean.

Bahamian government sought help from the United States to enforce antidrug trafficking regulations in the country, and the crime rate has since dropped.

❁ CULTURE AND LIFESTYLE

As a result of extended Spanish and British presence, most Bahamians are Christian; a majority belong to the Baptist sect. The country has the largest number of churches per capita in the world. While most Bahamians observe strictly Christian customs, others follow both Christian and indigenous ways. Thus, some priests mix Obeah, a mixture of African and folk traditions, with conventional Christian practices.

The cultural infusion into the islands has resulted in a tremendous diversity of customs and traditions. This richness is celebrated in all parts of The Bahamas and in all aspects of Bahamian life. Music is deeply entrenched in the Bahamian heart. Goombab (pronounced “goombay”) beats (a blend of African music and the European accordion), and the traditional African rhythms played on drums, whistles, and cowbells can be heard at festivals throughout the year. Masquerades—particularly the Junkanoo—and carnivals are enjoyed by young and old alike, with colorful clothes, singing, and dancing. Boxing Day and New Year's Day are two of the most popular and enthusiastically celebrated holidays in The Bahamas. The oral storytelling tradition is an ancient one and is as popular among children, as is dancing to both English folk songs and Caribbean calypso.

❁ CUISINE

Bahamian cuisine includes a variety of excellent dishes made from the bounty of the sea and land and features fresh seafood and fruit, especially conch and coconut. The conch (an ocean mollusk with a firm white flesh edged with pink) can be steamed, deep fried (called “cracked conch”), or eaten raw (just add lime juice and spices), and it turns up in chowders, salads, fritters, and stews. If conch is not available, lobster can always be substituted. The same is true for the many species of fish abundant in the sur-

Fun Fact

Obeah or Obi

This is an ancient system of beliefs, the origins of which are unknown. Occult powers are an essential part of Obeah—spells, rituals, hallucinogenic substances, shamanism, and magic—but equally strong is the belief in consequences. Quite simply, whatever one does or has done to another will return, because when a ripple is created in the normal course of events through magic, then the equilibrium (or balance/harmony) must be restored, sooner or later.

The winged serpent of wisdom, a revered concept in ancient African religions, was referred to as oph or ob. The word obeah may have been derived from this. Obeah is practiced in the West Indies, Jamaica, and tropical America.

rounding waters. Steamed, grilled, fried, or curried, seafood figures prominently in the Bahamian diet. A favorite for brunches is boiled fish with grits, and another local specialty is “stew fish,” made with tomatoes, celery, onions, and spices.

Coconuts are another main ingredient, because they are not only plentiful, but the sweet white flesh is versatile and is found in many desserts—tarts, pies, cakes, custards, trifles, candies, and ice cream; it can also be shredded to add its flavor to almost any dish. The island dessert menu is rich and varied. Fruit figures prominently in local specialties such as banana breads and puddings, carrot cake, and guava turnovers. Almost anything can be tossed into the many soups and chowders, but one delicious soup found only in the Caribbean is called souse. Its only ingredients are water, onions, celery, peppers, lime juice, and meat, usually chicken, sheep’s tongue, oxtail, or pig’s feet.

Never bland or boring, the food is spicy and perfectly complemented by the national beer Kalik, which can be found only in the Bahamas. Citrus fruits and rum are the featured ingredients in iced drinks such as the Bahama Mama (made with coconut, coffee liqueurs, and pineapple juice added to the rum), and rum punch, for which just about every restaurant and bar has a special recipe. A unique citrus drink, Switcher, is made from local limes.

Public/Legal Holidays

❁ JUNKANOO

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: January 1

Junkanoo is a national festival in The Bahamas, the only country that accords it this status. The celebration has its origins in West Africa. Junkanoo in the Caribbean began in the 17th century, when the slaves were allowed a holiday on Christmas so that they could be with their families. The dances, the music with cowbells, whistles, conch-shell horns, goatskin drums, and the exotic costumes were all essentially African. The celebrations included wearing masks and costumes and walking on stilts.

This is by far the biggest celebration in The Bahamas. Junkanoo bands begin parading in the dark hours of the early morning and finish several hours later, playing from approximately 2 to 8 A.M. They bring in the special day and the new year. These festivities, which are in the spirit of Mardi Gras in New Orleans and Carnival in Rio de Janeiro, are repeated to mark all of the major Bahamian holidays: New Year’s Day, Independence Day, Emancipation Day, Christmas, and Boxing Day, and New Year’s Day.

While the simplicity of the original Junkanoo is a thing of the past, the music remains traditional. Choreography, music, and costumes are the highlights of this masked parade. People dress up in elaborate attire and dance enthusiastically to the music. Each participating group has a theme, and the music, presentations, and costumes are selected accordingly. Competition is fierce, and the theme and costumes of each group remain a secret until the final performance. Rehearsals are held in secret in a “base camp” or “shack.” There are prizes for the best performances.

❁ NEW YEAR’S EVE/DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: December 31–January 1

New Year’s Day is observed on the first day of the Gregorian calendar, which is a solar-based system. Memories of the past year and resolutions for the new are combined in the celebrations. The New Year’s Day parade in The Bahamas is an important event, complemented by parties, masquerades, and family gatherings. Junkanoo bands rush into the streets in the early morning hours, because it is the beginning of the new year and this is Junkanoo day.

❁ MARTIN LUTHER KING DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: Third Monday in January

Martin Luther King Jr., was the face of the U.S. civil rights movement and represented oppressed people everywhere. Although King was born on January 15, 1929, his birthday is officially celebrated on the third Monday of January in The Bahamas, as it is in the United States.

In The Bahamas this is a day for children: They participate in essay-writing and painting competitions, along with other cultural events organized by schools and local authorities. Children also make colorful hangings out of hand tracings and display them all over buildings. Discussions and lectures concerning race and civil rights are held throughout the country.

❁ LABOR DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: First Friday in June

Labor Day, also called May Day or Workers’ Day, is a celebration of labor unions and workers all over the world. The May 1 observance of Labor Day has its origins in the international socialist movement. The first May Day/Labor Day occurred in 1889, a date chosen by the Second International to coincide with the American Federation of Labor’s general strike in the United States to win the eight-hour workday. Thereafter, International Labor Day became and remained more radical than the U.S. version observed in September.

It is a legal holiday throughout The Bahamas that, in a departure from most other countries, observes Labor Day on the first Friday of June. Schools, universities, and public offices remain closed as people attend music festivals, spend time at the beach, and, in recent years, at nightclubs or at cookouts.

Origins of Junkanoo

There are three suggested origins for the word junkanoo. Some say it refers to John Canoe, an African tribal chief brought to the islands as a slave who demanded that his people be allowed to celebrate together. Others suggest that it is derived from the French word l’inconnu, which means “unknown,” and is used to refer to the masked revelers at the parade. A third group thinks that the word is derived from the Scottish junk enoo, “junk enough.”

CARICOM DAY

Observed on: July 4

Caricom Day commemorates the founding of the Caribbean Community and Common Market (CARICOM) on August 1, 1973, under the Treaty of Chaguaramas. This alliance focuses on development issues and improving the lives of the people in the Caribbean. The first four signatories were Jamaica, Barbados, Guyana, and Trinidad and Tobago. Currently there are 15 members and five associate members. The treaty was revised in 2001 to create the Common Single Market and Economy (CSME).

Although many CARICOM countries observe this holiday on the first Monday of July, the date varies for others. The Bahamas joined CARICOM on July 4, 1983, and the anniversary of this day features discussions and lectures on regional and national issues.

❁ NATIONAL DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: July 10

The Bahamas gained independence on July 10, 1973, after 256 years of British rule. Although Queen Elizabeth II remains the constitutional head of state, Bahamians enjoy a parliamentary form of government and have an independent executive and judicial system.

Military parades mark National Day (or Independence Day), along with music and dance programs, food festivals, and spectacular fireworks. Junkanoo parades are held in some parts of the country.

❁ EMANCIPATION DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: First Monday in August

Great Britain passed the Emancipation Act on August 1, 1834, declaring every slave a free person. This was welcome news for slaves in British-controlled territories, even though this freedom came with a disclaimer: The slaves would be “apprenticed” to their former masters for a minimum of four years. (The only exception was Antigua.)

This holiday is the oldest celebrated in The Bahamas, and the festivities continue until Fox Hill Day, a week later. The six days are marked by a number of special events. The festival opens with a road race. The second day features choral singing on Fox Hill, and public luncheons are held over four days. These lunches are considered the most important aspect of the celebrations. A mini-Junkanoo parade is also part of the Emancipation Day festivities.

✿ DISCOVERY DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: Second Monday in October

Christopher Columbus (1451–1506) landed in the Western Hemisphere and in The Bahamas specifically on October 12, 1492. He arrived at Guanahani Island, the present-day San Salvador Island (not to be confused with the capital city of El Salvador). He effectively christened the country with his words “baja mer” (“low water”).

This holiday, known also as National Heroes Day or Columbus Day, is celebrated on the second Monday of October. The city of Nassau resounds with joyous singing, and people crowd the streets to watch the parade of international floats.

✿ VETERANS’ DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: November 11

Veterans’ Day, also known as Armistice Day or Remembrance Day, began as a remembrance of the soldiers who fought in World War I. The observance has since been expanded to include soldiers of other modern wars. Many European and North American countries observe the day on November 11 because the war ended at the 11th hour on the 11th day of the 11th month in 1918.

In The Bahamas there are public speeches and symposiums to mark the day. Government officials place wreaths on war memorials, and at 11 A.M. people observe a moment of silence.

Religious Holidays

✿ GOOD FRIDAY

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: Friday before Easter

Good Friday is a part of Holy Week, the last week of Jesus’ life on Earth. It commemorates his Crucifixion. It has been in the Christian liturgical calendar even longer than Easter, although no one is sure why it is called Good Friday. Some have suggested that the use of good in the name goes back to Old English and means “God’s” Friday, while others interpret good to mean something like “observed as holy.” This observance is also known as Black Friday and Sorrowful Friday, and in Eastern Orthodox Churches it is called Great Friday. For many years Good Friday was primarily a Catholic observance, but many Protestant Churches now hold special services from noon until three in the afternoon on this day to symbolize Jesus’ last hours on the Cross. Many of the faithful fast on this day; when they eat, it is generally fish instead of meat.

There is a special evening service, which is widely attended, known as the Tenebrae (Service of Shadows), held on the previous Thursday, and Wednesday as well. It consists of prayers and readings relevant to the suffering of Jesus. Lights in the church are gradually dimmed as the service progresses, evoking the darkness of a world without God. There is no Communion on Good Friday because this is not a celebration.

In The Bahamas, images of the Crucifixion are carried in processions, and participants reenact Jesus’ trial and death. Readings from the Gospel of St. John and the singing of hymns and psalms continue through the day.

✿ EASTER

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: First Sunday after Lent

Easter (also known as Eostre or Pascha) is widely considered the most important Christian holiday, since it commemorates the Resurrection of Jesus after his Crucifixion. The day is seen as the culmination of his Incarnation and is one of the two most ancient festivals—together with Epiphany—celebrated by Christians. The festival has its beginnings in the feast of the Teutonic spring goddess Estre, and the Jewish feast of the Passover (in Hebrew, Pesach) celebrating the “passing over” of the Jews when the 10th plague hit Egypt and also their escape from slavery in Egypt during the reign of Pharaoh Ramses II (1304–1237 B.C.E.).

In The Bahamas worship services begin before dawn, marking the end of the Easter Vigil that began on Holy Saturday. There are parades and feasts to mark this special day, and young girls and women wear colorful Easter bonnets decorated with ribbons, stencil drawings, paints, flowers, dried flowers, and other decorative materials.

The day after Easter is known as Easter Monday and the first day of Bright Week. People enjoy feasts and parades and indulge in traditional activities: Catholics and Anglicans douse each other with the perfumed holy water that they received on Easter for use at home. Egg-rolling competitions are also popular for children.

❁ PENTECOST

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: Fifty days after Easter

Pentecost takes place 50 days after Easter. The holiday celebrates the descent of the Holy Ghost on the disciples. This was considered a great miracle: Parted tongues of fire accompanied by a strong gust of wind descended on the apostles, marking them as fit preachers of the Gospel to all corners of the world.

Many scholars believe that many of the traditions and celebrations associated with this holiday were borrowed from pagan celebrations of spring in Western Europe. Homes are often decorated with green branches and flowers. In Christian tradition this is the 50th day after Easter and has been celebrated since the first century. (Pentecost in Greek means “fiftieth.”)

In many countries, including The Bahamas, this is a two-day holiday. Whitsunday and Whitmonday are the names used locally to celebrate the event. The name “Whitsun” originated in the third century C.E. and was derived from the white garments that were worn by those who were baptized during the vigil of this feast. In The Bahamas churches and homes are decorated with greens, and church services honor the descent of the Holy Spirit.

❁ CHRISTMAS DAY

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: December 25

Literally, Christmas means “Mass of Christ,” and it celebrates the birth of Jesus. He was born to the Virgin Mary in a manger in Bethlehem, although not on this date. A stationary star guided the Three Wise Men (or the Three Magi) to the spot. Christmas is not mentioned as one of the earliest Christian holidays, and, while it was celebrated in Alexandria, Egypt, as early as the second century, it was observed on May 20 at that time. The December holiday became widespread from the fifth century on. Pope Julius I (1337–52) designated December 25 as Christmas but died before instituting it.

In The Bahamas Christmas is celebrated in a manner similar to European and North American countries. Christmas trees, special gifts and cards, and large amounts of food served at family dinners all add to the festive mood. Junkanoo parades also mark this special day.

❁ BOXING DAY

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: December 26

Boxing Day is also known as St. Stephen’s Day in memory of the first Christian martyr. It is observed in the United Kingdom, Canada, Australia, and other British Commonwealth countries and former British colonies. The origins are twofold: on December 26, employers and estate owners in medieval England gave boxes of clothes and food, among other practical items, to their servants after the Christmas celebrations. Those they considered the “deserving poor”—laborers such as road sweepers and chimney sweeps—also received something. Church charity boxes were also opened on December 26, and the money was distributed to the poor.

In modern times employees as well as those performing useful public services are given tips or gifts.

In The Bahamas gifts and money are given as tokens of appreciation to all those who perform necessary public tasks including the postal employees, delivery people, and municipal workers. The day is spent in fun and friendship with family and friends. While government buildings and small businesses are closed, the shopping malls are open and full of people.

Fun Fact

One Catholic Easter tradition involves adding perfume to the holy water people receive on Easter. Men awaken their wives by sprinkling a little of this water on them and saying, “May you never wither.” Wives usually reciprocate by waking their husbands the next day with a larger quantity of the perfumed water.

❁ KADOOMENT

Observed in: Nassau

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: August 2

Kadooment is a harvest festival marking the ripening of the sugarcane. The festival originated in Barbados in the 1780s when that country was the world’s largest producer of sugar. The 1940s saw a discontinuation of the event, but it was revived in 1974. This is a major event with kadooment and tuk bands and calypso music. (The members of kadooment bands wear brightly colored costumes; the instruments played in tuk bands are a tin flute, a kettle-drum, and a bass drum. Tuk is thought to be derived from the Scottish word touk, which means “to beat or sound an instrument.”)

In Nassau the festival opens with the ceremonial “delivery of the last canes.” The two most productive cane cutters are crowned king and queen of the festival. Celebrations are akin to a summer carnival with revelers wearing body paint and brightly colored costumes and dancing to their favorite beats on the streets of Nassau. The festival ends with the Grand Kadooment, a carnival parade.

❁ MINI-JUNKANOO PARADE

Observed in: West End, New Providence

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: August 2

This parade is a special one for The Bahamas because it focuses on Bahamian children and their assimilation of national culture and affairs. Contests, workshops, seminars, and a variety of educational programs are held across the city to teach children Bahamian traditions. Storytelling and other programs are specially designed to encourage social and political awareness.

❁ FOX HILL DAY

Observed in: Fox Hill

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: One week after Emancipation Day

Great Britain passed the Emancipation Act on August 1, 1834. This act made every slave free, but freedom came at a price: The slaves would be “apprenticed” to their former masters for a minimum of four years.

Fox Hill Day is a legal holiday and has a special place in the history of The Bahamas. In 1834 Fox Hill was a small community miles from anywhere, so news of the declaration reached its residents a week later than the rest of the country, and this day celebrates the historic event. On the second Tuesday of August, the actual day of the original Fox Hill celebration, gospel concerts are held at churches; afterward, people head to Freedom Park for an afternoon of feasting and goombah music. This holiday has grown into a two-week event with street parties, dances, concerts, public lunches, and the plaiting of the maypole.

❁ BIRTH

In The Bahamas, a priestess (babalawo) arrives as soon as the expectant mother goes into labor and remains with her until after the birth. The priestess will return to the house seven days after the birth of a boy or nine days after the birth of a girl. To protect the mother and newborn, a cock and hen are sacrificed, palm wine is sprinkled on their entrails, and the dead animals are removed from the premises.

A purification ceremony follows the sacrifice. Earthen vessels containing water are placed before the altar or images/depictions of God. The earthen pots are taken to the house, and the water is poured over the roof. As it drips from the eaves, mother and baby pass under it three times in succession for luck and protection. Purified water is also used for the naming ceremony of the baby. The infant’s head is bathed, while the selected name is uttered three times. During this ceremony, the baby is held so that he or she touches the ground. After these ceremonies, new coal is brought to replace the older coal in the homes.

❁ MARRIAGE

Marriage in The Bahamas is not just between individuals, but is also an understanding between the families. Wedding customs are similar on all the islands. People gather on the streets to see the bride and groom on their way to the church. These onlookers are not hesitant to speak their minds if the couple seems mismatched. Once inside the church, the bride is escorted down the aisle by either parent or even both, her face covered until the groom lifts the veil. Traditionally the bridal gown and the bridesmaids’ dresses are handmade, never store-bought. To reinforce the fact, the seamstress carries the bride’s train down the aisle. After the ceremony the couple collects the wedding certificate from the church or rectory and then proceeds to the reception.

A small bridal doll, resembling the bride in her wedding dress, is placed on the center table with small gifts placed on the dress. At the reception, the bride and groom walk up to each guest and thank them for attending. Each guest receives a gift from the bridal doll and some, in turn, pin a dollar to the doll’s dress.

❁ DEATH

The body of the deceased is placed on a pedestal to ensure sufficient air and space. Next the body is washed with rum or herbal oils and dressed in beautiful clothes. The thumbs and toes are tied together. If the deceased is male, the head is shaved, and the hair wrapped in a piece of white cotton. This is buried in the earth alongside the house. If the deceased is female, the exposed parts of the body are painted red with dye made from tree bark. The next stage involves wrapping the body (male or female) in native attire over the clothes already worn and placing it on a mat by the door. Mourners pay their respects, and occasionally professional mourners are hired to mourn and sing.

Introduction

❁ HISTORY

Bahrain's history undoubtedly goes back to the roots of civilization, and it is one of the 15 Middle Eastern countries called "the cradle of humanity." The main island probably broke away from the Arabian mainland around 6000 B.C.E. and has been inhabited since prehistoric times. The recorded history of Bahrain goes back about 5,000 years, when it was known as Dilmun to the Sumerians, who founded the first great civilization of the Middle East. The name means "the sacred land" or the "land of life," which probably refers to the numerous springs that made the main island of the archipelago so attractive compared to the vast tracts of blistering desert sands that comprise the Arabian mainland. Three temples built during the era of the Dilmun trading empire have been excavated. All three were dedicated to Enki, the god of wisdom and sweet water.

Bahrain remained a major trading and commercial center throughout the succeeding centuries. It was visited, and occasionally occupied, by Babylonians, Assyrians, Greeks, Romans, Persians, Portuguese, and finally the British.

In 1783 local Arabs ended two centuries of Persian domination. Their descendants, the Al-Khalifa Dynasty, have remained in power since then. In 1816 Bahrain became a British Protectorate with governmental authority shared by the ruling Shaikh and a British adviser.

In 1968 the British withdrew military forces from the Gulf area. In March of that year Bahrain joined the mainland states of Qatar and the United Arab Emirates (UAE), which were also under British protection, to form the Federation of Arab Emirates. However the interests of Qatar and Bahrain proved incompatible with those of the smaller shaikhdoms, and both withdrew from the federation.

On August 15, 1971, Bahrain became fully independent. A new treaty of friendship was signed with the United Kingdom, and Shaikh Isa bin Salman al-Khalifa (1933-99) assumed the title of emir. Bahrain became a member of the Arab League and, later that same year, the United Nations. In December 1972 elections were held for a constituent assembly. This assembly produced a new constitution, which went into effect on December 6, 1973. In 1975 the shaikh suspended the constitution and dissolved the national assembly. Bahrain was a founding member of the Gulf Cooperation Council (GCC), which was formed in 1981 with neighboring Persian Gulf countries.

During the 1980s and 1990s relations with Qatar were strained by a dispute over the Hawar Islands and the large natural gas resources of the Dome field (in the shallow sea between both countries). In the late 1980s a causeway was built connecting Bahrain and Saudi Arabia. During the 1991 Gulf War coalition forces were allowed extensive use of Bahraini territory. In 1993 a consultative council, or shura, was appointed to replace the dissolved national assembly.

Shaikh Isa, who had ruled since 1961, died in 1999. His son Shaikh Hamad bin Isa al-Khalifa (b. 1950) became the new ruler and moved gradually toward increased democracy for Bahrain.

❁ GEOGRAPHY AND CLIMATE

Bahrain is an archipelago of 33 low-lying islands in the Arabian Gulf, just east of Saudi Arabia's shore. The capital is on the largest island, which also has most of the country's population. The island's limestone bedrock ascends gently toward the central peak, familiarly called Jebel Dukhan ("Mountain of Smoke") because it is surrounded by a misty haze on hot, humid days. Though its top is only 450 feet above sea level, it seems higher due to the flatness of the surrounding plains. Land use varies from extensive urban development and diligently cultivated areas in the north to sandy desert spreading south, east, and west from Jebel Dukhan. Here actual desert conditions prevail with sparse vegetation. Horticulture and agriculture flourish in the north, dependent on freshwater supplies from artesian wells or desalination plants. Dates, almonds, pomegranates, figs, citrus fruit, and a wide range of vegetables are grown here. Another striking feature of the Bahrain landscape is the immense quantity of man-made stony tumuli, or burial mounds. Bahrain has cool winters with sparse rainfall and hot summers with high humidity.

The summer season lasts from June to September. It is generally hot and dry but humid. Temperatures range from 100° to 108°F and the average humidity from 67 to 82 percent. The weather is often influenced by low pressure over Pakistan, which causes dry, northwesterly winds, known locally as al barab, "to blow in," lowering the humidity and creating pleasant weather conditions.

❁ ECONOMY

Bahrain's economy is heavily dependent on crude oil, but the government is looking for new sources of income. Oil was found in 1931, and oil revenues have financed extensive modernization projects, particularly in health and education.

The relatively high living standards of Bahrain are based on oil revenues, but resources are expected to be fully depleted by the year 2010. Bahrain is expected to be the first Persian Gulf nation to run out of oil.

The country's major industry is the large oil refinery on the island of Sitra, which processes local oil as well as oil from Saudi Arabia transported through pipelines. The country also has a big aluminum smelter that runs on natural gas.

Bahrain has become a major regional banking and communications center, besides offering services for insurance and financing. Bahrain houses numerous multinational firms, and the government actively encourages foreign investment. The U.S. Navy's Fifth Fleet, which patrols the Persian Gulf, is also based in Bahrain.

Agriculture is practiced on a small scale; springs in the northern parts of the main island provide good conditions for crop cultivation. Bahrain was once a major center of pearl harvesting as well, but the stocks declined during the 20th century.

❁ CULTURE AND LIFESTYLE

Bahrain offers a unique blend of ancient and modern values. The capital city of Manama, with its skyscrapers and lights, may project a flashy image, but outside the city life is unremarkably traditional. Modern skyscrapers jostle with magnificent mosques, and numerous air-conditioned shopping malls vie for customers with souks (traditional markets with narrow winding streets lined with shops) selling myriad items.

Traditional arts and crafts are very much alive in parts of Bahrain: dhows (fishing boats) are built on the outskirts of Manama, Muharraq, cloth is woven at Bani Jamrah, and exquisite pottery is fashioned at Aali.

Islam is the state religion, but freedom to worship is enjoyed by Hindus, Jews, Buddhists, and Christians. Bahrain's population is 85 percent Muslim. Shia Muslims are a majority (70 percent) of the population, but the Sunni dominate in government, military, and security forces. Most of the Shia are descendants from the Persians who once ruled Bahrain (Bahaareynehgaan).

Arabic is the official language, although English is widely spoken.

The island's location is ideal for water sports such as windsurfing, fishing, sailing, yachting, and pearl diving, and Bahrainis are avid fans of Formula One motor races, horse racing, and golf. Falconry, an ancient art, is a traditional sport of the Gulf ruling classes.

❁ CUISINE

Most of Bahrain is desert, so there is little agriculture, and the country must import much of its food. The cuisine is primarily Arabic or Middle Eastern, and lamb, various seafoods, dates, pomegranates, and rice are common ingredients. Baba ghanoush, an eggplant spread, is very popular. Perhaps the best-known traditional dishes in Bahrain are machbous, fish or meat served with rice, and mubammar, a sweet brown rice served with sugar or dates. Traditional street food like shawarma (lamb or chicken carved from a large rotating spit and served in pita bread) and desserts such as baklava are common. (Baklava is a very sweet dessert made of layers of flaky pastry filled with a mixture of ground nuts and sugar. The pastry is sliced, baked, and brushed with honey syrup flavored with lemon or rosewater).

Snack foods such as sambousas (crisp pastries filled with meat, cheese, sugar, or nuts) and small fried potato cakes are popular and can be bought in the souks. The traditional gahwa (Arabic coffee), served in a finjan (small cup), is strong and ubiquitous. Etiquette dictates that guests must accept a second cup if it is offered.

Fun Fact

A third serving of gahwa (Arabic coffee) can be refused by shaking the coffee cup from side to side.

Battle of Karbala

The fierce Battle of Karbala took place in 680 in the area now known as Iraq. It was fought between Hussein (the youngest grandson of Muhammad and the incumbent caliph) and Yazid, the ruler of Kufa (a city in Iraq, about 106 miles south of Baghdad, and 6 miles northeast of Najaf, located on the banks of the Euphrates River). Yazid had the troops of Hussein massacred while they were on the way to Kufa. He believed that this would assure that he would retain his title as caliph, head of the Islamic community. This happened on the 10th day of Muharram, and the sad occasion came to be called Ashura, meaning “ten.” The date is especially important to Shia Muslims.

Khalifa, ratified a trade union law which, among other things, declared May 1, the International Labor Day, an official holiday. In Bahrain the day is commemorated with trade union activities and speeches.

INDEPENDENCE DAY

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: August 15

This day celebrates a pivotal event in the history of Bahrain. On this day in 1971 Bahrain achieved independence from British rule, although it remained under British protection until December 16 of that same year. This is the most important public holiday in Bahrain, and the national flag is raised at special ceremonies in recognition of this historic occasion. Parades and public speeches are held.

NATIONAL DAY

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: December 16–17

This day commemorates Bahrain’s emergence from British protection on December 16, 1971. National Day was extended to a two-day holiday in 1999 by a decision of His Majesty King Hamad. In Bahrain on this day people remember and appreciate their freedom from colonial rule. The occasion is marked by civic ceremonies.

Religious Holidays

EL AM HEJIR

Observed by: Muslims
Observed on: First of Muharram, the first month of the Islamic calendar

The Islamic New Year is celebrated on the first day of Muharram according to the Islamic calendar. Its corresponding date on the Western (Gregorian) calendar is different every year. This is because Islam uses a lunar calendar based on the revolutions of the Moon and has only 354 days in its year. Thus the Islamic year loses 11 days annually in comparison with the Western year.

The beginning of the new year is usually quiet, unlike New Year’s celebrations associated with other calendars. In Bahrain, Muslims gather in mosques for special prayers and readings. A major part of the holiday is spent recounting the incident of the Hegira, Muhammad’s flight from Mecca to Medina in 622. Muslims also reflect on the passage of time and their own mortality.

ASHURA

Observed by: Shia Muslims
Observed on: Tenth of Muharram, the first month of the Islamic calendar

As in other Islamic countries with a majority Shia population, Ashura, also called Mourning of Karbala, is a day of mourning, honoring Hussein (the grandson of Muhammad) and other martyrs who sacrificed their lives in the Battle of Karbala (680). Observed primarily on the 10th day of Muharram, it consists of two days of fasting and prayers for forgiveness. Processions reenacting Hussein’s funeral move through the streets, and men flagellate themselves until their backs are bloodied. It is believed that men who suffer as much as Hussein did will receive special blessings.

EID AL-FITR

Observed by: Muslims
Observed on: First of Shawwal, the 10th month of the Islamic calendar

This marks the end of the austere month of Ramadan, which is considered the holiest month of the Islamic calendar. It was during this month that Muhammad fasted for 40 days, after which the Koran was revealed to him. The people of Bahrain begin the holiday with morning prayers, generally in mosques and idgahs (community prayer grounds). Afterward, they make social visits, exchange greetings and gifts, and enjoy delicacies, chiefly sewiyam (a vermicelli pudding), specially prepared to break the fast.

EID AL-ADHA

Observed by: Muslims
Observed on: Tenth of Dhu al-Hijjah, the 12th month of the Islamic calendar

This day marks the patriarch Ibrahim's (Abraham's) willingness to sacrifice his young son as God had commanded. In Bahrain, on this day each family that can afford it is expected to sacrifice a sheep, goat, ram, or bullock to Allah. The meat from the sacrifice is then shared with friends and family and distributed among the poor. Prior to this festival devout Muslims may, if they so desire, undertake hajj, a pilgrimage to Mecca, the center of the Islamic faith.

Rites of Passage

❁ BIRTH

The birth of a child calls for celebrations in the Muslim community of Bahrain, because a child is considered a token of Allah's mercy, especially if the child is male. After the birth babies are immediately washed to remove impurities. The first sound that a baby hears has to be its father (or any male relative) whispering the call to prayer, or adhan, into its right ear and then the left. This is thought to help the baby understand its duty to Allah at the very outset of its life.

❁ COMING OF AGE

Circumcision is not mentioned in the Koran, but many Muslims consider it essential nonetheless, and the Hadith (a book of commentaries on the Koran) records it as a practice enjoined by all past prophets. Significantly it is also known as tabara in Arabic, which means "purification." The age for this practice varies from region to region and even from family to family, but usually the age of seven is preferred, although it is known to be performed as early as the seventh day after birth or as late as puberty.

In the Muslim families of Bahrain a boy's circumcision is a cause for celebration, and there is a good deal of festivity, music, and food, and many guests visit the parents' home.

❁ MARRIAGE

In Bahrain, as in other traditional Islamic societies, most marriages are arranged by the couples' families, sometimes with the help of professional matchmakers. Before the wedding takes place, the two families decide on a sum of money or quantity of household goods that the groom's family must give to the bride. This provides security to the bride just in case the marriage fails. Weddings usually take place in the bride's home and are performed by an imam.

The bride and the bridegroom sit in separate rooms during the marriage ceremony. Two witnesses—one from the bride's family and one from the groom's family—are present during the entire ceremony. The actual ceremony begins with the imam reciting relevant passages from the Koran.

The imam then speaks about the duties of marriage and asks the bride and the bridegroom individually if they agree to the marriage. Once they have agreed, the bride, the groom, and the two witnesses sign a marriage contract that confirms their agreement.

The Koran says that a man may marry up to four wives, provided he can treat them all equally. However most men in Bahrain marry only one wife. If a marriage fails to work, the Koran says that Muslims are allowed to divorce but only as a last resort. First the couple must try to resolve their problems. If this does not work, each spouse must choose a friend or relative for counseling. If this too fails, they must wait for four months before they can end their marriage.

❁ DEATH

Bahrain observes the same funeral rites as Muslim countries throughout the world. Since death is unpredictable, Muslims are exhorted always to be prepared for the inevitable. The dying person is encouraged to declare his or her faith.

Muslims are always buried, never cremated. Muslims are taught to treat the dead body with gentleness and respect. The body is ritually washed and draped before burial, which takes place soon after death. After the person dies, the face is turned toward Mecca, the arms and legs are straightened, and the mouth and eyes closed. Then the body is covered with a sheet. The dead person's friends and acquaintances gather to offer prayers for the deceased.

For the burial the wrapped body is laid directly at the bottom of the grave, on its right side; once again its face must be turned toward Mecca. The grave is sealed and then covered with dust. Although graves are dug by gravediggers, the task of filling them with earth is carried out by the relatives. Attendants at funerals cover their heads with a cap or hat as a mark of respect.

The burial customs prevalent in ancient Bahrain can be gleaned from the awe-inspiring burial mounds at Aali village. This is probably the largest prehistoric cemetery in the world. The site has an estimated 170,000 burial mounds dating back to between 3000 B.C.E. and 600 C.E. Each mound covers a stone-built chamber, which forms the grave. These burial mounds are found all over the countryside.

Introduction

✿ HISTORY

Bangladesh has a rich historical and cultural past. The modern country was created from part of the former British colony of India and so shares a common regional history with both India and Pakistan. Over the centuries, the region witnessed the influx of many ethnic groups: Arab, Dravidian, European, Indo-Aryan, Mongol (Mughal), Persian, and Turkish. Around 1200 C.E. Sufi Muslim invaders subjugated Hindu and Buddhist royal dynasties, and converted most of the local population to Islam. Since then, Islam has played a pivotal role in the region's history and politics.

Portuguese traders and Christian missionaries reached Bengal in the latter part of the 15th century. They were followed by the Dutch, the French, and the British East India Companies during the 18th and 19th centuries. In 1859 the British Crown took control from the British East India Company, extending the British Empire in this part of the world from Bengal in the east to the Indus River in the west.

In the late 19th and early 20th centuries both Muslim and Hindu leaders began to press for a greater degree of independence. Prominent in the independence movement was the Indian National Congress, created in 1885 by English-speaking intellectuals. Growing concern about Hindu domination of the movement, however, led Muslim leaders to form the All India Muslim League in 1906.

The idea of a separate Muslim state emerged in the 1930s. On March 23, 1940, Muhammad Ali Jinnah (1876–1948), leader of the Muslim League, publicly endorsed the Pakistan Resolution that called for the creation of an independent state in regions where Muslims were a majority.

In June 1947 the United Kingdom decided to grant full dominion status to the two states created out of colonial India—India and Pakistan. The latter was split into two sections separated by approximately 1,000 miles of Indian territory. West Pakistan comprised four provinces; East Pakistan was formed as a single province. Each province had a legislature. The capital of Pakistan was located at Karachi. Islamabad became the capital in 1967.

Political instability and economic difficulties marked the next three decades of Pakistan's history. A significant amount of national revenues went toward developing West Pakistan at the expense of the East. Frictions between West and East Pakistan culminated in a 1971 army crackdown against the East Pakistan dissident movement led by Sheikh Mujibur Rahman (1921–75), leader of the Awami League (AL) Party, who had won the previous election on a platform of greater autonomy for the eastern province. What followed was one of the worst genocides in living memory and a mass exodus of millions of refugees into India. The death toll was estimated to be as high as two million. The disaster was compounded by torrential rains and destructive flooding. This human rights crisis was brought to worldwide attention by the famous Bangladesh concerts in New York in June 1971 (the first such benefit concert) and an album produced by George Harrison (1943–2001) and Ravi Shankar (b. 1920).

India and Pakistan went to war in December 1971, with Bangla Muktiyodhas ("Freedom Fighters") fighting side by side with the Indian army. The combined forces soon overwhelmed the Pakistani army in the eastern sector and ended the genocide. Pakistan's forces surrendered on December 16, 1971. What had been West Pakistan was now called Pakistan; East Pakistan became Bangladesh. The constitution of the new nation created a strong prime minister, an independent judiciary, and a unicameral legislature on a modified British model. The highly popular Mujibur Rahman assumed the office of prime minister.

In 1974 Mujibur Rahman proclaimed a state of emergency and amended the constitution to limit the powers of the legislative and judicial branches. The new constitution established an executive presidency, and instituted a one-party system. Rahman held the office of president until August 1975, when he was assassinated by mid-level army officers. This began a new phase of violence for Bangladesh, marked by successive military coups and assassinations.

In September 1991 the electorate approved another set of changes to the constitution, formally re-creating a parliamentary system, and returning governing power to the office of the prime minister, as in the original.

In an unusual move for a Muslim state, Bangladesh has twice had a woman at the helm: Begum Khaleda Zia (b. 1945), the widow of the assassinated former president Ziaur Rahman (1936–81); and Sheikh Hasina Wazed (b. 1947), the daughter of Mujibur Rahman.

❁ GEOGRAPHY AND CLIMATE

Bangladesh, located on the northern coast of the Bay of Bengal, is surrounded by India, with a small common border with Myanmar in the southeast.

The country is low-lying riverine land traversed by the many branches and tributaries of the Ganges and Brahmaputra Rivers. Tropical monsoons, frequent floods, and cyclones inflict heavy damage in the delta region. Bangladesh has a tropical climate, with a hot and rainy summer and a pronounced dry season in the cooler months. January is the coolest month of the year, with temperatures averaging near 79°F, and April, the warmest month, with temperatures ranging between 91° and 97°F. The climate is one of the wettest in the world; most places receive more than 60 inches of rain a year, and areas near the hills receive 200 inches. Most rain falls during the monsoon season (June–September), and little during the dry season (November–February). During the rainy season the Ganges River turns into "cyclone alley."

❁ ECONOMY

Since its creation, Bangladesh has suffered natural calamities and political upheavals. Development of the labor force, nutrition, and the building of infrastructure for sufficient health care and population control continue to be the major concerns of the country.

One of the world's most densely populated nations, since the 1980s Bangladesh has been caught in the vicious cycle of population growth and poverty. Although the rate of growth declined marginally in the early 21st century, the ever-increasing population continues to be a tremendous burden on the nation. On the positive side, the situation provides an abundant and cheap labor force that is easily trainable and convertible into a semi-skilled and skilled workforce, making it a haven for every sector of the computer technology industry, from distributors, dealers, and resellers of computer and allied products, to vendors of locally assembled computers, software developers and exporters, and Internet service providers (ISPs).

However, Bangladesh is still primarily an agricultural country, with some 60 percent of the population engaged in farming. Jute and tea are principal sources of foreign exchange. Bangladesh's government offers incentives to encourage the use of local fabrics in the export-oriented garment industries. Toward this end, the import of capital machinery and cotton are duty-free.

Major impediments to growth include frequent cyclones and floods, inefficient state-owned enterprises, inadequate port facilities, a rapidly growing labor force that cannot be absorbed by agriculture, delays in exploiting energy resources (natural gas), insufficient power supplies, and slow implementation of economic reforms. Progress on these issues is stalled in many instances by political infighting and corruption at all levels of government. Opposition from the bureaucracy, public sector unions, and other vested interest groups are other obstacles to development.

Fun Fact

There are more than 600,000 rickshaws on the streets of Dhaka.

CULTURE AND LIFESTYLE

Bangladesh is famous for the remarkable ethnic and cultural homogeneity of its population. More than 98 percent of its people are Bengalis; the rest are Biharis, or non-Bengali Muslims, and indigenous tribes. The majority of Bangladeshis are Muslim (83 percent). The other important minority religious groups are Hindus, Buddhists, and Christians.

Bangladeshis are particularly proud of their valuable cultural and linguistic heritage, because their independent nation is the result of a powerful movement to uphold and preserve their language and culture. Bangladeshis identify closely with Bangla, their national language. In English the word Bengali refers to both the language, called Bangla, and the people who speak it.

In rural Bangladesh the basic social unit in a village is the family (paribar or gushti), generally consisting of a patrilineal extended household (chula) living in a homestead (bari). Above the bari level, patrilineal ties are linked into sequentially larger groups based on real, fictional, or assumed relationships. The significant unit larger than kinship is the voluntary religious and mutual benefit association known as the society (samaj or millat). An informal council of samaj elders (matabdars or sardars) settles village disputes. Factional competition between the matabdars is a major dynamic of social and political interaction.

Groups of homes in a village, usually thatched bamboo huts, are called paras, and each para has its own name. Several paras constitute a mauza, the basic revenue and census survey unit. Toward the end of the 20th century, a few brick structures had begun to appear.

Traditionally farming was one of the most desirable occupations, but in the 1980s parents began to encourage their children to leave the increasingly overcrowded villages to find more secure employment in the towns. Traditional sources of prestige, such as landholding, distinguished lineage, and religious piety were being replaced by modern education, higher income, and steadier work. But these changes could not prevent rural poverty from increasing, nor did they improve the quality of life for those who migrated to the towns and cities. The women go to work in the garment industry in Dhaka; approximately 800,000 people work in the 4,000 factories, 75 percent of them women. The men rent rickshaws, ruining their legs transporting people through the clogged streets.

In the 1970s the population of Dhaka, the capital, was estimated to be about one million. During the 1980s an administrative decentralization program encouraged the growth of urban areas. Most of the urban population—government functionaries, merchants, and other business personnel—congregated in shabby structures with poor sanitation and few modern amenities. By the time the 21st century began the population of Dhaka was estimated to be anywhere from six million to 15 million; the city is so crowded that accurate numbers are impossible to get. What is beyond question is the problem of solid-waste disposal. Somewhere between 3,000 and 3,500 tons of solid waste are produced every day in Dhaka, but only 50 percent of it is removed; the remaining half lies along the roads, in open drains and low-lying areas, contributing to the deteriorating quality of Dhaka's environment.

By the end of the 20th century, even in relatively sophisticated urban populations, the segregation of the sexes persisted in Bangladesh. Although urban women enjoyed more physical freedom and could pursue professional careers, they still moved in a different social world from that of men. Moreover 82 percent of Bangladeshi women still lived in rural areas, not in cities. Thus the practice of pardab (the traditional seclusion of women) had become a matter of degree that varied widely according to social milieu.

Traditional, full pardab requires the complete seclusion of women from the time they reach puberty. Within the home women live in private quarters that only male relatives or servants are permitted to enter. Outside the home, a woman in pardab wears a veil or an enveloping, concealing outer garment. Observing the strictures of full pardab requires a devotion to and the financial means to seclude women and forgo their labor in the fields. For most rural families the importance of women's labor makes full seclusion impossible, although the idea remains. In some areas, for example, women go about unveiled within the confines of the para, or village, but wear the veil or outer garment when they venture farther from the community.

Although Hindu society is formally stratified into caste categories, caste has not figured as prominently in the Bangladeshi Hindu community as it has in the Hindu-dominated Indian state of West Bengal. About 75 percent of the Hindus in Bangladesh

Chakmas

Chakmas form the largest ethnic group in Bangladesh and are concentrated in the central and northern parts of the Chittagong hill tracts where they live among several other ethnic groups. According to the 1991 population census, there were about 253,000 Chakmas. More than 90 percent of them are concentrated in the Rangamati and Khagrachhari districts. About 100,000 Chakmas also live in India, mainly in Arunachal Pradesh, Mizoram, and Tripura. Small groups have settled in other countries as well. The vast majority of Chakmas are Buddhists, and they form the largest Buddhist population in Bangladesh. Integrated with their Buddhist practice are older religious elements, such as worship of the powers of nature.

belong to the lower castes, notably namasudras (“lesser cultivators”), while the remaining 25 percent belong primarily to untouchable groups. Even though some Hindus of higher castes belong to the professional class, there is no Hindu upper class. However as Hindus have increasingly enjoyed professional mobility, the castes have begun to interact in wider political and socioeconomic arenas, with the result that there has been some erosion of caste-consciousness. Bangladeshi Hindus have been able to assimilate into the Bengali mainstream culture without losing their religious and cultural distinctiveness.

In Bangladesh the function of marriage is to ensure the continuity of families rather than to provide companionship for individuals, and a new bride’s relationship with her mother-in-law is probably more important to her well-being than her (frequently) impersonal relationship with her husband. The process of choosing a spouse reflects this function and depends entirely on one’s social status. Typically parents choose spouses for their children, although men often have some say in the matter. In middle-class urban families men negotiate their own marriages. Only in the most elite class does a woman participate in her own marriage arrangements. Marriage generally is made between families of similar social standing, although a woman might properly marry a man of somewhat higher status. Financial standing has come to outweigh family background. Often someone with a good job in a Middle Eastern country is preferred to an individual of impeccable lineage.

❁ CUISINE

Bangladesh is renowned for its delicious food. Cooking is considered an art, and each district has its own way of preparing even the simplest dishes. Boiled plain rice is the staple diet of the Bangladeshi. Mustard and soybean oils are used for cooking, and fish is a part of all meals. Hilsa, the most popular fish, is available mainly during the rainy season. The hilsa caught from the river Padma is world famous and exported to countries such as the United Kingdom and United States, where there are large numbers of Bengali expatriates. The many types of freshwater fish (from rivers and lakes) are consumed in large quantities.

In an average Bangladeshi home, the staple meal consists of plain boiled rice served with an assortment of fried vegetables. This forms the first course and is followed by rice and soupy lentils. The third course is rice eaten along with fish or mutton curry. Occasionally chicken curry is prepared. In addition to fish, mutton, and chicken, beef is also consumed (by Muslims) in the form of spicy curries. Cooking methods used throughout the West, such as roasting, smoking, and baking, are not integral to Bangladeshi culinary arts and are not often used. The meal is generally finished with sweetmeats, usually prepared at home. Bengali sweets, primarily based on milk products such as yogurt and cottage cheese (paneer), are immensely popular and well known all over the subcontinent, including misti doi (sweet yogurt), sandesh (a sweet cottage cheese, sugar, and cardamom), rashogolla (sweet creamy balls), and rosmalai (cheese patties), especially that made in the Comilla district, to name but a few. The first step in most of the recipes for these sweets is making the cottage cheese from lemon juice added to boiled milk.

❁ NEW YEAR’S EVE DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: January 1

Bangladesh was carved out of India, which was under British rule for nearly two centuries. Not surprisingly, elements of British culture remain. One such influence is the celebration of the solar New Year (according to the Gregorian calendar) rather than the Islamic lunar New Year. For Bangladesh’s Christian population, New Year’s assumes great significance because it underscores a Western, rather than Eastern, outlook. In Bangladesh New Year’s Eve and New Year’s Day are public holidays, and all educational, commercial, and government establishments remain closed. Both days are largely spent in leisure and pursuing recreational activities.

❁ INTERNATIONAL MOTHER TONGUE DAY

Observed on: February 21

International Mother Tongue Day, also known as Martyrs’ Day or Shaheed Dibas, is meant to pay tribute to the lives that were sacrificed in the fight to make Bangla (Bengali) one of the national languages when Bangladesh was part of Pakistan. The West Pakistani authorities tried to impose Urdu as the national language, a move strongly resented by Bengalis. On February 21, 1952, police shot at a procession of Bengali activists and killed four of them. These four were later proclaimed martyrs of the Bengali cause. This nascent Bengali nationalism ultimately gave birth to the free nation of Bangladesh.

❁ BIRTHDAY OF BANGABANDHU

Observed on: March 17

Born on March 17, 1921, Sheikh Mujibur Rahman was an ardent freedom fighter and the founding father of Bangladesh. As the first president of the fledgling nation Rahman was also the architect of its development and progress. He was, and still is, hailed as Bangabandhu, or “Friend of Bengal.”

Every year early in the morning of this day, the Bangladeshi girls dance during the Victory Day parade in Dhaka on December 16. Bangladesh holds rallies, concerts, and a display of military equipment to mark its triumph in the independence war against Pakistan in 1971. (AP Photo/Zia Islam)

Awami League (a national party founded by Mujibur Rahman) raises the national and party flags atop party offices across the country. It also holds a milad mahfil (memorial function), at which people lay wreaths at the grave (mazaar) of Bangabandhu.

Rahman's daughter Sheikh Hasina, who has been president of the Awami League since 1981, leads other party officials in offering floral tributes to the portrait of Bangabandhu Sheikh Mujib at the Bangabandhu Museum, in Dhanmondi (the residence of Bangabandhu during his lifetime).

Bangabandhu Shishu Kishore Mela, a children's welfare organization, celebrates this day as Children's Day. Other sociocultural and youth organizations such as the Bangabandhu Sanskritik Tarun League, the Sonar Bangla Jubo Parishad, and the Bangabandhu Lalitkala Academy hold youth-oriented activities to mark the day.

❁ INDEPENDENCE DAY AND NATIONAL DAY

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: March 26

The independence of Bangladesh was formally declared on March 26, 1971, after a nine-month-long war of independence waged against Pakistan.

This important event is celebrated with processions, speeches by leading public figures, and a host of musical programs.

❁ BENGALI SOLAR NEW YEAR

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: Mid-April

The Bengali calendar is based on ancient subcontinent calendars that were codified and standardized by the Mughal emperor Akbar the Great (1542–1605) about 400 years ago. This is a solar calendar comprising six seasons organized around the region's agricultural cycle.

The Bengali New Year celebration, or Naba Barsha Poila Boishak, is not confined to any one religious community but is universal and secular in nature. The first day of the Bengali solar calendar marks the onset of the summer season. It symbolizes the renewal of hope and a fresh lease on life. Hindus and Muslims spend this day together in harmony (though there is a separate Islamic calendar) through social interactions, feasting, and attending concerts. Events are held throughout the country.

❁ LABOR DAY

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: May 1

Bangladesh, with its developing economy, honors the contributions of its workers and laborers to socioeconomic progress on this day, which is also called May Day. May 1 is celebrated as Labor Day to commemorate the important role played by workers in national economies. The May 1 observance of Labor Day was established by the international socialist movement in 1889. The date was set to coincide with a general strike called by the American Federation of Labor in the United States to win an eight-hour workday. In different parts of Bangladesh, including the capital city of Dhaka, workers conduct processions and rallies, as well promote workers' rights. Trade union leaders deliver inspiring speeches, and there are also musical and cultural programs.

❁ VICTORY DAY

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: December 16

This is among the most important official holidays in Bangladesh. On this day in 1971, after a prolonged nine-month war, the occupying armed forces of Pakistan formally surrendered to the allied forces of Bangladesh and India. The day is observed with great solemnity and a spirit of patriotism. It begins with a 21-gun salute. In the capital city of Dhaka, there is a ceremonial military parade in which all uniformed services are represented. Large crowds of people gather at the National Parade Square to watch this parade. Floral wreaths are laid at the Jatiya Smriti Soudha (National Memorial Monument) at Savar, near Dhaka, in memory of those who sacrificed their lives to liberate the country.

❁ EID AL-ADHA

Observed by: Muslims

Observed on: Tenth of Dhu al Hijjah, the 12th or pilgrimage month of the Islamic calendar

Eid al-Adha, or Bakr-Eid, honors the Old Testament patriarch Ibrahim's (Abraham's) unflinching willingness to sacrifice his young son because God commanded him to do so. In Bangladesh on this day, each family that can afford to is expected to sacrifice a sheep, goat, ram, or steer in the name of Allah. The meat is then shared with friends, family, and distributed among the poor. Prior to this festival, devout Muslims may, if they so desire, undertake hajj—a pilgrimage to Mecca—the center of the Islamic faith.

❁ EL AM HEJIR

Observed by: Muslims

Observed on: First of Muharram, the first month of the Islamic calendar

The Islamic calendar is based on the cycles of the Moon. Thus it has only 354 days. Muharram is the first month of the Islamic calendar. Compared to the Western (solar) calendar, the Islamic (lunar) year is 11 days shorter every year. Because of this, the corresponding Western date for the Islamic New Year varies from year to year. The beginning of the New Year is usually quiet, unlike New Year's celebrations associated with other calendars. Muslims gather in mosques for special prayers and readings. A major part of the holiday in Bangladesh is the recounting of the Hegira—Muhammad's flight from Mecca to Medina—and the devout reflect on the passage of time and mortality.

❁ MOULOU

Observed by: Muslims

Observed on: Twelfth of Rabbi al-Awwal, the fifth month of the Islamic calendar

Mouloud, also known as Maulid or Mawlid al-Nabi, is celebrated to mark the birthday of Muhammad, who was born in 570. It is celebrated on the 12th day of Rabbi al-Awwal, the third month of the Islamic Calendar. In Bangladesh Muslims focus on the life and teachings of Muhammad. They sing songs, say special prayers, and also reflect on how the prophet forgave even his worst enemies. This is also the day when alms are given to the poor, because Muhammad urged his followers not to make a show of his birthday. In fact following this directive, many Muslims do not celebrate Mouloud at all.

❁ SHAB-E-BARAT

Observed by: Muslims

Observed on: Fifteenth of Shaban, the eighth month of the Islamic calendar

Shab-e-Barat is a Persian compound that means “the night of commission or assignment,” and is known in Arabic as Lailatul baraat, “the night of emancipation.” In Bangladesh Shab-e-Barat is observed as the night of good fortune or special mercies. Muslims believe that a man's fate for the coming year is determined on this night. If someone prays to Allah throughout the night and asks for his forgiveness, he can expect that all his sins will be forgiven.

In Bangladesh candles or strings of decorative lights illuminate houses and streets for the occasion, and children light firecrackers. People prepare breads and various kinds of sweetmeats and distribute them to neighbors and the poor. Devout Muslims go to mosques for prayer and meditation even though there is no mention of it in the Koran or Muhammad's teachings. (Some argue that it is described as a meritorious observance in the Hadith.) Many Muslims fast during the day and perform nafal namaz (optional prayers) at night.

❁ SHAB-E-QADR

Observed by: Muslims

Observed on: Twenty-seventh of Ramadan, the ninth month of the Islamic calendar

Shab-e-Qadr in Persian means “the night of power” or “the night of respect”; it is a blessed night of the year for Muslims and is also called Lailatul-Qadr. According to the Koran if a believer prays throughout this night, all his sins are forgiven. Muslims believe that during this night five verses of al-Alaq, the first surah (chapter) of the Koran were revealed to Muhammad.

Shab-e-Qadr falls in the month of Ramadan and is observed with great religious fervor in Bangladesh. At the time of the Isha prayer, men assemble at mosques, and many stay to pray until midnight. (Isha is the nighttime prayer said by observant Muslims when the Sun has completely set.) Women pray at home. The day following Shab-e-Qadr is an official holiday in Bangladesh. To mark the occasion, radio and television stations broadcast special programs, and the newspapers and periodicals publish special features relating to the holiday.

❁ EID AL-FITR

Observed on: First of Shawwal, the 10th month of the Islamic calendar

This day marks the celebration at the end of the fasting month of Ramadan, the holiest month of the

Isha Prayers

During Ramadan, just after breaking the fast and before dinner, Muslims offer the fourth of the five daily prayers, which is called the Maghrib prayer. After dinner, they go to their mosques to offer the Isha prayer, the last of the five daily prayers. The day ends with a special voluntary prayer, the Taraweeh, offered by the congregation while reciting the Koran.

The time for Isha prayer lasts from when the red afterglow disappears from the sky after sunset until halfway through the night. The Isha prayer can be delayed as long as doing so does not cause any hardship to the members of the congregation.

Islamic calendar. It was during this month that Muhammad fasted for 40 days, after which the angel Jibril (Gabriel) revealed the Koran to him. Bangladeshis mark this day by first participating in a morning prayer with other Muslims, generally in mosques and idgahs (community prayer grounds). This is followed by social visits, the exchange of greetings and gifts, and partaking of delicacies, chiefly sewiyan, a vermicelli pudding especially prepared on this occasion.

LALON UTSAB

Observed in: Kushtia District

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: October

The Kushtia district of Bangladesh is the venue for this three-day cultural festival that takes place in October, on the anniversary of the death of Fakir Lalon Shah (1774–1890). This great composer, performer, and singer combined in his work the traditions of the Bauls (Hindu wandering mendicant singers) and the Sufis (Muslim mystics, often singer-poets). Lalon sang of peace and universal friendship, raising his voice against religious intolerance, the caste system, and other social inequities. On this occasion the Lalon Academy of Bangladesh organizes seminars, discussions, and musical performances on the life and works of this great mystic whose popularity is still growing, even after 200 years. Many renowned Bangladeshi singers perform songs and lyrics made famous by the poet.

CHIYACHOT

Observed in: Hilly areas of Bangladesh

Observed by: Mros tribes

Observed on: December–January

This festival is now the only carrier of the fading cultural heritage of one of the world's most ancient communities, Mros, people who inhabit the hilly tracts of Bandarban, in the southeastern part of Bangladesh. Chiyachot, the winter festival celebrated with the slaughter of cows and dancing, is a religious occasion for the Mros. The Mros believe that God created different religions for different societies, and the responsibility for bringing their religion to them was given to a cow. According to legend the cow, exhausted and hungry from a long journey, ate their holy book. For eating the holy book, the cow had to be severely punished; hence, the tradition of slaughtering cows.

BIRTH

The birth of a new child, especially a boy, is a time of great rejoicing in the Muslim community, because a child is considered a token of Allah's mercy. This attitude is very much alive in Bangladesh. Despite the burgeoning population, children are often referred to as wealth. After the birth babies are washed immediately to remove all impurities. The first sound that a baby hears has to be its father (or a male relative) whispering the call to prayer or adhan into the right ear and then the left. This helps the baby to understand its duty to Allah from the very start of its life.

Traditionally Bengalis welcome the newborn by placing a few drops of honey on its tongue and in each ear. The sweetness of the honey welcomes the infant to the sweetness of a good life. In addition, it is believed that the baby will grow up hearing sweet words and be a soft- and sweet-spoken person.

Between three and seven days after birth (this ritual can also be observed in multiples of seven—14, 21, or 28) the baby's head is shaved to remove the birth hair and encourage the growth of a thick head of hair. This ceremony is called the aqiqah, and it symbolizes the removal of misfortunes from the child, so that it can begin a good and independent life. In olden days silver equal to the weight of the discarded hair was distributed among the poor. Nowadays it is more common to sacrifice an animal (two for a boy, one for a girl) and share the meat with relatives and neighbors as a celebration of the birth.

Babies also receive their proper names on this day. The choice of name is taken very seriously, since it is thought to influence the future character and behavior of the child. The local imam (Muslim priest) may be consulted. In addition to the Muslim (Arabic) name, it is common to give a Bengali name to the child, too. Both names are often used in conjunction. The naming ceremony is important and has great religious significance.

❁ COMING OF AGE

Muslim boys generally experience a major change in status—circumcision (khitān)—when they have recited the entire Koran through once. In Bangladesh this tradition is followed, and the boy undergoes the operation between 10 and 12 years of age. This is a puberty rite, separating the boy from childhood and granting him new status as a man. The ceremony is accompanied by a great deal of festivity, music, special foods, and many guests. God is praised loudly during the actual ritual circumcision, partly, some say, to drown out the boy's cries.

Circumcision is not mentioned in the Koran, but Muslims everywhere regard it as essential, and the Hadith records it as a practice enjoined by all past prophets. Significantly it is also known by a euphemism: tabara, which means "purification."

Most Bangladeshis are married according to traditional Muslim wedding practices arranged by the couples' families. Muslim law holds that both the bride and the bridegroom are free to refuse the spouse that their parents have chosen for them during the ceremony itself when the kazi (Muslim marriage registrar) asks for their consent.

In most urban areas it is more common for the bride and the bridegroom to choose their own life partners. Before the wedding takes place, the bride's and the bridegroom's families decide on a sum of money or quantity of household goods that the groom's family must give to the bride. This sum of money is called a mehe, a sort of insurance for the bride, just in case the marriage fails. Weddings usually take place in the bride's home and are performed by an imam.

The bride and the bridegroom sit in separate rooms during the marriage ceremony. Two guests—one from the bride's family and one from the groom's family—witness the bride's consent for marriage and report this to the imam. The ceremony begins with the imam reciting passages from the Koran. The imam then speaks about the duties of marriage and asks the bridegroom if he agrees to the marriage. Once the bridegroom has agreed to the marriage, the bride, the bridegroom, and the two witnesses sign a marriage contract that confirms their agreement.

The Koran says that a man may marry up to four wives but only if he can treat them all equally. However, most Muslim men in Bangladesh marry only one wife. If a marriage does not work out, the Koran says that Muslims are allowed to get divorced but only as a last resort. First the couple must try to resolve their problems themselves. If this does not work, each spouse must choose a friend or relative for counseling. If this too fails, they must wait for four months before they end their marriage. In Bangladesh, the divorce rate is under 10 percent.

❁ DEATH

Bangladeshi Muslims adhere strictly to the Islamic practices pertaining to death and funerals. Since death is unpredictable and can happen at any time, Muslims are exhorted to be always prepared for the inevitable. However, it is improper for a person to wish for death. The dying person is encouraged to declare his or her faith. Cremation and other modes of disposal are strictly forbidden by Islam. The body must be ritually washed and draped before burial, which should be as soon as possible after death. The dead body is treated with gentleness and respect. A baby dying at or before birth must be given a name.

Religious laws do not allow Muslim women to attend burials. Mourners gather and the body is carried on a bier by at least four men to the burial ground. Attendees at funerals cover their heads with a cap as a mark of respect. A prayer is recited for the deceased just before the burial. Those attending the funeral form a double line facing each other, and the bier is passed on the shoulders along this line toward the grave. In the case of a child the bier is carried in the arms of a relative. The wrapped body is laid directly at the bottom of the grave, on its right side with its face turned toward Mecca. The grave is sealed and then covered with earth. Although graves are dug by gravediggers, the task of filling them with earth is carried out by the relatives. The grave is marked by creating a raised mound of earth. A stone may be used to mark its location, but no writings are allowed. Buildings or other structures are not allowed on top of the grave.

After the funeral a wake is held for both men and women, usually on the same day, in the form of a meal for all those attending the funeral.

Introduction

❁ HISTORY

Several Amerindian tribes originally inhabited the island of Barbados. An archaeological site at Port St. Charles has produced fragments of tools made of shells, utensils, refuse, and burial sites left behind by Amerindians from Venezuela. The artifacts indicate that they arrived around 1623 B.C.E. in long dugout canoes. These early people were replaced by another group thought to have been Arawaks, a short people with olive skin. The chiefs of the Arawaks (caiques) and other important members of the group wore nose plugs and/or rings made of copper and gold alloys. They were farmers and grew cotton, cassava (manioc), peanuts, guavas, corn, and papayas (or papaws). The cotton was used to make hammocks and arm-bands, while the cassava was ground and used in cooking. Seafood was also an important ingredient in their diet.

In 1200 C.E. the Caribs, said to have been warlike and fiercer than the Arawaks, arrived and replaced them. They were very skilled in the use of bows and arrows and manufactured a strong poison that they used to paralyze their prey. Some histories claim that the Caribs were cannibals who barbecued their enemies and washed them down with cassava beer, but this may be misunderstanding or hyperbole.

The Portuguese visited Barbados on their way to Brazil, and in 1536 Pedro a Campos named the island Os Barbados (“the bearded ones”), allegedly because the aerial roots of the fig trees growing on the island resembled beards. (Although it is widely reported that Campos named the island los Barbados, los is not the definite article in Portuguese; it would have to have been os.)

Although the Spanish found the island in 1492 and took the island from the Caribs, they eventually moved on to more lucrative Caribbean islands. Not, however, before eradicating the Caribs with the superior weapons of slavery and fatal diseases. An English captain John Powell claimed the now uninhabited island for England in 1625, and his brother Captain Henry Powell arrived two years later with 80 settlers and 10 slaves. From the arrival of the first British settlers between 1627 and 1628 until its independence in 1966, Barbados remained under uninterrupted British control.

The fairly prosperous colony, which made its wealth in sugar production, using the labor of enslaved Africans, was drastically affected by the 18th-century war between France and England and also by the American Revolution. Slavery was abolished in 1834. A British government proposal to form a confederation of Barbados and the Windward Islands in 1876 was met with stiff opposition, leading to violence and bloodshed. In the following decades, the African and mixed-race majority came to political power, eventually outnumbering the white landholders in the legislature.

Yet another serious disturbance, arising from poor economic conditions, erupted in 1937, and a British Royal Commission was sent to the island. Social and political reforms were gradually introduced and, in 1950, universal adult suffrage was achieved. Barbados joined the West Indies Federation formed between 1958 and 1962, which also included Trinidad and Tobago.

The country achieved complete internal self-government in 1961, and Barbados became an independent state in the British Commonwealth of Nations on November 30, 1966. The country is a member of the United Nations (UN) and of the Organization of American States (OAS). In 1973 Barbados helped to form the Community and Common Market (CARICOM), which promotes social and political cooperation and economic integration.

❁ GEOGRAPHY AND CLIMATE

Less than one million years old Barbados is the easternmost island in the Caribbean island chain. A volcanic eruption, in addition to the collision between the Atlantic and Caribbean crustal plates, created it. Later coral began to form, eventually accumulating to around 300 feet in depth. This pear-shaped island is geologically unique, because it is actually two land masses that have merged over the years. Densely populated, with nearly 280,000 people inhabiting an area of only 166 square miles, it is one of the few coral-capped islands in the region. Although it is relatively flat compared to its volcanic neighbors, its mixture of bustling towns and gentle, laid-back countryside surroundings amply compensate for it. The average annual temperature is about 80°F.

❁ ECONOMY

Most of Barbados's economy is based on manufacturing, tourism, and agriculture. While many people farm or work on sugar plantations, increasing numbers work in tourism-related businesses. The Barba-dian economy is becoming increasingly dependent on tourism as its chief industry.

❁ CULTURE AND LIFESTYLE

Since Barbados remained under British rule from 1627 to 1966, there is a strong British cultural undercurrent that often combines with the more colorful African influences. The national sport of Barbados is, not surprisingly, cricket, and Barbados boasts more world-class cricket players per capita than any other country. Barbados native Garfield Sobers (b. 1936), widely considered one of cricket's best players, was knighted in 1975, and Sir Frank Worrell (1924–67), another island cricket hero, is on the face of Barbados's five-dollar bill.

The merging of African and British cultures is most evident in the daily lives of the Barbadians. The family life, food, music, architecture, and street names are all fusions of British and African cultures. Theater, church choirs, and dances are important elements in religious and cultural festivals. The identity and political protest songs of the Mighty Gabby, such as "Massa Day Done," a local calypso artist, speak for emergent black pride throughout the Caribbean.

Barbadians are known as a quick-witted, fun-loving people, and their gift for innuendo (words and phrases with double meanings) is especially apparent in calypso music and indigenous literature.

❁ CUISINE

Flying fish with cou-cou (a mixture of cornmeal and okra with onions, peppers, and spicy sauce) is the national dish of Barbados. To make cou-cou (or fungi, pronounced "foon-gee"), cornmeal is brought to a stiff consistency and then is turned over onto a plate. The dish can also be made from breadfruit or green bananas. A variation of this dish is called "sweet fungi," because sugar is emphasized rather than salt.

Of the 17 species of sea urchin in the waters around Barbados, the white "sea egg," with its spiny shell and tasty golden roe, is considered a delicacy. The sea eggs are collected by divers from about 20 feet of water, mostly on the southern coast of the island. Once brought ashore, the shells are broken, the roe is removed, washed, and then repacked into whole shells. After being steamed, the shells are taken to market and sold by hawkers. Fried stuffed plantains (similar to bananas), garlic shrimp, and deep-fried fish cakes, spiced with hot peppers, are also popular.

Fun Fact

A popular sweet cake, called conkie, dunkanoo, or dokunu, is made by blending cornmeal, pumpkin, coconut, raisins, and spices. The mixture is then steamed in pieces of banana leaf before being eaten.

The widely circulated Barbadian $50 note is popularly known as an “Errol.” Its use is a constant remembrance of the life and service to the nation of Errol Walton Barrow (1920–87).

There are three broad categories of awards: the Order of Barbados, the Bravery Decoration, and the Services Medal of Honor.

GOOD FRIDAY

Observed by: Christians
Observed on: Friday before Easter

Good Friday (also known as Holy Friday, Great Friday, or Mourning Friday) is a religious holiday as well as a legal holiday in Barbados and is the day when Christians commemorate the Crucifixion of Jesus. It has been in the Christian liturgical calendar even longer than Easter has although no one is sure why it is called Good Friday. Some have suggested that the use of good in the name goes back to Old English and means “God’s” Friday, while others interpret good to mean something like “observed as holy.” This observance is also known as Black Friday and Sorrowful Friday, and in Eastern Orthodox Churches it is called Great Friday.

For many years Good Friday was primarily a Catholic observance, but many Protestant Churches now hold special services from noon until three in the afternoon on this day to symbolize Jesus’ last hours on the Cross. Many of the faithful fast on this day; when they eat, it is generally fish instead of meat. On the morning of Good Friday, a large cross, hung with a painted body of Jesus, or Corpus Christi, is displayed in the center of every church. During afternoon prayers, the painted effigy of Jesus is removed from the cross and taken to the altar in the church sanctuary. A low table, decorated with flowers, represents the tomb of Jesus, and this is where the body is ceremonially buried.

✿ PENTECOST

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: Fifty days after Easter

This holiday celebrates the descent of the Holy Ghost on the disciples. This was considered a great miracle: Parted tongues of fire accompanied by a strong gust of wind descended on the apostles, marking them as fit preachers of the Gospel to all corners of the world.

Many scholars believe that many of the traditions and celebrations associated with this holiday were borrowed from pagan celebrations of spring in Western Europe. Homes are often decorated with green branches and flowers. In Christian tradition this is the 50th day after Easter and has been celebrated since the first century. (Pentecost in Greek means “fiftieth.”)

In many countries, including Barbados, this is a two-day holiday. Whitsunday and Whitmonday are the names used locally to celebrate the event. The name “Whitsun” originated in the third century C.E. and was derived from the white garments that were worn by those who were baptized during the vigil of this feast.

In Barbados people dress in traditional costumes and parade through the streets, led by young girls dressed in white. Local fairs and festivities are held across the country to mark this day. Also called Pentecost Monday, it is also a legal holiday.

Christmas (meaning “Mass of Christ”) is both a legal and a religious holiday in Barbados. Early in its history the Catholic Church fixed this date as the day of Jesus’ birth. On Christmas Day Barbadians attend church services early in the morning. It is traditional to wear new clothes bought especially for Christmas. After the church services children receive gifts. Adults also exchange gifts with family members and friends. Playing traditional Christmas music and decorating homes with Christmas trees and garlands are also part of the season’s festivities.

Boxing Day is a legal as well as a religious holiday in Barbados. Traditionally this was the day when cash or other useful gifts were given to employees and public servants who perform useful jobs throughout the year. In Victorian England gifts among equals were exchanged on or before Christmas Day, but the less fortunate received their gifts the following day. It was also the day that church alms boxes were opened, and their contents distributed to the poor. Following the church services and family reunions of Christmas Day, Barbadians like to enjoy the outdoors on Boxing Day. Going to the horse races is a favorite way of spending the day.

Rites of Passage

❁ BIRTH

Due to long years of British rule most Barbadians belong to the Church of England (C.O.E.), so all religious ceremonies connected with the birth of a child are governed by C.O.E. traditions. A newborn baby is welcomed into Barbadian society by means of prayers and ceremonial blessings. At the christening of the child, friends and relatives come together for the church ceremony, which is followed by joyous parties. Generally the family name is passed from the father to the children. Sometimes, however, the family name is inherited from the mother, when she comes from a more prestigious and prosperous family than the father.

❁ MARRIAGE

A marriage in Barbados is an alliance between the two families involved. The bride and groom handle the wedding arrangements themselves. Everyone in the village lines the streets to see the bride and groom on their way to the church. If they do not look their best, they are publicly criticized.

The bride's father (and sometimes both parents) escorts the bride down the church aisle. The bridal gown and bridesmaids' dresses are handmade by local seamstresses. The seamstress usually carries the bride's train as she walks down the aisle. After the ceremony the couple goes to the church office to sign the wedding register. Later there is a wedding feast, and family and friends enjoy food, drink, music, and dancing, often until the following morning. The highlight is the serving of the traditional wedding cake, called black cake.

❁ DEATH

Funerals encompass a range of customs, which are commonly tailored to the wishes of the deceased and his or her family. Services are meant to comfort the family and guests and to celebrate the deceased's life. The funeral usually takes place within three days after the death. It is a common practice for the friends and relatives of the bereaved family to visit them and offer condolences. The funeral service usually includes readings from the Bible and singing hymns. A close friend or family member offers a eulogy for the deceased.

Introduction

❁ HISTORY

Belarus has a long history of wars, conquests, and invasions, including Lithuania's seizure of Belarus in the 14th century C.E. Through it all Belarusian culture and language have managed to survive. The Slavs settled in Belarus between the sixth and eighth centuries. In the ninth century Scandinavians, called Varangians by the Slavs, began to raid the eastern shores of the Baltic Sea and entered Eastern Europe under their leader Rurik (c.830–c.79). The Varangians, some of whom were known also as Rus or Rhos, made their way down the Dnieper River and established the great trade route from Kiev to Byzantium. By the 13th century the Belarusian region formed the core of the new Grand Duchy of Lithuania. By the 15th century the Grand Duchy included most of eastern Europe from the Baltic Sea to the Black Sea.

Despite wars and invasions, the 14th through the 16th centuries are considered to be the "golden age" of Belarusian culture. During that time Lithuania was one of the main cultural centers in eastern Europe; consequently Belarusian artists, painters, and architects were in demand all over Europe. In the beginning of the 16th century, the first books were printed in the Belarusian language. However in 1569, when Poland and Lithuania were united in a federal state called the Rzeczpospolita (the Polish-Lithuanian Commonwealth), Polish culture was introduced in the country and gained a strong foothold.

By the end of the 18th century Russia had encroached on the area, and the Rzeczpospolita and Belarus were absorbed by the Russian Empire. Russian gradually replaced the Belarusian language, and publishing anything in Belarusian was banned. As a result, Russian soon became the main language, and only the farmers in the countryside spoke Belarusian.

During World War I Russia and Germany waged a series of battles against each other, and a large part of Belarus was destroyed. Germany eventually took over Belarus, but in 1921 the Peace Treaty of Riga was signed, which gave western Belarus to Poland.

Later, when Germany and the Soviet Union invaded Poland in 1939, the Polish section of Belarus was returned to the Soviet Union. However in violation of the nonaggression pact that Germany and the Soviet Union had signed, Germany invaded Belarus. In retaliation the Soviet Union declared war on Germany. Soviet forces, with the help of native Belarusians, launched the Great Patriotic War. In 1944 the Red Army defeated the Germans and forced them out of Belarus. The joy of liberation felt by Belarusians on July 3, 1944, was short-lived as the Soviet Union reclaimed Belarus. Moreover in the process, Belarus was totally destroyed again. Minsk, the capital of the country, was ruined, and almost 25 percent of the country's population died. Over the next few years the country made efforts to revive its economy, but Russia once again began to dominate Belarusian culture by making Russian the official language of Belarus. Minsk soon became the industrial hub of the Soviet Union.

In April 1986 Belarus suffered a serious setback when an explosion occurred at the Chernobyl Nuclear Power station in northern Ukraine. This explosion released 100 times more radiation than the atomic bombs dropped on Hiroshima and Nagasaki. Although the disaster happened in Ukraine, winds carried the nuclear detritus into Belarus. Nearly a fifth of the country was severely affected, with drastic increases in cancers, genetic mutations, and leukemia. Belarus is still reeling from the consequences of this tragedy.

Over the years, nationalist sentiment in the country had been growing steadily, and in July 1990, with the dissolution of the Soviet Republic, the Republic of Belarus adopted a Declaration of State Sovereignty. In August 1991, a declaration of complete national independence was issued. Alexander Lukashenko (b.1954) has headed the authoritarian government of Belarus as the president of the republic since 1994, and Sergey Sidorsky (b. 1954) has served as prime minister since 2003.

❁ GEOGRAPHY AND CLIMATE

Belarus is a landlocked country and shares borders with the Russian Federation in the east, Poland in the west, Lithuania and Latvia on the north, and Ukraine in the south. The terrain is largely flat and marshy. The Belarusian ridge called Belaruskaya Grada runs across the country from the west-southwest to the east-northeast and consists of low hills. The highest point in the country is 1,198 feet in Gara Lysay. River valleys cut across this ridge and form a series of uplands and lowlands. Major rivers of the country are the Zakhodnyaya Dzvina and the Nyoman. Lake Narach, the country's largest lake, covers 263 square miles. Nearly one-third of the country is forests.

Belarus is characterized by a fairly moderate climate. Winters are cold, and the average temperature in January hovers around 25°F, while summers are warm and humid, with the average temperature in July reaching 71°F.

❁ ECONOMY

Almost half of the land of Belarus is arable, and state-run farms are the chief producers of agricultural products. Potatoes, flax, hemp, sugar beet, rye, oats, and wheat are the main agricultural products.

The leading industries of the country are machine building and metal processing. The most valuable mineral resource is peat, which is used for fuel and fertilizer. Belarus imports oil and natural gas from Russia. The major trading partners of Belarus are Russia, Germany, Ukraine, and Poland.

In the 21st century, the World Bank has been providing assistance to Belarus to help the disabled and to build schools and hospitals throughout the country.

❁ CULTURE AND LIFESTYLE

Belarus has a rich cultural heritage, which is deeply rooted in religion. Its culture is a blend of Eastern Orthodox and other religious traditions. Almost 80 percent of Belarusians adhere to Eastern Orthodox beliefs, while the remaining 20 percent of the population are Protestants, Roman Catholics, Jews, or Muslims.

Jews were once an integral part of Belarusian culture, following their arrival in the lands once encompassed by the Grand Duchy of Lithuania in the 13th century. But some 800,000 Belarusian Jews died in the Holocaust during World War II, and only 70,000 remain in Belarus. The great modern artist Mark Chagall is perhaps the most prominent among those Belarusian Jews who have contributed significantly to Belarusian modern culture.

Fun Fact

Until the fall of 2004 a rubber hose two miles long was used to smuggle vodka from Belarus to Lithuania.

Peace Treaty of Riga

The Peace Treaty of Riga was signed on March 18, 1921, between the Soviet Union and Poland. It marked the end of the Polish-Bolshevik War.

Russia was the traditional enemy of Poland. In the 18th century, it had established its rule in regions that were part of the Rzeczpospolita (a commonwealth composed of Poland and Lithuania). When Russia faced a civil war during World War I, the Rzeczpospolita sought to take advantage of this situation and reclaim the territories it had lost to Russia. This triggered a series of wars between the revolutionary Bolsheviks of Soviet Russia and the Rzeczpospolita, which began in 1918 and continued until the Battle of Warsaw in 1920.

Because of the great loss of life and property, as well as growing international pressure, the warring factions preferred to sign a peace treaty rather than engage in further bloodshed.

Fun Fact

In Belarus married women must wear a headdress when they leave the house.

Before 1990, when Belarus was under Soviet domination, Russian was taught in schools and was the official language for all government and business activities. However, since independence, Belarusian, an Eastern Slavonic language, has been declared the official language of the country. Both languages use the Cyrillic alphabet.

The traditional dress of Belarusian men consists of a belted shirt (kashoulya) over trousers. Women wear a shirt that is longer than those worn by men and a skirt called a palatnyanik, which is wrapped around the waist. The skirt is made from wool and is embroidered with multicolored threads and ornaments. Ornaments with rhomb-shaped symbols are supposed to protect the woman's arms from evil spirits and give her strength to work. Aprons, worn over the skirts, are decorated with lace (karounkas) and fringe (machbrami).

Belarusian folk music is based on traditional Orthodox hymns and sermons that originated in Belarus around the 12th century. Most Belarusian folk songs reflect on aspects of a peasant's life, such as work (crop gathering, harvesting), religion (traditional hymns), and life events (birth, life, death). Rock music is very popular among young Belarusians.

Traditional Belarusian musical instruments include the bagpipe (duda), the double pipes (parnyia dudki), the drum (baraban), the Turkish drum, the horn (rob), and the button accordion (harmonik).

❁ CUISINE

Fun Fact

For International Women's Day, every flower symbolizes a particular emotion or feeling. For example, a red rose signifies love, while a cactus flower is symbolic of long life and happiness. A yellow tulip symbolizes hidden love, while an orchid represents unique beauty.

Belarusians love mushrooms and use various kinds in their cooking. Some popular dishes are brybi v smtane (mushrooms with sour cream) and bribmoy soup (mushroom and barley soup). The most popular drink is called kvas; it is made from malt flour, sugar, mint, and fruit. Most dishes are accompanied by bread, which comes in different forms and flavors; the most widely eaten is black bread (made from rye).

Draniki (potato pancakes with sour cream or stuffed with meat) is a typical Belarusian meal. With increasing Western influence, however, pizzas and hamburgers are commonly eaten in Belarus.

Observed on: December 31–January 1

The first day of the Western or Gregorian calendar, January 1, is celebrated as New Year's Day throughout much of the world, and it is an important holiday in Belarus. On January 20, 1700, Peter the Great decreed that New Year's would be celebrated in Belarus on January 1. Moving the celebration to the first of the year in the Gregorian calendar was part of his goal to westernize eastern Europe. Detailed instructions on how the holiday should be celebrated were also given in the decree. Prior to this decree, Belarusians celebrated New Year's Day on January 14, following the old calendar.

On New Year's Eve, Belarusians exchange presents, indulge in fortune telling, and decorate fir and pine trees. Fireworks light up the night sky as people welcome the new year. Belarusians believe that on New Year's Eve, Ded Moroz (Father Frost) and his granddaughter, Snegurochka (Snow Girl), visit families and leave gifts for children. Many Belarusians also take the opportunity to thank God for all the good things that took place in the past year.

International Women's Day is celebrated on March 8. It commemorates the social, economical, political, and cultural achievements of women throughout the world. March 8 was chosen for these celebrations because it was on this date in 1848 that the king of Prussia promised to grant women the right to vote. May 1 is celebrated as Labor Day, also known as May Day or Workers' Day, in many parts the world to commemorate the important role played by workers. The May 1 observance of Labor Day was first declared by the International Socialist Party in 1889, and celebrated in 1890. This was a very important holiday in the former Soviet Union, and it continues to be observed in Belarus, where May 1 is a national holiday. Trade unions hold large demonstrations, and politicians often join the rallies held throughout the country to express their solidarity with the workers. When the Soviet Union controlled Belarus, attendance at the May Day parades was compulsory; since the liberation of Belarus many people prefer to spend a quiet day at home.

The earliest European origins of May Day are ascribed to pagan celebrations that were practiced by farmers, peasants, and villagers well before the Middle Ages. In Belarus a cycle of celebrations called Spring Greeting, characterized by specific spring (vesnavyia) songs, includes ritual foods such as eggs (symbols of life) and pancakes (symbols of the Sun). The holidays Maslenitsa, Vialikdzen (Easter), Yur'ya, and others are supposed to awaken Mother Earth from her winter sleep. The ritual performed on Yur'ya calls for Yaryla, the Sun god, to open nature's womb and release the grass, flowers, and animals.

During World War II (known in Belarus as the Great Patriotic War) Nazi forces had violated the nonaggression pact signed between Russia and Germany by invading the Soviet territory of Belarus. As a result Russia joined the Allied forces and declared war on Germany. Russian forces, with the support of Belarusians, defeated the Nazis and expelled them.

On this day Belarusians remember the heroes of World War II who protected the sovereignty of the country, and floral tributes are laid on graves. In the capital city of Minsk there is a parade of World War II veterans.

EASTER

Observed by: Christians
Observed on: First Sunday after Lent

Orthodox Easter is a Christian feast celebrating Jesus’ Resurrection from the dead. It falls on the first Sunday after Lent and is celebrated by Christians the world over.

Orthodox Easter is celebrated two weeks after Catholic Easter and is one of the most important religious celebrations in Belarus. A week before Orthodox Easter, celebrations begin with a special service of forgiveness. On the night before Easter Orthodox Christians assemble at the church and conduct a mock search for Jesus’ body. A procession of searchers leaves the church in the darkness of night in an attempt to find his body. When they return candles are lit in the church, and the Resurrection is announced. On Easter church processions are held in which devout Orthodox Christians carry lighted candles symbolic of the Resurrection.

Easter celebrations in Belarus also preserve traditions from pre-Christian pagan observances. Painting eggs is an eastern European tradition. In Belarus a single egg is dyed red by boiling it with a red onion. Special round cakes are also baked and taken to the church to be blessed.

❁ MARRIAGE

In ancient Belarus weddings took place in the order of priority, which meant that the eldest daughter of the family married first, followed by her younger siblings in the order of their births. Wedding rituals in Belarus lasted for three days; half took place at the bride's home, and half at the groom's. Gifts were exchanged between the families.

The Wedding Towel

In ancient Belarusian weddings towels played an important role. The towel marked the path of happiness that the newlyweds would follow for the rest of their lives.

When the marriage was solemnized in church, the bride and the groom would stand on the towel. After the wedding the bride would drag the towel around the altar, marking the way for her unmarried friends to follow suit and get married. Towels continue to be an integral part of traditional weddings in Belarus. Even the gifts exchanged between the families of the newlyweds are wrapped in colorful towels.

Today, as in earlier days, brides wear veils; the veil is traditionally believed to protect the bride from evil. It is also customary for brides to buy their own wedding shoes with money they have saved for the occasion. This is considered a sign of thrift, an essential quality that every Belarusian woman is expected to have. The groom is forbidden to look at the bride's face before the wedding. According to tradition he will have bad luck if he does.

The wedding takes place in an Orthodox church in the presence of the priest, friends, and family. Traditionally, the bride is surrounded by her bridesmaids, who are supposed to confuse the evil spirits that are determined to ruin the marriage by entering the bride's body. Thus bridesmaids play a vital role in safeguarding the bride on her wedding day. After the wedding the bride tosses her veil toward a group of single women, and it is believed that the one who catches the veil will be the next to get married.

The wedding is followed by a lavish reception where singing, dancing, feasting, and drinking take place. The highlight of the occasion is a wedding pie. It is an integral part of Belarusian weddings because it symbolizes good luck, happiness, and prosperity for the newlyweds.

Introduction

❁ HISTORY

The earliest inhabitants were the Belgae, who were predominantly Celts living in northeastern Gaul in the first century B.C.E. In 54 B.C.E. Julius Caesar (100–44) expanded his empire to include the region now known as Belgium. After the fall of the Roman Empire in the fifth century C.E., however, the Germans invaded the region and by 431 had established a new kingdom under the Merovingian Dynasty.

Clovis I (c.466–511), who ruled from northern France, was the most famous ruler of the Merovingian Dynasty. He converted to Christianity, and under his rule Irish monks preached Christianity and started to convert the local people. After his death the region began to splinter, until Pepin III (the Short, ?714–68) established the Carolingian Dynasty in 751 and created an empire that spanned nearly the whole of Europe. His son Charlemagne (742–814) succeeded him and ruled for 50 years. This empire remained intact until the death of Louis the Pious (967–87), Charlemagne's son, when it started disintegrating due to the infighting among Louis's three sons. The two younger sons rallied against their older brother Lothair (795–855) and defeated him at the battles of Fountenoy (841) and Aix-la-Chapelle (843), forcing him to sign the Treaty of Verdun, which divided Charlemagne's empire into three parts. Lothair retained the title of holy Roman emperor.

In the 14th century Belgium finally began experiencing growth, prosperity, and creativity under the rule of Philip II, the Duke of Burgundy (1165–1223), but this boom proved only temporary when the Low Countries (of which Belgium is one) entered into a long struggle with Catholic Spain in the mid-15th century.

In the 17th century, Belgium came first under Austrian and then under French rule again. In 1814 the French Emperor Napoleon (1769–1821) was defeated in the Battle of Waterloo. The powers that emerged following this battle included England, Russia, Prussia, and Austria. At the Congress of Vienna (October 1814–June 1815), these major powers decided to reunite the southern and northern parts of the Netherlands into the United Kingdom of the Netherlands, which included Belgium and Luxembourg. Belgium remained part of the northern provinces in the United Kingdom of the Netherlands until the Belgian Revolution in 1830.

This revolution was the consequence of a number of factors. Above all the primarily French-speaking Belgians felt dominated by the Dutch. They were underrepresented in the government and perceived the economic and political policies of the Dutch king to be anti-Belgian. Another factor was religion—while the Belgians were Catholic, the Dutch were Calvinist Protestants.

The European powers approved Belgium's independence from the Netherlands at the London Conference in 1830–31, and the country became independent on January 20, 1831. Also in 1831 Prince Leopold of Saxe-Coburg-Gotha (Leopold I; 1790–1865) was chosen as king of Belgium under a constitution that gave the monarchy limited powers.

Trade and commerce flourished under Leopold II (1835–1909). The king acquired control of the African state of Congo after the Conference of Berlin in 1885 and made it his own personal property, capitalizing on rubber cultivation (for which there was a growing market). However rubber plantations were largely dependent on slave labor, and the local population suffered greatly. It is estimated that between 3 and 22 million Africans lost their lives during this period. International pressure finally forced Leopold II to sell his property to the Belgian state as a colony in 1908.

In World War II Belgium was invaded by Germany in 1940, and Leopold III (1901–83), the reigning king, surrendered to the German forces. After the war the people of Belgium strongly opposed Leopold's rule, and in the interest of his country he abdicated in favor of his son Baudouin (1930–93). Belgium joined the North Atlantic Treaty Organization (NATO) after World War II and was also one of the founding members of the European Economic Community (EEC). Brussels is the headquarters of NATO and the EECs successor, the European Union (EU), which is why Belgium is sometimes referred to as “The Heart of Europe.”

❁ GEOGRAPHY AND CLIMATE

Located in western, Europe Belgium lies between Germany, Luxembourg, France, and the Netherlands and occupies 40 miles of coastline along the North Sea. It can be divided into three main regions: the coastal plains in the northwest, the central plateau, and the Ardennes uplands in the southeast.

Sand dunes and polders (stretches of land regained from the sea and enclosed by dikes to keep the sea from reclaiming the land) cover the coastal area in the northwest. The central plateau is a combination of smooth fertile valleys, caves, and gorges. The Ardennes uplands have thick forests that support a variety of wildlife, but the land is too rocky for farming. The Ardennes is also an important tourist spot because of its scenic beauty. The highest point (at 2,277 feet) is Signal de Botrange. The Meuse and Schelde are the main rivers of Belgium.

Although the summers are usually cool, Belgium

Low Countries

The name Low Countries is usually used to refer to those countries around the deltas of the Rhine, Scheldt, and Meuse Rivers, specifically the Netherlands, Belgium, and Luxembourg. These countries are located in low-lying areas. The Low Countries were the location of the early northern towns built during the reawakening of Europe in the 12th century.

experiences extremes of temperature during the course of the year. The warmest months are from April to September, when the temperature averages 77°F. The maximum temperature in summer has been recorded at around 90°F. Belgium's winters are usually mild. The lowest recorded temperature is 10°F, although the average is around 45°F.

❁ ECONOMY

The economy of Belgium is dominated by its import and export trade. It capitalizes on a strongly developed transport infrastructure that includes ports, canals, railways, and highways that link its industry with neighboring states. Food products, machinery, rough diamonds, petroleum, chemicals, and textiles are imported mainly from Germany, the Netherlands, France, the United Kingdom, Italy, the United States, and Spain. Exports include automobiles, food and food products, iron and steel, diamonds, textiles, plastics, and nonferrous metals. Two-thirds of Belgium's trade is with EU countries. The agricultural industry engages a small portion of the population, mainly dealing in products such as sugar beets, fresh vegetables, fruits, wheat, oats, rye, barley, tobacco, veal, pork, and milk and milk products. The country is home to over 1,000 international companies with nearly 60 foreign banks in Brussels, its financial capital.

In 1999 Belgium was one of the first European nations to accept the Euro as its currency.

Fun Fact

Walloon, one of Belgium's major languages, is derived from Vulgar Latin, although it has borrowed heavily from German and Flemish dialects.

The Belgian Revolution

An opera entitled Dumb Girl of Portici, the story of an anti-Spanish rebellion in Naples, helped to inspire the Belgian Revolution. In the opera the line, “a slave knows no danger, as death is better than living in chains,” inspired the audience in Brussels to run out of the theater shouting revolutionary slogans and destroying symbols of the Dutch authorities on August 25, 1830.

Benelux Union

The Agreement for the Benelux Economic Union was signed in 1944 between Belgium, the Netherlands, and Luxembourg to promote and facilitate the movements of workers, goods, and services in the region. The Benelux Union, which derived its name from the two initial letters of the names of these three countries, came into force in 1958.

CULTURE AND LIFESTYLE

Belgium is a densely populated and highly educated country. Ninety-eight percent of the Belgian population is literate. Belgians have a high standard of living, which is reflected in their housing and health care facilities. Belgians are known for their world-class architecture, art, elaborate castles, museums, and historic buildings. Belgian food, beer, and chocolates are exceptional as well, and the country has a booming automobile industry.

Folklore is an integral part of Belgian culture, and concerts, plays, carnivals, and other festivals are held throughout the year. Belgians mark historic occasions and celebrations with parades.

Roman Catholics represent 75 percent of the population. In addition Belgium has small but significant populations of Muslims and Jews. Protestants and others make up the rest, but only a small percentage attend church regularly.

Belgians are known for their hospitality. They have also created a place for themselves in the field of sports. Not only is the Belgian soccer team Red Devil famous, but the country has also produced world and Olympic champions in cycling, tennis, table tennis, judo, swimming, motocross, and cyclocross (motorcycling and cycling cross-country races).

CUISINE

Belgian cooking is among the most highly acclaimed in Europe. Potatoes are the staple food of Belgium, although the diet includes plenty of vegetables. Belgians also eat a lot of seafood and meat. Belgium's mussels are world renowned, and mussels and pommes frites (French fries) are the national dish. Spices, mustard, vinegars, and beer are widely used in savory and sweet recipes. Fresh herbs are also used extensively in cooking.

Belgians especially relish chocolates and produce renowned brands, such as Neuhaus. Mary's, another brand, is known to be the preferred choice of the royal family.

NEW YEAR'S EVE/DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: December 31–January 1

The first day of the Western, or Gregorian, calendar, January 1, is celebrated as New Year's Day throughout the world. In Belgium children write New Year's messages for their parents on decorated sheets of paper. It is also an occasion for people to make New Year's resolutions that they hope to fulfill in the coming year. New Year's is a time for eating and drinking and parties with family and friends.

LABOR DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: May 1

The earliest celebrations on this date, also called May Day or Workers' Day, are ascribed to pagan festivals that were held by farmers, peasants, and villagers in Europe well before the Middle Ages, and modern celebrations retain echoes of that pre-Christian past. However, May 1 is celebrated as Labor Day in Belgium, because in 1889 the Socialist Second International declared this as the day to recognize workers around the world. They coordinated this observance with the strike called by the U.S. labor union the American Federation of Labor demanding an eight-hour workday.

In member countries of the European Union, May Day is celebrated as Open Day, a chance for workers to enjoy an official day off. Workers in Belgium have a long history of labor activism. On Labor Day they parade in the streets seeking a better work environment and pro-labor policies. In recent years, campaigners have used this day to build worker solidarity and voice their protests by putting up stalls and displaying posters, leaflets, and stickers.

NATIONAL DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: July 21

The National Day of Belgium commemorates the day when the first king of Belgium, Leopold I, was crowned. It was after Belgium was separated from the Netherlands on October 4, 1830, that the Belgian National Congress asked Leopold to be the king. He agreed, and the day he was sworn in (July 21, 1831) became the Belgian national holiday. Leopold I supported the constitution that was drafted by the National Congress. After the formation of the kingdom, Leopold I was crowned king the same year.

This day is also observed as Independence Day. It is a national holiday and government offices, schools, and businesses are closed.

❁ FRENCH COMMUNITY HOLIDAY

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: September 27

The Belgian French community celebrates this day with a range of cultural events. Usually a town from the Walloon region in the south, where the majority of French-speaking citizens live, is selected to host the occasion, and that town becomes the center of all festivities. The day provides a platform for various arts and cultural activities that include classical music concerts, folksinging, exhibits, theater, and screenings of French films. Crafts markets are also set up, and the evening skies are brightly lit with fireworks.

❁ ARMISTICE DAY

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: November 11

Armistice Day (or Wapenstilstanddag) commemorates the end of World War I on November 11, 1918, after an armistice treaty was signed between the Allies (Great Britain, France, and the United States) and Germany in a railway carriage at Compiègne in France.

Armistice Day is observed all over Belgium. Though many towns were still occupied by German troops on this date in 1918, the people of Belgium celebrated it as the end of the war that had taken countless Belgian lives and the freedom of the Belgian nation. Religious ceremonies are held in many cemeteries on this day. Wreaths are laid at the local war memorial in every town and city, and the names of the dead are read aloud. Over the years the list has been expanded to include the dead of World War II and other wars as well. In the town of Ieper (Ypres), which is in the West Vlaanderen region of Belgium and the site of some of the fiercest battles of the war, the religious ceremonies include a service of remembrance in the morning hours at St. George's Church. Entry to the church service requires a ticket.

A Poppy Parade is held in the square by St. George's Church and St. Martin's Cathedral following the service. Participants in the Poppy Parade are each given a poppy petal to carry to the Menin Gate Memorial, where the petals are collected in baskets. Afterward an official parade with musical bands marches to the Menin Gate for the Last Post ceremony that occurs daily at 8 P.M. and consists of speeches, prayers, hymns, a choir, wreath-laying, and the "Last Post," played by the buglers of the local fire brigade.

In Brussels there is a military parade on this day, attended by the king, prominent political leaders, and military personnel. They lay wreaths at the Grave of the Unknown Soldier, Belgium's national monument to World War I.

This day is also celebrated by the German-speaking community.

❁ GOOD FRIDAY

Observed by: Christians
Observed on: Friday before Easter

Good Friday, the first Friday after Lent and the Friday before Easter, is the solemn Christian festival that marks the Crucifixion of Jesus. In Belgium it is called Goede Vrijdag, and the churches are draped in black because it is a day of mourning. Good Friday has been in the Christian liturgical calendar even longer than Easter has although no one is sure why it is called "Good" Friday.

Some have suggested that the use of good in the name goes back to Old English and means "God's" Friday, while others interpret good to mean something like "observed as holy." This observance is also known as Black Friday and Sorrowful Friday, and in Eastern Orthodox Churches it is called Great Friday.

For many years Good Friday was primarily a Catholic observance, but many Protestant Churches now hold special services. In Belgium's rural villages the women often wear mourning and in the afternoon attend a three-hour service at their local church from noon until three in the afternoon, a period that symbolizes Jesus' last hours on the Cross. Many of the faithful fast on this day; when they eat, it is generally fish instead of meat.

A pilgrims' procession highlights the meaning of this day by stopping in front of each of the 18 Stations of the Cross, built in Verne in 1680, to sing hymns and offer prayers. According to local lore, the number of steps between each of the stations is equal to the number of steps Jesus took as he went from

❁ EASTER

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: First Sunday after Lent

Easter is a Christian feast that celebrates Jesus' Resurrection from the dead three days after his Crucifixion. It falls on the first Sunday after Lent and is celebrated by Christians the world over. The holiday was named for a pagan goddess Eostre associated with the renewal of life: spring, fertility, and the hare (allegedly for its quick and prolific reproduction). Modern worshippers describe Eostre as a "goddess of dawn" based on the etymological relationship between her name and the Anglo-Saxon word for "dawn." Much of what we know comes from the Venerable Bede (d. 735).

This day is traditionally celebrated with church services, family dinners, and Easter chocolates. In some parts of Belgium the tradition of Easter bonfires continues.

The Monday after Easter is a national holiday, continuing the Easter festivities. In Belgium people often visit their friends and families on this day, enjoying the day off from work and school.

❁ ST. NICHOLAS DAY

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: December 6

St. Nicholas is one of the Christian church's most revered and celebrated saints. Popularly known as Santa Claus, he is considered the patron of children. On St. Nicholas's Eve (December 5) children place their shoes or small baskets at the hearth or beside the door with carrots, turnips, and a sugar lump for the saint's horse. They believe St. Nicholas rides on horseback over the rooftops, dropping his gifts down the chimneys. In the morning the shoes have been filled with chocolates and cookies shaped like the saint, as well as oranges, marzipan sweets, and toys. In the French-speaking Wallonia region of Belgium, St. Nicholas is said to ride a donkey.

In Dutch-speaking Flanders, there are colorful parades in honor of St. Nicholas with bands playing and banners depicting the saint. In shops and stores, St. Nicholas sits on a throne and greets children who come up to receive a small gift from him. Some churches collect toys and gifts for the poor at special services.

St. Nicholas is also believed to be the ruler of water and all its inhabitants (aquatic creatures, reptiles, and so forth). According to legend St. Nicholas saved sailors trapped in a sinking boat from drowning by closing the hole with a live carp.

❁ CARNIVAL OF BINCHE

Observed in: Binche
Observed by: General Public
Observed on: Three days before the beginning of Lent

Carnival precedes the Christian Lent, which requires faithful Christians to refrain from pleasure and excess for 40 days. With a history that goes all the way back to the 16th century, the festival attracts a huge crowd to Binche, and the extravaganza is now on the UNESCO Heritage List.

Its annual Carnival is world famous, and people dress up in fancy costumes and flood the streets of the small town 34 miles south of Brussels. On the night of the Trouilles de Nouilles, hundreds of people wearing masks go from bar to bar trying to convince those who aren't wearing costumes to buy them a drink. On Shrove Sunday, a day devoted mainly to musical parades, men dress in the clothing worn by women in the 19th century.

Shrove Tuesday is the big day for Carnival in Binche. Members of the different Carnival societies don their traditional costumes (Harlequin, Pierrot, and peasant outfits) along with the Gilles (clowns) in their colorful straw-stuffed costumes, made from wire, ribbons, bells, and fabric in the Belgian colors of black, red, and gold, and ostrich-plumed hats that are four feet high. At the end of the festivities, fireworks light up the night sky.

The Ommegang Pageant was started as a religious procession in 1359. However over the years it has been transformed into a folkloric event. The first Ommegang Pageant was held for Charles V, his son Don Philip, the Duke of Brabant, and his sisters, Eleanor of Austria, Queen of France, and Mary of Hungary in 1549.

Today the festival is mainly an expression of riches and glamour, one in which the population of Brussels takes pride and delight. It starts with a parade that originates at the Sablon Church and ends in the Grand Place, the heart of Brussels. After the procession, there is a flag-raising ceremony and an equestrian parade.

❁ MARRIAGE

Long courtships and living together before getting married are common in Belgium. Although people celebrate marriage in religious ways, only civil marriages are legal. A unique Belgian tradition involves giving the bride an embroidered handkerchief at the time of marriage. This handkerchief, which has the bride's name embroidered on it, is later framed and hung on the wall until the next marriage in the family. The handkerchief is taken down, and the name of the new bride is also embroidered on it. This ritual is followed and passed on to each generation.

Introduction

✿ HISTORY

Between the 16th century B.C.E. and the 4th century C.E., the Mayan civilization flourished in what is now Belize. In the centuries that followed, that civilization declined due to drought, famine, and inept leadership. Christopher Columbus (1451–1506) was the first European to land there in 1502, but the Spanish thought the region unimportant and mostly ignored it. In the 1600s, English and Scottish pirates enjoyed the safety provided by Belize’s great reef but turned to logging when English lumberjacks arrived from Jamaica to establish a settlement on the banks of the Belize River.

In the 1700s Spain tried unsuccessfully to dislodge the British from Belize. Between September 3 and September 10, 1798, a series of battles, which became known collectively as the Battle of St. George’s Caye, were fought between the Spanish and the British around the islands and reefs off the Belizean coast. These momentous battles, in which the British defeated the Spanish, are celebrated as a national holiday in Belize. In 1862 while the United States, embroiled in its own civil war, was too preoccupied to enforce the Monroe Doctrine (which had declared the Western Hemisphere off-limits to further colonization), Belize was officially made a British colony.

During the course of the 20th century several constitutional changes were implemented to expand representative government in the territory. The British granted full-fledged internal self-government to Belize in January 1964. However, the government of Guatemala claimed that Belize was rightfully a Guatemalan territory, and territorial disputes between the United Kingdom and Guatemala delayed Belize’s independence. In June 1973 the official name of the territory was changed from British Honduras to Belize. At long last in September 1981, the United Kingdom agreed to grant complete independence to Belize, even though Guatemala refused to drop its claim and recognize Belize as a nation until 1992.

❁ GEOGRAPHY AND CLIMATE

Located on the Caribbean Sea, Belize is south of Mexico and east and north of Guatemala in Central America. Along the coast, mangrove swamps and cays (pronounced “keys”) give way to hills and mountains in the interior. Most of the country is heavily forested with various hardwoods. The highest point is Victoria Peak, 3,681 feet. Belize’s barrier reef, at 180 miles in length, is the longest in the Western Hemisphere.

The climate of Belize is subtropical, with high humidity, especially along the coast, that averages 83 percent. Many days, however, cooling breezes off the Gulf of Mexico keep the humidity from feeling oppressive. The coastal area is exposed to southeast trade winds that have an uncanny consistency in July. Temperatures in Belize range from 50°F to 95°F, with an annual mean of 79°F. The coolest months are usually November to January, while May to September are the warmest, averaging 81°F. Location is a big factor for temperature in Belize. Cayo to the west can be several degrees cooler than the temperature along the coast, and in the mountains the mean annual temperature is 72°F.

The weather patterns in Belize can be dramatically changed by two meteorological disturbances: northers and hurricanes. Northers are cold, wet air masses from the northeast, usually pushed south by large arctic air masses from November to February. In Belize these northers bring heavy rains, choppy seas, and colder-than-normal temperatures. While northers may cause some discomfort, hurricanes are dangerous, violent storms frequent between June and October. Although Belize rarely experiences hurricanes, when they strike, they are devastating.

❁ ECONOMY

Tourism is the most lucrative industry in Belize. In spite of the expansionary monetary policies in place since 1998, Belize continues to be plagued by high rates of unemployment, a large trade deficit, and foreign debt. The high crime rate, as well as involvement in the South American drug and sex trades, are factors the country is trying to rein in. Nevertheless Belize is a transit and destination country for men, women, and children trafficked for the purposes of labor and sexual exploitation. Exact numbers of trafficking victims are unknown, particularly the number of transnational trafficking victims, given Belize’s long and porous borders.

❁ CULTURE AND LIFESTYLE

Even though Belize’s population is relatively small, it is diverse, composed of several ethnocultural communities separated by language, culture, occupation, and residence: Mestizo, Creole, Garifuna, Mayan, Chinese, Syrian-Lebanese, East Indian, and Mennonite. This diversity is evident in the various languages, religions, cuisines, styles of dress, and folklore. All have left their marks in one way or another, and the music of Belize especially reflects the traditions of the various ethnic groups.

The Maya, already in decline when the Spanish arrived in the 16th century, left behind temple complexes aligned with the movements of heavenly bodies. Lamanai, which means “submerged crocodile” in Mayan, has 60 large structures, a small temple, and a ball court. It was occupied as early as 1500 B.C.E., and was a major ceremonial center before other sites were built. Xunantunich, another major Mayan ceremonial center, was built on a hilltop near the Belize River but may have been abandoned around 900 C.E. after an earthquake. Its tallest remaining structure El Castillo rises 131 feet above the surrounding jungle.

Most of the Belizean festivals are religious in nature and express the cultural traditions of the Maya and Carib, the indigenous peoples. The celebrations of festivals, whether religious or musical, include participants from the various ethnic groups that inhabit Belize. For instance, punta rock—a modern musical interpretation of a Garifuna cultural dance—is performed by drummers and local artists during various festivals. The punta dance, in which women wear long dresses sewn from checkered material along with colored headdresses, is Belize’s most popular dance. Belizeans are also passionate about bicycle racing, kite flying, and horse racing, and these activities are featured during a number of festivals.

❁ CUISINE

Belize is home to several cultures, and each has contributed to the national cuisine, from Creole rice and beans, Mestizo chimole, Mayan caldo, and Garifuna hudut to East Indian curries. Many of the local animals once used in indigenous dishes, for example, the hawksbill turtle and gibnut (similar to a guinea pig), or paca, are now protected species. The staple dish is rice and beans, a Creole dish. Belize beans and rice, also known as stewed beans and white rice, is much like rice and beans except that the beans and rice are cooked separately, and the rice is cooked in coconut milk. Another Creole staple is seré, which usually contains fish in a seasoned coconut sauce with okra and ground cassava (manioc) and cocoa.

Creole seré resembles hudut, a Garifuna recipe. One kind of hudut is made with coconut milk and mashed plantain; another is more like a spicy fish stew. The “heat” will depend on whether habanero or the milder jalapeño peppers are used. Coconuts are plentiful in Belize, and every part is used, even the dried husk, which turns up in the country’s ornamental arts or as the starter for a barbecue fire. Its grated flesh is used in familiar recipes, such as coconut pies or tarts, and in local specialties like coconut crust (sweetened grated coconut baked in a folded flour crust), tablata (a mixture of grated coconut, thinly sliced ginger, sugar, and water, baked and cut into squares), or cut-o-brute, made with chunks of coconut rather than the grated flesh. Dishes incorporated from the Mestizo culture include tacos, tamales, panadas, and meat pies.

PAN-AMERICAN DAY

Observed by: Mestizo and Indian citizens

Observed on: October 13

This holiday, also known as Columbus Day or Day of the Americas, commemorates the voyage undertaken by the Italian navigator Christopher Columbus on behalf of Spain in the late 15th century. His accidental arrival in the Western Hemisphere gave rise to the greatest clash of cultures in history. People of various European and African nations came in contact with each other, as well as with the indigenous tribes, often resulting in violent conflict and disease epidemics.

Belize observes this day as a national holiday on which schools, businesses, and government offices are closed. Various cross-cultural events, ranging from street parties and beauty contests to horse and bicycle races, are held to promote the traditional Mestizo (Spanish-Indian) culture.

❁ GARIFUNA DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: November 19

Garifuna Day, or Garifuna Settlement Day, celebrates the cultural heritage of the Garifuna people. The Garifuna, or Black Caribs, have been in the region for more than 300 years. The descendants of shipwrecked slaves and native Caribs, the Garifuna melded the Carib language and traditions with African music and religious beliefs. On this day Belizeans take part in a festival to celebrate the unique Garifuna culture. Events like the Miss Garifuna Belize Pageant, the Classic Bike Race, and children's parades are held across the country. A Mass of Thanksgiving, accompanied by traditional African-inspired drumming, also takes place.

❁ GOOD FRIDAY

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: Friday before Easter

The Christian holiday of Good Friday (also known as Celebration of the Seven Words, Holy Friday, and Mourning Friday) marks the Crucifixion of Jesus. It has been in the Christian liturgical calendar even longer than Easter, although no one is sure why it is called Good Friday. Some have suggested that the use of good in the name goes back to Old English and means "God's" Friday, while others interpret good to mean something like "observed as holy." This observance is also known as Black Friday and Sorrowful Friday, and in Eastern Orthodox Churches it is called Great Friday.

For many years Good Friday was primarily a Catholic observance, but many Protestant Churches now hold special services from noon until three in the afternoon on this day to symbolize Jesus' last hours on the Cross. Many of the faithful fast on this day; when they eat, it is generally fish instead of meat.

Belizeans believe that a curse will befall those who disobey their parents or behave rudely toward others on this day. Special church services are held, and people participate in processions, carrying a cross through the streets. Noon marks the start of the Celebration of the Seven Words. This is a two-and-a-half-hour service that focuses on readings from the Psalms and Gospels that are repeated seven times. Fasts are observed and special prayers are offered on this occasion.

❁ HOLY SATURDAY

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: Last Saturday of Lent

On Holy Saturday, also called the Vigil of Easter or the Angelic Night, Catholic Belizeans hold an Easter Vigil Mass in the evening. A bonfire is lit at the doorway of each church. From that bonfire the cirio pascual (Easter candle) is lit and taken inside. All the other lights are then put out. The Easter candle is subsequently used to light individual candles of the faithful who gather inside to pray. An annual cross-country bicycle race is also held in Belize on this day.

❁ LAS POSADAS

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: December 16–24

On Belize Christmas festivities are preceded by las posadas, a nine-night candle church services that begins on December 16. During this ritual statues of Joseph and Mary are carried to different houses where they symbolically ask for, and are offered, food and shelter for the evening. Participants pray together after the statues have been welcomed. The ceremony is repeated at a different home each night until Christmas Eve, when Joseph and Mary make their way back to the church for the dance of the pastores, a performance symbolizing the shepherds bringing gifts to the baby Jesus.

The Greasy Pole

The greasy pole is a long piece of tree trunk, carefully hewn and then greased with a combination of soap and lard. On the final day of the Deer Dance Festival a competition is held to see who can climb all the way to the top of the pole.

Christmas Eve is a noisy event as strings of firecrackers are lit to mark the occasion. Christian celebrations include prayers and vigils. The devout attend misa de Gallo, or Midnight Mass.

CHRISTMAS

Observed on: December 24–25

Belizeans share the European and North American custom of decorating Christmas trees. They also decorate the exteriors of their homes with small festive lights, exchange greeting cards, and bake fruitcakes. As in the rest of the world Christmas is a time for visiting families and friends. The classic Creole Sunday dinner of rice, beans, and potato salad is typically served for Christmas.

Those of Mayan descent perform the Deer Dance, which enacts the relationship between humanity and nature, and the Garifuna perform the charikanari, a masquerade symbolizing the relationship between the hunter and the deer.

BOXING DAY

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: December 26

As a former British colony Belize observes Boxing Day, or St. Stephen's Day, on the day after Christmas. In England, tradespeople and those who performed public services used to go from house to house with small boxes asking for tips or bonuses. The alms boxes at local churches were also opened and the contents were passed out among the poor. Today on Belize parties, horse races, and dances—including the traditional garifuna—are performed by asederabatians (the ones who serenade) on this day. These lively entertainers parade through the streets of Belize. In Dangriga (the largest town in southern Belize), Boxing Day is celebrated with the beating of drums. Dancers go singing and dancing from one home to another and are rewarded with food and drink.

SAN PEDRO CARNIVAL

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: February

San Pedro's Carnival, which is pagan in origin, is similar to Mardi Gras in New Orleans and Rio de Janeiro. It is observed during the week leading up to Ash Wednesday and Lent, the 40-day period of fasting that precedes Easter. During this time people can indulge in bodily pleasures that they will give up during Lent. The local government of San Pedro usually organizes a week of festivities for visitors and residents. Children of all ages also participate in the Carnival. On the last day, people flood the streets to paint each other with a mixture of watercolor paint and raw eggs. Comparsa dancers form groups, dress themselves in outlandish costumes, and dance for money through the main streets of the town. One of the most popular comparsa groups is all-male. These men, usually well known and influential in the community, dress up like women and dance.

Rites of Passage

COMING OF AGE

In Belize coming of age among Catholics is announced by a quinceanos. This celebration, which is Mexican in origin, is a coming-out party that is given for a young girl when she turns 15. The quinceanos announces to the community that the girl has attained marriageable age. Marking her passage from childhood to adulthood she is dressed in a magnificent white gown similar to a wedding gown, and friends and family members escort her to the town's Catholic church. At the church a special Mass is held. The priest blesses a ring, which is then presented to the girl.

❁ MARRIAGE

A young man interested in courting, and possibly marrying, a young woman in Belize needs to obtain permission from the girl's parents to visit her at her home, in the presence of all her family members. On the wedding day as the bride takes her last walk as a single woman on her way to the church, friends and townspeople wish her well by throwing gifts in her path and paying her compliments.

Introduction

✿ HISTORY

The Republic of Benin is situated in western Africa. Throughout much of its history this region was known as Dahomey. The earliest recorded information dates back to the 12th or 13th century C.E. when members of the Aja tribe migrated eastward from Tado on the Mono River and established the village of Allada. When the state of Great Ardra was formed sometime later, Allada became the capital. In the 17th century three brothers had a dispute over who would be king. When it was settled, Kokpon stayed on in Great Ardra, his brother Do-Aklin established the town of Abomey, and the other brother Te-Agdanlin founded the town of Ajatche, or Little Ardra (called Porto Novo by Portuguese traders).

The settlers in Abomey built a strongly centralized kingdom with its own army and intermarried with the local population to form the Fon, or Dahomey ethnic group. By the end of the century, the Fon had become slave-traders, raiding their neighbors and selling them to coastal middlemen, who then resold them to the Europeans. It is estimated that as many as 20,000 slaves were transported from Great Ardra and Oidah annually.

King Agaja (1708–32 C.E.) sought to expand the Dahomey's borders until his policies brought his tribe into conflict with the Yoruba. The Yoruba captured the lands of the Dahomey and exacted an annual tribute. Nevertheless the Dahomey managed to continue their expansion to the north and maintained its slave trade well into the 19th century.

In 1863 seeking to challenge the Dahomey's power, the village of Porto-Novo agreed to become a French protectorate. This gave the French a position from which to subjugate the Dahomey along the coast. Although King Behanzin (r. 1889–90) tried to stop them, the French conquered that part of the territory and established a protectorate there as well. Between 1895 and 1898 the French also subjugated the regions to the north; in 1904 the whole territory was consolidated into French West Africa. France increased the production of palm products and built railroads and ports for exporting them. In addition, they encouraged Roman Catholic missionaries to build elementary schools.

The area, which came to be called after the dominant ethnic group (Dahomey), became an overseas territory of France in 1946, thereby gaining its own parliament and representation in the French National Assembly. Widespread demonstrations in the region forced the French to listen to the popular voice. Finally in 1958, the region was granted autonomy, and the Republic of Dahomey came into existence. The republic achieved independent status on August 1, 1960. Although Porto Novo is the capital, the seat of government was located in Cotonou.

Hubert Maga (1916–2000) was the nation's first president. Growing economic tensions, political instability, and tribal war, however, led to a military coup in 1963, and Justin Ahomadegbe (1917–2002) proclaimed himself chief of the state. Six more years of political unrest ensued, until 1969, when Lt. Col. Paul-Émile de Souza (?1930–99) became president.

Elections were canceled in 1970, and a three-man council was appointed. In 1972 Major Mathieu Kerekou (b. 1933) led a successful coup and declared himself head of state. When he proclaimed Marxist Leninism the country's ideology and declared it a socialist state, the country earned the nickname of "Cuba of West Africa."

In 1975, the country's name was changed to the Republic of Benin. The country was run as a socialist state until 1989. In 1991 free elections were held. Nicéphore Soglo defeated Mathieu Kerekou, but in the 1996 election Kerekou was reelected and was still in power in the early years of the 21st century.

❁ GEOGRAPHY AND CLIMATE

Benin is bordered by Nigeria on the east and Togo on the west. Burkina Faso lies to the northwest and Niger to the northeast. To the south is the Atlantic Ocean. The country has a coastal plain toward the south with various lagoons created by the Oueme, Mono, and Couffo Rivers. The largest lagoon, Lac Nokouge, separates Porto Novo and Cotonou. The popular fishing village Ganvie is also near this lake. The Atakora Mountains, rising to a height of 2,159 feet, lie on the northern side.

Benin's climate varies greatly from north to south. The southern climate is subtropical. It has two dry seasons and two rainy seasons, with temperatures ranging between 64°F and 95°F. In the north, the climate is tropical, with one dry season and one rainy season. Between March and June, the temperature can reach 115°F.

❁ ECONOMY

Benin is one of the most densely populated countries in Africa. In 1961 the population was around 2.1 million, and by 2003 it had exceeded 6.6 million.

The Court Art of Benin

The art that originated in the courts of Benin, prior to colonialism, is very popular today. It is dominated by images of fish, leopards, and crocodiles, since animals were considered symbols of deities. These motifs also represent the power of the oba (king).

The leopard especially stands out as the symbol of power. During his rule the oba kept tame leopards and paraded them through the city. At one time the people used to sacrifice leopards in order to preserve the power and well-being of the kingdom.

Widely known as the "policemen of the waters," crocodiles represented the god of water Olokun. They also represented the power of the oba.

The god of nature was Osun, and snakes represented his power. Beninians believed that the water god Olokun sent pythons to punish men who did wrong.

The art of Benin was often executed in ivory because it represented longevity. Coral was a symbol of royalty.

Most of the people live in the southern part of the country.

Benin is also one of the poorest countries in the world and is highly dependent on international aid. It is self-sufficient in food production, but natural calamities and environmental degradation are serious problems. Salinization of the lagoons, deforestation, excessive fishing, and soil erosion plague the country. Agriculture has also resulted in destruction of the rain forest.

About 70 percent of the Beninese are farmers. Maize, millet, coffee, cassava, groundnuts, and pulses (legumes) are the main crops. They are grown primarily for consumption in the regions where they are grown and for purposes of regional trade. Cattle breeding is also common. Goats, pigs, and sheep are raised, and fishing is done on a commercial scale. The major industrial product is cement. Benin also has traces of petroleum deposits, phosphates, iron, and gold.

There has been a rapid increase in cotton production during the 20th century, and cotton constitutes 84 percent of Benin's exports. Palm oil, which is produced from palm nuts, is also a major export of the republic.

Today, the government of Benin is trying to encourage foreign investment. It is also developing food-processing systems, and improvements have been made in communications and information technology. The tourism sector is growing but remains precarious because the traditional practice of vidomegon, whereby poor children are placed with wealthy families, has resulted in some labor and sexual exploitation. Benin is a source, transit, and destination country for trafficked children.

Fun Fact

Yoruba, believed to be one of the oldest widely practiced religions of the world, may have given birth to such American religions as Santeria (a fusion of Christian and Yoruba beliefs) in Cuba and Candomble (an Afro-American religion) in Brazil.

CULTURE AND LIFESTYLE

There are more than 20 sociocultural groups in Benin, each with its own history, language, traditions, and culture. The major tribes in this polyglot nation are Fon, Yoruba, Bariba and Dendi. The Fon, along with the Yoruba, are the two largest groups in the south, where most people speak the Fon language.

The Yoruba inhabit the southeastern and central parts of the Republic of Benin. Yoruba are followers of Christianity and Islam and fuse indigenous beliefs with these two religions. They organize themselves into small kingdoms, which are politically autonomous but culturally similar.

In the north, the Bariba, Dendi, and Somba, mainly farmers and shepherds, form the largest cultural groups. The Dendi tribal state can trace its origins to the kingdom of Songhai, which was destroyed by Morocco and then conquered by the French in 1901. The inhabitants of this region, as well as the language they speak, share the name of the region and are called Dendi. The Dendi breed cattle, but farming is their primary occupation. The Somba are mainly nomadic hunters and have no formal political organization.

The Bariba inhabit the central and northern parts of Benin. They form the largest ethnic group in the north and account for one-twelfth of

Vodoun

The term Voodoo or Vodoun applies to all the ancestor-based religions of West Africa whose origins may be traced to the Fon-Ewe people. The word Vodoun is a Fon-Ewe word, which means “spirits.” The practice of voodoo, or voodooism, is one of the world’s oldest religions, and Benin is considered its birthplace.

According to Beninese Vodoun beliefs, each family of spirits has its own specialized clergy, which is often hereditary. Some of the important spirits are: the goddesses of water, who are referred to as Mami Wata; a young and energetic spirit called Legba; the ruler of iron and the smith craft, known as Gu; and the ruler of diseases Sakpata.

All the spirits are revered for their powers, and regular rituals are performed to appease them. Vodoun is also used as a weapon against one’s enemies. Priests preside over rituals to invoke the power of these spirits to destroy one’s enemy.

the country’s population. Bariba society has high-ranking members who are chiefs and subordinate chiefs of towns. The nature of one’s work reflects the status of the family and is generally handed down from one generation to the next. Although a majority of Bariba are Muslim, the upper strata of society still adhere to indigenous beliefs. They are mainly farmers who grow crops like sorghum, rice, cassava (tapioca), corn, palm oil, and cotton. Men enjoy a dominant role, and women are expected to assist their husbands in agricultural activities.

Almost half of the Beninese population adheres to either the Christian or Muslim faith, while the other half practices indigenous beliefs. In 1996 the ancient religion of Vodoun, which involves witchcraft and animistic deities, was recognized as the official religion of Benin. Benin is the birthplace of Vodoun, better known as voodoo in the Western world. Vodoun recognizes one god and a series of intermediaries who act as communicators between God and the faithful.

CUISINE

The diet of the people of Benin consists in large part of yams, beans, millet, cassava (tapioca), and rice. Gari, made from the paste of the cassava (tapioca), is a popular dish in the southern part of the country. Djenkoume is made out of a paste of corn, red palm oil, and tomatoes. Okra pods (referred to as “ladyfingers”) are stewed or eaten raw. The Beninese have their own version of fries, which are made out of boiled and fried yams or plantains.

Stews are a favorite in Benin; one of their specialties is ago glain, made with shellfish, onions, and tomatoes in a sauce that varies by locale. The people in the north prefer starchy dishes such as millet couscous and often add local sauces for spiciness. Lamounou dessi is a favorite local sauce made from chilies, smoked shrimp, fish, and vegetables.

Traditional (or National Voodoo) Day is unique to Benin. Special festivals are organized in the city of Cotonou as well as in other parts of Benin. Cotonou is considered the birthplace of the Vodoun religion and celebrates Traditional Day in style. Thousands of Vodoun followers from all over the world flock to Cotonou to receive the blessings of the head of Cotonou's Vodoun practice, currently Daagbo Hounon Houna. Drinks and feasting follow as people invoke the blessing of the holy spirits and pray for mercy.

Voodoo, or Vodoun, as practiced in West Africa, started with the Yoruba people. It spread to other African countries through the slave trade. As a result of the slave trade, which flourished in some regions of Benin, Benin natives were exported to different parts of Africa, America, and Europe, where they practiced, or came in contact with, Vodoun.

Voodoo is now practiced by 50 percent of Benin's population. In many places, people belonging to other religious faiths also practice voodoo. According to voodoo belief, life begins from earth, water, fire, and air. The people believe that voodoo exists for doing good and for the good of society.

A festive spirit envelops the whole of Benin on Traditional Day. Songs and dance are an integral part of the celebrations with drummers highlighting the show. Goats are sacrificed to give thanks to the ancestral spirits.

On August 1, 1960, the country that was to become the Republic of Benin was granted independence from French colonial rule. For that reason Benin celebrates its independence on this date.

Benin, formerly called Dahomey, had been under French rule since the late 19th century. In 1946 following World War II, France designated the country an overseas territory. But the Beninese people wanted to be independent and pressed for total freedom. France granted it in 1958, and the Republic of Dahomey came into existence. The country achieved complete independence on August 1, 1960, after the Beninese intensified their protests against the French.

On Independence Day huge celebrations are held, and traditional dance and music performances take place all over Benin. Independence Day celebrations are presided over by the president, the official host of the foreign dignitaries invited for the occasion. Parades by the armed forces, patriotic speeches, and cultural programs are also a part of Independence Day celebrations in Benin.

Goats are sacrificed, and their meat is distributed among family, friends, and the poor.

The Edo Calendar

In the Edo kingdom, there were two kinds of years: male and female. One was a month longer than the other. The year was divided into Moons. The names of the Moons did not correspond to lunar months, but to ceremonies conducted in proximity to the said Moon (month). From time to time months were longer than lunar months, and at one point in northern Edo 40-day months were even used, yielding a nine-month year. In addition, a four-day week was more universal, because this was the typical interval between two markets at a given location. In the Idah area though, eight-day markets were sometimes found. On the day of rest, men would typically stay at home, although farm work was not totally prohibited. Women, however, went to market as usual.

IGUE FESTIVAL

Observed in: Regions with Edo populations

Observed by: Edo tribe

Observed on: Thirteenth month in the Edo calendar

In the ancient kingdom of Edo, tradition dictated that the king (or oba) be worshipped as the people's god. It was believed that the people's luck depended on that of the king. Thus this festival is dedicated to good luck, prosperity, and long life. People make offerings to appease the oba and other gods. Ritual sacrifices of animals are made in front of the oba, followed by traditional dance performances. Singing, feasting, drinking, and dancing are the main highlights of the Igue festival. The festival lasts for seven days, and the Edo people eagerly await this annual event.

MARRIAGE

Wedding rituals vary from community to community in Benin. Many value virginity highly. Thus, the mothers of Edo brides give their daughters cash if they remain virgins until their wedding night. After the wedding night the bedsheets are checked thoroughly for bloodstains. The next morning the bride's nightgown may be shown to the public as proof of her virginity.

DEATH

In the Vodoun culture, which is widespread in Benin, death is not regarded as the end of life. Practitioners believe that the body is the shell for the life force. After death, the soul journeys back to where it came from. It is important to send the soul back to the cosmic community; otherwise, it will wander the Earth and cause harm to the person's family.

Introduction

❧ HISTORY

Bermuda is named after the Spanish naval captain Juan de Bermudez (d. 1570 C.E.), who sighted the uninhabited islands around 1503. The Spanish did not claim the islands, but they became an important navigational landmark for galleons crossing the Atlantic between Spain and the Western Hemisphere. Since Bermuda is surrounded by dangerous coral reefs, nautical misadventures cast the Spanish ashore on several occasions and littered the seabed with huge amounts of treasure.

In 1609, the flagship Sea Venture, commanded by Admiral Sir George Somers (1554–1610) was blown off course and wrecked off the coast of Bermuda. The Catch, another vessel of the group of nine ships that sailed from Plymouth, England, was also wrecked. Both ships were headed for the British settlement at Jamestown, Virginia. Although the survivors of the wreck found the island quite pleasant, they fashioned replacement ships of fine Bermuda cedar and sailed off to Jamestown, arriving just in time to save the locals from starvation. However they left behind a couple of men to establish a British claim to the islands. Admiral Somers returned to Bermuda later in the year, only to die shortly afterward. The British renamed Bermuda Somers Islands in honor of the admiral, but the name failed to stick.

The Virginia Company, excited by news of the islands' habitability, sent 60 settlers to establish a colony three years after Somers's misadventure. Unfortunately the shallow topsoil and the lack of water prevented commercial crops such as sugarcane from being introduced. The settlers soon became reliant on food imports from the British colonies on the North American mainland, which they paid for by supplying sea salt from the islands. For many years the Virginia Company—a company chartered for the purpose of settling Virginia, and then a subsidiary, the Bermuda Company, ran the islands like a fiefdom. Eventually, however, settlers managed to get the company's charter rescinded, and in 1684 Bermuda became a British Crown Colony.

Slaves were first introduced to the islands in 1616; most were from Africa, though some were Amerindians. The slaves lived in deplorable conditions and were generally employed as domestic servants or tradesmen rather than agricultural laborers. The skills they learned stood them in good stead when slavery was abolished in 1834.

At the time of emancipation in 1834 more than half of the people residing in Bermuda were registered on the census as black or colored. The former slaves became sailors and shipbuilders. In the 1840s Portuguese immigrants came to Bermuda as agricultural workers. They were later followed by the West Indians. Despite Bermuda's reliance on trade with the North American colonies, political bonds with Britain proved stronger. During the American War of Independence Bermuda remained loyal to the Crown. During the War of 1812 the British Navy used Bermuda as a base from which to ransack Washington, D.C. The Americans responded by confiscating the unprotected cargo of Bermuda's merchant fleet, devastating the local economy.

In a bid to escape the long, harsh Canadian winter, Princess Louise, the daughter of Queen Victoria (1819–1901) and the wife of the governor general of Canada paid an extended visit to the islands in 1883. Unwittingly she was instrumental in putting Bermuda on the world tourist map. By the turn of the century Bermuda had been transformed into a fashionable winter destination for people seeking a warm-weather respite, who flocked aboard steamers, which sailed regularly from New York and Hamilton, Ontario, in Canada.

In the wake of World War II, women were given the right to vote, and, gradually some restrictions on the rights of black voters were removed. In 1963 the Progressive Labour Party was introduced, in part to represent the interests of nonwhite

Gombey Dancers

Gombey dancing is an art form unique to Bermuda. While it has roots in West African tribal music, gombey dancing also incorporates influences from Christian missionaries, the British military, and Amerindians, from whom gombey dancers have adapted their costumes. To the uninitiated, the gombey dancers may look like wildly costumed characters jumping up and down to loud music, but in fact the dancing is carefully choreographed to specific rhythms and often portrays biblical stories. The dancers traditionally take to the streets on Boxing Day and New Year's Day.

Bermudians in a government composed entirely of white landowners.

Today Bermuda enjoys an affluent status as an offshore financial center, but the government has begun reforming this industry to clean up the territory's reputation as a tax haven. More than 13,000 companies are registered here. The territory's other mainstay is tourism; more than half a million people visit annually. Although a healthy majority of islanders voted against independence in 1995, in 2004 Premier Jennifer Smith (b. 1947) reignited the issue by calling for the resumption of a territory-wide debate. In the early 21st century, the islands remain an overseas territory of Britain.

✿ CLIMATE AND GEOGRAPHY

Bermuda consists of about 138 coral islands and islets with ample rainfall but no rivers or freshwater lakes. Since it is located in the subtropical region, it commonly experiences gales and strong winds in winter. Bermuda has a remarkably mild, humid climate that seldom sees extremes of hot or cold. Rainfall is spread fairly evenly throughout the year.

✿ ECONOMY

The mainstays of Bermuda's economy are international financial services, especially insurance, and tourism. Fine beaches, an excellent climate, and picturesque sites have made Bermuda a fashionable and popular year-round resort. Semitropical produce, sales of fuel to aircraft and ships, and pharmaceuticals are among Bermuda's exports, though all are relatively minor in the overall economic picture.

✿ CULTURE AND LIFESTYLE

Bermudian culture is a melding of British and African heritages. The British influences are seen primarily in institutions, including the government, educational system, and legal framework. The judges still wear powdered wigs, and cricket is the most popular sport. English is spoken on Bermuda, and the majority of islanders identify themselves as Christian. The African influence is a bit subtler but can be seen in the island's music, which features reggae and calypso. These two types of music are African in origin but came to Bermuda by way of the West Indies. The wonderful rhythms of gombey dancers are another African-inspired art form.

✿ CUISINE

Bermuda does not have a distinctive cuisine, but it does have some local seafood dishes worth noting. The island's fish chowder is commonly made with rockfish or snapper and flavored with local black rum and sherry pepper sauce. Codfish cakes were once a staple food on the island and are still prepared on certain days of the year. Johnnycakes—cornmeal griddlecakes with peas and rice—are popular everyday fare. A typical well-known meal is the Sunday codfish breakfast, a huge affair consisting of codfish, eggs, boiled Irish potatoes, bananas, and avocado with a sauce made of onions and tomatoes.

Cassava pie is a traditional Christmas delicacy. Cassava, or yucca, is a starchy vegetable, which has special significance for Bermudians, since it is credited with having helped early settlers survive during periods of famine. Black Seal rum is the locally brewed national beverage. Locals often combine it with ginger beer, while visitors prefer it as the main ingredient in their rum swizzles.

Observed on: December 31–January 1

The residents of Bermuda bid farewell to the old year and welcome the new with hopes and aspirations. New Year's Day is celebrated by hosting parties with family and friends. As a popular tourist destination, Bermuda holds celebrations and festivities throughout the year for tourists, but New Year's is a particularly special time for residents.

❁ BERMUDA DAY

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: May 24

Bermuda Day was originally called Empire Day to celebrate Queen Victoria's birthday, but now May 24 marks the beginning of summer for Bermudians. This event-packed day kicks off with a bicycle race from Somerset to Hamilton, along with a half-marathon and a rollerblading race on the same course. In the afternoon a parade of floats and bands winds its way through the streets of Hamilton, the capital, while the first dinghy race of the season keeps boating enthusiasts entertained.

❁ QUEEN'S BIRTHDAY

Observed on: June 14

Since Bermuda is a British protectorate, the birthday of the reigning British monarch assumes great importance. The occasion is celebrated annually in June with great pomp and show. Politicians and civil servants attend the official ceremonies. The premier, opposition party leader, fire chief, police commissioner, and mayor of Hamilton (in top hat and chains of office) also attend. The governor, dressed in full ceremonial whites, plumed hat, and blue sash, inspects the regimental troops. There is a 21-gun salute before the governor leads the crowd in shouting three cheers for the queen.

❁ EMANCIPATION DAY

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: Last Thursday of July

On August 1, 1834, as in other British possessions in the West Indies, slavery was abolished in Bermuda, with the release of nearly 5,000 slaves from bondage. This historic event is commemorated on the last Thursday of July.

The most spectacular celebrations are those in the island town of St. George. They include dramatic readings, music, and dance. Part of the commemoration is a visit to the burial ground for slaves (as well as those of free blacks) at St. Peter's Church. These celebrations conclude with the famous and hugely popular Somers Cup Match: a cricket match between the Somerset and St. George's Cricket Clubs. Most Bermudians are lifelong supporters of one team or the other. Those who do not attend the match listen eagerly to the commentary on the radio.

❁ LABOR DAY

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: First Monday of September

In many countries Labor Day recognizes workers' contributions to economic development and progress on May 1, the date chosen by the Socialist Second International in 1889. In Bermuda, however, the observance takes place on the first Monday in September, the same day as in the United States. Labor union leaders make speeches and hold rallies, and there are road races, games, and other festivities on this day. Banks and educational institutions are closed.

❁ ARMISTICE DAY

Observed on: November 11

Armistice Day, or Remembrance Day, was originally instituted to honor veterans and those who were killed in World War I. Since then it has been expanded to include veterans and heroes of other wars. World War II has particular importance for Bermuda, because its strategic location in the Atlantic gave it an important role in aiding British and U.S. allies in military and intelligence operations. On this day the inhabitants of the island remember and pay homage to the soldiers who died in those wars.

Fun Fact

Bermuda has intimate associations with a number of famous writers and painters who lived, worked, or vacationed on the island, including Eugene O'Neill, Noel Coward, James Thurber, Peter Benchley, Georgia O'Keeffe, and Winslow Homer.

✿ GOOD FRIDAY

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: Friday before Easter

This Christian festival commemorates the Crucifixion of Jesus. It has been in the Christian liturgical calendar even longer than Easter has although no one is sure why it is called Good Friday. Some have suggested that the use of good in the name goes back to Old English and means “God’s” Friday, while others interpret good to mean something like “observed as holy.” This observance is also known as Black Friday and Sorrowful Friday, and in Eastern Orthodox Churches it is called Great Friday.

For many years Good Friday was primarily a Catholic observance, but many Protestant Churches now hold special services from noon until three in the afternoon on this day to symbolize Jesus’ last hours on the Cross. Many of the faithful fast on this day; when they eat, it is generally fish instead of meat.

This is a solemn occasion, and people spend the day listening to readings of the Gospels and Psalms and singing hymns, although there are other traditions on the island. One of them is flying kites, a custom that goes back to a 19th century Sunday school teacher who flew a kite to show his pupils how Jesus got to heaven.

Another Bermudian tradition is a special breakfast served on Good Friday: salted cod soaked overnight and boiled with potatoes. The dish is served with an olive oil and mayonnaise sauce and sliced bananas on the side.

✿ EASTER

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: First Sunday after Lent

Easter celebrates the day Jesus rose from the dead, three days after his Crucifixion. Many Bermudians and other local residents celebrate at sunrise on Easter morning with special prayer services, which are held throughout Bermuda. One of the most notable services is the one conducted at Horseshoe Bay. For Easter Sunday services the churches are colorfully decorated with special floral arrangements featuring Easter lilies, which bloom during this season. For the children there are Easter Egg Hunts and plenty of kite flying, a favorite pastime in Bermuda.

During Easter week celebrations, Bermudians eat traditional (British style) hot cross buns. Besides being available at local bakeries, they are often homemade and sold or given away by women. The buns are square-shaped, about one and three-quarters inches wide and one and a half inches deep, with sugar frosting applied to them in the shape of a cross, symbolizing Jesus’ agony and death on the Cross.

It is also customary for Bermudians to eat codfish cakes with bananas on this occasion, a dish ritually eaten during Lent. In previous centuries, Catholics abstained from meat on Fridays as a measure of austerity. Therefore eating codfish on Easter Sunday is meant to symbolize the end of austerity and penance and the commencement of festivities.

✿ BOXING DAY

Observed on: December 26

The day after Christmas is known as Boxing Day, Family Day, or the Feast of St. Stephen, the first Christian martyr. It is called Boxing Day following an old British tradition whose origins are unclear but may have been rooted in the custom of distributing the contents of alms boxes among the poor on this day. The day after Christmas tradespeople and others who performed public services went from door to door with small ceramic boxes asking for tips or bonuses. Boxing Day has been a recognized holiday in Bermuda only since the 20th century. Adding it to extend the Christmas holiday has allowed many people to travel and visit extended families. By and large it is a day devoted to outdoor sports, especially horse racing and cricket matches. Food, fun, and a spirit of love and friendship pervade the atmosphere.

✿ BERMUDA KITE FESTIVAL

Observed in: Horseshoe Bay

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: March

No one knows for certain exactly when or why Bermuda embraced kite flying during the Easter season. The story goes that a Sunday-school teacher used the flying of a kite to illustrate the way Jesus ascended to heaven. Once the kite was airborne at the full length of the string the teacher would cut the string, allowing the kite to be swept away by the wind until it disappeared. Over the centuries kite flying on Good Friday has become as much a part of the day as eating codfish cakes and playing marbles. The Kite Festival at Horseshoe Bay is indeed a spectacular event that fills the skies with kites of all shapes, sizes, and hues. There is a great deal of excitement among the people who take part in this much-anticipated event.

❁ PEPPERCORN CEREMONY

Observed in: Town of St. George

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: April

This is an old ceremony full of color, pomp, pageantry, and some silliness. The leading players in the ceremony are the governor and Freemasons of Lodge No. 200, a Scottish fellowship established in Bermuda in 1797. The ritual commences when the governor arrives in his landau (a four-wheeled, horse-drawn passenger carriage) wearing his ceremonial white uniform. Local dignitaries and members of the St. George's Lodge greet him. The Bermuda Regiment provides a guard of honor, and lodge members turn out in full regalia for the handing over of the annual symbolic rent for their use of the old State House—a single peppercorn. After the payment is made and speeches have been delivered, the governor and his escort leave.

Introduction

❧ HISTORY

Because little or no archaeological research has been done in Bhutan, nothing is known about the prehistory of the region. The earliest records available indicate that the first settlers arrived here about 1,400 years ago. However they may have encountered scattered clusters of earlier inhabitants. The official name of this country is Druk Yul, which means “land of the thunder dragon.” The Bhutanese call themselves Drukpa. The colloquial name Bhutan is probably derived from the Sanskrit word bhotant, which means “the end of Tibet”; another possible root is bhuuttan, which means “high land.”

In addition to the majority Bhote, today’s Drukpa population is made up of three main ethnic Nepalese groups: the Sharchops, the Ngalops, and the Lhotsampas. As far as is known the Sharchops were Bhutan’s earliest residents. They were originally members of tribes in northern Burma and northeast India. Today, they occupy eastern Bhutan. The Ngalops, who brought Buddhism to the kingdom, originated in the Tibetan plains. In the early 20th century the Lhotsampas (who are of Nepalese origin) migrated to the southern plains of Bhutan, mostly in search of agricultural land and work.

The roots of the present form of government were planted by Shabdrung Ngawang Namgyal (late 1500s–1651), a Tibetan lama (or priest) of the Drukpa School, who came to Bhutan in 1616. Under Namgyal’s leadership Bhutan was unified for the first time. Although he was the country’s supreme leader, he delegated responsibility for all civil affairs to the druk desi (an administrator similar to a prime minister) and responsibility for religious activities to the je khenpo, or chief abbot. Namgyal also built a system of fortified monasteries (dzongs), which have become an important focus of Bhutanese culture. After Shabdrung died, sporadic civil wars continued for almost two centuries. During this period the regional governors (ponlops) became increasingly powerful.

Ugyen Wangchuk (1861–1926), the ponlop of Trongsa, was finally successful in subduing the other feuding ponlops who had Dzongs are fortified monasteries prevalent in Bhutan. They serve as the religious, military, administrative, and social centers of their districts and are often the site of local festivals (tsechu).

Dzong

Dzongs are frequently sited on hilltops or mountain spurs. If a dzong is built on the side of a valley wall, a smaller dzong is typically built directly uphill from the main dzong for the purpose of keeping the slope clear of attackers, who might otherwise shoot downward into the courtyard of the main dzong below.

Dzong architecture is a distinctive type of fortress architecture. The buildings are massive, with towering exterior walls surrounding a complex of courtyards, temples, administrative offices, and living quarters for monks. The distinctive features of this genre include: high inward sloping walls of brick and stone painted white, with few or no windows in the lower sections of the wall; and the use of a surrounding red stripe near the top of the walls (perhaps punctuated by large gold circles) plunged Bhutan into a state of almost perpetual civil war. He had consolidated his authority across the entire country by 1885; in 1907, an assembly of representatives of the monastic community, civil servants, and other citizens, elected Ugyen Wangchuck the first king of Bhutan in recognition of his superb statesmanship and leadership abilities. Around the same time Wangchuck also assumed the role of mediator between the British and the Chinese. He ruled until 1926, establishing a dynasty. The monarchy has thrived ever since, and the present fourth king His Majesty Jigme Singye Wangchuck (b. 1955) commands the overwhelming respect of his subjects.

GEOGRAPHY AND CLIMATE

Bhutan is a landlocked country surrounded by the eastern Himalayan Mountains. It is south of Tibet and north and west of the Indian territories of Assam, West Bengal, and Sikkim. Bhutan's total area is about 18,147 square miles (about the size of Switzerland). The Greater Himalayas in the north reach heights of over 23,950 feet and are sparsely populated. Their height diminishes in the south of the country to form the fertile valleys of the Lesser Himalayas, which are divided by the Torsa, Raidak, Sankosh, and Manas Rivers. The majority of the population lives in the cultivated central uplands and Himalayan foothills.

The climate of Bhutan ranges from cold in the north to tropical in the south. In the high-altitude passes, the snowfall is so heavy it can lead to roadblocks. The period of heaviest snowfall in the higher mountain elevations is late December through mid-February. March through May is the spring season. Scarlet rhododendrons are in bloom, and Bhutan is vibrant, colorful, and quite spectacular. During the summer (late May–late September), the monsoons from the Bay of Bengal affect Bhutan. These monsoons have led to dense forestation in the south and alpine vegetation at higher altitudes.

Many species of wild orchids blossom during the late summer season (August). The autumn season (late September–November) is usually mild and clear.

CULTURE AND LIFESTYLE

The most common occupation in Bhutan is farming, and small family farms are the predominant social unit. At higher elevations cattle and yak breeding is the primary source of income, and the majority of Bhutanese here also live in small rural villages.

The Buddhist faith plays an important part in the Bhutanese way of life. Bhutan is the only country in the world to have retained the Tantric form of Mahayana Buddhism. Padmasambhava, better known as Guru Rinpoche (precious master), is the father of its official lineage (drukpa kagyü).

Buddhism affects all aspects of secular life. It is common to see Bhutanese making circles around offering receptacles (chortens or stupas) with prayer beads or twirling prayer wheels. In every Bhutanese home there is a special room used for prayers called a chosum.

Tshechus and dromchoes are two different kinds of spiritual festivals that are important here. They unite the population and are dedicated to the Guru Rinpoche or protective deities. There are also chortens lining the roadsides, marking places where it is believed Guru Rinpoche or other senior lamas stopped to meditate. Innumerable prayer flags (dashi) dot the hills, because the Bhutanese people believe they keep them in constant contact with the spiritual world.

There is no rigid class system in Bhutan, and neither rank nor birth affects social and educational

Masked Dances

Masked dances and dance dramas are common features at all Bhutanese festivals. Energetic dancers wearing colorful wooden or composition masks employ costumes and music to depict a panoply of heroes, demons, death heads, animals, gods, and caricatures of common people. The dances enjoy royal patronage and preserve not only ancient folk and religious customs but also perpetuate the art of mask-making.

opportunities. Bhutanese men and women enjoy equal rights in all respects. Dzongkha is Bhutan's official language, but the geographic isolation of Bhutan's highland villages has preserved a number of dialects.

Bhutanese women wear an ankle-length dress called a kira. It is made from finely woven fabric and beautifully colored in traditional patterns. They also wear necklaces made from coral, pearls, turquoise, or agate. (The Bhutanese call these stones dzi beads or "tears of the gods.") Men wear a gho, a long robe tied around the waist with a small belt called a kera. Bhutan uses both the Buddhist lunar calendar and the Gregorian calendar in designating its holidays.

❁ CUISINE

Meat and poultry, dairy products, grain, and vegetables are all basic to the Bhutanese diet. The Bhutanese also eat red or white rice with every meal. Chilies are used lavishly in preparing poultry and meat dishes (pork, beef, and yak). The national dish is emdatse (chili peppers and cheese stew). The usual drink on all social occasions is suja, a salted butter tea. A local beer called Chang, as well as arra, a drink distilled from rice, maize, wheat, or barley, are also popular. It is customary to offer doma or betel nuts to guests as a sign of welcome.

❁ LOSAR

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: February

Lasting for three days Losar (Tibetan lo means "year" and sar means "new") is the Buddhist New Year and one of Bhutan's major festivals. Before the onset of a new year, it is mandatory for Buddhists to complete all unfinished business and dismiss unhappy memories. On the last day of the old year Bhutanese visit monasteries to make offerings to the monks and deities. The first day of the new year is reserved for celebrating only with family.

On all three days of the holiday there are many feasts and dances throughout the country. The Bhutanese participate in the many New Year's ceremonies presided over by the monks. One important ritual is a play in which celebrants wear grotesque masks and robes, telling the story of the struggle between good and evil through dance and pantomime.

The dances, with their complicated patterns performed by specially trained monks, once served as a way of teaching Buddhism to people who could not read or write. But their deeper function was to control and influence the spirits. In the Drum Dance of Dramitse, which depicts a vision of heavenly entities at the palace of the Guru Rinpoche, the dancers wear animal masks representing deer, tigers, elephants, and crocodiles and carry ornately decorated drums. Some of the dancers wear costumes made of multicolored silk and skirts of brightly colored scarves. But the Black Hat dancer wears an elaborate, brocade robe and a black hat. This dance has two purposes. First it depicts the murder of a Tibetan king who persecuted Buddhists in 842. It is also a conquest of and offering to the Earth deities. Clowns provide a lighter spirit by mimicking the serious dancers and joking with the onlookers.

Another outstanding feature of the celebrations is the archery competitions across the country. Archery is Bhutan's national sport, and although archery competitions occur year-round, these are the most important ones. The night before a contest, the competing teams employ astrologers to cast spells on the opposition. The competitors then spend the night in a barn, a tradition continued for centuries and partly devised to keep the male competitors separated from their womenfolk, lest concentration should be compromised.

For the competitors the day of the event begins with a traditional breakfast and initiation ceremonies, after which the alcohol begins to flow freely. As competitors prepare to hit the targets, made of colorfully painted wood, the opposing team indulges in diversionary games. They whisper obscenities and, more daringly, dance in front of the target. Meanwhile the women sing to encourage their teams and try to discourage the opponents by jeering at them.

The official coronation was held on June 2, 1974.

In an otherwise quiet country, royal functions such as birthdays and coronations assume great significance. The general public celebrates with archery competitions, fireworks, and masked dances.

❁ DEATH OF THE THIRD KING

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: July 16

The third king of Bhutan Druk Gyalpo Jigme Dorji Wangchuk (1929–72) passed away on July 16 1972, while on a visit to Africa for medical treatment. He had suffered from a weak heart most of his life, having had his first heart attack at age 20. In spite of his ill health, he had a tremendous impact on the country: ending feudalism and freeing the serfs, moving Bhutan toward democracy, helping the peasants with labor-saving innovations such as wheeled vehicles (instead of hand-carrying crops), and moving the country from isolation to international involvement. The loyal Bhutanese population remembers their former king on this day by offering prayers. The royal family pays tribute with special religious ceremonies.

❁ BIRTHDAY OF THE FOURTH KING

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: November 11

The fourth and incumbent ruler of Bhutan and head of the Bhutanese royal family Jigme Singye Wangchuck (r. 1972–) was born on November 11, 1955. He studied both in India and in the United Kingdom. However his education was interrupted by his father's sudden death from a heart attack. He cut short his studies to replace his father on the throne, and over the years he has emerged as a highly popular monarch with a progressive outlook. In Bhutan, especially in the capital of Thimphu, a festive air prevails on the king's birthday. There are brilliant displays of fireworks, many mask dances, and an unusual din and bustle. To ensure safety and discipline the streets of the capital are often closed to vehicular traffic on this day.

❁ NATIONAL DAY

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: December 17

This day commemorates the ascension of Ugyen Wangchuck to the throne of Bhutan on December 17, 1907. Ugyen Wangchuk (1861–1926), the former ponlop (regional governor) of Trongsa, was instrumental in restoring peace among the feuding regional governors, who had devastated the country. By 1885 there was peace in the nation, and Ugyen's influence extended across the entire country. His next role was that of a mediator between the British and the Chinese. His outstanding contribution to the unification of a factionalized, warring territory into a peaceful, vibrant nation did not go unrecognized. The entire population of a grateful Bhutan, which included representatives of the monastic community, civil servants, and local residents, elected Ugyen Wangchuck the first king of Bhutan, and the date of his coronation came to be celebrated as National Day. Ugyen became the first hereditary king of Bhutan and established a dynasty. His royal line has continued uninterrupted since 1907.

❁ WINTER SOLSTICE

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: December 21

In the Northern Hemisphere the winter solstice is the day when the Sun is farther south than any other day of the year. At this time the Earth has its shortest period of daylight and longest hours of darkness. The people of western Bhutan celebrate the winter solstice with the same excitement as New Year's. It is common for young people to take part in archery contests (the national sport), while the elderly visit religious monuments. For farmers the solstice means the departure of winter, the prospect of warmer weather, and planting time.

❁ SHABDRUNG KUCHOE

Observed by: Buddhists
Observed on: April–May

The most dynamic era in Bhutanese history was probably the 17th century, which began with the arrival in 1616 of Shabdrung Ngawang Namgyal, the great leader of the Drukpa School of Mahayana Buddhism. This day commemorates his death in 1651 at the Punakha Dzong on the tenth day of the fourth month in the lunar calendar.

Shabdrung Ngawang Namgyal unified the country and laid the foundation for national governance and the Bhutanese identity. Beginning with the Simtokha Dzong in Thimphu, the Shabdrung (meaning “at whose feet one submits”) constructed many more dzongs, monasteries, and religious institutions. He founded Drukpa Kagyu as the state religion.

The Shabdrung left as his legacy a dualistic system of government—temporal and religious—with the je khenpo (chief abbot) as the religious head and the temporal leader known as the desi. This system saw Bhutan through the turn of the 19th century until the birth of the Wangchuk Dynasty and establishment of the hereditary monarchy in 1907.

❁ VESAK

Observed by: Buddhists
Observed on: Full Moon day in May

Vesak, known locally as Lord Buddha's Parinirvana Day, is a very important Buddhist festival, celebrating the birth, enlightenment, and death (and salvation, or parinirvana) of the Buddha. It is observed on the day of the full Moon in May, except in leap years, when the festival is held in June. On this day the devout congregate in the local Buddhist temples and monasteries and take part in ceremonial prayers to the rhythm of drums.

GURU RINPOCHE BIRTHDAY

Observed by: Buddhists

Observed on: Tenth of the fifth month of the Buddhist calendar

The most important figure in Mahayana Buddhism (which is followed in Tibet and Bhutan) was Padmasambhava, also known as Guru Rinpoche. There was a significant growth of Buddhism with his arrival in Bhutan in the eighth century. Born in the Swat province of what is now Pakistan, he became a Buddhist scholar and teacher and spread Buddhist teachings in Tibet and throughout the Himalayan region. His profound wisdom and mastery of the subject laid a firm foundation for Buddhism in Bhutan, where he traveled extensively and was involved in many daring encounters in the course of subduing local demons and deities. Throughout the Tibetan-Buddhist world Rinpoche Padmasambhava is venerated as the second Buddha.

In Bhutan his birthday is marked by community prayers and colorful mask dances. A special message from the Dalai Lama, the present leader of Tibetan Buddhists, is read to the celebrants.

THE FIRST SERMON OF LORD BUDDHA

Observed by: Buddhists

Observed on: Full Moon day in July

This Buddhist festival, known also as Asalha Puja Day and Dhamma Day, commemorates the Bud-

Rinpoche Padmasambhava

In the eighth century Padmasambhava, Guru Rinpoche (or the second Buddha) is believed to have made his legendary trip from eastern Bhutan to western Bhutan on the back of a flying tigress to subdue the evil spirits who hindered the propagation of Buddhism. After defeating them he blessed them as guardians of the doctrine, thus introducing Tantric Buddhism to Bhutan. The area where he landed is known as Taktshang, or Tigers' Nest, and is located in the Paro Valley. Today it remains one of most sacred places in Bhutan.

dha's first sermon to the public after he had attained enlightenment. On this occasion the Buddha set in motion the wheel of religion (dharmacakkappavattana) in the presence of five ascetics at a deer park in Sarnath, near Allahabad in India. It was the venue where Kondanna, the senior ascetic, became a stream-winner, or sotapanna (one who has attained the first level of enlightenment).

On this day the worshippers visit monasteries and bring food to the monks. They visit Buddhist shrines to offer flowers and light candles before images of the Buddha. The devout also listen to discourses by monks about the significance of this day, when the Buddhist faith was formally founded.

This day also marks the beginning of the Buddhist Lent (a three-lunar month period of austerity and abstention, coinciding with the rainy season).

DASHAIN

Observed by: Nepalese/Hindus

Observed on: October

During the month of Karttika in the Bikram Sambat calendar (late September and early October), the Nepalese people celebrate the biggest festival of the year—Dashain. Since Nepalese constitute a majority of the population in southern Bhutan, it is an important holiday in that part of the country. The 15 days of celebration occur during the bright lunar fortnight ending on the day of the full Moon. The Nepalese of Bhutan worship the Hindu deity Durga in all her manifestations with ceremonial prayers, offerings, and animal sacrifices. This celebration glorifies the triumph of good over evil. People wear colorful, new clothes and prepare special dishes for the occasion. Meat, a luxury for poor and lower-middle-class people, is a big part of Dashain feasts. Often animals are bought live from markets and sacrificed at home or in temples; then the whole family helps to cut up and prepare the meat.

❁ DESCENT OF LORD BUDDHA FROM HEAVEN

Observed by: Buddhists

Observed on: October–November

This festival, also called Lhabab Dheuchen, symbolizes the descent of Lord Buddha from heaven. In Tibet, the source of the Tantric form of Buddhism practiced in Bhutan, lha means “heaven,” bab means “descent.” According to legend Queen Mahamaya, the mother of Lord Buddha, who died shortly after his birth, was reborn in Trayastrimsa, or the heaven of the 33 gods. After attaining enlightenment Lord Buddha learned the whereabouts of his mother, and at the age of 41 ascended to the heavens along with many of his followers. He stayed in heaven for three months, teaching his mother and other celestial beings the supreme truth. Maudgalyayana, one of his disciples who had stayed behind on Earth, and other devotees began pining for him. Maudgalyayana, who possessed miraculous powers, was exhorted to go up to heaven to request the lord to return. The gods were not willing to let Lord Buddha return to Earth, so Maudgalyayana suggested that, since the earthly beings did not have the powers to visit heaven, the celestial beings could come to Earth to listen to Lord Buddha’s preaching. Lord Buddha finally relented and descended to Earth at a place called Sankasya. On this day devout Buddhists offer prayers at the local Buddhist shrines and prepare festive meals for friends and family.

❁ THIMPHU DRUPCHEN

Observed in: Thimphu

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: September 9

This festival (dromchoe) is dedicated to the Great Black Lord known as Mahakala (a bodhisattva or compassionate being) and Penden Lhamo. Dark blue in appearance, Penden Lhamo is the solitary female among the many dharmapalas—defenders (custodians) of the Buddhist faith. She is the patron deity of Tibet, the protector of all Tibetan Buddhist denominations (of which the Bhutanese Buddhists are one). She rides her mule through a sea burning with wisdom and streaming blood (opportunity of life in the bodily form) and is sheltered by an umbrella made of peacock feathers. Lhamo is conceptually related to the Hindu Shakti (goddesses Kali or Durga, who also destroy demons). This holiday is observed mainly by the residents of Thimphu, and the celebrations are confined to the capital.

❁ THIMPU TSECHU

Observed in: Thimphu

Observed on: September 13–15

Tsechu is a three-day masked festival that celebrates the virtuous deeds of Guru Rinpoche (Padmasambhava). Tsechu takes place in several regions of Bhutan, but the Tsechu in Thimphu is the most spectacular. The biography of the guru is highlighted by a 12-episode dance drama. Monks as well as laypeople perform the dances. Many of the dances were established by Shabdrung Ngawang Namgyal or by Pema Lingpa. The dancers enact the tales and myths connected with wrathful and compassionate deities, heroes, demons, and animals. The dances, known as cham, bring blessings to the onlookers, propagate the dharma (Buddhist creed), protect the onlookers from misfortune, and exorcise evil influences.

During the dances asaras (clowns) mimic the dancers and perform comic routines wearing masks with long red noses. The name is a corruption of the Sanskrit acharya (master). During the intermissions between the masked dances, elegantly dressed women sing and perform traditional dances.

Fun Fact

Tsechus are festivals conducted in honor of Padmasambhava, Guru Rinpoche. Dromchoes are festivals dedicated to either Yeshe Gampo (Mahakala) or Penden Lhamo, the two main protective deities of the Bhutanese.

Rites of Passage

❁ BIRTH

Since Bhutan is predominantly Buddhist, most Bhutanese adhere to the Buddhist ritual related to birth. The family chants and recites passages from the scriptures when the expectant mother goes into labor. The recital of prayers is believed to be helpful in allaying her fears. They may also be repeated by the father-to-be, to help to boost his confidence and calm his mind.

❁ COMING OF AGE

As in all Buddhist countries monasteries play a key role in everyday life in Bhutan. It is common practice among Buddhist families to have at least one son (generally the oldest) ordained as a monk. The initiation ceremony of a young boy (as a novice monk) is an important rite of passage. It represents the transformation of the boy into an adult. The initiation is accompanied by a big celebration and festivities, which are attended by the boy's family and friends. After the guests depart the boy is tonsured, and he takes his monastic vows. He leaves home for a sojourn in the monastery (which might last from a few days to a few weeks) and practices the rituals of Buddhist monastic life, including begging for food. During this time, it is mandatory for everyone, even his parents, to bow to him in reverence and acknowledge that he has reached a superior spiritual status. When the boy returns to his normal life, he is considered an adult in every respect. He may relinquish domestic life and enter the monastery again in the future if he so chooses.

❁ MARRIAGE

A traditional Bhutanese marriage is simple and is performed according to Buddhist precepts. Once the horoscope of the boy and the girl are matched, the family of the groom consults the lama for an auspicious day to conduct the marriage. The groom's family then visits the bride's house to ask her parents for their daughter's hand in marriage. On the day of the wedding bride and groom rise early to prepare food as offerings to the monks, as well as flowers, incense, and candles. These are believed to ensure good fortune for the marriage. At the stipulated time the bride and groom are taken to the venue of the wedding. The designated place must have a shrine featuring a statue or image of the Buddha, adorned with candles, flowers, and incense.

Buddhist wedding traditions do not necessarily require the presence of monks. The ceremony begins as the entire assembly recites the Vandana, Tisarana, and Pancasila readings. The couple then does obeisance to the image of the Buddha. Though there are no established marriage vows, the bride and groom are usually expected to be governed by the Sigilovdda Sutta doctrines. The bridegroom vows to love and respect his wife, to be kind, considerate, and faithful, and to provide her with pleasing gifts. The bride promises to perform her household duties competently, to be hospitable to her in-laws and her husband's friends, to be faithful, to invest their income, and to perform her duties lovingly and conscientiously. After the vows are uttered, the bride and groom can exchange rings. If monks are present, all the rituals will be punctuated by their chanting. Afterward the bride accompanies her husband to her new home, on either the same day or the next day, depending on their horoscopes. At her new home the bride is received by her mother-in-law. This is followed by a lavish meal.

❁ DEATH

In Bhutan, in cases where death is not sudden and the individual is languishing, monks are called in; they are expected to chant to help release the dying person's good energies from his or her body. The chanting continues until the person has drawn his or her last breath. After the person has died, the body is cleansed and dressed in neat but simple attire, utterly devoid of jewelry or embellishments. It is believed that the deceased has already been reborn elsewhere; thus such things are of no use to him or her. The body is placed in a casket and adorned with incense, and flowers offered by relatives, friends, and neighbors. It is common to cremate the dead, and the monks accompany the family to the cremation ground. The family offers food and candles to the monks in a bid to foster goodwill; it is commonly believed that this gesture contributes substantially toward the attainment of eternal peace and tranquility by the departed soul.

Introduction

❁ HISTORY

Completely landlocked, the country of Bolivia is nestled in the Andes mountain range, the west central part of the South American continent. Around the year 1450 the Quechua-speaking Incas (an ancient South American civilization) entered the highland area of what is modern Bolivia and annexed it to their empire, which was based in Peru. They controlled the area until the arrival of the Spanish around 1525. In 1538 Spanish conquistadors founded the settlement of Chuquisaca, a city that later became the region's administrative capital.

Bolivia's significance increased in 1544, with the discovery of silver deposits in the Andes. The settlement of Potosí was founded at the foot of a mountain 13,800 feet above sea level. As commerce grew in the region, so did Potosí. By the early 1800s it had become the largest settlement in South America and boasted a population of over 160,000. Other settlements in the region included La Paz, founded in 1548, Cochabamba, established in 1574, and Oruro, started in 1604.

During the period of Spanish rule Bolivia was known as Alto Peru (Upper Peru). At first it was a dependency of the Viceroyalty of Peru, but in 1776 it was transferred to the newly formed Viceroyalty of La Plata.

Over time the Spanish regime became increasingly corrupt and inefficient. Angered by this, the inhabitants of Alto Peru banded together under Simon Bolivar (1783–1830) and began a campaign for independence. In 1824, Bolivar's second-in-command General Antonio José de Sucre (1795–1830), defeated the Spanish forces at the Battle of Ayacucho. In 1825 an assembly met at Chuquisaca and declared Bolivia's independence. Sucre was elected president. In 1826, a constitution framed by Bolívar came into force. It was then that the country officially adopted the name Bolivia. Chuquisaca was renamed Sucre after the general.

Independence was followed by successive short-lived dictatorships and internal struggles. Hostilities with neighboring countries were also frequent. When nitrate deposits were discovered in the Atacama Desert, Chile and Bolivia fought for the spoils. The war lasted for four years, from 1879 to 1883, ending in defeat for Bolivia. It had to give up large portions of its territories, including its outlet to the Near Tiahuanaco, Bolivia, a bowl called the Fuente Magna (“Great Bowl”) was apparently fashioned in the style associated with Mesopotamian ceramics. Two texts are found on the bowl, one in cuneiform, the other in a Semitic language of possible Sinaitic extraction, showing cuneiform influences. The two varieties of cuneiform suggest that the bowl originated during the transitional period between ideographical writing and cuneiform. Chronologically this places it between 3,500 and 3,000 B.C.E., the Sumerian/Akkadian period. The inscription suggests that it was used for religious purposes. The local people call it El Plato del Chanco (“the pig’s dish”).

Fun Fact

Pacific Ocean. In 1904 it was forced to cede some territory to Brazil, and in 1935, some more to Paraguay. However it still retained significant mineral deposits, which had begun to attract foreign mining companies around the end of the 19th century. Three such conglomerates grew so powerful that they virtually ran the nation.

In 1952 the Movimiento Nacionalista Revolucionario (Nationalist Revolutionary Movement, or MNR), a revolutionary party, seized power and introduced wide-ranging political reforms. Its rule lasted for only 12 years until 1964, when the army took over. During the next 25 years Bolivia had no less than 19 presidents, 13 generals among them. Only two completed full terms in office.

GEOGRAPHY AND CLIMATE

Bolivia is the fifth largest country in South America. It consists of five geographical regions: the Altiplano, prone to severe flooding, is a highly populated plateau stretching from the Peruvian border to the Argentine border; fertile highland valleys lie to the south and east of the Altiplano; the Yungas are a transitional zone between the Andean region and the Amazonian forest; and the Chaco is a hot, dry, and largely uninhabited plain near the borders with Argentina and Paraguay. Finally, in the northern and eastern regions lies the Amazon Basin, made up of swamps, scrub, and rain forest.

Lake Titicaca

Lake Titicaca is the world’s highest navigable lake. Located at an altitude of 12,500 feet above sea level, with a surface area of 3,200 square miles, it is larger than Puerto Rico and is South America’s largest lake. Lake Titicaca’s maximum depth is about 600 feet; its average depth is 500 feet, and its volume of water is large enough to maintain an average temperature of 56° F. The lake actually moderates the climate for a considerable distance around it, making crops of corn and wheat possible in sheltered areas nearby.

There are two Andean mountain chains that run through the country. The Cordillera Occidental runs along the western border with Chile, near the Pacific Ocean. The Cordillera Real runs southeast through central Bolivia past Lake Titicaca and then joins the western Cordillera in the south of Bolivia.

Such extreme geographical variations naturally imply equally extreme weather conditions. By and large the country experiences cool temperatures. La Paz and Potosí are often very cold. However in the lowlands, the weather is hot and sunny, except for occasional cloudbursts. Bolivia’s rainy season lasts from November to March.

ECONOMY

Bolivia is one of the poorest countries in South America. In recent years it has undertaken thoroughgoing privatization. The state airline, telephone, railroad, electric power, and oil companies are all in private hands. It has also entered into a free-trade agreement with Mexico. Things have begun to look up economically, but only slightly. Bolivia is a source and transit country for men, women, and children trafficked for the purposes of forced labor and sexual exploitation. Poverty forces thousands of Bolivians to migrate or work in substandard conditions, placing large numbers at risk of being trafficked.

Bolivia produces soybeans, coffee, cocoa, cotton, corn, sugarcane, rice, potatoes, and timber. Its industries include mining, smelting, petroleum, food and beverages, tobacco, handicrafts, and clothing.

CULTURE AND LIFESTYLE

The inhabitants of Bolivia are largely descended from the indigenous communities that predated the Spanish conquests. Thus, while Spanish is the official language, only 60 to 70 percent of the people actually speak it, and then, only as a second language. Quechua, the language of the Inca civilization, is still spoken, as is Aymara, the pre-Incan language of the Altiplano district.

Roman Catholicism predominates, with approximately 95 percent of the population belonging to the Catholic Church. But many Bolivians, especially in the rural areas, adhere to a hybrid form of Christianity mixed with Incan and Aymara beliefs. The result is a unique blend of doctrines, rites, and superstitions.

CUISINE

Meat dominates Bolivia’s cuisine. It is usually eaten with rice, potatoes, and shredded lettuce. These ingredients form the base of chairo, or lamb soup.

Llajbua, a hot sauce containing tomatoes and pepper, is also popular. Chankha, which is chicken stewed in peas, and paceno, made from corn, potatoes, broad beans, and cheese, are national favorites.

Bolivia places great emphasis on strong liquor, and its beer and wine are well known. Bolivians also drink lots of chicha, an industrial-strength liquor made from corn.

❁ NEW YEAR'S EVE/DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: December 31–January 1

Bolivia ushers in the new year with singing, dancing, eating, and (especially) drinking. People usually spend the first few minutes of the year with close friends and family members.

The people of Bolivia also observe a few unique customs. One involves making little dolls out of straw or wood. These are then hung outside houses to bring good luck to the family.

Grapes are important to New Year celebrations in Bolivia, since they represent wishes sought to be fulfilled. Before the clock strikes midnight, the entire family gathers in a circle. Each person takes 12 grapes (one for each month) and eats them one by one, making a wish each time.

❁ LABOR DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: May 1

As in many part of the world May 1 is celebrated as Labor Day. The May 1 observance of Labor Day has its origins in the 19th-century international socialist movement. The first May Day/Labor Day occurred in 1889, set by the Second Socialist International to coincide with an 1890 American Federation of Labor (AFL) general strike in the United States to win the eight-hour workday. Thereafter International Labor Day became, and remained, more radical than the U.S. version observed in September.

In Bolivia, the occasion is observed by the government as well as by workers and their unions. Speeches, rallies, gatherings, and lectures are organized, and tributes paid to labor leaders.

❁ CARNIVAL

Observed by: Christians, General Public

Observed on: February–March (just before Lent)

Carnival is held just before Lent, the Christian season of fasting that precedes Easter. It is an occasion of great festivity, with celebrations spilling over into the streets in all major towns in the country. The most enthusiastic celebrations take place in the smaller towns. Oruro boasts the largest and best-known Carnival, a unique blend of Spanish and indigenous traditions. The ancient dances of various Andean communities are always a highlight.

Santa Cruz hosts a more modern Carnival, similar in spirit to the famous one held at Rio de Janeiro, Brazil. People dress in bright clothes and outlandish costumes and dance through the streets. Participants wearing plaster masks dance la diablada ("the devil's dance"). After performing this dance Catholics go to a church, where they are blessed by a priest. The next day they attend Mass and once again perform la diablada.

❁ GOOD FRIDAY

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: Friday before Easter

This Christian festival commemorates the Crucifixion of Jesus. It has been in the Christian liturgical calendar even longer than Easter has although no one is sure why it is called Good Friday. Some have suggested that the use of good in the name goes back to Old English and means "God's" Friday, while others interpret good to mean something like "observed as holy." This observance is also known as Black Friday and Sorrowful Friday; in Eastern Orthodox Churches it is called Great Friday.

For many years Good Friday was primarily a Catholic observance, but many Protestant Churches now hold special services from noon until three in the afternoon on this day to symbolize Jesus' last hours on the Cross. Many of the faithful fast on this day; when they eat, it is generally fish instead of meat.

For Bolivians Good Friday, also called Holy Friday or Mourning Friday, is a solemn occasion. People attend church services and often spend the rest of the day in quiet contemplation and prayer.

ALL SAINTS' DAY

Observed by: Catholics

Observed on: November 1

This is a holiday that honors all the saints of the Catholic Church, known or unknown. In Bolivia, where not only every town, but also every community, has its own patron saint, the holiday assumes a special significance. Special church services and prayer meetings are a feature of the day, and Catholics are instructed to avoid any kind of “servile” work. For Bolivians the day is also devoted to the remembrance of the dead as is also done on All Souls’ Day. Visiting the graves of their loved ones, Bolivians leave food, drink, and even toy boats to help the deceased in their afterlife. Candies, sweets, and bread, especially bread dolls, are customary offerings. The graves are also decorated with flowers and garlands.

CHRISTMAS

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: December 24–25

On Christmas Eve in Bolivia households stock up their pantries for the mammoth feasts to come over the next few days. Festivities begin that evening. At midnight, people drink champagne and eat cookies and other sweets. Sometimes the party continues through the night.

Bolivians place a pesebre (“manger”) under the Christmas tree, along with little figures representing Mary, Joseph, and the infant Jesus. Little toy animals are also placed there. The baby Jesus is also referred to by the name Cusquenos. A Bolivian children’s fable describes how the baby Jesus gets up on Christmas and makes mischief, shifting things around and hiding them. Due to the popularity of this legend, placing the pesebre under the tree is an extremely important custom. Traditionally it is kept there until New Year’s Eve.

On Christmas Eve the Catholic faithful attend Midnight Mass. There are also special church services on Christmas day.

Introduction

❁ HISTORY

Bosnia and Herzegovina (officially, the Republic of Bosnia and Herzegovina) is a mountainous country in the western Balkans. Initially a part of Illyria, Bosnia later became a part of the Roman Empire as the Province of Illyria. In 395 after the death of Roman Emperor Theodosius I (347–95), the Roman Empire was divided into two parts: the Byzantine Empire or the Eastern Empire, ruled by Arcadius (c. 377–408), a son of Theodosius I, and the Western Roman Empire, ruled by another of his sons Flavius Augustus Honorius (384–423). The Drina River, now the boundary between Bosnia and Herzegovina and Serbia, separated the Eastern and Western Roman Empires. Illyria and Pannonia were included in the Western Roman Empire; Bosnia initially was part of the Byzantine Empire, but because it lay right on the border between the Eastern and Western Roman Empires, it changed hands often.

In 455 the Ostrogoths (a Germanic tribe, also known as the Eastern Goths) invaded Pannonia and Dalmatia and brought the regions under their dominance. However after a series of wars fought between the Roman Empire and the Ostrogoths, which became known as the Gothic Wars (535–53), the Emperor Justinian (483–565) of the Eastern Roman Empire defeated the kingdom of the Ostrogoths and reclaimed Pannonia. Then in the sixth century, the Eastern Roman Empire invaded Dalmatia and reclaimed its territory.

During the sixth and seventh centuries, the Slavs from Poland, along with Turkic Avars (nomadic Euroasian tribes), invaded the Eastern Roman Empire and established their settlements in Bosnia and Herzegovina and its surrounding areas. In the eighth century, in a bid to remove the Avars and Slavs from Dalmatia, the Byzantine Emperor Heraclius (c. 575–641) invited the Croats and Serbs to establish their settlements in the region and fight alongside the Roman Empire. They successfully drove the Avars out of Dalmatia and, in recognition of their service, the region of Dalmatia (including Bosnia and Herzegovina) was split between the Croats and Serbs, with the title of duke conferred on their leaders.

By 925 a major portion of Bosnia was under the rule of the first Croatian king Tomislav (c. 10th century). However between 930 and 960 the eastern parts of Bosnia as well as the western parts of Serbia came under the rule of the Serbian Caslav Klonimirovic (r. 927–60), who acknowledged the sovereignty of the Byzantine Empire.

In 1060 Croatian King Petar Kresimir IV (r. 1058–74) regained control of Bosnia and declared its independence from the Byzantine Empire. In 1077 after taking control of the Hum region (Herzegovina), Serbian Prince Mihailo of Zeta (located in present-day Montenegro) followed suit. Mihailo was later crowned king of Serbia by Pope Gregory VII. His son Konstantin Bodin conquered and seized a major part of Bosnia from Croatia in 1083. However after Konstantin's death in 1101 the Croats reclaimed most of the regions that had been conquered by the Serbs. In 1102 the kingdom of Croatia, along with a major part of Bosnia, became a part of the Hungarian Empire. In 1160 the Byzantine Emperor Manuel I Comnenus (?1118–80) defeated Hungary and reclaimed Bosnia as part of the Byzantine Empire.

The Ottomans of Turkey attacked the Byzantine Empire in 1383 and finally conquered the region of Bosnia and Herzegovina in 1463.

The 15th century saw the growth of the Sephardic Jewish community, as Jews from Spain came to settle in the Ottoman Empire. In 1541 the Turks occupied Slavonia, which consisted of Croatia and most of Hungary. They ruled this region for more than a century before surrendering it to Austria under the Treaty of Karlowitz after losing the Austro-Ottoman War (also called the Great Turkish War, 1683–99). Later in 1716 Austria also occupied the northern part of Serbia and Bosnia. The power shifted back to the Turks in 1739, when Austria ceded the regions under the Treaty of Belgrade.

The Ottoman Era lasted until 1878. During this period Islam came to be the dominant religion in Bosnia. As the Ottoman Empire disintegrated and following its defeat in the Russo-Turkish War (1877–78), Bosnia and Herzegovina was invaded by Austro-Hungarian forces. By 1908 it had become a colony of the Austro-Hungarian Empire.

In 1914 World War I began after Archduke Ferdinand, heir to the Austro-Hungarian throne, was assassinated by the Serbs in Sarajevo. Austria was supported by Germany, whereas Serbia was backed by Russia. Following the end of the war in 1918 Bosnia and Herzegovina became part of the South Slav kingdom of Serbia, Croatia, and Slovenes (Serbo-Croatians), which was later renamed the Kingdom of Yugoslavia (literally, “Land of the South Slavs”; [jug means “south”]) in 1929. This was the first of three separate, but successive, political entities that existed during most of the 20th century on the Balkan Peninsula in Europe.

It existed under that name until it was invaded in 1941 by the Axis powers. Thousands of Jews and Serbs in Bosnia and Herzegovina were killed in concentration camps. In 1944 Germany was pushed out of Yugoslavia under the guidance of Josip Broz Tito (1892–1980), with support from the British and Soviet armies. Thereafter both countries became republics within a Socialist state established immediately after World War II in 1945 as Democratic Federal Yugoslavia (DFY), which in 1946 became the Federal People's Republic of Yugoslavia (FPRY), and in April 7, 1963, the Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (SFRY).

This remained in place until 1992, by which time four of its six constituent republics—Slovenia, Croatia, Macedonia, and Bosnia and Herzegovina—had seceded. At this point the region was in a condition of tumult and crisis given the dissolution of Yugoslavia and the independence of its former republics. The third, formed in 1992 and called the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (FRY), was on the territory of the remaining republics of Serbia (including the autonomous provinces of Vojvodina and of Kosovo, officially known as Kosovo and Metohija) and Montenegro. FRY, under President Slobodan Milosevic (b. 1941), intervened militarily to unite ethnic Serbs in neighboring republics into a “Greater Serbia.” All of these efforts were ultimately unsuccessful but caused great dislocation, bloodshed, and misery. This led to the deployment of United Nations' protective forces in 1992. By the end of the conflict in 1995, an estimated 200,000 people had lost their lives, and more than two million people had fled their homes in Bosnia-Herzegovina.

On November 21, 1995, the presidents of Serbia (Slobodan Milosevic), Croatia (Franjo Tudman [1922–99]), and Bosnia and Herzegovina (Alija Izetbegovic [1925–2003]) signed a U.S.-sponsored peace accord in Dayton, Ohio, which marked the end of the conflict in the region. The accord came to be known as the Dayton Accord. It provided for the division of Bosnia and Herzegovina into two political entities: the Federation of Bosnia and Herzegovina, with 51 percent of the territory (administered by Bosnian-Herzegovinian Muslims and Croats); and the Republika Srpska with 49 percent of the territory (administered by Bosnian-Herzegovinian Serbs).

The power-sharing agreement that was approved by the Dayton Accord makes Bosnia and Herzegovina one of the world's most complex democracies. It provides that the presidency of Any variation in pronunciation of vowels, depending on the length and tonal accent or pitch, can change the meaning of a word in the Serbo-Croatian language.

Fun Fact

Bosnia and Herzegovina will consist of three members: one Croat, one Bosniak from the Federation of Bosnia and Herzegovina (Bosniak has replaced Muslim as an ethnic term, in part to avoid confusion with the religious term Muslim an adherent of Islam), and a Serb from Republika Srpska. Each of them is elected for a four-year term.

The North Atlantic Treaty Organization (NATO) posted 34,000 peacekeeping troops in order to restore peace and help rebuild the nation, but inter-ethnic problems still exist. The European Union (EU) took over the policing responsibilities in 2003. In 2003 the name Yugoslavia was officially abolished when the state was transformed into a loose commonwealth called Serbia and Montenegro.

GEOGRAPHY AND CLIMATE

Bosnia and Herzegovina is located in southeastern Europe. The country's name reflects its mixed origin, with Bosnia occupying roughly the northern two-thirds of the country. The nation shares its borders with Croatia to the north, south, and west; Serbia and Montenegro are located to the east; and to the south, the Adriatic Sea coastline is just 12 miles away. The southern and central landscape is complemented by the Dinaric Alps. The highest point in the country is Mt. Maglic in Herzegovina at a height of 7,825 feet.

The country has rainy winters, with the minimum temperature in the capital of Sarajevo reaching 34°F in January. The landscape and conditions near Sarajevo made it suitable as a site for the 1984 Winter Olympics. Summer temperatures average 70°F.

Fun Fact

It is customary for guests to remove their shoes before entering a Muslim household in this country. The host provides slippers to his guests.

ECONOMY

Economically this was one of the weakest republics of the former Yugoslavia, and the devastation of war has made matters worse. The standard of living remains low because of rising inflation and large foreign debts. The country is also dealing with large-scale unemployment that affects close to 40 percent of the population.

The economy of Bosnia is largely concentrated in mining, forestry, agriculture, and the armaments industries. Although private farmers cultivate the land, the farms are small. Bosnia exports fruit and tobacco but has to import large quantities of basic food items. The country relies heavily on reconstruction assistance and humanitarian aid from the international community.

CULTURE AND LIFESTYLE

The influences of Turkish, Mediterranean, and Western European cultures are evident in Bosnia and Herzegovina. There are also considerable differences in the lifestyles between the urban and rural populations, and cultural clashes between the traditional and modern worlds. Among these diverse populations, hospitality, spontaneity, and a quick wit are greatly valued.

Bosnians follow a number of religions that include Islam, Eastern Orthodoxy, Catholicism, Protestantism, and Judaism. The various groups lived together in relative peace and tolerance for generations, but in the regional crisis that emerged in the 1990s ethnic tensions were stoked by leaders and manipulated for their own ends. In 1991 Bosnia had an urban population that was comparatively mixed by occupation, neighborhood, marriage, and friendship, and hoped for a standard of living like that of Western Europe and a rural population that was divided along ethnic lines and poorer.

Following the devastation of war, ethnic conflict has been suppressed but continues to simmer below the surface as Muslims, Croats, and Serbs are more conscious of their religious identification, and Muslim women have adopted more conservative dress, something not formerly characteristic of urbanized women. Among the Bosnian population, the memories of bloodshed and destruction of sacred sites, including houses of worship, linger. Another effect of the war was the serious damage done to the economy, which forced working women out of the workforce and back into their traditional roles of wife and mother.

Education is mandated by the state so most of the population is literate. The Bosnian and Serbo-Croatian language shares its roots with Indo-European languages such as Bulgarian, Macedonian, and Slovenian. The Serbo-Croatian language has also borrowed some words from Turkish, Arabic, and Persian.

A world-famous film festival is held every year in Sarajevo. Sarajevo is also famous for its Banja Luka, Mostar, and Bihac Museums. Roman mosaics, Neolithic era pottery, Asian architecture, and ancient Catholic and Orthodox artifacts and paintings form an integral part of Bosnia and Herzegovina's cultural heritage.

CUISINE

Bosnian cuisine consists principally of bread and roasted meats. Vegetarians in Bosnia have limited choices, especially because finding fresh fruits and vegetables can be challenging in Bosnia's long winters. The meals here vary only slightly from each other. Daily breakfast is called kwizija and usually consists of milk and tea with scrambled eggs, bread, and butter. Lunch is considered the most important meal of the day and includes soup followed by a meat or fish dish, vegetables, salad, and dessert. The cuisine is not spicy. The meat and vegetables are traditionally made by slow roasting and are served in a ceramic pot with a long, wide neck. Bosanski lonac, a stew sometimes known as Bosnian Pot, is a rich Bosnian specialty. The recipe has many variations, though the main ingredients remain beef, lamb, cabbage, potatoes, tomatoes, and carrots, seasoned with parsley, garlic, and pepper. Bosnian dishes like shish kebabs and burek (a type of pastry stuffed with meat) illustrate the influence of Turkish cuisine. Tufabijia is a special dessert made of apples stuffed with walnuts and topped with whipped cream. Baklava is a sweet dessert prepared only on special occasions.

Popular meeting places are kafane, coffee-houses, and kafici, the more modern café bars, and many people enjoy strolling through the town promenades (korza) in the summertime. The consumption of alcohol, once fairly common in Bosnia, and Herzegovina, is actively discouraged among Muslims, and in some areas it is prohibited.

❁ NEW YEAR'S EVE/DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: December 31–January 1

The first day of the Western (or Gregorian) calendar January 1, is celebrated as New Year's Day throughout much of the world. In Bosnia New Year's is celebrated with special meals or parties at home. The children make wish lists of gifts that they keep under their pillows, and their parents buy them gifts that are on their lists. At midnight there are fireworks displays.

❁ NATIONAL INDEPENDENCE DAY

Observed on: March 1

The National Independence Day of Bosnia and Herzegovina is observed to mark the day the country attained freedom from Yugoslavia in 1992. On this day Bosnia and Herzegovina was recognized as a multireligious, multicultural, and multiethnic European country. However, it is celebrated only in the areas with a Bosnian majority and is a normal working day in areas with a Croatian majority and in the Republic of Srpska.

Although the law does not recognize March 1 as a national holiday, some officials are campaigning for it to be changed out of respect for the 66 percent of voters who supported an independent Bosnia and Herzegovina in the referendum that was held on March 1, 1992.

❁ LABOR DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: May 1

The earliest origins of May Day, also known as Workers' Day, are ascribed to pagan celebrations that were practiced by farmers, peasants, and villagers in Europe well before the Middle Ages. The May 1 observance of Labor Day has its origins in 1889 when the international socialist movement set the date to coincide with a strike in the United States, called by the American Federation of Labor, demanding an eight-hour workday.

In Bosnia and Herzegovina, because unemployment rates are high, the majority of Bosnians demand job opportunities from the government on this day instead of rallying for better working conditions. Trade unions organize only a few May Day demonstrations. Other Bosnians use the day for family outings at nearby lakes and parks with barbecue and beer.

❁ NATIONAL DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: November 25

During the Nazi occupation (1941–45), Bosnia saw a brutal civil war and genocide. On November 25, 1943, the Communist resistance in Bosnia—in line with the Communist Party's stated policy of breaking up Yugoslavia—declared Bosnia's statehood. Even though this declaration was premature, since Bosnia and Herzegovina would remain an unwilling part of Yugoslavia under Soviet rule, it is still the recognized day on which the country celebrates its independence.

Religious Holidays

❁ CHRISTMAS

Observed by: Eastern Orthodox Christians

Observed on: January 6–7

The Christian festival of Christmas celebrates the birth of Jesus. The Eastern Orthodox Church calculates the date in accordance with the Julian calendar, so Orthodox Christians throughout the world celebrate Christmas on January 7. The majority of Bosnians are Orthodox Christians and observe Christmas on this date by attending church services and gathering for festive meals with friends and family.

However Bosnian Roman Catholics celebrate in December, decorating their homes with colored lights and singing Christmas carols throughout the month. On December 24, Christmas Eve, the Catholic faithful attend Mass and children receive gifts. Christmas day itself is spent feasting with family and friends.

For all Bosnian Christians the main Christmas treat is sorrel, a dark red drink made from soaking sorrel leaves in hot water and adding sugar, ginger or lime, and rum. The sorrel plant blooms only at Christmastime.

GOOD FRIDAY

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: Friday before Easter

The Christian holiday of Good Friday commemorates the Crucifixion of Jesus. A solemn occasion, it falls on the Friday before Easter and is the last Friday of Lent, a season of fasting and penitence.

Eastern Orthodox Christians meet three times during the day to pray—before noon, in the afternoon, and in the evening (for vespers)—as well as at night for the matins of Holy Saturday. They also observe a partial fast, depending on their health, until Easter. Bosnian Roman Catholics typically also eat only one meal or two small meals between Good Friday and Easter.

EASTER

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: First Sunday after Lent

Easter is a Christian feast that celebrates Jesus' Resurrection from the dead three days after his Crucifixion. It falls on the first Sunday after Lent. This is the most important holiday in the Orthodox and Roman Catholic calendars. There are church services in the morning followed by special Easter dinners to break the partial fast from Good Friday. Easter eggs (usually decorated the Thursday before) are an important part of the observances. They are often dyed red in particular to symbolize Jesus' Resurrection. The Easter eggs are shared with friends and family who visit on Easter Sunday. It is traditional to tap the end of one's egg against the end of another person's egg. Whoever's egg breaks must give it to the other person.

❁ MOULOU D

Observed by: Muslims

Observed on: Twelfth of Rabbi al-Awwal, the third month of the Islamic calendar

The birthday of Muhammad, the Muslim prophet, falls during the third month of the Islamic year. Muhammad was born in Mecca in the year 570. For Muslims this is a joyous day, though it is not a day of elaborate celebrations. Conservative Muslims do not observe Muhammad's birthday, because they believe that doing so diverts one's attention from absolute devotion to Allah.

❁ VIDOVDAN

Observed by: Eastern Orthodox Christians

Observed on: June 28

St. Vitus was a Christian saint from Sicily, Italy, who died as a martyr in 303. Vidovdan (St. Vitus's Day) is celebrated on June 15 on the Gregorian calendar and on June 28 on the Julian calendar.

The Latin term vitus means "lively." It also refers to a nervous condition characterized by trembling. For this reason St. Vitus is considered the patron of actors, comedians, dancers, and epileptics. He also protects against lightning, animal attacks, and oversleeping.

Bosnian Christians celebrate this day with feasting and dancing.

The Feast of St. Peter (Petrovdan) is observed on July 12, also called St. Peter's Day, and is an important Eastern Orthodox holiday. Bosnian Orthodox Christians celebrate with feasts and by lighting large bonfires.

❁ ST. ELIJAH'S DAY

Observed by: Eastern Orthodox Christians

Observed on: August 2

Elijah is mentioned in the Bible as the Hebrew prophet who sought to end idolatry, restore fair dealing, and who, upon death, was carried to heaven in a chariot of fire. Many incidents in his life gave him the status of saint. He was said to have raised a widow's son from the dead; he triumphed in a contest of faith with the priests of Baal that resulted in his victory and their death; and he was fed by ravens.

Bosnians associate St. Elijah's Day, or Ilindan, with thunder and lightning and believe that people should not drive carts or work with grass and grain on the feast day of St. Elijah because they might be killed by lightning. Bosnian traditions associated with this day include wearing new clothes, climbing mountains, and sitting by bonfires waiting for the sun to rise.

❁ MITROVDAN

Observed by: Eastern Orthodox Christians

Observed on: November 8

St. Demetrius of Salonica was a Christian martyr who lived in the fourth century. He is also referred to as "the Megalomartyr" by the Greeks. Demetrius was a deacon in Salonica. Early legends about Demetrius credit him with a military career, so he is also sometimes called a military martyr. He was run through with spears at Sirmium, modern Serbia, in 306, during the Christian persecutions of Emperor Maximian.

St. Demetrius was extremely popular in the Middle Ages, and, along with St. George, was the patron of the Crusades. His relics are kept in Thessalonica, Greece, a city of which he is the patron saint.

St. Demetrius's memory is celebrated on October 26, according to the Gregorian calendar. Eastern Orthodox Christians worship him as Mitar and have a feast in his honor on November 8 (St. Demetrius's birthday), according to the Julian calendar.

Bosnians believe that on Mitrovdan you can predict what kind of winter can be expected by the way an ox lies down and whether it sticks out its legs. If it sticks out its legs, the winter will not be severe.

Introduction

❁ HISTORY

Located in the central part of southern Africa, the Republic of Botswana, formerly known as Bechuanaland, is a young country. Prior to 1940 the only archaeological evidence of sustained human habitation in the Botswana region had been haphazardly assembled: the Stone Age tools collected by H. S. Gordon in the Tati district; P. W. Laidler's work on the pottery of several Iron Age sites in eastern Botswana; and some clay birds found by H. A. Wieschoff at Domboshaba. (It is believed that the clay birds were destroyed by Allied bombing during World War II.) The first systematic survey of Early and Middle Stone Age tools was not undertaken until the late 1940s for the Bechuanaland Protectorate. Because of the paucity of well-documented archaeological research, and the lack of Later Stone Age and Iron Age sites, it was commonly assumed that Botswana had been largely unpopulated for thousands of years, until the 18th–19th centuries C.E. In the 1970s this assumption was shown to be baseless when hundreds of Middle Iron Age Toutswe culture sites in the Central District were found. As the 20th century wore on, Botswana came to seem a central player in the prehistoric innovations in South Africa rather than peripheral, as had been thought. Much, however, remains to be learned.

The modern history of this region begins with the Zulu wars of the 1880s, when the Tswana, fleeing violence in South Africa, sought refuge in Bechuanaland. In a relatively short time they became the country's major ethnic group. By the late 19th century ethnic tensions between the Batswana and recently arrived Boer settlers from South Africa escalated into violence. By this time the European powers had become a formidable force in the region and most of Africa was under colonial rule. In 1885 seeking help in their struggle against the Boers, the Batswana turned to the British, who agreed to make Bechuanaland a British Protectorate.

The relationship between the British and the Batswana was harmonious. Modern-day Botswana comprises the northern part of the original Bechuanaland while the southern part became part of South Africa. When the list of colonies to be brought together under the unified state of the Union of South Africa was being finalized, the British honored the wishes of Botswana and did not include the northern region as a part of South Africa. The southern part of Bechuanaland, however, became part of what was the Cape colony, and is now part of South Africa.

Botswana’s movement from British protectorate to independent nation was fairly gradual and orderly. In order to mediate between British control and the drive for tribal power, two advisory councils composed of African and European representatives were established in 1920. Tribal power was regularized in 1934. Under the African-European Advisory Council the 1961 constitution paved the way for a consultative legislative council of Botswana, while the 1965 constitution sanctioned Botswana’s first general election. The country finally gained its independence in September 1966, and Seretse Khama (1921–80), a prominent leader, became the first president of the Republic of Botswana.

The name Botswana reflects the dominance of the main ethnic group of the country, the Tswana or Batswana, as they are known. Besides the Batswana, Botswana is also home to indigenous ethnic groups such as the Kalanga, Kgalagadi, Basarwa, and a small number of white people. Although Christianity has gained adherents in the recent past, most people still prefer the beliefs of their ancestors.

Since independence Botswana has emerged as a peace-loving and prosperous democracy. It is an active member of various international institutions such as the United Nations (UN), the Commonwealth of Nations and the Non-Aligned Movement as well as regional organizations such as the Organization of African Unity (OAU) and the South African Development Coordination Conference (SADCC). The Republic of Botswana leads by example and is hailed by the international community for its unwavering contribution toward regional development in Africa.

Zambezi River Dispute

The Zambezi River, a major river system, has been the cause of long-running border disputes between Botswana and Namibia. The dispute involves the particular stretch of border up to the Zambezi River, which runs parallel to the main channel of the river Chobe. The borders of Zambia, Namibia, and Botswana all meet in the center of the Zambezi River and, since the borders have never been clearly delineated, boundary disputes continue to fester.

GEOGRAPHY AND CLIMATE

Located in the heartland of southern Africa, the Republic of Botswana shares its western and northern boundary with Namibia, its northeastern boundary with Zambia and Zimbabwe, and the southern and southeastern boundary with South Africa. The Zambezi River, one of Botswana’s two major rivers, is the fourth largest river of the African subcontinent. The Nile, Zaire, and Niger are the other prominent rivers of this region. The disputed Zambezi River border that Botswana shares with Zambia is only several hundred yards across.

Geographically, Botswana has a squarish appearance. The sand of the Kalahari Desert is carried to the hollow basins of Botswana and fills them, thereby giving it a plain look. Nearly 70 percent of Botswana is covered with the Kalahari sand.

Botswana has a semi-arid climate and experiences moderate rainfall in certain regions.

However, due to the high rate of evaporation, the country does not have a perennial river, besides the Okavango River. Scarcity of water is a major hindrance to the development of agriculture in the region. The Okavango Delta formed by the Okavango River is the oasis of the Kalahari Desert. It is one of the largest inland deltas in the world.

ECONOMY

Twenty years ago Botswana was one of the 20 poorest countries in the world. Since gaining independence in 1966, however, it has recorded the fastest growth in per capita income in the world, and Botswana takes great pride in its booming economy. Guided by sound economic policies, the country has registered phenomenal growth and has made good use of the revenue generated by diamond mining. The amount of foreign debt is negligible, and besides earning the highest sovereign credit rating in Africa, Botswana has also amassed huge foreign reserves.

With the growing number of HIV/AIDS patients in Botswana and its subsequent effect on the economy, the government has initiated major health initiatives such as the Prevention of Mother-to-Child Transmission program and is also providing free antiretroviral treatment.

CULTURE AND LIFESTYLE

In ancient times Botswana was a full-fledged tribal region with varied cults and belief systems. The people were driven by the belief that ancestors guided their way of life from the underworld (afterlife) and communicated only through the elders or leaders of the cult. Religion was at the core of society, and religious rites such as male and female initiation ceremonies and rainmaking ceremonies were immensely important. Polygamy was common, and after the death of the husband, the children of his head wife inherited his estate. Belief in the supernatural and spirits and ghosts was widespread. Respecting elders and the traditional way of life was imperative.

The term San is usually used by scholars to refer to a diverse group of hunter-gatherers living in southern Africa who share historical and linguistic connections. This group of people was formerly referred to as Bushmen, but this term has since been abandoned because it is considered racist and sexist. The San folklore of Botswana has two main characters: Nodima (the good person) and Gcawama (the trickster). It was widely believed that all natural disasters and diseases were a direct consequence of the actions of these two characters.

With the advent of Christianity, the tribal way of life was greatly affected, and by the early 21st century Christianity had a strong foothold in the country. The lifestyle in Botswana reflects the confluence of Tswana and British ways of life. People wear Western attire, which has been preferred since the 19th century.

The traditional forms of dance and music gradually declined under colonial rule, but they have experienced something of a renaissance in post-independence Botswana. The northwestern region of Botswana is known for its artistic basketry, which is exported around the world.

❁ CUISINE

In Botswana common foods include corn porridge and sorghum, pulses (legumes), beans, and spinach. Tomato, onion, potato, and cabbage also find favor on the table. Beef is the most popular meat, followed by mutton (adult sheep). Dried caterpillars are a traditional snack food as well as the wild morulaplum fruit. For beer lovers, sorghum or millet-based beer is a favorite.

Labor Day (also May Day or Workers' Day) is celebrated in many countries of the world to honor the achievements and contributions made by workers. The observance of Labor Day on May 1 has its origins in the international labor movement and international socialism. In 1889 the Second International established May 1 as a holiday to express solidarity with the American Federation of Labor (AFL) in the United States in 1890. The AFL had called a strike to demand an eight-hour workday. In Botswana government offices, businesses, and schools remain closed on Labor Day.

❁ SIR SERETSE KHAMA DAY

Observed on: July 1

Sir Seretse Khama Day is celebrated in honor of the first president of the Republic of Botswana, Sir Seretse Khama, who was born on July 1, 1921. His grandfather was the great tribal king Khama III, and upon his death in 1925 Seretse Khama ascended the throne at the age of four. His uncle Tshekedi Khama became regent. In 1948 Seretse Khama married Ruth Williams, an Englishwoman. The world of that time was not ready to accept this mixed-race marriage. When his uncle demanded that he divorce her, Seretse turned his people against his uncle and took over the chieftainship. This caused a furor among the white settlers; he was declared unfit to rule and exiled to England. Eventually he was allowed back home and headed the Bechuanaland Democratic Party. In 1956 he was elected the first president of the Republic of Botswana. Under Seretse Botswana developed into a prosperous and peaceful country with high principles of liberal democracy and racial tolerance.

❁ PRESIDENT'S DAY

✿ GOOD FRIDAY

Observed by: Christians
Observed on: Friday before Easter

This Christian festival commemorates the Crucifixion of Jesus. It has been in the Christian liturgical calendar even longer than Easter has although no one is sure why it is called “Good” Friday. Some have suggested that the use of good in the name goes back to Old English and means “God’s” Friday, while others interpret good to mean something like “observed as holy.” This observance is also known as Black Friday, Mourning Friday, and Sorrowful Friday, and in Eastern Orthodox Churches it is called Great Friday.

For many years Good Friday was primarily a Catholic observance, but many Protestant Churches now hold special services from noon until three in the afternoon on this day to symbolize Jesus’ last hours on the Cross. Many of the faithful fast on this day; when they eat, it is generally fish instead of meat. In Botswana, Christians attend special prayer services that focus on the life and teachings of Jesus.

✿ EASTER

Observed by: Christians
Observed on: First Sunday after Lent

For Christians, Easter is considered the most important Christian festival, and its numerous celebrations and observances form the core of the liturgical year, which begins around the time of the vernal equinox in the Northern Hemisphere (the autumnal equinox in the Southern Hemisphere) and stretches out into summer in the Northern Hemisphere (winter in the Southern Hemisphere). This occasion celebrates the Resurrection of Jesus three days after his Crucifixion. Christians believe Jesus was the Son of God, and died on the Cross to redeem humanity from sin. Apart from its religious aspect, the Resurrection symbolizes a resurgence of hope and the renewal of life for all human beings. People wear new clothes to attend church. On this day children look forward to receiving sweets and candies since Easter marks the end of the 40-day fasting period of Lent. The entire family gathers for a special Easter midday supper.

✿ BOXING DAY

Observed by: Christians
Observed on: December 26

The day after Christmas is celebrated as Boxing Day. The day is also known as the Feast of St. Stephen, in honor of the first Christian martyr. On this day, boxes used for collecting money for the poor are opened, hence the name Boxing Day. In addition gifts and tips are given to those who render selfless services to the community throughout the year.

Most of the Commonwealth nations celebrate Boxing Day. The Commonwealth of Nations is an association of independent nations, most of which are former colonies of the British Empire. They share some common cultural links, which were influenced by the British, and Boxing Day is one of them.

✿ KURU TRADITIONAL AND MUSIC FESTIVAL

Observed in: Kalahari Region Observed by: San Observed on: First week of August

Held especially for the San people of the Kalahari, this festival is an endeavor of the Kuru Development Trust to revive people’s interest in their cultural heritage and to encourage them to take pride in it. Living in isolated parts of Botswana and being a minority, the San people are unable to participate in the traditional festivals held in Botswana. This festival gives them the opportunity to perform their traditional folk dances, which are finely intertwined with traditional songs and music, as well as giving them a chance to get in touch with their cultural heritage.

❁ MAUN CARNIVAL

Observed in: Maun

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: August–September

The Maun Carnival is named after the state-of-the-art entertainment complex in Maun (gateway to the Okavango Delta), known as the Power Station. The people of the village of Maun build decorative floats for a joyous procession that is an integral part of the carnival. Also at stake is the chance to win first prize for the best float, and the competition is intense during this festival. Aerial displays performed by light aircraft kick off the festivities. The local charter companies provide their best pilots for the demonstration.

After the show the procession heads toward the Power Station. The complex has booths selling traditional foods and crafts. The complex transforms itself into a big gaming zone, much to the delight of the children. In addition, music and dancing continue all night.

Rites of Passage

❁ COMING OF AGE

In ancient Botswana, separate coming of age ceremonies were held for boys and girls, known as bogwera and bojale, respectively. Bogwera means the “school of initiation” where young boys were sent on reaching puberty. These schools trained boys to be strong and respected tribal men. The training imparted lessons on social, moral, and ethical values and lay down a rigorous exercise regime to make them physically tough. Respecting elders, fulfilling one’s duties, and understanding one’s responsibilities were inculcated in each boy that entered the bogwera. It was imperative for every boy to undergo this training. After the completion of the training period, a permanent name was given to each group, and every member would take great pride in identifying himself with this name.

Bojale was the school of initiation for girls and helped them make a smooth transition from girlhood to womanhood. The daughter of the tribal chief, or a close relative of the chief who herself had reached puberty, would lead the group of girls belonging to her age group. The girls were taught everything about the tribal customs and values as well as their duties and responsibilities to society.

Ancient Ceremony of Patlo

In ancient Botswana, the proposal ceremony was known as patlo. The young man who was ready to marry would accompany his relatives to the house of his prospective bride. The entire group would then win over the hearts of the girl’s family by their humility. Thereafter they would return to their village. The girl’s family would then consult each other and, if the proposal was accepted, they would send word to the boy’s family. After a few more meetings, if the marriage had the consent of the parents as well as the tribal heads, a lavish wedding ceremony would follow.

When they completed the training period, the girls were assumed to have reached womanhood. On graduation each group was assigned a permanent name with which each member of the group would identify herself. The groups were often called upon to participate in collective projects of a social nature.

❁ MARRIAGE

Wedding ceremonies in Botswana reflect the urge to hold on to ancient traditions as well as incorporate Christian customs. In the early 21st century, love marriages have largely supplanted the traditional arranged marriages.

Most couples prefer getting married in church in a low-key ceremony. They either follow this with a formal reception in the Western style or take the traditional path of village feasts or some combination of the two. For a village feast, the entire village is invited. Animals are slaughtered for the occasion, and feasting on the meat is central to the celebration. Folk dancing and music are always part of traditional wedding ceremonies.

Introduction

✿ HISTORY

Prior to the arrival of the Portuguese, Brazil had been inhabited by nomadic tribal communities for at least 6,000 years. Unlike the Inca and Maya, Brazilian Indians did not develop an organized civilization. Aided by jungles and climate, they left very little evidence for archaeologists to study—just some pottery, shell mounds, and skeletons. But recent excavations at Pedra Furada, a rock shelter in the Serra da Capivara National Park in northeastern Brazil, have revealed what may be the oldest human site in the Americas. Using reliable radiocarbon dates from charcoal found in hearths at different levels of the shelter, a comprehensive chronology of human habitation has been developed. The lowest layer provided definite evidence of non-Clovis Paleoindian occupations, including human remains, as early as 48,000–30,000 years B.C.E. A unique rock painting tradition associated with a 17,000-year-old carbon-14-dated hearth has also been discovered. Human teeth found at a limestone site at Garrincho have been dated at 12,210 plus or minus 40 and are equivalent in their structure to similar teeth found in Europe and the Near East and dated at the end of the Late Pleistocene. They are clearly fossils of modern Homo sapiens.

It is estimated that when the Portuguese arrived, there were between two and six million Amerindians living in various types of communities in what is called Brazil. Because of unknown epidemic diseases, slavery, and slaughter, there are fewer than 200,000, most of them hiding away in the dense jungles of Brazil's interior.

In 1500 Pedro Alvares Cabral of Portugal (1467/68–1520) attempted to go to India but reached Brazil instead. In 1531 the Portuguese king sent over the first settlers. Legend has it that the locals ate the first governor and the first bishop of this new territory not long after they arrived. The Portuguese, however, persisted, and by 1534 Brazil was well on the way to becoming colonized. In that year the king divided the region into 15 provinces or “captaincies,” each of which he gave to a friend.

Before long the settlers began to prosper by growing sugarcane. They also enslaved much of the indigenous population for this purpose, and the slave trade soon became commercially significant. The bandeirantes (city-dwellers born of mixed parentage) led the slave-capturing industry and brutally expanded Brazilian territory into the interior of South America. During the 1600s African slaves began to replace indigenous ones. In 1690 the discovery of gold deposits led to a further influx of settlers and African slaves brought in to work the mines.

The story of Brazil’s independence is possibly unique in the history of the colonized world. In 1807 Napoleon (1769–1821) invaded Portugal. Queen Maria I of Portugal (1734–1816) fled to Brazil with the entire royal family aboard British ships and made Rio de Janeiro the capital of Portugal and Portuguese territories. When peace was restored, the queen returned to Portugal, leaving behind her son Dom Pedro I (1798–1834). In 1822 Pedro rebelled and declared independence from Portugal and was named emperor of Brazil. Portugal was by then too weak to fight; so Brazil gained its independence without a fight.

During the 19th century coffee became Brazil’s leading crop. Slavery was abolished in 1888. Coffee planters then recruited thousands of immigrants, mostly Italians, as plantation workers. In 1889, the king was deposed by a military coup financed and backed by coffee growers. The country became a republic in name, but the vested interests retained control of the government and economy. For the next 40 years, Brazil saw a number of civil and military regimes, all effectively controlled by the military.

The coffee growers lost economic clout with the onset of the Great Depression in 1929. The opposition Liberal Alliance, supported by the military, took over but lost the 1930 election. The military took over once again and installed the Liberal Alliance leader Getúlio Vargas (1883–1954) as president; he ruled until 1954. His method of ruling was inspired by the Fascism of Mussolini (1883–1945) in Italy and Salazar (1889–1970) in Portugal. Vargas ruled Brazil until he was driven out in 1954.

His replacement Juscelino Kubitschek (1902–76) was the first of Brazil’s big spenders; he built Brasília, the new capital, which was supposed to catalyze the development of the interior. By the early 1960s the economy was battered by inflation, partly because of the expense of building the new capital, and fears of encroaching Communism were fuelled by Castro’s (b. 1926) victory in Cuba. Again Brazil’s fragile democracy was squashed by a military coup in 1964. The military rulers then set about creating large-scale projects that benefited a wealthy few at the expense of the rest of the population.

In 1989 Fernando Collor de Mello (b. 1949) became the first democratic ruler in nearly 30 years but was removed in 1992 on charges of corruption. Itamar Franco (b. 1930), the vice president, took over and stabilized the economy. Fernando Cardoso (b. 1931) was elected president in 1994. He improved the economy but had to contend with long-standing problems relating to deficit and inequalities.

A left-wing government led by Luíz Inácio da Silva (b. 1946) came to power after the 2002 elections, capturing 61 percent of the vote. He introduced far-reaching measures intended to bridge the economic gap between rich and poor. But economic growth does not necessarily bring social justice in its wake. Gains in education, land reform, and welfare contrast tellingly with a sickly health system, urban overcrowding, rural landlessness, and environmental abuse. And in spite of the effort anticorruption measures have made little headway.

❁ GEOGRAPHY AND CLIMATE

Brazil is divided into four major geographic regions: the Atlantic seaboard in the east, the Planalto Brasileiro in the southern interior, the Paraná-Paraguai basin to the south, and the Amazon Basin in the north. The Atlantic seaboard, which is long and narrow, has a few coastal ranges south of Bahia but is flatter in the north. The Planalto Brasileiro, or central plateau, covers most of Brazil’s interior south of the Amazon Basin. It contains several small mountain ranges and large rivers. The highest peaks are located in the Tumucumaque, Pacaraima, and Imeri Ranges, which cross the northern border with the Guyanas and Venezuela. Toward the south lies the Paraná-Paraguai basin with its open forests, low woods, and scrubland. Finally the huge, densely forested Amazon Basin is situated in the north. The Amazon is the world’s largest river, and the Amazon forest contains 30 percent of the world’s remaining forested area. The entire length of the Amazon, from Iquitos, Peru, to its mouth on the northeastern coast of Brazil, is navigable by ocean-going ships. The most important navigable streams in the plateau region to the east and south are the São Francisco and Parnaíba.

The climate is mostly tropical but becomes temperate toward the south. The temperatures along the equator are high, averaging above 77°F, with little seasonal variation. In sharp contrast frosts are known to occur south of the Tropic of Capricorn during the winter (June–August), and in some years there is snow on the peaks in the mountainous areas.

❁ ECONOMY

Brazil’s economy is by far the largest in South America and is poised to become one of the world’s largest. It has well-developed agricultural, mining, manufac-

The Southern Hemisphere

A hemisphere is one half of a sphere. Planet Earth is divided into four hemispheres: the North, West, South, and East. Four continents are in the Southern Hemisphere: Africa, Australia, South America, and Antarctica. Brazil is in South America in the Southern Hemisphere, below the equator, and in the Western Hemisphere, west of the Prime Meridian, the line of longitude that passes through the Royal Greenwich Observatory, at Greenwich, England; it is the meridian at which longitude is 0 degrees. (The term Eastern Hemisphere is rarely used descriptively.) It used to be said that the four continents in the Southern Hemisphere were divided by four oceans: the Atlantic, Pacific, Indian, and Antarctic. In 2000 the International Hydrographic Organization created a fifth ocean, called the Southern Ocean, which completely surrounds Antarctica.

Because it is in the Southern Hemisphere Brazil's seasons are the opposite of those in the Northern Hemisphere. (This is also true for Australia, Africa, and Antarctica.) Summer occurs between December and February; fall is between March and May; winter lasts from June through August; and spring begins in September. This means that holidays celebrated in winter in the Northern Hemisphere fall during the summer in the Southern Hemisphere (for example, Christmas or Hanukkah), and what are spring holidays in the Northern Hemisphere are fall holidays in Brazil (for example, Easter or May Day). The seasons during which specific constellations can be seen are also different. Ursa Major, Hercules, and Libra are summer constellations in the Northern Hemisphere and winter constellations in the Southern Hemisphere, while Orion, Cassiopeia, and Andromeda are summer constellations in Brazil and winter constellations in Canada. The Southern Hemisphere was thought of as poorer and less developed than the Northern, but the Southern is also less polluted due to lower population densities, lower levels of industrialization, and smaller land masses across the southern temperate zone. The South Pole is oriented toward the center of our galaxy, the Milky Way, and this, combined with clearer skies, makes for spectacular views of the night skies from the Southern Hemisphere.

turing, and service sectors. Coffee is one of its best-known products, and sugarcane remains an important crop. Poverty for many, however, remains a constant.

CULTURE AND LIFESTYLE

Brazil's population is concentrated primarily along the Atlantic coast and in the major cities. Two-thirds of the population now lives in cities, more than 19 million in greater São Paulo, and 10 million in greater Rio de Janeiro.

The immigrant Portuguese language has been greatly influenced by numerous Indian and African dialects, but it is still the dominant language in Brazil.

The Brazilian dialect has become the dominant influence in the development of the Portuguese language because Brazil has 15 times the population of Portugal and a much more dynamic linguistic environment.

According to the Brazilian modernist artist Oswald de Andrade (1890–1954), in his “Cannibal Manifesto” (1928), the culture of Brazil began in 1516 when a Jesuit bishop named Sardinha was shipwrecked along the coast of Brazil. When he encountered the local people the Tupis, he undertook to teach them the values set forth in the Bible. They were so eager to absorb this new civilization that they promptly made a meal of him. This, de Andrade claimed, was the first event in Brazilian history because hereafter a Brazilian identity was shaped by avidly absorbing anything foreign and letting it all boil and steep together.

Brazilians, it seems, welcome not only the foreign, but also the paradoxical. Take, for example, the concept of time. Time, like anything else, can be shaped to one's desire. A Brazilian might drop by for an unannounced visit and stay for hours, and the host is expected to cancel prior commitments that might interrupt this social call. Most Brazilians, with the exception of people from Minas Gerais, schedule meetings provisionally. The time is likely to be changed without warning, and no one will arrive “on time.” However a bit of folklore claims that the people of Minas Gerais are so punctual that they come to meetings a day early.

Because the ethnicity of Brazilians is some combination of Amerindian, African, and European, they tend to focus on social class rather than a racial hierarchy. The very wealthy, wanting nothing to do with anyone they regard as inferior, naturally isolate themselves. The middle class, for lack of something better to do, imitates the wealthy class they wish to belong to. The poor, always with us, concentrate on getting through each day.

Fun Fact

Although Brazil has the sixth largest population in the world, because of its vast size its population density is only about 50 people per square mile. India and Japan, in contrast, both have more than 800 people per square mile.

❁ CUISINE

Approximately 1 million native Amerindians lived in Brazil when the Portuguese found them. Starting in 1538 nearly 5 million Africans were brought in as slaves, before slavery was abolished. Following the Portuguese immigrants were Italians, Germans, Syrians, and Lebanese. During the 1930s Asians started arriving.

Brazilian food reflects the diverse roots of its population and culture, and the distinctive contribution of each culture remains apparent in dishes now thought of as Brazilian.

Brazil can be divided into five regions by cuisine:

1. North (Amazon Basin): The people in this region are of mixed Amerindian and Portuguese ancestry who live on fish, root vegetables (manioc, yams, and peanuts), and palm or tropical fruits. Caruru do par, a one-pot meal of dried shrimp, okra, onion, tomato, cilantro, and dendé oil, is a favorite dish in the Amazon Basin.

2. Northeast (Bahia, Paraíba, and Pernambuco): This is a semi-arid area excellent for raising cattle, as well as sugarcane and cacao. In the state of Bahia, the cuisine is essentially Afro-Bahian, developed by cooks improvising on African, Amerindian, and Portuguese dishes using local ingredients. Inland, in the arid cattle-growing region, typical foods include dried meat, rice, beans, goat, manioc, and cornmeal.

3. Central-West (includes Federal District of Brasília, Golas, and Mato Grosso): This region is primarily open prairies with wooded areas in the north. Beef and pork from the ranches and fish from the rivers are featured in the cuisine, supplemented by local crops of soybeans, rice, corn, and manioc.

4. Southeast (Minas Gerais, São Paulo, and Espírito Santo): This is the primary industrial region in Brazil, with several distinctive styles of cooking. In Minas Gerais popular recipes call for corn, pork, beans, and local soft cheeses. In the large cities of Rio and São Paulo a favorite lunch dish is feijjada completa, made with beans and meat. Rice and beans is also popular, with black beans used in Rio, black or red beans in Minas Gerais, and red (or blonde) beans in São Paulo.

5. South (Paraná, Rio Grande do Sul, and Santa Catarina): The cowboys of this region favor dishes made with sun- or salt-dried meats and churrasco, fresh meats grilled over a wood fire.

The staple foods of Brazil include arroz (white rice), feijão (black beans), dried salted codfish, coconut, dried shrimp, lemon, and farinha (manioc [cassava] flour). These starches are usually eaten with steak, chicken, or fish.

Coffee, one of Brazil's cash crops, is the mainstay of each day. In fact, the word for "breakfast" in Portuguese, café da manhã, means "morning coffee." Some historians have suggested that the popularity of coffee may be left over from the days of café com leite

(coffee and milk) politics, when Brazil's political scene was dominated by the "coffee oligarchs."

Few cities can boast the renown of Rio de Janeiro's New Year's celebrations. No fewer than 2 million people from all over the world congregate at the Copacabana. It is considered good luck to dress in white. Concerts, music, dancing, and high spirits are all part of the festivities. At midnight the fireworks start. These are not ordinary firecrackers though; this is probably the finest and definitely among the most famous fireworks display in the entire world. Even after the fireworks end, the party continues throughout the night.

In Salvador, Brazil, the festival of Bom Jesus dos Navegantes is also celebrated on January 1. A procession of small boats carries the statue of Lord Jesus of Sailors from the main harbor to the Boa Viagem beach. It is said that sailors who join in this observance need never fear death by drowning.

Preparation:

Peel and slice the avocado and discard the seed. Place the avocado, lime juice, and sugar in a food processor or blender. Puree at high speed until completely smooth. revolutionary hero of Brazil. Nicknamed Tiradentes (or “tooth-puller”) because he occasionally pulled teeth, he was a leading conspirator in an abortive attempt to get rid of the Portuguese in 1789. The revolt was foiled, however, and Tiradentes was executed. The biggest celebrations are in Tiradentes’s home state of Minas Gerais, especially Ouro Preto, which is a UNESCO World Heritage Site.

✿ LABOR DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: May 1

Brazil celebrates Labor Day, also called May Day, or Workers’ Day, with parades, demonstrations, public meetings, and lectures that call attention to workers and their contributions. Labor Day is celebrated on May 1, because in 1889 the Socialist Second International chose this as the day to recognize workers around the world. They coordinated the observance with the strike called for 1890 by the U.S. labor union the American Federation of Labor (AFL) demanding an eight-hour workday. In recent years emphasis has shifted to the household sector, including maids, cooks, and other domestic servants, who receive no labor benefits at all. Moreover deep within the Amazon forest, debt-bondage and virtual slavery are not uncommon. May Day celebrations in recent years have consistently highlighted these situations.

In 1822 Pedro rebelled and, declaring independence from Portugal, was named emperor of Brazil. Brazil was the only European colony to gain its freedom without a long, costly struggle. Brazilians observe Independence Day with parades, public meetings, and parties. A huge military parade is a special feature of the day.

Republic Day marks the date in 1889 when Emperor Pedro II (1825–91) was overthrown by a military coup and Brazil formally became a republic. This transition was more illusory than real, however, since the military junta retained actual control over the nation. It was only in the late 20th century that Brazil began to experience prolonged periods of democracy. The day is celebrated in Rio de Janeiro with military ceremonies and speeches by politicians.

✿ CARNIVAL

Observed by: Christians, General Public

Observed on: February–March

Aside from its soccer team, Brazil is probably best known for its Carnival. The celebration occurs on the four days before Lent and represents the wildest, most abandoned celebration that Brazil and possibly all of South America has to offer.

Samba, a form of music and dance, is a big part of Carnival. Derived largely from African traditions, it is very lively and boisterous with strong rhythms. Many samba schools in Brazil teach the dance to adults as well as children year-round. The Sambadrome Auditorium in Rio de Janeiro hosts a huge samba competition every year just before Carnival.

Carnival itself involves a lot of samba dancing. Huge processions of dancers through the streets, competitions are held on the streets and the beaches, and people burst into music and dance spontaneously out of sheer joy. Elaborate floats are paraded through the streets, and many celebrants wear extravagant and fanciful costumes. Streets and buildings are decorated with colorful streamers and lights. Food and drink are also important parts of the celebrations.

❁ GOOD FRIDAY

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: Friday before Easter

Good Friday, the Christian holiday commemorating the Crucifixion of Jesus, is a national holiday in Brazil. It has been in the Christian liturgical calendar even longer than Easter has, although no one is sure why it is called Good Friday. Some have suggested that the use of good in the name goes back to Old English and means “God’s” Friday, while others interpret good to mean something like “observed as holy.” This observance is also known as Black Friday and Sorrowful Friday, and in Eastern Orthodox Churches it is called Great Friday.

For many years Good Friday was primarily a Catholic observance, but many Protestant Churches now hold special services from noon until three in the afternoon on this day to symbolize Jesus’ last hours on the Cross. Many of the faithful fast on this day; when they eat, it is generally fish instead of meat. Oratorios and cantatas related to Jesus’ life are also performed. Usually, the day ends with a big meal shared with friends and relatives.

❁ EASTER

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: First Sunday after Lent

For Easter, the Christian holiday that celebrates Jesus’ rising from the dead three days after his Crucifixion, a church service at sunrise is customary. Later in the day adults hide eggs all over the house, giving children clues about where to find them. Hunting for the eggs keeps the children occupied. Often the children receive gifts as well. Some families hold picnics while others host evening parties.

❁ CORPUS CHRISTI

Observed by: Catholics

Observed on: Eighth Sunday after Easter

This Christian festival, which originated in the 13th century, honors the presence of Jesus in the miracle of the Eucharist, the sacrament of Communion. The most common observance on this day involves religious processions. After church services the statues of Mary, Jesus, and the saints are placed on long logs and carried through the streets.

❁ OUR LADY OF APARECIDA

Observed on: October 12

Our Lady of Aparecida is the patron saint of Brazil. Her statue was carved around 1650 by Frei Agostino de Jesus, a Carioca monk from São Paulo known for his sculpture. It somehow got lost and found its way to the bottom of the Paraíba River. On October 12, 1717, some fishermen went to the river, intent on hauling in a large catch for a feast. They were having no luck when suddenly, instead of fish, they netted the statue. Immediately their luck changed, and their nets filled with fish. One of the fishermen prayed to the statue and began to venerate it. In 1732 he moved to the village of Porto Itaguassu and built a shrine for the statue. The inhabitants of the village built a bigger church on top of a nearby hill, and moved the statue there, thereby becoming the village of Aparecida. In 1930 Pope Pius XII proclaimed her the principal patron of Brazil.

On October 12 the entire nation ceases to function. Special Masses are held, and many visit the saint’s basilica. The day is also observed as Children’s Day.

Fun Fact

Because the statue of Our Lady of Aparecida lay for so long at the bottom of the river, it lost its original color and is now a dark brown, making it easy for people descended from indigenous communities and slaves brought in from Africa to identify with this saint as one of their own.

❁ ALL SOULS’ DAY

Observed by: Catholics

Observed on: November 2

This day is the feast day for all the souls still in purgatory waiting for expiation of their sins to allow them to enter heaven. It is also, more broadly, a day of the dead, a time for honoring one’s ancestors. Special Masses and prayers mark the day.

❁ CHRISTMAS

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: December 25

It is traditional at Christmas in Brazil to build a nativity scene, called presépio (from the Latin presepium, which means “straw bed”). Nativity plays are also quite common. The people of the northern region vary this by replacing shepherds with shepherdesses and introducing a scene where gypsies try to kidnap the infant Jesus.

Decorating Christmas trees and exchanging presents is essential to the celebrations. Santa Claus is known as Papai Noel (“Father Noel”). Legend has it that, when he comes to Brazil, he wears silk clothes because of the summer heat. The main streets are festooned with decorative lights, and fireworks are lit at midnight.

Devout Catholics attend midnight Mass or missa do galo (galo means “rooster”). The Mass is so named because the rooster announces the coming day, and the missa do galo finishes at 1 A.M. on Christmas morning. Others attend Mass the next day. However since people like to sleep late, the Masses are held in the late afternoon.

Christmas dinner occupies a position of great importance, with a menu that includes chicken, turkey, ham, rice, salad, pork, fresh and dried fruits, and even beer sometimes (since it is summer in Brazil).

YEMANJÍ FESTIVAL

Observed in: Salvador

Observed by: Followers of Candomblé religion

Observed on: January 1

On January 1 followers of the Candomblé religion gather at beaches all over Brazil to perform rituals to please Yemanjá, the goddess of the sea. Most of the celebrations are filmed and shown all over Brazil, but they go on all over the country. More than 1 million celebrants dressed in white go into the ocean at dusk, where high priestesses initiate new members into the priesthood. The initiates send little boats filled with religious objects, including statues of saints, into the surf. If the boats sink, the orisha Yemanjá, associated with the Virgin Mary of Catholicism, has heard the people’s prayers and will continue her support for another year. Salvador, on Praia Vermelha (the Red Beach in Rio de Janeiro), features the largest and most well-attended celebrations.

LAVAGEM DO BONFIM

Observed in: Salvador

Observed by: Catholics, Followers of Candomblé religion

Observed on: Second Thursday in January

This day marks the feast of Senhor do Bonfim, who is identified with both Jesus and the Candomblé deity Oxalá. A group of flower-carrying Baianas (Bahía residents), followed by tens of thousands of people, walk to the Igreja do Bonfim, a Catholic church. When they arrive, the Baianas wash the church steps in honor of the Senhor do Bonfim. The day also features lots and lots of batucada (drumming) and, later in the day and into the night, a boisterous party around the Igreja do Bonfim.

FESTA DE SÃO LAZARO

Observed in: Federação

Observed by: Catholics, Followers of Candomblé religion

Observed on: January 25–28

The Brazil Festa de São Lazaro (Feast of Saint Lazarus) takes place from January 25 to January 28. St. Lazarus, the patron saint of leprosy, lepers, and hospitals, is identified with Omulu, the god of smallpox, sickness, and health among the Candomblé

Candomblé

In the 16th century when the Portuguese began bringing Yoruba slaves to Brazil from Africa, there were already established indigenous spiritual systems, and Catholicism was desperately trying to rid the area of Amerindian beliefs. The slaves, however, found their beliefs in spirits and magic quite in harmony with indigenous faiths. Although the Catholics baptized the Yorubas as soon as they arrived, it was a meaningless act because the Africans had no idea what it was supposed to represent. Thus, although the Africans and Amerindians pretended to worship following the Catholic faith, they covertly carried on their religious beliefs until their liberation in 1888. By then at least 15 generations of Africans had grown up worshipping the orishas.

Candomblé, like Santería, retains its roots in Yoruban spiritual practices. The name derives from the clandestine celebrations held on coffee plantations by the blacks. The first center for Candomblé was in Salvador, the old capital city of Brazil. The religion’s spiritual leaders are women, or high priestesses. Most of the teachings remain oral.

Millions of people in Brazil will claim to practice Catholicism, but privately they continue to worship the orishas of Africa.

deities. The ceremonies held on this occasion are a blend of Catholic ritual and Candomblé. For example during the Catholic Mass inside the church, worshippers receive a banho de pipoca (“popcorn bath”), a common Candomblé ritual.

Introduction

✿ HISTORY

The early history of Brunei is not well documented, although there is evidence of its trade links with China as early as the sixth century C.E. The formal name of the country is Negara Brunei Darussalam, but it is commonly referred to as Brunei Darussalam.

The Brunei Empire reached the pinnacle of its glory from the 15th to the 17th centuries when its control extended over the entire island of Borneo (of which Brunei is the northeastern part) and spread farther north up to the Philippines. Brunei had become a major power to reckon with under its fifth sultan Bolkiah (r. 1473–1521), who was renowned for his maritime adventures and exploits. The era of glory continued briefly under the ninth sultan Hassan (r. 1605–19). Thereafter Brunei's fortunes entered a period of decline, due to a combination of internal battles for succession and the influx of European colonial powers into the region.

In 1839 the English adventurer James Brooke (1803–68) arrived in Borneo and helped the sultan put down a rebellion. As a reward he was made governor, and later rajah, of Sarawak in northwest Borneo and gradually expanded the territory under his control. (Geographically the area known as Sarawak, now forming the southeast part of Malaysia, borders Brunei on three sides.)

Meanwhile the British North Borneo Company was expanding its control over territory in northeast Borneo. In 1888 Brunei became a protectorate of the British government, retaining internal independence but with British control over external affairs. British control was further intensified in 1906, when executive power was transferred to a British resident, who advised the ruler on all matters except those concerning local custom and religion.

With the drawing up of a new constitution in 1959, Brunei was declared a self-governing state, while its foreign affairs, security, and defense remained the responsibility of the United Kingdom. In 1962 an attempt was made to introduce a partially elected legislative body with limited powers. It was abandoned after the opposition party Partai Rakyat Brunei launched an armed uprising, which the government quelled with the help of British forces. The sultan eventually decided that Brunei would remain an independent state and successfully resisted pressures in the late 1950s and early 1960s to join the neighboring area of Sabah (and also Sarawak) as part of the newly formed Malaysia.

In 1967 Sultan Omar Ali Saifuddin (1914–86) abdicated in favor of his eldest son Hassanal Bolkiah (b. 1946), who became the 29th ruler. The sultan himself retained the portfolio of defense and assumed the royal title seri begawan. In 1970, the national capital Brunei Town was renamed Bandar Seri Begawan in his honor.

On January 4, 1979, Brunei and the United Kingdom signed a new treaty of friendship and cooperation. Finally on January 1, 1984, Brunei became a fully independent state. Its next step was to join ASEAN (Association of South East Asian Nations). During the next two and a half decades Brunei moved toward Islamic fundamentalism. In 1991 the sale of alcohol was banned, and stringent dress codes have been enforced since then.

❁ GEOGRAPHY AND CLIMATE

Brunei is situated on the northern coast of the island of Borneo, in southeastern Asia, bounded on the north by the South China Sea and on all other sides by the Malaysian state of Sarawak.

The landmass of Brunei consists of a narrow coastal plain and a hilly interior region. There are extensive swamps, especially in the west and northeast. Most streams flow north to the coast, including the Belait River, the longest river of the country.

The climate of Brunei is largely humid and tropical with an average annual temperature of about 81°F. Although there is rain throughout the year the country experiences its heaviest rainfall during the monsoon season, which lasts from November to March.

❁ ECONOMY

Brunei is heavily dependent on its revenues from the sale of crude oil and natural gas to finance its development programs and ranks third among the major oil-producing countries in Southeast Asia. It is also the fourth largest producer of liquefied natural gas in the world. The state also receives income from rents, royalties, corporate taxes, and dividends. Because oil and gas are nonrenewable resources, the nation has made economic diversification a major priority.

The government provides for all medical services and subsidizes food and housing.

❁ CULTURE AND LIFESTYLE

The culture of Brunei is linked with the old Malay civilization that once encompassed the entire Malay Archipelago. The influx of various cultural elements and foreign civilizations strongly influenced Brunei's culture. Although Islam emerged as the strongest force and defines the lives of the majority of the population, strong and distinct traces of animism, Hinduism, and Western cultures remain.

Brunei has tried to preserve its diverse cultural heritage. The founding of the Arts and Handicraft Center in 1975 testifies to the push for preservation. Brunei is famous for indigenous crafts such as boat making, silver work, bronze toolmaking, and cloth weaving, as well as mat and basket weaving. Brunei also boasts of the skills of silat, a traditional art of self-defense.

Fun Fact

Brunei has been ruled by the same family for more than six centuries.

Fun Fact

The sultan's favorite sport is polo.

Silat

Pencak silat or silat (“fighting by using techniques of self-defense”) is an Asian martial art with roots in the culture of the Malaysian people. This art is widely known in Indonesia and Malaysia as well as Singapore, Thailand, Brunei, and the Philippines. It is estimated that there are hundreds of alirans (styles) and innumerable schools. The origin of alirans may be traced back to the movements and gestures of wild animals such as tigers and monkeys.

The system consists of sikap (positions) and gerak-gerak (movements). When pesilat (silat practitioners) are moving, these sikap and gerak-gerak change continuously. As soon as one finds an opening in an opponent's defense, he or she will try to finish the opponent with a fast serangan (attack).

Silat has a wide variety of defensive and attacking techniques. Practitioners may use hands, elbows, arms, legs, knees, and feet in attacks. Common techniques include kicking, hitting, tripping, sweeps, locks, take-downs, throws, strangles, and joint breaking.

Juru-juru is how one practices for silat. A juru is a series of meta-movements for the upper body, used as a guide to learn the positions and movements; it is known as buah when done with a partner. Langkah, or lower body movements, teach the use of footwork. When combined, it is known as dasar pasan, or whole body flow.

Some Bruneian Dishes

Nasi lemak is a favorite breakfast dish. This dish consists of rice cooked with coconut milk and served with spicy ikan bilis (anchovies), peanuts, sambal (spicy gravy) prawn, or fish or eggs, long beans, and cucumbers.

Satay consists of bite-size pieces of beef, goat, or chicken marinated in spices, skewered on thin sticks, and grilled over a charcoal stove. A spicy peanut sauce, ketupat, rice cakes, cucumber, and raw onions are the traditional accompaniments.

Beef rendang consists of fairly large pieces of beef cooked in coconut milk and spiced with onion, garlic, lemon grass, turmeric, ginger, and other spices.

Oil and gas wealth has built the ostentatious modern public buildings in the capital, but most of Brunei is undeveloped and untouched by the outside world. Alcohol is illegal, there is no nightlife to speak of, and the political culture encourages quiet acquiescence to the edicts of the sultan.

CUISINE

The cuisine of Brunei has been strongly influenced by and shows a striking resemblance to Malaysian food. The dishes are generally rich and spicy and are eaten with rice or noodles. Ubiquitous street vendors sell foods such as barbequed fish, chicken wings, and satay (chunks or slices of meat on put on skewers and grilled).

Ambuyat (a porridge made of sago starch), familiarly called “edible glue,” is a local specialty. This is accompanied by grilled fish, a spicy mango sauce, and an assortment of vegetables. Other local favorites include beef rendang (sort of a spicy beef stew cooked in coconut milk) and nasi lemak (rice cooked in coconut milk).

❁ CHINESE NEW YEAR

Observed by: Chinese

Observed on: January–February

The New Year is perhaps the most elaborate, colorful, and important festival of the Chinese calendar. It is celebrated on the first day of the first Moon of the lunar calendar. The Bruneian Chinese, who comprise approximately 15 percent of the population, congratulate each other and themselves on having lived through yet another year. Prior to this day every Chinese home gets a thorough cleaning. Spring couplets, written in black ink on large vertical scrolls of red paper, are put up on the walls or sides of gateways. Flowers and fruit are used to decorate homes. This is a time for family reunions and social visits. Families visit one another and bring oranges as a token of longevity and good fortune. Traditional cookies and lots of eating are part of the festivities. Unmarried young people and children receive ang pow, little red packets with money inside, a symbolic gesture of good luck, wealth, and health.

❁ EL AM HEJIR

Observed by: Muslims

Observed on: First of Muharram, the first month of the Islamic calendar

The Islamic calendar is based on the revolutions of the Moon, so it has only 354 days. Dhu al-Hijjah, the New Year, begins on the first day of Muharram, the first Islamic month. Because all Islamic days start at sunset, so do the holidays. In Islam the celebration of the New Year is usually quiet, unlike New Year's celebrations associated with other calendars. On this day in Brunei the people gather in mosques for special prayers and readings from scriptures. A major activity is the recounting and the narration of the Hegira, Muhammad's flight from Mecca to Medina. On this day Bruneians, like Muslims elsewhere, also reflect on the ephemeral quality of time and of their own lives.

❁ MOULOD

Observed by: Muslims

Observed on: Twelfth of Rabbi al-Awwal, the third month of the Islamic calendar

Mouloud, also called Mawlid al-Nabi, celebrates the birthday of Muhammad, who was born in 570. The Muslims of Brunei celebrate this day by recalling his pious life and teachings. Special prayers are said on this occasion, recollecting Muhammad's kindness and compassion because he forgave the bitterest of his foes. The Muslim faithful, if they so wish, also give alms to the poor and the needy. Conservative Muslim sects do not celebrate Muhammad's birthday because they believe it diverts their attention from worshipping only Allah.

❁ SHAB-E-MIRAJ

Observed by: Muslims

Observed on: Twenty-seventh of Rajab, the seventh month in the Islamic calendar

This is a very special night for the adherents of Islam. The official name of the holiday is Laylat Al-Isra wa Al-Miraj, which means "the night journey and ascension," but it is also known as the Ascension of the Prophet. On this night, Muhammad is believed to have gone from Mecca to Jerusalem, ascended into the seven heavens and returned, all in the course of a single night. During his sojourn in the seven heavens, Muhammad was commanded to establish the five daily prayers (salah, salat, or namaaz). He is also believed to have met luminaries such as Abraham (Ibrahim), Moses (Musa), Aaron (Harun), Adam (Allahu), the Archangel Gabriel (Jibril), and Jesus (Eesa). On this day, the devout Muslims of Brunei gather in mosques or at one another's homes and listen to the story of Muhammad's journey. They share food and sweets in honor of the night.

❁ SHAB-E-QADR

Observed on: Twenty-seventh of Ramadan, the ninth month of the Islamic calendar

This festival commemorates the most significant event in the history of Islam. It was in the ninth month of the Islamic calendar Ramadan that Allah sent down the revelation of the Koran to Muhammad, thus laying the foundation of a new faith. For this reason, Ramadan (or Ramazan) is considered the most sacred month of the Islamic calendar. In Brunei the people observe this day through prayers and reading of the scriptures, followed by feasts and get-togethers.

❁ EID AL-FITR

Observed on: First of Shawwal, the 10th month of the Islamic calendar

Eid al-Fitr is one of the major holidays of the Islamic calendar. It comes at the end of the holy month of Ramadan and celebrates the end of daily fasting. On this day the people of Brunei mark the end of the period of fasting during Ramadan with sweets, snacks, and dishes prepared specially for the occasion. People wear new clothes, and the men attend a special Eid prayer at their neighborhood mosques. There is a spirit of gaiety and cheerfulness all around.

❁ CHRISTMAS

Observance is generally confined to the capital, Bandar Seri Begawan, and the Belait District, where the majority of the Christian population (approximately 10 percent) and Western expatriates live. They usually hold “open house” parties to entertain family and friends.

Rites of Passage

❁ BIRTH

In Brunei there are two basic Muslim rituals accompanying the birth of a child. First the father or a male relative whispers the call to prayer (adhan) into the newborn’s right ear as the first sound it hears. This act symbolically makes the baby aware of Allah from the very first moment of its life. This is accompanied by reading from the relevant portions of the Koran.

After a few days, a naming ceremony is held. At a gathering of relatives and friends the child is formally given a name and often a lock of hair is cut from its head. This is generally followed by a celebratory meal, sacrifices, and readings from the Koran. The baby is weighed, and an equivalent amount in silver is given to charity.

❁ COMING OF AGE

Circumcision is not mentioned in the Koran, but Muslims everywhere regard it as essential, and the Hadith (a narrative record of the sayings of Muhammad) records it as a practice required by all the prophets. It is also known as tabara, meaning “purification.” In Brunei and neighboring countries where this procedure is followed, the boy undergoes circumcision between 10 and 12 years of age. It is, thus, a puberty rite, separating the boy from childhood and assigning him the new status of manhood. In certain cases it is performed in a clinic or hospital. Festivities, music, special foods, and the presence of a large number of guests are all part of the occasion. While the actual event is taking place, one may hear the praises of Allah being uttered, partly to induce a religious ambience, and partly (as some observers suggest) to muffle the boy’s cries of pain. However the procedure is relatively safe, and those who perform it are usually specially trained.

❁ MARRIAGE

In Brunei, whose culture has strong Malaysian influences, marriages are lavish affairs. The bride and groom are treated as “king and queen” for a day. The prewedding meeting between the bride’s and the groom’s parents determines the dowry that is to be given to the bride as well as the date of the marriage. A henna application ceremony is held prior to the wedding. The bride’s palms and feet are decorated with dye from henna leaves. Sometimes this is followed by several changes of costume, called tukar pakaian.

Marriage is a contract, and its solemnization is normally presided over by a kadbi, a religious official. The Akad Nikah or Solemnization of Marriage ceremony is, in effect, a verbal contract between the bride’s father, represented by the kadbi, and the groom. A small sum of money seals the contract. This token amount is distinct from the dowry or bride price, which the groom offers to the bride.

The simplicity of this ritual is in sharp contrast to the tremendous responsibilities of the groom toward his bride, which is reinforced in a brief lecture on marriage and its responsibilities, delivered later by the kadbi. The groom is also reminded that, should he fail to provide both spiritual and physical sustenance for his wife, the marriage may be dissolved if a complaint is made to the Syariat Court.

The solemnization is usually conducted by the kadbi in the presence of witnesses after both partners are asked separately for their consent to the marriage. Gifts are then exchanged, and there may be a recitation of the Koran. Gifts from the groom are checked to ensure everything is in order. These gifts are then displayed in the bridal chamber. This is followed by parties and feasts hosted by the groom’s and bride’s families.

❁ DEATH

In Brunei when a Muslim is nearing death, those around the person are called upon to comfort the person and remind him or her of God's mercy and forgiveness. They may also recite verses from the Koran. It is recommended that a dying Muslim's last words should be the declaration of faith: "I bear witness that there is no God but Allah." After the person has died, the people pray for the departed and begin preparations for burial. The eyes of the deceased are closed, and the body is covered temporarily with a clean sheet. It is forbidden for those in mourning to excessively wail, scream, or make wild gestures.

It is customary among Muslims to bury the deceased as soon as possible after death, avoiding the need for embalming or otherwise disturbing the body of the deceased. In case of an unnatural death, a postmortem may be performed if need be, but it should be done with the utmost respect for the dead. The family members wash the body with clean, perfumed water, after which it is wrapped in sheets of clean, white cloth (kafan).

The deceased is then transported to the site of the funeral prayers (salat-l-janazah). These prayers are commonly held outdoors, in a courtyard or public square, not inside the mosque. The community gathers, and the imam (prayer leader) stands in front of the deceased, facing away from the worshippers. The funeral prayer resembles the daily prayers, with a few variations. (For example, there is no bowing or prostration. Most of the prayer is said silently, except for a few words.)

The corpse is then taken to the cemetery for burial (al-dafin). While all members of the community attend the funeral prayers, only the men of the community accompany the body to the graveyard. The deceased is laid in the grave on his or her right side, facing Mecca. Erection of tombstones, elaborate markers, placing of flowers, or other mementoes is discouraged.

The friends and family of the dead person observe a three-day mourning period. They practice austerity and avoid wearing decorative clothing and jewelry. Widows observe an extended mourning period (iddah) for four months and ten days. During this period a widow is not allowed to remarry, move away from her home, or wear fancy jewelry and clothing.

❁ HISTORY

Not much is known about Bulgaria's ancient history, but recent social and political changes have made it possible to begin exploring the hundreds of prehistoric sites found there. Bulgaria abounds in archaeological monuments, many of which are still unknown to the international scholarly community, while others are being discovered every year. There are numerous Neolithic, Chalcolithic (Copper and Stone Age), and Bronze Age settlement mounds, which complement similar monuments found throughout the Balkans and northwestern Asia Minor. There are also significant remains of Classical, Hellenistic, and Roman urban centers, settlements, and temples, as well as more than a hundred Thracian tombs, with remarkable architecture and artistic decoration.

It is believed that what is now known as Bulgaria was a part of Thrace, an area in southeastern Europe (which also included Turkey, eastern Serbia, and northeastern parts of Greece). The inhabitants of this region were called Thracians and were of Indo-European descent. According to the Greek poet Homer, the Thracians promised to fight alongside the Mycenaean Greeks in the legendary Trojan War but did not fulfill their pledge. As a result, following the Trojan War, the Greek warrior Odysseus raided Thrace to punish them for failing to honor their promise.

Bulgaria is also thought to be the land of the Greek legend of Orpheus. It is believed that the Greeks borrowed the mythical figure of Orpheus from a Thracian ritual called the Orphic Mysteries, about which not much is known.

Around 46 B.C.E. the Romans conquered Bulgaria and began inhabiting the region they called Moesia. Sometime later in the sixth century C.E. Slavic nomads and farmers came to settle in the wastelands and were followed by a Central Asian Turkic ethnic group known as the Bulgars, who began migrating into this region around the seventh century from the northern coast of the Black Sea. The Bulgars were a nomadic Turkic steppe people, more like the Huns or Mongols, and expanded their chiefdoms by raiding neighboring tribes. They were ruled by khans (which is also the title for rulers of Mongolia and Turkey), a hereditary position.

The Byzantine Empire recognized Bulgar rule over the region between the Danube River and the Balkans (southeastern Europe) in exchange for a yearly tribute. Thus by the late seventh century the Bulgars had established their khanate (a region ruled by the khan), and Asparukh (d. 700) became the first emperor of Bulgaria. Initially the Bulgars faced constant opposition from the Slavs, who had entered Bulgaria long before the Bulgars and also outnumbered them. Over time the Bulgars absorbed the Slavic way of life, adopted the Slavic language, and in 865, under the rule of King Boris I, they embraced Orthodox Christianity.

The most ambitious Bulgarian king was Czar Simeon I (also known as Simeon the Great; d. 927), who was the son of Boris I (d. 907), the first Christian ruler of Bulgaria. He waged a war against the Byzantine Empire in an attempt to become the emperor of the Greeks and Bulgars. With the approval of Pope Formosus (?816–96), he even declared himself czar (or emperor) of Bulgaria and Greece.

After the death of King Simeon I, the Bulgarian Empire slowly disintegrated. The Byzantine Emperor John I Tzimisces (924–76) invaded the eastern part of the Bulgarian Empire and declared it a Byzantine protectorate. The Bulgarians suffered immensely under the Byzantine Emperor Basil II (958–1025), who defeated Czar Samuil of Bulgaria (958–1014) in 1014 in Balasita and ordered the massacre of thousands of Bulgarians. He also ordered his forces to blind more than 14,000 Bulgarian prisoners before sending them back to Bulgaria. As a result of his atrocities, he earned the nickname Voulgaroktonos or “Slayer of Bulgars.” Bulgaria was under Byzantine rule from 1018 to 1186.

In the late 12th century the power of the Byzantine Empire was on the decline. Taking advantage of this, Peter Asen, a Bulgarian noble of mixed descent (Cuman Bulgarian, and Vlach), led a revolt against the Byzantine Empire and declared himself Czar Peter II (r. 1040–41). He reclaimed some of the region under Byzantine rule, but the combined Hungarian, Serb, and Cuman (nomadic west Turkish tribes) forces prevented him from reclaiming the original territories of the Bulgarian Empire.

Under King Ivan II (r. 1218–41) the status of Bulgaria as a regional power was restored, and he expanded the kingdom, annexing the whole Balkan Peninsula, except for Greece. In 1242 Mongols raided Bulgaria and defeated the Bulgarian ruler. As a consequence Bulgaria was forced to pay an annual tribute to the Mongol ruler to prevent further raids. By 1280 the Bulgarian kingdom was reduced to a small state situated on the southern bank of the Danube River.

In the 14th century Bulgaria came under the rule of the Ottoman Turks. They did not force the Bulgarians to convert to Islam, but since non-Muslims were not allowed to serve in the army of the sultan, a new custom of “tribute of children” was

Greek Legend of Orpheus

In Greek mythology Orpheus is an important figure because he taught humanity the skills of writing, medicine, and agriculture. He is looked upon as a great poet and the inventor of the lyre. It is believed that his music and his singing could stop a river in its course and hypnotize wild beasts. Greek mythology also states that he initiated the cults of Apollo and the Thracian god Dionysus (god of wine), practiced magical arts, and taught astrology.

started. According to this custom every Christian community had to raise one out of five sons as a Muslim, and he was enrolled in the Janissaries, the elite armed force of the sultan.

Austria encouraged rebellion in Bulgaria in 1595 and 1688, but the revolts were quickly suppressed by Ottoman forces. In the 18th century the Russians, supported by the Bulgarians, fought with the Ottoman Turks over domination in the region. A peace treaty signed between Russia and the Ottoman Empire gave Russia the right to interfere in the internal matters of Bulgaria to safeguard the interests of its Christian subjects. In 1876 the Bulgarians staged an insurrection against the Ottoman rulers in what became known as the April Uprising. It was brutally crushed, and more than 30,000 Bulgarians were massacred.

The atrocities of the Ottoman Turks invited strong reactions from the international community. Russia intervened and called a conference at Constantinople in December 1876, which was attended by delegates from Great Britain, Italy, France, Germany, and Austria-Hungary, along with Russia and the Ottoman Empire. In order to find a peaceful solution to the Bulgarian problem, the formation of a Bulgarian state, made up of a small principality in the northern parts of the Balkan Mountains and including the entire Bulgarian region under Ottoman rule, was sanctioned. When the Ottomans refused to accept this plan, Russia with the backing of the European powers declared war on the Ottoman Empire in 1877. By January 1878 Russian forces had gained control over a major portion of Bulgaria, and the forces of the Ottoman Empire were ultimately defeated. In accordance with the Treaty of Berlin (1878), which was signed between the European powers and the Ottoman Empire, a principality of Bulgaria was created between the Danube River and the Stara Planina mountain range. It included Sofia and the ancient capital of the Bulgarian Empire Veliko Turnovo.

After the Bulgarian state was formed Bulgarians began drafting their country's constitution, and Stefan Stambolov (1854–95), a participant in the April Uprising and a prominent member of the Bulgarian Revolutionary Central Committee, was elected prime minister. In 1885 a coup supported by Bulgarians in Eastern Rumelia, which had been under the administration of the Ottoman sultan, brought about the unification of Eastern Rumelia and Bulgaria.

In October 1912 the First Balkan War broke out, and the Allied forces of Serbia, Bulgaria, Montenegro, and Greece invaded Macedonia and Thrace, which were under Ottoman rule. The Ottomans were defeated by the alliance and lost a considerable portion of their empire. However Bulgaria, which had suffered the heaviest human casualties in the war, demanded a larger share in the territories that were conquered by Serbs. The Serbs refused to give up their part and joined forces with Greece, offering Bulgaria the region of Thrace in return for its help. The two nations fought jointly against the Bulgarian forces, and soon Bulgaria lost all the territories it had won in the battle against the Ottoman Turks.

In 1915 during World War I, Bulgaria sided with its archrival the Ottoman Empire and joined forces with Germany and Russia against the Allied powers, which were supported by Serbia, Romania, and Greece. Bulgaria declared war on Serbia and Romania and reclaimed all the territories it had lost during the First Balkan War. However by September 1918, Greece, along with the Allied Forces, had defeated Bulgaria and forced Czar Ferdinand (1861–1941) to sign a peace treaty.

This treaty demanded that Ferdinand abdicate in favor of his son Boris III (1894–1943). In 1920 new elections were held in Bulgaria. They were won by the Agrarian Party leader Aleksandar Stamboliyski (1879–1923), who was sworn in as prime minister of Bulgaria. But in May 1934, after a military coup led by Kimon Georgiev (1882–1969) and backed by Czar Boris III, all political parties were abolished, and Czar Boris III took total control of Bulgaria.

In 1941 Bulgaria allied itself with Nazi Germany and Fascist Italy and allowed German forces to use it for an invasion of Greece and Yugoslavia. The Fascists defeated the two countries and, as a token of appreciation for its support, gave the Thrace region of Greece and a major part of Macedonia to Bulgaria. Bulgaria also declared war on Britain and the United States, but, due to Russian popularity in the region, refrained from declaring war on the Soviet Union. In 1943 Simeon II became czar after the sudden and suspicious death of his father shortly after a dinner meeting with Adolf Hitler. Czar Simeon II (b. 1937) was only six years old when he assumed the throne, so his uncle Prince Kyril of Bulgaria (1895–1945) and two others were appointed regents. In 1944 Kyril and the other regents were removed by a Soviet-backed coup. Kyril was soon tried and executed, as were many members of Bulgaria's educated governing classes.

Simeon, however, was allowed to stay on the throne with regents appointed by the new Communist government, which also appointed Georgi Dimitrov (1882–1949), a Bulgarian Communist, prime minister of Bulgaria. After the monarchy was abolished in 1946, following a rigged referendum that claimed 95 percent approval, the royal family went to Alexandria, Egypt, where Czaritsa Giovanna's (1907–2000) father, Victor Emmanuel III of Italy (1869–1947), was living in exile. In 1951 the Spanish government of Francisco Franco (1892–1975) granted asylum to the exiled Bulgarian royal family. In 1949 Dimitrov died, and an extreme Stalinist Vulko Chervenko (1900–80) was sworn in as the new prime minister.

When the Russian leader Stalin (1879–1953) died in 1953, Nikita Khrushchev (1894–1971), who disagreed with many of Stalin's views, took over the USSR. In 1956 the Stalin puppet Chervenko was replaced by Todor Zhivkov (1911–98) as chairman of the State Council of Bulgaria, while another Bulgarian Communist Anton Yugov (1914–91), was appointed prime minister.

After Yugov retired in 1962 Zhivkov became prime minister. In 1971 he promoted himself to the position of president and made Stanko Todorov (1920–96) prime minister. However Zhivkov's autocratic regime was growing increasingly corrupt and erratic. In the 1980s Bulgaria adopted a policy of forcing the minority Turks to adopt Bulgarian names instead of their Turkish names. Those who refused were persecuted, and thousands fled.

In 1989 people began demonstrating against the oppressive regime of Zhivkov, receiving widespread support from the Communists themselves. Eventually Zhivkov and his party gave up their right to rule Bulgaria, and in June 1990 the first free and fair elections since 1931 were held in Bulgaria. The Bulgarian Socialist Party (BSP), a moderate wing of the Communist party, won the elections and assumed power in 1991.

Between 1992 and 1997 the government of Bulgaria went back and forth between the Bulgarian Socialist Party and anticommunist regimes. However neither party did anything substantial to revive Bulgaria's failing economy. As in other post-Communist regimes in Eastern Europe, the transition to capitalism was more difficult than expected, and the backward condition of Bulgaria's industry and infrastructure was exposed. Discontent among the people against the two parties grew rapidly, and there were widespread demonstrations because of massive unemployment and lack of development.

In 1996 Czar Simeon II returned from exile and, using the name Simeon Saksoburggotski, started a new political party called the National Movement for Simeon II. This party won a landslide victory in the June 2001 elections, and Simeon Saksoburggotski was sworn in as the prime minister of Bulgaria. Under his rule Bulgaria is slowly trying to achieve economic stability, although unemployment and inflation remain high. In 2004 Bulgaria became a member of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization (NATO), an international organization for mutual defense, and it is expected to join the European Union (EU) before 2010.

❁ GEOGRAPHY AND CLIMATE

Located in southeastern Europe, Bulgaria is flanked by Turkey and Greece to the south, Romania to the north, Macedonia, Serbia, and Montenegro to the west, and the Black Sea to the east. The main topographical features of Bulgaria include: the Danubian Plateau (a region between the Danube River and the Balkan Mountains); the Balkan Mountains (also known as Stara Planina or Old Mountains); the central Thracian Plain; and the Rhodope Mountains. The Rila Mountains and the Pirin Mountains lying in the Rhodope mountain region, are the most striking topographic features of the Balkan region. The Rila mountain range is home to the highest peak in the Balkan Mountains Mount Musala, which stands 9,760 feet high. The second highest peak in Bulgaria Mount Vihrenm, which is 9,563 feet high, is located in the Pirin mountain range.

The important rivers of Bulgaria include the Danube, the Struma, the Maritsa, and the Mesta. The Sofia Basin (15 miles wide and 60 miles long) is home to the capital city of Sofia and its surrounding areas.

Bulgaria has a temperate climate that is characterized by wet, cold winters and hot, dry summers.

Renowned for its rose oil, Bulgaria has the largest rose plantations in the Kazanluk region and is called “The Valley of Roses.” Bulgaria has more than 250 native plant species that are not found anywhere else in the world, including the Balkan violet, the Rile primrose, the Rhodopean tulip, and the Bulgarian blackberry. A wide variety of mushrooms, raspberries, strawberries, blackberries, blueberries, and other fruits can be found in Bulgaria’s forests.

❁ ECONOMY

The Bulgarian economy has suffered immensely due to the lack of development of its infrastructure and the absence of progrowth economic policies. There is massive unemployment throughout the country, and inflation is high. However, the present government of Bulgaria, under the leadership of Simeon Saksokoburggotski (the former Czar Simeon II), is trying to revive the failing economy and has introduced a number of reforms. Privatization of industry is being encouraged, and the government is making investments in developing basic infrastructure facilities. It is also conducting talks with the members of the European Union (EU) and is expected to benefit from the economic policies of the EU after it joins that organization.

Some of the important industries in Bulgaria include food processing, chemicals, construction, machine building, electricity, and nuclear fuel. The agricultural produce of the region includes fruit, tobacco, vegetables, wine, barley, wheat, and sugar.

❁ CULTURE AND LIFESTYLE

Bulgaria’s population is dominated by ethnic Bulgarians, who constitute 84 percent of the country’s population. However, a significant number of Turks, Macedonians, Greeks, and Armenians also live in Bulgaria. The culture is a blend of the Bulgar, Thracian, and Slavic cultures.

Bulgarian is the official language of the country and is widely spoken in Bulgaria. It is a southern Slavic language and uses the Cyrillic alphabet. The various ethnic groups in the region speak their own languages.

Most Bulgarians are Bulgarian Orthodox Christians (83 percent), while 12 percent are Muslim. Minority religions—Roman Catholics, Protestants, Jews, and people of other faiths—practice their religions freely.

Bulgaria does not have a national dress; people in different parts of Bulgaria wear their own distinctive traditional costumes. For example in the Thrace region and mountainous part of Bulgaria, women prefer to wear the closed tunic, known as the soukman. In the northern parts of the Stara Planina and in the Danube Plain, women wear a bruchnik (double apron). Men generally choose between a chernodresnik and a beloldresnik, which are black or white robes.

The musical instruments used by Bulgarian performers, also used by musicians throughout the Balkan region, include the kaval (flute), tambura (a stringed instrument), tapan (two-sided drum), gaida (bagpipe), zurla or zurna (a woodwind instrument), and gadulka (violin).

Most of the traditional Bulgarian dances, called boro, are performed as line dances or circle dances. However some dances can also be performed by individuals. The traditional dances are not very popular among the Bulgarian youth and are usually reserved for weddings and village festivals.

Traditional Bulgarian artisans are renowned for their wood carvings, handicrafts, copperware, beautifully designed rugs, and ceramics.

❁ CUISINE

Bulgarian cuisine includes a wide variety of tasty and spicy delicacies. Bulgarians feast on salads, bean soup, kebabcheta (a spicy meat dish), kavarma (a tasty and

The Cyrillic Alphabet

The Cyrillic alphabet, also known as azbuka (derived from the old name of the first letters), is an alphabet used to write six Slavic languages: Belarusian, Bulgarian, Russian, Serbian, Macedonian, and Ukrainian. In addition many other languages spoken in Asia, Eastern Europe, and the former Soviet Union use it. In Bulgaria it is widely believed that Saint Clement of Orhid, a disciple of Saint Cyril and Saint Methodius and a Bulgarian scholar, was the inventor of the Cyrillic alphabet. However others credit Saint Cyril as its actual inventor.

spicy dish made from pork and veal liver), and peppers stuffed with cheese and egg.

Every region also boasts its own specialties, such as Danube fish soup, Bansko-style kapama (vegetables and meat stewed in an earthenware vessel), Thracian katmi (a delicious pancake), Rhodope cheverme (roasted lamb), and Dobroudjanska banitsa (cheese pie).

Coffee and white and red wines are favorite beverages in Bulgaria.

Fun Fact

It is believed that the health of an individual throughout the year will depend on the kind of life found near the place where the martenitsi is tied. If a worm is found near the martenitsi, it means the individual will enjoy good health and success throughout the year. An ant symbolizes good health throughout the year, but success will require hard work. A spider symbolizes bad health and lack of success throughout the year.

❁ NEW YEAR'S EVE/DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: December 31–January 1

New Year's Day is celebrated on January 1 in Bulgaria. Prior to 1916, Bulgaria followed the Julian calendar, which recognizes the new year as beginning in January. In 1916 Bulgaria adopted the Gregorian calendar, which is in use throughout most of the Western World. In Western Bulgaria, the Central Balkan region, and along the Danube River, a ritual called ladouvane (or maiden's rite) is performed on New Year's Eve. This ritual requires young girls to get up early on the morning of December 30 and drop their finger rings, along with barley and oats (since all are considered symbols of fertility), in a huge vessel. Then all the rings are tied together with the stem of a perennial plant, such as ivy or basil. The vessel is filled with water and kept in the open, under the starry night sky, until New Year's Eve. On December 31, the young girls perform a ritual dance around the huge vessel, and then an astrologer reveals their futures to them.

On New Year's Day, Bulgarians feast on banica, a flaky cheese pie, and usher in the new year with the ringing of church bells.

❁ MARTENITSA

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: March 1

Martenitsa is an ancient Bulgarian festival that commemorates the establishment of the Kingdom of Bulgaria in 681. Also since the spring season begins in the month of March, it has been a Bulgarian tradition to celebrate spring on March 1.

On this day Bulgarians wear small, neatly woven red-and-white woolen dolls, either on their wrists or affixed to their clothes. Called martenitsi or pizho and penda, these represent happiness and prosperity. The purity of the white snow that will soon be gone and the onset of spring, with its sunny days, are reflected in the red and white colors used to make the martenitsi. Bulgarians are supposed to wear these dolls until they see a stork. The stork is considered the harbinger of spring. After seeing the stork it is customary to remove the martenitsi, although the tradition of removing them varies from region to region. Some tie the martenitsi on a fruit tree to transfer their good luck and prosperity to the fruit-bearing tree, while some tie it to a stone, which transfers the good fortune to the stone.

Bulgarians believe the word mart in the term martenitsi refers to a fictional angry old woman named Baba Marta (meaning Grandma Marta), who suffers from mood swings. Bulgarians offer red and white colors or martenitsi to Baba Marta to please her, lest her mood swings prolong the cold weather and delay the onset of spring.

❁ LIBERATION DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: March 3

This day commemorates the formation of the first autonomous Bulgarian state within the Ottoman Empire on March 3, 1878, as a result of the Treaty of Berlin. This treaty was signed by the European powers and the Ottoman Sultan, after Russian forces defeated the Ottoman Turks in Bulgaria.

Bulgarians had suffered immensely under the oppressive rule of the Ottoman Turks, and after thousands of people were massacred by the sultan's army, the international community intervened and decided to create an autonomous state of Bulgaria. The Ottoman Turks refused to grant Bulgaria autonomy, so Russia backed by other European powers invaded Bulgaria and defeated the Turks. Eventually a peace treaty was signed between the sultan and the European powers, which led to the formation of the autonomous state of Bulgaria.

In the interim Prince Alexander of Battenberg (1854–1921), a nephew of Russian Czar Alexander II (1818–81), was chosen as the governor of Bulgaria, while the Ottoman Turks were allowed nominal rule over the region. However after the Bulgarian state was formed, Bulgarians began drafting their country's constitution, and Stefan Stambolov (1854–95), a prominent member of the Bulgarian Revolutionary Central Committee, was elected prime minister.

Liberation Day celebrations take place throughout the country and are observed with cultural festivals and programs showcasing the rich historical and cultural heritage of Bulgaria. All public and private institutions are closed.

❁ LABOR DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: May 1

The earliest origins of a celebration on May 1 (also called May Day) are ascribed to pagan celebrations that were practiced by farmers, peasants, and villagers in Europe well before the Middle Ages. The May 1 observance of Labor Day, or Worker's Day, was set by the Socialist Second International in 1889 in order to show solidarity with the U.S. American Federation of Labor (AFL), which had called a general strike in 1890 demanding an eight-hour workday.

It is a public holiday, and all private and public institutions are closed.

Observed on: May 1

Bulgarians also celebrate Eremia or Snake's Day on May 1. They believe snakes will bite people who work in fields on this day. However young Bulgarian women go to the fields on Snake's Day to pick garlic cloves and bring them home. It is believed that these garlic cloves will help ward off evil. Also people living along the Toundja River plant cabbages in the fields on this day, since they believe that the cabbage heads will become firm and tight, just like the snake's coils.

It is a public holiday, and all private and public institutions are closed.

❁ BULGARIAN ARMY DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: May 6

Bulgarian Army Day, originally St. George's Day (Gergyovden), commemorates the sacrifices made by the Bulgarian armed forces over the years to uphold the integrity and sovereignty of Bulgaria. On May 6, celebrations begin with a religious ceremony in which the flag of the Bulgarian armed forces is blessed and prayers are offered asking God to grant victory to the armed forces in the event of war. Then, a grand military parade takes place in the capital city of Sofia, which is presided over by the president and prime minister.

May 6 has traditionally been observed as St. George's Day to mark the death of the Christian saint St. George, who died on May 6, 303. Since the formation of the first Bulgarian state in 681, he has been revered as the patron saint of the Bulgarian Army, thus the merging of the two holidays. St. George was a devout Christian and a soldier in the Roman army, who was tortured and killed by fellow Romans when he refused to give up his faith on the orders of his Roman superiors.

St. George's Day in Bulgaria is known as Gergyovden and commemorates the end of spring and the onset of summer. It is observed with great enthusiasm by the peasants and farmers in Bulgaria. The name comes from georgius, an ancient Greek word that means "farmers." According to legend, during the pagan era a town lived in fear of a dragon. Although the townspeople tried to appease him by offering animals, he declared that he would not settle for anything less than human flesh. The people of the town submitted to their fate and began offering one human every day to protect the others. Soon, it was the turn of the king's daughter, but before the dragon could kill her, St. George appeared and killed the dragon. Since then, St. George has been the patron saint of farmers.

In eastern parts of Bulgaria, the youth of the village go to their fields on the eve of Gergyovden and drive away the corn pests and also get wet in the dew

Fun Fact

In Bulgaria Father Christmas (Saint Nicholas or Santa Claus) appears on January 1 and gives presents to children. Greeks attribute the qualities of St. Nicholas to St. Basil, whose death anniversary is observed on January 1

(Bulgarians believe this is good for health). Then they gather branches from pear trees and use them to decorate the doors of their barns, homes, animal pens, and cattle-sheds. Following this, they light candles and drink three sips of water for good health.

EDUCATION AND CULTURE DAY

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: May 24

Bulgarians celebrate May 24 as Education and Culture Day. It is also known as the Day of Slavonic Literacy and celebrates St. Cyril and St. Methodius. These saints are believed to have invented the Slavonic language and its literature.

St. Cyril and St. Methodius were brothers and devout Christians who belonged to a renowned Christian family in Thessalonica. The saints introduced Bulgaria to Christianity and convinced the king of Bulgaria Boris I (852–89) to embrace the new religion, along with his subjects. It is believed that St. Cyril invented the Glagolitic alphabet, which had 38 letters, 24 of which resembled those used in the Greek language. The brothers began teaching the Slavonic language in the region. Many believe that St. Cyril's disciple Saint Clement of Ohrid simplified the Glagolitic alphabet and created the Cyrillic alphabet, naming it in honor of his teacher. Disciples of these saints spread the use of Slavonic languages in other Slavic countries. Pope John Paul II declared St. Cyril and St. Methodius copatrons of Europe on December 31, 1980.

On this day people offer prayers in honor of these saints in local churches. Also the government of Bulgaria organizes a number of educational and cultural programs throughout the country to create awareness about the Bulgarian language (one of the Slavonic languages) as well as to encourage Bulgarians to take pride in their rich cultural heritage.

BOTEV DAY

On June 2, 1876, Botev, along with 200 other rebels, launched an attack against the Ottoman Turks with the intention of liberating Bulgaria from their rule. He was killed during this attempt. In his honor as the clock strikes noon on

UNIFICATION DAY

Observed on: September 6

This day commemorates the union of Bulgaria and Eastern Rumelia. In accordance with the Treaty of Berlin (1878), signed by the European powers and the Ottoman Empire, a principality of Bulgaria was created between the Danube River and the Stara Planina, which included Sofia and the ancient capital of the Bulgarian Empire Veliko Turnovo. Prince Alexander of Battenberg (1857–1893), a nephew of Russian Czar Alexander II, was made prince of the region.

An autonomous province of Eastern Rumelia, which was an integral part of the Kingdom of Bulgaria, was formed between the region Stara Planina and Rhodope Range (a mountain range in the southern part of Bulgaria), and a governor was appointed by the Ottoman sultan to administer the region.

However, the Bulgarians were not happy with this division and secretly supported a revolt by the Bulgarians living in Eastern Rumelia against the sultan's governor. As a consequence in 1885 a successful coup, backed by Bulgaria, ended the reign of the Ottoman Turks in the region, and on September 6, 1885, Bulgaria and Eastern Rumelia were unified.

❁ ST. BASIL'S DAY

Observed by: Bulgarian Orthodox Christians
Observed on: January 1

St. Basil's Day is observed in remembrance of the death of St. Basil on January 1, 1379. Also known as Basil the Great, he is considered one of the three holy hierarchs of the Eastern Orthodox Church. (Gregory Nazianus [329–89] and John Chrysostom [347–407] are the other two.) Gregory Nazianus (329–89), Gregory of Nyssa (335–c. 394), and St. Basil (330–79) were also called Cappadocian fathers, part of a fourth-century monastic family led by St. Makrina the Younger (330–79). Under the guidance of their sister St. Makrina, these three men were given a proper education and lessons on meditation and were collectively designated as Cappadocian fathers. Their mission was to demonstrate to Greek-speaking intellectuals that the Christian faith was not antiphilosophical and that Christians could hold their ground while conversing with Greek intellectuals.

On this day many devout Bulgarians attend local churches and offer prayers in honor of St. Basil.

❁ EPIPHANY

Observed by: Bulgarian Orthodox Christians
Observed on: January 6

The Feast of the Epiphany is a Christian celebration of the three astrologer-kings of ancient Persia (Caspas, Balthasar, and Melchior) who visited the infant Jesus in Bethlehem. It also celebrates the early life of Jesus prior to his baptism in the Jordan River by John the Baptist.

This is one of the most important Christian holidays in Bulgaria, and it is marked with special prayers and reading of psalms. Considered a symbol of life and purification, water is consecrated and then sprinkled on devout Christians to absolve them of their sins.

In Bulgaria an Epiphany ritual involves throwing a consecrated cross into ice-cold rivers or ponds. Young men and soldiers, blessed by the Orthodox clergy, dive in these waters to retrieve the cross. The person who retrieves it and kisses it is proclaimed the godfather of the village after receiving blessings from the local priest. Next the cross is carried to every home in the village to bless each house and its inhabitants. According to Bulgarian beliefs this ritual chases away evil and brings good health and prosperity.

Military flags and military units are also consecrated on Epiphany, a ritual that began in 1879.

Since this is also considered a day of baptism (referring to Jesus' baptism) the day is also known as the Day of Holy Baptism, and many people get baptized on this day.

In Bulgaria people also celebrate St. Jordan's Day or Voditzi (derived from the word voda, which means "water" in Bulgarian) on January 6. It marks the end of a 12-day period called Pogani, or the Unclean Days. Orthodox Christians believe evil and dark forces walk the Earth during these 12 days. In different parts of Bulgaria rituals are performed that are meant to ward off evil and purify villages and their residents.

❁ GOOD FRIDAY

Observed by: Bulgarian Orthodox Christians

Observed on: Friday before Easter

Orthodox Good Friday (Veli Potek in Bulgarian) falls on the Friday before Easter and is the last Friday in Lent. It commemorates the Crucifixion of Jesus. Many Christians observe a fast during Lent, starting on Ash Wednesday (the first day of Lent, 40 days before Good Friday), and Orthodox Christians continue to observe a partial fast until Easter. Some Christians fast on the first and last days of Lent, Ash Wednesday and Good Friday.

On Good Friday devout Bulgarians attend a Good Friday service in local churches to remember the life and teachings of Jesus. Many buy new pottery dishes. In the city of Orhid, pumpkins are planted on Good Friday, since people believe that pumpkins planted on this day will be very sweet. Also in the city of Samokov young girls bake sweet donuts made with honey and sugar, called sladko, blago, pogache, or "sweet bread."

EASTER

Observed by: Bulgarian Orthodox Christians
Observed on: First Sunday after Lent

Easter celebrates Jesus' Resurrection from the dead. It falls on the first Sunday after the month of Lent. Because Christians call Jesus the "light of the world," candles are part of the Easter Vigil and midnight services before Easter. In Bulgaria after attending midnight services people rush into the streets with burning candles in their hands, which symbolize Jesus' return from the dead. People also smash eggs on the walls of the church. These eggs are dyed with colors during Easter week. Most eggs are dyed red. Bulgarians believe in a biblical legend that says Mary took some eggs and bread wrapped in a shawl to the site of the Crucifixion after Jesus' death. Grief-stricken at the sight of her son's Crucifixion and the blood streaming from his wounds, she knelt down and wept bitterly. Her tears and the blood from Jesus' wounds dropped on the shawl and eventually on the eggs and bread, thereby coloring them both. It is believed that this was the start of the tradition of coloring eggs.

On Easter red-colored eggs are rubbed against the cheeks of children to wish them good health throughout the year. Before Easter lunch, Bulgarians play a game that involves raw eggs. In this game two opponents stand facing each other holding raw eggs in their hands and begin hitting each other's fists trying to break the other's egg. It is believed that the person whose eggs remain intact will enjoy good health and success in the coming year.

Roast lamb and a special Easter bread are the traditional dishes in Bulgaria. Easter games and celebrations continue even on Easter Monday, which falls on the first Monday after Lent.

THE TRANSFIGURATION

Observed by: Bulgarian Orthodox Christians
Observed on: August 6

The Feast of the Transfiguration is considered one of the 12 great feasts in the liturgical calendar followed by the Bulgarian Orthodox Church. According to biblical stories, it is believed that on the night of the Transfiguration a miraculous event occurred on Mount Tabor (a hill near Nazareth). Jesus, along with his three disciples Peter, James, and John, had climbed Mount Tabor and begun praying. It is believed that at that moment Jesus became transfigured, and his face shone with the radiance of the Sun, while his white clothes also shone brilliantly. Then Moses and Elijah (or Eling) appeared and began talking to Jesus about his coming death. Around the same time, a cloud appeared in the sky, and God's voice proclaimed Jesus as his son and asked the disciples to listen to his teachings.

On the night of the Transfiguration, Bulgarians believe that God appears in the sky, and the gates of heaven are visible. However only those people who have never sinned can see these things, and God fulfills their wishes. Many Bulgarians remain wide awake throughout the night of the Transfiguration, hoping to catch a glimpse of God and the gates of heaven.

A popular Bulgarian proverb states that, "By Virgin Mary's Day, straw becomes wheat, and after Virgin Mary's Day wheat becomes straw." Thus Bulgarians complete their threshing activities by Assumption Day.

❁ ST. DEMETRIUS DAY

Observed by: Bulgarian Orthodox Christians
Observed on: October 26

The Feast of St. Demetrius, a Christian saint, is observed on October 26. In Bulgaria it is also celebrated as Dismissal Day. According to legend St. Demetrius is the patron saint of winter and cold weather and is considered the elder brother of St. George, the patron saint of farmers. St. Demetrius is pictured as an old man, with a long, white beard (people believe that snow falls from his beard), who rides a red horse.

In northern parts of Bulgaria, this date is celebrated as Dismissal Day, since it marks the beginning of winter, when most agricultural activities will cease, all the helping hands hired for farming activities will be dismissed from their duties (temporarily), and work arrangements for the next year will be settled.

Many devout Christians in Bulgaria offer prayers in their local churches in honor of St. Demetrius.

❁ ST. MICHAEL'S DAY

St. Michael's Day is observed on November 8. St. Michael is also referred to as St. Michael the Archangel, or St. Rangel, by Bulgarians. Orthodox Bulgarians believe that he is the only advocate for the soul of the deceased in the kingdom of God. He is sometimes referred to as St. Michael, the Soul Reaper, and it is believed that people, as they near death, see him. It is popularly believed that people who die with smiles on their faces were visited by St. Michael and that he gave them a golden apple in exchange for their soul.

On this day ritual breads, similar to those prepared for burials and commemorations, are baked.

❁ ST. NICHOLAS DAY

Observed by: Bulgarian Orthodox Christians
Observed on: December 6

St. Nicholas is one of the most revered and celebrated saints. Popularly known as Santa Claus, he is considered to be the great patron of children. St. Nicholas is believed to be the ruler of water and all its inhabitants. In Bulgaria St. Nicholas, or St. Nicholay, is looked upon as the protector of sailors and fishermen, and there is an icon of St. Nicholas on every Bulgarian ship or boat. A story relates that St. Nicholas once helped a sailing boat packed with sailors by closing a hole in the boat with a live carp, thus saving them from drowning.

This date also marks the end of the autumn fishing season, so fishermen offer the fish caught on this day to St. Nicholas. After eating the first fish caught, they carry the rest of the fish home. Also wives of sailors immerse icons of St. Nicholas in the sea to ensure their husbands' safe return.

Ribnik, a carp dish baked with rice or wrapped in a casing of dough, is a favorite delicacy served on this day. Ribnik is baked with two loaves of bread and is then either blessed at home or at church. The carp is used because it is considered the servant of St. Nicholas. Before eating the food, the head of the family lights some incense sticks and waves them over the bread. Then he lifts the baked bread and breaks it into two pieces, keeping one half on the table and sharing the other half with everyone present. The fish head, which is in the shape of a cross, is buried inside the house to ward off evil, or is sewn in the caps of little children to protect them from evil. The food is kept on the table for the entire day and is shared with friends and neighbors.

Later the queen of roses gives the award for the most skillful rose picker of the year to the winner of the annual rose harvesting ritual, which takes place in the yards of the Institute of Kazanluk. A host of cultural and dance activities are also organized during the Festival of Roses, reflecting Bulgaria's cultural heritage.

Rites of Passage

❁ DEATH

The death of a person in Bulgaria is announced by the ringing of church bells, followed by wailing and mourning. After someone dies all the windows and doors in his or her house are kept open so the soul can leave. Also cups are placed upside down, and all the portraits and mirrors are covered with cloth.

In preparation for burial the body is washed with soap and water or water scented with basil leaves. The eyes of the deceased are kept closed, since Bulgarians believe that leaving the eyes open may cause the death of someone else in the family. The body is dressed in new clothes; young men and women are dressed in their wedding clothes for burial. The body is then placed under a canopy, since it is believed the soul will appear in front of God along with the canopy in which the deceased will be buried.

A special kind of bread is prepared that everyone at the funeral eats. Apples, breads, and dried fruit are buried with the deceased to provide food in the afterlife. Sometimes even money is placed in the pocket of the deceased. Also a number of rituals are performed to prevent the dead person from turning into a vampire, including burying a cross, a religious icon, or an incense stick with the body.

Introduction

❧ HISTORY

Burkina Faso has been populated since prehistoric times (12000–5000 B.C.E.), first by hunter-gatherers, then by the Bobos, farmers who migrated to this region from Mali. Traces of relatively permanent structures indicate that settlements were already in place between 3600 and 2600. Burial remains dated between 1500 and 1000 reveal the development of systematic spiritual beliefs as well as the use of ceramics, iron, and polished stones. Dogon relics have also been found in central and northern regions, but the Dogon left in the 15th century to settle in the sandy cliffs of Bandiagara, the capital of the Fulani Macina (also Massina) Empire. Around the same time, the empire-building Mossis from Ghana invaded the area and, after securing its borders, developed courts of law, administrative bodies, ministerial positions, and a cavalry to protect their realm. The cavalry proved to be critical in resisting the hostile advances of their Muslim neighbors and explains why, even today, Burkina Faso is one of the few West African countries that is not predominantly Muslim. In the southwest region of Burkina Faso (as well as in the Côte d'Ivoire) the remains of high walls have been found, but it is not yet known who built them.

In 1898 the French took over Burkina Faso, which was then known as Upper Volta. In 1904 they integrated it into French West Africa, but it became a separate colony in 1919, with François Charles Alexis Édouard Hesling as the first governor. In 1932 the French subdivided the land, giving little bits to Côte d'Ivoire (Ivory Coast), Niger, and Mali. They also “blackbirded” (kidnapped for use as plantation laborers) the people of Upper Volta and transported them to the nearby French colony of Côte d'Ivoire to work the plantations there. In 1947 Upper Volta was returned to its 1932 boundaries.

In the middle of the 20th century, when colonial rule was being challenged all over Africa, the people of Upper Volta also demanded their independence. Maurice Yaméogo (1921–93) of the majority Mossi group became the first president of liberated Upper Volta in 1960. His rule, thought by many to be unjust, was followed by two decades of military coups until a young and much-loved socialist Captain Thomas

Who Were the Blackbirders?

Blackbirders were colonists of the 19th and early 20th centuries who kidnapped people from their colonies (the blacks in Burkina Faso) for forced labor on their plantations. The victims, called kanakas, were abducted and forced to work on sugar and cotton plantations in Australia, Fiji, and the Samoan Islands. They were given nominal wages and often promised a return to their homes.

Sankara (1949–87) came to power. In 1984 he renamed Upper Volta Burkina Faso, which means “a land of honest people,” instituted wide-ranging reforms, and came down heavily on the tribal leaders and the elite of the country. In 1987 he paid for these reforms with his life. Captain Blaise Compaoré (b. 1951), a close associate of Sankara’s, came to power after helping to overthrow him.

Compaoré reversed all the policies that Sankara had initiated to benefit the disadvantaged. After the murder of journalist Norbert Zongo in 1998, the people held Compaoré responsible, and he became even more unpopular. Although the unhappy Burkinabé population missed Sankara and railed against Compaoré, he remained president in the early years of the 21st century.

GEOGRAPHY AND CLIMATE

Burkina Faso, one of the smallest countries in West Africa (about twice the size of the U.S. state of Colorado), is divided into 45 provinces. The population density is high, especially in the south and central parts. Most of the country (located at the edge of Sahel) is a vast central plateau with semi-arid, infertile soil. Its landscape is gently undulating, with a few hills, the last remains of a Precambrian massif (a block of the earth’s crust displaced without internal change). The southwestern area is a huge sandstone massif bordered by sheer cliffs 490 feet high.

Burkina Faso is landlocked by Togo, Ghana, and Benin to the southeast, Mali to the west, Côte d’Ivoire to the south, and Niger to the north. The northern part is desert with scarce vegetation, and this condition continues into the Sahara Desert to its north. The south has sugarcane fields and forests, where the slaves were forced to work. The east has green woodlands and undulating plateaus.

The French gave Burkina Faso its colonial name, Upper Volta, because of its three principal rivers, the Mahoun (Black Volta), Nakanbe (White Volta), and Nazinon (Red Volta), which flow through the central plateau. The Sourou is their main tributary. These rivers, which converge in Ghana, are impassable, being either completely flooded during the rainy season or dried up. Desertification and deforestation are the biggest threats to the country’s natural resources. Desertification has been speeded up by the droughts the country has experienced since 1970. For instance, there is a treeless 43-square-mile area around the capital city of Ouagadougou.

There are two seasons in Burkina Faso: the dry season (from November to May) and the wet season (from June to October). The time between March and June is perhaps the hottest. The dusty Harmattan winds that blow between December and February make people irritable and the atmosphere hazy. These winds are so called because they pick up dust while blowing over the Sahara Desert and deposit it in many West African countries, including Burkina Faso. People prefer to stay indoors until these winds stop blowing.

ECONOMY

Burkina Faso is a poor country. Around 80 percent of the country’s population is engaged in subsistence farming on the 14 percent of land available for agriculture. (Less than 10 percent is arable without irrigation.) Its fertility depends on the vagaries of the monsoons and the fragile quality of the soil. Overgrazing and deforestation have caused a lot of desertification and soil degradation, making soil quality even worse than it used to be. This, in turn, has determined patterns of human settlement, population density, and the entire economy. Cotton is the main crop, although sorghum, millet, maize (corn), peanuts, and rice are also grown. The business sector of the economy remains government-dominated and unprofitable. Though the government’s currency devaluation policies in 1994, along with the assistance of international agencies, led to an increase in exports and economic growth, Burkina Faso’s strained relations with its southern neighbor Côte d’Ivoire have adversely affected its economy. Many Burkinabés are suffering, and hundreds of thousands seeking employment in nearby countries, including Cote d’Ivoire and Ghana, have been expelled and are now refugees.

National Day of Forgiveness

In December 1998, a famous journalist Norbert Zongo and three of his friends were traveling about 50 miles away from Ouagadougou when they were shot dead, and their vehicle was burned. This tragic incident aroused the people’s anger, and the government used extreme violence to curb the rising antigovernment feeling after the journalist’s murder. The Committee to Protect Journalists (CPJ), activists, students, women’s groups, and later even bureaucrats, all united to protest and pressure Compaoré’s government to punish the culprits. March 30 then became the National Day for Forgiveness, as the government encouraged the people to forgive the crime. Whether anyone was ever punished for the murders is unknown.

❁ CULTURE AND LIFESTYLE

Despite coming from nearly 60 different ethnic groups, the people of this country are all Burkinabé at heart. The dominant groups are the Mossi (whose people have royal ancestors), the Bobos (who reside around the cities), the Sénufo, the Lobi, and the Fulani. Burkina Faso is one of the few western African countries that has remained predominantly non-Muslim. Most of these ethnic groups are non-Muslim and retain the animist beliefs of their ancestors. Some—mostly in the central part of the country, in the capital city Ouagadougou—are Christians. The Muslims are scattered in the remaining areas such as the second largest city of Bobo-Dioulasso. There are a number of foreign missionary groups (Muslim and Christian), who continue to proselytize, but religious affiliation is not a big issue; even the ruling party is composed of people from all religions.

The Mossi, Lobi, and Bobo boast several unique art forms, among them, elaborately carved masks, which are an important part of the lives and culture of most Africans. The masks are symbolic in nature and an integral part of customs, beliefs, and traditions. They are worn to mark important occasions—such as funerals, initiations, village purification ceremonies, and market day dances—as they have been for centuries. The Mossi tribe is famous for wearing huge (seven-foot high) red or white antelope masks while guarding certain fruits or at funerals. The Bobos wear striped butterfly masks in red, white, and black in order to tempt the deity Do (the son of god) while performing fertility ceremonies. The Lobis are known for preserving African traditions, including dyoro, the initiation ritual for young boys. They believe that their wooden carvings protect their families, which makes them hard to find on the market and, as a consequence, highly valued.

Each of the 60 different ethnic groups of Burkina Faso has its own musical tradition. The Mande people, who live in the southwest, are famous for their playing the balafon, a type of xylophone. Their balafons are usually made of wood, and vary depending on their makers; the Bwa, Sénufo, and Dagara peoples, for example, have their own distinctive types. The Fulani, who live in the northern region, are renowned for their complex vocal music, usually accompanied by equally intricate clapping percussion (a type of percussion provided by hand clapping).

The bendré is a very old type of membranophone—a percussion instrument made with a goat or sheepskin stretched taut across the open top of a hollow gourd—that may have been introduced during the reign of King Naaba Oubri, the founder of Ouagadougou. The music of the bendré is sacred, and different sounds can be produced by the lead drummer (benaaba) by striking the center or along the edges.

A stringed instrument popular throughout West Africa at least since the Malian Empire of the 13th century is the kora, which combines the features of the lute (it is played with the right hand) and the harp (it has perpendicular strings and a resonator). The resonator is half of a gourd with goat or calfskin stretched across it, perforated by two handles. At least some of its popularity is due to the fact that it is capable of being played in several different indigenous musical scales.

Although Burkina Faso has not yet produced a type of music for which it is known, it has produced a number of international stars in the world music scene, including Jean-Claude Bamogo (reggae), Tidiani Coulibaly and the Dafra Stars (well-known during the 1970s for their blend of Cuban music with West African), and Koudbi Koala's Saaba, who have popularized traditional Mossi music. Coulibaly and the Dafra Stars had to withdraw from their musical careers when they were unable to replace equipment provided by the state, putting an end to their performances of indigenous dust dances. A biannual event must have some of the credit for bringing Burkina Faso's musicians to the world's attention, the Semaine Nationale de la Culture (National Culture Week), a music festival started in 1983.

The Mossi storytellers, the griots, are also known as djeli (“praise-singers”) in Burkina Faso and, while they may have added some modern musical instruments to their performances such as electric guitars, they remain most important in their traditional role as oral historians. When called upon, they recite tribal histories and the genealogies of kings.

❁ CUISINE

The staple foods of Burkina Faso include millet, sorghum, rice, corn, peanuts, potatoes, beans, yams, and okra. Although meat is a rare treat in this poor country, protein is provided in the diet by eggs and fish, which are plentiful in the country's lakes and rivers. Most dishes in Burkina Faso are served with a sauce made from eggplant, okra, peanuts, fish, mutton, tomatoes, or beef. A stiff white gruel made of millet, sorghum, or corn flour, called to, usually accompanies a sauce. (In Bissa the porridge is called wu, while in Mooré it is known as sagabo.) A nutritious meal can be planned around pounded yams and plantains. A popular snack food sold by street vendors in towns is peanut rings, made of peanut butter with most of its oil squeezed out by hand, then rolled into rings and deep-fried. The peanut oil is saved for general cooking needs.

Néré seeds are highly valued because they figure prominently as seasoning in the many sauces favored

Fun Fact

The Harmattan winds that dominate the Sahara Desert are a continental part of the globe-encircling trade winds.

Fun Fact

The same instrument can have many different names, depending on the ethnic group and the language it speaks. The bendré, for example, is called a bara in Mali and a dumaa by the Hausa of Benin.

FESPACO Film Festival

Even though Burkina Faso is one of the poorest countries of the world, it is rich in theater, art, and film. When it comes to showcasing high-level filmmaking talent in African countries, it is West Africa's pampered child. The highly popular Le Festival Panafricain du Cinéma et de la Télévision de Ouagadougou (Panafrican Film and Television Festival of Ouagadougou, or (FESPACO Film Festival) is held late in February in Ouagadougou every odd-numbered year. Many FESPACO award-winning directors have gone on to win prestigious awards at the Cannes Film Festival. Burkina Faso's second largest city Bobo-Dioulasso hosts La Semaine Nationale de la Culture (National Culture Week) in April of the even-numbered years. Both contemporary and traditional forms of music, dance, and theater are featured at this popular cultural extravaganza.

by the Burkinabé, and the fermented seeds are also ground and rolled into balls called "African stock cubes," or soumbala. Bush rat is a delicacy (with or without sauce) in rural areas. The Burkinabé love yogurt and curdled milk products, and dates are very popular in the northern desert areas.

Although water is the usual liquid, dolo, a millet beer, and bissap, a drink made with hibiscus flowers, are often available in towns. A popular local soft drink called Zoomkoom (in Mooré zoom means "flour" and koom means "water") is made from a mixture of millet flour and water seasoned with ginger, lemon, and a lot of sugar.

Fun Fact

There is just one national newspaper in Burkina Faso, and it is only published in French.

NEW YEAR'S EVE/DAY

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: December 31–January 1

New Year's Day is one of the most celebrated holidays in the world, and in Burkina Faso there are celebrations all over the country. New Year's resolutions and vows of becoming more self-sufficient are accompanied by new hopes for prosperity. The day is marked by feasting and parties with family and friends.

INTERNATIONAL WOMEN'S DAY

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: March 8

This is a day of great significance for women around the world but especially for those living in developing nations. On Women's Day in Burkina Faso, women's rights groups renew their campaign in support of women's causes here. These groups include many autonomous international organizations such as Médecins sans Frontières (Doctors without Borders), which works to make medicines and treatment available to poor and victimized women. In 2003 the UNESCO Director came to Burkina Faso to give a lecture on the role of women in the sustainable development of African nations. Pauline Kaboré, one of the first women of Burkina Faso to benefit from a UNESCO literary program at the Center for the Education of Girls and Women in Africa (CIEFFA), was given a bronze medal on this day in 2003. She herself became a trainer and has devoted her life to the cause of emancipating other African women. She has set an example for women all over the world, especially in the countries of Asia and Africa, showing them the significance of the contributions they can make to their countries.

Every year similar developmental programs are held in Burkina Faso to highlight the plight and progress of the women of the country. In 2005 a global march to highlight women's rights was launched on International Women's Day. It was scheduled to finish in Ouagadougou in October 2005. Women from many third world countries participated. Their aim was to spread awareness about violence against women and the relevance and importance of gender equality throughout the 50 countries they visited during the march.

LABOR DAY

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: May 1

May 1 is celebrated as Labor Day to commemorate the important role played by workers. The May 1 observance of Labor Day has its origins in the international socialist movement of the 1880s. In 1889 the Second International, a consortium of socialist organizations, declared May 1 a day to recognize the importance of workers around the world and scheduled the first demonstrations and celebrations for the following year, 1890. They coordinated this observance with the strike called by the U.S. labor union the American Federation of Labor demanding an eight-hour workday.

In Burkina Faso all government offices, schools, and institutions are closed.

The most popular way of celebrating the holiday is drinking, and idle mopeds can be seen lined up outside the bars.

❁ EID AL-ADHA

Observed by: Muslims
Observed on: Tenth of Dhu al-Hijjah, the 12th month of the Islamic calendar

This is an important festival for all Muslims because it commemorates Ibrahim's willingness to sacrifice his son Ishmael to please God. In Burkina Faso on this day the Revolution Square (in the heart of the capital city of Ouagadougou) is filled with the noise of great rejoicing and festivities as thousands of Muslims gather to commemorate the end of the holy pilgrimage, or hajj, which is also marked on this day. The hajj to Mecca is a pilgrimage that every Muslim is expected to undertake at least once in his or her lifetime. This festival is also known as Tabaski, or La Fête du Mouton (French for the "Festival of the Sheep") in West Africa. The sheep refers to the ram that God substituted for Ibrahim's son at the last minute, thus sparing Ishmael's life. Prayer services and feasting are the order of the day for Muslims in Burkina Faso.

❁ EASTER

Observed by: Christians
Observed on: First Sunday after Lent

Easter celebrates the Resurrection of Jesus three days after his Crucifixion. This holiday, along with its satellite feasts and observances, is a very important Christian festival. Easter observances include attending special church services, giving gifts to children, wearing new clothes, and decorating and hunting for eggs, a symbol of rebirth, and the arrival of spring taken from ancient pagan fertility rites.

❁ MOULOUD

Observed by: Muslims
Observed on: Twelfth of Rabbi al-Awwal, the third month on the Islamic calendar

This day commemorates the birthday of the prophet Mohammad. For Muslims in Burkina Faso this is a very significant day. Cities and towns are decorated for the occasion, and sweets, distributed. Families and friends spend time together, and an air of brotherhood, love, and friendship prevails. Conservative Muslim sects disapprove of such celebrations because they believe they violate Muhammad's teachings and take attention away from devotion to Allah.

❁ ASCENSION DAY

The Feast of the Ascension is a day of special celebration for Christians all over the world. It commemorates Jesus' Ascension to heaven, which is believed to have occurred 40 days after his Resurrection from the dead on Easter.

❁ ASSUMPTION

Observed by: Christians
Observed on: August 15

The Christian Feast of the Assumption commemorates the Virgin Mary's elevation to heaven. It is an important festival for Catholics, because it reaffirms their belief in Jesus, who said that all devout Christians would find a place in the glory of heaven. This day is marked by feasts and prayer services in Burkina Faso's churches.

EID AL-FITR

Observed by: Muslims
Observed on: First of Shawwal, the 10th month of the Islamic calendar

The holy month of Ramadan comes to an end on this day and so does fasting. Muslims gather in mosques, offer prayers, and give alms to the poor. It is one of the most celebrated Muslim holidays. On this holy day, Muslims return to their daily lives after a month of fasting each day from dawn until dusk, and thank Allah for helping them to make it through the period of fasting and abstinence. Everyone wears new clothes and exchanges gifts with friends, relatives, and acquaintances.

Rites of Passage

COMING OF AGE

As in several other African countries, Burkinabés mark the transition from childhood to adulthood with circumcision for boys and genital cutting for girls.

Although female genital mutilation is illegal here, all but a few of the country's 50 ethnic groups practice female genital mutilation (FGM), and it is estimated that in the 21st century 70 percent of the country's women have undergone the procedures. Girls of the Mossi tribe are kept in seclusion during the circumcision period and taught about their motherly and wifely duties. This is followed by feasting and celebration. Among Muslim Burkinabés, female genital cutting is usually performed while the girl child is being named. Recent legislation outlaws FGM, and the government campaigns widely against the practice. The National Committee for the Fight against Excision (CNLPE) was set up in 1990 and carries out extensive educational work.

The boys of the Fulani tribe go through a test of their strength and manliness before being initiated into adulthood. This involves a ritual called sorro that requires hitting each other with sticks, during which they cannot show any pain.

MARRIAGE

Because of widespread teenage pregnancy and complications, the government has worked to eradicate the practice of marrying young girls to older men. Traditionally the groom's family pleads for the girl's hand, and if she and her family accept, the ceremony takes place.

Polygamy is common in the rural areas of Burkina Faso. The wives live in separate quarters from their husband and take turns cooking and enjoying the "wifely rights" of being with the husband. Fulani women are not allowed to utter the name of their in-laws or their first-born children.

Introduction

❧ HISTORY

From the 16th century Burundi was an independent monarchy, but little else is known about its history. Some legends say that Ntare Rushati, who founded the first Burundi dynasty, came from Rwanda during the 17th century, while more reliable sources say that he came from Buha and started his kingdom in the region of Nkoma.

In the 19th century European nations were scrambling to colonize the richest parts of Africa for themselves, and Burundi initially fell to the Germans in 1903, becoming part of German East Africa. Following World War I in 1919 the Belgians gained control of both Burundi and neighboring Rwanda. After World War II Burundi became a UN Trust Territory, although Belgium continued to control the nation's affairs. The unhappiness of the Burundians under Belgian domination led to several military coups, paving the way for Burundi's eventual independence in 1962.

Independence, however, far from ending political instability in the region, only served to intensify the antagonism of the two hostile ethnic groups, the Hutu and the Tutsi. Since the minority Tutsi dominated the bureaucracy (including the civil service) and the army, the majority Hutus were left feeling powerless.

In 1993 a Hutu banker, Melchior Ndadaye (1953–93) of FRODEBU (Front for Democracy in Burundi) won 60 percent of the popular vote in Burundi's first democratic presidential election since independence in 1962 and replaced President Pierre Buyoya (b. 1949), a Tutsi. However within 100 days Ndadaye was kidnapped and assassinated in a coup d'état by the Tutsi military, triggering civil war. Thousands of Tutsi civilians were massacred by the enraged Hutu, and the Tutsi military retaliated by slaying hundreds of thousands of

Who Are the Tutsi?

The Tutsis (also known as Watutsi or Batu) were the cattle-rearing peoples of Central Africa who originated in Ethiopia and migrated to Burundi and Rwanda. In the places they settled they developed kingdoms headed by a mwami, or king. The Tutsis were aristocrats who controlled their Hutu compatriots, a situation that eventually led to extreme ethnic violence in Burundi, Rwanda, and Congo.

Hutu. After still more turmoil and bloodshed Buyoya resumed power in 1996 the result of a coup. In 1998 he revised the constitution, enlarging the National Assembly (the lower chamber of Parliament) and introducing a system with two vice presidents, one Tutsi and the other Hutu.

Nonetheless in spite of these efforts at compromise, since 1993 an estimated 200,000 people have been killed in ethnic violence in Burundi, and 800,000 refugees have been forced to flee to Tanzania, while the number of internally displaced people (IDP) remains around 525,000. The IDP are those people who have fled their homes as a result of war and human rights violations. These people are not technically refugees because they have not crossed the international border. The number of IDP is rising in the war zones, and the problem is, in fact, graver than that of refugees. These people often run away to inaccessible areas in order to survive; however their status only makes it more difficult and sometimes impossible, to help them.

There is an acute shortage of electricity, water, food, and medicine. Approximately one out of every 10 adults has HIV/AIDS, and only half the children are fortunate enough to get an education. The Hutu rebels and the FDD (Forces for the Defense of Democracy) stage ongoing guerrilla warfare, and the government supports 61 detention camps for the Hutu. The war has had other effects as well. Burundi is a source country for children trafficked for the purpose of forced soldiering. The capital city and foreign nationals are the usual targets of the rebels.

Attempts at peace became slightly more effective in 2000, when a draft accord was signed under sponsorship of Nelson Mandela, the former president of South Africa. However there are many more issues to be negotiated before the conflict can be resolved to the satisfaction of those involved.

On August 19, 2005, Pierre Nkurunziza (b. 1963), chairman of the National Council for the Defense of Democracy-Forces for the Defense of Democracy (CNDD-FDD), running unopposed, became president. The CNDD was an ethnic Hutu rebel group that has transformed itself into a political party. Its victory generated hopes that government will be able to transform this country.

GEOGRAPHY AND CLIMATE

Burundi is a landlocked country with Tanzania to the east and south, the Democratic Republic of the Congo to the west, and Rwanda to its north. The central region is made up of plateaus sloping toward the Tanzanian east as well as the valley of the Malagarasi River, where coffee, tea, and plenty of savanna grass are grown. The Nile's southern tributary brings life to valleys and hills draped in banana groves, eucalyptus trees, cultivated fields, and pastures.

The climate of Burundi is that of a tropical highland, though temperatures fluctuate with changing altitudes. The average temperature is 72°F in the central plateau region, while it can rise to 81°F in the capital city of Bujumbura. The annual cycle of seasons includes a long dry season from June to August, a short wet season from September to November, a shorter dry season from December to January, and another long, wet one from February to May.

ECONOMY

About 90 percent of the population depends on subsistence-based agriculture, though food shortages are common. Growing and selling coffee constitute the economic spine of Burundi (80 percent of total foreign exchange). This effectively means that Burundian foreign exchange is dependent on fluctuations in the climate (for coffee growth) and the international market (for demand) for coffee. It is through Bujumbura, a major shipping center, that coffee and items such as, cotton, leather hides, and tin ore are exported via river. Because the nation has been engrossed in major ethnic wars since 1993 it has been impossible for the warring, victimized, and displaced farmers and herders to perform well on the economic front. The 250,000 dead and 800,000 displaced have had a devastating impact on the economy. There is also a shortage of medicines and electricity because the manufacturing sector is poorly developed, and there is a general lack of resources. Burundians make shoes, blankets, and soap, assemble imported components, and process food items on a small scale.

CULTURE AND LIFESTYLE

Burundi is a Central African nation closely linked with Rwanda, geographically, historically, and culturally. Although it is one of the smallest countries in Africa, it is one of the most populous, with a density of nearly 280 persons per square mile. Three ethnic groups live in Burundi: The largest tribe (about 85%) is the Hutu, who are farmers; the Tutsis, who raise cattle, represent between 10 and 15 percent of the population; the Twa people (the remaining 1 percent) are hunters-gatherers.

In spite of their small numbers the Tutsi have controlled the government through most of the nation's history. Originally however Burundi was a kingdom that was ruled by people belonging to both tribes. They spoke the same language and lived together in the same area. Inter-marriage between the Hutu and the Tutsi was commonplace. Their differences in earlier times were manifested in socioeconomic terms. Being Hutu or Tutsi had to do more with one's social status (in terms of the social hierarchies) than with ethnic identity. In their language (Kirundi), the word butu implies a subordinate position in society or denotes a farmer or herder. Some Europeans exploited these social distinctions for colonial gain. Years of strife between the two tribes has increased local hostility and eradicated human rights in the country. Due to the constant violence, many people are forced to live in camps.

In spite of decades of a genocidal civil war Burundi is home to the internationally known Master Drummers of Burundi, former royal percussionists. The Master Drummers inspired the first WOMAD (World of Music, Arts, and Dance) festival in 1982, igniting the world music scene. Burundian men's folk songs are also notable for their inanga accompaniment. (The inanga is a stringed instrument much like the zither.)

Though ethnic differences persist, people remain trusting and interdependent within their families, and children are taught to take care of their elders. Each extended family lives in an enclosed compound called a rugo, which is surrounded by high hedges or walls made of reeds. Each rugo contains beehive-style huts, although these are being increasingly replaced by rectangular clay homes.

The Kirundi language offers a rich oral literature of riddles, poetry, tales, and proverbs, much of which has been translated into French. The tradition has remained oral since all literate Hutus were executed in 1972 in a bid to curb their progress in writing and recording the literature of their own lives.

❁ CUISINE

The people of Burundi rely on red kidney beans, rice, cassava (manioc), corn, and sorghum as their staple foods. Beans are eaten at least once a day. Burundians also commonly eat yams, plantain, maize, and peas. There are abundant fish available from Lake Tanganyika, but meat and milk from cows is scarce.

Burundian food is stewed, boiled, or roasted over wood fires. Since deforestation is a major problem in Burundi, procuring wood for cooking is becoming increasingly problematic.

People living in urban centers have access to a wider variety of food, though restaurants remain few and are accessible only to the privileged. In Gitega and Bujumbura restaurants serve French, Greek, and Asian food (chapattis, rice, and spicy curries, for example).

A homemade banana wine called urwarwa is served with meals celebrating special occasions. Impeke, a home-brewed beer made from sorghum,

Hutu and Tutsi

The Hutus are traditional farmers who tend to be short, dark people belonging to the Bantu ethnic population, whereas the Tutsis are descended from pastoralist ancestors and tend to be taller, fairer, and slimmer. When ethnic violence broke out between the Hutus and the Tutsi, many deaths resulted from mistaken identity, as the physical stereotypes of the two groups are not entirely reliable indications of ancestry.

and Primus beer are also popular drinks. As a symbol of unity close family members and friends drink impeke from the same large container using straws.

Most Burundians make their own containers using the shells of various kinds of homegrown gourds for cooking, eating, and storing food. They also make drinking vessels and storage bins out of gourds.

❁ NEW YEAR'S EVE/DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: December 31–January 1

This is Burundi's most popular holiday, and the celebrations begin a week before January 1. Everyone cleans and decorates their homes. People purchase new clothes if possible and come together to feast and socialize with family and friends. The day is usually celebrated with drumming and dancing, with the young and the old, men, women, and children participating with equal zeal.

❁ DAY OF UNITY

Observed on: February 5

Living Conditions of Burundians

Burundi is an extraordinarily poor country. About 93 percent of the people live in rural areas, and only half of them have access to safe drinking water or sanitation facilities. Three people out of a thousand have telephones and access to newspapers. Only seven out of a thousand can afford their own television sets.

Fun Fact

Rearing livestock is a status symbol, and people who can afford to raise cows, sheep, and goats do not wish to eat them.

Fun Fact

Traditionally, Burundians do not have desserts or sweets with or following meals.

This day commemorates the hope of reconciliation between the Tutsi minority, who have been Burundi's historical rulers, and the Hutu, the majority tribe that was finally elected to power. Observances of Unity Day began in 1991, and two years later the country's first freely elected president Melchior Ndadaye replaced President Buyoya. Ndadaye's rule, however, lasted only a few months. He was killed in a coup, which was followed by bouts of ethnic violence, even though Ndadaye's party had seats in the military government that came to power. President Buyoya returned to power in 1998, and in his Unity Day speech of 1999 invited all Burundians—both those who have fled the country and those who are rebelling against the government—to unite in the monumental task of nation-building.

Fun Fact

Traditionally, Burundians were known for their hospitality. Any traveler who sought food and shelter for the night would be welcomed into a Burundian household. But the ethnic civil war and the subsequent environment of mutual hatred and mistrust have drastically affected this tradition.

People find it difficult to trust neighbors, and trusting strangers is even more difficult.

LABOR DAY

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: May 1

May 1 is celebrated as Labor Day, May Day, or Workers' Day in many parts of the world to commemorate the important role played by workers in their societies. It was declared a day of observance by the Second Socialist International in 1889, and first celebrated in 1890. The date was selected to coincide with a general strike in the United States called by the American Federation of Labor to win an eight-hour workday. In Burundi all government offices and business establishments, as well as schools, are closed. The day is characterized by labor union rallies, seminars, meetings, and speeches.

INDEPENDENCE DAY/NATIONAL DAY

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: July 1

On the first day of July 1962 Burundi obtained independence from a Belgian-administered UN Trust that governed Burundi after World War II. To celebrate their freedom every year several hundred people gather at the capital's City Park in front of the United Nations' peacekeeping mission headquarters. There they observe the celebrations, which include drumming, dancing, a military parade, and a marching band. Former rebels give speeches, as do prominent politicians. For reasons of security armed gunmen are stationed around the park to protect the celebrants.

Thus this day is also a reminder to Burundians of the challenges of returning to normalcy after 11 years of civil war. The fact that so many foreign troops (first from the African Union's peacekeeping mission and later from the UN peacekeeping mission) are needed in Burundi is upsetting for most citizens. Though the ceremonies last a whole day and briefly distract the hostile groups of the city, Burundians live with the reality of major socioeconomic and security problems that have yet to be resolved.

VICTORY OF THE UPRONA PARTY

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: September 18

Prince Louis Rwagasore, the son of Mwami (King) Mwambutsa IV, was a leader of the anti-colonial movement and founder of the nationalist movement, Union for National Progress (UPRONA). In September 1961 Rwagasore and UPRONA, on a platform calling for full independence from Belgium, won 80 percent of the vote in parliamentary elections. The day after the election Rwagasore was named prime minister with a mandate to lead the country to independence. Two weeks later he was assassinated, dying eight months before independence was won. In remembrance of these events there is a Mass in the Bujumbura Cathedral, and garlands are laid on the burial chamber of the prince. The recorded speech of the prince on winning the mandate for independence (on September 18, 1961) is also played for the benefit of citizens. On September 18 the Tutsi-dominated UPRONA party celebrates its election victory in Burundi on this date in 1961, which paved the way for independence.

UPRONA continued to be the nation's only political party until 1992, when a multiparty political system gained support. In spite of a defeat in the 1993 elections UPRONA was restored to power later as the result of a coup.

❁ ANNIVERSARY OF PRINCE RWAGASORE'S ASSASSINATION

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: October 13

Prime Minister Prince Louis Rwagasore became an undisputed symbol of unity when he married a Hutu woman even though he himself was a Tutsi. He was the eldest son of King Mwambutsa IV (1912–77), leader of the UPRONA (Union of National Progress) party and an intellectual who was educated in Belgium. When the country was to gain its independence from Belgium in 1962, the assumption was that Prince Rwagasore would lead the new government. However he was assassinated shortly after being elected, triggering unprecedented ethnic violence in Burundi. The loss of a charming leader and a descendent of the royal family, who had the legitimacy and personality to rule, threw the country into turmoil. With Rwagasore's death and a revolution in neighboring Rwanda (where majority Hutus had come to power), an influx of angry and frustrated Tutsi refugees from Rwanda brought out the ethnic hatred and suppressed violence of people in Burundi. On the anniversary of the prince's assassination Burundians lay garlands on the tomb of their cherished prince.

❁ NDADAYE DAY

Observed on: October 21

This day commemorates the assassination of Burundi's first elected Hutu leader. The presidential election of July 1993 was effectively a two-party affair. Hutus, led by Melchior Ndadaye of the Frodebu party, won the election to the highest post in the country for the first time. However Ndadaye was assassinated on October 21, 1993. A Tutsi president replaced Ndadaye, and the Tutsi continued to hold power in the early years of the 21st century. Because of the ethnic enmity and the fact that the Tutsis are in power, this day is quietly observed with a simple wreath-laying ceremony at Ndadaye's tomb.

❁ REPUBLIC DAY

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: November 28

On this day in 1966 the First Republic of Burundi (1966–76) was established, and the UPRONA party was declared the only legitimate party in the country. Prime Minister Michael Micombero (1940–83), a Tutsi, overthrew Mwami Charles Ndizeye Ntare V (1947–72) to establish Tutsi supremacy.

Religious Holidays

❁ EASTER

Observed by: Christians
Observed on: First Sunday after Lent

For Christians Easter is considered the most important Christian festival, and its numerous celebrations and observances form the core of the liturgical year, which begins around the time of the vernal equinox in the Northern Hemisphere (the autumnal equinox in the Southern Hemisphere) and stretches out into summer in the Northern Hemisphere (winter in the Southern Hemisphere). Easter celebrates the Resurrection of Jesus three days after his Crucifixion. Christians believe Jesus was the Son of God and died on the Cross to redeem humanity from sin. Apart from its religious aspect the Resurrection symbolizes the resurgence of hope and a fresh lease on life for all human beings. Christian Burundians observe this day by attending special Easter church services.

❁ ASSUMPTION

Observed by: Christians
Observed on: August 15

This day celebrates the Assumption of the Virgin Mary into heaven. In the Roman Catholic Church, this day is called the Feast of Assumption. The emphasis is on Mary's elevation to paradise, which happened just as Jesus had promised all people. The story of Mary's Assumption is not found in the Bible, but in folklore and apocryphal stories. The written records of this event go back as far as the third century. Burundians visit the Shrine of Our Lady of Peace in Mugera and hold prayer services to commemorate this day. People are reminded that Mary was an apostle of peace and love and that Christians need to ignore the ethnic differences in Burundi and live by Christian principles instead.

Rites of Passage

❁ COMING OF AGE

Circumcision for boys, a sign of adulthood, is widely practiced in Burundi. Genital cutting for girls, though illegal in some areas, is still fairly common, and is considered a sign of virginity and sometimes a status symbol. These circumcisions and genital cuttings are generally done in unhygienic conditions and without any medical supervision.

Female circumcision is widely criticized by Western industrialized countries, and many African nations have banned this coming-of-age ritual, which mutilates a girl psychologically as well as physically. Circumcised women often face painful problems during menstruation, pregnancy, and childbirth. Some eventually die from the recurring infections that result from the procedure.

❁ MARRIAGE

For the 93 percent of Burundians who live in rural areas, polygamy is common, despite city laws that prohibit it and Christians who preach against it. In some areas, fining polygamists is a good source of revenue for the government.

For a man to have as many wives as cattle is a kind of a status symbol, as well as a sign of wealth. Second wives have a second-class status in the household, and first wives have great power in determining how they are treated. If the first wife decides to go to court, she is likely to win the case, along with a good part of her husband's property. Property (as in a house) belongs to an entire family, and a husband cannot sell the family house without obtaining the consent of his children and wife.

In southwestern Burundi, men are so scarce—some were expelled to Tanzania, most went to war—that the women give cattle to woo men into marriage (a reversal of their own tradition). Some men justify their polygamy by saying that they are rehabilitating widows by marrying them. Women's groups in Burundi that have staunchly opposed polygamy seek to educate women about their rights and advocate financial independence for women.

Introduction

❧ HISTORY

There is scant information about the inhabitants of Cambodia prior to 1000 B.C.E. It is believed that the earliest peoples subsisted on a diet of fish and rice and lived in houses built on stilts. However, war, vandalism, looting, and the violence since the 1960s have destroyed many archaeological sites and made continued excavations impossible.

From the first to the fourth centuries C.E. major parts of Cambodia were integrated into the Southeast Asian kingdom of Funan, which played a vital role in developing the political institutions, culture, and art of later Khmer states. Starting with the leadership of Fan Shih-man (r. 205–25), the Funanese extended their control and by the third century inhabited the region around the lower Mekong River. An Indian Brahmin, however, gained control of Funan in the fourth century, bringing Hinduism, the Indian legal code, and a central Indian alphabet to the region.

Khmers from a rival northern state retook Funan in the sixth century and, as the Khmer Empire grew more powerful, Cambodia once again dominated Southeast Asia. The capital of the new empire was Angkor, which remains among the world's greatest architectural accomplishments. The Angkor Borei region in Takeo province, for example, is famous as the cradle of one of the earliest civilizations in mainland Southeast Asia, and it is said to have contained multiple urban centers. Among these are Oc Eo (in modern Vietnam) and Angkor Borei (in modern Cambodia). Brief excavations at Oc Eo in the 1950s revealed a complex system of water control and rich material culture, but vandalism has largely destroyed the site. Angkor Borei faces the same threat of destructive vandalism seen at Oc Eo.

It was the Angkorian era, which began in the eighth century, that raised the kingdom to the height of its artistic and religious power. The Thai kingdom of Ayudhya sent troops to Angkor in 1431; for the next century and a half, the Khmers were plagued by dynastic rivalries and continual warfare with the Thais. The Spanish and Portuguese, who had recently become active in the region, also played a part in these wars until resentment over their power led to the massacre of the Spanish garrison at Phnom Penh in 1599. A series of weak kings ruled Cambodia from 1600 until the French arrived in 1863.

Since 1802 Cambodia had been subordinated and jointly governed by Vietnam and Siam (now Thailand), and Cambodian kings could not be crowned without representatives of both kingdoms present. In 1860 King Ang Duong (1796–1860) died and his eldest son Norodom (1834–1904) was to succeed him, but the royal family nearly destroyed itself and the country was torn by rebellions. In 1861 Norodom, still uncrowned, fled the capital Oudong and a year later fled to Bangkok. After some political manipulation and the signing of a treaty that made Cambodia a French protectorate in 1863, the French forced King Norodom to sign another treaty in 1884 that turned his country into a colony.

The next four decades were generally peaceful. In 1941 the French installed 19-year-old Prince Sihanouk (b. 1922) on the Cambodian throne, a mistake on their part. The years after 1945 were filled with violence, strife, and considerable political turmoil. Around this time French colonial power was waning due to the Franco-Viet Minh War raging in Vietnam and Laos. Cambodia seized the opportunity and declared its independence from France in 1949, which became official in 1953, and King Norodom Sihanouk ascended the throne.

The Geneva Conference of 1954 led to an armistice providing for the withdrawal of all foreign forces from Cambodia. An agreement between France and Cambodia in December of that year severed the last strings of French control over Cambodian policy. Cambodia withdrew from the French Union in 1955 and was admitted into the United Nations later that year.

King Norodom Sihanouk abdicated in March 1955 in favor of his father Norodom Suramarit (1896–1960). Sihanouk subsequently formed the Popular Socialist party and served as premier. After Suramarit's death in 1960, Sihanouk's mother Queen Kossamak Nearireak assumed power, and Norodom Sihanouk assumed the new office of chief of state. (Interestingly, although other queens are listed, most "king lists" for Cambodia indicate that during the period between Suramarit's death and the first democratic elections (1960–93), the throne was unoccupied.) Throughout the 1960s Norodom Sihanouk struggled to keep Cambodia neutral as the neighboring countries of Laos and South Vietnam came under increasing Communist attack (due to the ongoing Vietnam War). Sihanouk permitted the use of Cambodian territory as a supply base and refuge by North Vietnamese and Viet Cong troops, while accepting military aid from the United States to strengthen his forces against Communist infiltration.

In 1975 the Khmer Rouge, led by Pol Pot (1925–98), seized control of Phnom Penh. The Khmer Rouge renamed the country Democratic Kampuchea and established Pol Pot as the premier. Immediately following the takeover, Phnom Penh was evacuated, and the populations of the country's urban areas were forced to move to rural areas and pursue agriculture. About a million and a half people died from harsh treatment, starvation, and execution by the Khmer Rouge over the next four years. Members of the upper, middle, and educated classes, as well as suspected enemies of the Khmer Rouge, were victims of the genocide. This destruction came to an end only with an invasion and occupation by Vietnam in December 1978, which drove the Khmer Rouge into the countryside but also started a civil war.

In 1987 talks began in Paris to try to settle this conflict. A peace treaty was signed by all of Cambodia's warring factions (including the Khmer Rouge, a Vietnamese-supported government led by Premier Hun Sen [b. 1952], and the followers of Norodom Sihanouk) on October 23, 1991. Sihanouk denounced the Khmer Rouge, who had resumed guerrilla warfare, aligned himself with Premier Hun Sen, and again became head of state.

Cambodia's first democratic elections were held in May 1993, supervised by a large United Nations peacekeeping mission. Royalists won most of the seats. Hun Sen's party came in second, and a coalition government with co-premiers—Prince Norodom Ranariddh (b. 1944), Norodom Sihanouk's second son, and Hun Sen—was formed. The Khmer Rouge, who had boycotted the elections, continued armed opposition, retaining control of substantial territory in the northern and western parts of the country. A new constitution reestablished the monarchy, and in September 1993 Sihanouk once more became king.

In 1996 the Khmer Rouge split into two factions, one of which came to an agreement with the government. Pol Pot was ousted and imprisoned by the remaining Khmer Rouge in 1997 and died in 1998; the Khmer Rouge subsequently lost most of its power. After fighting arose in July 1997 between the factions of Hun Sen and Prince Ranariddh, Hun Sen's forces declared victory and Ranariddh fled the country. He was replaced by Ung Huot (b. 1947). Prince Ranariddh returned to Cambodia in March 1998 and became an opposition candidate in the legislative elections held in July. Hun Sen's party (the Cambodian People's party) was the official winner of the disputed election, so he became the sole premier, while Prince Ranariddh became the president of the national assembly. Hun Sen has since continued to consolidate his control of the country.

Cambodia joined the Association of Southeast Asian Nations (ASEAN) in 1999. Elections in July 2003 failed to give Hun Sen's Cambodian People's Party the two-thirds majority needed to form a government, but the liberal and royalist opposition parties denounced the results, rejected a two-party coalition, formed the Alliance of Democrats, and insisted that the alliance be the basis for a three-party coalition. At present H. M. Preah Bat Samdech Preah Baromneath Norodom Sihamoni (b. 1953) is the titular ruler of the country.

❁ GEOGRAPHY AND CLIMATE

About 20 percent of the land area of Cambodia is used for agriculture. It lies completely within the tropics with its southernmost points slightly more than 10° above the equator. Cambodia shares international borders with Thailand and Laos on the west and the north, and Vietnam on the east and the southeast. The Gulf of Thailand lies to the southeast of the country. It has a coastline of 270 miles.

The dominant features of the Cambodian landscape are the Tonle Sap (Great Lake) and the Bassac River systems and the Mekong River, which crosses the country from north to south. The central plains are surrounded by densely forested and sparsely populated highlands, comprising the Elephant and Cardamom Mountains of the southwest and western regions; the highest mountain in Cambodia is Phnom Aural. It is 5,810 feet high and lies in the eastern part of this range.

The Mekong, Cambodia's largest river, dominates the geography of the country. The river originates in mainland China, flows through Myanmar, Laos, and Thailand before entering Cambodia. After traversing the country it continues further southeastward to its lower delta in Vietnam and to the South China Sea. Cambodia has a typical monsoon type of climate. There are two distinct seasons—a dry season from November to April, followed by six months of rain. Rainfall is highest between May and June and September and October. Temperatures may soar up to 104°F in April, while January is the coldest month of the year.

❁ ECONOMY

Cambodia is one of the world's poorest nations. Even before being plunged into civil conflict in the 1970s, Cambodia lacked significant industrial development and was largely dependent on agriculture. The country was self-sufficient with respect to food and produced exportable surpluses of its principal crops of rice and corn. Civil unrest, however, not only disrupted Cambodia's fledgling manufacturing industries, it severely damaged road and rail networks, virtually destroying every aspect of Cambodia's economy. Rice had to be imported, and production of its most profitable export crop, rubber, fell sharply.

The Khmer Rouge government had nationalized all means of production in Cambodia. Money and private property were abolished, and agriculture

Pol Pot

Pol Pot was born on May 19, 1925, in Prek Sbauv, Cambodia. As a young man he received his higher education in France, where he also had the opportunity to study left-wing politics. In 1953 he returned to Cambodia and joined the Communist Party, which he headed a decade later. Between 1975 and 1979, Pol Pot presided over a Communist regime in Cambodia known as the Khmer Rouge. His harsh utopian policies, partly inspired by Communism in China, forced 1.5 million Cambodians to their deaths due to malnutrition, illness, or sheer overwork. At least 200,000 more were executed as enemies of the state. The Cambodian revolution was one of the most murderous of the 20th century.

was collectivized. (Ownership was transferred to the people as a group, represented by the state.) The Khmer Rouge Four-Year Plan was a fiasco. Rice production rose slightly, but between 1976 and 1978 hordes of people died from malnutrition, overwork, and mistreated or misdiagnosed diseases. The Khmer Rouge executed almost anyone whom they suspected of being an enemy of the regime. The atrocities of the Khmer Rouge period nearly obliterated Cambodia's labor force.

After the Khmer Rouge was overthrown in early 1979, conditions gradually started improving. By the mid-1990s Cambodia had again achieved self-sufficiency in rice production and began to export small quantities. The country's infrastructure improved gradually in the 1990s, largely due to massive infusions of foreign assistance. Other sectors of the economy were less fortunate, however. By 1995 the country's economy as a whole was performing at only 40 to 50 percent of its pre-1970 capacity.

The poor, however, remain vulnerable to traffickers. In the 21st century Cambodia is a source, destination, and transit country for men, women, and children trafficked for the purposes of sexual exploitation and forced labor.

❁ CULTURE AND LIFESTYLE

Cambodia's population consists of many ethnic groups, but the Khmer are the largest segment. Other groups include Vietnamese, Chinese, Thai, and Burmese, as well as various hill tribes. The Khmer account for 80 percent of agricultural workers, while the Vietnamese and Chinese dominate the business sector of the economy.

Cambodia's official language is Khmer. The Khmer language is nontonal but has incorporated many words from Sanskrit and Pali. The Khmer alphabet uses 33 consonants, 24 dependent vowels, 12 independent vowels, and diacritic markers. Vowels may be written before, after, over, or under a consonant symbol. Vietnamese and Chinese dialects are also spoken. There is interpolation from European languages, particularly French, into Chinese terms and phrases. Fifty percent of Cambodia's population is illiterate.

The state religion of Theravada Buddhism was first introduced to Cambodia during the days of the great Angkor kingdom. It prospered, and for centuries monks were the only literate people. They resided in rural communities and performed the role of teachers. During the Khmer Rouge regime, Buddhism, including its architecture and its monastic communities, was almost totally wiped out and many of the temples and monasteries were destroyed. It was only after the political turmoil subsided that Buddhism was restored to its former importance in Cambodia although the days of architectural splendor may be over.

Cambodians greet each with a bow and a prayer-like gesture called a sompeab, which is initiated by the younger or lower-ranking person. Handshakes are also becoming more acceptable for greeting Cambodians. Level-headedness and calm behavior during a critical situation are extolled as virtues. Displays of bad temper or getting involved in brawls in public are frowned on. Because they are Buddhists, Cambodians do not celebrate their birthdays, and most people do not even know when they were actually born.

Cambodia's classical dance is derived from Indian court dance, which traces its origins to the apsaras (dancers). The traditions of Thailand and Java (in Indonesia) also influenced the music and dance of Cambodia. In the classical Cambodian dance, women, dressed in brightly colored costumes with elaborate headdresses, execute graceful movements accompanied by a local percussive ensemble known as the pinpeat. These orchestras include drums, gongs, and bamboo xylophones. In Cambodia's villages, the locals attend dramas performed by masked actors. Young and old enjoy traditional shadow plays performed by using black leather puppets to enact scenes from legendary tales. Folk dancing, popular in rural Cambodia, is performed to the accompaniment of drumbeats.

❁ CUISINE

Traditional Cambodian food is in many ways similar to its Chinese, Thai, and Vietnamese counterparts with a heavy emphasis on rice, noodles, salads, and spicy soups. There are two basic types of rice: an aromatic one that is used most often and a sticky rice found in many dessert dishes that are made with fruit such as duran. After rice, fish is the second most important food item. Cambodians eat it fresh, dried, smoked, or fermented in fish sauce or a paste (called prabok). When prabok is not used, a fermented shrimp paste (kapik) is often used. People also eat chicken, pork, and beef. A popular Khmer fish dish called amok is made with catfish steamed in a savory curry with a coconut base. Pork is used to make the popular sweet sausages called twab ko. There are a variety of curries (kari), including a sweet green fish curry and a spicy red chicken curry. Cambodians also serve a dish similar to fondue called yao bon, which is made with beef, shrimp, spinach, napa cabbage, and mushrooms that are dipped in a curry sauce instead of melted cheese.

The most common condiments and garnishes include ginger, lemongrass, chili, coriander, and mint. Cambodians love desserts, which they prepare with fruit or rice, often cooked in coconut milk and sweetened with palm sugar.

People use Western cutlery, chopsticks, and their fingers for eating. Rice flour is often used in cakes and pastries. In the cities the French influence is most evident. A variety of French breads and pastries—even the popular French frogs' legs—are widely available. Lunch is the main meal of the day and includes soup, which Cambodians consume simultaneously with rice, vegetables, and fish or meat.

Public/Legal Holidays

❁ NEW YEAR'S EVE/DAY

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: December 31–January 1

Although Cambodians have their own New Year's holiday (a three-day festival around the middle of April in the Gregorian calendar), they still observe the Western New Year as a public holiday as well, a custom probably traceable to Cambodia's history as a French colony. Cambodians spend this day with friends and family.

❁ NATIONAL DAY

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: January 7

This is a very important day in the political history of Cambodia. It commemorates the overthrow of the Khmer Rouge by Vietnamese troops in 1979, bringing to an end an era of bloodshed, massacre, genocide, and terror. In Cambodia the day is celebrated with parades and public speeches.

❁ INTERNATIONAL WOMEN'S DAY

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: March 8

This holiday is observed globally by women around the world in order to honor women's lives and draw attention to women's issues, especially violence against women, unequal pay and living conditions, and international prostitution. It is commemorated at the United Nations and is also an official holiday in many countries, including Cambodia. In Cambodia women's groups hold workshops and seminars to raise awareness about women's rights.

❁ CHAUL CHNAM

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: Mid-April

The Cambodian New Year, according to the lunar calendar, generally falls in mid-April at the end of the harvest season and is a three-day festival. Cambodian families visit wats (temples) on each of the three days, where they make offerings in hopes of good fortune for the New Year. On the first day of Chaul Chhnam, families clean and decorate their homes. On the second day it is traditional to give gifts (mainly new clothes) to one's elders and to the poor. On the third day the royal family visits the king in Phnom Penh to swear allegiance and wish him good health. Throughout the festival, it is traditional (especially for children) to splash one another with water and talcum powder. There are cultural events and sports competitions, including boxing matches, horse and elephant races, and a royal procession. The streets of towns and cities are decorated with lights.

❁ LABOR DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: May 1

May 1 is celebrated as Labor Day in many countries. In 1889 the Second International, a consortium of Socialist organizations, declared May 1 a day to recognize the importance of workers around the world, and scheduled the first demonstrations and celebrations for the following year 1890. They coordinated this observance with the strike called by the U.S. labor union, the American Federation of Labor (AFL), demanding an eight-hour workday.

After more than 100 years, it is still an important occasion to honor workers and laborers for their invaluable contributions to their societies. In Cambodia, where it is a public holiday, the day is celebrated with speeches and processions organized by the workers and the trade union leaders.

❁ CHRAT PREAH NENKAL

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: Early May

This public holiday is Cambodia's harvest festival. On this occasion a man and a woman from the royal family come out into the fields where they harness two cows to plough and sow a furrow. The cows are then released and allowed to feed from any of seven silver trays containing rice, corn, wheat, beans, grass, water, and alcohol. The choice of the cows predicts the coming growing season. If the cows eat the rice, corn, wheat, or beans, the next harvest will be bounteous; if they eat the grass, the crops will suffer that year. If they drink the water, it is a sign that rain will be plentiful. If they drink the alcohol, however, it is an omen of bad times to come.

❁ INTERNATIONAL CHILDREN'S DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: June 1

The origin of International Children's Day can be traced back to the 1925 World Conference for the Well-Being of Children, which took place in Geneva, Switzerland. Representatives from 54 countries attended the conference and produced the "Geneva Declaration Protecting Children," which focused on eradication of poverty, prevention of child labor, promotion of education, and other issues related to the welfare of children around the globe. Although the date of the observance may vary from one region to another, June 1 remains the most popular day, when the observance is celebrated in more than 21 countries.

In Cambodia too on this day children's welfare organizations and social workers hold seminars and conferences focused on improving the lives of the country's children. Games and sporting events are also held for the children themselves, at which they receive prizes and food packets.

❁ QUEEN'S BIRTHDAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: June 18

Queen Norodom Monineath Sihanouk is the consort of the former Cambodian ruler Norodom Sihanouk. Cambodians celebrate the birthday of their former queen on June 18. The capital city of Phnom Penh is festooned with portraits of the royal couple, and people gather in the streets to wish her majesty a long life. All businesses are closed on this day.

❁ PARIS PEACE AGREEMENT

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: October 23

This date commemorates the official end of the brutal civil war in 1991. The international talks regarding the future of Cambodia made progress when all the warring factions signed a treaty on this date. As a result of the treaty, the United Nations assumed the government's administrative functions and worked to implement democratic elections. In Cambodia the day is commemorated by civic ceremonies in the capital.

❁ BIRTHDAY OF KING NORODOM SIHANOUK

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: October 30–November 1

The octogenarian H. E. Norodom Sihanouk occupied the throne of Cambodia during one of the most turbulent periods of its political history. The people still venerate their former ruler, who abdicated the throne to his son on October 7, 2004. Sihanouk ruled Cambodia as its king from 1941 to 1955 and 1991 to 2004. Born on October 31, 1922, he has used the official title of king father of Cambodia since his abdication.

On the occasion of the former monarch's birthday (a three-day celebration), Phnom Penh's main streets and public parks are decorated with lights, and portraits of Sihanouk are displayed throughout the city. Newspapers carry illustrated articles about the former king, and the national television station broadcasts films and other programs. The royal palace is open to the public on Sihanouk's birthday, and there is a huge fireworks display in front of the royal palace in the evening.

❁ INDEPENDENCE DAY

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: November 9

On November 9, 1953, the country achieved independence after nearly 100 years of French colonial rule. The day is mostly celebrated in the capital of Phnom Penh. The present monarch makes a public appearance, mingling with the crowds, and the prime minister inspects a guard of honor on this occasion. The capital city is gaily decorated, and a festive atmosphere prevails; there is also a big parade with floats and marching bands that passes by the royal palace.

❁ BON OM TUK

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: Early November

This holiday celebrates the end of the rainy season and the reversal of the flow of the river Tonle Sap, the lifeblood of Cambodia. This unique natural phenomenon is celebrated throughout Cambodia. Every year in June, when monsoon rains cause the Mekong River to rise, excess water begins to flow into the Tonle Sap River. This causes the river to reverse its flow and drain into Tonle Sap Lake. The flow reverses again in the month of November, leaving behind vast quantities of fish. This provides a grand feast for Cambodians. The highlights of the festival are the three days of boat races, a tradition dating back to Angkorian times. Each boat is paddled by up to 40 oarsmen and elaborately decorated with serpent (naga) heads carved into the bow. Rural people travel to Phnom Penh to enjoy themselves and to compete in the races. Although there are similar boat races in other parts of the country, the biggest and most spectacular are those in the capital city. A carnival atmosphere surrounds the boat races, which are celebrated with food stalls, live music, dancing, and fireworks displays.

❁ UN HUMAN RIGHTS DAY

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: December 10

On December 10, 1948, the nascent United Nations General Assembly adopted the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, which has become a universally accepted charter for defending and promoting human rights. Human Rights Day is celebrated around the globe. The declaration states that "All human beings are born with equal and inalienable rights and fundamental freedoms."

Religious Holidays

❁ MAKKA BUCHA

Observed by: Buddhists
Observed on: February

On the full Moon day of the third lunar month (generally corresponding to February in the Gregorian calendar), Cambodians commemorate the sermon the Buddha delivered to 1,250 enlightened monks who had gathered to hear him. This event is marked by candlelit processions around the main shrines of all the temples (wats) in the country.

❁ VESAK

Observed by: Buddhists
Observed on: Last two weeks of May

This day, known locally as Vesaka Bochea, marks the three major events in the life of Siddhartha Gautama, the Buddha (the founder of Buddhism): his birth, his enlightenment, and his Mahaparinirvana (the quitting of his worldly body, or salvation). In Cambodia, as in other Buddhist countries, the faithful celebrate by carrying gifts of food and flowers to the local temples (wats), where they pray for good fortune and prosperity throughout the coming year.

❁ BONN DAK BEN

Observed by: Buddhists

Observed on: September–October

For two consecutive weeks Cambodian families remember their departed relatives by making offerings at the temples (wats). The 15th day of the festival, on the full Moon, is called Pchum Ben. This day is the most important of all. On this day Cambodians offer rice cakes (ben) and money to the monks and pray for the appeasement of dead souls. This ceremony closely resembles the pind daam ceremony of the Hindus (especially in India). A pind is a ball or lump of rice offered to the dead souls, to the accompaniment of chants and recitations from the Buddhist scriptures.

❁ ANGKOR WAT FESTIVAL

Observed in: Siem Reap

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: November–December

This festival was introduced to boost tourism in Cambodia and to reveal to the rest of the world the rich architectural treasures that are languishing and threatened due the impoverished condition of the country. The Angkor Wat—the largest religious monument in the world—was originally built as a Hindu funerary temple in the early 12th century and was later rededicated as a Buddhist temple. An architectural marvel with exquisite carvings and ornamentation, it is considered one of the Seven Wonders of the World and is a UNESCO World Heritage Site. Events include Buddhist ceremonies, concerts, and dance performances.

Rites of Passage

The official religion of Cambodia is Theravada Buddhism. The customs, practices, rites, and rituals of this sect vary from one country to another as well as from the other two schools of Buddhism, Mahayana and Vajrayana (Tantric). However, the basic rites are the same in most countries.

❁ BIRTH

Since most Cambodians are Buddhists, they practice the Buddhist rituals related to birth. When the expectant mother goes into labor, the family chants and recites passages from the Buddhist scriptures. The recital of prayers is intended to allay her fears. They may be also be uttered by her spouse to relieve his own anxiety.

Traditional Cambodian dancers perform at the closing ceremony of the annual Angkor Wat Festival in Siem Reap. Thousands of visitors crowd inside the temple grounds to watch performances by troupes from India, Vietnam, Laos, and Cambodia on a special stage built atop the ancient stone causeway that leads to the nearly 900-year-old temple. ❁ COMING OF AGE

The Buddhist monasteries and the monks who reside in them play a dominant role in the lives of the people in all Buddhist societies, including Cambodia. It is a common practice among Buddhists to have at least one son in the family (generally the oldest) ordained as a monk. The initiation ceremony of a boy into the monastic order is an important rite of passage, symbolizing the transformation of the boy into an adult. The initiation is accompanied by an elaborate celebration and festivities attended by the boy's parents, siblings, relatives, and friends. After the guests depart, the boy is tonsured and takes his monastic vows. He leaves home and takes up residence in the monastery (which might last anywhere from a few days to a few weeks), during which time he practices all the rituals of Buddhist monastic life. When the boy returns to his normal domestic life, he is considered an adult. He may relinquish domestic life and enter the monastery again in the future if he so chooses.

❁ MARRIAGE

In most Buddhist countries, including Cambodia, the couple's parents traditionally arrange the marriage. The underlying idea is that the parents, drawing from their life experiences, are best qualified to make the most suitable match for their offspring. It is also believed that, because marriages forge long-term links between families, the decision should be made by the elders in the families. Astrologers are consulted by the parents to fix an auspicious day for the formal wedding ceremony. In recent years, particularly in urban areas, young people have begun to rebel against these traditions, preferring to choose their own partners.

The wedding ceremony takes place in the bride's home. Although monks are usually invited to grace the occasion, they do not conduct the ceremony and are not crucial. Instead, a male relative of the bride is in charge of the ceremonies. All the rituals are performed before an image of Buddha profusely adorned with flowers and sticks of incense. The bride and groom exchange vows, promising to honor and respect each other. The couple present rings to each other; then the thumbs of their right hands are tied together. Alternatively, their wrists may be tied together with a silk scarf. This symbolizes their union as husband and wife. At the end of the ceremony, everyone present shares a celebratory feast. Sometimes the wedding celebrations go on for several days. Later at their convenience, the newlyweds visit the nearest monastery to seek blessings from the monks and respectfully listen to a sermon of the Buddha's teaching about an ideal married life.

❁ DEATH

A Buddhist funeral is a simple and solemn ceremony. Buddhists are not rigid about whether the body should be buried or cremated. They believe that when a person dies his or her soul is reborn somewhere else very shortly afterward. Only the Arahants, who have conquered all passions, will be released from the perpetual cycle of life, death, and rebirth and attain salvation (moksha or nirvana).

In Cambodia, while the dead body is being prepared for the funeral, the monks chant in order to release good energy. They also accompany the family members to the cremation or burial ground. After the ceremonies are over, the members of the bereaved family offer food and candles to the monks. This is done to satisfy the lingering spirit of the dead person, helping him or her toward a good reincarnation.

During the 14-day festival of Bonn Dak Ben (September–October), Cambodian families remember their deceased relatives by making offerings at the temples (wats). The 15th day, a full Moon day called Pchum Ben, is the most important day of all. On this day Cambodians go to the monasteries to offer rice cakes (ben) and money to the monks and pray for the appeasement of the dead souls.

Introduction

❁ HISTORY

Not much is known about Cameroon's history prior to the arrival of Europeans. It is believed that the Pygmy Baka tribe, one of the oldest cultures in some parts of Africa, inhabited the region. The highlands of Cameroon are considered to be the cradle of the Bantu language, although the Bantu were gone by the time Europeans found the region. The country owes its name to the Portuguese, who arrived in the area in 1472. At the sight of giant shrimp, they shouted with delight, "Camarões, camarões!" (Portuguese for "shrimp"); thus the region was named Cameroon. The Portuguese, however, did not stay in the area long. In fact for the next 400 years, the northern region of Cameroon was a battlefield for empires such as the Kanem-Bornu in Chad, while the southern region was the hub of the slave trade.

At the time of the arrival of the Germans in the late 19th century, the Fulani Empire in Sokoto (Nigeria) controlled the northern area of Cameroon. Shortly afterward Germany took charge of the region. Although they built schools, plantations, and railways, the Germans treated the plantation workers brutally. In fact on one of the plantations, one-fifth of the workers in a single year were reported to have died due to overwork.

On June 28, 1919, after the German defeat in World War I, the French established their control over 80 percent of the region, and it became known as French Cameroon, while the British took control of southern Cameroon and a small area in the north. In 1960 French Cameroon was granted independence after the people of the region expressed their desire to be a free country.

Ahmadou Ahidjo (1924–89), a northerner, became the first president of the new republic. He entered the political scene of Cameroon in the 1940s during the pre-independence era and played an active role in persuading the French to grant independence to the region.

A rift between the northern and southern Cameroonians led to a bloody battle, which was finally stopped by French military intervention. The northern Cameroonians of British Cameroon expressed their desire to be part of Nigeria and voted accordingly in 1961. The rest of the region (the southern part of British Cameroon and French Cameroon) came together and formed a unified republic in 1972. In 1975 Ahidjo was once again voted to power and began making investments in agriculture, health care, roads, education, and the like. But he also established an autocratic regime, which led to an era of repression. All political parties were banned, and their leaders imprisoned. In 1982 Ahidjo resigned and appointed Paul Biya (b. 1933), a southerner, to be his successor.

The next year, Biya decided to split Cameroon's Grand North into three provinces, the Adamawa, the North, and the Extreme North and dismissed the ministers who had served in Ahidjo's cabinet, charging that several had been involved in an attempt on his life. The alleged plotters were tried and found guilty in 1984. Ahidjo escaped to Paris and, shortly thereafter, northern members of Cameroon's Republican Guard attempted a coup, but also failed.

In 2002, a dispute between Cameroon and Nigeria over the ownership of the Bakassi Peninsula was resolved by the International Court of Justice, which decided in Cameroon's favor. The region had been a source of friction between the two countries because oil had been found there.

❁ GEOGRAPHY AND CLIMATE

The boot-shaped nation of Cameroon is located in the western part of Africa. It is flanked by the Central African Republic and Chad to the east; the Republic of Congo, Equatorial Guinea, and Gabon lie to the south; Nigeria borders Cameroon in the north and west, with the Atlantic Ocean along the western coast.

Topographically, Cameroon has three distinct parts: the northern savannahs (grassland dotted with trees, grasses, shrubs, and other forms of vegetation), northwestern hill regions, and the eastern and southern rainforests. A major portion of the country's population is concentrated near the towns of Bafoussam and Bamenda with their fertile volcanic soil. Mount Cameroon is the country's most striking topographical feature.

The region is also reported to have serious volcanic activity as was evident by the leak of poisonous gas from Lake Nyos in 1986, which killed 1,700 people. The Bénoué, the Wuori, the Sanaga, and the Nyong rivers flow through Cameroon.

Rainfall varies from region to region. While the extreme north receives scanty rainfall, heavy downpours are commonplace in some parts there. In fact, Cameroon is known to have one of the wettest climates on Earth with an average rainfall of 152 inches. The average maximum temperature varies from 70°F to 75°F, while the average minimum temperature remains between 66°F to 70°F.

❁ ECONOMY

Following independence, Cameroon's economy boomed for a considerable period of time. Exports reached an all-time high, and the country was one of the most prosperous nations in Africa. However, in the mid-1980s, faulty economic policies, accompanied by a drop in the prices of its principal commodities such as coffee, cocoa, and oil, and inflation forced the country into a decade-long recession.

The government tried to revive the economy by initiating pro-market economic reforms, and the International Monetary Foundation and the World Bank are assisting but continue to press for additional reforms, including increased transparency in budgeting, privatization, and poverty reduction programs. Another problem the government must find ways to deal with is the traffic in people for purposes of sexual exploitation and forced labor and prostitution. Cameroon is a source, transit, and destination country for women and children trafficked for the purposes of sexual exploitation and forced labor. Most trafficking is internal and children are at greatest risk.

❁ LIFESTYLE AND CULTURE

Cameroon is home to more than 130 ethnic groups. The five most prominent among them are: Kirdi and Fulani in the north, the Bamoun and Bamiléké in the west, and the Ewondo around Yaoundé. The Bamiléké enjoy a formidable position in the western region and are one of the largest communities in Doula. They are organized into more than 80 political units, each led by a chief who is the custodian of ancient customs and traditions. Also, there are a number of secret societies in each unit that share responsibility for the preservation of ancient rituals.

The Punu tribes live in small villages along the Ogowe River Basin. Each village has several lineages, and its head inherits the leadership of the village matrilineally (by descent through the female line). In contrast, the Bamoun have a single ruler they refer to as "sultan."

Although English and French are the official languages, Cameroonians prefer to use their native dialects. The three main language groups of the region are the Semi-Bantu languages of the west, the Bantu languages of the south, and the Sudanic languages of the north.

Each ethnic group has its own way of life and culture and adheres to its traditions and customs. Even today, 40 percent of the population still holds onto its indigenous beliefs, including vodun. The influence of Christianity and Islam is also evident,

Secret Societies

Masks are an integral part of kwifoyn, the tribal secret societies in Cameroon. Membership in these societies is reserved almost exclusively for men, and members of the kwifoyn take great pride in serving these societies. They are the custodians of Cameroon's ancient traditions and customs and ensure that people adhere to the traditional way of life. They also preside over ceremonial rituals that honor the ancestral spirits.

however. Christians make up 40 percent of the population; Muslims account for 20 percent.

For the indigenous cultures of Cameroon, music and dance are an integral part, especially in religious observances and rituals such as initiation and funerals. Makossa is the most popular style of music in Cameroon. It originated from a popular dance form in the Cameroonian city of Doula, known as kossa. It is an adaptable form of music that can be easily played on the guitar and thumb pianos. Bikutsi is another popular type of dance and music that is traditionally sung in Yaounde. Sculpture, woodcarvings, and wooden masks are some of the popular art forms of Cameroon. The masks made by the Punu tribe are famous for their size, style, and designs. These masks are almost 12 inches tall and 8 inches wide. Since white has been traditionally associated with antiwitchcraft powers, most of the Punu masks are white.

❁ CUISINE

In Cameroon, feuille, or manioc leaves (also called cassava and yucca), features prominently on the menu and is a chief ingredient in most traditional sauces and stews. Sauces are traditionally accompanied with riz (rice) and a mashed potato-like substance that appears in three forms: couscous, fufu, or pâte. These dishes can be made from corn, rice, manioc leaves, or even banana. Grilled chicken and fish are popular meats in Yaounde, and there are many stewlike dishes that combine meat and greens with a peanut butter sauce.

Bananas are a major cash crop in Cameroon, and they are used in numerous ways; when very ripe, they can be mashed and used to make banana bread. Yams are a staple food in many African countries, and Cameroon is no exception. The word yam comes from the Fulani people of Cameroon and the Congo, whose word for 'eat' is nyami. Unlike the yams or sweet potatoes in the United States, African yams are white or pale yellow in color. Both yams and plantains are sliced about one-quarter-inch thick and fried, and can be found for sale as snack foods in markets throughout sub-Saharan Africa. Depending on one's taste, they can be coated with powdered ginger and/or cayenne before frying and then salted, sprinkled with salt and hot sauce (Tabasco works!) after frying, or, if a sweet snack is preferred, they can be sprinkled with sugar and cinnamon.

❁ NEW YEAR'S EVE/DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: December 31–January 1

January 1 marks the beginning of the Western (Gregorian) calendar and is celebrated as New Year's Day

Vodoun

Vodoun (or Voodoo) is probably one of the world's oldest religions; it is thought to be nearly 10,000 years old. Although its essential wisdom originated in different parts of Africa long before the Europeans embarked on the slave trade, the structure of Vodoun, as we know it today, originated in Haiti during European colonization. The word voodoo comes from the West African word vodoun, which means "spirit." This Afro-Caribbean religion incorporates rites and rituals of many African ethnic groups including the Fon, Nago, Ibo, Dahomeans, Senegalese, Haussars, Caplaous, Mondungues, Mandinge, Angolese, Libyans, Ethiopians, and the Malgaches.

in Cameroon. Festivities begin on New Year's Eve, the last day of December of the old year, when people gather in public places and participate in mass celebrations. Dance, music, food, and drinks flow freely as people party all night to welcome the new year. All government offices, schools, and colleges are closed on January 1.

❁ YOUTH DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: February 11

Youth Day, which recognizes the importance of youth in society and the contributions of young workers, is celebrated in Cameroon on February 11. On this day, special programs are held to educate the young people of Cameroon about their society and how their actions will shape the future. Special workshops, exhibitions, debates, and other related programs are organized to educate them about their duties and responsibilities, as well as to create awareness of health issues such as AIDS, smoking, and drinking. The prime objective of these programs is to create a morally strong and responsible younger generation.

The Role of Masks in Rituals

According to ancient beliefs, masks act as a regulatory tool, ensuring control over society and law and order. Masks are an integral part of tribal rituals followed by the tribal secret societies (kwifoyn). A member of the kwifoyn feels privileged when granted the right to own a mask. The Kom tribesmen, who inhabit the northwestern region of Cameroon, wear their masks on their heads, instead of on their faces.

✿ LABOR DAY

Observed by: General Public

Labor Day is celebrated with great enthusiasm in Cameroon. Because it is a national holiday, all schools, colleges, and public and private institutions remain closed. ✿ GOOD FRIDAY

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: Last Friday of Lent

This Christian festival commemorates the crucifixion of Jesus. It has been in the Christian liturgical calendar even longer than Easter has although no one is sure why it is called “Good” Friday. Some have suggested that the use of good in the name goes back to Old English and means “God’s Friday,” while others interpret good to mean something like “observed as holy.” This observance is also known as Black Friday and Sorrowful Friday, and in Eastern Orthodox churches it is called Great Friday.

For many years Good Friday was primarily a Catholic observance, but many Protestant churches now hold special services. Cameroon is home to both Roman Catholics and Protestants, and on Good Friday, devout Christians attend special church services that focus on the life and teachings of Jesus. Choirs singing hymns are a highlight of the celebrations while plays based on Jesus’ life are also staged. In Cameroon, some faithful Christians fast on Good Friday. When they eat, it is generally fish instead of meat.

❁ ASSUMPTION DAY

Observed on: August 15

Assumption Day commemorates the assumption of Mary, the mother of Jesus, into heaven. According to one legend, when Mary was on her deathbed at the age of 73, all the apostles visited her, except St. Thomas, who arrived a little late. However, when he arrived, Mary's body was nowhere to be found because she had been resurrected. It is believed that her soul and body were united at the Tomb in the Valley of Jehoshaphat (Mary's Tomb) and St. Gabriel took Mary's soul to heaven. Roman Catholics attend a special mass in local churches and offer prayers to the holy mother Mary while devotional hymns are sung by the choir.

❁ EID AL-FITR

Observed by: Muslims

Observed on: First of Shawwal, the 10th month of the Islamic calendar

Muslims all over the world observe a month-long fast during the holy month of Ramadan. It is believed that Allah himself revealed the Koran, the religious book of Muslims, to Muhammad during Ramadan. Hence, it is the holiest of the holy months for devout Muslims. The fast is observed from dawn until dusk and consumption of food and water, as well as sexual intercourse, is strictly forbidden during this period. In Cameroon, many restaurants are closed during the day and only open after dusk. Smoking and drinking are also strictly forbidden during Ramadan.

Eid al-Fitr, also known as Djoulde Soumae, marks the end of Ramadan and fasting on this day is strictly forbidden in the Koran. Muslims rise early on this day and eat a light meal. ❁ EID AL-ADHA

Observed by: Muslims

Observed on: Tenth of Dhu al-Hijja, the 12th month of the Islamic calendar

Eid al-Adha is celebrated in honor of Abraham's readiness to sacrifice his own son on God's command. However, just as Abraham was about to kill his son Ishmael, God replaced the young boy with a ram. In Cameroon, schools, colleges, and government institutions remain closed on Eid al-Adha (Tabaski). In the morning, Muslims offer prayers in the local mosque with friends and family. Then, a big feast is prepared and people exchange gifts.

In the north and northwestern parts of the country, a parade of the Marabouts is the main highlight of these festivities. Marabouts are village wise men and fortune tellers who are held in high esteem in this region. Also, the holy pilgrimage (Hajj) takes place during this month. All Muslims who are physically and financially able to do so are directed by the Koran to undertake this journey at least once in their lifetime. It is the fifth pillar of Islam. At the end of the journey, the pilgrim must make a sacrifice and the men also have to have the top of their heads shaved.

❁ MOUNT CAMEROON RACE

Observed by: General Public

Observed in: Mount Cameroon

Observed on: January 2

Mount Cameroon, situated in the western part of the country, is a stratovolcano, locally known as Mount Faka, or the Chariots of the Gods. A stratovolcano is a tall conical mountain made up of hardened volcanic ash and lava. The Mount Cameroon race is an annual event held on January 2, the day after New Year's. It is the first cultural event of the year in Cameroon and is one of the most difficult footraces in Africa as the 26-mile stretch requires an athlete to go up and down the 10,000-foot mountain. Every year, thousands of participants from all over the world arrive to participate.

✿ GBAYA ANNUAL FISHING FESTIVAL

Observed by: All Gbaya Villages

Observed in: Cameroon

Observed on: March

On a signal given by the wabdo, a representative of the Gbaya secret society, everyone throws packets of do into the Mbere River. Do is a mixture of various bark and “rounded” plants that intoxicates the fish; their eyes become brighter and they lose their sense of direction. Thus disoriented, they drift toward the dam and hurdles the people have set up downstream. The intoxicated fish are easy to catch and the Gbaya fill their baskets until the effects of the do begin to wear off. The fish are dried and smoked beside the river, and then there is a great feast in the village, with the chief receiving the largest share. All the villagers receive a dish, as do the village ancestors, to thank them for a good harvest as well as to show hope for an equally good harvest of fish in the next year.

Fun Fact

In 2003, history was made in the Mount Cameroon race when a one-legged man, Ngeve Zache Etutu, became the first disabled person to successfully complete the challenging race.

✿ CAMEROON INTERNATIONAL THEATRE FESTIVAL

Observed by: General Public

Observed in: Yaounde

The Cameroon International Theatre Festival (CITFEST) is an annual event held in Cameroon’s capital, Yaounde. Founded in 1990, CITFEST was initiated by noted Cameroonian actor and director, Ambroise Mbia, who was appointed the Secretary General of the Second World Black and African Festival of Arts and Culture (FESTAC), which took place in Lagos (Nigeria) in 1977.

The objective behind the event is to facilitate the exchange of cultural ideas and traditions as well as to showcase and promote traditional African performing arts. This event serves as a gateway to ancient African performing art forms such as dance, music, theater, and costume. The main events include workshops on dramatic writing, stage directing, seminars on the role of theater in Africa, performances, and exhibitions.

✿ LELA FESTIVAL

funeral observances are scheduled. The Lela Festival is a three-month-long dance festival hosted by the chief (fon). ✿ NGONDO FESTIVAL

Observed by: General Public

Observed in: Doula

Observed on: December

The annual Ngondo Festival showcases Cameroon’s folk culture and diversity, particularly in dance and music, and attracts huge crowds. Every year in December, Doula, Cameroon’s largest city, takes on a carnival-like atmosphere with exhibits of handicrafts, canoe races, choral music, and ritual dances and songs with messages from the ancestors at the bottom of the sea. The locals, people inhabiting the coast, which stretches across the Francophone part of Cameroon as well as the Anglophone side, reconnect with their ancestors in a mystical dialogue that takes place in deep water. Ngondo means “people of the water,” and this festival pays homage to one of nature’s fundamental elements, water. The focus is on the Wouri River, which every three to four years yields a harvest of mbeaa toe, the shellfish that gave its name to Cameroon, and there are special rituals honoring the deity of the Wouri River. This festival also honors the deities that live in the sea, the Miengu, half men, half spirits, who reign over the oceans, the seas, and the rivers and bring prosperity to the Sawa people.

Rites of Passage

✿ BIRTH

In Cameroon, women depend on experienced midwives to help them through the process of delivery. The birth of a child is a time for celebration. Within 10 days of its birth, the child is named after the circumstances in which he or she was born, or after a prominent relative belonging to the father’s or the mother’s side of the family. The names are often unisex. Also, after birth, a girl’s ears are pierced while the boy is circumcised in accordance with tradition.

Twins are considered very special—a gift of the gods—in Cameroonian society; so a ritual to persuade the children to stay on Earth is performed. A special shrine is erected in their honor by the taangyie, the father of the twins, inside the mother’s house. A special chicken dish is prepared to feed the children. Meanwhile, the maangyie, the mother of the twins, performs a ceremonial dance outside the house. The tribal chief sends two cups, which are hung over the twins’ heads, and strands of precious beads that are strung around their necks.

❁ COMING OF AGE

Coming of age initiation rites for both boys and girls are well-kept secrets among most of the ethnic groups in Cameroon, and ethnic groups forbid members to describe the rituals to outsiders, especially Westerners. For this reason, not much is known about them.

Both sexes are taken deep into the forest, to a secret place, for the rituals, which last several days. Among the Baka (formerly called Pygmies), boys to be initiated are undressed, washed, shaved, and then have palm oil rubbed on their bodies. After these procedures, they are taken to a special hut, and the rituals, some of them dangerous, begin. Phases of the rituals that are “public” include dances and processions. The boys spend about a week in the hut, a period when they are not allowed to eat, sleep, or drink very much. Toward the end of the initiation period, each boy comes face-to-face with the Spirit of the Forest, who kills them and then brings them back to life as adults.

In Bafoussam, the ritual marking the transition from childhood to adulthood occurs every two years during November–December; a girl is not considered to be a woman unless and until she has gone through the Rhe Nian Nian, whatever her social status. The entire initiation lasts for nine weeks, but the girls spend nine days in the bush with their initiators, while the villagers’ most significant dances are performed daily in the chief’s yard. When the Nian Nian (initiated woman) emerges from the forest on the 10th day, a grand feast is held to welcome her. In Baleng (a subdivision of Bafoussam), the initiation ritual is held at the end of every leap year. It is estimated that 20 percent of the women of Cameroon have been infibulated as part of the initiation rites. (Infibulation involves the complete removal of the clitoris, labia minora, and most of the labia majora. The vaginal opening is then sewn almost completely shut. It is done, according to its advocates, to increase the man’s pleasure; at the same time, it not only robs women of their capacity for pleasure but makes the act of intercourse extremely painful. The cutting is often done with a piece of shell or broken bottle, which leads to frequent infections. This is not a one-time operation. After intercourse or childbirth, the vaginal opening is sewn shut again.)

❁ MARRIAGE

Child marriage was once an integral part of Cameroon’s culture. The promising of the bride was a fairly simple ritual. A prospective groom or his father would place a log of wood on a fire. If the parents of the newborn girl agreed to the proposal, then the log of wood would be allowed to burn and the girl was considered engaged to the suitor. The bride price was also negotiated at the time that the marriage was fixed.

Among the Bangwa tribe, marriage is finalized only after the payment has been made. Also, since child marriage was the norm, the Bangwa girl would go to her husband’s place after reaching physical maturity. In earlier times marriages were lavish affairs, but due to escalating costs, modern couples prefer a simple ceremony and seek the blessing of their elders.

❁ DEATH

In Cameroon, per ancient traditions and customs, the cause of death is always considered both natural and unnatural. The belief in supernatural forces is widespread, and witchcraft and vodun are an integral part of Cameroonian cultures.

Traditionally, the dead of a village were buried right behind their homes. The burial of a chief or a noble person would be rather lavish, while the death of a commoner was a simpler affair.

The Bangwa tribes believe in life after death and that souls assume the form of spirits and ghosts to avenge their death. They believe the dead souls spread death and disease among the living if they are not ritually pacified. According to Bangwa religious belief, souls go either to heaven or hell, and both these places are under the ground. The sky is considered to be the home of witches. Because of this the Bangwa tribe found it difficult to accept the Christian belief that heaven was located somewhere up in the skies.

Introduction

❁ HISTORY

The First Peoples, thriving Native American and Inuit groups, have inhabited parts of what is now called Canada for at least 10,000 years. The name Canada probably comes from the Iroquois word kanata-kon, meaning “to the village.”

The first Europeans to arrive were probably the Vikings, who are thought to have sent several expeditions to northern areas of the North American continent around 1000 B.C.E.

Archaeological evidence of a settlement was found at L'Anse aux Meadows (from the French, meaning “Jellyfish Cove”) in 1960, a site on the northernmost tip of the island of Newfoundland. There the remains of a Viking village were discovered, including dwellings, tools, and other implements that positively identified it. The Viking settlement dates back to more than 500 years before Christopher Columbus (1451–1506) and has the earliest European structures found in North America.

The Vikings may have sailed there and fished there centuries earlier, and English explorer John Cabot had spotted Newfoundland in 1497, but it was the French who began to settle the territory they called “New France.” When French explorer Jacques Cartier (1491–1557) sailed to the Gulf of St. Lawrence in 1534, he claimed the land he found for France.

The earliest French settlements were established at Quebec City (1608) and Montreal (1642; originally called Ville Marie). Many of the early French settlers worked in the fur trade, forming lucrative economic alliances with Native American groups. Others hoped to find their fortune in gold and silver or by discovering new trade routes to Asia.

The territory was sparsely populated, though, and British settlers to the south began encroaching on French territory. The Maritime Provinces, including Acadia (now eastern Quebec, the Maritime Provinces, and northern New England), were particularly contested during the 18th century, and France and England fought a series of wars that involved Canada, sometimes directly and sometimes indirectly, beginning in the late 17th century. By the end of the French and Indian War in 1763 Britain had won nearly all of New France. The French population of Quebec, however, retained the rights to their own language, religion, and civil law.

During the American Revolution many colonists loyal to Britain, called “United Empire Loyalists,” moved north to Canada, increasing the British presence in the area. Fur traders and explorers continued westward until, in 1793 Sir Alexander Mackenzie (1822–92) reached the Pacific Ocean. In 1839 Britain combined the territories of Upper Canada (Ontario) and Lower Canada (Quebec) as their Canadian colonies. These colonies gained the right to internal self-government in 1840, although Britain continued to decide Canadian foreign policy until 1931, and Canada did not technically reach complete independence until 1982, when it obtained the right to amend its constitution.

On July 1, 1867, Britain’s North American provinces were united as the Dominion of Canada in the British North America Act (BNA). This event is marked each year on the national holiday of Canada Day. The British sovereign continues to be the nominal head of Canada’s government, although all political power is held by the nation’s parliament and prime minister.

Canada’s recent history has been marked by disputes over the continued French character of the province of Quebec, where 80 percent of the population is of French descent. On June 3, 1987, the Meech Lake Agreement was signed. It would have given Quebec constitutional protection to maintain its French language and culture within an otherwise English-speaking nation. However, the agreement was subject to ratification by the nation’s other provinces, and, as critics complained that it did not offer similar protections to other minority groups and appeared to give Quebec the right to override elements of the country’s constitution unilaterally, the measure failed. This sparked the rise of a powerful separatist movement in Quebec. In a referendum on October 30, 1995, a proposition to secede from Canada was defeated, but only barely, by the voters of the province.

Canada has worked to make amends to the Native American groups who lost their land and independence as French and British settlers took over their territory. On January 7, 1998, the government formally apologized to the groups for 150 years of abuse and, on April 1, 1999, the vast territory of Nunavut (“Our Land”) was carved out of Canada’s Northwest Territories province as a homeland for the Inuit nation.

❁ GEOGRAPHY AND CLIMATE

Canada is bordered by the Arctic Ocean to the north, Alaska and the Pacific Ocean to the west, the North Atlantic Ocean to the east, and the United States to the south. It is the world’s second largest country in terms of area but has only one-tenth the population of the United States. Almost three-quarters of all Canadians live within 100 miles of its southern border, because much of the rest of the country has harsh terrain and a severely cold climate. The Rocky Mountains and dense forests in the west make that region a tourist destination. Vast prairies and fertile fields of wheat and other grains characterize the nation’s midsection. The largest cities and major industrial centers lie near the Great Lakes, and, to the east, fishing villages and beaches line Canada’s Atlantic coast. The massive territory of the north is largely an Arctic wilderness.

As befits a country that is so large, the climate varies greatly, from the bitter cold of the north, where some islands have permanent icecaps and summers are short and cool, to the more temperate conditions of southern Canada’s wheat fields, and the generally humid weather of the southeast.

❁ ECONOMY

Canada has a free market economy led by service industries and manufacturing, although the occupations of its colonial settlers—farming, fishing, logging, and fur trapping—continue to provide valuable exports. The country’s main stock exchange is in Toronto. Canada is a major producer of oil, natural gas, and hydroelectric power, as well as a mining center, exporting minerals including copper, gold, iron ore, nickel, potash, uranium, and zinc, as well as diamonds, which have been found recently in the far north.

Fun Fact

Inuktitut, which means “like the Inuit,” is the language of the Inuit people; it belongs to the Eskimo-Aleut family of languages. Inuit is spoken from western Alaska to eastern Greenland, in all areas north of the tree line. Unlike most indigenous American languages it has widespread official support, especially in Canada, where it is taught in Inuit schools.

The United Empire Loyalists

In 1783 shortly after the end of the American Revolutionary War and the creation of the United States, about 35,000 people, called “Tories” by their former countrymen and “United Empire Loyalists” in Canada and England, moved to Nova Scotia and the unsettled lands north of Lake Ontario to start their lives again. Their resettlement resulted in immediate changes for the British colonies of Canada: the Atlantic province of Nova Scotia and the inland colony of Quebec had to be reconstituted. The forests west of the Bay of Fundy, initially included in French Acadia, had been merged with Nova Scotia. In 1784 these lands were made a separate colony called New Brunswick. At the same time Cape Breton Island was separated from Nova Scotia (a division reversed in 1820).

Fun Fact

Long before the Europeans found Canada, First Nations peoples discovered the food properties of maple sap, which they gathered every spring. As early as 1700 the maple leaf was serving as Canada's national symbol. On February 15, 1965, it was incorporated into Canada's flag.

Fun Fact

In French, tourtière means "pie pan."

Canada is also a leading lumber and paper producer and wheat exporter. Manufacturing cars, planes, and other transportation equipment is another important economic area. The government has an active role in Canada's economy; for example it provides free health services to all workers. Provincial governments own utilities and broadcasters. Foreign investment and ownership of Canadian businesses is widespread, especially from the United States, but also from Germany, Japan, and the United Kingdom. On January 1, 1994, Canada, Mexico, and the United States entered the North American Free Trade Agreement (NAFTA), eliminating tariffs (taxes on imports) in the region. The United States is Canada's largest trading partner by far, although many citizens worry about its neighbor's outsize influence on its economy and culture.

❁ CULTURE AND LIFESTYLE

Canadian culture is an uneasy blend of influences. Forty percent of Canadians trace their ancestry to the British Isles, while almost a third descend from Britain's historic rival France. Most of the French descendants reside in Quebec, where French is the official language. The Quebec legislature has passed several laws mandating the use of French in government and business. Court challenges and other rulings have changed those laws, but the province still requires French lettering to be larger than English on all bilingual advertisements. Influences of both cultures dominate the Canadian way of life, although the country's government has worked to recognize all cultures within its borders, including Indian and Pakistani, Chinese, African, and West Indian, as well as Inuit and other First Nations people.

Almost two-thirds of Canadians are Christians (45 percent of the population is Roman Catholic). Other groups include Buddhists, Hindus, Jews, Muslims, and Sikhs, and an impressive 16 percent report they have no religious affiliation.

Winter sports such as hockey and skiing are popular with many Canadians, as is lacrosse, which was played by First Nations people long before the Europeans arrived. The government has preserved wide stretches of territory as national parks for wilderness preservation as well as vacationing and recreation. The nation also has extensive networks of libraries and museums. Literature thrives in both French and English, and Canada has also become a center for film production.

The Canadian calendar includes many secular and religious holidays and festivals, when people can take time off from work and join their families in celebration of their history and culture.

❁ CUISINE

Beef is a staple of the Canadian diet, with steak and roast beef both popular dishes. Chicken, lamb, pork, and fish and other varieties of seafood are also popular. Lobsters are harvested along the Atlantic shore of Nova Scotia, fresh cod comes from the Grand Banks, and salmon are caught off both the Pacific and Atlantic coasts.

As residents of a wheat-producing nation, Canadians eat bread at most meals. Potatoes, beans, carrots, lettuce, and peas are common vegetables, as is hot soup. Canadians enjoy drinking coffee, tea, milk, wine, and beer. Favorite desserts include pies—apple, blueberry, peach, and rhubarb—and maple syrup finds many culinary uses. On major holidays such as Christmas and Thanksgiving families traditionally sit down to a turkey dinner. On Christmas in Quebec, where French cuisine predominates, many families share a meat pie known as tourtière.

Privately, many Canadians make resolutions on New Year's Day to improve themselves in some way or to break bad habits.

their sovereign's birthday each year but have never stopped celebrating Victoria's day, which has been a state holiday since 1952. On Victoria Day Canadians celebrate the birthdays of both Victoria and their current sovereign, no matter when the current sovereign was born. People gather with friends and family to watch fireworks in cities across the country.

Although this is an official holiday in Quebec (because it is a national holiday), Québécois are not particularly excited about celebrating Canada's ties to the British monarchy. For this reason the Quebec National Assembly made May 24 a provincial holiday—National Patriots Day (in French, Journée nationale des patriotes), to commemorate the English-Canadian and French-Canadian patriots who fought British colonial power in the Lower Canada Rebellion (1837). Prior to 2003 May 24 was celebrated in Quebec as Fête de Dollard, after Adam Dollard des Ormeaux (1635–1660), a New France colonist who died a martyr's death when he, with 16 volunteers, was killed by the Iroquois.

Since 1901, May 24 had been celebrated throughout the British Empire as Empire Day. In 1952 the Statutes of Canada were amended to move the holiday to the Monday before May 25. From 1953 on, Empire Day was made the date of the Queen's official birthday in Canada, and the connection was made permanent in 1957. Then in 1958, Empire Day became known as Commonwealth Day.

province who lost their lives in the World War I Battle of Beaumont Hamel, part of the Battle of the Somme.

☪ LABOR DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: First Monday of September

Canada's version of Labor Day got its start with a workers' demonstration in Toronto on April 15, 1872. Labor Day continued to be observed in the spring until it was moved to its current date and declared an official holiday by Parliament in 1894. Many European countries celebrate Labor Day on May 1. In Canada banks, government offices, and schools are closed, and many families enjoy a last long summer weekend.

The idea for the holiday of Labor Day is often credited to a pair of Americans who organized the first Labor Day parade in the United States in 1882, but Canadians maintain that the event got its start here with the demonstration organized by the Toronto Trades Assembly, a labor organization. At the time unions were illegal in Canada, and 24 leaders of a printers' union were held in jail for going on strike to gain a nine-hour workday. Nearly 10,000 people came out to cheer the labor unionists that day. A few months later, a similar event took place in Ottawa, where seven unions organized a mile-long parade in support of better working conditions.

Fun Fact

The tradition of wearing poppies on Remembrance Day to commemorate Canada's war dead derives from the 1915 poem "In Flanders Fields," by Canadian Lt. Col. John McCrae. The poem concludes, "If ye break faith with us who die/We shall not sleep, though poppies grow/In Flanders fields."

☪ THANKSGIVING

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: Second Monday of October

Canada's Thanksgiving has its origins in celebrations that predate the country's settlement. For centuries European farmers had marked the harvest time with festivals of thanksgiving and brought those traditions to the Americas. In 1578 English navigator Martin Frobisher held a ceremony in Newfoundland to give thanks for surviving the long journey across the Atlantic Ocean, a tradition that was continued by settlers in that region. Thanksgiving in the United States, commemorating the Massachusetts Bay Colony's first harvest in 1621, also influenced Canada's holiday, as colonists loyal to Britain, known as the United Empire Loyalists, brought the tradition to Canada when they left the American colonies in advance of the Revolutionary War.

Canada's first official Thanksgiving holiday was celebrated on April 5, 1872, because the Prince of Wales had recovered from a serious illness. In 1879 Parliament declared Thanksgiving a national holiday. The date has changed over the years, until it took its current place on the calendar in 1957.

Canadians mark the holiday by gathering with families for a traditional turkey dinner.

Remembrance Day takes place on November 11, the date of the armistice that ended World War I in 1918. It continues as a national holiday today to remember all Canadians who have lost their lives in wars and peacekeeping operations. Since 1921 many Canadians have pinned a blood-red poppy to their clothing on the holiday as a symbol of remembrance. Associating poppies with war dead is a tradition that dates back to 19th-century Europe. On Remembrance Day the trumpet or bugle call known as "Last Post," similar to the American "Taps," is sounded at official ceremonies.

☪ BOXING DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: December 26, if a weekday, or first weekday following December 26

Boxing Day originated in England in the mid-19th century as a day for members of the upper classes to give boxes of fruit, clothing, or money to servants and other workers, much as businesses today often give holiday bonuses. Since the gifts were presented in boxes, the day took the name Boxing Day. In churches it is traditionally the day when alms boxes are opened and distributed to the poor.

Today it is a national holiday in Canada, the United Kingdom, and several other countries that were formerly a part of the British Commonwealth. Family and friends often gather together, and many people donate time or money to the poor. It is also one of the biggest shopping days of the year in Canada, since stores have major post-Christmas sales.

GOOD FRIDAY

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: Friday before Easter

This Christian festival commemorates the Crucifixion of Jesus, and it is the central holiday on the Christian calendar. It has been in the Christian liturgical calendar even longer than Easter has, although no one is sure why it is called Good Friday. Some have suggested that the use of good in the name goes back to Old English and means “God’s” Friday, while others interpret good to mean something like “observed as holy.” This observance is also known as Black Friday or Sorrowful Friday, and in Eastern Orthodox Churches it is called Great Friday.

In Canada Good Friday is a national holiday. Many Christians attend a special service mourning Jesus, which traditionally lasts from noon until 3 P.M., representing the last three hours of darkness, while Jesus suffered on the Cross. Some Christians observe Good Friday as a fast day in mourning for Jesus. When they eat, it is generally fish instead of meat.

EASTER

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: First Sunday after Lent

Easter, which celebrates the Resurrection of Jesus after his Crucifixion, is the most important holiday on the Christian calendar, and the culmination of the religion’s Holy Week including Good Friday, a national holiday in Canada that takes place two days prior. Easter also marks the end of the 40-day period of Lent. The date of Easter is based on the lunar calendar and can occur on any Sunday between March 22 and April 25. Depending on the denomination churches hold services on Saturday evening, at sunrise on Sunday, or on Sunday morning. Families gather on Easter Sunday for a festive meal, often featuring lamb, a symbol of Jesus, “the Lamb of God.” Symbols of the holiday include lilies, candles, and hot-cross buns.

Easter is also a celebration of spring, and Easter eggs and Easter bunnies, while having no direct connection to the story of Jesus, are both symbols of fertility appropriated from European pagan religions. Many families paint hard-boiled eggs and hide them for children to find in an Easter Egg Hunt. Many people also wear new clothes on Easter, another symbol of the new life promised by Jesus’ Resurrection. In some communities people put on their finest clothes for an annual Easter Parade.

ROSH HASHANAH

Observed by: Jews

Observed on: September or October

Rosh Hashanah is the Jewish New Year, observed over two consecutive days during which Jews attend services marking the beginning of 10 days of repentance and spiritual renewal, culminating on Yom Kippur, the Day of Atonement. Rosh Hashanah means “head of the year.” The date of the holiday, which like all Jewish festivals begins at dusk the previous day, is based on the Jewish lunar calendar, and can vary widely. In Jewish tradition Rosh Hashanah begins God’s annual judging of all human beings, when he decides who will live and die in the year ahead, a judgment made final on Yom Kippur. During services, a ram’s horn, called a shofar, is blown to call congregants to repentance. When families gather to share a meal on the holiday, many dip apples in honey, a tradition symbolizing hope for a sweet year ahead.

The evening before the holiday Jews attend a special service and begin their fast. The next day they attend services throughout the day until sundown, when the shofar, a ram’s horn, is blown to mark the end of the 10 days of repentance that began on Rosh Hashanah.

EID AL-FITR

Observed by: Muslims

Observed on: First of Shawwal, the 10th month of the Islamic lunar calendar

Fun Fact

Caribou is the traditional drink of the winter carnival. Recipes vary but usually include brandy, vodka, sherry, and port. Its invention is credited to a Quebec City bar called Ti-Pere, and it has been a part of the festival since its beginning.

During the Islamic holy month of Ramadan, the ninth month on the Islamic calendar, many Muslims do not eat or drink between sunrise and sundown, focusing their attention on study of the Koran. In Islamic tradition the prophet Muhammad received the first of the revelations that make up the Koran during Ramadan.

Eid al-Fitr, the joyous Feast of Fast-Breaking, takes place on the first day following Ramadan. The date is based on the Islamic lunar calendar, so the date varies (the Islamic calendar makes no adjustments to remain aligned with the Western solar calendar, so holidays move gradually through the entire solar year). On the first day of Eid al-Fitr, children dress in new clothes and receive gifts, and families share a special meal, often featuring sweet foods made with dates and honey.

Family Day is an official holiday only in Alberta. It is meant to recognize the values of the pioneers who settled the region and to celebrate home and family. The provincial legislature organizes events for families in major cities like Calgary and Edmonton. The date coincides with President's Day in the United States. Businesses have the option of giving employees a holiday on Family Day or on the Civic Holiday in August. Those with close ties to American suppliers and partners often choose Family Day as their company holiday.

Observed on: Monday closest to June 24

On June 24, 1497, explorer John Cabot (né Giovanni Caboto) reached the Newfoundland region in his ship The Matthew. He explored the area for almost a month before returning to England. In 1498 he set off on a new voyage to the region but was never heard from again. Today residents of Newfoundland and Labrador mark Cabot's arrival by observing Discovery Day instead of the midsummer Civic Holiday many other provinces celebrate.

Since the 500th anniversary of the voyage in 1997, it has also been referred to as Cabot 500 Day.

On Quebec National Day French Canadians honor the province's patron saint John the Baptist. It is also a carnival and agricultural fair. The fair got its start in 1886, and the first stampede was held in 1912. In 1923 it was established as an annual event. ❁ CIVIC HOLIDAY

Observed in: Alberta, British Columbia, Manitoba, New Brunswick, Northwest Territories, Nova Scotia, Nunavut, Ontario, Prince Edward Island, Saskatchewan

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: First Monday in August

The first Monday in August is a holiday in all Canadian provinces except Quebec, Newfoundland and Labrador, and the Yukon Territory. The holiday goes by different names in different provinces, but the goal is the same everywhere—a long midsummer weekend for workers and families. Alternate names include: Heritage Day (Alberta), British Columbia Day (British Columbia), New Brunswick Day (New Brunswick), Simcoe Day (Ontario), Natal Day (Nova Scotia, Prince Edward Island), Saskatchewan Day (Saskatchewan).

The concept got its start in Toronto in 1869, when the city council authorized a midsummer "day of recreation." In some locations, the day is filled with parades and fireworks. However it is not a national holiday, so official closings and observances vary from region to region, although most workers in observing provinces are given the day off.

❁ REGATTA DAY

Observed in: Newfoundland and Labrador

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: First Wednesday in August (weather permitting)

The Royal St. John's Regatta has been held each year on Quidi Vidi Lake in Newfoundland and Labrador's capital since at least 1826, and it is the oldest continuing annual sporting event in North America. Tens of thousands of people attend the regatta and its accompanying festival, which is a public holiday in the province. However unlike other holidays, Regatta Day cannot be officially declared until the St. John's Regatta Committee determines that weather conditions are ideal for racing.

Today the Yukon marks Carmack's find by observing Discovery Day instead of the midsummer Civic Holiday many other provinces celebrate.

Rites of Passage

❁ BIRTH

Canadian families of different faiths welcome their children into their religions in different ways. Roman Catholics and other Christian faiths christen infants in the church through the ritual of baptism, a symbolic washing with water that signifies the child's entry into the religion. At these ceremonies children are also formally named, although in practice most children receive their names before the ceremony. Other denominations such as Baptists do not baptize infants because they believe that baptism must always involve a public statement of faith by the person to be baptized.

Jewish boys are circumcised, usually on their eighth day of life, in a ceremony known as the Brit (or Bris) Milah. The ceremony can take place in a synagogue but often occurs in a family's home and is performed by a person called a mohel (also moyel). The circumcision is considered a sign of the covenant between God and the Jewish people established with the patriarch Abraham. Muslim families also circumcise infant boys.

❁ COMING OF AGE

When Jewish boys reach the age of 13, many take part in a ritual known as a bar mitzvah. Some denominations hold a similar ceremony for girls called a bat (or bas) mitzvah. The name literally means “son (or daughter) of the law,” and the event marks a young person’s entry into the adult community, including his or her responsibility for following all of the commandments of the religion. While no ceremony is required, many young people spend months studying a passage from the Torah that they will read in Hebrew in the synagogue on the day of their bar/bat mitzvahs. Families typically throw large parties after the bar/bat mitzvah. Some Jews believe that these parties have become a conspicuous display of wealth that overshadows the spiritual aspects of the day.

In a similar vein many Christian young people take part in a ceremony called a “confirmation,” which usually involves the rites of baptism. For Roman Catholics confirmation brings the grace of the Holy Spirit; for Protestants, it reinforces the entry into the faith promised at baptism. In many churches, such as the Roman Catholic and Lutheran, confirmation for young people also represents the culmination of several years of religious study.

❁ MARRIAGE

Weddings are important legal and religious events for Canadian couples. Almost 150,000 couples get married in Canada each year, although about 70,000 couples end their marriage each year through the legal process of divorce. While some immigrant cultures retain the practice of arranged marriage, almost all Canadians choose their own spouses. Like other Western nations Canadians have debated laws permitting same-sex couples to marry and take on the legal benefits and responsibilities and benefits of marriage. Most laws pertaining to marriage in Canada are set at the provincial level, where marriage licenses are issued. In 2005 Canada’s parliament legalized same-sex marriage, even though several provinces were already allowing it.

While some Canadians choose to be married in civil ceremonies, marriage is an important religious ceremony for followers of most of the world’s religions. Christian and Jewish couples are married by either a priest, minister, or rabbi, and all these faiths’ ceremonies involve a public declaration of commitment to the marriage, the presence of witnesses, and the exchange of rings, the latter a custom dating back at least to Roman times. Many couples write their own vows as substitutes or additions to traditional wedding liturgy. Roman Catholic weddings take place during Mass, and the couple receives Communion.

❁ DEATH

Canadian death customs share many elements with customs from around the world, such as the public announcement of a death, a funeral ceremony, and a burial. These long-standing customs are designed to show respect and pay tribute to the dead, and to offer comfort to survivors. Canadian funeral directors usually prepare bodies for burial through the embalming process, because funerals often take place several days after a death. However the Jewish funeral preparation differs, since tradition requires burial no more than two nights after a death and forbids embalming. In advance of a funeral many families hold an all-night vigil beside the corpse. Christians call this custom a “wake”; other religions use different names for similar practices. Most Canadian funerals involve a public ceremony at a funeral home followed by the public burial of the deceased in a coffin at a cemetery.

Cremation has gained in popularity in Canada in recent years. Cremation is the traditional practice of Buddhists and Hindus, although Judaism and some Christian denominations discourage it. In the case of burials, a second, shorter graveside ceremony is often held in advance of the burial, after which many families return to a relative’s home to share a meal.

Introduction

❁ HISTORY

The Cape Verde Islands were uninhabited when the Portuguese discovered them in the 15th century. The islands became a renowned center for trade (including the slave trade) by the 16th century, and by the 19th century they were used as important ports of call during transatlantic travel.

The islands became a colony of Portugal in 1495, an overseas province in 1951, and an independent nation in 1975. The constitution was established in 1980 and revised in 1992, 1995, and 1999. A multiparty democratic system was introduced in 1991 (with the Movement for Democracy [MPD] winning elections) making Cape Verde one of the most stable democracies in Africa.

The prime minister, president, and members of the General Assembly are elected, and judges on the Supreme Court are appointed by the other three branches of government. The African Party for the Independence of Cape Verde (Partido Africano da Independência de Cabo Verde [PAICV]) was formed after hopes of aligning with Guinea Bissau were dashed in 1980, following a coup there. PAICV won the February 2001 general elections. They were opposed by the other three major parties grouped under the banner of Democratic Alliance for Change (DAC), and made up of the PCD, PTS, and UCID parties. In the early years of the 21st century groups of the DAC continue to retain seats in the National Assembly.

❁ GEOGRAPHY AND CLIMATE

The Cape Verde archipelago is a group of ten islands and eight islets (very small islands) located in the Atlantic Ocean, 385 miles off the coast of West Africa. It includes two groups of volcanic islands that are mountainous and surrounded by reefs and cliffs. Nine out of 10 islands of the archipelago are inhabited as are five of the islets. The islands are divided into two groups: the windward group to the north (Barlavento) and the leeward group to the south (Sotavento). The largest island (in the Sotavento group) is São Tiago (or Santiago), which covers about 382 square miles. Fogo (also in the Sotavento group) has an active volcano of the same name. There have

Cape Verde Hurricanes

These hurricanes are among the most intense in the world and have this name because they originate near Cape Verde and move westward in August or September each year. There are about two such powerful hurricanes every year that develop in the ocean around these islands.

been seven volcanic eruptions on Mt. Fogo (fogo means “fire”) since 1760, the last one being in 1995. At 9,281 feet high Mt. Fogo is also the highest point in the islands. Santo Antão is the greenest of them all, owing to very heavy rainfall. The other islands are dry and hilly, making them difficult to farm.

The climate in these islands is one of the most pleasant of any West African country. The warmest month is September, averaging 81°F, and the coolest month is February, averaging 70°F. Due to the vast expanse of sea currents around the islands, they naturally tend to be cooler than most landlocked or western coastal areas. The islands are almost always under the influence of the dry northeast winds. There is virtually no rainfall, except for a period from August through October, when an average of 1.6 inches a month is recorded. These rains can fail for years at a time.

The Cape Verde islands are especially popular for their marine life, chief among them being blue humpback whales, dolphins, parrotfish (a brilliant blue-green fish), moray eels, barracuda, porpoises, and loggerhead, hawksbill, and green turtles. The corals and colorful fish are a big attraction in the waters off Sal, a famous tourist island of Cape Verde. The Cape Verde petrel, brown booby, Raza Island lark, tropic bird, frigate bird, and Cape Verde warbler are among the species of birds found there. Among the reptiles inhabiting the islands are the giant Cape Verde gecko and the Cape Verde skink (a variety of lizard).

ECONOMY

Cape Verde was given this name because it was very green (verde is Portuguese for “green”) due to the

Islands of Cape Verde

Sal, a desert island that is quite popular with tourists, has an international airport. São Tiago is another popular island, where the capital city Praia is located. São Vicente is the second most important island and contains the liveliest city of Cape Verde: Mindelo. The picturesque city of Mindelo is perched on a rocky plateau called Platô. Tourists love this place for its beaches on the northern end. It has more nightclubs and bars than Praia and is a tourist hotspot.

dense vegetation. This is also one of the reasons that it attracted Portuguese colonizers who set up sugar plantations and cotton mills that were worked by slave labor. However agriculture has been in continuous decline due to soil erosion, deforestation, and desertification.

One of Cape Verde’s greatest problems has been soil erosion. Its adverse effects began to be seen in the early 19th century, mainly the result of overgrazing by the goat population. Since independence a nationwide campaign to prevent soil erosion has been undertaken, which includes planting drought-resistant varieties of trees (acacia trees now cover 7 percent of the land surface), building small dikes, and utilizing better ways of farming.

Cape Verde has to import 85 to 90 percent of its food requirements, and this is the main cause of the country’s trade deficit and dependence on foreign aid. Because of its strategic location (close to the north south sea routes), Cape Verde has turned into an important communication station as well as an important air-refueling site. In the early years of the 21st century the main revenue generating sectors of the economy were related to transport, commerce, public services, and tourism. These contribute 72 percent of the total gross domestic product (GDP).

CULTURE AND LIFESTYLE

Culturally each island group is distinct, reflecting their geographic separation. In the 15th century the Portuguese brought slaves from mainland Africa to work the island plantations. Consequently most Cape Verdeans are a mix of African and European ancestry.

Portuguese is the official language here, though many speak Crioulo, a mix of Portuguese and West African tongues.

Cape Verde also boasts a rich heritage of Crioulo music and literature. Prior to 1975 a Crioulo literature dealing with liberation and independence thrived. However post-independence, writers began focusing on racial discrimination and the group emigrations of those called Americanos, inhabitants who had fled to America. Kaoberdiano Dambara (b. 1937) and Onésimo Silveira (b. 1935) are famous writers who still write in Crioulo and Portuguese, respectively.

The capital city of Praia has a popular dance form, funana, which uses foot-stomping beats. Morna is the slow way of singing the national song, whereas coladeira has a fast beat. Stringed instruments, such as the viola, guitar, violin, and the cavaquinho (a small arm-sized guitar) are prominently used. Drums are also popular. Cesaria Evora (b. 1941), with a worldwide following, is the most celebrated musician on the islands. Popularly known as “the barefoot diva” because of her propensity to appear on stage barefoot, she has worked tirelessly for the disadvantaged women and children of her country.

Since about 60 percent of the people are Roman Catholics, the church is a powerful institution on these islands. It owned the largest pieces of land on the islands at the time of independence, though succeeding land reforms did reduce its economic power slightly. While most people are Roman Catholics, many also believe in witches and make regular visits to healers. Nuno Miranda was a renowned spiritualist and traditional healer of the 20th century, whose followers came from all classes of Cape Verdean society.

Historically due to the lack of resources and irregular, scanty rainfall, many inhabitants (around 500,000) have immigrated to the United States and European countries.

❁ CUISINE

Catchupa, the national dish of Cape Verde, is a stew made of beans, hominy (kernels of corn that have been soaked in a caustic solution and then washed to remove the hulls). Catchupa rica is catchupa with meat and is prepared for special occasions, such as wedding ceremonies. Eating catchupa is a symbol of one's social and economic standing. Those who cannot afford meat eat catchupa pova containing fish, which is inexpensive and abundant. Greens are grown in gardens along with mandioca (similar to cassava leaves) and beans to feed and fatten the pigs for consumption during festivals.

The staple food item is corn, which is usually served finely ground. Xerem, dried corn pounded in a mortar to the fineness of rice, is the staple of feasts. And kuskus (Arabic, couscous), ground finer still and steamed in a distinctive ceramic pot called a binde, is a special treat served hot with butter and milk (kuskus ku leite) or molasses (kuskus ku mel). Yams, plantains, and cassava are other common foods. Canja is a thick chicken soup, whereas caldo do peixe is a traditional fish soup, painstakingly prepared using cassava, tomatoes, potatoes, yams, pumpkin, and plantains. A popular sweet dish azucarinhas is made from guava, papaya, banana, and corn laced with sweet syrup for enhanced flavor. One of the islands called Boa Vista is famous for its cheeses.

Pastel com diablo dentro, which means "pastry with the Devil inside," is a famous dish made with onions, tomatoes, and fresh tuna wrapped in a pastry made with corn flour and boiled potatoes. This is then deep-fried and eaten hot. Banana enroladas (deep-fried bananas wrapped in pastry) is another favorite. Manga de conserva, which is an unsweetened, sour, chutneylike mango dish, is also popular in Cape Verde.

Public/Legal Holidays

❁ NEW YEAR'S EVE/DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: December 31–January 1

Music, singing, and dancing are important elements of New Year's celebrations in the Cape Verde Islands. There is a good deal of revelry and feasting to welcome in the new year.

Catchupa

Any place becomes home to Cape Verdeans if they can find catchupa. It is the staple food on these islands that some spend as much as four hours preparing. For Cape Verdeans scattered around the world, it is always a special occasion when friends gather to share a well-made kettle of catchupa. These festive occasions are called catchupada. What goes into a kettle of catchupa may depend on whether it has been a year of rain or a year of drought. In a good year there will always be greens, mandioca (cassava), potatoes, maybe squash, yams, and plenty of pork meat. In a dry year there will be some corn, a handful of beans, and a piece of salt pork.

❁ LABOR DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: May 1

May 1 is celebrated as Labor Day, also known as May Day, in many parts of the world to commemorate the important role in their societies that workers play. The May 1 observance of Labor Day has its origins in the international socialist movement of the 1880s. The day was designated as an international observance in 1889 to coincide with an 1890 general strike in the United States called by the American Federation of Labor (AFL) to win an eight-hour workday. Businesses, schools, and government offices are closed in Cape Verde.

❁ INDEPENDENCE DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: July 5

Cape Verdeans observe this day with pride and enthusiasm, since it commemorates their independence from Portuguese rule in 1975. As an independent nation Cape Verde can boast of its record as one of the most stable democratic governments in Africa. Independence Day is a national holiday with businesses, schools, and government offices closed for the day. Many Cape Verdeans also attend church to commemorate this day.

Religious Holidays

❁ CARNIVAL

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: Tuesday before Lent

This is a traditional holiday in many countries (especially those with Roman Catholic populations). It is the last chance for revelry before Lent, the 40-day Christian period of austerity. People usually wear fancy costumes made especially for this day and parade in the streets. Parades, music, and masks are characteristic of the holiday, often called Mardi Gras (which means “Fat Tuesday” in French), and the day is considered the biggest annual show on the islands, full of color and people dancing through the streets. Strings of colorful beads of various shapes and sizes, doubloons (old gold Spanish coins), and outlandish costumes are traditional props used in the celebrations.

GOOD FRIDAY

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: Friday before Easter

This Christian festival commemorates the Crucifixion of Jesus. It has been in the Christian liturgical calendar even longer than Easter has although no one is sure why it is called Good Friday. Some have suggested that the use of good in the name goes back to Old English and means “God’s” Friday, while others interpret good to mean something like “observed as holy.” This observance is also known as Black Friday or Sorrowful Friday, and in Eastern Orthodox Churches it is called Great Friday.

People fast during the day and attend special prayer services with readings from the Gospel, recounting events in the life of Jesus leading up to his Crucifixion. This a solemn day marked by minimal socialization, distractions, and noise. The hours from noon until three in the afternoon are the hours in which Jesus was crucified. An unusual quiet marks this day in Cape Verde.

EASTER

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: First Sunday after Lent

This Christian holiday, marking the Resurrection of Jesus from the dead, is accompanied by celebration and feasting. Easter is celebrated for two days in Cape Verde—Sunday and Monday—both of which are national holidays with businesses and schools closed. On Easter Sunday Catholic Cape Verdeans attend special Easter Masses. The Monday holiday includes egg-rolling competitions for the children. Easter Egg Hunts are also popular; children must find colorful chocolate or candy eggs that the adults have hidden inside or outside their homes.

ASSUMPTION

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: August 15

This Christian holiday commemorates the Assumption of the Blessed Virgin Mary (mother of Jesus) into heaven. Catholic Cape Verdeans attend Mass and light candles in honor of Mary.

TABANKA

Observed in: São Tiago and Fogo

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: May

The islanders of Fogo and São Tiago celebrate the African feast of Tabanka each year because this was the time of the year when the slaves were given some liberty, and they used the occasion to celebrate with revelry and feasting. The word tabanka means an “association of mutual help” or a “brotherhood.” Its original meaning “small village” is still current in Guinea-Bissau and other countries along the west coast of Africa, but that sense was lost on Cape Verde because the African slaves were not allowed to live among their ethnic groups.

People dress up as royalty of earlier times, blowing conch shells and horns and playing drums. Throughout the festival people are supposed to embrace humor. Even if somebody dies, humor is regained immediately after the funeral ceremony. Interestingly a local law forbids intimate relations between husbands and wives during this festival.

❁ THE FEAST OF ST. PHILIP (SÃO FILIPE)

Observed in: All islands (especially Fogo Island)

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: May 1

Every island celebrates a saint's day devoted to its own patron saint. São Filipe (Fogo's largest city) draws crowds of people from all over the island on May 1 to celebrate the Feast Day, or Name Day, of their patron St. Philip. The feasting is elaborate and attracts huge, enthusiastic crowds. Three women using a big ceremonial mortar pound corn to the rhythm of drumming and singing around them. A goat or lamb is slaughtered for supper, and a mastro, a replica of a ship's mast, is erected and strung with branches of coconut palm or wild olive. The mastro, blessed with a magical charm, is placed at the entrance of the church to the beating of drums, clapping, and chants, which are typically African in nature and content. The mastro tradition can also be seen in the feasts of Santo Antão, Santo Andre, São Pedro, and São João on the islands of Santo Antão and Brava.

❁ FEAST OF SÃO JOÃO

Observed in: Brava region

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: Usually mid-year

In the Feast of São João kola (or cola) dancing breaks out during the high moments of the feast, which begins dramatically with exploding fireworks. The dance involves a gentle bumping of the abdomens of the dancers. Eating, drinking, and singing love songs are the main activities. There is also quite a bit of fortune-telling with playing cards. A bonfire is lit to drive away evil forces from the land, which can be a peasant's only source of wealth. In the evening people (especially the young) dance hand-in-hand around the bonfire, bending over it occasionally for good luck.

In Santo Antão Island, the northernmost island, people bring along the first harvest, which is sold off later to benefit the church. In Brava (the smallest island) the fruits are tied to the ceremonial mastro ("ship mast") and for anybody to take home once the celebrations are over.

Rites of Passage

❁ COMING OF AGE

The Batuku festival is celebrated on almost all islands though most predominantly on São Tiago. It calls for special mention as it initiates young women and is also a part of the wedding ceremonies on some islands. The most experienced woman dances in the middle with gyrating hip movements. The batxudas (or badjudas, meaning "the young girls") follow it up with their own sensual gyrating hip movements, acknowledging their adulthood and desire to get married. It is traditional for the girls to cover their faces with their hands and close their eyes as a sign of modesty while dancing.

❁ MARRIAGE

The Batuku dance, which follows a call-and-response pattern in its later part, is traditionally performed at weddings. Women sing songs in a mocking manner, advising the to-be-married couple, and emphasizing that their single days are about to be over. This dance is an essential part of the marriage ceremony on some of the islands, such as Santo Antão and São Nicolau.

Fun Fact

Flags hold great importance for the ritual-loving people of these islands.

For instance before being paraded around on horseback, flags are dipped in the sea and blessed by the local church. Before independence, only the influential people in society were allowed to parade the flags, but not so anymore.

Fun Fact

In the São João celebrations, some islanders wear a model ship costume and go from house to house asking for gifts. The ship bears a Portuguese Cross and is symbolic (like the mastro) of what happened between them and the colonizers historically (carjenas, which were pirate ships, used to come and steal their wealth). The national flag has replaced the Portuguese flag.

Introduction

✿ HISTORY

It is not known for certain who the original inhabitants of the Cayman Islands were. In 1503 Christopher Columbus (1451–1506) spotted a swarm of turtles around Cayman Brac and Little Cayman and named the islands Las Tortugas The Turtles). By the time Sir Francis Drake (?1540–96) and his band of privateers got to Grand Cayman in 1586, the islands were commonly known as Caymanas, after a Carib word for crocodiles (cayman). For the next century or so the Caymans were the territory of pirates and turtle-hunting sailors, very conveniently, since there were no permanent residents until the 1660s, when a few deserters from the British army came over from Jamaica. In 1670 the islands became possessions of the British Crown under administration from Jamaica. Britain, however, ignored the pirates’ use and abuse of the Caymans.

One of the major early occupations on these islands was wrecking, salvaging the remains of ships that ran aground on the islands’ many reefs. The most famous of these disasters is the Wreck of the Ten Sails, which occurred when a ship struck a reef in 1794, causing a chain reaction involving nine other vessels. According to legend the Caymanians went to such lengths to aid the shipwrecked travelers that a grateful British King George III (1738–1820) granted the islands tax-free status in perpetuity.

After slavery was abolished in 1834 most freed slaves remained on the islands. The export of cotton, mahogany, and sarsaparilla (mostly to Jamaica) emerged as the main industries until tourism and banking overshadowed them in the mid-20th century. Thatch rope, however, was the dominant land-based industry in Cayman for many years. Since the Silver Thatch Palm (from which raw material for the ropes was obtained) was extremely resistant to salt water, ropes made from it were much favored by fishermen and turtle hunters.

The largest demand came from Cuba and Jamaica.

Divers put the Cayman Islands on the international tourist map as early as the 1950s. The islanders, however, were slow to relinquish their isolation. By the next decade they were more receptive to foreign capital, and they began designing the tax structure that would make Grand Cayman a center of offshore banking (there are more financial institutions there than in New York City) and a sound infrastructure that would make it a capital of Caribbean tourism.

The islands placed themselves directly under the British Crown in the 1960s. Since then political contests have been waged by “teams” (parties are prohibited), though there have been few major issues and little sentiment for independence. Several marine parks, bird sanctuaries, and other nature reserves were developed and maintained during this period. In 1998 tourist numbers hit the 400,000 mark for the first time. The semi-independent country is the fifth largest financial center in the world.

❁ GEOGRAPHY AND CLIMATE

Grand Cayman, the largest and most populous of the three islands, and the sister islands, (namely, Cayman Brac and Little Cayman), which lie east-northeast of Grand Cayman, are separated from each other by a channel 6.8 miles wide. The total landmass of the three islands is 101 square miles. Grand Cayman occupies 47 square miles, Cayman Brac, 8.7 square miles, and Little Cayman, 6.2 square miles.

The three islands are limestone outcroppings, the tops of a submarine mountain range called the Cayman Ridge, which extends west-southwest to the Sierra Maestra range off the southeast part of Cuba to the Misteriosa Bank near Belize. There are no rivers or streams on the islands because of the porous nature of the limestone rock. It is this lack of runoff that gives the surrounding Caribbean Sea exceptional clarity, often to a depth of well over 120 feet. All three islands are surrounded by healthy coral reefs, which lie at the top of dramatic walls and drop-offs close to shore, creating ideal conditions for diving and sport fishing.

February is the coolest time of the year, with temperatures ranging from 64° to 73°F at night and 73° to 86°F during the day. The hottest months are usually July and August, when temperatures can reach highs of 86° to 90°F. Relative humidity varies from 68 percent to 92 percent. The rainy season starts in May and lasts through October, with May and October usually the rainiest months. March and April are usually the driest months of the year.

❁ ECONOMY

Despite the fact that about 90 percent of the islands’ food and consumer goods is imported, Caymanians enjoy one of the highest standards of living in the world. From the earliest days economic activity in

Buccaneers

The word buccaneer is commonly defined as “a pirate, someone who robs at sea or plunders the land from the sea without having a commission from any sovereign nation.” The first recorded use of the French word boucanier, which was borrowed into English, referred to a person on the islands of Hispaniola and Tortugas who hunted wild oxen and boars and smoked the meat in a barbecue frame known in French as a boucan. This French word came from a Tupi word (Tupi inhabited the coastal areas of Brazil) meaning “a rack used for roasting or for storing things, or a rack-like platform supporting a house.” The original barbecue makers seem to have subsequently adopted a more remunerative way of life—piracy—which accounts for the new meaning given to the word.

the Cayman Islands was hindered by its isolation and limited natural resources. The harvesting of sea turtles to provide supplies to ships in the area was the first major economic activity on the islands, but turtle populations were depleted by the 1790s. Agriculture, while sufficient to support the small early settler population, has always been limited by the scarcity of available land.

Swifter methods of transportation and telecommunications in the 1950s led to the emergence of what are now considered the Cayman Islands’ “twin pillars” of economic development: international finance and tourism. In 2002 more than 40,000 companies, including 600 banks, were registered in the Cayman Islands. Forty-three of the world’s largest banks have a substantial presence in the Cayman Islands. Tourism represents about 70 percent of gross domestic product and 75 percent of total export earnings. Unspoiled beaches, duty-free shopping, scuba diving, and deep-sea fishing draw almost a million visitors to the islands each year.

Sarsaparilla

The word sarsaparilla comes from the Spanish sarza, meaning “a bramble,” and parilla, “a vine,” which allude to the thorny stems of the plant. All parts of this plant, including the stem prickles, can be used. The roots, which are rich in starch, can be cooked and eaten. The root is usually dried and ground into a powder used in making cakes, puddings, sweet drinks, and jellies; it is even used in soups. A beer resembling root beer is made from the roots.

Fun Fact

The government of the Cayman Islands refuses access to the islands to cruise ships on Sundays, Good Friday, and Christmas Day.

✿ CULTURE AND LIFESTYLE

The majority of Caymanians are of African and British descent, with considerable interracial mixing. Grand Cayman has been heavily influenced by the U.S. lifestyle and values, especially the capital of George Town and the resorts along Seven Mile Beach. In the smaller villages and on the other two islands, Little Cayman and Cayman Brac, the culture is more West Indian, although the British influence is clearly perceptible. English is the only language spoken on the islands, and the Queen's birthday is celebrated every June with a parade and a 21-gun salute. West Indian traditions find expression in soca, calypso, and reggae music, which commonly emanates from clubs, bars, and local jeeps.

The Cayman Islands' most celebrated personality is the nonagenarian painter familiarly known as Miss Lassie. Born in 1914, Miss Lassie did not begin painting until encouraged by a spiritual experience in 1984. Her vibrant "markings" (as she calls them) are mostly representations of biblical scenes as envisioned in her dreams.

There are a lot of churches in the Caymans, where devout Christians worship regularly. Sunday is generally meant for church going, and even casual visitors are welcome to attend the services. Strait-laced manners, politeness, and other traditional British attributes are amply evident in the islands' culture and ethos.

✿ CUISINE

Due to the Caymans' historical connection to Jamaica it is commonplace to find an array of jerked meats among the island's specialties. This method of grilling meats originated with the Arawaks and involves cooking heavily spiced, marinated meats by smoking them over hardwoods, notably pimento, in enclosed barbecue grills. The pimento tree is the source of allspice, a popular Jamaican flavoring. Allspice finds its way into most jerk recipes.

Another popular dish is conch, served as ceviche—sliced thin and marinated in lemon or lime with bits of tomato and onion. Turtle, though not as popular as it once was, remains a part of traditional Cayman cuisine, often prepared in stews or as steaks. "Cayman-style" simply refers to any fish caught fresh from the sea and sautéed with black pepper, onions, and green peppers. Typical side dishes are plantains, yams, and rice and peas. Heavy cake is a favorite dessert. Made of a grated cassava root, it is sweetened with sugar and has the consistency of fudge. One can find an abundance of local fruits, including mangoes, grapefruits, coconuts, and breadfruit. Though most restaurants specialize in continental or international fare, items of traditional Caymanian cuisine are occasionally featured on menus.

✿ DISCOVERY DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: May 16

The Caymanians celebrate the discovery of the islands by Christopher Columbus on May 16, 1503. The celebrations invariably include a reenactment of Columbus's discovery of the sister islands, storytelling, and catboat activities by the Veterans' and Seamen's Society of Cayman Brac and Little Cayman. Other events include sightseeing trips on the dive boats from both Brac Reef and Tiara Beach resorts; kayak, boat, and Jet-Ski™ races; treasure hunts for adults (underwater) and children (on the beach) are organized.

✿ QUEEN'S BIRTHDAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: Monday on or before May 25

Since the Cayman Islands are a British colony, the birthday of the British monarch assumes great importance. The occasion is celebrated in June every year, with a full-dress military parade and a 21-gun salute, followed by an open house and garden reception held at Government House. Aviation Week, the largest aircraft event in the Caribbean, featuring everything from educational seminars to air shows, always coincides with the Queen's Birthday celebrations. Hence the islanders and visitors have the opportunity to enjoy a long weekend.

✿ CONSTITUTION DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: July 4

When Jamaica achieved independence in 1962 the Cayman Islands chose to maintain their status as a British Crown Colony. In 1971 the islands received their first governor and the present constitution was adopted in 1972. The people of the Cayman Islands commemorate this historic occasion on July 4.

❁ ANNUAL PIRATES WEEK

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: October

The annual Pirates Week festival, held in the last week of October, kicks off the winter tourist season. Caymanians relive the islands' early days when they were havens for ruthless pirates who stopped by to make merry and bury their treasures in the desolate parts of these islands. The festivities include days and nights of pirate parades, costume contests, music, fireworks, sports competitions, and craft fairs. The star attraction is a mock invasion by hordes of rowdy pirates, who arrest the governor in George Town harbor, followed by a float parade of colorful costumes and local steel drum bands. In the evening the roads are closed in George Town, the capital city, as the entire Big Cayman Island parties the night away, dancing to the rhythm of local and guest bands. Each day during the week the districts of West Bay, Bodden Town, East End, Northside, and George Town take turns hosting district heritage day, with local skills and crafts on display, along with a lavish feast and an evening of live music.

❁ REMEMBRANCE DAY

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: November 11

Remembrance Day, or Armistice Day, marks the official end of World War I on November 11, 1918. In fact it commemorates the historic occasion of the signing of a treaty, at Compiègne, France, to stop the ongoing war between the Allies (Russia, France, Italy, Great Britain, Japan, and the United States) and central powers (Germany, Austria-Hungary, and Turkey). Over the years it has become an occasion to honor the dead of subsequent wars, too. On this day the people of the Cayman Islands observe a minute of silence at 11 A.M. as a mark of respect. Veterans' organizations hold parades to pay homage to the soldiers who died in various wars.

❁ ASH WEDNESDAY

Observed by: Roman Catholics
Observed on: First day of Lent

On Ash Wednesday devout Catholics attend church and have their foreheads marked with ashes in the shape of a cross. According to the Old Testament, ashes were believed to have been used for two purposes: as a sign of humility and mortality; and as a sign of sorrow and repentance for sin. In the Cayman Islands the day is commemorated with religious services. Ash Wednesday is also the beginning of Lent, a 40-day period of fasting.

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: April

This Carnival-like event is an annual affair, usually held after Ash Wednesday. The heart and soul of Batabano is the Mas' Bands (groups in elaborate costume). While many of the costumes have traditionally been inspired by the Caymans' magnificent marine environment, with interpretations ranging from manta rays to sea anemones, designers have begun to utilize their costumes to comment on social issues, both local and worldwide. Thousands of locals and visitors flock into the streets every year to celebrate Batabano. Steel pans provide the rhythms, and revelers in costumes created from a plethora of textures and colors fill the streets. The energy is electrifying. Communities and districts join together to create the floats and Mas' Bands compete for prizes. The local equivalent on Cayman Brac is known as Brachanal, held a week after Batabano.

Introduction

✿ HISTORY

From the seventh century C.E. on, overlapping empires inhabited what is now C.A.R. Initially they included the Kanem Bornou, Ouaddai, Baguirmi, and Dafour groups, who had their base in the upper Nile and Lake Chad. Other sultanates later took over, and slave trade became common. The traffic in slaves ran across the Sahara Desert and through to West Africa.

Although Rabah, the Egyptian Sultan, controlled Oubangui in 1875, this changed when in 1885 the Germans, French, and Belgians arrived. A convention with the Congo Free State granted the French possession of the right bank of the Ouban-gui River, and in 1894 Oubangui became a French possession. The French, having defeated Sultan Rabah (d. 1900), had established control throughout the country by 1903. The Ubangi-Shari territory became part of neighboring Chad in 1906. In 1910 French Equatorial Africa took control of Ubangi-Shari, along with Chad, Congo, and Gabon. Minor revolts followed in the wake of that consolidation. Barthelemy Boganda (1910–59) led the assembly in C.A.R. A Catholic priest, he was well known for his fight for African emancipation in the assembly. The country declared its independence from France on August 13, 1960.

From 1965 to 1969 the Central African Republic witnessed many coups under the self-declared emperor Jean Bedel Bokassa (1921–96). In 1993 Ange Felix Patasse (b. 1937) defeated David Dacko (1930–2003) and Kolingba (b. 1936), both former C.A.R. presidents, and ended 12 years of military rule. This government supported democratic reform, but another disastrous period of political and social unrest followed in 1996 and 1997. Still Patasse returned to power after the elections. There was another military coup in March 2003.

GEOGRAPHY AND CLIMATE

The Central African Republic lies on a plateau between the Congo and Chad basins. Geographically the region is marked with plateaus and some scattered hills in the southwest and the northeast parts of the country. The Oubangui River and the Bangos Mountains are the most striking physical features.

The country has a tropical climate. Its two major seasons are a dry season and a rainy season. The rainy season starts in March and continues until October; the dry season begins in November and continues through February. The harvest rains fall from July to September. January and February are the driest months. Natural hazards occur in the form of floods and hot and dry winds. Natural resources are abundant; diamonds, oil, gold, uranium, timber, and hydropower are the country's main resources. However Central Africa faces several problems including poaching, deforestation, and the encroaching desert.

ECONOMY

The majority of the country's revenue comes from agriculture and forestry. Half the gross domestic product (GDP) is derived from the agricultural sector. Sixteen percent of earnings come from the timber industry, and diamonds contribute to 64 percent of export earnings. The main agricultural

The Bush Meat Crisis of Central Africa

Wildlife poaching for both commercial purposes and consumption is adversely affecting the wildlife throughout Africa. In the Central African Republic the situation is no better. This illegal bush meat trade could prove to be an economic and health threat for coming generations. In 1999 the Bush Meat Crisis Task Force was founded. It now has a large group of professionals working in various parts of Africa with the single aim of preserving wildlife. It focuses on keeping a tally of the wildlife population, fund-raising, and preservation.

crops include cotton, coffee, tobacco, yams, millet, manioc (also called cassava or yucca), timber, and corn. Textiles, logging, diamond mining, and assembling bicycles and motorbikes are the country's major industries.

The Central African Republic faces certain endemic problems, such as the lack of a skilled workforce, its landlocked position, and poor transportation facilities. Coups, internal conflict, and confrontations between the government and dissidents also contribute to the unsteady economy. Unequal distribution of income is a major cause of worry. Though nations like France have come forward to help, they can only meet about half of the humanitarian needs. Since C.A.R. is also one of the poorest countries of the world, the health hazards are quite daunting. Malnutrition, AIDS, and other diseases are widespread.

CULTURE AND LIFESTYLE

In the Central African Republic, the Banda and the Gbaya of the southwestern region form the largest ethnic groups. The Zande live in the southeast, the Aka Pygmies in the southwestern forests, the Mbororo in the western plains, and the Sara live in the north. Groups such as the Mondjombo, Banziri, Bouraka, Sangho, Yakoma, Bangou, and Dendi live along the Ubangi River. There has been a great deal of intermarriage among different ethnic groups. French is the official language of the country, but Sangho (also spelled Sango) is spoken by people along the Oubangui River and is the national language of the Central African Republic. Christians, animists, and a minority of Muslims are the major religious groups.

People in C.A.R. give great importance to clothing. For women loose tops are popular with a cloth wrapped around the hips as a skirt. Men's clothes are also loose and are printed with colorful African designs. There are tie-dyed and batiked clothes and handmade fabrics decorated with wood-block prints. Most women dress conservatively, since the standards set for women are more inflexible than those set for men.

In terms of literature the Central African Republic boasts a rich oral tradition. Stories, riddles, proverbs, and other inherited wisdom are the foundation. The legends of the Gbayas (also known as Bayas) have received special attention, and efforts are being made to translate their works into French. Musical instruments such as drums, ngombi (a bow harp with ten strings) or sanza (traditional guitar) accompany the songs and recitations.

Among the country's most inspiring landmarks are the enormous statues that stand at the Beforo Monument outside the town of Bouar. They are believed to have been carved by prehistoric people about whom very little is known. They are quite large and must have required significant ingenuity and strength to put in place.

❁ CUISINE

Rice, foutou (mashed plantain and cassava), and fufu, fermented cassava (cassava is an annual crop with starchy tuberous roots), served with grilled meat and sauce form the staple diet of Central Africans. The Portuguese introduced cassava into Africa from Central and South America in the 16th century. It was widely planted in Africa in the 19th century, because it can tolerate both drought and insects, making it an ideal famine food. Cassava can also be left in the ground for up to two years without spoiling after it matures, without any attention from a farmer. Spinach stew, made with tomatoes, peppers, chilies, onions, and peanut butter, is a popular dish.

Another popular stew is groundnut stew. It has okra, chicken, and ginger as the main ingredients. Gozo is a cassava paste that is fried. The local people also consume a cassava leaf salad. Bouiller is a favorite porridge made of rice. Capitaine fish is a delicacy. A great deal of ginger beer is consumed by the Central Africans.

nationalist in the Central African Republic and the leader of the Central African independence struggle. Boganda died in a plane crash on March 29, 1959. He had served as the prime minister of the Central African Republic from December 8, 1958, until his death. Founder of the Movement for the Social Evolution of Black Africa (actually Mouvement d'Évolution Sociale d'Afrique Noire, or MESAN), he is also well known for his efforts to unite the people of Central Africa.

Throughout this day people conduct prayer sessions, and the various political parties meet to remember the great leader of their country.

❁ LABOR DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: May 1

This day is a public holiday in many countries, including the Central African Republic, where it is considered labor union day. In 1889 the international socialist movement declared May 1 to be International Labor Day; it was scheduled to coincide with a general strike, planned by the American Federation of Labor (AFL) in 1890 in the United States to win the eight-hour workday. The May 1 observance of Labor Day has always been more radical than the early September version in the United States, which is advertised as a “workers’ holiday,” not an occasion for demonstrations and protests. It is sometimes referred to as May Day or Workers’ Day.

Spinach Stew

Serves 6

Ingredients:

- 2 small onions, chopped
- 2 Tbs. cooking oil
- 2 tomatoes, peeled and sliced
- 1 green bell pepper, chopped
- 2 pounds fresh spinach, chopped, or 2 10-ounce packages frozen spinach
- 1 tsp. salt
- 2 chili peppers, sliced, or ½ teaspoon ground cayenne pepper
- 4 Tbs. peanut butter

Preparation:

In a heavy skillet or stew pot, sauté onions in moderately hot oil until golden. Stir in tomatoes and green pepper. After a minute or so, add spinach, salt, and hot pepper. Cover, reduce heat, and simmer for five minutes.

Thin the peanut butter with several tablespoons of warm water to make a smooth paste. Add paste to the pot. Continue cooking for another 10–15 minutes, stirring frequently, and being careful not to let the mixture scorch. Add small amounts of water as needed so the stew does not stick to the pan.

Serve with rice or fufu.

Labor Day is a national holiday in C.A.R. and all public and private institutions remain closed on this day. Members of trade unions participate in meetings and marches.

❁ INDEPENDENCE DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: August 13

The former French territory of Oubangi-Shari became the Central African Republic on August 13, 1960. Barthélemy Boganda was elected the first prime minister of the country. The ruling Mouvement d'Évolution Sociale d'Afrique Noire (MESAN) was the main party. Since then the country has passed through some trying times—coups, internal violence, bloodshed, and corruption. This day honors the people who lost their lives in the struggle to win freedom for the nation. There are Independence Day parades, and prominent leaders address the nation on the economic, political, and social situation. Concerts, dance performances, and craft displays are part of the festivities.

❁ ANNIVERSARY OF THE PROCLAMATION OF THE REPUBLIC

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: December 1

Celebrations are held on this day to mark the country's attainment of nationhood. After World War II a rebellion broke out in the country that ultimately forced the French to grant self-government to the people of the Central African Republic. On December 1, 1958, under the French the country voted to become an autonomous republic and on August 13, 1960, achieved independence. The Central African Republic became the Central African Empire in 1976. Marshal Bokassa, who had headed the republic since 1965, was now called "emperor." But his leadership was marked by widespread violence and after a coup in 1979, former President David Dacko assumed power again. The country then regained the name of the Central African Republic. The day is celebrated with cultural activities, and schools also sponsor writing and art contests and special lessons to teach the children about their nation's history.

❁ CHRISTMAS

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: December 24–25

The Christian holiday of Christmas marks the birth of Jesus. In contrast to celebrations in most countries there is no traditional Christmas Day dinner in the Central African Republic; instead, the celebration is on Christmas Eve. Christmas festivities focus on children. Children gather at a neighbor's house for tea. Along with tea (served with hot milk), they are typically offered fruit samba (punch), makaras (different types of small cakes), and bon bons (candy). The children then gather around a crib under the Christmas tree and sing traditional songs and hymns in Sangho and French. At night they lie in their beds, waiting for Saint Nicholas (Santa Claus) to place gifts under their pillows.

Rites of Passage

❁ BIRTH

Celebrating the birth of a newborn is an elaborate affair in the Central African Republic and always includes a feast and singing. There is a call-and-response song that is sung during birth ceremonies:

"Ei-ob mama ti mbi, ti mbi aso mbi"

("Ei-Oh mother of mine, my belly hurts me.")

The response:

"Kanda be ti MO!"

(Literally, "Tie up your heart," but meaning, "Tough it out.")

People of this country do not always give the child the father's name. It is more important to give a meaningful name perhaps referring to an event, the place of birth, or a mark of affection or admiration. In urban areas today parents have started giving the child the father's name, in addition to a special meaningful name.

❁ COMING OF AGE

Although the practice of ritual female genital cutting (FGM) has raised serious human rights questions throughout the world, FGM is prevalent in approximately 10 of the C.A.R.'s 48 ethnic groups, and 50 percent of the women in C.A.R. have undergone FGM. There has been a law against the practice since 1966, and the government has taken a number of measures against the practice. Yet in spite of its cruelty and the danger of infection, it continues to be performed in the Central African Republic during infancy or adolescence. The procedure is usually carried out on girls between 4 and 12 years of age. The Central Africans celebrate the initiation ceremony with gifts in the form of money, jewelry, and clothes. Grand feasts are hosted for family members and friends. Cows, chickens, and goats are slaughtered for the feast.

Male circumcision takes place at puberty and is of utmost importance, since it enables a boy to complete his transition from boyhood to manhood. Skilled and experienced elders of the community perform the circumcision ritual in the Central African Republic.

Introduction

✿ HISTORY

In prehistoric times fragmented tribes occupied Chad. Their cave paintings and skulls can be seen here. In the eighth century C.E. the Berbers settled in Chad and established rule over the local tribes. Muslim traders, who carried on commerce with the local population, introduced Islam to Chad in 1085. By the 16th century three kingdoms flourished: the Kanem Bornu, the Bagirmi, and the Ouaddai. The Kanem Bornu Empire was the largest of the three. It built its power by annexing territories dominated by smaller local kingdoms.

Between 1883 and 1893 Rabih al Zubayr (?1840–1900), the Sudanese ruler, conquered all three kingdoms. Then, in 1891, Chad became a French colony. The French overthrew the Sudanese ruler and merged Chad into the French Equatorial area, along with Ubangi Shari (now known as the Central African Republic), Congo, and Gabon.

The region remained a French colony until 1960. In World War II it was the first French colony to join the Allies.

After the war in 1946 Chad became an autonomous republic under French governance. The first premier François (Ngarta) Tombalbaye (1918–75) spearheaded a freedom movement, which ultimately succeeded in winning Chad its independence. It attained independence in 1960.

Among the French colonies in Africa, Chad was the most neglected of all. The French focused mostly on the southern part of the country where they had cotton plantations. As a result Chad's south developed considerably, while the people of the north lost out on educational opportunities and development. And when Chad won its independence, the people of the south dominated. Chad's early years of independence were not peaceful, and decades of civil war, inter-tribal violence, and repeated Libyan invasions ensued. Guerilla warfare prevailed in Chad, and French troops had to be brought in to settle a long-standing dispute between the government and the rebels.

From the Muslim north what was to be a long drawn-out civil war broke out in 1965 over taxation. This became the first of several attempts by Libya to press its historical and cultural claims to Chad, Muammar al-Gadhafi (b. 1942) invaded in 1975 and captured a portion of Chad; two years later Libya invaded the rest of the country. General Felix Malloum, who had been Tombalbaye's chief of staff, led a coup against Tombalbaye in 1975 in which Tombalbaye was killed. Malloum installed himself as president and prime minister. In 1978 Hissene Habre (b. 1942) was made prime minister, but he lasted only a year because Malloum's regime collapsed in 1979. The civil war continued throughout Malloum's tenure.

Chad was still in a state of chaos in 1979, when nine rival groups came together to form a new provisional government. Goukouni Oueddei (b. 1944), also a former rebel leader, headed it. In 1980 conflict broke out again, and Hissene Habre of the Forces Armées Nationales du Tchad (Armed Forces of Chad, FANT) ousted Oueddei, abolished the position of prime minister, and declared himself president of Chad, installing a regime of terror and more killing. Thousands of tribes Habre thought hostile to the regime were destroyed, and many of Habre's political opponents were executed.

The president of Libya came up with a proposal for merging Chad with Libya in 1980. When Chad refused Libya withdrew from interfering in the country's affairs, only to invade again in 1983, this time entering from the northern side. The French sent its troops to defend Chad from the Libyan invasion. In 1987, with military support from France and the United States, Chad's troops successfully forced most of the Libyan troops from the country.

However, during this period, vicious rivalries between various ethnic groups like the Zaghawa, the Gorane, and the Hadjerai had resulted in violent clashes. In April 1989 the country's leader was Habre, a Gorane. After renewed violence broke out, Idriss Deby (b. 1952), one of the leading generals from the Zaghawa ethnic group, defected and fled to Sudan. As the leader of a Zaghawa rebel group the Patriotic Salvation Movement, he intensified attacks on Habre and other Goranes. People in Chad hated Habre's brutal regime of terror and genocide and, with the backing of Libya, and with no resistance from the French troops stationed in Chad, Deby led a successful coup against Habre and declared himself dictator in the country in December 1990. Thereafter, Habre went exile to Senegal.

Until the civil war ended in 1996 Chad faced many problems ranging from ethnic warfare to the Libyan invasion. After declaring himself the new president of Chad, Déby dissolved the legislature. In 1994 a new constitution was drafted, and in 1996 multiparty elections were conducted. Déby won these elections.

In northwestern Chad, however, a rebellion led by Déby's former defense minister Youssouf Togoimi (b. 1953) broke out in 1998. Togoimi's movement was called the Movement for Democracy and Justice in Chad. Although there has been a willingness to move toward democratic reform in the region, an ethnic oligarchy is still in power there.

In 2001 Déby was reelected, but his regime has been criticized for mismanagement, numerous civil rights abuses, and corruption. The government has consistently neglected to prosecute security force personnel accused of killings, rape, torture, arbitrary arrest, and detention. Lengthy pretrial detention remains a problem, and incarceration is a life-threatening experience. Violence and societal discrimination against women is common, and female genital mutilation (FGM) is widespread. Although Déby and Togoimi declared a ceasefire in 2002, conflicts persisted.

Eventually, the southeast-based rebels approached the government and signed a peace treaty.

In the 1980s Chad was declared the poorest country in the world. The World Bank helped Chad by providing $200 million to construct a pipeline to connect Chad's oil fields to those in Cameroon. It was considered a first step toward economic development. According to the agreement signed between Chad and the World Bank, 80 percent of the profits would be allotted to health, education, and social welfare. The country's prospects are good because of its oil resources, and its treasury is expected to increase by 50 percent. Chad faces a new major problem, however—refugees. Due to the conflict in neighboring Sudan, refugees have been compelled to come to Chad where they struggle with hunger, lack of medical aid, and epidemics in numerous refugee camps. Though Chad falls in the developing nations' category today, its people continue to fight a grim battle for survival.

❁ GEOGRAPHY AND CLIMATE

Situated in central Africa and the south of Libya, Chad has a tropical climate. It is a landlocked country, three times the size of Texas. It shares its borders with the Central African Republic, Cameroon, Niger, Sudan, and Nigeria. At one time Lake Chad which borders both Chad and Cameroon, was the second largest lake in Africa. Early in the 21st century, however, it was 10 percent smaller than its original size.

Chad has four climate zones: arid plains in the center, deserts in the north, dry mountains in the northwest, and tropical lowlands to the south. Chad faces many environmental hazards. The harmattan winds in the north are hot and dry and are followed by droughts and plagues. The average temperature is over 100°F. The rainy season begins in June and lasts until September.

❁ ECONOMY

Chad has impressive oil fields that have been discovered on the northern side of Lake Chad. A Cameroon–Chad pipeline, with investment from ExxonMobil (40 percent) and other major oil companies, promises to make the country one of the world's leading oil exporters. The citizenry of Chad is, however, dubious about the wealth oil promises to bring into this poor country. In October 2003 when President Idriss Déby opened the multibillion dollar facilities in the southern Doba basin, civic groups called

The Baggaras of Chad

The second largest group in western Sudan is the cattle-herding tribes, who spill over into eastern Chad. They are collectively called the Baggaras. The Rizaygat, Shuwia, Taisha, Habbaniya, and Humr/Messiria are the main Baggara tribes. They follow the rituals of the Sunni Muslims, but they prefer calling their religion the folk Islamic faith. They are concerned about the evil eye and protect their cattle from the envious eyes of other people. They often tie a necklace or bracelet (with Koranic verses inscribed on them) around their bodies to protect themselves from witch doctors. Baggaras are conservative Muslims and are strict in their adherence to praying five times a day facing Mecca.

The way these cattle-herders travel is seasonal. They make tents from grass, sticks, and mats. Women and men in these communities cannot eat together if they are not married. Men are allowed have up to four wives, but due to financial constraints, most men have only two or three wives and several children.

The women wear loose-fitting dresses, called tobes. During festivals women adorn themselves with jewelry. The amount they wear represents their family's social status and the wealth they possess.

for a national day of mourning as a silent protest against the ongoing violations of basic human rights in Chad, as well as against insecurity and falling living standards. Armed attacks on citizens, murders, rapes, extortion, and robberies continue to take place. In addition, the constant and lengthy cut-offs of water and electricity and the deterioration in basic sanitation services are a growing threat to public health."

Chad is also rich in natron, a complex of sodium carbonate used by the Egyptians in mummification. This has been found in the Lake Chad and Borkou areas. In addition, uranium deposits, gold, and wolframite have been found in many areas.

However, the country and its people are currently dependent on foreign capital for development. Chad's economy has long been handicapped by its landlocked position, high-energy costs, and a history of instability. Most of the people in Chad are engaged in subsistence agriculture. Other main fields of labor are forestry, fishing, and animal husbandry. There are major hazards to the economy caused by the country's geographic isolation, bad infrastructure, and continuing political uncertainties.

Fun Fact

A balafon is a pentatonic (a five-toned scale) or heptatonic (a seven-toned scale) xylophone of West Africa, with 18 to 21 keys. The keys, made of rosewood, are suspended on a bamboo frame over gourd resonators of graduated sizes. This arrangement produces a continuous nasal buzzing sound due to small holes of spider paper in the gourds.

CULTURE AND LIFESTYLE

Chad is a culturally diverse nation with many rich tribal heritages. Arabic and French are the two official languages of the country, and many Chadians speak several languages. In addition to the official languages there are hundreds of other tribal languages that are widely spoken.

Each of Chad's ethnic groups follows its own religious beliefs and customs. The music of each is different and so is the folklore. The cultural tales of the south are totally different from those of the north. Black African and other non-Muslim groups constitute a large part of the population. There is also a sizable Catholic population.

In the south the Sara, Ngambaye, Moundang, and Massa predominate. Most of them are Christians. The Sara group is the biggest ethnic group in Chad, with an interest in the educational opportunities provided by the French. The people of the Sara tribe occupy many major civil positions of the country.

A unique social structure is the main characteristic of the Maba tribe. They rely on friendships for aid. People belonging to the griots, the singers responsible for recounting histories and genealogies, play traditional music to earn their living. The people from central Chad are nomadic.

The northern portion of the country, inhabited by the nomadic Muslim tribes, is called the heart of Sahara. The Toubou tribe is dominant here. They are Muslims and descendants of Berber migrants (indigenous inhabitants of the Maghrib region, located north of the Sahara desert and west of the Nile River). In 1982 the Toubou people numbered 1.5 million and controlled Chad. Very clan-oriented, these people are herders who prefer to be independent. They are also considered strong on the battlefield.

CUISINE

Millet, a versatile grain that can be prepared in numerous ways, is the staple food of Chadians. Chadians make pancakes or balls with it, which are then dipped in sauces and eaten. They also use it as a paste. In the northern parts of Chad millet is called aiysh, and in the south, biya. Another staple food is sorghum, and rice is popular in some areas. Wheat and corn are not easily available.

Pork is famous in N'Djamena and the southern areas, but Muslims do not eat pork, so in the north, there is a great demand for beef and chicken. Live-stock herding is common in these areas.

Chad's lake and rivers supply a variety of fish. Capitaine (Nile perch) is the most widely available.

Music of Chad

Chad is ethnically diverse, and each region has its own genre of music and dance for which it is known. The Fulani tribe, for example, is well known for its music in which single-reeded flutes are played. The griots (praise-singers) use the five-stringed kinde (a bow harp), and different varieties of horns. In the region of the Tibesti Mountains, the folk music of the Teda people features men's stringed instruments and women's vocal music. Stringed instruments like the keleli are used to "speak for" male performers, since it is considered inappropriate for a man to sing in front of an adult woman. Lutes and fiddles are also popular, and a group calling itself "Tibesti" popularized the southern style of music called sai.

Traditional Chadian instruments include the hu hu (a stringed instrument with calabash loudspeakers), the kakaki (a tin horn), maracas, lutes, kinde, and horns. A ceremonial type of horn is still used among the elite: Waza is a musical ensemble that plays long royal trumpets, used in coronations and other upper-class ceremonies. Other regional varieties of music include the flute and drum music of the Kanembu and the balafon (a xylophone), whistle, harp, and kodjo drums of the Sara people, while the Baguirmians are known for their superb drum and zither music, as well as a folk dance featuring a mock battle in which dancers wield large pestles.

Other common varieties in these regions are tilapia, eel, and carp. A mud-dwelling catfish called balbout is available during the rainy season. Banda, a large smoked fish, is also a major part of Chadian cuisine. In Chad, fish are dried, salted, or smoked before they are sold. Salanga is a product that is made from dried or salted fish. Chad exports salanga, balbout, and other varieties of fish and fish products to both Cameroon and Nigeria.

Chadians combine fish and meat in one pot, making a single dish out of them. Kebabs are also popular, as are omelets served with rice and meat, and all kinds of fruit juices. Dates also figure prominently in the cuisine of Chad.

throughout the world. It is believed that Julius Caesar declared January 1 as New Year's Day since this was the day on which Roman citizens assumed new duties. Each year a festive spirit reigns as people organize parties, parades, and celebrations that begin on New Year's Eve.

New Year's is celebrated with great enthusiasm in Chad. On New Year's Eve people attend private parties or mass celebrations and usher in the new year with singing, dancing, and partying. On January 1 all government offices, schools, and colleges are closed.

Chad attained its independence peacefully on August 11, 1960, after being under French rule for almost 100 years. Chad was granted the status of an autonomous republic by the French on November 28, 1958. When efforts to form a federation with three French Equatorial African states didn't work out, it became an independent republic.

Because heavy rains in August often marred the celebrations and festivities, the government

The Kirdi of Chad

The Kirdi are a group of tribes living in the southwestern regions of Chad. In earlier times, all the people belonging to this group were pagans, and the word kirdi means "pagan." Today, however, many have embraced Islam. The Kirdis believe in one God, but they pray to their ancestors because they think the ancestors will talk to God for them.

Each tribe in this group speaks its own dialect of the Chadic language Biu-mandara. The group consists mainly of farmers who cultivate crops like millet and maize (corn). They also grow plants used for medicinal purposes and engage in hunting and other activities. Women participate in household activities, make clay objects, play with the children, and raise small crops.

As soon as the children attain puberty, the young men are given separate huts. After marriage, they live in them with their wives. Polygamy is allowed, but men in these groups are generally monogamous. The Kirdi people like music and dance, favoring instruments such as horns, harps, and drums.

shifted the observance to January, and Chad's independence is now celebrated on January 11 instead of August 11. On Independence Day most Chadians participate in Independence Day parades and many kinds of cultural activities that always include dance and music.

LABOR DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: May 1

While the earliest origins of May Day are ascribed to pagan celebrations practiced by farmers, peasants, and villagers in Europe well before the Middle Ages, conflicting opinions exist about the origins of Labor Day and its association with May Day. In 1889 the Second International, a consortium of socialist organizations, declared May 1 a day to recognize the importance of workers around the world and scheduled the first demonstrations and celebrations for the following year, 1890. They coordinated this observance with the strike called by the U.S. labor union, the American Federation of Labor (AFL), demanding an eight-hour workday.

Apparently the international socialist movement specifically chose May 1 to commemorate the AFL general strike. Although that event was postponed, May 1 was kept as the day for the observance. The United States made efforts to discourage the May 1 commemoration because of its socialist associations, so it celebrates a much less radical workers' holiday in September.

In Chad Labor Day is a national holiday, and all public and private institutions remain closed.

AFRICA DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: May 25

Africa Day, also known as Organization of African Unity Day (OAU Day), commemorates the historical decision of 32 nations to unify their efforts to form a united Africa on May 25, 1963. In the Ethiopian capital of Addis Ababa 32 countries of the African continent came together in 1963, and the Organization of African Unity (OAU) was formed. This day marks the unwavering commitment of African nations to foster a spirit of camaraderie and to work together for the overall development of the continent.

The idea to form a unified African organization was the brainchild of the President of the Independent state of Ghana, Kwame Nkrumah (1909–72) and the Emperor of Ethiopia Haile Selassie (1892–1975). Kwame Nkrumah was a Marxist-Socialist who studied in U.S. universities and returned to Ghana to participate in the independence movement. He was the champion of nonviolent protest against British rule in the region. When Ghana was granted independence he was sworn in as the independent nation's first president. Haile Selassie, the last emperor of Ethiopia, led his country to victory against the Italian occupation during World War II, and worked with Kwame Nkrumah to foster a spirit of unity among all African countries.

At present there are 53 member nations in the OAU. The OAU has been instrumental in ending colonial rule in Africa and has also played a key role in resolving regional disputes and internal conflicts and wars in Africa. The OAU intends to promote peace, human rights, and unity among all African nations.

In Chad Africa Day is a national holiday. It is commemorated with seminars and workshops, all of which focus on problems faced by Africa and development activities taking place on the entire continent as a whole.

REPUBLIC DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: November 28

Chad was under French domination for nearly a century. On September 28, 1958, France held a referendum on territorial autonomy. The results favored the dissolution of French Equatorial Africa and the granting of autonomy to the four constituent states: Chad, Gabon, Central African Republic, and Congo (Brazzaville).

Accordingly, on November 28, 1958, the French government made Chad an autonomous republic within the French Overseas Community. Since then November 28 has been celebrated as Republic Day in Chad. Because it is a national holiday, all shops, offices, and educational institutions are closed on November 28.

EID AL-ADHA

Observed by: Muslims

Observed on: Tenth of Dhu al-Hijjah, the 12th month of the Islamic calendar

Eid al-Adha is an important festival for Muslims all over the world because it celebrates Ibrahim's (Abraham's) unquestioning obedience to God when he was told to sacrifice his young son Ishmael in order to obey God's command. According to the Koran, Ibrahim was holding the axe over Ishmael's head when God's voice told him to sacrifice a ram instead. Muslims honor Ibrahim for his willingness to do God's will.

Muslims in Chad observe Eid al-Adha by going to their local mosques to offer prayers with their friends and relatives. Then a sheep or a goat is sacrificed, and a lavish feast follows. Some portion, usually one-third, is distributed among the poor.

Eid al-Adha also marks the end of the pilgrimage, or hajj, to Mecca that every Muslim is required to undertake at least once in his or her life.

GOOD FRIDAY

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: Friday before Easter

Good Friday falls on the Friday before Easter and is the last Friday of Lent. This Christian festival commemorates the Crucifixion of Jesus. It has been in the Christian liturgical calendar even longer than Easter has although no one is sure why it is called Good Friday. Some have suggested that the use of good in the name goes back to Old English and means “God’s” Friday, while others interpret good to mean something like “observed as holy.” This observance is also known as Black Friday and Sorrowful Friday, and in Eastern Orthodox Churches it is called Great Friday.

In Chad people attend prayer services, and the life and teachings of Jesus are remembered. In bigger towns special communal Good Friday services are held and attended by thousands of people. The service is followed by cross-bearing processions that imitate Jesus’ last journey.

Consumption of meat, alcohol, and other indulgences are strictly prohibited during the 40 days’ fasting of Lent. Many people also fast on Good Friday, while others eat a light meal. It is a day filled with sadness. Gospels and plays showcasing the life of Jesus are a regular feature during Holy Week in Chad.

EASTER

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: First Sunday after Lent

Easter is a Christian feast that celebrates their belief in Jesus’ Resurrection from the dead. It is sometimes known as Resurrection Day. This is a day of utmost importance because the fundamental teaching of Christianity is that Jesus, through his death, freed all humanity from the burden of sin.

The holiday falls on the first Sunday after the month of Lent and is celebrated by Christians the world over. They often buy new clothes for this special day and go to church to pray and participate in special services.

The word “Easter” is derived from the name of the Germanic goddess Eostre or Eastre. She was the revered mother goddess of the Saxon people who lived in northern Europe. Easter eggs, associated with Eostre’s rituals and symbols of new life, are now associated with the Christian festival.

ASSUMPTION

Assumption Day commemorates the Virgin Mary’s Assumption into heaven. According to legend when Mary was dying at the age of 73, long after Jesus had ascended to heaven, all the Apostles visited with her before her death except St. Thomas, who arrived too late to speak with her. Moreover when he did arrive, her body could not be found because she had been raised up to heaven. Christians believe that her soul and body were united at Jehoshaphat (Mary’s Tomb), and St. Gabriel took her soul to heaven.

All Saints’ Day is a Christian feast that honors all the saints (known and unknown) of Christianity. It is believed that All Saints’ Day celebrations began after the consecration of the Pantheon at Rome to the Blessed Virgin by Pope Boniface IV (r. 608–15). The Feast of All Saints has been celebrated on November 1 since the time of Charlemagne (742–814). Later it was declared a holy day of obligation (an observance considered mandatory for all Catholics) by Louis the Pious (778–840) at the instance of Pope Gregory IV (r. 827–44).

Rites of Passage

❁ BIRTH

One of the earliest tribes in Africa to convert to Islam was the Bagirmi Fulani, a branch of the Fulani tribe that occupies the Bagirmi region of south-central Chad. Children hold a vital position in their social life, because the Fulanis believe that people live for generations through their children. For them children represent the future. If a Fulani dies without seeing his or her children, he or she is considered to have died a sad death, so a child's birth is always celebrated with a grand feast.

When the people of this tribe welcome the first son into the family, the naming ceremonies are elaborate. According to them a man's features and his name will last as long as he has a son. The child is expected to bring with him all the happiness and prosperity that the family will enjoy in the future. Relatives and friends from all over the locality and the neighboring regions join the family on this occasion.

❁ COMING OF AGE

The Sara group of Chad has important initiation rites that mark a boy's transition from childhood to adulthood. Different groups follow different rites, but the most popular in Chad is yondo, a male initiation ceremony. The yondo, which symbolizes male authority and male bonds, takes place every six or seven years, and boys from all the Sara villages come for the rites.

Elders from their families often accompany the initiates. Sons or brothers who have completed their initiation ceremony attend but stay in a different house. Women must stay away altogether.

During yondo elderly males take the initiates to the bush area for a predetermined period of time. The boys are taught about their tribe's way of life and learn tribal secrets. In earlier times these rites used to go on for months, but the celebration has been shortened. The ritual of circumcision is also a part of yondo. Following the rites, initiates do not return to their actual homes.

Though there are coming of age ceremonies for women, too, these celebrations are shorter and less elaborate. Female genital mutilation, or FGM, is practiced in all areas of the country. There is no law specifically prohibiting FGM, and 60 percent of the women in Chad have undergone the procedure. Furthermore, the government has shown little interest in trying to eradicate the practice. Household responsibilities and moral values are taught to girls during these procedures.

❁ MARRIAGE

Among the Muslims in Chad women usually marry in their teens. In most of the groups men have more than one wife. In some groups the bridegroom's family pays a bride-price in order to get the woman their son wants to marry; in other cases the woman enters the man's home bringing a dowry in the form of cash, jewelry, and gifts.

The wedding ceremonies in the northern parts of Chad are interesting. In these areas, a mock ceremony is staged after marriage in which the bride is stolen from her family. After this performance the girl's family observes a mock mourning ritual.

❁ DEATH

In Chadian society ancestors play a vital role in bringing the living and the dead closer. They act as the link between the real world and the supernatural. It is believed that ancestors can interfere in people's daily affairs. People who died in the recent past are more likely to interfere, since they do not leave the Earth immediately after death. For a certain period of time they will wander between the Earth and the other world. Therefore, many rituals are conducted to satisfy the dead and ask them to leave. It is an aid in forgetting the grief caused by the death of this person and also in restoring social order. Many rites take place to relieve the spirits.

Among the Sara there is a belief that lightning and water spirits encourage violent deaths and also inspire other spirits to interfere in the day-to-day activities of their relatives. These spirits may come and live with the family or children. They can also take different forms or enter the bodies of living individuals. Since the spirits can cause harm, rites must be conducted to appease them. In this tribe the New

Year is celebrated on the first new Moon after the harvest. On this day major hunting activities take place and whatever is caught is offered to the ancestors.

In many villages the village chief holds supreme power, since he is believed to be the messenger between the living and the dead. In centralized societies the ruler of a particular community is expected to possess divine powers and to have a link between the natural and the supernatural.

Religion in Chad

The intricate system of relationships among the living and the dead, animals, plants, other natural phenomena, and the supernatural all inspire the animistic religions of Africa. It is believed that life forces animate all things. The relationships are all ordered, and humans are part of that order. Antisocial acts or bad luck disturb the world's balance, and the balance must be restored through sacrifices, prayers, and libations.

Ancestors are given considerable importance in Chadian society and beliefs, because they bridge the gap between the living and the dead. Chadians also believe in spirits and especially fear the spirits of the Sun, lightning, and water.

Introduction

✿ HISTORY

Although other accounts may eventually prove to be accurate regarding Chile's first inhabitants and their origins, contemporary thought posits that the original inhabitants of Chile were Amerindians who had gradually worked their way south from the Bering Straits about 10,000 years ago. The people of this Stone Age culture, called the Chinchorro, established themselves in fertile valleys along Chile's coast, and remnants of such a population are still living in the far southern tip of the country. The Chinchorro fished northern Chile's waters from 6000 to 1600 B.C.E., and the mummies they left behind are telling surprising stories to 21st-century archaeoparasitologists.

Although the Incas attempted to extend their empire south into northern Chile during the 15th century, the Chinchorros fiercely opposed their efforts and the Incas were forced to abandon the project.

The Portuguese navigator Ferdinand Magellan (1480–1521), seeking a southern passage to the Pacific (the Strait of Magellan), first saw Chile in 1520, when his ships navigated the channel that would become the Strait of Magellan.

Diego de Almagro (1475–1538), accompanied by his band of Spanish conquistadors in 1535, who traveled south from Peru in quest of gold, were the next Europeans to reach Chile. Like the Incas before them, the local population repulsed their encroachment.

It was not until 1541 that the first permanent European settlement Santiago was established by one of Francisco Pizarro's (1475–1541) lieutenants. The Spanish failed to find the gold and silver they were seeking, but the agricultural value of Chile's central valley attracted them, and Chile became part of the Viceroyalty of Peru, which encompassed most of Spain's South American colonies. In the course of their gradual conquest of the continent the Spaniards found hundreds of thousands of Indians from various cultures in what is now called Chile, who survived primarily through slash-and-burn agriculture and hunting.

The European conquest of Chile was very gradual, and the indigenous cultures successfully beat the foreigners back time after time. In spite of these setbacks the Europeans persisted. Indigenous people as well as mestizos, inhabitants of mixed indigenous and Spanish parentage, were used as laborers on the huge estates of the Spanish rulers. In 1553, 1598, and 1655, massive Mapuche insurrections destroyed many of the fledgling colony's major settlements and, with each uprising, the southern border of the colony was pushed farther north. The Spaniards went south as far as the Río Biobío, where the Mapuche tribes held them back. The abolition of slavery in 1683 helped to defuse some of the tensions between the colonists and the Mapuche, and some mutually beneficial trade became possible. In the north, however, the indigenous inhabitants were overcome by a different enemy—infectious diseases brought by the Spanish—to which they had no natural immunity.

The 1820s witnessed the culmination of South America's—and Chile's—struggle for independence from Spain. Bernardo O'Higgins (1778–1842), Chile's most famous patriot, became supreme director of a Chile that was only a fraction of the country's eventual size. After winning the War of the Pacific in 1883 against Peru and Bolivia, Chile added the Atacama Desert to its territories. Commerce and industry grew and led to a civil war in the 1890s, when the working class and the nouveau riche challenged the wealthy landowners' hegemony.

The liberals and conservatives continued alternately to dominate Chile's government until the 1960s, when the Christian Democrats came to power. They introduced social reforms of various kinds but were ousted by the radical left government of Salvador Allende (1908–73). This regime introduced radical measures, including the state takeover of many private enterprises and the wholesale redistribution of income.

On September 11, 1973, General Augusto Pinochet (b. 1915) led a bloody coup; many believe this was accomplished with the backing of U.S. agencies. Allende died during the coup; the official explanation was that he committed suicide. What followed was systematic genocide on a massive scale. During the coup as many as 80,000 people were estimated to have been killed. Pinochet's rule finally ended in 1988, when a referendum ousted him. In 1989 Christian Democrat Patricio Aylwin (b. 1918) came to power. Democracy nominally returned to Chile, though Pinochet continued to wield enormous influence until he was arrested in London. He was initially pronounced too ill to stand trial; but in 2001 a Chilean court stripped him of his immunity, a move confirmed by Chile's Supreme Court in 2004.

President Eduardo Frei (b. 1941) took the drastic step of accelerating human rights tribunals and inquiries into Pinochet's past. In this, however, he faced strong resistance from the military. Frei has made some progress in alleviating poverty. Ricardo Lagos (b. 1938), Frei's public works minister, succeeded him in 1999 as the first socialist since Allende to become president, winning election by a narrow margin.

The Chinchorro Mummies

The Chinchorro mummies, exhumed from the Atacama Desert (one of the driest places on Earth), are the oldest ever purposely created and go back 7,000 years, millennia before the Egyptians thought about mummifying their dead. (The oldest Egyptian mummy found is just 3,000 years old.) The Chinchorro mummies—eviscerated, dried, stuffed, fitted with wigs, and covered in colored clay—resemble modern art more than they do human beings. And it seems they loved their dead extraordinarily because they kept them nearby and spent considerable time repainting the mummies and continually touching up their work.

But something was wrong with the Chinchorros' health although they lived in a land free of pollution, at least the lethal sort that modern people must live with. They were bothered by numerous ailments, and 25 percent of their offspring died before they reached the age of one. More than one-third of the mummies had infections that ate away their leg bones, and one in five Chinchorro women had bones so porous that the vertebrae splintered from the weight of her flesh. On average the Chinchorros had a life expectancy of just 25 years.

For much of the 20th century scientists thought that most of the parasites common to Europe and Asia could not have survived the trek across Beringia, the temporary land bridge that enabled Asians to cross to what is now North America and populate the Western Hemisphere. The mummies left behind by the Chinchorros, those of ancient seal hunters in Alaska, prehistoric cave painters in southern Texas, and Inca corn farmers have, however, contradicted this assumption. Scientists now know that a host of parasites not only survived the Beringian cold, but others also awaited the immigrants as they explored the forests and coastline of their new home. The hunters died from heart failure caused by armies of nematodes that invaded their muscles. The intestines of foragers in the U.S. Great Basin were pierced by thorny-headed worms, and the throats, mouths, and lips of farmers in the Andes were ulcerated and rotted by protozoans. Life in the Americas for indigenous peoples before the Europeans arrived was not only brief but painful.

Easter Island

Easter Island, called Rapa Nui (“Great Rapa”) in Polynesian or Isla de Pascua (“Easter Island”) in Spanish, is called Te Pito te Henua (“Navel and Uterus”) by its inhabitants, descendants of the Polynesians who first settled it. Located in the south Pacific Ocean, Easter Island, one of the most isolated inhabited islands in the world, belongs to Chile although it is located 2,185 statute miles west of continental Chile. In 2002 it was home to 3,791 (2002 census), 3,304 of whom live in its capital city Hanga Roa. The island is famous for its numerous moai, thousand-year-old stone statues now located mostly along the coastlines.

The history of Easter Island can be related with the aid of a reconstructed king list, which also provides events and approximate dates since the fifth century. The island at one time supported a relatively advanced and complex civilization, but it apparently degenerated drastically during the 100 years before the arrival of Europeans. The Polynesians brought bananas, taro, sweet potato, sugarcane, and paper mulberry, as well as pigs and chickens with them.

European contact with the island began in 1722 on Easter Sunday when Dutch navigator Jakob Roggeveen (1659–1729) found it. By the mid-19th century the population was about 4,000 inhabitants, but by 1877 deportation of the people to Peru and Chile and the diseases brought by Westerners had reduced the population to a mere 111. The native Rapanui have since gradually recovered.

Modern Easter Island has virtually no trees, but the island was once home to subtropical moist broadleaf forests with a range of trees, shrubs, ferns, and grasses. The disappearance of the trees apparently coincides with a decline of the civilization. Excavated middens reveal a sudden drop in quantities of fish and bird bones as the islanders were unable to build boats for fishing, and the birds no longer had places for their nests. Chickens and rats became leading items of diet, and there is evidence of cannibalism based on human remains associated with cooking sites, especially in caves.

The survivors came up with new traditions to mete out the remaining resources. In the cult of the birdman (manutara), a competition was held every year: A representative of each tribe, chosen by its leaders, dove into the sea and swam across to Motu Nui, an islet, to find the season’s first Sooty Tern egg. The swimmer who returned first with an egg gained control of the island’s resources for his tribe for the coming year. Not every swimmer returned from these races, because the sea teemed with sharks.

Easter Island is probably most familiar as the site of hundreds of stone statues, called moai, whose creation and origins puzzled many for years. It is now thought that most of the moai were carved during a brief burst of creative megalithic activity, and archaeologists think that ceremonial site construction and statue carving occurred primarily between about 1100 and 1600. The most widely accepted theory of the statues’ origin is that they were carved by the Polynesian ancestors of the modern inhabitants (Rapanui) when the island was still forested, and resources were plentiful. It is possible that some statues were being carved when Jacob Roggeveen found the island. Most moai were carved out of a unique compressed volcanic ash or tuff found in only one quarry Rano Raraku. Work there seems to have been abandoned abruptly, because half-carved statues were simply left in the rock, approximately half of the known moai. The abrupt halt to an occupation that had so engrossed an entire population suggested some devastating event that ended the island’s customary life and traditional culture. Although many of the statues were still upright when Roggeveen arrived, by the mid-19th century all the statues had been overturned, although no one knows for sure why.

Some evidence suggests that statues were still being carved and continued until the population was drastically reduced when they were captured and removed by whalers and slave-raiders in the 19th century. The raiders succeeded in one thing: They destroyed almost all of the island’s oral traditions and the people’s knowledge of their culture, a devastation that will continue to complicate any efforts to put together a coherent historical understanding of Easter Island.

GEOGRAPHY AND CLIMATE

Chile occupies a thin strip on the western edge of the South American continent. It extends some 2,671 miles from north to south, between the Pacific Ocean and the mountains. It shares its eastern border mostly with Argentina and its northern border with Peru and Bolivia. Chile also claims Easter Island, Juan Fernández, and half of the southern island of Tierra del Fuego.

Although its width barely exceeds 124 miles, its enormous length and variations in altitude lead to extreme variations in climate. It features snow-capped mountains, river canyons, and plains. These include the famous Atacama Desert, which has been described as one of the most inhospitable regions on Earth and is so dry that no rainfall has ever been recorded there. Another region is the storm- and snow-prone region of Patagonia. And of course Chile’s coast features beaches and bays perfect for holidays by the shore.

As to climate the northern region features arid but temperate weather. The heartland enjoys a Mediterranean climate. Patagonia and Tierra del Fuego in the south are wind-, rain-, and snow-prone due to the influence of the Humboldt Current, a frigid stream of water that originates in Antarctica and brings cold air and cloudy, foggy weather to the coastal regions and into the river valleys. The rainy season in the heartland lasts from May until August.

❁ ECONOMY

Chile's copper exports have played a major role in its economic health, and it is a regional economic leader with high levels of foreign trade. In 1999 due to many factors—including a drop in exports (a result of the global financial crisis) and a severe drought—Chile experienced negative economic growth for the first time in more than 15 years. Unemployment remained a problem in the years that followed, but by the end of 1999 exports and economic activity had begun to recover.

Chile's agricultural products include fruit, wheat, corn, garlic, asparagus, and beans. It also produces beef, poultry, wool, and fish. Its main industries are copper, other minerals, foodstuff, iron and steel, wood and wood products, cement, and textiles.

Chile is a source, transit, and destination country for men, women, and children trafficked for the purposes of sexual exploitation and forced labor. Most victims are Chilean minors trafficked internally for sexual exploitation.

❁ CULTURE AND LIFESTYLE

The indigenous cultures of Chile have been virtually silenced by Europeans. In the middle and early modern Inca Empire northern Chile figured prominently as a cultural center, and the indigenous Mapuche and other Araucanian cultures blossomed in the central and southern regions. Those cultures, however, were dominated by the Spanish during the colonial period, and additional European influences, largely from Britain and France, started to make their influence felt during the 19th century and have continued. Chile's national dance is the cueca (short for zamacueca), which first appeared in the early 19th century. A traditional Chilean song, though not a dance, is the tonada, which originated in music brought with them by Spanish colonists. The tonada is distinguished from the cueca by an intermediate melodic section and a clearer melody.

In the mid-1960s native musical forms became linked to political activism and reformers like Chilean socialist Salvador Allende and his Popular Unity government. During Pinochet's rule, folk music served as a vehicle of protest, especially overseas. During the military dictatorship in the 1970s any form of public expression opposed to the junta was repressed, and protest songs were secretly played and circulated. In the late 1980s and after the return of democracy in the 1990s, new musical bands began to appear.

Spanish is Chile's official language, though a handful of native languages are still spoken. In the north there are more than 20,000 Aymara speakers; and in the south about half a million Mapuche speakers. Inhabitants of Easter Island, numbering about 2,000, speak the Polynesian language Rapa Nui. Chile's culture has been greatly influenced by the European incursions. Many Chilean intellectuals have been educated in Paris, and European influence is reflected in their art and literature. Chilean poets Gabriela Mistral and Pablo Neruda both won Nobel Prizes.

Roman Catholics constitute nearly 90 percent of the population.

❁ CUISINE

Seafood, beef, fresh fruit, and vegetables predominate in Chile's cuisine. Lomo a lo pobre, an enormous beefsteak with chips and two fried eggs, is a specialty. The parillada is a mixed grill of intestines, udders, and blood sausages. Curanto is a hearty stew of fish, shellfish, chicken, pork, lamb, beef, and potatoes. Humitas (corn tamales) and a variety of potato- and flour-based breads are popular. Chile also produces some of South America's finest wines.

❁ NEW YEAR'S EVE/DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: December 31–January 1

Chileans celebrate the New Year with warmth and gaiety. In fact the entire holiday beginning with Christmas is one of extremely high spirits. Many welcome the new year on the beaches, since the Southern Hemisphere is at the peak of its summer.

New Year celebrations involve food, drink, music, dancing, and, above all, nonstop parties. Several traditions distinguish Chilean celebrations from those observed elsewhere. One is cola de mono (monkey's tail), a beverage made from aguardiente (a strong alcoholic drink), coffee, milk, sugar, cinnamon, and egg yolk, which is traditionally drunk in the course of the festivities.

Another important aspect of Chilean New Year celebrations is fireworks displays. The city of Valparaíso is especially famous for them: Roman candles Chileans have several superstitions associated with the occasion. One involves eating lentils at midnight for good luck; another concerns walking around with a suitcase to increase one's chances to travel.

✿ LABOR DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: May 1

May Day is an important occasion all over South America but even more so in Chile in keeping with the nation's long background of leftist thought and politics. Since the end of the right-wing Pinochet regime Labor Day has been restored to its former significance.

In 1889 the Second International, a consortium of socialist organizations, declared May 1 a day to recognize the importance of workers around the world, and scheduled the first demonstrations and celebrations for the following year, 1890. They coordinated this observance with a strike called by the U.S. labor union the American Federation of Labor demanding an eight-hour workday. Chile's association with the occasion is very old. Demonstrations have been held on that day as far back as 1890, the first time May Day was observed. In modern times Chile pays tribute to workers and working people both officially and unofficially, with speeches, rallies, and public meetings.

✿ NAVY DAY

Observed by: General Public

Date: May 21

Chile celebrates May 21 as Navy Day or Glorias Navales Day, paying tribute to its naval forces. This day also commemorates the Battle of Iquique, which the Chilean Navy fought against Peru in 1879 during the Pacific War of 1879–84. The day's fighting started badly for Chile. Its ship Esmeralda was sunk, and naval hero Arturo Prat Chacón (1848–79) was killed in action. Soon, however, the Chileans gained the upper hand, virtually destroying the Peruvian navy. Chile observes the day with military parades, speeches, and commemorative services. In addition, many events, such as yacht and bicycle races, as well as marathons, are also organized.

✿ RECONCILIATION DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: First Monday in September

The day was instituted in recent times after the brutal regime of Pinochet was overthrown. It recognizes the terrible oppression and denial of human rights suffered by ordinary citizens. It is a day of quiet reflection and mourning for the tens of thousands who died during the Pinochet regime.

✿ INDEPENDENCE DAY AND ARMED FORCES DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: September 18 (Independence Day), September 19 (Armed Forces Day)

Chileans observe September 18 as Independence Day. On this day in 1810 they proclaimed independence from Spain (although they fought for eight more years to actually gain it). The next day is observed as Armed Forces Day. The day is set aside to honor the military and their past victories. In effect it amounts to a continuation of the Independence Day celebrations.

The occasion spawns a week of fiestas patrias (literally “patriotic parties”), where Chileans gather to celebrate their country, culture, and independence. Parades, music, dances, drinking, and eating traditional Chilean food are all part of the festivities. The armed forces stage a large parade in Santiago attended by the president. A prominent feature of the parades is displays by huasos, or traditional Chilean cowboys.

Many fiestas take place in ramadas, temporary open pavilions with thatched roofs, traditionally made from tree branches. Ramadas usually contain a dance floor, a place for a band, and tables for eating. Fondas, or refreshment stands, offer Chilean dishes. Empanadas, anticuchos (shish kebabs), and chicha (an alcoholic drink) are very popular. Many dance competitions also take place, with the national dance, la cueca, being the most popular.

❁ COLUMBUS DAY

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: October 12

In Chile Columbus Day is observed on October 12. Traditionally associated with Columbus's discovery of America, it has also in recent times begun to be recognized as Native American Day, acknowledging the cruelty of the conquest and oppression of indigenous peoples by European conquerors.

Chile also celebrates this day as Día de la Raza (Day of the Race), recognizing the mixed indigenous and Hispanic heritage of the continent. Colorful pageants, processions, music, and other cultural activities play an important part in the events.

Religious Holidays

❁ GOOD FRIDAY

Observed by: Christians
Observed on: Friday before Easter

This Christian festival commemorates the Crucifixion of Jesus. It has been in the Christian liturgical calendar even longer than Easter has although no one is sure why it is called Good Friday. Some have suggested that the use of good in the name goes back to Old English and means "God's" Friday, while others interpret good to mean something like "observed as holy."

For many years Good Friday was primarily a Catholic observance, but many Protestant Churches now hold special services from noon until three in the afternoon on this day to recall Jesus' last hours on the Cross. Many of the faithful fast on this day; when they eat it is generally fish instead of meat. Radio stations in Chile broadcast special "mourning" programs until Easter Sunday morning when Jesus' Resurrection is celebrated.

❁ EASTER

Observed by: Christians
Observed on: First Sunday after Lent

Easter marks the Resurrection and return of Jesus on the third day following his Crucifixion. Easter is a joyful occasion, celebrating rebirth and redemption. In Chile, people attend early morning church services. Afterward children engage in Easter Egg Hunts. Picnics and beach outings are also common because this observance falls in the autumn in Chile.

❁ CUASIMODO FESTIVAL

Observed by: Roman Catholics
Observed on: First Sunday after Easter

Cuasimodo celebrations are typically Chilean and rooted in custom rather than the precepts of Christianity. In colonial times it was traditional on the first Sunday after Easter for priests to take Communion to the houses of the aged and the sick, who had been unable to attend church during Easter. In those days priests would often be attacked on the way, so they began to venture out with groups of guards, mostly huasos or Chilean cowboys. After the priests performed the sacrament, the day would end with rodeos and horsemanship contests.

Over time this has become a festival in its own right. At the finish of the day an open-air Mass celebrates the Eucharist. Spectacular color, song, and excitement predominate. Naturally horsemanship displays are a big part of the occasion.

❁ ST. PETER'S AND ST. PAUL'S DAY

Observed by: Roman Catholics
Observed on: Late June/Early July

In Chile, the feast days of St. Peter and St. Paul hold special significance for fishermen (St. Peter, himself a fisherman, is the patron saint of fishermen). In villages all along Chile's coastline, Chilean fishermen decorate their boats and take the image of their patron saint out to sea to pray for good weather and large catches. Often this is done at night with candles and flares burning.

❁ ALL SAINTS' DAY

Observed by: Christians
Observed on: November 1

November 1 is celebrated as Día de Todos Santos, or All Saints' Day. This Christian festival over time has combined with preexisting indigenous festivities. The large pantheon of Christian saints is honored on this day, with each town celebrating its own patron saint with special services and prayers.

November 1 is also significant in South America because it marks the beginning of spring in the Southern Hemisphere. The rains return, and the Earth blooms. It is believed that the souls of the dead also return to reaffirm life. During this time doors are opened to guests. Hosts serve traditional Chilean dishes, particularly the favorites of their deceased relatives.

❁ CHRISTMAS

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: December 24–25

Chilean Christmas festivities start with decorating a tree with ornaments, tinsel, and candy. The Christmas Eve meal in Chile consists of chicken soup with potatoes, onions, and corn. For Catholics, attending Midnight Mass is customary. The main Christmas dinner, a midday meal on Christmas day, includes turkey, chicken, meat, salad, and rice. Rompon, a concoction of milk, eggs, and alcohol, is drunk, as is cola de mono (literally “monkey’s tail”), a beverage made of milk, eggs, coffee, cinnamon, and aguardiente (a strong alcoholic beverage). People also eat a Christmas pudding containing dried fruit.

Chile’s gift-bringer is called Old Man Christmas, and he climbs through windows rather than down chimneys. Since Christmas falls in the summer season, people go to the beach, the park, and other outdoor places on Christmas.

❁ FESTIVAL OF THE VIRGIN OF THE SONG

Observed in: North Chile

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: July

This five-day festival is held in honor of an indigenous woman who converted to Catholicism and to whom miraculous powers are attributed. It is celebrated across the north of Chile. The Atacama Desert hosts perhaps the most famous celebration, which is attended by thousands of people.

The festival features both Christian and Inca traditions, as well as Andean music, dance, and costume. Particularly dramatic are the scores of colorfully dressed dragon-dancers with their horned masks and swirling capes.

❁ FESTIVAL OF LA VIRGEN DEL ROSARIO

Observed in: Andacollo

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: December 22–24

La Virgen del Rosario, also known as la Virgen Morena or Dark Lady, is the patron saint of miners. Since mining is one of the most important industrial activities in Chile, it is not surprising that the saint, and also the festival, should assume national significance. According to some, its roots lie in the Quechua deity Anta-Coya, who was later subsumed into Catholicism.

Every year from December 22 to 24, hundreds of thousands gather at the town of Andacollo, in Norte Chico. Particularly popular events are cockfights and horse races.

Introduction

✿ HISTORY

Given a recorded history dating back to 1500 B.C.E., China is among the world's oldest civilizations. It is also the most populous nation in the world. Chinese history probably began around 5,000 years ago, and covers several different states and cultures of East Asia that have followed one after the other for the past 4,000 years. The country's earliest political organization is not known, but Chinese legends claim the region was once ruled by godly beings who taught the earliest people about hunting and agriculture, and gave them the gift of life. From 2205 until the 20th century, China was governed by a succession of dynasties, and its history is one of a series of divisions and unifications with periodic times of peace, war, and dynastic upheaval.

The first of these was the Xia Dynasty, said to have remained in power from 2205 until around 1818 B.C.E. There is no archaeological evidence of the Xia Dynasty, although several Neolithic sites have been claimed to be such. The Chou Dynasty (c. 1122–221 B.C.E.) is said to have succeeded the Xia. During this period the practice of Confucianism began, and the principle of a "mandate of heaven" was established, which held that the right to rule was given to the just and denied to the evil and corrupt. This later led to the Taoist view that heaven's wrath is expressed through natural disasters such as earthquakes, floods, and insect plagues. The Chou Dynasty is usually divided into three periods: the Western Chou period (1122–771), the period (722–481), and the Warring States period (481–221). The states of Jin and Jiu emerge as major competitors in the struggle to control an empire in China. A four-tiered class structure emerged: the lesser nobility (including scholars), the peasant farmers, the artisans, and the merchants. This was also the period of the Hundred Schools of Thought, when several schools of political philosophy emerged, including the four main schools: Confucianism, Taoism, Mohism, and Legalism.

Fun Fact

The Chinese were among the few civilizations to develop a writing system (ideogrammic) independently. The others were the Sumerians (cuneiform), Indians (Sanskrit-Devanagari), Mayans and Egyptians (hieroglyphics).

The Jin emerged victorious at the end of the Warring States period. The Chinese were first united under the Jin Dynasty (238–21). Prince Cheng named himself as the first Jin emperor and unified China under a central bureaucracy. The Jin standardized the writing system and completed the Great Wall that still surrounds China. The Jin Dynasty ended in 207, lasting only 14 years.

The Han Dynasty (207 B.C.E.–9 C.E.) that followed, was started by a man of humble origins Han, Kao Zu (or Liu Ping; 256 or 247–195). It engaged heavily in military conflicts. It created three economic regions, which led eventually to the formation of the Three Kingdoms. They ended up competing for control of the country. This period also witnessed the flowering of Buddhism and the fine arts. Stability came to China when it was reunited under the Sui Dynasty (581–618), and it continued under the Tang Dynasty (618–907). This was probably the most glorious period of Chinese history. Through military victories, China restored its control of the silk routes and became internationalized. Under the Tang emperors Buddhism flourished and split into two distinct schools: the Chan

(Zen) and Pure Land (Chinese Buddhist).

Under the Song Dynasty (960–1279) that followed, Confucianism experienced a revival, and China enjoyed tremendous urban and commercial growth. It was during this period that the Italian explorer Marco Polo (1254–1324) visited and wrote about China's incredible prosperity and its wealthy cities. The Yuan Dynasty (1280–1368), founded by Gublai Khan (1215–94), grandson of the famous Mongol ruler Genghis Khan (1162–1227), established a capital at what is now Beijing and militarized the nation's administration. Subsequently the Buddhist novice Hongwu (1328–98) established the Ming Dynasty (1368–1644) with two capitals, one at Beijing, the other at Nanjing.

In 1511 the Portuguese became the first European traders to reach China, and by 1557 they had established a trade mission in Macau. It was not until 1760, however, that other European merchants, principally from Britain, gained access to China's markets. The trade that followed tended to favor China, since the British bought more silk and tea than the Chinese did wool and spices. In 1773 the British decided to try to improve their trading position by selling opium to the Chinese. In 1839 a war erupted over the rampant addiction of the Chinese that resulted from this narcotic trade.

The Opium Wars, as they came to be known, continued until 1860, when treaties favoring the British led to the secession of Hong Kong.

Zhongguo

The Chinese refer to their nation as Zhongguo, which can be translated as “Middle Kingdom” or “Central State,” perhaps alluding to China as the center of its known world, with lesser tributary states around it. The name has not been consistently used throughout Chinese history because of its cultural and political associations. During the Warring States period, for example, it described only the states of the Yellow River (Huang He) Valley, and excluded the Jiu and Qin states, although the concept of “China” as the center was continually redefined as the country's political sphere of influence expanded territorially, and its culture came to incorporate foreign influences.

Zhengguo quickly came to be understood as including the Yangtze and Pearl River systems and, by the era of the Tang dynasty it had taken in regimes such as the Xianbei and Xiongnu, formerly characterized as “barbarian.” The People's Republic of China (PRC) controls Inner Mongolia, Xinjiang, and Tibet, while the Republic of China (ROC) controls Taiwan (also claimed by the PRC). Those regions are often included as part of Zhengguo, although their claims remain politically controversial.

Before and through the end of the Han Dynasty, the term Zhongguo could be understood to refer to the area immediately surrounding the imperial domain, those territories controlled directly by central authorities, or what is now called the North China Plain. With the influx of northern nomads, after the end of the Han Dynasty occurred, the meaning of Zhongguo lost its geographical reference and developed the more abstract sense of “political legitimacy” when it became necessary to distinguish the northern and southern areas. The northern Wei regime called itself Zhongguo and referred to the southern dynasties as yi, (“barbarian”). The southern dynasties, only recently separated from the northern, began to call them lu, which meant “criminal.”

The English term China (and the prefix sino-) is thought to go back to the Qin Dynasty, which unified the country and standardized the writing system. The name China, like Zhongguo, can be used to refer narrowly to China proper or, more broadly, to include Inner Mongolia, Manchuria, and Tibet. It is also used to refer to the People's Republic of China (PRC) or Taiwan (ROC), which causes some political problems. In most contexts it makes sense to refer either to “mainland China” or Taiwan.

Opium Wars

The Opium Wars, also called the Anglo-Chinese Wars, resulted in a series of humiliating military defeats for China. They also represent a sordid and vicious period in European history. The key player in the prelude to these wars was a brilliant and highly moral Chinese official named Lin Ze Hsu (1785–1850). Lin had become deeply concerned about the problem of opium addiction that threatened to destroy Chinese society in the 19th century.

Lin's concern put him in conflict with the British, who, through the British East India Company, were shipping large quantities of opium into Canton in exchange for tea and Chinese manufactured goods. The British could produce the opium in India since it was a British colony; by the 1830s they had established a major drug-trafficking business. This trade produced a country filled with drug addicts, as opium parlors proliferated throughout China. Moreover, the British traders generously bribed Canton officials in order to keep the opium traffic flowing. The effects on Chinese society were devastating.

Lin maneuvered himself into an appointment as the Imperial Commissioner at Canton. His express purpose was to cut off the opium trade at its source by rooting out corrupt officials and cracking down on British trade in the drug. He took over in March of 1839 and, within two months, took action against Chinese merchants and Western traders, shutting down all the traffic in opium. He did this by destroying all the existing supplies of opium and writing to Queen Victoria of Britain requesting that the British cease all opium trade.

The British, despite Lin's eloquent letter, refused to stop the opium trade. In response Lin threatened to cut off all trade with Britain and expel all the British from China. This led to the Opium Wars, which started when Chinese boats attempted to turn back British merchant vessels in November of 1839. Although this was a low-level conflict, it inspired the British to send a fleet of warships in June 1840. The Chinese, with old-style weapons and artillery, were no match for the British gunships, which ranged up and down the coast shooting at forts in addition to fighting on land. The Chinese were stunned by the technological superiority of the British land armies and suffered humiliating defeat.

The first of the Opium Wars ended in 1842, when the Chinese were forced to accept an ignominious peace under the Treaty of Nanking. In 1856 a second war broke out when the Chinese searched a British ship the Arrow in Guangzhou. The French joined the British in combat, and their combined forces led to the occupation of Guangzhou and Tianjin, compelling the Chinese to accept the treaty of Tianjin (1858), to which Russia and the United States were also parties.

Subsequently Western nations carved China into "spheres of influence." With respect to trade the United States proposed an Open Door Policy, and the Chinese agreed. Soon after China was forced to relinquish all of its colonial possessions. Vietnam, Laos, and Cambodia were ceded to the French, Burma to the British, and Korea and Taiwan to Japan.

The first half of the 20th century was a period of utter chaos in China. Intellectuals searched for a new philosophy to replace Confucianism, while warlords competed for imperial power. In southern China, Sun Yat Sen's (1866–1925) Guomindang (GMD), or Nationalist Party, established a base and began training a National Revolutionary Army (NRA). At the same time, talks between the Soviets and prominent Chinese Marxists resulted in the formation of the Chinese Communist Party (CCP) in 1921. Hopes of the CCP aligning with the GMD ended when Sun Yat Sen died in 1925, and Jiang Jie Shi (Chiang Kai-shek) (1887–1975), who favored a capitalist state supported by a military dictatorship, made his political debut in Beijing.

There was a split among the Communists, dividing those who focused on urban revolt and those who believed victory lay in uniting the countryside. By 1930 Mao Zedong (also Mao Tse-tung; 1893–1976), who established his forces in the mountains of Jinggang Shan, had marshaled a 40,000-person guerilla army. Although Jiang Jie Shi mounted four campaigns to exterminate the goerillas, each engagement resulted in a Communist victory. In 1931 Japan took advantage of the chaos in China and invaded Manchuria. Jiang Jie Shi did little to resist the Japanese and by 1939 they had overrun most of eastern China.

The defeat of the Japanese in World War II left China in the grip of civil war. On October 1, 1949, Mao Zedong declared the establishment of the People's Republic of China (PRC). Jiang Jie Shi and his followers fled in defeat to Taiwan, however, the United States continued to recognize him as the legitimate ruler of China. Meanwhile, although the PRC assumed power over a virtually bankrupt nation, an era of great confidence began to emerge. By 1953 inflation was arrested, industrial production had been restored to prewar levels, the redistribution of land was implemented, and China's first Five-Year Plan was launched. Next Mao initiated the Cultural Revolution (1966–70) and attempted to enhance his personal image. He published a book titled Quotations from Chairman Mao Tse-tung (usually referred to as “The Little Red Book”) and initiated a purge of his opponents. Universities were closed, intellectuals were killed, and temples were ransacked, all in an effort to wipe out China’s capitalist past and solidify the power of the Communists.

After Mao’s death in 1976 Chinese politics again saw conflict between moderates Zhou Enlai (1898–1976) and Deng Xiaoping (1904–97), and radicals and Maoists led by Mao’s widow Jiang Qing (1914–91). When Zhou died in 1976 the radicals prevailed. A public uprising against Jiang Qing and her associates led to further repression, and Deng disappeared for a time. However he returned to public life in 1977 and formed a standing committee of the Chinese Communist Party.

With Deng in charge China signed the 1984 Sino-British Joint Declaration (Britain agreed to return Hong Kong, a British colony since 1842, to China) and set out on a course toward economic reconstruction. However in the absence of political reform, general dissatisfaction with the Communist Party, soaring inflation, and increased demands for democracy led to widespread social unrest. This unrest climaxed in the student demonstrations of 1989 that led to the bloody Tiananmen Square massacre.

On July 1, 1997, British colonialism in China came to an end when Hong Kong was officially returned to China. Under what Deng Xiaoping labeled “one country, two systems,” Hong Kong embarked on one of the boldest experiments of the 21st century: capitalism under a Communist regime. In the mid-1990s China’s leadership passed to Jiang Zemin (b.

1926). Jiang charted a new course based on economic growth, and his successor Hu Jintao (b. 1942) instituted an even more aggressive program of economic modernization, exemplified in his decision to have China join the World Trade Organization (WTO).

GEOGRAPHY AND CLIMATE

China is located in the eastern part of Asia, on the west coast of the Pacific Ocean. It is the third largest country in the world (after Canada and Russia), with a total land area of nearly 4 million square miles. The distance from east to west measures over 3,231 miles and, from north to south, over 3,417 miles.

With a land border of 13,759 miles, China shares borders with 14 countries: Korea in the east; Russia in the northeast and the northwest; Mongolia in the north; India, Pakistan, Kazakhstan, Kyrgyzstan, Tajikistan, Afghanistan, Bhutan, and Nepal in the west and southwest; and Burma, Laos, and Vietnam in the south.

The coastline of China extends more than 8,700 miles. Across the East China Sea to the east and the South China Sea to the southeast, are Japan, the Philippines, Malaysia, and Indonesia. More than 5,000 islands are scattered over China’s vast territorial seas, the largest being Taiwan. One territorial sea and three neighboring seas altogether constitute nearly 3 million square miles.

China is a mountainous country with two-thirds of its total land area covered by mountains, hills, and plateaus. The highest mountain in the world, Mount Everest (29,035 feet), is located on the border between China and Nepal.

China has numerous rivers. The inland river system accounts for 36 percent of the total area in China. The Yangtze, Yellow, Heilongjiang, Pearl, and Huaihe are the major rivers. The Yangtze is the longest river in China and the third longest in the world, with a total length of 6,300 miles and a drainage area of more than one million square miles. It is an arterial waterway connecting such important cities as Shanghai, Nanjing, Wuhan, and Chongqing. The entire landmass of China has approximately 2,800 natural lakes with a total area of more than 49,709 square miles.

ECONOMY

Until the 1990s China was insular, and the rest of the world had little concrete knowledge about its economic and industrial condition. Around this time, however, it underwent rapid industrialization and restructured its economy. Thereafter it opened its doors to the world for trade purposes. During the recent past China has accounted for one-third of global economic growth, twice as much as the United States. In 2004 China’s official growth in gross domestic product (GDP) surged to nearly 10 percent. Even this may underestimate the true rate, however, which some economists calculate was as high as 13 percent.

China’s skyrocketing growth has helped to boost other economies with its huge hunger for imports, which surged by 40 percent in 2004 alone. While America’s industrial output has shrunk in the recent past, China’s has increased by almost 50 percent. As a result, its demand for commodities has skyrocketed, driving up prices. In the early years of the 21st century China accounted for one-third of the growth in global oil consumption and 90 percent of the growth in world steel demand. Ever since China signed the WTO treaty, its products have been flooding the open markets of neighboring countries, including India.

Fun Fact

In Nepal, Mt. Everest is called Sagarmatha, which means “goddess of the sky,” while in Tibet it is known as Chomolungma, “mother goddess of the universe.” In 1999 the world’s highest mountain had added an additional six feet to its stature.

❁ CULTURE AND LIFESTYLE

It has been said that every third person in the world is Chinese. In fact despite its stringent birth-control measures, China boasts the largest population in the world. Chinese society is still quite conservative, with deep-rooted traditions and a strong gender bias in this male-dominated country. The Chinese typically observe elaborate customs, rites, and rituals and are very conscious of symbols of social status, often regardless of wealth. Chinese are famous for their exquisitely beautiful calligraphy, painting styles, and a variety of ethnic handicrafts.

The Chinese calendar has no names for the months; rather, they are identified numerically in the order of their occurrence. The Chinese calendar is lunar-based, with the start of the lunar year determined by the cycles of the Moon. As a result, the beginning of the year can fall anywhere between late January and the middle of February. The calendar is also cyclical. Each year in the 12-year cycle is named for an animal, such as the rooster, tiger, rabbit, and snake. The Chinese believe that people born in a particular year will possess the traits of the animal that rules that year.

❁ CUISINE

Chinese cuisine is renowned throughout the world not only for its delicious taste and beautiful presentation, but also for its sheer variety and abundance. Food and cooking are considered integral parts of the nation's culture. Chinese chefs strive for harmony of sight, smell, taste, and texture, so that each dish is unique. The flavors must not overpower, yet must be strong enough to be tasted by the diners. In hot dishes a strong aroma stimulates the diner's appetite. Fragrances from fresh ginger root, garlic, or chili pepper are blended with wine, aniseed, cinnamon, peppercorn, or sesame oil. Soy sauce, sugar, vinegar, and other seasonings are used discreetly.

Public/Legal Holidays

❁ NEW YEAR'S DAY

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: January 1–2

In China the New Year (as it is calculated according to the Gregorian calendar) is not celebrated on as large a scale as the more important Chinese New Year, which falls about a month later. Still in China the Western New Year is a two-day, paid holiday for all employees. Parties are held almost everywhere, including parks, dance halls, and restaurants.

❁ LABOR DAY

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: May 1

International Labor Day is very important in China, since workers form the theoretical backbone of Communism. In 1889 the Second International, a consortium of Socialist organizations, declared May 1 a day to recognize the importance of workers around the world and scheduled the first demonstrations and celebrations for the following year, 1890. This was an attempt to coordinate this observance with the strike called by the U.S. labor union, the American Federation of Labor (AFL), demanding an eight-hour workday.

This day is as important as both New Year's celebrations and is a paid holiday for all employees. People enjoy themselves by hosting parties. The workers and trade union activists also organize parades and processions on this day. More often than not, this public holiday spills over into the two consecutive days that follow.

❁ CCPS BIRTHDAY

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: July 1

This is a day of immense significance in China's modern political history. It commemorates the founding of the Chinese Communist Party in Shanghai in 1921. It is a public holiday, featured in major front-page articles and special editorials in the government-owned newspapers and radio and television stations.

❁ NATIONAL DAY

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: October 1

This day celebrates the founding of the People's Republic of China in 1949. There are official flag-raising ceremonies and parades, and the streets of Beijing are illuminated with white and colored lights. During the day many people attend parties in parks, followed by fireworks and special television programs during the evening. The public holiday continues for the next two days (October 2 and 3). In Hong Kong this day features the famous National Day Cup horse races.

❁ CHINESE NEW YEAR

Observed by: Chinese (except Muslims and Christians)
Observed on: First of the first month of the Chinese calendar

Of all the traditional Chinese festivals, the New Year celebrations are the most elaborate and colorful. Preparations for the Chinese New Year start well in advance of the actual day, and the Chinese devote a significant portion of the last month of the year getting ready for it. According to tradition every corner of the house must be swept and cleaned thoroughly. Spring couplets, poetry written in black ink on large vertical scrolls of red paper, are pasted on the sides of doors and gateways. These couplets express good wishes for the family in the coming year.

During the month preceding the New Year, Chinese bid farewell to Zao Jun, the Kitchen God, the guardian of the family hearth as well as the inventor of fire. It is believed that Zao Jun leaves the house on the 23rd of this month to report the behavior of the family to the Jade Emperor. Therefore on the evening of the 23rd, families bid a ritual farewell to the deity with a delicious dinner, sweetmeats, and honey, so that what Zao Jun reports about the family will be “sweet.”

The last days of the old year are the appropriate time to pay off one’s debts. On the last day of the old year it is also customary for people to cook enough to last the next two days. Tradition stipulates that all food be prepared before New Year’s Day, so that scissors, knives, forks, and other sharp utensils can be put away to avoid “cutting” the luck it is hoped the New Year will bring.

On New Year’s Day, the Chinese congratulate each other on having passed through another year. It is traditional to wear new clothes, and everyone is supposed to be on his or her best behavior: no telling lies, raising one’s voice, using abusive language, or breaking anything on the first day of the year. The Chinese also give New Year’s presents that are similar in spirit to Christmas presents, although they tend to prefer items such as fruit and tea.

This holiday, more than any other Chinese holiday, stresses the importance of family. It is a time for family reunions and visiting friends and relatives.

❁ LANTERN FESTIVAL

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: Fifteenth of the first month of the Chinese calendar

The Lantern Festival marks the end of the Chinese New Year season. It takes place halfway through the first month of the Chinese calendar. This festival is largely celebrated in the rural areas by farmers. Lantern exhibits, lion and dragon dances, and eating tang yuan (round boiled sweet dumplings made of rice, with delicious fillings) are featured.

❁ DUAN WU FESTIVAL

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: Fifth of the fifth month of Chinese calendar

This festival honors the memory of Chu Yuan (Zhu Youan), a great patriot poet of the former state of Jiu during the Warring States period (475–221), who drowned himself to protest his emperor’s decision to submit to the aggressive neighboring state of Jin. For fear that fish would consume Chu Yuan’s body, the people of Jiu took to their boats and started throwing rice dumplings wrapped in bamboo leaves into the river, where he had drowned himself to encourage the fish to eat the rice dumplings rather than the poet’s body. In modern times a dragon-boat contest preserves the legacy of that historic incident. People also conscientiously observe the custom of feeding the fish.

Rites of Passage

❁ BIRTH

The major responsibility for a pregnant woman’s care is assumed by her mother-in-law, not her husband. In Chinese culture ancient customs, beliefs, and traditions play an important role in protecting the pregnant woman and her baby from complications. The Chinese fear evil influences as well as the natural phenomena of miscarriage, stillbirth, and birth defects.

Many customs relate to the behavior and environs of the pregnant woman. Chinese women are taught to avoid using foul language and torturing, striking, or killing animals during pregnancy. Argu-

Origins of the Lantern Festival

One explanation traces this festival to ancient times, when Taiyi, the god of heaven and one of Taoism's most important gods, was worshipped. The Chinese then believed Taiyi controlled the destiny of the human world. He was very powerful and commanded 16 dragons. It was he who decided when to inflict drought, storms, famine, or pestilence on human beings. Beginning with Jin Shi Huang, the first emperor to unite China, all subsequent emperors ordered splendid ceremonies in Taiyi's honor annually. They would ask the god to bring favorable weather and good health to the land. In 104 B.C.E. Emperor Wudi of the Han Dynasty proclaimed this holiday one of China's most important, and the celebrations lasted throughout the night.

Yet another account relates this festival to when Buddhism first entered China during the reign of the Emperor Mingdi of the Eastern Han Dynasty in the first century. Initially Buddhism did not have much influence on the Chinese people. One day, however, the Emperor Mingdi had a dream about a mysterious golden man in his palace. When he was about to ask the mysterious figure who he was, the figure rose to the sky and disappeared in the west. Because of this, Emperor Mingdi felt a need to send a scholar to India (which is west of China) on a pilgrimage to locate Buddhist scriptures. After traversing thousands of miles the scholar finally returned with them. Emperor Mingdi ordered that a temple be built to house a statue of Buddha and to serve as a repository for the scriptures. Because followers believe that the power of Buddha can dispel darkness, the emperor ordered his subjects to display lighted lanterns during what was to become the Lantern Festival.

ments and disputes are also to be avoided, because they may harm the fetus. It is considered bad luck to name an unborn baby since this implies eagerness on the part of the parents for a child of a particular sex.

A pregnant woman is encouraged to continue working since this is supposed to make both labor and delivery easier. However tradition prohibits working with glue or other adhesives because they are thought to cause birth complications. Likewise hammering nails is believed to cause deformity in the fetus.

The production of a male heir is of paramount importance in Chinese culture. Male offspring are essential for ancestor worship and the continuation of the family lineage. Girls have traditionally been considered as only "temporary" family members, while male offspring "belong" to the family their entire lives.

The Chinese often consult a holy man or shaman if a male offspring is not born after several attempts. According to prevalent Chinese superstitions a couple should eat certain types of food for the seven days leading up to conception to get the child of their choice: tofu, mushrooms, carrots, and lettuce for a boy; pickles, meat, and fish for a girl.

❁ MARRIAGE

Because China is a patriarchal society in which the perpetuation of the family is paramount, marriage is an important institution, and there are many intricate customs associated with it. Chinese men tend to marry quite late, since they need to save enough money for the wedding. It can be very expensive, especially in the case of socially prominent families. Failure to provide a lavish wedding is likely to lower the status of the family, bring criticism from relatives, and cause shame for all concerned. This relates to two important components of Chinese culture: to display wealth and prosperity conspicuously and to avoid embarrassment.

In Chinese culture a marriage is not simply a love match between two people, but an establishment of a relationship between two families as well. If the parents are not happy with the lineage and status of the other family, the wedding will not take place. However arranged marriages, in which the match is made by the parents or relatives of the bride and groom, are now rare and viewed as old-fashioned. Marriage today is usually based on the young people's own choices. However once the couple has decided to marry, the arrangements are taken over by the parents (or older relatives), reverting to tradition.

The first stage of the wedding involves information gathering on the part of the groom's family, who seeks to learn more about the reputation and lineage of the bride's family, as well as the character of the bride. Before the families meet, the groom's family will make discreet inquiries among friends and acquaintances. When a meeting (only between the elders of the two families) does occur, the bride's family tries to learn as much as possible about the status and wealth of the groom's family, as well as ensure that their daughter is not likely to be maltreated.

If both families are satisfied with the match, the groom's parents will send an elderly female representative to negotiate the marriage. The representative is expected to discuss the size of the bride's dowry, a suitable date, and other details of the wedding. It is considered inappropriate, however, for the groom's representative to try to bargain; her job is to ask the bride's name and date of birth in order to give this information to an astrologer who will set the wedding date.

If a death occurs in either family the wedding is usually postponed for a stipulated period of time, since it is not considered appropriate to hold a wedding during a period of mourning. A postponement may also occur if the wedding arrangements cannot be completed within a specified period or the couple wishes to wait. In these instances an engagement prior to marriage may be acceptable if the bride's parents' consent to it. Chinese engagements are not a binding commitment but merely an indication of intent. The engagement is usually a simple affair with an exchange of rings (worn on the third finger of the left hand), and the engagement is for an unspecified time period.

A few days before the wedding, the bride receives gifts from her friends and relatives, articles that will be useful to her in the traditional role of wife and homemaker. The bride's wedding dress combines the colors red, yellow, and white, which are considered auspicious. Black, blue, and gray may not be worn by either the bride or groom since these colors signify grief and bring bad luck to the marriage.

On the wedding day the groom visits the bride's house. An elderly woman (sam bob) is appointed to ensure that all customs are observed and to guide the couple through the ceremony. While the groom is at the bride's home a small reception is held at his house for relatives, friends, and neighbors. As a part of the wedding rites, the groom's house will be brilliantly decorated in red. (The bride's family may hold a similar banquet for their own relatives the day before the wedding. The groom attends this party with some of his own relatives in order to become acquainted with the bride's wider social circle).

At the start of the wedding ceremony the couple bows three times at the ancestral altar to pay homage to the ancestors and also to seek their blessings. Next the bride's parents serve tea and present the couple with a red packet (ang bow). Tea is then served by the newlyweds to the elder siblings and other senior relatives of the bride. The couple bows while serving the tea as a sign of respect and gratitude.

The wedding banquet is not an obligatory part of the ceremony; its inclusion depends largely on the traditions of the bride's family and its financial status. It is often held on the wedding night and is the climax of the event. Traditionally wedding banquets were held in the home or compound, but they often take place in restaurants and hotels subject to the mutual convenience of both parties.

Guests at the wedding banquet will customarily bring a red packet (for the couple) and sign a guest-book. They will also formally introduce themselves to the members of both families. Alcoholic drinks—uncommon in Chinese culture—are considered compulsory at this event, and the wedding couple often drinks a toast at every table. The wedding ends with the signing of the marriage register, which makes the marriage legal. The couple will then depart for the groom's house. In case a death has occurred in either neighborhood, an alternative route must be found to avoid passing a coffin or hearse since they are considered bad omens and portend calamity in conjugal life.

When the bride has crossed the threshold of the groom's house, she becomes part of the groom's family. Here the ancestor worship and tea serving ceremonies are repeated. After the ceremonies the bride is taken to the bridal chamber by her bridesmaids, where she retires for the night with her new spouse. Traditionally the room contains a potty and a baby bath as it is thought that these will hasten conception.

In the Chinese family system the wife lives with the husband's family and is deemed the "property" of her husband's family and no longer part of her own. Traditionally Chinese couples with the same surname are not supposed to marry. Cousins are not allowed to marry, because the Chinese fear such a union will produce deformed children. Even if the bride and groom have no known relatives in common, it is believed that if they share the same name, they stem from the same ancestral lineage and so should not marry.

DEATH

In China, there are several different funeral traditions. In one of these funeral rites extend over a 49-day period, of which the first 7 days are the most important. Prayers are said every 7 days for 49 days if the family can afford it; if the family is too poor, then the period may be shortened to between 3 and 7 days.

When a Chinese father dies his eldest son becomes the head of the family. If the eldest son passes away his second brother does not assume leadership of the family. Leadership passes to the eldest son of the eldest son, or the grandson of the father. He must assume the responsibilities and duties to the ancestors on behalf of the family. The head of the family should be present for at least the first and preferably the second, prayer ceremony. The head of the family should also be present for the burial or the cremation.

In the second tradition the prayer ceremonies take place at 10-day intervals. There are four of these ceremonies before the final burial or cremation. At the end of 100 days one additional prayer ceremony may be held, but it is not as necessary or important as the first four.

Most Chinese Buddhists believe that there is an intermediate period between death and rebirth. In Sanskrit it is called Antarabhava; in Tibetan it is called the Bardo. This interim period is important, because it influences the form the rebirth will take. If the family provides the appropriate prayers and memorial services, it ensures the deceased a good rebirth. Usually, it is the responsibility of the deceased's daughters to bear the funeral expenses.

Introduction

✿ HISTORY

Colombia's first inhabitants were Amerindian settlers from North and Central America including the Tayrona, Sinu, Muisca, Quimbaya, Tierradentro, and San Agustín. Around 1200 B.C.E. the first wave of Amerindians from Central America arrived in Colombia, bringing with them maize (corn), followed by a second wave in 500, and a third between 400 and 300, shortly before the Arawaks moved into the region from other areas of the continent. By 1000 B.C.E. Amerindians had developed the political system of cacicazgos (in Spanish cacique, in Taino cacike, or in Arawak kassequa, all meaning "chieftain.") with a pyramidal structure of power, especially the Muisca, or Chibcha people. Next to the Incas theirs was the largest political system of South America. They were farmers, artisans, and skilled goldsmiths; their dwellings were circular, made of wood and thatch. In Chibcha, muisca means "people." Their sacred sites such as Guatavita and Iguaque Lakes remain, and their cultural artifacts—goldwork, pottery, burial chambers, and rock paintings—can still be seen today.

Toward the end of the first millennium C.E. the Caribs moved to the mainland from their island homes, forcing the Chibcha to move into the higher elevations.

In 1499 Alonso de Ojeda (1466–1516), a former companion of Christopher Columbus (1451–1506), landed on the Guajira Peninsula with his own ships, accompanied by Amerigo Vespucci (1454–1512). The Indians initially tolerated the Spaniards but rebelled when the Spanish tried to enslave them. When Ojeda returned to Spain in 1500 he sold the captive Amerindians.

The Spaniards soon conquered a large part of what was to become Colombia, and Cartagena was founded in 1533. In 1544 the territory became a part of the Viceroyalty of Peru, made up of most of the Spanish territories in South America. This changed in 1739 when it was incorporated into the territory of New Granada.

In 1819 Simón Bolívar (1783–1830) and his liberation army secured independence for the region, which included Colombia. This was followed by 10 years of confederation with Venezuela and Ecuador. Regional differences among the three, however, finally destroyed the union. A lengthy period of unrest ensued.

Two parties were formed: the Conservative and the Liberal. Their rivalry led to no fewer than 50 insurrections and 8 civil wars in the 19th century alone. The 1899–1903 “War of a Thousand Days” led to a period of relative peace. But in 1948 war broke out again, and nearly 300,000 people were killed. After some time the conflict began taking on revolutionary overtones; so the Conservatives and the Liberals agreed to a power-sharing arrangement in 1957.

This two-party era came to an end in 1974, although a modified version of the two-party system continued for another 17 years. Resentments over the two parties’ monopoly of power fostered the growth of left-wing guerilla groups such as the National Liberation Army (ELN), Revolutionary Armed Forces of Colombia (FARC), and the April 19 Movement (M19). Also growing in power were the drug cartels of Medellín and Cali and the paramilitary death squads they financed.

By 1990 escalating violence brought the country to the point of collapse. In 1991 a new constitution came into effect, which strengthened government control. In the same year Pablo Escobar (1949–93), head of the Medellín cartel, surrendered to authorities. He escaped the next year but was killed in December 1993. In 1995, Gilberto Rodríguez Orejuela (b. 1940), leader of the Cali cartel, was arrested, but this hardly affected the drug trade. In 1998 the conservative Andrés Pastrana (b. 1954), who had led a campaign against politicians’ drug cartel connections, won the elections.

In 2002 the moderate-right independent Álvaro Uribe (b. 1952) won a landslide victory. Known for his staunch opposition to guerillas, Uribe had survived 15 assassination attempts even before he became president. In spite of setbacks in the early years of the 21st century he remained popular and continued his efforts to rein in the guerillas and drug cartels.

❁ GEOGRAPHY AND CLIMATE

Colombia is the fourth largest country in South America. The western part of the country is mostly mountainous; a part of the Andes Mountains is located here. This is also the location of the Sierra Nevada de Santa Marta, the world’s highest coastal mountain range. Colombia’s tallest mountain is the Pico Cristóbal Colón, at 18,946 feet. The Serranía de la Macarena is an isolated mountain formation rising 3,000 feet from the eastern plains. Over 50 percent of the lands east of the Andes are lowlands or covered by thick rain forest. The jungle of the Pacific coast holds a world record for the highest rainfall.

Chibcha Spiritual Beliefs

Like other Amerindian groups the Chibcha’s spiritual beliefs were pantheistic, and their zeques (“shamans.”) functioned as both healers and oracles. Their most important gods were the solar god Bochica and Chibchacum, who protected the people, farmers, and traders. Chia, the goddess of the Moon, may have been Bochica’s consort. Chibchacum was also the god of earthquakes. The Chibcha believed that Bochica had designated Chibchacum to carry the world on his shoulders. Whenever he tired of carrying the Earth on one shoulder, he shifted it to his other shoulder, a motion that caused earthquakes.

❁ ECONOMY

Colombia has two economies: the legitimate official one and that of the huge underground drug trade, which is apparently linked to the international traffic in women and girls for sexual exploitation and prostitution. The country produces coffee, bananas, rice, tobacco, corn, sugarcane, and cocoa beans. Its coffee is one of the best in the world. Among the industrial goods it produces are textiles, processed foods, beverages, chemicals, and cement. In addition to oil, its mines produce coal, gold, and gems such as emeralds.

Prolonged conflicts and weak domestic and foreign demand have hurt Colombia’s economy. Oil and coffee, Colombia’s main exports, face an uncertain future. Existing oil fields are close to depletion, while coffee production and demand are both depressed. On the other hand early 21st-century economic reforms have been well received by international financial institutions, and investor confidence seems to be growing. Colombia is the third largest recipient of U.S. foreign aid, but much of that aid is earmarked for fighting the drug trade, not for helping the people.

Colombia is a major source and transit country for women and girls trafficked for the purpose of sexual exploitation. The Colombian government estimates that 45,000 to 50,000 Colombian nationals engage in prostitution overseas, and a majority of them are trafficking victims.

❁ CULTURE AND LIFESTYLE

The majority of Colombia’s people are of mixed Spanish, African, and indigenous descent. Spanish is

Fun Fact

Lake Guatavita is among the places believed to have been responsible for the legend of El Dorado, a myth that lured Spanish conquistadors eager for gold and wealth. It is said that the local people threw all their wealth into the lake so the Spaniards could not get to it.

Simón Bolívar

Simón Bolívar, widely regarded as El Libertador (“The Liberator”) of South America, was born in what is now Caracas, Venezuela, into an aristocratic family. Following the death of his parents, he left for Spain in 1799 to finish his education. Bolívar returned to Venezuela in 1807, and joined the resistance juntas in South America. When the Caracas junta declared its independence from Spain in 1810, Bolívar went to England on a diplomatic mission. He returned to Venezuela in 1811, but in 1812, junta leader Francisco de Miranda (1759–1816) surrendered, and Bolívar was forced to flee.

In 1813 Bolívar led the invasion of Venezuela and retook Caracas on August 6, where he was proclaimed El Libertador, beginning the Second Venezuelan Republic. After the rebellion of José Tomás Boves (1782–1814) in 1814 and the fall of the republic, Bolívar returned to what is now Colombia and entered Bogotá, recapturing the city from the dissenting republican forces of Cundinamarca, now a department of Colombia. Again, however, after a number of political and military disputes with the government of Cartagena, Bolívar had to flee. This time to Jamaica, where he sought help from Alexandre Pétion (1770–1818), the leader of Haiti.

With Haitian help Bolívar landed in Venezuela and captured Angostura in 1816 (now Ciudad Bolívar). After the famous Battle of Boyacá in 1819 Colombia became another territory free from Spanish control, and in 1821 a federation covering much of Venezuela, Colombia, Panama, and Ecuador was created, with Bolívar as president and Francisco de Paula Santander (1792–1840), as vice president. Further victories in 1821–22 secured Bolívar’s rule over Venezuela and Ecuador, and he took over the task of fully liberating Peru. In 1824 the Peruvian congress named him dictator of Peru, and later that year the Spanish forces were decisively defeated. At the Congress of Upper Peru in 1825 the Republic of Bolivia was created in honor of Bolívar, who drafted a new constitution for the new nation. Internal divisions and strife, however, plagued the newly independent regions of South America, and Bolívar was unable to quell the unrest and rebellions.

After several attempts to hold the antagonistic interests together and an attempt on his life in 1828, Bolívar finally resigned the presidency in 1830, intending to leave the country for exile in Europe or the Caribbean, but he died from tuberculosis on December 17, 1830, in Santa Marta, Colombia.

Colombia’s official language. About 65 indigenous languages and nearly 300 dialects are still used, mostly in outlying areas. English remains little known and is rarely spoken.

Pre-Columbian art includes sculpture, pottery, and goldwork. Basket making fuses pre-Columbian designs with modern techniques. Inevitably Colombian music features traces of its varied ethnic backgrounds. African rhythms of the Caribbean, the Cuban salsa, and Andean music are all popular. Nobel Prize Winner Gabriel García Márquez (b. 1928) is the greatest figure of Colombian literature, but also prominent are younger writers such as R. H. Moreno-Durán (b. 1946).

Catholicism remains the dominant religion. In recent years, however, several Protestant denominations such as the Anglican, Lutheran, and Mormon faiths have significantly increased their numbers, as have various smaller religious sects through missionaries.

❁ CUISINE

Chicken, pork, potato, rice, and beans are key ingredients in Colombian cuisine. Ajiaco, a soup made with chicken and potato, is a specialty of the Bogotá region. Santander is famous for hormiga culona, which is made of fried ants. A specialty of Tolima is lechona, a whole suckling pig, which is spit-roasted and stuffed with rice and dried peas. Colombian coffee is famous the world over.

❁ NEW YEAR’S EVE/DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: December 31–January 1

In Colombia the New Year is celebrated with parties, music, dancing, and lots of food and drink. In addition, Colombians practice a ritual of “Burning Mr. Old Year.” Each family makes a rag doll representing the old year. In it they stuff all kinds of rubbish and discarded things, including fireworks. Some make it a point to add things that have brought grief to the family. At midnight the doll is burned to signify letting go of the past year and making a fresh start in the coming year.

❁ LABOR DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: May 1

Fun Fact

The Chibcha language was dominant in the region, creating communication problems for the conquistadors in their quest for gold and converts to Catholicism. In 1783 to rid themselves of this obstacle, the Spanish prohibited the use of indigenous languages.

Ajiaco

Serves 4

Ingredients:

2 Tbs. butter
 1 tsp. cayenne pepper
 1 c. unsalted chicken stock
 4 ears yellow corn, shucked and sliced into 1-inch thick wheels
 1 3-lb. chicken, cut into bite-sized pieces
 2 tsp. sweet paprika
 1 c. minced onion
 3 c. milk
 2 large yucca, peeled and cut into 1-inch-thick chunks
 Juice of one lime

Preparation:

In a 6-quart pot, melt the butter over medium heat.

(Do not allow the butter to burn.) Cook chicken pieces in the butter until the flesh is no longer pink. Using a slotted spoon, remove the chicken and place in a bowl. Next, put onion, garlic, cayenne, and paprika in pot and cook while stirring, until onion is translucent and colored with the paprika. Add stock, milk, yucca, corn, and chicken to the pot. Bring the contents almost to a boil then reduce heat, cover and simmer, stirring every now and then, for about 1 hour, or until yucca is tender. Remove from heat and stir in lime juice.

Serve with slices of Cuban or French bread that has been broiled until golden. Frozen corn on the cob or fresh frozen kernels can be substituted if fresh corn is not available, but the fresh corncob seems to impart a nice flavor to this dish. If you are wondering what to do with the wheels of corn, just pick them up with your fingers and nibble around the rims.

Labor Day commemorates the important role played by workers in their societies. In 1889 the Second International, a consortium of socialist organizations, declared May 1 a day to recognize the importance of workers around the world and scheduled the first demonstrations and celebrations for the following year, 1890. They coordinated this observance with a strike called by the U.S. labor union the American Federation of Labor (AFL), demanding an eight-hour workday.

Colombia has a long history of labor activism. In the past workers have played a significant role in challenging the two-party monopoly on power held by the Conservatives and the Liberals. In recent times, the rise of left-wing guerilla organizations has only added to the importance of the labor movement as a stabilizing influence. Labor Day is an important event for Colombians, marked by processions, pro-labor demonstrations, public meetings, and lectures.

INDEPENDENCE DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: July 20

This day commemorates Colombia's epic struggle against the Spanish conquerors. Like most South American countries, Colombia had to overcome tremendous odds to win its independence. Although Colombia declared independence from Spain on July 20, 1810, that date merely marked the beginning of its struggle. Not until 1819 was complete independence finally achieved. The day is celebrated with military parades, processions, and parties. Government offices, schools, and many businesses are closed on this day.

BATTLE OF BOYACÁ

Observed on: August 7

This holiday commemorates one of the most memorable battles in the Colombian struggle for independence. On this date in 1819 Colombian freedom fighters, equipped with little more than lances, knives, and spades, successfully fought off the Spanish army. They won partly because of their belief in their cause and partly because of the

The occasion is observed as a public holiday and is celebrated with speeches and parades.

❁ COLUMBUS DAY

Observed by: General Public, indigenous communities

Observed on: October 12 (observed on the following Monday if the 12th does not fall on a Monday)

Colombia observes October 12 as both Columbus Day and the Day of the Race. On the one hand the name Colombia derives from Columbus. Hence honoring his memory is a matter of priority for Colombians, and the anniversary of his discovery of America is an important occasion here.

In recent times, however, Columbus's "discovery" has been associated with the cruelty and oppression European conquerors perpetrated on the indigenous populations of South America. For this reason, especially among the South American nations, it is also celebrated as Día de la Raza (Day of the Race). In this way the Hispanic heritage of the continent, as well as the influences of indigenous races on Colombia's ethnic and cultural composition, are given recognition. Colombia celebrates the occasion with pageants, processions, music, and other cultural activities.

❁ CARTAGENA INDEPENDENCE DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: November 14

The city of Cartagena was important to Colombia's independence movement. In the days of Spanish rule, it was a major commercial center and among the richest towns in the Western Hemisphere. As a result it was subject to frequent raids by marauders. Finally the Spanish king had the city extensively fortified.

This, however, was not enough to protect Cartagena from its own people. On November 11, 1811, Cartagena declared its independence from Spain. In 1815, the Spanish, under General Pablo Morillo (1778–1837), recaptured the city. In this battle more than a third of the inhabitants were killed. The valor they showed has become a Colombian legend. Simón Bolívar himself named the city Ciudad Heroica ("Heroic City") in recognition of its inhabitants' bravery. The occasion is observed as a public holiday, marked by processions and speeches. In addition, there are numerous parades throughout the country.

Unlike Good Friday, Easter is a day of fun and gaiety because it celebrates the Resurrection of Jesus three days after his Crucifixion. Some Colombians attend dawn church services. Although Easter Egg Hunts were not originally a part of the celebrations in Colombia, they have become popular in recent years. Adults hide eggs all over the house and give children clues about where to find them. Sometimes, children are also given gifts. Picnics and parties, especially for children, are common.

St. Peter was the founder of the Roman Catholic Church who was martyred. St. Paul, another of Jesus' disciples, was similarly martyred. In Colombia, this day is most observed by fishermen, because St. Peter was a fisherman. For this day Colombian fishermen decorate their boats and take the image of their patron saint out to sea. They usually do this at night and burn candles and flares. There are also special Masses in churches and religious processions.

✿ IMMACULATE CONCEPTION

Observed by: Roman Catholics

Observed on: December 8

The Feast of the Immaculate Conception celebrates the Catholic belief that Mary, Jesus' mother, was herself free of original sin when she was born, making her a suitable mother for Jesus. It is an extremely significant occasion in the predominantly Catholic Colombia. The Christmas season begins the previous night, when families light candles in Mary's honor.

The day itself is a national holiday, celebrated with displays of lights. Each household tries to light at least a hundred candles on curbs and sidewalks in front of the house, and city streets and parks are illuminated with large powerful lights as well. Special Masses are also conducted on this day.

✿ CHRISTMAS EVE/DAY

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: December 24–25

The Christian feast of Christmas celebrates the birth of Jesus on the date established by the Catholic Church. Colombians celebrate Christmas lavishly. Public areas are decorated with lights and huge Nativity scenes, and special concerts are given. In Bogotá an enormous festival is held at the Parque Central Simón Bolívar. It is sponsored by both government and private agencies.

In their homes Colombians start decorating trees about 10 days before Christmas. They also set up Nativity scenes between December 16 and December 24 and gather around them at night to pray and sing carols. On Christmas Eve families gather to eat and dance. Popular items on the menu include ajiaco (a potato and chicken soup), chicken, and natilla (a corn-based dessert). At midnight people wish each other Merry Christmas and exchange gifts. Traditionally the infant Jesus was considered to be the giver of gifts, but in recent times the legend of Santa Claus has gained popularity as well.

The Medellín Flower Fair is the city’s most important cultural event. It is also an occasion of considerable economic significance, since Colombia is a major flower exporter. This event is always held during the first two weeks in August. The main features of this festival are spectacular parades and processions involving elaborate floral displays. The biggest parade takes place every year on August 11, which is a local holiday.

Other events include flower-arranging competitions, vintage car parades, lots of live music and dancing, and a beauty pageant. The festival also features exhibits of orchids, other flowers, and local crafts.

Rites of Passage

❁ DEATH

To most Colombians the basic Christian rites of baptism, Communion, and marriage mark the turning points in their lives and help to establish their identities as social beings. Among Colombian Catholics, the rite of extreme unction, one of the seven holy sacraments, is commonly administered at death. This involves the priest praying in Latin and touching various parts of the deceased’s body with cotton balls dipped in holy oil. The ritual is intended to prepare the dying person’s soul to leave the world calmly and peacefully.

Introduction

❁ HISTORY

Beginning in the 14th century, the islands of Comoros attracted explorers from Indonesia, the Persian Gulf, Africa, and Madagascar. In 1505 Portuguese explorers, the first Europeans, landed on Njazidja. A flourishing trade developed with subsequent expeditions, and this group of islands played a vital role in the thriving economy of the western Indian Ocean. Domoni, situated on the island of Nzwani (Anjouan), was a major center for trade from the 15th century. Trade was in full swing even with nations as far away as Japan. Merchants, sailors, and pirates made frequent visits to these islands. The Nzwani (Anjouan) Island was the favorite place for refueling and obtaining provisions. When the Suez Canal opened, these islands lost their importance as the main trade route changed, and the islands are mostly referred to as “the forgotten islands.”

Between 1841 and 1912 the French established their control over the islands of Grand Comore, Anjouan, Mayotte, and Moheli and handed over the administration of the region to the Governor General of Madagascar. Portuguese, French, and Arab traders established a plantation economy in the region. Even today Comoros uses one-third of its land to produce crops for export.

Under French rule, the native population suffered brutal treatment. Protests and uprisings were crushed and dissent was silenced. In the mid-20th century, however, France began to soften its stand in the wake of World Wars I and II. By 1947 Comoros had become an independently administered French

The Islands

Nzwani (or Anjouan) is often called “the pearl of the Indian Ocean.” It is a beautiful island that lures tourists to its beaches, hillsides, and rivers. Nzwani is the most populated island of Comoros. It has a volcanic peak called Mount Ntingi, which is covered with forests of mahogany, ferns, and wild orchids. Oils such as ylang-ylang, palma rosa, orange flower, and jasmine are exported from Comoros. In the 16th century sultanates in the Arabic style developed here. The chief who ruled the sultanate was called fani. There was occasional rioting and wars between the sultans. When the problems became serious, many fanis sought help from the Europeans, primarily the French. The French seized the opportunity and under the pretext of offering protection declared Nzwani a French Protectorate by 1866. Nzwani was one of the three islands to gain independence from the French in 1975.

colony. In 1961 Comoros was granted greater internal political autonomy also Volume by France, but the people of Comoros insisted on total independence. France was initially reluctant, which led to widespread protests and demonstrations against French rule.

In 1973 an agreement was reached between France and the islands of Grand Comore, Moheli, and Anjouan, according to which the islands of Comoros would be granted total independence by 1978. The island of Mayotte, preferring to remain a French protectorate, did not participate in these negotiations.

In a sudden move on July 6, 1975, the Comoran parliament passed a resolution severing all ties with France and declaring unilateral independence. Once again the representatives of Mayotte did not participate in these proceedings and refused to join the independent state of Comoros. Referendums in Mayotte were held in 1974 and 1976, and the people of Mayotte voted in favor of French protection. Even today the Union of Comoros has administrative control over Grand Comore, Moheli, and Anjouan, while Mayotte remains under French administration. Since independence Comoros has witnessed 19 coups; many of them had the support of the French government,

The Perfume Islands

Because two-thirds of the world’s perfume essence comes from these islands, some have called Comoros “the perfume islands.” In addition, the incredible history of these islands has given Comoros another interesting name—“the fantasy islands.” The islands are full of stories of pirates, sultans, kings, and queens.

which continued to seek control over the region.

All three islands have had their share of problems. Following growing economic instability and political unrest caused by the coups, the islands of Moheli and Anjouan declared independence from Comoros in 1997. The government of Comoros used force to try to reclaim the rebellious islands but failed. In Grand Comore after the death of the last democratically elected president, Mohamed Taki Abdoukarim (b. 1936), on November 6, 1998, a provisional government was placed in power under acting President Tadjidine Ben Said Massoude (1933–2004). On August 2, 1999, a military coup led by Colonel Azali Assoumani (b. 1959) ousted the provisional government, and Assoumani declared himself the president of Comoros. He maintained a firm grip on the region, despite several attempted coups; as of the early years of the 21st century, he remained the president.

On August 1, 1999, Anjouan also experienced political upheaval after the resignation of its first president Foundi Abdallah Ibrahim (?b. 1922). He handed over the reins to Said Abeid (b. 1941), a national coordinator. On August 9, 2001, however, a coup led by naval officers ousted his government, and a military junta led by Mohamed Bacar (b. 1962) assumed control of the island. Several coups were attempted against Bacar, most of which were led by Abeid; but each failed. Elections held in 2002 on the island of Anjouan legitimized Bacar’s claim to the presidency, when he was unanimously elected president of the island.

The island of Moheli entered into negotiations with the government of Comoros, and elections held in 2002 placed Mohamed Said Fazul (b. 1960) at the helm when he won the presidential elections with an overwhelming majority. The new constitution adopted in 2002 by all three islands granted greater autonomy to the islands of Grand Comore, Moheli, and Anjouan and gave each island the right to elect its own president. Thus the Union of Comoros came into being. President Azali Assoumani was elected as the overall president of the union, but his powers are restricted to security and finance on the islands of Moheli and Anjouan.

❁ GEOGRAPHY AND CLIMATE

Comoros is an island archipelago located off southern Africa at the northern end of the Mozambique Channel. The oldest of these islands—Maore (Mayotte)—remains a French territory. The remaining three islands make up the Union of Comoros: Njazidja (Grande Comore), Mwali (Moheli), and Nzwani (Anjouan). These islands are sometimes referred to as The Union of Comoros Islands and Mayotte, or the Federal Islamic Republic of the Comoros.

All the islands are volcanic, and low hills and steep mountains are prominent features. Njazidja (Grand Comore), closer to the African mainland, has a huge active volcano and the residents live in constant fear that it will erupt. In the early 21st century, Mayotte is claimed by Comoros, but remains under French control, because the citizens of the island prefer this arrangement.

The islands have a tropical marine climate. The annual average temperature in Comoros is 77°F. Cyclones pose a threat during the rainy season, which lasts from November until May. Crop cultivation on slopes without proper terracing techniques has resulted in soil erosion, and deforestation is a problem as well.

❁ ECONOMY

The Union of Comoros is one of the poorest countries in the world. It has poor transportation links; natural resources are limited; and widespread illiteracy stifles economic growth. Unemployment is high. Agriculture is the main sector of the economy, followed by fishing, hunting, and forestry. Most of the products are exported, but the country is not self-sufficient in food production. Without foreign aid, this group of islands would not be able to sustain itself. The main imported goods are petroleum products, cement, rice, foodstuffs, and transportation equipment. These are mostly imported from France, Thailand, Japan, and Kenya. Perfume oil, copra, cloves, vanilla, and ylang-ylang—the oil of a tropical tree used to make perfume—are exported mainly to France, Germany, and the United States. The islands are the world's largest producer of the essence ylang-ylang and the second largest producer of vanilla.

❁ CULTURE AND LIFESTYLE

Many settlements over the past 1,000 years have created the mixed population of Comoros. Today the Union of Comoros is a vibrant mix of Malagasy (Malay-Polynesians), African mainlanders, Shirazi Persians, and Arab traders. There are Indians and French Creoles too. Though there are rarely ethnic clashes, inter-island rivalries run strong. Sunni Islam is the dominant religion of Comoros. The official languages are Arabic and French. Shikomoro, the dialect of the islands, is used in everyday communication. Children attend Islamic schools. State education is compulsory for seven- to sixteen-year-olds, and 76 percent of the children attend primary school. Only 25 percent of the country's youth, however, receive a secondary education. In villages, people live in homes made of palm fronds. Only the rich build concrete houses.

Chirumani is a colorful cotton garment worn by most women. As a cosmetic a yellowish paste made from sandalwood and coral that is applied to the face for a better complexion is popular among the women. The main celebrations are those related to weddings, but Islamic festivals are widely observed.

The music of Comoros is colored by influences from Madagascar, East Africa, the Middle East, and southern India. There is a wide range of solo and choral musical styles in Comoros. Gongs, tambourines, oboes, zithers, five-stringed lutes, and drums are some of the instruments commonly used. Music accompanies all kinds of social occasions.

❁ CUISINE

African, Indian, Arab, and French cooking influences are evident in the cuisine of Comoros. The recipes use a variety of spices widely grown in the islands: cinnamon, cardamom, vanilla, pepper, coriander, cloves, and nutmeg. Rice and meat are the staple foods. Plantains, cassava (manioc), and couscous are other important foods. Spicy sauces generally accompany meals. Poulet au coco, chicken cooked with greens and rice, is a common dish. Langouste à la vanilla, or lobster cooked in vanilla sauce, is a delicacy. Kebabs are popular, and seafood is ubiquitous. On special occasions Comorans enjoy barbecued mutton. Fruits are also widely available on the islands. Trembo, a homemade brew of coconut milk and fruit juice, is a common drink.

Fun Fact

The name Comoros is derived from the Arabic word kamar (or kumr), which means "moon." This name was first applied by Arab geographers to Madagascar.

Observed on: May 25

The Organization of African Unity (OAU) was formed on May 25, 1963, at Addis Ababa, the capital of Ethiopia. On this day 32 African countries affirmed their commitment to build a united Africa. This day is also known as Africa Day.

Kwame Nkrumah and Haile Selassie were the founding fathers of the OAU. As more and more countries in Africa broke free of centuries of colonial exploitation and brutality, there was a need to foster a spirit of unity among the African nations as well as work toward overall development of the continent. With this aim the OAU came into being. Initially, only 32 countries were a part of the OAU. In the early 21st century, there are 53 member nations in the OAU. The OAU has been instrumental in ending colonial rule in Africa and has also acted as a peacemaker and negotiator in solving regional disputes, internal conflicts, and wars in Africa.

Like most OAU member nations Comoros observes a national holiday on May 25. Seminars and meetings are held on this day to discuss matters of interest to African nations and further African solidarity.

❁ DEATH ANNIVERSARY OF PRESIDENT ALI SOILIH ❁

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: May 29

This day commemorates the assassination of President Ali Soilih (1937–78) in a coup led by the former president of Comoros, Ahmed Abdallah (1919–89) in 1978. President Soilih had assumed power in 1975 after leading a coup against President Ahmed Abdallah, the first president of the independent Comoros. President Soilih hired a group of French mercenaries under the leadership of Bob Denard (b. 1929) to oust Abdallah. Ali Soilih introduced socialist economic policies in the region and encouraged the younger generation to play a vital role in society. The tables were turned on him, and he was assassinated on May 29, 1978, in a coup led by former president Abdallah, ironically, with the help of Soilih's former ally Bob Denard, who had helped in deposing Abdallah earlier.

Observed on: July 6

By 1912 the French had established their rule over the islands of Moheli, Grande Comore, and Anjouan, and the region was under the administration of the French governor of Madagascar. After World War II, however, the people of the region increased their demands for independence. In 1947 Comoros Islands became a separate administered colony, but the people insisted on complete independence. Although the French were reluctant to grant full independence, they partially relented and granted autonomy to the region in 1961. This move also failed to appease the proponents of independence, and violent riots ensued. On July 6, 1975, Comoros won full independence.

Independence Day is marked with official parades, cultural festivals, and public speeches, which pay tribute to the freedom fighters who died during the independence movement.

❁ DEATH ANNIVERSARY OF PRESIDENT AHMED ABDALLAH

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: November 26

This day commemorates the assassination of President Ahmed Abdallah on November 26, 1989. Ahmed Abdallah was the first president of independent Comoros and was well known for his anti-French stance. He was the president of the General Council (1949–53) when Comoros was a French colony. His first tenure as president was cut short by Ali Soilih, who hired a band of French mercenaries led by Bob Denard to oust the president. However he reclaimed power in 1978 by forging a friendship with the same Bob Denard and turning him against his former ally Ali Soilih. In his second tenure as president, he abolished all political parties.

Abdallah ruled the country until 1989 when a military coup led by Soilih's half-brother Said Mohamed Djohar (b. 1918) ousted him. He was shot dead on November 26, 1989, in the capital city of Moroni.

Observed on: First of Muharram, the first month of the Islamic calendar

El am Hejir marks the first day of Muharram, the first month of the Islamic calendar. It is believed that on this day in 622, Muhammad fled from Mecca to Medina (about 200 miles to the north of Mecca) and founded the first Islamic state in Medina. There is no specific religious ritual required on this day, but Muslims contemplate the general meaning of Hegira, and regard this as a good time for New Year's resolutions.

Celebrations are relatively low-key compared to the more prominent celebrations that take place during the two Eid festivals, Eid al-Adha and Eid al-Fitr. The majority of Muslims on Comoros are Sunni who have little connection with Muharram and do not celebrate the occasion. The Shia Muslims, however, celebrate this event with much more enthusiasm.

❁ ASHURA

Observed by: Muslims

Observed on: Tenth of Muharram, the first month of the Islamic calendar

Ashura commemorates the martyrdom of the grandson of Muhammad Hussein bin Ali, the third imam of the Shia Muslims, and other martyrs who sacrificed their lives in the Battle of Karbala, which took place in what is now Iraq in 680 between Sunni and Shia Muslims. The Syrian caliph Yazid overwhelmed Hussein and his followers. Hussein was decapitated, and his severed head was carried back to Damascus on a spear. It is the defining religious event for Shia Muslims, who strive to live and, if necessary, to die like Hussein. They believe that a model life can revive Islam and banish tyranny and oppression from the world.

Ashura means “ten,” referring to the day on which it is observed—the 10th day of the Islamic month of Muharram. In countries with large Shia populations, Shia end their 10-day observance with a large procession that reenacts Hussein’s funeral. Some of the Shia men flagellate or ritually cut themselves. They believe that inflicting bloody wounds on themselves will connect them with Hussein’s suffering and guarantee their salvation on the Day of Judgment.

In Comoros Ashura is confined mainly to the Shia community. Since the majority of Muslims in Comoros belong to the Sunni sect, it is a low-key holiday. The Mourning of Karbala is a major festival among the Shia Muslims; for Sunni, however, it is a voluntary day of fasting.

❁ MOULoud

Observed by: Muslims

Observed on: Twelfth of Rabbi al-Awwal, the third month of the Islamic calendar

The anniversary of the birth of Muhammad, the founder of Islam, falls in the third month of the Islamic year. With the exception of conservative sects, this is a day of rejoicing and celebrations for Muslims all over the world. Conservative Muslims do not celebrate anyone’s birthday, including that of Muhammad, because they believe such celebrations distract the faithful from the worship of Allah.

Mouloud is celebrated with great enthusiasm in Comoros. On this day, Muslims offer prayers in honor of the revered prophet and reiterate their commitment to adhere to the principles of Islam and follow the path shown by Muhammad. While in other Islamic nations the reading of the Mawlidi (the story of Muhammad’s birth) is a solemn practice held in a mosque, in Comoros the reading takes place in huge public gatherings in the streets. The streets are thoroughly cleaned and decorated before the readings take place. Elders of the community take turns reading parts of the Mawlidi and even recite their own poems, written in honor of Allah and Muhammad.

❁ SHAB-E-MIRAJ

Observed by: Muslims

Observed on: Twenty-seventh of Rajab, the seventh month of the Islamic calendar

Shab-e-Miraj commemorates Muhammad’s night journey and ascension to heaven, where Allah revealed the “Salat,” or “Salah” (a Muslim prayer that is performed five times a day) to Muhammad. On this day Muslims in Comoros narrate the story of Muhammad’s ascension and revelation. According to the story on this day two archangels visited Muhammad while he slept. They purified his heart and filled it with faith and knowledge. Then within a single night, he traveled from Mecca to Jerusalem on a winged creature named Buraq. When he arrived in Jerusalem he ascended to heaven and met earlier prophets and God. The “Salat” was revealed to him, and he was given instructions that were to be followed by all Muslims. Muslims also offer prayers in the mosque and thank Allah for showing them the right way of life.

❁ EID AL-FITR

Observed by: Muslims

Observed on: First of Shawwal, the 10th month of the Islamic calendar

Eid means “celebration.” Islam has two eid festivals, Eid al-Fitr and Eid al-Adha. Eid al-Fitr marks the end of the holy month of Ramadan, the month of austerity during which devout Muslims fast from dawn until dusk. Ramadan is the ninth month in the Islamic calendar. The first three days of Shawwal are called “the eid days.” Muslims in Comoros buy new clothes for the occasion. They wake up early in the morning and offer prayers in their local mosques. Greetings are exchanged, and friends and family come together to celebrate with a special feast. Charity to the poor in the form of food and money plays an integral part in the day’s observance.

❁ EID AL-ADHA

Observed by: Muslims

Observed on: Tenth of Dhu al-Hijjah, the 12th month of the Islamic calendar

The second of two eid festivals celebrated by Muslims, the Eid al-Adha observance falls at the end of the hajj and honors Ibrahim's (Ishmael) willingness to sacrifice his son Isaac at God's command. Just as Ibrahim was about to kill his son, God replaced the young boy with a ram. On this day Muslims in Comoros offer prayers to Allah. Sacrificing goats or sheep is also part of Eid al-Adha celebrations. The meat is shared with friends, family, and the poor.

The holy pilgrimage, or hajj, also takes place during this month. All Muslims who are physically and financially able to are directed by the Koran to undertake this journey at least once in their lifetime, and the journey is the Fifth Pillar of Islam.

✿ BIRTH

In Comoros, an expectant mother is taken to her parents' house to give birth. A midwife takes care of the woman during labor and attends to the child when it is born. Immediately after birth Muslim prayers are uttered in the infant's ears. The naming

A groom stands in front of some of the 5.5 pounds of gold jewelry he will give to his bride in Hantsambou, outside Moroni, capital of the Comoros Republic. A gift of as much as 17 pounds of gold jewelry, as many as nine days of celebrations, as well as a bride price of up to $40,000 are hallmarks of the traditional "grand wedding" on Grande Comore, the largest of the three islands that comprise the Comoros Republic. (AP Photo/Rodrique Ngowi) ceremony is held on the sixth day after birth. After the child is born the mother is restricted from saying prayers, touching the Koran, or entering a mosque for 40 days. The child is placed in a cradle on the 40th day. A rite called Ukikais is performed in some places. Two goats, which must be more than one year old, are sacrificed in the child's name. Only the meat of the goat is taken, and its bones, skin, head, and feet are buried under the Earth. A prayer is offered to God when the meat is ready to be served. The child's head is shaved. The hair is thrown into a river or buried. Sometimes wealthy parents weigh the hair and distribute silver or gold to poor people according to the weight of the hair.

✿ COMING OF AGE

At the age of six or seven, male children are circumcised. Among some Muslims, however, they are circumcised soon after birth. The barber generally performs the task, and the child is usually given some opiate for the pain.

For girls between the ages of nine and 13 coming of age is a big celebration. They are kept in seclusion for seven days. During this time a girl is allowed to eat only fish, bread, butter, and meat. She is given a warm bath in the evening. A grand feast is arranged, and close relatives and friends are invited to join the celebration. Gifts are given to the girl and everybody joins in this happy occasion.

✿ MARRIAGE

In Comoros wedding festivities may continue for an entire week. The celebrations include music, dancing, feasting, and exchanging gifts. A lot of jewelry is given to the bride. Relatives and friends gather from all over to take part in the celebration. The dance of the bulls is an important part of these festivities. Men come together in one of the main squares, where two bulls are brought to fight with each other. The men try to touch the bulls without getting hurt. The majority of the villagers gather to watch. They shout encouragements and advice to their favorite dancers.

The concerts that take place during weddings are called twarab. There are both private and public ceremonies. The whole community joins in these festivities, which end with gift-giving and feasts. The musicians and dancers invited to perform also receive gifts and money. Wealthy men may have more than one wife but must provide a house for each.

✿ DEATH

Muslims in Comoros follow Islamic rites for death and burial. The Koran is read out loud when an individual is nearing his or her death, and a few drops of sarbat (flavored water) are also given to the person.

After death the body is washed, dressed in new clothes, and wrapped in a shroud. The bier is carried to the mosque on the shoulders of the pallbearers. Relatives take turns carrying the bier, a highly prestigious job. Women do not attend funerals. At the mosque the priest or kazi recites verses from the Koran. The corpse is then laid in the grave and covered with earth. Two tree branches or saplings are planted near the grave, and the opening chapter of the Koran is read. On the third and 40th days after the death, relatives meet and share a meal remembering the dead person.

Introduction

❧ HISTORY

Evidence suggests that the region was inhabited as early as 10,000 years ago. Pygmies, the original inhabitants of this region, lived in the equatorial forests located in the north and northeast of the country. Hunting, gathering, and fishing were their main occupations.

Around 2,000 years ago the Bantu began migrating into the region and started exerting control. They forced the pygmy groups to move south and organized themselves in small states ruled by chiefs or elders. Some of these states shaped themselves into empires; prominent among them were the kingdoms of Kongo, Luba, Kuba, and Lunda. As a result the Democratic Republic of the Congo is home to more than 250 tribes, and the Bantu continue to dominate. Atrocities committed against the pygmy tribes continue in the Democratic Republic of the Congo.

The European influence in the region began in the late 15th century. The first European to enter the Congo was a Portuguese navigator Diogo Cão who reached the mouth of the Congo River and sailed upriver to the north. The Portuguese established relations with the king of Kongo and brought the slave trade with them.

The explorations of the Congo undertaken by explorers Henry Stanley (1841–1904) and David Livingstone (1813–73) caught the attention of the Belgian King Leopold II (1835–1909). He commissioned Henry Stanley to sign treaties with the tribal kings on his behalf and establish his authority in the region. In 1885 King Leopold's claim on Congo was formally recognized by the other European powers in a special ceremony at the Berlin West Africa Conference of 1884–85. Leopold not only ruled Congo, but also he was its personal owner.

Ironically, although the region was named the “Congo Free State,” the local population was treated brutally and forced into slavery on the rubber plantations. Between 1885 and 1908, a large number of Congolese were mercilessly killed by Leopold's armed forces. Estimates vary between 3 and 22 million people killed; many researchers say more than 10 million is the most likely number. The population, which was estimated to have been between 20 and 30 million when Leopold took control, was reduced to about 8 million by 1908.

The international community was shocked by the brutality and carnage and pressured Leopold to stop these atrocities. Finally the Belgian parliament took the Congo Free State under its wing and declared it a Belgian colony, renaming it the “Belgian Congo.” Around the same time, the Congolese initiated their own struggle for independence, and by 1950 the people of the Congo started nationwide demonstrations against foreign rule. On June 30, 1960, Congo won its freedom, and the Democratic Republic of the Congo was born.

Patrice Lumumba (1925–61) became the first prime minister, and Joseph Kasavubu was declared president of the Republic. During the period of the first republic (1960–65), a series of gruesome events rocked the country. Vested Belgian interests stirred up the already existing ethnic rivalries, thereby creating problems for the newly independent nation, including a mutiny in Katanga, the assassination of Lumumba, and volatile rebellions in many parts of the republic, which resulted in the intervention of the United Nations. Colonel Joseph Mobutu (1930–97) assumed power and in 1965 declared himself its supreme leader, beginning the period of the second republic (1965–97).

In accordance with his ideology of authentication, which held that the Zairian tradition favored a single authoritarian leader, he banned all political parties and also renamed the country “Zaire.” Unfortunately, he also plunged the nation into an economic crisis and created growing discontent among the general public. The human rights situation reached its nadir in the 1980s, and opposition leaders became prime targets. In 1990 under mounting international pressure, Mobutu reinstated a multiparty political system regime and declared the formation of the third republic. Nevertheless between 1990 and 1997, the country witnessed a sharp increase in ethnic violence as riots raged in different parts of the region. At the same time thousands of refugees from war-ravaged Rwanda began entering Zaire. An insurgence caused havoc in the region, and the government was unable to crush it.

The insurgents, led by Laurent Kabila (1938–2001), launched a full-fledged war against

Mbuti (Pygmies)

The Democratic Republic of the Congo is home to several groups of pygmies. Many Congolese believe that these pygmies have divine powers, especially due to the secretive nature of their rituals related to Jengi, the forest spirit. Pygmies have cordial relations with their immediate neighbors and speak in a language that is close to the neighbors'. They are dark-skinned and have an average height of less than 59 inches.

the Zairean army and took control of Zaire by May 1997. Following his victory Laurent Kabila was sworn in as the president, and the country was renamed the Democratic Republic of the Congo. Kabila's attempts to revive the economy failed and he, too, displayed dictatorial tendencies by banning all opposition political parties. Moreover reports involving Kabila in ethnic killings of Rwandan Hutu in Rwanda and Uganda also surfaced, which indicted Kabila, along with the Tutsi militants, as an active accomplice in these executions.

The Rwandan Hutu militants were living as refugees in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, having fled their country due to the rise of a Tutsi-led government, which had engaged in the wholesale slaughter of Hutus. In the Democratic Republic of the Congo these Rwandan Hutus, along with Congo's ethnic Hutus, launched a program of organized executions of ethnic Tutsis in the Congo. In retaliation Congolese Tutsis joined with Tutsis in Rwanda and Uganda and launched a counteroffensive under Kabila's direction. This sparked an ethnic war, which resulted in indiscriminate killing of Hutus as well as Tutsis.

With Kabila's involvement in the ethnic violence exposed, some ethnic Hutus in the Congo led a failed mutiny against him in 1998. Meanwhile Uganda and Rwanda began extending support to the insurgents and opponents of Kabila's regime, while Zimbabwe, Namibia, and Angola supported the Kabila regime, escalating the violence into a full-scale regional conflict.

Fun Fact

Since 1885 the Democratic Republic of the Congo has had seven names: Congo Free State (1885–1908), Belgian Congo (1908–60), Republic of the Congo-Leopoldville (1960–64), Democratic Republic of the Congo-Leopoldville (1964–66), Democratic Republic of the Congo-Kinshasa (1966–71), Republic of Zaire (1971–97), and the Democratic Republic of the Congo (since 1997). It is often referred to as “Congo-Kinshasa” to differentiate it from “Congo Brazzaville,” or the Republic of Congo.

Fun Fact

Elements of Kikongo have survived among the descendants of slaves in the Americas such as the language of the Gullah people of South Carolina.

President Kabila was assassinated on January 16, 2001, by one of his bodyguards. His son Maj. Gen. Joseph Kabila (b. 1971) was elected the new president. He has made attempts to end the regional conflict and has signed peace agreements with the warring groups.

Although the war is over, sporadic eruptions of violence continue and the wounds inflicted on the region and its people will take some time to heal. Recommendations to avoid entering the country continue in the 21st century because of the violence and the instability of its government.

In 2003 the International Human Rights organization caught the attention of the world by reporting that widespread acts of cannibalism were being committed against the endangered pygmy groups living in the forests of the Democratic Republic of the Congo. Many Congolese believe that pygmies are both subhuman and powerful and that by eating their flesh they will also become powerful. This myth has spelled doom for the pygmies, who are being systematically exterminated. The cannibals are using their vital organs as charms. Rampant raping and killing of pygmy women is also a cause of great alarm. The Movement for the Liberation of Congo, a member of the transitional alliance government and its allies, has been identified as the main perpetrator.

GEOGRAPHY AND CLIMATE

Located in the central part of Africa, the Democratic Republic of the Congo is surrounded by Uganda, Rwanda, Burundi, and Tanzania to the east; Zambia to the southeast and Angola to the south; the Atlantic Ocean and the Congo Republic to the east; the Central African Republic to the north; and the Sudan to the northeast. It straddles the equator; two-thirds of the country lies in the Southern Hemisphere and one-third in the Northern Hemisphere. The capital Kinshasa is the largest city.

The country has a largely tropical climate. Tropical forests cover the central plains. They are flanked by dense grasslands that extend beyond the Congo River in the north, plateaus and savannas in the south and southeast; and mountainous terraces in the west. Mt. Margherita, at 17,762 feet, is the highest peak. The nation's transport system is largely dependent on its rivers. Bomu and Ugami are the main rivers in the north, and the Congo River flows through the western part of the country. While the river basins are hot and humid, the southern highlands are cool and dry.

ECONOMY

Since 1985 despite the fact that the Democratic Republic of Congo possesses great natural resources, the economy has suffered immensely due to incessant war and genocide, bad governance, and poor economic policies. The Congo War has eaten up the government's revenue and dramatically reduced the national output. Lack of infrastructure, ongoing ethnic conflicts, corruption, devastating famine, and disease are the major hindrances in the development of the economy. Moreover, the country has mounting foreign debts, all of which make reviving the economy, halting the illegal traffic in its citizens, and bringing peace to the war-weary country particularly daunting tasks.

The country remains a source country for men, women, and children internally trafficked for forced labor and sexual exploitation. The vast majority of the trafficking occurs in northeastern and eastern Congo, regions that are outside effective government control. Armed groups continue to abduct and forcibly recruit Congolese men, women, and children to serve as laborers, porters, domestics, combatants, and sex slaves. Civilians are also forced to provide labor for armed groups and the Congolese military (FARDC).

CULTURE AND LIFESTYLE

There are more than 250 ethnic groups in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, with the Bantu-speaking people forming the bulk of the population. The Nilotic-speaking population resides in the north while scattered groups of pygmies live in the northeast. Also thousands of refugees from neighboring countries, who fled their war-stricken nations, have settled here.

Although French is the official language, the people prefer to speak their native languages, primarily Kiwanga, Lingala, Kikongo, and Tshiluba, but with 250 ethnic groups, each with its own language or dialect, communication among the groups is often difficult. More than 50 percent of the inhabitants are Roman Catholic, while 20 percent are Protestant. Muslims make up 10 percent of the population. A considerable number of people are affiliated with an indigenous Christian church known as Kimbanguism, which fuses the beliefs of Christianity with traditional African ones. Kimbanguism (The Church of Christ on Earth) is a branch of Christianity founded by Simon Kimbangu (1889–1951), an African preacher. The Belgian authorities treated the faith with suspicion and imprisoned Simon Kimbangu for most of his life (he died in prison). Kimbanguism gained membership of the World Council of Churches in 1969.

The pygmy populations are as varied as the

Nkisi Nkondi

Nkisi (pl., ninkisi, or nkishi/minkishi), which means “sacred medicine,” refers to a variety of objects believed to contain spiritual powers. The peoples who live in the Congo Basin, especially the Bakongo and the Songye, believe that the extraordinary powers possessed by some people come from some kind of communication with the dead. Banganga (sing., nganga) are healers, diviners, and mediators who protect the living from witchcraft and give them remedies against diseases caused either by witchcraft or the demands of bakisi (“spirits”). They use the minkisi, which are mostly containers made of pottery, gourds, horn, shells, or other objects capable of holding spiritually charged substances, to control the powers of bakisi or the dead.

Minkisi serve many purposes. A wooden figure called nkisi nkondi has a face, feet, and hands, and its power can be activated by driving nails or iron blades into it. The banganga use these figures (also known as fetishes) to harness spiritual forces to weaken enemies, drive away illnesses, and provide protection against thieves. The increasing belief in witchcraft and sorcery reflects the country’s social decay caused by war and poverty. Many of the street children roaming the Congo’s cities were cast out of their families after being denounced as witches. These homeless “witch children” often live in cemeteries, coming out only at night, and follow occult practices.

other cultures, and different groups speak different languages, most of which are related to the languages spoken by neighboring non-pygmy populations. Evidence shows, however, that at one time the various pygmy groups shared a common language. This is reflected in the word jengi, a common term used by all the pygmy groups, to refer to the forest spirits.

Although Kinshasa is a city of more than five million people, most Congolese reside in rural areas. While urban Congolese generally prefer to dress in Western attire, rural people still wear the traditional attire of their ethnic groups.

Among the Kongo women who live in the western part of the Democratic Republic of the Congo dress and body art in the form of distinct and elaborate scarifications have traditionally symbolized beauty and status. In the modern era, scarification is becoming obsolete, but the patterns have been captured on beautifully carved sculptures of nursing women called phemba. Phemba sculptures are used to ward off evil during delivery and to protect the health of the newborn child.

Traditional forms of art still survive in rural areas, including the Kongo art of carving wooden figures, which is called nkisi nkondi (also referred to as power sculptures).

The traditional music of the pygmies is vocal and rich in polyphonic harmony. The songs they sing are based on themes concerning their rural lives and especially their hunting and gathering skills.

❁ CUISINE

The most popular dish in the Democratic Republic of Congo is moambé, a spicy stew of peanuts, palm oil, and chicken served with yams, native loso rice, or most commonly fufu, a paste of mashed manioc (cassava). Common foods include yams, bananas, plantains, fruits, and fish.

❁ NEW YEAR’S EVE/DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: December 31–January 1

January 1, New Year’s Day, marks the first day of the first month of the Western (or Gregorian) calendar. In most countries celebrations begin on December 31, also known as New Year’s Eve. In the Democratic Republic of the Congo, the festivities are somewhat muted, given the present state of the country’s economy. Since this is a national holiday, all government offices and private and public institutions are closed on January 1.

Exotic Dishes

The Democratic Republic of the Congo is home to a number of interesting delicacies, albeit for an adventurous palate. They include monkey, bonobo (a kind of ape), gorilla, chimpanzee, crocodile, snake, tortoise, and okapi (a giraffe-like creature found in the Ituri forest of DRC) as chief ingredients. However, the fear of Ebola virus has made the people wary of consuming monkey meat, since simians can be affected with this virus. Because the Ituri forests are rebel strongholds, hunting of okapi has been similarly affected, and hence okapi rarely makes it to the dining table currently.

Fun Fact

The Mongandu people in the Democratic Republic of the Congo do not eat bonobos (an African ape) because they consider them too humanoid to be eaten. They believe that when humans are not watching them, these apes stand upright on their hind legs just like people.

MARTYRS' DAY

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: January 4

The Independence Martyrs' Day pays tribute to those who died in order to secure the independence of the Democratic Republic of the Congo. During the colonial period, which lasted until 1960, the region was ruled by Belgium. During the oppressive regime of King Leopold II, many people were brutally killed. Voices of protests and dissent were crushed, yet the brave Congolese intensified their resistance and persisted in their fight for independence.

On this day the Congolese remember those who sacrificed their lives for freedom.

INTERNATIONAL WOMEN'S DAY

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: March 8

International Women's Day has its origins in the late 19th- early 20th-century labor struggles. Its modern observance dates back to 1975 when the United Nations began sponsoring the holiday. In the Democratic Republic of the Congo the day is often used as an opportunity to highlight humanitarian and civil rights issues affecting women. These include rape, female genital mutilation, and the struggle for fair wages and decent workplace conditions.

LABOR DAY

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: May 1

May 1 is celebrated as Labor Day, also known as May Day, in many parts of the world to commemorate the important role played by workers. In 1889 the Second International, a consortium of socialist organizations, declared May 1 a day to recognize the importance of workers around the world and scheduled the first demonstrations and celebrations for the following year, 1890. They coordinated this observance with the strike called by the U.S. labor union, the American Federation of Labor (AFL), demanding an eight-hour workday. In the Democratic Republic of the Congo, Labor Day is called Working Day. It is a national holiday and schools, government offices, and businesses are closed.

known as Zaire, was declared an independent nation on June 30, 1960. The country was a Belgian colony for almost eight decades, and brutality and slavery were the predominant features of colonial rule. Independence Day commemorates the sacrifice made by thousands of Congolese who refused to be suppressed by the cruel regime. The freedom struggle for a free Congo was a fight for justice, equality, and the right of self-governance, which had long been denied its people. The incipient desires for independence took the form of small anti-Belgian demonstrations and culminated in a nationwide fight for freedom. The Belgian forces failed to silence these voices of dissent, and Belgium finally acceded to the demands of the Congolese people. Official speeches and military parades are the highlights of the day.

✿ CHRISTMAS EVE/DAY

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: December 24–25

Christmas is a day of celebration for Christians since it commemorates the birth of Jesus. In the Democratic Republic of the Congo, Christians all over the country attend church services on Christmas Eve and sing carols along with the church choirs.

In times prior to the state of civil war, homes were adorned with lights and Christmas trees on Christmas Day, and there was a festive atmosphere everywhere. People wore new clothes and offered prayers in churches. In the afternoon a lavish feast was prepared with all the traditional delicacies on the menu. People exchanged gifts and greetings. In the early 21st century, however, with the country's economy in a shambles and the wounds of the regional conflict still fresh, Christmas celebrations in this region have been muted.

✿ BIRTH

Although the pygmy groups do not have special birth rituals, they practice a form of foster parenting requiring that individuals other than biological parents take care of a newborn child. This care comes mainly from female relatives, such as sisters, aunts, grandmothers, and even other members of the village.

Newborn infants in pygmy tribes spend 40 percent of their time in the first three weeks of their new lives away from their mothers; they are often cared for by their siblings or female relatives. This is supposed to foster a special bond within the family.

✿ COMING OF AGE

The coming-of-age ceremony is integral to many cultures around the world. In the Democratic Republic of the Congo, different tribes perform different initiation ceremonies for boys and girls. The Bambuti pygmies, who reside in the Ituri forest, call the initiation ceremony for girls elima. When a tribal girl starts to menstruate, there is a big celebration since the event represents hope for the survival of the family and the tribe. The elima is a time of festivities, and the initiate lives in a special hut made for her, along with some of her friends. The ritual lasts for a period of one or two months, and a female relative is chosen to impart lessons on sex and adult womanhood. Traditional songs and dances, history lessons, and lessons on motherhood are part of the training. Excision of the clitoris is practiced by groups who live in the northern equatorial part of the country. There is no law in the Democratic Republic of Congo against female genital mutilation, and it is estimated that 5 percent of the women in the country have been infibulated.

At night when the girls sing together, the men hang around the hut and often sing along. Flirting is also permitted. On the final night of the ceremony, initiates adorn their bodies with white clay, paint, and apply perfumed oils and herbs. It is a night of rejoicing and is marked by dancing. The next day the girls complete their initiation period and are eligible for marriage.

Among the Baka pygmies, the initiation ceremony for men involves meeting with the Jengi (forest) spirit in a very secretive affair, which they are forbidden to discuss. Male circumcision is practiced among the Bantu-speaking tribes and is considered an important ritual that helps a boy make a swift transition to manhood.

✿ MARRIAGE

Exchanging gifts is the hallmark of traditional marriage in the Democratic Republic of the Congo.

Negotiations regarding gifts begin between families shortly after a marriage has been fixed. These gifts are known as bride-price and consist of livestock and money. The term bride price does not have a negative connotation, since it indicates the husband's ability to take care of his bride and his family. In the local Swahili language, it is called mali, which means "the worth." It is also called lobola or "dowry" in many parts of Africa. Young men spend years trying to accumulate enough money to pay the mali. Also in many parts of the region, nonpayment of mali often results in rejection of marriage proposals. Until the mali is paid, the groom cannot take his bride home.

However, the ongoing civil war in the country has rendered most of the people penniless, so few families can pay the mali. Traditional marriage rites are being abandoned because most young people are eloping (to ensure that payment of mali does not become a hindrance in their marriage), much to the displeasure of their parents and tribes.

DEATH

The older tribes do not consider death a natural phenomenon. Instead, they believe that death occurs when someone invokes the power of supernatural forces by acts of sorcery, witchcraft, and vodun. They also believe that the soul becomes a ghost or evil spirit and will avenge its death. Hence special rituals are practiced to pacify these spirits and protect the living from their wrath. During funerals, people wear masks because they believe that masks drive away the evil spirits. Along with the traditional African beliefs, there coexists a strong belief in a Christian God. But funeral celebrations tend not to center on this God but rather honor elders and ancestors. When an elder dies, other elders of the tribe perform a special ceremony in his honor, and the entire village participates. It is believed that ancestors can be appeased by making offerings to honor them and by following and honoring the traditional way of life. Most tribes retain their traditional funeral rites and customs.

Introduction

✿ HISTORY

First settled by Mbuti (formerly known as Pygmies) Congo was later settled by Bantu groups that also occupied parts of present-day Angola, Gabon, and Democratic Republic of the Congo (formerly Zaire), forming the basis for ethnic affinities and rivalries among those states. Several Bantu kingdoms—notably those of the Kongo, the Loango, and the Teke—built trade links leading into the Congo River basin. In 1482 the Portuguese located the Congo River and were soon using it for trade in slaves and ivory. For centuries the Congo River was a conduit of trade and conflict among various African groups and European colonizers, but only in 1880 did the French assume dominion over the colonial territory they called French Congo (or Middle Congo). In 1908 France collected various territories—Gabon, Chad, Oubangui-Chari (modern Central African Republic), and the Congo—into French Equatorial Africa (AEF), with Brazzaville as the federal capital. The following decades saw increasing discontent over continuing exploitation by the French.

During World War II the AEF administration sided with Charles de Gaulle (1890–1970) rather than with the Vichy regime in France, and from 1940 to 1943 Brazzaville became the symbolic capital of Free France. The Brazzaville Conference of 1944 began major reforms in French colonial policy including the end of forced labor, French citizenship for colonial subjects, decentralization of power, and the beginnings of self-government.

Middle Congo became the Republic of the Congo in 1960 when it proclaimed independence without leaving the French Community. Fulbert Abbé Youlou (1917–72) served as the country's first president, but he was deposed in 1963, overthrown in a three-day uprising called les Trois Glorieuses (or "Three Glorious Days"), led by labor and competing political parties; every member of his government was arrested or removed from office.

The military briefly seized control and installed a civilian provisional government headed by Alphonse Massamba-Débat (1921–77). Under the 1963 constitution Massamba-Débat was elected president for a five-year term; he named Pascal Lissouba (b. 1931) prime minister. But Massamba-Débat's term came to a sudden end in 1968, when army officers led by Captain Marien Ngouabi (1938–77) toppled the government. After a period of consolidation under the newly formed National Revolutionary Council (NRC) Ngouabi (now a major) assumed the presidency on December 31, 1968. One year later President Ngouabi proclaimed Congo to be Africa's first "people's republic" and announced the decision of the National Revolutionary Movement to change its name to the Congolese Labor Party (PCT).

Then early in 1977 President Ngouabi was assassinated, and a Military Committee of the Party (CMP) was named to head an interim government with Colonel (later General) Joachim Yhombi-Opango (b. 1939) serving as president. Only two years later in 1979 Yhombi-Opango was removed from office by the Central Committee of the PCT after being accused of corruption and deviating from party directives. The PCT then appointed Vice President and Defense Minister Colonel Denis Sassou-Nguesso (b. 1943?) to serve as interim president.

By the early 1990s after years of poor economic performance and the collapse of the Soviet Union, the Congo authorities changed their political and economic views, and the country's first democratic elections took place in 1992 with Pascal Lissouba (b. 1931) becoming the country's first democratically elected president. The Republic of Congo has struggled with its experiment in democracy, enduring ethnic unrest and a civil war in 1997 and restoring democracy and peace in its tenuous accord with opposition forces in 2003.

GEOGRAPHY AND CLIMATE

Congo is located in central West Africa, spanning the equator. It has Gabon to its west, Cameroon and Central African Republic to its north, Democratic Republic of the Congo to its south, and a small coastline with the Atlantic Ocean on the southwest side. The small coastal part of the country has grasslands, whereas the central and southern part form plateaus. The land rises toward Gabon, with tropical rain forests becoming more frequent toward the northern zone, where the land is covered with tropical rain forests that are richly nourished and flooded during monsoon by the tributaries of the Congo River, most notably the Ubangui and Sangha Rivers.

The average temperature ranges from 70°F to 81°F, with an average rainfall of 43 inches annually. The temperatures remain high, and the weather is humid in areas closer to the equator. The rainy, tropical season lasts from March until June, followed by the dry season from July until October.

ECONOMY

Forestry was the backbone of Congo's economy before the oil and petroleum industries took over. Congo is now one of the biggest petroleum producers in the entire African region. During the 1980s the gross domestic product of Congo rose by 5 percent, by far the highest in any African country. This growth can be attributed to the rising oil revenues that fueled internal development, and Congo has yet to tap its offshore oil reserves.

Electricity is provided by the Sounda Gorge hydroelectric power project and by the electric utility Société Nationale d'Electricité. Mining has also become an important activity over the years, though the biggest chunk of foreign exchange comes from oil-based activities (fourth largest in sub-Saharan Africa).

The agriculture sector consists primarily of subsistence farming. Cassava (manioc) is the main food crop, with cocoa and coffee forming the main cash crops, along with sugar and tobacco. A big portion of the country is home to tropical rain forests, so the timber industry also provides a major source of export revenue. There is a small manufacturing industry base for utilizing forestry and agricultural products. The World Bank and the International Monetary Fund continue to support the economic reform program of Congo. Poor infrastructure and public health problems, however, tend to pull down the economy.

CULTURE AND LIFESTYLE

The majority tribe the Bakongo or Kongo has inhabited the Republic of Congo (Brazzaville), the Democratic Republic of Congo (Kinshasa), and Angola for centuries. (The first two countries are often referred to as Congo-Brazzaville or Congo-Kinshasa.) In the late 15th century the Portuguese arrived on the western African coast. From the time of their arrival there was a great deal of tension between the Portuguese and the Bakongos, particularly in relation to Portuguese efforts to convert the indigenous people to Christianity. Today the Bakongos often combine traditional and Christian beliefs. They believe in spirit cults and the active role of ancestors in their lives. Ancestors are seen as mediators between the living and the spirit worlds.

Rural Congolese lead a traditional life: Men rule over women, and the gender roles are rigidly defined. Men hunt, clear forests, and make all the

Bush Meat

Bush meat, the product of the illegal killing of wildlife, is one of the least documented wildlife problems in Africa, but it probably involves more people and endangers more species than is currently known. Bush meat also plays an important socioeconomic role in Africa, and highlights a critical conflict between attempts to save endangered species and their habitat and the needs of African peoples for nutritious foods. In African communities bush meat is regarded as an available food resource and the demand for it is high.

As the populations of African countries continue to expand, especially in the arid and semi-arid regions, the demand for bush meat will most likely continue to grow as well. More than 90 percent of Africa's rural populations depend upon corn (maize) as their staple diet and consume less than half of the protein needed to maintain health. The combination of protein-poor diets and poverty has resulted in many people being malnourished as well as the world's highest infant mortality rates. Given such inadequate resources, wild animal meat has become critical both as a source of protein and as a means of producing a cash income from selling the skins and ivory. As populations rise and species disappear, the standard of living of many African people will deteriorate even further.

With bush meat resources in decline, not only is a larger and more diverse range of species being targeted, but commercial trade is also gradually replacing subsistence use in most areas. An emerging trend is that rising prices are stimulating the harvesting of a dwindling resource. One consequence has been increased hunting pressure on many protected areas, where bush meat harvest is now the number one illegal activity. Increased efforts to improve hunters' catch has also led to the increased use of more effective and, in most cases, unsustainable hunting techniques, such as night torching, long-line wire snaring, and shooting with semiautomatic weapons.

necessary decisions. Women are supposed to fetch water, tend fields, cook, care for the family, and do the housework. Married women cannot use banking facilities, are seldom allowed to work in offices (when they do they are paid less than men), cannot get a passport, and cannot rent or sell property without their husbands' permission.

The wood carvings of the Kongo and Teke tribes, mostly realistic figures representing their ancestors, are highly valued. Some of the special figures are fetiches based on the belief that a spirit inhabits them.

The Republic of the Congo is rich in literary works as well as in art. Sylvain Bemba (1934–95) was a famous journalist of his time who wrote novels and plays on his African experiences. In The Man Who Killed a Crocodile, for instance, Bemba writes about a local schoolteacher who confronts the village people about the ill-treatment of a woman of the village. He talks about the power of education in undoing injustice. Sony Labou Tansi (1947–95) is another writer known for his insightful examination of local politics. Gerald Felix Tchicaya U. Tamsi (1931–88) was one of the greatest Congolese poets; his works probe the social and political disappointments of the people of Africa.

❁ CUISINE

The traditional Congolese way of eating involves serving food on banana or cassava leaf plates. Cooking in liboke ("leaves") is a common practice, adding a distinctive flavor to any dish cooked this way. A Congo-Brazzaville National Culinary Team (also called Team Bana Liboke) has as its goal to make Congolese cuisine and eating habits famous. A popular sweet dish is baked bananas, though mangoes are commonly available, too. The more affluent Congolese eat two or three meals a day, but most households prepare just one meal, which is eaten in the evenings. Common people cook in one pot to save fuel and take turns picking out a handful of rice (or any other cereal or grain), which they eat like a ball with sauce/stew. The stew is called mwamba and can be made of fish, lamb, meat, or chicken. It is eaten with cassava, fufu (a corn flour preparation), or rice. Common Congolese dishes include pili pili (chicken), saka saka (cassava), mabuke (freshwater fish), and fumbwa (vegetable stew). Cooked termites are delicacies in some places, while caterpillars, roasted crickets, and grubs are relished in other areas. Bush meat is often grilled crocodile, smoked monkey, or smoked antelope.

It is customary in Congo-Brazzaville to spill some drink on the floor before consuming it as a libation for thirsty ancestors.

Curious Food Facts

In the hot tropical forests of Africa mangoes, bananas, and pawpaw are in plentiful supply. The people usually relish meat, chicken, and eggs with these fruits, along with corn biscuits or rough maize. Bananas are cooked in various ways and are an important food item. Ostrich eggs are highly valued because one egg can feed an entire family.

NEW YEAR'S EVE/DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: December 31–January 1

December 31 is not only New Year's Eve, but also Republic Day in Congo Brazzaville. New Year's Day brings families and friends together to celebrate a better and more prosperous new year. All offices and establishments are closed on both December 31 and January 1.

PRESIDENT'S DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: February 5

Home Cooking

In parts of sub-Saharan Africa people are so frightened about the possibility of being poisoned that they consume only bottled drinks. In the book The Fetish Folk of West Africa (1912), Robert Milligan wrote about some African women adding poison (available in many varieties) while preparing food, so people prefer homemade food.

In 1977 the assassination of President Ngouabi led to an interim government headed by Colonel Joachim Yhombi-Opango. He was later charged with corruption and removed by the Central Committee of the Congolese Labor Party, which simultaneously replaced him with then-vice president and defense minister Colonel Denis Sassou-Nguesso as interim president. This day is observed as President's Day, when the current leader of the country first became president on February 5. Official ceremonies mark the day.

INTERNATIONAL WOMEN'S DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: March 8

An annual event on March 8, International Women's Day commemorates, among other relevant historic events, the Triangle Shirtwaist Factory Fire (New York, 1911), where more than 140 women lost their lives. On International Women's Day on March 8, 2000, in the presence of government officials, UNDP, and UNESCO, about 2,000 women participated in a march that started from the Palais du Parlement (Parliament House), in Congo Brazzaville. The purpose of the march was to collect at least 10 million signatures of supporters so that their demands could be raised in the United Nations. Their main demand was to bring about an end to poverty and violence against women worldwide. That year there was a host of other events such as televised talk shows, radio and press interviews, debates, and discussions and signing of support cards.

Typically workshops and seminars are held on International Women's Day. Humanitarian organizations such as Médecins sans Frontières (Doctors without Borders) hold awareness and healing camps for treating and giving aid to the women of the Republic of the Congo, especially those who have been raped and victimized.

MARIEN NGOUABI DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: March 18

This day commemorates the memory of President Marien Ngouabi, who came to power following a coup he led in 1968. Ngouabi was assassinated, allegedly by a suicide commando, on March 18, 1977. The perpetrators of the crime were tried in court and some of them were executed, though the motivations for the assassination remain unclear. Colonel Joachim Yhombi-Opango was named to lead the interim government, but he was soon removed from office and replaced by Vice President and Defense Minister Colonel Denis Sassou-Nguesso as interim president. Nguesso would continue to serve as president into the early 21st century. This day is an official holiday in the Republic of the Congo.

INDEPENDENCE DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: August 13–16

By 1958 French Equatorial Africa had dissolved, making the four constituent African nations autonomous members of the French Community. Middle Africa became the Republic of the Congo. In 1959 the Republic of the Congo adopted a diagonal tricolor flag. It declared full independence on August 15, 1960. The administration of its first president Fulbert Abbé Youlou was overthrown in 1963 in a three-day uprising called Les Trois Glorieuses ("Three Glorious Days"), and Republic of the Congo's three-day celebration of independence takes its name from that uprising, as does its national anthem adopted in 1969. All offices and public institutions are closed, and the long holiday is devoted to flag-raising ceremonies, parades, and other large public gatherings.

CHILDREN'S DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: December 25

Children's Day was first observed in the United States in 1856, and by 1868 it had become a national celebration scheduled on the second Sunday in June. Now it is observed in countries around the world, although the date on which it falls differs from one country to another. In the Republic of the Congo the holiday is observed on December 25, and children are given opportunities to participate in a variety of social, cultural, and governmental activities.

❁ REPUBLIC DAY

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: December 31

On December 31, 1968, Captain Marien Ngouabi and other army officers toppled President Massamba-Debat's civilian provisional government before it could complete its full term. A year later on this same day Ngouabi declared Congo as Africa's first "people's republic" and renamed the National Revolutionary Movement the Congolese Labor Party. Since then December 31 has been officially celebrated as Republic Day in the Republic of the Congo.

Religious Holidays

❁ EASTER

Observed on: December 24–25

The Christian festival of Christmas celebrates the birth of Jesus. In the Republic of the Congo most cannot afford lavish celebrations, but those who can enjoy a feast of roasted beef or mutton. Families and friends gather in churches to celebrate Christmas. In Pointe-Noire visitors to the church receive gifts of food, such as tomatoes, fruit, exotic vegetables, and even live catfish from members of the church. Church services include skits and other performances by children.

Rites of Passage

❁ BIRTH

Since having children is a sign of prosperity, Congolese families are generally large, and childbirth is marked with celebration and rejoicing. Though the government has undertaken several family-planning programs, by the 1990s each woman had six children on an average. However women living in the cities now find it expensive to have so many children, and the average number of children fell to about three per woman in 2004. Childbirth, however, remains a special occasion. According to a custom the maternal uncle names the boy child, while the aunt or mother names a girl.

❁ COMING OF AGE

Secret societies oversee many indigenous African ceremonies and rituals, including coming-of-age rites. The practice of concealing rituals developed because slave masters prohibited them. Traditions were kept secret in order to preserve them. In Congo when boys and girls are on the cusp of puberty, they are kept in seclusion for several days while undergoing initiation rituals. Boys must pass tests of strength and endurance to become adult men, whereas women learn lessons particular to their adult responsibilities. Boys are circumcised to symbolize their entry into adulthood. Genital cutting, or female genital mutilation, a highly controversial practice in the west that has been banned in many countries, is still practiced in the Republic of the Congo. Masked dances and feasting mark this occasion as the young have been initiated successfully into their adult roles and into identities.

❁ MARRIAGE

In earlier times the parents of prospective couples arranged most marriages, but this practice has fallen out of favor. The groom pays a bride price to the girl's parents and takes it back in case of a divorce. There is a tradition of exchanging gifts, followed by a civil ceremony, and culminating for Christians with a church ceremony. Marriages involve much feasting, dancing, and merrymaking, which may last for days, particularly in the rural areas. Some ceremonies incorporate broom-jumping after the wedding. Symbolic of homemaking, broom-jumping also signifies moving "over" or "sweeping away" the past and moving into a new life after marriage. Pouring wine on the floor as an offering invites the ancestors to witness the wedding and underscores the importance of heritage and family.

❁ DEATH

The Pygmies of Africa's Congo see death as a sharp delineation. They pull down the hut over the dead person and move away with their camps while the family mourns. The dead person is then essentially erased from memory and never mentioned again. Widows may sometimes roam about naked or wear small aprons, which are traditionally worn by unmarried girls. People soon return to their normal lives. Most Bakongos believe that when people die their last bit of strength gets left behind in the cup or plates they touched last. The children of the deceased are encouraged to touch these utensils, and it is expected that what they need to know from the deceased will be revealed in dreams. The deceased is placed in the grave facing east and no grass is allowed to grow on the grave.

The grave is decorated with seashells, expressing the belief that seashells enclosed the soul's immortal presence and represented the sea, the land of demise, and purity.

Introduction

❁ HISTORY

Costa Rica is situated between North and South America and has shared the cultures of both, dating back to pre-Columbian times. The excavations in the Cordillera Central mountain range have yielded spear points of two distinct types: a variation of the Clovis point known in North America; and the Magellan type (the fishtail) known in South America. These date to the Pleistocene megafauna period, 1.8–1.6 million to 10,000 years ago, when the Americas were populated by large animals such as the giant sloth, mammoths, mastodons, saber-toothed cats, giant condors, and dire wolves. Interestingly, some of the pottery artifacts are Mayan in nature, with their cylindrical shapes, woven patterns, and the slab tripod feet.

Christopher Columbus (1451–1506 C.E.) stopped at Costa Rica for 17 days in 1502 on his fourth and final voyage. He was so impressed by the gold decorations worn by the friendly locals that he promptly dubbed the country Costa Rica, the “rich coast.” Despite the lure of its apparent wealth, settlements did not begin until 1522. For the next 300 years Costa Rica was ruled by Spain as part of the Captaincy General of Guatemala. Costa Rica, like its other colonized neighbors, suffered the effects of European invasion, and the indigenous population dwindled quickly because of its lack of immunity to the diseases contracted from European conquerors.

The absence of major gold deposits or any other valuable mineral resources allowed Costa Rica to remain a largely forgotten territory. Eventually, however, the Spanish turned to agriculture, and Costa Rica was the first nation in Central America to grow coffee and bananas on a commercial basis. The government gave free land to anyone willing to grow coffee for export—an enlightened step that moved away from the common pattern of keeping wealth in the hands of a few. This cultivation brought wealth and prosperity to many, and a more outward-looking perspective.

In 1821 Costa Rica was one of the countries included in the declaration of freedom from Spain pronounced by Guatemala.

Fun Fact

A large animal of the Pleistocene era found in South and Central America, but not in North America, was the giant armadillo (Glyptodont).

The news did not reach Costa Rica until a month after it was first announced. In 1824 Guanacaste Province became a part of Costa Rica, preferring it to Nicaragua. After this brief assimilation into the United Provinces of Central America, Costa Rica declared its sovereignty in 1838.

One of the landmark events of Costa Rican history took place in 1856, a period remembered for economic and cultural growth. During the term of coffee-grower-turned-president Juan Rafael Mora (1814–60), U.S. adventurer William Walker (1824–60) invaded Costa Rica with his army of recently captured Nicaraguan slaves. Mora organized an army of 9,000 civilians that succeeded against all odds and defeated Walker, forcing him out of the country. One of Mora's soldiers became a national hero—Juan Santamaria (1831–56)—the humble but very brave soldier who died in the 1856 battle. Santamaria is honored each year on April 11, which is known as Rivas Battle Day (or Juan Santamaria Day).

Costa Rica enjoys the distinction of being the only Central American country without an army. There have been only two periods of violence in the nation's history—the dictatorship of Federico Tinoco (1870–1931) in 1917–19, and the armed uprising in 1948 led by José Figueres (1906–90). The latter was a 44-day civil war that left 2,000 dead. The provocation was a disputed presidential election, and the immediate results of the bloodshed were the establishment of universal suffrage and the abolition of the military. The Constitution of 1949 gave women and blacks the right to vote.

In 1987 President Óscar Arias (b. 1941) received the Nobel Peace Prize for his attempts to spread Costa Rica's example of peace to the rest of Central America. His regional peace plan in 1987 formed the basis for the Esquipulas Peace Agreements.

Io on Earth

Poas Volcano (8,871 feet), active since well before records started in 1828, has had three major periods of activity since, 1888–95, 1903–12, and 1952–54. Occasional geyser eruptions continue, and from 1989 to 1991 gas emissions caused acid rain. At the present time the spectacular crater is a bubbling and steaming cauldron but is not thought to pose an imminent threat. At one time the volcano had two crater lakes, but the second crater lake drained away in 1989, leaving in its place a pool of liquid sulfur. This is the first such found on Earth, but liquid sulfur lakes can indeed be found on Io, one of Jupiter's moons. The remaining crater lake, Laguna Botos, is full of boiling sulfurous water. Poas's huge crater is 4,265 feet wide and nearly 1,000 feet deep.

Poas is a composite volcano or stratovolcano, a steep-sided, symmetrical cone of alternating layers of lava flows, volcanic ash, cinders, blocks, and bombs. The essential feature of a composite volcano is a conduit system through which magma rises to the surface from a reservoir deep in the earth's crust. As material erupts through the conduit it accumulates, and the volcano increases in size as lava, cinders, and ash are added to its slopes. Lavas either flow through breaks in the crater wall or issue from fissures on the flanks of the cone.

GEOGRAPHY AND CLIMATE

This country is one of mountains, coastal plains, and more than 100 volcanoes. Four volcanoes, two of them active, rise near the capital of San José in the center of the country; one of these, Irazu, erupted destructively in 1963–65. The climate is both tropical and subtropical, not extreme. The dry season lasts from December to April and the rainy season from May to November. The highlands are cooler than the plains. Costa Rica is a peaceful country characterized by an amazing natural beauty and the residents' love of horses. One-fourth of the land has been preserved as protected areas and national parks, and many of these are favorite picnic spots, including dormant volcanoes where the craters have metamorphosed into cold-water lakes. As a matter of fact, one of the dormant craters of Poas Volcano holds a cold-water lake that is the source of the Sarapiquí River.

ECONOMY

Costa Rica's stable economy is founded on tourism, agriculture, and electronics exports. Poverty has been substantially reduced over the past 15 years, with a strong social safety net for its people. Foreign investors remain attracted by the country's political stability and high educational levels, and tourism continues to bring in foreign money. Costa Rica recently concluded negotiations to participate in the U.S.–Central American Free Trade Agreement, which, if ratified by the Costa Rican legislature, would result in economic reforms and an improved investment climate.

CULTURE AND LIFESTYLE

More than 75 percent of Costa Ricans are Roman Catholics. In practice most church attendance takes place at christenings, funerals, and marriages. Easter is the most important holiday, and during Semana Santa ("Holy Week") the nation comes to a standstill.

Blend rum into eggnog mixture just before serving and sprinkle with freshly grated nutmeg and coconut. Serve cold.

Small villages have their own way of celebrating, and they add to the occasion the blessing of oxcarts, horses, and trucks. The Ticos, as Costa Ricans refer to themselves, are a happy, fun-loving people. The myriad celebrations include the National Chocolate Festival at Esparza in Puntarenas and the feast days of the patron saints of villages and towns. During these holidays many people walk to the city from all parts of the country. While some choose to party during religious holidays, most prefer a family gathering.

Independence Day is the most significant non-religious holiday in Costa Rica. Every town has its own formal official celebration including parades of young children, bands, and majorettes. People carry the national flag and wear the national colors: red, blue, and white.

❁ CUISINE

Costa Ricans have their own unique style, even when it concerns food: the gallo pinto (rice and beans preparation) takes all of 10 minutes to cook and is enjoyed for breakfast, lunch, or dinner while the vigoron (a pork preparation borrowed from neighboring Nicaragua) requires an hour and is sold by hawkers near the ports. It is also cooked in most coastal homes. No celebration is complete without rompopo (Costa Rican eggnog).

Public/Legal Holidays

❁ NEW YEAR'S EVE/DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: December 31–January 1

New Year's Eve and New Year's Day, called Año Nuevo here, are public holidays in Costa Rica. New Year's Eve is a worldwide celebration, marking the end of one year and the beginning of the new. The mood is joyous on New Year's Eve, and the revelry continues until midnight, the moment of transition into the new year. Most Costa Ricans prefer to be with friends and family.

On the first day of the year Costa Ricans seek to ward off bad luck by cleaning their homes. Celebrations around the country include street parties, music, dancing, and public feasts. A big dance is organized in San José's Parque Central (Central Park), and festivities conclude with a magnificent display of fireworks.

❁ RIVAS BATTLE DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: April 11

Rivas Battle Day is a national holiday in Costa Rica, commemorating the 1856 victory over William Walker, an American adventurer and his Nicaraguan slaves. On this day Spanish farmers under the leadership of Juan Rafael Mora, the president of Costa Rica, routed the invaders, who were forced back to Nicaragua. Walker was ultimately imprisoned and executed in Honduras.

This day is also known as Juan Santamaria Day (Día de Juan Santamaria) in honor of Juan Santamaria, the barefoot soldier who fought and lost his life at the battle of Rivas. The weeklong celebrations include parades with bands, music concerts, dances, and a cattle fair at Alajuela.

❁ LABOR DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: May 1

Labor Day honors the contribution of all workers and is observed in many countries of the world. The May 1 observance of Labor Day (also known as Día de los Trabajadores or May Day) has its origins in the international socialist movement. The first May Day/Labor Day occurred in 1890, set internationally by the Second International to coincide with an American Federation of Labor general strike in the United States to demand the eight-hour workday. Thereafter, International Labor Day became (and remains) more radical than the U.S. Labor Day observed in September.

At Puerto Limón there are lavish celebrations including huge parades in tribute to those who died in Chicago's Haymarket riots in support of workers' rights in 1886. Costa Ricans celebrate their day of rest by attending music festivals, marches, cookouts on the beach, and by listening to an address delivered by the president on this occasion.

❁ GUANACASTE ANNEXION

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: July 25

Costa Rica gained independence from Spain in 1821, and in 1824 Guanacaste province chose to join Costa Rica rather than Nicaragua. This day is celebrated as Guanacaste Annexation Day, Anexión de Guanacaste, or just Guanacaste Day. It is a country-wide holiday, but the most vibrant celebrations are held in Guanacaste province with bullfights, rodeos, cattle fairs, and fireworks.

❁ INDEPENDENCE DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: September 15

After centuries of Spanish colonial rule Costa Rica and other Central American nations declared their independence from Spain in 1821. To celebrate that event students and government officials bring the Freedom Torch from Guatemala to Costa Rica. The torch arrives in Cartago on September 14 at 6 A.M., and the national anthem is sung throughout the country. On the 15th, the nation celebrates with colorful parades and public monuments are decorated with flags, torches, shields, and commemorative plaques. The nocturnal Desfile de Faroles ("Parade of Lanterns") is one of the most important events of Independence Day, or Día de la Independencia, enthusiastically attended by university students, who make the lanterns themselves. Celebrations at San José are the most widely attended.

❁ COLUMBUS DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: October 12

Columbus Day, also referred to as Día de la Raza, Day of Race, or Discovery Day, commemorates Christopher Columbus's discovery of the Americas. In recent years there has been a reexamination of Columbus's legacy in light of the European colonizers' brutal treatment of the indigenous peoples of the Americas. Commemorations in many Latin American countries now emphasize native peoples and traditions as much as, if not more than, the person of Christopher Columbus.

The Carnival of Costa Rica, held on this day, includes dancing, music, and much food and drink.

Religious Holidays

❁ EPIPHANY

Observed by: Roman Catholics

Observed on: January 6

Epiphany commemorates the arrival of the Three Kings (or the Magi) at Bethlehem to honor the birth of Jesus. They bore gifts of frankincense (symbolizing the prayers of the world), myrrh (symbolizing Jesus' sacrifice and death), and gold (a gift fit for a king). In Costa Rica, where the holiday is often called Three Kings' Day, entire neighborhoods gather for a special prayer for the baby Jesus. This prayer is based on the rosary. Christmas carols are sung, and later coffee, cakes, and other delicacies are served.

❁ ST. JOSEPH'S DAY

Observed by: Roman Catholics
Observed on: March 19

St. Joseph is the patron saint of the capital city of Costa Rica San José. He is also the husband of the Virgin Mary and as such the protector of Mary and her child. He is regarded as the protector the church (the spiritual home of Christians) and of the worldly home. On Día de San José, Costa Ricans visit the area of Poas Volcano to attend special Masses and religious ceremonies. Traditionally stuffed artichokes, pasta, and fish are served on this occasion with breads, cookies, pastries, cakes, and other baked goods. Fava beans and breads are exchanged as gifts—fava, because these beans saved the drought-hit Sicilians from starvation, and Joseph's bread, to ensure plenty. In San José there are cattle shows, bullfights, rodeos, and horse races held on this day.

❁ MAUNDY THURSDAY

Observed by: Christians
Observed on: Thursday before Easter

Maundy Thursday is a Christian festival marking Jesus' Last Supper with his Disciples. On this day the streets in downtown San José remain quiet on Maundy, or Holy Thursday. Banks, public offices, and stores are closed. People prefer to walk or ride horseback rather than use vehicles. Special Masses are held in remembrance of the Last Supper. The cuisine is specific: dulce de chiverre (sweet preserves), arroz con leche (sweet rice), eggnog, quesadillas, rosquillas (round sweet breads with a hole in the middle), and polvorones (shortbread cookies), as well as various seafoods.

❁ GOOD FRIDAY

Observed by: Christians
Observed on: Friday before Easter

Good Friday marks the day that Jesus was crucified and is a day of contemplation and mourning. It is also known as Holy Friday, Great Friday, Mourning Friday.

In Costa Rica Good Friday Mass includes the darkening of the church—by dimming the lights or blowing out candles—as a symbol of the darkness of the event. In Costa Rica many businesses choose to close for the entire week, while Good Friday itself is a holiday for all. The extended weekend allows Costa Ricans to go to the beach or the mountains.

❁ EASTER

Observed by: Christians
Observed on: First Sunday after Lent

On Easter Christians believe that Jesus rose from the grave on the third day after his Crucifixion, as he had promised his followers. The term easter is derived from the name of Eostre, a Teutonic goddess of light. Easter is sometimes called Eostre or Pascha. The word pascha is of Greek origin but does not refer to suffering. The reference is to the Hebrew festival of Passover (Pesach), when the angel of death “passed over” the homes of the Jews exiled in Egypt.

Easter Sunday in Costa Rica is a balance of piety and parties. The more religious Costa Ricans stay at home or participate in religious celebrations that include Masses and processions. Others choose to spend their time on the beach.

❁ CORPUS CHRISTI

Observed by: Roman Catholics
Observed on: Thursday after Trinity Sunday

Corpus Christi is celebrated to commemorate the institution of the Eucharist. The Feast of Corpus Christi was established as an official church holiday in 1261 by Pope Urban IV (r. 1261–64). In Costa Rica the Feast of Corpus Christi begins with early morning Mass followed by a religious procession with the statues of Jesus and Mary as the centerpieces. Corpus Christi is most strongly observed in Pacayas and Cartago.

❁ ST. PETER'S AND ST. PAUL'S DAY

Observed by: Roman Catholics
Observed on: June 29

St. Peter and St. Paul are considered the greatest of the Christian missionaries and are credited with shaping the Catholic Church. St. Peter is the patron saint of fishermen, and St. Paul is the patron of musicians; so both saints are revered in this country, where fishing and music are both important aspects of everyday life.

In Costa Rica the holiday is known as Día de San Pedro y San Pablo or Feast of St. Peter and St. Paul. The day is celebrated with a Morning Mass and the blessing of boats and nets, followed by coffee and refreshments and games for children.

❁ VIRGIN OF LOS ANGELES

Observed by: Roman Catholics

Observed on: August 2

The Virgin of Los Angeles, also known as the Virgin la Negrita, is the patron saint of Costa Rica. Her legend can be traced back to Cartago in 1635. A mestizo (mixed descent) woman came upon a stone statue of the Virgin and child standing on a large stone. She took the image home and placed it in a basket. The next day, again while collecting firewood, she chanced upon a stone snake on the same large stone. She took this image home as well but found the first one missing. The next day the Virgin and child image was once again standing on that stone, and when she reached home with it, the snake image was missing. The latter reappeared on that stone the next day. This state of affairs continued, and the frightened young woman finally consulted a priest. He took the images with him, and the same events recurred. They understood that the Virgin wanted a church to be built at that spot and the church was built, the first in the country. In 1824, the Virgin la Negrita was declared the patron saint of Costa Rica. This holiday is also known as Día de la Virgen de Los Angeles, Feast of the Patroness of Costa Rica.

This day marks the most important pilgrimage in the country. Pilgrims walk from San José to Cartago and, once there, they cover the last leg of the pilgrimage on their knees.

❁ CHRISTMAS

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: December 24–25

Christmas, or Mass of Christ, celebrates the birth of Jesus, whom Christians believe to be a savior. The word “christmas” is derived from the Old English cristes maesse.

In Costa Rica this is a time for celebrations and parties, sharing and reflecting. Posada processions, symbolizing Joseph and Mary’s search for accommodations, proceed through the streets beginning nine days before Christmas. The Christmas season continues through the rest of December and into January with fiestas, parades, rodeos, choral and dance festivals, street fairs, and bull runs.

Children decorate cypress trees with colored strips, balls, and a gold star symbolizing the star of Bethlehem. Another popular feature is the Portal—a Nativity scene constructed of mosses and grass, colored sawdust, cypress twigs, black paper, and figurines representing Jesus in the manger. Most homes throughout the country, as well as commercial and public buildings, are decorated with multi-colored lights. For employees the Christmas season includes the aguinaldo (Christmas bonus).

The Christmas Choir Festival takes place during the first week of December in San Jose and involves both choral singing and worship. Church choirs, community choruses, and professional ensembles perform favorite carols, old and new, around the country and at the National Theater in San Jose.

New clothes, a candlelight service in church, and the Misa de Gallo (Midnight Mass) mark Christmas Eve in Costa Rica. A traditional supper of chicken and pork tamales follows, accompanied by eggnog and rum punch.

❁ SAN ISIDRO LABRADOR’S DAY

Observed in: San Isidro

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: May 15

Saint Isidro Labrador (1562–1635) is the patron saint of farmers and animals. Born near Madrid, Spain, into a poor family, Isidro was always God-fearing and kind, and drawn to the recitation of the scriptures. He worked the fields as a day laborer but never left for work without listening to the Santa Misa. He was invariably late for work, and the other laborers complained to their master. The employer saw that Isidro was indeed late but that the oxen were working anyway as if the laborer were there to guide them. Pope Gregory XV (r. 1621–23) canonized him in 1622. Costa Ricans in San Isidro honor the saint on Labrador’s Day. A priest blesses crops and animals, and events include cattle shows, bullfights, and oxcart parades, along with flower exhibits and fairs. Other names for this holiday are Día de San Isidro Labrador, Festival of St. Isador the Farmer

❁ CARRERA DE SAN JUAN

Observed in: San Juan

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: May 17

Carrera de San Juan (also called San Juan Day or San Juan Marathon) is held in honor of St. John of the Cross (1542–91). He and the mystic St. Teresa (1515–82) were the founders of the Discalced Carmelites. St. John was born John of Yepé. He led a rigorous life, wrote beautiful poetry, and was recognized only after his death. His relics are considered miraculous: His dead body, still uncorrupted, bears images of the Virgin, of different saints, and of Jesus on the cross, depending on the beliefs of the viewer.

The most prestigious race in Costa Rica is held on this day, and participants have to run a distance of almost 14 miles of very difficult terrain from El Alto de Ochomongo (near Cartago) to San Juan de Tibás. There are also other events associated with this festival, such as parades, dances, and cultural programs.

Rites of Passage

❁ MARRIAGE

Marriages in Costa Rica are based primarily on Roman Catholic traditions, interspersed with a few indigenous customs. Costa Ricans are conservative in family matters, and most Costa Ricans still live in their parents' home until marriage. Engagement parties and weddings are attended by immediate and extended family as well as large numbers of neighbors, friends, and their families. The bride wears an elegant white gown, and the groom is formally attired in black. The marriage vows are followed by the exchange of rings.

The traditional painted oxcarts of Costa Rica have a role to play in the wedding ceremony. The following custom originated among farming and other communities that made use of the cart. A single rosary, representing the "soft yoke of love," is placed around the necks of the couple. Symbolically just as two oxen must pull together for the cart to move, the couple must work together if their marriage is to succeed. The cart will not move if the oxen pull in different directions or at different rates.

The contractual nature of a marriage and the material goods a couple will share are symbolized by the groom giving some coins to his bride with the words, "These coins represent the material wealth we shall own and share." The bride takes the coins with the response, "I receive these coins and will care for our physical well-being." This establishes the understanding that the husband is the principal provider for the family, and the wife is the caretaker.

❁ DEATH

Catholic customs are observed at death. Funerals are usually held at funeral parlors. A Mass is held at church, after which everybody proceeds to the cemetery. The burial is a somber occasion, and dark dresses and ties are usual, although not mandatory. Calla lilies are typical funeral flowers. A Mass is held every day for nine days after death, as well as one month later. People offer condolences in person (at the church itself, if need be), by telegram, by card, or by telephone.

Introduction

❧ HISTORY

The dominant ethnic tribes of present-day Côte d'Ivoire began arriving in the region at the beginning of the 17th century C.E. The Kru tribe migrated to Côte d'Ivoire from Liberia in 1600; around the same time the Lubi and the Senoufo arrived from Burkina Faso and Mali and established settlements. The Akan people, including the Malinke from Guinea and the Baoulé from Ghana, did not begin migrating to Côte d'Ivoire until the 18th century.

Portuguese explorers reached the coast in the 15th century and began trading in slaves and ivory, but European penetration into the interior was delayed until the 1830s. The first French contact in the region was in 1637, when French missionaries landed at Assinie along the Gold Coast (modern-day Ghana) and began spreading Christianity. They made contact with tribes in Côte d'Ivoire but had little success among the local tribes, which did not welcome foreigners.

In the mid-19th century the fighting among tribes over territorial issues gave the French an opportunity to establish their presence in the region. During the period 1843–44 French Admiral Bouet-Williaumez signed a number of treaties with the kings of Assinie and Grand Bassam (a city in Côte d'Ivoire). He offered them French protection against their rivals and declared these regions a French protectorate. More French missionaries, explorers, and traders began arriving in Côte d'Ivoire, and soon the entire region was completely dominated by the French.

On March 10, 1893, Côte d'Ivoire was declared a French colony, and Captain Louis Gustave Binger (1856–1936), the French explorer who explored the Gold Coast region extensively, was appointed the first French governor of Côte d'Ivoire. Binger led the fight against the Malinke chief Samori Ture (c. 1830–1900), who strongly opposed French rule in the region. In 1898 French forces captured Samori Ture and largely quelled the Malinke rebellion, although the Baoulé tribe continued guerilla warfare against French forces until 1917.

Between 1904 and 1958 the French colony of Côte d'Ivoire was an important part of the Federation of French West Africa along with Niger, Senegal, Guinea, Upper Volta (Burkina Faso), Mauritania, Dahomey (Benin), and French Sudan (Mali). During this period the local inhabitants were forced to work on plantations for long hours under abusive conditions. Production of coffee, cocoa, and palm oil crops steadily increased until the region became a major exporter of coffee, cocoa, and bananas in West Africa.

The brutal treatment meted out by French forces caused discontent among the inhabitants and sowed the seeds of the independence movement.

In 1944 Félix Houphouët-Boigny (1905–93), the son of a wealthy Baoulé chief and a cocoa farmer, formed the first agricultural union of African cocoa farmers in Côte d'Ivoire. Known as the Syndicat Agricole Africain, it championed the cause of local farmers and the people of Côte d'Ivoire. After World War II Baoulé was elected as a representative of Côte d'Ivoire in the French National Assembly, and during his tenure (1946–59) he played a significant role in abolishing forced labor in Côte d'Ivoire by bringing the woes of its people to the notice of the French leaders. Houphouët-Boigny also served as the first African minister in the French government for a term of three years.

In December 1958 Côte d'Ivoire was granted autonomous status within the French Overseas Community, and in April 1959 Félix Houphouët-Boigny was sworn in as the prime minister of Côte d'Ivoire. On August 7, 1960, Côte d'Ivoire obtained complete independence from French rule, and Houphouët-Boigny was sworn in as the first president of the independent nation. Abidjan, a commercial center, was named the political capital of Côte d'Ivoire. During his tenure as president Houphouët-Boigny introduced pro-agricultural policies, and the country's economy thrived. Coffee production increased, and Côte d'Ivoire became the third major producer of coffee after Brazil and Colombia. By 1979 Côte d'Ivoire had assumed the rank of the world's leading coffee producer, as well as the leading African exporter of palm oil and pineapples. Côte d'Ivoire's success in agriculture earned it the title the "Ivoirian Miracle."

Houphouët-Boigny, however, was an authoritarian leader, and there was no freedom of the press in Côte d'Ivoire under him. He declared Côte d'Ivoire a one-party state, and his party, the Parti Democratique de la Côte d'Ivoire (PDCI), controlled the government. He spent millions of dollars in the development of his village Yamoussoukro and made it the new capital of Côte d'Ivoire.

The economy of Côte d'Ivoire suffered immensely after the country was hit by a series of droughts in the early 1980s. In addition crime and corruption in Côte d'Ivoire increased steadily, adding to the woes of the president. Meanwhile in order to deal with recession, Houphouët-Boigny took loans from the international monetary organizations. Yet the country's economy did not improve, and Côte d'Ivoire's international debts mounted.

Despite growing discontent among the citizens Houphouët-Boigny remained president until his death on December 7, 1993.

His successor was Henri Konan Bédié (b. 1934),

Houphouët-Boigny's loyal deputy. Under his rule all opposition party leaders were sent to jail, and all the military officers who did not agree with his policies were dismissed. On December 24, 1999, Bédié was ousted in a coup led by Robert Guéï (1941–2002), a former military commander, who had been dismissed by Bédié. This was the first coup d'état in Côte d'Ivoire.

As president Guéï promised the people that democracy would be restored in the region by 2000. He ran in the 2000 elections against the presidential nominee of the Front Populaire Ivoirien (FPI; Ivoirian Popular Front), Laurent Gbagbo (b. 1945). However when Gbagbo was declared victorious, Guéï refused to step down as president, and many people were killed, including citizens of other countries, in the riots that erupted all over the city. The worst single act of mob violence occurred on October 26, 2000, in Blokosso Village and resulted in the deaths of at least six men, including one Guinean.

Another presidential candidate and a Muslim opposition leader was Alassane Outtara (b. 1942). He had been disqualified from the presidential elections by the Supreme Court of Côte d'Ivoire because of his Burkinabé nationality. (Only one of his parents is a citizen of Côte d'Ivoire.) Muslims in the northern parts of the country violently protested this decision, and riots broke out.

On September 19, 2002, troops in the northern parts of the country rebelled against Gbagbo's government and gained control of a major part of the country. Hundreds of innocent people lost their lives in the fight between government forces and the militias, which included mercenaries and warlords from neighboring Liberia and Sierra Leone. The international community took notice of the situation, and France sent peacekeeping forces into the region. In January 2003 a peace agreement was signed between rebel leader Guillaume Solo and the president of Côte d'Ivoire Laurent Gbagbo. It stipulated that a united government would be formed in Côte d'Ivoire with equal representation for the rebels. But the rebels did not keep their promise to disarm their forces until October 15, 2004.

Côte d'Ivoire has remained divided between the rebel forces and the government, and the region has continued in a state of quasi war. On November 6, 2004, nine soldiers of the French peacekeeping forces and an aid worker were killed in an air strike by Côte d'Ivoire. In retaliation French forces launched an air strike at Yamoussoukro and Houphouët-Boigny is said to have been Africa's number one producer of "show" projects. He spent so many millions of dollars to transform his village Yamoussoukro into the new capital that it became the butt of jokes.

Fun Fact

To indicate its seriousness about being addressed as Côte d'Ivoire, the government passed a national law that forbids the country's name to be translated.

Deforestation

Côte d'Ivoire is cutting down rain forests faster than any other country on Earth. The only forest that remains untouched is the Tai National Park, which is home to more than 250 endemic species of trees and such endangered animals as the pygmy hippopotamus.

destroyed all the airplanes belonging to the Ivoirian Air Force. French nationals in the cities of Abidjan and Yamoussoukro were evacuated by French forces after fighting broke out between the French peacekeeping forces and local Ivoirians. Widespread protests against French forces continue in Côte d'Ivoire, and the government of Laurent Gbagbo remained on the sidelines, its hands full dealing with the economic slump, rebels, and regional violence.

Although named Côte d'Ivoire by the French, the nation has also been known, in other languages, as Ivory Coast (English), Elfenbeinküste (German), and Costa de Marfil (Spanish). In October 1985 the government appealed to the international community to address the nation uniformly as Côte d'Ivoire.

🌸 GEOGRAPHY AND CLIMATE

Located in Western Africa Côte d'Ivoire is flanked by Guinea and Liberia to the west, Ghana to the east, Burkina Faso and Mali to the north, and the Gulf of Guinea (North Atlantic Ocean) to the south. Topographically Côte d'Ivoire is flat, except for the Man region in the western part of the country, which is marked by a number of small hills. The Ébrié Lagoon begins at the Ghanaian border and covers the eastern coast. This is the most densely populated area of the country.

The Sassandra, Bandama, and Komoé are the main rivers in Côte d'Ivoire. Mont Nimba, which rises 5,750 feet, is the highest mountain in the country.

The northern parts of the country experience semi-arid weather conditions, while the southeastern parts enjoy an equatorial climate, and the central parts have a tropical climate. The three main seasons of Côte d'Ivoire are: warm and dry (November to March), hot and dry (March to May), and hot and

Man region

The Man region, located in the west-central part of Côte d'Ivoire, offers a panorama of sprawling green hills. A beautiful waterfall La Cascade runs into a bamboo forest westward of Man town. One can also find the second highest peak in Côte d'Ivoire Mont Tonkoui, at a distance of 9.3 miles north of La Cascade. The region is famous for its unique village masks and the performance of the Yacouba stilt dancers during the Festival of Masks.

wet (June to October). The annual average temperature is 79°F. However humidity drops progressively from the coast toward the north. Thus while the south experiences an average relative humidity of 85 percent, humidity in the north is only 71 percent.

🌸 ECONOMY

More than 70 percent of the country's population is engaged in agriculture, which is the main source of revenue and the backbone of the nation's economy. The country's principal exports are cocoa, coffee, pineapples, tuna, and tropical woods (timber). Côte d'Ivoire continues to be one of the world's largest producers and exporters of coffee, cocoa beans, and palm oil, despite the devastating droughts in the 1980s. Such exports have enabled the government to repay a considerable portion of Côte d'Ivoire's foreign debt.

Côte d'Ivoire has an excellent infrastructure, with road networks, rail connections, and telecommunication services. This facilitates its connection with neighboring countries, making Côte d'Ivoire the preferred choice of other West African countries for establishing trading posts for their operations. The government's policy of encouraging direct foreign investment has also played a major role in reviving the economy of Côte d'Ivoire.

The ongoing dispute between the rebels and the government has had little impact on the economy. Both sides acknowledge the benefits of a strong economy, and neither side wants to jeopardize the country's economic health. Although the rebels have captured cocoa plantations in many parts of the country, production remains undisturbed.

🌸 CULTURE AND LIFESTYLE

In Côte d'Ivoire people belonging to different faiths for the most part coexist peacefully. The government of Côte d'Ivoire also contributes regularly to the development of places of worship for different religions. Between 25 and 30 percent of the country's population are Christians, while 35 to 40 percent practice Islam. Approximately 25 to 40 percent of the population adhere to traditional animist beliefs.

Ivoirians believe in the power of magic and credit it with warding off evil, making juju priests (medicine men) highly sought-after. They give gris-gris necklaces (special charm necklaces that keep the evil spirits at bay) and are also fortune-tellers who are often consulted about impending dangers.

Among all the ethnic groups in Côte d'Ivoire the Senoufo hold on most strongly to their traditional beliefs. Children are taught about the tribal history and their way of life from a very young age, and they are expected to uphold the values and beliefs of the Senoufo.

French is the official language of Côte d'Ivoire, but most tribes prefer to speak their native language. Dioula is the most widely spoken native dialect.

Traditional village entertainers, known as griots or praise-singers, make use of musical instruments made from animal skins, gourds, and horns. They sing folk songs, which tell about the glorious past of different tribes and their leaders, as well as comment on the present situation in Côte d'Ivoire. The country is well known for its artistic creations as well, especially masks. The peoples of Côte d'Ivoire produce a wider variety of masks than those of any other African nation, and every ethnic group has its own sets of masks. Masks represent the souls of deceased people, lesser deities, or caricatures of animals.

One of the most famous festivals in Côte d'Ivoire is the Festival of Masks (Fêtes des Masques), which takes place in the Man region during the month of November. Villages in the region hold special dance contests in which participants have to wear the masks of their tribes and give dance performances. The purpose of the festival is to pay homage to the forest spirits who are said to be embodied in the special masks as well as to determine and honor the best dancer in the village.

The three groups known for their outstanding wooden carvings are the Baoulé (an Akan group that migrated from Ghana into the eastern area of the country), the Dan or Yacouba (a tribe from the rain forests), and the Senoufo (people who migrated from the north in the 17th century).

❁ CUISINE

The influence of neighboring countries on Côte d'Ivoire's cuisine is evident in the reliance on grains and tubers in the traditional diet. A favorite Côte d'Ivoirian side dish is attiéké, a couscous made from manioc (cassava), which is generally served with fish or kedjenou, a chicken dish cooked with vegetables and sauce. One of the most popular dishes, often available at small, open-air restaurants on the beaches, is maquis, braised chicken and fish smothered in onions and tomatoes. Aloco, another popular dish, consists of ripe bananas cooked in palm oil and spiced with chilies and steamed onions. Aloco can be eaten by itself or with grilled fish.

The local palm wine called Bangui is a popular beverage in Côte d'Ivoire.

Masks

Baoulé facial masks depict individuals with characteristic marks on their faces or unique hairstyles. They look very real and are traditionally used in memorial celebrations. The masks of the Senoufo people are extremely stylized and are used to show respect for village life. Depictions of an antelope, warthog, and hyena combine to make the very popular "fire-spitter" helmet mask (also called wohdec). The warthog mask is used to drive away evil spirits.

The Senoufo people trace their origin to the hornbill, which represents fertility in their mythology. The fact that hornbills mate for life and share the raising of their young makes hornbills highly regarded among the Senoufo people. The figure of a long hooked beak touching a potbelly signifies the continuity of life to future generations and is worn on the head in celebrations and dances. The harvest is typically celebrated with village masquerades.

Fun Fact

A mask is believed to have a soul or a living force, and a person changes into the entity represented by the mask after wearing it. Therefore only certain powerful individuals or families are allowed to own a mask, and it is considered dangerous for most other people to wear it.

Côte d'Ivoire achieved independence from France, and Félix Houphouët-Boigny was sworn in as the first president of independent Côte d'Ivoire.

On this day the president of the nation presides over Independence Day celebrations in the capital city of Yamoussoukro. After the customary raising of the national flag the president addresses the nation and reports on the progress made in the past year. A host of activities, such as youth concerts and soccer matches, are also held as part of the celebrations.

☼ DAY OF PEACE

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: November 15

The Day of Peace marks the adoption of a resolution by the UN Security Council on November 15, 2004, prohibiting the use of armaments in Côte d'Ivoire. This step was taken in order to restore peace in the war-ravaged country. Since September 2002 the war between rebels in the north and the government of Côte d'Ivoire has caused widespread destruction throughout the country, and hundreds of innocent people have lost their lives as a result of this ongoing conflict. Eventually, UN Peacekeeping Forces led by France entered Côte d'Ivoire to restore peace and order. International leaders acted as mediators between the government and the rebels, and a peace agreement was signed in January 2003, resulting in an 18-month ceasefire. However in early November, when the Ivoirian troops broke the ceasefire by attacking the rebels, the Security Council imposed a year-long sanction on the country, banning the use of weapons. Since it is a national holiday, all public and private institutions are closed.

After independence he became the country's first president, and during his rule agricultural production in the country reached new heights. Houphouët-Boigny was commonly known in the West as the "Sage of Africa" or the "Grand Old Man of Africa." In 1989 UNESCO created the Félix Houphouët-Boigny Peace Prize for "safeguarding, maintaining, and seeking peace." On this day Ivoirians pay tribute to their first president, remembering his life and legacy.

Religious Holidays

☼ EID AL-ADHA

Observed by: Muslims

Observed on: Tenth of Dhu al-Hijjah, the 12th month of the Islamic calendar

The Muslim holiday of Eid al-Adha commemorates the unwavering faith of Ibrahim (Abraham) in Allah and his willingness to sacrifice his son at God's command. Muslims believe that God visited Ibrahim in a dream and instructed him to sacrifice his own son, Ishmael. When learning of the dream, Ishmael asked his father to follow God's command. Ultimately God relented and substituted a ram for the sacrifice.

Ivoirian Muslims commemorate this event by sacrificing a goat, sheep, or camel, an act signifying their willingness to follow God's commands and to give up things important to them. A third of the meat of the sacrificial animal is given to the poor, another third goes to neighbors and relatives, and the final third is consumed by the family.

This is also the month that the holy pilgrimage or hajj is undertaken. In this month all able-bodied Muslims are directed by the Koran to undertake this journey at least once in their lifetimes.

Bouak, the second largest city in Côte d'Ivoire, is famous for its big and colorful Carnival, which takes place in March. People from all walks of life take part in the music, dancing, parades, and feasting. The Carnival, like others around the world, precedes Lent; it is a time of indulgence before the period of Lenten austerity begins in preparation for Easter. The origin of the Carnival can be traced back to the need to finish all meat and dairy products such as eggs and butter before the onset of the fasting season of Lent.

FÊTE DU DIPRI

Observed in: Gomon
Observed by: General Public
Observed on: April

The Fête du Dipri is celebrated in the village of Gomon, which lies 62 miles northeast of Abidjan. It is an annual festival held during the month of April. At midnight women and children of Gomon walk out naked from their huts and perform religious rites to ward off evil, nullify evil spells, and purify the village and its inhabitants. The rites are carried out exclusively in the darkness of the night. They are shrouded in mystery, and the residents of Gomon are forbidden to discuss these sacred rites with outsiders.

At the end of the ceremonies the village chief comes out of his hut to the sound of drumbeats and announces their completion. Before sunrise all the villagers return to their huts, believing now that the village will be protected from all kinds of evil for at least another year.

Rites of Passage

BIRTH

The birth of a child is a time for joy and religious celebrations in Côte d'Ivoire. When a woman becomes pregnant children in her family and the village are expected to respect her and treat her well. This special treatment is meant to ensure that during her pregnancy she is not disappointed or frightened by any person or situation. Neighbors cook special meals for her, because good food is considered important to the health of the mother and child. Ivoirians also believe that if she is not fed properly the pregnant woman will either have a miscarriage or her child will be born with scars all over its body.

Tradition in Côte d'Ivoire requires that the women return to her mother's house in the seventh month of pregnancy. After resting for a minimum of one month after giving birth to her child, she returns to her husband's house.

❁ COMING OF AGE

The oldest ethnic group in Côte d'Ivoire is the Senoufo group, which supports secret societies responsible for preparing children for adulthood, educating them about their tribe's folklore, history, culture, and way of life. The Poro cult is for the boys, and the Sakrobundi cult is for the girls. The education period lasts for seven years and ends with an initiation ceremony, which includes circumcision for the boys. Initiates perform a ritual dance known as the Dance of the Leopard Men, which completes the transition from childhood to adulthood.

In spite of the fact that Côte d'Ivoire has banned female genital mutilation, it is still widely practiced, and it is estimated that 60 percent of the women in the country, including Muslims, have had their clitorises excised. Girls in the 4- to 15-year age group have their clitorises removed in the belief that doing so builds character and helps them become better women and wives.

Among the Dan tribe circumcision takes place during the rice-harvesting season. Girls who have been excised are considered the pride of their families and are showered with gifts and new dresses.

The mask used in the rites of passage for teenagers is that of Djoanigbe, who is looked upon as a guide, teacher, and source of enlightenment in the lives of the young people. There are two ways by which a person can learn to use the mask: through birth into a mask family or through nomination to be a mask-wearer. If the ancestors have chosen a child to become a mask-wearer, then the parents of the child are expected to recognize this and provide

Djoanigbe

Meman Djianfa is believed to have been the founding king of the state of Djoa, which is made up of 18 villages. Their mask traditions originate from their concept of yu, the spiritual force present in all things. Djianfa's followers believe that he had special powers through which he communicated with animals. These animals saved the people from dangerous situations and protected their land. The night before Djianfa's death his spirit appeared to his people asking them to cut off his head after his death the next day and bury the rest of him. The blood that flowed from him is believed to have given birth to the river Yanflo (the river of success), his tomb became the mountain Kromanro, and his head became the mask of Djoanigbe.

Fun Fact

Although it was always owned and worn by a man, Kpelie represents the concept of feminine beauty and fertility. In addition to its use in funerals the Kpelie mask is used at initiation in the societies for boys, adolescents, and adults, and at harvest festivals to thank the ancestors for a good crop.

guidance to their child to follow the command. Only initiated men are allowed to wear the masks and can only pass the secret on to another initiated man—never to a woman. The initiation ritual lasts for seven days.

❁ MARRIAGE

After the completion of the initiation ceremony, a girl is considered ready for marriage. Arranged marriages are the norm in this country, and relatives play a central role in suggesting good matches. The prospective groom's family arrives at the bride's house with the marriage proposal. If the bride and her family accept the proposal, then kola nuts (an indigenous nut found in Africa, also used in making cola drinks) are presented to the bride's family, after finalizing the bride-price.

Different tribes have different marriage ceremonies; however, payment of bride-price is a common factor in all marriages. In some tribes on the day of the wedding, the groom and his family, dressed in their best clothes, arrive at the bride's home with clothes, shoes, and other gifts, which are neatly wrapped. Then they make the payment of the bride-price. Kola nuts and sweets are exchanged between the two families, and the celebrations begin. In the meantime the bride, wearing a beautiful wedding dress and a veil covering her face, is surrounded by her friends and female relatives in her room.

In the evening as the time of the wedding ceremony nears, the bride is escorted to the wedding area by an elderly woman. Here the bride sits barefoot on a stool, and the elderly woman wipes her face with a cloth dipped in gourd juice. Then using a sponge and straw, the woman scrubs the arms and legs of the bride. In the background women sing wedding songs accompanied by clapping and dancing.

After the elderly woman cleans the bride she helps her get off the stool, and the wedding is complete. The bride is then escorted back to her room by women, and a few minutes later the groom enters the room and takes her to his house.

❁ DEATH

In Ivoirian cultures funeral rites are based on the notion that those who die and are buried make the Earth fertile with their souls. Hence the soil belongs to the ancestors. The tribes in Côte d'Ivoire bury their dead in accordance with their tribal rituals. Among the Senoufo tribe the presiding priest of the funeral ceremony wears a Kpelie mask and leads the funeral procession, escorting the spirit of the deceased to the land of the dead.

The tribes in Côte d'Ivoire believe that after death the deceased takes the form of a spirit and along with other ancestral spirits becomes the guide and protector of its people. Hence special sacrificial offerings are made to these spirits on special occasions, such as death anniversaries and festivals, to show respect as well as to seek their blessings and protection against evil.

Introduction

❁ HISTORY

During the sixth century C.E. the Croats migrated from Ukraine and settled in the area now known as Croatia. The Croats established their own settlements and ruled themselves. In the 11th century Croatia entered into a union with Hungary and agreed to accept its authority. Despite being responsible to the Hungarian monarch, Croatia retained the freedom to choose its own leaders. In the 14th and 15th centuries Croatia was the pawn in wars between Venice and Turkey; during this time the greater part of Croatia came under Turkish rule. In the 16th century Croatia approached the Habsburgs of Austria for protection. By the end of the 17th century Croatia was freed from Turkish rule but remained under Austrian influence until 1918.

After the defeat of the Austro-Hungarian Empire in World War I Croatia became a part of the nation of Serbs, Croats, and Slovenes that was named Yugoslavia in 1929. Belgrade was declared the capital of this new union. In 1941 Germany invaded Yugoslavia and installed a Fascist puppet government called the Ustase. The new government attempted to eradicate all Serbs from Croatia, and over one million Serbs, Jews, Muslims, and Romas were brutally murdered.

A fierce war followed between the antifascist forces led by the Communist Party and the Ustase. Nearly a million people lost their lives. After World War II Yugoslavia, ruled by the Communists, was named the Federal Socialist Republic of Yugoslavia.

In the late 1980s Croatia began seeking freedom from the Yugoslavian confederation and an end to Communist rule. In June 1991 it declared its independence. Almost immediately the Serbs within Croatia rebelled and fighting broke out. The Yugoslav People's Army intervened in support of the Serbs. Heavy fighting continued for six months and led to massive destruction and loss of life. To end the violence the United Nations (UN) deployed a protection force in Serbian-held Croatia in December 1991. After a series of cease-fires the Serbs were forced to leave Croatia. In December 1995 Croatia signed the Dayton Peace Agreement, which provided for a permanent cease-fire.

In 1992 the Republic of Croatia became a member of the United Nations. Croatia applied for membership to the European Union (EU) in 2003 and was accepted as an official candidate country in 2004.

GEOGRAPHY AND CLIMATE

Croatia is shaped like a horseshoe. It has common borders with Slovenia, Hungary, Serbia and Montenegro (both Serbian and Montenegrin parts), Bosnia and Herzegovina, and Italy. Croatia includes approximately 1,185 islands and a 3,626-mile-long coastline along the Adriatic Sea. Because of the country's unusual shape it experiences two types of climate on the mainland. The coastal areas have a climate that is largely Mediterranean, with warm and sunny summers and mild winters. The northern and eastern territories of the country experience a more continental type of weather. This climate is distinguished by hot summers and very cold winters. These areas also get snowfall in winter.

Fun Fact

Croatians call their country Hrvatska.

The Croatian terrain is diverse and consists of flat plains, mountains, highlands, lakes, and islands. Dinara (nearly 6,000 feet high) in the Dinaric Alps is the highest point. The Sava, the Drava, and the Danube are the main rivers flowing through the country. There are oak forests in the mountains of Lika and Gorski Kotar. Croatia boasts well-preserved national parks where spotted lynx, deer, bears, wolves, reptiles, and birds abound.

ECONOMY

When Croatia was a part of the former Yugoslavia its economy was among the most prosperous in the region. With the dismantling of Yugoslavia, war, and the struggle for independence, Croatia was thrown into economic crisis. Following peace and a series of economic reforms the economy has stabilized. The Croatian economy is service based, and tourism plays a significant role in contributing to the gross domestic product (GDP).

Did You Know?

Croatia is the birthplace of the fountain pen. Cravats (neckties) originated in Croatia. The Dalmatian dog originally belongs to the region of Dalmatia, Croatia. Marco Polo, the world-famous traveler, was born in Korcula, Croatia

The country also has some industries such as chemicals, fertilizers, steel, textile, and cement. It maintains good trade relations with its neighbors, including Germany, Italy, and Slovenia. Croatia imports machinery, fuels, and electrical equipments, while exporting textiles, foodstuff, and chemicals.

LIFESTYLE AND CULTURE

A long history has given rise to a diverse and rich culture with strong artistic and literary traditions. The Croatian sculptor Ivan Meštrović (1883–1962) is well known in the international art arena. Notable Croatian writers include Marin Držić (1508–67) and Miroslav Krleža (1893–1981), who wrote Banners, a saga about Croatian life. The country has produced three Nobel Prize winners, among them two scientists and the renowned writer Ivo Andrić (1892–1975).

Croatian music is a lively mixture of cultures and styles. The kolo is a Slavic round dance (a folk dance performed in a circle) accompanied by tunes from Roma-style violins or the tambura, a Croatian mandolin. The music from Croatia's Dalmatian coast has a distinct Italian sound and is accompanied by the guitar and accordion.

Croats enjoy the abundant use of fabrics, laces, and colors in their traditional costumes. An overwhelming majority of Croats are Roman Catholics.

Although religious expression was suppressed during the Communist era Catholics have revived their faith and attend church devotedly. Apart from Greek Orthodox Christians there are a number of Muslims and some Jews in Croatia. The Croats are also avid sports fans. Soccer occupies a special place in Croatia. Basketball and handball are other sports that have a popular following.

CUISINE

Croats normally consume simple, easy-to-prepare dishes. There is a very strong Italian influence in Croatian cuisine. Croats largely use seafood, meat, and cheese to make dishes, such as cevapcici (sausages), raznjici (grilled meat), sarma (rice and meat rolled in cabbage leaves), and djuvec (stew). Bread and salads accompany most meals.

Almost every region of Croatia has its own wine that is unique to that area. Croatian pivo (beer), spricer (wine with mineral water), slivovica (plum brandy), and Turkish coffee are popular beverages in the country.

The Glagolitic Alphabet

The Glagolitic alphabet, or Glagolitsa, is the oldest known Slavonic alphabet. It was created by St. Cyril around 862–63 for translating the Bible and other texts into Old Church Slavonic (OCS). The name comes from OCS glagolu, meaning "word" (which was also the name for the letter g). Glagolati also means "to speak," so the Glagolitsa letters are poetically referred to as "the marks that speak."

Fun Fact

Croatians have their own script, the Glagolitic alphabet, which is more than a thousand years old. The Croats were the only European nation to be given special permission by Pope Innocent IV (r. 1243–54) in 1248 to use their own language and the Glagolitic script in their liturgy.

the former Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (SFRY) on this day in 1991. The parliament met in a secret location because of fears of attacks by the Yugoslav army and Serbian rebels. Independence had been declared on June 25, but the implementation was delayed in a three-month moratorium requested by the European Community (EC). The moratorium expired on October 7, and the next day independence became a reality.

❁ PALM SUNDAY

Observed on: Last Sunday before Easter

The Christian holiday of Palm Sunday, which falls on the Sunday before Easter, commemorates Jesus' return to Jerusalem a few days prior to his execution. In those days it was customary to cover the path of highly honored persons as a mark of respect. According to the Bible Jesus was greeted by admirers who laid palm fronds in his path as he entered Jerusalem. Thus the day came to be known as Palm Sunday. It also marks the beginning of Holy Week. In Croatia Palm Sunday is marked by a solemn procession of devout Catholics holding palm branches in their hands. The procession is followed by a special Palm Sunday Mass.

❁ MAUNDY THURSDAY

Observed on: Last Thursday before Easter

The Christian holiday of Holy Thursday, also known as Maundy Thursday, commemorates the day on which Jesus washed the feet of all his apostles before sharing a meal known as the Last Supper. It falls on the Thursday before Easter. It is also called Maundy Thursday because maundatum (a Latin word meaning "commandment") is the first word that was spoken by Jesus before he began washing the feet of his disciples. It was reported that he said, "Mandatum novum do vobis," which means, "A new commandment I give to you."

In Croatia all churches conduct special prayer services. The priests, while celebrating Mass, reenact the scene from the last supper Jesus shared with his disciples. They wash the feet of 12 chosen parishioners just as Jesus is supposed to have done. The faithful pray during this day, and the mood is somber.

The Christian Feast of Corpus Christi commemorates the institution of the Eucharistic Feast in the Mass, a ritual offering of sacred bread and wine, transformed, according to Catholic doctrine, into the body and blood of Jesus. Corpus Christi is celebrated by Catholics all over the world sixty days after Easter on the Thursday following Trinity Sunday, which is the Sunday following Pentecost. The word Eucharist is derived from a Greek word eucharisto, which means “to rejoice or give thanks.” On this day in Croatia the faithful attend church and participate in religious processions in the streets.

✿ CHRISTMAS

Observed by: Roman Catholics, Protestants

Observed on: December 24–25

The Christian festival of Christmas (in Croatian, Božić) celebrates the birth of Jesus. In Croatia Christmas celebrations begin on St. Nicholas’s Day (December 6) when children leave stockings outside their homes hoping to receive gifts for having been good throughout the year. Children are warned that those who have been bad will be kidnapped by the Devil Krampus, a Teutonic woods spirit, an ogre-like trickster who may eat human flesh. He is usually described as living out in the woods with his aged grandmother who combs his hair to put him to sleep at night.

On December 24 Croatian families attend church and offer prayers in a special Mass before Christmas. They return home to have a gala feast, during which they slice a cake specially made for the occasion. As a part of Croatian tradition families place three candles in the center of sprouting wheat. This remains on dinner tables until the Feast of Epiphany.

On Christmas Day the festivities continue with church services and the consumption of special Christmas foods and sweets. Friends and relatives visit each other and exchange gifts, and children open gifts brought by Saint Nicholas. Families gather at lunch or dinner to share a festive meal that often features roast turkey, pork, or other meat dishes. Special Christmas breads containing honey and nuts, known as badnji krub, are made during this season. Croatians stick candles in the center of this bread and use it to decorate their tables. A Christmas manger with figures of Joseph, Mary, and the baby Jesus, along with shepherds and the three Wise Men, are also placed in all churches in Croatia.

✿ BIRTH

Traditionally when a child is born, the mother and child are given a chicken, eggs, wine, and other food items that are considered healthy for the young mother. If the child is a boy he is often named after his paternal grandfather; if it is a girl she is frequently named after her paternal grandmother. Children are also often named after Christian saints. The tradition of godparents is still prevalent in Croatian families. Godparents are the child's spiritual guides. They are responsible for helping the child grow in the Christian faith and often play an important role in all Christian sacraments such as the first Communion and confirmation.

✿ MARRIAGE

Most Croatian weddings are lavish affairs. In Croatia a marriage signifies the coming of age of a couple. The bride cuts her hair and the groom shaves his beard as symbolic rites of passage. The haircut symbolizes the bride's new role in life. This is also meant to serve as a disguise to hide from evil spirits. After the wedding ceremony the bride is handed a handkerchief. This signifies her transition from a maiden to a matron. The wedding reception following the church service is often attended by a large number of guests.

Introduction

🌸 HISTORY

Cuba's original inhabitants were the Siboney—hunter-gatherers and fishermen—who were later joined by the Taino—a farming people related to the Arawak Indians of South America. Christopher Columbus (1451–1506 C.E.) was the first European to find Cuba on October 28, 1492, but it was Sebastián de Ocampo (d. c. 1514) who identified Cuba as an island and mapped it. In 1514 Spaniard Diego Velázquez de Cuéllar (1465–1524) conquered Cuba and established seven settlements there. The presence of Europeans had an adverse effect on the native population—which is true in general of every people unlucky enough to encounter them—who by 1570 had largely succumbed to the diseases the Spanish brought with them and to the ruthlessness of the invaders.

Sugar, tobacco (of Cuban cigar fame), coffee, and bananas (over 30 varieties) were the major crops from the beginning, but sugarcane soon became the most important. Slaves from the African continent were caught and brought in to work the sugarcane fields. The first railway in Latin America was built in 1837 to connect Havana and the plantations. Cuba was a rich territory by any measure. Because few Spanish women cared to live in Cuba during the first two centuries of Spanish occupation, there was much commingling between the European men, indigenous peoples, and people of African descent, and this accounts for the mixed ancestry of most of Cuba's population today.

The push for independence from Spain had a major turning point in 1868 with the Grito de Yara declaration that initiated the First War of Cuban Independence, also known as the Ten-Year War, from 1868–78. In 1895 the Cry of Baire (named for the village near Santiago, where the war was proclaimed) signaled the Second War of Independence.

Two momentous events occurred in 1898: The autonomous Cuban government came into being on January 1, and the American warship USS Maine entered Havana harbor and mysteriously exploded on January 25. The sinking of the Maine resulted in the U.S. declaration of war on Spain and its demand that the Spanish withdraw from Cuba. The Spanish-American War saw the defeat of Spain on December 10; the Spanish flag was lowered and the American flag flew over Cuba for the next three years. Cuba gained sovereignty on May 20, 1902.

A series of incompetent governments and dictators led to a rebellion in 1953. This was the beginning of Fidel Castro's (b. 1926) political career as he sought to oust Fulgencio Batista (1901–73)—the Cuban dictator. The first attack on the Moncada Barracks in 1953 was a failure, but the revolutionaries succeeded in 1959. The charismatic Argentinian Marxist Che Guevara (1928–67) was at Fidel Castro's side. The government assumed complete control over all areas of the economy, but this would-be utopia of equality-and-wealth-for-all concealed a harsh reality: political repression. In spite of brutal government controls, however, the arts flourished.

Fun Fact

Mogotes are loaf-shaped mountains of limestone worn away by seeping water.

GEOGRAPHY AND CLIMATE

Cuba, a group of islands located south of Key West, Florida, is the largest country in the Caribbean. It enjoys a tropical climate and fertile plains, coral reefs and coral islands, natural harbors, and white beaches. The islands that comprise the country of Cuba include the main island (Cuba), the Island of Pines (Isla de Pinos in Spanish), now known as the Isle of Youth (Isla la Juventud); Sabana; Colorados; Jardines de la Reina; Canarreos, and several smaller ones. Mogotes are unique to Cuba. These are steep hills shaped like haystacks that form the Sierra de los Órganos mountain range that reaches a height of over 1,000 feet.

Of Cuba's many rivers only the Cauto and Sagna le Grande are navigable, but the others offer excellent fishing. Cuba is also home to the city of Trinidad, designated a World Monument by UNESCO in 1988.

Cuban Dances

The rumba is a 16th-century dance form that eventually gave rise to a host of others, including danzón, Cuban son, and naningo. Danzón is a slow, precise dance, ideally covering the smallest area possible. Cuban son combines elements of Spanish and African dance that gave rise to salsa. The mambo, another precise dance, comes from the Haitian word for a voodoo priestess, although there is no such dance in Haiti. Perez Prado introduced the mambo to the world in 1943 at the Tropicana club in Havana. The triple-step in mambo evolved into the cha-cha-chá, which became popular in the United States in 1954.

ECONOMY

Under Fidel Castro's Communist administration the government of Cuba owns and runs most of the means of production. Officially about 75 percent of the workforce is employed by the government, though some economists place the figure closer to 90 percent. The only private employment covers about 200,000 farmers and about 100,000 small business owners of a population of 11 million. Cuba benefited from trade with and subsidies from the Soviet Union prior to that country's dissolution. Beginning in the late 20th century Cuba began again to court tourism as a source of income.

CULTURE AND LIFESTYLE

The father of Cuban independence José Martí was a writer of renown. But music is Cuba's greatest contribution to the arts. An amalgam of Spanish, African, and other influences, Cuban music is indeed inspiring—the rumba gave birth to the mambo, which led to the cha-cha-chá, salsa, danzón, son, and others.

In the 1960s political messages and artistic expression found perfect expression in nueva trova, the musical movement based on the troubadour style of the Middle Ages. The rhythms of Cuba are definitely African, but the lyrics and melodies retain a Spanish flavor.

The cultural melting pot saw new additions in the last two centuries. Chinese laborers arrived in Cuba in the 19th century, while Americans, Russians, and more Spaniards joined the mix in the 20th century. The traditional Roman Catholicism of the past gave way to an officially atheist state as Cuba adopted the tenets of orthodox Communism. The pope's visit in 1998 led to a relaxation of the ban on religion, and Christmas is once again celebrated openly. A majority of Cubans are Catholic but continue to practice spiritism and other African beliefs, including Santería. Nowhere is this merging of beliefs better reflected than in the December 17 pilgrimage to a chapel near Havana, which honors both San Lázaro and the African deity Babalu Aye, the orisha who governs epidemics and heals infectious diseases. Many of Babalu Aye's worshippers pray to him to heal them of HIV/AIDS in the 21st century.

Festivities reflect the mixed history and culture of Cuba, and anniversaries of military events coexist with Spanish traditions. People prefer to enjoy holidays like Christmas Eve (Noche Buena) at home with their families, while Carnival is a time for parties and unrestrained revelry. Dancers and musicians take to the streets for the float-parades, cheered by spectators who dance along in bright costumes and papier-maché masks.

❁ CUISINE

The famed cocina criolla (“creole kitchen”) of Cuba is part Spanish and part African, combining the African favorites—roasted meats, beans, and tomatoes—with the Spanish preference for rice, oranges, and lemons. A French planter who arrived from Haiti in the 19th century introduced the rice-and-kidney-bean dish moros y cristianos, also known as congrí. It has been likened to the population mix of Cuba. Ajiaco, a stew much like Colombia’s chicken and potato soup, is another classic Cuban dish.

Labor Day (May Day) is a celebration of the rights of labor unions and workers all over the world. Although the roots are in the pagan spring festivals that celebrated the new season and the fruits of agricultural labor, the May 1 observance of Labor Day has its origins in the international socialist movement. The first May Day/Labor Day occurred in 1890, set internationally by the Second International in 1889 to coincide with an American Federation of Labor general strike in the United States demanding the eight-hour workday. Thereafter international Labor Day became and remained more radical than the U.S. Labor Day celebrated in September.

The May Day parade held at the Revolution Plaza in Havana attracts large numbers of locals and visitors alike. The Cuban government, in line with its Communist ideals, holds Labor Day to be one of the most important government holidays, as a reminder of humanitarian ideals and the right to equal opportunity.

Fun Fact

Every year Cuba’s most important parade pays homage to San Lázaro. For some he is the healer saint, for others, the African divinity Babalu Aye. On foot, on their knees, or rolling along on the ground, thousands of pilgrims live a night of frenzy and immoderation, giving themselves up to ecstasy and pain.

Santería

A blend of ancient West African beliefs (primarily those of the Yoruba) and Catholicism, Santería is based on the belief that the world is divided into two realms: the invisible realm of heaven and the visible one on Earth. The Santería universe is composed not of objects, but of dynamic forces in continuous motion. These forces are represented by ashe, the growth impulse and the movement toward completeness and the divine. The divine is understood as the remote, all-powerful creator Olodumare (or Odumare), who cannot be understood. He manifests a part of his nature through the forces of the visible world, personified by the multidimensional beings known as orisha. The orisha are essentially guardian angels or guiding forces produced by Olodumare.

This was the headquarters of the 1,000-strong Maceo regiment and also the dictator Fulgencio Batista's second largest fortress in Cuba.

Celebrations continue from July 25 to July 27 and are hosted in turn by each of the 14 provinces. The national anthem the "Bayamo Song" is followed by the "Internationale" the workers' anthem. The Cuban revolutionaries fought against great odds: The Spanish troops were vastly superior in number and training and received 90,000 rifles from the United States. Cuba became independent (of Spain) on December 10, 1898, but was under U.S. control for three years, finally emerging as a sovereign nation on May 20, 1902. The day is celebrated with parades and symposia in remembrance of the historic occasion.

❁ BIRTH

Following the Christian custom children are baptized in church. The Cuban government guarantees a liter of milk per day per child, from birth to seven years of age.

❁ COMING OF AGE

In Cuba a girl’s puberty is cause for joy, because she is now eligible for marriage. The ceremony is known as the quinceanera (“celebration of budding womanhood”) and is traditionally held on her 15th birthday. It is usually as elaborate as a wedding, complete with formal flower arrangements, lavish parties, gowns, rented formal wear, limousines, photo sessions, catered dinners, and dance parties.

❁ MARRIAGE

Marriage ceremonies are Christian in nature, and Cubans need to provide proof of baptism in order to marry within the Catholic church. The wedding ceremony takes place in the church or the “wedding house.” Foreigners are not permitted to get married in Cuban churches. Once the marriage has been solemnized the marriage laws are read to the couple and they sign the register.

❁ DEATH

Cubans view funeral rites with great reverence. They hold wakes for 48 hours before the Catholic funeral Mass and burial. A funeral is treated as a community event and matters of social position become secondary as far as funeral rites are concerned. Members of the family, the community, and religious groups all donate money and other necessities for the burial. Funeral proceedings are photographed.

Introduction

❁ HISTORY

The rich Cypriot cultural diversity is the result of the country's 9,000-year-old tumultuous past. Cyprus has hosted settlers ranging from ancient Phoenicians, to Assyrians, Egyptians, Persians, Macedonian Greeks, and Romans. The oldest remains of Cypriot settlements date back to the Neolithic Age. Civilization grew and flourished in this region over time. During the Bronze Age it became wealthy due to extensive trade, which brought the Greeks, among other traders, to Cyprus. Ancient Cyprus witnessed its golden era under Alexander the Great (356–23 B.C.E.) Several generations of Greek settlers brought with them the Greek language, religion, and customs, and Greek influence continues to play a major part in the Cypriot way of life.

Gradually Cyprus came under Roman control. It became a part of the province of Syria in the Roman Empire. During this period Saints Paul (fl. mid-first c.) and Barnabas (fl. mid-first c.) traveled to Cyprus and introduced Christianity to the region. Cyprus was a part of the Byzantine Empire from 395 to 1191 and one of the first countries ruled by the Christian Emperor Constantine (d. 337). The island was valued by the emperor because the tomb of St. Barnabas is situated here.

Geographically Cyprus is in Western Asia (or the Near East), but politically and culturally it is considered European. Historically Cyprus, due to its position as a bridge between three continents (Europe, Asia, and Africa) as well as its two religions (Christianity and Islam) has been a pivotal locale, especially during the Crusades.

King Richard I (1157–99) of England captured Cyprus, married the Cypriot Berengaria of Navarre (c. 1165/1170–1230), in Limassol, and proclaimed her queen of England.

However King Richard sold Cyprus to the Knights Templar, who established the Lusignan Dynasty there. The Knights Templar was a powerful military order formed in 1118 as a result of the First Crusade to protect the kingdom of Jerusalem from Muslim forces as well as to ensure the safety of European Christians who visited the holy city of Jerusalem.

Greek Orthodox Christianity was officially replaced with

The Crusades

The Crusades refer to a series of military campaigns undertaken by Christians at the instance of the pope to reclaim the Holy Land (Palestine) from Muslim domination. The Holy Land is claimed by three monotheistic religions: Christianity, Islam, and Judaism. The Crusades took place between the 11th and 13th centuries and include nine major campaigns as well as many smaller crusades against the Muslims and sometimes even other Christian forces. (The Fourth Crusade was waged against Constantinople and the Albigensian Crusade against the Cathars of southern France.) The Crusaders, zealous Christians, also massacred many Jews.

the Catholic faith for a short while and, under the rule of this dynasty, the island flourished as one of the richest countries in the region. In 1489 the last Lusignan queen Catherina Cornaro (1454–1510) ceded Cyprus to the powerful city-state of Venice. The island was to function as a bastion against the Ottoman Empire in Turkey, which conquered Cyprus in 1571 and ruled the island until 1878, when the British began to show interest in its strategic location.

The British formally annexed Cyprus when the Ottoman Empire entered World War I in 1914. Turkey renounced all claims to Cyprus under the Treaty of Lausanne in 1923; subsequently the island was declared a British Crown colony in 1925. This vitally strategic island remained a British colony throughout World War II. In 1955 after losing hope of attaining freedom from British rule peacefully, the Armed Liberation Struggle broke out. Cyprus won its independence after five years of struggle. According to the Zurich-London Treaty Cyprus became an independent republic on August 16, 1960. However the two sovereign base areas of Dhekelia and Akrotiri were retained by the United Kingdom.

Peace continued to elude this country. In 1974 Turkey invaded Cyprus and occupied most of the northern part of the island. Even though such international bodies as the UN General Assembly, the Non-Aligned Movement, the British Commonwealth, and the Council of Europe condemned this action, Cyprus continues to be a divided nation with two governments in the early years of the 21st century. The city of Nicosia is the only divided capital in the world. Tassos Papadopoulos is the president of the Southern Greek Cypriot Republic, while Rauf Denktaş was replaced by Mehmet Ali Talat as president of the TRNC in 2005.

❁ GEOGRAPHY AND CLIMATE

Cyprus lies in the far eastern Mediterranean Sea close to Turkey, Syria, Egypt, and Greece. The nation covers an expanse of 5,748 square miles and is the third largest island in the Mediterranean Sea. The main relief features of Cyprus are the two large mountain ranges separated by the Mesaoria Plain. The Kyrenian Range lies in north Cyprus, and the Troodos Massif is in the center of the republic.

Mount Olympus is the highest point on the island. The three main rivers are the Yialias, the Pedhieos, and the Serraghis.

Cyprus enjoys a typically Mediterranean climate, with hot summers and dry winters. It is sunny almost all of the year. Rainfall is scarce, and the island has often seen drought years. Cypriots do enjoy a fair amount of snowfall in the higher altitudes of the Kyrenian and Troodos mountain ranges.

The island has a variety of plants and animals that are found nowhere else in the world. Citrus and olive groves, pine-forested mountains, and numerous flowering plants abound, and it is often described as a botanist's paradise. The mountainous areas of the island are home to a variety of Cypriot fauna. Large numbers of griffon vultures, fox, fruit-eating bats, sea turtles, and mouflons (wild sheep with big curling horns) can be seen here. The coastal areas of Cyprus shelter various species of fish, crabs, sponges, and other marine animals. Cyprus is also a popular layover for millions of birds during their migration from Europe to Africa and back.

❁ ECONOMY

The Cypriot economy is small, yet diverse and prosperous. The island enjoyed a rise in gross domestic product (GDP) during the late 1980s, only to suffer a lag after that due to the Gulf War. Tourism suf-

Berengaria of Navarre is traditionally described as “the only English queen never to set foot in the country,” but she sent several envoys to England seeking payment of the pension that she was due as Richard’s widow but that King John was not paying her. King John owed her more than £4,000 (about US$7,200) when he died.

Fun Fact

The name Cyprus is derived from some non-Indo-European word for copper, most probably the Sumerian term kabar, and refers to the large deposits of copper ore on the island. Through overseas trade the island has already given its name to the Classical Latin word for the metal, which appears in the phrase aes Cyprium, meaning “metal of Cyprus,” later shortened to cuprum.

ferred a major setback during this period. In spite of such losses, the World Bank named Cyprus a developed country during the mid-1990s. The major industries are tourism, the cultivation of fruits and vegetables, wine production, cement, clothing, and shoe manufacturing. The service sector contributes 62 percent to the GDP and is very important to Cyprus. Agriculture contributes 6 percent to the country's GDP. The major crops are potatoes, vegetables, barley, grapes, olives, and citrus fruits.

Cyprus possesses excellent ports such as Famagusta, Kyrenia, Larnaca, Limassol, and Paphos, and has been a crucial trading center since ancient times. The country enjoys good trade relations with many nations, including Russia, Bulgaria, the United Kingdom, Greece, Japan, Germany, and Turkey (North Cyprus only). The island exports citrus fruits, potatoes, grapes, wine, cement, clothing, and shoes and imports consumer goods, petroleum, lubricants, food and feed grains, and machinery.

Cyprus is a destination country for women trafficked from Eastern and Central Europe for the purpose of sexual exploitation. Traffickers who force women into prostitution continue to recruit victims fraudulently telling them they can work as dancers in cabarets and nightclubs on short-term "artiste" visas, in pubs and bars on employment visas, or illegally on tourist or student visas.

The Cypriot economy is prosperous but highly susceptible to the vagaries of the tourism industry and the region's political instability. The Turkish Cypriot economy is much smaller than that of its Greek counterpart, because it is not recognized by international bodies and depends on Turkish patronage. Greek Cyprus was admitted to the European Union (EU) in 2004, and efforts to reunite the two regions of the country continue.

✿ CULTURE AND LIFESTYLE

Cyprus is truly a divided nation. The cultural differences between the northern and southern regions of the island are very pronounced. While northern Cyprus reflects everything Turkish, the south exudes an essentially Greek culture. Ancient Greek temples, medieval frescoes, and Roman mosaics abound. Pottery, traditional copperware, weaving, and Lefkara lacework also reflect the region's rich Greek heritage.

The music and dance forms here, moreover, differ significantly from those of Greece. Instruments such as the violin and laouto (a four-stringed lute played with the quill of an eagle or vulture) are used for accompaniment. Most dance forms are performed as a suite and face-to-face. Dancers often

The Cyprus Mouflon

The Cyprus mouflon is a rare type of wild sheep that can only be found in Cyprus, where it is believed to have lived for more than 8,000 years. The mouflon is the largest wild animal that lives on the island. It is to Cypriots what the kangaroo is to Australians—an easily recognizable icon that appears in a stylized form on coins, postcards, and the Cypriot national airline emblem perform during wedding ceremonies, depicting the traditional courtship rituals conducted by young Cypriot villagers.

Cyprus enjoys a high degree of freedom of worship. Although the majority follows Greek Orthodox Christianity, other Christian denominations and other faiths, such as Islam, are found here. The Cypriot Church ranks fifth in eminence among the Orthodox Churches, after the patriarchates of Constantinople (Istanbul), Alexandria, Antioch, and Jerusalem. Thus it ranks above the patriarchates of Russia, Greece, Serbia, Romania, and others.

Since Cyprus is close to the Holy Land, it is not surprising that it is one of the earliest countries to have adopted Christianity. One of the earliest methods of spreading Christianity in this country was through monasteries set up across the island. Many of these monasteries, situated in the midst of orchards and vineyards, can still be seen today. Some have been producing wine for centuries.

❁ CUISINE

Cypriot cuisine is essentially Mediterranean. Traces of European and African influences are present, but Greek and Middle Eastern influences are prevalent. Regional herbs, local ingredients, and olive oil characterize Cypriot cooking. Seafood and meat are especially popular.

Cyprus is famous for kleftiko (oven-baked lamb) and mezedes (snacks). The mezedes, “little delicacies,” are small plates of savory dips, vegetables, fish, or meat dishes. These dishes are much more than traditional hors d’oeuvres and often compose a major part of the Cypriot meal. Apart from the classic Greek food, it is easy to identify variations of Greek salads, moussaka—the traditional Greek dish of ground meat and eggplant—and souvlaki, kebabs of pork, lamb, and chicken. Other Cypriot dishes include loukanika (sausages soaked in red wine and smoked), koupepia (grape leaves stuffed with minced meat and rice), tava (a tasty stew of meat, herbs and onions), and lountza (smoked pork) served in sandwiches. Popular seafood dishes include calamari (octopus in red wine), barbouni (red mullet), and sea bass. Cypriots also enjoy vegetable preparations of potatoes in olive oil and parsley, pickled cauliflower and beets, zucchini, kolokasi (a sweet potato-like root vegetable), and asparagus.

Cypriot desserts are mostly made of fresh fruit, served alone or with a selection of sweet pastries. Fruit preserved in syrup is also popular. Loukoumades (Cyprus doughnuts with honey syrup), daktyla (ladyfingers with almonds, walnuts, and cinnamon), and sbiamali (orange semolina cakes cut into squares) are also preferred sweet dishes in the country. A traditional sweet treat known as loukoumia (sugar-coated gelatin cubes flavored with rose water) is a favorite.

The traditional Cypriot wines are rich and strong. The island’s sherries are also favorites.

❁ NEW YEAR’S EVE/DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: December 31–January 1

The first day of the Western (Gregorian) calendar January 1 is celebrated as New Year’s Day throughout the world. On New Year’s Eve Cypriot children dress as Father Christmas and wander through the streets singing traditional songs. Families gather around fires and play a game with olive leaves (Agie Vasili Vasilias). Most families bake a special cake with a coin hidden in it called Vasilopitta to celebrate New Year’s. When the cake is cut, the person who finds the coin is supposed to have good luck in the year ahead.

New Year’s Day also coincides with St. Basil’s Day. Traditionally, it is on this day that St. Basil brings children presents rather than on Christmas.

Cypriot Wine

Cyprus, with a 4,000-year-old tradition of winemaking, occupies a unique place in the history of wines and the development of the wine trade. Archaeologists have found evidence suggesting that Cyprus supplied wine to the pharaohs of Egypt and to the ancient Greeks and Romans. The famous Cypriot Commandaria wine is known to be the oldest wine in the world. This wine was matured in huge earthen jars. While pouring the contents out, ancient Cypriots always left a certain amount of the wine as residue. This residue helped the new wine mature. In a way the old wine became the mother of the new. For this reason Commandaria was known as mana, the Greek word for “mother.” This tradition continues to this day.

struggle of the Greek Cypriots (the National Organization of Cypriot Combatants, or EOKA) against British colonial rule in 1955. The island of Cyprus was declared a British Crown colony in 1925. In 1955 after losing hope of attaining freedom from British rule peacefully, the Armed Liberation Struggle broke out. Cyprus won its independence after five years of war against the British.

LABOR DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: May 1

The May 1 observance of Labor Day was first decreed in 1889 by the Second International, a consortium of socialist organizations, to recognize the importance of workers around the world. It scheduled the first demonstrations and celebrations for the following year 1890. It coordinated this observance with a strike called by the U.S. labor union the American Federation of Labor (AFL), which was demanding an eight-hour workday.

In Cyprus on Labor Day there are parades and labor union meetings. It is a national holiday and government offices, schools, and shops are closed.

On August 16, 1960, after a five-year struggle, the United Kingdom granted independence to Cyprus. On October 1 of the same year the Republic of Cyprus came into existence. Since then Greek Cypriots have celebrated their independence day on October 1. Cypriot Independence Day is celebrated with a military parade in Nicosia and an open reception at the presidential palace in the evening. All offices and schools remain closed on this day.

The Turkish Republic of North Cyprus (TRNC) celebrates November 15 as Independence Day.

OCHI DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: October 28

Ochi Day commemorates the Greek resistance movement during World War II, which fought to protect Cyprus from the Axis powers of Italy and Germany. This day is the anniversary of General Ioannis Metaxas's (1871–1941) refusal to allow Italy free passage to invade Greece. It is said that the war would have been prolonged if it were not for his resistance.

Just like Greece, Cyprus celebrates this day with a lot of pomp and show. Military parades, naval parades, special church services, and other celebrations are held on Ochi Day. Most businesses, and schools are closed.

The Christian Feast of Epiphany celebrates the Three Wise Men from the East who came to Jerusalem looking for the newborn Jesus. On Epiphany the archbishop of Nicosia leads a huge procession of followers to the seaside where a ceremonial baptism is performed. GREEN MONDAY

Observed by: Eastern Orthodox Christians

Observed on: Last Monday before Lent

Green Monday is the last Monday before the start of the Eastern Orthodox Great Lent in Cyprus. Great Lent is a 40-day period of fasting, so named to differentiate it from the Advent fasting period, which is called Little Lent.

Great Lent is a period of self-denial and is observed with strict abstinence from all animal products (meat, dairy products), wine, and olive oil. Orthodox Christians also make a sacrifice during this period such as giving up a favorite food or other pleasure. Great Lent always begins on a Monday between February 15 and March 21. It is set at seven weeks before Pascha, or Easter, and is also called Clean Monday.

Green Monday is set aside for fun and relaxation, and many Cypriots enjoy picnics in the mountains on this day. It is a national holiday in Cyprus with government offices, schools, and businesses closed.

This sepulcher is then taken around in procession during the evening church service.

✿ EASTER

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: First Sunday after Lent

The Christian festival of Easter celebrates Jesus' Resurrection from the dead three days after he was crucified. The computation of the day of Easter is, however, completely different between the Julian calendar used by the Eastern Orthodox Church and the Gregorian (Western) calendar and does not correspond in any straightforward way.

Jesus' Resurrection is the central event of the Orthodox Church and is understood in absolutely literal terms. Jesus was crucified and died, descended into Hades, battled death, and won. Through these events he released mankind from the bonds of hell and then came back to the living. That each individual human may partake of this immortality, which would have been impossible without the Resurrection, is the main promise held out by God according to Orthodox Christian tradition. In one way or another every holiday of the Orthodox ecclesiastical year relates to the Resurrection. Every Sunday of the year is dedicated to celebrating the Resurrection, and most Orthodox believers will refrain from kneeling or prostrations on Sundays in observance thereof.

This is one of the biggest Greek Orthodox festivals in Cyprus. Cypriots bake special Easter breads, pastries, and cheese pies called flaounes. They also paint eggs red, in accordance with a very old Cypriot tradition, and attend the midnight Easter vigil in churches. A bonfire, known as a lampradjia, is lit in front of every church. The faithful greet each other, eat the traditional avgolemono soup (an egg and lemon rice soup), and crack Easter eggs against one another. (Two people knock Easter eggs, and the one whose egg doesn't break is supposed to have good luck.) The main Easter meal is souvla (barbecued lamb or goat), which is served when the Lenten fast is broken.

The date of the Christian celebration of Easter is linked to the ancient Jewish celebration of the Passover. The Jewish people, moreover, followed the Persian/Babylonian calendar, and their new year commenced with the spring equinox. It is probably no coincidence that most of the pagan societies settled in the Mediterranean region also had major religious celebrations at or following shortly after the spring equinox. A common point of these spring religious festivals was a god whose own death and rebirth symbolized the death and regeneration of life during this time of the year. There are stories of a few gods in pagan religions who were believed to have died only to be reborn.

Before the egg became closely linked with the Christian festival of Easter, it was closely associated with various spring festivals. The Romans, Gauls, Chinese, Egyptians, and Persians all regarded the egg as a symbol of the universe. In pagan times the egg represented fertility and the rebirth of the Earth. After the long, harsh winter, the Earth burst forth with signs of new life just as life emerges from eggs.

The Roman Catholic Church changed the symbolic meaning of the egg, as well as the pagan spring celebrations, in order to make it easier to win converts to Christianity.

Both the Sunday and Monday of this holiday celebrate Pentecost, the day on which the Holy Ghost descended upon Jesus' disciples. The holiday is usually called Pentecost because it takes place 50 and 51 days following Easter Sunday; in Greek pentecost means "fiftieth day." It is sometimes referred to as Whitsun, however, referring to the white garments that were worn by those who were baptized during the disciples' vigil. Pentecost also coincides with a celebration of Noah's Flood, which is called Kataklysmos ("deluge").

In Cyprus the weekend is filled with festivities including fairs and traditional dances. Some beaches take on a carnival-like air on this weekend. Schools and shops remain closed on these days.

Traditional Cypriot Marriages

Traditionally Cypriots followed the system of arranged marriages. The alliances were generally forged via a matchmaker. Opportunities for the young themselves to meet were rare and restricted. They socialized at church, in the presence of their parents, at the village fountain, and during “Sunday afternoon walks,” when girls and boys strolled separately. Romantic love was not reason enough to marry in traditional Cypriot society. Divorce and separation were rare because the system of marriage and dowry was so rigid that neither partner could opt out of the marriage easily.

CHRISTMAS

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: December 24–25

The Christian holiday of Christmas celebrates the birth of Jesus. Cypriots typically celebrate Christmas from St. Nicholas Day (December 6) through the Feast of the Epiphany (January 6). It is not uncommon for Greek Orthodox Cypriots to fast for the 40 days prior to Christmas, especially avoiding meat and dairy products. This fasting period is called Little Lent to distinguish it from Great Lent, the 40 days of fasting before Easter. Cypriots bake special Christmas cakes and pastries for the holiday. Children go door-to-door singing carols, many of which date back to the days of the Byzantine Empire and are given coins or sweets. Orthodox Churches display creches, or manger scenes, for the holidays.

Christmas is a religious holiday in Cyprus, and festivities are often solemn and reverent. The holiday has become more commercialized in recent years, but it is still more religious here than in many other countries. The Cypriot town of Paphos has a live reenactment of the events surrounding Jesus’ birth.

Christmas Day festivities are family-centered, with church services and special Christmas feasts that often include roast turkey. Traditionally children receive their gifts from St. Basil on New Year’s Day.

Visitors are treated to barrels of free wine and get to see the traditional processes of pressing grapes and preparing wine, making it a major tourist attraction. Music and Cypriot dance are an integral part of this festival.

Rites of Passage

MARRIAGE

Cypriot weddings are relatively informal, unlike weddings in other European cultures. A large number of people are often present to take part in the affair. Having 3,000 wedding guests is not unusual in Cyprus. Formal invitations are not distributed; everyone is invited verbally.

The wedding is solemnized in a Greek Orthodox Church, where the bride and the groom, along with the wedding party, attend a special prayer service. The service may be long, but it is not formal. Guests often wander in and out of the church without hesitation. The bride and groom, bedecked with flowers, are made to stand in the center of a circle, and the priest and other participants dance around them.

The wedding reception follows the church ceremony and can continue until the early hours of the next day. The reception often takes place in a big hotel, where guests gather to congratulate and bless the couple. The father of the bride usually gives a house or some ancestral property to his daughter.

Introduction

❧ HISTORY

At an unnamed site in the Czech Republic, evidence of prehistoric weaving has been found in clay fragments that range from 24,870 to 26,980 B.C.E. with the bones of mammoths and many smaller animals. No evidence was found that people were there later. At this time Alpine glaciers and the huge Scandinavian ice sheet were advancing on Central Europe, so the people who did the weaving had to leave. Sites with late Neolithic Corded Ware and potsherds finds of the Moravian middle Neolithic "painted pottery" culture are also being excavated. The ceramics, notable for their well-preserved painted decoration forming recognizable rectilinear and curvilinear patterns, as well as the conspicuous number of zoomorphic and anthropomorphic clay figurines, were found in a circular ditched enclosure with four gates.

The remains of an early Slavonic settlement known as Pohansko hillfort, inhabited between the sixth and eighth centuries C.E. was probably a clustered agriculture settlement divided into separate granges. Within the granges large extended clans, themselves divided into smaller nuclear families, lived and worked communally. Over three centuries the settlement shifted and was rebuilt several times.

Such archaeological and circumstantial historical evidence indicates that the Slavic tribes first moved into Bohemia in the sixth century, having reached Moravia and Slovakia somewhat earlier. These tribes adopted Christianity and united for a short period to form the Great Moravian Empire from 830 to 906. The empire was made up of western Slovakia, Bohemia, Silesia, and parts of eastern Germany, southeastern Poland, and northern Hungary. At the end of the ninth century the Czechs separated to form the independent state of Bohemia.

Around 870 Prince Bořivoj (fl. ninth century) of the Premysl (also spelled Przemysl) Dynasty (named after the most revered ancestor of Czechs, Premysl or Przemysl) established the Prague Castle as his seat of power, but he was unsuccessful in bringing the various tribes together. In 950 the German

King Otto I (or Otto the Great), the first holy roman emperor, invaded Bohemia and made it a part of his empire. (The term Holy Roman Empire did not come into usage until several centuries after Otto's accession; the Holy Roman Empire was a successor state to the empire founded in 800 by Charlemagne.)

However in 1212 the Premysls united the warring factions in the country; the Premysl Prince Otakar I (1198–1230) was granted permission by the emperor of Germany as well as by the pope to rule over Bohemia, and was granted the status of king. He was succeeded by his son Prince Otakar II (c. 1230–78), who married a German princess Margaret of Babenberg (d. 1266; sister of the duke of Austria and the last ruler of the Babenberg Dynasty Frederick II, (1219–46), and thus became the duke of Austria. By virtue of being a duke of Austria Otakar II established control over a major part of Austria. However after the death of Frederick II, he met with fierce opposition from the emperor of Habsburg Rudolf (1218–91) who was also the godchild of Frederick II. In 1278 a battle was fought between Bohemia and Habsburg, and Otakar II was killed on the battlefield.

“The golden age” of Bohemia began under the auspices of the king of Luxembourg Charles IV (1316–78). He was the son of John the Blind of Luxembourg (1296–1346) and Queen Elizabeth (1292–1330), the heir to the throne of Bohemia after the death of her brother and the last male ruler of the Premysl dynasty King Wenceslaus III (1289–1306). Charles IV was a great patron of the arts, and he founded the Charles University of Prague in 1348. During his reign Prague developed into one of the most beautiful cities in Europe, liberally dotted with impressive buildings in the Gothic style.

In the 14th and 15th centuries a Czech named Jan Zizka (c. 1370–1424) led a church-reform movement called the Hussite Revolution that was influenced by the teachings of Jan Hus (b. 1369), a religious reformer. The Roman Catholic Church often viewed his teachings as antipapal, since he spoke openly against the hierarchical tendencies as well as corruption and the accumulation of wealth prevalent in the Roman Catholic Church. In 1414 Jan Hus was summoned by the Council of Constance, an ecumenical council of the Catholic Church, where bishops had assembled to discuss and settle issues related to church practice and doctrine. After listening to the views of Jan Hus, the council declared him a heretic, and, in 1415 he was burned to death.

The death of Jan Hus marked the beginning of widespread protests by the Hussites against the Roman Catholic Church. The fight between the pro-church demonstrators and Hussites soon led to a series of wars, known as the Hussite Wars, fought between 1420 and 1434, and to the killing of German Roman Catholics in Prague by Bohemian Hussites. Hus's death and the succeeding violence also led to the reformation of the Catholic Church in Bohemia.

In 1440 Ladislaus the Posthumous (1440–57), whose name was chosen because he was born four months after the death of his father the king of Bohemia Albert II, 1397–1439), became king of Bohemia. During this period attempts were made by George of Poderbrady (d. 1471), a Bohemian noble and supporter of the Hussites, to unite the Hussites and the Czech Reformed Church, and Catholic sympathizers in the region were driven away from Prague. In 1457 Ladislaus died of the plague, and in 1458 George of Poderbrady was elected the new king of Bohemia, despite the pope's protests. George Poderbrady also became the first European king to denounce the Catholic faith. He ruled over the region until his death.

In 1526 after the Hussite King Louis II (1506–26) was defeated by the Ottoman Turks in the Battle of Mohacs, the Bohemian nobility elected Archduke Ferdinand I (1529–95), a Habsburg ruler, as the king of Bohemia. After he became the emperor following the death of his brother Charles V (1500–58), Ferdinand started spreading Catholicism in Bohemia and even imprisoned the bishops of the Czech Reformed Church and many Hussite leaders. This purge was carried on into the 17th century by the Holy Roman Emperor Matthias (?1557–1619) and led to growing friction between the royalty and the Hussites.

Thus on May 23, 1618, as a mark of protest against the rule of the emperor, two Habsburg councilors were thrown out of one of the windows of Prague Castle by the Bohemian people. This incident was the catalyst for the Thirty Years' War (1618–48) between the Bohemians and the emperor, which ended unfavorably for the Bohemians when the emperor emerged victorious at the end of the war. As a consequence Bohemians were forced to accept Germanization and the Catholic religion for the next three centuries, a condition that persisted into the 19th century.

In 1867 after suffering a series of defeats in Prussia and Italy, the Habsburg Dynasty, ruled by the King of Bohemia Franz Joseph (1830–1916), struck a deal with Hungary to strengthen his position in Europe, which led to the establishment of the dual monarchy of the Austro-Hungarian Empire. Under the dual monarchy the native Bohemians suffered immensely and were denied the right to have any say in the governance of their country. All policies were made in the interests of the Hungarians, Germans, and Austrians, and many Czechs were deprived of their basic rights

The term Bohemia is apparently derived from the Boii, a Celtic tribe dominant in Eastern Europe in Classical Roman times.

Fun Fact

Prague has earned many nicknames such as the “city of a hundred spires,” “the golden city,” the “mother of all cities,” and “the heart of Europe.” Since 1992 UNESCO has declared many historic places in Prague as World Heritage Sites.

Velvet Revolution and Velvet Divorce

The days after the November 17 demonstration have become known as the Velvet Revolution, because there were no casualties or major bloodshed. The demonstration ended the 42 years of Communist rule in 1989, when once again there was a call to reform politics and return to a democratic form of government. The Slovak nationalist movement arose toward the end of 1991 and sought independence for Slovakia. When it became clear that the general elections of June 1992 could not solve the problems of the two republics, Czech and Slovak leaders decided to split their states into two fully independent nations. On January 1, 1993, the Czechoslovakian federation was dissolved, and two separate independent countries were born: the Czech Republic and Slovakia. The “Velvet Divorce” was a term used widely in the media to describe the peaceful dissolution of Czechoslovakia into these two independent countries of Slovakia and the Czech Republic.

in the Austro-Hungarian Empire.

But this repressive rule failed to wipe out the Czech national identity. In the 19th century Bohemia and Moravia decided to unite and fight the Habsburgs. The city of Prague was the torchbearer of the revolt that had begun to sweep through Europe. The idea of an independent Czech state began to form in the 20th century and intensified during the course of World War I. The Czechs and the Slovaks decided to set up a single federal state of two independent republics in 1918. This resulted in the formation of the Republic of Czechoslovakia. Eventually due to the slow pace of development and the fact that they were not granted their own federal state, the Slovaks wanted to break away. The large number of Germans in Bohemia also cherished their own dreams of a greater Germany. In 1938 under the Munich Agreement Hitler took advantage of this fact and annexed the Sudetenland, a region along the Moravian and Bohemian borders that had a large German populace. This upset the Czechs, who immediately began to prepare for war. The German forces invaded Czechoslovakia and wreaked havoc on the underground resistance movement. Although Bohemia and Moravia suffered little damage, tens of thousands of Czech and Slovak Jews lost their lives in concentration camps.

On May 5, 1945, the city of Prague rose against the Germans and emerged victorious, thereby reestablishing Czech autonomy and independence. The Communists emerged as the majority party in the 1946 elections, winning 36 percent of the vote. Communist authorities established a repressive, authoritarian regime and during the 1950s Communist economic policies brought Czechoslovakia to the brink of bankruptcy.

In the 1960s things began to improve. Liberalization took place and Alexander Dubček (1921–92), a former leader of the Slovak party, became the president. He represented the people’s desire for complete democracy or “socialism with a human face.” The Soviet Union would not tolerate any threat to Soviet-style Communism and brutally crushed the “Prague Spring.” This was the name given to an uprising in 1968, which was a short-lived attempt at freedom from state control. Dubček was exiled, and thousands of prodemocracy party functionaries were expelled. The Communist regime was once again in control and remained in power for almost two more decades.

On November 17, 1989, the Communist youth movement in Prague carried out a peaceful prodemocracy rally. The police cracked down severely on the demonstrators, but the protests continued. Led by the dissident playwright Václav Havel (b. 1936), the democracy movement ultimately forced the Communist government to step down. Havel was subsequently elected president of the republic. The period between November 17 and December 29, 1989, which saw the Communist regime thrown out of Czechoslovakia, is known as the Velvet Revolution for its lack of violence.

In the meantime the Slavs were beginning to agitate for a separate republic, and the leaders of Czechoslovakia decided to split the nation into two parts. On January 1, 1993, Czechoslovakia ceased to exist and the Czech Republic and the Republic of Slovakia came into being. Václav Havel was sworn in as the first president of the Czech Republic.

The Czech Republic joined NATO in 1999 and the European Union (EU) in 2004.

GEOGRAPHY AND CLIMATE

The landlocked Czech Republic is bordered by Poland to the north, Germany to the northwest and west, Austria to the south, and Slovakia to the east. The Bohemian Massif, a ring of mountains that encloses the Bohemian Plateau, dominates the landscape. This imposing landform is 3,000 feet above sea level. The two main rivers are the Elbe and the Vltava. The highest peak is the Sněžka (“Snow Mountain”) in the Giant Mountains on the Polish border, part of the Sudetes mountain range, at 5,256 feet. To the west Bohemia is made up of rolling plains, hills, and plateaus encircled by low hills. To the east Moravia is extremely hilly.

The Czech Republic has a temperate climate

Fun Fact

The Royal Route, which connected the Royal Court and Prague Castle, retraces the coronation procession made by Bohemian kings and queens in the Middle Ages. In 1458 George of Poděbrady was the first king to walk this route; the stroll, which starts at Powder Gate in the Old Town and finishes at Matthias Gate in front of the castle, takes 90 minutes.

marked by cool summers and cold and snowy winters. The warmest month of the year is July, while January is the coldest. Winters are bitterly cold in the mountains and usually last from December through February. Temperatures can fall below freezing even in the lowlands. In the western region of Cheb the mean annual temperature is 45°F; in Prague during summer, the temperature can reach 91°F, while in winter the temperature can be as low as 1°F.

❁ ECONOMY

The economy of the Czech Republic has begun to bounce back with the help of sound economic policies, and it is regarded as one of the most stable economies among the post-Communist states.

The Czech Republic is a source, transit, and destination country for women and children trafficked from Ukraine, Russia, Belarus, Moldova, Lithuania, Romania, Bulgaria, Slovakia, China, and Vietnam into and through the Czech Republic mainly for the purpose of sexual exploitation.

Tourism is a good source of revenue, and Czech industries include power engineering, metallurgy, car manufacture, glass, leather, plastics, chemicals, ceramics, and beer. Growth has also received a boost from exports to the EU, and Germany in particular. Foreign investment has shown a steady upward trend and inflation has been brought under control. Deficits in the current account have hovered around five percent of the gross domestic product. There have been concerted efforts to privatize banking, telecommunications, and energy. The economy has almost made a full recovery from the recession since mid-1999. The shops are well stocked, and the cities have an air of prosperity.

❁ CULTURE AND LIFESTYLE

By nature the Czechs are straightforward, even-tempered people. Despite their turbulent history and the repressive nature of Communist rule, they have achieved a high degree of development in art, architecture, music, and literature and produced world-renowned musicians, composers, and writers.

The Czech Republic is famous for its grand and opulent architecture and possesses some of the finest Baroque, Renaissance, and Art Nouveau buildings in Europe. Less well known, but equally deserving of praise, are the illuminated manuscripts, religious sculpture, marionettes, and puppet theater. Czech Puppet Theater is regarded as one of the finest in the world.

The most famous Czech writer Franz Kafka (1883–1924) was a member of a circle of writers in Prague at the beginning of the 20th century. Some of the more recent writers of great talent and influence include Milan Kundera (b. 1929), Ivan Klima (b. 1931), and Josef Skvorecky (b. 1924). Milan Kundera wrote about life under the Communists, and his notable works are The Unbearable Lightness of Being (1984) and The Book of Laughter and Forgetting

Václav Havel

A leading playwright, Václav Havel became the president of Czechoslovakia in 1989. The Communists threw him into prison twice, and his plays were banned. He came to represent human rights, democracy, and peaceful resistance, not only in his country, but also throughout the world. He left office in February 2003 after having served as president for 13 years. Though he started out as an extremely popular figure in Czech politics, some of this luster was dimmed by his perceived shortcomings as a leader over the years. His first publicly performed play was The Garden Party in 1963.

(1979). Jaroslav Siefert (1901–86) won the Nobel Prize for Literature in 1984. Former Czech president Václav Havel, a playwright, has written several books about Czech history and politics. Disturbing the Peace (1991) and The Art of the Impossible (1998) are among his works.

Czech music, like Czech art and architecture, is of an extremely high standard. It encompasses the entire spectrum from classical to jazz. Antonín Dvořák (1841–1904) is generally regarded as the greatest Czech composer. He was an apprentice butcher who possessed a prodigious talent that resulted in works such as his Symphony from the New World, which he composed in the United States while lecturing there. Following World War II Czech jazz musicians were the foremost in their field, until the Communist regime put an end to their playing. Some immigrated to the United States and became successful there. However, the jazz scene has picked up again in the years following the Velvet Revolution.

❁ CUISINE

Czech cuisine is generally quite rich and, despite a move toward eating lighter food, traditional favorites still have a loyal following. Czech cuisine is partial to the use of meats and usually has a high content of fat, calories, and sugar. A meal frequently starts with a soup (polévka). Some popular soups are potato, garlic, and sauerkraut (fermented white cabbage). A meat dish (maso) and a side dish (příloha) follow the soup. Chicken, pork, and beef are the most popular meats and are often served with a sauce. Mackerel is a popular choice for grilling over an open fire. On Christmas Eve carp is usually served. As far as side dishes go, the popular choices include mashed or boiled potatoes, French fries, bread dumplings, potato dumplings, and potato salad.

Czech cuisine offers a wide range of desserts (moučníky). They are generally rather rich and fatty, and the ingredients often consist of butter (máslo) and whipped cream (slehačka). The favorites among them are crepes (paláčky) filled with jam (džem) or strawberries (jahody) and whipped cream, blueberry dumplings (borůvkové knedlíky), apple strudel (jablečný závin), and ice cream sundaes (zmrzlinový pohár).

A Czech meal is incomplete without the national beverage, beer (pivo), served with it. Other popular beverages are orange juice, apple juice, and soda. Czechs also like to drink tea with sugar and lemon, and coffee with or without milk or cream.

❁ LABOR DAY

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: May 1

May 1 is celebrated as Labor Day, also known as May Day, in many parts of the world to commemorate the important role played by workers. The earliest origins of May Day are ascribed to the pagan celebrations observed by farmers, peasants, and villagers in Europe well before the Middle Ages. In 1889 the Second International, a consortium of socialist organizations, declared May 1 a day to recognize the importance of workers around the world and scheduled the first demonstrations and celebrations for the following year, 1890. They coordinated this observance with the strike called by the U.S. labor union the American Federation of Labor (AFL) demanding an eight-hour workday.

On Labor Day Communists and Social Democrats organize rallies in different parts of the Czech Republic. Since the fall of Communism in the former Czechoslovakia, however, the people of the Czech Republic do not participate in these parades in large numbers.

❁ VICTORY DAY

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: May 8

Victory Day commemorates the victory of Allied Forces in Europe after Germany signed an unconditional treaty of surrender on May 8, 1945, bringing an end to World War II. During World War II German forces invaded Bohemia and Moravia, and the region came under Nazi rule. At the time thousands of innocent Czechs and Jews were sent to concentration camps and brutally killed by the Nazis. The Soviet Union, one of the members of the Allied Forces, launched an attack on German forces in Slovakia, Bohemia, and Moravia. However in May 1945, U.S. forces entered the region and liberated the city of Plzen from Nazi rule and, eventually, all of western Bohemia. Around the same time, a civilian uprising took place in Prague, which resulted in the defeat of the Nazi forces by the Czechs.

On this day war veterans, including American and Russian soldiers who helped in the liberation of the country during World War II, are honored in special celebrations that take place all over the country. In different parts of the Czech Republic memorials have been constructed in honor of all those soldiers of the Allied Forces who died liberating the region from Nazi occupation. Wreath-laying ceremonies and speeches by war veterans and Czech leaders are part of the Victory Day celebrations.

❁ JAN HUS DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: July 6

Jan Hus Day commemorates the death of Czech reformer and thinker Jan Hus (1369–1415), who was burned at the stake. Jan Hus was rector (or head) of the Charles University in Prague and was vocal regarding corruption and the accumulation of wealth and power, as well as the hierarchical tendencies that had become endemic to the Roman Catholic Church. He also propagated the use of the Czech language in the university, which caused major discontent among German students studying there.

In 1414 three bishops assembled at the city of Constance at the behest of the Holy Roman Emperor Sigismund (1368–1437) and Pope John XXIII (the antipope, r. 1410–15) to form the Council of Constance. They summoned Jan Hus and after listening to his antihierarchical and antipapal beliefs, declared him a heretic. By order of the council Jan Hus was condemned and burned at the stake on July 6, 1415. Centuries later on December 18, 1999, the late Pope John Paul II (r. 1978–2005) apologized on behalf of the Roman Catholic Church for the execution of Jan Hus.

On this day the Czech people pay homage to the life and legacy of this great revolutionary, a symbol of Czech nationalism and identity. The Hussite Church all over the country organizes special prayer ceremonies in honor of Jan Hus, which are attended by both Catholic and non-Catholic leaders.

❁ CZECH STATEHOOD DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: September 28

This day commemorates the death anniversary of the patron saint of the Czechs St. Wenceslaus (903–35), who was murdered by his brother Boleslas on September 28, 935. Wenceslaus was the son of the Duke of Bohemia Vrastilav I and was the prince of Bohemia. Although his father was a Christian, his mother Dragomir, like most Czechs at that time, was a believer in pagan gods. When Wenceslaus, at the behest of his grandmother St. Ludmilla (c. 860–921), embraced Christianity, his mother became furious and began plotting to kill him. After becoming the king of Bohemia following the death of his father, Wenceslaus sent his mother into exile and began spreading Christianity in Bohemia.

In 935 under the pretext of celebrating the feast of Saints Damian and Cosmas, Wenceslaus was invited to attend church services by his brother Boleslas and was killed by him while they were on their way to the church. He died as a Christian martyr, was canonized as a saint, and, thus, became the patron saint of the Czech Republic and its people. The Feast of St. Wenceslaus is celebrated on September 28, and since the year 2000 it has also been celebrated as Czech Statehood Day.

On this day huge celebrations are held in the Prague Castle, and special prayer services are organized in town halls and churches all over the Czech Republic in honor of the patron saint of the nation. It is a public holiday, and all private and public institutions are closed on September 28 as a mark of respect to St. Wenceslaus.

❁ CZECH FOUNDING DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: October 28

Czech Founding Day commemorates the establishment of the independent nation of Czechoslovakia on October 28, 1918. From 1867 until World War I Bohemia had been under the rule of the Austro-Hungarian Empire, which meted out unfair treatment to the Czechs and denied them their basic rights. The Czechs and Slovaks revolted against the empire in 1918 and with the support of U.S. President Woodrow Wilson they formed the independent state of Czechoslovakia, freeing themselves from the oppressive rule of the Austro-Hungarian Empire.

Czechoslovakia was formed on October 28, 1918, and continued as the country of Czechs and Slovaks until its dissolution into the independent states of the Czech Republic and the Republic of Slovakia in 1993. In the Czech Republic October 28 is celebrated as Czech Founding Day. On this day brave citizens of the Czech Republic are honored in a special ceremony held in Prague, and the spirit of Czech nationhood is celebrated. STRUGGLE FOR LIBERTY AND DEMOCRACY DAY

Observed on: November 17

This day commemorates two events that occurred on this day, separated by 50 years. These are the anti-Nazi demonstrations held on November 17, 1939, in which nine Czechs were killed by the occupying German forces, as well as the anti-Communist demonstrations, which were held on November 17, 1989, in the capital city of Prague.

On November 17, 1989, the peaceful demonstrators protesting against the corrupt Communist government in Czechoslovakia were brutally injured by the police who wanted to silence the voices of democracy. This historic event paved the way for widespread demonstrations in the country against the oppressive Communist regime and also marked the beginning of the end of Communist Czechoslovakia. The days after November 17 came to be known as the Velvet Revolution.

Since 2001 November 17 has been celebrated as Struggle for Liberty and Democracy Day. At the Prague Castle, the president of the Czech Republic joins fellow Czechs in paying tribute to all those who died for the cause of democracy and salutes the spirit of the Czech people, who protected the sovereignty and integrity of the nation.

EASTER

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: First Sunday after Lent

Easter is celebrated to mark Jesus' Resurrection from the dead three days after his Crucifixion. It falls on the first Sunday after Lent and is celebrated by Christians the world over. The origin of Easter celebrations can be traced back to as far as the end of the first century C.E.

In the Czech Republic after attending the special Easter prayer service in their local churches, every region in the Czech Republic celebrates this day in its own traditional way. Czechs visit their friends and family and gather for a special Easter dinner. One Easter tradition is the baking of gingerbread in the shape of a lamb for Easter dinner. Young girls also decorate Easter eggs, which they intend to give to boys on Easter Monday, when they come to their homes to sing hymns. Also a nationwide Easter egg contest is held in the Czech Republic in which the most beautifully decorated Easter eggs receive special prizes. Red eggs are also exchanged between friends and family members to wish one another happiness, good health, and prosperity.

EASTER MONDAY

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: First Monday after Easter

Easter Monday falls on the first Monday after Easter. In the Czech Republic Easter Monday is also celebrated as the day of pomlázka (whip), a ritual that can be traced to the early European pagans and that involved the whipping of women, girls, and livestock by men. The purpose was to chase away evil and bad spirits and ensure a healthy and prosperous year ahead.

Today young boys gently whip girls on their legs and also douse them with water. While whipping them thus, the boys sing an Easter song asking the girls to give them Easter eggs. As a reward for protecting her against evil spirits by whipping them away, a girl hands an Easter egg to a boy as well as ties a ribbon on his pomlázka (the whip made from birch or willow branches). Although eggs are still given as gifts on Easter in many villages and towns all across the Czech Republic, nowadays ribbons, bread, and brandy are often given to the young boys as a token of gratitude.

ST. CYRIL AND ST. METHIDIUS DAY

Observed by: Orthodox Christians

Observed on: July 5

This day commemorates the arrival of Saints Cyril (827–69) and Methodius (826–85) to Greater Moravia on July 5, 863. Saints Cyril and Methodius were brothers and devout Christians who belonged to a renowned Christian family in Thessalonica. They began spreading Christianity and the Slavonic language in the Slav countries, including Bulgaria and Greater Moravia.

Prince Borivoj of the Premysl dynasty was introduced to Christianity by St. Methodius, the bishop of Greater Moravia (Moravia) in 874. It is believed that St. Cyril invented the Glagolitic alphabet. Both the brothers began teaching the Slavonic language in the region. Many believe that St. Cyril's disciple St. Clement of Ohrid (c. 840–916) simplified the Glagolitic alphabet and created the Cyrillic alphabet, naming it in honor of his teacher. Disciples of these saints spread the use of Slavonic languages in other Slavic countries.

Pope John Paul II (r. 1978–2005) declared St. Cyril and St. Methodius copatrons of Europe on December 31, 1980. On this day people offer prayers in honor of these patron saints in local churches.

❁ CHRISTMAS

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: December 24–25

Christmas is a day of celebration for Christians all over the world because it marks the birth of Jesus. In the Czech Republic, some Czechs also observe the earlier Advent holiday, St. Nicholas Day, on December 6. Children believe that, if they hang their stockings on December 5, Svaty Mikulas (St. Nicholas), accompanied by his angel and Devil, will bring fruit, nuts, and sweets to good children. The angel will help him; the Devil will swat bad children and leave coal or onions and potatoes.

Christmas celebrations, however, begin in earnest on Christmas Eve (December 24) and last until St. Stephen's Day on December 26. On Christmas Eve people start decorating Christmas trees and making preparations for Christmas dinner. In accordance with Czech traditions Christmas Eve dinner is not served until the first star makes its appearance in the night sky. The meal consists mainly of fresh carp, potato salad, mushrooms, and fish soup. A special Christmas pastry called vanocka is served for dessert. After dinner, family members assemble around the Christmas tree, sing Christmas carols, and wish each other "Veselé Vánoce," a "Merry Christmas." Children are also allowed to open their gifts on Christmas Eve. Then they proceed to local churches to attend a special Christmas Eve Mass.

On Christmas Day (December 25), Czechs visit their friends and family and exchange gifts and greetings.

Rites of Passage

❁ MARRIAGE

The Czech Republic has many colorful and wonderful wedding traditions that go back through the ages, mainly drawing from the regions of Bohemia and Moravia. An ancient tradition during weddings in the Czech Republic required the friends of the bride to sneak into her back yard, plant a tree sapling, and decorate it with neatly painted eggshells and colorful ribbons. It was believed that the bride would live as long as the tree. On the eve of her wedding the bride's friends weave a wreath of rosemary, the symbol of remembrance, and remind her of the importance of love, wisdom, and loyalty in a marriage.

The traditional Czech wedding is a test for both the groom and the bride. A chopping box and axe and a bottle of wine are kept at the threshold of the bride's house for the groom's test. If he picks up the axe, it means that he will prove to be a good husband; if he picks up the bottle, it means he will be a drunkard. The bride is tested when she enters her husband's house for the first time. A broom is kept in the room's corner; if the bride notices it and swiftly cleans the room, she will prove to be a good housewife.

Fun Fact

At Czech weddings guests often throw peas, rather than rice, at the departing wedded couple.

In another traditional practice the bride and groom's friends throw nuts, grain, coins, or figs outside the newlyweds' house. It is done to please the gods who, it is hoped, will shower blessings on the couple. Nieces of the couple or daughters of their friends lead the wedding parade to the church and scatter flowers before them. This stems from a pagan belief that flowers attract the goddess of fertility.

Friends form an aisle for the newlyweds to walk through. They try to make the walk difficult, which is seen as a fun gesture but has the underlying meaning that the couple must overcome all difficulties in marriage and still walk together. After the wedding ceremony the groom's friends pull a rope across the church door. The rope is decorated with flowers, ribbons, and empty bottles and they allow the couple to continue their journey if they are paid off by the groom. This means that the groom has to pay off the sins of his youth.

According to Czech tradition the groom carries his bride over the threshold of their home. Romantic as it may seem, the main idea is to ward off the evil spirits that lurk under the threshold. There is also the ritual of the groom's friends kidnapping the bride after the wedding reception to signify the bride's separation from her parents and the beginning of a new partnership. If the groom does not find her he has to pay a ransom. Traditionally small buns called kolaches are baked a few weeks before the wedding. They are given to relatives, friends, and neighbors as an invitation to the wedding reception. Kolaches should have at least three kinds of filling to show the culinary art of the housewife.

A special Czech wedding dance is the kolibka. In this dance the chief bridesmaid holds a plate in her arms as if it were a baby. Guests throw coins onto the plate to start a nest egg for the couple's future offspring.

Introduction

✿ HISTORY

Archaeological evidence suggests that Denmark was inhabited as early as 100,000 years ago. However, it was only around 12,000 B.C.E. that settlements began to appear in the region. Before the arrival of Scandinavians, mummified bodies found in peat bogs indicate that Denmark was home to Celts. Early inhabitants were mainly nomadic hunters who crossed the region while hunting reindeer and other animals. Around 3000 they began practicing agriculture and animal husbandry in addition to hunting.

Due to climatic changes during the Iron Age (400 to 1 B.C.E.), the winters in the region became colder, which limited agricultural activities. As a result many tribes migrated south into Germanic regions. However around the same time, other tribes in Denmark began extracting iron from the ore found in peat bogs. Trade activities (especially with the Roman Empire) flourished as local tribes put their knowledge of iron to use and began creating a wide variety of iron tools, weapons, and coins. Around the fifth century C.E. many tribes from different parts of Europe began migrating toward Denmark. Prominent among them were the Danes, a tribe living in Terra Scania, a region in the southern parts of Sweden, who began migrating to Denmark to take advantage of the flourishing iron trade. Modern inhabitants of Denmark can trace their cultural and linguistic origins back to the ancient Danes.

In 808 the Danish earthen defense structure (the Danevirke, "Dane's work"), which stretches from the swampy moors of West Jutland to the town of Schleswig, was initiated by the Danish King Godfred (or Gudfred, d. 810) according to written sources. In 1969–75 excavations identified three building phases of the main structure of Danevirke, from between 737 and 968, around the same time as the new Runic alphabet was introduced.

Until the 11th century the Danes, together with Norwegians and Swedes, were known as Vikings. They colonized,

Fun Fact

The Runic alphabets, an ancient writing system of Northern Europe, consist of letters called runes. Formerly used to write Germanic languages, mainly in Scandinavia (the Futhork, named for its first six letters: F, U Th, A, R, and K) and the British Isles (which was called the Futhorc), the earliest runic inscriptions date from c. 150. Although this alphabet was generally replaced by the Latin alphabet as a result of the rise of Christianity (by c. 700 in central Europe and by c. 1200 in Scandinavia), it continued to be used until the early 20th century.

raided, and traded in all parts of Europe, exploring as far west as North America, according to archaeologists and historians. If Norse sagas are accurate around 1006 the first conflicts between Europeans and native peoples may have occurred at L'Anse aux Meadows in what is now Newfoundland. When Vikings tried to establish settlements along Newfoundland's coast, the indigenous people they met, described in the sagas as skraelings or skraelingars, were so hostile that they abandoned the effort. It is likely that the natives who expelled the Vikings were the Beothuk inhabitants of Labrador and Newfoundland, probably the descendants of an Algonquian group.

Between the eighth and the eleventh centuries the Vikings ruled Denmark. Under the Vikings Denmark became a great power, exercising control over the Jutland Peninsula (a peninsula that divides the North and Baltic Seas and forms the continental part of Denmark as well as the northern part of Germany), the southern part of present-day Sweden, and the island of Zealand (largest island of modern-day Denmark, also known as Sjaelland). Many small kingdoms were established within Denmark during this period.

King Harold Bluetooth Gormson (935–86), the son of a former Jutland chieftain Gorm the Old (r. ?948–?58) brought all these small kingdoms under his rule and established a unified kingdom of Denmark in 980. Gormson is thought to be the first king of Denmark.

According to legend Harold was visited by a German missionary, who asked him to embrace Christianity. Harold put him through an ordeal of fire, which involved walking nine steps holding red-hot iron rods in both hands. The missionary passed the test, so Harold and the entire kingdom of Denmark embraced Christianity.

Harold's son Sweyn Forkbeard (?986–1014) and grandson Canute the Great (1018–35) conquered many neighboring regions and ruled an expanding empire, which now included the kingdoms of Denmark, England, and Norway. However after the death of Canute the Great, natives of England and the Vikings of Norway began to rebel against the Vikings of Denmark and, following a series of violent battles, the English and Norwegians broke free from Danish rule. Canute's nephew Sweyn Estridson (1020–74) managed to preserve the kingdom of Denmark and established good relations with the archbishop of Scandinavia.

In the 12th century Valdemar the Great (1131–82) became the king of Denmark and made it into a powerful territory by annexing other territories, as well as establishing trade relations with regions along the Baltic Sea. However in the 13th century the successors of Valdemar the Great fought among themselves over the right to rule Denmark; in the process the kingdom and its economy suffered immensely. The close relations between the monarchy and the popes of Rome came under criticism from the nobility, as well as from commoners who blamed royalty for the economic problems of the country.

In the 14th century Margrethe I (1353–1412), the daughter of the king of Denmark Valdemar Atterdag (c. 1320–75) married King Håkon VI (1340–80) of Norway. After the death of King Håkon VI and the premature death of their son Olaf III, Margrethe I became the queen of Denmark. A good administrator Margrethe unified the kingdoms of Denmark, Norway, and Sweden (which included the Faroe Islands, Finland, Iceland, and Greenland), known as the Kalmar Union.

However the Swedes, who were unhappy with the extravagant spending of Danish kings on wars, rebelled against the Danish monarchy. In 1523 the Swedes elected Gustav Vasa (1496–1560) as their king, and the Kalmar Union was dissolved (although Norway remained under Danish rule). In 1536 Christian III (1503–59) was sworn in as the king of Denmark and Norway. He was greatly influenced by the teachings of Martin Luther (1483–1546), a German theologian and founder of the Lutheran Church. Luther challenged the traditions of the Roman Catholic Church and asked Christians to return to the teachings of the Bible. His protest started the Protestant Reformation, which aimed to reform the corruptions and errors of the Catholic Church. King Christian III introduced Lutheranism in his kingdom and forced Roman Catholic bishops and priests to convert to Lutheran beliefs and practices.

In the 17th century King Christian IV (1588–1648) became king of Denmark. The region of Oresund (the name of a strait separating Scania and Zealand), which connects the Baltic Sea to the Atlantic Ocean, formed the backbone of the trade

The Vikings

The word viking (from the Norse word vik, which means “bay” or “creek,” and the suffix -ing, meaning “coming from”) is a native Scandinavian term used to refer to the seafaring Norse, often considered pirates, who regularly raided the European coasts, raping and pillaging as they went. Countries raided by the Vikings between the eighth and the eleventh centuries included the British Isles and Scandinavian countries including Denmark, France, Sweden, and the southern parts of Norway.

route for northern European countries exporting goods to markets along the Atlantic Ocean at this time. Since Oresund was under Danish rule every passing ship had to pay a toll to pass through it, and the wealth of the Danish kingdom soared, particularly as trade and thus traffic increased. Denmark also profited from the Eighty Years' War (1568–1648) in the Netherlands, because fleeing skilled artisans and traders immigrated to Denmark, bringing their expertise with them. Denmark's prosperity during King Christian IV's reign made him the most celebrated Danish monarch. After his death in 1648 Denmark, under King Frederick III (1609–70), declared war on Sweden in 1658, but the Swedish forces were far too powerful for the Danes. Eventually Sweden won the war. A peace treaty was signed between the Danish and Swedish forces according to which Denmark handed over three of its richest provinces Hallandia, Scania, and Blechingia.

During the Napoleonic Wars (a series of wars fought between the French Emperor Napoleon Bonaparte [1769–1821] and the British between 1804 and 1815), Denmark formed an alliance with the French. Sweden, on the other hand, supported Britain. In 1807 British naval forces created havoc in Denmark by bombarding Copenhagen and inflicted further humiliation by capturing the Danish fleet. Denmark surrendered, and a peace treaty was signed between Denmark and Britain. As a reward for Swedish assistance, Britain gave the Swedish crown the right to rule Norway. The Norwegians revolted against this move and quickly declared their independence by electing their Crown Prince Christian Frederick (Christian VII; 1749–1808) as their new king.

In the 1830s the desire to become a republic gained momentum in Denmark; on June 5, 1849, the reigning monarch of Denmark King Frederick VII (1808–63) declared the kingdom a constitutional monarchy. The king became the head of the executive branch, while the legislative branch was composed of the Folketing (representatives elected by the people) and the Landsting (representatives elected by the landowners).

During World War I (1914–18), although Denmark remained neutral, the financial instability in Europe due to the war greatly affected the Danish economy. During World War II Denmark was invaded by Nazi Germany and remained under German occupation until the Allied forces liberated the country at the end of World War II. During German occupation Danish Jews were not sent to concentration camps but faced the threat of deportation. In 1943 most Danish Jews were relocated to Sweden.

Political reforms in Denmark began in 1953. A new constitution abolished the colonial status of Greenland. The country abandoned the policy of neutrality in war, and the constitution also authorized the abolition of the Landsting (upper house of elected representatives).

Denmark became a member of the United Nations and was one of the founding members of

Kalmar Union

The Kalmar Union included the Kingdoms of Denmark, Sweden, and Norway, which were unified under a single monarch Queen Margrethe I in 1397. In 1389 a war was fought between the Kingdoms of Denmark and Sweden, in which King Albert of Sweden (b. 1338) suffered defeat at the hands of Danish forces. The treaty between the two kingdoms required Albert to pay a tribute of 60,000 silver marks to Queen Margrethe I within three years of his release. When he failed to make the payment, Danish forces invaded Sweden, and Queen Margrethe I established authority over the region. In 1397 in the Swedish town of Kalmar, the Kingdoms of Denmark, Sweden, and Norway were declared unified under the rule of Queen Margrethe I.

the North Atlantic Treaty Organization (NATO). In 1973 it voted to join the European Coal and Steel Community, which later became the European Union (EU). However Danish voters rejected the proposal of having a unified currency and common defense as proposed in the Maastricht Treaty. In 1993 Denmark voted in favor of the treaty, after these two aspects were removed. In 2000 Danish voters again rejected the proposal of a single EU currency (Euro), even though the monarchy and businesses were in favor of a unified currency for the EU. Denmark continues to be a constitutional monarchy under the ruling monarch Queen Margrethe II (b. 1940).

GEOGRAPHY AND CLIMATE

A northern European country, the Kingdom of Denmark occupies the peninsula of Jutland between the North Sea and the Baltic Sea and includes 405 smaller islands. Sweden, Germany, and Norway are the countries neighboring Denmark. Among the 405 islands, only 82 are inhabited. The islands of Zealand (Sjælland) and Funen (Fyn) are the largest. Most islands are connected by bridges such as the Great Belt Bridge, which connects Funen with Zealand, and the Oresund Bridge, which connects Zealand with Sweden. Ferries also provide transportation to and from some islands.

Most of Denmark is flat. Almost 20 percent of the land is located at or near sea level, and a major portion of the arable land consists of wetlands. About 12 percent of the kingdom is covered with forests. Denmark has four main rivers, namely the Guden, which flows through the northern part of the country, the Stor, in the southern part, and the Varde and Skjern Rivers, which flow through the central part.

Denmark has a temperate climate, which is

Fun Fact

After the unbroken line of succession of Japan's emperors, Denmark has the longest unbroken line of succession in the world.

Fun Fact

Between the summer months of May and August, when the weather is pleasant, daylight lasts for more than 18 hours.

characterized by cool summer months and mild winters. In summer the daily average temperature is around 67°F, while in winter the daily average temperature is around 34°F.

ECONOMY

The Kingdom of Denmark has a robust economy. Although 65 percent of the country's arable land is devoted to agricultural activities, manufacturing industries (machinery and equipment, shipbuilding, and chemical production) contribute four times more than agriculture to the country's economy. Potatoes, grains, and sugar beets are the main agricultural products.

The Danish, krone is still the official currency of Denmark. Denmark carries on trading activities with most European countries, but Germany is its biggest trade partner. The main export items of Denmark are meat and meat products, fish, fuel, dairy products, chemicals, machinery and equipment, and ships.

CULTURE AND LIFESTYLE

The lifestyle of the Danish people can be described in one word—hygge (cozy and snug). Danish people like a relaxed lifestyle, and, although they are reserved by nature, they are comparatively more welcoming than their north European neighbors, the Norwegians and the Swedes. They enjoy a stress-free lifestyle, spending time with friends in local beer bars, pubs, and coffeehouses.

Danish is the official language of Denmark, although other languages, such as English, Greenlandic, Faroese, and German, are also spoken. More than 95 percent of the nation's population is Danish. However the country is also home to people of Somali, Iranian, Turkish, and German descent. Almost 95 percent of Danes are Evangelical Lutherans, while 3 percent are followers of other Protestant denominations and Roman Catholicism, and 2 percent are Muslim.

The Little Mermaid

The Little Mermaid pined to become a human in order to be with her sweetheart, but her love ended in disappointment and heartbreak. She is an unforgettable figure from one of the most widely read fairy tales by Hans Christian Andersen (1805–75), and she has been immortalized in the famous statue overlooking Copenhagen Harbor. The statue was created by a Danish sculptor named Edvard Eriksen (1876–1958). The statue of the Little Mermaid has become a symbol, not only of the city of Copenhagen, but also of the entire country.

Denmark was home to one of the world's most beloved literary figures Hans Christian Andersen (1805–75), who wrote hundreds of fairy tales, such as "The Little Mermaid," "The Ugly Duckling," "The Emperor's New Clothes," "Thumbelina," and "The Snow Queen," to name but a few.

The fiddle and accordion are integral parts of Danish folk music, although many Danish bands also use guitars. Some of the traditional Danish instruments used by shepherd boys include the village horn (byhorn), a cylindrical drum known as the bytromme (or town drum), and rumlepote (rumbling pots).

CUISINE

Fish, potatoes, and meat form the basic diet of the Danish people. Favorite Danish dishes include gravlax (salmon cured in dill, salt, sugar, and aquavit, often served with sweet mustard sauce), fleskesteg, or roasted pork, and bevid labskovs, a stew made by boiling pieces of beef with potatoes, pepper, and bay leaves. An open sandwich called smørrebrød (or buttered bread) and the pastry called wienerbrød (Vienna bread), popularly known as Danish in other parts of the world, are extremely popular in Denmark. Danish butter cookies are also famous worldwide. Tea, coffee, beer, spirits, and wine are the favorite beverages in Denmark.

NEW YEAR'S EVE/DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: December 31–January 1

The first day of the Western (Gregorian) calendar, January 1, is celebrated as New Year's Day throughout much of the world. Though the Gregorian calendar dates only to the late 16th century, January 1 was considered New Year's Day as early as the times of Julius Caesar, when it was the day on which Roman citizens assumed new duties. Each year a festive spirit reigns as people organize parties and celebrations on New Year's Eve.

In Denmark it is a good sign to find your door littered with a pile of broken dishes on New Year's. Old dishes are saved all year, and, in accordance with tradition, Danish youth go to their friends' homes around midnight on New Year's Eve to bang on their doors and smash and strew pieces of broken pottery, signifying a farewell to the old year and welcoming the new one. Many broken dishes signify that you have many friends. Singing, dancing, and feasting follow. Special New Year's parties are held in local pubs, bars, and restaurants as the Danish people welcome the new year. Also on New Year's Eve, the reigning monarch of Denmark greets the Danish people in a televised speech.

Fireworks are displayed over the Town Hall in central Copenhagen on January 1. Every year crowds gather in front of the Town Hall to celebrate New Year's Eve and await the last strokes of the Town Hall clock ending the year. (AP Photo/POLFOTO, Pelle Rink)

❁ QUEEN MARGRETHE'S DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: April 16

Queen Margrethe II, the ruling monarch of Denmark, was born on April 16, 1940. Denmark observes April 16 as a public holiday in her honor. On this day people waving the Danish flag (called Dannebrog) gather at a square in front of the palace in Amalienborg. At noon the palace doors are opened, and Queen Margrethe II, joined by the entire royal family, comes out on the balcony and waves to the cheering crowd. Birthday songs and joyful music are played by the Royal Guard Music Corps. Another highlight of the celebration is the parade of the Royal Guards in front of the palace. On this day the Royal Guards wear special celebratory attire consisting of red jackets and blue trousers that are worn only for special occasions.

❁ DYBBØLDAGEN

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: April 18

This day commemorates a historic battle fought between Denmark and Prussia in Dybbøl, Denmark, on April 18, 1864. The war began after Denmark declared Schleswig (a contested province between Germany and Denmark) a Danish state. This act violated the treaty signed between Denmark and the German Confederation (association of Central European states), which gave Austria and Prussia the right to rule over Schleswig-Holstein after the first Battle of Schleswig in 1460. The Battle of Dybbøl was fought between Denmark and Prussia and, even though Danish forces fought valiantly, they eventually lost the war to Austria-Prussia.

On this day the military flag as well as the national flag of Denmark, known as Dannebrog or "honorable cloth," flies at half-staff on government and military buildings and institutions as a mark of respect for the soldiers who lost their lives in the Battle of Dybbøl.

❁ PRINCE FREDERIK'S BIRTHDAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: May 26

Crown Prince Frederik Andre Henrik Christian, born on May 26, 1968, is the oldest son of Queen Margrethe II of Denmark. In honor of his birthday the Kingdom of Denmark observes May 26 as a public holiday. Public and private institutions are closed on this day.

❁ CONSTITUTION DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: June 5

This holiday commemorates two significant events: It marks the signing of the first constitution of Denmark on June 5, 1849, which declared the kingdom of Denmark a constitutional monarchy. It also commemorates a modified constitution adopted on the same day in 1953. Because it is a national holiday all schools and private institutions are closed, while public and government offices remain open only until noon. The day is observed with political speeches.

HOLY WEEK

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: Week before Easter

The Christian holiday of Palm Sunday falls on the Sunday before Easter and begins a week that many Christians refer to as “Holy Week.” Palm Sunday commemorates Jesus’ return to Jerusalem a few days prior to his execution. In those days it was customary to cover the path of people considered highly honorable as a mark of respect. It is believed that on his arrival in Jerusalem Jesus was greeted with palm fronds by his followers, who laid them in his path as he entered the city. Thus the day came to be known as Palm Sunday.

In the Kingdom of Denmark Palm Sunday is marked by solemn processions, led by clergy, of devout Christians holding palms in their hands. The processions are followed by special Palm Sunday services.

Other important days in Holy Week include Maundy Thursday, Good Friday, Holy Saturday, and, of course, Easter Sunday.

MAUNDY THURSDAY

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: Thursday before Easter

Maundy Thursday, also known as Holy Thursday, is an important Christian commemoration of the day on which Jesus is supposed to have washed the feet of all his apostles before sharing a meal known as the Last Supper. It falls on the Thursday before Easter. It is called Maundy Thursday because maundatum (a Latin word meaning “commandment”), is the first word that was spoken by Jesus before he began washing the feet of his disciples. It was reported that Jesus said, “Mandatum novum do vobis,” which translates as “A new commandment I give to you.”

GOOD FRIDAY

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: Friday before Easter

The Christian holiday of Good Friday commemorates the Crucifixion of Jesus. It is observed as a solemn occasion. It falls on the Friday before Easter and is the last Friday of Lent (an austere season of fasting and penitence). Some devout Christians observe a fast during Lent (the 40 days before Good Friday). However, many Christians fast only on Ash Wednesday (the first day of Lent) and Good Friday. In Denmark a ritual called the Stations of the Cross is performed, a reenactment of Jesus’ final journey of carrying the Cross to the place of his Crucifixion. Also on Good Friday the national flag of Denmark flies at half-staff for the entire day.

EASTER

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: First Sunday after Lent

Easter is a Christian feast celebrating Jesus’ Resurrection from the dead. It falls on the first Sunday after Lent and is celebrated by Christians the world over. On Easter in Denmark the entire family gathers to celebrate Jesus’ Resurrection. Exchanging gifts with friends and family, gækkebrev, and Easter eggs are all part of Easter celebrations in Denmark. Children send gækkebrev—anonymous letters written in poetic form—to their family members. The goal of the letters is to get Easter eggs. Recipients have to guess the names of the gækkebrevs’ writers. If the recipients do not guess correctly, they have to give the senders decorated chocolate Easter eggs. The Easter celebrations continue through Easter Monday, the first Monday after Easter and a public holiday in Denmark.

COMMON PRAYER DAY

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: Fourth Friday after Easter

This Christian holiday falls on the fourth Friday after Easter. In ancient times the Danish people continued fasting on a number of holy days, even after Easter. In 1686 Common Prayer Day, also known as Store Bededag, was instituted to replace the different days of penance and fasting observed after Easter with a single day.

It is customary for the Danish people to eat white bread with butter on the night before Store Bededag. On Common Prayer Day people offer prayers and eat hot wheat muffins. Public and private institutions remain closed on this day.

✿ ASCENSION DAY

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: Forty days after Easter

The Feast of the Ascension is a day of special celebration for Christians all over the world. It commemorates Jesus' rising to heaven 40 days after he rose from the dead on Easter. Devout Christians attend church services on this day. Ascension Day is a constitutional holiday and a flag day in Denmark, where government institutions fly their flags to commemorate the day.

✿ PENTECOST

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: Fifty days after Easter (Pentecost Sunday);

Pentecost takes place 50 days after Easter. The holiday celebrates the descent of the Holy Ghost on the disciples. This was considered a great miracle: Parted tongues of fire accompanied by a strong gust of wind descended on the apostles, marking them as fit preachers of the Gospel to all corners of the world.

Many scholars believe that many of the traditions and celebrations associated with this holiday were borrowed from pagan celebrations of spring in western Europe. Homes are often decorated with green branches and flowers. In Christian tradition this is the 50th day after Easter and has been celebrated since the first century. (Pentecost in Greek means "fiftieth.")

In many countries, including Denmark, this is a two-day holiday. In some countries the holiday has been called Whitsunday and Whitmonday since the third century. This name comes from the white garments worn by those baptized on this day.

It is a Danish custom for people to go to the woods with friends and family for a picnic on Saturday and watch the sunrise on Whitsunday. Whitsunday carnivals are held in many parts of Denmark.

✿ ST. MARTIN'S DAY

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: November 11

St. Martin's Day originally commemorated the birth of St. Martin (also known as St. Martin of Tours, 316–97), a beloved Catholic saint. Martin of Tours started out as a Roman soldier, was baptized, and became a monk. According to legend, when the people of Tours (France) expressed their desire to have St. Martin as their bishop, he showed little interest in the proposal and tried to escape the crowds by hiding among the geese. However the geese gabbled and gave his hideout away. Since that day people believe that because of their betrayal the geese are punished and so became the traditional meal on the Feast of St. Martin.

St. Martin's Day is a harvest festival that became well integrated into the folk calendars of Danes and other northern Europeans. It often represented the beginning of winter and the end of the fiscal year, a time when debts were settled, new aldermen appointed, and new contracts formed.

Situated when winter begins, many pagan fertility and light celebrations are connected with this holiday, such as the Martin's fires (bonfires and burning wheels,) and the Martin's singing. When evening falls children, carrying Martin's lanterns and torches, parade through the streets singing about the generosity of St. Martin. These processions often end with the lighting of a bonfire. Finally the children go from house to house and recite verses, for which they are rewarded with sweets or, more so these days, with money. In some areas the story about St. Martin sharing his cloak with a beggar in the cold of winter is reenacted.

St. Martin's Day retained its importance even as saints' days were deemphasized after the shift from Roman Catholicism to Protestantism. Contributing to its persistence in the festive calendar was its association with the birthday of the great Protestant reformer Martin Luther (1483–1546) on November 10. Danish Lutherans (the majority of Danes) and other Protestants celebrate Martin Luther's birthday by feasting on roasted wild goose or duck and drinking new wine or brandy. In many parts of the country a soup is made with the leftovers.

✿ CHRISTMAS

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: December 24–25

Christians celebrate Christmas on December 25 to mark the birth of Jesus. In Denmark Christmas celebrations begin on Christmas Eve (December 24), and last until December 26. On December 24, families attend church and offer prayers in a special service. After services, families gather around Christmas trees with lit candles. They form a circle around the tree and sing traditional Christmas carols. On Christmas Eve gifts are exchanged. Dinner includes roast goose or duck with gravy, cooked red cabbage, and potatoes. Red wine or Christmas beer (sweet beer with low alcohol content), along with apple juice, are also served. Cookies, apple dumplings, and coffee round out the meal.

On Christmas Day the Danish people visit their friends and families and exchange more gifts and greetings. Families typically gather for a special mid-day Christmas feast.

✿ TONDER FESTIVAL

Observed in: Tønder
Observed by: General Public
Observed on: August

The Tønder Festival which takes place in the town of Tønder, Denmark, in August, is one of the largest folk festivals in Europe. The Tønder Festival is a major event for lovers of folk music and dance. This five-day-long celebration attracts folk musicians, dancers, and performers from all over the world, and many renowned musicians perform. Most of the townspeople volunteer to ensure that all the visitors (Danish as well as foreigners) feel at ease and enjoy the festival.

As a special treat for the volunteers who are unable to attend the musical concerts held during the festival, a special concert is given in which the musicians perform again just for the volunteers.

✿ NATFILM FESTIVAL

Observed in: Copenhagen
Observed by: General Public
Observed on: November

The Natfilm Festival is an annual international film festival that takes place in the Danish capital city of Copenhagen in November. The biggest film festival in Denmark, it features important international films and provides a platform for Danish filmmakers to showcase their films. Although the film festival promotes Danish filmmakers, it also offers critical exposure for independent filmmakers from Asia and America.

Rites of Passage

✿ BIRTH

Danish women place their trust in midwives to ensure the delivery of healthy children. Even today it is estimated that one in three children are born at home in Denmark. Among the world's industrialized nations Sweden and Denmark have the lowest infant mortality and maternal death rates. The ritual of baptism—which formally introduces the child to Christianity—takes place at infancy.

✿ MARRIAGE

In Denmark weddings are formalized in churches. During the wedding ceremony the bride and the groom exchange wedding vows in the presence of God, the priest, and the assembled group of friends and family. Then the bride and groom, along with the maid of honor (from the bride's side) and the best man (from the groom's side), sign the marriage certificate. The priest puts the seal of the church on the document and signs it, thereby solemnizing the marriage. Prayers and hymns are also part of the wedding service.

After the wedding ceremony there is a reception. Cornucopia cake, or a Danish marzipan ring cake, which is made from almonds, candies, and fruit and decorated with sugar work, is the traditional wedding cake in Denmark. Some cakes also feature a portrait of the bride and the groom on them. Assembled guests enjoy dancing, singing, and feasting at the wedding reception.

✿ DEATH

The Danish observe Lutheran Christian rites to bury their dead. After reading passages from the Bible, the dead body is cleansed, dressed, and placed in a coffin. Then the coffin is taken to the church, where a service is held in the deceased's honor. The body is buried and flowers placed at the gravesite.

In many parts of Denmark graves belonging to the Viking age have been found. The burial rituals of the Vikings were different from Christian burial rites. The deceased was buried with an essential item that might be required in the afterlife; the object depended on the wealth and status of the deceased. For example a rich man was often buried with luxury items, while a poor man was buried only with a knife. Many wealthy Viking women in Denmark were buried in wagons. Food and drink was also buried along with the dead body to provide sustenance in the afterlife.

❧ HISTORY

The Republic of Djibouti (formerly called French Somaliland) was the last of the African French colonies to gain its independence in 1977. The country experienced rising ethnic violence throughout the 1970s. The Afars (a tribe of northern Djibouti, culturally linked with Ethiopia) and the Issas (a tribe of southern Djibouti, culturally linked with Somalia) did try peaceful governance by forming the first inter-ethnic party in 1976. However Ali Aref Bourhan (b. 1934; an Afar who ruled the territory by allying with the French) lost his position when the people elected Hassan Gouled Aptidon (b. 1916; of the Issa tribe) for three six-year terms.

A 10-year civil war ensued. Although a tentative 1994 peace accord granted concessions to the Afars, ethnic conflict between the two tribes continued. Ismael Omar Guelleh (b. 1947), known for his pro-French stand, was elected to power in 2000 with his uncle Gouled's support. He signed the final peace accord on May 12, 2001, officially ending the civil war between the government and the armed factions of the Afar rebels.

❧ GEOGRAPHY AND CLIMATE

Djibouti is a volcanic desert with most of its land unfit for cultivation. Mt. Moussa, the highest point in the country (6,768 feet), is located among the minor mountain ranges found toward the Ethiopian Highlands. The largest lake, Lake Abhe, lies on the Ethiopian border. The climate is hot and dry most of the year, with temperatures reaching 106°F in July. Rainfall is as little as five inches annually. The coastline is 500 miles long and is one of the most advantageous features of Djibouti's geography.

❧ ECONOMY

Djibouti utilizes its strategic location at the mouth of the Red Sea, an important shipping nexus for goods entering and leaving the East African highlands. The economy is essentially service based. Djibouti mainly exports coffee and animal hides, but its service activities (the banking sector and port facilities—transporting, communicating, warehousing, international transshipment, and refueling) provide most of the country's earnings. Its main imports are mostly food products, petroleum, and manufactured goods. Almost three-quarters of the labor force are engaged in subsistence agriculture, but most dwell in the city while periodically tending livestock in the rural areas. Since unemployment is rampant, along with a high population growth rate (including refugees and immigrants), Djibouti has to depend heavily on external aid (especially from France).

CULTURE AND LIFESTYLE

The two major ethnic groups of Djibouti—the Afars of the north and the Issas of the south—have battled fiercely in the late 20th century. Because these groups have traditionally lived as pastoral nomads and do not adhere to political boundaries, Djibouti has a huge problem of tens of thousands of refugees of both groups arriving from Somalia and Ethiopia. The years of brutal civil war, extreme poverty, and the dire refugee situation have all taken their toll on celebrations in Djibouti.

The culture is a mix of French colonial and modern Arabic influences. The most consistently observed holidays are the Muslim holy days.

CUISINE

Having traditionally been pastoral nomads Djiboutians rely extensively on sheep and goats for their needs. The milk and meat is consumed, and the animal skins, mostly exported. Tomatoes and dates are the main agricultural products. Most other food items need to be imported, since Djibouti lacks adequate livestock and agricultural produce for its needs.

The food is influenced by French cooking; however, the food on the streets is typically North African. It consists of chicken, fried meat, fish, lentils, or flat bread. Barbecued or baked fish with a spicy sauce is quite common. Since, as with most Muslim countries, Djiboutis do not have free access to alcohol, qat is used widely. Qat is a leaf that is chewed and is a mild stimulant. It is one of the few things you can always find piled under wet cloths at marketplaces. Qat is mostly imported from Ethiopia, whose airlines punctually drop qat consignments in Eritrea.

Qat

Chewing qat leaves is a national pastime in Djibouti, but it is widely debated as to whether qat chewing should be banned. For instance a person who does not chew it would say that the Djiboutian economy suffers a great deal as the afternoons are spent at home or under a tree chewing qat leaves and socializing. In fact, around 25–40 percent of household income goes into qat consumption, taking money away from education and work. Those who chew it (a large majority) argue that they concentrate better after chewing the green leaf and therefore perform better at work. A unique feature of this small country, qat is the most consumed item in Djibouti and also the most sought after.

NEW YEAR'S EVE/DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: December 31–January 1

New Year's Day is one of the most widely celebrated holidays in the world. In spite of its majority Muslim population by whom a lunar calendar is usually followed, Djibouti observes the New Year according to the Western (solar) calendar date of January 1. Because of the extreme poverty of the nation, modest celebrations are the norm.

LABOR DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: May 1

The May 1 observance of Labor Day has its origins in the international socialist movement. The first Labor Day, also called May Day, occurred in 1890, set internationally by the Second International in 1889 to coincide with an American Federation of Labor (AFL) general strike in the United States to win the eight-hour workday. Thereafter the international Labor Day became and remained more radical than the one in the United States. It was during the Vichy regime (1940–44) that France officially designated May 1 as Labor Day.

INDEPENDENCE DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: June 27

Djibouti (previously called French Somaliland) was the last French African colony to achieve independence in 1977 after nearly a century of dependency. Independence Day celebrations are held throughout the country. In the capital there is a military parade and speeches by government officials.

Religious Holidays

EL AM HEJIR

Observed by: Muslims

Observed on: First of Muharram, the first month of the Islamic calendar

This date marks the Islamic New Year and is the date when Muhammad fled Mecca for Medina. The lunar calendar used by Muslims is composed of 12 months; each month has 29–30 days. Therefore the Islamic year has only 354 days, and its cycle finishes 11 days earlier than that of the Western calendar every year. The date of this and other Islamic holidays varies in relation to the Western solar calendar.

❁ MOULOUD

Observed by: Muslims

Observed on: Twelfth of Rabbi al-Awwal, the third month of the Islamic calendar

Mouloud marks the birth of Muhammad and is also called Mawlid al-Nabi. The birthday of Muhammad is celebrated by many Muslims with elaborate feasting, parties, fairs, and parades. Stories narrating the birth of the prophet are told to children. However conservative Muslims do not believe in celebrating anyone's birthday, not even Muhammad's, because they believe it distracts one from worshipping only Allah.

❁ EID AL-FITR

Observed by: Muslims

Observed on: First of Shawwal, the 10th month of the Islamic calendar

The month of Ramadan unifies Muslims from all walks of life. The month is spent in raising spiritual consciousness through observing fasts, distributing alms, and worshipping Allah. During this month-long observance, neighbors wake each other up for subhoor, which means "meal before dawn." Observant Muslims visit the mosque frequently and recite the Koran often during the day. Eid al-Fitr, which marks the end of the Ramadan fasting, is celebrated with three days of feasting.

❁ EID AL-ADHA

Observed by: Muslims

Observed on: Tenth of Dhu al-Hijjah, the 12th month of the Islamic calendar

Since Djibouti is an overwhelmingly Muslim country (94 percent), the major holidays tend to follow the Muslim lunar calendar. Eid al-Adha, or the Feast of the Sacrifice, celebrates Ibrahim's (Abraham's) willingness to sacrifice his son to please God. It is a four-day celebration that officially ends the holy pilgrimage, or hajj. Every Muslim is expected to have journeyed to Mecca at least once in his or her lifetime if it is physically and financially possible. Eid al-Adha is celebrated with lightheartedness, the exchange of gifts, and prayers.

Prophet Muhammad's Birthday

This is one of the most celebrated days in Djibouti. On the prophet's birthday stories of how the prophet was born are narrated to young and old alike. It is said that the mountains and trees danced when Muhammad was born. The mountains sang, "There is no God but Allah," while the trees replied by singing, "and Muhammad is his prophet." The belief is that 7,000 angels gave Muhammad an exquisite bath in a golden pot filled with heavenly dew.

Rites of Passage

❁ BIRTH

The Muslim belief that pregnancy is a gift from God is widespread in Djibouti. Contraception, abortions, and pre-birth sex determination are all forbidden according to strict Islamic law. After giving birth the mother stays at home breast-feeding the newborn for a 40-day period called the afatanbah. She is assisted by female relatives and neighbors. Wearing garlic amulets and burning incense sticks are rituals intended to keep evil away from the newborn.

❁ COMING OF AGE

Both males and females are regularly circumcised in Djibouti. It is said that only after circumcision does any child become an accepted member of the adult community. Also, marrying uncircumcised partners is seen as unclean. Whereas the age of circumcision is five years for males, females are excised and infibulated between seven and fourteen years of age. For males the process is performed by medical doctors (at home or in a hospital) with pomp and show.

For girls "circumcision" (female genital mutilation, FGM) is carried out on 95 percent of the female population, although a penal code provision outlawing FGM has been in force since 1994. Among the several organizations working on the issue are the Association for the Equilibrium and Promotion of the Family (ADEPF) and the Union Nationale des Femmes de Djibouti (UNFD, National Union of Women of Djibouti), which organize workshops to raise awareness about the health risks of FGM. Both groups receive occasional media coverage. The Ministry of Health allows clinics and health training centers to distribute information about FGM.

❁ MARRIAGE

In Djibouti the marriage age for women is between 14 and 15, and for men, 18. Men may have up to four wives as the Islamic tradition allows. Men with more than one wife in the urban areas end up sustaining different households for different families, whereas in the countryside all the wives stay together and communally take care of the livestock and farm. To have multiple wives a man must have the financial wherewithal to support them.

❁ DEATH

When a person is fatally ill, it is considered insensitive for a physician to declare that he or she will die. A special portion of the Koran called vasin is recited at the dying person's bedside. A person called the sheikh (male or female) prepares the body after death. The appropriate Muslim prayers are said after the body has been cleaned, perfumed, and draped in white. The family of the deceased is responsible for digging the grave. The death anniversary is an important commemoration of the deceased person.

Introduction

❧ HISTORY

The first evidence of civilization on Dominica dates back to 3,100 B.C.E. The first settlers were the Ortoroids, who came from the South American mainland. Columbus (1451–1506 C.E.) reached Dominica on November 3, 1493, and gave it its present name, which means “Sunday” in Italian. Dominica’s history is similar to that of other Caribbean islands. The Spanish tried in vain to colonize the islands in the Lesser Antilles (of which Dominica is a part). However even their missionaries failed in their attempts to convert the local populations. The missionaries were either killed or held as hostages.

By 1727 some French families had entered Dominica as traders, lumberjacks, and farmers. Both the English and the French looked at Dominica as an island of strategic importance and in 1761 the English attacked Dominica in an attempt to gain control of the region. In accordance with the Treaty of Paris (1763) Dominica officially became a part of Britain. The French tried to regain possession of Dominica in 1795 and 1805 but failed to recapture it. The island of Dominica remained a British colony, and the English administered the island as a part of the Leeward Islands Federation until 1939. Many sugar plantations were set up in the country during this period. In 1831 the British passed the Brown Privilege Bill, allowing social and political rights to free blacks, and three free black men were permitted to join the legislature. In 1834 slaves throughout the British West Indies were emancipated. In 1838 Dominica became the only Caribbean nation in the British Empire to have a black-controlled legislature.

Eventually Dominica was added to the Windward Islands Federation, and in 1958 it joined the West Indies Federation. In 1967 the country became an Associated State of the United Kingdom. Dominica won its independence in 1978, on the 485th year of its discovery by Europeans. In 1980 it became the first Caribbean nation to have a woman prime minister—Mary Eugenia Charles (1919–2005).

Historically Dominica has been a favorite tourist destination because of its ecology and political stability. The year 2001, however, saw a reduction in the number of tourists because of the terrorist attacks on the United States, and by 2002 the country faced a deep economic and financial crisis.

Fun Fact

Dominica is one of the youngest islands in the Lesser Antilles and is still being formed by naturally occurring geothermal and volcano-related activity.

GEOGRAPHY AND CLIMATE

The island of Dominica is popularly known as “The Nature Island of the Caribbean” due to its spectacular and varied flora and fauna and its breathtaking natural beauty. It is the most mountainous of all the islands grouped under the Lesser Antilles; its volcanic peaks are the cones of lava craters and include the Boiling Lake, the second largest thermally active lake in the world. (The Lesser Antilles has one of the highest concentrations of potentially active volcanoes in the world.)

Dominica’s tropical rain forests, numerous waterfalls, and rivers owe their existence to the heavy rainfall in the interior of the island. The terrain is made up of rugged highlands and mountains interspersed with fertile valleys. Dominica has a tropical maritime climate with little seasonal variation.

Crab Callaloo

Ingredients:

2 lbs. callaloo leaves, spinach, or chard
1 clove garlic, chopped
1 1/2 lbs. okra, sliced
1 qt. water
4 scallions, chopped (top and bottom)
1 Tbs. fresh parsley, chopped
1/2 lb. crab

1/2 tsp. fresh thyme, chopped
1/2 tsp. hot pepper sauce
Salt, to taste

Preparation:

Combine all ingredients into a large pot. Cover and simmer for about one hour. Remove the meat and puree the stock. Cut the meat into chunks and add to the pureed mixture. Heat over a low flame until ready to serve.

ECONOMY

The Dominican economy is heavily dependent on agriculture, with nearly half of Dominican workers engaged in farming-related jobs. Dominica’s primary exports (bananas, soap, bay oil, vegetables, grapefruit, and oranges) are mainly agricultural. The country has some industries (soap, coconut oil, tourism, copra, furniture, cement blocks, and shoes), which employ around 30 percent of the island’s workforce. The island has high rates of poverty and unemployment.

CULTURE AND LIFESTYLE

The French culture, language, customs, and religion are deeply rooted in Dominican culture, as evidenced by the prevalence of Roman Catholicism, the preference for French names, and the use of the French language. Several other cultural influences can be seen in Dominica, such as Creole society, a blend of French, African, and Caribbean cultures and people. The Creole Music Festival that takes place in the month of October is a major tourist attraction. Other celebrations such as Independence Day and Carnival are also significant.

CUISINE

Despite the varied culinary influences—African, Carib, Indian, French, and Creole—Dominica’s cuisine is simple. The menu includes plenty of fresh crabs, crayfish, agouti (a member of the rat family), and manicou (a variety of crab found in Dominica). Fried chicken and fish and chips are available in plenty as are Creole dishes such as goat columbo (a stew) and callaloo soup (a creamed spinach-style soup), as well as other common Caribbean items such as curry-filled flat bread. The most famous national dish is the ubiquitous mountain chicken, which is actually made of the legs of a giant mountain crapaud (“toad”). A native of Dominica and Montserrat, the giant toad may only be caught between September and March to conserve its numbers. Prepared in a number of ways, it is said to taste like chicken and is usually eaten with the light locally brewed beer, Kubuli.

❁ EMANCIPATION DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: August 1

Emancipation Day celebrates the abolition of slavery in the British Empire, including Dominica. In August 1833 the British Parliament passed the Slave Emancipation Act, which gave all slaves in the British Empire their freedom, once they had served a three-year period of mandatory indentured servitude. The 1833 Act did not come into force until August 1, 1834. Although they were no longer legally slaves after this date, the enslaved people in the British West Indies were still made to work for their former masters as unpaid apprentices. They finally gained their freedom at midnight on July 31, 1838. Throughout the Caribbean and African worlds this is a major holiday, and Portsmouth in Dominica is the site of the most colorful celebrations.

❁ CREOLE DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: Friday before Independence Day

Creole Day is celebrated on the Friday before Independence Day to honor the Creole heritage of the majority of the Dominican population. People wear traditional Creole outfits and the different Kwéyól-speaking communities gather to enjoy traditional foods, folklore, and exhibits of traditional arts and crafts.

Fun Fact

Dominica's most famous national dish, mountain chicken, is actually a giant toad said to taste like chicken.

Fun Fact

Before Columbus's arrival the people called their island Wai'tu kubuli, meaning "Tall is her body."

Kwéyól

Kwéyól (Creole) is French for "indigenous." The word Creole can denote a person of mixed blood; it is also the name of the local language spoken by the inhabitants of the Caribbean islands. Also called "patois," this is the tongue most widely used from Louisiana in the United States to French Guyana (Cayenne) on the South American mainland and also predominates in countries such as Haiti, St. Maarten, Guadeloupe, Dominica, Martinique, St. Lucia, and parts of Grenada and Trinidad. There are at least 11 million Creole speakers worldwide. The alphabet for Antillean Creole is a mixture of French words and African sentence structure. Primarily oral, though various written transcriptions have been developed, Kwéyól has been around for nearly 300 years.

Religious Holidays

❁ CARNIVAL

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: Ten-day period prior to the start of Lent

Mas Domnik, the name given to Carnival in Dominica, has been called the “Caribbean’s most original Carnival.” Calypso shows and adventure sports begin a month before Carnival. Two days before, Bayfront City hosts the opening festivities, referred to as the Opening of Carnival City, which marks the start of the Carnival season. This is the first of many Carnival celebrations, which include beauty contests, costume parties, parades, and musical shows.

A last chance for Catholics to party before the 40-day Lenten fast Mas Domnik is a joyous occasion in Dominica. People from the various social groups put aside their differences to celebrate the grandest party of the year. During the 10-day festival a number of activities take place around the island. The calypso tents are vibrant with competition among the calypsonians as they vie for the title of calypso monarch of the year. Mas Domnik is a time for revelry, frivolity, and parties. The festival may be traced back to the days of plantation slavery. According to historians the masquerades and dances so important to Carnival were a feature of the French plantation culture throughout the Antilles, a time when families visited each other for Creole parties between Samedi Gras (Fat Saturday) and Mardi Gras (Fat Tuesday). When slavery was abolished in 1834 the freed blacks took these plantation celebrations to the streets, creating Carnival as it exists today.

❁ GOOD FRIDAY

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: Friday before Easter

Good Friday, a part of the Christian Holy Week, is a commemoration of Jesus’ Crucifixion. On Dominica Good Friday observances are very religious and filled with important symbolism. People attend church for readings from the Gospels and Psalms. A cross is taken through the streets with the painted body of Christ affixed to it. After the afternoon service the effigy of Christ is taken to a church. A low table representing the tomb is decorated with flowers and wreaths and an epitaphion (a cloth icon) is placed on it. The epitaphion represents the body of Christ wrapped in the burial shroud. The shroud is taken in the procession for the evening prayers and placed back in the tomb at the end of the day.

❁ EASTER

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: First Sunday after Lent

Easter, the most important holiday in the Christian calendar, commemorates Jesus’ Resurrection from the dead after being executed by Crucifixion. From the early morning Dominicans attend prayer services, which continue throughout the day. Parades and feasts are held during the day.

On Easter Monday, also known as Holy Monday, Dominicans celebrate by participating in events such as egg-rolling competitions and dousing each other with perfumed holy water.

❁ PENTECOST

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: Fifty days after Easter

Pentecost takes place 50 days after Easter. The holiday celebrates the descent of the Holy Ghost on the disciples. This was considered a great miracle: Parted tongues of fire accompanied by a strong gust of wind descended on the apostles, marking them as fit preachers of the Gospel to all corners of the world.

Many scholars believe that many of the traditions and celebrations associated with this holiday were borrowed from pagan celebrations of spring in Western Europe. Homes are often decorated with green branches and flowers. In Christian tradition this is the 50th day after Easter and has been celebrated since the first century. (Pentecost in Greek means “fiftieth.”)

In many countries, including Dominica, this is a two-day holiday. Whitsunday and Whitmonday are the names used locally to celebrate the event. The name “Whitsun” originated in the third century and was derived from the white garments that were worn by those who were baptized during the vigil of this feast.

Whitmonday celebrates the descent of the Holy Ghost from heaven, making complete the Christian Holy Trinity (God, Jesus, and the Holy Spirit). On this day people dress in their best clothes and walk in processions through the towns led by young girls in white. A country fair is held at Laudat on this holiday.

❁ CHRISTMAS

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: December 24–25

Christmas is celebrated on Dominica in much the same way it is in many other countries of the world. Decorating of Christmas trees, the exchange of gifts and cards, and the preparation of special dishes are among the festivities. Parties at home with family and friends highlight this holiday.

❁ BOXING DAY

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: December 26

The day after Christmas is traditionally observed as Boxing Day in Great Britain and former British colonies. In some countries it is also known as St. Stephen’s Day, in honor of the first Christian martyr. The origin of this holiday can be traced to the practice in Victorian England of giving cash or gifts (usually food) to servants and those of the lower classes. Gifts among equals were exchanged on or before Christmas Day, but the less fortunate received their gifts the day after Christmas. The name of this holiday refers to the church collection boxes that were opened for distribution to the poor on this day. Dominicans celebrate this additional day off from work and school with outdoor activities, including picnics and beach outings. If the 26th falls on a Sunday, then the holiday is celebrated on December 27.

❁ BAND SPLASH

Observed in: Roseau

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: Late January, early February

Band Splash is an opportunity for people to listen to new songs and albums being released for Carnival, and all the popular bands perform in this event. This is a highly popular musical extravaganza whose venue is Festival City, in Dominica’s capital Roseau. The event is usually held on a weekend between late January and early February. The program begins late in the evening of the first day, spilling over into the second day. The event is well attended, especially by the young, who dance away the night to the pulsating music.

❁ VAVAL

Observed in: Dublanc

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: February 25

Dominicans celebrate Vaval (also called Téwé Vaval) at noon on Ash Wednesday to mark the end of Carnival. Vaval represents the spirit of Carnival and is rooted in the old pagan and African traditions of the islanders. Effigies of Vaval, made out of old clothes, stuffing, and cardboard masks, made to represent the most outstanding person or event of the bygone year are paraded through the streets. These effigies are burned at night to symbolize the end of the revelry and the beginning of Lent, the 40-day Christian period of fasting leading up to Easter.

Rites of Passage

❁ BIRTH

For Dominican parents the birth of a child assures the continuation of the family line and heritage. People send flowers, cards, or gifts for the baby. Dominicans hold the Christian baptism ceremony within the first few months of the child’s life. Baptisms take place during the Sunday church service or on Sunday afternoons. Catholic children generally receive two names, one of which is that of a saint.

❁ MARRIAGE

Most marriages are celebrated according to Roman Catholic tradition. The bride wears the customary white gown, and the groom, a black formal suit. The wedding ceremony takes place at noon in a church and is known as the nuptial Mass. The bride and groom exchange vows and rings in front of their relatives and friends. The bride places her bouquet on the altar and then both the bride and the groom light a large unity candle from two smaller ones as a symbol of their new life together.

☼ DEATH

When a Dominican dies the body is washed thoroughly for the journey into the afterlife. Close friends and family members hold a wake at the home of the deceased. Thereafter the body is taken to the cemetery to be buried. At the church and graveside the funeral services consist of readings from the scriptures and prayers. At the funeral reception after the burial family members serve food and drinks to the guests. For Catholics, a Mass is held on every anniversary of the death.

Introduction

✿ HISTORY

When Columbus arrived on the island he named Hispaniola, he was welcomed by the Taínos, an Arawak Indian tribe, in 1492. Subsequently these harmonious conditions changed dramatically with the arrival of the Spanish conquistadors, who controlled the region with an iron hand. African slaves were brought to the island in 1503 to work on the plantations to replace the indigenous peoples whose numbers had been decimated by overwork, warfare, and disease. Over the next century French settlers occupied the western end of the island and their hold strengthened as Spanish power declined.

By the late 17th century Spain was not as formidable as in the past, and the Treaty of Ryswick of 1697 formally ceded the western part of the island to France. Finally in 1804 the western end gained independence as the Republic of Haiti. But the French who had also held on to the eastern part of the island were ousted in the Battle of Palo Hincado on November 7, 1808, when Spanish settlers, with the help of the British Royal Navy, won the eastern part of the island back for Spain.

Spain, however, proved weak during the period known in history as "La España Boba," "The Era of Foolish Spain." In 1821 the Spanish settlers declared their territory an independent state. Haitian forces occupied the whole island just nine weeks later and held on to it for the next 22 years. On February 27, 1844, the Dominican Republic gained independence

Juan Pablo Duarte (1813–76)

Juan Pablo Duarte, founder of the Dominican Republic, was born in 1813 in Santo Domingo City to a Spanish retailer and a Dominican mother. He studied law in Spain, where he was admitted to the bar. Duarte was attracted to the ideas of romanticism and nationalism as a student in Barcelona. While he was studying the eastern part of the Island of Santo Domingo, which had won independence from Spain, was conquered by the Republic of Haiti, making the island a single republic. The Haitians ruled the conquered part, inhabited largely by people of Spanish descent, with an iron hand.

Duarte, after returning to his native city, conceived the idea of freeing his country and founded

La Trinitaria, a secret society, in 1838. The organization soon spread throughout the whole Spanish section of the island. This was the beginning of the struggle for Dominican independence. A first attempt at independence in March 1843 was unsuccessful, and Duarte was compelled to leave the country. Another attempt made on February 27, 1844, however, was successful. Duarte was nominated for president by the Liberal Party in opposition to General Santana. Duarte was defeated and banished, remaining in obscurity for many years. He only returned to the island after the Dominican Republic was returned to Spanish rule in 1861. He participated in the struggle that ended in 1865 to reestablish the republic.

from Haiti. This was the culmination of a movement led by Juan Pablo Duarte while in exile. He is regarded as the hero of the Dominican independence movement. The first constitution of the Dominican Republic was adopted on November 6, 1844.

Spain reannexed the Dominican Republic in 1861, and the War of Restoration began in 1863. Finally, independence was restored in 1865.

The next 50 years witnessed 28 revolutions and 35 governments. Economic difficulties, the threat of European intervention, and ongoing internal disorders led to the U.S. occupation of the Dominican Republic in 1916 and the establishment of a military government. The occupation ended in 1924, with the formation of a democratically elected Dominican government.

In 1930, Rafael Trujillo (1891–1961), a prominent army commander, established absolute political control over the country. Under his leadership, the Dominican Republic was the only country that openly allowed the entry of European Jews during the Holocaust of World War II. However in August 1960 the Organization of American States (OAS) imposed diplomatic sanctions against the Dominican Republic because of Trujillo's complicity in an assassination attempt on President Rómulo Betancourt (1908–81) of Venezuela. These diplomatic sanctions remained in force even after Trujillo's own assassination in May 1961. In November of the same year the Trujillo family was forced into exile in France.

Toward its end the Trujillo regime became associated with the excessive use of force, and this gave rise to powerful underground movements. One of them was the July 14 Movement. Three of its members the three sisters Minerva, Maria Teresa, and Patria Mirabal (known as the "Three Butterflies") were imprisoned by Trujillo. International pressure secured their release, but they were assassinated by Trujillo's men on November 25, 1960. This date is observed as the "International Day for the Elimination of Violence against Women" in many Latin American countries.

Economic difficulties, coupled with problems in the delivery of basic services (including electricity, water, and transportation) have generated widespread discontent in the country. As a result there have been frequent and occasionally violent protests, including a paralyzing nationwide strike in June 1989. In 1990 President Joaquín Balaguer (1906–2002) instituted a second set of economic reforms. After concluding an IMF (International Monetary Fund) agreement, balancing the budget, and curtailing inflation, the Dominican Republic is experiencing a period of economic growth. The country has the largest gold mine in operation in the Caribbean.

GEOGRAPHY AND CLIMATE

The Dominican Republic, a Caribbean representative democracy, occupies two-thirds of the island of Hispaniola, while Haiti occupies the remaining one-third. A land of contrasts the Dominican Republic has towering mountains and rocky cliffs, rain forests, fertile valleys, cacti-studded desert terrain, 994 miles of coastline, and around 186 miles of prime soft sand beaches. The country is crossed by four rugged mountain ranges that bisect the country northwest to southeast. The largest range is the Cordillera Central with Pico Duarte, the tallest point in the Caribbean, rising over 10,416 feet. Three large fertile valleys rest between the ranges, one of which holds Lake Enriquillo in the southwest, the lowest point in the Caribbean, 131 feet below sea level and the only salt-water lake in the world inhabited by crocodiles.

The country enjoys a tropical maritime climate all the year round. The rainy season lasts from May to November, and the hurricane season from June through November.

❁ ECONOMY

Although the country has long been viewed primarily as an exporter of sugar, coffee, and tobacco, in recent years the service sector has overtaken agriculture as the economy's largest employer, due largely to growth in tourism and free-trade zones. After growing in 2002 growth again turned negative in 2003 with reduced tourism, a major bank fraud, and limited growth in the U.S. economy (the source of 87 percent of export revenues).

The Dominican Republic is a source, transit, and destination country for men, women, and children trafficked for the purposes of sexual exploitation and forced labor. The International Labor Organization (ILO) estimates that 48,000 children are engaged in child labor in this country.

❁ CULTURE AND LIFESTYLE

Because of several historical and sociopolitical factors Dominican society has evolved as a multicultural one. While Haiti is French in its customs and everyday life, the Dominican Republic reflects predominantly Latin American tastes and traditions. Spanish settlers gave the country their language and the Roman Catholic faith. Similarly African, European, and American civilizations have all enriched and permeated Dominican culture.

Traditional Taíno foods and medicines are in use even today. Taíno words—for instance, hammock and tobacco—are used extensively. Music and dance form the core of Dominican culture. The most popular dance form is the merengue. A little more pastoral is the bachata—Dominican country music, which specializes in songs about heartbreak and loss. Salsa would probably rank as the third most popular music of the Dominican Republic.

❁ CUISINE

Dominican cuisine is rich and varied. The most common meal, known as la bandera (“the flag”), consists of rice, beans, meat, vegetables, and fritos versed (green plantain fritters). The Dominican sancocho is a derivative of the Spanish coccid (“stew”), and each region of the country has its own way of preparing it. Some of the regionally famous variations include Samana's pescado con coco (fish with coconut sauce), chivo de Azua (a goat dish from Azua), and chivo liniero (a goat dish from the northwestern region), which has a unique taste because the goats feed on wild oregano. Consequently its meat gets seasoned while the animal is still alive.

The casabe (flat, round cassava bread) and cati-bias (cassava flour fritters stuffed with meat) are essentially Taíno foods that have come to form an integral part of the Dominican diet. Another dish the locrio is made with diverse ingredients; for this reason it is considered the most versatile dish of the native kitchen, allowing the chefs to create, with a

Bachata

Derived from traditional Latin American guitar music, bachata emerged in the 1960s. It was immediately denigrated by the media, mainstream musicians, and middle- and upper-class Dominicans, mainly because the lyrics—often about hard drinking, women troubles, illicit sex, and male bravado—were considered vulgar and worthless. While popular radio filled the airwaves with merengue and salsa rhythms, bachata musicians were forced to develop their own system of producing and distributing their music. Not until Juan Luis Guerra (b. 1957) won a Grammy in 1992 for his album Bachata Rosa did bachata gain legitimacy and international recognition.

little rice and whatever else is at hand (especially leftovers), an exquisite meal especially appealing to guests. Yaniqueques (“Johnny Cakes”) and mangú (a purée of boiled plantains) are also important items on this diverse local menu.

Merengue

Since the 1930s merengue has been recognized as the national dance of the Dominican Republic. Although it has musical links to Cuba, the dance properly belongs to the island of Hispaniola (Haiti and the Dominican Republic). The most popular story relates that a great hero of the revolution, who had been crippled in one leg, was welcomed home with a victory celebration. It was known that he loved to dance, but due to his injury all he could do was step with one leg and drag the other to close the dance step. Out of respect everyone dancing copied him, and the merengue was born.

According to another version, however, it originated with slaves who were chained together and of necessity were forced to drag one leg as they cut sugar to the beat of the drums. If this is true the dance probably originated with the slaves of the French colonies, who are said to have combined African dances with the French minuet of the late 1700s.

Carnival is the most colorful festival of the year. Not only is it a time of feasting before the Christian season of fasting known as Lent, but it also often coincides with Independence Day in the Dominican Republic. During Carnival week, people wear colorful masks and costumes, dancing, eating, and drinking in large street celebrations. Each city or town has its own unique costumes and celebrations. For example in Santo Domingo, the Devil, known as Diablo Coujelo, lashes out at bystanders with an inflated cow bladder to purge them of their sins. In Santiago the costume characters include pigs; in Cotuí there are butterflies; while San Pedro de Macorís features collois, or the good lawyer and businessman, who are draped with ribbons and feathers.

Rites of Passage

✿ MARRIAGE

Marriage customs in the Dominican Republic are grounded in the Roman Catholic tradition that celebrates matrimony as a holy sacrament. The ceremony consists of three biblical readings, the exchange of vows and of rings, the prayer of the faithful, the nuptial blessing, and music. The wedding rings are exchanged after the vows. The best man gives the bride's ring to the priest, who blesses it and gives it to the bridegroom. The groom then places it on the bride's finger. This procedure is repeated with the groom's ring. Brides can honor the Virgin Mary by presenting roses at her statue. The priest then pronounces them husband and wife. There may be a Mass to conclude the ceremony. Otherwise the celebration is completed with the Lord's Prayer and a blessing.

✿ DEATH

Dominicans are deeply traditional in their approach to death, although customs may vary according to the individual, family, and church. Upon death the body of the deceased is thoroughly washed to cleanse him or her for the afterlife. Friends and family hold a wake at a funeral home on the second day after death.

A Catholic funeral is held either immediately after the wake or on the third day. The funeral service is often part of a Mass. The priest reads from the scriptures, leads the prayers, and administers Holy Communion. After the service, the family of the deceased hosts a funeral reception. A Mass marks the death anniversary one year later.

Introduction

✿ HISTORY

Not much is known about East Timor prior to the arrival of the Europeans, although there is ample evidence that Chinese and Javanese sailors and traders visited the region in quest of sandalwood and beeswax, which were found there in abundance. The Portuguese were the first Europeans to arrive in the region of East Timor in the early 16th century. They established themselves at Lifau in 1556. Their claim to the island was disputed by the Dutch, who arrived in 1613. A treaty signed in 1859 and subsequently modified in 1893 set the border between the Dutch and Portuguese territories. The colonial powers exploited the island’s vast sandalwood resources.

During World War II Timor was also occupied by the Japanese from 1942–45. Then in 1950 Dutch Timor and the rest of the surrounding Dutch East Indies were transformed into the Republic of Indonesia. In 1975 when Portugal’s former colonies were winning their independence, fighting broke out between rival independence groups in Portuguese Timor. The Leftist Revolutionary Front for an Independent East Timor (FRETILIN) emerged triumphant, and on November 28 FRETILIN established the Democratic Republic of East Timor, with Francisco Xavier do Amaral (b. 1937) as its president. Nine days later Indonesia’s army invaded the territory and claimed sovereignty, administering the area as Timor Province. The annexation, however, was not internationally recognized. Meanwhile the people of the area suffered greatly from acute food shortages, disease, and military repression. Warfare with FRETILIN guerrillas also continued unabated. Finally in August 1998 Indonesia and Portugal reached an agreement that gave East Timor the right to local self-government. Indonesia was reluctant to withdraw its forces, however, and talks broke down.

In March 1999 Portugal and Indonesia agreed to let the East Timorese choose between autonomy within Indonesia or independence. In August of that year, in a UN-supervised referendum, voters chose independence. The territory descended into chaos as pro-Indonesian militias and the army unleashed a reign of terror and wanton brutality, killing supporters of independence, raping women, committing arson everywhere, and causing thousands to flee their homes. In September in light of mounting international pressure Indonesia asked the United Nations to send a peacekeeping force to East Timor. From 2000 onward the UN force assumed the administration and defense of East Timor, which became a dependent territory. A constituent assembly (assigned the important task of writing a constitution for East Timor) was elected in September 2001. In April 2002 José Alexandre “Xanana” Gusmão (b. 1946), a former guerrilla leader, defeated Xavier do Amaral and won the presidency. In May 2002 East Timor became an independent nation.

❁ GEOGRAPHY AND CLIMATE

East Timor includes the eastern half of the island of Timor, the Oecussi (Ambeno) region on the north-west portion of the island of Timor, in addition to the two islands of Pulau Atauro and Pulau Jaco. East Timor is part of the Indonesian archipelago as well as the biggest and easternmost of the Lesser Sunda Islands. To the north of the mountainous island are the Ombai Strait and Wetar Strait; to the south the Timor Sea separates the island from Australia. To the west is the Indonesian province of East Nusa Tenggara.

The island of East Timor was once part of the Australian continental shelf and is composed primarily of limestone. The island has a ridge of rugged mountains running its length. There are narrow coastal plains dotted with beaches, cliffs, and coral reefs. The region has no major valleys or important rivers. This topography, combined with the rocky soil and low rainfall, make agriculture difficult. The country experiences both food and water shortages in the dry season.

The climate of East Timor is largely tropical with hot and humid weather. The difference between the dry and rainy seasons is clear-cut. During the dry season, from May to November, the northern coast receives minimal rain, making agriculture impossible in that area. The central mountains and the south coast do receive a small amount of rain. From November to May, during the rainy season, the entire island receives lots of rain; however this often produces flooding and landslides. Typhoons are a common phenomenon in the region.

❁ ECONOMY

When the island of East Timor was colonized by the Portuguese, they exploited and ultimately exhausted its vast sandalwood reserves. In late 1999 about 70 percent of the remaining economic infrastructure was devastated by Indonesian troops and anti-independence militias. Over the next three years a massive international program, manned by 5,000 peacekeepers and 1,300 police officers, undertook a substantial reconstruction in both urban and rural areas. However economic growth was impeded in 2003 due to extensive drought and the gradual reduction of the international presence.

The country faces great challenges in its efforts to rebuild the infrastructure, to restructure and overhaul the civil administration, and to generate more jobs for young people. Agriculture holds a good deal of promise for East Timor's economy but it also faces obstacles. East Timor's coffee growers seem to have benefited from the demand for coffee in the Western world. The farmers are too poor to buy pesticides for their crops; of late however Western coffee importers (among them Starbucks) have agreed to pay high prices for the organic coffee beans grown in East Timor. The National Cooperative Business Association, with a grant from the U.S. Agency for International Development (USAID), has set up a cooperative body that will help in marketing Timorese coffee abroad.

Other elements of the post-occupation, nascent economy include marble mining, offshore fishing, and tourism. Some observers have suggested establishing a casino industry to attract tourists from Indonesia where gambling is illegal.

War has left hideous scars on a once lush and beautiful island that will have to be completely healed before tourism is possible. In addition East Timor faces the challenge of eradicating illiteracy and training its youth to run the bureaucracy required for a well-functioning government.

❁ CULTURE AND LIFESTYLE

Legends say that a giant crocodile was transformed into the island of Timor, or Ilha do Crocodilo (Crocodile Island), as it is popularly known. In spite of the lingering Portuguese influence, the East Timorese still cling to their ethnic lifestyle, spiritual beliefs, and languages.

The Portuguese colonial powers were successful in converting the bulk of the East Timorese population to Catholicism. During the colonial period a mission was established and churches were built. Today 90 percent of East Timorese are Roman Catholics.

Most East Timorese suffer the effects of poverty and squalor. A major task before the government is to heal the wounds of war and dispel the fears embedded in the national psyche.

CUISINE

The cuisine of East Timor is greatly influenced by the culinary arts of Portugal, which administered the territory for nearly three centuries. The fact that both countries are located in maritime regions further heightens the similarity between their cuisines. East Timorese eat an abundance of seafood, including crabs and fish. Other common foods include vegetables and greens (especially cabbage), and pork as well as beef. There are also plenty of cheeses. For dessert there is an array of pastries as well as puddings that incorporate fresh fruits.

INDEPENDENCE DAY (from Indonesia)

The people of East Timor cherish their independence from the rule of Indonesia. On this day in 2002 East Timor emerged as the youngest nation in the world (as well as one of the poorest). In East Timor the anniversary is observed with parades, processions, and the inspection of honor guards, as well as inspirational speeches by public figures.

CONSULTATION DAY

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: August 30

This day is of great significance in the political history of East Timor because on this day in 1999 a referendum was held under the auspices of the UN Aid Mission in East Timor (UNAMET). The general public voted for independence rather than autonomy within Indonesia. Their vote marked the first step toward the restoration of independence (originally achieved from Portugal in 1975 and then lost when Indonesia invaded and annexed East Timor), which finally came in 2002. In East Timor this day is observed with civic ceremonies, parades, and public speeches.

Pudim de Coco (Coconut Pudding)

Preheat oven to 350°F.

Ingredients:

- 3 c. sugar
- 6 eggs
- 2 Tbs. flour
- 2 c. coconut milk
- 1/4 c. freshly grated coconut (optional)

Preparation:

Slowly heat 1 cup of the sugar in a heavy skillet, stirring constantly with a wooden spoon until the sugar melts and is lump-free. When the sugar turns a caramel color, remove it from the heat and pour it into a 6-cup mold. Set aside.

Beat the eggs with the remaining 2 cups of sugar until fluffy. Place flour in a small bowl and add 2 tablespoons of the coconut milk, one at a time, until mixture is smooth. Add the flour mixture to the remaining coconut milk, mix well, and add to the egg mixture. Pour the mixture into the mold on top of the caramelized sugar. Place the mold in a large baking pan filled with 1 inch of hot water to create a bain-marie (a cooking utensil in which hot water is used to cook food in smaller pots). Bake for 40 minutes. Remove from water bath immediately. Cool for 20 minutes, then invert onto a serving dish and chill for 6 to 8 hours. To serve, sprinkle with freshly grated coconut if desired.

(Instead of grating fresh coconut, frozen fresh grated coconut can be found in the freezer department of most supermarkets and works just as well.)

✿ LIBERATION DAY

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: September 20

September 20 is observed by the Timorese people as Liberation Day, the day in 1999 that Australian-led peacekeeping troops, the International Force For East Timor (INTERFET), arrived in the country and brought an end to the violence that had followed East Timor's referendum for independence.

✿ SANTA CRUZ MASSACRE DAY

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: November 12

In response to the impending UN-sponsored delegation's arrival in East Timor, the Indonesian military threatened that they would kill any who dared protest against Indonesia's presence. On November 12, 1991, more than 270 East Timorese were massacred at the Santa Cruz cemetery in Dili, East Timor, by Indonesian troops.

The civilians at the cemetery were participating in a memorial procession in honor of Sebastio Gomez (d. 1991), a young political activist who had been slain earlier by the Indonesian military. At the funeral procession many Timorese held signs and banners supporting the church and Timorese independence. As the peaceful procession made its way through the streets of Dili, the capital city, more and more Timorese joined in. When Indonesian soldiers heard about the procession they marched into the cemetery and opened fire on the crowd. After the massacre the Indonesian Army cordoned off the area.

Priests, church officials, and aid workers were not allowed in. Scores of wounded Timorese were left to bleed to death on the roads and in the cemetery.

It is a cruel irony that the massacre took place after the UN-sponsored delegation had postponed its visit to East Timor. On this day East Timorese visit the cemetery and lay flowers to Gomez and all the citizens killed in the genocide.

✿ INDEPENDENCE DAY (from Portugal)

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: November 28

Like the celebration of its independence from Indonesia, won only after hundreds of thousands of Timorese had been killed, observances of its independence from Portugal are muted by poverty and exhaustion. Almost as soon as the Portuguese had left, Indonesia, which controls West Timor, seized the opportunity to make East Timor part of its territory and invaded, so the Timorese did not have much time to celebrate the withdrawal of its European colonizers.

✿ EASTER

Observed by: Christians
Observed on: First Sunday after Lent

For Christians Easter is considered the most important Christian festival, and its numerous celebrations and observances form the core of the liturgical year, which begins around the time of the vernal equinox in the Northern Hemisphere (the autumnal equinox in the Southern Hemisphere) and stretches out into summer in the Northern Hemisphere (winter in the Southern Hemisphere). This occasion celebrates the Resurrection of Jesus three days after his Crucifixion. Christians believe Jesus was the son of God and died on the Cross to redeem humanity from sin.

Because tourism is likely to become financially important to East Timor it may become an Easter pilgrimage destination for Southern Hemisphere Christians. The island's giant statue of Jesus, built at the very end of a mountain ridge by Indonesians when they occupied the country, could be a focal point to draw people to the island for pilgrimages during Easter.

GOOD FRIDAY

Observed on: Friday before Easter

This Christian holiday commemorates the Crucifixion of Jesus, whom Christians regard as their Messiah. A solemn occasion, it falls on the Friday before Easter and is the last Friday of Lent (a 40-day period of fasting and penitence).

Christians in East Timor observe this festival as a day of fasting. Reenactment of Jesus' procession to the place where he was crucified is an important annual ritual. Catholic Timorese generally spend the day in devotion, listening to public readings of Gospels and Psalms and singing hymns.

IMMACULATE CONCEPTION

Observed by: Roman Catholics

Observed on: December 8

Since the late 17th century Roman Catholic theologians have maintained that the Virgin Mary, the mother of Jesus, was born with a soul free from original sin, a doctrine known as the Immaculate Conception. The Virgin Mary is the patron saint of Portugal, of which East Timor is a former colony.

This is one of the holy days of obligation of the Catholic Church, which commands that all adherents of the church attend Mass on this day. This is the time to recognize Mary and her important role in the upcoming celebration of Christmas. In East Timor on this day Catholics attend Mass. They pay homage to Mary by lighting candles and offering flowers before her image.

Starting early in the morning and continuing into the small hours of the next day, the ceremony consists of dancing, drumming, chanting, and the proclamation of the rules of Tara Bandu, a season in which tree-felling, hunting, the taking of new land or wives, and the taking of other people's animals or garden produce are strictly forbidden.

Rites of Passage

✿ BIRTH

Because the area was under Portuguese rule for centuries Roman Catholicism is the predominant religion of East Timor, and Catholic rites are commonly practiced by the majority of the population. One of these is baptism, which represents one's entry into the community of the Catholic Church. It also represents the washing away of sins. In East Timor the newborn child is usually baptized by a priest in a church within a few weeks of its birth, and the event is generally celebrated with family get-togethers and special meals.

✿ MARRIAGE

In East Timor weddings generally take place in Catholic Churches. The bride is customarily dressed in white with a huge veil and floral ornaments. On the day of the wedding the bride and groom assemble at the church, along with their respective families. The couple then proceeds to the altar where the rites are conducted by a priest. The priest asks the couple for their consent to the marriage. After the couple exchanges rings there are readings from the scriptures. The priest then declares the two of them husband and wife. After the church ceremony the families of the couple organize one or more feasts to celebrate the occasion.

✿ DEATH

The East Timorese follow the practices of the Roman Catholic Church regarding death. Following a death family and friends traditionally observe a vigil, or wake. Flowers, candles, and rosary beads are placed close to the body. The body is washed, clothed, and laid in a coffin, which is taken to the church for a funeral Mass. Afterward the coffin is taken to the graveyard, where a brief graveside prayer ceremony takes place. After the coffin has been lowered into the ground those who are present symbolically throw handfuls of dust on the coffin before the grave is filled in. After the burial a Requiem Mass may be held in the church to pray for the peace of the departed soul. This ceremony is accompanied by solemn music.

Death Chant

Come, meet at the still pool and steaming waters, the arm and canal at the tree base and spring, descend to Lometta, mist fellow, mists here, fog fellow, fogs here, to descend into the white corn and yellow corn,
to descend into the white being and yam, to descend into the gardens of Bi Lebou and Mile, Kai, for flesh to turn about,
for water to turn around,
for women to emerge changed, for men to emerge changed.

Although many people of East Timor have become practicing Catholics they continue to honor their indigenous spiritual beliefs as well. To the south of Dili a ridge of mountains descends to the sea. For the Timorese that ridge of mountains is the path of the spirits of the dead, and they believe that the spirits of the dead travel that path down to the sea. At the base of that last hill or mountain before the sea is Grandfather Crocodile, the lord of the sea, who receives the spirits of the dead. The spirits remain in the sea for a while, and then return to the land. The Timorese have a death ritual chant that describes the return of the changed spirits from the sea to the land and their entry into plants and their fertilization of the Earth.

Introduction

✿ HISTORY

What is now Ecuador was inhabited by advanced indigenous cultures for thousands of years before the Incas conquered the native tribes in 1460. The Incas held sway until the Spanish conquistadors under Francisco Pizarro (c. 1475–1541), defeated the Emperor Atahualpa (c. 1502–33) at the Battle of Cajamarca in 1532.

Within decades of the Spaniards' arrival the indigenous population had been decimated by disease. Those who lived were forced into the encomienda ("royal land grants") labor system for Spanish landlords, the new elite. After nearly 300 years of Spanish rule Ecuador gained its independence on May 24, 1822. The "Republic of the Equator" was part of the South American general and patriot Simón Bolívar's vision of Gran Colombia. When Gran Colombia dissolved in 1830 Ecuador was one of the three countries that emerged (the others being Colombia and Venezuela). Between 1904 and 1942 Ecuador lost several provinces in conflicts with its neighbors. In 1942 the country went to war with Peru. This led to the loss of a large part of Ecuador's territory, including the entrance to the Amazon River. Having been ruled by dictators and military governments from 1960 to 1980, Ecuador has had a democratically elected government for more than 20 years.

✿ GEOGRAPHY AND CLIMATE

Ecuador, which includes the Galapagos Islands, is located in western South America. It borders the Pacific Ocean at the equator and is nestled between Colombia and Peru. The climate is tropical in the Amazonian jungle and in the lowlands along the coast but cooler in the higher inland areas. Ecuador must contend with frequent earthquakes, landslides, and volcanic activity as well as floods and periodic droughts.

Pichinchas Volcanoes

The Pichinchas volcanoes Guagua (in Quechua, “child”) and the older Pleistocene Rucu (in Quechua, “old one”) rise immediately west of Quito. The horseshoe-shaped summit crater is a little over one mile in diameter and 2,000 feet in depth. Many minor eruptions have occurred since the Spanish era. The central lava dome was probably emplaced during the volcano’s largest historical eruption in 1660, which dropped a foot of ash on Quito and generated west-flank lava flows. The volcano has no permanent ice cap.

ECONOMY

Ecuador has significant oil reserves, which in the early years of the 21st century have accounted for 40 percent of the country’s export earnings. Its dependency on petroleum, however, means that fluctuations in world oil market prices can have a serious effect on the nation’s economic well-being. In 1999 Ecuador faced its worst economic crisis ever and in 2000 changed its currency to the U.S. dollar. In the 21st century Ecuador’s economy is growing, thanks to oil production, economic reforms, and opening its markets to the world.

CULTURE AND LIFESTYLE

Farra (parties) and celebrations are held frequently. Hardly a month passes without a major celebratory event. Most festivals are celebrated with long processions, colorful ceremonies, and sumptuous feasts. Because more than 90 percent of the population is Roman Catholic, most of the holidays and celebrations follow the liturgical calendar of the Roman Catholic Church. These holidays are observed most in the highland villages, where celebrations include feasting, drinking, and dancing and continue for several days. Other holidays commemorate significant political or historical events.

Ecuadorian holidays are seldom celebrated on their fixed dates. If a public holiday occurs on a weekend, it may be celebrated on the previous Friday or the following Monday to make a longer weekend. Even a midweek public holiday is sometimes celebrated on the previous Monday or the following Friday for the same reason.

CUISINE

Ecuadorian food is rich in soups and stews. Other specialties include fresh tropical fruits, cornmeal pancakes, rice, beans, eggs, plantains, and vegetables. Fresh seafood is ubiquitous. Although the everyday diet of rice, potatoes, and meat (beef and chicken everywhere, pork in the Sierra) can be bland, no Ecuadorian table is complete without aji (hot sauce). Each locality has its own specialties; some of the more exotic include caldo de patas (soup made from cattle hooves), cuy (whole roasted guinea pigs), and tronquito (bull penis soup).

NEW YEAR’S EVE/DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: December 31–January 1

Ecuadorians traditionally celebrate New Year’s Eve along with año viejo (the old year). Dummies, representing the previous year, are stuffed with paper, sawdust, wood, and firecrackers. They are usually caricatures of local and international politicians or people in the news. The dummies are put on public display before they are burned. Women (or men disguised as women) and children dressed in black play the role of last year’s widows and ask for money or candies to arrange for the dummy’s mock funeral. If the previous year was bad, people kick the dummies before they burn them. This is done in the hope that the coming year will be better than the old one; it’s also a way for people to let off steam. At midnight on New Year’s Eve people place the dummies outside their homes and set them on fire. When the dummies are consumed the new year has begun.

Fun Fact

Atahualpa was the 13th and last emperor of the Tahuantinsuyo, or Inca Empire.

Simón Bolívar

From the very beginning Simón Bolívar (1783–1830) dreamed of an independent South America. In 1819 he established an army of around 2,500 soldiers and planned an attack on the Spanish vice-royalty of New Granada, the present-day Colombia. Simón Bolívar fought back the Spanish and was instrumental in winning independence for Bolivia, Ecuador, Peru, and Venezuela. He became famous as the “Great Liberator.” He was also known as the George Washington of South America.

They coordinated this observance with the strike called by the U.S. labor union the American Federation of Labor demanding an eight-hour workday.

May Day is also a spring festival with indigenous as well as European roots. In pre-Columbian times, Ecuadorians celebrated this day as the Day of Fire. Emphasizing traditional May Day celebrations, Ecuadorians decorate their homes with flowers and foliage and celebrate with songs and dances in honor of the forest gods.

Carnival is the last chance to kick up one's heels with abandon before the austere 40-day Christian period known as Lent. Carnival begins around the second week of February, when big parties are organized in every region of Ecuador. This occasion celebrates the Resurrection of Jesus three days after his Crucifixion. Christians believe Jesus was the Son of God, and died on the Cross to redeem humanity from sin.

The English name for this celebration Easter was taken from the name of the pagan deity Eostre. According to the Venerable Bede, (672–735), a renowned Anglo-Saxon Christian scholar, Easter was named after Eostre (or Eastre), the Mother Goddess of the Saxon tribes of Northern Europe; she was also the goddess of fertility. After the harsh dreary winters of Northern Europe she brought the warmth of spring, fertility, and abundance. The ancient deities in all civilizations had patron animals, and the rabbit, an obvious symbol of fertility, is the companion animal of Eostre.

Christians attend special Easter church services and then spend the day with family and friends.

Rites of Passage

✿ BAPTISM

A Catholic priest baptizes a child by making the Sign of the Cross on the child's forehead and sprinkling holy water. After being baptized the infant is dressed in a loose-fitting gown and blessings are recited. The family hosts a feast to celebrate the occasion. Baptism is one of the all-important rituals required by the Catholic Church. It is a ritual cleansing of original sin and a welcoming of the infant into the fold of the church.

✿ MARRIAGE

Ecuadorians believe January, April, and August are the best months for getting married because the blood of young men and women is thought to be very fertile in these months. The role of the godparents and parents of the wedding couple is of great importance in Ecuadorian marriages. The bride and the groom enter the church with their respective parents. After parting from their parents the bride and groom come together at the altar. The wedding ceremony includes passages from the Bible that refer to the creation of life and formation of new relationships. It is traditional for the bride and groom to thank the guests. After exchanging the vows of marriage they seal them with a kiss.

✿ FUNERAL RITES

When a person dies the body is wrapped in cotton blankets and placed outside the home. The funeral rites last for several days and are accompanied by weeping, feasting, and drinking. During this time, the coffin of the dead person is left open, and family members hold all-night vigils with the body. The mourners are supposed to wash their hands with running water after the burial and before leaving the cemetery. Once the burial rites are completed the family members host a traditional meal with mourners bringing food as gifts.

Introduction

❁ HISTORY

Archaeological evidence suggests that Egypt was inhabited as early as 700,000 years ago. Today, Egypt is the second most populated country in Africa and combines a rich modern culture with strong roots in the ancient world. All over Egypt are temples, pyramids, statuary, and other religious art of the powerful and refined civilization that was ancient Egypt. A large majority of the population follows Islam, which was introduced by Muslim Arabs in the seventh century. In more recent times, Egypt witnessed the British occupation of Egypt in 1882, which was an effort to maintain control over the Suez Canal.

In 1798 the French, led by Napoleon Bonaparte (1769–1821), invaded and conquered northern Egypt. Soon after, the British sent their army, successfully capturing Egypt and ousting the French. During World War I the British, fearing that German forces might occupy the Suez Canal, declared Egypt a protectorate. During World War II the Germans invaded Egypt. The British, led by General (later Field Marshall) Bernard L. Montgomery (1887–1976), defeated the Germans, led by Field Marshal Erwin Rommel (nicknamed the “Desert Fox,” 1891–1944) in a fierce battle at El Alamein. Meanwhile, Egypt’s nationalism was steadily gaining ground and this eventually led to a revolution in 1952.

On July 23, 1952, the military, headed by General Muhammad Naguib (1901–84), seized power. In 1953 Egypt was declared a republic. Colonel Gamal Abdel Nasser (1918–70) emerged as a rival to Naguib, and in February 1954 Naguib resigned.

Egypt expanded economically in the 1950s and 1960s with the help of Soviet technical and economic aid. Nasser tried to make Egypt the undisputed leader of a united Arab world. His main rallying cry was the denunciation of Israel and a call to other Arab nations for a united front against a state he wished to see destroyed.

In the Suez War of 1956 Egypt fought and lost to an alliance of Israeli, French, and British troops. However, the British and the French were pressured to withdraw their troops by the United States, and the crisis forced the resignation of British Prime Minister Anthony Eden (1897–1977). Another interesting result of the war was that Nasser’s standing grew enormously in the Arab world, even though he lost the war. The crisis also speeded up the process of decolonization by Britain and France.

In 1967 the famous Six Day War occurred between Israel on the one side and Egypt, Syria, and Jordan on the other. As a result of its victory in that war Israel gained control over the Sinai Peninsula, the West Bank, the Golan Heights, and the Gaza Strip.

After Nasser's death in September 1970, then Vice President Anwar al-Sadat (1918–81) succeeded him as president. In 1972 Sadat ordered all Soviet military personnel stationed in Egypt to leave the country and placed Soviet bases and equipment under Egyptian control. In 1973 there was another war with Israel, dubbed the Yom Kippur War. Several years of diplomatic maneuvering resulted in a peace accord, signed in 1978 in Washington, D.C., largely brokered by the United States and referred to as the Camp David Accord, named for the presidential retreat in Maryland where much of the negotiating took place. The pact was denounced by other Arab states, and on October 6, 1981, President Sadat was assassinated by Muslim extremists.

He was succeeded by Vice President Hosni Mubarak (b. 1928). President Mubarak continued good relations with Israel and remained active in the Middle East peace process. In 1989 Israel returned the last portion of the Sinai that it held to Egypt. Relations with the rest of the Arab world have improved, and Egypt was readmitted into the Arab League in 1989.

❁ GEOGRAPHY AND CLIMATE

Located in northeastern Africa, Egypt is surrounded by Libya in the west, Sudan in the south, and Israel in the northeast. The country has shorelines on the Mediterranean Sea in the north and the Red Sea in the east. The region across the Suez Canal is the Sinai Peninsula. It is the only land bridge between Africa and Asia. Cairo, the capital of Egypt, is the largest city in Africa. The Sahara desert takes up a large part of Egypt. Summers are hot and dry while winters are moderate. The country is prone to droughts, frequent earthquakes, heavy dust, and sand storms.

The lifeline of Egypt, the river Nile, flows for 4,157 miles, meandering through nine countries: Tanzania, Kenya, Democratic Republic of the Congo, Burundi, Rwanda, Ethiopia, Uganda, the Sudan, and Egypt. The word Nile comes from the Greek word nehios, which means “river valley.” From time immemorial, the Nile has been associated with life and fertility. Egypt is appropriately called “the gift of the Nile.” Most of the country's population lives on the banks of the river.

❁ ECONOMY

Egypt's economy is largely dependent on agriculture, media, petroleum exports, and tourism. Approximately one-third of the population is engaged directly in farming, with many others involved with processing and delivery of agricultural

The Pharaohs of Ancient Egypt

In ancient times, the high priest of all temples was called pharaoh. He was the head of law and administration as well as the commander of the army. For the Egyptians, pharaohs were gods, and only pharaoh and priests were allowed to enter temples. The Egyptians believed that if they did not keep pharaoh happy, the crops and their very existence would suffer.

items. Much food is imported, however, and Egypt remains the largest market for wheat exports from the United States.

Egypt is a transit country for women and girls trafficked from Eastern Europe and Russia into Israel for sexual exploitation. Some victims, primarily from sub-Saharan Africa, may also transit Egypt en route to Europe. Some Egyptian males are smuggled into Europe and are reportedly subjected to involuntary servitude.

Although it has been considered a low-income country in the past, economic conditions are improving because of the government's economic reforms and liberal policies. Egypt's gross domestic product is second only to Saudi Arabia among Arab countries.

❁ CULTURE AND LIFESTYLE

About 90 percent of the population of Egypt is Sunni Muslim. Al-Azhar University, the oldest Islamic institution for higher studies, has scholars from every Muslim country on Earth. The rector of Al-Azhar is regarded as the world leader of the Sunni sect.

Although the official religion of Egypt is Islam, Christianity was the dominant faith before the introduction of Islam. Today Coptic Christians are the largest religious minority, and there have often been conflicts between the dominant Muslim community and the Coptic Christians. Egypt's population also includes small numbers of Roman Catholics, Greek and Armenian Orthodox Christians, as well as Protestants.

Coptic Christians

Coptic Christianity was established in Egypt by the apostle Mark in the middle of the first century. Most of the Coptic Christian population of the world is found in Egypt. The Coptic Orthodox Church is the national church of Egypt and is led by the pope of Alexandria, who resides in Cairo. The church runs a number of primary and secondary schools throughout Egypt. Traditionally the Coptic language was used in church services. More recently, preaching is in Arabic.

Painting, music, art, and literature are deeply embedded in Egyptian culture. The interiors of the pyramids (large mausoleums made of blocks of stone built to honor and house the mortal remains of the elite of ancient Egypt in their journey to the next world) were intricately painted. Belly dancing is another well-known product of the Egyptian culture.

Contemporary Egyptian painting reflects the influence of Western art. Western influence has also crept into Egyptian music in the form of pop music.

❁ CUISINE

Egyptian food tends to be simple and bland. Bread is eaten with all meals and the most common one resembles pita bread and is made of either white or whole wheat flour. The staple diet is fuul and taamiyya. Fuul (pronounced fool) is a white bean stew. Taamiyya is made with green beans, and is spicy and fried in oil.

It was eventually returned after a historic peace treaty, known as the Camp David Accord, was signed between Egypt and Israel in October 1978. This agreement is named after the American presidential retreat at Camp David, Maryland, near Washington, D.C. as a tribute to workers. In 1889 the Second International, a consortium of socialist organizations, declared May 1 a day to recognize the importance of workers around the world, and scheduled the first demonstrations and celebrations for the following year 1890. They coordinated this observance with the strike called by the U.S. labor union the American Federation of Labor (AFL), demanding an eight-hour workday. In Egypt government offices, businesses, and schools remain closed.

Religious Holidays

❁ CHRISTMAS

Observed by: Christians
Observed on: January 6–7

The majority of Christians in Egypt belong to the Coptic Orthodox Church. In Egypt, Christmas is celebrated on January 7 because the Coptic Church follows the Julian calendar, not the Gregorian calendar used by the Roman Catholic Church. It is a very special celebration in Egypt since the holy family, fearing King Herod's persecution after Jesus' birth, had fled to Egypt from Bethlehem and lived there with the infant Jesus for almost four years. Prior to Christmas Coptic Christians fast for 40 days. During this period, no meat, poultry, or dairy products are consumed.

On Christmas Eve people wear new clothes to attend church. In Cairo at Saint Mark's Cathedral, the pope of the Orthodox Church begins prayers at 11 P.M., which are broadcast on Egyptian TV. Later everyone returns home to eat a special meal, known as fata. On Christmas Day they visit friends and relatives and take a kind of shortbread called kaik to give to their friends.

❁ SHAM EL NESSIM

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: First Monday after Coptic Easter

Sham El Nessim falls on the first Monday after Coptic Easter and has been celebrated for more than 4,500 years. Sham El Nessim literally means "sniffing the breeze." Sham means "smell," and el nessim means "air." This day celebrates the start of the harvest season.

In ancient times, salted fish, lettuce, and green onions were offered to the gods to ensure a good harvest. In modern-day Egypt, traditional food is eaten to celebrate the day. People eat a variety of salted fish known as fiseekh. Eggs are dyed in bright colors and symbolize the renewal of life. People pack food and go for picnics to enjoy the spring.

Although it is not essentially a Muslim holiday, Muslims and Christians alike celebrate Sham El Nessim all over Egypt.

Synonymous with new clothes and gifts, this day is marked with visits to mosques and cemeteries. Traditionally children receive a small amount of money, known as eidyah, from their elders. People greet each other by saying, "Eid Mubarak," which means, "Have a blessed Eid." Egyptians illuminate lanterns and families get together for a traditional feast.

❁ EID AL-ADHA

Observed by: Muslims
Observed on: Tenth of Dhu al-Hijjah, the 12th month of the Islamic calendar

Eid al-Adha, the Festival of Sacrifice, commemorates the willingness of Ibrahim (Abraham) to sacrifice his son to on God's command. Just as Ibrahim was about to kill his son God substituted a ram for the boy. To commemorate that biblical event each family that can afford it sacrifices a goat or sheep and distributes a part of the meat to the poor. At this time of the year each Muslim is expected to make a pilgrimage, called the hajj, to Mecca. This is to be done at least once in a lifetime if it is both physically and financially feasible. At the end of the journey, after sacrificing a goat or sheep, the pilgrims have to shave their heads or cut off a lock. This time of the year is also considered an auspicious time for marriages.

Rites of Passage

✿ BIRTH

In Egypt, prior to the birth of a baby, the woman's family prepares clothes and essentials like soap and powder. All the items are put in silk bags along with gold and silver coins as gifts to be given at birth.

The Egyptians believe that the number seven is very lucky. The seventh day after the birth is called the sebou and is marked with special celebrations and rituals. The baby is washed and dressed in new clothes. A sheep or a lamb is slaughtered, and a grand feast is prepared. Salt is scattered in the house to keep the evil eye, bad spirits, and diseases away from the baby. The infant is placed in a cradle and carried around the house. The mother steps over the child seven times without touching it. Finally bags of sweets and gold and silver coins are distributed to the guests.

❁ COMING OF AGE

The ritual of genital cutting (female genital mutilation, FGM) in women, when they come of age, originated in Egypt more than 2,000 years ago. In some parts of Egypt this rite is still practiced among Muslims, who derived the practice from earlier times. FGM is practiced by both Muslims and Coptic Christians in Egypt, particularly in the southern part of the country. The girls who live in these societies do not have a choice and are forced to go through with the ritual. Fully 97 percent of the women in Egypt have been genitally mutilated.

A presidential decree in 1958 prohibited FGM, making it punishable by a fine and imprisonment. In July 1996 Health Minister Ismail Sallam banned all licensed health professionals from performing FGM, but in June 1997 an Egyptian court overturned the ban. In his decision Judge Abdul Aziz Hammade stated that FGM was a form of surgery that doctors have the legal right to perform without interference from ministerial bodies. The health minister and the head of Egypt's medical syndicate have appealed the court's decision, and the Sheikh of al-Azhar, the highest religious authority in the country, has declared his support for the ban. The health minister has announced that his July 1996 ban will remain in place until the appeal process is completed.

In ancient Egypt, young boys were circumcised between the ages of 6 and 12. This process involves cutting all or part of the foreskin of the penis. Today this ritual has deep religious significance for Muslims, symbolizing a boy's initiation into manhood. The circumcision is often performed at home by a trained professional and is an occasion for big parties.

❁ MARRIAGE

In Egypt, the engagement of a man and woman involves the exchanging of rings; the groom also gives other jewelry to his wife-to-be. An elaborate feast is held to celebrate the engagement. Between the time of the engagement and the wedding itself, the couple's families prepare a new home for the couple to live in once they are married.

The night before the wedding day is called the henna night. The women go to the bride's house and sing and dance, and the bride's hands and feet are decorated with henna. On the wedding day the marriage is registered by a maazon, a priest who has an official license to register the marriage contract. In the evening there is a grand party where the guests eat, sing, and dance. Later the bride and groom are taken to their new house, and green wheat is showered on them to symbolize fertility.

❁ DEATH

Ancient Egyptians believed in life after death. It was believed that, to enable the soul to pass into the next life, the body of the dead person must be preserved. This process of preservation was called mummification. In ancient Egypt a long, drawn-out ritual was followed to mummify the body of the dead.

This specialized embalming procedure usually took about 70 days. To begin the body was washed, and the hair was removed. The brains were also removed and thrown away. The body was then dried and wrapped in bandages. The mouth of the mummy was left open to enable the deceased to breathe and eat. Finally the body was perfumed, and the head was stuffed with sawdust. Artificial eyes were inserted. After elaborate religious rituals the mummified body was placed in a coffin made of reeds then put in a tomb made of bricks and wood with the name of the deceased inscribed on it. The interiors of the tombs were painted with elaborate inscriptions describing food, drink, and other essentials that the person might need in the next life.

Naturally these rituals could end up costing quite a bit of money, and only the wealthiest citizens and royalty could afford the most costly procedures. Common folk made due with much more modest ceremonies.

In modern Egypt, the more simple Muslim burial practices prevail. The body is washed, clothed in special garments, and buried.

Introduction

✿ HISTORY

Before the Spanish conquest El Salvador was home to the Pipils, speakers of a dialect of Nahuatl, whose heritage is a mix of several cultural and language groups joined by conquest and later by culture. The earliest, a nomadic people, arrived in Central America about 3000 B.C.E.

They were influenced by the Mayans, who controlled this area until the ninth century, although this mixed culture was not as complex as that found in Mexico and Guatemala. Another nomadic group the Izalco Pipil, who were related to the Toltecs and the Aztecs, may have moved into this part of Mesoamerica in the 10th century, situating themselves in what is now called El Salvador. Their stories and archaeological excavations indicate that this group may have moved south, fleeing conflict in the Toltec Empire. These later immigrants developed a nation known as Cuzcatlán (“Land of Jewels”), incorporating some Mayan speakers peacefully as a result of trade.

The first Spanish attempt to colonize El Salvador in 1524 failed when Pedro de Alvarado (1495–1541) was forced to flee. In 1525 his second effort succeeded, and Spanish rule was established in this part of Latin America. The Spaniards called the land El Salvador (“the savior”), believing that the gold they found would increase their resources and fortunes. Unfortunately gold proved not to be as plentiful as they had hoped, and panning for it (a method of extraction from riverbeds) proved time-consuming.

The agriculture and economy of El Salvador flourished over the next two centuries. Although gold prospecting had proved futile, landowners realized the value of plantation farming and Spanish settlers seized most of the land. Local rebels were enslaved and forced to work in the fields with the African slaves.

By the late 17th century, however, Spain’s power began to diminish, and the 18th and 19th centuries saw a further decline in its powers. Napoleon’s (1769–1821) conquest of the Iberian

Xipe Totec

The Aztec god of agriculture and the changing seasons, especially springtime, Xipe Totec embodied the cycle of death and rebirth. Central to his cult was the notion that the outer “husk,” or skin, must be removed in order for the inner substance to grow. Just as a shoot of corn springs up from the kernel once its hard outer shell splits and falls away, Xipe Totec was believed to flay himself so that the people might have food. After his skin was removed he became a shining, golden god. In order to replicate this divine miracle of growth every spring his priests offered human sacrifices to him, ensuring a bountiful harvest. The people sacrificed were flayed alive, and their skins were worn by the priests in later rituals. These sacrifices symbolized the Earth’s regeneration and the development of new life.

The cult of Xipe Totec and its sacrificial rituals is similar to the European cult of the Corn God, who must be sacrificed every spring to ensure rebirth and the fertility of the land and its people. Xipe Totec’s name means, “Our Lord, the Flayed One.”

Peninsula (Spain and Portugal) in 1808 gave the people of El Salvador an opportunity to gain their freedom. Salvadorans proclaimed independence in 1811, only to be crushed by the troops dispatched by the viceroyalty of Guatemala. Not until 10 years later in 1821 did El Salvador and the other Central American provinces finally gain their independence from Spain. After a brief period of annexation to the Mexican Empire from 1822 to 1823 under Emperor Agustín de Iturbide (1783–1824), the United Provinces of Central America was formed under General Manuel José Arce (1786–1847). This federation was dissolved in 1838, and El Salvador became an independent republic.

Frequent revolutions disturbed El Salvador’s early history as an independent. The presidents drawn from the military remained sympathetic to the conditions of the underclass, but reforms were repeatedly thwarted by opposition from the wealthier citizens. At the same time there were attempts to form a Central American union, but none succeeded.

In the 20th century, there was less civil unrest, and the years from 1900 to 1930 were relatively stable. The Depression of 1931–32 was a harsh time and led to further political upheavals. General Maximiliano Hernández Martínez (1882–1966) enjoyed the longest presidency (1932–45).

Martínez was anticommunist, as evidenced by his handling of Farabundo Martí’s rebellion.

In 1932 the Marxist Augustín Farabundo Martí (1893–1932) led a rebellion that the armed forces ruthlessly crushed. The troops’ actions were severe enough to be termed la matanza, “the massacre.” Thirty thousand were killed, and Martí was executed by firing squad. Thereafter the military controlled El Salvador’s politics. This was a period of guided reforms. During World War II Martínez aligned the country with the Allies.

In July 1969 El Salvador invaded Honduras in the short Football War, and the two countries clashed again in 1976. The period that followed, lasting until 1992, was one dominated by civil war and human rights abuses. Finally the Peace Agreement between the government and the rebels in 1992 ended the civil war. The agreement was signed as part of the Chapultepec Peace Accords in Mexico and allowed the guerillas to form a political party and participate in the electoral process. The military was reined in and barred from civilian action. In 1993 investigations by the Truth Commission under UN auspices recommended the removal of human rights violators from political and military posts and the institution of judicial reforms. Amnesty was granted to certain offenders and a land-transfer program was initiated. Soldiers and former guerillas both benefited from this process.

❁ GEOGRAPHY AND CLIMATE

El Salvador is the smallest Central American country and the only one without a Caribbean coastline. Two parallel mountain ranges run east to west, dividing the country into two regions: mountains and the central plateau, and coastal plains (Pacific lowlands). The southern mountain range is made up of more than 20 volcanoes. Eruptions are rare, but earthquakes are frequent because of the range’s location at the juncture of three geologic plates. Río Lempa is the only navigable river. There are numerous volcanic lakes in the interior highlands.

The climate is tropical with pronounced wet and dry seasons; the rainy season (winter) lasts from May to October, while the dry season (summer) lasts from November through April. Temperatures vary according to elevation but change little from season to sea-

Fun Fact

Evidence of an Olmec presence in the region from at least 2000 B.C.E. exists in what is known as the Olmec Boulder, a stone sculpture of a giant head found near Chalchuapa in western El Salvador.

United Provinces of Central America

The United Provinces of Central America was formed in 1823. This federation was composed of Guatemala, El Salvador, Honduras, Nicaragua, and Costa Rica. Los Altos joined the federation in the 1830s.

The Football War

The Football War (or Soccer War), which took place in 1969, lasted only 100 hours. El Salvador and Honduras were playing a two-leg qualifying round for the 1970 Football World Cup and accused one another of ill-treating visiting supporters. The underlying cause was land reform in Honduras, which distributed land to Honduran peasants at the expense of some 300,000 Salvadoran peasants who had illegally immigrated to Honduras in search of farm land. The mass return of the Salvadoran peasants caused tremendous social and political upheaval in El Salvador. On July 14, 1969, the Salvadoran Army launched an offensive against Honduras. The Organization of American States (OAS) negotiated a cease-fire and Salvadoran troops withdrew in early August. The two nations signed a peace treaty on October 30, 1980, requiring them to put their dispute before the International Court of Justice.

son. While the Pacific lowlands are uniformly hot, the central plateau and mountain areas are relatively moderate. The country has many beautiful natural features; the most remarkable is the Montecristo Cloud Forest, part of the Parque Nacional Montecristo on the border shared with Guatemala and Honduras, where toucans, pumas, rare spider monkeys, two-fingered anteaters, and striped owls dwell.

ECONOMY

The Salvadoran economy has been growing at a steady, moderate pace since the signing of the Peace Agreement in 1992, which ushered in an environment of improved investor confidence and increased foreign investment. El Salvador has initiated a series of free-market policies, including the privatization of the banking system, telecommunications, public pensions, electrical distribution and some electrical generation, reduction of import duties, elimination of price controls, and enhancing the investment climate through measures such as improved enforcement of intellectual property rights.

One of the biggest challenges in El Salvador has been to offset the decline in the coffee sector—once the backbone of the economy—and to develop a more diversified economy. Another serious obstacle El Salvador must deal with is the trafficking of women and children for sexual exploitation in other countries as well as a source country for forced labor.

CULTURE AND LIFESTYLE

El Salvador's population is predominantly Roman Catholic although Salvadoran culture is a synthesis of Catholic and indigenous traditions. During the long war with Honduras, the government targeted the church for violence because it sympathized with the poor, which was equated with supporting communism as well. Many abandoned Catholicism as a result and Protestantism, especially its evangelistic sects, provided welcome alternatives. Spanish is the national language and, although indigenous languages are no longer in daily use, there is some academic interest in preserving the Pipils' Nahuatl language.

Although most of the music heard on Salvadoran radio is standard pop fare from the United States, Mexico, or other countries in Latin America, a small underground movement exists—canción popular (“folk music”)—which focuses on current events in El Salvador. El Salvador's artistic sensibilities are also evident during religious and public festivals when the plazas are filled with dancers and the streets with floats and parades, musicians, and street artists; clowns and crowds alike are garbed in festive colors.

Poetry is also popular, and well-known Salvadoran writers include Manlio Argueta (b. 1935) and leftist poet Roque Dalton (1935–75). La Palma is famous for the school of art established by Fernando Llorca (b. 1949). The town of Ilobasco is known for its ceramics, while the textile arts produced in San Sebastián are much sought after.

CUISINE

The most common and distinctive Salvadoran food is the pupusa, a thick corn tortilla filled with soft, white cheese or refried beans. The people consume rice and beans, which when “wedded” together are called casamiento (“marriage”), and enjoy such regional dishes as chicharrones (chunks of fried pork fat). El Salvador's location on the Pacific Ocean also provides a great deal of fresh seafood, including oysters and clams. Like residents of many Pacific nations, Salvadorans often prefer to prepare their fish as seviche, a dish in which the fish is prepared by marinating it in lime juice and spices.

Licudados (fruit drinks), coffee (for which the country is justly well known), and gaseosas (“soft drinks”) are ubiquitous. Tic-Tack and Torito are vodka-like spirits made from sugarcane and should be avoided by those who wish to keep their stomach lining.

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: December 31–January 1

New Year's Eve is an international holiday marking the end of one year and the beginning of the new. In El Salvador much of the emphasis is on preparations for the New Year's parties and entertainment that will continue into the next day. New Year's Eve welcomes the coming year even as it marks the end of a

✿ LABOR DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: May 1

International Labor Day, also called Workers' Day and May Day, acknowledges the vital role and contributions of workers across the world. The Labor Day celebration has a tenuous U.S. origin but is associated more prominently with international socialism. The first Labor Day occurred in 1890, established in 1889 by the Second International to coincide with a general strike in the United States to win the eight-hour workday. Since then International Labor Day has always been more radical than the U.S. observance in early September. In El Salvador trade unions organize a parade in recognition of the day. Government and public enterprises, along with schools and many businesses, remain closed.

✿ INDEPENDENCE DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: September 15

Independence Day in El Salvador is marked by military parades and joyful public celebrations. El Salvador officially won its independence on September 15, 1821, after three centuries of Spanish rule. The country's liberation was eventually made possible by a series of rebellions and the gradual weakening of Spain. Napoleon's conquest of the Iberian Peninsula signaled the collapse of the Spanish Empire and Spain soon lost El Salvador, Guatemala, Costa Rica, and Nicaragua.

At 7:00 A.M. on September 15 students and musical bands commence their march into the capital city of San Salvador. Students dress in blue and white uniforms representing the colors of the national flag. Special ceremonies are also held at the square, Plaza Libertadad, in downtown San Salvador. Various public events display the nations' traditional music and dances such as the merengue and salsa.

✿ COLUMBUS DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: October 12

Columbus Day (also called Discovery of America Day) celebrates the arrival in the Americas by Christopher Columbus. In El Salvador there are huge celebrations including fairs and festivals held in coordination with local churches. This day is also called Day of Indigenous and Aboriginal Races. In the late 20th century there was a reexamination of the Europeans' abuses of the native peoples of the Americas, and celebrations in recent years have acknowledged the contributions of these people and their suffering under European domination. In recognition of this exhibitions of indigenous popular art, music, and rural life are also held on this day.

✿ FIRST CRY OF INDEPENDENCE

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: November 5

On November 5, 1811, in the capital city of San Salvador, José Matías Delgado (1768–1833, founder of the Central American Nations) vigorously demanded independence from Spanish rule. This is known as the First Cry of Independence. El Salvadorans pay homage to this great freedom fighter and also remember other patriots who were involved in the struggle for freedom.

The currency of El Salvador is the colón, named after Cristóbal Colón (Christopher Columbus).

In the Old Testament ashes were found to have been used for two purposes: as a sign of humility and mortality and as a sign of sorrow and repentance for sins. The day is commemorated with religious services.

HOLY WEEK

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: Last week of Lent

Holy Week is the week preceding Easter Sunday. Beginning with Palm Sunday, the week is one of contemplation of the last week of Jesus' life on Earth. Maundy Thursday, Good Friday, and Holy Saturday are the three important days observed before Easter. During this period across El Salvador there are religious processions in which people hold aloft images of Jesus carrying the cross. There are also parades featuring colorful floats. People participate in Masses and religious services, which are held each day during this week. On Good Friday the city streets are closed to traffic and street artists re-create religious scenes on the pavements and the roads, using dyed sawdust, colored salt, and flowers. The celebrations come to a close with the special Mass and procession on Easter Sunday.

EASTER

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: First Sunday after Lent

For Christians, Easter is considered the most important Christian festival, and its numerous celebrations and observances form the core of the liturgical year, which begins around the time of the vernal equinox in the Northern Hemisphere (the autumnal equinox in the Southern Hemisphere) and stretches out into summer in the northern hemisphere (winter in the Southern Hemisphere). This occasion celebrates the resurrection of Jesus three days after his Crucifixion. Christians believe Jesus was the son of God, and died on the Cross to redeem humanity from sin. After rising from the dead, Jesus traveled in various parts of the Holy Land for 40 days before ascending to heaven. Worship services begin before daybreak. Parades and feasts are held across the country.

FEAST OF SAN SALVADOR

Observed by: Roman Catholics

Observed on: First week of August (3 Days)

The first week of August is devoted to the celebration of Jesus, the country's patron, El Salvador del Mundo (Savior of the World). A life-size image of Jesus is taken around the local Catholic churches in the weeks before the ritual of La Bajada is performed. On the day of La Bajada there is an early morning Mass, after which the image is taken to a public place or city square. The ritual of La Bajada is then performed. This involves the lowering of the icon into a giant globe. While the icon's dark purple robes are removed inside the globe, the raucous crowd grows silent and reflective. After several minutes, the Jesus figure is slowly lifted out again in glistening white robes (symbolic of the transfiguration). A crest of El Salvador is embroidered at the base of his robe. The spectators shout, "Viva El Salvador!" (with its double meaning), and applaud as the figure rises. The liveliest celebrations are held in San Salvador, the capital city, replete with fairs, carnival rides, food, soccer games, and a display of fireworks.

ALL SOULS' DAY

Observed by: Roman Catholics

Observed on: November 2

All Souls' Day, also called Memorial Day or Day of the Dead, is a Catholic festival in remembrance of family and friends who have departed from this world. This is a day steeped in antiquity: Seventh-century monks observed a remembrance and mass for dead monks of their order. It also has its roots in the pagan belief that dead family members return for a meal. Salvadorans visit local cemeteries to pray for their ancestors, and flowers and cypress wreaths are placed on the graves of loved ones. On All Souls' Eve candles in glass lanterns are placed around the graves or at the base of tombstones. The mood on this occasion is somber and people eat tamales, chicken or pork (sweet or salty), and sliced pumpkin cooked with brown sugar.

VIRGEN DE GUADALUPE

Observed by: Roman Catholics

Observed on: December 12

The Virgen de Guadalupe is an aspect of the Virgin Mary regarded as the patron of the Americas. The celebration harks back to a divine phenomenon that occurred in Mexico. The Virgin appeared to Juan Diego, a baptized Indian, on December 9, 1531, on Tepeyac hill. The beautiful dark-skinned lady revealed herself as the Virgin Mary and called him "my son." She asked that the bishop be told to build a church on the site. Diego approached the bishop and was asked for evidence of his incredible report. Diego saw the Virgin again on December 12 on the same hill and was asked to take roses from the barren hill as proof. When Diego returned to the bishop and let the roses slip from his cloak, the Virgin's image was imprinted on the fabric. The cloak is preserved at the Basilica of Guadalupe and has remained intact.

El Salvador, like other Latin American countries, celebrates this miracle with processions, prayers, dances, and fireworks. At some churches, worshippers maintain a vigil by arriving at the church at 3 A.M. and waiting for the church to open at 4 A.M. As part of the service the priest recounts the miraculous events surrounding this day. Other names for this celebration are Day of our Lady of Guadalupe and Fiesta of the Virgin of Guadalupe.

❁ CHRISTMAS

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: December 24–25

Christmas Eve, the evening before Christmas day, is a remnant of the ancient custom of calculating a new day from sunset rather than midnight. Christmas therefore used to begin on Christmas Eve. In El Salvador celebrations begin for Catholics after Midnight Mass (Misa del Gallo). Children celebrate with fireworks and await the arrival of Santa Claus, who brings them presents. A majority of Salvadoran homes have an ornately decorated Christmas tree and a miniature nativity scene accompanied by scenes of ancient Bethlehem. The day is one of family gatherings and traditional dinners. There are church services, traditional Christmas songs, and poetry readings. The Christmas tree is the center of the festivities.

San Miguel's Carnival (El Carnaval de San Miguel) is one of the biggest annual celebrations in the city of San Miguel. The city is brightly lit up for the Carnival and hosts myriad dances and games, while the marimba bands have people dancing in the main streets. A number of food stalls serve a wide range of dishes. Rites of Passage

❁ MARRIAGE

As in many other Latin American countries, marriage as a religious or civil ceremony was not prevalent in El Salvador in colonial times. Persistent poverty was probably the reason for this situation. Many Salvadoran couples, especially in rural areas, lived together in common-law or free unions. Women headed many families, and many children were born out of wedlock.

The modern Salvadoran wedding ceremony begins without the bride. The groom and the guests wait for her during the service. As soon as the wedding service starts a group of seven men leaves in seven white cars for the bride's home, where the bride is waiting for them with her family. The bride is then escorted to the church. Nuptial songs are played when she enters the church. After the marriage ceremony a small party is organized.

❁ DEATH

Salvadorans observe the Catholic Novena for nine days of mourning. According to Catholic tradition nine is the number most closely associated with grief. Friends and relatives gather at the home of the deceased for these days, and a feast is arranged on the ninth day.

Introduction

✿ HISTORY

It is thought that the Pygmies, hunter-gatherers of the equatorial rain forests, were the first inhabitants of the area now occupied by Equatorial Guinea. In the 17th century C.E. the Bantu tribes migrated into the region from the southern parts of Africa, and tribal warfare began between the indigenous Pygmies and the Bantu-speaking tribes. The Pygmies were unable to stand up to the might of the Bantus and were forced into the northern parts of the region. Today only a small number of Pygmies live in the forest regions of Equatorial Guinea.

The Bantu migrations brought the coastal tribes, sometimes called playeros, who came from the northeast and the Fang to the region. The Fang, in turn, may have produced the Bubi, who emigrated to Bioko from Cameroon and the Río Muni region of Equatorial Guinea in several waves and supplanted former neolithic populations.

Fernando Pó (fl. 15th c.), a Portuguese explorer, was the first European to set foot in the region, and he paved the way for European domination. He landed on what is now Bioko Island in 1472, while seeking new routes to India. Enchanted by its beauty he named the island Floro Formosa, which means “pretty flower.” The island was later renamed for its discoverer and came to be known as Fernando Pó Island.

By 1474 the island of Fernando Pó and neighboring Annobon island were controlled by the Portuguese, who established a colony in the region. In 1778 the Portuguese entered into the Treaty of Pardo with Spain, which required Portugal to hand over the administration of Fernando Pó Island, its adjacent islets, and commercial rights to the mainland between the Niger and Ogooué Rivers to Spain in exchange for certain South American territories. Thus began an era of Spanish domination in the region.

Spain's control remained intact until 1827, when the British, seeking to combat the slave trade, began to establish bases here between 1827 and 1843. Río Muni was declared a British Protectorate in 1843. This led to frequent skirmishes between the Spanish and the British armies over ownership of the mainland. In 1900 the Treaty of Paris resolved these disagreements, and Río Muni became a British colony while Spain was granted administrative control over the mainland territories.

Between 1926 and 1959 all the Spanish territories in the region were united, and the colony was collectively called Spanish Guinea. During their colonial reign the Spanish employed a large number of Nigerian laborers to work on the cocoa plantations, which formed the basis of the economy. They also built schools and encouraged education, so that, at one time Spanish Guinea had the highest literacy rate in this part of Africa.

In 1959 the Gulf of Guinea became part of Spain, and its name was changed to the Spanish Equatorial Region. A governor-general with both civilian and military authority was appointed. Local elections in the Spanish Equatorial Region took place that year, and the Equatoguinean representatives won seats in the Spanish Parliament. The two provinces into which the region was divided were granted limited autonomy under the Basic Law of December 1963. The region was renamed Equatorial Guinea, and, although the country was still ruled by the governor-general, the Equatorial Guinean General Assembly had the right to formulate laws and regulations.

The people of the region wanted complete independence, however, and protested against Spain's reluctance to grant the country autonomy. After mounting pressure from the UN and widespread anti-Spanish protests in the region, Spain relented and announced its decision to grant full independent status to Equatorial Guinea. Under the watchful eyes of UN observers, a public referendum was held in Equatorial Guinea on August 11, 1968, and its citizens voted unanimously in favor of a constitution that would establish a government led by a president who, in turn, would appoint the judges of the Supreme Court. Francisco Macías Nguema (1924–79) was sworn in as the first president of Equatorial Guinea in September 1968. Complete independent status was granted by Spain on October 12, 1968.

In July 1970 Macías declared the country a one-party state and abrogated key portions of the constitution in 1971. In 1972 he went a step further and declared himself president for life, establishing total control over the government. The Macías regime unleashed an era of terror in Equatorial Guinea, and more than one-third of the country's population was either killed or exiled. Education suffered as Macías ordered the closure of all schools in 1975. Religion was suppressed, and all of Equatorial Guinea's churches were closed by 1978. Obsessed by his theory of "authenticity," which involved replacing colonial names with native names, Macías began by changing his own name from Francisco Macías Nguema to Masie Ngueme Biyogo. His name itself underwent subsequent transformations; by the end of his rule, he was called Masie Nguema Biyogo N'egue Ndong. Under his rule the island of Fernando Pó was renamed Macías Nguema Biyogo, Annabolo Island was renamed Pagalu, and the capital of Santa Isabel became Malabo. He ordered the entire population to follow his example and drop their European names in favor of native ones.

Growing discontent among the people, however, began to manifest itself in protests and demonstrations. Finally in August 1979 Teodoro Obiang Nguema Mbasogo (b. 1942), Macías's nephew, led a coup against him, and Macías was tried and then executed for his crimes. Obiang assumed presidency of Equatorial Guinea in October 1979. The original names of the islands of Bioko (also Bioco) and Annobolo were restored.

Although Obiang continued as president in the early years of the 21st century as the result of successive electoral victories, outside observers see these elections as flawed. Locally, there have been occasional boycotts by opposition parties such as the Union Popular (UP) and the Convergence for Social Democracy (CPDS).

In March 2004 the government discovered a plot to overthrow the Obiang administration. Mark Thatcher (b. 1953), the only son of former British Prime Minister Margaret Thatcher (b. 1925), was arrested in South Africa for his alleged role in the plot. Obiang, who may be suffering from prostate cancer, has no obvious successor, a situation that has started a political struggle within the Equatoguinean elite.

In 2004 in the course of its investigation into Riggs Bank, based in Washington, D.C., where most of Equatorial

Fun Fact

The Pygmies, among the oldest cultures in some regions of Africa, are renowned for the sheer complexity of their vocal music, which is characterized by density, counterpoint, communalism, and improvisation. It has been noted that the level of polyphonic complexity typical of Pygmy music was not reached until the 14th century C.E. in Europe.

Fun Fact

Equatorial Guinea is the only country in the world that has bestowed the status of god on its presidents. In 2003 the national radio of Equatorial Guinea announced that President Obiang is a god "in permanent contact with the Almighty" and can "kill anyone without being called to account."

Guinea's oil revenues were paid, the U.S. Senate found that at least $35 million of those revenues had been siphoned off by Obiang, his family, and several senior officials in his regime. Obiang has denied any wrongdoing. In 2005 Riggs Bank paid $9 million to Chile as restitution for helping Augusto Pinochet conceal government funds; but no restitution has been made to Equatorial Guinea.

❁ GEOGRAPHY AND CLIMATE

Located in Western Africa, Equatorial Guinea is made up of two provinces: Bioko Island is located in the Bight of Biafra (the eastern bay of the Gulf of Guinea) and lies off the coast of Cameroon in North Africa, while the mainland area of Río Muni is flanked by Gabon in the south and east and Cameroon in the north.

Bioko Island has three extinct volcanoes and rich fertile volcanic soil, providing the perfect environment for the growth of vines and a wide variety of trees. Farmers spend most of their time trying to prevent the vines from encroaching on their cocoa plantations. The mainland region of Río Muni, also has thick vegetation, and its forested region is home to walnut and African mahogany trees. Equatorial Guinea is home to a wide variety of wild animals such as elephants, lions, and gazelle (antelope).

The three main rivers in the region are: the Río Campo (which forms the northern boundary), the Mbini River (which flows through the central parts), and Río Muni (a part of the southern boundary). The coastal plains of Río Muni have a number of valleys, which are separated by the scattered hills of the Crystal Mountains. The Mbini River (formerly Río Benito) divides the region into two roughly equal parts.

Equatorial Guinea has a tropical climate characterized by extremely hot temperatures and humidity. While it rains heavily on Bioko Island, mainland Río Muni is somewhat drier. The annual mean temperature is 81°F.

❁ ECONOMY

When Equatorial Guinea became independent, its citizens were among the most prosperous and well-educated in Africa. When the Spanish were in power they imported Nigerian labor to develop large cocoa plantations, and used the trade revenue to build an impressive system of schools and hospitals. However the repressive Macías regime decimated the country's infrastructure through pilferage, ignorance, and neglect. Approximately 60,000 Nigerian laborers left en masse in 1976, along with most other foreigners and skilled citizens, so that the country's economy collapsed.

Compounding the workforce problems is the fact that Equatorial Guinea is a transit and destination country for women and children trafficked for the purposes of sexual exploitation, involuntary domestic servitude, and other forced labor. Women and children are brought into the country from West and Central Africa, principally neighboring Cameroon, Nigeria, and Benin. Women are trafficked for commercial sexual exploitation in Malabo, where demand is high due to the booming oil sector.

Currently agriculture is still the primary occupation, employing more than half the population, in spite of the fact that the neglect of the rural economy under successive oppressive regimes has diminished the possibility of agricultural growth. Fishing is also carried out extensively in the coastal areas. The recent discovery and exploitation of large oil reserves in the equatorial region, however, may provide a much-needed boost to the economy, but government and military officials and their families own most of the country's businesses. Financial aid and concessions provided by the International Monetary Fund and World Bank were discontinued in 1993, after reports of financial mismanagement and corruption emerged. The 2004 Riggs Bank Scandal, which involved the bank's conspiracy in an embezzlement by Obiang, has not improved the prospects for Equatorial Guinea's economic future.

❁ CULTURE AND LIFESTYLE

In Equatorial Guinea the Bantu-speaking Fang are the dominant ethnic group. Among the Fang sorcerers are important members of the community, and the power of black magic is both feared and respected. Special ceremonies take place within the community to ward off the evil eye. One of the prominent ceremonies is the abira, which is performed to purge evil from the community.

The coastal areas are inhabited by the playeros, or "beach dwellers," peoples with a long history of intermarriage with Europeans.

The Bubi are the native inhabitants of Bioko Island; after the arrival of the Europeans their population dwindled considerably. The region is also home to the Fernandos, descendants of slaves freed by the British in the 19th century. Although Spanish is an official language of Equatorial Guinea the Fang and the Bubi prefer speaking their own languages.

Almost 85 percent of the country's population is Roman Catholic, while 15 percent adhere to traditional animist beliefs.

Polygamy is the norm and in the case of divorce, the laws of inheritance favor men. Limited educational opportunities are provided for women, and they are not encouraged to pursue higher education at all.

Equatorial Guinea has a rich cultural heritage, and song and dance are especially important. The balele (a passionate dance) and ibanga (a suggestive dance) are popular and are usually performed during cultural feasts and on special holidays. Dancing is accompanied by an orchestra of three musicians, who typically play the xylophone, drums, sanzas (a small thumb piano made from bamboo), and bow harps.

The traditional folklore of the Fang is called mvvet, which is named after the guitarlike instrument of the same name played by Fang balladeers as they recite the legends of their people. Wooden trumpets, xylophones, and drums also feature in the mvvet (a name given to both the folklore and the musical instrument).

❁ CUISINE

Traditional Fang cuisine features gari (flour made from cassava, or manioc), which is cooked into a thick porridge and served with a spicy sauce made out of insects (such as caterpillars), leaves, and crushed gourd seeds. Mushrooms, snails, yams, and plantains are also familiar culinary ingredients. Skewered and cooked beef and chicken are commonly served with rice and a spicy sauce.

Palm wine, beer, and sugarcane juice are the favorite beverages, and many Equatorial Guineans brew their own palm wine and millet beer.

Palm Wine

Palm wine is made from palm sap. The sap is not heated but is stored in plastic containers and left to ferment naturally. Fermentation usually occurs within two or three hours after the sap is collected, making the alcohol content very high. Using various processing methods the wine is extracted from the sap and stored either for personal or commercial use.

❁ AFRICA DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: May 25

Africa Day, also called Organization of African Unity (OAU) Day, commemorates the decision of 32 nations to form a united Africa. In the Ethiopian capital of Addis Ababa these countries came together in 1963 and the Organization of African Unity (OAU) was formed. This day marks their commitment to foster a spirit of camaraderie, working together for the overall development and betterment of the continent. The idea to form a unified African organization was the brainchild of the then president of the independent state of Ghana Kwame Nkrumah and the Emperor Haile Selassie of Ethiopia.

The OAU works to promote peace, human rights, and unity among all African nations.

At present there are 53 member nations in the OAU, which has been instrumental in ending colonial rule in Africa as well as playing a key role in resolving regional disputes, internal conflicts, and wars.

Africa Day is a national holiday in Equatorial Guinea, and all public and private institutions are closed. Seminars and conferences are held to discuss the major issues confronting the continent.

❁ PRESIDENT'S DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: June 5

In Equatorial Guinea June 5 celebrates the birth of the president of the nation Teodoro Obiang Nguema Mbasogo. Born on June 5, 1942, Obiang is the nephew of the former president, Francisco Macías Nguema. He started his career in the military after attending prestigious colleges in Spain. He earned the rank of lieutenant after his uncle became president. After widespread protest against the oppressive regime of Macías, Obiang led a successful coup d'état on August 3, 1979, ousting his uncle. He was hailed as a national hero.

In honor of the president's birthday, June 5 has been declared a national holiday in Equatorial Guinea. A big birthday party, with an array of cultural programs and a lavish feast, is thrown in the president's honor. All public and private institutions remain closed on this day.

ARMED FORCES DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: August 3

Armed Forces Day commemorates the historic coup d'état led by Teodoro Obiang Nguema Mbasogo against the oppressive regime of his uncle, the president of the Republic Francisco Macias Nguema. This day also pays tribute to the armed forces of the country (army, navy, and air force) and honors and recognizes the achievements of the military. Armed Forces Day celebrations are presided over by the president, and military parades are the central event of the day. The military strength of the nation is showcased through army drills and display of weapons.

CONSTITUTION DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: August 15

Constitution Day commemorates the adoption of a constitution by the Republic of Equatorial Guinea. On August 15, 1982, the Republic of Equatorial Guinea adopted a new constitution, drafted with the help of the UN Commission on Human Rights. It declared that the republic is a one-party state in which the president is to be elected for a period of seven years; legislators remain in office for five years. The people of Equatorial Guinea voted in favor of the constitution, and the government adopted it in 1982. Another constitution, allowing a multiparty system, was enacted by national referendum on November 17, 1991, and then amended in 1995. However the 1982 constitution is still celebrated as an important step toward democracy. Since this is a national holiday all government and private institutions are closed on August 15.

INDEPENDENCE DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: October 12

The Republic of Equatorial Guinea was granted its independence in 1968 by Spain. Since 1472 Equatorial Guinea had been ruled by one European power after another. From 1472 until 1778 the Portuguese controlled the region. Then in 1778 they handed it over to Spain, beginning the era of Spanish dominance over Equatorial Guinea, which lasted almost 190 years.

The local residents expressed their unhappiness over Spanish rule, and voices of dissent took the form of nationwide demonstrations and protests. In order to pacify these protestors limited autonomy was given to the region by the Basic Law of 1963. This move however failed to appease the protestors, who intensified their agitation. The international community also took notice of the situation and began pressuring Spain to end its colonial rule.

Spain relented under pressure, and on October 12, 1968, the Republic of New Guinea came into existence. Francisco Macías Nguema became the first president of the independent nation.

Independence celebrations in Equatorial Guinea are presided over by the president and are marked by official speeches that pay tribute to those who died for the cause of freedom, military parades, and receptions for foreign guests, as well as dance and musical performances.

For Christians Easter is considered the most important Christian festival, and its numerous celebrations and observances form the core of the liturgical year, which begins around the time of the vernal equinox in the Northern Hemisphere (the autumnal equinox in the Southern Hemisphere) and stretches out into summer in the Northern Hemisphere (winter in the Southern Hemisphere). This occasion celebrates the Resurrection of Jesus three days after his Crucifixion. Christians believe Jesus was the Son of God, and died on the Cross to redeem humanity from sin. Easter celebrations fall on the first Sunday following the 40-day observance of Lent. In Equatorial Guinea devout Catholics attend special church services on this day.

CHRISTMAS

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: December 24–25

Christmas celebrates the birth of Jesus. In Equatorial Guinea Christians begin Christmas shopping well in advance of the day. They buy gifts and new clothes and adorn their homes with lights, balloons, and ribbons.

On Christmas Eve, a festive spirit prevails. Devout Catholics attend a special Christmas Eve Mass where church choirs sing Christmas carols. After church people sing and dance through the night.

On Christmas Day people visit friends and family and exchange gifts and greetings. Music and dance performances are also part of Christmas celebrations. On Bioko Island, a version of the traditional balele dance (a passionate Fang traditional dance) is performed during Christmas festivities.

❁ DEATH

Among the Bubi when people are on their deathbed, their friends and relatives surround them in silence. After the person dies the women leave the house and mourn outside. A group of relatives wash the body and prepare the deceased for burial. Another group proceeds to the cemetery to dig the grave. The Bubi believe in burying the dead as quickly as possible.

Burial Practices among the Bubi

The Bubi believe that after death the soul follows the body of the person during the funeral procession. By carrying the body to the cemetery on an abandoned road, they believe that the soul will feel disoriented and frightened and so will not dare return to the village.

In ancient times the Bubi also believed that, after the burial, the soul would roam around the village and torment its inhabitants. When the funeral procession passed through the main road of the village, all the villagers closed their doors and windows to prevent the soul from entering their homes.

Introduction

✿ HISTORY

Along with the other countries in the Horn of Africa, Eritrea (official name, Hagere Ertra) forms part of the mythical "Land of Punt" or the "Land of Gods," of whose existence the Egyptian pharaohs spoke around 2900 B.C.E. Since ancient times, Eritrea has been known for trading in gold, frankincense, ivory, ebony, and slaves. The Pygmies of central Africa are the first known inhabitants, with a history in Eritrea dating back to around 8000 B.C.E. Eritrea got its present official name only after Italians arrived in the 19th century.

Eritrea had seen many wars since it came into existence, and had already changed hands several times when it became an Italian colony in 1885. As a colony Eritrea was the jewel of the Italian Empire, and Asmara, the capital, was thought to be among the finest cities of Africa, known for its art deco, modernist, and futurist architecture.

When the Italians left in 1945 the country came under British control. In 1952 following World War II the United Nations inadvertently gave Eritrea to Ethiopia as part of a federation. As a result of the UN decision the people of Eritrea began a long struggle for independence from this imposed government. Ethiopian Emperor Haile Selassie (1892–1975) triggered a 32-year-long armed conflict by openly initiating war against Eritrea in 1962.

The referendum of 1993 brought with it independence for Eritrea after an exhausting battle, by which much of its economic, social, and political life was adversely affected. Even after the war, unequal trade terms, coupled with Ethiopian access to Eritrean ports, jeopardized their relations. Hostility between these two countries has continued to simmer in the early years of the 21st century, and UN security forces, trying to maintain peace between them, patrol the border area.

President Isaias Afewerki (b. 1945) of the People's Front for Democracy and Justice (PFDJ) has ruled the country since

The Dahlak Archipelago

During Ethiopian rule the Dahlak Archipelago was made into a national park. A group of Eritrean freedom fighters took part in diving operations here against the Ethiopians during the war of independence. The feats of these freedom fighters account for Eritrea's diving industry today. The largest island in the archipelago, called Dahlak Kebir, was used as a military base by the Ethiopians.

In addition to sailing, scuba diving, and pearl fishing, tourists come to this island to see the ancient Arab inscriptions, Islamic and Turkish ruins, quaint Afar fishing villages, and massive cisterns. A major feature of the island's history is that it was an infamous channel for exporting slaves from the mainland to Arabia. Another island, called Nacura (situated to the west of Dahlak Kebir), was used for confining prisoners during colonial (especially Italian) rule.

1993. His is the only party allowed to operate. The president has been criticized for not bringing about democratic reforms and an end to censorship in Eritrea. Eritrea currently ranks 163 out of the 167 countries in terms of freedom of the press.

GEOGRAPHY AND CLIMATE

Eritrea can essentially be divided into three geographical zones: the dry desertlike eastern strip (including Denakil Desert, the most inhospitable region on Earth), the fertile central highlands, which receive 24 inches of annual rainfall, and the semi-arid western lowlands. The Anseba and the Barka Rivers run through the northern portion of Eritrea, and the Gash and Tekeze Rivers flow over the Ethiopian border into the Sudan. Amba Soira Mountain, rising to approximately 9,902 feet, is the highest point in Eritrea.

The upper portion of the Gash River is called the Mareb, and Eritrea was often referred to as Mareb Mellash, which means "this side of the Mareb River," and Bahrmeder ("Sealand"). In fact Eritrea derives its name from Mare Erythrean, the ancient Greek cartographic designation for the Red Sea. The 19th-century Italian colonizers made this name official.

The central part of Eritrea has cool temperatures that average about 64°F; the western zone has moderate temperatures of about 86°F, while the temperatures on the eastern strip can reach a blistering 122°F.

Retaining the entire coastline alongside the Red Sea was a very important point in the 1993 referendum in which Eritrea gained its freedom from Ethiopia. There are more than 200 islands in the Red Sea comprising the Dahlak Archipelago, and these became part of Eritrea after its independence.

The lowest point of Eritrea (246 feet below sea level) is called Kobar Sink; it lies in the Denakil Depression. In the Kobar Sink temperatures can get as high as 122°F, and during most years there is little rainfall. Being close to the Great Rift Valley the land has been stretched at this place, and lava oozes from below to solidify it. Although some water does seep in from above, it evaporates as steam due to the high temperatures.

ECONOMY

Historically agriculture has dominated the plateau regions of Eritrea, where rainfall is sufficient, whereas raising livestock has been the major activity on the drier eastern coastal strip. At the time of the 1952 federation, when Eritrea was entrusted to Ethiopia by the United Nations, Eritrea was more developed industrially than Ethiopia. In fact the Italians and the British colonizers had set up Eritrea to produce raw materials for export. But the nation's annexation later caused the shutting down of most Eritrean industries, some of which were moved to Ethiopia.

After 1974 Ethiopia's government placed Eritrea's industries under state control. Private enterprise was discouraged, even though economic pressures mounted as the result of continuous conflicts, famine, and drought. By the time Eritrea won independence in 1993 its economy had already been devastated, and its resources plundered, leaving 75 percent of the population dependent on external aid for food. Promoting self-sufficiency and economic reconstruction became the most important agenda for the post-independence government.

The 1998–2000 war between Ethiopia and Eritrea cost the latter's economy dearly. Social problems such as unemployment, illiteracy, and low skills are widespread; private enterprise is being encouraged to promote economic growth. However, Presi-

During the Eritrean War of Independence, fully functional sauna rooms were discovered on Nokra Island in the Dahlak Archipelago. These were used by Russian officers (the Russians were allies of Ethiopia), despite the scorching heat.

How Asmara Got Its Name

The origins of the name Asmara (the capital city of Eritrea) are 700 years old and not Italian as most would presume. It is said that four clans inhabited the Kebessa Plateau: the Geza Shelele, the Geza Gurtom, the Geza Asmae, and the Geza Serenser. These four groups unified (at their wives' suggestion) to defeat the preying bandits in that area, thus evolved the name Arbaete Asmara, which literally means, "the four are united" in the Tirigrinyan language.

dent Afewerki has received criticism for not implementing democratic reforms.

CULTURE AND LIFESTYLE

In spite of being an interesting mix of cultures, religions, and languages that can lead to some ethnic friction, the Eritreans have continued to stand by each other during their ongoing struggle against Ethiopia. About half the population is Christian and the other half Muslim, though most fall into distinct ethnic and linguistic categories. There are nine major ethnic groups in Eritrea and three distinct linguistic families—the Cushitic (Hamitic), the Semitic, the Nilotic. The Cushitic-speaking groups are the Sahos (of the eastern part), Bejas (of the western part), and Afars (of the southern tip). A small group of Kunamas, of Nilotic origin, remain in the province of Gash-Setit, and they have held onto their traditional religious beliefs, which involve venerating their ancestors and worshipping their creator god, Anna.

The Semitic languages are the most widespread languages spoken, especially Tigre (25 percent of the population) and Tirigrigna (50 percent of the population). The two best-known Nilotic languages—Kunama and Baria—are spoken in the lowland areas between the Setit and the Gash rivers.

Afar, Tigre, Kunama, Tirigrigna, and Arabic are the most common languages spoken by the people. English is used in schools, from high school on.

Ancient Geez is the basis of another language that is unique to Eritrea. The Eritrean Orthodox Church is its custodian and continues to use Geez in its services.

As a place of rich cultural diversity the capital of Asmara boasts three major landmarks: the Al Khulafa Al Rashiudin Mosque, the Nda Mariam Orthodox Church, and St. Joseph's Catholic cathedral. The tall gothic bell of the cathedral tower in Asmara is used by people to find their way in case they get lost in the city.

The National Museum has exhibits of inscribed tombstones from the Dahlak Islands and artifacts (from excavations), in addition to other objects of local interest. There is also quite a lot of dance, music, and theater activity in the city.

The annual Festival Eritrea is celebrated on the Expo grounds of Asmara in late August. On this occasion the diverse ethnic groups converge in one place for concerts, trade fairs, and conferences.

CUISINE

Despite the varied species of fish found in the Red Sea and an abundance of lobster, shrimp, oysters, and crabs, Eritreans are traditionally meat-eaters. Two popular meat dishes are tibsi, fried meat with garlic and onions, and kai wat, meat in a highly spiced sauce. The staple food items are kitcha and injera. Both are kinds of pancakes prepared differently and using different ingredients. Injera is usually eaten with a stew called zigni, prepared from anything easily available (meat, eggs, or vegetables) in a spicy tomato sauce, which has the required portions of berebere (a mix of various spices and seeds crushed for flavor and added to most dishes for taste). Eritreans who cannot afford meat often eat injera with shiro, chickpea porridge, instead.

Vegetables, fruit, cereals, and peanuts are abundant owing to the vast stretches of fertile land in parts of Eritrea. Desserts are not included in the traditional Eritrean cuisine.

Eritreans eat with their fingers. Food is placed on a large plate on a low table. Eating begins after the woman of the house brings a basin for hand washing.

Fun Fact

The ancient Geez (or Giiz) language and script are thought to have developed in the Ethiopian Highlands as a peasant language, although the origins of both remain controversial. The Ethiopian imperial court later adopted it. Now Geez is the language used for services in the Eritrean Orthodox Church and the Ethiopian Orthodox Tewahedo Church as well.

Fun Fact

The staple food in Ethiopia, injera, is a giant pancake made from various grains (such as maize or teff). It is spongier than kitcha, another kind of pancake, and takes between two and three days to prepare. The dough, which is fermented and later baked or fried, is eaten with zigni (a spicy stew).

struggle for independence from Ethiopia and celebrates the country's independence. The day brings with it new hope for future prosperity and the promise of a self-sufficient nation.

❁ INTERNATIONAL WOMEN'S DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: March 8

In 1993 the year of independence the women of Eritrea were granted legal rights unheard of in most countries in sub-Saharan Africa. These rights include the right to get a divorce, take custody of their children, own property, and hold 30 percent of the seats in the parliament. The power they achieved is quite exceptional and is frequently cited in women's studies programs in the United States and Europe.

The year 2005 marked the 25th anniversary of NUEW (National Union of Eritrean Women). On International Women's Day that organization, along with the UNMEE (UN Mission in Ethiopia and Eritrea) organizes lectures and public meetings in the capital city Asmara, stressing the strength of Eritrean women and the need for their further empowerment. A delegation of members of these organizations visits villages to spread awareness about International Women's Day. Statistics on the state of women in Eritrea, as well as the future roles women can expect play, are provided by these organizations.

National Anthem of Eritrea

The barbarian enemy humiliatingly defeated,
And martyrdom has paid for freedom.

Decades of devotion for purpose,
Your name became challenger, miraculous

Ertra, comfort for the oppressed,
Proved that truth can win after all.

Ertra, Ertra,

A sovereign state on Earth after all.

Dedication that led to liberation

❁ INDEPENDENCE DAY

Official independence was achieved in 1993, when 99.8 percent of the population voted yes to liberation from the Ethiopia. Independence Day, or Liberation Day, is celebrated all over the country with

The festive mood is reflected by plays, music, and dances (relating to the freedom struggle), while the city is covered with posters and signs celebrating the country's hard-earned freedom.

MARTYRS' DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: June 20

Martyrs' Day is celebrated to honor the 65,000 martyrs who lost their lives fighting for the liberation of Eritrea between 1973 and 1993. The day was first observed two days after a peace accord between Ethiopia and Eritrea was signed after the 1998 war. There are official ceremonies to commemorate the dead patriots.

BEGINNING OF THE ARMED UPRISING

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: September 1

Fun Fact

The Julian calendar, in addition to the standard 12 months, also has a 13th month, called Pagume.

This holiday commemorates the first time that Eritreans were armed and united in a confrontation with Ethiopia. In response to a show of unity and strength by Eritrea, Ethiopians declared war on Eritrea in 1962 and tried to seize it completely. Those Eritreans supporting independence, both inside and outside the country, united to form the first organized military division called the ELF (Eritrean Liberation Front).

EID AL-ADHA

Observed by: Muslims

Observed on: Tenth of Dhu al-Hijjah, the 12th month of the Islamic calendar

This Muslim holiday, also called the Feast of Sacrifice, celebrates the patriarch (Ibrahim's) Abraham's absolute devotion and faith in God, evidenced by his willingness to sacrifice his young son because God commanded him to do so. Prior to this festival devout Muslims who are physically and financially capable of doing so undertake a hajj, or pilgrimage, to Mecca, the central city of the Islamic faith. A hajj is required by the Koran and the fifth pillar of Islam.

CHRISTMAS

Celebrated by: Christians

Observed on: January 6–7

Christmas celebrates the birth of Jesus. The Roman Catholic Church observes Christmas on December 25 because Pope Julius I (r. 337–52), who based it on the Gregorian calendar, fixed that date in 320. However, the Coptic Orthodox Church observes it on January 7 because its liturgical dates are calculated using the Julian calendar. Prior to Christmas, which is called Leddet in Eritrea, Coptic Christians fast for 40 days. They call this period Little Lent to distinguish it from the fast of Great Lent before Easter. During Little Lent, no meat, poultry, or dairy products can be consumed.

EPIPHANY

Celebrated by: Christians

Observed on: January 19

The roots of this observance can be traced back to the Eastern Christian Churches, and it is an important observance in Eritrea. According to the Bible three Magi (Wise Men), named Melchior, Caspar, and Balthazar, spotted a bright star in the skies on the night Jesus was born. They followed the star to Bethlehem, found the infant Jesus there, and presented the divine child with gold, frankincense, and myrrh. On the eve of Epiphany, also called Timket ("baptism") in Eritrea, Orthodox Christians assemble outdoors and participate in colorful religious processions. There is drumming and singing while they parade behind the priest to the river. Here the faithful immerse themselves, reenacting Jesus' baptism. Epiphany is usually celebrated on the 19th except leap years, when it is celebrated on the 20th.

EASTER

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: First Sunday after Lent

For Christians Easter is considered the most important Christian festival, and its numerous related celebrations and observances form the core of the liturgical year, which begins around the time of the vernal equinox in the Northern Hemisphere (the autumnal equinox in the Southern Hemisphere) and stretches out into summer in the Northern Hemisphere (winter in the Southern Hemisphere). This occasion celebrates the Resurrection of Jesus three days after his Crucifixion. Christians believe Jesus was the Son of God, and died on the Cross to redeem humanity from sin. Apart from its religious aspect the Resurrection symbolizes the resurgence of hope and a fresh lease on life for all human beings. It occurs at the end of the 40-day abstinence period of Lent, and celebrates Jesus' Resurrection. Orthodox Christian Eritreans call it Tensae, and the devout follow a vegan diet during Lent.

❁ MOULOU

Observed by: Muslims

Observed on: Twelfth of Rabbi al-Awwal, the third month of the Islamic calendar

Mouloud marks the birth of Muhammad and is a joyous holiday for all Muslims, with the exception of conservative sects, who believe that observing anyone's birth (even Muhammad's) diverts one from focusing on the worship due to Allah. In Eritrea people go to the mosque to remember Muhammad's life and teachings. Afterward there are parties and feasting.

❁ ORTHODOX NEW YEAR'S EVE/DAY

Observed by: Orthodox Christians

Observed on: September 11

The Orthodox New Year's Day Meskerem 1, also called Keddus Yohannes, is celebrated in accordance with the Julian calendar.

Many Eritreans attend church on New Year's Eve. In addition to church services, Eritreans celebrate the new year with family get-togethers. Torches, or boyona boye, made of dried leaves and tall, thick sticks, are set afire in front of homes, while the old and young sing. Girls go through neighborhoods singing New Year's songs; they are rewarded with gifts of food and money. Boys welcome the new year by visiting neighborhoods and wishing families a happy and prosperous new year. Like the girls they are given food and money for their efforts.

❁ MESKEL

Observed by: Orthodox Christians

Observed on: September 27

Meskel, or Mashkela, commemorates the discovery (according to Orthodox Christians) of the true Cross (the one on which Jesus was crucified). Villagers carry torches to a clearing outside their village and prepare bonfires, then the celebrations begin with singing and dancing around the bonfires.

Priests in full ceremonial dress are in attendance. They bless a cloth, then drape it over the woodpile (damera) before it is set on fire. It is considered a bad omen if the damera doesn't fall toward the east as it burns. Once the fire goes out the ashes are used to make the Sign of the Cross on people's foreheads.

❁ EID AL-FITR

Observed by: Muslims

Observed on: First of Shawwal, the 10th month of the Islamic calendar

Ramadan is considered the holiest month of the Islamic calendar. It was during this month that Muhammad observed austerity and fasted for 40 days, after which the Koran was revealed to him. Eid al-Fitr, one of two Islamic Eid festivals, celebrates the end of the month-long fast that devout Muslims observe from dawn to dusk during Ramadan. Muslim Eritreans celebrate with morning prayers at mosques, followed by social visits, exchanges of greetings and gifts, and feasting to end the period of fasting.

Observed on: Mid-February

Operation Fenkil was a crucial military and psychological watershed event in Eritrea's struggle against Ethiopia. It was in 1990 that Massawa, Eritrea's main port on the Red Sea, was liberated under Operation Fenkil. Once the EPLF (Eritrean People's Liberation Front) had freed this port city, driving the Ethiopians out of the country suddenly became a possibility.

Featured events on this day are literary contests and sports competitions, including soccer matches and camel and cycling races.

❁ FESTIVAL ERITREA

Observed in: Asmara

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: Ten days bridging the last week of August and the first week of September

Festival Eritrea is an annual event, which is held by the government of Eritrea in Asmara to showcase the art, culture, and traditions of all the ethnic groups of Eritrea. The event helps foster a spirit of unity among the populace and reflects their cultural diversity. It also serves as a foundation for economic growth.

This event provides a platform to pass on the rich cultural heritage to the next generation, thereby serving as a cultural investment. A host of cultural activities, music and dance performances, exhibits, and literary events are featured. Neighboring countries are invited to participate in the festivities and share their cultures. In exchange, versions of Festival Eritrea are held in other countries to create interest in, and familiarize people with, Eritrean culture.

Rites of Passage

❁ COMING OF AGE

For Eritrean women what is euphemistically called circumcision (now called Female Genital Mutilation [FGM]) takes place at one or two months of age.

FGM is carried out by almost all ethnic groups in Eritrea, and it is estimated that 90 percent of the women must live with its consequences. No law specifically prohibits FGM. Prior to winning independence from Ethiopia in 1991, the Eritrean People's Liberation Front (EPLF) undertook abolition campaigns in areas under its control with the stated aim of discontinuing the practice.

Men are also circumcised in Eritrea at a young age but without the damaging consequences of what is inflicted on girls and women.

❁ MARRIAGE

If you are a foreigner visiting Eritrea, and you happen to come across a wedding ceremony in progress, you'll be welcomed to join in and made the guest of honor. Marriages are occasions when anyone who happens to pass by gets invited to the celebration. Bands playing loudly add to the festivities. Everyone feasts on injera, "good food," and suwa, "drink," but the best part of the celebration is eating the sumptuous wedding cake.

Introduction

❁ HISTORY

Not much is known about the ancient history of Estonia, but archaeological evidence suggests that humans began to move into the region as the ice from the last glacial era withdrew 11,000 to 13,000 years ago. The oldest settlement in Estonia, established around 7500 B.C.E., was located on the Pärnu River, near the present town of Sindi. Around 3000 or 2000, Finno-Ugric hunters arrived in Estonia from southeastern parts of Europe and established settlements. They spoke a Finno-Ugric language (which is related to Estonian, Finnish, and Hungarian) that belongs to the Uralic language family (languages spoken in the region along the Ural Mountains).

By the first century Estonians had organized themselves into small male-dominated agrarian tribal clans. There were frequent skirmishes over regional dominance between Estonian tribes and neighboring Latvian tribes.

Until the 12th century Estonians had kept Christian Crusaders at bay and held strongly to their pagan beliefs. In 1193 at the instance of Pope Celestine III (r. 1191–98), Christians launched Crusades against the northern European pagans.

In 1217 German Crusaders launched an attack on Latvia and, after establishing their control over the region and forcing many Latvian tribes to accept Christianity literally at the point of a sword, they began raiding the northern parts of Estonia with the assistance of Latvian tribes, who were the Estonian's archrivals.

Estonians fiercely resisted these attacks. Many tribes joined forces under the leadership of the renowned Estonian commander Lembitu (d. 1217) and launched counterattacks on Latvian territories. However in the Battle of St. Matthew's Day (September 21, 1217), fought between German Crusaders and Estonian forces, Lembitu was killed. By 1219 Danish Crusaders, led by the king of Denmark Waldemar II (1170–1241) established control over northern Estonia. By 1227 the last of the Estonian tribes was defeated by the Crusaders, and Denmark and Germanic tribes colonized Estonia. Estonians were forced to embrace Christianity and were made to work as laborers. Although there were frequent raids by Russian Impe-

Fun Fact

While it is commonly believed that the word pagan refers to witchcraft and satanic practices, it is derived from the Late Latin paganus, “civilian” and means “peasant” or “country dweller.” It acquired its negative connotations as justifications for the Crusades and the Inquisitorial witch hunts that followed.

rial forces, the Germanic tribes and Denmark maintained control of the region.

In 1558 Russia invaded Estonia and established its rule over a considerable part of the country. This sparked the Livonian Wars that were fought between Russia and the kingdoms of Poland, Denmark, and Sweden. Eventually in 1561 Sweden took control of northern Estonia and by 1582–83 the southern parts of Estonia had surrendered to Poland. However Sweden invaded the Estonian territories under Danish and Polish control and by 1625 had established control over all of Estonia.

In 1725 during the Great Northern War Russia reclaimed Estonia and established its control over the region again.

In 1819 Russia abolished serfdom (bonded laborers) in Estonia, and the peasants were given ownership of their lands. Also under Russian rule Estonians came together as one people and began rediscovering their cultural roots. The Estonian language was adopted as the language of instruction in schools, and cultural festivals were held on a regular basis starting in 1869. At the beginning of the 20th century Estonians began voicing their demand for independence from Russian rule.

After World War I and the collapse of Imperial Russia in 1918 the Russian Provisional Government decided to give autonomous status to Estonia. As a result Estonians elected leaders to the Maapäev (political assembly of leaders), but due to opposition by some extremists in the region, they were forced to go underground.

On February 24, 1918, the Maapäev declared Estonia’s independence from Russia. Just one day later, however, on February 25 German forces invaded Estonia. They remained in the region until the defeat of Germany at the end of World War I in November 1918. As the German forces withdrew from Estonia, Russian forces declared war on the country and tried to reclaim the region, but Estonian forces held their ground. On February 2, 1920, a peace treaty was signed between Russia and the Republic of Estonia whereby the Soviet Union (Russia) relinquished all claims over Estonia and recognized its independent status.

In 1920 Estonia adopted its first constitution and a parliamentary form of government. Members were elected to the parliament (Riigikogu) for a period of three years. However in 1934 Prime Minister Konstatin Päts (1874–1956), an Estonian freedom fighter, established an authoritarian regime in the country; in 1938 he assumed the office of the president of the Republic of Estonia.

During World War II Germany and the Soviet Union signed the infamous Molotov-Ribbentrop Nonaggression Pact of August 23, 1939, which allowed the Soviets to occupy Estonia (along with Latvia, Finland, and then Lithuania) in exchange for Nazi Germany’s assumption of control over Poland. An Estonian Socialist Republic dominated by the Soviet Union was proclaimed on July 21, 1940, just a month after Soviet troops began their occupation of Estonia. However Hitler’s Nazi forces violated the nonaggression pact and invaded Russian territories, including Estonia. Russia then declared war on Germany and joined forces with the Allied powers. For its part Estonia largely supported Germany, and so many Estonian ports, harbors, and cities were bombarded by the Allied forces.

After the defeat of Nazi Germany in World War II Russia reclaimed Estonia and maintained a firm grip over the country until the disintegration of the Soviet Union in 1991.

In 1981 the Estonian Communist Party (ECP), which enjoyed the support of the Soviet government, made Russian the official language in Estonian schools. This caused grave concern among Estonians for the survival of their own language, as well as their cultural identity. Estonians began voicing their concerns, and many political parties emerged during this period to bring these issues to the notice of the Soviet government. Eventually Estonians began protesting against Soviet forces and demand total independence. The Supreme Soviet of Estonia, the governing body of Estonia, declared Estonia’s sovereignty on November 16, 1988, and with the approval of the USSR granted official status to the Estonian language.

After the August 1991 coup in the USSR, which saw the ouster of Soviet President Mikhail Gorbachev (b. 1931), Estonia quickly seized the opportunity and declared its independence from the Great Northern War (1700–21)

The Great Northern War was actually a series of wars fought between two factions: the kingdom of Sweden on one side and the kingdoms of Russia, Denmark-Norway, and Saxony-Poland on the other. After the Swedish invasion of Estonian territories, which had been held by Poland and Denmark, the Polish and Danish forces joined with archrival Russia to defeat Sweden. In 1700 the Russian coalition launched an attack on the Swedish forces in the Baltic region. This marked the beginning of a series of wars fought over a period of 21 years.

Eventually in 1721, after suffering resounding defeats on various battlefronts, the Swedish forces surrendered to the coalition and ended the Great Northern War by signing the Treaty of Nystad and a number of other treaties, known as the Stockholm treaties. At the end of the war the Russian Empire assumed the role of the dominant power in the Baltic region.

USSR on August 20, 1991. Russian Federation forces, however, remained in Estonia until August 31, 1994, when they withdrew and recognized the independent status of Estonia in response to mounting international pressure.

Since 1991 Estonia has had 11 governments and 7 prime ministers and is still struggling to maintain political stability. In 2004 Estonia became a member of the European Union (EU) and the North Atlantic Treaty Organization (NATO).

❁ GEOGRAPHY AND CLIMATE

The Republic of Estonia is located in eastern Europe and is flanked by the Gulf of Finland to the north, Russia to the east, Latvia to the south, and the Baltic Sea and the Gulf of Riga to the west. The islands of Saaremaa and Hiiumaa are the largest among Estonia's more than 1,500 islands.

Topographically Estonia's land is mostly flat. The highest point of Estonia is Suur Munamagi, which is 1,043 feet high and located in the southeastern part of the country. The country has more than 1,400 lakes, the biggest of which is Lake Peipsi, which is also the fourth largest European lake, with an area of 2,175 square miles.

The climate here is temperate and is characterized by wet, moderate winters and warm summers, with occasional showers. The annual average temperature of Estonia is 42°F, with an average winter temperature of 23°F, and an average summer temperature of 62°F.

❁ ECONOMY

Until 1998, Estonia's economy was heavily dependent on trade with Russia, and the Russian financial crisis of 1998 had a severe impact on the nation's economy. In 1999 Estonia joined the World Trade Organization (WTO), and with the help of progrowth policies and economic reforms it successfully revived its failing economy. Privatization of telecommunications, railways, energy, and other public sectors, increasing foreign investments, shifting of routine operations of Scandinavian countries to Estonia, as well as the use of Estonian ports by Russian oil companies as a transit point, all have made Estonia one of the strongest economies among the new countries that have joined the EU.

❁ CULTURE AND LIFESTYLE

Estonia has a rich cultural heritage. More than 65 percent of the country's population consists of native Estonians, while the country is also home to Russians, Finns, Belarusians, and Ukrainians. Estonian is the official language.

The Estonian culture is reflected in its folklore and folk songs, which have been carefully preserved for centuries. The songs, verses, and chants are about love, life, myths, seasonal changes, farming, and harvests and touch every aspect of traditional Estonian life. Rhythmic verses, known as regivarss, are extremely popular. The peculiar aspect of most Estonian folk songs is that they repeat particular lines several times, though with slight variations in the theme. The fiddle, accordion, and concertina (a free-reed instrument with features similar to an accordion) are the musical instruments widely used in Estonia.

The island of Saaremaa is known for its sculptures, many of which depict the daily life of peasants in ancient Estonia.

Estonians adhere to different denominations of Christianity, including Evangelical Lutheran, Russian Orthodox, Estonian Orthodox, Baptist, Methodist, Seventh-day Adventist, Roman Catholic, Pentecostal, and Word of Life. Some ancient equinoctial heathen (pagan) traditions are still held in high regard, and the summer equinox (Jaanipäev) is a time of great celebration and festivities. Among neopagans the ancient deity Taara (related to the Norse god Thor) is again being worshipped. Estonia is also home to about 3,000 Jews, although as a result of Hitler's "final plan" few Jews survived the Holocaust of World War II, from a prewar population of about 6,000.

❁ CUISINE

Pork, garden vegetables (beans, peas, carrots), and potatoes form the core of a traditional Estonian meal. Delicacies include smoked fish and suitsukala (trout). During the Christmas season restaurants serve a variety of sausage made from the fresh blood of pigs. Verevorst (blood sausages) and vere pannkoogid (blood pancakes) are also served across Estonia.

In Estonia preferred beverages include hoogvein (mulled wine), Saare beer and Saku beer (varieties of strong and light beers made on the Estonian island of Saaremaa), tea, and coffee.

Fun Fact

In 2004 Estonia became one of the first countries in the world to adopt a flat-rate tax system. Citizens have to pay income tax at a flat rate of 26 percent regardless of their income.

Taara

Tharapita, also called Taara, Tooru, or Uku, the Estonian god of war, was the supreme deity of the Oeselians, who inhabited the island of Saaremaa. Tharapita and the names of related Finno-Ugric deities are thought to be derived from a proto-Finno-Ugric word that meant "high." The English word Thursday means "Thor's day," and medieval Estonians did not work on Thursdays. Thursday nights were called "evenings of Tooru," when Estonians gathered in sacred woods to dance and sing until dawn. Tharapita has also inspired an Estonian neopagan movement, known as taaralased or taaraulised, and Tartu, Estonia's second largest city, was named for their god of war.

❁ NEW YEAR'S EVE/DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: December 31–January 1

The first day of the Western (Gregorian) calendar, January 1, is celebrated as New Year's Day throughout the world. In Estonia a festive atmosphere envelops the nation as people attend parties on New Year's Eve and dance and sing into the new year. In many parts of Estonia people celebrate New Year's Day by sharing jokes and fortune-telling.

❁ INDEPENDENCE DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: February 24

On February 24, 1918, Estonia declared its independence from Russia. Estonia had been under Russian domination since 1721, and starting in the late 19th century there had been a growing demand for independence. Although the Russian forces were far more powerful than the Estonians, the Russian Empire collapsed during World War I, and Estonians seized the opportunity to declare independence.

Shortly after the declaration Estonia was invaded by Germany, and it had to fight twin enemies—Baltic-Germans as well as the Soviet forces. The German threat was crushed in 1919, and on February 2, 1920, a peace treaty was signed between the Soviet Union and the Republic of Estonia. In accordance with the treaty the Soviet Union relinquished its rights over Estonian territory and recognized Estonia's independence.

Celebrations are held in different parts of Estonia to commemorate this day. In the capital of Tallinn the president of the republic presides over the Independence Day celebrations, which are marked by official speeches, military parades, and a host of cultural activities. The unsung heroes of the country's freedom struggle are remembered, and their lives and legacy are celebrated.

❁ LABOR DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: May 1

The earliest origins of celebrations on May 1 are ascribed to pagan festivities that were practiced by farmers, peasants, and villagers in Europe well before the Middle Ages, hence the alternate names May Day and Spring Day.

May 1 came to be known as Labor Day or Workers' Day after the date was selected by the international socialist movement in 1889 for a demonstration. It was organized to coincide with the 1890 strike called by the U.S. labor union the American Federation of Labor (AFL), demanding an eight-hour workday. Because of its socialist origins this was a very important holiday in the former Soviet Union and its satellite republics, of which Estonia was one.

In Estonia May 1 is a public holiday and all public and private institutions are closed.

❁ VICTORY DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: June 23

Victory Day, also called Day of Remembrance, commemorates the historic victory of Estonian forces during the War of Independence. They defeated the Baltic-German armed forces in the Battle of Valnna (Cëssis) on June 23, 1919, and eliminated the Baltic-German threat to establish control over Estonia.

On this day Estonians pay tribute to those freedom fighters who died to regain Estonia's independence and celebrate the Estonian tradition of fighting for freedom and democracy.

On the night of June 22 a victory flame is lit at the ancient Kloodi Pahnimae settlement in Rakvere. On June 23 in Rakvere people gather at the War of Independence Monument and place floral tributes in memory of the freedom fighters. Then they attend a special memorial. The president of the republic presides over Victory Day ceremonies, which include military parades. The victory flame then begins its journey to other parts of Estonia.

❁ MIDSUMMER'S DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: June 24

Midsummer's Day commemorates the summer solstice, the longest day of the year, which occurs on June 21 or 22. It marks the end of the sowing season and the beginning of the haymaking season. This festival originated in pre-Christian times when people believed that the forces of good and evil gather in the darkness on this night. Many people also practiced magic on Midsummer's Day.

Many Estonians gather certain herbs, believed to have magical properties, on this day. In the evening they assemble in open fields and light bonfires. The victory flame lit by the president during the Victory Day celebrations travels to different parts of the country and is used to light huge bonfires during midsummer celebrations.

It is an Estonian belief that the flames of the bonfires have a purifying effect and help ward off evil. In villages people dance and sing around the bonfires. Also in many parts of the country, small bonfires are lit and people jump over them to ensure a good harvest and avoid bad luck in the coming year.

Fun Fact

With written records of more than 133,000 folk songs, Estonia has one of the biggest collections of folk songs in the world.

St. John's Day, the Catholic feast day of John the Baptist, is also observed on June 24; it was superimposed on Midsummer's Day, and the bonfires were renamed St. John's Fires.

❁ INDEPENDENCE RESTORATION DAY

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: August 20

In accordance with the nonaggression pact of 1939 Germany recognized Soviet authority over Estonia. In 1940 Soviet forces invaded the country and established control over the region, thus ending the nation's independent status. However in 1941 Germany violated the nonaggression pact and invaded Estonia. In retaliation the Soviet Union joined the Allied powers and declared war on Germany. Initially Estonians greeted German forces warmly, hoping to restore their independence. It soon became clear, however, that Nazi Germany had no intention of granting independence to the nation.

When the Soviet forces helped defeat Germany in 1944, they reclaimed Estonia. The Soviets maintained a firm grip on Estonia until the disintegration of the USSR in 1991. Throughout the period of Soviet dominance the call for independence persisted throughout Estonia, and anti-Soviet guerilla forces were the face of the violent resistance to Soviet occupation.

On August 20, 1991, independence in the Republic of Estonia was restored, and many countries around the globe gave recognition to Estonia's independence.

Religious Holidays

❁ GOOD FRIDAY

Observed by: Christians
Observed on: Friday before Easter

The Christian holiday of Good Friday commemorates the Crucifixion of Jesus. A somber occasion, it falls on the Friday before Easter and is the last Friday of Lent (an austere season of fasting and penitence). Some devout Christians, especially Roman Catholics and members of Orthodox Churches, observe a fast during Lent (the 40 days before Good Friday). However many Christians fast only on Ash Wednesday (the first day of Lent) and Good Friday. In Estonia devout Christians attend special Good Friday prayer services and also listen to readings of Gospels that narrate Jesus' final moments before the Crucifixion.

❁ EASTER

Observed by: Christians
Observed on: First Sunday after Lent

Easter is a Christian feast that celebrates Jesus' Resurrection from the dead three days after his Crucifixion. It falls on the first Sunday after the month of Lent. The origin of Easter celebrations can be traced back as far as the end of the first century C.E. The word Easter is derived from the name of the Germanic Goddess Eostre, or Eastre. She was the revered mother goddess of the Saxon people of northern Europe.

In Estonia devout Christians attend special Easter services on this day. Among Russian Christians in Estonia Easter is the most important Christian festival, since it commemorates Jesus' Resurrection and represents the victory of life over death. From Good Friday until Easter, Russian Christians visit the graves of their deceased relatives and leave flowers. On Easter they prepare Pascha (also a name for Easter), a special dish made with cottage cheese, raisins, and other fruits.

❁ PENTECOST

Observed by: Christians
Observed on: Fifty days after Lent

Pentecost takes place 50 days after Easter. The holiday celebrates the descent of the Holy Ghost on the disciples. This was considered a great miracle: Parted tongues of fire accompanied by a strong gust of wind descended on the apostles, marking them as fit preachers of the Gospel to all corners of the world.

Many scholars believe that many of the traditions and celebrations associated with this holiday were borrowed from pagan celebrations of spring in western Europe. Homes are often decorated with green branches and flowers. In Christian tradition this is the 50th day after Easter and has been celebrated since the first century. (Pentecost in Greek means "fiftieth.")

Pentecost is sometimes known as Whitsunday. The name "Whitsun" originated in the third century and was derived from the white garments that were worn by those who were baptized during the vigil of this feast. On this day devout Christians in Estonia attend church services.

❁ CHRISTMAS

Observed by: Christians
Observed on: December 24–25

Christmas is a day of great joy for Christians all over the world because it celebrates the birth of Jesus, whom they believe was the Son of God. In Estonia Christmas celebrations begin on December 24, Christmas Eve, and last until December 26.

Estonians refer to Christmas as Jouloud. Originally Jouloud was a pre-Christian festival that celebrated the birth of the Sun (the winter solstice) and lasted for a period of 17 days, starting December 21 (St. Thomas Day) and ending January 6 (Epiphany). It was looked upon as a period of rest during the dark winter days and was marked by a great deal of feasting. The Catholic Church, eager to swell the ranks of the converted, set out to achieve this goal by taking over the sacred sites, religious symbols, and celebrations of European pagans. Winter Solstice was an important pagan winter festival.

Since 354 C.E. in the Western world, Jesus' birthday has been celebrated on December 25. This date was significant in the ancient world for many reasons. In Phrygia (former Asia Minor, modern Turkey), the Sun god Attis's birth was commemorated on December 25. The same was the case with Mithra, the Persian sun god. Saturnalia, a Roman festival honoring the god Saturn, was celebrated from December 17–24. The Catholic popes selected December 25 to attract converts by changing the object of the observances but not the substance of these pagan festivals. Only their reference was different; the symbols and activities have remained largely the same.

When Estonians embraced Christianity, they came to regard Christmas and Christmas Eve as the holiest days of the year. In ancient times people would visit saunas at noon on December 24 and then change into clean clothes. They believed that the forces of good and evil gathered in the darkness of the night on Christmas Eve, so they drew holy symbols such as crosses, wheels crossed, and pentagrams on all the doors and windows of their homes to ward off the evil spirits. Also food was laid on the table for the ancestral spirits who were believed to visit the homes and were not affected by the signs.

Fun Fact

Estonians believed that cattle could talk like humans on the night of Christmas, so they fed them Christmas bread.

There are many other old beliefs associated with Christmas. For instance it was believed that if men ate seven times during Christmas night, they would have the strength of seven men the next year.

Devout Catholics in Estonia attend a special midnight Mass on Christmas Eve. When they return home, they gather around the Christmas tree and exchange presents. Wheat cakes are placed on the windowsill for St. Nicholas (Santa Claus). Also, the Christmas supper is covered with straw to represent the manger where Jesus was born.

On Christmas Estonians prefer to celebrate with their families over a quiet Christmas dinner. Traditional Christmas food consists of pork, baked potatoes, and potato salad with red beets, pâté, and gingerbread. People drink beer, wine, and mead (fermented honey) for Christmas.

On December 26 in Estonia people have the day off from school and work. They visit their friends and family and exchange Christmas gifts and greetings.

Rites of Passage

✿ BIRTH

In Estonia pregnant women in villages are assisted in childbirth by elderly village women known as babushka or bapka. The bapka massage the woman's belly and give her sweet or soda water to facilitate the expulsion of the placenta. For the actual delivery many Estonian women prefer to lie on the straw-covered floor because they believe that it makes delivery less painful, although the woman may kneel on the floor if it is an easy delivery. The future of a newborn was predicted by observing birth omens and the child. Tuesday, Thursday, and Saturday were thought to be good days on which to be born; children born on Sundays were supposed to be very happy. After the birth the baby's face is covered with a piece of the amnion (the caul), and Estonians believe the caul can be "read" to predict the child's fortune. For example a red caul indicates good luck where a black one portends misfortune for the child. If one sees an eagle on the caul when holding it up to the sun, it means the child will have good luck. At one time the umbilical cord was kept wrapped in a piece of cloth near the cradle or under the child's pillow. Amulets are tied around the child's arms to ward off evil and bring good fortune.

Estonian women in villages are reluctant to deliver their children in hospitals, since they fear that their children may not be given their cauls or that the children's cauls may be stolen. The dried caul is kept wrapped and hidden lest someone steal it. They believe that if a caul is lost or stolen, then the child will be robbed of his or her good luck and misfortune will befall him or her. Some adult Estonians wear their cauls in a small bag hung around their necks for important meetings or other events they want to go favorably.

✿ MARRIAGE

In earlier times men from the suitor's family would arrive at the house of the prospective bride with a marriage proposal. They rode on horseback and carried with them beer and a red, sweet alcoholic drink for the bride's family. The horses were generally well-groomed stallions, adorned for the occasion in order to reflect favorably on the status of the suitor's family.

One of the married men would make the proposal on the suitor's behalf and place the bottle of beer and the red alcoholic drink on the table. If the father of the bride drank from the bottle, it meant the proposal had been accepted. If this was the case the groom's family presented gifts to the bride's family; these generally included a knife, a scarf, and an apron for the bride, an apron for the bride's mother, scarves for the bride's sisters and brothers, and a pipe or a cap for the father. Also the amount of bride price was decided and paid in silver to the bride's family as a token of thanks to the bride's family for her upbringing.

If the bride's family called off the marriage, all the gifts and the amount of the bride price had to be repaid to the suitor's family. However if the suitor's family called off the marriage, then the bride's family was allowed to keep the bride price as well as the gifts as compensation for breaking off the marriage.

The wedding ceremony began with a party during which the bride's hair was covered with a close-fitting cap (a coif). The young people's cauls were carefully stored in chests; at the time of marriage, they were sewn into the brim of the bride's headdress (the kirkirka) and the groom's wedding coat.

On the actual wedding day the groom's guests (saajarahvas) and bride's guests (saunjarahvas) gathered at the houses of the groom and bride, respectively. Then the saajarahvas went to the bride's house to claim her. However prior to their arrival, the bride would be covered with leafy birch twigs and secretly taken to the steam and sauna room, where she would be dressed for the wedding. Then the groom would arrive and take his bride home in a simple ceremony.

The next day the saunjarahvas arrive at the groom's house with the dowry chest and ask to meet the bride. After exchanging greetings the headdress of a married woman would be placed on her head, and she would be proclaimed a married woman. The most important rite of the wedding ceremony, it took place in a secluded area (a sauna or barn) and was only attended by the female relatives of both sides of the families. After donning the headdress the bride was given an apron to wear, since Estonian tradition required that any married woman wear one. During the "patching the apron" ritual that followed the bride would meet guests, and they would throw money into her apron to wish her happiness and prosperity. Next the bride danced either with the groom or any of his relatives. Singing, dancing, feasting, and drinking followed. The next day the bride presented gifts to the guests as tokens of thanks for participating in the celebrations. The guests estimated the value of the young wife by the number of gifts, intricacy of workmanship, and beauty of the patterns and ornaments. Ribbons and belts were also tied to cattle as a gift from their new mistress.

The traditional way of announcing the end of a wedding ceremony was to serve cabbage soup or a cabbage dish to the guests. Lack of meat during feasts was considered the end of the wedding ceremony; if the guests still did not take the hint, the bride would enter the room filled with guests with a spinning wheel and start spinning the wheel in the middle of the room.

✿ DEATH

Earlier in their history Estonians believed that the best time to die was either in autumn, when the old leaves fell, or in spring, when the trees were covered with new leaves because they believed that dying during these seasons was easier. They thought that only evil people and witches died during the winter blizzards. Someone who died during the day and when the weather was good was considered to have died a good death.

After someone died his or her body was placed on a ladder covered with straw or on a bier, then washed with soap and water, dressed in white clothes, and the limbs were tied to the body to keep them in place. Then the straw or the bier was burned. As long as the body remained in the house, no one was permitted to take anything out. Because people feared it might anger the deceased and a member of the family might have an accident. The body was not left alone at night; while family members kept watch over the dead body they were fed boiled peas and beans sprinkled with salt. Estonian Lutherans in general no longer adhere to this practice, but it is still common among Orthodox Christians.

Before the funeral the body was placed in a coffin, and people made sure that not a single teardrop fell into the coffin, because Estonians believed that the person whose tears fell inside the coffin would also die soon. For the main funeral people were not invited, but many volunteered to participate in the ceremony. The body was carried from the house feet first, then the house was swept clean, and all garbage was thrown out immediately. In many parts of Estonia people even burned incense sticks to cleanse the air and to ensure the soul of the deceased did not return to haunt them.

The coffin was then placed on a carriage and driven across a long, winding road to ensure that the soul of the departed could not find his or her way back home. After the burial the relatives of the deceased organized a feast (a wake) in the person's honor. It was believed that, if the feast was not held, then the soul of the deceased would seek revenge, and great misfortune would befall the family. Animals had to be slaughtered for the feast, because Estonians believed that, otherwise, the animals

Fun Fact

Marriage proposals and weddings took place on the day of the new Moon and never on that of the old (full) Moon because Estonians believed that if a proposal were made on old Moon day, the bride would grow old quickly, and her face would have lot of wrinkles. However if the proposal were made at the time of the new Moon, the bride would remain young for a longer period of time. Estonians believe that the new Moon symbolizes fertility, prosperity, and good health.

Fun Fact

No one, not even the wise, could say where Toonela (underworld, where the souls of the deceased were supposed to go) was to be found.

reared by the family would die, and death and disease would strike the family. If there were any leftovers from the feast, they were poured on the ground during the wake as a mark of respect for the deceased.

The wake was followed by a period of mourning, during which relatives wore silver jewelry. Uttering the name of the deceased during this period was forbidden.

Estonian custom established the mourning period for widows at six months; for widowers it lasted six weeks.

Introduction

❁ HISTORY

Ethiopia, the land of the Blue Nile and Great Rift Valley, is the oldest independent country in Africa and is popularly referred to as “the cradle of humanity.” Ethiopia is also home to “Lucy,” in the 20th century the oldest known fossil evidence of a hominid (of the family of apes), who lived around 3.5 million years ago.

There are records of Ethiopian rulers dating back 5,000 years. Menelik I (est. 200 C.E.) was the first of the modern emperors of Ethiopia; according to legend he was the son of King Solomon and Makeda, the Queen of Sheba (the ancient name for Abyssinia).

The Ethiopian monarchy, unique among African nations, managed to avoid colonial rule (with the exception of Italian occupation from 1936–41 during World War II). Emperor Haile Selassie (1892–1975) was the last ruler of this ancient dynasty. Selassie forcibly annexed neighboring Eritrea in 1962. The war caused much hardship and ruined the economies of both countries. In 1974 Selassie was ousted by Mengistu Haile Mariam (b. 1937), who, with popular backing, rebelled against the emperor’s oppressive rule.

Haile Mariam headed a Marxist-Leninist military dictatorship, known as the Derg. It banned churches, evicted Americans, and looked to the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics (USSR) for economic support. Eventually, a rebel coalition called the Tigray People’s Liberation Front emerged. It aided Eritrea in regaining control over its main port and took over Ethiopia as well. Mengistu fled, and Tigrayan Meles Zenawi (b. 1955) won Ethiopia’s first parliamentary elections in 1995. Zenawi moved the country toward private sector expansion and ensuring an adequate food supply for the people.

Another two-year war between Eritrea and Ethiopia made the United Nations declare a 16-mile buffer zone between both countries to ensure peace, even though they also signed a peace accord between themselves. With the backdrop of the simmering border issues, the government in the early years of the 21st century focused on a controversial

Who Is Lucy?

“Lucy” is the fossil remains of a landmark in human evolution, the oldest relatively complete skeleton (the first species of Australopithecus afarensis). She is also known by the name of “Dinquinash,” and is on display at the National Museum in Addis Ababa. After discovering her, renowned paleoanthropologist Donald Johanson (b. 1943) and his crew came up with the name “Lucy” while listening to the music of the Beatles.

and ambitious project of relocating around 2 million people from the low-rainfall highlands in an attempt to improve the food and water supply problems of the country.

Fun Fact

Menelik I is believed to have stolen the Ark of the Covenant when he visited his father, Solomon, in Jerusalem, and brought it back with him to Ethiopia, where it is said to still be in a small church in the ancient town of Axum.

GEOGRAPHY AND CLIMATE

A landlocked country on the eastern African front (Horn of Africa), Ethiopia shares borders with Sudan (in the west), Eritrea (in the north), and Somalia and Djibouti (in the east). It covers a land area twice the size of France and is intersected by deep gorges including the fascinating Great Rift Valley. The Blue Nile, the chief headstream of the Nile by water volume, originates in Ethiopia.

Only about 12 percent of Ethiopia is used for subsistence agriculture that clusters along the banks of the Nile River. Big portions of its forests have been cut down for fuel over the past 25 years, significantly reducing forest cover.

The climate in Ethiopia varies by location. The central highlands (plateau) have moderate temperatures averaging about 61°F, while it gets hotter toward the low-lying areas. Kiremt (the rainy season)

The Great Rift Valley

Also called the Great Earth Fissure, the Great Rift Valley (GRV) spreads over seven east African states. It comprises 2 percent of the African land area and abounds in thousands of mineral water lakes and stunning flora-fauna reserves. The rift (a 15- to 30-mile-wide break in the earth’s surface) is a deep “Y” sign cutting across the mainland. It is home to many active volcanoes and the Afar Triangle, in which three distinct land plates are pulling away from each other, creating frequent earthquakes. The GRV attracts tourists and scientists from around the world.

lasts from June to September, and there are light showers in late March. It remains dry for most of the remaining year. Vibrant flowers cover the landscape after heavy rainfalls.

Many bird and animal species may be found in Ethiopia’s 14 major wildlife reserves, referred to as sub-Saharan microcosms. The unique Rift Valley houses some of the most exquisite animal and bird species in the world, while the Blue Nile Falls continue to dazzle tourists with natural beauty.

ECONOMY

The Ethiopian economy is essentially based on agriculture, which accounts for more than half its gross domestic product (GDP). Coffee (Arabica) exports provide employment for about 80 percent of the people and account for 60 percent of Ethiopia’s total exports. Around 15 million Ethiopians depend on coffee for their livelihood, making coffee production a vital part of their social, cultural, and economic well-being. Many farmers have started exporting qat, a mild stimulant that is heavily consumed in neighboring Eritrea. The sales of qat are intended to offset losses in revenue from coffee caused by coffee’s falling market price.

The war between Eritrea and Ethiopia (1998–2000) disrupted the economies of both countries. Ethiopia subsequently suffered major droughts and had to seek debt relief from the United Nations Highly Indebted Poor Countries (HIPC) in 2001. HIPC is an agreement among official creditors to help the most heavily indebted countries obtain debt relief. The program is administered by the World Bank.

CULTURE AND LIFESTYLE

Ethiopia is a dense, complicated mixture of approximately 80 different cultures. The Oromos, the largest ethnic group, is composed of a mix of Muslims, Christians, and traditional animists. The official and most widely spoken language is Amharic. Orominya and Tigrinya are spoken in the northern and southern parts, respectively.

The Ethiopian Orthodox Church has dominated the life of Ethiopians since the fourth century. This tradition was essentially monastic with Orthodox clergy in nearly every town of the country. The Orthodox tradition encompasses a belief in God, Jesus, and Catholic saints, yet focuses on the Old Testament, in contrast to most Western Churches. Church services often include fortune-telling, dancing, and astrology, incorporating the widespread traditional African animist beliefs. Ethiopian traditions, which operate within a rigid religious system, give special importance to festivals and celebrations. By tradition, fasting is observed twice a week (Wednesday and Friday), and the people generally avoid consumption of dairy and meat products.

A priest carries what Ethiopian Orthodox Christians believe is a replica of the lost biblical Ark of the Covenant, during the start of the annual Timket (Epiphany) holiday, which celebrates the baptism of Jesus, in the town of Axum, Ethiopia. Local legend holds that the Ark was brought to Ethiopia by the nation's first king. Belief in the Ark is a central feature of Ethiopian Orthodox Christianity. (AP Photo/Karel Prinsloo)

❁ CUISINE

Injera (also enjera), a flat fermented pancake, is the mainstay of the Ethiopian diet. It is made from teff, a tiny, round grain similar to millet. Teffa, Amharic for “lost,” is so named because it is often lost when it is harvested and threshed because of its tiny size. One might think that teff would be readily and cheaply available in the markets of Ethiopia, especially because so much of the land is devoted to its production and because it is more nutritious than barley, wheat, and millet; but its availability is limited. Because of the labor-intensive harvesting and processing techniques it requires, the cost of producing teff is the highest in Ethiopia—another consequence of its small size.

As in Eritrea, everyone eats with their hands. The other ubiquitous food is wat, or wot, a stew made with spices, meats, and pulses, such as lentils, beans, and split peas. It is served in a large plate, and everyone uses the flat teff pancakes to scoop mouthfuls of the wat.

The southern region of Kaffa and Buno claims to be the original home of coffee, and the bean has been grown in Ethiopia for more than 2,000 years. Coffee Arabica is quite popular in the capital city of Addis Ababa. So is tella, the local beer, a brew made from barley or maize, supplemented with tej, made from honey, and arakie, a potent grain spirit.

Fun Fact

Ethiopia uses the traditional Julian calendar (13 months), which is about eight years behind the Western Gregorian calendar.

❁ ADWA VICTORY DAY

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: March 1

On this day in 1896 Ethiopian Emperor Menelik II (1844–1913) defeated the Italians in the Battle of Adwa. Ethiopia was the first country in Africa to obtain its independence from European control and was still independent at the end of the 19th century. This crucial defeat at Adwa marked the fall of the Italian colonial empire. In fact for blacks all over the world this is a special day since it showed the strength of black power as capable of defeating the supposedly superior white race in a twist on the ideology of the period. Forty years later, after Italian forces of Benito Mussolini (1883–1945) had defeated Ethiopia, Emperor Haile Selassie's efforts to regain independence made him a national hero. This day is celebrated with much pride, music, and dance.

Fun Fact

The Geez script, which is used to write the Amharic and Tigrinya languages, uses a modest 231 letters. No wonder Amharic typewriters are staggeringly complex!

❁ DERG DOWNFALL DAY

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: May 28

Emperor Haile Selassie's long rule came to an end when the military Derg regime toppled him in 1974. By 1991 Ethiopians had had enough of the authoritarian Derg regime, and the coalition rebel forces of the Ethiopian People's Revolutionary Democratic Front (EPRDF) took power.

On this day all government offices, schools, and institutions in Ethiopia are closed to mark the downfall of the Derg regime.

The Ethiopian Calendar

The Ethiopian calendar is based on the old Alexandrian, or Coptic, calendar, which in turn is based on the even older Egyptian calendar. During the reign of Ptolemy III (r. 246–22 B.C.E.) a reform of the Egyptian calendar was introduced (Decree of Canopus, 238), which was made up of the intercalation of a sixth day every fourth year to bring the wandering calendar into agreement with the solar year. However, this reform was opposed by the Egyptian priests, and the idea was not adopted until 25 B.C.E., when the Roman Emperor Augustus (63 B.C.E.–14 C.E.) formally reformed the calendar of Egypt, keeping it forever synchronized with the newly introduced Julian calendar. To distinguish it from the ancient Egyptian calendar, which remained in use by some astronomers until medieval times, this reformed calendar is known as the Coptic calendar. To illustrate the slippage between the Gregorian and Coptic calendars, September 1992 in the Gregorian calendar corresponds to the Coptic date of Maskaram 1985, a difference of seven years. The years and months of the Ethiopian calendar coincide with those of the Coptic calendar but have Amharic names.

The Ethiopian calendar consists of the following 13 months:

Maskaram (New Year): September 11–October 10

Timket: October 11–November 9

Hidar: November 10–December 9

Tahsas: December 10–January 8

Tir: January 9–February 7

Yekatit: February 8–March 9

Megabit: March 10–April 8

Miyazya: April 9–May 8

Ginbot: May 9–June 7

Sene: June 8–July 7

Hamle: July 8–August 6

Nahase: August 7–September 5

Paguemen: September 6–10

The Ethiopian government's fiscal year begins on Hamle 1 (July 8) and ends on Sene 30 (July 7).

NEW YEAR'S EVE/DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: September 11

New Year's Day, called Enkutatash in Ethiopia, commemorates the New Year as well as the feast day of St. John the Baptist. It also marks the end of the heavy rainy season.

The Ethiopians follow the Coptic calendar, which has 12 months of 30 days (Maskaram through Nehase) and a 13th month (Paguemen) of five or six days, depending on whether or not it is a leap year. The New Year is celebrated on the first day of Maskaram, which is the equivalent of September 11 of the Western or Gregorian calendar.

The name Enkutatash comes from the gift of enku ("jewels") put in the treasury of the Queen of Sheba by the chiefs when she returned from her visit to Jerusalem after meeting King Solomon. On this day children wear colorful new clothes and hand out small paintings and flowers while dancing on the roads and singing the traditional song "Abebaye hoy." Fires are lit in front of houses after dark on New Year's Eve.

In the Kostete Yohannes church of the Gondar region there is a special religious service that takes place on this day. After chanting psalms, prayers, and hymns for three days, people come out in great numbers in lively processions to celebrate the new year.

The Raguel Church (close to Addis Ababa and on top of Entoto Mountain) also has an impressive religious celebration on this day.

CHRISTMAS EVE/DAY

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: January

In Ethiopia Christmas is called Genna, a name derived from a Greek word meaning "birth" or "nativity." The celebrations commence as early as 3 A.M. in special church services where priests, singers, and poets chant and sing in Geez, the ancient language still used in the Ethiopian church. Traditionally Christmas trees were not part of the Ethiopian Christmas decorations, though now they are seen in Addis Ababa and some other cities. Exchanging gifts was also not common, though children were often given new clothing. The Western gift-giving tradition, however, has begun to catch on.

Legend has it that shepherds were playing a kind of field hockey the night Jesus was born. So, traditionally Ethiopian men play genna (Ethiopian hockey) with curved wooden sticks and a ball on Christmas Eve. Like field hockey, the game can get rough, and at the end of it the community leader gives a prize for the best player. Genna feasting includes bread and mead—a fermented beverage

❁ EPIPHANY

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: January

The roots of this observance can be traced back to the Eastern Christian Churches. It is an important observance in Eritrea. According to the Bible, the three Magi (wise men)—Melchior, Caspar, and Balthazar—spotted a bright star in the skies on the night Jesus was born. They followed the star to Bethlehem, found the infant Jesus there, and presented the divine child with gold, frankincense, and myrrh.

The Feast of the Epiphany celebrates Jesus' childhood events leading up to his baptism by John the Baptist in the River Jordan. Starting on the eve of Epiphany, called Timket ("baptism") in Ethiopia, this three-day festival is one of the most splendid celebrations in the country. It includes colorful processions in which the symbolic Ark of Covenant is taken from churches to a nearby sacred pool, followed by an elaborate church service. There is much music and celebrating at night.

The feast of St. Michael (a very popular Ethiopian saint) is observed on the third day. For this festival the people traditionally wear crisp new white clothes, and the priest wears contrasting colors, velvets, and jewels. Tella and tej, Ethiopian beer and mead (fermented honey), are prepared along with specially baked bread, while sheep are readied for slaughter.

On this day Muslims wear new clothes, entertain friends and relatives, and visit family graves to pay tribute to the dead.

Ethiopian Orthodox churches, like most Christian churches, mourn the death of Jesus, whom they believe to be their savior, on Good Friday. The day is spent in silence, meditation, prayer, penance, and fasting. Church services begin early in the morning last until about 3 P.M., intended to correspond to the time Jesus spent on the Cross.

Observed on: First Sunday after Lent

On the eve of Ethiopian Easter, called Fasika, Orthodox Christians attend church and light candles during Easter services that begin around midnight. After church they celebrate by breaking their 55-day-long fast (during Lent, devout Christians eat only vegetarian fare) by eating meat with injera (pancakes made with teff, grass flour), tej (honey wine), or tella (beer). Easter, like Christmas, is a time to gather with family and exchange gifts.

❁ MESKEL

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: September

Meskel, or mesquel, literally means "cross," and this festival, celebrating the discovery of the Cross on which Jesus was crucified, is second only to the Timket (Epiphany) festival in importance to Ethiopian Christians. According to legend, Empress Helen, the mother of Constantine the Great (306–37), prayed that she might find the sepulcher where Jesus was buried for three days before his Resurrection. The smoke of an incense burner then guided her to discover the buried Cross. The patriarch of Alexandria gave half of the Cross to Emperor Dawit I (1382–1413) of Ethiopia, who promised to protect Coptic Christians. A part of the Cross is still maintained in the Gishen Marien Monastery, 37 miles northwest of Dessie.

The ancient Meskel festival, also called Demera, dating back 1,600 years, begins when a green tree is planted at marketplaces or in town squares, and everyone brings a wooden pole (crowned with yellow Meskel daisies), which are placed around the tree, forming a wooden pyramid. Chibo (torches made from eucalyptus trees) are used to start the bonfire by lighting demera, bundles of branches, until the trees within the pyramids are consumed by fire. The celebrants believe that the direction in which each tree finally falls will face difficult times in the coming year, and many remain until the tree has fallen to see which region is in for hard times. Ornately robed priests carrying silver Coptic crosses dance with their followers around the fires singing and chanting and carrying flaming torches. The flowering of the cross-shaped Meskel daisies also marks the end of the three-month long rainy season and the return of the Sun.

In Addis Ababa, there are exciting processions which bring people carrying burning torches to congregate at the Meskel Square in the southeast portion of the city in the evening. A huge bonfire is lit and the festivities continue until dawn. There is dancing, music, feasting, and even a special Meskel song.

❁ EID AL-FITR

Observed by: Muslims

Observed on: First of Shawwal, the 10th month of the Islamic calendar

This day marks the end of Ramadan, the holy month of fasting (the fourth of the five pillars of Islam). This day is one of celebration after a month of fasting from the Fajr prayer (dawn) to the Maghrib prayer (dusk). Fasting, in Islam, is an act of drawing closer to Allah since it marks the abandonment of all worldly longings. It symbolizes a shield, which protects a Muslim from sins and ultimately jabannum or “hellfire.” On this day Muslims dress in new clothes, pray in mosques, distribute alms to the needy, and exchange gifts, celebrating love and brotherhood.

❁ MARRIAGE

Marriages in the Amhara and Tigray regions are arranged only after much negotiation between the parents of the bride and groom. Men here are married by the age of 30, whereas women are married in their late teens. Traditionally a bride must be a virgin and unrelated to the groom's family, going back at least five generations.

On the wedding day, the bride's father presents cows, sheep, honey, and wheat as a dowry to the groom. After the ceremony, following Muslim customs, food is served at the bride's house. Here the groom can eat only a special dish prepared by the mother of the bride.

Introduction

❁ HISTORY

Fiji was first settled about 3,500 years ago by Polynesian migrants from Southeast Asia. These original inhabitants of Fiji are now called the Lapita people after a distinctive type of fine pottery they produced, known as Lapita pottery. The Polynesians were followed by Melanesians, who arrived in Fiji about 2,500 years ago from the area around New Guinea. The Polynesians and Melanesians are believed to have been expert sailors and fishermen who lived mostly around the coastal areas. Later on the development of agriculture around 500 B.C.E increased the population and led to the formation of tribal communities.

The first European to set foot on the Fiji islands was the Dutch explorer Abel Tasman (?1603–?59) in 1643. The British explorer Captain James Cook (1728–79) visited Fiji in 1774. In the early 19th century the discovery of sandalwood and sea cucumber in the region attracted traders to the islands. A sea cucumber is a tubular, spineless sea animal prized as a delicacy and also for its medicinal properties. Both the sandalwood and sea cucumber were highly valued in Asia, and European traders got involved in their trade in the hope of making quick fortunes.

In 1874 Fiji came under British rule. The British introduced a system of administration that prevented indigenous Fijians from working on the European-owned sugarcane plantations. That is why over 60,000 Indians were brought to Fiji by the British. They were treated as indentured servants before the practice was abolished. As a result over 40 percent of today's population is of Indian descent.

The 19th century also saw the arrival of Christian missionaries in Fiji. The majority of Fijians today are Christians.

In 1970 Fiji gained independence from the United Kingdom. Ethnic tensions flared up soon after that. A new constitution was drawn up that entrenched ethnic separation by providing separate electoral rolls for each ethnic group. Those tensions escalated in 1987 after elections seated a coalition government dominated by ethnic Indians. A coup led by Sitiveni Rabuka (b. 1948), a native Fijian military leader, overthrew the civilian government. A new constitution was written giving preferential treatment to ethnic Fijians. Pressure from the international community led to changes in the constitution in 1997, which eased tensions for a time.

The first election under that constitution was held in May 1999, and the Labor Party won. The party's leader Mahendra Chaudhry (b. 1942) was appointed prime minister. He was the first Indo-Fijian to occupy the position.

In May 2000 Chaudhry and his cabinet were taken hostage for 56 days by a group of disgruntled indigenous Fijians led by failed local businessman George Speight (b. 1957), who called for a new constitution that would give indigenous Fijians political supremacy. In light of growing international and domestic pressure, Speight and his men were arrested. Speight pleaded guilty to treason and was sentenced to death, but later the sentence was commuted to life imprisonment.

Because of the antidemocratic activities and coup of 2000, Fiji's membership in the Commonwealth of Nations was suspended, and, under pressure from the international community, the interim administration committed itself to holding democratic elections in 2001. The new and predominantly indigenous Soqosoqo Duavata ni Lewenivanua Party (SDL), the party of the interim prime minister Laisenia Qarase (b. 1941), obtained the largest number of seats in the elections and formed a government. The Fijian Labor Party (FLP) won 28 seats but was excluded from power. The FLP challenged its exclusion, saying it was unconstitutional. The High Court and Court of Appeal upheld the FLP's position but a power-sharing agreement could not be reached by the two parties. In November 2004, Chaudhry announced that his party would assume the role of official opposition.

GEOGRAPHY AND CLIMATE

Fiji is an archipelago that includes 332 islands. Of these only about 100 or so are inhabited while many others are used as fishing bases and planting grounds. The majority of the population lives on two islands: Viti Levu and Vanua Levu. Taveuni, Kadavu, Gau, and Koro are the other important islands. The international dateline runs through Fiji although most of the islands are situated just west of the line.

This island nation has a mild, tropical, maritime climate. During the summer, which is Fiji's rainy season (November to April), temperatures can reach 86°F. During the dry season (May to October), the temperature drops down to 64°F. Rainfall is usually in the form of warm, sudden afternoon showers, which go as quickly as they come. On the mountainous islands trade winds cause variations in climate and vegetation.

ECONOMY

Fiji's fertile soil yields sugarcane, tropical fruits, taro (a fleshy, starchy, underground stem, called the potato of the tropics), cotton, pineapples, bananas, wood, and coconuts. Limestone quarrying is also important. Sugar, the processing of which accounts for a third of Fiji's industrial production, is the main export. Gold, silver, clothing, copra, and processed fish are also exported. The European Union nations and Australia receive most of its exports. Imports, principally from Australia, New Zealand, and Japan, consist largely of foodstuffs, manufactures, and machinery.

Fiji has a flourishing tourism industry, a major source of foreign exchange. Roughly 250,000 tourists visit Fiji each year.

Visiting a Fijian Village

Fijians are a friendly, hospitable people. However visitors cannot simply stroll into a village since this would be considered a violation of privacy. Before visiting it is customary to purchase the traditional gift, a bundle of unpounded yaqona (kava). When approaching the village, visitors should not enter immediately but wait nearby until someone comes to greet them and ask the purpose of their visit. They will then be taken to the chief or turaga ni koro, to whom the kava should be offered. Pounded into powder, the yaqona is mixed with water and served.

Visitors who are accepted by the chief will be assigned a guide and host.

Once inside the village visitors should observe the following practices: They should take off their shoes when entering someone's house or any other village building; they should speak softly and not raise their voices as this might be interpreted as anger; they should not wear hats in the village because that is considered an insult to a chief; they should not touch anyone's head (also an insult.); they should show respect but be cautious about praise, since Fijians will feel obliged to make a gift of any object if visitors show too much liking for it.

Meke

Meke, traditional dances, are performed regularly in most villages. These dances are powerful and graceful at the same time, incorporating diverse elements such as the spear dance, the fan dance and the sitting dance. They are performed to the accompaniment of singing, clapping, and drum beating. The dancers usually wear grass skirts with decorative arm- and wristbands. Their bodies are oiled, their faces painted, and they wear flowers, shells, or other ornaments woven into their hair. Meke are usually narratives describing important events, such as how a battle was won, a chief installed, or some other significant occurrence. Some of these meke are old, handed down from generation to generation. Others are created especially for an occasion. In such cases they are choreographed and put together by a dau ni vucu, a composer who is an individual comparable to the wandering minstrels of old England.

CULTURE AND LIFESTYLE

Fijians continue to practice many of their traditional arts and crafts, some of which have endured the destructive impact of Western influences and the relentless criticism of Christian missionaries, and some of which have been modified and embellished to satisfy the demands of tourism. Fiji has been famous for pottery since the Lapita people began trading their wares in the South Pacific thousands of years ago. Wood carving is also still important. Fijian carvers make war clubs, spears, and drinking bowls, or tanoa, which are in daily use in many Fijian households. Bark cloth, known in Fiji as masi, is used for making ceremonial robes, waistbands, and turbans. The cloth is made from the bark of the paper mulberry tree; its production is very laborious. Traditionally large and highly decorated masi cloths were used as ceremonial gifts, and there was much prestige associated with their ownership. The weaving of pandanus (a tree with long leaves in the shape of blades) leaves into mats and baskets has a long tradition too. Most village girls still learn the craft, and there are all sorts of variations in style and color (achieved by scraping the leaves, burying them in mud, and boiling them with other plants).

Fiji has a strong dance tradition, and Fijian dances are passed down from generation to generation. Traditional dance, known as meke, accompanies special events like births, deaths, and marriages. At times of war men performed cibi with spears and clubs, while women performed dele or wate dances, which sexually humiliated captured enemies.

Yaqona

Yaqona (kava) is the key ingredient in Fiji's national drink. Yaqona is the dried root of the pepper plant. To make the drink it is pounded into a fine powder, steeped in water, strained, and served in an elaborate ceremony on formal occasions. The drink made from yaqona is used to acknowledge special occasions and end disputes and is drunk at official ceremonies. A bitter-tasting, intoxicating drink, it encourages a sense of well-being and is offered to guests as a special sign of goodwill. The drink is prepared in a special wooden bowl (tanoa) and drunk from a coconut shell (bilo).

CUISINE

Fijian cuisine is a mixture of Melanesian, Polynesian, Indian, Chinese, and Western cuisine. Staple food items include breadfruit, yam, cassava, taro root (dalo) and leaves (rourou), besides beef, pork, and poultry, and, of course, seafood. Exotic fruit such as limes, guavas, mangos, bananas, and pineapples are also popular in both sweet and savory dishes, and coconut milk (Jolo) is used in many dishes. Herbs and spices, such as garlic, ginger, turmeric, coriander, fenugreek, cumin, soy sauce, and chilies, are used to flavor dishes.

A typical Fijian main course consists of a dish of meat, poultry, or fish, boiled taro leaves, and cassava or taro as accompaniments. Local dishes include kakoda (a marinated local fish steamed in coconut cream and lime), rourou (a taro leaf dish), kassaua (tapioca, often boiled, baked, or grated and cooked in coconut cream with sugar and mashed bananas), and duruka (an unusual asparagus-like vegetable in season during April and May).

❁ RATU SIR LALA SUKUNA DAY

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: Last Monday of May

Fiji celebrates this day to honor Ratu Sir Lala Sukuna, who is considered to have been Fiji's greatest statesman, soldier, high chief, and scholar. Lala Sukuna was a decorated war hero in the First World War. In that war Britain did not allow native Fijians to join their armed forces. In order to prove himself on the battlefield and gain the respect of the British for all Fijians Sukuna enlisted in the French Foreign Legion. He fought bravely but was wounded and forced to return to Fiji toward the end of 1915. He went back to France the following year with the Native Transport Detachment, a newly formed contingent assisting the British Army. Seeing his example the British colonial authorities changed their minds about native participation in the war. For his distinguished wartime service the French government conferred upon Ratu Sukuna that country's highest military honor the Croix de Guerre. Fijians celebrate this day with cultural shows and games.

Fun Fact

❁ FIRE WALKING

Observed in: Bequa

Observed by: General Public of Bequa and Hindus

Observed on: Ten days around the full Moon day in July or August

Hindu fire walking is an annual practice (usually lasting 10 days) that coincides with the full Moon in July or August. It is a tradition that originated in southern India and was brought to Fiji by Indians during the colonial period. Fire walking is a tradition Fijians also share with the inhabitants of the island of Bequa.

Only men are allowed to be firewalkers. Traditionally there is a lot of preparation prior to the actual event. The men isolate themselves during the preparation period and must abstain from eating meat and having sex. They spend the time meditating and worshipping the goddesses Kali and Mariyamman. A pundit (Hindu priest) oversees the preparations, which can take up to 10 days.

On the final day, the firewalkers bathe in the river or sea and their tongues, cheeks, and the pundits pierce their bodies with three-pronged skewers. The firewalkers then dance to the fire pit. Their bodies are whipped during the ceremony, but they do not appear to be in any sort of pain. It is believed that if they focus on the goddess they will be free from all harm. The goddess's statue, decorated with marigold garlands, is placed facing the pit to bless the ceremony. The men walk over the glowing coals. This takes only a few minutes. They repeat this feat five times to the accompaniment of sacred chanting and drumming.

Fire walking is also practiced by the Sawau tribesmen living in the four villages on the southern side of the island of Bequa. According to Fijian mythology the ability to walk barefoot on white-hot stones was granted by the gods to a Bequan chief, whose descendants now act as fire-walking instructors. When the ceremony is to be performed, several representatives are chosen from each village. For two weeks before the event, the participants must avoid contact with females. Also, they must not eat any coconut. Failure to observe these taboos is said to render the participant liable to severe burns during the ceremony.

A large circular pit is dug for the fire-walking event. The pit is lined with large river stones, and a huge log fire is built over them some six to eight hours before the ceremony. When the time arrives, young men of the village prepare the arena for the firewalkers. Armed with long green poles, the young men clear the burning logs from the stones, while chanting “O-vulo-vulo” in unison. Then bundles of leaves and grass are placed around the edge of the pit. The village men, who have prepared the pit, surround the circle, leaving only a gap for the entry of the firewalkers.

The firewalkers now emerge from their place of concealment and approach the pit. The bundles of leaves and grass are quickly removed and the firewalkers enter the pit and walk briskly on the white-hot stones around the circumference of the pit. They appear to be immune to the heat and flames. Then, with a sudden shout, the bundles of grass and leaves are thrown on the stones, and the group huddles in the center of the pit chanting a song associated with the occasion. Around the ankle of each is a band of tinder-dry fern leaves. These bands are carefully removed and buried in the pit with four baskets of roots. The pit is then covered with earth and left for a period of four days. After four days, the pit is opened by the firewalkers. The baked roots are taken out, ground, and mixed with water. The roots are then cooked and eaten by the firewalkers. This completes the fire-walking ceremony.

Rites of Passage

✿ BIRTH

After the birth of a child on Fiji it is customary for every relative to put some money in the baby’s hand when seeing him or her for the first time.

At one month of age a baby is supposed to make his or her first appearance in church. The child is brought to the church by his or her aunt on the father’s side. The minister blesses the baby with a prayer. When the service is over, the oldest sister of the child’s mother takes the baby back home.

Men from Viseisei village in Fiji prepare a mildly narcotic drink called kava during a welcome ceremony. Partaking of the drink, prepared in a special wooden bowl and served in a coconut shell, is an important gesture of goodwill for Fijians. (AP Photo/Rick Rycroft)

Two or three months later women from the village visit and bring gifts such as clothes, mats, rugs, and soaps for the baby. The women form a circle around the baby. Then one of them steps into the middle, claps to get everyone's attention, and discusses the gifts. The women pass the baby around, and they all kiss it.

❁ MARRIAGE

On Fiji it is customary for a young man to ask the girl's father for her hand in marriage. The groom is also expected to present a valuable gift to the bride's father. Traditionally, this present should be a whale's tooth, symbolizing status and wealth. Assuming a young Fiji man receives permission to marry from the bride's father, the prospective groom is expected to prepare a lavish feast and to send it to the bride's family. Just before the wedding it is traditional for the Fiji bride to be tattooed, a sign of beauty on the islands.

❁ DEATH

When a person dies, the death is announced by loud weeping and wailing by women who assemble outside the house where the deceased has died. In between the actual death and the funeral, friends and family come to the house of the dead to pay their respects. Relatives from the deceased's maternal family are responsible for placing the body in the casket and accompanying it the church for the service, as well as for the burial.

After the burial, a feast is held. Cattle are killed specially for this meal. The men are served first and then the women. There are more feasts organized on the fourth, 10th, 50th, and 100th days after a death (provided the family can afford them). Close friends and family all participate because it is customary for feasting to be a part of the mourning process.

Introduction

❁ HISTORY

On the basis of conclusive archaeological evidence, human settlement in Finland began around 8500 B.C.E., during the Stone Age, as the ice from the last Ice Age was retreating. The earliest inhabitants were probably hunter-gatherers who spoke a dialect of Finno-Ugric. Ceramics were being produced from about 5300, and numerous nonindigenous artifacts, found during excavations, indicate that there was a wide-ranging trade network. Archaeologists have recovered flint from Scandinavia and Russia, chisels from Russia's Lake Omega region, and spearheads made in northern Scandinavia.

Later evidence of the culture known as the Battle-Axe or Cord Ceramic Culture (so called because cord was wrapped around pottery objects to make a design) indicates that they arrived in the region about 3200, bringing with them agriculture. From approximately 3,000 to 1,000 B.C.E., during the Bronze and Iron Ages, trade and the resulting cultural contacts the Finnish, Scandinavian, and Russian tribes continued.

Most of this information is derived from the study of excavated sites and the artifacts found there. Because there are few written records prior to the 13th century, not a lot is known about the specifics of Finnish history. Although sagas are full of stories about Finnish leaders, these are regarded as largely fictitious.

For almost 700 years, from the 12th to the 19th centuries, Finland was under Swedish rule. King Erik IX of Sweden (c. 1120–60), also called Erik the Lawgiver and Eric the Saint, brought Christianity to Finland in 1154. During this time Swedish was the predominant language, but the peasants continued to speak Finnish.

Severe famines struck Finland in the 17th century. The worst one in 1696–97 killed nearly one-third of the entire population. In a bid to annex Finland Russia waged a series of wars against Swedish-controlled Finland in the 1700s. In 1808 the armies of Russian Emperor Alexander I (1777–1825) conquered Finland. Finnish ties with Sweden were severed; to curb Swedish influence the Russians promoted the Finnish language. During the latter half of the 19th century Finland experienced a surge in nationalism, which gave rise to a nationalist movement called Fennomania.

Midnight Sun

In the regions located north of the Arctic Circle and south of the Antarctic Circle, the Sun shines continuously longer than anywhere else on Earth. This day, called a polar day, can last for six months at the North Pole. This phenomenon occurs because the Earth is tilted on its axis, and at the extreme latitudes the Sun remains above the horizon even after setting. The opposite phenomenon, known as polar night, occurs in these regions when the Sun remains below the horizon, even after rising. The farther the observer moves away from the poles, the shorter the duration of these phenomena.

The period of midnight Sun is known to have depressing effects on human beings. People who live in Alaska, Greenland, Iceland, northern regions of Canada, Scandinavia, and Russia are prone to depression, mood swings, and suicidal tendencies during this period.

Following the Bolshevik Revolution in Russia and the downfall of the czar, Finland declared its independence on December 6, 1917. With the signing of the Treaty of Tartu in 1920, the Finnish-Russian border was formalized. During this time social and economic disparities between the ruling and working classes of Finland were increasing, which led to a bitter civil war in 1918. The war was fought between the educated class, supported by the independent farmers and Imperial Germany, and the poor rural and industrial workers. Approximately 30,000 Finns were killed in the bloody civil war.

During World War II, Finland had to fight invasions from the Soviet Union in the Winter War of 1939–40 and then again in the Continuation War of 1941–44. Finland waged the Lapland War to oust the Germans from northern Finland in 1944–45. The country's war-ravaged economy emerged as a modern industrial economy toward the end of the 20th century. Finland joined the European Union (EU) in 1995. Today the per capita income of Finland is on a par with that of other Western European nations.

GEOGRAPHY AND CLIMATE

Finland is a land of thousands of lakes and islands, with an astounding 187,888 lakes and 179,584 islands. The land here is mostly low-lying and flat, although there are a few hills in the northern region. These areas are covered with forests, and very little land is used for agricultural purposes.

Finland shares borders with Russia, Norway, and Sweden. About 25 percent of Finland's total land area lies across the Arctic Circle, evident in the severe climatic conditions in the country. Most parts of Finland experience harsh winters and moderately warm summers. The temperature can be as low as 22°F during winters and yet get as warm as 86°F during the summer months.

Finland is one of the few countries in the world where you can experience the phenomenon of the midnight Sun. The days and nights can be very long in this country. At the northernmost point of Finland, the Sun does not set for 74 days during summer. During winters, the sun does not rise for at least 51 days.

ECONOMY

Finland has a highly developed economy and the Finnish people enjoy a high standard of living. Finland has developed wood, manufacturing material, metal, medical accessories, engineering, and telecommunications industries. Finland enjoys good trade relations with Germany, Norway, the United Kingdom, France, Italy, Russia, and Sweden. The Finnish economy depends on the import of raw materials and minerals from these and other nations. The country does not export any agricultural products, but forestry is a major export industry. Finland has adopted the Euro as its official currency.

CULTURE AND LIFESTYLE

Although sparsely populated, Finland has a diverse culture. In addition to its renowned modern building design and architecture, Finnish design in furniture and glassware is famous. The country offers a wide variety of music and literature, hosting several musical festivals during the year, where modern and classical genres are showcased.

Finland's national epic, the Kalevala, is well known across the literary world. Elias Lönnrot compiled this epic myth in the 1830s, consisting of stories about the creation of the world, the birth of humanity, and the fight between good and evil.

Sports are extremely popular in Finland, in particular winter sports. Formula One racing, ice hockey, and track events are among other favorites. Nordic Walking, a fitness walking technique, is also a popular recreational activity in Finland. This exercise is suitable for all ages and can be practiced at any time of year. Almost half a million Finns are said to practice Nordic Walking.

ST. URHO'S DAY

According to legend Finland, a country rich in grapes, once suffered a plague of grasshoppers and locusts that destroyed their crops. It is said that St. Urho (pronounced oorlho) chased away these insects with a giant metal fork, shouting, "Heinasirkka, heinasirkka, meine taatta hiiteen" ("Grasshopper, grasshopper, get out of here!").

The Finnish people celebrate this event by dressing up in purple and green—purple for the grapes and green for the vines (or, according to some, for the grasshoppers). At sunrise, they gather together, carry pitchforks, and march, chanting, "Heinasirkka, heinasirkka, meine taatta hiiteen" and chasing imaginary grasshoppers.

LABOR DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: May 1

The earliest origins of this holiday are ascribed to pagan celebrations that were practiced by farmers, peasants, and villagers in Europe well before the Middle Ages. Today it combines such varied influences as the international workers' movement, European celebrations of spring, the modern street carnival, and the Finnish enthusiasm for drinking.

The name Labor Day came to be associated with May 1 when in 1889 the Second International, a consortium of socialist organizations, declared it a day to recognize the importance of workers around the world, and scheduled the first demonstrations and celebrations for the following year, 1890. They coordinated this observance with the strike called by the U.S. labor union, the American Federation of Labor (AFL), demanding an eight-hour workday. In many parts of the world the holiday is also known as May Day.

In Finland, it is a time for workers to conduct parades and rallies. Moreover, even though it may still be snowing, this day also commemorates the advent of spring in Finland and is referred to locally as Vappu. Street carnivals, feasting, and drinking mead are highlights of the day.

MIDSUMMER'S EVE/MID-SUMMER'S DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: June 25–26

Midsummer's Eve, also called Juhannusaatto and Juhannuspaiva in Finland, is a celebration of the summer solstice, the longest day of the year. After Christmas this celebration is the next most important holiday of the year here. Christians changed this celebration, making it the feast day of St. John the Baptist instead.

Midsummer, however, has been important since pagan times, especially in northern Europe, where the contrast between the dark and the light seasons is dramatic. The long, cold winter nights have turned into the white nights of the Finnish summer. In the north of Finland, the Sun actually remains above the horizon all night.

In Finland the solstice is a public holiday celebrated on the third weekend of June. The Finnish flag is officially displayed all across the country from Midsummer's Eve until the next evening. All schools and offices remain closed. Pre-Christian celebrations included a fertility festival and special rituals conducted to ensure a good harvest in August.

Lighting a bonfire is the high point of Midsummer night. These bonfires used to be part of the eastern Finnish Midsummer celebrations; in western Finland they were lit on Ascension Day and Whitsunday, and in Ostrobothnia on Easter Saturday. Nowadays, Midsummer fires are lit all over Finland, except in the Swedish-speaking areas on the coast, where a Midsummer pole, similar to a maypole, is set up instead. In Finland the bonfire is called the Juhannus Bonfire; it is to be used for cleansing and warding off evil spirits.

Midsummer celebrations include lilacs, silver birches, maidens in national costume, and, flying above it all, Finland's blue and white flag because Midsummer is also the day of the Finnish flag.

Many people enjoy a relaxing day in the country. They meet family and friends for picnics, and potatoes and pickled or smoked fish are usually included in the meal. For dessert the first strawberries of the season are typically served, along with beer.

❁ HOLY WEEK

Observed by: Christians

Dates: Friday before Easter

The Christian holiday of Good Friday commemorates Jesus' Crucifixion. A solemn occasion, it falls on the Friday before Easter and is the last Friday of Lent (an austere 40-day period of fasting and penitence).

In Finland this day is known as Long Friday. This name is only found in Scandinavian cultures. The Christians here observe a fast on this day, and a ritual called the Stations of the Cross is performed. This is a reenactment of Jesus' final journey to Golgotha, carrying the Cross to his Crucifixion.

In the 1980s, a Greek Orthodox observance was revived called virpominen. Children costume themselves as witches and go door to door reciting Bible verses and carrying willow sprigs. They are rewarded for this with money and candy. Interestingly children have been dressing up as Easter witches in Sweden for at least 100 years.

In Finland the entire family gathers together to celebrate Jesus' Resurrection. Children grow grass on plates indoors and decorate Easter eggs. Feasting and exchanging greetings and colorfully decorated Easter Eggs continue even on the next day, Easter Monday, which is the first Monday after Lent. This day commemorates the revelation of the risen Jesus to his disciples following his mortal death on the Cross.

❁ PENTECOST

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: Fifty days after Lent

Both the Sunday and Monday of this Christian holiday celebrate Pentecost, the day on which the Holy Spirit descended upon Jesus' disciples. In Greek Pentecost means “the 50th day,” and the holiday got this name because it takes place 50 and 51 days after Easter.

Whitsunday and Whitmonday are alternate names derived from the white garments that were worn by those who were baptized during the disciples’ vigil. Whitsunday and monday have been celebrated since the third century. Many scholars believe that many of the traditions and celebrations were borrowed from pagan celebrations of the spring. On this day, devout Finns attend special prayer services.

Finns and Saunas

Although sauna baths are not of Finnish origin, the concept of steaming your body inside a heated room for cleansing purposes has woven itself into Finnish culture over the centuries. Finns spend a lot of time in saunas. One in every three Finns owns a sauna, and it is considered a necessity rather than a luxury. Finns are known to eat, drink, cook, relax, entertain guests, and, sometimes, even finalize business deals inside saunas.

The Finns do not wear clothes when they take sauna baths because it is considered rude. Traditionally, the sauna is the place where all cleansing rituals, during all stages of life from birth to death, take place.

❁ TANGO FESTIVAL

Observed in: Seinäjoki

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: July

The Tango Festival, or Tangomarkkinat in Finnish, held in Seinäjoki is the biggest summer event in Finland. This is also the biggest tango festival in the world. Thousands of people visit Finland from all corners of the world to dance and listen to tango music. The Finns are reserved and quiet by nature. This South American dance form is highly expressive in nature and is a favorite among Finns for this reason. They call it a “three-minute dream with your eyes open.”

Rites of Passage

❁ BIRTH

Traditionally, Finnish women give birth to babies in the sauna. The sauna bath plays an integral part in Finnish life and in the various rites of passage. The sauna is a heated room where people take steam baths. This is the most hygienic place in the traditional household.

The custom of giving birth in the sauna was followed religiously until World War II. The newborn and the mother would remain in the sauna, along with the midwives, for about a week. The father saw the baby for the first time when the mother and child returned home from the sauna. The eldest family member named the baby by sprinkling water over him or her. Although this custom dates back to the pre-Christian days, it was eventually replaced by a more formal baptism.

❁ MARRIAGE

Finnish weddings are normally not extravagant. However there are some nuptial customs that are found only in Finland. Weddings normally take place in summer. Traditionally, engaged couples roam the streets half-dressed and wearing masks and behaving outrageously, much to the amusement of passersby.

On the wedding day, the bride wears a crown. The wedding procession walks through an arch of honor, and the couple stands under a specially designed canopy known as the bridal sky. Straw ornaments, mirrors, and garlands are used to decorate the wedding venue. The reception after the wedding ceremony is characterized by lively music, dance, and feasting.

❁ DEATH

When a person dies in Finland, the body is not kept in an open casket and nobody sees it. Thus, it is not cleaned or dressed in new clothes. There is also no overt display of emotion during the funeral. The only person officially allowed to speak during the ceremony is the minister. After the coffin has been placed in the ground, people place flowers on it and say a few words or recite a poem.

✿ HISTORY

The history of human life in France goes back at least 32,000 years to the Paleolithic era. France is famous for its many caves containing hundreds and hundreds of beautiful paintings of various animals familiar to Paleolithic hunters. Perhaps the most well-known cave is that at Lascaux in central France, discovered in 1940 and thought to be about 16,500 years old. Among the spectacular paintings of bulls, antelopes, and horses, paleoastronomers have found what appear to be the earliest maps of the night sky as it would have looked from Earth at the time.

This ancient planetarium was found in an area of the Lascaux system called the Shaft of the Dead Man. Among the star patterns represented on the cave's walls is the Summer Triangle, with its three stars, Vega, Deneb, and Altair, the brightest stars visible during the northern summer. Seventeen thousand years ago, around the time these drawings were made, this area of the heavens never set below the horizon and would have been particularly clear at the beginning of spring. Closer to the entrance of the cave system is a map of the Pleiades star cluster, sometimes called the Seven Sisters, above the shoulder of a bull. In the 21st century this portion of the sky is part of the constellation called Taurus the Bull, indicating that the identification of this cluster with the bull goes far back into prehistory.

But the Lascaux cave complex is not the oldest Paleolithic art gallery in France. That honor may go to a new system near Lascaux discovered at Chauvet-Pont-d'Arc in the mid-1990s by an amateur spelunker, which contains paintings dating back between 32,000 and 30,000 years. The dates identify the work as that of the Aurignacian culture (34,000–23,000), peoples whose artifacts have been found spread across the continents of Europe and Asia. The Aurignacians are known for their innovative flint-knapping techniques, body ornaments, and diverse tools.

Unlike Lascaux, where many of the animals represented were probably on the Paleolithic menu, the animals of Chauvet-Pont-d'Arc include dangerous animals—lions, bears, and rhinoceros—more than 60 percent of the animals drawn on the gallery's walls. The proposed age of this system would be enough to make it an important find. What may be more significant, however, in terms of understanding our species' development, is the sophistication of the techniques used to portray the animals, in particular the use of perspective and shading.

Although Aurignacian hunters had projectile points made of antler, bone, and ivory, they did not use spear-throwers (atlatls) or the bow and arrow. It is not known whether they had eyed needles for stitching hides together, but none have so far been found.

During the Iron Age the Celtic Gauls arrived in France from the east. After many centuries of war and conflict with the Romans, the Gauls were defeated by the Romans under the leadership of Julius Caesar in 52 B.C.E. France, known as the province of Gaul during Roman rule, became a highly developed territory. Archaeologists have unearthed ruins of public baths and amphitheaters that date back to this period.

However this period of prosperity did not last and barbarian raids started to undermine the stability of Gaul. These barbarians were violent tribes that came from Germany. The Franks were the most powerful among them. In 5 C.E. the Franks succeeded in establishing their rule over the region. The struggle for power continued between different groups and France subsequently saw the rule of the Merovingians, Carolingians, and eventually the Capetian Dynasty.

This period is often referred to as the Gothic period and was generally a prosperous time in spite of continual wars and feuds. The Gothic period is synonymous with the grand cathedrals that are still found in France today. The church emerged as a constant and stable power, and many monasteries flourished under the Capetian monarchy. The monasteries became increasingly involved in farming and other economic activities. France was one of the major contributors to the Crusades, the series of holy wars started by Christians who sought to take the Holy Land from the Muslims. This considerably weakened the Capetian Dynasty, which was further undermined by the Hundred Year's War (1337–1453) with England. The Hundred Year's War, which was actually fought for a little over a century, inflicted great damage on both France and England. Famines and bubonic plague, social and political turmoil, afflicted France in its aftermath.

In response to war, civil strife, feudal rebellion, and banditry, King Louis XI (1423–83) and his successors began to create the institutions and amass the power of a premodern state. Louis expanded and consolidated France's borders, built up the royal army, and curtailed unruly nobles. François I (1494–1547), in 1516, secured an agreement with the pope that gave France considerable religious autonomy and created a national Catholic clergy.

The Wars of Religion, which wracked France with civil war for nearly 40 years between 1562 and 1598, were as much political as they were religious. When King Henry II (1519–49) died accidentally in a tournament in 1559, his widow Catherine de Medici (1519–89) oversaw a tumultuous 30-year period in which her three young sons (François II [1544–60], Charles IX [1550–74], and Henri III [1551–89]) ruled in succession for brief periods. The country endured chaos, punctuated by ferocious struggles between Huguenots (Protestants) and Catholics.

With the end of the Wars of Religion, and the advent of the strong leadership of the royal advisor Cardinal Richelieu (1585–1642), France saw the rise of an absolute monarchy, epitomized by King Louis XIV (1638–1715). Known as the Sun King, he ruled from 1643 to 1715, amid great pomp and splendor.

The 18th century is known as the period of the Enlightenment in France. The philosophies of Voltaire, Rousseau, and other philosophes had a profound effect on Western thought, and the ideals of liberty and equality expressed during this period ultimately fueled both the American and French revolutions. The French Revolution in 1789 eliminated the absolute monarchy in France and led to the formation of the First French Republic in 1792.

Following a period of incredible bloodshed, which included the execution of the king and then countless others in the Terror, the French Revolution eventually led to the rise of Napoleon Bonaparte (1769–1821), who expanded the French Empire by conquering neighboring countries. Napoleon I ruled France from 1804 to 1814, after which the Bourbon Dynasty was restored to power. The period that followed is known as the French Restoration. The power of the Roman Catholic Church, which had suffered great losses during the revolution, was reestablished under the Bourbons.

The French Second Republic was established in 1848, when the monarchy was replaced with a representative government. In 1852, however, Napoleon III (1808–73) overthrew this government and established the Second Empire. In 1870 Napoleon III was overthrown, and the Third French Republic was established. During this period France pursued an aggressive colonial program, expanding its overseas territories in Asia and Africa. During

The Empire That Was

Like most other modern colonial empires, France's colonial empire has disintegrated and given rise to several new nations in Africa and Asia. However France still controls some overseas territories. There are French territories in North and South America, as well as in the Indian and Pacific Oceans. France has the second largest Exclusive Economic Zone (EEZ) distributed around the world. The French EEZ covers 8 percent of the total world EEZ area, while the French homeland only occupies 0.45 percent of the total land surface area of Earth.

The puppet government that served the Nazis from 1940–44 is called the Vichy regime because its capital was located in Vichy, a spa and resort town in central France. Marshall Philippe Pétain (1856–1951) was at its head. His legacy remains in the word pétainisme, a pejorative term for reactionary policies.

Fun Fact

Among the most industrialized nations in the world, France produces the least amount of carbon dioxide, but it relies heavily on nuclear power, which produces radioactive waste that must somehow be disposed of.

Fun Fact

Mont Blanc, in the French Alps, is the highest peak in Europe. It is 15,781 feet high.

World War I France allied with nations that opposed German power. Much of that war was fought on French soil; by the end the country had suffered a huge loss of troops and industrial capacity and had to work hard to rebuild its economy.

During World War II France and its territories were defeated by Nazi Germany in 1940; some 90,000 French troops died and nearly two million were taken prisoner. German troops occupied the country, assisted by the collaborationist Vichy regime. Under the Vichy regime some 76,000 French and foreign Jews were deported to death camps; less than 3 percent survived.

Opposing the German occupation was the leader of the Free French General Charles De Gaulle (1890–1970) and various partisan groups acting independently of De Gaulle.

France was freed by the Allied forces in 1944. Charles de Gaulle set up a provisional government and subsequently became the president of France. After the world wars France was unable to maintain its colonial empire as the 1950s and 1960s became a period of chaotic decolonization around the world.

In the 21st century France is a stable and prosperous country with a presidential democracy.

The country enjoys good relations with neighboring nations, including Germany, in spite of their turbulent past.

France is a founding member of the European Union (EU).

GEOGRAPHY AND CLIMATE

France is one of the largest countries in Europe. It shares borders with Switzerland, Germany, Luxembourg, Belgium, the United Kingdom, Spain, Italy, Monaco, and Andorra.

France consists mainly of plains and slightly undulating hills. The Pyrenées mountain ranges are located in the south, while the country shares the Alps mountain range with Switzerland to the west. The Massif Central, one of the oldest ranges in France, is located in the middle of the country.

France has a fairly long coastline that exceeds 1,988 miles and borders the North Sea, Atlantic Ocean, and the Mediterranean Sea. French beaches can be smooth and sandy or rocky and rough. The country has four major rivers: the Loire, Seine, Rhône, and Garonne. The Loire, the longest river in France, stretches 634 miles, from its beginning in the Massif Central until it drains into the Atlantic Ocean. The German Rhine River, situated on the Franco-German border, also forms a part of the country's system of waterways.

France has four types of climate: oceanic, semi-continental, Mediterranean, and mountain. Except for the coastal regions, marked by hot summers and mild winters, most parts of the country generally enjoy cool winters and mild summers. France also experiences strong, dry, cold winds known as mistral, which blow from the northwest.

ECONOMY

France is one of the major industrialized economies in Europe and, indeed, the world. The French government, although it has relaxed control over many economic sectors, still claims a major stake in railways, electricity, and telecommunication sectors. The country is blessed with a rich supply of natural resources. Among its mineral resources are coal, iron ore, potash, zinc, and bauxite. France also has sound timber and flourishing fishing industries. Aerospace, automobiles, chemicals, electronics, machinery, textiles, and tourism are other major industries in France. French farmers cultivate grains, potatoes, and wine grapes. Beef, fish, and dairy products also contribute to the country's economy.

France enjoys good trade relations with the United Kingdom, Belgium, Germany, the United States, Italy, Spain, and the Netherlands. France exports transportation equipment, machinery, iron and steel, and beverages. The import list includes crude oil, plastics, and chemicals.

France is a leading member of the Group of Eight (G8) and officially joined the European Union (EU) in 1999. The French currency, the French franc, was replaced with the Euro in 2002.

CULTURE AND LIFESTYLE

The French people are generally convivial and friendly. It is customary for people to greet each other even if they are strangers but to address each other formally (as monsieur, madame, or mademoiselle, as the case may be). French culture has been highly romanticized over the ages. Artists and fashion designers flock to France for inspiration and exposure. Tourists consider Paris a haven for romantics. Music, literature, philosophy, art, museums, festivals, food, style, and a cosmopolitan lifestyle are synonymous with France. The French are also avid fans of sports such as rugby, soccer, tennis, skiing, and basketball. The most popular sporting events involve cycling and auto racing. France hosts the world famous Tour de France (cycling) and Grand Prix (auto racing) events.

About 85 percent of the French population is Roman Catholic. In modern France adherence to church orthodoxy has diminished, though there are still plenty of Catholic faithful who adhere to the traditions and rituals. Minority communities include Muslims, Protestants, and Jews. A large number of French do not subscribe to any religious beliefs.

❁ CUISINE

French cuisine is widely renowned. The word gourmet is French, and the restaurant is a French invention. Every region in France has a distinct flavor to its cooking. Classic French cuisine mainly originates from the northern parts of France. Liberal use of butter, cream, cheese, and eggs is characteristic of classic French cooking. Combinations of salads, red and white meat, freshwater fish, and red and white wine are common items on French menus. The French, however, do not prepare such elaborate and delicate dishes on a daily basis.

A normal day begins with café au lait (coffee with hot milk), croissants, and other breads along with butter and jam. Dishes of pork, fish, or veal often form the main course at dinner tables. Cheese and apple tarts are also included in the main meals. White wine is often drunk with fish or cheese, and red wines with red meat.

French wines are among the world's best. French wine-making has a rich and long history that dates back to pre-Roman times. Some of the most famous varieties come from the Burgundy, Rhône, Champagne, and Bordeaux regions.

Public/Legal Holidays

❁ NEW YEAR'S EVE/DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: December 31–January 1

The first day of the Western (Gregorian) calendar, January 1, is celebrated as New Year's Day throughout much of the world. In France many cities sponsor fireworks displays on New Year's Eve. In French homes small bunches of mistletoe are hung above doorways, and at midnight on New Year's Eve revelers kiss each other under the mistletoe for good luck.

Traditionally the French make personal New Year's resolutions and have a feast on this day. Dishes such as soupe à l'oignon (onion soup with bread and melted cheese) and dinde rôtie (roast turkey) are often included. Many people eat pancakes for good luck. The first of January is a day for visiting relatives, friends, and neighbors and exchanging gifts. It is a national holiday and schools, government offices, and commercial establishments remain closed.

St. Mary Magdalene

St. Mary Magdalene, the sister of Martha and Lazarus of Bethany, is believed to have traveled to France. Legend has it that she wandered toward the east from Les Saintes-Maries-de-la-Mer. When she reached the forest of Sainte Baume, she found a cave, and resolved to live in that cave for 30 years, surviving only on wild roots, berries, and prayers. She did penance for her sins and eventually died there. Christians believe that Mary Magdalene was forgiven her sins and that she was a pure soul when the angels took her to heaven.

❁ LABOR DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: May 1

The earliest origins of what is now called Labor Day, Workers' Day, or May Day are ascribed to pagan celebrations welcoming the return of spring practiced by farmers, peasants, and villagers all over Europe well before the Middle Ages. In 1889 the Second International, a consortium of socialist organizations, declared May 1 a day to recognize the importance of workers around the world, and scheduled the first demonstrations and celebrations for the following year 1890. They coordinated this observance with the strike called by the U.S. labor union, the American Federation of Labor (AFL), demanding an eight-hour workday.

Most countries observe May 1 as International Labor Day. It was under the Vichy regime (1940–44) that France renamed and first celebrated this day as Labor Day. French workers hold marches and rallies throughout the country on this day.

In France, the first of May is also devoted to the Virgin Mary and is known as the Day of the Lily of

Bordeaux Wines and Glasses

Bordeaux is a port city in southwestern France and a major center of the wine trade. Bordeaux wines come in a wide range of colors, from deep crimson to brick reds to amber to the golden straw-colored white wines. These wines are served in a special kind of wineglass known as a "Bordeaux glass." This wineglass, shaped like a tulip, narrows toward the bottom and has slightly curved edges. This ensures that the wine's aroma does not escape. To distinguish and appreciate the varieties and qualities of Bordeaux wines, one should take tiny sips, swishing the liquid around in the mouth and combining it with a bit of air to release its full flavor.

✿ LIBERATION DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: May 8

Liberation Day, or Victory Day, Fête de la Victoire 1945, is the anniversary of the signing of the treaty ending World War II. This day was declared a public holiday by President Giscard d'Estaing (1974–81). In France there are special military and ceremonial parades on this day. There are also special prayer services in churches across the nation. The president visits the Arc de Triomphe and pays homage to all French soldiers. Schools, government offices, and commercial establishments are closed for this public holiday.

✿ BASTILLE DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: July 14

Bastille Day, or Fête Nationale (National Festival), commemorates the beginning of the French Revolution on July 14, 1789. On this day the people of Paris stormed the Bastille prison to free the political prisoners who were held there for dissenting against the rule of King Louis XVI.

The Bastille was looked upon as a symbol of the absolute authority of the king. Thus its liberation by the people, celebrated on Bastille Day, is seen as a victory of democracy over oppressive rule. The French celebrate this day with fireworks displays and military parades. The most famous among these parades takes place on the Champs-Élysées in Paris. Family and friends gather for parties and barbecues on this day, and firefighters organize special dance parties.

✿ ARMISTICE DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: November 11

Armistice Day, Jour d'Armistice, also known as Remembrance Day, is the anniversary of the signing of the armistice ending World War I in Compiègne, France. France, like all of Europe, suffered tremendous casualties in this war, and the day is set aside to honor the dead and wounded soldiers. In 1918 at the 11th hour of the 11th day in the 11th month, the world rejoiced and celebrated. After four years of bitter war, an armistice was signed. The “war to end all wars” was over.

In England and France, an unknown soldier was buried in each nation’s highest place of honor (in England, Westminster Abbey; in France, the Arc de Triomphe). These memorial gestures all took place on November 11, giving universal recognition of the celebrated end of World War I at 11 A.M. Since, this observance has included all soldiers who died in wars after World War I.

There are special military and ceremonial parades, and special prayer services are held in churches across the nation. The president visits the Arc de Triomphe and pays homage to all soldiers, particularly those who perished in this and later wars. All schools and offices remain closed during this public holiday.

✿ PALM SUNDAY

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: Sunday before Easter

Palm Sunday is an important Christian holiday that falls on the Sunday before Easter. It commemorates Jesus' return to Jerusalem a few days prior to his execution. In those days it was customary to cover, in some manner, the path of persons who were considered highly honorable, as a mark of respect. It is believed that on his arrival in Jerusalem, Jesus was greeted with palm fronds by followers who laid them in his path as he walked along the streets of Jerusalem. Thus the day came to be known as Palm Sunday.

Palm Sunday marks the beginning of Holy Week. In France it is commemorated by a solemn procession of devout Catholics holding palm branches in their hands, led by the church priests, and is followed by a special Palm Sunday Mass.

❁ MAUNDY THURSDAY

Observed by: Roman Catholics
Observed on: Thursday before Easter

Maundy Thursday, also known as Holy Thursday, is a Christian commemoration of the day on which Jesus washed the feet of his apostles before they shared a meal now called the Last Supper. It is called Maundy Thursday because mandatum (a Latin word meaning "commandment") is the first word that was spoken by Jesus before he began washing the feet of his disciples. It was reported that Jesus said, "Mandatum novum do vobis," which translates as "A new commandment I give to you."

Maundy Thursday falls on the Thursday before Easter. In France churches conduct special prayer services. The priest, while celebrating Mass, reenacts scenes from the Last Supper. He washes the feet of 12 chosen parishioners just as Jesus did for his disciples. The mood is somber, and the faithful pray during this day.

❁ PENTECOST

Observed by: Christians
Observed on: Fifty days after Lent (Pentecost Sunday), 51 days after Lent (Pentecost Monday)

Pentecost is celebrated over a two-day period to commemorate the descent of the Holy Spirit on Jesus' disciples. In Greek Pentecost means "the 50th day," and the holiday is so named because it begins 50 days after Easter. The names of Whitsunday and Whitmonday, which are also used in connection with this holiday, refer to the white garments that were worn by those who were baptized during the disciples' vigil. Whitsunday and Monday have been celebrated since the third century. Many of the traditions and celebrations now associated with Pentecost were taken from pagan celebrations of the spring.

The French attend special church prayer services on Pentecost. Also on this day barefoot student pilgrims walk from Notre Dame in Paris to Notre Dame in Chartres in memory of the dying wish of the famous French poet-philosopher Charles Péguy (1873–1914).

In 2005 the French government cancelled the annual Pentecost holiday, celebrated on Whitmonday.

Fun Fact

When Péguy's son Marcel fell seriously ill, he turned him over to the protection of the Virgin and "walked away," promising that if his son recovered, he would make a walking pilgrimage between Notre Dame in Paris and Notre Dame in Chartres, a good 60 miles. Marcel did recover and Péguy kept his vow. He would later repeat the pilgrimage for other causes. In the interwar years as the cult of Péguy grew in France, thousands of people reenacted this concrete devotion yearly. Many still do.

A new law mandated that workers give up the Monday holiday, while their employers paid into a government fund to improve health care for the aged and disabled. This work-ing "Day of Solidarity" was inspired by the devastation of a 2003 heat wave that killed 15,000 people, mostly elderly, and the French government hoped to raise $2.6 billion by these means for health services. But anger emerged over the plan, fueled by discontent about economic conditions, including unemployment and budget cuts, and the inconvenience of losing an important occasion for leisure, when individuals and families schedule brief vacations. The French felt the loss of the holiday more strongly because two other annual holidays, on May 1 and May 8 (May Day and Liberation Day), each fell on Sundays in 2005, meaning there had been no days off. Strikes disrupted the country's public transportation, workers stayed away from work, and students, from school.

CHRISTMAS

Observed by: Christians
Observed on: December 24–25

Christmas, a day of great joy for Christians the world over, celebrates the birth of Jesus. In France, Christmas celebrations begin on Christmas Eve (December 24), and continue until December 26. On December 24, Catholic families attend church and offer prayers in a special midnight Mass. Afterward either they sit down to a huge feast at home or in a restaurant or café that is open late.

On Christmas Day the festivities continue with church services and the enjoyment of special Christmas delicacies, and friends and relatives visit each other and exchange gifts. Children open gifts they have received from Father Christmas (Père Noël). Families gather at lunch or dinner to celebrate Christmas with a special feast. Turkey, goose, and chicken are typical centerpieces of the meal, though particular preparations differ from region to region. There is also an elaborate chocolate cake baked in the shape of and decorated like a log of wood called bûche de noel, made especially for this holiday. This cake has its origins in pagan Gallic celebrations.

Christmas decorations are often prepared well in advance of Christmas. The lights and decorations of Paris are world famous. A crèche, or manger scene with figures of Joseph, Mary, and the baby Jesus, along with shepherds and the Three Wise Men, are placed in all churches and some homes.

Rites of Passage

❁ MARRIAGE

Typically there are two wedding ceremonies in France: a civil ceremony and a church ceremony. The civil ceremony is very short and is conducted by the local mayor. He legalizes the wedding after reading an excerpt from the French constitution and declaring the couple husband and wife.

The second wedding ceremony is religious in nature and normally takes place inside a church, conducted by a priest in front of family and friends.

At the wedding reception, a toast is made to the newlyweds. The couple drinks from special goblets

Weddings and the French

Many wedding customs that are followed today in Western cultures trace their beginnings to French wedding traditions. The concept of the bridal trousseau (the personal outfit of a bride, clothes, accessories, and linens) originated in France. The word comes from the French word trousse, which means "bundle."

During wedding receptions, the guests and the couple often raise a toast. This is also a French custom. In earlier days a small crumb of toast was dropped into the couple's drink to symbolize good health.

that may be family heirlooms. Some French couples also serve a special dessert known as croquembouche instead of the traditional wedding cake. The revelers pop the corks on champagne bottles with a saber specially made for this purpose. This custom dates back to the time of Napoleon. In those days skilled horsemen, astride horses, would ride past ladies holding up champagne bottles and cut off the corks with sharp sabers.

After a long wedding reception the couple retires to their new home. Sometimes close friends appear on their doorstep singing and clanging pots and pans. The groom is expected to entertain his boisterous guests with snacks and drinks.

Introduction

❁ HISTORY

Twenty-nine archaeological sites in the Iwokrama rain forest in central Guyana indicate significant Archaic (7000–3500 B.C.E.) and Horticultural occupations. Although no evidence of Paleo-Indians has yet been found, it will likely come to light based on what seems to be a presence in Guyana and the Amazonian basin. Archaic period sites include petroglyphs (carvings or inscriptions in rocks), sharpening grooves, and a chipping station. The varied range of sites suggests that Archaic peoples both processed local products and manufactured stone tools. Other sites show permanency of occupation, the sort of stability typical of fisheries and horticultural activities.

Guiana's petroglyphs commonly belong to the Enumerative and Fish Trap (2050–1600 B.C.E.) petroglyph traditions. Enumerative petroglyphs, mainly found in the South Rupununi savannahs, as their name suggests, provide a count of the animals caught during a hunting or fishing trip.

Around 4,000 years ago Guiana's major rivers were reduced to deep pools by a severe drought. The types of fish to be caught in the deep pools differed from one pool to the next. In order to tell other people which kind of trap to use, fish traps were drawn on rocks near specific pools so they would know the kind of fish available there. Hence the name, fish trap petroglyphs.

When Christopher Columbus (1451–1506) visited the country in 1498, he found the indigenous South American and Caribbean tribes. Columbus named the area Land of Pariahs.

By the mid-17th century, the Dutch, English, and French had all established colonies in the region.

In 1817 France took complete control of the region. Sugar and timber production were carried out by the slaves imported from Africa. When slavery was abolished in 1848 the sugar industry in French Guiana almost collapsed. In 1850 following its abolition, the French tried bringing in boatloads of Indians, Malays, and Chinese to work the plantations. Most of these immigrants ended up opening shops in Cayenne and other towns.

In the 19th century, France used French Guiana as a penal colony to reduce the cost of maintaining prisons in

Devil's Island

Devil's Island is a small island off the coast of French Guiana. Until 1946 Devil's Island was a French penal colony, renowned as one of the most horrible prisons in the world, from which escape was almost impossible. Surrounded by ocean and impenetrable jungles, only a handful of convicts ever managed to escape.

Opened by the French Emperor Napoleon III (1808–73) in 1852, Devil's Island housed political prisoners, hardened criminals, and the most notorious thieves. Prisoners were subjected to brutal treatment and kept in filthy cells. Initially the island housed only one prison; later the French built prison facilities at Kourou on the French Guiana mainland. Hundreds of prisoners were crammed in small rooms with tin roofs. Most of the prisoners died due to disease and suffocation. Food was slipped into the room, and dead bodies removed—both once a day. Due to the harsh environment of the prison and the fact that more than 80,000 prisoners died within its walls, the island earned the name Devil's Island.

Ex-convicts wrote several books about surviving Devil's Island early in the 20th century when it was still a prison. One of the best-known books written about Devil's Island is Papillon. It was written by an ex-convict, Henri Charrière, who was imprisoned in the penal colony in 1931 for murdering a pimp. The book provides a convict's view of the treatment meted out to prisoners and also details numerous escape attempts undertaken by the convict and his final successful escape.

Probably the most famous man ever imprisoned on the island was Alfred Dreyfus (1859–1935). His case became a cause célèbre that stirred controversy regarding critical French institutions and issues, including the antagonism between monarchists and republicans, the political parties, the ongoing meddling of the Catholic Church in political affairs, the army's reputation, and brought anti-Semitic prejudices to the fore. Dreyfus was a captain in the French army; he was also a Jew. In 1894 he was accused of treason, secretly court-martialed and found guilty, and sentenced to life imprisonment on Devil's Island.

In spite of the fact that an outspoken anti-Semite lieutenant colonel named Georges Picquart pointed to a Major Walsin Esterhazy as the guilty party, the French army, more concerned with its image than justice, covered up its mistake, and shipped Picquart off to Tunisia as punishment. What by now was being called “The Dreyfus Affair” might have ended there but for novelist Émile Zola's (1840–1902) publication of his now famous “J'accuse!” (“I accuse!”).

The political right and the leadership of the Catholic Church—both fiercely opposed to the Republic—claimed the Dreyfus case was a conspiracy of Jews and Freemasons intended to smear the prestige of the army and ruin France.

Finally, in 1899 the French president pardoned Dreyfus, but it was not until 1906—12 years after the case started—that he was exonerated of the charges and restored to his former military rank. The affair, in the end, strengthened the Republic, largely as a result of the conduct of the army and the Catholic Church.

Almost 100 years after it was opened, France closed the prison at Devil's Island in 1946.

France and to bring in more settlers. Between 1852 and 1939 about 70,000 prisoners were deported from France to the various prisons of French Guiana, the most notorious of these being the one on Devil's Island. It remained a penal colony until just after the end of World War II.

In 1946 French Guiana became an overseas department of France. Paris granted the country autonomy (but not independence) in 1982, and since then the Parti Socialiste Guyanais (PSG) of French Guiana has run the country.

The people of French Guiana enjoy a high standard of living primarily because of the heavy subsidies provided by the French government. In 1968, the European Space Agency established a rocket-launching base in the town of Kourou in French Guiana.

❁ GEOGRAPHY AND CLIMATE

Located in the northern part of South America, French Guiana is bordered by the North Atlantic Ocean to the north, Suriname in the west, and Brazil in the south and east.

Low-lying plains, hills, and small mountains characterize French Guiana's terrain. Bellevue de l'Inini, at 2,792 feet, is the highest point in French Guiana. Important rivers of French Guiana include the Maronia, Sinnamary, Mana, Oyapock, and Approuage.

French Guiana has a tropical climate with hot and humid weather conditions throughout the year. The region is also prone to thunderstorms and heavy showers during the rainy season, which lasts from January to June. The temperature in the region varies from 75°F to 90°F.

Fun Fact

Ancient inhabitants of Guiana believed that a master of animals provided the land with food, and that the souls of dead humans replenished the animal supply—showing a consciousness of the need to preserve the local resources. Such petroglyphs were a means of providing statistical information to the master of animals.

The country is home to a wide variety of flora that includes trees such as grapefruit, apricots, cinnamon, sapodillas, avocados, and rosewood as well as spices like cayenne. It is also a popular destination for bird watchers, and is known for its uniquely healthy jaguar population.

ECONOMY

The economy of French Guiana is heavily dependent on France. Forestry, fishing, and agriculture are the main economic activities of French Guiana. Rice and cassava are the important crops. Export items include shrimp, gold, timber, clothing, and rosewood essence.

The European Space Agency, an organization that consists of the national space organizations of 16 European nations, has used the Guiana Space Center at Kourou since 1968. The Space Center is a major source of revenue, contributing about 25 percent to French Guiana's gross domestic product (GDP).

CULTURE AND LIFESTYLE

French Guiana is predominantly Roman Catholic. French is the national language of French Guiana although French Creole (a dialect mixing the local languages with French) is also widely spoken in the region. In addition, ethnic tribes speak their own languages such as Oyapi, Carib, Macushi, Palicur, Wayana, Arawak, Hixkaryana, and Emerillon. The Boni Maroon are known for their intricate wood-carvings, which are popular among tourists.

In terms of ethnicity French Guiana is home to ethnic blacks, mulattoes (mixed European and African ancestry), Amerindians (descendants of the original inhabitants of the region), Maroons (descendants of escaped slaves who settled largely in the interior parts of French Guiana), whites (Europeans, mainly French), Indonesians, Vietnamese, and Chinese.

Caribbean music and dance are extremely popular in French Guiana, as are pop, rock, rap, and reggae. The biggest celebrations are the Carnivals that take place annually just before Lent. Other than Abolition Day on June 10, French Guiana's national holidays are the same as those of France.

CUISINE

The cuisine of French Guiana is greatly influenced by Chinese, Creole, Indonesian, French, and Vietnamese cooking.

Cayenne pepper, also known as Capsicum frutescens, is the native spice of French Guiana and is found in abundance. It is made from the dried pods of chili peppers and has a strong and pungent smell.

Bouillon d'aoura, the favorite dish of French Guiana, consists of smoked fish, prawns, vegetables, chicken, and crab, served with aoura, a fruit of the savannah trees. Other traditional recipes include afada (a spicy dish made with ripe plantains), azowe (a sweet snack made with corn flour, peanut flour, and sugar), baba (ground unhusked rice), baka kasaba (pastries made from cassava flour), and saramakan chicken (chicken and cassava stew). Drinks made from sugarcane and wines are favorite beverages. A concoction of rum, lime juice, and sugarcane syrup

Tribes of French Guiana

French Guiana is home to numerous ethnic tribes, including the native Caribs, Arawaks, and Macushi, as well as the Boni Maroons, descendants of escaped slaves. Caribs were known as "Galibi," but the Spanish corrupted the name to "Canibal," an error facilitated by the European perception of them as ferocious and warlike, furthered among colonists by the Caribs' ritual scarification. Fishing, agriculture, and basket making are traditional occupations among Caribs. The Arawaks live mainly in the tropical forest regions; forestry is their main occupation. The Boni Maroon tribes are descended from African slaves who escaped from Suriname and settled in the interior of French Guiana. They have traditionally lived as subsistence hunters and gatherers and as farmers. They are also well known for the beauty of their artistic wood carvings.

The Macushi, a group of Amerindians widespread in northern countries of South America, have traditionally practiced sustainable harvesting of forest resources. They speak a North Carib language variously spelled "Makushi," "Makuxi," "Macusi," or "Macussi," and also known as Teweya or Teueia.

The Macushi Amerindians of Nappi are famous for their small figurines crafted from a latex known as balata that they harvest from the bulletwood tree. They have designed, crafted, and sold sculptures, figurines, and other objects for years. The income earned from figurines supports many Nappi families that would otherwise clear forest for farmland or other forms of subsistence.

Public/Legal Holidays

❁ NEW YEAR'S EVE/DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: December 31–January 1

January 1 marks the beginning of the Western (Gregorian) calendar and is celebrated as New Year's Day all over the world. Celebrations and revelries begin the evening of December 31 (New Year's Eve). In the capital city of Cayenne, people attend New Year's Eve parties to usher in the new year. Singing, dancing, feasting, and drinking are major highlights of the celebrations. As the clock strikes midnight, people cheer the new year's arrival. New Year's Day is a public holiday, spent quietly, recovering from the effects of the revelry.

❁ LABOR DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: May 1

May 1 is celebrated as Labor Day and is also known as May Day and Workers' Day in many parts of the world. It celebrates the importance of workers to their societies. In 1889 the Second International, a consortium of socialist organizations, declared May 1 a day to recognize the contribution of workers around the world, and scheduled the first demonstrations and celebrations for the following year 1890. They coordinated this observance with the strike called by the U.S. labor union, the American Federation of Labor (AFL), demanding an eight-hour workday. In French Guiana the observance is a public holiday with government offices, schools, and businesses closed.

❁ VICTORY DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: May 8

Victory Day, Fête de la Victoire (Feast of Victory), commemorates the official end of World War II in Europe. On May 8, 1945, Germany signed an unconditional treaty of surrender to the French and Allied forces. The day is also known as V-E Day, which stands for Victory in Europe. France was defeated and occupied by Germany during much of the war. The Germans set up a nominally free part of France known as Vichy France. French Guiana was officially loyal to the Vichy regime, although there was little contact between the two during the German occupation. In 1940 French Guiana sided with de Gaulle's government in exile and joined the fighting on the side of the Allied forces.

On this day people in French Guiana pay homage to the soldiers who lost their lives during World War II. Special memorial services are held throughout French Guiana, and war veterans march in parades.

❁ ABOLITION DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: June 10

This day commemorates the abolition of slavery in French Guiana and throughout the French colonies on June 10, 1848. During its rule over French Guiana, France had enslaved local ethnic Amerindians and other Caribbean tribes. Most of the slaves, however, were brought from Africa to work on the sugar plantations. Cayenne was surrounded by plantations, some of which had several thousand slaves. After the abolition of slavery, many of the former slaves fled into the jungle where they set up communities similar to the ones they had known in Africa. On this day, the descendants of the former slaves celebrate their liberation. The day is marked by street fairs, art exhibits, and Caribbean dance and music performances.

❁ BASTILLE DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: July 14

Bastille Day, the most important French national holiday, commemorates the beginning of the French Revolution on July 14, 1789. On this day, the people of Paris stormed the prison at the Bastille, which had been a potent symbol of the king's absolute authority and tyranny.

On this day the people of French Guiana gather in the capital of Cayenne, which is festooned with French flags. After an official flag-raising ceremony, there is a parade of French Guianese forces followed by official speeches and performances of French patriotic songs. A French Guiana is home to Kaieteur, the world's highest free-falling waterfall. Although the total height of Venezuela's Angel Falls is greater, its drop occurs in stages. The falls at Kaieteur, in contrast, is one huge, thunderous cataract 328 feet wide made as the Potaro River drops 748 feet straight down, nearly five times the height of Niagara Falls (177–184 feet).

Fun Fact

Fun Fact

Papillon was Charrière's nickname, because he had a butterfly tattooed on his chest (papillon is French for "butterfly").

Fun Fact

The northeast and southwest trade winds converge in what is called the Zone Intertropicale de Convergence (Z.I.C.). Their convergence creates a low-pressure system between November and February that causes the rainy season in French Guiana.

Fun Fact

Because it is an overseas department of France, French Guiana is technically part of the European Union even though it is in South America. The Euro is the national currency of French Guiana.

Fun Fact

A sharp-toothed killer fish, called aimara in French Guianese Creole, lurks alone when stalking prey. Often growing to more than 3 feet in length, its flesh is considered a delicacy when it can be caught.

Fun Fact

Chili is the ancient Aztec name for cayenne pepper.

lot of eating and drinking marks the day's celebrations.

REMEMBRANCE DAY

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: November 11

Remembrance Day, also known as Armistice Day, commemorates the end of World War I on November 11, 1918, after an armistice was signed between the Allies and Germany in a railway carriage at Compiègne in France. Marshal Ferdinand Foch (1851–1929), a French army officer, was the commander in chief of the Allies who led them to victory against the German forces. The armistice treaty was signed at the 11th hour (11 A.M.) of the 11th day of the 11th month.

Because there are few veterans of World War I still alive Remembrance Day has evolved to honor the soldiers of both world wars. In French Guiana, the president of the General Council and other state officials attend a memorial service. Other highlights of the day include the observance of two minutes of silence in honor of the victims and soldiers, prayer services, political speeches, wreath-laying ceremonies, and the singing of devotional hymns.

War veterans of both world wars living in French Guiana march in parades.

Religious Holidays

EPIPHANY

Celebrated by: Christians
Observed on: January 6

Epiphany, called La Fête des Rois ("The Feast of the Three Kings") in French Guiana, celebrates the visit of the Three Kings, or Magi, to the infant Jesus in Bethlehem. In French Guiana, as in France, it is traditional on this day to serve a galette des rois ("cake of the kings"). A charm (often a bean or small figurine) is baked into the cake. Whoever gets the charm in his or her piece of cake is crowned the king or queen and can choose a partner.

CARNIVAL

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: Last two weeks before Lent

Carnival, the biggest celebration in French Guiana, is a lively event, combining Caribbean traditions with French joie de vivre. In Guiana Carnival is called Tululu. Carnival celebrations, which began in 1848 after the abolition of slavery, span two weeks. They end on Mardi Gras (which means "Fat Tuesday" in French), which is the day before Ash Wednesday, the first day of Lent. Mardi Gras is traditionally the last burst of frivolity before the sober Christian period of abstinence and reflection known as Lent.

During Carnival in the capital city of Cayenne and other parts of French Guiana, people dress up in colorful and outlandish costumes, participate in parades, and attend the many parties that are being held. Carnival starts with the arrival of King Vaval, an effigy representing the spirit of Carnival. Vaval arrives in a canoe and is met by a large crowd gathered on the beach to welcome him. The festivities officially end with the burning of Vaval. The other important characters in Carnival are the Touloulous, the carnival queens. These women wear masks and dress from head to toe in lace and petticoats, tights, and gloves. They even disguise their voices when they speak so as not to be recognized. Like Vaval, the Touloulous embody the spirit of the Carnival with their brazen abandon.

PALM SUNDAY

Observed by: Christians
Observed on: Sunday before Easter

Palm Sunday is an important Christian holiday that falls on the Sunday before Easter. It commemorates Jesus' return to Jerusalem a few days prior to his execution. In those days, it was customary to cover, in some manner, the path of persons who were considered highly honorable, as a mark of respect. It is believed that on his arrival in Jerusalem, Jesus was greeted with palm fronds by followers who laid them in his path as he walked along the streets of Jerusalem. Thus the day came to be known as Palm Sunday.

Palm Sunday marks the beginning of Holy Week. On Palm Sunday devout Catholics attend a special Palm Sunday Mass where they receive tokens made of strips of palm frond.

MAUNDY THURSDAY

Observed by: Christians
Observed on: Thursday before Easter

Holy Thursday, also known as Maundy Thursday, is a Christian commemoration of the day on which Jesus washed the feet of his disciples before they shared a meal now called the Last Supper. It falls on the Thursday before Easter. It is also called Maundy Thursday because maundatum (a Latin word meaning “commandment”) is said to be the first word spoken by Jesus before he washed the disciples’ feet. It was reported that Jesus said, “Mandatum novum do vobis,” “A new commandment I give to you.”

In Catholic churches special prayer services are held. The priest, while celebrating Mass, reenacts the scenes from the Last Supper, washing the feet of 12 chosen parishioners just as Jesus did for his disciples. The mood is somber, and the faithful pray during this day.

❁ GOOD FRIDAY

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: Friday before Easter

The Christian holiday of Good Friday commemorates the Crucifixion of Jesus Christ. A somber, solemn occasion, it falls on the Friday before Easter and is the last Friday of Lent (an austere season of fasting and penitence).

Most Guianese observe a fast, eschewing meat and dairy, from Ash Wednesday (the first day of Lent), for the entire 40 days before Good Friday and a partial fast until Easter. Some fast only on Ash Wednesday and Good Friday, marking the beginning and the end of the period of fast.

Guianese Christians attend special prayer services. Local churches stage Passion plays, reenacting Jesus Christ’s final moments before the Crucifixion. Devout Catholics fast on Good Friday, and in churches a ritual called the Stations of the Cross is performed. This is a reenactment of Jesus’ final journey to Golgotha as he carried the Cross to his Crucifixion.

❁ EASTER

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: First Sunday after Lent

Easter is a Christian feast that is observed on the first Sunday following Lent to celebrate Jesus’ Resurrection from the dead three days after his Crucifixion. On the night before Easter, French Guianese attend a midnight prayer service at their local churches and after the priest announces Christ’s Resurrection, people turn to greet one another and offer prayers to God. On Easter people visit friends and family, sharing a lavish Easter dinner.

The first Monday after Lent is celebrated as Easter Monday. It is a continuation of the Easter cel-bration and because it is a national holiday, government offices, schools, and businesses are closed.

❁ ASCENSION DAY

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: Forty days after Easter

The Feast of the Ascension is a day of celebration for Christians, commemorating Jesus’ Ascension into heaven 40 days after his Resurrection on Easter. On this day, special prayer services are held in churches all over French Guiana, which are widely attended.

❁ PENTECOST

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: Fifty days after Lent

Both the Sunday and Monday of this holiday celebrate the day on which Christians believe the Holy Spirit descended upon Jesus’ disciples. They are often called Whitsunday and Whitmonday, respectively. Devout Catholics attend Mass on both days. Pentecost Monday is an official holiday with government offices, businesses, and schools closed for the day.

❁ ASSUMPTION

Observed by: Roman Catholics

Observed on: August 15

The Feast of the Assumption commemorates Jesus’ mother Mary rising up to heaven. On this day devout Catholics in French Guiana attend prayer services in their local churches and offer prayers to the Virgin Mary.

❁ ALL SAINTS’ DAY

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: November 1

All Saints’ Day is a Christian feast, honoring all the saints (both known and unknown). It is an annual religious celebration, which takes place on November 1.

On All Saints’ Day, devout Catholics in French Guiana attend Mass in honor of the saints and offer prayers.

The Emerillions are the smallest group of Guiana’s Amerindian population. They live in the Canopi region.

ALL SOULS' DAY

Observed by: Roman Catholics

Observed on: November 2

All Souls' Day is a Roman Catholic festival held in remembrance of the departed. It is usually celebrated on November 2 unless it falls on a Sunday, in which case the commemoration is celebrated on Monday. The abbot of Cluny, St. Odilo, introduced this day in the 11th century. It follows All Saints' Day.

In French Guiana three Masses are conducted on All Souls' Day: one honoring the clerics, one honoring the departed, and the last honoring the pope. Also on this day the Guianese visit cemeteries and place flowers and candles at the graves of their deceased relatives. It is traditional to eat dishes made from lentils and peas.

CHRISTMAS

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: December 24–25

The Christian festival of Christmas celebrates the birth of Jesus, whom Christians believe to be the Son of God. On Christmas Eve (December 24) French Guianese Catholics attend a Midnight Mass that includes readings from the Bible pertaining to Jesus' birth and church choirs singing devotional hymns and carols. In many churches children perform nativity plays.

On Christmas children open gifts brought by Father Christmas (Père Noël). Later the Guianese visit friends and family, and exchange gifts and greetings.

Rites of Passage

BIRTH

The birth of a child is greeted with celebrations among the Maroon tribes (such as the Aluku, also known as Boni Maroon) of French Guiana. The Boni Maroon believe in the theory of nenseki (transmigration of the soul), the idea that, if a soul has led a good life and dies, it returns to the world as another animal or, sometimes, as a human again.

The birth of twins, however, has traditionally evoked strong divergent reactions, depending on the tribe. While some groups deified twins, others saw them as evidence of evil forces and killed them at birth. In many cases even the mother of the twins was killed, since it was believed that evil spirits had possessed her.

In modern Guiana the vast majority of people have embraced Christianity, and children are baptized according to Christian tradition.

COMING OF AGE

Among the Amerindians of French Guiana a girl is thought to have come of age when she has her first menstrual period. These tribes believe that the menstrual blood can attract monstrous spirits by its smell, so girls are taught how to protect themselves from evil spirits during their menses. They are advised not to go to the river, the kitchen, or to the community center, meet villagers, or even participate in any community work.

When boys, on the other hand, reach puberty, they undergo a period of rigorous training and seclusion to become what the tribes call "faith healers," or true tribesmen. They are trained to become breadwinners and also taught the ways of the governing council.

MARRIAGE

Earlier the Amerindians did not marry outside their community, but over time this has changed. Nowadays they marry freely outside their communities, and the tribes have mingled. When two Amerindian youth decide to get married, the boy's family visits the girl's home with the formal marriage proposal. If the marriage proposal is accepted by the girl's family, both sides offer each other cigarettes. Before marriage both the boy and the girl are subjected to various tests to prove their competence for marriage and its responsibilities. The boy has to prove himself as a farmer, artisan, and hunter, whereas the girl has to prove herself to be an accomplished weaver, potter, and basket maker.

Introduction

❁ HISTORY

Extensive archaeological research in what is now the Republic of Gabon began during the 1980s and has focused on the Ogooue River Valley because it appears to have served as a major prehistoric trade route and, much later, provided accessible routes for successive waves of Bantu-speaking peoples from Nigeria and Cameroon. The major ridge lines in Gabon are generally oriented in a north-south direction, and numerous elephant trails along the ridge lines were probably used by early humans migrating south. Artifacts found at various sites indicate that the Ogooue was inhabited by Stone Age hunter-gatherers, a succession of Neolithic peoples, and waves of Iron Age groups. (In central Africa no evidence of a Copper Age has yet been found, so the Iron Age comes right after the Neolithic phase.)

During the Stone Age, which ends around 5000–4500 B.C.E., technology apparently developed gradually in a stable population, and the acquisition of better hunting equipment, such as the bow and arrow gave hunters greater mobility and accuracy. Most of the dating for sites and artifacts in the Ogooue Valley must be done by comparison to other sites where there is a clear stratigraphic record, but three layers at one site, which archaeologists named Lope 2, have been dated. The first, and oldest layer, was used around 10,000 years ago; the second layer evidences use about 9,000 years ago; and the third layer, the youngest, is around 7,000 years old.

Beginning during the Neolithic and progressing through the Iron Age, a variety of successive cultures indicates successive migratory waves coming into the region. The sudden appearance in the Ogooue of polished stone implements and pottery around 2500 may mean that Neolithic peoples moved into the valley from some other place.

The upper Holocene (3,000 B.C.E. to the present) shows a series of migrations of iron-working Bantu peoples from the vicinity of the Nigeria-Cameroon border into the Ogooue from 1500 to the start of the Christian era. These groups apparently replaced the inhabitants already living there although it is possible that the Neolithic peoples may have coexisted with the ironworkers. The ceramic arts are well represented by successive, often very different, styles, and the furnaces used by the ironworkers become increasingly

Fun Fact

When it became possible to import large quantities of containers from Europe, the pottery traditions that had lasted about 4,500 years in the Ogooue Valley quickly became extinct, and pottery is no longer made or used.

technologically sophisticated. Of particular interest from this period are widely distributed petroglyphs (carvings or inscriptions on a rock) found on boulders along the Ogooue River.

A form of open-air rock art was first found in the area in 1987. Since then an intensive search has found more than 1,000 petroglyphs up and down the Ogooue Valley, mostly on rounded or flat rock outcrops. Unfortunately local oral traditions and historical accounts both fail to mention these works, and the people who now inhabit the valley ignore them.

Although dating such open-air artwork is virtually impossible, from the patina on the figures and the fact that they were made with iron chisels, the petroglyphs seem to be the work of Iron Age peoples. This makes them roughly contemporaneous with the beginning of the Christian era and attributable to the several waves of Bantu speakers. Additional evidence for this interpretation is provided by an archaeological site less than 700 feet from petroglyphs on Elarmekora Hill, where pottery shards were found adorned with concentric circles identical to the petroglyphs.

The petroglyphs appear to have been carefully thought out because at least some of the figures were first roughly drawn with faint rectangular lines. The actual designs were then pecked out, probably with iron chisels, leaving thousands of tiny round depressions. A great variety of petroglyphs have been described. They fall into two broad categories: abstract designs such as triangles and the concentric circles already mentioned, and representational figures, many of small four-footed animals, suggestive of a symbolism related to hunting, lizards, insects, and, at one site, what may be fertility symbols used in initiation rituals.

The Portuguese were the first Europeans to enter the region, arriving in 1472 C.E. Gabon owes its name to the Portuguese, who named it gabao, after the shape of the Komo River estuary. In Portuguese, a gabao is “a coat with sleeves and hood.” But the Portuguese concentrated their activities on the nearby islands of São Tomé and Bioko instead of Gabon. By the 16th century the region had become a hub for slave trading and had also attracted the Dutch, French, and English, who visited the coastal regions for commercial purposes, trading in ivory and precious tropical woods in addition to slaves.

Among the European powers France was most interested in establishing a colony in Gabon and in 1839 and 1841 signed treaties with the coastal chiefs and declared the coastal region a French Protectorate. In 1849 the French founded Libreville, meaning “free city,” as a settlement for freed slaves.

Although the Congress of Vienna had abolished the slave trade in 1815 and although French naval patrols reduced the number enslaved and shipped, slaves continued to be exported from the Gabon coast until the 1880s.

France established its dominance in the whole of Gabon in 1885, but it did not officially administer control over the region until 1903. At the beginning of the 20th century private French companies began exploiting the local people and using them for forced labor. Made to work under inhuman conditions and brutally treated, the Gabonese responded to such treatment with periodic revolts and uprisings that were suppressed by French forces. French exploitation of the region’s natural resources is evident from the fact that, by the end of World War I, most of the forests of Gabon were destroyed, and most of the country’s natural resources exhausted.

Early in the 20th century the Gabonese began to intensify their freedom movement. In 1910 Gabon joined with Chad, Central African Republic, and Republic of the Congo Brazzaville to form French Equatorial Africa, a federation that lasted until 1959. After World War II, as the independence wave washed over colonies throughout the world, Gabon too pressed its demand for self-determination. The French relented, though reluctantly, and granted independence to Gabon on August 17, 1960.

Léon M’Ba (1902–67) was sworn in as the first president of the Republic of Gabon, remaining in office until his death. In that year the reins of power were entrusted to Albert-Bernard Bongo (b. 1935). He converted to Islam and assumed a new name El Hadj Omar Bongo. He also declared Gabon a one-party state and maintained his own power. Until 1990 the Gabonese Democratic Party (PDG) was the only legalized national political party in the country.

Bongo’s appointment as president coincided with rising oil prices and the discovery of large manganese and uranium deposits in Gabon. The economy boomed. With untold wealth flowing into Gabon and Gabonese confidence at an all-time high, the era came to be known as the “Gabonese Miracle.” The miracle lasted for a decade, after which the slump in international oil prices materially affected the country’s economy.

In 1990 after popular discontent had produced seven days of rioting in Port-Gentil, Bongo submitted to the demands of the Gabonese people and legalized the existence of other political parties. In the elections held since 1990 Bongo has been declared the winner each time and, in the early 21st century, amid charges of election fraud, he still held the office of president of the Republic of Gabon. In the turbulence of African politics where coups are common, Gabon is an exception: Bongo’s presidency spans more than three decades. In 2003 Bongo directed the parliament to alter Gabon’s constitution to allow him to run for president as many times as he desires.

❁ GEOGRAPHY AND CLIMATE

The Republic of Gabon is located in western Africa and is flanked by Cameroon to the north, Republic of the Congo (Brazzaville) to the south and the east, and Equatorial Guinea to the northwest. Libreville is its capital. The Ogooue River is the lifeline of Gabon and geographically divides the country into two as it flows through Franceville and Lambarene into the Atlantic Ocean. The Cristal Mountains, almost 3,000 feet high, are located in the northern part of Gabon. The Chaillu Mountains are located in the central part of the country and are home to the highest peak in Gabon, Mount Iboundji, which stands 3,189 feet high.

More than three-fourths of Gabon is covered by dense equatorial rain forests, which are home to an encyclopedic variety of flora and fauna. From ebony to the climbing palm, rubber vines to purple hearts (hardwood tree), Gabon has a rich variety of flora. Gabon is also home to snakes, vipers, and pythons along with monkeys, baboons, crocodiles, and even endangered gorillas.

Gabon has an equatorial climate characterized by high temperatures, coupled with humidity throughout the year, and heavy rainfall from June to September. The annual average temperature is 81° F.

❁ ECONOMY

Gabon is economically more prosperous than most of its neighbors and enjoys good trade relations with America and Europe. The country has a vast amount of natural resources, both minerals and wood. Oil is the major revenue generator of Gabon's economy, in addition to timber and manganese. But the lack of proper infrastructure facilities and financing hinders the development of these resources. The country also does not have a large enough workforce and depends on immigrants to meet the labor needs of retailing, transportation, and artisanship.

Gabon has become a leader in the fight against human trafficking on the African sub-continent, and has passed comprehensive anti-trafficking legislation in recent years.

❁ CULTURE AND LIFESTYLE

Gabon is home to the descendants of the Bantu-speaking tribes as well as a small group of Bongon, a people once called pygmies. The Bantu descendants are divided into 10 major ethnic groups. Prominent among them are the Fang, who reside in the north and northeastern parts of Gabon. The Myene people live in the coastal regions, the Eshira are based in southwestern Gabon, and the Mbede live in the southeast.

In ancient times the Fang were warriors who practiced cannibalism. This practice had stopped by the early 17th century. By the 19th century some Fang were engaged in hunting to take advantage of the growing demand for ivory, while others became farmers, practicing slash-and-burn forest-clearing techniques. Farming is still the primary occupation of the Fang in modern-day Gabon.

Between 50 and 75 percent of the Gabonese are Christians. French is the official language, although most Gabonese converse in the native African Fang language. While Bapunu is widely spoken in the southern region, Bandgabi is spoken around Franceville.

Music and dance are integral to Gabonese culture. Specially crafted drums, the balafone (xylophone), and the sanza (a stringed instrument, also called mbira) are some of the popular musical instruments in Gabon. The shape of these instruments and their style of playing have remained unchanged for centuries. They are played in accordance with the traditions of each tribe and produce rhythms expressing happiness or sorrow according to the occasion. Gabonese folklore enjoys a distinct place in its culture and involves recitation of ancient tales (half-spoken and half-sung), accompanied by traditional musical instruments.

Guardian figures (wooden figurines) made by the Fang are placed on wooden boxes that contain the bones of their ancestors. These figures are intended to scare away intruders and protect the ancestral bones. It is believed that the bones contain the power of the dead and are carefully preserved.

The traditional art of carving wooden masks is a specialty of the Gabonese ethnic groups; masks play an important role in many rituals and ceremonies. The Fang believe that these masks help them keep in touch with the world of the dead. In ancient times, these wooden masks were prepared under the watchful eye of a priest, who ensured that

Fun Fact

The world's smallest crocodilians, known as "dwarf crocs," are found in the rain forests of Gabon. They grow to a length of five feet, which is small when compared to the 20- to 25-foot crocodiles found in other parts of the world. Dwarf crocodiles are an endangered species since they are being killed indiscriminately for their meat.

Fang Masks: Inspiration for Picasso and Matisse

The 20th-century painters Pablo Picasso and Henri Matisse both owned Fang masks. Matisse's Portrait of Madame Matisse (1913) was inspired by a Fang mask. It is believed that although Matisse started the portrait with a clear picture in mind, he decided to omit the familiar features while painting the face. The painting took on a masklike representation, much like the Fang masks in Matisse's collection.

Picasso's Les Femmes d'Alger (O. J. R. M.) (1907), one of the great paintings in modern art, shows two female figures with masks resembling a Gabon Mahongwe mask.

the best wood was used. The entire process of crafting masks required great attention to detail since any sloppiness might anger the spirits, causing disease and death. It was believed that, after a mask was made, it assumed supernatural powers and acted as a window to the world of the spirits. Fang masks have inspired such Western artists as Picasso and Matisse.

CUISINE

Although the cooking of Gabon has been influenced by Arab, Portuguese, French, and British styles of cuisine, it remains essentially true to its indigenous roots and its recipes are typical of much West African cooking. Among the Fang and other Gabonese tribes, the traditional diet includes rice, yams, and cassava (a perennial woody shrub). Chicken is extremely popular and is a featured ingredient in many Gabonese dishes. Besides chicken, grasscutter (a large rodent), porcupine, antelope, and big forest snails are also common on the menu in many Gabonese restaurants. Porridge made of gari (grated fresh cassava), accompanied by a spicy sauce, is also served. Nyembwe (a chicken dish made with palm nuts) and stuffed crab are classic dishes of Gabon. Palm nut is also used to make cooking oil. Favorite beverages include wine made from bananas and a light beer made from millet.

Baked Bananas

Serves 8

Ingredients:

- 8 bananas, cut into three uniformly diagonal pieces
- 1 egg, beaten lightly
- 2 Tbs. orange juice
- 1/2 c. bread crumbs
- 1/2 c. vegetable oil
- sour cream
- brown sugar

Preparation:

Preheat oven to 350°F.

Combine orange juice with beaten eggs. Heat the oil in a sauce pan. Dip the bananas in the egg mixture, then coat with the bread crumbs. Sauté the bananas until they begin to brown lightly, then use a spatula to place them on a cookie sheet and bake them at 350° for five minutes.

Serve 1 banana per guest and top each with 3 Tbs. of sour cream and 1 Tbs. of brown sugar.

This is a wonderfully flexible basic recipe and many variations are possible. For example, the bananas can be dipped in the egg mixture, then either in shredded coconut or chopped peanuts and baked for five minutes. Or the bananas can be coated in a blend of cracker crumbs, curry powder, and cayenne pepper before sautéing.

LABOR DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: May 1

Labor Day, also called May Day and Workers' Day, commemorates the important role played by workers in their societies. The May 1 observance of Labor Day was decreed by the Second Socialist International in 1889 to coincide with a general strike in the United States scheduled by the American Federation of Labor (AFL) to occur in 1890 to win an eight-hour workday.

In Gabon Labor Day is a very important holiday. Workers, wearing their uniforms, parade through towns and cities. Some carry their tools and provide demonstrations of their work. For example the firemen in Gabon display their fire-fighting skills by conducting fire drills for the public.

Food and wine are also an integral part of Labor Day celebrations in Gabon. Families prepare big meals, sharing them with other workers and their families. Palm wine is a favorite beverage during Labor Day festivities. After the meal, people dance to local music.

The French granted Gabon full independence on August 17, 1960, after it agreed to a treaty of cooperation with France. Independence Day, or National Day, celebrations are held in different parts of Gabon, and festivities are spread over three days, between August 16 and August 18.

The Gabonese celebrate this holiday with great enthusiasm from the capital city of Libreville to the most remote village. Official speeches, parades by the armed forces, and cultural activities such as traditional dance and music performances are integral parts of Independence Day celebrations.

Religious Holidays

✿ EASTER

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: First Sunday after Lent

Christians celebrate Easter in remembrance of Jesus' Resurrection three days after his Crucifixion. It falls on the first Sunday after Lent. The Bwiti religion, widely practiced in many parts of the country, blends Christian practices with indigenous beliefs. The Bwiti Easter lasts for four days, beginning the Thursday before Good Friday (Maundy Thursday) and continuing until Easter Sunday. Adherents of the Bwiti religion take iboga, a sacred hallucinogenic plant, in the evening rituals that are a part of the Easter celebrations. People dance and sing joyfully throughout the festivities.

Easter Monday is celebrated on the Monday after Easter. Symbolizing the rolling away of the stone from the mouth of Jesus' tomb, egg-rolling competitions are a major highlight of this celebration. People compete in rolling their beautifully decorated Easter eggs down a slope or designated path.

The Bwiti Religion

Bwiti is a syncretic religion that borrows from animist beliefs as well as traditional Christian concepts. An ever-evolving religion, it has many sects, each of which has its own founding father as well as its own interpretation of Christian principles. Each sect has its own temple or place of worship, with a distinctive central axis or akun, which distinguishes the temples belonging to various sects. The akun is decorated with symbolic designs that reflect the the cosmic tree.

The Bwiti is an open religion with no secrets relating to the rites of passage, and initiates can be inducted into more than one sect without any conflict. Moreover no rivalry exists among the different sects, making it a uniquely tolerant religion.

✿ CHRISTMAS

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: December 24–25

Christmas marks the birth of Jesus, and it is celebrated with great enthusiasm in Gabon. Devout Roman Catholics attend Mass on Christmas Eve and afterward dance and sing. Drums are an important part of Christmas Eve celebrations, as people sway to traditional hymns sung to the beat of drums.

On Christmas Day Catholics attend morning Mass. Many women kneel outside the church in reverence before entering the church to offer prayers to Jesus. They wear new clothes and pray at the Nativity scene, which depicts the baby Jesus in the manger.

Rites of Passage

✿ BIRTH

The birth of a child is greeted with great delight in Gabon. A lavish feast is prepared, and friends and family members from far and near take part in the celebrations.

❁ COMING OF AGE

Among the Bwiti, initiation rites are a weeklong event. The key element in the ritual is the hallucinogenic iboga, which is used by the various Bwiti sects in Gabon. The Bwiti religion is a fusion of indigenous and Christian beliefs.

Bwiti initiation rites may only be administered by people who themselves have undergone the rituals. However, all the villagers participate in the ceremonies, and each one is assigned a specific task of singing, drumming, or dancing during the festivities. The rites are composed of three phases of symbolic acts: The first phase begins the process of symbolic death, which is completed in the second phase. The third phase represents rebirth. The ceremonies guide the initiate through these three phases and bring him back into the world (rebirth) as an adult member of the community.

This symbolic rite is performed by administering the hallucinogenic iboga. It is given to the initiates, and the Bwiti believe that they experience spiritual revelations after consuming this sacred plant. They achieve clarity of thought as well as peace of mind. The initiates are assumed to be in the state of “sacred knowing.” The deeper the stillness of mind, the greater the insight of the initiates. Their experiences during this period will lay the foundation for fundamental changes in their adult lives.

❁ MARRIAGE

Polygamy is part of the Gabonese social order and is a common feature of both traditional and civil marriages. However in a civil marriage the law requires the couple to declare whether they want to have a monogamous or polygamous relationship. A common-property law governs monogamous married couples, while in polygamous relationship the property rights of wives are severely reduced in the event of a divorce or separation.

❁ DEATH

The Gabonese believe in the powers of their ancestral spirits. In ancient times people preserved the bones of their ancestors in a closed wooden box and kept a guardian figure to protect it. They believed that the bones of the ancestors held supernatural powers and hence needed to be preserved and protected.

Traditional rituals also involve removing certain body parts and cleansing the corpse before burial.

Introduction

Republic of The Gambia, a former British colony, was granted the right of self-governance in 1963 and became an independent nation on February 18, 1965. The Gambia (or Gambia) is named after the river Gambia, which owes its name to the Portuguese, who carried on trade in the region and named it câmbio meaning “trade” or “exchange.” Gambia is the British pronunciation of the Portuguese word câmbio.

❁ HISTORY

The history of The Gambia can be traced back to 500 C.E. when the region was endowed with agricultural prosperity and the knowledge of smelting iron. The iron was turned into tools, cookware, and weapons and helped develop trade in the region. Between 500 and 1000, numerous stone circles were built between the Saloum and Gambia Rivers. The British Isles are well known for their ancient stone circles and menhirs, especially Stonehenge and the large ceremonial complex at Avebury, and similar stone structures are found throughout Europe, the Near East, and North America. Few, however, know about the stone circles found in The Gambia and southern Senegal, which have between 10 and 24 standing stones. Although not as old as those of Europe, their construction was just as labor intensive, and the people who built them left hundreds behind. The sizes and shapes of the stones vary, though many are round with a flat top. Some are square, some have a ball cut in the top of the stone, and some smaller stones have a cup-shaped hollow on top. The largest stones found, thought to weigh as much as ten tons apiece, are at Niai Kunda.

Most of the stones are laterite, a red-brown iron-bearing sandstone, common in the area. Laterite was a perfect medium for working because it is a relatively unstable rock, which makes it easy to quarry. However, once exposed to air it hardens and is capable of withstanding considerable weathering, as The Gambia's circles attest. Lab tests performed at the University of Dakar have dated the stones to around 750 (±110), before the Mandinka moved into the region. In spite of excavations, which found human remains, not much is known about the stones, their meaning, or the symbolism implied by their differences. The circles almost certainly were communal cemeteries. Some group, or even groups, had the time, the workforce, and the desire to construct them. The reasons for the various shapes, as well as the identity of the engineers who built them, remain mysteries.

Fun Fact

King Bojang sold St. Mary's Island to the British for about US$45, which they paid with cash, rum, tobacco, and guns.

Fun Fact

Despite the end of British rule in 1965, the queen of England, Queen Elizabeth II (b. 1926), continues to be the titular head of state of the Republic of The Gambia.

By 1000 trade had increased significantly between the countries in the northern and southern regions of the Sahara. It is believed that the region was part of the Ghana Empire and the Songhai Empire successively. Around the 14th century Gambia became part of the Mali Empire, founded by the charismatic ruler Sundiata Keita (c. 1190–c. 1255). The Mali Empire was the dominant force in the Sahara and controlled trans-Saharan trade, which brought it in contact with the powerful Arab chieftains. The Mali Empire was influenced by the teachings of Islam and eagerly embraced the religion. But by the 15th century the influence of the Mali Empire was fading, and a group of Malinke (subjects of the Mali Empire) settled in the region near the Gambia River. They brought the teachings of Islam with them and came to be known as Mandinka. The Wolof, from Senegal, and the Fulani, the nomadic West African tribe, also began settling in the region around the same time.

The first European contact in the region came through the Portuguese in 1455, when navigators reached the Gambia River. Slavery was a part of the African culture before the arrival of Europeans. However the Portuguese spread slave trade to other parts of the world and enjoyed a monopoly in this trade until the mid-16th century when their interests were threatened by the French and British. By the end of the 16th century Portuguese rule in the region had ended, and the British and French began fighting for dominance as the slave trade was the main source of revenue in the region. It is estimated that more than 3 million slaves were exported from the region during the colonial period.

The capital city of Banjul was called Bathurst until 1973. In 1816 Tumami Bojang, the king of the Kombos, who owned St. Mary's Island, sold it to the British.

The British established Bathurst, named after Henry Bathurst (1762–1834), third Earl of Bathurst, then the colonial secretary. In 1820 the river Gambia was declared a British Protectorate. Slavery was abolished in all the colonies of the British Empire in 1834. The British tried to put an end to slave trade in the region, but were unsuccessful. In 1886 Gambia became a Crown Colony, and a year later the French and the British settled their ownership dispute in the region by defining the boundaries of Senegal (a French colony) and The Gambia.

British rule in the region continued until 1965, when the country was officially granted independence. Sir Dawda Kairaba Jawara (b. 1924), the leader of the People's Progressive Party (PPP), was sworn in as the first president of the Republic of The Gambia.

The article the was added before Gambia and the country was named "The Republic of The Gambia." The Gambia became a republic in the Commonwealth of Nations in 1970, following a referendum. An unsuccessful coup in 1981 failed to bring a change in leadership. Also in 1982 Senegal and The Gambia signed the Treaty of Confederation, which led to the formation of The Senegambia Confederation. However, the idea of a unified culture and economy failed to win people's votes in both countries, and The Gambia withdrew from the Confederation in 1989.

Sir Dawda Kairaba Jawara remained the president of The Gambia until 1994, when he was forcibly displaced by a military coup led by Lieutenant Yahya A. J. J. Jammeh (b. 1965) and the Armed Forces Provisional Ruling Council (AFPRC). Jammeh was named president of The Gambia, and a transitional plan for restoring democracy was announced by the AFPRC. According to the plan fresh elections took place under international supervision, and Jammeh was reelected president of The Gambia in 2001.

GEOGRAPHY AND CLIMATE

Located in the western part of Africa, The Gambia is largely surrounded by Senegal with the Atlantic Ocean toward the west.

The Gambia River is one of the striking geographical features of the region, and the flood plain is flanked by low hills. It divides the country (lengthwise) into two equal parts. Gambia owes its diverse vegetation to the subtropical climatic conditions. Mangrove forests dominate the areas along the Gambia River, while open savannahs (grasslands dotted with a wide variety of trees) and dry grasslands provide some greenery to the semi-arid Sahel region.

The Gambia has a subtropical climate, characterized by a long dry season followed by a short spell of rain. Humidity is a cause for major discomfort preceding the rainy season. The average day temperature between December and February is 75°F and 86°F from June to September.

ECONOMY

The Gambia has a liberalized market-based economy with agriculture forming its backbone. Agriculture is the primary occupation of more than 75 percent of the population. Groundnuts (similar to peanuts), corn, rice, millet, and sesame are the chief crops.

The government has initiated many economic reforms that have contributed to the development of the region. A major problem is the trafficking of people for sexual exploitation and forced labor, especially children. There is as yet no comprehensive effort on the part of the government to halt these crimes.

❁ CULTURE AND LIFESTYLE

More than 63 percent of the population resides in the rural areas. But each year more and more rural youth are migrating to the cities in search of employment and a better life. Even though the urban population is greatly influenced by Western ideology and values, Gambians across the country still hold onto their traditions. Indigenous dress styles (depending on the tribe or ethnic group), as well as extended families, continue to be an integral part of the society.

The Gambia is home to a wide variety of ethnic groups, each having its own customs, language, and traditions. The Mandinka are the dominant ethnic group, followed by other groups such as the Wolof, the Fula, and Serahule. It is estimated that more than 3,500 non-Africans, including Europeans and people of Lebanese origin, live in The Gambia. Despite the ethnic diversity, there is minimal ethnic violence. Approximately 90 percent of The Gambians are Muslims while 9 percent are followers of Christianity.

The indigenous people have divided their society on the basis of status. Warriors and traditional nobility are at the top, followed by farmers, traders, and tradespeople, such as blacksmiths, weavers, and so forth. The griots (pronounced “GREE oh”), the traditional storytellers are the lowest in the caste system but are held in high esteem, because they are responsible for passing on oral history and traditions and can recite a family or village history from memory. They are the custodians of the histories of the villages and their people.

Greeting each other is an important tradition of The Gambia. The Wolof and the Mandinka people have a special ritual for greeting each other that lasts for half a minute. Even in the urban areas, the greeting may be in French or English, but is never forgotten. It is an integral part of The Gambian culture.

The Gambia has a rich musical tradition. The balafon (similar to a xylophone), ngoni (a lute), drums, and kora (a 21-string harp) are traditionally used as accompaniments during musical performances.

The griots and poets have carried on the ancient tradition of preserving family and village histories by bringing them alive through songs and long narratives. The griots, while playing the kora, sing praises and recite stories of the people’s glorious past, thereby arousing a sense of pride among the ethnic groups. The griots are the living encyclopedia of Gambia’s historical past and the custodians of its rich cultural heritage. They can recite different chapters of tribal history for many hours and even for days on end.

❁ CUISINE

The Gambian cuisine offers a wide variety of traditional delicacies. These include benechin, a rice-based dish cooked in vegetable and fish sauce, and plasas, a fish or meat dish cooked with vegetable leaves in

Greeting Ritual in The Gambia

The greeting ritual begins with the Islamic greeting, Salaam aleikum (“Peace be with you”) and the response, Aleikum salaam (“And peace be with you as well”). Then questions about the well-being of family, friends, and even the village are asked. The answer is given as Al humdulallah (“Thanks be to God”) as everything good (or bad) is taken as God’s will.

palm oil and served with fufu (a starchy accompaniment made of yam or plantain; the African equivalent to mashed potatoes).

In The Gambia, it is customary for people to eat from a communal bowl. Mats are spread on the ground, and the food bowl is placed at the center. The meal is usually brought in large bowls and, if sauce is an accompaniment, then the oldest female of the house brings the sauce in another bowl. Washing hands is a ritual religiously followed prior to eating. Men sit on the mats after removing their slippers, and food is served in the large communal bowls. In the villages men eat from the same communal bowl, while women eat from their own. Little boys eat with the men, and girls eat with the women.

Fun Fact

The Republic of The Gambia is the smallest country on the African continent.

LABOR DAY

Observed on: May 1

May 1 is celebrated as Labor Day, May Day, or Workers' Day in many parts of the world to commemorate the important role played by workers. The May 1 observance of Labor Day has its origins in the international socialist movement and was chosen in 1889 to coincide with an American Federation of Labor (AFL) general strike in the United States for an eight-hour workday, originally scheduled for 1890. In The Gambia, government offices, businesses, and schools remain closed on this day.

LIBERATION DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: July 22

Liberation Day commemorates the successful coup led by Lieutenant Yahya A. J. J. Jammeh and the Armed Forces Provisional Ruling Council (AFPRC) on July 22, 1994. The coup displaced the then-president of The Gambia, Sir Dawda Kairaba Jawara, and a transitional plan for democracy was set into motion. In 1996 The Provisional Independent Electoral Commission (PIEC), which was renamed Independent Electoral Commission (IEC) in 1997, was given charge of registering voters and conducting fair and free elections in the region. In 2001–02 free elections were conducted in the region, and Yahya Jammeh was re-elected president of The Gambia. Official speeches and military parades commemorate the famous coup, which was considered the turning point in restoring power to the people of The Gambia.

EID AL-ADHA

Observed by: Muslims

Observed on: Tenth of Dhu al-Hijjah, the 12th month of the Islamic calendar

Eid al-Adha, or the Festival of Sacrifice (also called Tabaski and Eid al-Kebir), is celebrated in honor of (Ibrahim's) Abraham's readiness to sacrifice his own son on God's command. However, just as Ibrahim was about to kill his son, God replaced the young boy with a ram. On this day, Gambian Muslims get up early in the morning to attend mosque where they offer prayers alongside their friends and family. Then they greet each other and exchange gifts. A big traditional feast of mutton is prepared for this day.

This is also the month in which the holy pilgrimage called hajj, the fifth pillar of Islam, is made. The Koran states that it is mandatory for every Muslim to undertake this journey at least once in his or her lifetime if it is physically and financially feasible.

❁ INTERNATIONAL ROOTS FESTIVAL

Observed in: Jufureh

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: June–July

Every year The Gambia plays hosts to the International Roots Festival, which is held during June and July. The International Roots Festival is intended to help the black people of African descent living in America and European countries become aware of, and connect with, their African roots. Cultural programs, such as traditional Gambian folk dances and musical performances, exhibitions of folk art, and ancient crafts, are organized to highlight The Gambia's rich cultural heritage.

The Jufureh village is the ancestral home of the famous black novelist Alex Haley, the author of the best-selling novel Roots, which was adapted into a movie and serialized on U.S. television. Haley wrote the book while trying to find his own roots. His search took him to The Gambia, and he discovered that he was the descendant of Kunta Kinte, a Gambian who was captured and trafficked to North America to work as a slave.

Rites of Passage

❁ BIRTH

In Gambian society, birth and pregnancy are secretive affairs. During the entire period of pregnancy people refrain from talking about it and are rather discreet in their behavior. The news is kept private, because the Gambians believe that talking about it can endanger the life of the unborn child, causing some harm to befall it. After the birth of a child, certain rituals are performed to ward off evil. For example fire burns for a week in a house where a child is born, and the mother has to remain indoors.

The naming ceremony takes place one week after the child's birth. The father or his relatives have the right to name the child, and the father is responsible for inviting friends and family for festivities and rituals. The naming ceremony takes place early in the morning and begins with an elder shaving the child's head or cutting a lock of hair and saying a prayer. Then the priest whispers the chosen name in the child's ear, while the griot ("praise-singer"), or musical entertainer, says it aloud for the entire community to hear. Once the name has been announced, the child's hair is buried. On this day, livestock and poultry are sacrificed, and food is offered to the guests. Later in the evening a huge feast is held followed by drumming and dancing.

Kankurangs

The kankurang is a masked individual whose job is to act as a bodyguard for circumcised boys, protecting them from evil spirits. This personage originated in the 12th century. The kankurang appears at ceremonies covered in leaves or bark with tufts of leaves on his upper arms and ankles. His head and torso are also covered with red-orange bark. Brandishing a machete and a stick, his fierce and menacing dance is meant to threaten onlookers and inspire fear.

COMING OF AGE

Circumcision is a ritual performed at puberty among the Mandinka, the Fulas, and the Jolas. Young boys between the ages of 8 and 12 years are circumcised in special ceremonies in accordance with the customs and traditions of the ethnic group. Ritual genital cutting (also called female genital mutilation, FGM) for girls, a highly controversial practice that has been banned in many countries, is still performed in the Gambia. The Foundation for Research on Women's Health, Productivity, and Environment (BAFROW), a Gambian women's organization, reports that seven of the Gambia's nine ethnic groups practice FGM, and estimates that between 60 to 90 percent of women in the Gambia have had these operations. Almost 100 percent of Fula and Sarahuli women have had their genitals removed.

The Wolof tribe prefers a different manner of welcoming adulthood. When they reach puberty, children spend a time in seclusion (in modern times it is only a few days) during which they are taught lessons on adulthood, tribal history, traditions, and customs, and informed of their duties and responsibilities as adults. While boys customarily wear white robes with a triangular hood, girls wear specially designed bead-dresses.

At the end of this instruction period a big ceremony is held at the village to welcome the initiates back into village life. Parents prepare special clothing for the initiates, which they wear for several days after their return.

Socializing, feasting, dancing with masks, and drumming are highlights of the initiation ceremonies.

MARRIAGE

Arranged marriages are the norm in many parts of Gambian society. The suitor, or his family, sends kola nuts (an indigenous fruit of West Africa used to make soft drinks) to the family of the bride-to-be; this is considered an official proposal. In Islamic society a marriage needs to have the consent of both the bride and groom. If the bride's family accepts the gift of kola nuts, then the marriage is considered fixed. Kola nuts are considered a symbol of purity and for this reason are used as offerings for marriages. The suitor must also give money and other gifts to the bride's family. All this is in addition to the bride price fixed by the bride's family and which the suitor has to negotiate and pay in order to win the right to court his bride-to-be.

After the bride's price has been paid, the bride's family gives a dowry to the groom, which consists of clothes, jewelry, utensils, and all the equipment needed by the newly married couple to set up their house. A religious leader performs the legal rites of Muslim marriages, which are usually performed in the bride's family home in the presence of the fathers or guardians of both the bride and the groom.

If the bride price is paid at the time of marriage, the groom can take his bride with him, and they immediately embark on their new life. Otherwise another ceremony takes place at a later date (when the bride price is paid), after which the groom may take his bride home.

Partying, dancing, and drumming are all part of the wedding celebration. All wedding guests are expected to contribute food or money to the couple, the bride's parents, and the griots ("praise-singers").

DEATH

In Gambian society the family and friends of the deceased person express their grief by sobbing and wailing. When a person discovers the death of a villager, he wails out loud to inform the other members of the community. The village elders then inform the family and friends of the death and make arrangements for the burial. The dead body is washed and dressed in a white shroud and is either placed in a coffin or on a mat. Men carry the body to the mosque where prayers are offered for the deceased. Then the body is taken for burial and the bereaved family gives money or food to the needy in the name of the dead person. The third, seventh, and the 40th day following the burial are also days for the family of the deceased to practice charity.

According to Islam the mourning period of a widow lasts four months and 10 days, during which time she has to remain confined to the house and wear simple clothes without adornment.

Introduction

✿ HISTORY

Ongoing archaeological investigations since the 1980s in the Caucasus region have identified several important caves. The Caucasus Mountains are a promising region for archaeological exploration and may provide significant information about the Paleolithic peoples who inhabited the many caves and rock shelters found there. In Russia farther north in the Caucasus there are also numerous megaliths (a large usually rough stone used in prehistoric cultures as a monument or building block) that are just beginning to be mapped and studied. So far only limited excavations have been undertaken, and even fewer completely explored and analyzed. What is so far known, however, suggests that the Caucasus may fill in gaps in the progress of early Homo sapiens as they moved out of Africa into the Middle East, Europe, and Asia, the development of Homo sapiens neandertalensis, as well as linking the arrival of Homo sapiens with the disappearance of the Neandertals.

Some idea of just how long humans have dwelled in the region of the Caucasus can be inferred from the Neandertal remains found at Barakai and Matouozka Caves in the northwest, as well as the important discovery of artifacts and Homo erectus remains, close to two million years old, at Dmanisi in Georgia. The Caucasus Mountains form a natural barrier among the Middle East, Asia, and Europe, so various hominid species would have to have traversed them at some point during the lengthy process of dispersion.

In the eighth century B.C.E. the Greeks colonized areas of what is now western Georgia. Around the seventh century Anatolian tribes from Turkey moved into the eastern regions, assimilated with the people already there, and formed the kingdom of Iberia. Between 550 and 300, control of the area shifted among various foreign regimes, primarily the Persians, Macedonians, and the Seleucids. In 189 the Romans defeated the Seleucids and allowed the local residents to set up independent Armenian states, which united a century later to form a stronghold of the Roman Empire, with a domain extending from the Caspian Sea to central Turkey, and including a sizable portion of modern-day Georgia.

In 330 C.E. King Marian III of Georgia embraced Christianity, and Georgia became a Christian kingdom. Around 400 the expanding Byzantine Empire occupied the regions of western Armenia, including western Georgia, and Persia gained control of the eastern area of Iberia. Muslim Arabs took control in the mid-seventh century, establishing an emirate in Tbilisi. In 978 the United Kingdom of Georgia came into existence, and all the principalities of Georgia, including Armenia, Azerbaijan, and the north Caucasian territories, were unified under the kingdom by the ruling Bagrationi Dynasty of Georgia.

In 1060, however, the Seljuk Turks established their authority over most of Armenia. A large number of Armenians fled to Georgia, launched an attack, and recovered Tbilisi from the Turks in 1122, extending Georgia's borders from western Azerbaijan to eastern Turkey. However in 1236 invading Mongols, led by Tamerlane (also Timur Lenk, 1336–1406), ended this golden period of the Georgian Empire.

Subsequent centuries saw numerous attempts by Turkey and Persia to seize Georgia. In the 18th century Georgia, looking for support and protection against Turkey and Persia, agreed to be annexed by Russia. In the 19th century Georgia was absorbed into Russia entirely.

World War I and the Russian Revolution of 1917 prompted Georgia to break away from Soviet Russia. In May 1918, the Georgian Menshevik Party declared Georgia's independence. Although this independence was recognized by the Soviet government in 1920, the Red Army invaded Georgia in 1921 and annexed it. Georgia was again declared a Russian republic. In 1936 it became a separate union republic, still governed by Russia. As the Soviet Union was breaking up, Georgians stepped up protests and rebellion against Soviet rule; in April 1991 Georgia declared itself independent once more. Its independence was legitimized, however, only after the complete disintegration of the Soviet Union in December 1991.

Post-independence the unpopular regime of President Zviad Gamsakhurdia (1939–93) was overthrown, and in October 1992 Eduard Shevardnadze (b. 1928) was elected president. In 1993 Georgia joined the Commonwealth of Independent States (CIS), a confederation of 12 former Soviet republics, including Georgia, Russia, and Uzbekistan. In the presidential elections in January 2004, Mikhail Saakashvili (b. 1967) was elected president.

❁ GEOGRAPHY AND CLIMATE

Situated in southwestern Asia, Georgia lies between Turkey and Russia, bordering the Black Sea. It shares its southern border with Turkey and Armenia, with Azerbaijan in the east and Russia in the north. The Greater Caucasus and Lesser Caucasus ranges dominate its northern and eastern regions. Georgia controls much of the Caucasus Mountains and the routes through them. The Abkhazia and Ajara autonomous republics and South Ossetia are a part of the Republic of Georgia. Its capital Tbilisi is the largest city.

The topography of Georgia is diverse, with mountainous ranges in the north and eastern regions, a narrow lowland area along the Black Sea, and plains in the east. Its highest point is Mt. Shkhara at 17,060 feet. Georgian terrain is highly seismic and prone to earthquakes.

The climate of Georgia is warm and pleasant, subtropical and humid along the Black Sea coast. With the Caucasus range to its north and east, protecting it from northern winds and cold interference, the eastern plains tend to have a continental climate, while the highest mountains have snow year-round. The average temperature in winter is 34° F, and summer temperatures average 77° F.

❁ ECONOMY

The economy of Georgia suffered a tremendous setback due to warfare, corruption, and the effects of Russia's economic instability. Its economic growth was negative in the early 1990s, because of the terrible condition of its infrastructure and the failure of economic reorganization toward a market economy.

Joseph Stalin

Georgia's most famous—or infamous—native son was born Iosif Vissarionovich Dzhugashvili in the town of Gori, Georgia, on December 21, 1879. He would later change his name to Joseph Stalin and rise to the heights of power as one of the world's greatest dictators. At the time of his birth Georgia was part of the vast Russian Empire. Iosif was the third and only surviving child of a poor cobbler and a housecleaner. He attended the Gori Church School, where he excelled at his studies, winning a scholarship to the Tbilisi Theological Seminary in the Georgian capital. From there he made his way to Moscow.

In the wake of the tumultuous Russian Revolution

Stalin became the general secretary of the Communist Party of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics (USSR) in 1922 and ruled until his death in 1953. Stalin is notorious for his wartime pact with Hitler, brutal suppression of dissent, concentration camps, disastrous economic policies, and the death of millions.

In Gori Stalin remains a household name and popular figure among some; the town has a Stalin museum and one of the few statues of the dictator that remains standing in the world. In most other places in Georgia, and throughout the former Soviet Union, angry crowds tore down such statues as the Soviet Union crumbled in the early 1990s.

Numerous industries collapsed after independence, and despite having a potential for cultivation in the lowlands, farming was grossly inefficient due to post-Soviet misallocation of land and materials.

The primary occupation in Georgia is agriculture. The warmer regions produce tea, citrus fruits, tobacco, wine grapes, and rice. Mulberry trees are also grown to feed the worms for silk production. Livestock such as sheep, pigs, and poultry are common.

Georgia has rich deposits of manganese, copper, tungsten, coal, lignite, barites, iron, molybdenum, oil, and peat. There are also sizable deposits of marble, dolomite, talc, and clay. The coastal climate and soils allow for tea and citrus cultivation. Industry in Georgia is heavily dependent on raw materials from other Commonwealth of Independent States republics and from abroad. It primarily manufactures semifinished metals, vehicles, textiles, and chemicals. Despite its great potential to generate hydroelectric power, it has to rely on fuel and energy imports to cater to the domestic demands for power and energy. Georgia has to import 95 percent of its fuel requirements, mainly oil and natural gas. The nation exports citrus fruits, tea, machinery, ferrous and nonferrous metals, and textiles to Armenia, Azerbaijan, Bulgaria, the Czech Republic, Germany, Poland, Russia, and Turkey. Machinery and machine parts, energy and fuels, transportation equipment, and textiles are imported mainly from Bulgaria, the Czech Republic, Poland, Russia, and Ukraine. Its chief trade partners are its neighbors Russia, Turkey, Azerbaijan, and Armenia.

According to a 2001 estimate 54 percent of the population lives below the poverty line, and the unemployment rate is 17 percent. Despite the severe setbacks to the economy due to civil strife, with the aid of the International Monetary Fund and the World Bank, Georgia has successfully achieved positive gross domestic product growth and slowed the rate of inflation.

The Georgian government lacks sufficient structures to collect tax revenues. It also has a severe energy shortfall. The start of construction on the Baku-Tbilisi-Ceyhan oil pipeline and the Baku-Tbilisi-Erzurum gas pipeline is expected to attract investment and provide job opportunities.

CULTURE AND LIFESTYLE

The Republic of Georgia has a rich cultural heritage, a mix of European and Asian cultures. Georgian society is dominated by ethnic Georgians but is also home to other ethnic groups, including Russians, Armenians, Azeri, Ossetians (descendants of the Scythians and Alans), and Abkhaz. Georgia, along with its Caucasian neighbors Azerbaijan and Armenia, is a relatively young country.

Although some believe the country derives its name from its patron saint St. George, the name Georgia actually originates from the Arabic and Persian words kurj and gurj, terms that were used to refer to Georgians by Arabs and Persians. In the Persian language, Georgia was referred to as Gurjistan, the land of the Gurjs, or Georgians. Georgians call themselves Kartvelebi, their land Sakartvelo, and their language Kartuli. These names are derived from a pagan chieftain called Kartlos, said to be the father of all Georgians.

Georgian, the official language of the country, is widely spoken throughout the country, albeit with varied dialects. The Russian, Azeri, and Armenian languages are also spoken in some pockets of the country. In the Abkhazia region of Georgia, the local language Abkhaz is the official language. The Georgian language does not use the Cyrillic alphabet like most of its neighbors but has its own alphabet consisting of 33 symbols, including 28 consonants and 5 vowels.

Georgians value close family ties, and often many generations live together in the same house. Elders are revered, and every person is expected to show modesty, respect, and love toward family and friends.

Though predominantly Georgian Orthodox, Georgians enjoy freedom of religion, and many people adhere to other Christian churches, such as Russian Orthodox and Armenian Apostolic, as well as Islam. People of all faiths are free to enter Georgian Orthodox churches, but women must cover their heads.

Georgian culture is reflected in its folk songs and dances. Folk songs have been passed from one generation to the next over the centuries. Different regions of Georgia have their own folk songs and, although most Georgian songs use three-part harmony, some labor songs sung in the Ajaria and Guria region use four-part harmony. In Western Georgia, gankivani (a kind of yodel) and krimanchuli (polyphonic-singing) are very popular. Many groups in Georgia are trying to preserve their folk music and to create interest among the younger generation in their traditional music. Today most of the folk songs are sung during supra. Supra is a ritual banquet, which is an essential part of all the major life events such as births, weddings, and funerals.

CUISINE

Some traditional Georgian dishes include khushi (a brothlike dish made from beef entrails), mcvadi (pork or mutton with tomatoes), lobio (kidney beans), pkhali (a vegetable dish made from beet leaves, pomegranate seeds, walnut paste, and spices), khachapuri (pie), kupati (roasted sausages), and khinkali (mutton dumplings).

Wine (especially white and dry red wines) and beer are the preferred beverages. Georgians do not drink wine without making a toast. Some of the more popular wines include mukhuzani (bitter but pleasant-tasting), ojaleshi (sweet), and kindzmarauli (garnet-red, honey flavored). Fruit juices and soft drinks are also popular.

❁ NEW YEAR'S EVE/DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: December 31–January 1

The first day of the Western or Gregorian calendar January 1 is celebrated as New Year's Day throughout the world. Georgians traditionally celebrate the New Year with their family over a meal consisting of gozinaki (nuts fried with honey), turkey, and liquor. They pray for peace, happiness, and the health of their families and greet one another on this joyous occasion.

Nowadays young Georgians attend New Year's Eve parties, a relatively new development. The parties last through the night with much singing and dancing.

❁ MOTHER'S DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: March 3

Mother's Day can be traced back to the ancients, who held special festivals venerating the mother goddess. The Greeks worshipped Rhea, wife of the god Cronus and mother of all gods and goddesses, and held festivals to pay homage to her. Around 250 B.C.E. the Romans celebrated a three-day festival during the Ides of March (March 15–18). It was known as Hilaria, in deference to the Roman mother goddess Cybele. However these festivals were dedicated to mother goddesses and not to immediate relatives. It is believed that, with the arrival of the Catholic Church, this adoration was transferred to the Blessed Virgin Mary and then to mothers in general.

On Mother's Day Georgian children give flowers and gifts to their mothers and help them in their daily chores as tokens of appreciation.

❁ INTERNATIONAL WOMEN'S DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: March 8

International Women's Day (IWD) became an important day for celebrating the economic, political, and social achievements of women around the world. Historically the observance gained momentum during the early 20th century and was initially a day chosen by women workers to protest the conditions under which they worked. The first such protest was staged on March 8, 1857, by women garment and textile workers, and it became a traditional date for women workers to protest their long hours and low pay. The first IWD was observed in the United States on February 28, 1909, following a declaration by the Socialist Party of America. The next year, an international women's conference was held in Copenhagen and IWD was established. Among other historic

Georgian Kinship

In Georgia spiritual kinship is extremely strong. It implies that people who are not family members may share the same bond as blood relations by performing certain rituals. In Abkhazia people believe that anyone who eats from the same shared pot as the family is a member of the family, even though he or she is not related by blood. An ancient tradition of cutting fingers to proclaim oneself as the brother of a woman who has no brothers is practiced even today. Godparents, who may be relatives or friends, become lifelong family members.

events it commemorates the Triangle Shirtwaist Factory fire that occurred in New York in 1911, when over 140 women lost their lives because of inadequate safety measures.

In spite of its origins in workers' protest movements, the holiday quickly lost its political emphasis and devolved into a mawkish observance not much different from Mother's Day. Its political thrust was revived by the second wave of feminism during the 1960s, when protest marches and rallies on subjects such as incest and date rape became the focus. In 1975 the United Nations undertook sponsorship of International Women's Day.

❁ INDEPENDENCE DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: May 26

On May 26, 1918, during World War I, the National Convention of Georgia proclaimed Georgia's independence from Soviet Russia. Although the Red Army would invade Georgia and annex it in 1921, Georgia celebrates its independence day on May 26.

Tamada

In Georgia ancient dining rituals emphasize the importance of the tamada, or the person who proposes toasts before drinking. The host selects the tamada. He is generally a man with a good sense of humor. If there are many guests at the table the tamada appoints assistants, known as tolumbashis, and they help the tamada develop ideas or choose words for the toast. Toasts are proposed in a strict, predetermined order, and it is considered disrespectful to interrupt a tamada while he is proposing a toast. The guests are expected to listen attentively.

The tamada is the most important person at a dinner. If one needs to leave the table he or she has to ask the tamada's permission to propose a toast in honor of the family. Only after raising a toast to the family may a person leave the dinner table.

On this day thousands of Georgians assemble for the Independence Day celebrations presided over by the president of Georgia. A presidential speech and military parades mark the official commemoration. At Victory Park in Tbilisi the president and the chairman of the Georgian parliament lay wreaths on the graves of national heroes and public figures as a token of respect for their contributions to Georgia's independence.

International Women's Day was the initial phase of what became the Russian Revolution.

❁ CHRISTMAS

Observed by: Orthodox Christians
Observed on: January 6–7

Orthodox Christians celebrate the birth of Jesus on January 7 because, having refused to accept the Gregorian calendar when it was introduced, they follow the Julian calendar. There is a difference of 13 days between the Julian and the Gregorian, or Western, calendar (which is the one followed by most Christians around the world and which celebrates December 25 as the day of Jesus' birth).

The Orthodox believe that the star of Bethlehem was seen in the sky on the eve of January 6, so they celebrate Christmas Eve on January 6. Georgian Orthodox Christmas celebrations last for 12 days, beginning on Christmas Eve and continuing until Epiphany (January 19).

In earlier times there was a total ban on working during the 12 days of Christmas, and people even stopped their daily chores in honor of the Nativity and baptism of Jesus. During these holy days people indulged in fortune-telling, magic rituals, and the procurement of good luck charms. Carol singers wore colorful costumes and went door-to-door singing Christmas carols. They were treated to Christmas sweets and candies by the families they visited. The carolers were treated well, because it was believed that the fortunes of the new year would depend on the generosity with which they were treated.

Since the church banned the practice of fortune-telling and magic rituals, Georgians would sneak out of their homes in secrecy and visit sorcerers and fortune-tellers in cemeteries, barns, and other deserted places. They sought their services in predicting the events of the coming year. Questions about the number of calves that would be born, the quantity of honey that would be produced by bees, as well as issues related to marriage, were the most common queries.

Traditional dishes served during the holy days included kutya (a honey pudding made with raisins and rice), as well as dishes made with an odd number of fish (for good luck). On the dinner table, an extra set of plates and cutlery were placed for the family members who had passed away during the past year.

❁ EPIPHANY

Observed by: Orthodox Christians
Observed on: January 19

The Christian Feast of the Epiphany is celebrated to remember the legend of the Three Wise Men from the East (or Magi) who came to Jerusalem looking for the newborn Jesus. The word epiphany means “to reveal” or “to make known,” and the day was so named because it was the Magi who revealed Jesus to the world as a king and lord.

Orthodox Christians in Georgia celebrate Epiphany on January 19. On this day devout Christians bathe in the rivers and lakes by making cross-shaped ice-holes on the frozen surfaces, because they believe that on Epiphany water assumes special powers. Consecrated water is sprinkled in homes, offices, and churches on Epiphany in the belief that it acts as a curative remedy. People also attend an Epiphany Liturgy.

❁ GOOD FRIDAY

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: Friday before Easter

Orthodox Good Friday, a solemn holiday also known as Mourning Friday, Black Friday, and Sorrowful Friday, commemorates the Crucifixion of Jesus. In the Orthodox Church it is called Great Friday. Because it is one of the holiest days in the Orthodox calendar, the faithful are expected to observe a strict fast throughout the day. Communion is not celebrated on this day because it is a day of mourning; instead Orthodox Christians attend three special services in the morning, afternoon, and evening. This is an official holiday in Georgia with government offices, schools, and businesses closed for the day.

❁ EASTER

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: First Sunday after Lent

The Christian festival of Easter celebrates Jesus' Resurrection. The holiday falls on the first Sunday after the austere 40-day period of fasting called Lent. The word Easter is derived from the name of the Germanic goddess Eostre or Eastre. She was the revered mother goddess of the Saxon people in northern Europe, thus the holiday has a more general and ancient association with spring, fertility, and rebirth. Easter eggs have long been associated with the spring festival, and symbolize new life. The Catholic Church, in an effort to win converts from the pagan peoples of Europe, imposed their own meaning on the purpose of the observance but retained the name of the goddess as well as many of the symbols associated with her worship at the end of the first century C.E.

On Easter Sunday in Georgia Christians attend Easter services in church and afterward enjoy a large family meal. Easter Monday is a national holiday and a time to repent for one's sins. On this day devout Orthodox Christians attend a special service in their local churches and, in the presence of priests, ask for forgiveness from the risen Jesus.

❁ ASSUMPTION

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: August 15

The Feast of the Assumption commemorates the death and assumption into heaven of Mary, the mother of Jesus. Assumption Day is known as Mariamoba in Georgia, and on this day devout Georgian Christians attend a special service in their local churches in honor of Mary. This is a public holiday in Georgia with government offices, schools, and businesses closed for the day.

❁ ST. GEORGE'S DAY

Observed by: Orthodox Christians

Observed on: May 6 and November 23

St. George is the patron saint of Georgia, and the nation celebrates St. George's Day twice each year: on May 6, to mark his birthday, and on November 23, to observe his torturous death. The November 23 St. George's Day, known as Giorgoba in Georgia, was declared a national holiday following Georgia's Independence in 1918.

St. George was an accomplished warrior in the Roman Empire who had earned the title of centurion due to his courage, loyalty, and honor. He was also known as George the Victorious because of the innumerable battles he had won. Embracing Christianity he took it upon himself to protect his fellow Christians from persecution and harm. His heroism infuriated the Roman authorities, and he was asked to denounce Christianity. When he refused, he was beheaded.

On St. George's Day on November 23, devout Georgians attend special church services in honor of their patron saint.

Fun Fact

St. George goes much further back than the Roman Empire, to pagan times when he was revered as the god of the mountains.

Rites of Passage

❁ BIRTH

Children are an integral part of society in Georgia, and the birth of a child is a joyous occasion for the entire community. In the Abkhazia region, residents believe that a child belongs not just to his or her parents but to all the members of the family. Until 1920 when Georgia came under Soviet control, Abkhazians neither celebrated their birthdays nor kept track of their ages. Their language has words for various stages of life, but no ages are specified for when these stages begin and end.

❁ MARRIAGE

In Georgia, couples get married first in a civil ceremony that is legally binding and then participate in a solemn Orthodox church wedding. Lavish receptions following the church service are the norm, with much feasting, singing, and folk dancing.

Fun Fact

A daughter-in-law is not allowed to speak in front of her father-in-law unless he gives her explicit permission to do so. It often takes years to obtain this permission, and the event is marked by a huge feast.

In the Abkhazia region of Georgia, the groom, along with his senior relatives and friends, goes to the bride's house on the day of the wedding. There, the wedding party is treated to a lavish feast, and friends and family members wish the bride and the groom well by giving speeches and making toasts in their honor. After the party the bride rides in a car or on horseback to the groom's house. Her bridesmaids and a male relative escort her to ensure that she is respected there. In accordance with tradition the wedding takes place at the groom's house, and the bride's family does not attend the wedding.

During the wedding feast at the groom's home, the bride and groom are housed in separate rooms and kept away from the guests. When the guests are allowed to see the bride and groom, tradition requires that neither the bride nor the groom express any kind of emotion (not even a smile) in front of elders during the wedding; to do so is considered immodest. To show their respect for elders and tradition as well as to display their sense of modesty and discipline, the newlyweds do not spend the first night together after the wedding.

For a considerable period of time after marriage, it is traditional for the couple to wake up before or sleep later than everyone else in the house. They do this to ensure that the family members do not see them enter or emerge from their bedroom, as that would be considered immodest.

Women do not take their husband's surname after marriage and are protected by their father and brothers even after marriage.

❁ DEATH

In Georgia it is customary for close relatives to gather around a dying person. A bowl of clean water is placed near the bed (near a window) of the dying person. It is believed that this enables the soul to cleanse itself after leaving the body. Death is followed by a simple burial.

People visit the grieving family on the third, fourth, and fifth days after the death of the family member. Then the priest presides over the funeral feast in memory of the deceased. The mourning period lasts for a year and ends one year later on the date of the death.

On anniversaries and religious days such as All Souls' Day, family members visit the cemeteries and offer prayers, flowers, and candles at the graves of their deceased relatives and even share suppers near the graves.

Introduction

❁ HISTORY

It had long been known that both the north and south walls of western Germany's Neander Valley had many caves and rock shelters. Then in 1856 a partial humanoid cranium was found in a cave called the Kleine Feldhofer Grotte. Although no one could have predicted it then, the discovery marked the beginning of human paleontology and started the longest-standing debate in the discipline: the role of Neanderthals in human evolutionary history.

No other archaeological materials were gathered, and the cave was destroyed. However, archaeological excavations done in 1997 and 2000 have yielded additional Neanderthal bone fragments, making the Neanderthal site the first Pleistocene (1.8 million to 11,000 years old) locality to yield sequences from more than one human. Radiocarbon dates for both Neanderthal individuals indicate an age of about 40,000 years for them.

Evidence for more recent cultures in prehistoric Germany include numerous Bandkeramik villages and associated cemeteries. The Bandkeramik peoples were the first true farming communities in central Europe, and the sites have been dated between 5400 and 4900 B.C.E. Their name refers to the distinctive banded decorations found on their pottery. The villages at Bandkeramik sites are characterized by long-houses with rectangular plans, and some were protected by surrounding ditches. The domesticated crops include emmer and einkorn wheat, peas, lentils, and linseed. Numerous cairns, menhirs, and dolmens dot the German landscape, the remains of an ancient, and dominant, Celtic presence. The Celts are now thought to be the immediate ancestors of the tribes and clans known as Germanic (or Teutonic), and the vestiges of Celtic religious beliefs and symbols can still be found in the customs of many modern German communities.

A large number of tribes from Scandinavia began moving down into Germany between 800 and 700 B.C.E. and established their settlements in the region. It is thought that the deteriorating climatic conditions in Scandinavia forced these tribes to migrate to milder climates. Animal husbandry was their main occupation. These Germanic tribes were also notorious for invading other territories and taking control of them. Around 100, these Teutonic tribes (primarily Franks, Lombards, and Visigoths) invaded the regions of Gaul, Illyria, and Italy, which were under the domination of the Roman Empire. Initially the renowned Roman commander Marius (d. 86 B.C.E.) led the Roman forces to victory over the Teutons.

However from 58 B.C.E. to 5 C.E. the Romans and the Germanic tribes fought a series of wars. The Romans ultimately lost control of the region, and different parts of Germany were subsequently ruled by various empires and dynasties, such as the Frankish Empire under Charlemagne (742–814) and the Holy Roman Empire under Otto I (the Great, 912–73) of the Saxon Dynasty. (In 962 Pope John XII [r. 955–63] crowned Otto I the Holy Roman Emperor and successor of Charlemagne, laying the foundation of the first Holy Roman Empire of the German nation.)

After the death of Otto I, Germany was ruled by three main dynasties: the Saxons, the Hohenstaufens, and eventually the Hapsburgs. It was during the rule of King Maximilian I (1459–1519) of the Hapsburg Dynasty that in 1517 German Augustinian theologian Martin Luther (1483–1546) nailed his 95 theses on the doors of Castle Church at Wittenberg.

Luther challenged what he and others perceived to be abuses and corruption in the Roman Catholic Church headed by Pope Leo X (r. 1513–21) and asked Christians to return to the teachings of the Bible. He led the Protestant Reformation, which aimed at reforming the beliefs of the Roman Catholic Church. Eventually in 1521 at the Diet of Worms, Martin Luther was excommunicated by the Catholic Church.

From 1618–48 Germany was enmeshed in the Thirty Years' War. Although this was mainly a conflict between Catholics and Protestants, it was also a result of the ambitions of various princely states within the empire. The war began with a Protestant uprising against the Holy Roman Emperor in Bohemia. When other European powers (King Christian IV of Denmark [1588–1648], Gustav II Adolph of Sweden [1594–1632], and Cardinal Richelieu of France [1585–1642]) began interfering in German affairs by extending their support to the German Protestants, the conflict escalated into a full-fledged European war. Almost one-third of Germany's population perished, and the country was left in an impoverished state, its agriculture devastated, its commerce and industry in ruins. The suffering of the peasants would be remembered for many years. The war ended in 1648 after a peace treaty was signed between Germany, France, and Sweden. According to the treaty, a large portion of the Holy Roman Empire was distributed among the victors; the remaining states and principalities that made up the empire were given the right of self-governance.

During the Napoleonic Wars (1803–15), Napoleon I (1769–1821) attacked the states that made up Germany but was fiercely resisted, especially by the forces of the Prussian state. Eventually, after a decisive battle at Leipzig on October 16–19, 1813, Napoleon's ambition to rule Prussia ended after the Prussians defeated the French army.

In 1866 the chancellor of Prussia Otto Van Bismarck (1815–98) initiated a series of military campaigns and annexed many of the other states that now make up Germany, thereby laying the foundation for a unified Germany. After the defeat of France during the Franco-Prussian War (1870–71) on January 18, 1871, King Wilhelm I of Prussia (1861–88) was declared kaiser (emperor) of Germany, and this led to the unification of all of the German states into one nation.

The ambitious Kaiser Wilhelm II (1888–1918) began German colonial expansion in Asia. This put Germany in direct conflict with British, Japanese, Russian, and American interests. Moreover Germany was engaged in shipbuilding activities, which the British perceived as a threat to their dominance of the seas. This collision course with the other major imperial powers ultimately led to World War I (1914–18), during which Germany opposed the Allies (Russia, Britain, Italy, France, and the United

Diet of Worms

The name "Diet of Worms" is derived from the word diet, which refers to a general assembly of the estates of the Holy Roman Empire. The place where the meeting was held was called Worms.

These meetings took place between January 28 and May 25, 1521, and were presided over by the Holy Roman Emperor Charles V (1500–58). Martin Luther (1483–1546) was summoned by the Emperor to appear before the Imperial Diet and agreed to do so after the emperor promised him safe passage home after the meeting. This promise was necessary because of the execution of Czech reformer Jan Hus (1372/73–1415) by the Council of Constance (Roman Catholic Council) in 1414–18.

Luther was summoned to explain his position on the 95 theses nailed to the door of the Castle Church in Wittenberg. The pope and the priests wanted him to retract his statements made against the Catholic Church and to renounce his teachings. Luther refused to do so and as a result was declared a heretic and outlawed by the Roman Catholic Church. Possession and reading of his writings was banned by the Edict of Worms (issued by the Diet), which was signed by Holy Roman Emperor Charles V.

States) and fought on the side of the Ottoman Empire and Austro-Hungary. Germany participated in a number of bitterly fought battles during the war and, after initial victories in certain regions, suffered immensely at the hands of the Allies. Around the end of October 1918 German naval troops in the city of Kiel refused to participate any further in the war, and soon this rebellion spread to other parts of Germany, forcing Kaiser Wilhelm II to abdicate the throne. On November 9, 1918, the Social Democratic leader Phillip Scheidemann (1865–1939) declared Germany a republic and on November 11, 1918, Germany signed an armistice in Compiègne, France, ending World War I.

The Treaty of Versailles in 1919 humiliated Germany by handing over all the German colonies to the Allies as well as by restraining German military operations, restricting its military force to just 100,000 soldiers. Also Germany and its allies were forced to accept responsibility for the war and made to pay a substantial amount as compensation to the Allies for the expenses incurred by them during the war. Friedrich Ebert (1871–1925) was sworn in as the first president of the Weimar Republic on August 11, 1919.

In 1933 Adolf Hitler (1889–1945), a volunteer in World War I and founder of the National-sozialistische Deutsche Arbeiterpartei (National Socialist German Labor Party), which was originally referred to as the N.S.D.A.P. but better known as the Nazi Party, came to power in 1933 when he was appointed chancellor of Germany. He gave a free hand to the Schutzstaffel (SS), which was a protective squadron and a paramilitary force of the Nazi Party. He banned all other political parties in Germany, had all politicians belonging to Communist and Socialist Parties arrested, and ordered them sent to concentration camps where many were put to death. These camps were administered by a new secret police known as the Gestapo. In violation of the terms of the Treaty of Versailles Hitler began recruiting troops under universal military service and reestablished the German Air Force. In 1935 he passed the Nuremberg Race Laws, which not only terminated the German citizenship of Jews, but also forbade them from marrying Germans. Jews in Germany, and eventually in the nations occupied by Germany during World War II, were subjected to brutal treatment and death. This infamous period became known as the Holocaust.

In 1939 Germany signed a secret nonaggression pact with the Soviet Union and invaded Poland, thus sparking World War II. However, in 1940 Germany violated the nonaggression pact and invaded regions occupied by Soviet forces. As a result the Soviet Union declared war on Germany and joined the Allies (Great Britain, France, and, after December, 1941, the United States) in the fight against the Axis (Germany, Italy, and Japan).

During the war German forces occupied major parts of Europe and continued the persecution of Jews wherever they went. However by 1945, the

The Holocaust

The term holocaust is derived from the Greek word holokauston, which means “a burnt sacrificial offering to God” (from holos, “totally,” and kaustos, “burned”). Holocaust is used to refer to the systematic annihilation of European Jews and others termed undesirable by Nazi Germany. It started in 1941 and was extensively and secretly carried out until 1945.

It is estimated that more than six million Jews were killed by Germans in concentration camps during the Holocaust. Slavs (Russians, Poles, and others), Sinti (nomadic tribes of northwestern Europe), Roma (Gypsies), mentally handicapped, gay men and lesbians, elderly people, Catholics, political opponents and dissidents, and Jehovah’s Witnesses (a sect of Christianity) were also murdered in the concentration camps.

It is estimated that a total of 26 million men, women, and children were killed during the Nazi regime.

Allied forces had succeeded in defeating the Axis powers. Hitler committed suicide, and Germany suffered immensely as the Allies bombed German ports and harbors, completely destroying the country’s infrastructure.

In 1945 at the Potsdam Conference, the Allies divided Germany into four military zones with three zones forming the Federal Republic of Germany (West Germany), and the Soviet-occupied zone forming the German Democratic Republic (East Germany). The former German capital of Berlin, which was located in East Germany, was split down the middle between East and West. In West Germany, democracy was restored; it benefited greatly from the American plan for the reconstruction of Europe. By 1960 West Germany had a robust economy.

In East Germany a Communist government assumed power, with the backing of Poland and the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics (USSR). The oppressive policies of this government and lack of opportunities in the region forced many East Germans to move to the more prosperous West Germany. Eventually on August 13, 1961, in an attempt to prevent East Germans from crossing over to West Germany via West Berlin, the Communist regime of East Germany erected the infamous Berlin Wall, a concrete wall about 12 feet high. It surrounded all of East Berlin. Efforts by East Germans

Fun Fact

In 1996, a German paleontologist tripped over something in the Neander Valley. When it was dug up, that “something” was a 50,000-year-old Neanderthal musical instrument carved from the six-foot-long tip of a mammoth tusk. The 16 carefully spaced holes on the tusk’s surface suggest that the Neanderthals used an octave scale.

to cross over the wall to a better life resulted in many deaths and imprisonments.

Finally in 1989, there were widespread demonstrations in Leipzig and Berlin against the Communist government. The growing discontent and disillusionment led to its fall. As a result on November 9, 1989, East German authorities allowed many East Germans to cross over to West Germany via West Berlin and brought down the Berlin Wall.

On August 31, 1990, a reunification agreement was signed between officials of West and East Germany; the agreement came into effect on October 3, 1990, which was called the Day of German Unity (Tag der deutschen Einheit), or Unity Day.

In the 21st century Germany has one of the strongest economies in the world and is a principal member of the European Union (EU). Putting its Nazi past behind, Germany has been transformed into one of the most respected republics in the world. It is a member of the United Nations (UN), Group of Eight (G8), and the North Atlantic Treaty Organization (NATO). At present Germany is also seeking a permanent seat on the United Nation's Security Council (UNSC).

❁ GEOGRAPHY AND CLIMATE

Located in central Europe the Federal Republic of Germany is flanked by Switzerland and Austria to the south, Luxembourg and France to the southwest, the Netherlands and Belgium in the northwest, Denmark and the North Sea and Baltic Sea to the north, and the Czech Republic and Poland to the east.

The Alps are situated in the southern part of Germany, while the central parts of Germany are covered with forests. Important European rivers such as the Danube, Rhine, and Elbe flow through the region between the central uplands and the low-lying areas of northern Germany. Mount Zugspitze, located in the Alps, is the highest point in Germany and stands 9,718 feet high. The lowest point is Neuendorfer/Wilstermarsch, which is 12 feet below sea level and is located in the low-lying region of northern Germany.

Germany's climate is mainly cool and temperate. The climatic conditions in the eastern parts of Germany often display continental features and are marked by warm summers, extremely cold winters, and sparse rainfall. However in the northern and northeastern parts of Germany, the climate displays oceanic features and is characterized by heavy rainfall (throughout the year), mild winters, and cool summers. The central and southern parts of Germany experience a transitional climate marked by both oceanic and continental climatic conditions.

A wide variety of flora is found in Germany, which includes buttercups, cyclamen, orchids, pulsatilla, gentians, alpine roses, and edelweiss, as well as trees such as the birch, chestnut, oak, beech, maple, and ash. Germany is also home to a wide variety of animals and birds such as raccoons, alpine marmots, beavers, wild goat, snow hare (hare with white fur), sea eagles, golden eagles, falcons, white storks, sandpipers, and cranes.

ECONOMY

One of the leading industrialized nations in the world, the Federal Republic of Germany is a unified democratic state composed of 16 landes (states). Berlin is the capital. In terms of gross domestic product (GDP), Germany is the third largest economy in the world, after the United States and Japan. According to the World Trade Organization (WTO), Germany was the largest exporter in the world in 2004, for the second year in a row. Its major export items include machinery, motor vehicles, chemicals, metals, textiles, as well as agricultural products such as hops (Germany is the second largest producer of hops, the key ingredient in beer, in the world), cabbage, apples, pears, potatoes, oats, and rye.

The service sector, including tourism, is the largest contributor to Germany's GDP. On the industrial front, Germany has the distinction of being the largest and most technologically advanced producer of trucks, automobiles, iron, steel, machine tools, and electronics. Germany is home to automobile giants such as Volkswagen and Daimler Chrysler, and global market leaders such as Siemens. In the shipbuilding industry it is also the world leader.

An important member of the European Union (EU), Germany is one of the EU countries that have accepted the Euro (common currency of many member nations of EU) as the national currency.

❁ CULTURE AND LIFESTYLE

Germany has a rich cultural heritage. Almost 92 percent of the nation's population is ethnic German, but the country is also home to a substantial number of Italian, Greek, Serbo-Croatian, Polish, Russian, Spanish, and Turkish peoples. In addition most of the refugees of the former Yugoslavia have been absorbed by Germany.

Germany is the birthplace of the Protestant Reformation movement, and almost 34 percent of the country's population is Protestant, while 34 percent are Roman Catholic. Around 4 percent of the population adheres to Islam, while almost 28 percent adhere to other religions or are not affiliated with any organized religion.

German is the official language of the country and is the second most widely spoken language in Europe (after Russian). It is also the third most popular foreign language taught around the world, as well as in the EU.

Germans love music of all types, whether classical, rock and roll, hip-hop, or folk. Some of the most popular forms of German music include: volksmusik (traditional style of music that involves duets and yodeling), neue deutsche welle (music derived from punk rock), krautorock (kraut is British slang for German and refers to the style of music played by experimental bands in Germany in the 1970s), and German hip-hop.

Germany is sometimes referred to as das Land der Dichter und Denker (the Land of Poets and Thinkers), because it is the home of such world-renowned composers as Ludwig van Beethoven, Johann Sebastian Bach, Robert Schumann, Johannes Brahms, Carl Orff, and Richard Wagner, as well as great philosophers including Karl Marx, Friedrich Engels, Georg Wilhelm Friedrich Hegel, Martin Heidegger, Immanuel Kant, and Gottfried Leibniz, and scientists such as Albert Einstein, Werner Heisenberg, Heinrich Rudolph Hertz, Johannes Kepler, Max Planck, and Robert Wilhelm Bunsen. Besides being the birthplace of great poets such as Johann Wolfgang von Goethe, Heinrich Heine, and Friedrich Schiller, Germany is also home to great engineers and inventors, including Gottlieb Daimler (of DaimlerChrysler), Ernst Werner von Siemens, Rudolf Diesel, Karl Benz, Johann Gutenberg, Nicolaus Otto, and Karl Braun. Martin Luther, the father of the Reformation movement, was also German. Famous German novelists of the 20th century include Thomas Mann, Herman Hesse, and Günter Grass, all winners of the Nobel Prize for literature.

❁ CUISINE

German cuisine is hearty. Classic dishes include rote grütze (fruit soup), Helgolander Krabbensalat (Helgoland's shrimp salad), bulleten (meat balls), sauerfleisch (meat made with fish gelatin), soleier (pickled eggs), handkäs (a dish made of sour cream and cheese), badener schmeckensüpple (an herb-flavored snail broth), and spannferkel (spit-roasted baby pig).

Germans also love cakes and desserts, and some of the favorites include Schwarzwälder kirschtorte (Black Forest cake), Dresdner stollen (a Christmas fruitcake shaped like a wrapped infant and covered with confectioner's sugar), and welfenspeise (a vanilla-flavored dessert made with wine), to name only a few.

The preferred German beverage is beer or wine. Other beverages include sekt (a kind of wine), soft drinks such as radler (a light beer mixed with apple juice or lemonade) and limo (lemonade mixed with sweetened sparkling water).

❁ NEW YEAR'S EVE/DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: December 31–January 1

The first day of the Western (Gregorian) calendar, January 1, is celebrated as New Year's Day throughout the world. Germans begin celebrating the new year (Neujahr) on New Year's Eve with family gatherings, parties, fireworks, and much eating and drinking. In Germany New Year's Eve is sometimes known as Sylvester because December 31 also marks the feast of St. Sylvester, a German pope who lived in the fourth century.

On New Year's Eve, it is a German tradition to leave a small bit of everything that has been served for dinner on one's plate and not to clear the table until midnight. This act stems from the belief that, by doing so, there will be plenty of food to eat in the coming year. Carp is an important part of New Year's Eve dinner since Germans believe that carp symbolizes wealth and prosperity.

On New Year's Eve Berlin plays host to one of the largest open-air parties in the world, with a range of entertainment that includes singing, dancing, and feasting. As the clock strikes 12, a spectacular display of fireworks lights the night sky, and people raise their glasses of champagne to welcome the new year.

An ancient German tradition associated with New Year's Day celebrations is fortune-telling. Germans play a wide variety of games focused on making yearly predictions for people. One of them, known as Bleigießen, involves pouring molten lead into a bowl filled with cold water. Predictions are made according to the shapes formed by the lead in the bowl. For example if the molten lead takes the shape of a heart or ring, it implies the person might get married in the coming year. The shape of a pig implies plenty of food, while a ship indicates travel or a journey.

❁ LABOR DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: May 1

The earliest celebrations on May 1, Labor Day, are

German Beer

Since the eighth century B.C.E., Germans have brewed frothy alcoholic malt beverages. Germany is one of the largest brewers and exporters of beer in the world. In fact almost 20 percent of all the breweries in the world are based in the German state of Bavaria.

According to German legend the modern recipe for beer was invented by Jean Sans Peur (in English, "John the Fearless"), who came to be known as Gambrinus the king of beer for throwing a few hops in fermented malt. Over a period of time, the art of brewing was refined by German monastic orders whose monks used to drink beer during long fasting periods.

In accordance with a decree issued by Duke Wilhelm IV of Bavaria (1493–1549/50), which was announced in 1516, beer could only contain hops, pure water, and barley. This came to be known as Wilhelm's Purity Law. Later the law was modified to allow the distilling of wheat-based beer in Bavaria. German beer does not contain any preservatives, and most of the brews contain only 4 percent alcohol.

ascribed to pagan holidays observed by farmers, peasants, and villagers in Europe well before the Middle Ages. The May 1 observance of Labor Day, Tag der Arbeit, was first established by the Second Socialist International in 1889. The date was chosen to coincide with a general strike in the United States called by the American Federation of Labor (AFL) and scheduled to take place in 1890, when the strikers planned to demand an eight-hour workday.

On May 1 political parties and trade unions across Germany organize huge rallies and demonstrations to show their solidarity with as well as support for German workers. The rallies provide a platform for workers to voice their views and concerns about issues related to their work and work environment.

❁ EPIPHANY

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: January 6

The Christian Feast of Epiphany celebrates the Three Wise Men from the East (or Magi) who came to Bethlehem to pay tribute to the newborn Jesus. The word epiphany means “to reveal” or “to make known,” and the holiday is so named because it was the Magi who revealed Jesus’ birth to the world.

The Feast of Epiphany is celebrated in the predominantly Roman Catholic regions of Saxony-Anhalt, Bavaria, and Baden-Württemberg. During the octave of Epiphany, three children dress themselves as the Magi and sing carols, which are known as star songs. They are led by another child who holds a pole that has a gold star on it as a reenactment of the Wise Men’s journey to Bethlehem to see the baby Jesus.

In many villages children also carry a crib with them and leave it in a house that needs one. Using chalk, they mark the doors of all the houses they visit with the letters CMB, which are the initials of the Magi and are also the initials of a blessing Christus mansionem benedicat, which means, “May Christ bless this house.”

❁ GOOD FRIDAY

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: Friday before Easter

The Christian holiday of Good Friday commemorates the Crucifixion of Jesus. A somber occasion, it falls on the Friday before Easter and is the last Friday of Lent (an austere season of fasting and penitence observed by the devout). In Germany Roman Catholics participate in Good Friday services held in churches all over the country. The prayer service involves readings from the scriptures and a series of prayers, known as Good Friday prayers. A crucifix is also presented during the service, and all devout Catholics are encouraged to pay homage to it.

Special Good Friday services are also held in Protestant churches, and among German Lutherans Good Friday is an important day of worship. The two worship services of Good Friday are the Tre Ore (Latin for “three hours,” referring to the three hours Jesus is believed to have hung on the Cross) and Tenebrae, the Service of Shadows (or Darkness).

❁ EASTER

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: First Sunday after Lent

Easter is a Christian feast celebrating Jesus’ Resurrection from the dead three days after his Crucifixion. It falls on the first Sunday after Lent and is celebrated by Christians the world over. The origin of Easter celebrations can be traced back to as far as the end of first century C.E., but the day, its name, and many of the symbols associated with its celebration are much older, going back to pre-Christian pagan spring celebrations. The word Easter is derived from the name of a Germanic goddess called Eostre or Eastre, the revered mother goddess of the Saxon people who lived in northern Europe.

On Easter Sunday devout German Christians attend a special Easter prayer service to commemorate Jesus’ Resurrection. There is a tradition of presenting beautifully decorated Easter eggs and other presents as gifts to friends and relatives. There is also a tradition of parents hiding egg-shaped chocolates, gifts, and sweets in the garden for the little children to discover.

Egg-rolling competitions are also part of Easter celebrations and take place on Easter Monday as well as Easter Sunday. During the competition children roll colored, hard-boiled Easter eggs down green, grassy slopes, and the one whose unbroken egg reaches the end of the slope first is declared the winner. Another game involves two players who hold eggs in their hands; each one tries to break the other person's egg. The player whose egg remains intact is declared the winner and receives the broken egg as well.

✿ ASCENSION DAY

Observed by: Roman Catholics

Observed on: Forty days after Easter

The Christian holiday of Ascension Day celebrates Jesus' rising into heaven 40 days after he was resurrected from the dead on Easter. In Germany the Ascension is known as Himmelfahrtstag and Vatertag (Father's Day). Ascension Day is one of the important feasts in the Catholic calendar, and many devout Catholics attend special Ascension prayer services in their local churches and offer prayers to God.

Many colorful customs mark Ascension Day in Germany, where it is a public holiday. Citizens revel in outdoor activities and picnics. In the villages of Fienstedt, Zornitz, Gorsleben, and Krimpe, the drinking of Ascension beer is a strong tradition. According to 13th-century documents, villagers are commanded to drink beer in the memory of Countess Elizabeth of Thuringia (1207–31), who was famous for her kindness and charity to the poor and believed to have exempted the inhabitants from paying tithes. She was canonized in 1235. Her body was enshrined in Elisabeth-Kirche in Marburg, which is named for her.

Germany also celebrates Father's Day on this day, so it is also a time for men to get together and go out to the country. The city of Berlin is where this custom was supposed to have started. In the 19th century the city's men hired horse-drawn carriages to take them out of town. With the advent of modern technology, the carriage has been replaced by buses, trucks, and little steamers, all decorated with festive garlands and pennants. Food, wine, and beer are consumed heavily, and wives are not supposed to complain if their husbands come home late at night in less than acceptable condition.

✿ PENTECOST

Observed by: Roman Catholics

Observed on: Fifty days after Easter

Both the Sunday and Monday of this holiday celebrate the Christian feast of Pentecost, Pfingsten, the day on which the Holy Spirit descended upon Jesus' disciples. In Greek, pentecost means the 50th day, and the holiday got this name because it takes place 50 and 51 days after Easter.

Pentecost has also been given the names Whitsunday and Whitmonday referring to the white garments worn by those who were baptized on this day. Whitsunday and Monday have been celebrated since the third century C.E.

For almost 2,000 years, the image of a dove suspended in air has been the symbolic image of the Holy Spirit. During the special church services held on Pentecost Sunday and Monday, a reenactment of the event takes place. It is called Heilig-Geist-Schwingen. During this reenactment, a dove, symbolizing the Holy Spirit, enters the church through a round window in the center of the church (the Heiliggeistloch). Also there is a symbolic ceremony of calling the Holy Spirit, known as Veni Creator Spiritus, in which an artificial dove, fastened to a wheel for easy movement, hovers over the praying congregation as a symbol of the descent of the Holy Spirit.

Scholars believe that many of the traditions and celebrations were borrowed from pagan celebrations of the spring, along with many of the rituals connected with Easter. In Germany, Pentecost Sunday and Monday observances are as much an occasion for celebrating the advent of spring as the gift of the Holy Spirit. Another ancient German tradition observed on this holiday involves bringing green leaves, flowers, and branches from the woods and decorating streets and buildings with them. While bringing the green leaves and flowers, a young man, with his face blackened and wearing a mask made of tree bark, hides underneath reeds and branches. Villagers have to guess who the person is. He is known in different parts of Germany by different names (Pfingstl in southern Germany and Wild Man in Thuringia).

Games are also an important part of Pentecost celebrations. Girls and boys in many parts of Germany play a game called Topf schlagen (strike the pot). In this game the child is blindfolded and has to find and break an inverted pan or a pot with a long wooden spoon or a stick. In earlier times, the winner was rewarded with Pfingsthahn (a rooster on a perch). However sweets and small gifts are now hidden inside the pot instead.

✿ CORPUS CHRISTI

Observed by: Roman Catholics

Observed on: Sixty days after Easter

The Christian Feast of Corpus Christi commemorates the institution of the Eucharist, a Christian ritual of consuming sacred bread and wine. The word eucharist is derived from the Greek word eucharisto, which means "to rejoice or give thanks."

The Feast of Corpus Christi is known as Fronleichnam in Germany and is mainly celebrated by devout Roman Catholics. Special church services are held in Hesse, Baden-Württemberg, Rhineland-Palatinate, Bavaria, Saarland, North-Rhine Westphalia, Saxony, and Thuringia.

❁ REFORMATION DAY

Observed by: Protestants
Observed on: October 31

Reformationstag, or Reformation Day, commemorates the posting of the Ninety-five Theses (written by German theologian Martin Luther) on the doors of Castle Church at Wittenberg on October 31, 1517. In this document Luther challenged the traditions of the Roman Catholic Church and the authority of the pope and asked Christians to return to the teachings of the Bible. He led the Protestant Reformation, which aimed at reforming the practices of the Roman Catholic Church.

Protestants all over the world celebrate this holiday. Red is the liturgical color of the day and is symbolic of the Holy Spirit, which descended on the disciples of Jesus on Pentecost. Protestants believe that the same Holy Spirit inspired Luther to nail his theses on the church door and thereby start the Reformation.

On this day Protestants in Germany attend church and offer prayers to God, thanking him for communicating the importance of the Gospels through his messenger Martin Luther.

Reformation Day is a public holiday in the Mecklenburg-Western Pomerania, Saxony-Anhalt, Thuringia, Saxony, and Brandenburg regions of Germany.

❁ ALL SAINTS' DAY

Observed by: Christians
Observed on: November 1

All Saints' Day, in German Allerheiligen, is a Christian feast that honors all the saints (known and unknown) of Christianity. It was first introduced in 610, when Pope Boniface IV (r. 608–15) turned the ancient Roman Pantheon into a temple of the Blessed Virgin and All Martyrs. Beginning with Gregory III (r. 731–41) the celebration of a Feast of All Saints was commemorated at St. Peter's Cathedral (in Rome) on November 1. In 835 Pope Gregory IV (r. 827–44) extended this feast to the entire church. On All Saints' Day in Germany people get together for family meals (lunches), after which they visit the graves of their dead relatives and place flowers, crosses, or wreaths made of pine or evergreens on them. Germans living in urban areas return to their native villages to observe All Saints' Day with their extended families.

In the afternoon families gather in the home again for Kaffee und Kuchen (coffee and cake). In the villages of the Bavarian region church services known as Allerheiligen Gottesdienst are held during which sermons are given on the lives of Christian saints. All Saints' Day is an official holiday in Germany. The next morning (All Souls' Day, November 2), church services are conducted with special prayers for the deceased.

❁ ALL SOULS' DAY

Observed by: Catholics
Observed on: November 2

The feast of All Souls' Day, in German Allerseelen, developed gradually. The first such observance is thought to have occurred with a celebration of the departed at the French monastery of Cluny in 998; the idea then spread to other monasteries and orders. Beginning in the 14th century the observance was celebrated just one day later, on November 2, but dates still fluctuate somewhat from country to country and region to region. In Bavaria and Austria October 30 through November 8 is celebrated as Seelenwoche, All Souls' Week. Halloween is a time to remember and honor the dead, and it is a time when the "veil between the worlds" is thinner than usual.

All Souls' Day is especially for the Armen Seelen, the poor souls still in purgatory who have not yet reached their full communion with God. In 835 Pope Gregory IV initiated the churchwide celebration. In the morning church services are conducted with special prayers for the deceased. Requiem Masses, cemetery processions, decorated graves with flowers and wreaths, alms and good deeds, all are supposed to shorten the time of suffering of the deceased in purgatory.

❁ BUSS UND BETTAG

Observed by: Protestants, especially Lutherans
Observed on: Wednesday before Totensonntag (between November 10 and 16)

Buss und Betttag, Day of Repentance and Prayer, is a Protestant holiday observed on the Wednesday before Totensonntag, the Sunday of the Dead. The first day of penance was observed by Protestants in 1532 as a reaction against the Ottoman wars.

It is a national holiday throughout Germany, with the exception of Bavaria, which has a predominantly Catholic population. On this day, German Protestants observe a daylong fast and ask God to forgive their sins. Many churches in Germany organize special church services on Buss und Betttag. The observance is also called Penance Day.

❁ TOTENSONNTAG

Observed by: Protestants, especially Lutherans

Observed on: Last Sunday before Advent (between November 14 and 20)

Totensonntag, Sunday of the Dead, or Ewigkeitssonntag, falls on the last Sunday before Advent (the start of the Christmas season). For German Protestants it is a day to remember the dead. Some sources say that Duke August of Saxe-Gotha-Altenburg (1772–1822) instituted this holiday in 1814; others attribute its origin to the fact that Lutheran Church was unable to keep people from commemorating their dead, as they had done under Catholicism. Whatever its true origin, Totensonntag was started as an observance for Protestants, especially Lutherans, on the Sunday before the first Sunday in Advent.

On this day, German Protestants visit the graves of their family members and offer floral arrangements and prayers in their honor.

❁ ST. NICHOLAS DAY

Observed by: Roman Catholics

Observed on: December 6

This day marks the death of St. Nicholas, the Bishop of Myra (a place in modern Turkey), who died on December 6, 343 C.E. St. Nicholas is one of the most revered and celebrated saints. Popularly known as Santa Claus, he is considered to be the great patron of children. It is believed that he rescued three dead children and brought them back to life.

In Germany children receive gifts, chocolates, and a variety of sweets on St. Nicholas Day. They leave their shoes outside their homes on the eve of St. Nicholas Day in the hopes that St. Nicholas will fill them with presents. It is believed that he visits those children who have been good, and they receive small gifts, candies, chocolates, and apples. Those who have not been good are given stern lectures by St. Nicholas.

In southern Bavaria beginning on St. Nicholas Day, children perform a ritual called Frauentragen, a reenactment of Joseph and Mary's search for a shelter before the birth of Jesus. During this ritual, children carry a statue of the Virgin Mary while singing hymns, enter a farmhouse, and place the statue under the crucifix. Then on the following night, they repeat the ritual and place the statue in another farmhouse. They continue this ritual every night until the night before Christmas.

❁ CHRISTMAS

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: December 24–26

The Christian feast of Christmas celebrates the birth of Jesus. In Germany Christmas celebrations begin on December 24 and last until December 26. On Christmas Eve Germans decorate their Christmas trees with apples, straw stars, gilded nuts, Lebkuchen (spicy biscuits), electric lights, candles, wooden angels, and other ornaments. Neatly wrapped presents are placed under the tree. After dark parents invite their children to see the beautifully lit trees and give the children their presents. In many parts of Germany Christmas stories are often narrated or Christmas carols are sung before exchanging gifts. Many Roman Catholic families also attend Christmas Eve Mass. For dinner, carp, almonds, apples, and nuts are classic ingredients for the Christmas Eve menu.

Christmas Day is known as the first day of Christmas (der zweite Weihnachtsfeiertag). On Christmas day, Catholics attend church in the morning, if they did not go to Mass the night before. Then, they visit their friends and families and exchange gifts and greetings. In many parts of Germany a dish made from goose meat is a favorite meal served on Christmas.

The second day of Christmas, December 26, is celebrated as St. Stephen's Day (or Boxing Day) in many parts of Germany. St. Stephen was the first Christian martyr. He was stoned to death by Roman rulers for speaking in favor of Jesus and his disciples. Visiting friends and families continues on the second day of Christmas as well.
