

RELIGIONS of the World

A COMPREHENSIVE ENCYCLOPEDIA
OF BELIEFS AND PRACTICES

VOLUME I: A-C

RELIGIONS of the World

A COMPREHENSIVE ENCYCLOPEDIA OF BELIEFS AND PRACTICES

VOLUME I: A–C

J. GORDON MELTON

MARTIN BAUMANN

Editors

DAVID B. BARRETT

World Religious Statistics

DONALD WIEBE

Introduction

A B C  C L I O
Santa Barbara, California Denver, Colorado Oxford, England

Copyright © 2002 by J. Gordon Melton and Martin Baumann

All rights reserved. No part of this publication may be reproduced, stored in a retrieval system, or transmitted, in any form or by any means, electronic, mechanical, photocopying, recording, or otherwise, except for the inclusion of brief quotations in a review, without prior permission in writing from the publishers.

Library of Congress Cataloging-in-Publication Data

Religions of the world : a comprehensive encyclopedia of beliefs and practices / edited by J. Gordon Melton and Martin Baumann; statistical tables prepared by David B. Barrett.

p. cm.

Includes bibliographical references and index.

ISBN 1-57607-223-1 (alk. paper)—ISBN 1-57607-761-6 (eBook)

1. Religions—Encyclopedias. I. Melton, J. Gordon. II. Baumann, Martin.

BL80.3.R45 2002

291—dc21

2002005617

07 06 05 04 03 02 10 9 8 7 6 5 4 3 2 1 (cloth)

ABC-CLIO, Inc.

130 Cremona Drive, P.O. Box 1911
Santa Barbara, California 93116-1911

This book is also available on the World Wide Web as an eBook. Visit www.abc-clio.com for details.

This book is printed on acid-free paper ♻.

Manufactured in the United States of America

To
Robert L. Moore

CONTENTS

Volume I

Preface: An Overview of the World's Religions J. Gordon Melton	ix
Acknowledgments	xv
Basic Bibliography	xvii
Introduction: The Study of Religion Donald Wiebe	xix
A Statistical Approach to the World's Religious Adherents, 2000–2050 C.E. David B. Barrett and Todd M. Johnson	xxvii
About the Editors and Contributors	xxxix
A–Z List of Entries	lxvii

Religions of the World

Entries A–C	1
-------------	---

Volume 2

Entries D–J	382
-------------	-----

Volume 3

Entries K–R	739
-------------	-----

Volume 4

Entries S–Z	1115
Index	1469

PREFACE: AN OVERVIEW OF THE WORLD'S RELIGIONS

R*eligions of the World: A Comprehensive Encyclopedia of Beliefs and Practices* has been designed to survey the present religious situation around the world as the twenty-first century begins. To accomplish this task, the text is anchored in a disciplined country-by-country discussion of the emergence of the contemporary religious community in each of the more than 240 nations from the smaller island republics to the larger and more populous countries. This survey is made in the more than 1,200 A-to-Z entries below.

In the world of world religions encyclopedias, Religions of the World has assumed a unique approach. The great majority of previous world religions encyclopedias have grown out of the disciplines of anthropology and comparative religion. Those volumes have done a monumental job of highlighting the building blocks of the religious life as they have appeared in widely variant cultural contexts. While showing the very different religious structures that have been created by people around the world, they have also tried to discern the common elements that repeatedly appear in all or most religious traditions—prayer and meditational techniques, myth, ritual, devotion, sacred texts, moral perceptions, deities, spirit entities, and so forth.

Rather than attempt to duplicate past endeavors, Religions of the World takes a very different approach. It is concerned more with the organizations of various religious communities, the history of their origin and growth, their interaction with the larger world, and their present status in the world. Rather than concentrate on the often abstract themes that run throughout the religious world, we have tried to locate different religious communities in space and time and tried to identify those communities that have secured the greatest support from their ideal constituency and those that have had the greatest impact on the world in which they exist. The attempt to ground each religious community discussed has included the naming of present leadership and giving addresses at which the individual groups may be contacted as well as listing official websites, where applicable.

The production of this encyclopedia has dominated the life of the Institute for the Study of American Religion (ISAR), a religious studies facility in Santa Barbara, California, for more than a decade. Since its founding in 1969, ISAR has concentrated on the production of reference books that have, as its name implies, primarily focused on religion in North America. However, at the end of the 1980s, several factors converged to redirect its research to a larger context. Not the least of these factors was the invitation to the director of the Institute (J. Gordon Melton) to join the international board of the Center for Studies on New Religions (CESNUR) headquartered in Turin, Italy. Board duties required several annual trips overseas and provided the opportunity for comparing the American and European situation and time to consider the possibility of adapting techniques used in producing the reference books in American religion using a global scope. CESNUR provides the context in which this volume's two editors initially met and provided regular opportunities for consultation.

By far the most important element in generating this encyclopedia, however, was the long-term relationship that began in the later 1980s between ISAR and its director and the Institute for World Spirituality (IWS) and its founder, Dr. Robert L. Moore, a professor of Psychoanalysis, Culture, and Spirituality at Chicago Theological Seminary. Moore and Melton had met in the 1970s when ISAR was located in Chicago and together had written a textbook, The Cult Experience (1982). Their paths diverged in 1985 when ISAR relocated to California. In the meantime, Moore had founded the Institute for World Spirituality, an organization working toward the creation of interfaith cooperation for the human future. As he began to work in an interfaith context, Moore saw the need for a means of placing religious leaders throughout the world in contact with each other. He initially suggested the idea of creating an “International Directory of the World’s Religions,” and through the 1990s, IWS and ISAR worked together on the production of such a directory. This project could not have been completed without the financial and other support given by IWS.

Since the beginning of the new century ISAR has been developing an Internet site that can hold the directory and setting up a structure that can continually expand and update it. The idea of creating Religions of the World, as an encyclopedia of the most important of the world’s religions, emerged as a logical extension of the directory project in conversations with the wide range of scholars and religious leaders who cooperated with it.

Scope and Arrangement of Encyclopedia Entries

Religion does not just happen. Religions are created by inspired individuals, spread by faithful devotees, and structured so as to reach specific goals and serve the felt needs of adherents. Religious groups develop an economy to provide for the upkeep of facilities and sustain leadership as they pursue their spiritual visions. Some religions are more successful than others in each of these endeavors, relative success often being dictated by a more or less friendly environment.

In its attempt to describe the present situation to which the religious world has evolved, Religions of the World presents four distinct elements. First, the introductory essays by Donald Wiebe and David B. Barrett provide some overall perspective on the basic approach in the body of A-to-Z entries. Wiebe discusses the development and present state of the debate on the question of religion in the academy and how scholars attempting to understand its many manifestations can operate; that is, how an encyclopedia of religions is possible. As a distinct discipline, religious studies is an academic enterprise built around “an organized group of scholars and scientists from a diverse range of disciplines who have gained ‘academic identity’ by virtue of their common interest in religion. And it is essentially a ‘scientific enterprise’ because it is chiefly characterized by a cognitive intention, and takes for granted that the natural and social sciences are the only legitimate models for the objective study of religion.” Thus religious studies engages the religious community in terms of its publicly accessible manifestations—it ideas, its behavior, its existence in community, its historical development—rather than the Truth it claims, and thus compares without making judgment, at least of a religious/theological nature.

Barrett, a religious statistician, provides an overall picture of the world’s religious situation in terms of the larger religious groupings and offers some projection of where those different groups will go in the next. While religions have dispersed dramatically through the twentieth century, the older areas of strength by Christianity, Hinduism, Judaism, Buddhism, and Islam remain and will effect religious life for the foreseeable future.

The main body of the text of Religions of the World, the more than 1,200 A-to-Z entries, offer three kinds of material. First, in a series of core essays, the basic data about sixteen major religious traditions are presented. Not only are the five largest communities described, but several smaller groups—Jainism, Shintoism, Zoroastrianism, and Sikism/Sant Mat are highlighted. These core essays include several items often neglected in other volumes on world religions. First, there is an essay on what are termed Ethnoreligions, and a complementary essay on Traditional African Religions. These religions, described under a variety of terms in world religions textbooks, are those religions basically active among one people or ethnic group and in which membership in the ethnic group is basic to membership/participation in the religion. The religions in this highly diverse set are individually quite small but, collectively, remain an important element in the ongoing evolution of the religious community.

Second, among the core essays is one on the Western Esoteric Tradition. Possibly the most neglected element in religious studies texts, Western esotericism has been the major alternative to Christianity in the West for the last two thousand years. Often present as a persecuted minority, it has blossomed since the sixteenth century and has made its presence felt in the last generation as it made a quantum leap forward in a revivalistic movement generally called the New Age. The defining of the Western esoteric tradition(s) provides a handle for understanding much of the religious/spiritual activity apart from the Christian church in the Western world.

Third, the core essays include a discussion of Unbelief. The modern religious world is in large part defined by the critique on religious claims that began with the Protestant attack on Roman Catholic supernaturalism in the sixteenth century and expanded in the French Enlightenment. Unbelief differs from mere irreligion in that it offers a nonsupernatural perspective from which decisions concerning metaphysics, ethics, and human relations can be constructed. With due deference to the nonreligious nature of the Unbelief community, the fact that it largely concerns itself with traditional religious questions (the existence of god, supernaturalism, normative behavior) and that it offers a replacement (sometimes in an evangelical manner) for traditional “religious” life makes Unbelief and its organizational manifestations an important element in any discussion of the religious world and hence appropriately included in our text.

Supplementing the core essays are entries that describe the religious situation in each of the countries of the world. The assignment given to each author was to provide some historical perspective on the current religious community with a description that highlights its diversity. Authors come from a variety of scholarly disciplines; they are sociologists, anthropologists, and religious historians, and a few are religious affairs officials serving in government posts. Their entries, while providing the basic sets of facts, reflect their varied approaches to the question. No attempt has been made by the editors to remold these entries into a common format. Their diversity represents the continued diversity of perspectives that informs our knowledge of religious life.

The country essays cover all of the designated countries as recognized by the United Nations, plus several other designated areas now on that list such as Antarctica and the British Indian Ocean Territory. Thus one will find entries on not only the larger countries (China, Indonesia, Russia) but of smaller ones from Liechtenstein to Niue. Included are those areas of the world still under foreign control from Wake Island to Mayotte. Also covered are the newer countries such as Timor and Bosnia/Herzegovina. Accompanying most country entries are a map and a set of statistics (created by David B. Barrett) that provide helpful additions to the text. It should be noted that the discussion of the Vatican is included in the entry on Italy, and that in addition to the main entry on China, additional entries focus on China: Hong Kong, China: Macau, China: Taiwan, and China: Tibet.

The bulk of the entries focus upon nearly 1,000 of the most important religious bodies in the world, the majority being communities within the larger religious groupings that were the subject of the core essays. The list of religious communities was arrived at by a complex but very focused process. First, those larger religious communities notable for having a membership in the millions constituted the original list, to which were added some groups that while relatively small had a significant international presence, with worshipping communities in 50 or more countries.

To ensure broad coverage, each country was surveyed and an entry on the largest religious group in every country added, if it was not already on the list. This list was then circulated to the members of the editorial board (and other colleagues in religious studies), who were asked to suggest additional groups that had some regional significance. A particular effort was made to give proper coverage to some of the more neglected areas in world religious studies such as Indonesia, central Asia, and the island nations of the Pacific.

In order to give broad coverage to the various religious traditions, it was decided to include an entry on all of the member churches of the World Council of Churches and all of the cooperating organizations of the World Fellowship of Buddhists (whose membership lists have varied during the years of the development of this text). Islam presented a separate problem as divisions within the Muslim community have developed somewhat differently. Thus entries have been included on the major schools of Muslim jurisprudence (Hanafite, Hanbalite, Ismaili, Malikite, Shafiite, Shi'ite, and Sufi) as well as entries that cover a number of smaller sectarian expressions. In some cases, the Islamic community is covered as the major object of attention in country entries (Oman, Morocco, the Maldives), in some other countries it has received a separate entry (Brunei, Germany, Malaysia, Romania).

The Roman Catholic Church, the largest single religious organization in the world, presented special problems as on the one hand it was merely one community among many, but on the other hand, a single descriptive entry did not seem adequate. The decision was made to expand coverage of the church by including entries on the several Eastern-rite churches that form an important, distinct, but often misunderstood element of its life, and also to include entries on some of the religious orders that have been most important in the spread of Roman Catholicism worldwide (e.g., Dominicans, Franciscans, Holy Ghost Fathers, Jesuits, White Fathers). In like measure, several of the Protestant missionary agencies that were most important in the spread of Protestantism in the nineteenth century were also given entries (e.g., American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions, Basel Mission, Church Missionary Society, London Missionary Society, Paris Mission).

Finally, in keeping with the contemporary emphasis on religious life as the twenty-first century began, a select number of entries were reserved for groups that though relatively small, in some cases, infinitesimally so, have had an impact due to their interface with the larger religious and secular world. None are more quickly called to mind than the revivalist Islamic movement variously known as Islamic fundamentalism or revivalism. These have been given a set of entries under the general heading of "Islamism," and additional entries cover its development from the Muslim Brotherhood to its more recent tragic expression in Al Qaeda. Similar groups within the Jewish community are also covered. Among the smaller groups that have become of interest because of their involvement in violent incidents are Aum Shinrikyo, the Branch Davidians, the Church of the Lamb of God, the Movement for the Restoration of the Ten Commandments, the Peoples Temple, and the Solar Temple.

The existence of several thousand distinct ethnoreligions presented a particular problem. Space did not allow the inclusion of separate entries of even a representative sample of the varied world of small land-based primal religions, and hence the decision was made to present a somewhat random selection of groups from different parts of the world (such as the Navaho from North America, the Zulu from Africa, and the Bon of Tibet), in the hope that future supplements and editions to this volume will work toward presenting at least a more representative selection of ethnoreligions. However, in keeping with the contemporary emphasis of this volume, we have moved to include coverage of a small group of twentieth-century revivalist ethno-religions, with examples drawn primarily from North America and Europe, but including a few others such as the Santo Daime movement from Brazil.

The diversity of the world's religious community is in many ways a daunting phenomenon, and it will grow even more complex in the next century as an increasing number of individuals exercise their rights to religious self-determination. Meanwhile, running against the trend to greater diversity is the monumental effort of religious leaders to seek out and unite with people in other countries with whom they share both religious affirmations and secular aspirations. The religious community is only partially displayed if we neglect the many interfaith and ecumenical organizations that attempt to bring otherwise differing faith communities together for joint witness and action. While interfaith organizations (from the Council for a Parliament of the World's Religions to the World Conference on Religion and Peace) concentrate on overcoming religious and social conflict, intrafaith ecumenical groups (from the International New Thought Alliance to the World Muslim Congress) attempt to overcome religious differences in order to present a united witness for a particular faith expression. Some fifty encyclopedia entries are devoted to interfaith and ecumenical organizations that operate on an international level.

Cross-Referencing and Indexing

In order to make Religions of the World as accessible as possible to readers, an extensive set of cross-references appears throughout the text. These will be especially helpful in directing users from country entries to entries about particular groups mentioned as existing in a particular country and the exact name under which a group is described. These cross-references will also direct users to other religious bodies closely related to a particular group to which an entry is given, including parent bodies from which a group has originated and ecumenical organizations which it has joined.

A more extensive end-of-book subject index gives access to entries through the names of leaders, concepts which they espouse, and practices they observe.

Contact

While believing that this work makes a valuable contribution to our knowledge, we are quite aware that we are only beginning a process of describing the world's religions, which number in the tens of thousands. It is hoped that this work may in the future be followed by other works that provide coverage of additional religious groups and the editors are open to suggestions for groups that might be fruitfully included in future editions. We also welcome communications on improving the present text, correcting any errors that might have inadvertently entered into the entries, or expanding coverage of any subjects. Please address correspondence to:

J. Gordon Melton
Institute for the Study of American Religion
P.O. Box 90709
Santa Barbara, CA 93190
jgordon@linkline.com

Martin Baumann
Religionswissenschaftliches Seminar
Kasernenplatz 3
6003 Luzern
Switzerland
martin.baumann@unilu.ch

ACKNOWLEDGMENTS

Such a book as Religions of the World: A Comprehensive Encyclopedia of Beliefs and Practices, while carrying the names of two coeditors, could not have been produced without the cooperation and assistance of hundreds. And as one arrives at the point of completing such a work, one pauses to call to memory all the many people who have been our teachers throughout a long life. This work would not have been remotely possible without the many teachers and professors who were patient with our growing up process, the students who continue to motivate our growth now that we have assumed some professorial duties, and colleagues who continually supplement our knowledge and enlarge our perspective. To all we offer our first thanks.

Out of that multitude, however, some individuals stand out for their particular assistance in making this volume possible. We begin with a special thanks to Robert L. Moore and the board members of the Institute for World Spirituality, which provided the base and ongoing support from which this volume could emerge. Singled out for particular mention is Phil Matthews, an IWS associate, without whose strong support this project could not have gone forward.

We also extend our words of appreciation to the editorial board and the more than 200 scholars who contributed articles. We hope the role that this volume plays in filling a gap in their library's reference bookshelves will make their effort for the volume worthwhile.

Finally, in working on reference books, one becomes aware of the effort contributed by the publisher and staff in bringing a product to completion. It was a genuine pleasure to work with Todd Hallman (acquiring editor) and Martha Whitt (senior production editor) who assumed oversight of the project at various stages of its development and to their assistants who buckled down and dealt with the manuscript of a work of one million-plus words.

Among the ABC-CLIO staff who contributed to this work are: Gina Zondorak (assistant editor), Liz Kincaid (media editor), Anna Kaltenbach and George Smyser (map development), Carla Roberts (proofreading), and George Smyser (manufacturing coordinator). The outside editorial production staff include Silvine Farnell, Patricia L. Heinicke Jr., and Martin Hanft (copyeditors); Jerry Marshall and Alexandria Truitt (image researchers); Veronica Seyd (text design); Andrew Berry of Letra Libre (typesetting); and Suzanne Najarian and Kirsten L. Svenson (proofreaders). Last, but by no means least, is the man with the final word, the indexer, Will Ragsdale.

*J. Gordon Melton
Martin Baumann
May 2002*

BASIC BIBLIOGRAPHY

During the preparation of Religions of the World, the editors assembled a set of volumes that served as desk references from which information was drawn and against which entries were checked for accuracy. These volumes served as a reference point for a majority of the encyclopedia entries, but to avoid undue repetition, except in those places where they became the major source, they are not listed as such.

- Anderson, Gerald H., ed. Biographical Dictionary of Christian Missions. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans, 1998.
- Bachmann, E. Theodore, and Mercia Brenne Bachmann. Lutheran Churches in the World: A Handbook. Minneapolis, MN: Augsburg Press, 1989.
- Barrett, David. The Encyclopedia of World Christianity. 2d ed. New York: Oxford University Press, 2001.
- Bauswein, Jean-Jacques, and Lukas Vischer, eds. The Reformed Family Worldwide: A Survey of Reformed Churches, Theological Schools, and International Organizations. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans, 1999.
- Bissio, Roberto Remo, et al. Third World Guide 93/94. Montevideo, Uruguay: Instituto del Tercer Mundo, 1992.
- The Brethren Encyclopedia*. 2 vols. Philadelphia: The Brethren Encyclopedia, Inc., 1983.
- Burgess, Stanley M., and Gary McGee, eds. Dictionary of Pentecostal and Charismatic Movements. Grand Rapids, MI: Regency Reference Library, 1988.
- The Church of England Yearbook*. London: Church Publishing House, published annually.
- Directory—Handbuch*. Geneva: Lutheran World Federation, issued annually.
- EGgenberger, Oswald. Die Kirchen Sondergruppen und religiösen Vereinigungen. Zürich: Theologischer Verlag, 1994.
- Glazier, Stephen. The Encyclopedia of African and African American Religion. Boston: Routledge, 2001.
- Handbook*. Grand Rapids, MI: Reformed Ecumenical Synod, 1997.
- Harmon, Nolan B. Encyclopedia of World Methodism. 2 vols. Nashville, TN: United Methodist Publishing House, 1974.
- Hart, D. G., and Mark A. Noll, eds. Dictionary of the Presbyterian and Reformed Tradition in America. Downers Grove, IL: Intervarsity Press, 1999.
- Hoke, Donald, ed. The Church in Asia. Chicago: Moody Press, 1975.
- Kane, J. Herbert. A Global View of Christian Missions. Grand Rapids, MI: Baker Book House, 1971.
- Lorie, Peter, and Julie Foakes. The Buddhist Directory. London: Boxtree, 1996.
- Melton, J. Gordon. Encyclopedia of American Religions. 6th ed. Detroit, MI: Gale Research Company, 1999.
- Murphy, Larry G., J. Gordon Melton, and Gary L. Ward. Encyclopedia of African American Religion. New York: Garland Publishing, 1993.
- Orthodoxia*. Regensburg, Germany: Ostkirchliches Institut, issued annually.
- Payne, Wardell J. Directory of African-American Religious Bodies. 2d ed. Washington, DC: Howard University Press, 1996.
- Quakers around the World*. London: Friends World Committee for Consultation, 1994.

- Roberson, Ronald G. The Eastern Christian Churches—A Brief Survey. 5th ed. Rome: Edizioni Orientalia Christiana, Pontificio Istituto Orientale, 1995.
- Siewert, John A., and Edna G. Valdez, eds. Mission Handbook: U.S. and Canadian Christian Ministries Overseas. Monrovia, CA: 1997.
- Stein, Gordon, ed. The Encyclopedia of Unbelief. 2 vols. Buffalo, NY: Prometheus Books, 1985.
- Van der Bent, Ans J., ed. Handbook/Member Churches/World Council of Churches. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 1985.
- Ward, Kevin, and Brian Stanley. The Church Missionary Society and World Christianity, 1799–1999. Richmond, Surrey, UK: Curzon Press, 2000.
- Wardin, Albert W., ed. Baptists around the World. Nashville, TN: Broadman and Holman, 1995.
- Weller, Paul, ed. Religions in the UK: A Multi-Faith Directory. Derby, UK: University of Derby/Inter Faith Network for the United Kingdom, 1993.
- Wingate, Andrew, et al., eds. Anglicanism: A Global Communion. London: Mowbray, 1998.
- World Methodist Council, Handbook of Information*. Lake Junaluska, NC: World Methodist Council, 1997.

INTRODUCTION: THE STUDY OF RELIGION

Donald Wiebe

The study of religion is probably as old as religion itself, although there is no single form that defines that notion. The earliest form of the study of religion without doubt is devotional and catechetical. This kind of study of religion is primarily concerned with the edification and spiritual growth of the individual and community, and it is not capable, therefore, of being clearly differentiated from religion itself. If being religious is in some sense being able to provide a religious account of the world and of human existence in it, then it also necessarily involves a study of religion that will assist the devotee in obtaining the knowledge and skills necessary to provide such an account. There can be no doubt that such devotional study involves the intellect and in some sense concerns itself with cognitive issues, but it includes much more than that; training and formation in the practical and ethical requirements of the religious life are essential to the kind of “understanding” of the fundamental religious questions of truth, value, and meaning that is sought by believers. This kind of knowing, therefore, is not primarily about cognition but rather about the construction and organization of meaning. A catechetical and devotional study of religion, therefore, is much less a scholarly or academic undertaking than it is a form of religious formation and education; it provides an “understanding” of religion wholly from the inside and cares little, or not at all, for elaborating a theoretical account of religion. Indeed, it is not a detached study of religious phenomena, nor does it seek objectivity (intersubjective testability) for the claims it makes; it requires of the student, rather, submission to the tradition and the community, and therefore exhibits a structure characterized by hierarchy and authority. Religion in the West, however, has also inspired a more scholarly and academic investigation of religious reality and the religious life that—even though directed toward edification of the student/believer—blends both catechetical/devotional and scholarly/cognitive concerns in a quest for a more profound and shareable understanding of religion.

Although both these forms of study—catechetical/devotional and scholarly/cognitive—presume of the student a faith commitment, the latter eventually produced an elaborate structure of theological disciplines that made possible the development of a more systematic, comprehensive, and therefore “scientific” understanding of the Christian faith. However, “scientific” here does not bear the connotation of the modern notion of science, since, in this context, the scholarship involved is still constrained by religious commitment and belief; it is scholarship from the point of view of the religious insider and produces a systematic body of knowledge of (the Christian) religion. Because such a body of knowledge is constructed as an essential element of the “meaning” of the Christian faith, it is clearly different from the modern scientific endeavor. Such an academic and scholarly undertaking, therefore, can, at most, be designated a “faith-imbued science.” And even though much of the scholarly work in such disciplines as biblical studies and church history, for example, is indistinguishable from that produced by scholars not constrained by a faith commitment and by religious beliefs, it is essentially a theologico-religious exercise.

These religious forms of “the study of religion” do not exhaust that notion—they are simply the earliest forms of that enterprise. And the kind of “scientific” understanding of religion that blends systematic scholarly and catechetical/devotional concerns differs radically from the narrower, more academic and strictly scientific interest in religious phenomena that emerged in the context of the modern Western university in the last quarter of the nineteenth century. This new academic enterprise is scientific not simply in the sense of producing a systematic body of knowledge of religion—and of religions in their historical manifestation—but also in the fuller scientific sense of seeking a natural explanatory and theoretical account of religion. And in embracing the naturalism of the modern sciences, this new study of religion transcends the constraints upon research and scholarship imposed by the prior faith-informed framework governing the work of the scholar-devotee. This new study of religion, therefore, cannot be included in the category of “faith-imbued science” but is rather more appropriately given its own designation as the scientific study of religion—with “scientific” now being understood to mean a strictly (unblended) academic undertaking that finds its natural home in the context of the modern research university and affiliated institutes, schools, and associations. Although it is historically connected with the intellectual examination of religion that preceded it, its fundamental objective and methodology represent a radical reorientation of that study. Whereas the devotee-scholar is dedicated to providing a systematic intellectual comprehension of the tradition that is consistent with the faith of the religious community concerned, the modern scientific student of religion aims to explain religion (both tradition and faith) as an aspect of the natural world.

This modern approach to the study of religion, it must be noted, has been variously named since its emergence (for example, religionswissenschaft: history of religions, comparative religions, religiology), although the term “religious studies” has become the most frequently used designation for that academic study of religion in colleges and universities since roughly the middle of the twentieth century. It is also important to recognize, however, that this purely scientific approach to the study of religion has not yet come to full fruition in the modern university. It has rightly been pointed out that even though it is possible to view “religious studies” as a reductionistic scientific project, that does not describe the kind of work in which the majority of those who teach in departments of religious studies are engaged. This may be accounted for, in part, by the fact that the formation of departments of religious studies has been intertwined in a variety of ways in earlier institutional developments related to religious education and the study of theology in the college and university context. Religious studies, that is, was often introduced into the university curriculum through pre-existing departments of theology and never fully succeeded in freeing itself from their well-entrenched and well-funded religious agendas. However, the lack of success in fully transforming the study of religion from a faith-based “science” to a “science of religion” may, on the other hand, represent a failure of nerve on the part of later students of religion to follow through on the scientific program for the study of religion set out by its nineteenth-century founders because of the possible harm such a program might do to religion itself. Whatever the cause, the academic study of religion in most colleges and universities today is predominantly a theological or crypto-theological enterprise, and it finds added support for its rejection of the modern scientific ideal in a relatively widespread postmodernist backlash against science in general.

Postmodernists are fond of pointing out that science has been under attack since the end of the nineteenth century as naive in its view of itself as a system or structure that escapes the nonrational determinations of culture affecting other modes of thought. Consequently, postmodern students of religion—whose primary concern, it appears, is with the maintenance and promotion of religion—maintain that the sciences are not simple, rational processes of thought and analysis that can provide a neutral framework for an uncomplicated, objective study of religion. They maintain, therefore, that the academic study of religion can be legitimately undertaken in a “reflective” rather than a reductionistic explanatory manner that not only permits but even requires of the student a conscious engagement with religious truth, value, and meaning. “Reflection” on these matters, it is claimed, is not a mere repetition of pious affirmations but rather makes possible a “deeper conversation” with religion that can better reveal religion’s essential character than can the reductionistic approach of the theoretical sciences. Such an approach, moreover, is often labeled “postmodern science,” even though it bears no resemblance to science as a fundamental set of methods for obtaining knowledge of the world that chiefly characterizes the disciplines of the modern Western research university. But there can be no doubt that such a postmodern approach to the study of religion—in its espousal of an (interior) “understanding” of the truth, value, and meaning of religion gained through dialogical engagement rather than an empirically testable theoretical account of religion as its primary goal—more closely resembles the catechetical, devotional, and faith-imbued study of religion dominant in the premodern university. There can be little doubt, that is, that its concerns are more gnostic than epistemic, for it is clear that for the postmodernist, rational cognitive inquiry is of little or no importance compared with the issue of determining the meaning of life and the value of religion; making sense of life constitutes its “framework of knowledge” and calls for an immersion of the student in the “wisdom” of the cultural system “studied” rather than description, critical analysis, and explanation of that cultural system.

In light of this overview of historical developments in the “study of religion,” it is clear that there is no simple answer to the question of the nature of that study. There are at least two, and possibly three, distinct approaches to the intellectual, scholarly, and academic study of religion: premodern “faith-imbued science,” which blends devotional, catechetical, moral, and intellectual concerns; modern scientific study of religion, which espouses reason as a nonmoral instrument of inquiry that attempts to diminish as much as possible religious, moral, social, cultural, political, and other noncognitive influences in its quest for knowledge about religion; and “postmodern science,” which, in rejecting modern science, appears to be a new form of gnosticism that is only superficially distinguishable from premodern faith-imbued science.

There are many postmodern scholars but as yet no postmodern universities; postmodernism, that is, has not as yet, so to speak, “convinced” the sciences (which, for this discussion, includes all the academic disciplines and not just the natural sciences) of the modern university that their methods for obtaining objective knowledge of the world are incapable of achieving that end. The primary purpose of the contemporary research university, therefore, still appears to be that of obtaining rationally and empirically sound knowledge (including the skills required in producing it) and of making it available for the management of the affairs of society. Consequently, insofar as academic students of religion today desire scientific credibility, they must refuse to expand the religious studies portfolio beyond the quest for public knowledge of public facts about religious phenomena, events, and behavior.

Although it is true that the emergence of “religious studies” as a scientific study of religion in the nineteenth century was intertwined with earlier institutional developments in religious education and the study of theology, there can be no doubt that the primary impulse that made possible its entry into the university curriculum as a new intellectual enterprise was the rapid development of the natural and social sciences following on from their emancipation from the dominance of theology in the premodern university. The premodern university was essentially a religious institution that concerned itself not simply with the quest for knowledge but also with the moral and religious formation of its students. Nevertheless, as historians have noted, premodern universities, by virtue of legal developments that made them autonomous corporate entities, were also able to provide what has been called intellectual “neutral spaces” in which the natural and social worlds could be subjected to critical analysis and explanation. And the subsequent transformation of the traditional notion of “right reason” to “reason(ing)” —based on the recognition of the possibility of dissociating knowledge from virtue—gave rise to an unrestricted cognitive drive (that is, the quest for knowledge for the sake of knowledge alone); in effect, it created a nonmoral and nonideological instrument of inquiry that made possible the full exploitation of that neutral intellectual space of the medieval university, and the eventual transformation of the religious university into the modern research university. And these developments also made possible a new conceptual ordering of the world, with the mythic ordering of reality giving way to a naturalistic, empirical, and rational framework of understanding within which the critique of religion itself became possible. And it is this new reality that made possible the transformation of “religion” from a supernatural reality to an object of science; “religion,” that is, came to function as a taxonomic indicator used to designate a range of human behavior involving belief in the supernatural that was now open to natural explanation.

Understanding these transformations, it should be clear that even though the academic (scientific) study of religion appears to have its beginnings within the framework of Christian theology—because in most cases it found its way into the curriculum of colleges and universities in association with faculties and departments of theology or other institutional arrangements for the “delivery” of religious “services” to undergraduates—it is not so much the “offspring” of theology as it is the result of the critique of religion and theology. And though it is true that many theologians and religious instructors (“faith-imbued scientists”) have contributed to the scientific study of religion, they have done so not as theologians or religious educators but as philologists, historians, and social scientists, making use of positivist and empiricist methodologies in their broader religio-theological frameworks of thought. Clearly distinguishing the political from the intellectual aspects of the introduction of the “study of religion” into the university curriculum, therefore, is helpful in recognizing why “religious studies” is in fact a new enterprise and not simply “religion” or “theology” in another guise—nor a mere embellishment of the theological disciplines already ensconced in the university setting with which “religious studies” became associated. Indeed, it is in a sense a rival to the theological “disciplines,” for—insofar as they are themselves aspects of religion—they will be aspects of the subject matter studied by students of religion. Given these developments it is also clear why talk about the “academic study of religion” ought to be seen as a normative matter rather than merely descriptive of what now passes for academic and scientific work in contemporary departments of religious studies, for it excludes some traditional scholarly examinations of religion from the field. It is not surprising, therefore, to hear theologians bitterly complain about how quickly the academic study of religion (religious studies) secularized its “host” and converted departments of theology into venues for a nonconfessional, naturalistic “discipline” for the study of religion.

If the modern research university is primarily committed to the creation and dissemination of knowledge and to the promotion and development of the skills necessary for acquiring new knowledge, then it is only the modern, strictly scientific study of religion that is “legitimately” a part of the curriculum of the modern Western university, for it is the only study of religion that transcends the traditional structures of knowledge and authority governing the theological “disciplines” and that, like the other sciences (university “disciplines”), restricts itself to obtaining “public knowledge” of “public facts.” The “academic study of religion,” therefore, is a new kind of intellectual inquiry into religious phenomena that possesses a normative structure even though it may not be entirely accurate to see it as a discipline with its own peculiar methodology. It is more accurate, rather, to refer to this new inquiry as an academic or scientific “enterprise.” To see it as a discipline with a set of methods specific to itself would be justified only, it appears, if religion were a sui generis reality explicable solely with reference to its peculiar nature, rather than in relation to other types of human engagements, and the natural world within which human communities exist. However, “religion” now refers merely to a range of human constructions and behavior connected to beliefs in transcendental beings, powers, and states in which scholars from a multiplicity of humanistic, social-scientific, and socio-biological disciplines have an interest, and whose work may contribute to achieving an overall understanding (explanation) of religion.

“Religion” no longer designates some sacred, mysterious, transcendental, or metaphysical reality that sets it wholly apart from the mundane world and therefore beyond the methods of inquiry applicable to the study of everyday, ordinary reality. On the one hand, therefore, the academic study of religion is comparable to economics, political science, sociology, and psychology, among other disciplines, in that, like them, it simply tries to account for a specific range of human behavior in nonreligious and nontheological terms. On the other hand it differs from them in its interdisciplinary and polymethodic character and is better described as an “academic enterprise” because it is essentially an organized group of scholars and scientists from a diverse range of disciplines who have gained “academic identity” by virtue of their common interest in religion. And it is essentially a “scientific enterprise” because it is chiefly characterized by a cognitive intention and takes for granted that the natural and social sciences are the only legitimate models for the objective study of religion. The multidisciplinary and polymethodic character of this “scientific enterprise” constitutes a centrifugal force that threatens its coherence and identity, but the commitment to finding a theory of religion that will provide a causal explanatory account of the data of religion—which is an essential, even if not yet sufficiently developed, element of the “enterprise”—creates a counterbalancing centripetal force. The religious studies enterprise, therefore, even though polymethodic, is more than a miscellaneous agglomeration of humanistic and social-scientific disciplines. The modern student of religion, therefore—whether working at the level of the “naturalist” in the collection, description, and classification of data, or at the level of analysis and interpretation of the meanings that the data have for the devotee, or at the level of comparative analysis of religious systems of thought and practice that might provide useful generalizations about religion, or at the level of theory that might provide a causal explanation for the data—is essentially concerned to find an “account” of religion in terms of scientifically warrantable (testable) claims, thereby contributing to a cumulative body of knowledge about religions and religion.

Whether it is even possible for a postmodern university to take shape and form in the manner of the modern research university is doubtful. And there is no doubt that it does not as yet exist as anything but an idea or ideal. Nevertheless, postmodernists within the precincts of the modern university, in alliance with more general antisience forces in society at large, exert considerable pressure for radical changes to the structure, curriculum, and operation of the modern university. This is no more evident than in the area of religious studies. What is of particular interest in this case, however, is the affinity between the postmodernists and the premodern students of religion. Both groups of scholars are, in some sense, committed to sound scholarship and science, providing that the scholarship involved does not simply “degenerate” into mere academicism, and that the science espoused not simply sink into unrestrained reductionism. Like the premodern theologians, the postmodern “Historians of Religion” (not “historians of religion,” who concern themselves only with mundane historical matters) see themselves as spokespersons for an academically grounded study of religion yet use their scholarly careers to reveal the perennial mystery and ultimate truth of religion that they “know” by other than scholarly and scientific means. Like “historians of religion,” they engage in philological and historical investigations, but it is by means of some gnostic form of initiation that they seem to possess an esoteric “understanding” of religion—an “understanding” that lies beyond all mundane scholarly and scientific criticism.

Given this stance of the postmodern “Historians of Religion,” it is obvious that they are operating with incoherent notions of scholarship and science: rejecting the logical and empirical constraints of normal scholarly and scientific practice in the production of knowledge, yet espousing them as means for the dissemination of a “knowledge” gained by other unspecified (and uncriticizable) means. Furthermore, there is no rationale provided for the implicit claim in such practice that postmodern scholarship and science represent epistemological improvement, development, or progress over that produced by modern scholarship and science in its elaboration of the intellectual “neutral space” provided by the medieval university. Indeed, the so-called postmodern scholarship and science is rather an antischolarship and antisience and is, therefore, subversive of the modern university. It sees scholarship and science as forms of cognitive imperialism that undermine other cultural, religious, and political values and therefore attempts to reconstruct the university so as to provide a framework for their articulation and promotion. Although some see the possibility of a postmodern university as the democratization of scholarship, it is difficult to see how this can be anything other than the balkanization of the university. Given the wide diversity of noncognitive goals and values seeking attention and place in the public sphere, importation of their agendas into the universities will do little by way of mediating their contending claims for power; indeed, it will simply make the sciences available for the articulation and defense of individual and local social interests. In a postmodern university, therefore, there can be no “growth of knowledge”; such an institution can only encourage an accumulation of contending and contradictory assertions and unsubstantiated claims.

In summary, then, the preceding analysis has shown that “the study of religion” can designate more than simply one kind of intellectual engagement with religion. The study of religion in the premodern university is a form of “faith-imbued” study that is clearly distinguishable from the modern, “strictly scientific” approach to understanding religion, an enterprise that emerged in the late nineteenth century, spurred on by a period of rapid growth in the natural sciences. And it is the latter approach to the study of religion—one directed to obtaining reliable public knowledge about religious behavior—that finds legitimation in that peculiar modern institution, the research university. And its success in matters of cognition is incontrovertible, despite the claims of postmodern scholars that science, no more than religion itself, is a culture-transcending mode of thought or source of knowledge. Science may be of little or no help in addressing human problems: in providing people a sense of belonging, in furnishing a basis of obligation and cooperation in society, or in consoling the afflicted. However, its superiority in the sphere of cognition is wholly conspicuous and distinctive. Postmodern efforts to improve upon the modern university involved transforming the notion of knowledge, incorporating into it the concerns of Truth, Value, and Meaning, and making of it a form of wisdom capable of addressing human problems. Achieving such “wisdom-knowledge,” however, involves (an uncritical) immersion in the traditions housing Truths, Values, and Meanings, and is, therefore, a gnostic form of knowing quite incommensurable with scientific knowledge of the modern university; it is, in fact, indistinguishable from the mythopoetic, faith-imbued knowledge of the theologians of the premodern university. “Religious studies,” therefore, if it is to be an appropriate academic undertaking within the context of the contemporary research university, and a legitimate element of the curriculum in today’s colleges and universities, must be a purely cognitive enterprise in the strict sense of “science” set out above. Other styles of the “study of religion” may have their rightful place, but that place is not the modern research university.

A STATISTICAL APPROACH TO THE WORLD'S RELIGIOUS ADHERENTS, 2000–2050 C.E.

David B. Barrett and Todd M. Johnson

About the Statistics Used in this Encyclopedia

Religions of the World: A Comprehensive Encyclopedia of Beliefs and Practices contains a standardized statistical table, with totals of followers (adherents) of the 19 largest religions, for each of the world's 238 countries, 20 regions, 7 continents, and the entire globe itself. This listing follows the names and definitions as designated by the United Nations (UN) as of 2002. Tables for the world, the continents, and the continental regions immediately follow this introduction. The tables for the individual countries (as well as Antarctica) appear in the encyclopedia entry for the respective country.

A Standardized Format

The standardized formats and definitions in each of these short religion tables are as follows: Titles follow the format "Status of religions in Afghanistan, 2000–2050," with the largest being "Status of religions in World Population, 2000–2050." This latter table lists the world's 19 largest or most significant distinct religious blocs, ranked numerically by number of followers (adherents) in 2000 C.E. The largest such religion, Christianity, is then subdivided into the 3 largest of its 6 constituent ecclesiastical megablocs of affiliated church members (Orthodox, Roman Catholics, Anglicans, Protestants, Independents, and Marginal Christians).

Standardized columns

Scanning across the column heads of each table, readers will note 6 categories of information: (1) name of the religion's followers, (2) total of those followers (including children) in 2000, (3) that total expressed as a percentage of total population (which in turn is shown on the bottom line), (4) annual percent rate of growth over the period 1990–2000, (5) projected total followers in 2025 C.E., and (6) total projected followers in 2050 C.E. The future projections in these last 2 columns are built on the 7 detailed alternate scenarios that are part of the UN's demographic database for every country and every year from 1950 to 2050.

Duplicate membership

In the interests of brevity, these highly condensed tables abridge an important issue and omit a variety of explanatory categories (which can be studied more completely in the World Christian Encyclopedia, 2d ed. [New York: Oxford University Press, 2001], and also in World Christian Trends [Pasadena, CA: William Carey Library, 2001]). Among these categories are: (1) Unaffiliated Christians (found in all countries) often called nominal Christians, being professing followers of Christ who are not known to or involved in organized Christianity; (2) Doubly affiliated Christians (found in 93 countries, such as Brazil), being baptized members of a denomination who become baptized or affiliated in a second denomination without renouncing the former; (3) Disaffiliated Christians (found in 11 countries, such as Italy), being baptized persons who profess to have abandoned Christianity (as in polls) but without renouncing their baptismal membership; and (4) Doubly counted religionists (found in 24 countries, the largest being India), being followers of one religion (e.g., Hinduism, Islam, or Buddhism) who become committed members of another religion (e.g., Christianity) at the same time as retaining committed membership in the first.

Definitions

The tables use the following categories and subjects:

Continents. These follow current UN demographic terminology, which now divides the world into 7 major areas including Antarctica. See World Population Prospects: The 1998 Revision (New York: United Nations, 1999), which gives populations of all continents, regions, and countries covering the period 1950–2050. Note that “Asia” now includes the former USSR Central Asian states; and “Europe” now includes all of Russia extending eastward to Vladivostok, the Sea of Japan, and the Bering Strait.

Countries. This covers sovereign countries (properly termed nations) and nonsovereign countries in which each religion or religious grouping has a numerically significant and organized following.

Followers (or Adherents). As defined in the 1948 Universal Declaration of Human Rights, a person’s religion is what he or she says it is, and no one has the right to deny such profession. Totals are enumerated following the methodology of the World Christian Encyclopedia using recent censuses, polls, surveys, reports, Web sites, literature, and other data.

Atheists. Persons professing atheism, skepticism, disbelief, or irreligion, including the militantly antireligious (opposed to all religion). Compare with “Nonreligious,” below.

Buddhists. At the world level, followers of the Buddha are 56 percent Mahayana, 38 percent Theravada (Hinayana), 6 percent Tantrayana (Lamaism).

Chinese folk-religionists. An umbrella term for followers of traditional Chinese religion (local deities, ancestor veneration, Confucian ethics, Taoism, traditional universism, divination, some Buddhist elements).

Christians. Followers of Jesus Christ comprising (a) persons affiliated with churches (church members, including children), divided into 6 standardized ecclesiastical megablocs as enumerated below; plus (b) persons professing in censuses or polls to be Christians though not so affiliated. Each table lists under “Christians” only the 3 largest such megablocs. Figures for these 3 megablocs may be larger than the total on the previous line because many Christians are affiliated to more than one denomination. The 6 megablocs are as follows:

1. Orthodox. Churches in communion with the ancient patriarchates of the East, including (a) Eastern Orthodox (Constantinople, Antioch, Jerusalem), (b) Oriental Orthodox (Echmiadzin, Alexandria, Damascus, Addis Ababa, India), and (c) the Ancient Assyrian Apostolic Church of the East.
2. Roman Catholics. Churches and jurisdictions in communion with the Holy See and the Roman papacy.

3. Anglicans. Churches in communion with the Archbishop of Canterbury.
4. Protestants. Churches tracing their ancestry back to the Protestant Reformation in Europe from 1517 onwards, under Luther, Calvin, Zwingli, et al.
5. Independents. Members of churches and networks that regard themselves as postdenominationalist and neo-apostolic and thus are independent of and uninterested in historic, organized, institutionalized, denominationalist Christianity.
6. Marginal Christians. Members of denominations regarding themselves as on the margins of organized mainstream Christianity (Mormons, Jehovah's Witnesses, Christian Science, Religious Science, et al.).

Confucians. Non-Chinese followers of Confucius and Confucianism, mostly Koreans in Korea.

Ethnoreligionists. Followers of local, tribal, or shamanistic religions, with members restricted to one ethnic group.

Hindus. At the world level, followers of Hindu deities are 70 percent Vaisnavites, 25 percent Saivites, and 5 percent Shaktites, neo-Hindus, and reform Hindus.

Jews. Adherents of Judaism. For detailed data on "core" Jewish populations, see the annual "World Jewish Populations" article in the American Jewish Committee's American Jewish Year Book.

Muslims. At the world level, 83 percent are Sunnites, 16 percent are Shi'ites, and 1 percent are other schools.

New-Religionists. Followers of twentieth-century new religions, new religious movements, radical new crisis religions, and non-Christian syncretistic mass religions, all founded since 1800 and most since 1945, mostly Asian in origin and membership but increasingly with worldwide followings.

Nonreligious. Persons professing no religion, nonbelievers, agnostics, freethinkers, indifferent, uninterested, or dereligionized secularists indifferent to all religion but not militantly so. Compare with "Atheists," above.

Other religionists. Includes a handful of smaller religions, quasi-religions, pseudo religions, parareligions, religious or mystic systems, religious and semireligious brotherhoods of numerous varieties.

Total population. UN medium variant figures for mid-2025 and mid-2050, as given in World Population Prospects: The 1998 Revision.

Religious Adherents of the World and by Continent and Region

The following tables cover the world's countries as recognized by the UN, plus 11 countries not recognized or included by the UN: Bougainville, British Indian Ocean Territory, Christmas Island, Cocos Islands, Mayotte, Norfolk Island, Northern Cyprus, Somaliland, Spanish North Africa, Svalbard and Jan Mayen Islands, and the Republic of China (Taiwan). There is a country entry in the encyclopedia for each country, plus entries for British Indian Ocean Territory, Christmas Island, Cocos Islands, Mayotte, Svalbard and Jan Mayen Islands, and China: Taiwan. There is, in addition, an entry on Antarctica. For statistics and material on the Vatican (Holy See), see Italy; for material on Hong Kong and Macau, see China: Hong Kong and China: Macau. The tables below cover the world, then each continent in alphabetical order. Following each individual continent are the tables for each region of that continent, each with a note detailing the countries that compose that region.

The World

Followers	2000			2025	2050
	total	%	rate
Christians	1,999,564,000	33.0	1.36	2,616,670,000	3,051,564,000
Roman Catholics	1,057,328,000	17.5	1.29	1,361,965,000	1,564,609,000
Independents	385,745,000	6.4	2.49	581,642,000	752,892,000
Protestants	342,002,000	5.7	1.44	468,633,000	574,419,000
Muslims	1,188,243,000	19.6	2.13	1,784,876,000	2,229,282,000
Hindus	811,336,000	13.4	1.69	1,049,231,000	1,175,298,000
Nonreligious	768,159,000	12.7	0.83	875,121,000	887,995,000
Chinese folk-religionists	384,807,000	6.4	1.02	448,843,000	454,333,000
Buddhists	359,982,000	6.0	1.09	418,345,000	424,607,000
Ethnoreligionists	228,367,000	3.8	1.33	277,247,000	303,599,000
Atheists	150,090,000	2.5	0.30	159,544,000	169,150,000
Neoreligionists	102,356,000	1.7	1.03	114,720,000	118,845,000
Sikhs	23,258,000	0.4	1.87	31,378,000	37,059,000
Jews	14,434,000	0.2	0.91	16,053,000	16,694,000
Spiritists	12,334,000	0.2	1.96	16,212,000	20,709,000
Baha'is	7,106,000	0.1	2.28	12,062,000	18,001,000
Confucianists	6,299,000	0.1	0.73	6,818,000	6,953,000
Jains	4,218,000	0.1	0.87	6,116,000	6,733,000
Shintoists	2,762,000	0.1	-1.09	2,123,000	1,655,000
Taoists	2,655,000	0.0	1.00	3,066,000	3,272,000
Zoroastrians	2,544,000	0.0	2.65	4,440,000	6,965,000
other religionists	1,067,000	0.0	1.03	1,500,000	1,938,000
Total population	6,055,049,000	100.0	1.41	7,823,703,000	8,909,095,000

Africa (60 countries)

Followers	2000			2025	2050
	total	%	rate
Christians	360,232,000	45.9	2.68	633,804,000	903,205,000
Roman Catholics	120,386,000	15.4	2.88	228,295,000	341,894,000
Protestants	89,000,000	11.4	2.88	157,300,000	227,150,000
Independents	83,841,000	10.7	2.96	139,813,000	209,164,000
Muslims	317,374,000	41.1	2.37	519,348,000	695,279,000
Ethnoreligionists	96,805,000	15.1	1.99	126,051,000	134,509,000
Nonreligious	5,024,000	0.6	3.42	10,576,000	19,734,000
Hindus	2,351,000	0.5	1.94	3,427,000	4,964,000
Baha'is	1,733,000	0.2	2.28	3,396,000	5,560,000
Atheists	420,000	0.1	2.36	890,000	1,474,000
Jews	214,000	0.0	0.62	234,000	275,000
Buddhists	134,000	0.0	2.25	294,000	563,000
Jains	66,100	0.1	1.55	94,600	200,000
Sikhs	53,100	0.0	1.54	101,000	145,000
Chinese folk-religionists	32,400	0.0	1.35	57,500	112,000
Neoreligionists	28,400	0.1	3.43	43,000	68,000
Spiritists	2,500	0.0	0.04	4,400	7,200
Zoroastrians	880	0.0	2.04	1,800	3,000
Confucianists	240	0.0	0.51	500	900
other religionists	65,700	0.0	1.92	122,000	190,000
Total population	784,445,000	100.0	2.47	1,298,311,000	1,766,082,000

Followers	2000			2025	2050
	total	%	rate
Christians	151,117,000	61.2	2.65	271,313,000	389,128,000
Roman Catholics	47,431,000	19.2	2.59	85,902,000	123,927,000
Protestants	35,724,000	14.5	3.07	66,248,000	96,825,000
Orthodox	25,537,000	10.5	2.65	47,148,000	68,860,000
Muslims	51,030,000	20.7	2.69	94,345,000	136,246,000
Ethnoreligionists	41,541,000	17.1	2.14	54,432,000	60,041,000
Hindus	1,272,000	0.5	1.85	1,971,000	2,865,000
Nonreligious	864,000	0.4	3.85	2,013,000	3,697,000
Baha'is	832,000	0.3	1.70	1,536,000	2,609,000
Atheists	90,100	0.1	3.03	200,000	348,000
Jains	66,100	0.1	1.55	94,600	200,000
Buddhists	57,900	0.1	2.33	113,000	224,000
Sikhs	42,300	0.0	1.60	80,500	114,000
Jews	28,800	0.0	1.55	38,100	47,500
Chinese folk-religionists	23,400	0.1	1.42	37,100	70,200
Zoroastrians	880	0.0	2.04	1,800	3,000
Spiritists	530	0.0	0.60	800	1,200
other religionists	2,800	0.0	1.55	4,700	8,100
Total population	246,969,000	100.0	2.56	426,181,000	595,562,000

Eastern Africa includes 21 countries: British Indian Ocean Territory, Burundi, Comoros, Djibouti, Eritrea, Ethiopia, Kenya, Madagascar, Malawi, Mauritius, Mayotte, Mozambique, Reunion, Rwanda, Seychelles, Somalia, Somaliland, Tanzania, Uganda, Zambia, and Zimbabwe

Followers	2000			2025	2050
	total	%	rate
Christians	78,075,000	81.6	3.26	156,486,000	237,100,000
Roman Catholics	42,154,000	44.1	3.38	86,486,000	135,750,000
Protestants	17,592,000	18.4	3.26	33,346,000	48,547,000
Independents	14,674,000	15.3	3.45	32,869,000	54,540,000
Muslims	8,966,000	10.8	2.86	17,240,000	25,638,000
Ethnoreligionists	7,530,000	7.9	1.92	8,206,000	5,886,000
Nonreligious	491,000	0.5	4.64	1,514,000	3,952,000
Baha'is	402,000	0.4	3.10	834,000	1,301,000
Hindus	93,200	0.2	3.81	201,000	401,000
Atheists	68,200	0.1	3.33	138,000	260,000
Neoreligionists	10,700	0.3	3.85	21,000	33,000
Buddhists	4,600	0.0	3.97	9,400	20,000
Jews	460	0.0	0.98	300	300
Chinese folk-religionists	320	0.0	2.34	600	1,200
other religionists	11,600	0.0	4.78	22,600	41,000
Total population	95,653,000	100.0	3.12	184,673,000	274,631,000

Middle Africa includes 9 countries: Angola, Cameroon, Central African Republic, Chad, Congo (Republic of, Brazzaville), Congo (Democratic Republic, Zaire), Equatorial Guinea, Gabon, and São Tomé and Príncipe

Followers	2000			2025	2050
	total	%	rate
Muslims	151,869,000	87.7	2.04	217,633,000	262,354,000
Christians	15,865,000	9.2	1.87	23,128,000	29,989,000
Orthodox	9,582,000	5.5	1.57	12,384,000	14,484,000
Roman Catholics	3,583,000	2.1	2.18	6,117,000	8,517,000
Anglicans	2,323,000	1.3	2.57	3,604,000	4,605,000
Ethnoreligionists	3,518,000	10.0	0.72	4,401,000	4,503,000
Nonreligious	1,888,000	1.1	2.77	3,726,000	6,482,000
Atheists	121,000	0.1	1.88	192,000	276,000
Baha'is	42,600	0.0	2.08	76,000	124,000
Jews	24,600	0.0	0.46	19,800	17,900
Buddhists	18,900	0.3	2.23	55,000	138,000
Hindus	6,300	0.0	2.56	15,000	25,200
Sikhs	2,000	0.0	1.73	5,000	10,000
Chinese folk-religionists	1,600	0.0	1.11	4,000	10,000
Total population	173,265,000	100.0	2.01	249,120,000	303,765,000

Northern Africa includes 8 countries: Algeria, Egypt, Libya, Morocco, Sahara, Spanish North Africa, Sudan, and Tunisia

Followers	2000			2025	2050
	total	%	rate
Christians	38,964,000	83.1	2.01	46,778,000	55,089,000
Independents	19,899,000	42.4	2.23	25,490,000	30,990,000
Protestants	13,840,000	29.5	1.85	16,596,000	19,980,000
Roman Catholics	4,577,000	9.8	2.20	6,405,000	8,370,000
Ethnoreligionists	4,382,000	9.4	0.14	4,144,000	3,732,000
Nonreligious	995,000	2.1	3.21	1,497,000	2,175,000
Hindus	964,000	2.1	1.90	1,211,000	1,609,000
Muslims	958,000	2.0	1.72	1,122,000	1,339,000
Baha'is	301,000	0.6	2.57	586,000	851,000
Jews	159,000	0.4	0.48	174,000	205,000
Atheists	82,600	0.2	1.72	216,000	303,000
Buddhists	46,600	0.1	2.07	100,000	150,000
Sikhs	8,800	0.0	1.23	15,400	20,600
Chinese folk-religionists	3,200	0.0	1.31	8,000	15,000
Spiritists	2,000	0.0	-0.11	3,600	6,000
Confucianists	240	0.0	0.51	500	900
other religionists	18,200	0.0	0.63	30,400	40,000
Total population	46,885,000	100.0	1.83	55,886,000	65,536,000

Southern Africa includes 5 countries: Botswana, Lesotho, Namibia, South Africa, and Swaziland

Followers	2000			2025	2050
	total	%	rate
Muslims	104,550,000	47.2	2.67	189,007,000	269,702,000
Christians	76,211,000	34.4	2.70	136,099,000	191,899,000
Independents	29,464,000	13.3	3.23	45,488,000	67,850,000
Roman Catholics	22,642,000	10.2	2.84	43,384,000	65,329,000
Protestants	20,484,000	9.2	2.93	38,833,000	58,505,000
Ethnoreligionists	39,834,000	18.0	2.19	54,869,000	60,347,000
Nonreligious	786,000	0.4	4.15	1,826,000	3,428,000
Baha'is	156,000	0.1	2.97	364,000	674,000
Atheists	57,700	0.0	2.22	143,000	287,000
Neoreligionists	17,800	0.1	3.18	22,000	35,000
Hindus	15,000	0.0	2.28	29,400	63,800
Buddhists	6,400	0.0	1.76	16,000	32,000
Chinese folk-religionists	3,900	0.0	1.03	7,800	15,200
Jews	860	0.0	0.09	2,000	4,000
other religionists	33,100	0.0	1.84	64,100	101,000
Total population	221,673,000	100.0	2.60	382,451,000	526,589,000

Western Africa includes 17 countries: Benin, Burkina Faso, Cape Verde, Gambia, Ghana, Guinea, Guinea-Bissau, Ivory Coast, Liberia, Mali, Mauritania, Niger, Nigeria, Saint Helena, Senegal, Sierra Leone, and Togo

Asia (50 countries)

Followers	2000			2025	2050
	total	%	rate
Muslims	832,879,000	22.6	2.10	1,219,867,000	1,484,321,000
Hindus	805,120,000	23.6	1.69	1,040,589,000	1,164,080,000
Nonreligious	608,594,000	16.5	0.93	702,802,000	696,142,000
Chinese folk-religionists	383,408,000	11.6	1.02	447,120,000	452,347,000
Buddhists	354,651,000	10.0	1.07	408,835,000	410,309,000
Christians	312,849,000	8.5	2.32	464,800,000	584,716,000
Independents	154,732,000	4.2	3.17	247,278,000	318,576,000
Roman Catholics	110,480,000	3.0	2.00	159,576,000	193,928,000
Protestants	49,970,000	1.4	1.84	73,270,000	92,842,000
Ethnoreligionists	128,298,000	3.6	0.87	147,976,000	165,996,000
Atheists	121,945,000	3.3	0.53	135,462,000	144,908,000
Neoreligionists	100,639,000	4.9	1.00	112,430,000	115,948,000
Sikhs	22,421,000	0.8	1.86	30,206,000	35,610,000
Confucianists	6,264,000	0.4	0.73	6,771,000	6,896,000
Jews	4,429,000	0.1	2.99	5,812,000	6,443,000
Jains	4,145,000	0.4	0.85	6,014,000	6,524,000
Baha'is	3,475,000	0.1	2.14	5,483,000	7,839,000
Shintoists	2,699,000	0.8	-1.14	2,043,000	1,554,000
Taoists	2,643,000	0.2	1.00	3,053,000	3,256,000
Zoroastrians	2,463,000	0.1	2.66	4,311,000	6,791,000
Spiritists	1,900	0.0	0.21	3,000	4,000
other religionists	62,100	0.0	2.01	93,000	123,000
Total population	3,682,550,000	100.0	1.48	4,723,140,000	5,268,451,000

Followers	2000			2025	2050
	total	%	rate
Nonreligious	561,296,000	37.8	0.89	628,075,000	590,404,000
Chinese folk-religionists	371,186,000	25.0	0.99	431,068,000	433,738,000
Buddhists	188,583,000	12.7	0.79	200,672,000	182,376,000
Christians	114,659,000	7.7	2.67	166,078,000	202,334,000
Independents	90,902,000	6.1	3.07	132,885,000	164,785,000
Roman Catholics	12,015,000	0.8	1.59	19,901,000	23,871,000
Protestants	10,512,000	0.7	1.12	13,365,000	14,740,000
Atheists	109,955,000	7.4	0.53	120,543,000	127,240,000
Ethnoreligionists	65,330,000	4.4	0.32	72,255,000	66,967,000
Neoreligionists	44,897,000	3.0	0.61	46,195,000	42,981,000
Muslims	19,632,000	1.3	0.54	21,655,000	21,825,000
Confucianists	5,358,000	0.4	0.66	5,210,000	5,080,000
Shintoists	2,697,000	1.6	-1.14	2,040,000	1,550,000
Taoists	2,642,000	0.2	1.00	3,050,000	3,250,000
Baha'is	66,800	0.0	2.65	97,200	138,000
Hindus	39,900	0.0	0.96	60,000	85,000
Jews	2,700	0.0	-2.15	2,800	2,800
Spiritists	1,900	0.0	0.21	3,000	4,000
Sikhs	760	0.0	0.33	900	1,200
Zoroastrians	570	0.0	0.30	700	900
other religionists	11,400	0.0	0.65	15,000	18,000
Total population	1,485,217,000	100.0	0.96	1,695,441,000	1,676,245,000

Eastern Asia includes 6 countries: China, Peoples Republic of; China, Republic of (Taiwan); Japan; Mongolia; North Korea; and South Korea

Followers	2000			2025	2050
	total	%	rate
Hindus	794,023,000	54.4	1.68	1,023,934,000	1,140,292,000
Muslims	511,067,000	34.3	2.22	763,131,000	946,257,000
Christians	73,677,000	4.9	2.27	115,366,000	148,362,000
Independents	37,431,000	2.5	4.08	71,305,000	94,164,000
Protestants	19,037,000	1.3	2.18	27,167,000	33,717,000
Roman Catholics	18,744,000	1.3	1.75	25,325,000	30,348,000
Ethnoreligionists	38,101,000	2.6	1.62	45,104,000	66,513,000
Nonreligious	25,011,000	1.7	1.22	37,674,000	52,606,000
Buddhists	24,644,000	1.8	1.51	33,022,000	38,704,000
Sikhs	22,273,000	1.6	1.86	29,935,000	35,192,000
Atheists	4,907,000	0.3	-0.63	4,752,000	4,831,000
Jains	4,142,000	0.4	0.85	6,008,000	6,515,000
Zoroastrians	2,463,000	0.2	2.66	4,310,000	6,790,000
Baha'is	2,314,000	0.2	1.93	3,528,000	5,038,000
Chinese folk-religionists	153,000	0.0	1.83	285,000	462,000
Jews	120,000	0.0	-0.83	107,000	109,000
Neoreligionists	3,600	0.0	0.95	5,500	8,800
Shintoists	150	0.0	2.32	350	500
other religionists	8,400	0.0	0.96	12,000	16,000
Total population	1,490,778,000	100.0	1.87	2,049,851,000	2,430,004,000

South-central Asia includes 14 countries: Afghanistan, Bangladesh, Bhutan, India, Iran, Kazakhstan, Kirghizstan, Maldives, Nepal, Pakistan, Sri Lanka, Tajikistan, Turkmenistan, and Uzbekistan

Status of religions in South-eastern Asia, 2000–2050

Followers	2000			2025	2050
	total	%	rate
Buddhists	141,234,000	27.2	1.38	174,778,000	188,617,000
Muslims	138,429,000	26.7	1.57	175,585,000	185,120,000
Christians	111,034,000	21.4	2.09	164,443,000	210,839,000
Roman Catholics	76,209,000	14.7	2.11	108,857,000	132,292,000
Independents	25,160,000	4.9	2.29	40,496,000	55,522,000
Protestants	20,190,000	3.9	1.91	32,358,000	43,832,000
Neoreligionists	55,720,000	11.8	1.33	66,193,000	72,895,000
Ethnoreligionists	24,817,000	4.8	1.24	30,568,000	32,428,000
Nonreligious	17,664,000	3.4	2.21	29,981,000	42,327,000
Chinese folk-religionists	12,034,000	2.3	1.88	15,711,000	18,057,000
Hindus	10,252,000	2.0	2.31	14,912,000	20,786,000
Atheists	6,494,000	1.3	2.02	9,565,000	12,045,000
Baha'is	954,000	0.2	2.47	1,595,000	2,219,000
Confucianists	905,000	0.5	1.19	1,561,000	1,816,000
Sikhs	79,400	0.1	1.47	126,000	168,000
Jains	2,900	0.0	0.78	5,000	7,800
Jews	2,300	0.0	1.30	2,900	3,700
Shintoists	1,400	0.0	1.87	2,600	3,900
Taoists	1,300	0.0	1.92	2,800	5,700
Zoroastrians	260	0.0	0.58	500	800
other religionists	10,000	0.0	3.21	17,500	25,000
Total population	518,540,000	100.0	1.63	683,527,000	785,583,000

South-eastern Asia includes 11 countries: Brunei, Cambodia, Indonesia, Laos, Malaysia, Myanmar, Philippines, Singapore, Thailand, Timor, and Vietnam

Status of religions in Western Asia, 2000–2050

Followers	2000			2025	2050
	total	%	rate
Muslims	163,751,000	87.1	2.38	259,497,000	331,118,000
Christians	13,479,000	7.2	1.57	18,914,000	23,180,000
Orthodox	8,596,000	4.6	1.08	10,686,000	11,483,000
Roman Catholics	3,512,000	1.9	2.65	5,494,000	7,416,000
Independents	1,238,000	0.7	3.59	2,592,000	4,105,000
Nonreligious	4,624,000	2.5	0.22	7,073,000	10,804,000
Jews	4,304,000	2.8	3.13	5,699,000	6,327,000
Hindus	805,000	1.7	4.20	1,683,000	2,917,000
Atheists	590,000	0.3	-3.47	602,000	792,000
Buddhists	190,000	0.1	2.94	363,000	613,000
Baha'is	140,000	0.1	3.35	262,000	444,000
Sikhs	67,200	0.1	3.62	144,000	248,000
Ethnoreligionists	50,200	0.1	6.15	48,400	87,200
Chinese folk-religionists	35,200	0.0	2.14	56,000	90,000
Neoreligionists	18,500	0.1	2.76	37,300	63,700
Jains	200	0.0	3.47	500	1,200
Zoroastrians	30	0.0	0.63	40	50
other religionists	32,300	0.1	2.47	48,500	64,000
Total population	188,015,000	100.0	2.26	294,321,000	376,617,000

Western Asia includes 19 countries: Armenia, Azerbaijan, Bahrain, Cyprus, Georgia, Iraq, Israel, Jordan, Kuwait, Lebanon, Northern Cyprus, Oman, Palestine, Qatar, Saudi Arabia, Syria, Turkey, United Arab Emirates, and Yemen

Europe (48 countries)

Status of religions in Europe, 2000–2050

Followers	2000			2025	2050
	total	%	rate
Christians	559,643,000	76.8	0.17	554,586,000	492,726,000
Roman Catholics	285,978,000	39.2	0.16	276,272,000	243,560,000
Orthodox	158,105,000	21.7	0.19	165,804,000	152,709,000
Protestants	77,529,000	10.6	0.15	77,089,000	70,232,000
Nonreligious	106,841,000	14.7	-0.22	86,237,000	72,424,000
Muslims	31,566,000	4.3	0.78	36,005,000	37,584,000
Atheists	22,922,000	3.2	-1.21	16,768,000	15,065,000
Jews	2,527,000	0.4	-0.49	2,107,000	1,920,000
Buddhists	1,547,000	0.3	1.39	2,236,000	2,872,000
Hindus	1,416,000	0.3	1.31	1,707,000	2,094,000
Ethnoreligionists	1,263,000	0.2	0.40	1,151,000	1,034,000
Chinese folk-religionists	255,000	0.1	1.11	351,000	434,000
Sikhs	239,000	0.2	0.46	281,000	360,000
Neoreligionists	158,000	0.1	1.11	223,000	286,000
Spiritists	133,000	0.1	1.88	167,000	199,000
Baha'is	130,000	0.0	1.98	204,000	336,000
Confucianists	10,700	0.0	0.72	14,600	19,700
Zoroastrians	660	0.0	0.75	980	1,400
other religionists	236,000	0.1	0.59	295,000	348,000
Total population	728,887,000	100.0	0.09	702,335,000	627,691,000

Followers	2000			2025	2050
	total	%	rate
Christians	220,275,000	71.8	0.17	229,854,000	212,114,000
Orthodox	136,374,000	44.4	0.17	143,620,000	131,650,000
Roman Catholics	61,698,000	20.1	0.23	62,930,000	58,336,000
Independents	18,738,000	6.1	1.02	20,613,000	20,402,000
Nonreligious	56,748,000	18.5	-0.75	33,842,000	18,725,000
Muslims	13,588,000	4.4	-0.06	13,925,000	13,405,000
Atheists	12,491,000	4.1	-2.13	6,085,000	3,665,000
Jews	1,356,000	0.4	-1.12	916,000	749,000
Ethnoreligionists	1,138,000	0.5	0.25	1,011,000	864,000
Hindus	766,000	0.5	1.20	900,000	1,100,000
Buddhists	589,000	0.2	0.59	908,000	1,163,000
Baha'is	21,800	0.0	1.23	40,600	80,000
Spiritists	7,300	0.0	0.69	9,000	10,000
Chinese folk-religionists	930	0.0	0.91	2,000	4,000
other religionists	10,700	0.0	0.74	13,000	16,000
Total population	306,990,000	100.0	-0.12	287,506,000	251,894,000

Eastern Europe includes 10 countries: Belorussia, Bulgaria, Czech Republic, Hungary, Poland, Moldavia, Romania, Russia, Slovakia, and Ukraine

Followers	2000			2025	2050
	total	%	rate
Christians	78,312,000	83.0	0.16	78,098,000	70,544,000
Protestants	28,132,000	29.8	0.15	27,896,000	25,746,000
Anglicans	26,523,000	30.6	0.13	26,289,000	24,522,000
Roman Catholics	12,673,000	13.4	0.17	13,166,000	12,937,000
Nonreligious	10,622,000	11.3	0.27	11,598,000	12,870,000
Atheists	2,372,000	2.5	0.06	2,486,000	2,935,000
Muslims	1,551,000	1.7	1.65	1,890,000	2,208,000
Hindus	433,000	0.6	1.36	506,000	608,000
Jews	351,000	0.4	-0.46	320,000	294,000
Buddhists	236,000	0.3	3.24	358,000	432,000
Sikhs	235,000	0.4	0.45	275,000	350,000
Spiritists	70,600	0.1	2.24	87,600	104,000
Baha'is	44,500	0.1	1.70	58,700	89,900
Chinese folk-religionists	42,200	0.1	1.25	48,400	56,700
Neoreligionists	38,000	0.1	1.93	69,300	86,000
Ethnoreligionists	9,000	0.0	1.68	10,700	13,300
other religionists	64,800	0.1	0.45	70,100	80,400
Total population	94,383,000	100.0	0.20	95,876,000	90,660,000

Northern Europe includes 14 countries: Channel Islands, Denmark, Estonia, Faeroe Islands, Finland, Iceland, Ireland, Isle of Man, Latvia, Lithuania, Norway, Svalbard and Jan Mayen Islands, Sweden, and United Kingdom

Followers	2000			2025	2050
	total	%	rate
Christians	120,917,000	83.9	0.04	110,777,000	91,959,000
Roman Catholics	110,713,000	76.8	0.05	100,575,000	82,044,000
Orthodox	18,703,000	13.0	0.28	18,729,000	17,404,000
Independents	1,494,000	1.0	0.95	1,812,000	2,132,000
Nonreligious	12,389,000	8.6	0.09	12,159,000	10,820,000
Muslims	7,249,000	5.0	1.32	8,695,000	8,361,000
Atheists	3,350,000	2.3	-0.71	3,041,000	2,934,000
Buddhists	77,400	0.1	0.92	98,500	123,000
Chinese folk-religionists	64,300	0.1	0.86	96,000	116,000
Jews	59,600	0.0	-1.84	57,400	56,800
Baha'is	29,800	0.0	4.00	55,100	82,800
Neoreligionists	12,000	0.0	0.46	16,000	20,000
Ethnoreligionists	5,300	0.0	0.75	9,200	13,800
Spiritists	4,400	0.0	1.21	6,500	8,500
Hindus	3,100	0.0	2.48	6,400	10,100
other religionists	13,400	0.0	0.54	18,500	22,000
Total population	144,174,000	100.0	0.08	135,035,000	114,526,000

Southern Europe includes 15 countries: Albania, Andorra, Bosnia-Herzegovina, Croatia, Gibraltar, Greece, Holy See, Italy, Macedonia, Malta, Portugal, San Marino, Slovenia, Spain, and Yugoslavia

Followers	2000			2025	2050
	total	%	rate
Christians	140,139,000	76.4	0.28	135,858,000	118,110,000
Roman Catholics	100,894,000	55.0	0.24	99,601,000	90,242,000
Protestants	39,158,000	21.4	0.08	37,863,000	32,790,000
Independents	2,818,000	1.5	0.99	3,151,000	3,259,000
Nonreligious	27,083,000	14.8	0.65	28,638,000	30,009,000
Muslims	9,180,000	5.0	1.55	11,495,000	13,610,000
Atheists	4,708,000	2.6	0.61	5,156,000	5,530,000
Jews	761,000	0.4	0.85	814,000	820,000
Buddhists	644,000	0.4	1.60	871,000	1,155,000
Hindus	213,000	0.1	1.58	295,000	376,000
Chinese folk-religionists	148,000	0.1	1.18	204,000	258,000
Ethnoreligionists	111,000	0.1	1.94	120,000	143,000
Neoreligionists	108,000	0.1	0.91	138,000	180,000
Spiritists	50,400	0.1	1.63	64,000	77,400
Baha'is	33,600	0.0	1.27	50,100	83,400
Confucianists	10,700	0.0	0.72	14,600	19,700
Sikhs	3,700	0.0	1.46	6,300	10,000
Zoroastrians	660	0.0	0.75	980	1,400
other religionists	147,000	0.1	0.65	193,000	230,000
Total population	183,340,000	100.0	0.41	183,918,000	170,611,000

Western Europe includes 9 countries: Austria, Belgium, France, Germany, Liechtenstein, Luxembourg, Monaco, Netherlands, and Switzerland

Latin America and the Caribbean (46 countries)

Followers	2000			2025	2050
	total	%	rate
Christians	481,102,000	92.7	1.63	641,116,000	734,437,000
Roman Catholics	461,220,000	88.8	1.65	606,059,000	688,833,000
Protestants	48,132,000	9.3	1.91	76,191,000	96,439,000
Independents	39,706,000	7.7	1.90	60,022,000	75,171,000
Nonreligious	15,928,000	3.1	2.32	25,800,000	36,460,000
Spiritists	12,039,000	3.4	1.97	15,836,000	20,264,000
Atheists	2,757,000	0.5	1.57	3,672,000	4,545,000
Muslims	1,672,000	0.3	1.99	2,638,000	3,381,000
Ethnoreligionists	1,288,000	0.3	1.64	1,305,000	1,321,000
Jews	1,142,000	0.2	0.74	1,227,000	1,278,000
Baha'is	873,000	0.2	2.87	1,577,000	2,429,000
Hindus	768,000	0.2	0.89	969,000	1,105,000
Buddhists	647,000	0.1	1.70	1,082,000	1,651,000
Neoreligionists	622,000	0.2	1.83	983,000	1,387,000
Chinese folk-religionists	194,000	0.0	1.84	282,000	382,000
Shintoists	6,800	0.0	1.27	10,000	16,000
Confucianists	440	0.0	1.05	600	800
other religionists	98,000	0.0	1.89	150,000	218,000
Total population	519,138,000	100.0	1.66	696,648,000	808,895,000

Followers	2000			2025	2050
	total	%	rate
Christians	30,049,000	78.8	1.24	38,193,000	42,367,000
Roman Catholics	23,191,000	60.8	1.23	29,114,000	31,552,000
Protestants	3,863,000	10.1	1.66	5,468,000	7,021,000
Independents	1,309,000	3.4	1.76	2,157,000	2,979,000
Nonreligious	3,862,000	10.1	0.99	4,160,000	4,347,000
Spiritists	2,735,000	7.2	0.77	3,147,000	3,381,000
Atheists	871,000	2.4	0.72	944,000	908,000
Hindus	364,000	1.7	0.83	458,000	504,000
Muslims	114,000	0.3	0.90	161,000	194,000
Baha'is	64,800	0.2	2.02	115,000	189,000
Chinese folk-religionists	41,700	0.1	0.91	58,000	72,100
Buddhists	14,000	0.1	0.46	17,900	21,000
Jews	8,300	0.0	0.58	9,000	10,500
Neoreligionists	1,400	0.0	2.54	1,800	2,700
Ethnoreligionists	30	0.0	1.14	50	80
other religionists	13,100	0.0	1.97	20,200	29,400
Total population	38,139,000	100.0	1.17	47,287,000	52,026,000

Caribbean includes 24 countries: Anguilla, Antigua and Barbuda, Aruba, Bahamas, Barbados, British Virgin Islands, Cayman Islands, Cuba, Dominica, Dominican Republic, Grenada, Guadeloupe, Haiti, Jamaica, Martinique, Montserrat, Netherlands Antilles, Puerto Rico, Saint Kitts and Nevis, Saint Lucia, Saint Vincent and Grenadines, Trinidad and Tobago, Turks and Caicos Islands, and Virgin Islands of the United States

South America (right) includes 14 countries: Argentina, Bolivia, Brazil, Chile, Colombia, Ecuador, Falkland Islands, French Guiana, Guyana, Paraguay, Peru, Suriname, Uruguay, and Venezuela

Followers	2000			2025	2050
	total	%	rate
Christians	130,214,000	96.3	1.93	179,745,000	209,650,000
Roman Catholics	124,010,000	91.7	1.93	169,850,000	195,700,000
Protestants	6,984,000	5.2	2.68	12,750,000	18,175,000
Independents	5,161,000	3.8	2.57	9,654,000	13,695,000
Nonreligious	3,570,000	2.6	2.55	6,411,000	9,492,000
Muslims	397,000	0.3	2.02	693,000	992,000
Atheists	205,000	0.2	3.05	396,000	608,000
Spiritists	184,000	0.6	2.95	325,000	463,000
Baha'is	178,000	0.1	2.83	326,000	508,000
Ethnoreligionists	152,000	0.1	2.84	166,000	180,000
Jews	135,000	0.1	1.52	145,000	168,000
Chinese folk-religionists	67,700	0.1	2.48	92,700	132,000
Buddhists	60,000	0.0	2.11	96,600	148,000
Neoreligionists	25,100	0.0	1.79	50,000	70,000
Hindus	20,800	0.0	1.76	34,500	55,500
other religionists	12,600	0.0	2.21	24,500	37,500
Total population	135,222,000	100.0	1.95	188,504,000	222,502,000

Central America includes 8 countries: Belize, Costa Rica, El Salvador, Guatemala, Honduras, Mexico, Nicaragua, and Panama

Followers	2000			2025	2050
	total	%	rate
Christians	320,840,000	92.8	1.54	423,178,000	482,419,000
Roman Catholics	314,019,000	90.8	1.56	407,095,000	461,581,000
Protestants	37,285,000	10.8	1.80	57,973,000	71,243,000
Independents	33,236,000	9.6	1.80	48,211,000	58,497,000
Spiritists	9,120,000	3.2	2.35	12,364,000	16,421,000
Nonreligious	8,496,000	2.5	2.90	15,229,000	22,622,000
Atheists	1,680,000	0.5	1.87	2,332,000	3,029,000
Muslims	1,161,000	0.3	2.09	1,785,000	2,196,000
Ethnoreligionists	1,136,000	0.3	1.50	1,138,000	1,141,000
Jews	999,000	0.3	0.64	1,074,000	1,100,000
Baha'is	630,000	0.2	2.97	1,136,000	1,732,000
Neoreligionists	595,000	0.2	1.83	931,000	1,315,000
Buddhists	573,000	0.2	1.69	967,000	1,483,000
Hindus	383,000	0.2	0.90	476,000	545,000
Chinese folk-religionists	84,500	0.0	1.82	131,000	178,000
Shintoists	6,800	0.0	1.27	10,000	16,000
Confucianists	440	0.0	1.05	600	800
other religionists	72,300	0.0	1.83	105,000	151,000
Total population	345,777,000	100.0	1.60	460,856,000	534,367,000

Northern America (5 countries)

Followers	2000			2025	2050
	total	%	rate
Christians	260,624,000	84.2	0.81	290,345,000	300,681,000
Independents	80,237,000	25.9	1.62	102,710,000	116,411,000
Roman Catholics	71,035,000	22.9	0.40	80,520,000	82,822,000
Protestants	69,978,000	22.6	0.72	74,765,000	75,868,000
Nonreligious	28,473,000	9.2	1.66	44,856,000	56,368,000
Jews	6,024,000	2.0	0.23	6,560,000	6,660,000
Muslims	4,450,000	1.4	1.56	6,520,000	7,900,000
Buddhists	2,701,000	0.9	2.75	5,420,000	8,600,000
Atheists	1,680,000	0.5	3.51	2,250,000	2,598,000
Hindus	1,327,000	0.4	3.13	2,050,000	2,500,000
Chinese folk-religionists	854,000	0.3	1.23	945,000	950,000
Neoreligionists	842,000	0.3	3.62	961,000	1,048,000
Baha'is	786,000	0.3	2.25	1,201,000	1,527,000
Sikhs	528,000	0.2	2.81	760,000	900,000
Ethnoreligionists	444,000	0.1	4.37	506,000	505,000
Spiritists	151,000	0.1	1.43	192,000	224,000
Zoroastrians	77,600	0.0	2.37	124,000	166,000
Shintoists	56,200	0.0	1.18	70,000	85,000
Taoists	11,100	0.0	1.08	13,500	16,500
Jains	7,000	0.0	3.36	7,000	8,500
other religionists	597,000	0.2	0.89	830,000	1,045,000
Total population	309,631,000	100.0	0.94	363,612,000	391,781,000

North America includes 5 countries: Bermuda, Canada, Greenland, Saint Pierre and Miquelon, and United States of America

Oceania (28 countries)

Followers	2000			2025	2050
	total	%	rate
Christians	25,110,000	82.6	1.33	32,010,000	35,788,000
Roman Catholics	8,228,000	27.1	1.64	11,240,000	13,568,000
Protestants	7,392,000	24.3	1.57	10,015,000	11,882,000
Anglicans	5,409,000	18.2	0.53	5,996,000	6,523,000
Nonreligious	3,298,000	10.9	1.50	4,849,000	6,865,000
Atheists	365,000	1.5	1.29	503,000	560,000
Hindus	355,000	1.5	1.43	490,000	555,000
Muslims	301,000	1.1	3.04	497,000	816,000
Buddhists	301,000	1.0	5.19	478,000	611,000
Ethnoreligionists	268,000	0.9	1.90	259,000	235,000
Baha'is	110,000	0.4	2.87	200,000	310,000
Jews	97,000	0.3	0.96	113,000	119,000
Neoreligionists	66,500	0.2	9.02	79,800	108,000
Chinese folk-religionists	63,500	0.2	1.39	87,200	108,000
Confucianists	23,700	0.1	1.06	31,200	35,100
Sikhs	18,200	0.1	3.55	29,200	44,300
Spiritists	7,000	0.0	0.59	9,000	11,000
Zoroastrians	1,400	0.0	3.18	2,000	3,000
other religionists	9,400	0.0	0.59	11,100	13,900
Total population	30,393,000	100.0	1.41	39,647,000	46,180,000

Status of religions in Australia-New Zealand, 2000-2050

Followers	2000			2025	2050
	total	%	rate
Christians	18,199,000	80.0	1.01	21,167,000	21,846,000
Roman Catholics	5,896,000	25.9	1.35	7,351,000	8,401,000
Anglicans	4,886,000	21.5	0.29	5,051,000	5,151,000
Protestants	3,562,000	15.7	0.70	4,051,000	4,251,000
Nonreligious	3,239,000	14.2	1.47	4,726,000	6,660,000
Atheists	363,000	1.6	1.28	500,000	556,000
Buddhists	280,000	1.2	5.30	436,000	546,000
Muslims	238,000	1.0	3.61	411,000	714,000
Jews	96,300	0.4	0.96	112,000	118,000
Hindus	82,500	0.4	2.60	124,000	160,000
Ethnoreligionists	65,900	0.3	2.40	73,000	75,000
Neoreligionists	59,500	0.3	9.96	66,000	87,600
Baha'is	37,400	0.2	2.94	66,000	108,000
Chinese folk-religionists	34,300	0.2	0.76	41,200	46,500
Confucianists	23,200	0.1	1.01	30,000	33,000
Sikhs	12,800	0.1	4.44	20,700	33,500
Spiritists	7,000	0.0	0.59	9,000	11,000
Zoroastrians	1,400	0.0	3.18	2,000	3,000
other religionists	8,700	0.0	0.33	9,800	12,000
Total population	22,748,000	100.0	1.17	27,793,000	31,009,000

Australia/New Zealand includes 5 countries: Australia, Christmas Island, Cocos Islands, New Zealand, and Norfolk Island

Status of religions in Melanesia, 2000-2050

Followers	2000			2025	2050
	total	%	rate
Christians	5,820,000	89.9	2.28	9,133,000	11,723,000
Protestants	3,299,000	51.0	2.57	5,156,000	6,613,000
Roman Catholics	1,807,000	27.9	2.38	3,022,000	4,018,000
Anglicans	520,000	8.3	3.08	942,000	1,367,000
Hindus	272,000	33.3	1.10	366,000	395,000
Ethnoreligionists	195,000	3.0	1.77	176,000	150,000
Muslims	63,600	1.1	1.17	86,000	102,000
Baha'is	48,900	0.8	2.67	89,900	133,000
Nonreligious	40,100	0.6	2.87	82,500	141,000
Buddhists	12,700	0.2	3.11	21,300	30,200
Chinese folk-religionists	6,400	0.1	1.72	9,400	13,000
Sikhs	5,300	0.7	1.68	8,500	10,800
Neoreligionists	4,900	0.1	2.87	8,100	11,200
Atheists	1,800	0.2	3.32	3,000	4,200
Jews	670	0.0	1.86	930	1,200
other religionists	480	0.2	4.86	800	1,200
Total population	6,472,000	100.0	2.20	9,985,000	12,714,000

Melanesia includes 6 countries: Bougainville, Fiji, New Caledonia, Papua New Guinea, Solomon Islands, and Vanuatu

Status of religions in Micronesia, 2000-2050

Followers	2000			2025	2050
	total	%	rate
Christians	506,000	93.1	2.61	879,000	1,198,000
Roman Catholics	344,000	63.4	2.99	614,000	845,000
Protestants	187,000	34.4	2.48	308,000	411,000
Independents	25,100	4.6	4.11	59,600	94,500
Baha'is	10,700	2.0	3.15	21,300	35,000
Buddhists	7,100	1.5	5.38	18,900	32,400
Nonreligious	6,400	1.2	5.58	14,400	24,400
Ethnoreligionists	6,100	1.3	1.18	8,800	10,100
Chinese folk-religionists	4,300	1.1	2.94	10,400	17,000
Neoreligionists	2,100	0.6	4.75	5,600	8,800
Confucianists	490	0.2	3.70	1,200	2,100
Total population	543,000	100.0	2.67	960,000	1,328,000

Micronesia includes 7 countries: Guam, Kiribati, Marshall Islands, Micronesia, Nauru, Northern Mariana Islands, and Palau

Status of religions in Polynesia, 2000-2050

Followers	2000			2025	2050
	total	%	rate
Christians	585,000	92.7	1.40	831,000	1,021,000
Protestants	344,000	54.6	1.47	500,000	608,000
Roman Catholics	181,000	28.7	1.66	253,000	305,000
Marginal Christians	66,800	10.6	1.27	89,100	112,000
Chinese folk-religionists	18,500	3.8	2.19	26,200	31,500
Baha'is	13,400	2.1	3.16	22,600	33,400
Nonreligious	12,700	2.0	3.91	25,200	39,700
Buddhists	930	0.2	4.35	1,600	2,500
Ethnoreligionists	420	0.1	0.24	460	520
Hindus	100	0.1	12.68	50	100
Atheists	70	0.6	3.27	80	120
other religionists	270	0.1	3.05	500	700
Total population	631,000	100.0	1.51	909,000	1,129,000

Polynesia includes 10 countries: American Samoa, Cook Islands, French Polynesia, Niue, Pitcairn Islands, Samoa, Tokelau, Tonga, Tuvalu, and Wallis and Futuna Islands

ABOUT THE EDITORS AND CONTRIBUTORS

Editors

J. Gordon Melton. J. Gordon Melton is the Director of the Institute for the Study of American Religion founded in 1969 in Santa Barbara, California, and a research specialist with the Department of Religious Studies of the University of California at Santa Barbara. He is the author of more than thirty books on American religion, including the Encyclopedia of American Religions (6th ed., Gale Research, 2000), the New Age Encyclopedia (with James R. Lewis and Aidan Kelley, Gale Research, 1990), and American Religions: An Illustrated History (ABC-CLIO, 2001).

Martin Baumann. Martin Baumann is Professor for the History of Religions at the University of Lucerne in Switzerland and Research Fellow at the University of Hannover in Germany. His teaching and current research include diaspora studies, Buddhism in the West, and Hindu traditions in Europe and the Caribbean. He has published on these topics in both German and English, and his most recent book is Migration, Religion, Integration (Diagonal, 2000).

Association of German Mennonite Congregations
Atheism
Buddhism
European Buddhist Union
German Buddhist Union
Germany
Germany, Hinduism in Germany, Islam in
Hinduism
Maha Bodhi Society
Theravada Buddhism
Trinidad and Tobago
Vipassana International Academy
Western Buddhist Order, Friends of the Area Editors

Allan H. Anderson. Dr. Allan H. Anderson directs the Research Unit for Pentecostal Studies and the Research Unit for New Religions and Churches for the Graduate Institute for Theology and Religions at the Selly Oak campus of the University of Birmingham. His most recent books are Zion and Pentecost: The Spirituality and Experience of Pentecostal and Zionist/Apostolic Churches in South Africa (University of South Africa Press, 2000) and African Reformation: African Initiated Christianity in the 20th Century (Africa World Press, 2001).

African Apostolic Church of Johane Marange
 African Brotherhood Church
 African Christian Church and Schools
 African Church of the Holy Spirit
 African Independent Pentecostal Church of Africa
 African Initiated Churches
 African Israel Church, Ninevah
 Aladura Churches
 Apostolic Sabbath Church of God
 Brotherhood of the Cross and Star
 Bwiti
 Cherubim and Seraphim/Eternal Sacred Order of the Cherubim and Seraphim
 Christ Apostolic Church
 Church of Pentecost
 Church of the Lord (Aladura)
 Deeper Life Bible Church (Nigeria)
 Deima Church [Église Déimatiste]
 Harrist Church [Église Harriste] (Ivory Coast)
 Kimbanguist Church (Congo)/Église de Jésus Christ sur la terre par le prophète Simon Kimbangu
 Legion of Mary [Maria Legio] (Kenya)
 Mai Chaza Church/City of Jehovah
 Musama Disco Christo Church/Army of the Cross of the Christ Church
 Native Baptist Church [Église Baptiste Camerounaise]
 (Cameroon)
 Nazareth (Nazarite) Baptist Church/AmaNazaretha (South Africa)
 Nguzist Churches (Congo)
 Nomiya Luo Church (Kenya)
 Organization of African Instituted Churches
 Spiritual Churches (Ghana)
 Spiritual Churches (Kenya)
 Tocoist Church/Church of Our Lord Jesus Christ in the World
 Traditional African Religions
 Zimbabwe Assemblies of God Africa

Zion Christian Church (South Africa, Zimbabwe)
 Zionist and Apostolic Churches (South Africa, Zimbabwe)

David B. Barrett. David B. Barrett is President of the Global Evangelization Movement in Richmond, Virginia; Research Professor of Missiometrics at Regent University in Virginia Beach, Virginia; and Honorary Research Advisor to the United Bible Societies. He was the editor of the first edition of the World Christian Encyclopedia (Oxford University Press, 1982) and coauthor with George T. Kurian and Todd M. Johnson of the second edition (Oxford University Press, 2001). He is the coauthor with Todd M. Johnson of World Christian Trends A.D. 30–A.D. 2200: Interpreting the Annual Christian Megacensus (William Carey Library, 2001).

Statistical tables

James A. Beverley. James A. Beverley is Professor of Theology and Ethics at Tyndale Seminary in Toronto, Canada. He is a specialist on new religious movements and the relationship of Christianity to other world religions. He is author of five books including Understanding Islam (Thomas Nelson, 2001), Holy Laughter & The Toronto Blessing (Zondervan, 1995), Nelson's Illustrated Guide to Religions (Thomas Nelson, forthcoming), and is senior editor of The Encyclopedia of Religions in Canada (HarperCollins Canada, forthcoming).

Canada
 Islam
 Toronto Airport Christian Fellowship

Gail M. Harley. Gail M. Harley is a lecturer with the Department of Religious Studies of the University of South Florida in Tampa. She is the author of Emma Curtis Hopkins: Forgotten Founder of New Thought (Syracuse University Press, 2002); has authored a number of articles on American religion, New Thought, and the Middle East; and is currently senior editor of a multi-volume Encyclopedia of Women and Religion in America (M. E. Sharpe, 2003).

Church of Christ, Scientist
 Iraq
 Jordan
 Lebanon
 Syria

Turkey
World Brotherhood Union Mevlana Supreme Foundation

Clifton L. Holland. Clifton L. Holland is Director of the Latin American Socio-Religious Studies Program (known as PROLADES in Spanish), which was founded in 1977, and currently has headquarters in San José, Costa Rica. In 1982 he founded and served as the first Director of the Missiological Institute of the Americas, which in 1995 became the Evangelical University of the Americas (UNELA). He currently teaches social sciences and religious studies in Costa Rica and in UNELA extension programs in other countries. He has done fieldwork on religious groups in 20 countries throughout the Americas, as well as on Hispanics in the U.S.A. Since 1995 he has edited the monthly news journal MESOAMERICA, published by the Institute for Central American Studies (ICAS).

- Apostolic Assembly of Faith in Jesus Christ [Asamblea Apostólica de la Fe en Cristo Jesús]
- Apostolic Church of Faith in Jesus Christ [Iglesia Apostólica de la Fe en Cristo Jesús] (Mexico)
- Argentina
- Belize
- Costa Rica
- El Salvador
- Garífuna Religion
- Guatemala
- Honduras
- Light of the World Church [Iglesia la Luz del Mundo]
- Mexico
- New Acropolis Cultural Association [Asociación Cultural Nueva Acrópolis]
- Nicaragua
- Panama

Massimo Introvigne. Massimo Introvigne received his B.A. in philosophy at the Pontifical Gregorian University and his doctorate in law at Turin University. He is a member of the Italian Association of Sociology and has taught short courses and seminars at several Catholic universities. In 1988 he established CESNUR (Center for Studies on New Religions), Europe's largest research center on new religious movements (see <http://www.cesnur.org>), and currently serves as its managing director. He is the author, coauthor, or editor of 35 books and of more than 100 chapters and articles published in academic journals in five different languages.

- Army of Mary [Armée de Marie]
- Church of Satan

- Church of the Kingdom of God
- Damanhur
- Evangelical Baptist Union of Italy (UCEBI)
- Evangelical Methodist Church of Italy
- Fraternity/Society of Saint Pius X
- Gnostic Churches (Doinel)
- Gnostic Movement (Samael Aun Weor)
- The Grail Movement
- Healing Tao
- Iglesia ni Christo [Church of Christ]
- Italian Assemblies of God [Assemblee di Dio in Italia]
- Italy
- Lectorium Rosicrucianum
- Martinism
- Mazdaznan
- New Apostolic Church
- O.T.O. (Ordo Templi Orientis)
- People of God (Paraguay)
- Priory of Sion
- Seventh Day Adventist Reform Movement
- Shri Ram Chandra Mission
- Spiritual Human Yoga/Mankind Enlightenment Love
- Universal Church of the Kingdom of God [Igreja Universal do Reino de Deus]
- Universal Life [Universelles Leben]
- Universal Soul
- Waldensian Church

Todd M. Johnson. Todd M. Johnson, a YWAM missionary, is Director of the World Evangelization Research Center in Richmond, Virginia, and Adjunct Professor at Trinity Evangelical Divinity School in Deerfield, Illinois, for the Perspectives on the World Christian Movement Course. He is coauthor, with David B. Barrett and George T. Kurian, of the second edition of World Christian Encyclopedia (Oxford University Press, 2001), and, with David B. Barrett, coauthor of World Christian Trends A.D. 30–A.D. 2000: Interpreting the Annual Christian Megacensus (William Carey Library, 2001).

Statistical tables

Timothy Miller. Timothy Miller is a professor of religious studies at the University of Kansas. He is the author of The Quest for Utopia in Twentieth-Century America (Syracuse University Press, 1998), The 60s Communes (Syracuse University Press, 2000), and editor of America's Alternative Religions (SUNY Press, 1995), among other works. He is currently President of the International Communal Studies Association and a past chair of the New Religious Movements Group of the American Academy of Religion.

The Bruderhof
Hutterites

Catherine Wessinger. Catherine Wessinger is Professor of History of Religions and Women's Studies at Loyola University in New Orleans. She is co-general editor of Nova Religio: The Journal of Alternative and Emergent Religions. Her books include Annie Besant and Progressive Messianism (Edwin Mellen, 1988) and How the Millennium Comes Violently: From Jonestown to Heaven's Gate (Seven Bridges Press, 2000). She edited Women's Leadership in Marginal Religions: Explorations Outside the Mainstream (University of Illinois Press, 1993) and Millennialism, Persecution, and Violence: Historical Cases (Syracuse University Press, 2000).

Self-Realization Fellowship
Vedanta Societies/Ramakrishna Math and Mission

Contributors

Irawin Abidin. Irawin Abidin is the former Ambassador of the Republic of Indonesia to the Holy See.

Indonesia

Andreas Ackermann. Andreas Ackermann holds a Ph.D. in sociology from the University of Bielefeld, Germany. He is presently a research fellow at the Institute for Advanced Study in the Humanities (Kulturwissenschaftliches Institut), Essen, studying Yezidi people and tradition in Germany. His publications include Ethnic Identity by Design or by Default: A Comparative Study of Multiculturalism in Singapore and Frankfurt am Main (IKO-Verlag, 1997) and a number of articles on migration and Yezidi tradition.

Yezidis

Afe Adogame. Afe Adogame holds a Ph.D. in history of religions from the University of Bayreuth in Germany. He is presently a lecturer and research fellow at the Department for the Study of Religions at the University of Bayreuth. His teaching and research focus includes new African religious movements and African religious diaspora in Europe.

Celestial Church of Christ
Nigeria

Phyllis D. Airhart. Phyllis D. Airhart is Associate Professor of the History of Christianity and Director of Advanced Degree Studies at the Emmanuel College of the University of Toronto. Her publications include Serving the Present Age: Revivalism, Progressivism, and the Methodist Tradition in Canada (McGill-Queen's University Press, 1992M), Doing Ethics in a Pluralistic World (coeditor with Marilyn Legge and Gary Redcliffe, Wilfrid Laurier University Press, 2001), and a number of articles on religion in Canada.

United Church of Canada

Mikael Aktor. Mikael Aktor is Assistant Professor at the Department of the Study of Religions at the University of Southern Denmark. His Ph.D., which he earned from the University of Copenhagen and the School of Oriental and African Studies at the University of London, is an investigation of rules of untouchability in classical Indian law literature (dharmasastra). He has published various articles on this and related subjects in Danish and British journals and books.

Ambedkar Buddhism

Milda Alisauskiene. Milda Alisauskiene received her B.A. in social studies at Vilnius Pedagogical University in 1999, and is currently studying for an M.A. in religious studies at Vilnius University, researching new religiosity in the city of Visaginas (Lithuania). She is a cofounder of Lithuania's New Religions Research and Information Centre.

Lithuania

Nancy T. Ammerman. Nancy T. Ammerman is Professor of Sociology of Religion at Hartford Seminary's Hartford Institute for Religion Research. She is the author of Baptist Battles: Social Change and Religious Conflict in the Southern Baptist Convention (Rutgers, 1990) and Congregation and Community (Rutgers, 1997).

Cooperative Baptist Fellowship

Galen Amstutz. Galen Amstutz holds a Ph.D. in East Asian religions from Princeton University and currently serves as coordinator of the Reischauer Institute of Japanese Studies at Harvard University. Author of Interpreting Amida: History and Orientalism in the Study of Pure Land Buddhism (SUNY Press, 1997), he continues to focus his research on Shin Buddhism in Japan.

Pure Land Buddhism (China)

Angela An. Angela An is an undergraduate student at the University of Virginia with a double major in anthropology and sociology. Following graduation in 2003, she plans to work as a Peace Corps volunteer and then pursue graduate education.

Ananda Marga Yoga Society

W. Michael Ashcraft. W. Michael Ashcraft is Associate Professor of Religion at Truman State University in Kirksville, Missouri. He received his Ph.D. in religious studies from the University of Virginia and specializes in the study of American religions. His forthcoming book is a study of a theosophical community in Point Loma, California in the early twentieth century.

Church Universal and Triumphant
Theosophical Society (America)

Will Bagley. Will Bagley is an independent historian, Salt Lake Tribune independent columnist, and writer on the American west. He is editor of the Arthur H. Clark Company's series Forgotten Kingdom: The Mormons and the American Frontier.

Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints

Eileen Barker. Eileen Barker is the Distinguished Professor of Sociology with special reference to the study of religion at the London School of Economics. She is the author of books such as The Making of a Moonie: Brainwashing or Choice? (Blackwell, 1984) and New Religious Movements: A Practical Introduction (HMSO, 1989). She is the founder and chairperson of INFORM (Information Network Focus on Religious Movements), a research center on new religious movements.

Armenia
Brahma Kumaris
Subud
United Kingdom

David V. Barrett. David V. Barrett, a former teacher of religious studies and English, and intelligence analyst for the British and American governments, has since 1991 been a full-time freelance writer concentrating on religious and esoteric subjects. In 1997 he entered the Ph.D. program for sociology at the London School of Economics with a concentration on new religious movements. He is the author of Sects, "Cults" & Alternative Religions (Blandford, 1996), Secret Societies (Blandford, 1997), and The New Believers (Cassell, 2001).

Catholic Apostolic Church
Church of God, International (plus Churches of God Outreach Ministries, Intercontinental Church of God)
The Emissaries
Living Church of God
Philadelphia Church of God
Plymouth Brethren (Exclusive)
United Church of God, an International Association (plus Church of God, an International Community)
Worldwide Church of God

Steven Barrie-Anthony. Steven Barrie-Anthony has authored or coauthored a number of professional publications on religion and also several articles in the Los Angeles Times and the Los Angeles Times Sunday Magazine. He is a student at Occidental College in Los Angeles.

India, Hinduism in India, Religion in Contemporary

Behar Bejko. Behar Bejko is the former Chief of the Committee on the Cults of the State of Albania. He has worked with Muslim and Christian humanitarian organizations in Albania, he organized an international seminar that focused on international laws on religious issues, and is expected to be the Albanian Ambassador to Egypt.

Albania

Sandra Bell. Sandra Bell is a lecturer in anthropology at the University of Durham. She wrote her doctoral thesis on the development and adaptation on Buddhism in Britain and has published a number of articles on Buddhism in the West. She is coeditor, with Elisa Sobo, of Celibacy, Society and Culture: The Anthropology of Sexual Abstinence (Wisconsin University Press, 2001).

British Forest Sangha
Shambhala International
Thai Forest Monks

David K. Bernard. David K. Bernard is the founder and pastor of the New Life United Pentecostal Church of Austin, Texas, and the president of the Urshan Graduate School of Theology. He holds a doctorate of jurisprudence with honors from the University of Texas and is currently enrolled in the masters of theology program at the University of South Africa. He is the author of twenty-four books, including The Trinitarian Controversy in the Fourth Century (Word Aflame Press, 1993).

United Pentecostal Church International

Roger Bischoff. Roger Bischoff heads the International Meditation Centre in the United Kingdom. He has translated a variety of texts of Burmese Buddhism into English and is the author of Buddhism in Myanmar: A Short History (Buddhist Publication Society, 1995). In 1998, with William Pruitt, he produced the catalogue of Burmese and Pali manuscripts for the Wellcome Library in London, England.

International Meditation Centres [Sayagyi U Ba Khin]

Sergei Blagov. Dr. Sergei Blagov is a part-time lecturer on Vietnamese history and religions at the Institute of Asian and African Studies at the Moscow State University. He has spent a total of seven years in Vietnam as a researcher and a journalist.

Hoa Hao Buddhism

Richard Boeke. Dr. Richard Boeke is the Secretary of the International Council of Unitarian Universalists and chairperson of the World Congress of Faiths (WCF). Following his graduation from Yale Divinity School, he served as a U.S. Air Force chaplain from 1955 to 1958. Since 1959 he has been an active Unitarian Universalist minister, most recently in Berkeley, California and Sevenoaks, England.

International Council of Unitarians and Universalists

Leslaw Borowski. Dr. Leslaw Borowski works at the Cathedra of Religious Studies and the Philosophy of the East at Maria Curie-Sklodowska University in Lublin, Poland. He works on neo-Hinduism and general problems of new religious movements and teaches Indian and Chinese philosophy.

The Clan of Ausrans (Poland)
Evangelical Church of the Augsburg Confession
(Poland)
Old Catholic Church of Mariavites/Catholic Church of Mariavites
Orthodox Church of Poland [Polski Autokefaliczny
Kosciol Prawoslawny]
Polish National Catholic Church/Polish Catholic Church
[Kosciol Polskokatolicki]

Martha Sonntag Bradley. Martha Sonntag Bradley is an historian of Utah and Associate Professor in the Graduate School of Architecture of the University of Utah. She is the author of eight books, including Kid- napped from that Land: The Government Raids on the Short Creek Polygamists (University of Utah Press, 1993), a social history on polygamists in southern Utah and modern-day Mormon fundamentalism, and The Four Zinas: A Story of Mothers and Daughters on the Mormon Frontier (Signature, 2000), a book about nineteenth-century Mormon polygamy. She is currently working on a history of the national fight against the Equal Rights Amendment during 1972 and 1983.

Polygamy-Practicing Mormons

Jan Brzezinski. Jan Brzezinski earned his Ph.D. in Sanskrit literature from London's School of Oriental and African Studies. He has taught at the University of Manitoba and McGill University, and has translated and published several Sanskrit texts from the Gaudiya Vaisnava tradition.

Gaudiya Math

Gary Burlington. Gary Burlington is a professor of world missions at Lincoln Christian College in Nebraska, and a former missionary in Zambia. He completed his Ph.D. at Biola University with a dissertation on the Sweet Heart Church of the Clouds (Umutima Uwalowa wa Makumbi) of Zambia and its founder, Emilio Mulolani Chishimba.

Mutima Walowa Wa Mukumbi [Sweet Heart of the Clouds]

Andrea Cassinascio. Andrea Cassinascio is a priest-monk in the Russian Orthodox Church (Moscow Patriarchate) with the monastic name of Fr. Ambrose, and rector of the Russian Orthodox parish of Torino, Italy. He has authored several essays and a book on the Eastern Christian presence in Italy.

Liberal Catholic Church
Serbian Orthodox Church

Kim-Kwong Chan. Kim-Kwong Chan, Ph.D. and D.Th., is the Executive Secretary of the Hong Kong Christian Council and the author and coauthor of eight books on Christianity in China. He holds current honorary teaching and research appointments at the Chinese University of Hong Kong, Coventry University in the United Kingdom, Regent University in the United States, and Zhejiang University in China.

China
 China: Hong Kong
 China: Macao
 Chinese Protestant Three-Self Patriotic Movement Committee

James Chancellor. James Chancellor, the W. O. Carver Professor of World Religion and World Missions at the Southern Baptist Theological Seminary, is the author of Life in the Family: An Oral History of the Children of God (Syracuse University Press, 2000).

The Family/Children of God

Stuart Chandler. Stuart Chandler received his Ph.D. from Harvard University. He is an assistant professor at Indiana University of Pennsylvania. His research focuses on modern Chinese Buddhism and on the growing religious pluralism of the United States.

Foguangshan

Dorthe Refslund Christensen. Dorthe Refslund Christensen, Ph.D., is a lecturer at the Center for the Study of Religion at the Southern Danish University of Odense, Denmark, and the secretary of RENNER (Research Network on New Religion), the Danish-based scholar association. She is the author of Scientology: Fra Terapi til Religion (Scientology: From Therapy to Religion; Gyldendal, Nye Religioner, København, 1997), the first Danish introduction to the ideas and practices of the Church of Scientology.

Church of Scientology

Mathew Clark. Mathew Clark is head of the Department of the New Testament at the Auckland Park Theological Seminary in Johannesburg, South Africa. He is also principal of the Durban campus of that seminary. He was the first chair of the Pentecostal Theological Association of Southern Africa, founded in 1998.

Apostolic Faith Mission of South Africa

Peter B. Clarke. Peter B. Clarke is the Professor of the history and sociology of religion in the Department of Theology and Religious Studies at King's College, London. Recent publications include the editing of and contributions to New Trends and Developments in African Religions (Greenwood Press, 1998); with Elisabeth Arweck, An Annotated Bibliography of New Religious Movements in the West (Greenwood Press, 1997); New Trends and Developments in the World of Islam (Luzac Oriental, 1998); An Annotated Bibliography of Japanese New Religions (Japan Library/Curzon, 1998); and Japanese New Religions: In Global Perspective (Curzon Press, 2000). He is also the founding editor and contemporary coeditor with Dr. Elisabeth Arweck of the Journal of Contemporary Religion.

Agonshū
 Honmichi [Original Way]
 Kōfuku no Kagaku [Institute for Research in Human Happiness]
 Konkōkyō [Golden Light Teachings]
 Ōmoto
 Sekai Kyūsei Kyō (Church of World Messianity)
 Shinnyoen, Garden of Absolute Reality
 Tenrikyō [Religion of Heavenly Wisdom]
 Tenshō Kōtai Jingūkyō [The Religion of the Mighty God of Heaven]

Chas S. Clifton. Chas S. Clifton teaches writing at the University of Southern Colorado. He serves as associate editor of The Pomegranate: A Journal of Pagan Studies and secretary of the Nature Religions Scholars Network.

Covenant of the Goddess
 Gardnerian Wicca

Catherine Cornille. Catherine Cornille, a specialist in Japanese new religions in Europe, was formerly a member of the Faculty of Theology at the Catholic University of Leuven in Leuven, Belgium. She is the author of The Guru in Indian Catholicism: Ambiguity or Opportunity of Inculturation (Peeters, 1991); Vrouwen in de Wereldgodsdiensten: Teksten, tradities en recente ontwikkelingen (Lemniscaat, 1994); editor of A Universal Faith? Peoples, Cultures, Religions and the Christ. Essays in Honor of Prof. Dr. Frank De Graeve (Peeters, 1992); and of Many Mansions? Multiple Religious Belonging and Christian Identity (Orbis, 2002).

Mother Meera, Disciples of
 Sūkyō Mahikari

Diana Cousens. Diana Cousens has an M.A. in Tibetan history and works as a senior university administrator. Her paper on the visionary lineages of Jamyang Khyentse Wangpo will be published in 2002 as a part of the Conference Proceedings of the International Association of Tibetan Studies Conference in Leiden. She also publishes in the Buddhist Press.

Nyingma Tibetan Buddhism
Tibetan Nyingma Institute

Jamie Cresswell. Jamie Cresswell is the Director of the Institute of Oriental Philosophy European Centre in the United Kingdom and is working on a Ph.D. thesis on the development and organization of Buddhism in the West. He has coedited New Religious Movements: Challenge and Response with Dr. Bryan Wilson (Routledge, 1999).

The Buddhist Society
Foundation for the Preservation of the Mahayana
Tradition
Rigpa Fellowship

Vivienne Crowley. Vivienne Crowley, Ph.D., is a chartered psychologist and lectures on the psychology of religion at the University of London. She is the author of many books and papers on Wicca, Paganism, and the psychology of religion, including The Natural Magician (Penguin, 2002) and Your Dark Side (Thorsons, 2001).

Fellowship of Isis
Goddess Spirituality
Pagan Federation

Constantin Cuciuc. Dr. Constantin Cuciuc is a professor at the University of Bucharest Scientific Research for the Institute of Sociology at the Romanian Academy in Bucharest, Romania. He is the author of Atlasul Religiilor si al Monumentelor Istorice Religioase din Romania (Atlas of Religions and Religious Historical Monuments in Romania; Editura Gnosis, 1997) and Religii noi in Romania (New religions in Romania; Editura Gnosis, 1996).

Old Rite Romanian Orthodox Church
Reformed Church in Romania
Romania, Islam in
Romanian Greek Catholic Church
Romanian Orthodox Church

David Daniels. David Daniels is an associate professor of church history at McCormick Theological Seminary in Chicago, Illinois, and an ordained minister in the Church of God in Christ. He is the author of numerous published articles on the history of Christianity including "Teaching the History of U.S. Christianity in a Global Perspective" in Theological Education (Spring, 1993), and the entry on Black Holiness Pentecostals in the Encyclopedia of Afro-American Religion (Garland, 1993).

Church of God in Christ

Matthias Dech. Dr. Matthias Dech studied comparative science of religion and Indology in Marburg, Germany, where, in 1999, he completed his Ph.D. thesis on Hindus and Hinduism in Germany. Since 1999, he has been a computer consultant at the Deutsche Börse (German exchange) in Frankfurt, Germany.

Vishwa Hindu Parishad

Dell deChant. Dell deChant is an instructor and Director of the Undergraduate Program in the Department of Religious Studies at the University of South Florida. He is editor of the Journal of the Society for the Study of Metaphysical Religion. He is the coauthor with Darrell Fasching of Comparative Religious Ethics (Blackwell, 2000).

International New Thought Alliance
Religious Science
Unity School of Christianity/Association of Unity Churches

Max Deeg. Max Deeg is a professor of religious studies at the University of Vienna in Austria.

Mahayana Buddhism
Tiantai/Tendai

Mahinda Deegalle. Mahinda Deegalle is Lecturer in the study of religions at Bath Spa University College in the United Kingdom. He has coedited Pali Buddhism (Curzon Studies in Asian Philosophy) (Curzon Press, 1996) and has written two Sinhala works on Buddhism. He has published a number of articles on Buddhist preaching, and his current research interests are the Mahayana movement in Sri Lanka, ascetic practices, and new religious movements in Japan.

All Ceylon Buddhist Congress
Hossōshū
Ontakekyō
Sarvodaya
Young Men's Buddhist Association

Raffaella Di Marzio. Raffaella Di Marzio, a graduate in both psychology and religious sciences, is member of the Rome branch of GRIS (Gruppo di Ricerca e Informazione sulle Sette), a Roman Catholic cult-watching organization. She has published articles on several fringe Catholic movements, is a contributor to the Enciclopedia delle Religioni in Italia (Elledici, 2001) and to Cultic Studies Journal, published by American Family Foundation (AFF). She is also a member of the editorial advisory board of Cultic Studies Review: An Internet Journal of Research, News & Opinion (CSR), published by AFF.

La Missione—Luigia Paparelli

Thadeus Doktor. Thadeus Doktor received his doctorate in 1988 from Warsaw University. He is currently an adjunct professor at the Institute of Applied Social Sciences at the Warsaw University. His books include Spotkania z astrologią (Meetings with astrology; Iskry, 1987); Ruchy kultowe: Psychologiczna charakterystyka uczestników (Cult movements: Psychological characteristics of members; Nomos, 1991); Nowe ruchy religijne i parareligijne w Polsce (New religious and parareligious movements in Poland; Verbinum, 1999); and (with Irena Borowik) Pluralizm religijny i moralny w Polsce (Religions and moral pluralism in Poland; Nomos, 2001).

Poland
Rodzima Wiara (Poland)

Will Douglas. Will Douglas is at Wolfson College in Oxford, where his research has centered on the history of Himalayan Buddhism and on the relation between literacy, technology, and religion. He is presently translating the Karandavyuha Sutra.

Newar Buddhism (Nepal)

Markus Dressler. Markus Dressler was, from April 1998 to March 2001, a fellow and doctoral student at the Max Weber Center for Cultural and Social Studies at the Erfurt University in Germany. In March 2001 he finished his doctorate with a thesis on Alevism (published under the title Die Alevitische Religion: Traditionslinien und Neubestimmungen, Würzburg: Ergon 2002). In April 2001, provided with a scholarship from the German Academic Exchange Service, he embarked on a post-doctoral project as a visiting researcher at the Orient-Institute of the German Oriental Society in Istanbul, then at the Near Eastern Studies Department of New York University.

Bektashis (Bektashiye)

Eugene M. Elliott III. Eugene M. Elliott III graduated from the University of Virginia in 2002 with a B.A. in foreign affairs. After graduation he has pursued his interests in environmental policy and environmental education.

Elan Vital/Divine Light Mission

Miguel H. Farias. Miguel H. Farias was a research assistant at the University of Lisbon from 1998 until 2000, and is currently doing a doctorate in psychology at the University of Oxford. He has researched and published on new religious movements in Portugal and is now working on a social-psychological study of New Age individuals in England.

Lusitanian Church (Lusitanian Catholic Apostolic Evangelical Church)
Portugal

Willy Fautré. Willy Fautré is the Director of Human Rights Without Frontiers International in Brussels, Belgium, and is a member of the Belgian Association of Journalists of Religious Information. He is also a teacher of Germanic languages.

Belgium

Marianne Q. Fibiger. Marianne Q. Fibiger received her Ph.D. from Aarhus University in 1999. Her dissertation was entitled “The Sri Lankan Tamil Hindus in Denmark: A Religious Study of the Importance of Religion in an Intercultural Encounter.”

Sri Lanka, Hinduism in

Adele Fletcher. Adele Fletcher is a researcher currently based in Mito City, Japan. She holds a Ph.D. in Maori and an M.A. in religious studies from the University of Canterbury in New Zealand. Forthcoming publications include two articles on nineteenth-century Maori religion, “Atua, Ancestors and Ghosts” and “Sacred Hierarchies: Maori Ritual and Social Stratification.”

Maori Religion

Peter Flügel. Dr. Peter Flügel teaches in the Department of the Study of Religions of the School of Oriental and African Studies (SOAS) at the University of London. He is the author of Asceticism and Devotion: The Ritual System of the Terapanth Svetambara Jains (Peter Lang, forthcoming) and with G. Houtman is coeditor of Asceticism and Power in the Asian Context (Curzon Press, forthcoming).

Sthanakavasi Jain Tradition
Terapanth Svetambara Jain Tradition

Judith M. Fox. Dr. Judith M. Fox is an independent academic researcher specializing in South Asian new religions. In addition to journal articles and contributions to edited volumes, she has produced The Way of the Heart: A Study of Rajneeshism (Aquarian Press, 1986), Sahaja Yoga (Curzon Press, 1999), and Osho Rajneesh: e il suo movimento (Elledici, 1999).

Sahaja Yoga

Selena Fox. Reverend Selena Fox is founder and High Priestess of Circle Sanctuary. She also is a writer, photographer, clinical psychotherapist, Pagan religious freedom activist, and guest speaker at colleges and universities. She is a member of the Assembly of Religious and Spiritual Leaders associated with the Parliament of the World's Religion.

Circle Sanctuary
Wiccan Religion

Liselotte Frisk. Liselotte Frisk received her Ph.D. in 1993 from Åbo Academy in Finland. She was an assistant professor in history of religion at Umeå University in Sweden from 1995 to 1999, and from 1999 to 2001 was an assistant professor in religious studies at Dalarna University in Sweden. Since December 2001, she has been Associate Professor of Religious Studies at Åbo Academy.

The Satsang Network

David N. Gellner. David N. Gellner is a lecturer in social anthropology at the University of Oxford. His books include Monk, Householder, and Tantric Priest: Newar Buddhism and its Hierarchy of Ritual (Cambridge University Press, 1992), Nationalism and Ethnicity in a Hindu Kingdom (Harwood, 1997), and The Anthropology of Buddhism and Hinduism: Weberian Themes (Oxford University Press, 2001).

Nepal

Nikandrs Gills. Nikandrs Gills is a researcher at the Academic Center for Study of Religions at the Institute of Philosophy and Sociology, University of Latvia. He studied philosophy, and his research focuses on phenomenology of religion, history of religions, and churches of Latvia, including new religious movements. He is the compiler and editor of Religious Philosophical Articles.

Latvia
Latvia, Paganism in
Latvian Evangelical Lutheran Church

Stephen D. Glazier. Stephen D. Glazier is Professor of Anthropology at the University of Nebraska at Lincoln. He is the editor of The Encyclopedia of African and African American Religions (Routledge, 2001) and Anthropology of Religion: A Handbook (Praeger, 1999). Glazier currently serves as Secretary of the Society for the Scientific Study of Religion and is President of the Society for the Anthropology of Consciousness.

Rada Religion
Rastafarians
Spiritual Baptists

Donatas Glodenis. Donatas Glodenis received his B.A. in Christian studies at Lithuania Christian College in Klaipėda, Lithuania in 1999. He currently works for the Ministry of Justice of the Republic of Lithuania. He writes extensively on religious minorities and state-church relations in Lithuania and has coauthored a few books.

Lithuania
Romuva

Joscelyn Godwin. Joscelyn Godwin is Professor of Music at Colgate University, where he has taught since 1971. He was educated at Magdalene College and Cornell University, and has written, translated, and edited numerous books in the fields of musicology and esotericism, notably Harmonies of Heaven and Earth (Thames & Hudson, 1987), The Theosophical Enlightenment (SUNY Press, 1994), and a translation of the Hypnerotomachia Poliphili of 1499.

Western Esoteric Tradition

Marion S. Goldman. Marion S. Goldman is Professor of Sociology and Religious Studies at the University of Oregon. She focuses on issues of gender, sexualities, and religious movements. Her 1999 book Passionate Journeys (University of Michigan Press) considers the high-achieving women and men who followed Bhagwan Shree Rajneesh (now Osho) to central Oregon in the 1980s. Her recent work is about the Esalen Institute and its profound influence on contemporary culture.

Osho Commune International

Arthur L. Greil. Arthur L. Greil is Professor of Sociology and Health Policy at Alfred University. His work on religion has focused on conversion, quasi-religion, and religion and politics. He is coeditor, with Thomas Robbins, of a volume on quasi-religion and is currently coediting, with David Bromley, a volume on defining religion.

British Israelism
Jehovah's Witnesses

Peter Gyallay-Pap. Peter Gyallay-Pap holds a Ph.D. in political science and international relations from the London School of Economics. He is a senior research fellow at the Center of Advanced Study in Phnom Penh, Cambodia, and adjunct faculty at Adams State College in Colorado. He has spent ten years working with and writing about Buddhism in Cambodia.

Buddhist Institute (Cambodia)
Cambodia

Jeffrey K. Hadden. Jeffrey K. Hadden earned a Ph.D. in sociology at the University of Wisconsin in 1963. He has been Professor of Sociology at the University of Virginia since 1972. His writings in the area of religion have focused on religious movements. His most recent book, Religion and the Internet (JAI, 2001) was coedited with Douglas E. Cowan.

Ananda Marga Yoga Society
Elan Vital/Divine Light Mission
Integral Yoga International
Serpent Handlers/Signs Following Movement

Phillip E. Hammond. Phillip E. Hammond is D. Mackenzie Brown Professor of Religious Studies at the University of California at Santa Barbara. He received a Ph.D. in sociology from Columbia University and taught in the sociology departments of Yale University, the University of Wisconsin, and the University of Arizona before moving to UCSB in 1978. The most recent of his many books is The Dynamics of Religious Organizations (Oxford University Press, 2000).

Sōka Gakkai International

Jürgen Hanneder. Jürgen Hanneder holds a Ph.D. in Indology from the University of Marburg, Germany, and is presently a research scholar in a project located at the University of Halle, Germany, which deals with the Kashmirian version of the Yogavasishta. His teaching and research focus includes Kashmirian Shaivism, classical Sanskrit poetry, and modern Sanskrit literature.

Kashmir Saivism
Pashupata Saivism

Charlotte Hardman. Charlotte Hardman is a social anthropologist and head of the Religious Studies Department at the University of Newcastle upon Tyne, England. She has worked in Nepal for many years and has published books and articles on Nepal. She has also carried out research on new religious movements and has written on religion in contemporary society and on children.

Druidism
Nepal, Indigenous Religions in

Carol Harris-Shapiro. Carol Harris-Shapiro, the author of Messianic Judaism: A Rabbi's Journey through Religious Change in America (Beacon Press, 1999), is an assistant professor of religion at Temple University and a Reconstructionist rabbi. Her research interests include American religion, contemporary American Judaism, and religious/ethnic identity construction.

Union of Messianic Congregations

Christopher H. Hartney. Christopher H. Hartney is currently research assistant at the Department of Studies in Religion at the University of Sydney where he is completing a doctorate on Caodaism.

Caodaism
China: Taiwan
Vietnam

Jan-Peter Hartung. Jan-Peter Hartung is a doctoral candidate and researcher in religious studies and Islamic studies at the Max Weber Center for Cultural and Social Studies at Erfurt University in Germany. His fields of research and interest include Islamic scholarship in South Asia in the eighteenth to twenty-first centuries, Sufism, Islamic philosophy, and Muslim revivalist movements in South Asia.

Chistiniyya Sufi Order (Cishtiyya)
Naqshbandiya Sufi Order

Alan Hayes. Alan Hayes earned his Ph.D. from McGill University and is currently Bishops Frederick and Heber Wilkinson Professor of Church History of Wycliffe College at the University of Toronto. His teaching and research interests include early Christianity, Anglican history, early modern history, Canadian Christianity, historiography, and worship.

Anglican Church of Canada

Gordon L. Heath. Gordon L. Heath, currently studying for his Ph.D., is Assistant Professor of History and Director of the Degree Completion Program at Tyndale College in Toronto, Canada.

Christian Church (Disciples of Christ) in Canada
Doukhobors
Evangelical Lutheran Church in Canada
Evangelical Mennonite Conference (Canada)
Lutheran Church—Canada
Presbyterian Church in Canada

Kathleen Hertzberg. Kathleen Hertzberg, a life-long member of the Society of Friends, is the cofounder of the Canadian Friends Historical Association, founded in 1972. She attended Woodbrooke, the Quaker College in England. Prior to the Second World War, she assisted Jews and others in leaving Germany. She moved to Canada in 1952 and has served as the chair of the Canadian Friends Service Committee and a representative of Canadian Yearly Meeting on the (international) Friends World Committee for Consultation.

Canadian Yearly Meeting of the Religious Society of Friends

Norman A. Hjelm. Norman A. Hjelm, now retired in Wynnewood, Pennsylvania, served as Lutheran World Federation Director of Communication and Acting Deputy General Secretary for Planning. For a long time he was Director and Senior Editor of Fortress Press in Philadelphia. He also served as Director of the Commission on Faith and Order of the National Council of the Churches of Christ in the U.S.A.

Lutheran World Federation

E. G. Hoekstra. E. G. Hoekstra, M.A., is a retired pre-university education teacher who wrote many publications on religion in the Netherlands, especially on the diverse churches and religious movements. He is cowriter and editor of Wegwijs in religieus en levensbeschouwelijk Nederland (3d ed., Kampen, 2002) and is coeditor of the series “Wegwijs, Kok, Kampen.”

The Netherlands
Netherlands Reformed Church

Netherlands Reformed Churches
Old Catholic Church of the Netherlands
Reformed Churches in the Netherlands (GKN)
Reformed Churches in the Netherlands (Liberated)
Reformed Denomination
Remonstrant Brotherhood

Michael W. Homer. Michael W. Homer is a trial lawyer in private practice in Salt Lake City, Utah. He has written books and articles concerning Mormonism, Freemasonry, Arthur Conan Doyle, and Spiritualism. He is the author of Lo spiritismo (Elledici, 1999).

Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints

Qamar-ul Huda. Qamar-ul Huda is Assistant Professor of Islamic Studies and Comparative Theology in the Department of Theology at Boston College. His area of interests are on Sufism, Qur’anic hermeneutics, Islamic ethics, and history of religious thought.

Mevlevi Sufi Order
Qadiriyya Rifaiyya Sufi Order
Qadiriyya Sufi Order
Shâdhiliyya Sufi Order
Suhrawardiyya Sufi Order

Neil Hudson. Neil Hudson lectures at Regents Theological College in Nantwich, England. He was awarded a doctorate from King’s College, London in 1999 for work related to the Elim Pentecostal Church. His research interests include the challenge that contemporary society places before the church and Pentecostal history. He serves on the editorial board of the Journal of the European Pentecostal Theological Association and the management board of the Donald Gee Centre for Pentecostal Research.

Elim Pentecostal Church

Lynne Hume. Lynne Hume is an anthropologist and senior lecturer in the Department of Studies in Religion at the University of Queensland in Australia. She lectures on Aboriginal religions, women and religion, and new religious movements. Her current research is on altered states of consciousness and religious experience.

Aboriginal Religions

Alan Hunter. Dr. Alan Hunter is Senior Lecturer at the Centre for the Study of Forgiveness and Reconciliation at Coventry University in the United Kingdom. Dr.

Hunter has authored several works on religion and society in China, including (with Kim-kwong Chan) Protestantism in Contemporary China (Cambridge University Press, 1993) and (with John Sexton) Contemporary China (MacMillan, 1999).

China

Harold D. Hunter. Harold D. Hunter is the Director of the Archives and Research Center of the International Pentecostal Holiness Church in Oklahoma City, Oklahoma, the author of Spirit Baptism: A Pentecostal Alternative (University Press of America, 1983), and a past president of the Society for Pentecostal Studies.

Church of God of Prophecy
International Pentecostal Holiness Church
Pentecostal Church of God
Pentecostal World Fellowship

Dawn L. Hutchinson. Dawn L. Hutchinson is a graduate student at Florida State University, and is currently studying for her Ph.D. Her area of concentration is American religions with a special interest in new religious movements. She has given papers at the 1999 and 2000 annual regional meetings of the Society for the Study of Metaphysical Religions and at the 2001 annual conference of the American Academy of Religion.

A Course in Miracles

Manfred Hutter. Manfred Hutter is Professor for Comparative Religion at the University of Bonn in Germany. His teachings and current research include Indian religious traditions and spirituality in Europe, the Bahá'í Faith, and traditional and contemporary Zoroastrianism.

Austria
Austrian Buddhist Association
Evangelical Church of the Augsburg and Helvetic
Confessions in Austria
Old Catholic Church of Austria

Keishin Inaba. Keishin Inaba studied religions at Tokyo University from Professor Susumu Shimazono, and obtained a Ph.D. under the supervision of Professor Peter B. Clarke at King's College, University of London, where he was a postdoctoral fellow from July 2000 to May 2001. He also researched religions in the United Kingdom as a researcher for a Japanese governmental project. He has published essays and articles on altruism and religions, Japanese religions, and new religions. He is currently a research Associate at the Centre de Recherches sur le Japon at the École des Hautes Études en Sciences Sociales in Paris, France.

Byakkō Shinkō Kai
Ennōkyō
Gedatsu Kai
Izumo Ōyashirokyō
Kōdō Kyōdan
Kurozumikyō
Myōchikai Kyōdan
Nichirin Shōshū
Nichirinshū
Reiha-no-Hikari

Edward Irons. Edward Irons is the Director of The Hong Kong Institute for Culture, Religion, and Commerce, a religious studies research facility concentrating on Hong Kong and Chinese cultural studies, Chinese religions, and the interaction of cultural and religious issues with commerce in contemporary society.

Falun Gong (Falun Dafa)
Tian Dao (Yiguandao)

Ginette Ishimatsu. Ginette Ishimatsu is Associate Professor of Asian Religions at the University of Denver. She is the author of Between Text and Tradition: Hindu Ritual and Politics in South India (Westview, forthcoming) and contributor (with S. S. Janaki, N. R. Bhatt, and Richard Davis) to a critical edition and translation of Aghorashivacharya's Kriyakramadyotika.

Tamil Saivism

Forrest Jackson. Forrest Jackson, a graduate of Tulane University, was first entranced by flying saucers at the age of six when his mother, a UFO contactee, took him to see Close Encounters of the Third Kind. Along with Rodney Perkins, he cowrote Cosmic Suicide: The Tragedy and Transcendence of Heaven's Gate (Pentaradial Press, 1997).

Chen Tao

Kumar Jairamdas. Kumar Jairamdas is a student at the University of South Florida with interests in Vajrayana; Jainism; developmental Hinduism and Buddhism in India; Hindu, Buddhist, and Jain mythology; and the Hindu/Buddhist influence on Tibetan religion. He has traveled to Indonesia to study the ways in which Hindu mythology has been transmitted in non-Indian Hindu culture. He has also visited Singapore to observe secularized Hindu/Buddhist traditions.

Saivism (Hinduism)
 Shakta Movement (Hinduism)
 Smarta Tradition (Hinduism)
 Tantrism
 Vaisnavism
 Yogi Tradition

Abhi P. Janamanchi. Reverend Abhi P. Janamanchi is a Unitarian Universalist minister who currently serves in the Unitarian Universalist Society in Clearwater, Florida. He hails from India and is also a member of the Brahma Samaj.

Brahmo Samaj

Constance A. Jones. Constance A. Jones, Ph.D. is Professor at the California Institute of Integral Studies in San Francisco. She is a sociologist of religion who conducts research in new religious movements in America. Her publications include analyses of Eastern religions in America, particularly Hindu groups.

The Gurdjieff Foundations
 Krishnamurti Foundations

Andy Brubacher Kaether. Andy Brubacher Kaether completed his M.A. in theology at the Toronto School of Theology, University of Toronto. His thesis is entitled “Christology in African Independent Churches: Theological Reflections in Mennonite Missions Perspective.”

Church of Moshoeshoe (Lesotho)
 Spiritual Healing Church (Botswana)

William K. Kay. William K. Kay is the Director of the Centre for Pentecostal and Charismatic Studies at the University of Wales in Bangor, and Senior Lecturer in Religious and Theology Education at King’s College, London. Among many other publications, he is author of Pentecostals in Britain (Paternoster, 2000) and coeditor of the three-volume series Religion in Education (Gracewing, 1997, 1998, 2000).

Assemblies of God in Great Britain and Ireland

Alexandra Kent. Alexandra Kent is a social anthropologist at the Department of Social Anthropology at Göteborg University in Sweden. She carried out doctoral research on the Sathya Sai Baba movement in Malaysia between 1996 and 1998 and presented the material in the year 2000 in a thesis entitled “Ambiguity and the Modern Order: The Sathya Sai Baba Movement in Malaysia.” Between 2000 and 2002 she conducted postdoctoral research on Chinese participation in the Tamil festival of Thaipusam in Penang, Malaysia.

Sathya Sai Baba Movement

Benny Liow Woon Khin. Benny Liow Woon Khin earned a B.A. Hons. Ed. in history in 1980 from Universiti Sains Malaysia, and in 1985 earned a Master of Public Administration from University of Malaya. He works as a general manager of human resources at a leading Malaysian-based multi-national corporation in Kuala Lumpur. He is editor of Eastern Horizon, a journal of the Young Buddhist Association of Malaysia. His most recent publications are K.Sri Dhammananda Felicitation: Essays in Honor of His 80th Birthday (BGF, 1999) and K.Sri Dhammananda: A Pictorial Retrospect (BGF, 1997).

Buddhist Missionary Society Malaysia
 Young Buddhist Association of Malaysia

Sallie B. King. Sallie B. King is Professor of Philosophy and Religion at James Madison University. She is the author of Buddha Nature (SUNY Press, 1991) and Journey in Search of the Way: The Spiritual Autobiography of Satomi Myodo (SUNY Press, 1993) and coeditor of Engaged Buddhism: Buddhist Liberation Movements in Asia (SUNY Press, 1996) and The Sound of Liberating Truth: Buddhist-Christian Dialogues in Honor of Frederick J. Streng (Curzon Press, 1999).

Unified Buddhist Church, the Order of Interbeing, and the Community of Mindful Living

Christoph Kleine. Christoph Kleine holds a Ph.D. in religious studies from the University of Marburg, Germany. He is presently a lecturer at various German universities. His special field of interest is East Asian religious history—particularly Buddhism, hagiography, religion and politics issues, and methodological questions of the study of religions. His publications include Hönens Buddhismus des Reinen Landes: A Multilingual Dictionary of Chinese Buddhism (Peter Lang, 1996) and a number of articles in various journals, books, and reference works.

Jōdo-Shinshū [True Pure Land School]
 Jōdo-Shū [Pure Land School]

Alioune Koné. Alioune Koné is a Ph.D. candidate in sociology at the École des Hautes Études en Sciences Sociales in Paris, France, and currently a research associate at the Center for Interdisciplinary Studies of Religious Facts (CEIFR), a Centre National de la Recherche Scientifique (CNRS) institution in Paris. His dissertation is a sociological analysis of the legacy of Taisen Deshimaru Roshi (1914–1982).

International Zen Association

Milan Kováč. Milan Kováč, Ph.D., is a Chair of the Department of the History of Religions at the Comenius University in Bratislava, Slovakia. He has concentrated his studies on philosophy, history, and history of religions.

Slovakia

Louise Kretzschmar. Louise Kretzschmar is Professor of Christian Ethics at the University of South Africa in Pretoria, and chairperson of the governing board of the Baptist Convention College in Soweto. She is the author of The Voice of Black Theology in South Africa (Ohio University Press, 1986); Privatization of the Christian Faith: Mission, Social Ethics and the South African Baptists (Asempa Press, 1998); coeditor (with L. D. Hulley and Luke Lungile Pato) of Archbishop Tutu: Prophetic Witness in South Africa (BHB International, 1997); and coeditor (with C. Kourie) of Christian Spirituality in South Africa (Cluster, 2000).

Baptist Union of South Africa/Baptist Convention of South Africa
Baptists

Alexei D. Krindatch. Alexei D. Krindatch graduated from the Moscow State University in 1988, specializing in human geography and geography of religions. From 1995 to 1996 he was a Pew Fellow at Columbia University in New York, participating in the Religion, Human Rights, and Religious Freedom Program. He is the author of a monograph Geography of Religions in Russia (Glenmary Research Center, 1996), one of 30 publications in various languages. He is currently employed as a research fellow at the Center of Geopolitical Studies of the Institute of Geography in Moscow, Russia.

Georgia
Georgian Orthodox Church
Russian Orthodox Church (Moscow Patriarchate)

Solveiga Krumina-Konkova. Solveiga Krumina-Konkova is a doctor of philosophy, a leading researcher, and a head of the Academic Centre for the Study of Religions of the Institute of Philosophy and Sociology at the University of Latvia. She is an author of the book Evil and Man's Free Will (Zinatne, 1992, in Latvian), and of numerous articles on religions in Latvia.

Latvia
Latvia, Paganism in
Latvian Evangelical Lutheran Church

Khun Eng Kuah. Khun Eng Kuah holds a Ph.D. in anthropology from Monash University in Australia. She is currently Associate Professor at the Department of Sociology at the University of Hong Kong. Her teaching and research focus includes Buddhism—society and state; the emigrant villages in China; and ancestor worship in south China. Her recent publications include a book titled Rebuilding the Ancestral Village: Singaporeans in China (Ashgate, 2000).

Singapore, Buddhism in

André Laliberté. André Laliberté is presently Assistant Professor at the Department of Political Science at the University of Ottawa. He holds a Ph.D. in political science from the University of British Columbia in Canada. He teaches courses on comparative politics and Chinese politics, as well as a seminar on religion and politics. He has published on the politics of Taiwanese Buddhist organizations and on Chinese international ethics, and his current research interests include charity and welfare policy in China and Taiwan.

Buddhist Association of the Republic of China
The Buddhist Compassion Relief Tzu Chi
Association
The Dharma Drum Mountain Association
(Fakushan)
Master Ching Hai Meditation Association

David Christopher Lane. David Christopher Lane is currently a professor of philosophy and sociology at Mount San Antonio College in Walnut, California. He is the author of several books, including The Radhasoami Tradition: A Critical History of Guru Successorship (Garland, 1992), Exposing Cults: When the Skeptical Mind Confronts the Mystical (Garland, 1994), and The Making of a Spiritual Movement: The Untold Story of Paul Twitchell and Eckankar (Del Mar Press, 1983). Lane received his Ph.D.

from the University of California at San Diego where he was also a recipient of a Regents Fellowship.

Manavta Mandir
 Master Ching Hai Meditation Association
 Radhasoami
 Ruhani Satsang

Laura Maria Latikka. Reverend Master of Theology Laura Maria Latikka earned her Master of Theology at Åbo Akademi University in Turku, Finland in 1996. From 1990 to 1991, she studied at Aarhus University in Denmark. In 1997 she was named the Secretary for Church and People of Other Faiths in the Evangelical Lutheran Church of Finland until 2000.

Evangelical Lutheran Church of Finland
 Finland

Paul Alan Laughlin. Paul Alan Laughlin is Professor and Chair of the Department of Religion and Philosophy at Otterbein College in Ohio, and the author of numerous publications, most in the field of American metaphysical religion. His latest book is Remedial Christianity: What Every Believer Should Know about the Faith, but Probably Doesn't (Polebridge Press, 2000).

Seichō-no-Ie

Martha Lee. Martha Lee earned her Ph.D. from Syracuse University and is now an associate professor at the University of Windsor in Ontario, Canada. She is the author of The Nation of Islam, an American Millenarian Movement (Syracuse University Press, 1996), Earth First! Environmental Apocalypse (Syracuse University Press, 1995), and the editor of Millennial Visions: Essays on Twentieth Century Millenarianism (Praeger, 2000).

Nation of Islam (Farrakhan)
 Warith Deen Mohammad, Ministry of

James R. Lewis. James R. Lewis teaches religious studies at the University of Wisconsin at Stevens Point. His publications include Cults in America: A Reference Handbook (ABC-CLIO, 1998), Witchcraft Today: An Encyclopedia of Wiccan and Neopagan Traditions (ABC-CLIO, 1999), UFOs and Popular Culture: An Encyclopedia of Contemporary Myth (ABC-CLIO, 2000), and Satansim Today: An Encyclopedia of Religion, Folklore, and Popular Culture (ABC-CLIO, 2001).

Adidam

Aumist Religion
 Branham Tabernacle and Related Assemblies
 Church of the Brethren
 International Evangelical Church
 Movement of Spiritual Inner Awareness
 Sikh Dharma
 Sikhism and the Sant Mat Tradition
 The Way International

John LoBreglio. John LoBreglio is a Ph.D. candidate in religious studies at the University of California at Santa Barbara. He has also completed a doctoral course at Kyoto University in Japanese cultural studies.

Japan Buddhist Federation
 Nipponzan Myohoji

Phillip Charles Lucas. Phillip Charles Lucas is Associate Professor of Religious Studies at Stetson University in DeLand, Florida and a founding editor of Nova Religio: The Journal of Alternative and Emergent Religions. He is the author of The Odyssey of a New Religion: The Holy Order of MANS from New Age to Orthodoxy (Indiana University Press, 1995), and coauthor of Cassadaga: The South's Oldest Spiritual Community (University Press of Florida, 2000). He is the author of numerous articles on alternative religions.

Ancient and Mystical Order Rosae Crucis
 I AM Religious Activity (Saint Germain Foundation)
 Sufi Order International

Luk Fai. Luk Fai, D.Min., is the General Secretary of the Hong Kong Council of the Church of Christ in China.

The Hong Kong Council of the Church of Christ in China

Dusan Lužný. Dusan Lužný is Associate Professor at the Institute for the Study of Religions at the Faculty of Arts of Masaryk University in Brno in the Czech Republic. He focuses on the issues connected with the existence and activities of new religious movements and on the transformations of religion in the globalization process. He is the author of monographs Nová náboženská hnutí (New religious movements; 1997), Náboženství a moderní společnost: sociologické teorie modernizace a sekularizace (Religion and modern society: sociological theories of modernization and secularization; 1999), and Zelení bódhisattvové: sociálně a ekologicky angažovaný buddhismus (The green boddhisattvas: socially and ecologically engaged buddhism; 2000).

Czech Republic
 Evangelical Church of the Czech Brethren [Ceskobratrská církev evangelická]
 Silesian Evangelical Church of the Augsburg Confession
 [Slezská církev evangelická augsburského vyznání]

Richard McBride. Richard McBride holds a Ph.D. in east Asian languages and cultures from the University of California at Los Angeles. He is presently a lecturer for courses on Korean and Chinese Buddhism at UCLA and the University of California at Irvine. His research focus includes Buddhist spells (dharani) and bodhisattva cults in Korean and Chinese Buddhism.

Chogye Order (Chogye-Jong)
 Pomun Order [Pomun-Jong]
 Won Buddhism (Won Pulgyo)

Gary B. McGee. Gary B. McGee received his Ph.D. from Saint Louis University. He currently is Professor of Church History and Pentecostal Studies at Assemblies of God Theological Seminary in Springfield, Missouri.

Assemblies of God

Marjory A. MacLean. Reverend Marjory A. MacLean is depute clerk and acting principal clerk to the general assembly of the Church of Scotland, and is a former lawyer and parish minister.

Church of Scotland

David Wayne Machacek. David Wayne Machacek is a research coordinator at the Center for the Study of Religion and lecturer in religious studies and writing at the University of California at Santa Barbara. His books include Soka Gakkai in America: Accommodation and Conversion (with Phillip E. Hammond; Oxford University Press, 1999) and Global Citizens: The Soka Gakkai Buddhist Movement in the World (with Bryan Wilson; Oxford University Press, 2000).

Sōka Gakkai International

Ranjana Mukhopadhyaya. Ranjana Mukhopadhyaya is a research scholar in sociology of religion at the University of Tokyo, Japan and University of Delhi, India. Her research is on Japanese religions, particularly on modern Japanese Buddhism, new religious movements, and on the public role of religion. Her publications, in English as well as Japanese, are on engaged Buddhism and on state-religion relations and social activism of religious groups in Japan.

Kokuchū-Kai
 Reiyūkai
 Risshō Kōsei-Kai

Peter Jan Margry. Peter Jan Margry is Director of the Department of Ethnology of the Meertens Institute at the Royal Netherlands Academy of Arts and Sciences in Amsterdam. His research focuses on modern religious culture in the Netherlands and Europe, with themes on rituals, sanctity, pilgrimage, apparitions, and fundamentalism.

Fatima (Portugal)
 Marian Devotion, World Network of
 Medjugorje (Bosnia-Herzegovina)
 Our Lady of All Nations (Netherlands)

Javier Martínez-Torrón. Javier Martínez-Torrón, Doctor of Law and Doctor of Canon Law, is a Professor of Law at Complutense University in Madrid, Spain. He is Vice President of the Section of Canon Law and Church-State Relations of the Spanish Royal Academy of Jurisprudence and Legislation. He is also author of numerous books and articles published in Spanish, English, Italian, French, Russian, and Lithuanian. His research on law and religion issues is characterized by a predominant interest in international and comparative law.

Spain

Bruce Matthews. Bruce Matthews is the C. B. Lumsden Professor of Comparative Religion and Dean of Arts at Acadia University in Nova Scotia. His research interests and many publications have focused largely on Buddhism in the modern world, more particularly the Theravada tradition of Sri Lanka and Myanmar.

Myanmar

Jean-François Mayer. Jean-François Mayer is a lecturer in religious studies at the University of Fribourg in Switzerland. He is the author of a number of books and articles including I nuovi movimenti religiosi: Sette cristiane e nuovi culti (with Massimo Introvigne and Ernesto Zucchini; Elledici, 1990); Las sectas: Inconformismos cristianos y nuevas religiones (Desclée De Brouwer, 1990); Les nouvelles voies spirituelles: Enquête sur la religiosité parallèle en Suisse (Ed. L'Age d'Homme, 1993); Il tempio solare (Elledici, 1997); and Les fondamentalismes (Georg Editeur, 2001).

Arès Pilgrims
Old Catholic Church in Switzerland [Christkatholische Kirche der Schweiz]
Russian Orthodox Church Outside of Russia
Solar Temple, Order of the Spiritual Human Yoga/Mankind Enlightenment Love
Switzerland

Sarah Meadows. As a student at the University of Virginia, Sarah Meadows worked closely with Jeffrey K. Hadden and the New Religions project he created.

Integral Yoga International

Andrea Menegotto. Andrea Menegotto is a freelance professional researcher in the field of social and humanistic sciences. He collaborates with different training institutes and organizations and is a researcher at the Center for Studies on New Religions (CESNUR) in Milan.

Art of Living Foundation

Michael L. Mickler. Michael L. Mickler is Vice President and Associate Professor of Church History at the Unification Theological Seminary. He is the author of Forty Years in America: An Intimate History of the Unification Movement, 1959–1999 (HSA Publications, 2000), A History of the Unification Church in America, 1959–74 (Garland, 1993), and The Unification Church in America: A Bibliography and Research Guide (Garland, 1987), as well as articles and reviews on the Unification Church and other movements.

Unification Movement

Rebecca Moore. Rebecca Moore teaches in the Department of Religious Studies at San Diego State University. She has studied Peoples Temple and the events at Jonestown for the past two decades, and has published a number of books and articles on the subject. She is currently co-general editor of Nova Religio: The Journal of Alternative and Emergent Religions.

Peoples Temple
Sri Chinmoy Centers International

Heinz Muermel. Heinz Muermel studied Protestant theology at Karl Marx University in Leipzig. He wrote his Ph.D. dissertation on “Das Magieverstaendnis von Marcel Mauss” (The Concept of Magic with Mauss). His areas of study have included the thought of the French school of sociology on religion; the Theravada Buddhism of Sri Lanka; and Buddhism in Germany and its relation to other religious groups.

Sri Lanka

Larry G. Murphy. Larry G. Murphy is a professor of the history of Christianity at Garrett Evangelical Theological Seminary in Evanston, Illinois. He is the editor of Down by the Riverside: A Reader in African American Religion (New York University Press, 2000) and coeditor (with Gary Ward and J. Gordon Melton) of the Encyclopedia of African American Religion (Garland, 1993).

African Methodist Episcopal Church
African Methodist Episcopal Zion Church
Christian Methodist Episcopal Church

Wilson Niwagila. Wilson Niwagila was born in Bukoba, Tanzania and later studied theology in Tanzania, the United States, and Germany. He became a Lutheran parish pastor in several congregations in Tanzania and Germany. In Tanzania, he was the Lutheran secretary for Christian Education, the Director of the Evangelical Academy, and Provost of Makumira University College. At present, he is the Executive Secretary for Evangelism of the United Evangelical Mission for Germany, Asia, and Africa.

Evangelical Lutheran Church in Tanzania

Lionel Obadia. Lionel Obadia is a lecturer in anthropology at the Université Charles-de-Gaulle in Lille, France. A specialist in Buddhism, he is the author of Bouddhisme et Occident: La diffusion du bouddhisme tibétain en France (1999).

Diamond Way Buddhism
France
Kagyupa Tibetan Buddhism
Karma-Kagyupa Tibetan Buddhism

Roger E. Olson. Roger E. Olson holds a Ph.D. from Rice University in Houston, Texas. He is author of several books on theology including The Story of Christian Theology: Twenty Centuries of Tradition & Reform (InterVarsity Press, 1999). Olson is currently Professor of Theology at Baylor University in Waco, Texas and has written articles and essays on new and alternative religious movements.

ECKANKAR

Frands Ole Overgaard. Frands Ole Overgaard teaches church history in the Theological Faculty of Aarhus University in Denmark.

Evangelical Lutheran Church in Denmark

Douglas M. Padgett. Douglas M. Padgett is a doctoral candidate in the Department of Religious Studies at Indiana University. His dissertation is on the effects of exile and war on Vietnamese Buddhism in diaspora. He is the author of “‘Americans Need Something to Sit On,’ or Zen Meditation Materials” and “Buddhist Diversity in North America” in the Journal of Global Buddhism.

Unified Buddhist Church of Vietnam

Rafael Palomino. Rafael Palomino earned his Ph.D. from the Universidad Complutense de Madrid in 1993, where he is currently Professor of Law. He is author of Las Objeciones de Conciencia (Conflicts between Religious Conscience and Law in the United States of America; Montecorvo, 1994) and coauthor of Estado y Religión: Textos para una Reflexión Crítica (History of Church-State Relations; Ariel, 2000).

Spanish Evangelical Church
Spanish Reformed Episcopal Church

Susan Palmer. Susan Palmer is a lecturer in the religious studies department of Dawson College in Montreal, Quebec, and is Adjunct Professor at Concordia University in Montreal. She has authored, edited, or coedited seven books, notably Moon Sisters, Krishna Mothers, Rajneesh Lovers (Syracuse University Press, 1996), Children in New Religions (coedited with Charlotte Hardman; Rutgers University Press, 1999), and I raeliani (Elledici, 2000). She is currently researching new religions in Quebec and France.

Raelian Movement International
Twelve Tribes

Michael Papazian. Michael Papazian is Assistant Professor of Philosophy at Berry College at Mt. Berry, Georgia. He is the author of the forthcoming book The Com- mentary on the Four Evangelists of Stepano Siwnik (Peeters Press, 2002) as well as numerous articles on ancient philosophy and Armenian Christianity.

Armenian Apostolic Church (Holy See of Echmiadzin)
Armenian Apostolic Church (See of the Great House of Cilicia)

Thomas V. Peterson. Thomas V. Peterson teaches religious studies at Alfred University. Author of Ham and Japheth: The Mythic World of Whites in the Antebellum South (Scarecrow Press, 1978) and Linked Arms: A Rural Community Resists Nuclear Waste (SUNY Press, 2001), he has written articles on ritual studies, religion and art, and Native American studies.

The Lakota
The Navajo

Karma Phuntsho. Lopen Karma Phuntsho was trained as a monk and holds a Lopen degree from the Nyingma Institute in Mysore and a M.St. in classical Indian religions from Oxford. He is currently writing his Ph.D. thesis and is an associate in Indian and Sanskrit studies at Harvard University and the Centre National de la Recherche Scientifique (CNRS) in Paris. His expertise is in Tibetan Buddhism and his publications include Steps to Valid Reasoning: A Treatise in Logic and Epistemology (Ngagyur Nyingma Institute, 1997).

Bhutan

William L. Pitts Jr. William L. Pitts Jr. teaches church history in the Religion Department at Baylor University. His professional work focuses on American religious history. He has published in the areas of historiography, spirituality, Baptist history, and new religious movements, including numerous articles on the Davidians and Branch Davidians.

Branch Davidians

John Powers. John Powers holds a Ph.D. from University of Virginia in Buddhist Studies. He is currently a reader in the Centre for Asian Societies and Histories at Australian National University.

China: Tibet
Gelukpa Tibetan Buddhism
Sakyapa
Tibetan Buddhism

Charles S. Prebish. Charles S. Prebish holds a Ph.D. in Buddhist studies from the University of Wisconsin. He is currently Professor of Religious Studies at the Pennsylvania State University. He is a past officer in the International Association of Buddhist Studies, and has published eleven books, the most recent of which is Luminous Passage: The Practice and Study of Buddhism in America (University of California Press, 1999).

Insight Meditation Society
The Kwan Um School of Zen

Carolyn V. Prorok. Carolyn V. Prorok teaches in the Department of Geography and Environmental Studies at Slippery Rock University in Pennsylvania. She has authored a number of scholarly articles and is the coeditor (with Kiran Banga Chhokar) of Asian Women and Their Work: A Geography of Gender and Development (NCGE, 1998).

Arya Samaj
Divine Life Society
Espiritismo
Iran
Ireland
Presbyterian Church in Trinidad
Trinidad and Tobago, Hinduism in

Paulson Pulikottil. Paulson Pulikottil is an assistant professor at Union Biblical Seminary in Pune, India. He earned his Ph.D. from Sheffield University in 1995, and is currently President of the Asian Pentecostal Society and a member of the World Council of Churches Joint Consultative Group with Pentecostals.

Indian Pentecostal Church of God
The Pentecostal Mission

Kęstutis Pulokas. Kęstutis Pulokas is the chair of the Lithuanian Bible Reading Society (a member of the Scripture Union) and a board member of the Cultural and Historical Society of the Reformation in Lithuania. In 1993 he attended summer courses in Lutheran Theology at Concordia Seminary in St. Louis, Missouri, and from 1993 to 1994 served as editor of Liuteronu balsas, the bimonthly publication of the Vilnius Evangelical Lutheran Church. He later graduated from the Philological Faculty of Vilnius University in 1994.

Evangelical Lutheran Church of Lithuania/Lithuanian
Evangelical Lutheran Church in Diaspora

Martin Ramstedt. Martin Ramstedt holds a Ph.D. in anthropology from Munich University. From 1997 to 2001, he worked as a research fellow at the International Institute for Asian Studies in Leiden, the Netherlands, pursuing research on Hinduism and ethnic religions in modern Indonesia. Since late 2001, he has worked as a research fellow at the Meertens Instituut in Amsterdam, focusing on new forms of religiosity and transcultural religious movements in the Netherlands. He also teaches at the Theological Department at Nijmegen University.

Indonesia, Buddhism in Indonesia, Confucianism in Indonesia, Hinduism in

Kari Rantila. Kari Rantila is a chief editor, translator and university teacher with the Finnish Orthodox Church.

Finnish Orthodox Church

Jeremy Rapport. Jeremy Rapport is a graduate student in religious studies at the University of Kansas. His primary area of interest is new religious movements in America.

Seventh-day Adventist Church
Universal Faithists of Kosmon
The URANTIA Foundation

Ian Reader. Ian Reader is a professor in the religious studies department at Lancaster University in England. He has formerly worked at universities and research institutes in Japan, Scotland, Hawaii, and Denmark. He has written extensively about religion in Japan, and specializes in the study of pilgrimages and of religion in the modern day.

Aum Shinrikyō/Aleph
Japan

David A. Reed. David A. Reed is Associate Professor of Pastoral Theology and Director of Field Education at Wycliffe College in Toronto, Canada. Reared in the Oneness Pentecostal Tradition and now an Anglican minister and theologian, he began his study of the Oneness movement with a doctoral thesis completed in 1978.

Church of the Lord Jesus Christ of the Apostolic Faith

Terry Rey. Terry Rey is Assistant Professor of African and Caribbean Religions at Florida International University in Miami and formerly Professor of Ethnology at Haiti's State University in Port-au-Prince. He has studied at universities in Australia, Zaire, and Germany and holds a doctorate in religion from Temple University.

Haiti
Vodou

Keith Richmond. Keith Richmond is an historian with a special interest in the Tibetan Bon religion. He has contributed papers on the subject to a number of conferences and journals, and is currently completing his Ph.D. at Monash University in Melbourne, Australia.

Bon Religion
Nyingma Tibetan Buddhism

Bernadette Rigal-Cellard. Bernadette Rigal-Cellard is Professor of North American Studies and Chair of the English Department at the University Michel de Montaigne-Bordeaux 3. Her 1982 Ph.D. dissertation bore on "Contemporary Religious Movements in America: Evangelism and the New Religions, an Assessment of the Fourth Great Awakening." Her research concentrates on the interaction of American and Canadian religions with their surrounding culture, the impact of Christian missions on Native communities, and the transformations undergone by religious groups in their transatlantic passage from Europe and Africa to the Americas and vice versa.

Apostles of Infinite Love

Ringo Ringvee. Ringo Ringvee earned his M.A. in theology from the University of Helsinki in 1998. He has been giving courses in several institutions of higher education in Estonia, focusing on religion in contemporary society and on the religious situation in post-Soviet Estonia. He is currently working in the Department of Religious Affairs of the Ministry of Internal Affairs of the Estonian Republic.

Estonia
Estonian Apostolic Orthodox Church/Estonian Orthodox Church (Moscow Patriarchate)
Estonian Evangelical Lutheran Church
Estonian Evangelical Lutheran Church Abroad

Ronald Roberson. Ronald Roberson holds a doctorate from the Pontifical Oriental Institute in Rome. He is currently an associate director of the Secretariat for Ecumenical and Interreligious Affairs at the United States Conference of Catholic Bishops in Washington, D.C., where he specializes in relations with the Orthodox Churches. He is the author of The Eastern Christian Churches: A Brief Survey (6th ed., Pontifical Oriental Institute, 1999).

Ecumenical Patriarchate/Patriarchate of Constantinople
Greek Orthodox Patriarchate of Alexandria and All Africa
Greek Orthodox Patriarchate of Antioch and All the East
Greek Orthodox Patriarchate of Jerusalem
Orthodox Church of Greece

James Burnell Robinson. James Burnell Robinson is Associate Professor of Religion at the University of Northern Iowa in Cedar Falls, Iowa. He received his doctorate from the University of Wisconsin at Madison in the area of Buddhist studies with a specialty in Tibetan Buddhism but has since broadened his research to include esoteric religious movements in the West as well. He is presently researching the history of the idea of spiritual hierarchy from a cross-cultural perspective.

Anthroposophical Society
Christian Community

David G. Roebuck. David G. Roebuck, Ph.D., is the Director of the Dixon Pentecostal Research Center in Cleveland, Tennessee, which serves as the archives for the Church of God. He is an assistant professor of religion at Lee University and also teaches at the Church of God Theological Seminary.

Church of God (Cleveland, Tennessee)

Verónica Roldán. Verónica Roldán has a Ph.D. in sociology, is Professor of Sociology of Cultural Process at the University of Perugia, is a researcher of CESNUR (Center for Studies on New Religions) Italia team, and auxiliary Professor of Sociology of Religions at the Università di Roma Tre. She is the author of different articles and books on new religions movements, including La Chiesa Anima Universale (Elledici, 2000).

Iglesia ni Cristo [Church of Christ]

Eric Rommeluère. Eric Rommeluère is a lecturer and the Vice President of the European Buddhist University, an institute for the studies on Buddhism, founded in Paris in 1995. Eric Rommeluère's various publications are about Chan/Zen Buddhism and the acculturation of Buddhism in the West.

Rinzai (Japan), Lin-Chi (China), Imje (Korea), Lam-Te (Vietnam)

Mikael Rothstein. Mikael Rothstein is an associate professor in the Department of the History of Religions at the University of Copenhagen, Denmark, where he specializes in the study of new religions. He is a coeditor of the journal Chaos. Among his several books are Belief Transformations (RENNER Studies on New Religions, 1996), I culti die dischi volanti (Flying saucer religions; Elledici, 1999), and edited New Age Religion and Globalization (RENNER Studies on New Religions, 2001).

Denmark
UFO Religions

Richard C. Salter. Richard C. Salter is an assistant professor of religious studies at Hobart and William Smith Colleges in Geneva, New York. From 1986 to 1988 he was a Peace Corps volunteer in Dominica, and in 1994 he returned there for dissertation research. His dissertation was on religious group formation in Dominica.

Dominica

Tiago Santos. Tiago Santos graduated in sociology from the Universidade Nova de Lisboa in 1997. He was already a research assistant at the time and has since always worked in the craft. In 2001 he became a founding associate of Numena, an independent research center. He currently holds a scholarship from the Fundação para a Ciência e Tecnologia for his work on elective affinities.

Lusitanian Church (Lusitanian Catholic Apostolic Evangelical Church)
Portugal

James A. Santucci. James A. Santucci received his Ph.D. in Asian civilization from the Department of Asian Civilizations at the Australian National University in Canberra. He is currently a professor in the Department of Religious Studies at California State University at Fullerton. He is the author of La società teosofica (Elledici, 1999), Hindu Art in South and Southeast Asia, An Outline of Vedic Literature (Scholars Press, 1976), and coauthor of America's Religions (Libraries Unlimited, 1997). He has written numerous articles for journals and encyclopedias and is currently editor of Theosophical History, a quarterly journal.

Theosophical Society (Adyar)

Jeffrey M. Schwartz. Jeffrey M. Schwartz, M.D., is a research psychiatrist at the University of California at Los Angeles School of Medicine. He is the author of three books and approximately 100 scientific publications in the fields of neuroscience, psychiatry, and most recently, philosophy of mind and Buddhist meditation. He has maintained a regular practice of Vipassana meditation since 1975.

Buddhasananuggaha Association (Venerable Mahasi Sayadaw)

Ruediger Seesemann. Ruediger Seesemann specializes in Islamic studies and works as a research fellow at the University of Bayreuth in Germany. His current research topics include the development of the Tijāniyya Sufi Order in west Africa and Islamic education in east Africa.

Muridiyya
Tijāniyya Sufi Order

Gaynor Sekimori. Dr. Gaynor Sekimori was a research fellow at the Centre for the Study of Japanese Religions at the School of Oriental and African Studies of the University of London from 2000 to 2001 and since November 2001, an associate professor at the University of Tokyo. His research interests include Shugendō, Japanese combinatorial religion, religious art, and gender and religion.

Shugendō

Leah Shaw. Leah Shaw is a graduate of Truman State University in Kirksville, Missouri. She is currently attending graduate school at the University of Missouri at Kansas City where she is working toward a M.S.W. in social work.

Church Universal and Triumphant

Michael Shermer. Michael Shermer is the founder and publisher of SKEPTIC magazine, director of the Skeptics Society, and a contributing editor and monthly columnist for Scientific American. He is the author of Why People Believe Weird Things (W.H. Freeman, 1997), How We Believe: The Search for God in an Age of Science (W.H.

Freeman, 1999), Denying History : Who Says the Holocaust Never Happened and Why Do They Say It? (with Alex Grobman; University of California Press, 2000), The Borderlands of Science (Oxford University Press, 2001), and In Darwin's Shadow: The Life and Science of Alfred Russell Wallace (Oxford University Press, 2002).

Agnosticism

Steven L. Shields. Steven L. Shields is the founder of Restoration Research, an organization focusing research in the many splinters of the Latter-day Saints community, and is the author of Divergent Paths of the Restoration (Restoration Research, 1980).

Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints

Larry Dwight Shinn. Larry Dwight Shinn is currently President of Berea College, a liberal arts college in Berea, Kentucky that is dedicated to serving the Appalachian region. He received his Ph.D. in history of religions from Princeton University, taught at Oberlin College for fourteen years, and served as Dean and Vice President at Bucknell University for ten years. He has authored two books: Two Sacred Worlds: Experience and Structure in the World Religions (Abingdon, 1977) and The Dark Lord: Cult Images and the Hare Krishnas in America (Westminster John Knox Press, 1987), has coauthored and edited four other books, and has written more than twenty published articles.

International Society for Krishna Consciousness

Marat S. Shterin. Marat S. Shterin received his Ph.D. in sociology from the London School of Economics and Political Science, where he is currently a research fellow. He has published a number of articles both in Russia and in the West on various aspects of religion in Russia, including religion and modernization, religions of ethnic minorities, new religious movements, and religion and law.

Great White Brotherhood (Russia/Ukraine)
 Mother of God Centre (Orthodox Church of Mother of God "Majestic")
 Russia
 Russia, Ethnic Minority Religion in
 White Brotherhood

Elijah Siegler. Elijah Siegler received his B.A. from Harvard University and his M.A. from the University of California at Santa Barbara, both in religious studies. He is currently completing his doctorate at UCSB, writing on the history and practice of Daoism in America. His published works include articles on religion on television police dramas and on New Age channeling groups.

Chinese Daoist Association
 Chinese Religions
 Daoism
 Healing Tao
 Quanzhen Daoism
 Taoist Tai Chi Society
 Zhengyi Daoism

Karl Sigurbjörnsson. The Most Reverent Karl Sigurbjörnsson became the Lutheran Bishop of Iceland in 1998. Prior to that time he was Pastor of Hallgrímskirkja, Reykjavík. Born in 1947, he served in the parish ministry in Iceland from 1973 to 1997. He is the author and translator of several books on the subject of prayer and pastoral care. In 2000, he was awarded an honorary decree in theology by the Faculty of Theology at the University of Iceland.

Evangelical Lutheran Church in Iceland

Pataraporn Sirikanchana. Pataraporn Sirikanchana holds a Ph.D. in religious studies from the University of Pennsylvania and presently works as chairperson of the Department of Philosophy at Thammasat University, as an advisor for the World Fellowship of Buddhists, and as board member of the Thai Royal Academy. Her publications include Fundamental Knowledge of Religion and articles on religion and philosophy both in Thai and in English.

Buddhist Association of Thailand under Royal Patronage
 Dhammakaya Foundation
 The Santi Asoka
 Thailand
 World Fellowship of Buddhists

Jaroslav Z. Skira. Jaroslav Z. Skira is an assistant professor of historical theology and Director of the Eastern Christian Studies Program at Regis College, University of Toronto, Canada.

Roman Catholic Church

Margareta Skog. Margareta Skog, M.A., is a researcher on the sociology of religion at the Church of Sweden in Uppsala, Sweden. Her studies comprise religious communities beside the Church of Sweden, as the Free Churches, immigrant religions, new religions, and new religiosity.

Sweden

Pedro Soares. Pedro Soares is a social psychologist whose research has focused on minority and messianic religious movements in Portugal. He is the coeditor of The Experience of the Sacred (Hugin, 1998) and Science and the Primacy of Consciousness (Noetic Press, 2000).

Lusitanian Church (Lusitanian Catholic Apostolic Evangelical Church)
Portugal

Marika Speckmann. Marika Speckmann received her M.A. degree in study of religions, ethnology, and archaeology at the Philipps Universität Marburg in 1998. Most recently, she has worked in completing her doctoral dissertation concerned with Native American mythology and its meaning for non-American Indian (industrial) cultures.

Native American Church

Michelle Spuler. Michelle Spuler holds a Ph.D. in the study of religions from the University of Queensland in Australia. She has been an assistant professor in New Zealand and the United States and currently lives in London. Her areas of research cover Buddhism in the West, New Age, and new religious movements. She recently published a study on the Diamond Sangha in Australia and compiled Buddhism in Australia: A Bibliography published by the Australian Association for the Study of Religion (posted at <http://www.aasr.org.au/aasr/internet.htm>).

Diamond Sangha
New Zealand
Sanbō Kyōdan
Zen Buddhism

Paul Stange. Paul Stange is a senior lecturer in Asian studies at Murdoch University in Perth, Australia, where he has been based since 1980. His Ph.D. in history is from the University of Wisconsin at Madison. He has also worked at Curtin University in Perth and at Satyawacana University, the University of Malang, and Gadjah Mada University in Indonesia. He contributed a chapter to the Cambridge History of Southeast Asia (Cambridge University Press, 1999) as well as other essays to scholarly journals and books.

Javanism
Pangestu
Sapta Darma
Sumarah

Stephen J. Stein. Stephen J. Stein is Chancellors' Professor of Religious Studies and Adjunct Professor of History at Indiana University in Bloomington. His research interests center on eighteenth-century American intellectual history and on dissenting religious communities throughout American history. He is author of the definitive study The Shaker Experience in America: A History of the United Society of Believers (Yale University Press, 1992).

United Society of Believers in Christ's Second Appearing (Shakers)

H. Christina Steyn. Dr. H. Christina Steyn is Senior Lecturer in the Department of Religious Studies at the University of South Africa where she specializes in new and alternative religious movements.

South Africa

Robert Stockman. Robert Stockman has a doctorate in history of religion in the United States from Harvard University. He is the author of The Bahá'í Faith in America, I (Bahá'í Publishing Trust, 1985) and The Bahá'í Faith in America, II (George Ronald, 1994), Thornton Chase: The First American Bahá'í (Bahá'í Publishing Trust, 2002), as well as various articles about Bahá'í history and theology. Currently he is Coordinator of the Institute for Bahá'í Studies in Evanston, Illinois, as well as an instructor in religious studies at DePaul University.

Bahá'í Faith

Martin Stuart-Fox. Martin Stuart-Fox is Professor and Head of History at the University of Queensland, Australia. His publications include A History of Laos (Cambridge University Press, 1997), The Murderous Revolution: Life & Death in Pol Pot's Kampuchea (3d. ed., Orchid Press, 1998), and (with R. S. Bucknell) The Twilight Language: Explorations in Buddhist Meditation and Symbolism (St. Martin's Press, 1986).

Lao Buddhist Sangha
Laos

William H. Swatos Jr. William H. Swatos Jr. is Executive Officer of the Association for the Sociology of Religion and of the Religious Research Association. He received his Ph.D. in sociology from the University of Kentucky and was named a distinguished alumnus of that department in 1989. With Loftur Reimar Gissurarson, he is the author of Icelandic Spiritualism: Mediumship and Modernity (Transaction, 1996).

Iceland

Vinson Synan. Vinson Synan, Ph.D., is Dean of the School of Divinity at Regent University in Virginia Beach, Virginia. He is author of fourteen books on Pentecostalism and the Charismatic renewal. His major works include his dissertation, "Holiness Pentecostal Movement," which he wrote in 1967 while attending the University of Georgia. He also wrote The Century of the Holy Spirit (Thomas Nelson, 2001).

Yoido Full Gospel Church

Martin Tamcke. Martin Tamcke holds a Ph.D. in theology and did post-graduate studies on the history of Eastern Christianity. He is Professor for Ecumenical Theology at the University of Göttingen in Germany and Director of the Institute for the History of Oriental Churches and Missions. His studies focus on the past and present of Asian churches.

Syrian Orthodox Church of Malabar

Francesca Tarocco. Francesca Tarocco lectures on Chinese religions at the Department of the Study of Religions at the School of Oriental and African Studies (SOAS) at the University of London, and on Buddhism at Manchester University. Her research interests include Buddhist apocrypha, Buddhist religious practice in East Asia, and the intellectual history of modern Chinese Buddhism.

Chinese Buddhist Association

Gordon Taylor. Gordon Taylor graduated from the University of London in 1972. He served on the staff of the Greater London Council from 1965 to 1986 prior to moving to the international headquarters of The Salvation Army as a researcher in the Literary Department, a position he held from 1986 to 1988. He became a senior researcher at the Army's International Heritage Centre from 1988 to 1997 and since 1997 has been the archivist. He is the author of the Companion to the Song Book of The Salvation Army (The Salvation Army International Headquarters, 1989).

The Salvation Army

Gene R. Thursby. Gene R. Thursby is an associate professor of religion with the Department of Religion at the University of Florida. He is the author of Hindu-Muslim Relations in British India (Brill, 1975) and The Sikhs (Brill, 1992). He maintains the Internet site for the New Religious Movements Group of the American Academy of Religion.

Siddha Yoga

Donald Tinder. Donald Tinder earned his Ph.D. from Yale. He served in various ministries in America while he was a preacher among Brethren. He and his wife went to Europe in 1988 as Brethren missionaries, where he has been serving as a professor at both Tyndale Seminary in Amsterdam and the Evangelical Theological Faculty in Louven, Belgium.

Christian Brethren

Péter Török. Péter Török received his Ph.D. from the University of Toronto. His research interests include church-state relationships and new religious movements. He is a research fellow of the Department for the Studies of Religions at the University of Szeged in Hungary and the leader of the Hungarian Center for Information on Religions.

Hungary

Frank Usarski. Frank Usarski, Ph.D., lectured on religionswissenschaft (comparative religion) at the universities of Hannover, Oldenburg, Bremen, Erfurt, Chemnitz, and Leipzig, between 1988 and 1997. Since 1998, he has been Professor at the Pontifical Catholic University of São Paulo, Brazil.

Brazil

Candomblé

Spiritism

Umbanda

Gerard van't Spijker. Dr. Gerard van't Spijker earned his Ph.D. in 1990 from the Free University of Amsterdam, the Netherlands. He was the Theological Advisor of the Presbyterian Church in Rwanda from 1973 to 1982, and from 1995 to 1999 the coordinator of the Ecumenical Center for Theological Education and Research in Butare, Rwanda. He is currently research fellow of the Interuniversity Institute for Missiological and Ecumenical Research, at the University of Utrecht, the Netherlands.

Rwanda

Carmen Voigt-Graf. Having completed an M.A. in geography at the Free University in Berlin, Carmen Voigt-Graf is currently working on her Ph.D. in geography at the University of Sydney. Her research interests concern diasporas and transnational communities, in particular the Indian diaspora in Australia, Fiji, and East Africa.

Fiji Islands, Hindu Community of the Melitta Waligora. Melitta Waligora is a member of the staff of the Seminar for History and Society of South Asia at the Humboldt University of Berlin, Germany. Her teaching and research focus includes Indian modern philosophy, Bengal Renaissance, and gender studies.

Sri Aurobindo Ashram

Graham B. Walker Jr. Graham B. Walker Jr. holds a Ph.D. degree in Theology from the Southern Baptist Theological Seminary and serves as the Associate Dean of the McAfee School of Theology at Mercer University. For more than eighteen years he lived and taught in Southeast Asia. He has authored numerous articles and edited journals related to Filipino religious experience. He is contributor and editor of Human Fault and Cosmic Fault Lines: Southeast Asian Portraits of Evil (Mercer University Press, forthcoming). Walker's current research focuses on the South Asian ritual of Thaipusam.

Philippines

Morten Warmind. Morten Warmind is an assistant professor and sociologist of religion with the Department of the History of Religions of the University of Copenhagen, Denmark. He specializes in the study of Celtic and old Norse religion.

Denmark

Helen Waterhouse. Helen Waterhouse is a lecturer in religious studies at the Open University in the United Kingdom. Her publications include Buddhism in Bath: Authority and Adaptation (University of Leeds, 1998) and her chief research interests are British Buddhism, reincarnation belief in the West, and religious practice in locality.

New Kadampa Tradition

Irving A. Whitt. Irving A. Whitt served as a missionary in Kenya from 1970 to 1980. He later chaired the Missions Department at Eastern Pentecostal Bible College in Canada from 1984 to 1991 and chaired the Missions Department at Tyndale Seminary in Toronto from 1991 to 2000. In 2000 he assumed the position of Missions Education Coordinator with the Pentecostal Assemblies of Canada. His masters and doctoral studies were completed in missions at Fuller Theological Seminary.

Pentecostal Assemblies of Canada

Donald Wiebe. Donald Wiebe is a professor of religious studies at Trinity College, University of Toronto. He has taken a primary interest in the problems of the academic and scientific study of religion, and method and theory in the study of religion. He is the author of Religion and Truth: Towards and Alternative Paradigm for the Study of Religion (Mouton De Gruyter, 1981), The Irony of Theology and the Nature of Religious Thought (McGill-Queens University Press, 1991), Beyond Legitimation: Essays on the Problem of Religious Knowledge (Palgrave, 1994), and The Politics of Religious Studies: The Continuing Conflict with Theology in the Academy (Palgrave, 1999). In 1985, with Luther H. Martin and E. Thomas Lawson, he co-founded the North American Association for the Study of Religion and has twice served as President of that Association—from 1986 to 1987 and from 1991 to 1992.

Introductory essay

Duncan Williams. Duncan Williams is an assistant professor of East Asian Buddhism at the University of California at Irvine. He is the editor of American Buddhism: Methods and Findings in Recent Scholarship (Curzon Press, 1999) and author of The Other Side of Zen: A Social and Institutional History of Soto Zen Buddhism in Tokugawa Japan (Princeton University Press, forthcoming).

Soto Zen Buddhism

Raymond B. Williams. Raymond B. Williams is Professor of Religion at Wabash College and Director of the Wabash Center for Teaching and Learning in Theology and Religion. He is founding editor of the journal Teaching Theology and Religion. His most recent book is An Introduction to Swaminarayan Hinduism (Cambridge University Press, 2000).

Swaminarayan Hinduism

Jane Williams-Hogan. Jane Williams-Hogan earned her Ph.D. from the University of Pennsylvania. She is a professor of sociology and holds the Carpenter Chair in the history of religion at Bryn Athyn College in Bryn Athyn, Pennsylvania. She is the author of a number of articles on Emanuel Swedenborg and a forthcoming book Swedenborg e gli swedenborgiani in a series entitled "Religioni e Movimenti" (Elledici, 2003).

The General Church of the New Jerusalem
Swedenborgian Church of North America
Swedenborgian Movement

Robert S. Wilson. Robert S. Wilson received his Ph.D. in British history from the University of Guelph in 1973. He served as the academic Dean and Professor of History at Atlantic Baptist University in Moncton, New Brunswick from 1971 to 1991, and as Professor of Church History at Acadia Divinity College since 1991. He is the chair of the Atlantic Baptist Heritage Series Editorial Committee.

Canadian Baptist Ministries
Union d'Églises Baptistes Françaises au Canada

Robert Winterhalter. Robert Winterhalter is President of the Society for the Study of Metaphysical Religion. An ordained minister of Divine Science and Unity, he is on the faculty of the Emma Curtis Hopkins College and Theological Seminary in Clearwater, Florida, where he teaches in the External Degree Program, specializing in biblical studies.

Divine Science Federation/United Divine Science
Ministries, International

Ali Yaman. Ali Yaman got his M.A. in political history from the Institute of Social Sciences at Istanbul University. His M.A. thesis was on the institution of Dede and its functions in Alevism and he is now continuing his studies on changing Alevism for a doctorate degree at Istanbul University.

Alevism (Turkish Alevi)

Ahmad F. Yousif. Ahmad F. Yousif is an associate professor at the Department of Usuluddin at the University of Brunei Darussalam. He also taught at the International Islamic University Malaysia and the University of Ottawa where he completed his M.A. and Ph.D. degrees at the Department of Religious Studies. Dr. Yousif has published a number of articles in international journals, in addition to his two books, Islamic Identity in the Canadian Society (LEGAS,1993) and Religious Freedom, Minorities and Islam: An Inquiry into the Malaysia Experience (Thinker's Library,1998).

Brunei
Brunei, Islam in

Andrij Yurash. Andrij Yurash received his Ph.D in political science from the Ivan Franko L'viv National University and L'viv Theological Academy in the Ukraine. He is a member of the International Study of Religion in Eastern and Central Europe Association and the American Academy of Religion.

Ukraine
Ukraine, Eastern Orthodoxy in

PierLuigi Zoccatelli. PierLuigi Zoccatelli was born in Verona, Italy in 1965, and currently works in Turin as Vice Director of CESNUR, the Center for Studies on New Religions. He is also a member of SIPR (the Italian Society for the Psychology of Religion). He is the author of several articles and four books on new religious movements and Western esotericism, subjects on which he has lectured extensively in Italian and international academic and non-academic settings. He authored Il New Age (Elledici, 1997) and was an associate editor of the monumental Enciclopedia delle religioni in Italia (Encyclopedia of Religions in Italy; Elledici, 2001).

Army of Mary [Armée de Marie]
Church of the Kingdom of God
Damanhur
Evangelical Baptist Union of Italy (UCEBI)
Evangelical Methodist Church of Italy
Fraternity/Society of Saint Pius X
Gnostic Churches (Doinel)
Gnostic Movement (Samael Aun Weor)
The Grail Movement
Healing Tao
Iglesia ni Cristo [Church of Christ]
Italian Assemblies of God [Assemblee di Dio in Italia]
Lectorium Rosicrucianum
Martinism
Mazdaznan
New Apostolic Church
O.T.O. (Ordo Templi Orientis)
People of God (Paraguay)

Seventh Day Adventist Reform Movement
Shri Ram Chandra Mission
Spiritual HumanYoga/Mankind Enlightenment
Love
Universal Church of the Kingdom of God [Igreja
Universal do Reino de Deus]
Universal Life [Universelles Leben]
Universal Soul
Waldensian Church

Robert J. Zydenbos. Robert J. Zydenbos is Professor of Indology at the University of Munich, Germany, and has previously held Indological teaching positions at universities in Heidelberg, Madras, and Toronto. His main research interests are Kannada language and literature, and the religious traditions of Karnataka, particularly Jainism, Madhva Vaisnavism, and Virasaivism.

Virasaivism

A-Z LIST OF ENTRIES

Volume I

- Aboriginal Cult of Maria Lionza
Aboriginal Religions
Adidam
Adventism
Afghanistan
Africa Inland Church
African Apostolic Church of Johane Marange
African Brotherhood Church
African Christian Church and Schools
African Church of the Holy Spirit
African Independent Pentecostal Church of Africa
African Initiated Churches
African Israel Church, Nineveh
African Methodist Episcopal Church
African Methodist Episcopal Zion Church
African Orthodox Church
African Protestant Church
Agnosticism
Agonshū
Ahmadiyya Anjuman Ishaat Islam, Lahore
Ahmadiyya Movement in Islam
Al Qaeda
Aladura Churches
Albania
Albania, Orthodox Autocephalous Church of Alevism (Turkish Alevi)
Algeria
All Ceylon Buddhist Congress
Alliance World Fellowship
Ambedkar Buddhism
American Atheists
American Baptist Association
American Baptist Churches in the U.S.A.
American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions
American Samoa
Amish
Ananda Marga Yoga Society
Ancient and Mystical Order Rosae Crucis
Ancient Church of the East
Andhra Evangelical Lutheran Church
Andorra
Anglican Church in Aotearoa, New Zealand, and Polynesia
Anglican Church of Australia
Anglican Church of Canada
Anglican Church of Hong Kong and Macao
Anglican Church of Korea
Anglican Communion/Anglican Consultative Council
Anglican Province of the Southern Cone of America
Angola
Anguilla
Antarctica
Anthroposophical Society
Antigua
Apostles of Infinite Love
Apostolic Assembly of Faith in Jesus Christ [Asamblea Apostólica de la Fe en Cristo Jesús]
Apostolic Catholic Assyrian Church of the East
Apostolic Church
Apostolic Church of Faith in Jesus Christ [Iglesia Apostólica de la Fe en Cristo Jesús] (Mexico)
Apostolic Faith
Apostolic Faith Mission (Portland, Oregon)
Apostolic Faith Mission of South Africa
Apostolic Sabbath Church of God
Apostolic World Christian Fellowship
Arcane School
Arès Pilgrims
Argentina
Armenia
Armenian Apostolic Church (Holy See of Echmiadzin)
Armenian Apostolic Church (See of the Great House of Cilicia)
Armenian Catholic Church
Army of Mary [Armée de Marie]

- Arsha Vidya Gurukulam
 Art of Living Foundation
 Aruba
 Arya Samaj
 Assemblies of God
 Assemblies of God in Brazil
 Assemblies of God in Great Britain and Ireland
 Assemblies of Yahweh
 Associated Churches of Christ in New Zealand
 Association for Research and Enlightenment
 Association of German Mennonite Congregations
 Atheism
 Aum Shinrikyō/Aleph
 Aumist Religion
 Australia
 Austria
 Austrian Buddhist Association
 Azerbaijan
 Bahá'í Faith
 Bahamas
 Bahamas National Baptist Missionary and Education Convention
 Bahrain
 Bangladesh
 Bangladesh Baptist Sangha
 Baptist Association of El Salvador
 Baptist Bible Fellowship International
 Baptist Convention of Hong Kong
 Baptist Convention of Kenya
 Baptist Convention of Nicaragua
 Baptist Convention of Western Cuba
 Baptist Union of Denmark
 Baptist Union of Great Britain
 Baptist Union of Hungary
 Baptist Union of New Zealand
 Baptist Union of South Africa/Baptist Convention of South Africa
 Baptist World Alliance
 Baptists
 Barbados
 Basel Mission
 Batak Christian Community Church (GPKB)
 Bektashis (Bektashiye)
 Belarus
 Belgium
 Belize
 Bene Israel
 Benedictines
 Benin
 Bermuda
 Beta Israel
 Bhutan
 Bible Sabbath Association
 Bohras (Islam)
 Bolivia
 Bolivian Evangelical Lutheran Church
 Bon Religion
 Bosnia and Herzegovina
 Botswana
 Brahma Kumaris
 Brahmo Samaj
 Branch Davidians
 Branham Tabernacle and Related Assemblies
 Brazil
 Brethren
 Brethren in Christ
 British Forest Sangha
 British Indian Ocean Territory
 British Israelism
 British Virgin Islands
 Brotherhood of the Cross and Star
 The Bruderhof
 Brunei
 Brunei, Islam in Buddhasasananuggaha Association (Venerable Mahasi Sayadaw)
 Buddhism
 Buddhist Association of Thailand under Royal Patronage
 Buddhist Association of the Republic of China
 The Buddhist Compassion Relief Tzu Chi
 Association
 Buddhist Institute (Cambodia)
 Buddhist Missionary Society Malaysia
 The Buddhist Society
 Builders of the Adytum
 Bulgaria
 Bulgarian Catholic Church
 Bulgarian Orthodox Church
 Burkina Faso
 Burundi
 Bwiti
 Byakkō Shinkō Kai
 Cambodia
 Cameroon
 Cameroon Baptist Convention

- Canada
 Canadian Baptist Ministries
 Canadian Yearly Meeting of the Religious Society of Friends
 Candomblé
 Caodaism
 Cape Verde Islands
 Catholic Apostolic Church
 Catholic Diocese of the Old Catholics in Germany
 Cayman Islands
 CBAmerica
 Celestial Church of Christ
 Central African Republic
 Chad
 Chaldean Catholic Church
 Channel Islands
 Charismatic Movement
 Chen Tao
 Cherubim and Seraphim/Eternal Sacred Order of the Cherubim and Seraphim
 Chile
 China
 China: Hong Kong
 China: Macao
 China: Taiwan
 China: Tibet
 China Islamic Association
 Chinese Buddhist Association
 Chinese Catholic Patriotic Association
 Chinese Daoist Association
 Chinese Protestant Three-Self Patriotic Movement Committee
 Chinese Religions
 Chistiniyya Sufi Order (Cishtiya)
 Chogye Order (Chogye-Jong)
 Chondogyo
 Christ Apostolic Church
 Christian and Missionary Alliance
 Christian Brethren
 Christian Church (Disciples of Christ)
 Christian Church (Disciples of Christ) in Canada
 Christian Church in Central Sulawesi
 Christian Church in East Timor (GKTT)
 Christian Church in South Sulawesi (GKSS)
 Christian Churches and Churches of Christ
 Christian Churches of Java (GKJ)
 Christian Community
 Christian Congregation of Brazil
 Christian Evangelical Church in Bolaang Mongondow (GMIBM)
 Christian Evangelical Church in Halmahera (GMIH)
 Christian Evangelical Church in Minahasa (GMIM)
 Christian Evangelical Church in Timor (GMIT)
 Christian Holiness Partnership
 Christian Life Churches International
 Christian Methodist Episcopal Church
 Christian Outreach Centre
 Christian Protestant Church in Indonesia (GKPI)
 Christian Reformed Church in North America
 Christian Service Society
 Christianity
 Christmas Island
 Church in the Province of Kenya
 Church in the Province of Melanesia
 Church in the Province of Nigeria
 Church in the Province of Rwanda
 Church in the Province of South Africa
 Church in the Province of Sudan
 Church in the Province of Tanzania
 Church in the Province of the West Indies
 Church in the Province of West Africa
 Church in Wales
 Church Missionary Society
 Church of Bangladesh
 Church of Central Africa Presbyterian (General Synod)
 Church of Christ in Thailand
 Church of Christ in the Congo–Baptist Community of the Congo River
 Church of Christ in the Congo–Baptist Community of the Western Congo
 Church of Christ in the Congo–Community of Baptist Churches in the Eastern Congo
 Church of Christ in the Congo–Community of Disciples of Christ
 Church of Christ in the Congo–Community of Light
 Church of Christ in the Congo–Community of Presbyterians
 Church of Christ in the Congo–Episcopal Baptist Community of Africa
 Church of Christ in the Congo–Evangelical Community
 Church of Christ in the Congo–Mennonite Community
 Church of Christ in the Congo–Presbyterian Community of Kinshasa
 Church of Christ of the Congo–Province of the Anglican Church of the Congo
 Church of Christ, Scientist

Church of England
 Church of God (Anderson, Indiana)
 Church of God (Cleveland, Tennessee)
 Church of God in Christ
 Church of God, International (plus Churches of God
 Outreach Ministries, Intercontinental Church of God)
 Church of God of Prophecy
 Church of Ireland
 Church of Jesus Christ in Madagascar
 Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints
 Church of Moshoeshoe (Lesotho)
 Church of North India
 Church of Norway
 Church of Pakistan
 Church of Pentecost
 Church of Satan
 Church of Scientology
 Church of Scotland
 Church of South India
 Church of Sri Lanka
 Church of Sweden
 Church of the Augsburg Confession of Alsace and Lorraine
 Church of the Brethren
 Church of the Brethren in Nigeria
 Church of the Disciples of Christ
 Church of the Kingdom of God
 Church of the Lamb of God
 Church of the Lord (Aladura)
 Church of the Lord Jesus Christ of the Apostolic Faith
 Church of the Nazarene
 Church of the Province of Burundi
 Church of the Province of Central Africa
 Church of the Province of Myanmar
 Church of the Province of Southeast Asia
 Church of the Province of the Indian Ocean
 Church of the Province of Uganda
 Church of the White Eagle Lodge
 Church of Tuvalu
 Church Universal and Triumphant
 Churches of Christ (Non-Instrumental)
 Circle Sanctuary
 The Clan of Ausrans (Poland)
 Cocos Islands
 Colombia
 Comoros
 Congo (Brazzaville), Republic of the

Congo (Zaire), Democratic Republic of the Congregational Christian Church in Samoa
 Congregational Christian Church of American Samoa
 Congregationalism
 Conservative Judaism
 Convention Baptiste de' Haiti
 Convention of Philippine Baptist Churches
 Cook Islands
 Cook Islands Christian Church
 Cooperative Baptist Fellowship
 Coptic Catholic Church
 Coptic Orthodox Church
 Costa Rica
 Council for a Parliament of the World's Religions
 Council for Secular Humanism
 Council of Baptist Churches in North East India
A Course in Miracles
 Covenant of the Goddess
 Croatia
 Cuba
 Cumberland Presbyterian Church
 Cyprus
 Czech Republic
 Czechoslovak Hussite Church

Volume 2

DahnHak
 Damanhur
 Daoism
 Deeper Life Bible Church (Nigeria)
 Deima Church [Église Déimatiste]
 Denmark
 Dhammakaya Foundation
 The Dharma Drum Mountain Association (Fakushan)
 Diamond Sangha
 Diamond Way Buddhism
 Divine Life Society
 Divine Science Federation/United Divine Science
 Ministries, International
 Djibouti
 Dogon Religion
 Dominica
 Dominican Republic
 Dominicans
 Doukhobors
 Druidism
 Druze

- Dutch Reformed Church (South Africa)
 East Africa Yearly Meeting of Friends (South)
 East Java Christian Church (GKJW)
 Eastern Orthodoxy
 ECKANKAR
 Ecuador
 Ecumenical Patriarchate/Patriarchate of Constantinople
 Églises Baptiste de la RCA
 Egypt
 Ekalesia Niue
 El Salvador
 Elan Vital/Divine Light Mission
 Elim Pentecostal Church
 The Emmissaries
 Ennōkyō
 Episcopal Anglican Church of Brazil
 Episcopal Church
 Episcopal Church in Jerusalem and the Middle East
 Episcopal Church in the Philippines
 Equatorial Guinea
 Eritrea
 Espiritismo
 Estonia
 Estonian Apostolic Orthodox Church/Estonian
 Orthodox Church (Moscow Patriarchate)
 Estonian Evangelical Lutheran Church
 Estonian Evangelical Lutheran Church Abroad
 Ethiopia
 Ethiopian Catholic Church
 Ethiopian Evangelical Church Mekane Yesus
 Ethiopian Orthodox Tewahedo Church
 Ethiopian Zion Coptic Church
 Ethnoreligions
 European Buddhist Union
 Evangelical Baptist Union of Italy (UCEBI)
 Evangelical Christian Church in Irian Jaya (GKI)
 Evangelical Church in Chile
 Evangelical Church in Germany
 Evangelical Church in Kalimantan (GKE)
 Evangelical Church in New Caledonia and the Loyalty Islands
 Evangelical Church of Cameroon
 Evangelical Church of Chad Evangelical Church of French Polynesia
 Evangelical Church of Gabon
 Evangelical Church of the Augsburg and Helvetic
 Confessions in Austria
 Evangelical Church of the Augsburg Confession in Romania
 Evangelical Church of the Augsburg Confession in the Slovak Republic
 Evangelical Church of the Augsburg Confession
 (Poland)
 Evangelical Church of the Congo
 Evangelical Church of the Czech Brethren
 [Ceskobratrská církev evangelická]
 Evangelical Church of the Lutheran Confession in Brazil
 Evangelical Church of the River Plate
 Evangelical Church of the West Indies
 Evangelical Church of Togo
 Evangelical Church of West Africa
 Evangelical Church–Synod of the Nile
 Evangelical Churches of Vietnam
 Evangelical Congregational Church in Angola
 Evangelical Covenant Church
 Evangelical Free Church of America
 Evangelical Friends International Evangelical Lutheran Church in America
 Evangelical Lutheran Church in Canada
 Evangelical Lutheran Church in Congo
 Evangelical Lutheran Church in Denmark
 Evangelical Lutheran Church in Iceland
 Evangelical Lutheran Church in Kenya
 Evangelical Lutheran Church in Namibia
 Evangelical Lutheran Church in Southern Africa
 Evangelical Lutheran Church in Tanzania
 Evangelical Lutheran Church in the Kingdom of the Netherlands
 Evangelical Lutheran Church in Zimbabwe
 Evangelical Lutheran Church of Finland
 Evangelical Lutheran Church of France
 Evangelical Lutheran Church of Lithuania/Lithuanian
 Evangelical Lutheran Church in Diaspora
 Evangelical Lutheran Church of Papua New Guinea
 Evangelical Lutheran Free Church of Norway
 Evangelical Mennonite Conference (Canada)
 Evangelical Methodist Church in the Philippine Islands
 Evangelical Methodist Church of Argentina
 Evangelical Methodist Church of Bolivia
 Evangelical Methodist Church of Costa Rica
 Evangelical Methodist Church of Italy
 Evangelical Methodist Church of Uruguay
 Evangelical Mission of South Haiti
 Evangelical Presbyterian Church, Ghana
 Evangelical Presbyterian Church in South Africa

- Evangelical Presbyterian Church of Portugal
 Evangelical Presbyterian Church of Togo
 Evangelical Reformed Church of Angola Evangelical Synodal Presbyterial Church of the Augsburg Confession in Romania
 Faeroe Islands
 Falkland Islands/Malvinas Islands
 Falun Gong (Falun Dafa)
 The Family/Children of God
 Fatima (Portugal)
 Federation of Swiss Protestant Churches
 Fellowship of Irian Jaya Baptist Churches
 Fellowship of Isis
 Fiji Islands
 Fiji Islands, Hindu Community of the Finland
 Finnish Orthodox Church
 Foguangshan
 Foundation for the Preservation of the Mahayana
 Tradition
 France
 Franciscans
 Fraternité Blanche Universelle
 Fraternity/Society of Saint Pius X
 Free Churches
 Free Methodist Church of North America
 Free Wesleyan Church of Tonga Freemasonry
 Freethought
 French Guiana
 French Polynesia
 Friends General Conference
 Friends/Quakers
 Friends United Meeting
 Friends World Committee for Consultation
 Gabon
 Gambia
 Gardnerian Wicca
 Garífuna Religion
 Gaudiya Math
 Gedatsu Kai
 Gelukpa Tibetan Buddhism
 General Baptist Evangelical Convention of Egypt
 The General Church of the New Jerusalem
 Georgia
 Georgian Orthodox Church
 German Buddhist Union
 Germany, Hinduism in Germany, Islam in Ghana
 Gibraltar
 Gnostic Catholic Church
 Gnostic Churches (Doinel)
 Gnostic Movement (Samael Aun Weor)
 Gnosticism
 Goddess Spirituality
 The Grail Movement
 Great White Brotherhood (Russia/Ukraine)
 Greece
 Greek Catholic Church
 Greek Evangelical Church
 Greek Orthodox Patriarchate of Alexandria and All Africa
 Greek Orthodox Patriarchate of Antioch and All the East
 Greek Orthodox Patriarchate of Jerusalem
 Greenland
 Guadeloupe
 Guam
 Guatemala
 Guinea
 Guinea-Bissau
 The Gurdjieff Foundations
 Gush Emumin
 Guyana
 Haiti
 Hanafite School of Islam
 Hanbalite School of Islam
 Harrist Church [Église Harriste] (Ivory Coast)
 Hassidism
 Healing Tao
 Hinduism
 His Highness Prince Aga Khan Shia Imami Ismaili Council
 Hoa Hao Buddhism
 Holiness Movement
 Holy Catholic Church in Japan
 Holy Ghost Fathers
 Holy Orthodox Church in Japan
 Honduras
 The Hong Kong Council of the Church of Christ in China
 Honmichi [Original Way]
 Hossōshū
 Human-Etisk Forbund i Norge

- Humanism
Hungary
Hutterites
I AM Religious Activity (Saint Germain Foundation)
Ibadhi Islam
Iceland
Iglesia ni Cristo [Church of Christ]
Independent Church of Australia
India, Hinduism in
India, Religion in Contemporary
Indian Pentecostal Church of God
Indonesia
Indonesia, Buddhism in Indonesia, Confucianism in Indonesia, Hinduism in
Indonesian Christian Church (HKI)
Indonesian Gospel Tabernacle Church (GKII)
Initiatives for Change/Moral Re-Armament
Insight Meditation Society
Integral Yoga International
International Association for Religious Freedom
International Association of Reformed and Presbyterian Churches
International Church of the Foursquare Gospel
International Churches of Christ
International Coalition for Religious Freedom
International Conference of Reformed Churches
International Congregational Fellowship
International Council of Christian Churches
International Council of Christians and Jews
International Council of Community Churches
International Council of Unitarians and Universalists
International Evangelical Church
International Evangelical Church, Soldiers of the Cross
International Federation of Free Evangelical Churches
International Federation of Secular Humanistic Jews
International Fellowship for Impersonal Enlightenment
International Humanist and Ethical Union
International Lutheran Council
International Meditation Centres [Sayagyi U Ba Khin]
International New Thought Alliance
International Old Catholic Bishops' Conference
International Pentecostal Church of Christ
International Pentecostal Holiness Church
International Society for Krishna Consciousness
International Yoga Fellowship Movement
International Zen Association
Inter-Religious Federation for World Peace
- Iran
Iraq
Ireland
Islam
Islamism
Isle of Man
Ismaili Islam
Israel
Italian Assemblies of God [Assemblee di Dio in Italia]
Italo-Albanian Catholic Church
Italy
Ivory Coast [Côte d'Ivoire]
Izumo Ōyashirokyō
Jainism
Jamaat-e-Islam
Jamaica
Jamaica Baptist Union
Japan
Japan Baptist Convention
Japan Buddhist Federation
Javanism
Jehovah's Witnesses
Jesuits
JeungSanDo
Jōdo-Shinshū [True Pure Land School]
Jōdo-Shū [Pure Land School]
Johnston Island
Jordan
Judaism
- Volume 3
- Kabbalah Learning Centre
Kagyupa Tibetan Buddhism
Kanaky
Karaites
Karma-Kagyupa Tibetan Buddhism
Karo Batak Protestant Church (GBKP)
Kashmir Saivism
Kazakhstan
Kenya
Kimbanguist Church (Congo)/Église de Jésus Christ sur la terre par le prophète Simon Kimbangu
Kiribati
Kiribati Protestant Church
Kōdō Kyōdan
Kōfuku no Kagaku [Institute for Research in Human Happiness]

- Kokuchū-Kai
 Konkōkyō [Golden Light Teachings]
 Korea, Democratic People’s Republic of (North Korea)
 Korea, Republic of (South Korea)
 Korean American Presbyterian Church
 Korean Christian Church in Japan
 Korean Methodist Church
 Krishnamurti Foundations
 Kurozumikyō
 Kuwait
 The Kwan Um School of Zen
 Kyrgyzstan
 The Lakota
 Lao Buddhist Sangha
 Laos
 Laos Evangelical Church
 Latvia
 Latvia, Paganism in
 Latvian Evangelical Lutheran Church
 Lebanon
 Lectorium Rosicrucianum
 Legion of Mary [Maria Legio] (Kenya)
 Lemba
 Lesotho
 Lesotho Evangelical Church
 Leuenberg Church Fellowship
 Liberal Catholic Church
 Liberia
 Liberia Baptist and Educational Convention
 Libya
 Liechtenstein
 Light of the World Church [Iglesia la Luz del Mundo]
 Lithuania
 Living Church of God
 The Local Church
 London Missionary Society
 Lubavitch Hassidism
 Lusitanian Church (Lusitanian Catholic Apostolic Evangelical Church)
 Lutheran Church–Canada
 Lutheran Church in Hungary
 Lutheran Church in Liberia
 Lutheran Church–Missouri Synod
 Lutheran World Federation
 Lutheranism
 Luxembourg
 Macedonia
 Madagascar
 Maha Bodhi Society
 Mahayana Buddhism
 Mai Chaza Church/City of Jehovah
 Malagasy Lutheran Church
 Malankara Orthodox Syrian Church
 Malawi
 Malaysia
 Malaysia, Islam in
 The Maldives
 Mali
 Malikite School of Islam
 Malta
 Manavta Mandir
 Mandaean
 Maori Religion
 Mar Thoma Syrian Church of Malabar
 Marian Devotion, World Network of Maronite Catholic Church
 Marshall Islands
 Martinique
 Martinism
 Master Ching Hai Meditation Association
 Mata Amritanandamayi Math
 Mauritania
 Mauritius
 Mayotte
 Mazdaznan
 Medjugorje (Bosnia-Herzegovina)
 Meher Baba, Friends of Melkite Catholic Church
 Mennonite Church
 Mennonite Church in the Netherlands
 Mennonite World Conference
 Mennonites
 Mennonites in Paraguay Methodism
 Methodist Church
 Methodist Church, Ghana
 Methodist Church in Brazil
 Methodist Church in Chile
 Methodist Church in Fiji and Rotuma
 Methodist Church in India Methodist Church in Ireland
 Methodist Church in Samoa
 Methodist Church in Singapore
 Methodist Church in the Caribbean and the Americas
 Methodist Church in the Union of Myanmar Methodist Church in Zimbabwe

- Methodist Church, Nigeria
 Methodist Church of Cuba
 Methodist Church of Kenya
 Methodist Church of Malaysia
 Methodist Church of Mexico
 Methodist Church of New Zealand
 Methodist Church of Peru
 Methodist Church of Sierra Leone
 Methodist Church of South Africa
 Methodist Church of Togo
 Methodist Church, Sri Lanka
 Methodist Church, Upper Myanmar
 Methodist Pentecostal Church of Chile
 Mevlevi Sufi Order
 Mexico
 Micronesia
 Midway
 Mission Covenant Church of Sweden
 Missionaries of Charity
 La Missione–Luigia Paparelli
 Mita Congregation
 Moldova
 Molokans
 Monaco
 Mongolia
 Montserrat
 Moravian Church, Eastern West Indies Province
 Moravian Church, European Continental Province of the Moravian Church in America
 Moravian Church in Great Britain and Ireland
 Moravian Church in Jamaica
 Moravian Church in Nicaragua
 Moravian Church in Southern Africa
 Moravian Church in Suriname
 Moravian Church in Tanzania
 Morocco
 Mother Meera, Disciples of
 Mother of God Centre (Orthodox Church of Mother of God “Majestic”)
 The Movement for the Restoration of the Ten Commandments
 Movement of Spiritual Inner Awareness
 Mozambique
 Mülheim Association of Christian Fellowships
 Murīdiyya
 Musama Disco Christo Church/Army of the Cross of the Christ Church Muslim Brotherhood
 Muslim World League
 Mutima Walowa Wa Mukumbi [Sweet Heart of the Clouds]
 Myanmar
 Myanmar Baptist Convention
 Myōchikai Kyōdan
 Namibia
 Naqshbandiya Sufi Order
 Nation of Islam (Farrakhan)
 Nation of Yahweh
 National Association of Congregational Christian Churches
 National Association of Free Will Baptists
 National Baptist Convention of America
 National Baptist Convention of Mexico
 National Baptist Convention, U.S.A.
 National Evangelical Synod of Syria/National Evangelical Union of Lebanon
 National Presbyterian Church in Mexico
 National Spiritualist Association of Churches
 Native American Church
 Native Baptist Church [Église Baptiste Camerounaise] (Cameroon)
 Nauru
 Nauru Congregational Church
 The Navajo
 Nazareth (Nazarite) Baptist Church/AmaNazaretha (South Africa)
 Nepal
 Nepal, Indigenous Religions in
 The Netherlands
 Netherlands Antilles
 Netherlands Reformed Church
 Netherlands Reformed Churches
 Neturei Karta
 New Acropolis Cultural Association [Asociación Cultural Nueva Acrópolis]
 New Age Movement
 New Apostolic Church
 New Kadampa Tradition
 New Zealand
 Newar Buddhism (Nepal)
 Nguzist Churches (Congo)
 Nicaragua
 Nichiren Shōshū
 Nichirenshū
 Niger

- Nigeria
 Nigerian Baptist Convention
 Nipponzan Myohoji
 Niue
 Nomiya Luo Church (Kenya)
 Northern Marianas
 Norway
 Norwegian Baptist Union
 Nyingma Tibetan Buddhism
 Old Believers (Russian Orthodox)
 Old Catholic Church in Switzerland [Christkatholische Kirche der Schweiz]
 Old Catholic Church of Austria
 Old Catholic Church of Mariavites/Catholic Church of Mariavites
 Old Catholic Church of the Netherlands
 Old Catholicism
 Old Rite Romanian Orthodox Church
 Oman
 Ōmoto
 Ontakekyō
 Organization of African Instituted Churches
 Orthodox Church in America
 Orthodox Church in China
 Orthodox Church in Czech Lands and Slovakia
 Orthodox Church of Cyprus
 Orthodox Church of Greece
 Orthodox Church of Poland [Polski Autokefaliczny Kosciol Prawoslawny]
 Orthodox Judaism
 Orthodox Presbyterian Church
 Osho Commune International
 O.T.O. (Ordo Templi Orientis)
 Our Lady of All Nations (Netherlands)
 Pagan Federation
 Pakistan
 Palau
 Palo Mayombe
 Panama
 Pangestu
 Pantheism
 Papua New Guinea
 Paraguay
 Paris Mission
 Pashupata Saivism
 Pasundan Christian Church (GKP)
 Pentecostal Assemblies of Canada
 Pentecostal Assemblies of the World
 Pentecostal Church of Chile
 Pentecostal Church of God
 The Pentecostal Mission
 Pentecostal Mission Church
 Pentecostal World Fellowship
 Pentecostalism
 Pentecostalism in Scandinavia
 People of God (Paraguay)
 Peoples Temple
 Perfect Liberty Kyōdan
 Peru
 Philadelphia Church of God
 Philippine Independent Church
 Philippines
 Pitcairn Islands
 Plymouth Brethren (Exclusive)
 Poland
 Polish National Catholic Church/Polish Catholic Church [Kosciol Polskokatolicki]
 Polygamy-Practicing Mormons
 Pomun Order [Pomun-Jong]
 Portugal
 Presbyterian Church in Brazil
 Presbyterian Church in Cameroon
 Presbyterian Church in Canada
 Presbyterian Church in Rwanda
 Presbyterian Church in Taiwan
 Presbyterian Church in the Republic of Korea
 Presbyterian Church in the Sudan
 Presbyterian Church in Trinidad
 Presbyterian Church of Africa
 Presbyterian Church of Aotearoa New Zealand
 Presbyterian Church of Australia (Continuing)
 Presbyterian Church of Cameroon
 Presbyterian Church of Colombia
 Presbyterian Church of East Africa
 Presbyterian Church of Ghana
 Presbyterian Church of India
 Presbyterian Church of Korea (HapDong)
 Presbyterian Church of Korea (TongHap)
 Presbyterian Church of Mozambique
 Presbyterian Church of Nigeria
 Presbyterian Church of Pakistan
 Presbyterian Church of Southern Africa
 Presbyterian Church of Vanuatu
 Presbyterian Church of Wales
 Presbyterian Church (U.S.A.)
 Presbyterian Reformed Church in Cuba

- Presbytery of Liberia
 Priory of Sion
 Progressive National Baptist Convention of America
 Protestant Christian Batak Church (HKBP)
 Protestant Christian Church–Angkola (GKPA)
 Protestant Christian Church of Bali (GKPB)
 Protestant Christian Church of Nias (BNKP)
 Protestant Church in Sabah (Malaysia)
 Protestant Church in Southeast Sulawesi (GEPSULTRA)
 Protestant Church in the Moluccas (GPM)
 Protestant Church of Algeria
 Protestant Church of Senegal
 Protestant Methodist Church in Côte d’Ivoire Protestant Methodist Church of Benin
 Puerto Rico
 Pure Land Buddhism (China)
 Qadiriyya Rifaiyya Sufi Order
 Qadiriyya Sufi Order
 Qatar
 Quanzhen Daoism
 Rada Religion
 Radhasoami
 Raelian Movement International
 Ramtha’s School of Enlightenment
 Rastafarians
 Reconstructionist Judaism
 Reform Baptists (Russia)
 Reform Judaism
 Reformed Christian Church in Slovakia
 Reformed Christian Church in Yugoslavia
 Reformed Church in America
 Reformed Church in Romania
 Reformed Church in Zambia
 Reformed Church in Zimbabwe
 Reformed Church of Alsace and Lorraine
 Reformed Church of Christ in Nigeria
 Reformed Church of France
 Reformed Church of Hungary
 Reformed Churches in the Netherlands (GKN)
 Reformed Churches in the Netherlands (Liberated)
 Reformed Denomination
 Reformed Ecumenical Council
 Reformed Presbyterian Church of Equatorial Guinea
 Reformed/Presbyterian Tradition
 Reiha-no-Hikari
 Reiyūkai
 Religious Science
 Remonstrant Brotherhood
 Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints Reunion
 Rhenish Mission
 Rigpa Fellowship
 Rinzai (Japan), Lin-Chi (China), Imje (Korea), Lam-Te (Vietnam)
 Risshō Kōsei-Kai
 Rodzima Wiara (Poland)
 Roman Catholic Church
 Romania
 Romania, Islam in Romanian Greek Catholic Church
 Romanian Orthodox Church
 Romuva
 Ruhani Satsang
 Russia
 Russia, Ethnic Minority Religion in
 Russian Orthodox Church (Moscow Patriarchate)
 Russian Orthodox Church Outside of Russia
 Ruthenian Catholic Church
 Rwanda
- Volume 4
- Sahaja Yoga
 Sahara
 St. Helena
 St. Kitts-Nevis
 St. Lucia
 St. Pierre et Miquelon
 St. Vincent
 Saivism (Hinduism)
 Sakyapa Tibetan Buddhism
 Salesians
 Salvadorean Lutheran Synod
 The Salvation Army
 Samavesam of Telegu Baptists Churches
 Samoa
 San Marino
 Sanbō Kyōdan
 Sangir-Talau Evangelical Church (GMIST)
 Sant Nirankari Mission
 Santería
 The Santi Asoka
 Santo Daime
 São Tomé and Príncipe
 Sapta Darma

- Sarvodaya
 Satanism
 Sathya Sai Baba Movement
 Satmar Hassidism
 The Satsang Network
 Saudi Arabia
 Scottish Episcopal Church
 Sedevacantism and Antipopes
 Seichō-no-Ie
 Sekai Kyōsei Kyō (Church of World Messianity)
 Self-Realization Fellowship
 Senegal
 Serbian Orthodox Church
 Serpent Handlers/Signs Following Movement
 Seventh Day Adventist Reform Movement
 Seventh Day Baptist General Conference
 Seventh-day Adventist Church
 Seychelles
 Shādhiliyya Sufi Order
 Shafiite School of Islam
 Shakta Movement (Hinduism)
 Shambhala International
 Shi'a Islam
 Shiah Fatimi Ismaili Tayyibi Dawoodi Bohra
 Shingon Buddhism
 Shinnyoen, Garden of Absolute Reality
 Shinto
 Shri Ram Chandra Mission
 Shugendō
 Siddha Yoga
 Sierra Leone
 Sikh Dharma
 Sikhism and the Sant Mat Tradition
 Silesian Evangelical Church of the Augsburg Confession [Slezská církev evangelická augsburského vyznání]
 Simalungun Protestant Christian Church
 Singapore
 Singapore, Buddhism in Slovak Evangelical Church of the Augsburg Confession in Yugoslavia
 Slovakia
 Slovenia
 Smarta Tradition (Hinduism)
 Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts
 Sōka Gakkai International
 Solar Temple, Order of the
 Solomon Islands
 Somalia
 Soto Zen Buddhism
 South Africa
 Southern Baptist Convention
 Spain
 Spanish Evangelical Church
 Spanish Reformed Episcopal Church
 Spiritism
 Spiritual Baptists
 Spiritual Churches (Ghana)
 Spiritual Churches (Kenya)
 Spiritual Healing Church (Botswana)
 Spiritual HumanYoga/Mankind Enlightenment Love
 Spiritualism
 Sri Aurobindo Ashram
 Sri Chinmoy Centers International
 Sri Lanka
 Sri Lanka, Hinduism in
 Stella Maris Gnostic Church
 Sthanakavasi Jain Tradition
 Subud
 Sudan
 Sudan Interior Church
 The Sufi Movement
 Sufi Order International
 Sufism
 Suhrawardiyya Sufi Order
 Sūkyō Mahikari
 Sumarah
 Suriname
 Svalbard and Jan Mayen Islands
 Swaminarayan Hinduism
 Swaziland
 Sweden
 Swedenborgian Church of North America
 Swedenborgian Movement
 Switzerland
 Syria
 Syriac Orthodox Patriarchate of Antioch and All the East
 Syrian Catholic Church
 Syrian Orthodox Church of Malabar
 Syro-Malabar Catholic Church
 Syro-Malankara Catholic Church
 Tajikistan
 Taliban
 Tamil Saivism

- Tantrism
 Tanzania
 Taoist Tai Chi Society
 Tenrikyō [Religion of Heavenly Wisdom]
 Tenshō Kōtai Jingūkyō [The Religion of the Mighty God of Heaven]
 Terapanth Svetambara Jain Tradition
 Thai Forest Monks
 Thailand
 Theosophical Society (Adyar)
 Theosophical Society (America)
 Theravada Buddhism
 Tian Dao (Yiguandao)
 Tiantai/Tendai
 Tibetan Buddhism
 Tibetan Nyingma Institute
 Tijāniyya Sufi Order
 Timor
 Tocoist Church/Church of Our Lord Jesus Christ in the World
 Togo
 Tokelau Islands
 Tonga
 Toraja Church (GT)
 Toronto Airport Christian Fellowship
 Traditional African Religions
 Traditional Anglican Communion
 Trinidad and Tobago
 Trinidad and Tobago, Hinduism in True Buddha School
 True Jesus Church
 True (Old Calendar) Orthodox Church of Greece
 Tunisia
 Turkey
 Turkmenistan
 Turks and Caicos Islands
 Tuvalu
 Twelve Tribes
 UFO Religions
 Uganda
 Ukraine
 Ukraine, Eastern Orthodoxy in Ukrainian Greek Catholic Church
 Umbanda
 Unarius
 Unbelief
 Unification Movement
 Unified Buddhist Church of Vietnam
 Unified Buddhist Church, the Order of Interbeing, and the Community of Mindful Living
 Union d'Églises Baptistes Françaises au Canada
 Union of Baptist Churches of Cameroon
 Union of Evangelical Christians–Baptists of Russia
 Union of Evangelical Christians–Baptists of the Ukraine
 Union of Evangelical Free Church Congregations (Baptist)
 Union of Indonesian Baptist Churches
 Union of Messianic Congregations
 Union of the Armenian Evangelical Churches in the Near East Union of Welsh Independents
 Unitarian Universalist Association
 United Arab Emirates
 United Baptist Church (Mozambique)
 United Church in Jamaica and the Cayman Islands
 United Church in Papua New Guinea
 United Church of Canada
 United Church of Christ
 United Church of Christ–Congregational in the Marshall Islands
 United Church of Christ in Japan
 United Church of Christ in the Philippines
 United Church of Christ in Zimbabwe
 United Church of God, an International Association (plus Church of God, an International Community)
 United Church of the Solomon Islands
 United Church of Zambia
 United Congregational Church of Southern Africa
 United Evangelical Church–Anglican Communion of Angola
 United Evangelical Lutheran Church (UELC)
 United Evangelical Lutheran Church in India
 United Free Church of Scotland
 United Kingdom
 United Lodge of Theosophists
 United Methodist Church
 United Pentecostal Church International
 United Presbyterian Church of Brazil
 United Protestant Church of Belgium
 United Protestant Church of Netherlands Antilles
 United Reformed Church of the United Kingdom
 United Religions Initiative
 United Society of Believers in Christ's Second Appearing (Shakers)
 United States of America
 Uniting Church in Australia

Uniting Presbyterian Church in Southern Africa
Uniting Reformed Church in South Africa
Unity School of Christianity/Association of Unity Churches
Universal Church of the Kingdom of God [Igreja Universal do Reino de Deus]
Universal Faithists of Kosmon
Universal Fellowship of Metropolitan Community Churches
Universal Great Brotherhood
Universal Life [Universelles Leben]
Universal Soul
The URANTIA Foundation
Ursulines
Uruguay
Uzbekistan
Vaisnavism
Vanuatu
Vedanta Societies/Ramakrishna Math and Mission
Venezuela
Vietnam
Vipassana International Academy
Virasaivism
Virgin Islands of the United States
Vishwa Hindu Parishad
Vodou
VRINDA/The Vrindavan Institute for Vaisnava Culture and Studies
Wahhabi Islam
Wake Island
Waldensian Church
Wallis et Futuna Islands
Warith Deen Mohammad, Ministry of
The Way International
Wesleyan Church
Western Buddhist Order, Friends of the Western Esoteric Tradition
White Brotherhood
White Fathers
White Plum Asanga
Wiccan Religion
Wisconsin Evangelical Lutheran Synod
Won Buddhism (Won Pulgyo)
Word of Life Church [Kale Heywet]
World Alliance of Reformed Churches
World Brotherhood Union Mevlana Supreme Foundation
World Buddhist Sangha Council
World Conference on Religion and Peace
World Congress of Faiths
World Convention of Churches of Christ
World Council of Biblical Churches
World Council of Churches
World Evangelical Alliance
World Fellowship of Buddhists
World Methodist Council
World Muslim Congress
World Plan Executive Council
World Reformed Fellowship
World Sephardic Federation
World Vaisnava Association
World Zoroastrian Organization
Worldwide Church of God
Yemen
Yezidis
Yogi Tradition
Yoido Full Gospel Church
Yoruban Religion/Spirituality
Young Buddhist Association of Malaysia
Young Israel
Young Men's Buddhist Association
Yugoslavia
Zambia
Zaydites
Zen Buddhism
Zhengyi Daoism
Zhong Gong
Zimbabwe
Zimbabwe Assemblies of God Africa
Zion Christian Church (South Africa, Zimbabwe)
Zionist and Apostolic Churches (South Africa, Zimbabwe)
Zoroastrianism
Zulu Religion/Spirituality

RELIGIONS of the World

A COMPREHENSIVE ENCYCLOPEDIA
OF BELIEFS AND PRACTICES

VOLUME I: A-C

Aboriginal Cult of Maria Lionza

The movement built around the veneration of Maria Lionza originated out of the dissemination of the SPIRITISM of Allan Kardec in Venezuela at the beginning of the twentieth century. As Spiritism became a popular movement, mediums in the countryside began to make contact with what were considered nature spirits. One such spirit was Maria de la Onza or Maria Lionza, believed to be the guardian spirit of flora and fauna in the area around the holy mountain of Sorte in the State of Yaracuy. Believers could gather at the foot of the mountain, where they could consult her about their personal problems through the instrumentality of a group of mediums.

Over time, additional spirits were also consulted, and as the movement spread around the country, a great variety of new kinds of spirits became available for consultation. As the number of spirits multiplied, leaders began to speak of “courts” of spirits, groups to which the different spirits belonged. Maria Lionza headed the Celestial Court. There is a court of patriots, which includes Simon Bolívar and the generals who fought with him, a court of medical doctors, and a court of African figures (which includes the orishas of SANTERIA). The exact spirits available for consultation in any given center vary widely, though the common spirit of Maria Lionza holds the diverse world together. Many people of a Roman Catholic background identify Maria Lionza with the Virgin Mary.

The movement found favor in high circles in the Venezuelan government in the 1930s and 1940s, and by the 1950s centers could be found across the country. In 1968, an attempt was made to bring some organization to the movement with the founding of the Aboriginal Cult of Maria Lionza, with its headquarters in Caracas. The movement has spread to neighboring countries, to some of the larger Caribbean islands, and to the United States.

Although consulting the spirits through the mediums was the most important practice in the early days of the movement, over the century a variety of additional rites and ceremonies have emerged. Exorcism rituals are conducted for people, the spirit frequently telling people that troubles are due to evil spirits that have possessed them. The leaders of the group may also practice various alternative healing arts and conduct magical rituals aimed at producing specific sought-for results. Specific ceremonies borrow freely from other religious traditions.

There are no figures on the exact number of followers of Maria Lionza, but observers have suggested that some 5 percent of the Venezuelan public may be regularly active and that many times that number occasionally participate in various ceremonies. Others have suggested lower figures, possibly as few as several hundred thousand adherents (not an insignificant figure in a country where only the Catholic Church, the JEHOVAH’S WITNESSES, and the Seventh-day Adventists can claim more than a hundred thousand members). Adherents will attempt to make a pilgrimage to Sorte at least once annually.

Sources:

- Garcia Gavidia, Nelly. Posesion y ambivalencia en el Culto de Maria Lionza. Maracaibo, Venezuela: Universidad de Zulia, 1987.
- Manata, Bruno. Maria Lionza, su entidad, su culto y la cosmovision anexa. Caracas, Venezuela: Universidad Central de Venezuela, 1995.
- Pollak-Eltz, Angelina. “The Venezuela Cult of Maria Lionza.” In Encyclopedia of African and African American Religions, edited by Stephen D. Glazier. New York: Routledge, 2001.

Aboriginal Religions

Aboriginal cosmology centers on a concept that has been translated as “the Dreaming,” or “Dreamtime,” which refers both to a founding drama of how the Ancestors rose up from beneath the earth to shape and mould an already existing, yet amorphous world, and to an eternal, atemporal metaphysical reality. The term Dreaming was the first attempt at understanding the Aranda words altjiranga ngambakala. Although Dreaming does not adequately convey the full significance of the complex aspect Aboriginal cosmology, it does suggest the mystery of the connection of Aboriginal people to land, spirituality, and all that exists. Aboriginal people sometimes use the term Law, or Eternal Law, to articulate the idea of timelessness that is at the heart of Aboriginal cosmology.

When the Ancestors rose up from beneath the earth, they journeyed from place to place, imbuing all things with their own essence, power, or energy and establishing a set of laws for all to follow. As the Ancestors traveled, they left tangible expressions of themselves in the landscape: here a rocky outcrop, there a tree or waterhole, metamorphosing a part of their own essence into some feature of the environment, or imprinting themselves onto cave walls or ritual objects. When they had completed their journeys, they went back under the earth from whence they had come. The whole continent of Australia is crisscrossed with such landmarks, and these form the basis of Aboriginal lore and law. There is no such thing as original sin; rather, life is a mixture of good and bad, and there is an absence of accountability for one’s actions to Ancestral beings. Aboriginal people are linked to the Ancestral beings through territories (land links), totems (other-species links), and kinship connections (human relationships). When a person is born, by being a member of a particular kin group, its Ancestral associations, and its land connections, he or she automatically fits into a religious framework that is based on this triad.

The Aboriginal sacred Churunga with inscriptions. Churunga inscriptions seem to be both representations and embodiments of matter. (Eric Smith/TRIP)

The trails made by the Ancestors are associated with ritual performance, with song lines (a series or sequence of songs marking a particular event associated with a place along the ancestral route) and with individual and group affiliations that provide Aborigines with identity and kinship connections that extend to everything in their environment. All things—land, humans, and that which is both living and inanimate—are interconnected through these Dreaming (Ancestor) beings. The land is a vast web of sacredness. Land, spirit, and humans are inextricably interwoven. Aborigines say they are caretakers of the land rather than owners.

The Dreaming is not one story but many (for example, Kangaroo Dreaming, Emu Dreaming), and one entire myth complex (stories, songs, ceremonies) associated with each Dreaming story might traverse several linguistic groups. Red Kangaroo, for example, may have emerged from beneath the ground in one place, traversed country that is “owned” by two or three different Aboriginal groups and go back into the ground at the end of the journey in country belonging to a fourth group. Each group has rights and responsibilities, as guardians and caretakers, for the tract of land associated with their part of the Ancestral route. These responsibilities include taking care of country by periodically following song lines pertaining to the creation stories and keeping up ceremonial performances. These performances may incorporate body painting, objects, artwork, songs, and dances, all of which pertain to the Ancestral story and place connected with the performance. Separate “men’s business” (men-only ceremonies) and “women’s business” (women-only ceremonies) emphasize distinct gender boundaries for some ceremonies. For other ceremonies, however, men and women perform roles that are complementary and necessary for the proper enactment of a Dreaming performance. Knowledge and beliefs about Ancestral power, myth, and responsibilities are shared, and both women and men have rights and responsibilities in caring for country. Some places belong to women’s Dreaming (women’s business), some to men’s Dreaming (men’s business), others to both genders. Both residence and myth link Aborigines to country in a deeply significant spiritual sense. The links are emotional, metaphysical, and situational.

Traditional education on matters pertaining to the Law emphasize acquisition of knowledge of the Law through ceremonial participation and instruction from the elders who have passed through various stages of initiation. Much knowledge is sacred; some knowledge is both sacred and secret, and only passed on to those who have accumulated the necessary knowledge to be ready to learn the next level of esoteric information. This is a long slow process that is tied up with the structure of Aboriginal society. Many Aborigines who have been denied access to such enculturation and instruction, for one reason or another (such as early government policies of assimilation and missionization), and have been raised in urban areas have become Christians, and their links to the land are more tenuous than those created by traditional education. Urban Aborigines tend to have a more generic link to the land; they talk about Mother Earth, as a pan-Australian Aboriginal concept, rather than making associations with creation stories that link people from a particular region to their own local geographic areas.

The responses to Christianity have varied, from outright rejection to syncretism in varying degrees to acceptance. Some Aborigines have become priests and ministers themselves and are attempting a biblical hermeneutic that is culturally relevant to Aborigines. A majority of Aboriginal Australians now profess to be Christians. Although census figures are understated, due to incomplete census returns from remote areas of Australia, in the 1991 census, among the 45,208 people who said they spoke an Aboriginal language, 3,802 (9 percent) stated that they followed Aboriginal traditional religious beliefs. Some researchers have estimated that about 10,000 people could be considered adherents of traditional religious beliefs.

The artwork of Aborigines demonstrates the mystique and complexity of their cosmology and epistemology. Aboriginal art, like Aboriginal knowledge, consists of layers of meaning; unless it is executed for commercial purposes, a particular work of art conveys encoded meaning that can be interpreted according to the viewer's access to restricted knowledge. Much contemporary art and literature communicates Aboriginal history since contact, their strong sense of kinship, their feelings about land and spirituality, as well as traditional themes from the Dreaming.

Lynne Hume

Sources:

- Berndt, R. M., and C. H. Berndt. The World of the First Australians: Aboriginal Traditional Life, Past and Present. Canberra: Aboriginal Studies Press, 1988.
- Charlesworth, Max, ed. Religious Business: Essays on Australian Aboriginal Spirituality. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1998.
- Hume, Lynne. Ancestral Power: The Dreaming, Consciousness and Aboriginal Australians. Melbourne: Melbourne University Press, 2002.
- Morphy, Howard. Ancestral Connections: Art and an Aboriginal System of Knowledge. Chicago: The University of Chicago Press, 1991.
- Swain, Tony, and Deborah Bird Rose, eds. Aboriginal Australians and Christian Missions: Ethnographic and Historical Studies. Bedford Park, South Australia: Australian Association for the Study of Religions, 1988.

Adidam

Adidam, referred to less formally as the Way of the Heart, was founded by Avatar Adi Da Samraj, born Franklin Jones in Long Island, New York, in 1939. In his autobiography he asserts that he was born into a state of perfect awareness of ultimate reality, but sacrificed that reality at the age of two in order to completely identify with human limitations. Jones spent his college and subsequent years in a spiritual quest, which eventually led him to Swami Muktananda and other gurus in that lineage. Jones says that he reawakened to his true state in 1970.

One of the central teachings of the Way of the Heart is that no form of seeking for happiness is ever permanently successful, because the means of becoming happy are always transitory. In fact, Adi Da points out that seeking means constant activity and that activity prevents the conscious realization of perfect happiness. He further asserts that he has realized this Most Perfect Happiness—God, Truth, or Reality—and has the power to transmit that Divine Self-Realization to others. The Way of the Heart, then, consists of a devotional relationship with Adi Da, whom his devotees assert is the source of Divine Self-Realization. All the traditional means of religious life are employed as a means of “radical” understanding and devotional communion with Adi Da—meditation, study, ceremonial worship, community living, moral and ethical observances, disciplines related to diet, health, sexuality, money, and so on.

Adi Da began to teach this “radical” understanding—a combination of discriminative self-observation and guru-devotion—in 1972, opening a small ashram in Los Angeles. His method of working with his students was initially quite traditional. It soon became clear, however, that a different approach was necessary, and he switched to a “Crazy-Wise” teaching style. In 1979, he took the name Da Free John. In 1986, he changed his name to Swami Da Love-Ananda. He again changed his name during the late 1980s to Da Avabhasa (the Bright). Finally, in 1995, he became Adi Da. This last change, says Adi Da, signaled the completion of his Revelation Work.

The institution of Adidam has an educational organization, the Laughing Man Institute, which is responsible for conducting courses all over the world to familiarize people with the teaching and the person of Adi Da. Additionally, the institution has a publishing mission, the Dawn Horse Press, which publishes books by and about Adi Da; since 1972, over fifty volumes have been published. The institution publishes a number of magazines.

As of the end of the 1990s, Adidam reported over 1,000 members, the majority of whom reside in the United States. There are also members in Canada and Fiji, and various European countries. Centers have been opened in Australia, New Zealand, and Great Britain. Adidam maintains three ashrams, located in Fiji, Hawaii, and northern California. For many years, Adi Da lived in Fiji, but in recent years has resided at the Mount of Attention, the retreat center in California.

Address:

Adidam
12040 North Seigler Rd.
Middletown, CA 95461
<http://www.adidam.org>

James R. Lewis

Sources:

- Avatar Adi Da Samraj and the First 25 Years of His Divine Revelation Work*. Middletown, CA: Dawn Horse Press, 1997.
- See the Brightness Face to Face: A Celebration of the Rachira Buddha*. Middletown, CA: Dawn Horse Press, 1997.

Adventism

Adventism refers generally to those Christian religious groups that place a strong emphasis upon the imminent

William Miller (Matilda Erickson Andross. Story of the Advent Message. Takoma Park, MD: Review and Herald Publishing Association, 1926.)

Second Coming, or Advent, of Jesus Christ to bring history to a culmination, but particularly to those groups that trace their history to the ministry of William Miller (1782–1849), a Baptist lay minister in the 1830s in the eastern United States. From his home in New York in the 1820s, Miller began a study of the Bible that led him to conclude that Christ would return in 1843. In 1831, he began to share the result of his speculations with others, and a movement began to gather around his notions.

Miller built his system on projections from easily dated events in biblical history. When Christ did not return in 1843, and especially after 1844, termed the Great Disappointment in Adventist history, Miller recanted his ideas, but many of those who had been attracted to his basic perspective continued to believe and developed a spectrum of revised timetables for Christ's return and other End Times events. The largest group gathered around Ellen G. White (1827–1915) who with her husband James White founded the SEVENTH-DAY ADVENTIST CHURCH. Later in the century, Pastor Charles Taze Russell (1852–1916) organized a community of Bible students that in the 1930s evolved into the JEHOVAH'S WITNESSES. One of the smaller groups to come out of the Millerite enthusiasts was the Seventh-day Church of God, which in the 1930s gave birth to its most successful representative body, the WORLDWIDE CHURCH OF GOD.

During the twentieth century, both the Seventh-day Adventists and the Witnesses became large worldwide bodies with members in more than two hundred countries. The Worldwide Church of God seemed destined to follow their success until trouble erupted under founder Herbert W. Armstrong's successors and the organization splintered to produce the UNITED CHURCH OF GOD AN INTERNATIONAL ASSOCIATION, the Global Church of God, and a host of other lesser groups.

Sources:

- Bull, Malcolm, and Keith Lockart. Seeking a Sanctuary: Seventh-day Adventism and the American Dream. San Francisco, CA: Harper and Row, 1989.
- Land, Gary, ed. Adventism in America: A History. Berrien Springs, MI: Andrews University Press, 1998.
- Morgan, Douglas, and Martin Marty. Adventism and the American Republic: The Public Involvement of a Major Apocalyptic Movement. Knoxville: University of Tennessee Press, 2001.
- Tkach, Joseph. Transformed by Truth. Sisters, OR: Multnomah Books, 1997.

Afghanistan

The area constituting the present nation of Afghanistan has been inhabited since prehistoric times, many people using the famed Khyber Pass to make their way in and out of India. The region was conquered by the ancient Persians in the sixth century B.C.E. and then by Alexander the Great. In the first century B.C.E. the nation of Kusana emerged and became an important stop on the trading route that connected Rome with China and India.

Persia returned around 240 C.E. and was still in charge when the Arab Muslims' Umayyad Empire exploded out of the Arabian Peninsula and quickly moved east to the Indus River. Along the way Kandahar and Kabul fell. In the thirteenth century, Mongols from the east moved into the region. As Mongol power disintegrated, the region became the target of Persians from the southwest, Uzbeks from the north, and Indians from the southeast. An independent state began to take shape in the middle of the eighteenth century, but was immediately faced with Russian pressure to the north and British designs on the Indus Valley. As a result of the British-Afghan War (1878–1880), Afghanistan lost the Khyber Pass, and a British puppet was placed in the ruler's chair. The British, however, granted to Afghanistan a narrow strip of land that extended eastward to the Chinese border. The country overthrew the British protectorate in 1919, but the former Afghan land incorporated into India (now Pakistan) has remained a source of tension.

Since independence in 1919, forces of tradition and modernization have vied for control, and each has succeeded in different ways. Different leaders have attempted to build modern transportation and communications systems, create industry, and reorganize the decentralized government. Attacks on different customs (women's veils, the dowry system) have tended to alienate secularists from traditional religious leaders. The land has never been able to overcome the tensions between the various religious (Shi'a, Ismaili, and Sunni Islam), language (Pashto, Dari, Turkic), and ethnic (Pashtun, Tajik, Uzbek, Hazzara) factions that control different parts of the country. In the modern context, these different factions have looked to various outside forces for support.

Dominating the last half of the twentieth century was the country's relationship with the Soviet Union. In 1979, the Soviet Union occupied the country with claims of a friendship agreement. They did not withdraw until 1988, as the Soviet Union was being dismantled. While the Soviets were present, different factions united in opposition, but each had a different vision of Afghanistan's post-Soviet future. Civil war broke out in the 1990s, and as the various factions vied for dominance, a new force emerged called the TALIBAN. Growing in the south, it captured Kabul in 1994. The major opposition came from what was termed the Northern Alliance, a coalition of ethnic groups (including Sunni, Shi'a, and Ismaili Muslims). The Taliban had a major victory in 1998, but eventually was unable to gain control of the entire country, leaving it divided between two factions at the beginning of the twenty-first century.

Sunni Islam of the HANAFITE SCHOOL OF ISLAM came to dominate the Pashtuns, who in turn were the dominant political force in the country through most of the twentieth century. Their traditional territory includes the southern half of the nation. In the center of Afghanistan is the homeland of the Hazzara people, who are Shi'a Muslims with close ties to Iran. To the north are two other Hanafite Sunni groups, the Tajik (Dari-speaking) and Uzbeks (Turkic-speaking), divided from the Pashtuns by ethnicity and language. The Ismailis draw support from several of the smaller ethnic groups. Like the Tajik and Hazzara, most of the Ismailis speak Dari.

While the various factions were fighting over Kabul, the Taliban (Persian; students) emerged out of seclusion. The Status of religions in Afghanistan, 2000-2050

Followers	2000		2025	2050
	total	% rate
Muslims	22,296,000	98.1 4.43	44,153,000	59,882,000
Zoroastrians	304,000	1.3 4.73	675,000	1,000,000
Hindus	79,500	0.4 0.59	50,000	35,000
Baha'is	23,100	0.1 1.70	30,000	42,000
Christians	7,100	0.0 0.11	14,200	26,700
Independents	3,000	0.0 1.84	10,000	20,000
Protestants	2,000	0.0 -0.49	2,000	2,500
Roman Catholics	1,500	0.0 -0.66	1,200	1,500
Sikhs	4,000	0.0 2.98	6,000	10,000
Ethnoreligionists	3,000	0.0 0.05	600	200
Nonreligious	2,800	0.0 3.28	4,500	8,000
Atheists	260	0.0 -14.21	200	200
Jews	140	0.0 0.45	100	100
Total population	22,720,000	100.0 4.41	44,934,000	61,004,000

Taliban movement had grown among students in religious schools that had been established in Pakistan during the days of the Russian occupation. The movement, under the leadership of Mullah Muhammed Rabbani, quickly gained the support of the Pashtun areas of the country and in 1994 moved on Kabul. The Taliban represents an extremely conservative form of Islam and has found an ally in the WAH-HABI ISLAM leadership of Saudi Arabia.

Shi'a, Ismaili, and Tajik and Uzbek Sunnis, uniting into the Northern Alliance, have opposed the Taliban. At the end of the 1990s, the Taliban controlled some two-thirds of Afghanistan, while the Alliance held the rest. Neither appeared capable of defeating the other, and a standstill resulted.

The Taliban instituted a traditional Muslim regime in that part of Afghanistan it controlled. It moved to reimpose a spectrum of traditional rules on women.

Muslim women walk outside the Hazrat Ali Shrine in Mazar-i-Sharif, Afghanistan. (Helene Rogers/TRIP)

The area held by the Taliban was also home to a variety of non-Muslim minorities, including Hindus, Punjabi Sikhs, Jews, and a few Christians. All had to conform to Taliban rules, which had become the law of the land.

Prior to the Taliban coming to power there were tens of thousands of Indians (practicing Sikhs and Hindus) residing in Afghanistan. Many left for India or other countries, and the number remaining dwindled to a few thousand, of which approximately 1,700 were Hindus. In 2001, the Taliban announced a program to have the Hindus wear an identifying yellow badge on their clothing. This action brought much criticism, as it appeared to resemble the Nazi imposition of such identifying marks on Jews in pre-war Germany. The remaining Indians, Sikhs from the Punjab, took steps to keep their traditional monotheistic worship alive, including the removal of pictures of their gurus from the walls of the gurdwaras (temples), so that they would not be considered idolaters.

Jews have resided in Afghanistan, and in the other countries of central Asia, since ancient times. Toward the end of the nineteenth century, there were some 40,000. Following the establishment of the state of Israel, a mass exodus began and at the beginning of the twenty-first century there was only a small community (less than 50 people) left in Kabul. A single rabbi remained to oversee the single Jewish synagogue.

Christianity had a presence in Afghanistan from at least the fourth century. In 425, the bishop of Herat was a noted attendee of the Council of Seleucia (Persia). Christian influence in the area was largely eliminated during the years of Mongol rule (fourteenth century). Missionaries were not allowed into the country, and Islamic law calls for death to anyone who leaves Islam for Christianity. A new Christian presence developed in the twentieth century among expatriates working in the country as diplomats or technicians. In 1973, the first Protestant church was erected in Kabul, but ordered destroyed two years later. There has been a Roman Catholic chapel and priest at the Italian embassy since 1932.

Buddhism was introduced into Afghanistan in the third century B.C.E. and flourished for many centuries in the eastern part of the country. Buddhist hegemony ended with the coming of the Arabs, and, as in India, over the next centuries it disappeared. There are no Buddhists in Afghanistan today. The Buddhists did leave behind a significant amount of art, including some massive statues of the Buddha. In March 2001, the Taliban leader ordered all religious statues in Afghanistan destroyed. The world's attention was focused on the Bamiyan Buddha, two large stone statues that the Taliban found religiously offensive. In spite of negative world reaction, including significant negative reaction from other Islamic countries, the statues were destroyed.

The situation in Afghanistan was in flux during the later 1990s, but changed significantly on September 11, 2001, when agents of AL QAEDA, an extreme Islamist group, hijacked four commercial jets and crashed them into the Pentagon in suburban Washington, D.C., and the two World Trade Center Towers in New York City. Al Qaeda had moved its center to Afghanistan in the mid-1990s and had found protection from the Taliban in return for its financial backing of the Taliban in the continuing civil war and in the attempt to impose a strict form of Islam upon the populace. In reaction to the bombings, the U.S. government launched military operations in Afghanistan, directed against not only Al Qaeda and its leader, Osama bin Laden, but against the Taliban government, which was charged with being an accessory to Al Qaeda's violence. The military action quickly led to dramatic changes in the balance of power, changes that were still in progress as this book was completed.

The volatile situation resulting from the U.S. forces entering Afghanistan assures that the religious situation in the country will remain in an unsettled state for the foreseeable future.

Sources:

- Bodansky, Yossef. Bin Laden: The Man Who Declared War on America. New York: Forum, 2001.
- Ghani, A. "Afghanistan: Islam and Counter-Revolutionary Movements." In Islam in Asia: Religion, Politics, and Society, edited by John L. Esposito. New York: Oxford University Press, 1987.
- Juergenmeyer, Mark. Terror in the Mind of God: The Global Rise of Religious Violence. Berkeley: University of California Press, 2001.
- Maley, William, ed. Fundamentalism Reborn? Afghanistan and the Taliban. New York: New York University Press, 1998.
- Matinuddin, Kamal. The Taliban Phenomenon: Afghanistan, 1994–1997. Karachi, Pakistan: Oxford University Press, 1999.
- Olesen, Asta. Islam and Politics in Afghanistan. Richmond, Surrey, UK: Curzon Press, 1995.

Africa Inland Church

Africa Inland Church is the name of an autonomous church created as the result of the successful missionary effort launched in the 1890s by the Africa Inland Mission (AIM). AIM was begun by Peter Cameron Scott, a white man living on the coast of Kenya. He developed a vision of a line of Christian missionary stations from Mombasa to Lake Chad, their goal being to resist the further spread of Islam in the region. To that end he founded the Africa Inland Mission as an interdenominational Protestant missionary organization in 1895, and shortly thereafter the first station was opened at Nzau n (or Nzawe), Kenya, about 200 miles from the coast, among the Akamba people. Before he died the next year, he had obtained the support of a number of conservative church leaders in the United States. He was succeeded by Charles E. Hurlburt, who served as general director of AIM until 1927. After a pause to gather new missionary recruits, the work spread across Kenya (including the Masai and the Tugen peoples) and entered Tanganyika (now Tanzania) in 1909. It pushed on to the eastern Congo among the Zande people in 1912, with the assistance of American president Theodore Roosevelt, who gained the permission of the Belgian government. After World War I, the work expanded to Uganda (1918), the Central African Republic (1924), and the southern part of the Sudan. At the same time, financial support for the work spread through conservative churches throughout the English-speaking world.

Coincidental with its work, schools were founded, most notably the Rift Valley Academy at Kijabe, Kenya (the cornerstone of which was laid by Roosevelt in 1906). These schools (now including secondary schools, Bible schools, and a theological college) began to produce an indigenous leadership, which in turn began to generate indigenous support of the growing mission. The church in Tanzania at one point managed more than 300 primary and secondary schools, but these have now passed into the control of the government.

In 1930, AIM was able to drop support of nationals from its budget. In 1943, the mission in Kenya established the self-governing Africa Inland Church, and in 1971 the church assumed control of the mission's other work and facilities. The church established its own missionary board and commissioned its first missionary in 1960. The church in Tanzania became autonomous in 1964. AIM continues to offer substantial support and remains active across Africa.

The church adheres to a conservative Evangelical perspective, but where necessary it has joined with more liberal Protestant churches and even the ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH in common cause. This is especially manifest in the Sudan, where it is a member of the Sudan Council of Churches. It has a congregational organization.

The Africa Inland Church, with more than a million members, is the second largest church body in Kenya (the Roman Catholic Church being larger). It is one of the larger churches in Tanzania, with more than 300,000 members, primarily among the Sukuma people. It has smaller memberships in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, the Sudan, and the Central African Republic, though it has a large constituency among the Sudanese. As of the end of the 1990s, AIM International (PO Box 178, Pearl River, NY 10965) supports more than 300 missionaries in Kenya and approximately 100 workers in adjacent countries. AIM International has an Internet site at <http://www.aim-us.org>.

Address:

Africa Inland Church
Kibera, Box 72197
Nairobi
Kenya

Sources:

Anderson, Dick. We Felt like Grasshoppers: The Story of the Africa Inland Mission. Nottingham: Crossway Books, 1994.
Richardson, Kenneth. Garden of Miracles: A History of the Africa Inland Mission. London: Victory Press, 1968.

African Apostolic Church of Johane Marange

The second largest denomination in Zimbabwe is the African Apostolic Church of Johane Marange (AACJM), known as Vapostori (Apostles), estimated to have almost a million affiliates in Zimbabwe in 1999, with thousands more in countries further north. The Vapostori have more affinity with PENTECOSTALISM than most other AFRICAN INITIATED CHURCHES (AICs) in Zimbabwe.

Some early Pentecostal preachers of the APOSTOLIC FAITH MISSION OF SOUTH AFRICA in Zimbabwe wore white robes, carried staffs, shaved their heads and grew beards, and taught Old Testament laws—characteristics of both South African Zionists and of African Apostles in Zimbabwe. Johane (John) Marange (1912–1963), grandson of a chief, received frequent dreams and visions from the time he was six years old. In 1932, an audible voice told him he was “John the Baptist, an apostle,” called to preach internationally and convert people, to baptize them, and to tell them to keep the Old Testament laws and the seventh-day Sabbath. He spoke in tongues and was given other ecstatic manifestations of the Spirit, and he founded the AACJM on the basis of these revelations. In July 1932, the first mass baptism, of 150 people in the Marange chiefdom, took place. Johane Marange in thirty years preached as far afield as Mozambique, Zambia, Malawi, and central Congo, exorcising evil spirits and baptizing thousands of people, commanding them to renounce traditional ritual practices and Witchcraft. Abero (Abel) Marange, Johane’s son and successor, held a Pendi (a Pentecost festival) in the southern Congo in 1964 attended by 10,000 people, but this was only one part of a deeply divided AACJM region. The AACJM has few rivals among AICs for missionary zeal, spreading to many parts of central and southern Africa, as far as Uganda and even Ghana. Although members may make annual pilgrimages to the Marange chiefdom for the main festival of the AACJM in July, the centripetal nature of an African Zion is not emphasized as it is in ZIONIST CHURCHES.

A unique feature of this church is the widespread setting up of hundreds of Pendi centers, where annual festivals are held in which the church leaders minister and give the sacraments to several congregations gathered together from that district. The AACJM also has a canonical addition to the Bible, containing the visions and personal experiences of Marange, called The New Revelation of the Apostles. Apart from the characteristic open-air mass services, shaved heads, beards, staffs, and white robes of Marange apostles, the AACJM also practices night vigils known as mapungwe, a practice that has become a feature of many types of grass-roots Christianity in Zimbabwe. In the mapungwe, the AACJM practices rituals that involve walking on fire and picking up burning embers with bare hands, symbolizing the power of the Spirit at the end of the world. Sometimes, Marange is praised and sung to as “the king of heaven,” but he is not regarded as superseding Christ. When Marange died in 1963, a schism occurred between his sons and his cousin, his eldest son Abero succeeding him as priest, the name given to the paramount leader of this church. Johane’s cousin, Prophet Simon Mushati, one of the first Vapostori who had assisted Johane on Pendi rounds, began a new church called the African Apostolic Church, St. Simon and St. Johane.

Allan H. Anderson

Sources:

Daneel, M. L. Old and New in Southern Shona Independent Churches. 2 vols. The Hague: Mouton, 1971, 1974.
Jules-Rosette, Benetta. “Prophecy and Leadership in the Maranke Church.” In African Christianity: Patterns of Religious Continuity, edited by George Bond et al. New York: Academic Press, 1979.
The New Revelation of the Apostles. N.p.: African Apostolic Church of Johane Marange, n.d.

African Brotherhood Church

The African Brotherhood Church (ABC), predominantly a Kamba church, was founded in 1945 in Nairobi, Kenya, by Simeon Mulandi (1914–1975), a former officer of THE SALVATION ARMY who had received visions about founding a new church. The ABC was a reaction to the missionary attitudes of that time, and most of its first members were dissatisfied members of the Africa Inland Mission, an evangelical missionary organization. Mulandi said that that kind of missionary Christianity meant that “you always had to be apologizing for being an African.”

Like so many Kenyan independent churches, this church was presumed to be nationalistic and anticolonial from the beginning and was accused of being a front for the Mau Mau resistance movement. It developed independent schools and a divinity school in 1950 and was one of only four African Initiated Churches (AICs) admitted to the All Africa Conference of Churches in 1966. By 1998 it had some 400 congregations with over 130,000 members. Mulandi himself was dismissed from the church in 1951 for personal misconduct, and his capable administrative assistant Nathan K. Ngala became head of the church, later to be called bishop. He continues to preside over a well-organized episcopal hierarchy.

The church began to expand into non-Kamba areas, but its activities in western Kenya were limited after a Luyia schism in 1952 resulted in the Christian Brotherhood Church led by Wellington B. Sakwa, who became its bishop. The ABC may be regarded as evangelical: it practices adult baptism by immersion and emphasises the ministry of all its members, including administration of Communion by lay leaders. This church was one of a few African Initiated Churches that have officially requested the assistance of foreign Western missionaries. Each church district, with at least twenty congregations, is called a pastorate. Bishop Ngala, like the AFRICAN CHRISTIAN CHURCH AND SCHOOLS, invited the Canadian Baptist Overseas Mission Board to send mission partners in 1979 for an initial period of ten years, to work mainly in theological and secondary school education under the direction of the African church, and this partnership continues despite some strains.

Address:

African Brotherhood Church
P.O. Box 32
Machakos
Kenya

Allan H. Anderson

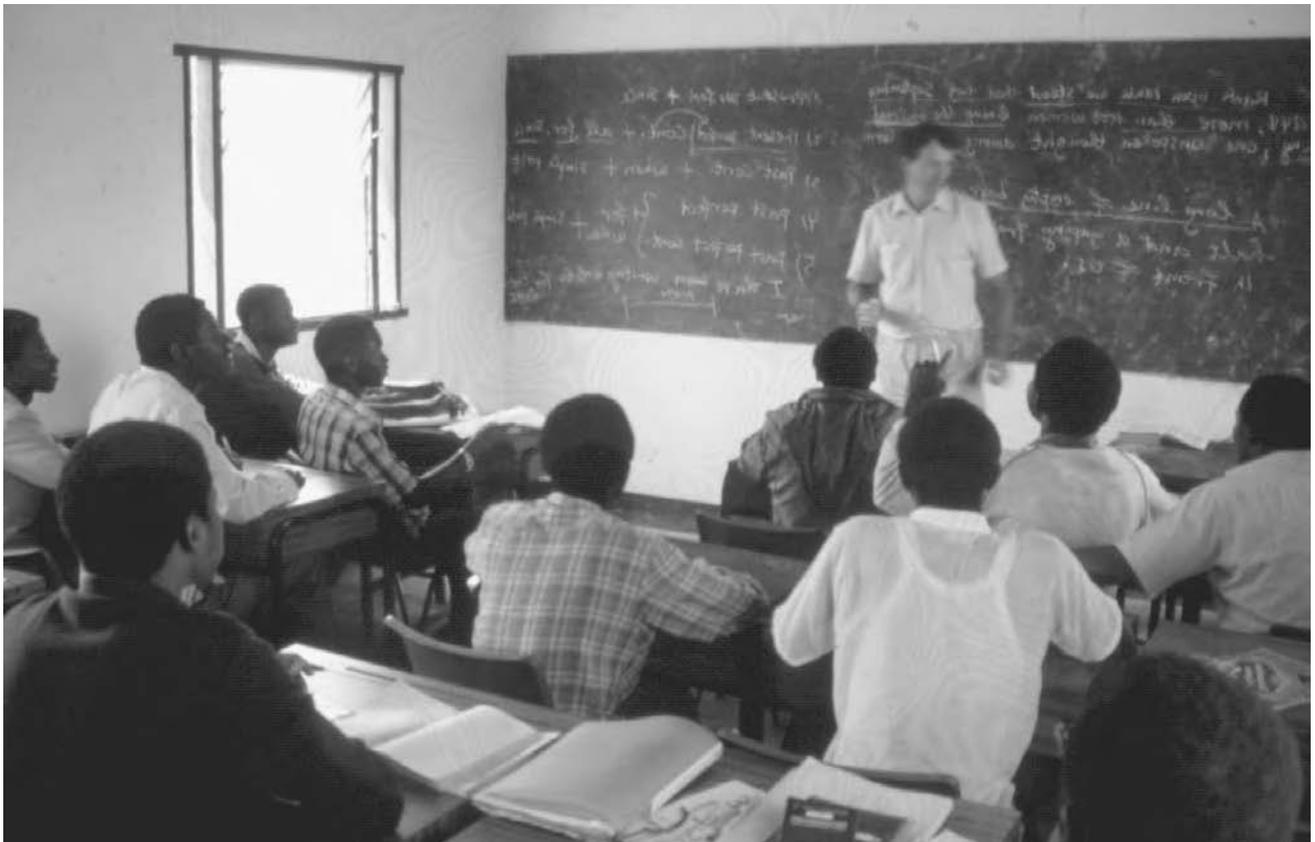

Sources:

Sandgren, David. "Kamba Christianity: From Africa Inland Mission to African Brotherhood Church." In East African Expressions of Christianity, edited by Thomas Spear and Isaria N. Kimambo. Oxford: James Currey, 1999.

World Council of Churches. "The African Brotherhood Church." Faith and Order Paper 61: Ecumenical Exercise III. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 1972.

African Christian Church and Schools

The African Christian Church and Schools (ACCS) is one of many evangelical AFRICAN INITIATED CHURCHES founded in the central province of Kenya among the Gikuyu people in 1948 as the result of a schism in the Africa Inland Mission. African members and North American missionaries differed over the questions of the ownership of church property and

A missionary teaches at a Christian missionary school in Zaire, Africa. (D. Butcher/TRIP)

African Church of the Holy Spirit

the standards of mission school education. Unlike most of the African churches in Kenya, the ACCS did not begin with a dominant charismatic founder, although Elijah Mbutia was president (later called dignitary) of its first general council until 1966, and it had only two pastors, Joshua Mudai and Paul Gitau. The ACCS was cooperative with the colonial government and was the first African Initiated Church to be admitted to the ecumenical Christian Council of Kenya in 1954. In 1970 this church, like the AFRICAN BROTHERHOOD CHURCH later, received the first eight Canadian Baptist missionaries it had invited to Kenya for an initial ten-year assignment; the relationship continues today. Like the Baptists, the ACCS practices only two sacraments, adult baptism by immersion and the Eucharist.

The church now has a moderator at its helm (presently James N. Waithaka), operates over sixty schools, three medical centers, a home for destitute children in Gituru, and a theological college in Kigumo. The estimated membership in 2000 was about 10,000. The church is a member of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES.

Address:

African Christian Church
P.O. Box 1365
Thika
Kenya

Allan H. Anderson

Sources:

- Amsler, Karrie M., and Paul Robinson. "The African Christian Church and Schools: Faith and Action." Unpublished paper, 1997. Copy located in the Harold Turner Collection, University of Birmingham, UK.
- "The History of A.C.C. and S." Unpublished paper, African Christian Church and Schools, 1973. Copy located in the Harold Turner Collection, University of Birmingham, UK.
- Sandgren, David. "Kamba Christianity: From Africa Inland Mission to African Brotherhood Church." In East African Expressions of Christianity, edited by Thomas Spear and Isaria N. Kimambo. Oxford: James Currey, 1999.

African Church of the Holy Spirit

After a Pentecostal revival in a FRIENDS Africa Mission in 1927, a "Holy Spirit" movement among the Abaluyia people in western Kenya emerged, encouraged by North American missionary Arthur Chilson. The Abaluyia were undoubtedly influenced by similar movements among the neighbouring Luo, and like them, they called their movement Dini ya Roho. The local church leaders and American Friends mission authorities discouraged the revival and banned public confession of sins and spiritual gifts like prophecy and speaking in tongues.

Chilson did not return to Kenya after his furlough in 1928, and the revivalists, expelled from the Friends Mission in 1929, eventually organized themselves under their leader

Jakobo Buluku. Buluku died in 1938 as a result of a violent confrontation between his followers and noncharismatic Friends. As the movement began to organize, a split on the issue of Sabbath observance in 1940 resulted in the Holy Spirit Church of East Africa (HSCEA), eventually led by Bishop Lucas Nuhu. The main church to emerge was called the African Church of the Holy Spirit (ACHS), led since 1952 by Kefa Ayub Mavuru as high priest, officially registered in 1957, and joining the National Christian Council of Kenya in 1960. Several schisms from the ACHS resulted in the Church of Quakers in Africa in 1962 (called the African Church of the Red Cross from 1965), the Gospel Holy Spirit Church of East Africa in 1964, and the Lyahuka Church of East Africa in 1971.

These Roho churches, like the Friends, do not have sacraments of water baptism and Communion, but teach the "baptism in the Holy Spirit of adult persons upon repentance." Rituals for purification from evil precede all church services and must occur before meals and before entering and leaving houses. In common with other spiritual and prophetic churches, members of these Roho churches reject the use of medicines, wear white robes with a red cross, turbans, and beards, and remove shoes in services. The churches emphasize the freedom and power of the Spirit in their church meetings, with ecstatic phenomena, especially prophecy, speaking in tongues, the interpretation of dreams, and healing. The churches have also spread, mainly through migration, to Tanzania and Uganda.

In 1975, the ACHS and the African Israel Nineveh Church were the first two AFRICAN INITIATED CHURCHES in Kenya and the second and third in Africa to become members of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES.

Address:

African Church of the Holy Spirit
P.O. Box 183
Shinyalu, Kakamega
Kenya

Allan H. Anderson

Sources:

- "Consultation with African Instituted Churches, Ogere, Nigeria, 9–14 January 1996." Geneva: World Council of Churches, 1996.
- Hoehler-Fatton, Cynthia. Women of Fire and Spirit: History, Faith and Gender in Roho Religion in Western Kenya. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1996.
- Rasmussen, Ane Marie Bak. Modern African Spirituality: The Independent Spirit Churches in East Africa, 1902–1976. London and New York: British Academic Press, 1996.

African Independent Pentecostal Church of Africa

Churches sticking fairly closely to the churches founded by European missions that they came from, seceding mainly for political reasons and claiming their initial membership from mission churches, began among the Agikuyu in central Kenya as popular movements of protest against the colonial seizure of land and, in particular, against missionary attacks on female circumcision, a central political issue. The African Independent Pentecostal Church of Africa (AIPC) and the AFRICAN ORTHODOX CHURCH (AOC) began in a climate of increasing demands by the Agikuyu for political independence, expressed by the Kikuyu Central Association, and in a corresponding struggle for schools independent of European missions. By 1929, the Kikuyu Independent Schools Association (KISA) under Johana Kunyiha and the Kikuyu Karing'a Educational Association (KKEA), which had the support of future president Jomo Kenyatta, had been formed to provide such independent education. And yet, after the model of mission education, the independent schools also sought to provide a Christian foundation, and for this they needed ordained clergy.

The request of KISA to the Anglicans in 1933 to allow two young men to receive theological training was met with such stringent conditions that KISA and KKEA were forced to look elsewhere. KISA invited the AOC archbishop in South Africa, Daniel Alexander, to come and supervise the training of their clergy, at KISA's expense. Alexander had told KISA that the AOC was "perpetually autonomous and controlled by Negroes entirely" and that it was "a church of Africans governed by the Africans and for the Africans." Alexander arrived in Kenya in November 1935 and remained there until July 1937, during which time he opened a theological seminary with eight students, seven of whom were sponsored by KISA, and one by KKEA. Before his return to South Africa, he ordained three deacons and two subdeacons.

The newly ordained clergy did not agree among themselves about the organization of their new church. Some, supported by KKEA and including the deacon Arthur Gatung'u Gathuna, wanted to remain in the AOC. Others, supported by KISA, formed a separate church altogether, the AIPC, which adopted the name Pentecostal, not because it emphasized the experience of the Spirit, but because it had clergy appointed by the Spirit and was controlled by the Spirit and not by foreigners. And so, in September 1937, the AIPC emerged from KISA and the AOC out of KKEA. As most AFRICAN INITIATED CHURCHES (AICs) were regarded with suspicion by the British colonial administration, both churches were banned in 1952–1953 during the Mau Mau Uprising, and the independent schools were closed. But after independence in 1963, thousands of nominal Presbyterians openly joined the AIPC, which soon had 100,000 members and was led by Archbishop Benjamin Kahihia, one of the original four ordained in 1937.

By 2000, this church was the largest AIC in Kenya and one of the four largest on the continent, with 1,250,000 adherents.

Address:

African Independent Pentecostal Church of Africa
c/o OAIC
P.O. Box 21736
Nairobi
Kenya

Allan H. Anderson

Sources:

- Barrett, David B., and T. John Padwick. Rise Up and Walk! Conciliarism and the African Indigenous Churches, 1815–1987. Nairobi: Oxford University Press, 1989.
- Githieya, Francis K. The Freedom of the Spirit: African Indigenous Churches in Kenya. Atlanta, GA: American Academy of Religion, 1997.

AFRICAN INITIATED CHURCHES

In most countries of the sub-Saharan Africa, African Initiated (Independent/Indigenous/Instituted) Churches (AICs) make up a significant section of the Christian population. Although in Africa there are inevitable difficulties with statistics, David Barrett and John Padwick (1989) have estimated that from a total of about 42,000 AIC members in 1900, there were some 29 million (or 12 percent of the total Christian population of Africa) in 1985, and by 2000 that figure had at least doubled. Most AIC members are found in southern Africa, the Congo (Kinshasa), and along the West African coast, where the proportion of AICs to the total Christian population is much higher than elsewhere. Whatever the accuracy of the statistics, AICs are undoubtedly a major force in African Christianity today, one manifestation of the shifting of the center of gravity of Christianity in the twentieth century from the north to the south. To the consternation of some, this astonishing growth has sometimes been at the expense of older European-founded churches. Living, radical experiments of an indigenized Christianity that has consciously rejected Western ecclesiastical models and forms of being Christian are provided in the AICs.

There are many kinds of AICs, from the earliest “Ethiopian” and “African” churches, which emerged at the end of the nineteenth century, to the later, more prolific “prophet-healing” and “spiritual” churches, and the most recent “new Pentecostal” or “Charismatic” churches that emerged after 1970. Many authorities place the birth of the modern AIC movement in the story of Kimpa Vita (Dona Beatrice) and the Antonian movement in the Kongo Kingdom of the early eighteenth century but more immediately in the early “African” churches in West Africa and the “Ethiopian” churches in South Africa at the end of the nineteenth century. The Liberian prophet William Wade Harris and the Harrist movement that emerged from his remarkable ministry, as well as the ministry of the Nigerian healer-prophet Garrick Braide, influenced the development of a new kind of AIC throughout West Africa—including “spiritual churches” in Ghana and ALADURA (praying) CHURCHES in Nigeria. Parallel developments took place in AICs south of the Zambezi, where the greatest proliferation of AICs in the continent is to be found. ZIONIST AND APOSTOLIC CHURCHES are found there, the largest of which is the ZION CHRISTIAN CHURCH, founded by Engenas Lekganyane, and the more unusual but equally significant Zulu movement of Isaiah Shembe, the NAZARETH BAPTIST CHURCH, better known by its Zulu name amaNazaretha.

The moving story of Simon Kimbangu and Kimbanguism in the Congo resulted in what is now the largest AIC in the continent, the KIMBANGUIST CHURCH, and in the rise of Ngunzi (prophet) churches. Many of these AICs found themselves in violent conflict with both colonial administrations and European missions. Later, the tragic episode of Alice Lenshina and the Lumpa movement in Zambia was an example of an AIC that clashed with the nationalist ideology of a newly independent African nation. In East Africa, and particularly in Kenya, AICs have also proliferated and have become a prominent aspect of Christianity in that region, including the large AFRICAN INDEPENDENT PENTECOSTAL CHURCH OF AFRICA and several “Spirit” or Roho churches. Since the 1960s, AICs have been transplanted and developed in Britain and other parts of Europe, especially those from West Africa. More recent new Pentecostal and Charismatic churches have arisen in different parts of Africa in the last three decades of the twentieth century, resulting in revivalist and rapidly growing independent Pentecostal or Charismatic churches, some of which propagate a “success” and “prosperity” theology, although forming an increasingly significant part of African Christianity.

Types and Terms. The many thousands of AICs today, including the most recent varieties, have become a dominant, as well as the fastest growing, expression of Christianity on the continent. After the European colonization of Africa, a process of religious acculturation took place as older African religious and social traditions were threatened and partially replaced by new ones. The creative independent African Christian churches that began to emerge at the turn of the twentieth century were initially snubbed and persecuted. Western mission church leaders and other observers labeled them “sects” and “nativistic,” “messianic,” “separatist,” and “syncretist” movements. The term African independent churches was probably the first acceptable, neutral phrase used for these new movements. Harold Turner (1979) defined African independent church as “a church which has been founded in Africa, by Africans, and primarily for Africans.” Later, many African churches founded by European missionaries became independent of European control, and the term African indigenous churches was proposed to distinguish between the newly independent churches in Africa and those that had formed autonomous churches decades before. After the African states began to emerge one by one from colonial domination in the 1950s and 1960s, there was new impetus toward the Africanization of Christianity. Many European mission-founded churches began to move toward inculturation and seek to be seen as indigenous. The term African indigenous churches therefore has also become inadequate, particularly because most AICs are not completely free from foreign influence and cannot be regarded as indigenous in any normative sense. African initiated churches and African instituted churches are terms more recently deployed, which avoid these difficulties by simply indicating that these churches were initiated by Africans, and not by Western missionaries.

AICs have often flourished in areas where Protestant missions have been longest, particularly in southern Africa, the Congo Basin, central Kenya, and along the West African coast. There also seems to be a connection between the number of different Protestant missions in a particular region and the emergence of AICs. In any typology of these movements, hasty generalizations or overlooking obvious differences must be avoided, and the distinctive liturgies and healing practices, and the different approaches to African religion taken by different AICs, must be appreciated. The many terms used to describe AICs were coined by European researchers and outsiders, and they are not terms familiar to, or always acknowledged by, the vast majority of AICs themselves—although some may have accepted them for their own purposes. A typology can be no more than a hypothesis that depends on further research for its confirmation or correction, as it may overlook the complexities of the subject or may even distort our understanding of it. Harold Turner’s (1979) sage advice was that it is better to think of a typology of tendencies and emphases rather than of individual religious bodies and movements.

Although there has been extensive literature on AICs over the years, the first systematic and comprehensive regional study appeared in 1948, when Swedish Lutheran missionary Bengt Sundkler published Bantu Prophets in South Africa. This landmark publication set the standard for the flood of literature that followed, and few were to attain it. Sundkler’s own research was conducted in rural Zululand (now KwaZulu Natal) during the mid-1940s, and he identified two main types of AICs in South Africa—Ethiopian and Zionist churches. Most scholars of the movement during the next forty years followed Sundkler’s basic dual typology from southern Africa and placed the many different kinds of AICs from all over the continent into the two broad categories of Ethiopian or African churches, and Zionist or spiritual churches. In West Africa, Turner followed this twofold distinction between Ethiopian type and prophet-healing type; Zimbabwean-born M. L. (Inus) Daneel made the same distinction between Spirit-type and Ethiopian-type churches. Zionist- or Spirit-type is the southern African equivalent of the more appropriate continental terms prophet-healing and spiritual, and it distinguishes prophetic churches, emphasizing the revelation of the Spirit from nonprophetic churches.

It is probably true to say that the dual typology no longer applies to southern African churches, let alone those in the rest of Africa. Nevertheless, in the use of any terms at all, it is important to remember that there are many more “types” of churches than those proposed by researchers, and that the churches themselves often do not recognize the categories given them by outsiders. Furthermore, within every type there are exceptions to the general characteristics—so we have to qualify definitions with terms such as generally or usually. Dividing AICs into types is not particularly helpful, and what is offered here is a very brief outline of an extremely complicated subject. (Types are described to facilitate understanding the broad differences between the movements, but such categorization does not do justice to their diversity. Placing AICs into categories results in generalizations that do not accurately reflect the true nature of each church, and that is not an African concern in any case. Today there are so many recognized exceptions to the “types,” and so many new churches being created, that any typology can only outline some of the common characteristics of different “types” in an attempt to make this vast multifarious movement more understandable to the outsider. Turner [1979] suggested that such a framework and language was necessary both for comparative purposes and in order to distinguish the essential features of African religious movements.)

The types are not intended to be definitive, however, especially as the movements they describe are dynamic churches under a constant process of change. Three broad categories of AICs, however, have certain common features that distinguish them from others, and are described briefly in what follows, while the problems with this categorization are also noted.

African/Ethiopian Churches. AICs that do not claim to be prophetic or to have special manifestations of the Holy Spirit, and which have modeled themselves to a large extent on the European mission churches from which they seceded, have been called Ethiopian or Ethiopian-type churches in southern Africa and African churches in Nigeria. These were usually the first AICs to emerge. The term Ethiopian or African is not used or recognized by all churches in this category, however. In Kenya, for example, the terms are not used at all for many AICs there, which would be very similar in character to this type. The largest of these AICs there is the African Independent Pentecostal Church Africa, which further complicates the typology. Nevertheless, the terms Ethiopian and African are used for want of better ones to describe AICs generally of earlier origin than the other two types described below, and to describe those that arose primarily as political and administrative reactions to European mission-founded churches. For this reason “African” churches are very similar to the churches from which they emerged. They usually practice infant baptism, read liturgies, sing translated European hymns, wear European-type clerical vestments (often black), and are less enthusiastic or emotional in their services than are the “prophet-healing” churches. They tend to be less prescriptive than other AICs regarding food taboos such as eating pork, the use of medicine, and the consumption of alcohol. Most often not named Ethiopian or African, they originated in secessions from mission-founded churches on racial and political grounds. They were a reaction to the white mission’s conquest of African peoples, even though their church organization and Bible interpretation were largely copied from the patterns of those mission churches; sometimes they even include the church’s generic name in the church title: “Methodist,” “Presbyterian,” “Congregational,” “Lutheran,” and so on.

In southern Africa, the word Ethiopian in the church name is more common and had special significance in these countries more heavily colonized than the rest of Africa. Ethiopia, the only African nation that had successfully resisted European colonialism by defeating Italy in war, is mentioned in the Bible as a nation that “stretches out her hands to God” (Psalm 68:31). This verse and the conversion of the Ethiopian court official (Acts 8) formed the basis of the “Ethiopian” ideology that spread in South Africa in the 1890s and may have affected the establishment of these AICs elsewhere. Africans received Christianity before Europeans had, and therefore they had a special place in God’s plan of salvation. The “African” and “Ethiopian” churches have declined in the past fifty years and have been somewhat eclipsed by the other, more enthusiastic Pentecostal-type churches.

Prophet-Healing/Spiritual Churches. The “prophet-healing” or “spiritual” churches are churches that emphasize spiritual power. They are independent African churches with historical and theological roots in the Pentecostal movement, although they have moved in their own direction away from Western forms of Pentecostalism in several respects over the years and may not be regarded as “Pentecostal” without further qualification. Like Pentecostals, however, they are churches that emphasize—usually in contrast to “Ethiopian” and “African” churches—the working of the power of the Spirit in the church. Although these AICs differ fundamentally from Western Pentecostal churches, they too emphasize the centrality of the Spirit in faith and (especially) in practice, and therefore have also been termed African Pentecostal. This is the largest and most significant grouping of AICs, and a particularly difficult type to describe, for it includes a vast variety of some of the biggest of all churches in Africa—the Kimbanguist Church and the African Apostolic Church in Central Africa, the CHRIST APOSTOLIC CHURCH, other Aladura churches and the HARRIST CHURCH in West Africa, and the Zion Christian Church, other Zionist and Apostolic churches, and the amaNazaretha in southern Africa. These are all churches with hundreds of thousands of members, and in at least two cases (Kimbanguists and Zionists), millions. Some of these churches are now members of ecumenical bodies such as the different national councils of churches, the continental All Africa Council of Churches and the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES. In the eyes of those who consider these councils as offering some measure of respectability, these moves are welcomed and give the AICs legitimacy denied them by European churches and colonial powers for so long. But most AICs are not members of ecumenical bodies and are not clamoring to be so. Their legitimacy hails from a belief in divinely appointed leaders who do not feel a need to seek human recognition, and from their time-tested strengths as major denominations in their own right.

Because written theology is not a priority and is generally less precisely formulated in these churches than in European-instituted churches, the differences in belief systems, liturgy, and prophetic healing practices are considerable. Foundational to these churches are definite theological presuppositions, found more in the practice of their Christianity than in formal dogma. Like the new Pentecostal and Charismatic churches described below, there is an emphasis on healing, although the methods of obtaining healing differ. Whereas other Pentecostals generally will practice the laying on of hands or prayer for the sick, that will often be accompanied in prophet-healing churches by the use of various symbolic objects such as blessed water, ropes, staffs, papers, ash, and so on. This constitutes one of the more obvious differences between other Pentecostals and these churches. There are often strong taboos for members prohibiting alcohol, tobacco, and pork. The attitude to traditional religious practices is generally more ambivalent than in the new Pentecostal churches, particularly when it comes to ancestor rituals, and some of these churches also allow polygyny. But for the majority of these churches across Africa, a clear stand is taken against certain traditional practices such as witchcraft and spirit possession.

For the outside observer, the biggest distinguishing feature of these churches in most parts of Africa is the almost universal use of robes and uniforms for members, often white robes with sashes, and in some cases militarylike khaki. These obviously non-African accretions notwithstanding, these churches have possibly adapted themselves to and addressed the popular African worldview more substantially than have other churches, and that is their unique contribution toward understanding Christianity in Africa. It is in fact this adaptation to and confrontation with African tradition that constitutes at the same time both the challenge and the problem of these AICs to a contextual African theology, particularly when African theologians have taken on board the entire spectrum of African traditional religion without question.

Newer Pentecostal/Charismatic Churches. The newer Pentecostal or Charismatic churches and “ministries” are of more recent origin, and may be regarded as “Pentecostal” movements because they too emphasize the power and the gifts of the Holy Spirit. They vary in nature from hundreds of small independent house churches to rapidly growing and large church organizations, such as the DEEPER LIFE BIBLE CHURCH in Nigeria of William Kumuyi, the ZIMBABWE ASSEMBLIES OF GOD AFRICA of Ezekiel Guti, and the Grace Bible Church of Mosa Sono in South Africa, to name a few. Despite their recent origins, some of these churches are already among the largest and most influential denominations in their respective countries, especially in West Africa.

The rapid growth of these churches over the last two decades of the twentieth century indicates that a significant number of their members come from both the older European mission-founded churches and from the prophet-healing churches. There is a strong Western, especially North American, Pentecostal influence in many of these churches, both in liturgy and in leadership patterns, and North American neo-Pentecostal “prosperity” preachers are sometimes promoted. The difference between these churches and new Pentecostal and Charismatic churches in the West is difficult to discern on the surface, except that the leadership is entirely African and more of a local, autonomous nature. Their founders are generally charismatic and younger men and women who are respected for their preaching and leadership abilities and who are relatively well educated, though not necessarily in theology. These churches tend to be more sharply opposed to traditional practices than are the prophet-healing churches, and they often ban alcohol and tobacco, the use of symbolic healing objects, and the wearing of church uniforms. The membership tends to consist of younger, less economically deprived and more formally educated people. They are often seen, particularly by the older AICs, as mounting a sustained attack on traditional African values.

These are three of the ways in which AICs can be described, but these “types” are by no means the only ones, nor is this the only way a typology could be suggested. There are hundreds of AICs that do not fit neatly into any of these three “types,” and probably would not wish to do so. Deciding on types is so often determined by the criteria used, and by who does the deciding. What is important is how the churches see themselves. The tremendously rich diversity and creativity of the AIC movement will be illustrated in the various entries that follow, and this discussion of typology is intended merely as an admittedly superficial introduction to the subject. The reader, it is hoped, will be able to make evaluations about the complexity of the AIC movement on the basis of internal evidence from the churches themselves.

The contribution that the AICs make to Christianity in Africa is considerable. It includes innovative adaptations these churches make to older African religious beliefs, such as their approach to the phenomena of ancestors, divination, and traditional medicine and healing. The AICs make a contribution to the understanding of issues such as contextualization, inculturation, syncretism, and how Christianity relates to African culture. This contribution is so far-reaching that we may really consider this to be a reformation of at least the magnitude of the Protestant Reformation in Europe, and perhaps a more profound reformation than the European one ever was.

Allan H. Anderson

Sources:

- Anderson, Allan H. African Reformation: African Initiated Christianity in the Twentieth Century. Trenton, NJ: Africa World Press, 2001.
- Barrett, David B. Schism and Renewal in Africa: An Analysis of Six Thousand Contemporary Religious Movements. Nairobi: Oxford University Press, 1968.
- Barrett, David B., and T. John Padwick. Rise Up and Walk! Conciliarism and the African Indigenous Churches, 1815–1987. Nairobi: Oxford University Press, 1989.
- Daneel, Inus. Quest for Belonging. Gweru, Zimbabwe: Mambo Press, 1987.
- Sundkler, Bengt G. M. Bantu Prophets in South Africa. London: Oxford University Press, 1948, 1961.
- Turner, Harold W. Religious Innovation in Africa. Boston: G. K. Hall, 1979.

African Israel Church, Nineveh

One of the most prominent AFRICAN INITIATED CHURCHES (AICs) in Kenya is the African Israel Church, Nineveh (AICN), now usually known as the African Israel Nineveh Church, founded in western Kenya in 1942 by the Pentecostal Luyia evangelist Daudi Zakayo Kivuli (1896–1974). Kivuli associated with the PENTECOSTAL ASSEMBLIES OF CANADA from 1925 and was made a supervisor of schools for this mission. After an ecstatic Spirit baptism experience in 1932, he embarked on an evangelistic and healing ministry officially authorized by the Canadian missionary Keller in 1939, and he was well known among both the Luyia and the Luo. When he was elected liaison leader for the church in 1940, other African leaders did not support him.

Apparently with the blessing of Keller, Kivuli founded his own church organization, called at first Huru Salvation Nineveh and soon after, African Israel Church, Nineveh. Kivuli took the title high priest, and his home, Nineveh, became the headquarters of the church and the place to which people flocked. The church was registered with the government in 1957.

The AICN has many practices similar to those of many other Pentecostal churches in other parts of the continent. Members wear long flowing white robes and turbans, practice constant singing and dancing, emphasize Spirit possession, observe Old Testament dietary and purification taboos, and have a holy place (Nineveh) where the present archbishop, a grandson of Kivuli, resides. The AICN, like other Roho churches—those with a Quaker background, such as the AFRICAN CHURCH OF THE HOLY SPIRIT—is known for its joyful and colorful processions and open-air meetings, in which flags, drums, staffs, bells, and trumpets are used in singing to traditional African tunes. Friday, the day of Christ's crucifixion, is declared to be a day of worship together with Sunday, the day of resurrection, and the church places great emphasis on the open confession of sins and daily dawn prayers. Polygamists are accepted as church members, but monogamy is enjoined on all leaders and unmarried members. Alcohol, tobacco, pork, fish without scales, and sexual intercourse on Fridays are all proscribed. This church did not isolate itself as some other Pentecostal churches had done, but after its first application was rejected in 1957, it joined the National Council of Churches of Kenya and was admitted to the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES in 1975.

When Kivuli died in 1974, his wife Rabeca Jumba Kivuli (1902–1988) succeeded him as leader and remained high priestess of the AICN until her retirement in 1983. During her leadership a secession occurred, resulting in a new church called the African Israel Church. Kivuli's grandson, John Mweresa Kivuli II (b. 1960), became high priest in 1983, but from 1991 he has been known as archbishop and has embarked on a process of "modernization." Kivuli II, who completed a theological degree, explained that his change in title was because the AICN had grown in theological understanding, and it now saw all believers as priests and Christ as the only high priest. The church claimed over 800,000 members in Kenya in 1991, and although Luyia and Luo people dominate the membership, the AICN has become an interethnic national movement.

Address:

African Israel Church, Nineveh
P.O. Box 701
Kisumu
Kenya

Allan H. Anderson

Sources:

- Kivuli, John M., II. "The Modernization of an African Independent Church." In Freedom and Independence, edited by Uin Stan Nussbaum. Nairobi: Organization of African Instituted Churches, 1994.
- Kudoyi, Peter Wilson. "African Israel Nineveh Church: A Theological and Socio-Historical Analysis." M.A. thesis, Kenyatta University, 1991.
- Welborn, F. B. and B. A. Ogot. A Place to Feel at Home. London: Oxford University Press, 1966.

African Methodist Episcopal Church

The African Methodist Episcopal Church emerged in the social, religious, and political ferment of late-eighteenth-century America. Its founder, Richard Allen (1760–1831), converted by a traveling Methodist preacher while yet enslaved, was one of at least two persons of African descent present at the 1784 founding conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church (MEC) (now a constituent part of the UNITED METHODIST CHURCH). Just three years later he co-led the movement that came eventually to take form in the founding of the African Methodist Episcopal Church (AMEC).

The MEC early on distinguished itself among African Americans by its active evangelistic outreach to them, by the congeniality of its simple style of piety, and by its willingness to admit blacks to certain levels of religious leadership. Nonetheless, the oppressive, discriminatory conditions of life for Africans imported into the United States had the result that these people who had been of disparate ethnic and regional origins on the African continent were pulled into a common frame of existential needs and interests. So that, while finding satisfaction in their worship with Whites, Blacks felt the urge to also have devotional time apart. Here, in an empathetic atmosphere of mutuality and shared experience, they might find space to express freely their particular concerns and needs and be led in connecting these to the resources of their faith. The first of such separate gatherings among Methodists occurred in 1786 in Baltimore. It should be added that here, as in many other such separations, discriminatory practice in the church itself was a prime contributing factor. For instance, the two Methodist congregations in Baltimore had instituted the practice of serving Communion to their black members after all whites had been served.

In November of 1787, Richard Allen and other blacks arriving to worship at Philadelphia's St. George Methodist Church were directed to a new gallery seating area. But they took seats in what turned out to be the Whites-only section of the gallery. As they knelt for prayer, a church officer approached, insisted that they move, and began physically to remove them, though prayer was still in progress. Prayer shortly ending, Allen, Absalom Jones, Dorus Ginnings, William White, and several other women and men decided that rather than remain in the face of such indignity, they would leave the church altogether and seek a more fitting and hospitable situation for divine worship.

For several years, this group and those whom they recruited met and conducted religious exercises as part of the Free African Society, which had been formed earlier in 1787 as a mutual-aid society, a form of insurance/support organization to address material crises and social and spiritual development.

By 1794, Allen and Jones had raised monies for the erection of a church building. Disagreement among the members of the Free African Society over which denomination they should affiliate with resulted in the formation of two congregations. The structure that had been built and the majority of members became the African Episcopal Church of St. Thomas, which Absalom Jones consented to lead. Allen purchased and remodeled as a worship space an old blacksmith shop, to be the Bethel African Methodist Episcopal Church.

For some twenty-two years Bethel functioned as an MEC congregation, with white pastors appointed by the Methodist Conference. But the assigned pastors treated the congregation rudely. The inability over the years to obtain relief from the conference from this abuse in their own separate facility, combined with a dispute with the conference over the ownership of church property, led to discussions with other similarly separated black Methodist congregations about the possibility of formal independence. Sixteen clergy and lay representatives of five congregations met in Philadelphia in April 1816 and voted to sue in the Pennsylvania State Supreme Court for legal independence. The plea was granted, and the new denomination was incorporated as the African Methodist Episcopal Church. Daniel Coker, of the Baltimore church, was elected the first bishop but declined the next day in favor of Richard Allen.

Home missions began from the first days of the denomination. There was an active effort in the North. Restrictions on the travel of free blacks in the slave South inhibited the work in that area until after the American Civil War, while in the trans-Mississippi West, churches were sprinkled through every territory, most heavily on the Pacific coast. There were even missions to Native Americans and Mexicans in the Southwest and Mexico.

In 1821, Daniel Coker became the first to undertake overseas mission work, establishing congregations in Liberia and Sierra Leone. Coker's work, however, was not under AMEC sponsorship. Official overseas missions to Africa began in 1824, when the church sent John Boggs to Liberia. In subsequent decades the church sent additional personnel to the work in Liberia and Sierra Leone. In 1864, a Board of Missions was established, and a denominational-level secretary of missions was elected. Though many of the mission initiatives taken by the church from its early days had not been continued due to inadequate support, by 1878, AMEC work on the African continent was permanently established.

In the 1890s, Bishop Henry McNeal Turner (1834–1915) visited West Africa, in part exploring his dream of African American emigration to Africa as the alternative to endemic abuse and discrimination in the United States. While there, he organized annual conferences in Liberia and Sierra Leone. In 1896, in response to appeals from South African Rev. Mangena Maake Mokone for affiliation of his Ethiopian Church of South Africa with the AME Church, Bishop Turner implemented the organization of the work as the Eighteenth Episcopal District of the AME Church. Two years later, the Women's Home and Foreign Missionary Society was established to lend support to missions in southern Africa. As the twentieth century progressed, so, also, did the denomination's work on the continent. There are now five episcopal districts in Africa, one in West Africa, and four in southern Africa.

Whereas the AME Church, practically from the outset, saw a mandate to be in ministry to the people of their homeland, Africa, they also recognized a field of service in the Caribbean. In 1827, the Reverend Scipio Beane was commissioned to initiate work in Haiti. Though Africa came to take the focus of foreign mission work in that time period, the Caribbean was not forgotten. In 1874, the church organized the Women's Parent Mite Missionary Society. Its portfolio included support for the work in the Caribbean islands and Central and South America, as well as other fields. Under a succession of secretaries of missions, such as the noted L. L. Berry, the work proceeded, ultimately resulting in the permanent planting of the AME Church in Suriname-Guyana, the Windward Islands, the Virgin Islands, the Dominican Republic, Haiti, Jamaica, and Cuba. The annual conferences of those places, along with London, England, constitute the church's Sixteenth Episcopal District.

As with the other large historically black branches of Methodism, the AME Church through the years has had a particular concern for education. It began one of the first and oldest continuously existing black-run institutions of learning, Wilberforce University, and has maintained numerous other schools, colleges, seminaries, and institutes. The church counts over two million members in 6,200 congregations.

Address:

African Methodist Episcopal Church
500 Eighth Ave. S.
Nashville, TN 37203
<http://www.amecnet.org>

Larry G. Murphy

Sources:

- Allen, Richard. The Life Experience and Gospel Labors of the Rt. Rev. Richard Allen. Nashville: Abingdon Press, 1983.
- Murphy, Larry, et al. eds. The Encyclopedia of African American Religions. New York: Garland Publishing, 1993.
- Richardson, Harry V. Dark Salvation: The Story of Methodism as It Developed among Blacks in America. Garden City, NY: Anchor-Press/Doubleday, 1976.
- Singleton, George A. The Romance of African Methodism. Nashville: AME Press, 1985.

African Methodist Episcopal Zion Church

An African American woman, known to history only as Betty, was among the band of five people who constituted the first recorded Methodist meeting in North America (1766). African Americans contributed toward the construction of the first Methodist meetinghouse, to be named the John Street Church, in New York City. It was from this congregation that arose what was ultimately the second major autonomous body of black Methodists.

The independent African Methodist Episcopal Zion Church (AMEZ Church) grew from the same sociocultural matrix that produced the AFRICAN METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH under the leadership of Richard Allen (1760–1831) in Philadelphia. While contented with their affiliation to the Methodist Episcopal Church (MEC) (now an integral part of the UNITED METHODIST CHURCH), they desired accommodation within that body to their needs and concerns and to be fully privileged members, with equal access to the liturgical and sacramental life of the church, and they wanted acceptance of African Americans to full ordination. Their proscribed status in the larger society gave particular impetus to their felt need to hold separate devotional services, in addition to worship shared with whites, services that could connect the resources of the faith to their circumstances as marginalized, often abused Americans.

Meeting first informally, under white clergy supervision, the black members of St. John in 1796 requested that they be allowed an official separate meeting, in their own facility. The request was granted by MEC bishop Francis Asbury (1745–1816). A building belonging to one of the black members was fitted up as a worship space for the new “African Chapel.” By 1800, another larger, more permanent structure was erected, and in 1801 a congregation was chartered that called itself Zion Church, the name in public records being the African Methodist Episcopal Church of the City of New York.

Still a separate congregation in full communion with the MEC, with white clergy appointed by that body, it might have remained so had not Zion Church been caught up in a controversy with its sister white churches concerning church governance and the ownership of congregational property. Many members in the Methodist congregations desired greater lay participation in denominational legislation and administration. Further, they took issue with the policy of centralized conference ownership and control of all congregational properties. By 1820, the matter came to open legal dispute in the Methodist Conference. Zion Church, which had been granted ownership of its property as one of the terms of its separate status, found itself on the side of the dissidents, who, coincidentally, were led by Zion’s white pastor, Rev. William Stillwell (d. 1851). Already disturbed by the continued resistance of the conference to ordaining black clergy, Zion Church was at a point of decision. The resolution reached was to form its own rules of governance, or Discipline, and to move toward full autonomy.

There had been deep dissatisfaction with earlier initiatives by representatives of Richard Allen, sent to New York to recruit members for his Philadelphia-based group, hence a choice not to join with the Allenites. Instead, in 1821, Zion joined with another separate New York body of black Methodists, the Asbury Church, and four other similarly organized groups in New York, Connecticut, and Pennsylvania, to form an independent African Methodist Episcopal Church. One of the early and sustaining Zion leaders, James Varick, was selected in 1822 as the first bishop (then called superintendent). To establish clearly its identity as distinct from the Philadelphia group of the same name, and in honor of the popular name of the mother church, the General Conference of 1848 added “Zion” to the denomination’s official name.

Though it emerged to independence in New York, many of the AMEZ Church’s key judicatory offices and its most enduring educational institutions, Livingstone College and Hood Seminary, came to be located in North Carolina, ultimately the seat of its numerical strength.

Like the AME Church, the AMEZ Church experienced slow early growth, partly as a result of the restrictions imposed by the South on their evangelization amongst the enslaved, which encompassed the great majority of the black population. Thus it was that with Emancipation, the church experienced a major swelling of its ranks. The work of recruitment among the emancipated was led by Bishop J. J. Clinton (1823–1881), but the impetus for it came from

Mrs. Melvina Fletcher, who challenged Bishop Clinton to proceed with this task, which had been assigned to him, and who raised the funds to underwrite the work.

Meanwhile, by the mid-nineteenth century, energetic, highly capable pioneers such as Rev. John J. Moore began extension of the church's presence to the Far West. By century's end, Calvin C. Petty (1849–1900), Thomas H. Lomax (1832–1908), and Alexander Walters (1858–1917) (all, like Rev. Moore, later to become bishops) were among those who had continued the westward expansion, including the organization of AMEZ Annual Conferences in the Southwest and Far West.

The AMEZ Church holds the distinction of being among the first of the independent black denominations to fully ordain women, conferring deacon's orders upon Julia A. J. Foote in 1884 and upon Mary J. Small in 1895. Rev. Foote was ordained elder in 1900.

The AMEZ Church had been active in its participation in the Underground Railroad's conveying of escaped slaves to freedom in Canada. Seeing it as appropriate to follow through on that ministry, the church desired to extend its full services to this Canadian population. Work in Canada proceeded, and by 1856 a British North America Conference was established. But the black population of Canada dwindled, and the church found itself with insufficient resources to sustain the work properly. So in 1864 the recently established conference was merged with the New England Conference.

Mission attention shifted to the promising field of the African continent. AMEZ work on the African continent was initiated in 1878, when the Reverend Andrew Cartwright formed a congregation in Brewerville, Liberia. In 1880, the General Conference organized the General Home and Foreign Board and the Ladies Mission Society to support the work of foreign missions. In 1896, the church appointed the Reverend John Small (1845–1905) as bishop to Africa. Bishop Small focused on training local leadership for the African work, rather than recruiting black Americans. Small was successful in establishing the AMEZ Church firmly in the Gold Coast (present-day Ghana). Bishops and missionary workers who followed in the path opened by Cartwright and Small extended the work along the West African coast from Liberia to Nigeria, and into South Africa.

Back in the Western Hemisphere, there had been intermittent initiatives to the West Indies and South America. As early as 1856, a church had been established in Demerara, followed a few years later by work in Haiti. By 1899, there were also congregations in Santo Domingo. The twentieth century saw further development in the West Indies, with Annual Conferences formed in Guyana, the Bahamas, the Virgin Islands, Jamaica, and England.

At the beginning of the twenty-first century, the AMEZ Church counts some 1.5 million in its membership, with three thousand congregations.

Address:

African Methodist Episcopal Zion Church
P.O. Box 23843
Charlotte, NC 28232
<http://www.theamezchurch.org>

Larry G. Murphy

Sources:

- Bradley, David Henry. A History of the A.M.E. Zion Church. Vol. 2. Nashville: The Parthenon Press, 1970.
- Murphy, Larry G., J. Gordon Melton, and Gary L. Ward, eds. The Encyclopedia of African American Religions. New York: Garland Publishing, 1993.
- Richardson, Harry V. Dark Salvation: The Story of Methodism as It Developed among Blacks in America. Garden City, NY: Anchor-Press/Doubleday, 1976.
- Walls, William J. The African Methodist Episcopal Zion Church: Reality of the Black Church. Charlotte, NC: A.M.E. Zion Publishing House, 1974.

African Orthodox Church

The African Orthodox Church is one of several churches that have originated in America but experienced their greatest success outside the country of their origin. The church was founded by George Alexander McGuire (1866–1934), formerly a priest in the EPISCOPAL CHURCH. He had risen as far as an African American could in that church at the time, and in 1919 he left the church and founded the Good Shepherd Independent Episcopal Church. He subsequently sought consecration as a bishop in order to found a church with apostolic succession that would be led and controlled by people of African descent.

McGuire was consecrated in 1921 by Joseph Rene Vilatte (1854–1929), then head of the small American Catholic Church, who had received his orders from the SYRIAN ORTHODOX CHURCH OF MALABAR. McGuire was then installed as the first bishop of the new African Orthodox Church, a church that was orthodox in faith and practice but not in communion with the ECUMENICAL PATRIARCHATE or other canonical orthodox bishops.

The church found an immediate response, primarily with the community of expatriate West Indians then residing in many American cities. Within two years congregations had been established in Brooklyn, New York; Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania; New Haven, Connecticut; as well as Nova Scotia, Cuba, and Santa Domingo. Additional congregations, including one in the Bahamas, soon emerged.

Following McGuire's death, the church has experienced a bumpy course in the United States. There were several schisms, finally healed in the 1960s. In the 1980s, there were seventeen parishes, but the number declined through the 1990s.

The African branch of the church began in 1924 when several members of the African church left to found an independent body. The leader of the group, Daniel William Alexander (1883–1970), the son of a West Indian immigrant to South Africa, learned of the existence of the African Orthodox Church, and in 1927 traveled to the United States, where he was consecrated as bishop (and later elevated to archbishop). Upon his return to South Africa, he established his headquarters in Kimberly. He traveled the countryside establishing churches both across South Africa and in Kenya, Uganda, and Rhodesia (now Zambia).

The amiable relationship between the African and American branches continued through the years, and in 1960 the international leader of the church, Patriarch James I (William E. J. Robertson), traveled to Africa to consecrate the successors of the aging archbishop. While there, the patriarch ordered Alexander to resign in favor of one of the newly consecrated bishops. The break caused by the incident was healed soon after Patriarch James's death in 1962, and Wafter Mbina succeeded Alexander. However, in 1963, Alexander suddenly reasserted his leadership, broke with both the American church and Mbina, assumed the title of patriarch, and reorganized his following as the African Orthodox Church in the Republic of South Africa. It is that church that has survived to the present. He was succeeded by his godson, Daniel Kanyiles (Patriarch James II). In the 1970s, the church reported twenty parishes in South Africa.

The work in Uganda had begun in 1929 when Ruben Spartas, an Anglican, heard of the African Orthodox Church. In 1932, he obtained ordination from Bishop Alexander, but the next year he came to the conclusion that the African Orthodox Church was not fully Orthodox, and brought his work under the GREEK ORTHODOX PATRIARCHATE OF ALEXANDRIA AND ALL AFRICA, which already had work in the region. The group (some 7,000 strong), however, broke away from the patriarch of Alexander in 1966 and formed the African Greek Orthodox Church.

Early in the 1930s, Alexander spent over a year working in Kenya, raising a constituency and ordaining two priests. This church ran into trouble in 1952 when it was associated with the Mau Mau terrorism. Its schools were closed, and it was not allowed to conduct public worship. When the ban was lifted in the 1970s, the remaining Orthodox believers transferred their allegiance to the patriarch in Alexandria.

The American branch of the African Orthodox Church has its headquarters in New York. Its current patriarch is Archbishop Jamen Bernardt Butler.

Address:

African Orthodox Church
International Chancery, Holy Cross Cathedral
122 West 129th St.
New York, NY 10027

Sources:

Githieya, Francis Kimani. The Freedom of the Spirit: African Indigenous Churches in Kenya. Atlanta, GA: Scholar's Press, 1997.
Newman, Richard. "The Origins of the African Orthodox Church." In The Negro Churchman. Millwood, NY: Krause Reprint Co., 1977.
Terry-Thompson, A. C. The History of the African Orthodox Church. N.p., 1956.

African Protestant Church

The African Protestant Church originated within the American Presbyterian mission in Cameroon in the 1930s. In 1921, the mission (now the Presbyterian Church of Cameroon) had founded a Bible school (now Dager Theological School) at Bibia. Students were trained in German and then, if deemed worthy, sent to Europe for further training. In 1934, some pastors led by Martin Bambba Minkio and working among the Ngumba people demanded the use of their native language. They left the mission and established an independent church. The church quickly received some 2,000 members from the mission.

Originally the church was named Église Protestante autochtone, but the name was subsequently changed to Église Protestante Ngumba and more recently assumed its present name, in French, Église protestante africaine. The church has remained small (6,000 members in the late 1990s), but has become a member of the All Africa Council of Churches and the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES. It is headed by the church synod.

Address:

African Protestant Church
B.P. 6754
Yaoundé
Cameroon

Source:

Bauswein, Jean-Jacques, and Lukas Vischer, eds. The Reformed Family Worldwide: A Survey of Reformed Churches, Theological Schools, and International Organizations. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans, 1999.

Agnosticism

Agnosticism is an intellectual position based on the belief that proving or disproving God's existence is beyond human competence. In 1869, when he coined the term, Thomas Huxley said of the agnostic, "When I reached intellectual maturity and began to ask myself whether I was an atheist, a theist, or a pantheist . . . I found that the more I learned and reflected, the less ready was the answer. They [believers] were quite sure they had attained a certain 'gnosis,'—had, more or less successfully, solved the problem of existence; while I was quite sure I had not, and had a pretty strong conviction that the problem was insoluble."

There are many positions one can take with regard to the God question. One may be a theist and hold to a “belief in a deity, or deities” and “belief in one God as creator and supreme ruler of the universe.” Or one may hold to ATHEISM, the “disbelief in, or denial of, the existence of a God.” Agnosticism, in contrast, is defined as “unknowing, unknown, unknowable.” At a party held one evening in 1869, Huxley further clarified the term agnostic, referencing St. Paul’s mention of an altar in Athens to “the Unknown God” in Acts 17:23, as “one who holds that the existence of anything beyond and behind material phenomena is unknown and so far as can be judged unknowable, and especially that a First Cause and an unseen world are subjects of which we know nothing.”

Agnostics make a point of distinguishing between a statement about the universe and a statement about one’s personal beliefs. One may personally believe in God and still argue, as the agnostic does, that by the criteria of science and reason God is an unknowable concept. We cannot prove or disprove God’s existence through empirical evidence or deductive proof. Therefore, the agnostic suggests that theism and atheism are both indefensible positions as statements about the universe. Thomas Huxley once again clarified this distinction: “Agnosticism is not a creed but a method, the essence of which lies in the vigorous application of a single principle. Positively the principle may be expressed as, in matters of the intellect, follow your reason as far as it can carry you without other considerations. And negatively, in matters of the intellect, do not pretend the conclusions are certain that are not demonstrated or demonstrable. It is wrong for a man to say he is certain of the objective truth of a proposition unless he can produce evidence which logically justifies that certainty.”

Martin Gardner, one of the founders of the modern skeptical movement, is a believer, but one who believes that the existence of God cannot be proved. He now refers to himself as a fideist, or someone who believes in God for personal or pragmatic reasons, but his position could also be described as agnostic. In defending his position, he noted, “As a fideist I don’t think there are any arguments that prove the existence of God or the immortality of the soul. Even more than that, I agree with Unamuno that the atheists have the better arguments. So it is a case of quixotic emotional belief that is really against the evidence and against the odds.”

Atheists often accuse agnostics of being wishy-washy. Many atheists would argue that there are really only two positions on the God question: You either believe in God or you do not believe in God—theism or atheism. Agnostics respond that atheism typically means denial of the existence of a God and agnostics argue that denial of a God is an untenable position. It is no more possible to prove God’s nonexistence than it is to prove His existence. “There is no

God” is no more defensible a statement than “There is a God.”

Michael Shermer

Sources:

Huxley, Thomas H. Collected Essays. Vol. 5. New York: D. Appleton, 1894.

Shermer, Michael. How We Believe: The Search for God in an Age of Science. New York: W. H. Freeman, 2000.

Agonshū

Agonshū, a Japanese “new, new religion” (in Japanese, shin shin shukyo) was established in its present form in 1978 by Kiriya Seiyo (b. 1921), its founder and Kancho (leader). Kiriya started an earlier movement in 1954 known as Kannon Jikeikai, Association for the Worship of the bodhisattva Kannon, who is regarded as the most potent symbol of compassion and mercy and a widely worshipped Buddhist figure, not only in Japan but also among Japanese and their descendants in other countries, including the United States and Brazil.

In the late 1970s, Kiriya claimed to have discovered the essentials of original, authentic Buddhism, by reading the Agama (in Japanese, Agon, whence the name of the sect) sutras, early Buddhist texts that, he claimed, pre-date all other Buddhist sutras, including the Lotus Sutra, which is widely revered in Japan. This discovery provided Kiriya with an unrivalled understanding of the deeper meaning of Buddhism. In practice it meant the development of a system of beliefs and practices, the principal aim of which is to ensure that the sufferings of the spirits of the dead are terminated as they attain jobutsu (Buddhahood).

In its teachings Agonshū stresses that all misfortunes and problems in life can be explained by reference to one’s own or one’s ancestors karmic actions. Large-scale goma rituals, in which requests or petitions are inscribed on sticks or wood that are then burnt on a pyre while invocations are chanted, are performed every Friday in the Sohonzan Main Temple in Kyoto to eliminate negative ancestral karma and transform the sufferings of the spirits of the dead into Buddhahood. The main annual festivals are the Star Festival (Hoshi Matsuri) on February 11, which consists of an outdoor goma ritual on a grand scale, the Flower Festival of April 8 to mark the Buddha’s birthday, the Great Buddha Festival (Dai-Butsu Sai) of May 5, and the Tens of Thousands of Lanterns service, held in Kyoto July 13–15 and in Tokyo August 13–15, for the liberation and peace of ancestors’ souls. Many of those who attend the Tens of Thousands of Lanterns service at Kyoto also visit the Agonshū cemetery on the Kashihara hills northwest of the ancient capital city of Nara. The unique feature of this cemetery is that every tomb has what is called a Ho

Kyo Into, in which a small replica of the Busshari and its casket is placed.

Agonshū's principal object of veneration is the shinsei-busshari (true Buddha relic), a casket said to contain an actual fragment of a bone of the Buddha, and hence his spirit. Three esoteric methods (shugyo) form the core of the training undertaken by recruits: jobutsu-ho, which provides the necessary sensitivity and aptitude for spiritual enlightenment; noyi hoju-ho, a practice performed with the shinsei-busshari that enables one to achieve the happiness, good fortune, and insight to cut loose from karma (a rare accomplishment); and gumonji somei-ho, a technique for developing profound wisdom and extraordinary mental awareness.

The estimated size of the membership in Japan is one million, and Agonshū now has a modest following of between one hundred and one thousand members in most countries of the Far East, Asia, and Africa. It is also present in small numbers in Mongolia, Russia, the United States, Canada, Brazil, and several European countries. The movement is actively engaged in projects for the establishment of world peace and the reform of Buddhism through the teaching of the Agama sutras.

Agonshū is organized into main offices, branch offices, dojos (centers or places of worship where teaching and training take place), and local offices. There are seven main offices in different regions of Japan, and a main religious center in Kyoto, while it has administrative headquarters in both Tokyo and Kyoto.

Address:

Agonshū
607 Kitakazan Omine-cho
Yamashima, Kyoto
Japan

Peter B. Clarke

Sources:

The founder and present leader, Kiriya Seiyo, has published many treatises in Japanese on the teachings of the movement, including Henshin no genri (The principles of transformation). Tokyo: Kadokawa Bunsho, 1971.

Reader, Ian. "Agon Shu: The Rise of a Japanese 'New, New Religion': Themes in the Development of Agon shu." Japanese Journal of Religious Studies 15, 4 (1988): 231–261.

Ahmadiyya Anjuman Ishaat Islam, Lahore

Following the death of its founder, Hazrat Mirza Ghulam Ahmad (1835–1908), the AHMADIYYA MOVEMENT IN ISLAM faced a division concerning his status. During his lifetime, Ahmad had successively declared his calling to help revive Islam, his role as al-Mahdi, the expected Hidden Imam of the Shi'a Muslims who was expected to return at the end of the age to reform Islam, and then his prophet-hood, an affirmation that would make him equal in status to Muhammad. Most of the followers, including Ahmad's family, continued to affirm his elevated status, including his prophethood. However, others, under the guidance of Maulawi Muhammad Ali (d. 1951), while considering Ahmad the promised Messiah (expected by both Christians and Muslims), stopped short of affirming his prophethood. Ali argued that Ahmad's references to his prophetic status should be understood allegorically, not literally. Ahmad is the greatest mujaddid (a renewer of Islam) but is not equal to Muhammad. Ali especially argued that the acknowledgment of Ahmad's status was not a precondition to being considered a Muslim.

The Lahore Ahmadiyyas assumed control of the Woking Muslim Mission in England, which had been founded at the Woking Mosque in 1913 by Khwaja Kamal-ud-Din (1870–1932). The mission influenced a number of British converts to Islam with its nonsectarian approach to Islam. For the next fifty years the mission was a major center for the dissemination of Islam in the United Kingdom (until its expulsion from the mosque in the 1960s). A mosque and mission were opened in Berlin in 1926. Surviving World War II, it continues as the center of the propagation of Lahore Islam in the German language.

The Ahmadiyya movement spread initially into those countries where Pakistanis and Indians had migrated in numbers. Hence it opened work in Fiji, Suriname, Trinidad, Guyana, South Africa, and Indonesia, where it answered attacks by both Christians and Hindus.

In 1974, the Pakistani government amended its constitution so as to categorize members of both the Ahmadiyya Movement in Islam and the Ahmadiyya Anjuman Ishaat Islam, Lahore as being non-Muslims. This opinion was seconded by the MUSLIM WORLD LEAGUE, based in Saudi Arabia. Then in 1984, the Pakistanis issued an ordinance prohibiting Ahmadiyyas from referring to themselves as Muslims or representing themselves as Muslims in any manner. They also prohibited members of the movement (with criminal penalties for disobeying) from engaging in some distinctive Muslim practices and using several Muslim terms.

The Lahore Ahmadiyyas denied the validity of these actions, feeling that they were based on new nontraditional criteria for membership in the Muslim community. Muslims have responded that while the Lahore believers have dropped the offensive reference to Ahmad as a prophet, they have not dropped some of Ahmad's other unique beliefs, especially the end to jihad (holy war), a major belief of Orthodox Islam. The Lahore community have made much of a case in South Africa in which one of their members filed a civil suit against the Muslim Judicial Council. He claimed that the council was defaming him by branding the Ahmadis as unbelievers and apostates. The case was decided in 1985 in his favor.

A mosque in Surrey, England, for the Lahore Ahmadiyyas (Richard Little/TRIP)

Ahmadiyya Movement in Islam

The Ahmadiyya Anjuman Ishaat Islam, Lahore is present in some sixteen countries around the world, with a particularly strong following in the Netherlands.

Address:

Ahmadiyya Anjuman Ishaat Islam, Lahore
5-USman Block
New Garden Town
P.O. Box Ferozepur Road
Lahore, P.C. 54600
Pakistan
<http://www.aaail.org>

Sources:

Ali, Muhammad. The Founder of the Ahmadiyya Movement. Newark, CA: Ahmadiyya Anjuman Ishaat Islam, Lahore, 1984.
Aziz, Zahid, comp. The Ahmadiyya Case. Newark, CA: Ahmadiyya Anjuman Ishaat Islam, Lahore, 1987.
Faruqi, N. A. Ahmadiyyat in the Service of Islam. Newark, CA: Ahmadiyya Anjuman Ishaat Islam, Lahore, 1983.

Ahmadiyya Movement in Islam

The Ahmadiyya Movement in Islam began as one aspect of the larger revival of Islam that swept through the Muslim world in the nineteenth century; in the years after the death of its founder, however, it took a direction that pushed it to the fringe of Islam. The movement was launched by Mirza Ghulam Hazrat Ahmad (1835–1908), a Pakistani government worker, who as a devout Muslim brooded over what he perceived was the decline of the Muslim community. In 1880, he published a book, Barahin-I-Ahmadiyah, in which he revealed the calling he felt to help revive Islam in the face of a militant Christian mission in India.

In 1891, he proclaimed that he was al-Mahdi, the expected Hidden Imam of the Shi'a Muslims who was expected to return at the end of the age to reform Islam. His proclamation came as part of an attack upon Christianity, in which he also declared his belief that Jesus was a prophet (in other words, a person of the same high status as Muhammad) but was not divine. He went on to articulate his unique belief that Jesus had not died on the cross, but had survived his ordeal and later moved to Kashmir, where he lived out his normal life. The Second Coming would not involve the reappearance of the resurrected Jesus, but the appearance of someone with the spirit and power of Jesus, a person like Ahmad.

Ahmad began a massive missionary effort directed to the West arguing for Islam, but including as an integral part of his message the claim about his role as the fulfiller of the prophecy of the Second Coming of Jesus. In 1901, he took the additional step of declaring himself a prophet, and hence equal to Muhammad. After his death, those Muslims attracted to his movement argued about his prophethood. The majority continued aligned to Ahmad's family and proclaimed his prophethood, even going so far as to suggest that only those who acknowledged the new prophet Ahmad were true Muslims. But a significant minority rejected the claim (while asserting Ahmad's role as a renewer, or mujad-did, of Islam) and organized as the AHMADIYYA ANJUMAN ISHAAT ISLAM, LAHORE.

Upon Ahmad's death, a caliphate (without any political powers) was instituted to lead the movement. The first caliph and successor to Ahmad was Hazrat Haji Hakeem Maulvi Nurud-Din Sahib (1841–1914). He was succeeded in turn by Sahibzada Bashirud-Din Mahmud Ahmad Sahib (1889–1965), only twenty-five years old at the time. He was called to lead the movement through the early 1950s, when popular feeling against it reached a new peak and led to rioting. In 1954, he was almost killed when a man stabbed him in the neck. In 1955, he established an electoral college consisting of some 150 of the movement's leaders, who were to determine his successor.

Following the caliph's death in 1965, his son, Sahibzada Mirza Nasir Ahmad Sahib (1909–1982), was elected to succeed him. He led the movement as it spread internationally, while at the same time fighting for its status in the Muslim world. He was succeeded by the current caliph, Hazrat Mirza Tahir Ahmad (b. 1928).

The Ahmadiyya Movement in Islam holds most beliefs common to Orthodox Sunni Islam, although Ahmad did challenge one of the pillars of Islam by declaring the end to jihad (holy war). The primary belief that separates the movement from the larger world of Islam, however, remains the role it assigns to its founder. That additional affirmation has led to the movement being seen as a sectarian Islamic movement by the great majority of Muslims. In 1974, the Pakistani government declared the movement to be non-Muslim, a move followed by the MUSLIM WORLD LEAGUE, which also declared it to be outside of Islam. In 1984, Pakistan also passed an ordinance forbidding Ahmadiyyas from referring to or representing themselves as Muslims. These actions have not stopped the movement's spread, and it now exists in more than 174 countries, its legal status secure in the great majority where Islam is also a minority faith. It has spread across North America, where it has particular appeal to African Americans.

The international headquarters of the movement is in Rabwah, Pakistan. The American branch has developed an expansive Internet site at <http://www.alislam.org>. As the new century begins, it claims more than 130 million adherents worldwide.

Sources:

Ahmad, Hazrat Mirza Bashiruddin Mahmud. Ahmadiyyat, or the True Islam. Washington, DC: American Fazl Mosque, 1951.
Dard, A. R. Life of Ahmad. Lahore, Pakistan: Tashir Publications, 1948.

Khan, Muhammad Zafrulla. Ahmadiyya, the Renaissance of Islam. London: Tabshir Publications, 1978.

Nadwi, S. Abul Hasan Ali. Qadianism, A Critical Study. Lucknow, India: Islamic Research and Publications, 1974.

Al Qaeda

Al Qaeda (literally, “The Base,” also spelled al-Qa’idah), is the Muslim organization founded by Osama bin Laden (b. 1957) (also known as Usama bin Laden) that is at the center of the World Islamic Front, a network formed in 1998 of groups that have shown a willingness to undertake violence (including terrorism) in their cause. Their cause is what has been termed Islamism, or, popularly in the West, Islamic fundamentalism. Islamists have as their goal removing of Western influence (both political and cultural) in the Muslim world and restoring the rule of Islamic law in Muslim countries. The World Islamic Front includes the Jihad Group in Egypt, the Egyptian Islamic Group, the Jamiat-ul-Ulema-e-Pakistan, and the Jihad Movement in Bangladesh.

The emergence of Al Qaeda is very much tied to the career of its founder. Osama bin Laden was born in 1957 in Saudi Arabia, the son of a wealthy Saudi businessman (a pious follower of WAHHABI ISLAM) and his Syrian wife. He attended King Abdul Aziz University where the conservative Wahhabi perspective was reinforced. During his student years, he became acquainted with Abdullah Azzam (1941–1989), a Jordanian Islamist leader who had joined the university faculty, and Muhammad Qutb, the brother of Egyptian Islamist theorist Sayyid Qutb (1906–1966). The pair introduced him to the ideology of Islamism and its program for establishing Islamic political power. The Islamist perspective provided a new context, one that changed bin Laden’s future course, for the events of 1979: the Iranian Revolution, the taking of the mosque in Mecca by groups of Muslim dissidents, and the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan. These events, understood in the context of Islamism, launched him on his activist career; his experience was not unlike the awakening experienced by the leaders of the MUSLIM BROTHERHOOD in Egypt a generation previously. In 1980, he moved to Afghanistan and began to raise money for the resistance to the Soviets. In 1984, he established the House of the Faithful (Beit-al-Ansar) in Peshawar (on the Pakistani side of the Khyber Pass) as a logistics base for the anti-Soviet forces. In Afghanistan he also became reacquainted with Abdullah Azzam, who had established a Services Office to help recruit soldiers from the larger Muslim world. During this time he was able to build a vast international network of support for the Afghani fight. He formally established Al Qaeda in 1989.

The 1989 abandonment of Afghanistan by the Soviets was followed in 1990 by the invasion of Kuwait by Iraqi forces at the direction of Saddam Hussein. Bin Laden offered his services to the Saudi government. The fact that the Americans took center stage in liberating Kuwait appears to have been the beginning of bin Laden’s disillusionment with Saudi Arabia and its leadership. The Americans coming to Saudi Arabia and their leaving a token force there after the Gulf War led to the first fatwa (legal declaration) issued by bin Laden in 1996. His list of grievances culminated with this statement: “The latest and the greatest of these aggressions incurred by the Muslims since the death of the Prophet (Allah’s blessings and salutations be upon Him) is the occupation of the land of the two Holy Places, the foundation of the house of Islam, the place of the revelation, the source of the message and the place of the noble Ka’ba, the Qiblah of all Muslims, by the armies of the American Crusaders and their allies.” He also accused the Americans of killing his late colleague Abdullah Azzam and arresting Sheikh Omar Abdur Rahman (implicated in the bombing of the World Trade Center in New York in 1993).

An undated portrait of Al Qaeda leader Osama bin Laden (AFP/CORBIS)

In 1991, he aligned himself with Hassan al-Turabi, the leading Islamist advocate in Sudan and the dominant figure in the National Islamic Front (NIF), an Islamist political party that had supported the military coup that took over Sudan in 1989. Al-Turabi had come to believe that the fall of Saddam Hussein could become the catalyst for the establishment of truly Islamic governments (headed by dedicated Muslims ruling according to Islamic law) across the whole Muslim world from Africa to Bangladesh. It is at this time, while living in Sudan, that bin Laden expanded Al Qaeda as an activist Muslim organization designed to bring to fruition the Islamist ideal.

During this period, bin Laden also established a variety of businesses to support the program he was developing, which included the opening of the first centers for the training of people in guerilla warfare and terrorism. Among the first events tied to their centers were attacks on Americans in Somalia in 1993. In 1996, bin Laden returned to Afghanistan. He ingratiated himself with the now-ruling TALIBAN, relocated Al Qaeda to Afghanistan, and expanded its operation throughout the country. Not only did Al Qaeda supply the Taliban with funds for arms, but bin Laden also supported the building of new mosques.

In 1998, Al Qaeda activated the core of its network for the issuing of the now famous manifesto, the "Ruling against the Jews and Crusaders [Americans]," posted on the Internet under the title of "Jihad against Jews and Crusaders." He charges the United States with various sins related to its support for Israel and with otherwise meddling in Middle East affairs, beginning with the continuing affront that "for over seven years the United States has been occupying the lands of Islam in the holiest of places, the Arabian Peninsula, plundering its riches, dictating to its rulers, humiliating its people, terrorizing its neighbors, and turning its bases in the Peninsula into a spearhead through which to fight the neighboring Muslim peoples."

Basing its conclusions upon a spectrum of Muslim authorities, bin Laden and the World Islamic Front called upon Muslims everywhere to join the fight against the Americans (and their allies). Making the general statements specific, he added, "The ruling to kill the Americans and their allies—civilians and military—is an individual duty for every Muslim who can do it in any country in which it is possible to do it, in order to liberate the al-Aqsa Mosque [in Jerusalem] and the holy mosque [in Mecca] from their grip, and in order for their armies to move out of all the lands of Islam, defeated and unable to threaten any Muslim."

This document has been seen as underlying the suicide attacks on American embassies in Kenya and Tanzania and most importantly the terrorist bombings of the Pentagon in suburban Washington, D.C., and the World Trade Center in New York City on September 11, 2001. Observers in the West immediately blamed Al Qaeda (and the network represented by the World Islamic Front) for the bombings. In response the American president, George W. Bush, moved to activate a coalition similar to the one that supported U.S. efforts in the Gulf War. In October 2001, the United States and its allies opened military operations against Al Qaeda and the Taliban in Afghanistan and has promised to carry the war to other groups that have engaged, and continue to engage, in terrorism.

Al Qaeda is headed by bin Laden as amir. He is assisted by a consultative council, the Majlis-e Shura. Among the members of this council are Muhammed Atef, Abdullah Ahmed Abdullah, Anas al Liby, Saif al Adel, and Ayman al-Zawahiri. The latter is another important ideological connection tying bin Laden to the Islamist heritage. Al-Zawahiri was a former leader of the Egyptian jihad group that grew out of the Muslim Brotherhood and was linked to the assassination of Egyptian president Anwar Sadat in 1981. Other Egyptian jihad leaders, such as Abd al-Salam Faraj and Sheik Omar Rahman, contributed substantially to the creation of an Islamic perspective legitimizing terrorist activity, a perspective that bin Laden has come to hold.

As this encyclopedia goes to press, international action against Al Qaeda and its network of supporters and sympathizers continues. It has placed the organization's future very much into doubt.

Sources:

- Bergen, Peter L. Holy War, Inc.: Inside the Secret World of Osama bin Laden. New York: The Free Press, 2001.
- Bin Laden, Osama. "Jihad against Jews and Crusaders." February 23, 1998. Posted at <http://www.fas.org/irp/world/para/docs/980223-fatwa.htm>. Accessed November 1, 2001. (Also posted at other sites.)
- Gwynne, Rosalind. "Al-Qa'ida and al-Qur'an: The 'Tafsir' of Usamah bin Ladin." September 18, 2001. Posted at http://web.utk.edu/~warda/bin_ladin_and_quran.htm. Accessed November 1, 2001.
- Jansen, Johannes J. The Neglected Duty: The Creed of Sadat's Assassins and Islamic Resurgence in the Middle East. New York: Macmillan Company, 1986.
- The Jihad Fixation: Agenda, Strategy, Portents*. Delhi: Wordsmiths, 2001. This compilation contains the text of bin Laden's several fatwas as well as reprinted articles in which he was interviewed.
- Juergensmeyer, Mark. Terror in the Mind of God: The Global Rise of Religious Violence. Berkeley: University of California Press, 2001.
- Kramer, Martin. "Fundamentalist Islam at Large: The Drive for Power." Middle East Quarterly, June 1996. Posted at <http://www.meforum.org/meq/june96/kramer.shtml>. Accessed November 1, 2001.
- Rashid, Ahmed. Taliban: Militant Islam, Oil and Fundamentalism in Central Asia. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 2001.

Aladura Churches

The independent West African churches that emerged as reactions to the paternalism of European missions were patterned on the churches from which they had seceded. These African churches began declining in the 1920s and were completely overshadowed by new, rapidly growing prophet-healing, or "spiritual," churches. First, churches associated with the prophets William Wade Harris and Garrick Sokari Braide emerged, followed by churches known by the Yoruba term Aladura (prayer people). Like ZIONIST AND APOSTOLIC CHURCHES in southern Africa and Holy Spirit churches in East Africa, Aladura churches presented a much more penetrating challenge to older churches than earlier African churches had because they questioned the very heart of Christianity in Africa. In this, they were sometimes aided and abetted by new churches from the north, especially the Pentecostals, whose ideas they borrowed freely yet selectively. Nevertheless, this was a specifically African Christian response, despite the outward trappings of rituals and customs that were innovations rather than continuations of African traditional symbols. In this regard, these new West African churches represent a reformation of African Christianity that reverberates to the present day.

Members of the Aladura Christian Church in London during a ceremony (J. Highet/TRIP)

In 1990, AFRICAN INITIATED CHURCHES constituted about 19 percent of the total population of Nigeria, or 38 percent of the Christian population there, in over one thousand different churches. These are the “churches of the Spirit,” which arose almost simultaneously in many parts of the continent, contemporaneous with Pentecostal movements emerging in other parts of the globe, but independent of them. The largest group of these churches is in Yorubaland, where by 1950, Aladura churches were at the very center of society. This movement emphasized prayer, so they were known as Aladura, a term that distinguished them from other Christian churches at the time. The largest Aladura churches are the CHRIST APOSTOLIC CHURCH, the CHURCH OF THE LORD (ALADURA), the CHERUBIM AND SERAPHIM, and the CELESTIAL CHURCH OF CHRIST, a church of later origin and different historical roots. Aladura churches in Nigeria have sought cooperation, and when some were refused admission into the Christian Council of Nigeria, they formed the Nigerian Association of Aladura Churches, with 95 denominations and 1.2 million members in 1964, rising to as many as 1,200 member churches by 1996.

During the 1950s, Aladura churches spread to Ghana, Liberia, and Sierra Leone, through the efforts of traveling Nigerian preachers, especially Apostles Oduwole and Adejobi of the Church of the Lord (Aladura), and new Ghanaian churches in the traditions of Aladura seceded. From Africa the Aladura churches spread to Europe. The Aladura churches arrived in Britain in 1964, and in other parts of Europe more recently. Like the African Caribbean Pentecostal churches before them, the creation of these West African churches throughout Europe was often encouraged by a feeling of estrangement and loneliness, and sometimes, by indifferent and racist attitudes in European churches. But perhaps more importantly, the intense and holistic spirituality of these churches, their particular contextualization of the Christian message, and their revivalist tendencies were often absent from these churches and left African believers with a sense of emptiness. The African churches in Britain are increasing remarkably. Including the churches of African Caribbean origin, in 1995 there were estimated to be between 200 and 300 black-led denominations in some 3,000 congregations in Britain.

Allan H. Anderson

Sources:

Anderson, Allan H. African Reformation: African Initiated Christianity in the Twentieth Century. Lawrenceville, NJ: Africa World Press, 2000.
 Peel, J. D. Y. Aladura: A Religious Movement among the Yoruba. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1968.
 Turner, Harold W. History of an African Independent Church. Vol. 1, The Church of the Lord (Aladura). Oxford: Clarendon, 1967.

Albania

Albania, a country of some 3.5 million people, is located on the Adriatic Sea and shares borders with Greece, Macedonia, and Serbia. During the years of the Roman Empire, Albania constituted the province of Illyria, which became part of the eastern division of the empire as it evolved into the Byzantine Empire. As the Byzantine power crumbled, Albania briefly came under Serbian and Bulgarian rule. In the fourteenth century, an Albanian state was established, but the Turks overran the Balkans in the fifteenth century. Albania, under their national hero Scanderberg (1405–1468), a Turkish janissary, led a revolt that kept the Turks busy for a quarter of a century, though ultimately the Turks reestablished their rule.

Albania remained under Turkish rule until it gained its independence in 1912. The country existed as an independent nation for a generation, until annexed by Italy in 1939. Following the defeat of the occupying forces, a people's republic was declared by the leaders of the resistance, who happened to be dedicated Marxists. In 1944, under Enver Hoxha, Albania became a Communist state, which pursued an independent course within the wider Communist world until its fall in 1989–1990. Its consciously antireligious stance culminated in constitutional changes, and in 1967 freedom of belief and conscience was prohibited by the Albanian constitution. Subsequently, the churches and mosques were ordered to close, and later many of them were demolished, and the priests and imams arrested. Albania became the first and only country in the world officially declared atheist.

To return to the early religious history of Albania, the ancient pagan faith of the Albanian people was incorporated into the eclectic paganism of the Roman world, through which a variety of religions spread. The first Christian community was established at Durres in 58 C.E. In the year 395, the Roman Empire was divided into the Eastern and Western Empires, and Albania fell into that area controlled by

Status of religions in Albania, 2000-2050

Followers	2000			2025	2050
	total	%	rate
Muslims	1,208,000	38.8	0.49	1,506,000	1,775,000
Christians	1,101,000	35.4	3.25	1,680,000	2,121,000
Roman Catholics	521,000	16.8	3.21	773,000	900,000
Orthodox	500,000	16.1	2.92	730,000	880,000
Protestants	20,000	0.6	14.87	63,000	180,000
Nonreligious	518,000	16.6	-5.30	420,000	300,000
Atheists	280,000	9.0	-4.48	200,000	100,000
Baha'is	5,700	0.2	11.06	14,000	25,000
Jews	300	0.0	-0.36	500	700
Total population	3,113,000	100.0	-0.55	3,820,000	4,322,000

the Eastern, or Byzantine, Empire. In the Byzantine Empire, EASTERN ORTHODOXY came into dominance. However, Albania was close enough to the boundary of the two empires that Orthodox and Roman Catholics vied for the allegiance of the Albanian people. That rivalry was somewhat subdued by the incorporation of Albania into the Ottoman Empire in the middle of the fifteenth century.

The Turks were Sunni Muslims of the Hanafite school, and subsequent to their gaining power, a number of Albanians converted to Islam. A variety of reasons have been offered for the conversion of such a high percentage of Albanians, when compared to neighboring countries so occupied, including proselytization efforts, reaction to anti-Albanian activities of the Orthodox in neighboring countries, and the possibility that high taxes could be avoided by becoming Muslims. In any case, Albania became the first European nation in the Middle Ages to embrace Islam.

Most Muslims in Albania were Hanafis. They were organized into four regions (Tirane, Shkoder, Korce, and Gjirokaster), each under the leadership of a grand mufti. Some 20 percent of Muslim Albanians identified with a Turkish Sufi movement, the Bektashis. This group developed a strong presence within the Turkish army, through which it spread to the Balkans. It suffered when the units in which it was strongest were disbanded in 1826, but it was revived at the end of the nineteenth century in Albania and Turkey. Then in 1925, all Sufi orders were officially disbanded in Turkey and the Bektashis' center shifted to Albania.

The generation-long battle to prevent the conquest of the nation by the Ottomans was led by Scanderberg (born Gjergj Kastrioti). He died a Christian martyr and was buried in a Christian church, but is today considered a national hero by Christian and Muslim alike as a freedom fighter seeking to preserve an independent nation. Albanian religion has always been identified with the desire to establish and preserve the Albanian national identity. This uniting factor has meant that, in spite of the important religious differences between the Christian and Muslim communities, they have been able to live together in relative peace. The tolerant spirit has been demonstrated in numerous mixed marriages and frequent exchange of visits during religious celebrations.

Through the centuries under Muslim rule, the Eastern Orthodox Church survived, but it drew its leadership from neighboring countries. A drive for an autonomous church emerged among Albanians in the nineteenth century, but was opposed by the ECUMENICAL PATRIARCHATE in Istanbul. Thus, an autonomous Albania was actually founded in a diaspora community in the United States, under the leadership of Fan S. Noli. He was ordained in 1908 by an American bishop of the Russian Orthodox Church, who directed him to found an Albanian jurisdiction. The work was organized as an independent diocese in 1919. Returning to a now independent Albania in 1920, Noli led in the founding of an autocephalous church in 1922 and became its first bishop in 1923. The ecumenical patriarch eventually recognized it as the Orthodox Autocephalous Church of Albania in 1937.

The newly formed church was an early target of the Marxist government, which ordered the closing of its seminary and stopped the ordination of any new priests. Its churches were closed in 1957, and many priests were arrested. Only twenty-two priests remained when freedom came in 1990. In 1991, the ecumenical patriarch took the lead in rebuilding the church with the appointment of Archbishop Anastasios as the new exarch of Albania. He reestablished the Monastery of St. Viash, Durres, and the Resurrection of Christ Theological Academy. He also opened additional schools and medical facilities. The church now serves approximately 20 percent of the population. It is the only Albanian-based church that is a member of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES.

The ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH has traditionally been strongest in the northern part of the country. As the split developed between the Orthodox and Roman churches, the archdioceses at Durres and Shkoder aligned with Rome. In the eleventh century, an Eastern-rite diocese emerged. These were all directly affiliated to the Vatican. Proportionately, the Roman Catholic community suffered the most from the Hoxha regime, in part due to the dislike of Italians that had developed from Italy's attempt to occupy the country. Hoxha moved immediately to expel the apostolic delegate from the Vatican (1944) and then the Italian priests and nuns (1945). But these actions were only the beginning. In 1948, three bishops were executed. By the mid-1970s, no fewer than 120 Catholic leaders had been killed. In 1977, the three remaining bishops disappeared and were never seen again. By the end of the 1970s, all of the remaining priests were either in prison or in hiding.

With the fall of the Marxist government, a decade of rebirth and revitalization of religion and spiritual life began. Through the 1990s, the older religious communities revived, and a variety of new religions—Protestant/Evangelical churches, CHURCH OF JESUS CHRIST OF LATTER-DAY SAINTS, SEVENTH-DAY ADVENTIST CHURCH, and various new groups from the spectrum of the world's religions—arrived. Prior to World War II, several Protestant groups, the Seventh-day Adventist Church, the AMERICAN BOARD OF COMMISSIONERS FOR FOREIGN MISSIONS, the BAPTISTS, and the Methodist Episcopal Church (now a constituent part of the UNITED METHODIST CHURCH), had work in Albania. Most of this work was lost and had to be restarted after 1990. The Adventists were among the first to reestablish work in 1990, at which time they found a few believers from their earlier efforts. Conservative Baptists arrived in 1991, and shortly thereafter the BAPTIST WORLD ALLIANCE opened a center for humanitarian aid in Tirana. In 1993, Evangelical missionaries formed the Evangelical Brotherhood, which evolved into the Albanian Evangelical Alliance, now a member of the European Evangelical Alliance, through which it relates to the WORLD EVANGELICAL ALLIANCE.

The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints entered the country in 1991, and the first permanent missionaries arrived the following year. The work was originally conducted by the Austria Vienna Mission, but in 1996 the Albania Tirana Mission was officially opened. The church has built a strong humanitarian work assisting the country as a whole to rebuild.

Through the 1990s, the Republic of Albania assumed a very tolerant and even supportive stance toward the traditional religious communities and a noninterfering policy toward the newly arrived groups previously unknown to Albanians. In spite of the appearance of a variety of competing religious groups, the state has refrained from any move to restrict religious freedom. There is no state religion, and the principle of separation of church and state has been written into the law. The parliament has appointed a State Committee for Religious Affairs, which maintains a relationship with the various religious communities in Albania, while refraining from interfering in their internal affairs. Each of the religious groups is, of course, expected to operate under the common law and the Albanian constitution. An appraisal of the situation at the beginning of the new century, especially of the needs of both the Christian and Muslim communities, suggests that, as the country as a whole stabilizes its position economically, the government will assume a more active role in assisting the older larger religious groups in their rebuilding process.

Behar Bejko

Sources:

Costa, Nicolas J. Albania: A European Enigma. Boulder, CO and New York: East European Monographs and Columbia University Press, 1995.

Hutchings, Raymond. Historical Dictionary of Albania. Lanham, MD: Scarecrow Press, 1996.

Albania, Orthodox Autocephalous Church of

Albanian patriots such as Sami Frashëri (1850–1904) began to agitate for an independent Albanian church in the 1880s. Prior to that time, followers of EASTERN ORTHODOXY worshipped in churches that drew their leadership from the autonomous churches in neighboring countries (Greece, Bulgaria, Serbia). Orthodoxy had been established in Albania in the days of the Byzantine Empire, but its progress had been stopped and even reversed under the centuries of Turkish rule that began in the fifteenth century. The drive for autonomy was opposed by the ecumenical patriarch (the patriarch of Constantinople), who included the Albanian parishes in his jurisdiction, and the Turkish government, which ruled the land until the First Balkan War (1912).

Stifled in their homeland, as early as 1900 Albanian expatriates in Romania attempted to create an Orthodox church outside the jurisdiction of the ECUMENICAL PATRIARCHATE that would use the Albanian language. However, it was in the United States that the first Albanian Orthodox church was founded. Its founding was occasioned by the refusal of a Greek priest to hold the funeral services for a young Albanian nationalist. The Albanian-American community of Boston designated Fan S. Noli to seek ordination for the purpose of founding an Albanian Orthodox church. Noli was able to gain the favor of Archbishop Platon of the RUSSIAN ORTHODOX CHURCH (now the ORTHODOX CHURCH IN AMERICA), which competed with the Greeks for hegemony in the United States. Noli was ordained on March 8, 1908, and Platon commissioned him to found a missionary church under the jurisdiction of the Russian Orthodox Church. It was organized as an independent diocese in 1919. Noli translated the service from Greek and later translated several liturgical books.

Noli returned to Albania in 1920, where he enjoyed a promising political career. He served a short term as Albania's prime minister. In 1922, a congress was called to consider religious independence. It declared the existence of an autocephalous church, but the lack of episcopal leadership presented a major problem. That problem was solved the following year when Noli was consecrated as a bishop. Then in 1926, President (later King) Zog became interested in the issue and gave his support to establishing the new church. An initial synod was held in 1929 at the king's villa; autonomous status was finally attained on April 13, 1937, when the patriarchate released the church from its jurisdiction.

Frustrated at the refusal of the Ecumenical Patriarchate to cooperate with the independence effort, Noli returned to the United States in 1930, where he reorganized the Albanian parishes as the Albanian Orthodox Archdiocese of America. After the patriarchate released the Albanian church, the American Archdiocese aligned itself with the new autonomous jurisdiction.

The church immediately fell on hard times with the outbreak of World War II and the rise of a Marxist government under the leadership of dictator Enver Hoxha. Hoxha steadily led the country toward atheism, eventually declaring the country officially an atheist state. He initially closed the church's seminary and limited new ordinations. In 1967, he closed all churches and attempted to stop all religious activity. Many churches were destroyed, and some priests arrested. Only twenty-two priests were still alive in 1990.

After Hoxha came to power, the American archdiocese withdrew its connection from the church in Albania, feeling that the leadership had been compromised. Shortly thereafter, in 1950, the ecumenical patriarch designated Mark I. Lipa as his episcopal representative for America, and Lipa began to gather Albanian parishes into the Albanian Orthodox Diocese of America. Lipa's effort split the American Albanian community.

With the fall of the Communist government, religious freedom was restored in May 1990. The ecumenical patriarch took the lead in rebuilding the church and in January 1991 sent His Beatitude Archbishop Anastasios as the new exarch of Albania. He was enthroned on August 2, 1992, as the archbishop of Tirana, Durres, and All Albania. He moved quickly to reopen the Monastery of St. Vlash, Durres, which became the location of the Resurrection of Christ Theological Academy. He also opened a boys' ecclesiastical high school, nine kindergartens, and five medical clinics.

Finally, in July 1998 the Holy Synod was reestablished. It now includes His Beatitude Archbishop Anastasios; His Eminence Ignati, metropolitan of Berat; His Eminence John, metropolitan of Korca; and His Grace Kosma, bishop of Apollonia. This synod fully restored the autocephalous status of the Church of Albania. The church has most recently joined the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES. It now claims the allegiance of some 650,000 believers in Albania, about 20 percent of the population.

Address:

Orthodox Autocephalous Church of Albania
Rugae Kavajes 151
Al-Tirana
Albania
<http://www.orthodoxalbania.org>

Source:

Skendi, Stavro. The Albanian National Awakening, 1878–1912. Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1967.

Aleph

See Aum Shinrikyō

Alevism (Turkish Alevis)

The Arabic term Alevi is best defined as “of Ali” or “pertaining to Ali.” It also appears in English as Alouite or Alawite. Alevism can be generally defined as the love of Ali and his family line, or as following the Way of the Family of the Prophet. It is generally accepted that this path was founded by Ali (595–661), who married Fatima, the daughter of Muhammad, the prophet of ISLAM. The path continued through Ali's offspring. Ali was the fourth caliph after the death of the Prophet, and is considered the first imam, the first of the line of leaders recognized within SHI'AH ISLAM to be divinely appointed successors of Muhammad. Over time, the concept of Alevism has been defined in many different ways, from the perspectives of etymology, politics, and SUFISM, and it has been supported or attacked with various motives. Alevism is not a faith exclusive to any given ethnic group. Carried by migrations stretching from central Asia to the Middle East and as far as the Balkans, Alevism found adherents in many countries through adaptation to local faiths and cultures.

The term Alevi is used to describe the descendants of Ali in countries like Saudi Arabia, Egypt, Yemen, Iran, Pakistan, India, Iraq, Anatolia (modern Turkey), and the Balkans, as well as in the countries of central Asia. Groups coming under the category of Alevi are known by different names in various countries: Ismailis in Pakistan, Jaferis in Iran, Zeydi in Egypt and Yemen, Nusayris in Syria, and DRUZE in Lebanon. The term Ali Ilahi was used for Alevi groups in studies done in Moscow by the former Soviet Union.

In today's Turkey, the term Alevi is used narrowly to refer to the physical descendants of Ali, but it is also used in a much broader sense. It refers to a type of heterodox Islam, sometimes called folk Islam, practiced by various groups in Anatolia, including the Kizilbash, Tahtaji, Abdal, Yoruk, Zaza, Barak, Avshar, Nalji, Chepni, Sirach, Amujali, Bedreddini, Terekeme, Nusayri, and BEKTASHI. The differences between these groups stem from their independent interpretations of folk Islam. Alevism, in this sense of folk Islam, was born of historical and social factors that rely more on oral than written traditions. Forms of Alevism continue to live on as ancient faiths and mythology under Islamic forms.

Turkish tribes, which had been spread across a wide geographical area, had come into contact with and been influenced over the centuries by shamanism, Manichaeism, Christianity, Judaism, and even Buddhism prior to the emergence of Islam. Large-scale Turkish conversion to Islam can be dated to the eighth century, as Arab armies began to conquer central Asia. As Turks received Islam, they also tended to preserve their ancient beliefs and practices. Most of these Turks did not respect the Muslim sheikhs (leaders) and clergy, who spread various restrictive religious laws. Rather, they attached themselves to and came under the influence of “fathers,” who filled a role similar to pre-Islamic religious leaders such as shamans. These religious leaders taught more basic religious principles and emphasized the similarities between the Turks' ancient beliefs and the new religion. The result was a variety of syncretistic forms of folk Islam that kept ancient beliefs and practices in the forefront and placed religious obligations in the background.

This nominal Islam, which the Turks who moved into Anatolia beginning in the eleventh century brought with them, made it quite easy for them to mix in with the local inhabitants. These Turkish immigrants added a combination of Islamic religious law, Arab and Persian religious culture, and traces of native Anatolian culture to their own customs. Anatolian Turkish culture was born from this synthesis.

This synthesis appeared in two distinct forms. Residents of urban areas accepted a more orthodox understanding of Islam, while nomadic and seminomadic groups on the fringes of the towns and cities accepted a heterodox Islamic understanding, or Alevism. This division continued through the Seljuk and Ottoman periods. In the Babai Rebellion of 1240, the heterodox groups revolted against the official Sunni Islam of the central administration. This rebellion left deep scars in Anatolia, and even after the rebellion was crushed, the ideas behind it remained in the minds of the rebels. This heterodox opposition stance was accepted by the groups known as the Vefais, Kalenderis, Haydaris, and Yesevis, and became known by the general name Rum Abdals from the beginning of the fourteenth century.

From the foundation of the Ottoman state in the fourteenth century, heterodox dervishes known for the spinning movements in their meditation practices, and called by the names of abdal, baba, dede, or ahi, were greatly respected by Ottoman sultans and were prominent in former Byzantine lands and in the Balkan areas conquered by the Ottomans. From the thirteenth century, heterodox babas and abdals started to found small dervish lodges in Anatolia and the Balkans, and their activities were multiplied through their disciples. In the sixteenth century, sheikhs who had earlier been part of the Kalenderi, Yesevi, and similar movements somehow joined up with the BEKTASHIS, so that by the time of the seventeenth century, each one of the Rum Abdal lodges had become a Bektashi lodge. In the outlying areas, centers of faith called Ojaks appeared. The Alevis in the rural areas mostly came under the influence of Dedes who were associated with these Ojaks.

In the sixteenth century, the Safawi ruler, Shah Ismail, strengthened his presence in Anatolia and held great influence, especially over the Alevi Ojaks. From the sixteenth century these strong Turkish clans increased their support of the Safawi line, so much so that they became a threat to the Ottoman state, which resorted to strong measures in its opposition to them. The Ottoman administration always saw these heterodox Turkish clans as potential threats and considered them to be irreligious and immoral. Over time, these clans cut every kind of tie with the Ottoman administration and succeeded in pursuing their faith and practices for hundreds of years, closed to the outside world. Unquestionably, this success was due in great part to a vibrant oral and musical tradition. The social and religious organization of what is known today as Alevism, including the institution of Dedelik (Alevi; clergy), is the product of the leadership of the Safawi Shah Ismail. After the death of Shah Ismail, the Alevis of Anatolia lived in continual conflict with the Ottoman administration. In spite of the fact that they were an essential element of the founding of the Ottoman state, Alevis were spurned by the government, so the Alevis did not recognize the authority of the Ottoman administration. They handled all of their social needs and problems among themselves, including holding their own peoples' courts.

Since they had lived for centuries under the persecution of the Ottoman administration, Alevis received the new Turkish Republic's government with joy. They were pleased by most, if not all, of the reforms made in the first years of the republic. Alevis in general supported Mustafa Kemal Atatürk, the founder of the republic, and his Republican People's Party (CHP). Especially after the 1960s, Alevis were active in most leftist movements. Because of this, the dominant mind-set in Turkish society equated being Alevi with being leftist, and the marginalization of Alevis was increased. The killings of Alevis in Çorum, Maras, Sivas, and Istanbul's Gazi neighborhood can be attributed to this marginalization. Even though Alevis are considered equal by the constitution, from religious and cultural perspectives other Turks see them as outside the cultural and religious mainstream, and they continue to be treated like an unequal Muslim minority.

In today's Turkey, and even more so in Europe, Alevis have organized themselves into associations, foundations, and religious centers (cem evi). Unbiased researchers estimate the population of Alevis in Turkey to be at least 15 million. Alevis are found in every part of Turkey, with the exception of the Black Sea and southeastern Anatolia regions, where they are very few. Alevi population is most concentrated in Erzincan, Sivas, Tunceli, Tokat, Kahramanmaraş, and Malatya provinces.

Due to various factors, Alevis historically kept their worship and beliefs secret and perpetuated their culture through oral tradition, but this has changed. This oral tradition expresses itself through the poets and folk literature and music, which is how Alevi faith and culture has come down to us today. Throughout the centuries, Alevi Dedes and poets used Turkish, the language of the people, as opposed to the heavily Persian and Arabic-influenced language of the Ottomans. Alevis consider books like the Qur'an, the Buyruk, and the Velayetname to be holy.

Alevi religious leaders are called Dede, which is a hereditary office from the various Ojaks, or clans, in Anatolia. Alevism's system of morality can be briefly summarized in the two precepts, Love the Family of the Prophet, and Take Moral Responsibility for Your Hands, Your Tongue, and Your Loins, and in the Four Doors, Forty Steps. Those who do not obey these rules are considered fallen and are expelled from the group.

The regular worship service of Alevis is called the Cem (assembly). In addition to the Cem, important days of celebration are Sultan Nevruz, the Fast of Muharrem, the Fast of Hızır, Hıdırellez, the Sacrifice Feast, and the Feast of Abdal Musa. There are regional variations of the forms of these practices and celebrations. Every year, international festivals are held in honor of Anatolian saints such as Haji Bektash Veli, Abdal Musa, and Pir Sultan Abdal.

There is no central headquarters for the Alevi community in Turkey, divided as it is in various ethnic communities. In Europe, Alevi communities may be contacted through the European Federation of Alevi Unions (Avrupa Alevi Birlikleri Federasyonu), which hosts an Internet site at <http://www.alevi.com/>. Other contacts can be found on the Alevi-Bektasi resources site at <http://www.people.fas.harvard.edu/~erdemir/alevi.html> or at <http://www.alevibektasi.com>.

Ali Yaman

Sources:

- Kehl-Bodrogi, Krisztina. Dis Kizilbas/Aleviten. Untersuchungen über eine esoterische Glaubensgemeinschaft in Anatolien. Islamkundliche Untersuchungen, Bd. 126. Berlin: 1988.
- Kehl-Bodrogi, Krisztina, Barbara Kellner-Heinkele, and Anke Otter-Beaujean, eds. Collected Papers of the International Symposium "Alevism in Turkey and Comparable Syncretistic Religious Communities in the Near East in the Past and Present," Berlin, 14–17 April 1995. In Syncretistic Religious Communities in the Near East. Studies in the History of Religions, Numen Book Series, edited by H. G. Kippenberg, E. T. Lawson, vol. 76. Leiden, Netherlands: Brill, 1997.
- Mélikoff, Irène. Hadji Bektach: un mythe et ses avatars. Genèse et évolution du soufisme populaire en Turquie. Islamic History and Civilization, Studies and Texts 20. Leiden, Netherlands: Brill, 1998.
- Olsson, Tord, Elisabeth Ozdalga, and Catharina Raudvere, eds. "Alevi Identity: Cultural Religious and Social Perspectives." In Transactions: Swedish Research Institute in Istanbul, vol. 8. 1998.
- Vorhoff, Karin. Zwischen Glaube, Nation und neuer Gemeinschaft: Alevitische Identität in der Türkei der Gegenwart. Islamkundliche Untersuchungen, Bd.184. Berlin: 1995.
- Yaman, Ali. Alevilik Bektasilik Bibliyografyasi. Mannheim, Germany: Institute of Alevi Bektashi Culture, 1998.

his successors. They had to fight off Spanish incursions at the end of the fifteenth century.

In the sixteenth century Algeria was incorporated into the Ottoman Empire (which also drove the Spanish away). Reacting to a supposed insult, the French invaded Algiers during the Napoleonic era. Defeated, the French returned in 1830 and set about conquering the northern coast and then moving south into the Sahara. They were never able to completely pacify the country. In 1873, however, they had enough of the country under their control to begin inviting French settlers to take control of appropriated land. Over a million moved to Algeria by 1950.

The last phase of the colonial era began with renewed resistance to the French in the 1920s. Rebellious activities often met with brutal reaction. In 1962, President de Gaulle signed an agreement that led to independence. Within a short time over 600,000 French left, and some 500,000 Algerians then living abroad returned. The country passed through several decades of economic and political instability, aggravated by the appearance of radical groups that identified an ultraconservative form of Islam with the cause of helping the poorest and most disenfranchised elements of the society. That instability, often breaking out in terrorist activity, civil war, and suppression of dissent, continued through the 1990s.

To return to the early history of Islam, the Sunni MALIKITE SCHOOL OF ISLAM swept across Algeria in the eighth century. However, Algerians tended to dissent from their Sunni conquerors over the issue of the caliphate. They adopted the Ibadite position (popularized in Oman) that the caliphate did not have to remain in the hands of the family of Muhammad, but belonged to the most qualified. The IBADHI ISLAM school remains strongest in the southern part of the country and operates the Institute al-Haya in Guerara in the Oasis Province. There is now also a small community of followers of the HANAFITE SCHOOL OF ISLAM, most descendants of Turks and Moors. There is a considerable presence by the Sufi brotherhoods, most prominently the Tİ-JÂNİYYA SUFI ORDER and the QADIRIYYA SUFI ORDER.

The modern history of Islam has been most influenced by the rise of fundamentalist Islam and the tying of Islam, first to the fight for independence from France and then to the struggle to relieve the plight of the poor. Resistance was

Algeria

The area that composes the modern state of Algeria has been inhabited by the Berber people since ancient times, and as early as 1200 B.C.E. Phoenicians arrived. The territory was incorporated into the Carthaginian Empire based in neighboring Tunisia, later gradually became part of the Roman Empire, and fell to the Arabs early in the eighth century C.E. Since that time Islam has been the dominant religion of the country. In the twelfth century, Algeria was incorporated into the Almohad Empire, centered in Morocco. With the fall of the Almohad Empire, an actual Algerian state appeared under Yaglimorossen ibn Zianr and

Status of religions in Algeria, 2000-2050

Followers	2000			2025	2050
	total	%	rate
Muslims	30,442,000	96.7	2.34	44,667,000	54,264,000
Nonreligious	948,000	3.0	2.79	1,800,000	3,200,000
Christians	91,000	0.3	1.50	159,000	280,000
Independents	65,000	0.2	3.30	125,000	234,000
Roman Catholics	20,300	0.1	-2.07	25,000	31,000
Protestants	3,400	0.0	-1.49	4,500	6,200
Atheists	4,000	0.0	-0.11	3,000	4,000
Baha'is	2,800	0.0	3.44	6,000	12,000
Jews	570	0.0	-0.58	700	1,000
Total population	31,471,000	100.0	2.36	46,611,000	57,731,000

first formed by the National Liberation Front (FLN), made famous by the writings of Franz Fanon (1925–1961), whose thought helped shape it through the 1950s. However, after the FLN took control of the government, adopting a socialist and nominally Islamic stance, a variety of dissenting groups based in the mosques in the poorer neighborhoods emerged. In 1989, the government opened the country to a multiparty system, and both Marxist and fundamentalist Muslim organizations emerged. Of the latter, the Islamic Salvation Front (FIS) and the Da'wa Islamic League were the most important. The FIS, demanding that an Islamic state be proclaimed and Islamic law be adopted, won a major victory in the 1992 elections.

In reaction to a possible FIS takeover in a future election, the government reacted and arrested all of the FIS's major leaders. The FIS was officially disbanded, and sympathetic imams were replaced in a number of mosques. The actions did not stop the FIS, and it has continued as a strong force in the land. In 1996, parties based on either religion or language were banned, and further violence ensued. The situation has yet to be resolved.

Jewish life in Algeria can be traced to the fourth century B.C.E. It suffered under the Turkish regime, but revived after the French takeover. In 1870, most Jews were given French citizenship. Fearful of the independent Muslim government, soon after the changes of 1962 the great majority of the 120,000 Jews took the opportunity to migrate to France. Today less than 150 Jews are known to live in the country. There is one communal center and synagogue, located in Algiers.

Christianity has an ancient history in Algeria. It spread among the Latin-speaking people living in the area, which was part of the Roman Empire in the first century of the Common Era. Some of the most noteworthy of the church's Latin fathers were Algerians, including Tertullian, Cyprian, and Augustine of Hippo. The Berber tribes were strongly identified with the Donatist movement, which spread from Carthage in the fourth century and incited Augustine to some of his most extreme writing. Both the orthodox and Donatist perspectives survived only to be wiped out in the eighth century by Islam. The Kabyle (a Berber group) has been known as a Christian people who accepted Islam only after lengthy resistance.

Christianity returned to Algeria in the fifteenth century when a resurgent Spain captured the coastal city of Oran in the 1490s, but the Spaniards were soon driven out by the Ottomans. Then, following the French invasion, the ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH was established within the French expatriate community. In 1838, Algeria was designated a diocese under Aix-en-Provence (France), but the church was not allowed to proselytize the Muslims. Missionary activity was only allowed after Charles Lavigerie, a priest with the White Fathers, became bishop of Algiers. The church's spread, however, was much more tied to the arrival of hundreds of thousands of French settlers than to any conversion of the Muslim population.

The Catholic archbishop acquitted himself well during the last years of the struggle for independence, setting the stage for amiable Christian-Muslim relations after 1962. However, the Catholic community was gutted by the movement of so many French back to their homeland. The church reoriented itself toward service to the Algerian community through educational and medical institutions. That has been countered by the government policy of Islamicizing all educational efforts, leaving only a minimal Catholic presence.

Short-lived Protestant missions were launched as early as 1830, but permanent work did not begin until the REFORMED CHURCH OF FRANCE arrived with the waves of French settlers beginning in 1873. The church grew in the expatriate community, but it had little impact on the Muslim citizenry. Like the Catholic Church, it was gutted by the massive migrations of the 1960s and had only seventeen congregations by the mid-1970s.

In 1881, the founder of the American-based North Africa Mission, Edward H. Glenny, settled in Algiers. The mission found its greatest success among the Kabyle Berbers. Representatives of the British-based Algiers Mission Band, which, like the North Africa Mission, was an independent evangelical group, arrived in 1888.

In 1908, two British women who had been in Algiers as missionaries since 1891 joined the Methodist Episcopal Church (now an integral part of the UNITED METHODIST CHURCH), and in 1909 transferred their work to its jurisdiction. Following World War II, additional personnel were sent from the United States, and through the years work was extended to centers across the country. The Methodists opened a hospital in 1966; in 1969, however, most of the missionaries were accused of being agents from the Central Intelligence Agency and expelled from the country.

At the time of Algerian independence, there was a spectrum of Christian groups, the majority of which were various European and North American Protestant/FREE CHURCHES missionary efforts. Some found a following not so much among the Algerians as among the French Catholics. The ASSEMBLIES OF GOD were among the most successful, but suffered by the return to France of many members. Most of these churches remained very small, with only one or two centers.

The new government declared Islam the state religion, a provision that stops significantly short of declaring Algeria an Islamic state, and added a provision against discrimination based on religion or race. Christian churches were given freedom to operate but were not allowed to proselytize Muslims. The JEHOVAH'S WITNESSES, who had opened work around 1950, were expelled in 1970 due to their proselytizing.

A variety of churches were established to serve other-than-French expatriate communities, including the several Orthodox churches: COPTIC ORTHODOX CHURCH (Egypt), RUSSIAN ORTHODOX CHURCH, GREEK ORTHODOX PATRIARCHATE OF ALEXANDRIA AND ALL AFRICA, and the GREEK ORTHODOX PATRIARCHATE OF ANTIOCH AND ALL THE EAST. There was also a single congregation of the Coptic Evangelical Church. Unlike the churches based in the French community, these churches were not affected by Algerian independence.

In 1940, many of the church groups banded together in the Evangelical Mission Council. It was reorganized in 1964 as the Association of Protestant Churches and Institutions in Algeria, but many groups withdrew in protest of its relationship to the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES. Much of the work of the council became obsolete when in 1972 the Methodist Church, the Reformed Church and several other groups merged to form the PROTESTANT CHURCH OF ALGERIA. This church has only eight congregations scattered across the coastal cities of the north but is considered important by European Protestants as a base of Christian witness. It is a member of the World Council of Churches and retains ties to its parent bodies.

With the exception of the BAHÁ'Í FAITH, which has won a few adherents, few new religions have attempted to settle in independent Algeria.

Sources:

- Barrett, David. The Encyclopedia of World Christianity. 2d ed. New York: Oxford University Press, 2001.
- Bissio, Roberto Remo, et al. Third World Guide 93/94. Montevideo, Uruguay: Instituto del Tercer Mundo, 1992.
- Entelis, J. P., and P. C. Naylor. State and Society in Algeria. Boulder, CO: Westview Press, 1992.
- Lehuraux, L. Islam et Chrétienté en Algérie. Alger: Imprimerie Baconnier, 1957.

All Ceylon Buddhist Congress

All Ceylon Buddhist Congress (ACBC), known in Sinhala as Samasta Lanka Bauddha Maha Sammelanaya, founded in 1918, has become the primary lay Buddhist organization in Sri Lanka, having as its avowed purpose the act of “engaging in the Buddhist tradition” (yunjatha buddha sasane).

The predecessor of ACBC was the All Ceylon Young Buddhist Congress (Samasta Lanka Taruna Bauddha Samiti Sammelanaya). In a meeting held at the Colombo YOUNG MEN'S BUDDHIST ASSOCIATION (YMBA) on October 18, 1918, the twenty-five members in attendance decided to establish the All Ceylon Young Buddhist Congress (ACYBC) and to hold its first congress at Ananda College, Colombo. That gathering, held December 20–21, 1919, was chaired by Sir D. B. Jayatilake. Originally the ACYBC was designed to ensure harmony among the various centers of the Young Men's Buddhist Association and to unify their social and religious activities. It subsequently became an organization of indigenous intellectuals such as the late Professor Gunapala

Malasekere (1899–1973), who held its presidency from 1940 to 1958 and 1970 to 1973. Although early congresses were exclusively for men, beginning in 1924, with the congress held at Panadura, women also participated. Also in 1924, the chair's speech was delivered in Sinhala (rather than the English that had been used in meetings until that time) by C. W. W. Kannangara. ACBC's influence was extended in 1929 by the appointment of an advisory board of 60 monks, representing the three monastic fraternities.

ACBC's history has been punctuated by three prominent achievements: (1) In 1941 (prior to the Buddha Jayanti Tripitaka translation project in 1956), ACBC established a trust to translate the Tripitaka (primary Buddhist scriptures) into Sinhala, with the aim of reviving Pali literature and the study of Buddhism. By 1967, the trust had published ten volumes, including the Cullavagga, a volume detailing the rules for Buddhist nuns. (2) In 1950, ACBC hosted the 129 Buddhist leaders (representing 29 countries) who formed the WORLD FELLOWSHIP OF BUDDHISTS, which was inaugurated on May 25, 1950, at the Tooth Relic Temple in Kandy, Sri Lanka. (3) On December 27, 1953, at the annual meeting of ACBC held at Kegalla, congress president Professor Gunapala Malalasekere announced the forthcoming appointment of a Buddhist Information Search Committee to investigate the status of Buddhism and Buddhist affairs. The committee was appointed the following April and began a year of collecting data from people in Ratnapura on June 26, 1954. Following the close of its inquiry in May 1955, a 186-page report was presented to the country in a meeting held at Ananda College on February 4, 1956. The Sri Lankan government moved to implement the report by appointing the Buddha Sasana Commission in 1957.

Beginning in the 1940s, ACBC has been actively involved in a variety of social and welfare activities, especially educational projects involving Buddhist children. While maintaining hostels for male and female children, vocational training centers for youth, homes for elderly adults, a rest house for bhikkhus (monks) in Baddegama, and a school and hostel for children of special needs, as well as providing food and medicine for the sick and propagating Buddhism, ACBC has worked on projects across the country aimed at raising the standards of living.

In 1993, the All Ceylon Buddhist Congress celebrated its seventy-fifth anniversary, a celebration that included the issuance of a commemorative volume reflecting upon its history and activities.

Address:

All Ceylon Buddhist Congress
380 Bauddhaloka Mawatha
Colombo 7
Sri Lanka

Mahinda Deegalle

Alliance World Fellowship

Sources:

- All Ceylon Buddhist Congress: Diamond Jubilee Celebrations, 1919–79. Colombo, Sri Lanka: Metro Printers, 1980.
- Bechert, Heinz. Buddhismus: Staat und Gesellschaft in den Ländern des Theravada Buddhismus. 3 vols. Wiesbaden, Germany: O. Harnassowitz, 1966–1973.
- Bond, George. The Buddhist Revival in Sri Lanka: Religious Tradition, Reinterpretation and Response. Columbia: University of South Carolina Press, 1988.
- Mutukumara, Nemsiri, ed. Samasta Lanka Bauddha Maha Sammelanaya: Hattapasvani Jayanti Samaru Sangrahaya (All Ceylon Buddhist Congress: Seventy-fifth anniversary souvenir). Dehiwala, Sri Lanka: Sri Devi Mudranalaya, 1993.
- Seneviratne, H. L. The Work of Kings: The New Buddhism in Sri Lanka. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1999.

Alliance World Fellowship

The Alliance World Fellowship (AWF) is the product of the very successful world mission program launched by the CHRISTIAN AND MISSIONARY ALLIANCE (CMA) following its formation in 1897. Over the next seven decades, missions were established in more than fifty countries. In the years after World War II, CMA personnel were among the leaders in rethinking the nature of the missionary enterprise, especially in light of the emergence of nations in the Third World. As a number of the CMA missions became autonomous national churches, the Alliance World Fellowship was organized in 1975 as a means of maintaining fellowship and restructuring the relationship among the churches as international partners in mission.

In the partnership model, churches and former missions relate as separate organizational entities, working together as partners. Overseas national churches are seen as independent and autonomous, meaning that they are not related organizationally to the CMA except as equal members in the fellowship.

The AWF meets quadrennially. It assumes no legislative authority. Programs consist of reports on church work internationally, lectures and discussions, and small group meetings on topics of interest. Worship reflects the multinational participation.

In 2001 the AWF had more than forty member churches, with more than two million members, from as many nations.

Address:

Alliance World Fellowship
P.O. Box 35000
Colorado Springs, CO 80935–3500
<http://www.cmalliance.org/missions/world/awf.htm>

Source:

Moore, David H. "How the C&MA Relates to Overseas Church."
Posted at http://online.cbccs.sk.ca/alliancestudies/ahtreadings/ahtr_s74.html. Accessed October 1, 2001.

Ambedkar Buddhism

A wave of mass conversions to Buddhism among the so-called untouchable castes in India was set in motion when their leader, Dr. B. R. Ambedkar (1893–1956), publicly went through a Buddhist conversion ceremony in Nagpur, India, on October 14, 1956. From a total number of 180,823 Buddhists in India before this event (1951 Census), the number has since risen to 6,431,900 (1991 Census), mainly due to these conversions. Several loosely organized local groups of followers together form the movement, which in lack of a central overarching organization is here labeled Ambedkar Buddhism. The term neo-Buddhism, which is frequently used in the Western academic literature, is a term that adherents find patronizing and do not use themselves. Geographically the movement is concentrated in Maharashtra where it started, but a few centers are also found in Western countries, for instance in Great Britain.

Bhimrao Ramji Ambedkar, "Babasaheb" among his followers, was himself born in an untouchable Mahar caste (consisting of unskilled laborers) in Maharashtra. He received an unusually good education, which included university degrees in law and economics in New York and London. Returning to India in 1923, he started his work of social uplift for the untouchables. He founded three succeeding political parties, and as chairman of the Drafting Committee for the Indian Constitution and as law minister in the first independent government, he secured the political abolishment of untouchability and laid the basis for future schemes of positive compensative discrimination.

Ideologically his aim was to build up a new self-respect among untouchables. This had to be gained by rejecting Hinduism, which to Ambedkar first of all was felt as the religion of caste and untouchability. As part of several campaigns, he organized a conference in the town of Mahad in 1927 where the Manusmriti, the most prominent of the classical Hindu law books, was burned publicly. By 1935, he had arrived at the conviction that conversion away from Hinduism would be necessary in order to cast off the stigma of untouchability. In 1948, he published his book The Untouchables, in which he advanced his theory that the untouchable castes are descendants from the few Buddhists who remained in India when Buddhism was crowded out from the subcontinent during the Hindu revivals in the Middle Ages. Thus, conversion to Buddhism would be a return to the original religion of the untouchables.

In 1955, Ambedkar founded the Buddhist Society of India, whose activities to some extent were hosted by the schools and colleges established by the People's Education Society, another organization founded by Ambedkar already in 1945. When he died a few months after his conversion in 1956, the leadership passed on to his son, Yeshwant Ambedkar, but the society remained without a fixed organizational structure. Since that time, it has established itself as a network of more or less independent branches. The geographic centers are in Nagpur, Pune, and Mumbai (where a Dr. Ambedkar Memorial Shrine is situated). Due to the emigration of Ambedkar Buddhists overseas, a few centers have been established in Western countries in recent times.

Ambedkar Buddhism is formed to suit its social purpose. The emphasis is on social ethics, supernatural elements being avoided, in accordance with Ambedkar's understanding of Buddha, expressed in his book The Buddha and His Dhamma, published posthumously in 1957. Unlike Theravada Buddhism it is not a monastic religion. The local groups gather in buildings called Viharas for daily or weekly services, which include recitation of Ambedkar's books and excerpts from Buddhist canonical literature. Religious veneration for Ambedkar, in such forms as offerings (puja) in front of his statue or picture, is also common among the followers. The movement has also published guidebooks for Buddhist rituals, which contain prayers and instructions for weddings, deaths, and other rites of passage. Besides these activities the Viharas are used for educational and social purposes.

Apart from Buddha's birthday, the main festivals are the three important dates related to the life of Ambedkar, the Ambedkar Jayanti (his birthday) on April 14, the Dhamma Diksha (the day of his conversion) on October 14, and Ambedkar's death memorial day on December 6.

The movement finds expression in a set of organizations: the Buddhist Society of India, c/o Prof. P. P. Garud, 180/4932, Pant Nagar, Ghatkopar, Bombay 400095, India; the International Buddha Education Institute Buddha Lok, Meerut Road, Hapur 245101 (Ghaziabad), U.P., India; Dr. Babasaheb Ambedkar Samarak Samiti, Ambedkar Town Dharaampenth, Nagpur, India; Federation of Ambedkarite Buddhist Organizations, Milan House, 8 Kingsland Road, London E2 8DA, United Kingdom.

Address:

Ambedkar Buddhism
<http://www.ambedkar.org>

Mikael Aktor

Sources:

- Ambedkar, B. R. The Untouchables: Who Were They and Why They Became Untouchable. New Delhi: Amrit Book Co., 1948.
- . The Buddha and His Dhamma. Bombay: Siddharth College Publication I, 1957.
- Fiske, Adele. "Scheduled Caste Buddhist Organizations." In The Untouchables in Contemporary India, edited by J. Michael Mahar. Tucson: University of Arizona Press, 1972.
- Fitzgerald, Timothy. "Ambedkar Buddhism in Maharashtra." Contributions to Indian Sociology 31, 2 (1997): 225–251.
- Zelliot, Eleanor. From Untouchable to Dalit: Essays on the Ambedkar Movement. New Delhi: Manohar Publications, 1992.

American Atheists

Among the most important organizations promoting corporate life for professing atheists, American Atheists was founded as the International Freethought Association of America in 1963 by Madalyn Murray O'Hair (1919–1995). Although ATHEISM had been professed by numerous individuals, including prominent cultural and intellectual leaders, it did not take on real organizational life until the nineteenth century and has shown some difficulty in sustaining stable ideological communities.

O'Hair had filed a lawsuit in the state of Maryland challenging the practice of beginning the day in public schools with prayer and a reading from the Bible. The suit argued that those practices violated the provisions in the Constitution against the establishment of religion by the state and the principle of separation of church and state. She later instituted a second (unsuccessful) suit calling for the end of tax exemption for church-owned property. The Supreme Court's agreement with her in the first suit became the catalyst that led to the founding of the association. By this time she had moved to Hawaii, and she subsequently moved to Austin, Texas, where the association was superseded by the Society of Separationists and several associated organizations, including the Charles E. Stevens American Atheist Library and Archives and Poor Richard's Universal Life Church (chartered by the Universal Life Church). The Society of Separationists evolved into American Atheists, Inc.

Through the 1970s and 1980s, Murray became the most outspoken and famous atheist in North America, and her often abrasive manner created many critics above and beyond those who rejected her atheist perspective. In 1978, a group left her organization to create the rival Freedom from Religion Foundation, and subsequently other similar atheist organizations appeared. One of her sons, William Murray, broke with his mother to become a Christian. Then on September 4, 1995, O'Hair, her son Jon, and her granddaughter Robin Murray O'Hair disappeared. After a few contacts with American atheist leaders through that month, they were not subsequently in communication, and several years later it was finally determined that they had been murdered. Meanwhile, in 1996, the organization reorganized, and Ellen Johnson became its new president.

American Atheists advocate a non-Marxist worldview that is free from theism. They suggest that a world without religion would be a better place. Religion is baseless superstition and supernatural nonsense, according to them, and healthy people do not need God. O'Hair and most of the members reject the historicity of Jesus and belief in a life after death. They have been active in civil rights causes and the peace movement, but a main activity has involved legal cases opposing what they see as violations of the absolute separation of church and state.

American Atheists is largely confined to the United States. In 1997, it reported 2,400 members in 30 chapters. However, it has helped establish a global atheist network through United World Atheists, which holds a triennial World Atheist Meet.

Address:

American Atheists
Box 2117
Austin, TX 78767
<http://www.atheists.org>

Sources:

O'Hair, Madalyn Murray. Bill Murray, the Bible and the Baltimore Board of Education. Austin, TX: Atheist Press, 1970.
———. What on Earth Is an Atheist? Austin, TX: American Atheist Press, 1969.
Stein, Gordon. The Encyclopedia of Unbelief. Buffalo, NY: Prometheus Books, 1985.
Wright, Lawrence. Saints and Sinners. New York: Random House, 1993.

American Baptist Association

During the nineteenth century, beginning in the 1850s, the SOUTHERN BAPTIST CONVENTION was the scene of what became known as the Landmark Controversy, led by James R. Graves (1820–1893), who attempted to call Baptists back to what he considered the old landmarks of Christianity. Graves believed that the only true Christian churches in the world were the Baptist churches and that there had been a succession (however thin) of Baptists since the time of Christ and his baptism by John. Such true Baptist churches practiced baptism by immersion, limited communion to fellow Baptists, and rejected pulpit fellowship with ministers of non-Landmark churches.

Although Landmark ideas found considerable support among Southern Baptists, it was only at the beginning of the twentieth century that this perspective took on organizational life. Seceding from the Southern Baptist Convention and the state organizations associated with it, Landmark Baptists formed the East Texas Baptist Convention in 1900. Other state associations followed. A national association was formed in 1905, the General Association of Baptists. The General Association was never able to gain the support of the majority of Landmark congregations, however, and in 1924 a second organization was attempted, the American Baptist Association. Leading in this second organization was Ben M. Bogard (1868–1951), who also founded the Missionary Baptist Seminary attached to the church he pastored, the Antioch Missionary Baptist Church in Little Rock, Arkansas.

Crucial to the Landmark cause had been a criticism of the organization of the Southern Baptist Convention. The Landmark teachers advocated an equal representation of congregations at the convention meetings, irrespective of their size or financial contributions to the convention. They also challenged the authority of the Foreign Mission Board to appoint and dismiss missionaries. Although the Landmark position allows for associations beyond the local church, the powers of the association are strictly limited. There is no mission board, and the nurturance of missions has been placed in the hands of a committee that works with local churches. Missionaries are sent out by local churches with the approval of the association. In like manner, colleges are established by local churches and recognized by the association.

In the 1990s, the American Baptist Association claimed approximately 250,000 members, the largest group of which resided in the state of Arkansas. It supports a number of home missionaries, a variety of missionaries in foreign countries, and numerous indigenous Baptist churches around the world.

Address:

American Baptist Association
4605 N. State Line Ave.
Texarkana, TX 75501
<http://www.abaptist.org>

Sources:

Forman, L. D., and Alta Payne. The Life and Work of Benjamin Marcus Bogard. Little Rock, AR: self-published, 1965–1966.
Glover, Conrad N., and Austin T. Powers. The American Baptist Association, 1924–1974. Texarkana, TX: Bogard Press, 1979.

American Baptist Churches in the U.S.A.

The oldest Baptist body in the United States, the American Baptists formed as scattered Baptist churches and associations across the country banded together in the early nineteenth century. Baptists in the United States generally look to Roger Williams (c. 1603–1684) and the founding of the independent congregation in Providence, Rhode Island, as their beginning. Williams had been a minister among the Massachusetts Puritans (originators of CONGREGATIONALISM). His colleague John Clarke (1609–1676) began a second church in Rhode Island in 1648. These congregations championed Baptist ideals of adult baptism, congregational autonomy, and separation of church and state.

Baptists, persecuted in England, fled to the American colonies, where they continued to be persecuted until afforded some relief by the Act of Toleration passed in England in 1689. However, it is not surprising to find their second center of emergence to be in Pennsylvania, the colony established to provide a haven for the equally persecuted and despised FRIENDS (Quakers). The Pennepack Baptist Church opened in Philadelphia in 1688, and it was in

Choir at the First American Baptist Church in Savannah, Georgia (K. Cardwell/TRIP)

Philadelphia that the first Baptist association of churches was formed in 1707. The Philadelphia Association was a loose fellowship of independent Baptist congregations whose powers were strictly advisory. It had a role in disciplining ministers (who received ordination in the local congregation) and could set standards for fellowship. Among its important actions was the adoption of the London Confession of Faith, which included a Calvinist theological perspective and a statement about its use as a standard for association membership.

During the eighteenth century, Baptists emerged throughout the colonies, and numerous associations like the Philadelphia one were established. Also, three main groupings of Baptists appeared. Besides the Calvinists (who accepted an emphasis on God's election and predestination of believers), there were associations of General Baptists (who emphasized the role of free will in God's salvation plans), and Separate Baptists (who emphasized the necessity of the experience of personal salvation known as being born again). General Baptists found their greatest success in the southern colonies, and most eventually converged in the NATIONAL ASSOCIATION OF FREE WILL BAPTISTS.

The first national association of Baptists in America came as a direct result of the beginnings of world mission in the early nineteenth century. In order to facilitate their support of the missionary enterprise, some Baptists created the General Missionary Convention of the Baptist Denomination in America in 1814. The convention met triennially, and any congregation could choose to associate. The organization of the convention led to a major controversy over the role of organizations that appeared to take responsibility for ministry away from the congregation. Those who rejected the idea of such supracongregational structures withdrew and formed what became known as the Primitive Baptists. Those who accepted the idea of such organizations, as long as they were voluntary and did not infringe upon congregational autonomy, went on to found additional conventions to facilitate education, home missions, and the publication of literature. These additional societies tended to hold meetings at the same time as the meeting of the Triennial Missions Convention.

The next issue to rend American Baptists was slavery. The issue reflected the growing tension in America that eventually led to the Civil War, but it was precipitated within the convention over its refusal to credential any missionary who also happened to own slaves. In 1845, the issue split the convention, with Baptists in slave-holding states forming the Southern Baptist Convention. This separation occurred just as Baptists were in the midst of a concerted effort to convert African Americans in the South, both slave and free. In the years after the Civil War, lacking a national organization, many African American Baptists chose to affiliate with the Triennial Convention rather than the Southern Baptists. The majority of African American Baptists remained in affiliation with the Triennial Convention for a generation, but toward the end of the century many separated over the issue of self-determination to form the National Baptist Convention in the U.S.A. However, many remained in association with the Triennial Convention and today continue to form a substantial portion of the membership of the American Baptists.

Through the nineteenth century, Baptists associated with the Triennial Convention were content to continue their separate support of the various national organizations, but they finally moved toward a more centralized organization to coordinate the work of the various national and international ministries. In 1907, delegates moved to form the Northern Baptist Convention and to make the various societies its associated agencies. A new level of cohesiveness emerged.

The Northern Baptist Convention was one of the main arenas for the fight between fundamentalists (who demanded a strict adherence to traditional Baptist doctrinal perspectives) and modernists (who sought a revision of Christian beliefs in the light of modern social and intellectual developments). Although fundamentalists appeared to hold a slight majority in the 1920s, by the 1930s the modernists had firmly taken control, and many of the most conservative members and ministers left to found several new Baptist denominations, such as the Conservative Baptist Association.

Fundamentalists had attempted to force the Northern Baptists to adopt the New Hampshire Confession of Faith (an early statement of the Baptist perspective promulgated in 1730). However, in 1922 the convention adopted an alternate position, affirming that “the New Testament is the all-sufficient ground of our faith and practice and we need no other statement.” In subsequent years, the convention has not chosen to adopt a distinctive creedal statement, and a wide divergence in doctrinal perspectives is noticeable.

After World War II, the Northern Baptists changed names twice. In 1950, the convention became the American Baptist Convention and in 1972 took its present name. In 2001, the American Baptist Churches in the U.S.A. reported 1.5 million members in 5,800 congregations. It supports several colleges and eight postgraduate seminaries for the training of ministers. It is a member of the BAPTIST WORLD ALLIANCE and the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES.

As an organization, it traces its origin to the growth of the Protestant Christian missionary impulse in America. From initial support for Adoniram Judson (1788–1850) in India, the Triennial Convention expanded work to Burma (Myanmar). By the time of the break with the Southern Baptists in 1845, the convention supported 111 missionaries in Europe, West Africa, Asia, and the American West. It went on to found missions in countries around the world, most of which in the last half of the twentieth century were transformed into autonomous national churches and many of which are profiled elsewhere in this encyclopedia. The American Baptists continue to support many missionaries who are working with partner churches around the world.

Address:

American Baptist Churches in the U.S.A.
P.O. Box 851
Valley Forge, PA 19482–0851
<http://www.abc-usa.org>

Sources:

- Brackney, William H., ed. Baptist Life and Thought, 1600–1980: A Source Book. Valley Forge, PA: Judson Press, 1983.
- Maring, Norman H. American Baptists: Whence and Whither. Valley Forge, PA: Judson Press, 1968.
- McBeth, H. Leon. The Baptist Heritage: Four Centuries of Baptist Witness. Nashville, TN: Broadman Press, 1987.
- Torbet, Robert G. A History of the Baptists. Philadelphia: Judson Press, 1963.
- Wardin, Albert W., ed. Baptists around the World. Nashville, TN: Broadman and Holman Publishers, 1995.

American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions

Organized in 1810 as the missionary arm of the Congregational Churches of New England (now a constituent part of the UNITED CHURCH OF CHRIST), the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions was the first Protestant sending agency to commission missionaries from the United States. It joined in the missionary thrust begun in the previous century by the Moravians and became one of the most important missionary organizations participating in the dramatic nineteenth-century expansion of Protestantism around the world. Formally incorporated in 1812, it sent its first missionaries to India the very same year. Among the notable personnel to serve in India was Dr. John Scudder (1797–1855), who created the first medical mission in the country.

Among the more famous of the American Board efforts was the Hawaiian mission established in 1820 under the leadership of Hiram Bingham. Hawaii became the launching pad for work throughout the South Seas. Over the next decades work was expanded to Africa and the Middle East.

Periodically through the nineteenth century, Congregationalists working through the American Board cooperated with other churches of the Reformed tradition, and for a time the American Board became the missionary arm of the American Presbyterians (1812–1870), the DUTCH REFORMED CHURCH, now the REFORMED CHURCH IN AMERICA (1826–1857), and the German Reformed Church, now a constituent part of the United Church of Christ (1839–1866). Although always predominantly a Congregational venture, by the end of the twentieth century the American Board returned to its status as an exclusively Congregational agency. It also became more closely tied to the National Council of Congregational Churches. It continued to work with like-minded denominations, and in 1886 the Congregational Church in Canada used the American Board as its missionary arm in Angola. That relationship continued even after the Canadian Congregationalists merged into the UNITED CHURCH OF CANADA in the mid-1920s. In 1895, the small Schwenkfelder Church channeled its missionary concern through the American Board.

The operation of the American Board was considerably altered by changes in Congregationalism in the United States. In 1931, the Congregational churches united with the CHRISTIAN CHURCH (DISCIPLES OF CHRIST), and the American Board absorbed the missionary program of the Christian church (then entirely devoted to Japan). Then in 1961, following the merger of the Congregational-Christian Churches with the Evangelical and Reformed Churches to form the United Church of Christ, the various missionary agencies that had served the merging churches were merged to form the United Church Board for World Ministries. The new United Church Board continued the history of the American Board, but it came into existence just as numerous mission churches were in the process of dropping their missionary status and becoming independent churches. The United Church Board assumed some leadership for reorienting the United Church of Christ around the new idea of partnership relationships with Congregational churches in other countries, many of which continued to need both financial and personnel support, even as they dropped their former subordinate status.

In 1995, the United Board of World Ministries of the United Church of Christ and the Division of Overseas Ministries of the Christian Church merged into a common Global Ministries Board, a reflection of the complete intercommunion the two churches had accepted. The new common board, which officially began to function on January 1, 1996, now carries the history of the former American Board. Many churches around the world owe their beginnings to the efforts of American Board missionaries and are so identified throughout this encyclopedia.

Addresses:

Global Ministries Board
130 E. Washington St.
Indianapolis, IN 46204

700 Prospect Ave., 7th floor
Cleveland, OH 44115–1100

475 Riverside Dr., 10th floor
New York, NY 10115
<http://www.globalministries.org>

Sources:

- Mason, Alfred DeWitt. Outlines of Missionary History. New York: Hodder and Stoughton, 1912.
- Phillips, Clifton Jackson. Protestant America and the Pagan World: The First Half Century of the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions, 1810–1860. Cambridge: East Asian Research Center, Harvard University, 1969.
- Strong, William E. The Story of the American Board. New York: Pilgrim Press, 1910.

American Samoa

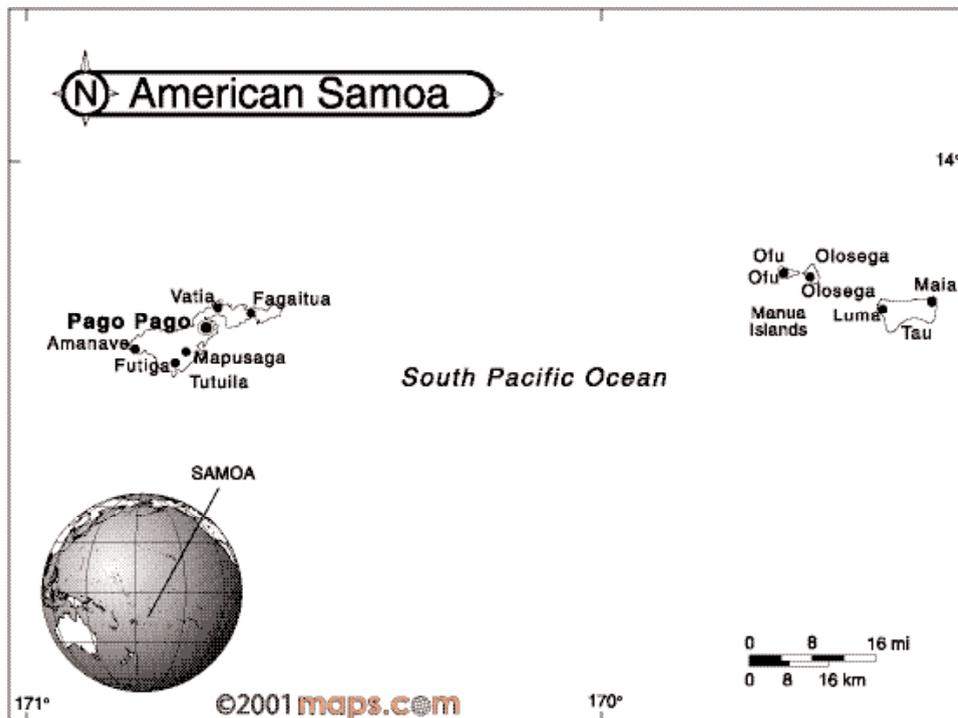

The history of American Samoa is intertwined and identical with that of the nation of Samoa (or Western Samoa) through the nineteenth century. American Samoa consists of those islands at the eastern end of the Samoan archipelago. The United States received hegemony over this area by a treaty in 1899 and the following year established a naval dependency centered on Pago Pago, one of the best natural deep-sea harbors in the world. It has proved a strategic location, especially during World War II.

After World War II, American Samoa became a United Nations trusteeship administered by the United States. Due to economic and other pressures, coupled with the openness of American immigration policy, many Samoans moved to Hawaii and the American mainland. In 1984, the United Nations ruled that independence should be granted, but the islanders have been content with local self-government and their peculiar relationship to the United States. They are considered U.S. citizens, but without the right to vote in the national elections while residing in American Samoa.

Through the nineteenth century, the missions established in Samoa by the METHODIST CHURCH (beginning in 1828), the LONDON MISSIONARY SOCIETY (1830), and the ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH (1845) spread across the Samoan archipelago. None of the three missions divided after the eastern islands were separated from the western islands in 1899. They continued to grow and prosper until 1962, when Western Samoa became an independent nation. Almost immediately, the London Missionary Society church became the CONGREGATIONAL CHRISTIAN CHURCH IN SAMOA, and in 1964, the Samoa Conference of the Methodist Church in Australia became the METHODIST CHURCH IN SAMOA. The Catholic vicariate that had emerged in 1957 to serve Samoa, American Samoa, and the Tokelau Islands was elevated to a diocese in 1966.

The emergence of Western Samoa as an independent nation eventually affected the major church structures, however, beginning in 1980 with the setting aside of the under the German rule in Samoa were removed following the American takeover. An early center was established at Mapusaga, which became an LDS village, complete with a school and a plantation that provided financial support. Membership at the end of the twentieth century was above 12,000 members out of a population of some 40,000.

Amish

The BAHÁ'Í FAITH is also present in American Samoa, though it has not enjoyed the success that it has had in Western Samoa.

Sources:

Barrett, David. The Encyclopedia of World Christianity. 2d ed. New York: Oxford University Press, 2001.

Bissio, Roberto Remo, et al. Third World Guide 93/94.

Montevideo, Uruguay: Instituto del Tercer Mundo, 1992.

Forman, Charles H. The Island Churches of the South Pacific: Emergence in the Twentieth Century. Maryknoll, NY: Orbis, 1982.

Followers	2000			2025	2050
	total	%	rate
Christians	65,200	95.8	3.75	137,000	191,000
Protestants	35,800	52.6	3.47	73,000	93,400
Roman Catholics	9,500	13.9	2.64	17,000	22,000
Marginal Christians	8,000	11.8	4.60	16,000	26,000
Nonreligious	1,400	2.0	5.40	3,300	5,000
Baha'is	990	1.5	4.62	2,000	3,000
Buddhists	440	0.6	8.18	900	1,300
Chinese folk-religionists	80	0.1	5.07	200	400
Total population	68,100	100.0	3.83	143,000	201,000

Congregationalists in the east as the CONGREGATIONAL CHRISTIAN CHURCH OF AMERICAN SAMOA. There have been talks aimed at the reunification of the two churches, but as yet they have not been fruitful. Two years later, the Roman Catholic diocese was divided, and a new Diocese of Samoa-Pago Pago created. Only the Methodist Church has remained as a single body. The Methodists and Congregationalists form the backbone of the National Council of Churches in American Samoa.

Virtually the same array of additional churches have come to American Samoa as established work in Samoa, beginning with the SEVENTH-DAY ADVENTIST CHURCH in 1895. These include the ASSEMBLIES OF GOD, the UNITED PENTECOSTAL CHURCH INTERNATIONAL, the CHURCH OF THE NAZARENE, and the JEHOVAH'S WITNESSES. The single Anglican parish is a part of the Diocese of Polynesia of the ANGLICAN CHURCH IN AOTEAROA, NEW ZEALAND, AND POLYNESIA.

The restrictions that had hobbled the work of the CHURCH OF JESUS CHRIST OF LATTER-DAY SAINTS (LDS)

Amish

The Amish are a small conservative Anabaptist group that takes its name from Jacob Amman (b. c. 1644), a leader among the Swiss MENNONITES who insisted upon a strict interpretation of the writings of Menno Simons (1496–1561) (to whom Mennonites look as their founder) and of the Dordrecht Confession of Faith, the common statement of belief among Mennonites. He emphasized church discipline and the use of avoidance and the ban to win back erring members. If a church member was put under the ban, members were to avoid communications with the person, and the spouse was to neither eat nor sleep with the offender. The advocacy of a ban led to a division among the Mennonites, and Amman placed all who disagreed with him under the ban. Later attempts at reconciliation failed, and the Amish emerged as a separate group.

The Amish dressed in the common clothing worn by people of the seventeenth century. One distinctive element in their attire was clothing void of buttons, a fashion that originated from a rejection of the bright buttons worn by the soldiers who had persecuted the Anabaptists. Over the centuries, the clothing was retained in spite of passing styles, and the Amish have become readily identifiable by their distinctive plain garb. The men also continue to keep their hair long and wear beards. The women wear bonnets to cover the head and aprons.

An Amish farmer plows his field using a six-horse team in Gordonville, Pennsylvania (J. Greenberg/TRIP)

The Amish began to migrate to America early in the eighteenth century and were able to maintain their agricultural life for many years in rural Pennsylvania, Ohio, and Indiana. However, during the twentieth century the community was under increased pressure to change to accommodate the modern world that now surrounded their communities and the increasing influx of tourists into “Amish country.”

Searching for plots of land large enough to support an Amish community has forced their migration to more isolated spots across the United States and Canada, though 80 percent still reside in Pennsylvania, Ohio, and Indiana. There are also a small number in Central America. None remain in Europe. More than half of the estimated 150,000 Amish are members of the Old Order Mennonite Church. There is no central headquarters, but spokespersons may be reached c/o Pathway Publishers, Rte. 4, Aylmer, ON Canada N5H 1R3.

The attempt to lead a separated life has made the Amish the subject of a variety of court actions. They do not use automobiles and wish to travel the public road in their horse-drawn buggies. They advocate education only through elementary school. The Amish are very reluctant to take part in any court proceedings. Several states have passed special legislation to accommodate the buggies, and the United States Supreme Court decision in 1972 allowed Amish children freedom not to attend secondary school. The National Committee for Amish Religious Freedom, founded in 1967 at the University of Chicago, attempts to assist the Old Order Amish and related Mennonite groups to continue their way of life in the face of the many rules and regulations that periodically infringe upon their community.

Members of the Old Order Amish, as those who belong to the Old Order Mennonite Church are called, generally worship in the homes of the members, each family hosting the congregation on a rotating basis. Some of the smaller splinter groups have built churches.

Sources:

- Denlinger, A. Martha. Real People: Amish and Mennonites in Lancaster, Pennsylvania. Scottsdale, PA: Herald Press, 2000.
- Hoestetler, John A. Amish Society. Baltimore, MD: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1968, 1993.
- Kraybill, Donald B., and Carl F. Bowman. On the Backroad to Heaven: Old Order Hutterites, Mennonites, Amish, and Brethren. Baltimore, MD: Johns Hopkins University Press, 2001.

Ananda Marga Yoga Society

46

Prabhat Ranjan Sarkar (1921–1990) founded the Ananda Marga Yoga Society in 1955 in the state of Bihar, India. Ananda Marga conceives of itself as “an international socio-spiritual movement involved in the twin pursuit of Self-realization and service to all of creation.” Sarkar, better known as Marga Guru Shrii Shrii Anandamurti (“He who attracts others as the embodiment of bliss”), is often referred to by his followers as simply Baba (Father). He is reported to have been an accomplished yogi by the age of four and to have attracted his initial devotees when he was only six. However, he went on to marry and obtain employment with the railway, where he was working when he founded Ananda Marga. During the next thirty-five years, Sarkar authored more than 250 books as Shrii Shrii Anandamurti. Additional volumes on various topics such as economics, education, social philosophy, and sociology appeared under his given name.

After officially founding Ananda Marga, Sarkar began to train missionaries to spread his teachings, and today Ananda Marga has a complex international organizational structure that divides the globe into eight sectors. It recognizes three levels of membership: (1) Acharyas, fully committed devotees and teachers who may be deployed to any location in the world; (2) Local Full Time Workers; and (3) Margiis, initiates who hold jobs outside the movement. The number of active members is not known, but estimates run as high as several hundred thousand.

Ananda Marga involves three distinct dimensions: (1) the practice of ancient tantra (tan is Sanskrit for expansion and tra signifies liberation) yoga, (2) meditation, and (3) active engagement in social service toward the goal of realizing a more humane and just world. Acharyas instruct initiates in both yoga and correct methods for meditation. Members of Ananda Marga also follow the Sixteen Points, created by Sarkar, which is an important system of spiritual practices that helps followers balance the physical, mental, and spiritual parts of their lives.

Sarkar’s commitment to a philosophy of “service of humanity” has led to the creation of multiple organizations. The perennial need for disaster relief around the world was addressed by creating the Ananda Marga Universal Relief Team (AMURT) in 1965 and the Ananda Marga Universal Relief Team Ladies (AMURTEL) in 1977. In 1958, Sarkar created Renaissance Universal as a structure to encourage intellectuals to conceive and create programs for improving the human condition. The Education, Relief, and Welfare Section (ERWS) is another organization created for the purpose of propagating Ananda Marga’s agenda of social service.

Sarkar was also active in trying to conceptualize and mobilize new ways of educating humankind. In his book Neo-Humanism: The Liberation of Intellect (1982), he advocates a form of education that simultaneously develops the physical, mental, and spiritual realms of human existence. At yet another level, Sarkar’s philosophy of service to humanity extends humanism to include animals and plants as well as people. With this belief, Sarkar established a global plant exchange program and also animal sanctuaries around the world.

The political dimension of Sarkar’s broad philosophy of social service, called PROUT (Progressive Utilization Theory) was first developed in 1959. It calls for economic democracy and human rights. Sarkar also promoted the creation of a world government with a global bill of rights, constitution, and justice system.

Sarkar’s political activism led Ananda Marga into much controversy in India during the 1960s and 1970s. Sarkar unsuccessfully ran for office in the 1967 and 1969 elections under the Proutist Bloc. At the same time, many began to see the Proutists as a terrorist organization. Both Prout and Ananda Marga were banned in India during the period of national emergency proclaimed by Indira Ghandi, and Sarkar was accused, convicted, and sentenced to life in prison for conspiring to murder former members. He won a new trial in 1978 and was acquitted of the charges.

Ananda Marga and its constituent organizations survived banishment from India and the imprisonment of its founding leader. Since the acquittal, it has recovered slowly in India, but experienced international growth.

Address:

Ananda Marga Yoga Society
Eastern Metropolitan By-Pass
V.I.P. Nagar
Tiljala, Calcutta 700039
India
<http://www.anandamarga.org>

Jeffrey K. Hadden and Angela An

Sources:

- Anandamurti, Shrii Shrii. Ananda Marga in a Nutshell. 4 vols. Calcutta: Ananda Marga Publications, 1988.
- Avadhuta, Ācārya Vijayānanda. The Life and Teachings of Shrii Shrii Anandamūrti. Calcutta: Ananda Marga Publications, 1994.
- Shrii P. R. Sakar and His Mission. Calcutta: Ananda Marga Publications, 1993.
- Way of Tantra: Ananda Marga Yoga Philosophy*. Calcutta: Ananda Marga Publications, 1989.

Ancient and Mystical Order Rosae Crucis

The Ancient and Mystical Order Rosae Crucis (AMORC; rosae crucis means “rosy cross” in Latin) has been a successful purveyor of the WESTERN ESOTERIC TRADITION to Middle America since its founding by H. Spencer Lewis (1883–1939) in 1915. Between 1915 and 1939, Lewis, a former adman, established the order in San Jose, California, and elaborated a spiritual pedigree for the group that included many of the major figures and esoteric fraternities of both Western civilization and the alternative reality tradition. Prominent figures in this illustrious lineage included Moses, Jesus, Solomon, the German Rosicrucian Fraternity of Pennsylvania, the Ordo Templi Orientis, the Knights Templars, the Essenes, Christian Rosenkreutz, Paracelsus, the Tibetan Great White Brotherhood Lodge, and Theosophy. Although challenges to this mythic history (and thus AMORC's legitimacy) were formidable during the 1920s and 1930s—particularly from the writings of R. Swinburne Clymer (1879–1966) of the Fraternitas Rosae Crucis—Lewis's order has survived its early controversies and played a key role in spreading the doctrines of Western Esotericism and mysticism in the United States through its ubiquitous advertising and numerous publications. Many leading members of contemporary esoteric orders were members of AMORC during their early spiritual training. Such new religious movements as the CHURCH OF SCIENTOLOGY, the Mayan Order, Astara, Silva Mind Control, the Holy Order of MANS, and the Order of St. Germain can be viewed as direct or indirect offshoots of AMORC.

AMORC represents itself as a nonsectarian, nonreligious school of spiritual initiation whose members devote themselves to the investigation, study, and practical application of natural and spiritual laws. The order's stated purpose is to further the evolution of humanity by helping develop the individual's full potential. By exploring the spiritual side of human nature and learning to work with the universal laws governing human behavior, members are prepared for cosmic initiation into the Great White Brotherhood. This brotherhood is described in AMORC's literature as a group of men and women who have attained high spiritual development and who work behind the scenes to guide humanity's evolutionary growth.

The teachings of AMORC cover such areas of knowledge as metaphysics, mysticism, psychology, and occult science. The emphasis in all these teachings is on personal mastery of outer conditions through mental imaging and practical daily application of lofty esoteric truths. The order distributes its lessons to members through a correspondence course developed by Lewis's son and successor, Ralph Maxwell Lewis (1902–1987). The younger Lewis moved AMORC away from its earlier emphasis on theurgy and "old occultism" and focused attention on psychological, metaphysical, and mystical approaches to esoteric development. The correspondence course has a scientific style and includes practical experiments.

AMORC's present North American headquarters, Rosicrucian Park, is in San Jose, California. The complex was established in 1927 and houses an acclaimed Egyptological and science museum, a planetarium, and a temple designed after the ancient Egyptian Temple of Dendera. The park has been a major tourist attraction in San Jose since the 1930s. The order's present emperor is Christian Bernard (b. 1953), the son of the prominent French esotericist, Raymond Bernard (b. 1921). Bernard was formally installed as emperor on August 7, 1990.

In 1990, the order claimed 250,000 members. By 1998, this number had fallen to 200,000. It is likely this loss of membership stems from a leadership battle fought out in the courts in 1990. Following the death of Ralph Lewis in 1987, Gary Lee Stewart (b. 1953), who had begun his career as a clerk in AMORC's adjustments department, became emperor. Stewart had impressed Lewis during a stint as a motoring missionary and was designated his successor. Stewart soon made waves among the order's older leadership as he began to implement his vision of a revitalized Rosicrucian order that took an active role in feeding starving Africans, fighting for human rights in Central America, and saving the Amazon rain forest. Following the creation of a $3 million trust account in Andorra and the securing of a $5 million loan using Rosicrucian Park as collateral—all to fund his initiatives—Stewart was charged by AMORC's board of directors with embezzlement and abuse of power and forced from office in April 1990. Stewart denied the charges and countersued AMORC for $31 million, alleging that the board had violated state law and its own constitution in firing him. In November 1990, Stewart lost his legal bid to win back his job. He has since become the head of an AMORC-derived order, the ConFraternity Rosae and Crucis, that works with original AMORC lessons and rituals and claims a worldwide membership. It is likely this splinter group has siphoned off many of the 50,000 members AMORC has lost during the 1990s.

AMORC's Web site (2001) lists forty meeting sites in the United States and Canada and Grand Lodges in England, Australia, New Zealand, Germany, Spain, France, Greece, Holland, Italy, Sweden, Czechoslovakia, Japan, Nigeria, Mexico, and Brazil. It claims members in over a hundred countries worldwide. AMORC derives its income mainly from the sale of books and paraphernalia and from annual dues paid by its international membership.

Address:

Grand Lodge
Ancient and Mystical Order Rosae Crucis
1342 Naglee Ave.
San Jose, CA 95191
<http://www.amorc.org/>

Phillip Charles Lucas

Sources:

Lewis, H. Spencer. Rosicrucian Questions and Answers. San Jose, CA: Supreme Grand Lodge AMORC, 1969.

Ancient Church of the East

Lewis, Ralph M. Cosmic Mission Fulfilled. Kingsport, TN: Kingsport Press, 1979.

Who and What are the Rosicrucians. San Jose, CA: Supreme Grand Lodge AMORC, 1966.

Ancient Church of the East

In 1972, the APOSTOLIC CATHOLIC ASSYRIAN CHURCH OF THE EAST, whose headquarters had been in the United States for more than three decades, experienced a schism in Iraq, where the largest number of its members reside. A group reorganized under Mar Addai as the church's new patriarch. The new body was also recognized by the government as the official continuing body of the Church of the East, whose history can be traced to the spread of Christianity into the region in the second century.

The Ancient Church of the East is like its parent body in belief and practice, the only distinction being in its administration. The schism spread through the whole of the Church of the East, and dioceses were soon established in Syria, the United States, and Germany (and now in Denmark).

Address:

Ancient Church of the East
c/o Patriarch Mar Addai II
P.O. Box 2363
Baghdad
Iraq
<http://www.atour.com/~maraddi>

Sources:

Orthodoxia. Regensburg, Germany: Ostkirchliches Institut, issued annually.

Roberson, Ronald G. The Eastern Christian Churches—A Brief Survey. 5th ed. Rome: Edizioni Orientalia Christiana, Pontificio Istituto Orientale, 1995.

Andhra Evangelical Lutheran Church

The Andhra Evangelical Lutheran Church (Andhra Suvesha Lutheran Sangham) represents the first American Lutheran entrance into foreign missions. In 1842, the Ministerium of Pennsylvania, the original Lutheran organization in the United States (now a constituent part of the EVANGELICAL LUTHERAN CHURCH IN AMERICA) sent C. F. Heyer (1793–1873) to begin work among the Telegu-speaking residents of Guntur, some 200 miles north of Madras, India. In 1850, the work begun in 1845 by the Norddeutsche Mission based in Bremen, Germany, was integrated into Heyer's prior effort. The mission spread through the state of Andhra Pradesh.

In the second generation the education emphasis of the mission emerged with the founding of a Bible training school at Rajamunsry (later Luthergeri Seminary). Today the church supports a law school and a set of secondary schools across Andhra Pradesh. About the same time Dr. Anna S. Kugler, a pioneer medical missionary, arrived to establish the first of what later became a set of nine hospitals opened by the mission. The hospital became the keystone in a far-reaching public health program. She was soon joined by Catherine Fahs, who opened the church's nursing school.

The church is headed by its general synod and president. The first Indian president, elected in 1944, signaled the transfer of the church to indigenous leadership. Women have also played a central part in the church's extensive development. They are organized into more than 800 sanajams (sections) and have developed a unique evangelism technique, Bible teams. Each team consists of a Bible teacher, a public health nurse, an educator, and a social worker. The teams have established social centers that reach out to villages. They have also established ashrams in which women of different castes come together for education and sharing.

The women's program is integrated into an extensive social service program run by the church as a whole, which also includes efforts initiated by the LUTHERAN WORLD FEDERATION. Efforts have been made to assist residents to build fireproof housing, hostels have been opened, and cyclone relief provided. The overall aim has been to assist people to become self-supporting. Problems that demand the church's attention have multiplied as modernization spreads through India, disrupting traditional patterns.

At the end of the 1990s, the church reported 400,000 members, making it one of the largest Lutheran churches in Asia. It now supports the interdenominational Andhra Christian Theological College at Secunderabad, where most of the ministers receive their training, and Andhra Christian College (founded by Lutherans). The church has entered into the Christian ecumenical community in India; it did not participate in the founding of the Church of South India, but does share full pulpit and altar fellowship with it. It is part of the associated United Evangelical Churches in India, through which it is a member of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES and the Lutheran World Federation. The church also retains its long-standing special relationship with the Evangelical Lutheran Church in America.

Address:

Andhra Evangelical Lutheran Church
P.O. Box 205
Brodie Pret
522 002 Guntur
Andhra Pradesh
India

Sources:

Neill, Stephen. A History of Christianity in India, 1707–1858. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1985.

Swavelly, C. Mission to Church in Andhra Pradesh, India: The Andhra Evangelical Lutheran Church, 1942–1962. New York:

Board of Foreign Missions of the United Lutheran Church in America, 1962.

Swihart, Altman K., ed. One Hundred Years in the Andhra Country. Madras, India: The Diocesan Press, 1942.

Andorra

Andorra is one of several postage-stamp countries that can still be found across Europe. Known officially as the Principality of Andorra, it consists of 190 square miles in the Pyrenees Mountains, bounded on the north by France and on the south by Spain. There is a local council that governs the land, but it is officially a suzerainty of two princes, the president of the French Republic and the bishop of the Roman Catholic Diocese of Urgel (in Spain).

The ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH is the dominant religious body, having a history in the area that dates to the beginning of the seventh century C.E. The Andorran parishes are part of the Diocese of Urgel.

The religious homogeneity of Andorra has been challenged in the decades since World War II by the entrance of both the JEHOVAH'S WITNESSES and the SEVENTH-DAY ADVENTIST CHURCH. The Witnesses initiated work around 1960. The Adventist work is part of the SDA Spanish Union of Churches organized in 1903.

Source:

Galinier-Pallerola, J. La religion populaire en Andorra: XVIe–XIXe siècles. Paris: Editions du centre national de la recherche scientifique, 1990.

Anglican Church in Aotearoa, New Zealand, and Polynesia

The Anglican Church in Aotearoa, New Zealand, and Polynesia had its beginning in the spread of the CHURCH OF ENGLAND, previously established in Australia, into the South Pacific. The Reverend Samuel Marsden, a church representative, negotiated the settlement of three missionary families on New Zealand in 1814 with a chief of the Maori people. The missionaries settled at Oihi in the Bay of Islands. Missionary activity spread throughout the island under the general guidance of the CHURCH

Status of religions in Andorra, 2000–2050

Followers	2000			2025	2050
	total	%	rate
Christians	72,900	93.5	4.08	141,000	146,000
Roman Catholics	69,500	89.2	4.06	132,000	135,000
Marginal Christians	450	0.6	6.49	2,400	5,000
Protestants	140	0.2	5.76	500	1,000
Nonreligious	3,900	5.0	5.60	9,900	14,400
Muslims	490	0.6	11.26	1,500	2,000
Hindus	350	0.5	15.94	1,000	1,600
Jews	270	0.3	4.62	400	700
Baha'is	110	0.1	6.25	250	500
Total population	78,000	100.0	4.21	154,000	165,000

MISSIONARY SOCIETY, assisted by early converts among the Maori who became effective evangelists. The first bishop, George Augustus Selwyn (1809–1878), arrived in 1842. The church was set apart in 1857 as an autonomous province, and by the end of the next decade five dioceses had been designated.

Today, the headquarters of the church may be reached through its presiding archbishop, Rt. Rev. John C. Paterson. The church is an integral part of the larger worldwide Anglican Communion and at one with it in doctrine and practice, though in recent decades church life has been marked by an effort to create a distinctively New Zealand church. As part of that effort, the church published its own revised prayer book (which contains the liturgy for its public services of worship) in 1989. Females were ordained to the priesthood in 1977, and in 1990 the Reverend Dr. Penny Jamieson was ordained as bishop of Dunedin, becoming in the process the first woman diocesan bishop in the Anglican Communion.

Anglican Church of Australia

Under Bishop Selwyn, the province cooperated with the church in Australia in the development of the Melanesian Mission, which took Anglican missionaries initially to the Solomon Islands. The New Zealand Church later gained hegemony over Anglican work elsewhere in the South Pacific. Today this work survives as the Church's Polynesia Diocese, whose bishop resides in Fiji. The diocese includes Fiji, Samoa, Tonga, and the Cook Islands.

The Church is a member of the World Council of Churches. With more than seven hundred thousand members, it remains the largest religious body in New Zealand. It supports an Internet site, given below, and each diocese has a linked home page.

Address:

Anglican Church in Aotearoa, New Zealand and Polynesia
Rt. Rev. John C. Paterson
P.O. Box 37 242
Parnell, Auckland 1033
New Zealand
<http://www.anglican.org.nz>

Sources:

The Church of England Yearbook. London: Church Publishing House, published annually.
Van der Bent, Ans J., ed. Handbook/Member Churches/World Council of Churches. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 1985.

Anglican Church of Australia

The British established their first settlement, built around a military post and a penal colony, at Botany Bay. A CHURCH OF ENGLAND chaplain, Richard Johnson, accompanied the initial wave of settlers. Other chaplains came as the settlement grew, and as additional settlers arrived, Anglican parishes were created. In 1824, the church in Australia was incorporated into the Diocese of Calcutta (India) as an archdeaconry. The first Australian bishop, whose diocese covered all of the subcontinent and Tasmania, was consecrated in 1936. Tasmania became a separate diocese in 1842, and three additional dioceses were created in 1847. By 1872, when the General Synod met for the first time, the number of dioceses had increased to ten. The work grew as the population grew, and by the middle of the twentieth century there were more than twenty dioceses. Also included in the Australian jurisdiction was Papua New Guinea.

Anglican work in Australia remained a part of the Church of England through 1961. Then in 1962 the dioceses and the several state governments of Australia approved the constitution of the Church of England in Australia. A General Synod, which meets at least every four years, was constituted and a primate selected from among the bishops. In 1977, the work in Papua New Guinea was set apart as a separate province. The present name of the church was adopted in 1981.

The Anglican Church of Australia has a membership in excess of 4,000,000. The church is an ecumenically oriented body. It remains in full communion with the Church of England and participates in the worldwide ANGLICAN COMMUNION. It is also a member of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES.

Addresses:

Anglican Church of Australia
St. Andrew's House, Ste. 101
Sydney Square
P.O. Box Q190, QVB Post Office
Sydney, NSW 1230
Australia
<http://www.Anglican.org.au>

Archbishop Peter Carnley
G.P.O. Box W2067
Perth WA 6846
Australia

Sources:

Bentley, Peter, and Philip J. Hughes. A Yearbook of Australian Religious Organizations. Kew, Victoria, Australia: Christian Research Association, issued annually.
Breward, I. A History of the Australian Churches. St. Leonards, Australia: Allen and Unwin, 1993.

Anglican Church of Canada

The Anglican Church of Canada is the name given in 1955 to the Canadian branch of the ANGLICAN COMMUNION.

Since the CHURCH OF ENGLAND was constitutionally established in England, Anglican worship and ministry frequently accompanied English explorers, soldiers, settlers, and fishing fleets into what is now Canada, at least as early as the 1570s. In 1699, the bishop of London sent a minister to the townfolk of St. John's, Newfoundland, and over the following decades a few other parishes were created in Quebec and Nova Scotia. A much more substantial Anglican presence in the future Canada followed the American Revolution, when English-speaking refugees began flooding north from the United States. British and colonial governments made sure that Anglican churches were provided for them. Mission societies connected with the Church of England, particularly the SOCIETY FOR THE PROPAGATION OF THE GOSPEL IN FOREIGN PARTS, raised most of the money for church buildings and clergy salaries in these newer provinces of British North America (BNA), and they recruited and oversaw most of the missionaries. In addition, the Crown made large grants of land to the Church of England. The first overseas diocese of the Church of England was Nova Scotia (1787), but BNA bishops had little freedom of action given the authority referred by the mission societies, the Colonial Office, and the colonial governments.

Statutes establishing the Church of England were enacted successively in Nova Scotia (1758), New Brunswick (1784),

St. George's Anglican Church in Montreal, Quebec, Canada (B. Turner/TRIP)

and Prince Edward Island (1803). Well into the nineteenth century, the Church of England was also commonly referred to as the established church elsewhere in BNA, even if it could not legally enforce its pretensions. Church establishment meant that the government gave the Church of England financial help, appointed its chief ministers, and granted it certain legal privileges. In return, the church undertook to form citizens in Christian and civic virtues, including loyalty to the British Crown, and to provide various social services, including primary, secondary, and university education. But between about 1825 and 1860, most Anglican privilege was dismantled in BNA. Most educational systems were taken over by the government, statutes of establishment were repealed, and the church's landed endowment was seized.

As the Church of England in BNA lost its privileges, it also freed itself from its colonial dependencies and developed instruments of self-government. Starting with the Diocese of Toronto in 1853, Anglicans began governing themselves through synods, or church assemblies of clergy and lay representatives. Through their synods they could elect their own bishops without interference from England.

Court cases in the early 1860s severed most connections between colonial Anglican churches and the British Crown. The church in Canada became legally simply one religious denomination among others.

Meanwhile, the Northwest (the area between the Rocky Mountains and the Great Lakes) was not yet part of Canada, but was owned by the Hudson's Bay Company. Here Anglican chaplaincies to settlers and missions to native peoples were sponsored largely by the CHURCH MISSIONARY SOCIETY (CMS), which began its work there in 1820 and ended it a century later. The CMS had a policy of developing indigenous leadership, which led in 1850 to the first Anglican ordination of a Canadian native person, Henry Budd. Synodal government was developed there in 1869.

With the birth of the dominion of Canada in 1867 and its acquisition of the Northwest in 1870, Canadian Anglicans determined to create a national church structure. The Church of England in Canada was formed in 1893. It was to be governed by a General Synod and administered by a primate with the title archbishop. The national church assumed responsibility for foreign and domestic missions, and in 1918 one of its committees produced the first specifically Canadian Anglican order of worship, called the Book of Common Prayer (Canada).

The constituting document of the Anglican Church of Canada (ACC) is the very brief Solemn Declaration of 1893, which affirms the determination of the ACC to maintain the doctrine, sacraments, and discipline as commanded by Christ in Scripture and as set forth in the Book of Common Prayer and the Thirty-nine Articles of the Church of England. It particularly affirms the authority of the canonical Scriptures as containing all things necessary to salvation. The ACC has no formal confessional statement. But its authorized liturgical texts, to which its clergy are obliged to conform when they lead worship, are usually seen as expressing the doctrinal norms of the denomination. Either the Apostles' Creed or the Nicene Creed is recited in most services of worship. In practice, Canadian Anglicans accept a wide spectrum of theological beliefs.

Until the 1960s, the characteristic Anglican Sunday service was Morning Prayer and Evening Prayer from the Book of Common Prayer. Since the 1960s, weekly Holy Communion (or Holy Eucharist) has become the norm in a majority of Anglican churches. Two authorized liturgical texts are in use. The Book of Common Prayer (Canada) of 1959 uses sixteenth-century English and reflects the theology of the Protestant Reformation. The Book of Alternative Services of 1985 uses updated language and reflects the theology of the Liturgical movement of the twentieth century. Since 1967, the ACC has welcomed all baptized Christians to receive communion.

Women were initially ordained to the priesthood in the ACC in 1976, and female clergy now make up about 16 percent of active clergy. The first woman to be ordained bishop was Victoria Matthews, in 1994.

The ACC reached a peak of church attendance, and probably church-building and financial resources as well, in the early 1960s. Published annual statistics suggest a significant decline since then. About 1.3 million members were recorded on parish rolls in the early 1960s, but fewer than 720,000 in 1997. The church is a member of the worldwide Anglican Communion and the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES.

Until its demise in the late 1960s, the residential school system for native peoples was the largest single item in the church's national budget. This system grew out of treaties signed by the Canadian government late in the nineteenth century and subsequent contracts with several Christian denominations to administer native schools. The failures and abuses of this system resulted in the filing of more than a thousand lawsuits in the 1990s (almost all yet to be adjudicated as this encyclopedia goes to press), which have created a significant financial crisis for the ACC.

The church has its headquarters in Toronto. Its current primate is Most Reverend Michael Peers. It supports an Internet site, given below.

Address:

Anglican Church of Canada
600 Jarvis St.
Toronto, Ontario M4Y 2J6
Canada
<http://www.anglican.ca>

Alan Hayes

Sources:

- Carrington, Philip. The Anglican Church in Canada: A History. Toronto: Collins, 1963.
- Grant, John Webster, general editor. A History of the Christian Church in Canada. Toronto: McGraw-Hill Ryerson, 1972.
- Handbook of the Anglican Church of Canada*. Toronto: Anglican Church of Canada, General Synod, 1999.
- Hayes, Alan L. Anglican Controversy and Identity in Canada. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, forthcoming 2002.
- Walsh, H. H. The Christian Church in Canada. Toronto: Ryerson Press, 1956.

Anglican Church of Hong Kong and Macao

Anglicans arrived in Hong Kong with the British, and the first church was opened in 1842. The cornerstone for St. John's Cathedral was laid five years later. The work grew, along with a set of parochial schools, and was for many years integrated into the larger work in mainland China. Hong Kong was the center of the Diocese of Victoria, which included China and Japan, but through the years, as the work was divided, its episcopal territory was reduced accordingly. Missionaries were received into the diocese not only from the CHURCH OF ENGLAND, but from Anglican churches in North America, Australia, and New Zealand.

The work in Hong Kong and Macao was dramatically altered during the 1940s, first by the Japanese invasion and occupation and then by the Chinese Revolution and the expulsion of all foreign missionaries in 1950. Outside of Hong Kong and Macao, all of the Anglican work in China was merged into the CHINESE PROTESTANT THREE-SELF PATRIOTIC MOVEMENT COMMITTEE and the China Christian Council. The work in Hong Kong continued as an extraprovincial diocese. Then in 1997, in anticipation of the change of government in the two territories, the Diocese of Hong Kong and Macao was transformed into the Province of Hong Kong Sheng Kung Hui with three dioceses—Hong Kong, East Kowloon, and West Kowloon and the Missionary Area of Macao under the Diocese of Hong Kong. Currently one archbishop and two bishops serve the province.

Address:

Anglican Church of Hong Kong and Macao
c/o The Most Reverend Peter Kwong
Bishop of Hong Kong and Macao
Bishop's House
1 Lower Albert Rd.
Hong Kong

Sources:

Hoke, Donald. The Church in Asia. Chicago: Moody Press, 1975.
Poon, Michael. "The Theological and Mission Task Facing Hong Kong Anglicans in the Face of Reunification with China after 1997." In Anglicanism: A Global Communion, edited by Andrew Wingate et al. London: Mowbrays, 1998.

Anglican Church of Korea

Reverend John C. Corfe was consecrated in London in 1889 as the first bishop for a projected diocese of the CHURCH OF ENGLAND in Korea. He arrived in 1890 and settled in Seoul as an agent of the SOCIETY FOR THE PROPAGATION OF THE GOSPEL IN FOREIGN PARTS. Early work extended to Kyung-gi and Chung-cheong Provinces. He also established a set of educational, medical, and social-service facilities. Church growth was slow but steady. In the decade between World Wars I and II, missionary work concentrated in the northern half of Korea. In 1939, the church had some 10,000 members

As a result of the Korean War, the half of the church's property and members located in the People's Republic of Korea were lost. However, the church has continued to expand in the south. In 1965, the first Korean bishop was named as the bishop of Seoul. At the same time, a second diocese was created in which an Anglo bishop continued to serve. In 1974, he completed his period of service and returned. That same year a third diocese was created, and two Koreans were consecrated as bishops. The three Korean dioceses remained under the jurisdiction of the archbishop of Canterbury until 1993. That year, the Diocese of Seoul was elevated to an archdiocese, the first archbishop of Seoul, Most Reverend Simon K. Kim, was consecrated, and the church in Korea reorganized as a new province, the Anglican Church of Korea.

The Church of Korea is headed by Archbishop Kim, who serves both as primate and as bishop of Seoul. The church supports the Anglican University in Seoul, and four religious orders: the Society of the Holy Cross, the Korean Franciscan Brotherhood, the Order of St. Benedict, and Jesus Abbey. Jesus Abbey is an international Christian community in the mountains of Kangwondo. The church is a member of the worldwide ANGLICAN COMMUNION and the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES.

Address:

Church of Korea
3 Ching-cong
Chung-ku, Seoul 100-120
Korea
<http://www.sk.h.or.kr/eindex.htm>

Sources:

Kane, J. Herbert. A Global View of Christian Missions. Grand Rapids, MI: Baker Book House, 1971.
Park, I. G. The History of Protestant Mission in Korea. Seoul: Yonsei University Press, 1970.

Anglican Communion/Anglican Consultative Council

The worldwide Anglican Communion consists of those Christian churches that have developed out of the ministry and mission of the CHURCH OF ENGLAND and that remain in formal community with the church and its primary official, the archbishop of Canterbury. The Church of England traces its beginning to the emergence of Christian communities in the second century C.E. and the development of the first dioceses by the fourth century; however, the emergence of the modern Anglicanism is generally referred to the definitive events of the sixteenth century.

Through the fifteenth century, the British church was part of the larger ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH. However, in the 1530s, King Henry VIII (r. 1509-1547) was excommunicated and led in the separation of the church from Roman authority. At the same time, Lutheran and Reformed churches were being formed in several countries of continental Europe. Under Henry's successor, Edward VI (r. 1547-1553), an attempt was made to swing England squarely into the Protestant camp. Under Mary I (r. 1553-1558), an opposing effort was exerted to return the country into the Roman Catholic realm. Under Queen Elizabeth I (1558–1603), a unique mixture of elements of both Roman Catholicism and Protestantism, a via media, or middle way, was created. Modern Anglicanism derives from that middle way, which incorporates the Protestant emphasis on biblical authority and limits the number of sacraments to baptism and the Lord's Supper. A number of Roman Catholic beliefs and practices are specifically rejected in the church's statement of faith (the Thirty-nine Articles of Religion). At the same time, the threefold ministry of deacon, priest, and bishop is retained, as is the emphasis on a formal liturgy and church tradition. The result was a new form of Christian faith.

Beginning in the early seventeenth century, England began to plant colonies in North America. The colonial enterprise grew to include a large worldwide empire, which included Australia, New Zealand, various South Pacific island groups, a large section of Africa, India, Hong Kong and several South Asian lands, and many Caribbean islands, among other lands. The Church of England established foreign branches in the various British colonies, and beginning with Canada in 1787 and Australia in 1842, supplied them with a resident bishop.

Through the nineteenth century independent churches, administratively separate but remaining in communion with the Church of England, began to emerge. This process accelerated in the twentieth century after World War II. Earlier, as a result of the American Revolution, an independent EPISCOPAL CHURCH had been created in the United States.

In 1867, at the request of Canadian Anglican leadership, the first of what became regular gatherings, the Lambeth Conferences, was hosted by the archbishop of Canterbury. These conferences have continued to be held, roughly every ten years, and have provided a time for deliberations by the bishops from around the world and the opportunity for them to speak on issues with a united voice.

In 1897, the bishops saw fit to create a more permanent structure to provide for continuity between conferences and created the Consultative Body of the Lambeth Conference. This organization evolved in several steps into the Anglican Consultative Council, with headquarters at Lambeth Palace in London. The council brings together not only bishops, but presbyters, deacons, laypeople, and youth from the various churches to work on common problems. It meets every two years and is hosted by different Anglican churches around the world.

The Lambeth Conference of 1888 proposed the most commonly cited expression of the Christian faith as espoused by the church of the Anglican Communion, the Chicago-Lambeth Quadrilateral. This document affirms the faith of Anglicanism to be based upon four pillars: the Holy Scriptures of the Old and New Testaments as the revealed Word of God; the Nicene Creed as the sufficient statement of the Christian faith; the two sacraments of Baptism and the Eucharist as administered with the unfailing words and elements used by Christ; and the historic episcopate. This faith finds expression in the Book of Common Prayer, which includes the liturgical text for Sunday worship and the Thirty-nine Articles of Religion.

The Anglican Communion currently consists of more than forty independent church bodies. The Anglican Consultative Council has its headquarters at Partnership House, 157 Waterloo Rd., London SE1 8UT, England. Both it and the Anglican Communion are served by the Anglican Communion Secretariat, which is headquartered in the same building.

Address:

Anglican Communion
<http://www.anglicancommunion.org/site.html>

Sources:

- Holloway, Richard, ed. The Anglican Tradition. Wilton, CT: Morehouse-Barlow, 1984.
Neill, Stephen. Anglicanism. London: A. R. Mowbrays, 1977.
Whale, John. The Anglican Church Today: The Future of Anglicanism. London: Mowbrays, 1988.
Wingate, Andrew, et al., eds. Anglicanism: A Global Communion. London: Mowbrays, 1998.

Anglican Province of the Southern Cone of America

Anglican efforts to build a mission in Argentina began in the 1840s, carried out by the South American Missionary Society, an independent sending agency operating within the CHURCH OF ENGLAND. Initial work was begun in 1824 among the Patagonian people in the extreme southern part of Argentina; however, both initial missions failed, and their members died, those of the first mission from starvation, those of the second at the hands of hostile natives. Then, in 1888, Barbrook Grubb moved to the Chaco region in northern Argentina near the Paraguayan border and began a mission among the native peoples. The work soon spread into Paraguay, where Wilfred B. Grubb began to work among the Lengua people. The society's work spread to Chile at the beginning of the twentieth century, when a medical mission was opened among the Mapuche people.

From these modest beginnings, the Church of England was established throughout the southern half of Spanish-speaking South America. The work was inhibited, however, by the policy of the church, articulated forcefully at the 1910 conference on missions at Edinburgh, that South America was not an object of missions for the church, due to the prior establishment of the ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH. Thus, the independent work nurtured by the South American Missionary Society and a few congregations established to serve expatriates constituted the extent of the Anglican thrust in the Spanish-speaking countries of the continent.

Over the years, the society's work grew, a number of congregations were formed, and converts were trained and ordained for the ministry. In the decades after World War II, the hierarchy was developed, with dioceses being formed in Argentina (two), Chile, Paraguay, and Uruguay. These were originally under the direct authority of the archbishop of Canterbury, but in 1974 they were reorganized under the Consejo Anglicano Sud-Americano. A separate Diocese of Peru and Bolivia was formed in 1978. The constitution for the new province of the Anglican Church of the Southern Cone of America was approved in 1981, and the church was inaugurated two years later.

The church is led by its primate, currently Most Reverend Maurice Sinclair. As the new century began, the province reported 27,000 members. It is a member of the worldwide ANGLICAN COMMUNION and the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES.

Address:

Anglican Province of the Southern Cone of America
Casilla de Correo 187
CP 4400 Salta
Argentina

Sources:

Kane, J. Herbert. A Global View of Christian Missions. Grand Rapids, MI: Baker Book House, 1971.
Wingate, Andrew, et al., eds. Anglicanism: A Global Communion. London: Mowbrays, 1998.

were ended by the Portuguese drive for Angola's mineral wealth and slaves.

Late in the sixteenth century, the Jaga people, staunchly opposed to the Portuguese, gained control in northern Angola and moved southward. In the meantime the Portuguese had established their center near present-day Luanda, but found their attempts to push inward stopped by local resistance. Through the next centuries, they were able to keep a presence along the coast and keep up the slave trade (which involved the selling into slavery of an estimated three million people), but did not establish control over the entire designated colony until the twentieth century.

After World War II, a nationalist movement developed, which was met with attempts by Portugal to increase the European presence in the land and to keep Angola from following the trend toward independence that was becoming so much a part of African life. In 1961, Angola was reclassified as an overseas province of Portugal. That same year a

Angola

Angola had become the home of Bantu peoples beginning in the seventh century C.E., but over the centuries various groups passed through the area and settled. Much of what is now northern Angola was incorporated into the Kongo Kingdom that the Portuguese found when they first moved along the Atlantic coast toward the end of the fifteenth century. The Portuguese built cordial relations with the Kongo ruler, Manikongo Nzinga Alfonsa (whose lengthy rule lasted from 1505 to 1543). He converted to Christianity, but both the rule of his successors and the positive relations between the inhabitants and the Portuguese

Followers	2000		2025	2050
	total	% rate
Christians	12,115,000	94.1 3.44	24,441,000	35,516,000
Roman Catholics	8,000,000	62.1 3.63	16,500,000	24,338,000
Protestants	1,930,000	15.0 4.03	4,100,000	6,300,000
Independents	880,000	6.8 4.44	2,062,000	3,200,000
Ethnoreligionists	639,000	5.0 2.21	300,000	250,000
Nonreligious	94,900	0.7 4.69	300,000	1,000,000
Atheists	26,600	0.2 3.43	60,000	120,000
Baha'is	1,500	0.0 4.05	3,500	10,000
Buddhists	1,100	0.0 2.04	2,200	4,500
Chinese folk-religionists	110	0.0 3.14	200	400
Total population	12,878,000	100.0 3.39	25,107,000	36,901,000

civil war began for control. The conflict lasted for fourteen years before independence was finally declared in 1975. However, the several groups that had worked against the Portuguese now began to fight among themselves for control. Only in 1991 was a peace treaty negotiated, and elections were held the following year. One of the losing groups, the União Nacional para a Independência (UNIDA), did not accept the results and renewed the war for another two years. The country now exists under a government of National Reconciliation that emerged out of the 1994 agreement, the Lusaka Protocol. However, many of the UNIDA resisted steps at disarmament, and the civil war resumed and continues as this encyclopedia goes to press.

The effects of a generation of war (following a rather brutal colonial regime) have included deep divisions between various ethnic groups (especially the larger Ovimbundu, Mbundu, and Bakongo peoples), massive displacements of people, and deep economic problems.

Traditional indigenous religions have declined significantly since World War II. In 1950, more than 70 percent of the public still adhered to a traditional religion, but by the end of the century that number had dropped to around 5 percent. Traditional religion was strongest in some of the most rural areas, especially among the Hukwe, Mbukushu, Mbwela, and Kwangali, all relatively small groups. However, about 70 percent of the half-million Chokwe people retain their traditional faith. Traditional beliefs still retain a broader power as particular elements (belief in malevolent magic, respect for ancestors, and traditional healing practices) survive within various Christian churches.

Christianity, which now claims more than 90 percent of the population, was introduced into Angola in 1491 by the Portuguese. A number of Roman Catholic priests, including Franciscans and Dominicans, established missions. Christianity flourished for a generation and Henrique, the son of Manikongo Nzinga Alfonsa, became the first sub-Saharan African to be consecrated as a bishop. However, the Portuguese authorities undercut the church with the pursuit of the slave trade. Much of the work (including the diocesan structure) was lost in the sixteenth century.

The Portuguese shifted southward after the founding of Luanda in 1576, and with the help of Jesuits, the church's presence was reasserted. An episcopal see was established, but the ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH made little progress over the next centuries, due to native resistance to the presence of the Portuguese authorities and the slave trade. A new beginning for the church occurred in 1865 with the assignment of the White Fathers to Angola by the Vatican. By the end of the nineteenth century, real progress was made, though only since World War II has significant progress in the interior been seen. By 1970, there were more than 2.5 million Catholics, a number which has jumped to closer to 8 million today. With more than 60 percent of the population, the Catholic Church is by far the most dominant force in Angolan religion.

Very early in their approach to Angola, which only began in the last half of the nineteenth century, Protestant groups agreed to a noncompetitive approach, and different groups tended to restrict their missionary efforts to specific peoples. The British Baptists arrived initially in 1878 and established work among the Bakongo people near São Salvador. Two years later, missionaries with the AMERICAN BOARD OF COMMISSIONERS FOR FOREIGN MISSIONS arrived to work among the Ovimbundu and were joined by Canadian Presbyterians (now an integral part of the UNITED CHURCH OF CANADA) in 1886. Their efforts resulted in what is today the EVANGELICAL CONGREGATIONAL CHURCH IN ANGOLA.

In 1885, forty-five missionaries from the Methodist Episcopal Church (now an integral part of the UNITED METHODIST CHURCH) arrived in Angola as one of the first efforts organized by the newly elected bishop, William Taylor. They began work among the Kimbundi people near Luanda. The CHRISTIAN BROTHERS established their mission in 1889. Anglicans established work in Angola early in the twentieth century. It remained small and for many years was under the CHURCH OF THE PROVINCE OF SOUTH AFRICA. A separate diocese for Angola was created in the mid-1990s. Also entering in the 1920s and building a successful affiliated mission was the SEVENTH-DAY ADVENTIST CHURCH.

Pentecostals appear to have entered Angola in the 1930s with the initial effort by the CHURCH OF GOD (CLEVELAND, TENNESSEE). Spectacular growth has been experienced by the ASSEMBLIES OF GOD mission, now known as the Evangelical Pentecostal Mission of Angola. This church is also notable as one of the few Pentecostal churches with membership in the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES.

Independent Evangelical missions have had an important role in the development of the country. In 1897, the Philafricaine Mission, supported by Swiss Protestants, began work. The South African General Mission (now the African Evangelical Fellowship) launched work in southern Angola along the Kutsi River in 1914. Its efforts have resulted in the formation of the Evangelical Church of South Angola. The 1920s saw the advent of Archibald Patterson, an independent Anglican missionary who started work in the province of Uige in northern Angola. The work prospered until the 1960s, when it was thoroughly disrupted by the civil war. In subsequent years several churches have resulted from the original missionary effort, including the EVANGELICAL REFORMED CHURCH OF ANGOLA and the UNITED EVANGELICAL CHURCH—ANGLICAN COMMUNION OF ANGOLA.

Angola has been notable for its relative lack of African Initiated Churches. The largest is the KIMBANGUIST CHURCH (the Church of Jesus Christ on Earth by His Messenger Simon Kimbangu), which originated in the neighboring Democratic Republic of the Congo. In spite of being suppressed for a time, it now has more than three hundred thousand members. During the period of suppression (following Kimbangu's arrest in the Congo), a splinter group, the TO-COIST CHURCH, began in Angola. Angola was also the home of several splinter groups of the AFRICAN APOSTOLIC CHURCH OF JOHANE MARANGE (based in Zimbabwe).

Christian ecumenical activity began in 1922 with the formation of the Evangelical Alliance of Angola. The alliance was suppressed in 1961. In 1974, several of the more conservative churches formed the Association of Evangelicals in Angola, now associated with the WORLD EVANGELICAL ALLIANCE. There years later, a number of the older churches formed the Angolan Council of Evangelical Churches (now the Council of Christian Churches in Angola) and affiliated with the World Council of Churches.

Apart from a small community of the BAHAI FAITH and some Buddhists affiliated with SOKA GAKKAI INTERNATIONAL, there is little visible presence by groups outside of the Christian tradition. There is no Islamic work of note.

Sources:

Grohs, G., and G. Czernik. State and Church in Angola, 1450–1980. Geneva: Institut Universitaire des Hautes Études Internationales, 1983.

Henderson, Lawrence W. A igreja em Angola: um rio con várias correntes. Lisbon: Além-Mar, 1990. English edition: The Church in Angola: A River of Many Currents. Cleveland, OH: Pilgrim Press, 1992.

Santos, A. F. Liturgia, Cristianismo e sociedade en Angola. Neves, Angola: Editorial Coloquios, 1968.

Anguilla

Anguilla, the most northerly of the Leeward Islands, on the northwest corner of the Caribbean Sea, is a British Dependent Territory, having separated from St. Kitts in 1980. Though known from the fifteenth century by Europeans, Anguilla (together with the associated Sombrero Island) was unattractive for settlement due to limited fresh water reserves, and only in the nineteenth century did the popula-

Status of religions in Anguilla, 2000–2050

Followers	2000			2025	2050
	total	%	rate
Christians	7,600	91.5	1.23	9,900	11,200
Protestants	4,100	49.7	2.11	5,700	6,200
Anglicans	2,600	31.9	0.31	3,200	3,500
Roman Catholics	310	3.7	3.03	520	700
Spiritists	460	5.5	1.82	650	800
Nonreligious	100	1.2	2.46	200	400
Baha'is	90	1.0	2.08	160	300
Muslims	50	0.6	4.37	80	150
Hindus	20	0.2	5.45	40	60
Total population	8,300	100.0	1.30	11,000	12,700

tion begin to grow. Among its few assets are extensive salt deposits. Today there are still only slightly over 7,000 residents on the island, many descendants of the slaves brought from Africa.

Beginning in 1916, Anguilla was administered as part of a British colony including the Virgin Islands and St. Kitts. The former separated in 1871. In the 1960s, Anguillans agitated against both their continued colonial status and their ties to St. Kitts, but their autonomy was not fully accomplished until 1980.

The Church of England was established on Anguilla at the end of the seventeenth century. It was joined by the Methodists in 1813. The great majority of the islanders are members of one of these two churches. The Anglican parishes are now part of the CHURCH IN THE PROVINCE OF THE WEST INDIES and the Methodist churches of the METHODIST CHURCH IN THE CARIBBEAN AND THE AMERICAS, both headquartered in Antigua. The ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH established a parish in 1850. It is now a part of the Diocese of Saint John's (Antigua).

Antarctica

During the twentieth century, several other Protestant churches have attempted to found churches, most notably the CHRISTIAN BROTHERS and the CHURCH OF GOD (ANDERSON, INDIANA), and both the JEHOVAH'S WITNESSES and the SEVENTH-DAY ADVENTIST CHURCH also have a following.

Sources:

- Barrett, David. The Encyclopedia of World Christianity. 2d ed. New York: Oxford University Press, 2001.
- Bissio, Roberto Remo, et al. Third World Guide 93/94. Montevideo, Uruguay: Instituto del Tercer Mundo, 1992.
- Petty, C. L. A Handbook History of Anguilla. Anguilla: n.p., 1991.

Antarctica

Uninhabited until the twentieth century, the Antarctic region began to be systematically explored in the 1820s, and by the end of the 1830s it was established that Antarctica was a continent (as opposed to a group of islands connected by ice). Exploration of the interior increased through the first half of the twentieth century, and after World War II the continent was targeted for scientific research. Since that time quite a few countries have established year-round stations there, and seven have made formal territorial claims (none of which are broadly recognized). A 1959 treaty (which took effect in 1961) offers a legal framework for the current activities being carried out by the thirty-nine countries that have personnel there.

The Antarctic Treaty freezes the territorial claims that have been made by Argentina, Australia, Chile, France, New Zealand, Norway, and the United Kingdom. Most other nations do not recognize these territorial claims. The United States and Russia have not made territorial claims to date, but have reserved the right to make such claims.

The religious life of Antarctica reflects the spectrum of religions from the countries that have sent personnel to the region. There is only one religious structure on the continent, the Chapel of the Snows, a Christian church in which both a Protestant and a Roman Catholic chaplain conduct services, the largest percentage (68 percent) of the residents being Christian. As might be expected, the second largest group on the continent consider themselves nonreligious.

Sources:

- Barrett, David. The Encyclopedia of World Christianity. 2d ed. New York: Oxford University Press, 2001.
- McGonigal, David, and Lynn Woodworth. Antarctica and the Arctic: The Complete Encyclopedia. Westport, CT: Firefly Books, 2001.
- The World Factbook*. Washington, DC: Central Intelligence Agency, 2001.

Followers	2000			2025	2050
	total	%	rate
Christians	3,400	75.6	3.99	8,000	12,300
Roman Catholics	1,400	31.1	3.95	3,000	4,600
Protestants	970	21.6	4.41	3,000	4,700
Independents	700	15.6	3.42	1,500	2,200
Nonreligious	910	20.2	0.00	1,500	1,800
Muslims	120	2.7	11.61	200	450
Hindus	40	0.9	2.92	200	280
Buddhists	30	0.7	4.14	100	150
Total population	4,500	100.0	3.15	10,000	15,000

Anthroposophical Society

Rudolf Steiner (1861–1925) was a spiritual and esoteric teacher, a scholar, and the founder of the “school of spiritual science” called Anthroposophy. He understood this term to mean “the wisdom of becoming truly human”—the knowledge that enables human beings to develop their spiritual faculties and to assimilate into their consciousness the spiritual truths and realities of the cosmos. He felt that the attainment of the fullest human love and freedom is accomplished through regaining access to the inner reality of the self that humanity has lost in modern civilization. To aid in this attainment, Steiner, using his spiritual experiences and clairvoyant powers, set out an overarching account of the evolution of consciousness combined with a method of transforming human thinking and way of being. Between 1891 and 1924, the year before his death, he wrote some forty books. However, he was even more prolific in his speaking. It is said that he delivered more than six thousand lectures, which have been published in three hundred volumes.

Early in his intellectual life, Rudolf Steiner fell under the spell of the great German poet and thinker, Johann Wolfgang Goethe (1749–1832), probably best known in the English-speaking world as a poet and the writer of the play, Faust. Steiner edited Goethe's scientific writings, which presented Goethe's view of the natural world as a living organic system rather than the mechanical operation of dead matter.

Steiner had shown some clairvoyant abilities as a youth but was reluctant to reveal them in a culture that was by and large skeptical of such things. He came to feel strongly that it was only by bringing the spiritual world into intimate connection with the natural and social world that true human betterment would come about.

In 1902, he became involved with the Theosophical movement, believing that it was in the context of Theosophy that his ongoing spiritual experiences could be best understood. He served as general secretary of the German branch of the THEOSOPHICAL SOCIETY for several years. However, in 1909 he separated himself from the Theosophical Society because he rejected the claim that Jiddu Krishnamurti was the coming messiah. Even more deeply, Steiner had become convinced that the West could be saved from materialism and spiritual blindness only by drawing upon the resources of Western Christian esotericism and not by importing Oriental philosophies, however profound.

The foundations of the Anthroposophical movement were actually laid by Steiner's followers in 1913, the year that Steiner laid the foundation stone for the great building called the Goetheanum, designed to embody Goethe's vision of an organic order. However, it was not until 1923 that Steiner refounded the movement as the General Anthroposophical Society and became its first leader. This society is headquartered in the Goetheanum in Dornach but has branches in many parts of the world, including the United States.

A distinguishing mark of the Anthroposophical movement, beginning with Steiner himself, is the readiness to exercise its principles in practical endeavors. Steiner believed that spiritual principles were directly relevant to modern life and could transform our everyday living. He was eager to show how different human disciplines and arts could be made into spiritual practices. Steiner freely put himself at the disposal of all who sought his help and guidance. He developed the principles of eurhythmics for a dancer, gave public lectures to any who were interested, and wrote plays to illustrate esoteric principles.

In 1919, Steiner was asked by the owner of the Waldorf Astoria Cigarette Factory to set up a school based on his lectures on child development and pedagogy to help educate the children of his workers. This school became the model for what became known as the Waldorf schools, which now include over five hundred schools around the world, with ninety in the United States. It is the largest non-sectarian private school movement in the world, aimed at integrating the works of head, heart, and hand to develop each child into a free and responsible adult.

Responding to some farmers who were concerned with the extensive use of chemical fertilizers in modern agriculture, Steiner developed the "biodynamic" methods, building on his vision of nature as an organic whole, both spiritual and material. These methods of organic farming are still studied and utilized today among those who believe that organically grown food is superior.

Steiner was interested in the whole person, not just the spiritual aspect, and so he lectured extensively on medicine, particularly homeopathy, from an Anthroposophic viewpoint. The Anthroposophical Society continues to work with medical professionals to expand the repertoire of medical practice beyond their standard education.

Steiner saw himself as working primarily within the esoteric traditions of Christianity, as revealed in the Rosicrucian tradition, alchemy, and the like. He was respectful of, but not directly concerned with, the institutional Christian church and its exoteric theology. But ever responsive to those who called upon his help, he agreed to work with a group of ministers and theology students to help renew the institutional church. From this work came the Movement for Religious Renewal, also called the CHRISTIAN COMMUNITY. Although Anthroposophic Spiritual Science is designed to help individuals in their own spiritual ascent, the central sacrament of the Christian community, the Act of Consecration of Man, is designed to allow the participant to experience the descent of the divine into an assembled community.

Anthroposophy continues to develop its programs. With its world headquarters in the Goetheanum in Switzerland, the General Anthroposophical Society coordinates the activities of Anthroposophical societies in other European countries and in the United States. In addition to the Internet site given below, the international organization supports an Internet site that provides contact to Anthroposophical groups worldwide, <http://www.anthroposophy.net/>. The Anthroposophic Press (which may be contacted at <http://www.anthropress.org>), Rudolf Steiner Verlag (Switzerland), and Hawthorn Press (UK) have made Steiner's writings available in various European languages.

Address:

Anthroposophical Society
Goetheanum
4143 Dornach
Switzerland
http://www.goetheanum.ch

James Burnell Robinson

Sources:

Hemleben, Johannes. Rudolf Steiner: An Illustrated Biography. Translated by Leo Twyman. Edinburgh: Sophia Books, 2001.

McDermott, Robert. "Rudolf Steiner and Anthroposophy." In Modern Esoteric Spirituality, edited by Antoine Faivre and Jacob Needleman. New York: Crossroads, 1992.

Steiner, Rudolf. The Anthroposophical Movement: Eight Lectures at Dornach, 1923. Edinburgh: Rudolf Steiner Press, n.d.

———. How to Know Higher Worlds: A Modern Path of Initiation. Translated by Christopher Bamford. Herndon, VA: Anthroposophic Press, 1994.

Antigua

Antigua, an island of the Lesser Antilles on the northwest edge of the Caribbean Sea, was among the sparsely settled Caribbean islands, due to lack of fresh water. It was first inhabited by Caribs, who later abandoned it. The Spanish tried in the seventeenth century and the French in the eighteenth century. After the French left, the British succeeded in developing a means of saving rainwater, and in the nineteenth century, the colony prospered. Settlers created tobacco and sugar plantations and brought in African slaves to work them. Slavery was abolished in 1838, though the limitation on jobs left the Africans in virtual slavery into the next century. Following unrest in the 1960s, a new constitution adopted in 1966 granted the island self-government. The United Kingdom remains responsible for the island's defense and foreign relations.

With the initial British settlers came the CHURCH OF ENGLAND. A diocese covering work in the Leewards was formed in 1842. That diocese is now part of the CHURCH IN THE PROVINCE OF THE WEST INDIES, whose archbishop resides in Nassau, in the Bahamas. In the middle of the eighteenth century, both the Moravians (1756) and the Methodists (1760) initiated work on Antigua and continue to enjoy a sizable following. The Methodist congregations are part of the METHODIST CHURCH IN THE CARIBBEAN

Status of religions in Antigua & Barbuda, 2000-2050

Followers	2000			2025	2050
	total	%	rate
Christians	63,400	93.9	0.53	69,500	71,000
Anglicans	22,600	33.5	0.09	22,800	22,000
Protestants	21,000	31.1	-0.09	22,400	23,000
Roman Catholics	7,800	11.6	1.09	11,800	16,000
Spiritists	2,200	3.3	1.06	3,300	4,800
Nonreligious	940	1.4	1.61	300	550
Baha'is	630	0.9	2.32	1,400	2,000
Muslims	270	0.4	-0.90	500	700
Hindus	50	0.1	0.77	100	170
Total population	67,600	100.0	0.57	75,100	79,200

AND THE AMERICAS, headquartered on Antigua in Saint John's, and the Moravians are part of the East Indies Province, also headquartered on the island at Cashew Hill.

Through the twentieth century a variety of churches have initiated work among the 80,000 residents of Antigua, including the ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH (now the second largest group on the island), the CHRISTIAN BRETHERN, the CHURCH OF GOD OF PROPHECY, the CHURCH OF GOD (ANDERSON, INDIANA), THE SALVATION ARMY, and the WESLEYAN CHURCH. Both the SEVENTH-DAY ADVENTIST CHURCH and the JEHOVAH'S WITNESSES also have a following. The Anglicans, Methodists, Moravians, and Salvation Army are affiliated together in the Antigua Christian Council, which is in turn associated with the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES.

Although most Antiguan are Christians, there is an outpost of the AHMADIYYA MOVEMENT IN ISLAM, which has opened a mosque, and several spiritual assemblies of the BAHAI FAITH. In the 1960s, many Africans were attracted to the RASTAFARIANS, a movement with roots in Black Judaism, calling for the liberation of black people.

Sources:

Barrett, David. The Encyclopedia of World Christianity. 2d edition. New York: Oxford University Press, 2001.

Bissio, Roberto Remo, et al. Third World Guide 93/94.

Montevideo, Uruguay: Instituto del Tercer Mundo, 1992.

Apostles of Infinite Love

The Apostles of Infinite Love constitute a Catholic traditionalist group that sustains Quebec messianism, according to which Providence has saved French Canadians from Protestantism, assimilation into Anglo-Saxon culture, and the anticlericalism prevailing in old France. It promises the latter-day triumph during the last days of this system of the Roman Catholic Church in Quebec, which will resurrect Catholicism at large through the pontificate of Pope Gregory XVII.

The Apostles were originally called together by Father John of the Trinity, born Gaston Tremblay in 1928 at Rimouski. He founded a community authorized by Pius XII in 1953. It settled in Saint-Jovite in 1958 as the motherhouse of the Order of the Mother of God, to fulfill the demands of the Blessed Virgin Mary, in her apparition at La Salette (France) in 1846. John then met Michel Collin (1905–1974) from Lorraine, who had assumed the papal role over his small Renovated Church of Christ as Pope Clement XV. Clement recognized Father John as his successor and ordained him priest and bishop in 1962, as well as Superior General of his order, the Apostles of Infinite Love. In 1968, following Clement's death, John took over the apostolic succession of Saint Peter under the name Gregory XVII and was crowned in 1971. His encyclical Peter Speaks to the World (1975) enjoins Christians to unite. He later exposed the apostasy of Pope Paul VI and of the Vatican. Strangely enough, Rome has not formally excommunicated him.

The expanding and self-supporting order antagonized the official ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH and the surrounding community. From 1966 until 2001, when charges were dropped for lack of evidence, various affairs (mainly about the treatment of resident children) plagued the Apostles. They have communities throughout North America, but the number of monks, nuns, and lay residents has sharply fallen to only about three hundred followers altogether.

Expounded in numerous books, Gregory's doctrine upholds the teaching of the pre-Vatican church, with notable exceptions: ordination of women and married Apostles and celebration of mass in French and in English, not in Latin. Based on prayer, work, and discipline, religious rules obey the thirty-three points dictated by the Virgin at La Salette.

Brothers and sisters live in separate quarters. Newcomers share their wealth and belongings.

Gregory bases his beliefs on the Bible, past prophecies (mostly those associated with the appearances of the Virgin at La Salette and Fatima, along with the prophecies of Nostradamus), and numerology as the justification of his election and his millenarianism. The earth is being purged of evil bred by the corrupt Roman clergy and modernism. The church will be born-again in glory into a Catholic millennium presided over by Grand Pontiff Gregory XVII. Apostates will then reappear, before a second castigation definitely cleanses the earth to bring about the end of the world and the resurrection of the true church in Quebec, as was announced by the Virgin Mary in various visions. Gregory also claims Nostradamus predicted the link between his election as pope in 1967 and the rise of the independence-seeking Parti québécois, two signs of divinely protected resistance to assimilation, preparing the gathering of the Christian forces for the final conquest. In this apocalyptic script the gathering of the Jews in the latter days is replaced by the gathering of the French of the motherland and the French diaspora in other lands.

Gregory's prophecies recall the social and political mission of the Church of French Canada before its decline in the twentieth century. The clergy sublimated the disaster of the English conquest by representing it as desired by God to protect the community from the French revolutions of the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries. For Gregory, the fight is within Catholicism as well as against Protestantism.

Far from being relegated to a sectarian status in today's Québec, the Apostles should be regarded as actively participating with about half its population in the province's quest for political and cultural sovereignty. The Apostles' ambition goes even further than this, since not only do they envision their Saint Jovite Vatican as the keeper of the traditional values of their province/nation, but also as the savior of the Church Universal and of the world.

Address:

The Apostles of Infinite Love
Monastery of the Apostles
P.O. Box 308
St. Jovite, Quebec J0T 2H0
Canada
<http://magnificat.qc.ca/>

Bernadette Rigal-Cellard

Sources:

Barette, Jean-Marie. La Prophétie des Apôtres des Derniers Temps.

St. Jovite: Éditions Magnificat, 1988. English edition: The Prophecy of the Apostles of the Latter Times.

Catéchisme de la doctrine chrétienne catholique, enseignée par

Jésus-Christ et les Apôtres. St. Jovite: Éditions Magnificat, 1996.

- Côté, Jean. Père Jean de la Trinité, Prophète parmi les hommes. Montreal: Édition Priorité, 1985. Reprint, St. Jovite: Éditions Magnificat, 1991. English edition: Prophet without Permit: Father John of the Trinity.
- Cuneo, Michael W. The Smoke of Satan: Conservative and Traditionalist Dissent in Contemporary American Catholicism. New York: Oxford University Press, 1997.
- Rigal-Cellard, Bernadette. "Le futur pape est québécois: Grégoire VIII." In Religions et politiques de l'extrême au Canada, edited by Bernadette Rigal-Cellard. Bordeaux: MSHA, 2002.
- Vaillancourt, Jean-Guy, and Martin Geoffroy. "La droite catholique au Québec: essai de typologie." Studies in Religion/Sciences religieuses. 25, 1 (1996): 21–33.

Apostolic Assembly of Faith in Jesus Christ [Asamblea Apostólica de la Fe en Cristo Jesús]

This Hispanic denomination traces its origin to the early days of the Pentecostal revival that broke out in Los Angeles, California, in 1906, but it was not formally organized until 1925 in San Bernardino, California. Its present name was adopted at its legal incorporation in the State of California in 1930. For lack of a denominational structure prior to 1930, the early Hispanic leaders of Oneness ("Jesus Only") Pentecostal churches obtained their ministerial credentials from the PENTECOSTAL ASSEMBLIES OF THE WORLD (PAW). The Apostolic Assembly, early in its development, adopted an episcopal structure of church government.

Among those who attended the famous Azusa Street Apostolic Faith Mission (1906–1913) in Los Angeles were several Mexican believers. Luis López was baptized there in 1909, and before long the mission had produced its first Mexican preacher, Juan Navarro. Evidently, both López and Navarro were Protestants prior to their arrival in Los Angeles; but, upon hearing the Pentecostal message, they were convinced of its truth and received the baptism in the Holy Spirit, as evidenced by speaking in tongues and other signs and wonders. They also accepted the doctrine that they should be rebaptized in the name of Jesus Christ alone, rather than in the name of the whole Trinity, and that "this is the true baptism that saves." This baptismal practice dates from about 1909, which is several years prior to the controversy that erupted over the "Jesus Only" versus Trinitarian baptismal formula, a controversy that sharply divided Pentecostals in 1913.

In 1912, soon after twenty-two-year-old Francisco F. Llorente arrived in San Diego from his home in Acapulco, Mexico, he was converted to Pentecostalism by a group of Anglo-Americans who were followers of the Apostolic Faith (or "Jesus Only" Pentecostals). In 1914, Llorente converted and baptized Marcial De La Cruz, and the pair traveled throughout southern California during 1914–1915, establishing groups of Spanish-speaking believers. These early Mexican Pentecostal leaders differed from other Pentecostal groups in teaching that the churches should not have women preachers, that women should have their heads covered during public worship services, and that water baptism should be administered only in the "name of Jesus" (as in Acts 2:38 and 1 Timothy 2:12).

Beginning in 1916, Navarro, Llorente, and De La Cruz received their ministerial credentials from the PAW, and Llorente was named the PAW's Mexican representative. That event marks the organizational beginning of the Apostolic Assembly as an emergent denomination, with Llorente as its acting bishop (1916–1925).

In 1917, Antonio Nava was converted, baptized in the Holy Spirit, and received a divine call to the ministry. He launched a career in evangelism and church planting that led to his being named the second presiding bishop (1929–1950) of the Apostolic Assembly, following the death of Llorente in 1928.

Between 1916 and 1919, the Spanish-speaking work spread from San Francisco to the Mexican border. Llorente dedicated most of his efforts to ministry between Los Angeles and San Francisco. Although the work was loosely related to the PAW, the PAW leadership exercised no control or supervision of the Spanish-speaking work in California at the time the PAW was formally incorporated in 1919.

In December 1925, the leaders of the Hispanic Apostolic churches (some twenty-three congregations) in the American Southwest and Baja California met together in San Bernardino, California, for their first general assembly as an organization. Those in attendance chose the Church of the Apostolic Pentecostal Faith as the official name of their movement and elected Francisco Llorente as presiding bishop (1925–1928). However, when the new denomination became officially incorporated in California in 1930, its name became the Apostolic Assembly of Faith in Jesus Christ, and it formally severed its ties to the PAW. The work in Baja California, Mexico, remained under the supervision of the Apostolic Assembly in California until transferred to the supervision of its sister denomination in Mexico, the APOSTOLIC CHURCH OF FAITH IN JESUS CHRIST, in 1933. The latter was formally organized in Torreón, Coahuila, Mexico, in 1932, although its first church had been formed in 1914 in Villa Aldama, Chihuahua. Also, the delegates adopted an organizational structure similar to METHODISM, with an executive board of ministers. The original officers included the president (pastor general or presiding bishop), executive elder (Anciano Ejecutivo), secretary, and assistant secretary.

The young Hispanic Apostolic Faith movement suffered from the migratory nature of the Mexican-American population, mainly composed of agricultural workers who followed the seasonal planting and harvesting of crops in the Southwestern states; the lack of literacy and basic education among the Spanish-speaking people; the lack of funds for pastoral salaries and for purchasing land and constructing church buildings; the large-scale movement of migrant farm workers back to Mexico during the Great Depression of the 1930s; and the general lack of experience in organizational development and management.

Also, two divisions affected the new denomination during the 1920s and 1930s. In 1926, a small group of pastors, led by José L. Martínez of San Bernardino, revolted against the leadership of Llorente and demanded “a doctrinal purification, the purging of the ministry, and a new name for the movement.” The requirement concerning tithing was also a major issue in the financial structure of the denomination. The unfortunate result of this conflict was the withdrawal of Martínez and six other pastors, who formed the Apostolic Christian Assembly of the Name of Jesus Christ in 1927. During the late 1930s, a small group of churches in New Mexico, led by Pedro Banderas, left the Apostolic Assembly over disagreements on tithing and joined the Pentecostal Assemblies of Jesus Christ, which was created in 1932 by a merger of the Apostolic Church of Jesus Christ and the PENTECOSTAL ASSEMBLIES OF THE WORLD. During the period 1940–1945, the Apostolic Assembly adopted a pacifist position regarding the bearing of firearms during World War II and taught that if called upon to serve in the armed forces the duty of their members was to obey the draft but to declare themselves as “conscientious objectors” and only serve in a noncombatant role, such as in the medical corps.

The Apostolic Assembly grew slowly during the 1930s and early 1940s, but began a period of expansion following World War II. By 1963, it reported 60 affiliated congregations, and the number more than doubled over the next three years to 152 congregations. Also, in 1946, the Apostolic Assembly agreed to a joint venture with the UNITED PENTECOSTAL CHURCH INTERNATIONAL and the Apostolic Church of Mexico to evangelize Central America, initially in Guatemala, El Salvador, and Nicaragua. In the 1960s, new Apostolic Assembly churches were established in Washington, Oregon, Iowa, Pennsylvania, and Florida, and missionary efforts were undertaken in Costa Rica, Honduras, and Italy in 1964–1965. Along the way, in 1949, the Apostolic Bible Training School was established in Hayward, California.

During the 1950s, the denomination divided the work into various districts, each supervised by a bishop to be elected by the majority of the ministers of his district and subject to the approval of the Qualifying Commission, composed of three members of the national board of directors. The ministers of the local congregations are appointed and subject to removal by the district bishop; the local congregations are consulted regarding the matter, but the bishop makes the final decision. Sometimes the district bishop allows the local church to call its own pastor, but pastoral changes are normally made at the district conventions or at regional pastors’s meetings. All church buildings and properties are held in the name of the corporation. The principle of self-support is strongly adhered to, and tithing is considered the duty and obligation of every member. In addition, no local church is exempt from sending a tenth of its tithes and offerings to the general treasurer of the Apostolic Assembly. The tithes of the pastors and elders of each district must be sent monthly to the district treasurer for the support of the district bishop and the administration of the district.

In 1993, the Apostolic Assembly reported 451 organized churches nationally, with about 40,600 members, which made it the third-largest Hispanic denomination in the United States, after the Assemblies of God and the Southern Baptist Convention in terms of Hispanic churches and membership.

Address:

Apostolic Assembly of Faith in Jesus Christ
5251 E. Beverly Blvd.
Los Angeles, CA 90022

Clifton L. Holland

Sources:

- Burgess, Stanley M., and Gary B. McGee, eds. Dictionary of Pentecostal and Charismatic Movements. Grand Rapids, MI: Regency Reference Library/Zondervan Publishing House, 1988.
- Gaxiola, Manuel J. La Serpiente y la Paloma: Historia, Teología y Análisis de la Iglesia Apostólica de la Fe en Cristo Jesús de México (1914–1994). 2d ed. Nacaulpan, Mexico: Libros Pyros, 1994.
- Holland, Clifton L. The Religious Dimension in Hispanic Los Angeles: A Protestant Case Study. South Pasadena, CA: William Carey Press, 1974.
- . “An Update on the National Study of Hispanic Protestant Church Growth in the USA.” Unpublished research report, 1993. Pasadena, CA: IDEA-PROLADES.
- Ortega, José A., ed. Historia de la Asamblea Apostólica de la Fe en Cristo Jesús, 1916–1966. Mentone, CA: Editorial Committee of the Asamblea Apostólica, 1966.

Apostolic Catholic Assyrian Church of the East

Through the second century, the Christian movement spread from Jerusalem and Antioch eastward to Edessa (in eastern Syria) and on to Nisibis and Seludia-Ctesiphon (in present-day Iraq), then a part of the Persian Sassanid Empire. The Sassanid rulers were devoted Zoroastrians, though it was a minority perspective within the empire as a whole, which may account for their allowing Christianity a relative degree of tolerance, at least through the initial decades of their reign. However, during the last decades of the third century persecutions were launched. These coincided with the consecration of the first bishop for the Persian church in Seludia-Ctesiphon in 285. The church, however, appears to have grown even before it had a strong central authority and was noted for the number of Christian who were devoted ascetics.

Apostolic Church

Real persecutions began during the lengthy reign of Shapur II (309–379) after he concluded that Christians represented a potentially disloyal community, whose real allegiance might turn out to lie with Constantine and the Roman Empire that constantly threatened his western border. The massive, and at times systematic, suppression of the church began in 344 and continued through the end of the century. The church was able to reorganize and rebuild in the fifth century, following the issuance of an edict of toleration by Shah Yazdegerd I around 409. At a synod in 410, the bishops established an independent Church of the East under a catholicos (patriarch) who resided at Seludia-Ctesiphon. The church accepted the orthodox confession adopted by the Council of Nicaea (325), but as the century proceeded, it claimed the status of a patriarchate, equal to Constantinople, Jerusalem, and Antioch.

In the fifth century, the Church of the East was swept into the next stage of the Christological controversy, in which the attempt was made to more precisely define the human and divine natures of Christ. The issue was how to defend the complete humanity of Christ without underplaying his divinity, and vice versa. Into this theological morass stepped Nestorius, consecrated as patriarch of Constantinople in 428. In attempting to moderate between the two parties, he attacked a popular phrase describing the Virgin Mary as the “Mother of God.” Cyril, the patriarch of Alexandria, accused him of heresy, for denying the deity of Christ. The issue came before the Ecumenical Council at Ephesus, which Cyril dominated. The council excommunicated Nestorius, who accepted exile. The bishops of the Church of the East questioned the legality of the council’s actions and called its manner of acting a disgrace. Although the decrees promulgated by Ephesus were somewhat balanced by the Chalcedonian Council in the next generation, by that time the Persian Church had gone its separate way and came to be identified as the Nestorian Church.

The growth and development of the Church of the East, together with its ever-shifting relationship with the Persian rulers, was abruptly altered by the conquest of Persia by the Muslim Arabs in 644 (when Seludia-Ctesiphon fell). In general, the Islamic rulers appear to have treated the Christians better than had the Zoroastrians. Christians were taxed heavily, but in return were guaranteed the protection of the Islamic state. Through the Muslim centuries, the church maintained its strength in the Kurdish areas of Turkey and northern Iraq.

In the late nineteenth century, the church was forced from its headquarters in Qudshanis (Turkey) when the Turkish army moved against Kurdistan. The patriarch returned in 1918 but was again forced to leave when under Turkish pressure. In 1940, the patriarch moved to the United States. Members of the church found refuge in Syria and Iraq.

The Church of the East, although accepted by the CHURCH OF ENGLAND and many Protestant bodies as orthodox in faith and practice, has not been accepted within the larger world of Eastern Orthodoxy, as it still has not affirmed the finding of all of the early Ecumenical Councils, including those that met after the Nestorian controversy ended. The church is a liturgical body with a full sacramental system analogous to that of Eastern Orthodoxy; it is unique in designating the Sign of the Cross, Unction, and “Holy Leaven” as additional sacraments. The idea of holy leaven refers to the belief that a portion of the bread used in the Last Supper of Jesus and the Apostles was brought to the East by the apostle Thaddeus and that the Eucharistic meals in the church are continuous with the event. A small piece of bread from a Eucharist is incorporated into the bread prepared for the next. The church is a member of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES.

The church is currently led by His Holiness Mar Dinka IV, the Catholicos Patriarch. Bishops are now found in India, Lebanon, Iraq, Syria, Australia, Canada, and the United Kingdom. The majority of church members reside in Iraq where more than fifty thousand may be found. The church claims more than half a million members worldwide. The church in Iraq experienced a schism, which led to the formation of what became known as the ANCIENT CHURCH OF THE EAST.

Address:

Apostolic Catholic Assyrian Church of the East
8909 Birch Ave.
Morton Grove, IL 60053
<http://www.cired.org/ace.html>

Sources:

- Orthodoxia*. Regensburg, Germany: Ostkirchliches Institut, issued annually.
- Roberson, Ronald G. The Eastern Christian Churches—A Brief Survey. 5th ed. Rome: Edizioni Orientalia Christiana, Pontificio Istituto Orientale, 1995.
- Van der Bent, Ans J., ed. Handbook/Member Churches/World Council of Churches. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 1985.

Apostolic Church

One of the oldest Pentecostal bodies in the United Kingdom, the Apostolic Church’s beginnings can be traced to the famous revival of 1903–1904, which emerged in Wales in a church at New Quay on Cardigan Bay. Evans Roberts (1878–1949), one of the first people converted in the revival, quickly emerged as an evangelist and the dominant voice. The revival developed some distinctive characteristics, as participants experienced the baptism of the Holy Spirit as a personal empowerment and the gifts of the Spirit (prophecy, healing, and the rest) began to appear, though there was no emphasis on speaking in tongues, as in the Pentecostal movement then beginning in the United States.

Pentecostalism was brought to England in 1907 by Anglican priest Alexander A. Boddy (1854–1930), who out of his experience of working in the Welsh revival traveled to Norway and there received the baptism of the Holy Spirit with the accompanying evidence of speaking in tongues. Pentecostalism had been brought to Norway by Thomas B. Barrett (1862–1940), who had himself been in Los Angeles at the services conducted at the Pioneer Pentecostal meetings at the Azusa Street Mission that began in 1906. As the Pentecostal experience spread across Great Britain, independent congregations were formed, and in 1908, the Apostolic Faith Church (named after the work in Los Angeles) was founded in Bournemouth. Among the members of that church were Daniel Powell Williams (1882–1947) and his brother William Jones Williams (1891–1945), both formerly associated with the Welsh revival.

In the second decade of the century, the Apostolic Faith Church (indeed the Pentecostal movement as a whole in Great Britain) experienced a controversy over the gift of prophecy, as a number of people had emerged who spoke inspired prophetic words to the believers. Some accepted the words only as words to inspire the congregation. Others looked to them for guiding and leading the church. Among those congregations that favored the use of prophecy for guidance and leadership was the Penygroes Church in Wales. This church created the office of prophet and called William J. Williams to hold it. His brother was named to the office of apostle. The issue of prophets and apostles came to a head in 1916. The leaders of the Apostolic Faith Church rejected the use of apostles and prophets as leaders, and so, in 1916, many of the congregations that favored this style of leadership withdrew from the church. They were joined by the Burning Bush Assembly in Glasgow, Scotland, in 1922, by which time the initial structure of the Apostolic Church was in place. Other congregations soon aligned themselves with the new church.

The Apostolic Church is similar to other Pentecostal bodies, with the exception of being led by an apostle and a prophet. The church does believe in tithing, which is considered obligatory. In 1922, in response to prophetic guidance, a missionary program was begun, the first missionaries being sent to Argentina. Work subsequently expanded to the United States (1923), Canada (1927), and China (1924). A parallel movement was organized in Denmark in 1924, soon followed by France and Italy, and in the 1930s, Australia and New Zealand. Decade by decade new mission fields have been opened. During the 1990s, work began in Mozambique, Botswana, Indonesia, Singapore, Angola, Chile, Tanzania, and Myanmar.

During the twentieth century, much of the work outside the United Kingdom developed into independent national churches, now tied together in a triennial Apostolic World Conference. For information, the contact given is the Secretary, Apostolic World Conference, 216 Beales Lane, Greensborough 3088, Victoria, Australia. Autonomous Apostolic churches now exist in Australia, Cameroon, Canada, Denmark, France, Germany, Ghana, Hungary, Italy, Jamaica, New Zealand, Nigeria, Papua New Guinea, Portugal, Switzerland, the United States, and Vanuatu. The largest work is in Nigeria, where a membership of 4.5 million is reported.

Address:

Apostolic Church
P.O. Box 389, 24–27 St. Helens Rd.
Swansea, SA1 1ZH
United Kingdom

Sources:

Hollenweger, Walter J. Pentecostalism: Origins and Developments Worldwide. Peabody, UK: Hendrickson, 1997.
Worsfold, James E. A History of the Charismatic Movements in New Zealand. Wellington, NZ: Julian Literature Trust, 1974.
———. The Origins of the Apostolic Church in Great Britain. Wellington, NZ: Julian Literature Trust, 1991.

Apostolic Church of Faith in Jesus Christ [Iglesia Apostólica de la Fe en Cristo Jesús] (Mexico)

The Apostolic Church in Mexico is a sister denomination to the APOSTOLIC ASSEMBLY OF FAITH IN JESUS CHRIST in the United States of America, and both trace their origins to the early days of the Pentecostal revival in Los Angeles, California, which began in 1906. Due to a lack of denominational structures prior to the early 1930s, many of the early leaders of Oneness (“Jesus Only”) Hispanic Pentecostal churches obtained their ministerial credentials from the PENTECOSTAL ASSEMBLIES OF THE WORLD (PAW). Both the Apostolic Church and the Apostolic Assembly early in their development adopted an episcopal structure of church government.

In the period between 1900 and 1930, hundreds of thousands of people from northern Mexico traveled to the United States to escape the turmoil of the revolutionary period (1910–1917), and many who settled in Los Angeles came into contact with the early Pentecostal movement, came to believe in the non-Trinitarian form of the Pentecostal faith, and eventually carried this Oneness doctrine back to their homes in Mexico. Between 1914 and 1932, at least twenty-six Apostolic churches were founded in twelve of Mexico’s northern states by migrant evangelists, who then carried the Pentecostal message farther south to Nuevo León, Zacatecas, San Luis Potosí, Tamaulipas, and Veracruz. The first known Apostolic Faith church in Mexico was established in 1914 in Villa Aldama, Chihuahua.

Many of the early Apostolics in Mexico had close ties to the Apostolic Faith movement, which spread in California among the growing Spanish-speaking population during the period 1910–1930. Mexican Apostolic believers in Los Angeles accepted the “Jesus Only” doctrine that they should be baptized (or rebaptized) in the name of Jesus Christ alone, rather than in the name of the whole Trinity, and that “this is the true baptism that saves.” This baptismal practice dates to 1909 in Los Angeles, four years prior to the controversy that erupted over the “Jesus Only” versus Trinitarian baptismal formula, a controversy that sharply divided California Pentecostals in 1913.

By the 1930s, there were three geographical groupings of Apostolic churches in northern Mexico that were formed by migrants who propagated the Pentecostal message among their families, friends, and neighbors. (1) The first convention of the Church of the Apostolic Faith (the name adopted in 1944) was held in 1932, when eleven pastors from Coahuila, Nuevo León, and Tamaulipas met to organize a denominational body. They elected Felipe Rivas Hernández (1901–1983) as their first pastor general (bishop). (2) In 1933, Apostolic Faith pastors in the state of Sinaloa held their first convention. Since 1925, the Apostolic leaders in Sinaloa had maintained a fraternal relationship with the Apostolic Assembly in California; but in 1936, the Sinaloa Apostolics became officially affiliated with the Church of the Apostolic Faith. (3) During the 1920s, various Apostolic pastors evangelized and planted churches in the state of Baja California, which were affiliated with the Apostolic Assembly in California until 1937, when they also transferred to the supervision of the Apostolic Church under Bishop Rivas Hernández.

During 1928, Antonio Nava laid aside his responsibilities in California as pastor general of the Apostolic Assembly and visited the Apostolic churches in Mexico. Nava’s travels through eight Mexican states with Bishop Hernández strengthened the status and authority of Hernández within the congregations. Also, Rivas presented ministerial credentials in the name of the Apostolic Assembly of Faith in Jesus Christ with headquarters in Torreón, rather than the United States. In 1931, he became the official representative in north-central Mexico of the Apostolic Assembly of California, according to a document signed by Antonio Nava and Bernardo Hernández, pastor general and secretary general, respectively, of the Apostolic Assembly.

In the meantime, members of the early Apostolic movement were being drawn away by the prophetic witness of two charismatic leaders, known as Saul and Silas (whose real names were Antonio Muñoz and Francisco Flores), who appeared in northern Mexico in 1924. These bearded and unwashed prophets, with similarities to the biblical John the Baptist, preached a message of repentance and faith, which required people to denounce their old religion and material possessions and to be rebaptized in the name of Jesus. Their authority ultimately derived from special divine revelation through their own prophecies, dreams, and visions, rather than from the Bible, a relatively unknown and unread book in those days. The movement produced great dissension during the decade 1925–1935, causing some Apostolic pastors and members—including entire congregations—to leave the Apostolic Faith movement. Another internal problem in Hernández’s home church in Torreón caused much conflict among Apostolics in the 1920s, with the result that some Apostolic leaders and churches formed another movement, which later became affiliated with the Spiritual Christian Evangelical Church, with headquarters in Tampico, Tamaulipas, founded by Scotsman Joseph Stewart (1871–1926) in 1926. There appear to be few doctrinal differences between these two denominations.

The Apostolic Church grew slowly during the period 1930–1960. In 1940, it reported only 2,113 members, increasing by 1954 to 8,313; and by 1960 to 12,106. By the convention in 1934, the Apostolic churches in Mexico began to feel part of a national movement separate from the Apostolic Assembly in California, though they maintained fraternal ties. During the next decade more than a hundred new Apostolic churches were organized in Mexico.

Apparently, many of the leaders of the Apostolic movement were members of the growing middle class of small businessmen, artisans, shopkeepers, and independent campesinos (small landowners rather than landless peasants), who were somewhat independent of the large landowners and the governing class. There was a certain amount of upward social mobility among the leadership ranks of the Apostolic Church based on merit and faithfulness as unpaid church workers. Leadership training was accomplished by pastors, who selected and supervised natural leaders, who then proved their worth by serving as deacons, evangelists, and assistant pastors in existing churches and by helping to establish new congregations in nearby areas.

In the convention of 1935, Hernández was recognized (not elected) as pastor general. In 1945, the Apostolic Church in Mexico approved its first constitution, which was almost identical to the one recently adopted by the Apostolic Assembly in California (1944–1945), the two editorial committees having worked together on producing the various drafts and the final copies of the two constitutions, but with slightly different names for the two sister organizations. The constitution, which took effect in 1946, formalized and unified the organizational structure that had developed in the two countries and upgraded the requirements and obligations for different church officers. The following year, the Apostolic Theological Institute was established in Mexico City.

Significant growth began in 1948, with the Apostolic Church’s sending out of its first foreign missionary, Maclovio Gaxiola, to Nicaragua in 1948. Soon missions were opened in El Salvador (1951), and Guatemala (1952), and later, missionaries were sent to Argentina, Colombia, Venezuela, Cuba, and Spain.

In 1970, there was a new president of the Apostolic Church, Manuel de Jesús Gaxiola, who was a graduate of the School of World Mission Fuller Theological Seminary in Pasadena, California, and a representative of the newer generation of trained professionals. He brought numerous changes to the denomination's operational structure, including a new emphasis on church growth and on improved fraternal relationships with the Apostolic Assembly in Los Angeles, California, and the UNITED PENTECOSTAL CHURCH INTERNATIONAL.

Manuel Gaxiola later received a Ph.D. in theology from the University of Birmingham and served on the board of directors of the Society of Pentecostal Studies. He was president of the society and also wrote an updated version of La Serpiente y la Paloma, a history of the Apostolic Church in Mexico (1994). Gaxiola became one of the builders of fraternal relationships among Protestants in Mexico and elsewhere, and in so doing he assisted his denomination in achieving a higher level of respect and acceptance in a generally hostile religious environment.

In 1986, Abel Zamora Velázquez was elected as presiding bishop. During his term (1986–1987), the headquarters of the church were moved from Mexico City to Guadalajara, Jalisco. (The first headquarters of the Apostolic Faith movement in Mexico had been in the city of Torreón, Coahuila, from 1932 to 1958.) In 1995, the church reported 1,640 organized churches with about 41,600 members, with a projected growth of 1,810 churches and 46,400 members by 2000. Today, the Apostolic Church of Faith in Jesus Christ is one of the largest Protestant or free church (see FREE CHURCHES) denominations in Mexico.

Clifton L. Holland

Sources:

- Brierly, Peter, ed. World Churches Handbook. London: Christian Research, 1977.
- Gaxiola, Manuel J. La Serpiente y la Paloma: Historia, Teología y Análisis de la Iglesia Apostólica de la Fe en Cristo Jesús de México (1914–1994). 2d ed. Nacaulpan, Mexico: Libros Pyros, 1994.
- Holland, Clifton L. The Religious Dimension in Hispanic Los Angeles: A Protestant Case Study. South Pasadena, CA: William Carey Press, 1974.
- Ortega, José A., ed. Historia de la Asamblea Apostólica de la Fe en Cristo Jesús, 1916–1966. Mentone, CA: Editorial Committee of the Asamblea Apostólica, 1966.

Apostolic Faith

The Apostolic Faith is a relatively small denomination, most notable as the original Pentecostal church that gave birth to the international Pentecost movement. It grew out of the ministry of Charles Fox Parham (1873–1929). Parham was a minister in the Methodist Episcopal Church (now an integral part of the UNITED METHODIST CHURCH) who left the Methodists in 1898 and founded a home for divine healing in Topeka, Kansas. In 1900, he opened the Bethel Bible College. He asked his students to search the Bible while he was away over the end-of-the-year holidays, concerning the baptism of the Holy Spirit. When he returned, as New Year's Eve approached the students reported that the baptism was accompanied with a sign, speaking in tongues. Retiring to the chapel, Parham and the students began to pray for God to baptize them with the Holy Spirit, and Agnes Ozman became the first to experience the baptism and speak in tongues. Over the next years, Parham and his students began to spread the word of the baptism through the American states of Kansas, Missouri, Oklahoma, and Texas.

In 1905, Parham opened a Bible school in Texas. In spite of the racial segregation then the norm in the American South, he allowed an African American preacher, William J. Seymour, to attend the class. The next year, Seymour left for Los Angeles, California, where he became the leader of a small mission that then became the center of a three-year revival during which PENTECOSTALISM spread rapidly across the United States and around the world.

Charles Fox Parham (Mrs. Charles F. Parham. The Life of Charles F. Parham, Founder of the Apostolic Faith Movement. Joplin, MO: Hunter Printing Company, 1930.)

Apostolic Faith Mission

Parham became alienated from the revival, and the revival soon left him behind. He continued to preach in the midwestern and eastern United States, though his work was tainted when accusations of immoral behavior were brought against him. In fact, Parham was arrested for sodomy, though no charges appear to have been filed, and it seems that Parham was framed by Wilbur Voliva, the head of the non-Pentecostal Christian Catholic Church. Some colleagues who disliked Parham seized on the opportunity to discredit him.

Those who had responded to his ministry, however, eventually founded the fellowship now known as the Apostolic Faith. In 1950, a Bible school was opened in Baxter Springs, Kansas, and the Apostolic Faith still has its headquarters in Baxter Springs. Its work is confined to the United States. There are an estimated 10,000 adherents.

Address:

Apostolic Faith
1009 Lincoln Ave.
Baxter Springs, KS 66713

Sources:

- Goff, James R., Jr. Fields White unto Harvest: Charles F. Parham and the Missionary Origins of Pentecostalism. Fayetteville: University of Arkansas Press, 1988.
- Parham, Charles F. A Voice of One Crying in the Wilderness. Baxter Springs, KS: Apostolic Faith Bible College, 1910.
- Parham, Sarah E. The Life of Charles Fox Parham. Joplin, MO: Hunter Printing Company, 1930.

Apostolic Faith Mission (Portland, Oregon)

The Apostolic Faith Mission headquartered in Portland, Oregon, began with the attraction of Florence L. Crawford (1872–1936) to the Pentecostal revival at the Apostolic Faith Mission on Azusa Street in Los Angeles, California, that began in 1906. This original mission was headed by William J. Seymour (1870–1922), who brought the Pentecostal experience (which included speaking in tongues) from Houston, where he had attended a Bible school headed by Charles Fox Parham (1873–1929). Once the revival began, it continued daily for three years. Crawford testified to a healing of her eyes during these meetings and soon became an assistant to Seymour.

The revival attracted people to California from across North America and around the world. Crawford worked on the Apostolic Faith; the tabloid periodical started to make people aware of what was happening as the message spread. She also began to travel along the West coast as an itinerant home missionary. As early as December 1906, she made a trip to Portland.

In 1908, having been invited to return to Portland, Crawford left the Los Angeles Mission and relocated permanently to Oregon. With the blessing of Seymour, she brought the Apostolic Faith with her, the work in Portland being seen as an outpost of the original mission. However, over the next few years, the Portland work became independent of Seymour. It continued the missionary thrust that had become integral to the Pentecostal movement and over the next generation became a global organization. In 1922, the headquarters of the church was established in a new building in downtown Portland, which became known for the large neon sign, “Jesus the Light of the World.”

The Apostolic Faith is a Trinitarian Holiness Pentecostal church that stresses the need of a born-again experience of faith, followed by sanctification and the baptism in the Holy Spirit.

Affiliated churches are found in thirty-two different countries. The majority of its 60,000 members are now outside North America. The largest membership is in Nigeria (20,000 members). There are 4,000 members in United States.

Address:

Apostolic Faith Mission
6615 SE 52nd Ave.
Portland, OR 97206
<http://www.apostolicfaith.org>

Sources:

- A Historical Account of the Apostolic Faith*. Portland, OR: Apostolic Faith Publishing House, 1965.
- The Light of Life Brought Triumph*. Portland, OR: Apostolic Faith Publishing House, 1955.
- Saved to Serve*. Portland, OR: Apostolic Faith Publishing House, 1967.

Apostolic Faith Mission of South Africa

The Apostolic Faith Mission (AFM) of South Africa is a classical Pentecostal denomination established in 1908 in Johannesburg, during the missionary visit of Americans John G. Lake and Thomas Hezmalhalch, who had arrived from the Azusa Street Revival in Los Angeles. The first South African president (1913–1931) was P. L. Le Roux, a graduate of Andrew Murray’s Bible School in Wellington, Cape Province. Le Roux had been a missionary among the Zulus for John Alexander Dowie’s Zionist movement and brought many Zionist churches with him into the AFM. The AFM still practices baptism by threefold immersion, a legacy of Zionism.

In 1919, a large group of Africans left the church as a result of racial disputes. This group became the originators of the ZION CHRISTIAN CHURCH, the largest African Initiated Church in South Africa. In 1928, a small group left the church as a result of a liturgical dispute, taking the name Latter Rain Church. They were led by a “prophetess,” Mrs. Fraser. In 1958, the Pentecostal Protestant Church left the AFM for similar reasons.

The AFM is strongly committed to missionary endeavors, and large “daughter churches” have arisen among the African, Asian, and Coloured (mixed race) population. Most Asian converts are from Hinduism, most African converts are from tribal religions. In 1996, the previously separated race groups in the South African AFM united formally, bringing together the daughter churches and the White section in a single denominational structure.

As a result of missionary activity from South Africa, autonomous AFM churches exist in most southern and east African countries, as well as in parts of Latin America and South Asia—currently more than 30 countries. They relate under a loose fellowship called AFM International. Major emphases in all areas are evangelisation, divine healing, and “separation from the world.” Membership currently exceeds 1 million in South Africa, while figures for the rest of Africa are uncertain. The AFM in Africa is a truly indigenous African church, as most of its membership has deep roots in Africa, including the White South Africans, of whom the vast majority are Afrikaners (descendants of Dutch settlers in the seventeenth century). However, doctrinally and liturgically the church is clearly in the mainstream of Pentecostalism.

The church is organized in each nation on a democratic presbyterian system, with a “call” system operating for pastors (that is, congregations call their pastors rather than accepting a pastor sent by the presbytery). Theological training is at degree level in South Africa and Zimbabwe, but very basic in most other countries.

Address:

Apostolic Faith Mission of South Africa
Maranatha Park
Lyndhurst
Johannesburg
South Africa

Mathew Clark

Sources:

- Anderson, Allan H. Bazalwane: African Pentecostals in South Africa. Pretoria: Unisa, 1992.
- . Tumelo: The Faith of African Pentecostals in South Africa. Pretoria: Unisa, 1993.
- Burger, I. vd M. Geloofsgeskiedenis van die Apostoliese Geloof Sending van Suid Afrika 1908–1958. Johannesburg: Evangelie Uitgewers, 1990.
- De Wet, C. R. The Apostolic Faith Mission in Africa: 1908–1980. A Case Study in Church Growth in a Segregated Society. Ph.D. dissertation, University of Cape Town, 1989.
- LaPoorta, J. J. Unity or Division? The Unity Struggles of the Black Churches within the Apostolic Faith Mission of South Africa. Kuils River: Japie LaPoorta, 1996.

Apostolic Sabbath Church of God

At the same time that Johane Marange established his AFRICAN APOSTOLIC CHURCH OF JOHANE MARANGE, another enigmatic Shona prophet, Johane (John) Masowe (meaning wilderness or open place), formerly known by the name Shoniwa (c. 1915–1973), started the Apostolic Sabbath Church of God, known in Shona as Vahosanna, after the frequent calling out of the word by members in church gatherings. He had been a preacher in the APOSTOLIC FAITH MISSION, a South African Pentecostal church, in 1930, but separated himself from this church soon afterwards. He fell sick and dreamt that he had died and risen again as the “Messenger of God,” a John the Baptist figure like Marange. He was convinced that he had been sent from heaven to preach to African people. He began to preach that people must leave witchcraft and adultery, destroy all religious books (including the Bible, an injunction that was later lifted), and shun all inventions of the whites. His followers should not carry identification documents, plough their lands, or work for the whites. The biblical prophets would descend from heaven and drive the whites out of the country. He was restricted to his home district and imprisoned for failing to obey the restriction order.

His followers organized themselves into a closed religious community that moved from Zimbabwe in the early 1940s to South Africa, eventually settling in Port Elizabeth in 1947. There they lived in a deprived community of about a thousand in the slum area of Korsten. The community engaged in various crafts and industries, including basket making, and they were known as the Korsten Basket Makers. When their company went into liquidation, they began to use the name African Gospel Church, the name of an African Pentecostal church in South Africa. They were declared illegal residents in South Africa under the draconian laws regarding residence, and 1,880 people were repatriated in 1962 to Zimbabwe. Masowe told his people that they were Jews who must return to Israel, and in 1963, some of the Vahosanna began a migration from Zimbabwe, reaching Lusaka in Zambia. Masowe continued to travel and make converts throughout Zambia and soon afterwards in Kenya, Tanzania, Mozambique, and the Congo. Only Masowe himself could perform baptisms, but his illness in 1964 left him a recluse in Tanzania for the rest of his life.

In 1972, the name of the church was again changed to Gospel of God Church. Increasing importance was given to a group of nuns, the “wives” of Masowe, also called the Sisters, who would be part of the headquarters, remain celibate, function as ritual singers, and move with the people of God as a guarantee of God’s presence and power among them. They constituted the “ark of the covenant” and the “new Jerusalem.” By 1975, there were over a hundred Sisters; most were in Lusaka, but some moved to Nairobi.

In 1973, Masowe died in Zambia after a long illness, during which he was still planning the next stage of the journey to Kenya, and he was buried at his home in Zimbabwe. Many of the Masowe Apostles and the Sisters have been in Nairobi since 1972. There were claims of half a million Masowe Apostles in 1975, scattered from South Africa to Kenya.

Allan H. Anderson

Sources:

- Dillon-Malone, Clive M. The Korsten Basketmakers: A Study of the Masowe Apostles, an Indigenous African Religious Movement. Manchester, UK: Manchester University Press, 1978.
- Kileff, Clive, and Margaret Kileff. "The Masowe Vapostori of Seki: Utopianism and Tradition in an African Church." In The New Religions of Africa, edited by Benetta Jules-Rosette. Norwood, NJ: Ablex, 1979.

Apostolic World Christian Fellowship

Apostolic World Christian Fellowship is a global association that provides fellowship for non-Trinitarian (Apostolic or "Jesus Only") churches within the larger world of PENTECOSTALISM. The idea of the fellowship was suggested by Bishop W. G. Rowe in 1970 as a remedy for what he saw as strife and disunity among Apostolic Pentecostal denominations. He served as the organization's first chairman and retired in 1991 after two decades of service. He was succeeded by Bishop Samuel L. Smith.

The fellowship has developed a fourfold program that emphasizes unity in spite of personal and organizational differences, the sharing of successful outreach programs to assist churches in their evangelistic work, activating the laity, and world missions. The fellowship has moved to heal the racial divisions that began to divide Apostolics in the 1920s.

In 2001, more than 135 denominations and organizations were affiliated with the fellowship, and worship and outreach efforts are supported in most of the world's countries. Member churches include the CHURCH OF THE LORD JESUS CHRIST OF THE APOSTOLIC FAITH, the PENTECOSTAL ASSEMBLIES OF THE WORLD, the TRUE JESUS CHURCH, and the UNITED PENTECOSTAL CHURCH INTERNATIONAL.

Address:

AWCF Headquarters
11 West Iowa St.
Evansville, IN 47711
<http://www.awcf.org>

Source:

Apostolic World Christian Fellowship. Posted at <http://www.awcf.org/>. Accessed January 11, 2002.

Arcane School

The Arcane School is a Theosophical organization that grew out of the life and experiences of Alice B. Bailey (1880–1949). As a teenager in England, Bailey had been visited by a turbaned stranger, who told her that an important future had been mapped out for her future life. She eventually moved to California and became associated with the THEOSOPHICAL SOCIETY there. She concluded that the stranger who had visited her was Koot Hoomi, one of the Theosophical Masters with whom the society's founder had claimed to be in contact. She eventually became the editor of the society's magazine, The Messenger. Her husband, Foster Bailey, was the society's national secretary.

In 1918, Bailey made contact with another Theosophical Master known as Djwhal Khul (D.K.), or the Tibetan. She began to channel material from him that turned into a series of books, the first entitled Initiation: Human and Solar. Her channeling eventually led her to separate from the society and establish the Arcane School in 1923. The society's leaders had been unhappy with her independent contact with the Masters.

The content of the teachings brought forward by the Tibetan were very much in agreement with Theosophy, but also included a vision of a coming New Age and a program by which people could prepare for it. The effort of people in service to the world combined with the power of the Masters, the Spiritual Hierarchy, would bring the reappearance of the Christ. The Arcane School has established meditation groups to channel the energy of the hierarchy to the world. Since the powers from the hierarchy are particularly available at different times of the month and of the year, students of the school gather at the time of the full moon each month and for three annual festivals—Easter (the celebration of the Resurrection of Christ), Wesak (Buddha's birthday), and Goodwill (in June). A program of service has found expression in the New Group of World Servers.

The groups associated with Alice Bailey have been particularly identified with what is termed "The Great Invocation," a prayer that describes the movement of power from the hierarchy to the world as Bailey prescribed. It is frequently repeated in Baileyite gatherings and in various other groups in the Theosophical tradition.

From the point of Light within the Mind of God
Let light stream forth into the minds of men.
Let Light descend on Earth.

From the point of Love within the Heart of God
Let love stream forth into the hearts of men.
May Christ return to Earth.

From the centre where the Will of God is known
Let purpose guide the little wills of men—
The purpose that the Masters know and serve.
From the centre which we call the race of men
Let the Plan of Love and Light work out
And may it seal the door where evil dwells.
Let Light and Love and Power restore the Plan on Earth.

The Arcane School (and the associated Lucis Trust publishing concern) has three major international offices, in London; Geneva, Switzerland; and New York. All three addresses are given below.

In the years after Alice Bailey's death, several of the students in the school left and founded separate parallel organizations, among the more important being Meditation Groups, Inc. (Box 566, Ojai, CA 93023) and the School for Esoteric Studies (58 Oak Terrace, Arden, NC 28708–2820). In the 1980s, one former student of the school, Benjamin Crème, began to announce the imminent appearance of the Christ (identified with the Buddhist Maitreya), from whom he has received a number of messages. He went on to found Share International (Box 41877, 1009 DB Amsterdam, Netherlands) to raise awareness of Maitreya's imminent manifestation and to provide a vehicle of service for those who respond to that message. Share has affiliated groups across North America and Europe as well as Japan, Taiwan, the Philippines, Australia, and New Zealand.

Bailey's teachings had a significant influence on the millennial beliefs that underlay the NEW AGE MOVEMENT of the 1980s. That movement had looked for the coming of a new era of peace and wisdom, to be brought about by people channeling the energies of the cosmos into the mundane contemporary world.

Addresses:

Arcane School
Ste. 54, 3 Whitehall Ct.
London SW1A 2EF
United Kingdom

1 rue de Varembe (3e)
C. P. 31
1211 Geneva 20
Switzerland

120 Wall St., 24th Floor
New York, NY 10005
<http://www.lucistrust.org>

Sources:

- Bailey, Alice. The Reappearance of the Christ. New York: Lucis Publishing Company, 1948.
———. The Unfinished Autobiography. New York: Lucis Publishing Company, 1951.
Sinclair, John R. The Alice Bailey Inheritance. Wellingsborough, Northamptonshire: Turnstone Press, 1984.
Thirty Years' Works. New York: Lucis Publishing Company, n.d.

Arès Pilgrims

The Arès movement appeared in 1974, following revelations received by a French prophet, Michel Potay (b. 1929). Originally trained as an engineer, then from 1964 a professional occultist, Potay—without giving up his activities in healing and counseling—subsequently converted to Orthodoxy and was ordained a deacon in 1969 in the Église Catholique Orthodoxe de France, an independent Western-rite Orthodox jurisdiction. From 1971, he claimed to be associated with the Living Church, a pro-Communist Russian Orthodox schism launched in the 1920s. In January 1974, Potay and his family settled in Arès, not far from Bordeaux. It was there that Jesus allegedly appeared to him and dictated what became the Gospel Delivered in Arès, first published in 1974.

In 1977, according to Potay, God himself spoke to him from a stick of light. This resulted in a second sacred text, the Book. The two texts form together the Revelation of Arès.

Arès Pilgrims see the new revelation as a development within the Abrahamic tradition: They accept the Bible (with the exception of some books) and the Qur'an, but do not see them as enjoying the same level of authority as the Revelation of Arès. (The Qur'an is held in high esteem, since it is considered as containing fewer interpolations than the Bible.) The beliefs of the Arès Pilgrims are monotheistic, but not Trinitarian (Jesus is not considered as God). They aspire to change the world in order to realize the Eden that God originally planned for mankind. If a "remnant" decides to adopt a different behavior, this change can take place; a "small remnant" (i.e., the Arès Pilgrims) is called to play a key role in that change, which is not expected in the immediate future, but should take several generations before becoming a reality. It is not uncommon for Arès Pilgrims to engage in grassroots activities with other people involved in various causes in order to contribute to these changes.

The Arès Pilgrims are scattered mainly in France and other French-speaking countries; in addition to a core group of a few hundred people, it can be estimated that three to four thousand persons identify more or less with the message. The active ones gather in local groups for missionary activities and various projects, but they have few ritual practices outside of Arès, except for the recitation of the prayer called "Father of the Universe" (a revised version of the Lord's Prayer) four times a day. The pilgrimage to Arès, to the spot where God spoke to Potay, is currently open during three periods of two weeks every summer and offers a major opportunity for gathering. When they enter the House of the Saint's Word, the pilgrims are clothed in white tunics, and they prostrate to the ground, before chanting individually passages from the Bible, the Qur'an, or the Revelation of Arès, passages that each one chooses. The yearly pilgrimage also offers Potay the opportunity to address the gathered groups of pilgrims.

Address:

Arès Pilgrims
c/o Frère Michel Potay
Maison de la Révélation
B.P. 16
33740 Arès
France
<http://perso.wanadoo.fr/michelpotay/welcome.html>

Jean-François Mayer

Sources:

Mayer, Jean-François. Michel Potay et la Révélation d'Arès. Fribourg, Switzerland: Les Trois Nornes, 1990.
 ———. "La 'Révélation d'Arès': naissance d'un pèlerinage dans la France contemporaine." Social Compass 48, 1 (2001): 63–75.
The Revelation of Arès (French-English bilingual edition). Arès: Maison de la Révélation, 1995.

Argentina

Argentina is on the southeastern part of the South American continent, separated from its western neighbor, Chile, by the Andes Mountains. Both the Andean region and the Patagonian region (a barren tableland in the southern part of the country) were inhabited by large indigenous groups at the time of the Spanish colonization. The influx of Christianity has all but wiped out the indigenous religion of the native peoples of Argentina, but it survives in the more remote areas along the Andes Mountains and along the border with Bolivia and Paraguay. In the last half of the twentieth century, shamans among the Guarani people have attained a status as alternative healers, and the sophistication of Guarani religious thought has been recognized by anthropologists.

In 1502, Amerigo Vespucci commanded the first ship of Spanish sailors to arrive at the mouth of the Río de La Plata, or River Plate. The Spanish first settled Argentina in 1516, and the first Catholic missionaries arrived by 1539. Argentina gained its independence in 1816, after the commercial bourgeois ousted the Spanish viceroyalty of the River Plate. Most Argentines today are descendants of the European immigrants (mostly from Spain and Italy but also from Russia, Poland, Germany, England, Ireland, France, Portugal, Armenia, Lebanon, and Turkey) who arrived between 1870 and 1950. Among them is found the largest Jewish community in South America and the fifth largest in the world. There are about 1,050,000 indigenous peoples mainly in the north and southwest, many of whom continue traditionalist religious practices. The current total population is estimated at 37,031,802 (April 2000).

The ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH was established in Argentina with the arrival of FRANCISCANS in 1536. Their work was supplemented by the JESUITS in 1586. The Jesuits were especially active among the native people. The expulsion of the Jesuits in 1767 placed the church in a leadership crisis, which was merely deepened by the forces that created an independent Argentina in 1810. The new ruling elite was both anti-Spanish and anticlerical. Its opposition to the Catholic Church was manifested in an attempt (ultimately unsuccessful) to establish an independent Argentine Catholic Church. At the end of the nineteenth century, the country was reported to be 99 percent Catholic, and Catholicism was the state religion.

Status of religions in Argentina, 2000-2050

Followers	2000			2025	2050
	total	%	rate
Christians	34,400,000	92.9	1.24	43,311,000	50,010,000
Roman Catholics	33,750,000	91.2	1.25	41,500,000	47,000,000
Protestants	2,295,000	6.2	1.91	3,500,000	4,550,000
Independents	2,050,000	5.5	2.19	3,200,000	3,950,000
Nonreligious	865,000	2.3	3.38	1,582,000	1,943,000
Muslims	721,000	2.0	2.56	1,100,000	1,300,000
Jews	490,000	1.3	0.00	450,000	400,000
Atheists	278,000	0.8	2.37	370,000	430,000
Spiritists	86,900	0.2	2.19	100,000	120,000
Ethnoreligionists	58,500	0.2	1.58	60,000	62,000
Neoreligionists	50,500	0.1	1.38	60,000	75,000
Buddhists	18,000	0.1	2.09	30,000	47,000
Baha'is	10,200	0.0	2.47	19,000	30,000
Hindus	5,400	0.0	1.25	6,500	8,000
Confucianists	440	0.0	1.05	600	800
Chinese folk-religionists	400	0.0	1.34	600	900
other religionists	43,500	0.1	1.90	60,000	80,000
Total population	37,027,000	100.0	1.31	47,150,000	54,507,000

The Catholic Church was strengthened by a century of heavy immigration (four million from 1850 to 1950) from predominantly Catholic European countries (Poland, Ireland, Italy, and Spain). In addition, a number of Ukrainian Catholics also arrived and constitute the largest of the several Eastern Rite communities now present.

Today, freedom of worship is guaranteed for all Argentines by the constitution. The Roman Catholic Church maintains its official status, and adherence to Catholicism is a requirement for eligibility to the offices of president and vice president of the republic. In 1995, the country was about 88 percent Catholic, the Protestant population totaled only about 7 percent, and other religious groups or the nonreligious comprised about 5 percent. In 1992, the Ministry of Cults and Foreign Affairs listed 2,986 registered religious groups: Of these, 1,790 were Evangelical groups, about 400 were Catholic or Orthodox organizations (mainly religious orders and institutions), 382 were listed as "diverse spiritual cults," and 387 were of Afro-Brazilian origin.

The early presence of Protestantism (1800s) was due in large part to the immigration of English Methodists, Scottish Presbyterians, German and Scandinavian Lutherans, Italian Waldensians, Welsh Protestants, German-Russian and French-Swiss Baptists, Armenian Congregationalists, Dutch Mennonites, and Dutch Reformed, among others. Today, at least nine branches of EASTERN ORTHODOXY exist, and there is a small Anglican presence. Missionary efforts by Anglicans (from the CHURCH OF ENGLAND) and Presbyterians (from the CHURCH OF SCOTLAND) began in Argentina in 1824, ministering to English and Scottish immigrants in their own languages in Buenos Aires. The Anglican work is now incorporated into the ANGLICAN PROVINCE OF THE SOUTHERN CONE OF AMERICA. The Methodist Episcopal Board of Missions began work in Buenos Aires in 1836. In the 1850s, Anglican missionaries (later, the South American Missionary Society) began work among the Indians of the Patagonia and later of the Chaco in northern Argentina. During the late 1800s, new Protestant missionary efforts were begun among the Spanish-speaking population: CHRISTIAN BROTHERS (1882), THE SALVATION ARMY (1882), SEVENTH-DAY ADVENTIST CHURCH (1894), CHRISTIAN AND MISSIONARY ALLIANCE (1895), South American Evangelical Mission (1895), and Regions Beyond Mission (1899).

Dozens of other Protestant mission agencies arrived during the early 1900s, notably the SOUTHERN BAPTIST CONVENTION (1903), the CHRISTIAN CHURCH (DISCIPLES OF CHRIST) (1904), LUTHERAN CHURCH—MISSOURI SYNOD (1905), the MENNONITE CHURCH (1917), and the ASSEMBLIES OF GOD (1914).

In 1995, the estimated size of the Protestant non-Pentecostal denominations in Argentina was as follows:

Seventh-day Adventist Church (64,400 members), the Evangelical Baptist Convention (44,800), Christian Brethren (34,800), Evangelical Lutheran Church (Missouri Synod, 21,100), and the Anglican-Episcopal Church (11,000). All other non-Pentecostal Protestant denominations had less than 10,000 members in 1995.

Today, Pentecostals (about 70 percent) outnumber all other Protestants in Argentina, due to substantial church growth resulting from revivals in the 1950s (especially the Tommy Hicks Crusade) and the 1970s (CHARISMATIC MOVEMENT). The largest Pentecostal denominations in Argentina in 1995 were the following: National Union of the Assemblies of God (118,000 members), Vision of the Future (111,000), Swedish-Norwegian Assemblies of God (82,700), Italian Christian Assemblies (44,400), Chilean Evangelical Pentecostal Church (36,300), Foursquare Gospel churches (28,100), CHURCH OF GOD (CLEVELAND, TENNESSEE) (22,200), Christian Pentecostal Church of God (21,100), and the United Evangelical Church of Argentina (20,500). All other Pentecostal groups had less than 20,000 members in 1995.

Many of the older Protestant churches had been involved in the multinational Confederation of Evangelical Churches of the River Plate, which was replaced by the Argentina Federation of Evangelical Churches in 1958. Today, the churches associated with the larger Protestant ecumenical community are members of the Argentine Federation of Evangelicals, which is related to the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES. Many of the more conservative Evangelical groups are related to the Argentine Alliance of Evangelical Churches, which is affiliated with the WORLD EVANGELICAL ALLIANCE.

Other non-Protestant Christian groups in Argentina include the JEHOVAH'S WITNESSES (1,630 kingdom halls with about 110,000 members), the CHURCH OF JESUS CHRIST OF LATTER-DAY SAINTS (550 temples with about 88,400 members), THE FAMILY, Christian Science (CHURCH OF CHRIST, SCIENTIST), UNITY SCHOOL OF CHRISTIANITY, Light of the World Church (Guadalajara, Mexico), Voice of the Cornerstone Church (Puerto Rico), and Growing in Grace churches (Miami, Florida).

Like the Orthodox community, the Jewish community of Argentina is the largest in South America. The first Jews were Marranos, escaping from their hidden position in Spain, and Sephardic Jews still form a significant and visible portion of the community. Jews from Germany, North Africa, and the Balkans began to arrive in large numbers in the 1860s, and the first eastern European Jews arrived in 1889. Today, more than 300,000 Jews reside in Argentina, about two-thirds of whom live in Greater Buenos Aires. They have their center in the Representative Organization of Argentine Jews. Jews of Iberian origin (an estimated 60,000 to 100,000) have formed the Central Sephardic Community. Eastern European Jews representing conservative Judaism have formed the Latin American Rabbinical Seminary.

The same migrations from North Africa and the Middle East that brought Jews to Argentina also brought a minority of Muslims, who formed mosques in Buenos Aires and Mendoza and have now adopted a missionary stance vis-à-vis the Spanish-speaking population.

Some of the other religions that exist in Argentina today include BUDDHISM, Hinduism and the BAHÁ'Í FAITH. Buddhism entered the country through the immigration of Japanese, which steadily increased during the twentieth century. The following Buddhist groups are present in Argentina: Japanese Soto School (Tangen Daisetsu lineage), SOKA GAKKAI INTERNATIONAL, INTERNATIONAL ZEN ASSOCIATION (Paris, France), Buddhist Community Seita Jodo-Shinshu Honpa-Honganji, Kagyu Dak Shang Choling, Shobo An Zendo, and the Tzong Kuan Buddhist Temple. The PERFECT LIBERTY/KYODAN, founded in Japan, also exists in Argentina. Hindu groups include the BRAHMA KUMARIS (Raja Yoga), the VEDANTA SOCIETIES, KRISHNA-MURTI FOUNDATIONS, Sawan Ruhani Mission (Science of Spirituality), Vaisnava Mission, International Society for Krishna Consciousness (also known as the Hare Krishnas), ANANDA MARGA YOGA SOCIETY (The Way of Perfect Happiness), and the MASTER CHING HAI MEDITATION ASSOCIATION. The Baha'i Faith grew steadily in the last half of the twentieth century.

Native Amerindian religions (which are animist) have declined in recent years but are still practiced by the Chiriguano as well as by the Guarani- and Quechua-speaking Bolivians who work on the sugarcane plantations in northern Argentina.

Since the mid-1960s, several varieties of Afro-Brazilian religions have been present, largely among Brazilian immigrants, including the Center of African Religion (Ile Afonxa Xango e Oxum Leusa), the Xango Aganyu African Temple, CANDOMBLÉ, and UMBANDA.

Western esoteric groups are commonplace in Argentina. The Panamerican Spiritualist Confederation (influenced by Frenchman Allan Kardec) was founded in Buenos Aires in 1946 and includes affiliated members in Brazil, Colombia, Cuba, Dominican Republic, Honduras, and Mexico. Other Ancient Wisdom-Psychic-New Age groups include the Universal Gnostic movement (founded by Samuel Aun Weor in 1977 in Mexico), the UNIVERSAL GREAT BROTHERHOOD (founded in Venezuela in 1948 by Serge Raynaud de la Ferriere), the NEW ACROPOLIS CULTURAL ASSOCIATION (founded by Jorge Angel Livraga Rizzi in 1957), Siloism (founded in the 1960s by Mario Rodríguez Cobo, known as Silo), the Basilio Scientific School (founded by Blanca Aubreton in 1917), Schools of the Fourth Way (influenced by George Gurdjieff), the True Spiritist Society, the THEOSOPHICAL SOCIETY, the ANTHROPOSOPHICAL SOCIETY (followers of Rudolf Steiner), the UNIFICATION MOVEMENT (followers of Rev. Sun Myung Moon), the CHURCH OF SCIENTOLOGY, the RAEIAN MOVEMENT INTERNATIONAL (founded in France by Claude Vorilhon, known as Rael), and several flying saucer-extraterrestrial study groups.

Clifton L. Holland

Sources:

- Brierly, Peter, ed. World Churches Handbook. London: Christian Research, 1997.
- Enns, Arno W. Man, Milieu and Mission in Argentina. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans, 1971.
- Grimes, Barbara F., ed. Ethnologue: Languages of the World. 12th ed. Dallas, TX: Summer Institute of Linguistics, 1992.
- Monti, Daniel P. Presencia del protestantismo en el Río de la Plata durante el Siglo XIX. Buenos Aires: Editorial La Aurora, 1969.
- Religion-In-The-Americas (RITA) Database, Argentina documents. Posted at <http://www.prolades.com>.
- Saracco, Norberto, ed. Directorio y Censo de Iglesias Evangélicas de la Ciudad de Buenos Aires. Buenos Aires: Fundación Argentina de Educación y Acción Comunitaria, 1992.
- Villalpando, Waldo Luis, ed. Las Iglesias del Trasplante: Protestantismo de Inmigración en la Argentina. Buenos Aires: Centro de Estudios Cristianos, 1970.

Armenia

At the beginning of the twenty-first century, the Republic of Armenia occupies less than 30,000 land-locked square kilometers of the Caucasus—a tenth of the land that was known in ancient times as Greater Armenia. Like its geographical boundaries, the population (around 3.5 million in 2000) has fluctuated throughout history as a result of invasions, conquests, earthquakes, migrations, deportations, and genocide. But whatever the numbers, the Armenian people have remained remarkably homogeneous, one of the main reasons being the existence for 1,700 years of the ARMENIAN APOSTOLIC CHURCH (Armenia being the longest surviving Christian nation) and its resistance to attempts to convert either the nation or its citizens to other faiths or to induce the church to merge with other Christian sects.

Archaeological sites indicate that the Armenian highlands have been inhabited since the Lower Paleolithic period; written records of those who lived and fought in the area exist from the mid-fourteenth century B.C.E. Present-day Armenians are thought to have emerged as a unique Indo-European linguistic family around 600 B.C.E., the earliest mentions of Armenians and Armenia occurring, respectively, in 550 and 520 B.C.E. By 70 B.C.E., the Armenian king Tigranes II (c. 95–55) had united an empire stretching from the Caspian to the Mediterranean. As the result of many bloody battles, however, Armenia has found itself under the rule of the Roman, Byzantine, and Ottoman Empires and Turkey in the west, and Persia, Russia, and the Soviet Union in the east. Nonetheless, it has managed to enjoy brief periods of independence and to remain relatively autonomous, with its own distinct cultural identity.

Little is known about the religion(s) of pre-Christian Armenia, but it seems the elements and some nature gods were worshipped. There then emerged various legendary heroes who have been compared with the gods of the Hittites and Assyrians. Later, a number of Iranian and, still later, Greek divinities were appropriated into the syncretistic Armenian pantheon, with their own, specifically Armenian, names: Aramazd, the creator, had his principle shrine at Ani; Anahit, the goddess of fertility and protector of the Armenians, had one of her chief temples at Erez.

It is said that Christianity was first introduced to Armenia in the second part of the first century C.E. by two of Jesus' disciples, Thaddeus and Bartholomew (hence the church's claim to apostolic origins). As elsewhere, the early Christians were persecuted, but around 301 King Tiridates III, having been converted by Saint Gregory the Illuminator (whom he had imprisoned for several years), declared Armenia a Christian nation. Gregory was consecrated as the first catholicos (as the primates of the Armenian Apostolic Church and some other Eastern churches are called), and a cathedral was erected on the site of a pagan temple at Echmiadzin, the present site of the Catholicate of All Armenians. Paganism was officially abolished, and most of its temples and statues were destroyed; but it continued for centuries, with remnants still surviving in folklore and local customs.

The homogeneous character of the church and the people was greatly strengthened in 404, when Mesrob Mashtotz (361–440) invented a special alphabet, enabling the Bible and other Christian literature to be translated into Armenian; but the church found itself under increasing attack from the Persians, who were trying to convert the Armenians to ZOROASTRIANISM. In 451, the national hero, Vartan Mamikonian (d. 505) was defeated by an overwhelmingly superior force of Persians. The Armenians persisted in their Christianity, however, and in 485 were granted freedom of worship. Another event in 451 that was to contribute to the Status of religions in Armenia, 2000-2050

Followers	2000			2025	2050
	total	%	rate
Christians	2,956,000	84.0	2.11	3,660,000	3,726,000
Orthodox	2,752,000	78.2	1.90	3,361,000	3,322,000
Roman Catholics	160,000	4.6	4.81	210,000	229,000
Independents	28,000	0.8	7.97	50,000	80,000
Nonreligious	295,000	8.4	-7.36	146,000	185,000
Atheists	172,000	4.9	-7.10	55,000	50,000
Muslims	94,300	2.7	-4.53	80,000	25,000
Baha'is	1,300	0.0	8.29	5,000	10,000
Jews	560	0.0	-3.45	500	500
Total population	3,520,000	100.0	-0.07	3,946,000	3,996,000

segregation of Armenian Christians was the Council of Chalcedon, which concluded that the one person of Christ consists of two natures (God and man). The Armenians, busily fighting to be Christians rather than Zoroastrians, did not attend the council. They considered a sharp division between the two natures to be tainted with the Nestorian heresy, to which they were opposed. They were, however, also opposed to a Monophysite doctrine (according to which Christ was seen as having only a divine nature), believing rather that in Christ a divine and human nature was “one nature united in the Incarnate Word.” While the fact that it has, historically, differed in its Christology from both EASTERN ORTHODOXY and the ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH has served to maintain the Armenian Church's separate identity, it has also meant that other Christian churches have not always been as ready to defend it as they might otherwise have been.

Challenges to the monolithic identity of Armenians and the early life of the Armenian Church came during the first millennium from the views of heretics such as the Manichaeans, Messalians (Euchites), Encratites, Montanists, and Novitians, and the more specifically Armenian Borborites, McIne, Iconoclasts, and Paulicians, all of whom underwent considerable persecution. Around the ninth century, the Tondrakian movement gained substantial support as a messianic social reformist movement that advocated asceticism and renunciation of material riches; it championed the peasants and poorer classes, causing serious disturbances for almost two centuries. Not surprisingly, it too was persecuted by the Armenian aristocracy and Church hierarchy.

From the early eleventh century Armenia suffered four hundred years of invasions and bloody massacres. Some Armenians fled to Persia, Europe, or India; many went to the northeast edge of the Mediterranean where, with the help of the Crusaders, they founded the Cilician Kingdom (1098–1375). The See of the catholicos of All Armenians was reestablished at Sis, leading to an organizational split within the Apostolic Church in 1441 between the Sees of Cilicia and Echmiadzin.

In Cilicia, Catholicism gained the allegiance of a number of upper-class Armenians through intermarriage, educational institutions, and conversion. An Armenian Uniate order, which used an Eastern liturgy, the Mekhitarists, was founded in 1701. Although representing less than 1 percent of Armenians, they maintain important monastic centers of learning on the Venetian island of San Lazzaro, in Vienna, and elsewhere.

The establishment of the Ottoman Empire in 1453 led to four centuries of relative peace and independence, with the Armenian patriarch responsible for the Armenian millet. However, the internal homogeneity the system offered the Armenian community worked only in so far as the Armenians followed one religion. In 1830, French pressure resulted in the creation of a separate millet (semi-autonomous organization for administering various religious communities in the empire) for Catholics; then Protestant missionaries, mainly from America, who were forbidden by law to convert Muslims, concentrated on the Christian Armenians, and, by 1847, a Protestant millet was established.

Toward the end of the nineteenth century, relations between the Armenians and their Turkish rulers deteriorated. In response to oppression and attacks by Turks and Kurds, small numbers of Armenian revolutionaries banded together; there followed a series of massacres of tens of thousands of Armenians in 1894–1896 and again in 1909. Then, in 1915, Armenians throughout Turkey were systematically murdered or marched into the desert to die. Perhaps half a million escaped to the diaspora; two or three times that number perished as a result of genocidal atrocities.

The church in eastern Armenia suffered from many of the deprivations experienced by all the Soviet Republics but continued to play an important part in the life of the community (although accusations of its being a Communist puppet resulted in a split between the Catholicates of Echmiadzin and Cilicia.) By 1988, Armenia was enjoying a higher standard of living, better education, and greater freedom than most Soviet Republics. It also had the advantage of a large and supportive diaspora. But its fortunes were to change dramatically. In December 1988, an earthquake measuring 6.9 on the Richter scale killed 25,000, injured 15,000, and left 517,000 homeless.

Nagorno-Karabakh, an Armenian-populated enclave within the neighbouring Islamic Azerbaijan, had long been a bone of contention between the two republics; the situation erupted in 1989, and by 1993 Karabakh and much of the surrounding territory was in Armenian hands. Ethnic cleansing and wholesale migration on both sides resulted in an influx of refugees from Azerbaijan and an exodus of Azerbaijanis from Armenia. The result of the war and an economic blockade, imposed by Turkey and Azerbaijan in 1988, left Armenia severely impoverished.

The Republic of Armenia gained its independence from the Soviet Union in October 1991. Compared with its neighbors, Armenia enjoys a relatively high standard of human rights. The 1991 Law on Freedom of Conscience and Religious Organizations guarantees freedom of thought, conscience, and religion to everyone, subject only to the protection of public order, health and morality, and the rights and freedoms of other citizens. Although the law affirms the separation of church and state and maintains that all citizens and registered religious communities have the same rights, the Apostolic Church (defined as the national church) is accorded certain privileges. Proselytizing (undefined) is forbidden, except by the Apostolic Church; and all religious organizations are required to register with the State Council on Religious Affairs. A 1997 amendment raised the minimum requirement for registration from fifty to two hundred adult members and banned foreign funding for religions with headquarters outside Armenia. In 2000, a Memorandum of Understanding was signed as a preliminary step toward a concordat between church and state that would amend the constitution by clarifying conditions for church-state collaboration on subjects such as education, social services, state protocol, and the media.

As they have done throughout their history, the vast majority of Armenians consider themselves to be members of the Apostolic Church (as a birthright, even if they rarely enter a church building). By January of 2000, fourteen different groupings of religions were officially registered: the Armenian Apostolic Church, the ARMENIAN CATHOLIC CHURCH, ethnically affiliated Orthodox churches (Russian, Georgian, Greek, Romanian, Bulgarian), Judaism, Paganism, the BAHÁ'Í FAITH, the CHURCH OF JESUS CHRIST OF LATTER-DAY SAINTS, Armenian and other Baptists, Evangelical Protestants, the SEVENTH-DAY ADVENTIST CHURCH, Charismatics, and the NEW APOSTOLIC

CHURCH. Several other religions exist but are not registered for a variety of reasons: Most YEZIDIS and MOLOKANS do not feel the need to register as religious communities; the charter of the JEHOVAH'S WITNESSES is deemed to contradict the constitution; ISKCON (the INTERNATIONAL SOCIETY FOR KRISHNA CONSCIOUSNESS) has not the necessary two hundred members. Some religions function openly without official sanction, while members of other religions, such as the UNIFICATION MOVEMENT, operate in a more or less clandestine fashion as individuals or small communities.

Throughout the former Soviet Union, traditional religions continue to suffer from years of oppression. State-imposed secularism, the confiscation of property, a shortage of clergy, an atheistically socialized population, lack of experience in teaching and pastoral skills, and other deprivations have taken their toll. The arrival of well-trained and prosperous missionaries offering their spiritual (and secular) wares to the recently liberated population has been seen as adding insult to injury. Unsurprisingly, the two catholici issued an official joint statement in 1992 vigorously objecting to the proselytizing efforts of Armenian Roman Catholics, Mekhitarists, Protestants, various para-church movements, such as Jehovah's Witnesses, Pentecostals, and Mormons, and non-Christian movements such as ISKCON and Transcendental Meditation.

On the whole, the traditional religious communities have continued to practice their beliefs without difficulty in the post-Soviet Republic, but the fortunes of the newer religions have been more mixed. The ISKCON temple in Yerevan has been desecrated more than once. In April 1995, members of a number of minority religions, including Krishna devotees, Baptists, Baha'i, Charismatics, and Jehovah's Witnesses, were threatened, robbed, attacked, and even imprisoned by paramilitary gangs. Krishna devotees were taken, bleeding from the head, to hospitals; members of THE FAMILY were told that if they did not leave Yerevan within the next few hours they would be thrown over the balcony of their fifth-floor Yerevan apartment. They left. Members of an indigenous new religion, the Warriors of Christ, were imprisoned for hooliganism. Such incidents provoked international condemnation and have not been repeated; however, Jehovah's Witnesses are imprisoned for conscientious objection, and watching police have not interfered when they have been physically assaulted; the Warriors of Christ has had its property confiscated and its leader imprisoned on suspicion of swindling—an accusation that the movement hotly denies.

As throughout its turbulent history, Armenia has entered the twenty-first century facing acute economic, political, and military challenges. Its national church continues to play a significant role in the life of its people. How it will survive in an environment of globalization and pluralism remains to be seen, but it might be noted that the Armenian

Apostolic Church is an active member of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES, that it enjoys friendly official relations with other major religions, and that, in September 2001, Catholicos Karekin II (b. 1951) undertook that Armenia would fulfil all the requirements on freedom of conscience necessary for its acceptance into full membership of the Council of Europe.

Eileen Barker

Sources:

- Dadrian, Vahakn N. The History of the Armenian Genocide: Ethnic Conflict from the Balkans to Anatolia to the Caucasus. Providence, RI: Berghahn, 1995.
- Hovannisian, Richard. The Republic of Armenia. 4 vols. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1977, 1982, 1996.
- Nersessian, Sirarpie Der. The Armenians. London and New York: Thames and Hudson, 1969.
- Walker, Christopher J. Armenia: The Survival of a Nation. 2d ed. London: Routledge, 1990.

Armenian Apostolic Church (Holy See of Echmiadzin)

The presence of Christians in Armenia can be traced back as far as the Apostolic period. According to a tradition, two of the twelve apostles, Thaddeus and Bartholomew, were the first evangelizers of Armenia and were both martyred there. There is historical evidence of a substantial Christian community in Armenia during the first three centuries of Christianity.

Christians remained a persecuted minority in Armenia until the missionary activity of St. Gregory the Illuminator (240–332). Gregory, a relative of the Armenian king Tiridates III (c. 238–314), was raised a Christian. The pagan Tiridates had Gregory imprisoned for nearly fifteen years in Khor Virab (deep dungeon) in Artashat, near Mount Ararat. After fifteen years of imprisonment, Gregory was released to cure Tiridates of a debilitating illness. Gregory converted the king and royal family to Christianity. Tiridates proclaimed Christianity the state religion of Armenia around 301.

After his ordination, Gregory baptized the king and royal family and was subsequently installed as the first catholicos, or chief bishop, of all Armenians, and continued his efforts to evangelize the Armenian people. In particular, Gregory is reported to have had a vision in Vagharsapat (twelve miles west of Yerevan, the present-day capital of Armenia) of Christ descending from heaven and striking the ground with a golden hammer. At this spot, the Cathedral of Holy Echmiadzin (the Only Begotten One Descended) was built. Echmiadzin thus became the original See of the catholicos of All Armenians. With the support of the royal family, Christianity was able to spread quickly throughout Armenia and to permeate all aspects of Armenian life and culture.

The fifth century is significant to the Armenian Church for three reasons. First, St. Mesrop Mashtots (d. 438) invented the Armenian alphabet in 405. Together with the catholicos St. Sahak I (d. 439) and a number of disciples, Mesrop worked on the translation of the Bible into Armenian. Second, the Persian king attempted to impose Zoroastrianism on the Armenians. The Armenians resisted and, under the command of the general St. Vardan Mamikonian (d. 451), met the Persian forces in battle at Avarair in 451. Although the Armenian forces were defeated, the resistance continued and, in 484, the new Persian king allowed the Armenians to practice their Christian faith. The war against the Persians remains a defining feature of Armenian religious and national identity. Finally, due to the war, the Armenians were not represented at the Council of Chalcedon, one of the international gatherings of bishops of the Christian church at which decisions on essential Christian doctrines were made (451). The Armenian Church later formally rejected Chalcedon. As a result, the church has been isolated from the Eastern Orthodox churches that accepted the council's ruling, while being in communion with the other non-Chalcedonian or Oriental Orthodox churches. The liturgy and traditions of the Armenian Church are nevertheless very similar to those of EASTERN ORTHODOXY.

The See of the catholicos of All Armenians is not attached to any particular city. In 485, the see moved to Dvin, near Echmiadzin. From the tenth to the twelfth centuries, it was moved several times to various cities. As a result of invasions in Armenia, many Armenians migrated to Cilicia during the eleventh and twelfth centuries. In 1116, the see was moved to Cilicia. During the Cilician period, there was increased contact with other churches. St. Nerses IV Klayetsi (the Gracious) (1102–1173) was a remarkable catholicos who worked for unity with the ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH and Eastern Orthodox Church.

In 1375, the Armenian Kingdom of Cilicia fell. Many Armenians wished to return the see to Echmiadzin. The incumbent catholicos, however, did not want to leave Cilicia. Instead, a new catholicos was elected at Echmiadzin in 1441. Henceforth, there have been two Armenian catholicoi, the catholicos of All Armenians in Echmiadzin and the catholicos of Cilicia.

The church in Echmiadzin faced various challenges in the ensuing centuries. The church had a political function, since there was no longer an Armenian state. The catholicos of Echmiadzin had to deal with Persian and later Russian authorities. Various catholicoi of Echmiadzin, most notably Mkrtych I Khrimian (d. 1906) were influential national leaders.

An attempted genocide of the Armenians by the Ottomans starting in 1915 resulted in the deaths of over a million Armenians and the creation of a worldwide diaspora. A small fraction of historical Armenia, including Echmiadzin, became the Soviet Republic of Armenia. The church was severely persecuted under Communist rule. With the fall of the Soviet Union and the restoration of Armenia's independence in 1991, the see has been free to operate its seminary and resume its prominent role in the life of the Armenian people. Catholicos Karekin I (d. 1999) signed a historic common declaration with Pope John Paul II in 1996 articulating the agreements on Christology that have been made by the Armenian Church in dialogue with the Chalcedonian churches.

Today, approximately six million Armenians claim adherence to the Armenian Apostolic Church. Half of all Armenians now live outside Armenia. The See of Echmiadzin has primacy of honor for all faithful of the Armenian Church. Only a catholicos can ordain bishops and bless the holy meron (chrism) used in the sacraments of ordination and chrismation. The catholicos has, in addition to his ecclesial functions, an important role as a national figurehead. The catholicos is elected by a delegation of bishops and laypersons. The see has direct jurisdiction over dioceses in Armenia and the former Soviet Union, Europe, North and South America, and Australia. Several dioceses in the Middle East, as well as one dissident diocese in North America, are under the jurisdiction of the See of Cilicia. The Armenian patriarch of Constantinople exercises authority over the Armenian churches of Turkey, while the Armenian patriarch of Jerusalem is the custodian of Armenian churches and holdings in the Holy Land. Both patriarchs, however, are dependent on the catholicos of All Armenians for bishops and the holy chrism.

Address:

Armenian Apostolic Church
c/o The Holy See
Echmiadzin
Armenia

Michael Papazian

Sources:

Armenian Apostolic Church. Posted at <http://www.100anniversary.com>.
Arpee, L. A History of Armenian Christianity from the Beginning of Our Own Time. New York: Armenian Missionary Association of America, 1946.
Gulesserian, P. C. The Armenian Church. New York: AMS, 1970.
Thompson, R. W. Studies in Armenian Literature and Christianity. Altershot, UK: Variorum, 1994.

Armenian Apostolic Church
(See of the Great House of Cilicia)

As a result of invasions of Armenia by the Seljuk Turks in the eleventh century, a large number of Armenians migrated to Cilicia in Anatolia along the Mediterranean coast. The See of the catholicos of All Armenians moved to Cilicia in 1116, eventually settling in the city of Sis. This was an especially vibrant period for the Armenian Church, in part because the church was now in direct contact with Latin Christians and crusaders. Many of the Armenian bishops were greatly influenced by Latin Christianity and culture, and even entered into full communion with Rome. Notable clergy in this period were Catholicos St. Nerses IV Klayetsi (the Gracious; 1102–1173), the author of numerous theological works and poems, and St. Nerses of Lampron (1153–1198), bishop of Tarsus and author of an extensive commentary on the Armenian liturgy. Both men were actively involved in attempts to restore unity with the Greek and Latin churches.

With the aid of crusaders, the Armenians were able to establish a kingdom in Cilicia. The Armenian Kingdom of Cilicia fell in 1375 to the Egyptian Mamelukes. Many Armenians began to return to Armenia and wanted to return the see to Echmiadzin in Armenia. The incumbent catholicos, Grigor IX Mousabegyantz, however, did not want to leave Cilicia. Instead, a new catholicos, Kirakos of Virab, was elected at Echmiadzin in 1441. As a result, there are today two Armenian catholicoi, the catholicos of All Armenians, whose see is at Echmiadzin, and a catholicos of the Great House of Cilicia. Both catholicoi have the same privileges and authority to ordain bishops and to bless the holy meron (chrism) used in the sacraments of ordination and chrismation. The catholicos of All Armenians enjoys a primacy of honor, though the catholicos of Cilicia has complete authority within the dioceses under his jurisdiction. There are no doctrinal or liturgical disagreements between the two sees. Disagreements over jurisdiction were limited and inconsequential until the political crises of the twentieth century.

In 1915, the Ottoman government began a policy of genocide against the Armenians. As a result, Cilicia was effectively depopulated of Armenians. The See of Cilicia went into exile, eventually settling in Antelias, Lebanon, on the outskirts of Beirut. Having lost its traditional dioceses in Cilicia, the See of Cilicia was granted the dioceses of Lebanon, Syria, and Cyprus, formerly under the jurisdiction of the Armenian patriarch of Jerusalem. In 1920, Armenia was forcibly incorporated into the Soviet Union. Thus, the See of Echmiadzin fell under Communist domination. Because of opposition to Communist influence, several dioceses that had been under Echmiadzin asked to be taken under the jurisdiction of the See of Cilicia. In 1956, Catholicos Zareh I of Cilicia agreed to extend his jurisdiction over the dioceses of Iran, Greece, and a number of North American parishes that refused to accept the authority of the Echmiadzin Diocese. As a result, there are two rival Armenian dioceses in North America. The collapse of the Soviet Union and the restoration of Armenian independence in 1991 were viewed as hopeful signs that the conflict would end. The jurisdictional conflicts, however, have persisted.

Because it was free of Communist interference, the See of Cilicia was more active in the twentieth century than the See of Echmiadzin. Its seminary has produced clergymen who serve the Armenian Church throughout the world. The see publishes a large number of books in Armenian on religious and secular topics. Several of the catholicoi of Cilicia have also been prominent leaders in the ecumenical movement. Catholicos Karekin II (catholicos of Cilicia from 1977–1995; as Karekin I, catholicos of all Armenians, 1995–1999) was an observer at the Second Vatican Council and a vice-moderator of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES. Catholicos Aram I (catholicos of Cilicia since 1995) currently serves as moderator of the World Council of Churches.

Address:

Armenian Apostolic Church
c/o the Holy See
Armenian Catholicosate of Cilicia
Antelias
Lebanon
<http://www.armprelacy.org>

Michael Papazian

Sources:

- Arpee, L. A History of Armenian Christianity from the Beginning of Our Own Time. New York: Armenian Missionary Association of America, 1946.
- Gulesserian, P. C. The Armenian Church. New York: AMS, 1970.
- Sarkissian, Karekin. The Council of Chalcedon and the Armenian Church. New York: Armenian Church Prelacy, 1965.
- Thompson, R. W. Studies in Armenian Literature and Christianity. Aldershot, UK: Variorum, 1994.

Armenian Catholic Church

The Armenian Catholic Church, an Eastern-rite church in full communion with the ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH, emerged in the eighteenth century as the outgrowth of several centuries of missionary activity by Roman Catholics among members of the ARMENIAN APOSTOLIC CHURCH residing in Lebanon. The ancient church of Armenia was separated from the larger body of Christendom in the fifth century following the Council of Chalcedon (451 C.E.). For a variety of reasons, the Armenian bishops refused to affirm the teachings promulgated by the council, one of the international gatherings of bishops of the Christian church at which decisions on essential Christian doctrines were made, concerning the nature of Christ. The Armenian position has traditionally been termed Monophysitism, the doctrine that Christ had only one nature, the divine, even though he took on human form. Chalcedon taught that Christ had both a human and a divine nature. The argument remains an important one in Christian theology, and many within other Christian communities considered the Armenians to be heretics.

Army of Mary

After many centuries of independent development, members of the Armenian Church came into contact with the Crusaders who passed through Little Armenia (Cilicia), an Armenian land on the southern coast of what is now Turkey. An initial alliance of the church in Cilicia and the church in Rome was established in 1198. However, the union was unacceptable to the main body of Armenians and was ultimately brought to an end by the Tatar conquest of the area in 1375. The Roman Catholics kept the ideal alive with the publication of a union decree by the Council of Florence in 1439.

Over the next centuries, as opportunities arose, missionary activity was carried out by Catholic priests, and a scattered number of Armenian congregations affiliated to the Roman Catholic Church emerged. Then in 1742, following the conversion of an Armenian bishop, Abraham Ardzivian (1679–1749), to Catholicism, Pope Benedict XIV established the Armenian Catholic Church as a formal body of believers with Ardzivian as their patriarch. He took the name Abraham Pierre I, and his successors have subsequently included Pierre as part of their religious titles. The church continued to use the Armenian liturgy, which had been developed among the Armenian people through the centuries, with some minor adjustments.

The faithful under the new patriarch's jurisdiction resided within the Ottoman Empire, and they became subject to some immediate persecution. The Ottoman authorities wished to relate to their Armenian subjects through one church, the Armenian Apostolic Church, and its bishop in Constantinople. It was not until 1829 that the government recognized those Armenians in communion with Rome. The government allowed the appointment of a second bishop, to reside in Constantinople. Finally in 1867, the two bishoprics were united into a single patriarchal office located at Constantinople.

The church grew substantially for a half century, but was decimated by the Turk's wholesale slaughter of Armenians at the end of World War I. Those who died included an estimated 100,000 Armenian Catholics, among them 7 bishops, 130 priests, and 47 nuns. In 1928, the patriarch was relocated to Lebanon. During this same period, many Armenians left their traditional homeland and relocated across Europe, North Africa, Australia, and North and South America. Subsequently dioceses were established in France, the United States, and Argentina.

The majority of members reside in Lebanon and Syria, but there are dioceses in Turkey, Iran, Iraq, and Egypt. There are some 150,000 members worldwide. Following the fall of the Soviet Union, the Vatican moved to strengthen its ties to Armenian Catholics in the former Communist countries and appointed a bishop to oversee their work. The church supports three ordered religious communities, a seminary in Lebanon, and a college in Rome.

Address:

Armenian Catholic Church
rue de l'Hopital Libanais
Jeitaoui, 2400 Beirut
Lebanon
<http://www.geocities.com/Athens/Delphi/9395/#>

Sources:

Liesel, N. The Eastern Catholic Liturgies: A Study in Words and Pictures. Westminster, MD: Newman Press, 1960.
Roberson, Ronald G. The Eastern Christian Churches—A Brief Survey. 5th ed. Rome: Edizioni Orientalia Christiana, Pontificio Istituto Orientale, 1995.

Army of Mary [Armée de Marie]

Marie-Paule Giguère (b. 1921) was born in Sainte-Germaine-du-Lac-Étchemin (Québec) in 1921 and married Georges Cliche (1917–1997) in 1944. Although Marie-Paule had five children, her marriage was not happy. Georges was a spendthrift, unfaithful, and an alcoholic. Counseled by a number of Catholic priests, Marie-Paule left him in 1957. She started hearing the “internal voice” of Jesus Christ and the Virgin Mary as a teenager, and eventually they asked her to write a voluminous spiritual autobiography, Vie d'Amour (Life of Love), the fifteen volumes of which were published between 1979 and 1994.

Marie-Paule first “heard” a reference to the Army of Mary, a “wonderful movement” that she was called to lead, in 1954. It was officially established on August 28, 1971. A priest from the Catholic diocese of Rimouski (Québec), Father Philippe Roy (1916–1988), joined the movement in 1972 and eventually became its general director. Following a request by Monsignor Jean-Pierre van Lierde, a prelate in the Vatican's Roman Curia and a friend of Marie-Paule, the archbishop of Québec, Maurice Cardinal Roy (1905–1985; not a relative of Father Philippe Roy) officially recognized the Army of Mary as a Catholic lay association in 1975. In 1976, a popular French author of texts on prophecy, Raoul Auclair (1906–1997), after having read the manuscript of Vie d'Amour, decided to become a member of the Army of Mary. In 1978, he moved from France to Québec, where he became the editor of the movement's magazine, L'Etoile. In the years that followed, the Army of Mary gathered thousands of followers in Canada (and hundreds more in Europe).

The Community of the Sons and Daughters of Mary, a religious order including both priests and nuns, was established in 1981, with John Paul II personally ordaining the first Son of Mary as a priest in 1986. Several other ordinations followed, and a number of Catholic dioceses throughout the world were happy to welcome both the Sons and the Daughters of Mary to help them in their pastoral work. After her husband's death in 1997, Marie-Paule herself became a Daughter of Mary and was subsequently elected superior general of the congregation. A larger Family of the Sons and Daughters of Mary also includes lay organizations, such as the Oblate-Patriots, established in 1986 with the aim of spreading Catholic social teachings, and the Marialys Institute (created in 1992), which gathers Catholic priests who are not members of the Sons of Mary but who share their general aims.

The Army of Mary's success has always been accompanied by conflicts with members of the Catholic hierarchy. Liberal Catholic bishops in Québec regarded the movement as suspiciously archconservative. After Cardinal Roy's death, his successor Louis-Albert Cardinal Vachon proved to be as hostile to Marie-Paule's visions and revelations as Roy had been sympathetic. Vachon regarded some of the visions as of dubious orthodoxy. He focused on certain writings by Raoul Auclair (according to which the Immaculate existed as a spiritual being since before the creation, later to descend into the Virgin Mary) and on other writings by a Belgian member, Marc Bosquart, who had moved to Québec and had written two books claiming that the Immaculate was now mystically inhabiting Marie-Paule. Although the Army of Mary maintained that these were Bosquart's personal opinions, rather than teachings of the movement itself, Vachon proceeded to withdraw the official recognition of the Army of Mary as an official Catholic organization. The case went to Rome, and in 1987 the Congregation for the Doctrine of Faith judged Bosquart's opinions as "seriously erroneous." Although the Army of Mary promptly withdrew Bosquart's books from circulation, skirmishes with Catholic bishops in Québec continued, while some English-speaking Canadian bishops, and certain bishops in Italy, were still prepared to accept both the Sons and Daughters of Mary and the Army of Mary itself into their dioceses.

Finally, on March 31, 2000, the Vatican Congregation for the Doctrine of Faith sent a note to all Canadian bishops stating that Marie-Paule's Vie d'Amour contained doctrinal errors and that further action needed to be taken. In 2001, the National Conference of Canadian Bishops published a statement saying that the Army of Mary should no longer be regarded as a Roman Catholic organization. Both documents were careful, however, in distinguishing between the Army of Mary as a lay organization and the congregations of the Sons and Daughters of Mary. Apparently, the Vatican would like to maintain an ongoing dialogue with the latter, and has praised their members as excellent priests and nuns, despite the fact that they remain fiercely loyal to Marie-Paule and are unlikely to separate themselves from the Army of Mary. Membership in the lay organization is currently around 6,000.

Address:

Army of Mary
Centre International de l'Armée de Marie

Spiri-Maria
155 Route de la Grande-Ligne
Lac-Etchemin, Québec G0R 1S0
Canada
<http://www.communaute-dame.qc.ca>

Massimo Introvigne and PierLuigi Zoccatelli

Sources:

Giguère, Marie-Paule. Vie d'Amour. 15 vols. Limoilou, Québec: Vie d'Amour, 1979–1994. Volumes 1–3, 5, and 7–15 have been translated into English as Life of Love. Limoilou, Québec: Vie d'Amour, 1979–1987. See also the five volumes Appendices. Limoilou, Québec: Vie d'Amour, 1992–1993.
Introvigne, Massimo. "En Route to the Marian Kingdom: Catholic Apocalypticism and the Army of Mary." In Christian Millenarianism: From the Early Church to Waco, edited by Stephen Hunt. London: Hurst, 2001.

Arsha Vidya Gurukulam

Arsha Vidya Gurukulam was founded at Saylorsburg, Pennsylvania, in 1986, by Swami Dayananda Saraswati, who had been a disciple of Swami Chinmayananda (1916–1993), famous authority of the scriptures of India and founder of a teaching mission to the West. Swami Dayananda seemed destined to be his teacher's successor as head of Chinmaya West, but in 1982, he left the organization in part to lead what he considered a more simple life of a teacher rather than as an administrator of a growing institution.

Swami Dayananda emerged in the 1970s teaching a course on Advaita Vedanta, a monistic form of Hindu thought that views reality as one, and all distinctions as illusion. Important to the advaita approach is an understating of the self (atman) and identical with God (Brahman). Advaita negates dvaita, which means "two" thus advaita is "that which is nondual." It reveals that there is nothing other than that One, a whole without parts. Enlightenment is a shift in understanding concerning the Whole that is best brought about through the study of the sacred texts

His teaching career has included both an intensive study of classical Hindu literature that undergirds the more than twenty books he has authored. He continues to teach intensive courses on Vedanta at Saylorsburg and its two sister ashrams in India, one at Coimbatore, established in 1990, and one at Rishikesh. These ashrams are distinctive in that they are not dominated by a contemplative atmosphere but attempt to create a more academic environment. The primary goal is the acquisition of knowledge about Vedanta. Residents spend much time in the study of the ancient Sanskrit texts. Spiritual practice is centered on a thirty-minute period of meditation each morning. Mastery of the sacred scripture is seen as the most reliable means to overcome ignorance and appropriate direct knowledge of the Absolute.

Art of Living Foundation

Through the years Swami Dayananda has trained a number of students who have themselves gone on to establish their own ashrams following the traditions they have learned at the Arsha Vidya Gurukulam: Included are Swami Veditatmananda, founder of Adhyatma Vidya Mandir in Gujarat; Swami Vagishananda, founder of the Education for Living program in London, England; and Gambhira Chaitanya, who teaches in Argentina and Brazil. The staff of teachers at the three ashrams allow a year-round program of instructions that also include classes in hatha yoga and ayurveda medicine.

Addresses:

Arsha Vidya Gurukulam
P.O. Box 1059
Saylorsburg, PA 18353

Arsha Vidya Gurukulam
Anaikatti P.O.
Coimbatore - 641 108
Tamil Nadu
India

Sources:

- Dayananda Saraswato, Swami. Meditation at Dawn. Self-published, n.d.
- . Purbamadah Purnamidam. Self-published, n.d.
- . The Value of Values. Saylorsburg, PA: Arsha Vidya Gurukulam, 1993.
- “Swami Dayanada Renounces Chimaya Mission West: Changes and Challenges Ahead” New Saivite World (Fall 1983).

Art of Living Foundation

Ravi Shankar (honored with the title of Sri Sri), who is not to be confused with the famous Indian musician, was born in 1956 in southern India. His life is totally dedicated to what he defines as the “re-evaluation of human values.” In 1982, he founded the Art of Living Foundation in the United States. This educational organization, which refuses to be labeled a religious organization, was created to assist all members of society, regardless of their sociocultural context, in reaching their full human potential. The International Association for Human Values (IAHV), with main offices in Geneva, Switzerland, and with three national chapters (United States, India, and Canada) embodies the common objective of all of the initiatives promoted and inspired by Ravi Shankar. Since November 1996, the Art of Living Foundation has been a nongovernment organization (NGO), with the status of consultant to the Economic and Social Council (ECOSOC) of the United Nations, offering educational programs, practical tools, and experience-gaining processes for stress management, problem solving, health improvement, and living life with greater joy and enthusiasm. According to the foundation, more than a million people in ninety-eight nations around the world have participated in these programs.

The Art of Living Foundation has affiliate offices on all of the continents and manages three main international centers: Bangalore (India), St. Mathieu du Parc (Québec, Canada), and Bad Antogast (Oppenau, Germany). The “5 H Program” is a volunteer-operated initiative of the International Association for Human Values and offers social and community development programs that focus on five objectives: Health, Homes, Hygiene, Harmony amidst Diversity, and Human Values. In 1992, Ravi Shankar created the Prison SMART (Stress Management and Rehabilitative Training) Foundation, whose activities are aimed at those people involved in the justice system. The foundation also organizes a series of specific training programs, which include the ART Excel (All ’Round Training for Excellence) Program and the Corporate Executive Program (for corporate training).

Although Ravi Shankar draws from a spiritual patrimony of Indian origin, he also draws from humanity’s various religious and spiritual traditions, which he sees as having a universal relevance. According to the Art of Living, there are seven levels to human existence: body, breathing, mind, intellect, memory, ego, and self. In the teaching of Ravi Shankar, health is not seen simply as the absence of illness, but rather as consisting of the harmony of these seven levels. The Art of Living emphasises the importance of learning special techniques for preserving or reestablishing this harmony. These techniques, which use breathing as the main tool, are applied at two levels. The first consists in different types of pranayama (Sanskrit; to direct or store vital energy), in which it is believed that inhalation coincides with taking in energy and exhalation coincides with the elimination of toxins from the body. The purpose of the pranayama is to keep the mind calm and lucid, to increase lung capacity, and to energize the entire organism. The second application is sudarshan kriya (Sanskrit; purifying action that permits a clear vision of your own nature), which again works with breathing in its twofold nature: the intake of vital energy and the release of toxins. The sudarshan kriya starts a self-healing process, making it possible for the individual to enjoy great benefits. The final purpose of these techniques is the revitalization of the seven levels and the resynchronization of the first six with the Self. When the body is charged with energy and the seven levels are in harmony, the natural and spontaneous response is for the individual to express the fundamental human values that represent the true human nature, a state of things that the Art of Living perceives as its objective.

Another tool used by the Art of Living is Sahaj Samadhi meditation. Meditation is defined as a state of being in which the individual effortlessly enters into contact with the most profound part of him or herself—the Self—the essence of the human soul by using a method that dates back to the ancient Vedic tradition, being the oldest, indeed the eternal scripture, according to Hindu belief. In addition to teaching these techniques, Ravi Shankar makes use of other tools, including a learning system aimed at integrating healthy and effective life principles into one's own daily life and at recognizing the mechanisms of the human mind that generate stress and uneasiness; the techniques are then used for self-liberation from stress and uneasiness.

There is no central headquarters for the foundation; of the international centers, the most important is in Bangalore: Art of Living Foundation, c/o Ved Vignan Mahavidya Peeth-Bangalore, Prashant Rajore, 21st km, Kanakapura Rd., Udayapura, Bangalore, Karnataka 560 062 India. The International Association for Human Values (IAHV) is headquartered in Geneva: IAHV, 2 Ave. Pictet Rochemont, CH-1207 Geneva, Switzerland. It has an Internet site at <http://www.iahv.org/>.

Address:

Art of Living Foundation
<http://www.artofliving.org>

Andrea Menegotto

Sources:

- Menegotto, Andrea. "Arte di Vivere." In Enciclopedia delle religioni in Italia, edited by Massimo Introvigne, et al. Torino, Italy: Editrice Elledici, 2001.
- Shankar, Sri Sri Ravi. God Loves Fun. Santa Barbara, CA: Art of Living Foundation, 1996.
- , et al. An Intimate Note to the Sincere Seeker. 5 vols. Santa Barbara, CA: Art of Living Foundation, 1996–2000.

Status of religions in Aruba, 2000-2050

Followers	2000			2025	2050
	total	%	rate
Christians	99,100	96.4	4.91	240,000	330,000
Roman Catholics	84,300	82.1	5.17	210,000	303,000
Protestants	7,500	7.3	1.82	18,000	11,500
Independents	1,400	1.3	2.07	2,500	4,200
Nonreligious	1,400	1.4	6.07	5,000	9,000
Spiritists	1,000	1.0	5.29	2,000	3,000
Muslims	280	0.3	7.33	1,000	1,500
Atheists	260	0.3	4.85	600	900
Chinese folk-religionists	160	0.2	4.07	400	500
Baha'is	150	0.1	7.77	400	600
Jews	140	0.1	2.73	300	400
Buddhists	130	0.1	2.82	300	400
other religionists	80	0.1	4.41	200	300
Total population	103,000	100.0	4.93	250,000	347,000

raise horses and cattle, which for many years formed the base of the island's economy. The island came under Dutch control by the Treaty of Westphalia and was grouped together with nearby Curaçao and Bonaire as the Netherlands Antilles. Through the next century, because of the low need for labor, few slaves were imported. People of African descent constituted about 12 percent of the population when freedom was granted in the nineteenth century.

Life on Aruba changed dramatically at the end of the 1920s with the discovery and development of oil fields. Many expatriates, mostly Americans, settled there. Through the last half of the twentieth century, Arubans agitated for freedom from the Netherlands Antilles, with power centered on Curaçao, and then for independence as a nation. The former was granted in 1986, but in 1990 Aruba withdrew its petition for independent nationhood.

Aruba

Aruba, an island nation related to the Netherlands in the Caribbean off the coast of Venezuela, was originally settled by the Caiquetios people. They were the unfortunate victims of contact with Europeans and through the 1600s were conquered, and many were sold into slavery by the Spanish. The few settlers who occupied the island began to

Arya Samaj

When the Dutch took control of the Antilles (which also included the Windward Islands), they expelled the Spanish Catholic Mission. However, Jesuit priests were allowed back in 1705. Subsequently, the ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH became and has remained the dominant religion on Aruba; it claims some 80 percent of the 62,000 residents. The Dutch introduced the REFORMED/PRESBYTERIAN TRADITION to the Antilles, and it continues as the United Protestant Church of Aruba, combining both Reformed and Lutheran elements.

When the Dutch lost their foothold in Brazil in the seventeenth century, which had been centered in Recife, they evacuated the Jewish community, which feared once again coming under Portuguese rule. Most of the Brazilian Jews were taken either to New Amsterdam (New York) in America or to Curaçao. Some of the Curaçao Jews eventually moved on to Aruba but abandoned the island in the nineteenth century. A new start for the Jewish community there was made in 1924, and now a small community of some thirty-five families exists. The community dedicated a new synagogue in 1962.

Also, early in the twentieth century, a community of Muslims formed in Curaçao, consisting of immigrants from Syria, Lebanon, and Suriname. Members of this community moved to Aruba.

Through the twentieth century a variety of Protestant churches, including Holiness and Pentecostal churches from the United States, made Aruba their home. Notable among these was the Evangelical Alliance Mission, which came in 1931 and sponsors a broadcasting station, Radio Victoria. The SEVENTH-DAY ADVENTIST CHURCH, which came a few years before, have the third largest membership of any church on the island.

The JEHOVAH'S WITNESSES landed on Aruba in the early 1940s. The CHURCH OF JESUS CHRIST OF LATTER-DAY SAINTS organized its first congregation in 1986, and the following year, portions of the Book of Mormon were translated into the local language, Papiamentu, and published.

Sources:

Barrett, David. The Encyclopedia of World Christianity. 2d ed. New York: Oxford University Press, 2001.

Bissio, Roberto Remo, et al. Third World Guide 93/94.

Montevideo, Uruguay: Instituto del Tercer Mundo, 1992.

Brada, W. M. Kerkgeschiedenis. Curaçao: Paulus Drukkerij, 1946.

Arya Samaj

Founded in 1875 in colonial India, the Arya Samaj (noble soul), formerly known as Arya Pratinidhi Sabha, is a reformist Hindu sect that synthesizes ancient orthodox ritual practice with modern notions of social organization and interaction. Arya Samajis reject much of Hinduism's sanatan dharma (e.g., idol worship, pūja) and instead have made the Vedas their preeminent sacred texts. Havan (an ancient fire ceremony) is their central ritual practice, and they promote ten basic principles: (1) God is the original source of all that is true, (2) God is a single, eternal, fully conscious being, (3) the Vedas are the books of all true knowledge, (4) all people should be ready to accept truth, (5) all acts should be performed with righteousness and duty, (6) Samajis should promote good to the whole world through physical, spiritual, and social progress of all humans, (7) all interactions should be regulated by love and due justice in accordance with the dictates of righteousness, (8) realization and acquisition of knowledge (vidyaa) should be promoted for all, (9) Samajis should strive for the upliftment of all and not be satisfied with only personal development, and (10) while the individual is free to enjoy individual well-being, everyone should dedicate themselves to overall social good.

Most of these principles support a strong, anticaste, universalizing sentiment of social service. Moreover, they introduced a ceremony for conversion called shuddhikaran (purification) that ritually cleansed converts so that they could be absorbed or reabsorbed into the Hindu fold. Despite this ceremony, and promotion of fundamental principles of social justice, many Samaji communities were unable to forget a convert's caste background, thus making it difficult for individual converts to be absorbed socially into the group. For this reason, especially in the first half of the twentieth century, proselytization efforts focused on entire (usually endogamous) groups.

Mul Shankara (1824–1883), founder of the Arya Samaj, was born a Brahman, reared with an Orthodox Brahman education in Gujarat, and went on to take the vows of a sannyasi (a follower of the renounced life) in 1848 with the Sarasvati Dandi Order of Yogis. As a sannyasi, he took a new religious name, Dayananda Sarasvati, and wandered the length and breadth of India for the next twelve years, eventually settling in Mathura to study under the Vedic scholar Virajananda. In the context of colonial India's emerging social and political consciousness and nationalism, Dayananda preached a message of gender equality and social liberalism (strongly anticaste) through Vedic interpretations, a message that was often in conflict with other emerging sectarian philosophies of the time. His abrasive and polemic style did not endear him to many who cherished traditional Hinduism, but there were others who found his message liberating. Thus the Arya Samaj grew as an organization, particularly in the Punjab, where it remains an important sect to this day.

Members of the group continue to engage in proselytizing its universalizing message of spiritual truth and social reform, a practice that has taken the organization and its philosophy around the world. Countries of the Indian diaspora, in particular (e.g., Guyana, Trinidad and Tobago, Canada, Kenya, and many more), have numerous, registered centers for worship, but the worldwide number of adherents is difficult to assess. Trinidad (in the eastern Caribbean) is particularly notable for having the first woman to become a Hindu priest (pandit). Indrani Rampersad was inducted as a pandita of the Arya Pratinidhi Sabha.

Address:

Arya Samaj
Sarvadeshik Arya Pratinidhi Sabha
Dayanand Bhawan
Asaf All Road
New Delhi
India
<http://www.wherisgod.com>
<http://aryasamaj.com>

Carolyn V. Prorok

Sources:

- Gupta, Shiv Kumar. Arya Samaj and the Raj, 1875–1920. New Delhi: Gitanjali Publishing House, 1991.
- Lajpat Rai, Lala. The Arya Samaj: An Account of Its Origin, Doctrines, and Activities. New Delhi: Reliance Publishing House, 1991.
- Yoginder, S. S. “The Fitna of Irtidad: Muslim Missionary Response to the Shuddhi of Arya Samaj in Early Twentieth Century India.” Journal of Muslim Minority Affairs 17, 1 (1997): 65–83.

Assemblies of God

The Assemblies of God is an American Pentecostal and Evangelical Christian denomination with fraternally related constituencies around the world; it was founded at Hot Springs, Arkansas, April 2–12, 1914. The roots of the General Council of the Assemblies of God (AG) can be traced to radical Evangelicals in the Wesleyan wing and especially the Reformed wing of the nineteenth-century HOLINESS MOVEMENT. In addition to the historic truths of the Christian faith, these Holiness forerunners of AG subscribed to three distinctive beliefs: They believed in sanctification, or full consecration, as a work of grace subsequent to conversion, referred to later in the century as baptism in the Holy Spirit; they believed in divine healing; and they preached the urgent need to evangelize the world before the imminent premillennial return of Jesus Christ. Modern Pentecostalism arose from this background; its official beginning is dated to a revival on January 1, 1901, under the leadership of Charles F. Parham (1873–1929) at his Bethel Bible School in Topeka, Kansas. Parham framed the doctrine distinctive of classic Pentecostalism by teaching that glossolalic utterance, or speaking in tongues, signified that the prophesied outpouring of the Holy Spirit (Joel 2:28–29) had now come, that it (not Holiness sanctification) verified the reception of Spirit baptism, and that it provided linguistic expertise and spiritual empowerment for God’s End-time missionaries. Subsequent Pentecostal revivals, notably in Houston; Los Angeles; Chicago; Zion, Illinois; Nyack, New York; and elsewhere, also strongly impacted those who formed the AG.

Concerns about doctrinal stability, legal recognition, overseas missions, ministerial training, and spiritual unity led over three hundred largely independent Pentecostals to gather in Hot Springs, Arkansas, in 1914 to establish the General Council of the AG. Preferring to be identified as a “cooperative fellowship” rather than as a denomination, the council did not adopt a creedal statement until 1916 (Statement of Fundamental Truths), when a schism occurred over the nature of the Godhead, a schism that resulted in the withdrawal of “Jesus Name” or “Oneness” believers. A constitution and bylaws came later in 1927. From the beginning, the AG embraced conservative Evangelical doctrines, with the addition of a distinctively Pentecostal spirituality emphasizing baptism in the Holy Spirit with the “initial physical evidence,” as it was called, of speaking in tongues and the restoration of the charismatic gifts of the Spirit, as enumerated by Saint Paul (1 Cor. 12:8–10), for the life and mission of the church. The most recent exposition of AG theology appears in the 1995 edition of Systematic Theology, edited by Stanley M. Horton.

Organizationally, the AG adopted a mixed congregational/presbyterial church polity. This polity allows for a measure of local church sovereignty, under the oversight of the General Council, the highest governing body, made up of all ordained ministers and lay delegates from the churches, which meets biennially. Two smaller bodies, the General Presbytery and the Executive Presbytery, also administer the denomination and its many programs. The general officers include the general superintendent, assistant general superintendent, general secretary, and general treasurer; other top leaders include the executive directors of AG World Missions and AG Home Missions. Ministerial training is provided through regional and national institutions of higher education (Bible institutes, colleges, universities), as well as through the Assemblies of God Theological Seminary and the nontraditional program of Global University, both located in the headquarters city of Springfield, Missouri. The Gospel Publishing House serves as the denominational publishing arm and the weekly Pentecostal Evangel as its official voice.

One of the Assemblies of God’s 2002 logos (Courtesy of the Assembly of God)

Aggressively evangelistic, the AG included thirty missionaries on its roster in 1914. By 2001, 1,816 missionaries served in 186 nations, in ministries of gospel proclamation and compassion, in association with fraternally related constituencies numbering over 35 million people. Central to its concept of missionary work has been the priorities of establishing self-supporting, self-governing, and self-propagating indigenous churches and providing leadership training. In the United States, the AG lists 32,310 credentialed ministers, 12,084 churches, and an overall constituency of 2,577,560. It also holds membership in the National Association of Evangelicals, through which it is related to the WORLD EVANGELICAL ALLIANCE. The Flower Pentecostal Heritage Center, located in the national headquarters complex, houses a museum and archival resources.

Address:

Assemblies of God
1445 Boonville Ave.
Springfield, MO 65802
<http://www.ag.org/top/>

Gary B. McGee

Sources:

- Blumhofer, Edith L. Restoring the Faith: The Assemblies of God, Pentecostalism, and American Culture. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1993.
- Horton, Stanley M., ed. Systematic Theology. Springfield, MO: Gospel Publishing House, 1995.
- McGee, Gary B. This Gospel Shall Be Preached: A History and Theology of Assemblies of God Foreign Missions to 1959. Springfield, MO: Gospel Publishing House, 1986.
- . This Gospel Shall Be Preached: A History and Theology of Assemblies of God Foreign Missions since 1959. Springfield, MO: Gospel Publishing House, 1989.

Wilson, Everett A. Strategy of the Spirit: J. Philip Hogan and the Growth of the Assemblies of God Worldwide, 1960–1990. Irvine, CA: Regnum Books International, 1997.

Assemblies of God in Brazil

Pentecostalism in Brazil began with the immigration of two Swedes to Belém in 1910. Daniel Berg (b. 1885) was a Baptist who moved from his native Sweden to the United States in 1902. In 1909, while visiting his homeland, he received the Pentecostal baptism of the Holy Spirit with the accompanying evidence of speaking in tongues. Upon his return to America, he joined the congregation led by Pentecostal pioneer William H. Durham in Chicago. There he met Gunnar Vingren, who had a dream that the pair should go to Brazil as missionaries. Once settled in Belém, they began to spread the Pentecostal message among the Baptists of the city.

As they mastered the language, the pair began to travel across Brazil, first in the north and then in the 1920s in the south. The Assemblies of God emerged as the result of their work. As early as 1913, the initial missionaries (to Portugal) were commissioned. Subsequently, missionary work was launched in French Guiana, Bolivia, Colombia, Canada, the United States, Ecuador, Paramaribo, Mozambique, and East Timor. The church had some four hundred thousand members by 1940. It surpassed the million mark in the early 1960s. By the 1970s, the Assemblies were the largest Protestant church in the country and the only one with congregations in all of the states of Brazil. By the end of the century, it had more than six million members and a constituency more than twice that number.

The church has an extensive Web site, given below, through which it may be contacted. Its publishing house is located at Av. Brasil, 34.401, Bangu, Rio de Janeiro RJ, CEP 21851-000, Brazil. It has rejected membership in the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES.

Address:

<http://www.admb28.hpg.ig.com.br/setor28.htm>

Sources:

- Albarez, Miguel Angelo. "Introduction to the History of the Pentecostal Movement in Brazil." Th.M. thesis, Fuller Theological Seminary, 1996.
- Conde, Emilio. Historia das Assembleias de Deus no Brasil. Rio de Janeiro: Assembleias de Deus, 1960.
- Dantas, Elias. "O Movimento Pentecostal Brasileiro: Sua Historia e Influencia Sobre as Denominacoes Tradicionais no Brasil." Th.M. thesis, Fuller Theological Seminary, 1988. (Portuguese, with summary in English)
- Endrueit, Wilson Harle. "Pentecostalism in Brazil: A Historical and Theological Study of its Characteristics." Ph.D. dissertation, Northwestern University, 1975.

Assemblies of God in Great Britain and Ireland

Assemblies of God in Great Britain and Ireland (AGGBI) was founded from independent Pentecostal congregations in the United Kingdom. In response to an invitation from John Nelson Parr (1886–1976), a gathering was arranged at Aston, Birmingham, in February 1924. Parr assured those present that “the autonomy of the local assembly would be strictly observed.” He had in mind a British fellowship based on the pattern of the General Council of the ASSEMBLIES OF GOD, which had been formed in the United States in 1914. The union of assemblies that was envisaged was to operate at three levels. First, assemblies would adhere to the same fundamental truths. Second, assemblies should maintain fellowship through District Presbyteries. Third, a General Presbytery would be set up, composed of local pastors and elders.

The Assemblies’ statement of fundamental truths followed basic Evangelical tenets regarding the Trinity, the authority of the Bible, and the need for a personal experience of conversion. They also believed water baptism should be by total immersion and that healing from illness is provided for by the death of Jesus on the cross (the Atonement). In common with many other Pentecostal denominations, they agreed that spiritual gifts and miracles should be expected in the modern era and that speaking in tongues (glossolalia), as described in the New Testament, is the initial evidence of the baptism in the Holy Spirit, a divine experience given to empower the ordinary believer for Christian service.

A second meeting was held in Highbury, London, in May 1924 with eighty people present, among them Donald Gee (1891–1966) and the Carter brothers, John (1893–1981) and Howard (1891–1971). As a consequence of an invitation, thirty-seven assemblies in England and one in Belfast joined immediately and thirty-eight from Wales and Monmouth joined in August, accepting the pattern that had been worked out at the Aston meeting. The AGGBI became a reality.

At the end of 1925, several senior members of the Pentecostal Missionary Union (PMU), a Pentecostal agency formed in 1909 in England, resigned. The remaining members, who were by now representatives of the AGGBI, took responsibility for the whole enterprise, and the two bodies merged. This provided AGGBI with a ready-made missionary work, which has continued to be active, first in specific fields in China and India where missionaries were supported, and latterly in a less organized way in thirty countries of the world, often by providing teaching and other support for indigenous churches.

The number of assemblies (or congregations) in Britain increased from 140 in 1927 to 200 in 1929. It has continued a steady growth, and by the mid-1950s there were more than 500. At the end of the century, there were around 700. The period of fastest growth occurred in the period 1926–1928, as a result of the ministry of the healing evangelist Stephen Jeffreys. The 1930s and 1950s were also periods of steady growth. Throughout the period when AGGBI was growing, British society was becoming more secular, and numerical decline was observable among the older denominations.

The war years (1939–1945) put a stop to campaigning but were marked by a more than usual sense of unity among ministers. By the 1960s, when the CHARISMATIC MOVEMENT burst on the scene, AGGBI was in need of “Another Springtime” (the title of a sermon preached at the General Conference by Donald Gee in 1960), and many attempts were made to secure this, mainly by reforming the intricate and increasingly complex constitution.

Tensions between reformers and conservatives in the 1970s led by the end of the 1980s to a simplified constitution, which appeared to encroach on local church autonomy, since it gave authority to regional and national superintendents. A policy of regionalization grouped congregations together into larger blocks and also allowed for the delegation of business matters to smaller subgroups of ministers. Efforts to combine reforms with an emphasis on creating new churches in Britain were partly successful, but it was difficult to accelerate growth at home while maintaining overseas efforts.

In the late 1990s, the general superintendency and the national leadership ensured that local projects and departmental structures, particularly in education, training, and church planning, were coordinated, and ambitious targets for growth were set. At the same time expansion of facilities permitted a full range of degree courses to be offered at Mathersey Hall, the denominational Bible College.

Address:

Assemblies of God in Great Britain and Ireland
c/o Mr. Basil D. Varnam, Gen. Admin.
106 Talbot St.
Nottingham NG1 5GH
United Kingdom
<http://www.aog.org.uk>

William K. Kay

Sources:

- Gee, Donald. Wind and Flame. Nottingham, UK: Assemblies of God Publishing House, 1967.
- Kay, William K. Inside Story. Mathersey, UK: Mathersey Hall Publishing, 1990.
- Kay, William K. Pentecostals in Britain. Carlisle, UK: Paternoster, 2000.
- Massey, R. “A Sound and Scriptural Union: An Examination of the Origins of the Assemblies of God in Great Britain and Ireland, 1920–25.” Ph.D. dissertation, University of Birmingham, 1987.

Assemblies of Yahweh

88

The Assemblies of Yahweh emerged in the 1980s as the largest of the groups of the Sacred Name movement, a faction within the larger Adventist movement in the United States. The Adventist movement had originated in the 1830s around the prediction of founder William Miller (1782–1849) that Christ would return in 1843/44. When Christ failed to appear, the movement split into three major segments, each of which spawned a number of individual churches. One faction took the name Church of God and was distinguished by its acceptance of sabbatarianism (worship on the Sabbath or Saturday rather than Sunday). In the 1930s, the idea that Yahweh, God's name in Hebrew (the original language of the Jewish Bible/Christian Old Testament), was significant and that it and Yahshua (rather than Jesus) should be used within the Church of God (Seventh Day) began to gain currency. The use of the Sacred Names was often aligned with the demand that the church revive the observance of the ancient Jewish festivals.

In 1937, Elder C. O. Dodd founded The Faith, a periodical supporting the cause of the Jewish festivals. By the early 1940s, he had begun to argue for the Sacred Name cause in the Faith and to print supportive material through the Faith Bible and Tract Society. Over the next generation a small number of Sacred Name congregations formed in various parts of the United States. Into this situation in the 1960s came Jacob O. Meyer, a former member of the CHURCH OF THE BRETHREN who had been converted to the Sacred Name cause and affiliated with a small congregation in Hamburg, Pennsylvania. In 1964, he moved to Idaho to become the assistant editor of the Sacred Name Herald, one of several periodicals serving the loosely organized movement.

In 1966, Meyer returned to Pennsylvania and began an independent radio ministry. By 1968, his ministry had grown to the point that a magazine, The Sacred Name Broadcaster, was launched, and in 1969, he founded the Assemblies of Yahweh. By the end of the century, some seventy congregations had been formed. There are affiliated assemblies in some fifty countries, with offices for the global work located in the United Kingdom, the Philippines, and Trinidad.

Apart from the use of the Sacred Names, the Assemblies of God have developed other unique beliefs. Meyer asserts that if one is to understand the Scriptures, the Old Testament must be allowed to supply the basis of faith. He denies the doctrine of the Trinity and believes that all the Jewish commandments must be followed (including the Jewish festivals) with the exception of the animal sacrifice ordinances. Women in the Assemblies dress modestly and cover their heads during worship services. Worship without using the words God and Jesus has made much of the traditional Christian literature unacceptable to the Assemblies, and to fill the vacuum, Meyer has led in compiling a Sacred Name hymnal and translation of the Bible.

The Assemblies of Yahweh sponsor the Obadiah School of the Bible, also in Bethel, Pennsylvania. It is headed by the directing elder (Meyer) and the ordained elders (all male). There are also a number of senior missionaries and missionaries (who may be female). The primary spread of the Assemblies has come in response to its expansive radio ministry, which is broadcast in some seventy countries.

Address:

Assemblies of Yahweh
P.O. Box C
Bethel, PA 19507
<http://www.assembliesofyahweh.com>

Sources:

Meyer, Jacob O. The Memorial Name—Yahweh. Bethel, PA: Assemblies of Yahweh, 1978.
Psalms, Anthems. Spiritual Songs for the Assemblies of Yahweh. Bethel, PA: Assemblies of Yahweh, n.d.
The Sacred Scriptures, Bethel Edition. Bethel, PA: Assemblies of Yahweh, 1981.

Associated Churches of Christ in New Zealand

The Associated Churches of Christ in New Zealand is one product of the Restoration movement, which emerged on the American frontier early in the nineteenth century. In the attempt to “restore” the true church of the apostolic era of the Christian movement, ministers such as Barton W. Stone (1772–1844) and Alexander Campbell (1788–1866) left their connection with the Presbyterians in an expressed desire to be known simply as Christians. It was their belief, in spite of the many denominations they saw around them, that the church was essentially one, and they desired to find an expression of that unity. The Restoration movement is generally dated from Barton Stone's ministry at Cane Ridge, Kentucky, in 1801. Campbell, and his father, Thomas Campbell (1763–1854), arrived in the United States later in the decade.

The Campbells began to advocate reform in the 1820s, during which time they were most closely associated with the Baptists, but by the 1830s, the Campbellites, as they were called, were a distinct body. The Stone and Campbell movements united in 1832. Through the rest of the century, the movement expanded, based on a conservative Free church theology (which resembled that of the Baptists in many ways). Like the Baptists, the movement rejected the idea of sacraments and practiced two ordinances, baptism and the Lord's Supper. However, it was identified by its desire to overcome denominational differences.

In the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries, the movement fell victim to a variety of differences, some related to American sectionalism, some to relative degrees of affluence. A key factor was the desire of some in the congregationally organized movement for more centralized control over various denominational ministries, including publications and missionary work. During the last decades of the nineteenth century, the congregations in the northern states moved toward a degree of centralization. Local churches also began to install church organs in their sanctuaries. Churches in the southern states (who came to be known as the CHURCHES OF CHRIST) tended to reject both tendencies and gradually broke fellowship with the northern churches, who came to be known as the CHRISTIAN CHURCH (DISCIPLES OF CHRIST). A third group, which rejected any centralization, but was open to some practices such as instrumental music in their congregations, became known as the CHRISTIAN CHURCHES AND CHURCHES OF CHRIST.

In 1840, the first Restoration church was founded in New Zealand, by Scottish minister Thomas Jackson, at Nelson. Its existence was noted in both American and British periodicals associated with the movement later in the decade. The spread of the church through the islands was somewhat dependent on migration from Great Britain. Eventually three conferences (Auckland, Middle District, and South Island) facilitated cooperative action among the congregations, and in 1901, for the first time, a national conference was convened. The national conference has been held annually since 1921 and has become the means of establishing a variety of cooperative ministries. As early as 1906, missionary work in what is now Zimbabwe was launched, and work was added later in Vanuatu. In 1927, a theological college was opened, though it has since closed.

As the new century began, the Churches of Christ reported forty congregations with several thousand members. It is a member of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES. It is also related to the larger community of the Churches of Christ, Christian Churches and Churches of Christ, and the Christian Church (Disciples of Christ), through the WORLD CONVENTION OF CHURCHES OF CHRIST.

Address:

Associated Churches of Christ in New Zealand
Auckland District Committee
c/o Ron O'Grady
P.O. Box 15-774
Auckland
New Zealand
<http://www.churchesofchrist.org.nz>

Sources:

Davidson, Allan K. Christianity in Aotearoa: A History of Church and Society in New Zealand. 2d ed. Wellington: Education for Ministry, 1997.

Van der Bent, Ans J., ed. Handbook/Member Churches/World Council of Churches. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 1985.

Association for Research and Enlightenment

The Association for Research and Enlightenment (ARE) was founded in 1931 as the vehicle for presenting the work and teaching of American seer Edgar Cayce (1877–1945) to the public. Edgar Cayce was one of the more notable psychics of the twentieth century, who during the 1920s developed a reputation for being able to diagnose the illness of those who came to him and prescribe for their condition. He later became known for his giving what were termed “life readings.” While in a trance state, he would offer observations on an individual’s previous embodiments on earth and how experiences from these past lives affected that individual’s present existence. These life readings were recorded by a stenographer and later transcribed. By the end of Cayce’s life, records of more than fourteen thousand readings had been compiled.

In 1948, three years after Cayce died, the Edgar Cayce Foundation was chartered as a sister organization. It now has formal ownership of the transcriptions of the readings, the related documentation, and the facilities in Virginia that house the ARE. The ARE is a membership organization that disseminates material derived from the readings, holds conferences related to the teachings, and promotes study groups in which people around the world may become familiar with and appropriate the teachings for their own life.

The ARE became more than a small organization of Cayce associates under the leadership of Cayce’s son Hugh Lynn Cayce (1907–1982), who oversaw the production of a number of commercially published books about his father and the perspective that emerged from the readings (more than three hundred such books having been written to date). The ARE became prominent as the New Age movement developed in the 1970s and in subsequent decades has become a global organization.

In 1997 ARE had 40,000 full members and served that many more who were attracted to the teachings. Centers are now operating in more than a dozen countries (including Poland, Germany, France, England, Sweden, and Japan), and study groups are found in more than 50 countries. Related facilities include Atlantic University (which offers degrees in transpersonal psychology), the Cayce-Reilly School of Massotherapy, the Health and Rejuvenation Research Center, and the Edgar Cayce Institute for Intuitive Studies. The ARE is presently led by Charles Thomas Cayce (b. 1942).

Like many groups in the Western Esoteric tradition, the ARE considers itself a spiritual but not a religious group, and notes that a number of people who are otherwise members of various religious communities participate in its activities.

Address:

Association for Research and Enlightenment
Atlantic Ave. at 67th St.
Box 595
Virginia Beach, VA 23451
<http://www.edgar cayce.org/>

Sources:

- Bro, Harmon Hartzell. A Seer out of Season: The Life of Edgar Cayce. New York: New American Library, 1989.
- Cayce, Hugh Lynn, ed. The Edgar Cayce Reader. 2 vols. New York: Bantam Books, 1982.
- Smith, Robert A. Hugh Lynn Cayce: About My Father's Business. Norfolk, VA: Donning Company, 1988.
- Sugue, Thomas. The Story of Edgar Cayce. New York: Dell Publishing Company, 1945.

Association of German Mennonite Congregations

The Mennonite movement in Germany originated out of the Anabaptist movement that emerged in southern Germany and German-speaking Switzerland during the early years of the Protestant Reformation. The most tragic incidents in Anabaptist history occurred in Germany, where the millennial movements led by Thomas Müntzer at Mühlhausen (1524) and then Jan Matthys of Leiden at Münster (1534–1535) both turned into open warfare. These incidents increased the pressure on the adherents, who had already been feeling the ire of both Protestants and Roman Catholics on religious grounds. The Anabaptists rejected infant baptism and with it the idea of a general population that was Christian, whose members led their lives in a Christian state led by Christian rulers. They sought a church separate from state authority, one composed only of those who had experienced regenerating faith and chose freely to join the fellowship and live under its discipline.

In Holland, Menno Simons (1492–1559) became the spokesperson of the movement and developed its theology, distinguishing it from the theology of the Protestants and Catholics on the one hand and that of the radical Münsterites on the other. He reformed the movement and spearheaded its spread, especially into northwestern Germany. Emden was an early Mennonite center, and strong communities emerged at Hamburg and Lübeck. As early as 1623, Duke Friedrich invited them to settle in Friedrichstadt. They also later found refuge on the estates of other sympathetic noble families. They developed in strength in the palatinate in southern Germany after 1664, where the elector Karl Ludwig issued a letter of toleration. While successfully finding refuge in various places, the Mennonites always lived under the threat that the current ruler of the territory in which they resided might change his opinion—or that a new ruler might not be as tolerant. When a more tolerant situation was discovered, they frequently migrated.

The Mennonites were especially influenced by the Pietist movement, which originated in the late seventeenth century. The Pietists shared an emphasis on personal religion and faith that resonated with Mennonite emphases. While helping to revive some Mennonite congregations, Pietism also led to many rejoining the established church.

The Mennonite emphasis on peace and their refusal of military service led to conflict with Fridrich Wilhelm (1620–1688) and thus created an openness in the 1760s to the invitation given by Catherine the Great of Russia (r. 1762–1796) to German Mennonites to relocate to Russia. Between 1762 and 1772, some hundred Mennonite colonies were founded in Russia, further depleting the German community. Already, in the 1680s, the first moves of European Mennonites to Pennsylvania (then a British colony) had begun. The Palatinate Mennonites joined the move in the first decade of the eighteenth century. In the next century, the thrust of Mennonite history was transferred from Europe to North America.

Through the nineteenth century, the German Mennonite movement developed as two separate communities, a more urbanized community in the northwest and a more rural community in the south. Education became an issue. Although some leaders were trained in the Mennonite seminary in Holland, most attended the Pietist and, in the nineteenth century, Baptist schools in Germany. A large Mennonite boarding school, the Weierhof, developed in the palatinate. It produced the most important Mennonite leader of the early twentieth century, Christian Neff (d. 1946), a pioneer advocate of Mennonite unity. During his half century of leadership, the German Mennonite community experienced a revival. They supported world missions through the Mennonite Missionary Association, a Dutch sending agency. They developed a relief agency to assist Mennonites trapped in the Soviet Union (1924), and they opened a new Bible study center at Karlsruhe.

Many German Mennonites died during World War II. Others who originally lived east of the Oder-Neisse Line were displaced westward. They recovered with assistance from North America and by the 1960s appeared to have revived. In 1952, the European Mennonite Evangelism Committee was established as a joint effort by German, Swiss, French, and Dutch Mennonites; it continued the efforts of the Mennonite Missionary Association established by the Dutch church in the previous century. Through the committee, work was supported in Indonesia and Africa.

There are approximately twenty thousand members. The association is a member of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES and cooperates with the MENNONITE WORLD CONFERENCE.

(It should also be noted that in Germany, there are also several other smaller Mennonite bodies. Then in the 1990s, the German Mennonite community was suddenly swelled by the addition of some 77,000 Mennonites who moved from the Volga Region in Russia to Germany. Some joined the several older groups and others formed new groups reflective of the various divisions that had emerged in Russia since the eighteenth century.)

Address:

Association of German Mennonite Congregations
Ökumenisches Institut
Plankengasse 1, D-69117
Heidelberg
Germany

Martin Baumann

Sources:

Dyck, Cornelius J. An Introduction to Mennonite History.
Scottsdale, PA: Herald Press, 1967.
The Mennonite Encyclopedia. 5 vols. Scottsdale, PA: Herald Press, 1955–1959.
Mennonite World Handbook: Mennonites in Global Mission. Carol Stream, IL: Mennonite World Council, 1990.

Atheism

Atheism (literally, “without theism”) refers to a spectrum of belief systems that do not include a belief in a deity. In the modern West, dominated by Christian theism, atheism has often been defined in relation to Christianity as “denial” of belief in God. While on a practical level, atheism is frequently in debate with theistic beliefs and often contrasted with them, atheists contend that atheisms are belief systems that have been constructed apart from any affirmation of God or a deity. Atheisms do not in and of themselves deny God. Rather they find no rationale for such an additional affirmation. Many atheists find no meaning in the term God.

There have been thinkers throughout history who have proposed ways of thinking about the world that were nontheistic, and while atheism is often seen as a nonreligious way of viewing the world, several prominent religious systems (notably Jainism and Theravada Buddhism) are also atheistic. Most modern Western atheists trace their beliefs to Baron d’Holbach (1723–1789) who authored a series of works, most published anonymously, that denounced the Roman Catholic Church. In 1772, the first openly atheist book, written by him, The System of Nature, appeared. His books denounced what he saw as the erroneous systems of the past and advocated a new order in which a nature-based ethical system would be operative.

In the nineteenth century, several atheist systems gained widespread support and became the basis of a developing organizational life. Most widely held was Marxism, as developed by Karl Marx (1818–1883), Friederich Engels (1820–1895), and their followers. Marxist thought, in its several variations, has offered a complete worldview without God that is basically antireligious. Marx attacked religion for defending oppressive socioeconomic systems and drugging the masses of humanity into accepting their exploited state. No form of atheist thinking has been so successful in perpetuating itself as has Marxism, which rose to a position of dominance in the Soviet Union, the countries of eastern Europe, and many Third World nations through much of the twentieth century, and still is the controlling philosophy in the People’s Republic of China. Marxism also continues to be espoused by some Western intellectuals, though its support in academia has measurably declined since the dissolution of the Soviet Union at the end of the 1980s.

In its rise to political dominance, Marxism has developed an extremely poor record in human rights, and many Western atheists have attempted to separate themselves from it. They instead follow a lineage of atheists that includes such notable writers as Revolutionary philosopher Thomas Paine, poet Percy Shelley, popular lecturer Robert G. Ingersoll, nineteenth-century FREETHOUGHT movement leader Robert Bradlaugh of the National Secular Society (in Great Britain), and a spectrum of twentieth-century thinkers and organizations. These organizations and individuals (many of whom have edited periodicals) have been known as defenders of free speech and advocates of a variety of liberal political causes, including those related to sexual education and birth control. In the twentieth century prominent atheist spokespersons included Joseph Lewis (1889–1968) of Freethinkers of America; Charles Lee Smith (1887–1964) of the American Association for the Advancement of Atheism; and R. M. Bennett, editor of the Truth Seeker. A variety of intellectuals are identified with atheism, including Ludwig Feuerbach, Auguste Comte, Bertrand Russell, Clarence Darrow, and John Dewey. Contemporary atheists have attempted, with some success, to identify atheism as the chosen worldview of the majority of contemporary academicians, especially scientists.

Since World War II, non-Marxist atheism has appeared under a variety of guises, including HUMANISM (a nontheistic system that emphasizes human values and ethics), secularism (which offers a worldview apart from any reference to the sacred), and rationalism (emphasizing the essential role of reason in establishing a worldview). Humanism has developed both as a religious system and a nonreligious alternative to religion. Atheism as an organized alternative to religion received a significant boost from Madalyn Murray O’Hair (1919–1995) who in 1963 organized AMERICAN ATHEISTS, one of the largest atheist organizations ever created. Her acerbic personality eventually led to the organization’s splintering, and her own life was ended in 1995 when she, along with her son and granddaughter, was murdered. However, American Atheists had a definite impact in raising the profile of atheism within American culture.

Aum Shinrikyō

Although North American atheist groups are among the best organized in the world, other nonreligious and atheist groups, not associated with the spread of Marxism, have appeared in other countries, including the Atheist Foundation of Australia, the Mexican Ethical Rationalist Association, the Finnish Freethought Union, the Union Rationaliste (France), the International League of Non-Religious and Atheists (Germany), the Deutscher Freidenker Bund (Germany), the Union degli Atei e degli Agnostici Razionalisti (Italy), the Portuguese Freethought Association, the Forbundet for Religionfrihet, and the World Union of Freethinkers (Belgium). Some of these groups are members of the INTERNATIONAL HUMANIST AND ETHICAL UNION.

Though still a minority belief system, atheism has had a significant impact on the intellectual climate in the twentieth century and is especially important in the political arena in many countries such as France and the former Communist countries of Europe. Contemporary atheists have identified themselves with such causes as the separation of religion and the state, the fight against prescientific and pseudoscientific thinking, and the promotion of ethical systems apart from religious foundations.

Martin Baumann

Sources:

- Bradlaugh, Charles. A Plea for Atheism. London: Freethought Publishing Co., 1864.
- Johnson, B. C. The Atheist Debater's Handbook. Buffalo, NY: Prometheus Books, 1982.
- O'Hair, Madalyn Murray. What on Earth Is an Atheist? Austin, TX: American Atheist Press, 1970.
- Stein, Gordon, ed. An Anthology of Atheism and Rationalism. Buffalo, NY: Prometheus Books, 1980.

Aum Shinrikyō/Aleph

Aum Shinrikyō is a Japanese new religion founded by the partially blind, charismatic Asahara Shōkō (b. 1955). Originating in 1984 as a yoga and meditation group, it developed millennial orientations and taught that a final confrontation between good and evil would occur around the end of the twentieth century. Asahara claimed his sacred mission was to lead the forces of good in this final encounter, which would destroy the corrupt material world and bring about a new spiritual realm on earth.

Aum taught that humans were weighed down by negative karma, but that this could be eradicated through religious austerities. If they did eradicate it, they could attain enlightenment and rebirth in higher realms; if not, they would be reborn in lower realms. Asahara was regarded as an enlightened guru whose words expressed supreme truth and to whom followers had to show absolute obedience. Disciples were expected to perform arduous ascetic tasks, and those who succeeded were granted holy names and special ranks in the movement, which became intensely hierarchical.

Aum attracted a highly dedicated but limited following among young Japanese who renounced the world and left their families to join its commune at Kamikuishiki in Yamanashi Prefecture (about two hours outside of Tokyo), and follow Asahara. It also aroused opposition from the families of devotees, who objected to their offspring severing all familial ties in this way, and from the media, which portrayed the disciples' devotion to their leader in a negative light. A campaign was organized against Aum, to which the movement reacted with hostility and intolerance, branding all who opposed it as enemies of the truth who were unworthy of salvation. Such aggressive responses provoked further opposition and increasingly led Aum into conflict with the outside world—a conflict that took on, in Asahara's mind, the nature of a final confrontation between good and evil, in which he declared that anyone who opposed Aum was an enemy of the truth who deserved to be punished with death.

Ultimately these doctrines came to legitimize killing others in the name of truth and in order to further Aum's mission on earth. This turn to violence was spurred by widespread public rejection of Aum in Japan, by internal fragmentation and tensions, and by its failure to expand overseas; apart from a brief period of success in Russia, it failed to gain a secure footing outside of Japan. The violence was also fuelled by Asahara's increasing paranoia, as he came to regard every sign of opposition to Aum as evidence of a conspiracy against the movement. Eventually he came to envision his movement as under siege from a world conspiracy that included the U.S. and Japanese governments and others such as the Jews and the Freemasons, who planned to destroy him and Aum so as to enable the forces of evil to triumph.

Proclaiming that Aum had to fight against such evil, that the world merited punishment for its sins, and that only devout Aum followers were worthy of salvation, Asahara set the movement on a collision course with society. From the early 1990s, Aum began to manufacture biological and chemical weapons to fight against its enemies and to strike out at individual opponents and the wider public. This culminated in its March 1995 nerve-gas attack on the Tokyo subway, which killed twelve and injured thousands of commuters. This attack was followed by massive police intervention, the arrests of most of Aum's hierarchy, and numerous trials in which senior figures in the movement have been charged with murders and other crimes. As of 2001, several had been sentenced to death, while Asahara remained on trial for his life.

The movement continues to exist, however, although it has severed formal ties with Asahara and has changed its name to Aleph in order to emphasize this severing. It retains almost a thousand followers (down from around ten thousand at its peak), who continue to believe that the world is evil and that the only way to liberation is through meditation and renunciation. They also continue to venerate Asahara as the spiritual master who taught them the way of liberation. Aleph's continuity of belief with Aum has led to a continuation of suspicion in Japan. It is thus kept under very close scrutiny at all times by the authorities, who have passed laws especially for this purpose.

Subway passengers affected by nerve gas released in central Tokyo subways by Aum Shinrikyō are carried into St. Luke's Hospital, March 20, 1995. (AP/Wide World Photos)

Address:

http://www.aleph.to/index_e.html

Ian Reader

Sources:

Asahara, Shoko. Supreme Initiation: An Empirical Spiritual Science for the Supreme Truth. New York: AUM USA, 1988.

—. The Teachings of the Truth. 3 vols. Shizuoka, Japan: Aum Publishing Co., 1992.

Lifton, Robert Jay. Destroying the World to Save It: Aum Shinrikyō, Apocalyptic Violence, and the New Global Terrorism. New York: Metropolitan Books, 1999.

Reader, Ian. Religious Violence in Contemporary Japan. Richmond, UK, and Honolulu: Curzon Press and University of Hawai'i Press, 2000.

Shimazono, Susumu. "In the Wake of Aum: The Formation and Transformation of a Universe of Belief." Japanese Journal of Religious Studies 22, 3–4 (1995): 343–380.

Watanabe, Manabu. "Reactions to the Aum Affair: The Rise of the Anti-Cult Movement in Japan." Bulletin of the Nanzan Institute for Religion and Culture 21 (1997): 32–48.

Aumist Religion

The Aumist religion is a relatively new faith community, founded in 1969 by Gilbert Bourdin (1923–1998), best known as His Holiness Lord Hamsah Manarah. It considers itself a Religion of Unity, representing a synthesis of all the religions and spiritual movements of the planet, and became well known in the late 1990s due to its conflicts with the French government.

Bourdin was born into a traditional Roman Catholic family, but was attracted by mysticism and occult sciences when he was young. He investigated a wide spectrum of Western initiatory paths (kabbalah, alchemy) and studied the "philosophical" principles of FREEMASONRY, Rosicrucianism and Martinism. In India, he stayed with the renowned yogi Swami Sivananda (1887–1963), founder of the DIVINE LIFE SOCIETY, from whom he received the initiation into the life of a sannyasi, on February 13, 1961, at Rishikesh. Sivananda gave Bourdin the name Hamasananda Sarasvati.

During his numerous trips, Lord Hamsah Manarah was also initiated into Jainism, Sufism, various branches of Hinduism and Buddhism, and several African religions. The titles of Acharya and Mahacharya (a teacher who preaches what he has himself accomplished) were given to him in stages by Jainist and Hindu masters. He also received the title of Adinath, First Master or patriarch, with the implication that he is a divine incarnation.

After his long initiatory pilgrimage, which including the visitation of many of the world's holy sites, in 1969 Lord Hamsah Manarah settled on a mountain over the small village of Castellane in the Alps of Haute-Provence, France. This place corresponded to one he had seen in a dream. As news of his presence spread, many journeyed to meet him. As some who were attracted to him decided to stay on the mountain, an ashram emerged, and plans for a city began to be projected. Included in the city were temples and statues from different religions, including the largest Buddha in Europe (21 meters), a giant figure of Christ (17 meters), and one known as the Cosmoplanetary Messiah (33 meters). In 1990, Lord Hamsah Manarah revealed to the world that he was the Cosmoplanetary Messiah, that is the Messiah for whom all the traditions wait.

Lord Hamsah Manarah devoted almost two decades of his life to leadership of the community and the creation of Aumism, writing some twenty-two books. In his final years, however, he was caught up in problems with the French government, which, in the wake of the deaths of members of the ORDER OF THE SOLAR TEMPLE in 1994, began a crusade against various minority religions in the country. The Aumist religion was singled out for special attention, and efforts were made to destroy the city. Following the leader's death in 1998, a controversy ensued over the final resting place of his body. In September 2001, French authorities came to Mandarom and destroyed the statue of Lord Hamsah Manarah. They continue efforts to have the remaining sacred statues demolished and the community scattered.

Aumism sees itself as the synthesis of all the religions and spiritual movements of the planet. Aumists pray equally to Buddha, Allah, Christ, and Mother Nature. The Aumist also feels a harmonious relationship with all people, all races, all classes, and all traditions, and the religion does not demand that members give up their prior faiths in order to become Aumist (though acknowledging Lord Hamash Manarah and his teachings contradicts the teachings of many religions).

The name Aumism is derived from the sound "om," considered the root of all the sacred sounds found in every tradition (Amen, Amin, and so on). According to Aumists, the benefits from repeating "om" are vast. Aumists also repeat various other mantras (words of power) for collective and individual ascent.

Aumists believe in reincarnation according to the Law of the Evolution of the Souls. A vegetarian diet is recommended, although it is not demanded. Aumism is opposed to drugs, suicide, and sexual deviations (i.e., polygamy and homosexuality).

The Aumist religion has its headquarters at the Holy City of Mandarom Shambhasalem, Haute-Provence, France, where some fifty monks and nuns reside. The movement has been formally organized into a church, and priests, priestesses, and bishops designated. The community expects Lord Hamash Manarah to reincarnate, and they believe that they will be able to recognize him in much the same manner that Tibetans recognize the next incarnation of a lama. In the meantime, leadership has passed to a group of high priests. Priests and priestesses oversee five sacraments: baptism, confirmation, renovation, marriage, and transition.

One becomes an Aumist through baptism, that is, the transmission of the sound om. Those who pursue their spiritual path within the movement may associate with the Initiatory Order of Triumphant Vajra and become Knights. The Initiatory Order is structured in twenty-two degrees, with each degree corresponding to a particular spiritual journey of prayer and study. Knights may also seek the priesthood. Both men and women, married and unmarried, may become priests. Married priests belong to the outside branch. Unmarried priests may join the renunciate monastic branch and live in the Holy City.

Centroms, as places for prayer are called, serve as local centers for Aumists. Centroms are located across France (about a hundred), in most European countries, and in primarily French-speaking lands in Africa, Oceania, the Indian Ocean, and Canada. In Canada, where the Aumist religion has a considerable following, an ashram has been established. Aumists from around the world come to the Holy City for various events and seminars. There are approximately a thousand Knights and thousands of Aumists in the world.

Address:

Aumisme
Cité Sainte de Mandarom
La Baume 04120
Castellane
France
<http://www.aumisme.org> (in French)

James R. Lewis

Source:

Manarah, S. Hamsah. Aumism: The Doctrine of the Golden Age. Castellane, France: Éditions du Mandarom, 1999.

Australia

The continent of Australia has been inhabited at least 50,000 years. At some undetermined point the Aboriginal people emerged as a distinctive ethnic grouping; they developed more than 260 languages, a variety of cultures, and a variety of related religious perspectives. They were seminomadic people whose existence was tied to the land that they revered. ABORIGINAL RELIGIONS included a series of stories related to the creation of the world out of preexisting substances by the "Ancestors." They were also marked by a set of rituals that integrated them into the natural world as the seasons changed and the process of obtaining food and shelter continued.

Though the Spanish first sighted Australia in 1606, European settlement did not begin until 1788, when the first group of British colonists arrived, most as prisoners. Their arrival at Botany Bay (Sydney) serves to divide Australian history into two eras. A period of aggressive settlement of particularly the southeastern coast followed. Efforts to establish European hegemony cost the Aboriginal people an estimated 80 percent of their population. More prisoners were sent, the largest number coming in 1830, when some fifty-eight thousand arrived. No additional prisoners were sent after 1840. Further periods of population expansion followed gold discoveries in 1851 and 1892. Though most settlers were of European background, measurable numbers came from Italy, Greece, Germany, the Netherlands, and the southern Balkans.

Six British colonies were established on the continent. In 1901, they were reorganized as autonomous states (including Tasmania), associated together as the independent Commonwealth of Australia. Women were granted the vote the following year. Areas remaining outside the commonwealth were added in 1911.

The Aboriginal population suffered from the attempts of Europeans to claim ownership of the land. Those who survived this process of displacement had their culture and way of life disrupted. Although Aboriginal life and religion survives, it does so primarily in the less hospitable rural areas away from the more populated coasts and river valleys.

Christianity was introduced to Australia by CHURCH OF ENGLAND ministers serving as chaplains of the original penal colony. Neither the prisoners nor the soldiers set to guard them were particularly responsive to the church's

Status of religions in Australia, 2000-2050

Followers	2000		2025	2050
	total	% rate
Christians	14,973,000	79.3 0.94	17,364,000	17,669,000
Roman Catholics	5,400,000	28.6 1.43	6,800,000	7,800,000
Anglicans	4,060,000	21.5 0.12	4,200,000	4,250,000
Protestants	2,630,000	13.9 0.59	3,000,000	3,100,000
Nonreligious	2,745,000	14.5 1.42	4,025,000	5,808,000
Atheists	329,000	1.7 1.26	454,000	506,000
Buddhists	242,000	1.3 5.62	380,000	480,000
Muslims	229,000	1.2 3.67	400,000	700,000
Jews	91,100	0.5 0.93	105,000	110,000
Hindus	60,200	0.3 2.73	91,000	120,000
Neoreligionists	54,100	0.3 10.46	60,000	80,000
Ethnoreligionists	46,600	0.3 2.91	52,000	55,000
Baha'is	33,500	0.2 2.94	60,000	100,000
Chinese folk-religionists	26,100	0.1 0.84	33,000	38,000
Confucianists	23,200	0.1 1.01	30,000	33,000
Sikhs	12,500	0.1 4.53	20,000	32,500
Spiritists	5,700	0.0 0.47	7,000	8,500
Zoroastrians	1,400	0.0 3.18	2,000	3,000
other religionists	7,100	0.0 0.11	7,500	9,000
Total population	18,880,000	100.0 1.12	23,091,000	25,752,000

ministrations. The Reverend Samuel Marsden oversaw the church's development beginning in 1793. His hegemony extended to Tasmania and other British settlements in the South Pacific. In 1823, Australia was placed within the geographically impossible Diocese of Calcutta, and it was not until 1832 that a bishop arrived in Australia. Over the next decade five dioceses were carved out.

The Anglican Church developed sporadically as British settlement evolved and the colony prospered. As early as 1826, a mission among the Aboriginal people was launched, though its progress was slow. The church's attempts to build settled Christian congregations and communities clashed with the Aboriginal nomadic life.

On January 1, 1962, the church became autonomous as the Church of England in Australia, assuming its present name, ANGLICAN CHURCH OF AUSTRALIA, in 1981. Once claiming more than half of the population as members, the church has declined as a percentage of the population through the twentieth century. In the 1980s, it was replaced by the ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH as the largest religious group in the country.

Among the first settlers were Irish political prisoners, who formed the core from which the Roman Catholic Church in Australia grew. Immigrants from predominantly Catholic countries led to further expansion, and in the twentieth century a number of Australians converted to the church. Irish priests arrived in 1803 and have dominated the clergy over the years. The first bishop was consecrated in 1834, and the hierarchy expanded nationally in the 1840s.

Protestantism began with Presbyterian settlers, who built an initial church in 1809. The first Baptist church followed in 1813, but membership growth was extremely slow during their first generation. METHODISM also emerged as a visible community in the second decade of the century, and in 1815, the first minister arrived from England to travel among them. Over the century the Methodists emerged as the second largest group in the colony.

Through the nineteenth century a variety of British and American groups established work, including the LONDON MISSIONARY SOCIETY, THE SALVATION ARMY, the Churches of Christ (associated with the American group known as the CHRISTIAN CHURCH [DISCIPLES OF CHRIST]), the Lutherans, and the SEVENTH-DAY ADVENTIST CHURCH. In 1977, the Congregationalists (resulting from the London Missionary Society's work), the Methodists, and the majority of the Presbyterians united to form the UNITING CHURCH IN AUSTRALIA, the third largest groups in the country. Some 30 percent of the Presbyterians formed as the PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH OF AUSTRALIA (CONTINUING).

Through the twentieth century, groups representing the entire spectrum of Christianity emerged in Australia. Greek immigrants created a large Orthodox community under the jurisdiction of the ECUMENICAL PATRIARCHATE/PATRIARCHATE OF CONSTANTINOPLE, with an archbishop in Sydney. PENTECOSTALISM grew steadily over the century, though membership is scattered among a number of both local and imported groups. Several new churches, such as the Christian Life Churches International and the CHRISTIAN OUTREACH CENTRE, have come on strong as a result of the late-twentieth-century CHARISMATIC MOVEMENT.

The Jewish presence in Australia became visible in 1817, when a small group formed a burial society (it being common for a cemetery to be the first communal structure created by a newly established Jewish community). A congregation was founded in Sydney in 1828 and an initial synagogue opened in 1844. Meanwhile, worshipping communities emerged in Melbourne, Ballarat, Geelong, and Adelaide. By the beginning of the twentieth century, Jews had spread across the continent, and many had risen to positions of prominence in the business and government community.

Today there are more than ninety thousand Jews in Australia, more than half of whom reside in Melbourne. Community affairs are cared for by the Executive Council of Australian Jewry, also headquartered in Melbourne. The majority of religious Jews can be found in the Ashkenazi and Sephardic Orthodox synagogues, though there are various forms of REFORM JUDAISM, united by the Australian Federation for Progressive Judaism.

BUDDHISM grew during the twentieth century, primarily by the arrival of tens of thousands of immigrants from China, Thailand, Tibet, and Japan. Since World War II, a strong Western Buddhist community has emerged, and a variety of Buddhist ecumenical structures now attempt to bridge the language and cultural barriers that separate the different Buddhist groups. The Buddhist Council of New South Wales carries an extensive directory of Buddhist centers on its Internet site at <http://www.buddhistcouncil.org/>. In 2001, the United Vietnamese Buddhist Congregation in Australia hosted the meeting of the WORLD BUDDHIST SANGHA COUNCIL's international conference.

The first Muslims in Australia came from Afghanistan in the 1860s, and by the census of 1911, there were some four thousand residing in Australia. The community declined through the 1930s but then grew slowly through the middle of the century. It has more than doubled since 1971, primarily from immigration, and now numbers in excess of two hundred thousand. Muslims form a very diverse community, coming from all parts of the Muslim world, including Bosnia and Africa. The majority of Muslims are united in the Australian Federation of Islamic Societies. While the great majority of Muslims are mainstream Sunnis and Shites, there is a small group attached to the AHMADIYYA MOVEMENT IN ISLAM and groups of DRUZE in Adelaide and Sydney. There is a small following of the NAQSH-BANDIYA SUFI ORDER and an equally small number of Westerners associated with the Australian center for SUFISM in Sydney.

The religions of the Indian subcontinent (Sikhism, Hinduism, JAINISM) also came to Australia in the nineteenth century, but not in great numbers. Growth was limited by immigration restrictions through much of the twentieth century. During the last decades of the twentieth century, however, tens of thousands arrived from India and Sri Lanka. The 1991 census reported more than forty thousand Hindus, most from India, but an almost equal number arriving from Fiji (see FIJI ISLANDS, HINDU COMMUNITY OF THE).

Mingled with the Hindu immigrants were a variety of Indian spiritual teachers (gurus), most of whom simply visited Australia as part of their work in spreading their movements internationally and a few of whom resided in Australia. At the same time, Australian spiritual seekers traveled to India in search of spiritual enlightenment. Possibly the most famous of these is John Mumford, who as Swami Anandakipila has become a major force in spreading the tantric teachings of the INTERNATIONAL YOGA FELLOWSHIP MOVEMENT among Westerners.

As an English-speaking country, Australia has been the home of Western Esoteric groups since the mid-nineteenth century. SPIRITUALISM thrived, and both the THEOSOPHICAL SOCIETY and the LIBERAL CATHOLIC CHURCH had major centers in the cities. In the last half of the twentieth century, Australia became the home to the same spectrum of esoteric, occult, Wiccan, and NEW AGE MOVEMENT groups that are now found across North America and Europe. A variety of Japanese new religions also found an initial base in the country's Japanese community.

Sources:

- Breward, I. A History of the Australian Churches. St. Leonards, Australia: Allen and Unwin, 1993.
- Coucher, P. Buddhism in Australia, 1848–1988. Sydney: New South Wales University Press, 1988.
- Drury, Nevill, and Gregory Tillett. Other Temples, Other Gods: The Occult in Australia. Sydney: Hodder and Stoughton, 1982.
- Gillman, I. Many Faiths, One Nation: A Guide to the Major Faiths and Denominations in Australia. Sydney: Collins, 1988.
- Humphries, R. A., and R. S. Ward, eds. Religious Bodies in Australia: A Comprehensive Guide. Wantirna, Australia: New Melbourne Press, 1995.
- Piggin, S. Evangelical Christianity in Australia: Spirit, Word, and World. New York: Oxford University Press, 1996.

Austria

During the last centuries of the pre-Christian era Austria was mainly inhabited by Celtic tribes who venerated Celtic gods, an observation deduced from theophoric elements in personal names and also from epigraphical sources. Then in 15 and 9 B.C.E., the main areas of Austria became the provinces Noricum and Pannonia of the Roman Empire,

Status of religions in Austria, 2000-2050

Followers	2000		2025	2050
	total	% rate
Christians	7,370,000	89.8 0.52	7,124,000	5,645,000
Roman Catholics	6,200,000	75.5 0.33	6,156,000	5,100,000
Protestants	414,000	5.0 -0.15	400,000	355,000
Orthodox	155,000	1.9 3.03	190,000	215,000
Nonreligious	562,000	6.8 1.38	700,000	900,000
Muslims	183,000	2.2 2.75	240,000	400,000
Atheists	69,300	0.8 1.45	85,000	95,000
Jews	8,600	0.1 -0.45	8,000	8,000
Buddhists	5,200	0.1 13.20	9,000	12,500
Baha'is	3,800	0.1 4.22	5,000	8,400
Hindus	2,500	0.0 5.08	5,000	9,000
Chinese folk-religionists	1,300	0.0 8.60	2,200	3,500
Neoreligionists	920	0.0 2.77	1,500	2,500
Sikhs	410	0.0 7.47	1,000	2,000
Confucianists	380	0.0 20.43	600	800
Ethnoreligionists	40	0.0 44.97	70	100
other religionists	3,500	0.0 1.04	5,000	7,500
Total population	8,211,000	100.0 0.64	8,186,000	7,094,000

thus bringing not only Roman gods to Austria, but also the gods of various Eastern religions, which then flourished within the Roman Empire. The more famous deities, Mithras, Jupiter Dolichenus, and Isis, were partly identified with local Celtic gods. During the fourth century C.E., Christianity came to Austria, mainly via Aquileia in Italy; the most famous missionary in these early times was Severin (d. 487). His biography, written by his disciple Eugeippius, details the spreading of Christianity along the river Danube and to the Alps and also reports on the decline of social structures due to the migration of nations that had brought non-Christian Slav people to the southern and eastern parts of the Alps, people who began to replace the Celtic and Roman population. Some Germanic tribes, who were Arians, also lived in the area of modern Austria. In the next century Bavarians migrated to the north of Austria.

In 696, Rupert of Worms founded the Diocese of Salzburg, which became the starting point for the organization of the Catholic Church in Austria. Bishop Virgilius of Salzburg (745–784), one of Rupert's successors, came from Ireland as one among the Irish and Scottish monks and missionaries who then were active in Austria. Through the beginning of the tenth century, Christianity spread and developed a stable organization, but migrating Avars and Hungarians gave this growth a setback, which lasted until the early years of the regency of the counts of Babenberg (976–1246). Beginning in the eleventh century, the restoration of Christianity led to the founding of parishes all over Austria and to the creation of new dioceses at Gurk (1072) and Seckau (1218). At the same time monastic life was reorganized, and a number of new monasteries were founded (primarily by Augustinians, Benedictines, and Cistercians). Thus during the eleventh, twelfth, and thirteenth centuries Christianity at last became the dominant religion all over Austria, professed by all except the Jews, whose historical beginnings in Austria date to the early tenth century. The Jewish community centered on Vienna. During the thirteenth century, Jews lived throughout the city, though the more concentrated Jewish community was renowned in middle Europe until the Jews were expelled from (or suffered martyrdom in) Vienna in 1420/1421.

From the beginning of the reign of the Hapsburg dynasty (1276–1918), Austria's rulers involved themselves in Catholic concerns; they led in the founding of the faculty of theology at the University of Vienna in 1365 and in establishing Vienna as the center of a new diocese in 1468. At the end of the Middle Ages, such state-church connections were not only of benefit to the ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH. From the early years of the Protestant Reformation we find members of the EVANGELICAL CHURCH OF THE AUGSBURG AND HELVETIC CONFESSIONS IN AUSTRIA who could openly practice their religion, though their protected status ended in 1620 with the coming of the Counter-Reformation, led by the Society of Jesus (the JESUITS) and the Capuchins. The strengthening of the Catholic Church also created a new cultural impact with the baroque period, which can only be understood as a result of a widespread feeling of triumph after the Thirty Years' War (1618–1648) and the defeat of the Turkish Muslims before the walls of Vienna (1683). The baroque era placed a strong Catholic stamp on Austrian history for more than a century and a half.

This Catholic dominance was somewhat affected during the later eighteenth century when the emperor Joseph II dissolved a number of the Catholic monasteries not directly engaged in social or educational activities and also extended toleration to the Evangelical and Orthodox churches; Byzantine Orthodox Christians had settled in Austria during the course of the eighteenth century as merchants. Also the Jews now found themselves in a better situation again, and the revived Jewish community of Vienna became famous as a center for printing Hebrew books. In the early nineteenth century, (the haskalah movement) the Jewish Enlightenment prospered in Vienna.

The proliferation of Christian denominations and sects in Austria can be traced to the second half of the nineteenth century. In 1867, religious freedom was granted to all inhabitants by the Fundamental Law of the State, and in 1874, another law opened the possibility for religious communities to obtain official acknowledgement by the state. The Roman Catholic Church, the Evangelical Church, and the Jewish community were the first three religions to attain this status, with the OLD CATHOLIC CHURCH OF AUSTRIA following in 1877. ISLAM was acknowledged in 1912 as a result of the Muslim community in Herzegovina then being part of the Austrian monarchy. The Roman Catholic Church remained the dominant religion, although after World War I, with the end of the Austrian monarchy, the new government established a policy of separating state and church. In 1933, the Republic of Austria ratified a concordat with the Holy See.

The Nazi occupation and World War II brought significant change to Austria. In the years following the war, the Catholic Church, which presently reports 6 million members, holds the allegiance of only 75 percent of the total population, a significant decline since 1945, when more the 90 percent of the Austrian population were Catholics. The Jewish community, which had 180,000 members in 1938, was decimated by the Nazi terror, and as the new century begins only some 8,000 Jewish people reside in Austria. Since the 1960s, a growing number of Muslim people have migrated to Austria, in the early years mainly as guest workers from Turkey and Yugoslavia. The 1980s saw refugees from Iran and various Arabic countries settled in Austria, and in the 1990s, Bosnian Muslims sought shelter in Austria. To a minor degree native Austrians have also converted to Islam, so that presently there are about 400,000 Muslims living in Austria.

In 1983, Austrian Buddhism also became acknowledged as an official religion by the state. The Buddhist community is estimated to include approximately 12,000 with a Western and 5,000 with an Asian ethnic background. The Catholic Bishops' Conference has taken the lead in interfaith dialogues and has founded and financed an institution to pursue dialogue with the non-Christian religions in Austria. Protestant Christian churches initiated a new phase of ecumenical activity in 1958 with the formation of the Ecumenical Council of Churches in Austria; the Roman Catholic Church has freely cooperated in ecumenical endeavors since the Second Vatican Council (1962–1965). An additional important ecumenical activity began in 1964 with the founding of Pro Oriente, an organization that concentrates upon theological dialogues with the pre-Chalcedon Churches and the Christological issues that divide these churches. Several churches in the Middle East that did not accept the doctrines of the Council of Chalcedon (451 C.E.) now considered the Orthodox position on the divine and human natures of Christ. Two non-Chalcedonian churches, the ARMENIAN APOSTOLIC CHURCH, with 3,000 members, and the Syriac Orthodox Church of Antioch (also 3,000 members) now have legal acceptance as official religions in Austria. At the same time, other churches have also received legal status, including the CHURCH OF JESUS CHRIST OF LATTER-DAY SAINTS (4,000 members), the UNITED METHODIST CHURCH (1,100 members) and the NEW APOSTOLIC CHURCH (5,000 members). Also more than 20,000 members of the Greek Orthodox Church (under the authority of the ECUMENICAL PATRIARCHATE) reside in Austria.

Discussions on religious freedom and the acceptance of minor religions, called new religions, led in 1998 to new state legislation for some minority religions as religiöse Bekenntnisgemeinschaften. Although they now are acknowledged as juridical communities, they do not get the same support by the state as the older religious communities, whose juridical status is based on the legislation of 1874. At present, only nine communities have been accepted as Bekenntnisgemeinschaften: the BAHÁ'Í FAITH; the Hindu community; the Christengemeinschaft (a Christian community with an ANTHROPOSOPHICAL SOCIETY background); the SEVENTH-DAY ADVENTIST CHURCH; a group of Pentecostal communities; a group of independent churches; the Baptist Church; the COPTIC ORTHODOX CHURCH; and the JEHOVAH'S WITNESSES.

The Jehovah's Witnesses have about 25,000 members in Austria; all the others report between 1,000 and 5,000 members. During the last years of the twentieth century there was a significant discussion about the different levels of status of religions, which some viewed as a sign of injustice and denial of religious freedom. Some have also seen it as problematic that the smaller new religions (each having less than 500–1000 members) are frequently spoken of in the public and presented in the media as destructive cults.

Manfred Hutter

Sources:

- Buddhism in Austria. Posted at <http://www.buddhismus-austria.org>
 Bundespressdienst, ed. Religionen in Oesterreich. Vienna: n.p., 1997.
 Christian churches in Austria. Posted at <http://www.kirchen.at> Glaser, F. Fruehes Christentum im Alpenraum. Regensburg: 1997.
 Islam in Austria. Posted at <http://www.islam.at> Religions in Austria. Austria Documentation. Vienna: Federal Press Service, 1990.
 Schoen, D. Orientalische Kulte im roemischen Oesterreich. Vienna: n.p., 1988.

Austrian Buddhist Association

A small number of Buddhists in Austria founded a Buddhist society in Vienna in 1947 under the then operative law that gave religious communities the possibility of forming a society; this juridical status still did not put the groups that chose it on a level with religious communities like the OLD CATHOLIC CHURCH OF AUSTRIA or the CHURCH OF JESUS CHRIST OF LATTER-DAY SAINTS. Further efforts to improve the status of the society led eventually in 1983 to the foundation of the Austrian Buddhist Association (in German, Osterreichische Buddhistische Religionsgesellschaft), which then gained full legal recognition by the Austrian republic as one of the official religions in Austria. The association is also a member of the EUROPEAN BUDDHIST UNION and serves as a regional center of the WORLD FELLOWSHIP OF BUDDHISTS.

The association is an umbrella organization covering different Buddhist groups and individual Buddhists alike. At the end of 2000, twelve groups were formally members of the association, while about ten other Buddhist groups had not applied for membership. As of 2000, discussions have begun concerning the possible affiliation of the Austrian branch of SOKA GAKKAI INTERNATIONAL. Slightly more than 2,000 individuals have also joined the association, a low percentage of the estimated 17,000 Buddhists now living in Austria and practicing their religion in various groups and communities.

The association is headed by a board of five people who serve as official representatives of the association in relation to the Austrian republic. Of greater importance in administering the affairs of the association, however, is the Council of the Sangha (in German, Sangharat means community), consisting of the five people on the board and representatives of all the Buddhists groups and communities who have joined the association. The main aims of the association are to promote knowledge of Buddhism to the general public, to serve as representatives for public or administrative institutions, and to provide religious instruction in public schools to all pupils who are Buddhists. Another important organizing body within (and partly parallel to) the association are the three Buddhist communities for the northeastern, southern, and western areas of Austria. These three communities were established in 1997 as a result of the increase of the number of Buddhists in Austria, in order to better serve their religious needs. These communities help different groups or individuals in their respective areas to organize meetings, to promote the teachings of the Buddha, or to encourage all to lead a Buddhist way of life.

The association is not related to a specific Buddhist school or tradition, but creates a network and structures for cooperation among the various Buddhist groups. Though not an official journal of the association, the quarterly journal Ursache und Wirkung focuses on the same aims and has since 1991 covered all topics concerning Buddhism in Austria and in people's daily lives. The journal has an Internet site at <http://www.ursache.at>.

Azerbaijan

Address:

Austrian Buddhist Association
Osterreichische Buddhistische
Religionsgesellschaft
Fleischmarkt 16
A-1 010 Vienna
Austria
<http://www.sbg.ac.at/budd>

Manfred Hutter

Sources:

Hurter, Manfred, ed. Buddhisten und Hindus in deutschsprachigen Raum. Frankfurt: Peter Lang, 2001.
Riedl, Peter, ed. Buddhismus in Osterreich. Vienna: Ursache und Wirkung Zeitungsverlag, 1998.

Azerbaijan

Azerbaijan, a small country on the Caspian Sea, emerged in the fourth century B.C.E. as several peoples residing in the region united and proclaimed their independence from Persia, which had recently been overrun by Alexander the Great. The name Azerbaijan is a derivative of the name of one of these people, the Atropatene. In the seventh century C.E., the area was incorporated into the Arab Kingdom and the peoples of the region united by the imposition of Islam. As the division developed between Sunni Islam and SHI'A ISLAM, Azerbaijan became part of the Shiite world. In the eleventh century, the Turks occupied the land, and the Turkish language came into common usage. Modern Azeri is a dialect of Turkish, and it is also the case that Azeri identity developed in this period, tied both to the country's unique language and Shi'a Islam.

Beginning in the sixteenth century, Azerbaijan became the target of expansionist dreams of its neighbors, Turkey and Persia, and in the eighteenth century, Russia. Russia was granted northern Azerbaijan in 1828. The country became increasingly prized for its rich oil deposits. In 1920, all of the country was incorporated into the new Soviet Union and then joined with Armenia and Georgia into a Transcaucasian Federated Soviet Republic.

The Muslim Azeris and the Christians of nearby Armenia have a long rivalry. In 1918, while an independent Azerbai-

Status of religions in Azerbaijan, 2000-2050

Followers	2000			2025	2050
	total	%	rate
Muslims	6,472,000	83.7	1.04	8,490,000	9,374,000
Nonreligious	838,000	10.8	-0.56	500,000	300,000
Christians	358,000	4.6	0.15	365,000	271,000
Orthodox	345,000	4.5	0.15	350,000	250,000
Roman Catholics	7,500	0.1	-0.64	8,000	8,000
Independents	3,600	0.1	3.71	5,000	10,000
Atheists	36,000	0.5	-4.14	20,000	10,000
Jews	28,500	0.4	0.16	25,000	20,000
Baha'is	1,400	0.0	2.67	3,000	6,000
Total population	7,734,000	100.0	0.78	9,403,000	9,981,000

jan nation briefly existed, Azeris carried out a massacre of Armenians residing in the country. Then in 1988, as the Soviet Union was in its last phase, the Armenians who controlled the province of Nagorno-Karabakh revolted, and in 1991, when the cease-fire was negotiated, a strip of land connecting the province to Armenia was in Armenian hands. To the present, that section of Armenia (though a matter of ongoing dispute) divides Azerbaijan into two geographically separated territories. As a result of the loss to Armenia, the Azeris carried out a retaliatory persecution of Armenians living in the remaining part of the land. Many left the country at this time.

The majority of Azeris are Shi'a Muslims, the remainder being Sunni Muslims, primarily of the HANAFITE SCHOOL OF ISLAM. The Shiites are closely related to the Iranians who share the same faith, especially to the large Azeri-speaking community in northern Iran. Sunni Islam was introduced in the nineteenth century with the encouragement of Russian authorities, who facilitated Hanafi imams' relocation to the northern part of the land. At the same time, members of the NAQSHBANDIYYA SUFI ORDER entered the region, as did members of the QADIRIYYA SUFI ORDER. Both became the source of anti-Russian agitation.

However, during the years of Soviet rule, secularization proceeded, and in the 1990s, a secular government, based to some extent on the Turkish model, was instituted. There is no state religion in contemporary Azerbaijan. Islam revived in the 1980s, but not to the extent of being strong enough to impose an Islamic theocracy on the emerging state. The strongest Muslim political party, the Azerbaijan Islamic Party, has as its major ideological thrusts anti-Semitism and anti-Turkism, Turkish thought being seen as a hindrance to uniting Azeris around Islam.

Soviet authorities attempted to suppress Islam and closed numerous mosques during the 1930s. A few were allowed to reopen in the 1940s, but only eleven were in operation as changes began to occur in the 1980s. Also, in the 1940s, the government created the Muslim Spiritual Board of Transcaucasia, based in Baku, as an administrative body over the Muslim community throughout the Caucasus region. During the period when the Soviet Union was led by Leonid Brezhnev and then by Mikhail Gorbachev, the freedom for Islamic practice increased. In the 1980s, Allashukur Humatogly Pashazade was named sheikh ul-Islam, that is, head of the Muslim Spiritual Board. The board continues as the Supreme Religious Council of the Caucasus Peoples in independent Azerbaijan. It oversees one seminary for the training of imams.

Christianity reached the Caucasus by the end of the first century C.E. and was well established by the third century. It became the dominant religion in the northern half of the country in the fifth century but was displaced in the seventh century by Islam.

Two main forms of Christianity survive to the present. The ARMENIAN APOSTOLIC CHURCH survives primarily among the Armenian people who reside within Azerbaijan, and the RUSSIAN ORTHODOX CHURCH grew significantly among the Russians who moved into the area beginning in the eighteenth century. The strength of the Armenian church was dramatically reduced by the incorporation of Nagorno-Karabakh into Armenia. An estimated 2 percent of the population are ethnically Russian.

Prior to both Christianity and Islam, Zoroastrianism had been established in Azerbaijan. Zoroaster was born in the seventh century B.C.E. in what is now Azerbaijan. His faith spread southward and later became the dominant religion of Persia. The Surakhany Temple on the Apsheron Peninsula near Baku remains a sacred site acknowledged by Zoroastrians. With the arrival of Islam, Zoroastrian power was broken, and in the eighth century many believers moved to India where they remain as a recognizable group, the Parsis. Most Zoroastrian activity today originates from outside of the country.

The MOLOKANS, a FREE CHURCH group that developed in the Volga River valley, moved southward into the Caucasus during the nineteenth century. In 1873, Vasili V. Ivanov-Klyshnikov (1846–1919) moved to Azerbaijan from Georgia. He was a Molokan who had become a Baptist, and he began to gain converts, primarily among Molokan Russians. A congregation was established in Baku around 1880. The Baptists survived the Soviet era, and at the end of the 1990s, there were six congregations that had united as the UNION OF EVANGELICAL CHRISTIANS–BAPTISTS OF RUSSIA, which is associated with the Euro-Asian Federation of Unions of Evangelical Christians-Baptists that provides fellowship for Baptists throughout the countries of the former Soviet Union.

Sources:

Barrett, David. The Encyclopedia of World Christianity. 2d ed. New York: Oxford University Press, 2001.

Swietochowski, T. Russian Azerbaijan, 1905–1920: The Shaping of a National Identity in a Muslim Community. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1985.

BAHÁ'Í FAITH

The Bahá'í Faith is a religion that began in Iran in 1853. Its founder was Mírzá Husayn-'Alí (1817–1892), known as Bahá'u'lláh. He wrote some 15,000 documents, the majority of them letters, that define the religion's main teachings. In his lifetime the religion spread across the Middle East to Russian Central Asia, India, and Burma. He appointed his eldest son, 'Abbás (1844–1921), known as 'Abdu'l-Bahá, as his successor. 'Abdu'l-Bahá wrote about 27,000 letters and essays that interpreted Bahá'u'lláh's teachings, and he oversaw the religion's spread to North America, Europe, Hawaii, East Asia, and Australia. He appointed a successor, his grandson Shoghi Effendi (1897–1957), who became the Guardian of the Bahá'í Faith upon 'Abdu'l-Bahá's passing in 1921. Shoghi Effendi wrote some 17,500 letters interpreting the writings of Bahá'u'lláh and 'Abdu'l-Bahá; translated Bahá'u'lláh's major works into English; oversaw the establishment of the Bahá'í administrative system; and managed the expansion of the Bahá'í Faith to nearly every country in the noncommunist world. In 1963 the Bahá'í world, following guidelines in the writings of Bahá'u'lláh, 'Abdu'l-Bahá, and Shoghi Effendi, elected the nine-member Universal House of Justice, the supreme governing body of the religion. In the nearly forty years since, worldwide membership in the Bahá'í Faith has grown to more than five million, and the Faith has emerged as the most geographically widespread religion in the world after the ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH.

Bahá'í teachings stress the unity of God, the unity of all major world religions (which are understood to have been founded by divine teachers and to be based on revelation), and the unity of humanity (which implies equality of all races and sexes, the need for access to universal education, and the necessity for world peace founded on international law). The religion emphasizes daily prayer, an annual fasting period, daily study of Scripture, sharing one's beliefs with others, material sacrifice for the religion, and service to humanity. Bahá'í communities have no clergy but elect nine-member governing councils.

Origins. The Bahá'í Faith arose from the Bábí Faith, a religion that briefly flourished in Iran in the 1840s. It was established by 'Alí-Muhammad of Shiraz (1819–1850), who in 1844 took on the title of the Báb (the gate) and who declared himself to be the fulfillment of Islamic prophecies. The Twelver SHI'Á ISLAM that dominates Iran expected the return of the twelfth imam (a messianic figure), and the expectation peaked among some Shi'ites in 1844. The Báb initially hinted that he was merely a gate to the twelfth imam, but gradually made explicit a claim to be the twelfth imam himself. He also penned mystic commentaries on the Qur'án, whose style and content signified a claim to divine revelation.

In a country spiritually dominated by a network of Muslim clerics, the claim to be the successor of Muhammad created immediate controversy. Followers of the Báb were initially arrested and expelled from cities, later beaten, and eventually executed. In three locations the Iranian army attacked Bábís and killed them (two were quarters of cities in which the majority of the inhabitants had converted to the new religion). The Báb was placed under house arrest, then moved to remote prisons in the mountains of northwestern Iran. Finally he was put on trial, found guilty of blasphemy, and in 1850 executed in Tabriz. Estimates of the numbers of Bábís who were eventually killed for their beliefs range as high as twenty thousand. Many of the Báb's extensive writings were lost, though hundreds of works have survived, sometimes with several textual variants. The Báb's teachings included a new series of laws to replace the Islamic shari'ah law and an emphasis on the coming of a successor, "He whom God would make manifest," who would appear soon and be a far greater messiah.

A lotus-shaped Bahá'í temple in Delhi, India (Dinodia/TRIP)

Among the early converts to the Bábí movement was Mírzá Husayn-'Alí, a nobleman born in northern Iran whose father was a palace official. As the Bábí leadership was executed, one after another, his role in the movement grew in importance. In the summer of 1848 he assembled a gathering of the remaining Bábí leaders at which he gave each a title; he took on the title of Bahá'u'lláh (the glory of God), one subsequently endorsed by the Báb. Before his execution, the Báb recognized Bahá'u'lláh's teenage half-brother Yahyá (1831–1912) as a figurehead leader of the Bábí community, though he gave Yahyá no explicit authority. Considering that Yahyá was completely unknown in the Bábí community and was still a youth living in Bahá'u'lláh's household, the appointment was probably made to allow Bahá'u'lláh to run the Bábí movement with a minimum of government interference.

In August 1852 a group of Bábís attempted to assassinate the king, resulting in a severe government-sponsored pogrom against the remaining Bábís. Bahá'u'lláh was arrested and imprisoned for four months. While there he received a revelation:

During the days I lay in the prison of Tihran (Tehran), though the galling weight of the chains and the stench-filled air allowed Me but little sleep, still in those infrequent moments of slumber I felt as if something flowed from the crown of My head over My breast, even as a mighty torrent that precipitateth itself upon the earth from the summit of a lofty mountain. Every limb of My body would, as a result, be set afire. At such moments My tongue recited what no man could bear to hear. (Bahá'u'lláh, Epistle to the Son of the Wolf, p. 22)

The event marked the beginning of Bahá'u'lláh's ministry, though he did not announce his status as "He whom God would make manifest," the successor to the Báb, for another decade.

When the Iranian government released Bahá'u'lláh from prison, they banished him from Iran. Hence he departed for Baghdad, a city in the Ottoman Empire frequented by many Iranians intent on performing pilgrimage to the Shi'ite shrines nearby. The next ten years were highly productive ones, in which Bahá'u'lláh penned several of his most important works: The Hidden Words (a collection of ethical and mystical aphorisms), The Seven Valleys and Four Valleys (two works about the mystic journey of the soul, in dialogue with Sufi concepts), and the Book of Certitude (a work delineating basic theological concepts and principles of personal spiritual development through commentary on passages from the Bible and Qur'an). His efforts to revitalize the Bábí community of Baghdad and to revive the Iranian Bábí community were so successful that the Iranian government requested that the Ottomans move him farther from Iran. On the eve of his departure for Istanbul, in April 1863, Bahá'u'lláh publicly declared to his companions and close associates that he was the prophetic teacher the Báb had prophesied.

Bahá'u'lláh spent the next five years under house arrest in Istanbul and Edirne, both in European Turkey. Building on diplomatic contacts made in the Ottoman capital, he sent epistles to the heads of state of Iran, Turkey, and the major European powers, as well as to Pope Pius IX, announcing his claim to be God's messenger and Christ returned. He sent numerous tablets (a Bahá'í technical term for a writing of Bahá'u'lláh, usually a letter to an individual) to Iran's Bábís and sent teachers to announce his messianic claim. The result was the rapid conversion of more than 90 percent of the Bábís to the Bahá'í Faith. Bahá'u'lláh's half-brother Yahyá, the figurehead leader of a now almost nonexistent community, broke with him and attempted to have Bahá'u'lláh murdered. The Ottoman authorities, unable or unwilling to determine the root cause of the strife between the two half-brothers, exiled Bahá'u'lláh and most of his followers to the prison city of Acre, in what is today northern Israel, in the summer of 1868. Yahyá and most of his handful of followers were sent to Cyprus.

In Acre, Bahá'u'lláh and his followers were confined in a prison under severe conditions for more than two years, resulting in several deaths, including one of Bahá'u'lláh's sons. Subsequently Bahá'u'lláh was released but was considered under house arrest, first in houses within the city walls, later in more comfortable accommodations outside Acre. Once he was released from prison, the flow of Iranian Bahá'í pilgrims resumed, and they carried tablets to friends and fellow Bahá'ís back home. Among the surge in literary output can be numbered the Kitáb-i-Aqdas, or book of laws (a work that defines Bahá'í worship practices such as obligatory prayer and fasting, its obligatory tithe of 19 percent of the believer's surplus income, its laws of marriage and inheritance, and miscellaneous prohibitions, such as drinking alcohol); a series of tablets produced after the Aqdas that outlines basic social reform teachings; the Epistle to the Son of the Wolf (a major work of apologetics and a summary of many basic teachings); and The Book of the Covenant (Bahá'u'lláh's will).

The latter work specified that upon Bahá'u'lláh's passing, his eldest son, 'Abbás, was to become his successor; other tablets praised 'Abbás as the exemplar of Bahá'u'lláh's teachings and the official interpreter of Bahá'u'lláh's revelation. Consequently, when Bahá'u'lláh passed in 1892, at age seventy-five, 'Abbás, age forty-eight, was quickly acknowledged by all as the rightful head of the Bahá'í Faith. He took the title of 'Abdu'l-Bahá, meaning servant of Bahá, to underline his subservience to his father's legacy. An attempt by one of 'Abdu'l-Bahá's half-brothers to form a rival Bahá'í movement garnered virtually no support and died out, though it did cause Ottoman officials to look at all Bahá'ís with suspicion and to renew 'Abdu'l-Bahá's confinement within the city of Acre. The decade of confinement ended in 1908, when the Young Turks Revolution toppled the Ottoman sultan and converted Turkey into a secular republic.

From 1892 to 1908, 'Abdu'l-Bahá was free to receive visitors and communications, including cablegrams. The spread of the Bahá'í Faith to the United States and subsequently to Europe, Hawaii, Australia, and Japan resulted in a diverse group of pilgrims entering Acre—still a prison city—to meet 'Abdu'l-Bahá and receive his wisdom. When 'Abdu'l-Bahá's confinement permanently ended in 1908, he considered travel. In 1910 he visited Egypt and in 1911 he traveled to Europe to meet and encourage that continent's fledgling Bahá'í communities. In 1912 he traveled to North America, arriving in early April (just two weeks before the sinking of the Titanic, a ship many Bahá'ís had urged him to take because of its reputation for safety). His nine-month journey extended as far south as Washington, as far north as Montreal, and as far west as Los Angeles. He gave hundreds of speeches to thousands of people gathered in churches, synagogues, and theosophical lodges. He spoke to the annual Lake Mohonk Peace Conference and the fourth annual national conference of the NAACP. The result was hundreds of newspaper articles, almost all favorable. He left North America in December 1912, spending the winter and spring visiting Bahá'ís from London to Budapest before returning to Palestine months before the beginning of World War I. A contemplated trip to India was rendered impossible by the war and subsequent old age. He passed away in November 1921 at age seventy-seven.

Like his father, 'Abdu'l-Bahá wrote a will, in which he named his eldest grandson, Shoghi Effendi Rabbani, to be his successor and valí amru'lláh (Guardian of the Cause of God). As a result, aside from a few small efforts to split the Bahá'í community (none of which garnered more than a few hundred followers or lasted more than a generation), the Bahá'ís unitedly accepted Shoghi Effendi as their new head. 'Abdu'l-Bahá's will also specified the system whereby Bahá'ís would elect nine-member local spiritual assemblies (governing councils of local Bahá'í communities) and delegates who would elect nine-member national spiritual assemblies. The will also specified that the members of all national spiritual assemblies would serve as the delegates to elect the Universal House of Justice, the supreme worldwide Bahá'í governing body. 'Abdu'l-Bahá's will asserted that while the Guardian had the power to interpret authoritative Bahá'í texts, the Universal House of Justice had the authority to legislate on matters about which the texts were silent.

Shoghi Effendi devoted much of his energy to building local and national spiritual assemblies around the world. He utilized his Oxford education to translate the major works of Bahá'u'lláh into masterfully clear English of an elevated King Jamesian style that has become the model for subsequent translation of Bahá'í sacred texts. Among the 17,500 letters he wrote were a dozen epistles of book length in which he defined basic Bahá'í teachings and laid the theoretical foundation for the establishment of Bahá'í institutions.

Shoghi Effendi's sudden death, without a will, in November 1957 plunged the Bahá'í world community into a crisis, because it deprived the community of its international leadership and raised the specter of schism. But Shoghi Effendi had begun a ten-year plan for expansion of the Bahá'í Faith in 1953 that provided the Bahá'ís with clear goals until April of 1963. He had also appointed a series of individuals as Hands of the Cause of God (a position created by Bahá'u'lláh). In October 1957 he raised their total number to twenty-seven and termed them “the Chief Stewards of Baha'u'llah's embryonic World Commonwealth, who have been invested by the unerring Pen of the Center of His Covenant with the dual function of guarding over the security, and of insuring the propagation, of His Father's Faith” (Shoghi Effendi, Messages to the Bahá'í World, p. 127). 'Abdu'l-Bahá's will had also given the Hands clear authority. Consequently the Bahá'ís of the world turned to the Hands, who co-ordinated the Bahá'í Faith until the completion of Shoghi Effendi's ten-year teaching plan. One effort by a Hand of the Cause, Charles Mason Remey, to claim leadership of the Bahá'í community garnered support from several hundred persons, but subsequently the Remeyite movement split into at least four factions.

In April 1963 the Hands oversaw the election of the Universal House of Justice, from membership in which they voluntarily disqualified themselves. Subsequently the Universal House of Justice has been elected every five years by the members of all the national spiritual assemblies, who either send their ballots by mail, or gather in Haifa, Israel, to cast their ballots in person. The Universal House of Justice has overseen continued expansion of the Bahá'í community and coordinated translation of more Bahá'í texts into English and other languages (including the Kitáb-i-Aqdas); it was also responsible for a great increase in the public visibility of the Bahá'í Faith worldwide.

Authoritative Texts. The Bahá'í Faith possesses authoritative texts from the Báb, Bahá'u'lláh, 'Abdu'l-Bahá, Shoghi Effendi, and the Universal House of Justice. In all cases a sharp distinction is made between written and oral statements by the head of the Faith: the former are binding if they can be authenticated; the latter are not binding unless they were committed to writing and subsequently approved by the head of the Faith.

The authoritative texts also are hierarchically ranked in importance. Those by the Báb and Bahá'u'lláh are the most important, because both individuals are considered Manifestations of God and thus were mouthpieces of divine revelation. Their writings are considered the word of God. Because Bahá'u'lláh often abrogated specific laws of the Báb, the latter are not binding on Bahá'ís. 'Abdu'l-Bahá is not considered a Manifestation of God, but his writings come from an individual whose spiritual rank is considered unique in human history (above that of an ordinary human being but below that of a Manifestation); hence his writings possess a sacredness and are considered part of Bahá'í scripture. Shoghi Effendi, on the other hand, occupies a rank even further from that of a Manifestation, and his writings, though binding and authoritative, occupy a less sacred place in the hierarchy of Bahá'í scripture. The writings of the Universal House of Justice are also binding and authoritative but, like papal encyclicals, would not be considered scripture.

An important distinction can be made among authoritative texts between their spiritual import and their morally and ethically binding nature. Bahá'ís can include in a program of Bahá'í worship writings by the Báb, Bahá'u'lláh, and 'Abdu'l-Bahá, plus the Qur'án and the Bible; all these texts are considered spiritually uplifting and potentially transformative of the soul. Writings by Shoghi Effendi and the Universal House of Justice would not normally be included in a worship program. On the other hand, when Bahá'ís look for guidance how to live their lives, they turn to the writings of the Universal House of Justice, Shoghi Effendi, 'Abdu'l-Bahá, and Bahá'u'lláh; normally, the writings of the Báb, the Qur'án, and the Bible would not be included, because those revelations have had many of their specific ethical aspects superseded by Bahá'u'lláh's revelation, by the interpretations of 'Abdu'l-Bahá and Shoghi Effendi, and by the legislation of the Universal House of Justice.

A significant feature of Bahá'í authoritative texts is their sheer volume; 15,000 documents by Bahá'u'lláh, 27,000 by 'Abdu'l-Bahá, and more than 17,500 by Shoghi Effendi. No official estimate of the quantity of writings of the Universal House of Justice is known, but when one considers that the nine-member body employs a large secretariat to research and draft responses, the rumored estimate of 250,000 letters composed since 1963 may be approximately correct. Furthermore, Bahá'u'lláh wrote in Arabic, Persian, and a unique combination of the two; 'Abdu'l-Bahá wrote in the same plus a small number of texts in Ottoman Turkish; Shoghi Effendi wrote in Arabic, Persian, a combination of the two, English, and French. The Universal House of Justice produces most of its communications in English, but it has used various other languages as well. To date, perhaps 5 percent of Bahá'u'lláh's corpus has been translated into English; much more of 'Abdu'l-Bahá's writings have been translated into English, but the old translations have not been checked for accuracy, updated, or even completely collected together. The Bahá'í World Centre has been computerizing the Bahá'í authoritative texts in their original languages and their translations for some twenty years.

Basic Beliefs. Bahá'í teachings are often summarized as the unity of God, the unity of religion, and the unity of humankind. If one adds teachings about the creation of a Bahá'í community and about the personal spiritual life, one has a useful division of Bahá'í teachings.

Bahá'u'lláh describes God as an unknowable essence—in other words, that ultimately God is beyond human ken and reckoning. Bahá'u'lláh's view, however, is not that humans can know nothing about God; on the contrary, even though the divine has an unknowable essence, it also has attributes such as mercy, justice, love, patience, self-subsistence, might, and knowledge that we can experience and know. By developing these qualities in their own souls, humans guide and foster their personal spiritual development and prepare themselves for the next life, in which spiritual growth occurs continuously and primarily through God's grace. Experiencing God's attributes in creation is the basis of nature mysticism; Bahá'u'lláh says that all created things reflect divine attributes (a concept that is also fundamental to Bahá'í environmental ethics). Bahá'u'lláh notes, however, that the perfect reflector of divine attributes on this plane of existence is the Manifestation of God, a rare figure who receives divine revelation and guidance and manifests them perfectly in the language of his/her culture and through his/her own life and actions. In an epistemological sense the manifestation is God, because in the mortal plane she/he is the only perfect source of knowledge of the divine. Bahá'u'lláh identifies Abraham, Moses, Jesus, Muhammad, Zoroaster, the Báb, and Himself as Manifestations and suggests that Adam, Noah, the founder of the Sabaeen religion, Salih, and Hud were also Manifestations (the last three are figures mentioned in the Qur'an as well). To this list 'Abdu'l-Bahá adds Buddha and Shoghi Effendi adds Krishna, raising the total to fourteen. Bahá'u'lláh also states that many Manifestations lived so long ago that their names have been lost; 'Abdu'l-Bahá stresses that humanity has always received divine guidance through Manifestations.

The Bahá'í recognition that the majority of the world's major religions were established by Manifestations is the basis of the Bahá'í concept of the unity of religion. Bahá'u'lláh and 'Abdu'l-Bahá both state that all religions are based on a divine revelation (either directly or by borrowing divine ideas from previous religions) but add that, while all religions share certain basic ethical and metaphysical principles, they also differ because the revelation had to be tailored to the social and cultural context in which it was expressed. Bahá'u'lláh and 'Abdu'l-Bahá also criticize the learned and clergy of all religions for misunderstanding and distorting the original teachings. The bewildering diversity of the world's religions—especially in ritual and practice—is attributed to differing cultural contexts and interpretations. Bahá'í scholars have just begun to research issues that arise from the Bahá'í approach to religion, such as the relationship of the Bahá'í Faith to Buddhism (which fits the Bahá'í model of a religion the least), and to Sikhism, Jainism, and Chinese religions (which have no Manifestations recognized by the Bahá'í Faith). Interfaith dialogue is also affected by the Bahá'í concept of Manifestation, for it implies that the latest Manifestation—Bahá'u'lláh—is in some sense the most important. Bahá'u'lláh states that God will continue to send Manifestations to humanity in the future, but the next one will come only after the lapse of a thousand years (which is the time given the Bahá'í Faith to develop itself and mature).

Bahá'u'lláh emphasizes that human beings are the “waves of one sea,” “the leaves of one branch,” and “the flowers of one garden,” images that emphasize the overriding unity of all human beings. Shoghi Effendi notes that the oneness of humankind is the watchword and pivot of the Bahá'í teachings. Although this teaching can be seen as similar to Paul's words that Christians are “baptized into one body, whether we be Jews or Gentiles, whether we be bond or free” (KJV, I Cor. 12:13), Bahá'u'lláh and 'Abdu'l-Bahá strongly emphasized the implications of this principle: that all persons are equal before God and therefore must have basic equality in human society; that men and women are equal; that races are equal and must be reconciled and united. Specifically, Bahá'u'lláh noted in his writings the right of all people, including women, to training so that they can pursue a trade or profession. In his visit to the United States in 1912, 'Abdu'l-Bahá insisted on all Bahá'í meetings being open to blacks as well as whites and encouraged an African American man, Louis Gregory, to marry an English woman, Louise Matthew. American Bahá'í communities began the struggle to integrate themselves ethnically and racially as early as 1908, and women were first elected to Bahá'í local and national governing bodies as early as 1907 (in 2001 they constitute the majority of the membership of American local spiritual assemblies and four-ninths of the membership of the national spiritual assembly).

In addition to its implications of unity, the oneness of humanity also is understood to imply the need to establish a global governing system. Bahá'u'lláh called on all kings and rulers to end war, limit armaments, and meet in an international summit to establish common treaties and institutions. He said that an international language and script should be selected to supplement local languages and allow easy world communication. The Bahá'í texts also call for an international system of weights and measures, a world currency, an elected world legislature, an international collective security arrangement, and global measures to ensure universal education and health care, to create equitable access to resources, and to diminish the extreme imbalances of wealth and poverty. Indeed, the Bahá'í authoritative texts include an extensive critique of existing social norms and a vision for creating a just, unified world.

The Bahá'í community consists of all persons who have accepted Bahá'u'lláh and have requested membership in the body of his followers. It is conceived of as an evolving entity destined to reflect Bahá'u'lláh's teachings ever more perfectly and to embrace an ever-larger segment of humanity. The chief goal of the Bahá'í community is to achieve ever-greater unity. Bahá'u'lláh exhorts Bahá'ís to “be ye as the fingers of one hand, the members of one body” (Kitáb-i-Aqdas, para. 58), a utilitarian metaphor of working together that is reinforced by 'Abdu'l-Bahá's exhortation that “verily, God loveth those who are working in His path in groups, for they are a solid foundation” (Bahá'í World Faith, p. 401). But more important is an ideal, spiritual unity expressed in the metaphor that the Bahá'ís should be “one soul in many bodies” ('Abdu'l-Bahá, quoted in Shoghi Effendi, The Lights of Divine Guidance, vol. 2, p. 50). This form of spiritual unity is rarely achieved in practice. 'Abdu'l-Bahá describes it in these words:

Another unity is the spiritual unity that emanates from the breaths of the Holy Spirit. . . . Human unity or solidarity may be likened to the body, whereas unity from the breaths of the Holy Spirit is the spirit animating the body. This is a perfect unity. It creates such a condition in mankind that each one will make sacrifices for the other, and the utmost desire will be to forfeit life and all that pertains to it in behalf of another's good. This is the unity that existed among the disciples of Jesus Christ and bound together the Prophets and holy Souls of the past. It is the unity which through the influence of the divine spirit is permeating the Bahá'ís so that each offers his life for the other and strives with all sincerity to attain his good pleasure. (Promulgation of Universal Peace, pp. 191–192)

Bahá'ís strive for spiritual unity through various means. Bahá'í gatherings begin with prayer. Discussion about any matter is conducted according to the principles of consultation, whereby individuals are encouraged to be frank but tactful in expressing themselves; should listen carefully and avoid offending or feeling offended by others; where ideas, once expressed, belong to the group and thus can be modified or rejected by all present, including the person first proposing the idea; where decisions ideally should be unanimous, but can be carried by a majority; and where the results of consultation must be trusted and not undermined by subsequent dissent, noncooperation, or backbiting. Consultation is simultaneously a set of principles of behavior, a collection of attitudes toward people and ideas, and a culture of discourse to model and perfect.

Reinforcing the goal of spiritual unity and the means of consultation are practical principles in such matters as elections. The Bahá'í Faith has no clergy; authority rests in, and is delegated by, elected bodies at the local, national, and international level. Bahá'í elections are based on the right of the individual to free and unfettered choice in voting. For elections to local spiritual assemblies, national spiritual assemblies, and the Universal House of Justice, electors can vote for any Bahá'í age twenty-one or older who resides within the body's area of jurisdiction (the locality, the nation, and the world, respectively). They are urged to consider “without the least trace of passion and prejudice, and irrespective of any material consideration, the names of only those who can best combine the necessary qualities of unquestioned loyalty, of selfless devotion, of a well-trained mind, of recognized ability and mature experience” (Shoghi Effendi, Bahá'í Administration, p. 88). When Bahá'ís come together to vote, they begin by praying. Forbidden is all discussion of names of possible candidates, nominations, campaigning, straw votes, and other forms of influence. If evidence of efforts to influence voters comes to light, the election is invalidated. Such a system of elections, where voting is a spiritual act and campaigning is banned, fosters the conditions for consultation, greatly reduces opportunities for strife in the Bahá'í community, and reinforces unity.

In any locality (usually defined as the smallest unit of civil jurisdiction, a city, township, or county) where nine or more Bahá'ís reside, the Bahá'ís gather annually to elect the nine-member local spiritual assembly between sunset April 20 and sunset April 21. Nations are divided into electoral units, and each unit annually elects one or more delegates (depending on the unit's population) who gather annually in a national convention to elect the nine-member national spiritual assembly. Every five years, the members of all the national spiritual assemblies (there were 182 in 2001) gather in Haifa, Israel, to elect the nine-member Universal House of Justice. The Universal House of Justice has the authority to determine the number of delegates chosen to elect each national spiritual assembly; must approve any changes to the bylaws of national spiritual assemblies; can overturn the decisions of such assemblies, and ultimately can disband them for reasons of improper functioning. National spiritual assemblies have similar jurisdiction over local spiritual assemblies.

In the 1980s and 1990s, a fourth level of Bahá'í institution was established by the Universal House of Justice: the regional Bahá'í council. It exists to coordinate and encourage Bahá'í activities in an area smaller than a nation and is elected annually by all the members of the local spiritual assemblies in that region. The United States is divided into four regions (Northeast, South, Central, and West), and it first elected regional councils in November 1997.

Complementing the elected bodies is an appointed arm of the Bahá'í administrative system consisting of individuals who have no personal authority but who advise and encourage. Bahá'u'lláh appointed the first members of this arm, the Hands of the Cause of God, in the late nineteenth century. 'Abdu'l-Bahá asked the Hands—who at that time all resided in Tehran—to oversee the establishment of the Bahá'í governing body for that city in 1896 (the first such body in the world). Shoghi Effendi appointed additional Hands and created a subsidiary institution under them, Auxiliary Board members, who were appointed by the Hands. He also said that Auxiliary Board members would in turn appoint assistants. After the passing of Shoghi Effendi, the Universal House of Justice determined that the Bahá'í scriptures did not authorize them to appoint Hands; hence that institution would die out when the last Hands died. Consequently, the Universal House of Justice chose to create a parallel institution, the Counselors, who would carry on the functioning of the Hands of the Cause of God. In 2001, there were 3 Hands still living; worldwide, there were 81 Counselors; operating under them were 990 Auxiliary Board members; and under them thousands of assistants. The Counselors and Auxiliary Board members meet with the Universal House of Justice annually; individual Counselors meet with national spiritual assemblies several times per year; and Auxiliary Board members and their assistants meet with local spiritual assemblies and entire local Bahá'í communities every year or two. Thus the Bahá'í world is tied together in a series of face-to-face relationships and consultative gatherings.

As of 2001, the Bahá'í Administrative Order consisted of four levels of elected bodies plus their innumerable committees and three levels of appointed individual advisors. The Universal House of Justice is authorized to create additional institutions as it sees fit, so the picture will gradually change. Shoghi Effendi emphasized that the Bahá'í Administrative Order is the embodiment of the Bahá'í teachings and the primary vehicle for their expression in the world.

In addition to the Bahá'í governing institutions, the Bahá'í texts describe the creation and development of Bahá'í communities. Bahá'í community life centers on the institution of the feast, a gathering once every Bahá'í month (which lasts nineteen days) wherein the Bahá'ís worship together, consult on local community activities, and socialize. The feast also provides the principal opportunity for local spiritual assemblies to share their ideas and plans and receive feedback from the local members. In addition to feasts, Bahá'ís attend firesides (gatherings, usually in people's homes, to introduce the Bahá'í Faith to others), deepenings (meetings to study Bahá'í texts and principles together), children's classes (the equivalent of Sunday school), adult classes, and devotional meetings (sometimes held weekly on Sundays). Particularly important are Bahá'í holy days, nine of which are observed every year. In addition to the Bahá'í New Year's Day (March 21), they commemorate events in the lives of the Báb and Bahá'u'lláh. Supplementing the nine holy days on which Bahá'ís should suspend work are two holy days connected with the life of 'Abdu'l-Bahá (on which Bahá'ís can carry out their occupations) and Ayyám-i-Há, a four- or five-day period of service, merry-making, and gift giving (February 26 through March 1; Ayyám-i-Há is necessary to bring the total days in the Bahá'í calendar from 361 [the number in nineteen months of nineteen days each] to the number of days in a solar year). Every Bahá'í holy day is accompanied by a gathering that is open to the public.

In the United States, most local Bahá'í communities meet in the homes of the members, but rented and purchased Bahá'í Centers are becoming much more common. The United States has only one Bahá'í House of Worship, located in Wilmette, Illinois, outside Chicago. It is a national House of Worship and does not serve a particular local Bahá'í community. It hosts daily worship programs, holy day observances, and a variety of classes, special gatherings, and interfaith activities.

Devotional Life. No account of Bahá'í teachings would be complete without an exploration of the devotional life of the individual. The Bahá'í scriptures state that the purpose of life is “to know and worship” God and to “carry forward an ever-advancing civilization,” thus embracing both a vertical relationship with one’s Creator and a horizontal relationship with one’s fellow humans. Rather than stress an instant of personal salvation, like some Christian groups, or a moment of enlightenment, like some Buddhist groups, the Bahá'í scriptures stress ongoing personal transformation based on internalization of the Bahá'í revelation and its expression in service to others. Bahá'u'lláh called on Bahá'ís to build their prayer life on the pillar of daily obligatory prayer; he gave three prayers among which Bahá'ís choose one to say daily. (Bahá'ís also can choose among hundreds of prayers penned by Bahá'u'lláh, the Báb, and ‘Abdu’l-Bahá on a variety of subjects, such as forgiveness, assistance, healing, and grief; they rarely pray spontaneously in their own words.) Bahá'u'lláh ordained the repeating of the phrase Alláh-u-Abhá (God Is Most Glorious) ninety-five times each day as the basis for one’s meditative and contemplative life. He established a period of fasting (from sunrise to sunset, for nineteen days from March 2 through March 20; in that period Bahá'ís abstain from eating, drinking, and tobacco) as a mild ascetic practice, granting exceptions to those under age fifteen, over age seventy, the ill, travelers, women who are pregnant, menstruating, or nursing, and anyone performing heavy labor. He enjoined the practice of reciting the Word of God twice daily in order to connect the believer to the revelation.

The horizontal dimension of the devotional life has various aspects. Bahá'u'lláh says Bahá'ís should be “anxiously concerned with the needs of the age ye live in, and center your deliberations on its exigencies and requirements” (Gleanings from the Writings of Bahá'u'lláh, selection CVI). Bahá'ís are thus encouraged, individually and collectively, to improve the world around them. Bahá'u'lláh requires all to “engage in some occupation” and exalts such work “to the rank of worship of the one true God” (Kitáb-i-Aqdas, para. 33), thus potentially spiritualizing the life of the rank and file, while simultaneously forbidding ordained priesthood and monasticism. He describes marriage as “a fortress for well-being and salvation” (Bahá'í Prayers, p. 105), thus sacralizing that institution and making it a vehicle for spiritual progress. Finally, the Bahá'í scriptures describe ‘Abdu’l-Bahá as the personal exemplar Bahá'ís should emulate. His life of service to others serves as a model of behavior.

International Diffusion. The Bábí community was largely confined to Iran and Iraq and their Shi'ite populations, and virtually all Bábís had become Bahá'ís by 1880. By the mid-1880s the Bahá'ís began to reach out to Iranian Jews and Zoroastrians, whose younger and more educated members soon became attracted to the religion’s modernistic ideas and its claim to fulfill scriptural prophecies. The result was the eventual conversion of perhaps 10 percent of Iran’s Jews, and a similar percentage of the Zoroastrians, to the Bahá'í Faith. The conversion continued for about fifty years and ended as the Jewish and Zoroastrian Bahá'ís assumed a greater Bahá'í identity, intermarrying more with Bahá'ís of Muslim background than with Jews or Zoroastrians.

Commerce and flight from persecution often took the religion to India and Central Asia. Jamál Effendi, an Iranian Bahá'í, arrived in Bombay in 1872 and traveled around India to proclaim the new religion. In May 1878, accompanied by a young man named Siyyid Mustafá Rúmí, he traveled to Burma, creating Bahá'í communities in Rangoon and Mandalay. Rúmí remained and built a strong Burmese Bahá'í community; he also traveled to Malaysia and the Indonesian archipelago in the early 1880s to establish Bahá'í communities there. Meanwhile, so many Iranian Bahá'ís moved northward into Russian Central Asia to escape persecution that they became one of the largest religious communities in Ashgabat (the modern capital of Turkmenistan). 'Abdu'l-Bahá authorized them to construct the first Bahá'í House of Worship in the world. (In the 1920s, under Stalin, the House of Worship was confiscated and the vast majority of the city's two thousand Bahá'ís were expelled to Iran, executed, or exiled to Siberia.)

Bahá'u'lláh's exiles to European Turkey and Palestine resulted in the establishment of Bahá'í communities there and in nearby cities such as Alexandria, Cairo, Port Said, and Beirut. Iranian Bahá'ís settling in all those cities introduced the Bahá'í Faith to Shi'ites of non-Iranian origin, Sunni Muslims, and Arab Christians. In the 1870s a group of Bahá'ís was exiled from Egypt to Khartoum for teaching their religion, resulting in the establishment of a Bahá'í community there. In 1888 two Lebanese Christians became Bahá'ís in Egypt and in 1892 immigrated to the United States.

One of them, Ibrahim George Kheiralla (1849–1929), was responsible for converting the first Americans in 1894. From a small group in Chicago, by 1900 the United States had four Bahá'í communities of fifty or more believers, plus scattered Bahá'ís in twenty-three states. By 1899 the Faith was also introduced from Chicago to Ontario, Canada; Paris, France; and London, England. A convert in Europe in turn took the Bahá'í Faith to Hawaii in 1901, and two Hawaiian Bahá'ís took it to Japan in 1914. In Shanghai, China, Occidental Bahá'ís met a few Persian Bahá'í merchants who had settled; at that point the Bahá'í religion had circled the globe from both directions. American Bahá'ís visited India and Burma in 1904–1906, helping those communities to establish relations with governing authorities and increasing the Faith's publicity and prestige. In 1906 an American Bahá'í of German background returned to his native country, establishing a strong Bahá'í community in Stuttgart. In 1910 a pair of American Bahá'ís circled the globe westward, visiting major Bahá'í communities in every country where the religion could be found. By 1921 other American Bahá'ís had settled in Mexico, Brazil, Australia, New Zealand, and Korea.

American Bahá'ís played an important role even in Iran. In 1908 an American Bahá'í man settled in Tehran, Iran's capital, followed by four American Bahá'í women in 1909–1911. All were able to help the fledgling Bahá'í school system modernize, Westernize, and attain high standards of quality. The women were physicians and nurses, able to treat women in a society in which male doctors still could not examine female patients; they helped the Bahá'í community of Tehran establish a public clinic that eventually became a major hospital. The women played a role in raising the consciousness of Iranian Bahá'ís about equality of the sexes. Their presence also signaled to those wishing to persecute the Iranian Bahá'ís that the community now had active coreligionists in other countries.

'Abdu'l-Bahá was so impressed by the American Bahá'í community that he sent them a series of fourteen tablets from 1914 to 1916 entitled The Tablets of the Divine Plan, in which he enjoined them to spread the Bahá'í religion to every nation and island on the globe. He enumerated hundreds of places where there should be Bahá'í communities, all of which subsequently became missionary goals. In the 1920s Shoghi Effendi gave the American Bahá'ís the chief responsibility for establishing Bahá'í elected institutions, and he patterned such bodies in Europe, Asia, and Australasia on the American model.

In 1937, the North American Bahá'ís having finally established firm local and national spiritual assemblies, Shoghi Effendi gave them a Seven Year Plan (1937–1944) calling for them to establish at least one local spiritual assembly in every state in the United States, one in every province of Canada, to establish the Bahá'í Faith in every country in Latin America, and to complete the exterior of the Bahá'í House of Worship in Wilmette, Illinois. In spite of World War II, every goal was achieved, and many Latin American nations had local spiritual assemblies as well as small groups of Bahá'ís in 1944.

In 1946, Shoghi Effendi launched a second Seven Year Plan (1946–1953) that called for creation of a separate national spiritual assembly for Canada (the Canadian Bahá'ís having shared a national assembly with the United States all that time), a single national spiritual assembly for all of South America, another for all of Central America, and re-establishment of the Bahá'í Faith in war-ravaged western Europe.

By 1953 there were twelve national spiritual assemblies worldwide: one in Italy and Switzerland, one in Germany and Austria, one in Egypt and Sudan, one in Australia and New Zealand, one in India and Burma, the four aforementioned in the Americas, the United Kingdom, Iran, and Iraq. Shoghi Effendi gave plans to all twelve of them for the period 1953–1963. Among the goals were to more than double the number of countries, islands, and significant territories in which the Bahá'í Faith was established and to raise the number of national spiritual assemblies to fifty-seven. Except for a national spiritual assembly in one Islamic country, all the goals were achieved by 1963. The United States achieved perhaps a third of the goals, while expanding the number of American Bahá'ís from 7,000 to 10,000.

The next decade—1963–1973—saw the fruits of the effort to spread the Bahá'í Faith widely but very thinly around the world. Latin American Bahá'ís settling in Bolivia reached out to the rural population, and tens of thousands became Bahá'ís; the Bolivian Bahá'í community is still the largest in Latin America, with a university and a radio station to serve its members and the citizenry. Similar efforts have brought thousands into the Bahá'í Faith in Kenya, Uganda, Swaziland, and several Pacific archipelagoes, as well as hundreds of thousands of new Bahá'ís into India. In the United States, door-to-door teaching brought 10,000 to 15,000 rural African Americans into the Bahá'í Faith in South Carolina, North Carolina, and Georgia in the years 1969–1972. At the same time an unusual receptivity swept the college population, no doubt stimulated by the Vietnam War and the civil rights movement. By 1974 the United States had 60,000 Bahá'ís. Subsequent conversion has been supplemented by immigration (some 12,000 Iranian Bahá'ís and perhaps 10,000 Southeast Asian Bahá'ís have settled in the United States since 1975), with the result that in 2001 the United States had 142,000 Bahá'ís and nearly twelve hundred local spiritual assemblies. Notable is the presence of hundreds of native Bahá'ís on the Navajo and Lakota reservations, the involvement of several thousand Hispanic Bahá'ís (served by a quarterly Spanish-language Bahá'í magazine), and a thousand or so multiracial or multiethnic marriages within the American Bahá'í community. The National Spiritual Assembly of the Bahá'ís of the United States owns retreat and conference centers in five states; publishes a children's magazine, a monthly newspaper, and a quarterly scholarly periodical; operates a radio station in South Carolina; runs a senior citizen's home and two institutions for economic development and public health; and employs some two hundred staff.

Expansion of the American Bahá'í community in the last twenty-five years has also allowed resources to be channeled in several new directions. The Bahá'í community has been able to sustain much greater commitment to the abolition of racism, the establishment of world peace, and the development of society. One result has been greater media attention. The larger community also produced an expanded book market that stimulated writers and scholars, so that Bahá'í literature greatly expanded in scope and depth. Cultural expressions of the Bahá'í Faith, such as operas and “Bahá'í gospel” music, developed and have become much more sophisticated. Now more than a century old, the American Bahá'í community is an indigenous American religion, with fifth- and sixth-generation members.

Internationally, the Bahá'í Faith and its governing body, the Universal House of Justice, are located in Acre (near Haifa), Israel, its location being close to Bahá'u'lláh's burial place at Bahjí, north of Acre. Several official Internet sites are maintained at <http://www.bahai.com/>, <http://www.us.bahai.org/> (United States), and <http://www.bahai.com/>.

Robert Stockman

Sources:

Note: For a full listing of Bahá'í sacred writings, see <http://www.bahai.org/section5.html>.

'Abdu'l-Bahá. Some Questions Answered. Wilmette, IL: Baha'í Distribution Service, 1981.

The Báb. Selections from the Writings of the Báb. Haifa: Baha'í World Centre, 1978.

Bahá'u'llah. The Kitáb-i-Aqdas: The Book of Certitude. Translated by Shoghi Effendi. London: Baha'í Publishing Trust London, 1961. Various additional editions.

Collins, William P. Bibliography of English-language Works on the Babi and Bahá'í Faith, 1845–1985. Wilmette, IL: Bahá'í Publishing Trust, 1991.

Perkins, Mary, and Philip Hainsworth. The Bahá'í Faith. London: Ward Lock Educational, 1980. Universal House of Justice. The Promise of World Peace. Haifa, Israel: Bahá'í World Centre, 1985.

Bahamas

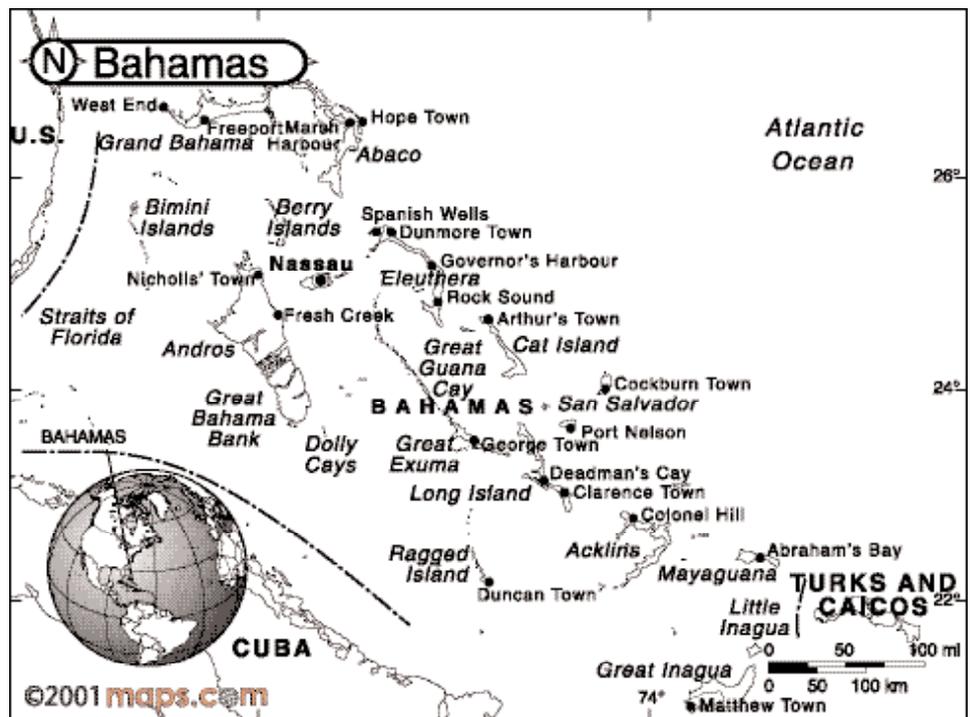

The Bahamas, an archipelago that stretches from near the southeastern coast of Florida to the Turks and Caicos in the Caribbean, was originally the home of the Awarak people. They were probably the first people of the Western hemisphere to make contact with Columbus on his exploratory voyage in 1492. Unfortunately, the contact proved disastrous, and the Arawak were soon obliterated by a combination of European diseases to which they had no immunity and European attempts to enslave them.

The Spanish did not colonize the Bahamas, as they were looking for lands rich in gold. However, it was later colonized by British privateers, who preyed on the Spanish ships loaded with gold and preparing to cross the Atlantic. In the 1640s, the British began serious settlement in the Bahamas and developed a plantation culture, which needed laborers. To fill that need, they imported Africans, whose descendents constitute the majority of the population today. Slavery was abolished in 1838. Independence was declared in 1973, and the Bahamas remain within the British Commonwealth. The monarch of the United Kingdom is officially the head of state, but most power is in the hands of the local legislature and prime minister.

For the first two hundred years of British dominance of the Bahamas, the CHURCH OF ENGLAND was the only organized religious group. Its hegemony was not disturbed until the 1786 arrival of the Methodists. During the nineteenth and twentieth centuries, however, it lost substantial ground, as more and more religious groups, primarily from the United States, established congregations. Today, only about a third of the Bahamas 250,000 residents identify themselves as Anglicans and members of the Diocese of the Bahamas of the Anglican CHURCH IN THE PROVINCE OF

THE WEST INDIES, whose archbishop currently resides in Nassau.

Wesleyan (British) Methodists expanded into the Caribbean only after the American Revolution, when the Methodists in the United States formed an independent organization. As with the Anglican church, the Methodists' work was further strengthened by Loyalists who left the former American colonies to settle in the Bahamas. The Methodist community, now an integral part of the METHODIST CHURCH IN THE CARIBBEAN AND THE AMERICAS, received a new injection of energy in 1877 with the arrival of missionaries from the AFRICAN METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH, a predominantly Black denomination in the United States.

Followers	2000			2025	2050
	total	%	rate
Christians	283,000	92.4	1.71	376,000	432,000
Protestants	167,000	54.5	2.01	231,000	267,000
Roman Catholics	48,000	15.7	1.22	57,000	60,000
Anglicans	27,300	8.9	-0.18	25,000	25,000
Nonreligious	16,200	5.3	4.51	30,000	40,000
Spiritists	4,700	1.6	2.78	6,500	8,000
Baha'is	1,200	0.4	2.18	1,800	3,000
Jews	920	0.3	1.37	900	1,100
Chinese folk-religionists	180	0.1	2.06	300	500
Total population	307,000	100.0	1.85	415,000	485,000

Bahamas National Baptist Missionary and Education Convention

Among the twentieth-century arrivals, missionaries representing the Baptists (with ties to the BRITISH BAPTIST UNION and the CHURCH OF GOD (ANDERSON, INDIANA), a HOLINESS body from the United States, had the most significant response. The Baptists, now organized as the BAHAMAS NATIONAL BAPTIST MISSIONARY AND EDUCATION CONVENTION, are the largest religious community in the islands, surpassing even the Anglicans. More than twenty other Protestant churches are operating in the Bahamas, most from bases in the United States. The Bahamas Christian Council, affiliated with the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES, includes a spectrum of churches from Lutherans and Pentecostals to Greek Orthodox and Roman Catholics. Both the SEVENTH-DAY ADVENTIST CHURCH and the JEHOVAH'S WITNESSES have built strong followings since their arrivals, in 1909 and 1926 respectively.

The ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH arrived in the Bahamas toward the end of the nineteenth century (1885) and through the next century built a thriving community. A vicariate was erected in 1941. It is now the third largest religious body in the Bahamas. The work is attached to the Diocese of Kingston (Jamaica).

There is a small Jewish community in the Bahamas centered on Freeport, as well as several spiritual assemblies of the BAHÁ'Í FAITH.

Sources:

- Barrett, David. The Encyclopedia of World Christianity. 2d edition. New York: Oxford University Press, 2001.
- Barry, C. J. Upon These Rocks: Catholics in the Bahamas. Collegeville, MN: St. John's Abbey Press, 1973.
- Bissio, Roberto Remo, et al. Third World Guide 93/94. Montevideo, Uruguay: Instituto del Tercer Mundo, 1992.
- Prozan, V. M. "A Religious Survey of the Bahama Islands, British West Indies." M.A. thesis, Columbia Bible College, 1961.
- Thompson, J. K. The Rise of the Seventh-day Adventist Church in the Bahamas and the Cayman Islands. Nassau, Bahamas: n.p., 1992.
- Williams, C. The Methodist Contribution to Education in the Bahamas (circa 1790–1975). Gloucester, UK: A. Sutton, 1982.

Bahamas National Baptist Missionary and Education Convention

The Baptist Church came to the Bahamas in 1780 in the person of Frank Spence, an African American who had left slavery to join the British during the American Revolution. He had left the South during the war and finally made his way to Long Island, New York, from which he was transported to Nassau. He began preaching and by the 1830s oversaw a chapel that could hold some 900 worshippers. Other Baptist preachers with a similar story also found their way to the islands.

In 1833, the Baptist Missionary Society (supported by British Baptists) arrived, and the members were appalled by the conditions they found. They took control of two congregations, dissolved them, and reconstituted them by accepting only the minority who had maintained what they considered a moral life. In the process one of the congregations broke with the missionaries and founded the independent Native Baptist Church. Through the decades additional schisms rent the growing church.

Crucial to the growing movement, the NATIONAL BAPTIST CONVENTION, U.S.A. took an interest in the Bahamas and began supporting the work. Their entrance into the field coincided with the lessening of the Baptist Missionary Society's presence, which was completely withdrawn in 1931. The National Baptists encouraged the Bahamians to unite and in 1935 inspired the formation of the Bahamas Baptist Missionary and Educational Convention, which brought six different groups together. The SOUTHERN BAPTIST CONVENTION added its support to that of the National Baptists.

The new convention launched an educational program in 1943 with the founding of Jordan Memorial School. Jordan Memorial has recently merged with a second school, founded in 1961, to become the Jordan-Prince Williams Baptist School. The convention also oversees the Bahamas Baptist Bible Institute and the Bahamas Baptist College. (The institute had begun in 1953 as an effort of two Southern Baptist missionaries.)

In 1971, Baptists adopted a new constitution in an effort to bring greater unity to the movement, with the former association that constitutes the convention retaining a considerable amount of power in managing the affairs of the churches associated with it.

In the mid-1990s the convention reported some 56,000 members in 211 churches, making it the largest religious group in the islands. It is a member of the BAPTIST WORLD ALLIANCE.

Address:

Bahamas National Baptist Missionary and Educational Convention
P.O. Box N-4435
Nassau
Bahamas

Sources:

- Canzoneri, Antonina. "Early History of the Baptists in the Bahamas." Journal of the Bahamas Historical Society 4 (October 1982): 9–16.
- Symonette, Michael C., and Antonina Canzoneri. Baptists in the Bahamas. El Paso, TX: Baptist Publishing House, 1977.

Bahrain

Bahrain is an island nation consisting of one large island (48 by 15 kms) and thirty-two smaller islands located in the Persian Gulf. Several of the islands lie just off the coast of Qatar. Bahrain has been important over the centuries as a trading center in the flow of goods between India and Mesopotamia. It gained additional importance in the twentieth century as a source of oil. Christians arrived in the islands quite early and during the third century C.E. a bishopric was established. The Christian movement was overwhelmed and largely displaced by Islam. Islamic culture flourished from the eleventh through the fifteenth centuries.

Then in 1507 the Portuguese arrived and brought Catholicism with them. However, a century later Christianity was again displaced when Persians (Iranians) drove the Portuguese out.

The Persians ruled the land for a century, but were then driven out by Sheikh al-Khalifah, who assumed power in 1782. He established a dynasty that has continued to rule into the twenty-first century. Though still ruled by this dynasty, from 1861 to 1971 Bahrain existed as a British Protectorate, the arrangement having begun due to fear that Persia might attempt to assert its hegemony over the island state. Since 1971, the country has existed as a fully independent nation.

Islam is the religion of Bahrain and is supported by legal structures, including laws against proselytization. However, the Muslim community is divided fairly equally between Sunni and SHI'A ISLAM, the latter enjoying a dominant role outside the urban areas. Divisions within the Muslim community are largely along national lines, there being many people from neighboring lands residing in Bahrain. The community has been especially influenced by the WAHHABI ISLAM adherents who dominate Saudi Arabia, especially since the opening in 1986 of the superhighway that connects the capital, al-Manamah, with the Arabian peninsula.

The Christian community had a third beginning in Bahrain in 1889 when representatives of the Arabic Mission of the REFORMED CHURCH IN AMERICA began work concentrated in education and medical assistance. This effort exists today as the National Evangelical Church of Bahrain, which has four congregations. Amy Elizabeth Wilkes, the first Anglican in Bahrain, was sent by the Church Missionary Society in 1895 to work in Baghdad. However, she met and married Samuel Zwemer, the head of the Reformed

Status of religions in Bahrain, 2000-2050

Followers	2000			2025	2050
	total	%	rate
Muslims	508,000	82.4	2.17	689,000	779,000
Christians	64,500	10.5	2.82	97,000	116,000
Independents	27,100	4.4	3.07	42,000	50,000
Roman Catholics	25,000	4.1	3.34	37,000	45,000
Protestants	5,100	0.8	2.72	7,400	9,000
Hindus	38,600	6.3	3.26	63,000	80,000
Nonreligious	3,200	0.5	8.63	5,000	10,000
Baha'is	1,400	0.2	3.27	2,400	5,000
Jews	620	0.1	2.12	700	900
Buddhists	430	0.1	6.05	600	1,000
Neoreligionists	60	0.0	11.98	100	300
Ethnoreligionists	60	0.0	11.98	100	250
Total population	617,000	100.0	2.34	858,000	992,000

work, and settled in Bahrain to assist him with what was known then as the American Mission. Only in the 1930s did enough Anglicans reside in Bahrain to organize a separate Anglican parish, and it was not until 1951 that a chaplain was secured. St. Christopher's Church (now St. Christopher's Cathedral), was dedicated two years later. The Anglicans, primarily expatriate British residents, now have the largest number of members among the small Christian community. The several congregations in Bahrain are part of the Diocese of Cyprus and the Gulf of the EPISCOPAL CHURCH IN JERUSALEM AND THE MIDDLE EAST. The ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH created a prefecture for Arabia in 1875 that included Bahrain in its assigned territory, but it was not until 1938 that its first (and only) parish was opened in al-Manamah. The parish is part of the present vicariate of Arabia, and its priests and religious also serve the Catholic community of Oman.

Given the size of the Christian community, it is extremely diverse, consisting almost totally of expatriates from different countries who have been allowed to bring their religion with them. The largest groups, from India, support the MAR THOMA SYRIAN CHURCH OF MALABAR, the St. Thomas Evangelical Church, the CHURCH OF SOUTH INDIA, and the Orthodox Syrian Church of India, among others. A variety of small Evangelical groups also operate within the Indian, British, and American expatriate communities. Although no Arab Bahrainis are openly Christian, observers suggest that there are many secret Christians who have quietly responded to the many radio broadcasts beamed into Bahrain from other countries.

Even smaller than Christianity in Bahrain, Hinduism has several thousand adherents and the Baha'i Faith several hundred, also all expatriates.

Sources:

- Barrett, David. The Encyclopedia of World Christianity. 2d edition. New York: Oxford University Press, 2001.
- Bissio, Roberto Remo, et al. Third World Guide 93/94. Montevideo, Uruguay: Instituto del Tercer Mundo, 1992.
- Horner, N. A. "Present-Day Christianity in the Gulf States of the Arabian Peninsula." Occasional Bulletin of Missionary Research 2 (April 1978): 53–63.

Status of religions in Bangladesh, 2000-2050

Followers	2000			2025	2050
	total	%	rate
Muslims	110,849,000	85.8	1.71	155,924,000	185,281,000
Hindus	15,995,000	12.4	1.34	19,500,000	23,000,000
Christians	934,000	0.7	2.49	1,518,000	1,964,000
Independents	536,000	0.4	2.97	950,000	1,250,000
Roman Catholics	235,000	0.2	1.63	325,000	410,000
Protestants	160,000	0.1	2.29	240,000	300,000
Buddhists	802,000	0.6	1.37	1,100,000	1,330,000
Ethnoreligionists	735,000	0.6	2.22	950,000	1,150,000
Nonreligious	93,700	0.1	4.22	130,000	200,000
Sikhs	21,300	0.0	1.70	29,000	43,000
Atheists	10,200	0.0	0.83	10,000	12,000
Baha'is	8,300	0.0	1.77	10,000	15,000
Zoroastrians	300	0.0	1.74	400	700
Total population	129,155,000	100.0	1.67	178,751,000	212,495,000

Bangladesh

In one sense, Bangladesh is one of the newer nations of the world, having been formed through the breakup of Pakistan in 1971. However, the area of present-day Bangladesh traces its history to the ancient kingdom of Banga and to the story of India recorded in the Mahabharata. In the seventeenth century, the British named the area of present-day Bangladesh and the section of India to the west, Bengal. In 1947, England divided the area into West Bengal (dominated by Hindus) and East Bengal (dominated by Muslims). East Bengal then became East Pakistan at the time the new nation of Pakistan was created. Through the 1950s and 1960s, the people of East Pakistan felt that it was being treated as the lesser partner in the new nation, and in 1971 they broke free.

Bangladesh (literally, the land of the Bengali-speaking people) also differed linguistically from West Pakistan, where Urdu and Punjabi were the dominant languages.

Hinduism flourished in the area for centuries, but in the thirteenth century Muslims from Afghanistan swept across the lands immediately south of the Himalayas, and Muslim rule was established in Banga. Various dynasties came and went prior to the seventeenth-century arrival of the Portuguese, the first Europeans in the area. They were followed by the Armenians, French, and British. Britain expanded its trade through the eighteenth century to the point that, following the battle of Plassey in 1757, it was able to take control of the region, later incorporating it into India. The people of East Bengal participated in the move to free India from British rule, thus setting the stage for the events that led to the reestablishment of the nation in 1971.

In the years following the Muslim conquest, Islam replaced Hinduism as the primary religion and today claims more than 80 percent of the population. Most follow the Sunni HANAFITE SCHOOL OF ISLAM, but there is a significant WAHHABI ISLAM minority and some followers of SHI'A ISLAM (most of whom trace their ancestry to Persia). The AHMADIYYA MOVEMENT IN ISLAM, condemned as not Muslim in Pakistan, as well as SUBUD (an Indonesian Sufi movement), has also established a presence in Bangladesh. The BAHÁ'Í FAITH, a new religion from Iran with roots in Shi'a Islam, began to spread in Bangladesh after being initially established among Iranian expatriates.

In 1975, the government declared Bangladesh an Islamic state. Though more than 80 percent of the population in Bangladesh, Muslims have been mild in their treatment of members of other faiths, especially Christians, Hindus, and Buddhists. Various interfaith efforts, such as the Bangladesh Buddhist Christian Hindu Unity Council, have made important contributions to social unity.

Roman Catholicism was introduced into the area in the sixteenth century by the Portuguese, but it was not until 1886 that it had grown to the point that a diocese could be erected. It found particular strength among descendants of those Portuguese who had intermarried with native Bengalis.

British Baptist William Carey, at the behest of the Baptist Missionary Society, initiated one of the great thrusts of Christian missionary history with his arrival in Bengal in 1793. The effort radiated out from Calcutta, by 1795 was in East Bengal, and by 1816 had been established in Dhaka. This work was incorporated into the Bengal Baptist Union. The union's work in East Bengal emerged, after several name changes, as the BANGLADESH BAPTIST SANGHA. Australian Baptists working along parallel lines built, beginning in the 1880s, what became the Bangladesh Baptist Fellowship. Its efforts were increased by the merger with separate work initiated by New Zealand Baptists and missionaries of the SOUTHERN BAPTIST CONVENTION. Carey is also remembered for doing the first translation of the Bible into Bengali.

Anglicans initiated work on the Indian subcontinent in the seventeenth century primarily to serve those involved in trade with the East India Company; however, it was not until early in the nineteenth century that missionaries settled in East Bengal. About this same time, 1817, Presbyterians from the CHURCH OF SCOTLAND launched a mission. In 1924, the CHURCH OF ENGLAND mission, the Presbyterians, and the Congregationalists of East Bengal joined the United Church of North India. Shortly thereafter the Anglicans withdrew from the United Church in order to form the Anglican Church in India, later known as the Church of India, Pakistan, Burma, and Ceylon. Those two churches (along with various Methodist and Baptist bodies) began what proved to be a forty-year negotiation process. In the 1970s, they finally created two churches, the CHURCH OF PAKISTAN and the CHURCH OF NORTH INDIA. The Church of Pakistan was no sooner created than the war that led to the establishment of Bangladesh as a separate nation occurred. Thus in 1971, the Diocese of Dhaka was set apart as the CHURCH OF BANGLADESH.

Also entering East Bengal in the nineteenth century were the Lutherans. The present Bangladesh Evangelical Lutheran Church was initiated by Norwegians, with later assistance from Denmark and the United States. Several Holiness and Pentecostal bodies initiated work early in the twentieth century, and the number of American missionary groups has grown considerably since World War II.

Among the more interesting Christian churches in the country are the indigenous churches, such as the Bengal Evangelistic Mission (which dates to 1833) and the All One in Christ Fellowship. The JEHOVAH'S WITNESSES entered East Bengal in the 1930s, and the CHURCH OF JESUS CHRIST OF LATTER-DAY SAINTS in the 1980s.

Christian ecumenism is focused in the Bangladesh National Council of Churches, founded in 1954 as the East Pakistan Christian Council. It cooperates with the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES. More conservative Evangelical denominations are united by the Evangelical Fellowship of India, which in turn is related to the WORLD EVANGELICAL ALLIANCE.

Although the country is predominantly Muslim, there is a significant Hindu and Buddhist presence in Bangladesh. Since the independence of Bangladesh, there has been a tendency of Hindus (draw from across the spectrum of Bengali Hinduism) to migrate to India. During the same period, the INTERNATIONAL SOCIETY FOR KRISHNA CONSCIOUSNESS, an American Hindu body with Bengali roots, has established work in Bangladesh. Buddhists tend to be concentrated in the easternmost part of Bangladesh, among various peoples residing east of Chittagong.

In the rural areas of the country, there are still peoples who follow traditional indigenous religions that are part of neither Hinduism nor Buddhism.

Sources:

- Baum, R. A. Islam in Bangladesh. International Studies in Sociology and Social Anthropology, vol. 58. Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1991.
- Biswas, S. Religion and Politics in Bangladesh and West Bengal: A Study of Communal Relations. Tokyo: Institute of Developing Economies, 1993.
- Khan, A. K. Christian Mission in Bangladesh: A Survey. Leicester, UK: Islamic Foundation, 1982.
- Roy, A. The Islamic Syncretistic Tradition in Bengal. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1983.

Bangladesh Baptist Sangha

British Baptists began their missionary enterprise in Bengal, north of Calcutta. The work quickly spread to East

Baptist Association of El Salvador

Bengal. They had little success among the Hindu and Muslim communities, but found a ready audience among various peoples in the backcountry, especially among the hill people east and south of Chittagong in the southeastern part of East Bengal. The work in Bengal grew up as a single mission, and that mission was reorganized in 1935 as the Bengal Baptist Union.

In East Bengal a number of primary and secondary schools were established and, in 1907, a hospital at Chandraghona. Pastors are trained at the Pastors Training School at Dhaka and through the College of Christian Theology, a cooperative project with several other Protestant groups.

In 1947 East Bengal left the nation of India and became part of Pakistan. In 1956, following the renaming of East Bengal as East Pakistan, the Bengal Baptist Union divided, and East Bengal was set apart as the Baptist Union of Pakistan. At that time East Bengal became a separate field for the missionary work of the Baptist Missionary Association representing the BAPTIST UNION OF GREAT BRITAIN. East Pakistan separated from Pakistan and became the state of Bangladesh in 1970/1971. Subsequently the Baptist Union of Pakistan was renamed the Bangladesh Baptist Sangha.

In the 1990s the Sangha reported 11,500 members in 231 congregations. The Baptists are the largest Protestant group in Bangladesh, and the Bangladesh Baptist Sangha (also known as the Communion of Baptist Churches in Bangladesh) is the largest of the several Baptist churches. It is a member of the BAPTIST WORLD ALLIANCE.

Address:

Bangladesh Baptist Sangha
33, Senpara Parbatta
Mirpur-10, Dhaka 12 16
Bangladesh

Sources:

Ahmed, R. Islam in Bangladesh: Society, Culture and Politics. Dhaka: Bangladesh Itihas Samiti, 1993.
Soddy, Gordon. Baptists in Bangladesh. Khulnu, Bangladesh: Literature Committee, National Council of Churches, Bangladesh, 1987.

Baptist Association of El Salvador

Baptist work in the small Central American nation of El Salvador began relatively late, in 1911, but built upon earlier work by independent Evangelicals with Baptist leanings. Since the late nineteenth century, Protestant distributors of Christian literature had traveled the country, and several autonomous missions had been established. In 1911 the American Baptist Home Mission Society (now an integral part of the AMERICAN BAPTIST CHURCHES IN THE U.S.A.) adopted William Keech, formerly superintendent of the British and Foreign Bible Society in Central America, to lead its work, and the society found its first group in adopting the mission in Santa Ana already begun by Percy T. Chapman and his wife. Chapman quickly extended the work by organizing groups that had emerged from the distribution of Christian literature. The Woman's American Baptist Home Mission Society (ABHMS) added their strength to the work and began to found elementary schools.

The work matured to the point that the Baptist Association of El Salvador was founded in 1934. The ABHMS continued its support, though in 1941 the seminary it had established was moved to Nicaragua. The Southern Baptist Convention added its support in 1974 through the assignment of a missionary couple to develop the literature ministry. They opened a bookstore, which cooperates with various Baptist groups in the country. The BAPTIST UNION OF GREAT BRITAIN, through the Baptist Missionary Association, added its support to the Nicaragua Association in 1988.

In the mid-1990s, the Baptist Association of El Salvador reported 5,500 members in 61 churches. Not a part of the association is the 5,000-member independent Baptist Church in San Salvador, which claims to be the largest Baptist congregation in Latin America. The association is a member of the BAPTIST WORLD ALLIANCE and the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES.

Address:

Baptist Association of El Salvador
Av. Sierra Nevada 922, Apartado 347
San Salvador
El Salvador

Sources:

Beers, G. Pitt. Ministry to Turbulent America. Philadelphia: Judson Press, 1957.
Kirkwood, Dean R. Renewal amid Revolution. Valley Forge: International Ministries, American Baptist Churches of the U.S.A., 1980.

Baptist Bible Fellowship International

The Baptist Bible Fellowship International grew out of the World Baptist Fellowship, which in turn had arisen within the SOUTHERN BAPTIST CONVENTION. At the height of the fundamentalist-modernist controversy in the 1930s, J. Frank Norris (1877–1952), pastor of the First Baptist Church of Fort Worth, Texas, emerged as a leading conservative fundamentalist voice. As pastor of a 28,000 member parish, he began to accuse the leadership in the convention of tendencies toward modernism (deviation from traditional Christian beliefs in response to modern changes) and cooperation with various ecumenical structures. As early as 1924, he was excluded from the Texas Baptist Convention, and then in 1931 he resigned from the Southern Baptist Convention and formed the Premillennial Fundamental Missionary Fellowship to raise money for fundamentalist missionaries in China.

Once separated from the Southern Baptists, Norris set about the task of building the fundamentalist cause nationally, and the Missionary Fellowship evolved into the World Baptist Association. The flamboyant and somewhat autocratic Norris drew many conservative pastors to his cause and trained others at the Arlington Baptist College. He also ultimately pushed away many of his followers by his manner.

In 1948, the aging Norris, who had also become pastor of a second church in Detroit, Michigan, turned the church congregation in Texas over to G. Beauchamp Vick (1901–1975). Two years later, Vick and Norris clashed at the annual meeting of the World Baptist Association, and Vick withdrew and with his supporters founded the Baptist Bible Fellowship. Also formerly the president of Arlington Baptist College, Vick quickly moved to found the Baptist Bible College in Springfield, Missouri, and the Baptist Bible Tribune. With Norris's death a scant two years later, the Baptist Bible Fellowship emerged as the most vital force in the continuing fundamentalist cause within the American Baptist community. It immediately gained support in the South and Midwest, and by the mid-1970s had become a national body. It also developed an aggressive evangelism and missionary program, and it became known for the large Sunday schools developed by its leading congregations.

In the mid-1990s the Baptist Bible Fellowship International reported 1,600,000 members in 3,500 churches in the United States. In addition it supports more than 750 missionaries in seventy countries. Besides the original Baptist Bible College (and its associated Baptist Bible Graduate School of Theology), the fellowship supports five additional colleges. The fellowship is not a member of any ecumenical groups. One of the fellowship's former ministers, Jerry Falwell (b. 1933), left to become one of America's leading televangelists in the late twentieth century and founder of Liberty University and Liberty Baptist Fellowship.

The fellowship's leaders follow a premillennial dispensational theology of the kind exemplified in the Scofield Reference Bible and the teaching of Irish theologian John Nelson Darby, founder of the PLYMOUTH BROTHERS movement.

Address:

Baptist Bible Fellowship International
Box 191
Springfield, MO 65801
<http://www.bbfi.org>

Sources:

Bartlett, Billy Vick. A History of Baptist Separatism. Springfield, MO: self-published, 1972.
Falwell, Jerry. The Fundamentalist Phenomena. Garden City, NY: Doubleday, 1981.

Baptist Convention of Hong Kong

Even before China ceded Hong Kong to Great Britain in 1842, Baptists had begun to use it as an entry point for missionary activity further inland. In 1836, John Lewis Shuck (1814–1863) arrived in Macao (a Portuguese colony since 1557) and moved on to Hong Kong in 1842. He opened the first Baptist church on Queen's Road, but after two years he moved to Canton. He had been joined in Hong Kong by William Dean, who opened the Tie Chiu Baptist Church. These two congregations were the first Baptist churches around the entire Pacific basin. The island remained the headquarters for American Baptists until 1860, when a shift was made to Swatow. Through the years, Baptist work in Hong Kong was kept alive even without missionary support and was eventually incorporated into the larger China mission of the SOUTHERN BAPTIST CONVENTION (SBC) in 1881. In 1938 the Hong Kong Baptist Association was formed. The first Baptist missionaries (from the SBC) were stationed in Macao in 1910.

Hong Kong took on added importance following the Chinese Revolution and the expulsion of missionaries from China. Many moved to Hong Kong, which became the vital center of Baptist work. A number of primary schools were created, and Hong Kong Baptist Theological Seminary (1951) and Hong Kong College, now University (1956), were established. The association matured into the Hong Kong Baptist Convention and grew into one of the strongest bodies in the territory.

In the 1990s, the convention reported a membership of more than forty-five thousand. It operates Baptist Press, which serves churches throughout Southeast Asia. The convention is a member of the BAPTIST WORLD ALLIANCE.

Address:

Baptist Convention of Hong Kong
73 Waterloo Rd., 1st Floor
Kowloon
Hong Kong

Source:

Wong, Paul Tat-Keung. The History of Baptist Missions in Hong Kong. Ph.D. dissertation, Baptist Theological Seminary, 1974.

Baptist Convention of Kenya

Missionary representatives of the SOUTHERN BAPTIST CONVENTION arrived in Kenya only in 1956, with the transfer of three families from their mission in Nigeria. Work was begun in Nairobi and Mombasa, and soon followed in the Nyeri region. The new mission found an immediate response, and the first church was formally initiated just two years later. The Shauri Mayo section of Nairobi became an early center of activity with the formation of a business college and community center.

Baptist Convention of Nicaragua

Growth had proceeded to the point that the Nairobi Baptist Association was formed in 1961. The Southern Baptists continued to offer support both in the form of finances and personnel. Other local associations followed, and they joined together to form the Baptist Convention of Kenya in 1971. The convention supports two secondary schools, a nonresidential theological college, and an effective correspondence course, the Bible Way, that has enrolled more than 150,000 Kenyans, including some 2,000 in the prison system. A coordinated evangelistic program is reaching out to the diverse language groups of the country. In one of its more successful campaigns in and around Mombasa in 1990, eighty-four new congregations were established.

The Baptist Convention joined the National Christian Council of Kenya, but withdrew over differences of opinion with its stances. The Nairobi Baptist Convention has remained a member of the council. The convention has also withdrawn fellowship from the original Baptist congregation, the Nairobi Baptist Church, because of the latter's practice of open communion.

In the 1990s the Baptist Convention of Kenya reported 150,000 members in 2,000 churches. It is a member of the BAPTIST WORLD ALLIANCE.

Address:

Baptist Convention of Kenya
P.O. Box 14907
Nairobi
Kenya

Source:

Saunders, Davis Lee. A History of Baptists in East and Central Africa. Th.D. dissertation, Southern Baptist Theological Seminary, 1973.

Baptist Convention of Nicaragua

In the 1840s, the Moravians opened work along the Miskito Coast, an area along the eastern coast of Nicaragua that at the time had existed for many years as a semi-autonomous region under the leadership of a local ruler loosely aligned to the British. In 1850, the Clayton-Bulwer Treaty assigned this land to Nicaragua as a protectorate, though it was many years before any effective authority was established in the area.

Baptist work began from Belize, where the Baptist Missionary Society (BMS) had been working since 1822. In 1850 the BMS withdrew from Belize and liquidated its property. Thus it was that in 1852 a young missionary, Edward Kelly (d. 1914), was free to come to Corn Island on the Miskito Coast. His work was interrupted in 1865 when a hurricane hit the coast and destroyed the chapel that had been built. After being away for more than a decade, he returned in 1880 and devoted the rest of his life to the mission.

In 1916, the American Baptist Home Mission Society (ABHMS) (now an integral part of the AMERICAN BAPTIST CHURCHES IN THE U.S.A.) held a significant conference in Panama on the needs for missions in Latin America. This conference led directly to the expansion of Baptist work to the larger Spanish-speaking part of Nicaragua. The Woman's American Baptist Home Mission Society adopted Eleanore Blackmore, already working in Nicaragua, and in 1917 the ABHMS sent George H. Brewer, who organized a church in Managua in 1918. The work had a slow but steady growth. The Woman's Society founded schools and a hospital, and later a college was opened in Managua. In 1941, the Central American Seminary, originally opened in El Salvador, was moved to Nicaragua.

The mission matured into the Baptist Convention of Nicaragua (Convención Bautista de Nicaragua) in 1937. It continued to be supported by American Baptists, and Southern Baptists added their support in 1990 with the assignment of Jim and Viola Palmer to Nicaragua. The Palmers had previously worked in Honduras.

The convention faced a serious challenge during the Sandinista era (1979–1990), as it attempted to remain politically neutral while extending freedom to its members to hold conflicting political views. In 1992 the convention experienced sudden growth from the incorporation of twelve churches that previously comprised the Miskito Baptist Association, an independent work built by Nicaraguan native Denis Centro.

In the mid-1990s the convention reported 9,000 members in eighty-six churches. It is a member of the BAPTIST WORLD ALLIANCE and the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES.

Address:

Baptist Convention of Nicaragua
Aopartado postal 2593
Managua
Nicaragua

Sources:

Beers, G. Pitt. Ministry to Turbulent America. Philadelphia: Judson Press, 1957.
Kirkwood, Dean R. Renewal amid Revolution. Valley Forge, PA: International Ministries, American Baptist Churches of the U.S.A., 1980.

Baptist Convention of Western Cuba

During the late nineteenth century, many Cubans came to the United States. Albert J. Díaz, who had joined a Baptist church in New York City, returned to his native land in 1882 and the following year organized the first Baptist congregation in the country at Havana. Word of what he had accomplished found its way to several Baptists in Key West, Florida, who in turn recommended that the SOUTHERN BAPTIST CONVENTION send some missionaries to Havana to offer Díaz some support. Díaz himself came to Key West in 1885 and was ordained as a minister. Upon his return he reorganized his congregation as a Baptist church and led them to baptism in the harbor at Havana. Shortly thereafter, F. W. Wood moved from Florida to Cuba under the auspices of the Jamaica Baptist Missionary Society and began work in Cienfuegos. The Southern Baptists began giving support in 1886.

In 1886 the Spanish authorities granted some degree of religious toleration, which allowed Díaz to purchase a cemetery plot and a former theater as the new Baptist headquarters. The work continued to develop across the island during the Spanish American War (when Díaz was imprisoned) and the establishment of the independent Cuban government with an American-style constitution. In the midst of these momentous occurrences, the Southern Baptists quietly worked out an agreement with the American Baptist Home Mission Society (now part of the AMERICAN BAPTIST CHURCHES IN THE U.S.A.) to divide the island. The American Baptists assumed responsibility for the eastern half and the SBC for the western part (including Havana).

In 1901, the Southern Baptists sent C. D. Daniel to Havana as superintendent over the Baptist work. Taking this as a vote of no confidence, Díaz resigned. Four years later Daniel led in the formation of the Baptist Convention of Western Cuba. The same year Nathaniel McCall arrived to found the Colegio Bautista and commence theological training in Havana. He soon succeeded Daniel as head of the convention and continued to lead it for the next forty-two years. He was succeeded by Herbert Caudill.

In 1959, Fidel Castro came to power. He has headed a regime that has been generally hostile to religion, but the Baptist Church has been able to survive, though the government has nationalized its many schools. Many of the missionaries left in 1961 when Castro openly declared the Marxist base of the new government. Then in 1965 he arrested Caudill and forty-seven other leaders of the Baptist Convention of Western Cuba. Most were sentenced to prison for currency violations and cooperation with the Central Intelligence Agency. Caudill was allowed to leave the country in 1969. Cuban Baptists emerged from this experience both self-supporting and self-governing.

In the mid-1990s the Baptist Convention of Western Cuba reported 7,600 members in 113 churches. Like its counterpart in eastern Cuba, it has joined the BAPTIST WORLD ALLIANCE.

Address:

Baptist Convention of Western Cuba
Zulueta No. 502, Esq. Dragones
Habana 2
Cuba

Sources:

Greer, Edward. "History of Southern Baptist Mission Work in Cuba, 1886–1916." M.A. thesis, University of Alabama, 1963.
Ramos, Marcos A. Protestantism and Revolution in Cuba. Coral Gables, FL: North-South Center for the Research Institute for Cuban Studies, University of Miami, 1989.

Baptist Union of Denmark

Baptist life in Denmark was deeply rooted in German Baptist work. Julius Köbner, the son of a Jewish rabbi, was converted to Christianity in 1826. Ten years later he was baptized by J. W. Oncken (1800–1884), the founder of the German Baptist movement. He became a close associate and assisted in the founding of the seminary in Hamburg and the spread of the Baptist movement throughout Europe.

In the late 1830s, Köbner established contact with some informal Bible study groups in Copenhagen, and toward the end of the 1830s he traveled to Denmark with Oncken and baptized eleven people. They formed the first Baptist church in Denmark in 1839. One of their number, Peder C. Monster, was arrested (on laws passed several centuries earlier against the Anabaptists) and later deported. Later Köbner returned to pastor the church. In 1849, the Union of Associated Churches of Baptized Christians in Germany and Denmark was formed. That same year, the laws governing religion were relaxed in Denmark, and the Baptists experienced some religious freedom as a "tolerated" group allowed. The Baptists could not, however, own property or solemnize weddings for their members, a privilege only granted in 1952.

In spite of obstacles, including the loss of many members to the CHURCH OF JESUS CHRIST OF LATTER-DAY SAINTS and the migration of a fourth of their members to the United States, the movement slowly grew. In 1888, it separated from the German Union and formed the Baptist Union of Denmark. By this time the group had built a relationship with American Baptists and accepted the New Hampshire Confession of Faith as their doctrinal statement. Their ministers were increasingly trained in the United States. By the end of the century, the Baptists had twenty-eight churches. In 1906 they joined the BAPTIST WORLD ALLIANCE. In 1918 they created their own seminary.

In the decades since World War I, the Danish Baptists have become a more ecumenical church. They have absorbed elements of Lutheranism into their doctrine, they practice open communion (meaning that non-Baptists may receive the Lord's Supper at their churches), and they have accepted individuals from infant-baptizing traditions without rebaptizing them (the common standard in Baptist churches being a nonrecognition of infant baptism). They have been members of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES since 1948, and they have also participated in the Lausanne Movement, a confessional movement of conservative evangelical Christians.

Danish Baptists have been active in foreign missions since 1928, when they began work in Burundi and Rwanda. They have continued in the last generation as a cooperative partner with the new postcolonial Baptist churches in Africa.

In the 1990s, Knud Wümpelmann became the first Dane elected as president of the Baptist World Alliance.

Address:

Baptist Union of Denmark
c/o Reverend Ole Jørgensen, Gen. Sec.
Købnerhus
Lærdalsgade 5, 1
2300 København S
Denmark

Sources:

- Hylleberg, Bent, and Bjarne Møller Jørgesen. Et kirkesamfund bliver til: Danske baptisters historie gennem 150 år. Brabde, Denmark: Føltveds Forlag, 1989.
- McBeth, H. Leon. The Baptist Heritage: Four Centuries of the Baptist Witness. Nashville, TN: Broadman Press, 1987.
- Rushbrooke, J. H. The Baptist Movement in the Continent of Europe. London: Kingsgate Press, 1923.

Baptist Union of Great Britain

Baptists emerged in the context of British Puritanism, the continued effort to reform the CHURCH OF ENGLAND, to “purify” it of all elements seen as unscriptural. During the Elizabethan era, some concluded that the Church of England could not be purified and that Christians should separate from it and organize congregations where proper belief prevailed and proper worship occurred, conclusions that gave them the name of Separatists. They believed that the church should be free of entanglement with the state and composed of those who actively professed the faith. Robert Browne (1550–1633) became a popular spokesperson for this position.

As the movement progressed, the logic of the Separatists led to several other conclusions, among them the belief that the local church should be the basic unit of organization of the church. The local church should be composed of baptized adult believers, and the proper biblical mode of baptism was full immersion. The Separatists’ emphasis on correct baptism later gave them their name. Their emphasis on the local church meant that the development of church associations was a relatively low priority. The focus on the local church, each headed by a pastor with distinctive background and training, also allowed a variety of theological perspectives to arise.

The Baptists emerged within the context of the Reformed theology of John Calvin (1509–1564) (while rejecting the presbyterian polity he advocated) and the assertion of God’s sovereignty and a belief in predestination. Reformed theology tended to affirm that God both foreknew and elected, or chose, those who would be saved. This view emphasized the need for those who knew themselves to be the elect, to be saved Christians, to organize themselves into pure congregations. Dissenting from this view were those identified with Dutch theologian Jakob Arminius (1560–1609), who affirmed that Christ died for all and left some room for human freedom. The Arminians asserted that any who responded in faith to Christ would be saved. This latter view emphasized the need for evangelism and calling people to have faith. John Smyth (c. 1570–1612) was an early Separatist identified with this position.

These two positions came to be identified with the Particular (Christ died for the elect) and General (Christ died for all) Baptists, and they were expressed in a set of Confessions, brief summaries of their theological perspective. The most important of the Confessions were, for the General Baptists, the Orthodox creed of 1678, and for the Particular Baptists, the Second London Confession of 1677 (revised and reissued in 1689). Crucial for the development of the Baptist position was Andrew Fuller (1754–1815). Raised as a Particular Baptist, Fuller faced the problem of the movement’s inward direction. He came to believe that the neglect of the example of the apostles, who were continually presenting the claims of Christ to unbelievers, was wrong. He led in the development of a theology that wedded the Particular position with a strong emphasis upon evangelism. Fuller’s moderate Calvinism eventually largely replaced the more stringent Calvinism that had previously dominated the Particular Baptists, though the older position was continually revived.

Given the emphasis upon the local church, it is not surprising that the Baptist movement could exist for centuries without national organizations and the development of denominational structures. More informal groupings had been able to meet the demands of the early generations. As early as the 1640s, Particular Baptists had formed regional associations, and pastors had met together for fellowship and theological discussions. There had even been national conventions. The motivation for a more stable national organization appears to have been a response to the success of the missions program. The need to undergird the missionary enterprise became a pragmatic rationale for the congregations’ drawing together in unity. Such a call was issued in 1811 by Joseph Ivimey.

The model for Ivimey was the very successful Baptist Missionary Society (BMS), formed in 1792 as the Particular Baptist Society for the Propagation of the Gospel among the Heathen. The moderate Calvinism of Andrew Fuller (1757–1815) provided the theological foundation, and a booklet by William Carey (1761–1834), An Enquiry into the Obligations of Christians to Use Means for the Conversion of the Heathen (1792), the inspiration. Fuller became the first secretary of the BMS, which was headquartered in Kettering, where he pastored a church. Carey was sent to India as the society's first missionary, and a new era in Protestant missions was launched.

The meeting in response to Ivimey's call was held at the London church pastored by John Rippon in 1812. That meeting issued a more formal call to Baptist churches to send representatives to a meeting the next year, a meeting in which a union was to be formed. The union would support missions, Sunday schools, preaching in more rural parts of the country, and the raising of funds for the construction of new church buildings. Forty-six ministers met to form the union. The new union initially involved only a minority of Baptists, Fuller being among those who refrained from participation. He felt that it would compete for attention with the BMS.

The union grew by steps through the nineteenth century. It underwent several reorganizations, but operated in the shadow of the BMS through its first fifty years. In the meantime, the General Baptists had pioneered organizational life as early as 1770 with the formation of the New Connection of General Baptists, inspired by the work of Dan Taylor, a pastor who came to the Baptists from the Methodists, with whom they shared a similar theological perspective. Also inspired by the missionary endeavor, but cut out from participation in the BMS, they formed the Foreign Baptist Mission in 1816 and patterned it on the BMS organizationally.

Through the nineteenth century the distinctions between General and Particular Baptists were softened. General Baptist congregations participated in both the New Connection and the Baptist Union and the doctrinal basis of the union was modified to down play Particular distinctions. Beginning in 1870, a growing number of leaders concluded that the two groups should unite. That merger occurred in 1891. The General Baptist structures were dissolved, and their substance incorporated into the union.

The creation of the new union in 1891 seemed also to mark a turning point in Baptist life in England. The Baptist denomination had arrived at the point of being established as a national organization. It tended to turn its attention away from evangelism, and growth stopped. The growth that did occur through the first half of the twentieth century came from the mission field. Through the nineteenth century, the union cooperated with the BMS in the development of an extensive international Baptist movement. Baptist churches emerged throughout the British colonies and beyond, and growth continued through the middle of the twentieth century. However, the last half of the century was characterized by the maturing and independency of the mission churches and the reorientation of the Baptist Union to life in a worldwide Baptist ecumenical fellowship, most clearly epitomized in the BAPTIST WORLD ALLIANCE.

At the end of the 1990s, the Baptist Union of Great Britain reported 140,000 members and 1,787 churches. It is a member of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES.

Address:

Baptist Union of Great Britain
Baptist House
P.O. Box 44
129 Broadway
Didcot, Oxfordshire OX11 8RT
United Kingdom
<http://www.baptist.org.uk>

Sources:

McBeth, H. Leon. The Baptist Heritage: Four Centuries of the Baptist Witness. Nashville, TN: Broadman Press, 1987.
Underwood, A. C. A History of the Baptists. London: Carey Kingsgate Press, 1947.

Baptist Union of Hungary

Baptist work in Hungary dates to 1842 and a fire that swept through Hamburg, Germany. In the wake of the fire carpenters from the large German-speaking community in Hungary came to Hamburg to assist in the rebuilding process. While there they encountered the members of the Baptist church headed by John G. Oncken (1800–1854). Five of the carpenters were baptized in 1845, and upon their return home formed a tract society to distribute Christian literature. Their activity was limited, given the country's law regulating religious activity outside the Roman Catholic Church. Authorities disbanded the first congregation that had formed in Budapest in 1846. In the 1860s, one of Oncken's assistants, G. W. Lehmann, made contact with the believers and while in Budapest held a midnight baptismal service in the Danube.

It was not until the 1870s, however, that a second congregation emerged. Oncken sent a new missionary, Heinrich Meyer, who formed a church in Budapest in 1874. He also discovered in Mahaly Kornya and Mihaly Toth two capable local workers. Kornya baptized over 11,000 people in the next thirty-five years. During this early stage, the work was conducted in German and primarily reached German-speaking Hungarians. Their work spread throughout Hungary, then part of the Hapsburg Empire, which included Transylvania (now in Romania) and parts of Slovakia and Serbia. Finally in 1893, two Hungarians, Lajos Balogh and Andreas Udvarnoki, completed studies at the seminary in Hamburg and began to build the church among Hungarian-speaking people. In 1905, the Hungarian-speaking work was organized as a separate union that received state recognition (leaving the German-speaking Baptists separated without such recognition). Only after World War I and the disruption of the Austrian hegemony in Hungary did the two groups come together as the Union of Hungarian Baptist Churches (Magyarországi Baptista Egyház). They were helped by the SOUTHERN BAPTIST CONVENTION and German-American Baptists, and in 1920 opened a seminary.

Baptist Union of New Zealand

Following World War II, Hungary came under the rule of a Marxist government, though its attitude toward religion was milder than that in neighboring Warsaw pact countries. The church negotiated its position with the government and survived with a minimum of persecution. Beginning in 1955, the union operated for a time under the name Hungarian Baptist Church. In 1967 it revised its doctrinal statement, adopted in 1902 from that of the German Baptists. The new statement affirms biblical authority, declaring that the Bible was written by divinely inspired men and compiled by the church under the guidance of the Holy Spirit. The Bible has thus been saved from essential error. The confession goes on to affirm the major Christian doctrines and speak of the religious life.

The Baptist Union emerged from the fall of the Marxist government at the end of the 1980s with the need to face the changes brought about by the new freedom. Among its first projects was the founding of an International Baptist Lay Academy, which attracts students from both Hungary and the neighboring countries. The church reported 11,000 members in 252 churches in the 1990s. It is a member of the Hungarian Evangelical Alliance, the BAPTIST WORLD ALLIANCE, and the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES.

Address:

Baptist Union of Hungary
Aradi ut. 48
1062 Budapest
Hungary

Sources:

- McBeth, H. Leon. The Baptist Heritage: Four Centuries of the Baptist Witness. Nashville, TN: Broadman Press, 1987.
- Rushbrooke, J. H. The Baptist Movement in the Continent of Europe. London: Kingsgate Press, 1923.
- Westin, Gunnar. The Free Church through the Ages. Nashville, TN: Broadman Press, 1958.

Baptist Union of New Zealand

The Baptist movement came to New Zealand with the original British settlers at the end of the nineteenth century. The Baptists worshipped with other denominations until enough arrived that separate churches could be formed, with lay leadership. It was not until 1851, however, that the first ordained minister arrived, Reverend Decimus Dolamore, who founded a church in Nelson. Among the additional ministers that found their way to the islands was Thomas Spurgeon, the son of the famous British preacher Charles Spurgeon. Others were trained in the school founded by Spurgeon, and they gave the New Zealand Baptists a decidedly conservative Reformed theological perspective. The movement continued to grow as immigration from England persisted.

Dolamore's early suggestion that a national association be created were ignored. Churches were scattered over the islands and had quickly developed an appreciation of their independency. Initial organization was centered on the Canterbury Baptist Association, created by six congregations in 1873. The association developed a plan of training and sending out lay preachers to form new churches. The association's success gave support to those desiring a larger union. Charles Dallaston called a meeting in Christ Church in 1880 to consider a national organization. The Baptist Union of New Zealand was formed in 1882, with twenty-two of twenty-five churches participating. Two years later the Canterbury Association disbanded and turned its periodical, the New Zealand Baptist, over to the union.

The union emerged with a broad program for missions, Christian education, and ministerial development, but was slowed by lack of resources. Its first program was a mission among the Maori people, the indigenous people of the islands. Thomas Spurgeon emerged as the leading minister, and he traveled the islands holding evangelistic services. Growth was aided by the development of an extensive Sunday school program for children and youth.

The New Zealand Baptists struggled to establish their identity. Many Baptists stayed with the original churches in which they had worshipped before Baptist churches had been founded. Also they experienced direct competition from the PLYMOUTH BRETHERN (EXCLUSIVE), who had similar organization and doctrine, but were known for their unique premillennial eschatology. Brethren founder John Nelson Darby had developed a method of Bible interpretation that divided Bible history into various eras or dispensations and saw the return of Christ as the next item on God's agenda for humankind. This dispensationalism, as it was called, appealed to ministers of a conservative Reformed theological background.

The union ended the nineteenth century on a down note, being strongly affected by the bad economic times and the migration of many of its members to Australia or back home to England. However, in the twentieth century they were able to reverse the trend and begin an era of growth. The Baptist Missionary Society of New Zealand was formed in 1885 and sent their first missionary to India. Over the twentieth century India became the focus of their foreign missionary work.

Through the early twentieth century, the union struggled with a leadership spread along a theological perspective and faced criticism from its most conservative leaders. However, a long history of interaction with other churches led gradually to the emergence of an ecumenical perspective in which Baptists, while asserting their unique identity, nevertheless saw themselves as a part of the larger Protestant camp. They joined the New Zealand Council of Churches in 1941 and applied for membership in the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES while that organization was still in its formative stages. The maturing of the church was further reflected in the change in missionary policy in 1967. The Indian mission was at the time in the process of being turned over to indigenous leaders. The “Other Avenues of Services” policy suggested that in the future New Zealand Baptists would operate through centers sponsored by other bodies.

At the end of the 1990s the Baptist Union of New Zealand reported 24,000 members in 200 churches.

Address:

Baptist Union of New Zealand
P.O. Box 97–543
South Auckland Mail Centre
Auckland
New Zealand

Sources:

History of the Baptist Union. Posted at <http://www.baptist.org.nz>
McBeth, H. Leon. The Baptist Heritage: Four Centuries of the Baptist Witness. Nashville, TN: Broadman Press, 1987.
Tenson, Paul, et al. A Handful of Grain: The Centenary History of the Baptist Union of New Zealand. 4 vols. Wellington, NZ: New Zealand Baptist Historical Society, 1982–1984.

Baptist Union of South Africa/ Baptist Convention of South Africa

Within South Africa, Baptists trace their origins to the arrival of the 1820 British settlers and the German settlers of 1857–1858. Baptist churches were formed first in the Eastern Cape and later in other parts of Southern Africa. This meant that Baptists, along with other denominations, were inextricably caught up in the processes of imperialism, colonialism, and, later, apartheid.

The first Baptist church in South Africa was established at Salem on the Assegai Bush River, followed by a church in Grahamstown (1823). Other English, German, and, later, Afrikaans Baptist churches were established in the following years. These were originally in the Eastern and Western Cape as well as in Natal. Subsequently, with the discovery of diamonds and gold, churches were established in the interior of the country. Limited support was received from churches in England and Germany, especially in the provision of ministers. In 1877, the Baptist Union was formed.

As a result of an agreement between the LONDON MISSIONARY SOCIETY and the Baptist Missionary Society, to the effect that the former would work in Southern Africa and the latter north of the Limpopo River, no Baptist missionaries were sent from overseas to South Africa. Mission work amongst the indigenous African inhabitants was first started by the German Baptists at Tschabo in 1870. The South African Baptist Missionary Society was only formed in 1892 to promote evangelism amongst the black population. These efforts were severely hampered by black anger and suspicion as a result of the occupation of previously Xhosa-owned land by white settlers and, equally, by lack of enthusiasm on the part of white Baptist settlers for missionary work as a result of the ongoing border wars. Later, the National Black American Baptists also engaged in mission work in the Eastern Cape.

In 1927, the Baptist Union grouped all the black churches into the Bantu Baptist Church. In 1966, the Bantu Church dissolved and was superseded by the Baptist Convention of South Africa. Ostensibly, this grouping existed under the Baptist Union umbrella, but it enjoyed no real equality and perpetuated the separation between white and black Baptists. Separate assemblies, ministerial rolls, theological education, and pension policies, together with subsequent general conformity with apartheid, served to entrench, within Baptist circles, the social stratification of the country as a whole. In 1987, the Baptist Convention declared itself an autonomous group, exposing the fiction of the Baptist “union,” and severed its remaining institutional ties with the Baptist Union (though some black churches did remain within the union).

Both the Baptist Union and the Baptist Convention of South Africa are members of the BAPTIST WORLD ALLIANCE.

The Baptist Union and the Baptist Convention are the two largest Baptist groups in the country, though small compared to the Methodists or Anglicans (CHURCH OF THE PROVINCE OF SOUTH AFRICA), but they are not the only groups. Other Baptist groups include the Afrikaans Baptist Churches and two Indian Baptist groups. All five of these groups formed the South African Baptist Alliance in 2001.

Addresses:

Baptist Convention of South Africa
Box 93521
Yeoville 2143
South Africa

Baptist Union of Southern Africa
Private Mailbag X45
Wilropark 1731
South Africa

Louise Kretzschmar

Sources:

Hudson-Reed, Sydney. By Taking Heed: The History of the Baptists in Southern Africa, 1820–1977. Roodepoort, South Africa: Baptist Publishing House, 1983.
Kretzschmar, Louise. Privatization of the Christian Faith: Mission, Social Ethics and the South African Baptists. Legon, Ghana: Asempa Press, 1988.

Baptist World Alliance

In 1904, Archibald T. Robertson (1863–1934), a professor at the Southern Baptist Theological Seminary in Louisville, Kentucky, wrote a brief article suggesting a conference of Baptists from around the world. The article was sent to a host of global contacts, and amid the many positive responses was that of J. H. Shakespeare, the editor of the Baptist Times and Freeman in London. Shakespeare and several prominent British Baptists extended an invitation to meet in London in the summer of 1905. Representatives from twenty-three countries gathered for the week of July 11–19, 1905, and formed the BAPTIST WORLD ALLIANCE. The word alliance was chosen deliberately to communicate to Baptists that the new organization had no plans to assume the functions normally assumed by Baptist unions, associations, or conventions.

The new organization set as its goals to promote fellowship between the world's Baptists, to offer inspiration, to speak on issues of mutual concern, such as religious freedom and world peace, and to coordinate the distribution of relief funds in response to emergencies. That the promotion of religious liberty was its first priority reflected in part the problems that Baptists were experiencing in extending their fellowship into predominantly Roman Catholic areas.

Shakespeare became the first general secretary, and his twenty years of service gave the alliance its early direction. The alliance was headquartered in London and projected plans for meetings every five years.

The alliance headquarters remained in London until 1941, when the German attack on London forced it to move to the United States, a move that became permanent. A European headquarters was established in London after the war, but later moved to Copenhagen, Denmark. Membership grew annually and increased markedly through the late twentieth century as missions matured into autonomous churches. The alliance identified (without formal affiliation) with the new WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES, though it has included many conservative Baptist bodies for whom the council was much too liberal. Additionally, many Baptists rejected fellowship with various groups that have affiliated with the council, such as the Orthodox churches. The SOUTHERN BAPTIST CONVENTION, the largest Protestant body in the United States, prominent in its absence from American and world ecumenical structures, has nevertheless remained a prominent force in the alliance.

The alliance operates through a set of regional Baptist fellowships, including the North American Baptist Fellowship, with whom it shares office space in Virginia. In the year 2000, the alliance reported 196 member Baptist associations and unions as members.

Address:

Baptist World Alliance
6733 Curran St.
McLean, VA 22101
<http://www.bwanet.org>

Source:

McBeth, H. Leon. The Baptist Heritage: Four Centuries of the Baptist Witness. Nashville, TN: Broadman Press, 1987.

Baptists

The Baptists are a Protestant church tradition whose theological origins (as seen in beliefs such as believer's baptism, freedom of religion, and separation between church and state) can be traced back to the sixteenth-century Anabaptists, who rejected infant baptism and held that adults should be rebaptized (whence Anabaptist), once they became believers. Historically, however, they are more closely linked to the seventeenth-century English Puritan Separatists.

Although this development of a middle way eventually led to the main body of English Christians being incorporated into the CHURCH OF ENGLAND, those who were called Puritans by their enemies, including those later known as Congregationalists and Presbyterians, demanded further purification of the church. They wished to move the church more clearly into the Protestant camp and change its government from rule by the monarch and the bishops appointed by the monarch to a congregational or presbyterian (rule by elders) system, though they still assumed that there would be only one church and that there would be an intimate tie between the church and state. Those who were called Separatists by their enemies, including the Baptists, while largely sharing the Protestant theology of the Congregationalists and Presbyterians, called for a more radical solution. They did not want to wait for the government to reform the church; they wanted to separate from the established church and form their own congregations, consisting only of true Christian believers, immediately. The Baptists also taught believer's baptism and stressed liberty of conscience and separation between church and state, refusing to accord to the state the authority to suppress "false" religious beliefs.

A baptismal ceremony by the sea in Eastbourne, England (J. Ringland/TRIP)

Following his acceptance of (adult) believer's baptism, the former Separatist John Smyth (d. 1612) formed a Baptist Church in the Netherlands (1609) whilst in exile from England. He is generally considered the founder of organized Baptists in England. Another erstwhile Separatist and member of Smyth's church, Thomas Helwys (c. 1550–c. 1616), returned home and established the first Baptist church in England in 1612. English Baptists largely espoused seventeenth-century radicalism, with its resistance to royal authority, and they participated in the English Civil War of 1642–1648. During the eighteenth century, they experienced religious decline, and they both benefited from and contributed to the Evangelical revival of the nineteenth century. Along with other groups such as Presbyterians, Congregationalists, Quakers, and Methodists, they were termed Dissenters, or Nonconformists, since they refused to conform to the established (Anglican) church.

The first German Baptist church was established in Hamburg in 1834. Along with German Baptists, the English (and some American Baptists) were involved in advancing Baptist work on the continent of Europe. European Baptists, through missionary work and colonial settlement, established many churches in other parts of the world, especially in Africa, Australia, and Asia.

Also in the seventeenth century, some Baptists emigrated along with the Puritans to North America from both England and the Netherlands. The first Baptist church in America was established by Roger Williams on Rhode Island in 1639, and Baptist churches later spread across what became the United States of America. Today, Baptist churches are prominent in the United States, with the SOUTHERN BAPTIST CONVENTION and the AMERICAN BAPTIST CHURCHES being two of the largest groups. As a result of the Great Awakening, a revival of religious life that affected a large part of the American colonies in the eighteenth century and the missionary movements of the nineteenth and twentieth centuries, Baptist churches were established in many other parts of the world, including Africa, Asia, and Latin America.

Today, Baptists form one of the largest Protestant communions in the world, with approximately 42 million baptized members and a Baptist community of about 100 million. The BAPTIST WORLD ALLIANCE (BWA) is an international fellowship of 188 national unions or conventions from across the world. The major foci of the BWA are fellowship, justice, evangelism, and aid (relief and development).

Along with other Christian traditions, Baptists share a faith in the Triune God, commitment to the Gospel of Jesus Christ, belief in the authority of the Bible, the priesthood of all believers, the church as a community of believers, and the importance of mission. In addition, certain principles are stressed by Baptists, although specific interpretations of these principles may differ. Baptists practice believer's baptism (as opposed to infant baptism) because of their understanding of Christian faith as centered in personal, conscious, and committed discipleship. They stress regenerative church membership and congregational (as opposed to episcopal or presbyterian) church government. Some Baptists speak of the autonomy of the local church, others of the interdependence of Baptist churches.

Baptists believe in the separation of church and state because of their conviction that religious belief cannot be compelled; thus, they strongly support religious freedom and resist religious persecution. Different understandings of the Baptist principle of the separation of church and state throughout Baptist history have led some Baptists to neglect social involvement, whilst others have been leaders in social renewal and transformation. With respect to war and political involvement, Baptists in different contexts and periods have sometimes been pacifists and, at other times, participated in both revolutionary movements and wars. Unlike some denominations, Baptists do not adhere to a definitive doctrinal creed, but they do espouse an acceptance of the authority of the Bible and basic Christian beliefs, together with the above-mentioned Baptist principles.

Louise Kretzschmar

Sources:

- Cook, Henry. What Baptists Stand For. London: Carey Kingsgate, 1961.
- Macbeth, Leon. The Baptist Heritage: Four Centuries of Baptist Witness. Nashville: Broadman Press, 1975.
- Payne, Ernest. The Story of the Baptists. London: Baptist Union Publishers, 1978.
- Stanley, Brian. The History of the Baptist Missionary Society, 1792–1992. Edinburgh: T. & T. Clarke, 1992.
- Torbet, Robert G. A History of the Baptists. Philadelphia: Judson Press, 1950, 1975.
- Wardin, Albert W., ed. Baptists around the World. Nashville, TN: Broadman and Holman Publishers, 1995.

Barbados

Barbados, the most easterly of the Caribbean islands, was originally home to the Arawak people and was one of the few islands not taken over by the Caribs. The Spanish landed there in the early 1500s and repaid the kindness of the Arawak people with a wholesale massacre. When the British landed a century later, they found the island uninhabited. Looking for farmland rather than mineral wealth, they settled the land and installed a plantation system (focused on sugar cane) that also required their bringing large numbers of slaves from West Africa. The descendents of the Africans constitute the majority of the present population. Slavery was abandoned in 1834; however, universal voting rights were not extended until 1951. Independence was granted, within the British Commonwealth, in 1966.

The CHURCH OF ENGLAND was established with the arrival of the first settlers in 1626. The Diocese of Barbados was created in 1824. It is now an integral part of the CHURCH OF THE PROVINCE OF THE WEST INDIES, one of a number of new autonomous Anglican churches created as the Church of England divested itself of its matured mission churches around the world. More than half of all Barbadians, who now number around 260,000, consider themselves Anglican in church membership. The archbishop currently resides in Nassau, the capital of the Bahamas.

The Moravians and Methodists, two of the pioneer Protestant bodies who developed world missionary programs, came to Barbados in 1765 and 1788 respectively. The Moravians developed a special interest in evangelizing the plantation workers. British Methodists redirected some of their energy away from their lost work in the former American colonies to evangelization in the Caribbean. The Moravians are part of the MORAVIAN CHURCH, EASTERN WEST INDIES PROVINCE, with headquarters in Antigua, and the Methodists are part of the METHODIST CHURCH IN THE CARIBBEAN AND THE AMERICAS, with headquarters in Antigua.

Beginning in the last decades of the nineteenth century and continuing through the twentieth century, numerous Protestant and FREE CHURCHES, primarily from the Status of religions in Barbados, 2000-2050

Followers	2000			2025	2050
	total	%	rate
Christians	262,000	96.8	0.46	284,000	269,000
Protestants	85,200	31.5	0.63	105,000	94,000
Anglicans	77,300	28.6	-0.26	70,000	70,000
Independents	17,500	6.5	3.10	24,000	28,000
Baha'is	3,500	1.3	3.49	5,000	7,000
Muslims	2,000	0.8	1.45	3,200	4,800
Nonreligious	1,400	0.5	1.88	2,400	4,000
Hindus	890	0.3	1.09	1,200	1,400
Buddhists	110	0.0	0.77	150	210
Spiritists	50	0.0	0.77	90	140
Jews	30	0.0	0.65	60	90
Ethnoreligionists	30	0.0	1.14	50	80
other religionists	470	0.2	4.61	700	1,000
Total population	270,000	100.0	0.50	297,000	288,000

United States, arrived in Barbados to begin mission work. Among the earliest was the AFRICAN METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH (1897), which had a decade previously opened work in the Bahamas. Among the most successful were the CHURCH OF GOD (CLEVELAND, TENNESSEE) who operate on Barbados as the New Testament Church of God, a Pentecostal body. The Holiness churches are well represented by the CHURCH OF THE NAZARENE, the WESLEYAN CHURCH (whose work had been initiated by the former Pilgrim Holiness Church), the United Holy Church of America, the Bible Missionary Church, and THE SALVATION ARMY. A number of the Protestant churches are members of the Barbados Christian Council, which is related to the Caribbean Conference of Churches and through that organization to the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES.

The SPIRITUAL BAPTISTS, a group that mixes African and Christian religious and cultural themes, has spread to Barbados from Trinidad and Tobago, where it originated early in the twentieth century. It is a spirit-possession religion, in which members believe themselves possessed of the Holy Spirit and are led to dance, sing, or, most characteristically, shout. They came to be known as the shouters by their early detractors. The Spiritual Baptists significantly enlarged the spectrum of Christian life on Barbados as have other groups such as the JEHOVAH'S WITNESSES, the CHRISTADELPHIANS, the CHURCH OF JESUS CHRIST OF LATTER-DAY SAINTS, the UNITY SCHOOL OF CHRISTIANITY, and the CHURCH OF CHRIST, SCIENTIST.

Barbados has one of the oldest Jewish communities in the Western Hemisphere, a community formed in 1650 by refugees from Brazil who escaped when the Portuguese retook land seized by the religiously tolerant Dutch. The Jewish community existed quietly on Barbados through the eighteenth century, and in 1820 Barbados became the first British colony to remove all political disabilities of the Jews. The Jewish community declined through the early twentieth century, as many moved away to escape the poor economy. However, in 1932, when only one practicing Jew was left on the island, a new community of Jews arrived from Europe. The community grew and prospered, so that in 1987 they were able to reopen the old synagogue in Bridgetown, the second oldest synagogue in the Western Hemisphere (only the one in Curaçao being older). Today there are about fifty-five Jews on Barbados.

The BAHÁ'Í FAITH came to Barbados in the 1960s and has established a string of spiritual assemblies through the islands. There are more than 800 Muslims on Barbados, centered on a teaching center in Hastings. There are some 500 Hindus (most from East India), the majority residing in Bridgeport.

Sources:

- Blackman, F. Methodism: 200 Years in Barbados. Bridgetown, Barbados: Caribbean Contact, 1988.
- Campbell, P. F. The Church in Barbados in the Seventeenth Century. St. Michael, Barbados: Barbados Museum and Historical Society, 1982.
- Hill, B. Historic Churches of Barbados. Bridgetown, Barbados: Art Heritage Publications, 1984.
- Maynard, G. O. A History of the Moravian Church: Eastern West Indies Province. Port of Spain, Trinidad: Yuille's Printerie, 1968.

Basel Mission

The Basel Mission, the Evangelische Missionsgesellschaft in Basel, one of the leading missionary societies that facilitated the phenomenal spread of Protestant Christianity around the world in the nineteenth century, was a product of the spread of Pietism and the British Evangelical Awakening in Central Europe. Christians from various denominations found new spiritual life as a result of the movement, one result of which was the desire to spread the Christian message around the world. The mission began to support a school for the training of missionaries, and sent out its first missionaries under the auspices of some of the older missionary societies, particularly the CHURCH MISSIONARY SOCIETY, which shared similar roots in the Evangelical Awakening.

In 1922, the Basel Mission sent out its first missionaries under its own direct sponsorship. They took up work in Russia. Work spread to Ghana, India, Hong Kong, and southern China within the first generation. Work expanded in Africa after Germany established new colonies in the 1880s, but then shrank following the loss of those colonies following World War I. In fact, it lost all of its work for a short period as a result of its identification with Germany (even though it was based in Switzerland), but regained many of its posts during the 1920s.

The work grew considerably during the 1940s, and as World War II approached, structural changes were made to prevent the kind of disruption that occurred during World War II. The German part of the society was set apart as a separate German branch with headquarters at Stuttgart. The Swiss branch was thus able to continue with little disruption through the war years.

Over the years, support for the mission had come from a variety of sources, though Reformed churches in Germany and Switzerland provided the bulk of the support, and the missionaries tended to be in the REFORMED/PRESBYTERIAN TRADITION. The establishment of an exclusively Swiss branch of the mission gave it an even more exclusively Reformed outlook, as it relied heavily upon support from the FEDERATION OF SWISS PROTESTANT CHURCHES.

In the postwar years, the mission has had to respond to the changing face of Protestantism worldwide, especially the maturing of missions into independent churches. One symbol of this change was the alignment of the mission with the other mission organizations that constituted the Swiss Mission Council and the German Mission Council and the alignment of both these councils with the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES. Most recently, the Basel Mission merged with four other missionary organizations to create Mission 21.

Mission 21 continues an active international program supporting the indigenous churches that grew out of its earlier missionary activity.

Address:

Mission 21
Missionsstrasse 21
Postfach, 4003 Basel
Switzerland
<http://www.mission-21.org> (German only)

Source:

Mission 21 (in German). Posted at <http://www.mission-21.org>. Accessed September 15, 2001.

Batak Christian Community Church (GPKB)

The Batak Christian Community Church was formed in 1927 when a group of ministers and churches withdrew from the RHENISH MISSION (now known as the PROTESTANT CHRISTIAN BATAK CHURCH), which had been working for many years among the Batak people of Sumatra, Indonesia. The new church established a presbyterial-synodal polity. The synod operates as the church's governing body. It calls pastors, appoints them to churches, and pays their salaries. The chair of the synod is designated as the church's ephorus, or bishop. The church has a Lutheran theological perspective, inherited from the German Lutheran Church through the Rhenish Mission.

The church chose the name Gereja Punguan Kristen Batak (or Batak Christian Community Church) and is generally designated by the acronym of its Indonesian name, GPKB. Relative to its parent body, it is a small church with fewer than 20,000 members. It is based among the Batak people but has extended its mission beyond the Batak population to include, for example, the Maya-Maya people in the northern part of the island. It operates two Bible schools for training lay evangelists. Ministers complete their theological work at one of several schools operated by other churches, including that of their parent body.

After World War II, the church reestablished relations with the Rhenish Mission, now known as the United Evangelical Mission, and with the Lutheran Church of Australia. It is also a member of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES, the LUTHERAN WORLD FEDERATION, and the Community of Churches in Indonesia.

Source:

Bachmann, E. Theodore, and Mercia Brenne Bachmann. Lutheran Churches in the World: A Handbook. Minneapolis, MN: Augsburg Press, 1989.

Bektashis (Bektashiye)

The Bektashiye is a heterodox Turkish dervish order located today mainly in Albania and, to a lesser extent, in its traditional homeland Turkey. The order claims patronage of Haji Bektash Veli, a legendary thirteenth-century figure who, according to Bektashi tradition, traveled from Horasan in eastern Iran to Anatolia as a follower of the famous Sufi sheikh Ahmad Yasawi (d. 1166). He was likely involved in the Sufi-led Babai Rebellion against the Seljuk Turks in 1240 in southeastern Anatolia. Following the suppression of the revolt, he settled in a small, central Anatolian village now known as Hajibektash. The Babai Rebellion forms also the nucleus for the development of the socio-religious milieu, which nowadays is known as "Alevi" (see ALEVISM). Bektashis and Alevis share part of their history and even more so rites and beliefs but are nevertheless different in their organization. Today it is common among Alevis to call themselves "Alevi-Bektashis"—a member of the Bektashi order, however, would hardly call himself an "Alevi."

The Bektashiye took on its characteristic feature as a Sufi order in the early sixteenth century under the leadership of Balim Sultan (d. 1516), possibly appointed as head of the Sufi lodge of Hajibektash by Sultan Bayezid II. Balim Sultan, honored by the Bektashis as their "second master," managed to formalize the guiding rules and structures of the order. He brought together Anatolian dervishes of different traditions (mainly Kalenderiye, Haydariye, and Yeseviye) who united in their adoration of Haji Bektash. It is quite possible that the institutionalization of the Bektashis as a Sufi order was politically motivated. Its goal might have been to bind together and de-radicalize a socio-religious milieu, which supported the Shah of Persia whom it regarded as its religious leader. The Anatolian adherents of the Persian Shah, the so-called "Kizilbash," conducted several revolts against the Ottoman Empire and thus were considered a severe political threat.

Though historically still quite obscure, there are circumstances indicating that the division of the order into the two branches of the Babayan and Celebiyan was a product of Balim Sultan's innovations. Given his institutionalization of the order, especially his introduction of celibacy as a condition for members initiated in the higher ranks of the order, he can be regarded as the founder of the Babayan branch of the Bektashiye. Whereas the Celebi, spiritual leader of the Celebiyan, legitimized his position by claiming direct descent from Haji Bektash, the Babayan branch insisted on Haji Bektash's celibacy and therefore established the leadership of the order by vote. Opposed to the Celebiyan who do not bear the formal characteristics of a Sufi order and are instead part of the rural Kizilbash-Alevi milieu, the Babayan branch bears these characteristics and can therefore be counted as a Sufi order.

The hierarchy of the Bektashi order is structured by the spiritual level of its adherents. The order is led by the elected dedebaba, followed by the dedes (or khalifes) and the babas. Although the babas act as principals of the dervish lodges, the primary function of the dede is to keep the various lodges in contact with the center in Hajibektash, residence of the dedebaba. The adherents who are not yet initiated stand outside the life of the lodge and are called ashik, while the initiated ones are named muhip. After several years of service in the lodge, the muhip may obtain the status of a fully initiated dervish—provided he meets the requirement of celibacy. Low-ranked Bektashis owe obedience to high-ranked Bektashis, who act as spiritual guides (mürshid) for the former on the mystic path. The guidance of the mürshid is essential for the spiritual path.

According to the doctrine of the “Four Gateways” (dört kapı) at the heart of Bektashi as well as Alevi belief, the first station of the mystical path is the shariat kapısı (“Gateway of the law”), symbolizing the exoteric meaning of the religious law. It is followed by the tarikât kapısı (“Gateway of the path”), involving a candidate’s initiation into Bektashi rites and beliefs. The third station, the marifet kapısı (“Gateway of knowledge”), marks the achievement of mystical experience and knowledge. As metaphor for the inner experience of the mystical union with God, the hakikat kapısı (“Gateway of truth”) is the highest level.

In contrast to adherents of orthodox Sunni and SHI’A ISLAM, the Bektashis typically not only reject the religious duties of Islam but also perceive God as immanent, manifesting himself in nature and human beings, especially in the human face. The Bektashis themselves link the pantheistic element in their philosophy with the ideas of the famous mystic Ibn ‘Arabî (d. 1240), while their conception of God’s manifestation in the human derives from the strong influence of the Hurufi sect, which emerged in fifteenth-century Persia.

With regard to their rites and doctrines, the Bektashi order appears extremely syncretistic. Alongside diverse influences of heterodox Muslim mysticism, it draws together pre-Islamic Turkish as well as Manichaean and some Christian elements. Notwithstanding its non-Muslim contents, Bektashi terminology is highly influenced by Shi’a mythology and different Sufi conceptions. The Bektashis’ astonishing ability to integrate foreign religious conceptions may be explained by the fact that the rules and doctrines of the order never underwent formal, written canonization.

The most important rite of the Bektashis (as well as Alevi) is the so-called “Celebration of Communion” (ayin-i cem). Central to the celebration is the recollection of mythical events of early Shi’a history and the praising of its martyrs. The recollection is accompanied by the music of the saz (a traditional stringed instrument) and mourning hymns. Especially in Ottoman times the use of wine during the communion, the participation of women, and its celebration at night provoked severe criticism from orthodox Muslims who accused Bektashis and even more so Alevis of celebrating sexual orgies in their meetings.

The history of the order is still quite obscure. From the rise of the Ottoman Empire in the fourteenth century, Bektashi dervishes, as well as adherents of similar traditions that later fused with them, were at the forefront of Ottoman expansion deserving of the Islamization of new territories, especially the Balkan region. Their close relations with the Ottoman elite forces, the janissaries, made them a sort of army clergy. Their institutional relationship with the Ottoman Empire came to an abrupt end in 1826, when the janissary forces, whom the Sultan accused of leading a conspiracy, were dissolved, and the closely related Bektashi order was disbanded. Many of its lodges were destroyed or transferred to the strictly orthodox NAQSHBANDIYA SUFI ORDER, and many highly ranked Bektashis were killed or fled to Albania; by the mid-nineteenth century, however, the order had nonetheless succeeded in reestablishing itself as a semi-legal institution in the Ottoman Empire. Resembling FREEMASONRY in the second half of the nineteenth century, the order was finally forbidden by the Kemalist ban on all Turkish Sufi orders in 1925. Thereafter, Bektashis in Turkey had to leave their lodges and could go on with their rites only in secret private circles. Albania, always a stronghold of the order, became a refuge for high-ranked Bektashis who fled Turkey. From the last decades of the nineteenth century, Albanian and Turkish Bektashis had already parted ways, due to their involvement in the respective nationalist projects and to highly different political and societal circumstances. This alienation was deepened when the Turkish Bektashis loosened the rule of celibacy after the closure of the dervish lodges, a measurement severely criticized by the Albanian Bektashis.

Today the order is strongest in Albania, where the Bektashi order was rehabilitated as an officially recognized religion after the downfall of the Communist regime in 1990; after Albania, Turkey and the Turkish diaspora states are home to the largest numbers of committing Bektashis. Bektashi convents are found in Albania, but there is also one in Michigan (U.S.). The order is secretive and tends to be separatist relative to Sunni but also orthodox Shi’a Islam. No headquarters or contact addresses are currently available.

Markus Dressler

Sources:

- Birge, John Kingsley. The Bektashi Order of Dervishes. 1937. Reprint, London: Weatherhill, 1994.
- Dressler, Markus. Die alevitische Religion. Traditionslinien und Neubestimmungen. Abhandlungen für die Kunde des Morgenlandes LIII, 4. Ergon: Würzburg, 2002.
- Mélikoff, Irène. Hadji Bektach: un mythe et ses avatars. Genèse et évolution du soufisme populaire en Turquie. Islamic History and Civilization, Studies and Texts 20. Leiden: Brill, 1998.
- Ocak, Ahmet Yaşar. “Bektaşilik.” In Türkiye Diyanet Vakfı İslam Ansiklopedisi, vol. 5. Istanbul: Türkiye Diyanet Vakfı, 1995, pp. 373–379.
- Popovic, Alexandre, and Gilles Veinstein, eds. Bektacchiyya. Etudes sur l’ordre mystique des Bektachis et les groupes relevant de Hadji Bektach. Istanbul: İsis, 1995.

Belarus

The territory of the present country of Belarus was settled around the first century C.E. by several Slavic peoples and centuries later participated with Slavic peoples in adjacent lands to form Kiev Rus, the state that eventually gave rise to the modern countries of Russia, Ukraine, and Belarus. The differentiation of the three cultures and language occurred gradually through the fourteenth, fifteenth, and sixteenth centuries. In 1569, Belarus was incorporated into Poland, and their cultural identity was further forged in the attempt to resist the imposition of the ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH. However, in 1596 the Belarusian Orthodox Church became an Eastern-Rite Roman Church.

In the 1790s, Russia completed its annexation of Belarus, and the Orthodox Church was reestablished. At this time, authorities also forbade the use of the term Belarusian. Belarus became an important part of the Russian Empire, and the key railroad line connecting Moscow to Poland passed through Minsk and Brest.

Belarus became a pocket of discontent at the beginning of the twentieth century. At the end of World War I, an independent Belarus was proclaimed, but it dissolved when Poland and the Soviet Union split the land in two. The Polish part of Belarus was incorporated into the Soviet Union in 1937. Finally, in the wake of the dissolution of the Soviet Union, Belarus emerged as an independent country.

In 1889, Vladimir, the ruler of the Kiev Rus, converted to Orthodox Christianity, and the process of Christianization of the Slavic people, including the Belarusians, began. It was largely completed over the next centuries. A form of Orthodox Christianity utilizing the Slavonic language came to dominate in the region.

In the fourteenth century, Lithuania expanded to include the Belarusians, and the Lithuanians brought Roman Catholicism with them. Several orders, including the FRANCISCANS, began work among the people, and the Catholic church began to draw away believers from Orthodoxy. This initiated a centuries-long struggle between the two churches. That struggle had a major turning point in 1596, when Bishop Ipati Poci (1541–1613) led in a union of the Orthodox and Catholic factions by convincing the Orthodox leaders to form a Uniate church. The Orthodox kept their liturgy and many of their customs but united with Rome theologically and administratively. Thus the GREEK CATHOLIC CHURCH came to dominate in Belarus.

Following the Russian takeover a century later, authorities suppressed the Roman Catholic Church, both the Status of religions in Belorussia, 2000-2050

Followers	2000			2025	2050
	total	%	rate
Christians	7,191,000	70.3	0.41	8,107,000	7,504,000
Orthodox	4,986,000	48.7	0.49	5,450,000	5,000,000
Roman Catholics	1,350,000	13.2	1.18	1,570,000	1,600,000
Protestants	130,000	1.3	3.75	320,000	500,000
Nonreligious	2,454,000	24.0	-0.27	1,137,000	622,000
Atheists	506,000	4.9	-3.97	150,000	80,000
Jews	58,300	0.6	0.06	60,000	60,000
Muslims	25,900	0.3	1.66	40,000	60,000
Buddhists	1,000	0.0	0.44	1,500	3,000
Ethnoreligionists	510	0.0	0.26	600	800
Baha'is	110	0.0	0.58	150	400
Total population	10,236,000	100.0	-0.02	9,496,000	8,330,000

Latin rite and the Greek rite, and imposed the Russian Orthodox Church on Belarus. Believers in the western part of the country, especially those of the Latin Rite of Polish background, resisted the Russification and remained loyal to Rome. Their position was supported between 1921 and 1939 when Western Belarus was again part of Poland. However, the Greek rite was almost totally suppressed.

Both the Orthodox and Catholic Church suffered during the Soviet era, but both were able to revive in the 1990s. The Greek Church essentially started over in 1990. It currently has a dozen parishes in the major cities of the county served by six priests and one deacon. Seminarians are in training and will be immediately put into service as new parishes emerge across the country.

In 1989, the Russian Orthodox Church in Belarus was designated as a semi-autonomous Belarusian Exarchate.

The ten dioceses include approximately half of the ten million citizens of the country. Cardinal Kazmierz Swiatek, archbishop of the Minsk-Mogilev Archdiocese, heads the approximately four hundred Roman Catholic parishes, with an estimated 10 to 20 percent of the population.

In 1997, the government established the State Committee on Religious and National Affairs (SCRNA) to oversee the various religions and denominations. The government, while professing to treat all religions as equal before the law, has shown distinct bias in favor of the Orthodox Church, which receives various financial advantages. The country's president has declared the preservation and development of the Orthodox Church to be a moral goal of the country. The Roman Catholic Church, as the second largest religious organization, has seen itself in a struggle for equal treatment by the government.

LUTHERANISM spread to Lithuania in the 1540s and from there found its way to the cities of Belarus. Following close behind were representatives of the REFORMED/PRESBYTERIAN TRADITION. Beginning in the 1570s, however, Polish Unitarianism, that is, Socinianism, spread into Belarus, and all three variations on Protestant Christianity competed with each other and found their pockets of strength. While facing various problems, the Reformation churches survived into the twentieth century, but during the Soviet era they disappeared. In 1992, the first congregation of the Belarusian Evangelical Reformed Church was founded in Minsk as a self-conscious attempt to revive the Reformed tradition. Lutheranism also revived in the 1990s, and in 1997 there were four parishes, which had become ten parishes by the end of the century. The constituting Synod of the Belarusian Evangelical Lutheran Church took place on December 2, 2000, in Vitsyebsk.

BAPTISTS began work in Belarus in 1877, when Dmitri P. Semenov, who had become a Baptist while living in Odessa, returned to his home village of Usokh. He built a small following, which constituted the first (and for some years the only) Baptist congregation in the country. In the meantime, Baptists began to arrive in Belarus from their center in St. Petersburg. A second congregation was organized in 1912 under the leadership of B. S. Cheberuk. Through the early twentieth century various other Protestant and FREE CHURCHES emerged, including the first Pentecostal churches and a few Methodist churches.

The annexation of Belarus to Russia in 1937, the attempts to suppress religion by the Marxist government, and World War II led to numerous changes in the ensuing years. The Baptists joined with other Evangelicals in the All-Union Council of Evangelical Christians-Baptists in 1944. Pentecostals merged into the Union in 1945. Even earlier, in 1937, the Methodists had disbanded the Russian Mission and advised all the members to join the Baptists or one of the other Free Churches. What is now the UNION OF EVANGELICAL CHRISTIANS-BAPTISTS OF RUSSIA experienced continued suppression through the 1960s but found some relief in the 1980s and has experienced significant growth through the 1990s. When allowed, the Pentecostals pulled away and formed their own church. The Pentecostal Union, with more than 16,000 members, is the largest Evangelical church in Belarus. The SEVENTH-DAY ADVENTIST CHURCH also had established work in the country, which was organized into the Belarus Conference in 1978.

Some religions are viewed as traditional, including Russian Orthodoxy, Roman Catholicism, Judaism, and Islam (as practiced by a small community of ethnic Tatars with roots in the country dating back to the eleventh century); some are viewed as nontraditional, including some Protestant and other faiths; and some are viewed as sects, including Eastern religions and other faiths. The authorities deny permission to register legally at the national level to some faiths considered to be nontraditional and to all considered to be sects. Without legal registration, it is extremely difficult to rent or purchase property in order to hold religious services.

Jews appear to have first settled in Belarus in the fifteenth century and were identified with the Lithuanian segment of the population. Through the next century communities sprang up in most of the larger towns and cities. They periodically faced attempts to force them to convert to Christianity and often had to pay taxes at a much higher rate than Christians. At the time of the Russian annexation of all of Belarus in 1939, there were more than 400,000 Jews living there. During the time that the Germans occupied the territory of the Soviet Union, approximately three-fourths of the Jewish population (including those trapped in Belarus) were massacred. After the war, less than 100,000 could be found in Belarus. In 1989 there were some 112,000 Jews in Belarus, but over the next three years almost 50,000 migrated to Israel and elsewhere. Migration to Israel has continued through the 1990s, but some 40,000 Jews remain in the country, and synagogues remain open throughout Belarus.

There is a small Islamic community in Belarus, which dates to the eleventh century when Tatars settled there. Today some 100,000 Muslims reside in 25 communities throughout the country, which are organized through the Islamic Association of Belarus.

Like Judaism, Islam is considered a traditional religion of Belarus by the government. In stark contrast are the new religions that have entered the country over the last generation, especially during the 1990s. The INTERNATIONAL SOCIETY FOR KRISHNA CONSCIOUSNESS, the UNIFICATION MOVEMENT, and the CHURCH OF SCIENTOLOGY have opened centers. Buddhism has entered into the country through the DIAMOND WAY BUDDHISM Kagyu Karma Tibetan lineage under Ole Nydahl. The CHURCH OF JESUS CHRIST OF LATTER-DAY SAINTS opened work in Minsk at the beginning of 1994. Although these newer religions in Belarus represent only a small percentage of the population, they have introduced the country to the world's contemporary religious pluralism.

Belgium

Sources:

Rigsby, J. "Standing Room Only: Christian Resurgence in Belarus." Christian Century 111 (July 17–August 3, 1994): 709–711.
 "The Virtual Guide to Belarus." Posted at <http://www.belarusguide.com>. Accessed May 25, 2001.

Belgium

The area covered by the present-day Federal Kingdom of Belgium has found itself under the rule of various European powers and empires during its history, being used as a pawn on the international political chessboard.

Christianity was gradually introduced into the country at the end of Roman rule, but evangelism did not really start until the sixth and seventh century, when missionaries such as Eloi, Aubert, Amand, and others came into the area from present-day France. At that time, the local population still worshipped Gallo-Roman and Germanic deities. In the eighth century, monasteries enjoyed exceptional prosperity and became centers of intense agricultural and economic activity. The Roman Catholic Church dominated social and political life throughout the Middle Ages.

In the fifteenth century, the Belgian territories fell under the rule of the House of Burgundy and later, the Austrian Hapsburgs. In the sixteenth century, Charles V, grandson of the Hapsburg Archduke Maximilian of Austria and son of Joanna of Aragon, inaugurated Spanish rule over the Low Countries. Initially encompassing present-day Belgium, Luxembourg, and The Netherlands, the Low Countries progressively became part of a wider empire, which included German and Austrian territories, a part of Italy, the Iberian Peninsula, and recently discovered territories in Central and South America. Under Charles V's rule, and despite his own role as staunch defender of the Catholic Church, the Protestant Reformation was introduced into Belgium by the Lutherans, Anabaptists, and Calvinists. The first decrees curbing heresies were passed in the 1520s. The Inquisition raged over the Low Countries; with the encouragement of Charles V, it was carried out by civil courts, but clerics of the Catholic Church were also involved in the proceedings

Status of religions in Belgium, 2000-2050

Followers	2000			2025	2050
	total	%	rate
Christians	8,969,000	88.3	0.15	8,479,000	7,190,000
Roman Catholics	8,222,000	80.9	0.03	7,750,000	6,700,000
Protestants	125,000	1.2	0.66	150,000	170,000
Marginal Christians	72,000	0.7	1.11	100,000	130,000
Nonreligious	589,000	5.8	0.68	650,000	720,000
Muslims	365,000	3.6	0.85	500,000	650,000
Atheists	176,000	1.7	0.59	212,000	250,000
Buddhists	21,700	0.2	0.83	30,000	40,000
Jews	21,300	0.2	-0.75	20,000	32,800
Confucianists	8,300	0.1	0.35	10,000	11,700
Spiritists	3,600	0.0	0.48	5,000	6,400
Ethnoreligionists	3,200	0.0	0.65	4,000	4,700
Baha'is	2,400	0.0	0.70	4,000	6,500
Neoreligionists	320	0.0	0.49	400	500
Zoroastrians	10	0.0	0.96	30	50
other religionists	2,000	0.0	1.22	4,000	5,300
Total population	10,161,000	100.0	0.21	9,918,000	8,918,000

as experts. In 1523, two Lutherans were burnt at the stake in Brussels as the Inquisition's first martyrs. Thousands of heretics or suspected heretics were tortured, hanged, drowned, decapitated, burnt, or buried alive. Many Protestants fled the country and settled in Germany, England, or the New World, where one of the villages they founded was on the island of Manhattan, the current location of New York City.

Charles V's son and successor, Philip II, retained the policy of supporting the Inquisition. In 1565, two thousand noblemen requested the then governor of the Low Countries, Margaret of Parma, to put an end to the Inquisition and establish freedom of religion. Encouraged by this defiance, Protestants set out to destroy images, paintings, and statues in Catholic churches, an uprising called the icono-clast fury. A number of Calvinist noblemen set up an army to obtain freedom of religion but were defeated by Spanish troops in 1567, north of Antwerp. In the same year, Philip II sent the duke of Alba to the Low Countries to stamp out Protestantism for good. The earls of Egmont and Hoorne, leaders of the rebellion, were decapitated, around 1,100 death sentences were pronounced, and the total possessions of about 9,000 people were confiscated. By 1585, the Catholic Counter-Reformation had been successful in the southern part of the Low Countries (present-day Belgium), but war continued with the northern provinces (mainly the present-day Netherlands), which eventually managed to become independent, serving as a refuge for persecuted Protestants from the southern provinces.

Until the beginning of the eighteenth century, the area now called Belgium remained under Spanish rule (a rule challenged by the kings of France) and so also under the influence of Roman Catholicism. However, from 1640 onward, the ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH faced an internal conflict between Jansenists and JESUITS. At its origin was the publication in 1640 of the book Augustinus, written by the late bishop of Ypres, Corneille Jansen (1585–1638); the book's interpretation of the teachings of St. Augustine (354–430) was close to Protestant ideas of the time. The Jansenist movement inspired by the book survived in the country until around 1725–1730.

In the eighteenth century, the area now called Belgium was under Austrian rule, with the exception of a few years of French occupation. In 1781, the Austrian Hapsburg emperor, Joseph II, published an Edict of Tolerance, which recognized freedom of worship and established that all citizens, whatever their religion, would have equal access to public jobs. He also attacked the privileges of the Catholic Church, dissolving hundreds of convents, replacing all episcopal seminaries by one general seminary under his authority and limiting the number of processions and the like. These measures caused widespread opposition among the clergy.

In 1789, the French Revolution abolished absolute monarchy and the privileges of the Catholic Church in France. Six years later, the French Republic opened war against the Austrian empire, annexed the Belgian territories, and converted them into nine French administrative divisions to be ruled according to the French law and constitution. Many churches were closed or desecrated, abbeys were burnt down, and hundreds of nonjuring priests were deported. To restore religious peace, Napoleon reestablished freedom of worship for the Catholic Church and concluded a concordat with the Vatican.

After the fall of Napoleon in 1815, Britain, Austria, Prussia, and Russia agreed to include the (predominantly Catholic) Belgian territories in the (Protestant-dominated) Kingdom of the Netherlands, to protect themselves against France. Through various repressive measures, the new sovereign, William I, tried to bring the Catholic Church to its knees, quickly alienating his new Catholic subjects in the process. He closed Catholic schools, expelled the Christian Brothers, left three of the five dioceses vacant, and broke off concordat negotiations with the Holy See. All the minor seminaries were closed, and candidates for the priesthood had to attend a state-run college. It was in this context that unionism, a political coalition between Catholics and anti-clerical liberals to drive out the Dutch, began to take shape in the 1820s.

In September 1830, the Belgians rebelled against Dutch rule and gained independence under the protection of England and France. A parliamentary monarchy was created, and Leopold I, a German Lutheran, was chosen as the first king. The Belgian Constitution of 1831 guaranteed complete freedom of worship, including the right of each religious body to select its own officials without state interference. Freedom of education was also recognized.

Catholicism, Protestantism (about 5,000 members, only 2,000 of whom were Belgians) and Judaism (about 1,000 members) enjoyed de facto state recognition. The state did not endorse the theological claims of any religion but afforded a privileged status to all of them on the basis of their social utility, providing for the payment of the salaries and retirement pensions of their clergy and chaplains, the maintenance of their places of worship, and so on. Anglicanism (only a few hundred members) was recognized in 1835.

In 1846, the Catholic-Liberal political alliance disintegrated. During the next thirty years, bitter political battles took place between Catholics and Liberals, especially over Catholic and public school issues.

Under Leopold II (1865–1909), Protestantism's various denominations experienced some significant growth. THE SALVATION ARMY opened a mission in 1889. In 1904 the first Baptist church was established. In 1899 the (Dutch-speaking) Reformed Churches were created.

World War I (1914–1918) slowed down the expansion of Protestantism, but this conflict also drew the attention of British and American Protestants to Belgium. A number of missions, which had helped war victims and Belgian troops under siege, opened several churches after 1918. The American evangelists Ralph and Judith Norton founded the Belgian Evangelical Mission and a Biblical Institute in 1919. The Jehovah's Witnesses movement also started in the 1920s. British and American Methodists created the Methodist Mission in 1922. In 1923, a Swedish couple began to spread Pentecostal teachings, but it was only in the aftermath of World War II (1940–1945) that the Pentecostal denomination emerged under the name of ASSEMBLIES OF GOD. Between the two World Wars, a number of Protestant denominations joined the main branch of Protestantism that had been recognized just after the creation of the Belgian state, the UNITED PROTESTANT CHURCH OF BELGIUM.

Since 1945, Evangelical and Pentecostal churches have grown rapidly. Their followers now number more than those of the state-recognized United Protestant Church. Administrative merging of both branches of Protestantism (about 100,000 believers in total) is in process.

The influx of peoples from Central and Eastern European countries along with Muslim countries has opened the door to both EASTERN ORTHODOXY and Islam in Belgium. Islam (numbering about 250,000) was recognized in 1974. Most Muslims come from North Africa (the MALIKITE SCHOOL OF ISLAM) and from Egypt and Turkey (the HANAFITE SCHOOL OF ISLAM). Orthodox Christians numbered about 40,000 in 1985 and are affiliated with either the Greek Church (under the ECUMENICAL PATRIARCHATE) or one of the Russian Orthodox churches. A policy of laicism was also recognized in 1994. JEHOVAH'S WITNESSES, who number about 40,000, have not been recognized.

Many other non-Christian groups settled in Belgium in the second half of the twentieth century, and Belgium is now home to a wide spectrum of the world's religions (including Buddhist, Hindu, esoteric, and magical groups). In 1997, a parliamentary commission on cults issued a report listing 189 religious movements. Most of them represented this new pluralistic religious community, but there were over twenty Christian Evangelical and Pentecostal-oriented groups mentioned, and even some Roman Catholic movements such as the Charismatics. Since the publication of that report and the creation of an observatory on cults, many minority religions have complained about religious intolerance and discrimination.

Willy Fautré

Sources:

Braekman, Emile. 150 ans de vie protestante en Belgique. Brussels, Belgium: Bulletin VIII-7 de la Société d'histoire du protestantisme belge, 1980.

———. Le protestantisme belge au 16^{me} siècle. Carrières-sous-Poissy, France: Editions La Cause, 1997.

Hasquin, Hervé. La Wallonie, son histoire. Brussels, Belgium: Editions Luc Pire, 1999.

Jansen, H. P. H. Prisma Kalendarium. Geschiedenis van de Lage Landen in jaartallen. Utrecht, Nederland: Uitgeverij Het Spectrum, 1995.

Belize

Known as British Honduras until 1973, Belize is located on the southeastern part of the Yucatan Peninsula on the Caribbean coast between Mexico and Central America, bordered by Mexico to the north and Guatemala to the west and south. The terrain is largely flat, with a swampy coastline and low mountains in the interior. However, the Caribbean coastal waters of Belize contain one of the largest barrier reefs in the world, which is a major tourist attraction.

This small nation of 8,867 square miles (about the size of Massachusetts) has more historical ties to the Caribbean than to the rest of Central America. It was settled by British buccaneers in the mid-1600s, who used its sheltered cays and coves as hideouts from which they could prey upon Spanish shipping. British influence continued to grow along the Caribbean coast of Central America, while the Spanish neglected the area. During the 1700s, British colonists and their African slaves came to Belize from other British-controlled islands of the Caribbean to exploit the forests for lumber and dyes, as well as to start agricultural development. Belize has evolved as an English-speaking Caribbean culture and is part of the British Commonwealth of Nations, although it achieved its independence from Britain in 1981. Nevertheless, Guatemala has continued to insist that part of southern Belize belongs to the Republic of Guatemala, and maps of that country have historically included Belize as part of its national territory.

Because of its British influence, Belize is the only country in Central America where English is the national language and Protestantism has been the dominant religion. However, due to the large-scale immigration of Spanish-speaking peoples from Mexico, Guatemala, and El Salvador during the nineteenth and twentieth centuries, the size of the Spanish-speaking population has notably increased to about half of the nation's total population of 240,200 in 2000.

Most Belizeans are of multiracial descent. About 46.4 percent of the population is of mixed Mayan and European descent (Mestizo); 27.7 percent are of African and Afro-European (Creole) ancestry; about 10 percent are of Mayan descent; and about 6.4 percent are Afro-Amerindian (Garífuna). The remainder, about 9.5 percent, include European, East Indian, Chinese, Middle Eastern (mainly Jews and Lebanese), and North American groups. The European population includes many Mennonites of Swiss-German descent who arrived in the 1950s and 1960s by way of Canada and Mexico. There is a sizeable community of East Indians, whose ancestors came to Belize as indentured servants to work on the sugar plantations in the 1880s.

Religiously, about 60 percent of the population belong to the ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH, while Protestant groups account for most of the remaining 40 percent. The East Indians are traditionally Hindus, and the Lebanese are traditionally Maronite Christians (Eastern-Rite believers who recognize the authority of the Pope in Rome). Many of the Mayans are nominal Roman Catholics who also maintain Native religious practices, centered on shamanism and bu-jería (witchcraft). The Garífunas, who were deported by the British from the island of St. Vincent in 1797 to the Bay Islands of Honduras, eventually settled along the Caribbean shore of Central America, from Belize in the north to Nicaragua in the south. Most Garífunas are marginal Christians (some claim to be Roman Catholics or Protestants) who still maintain their unique cultural and traditionalist religious practices; thus spirit-possession is a strong component of normal village life in southern Belize.

The Anglican Church (also known as the CHURCH OF ENGLAND) in Belize is now part of the CHURCH OF THE PROVINCE OF THE WEST INDIES, which also includes the Caribbean islands as well as Guyana and Surinam, with headquarters in Nassau, in the Bahamas. Anglican chaplains were sent to the Colony of British Honduras, beginning in the 1770s, by the SOCIETY FOR THE PROPAGATION OF THE GOSPEL IN FOREIGN PARTS to attend to the spiritual needs of the British colonists and the military garrison concentrated in Belize City, a former pirate enclave at the mouth of the Belize River, probably founded in 1638. Until the 1860s the Anglican Church (financed by the colonial government) dominated the religious life of the colonists, which was centered in St. John's Anglican Cathedral, built in 1815. The size of the Anglican community in Belize has gradually increased over the years, mainly due to natural population growth. From about 12,000 adherents in 1936, the number of Anglicans increased to 17,783, according to the 1970s Census. In 1978, there were about 20,000 adherents, scattered among twenty-six organized parishes and mission stations, and the Anglican Church operated twenty-three primary schools and two secondary schools in Belize. By 2000, the number of Anglican adherents was expected to reach about 28,800, or 12 percent of the total population, although there were only twenty churches and 3,300 communicant members but it fell far short.

During the early 1800s, groups of English Nonconformists, or Dissenters, (meaning non-Anglicans) began arriving in British Honduras, which led to a slow erosion in Anglican influence even though it was the established church. English Baptist and Methodist missionaries were sent to the colony in 1822 and 1824, respectively, and Scottish Presbyterians began work in Belize City in 1825. By 1856, the Protestant community of Belize City, where most of the inhabitants of the colony resided, included 2,500 Anglicans, 500 Methodists, 500 Baptists, and 200 Presbyterians, in addition to 1,000 Roman Catholics and 2,260 "others" in a total population of about 7,000 people.

Status of religions in Belize, 2000-2050

Followers	2000			2025	2050
	total	%	rate
Christians	219,000	91.0	2.52	333,000	416,000
Roman Catholics	137,000	56.9	2.40	200,000	250,000
Protestants	39,500	16.4	2.96	70,000	95,000
Anglicans	10,500	4.4	-0.91	9,000	8,000
Baha'is	6,900	2.9	2.73	12,000	20,000
Hindus	5,500	2.3	3.30	10,000	18,000
Jews	2,600	1.1	2.16	2,800	3,500
Spiritists	2,000	0.9	2.46	3,000	3,600
Nonreligious	2,000	0.8	4.38	5,000	8,500
Muslims	1,400	0.6	3.34	2,500	4,000
Buddhists	840	0.4	3.45	1,500	3,200
Ethnoreligionists	440	0.2	-0.87	300	200
Total population	241,000	100.0	2.53	370,000	477,000

The origin of British Methodist work in Belize is attributed to a British merchant, William Jeckel, who arrived in the early 1800s and was instrumental in organizing Methodist societies in Belize City, Burrell Boom, and Free-town. In 1824, Jeckel requested help from the Wesleyan Methodist Missionary Society in England, which soon sent three missionaries to the colony. In 1829 Methodist work consisted of one small chapel in Belize City and a few preaching points along the inland rivers.

Early Methodist missionary endeavors in Belize were plagued by sickness and death, storms and fires, staff shortages and financial hardships, and membership growth and decline for more than a century. In 1913, the British Methodist District of the Wesleyan Methodist Church consisted of 2,000 communicant members and was served by 9 ministers, including 3 native Belizeans. After the withdrawal of the Wesleyan Missionary Society from the Western Caribbean in 1930, the British Honduras District was under the supervision of the Methodist Church in Jamaica from 1932 to 1952. In 1967, the Belize-Honduras District became a founding member of the autonomous METHODIST CHURCH IN THE CARIBBEAN AND THE AMERICAS, with headquarters in St. Johns, Antigua, West Indies. In 1960, there were 1,800 communicant members among the 15 Methodist congregations in Belize; in 1978, 22 churches were reported with about 1,700 communicant members; and in 2000 the situation was about the same.

The London-based Baptist Missionary Society began work in Belize City in 1822, with the arrival of Mr. and Mrs. Joseph Bourne, not to serve the spiritual needs of the English colonists but to Christianize their slaves and freedmen, as former African slaves who had gained their freedom were called. In 1832, the population of the Colony of Belize totaled about 4,550, which included 2,100 slaves, 2,200 free African people, and fewer than 300 whites.

The Baptists in Belize shared a similar history of trials and tribulations with the Methodists, in an inhospitable climate that caused much sickness and death among the early missionaries. Bourne organized the First Baptist church in 1825 and served a small congregation of 20 members until leaving the Colony in 1834. Another Englishman, Alexander Henderson, arrived in late 1834 to continue the work of evangelism among slaves, soldiers, and discharged prisoners in the poorer sections of Belize City. Henderson was also assisted by other missionaries from England during the 1840s, but not without controversy. Because Henderson practiced "closed communion" (only baptized Baptists could receive the Lord's Supper), several new recruits from the Missionary Society refused to work with him. Henderson was forced to resign from the Mission in 1850, but he soon organized the Independent Baptist Mission of Belize with the support of most of his former members. Consequently, the society decided to abandon Belize, recalled its missionaries, and sold its properties, leaving Henderson as the uncontested leader of the Baptist movement. In 1850, Baptist work in Belize included two organized churches, seven preaching stations, three day schools, five Sunday schools, and about 230 baptized members. Henderson pioneered the founding of the Queen Street Baptist Church in 1850, which he pastored from 1850 to 1879.

Following Henderson's retirement in 1879 due to failing health, Baptist work was carried on by laypeople until the arrival of missionary David Waring from England in 1881. Waring continued the work begun by his predecessors, including outreach to the Yucateco-Maya in the north and the Garifuna in the south, as well as supporting Baptist work in the Bay Islands of Honduras, begun by Mr. and Mrs. John Warner in 1849. Waring sought assistance from the Jamaican Baptist Missionary Society, which sent James Bryant to Belize in 1886. When Waring returned to England in 1888, Bryant was placed in charge of the Belize Baptist Mission.

Encouraged by Bryant, the Jamaican Society was invited to assume responsibility for the Belize field. Soon thereafter, Mr. and Mrs. Charles Brown arrived from Jamaica along with their nephew, Robert Cleghorn, to administer the work in Belize, which began to prosper under the new leadership. By 1901, the Baptist Mission reported 353 baptized members and 1,324 adherents among nine organized congregations, along with six schools and more than 600 children enrolled.

After Brown's retirement in 1901 due to poor health, Cleghorn became the chief pastor and superintendent of the Baptist Mission in a distinguished career that ended in 1939, after celebrating his fiftieth year of service in Belize. To commemorate the occasion, Cleghorn wrote A Brief History of Baptist Missionary Work in British Honduras (1822-1939). Not much is known about Baptist work in Belize between 1940 and 1960, but in 1961 the Conservative Baptist Home Mission Society (U.S.A.) was invited to work with the Belize Baptist Mission. The N. T. Dellingers arrived soon thereafter to supervise the work and rebuild the ministry. By 1978 there were six organized churches and 330 baptized members, mainly among the Creoles. Several missionaries associated with the SOUTHERN BAPTIST CONVENTION arrived in Belize in the late 1970s to begin work in the interior and to assist with Baptist work in Belize City. In 2000, there were a total of twenty-five Baptist congregations in Belize with about 2,500 baptized members.

The SEVENTH-DAY ADVENTIST CHURCH entered Belize in the early 1900s as an extension of their work in Honduras that began in 1887. The Adventist Mission in British Honduras was officially organized in 1922, and in 1930 the two countries were separated administratively. By 1960, the Adventist community in Belize numbered 1,050, grew to about 2,500 in 1970, and increased to about 12,000 in 1978. Adventist work was centered in the Districts of Belize and Corozal. In 2000, the Adventists reported forty-eight congregations and 10,700 members, which made this the largest Protestant denomination in Belize in terms of communicant membership.

The CHURCH OF THE NAZARENE began work in Belize in the 1930s as an extension of their work in Guatemala, after two Mayan Indian lay-preachers walked more than sixty miles from their home in the Petén of Guatemala to Benque Viejo on the border to evangelize and start new churches in British Honduras. In 1931 the Mission Council of the Church of the Nazarene decided to enter Belize as a new field of service, and eventually sent two veteran, elderly, single female missionaries to work in Benque Viejo, Cayo District. By 1955, 11 Nazarene missionaries were serving in Belize, assisted by 22 national workers, who served ten organized churches with about 450 members and 300 children enrolled in six Nazarene schools. In 1966, there were sixteen churches and eleven missions. During the 1960s work began among East Indians, Garífuna, Kekchí, and Mopan-Maya near Punta Gorda in the Toledo District. The Nazarene High School was established in 1964 in Benque Viejo and later was moved to Belize City. Also, the Nazarenes began a program of Theological Education by Extension (TEE) throughout Belize in several languages: English, Spanish, and various Indian dialects. In 2000, the Nazarenes reported twenty-eight congregations with 1,820 members.

The Gospel Missionary Union (GMU), an independent Holiness mission, sent their first missionaries to Belize in 1955, the Gordon Lees, who established the Yarborough Bible Church in Belize City in 1956. The GMU acquired a 20-acre tract of land about 30 miles from Belize City in 1956, where they opened a camping-conference center and a Bible school, known as Carol Farm. Outreach began among the Yucateco-Maya in 1960 in Orange Walk district, and a Christian bookstore was established in Belize City in 1962. In 2000, the GMU reported seventeen congregations with about 940 members.

Numerous Anabaptist-Mennonite groups began arriving in Belize in the 1950s from Mexico, Canada, and the United States, and by 1978 there were at least fifteen Mennonite agricultural colonies in the country, mainly composed of Old Colony Mennonites (Reinlanders) and Kleingemeinde Mennonites ("The Little Brotherhood") who still spoke Low German. After Hurricane Hattie devastated parts of Belize in 1961, a number of Mennonite agencies arrived to offer disaster relief, including the Beachy AMISH and the Eastern Mennonite Board of Missions and Charities. In 1969, the Mennonite Central Committee established the Mennonite Center in Belize City to assist the Mennonite colonies both economically and socially. By 1978, the Belize Evangelical Mennonite Church had been organized with five congregations and 122 communicant members among Creoles, Mestizos, Mayans, and Garífuna. In addition, eleven distinct Mennonite groups reported thirty-seven organized congregations and about 1,900 communicant members. Overall, the total Mennonite community in Belize numbered about 5,000, most of whom resided in agricultural colonies at Spanish Lookout, Blue Creek, and Shipyard.

Other non-Pentecostal groups in Belize include the NATIONAL PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH IN MEXICO, independent CHURCHES OF CHRIST, CHRISTIAN BROTHERS, THE SALVATION ARMY, FRIENDS, the WESLEYAN CHURCH, and dozens of independent churches. Many Christian groups relate to each other through the Belize Christian Council, which in turn is related to the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES.

Although there were few Pentecostal churches in Belize in 1960, since that time the Pentecostal Movement has experienced substantial growth throughout the country. From five organized churches and about 200 members in 1960, the Pentecostals grew to sixty-seven congregations and 1,656 baptized members in 1978. However, at that time, the largest Pentecostal denomination in the country, the Kekchí and Mayan Churches of Belize, founded in 1968, only reported fifteen congregations and 750 members. The CHURCH OF GOD INTERNATIONAL (CLEVELAND, TENNESSEE) arrived in 1944. In 2000, there were twenty-two churches and 610 members. The ASSEMBLIES OF GOD began work in Belize in 1951, but it was hindered by internal controversies that led to the formation of two rival groups with a combined membership of only 100 members by 1978. In 2000, the Assemblies reported forty-one churches with about 1,000 members. Other more recent arrivals include the CHURCH OF GOD IN CHRIST, CHURCH OF GOD OF PROPHECY, PENTECOSTAL CHURCH OF GOD, UNITED PENTECOSTAL CHURCH INTERNATIONAL, Pentecostal Missionary Baptist Church, Pentecostal Church of God (Puerto Rico), Apostolic Faith Churches, Resurrection Churches and Ministries, and the Caribbean Light and Truth Mission.

Non-Protestant Christian groups in Belize include the JEHOVAH'S WITNESSES (twenty-five kingdom halls and 1,180 members), the CHURCH OF JESUS CHRIST OF LATTER-DAY SAINTS (six temples and 950 members), CHRISTADELPHIANS, UNITY SCHOOL OF CHRISTIANITY, and THE FAMILY (formerly known as the Children of God).

Non-Christian faiths include Hinduism (among East Indians), ISLAM, GARÍFUNA RELIGION, and Obeah-Myalism among the Creoles. There is a small Jewish community and a growing BAHÁ'Í FAITH community that add to Belize's pluralistic religious life. Despite the multifaceted missionary efforts by the various Christian groups from North America and Europe, some of the surviving Amerindian population have adhered to the traditional religious practices that existed prior to the arrival of the Spanish. Two of the Mayan peoples in Central America that survived the ravages of colonization are the Kekchí and Mopán in Belize, who number around 13,000. They adhere to a nature-based religion that recognizes a supreme spirit and many lesser spirits that inhabit everything in the world. Interaction with the world involves the frequent appeasement of the spirits. Shamans are important religious functionaries. The government of Belize actively promotes a spirit of religious tolerance.

Clifton L. Holland

Sources:

- Brierly, Peter, ed. World Churches Handbook. London: Christian Research, 1977.
- Cho, Julian. "The Mayans of Southern Belize." Posted at <http://www.ecologic.org/mayasofsouthernbelize.htm>.

Cleghorn, Robert. A Brief History of Baptist Missionary Work in British Honduras (1822–1939). London: The Kingsgate Press, 1939.

Grimes, Barbara F., ed. Ethnologue: Languages of the World. 12th ed. Dallas, TX: Summer Institute of Linguistics, 1992.

Holland, Clifton L., ed. World Christianity: Central America and the Caribbean. Monrovia, CA: MARC-World Vision, 1981.

Johnson, W. R. A History of Christianity in Belize: 1776–1838. New York: University Press of America, 1985.

Bene Israel

In the eighteenth century, the Jewish community in the West discovered the existence of a group of people in India who called themselves Bene Israel (Children of Israel). They described themselves as descendants of Jews who had left Palestine prior to the building of the Second Temple and settled in India following a shipwreck near Konkan, an area on the western coast of India. Seven men and seven women survived and became the parents of a new tribe. They settled in the village of Navgon and adapted to Indian life, including the caste system. They eventually became a caste within India culture and were responsible for the pressing and production of oil. As they grew, members of the Children of Israel moved to other towns along the Konkan coast. In the twentieth century, many of the members of the community rose to prestigious positions requiring professional acumen.

Over the centuries they forgot Hebrew and many elements of the tradition, but they still continued various Jewish traditions. They observed the Sabbath and refused to work on that day. They circumcised their children and retained elements of the biblical dietary laws. They observed Jewish holidays, all dating to the time prior to the building of the Second Temple.

In the nineteenth century, the Jews residing in the Portuguese settlements in southern India (Chochin) made contact with the Bene Israel and facilitated a revival of Jewish tradition among them. Through the Jews of Cochin, the West learned of the Bene Israel's existence. Meanwhile, some soldiers serving with the British in Aden, Yemen, opened a prayer hall and made contact with the Yemenite Jewish community. Subsequently, some Yemenite Jews moved to India and assumed a role in ritual practice for the Jewish community, especially in the circumcision of males and the butchering of meat. The first synagogue was built among the Bene Israel in 1796 by Samuel Divekar, following what he considered his fated survival while a prisoner of war. Subsequently other synagogues have been built.

The Bene Israel have a set of unique beliefs and practices. The Malida is a thanksgiving ceremony performed in the home as the men sit around a plate of spices, rice, and flowers. It includes a song praising Elijah as the precursor of the Messiah. Elijah is believed to have visited them on the occasion of the shipwreck that first landed them in India. They also do not eat beef, a custom they have developed out of deference to their neighbors, who are Hindu. They do maintain a kosher diet, but it is less strict than among Orthodox Jews in the West. There are no rabbis, and worship is led by the members.

There are two main groups within the community. Those born of two Jewish parents are called Gora, and those who lack a Jewish mother, Kala. The Kala are not allowed to participate in some practices, such as the blowing of the Shofar, as they are considered less than complete Jews.

In the 1950s, there were an estimated 30,000 in the Bene Israel community, but through the last half of the century, the majority migrated, most to Israel, but others to England, Australia, and the United States (where a synagogue has been opened in New York City). Only some 5,000 remain in India. Those who remain live primarily in Thana, a Mumbai (Bombay) suburb. In Israel, Bene Israel centers can be found in Ashdod, Lod, Ramle, and Beersheba (among others). Significant recognition of their presence came in 1962, when the Orthodox Chief Rabbinate of Israel decreed that marriage of other Jews with the Bene Israel was permitted. Two years later the Israeli prime minister affirmed that the government of Israel regards them as Jews in every respect; hence the Bene Israel may move to Israel under the Law of Return.

Address:

Council of Indian Jewry
c/o The Jewish Club
Jeroo Building, Second Floor
137 Mahatma Gandhi Rd.
Bombay 400023
India

Sources:

Isenberg, Shirley. Israel's Bene Israel: A Comprehensive Inquiry and Sourcebook. Berkeley, CA: J. L. Museum, 1988.

Katz, Nathan. Who Are the Jews of India? Berkeley: University of California Press, 2000.

Strizower, Schifra. The Bene Israel of Bombay. New York: Schocken Books, 1971.

Benedictines

One of the most historically important and widespread orders of the ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH, the Benedictines are distinctive in part for their decentralized structure. Lacking the strong hierarchy present in orders such as the JESUITS, the Benedictines are often described as a confederation of monasteries and congregations that follow the Rule of St. Benedict.

St. Benedict of Nursia (c. 480–c. 547) is considered the father of Western monasticism. After experiencing several aspects of the monastic life, Benedict founded a monastery at Monte Casino, and it is to him that the popular code that still guides Benedictine life is ascribed, an ascription that is somewhat in doubt due to the general lack of information about Benedict's life. The rule was but one of several that circulated in the next centuries, from which the various monastic communities could choose. It was championed by Pope Gregory the Great (c. 540–604) and was the discipline accepted by Augustine of Canterbury (d. 604) and those who helped him establish Christianity in England. Through the seventh century, those who followed the rule assisted the spread of Christianity in northern Europe. The Benedictine monk Ansgar began the evangelization of Scandinavia in 826.

A sixteenth-century depiction of Saint Benedict with his friars at the refectory (Archivio Iconografico, S.A./CORBIS)

Through the remainder of the first Christian millennium, the rule accompanied the spread of monasticism throughout Europe. The decentralized nature of the Benedictine life, however, allowed its subversion by local rulers and its weakening by lax monks. In the tenth century, the first of several important reform movements began at Cluny (in western France) under William of Aquitaine (935–963). A new evangelistic zeal accompanied the Cluniac reforms and led to the further spread of Christianity into the more remote corners of Europe from Norway to Bohemia. Further new orders inspired by the rule emerged in the eleventh, twelfth, and thirteenth centuries, including the Camaldolese, Celestines, and Olivetians. At the same time the Benedictines experienced new levels of corruption stemming from their incorporation into the system of feudal land ownership.

Attempts at reform that began in the fourteenth century culminated in the fifteenth century in the introduction of a new structure, the congregation, an association of monasteries in a region or country. Through the century, for example, all the monasteries in Italy were united in the Cassinese Congregation, headquartered at Monte Cassino. Soon national congregations had arisen from Poland and Hungary to Spain and Portugal. The Council of Trent (1545–1563) ordered every monastery to affiliate with a congregation.

The modern world was not kind to the Benedictines. The Reformation destroyed Benedictine monasticism in Great Britain, Scandinavia, Holland, and northern Germany, and it faced severe reduction in Switzerland, France, and Belgium. It recovered during the seventeenth century, only to be devastated by the Enlightenment, which led to further closing of centers in France, Switzerland, and even Italy. Early in the nineteenth century, all the monasteries in the German states of Baden, Bavaria, Württemberg, and Prussia were closed. Those in Spain and Portugal were lost in 1834–1835.

After reaching its low point in the early nineteenth century, Benedictine monasticism experienced a revival that has carried it into the present time. Besides recovering in areas where it had formerly existed across the European continent, it gained new life by expansion to America in 1846. Then in 1888 Leo XIII reestablished the Collegio Sant'Anselmo as an international training center for Benedictine monks and in 1893 created a new office, the abbot primate, as the head of all the confederated congregations. In 1952, Pope Pius XII approved a new code, the Lex Propria, which governs the confederation.

The current abbot primate of the Benedictines is Notker Wolf, O.S.B. (b. 1940). The international Benedictine Confederation of Congregations may be contacted at Badia Primaziale Sant'Anselmo, Piazza Cavalieri di Malta, 5, I-00153 Roma, Italia.

Quite apart from the monasteries and congregations of male Benedictines, there are a number of female monasteries that are associated together in federations that are also a part of the Benedictine Confederation. Female Benedictines trace their lineage to St. Benedict's sister St. Scholastica and enjoy a history as long and expansive as that of their male counterparts. Also part of the confederation are the oblates, men and women living a secular life in the world according to the spirit of the Rule of Saint Benedict. Oblates tend to be attached to the particular monastery close to their place of residence.

At present there are some 250 Benedictine monasteries (of monks) worldwide, grouped in 21 congregations. There are some 350 monasteries for nuns (those who take solemn vows), grouped in 24 federations. In addition there are some 600 houses of sisters (who take simple vows), also grouped in federations.

Address:

<http://www.osb.org>

Sources:

- Butler, Dom Cuthbert. Benedictine Monachism: Studies in Benedictine Life and Rule. London: Longmans, Green, 1924.
- De Waal, Esther. Living with Contradiction: Introduction to Benedictine Spirituality. Harrisburg, PA: Morehouse Publishing, 1998.
- McQuiston, John. Always We Begin Again: The Benedictine Way of Living. Harrisburg, PA: Morehouse Publishing, 1996.
- Rippinger, Joel. The Benedictine Order in the United States: An Interpretive History. Collegeville, MN: Liturgical Press, 1990.

Benin

More than sixty different peoples inhabited the land of the present state of Benin in the centuries prior to the arrival of Europeans. The most important of these groups were the Fon, Adja, Yoruba, and Babiba. The Yoruban culture reached into Benin from the city of Ifa, now in neighboring Nigeria. The Fon settled in central Benin along the Okpara and Ouémé Rivers. In the seventeenth century, the Ewe People (related to the Yoruban) developed two states, the Hogbonu, centered on present day Porto Novo, and Abomey. In the nineteenth century, the Fon emerged with an expansive empire that moved east and west from Abomey into traditional Yoruban territory, and established Ouidah as a major port of call for European slave traders.

The British upset the structure of Benin society by banning the slave trade in 1818, though some illegal trafficking continued into the midcentury. Many Yorubans passed through Ouidah on their way to Cuba, one of the last American countries to drop slavery. In 1890 the French attempted to occupy Benin and in 1891 defeated the primary Fon army. The defeated ruler, Benhanzin, kept up a resistance until 1894 and is remembered today as a national hero. In establishing colonial rule, the French destroyed the economic basis of Fon culture in palm oil and other agricultural products. During their seventy year rule of Dahomey, as it was then called, the French ran the colony into bankruptcy.

Benin became an independent republic in 1960. The country went through two decades of political instability and a change of government every year or two. A more stable government was elected in the 1980s, and it was helped by improved sugar production and the discovery of oil off the coast. Optimism was dimmed by the encroachments of the Sahara into the northern part of the country. A new president, elected in 1991, abandoned the Marxism of his predecessor, and the country has been making a transition to democracy.

Traditional religion has remained strong in Benin. The Yoruban faith is built around veneration of and possession by the deities, the Orisha. Knowledge of the will of the deities is sought by the use of oracles. Among the Fon, the deities are referred to as the Vodoun. The Yoruban faith was exported to the Caribbean, especially Cuba, and has become the basis of contemporary SANTERIA.

Islam has come into Benin from two directions. In the north it has been introduced among the Fulani, Dendi, and Bariba people from Niger and in the south among the Yoruban from their own people in Nigeria. The great majority of the Muslims are of the MALIKITE SCHOOL OF ISLAM, but both the TIJANIYYA and QADIRIYYA SUFI ORDER are active. Approximately 17 percent of the population are Muslims. The Muslim-inspired AHMADIYYA MOVEMENT IN ISLAM has also opened centers, and the BAHÁ'Í FAITH has a small presence.

Status of religions in Benin, 2000-2050

Followers	2000			2025	2050
	total	%	rate
Ethnoreligionists	3,140,000	51.5	2.22	4,594,000	4,677,000
Christians	1,705,000	28.0	3.18	3,850,000	6,570,000
Roman Catholics	1,266,000	20.8	2.91	2,700,000	4,300,000
Protestants	230,000	3.8	4.51	600,000	1,300,000
Independents	175,000	2.9	3.85	470,000	800,000
Muslims	1,221,000	20.0	3.45	2,580,000	4,200,000
Baha'is	13,100	0.2	5.03	40,000	80,000
Nonreligious	10,000	0.2	3.29	28,000	60,000
Atheists	4,100	0.1	2.72	10,000	20,000
other religionists	3,400	0.1	3.45	7,000	13,000
Total population	6,097,000	100.0	2.72	11,109,000	15,620,000

As early as 1689, Portuguese Roman Catholics opened a chapel at Ouidah, and both French and Portuguese priests served the small Catholic community into the nineteenth century. Active missionary work began in the interior in the 1860s under the African Missions of Lyon. In 1883 a prefecture was erected, and steady growth followed. A seminary was opened in 1913, but the first African priest was not ordained until 1928. The Archdiocese of Cotonou was erected in 1955, and the first African archbishop consecrated in 1860. The ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH is strongest among the Fon, Mina Adja, and Gun people.

British Methodists, in the person of famed African missionary Thomas Birch Freeman (1809–1890), arrived in Dahomey in 1843, and a small work was started. It grew in spite of the opposition of the local king, but very slowly. It gained as French influence increased in the area during the last third of the nineteenth century. Through the first half of the twentieth century, the Methodist work was tied to that in neighboring Togo. It has more recently been separated both from Togo and from the METHODIST CHURCH in Great Britain as the PROTESTANT METHODIST CHURCH OF BENIN. It is the largest Protestant body in the country. The other major Protestant churches (Presbyterian, Lutheran, Baptist, Congregational) have not established work in Benin, and there is no national Protestant ecumenical organization.

Benin was an early scene for the spread of AFRICAN INITIATED CHURCHES (AICs). Possibly the first was the African Union Mission, a branch of the United Native African Church, a schism of the CHURCH MISSIONARY SOCIETY (Anglican). The church appears to have arrived in Dahomey in 1895, only four years after its establishment. Through the twentieth century, other AIC bodies arrived, including the CHERUBIM AND SERAPHIM (1933); the Heavenly Christianity Church (Église du Christianisme Céleste du Bénin), which originated in Benin in 1947 and late reemerged in Nigeria as the CELESTIAL CHURCH OF CHRIST; and the Église Apostolique du Togo et Bénin, founded as the Divine Healers Church in 1951 in Togo.

The Sudan Interior Mission launched work among the Bariba people from a station in Kandi. Missionaries from the ASSEMBLIES OF GOD, a Pentecostal church from the United States, arrived in Benin in 1938. They began work in the northern part of the country among the Somba and Pilapila people, and the church quickly became the major Christian body challenging the spread of Islam. The JEHOVAH'S WITNESSES established their initial work in 1935.

While Benin has not been a major target of new religious movements (Eastern or occult), the number of African Initiated Churches has grown through the last half of the twentieth century.

Sources:

- Decalo, Samuel. Historical Dictionary of Benin. Metuchen, NJ: Scarecrow Press, 1995.
- Merlo, M. C. "Les sectes du Dahomey." In Devant les sectes nonchrétiennes. Louvain, Belgium: Desclée de Brouwer, 1961.

Bermuda

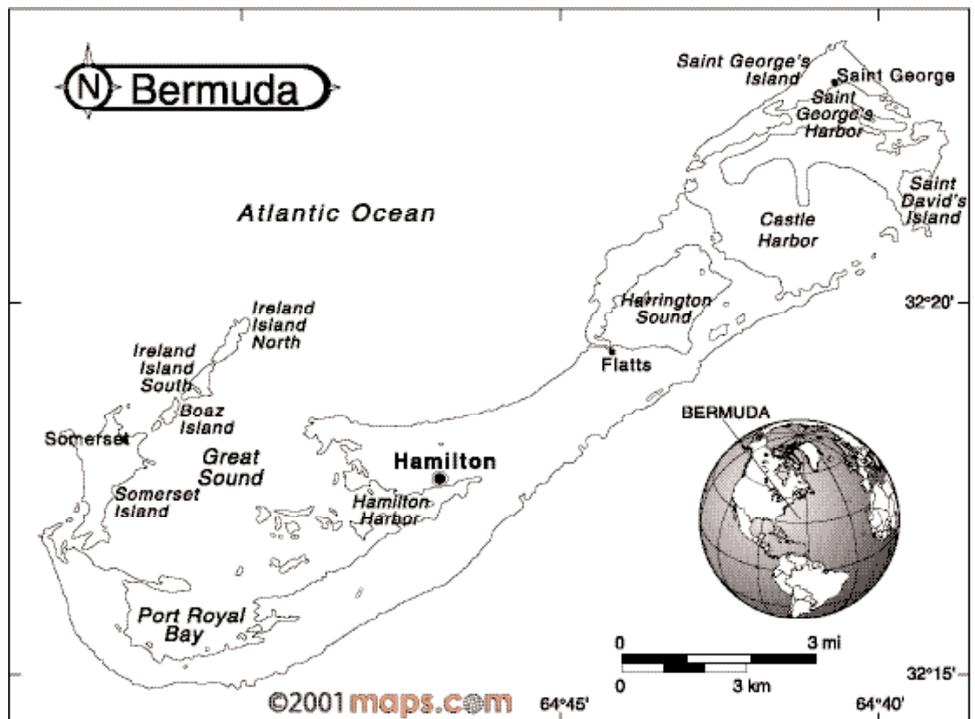

Bermuda comprises a set of 150 small coral islands in the Atlantic Ocean due west of Georgia (U.S.). They were uninhabited until 1609, when some British immigrants on their way to America settled there after being shipwrecked. These original inhabitants encouraged others to join them, and in 1684 a government was organized under the British Crown. Over the next decades an agricultural economy developed, and, as with many lands settled by Europeans, it depended on slaves imported from West Africa. At the time slavery was discontinued in the 1830s, the majority of the population on the 20 inhabited islands was of African descent. In 1968, the colony was given a level of local autonomy, and since that time the majority party in the parliament names the prime minister. The governor is appointed from London.

The original settlers were Anglicans. Though Presbyterians arrived a few years later and eventually became the largest church in the colony, the CHURCH OF ENGLAND regained its majority status early in the 1700s and has remained the largest religious body in Bermuda to the present. St. Peter's Church in St. George's, constructed in 1612

Status of religions in Bermuda, 2000-2050

Followers	2000			2025	2050
	total	%	rate
Christians	60,200	93.3	0.75	69,100	72,200
Anglicans	24,200	37.5	0.21	22,700	22,500
Protestants	19,500	30.2	1.09	25,000	26,800
Roman Catholics	10,400	16.1	1.00	13,000	14,000
Nonreligious	2,600	4.0	3.49	3,500	5,000
Spiritists	1,300	2.1	1.54	2,200	3,500
Baha'is	320	0.5	0.80	650	1,000
Buddhists	20	0.0	-1.73	20	20
Jews	20	0.0	0.49	40	60
other religionists	50	0.1	0.22	80	100
Total population	64,600	100.0	0.85	75,600	81,900

by Governor Richard Moore, is the oldest Anglican Church in continuous use in the Western Hemisphere. It was also the meeting place of the first General Assembly (forerunner of Bermuda's Parliament) on August 1, 1620. The Anglicans have unique status as an extra-provincial diocese directly under the Archbishop of Canterbury. Enlarging the Anglican community is the Reformed Episcopal Church, a nineteenth-century group that broke from the EPISCOPAL CHURCH in the United States and opened work in Bermuda around 1890.

Presbyterians from the CHURCH OF SCOTLAND arrived in 1612. Christ Church in Warwick is believed to be the oldest Presbyterian church in the British colonies. Methodists arrived in the eighteenth century and settled in Hamilton. The Methodist community was enlarged by the establishment of work by the AFRICAN METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH, which emerged through the twentieth century as the second largest Protestant church in the country. Because of the country's relative closeness to the United States, a number of Christian groups, representative of the broad spectrum of Christianity, expanded to Bermuda through the twentieth century. Bermuda, as a loyal British colony, developed a special relationship to Canada in the decades after the American Revolution. The religious expression of that relationship is found in the congregations in Bermuda with direct ties to the UNITED CHURCH OF CANADA, the PENTECOSTAL ASSEMBLIES OF CANADA, and the PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH IN CANADA.

The ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH developed from a small presence in the nineteenth century to become the second largest religious body in Bermuda by the middle of the twentieth century. Also a part of the country's Canadian ties, the work existed as an outpost of the Diocese of Halifax (Nova Scotia). In 1953 it was made a prefecture and three years later a vicariate. Finally, in 1957 the Diocese of Hamilton was created as a suffragan, subordinate to the Diocese of Kingston (Jamaica).

As Bermuda has attracted members of many Christian groups, so it has drawn to it adherents of a variety of other religions. There exist presently in the islands small communities of Jews, Bahá'ís, Muslims, Rosicrucians, SUBUD, RASTAFARIANS, and Hindus. The Jewish community meets in a metaphysical church, the Unity Foundation of Truth. There is a congregation of both the United Church of Religious Science and of the CHURCH OF CHRIST, SCIENTIST in Hamilton. Given the relative smallness of the country, with a population of only about 65,000, most new groups have had difficulty establishing more than one or two centers of worship in what has become a highly competitive atmosphere.

Sources:

Barrett, David. The Encyclopedia of World Christianity. 2d edition. New York: Oxford University Press, 2001.

Bissio, Roberto Remo, et al. Third World Guide 93/94.

Montevideo, Uruguay: Instituto del Tercer Mundo, 1992.

Beta Israel

In the fourth century C.E., at which time Ethiopia largely became Christian, a variety of its peoples declined the new faith. Among these were groups who identified themselves as Jewish, and over the years Ethiopia's Jewish community has continued. The origin of Beta Israel is lost to history, and a variety of explanations have been offered as to how a large community of Africans devoted to the Torah and Jewish belief and practice could have arisen. The community itself tends to favor a Yemeni origin. In the fifth century B.C.E. a kingdom was established in Yemen that included much of Ethiopia. The founding of this kingdom is attributed to Menelik, the son of the queen of Sheba who is mentioned in the Hebrew Bible (1 Kings 10). Whatever the exact origin, the existence of the Yemenite kingdom for many centuries provided numerous opportunities for Jews and Judaism to enter Ethiopia and for a community of Jewish believers to emerge.

The existence of Beta Israel became known outside of the region in the fourteenth century, a time of conflict between Muslims (who wished to expand into Ethiopia) and the Christian nation centered at Axum. Over the century of ongoing conflict, Beta Israel was involved as a balancing power between the two groups, frequently changing sides as their interest demanded. As a minority group, however, they found that each wave of fighting tended to decrease their numbers and take from their land. They survived largely because they commanded high ground (which is more easily defended) in the Semien Mountains. However, between the thirteenth and the seventeenth centuries, their numbers are estimated to have declined from one million to two hundred thousand.

A new era for Beta Israel began early in the nineteenth century, when Anglican and Protestant Christians discovered their existence and launched a mission to convert them. This campaign led to the alerting of some European Jewish leaders to the existence of a Jewish community in Africa, and in 1868 Joseph Halevy, a professor from the Sorbonne who had worked in Yemen and was an agent for the Alliance Israelite Universelle in France, visited the community. It was one of Halevy's students, Jacques Faitlovitch (1881–1955) who placed the Ethiopian community on the agenda of world Jewry. After his first visit in 1904, he spent the rest of his life assisting them educationally and helping European Jews to view Beta Israel as brothers and sisters. He became an Israeli citizen and launched a drive to have them recognized under the Israeli law of return, which would allow them to immigrate to Israel. His efforts were picked up and carried forward by the American Association for Ethiopian Jews and the British-based Falasha Welfare Association (Falasha being a popular designation for Ethiopian Jews during the twentieth century).

In spite of Faitlovitch's efforts the Beta Israel community continued to decline during the twentieth century. By the 1970s only some thirty thousand remained. Various successive governments, especially that of Emperor Haile Selassie (1892–1974) who assumed the throne in 1948, found reasons to attack them. Their situation did not improve under the Marxist regime that followed. That regime forbade the practice of Judaism, and members of the Beta Israel were imprisoned on various charges, such as being "Zionist spies." Jewish religious leaders, called Kesim (sing. Kes), experienced a new level of government harassment. Their situation became increasingly acute in the mid-1980s during the Ethiopian civil war.

Religiously, the Beta Israel have follow an archaic form of Judaism under the leadership of a high priest. They have the Hebrew Bible, but have been unfamiliar with the later written commentaries on the Torah that were compiled as the Talmud. Thus they inherit a system of belief and practice that reflects their own appropriation of the scriptures and has not reflected the ongoing developments elsewhere in the Jewish world. They have a system of dietary laws and emphasize the keeping of the Sabbath. One practice that they have altered as a result of the contact with Faitlovitch was the sacrificing of a lamb at Passover, which they gave up at his request. Both the questions concerning their origins and the nature of their practices made it more difficult for their advocates to interest important Jewish leaders in their situation.

The efforts to sway ORTHODOX JUDAISM to recognize Beta Israel led to the 1973 decree by Ovadia Yossef, the Sephardic chief rabbi in Israel, that the Ethiopian Jews should be allowed to immigrate to Israel under the law of return. He voiced an interesting notion that they were descendants of the ancient tribe of Dan. Two years later, his Ashkenazic counterpart, Rabbi Shlomo Goren, who led the Ashkenazi (European) Jewish community, lent his support to the Beta Israel cause. Shortly thereafter the Israeli parliament consented. A few Beta Israel arrived in Israel in the 1970s, but it was not until the crisis of 1985 that Israel undertook Operation MosesThree and airlifted some fifteen thousand Jews to Israel. Hundreds more arrived a short time late under Operation Sheba. Then both Ethiopia and Sudan (where many had fled), closed their borders, and an additional fifteen thousand Falasha found themselves stuck in refugee camps. Only in 1991 was Israel allowed to assist these additional Jews (Operation Solomon).

Today, most members of Beta Israel reside in Israel. The Israeli government and social service agencies assisted their resettlement, the development of new means of support, and adjustment to a new homeland. Although more than thirty thousand Beta Israel have moved to Israel, an estimated twenty-eight thousand remain in Ethiopia, many in Addis Ababa and others in the countryside that has been their traditional homeland. Efforts to assist the Beta Israel in Ethiopia are being spearheaded by the North American Conference on Ethiopian Jewry (NACOEJ), 132 Nassau St., 4th Fl., New York, NY 10038. Up-to-date information is posted on their Web site at <http://www.circus.org/Old%20NACOEJ%20Site/nacoej.htm>. Contact with the community in Israel may be made through the Israel Association for Ethiopian Jews, 5 Even Israel St., Jerusalem, Israel 94228 (Web site: <http://www.ahava.com/iaej/>) and the Association of the Ethiopian Family and Child in Israel (ALMAYA), P.O. Box 5668, Shaul Hamelech St. 89/42, Beer-Sheva 84152, Israel.

Sources:

Avraham, Shmuel, with Arlene Kushner. Treacherous Journey: My Escape from Ethiopia. New York: Shapolsky Publishing, 1986.
 Gruber, Ruth. Rescue: The Exodus of the Ethiopian Jews. New York: Atheneum, 1987.
 Herman, Marilyn. "Songs, Honour and Identity: the Beta Israel (Ethiopian Jews) in Israel." Ph.D. dissertation, Oxford University, 1994.
 Messing, Simon D. The Story of the Falashas: "Black Jews" of Ethiopia. Brooklyn, NY: Balshon Printing and Offset Co., 1982.
 Rapoport, Louis. The Lost Jews: Last of the Ethiopian Falashas. New York: Stein and Day, 1983.

Bhutan

Bhutan is a small country of a million and a half people wedged between India and Tibet (China). Although known as Bhutan to the outside world, it is known as Druk-Yul (the land of the Thunder Dragon) by its citizens. The traditional religion of the area was the BON RELIGION, a shamanistic faith that has survived to the present by incorporating Buddhist elements. However, in the twelfth century a religious revolution occurred, as the Drukpa Kagyu branch of TIBETAN BUDDHISM gained dominance. The Kagyu tradition had originated in the eleventh century C.E. through the synthesizing work of the accomplished teacher Tilopa (988–1069). He was followed by a succession of teachers: Naropa (1916–1100), Marpa (1012–1097), Milarepa (1052–1135), and Gampopa (1079–1153). Among several subschools that

Followers	2000			2025	2050
	total	%	rate
Buddhists	1,571,000	74.0	2.53	2,954,000	4,349,000
Hindus	436,000	20.5	1.40	750,000	1,050,000
Ethnoreligionists	81,300	3.8	2.27	140,000	200,000
Muslims	22,000	1.0	2.60	40,000	60,000
Christians	9,600	0.5	1.40	14,500	18,000
Independents	5,800	0.3	1.58	8,000	10,000
Protestants	3,200	0.2	0.99	5,500	6,500
Roman Catholics	600	0.0	1.84	1,000	1,500
Nonreligious	3,300	0.2	2.67	5,000	8,000
Baha'is	650	0.0	2.61	1,000	1,700
Total population	2,124,000	100.0	2.27	3,904,000	5,687,000

Buddhist monks chant in a monastery in Paro, Bhutan. (W. Jacobs/TRIP)

Bible Sabbath Association

originated under Gampopa's students was the Pagtu Kagyu, begun by Pagtu Dorje Gyalpo. Drukpa Kagyu was begun by one of Pagtu's disciples, Lingje Repa.

Although it was the dominant religion in Bhutan, Drukpa Kagyu continued to struggle with Bon and other rival groups for several centuries; then in the seventeenth century the nation of Bhutan was united around Drukpa Kagyu by Lama Ngawang Namgyal (who was both the spiritual leader and secular ruler). The religion lent its name to the country and has since that time been integral to its life and structure. The country existed as a theocracy until 1907, when the rule of the shabdrungs (as Namgyal and his successors were known) was overthrown and an hereditary monarchy established by Ugen Wangchuch. Today, the Buddhist leadership appoints two of the nine members of the council that assists the ruler, and a large number of Buddhist monks serve in the Tsongu, the national consultative assembly.

The majority of Bhutan's citizens are Tibetans and Butias. However, approximately 25 percent are Nepalese, most of whom are Hindus. Though there is legal recognition of the Nepalese, considerable friction exists between the two communities. The 1990s has been marked by the "bhutanization" program and the attempt to have the Dzong language be used throughout the land. Rejection of the effort by the Nepalese has occasionally led to violent exchanges between protesters and the authorities. The Ammasese also exist as a second significant Hindu ethnic group.

Bhutan has severe laws against proselytizing, which have significantly blunted efforts of Christians to launch work within the country. Openings have been found among Bhutanese who were living across the border in India. The Scandinavian Alliance Mission began work in 1892. Its missionaries were soon joined by representatives of both the Sental Mission, a work among the Sental people initiated by the Northern Evangelical Lutheran Church, and the CHURCH OF SCOTLAND mission. The Church of Scotland established several schools in Western Bhutan and its successor, the CHURCH OF NORTH INDIA, is the only Protestant group both resident and working in Bhutan. A variety of Evangelical groups, such as the Assemblies movement started by Bhakt Singh, have been working along the Indian border for several decades, but with little visible result.

Catholicism has also spread among the ethnic Indians of Bhutan, though membership is still measured in the low hundreds. Most of these are workers in the several Catholic-run schools. Work has been incorporated in the Diocese of Tezpur in India. The single parish is located in Puntsholing, a border community.

Karma Phuntsho

Sources:

Barrett, David. The Encyclopedia of World Christianity. 2d edition. New York: Oxford University Press, 2001.

Bissio, Roberto Remo, et al. Third World Guide 93/94.

Montevideo, Uruguay: Instituto del Tercer Mundo, 1992.

Chakravarti, B. A Cultural History of Bhutan. 2 vols. Chittaranjan: Hilltop, 1979, 1980.

Dorji, C. T. History of Bhutan Based on Buddhism. Thimphu, Bhutan: Sngay Xam in collaboration with Prominent Publishers, 1994.

Frey, K. "Studies in Bhutanese History Dealing with the Structural Organization of the Bhutanese Theocracy." Tibetan Review 18, 4 (1983): 15–22.

Bible Sabbath Association

The Bible Sabbath Association was founded in 1943 by several sabbatarians (i.e., people who believe that the Jewish Sabbath rather than Sunday is the proper day for Christians to set aside for worship) who had a felt need for mutual support as they made their way in the Christian world that was oriented on Sunday. At the time of the association's founding, many countries (especially the United States) still had a number of laws restricting Sunday activities and allowed discrimination against those who kept the Sabbath.

The sabbatarian perspective had been discussed during the early centuries of the church as it separated from Judaism. It reemerged in the 1550s among the British Reformers, and an initial book offering it supported was published in 1595. An early sabbatarian Baptist church was founded in England in 1617, and the idea was brought to the American colonies in 1664. About the same time, sabbatarianism appeared among the German Pietists.

Sabbatarianism was the exclusive possession of the Baptists until the middle of the nineteenth century, when Ellen G. White, the founder of the SEVENTH-DAY ADVENTIST CHURCH (SDA), injected it into the scattered Adventist movement, which was still trying to recover from the non-appearance of Jesus in 1844. The issue split the Adventists, but the SDA emerged as a successful movement and in the twentieth century spread worldwide. Less successful was the Church of God Adventist group, which accepted sabbatarianism but not the other unique ideas of Ellen G. White. They splintered into numerous small groups, many also adhering to the idea of the "Sacred Names," that is, that the personages generally referred to as God and Jesus should more properly be called Yahweh and Yahsua.

Finally, in the twentieth century, sabbatarianism found a home among the many splinter groups of the CHURCH OF JESUS CHRIST OF LATTER-DAY SAINTS.

The Bible Sabbath Association has included members from all the modern sabbatarian churches. Primarily concerned with groups in the United States and with removing what it felt were discriminatory regulations that directly affected them, the association has in recent decades reached out to sabbatarian congregations that have emerged around the world in the developing pluralistic culture. Among its most valuable activities is the periodic publication of a directory of sabbatarian groups worldwide.

Address:

Bible Sabbath Association
RD 1, Box 22
Fairview, OK 73737
<http://www.biblesabbath.org>

Sources:

Dellinger, George. A History of the Sabbath Resurrection Doctrine. Westfield, NJ: Sabbath Research Center, 1982.
Directory of Sabbath-Observing Groups. Fairview, OK: Bible Sabbath Association, Revised periodically.
Haynes, Carlyle B. From Sabbath to Sunday. Washington, DC: Review and Herald Publishing Association, 1928.

Bohras (Islam)

The Bohras continue a lineage of ISMAILIS, who in the eleventh century acknowledged the authority of al-Mustali (caliph in Egypt, 1094–1101), and later al-Tayyib, a subsequent heir to the throne. Following the death of his father, al-Mustali, the younger son of Caliph al-Afdal, became the focus of a struggle between his supporters and those of his elder brother, al-Nizar. He won, and his elder brother was executed. Al-Nizar's supporters relocated to Persia (Iran) and Mesopotamia (Iraq) and continued their movement from there. Today the Nizari Ismailis are the larger Ismaili group and now exist under the leadership of HIS HIGHNESS PRINCE AGA KHAN SHIA IMANI ISMAILI COUNCIL.

However, at the end of the eleventh century, the Ismailis in Egypt (where the Fatimid Caliphate ruled), Syria, and Yemen recognized al-Mustali. During the early twelfth century, his successors in office were assassinated, and after the death of Caliph al-Aziz in 1130, an infant son, al-Tayyib, remained as the heir. Given al-Tayyib's age, leadership of the Fatimid Empire fell to an older cousin, Abd-al Majid (d. 1131). Over the next years, al-Tayyib was never seen in public, and most to this day presume that he was killed. In 1132, al-Majid had himself named caliph, an event that sparked yet another division of the Ismaili community. The new party formed around those who looked for the rise of al-Tayyib.

The supporters of al-Tayyib, refusing to support the caliph and the authorities in Cairo, were suppressed in Egypt but found a haven in Yemen, where the queen supported their cause. Over the next decades, leaders came to believe that al-Tayyib had survived, had been secretly taken out of Egypt, and had married and produced progeny. In Yemen, in the absence of any visible manifestation of al-Tayyib or his sons, the queen appointed a substitute who took the title of al-mutlaq (administrator). The al-mutlaq was granted full authority, almost as if he were an imam, to head the Ismaili community on behalf of the Hidden Imam (al-Tayyib) in his absence.

The Yemenite community preserved significant quantities of Ismaili literature, most of which was lost when the Egyptian libraries of the Fatimid Dynasty were looted and burnt by the Ottoman conquerors. In Yemen, moreover, the Ismailis had to contend with the ZAYDITES a Shi'a group with its major strength in the region. Further trouble followed the rise of the Ottoman Empire, which overran Yemen in 1517. As a direct result of the intolerance of the Ottomans (followers of the HANAFITE SCHOOL OF ISLAM), the al-mutlaq and the headquarters of the movement moved to Gujarat. Over the centuries, a sizable Ismaili community had developed in western India, and the al-Tayyib followers had built additional support in Gujarat. The Gujarati group had survived even after a Sunni Muslim ruler annexed the region in 1298.

The main body of al-Tayyib Ismailis, who came to be known as Bohras (traders), as many of the men engaged in trading businesses, suffered a major split over succession to the office of the al-mutlaq in 1589. The larger group acknowledged Da'ud (or Dawood) Burhan al-Din (d. 1612) as the new leader. A minority accepted the claims of Sulayman (b. Hasan al-Hindi). Sulayman's strength was in Yemen, where his followers were in the majority. In subsequent years, additional problems with succession led to the formation of a number of Ismaili groups, though those that have survived are quite small.

The supporters of Dawood Burhan al-Din remained strong in Gujarat, though in 1785 the headquarters were moved to what were seen as more tolerant British-controlled territory in Surat. There a school for training of future leadership was founded. The community, some seven hundred thousand strong, continues as the SHIAH FATIMI ISMAILI TAYYIBI DAWOODI BOHRA community (also popularly known as the Daud Bohras). Through the twentieth century the Daud Ismaili community has been affected by the emergence of a reformist community that has asked for changes in light of modern life. The largest group of reformists have organized themselves under the Central Board of the Dawoodi Bohra Community to challenge what they see is the overly authoritarian role assumed by many Bohra priests.

The Sulaymani Ismailis eventually made their headquarters in northern Yemen at Najran, near the border with Saudi Arabia. In fact, in 1934 Najran was included in territory annexed to Saudi Arabia. From there, the Sulaymani Ismaili al-mutlaq leads a following of some hundred thousand believers.

Sources:

Amiji, H. M. "The Bohras of East Africa." Journal of Religion in Africa 7 (1975): 27–61.
Corbin, Henry. Cyclical Time and Ismaili Gnosis. London: Kegan Paul International, 1983.
Daftary, Farhad. A Short History of the Ismailis. Princeton, NJ: Marcus Wiener Publishers, 1998.

Bolivia

The land that now comprises Bolivia has been inhabited for several thousand years by agricultural peoples, who produced several sophisticated civilizations. In the ninth century, a kingdom centered on Tiahuanaco spread along the Andes. By the twelfth century it had been replaced by the Inca leadership from the Cuzco Valley of Peru, which absorbed many features of the earlier kingdom. By the sixteenth century the empire reached from Ecuador to northern Chile and Argentina and included the Aymará and Quechua peoples in Bolivia.

The Spanish moved into Inca territory early in the 1500s, and in 1545 occupied the silver mines at Potosí, which went on to become one of the largest cities in the world in the seventeenth century. A generation of struggle for independence from Spanish rule in the early nineteenth century finally led to success in 1825 under the leadership of Simon Bolívar (1783–1830), after whom the independent nation was named. The coming of independence did not help the Native peoples, as the Spanish families who had settled the land years earlier now took control. Two wars in 1879–1883 and 1932–1835 cost Bolivia much of its territory, including the all-important land that connected it to the Pacific Ocean (now a part of Chile).

Beginning with the assassination of its president in 1946, Bolivia has been the scene of successive waves of new governments attempting to establish democracy and to deal with the country's peculiar economic problems. This unstable context provided an arena for Ernesto "Che" Guevara, popular leftist revolutionary, who was killed in 1967. By the 1990s, Bolivia had become a center of cocaine production. At the same time, in recent decades the Native peoples have significantly heightened their participation in the country's political structure as a means of slowing the encroachment upon their lands and cultures.

Many of the Native peoples, especially the Quechua and Aymará in the western highlands and the Guaraní in the south, have retained their traditional religion, though most have been at least nominally baptized as Roman Catholics. These traditional religions are polytheistic and tend to see the earth as populated with spirit entities. Religious leaders,

Status of religions in Bolivia, 2000-2050

Followers	2000			2025	2050
	total	%	rate
Christians	7,835,000	94.1	2.34	12,154,000	15,287,000
Roman Catholics	7,350,000	88.3	2.33	11,400,000	14,000,000
Protestants	530,000	6.4	2.85	1,100,000	1,625,000
Independents	145,000	1.7	3.48	270,000	390,000
Baha'is	269,000	3.2	3.02	525,000	800,000
Nonreligious	110,000	1.3	6.25	300,000	700,000
Ethnoreligionists	67,700	0.8	1.21	70,000	30,000
Atheists	33,500	0.4	2.56	60,000	110,000
Buddhists	5,300	0.1	1.71	9,000	17,000
Jews	3,100	0.0	1.79	4,000	5,500
Muslims	1,700	0.0	4.24	4,000	8,000
Neoreligionists	1,400	0.0	1.68	3,500	7,500
Spiritists	1,100	0.0	1.10	1,200	1,400
Chinese folk-religionists	380	0.0	1.87	600	900
Total population	8,329,000	100.0	2.40	13,131,000	16,967,000

who function variously as shamans, healers, and divines, keep the largely oral traditions alive and have become increasingly important as symbols of cultural persistence.

The Spanish brought the ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH with them, and Bolivia was incorporated in a new Diocese of Cusco (Peru) in 1537. The first Native peoples to be Christianized were the Parias and Chacras. Over the next century and a half the FRANCISCANS and JESUITS established a number of missions, the Jesuits developing their well-known cooperative villages among the Moxos and Chiquitos. Through the nineteenth century, the Catholic Church had a virtual monopoly on organized religious life, but because of a shortage of trained priests many Natives are nominally Catholic but continue their allegiance to traditional faiths in various admixtures. Through the twentieth century, the church was slow to recruit Bolivian priests.

The country is officially more than 90 percent Catholic. The church is led by the archbishop in La Paz (established as a diocese in 1608 and an archdiocese in 1975). A set of vicariates serve various Native peoples. The church retains its role as the official religion of the state, though other religions are now allowed some degree of toleration and freedom. The permeation of the church into Bolivian society also means that both lay Catholics and priests are found across the political spectrum.

Protestants were relatively late in targeting Bolivia for missionary activity. The first resident missionary did not initiate work until 1895. He made Bolivia unique, in that Protestant/FREE CHURCHES activity was initiated by the CHRISTIAN BRETHREN (the open branch of the PLYMOUTH BRETHREN movement). Canadian Baptists arrived in 1898 and American Methodists in 1901. Work centered on the building of schools, and membership growth was relatively slow. However, the missions developed into the EVANGELICAL METHODIST CHURCH OF BOLIVIA and the Bolivia Baptist Union, two of the more prominent Protestant bodies. Lutherans from the independent World Mission and Prayer League established a mission among the Aymará people, which has grown into the BOLIVIAN EVANGELICAL LUTHERAN CHURCH.

Through the twentieth century a wide spectrum of Evangelical and Pentecostal churches have arrived, primarily from the United States. The Andes Evangelical Mission opened work among the Quechua. It was joined in 1937 by the Evangelical Union of South America. They collaborated in producing a Quechua New Testament and finally merged their work in 1957 as the Evangelical Christian Union, one of the largest FREE CHURCHES in the country. The SEVENTH-DAY ADVENTIST CHURCH opened its now extensive work among the Aymará people in 1907. It responded to a call from the Aymará to build schools in the years immediately after World War II, and that action led to a mass movement into the church. The CHURCH OF THE NAZARENE and the Society of FRIENDS (Oregon) also found some success.

PENTECOSTALISM, though not as prominent in Bolivia as in some neighboring countries, is represented by missionaries from most of the more notable American churches, including the ASSEMBLIES OF GOD, the CHURCH OF GOD (CLEVELAND, TENNESSEE), the INTERNATIONAL CHURCH OF THE FOURSQUARE GOSPEL, and the Church of the Open Door. In addition, Pentecostals from Sweden, Norway, Trinidad, and Brazil have initiated work. Non-Pentecostal evangelicals have also come from Switzerland and Latvia. In turn, they have become the seedbed for more than forty Bolivian-based Free churches.

The National Association of Evangelicals in Bolivia was founded in 1966, but has since experienced the division between those groups that were more ecumenically oriented and associated with the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES and the more conservative Evangelical groups. Today, the latter dominate the Asociación Nacional de Evangélicos de Bolivia, which is associated with the WORLD EVANGELICAL ALLIANCE. There is today no national cooperative body connected with the World Council of Churches.

The first Jewish residents appear to have settled in La Paz in 1905. The very small community grew measurably in the 1920s with the addition of Russian immigrants and, after 1935, German refugees. Today there are some 640 Jewish residents, the majority of whom still reside in La Paz. Circulo Israelita is the national representative Jewish organization.

A wide variety of religions have come to Bolivia since World War II, among the most noticeable being the different Japanese religious groups that have followed the Japanese migration to South America. The BAHÁ'Í FAITH, introduced in 1965, found an unprecedented response to its message and has seen notable growth, with more than 700 spiritual assemblies operating by the 1980s. SPIRITISM from Brazil has a small following.

Sources:

Alonso, I., et al. La Iglesia en Perú y Bolivia. Fribourg, Switzerland: FERES, 1962.

Wagner, C. P. The Protestant Movement in Bolivia. South Pasadena, CA: William Carey Library, 1970.

Bolivian Evangelical Lutheran Church

The Bolivian Evangelical Lutheran Church is the largest Lutheran body operating among the Native population of South America. It began in 1938 with the arrival of representatives of the World Mission and Prayer League (WMPL). The league had grown out of a student prayer movement in Minneapolis, Minnesota (U.S.), earlier in the decade. WMPL is supported primarily by Midwestern Lutherans of Scandinavian descent.

After consultation with other Protestant groups working in the area, the league decided to direct its efforts to the Aymará people. Though nominally Roman Catholic, they were judged to be without significant spiritual care. The first two missionaries settled in Sorata in the Andean Mountains and opened a Bible school, a clinic, and a home for orphans. These facilities, located on a farm, became the center for evangelization. They learned the Aymarán language and found that lay people developed an unusual level of participation in spreading the message of the church throughout the Aymarán community.

The WMPL sent additional missionaries over the years, and their work was expanded by lay pastors trained in the school. A headquarters was established in La Paz and work begun among the Spanish-speaking population. The headquarters complex included a school (now the Lutheran Center of Theological Education), a bookstore, offices, and a worship sanctuary.

The continued success of the league was expressed not only by the growth of Spanish-speaking congregations, but through work initiated by the Aymarán members among the Quechua Indians, whose traditional territory included parts of Peru. However, in 1969 the league faced a major crisis when the Spanish-speaking members withdrew and formed the Latin American Lutheran Church. Three years later the WMPL mission became autonomous as the Bolivian Evangelical Lutheran Church. It is organized congregationally, and national governance is through a synod and elected officers. Both churches hold to traditional Lutheran doctrinal statements such as the Augsburg Confession.

In recent years, although there have been attempts to heal wounds caused by the separation, the two bodies have moved in separate directions. The Latin American Lutheran Church, the smaller of the two bodies, has identified with the more conservative Protestant and FREE CHURCHES and affiliated with the National Association of Evangelicals of Bolivia, which is in turn affiliated with the WORLD EVANGELICAL ALLIANCE. At the same time the Bolivian Evangelical Lutheran Church has identified with the global ecumenical movement and joined the LUTHERAN WORLD FELLOWSHIP and the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES. Pastors from both churches, as well as from the German-speaking Evangelical Lutheran Church in Bolivia, participate in the Conference of Lutheran Pastors of Bolivia.

The church reports a membership of 18,000.

Address:

Bolivian Evangelical Lutheran Church
Calle Río Pirai (Zina El Tejar)
La Paz
Bolivia

Source:

Bachmann, E. Theodore, and Mercia Brenne Bachmann. Lutheran Churches in the World: A Handbook. Minneapolis, MN: Augsburg Press, 1989.

Bon Religion

The traditional texts of the Bon-pos (followers of Bon) suggest that their religion was first promulgated by Tonpa Shenrab (sTon-pa gShen-rab) some twenty thousand years ago in a place called Olmo lun-rin ('Ol-mo lun-ring), often identified with Ta-zig (sTag-gzig: Iran?), and then in Shanshung (Zhang-zhung: Western Tibet?), from which they spread to Tibet itself. Bon became the Tibetan national religion and remained so until its position was gradually usurped by the newly introduced Buddhism during the eighth–eleventh century C.E.

Early non-Tibetan studies of Bon (often following arguably tendentious Buddhist sources) suggest that the religion was originally shamanic and animist, but adopted many Buddhist texts and practices following their introduction to Tibet from India. More recent scholarship has suggested that the Bon might actually have its roots in an early Central Asian (as opposed to Indic) diffusion of Buddhism into Tibet, heavily flavored with both Indo-Iranian and autochthonous religious beliefs. In the millennium or more that has passed since Bon and Buddhism met in Tibet, the two religions have developed side by side and have clearly adopted much from each other.

Regardless of its historical origins, it is clear that Bon—as it is now practiced—is a genuine, if unconventional form of Buddhism, a point now acknowledged by the Dalai Lama. Thus although the texts of Bon-pos and Buddhists differ in detail, they enjoy a common vocabulary of belief. Both religions refer to the founder of their religion as Sangye (Sans-rgyas, used to translate Buddha; literally, “fully purified”) and divide their canon into Kanjur and Tenjur (bKa-'gyur and bsTan-'gyur, Bon orthography: brTen-'gyur), the former comprising the texts that contain the authoritative words and teachings, and the latter important commentaries. Zealous practitioners of both religions aim to achieve chang-chu (byang-chub: awakening) and to attain liberation from the cycle of suffering and re-birth for all creatures. In the case of practitioners of Dzogchen (rDzogs-chen: Great Perfection), a tantric practice common to both Bon and the NYINGMA (rNying-ma) TIBETAN BUDDHISM, the aim is more specifically to achieve “oneness,” an undifferentiated unity with the inner and outer cosmos.

Also in common with Nyingma, Bon has a tradition of noncelibate “householder” (sngags-pa) lamas, who preserve particular teaching lineages within a family. In larger Bon monasteries monks are educated in a way similar to that of the Gelugpa (dGe-lugs-pa) sect of Buddhism: following the Vinaya (monastic code), practicing dialectical debate, and being trained in philosophy and logic.

Although Bon is mainly concentrated in the eastern provinces of Tibet, enclaves of Bon exist throughout the country, and in the ethnically Tibetan regions of Western Nepal and in Bhutan. Accurate population statistics do not exist, although a reasonable estimate might be that about 10 percent of the Tibetan population follow Bon. Some Bon teachers lecture internationally, but the religion does not actively proselytize outside its own community.

Both Bon-pos and Buddhists suffered vigorous persecution following the Chinese invasion of Tibet in the 1950s. Following the destruction of their principal monastery, Menri (sMan-ri), in 1959 many Bon-pos fled as refugees, mostly to India and Nepal. There they have established a number of monasteries, the largest of which is Palshenten Menri Ling (dPal gShen-bstan sMan-ri-gling), in Himachal Pradesh, which is home to the current head of the Bon religion, Abbot (mKhan-po) Sangye Tenzin Yong-dong (Sangs-rgyas bsTan-'dzin lJong-ldong).

An aerial view of the main building of the Gurujem Monastery in Tibet (K. D. Halliday/TRIP)

Address:

Bon Monastic Centre
Dolanji Village
P.O. Ochgat
Via Solan
Himachal Pradesh
India

Keith Richmond

Sources:

- Karmay, S. G. The Treasury of Good Sayings: A Tibetan History of Bon. London Oriental Series, vol. 26. London: Oxford University Press, 1972.
- Kvaerne, P. The Bon Religion of Tibet. The Iconography of a Living Tradition. London: Serindia, 1995.
- Snellgrove, D. L., ed. and trans. The Nine Ways of Bon [Excerpts from the GzI-brjid]. London Oriental Series, vol.18. London: Oxford University Press, 1967. Reprint, Boulder, CO, 1980.
- Snellgrove, D. L., and H. E. Richardson. A Cultural History of Tibet. London: 1968. Rev. ed., Boston: Shambhala, 1986.

Bosnia and Herzegovina

The territory of Bosnia and Herzegovina, a former republic of the Federated Republics of Yugoslavia, was originally inhabited by the tribes of the Illyrian people who in the second century B.C.E. were conquered by the Romans. In the seventh century C.E., Serbs settled in the region. At the end of the tenth century, the land was overrun by an expansive Bulgarian ruler. During this time, the Gnostic religion of the Bogomils took hold in the region, and Bosnia became one of its strongest centers. Christian forces in neighboring lands fought crusades to wipe out what they saw as heresy, but they were unable to defeat the Bosnian armies.

Bosnia and Herzegovina became a province of the Turkish Ottoman Empire in the fifteenth century. The Muslim Turks placed great pressure on the Bogomils to convert to Islam. The result was an unusual mixture of Muslim, Roman Catholic, and Eastern Orthodox believers in the Status of religions in Bosnia & Herzegovina, 2000-2050

Followers	2000			2025	2050
	total	%	rate
Muslims	2,385,000	60.0	1.92	3,079,000	2,734,000
Christians	1,391,000	35.0	-3.85	1,110,000	913,000
Orthodox	700,000	17.6	-4.42	600,000	500,000
Roman Catholics	681,000	17.2	-3.27	500,000	400,000
Protestants	2,700	0.1	0.77	3,000	5,000
Nonreligious	129,000	3.3	-3.28	100,000	90,000
Atheists	66,900	1.7	-3.45	35,000	30,000
Jews	400	0.0	-1.27	350	500
Total population	3,972,000	100.0	-0.81	4,324,000	3,767,000

Bosnia and Herzegovina

country. Turkish rule continued until the nineteenth century, but the country became free in stages. In 1878, the Congress of Vienna assigned Bosnia and Herzegovina to Austrian control. However, many Bosnians had become committed to a united southern Slav kingdom, and it was the assassination of the Austrian Archduke Ferdinand in Sarajevo in 1914 that occasioned the beginning of World War I and the eventual collapse of the Austrian Empire. Bosnia became a part of Serbia.

Bosnia was occupied by the Germans during World War II and was then incorporated into the Federated Republics of Yugoslavia after the war. In 1991 Bosnia and Herzegovina declared itself independent of Yugoslavia, the leaders opting for a multiethnic and multireligious country. Following a plebiscite that approved the establishment of an independent country in 1992, war broke out. Bosnian Serb troops opposed Bosnian Muslim and Croatian (Roman Catholic) troops. The war continued through the 1990s and exacted heavy losses of life, especially among the residents of Kosovo. It was only brought to an end by the intervention of European and American forces.

The story of modern Bosnian religion begins with the attempt of Orthodox forces from Serbia and Roman Catholic forces from Croatia to convert the Bogomils. The Orthodox efforts in the crusades paralleled the rise of the SERBIAN ORTHODOX CHURCH and its struggles to gain independence from the ECUMENICAL PATRIARCHATE, headquartered in Constantinople. Over the years the Serbian Church developed a strong presence in Bosnia and claimed some 30 percent of the population as members. In like measure, Roman Catholics based in Croatia developed a strong presence in the land and claimed some 17 percent.

The Muslims, of the Sunni HANAFITE SCHOOL OF ISLAM, became the dominant religious force in the land. Following the Turkish conquest, Muslims had the necessary time to devote to the full conversion of the Bogomils to Islam. Eventually, Sarajevo became the seat of the Supreme Council of Islam. During the twentieth century, the Supreme Council provided leadership for the more than 2,000 mosques of the Muslim community in Bosnia and the associated neighboring republics. More than 40 percent of the population is Muslim.

The war, which began in 1992, occurred as troops of the former Yugoslavia who happened to be Bosnian Serbs and members primarily of the Orthodox Church turned their armament on their fellow Bosnians. The Bosnian majority included Croats, Serbs, and Muslims, but the Serbian forces were particularly brutal against the Muslim element of the population, and as they gained control of part of the country in 1993, they killed the Muslims or drove them from the land.

Though they make up a very small percentage of the population, various Protestant and FREE CHURCHES have come into Bosnia. The CHURCH OF THE NAZARENE came into the area in the 1870s. The Baptists had begun a decade earlier with the efforts of a former Nazarene, Franz Tabor, who moved to Sarajevo in 1865. Over the years the Baptist work was destroyed, and it started anew in the 1990s. The single Baptist church is located in Sarajevo. Methodists began work in the 1800s, the CHRISTIAN BROTHERS in 1905, and the SEVENTH-DAY ADVENTIST CHURCH in 1909. An older Lutheran presence that dated from the sixteenth century appears to have died out.

Given the chaos of the 1990s, little new work has had the opportunity to be started. A few Christian agencies have begun work as the war ended. The INTERNATIONAL SOCIETY FOR KRISHNA CONSCIOUSNESS is one of the few Eastern religions that have moved into the country. A small community of Jews, now some 1,100, centered on Sarajevo, survived the Holocaust and chose not to move to Israel.

Women read the Qur'an at a mosque in Sarajevo after the death of their friend. (Ibrahim/TRIP)

Sources:

Cuvalo, Ante. Historical Dictionary of Bosnia and Herzegovina. Lanham, MD: Scarecrow Press, 1997.

Malcolm, Noel. Bosnia: A Short History. New York: New York University Press, 1994.

The Muslims of Bosnia-Herzegovina: Their Historical Development from the Middle Ages to the Dissolution of Yugoslavia.

Cambridge, MA: Center for Middle Eastern Studies, Harvard University, 1996.

Botswana

Botswana, located in south central Africa, was given its name by the 'Tswana people who settled there in the seventeenth century and were in residence when the Europeans arrived in the next century. The 'Tswana's homeland became a bone of contention between England and Portugal, and each tried to build a route across the continent to unite their coastal colonies. The first Europeans to settle the land, however, were Afrikaners (also called Boers) who had left Cape Town following the British takeover. About the same time, the Zulus began to expand into 'Tswana territory, and the conflict between the three groups continued through the rest of the century. In 1894, representatives of the three groups met in London to resolve their differences, the outcome of their meeting being the establishment of a British protectorate in what was then called Bechuanaland. Through the early twentieth century, the Afrikaners were able to take control of the agricultural production.

Botswana gained independence in 1966. British-trained Seretse Khama (1921–1980), whose marriage to Ruth Williams, a white European, became a scandal in England, became the country's first president and sought means to reconcile his people with the Afrikaners, who had come to own some 80 percent of the country's wealth. Although a relatively poor country, it was able to experience economic growth during the 1980s, and in the 1990s the wealth (in diamonds and beef) began to filter down to the larger part of the population

Traditional religions survive in Botswana, and between a third and a half of the people continue to follow them. The San people (often called Bushmen), the original inhabitants of Botswana who had been pushed aside by the 'Tswana, have been particularly resistant to Christian missionary efforts. The San possess a sophisticated religion built around the belief that certain animals (such as the praying mantis) and the celestial bodies (sun, moon, etc.) are particularly manifestations of the divine.

Protestantism came into the country early in the nineteenth century. The LONDON MISSIONARY SOCIETY (LMS) launched a mission in the region in 1816 and the resultant United Congregational Church became and has remained the largest church in the country. LMS missionaries were responsible for the translation of the Bible into Setswana, the first translation into one of the southern African languages. Eventually, the congregations in Botswana were united with the UNITED CONGREGATIONALIST CHURCH OF SOUTHERN AFRICA (formed in 1859).

Over the next years several other churches entered the country from South Africa, including the METHODIST CHURCH OF SOUTH AFRICA (1822), the DUTCH REFORMED CHURCH (1830), and the EVANGELICAL LUTHERAN CHURCH IN SOUTHERN AFRICA (1857). The Methodist and Lutheran churches remain a part of their parent body, though the Dutch Reformed Church of Botswana has been autonomous since 1979.

The first ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH mission was opened in 1895; throughout the first half of the twentieth century, however, work was conducted in the country from bases in three of the neighboring countries. Finally in 1959, an Apostolic Prefecture was established for the country, and a bishop for Gaborone was consecrated in 1970. The CHURCH OF ENGLAND entered in 1899, and its work is now a part of the CHURCH OF THE PROVINCE OF CENTRAL AFRICA. The Diocese of Botswana was established in 1972.

The SEVENTH-DAY ADVENTIST CHURCH did not enter the country until 1921, but over the next decades emerged as the second largest of the churches produced directly by the missionary endeavor. The work is currently organized as two fields (North Botswana and South Botswana) attached to the Church's Eastern Africa Division. More recently, the Lutherans have challenged the Seventh-day Adventists in membership.

Botswana has proved fertile ground for indigenous churches, especially in the last half of the twentieth century. The most successful has been the SPIRITUAL HEALING CHURCH, founded around 1950 by representatives of the Moshoeshoe Berean Bible Readers Church founded

Status of religions in Botswana, 2000-2050

Followers	2000			2025	2050
	total	%	rate
Christians	972,000	59.9	3.12	1,488,000	1,951,000
Independents	498,000	30.7	3.90	780,000	1,100,000
Protestants	178,000	11.0	1.97	250,000	300,000
Roman Catholics	60,000	3.7	2.30	115,000	200,000
Ethnoreligionists	629,000	38.8	1.43	714,000	777,000
Baha'is	12,400	0.8	2.82	22,000	45,000
Muslims	3,300	0.2	3.56	6,000	12,000
Nonreligious	2,300	0.1	4.98	5,000	10,000
Hindus	2,200	0.1	3.75	6,000	1,500
Jews	340	0.0	3.03	400	500
Sikhs	200	0.0	2.66	400	600
Total population	1,622,000	100.0	2.43	2,242,000	2,798,000

early in the century by Lesotho prophet Mattita. Other groups originating in neighboring countries include the ZION CHRISTIAN CHURCH of South Africa and St. John's Apostolic Faith Mission Church of South Africa. The later church has had a Botswana schism known as St. Peter's Apostolic Faith Healing Church. Many of these independent churches are products of PENTECOSTALISM, which appears to have entered the country through them. The Swedish Holiness Union Mission did not open work until 1960, the American-based ASSEMBLIES OF GOD until 1963, and the CHURCH OF GOD (CLEVELAND TENNESSEE) until 1968.

The Muslim community in Botswana is minuscule, as is the Jewish. There is a small community of adherents of the BAHÁ'Í FAITH. The Hindu Temple in Gaborone and the Shiva-Vishnu Temple at Selebe-Phikwe serve the Asian Indians in the country. There is also a center sponsored by the INTERNATIONAL SOCIETY FOR KRISHNA CONSCIOUS-

NESS. The CHURCH OF JESUS CHRIST OF LATTER-DAY SAINTS initiated a missionary effort in 1990. Although there is a growing diversity in Botswana, its relative isolation and small population has made it less attractive than some other African countries to the spread of the new religions from Asia, North America, and Europe.

Sources:

Amanze, J. N. Botswana Handbook of Churches: A Handbook of Churches, Ecumenical Organizations, Theological Institutions and Other World Religions in Botswana. Gaborone, Botswana: Pala Press, 1994.

Fako, T. T. A Guide to the Registered Churches of Botswana. Gaborone: University of Botswana, 1983.

Parratt, S. N. "Muslims in Botswana." African Studies 48, 1 (1998): 71–82.

Brahma Kumaris

The Brahma Kumaris World Spiritual University (BKWSU) was founded in the late 1930s in Karachi (now Pakistan), by Lekhraj Khubchand Kirpalani (1877–1969), a wealthy diamond merchant and devout Hindu, who later took the spiritual name Prajapita Brahma. In his mid-fifties, Dada Lekhraj (known to "students" as Brahma Baba) decided to sell his business and devote himself to spiritual pursuits. He was disturbed both by the materialism of commerce and by the treatment of women and had received a number of visions, including an experience of Siva speaking through him in order to create a new world order. He began a movement, the Om Mandli, and many women (married and single) attending the religious gatherings took vows of celibacy. In 1938 some aggrieved husbands and relatives founded the Anti Om Mandli Committee, resulting in sensational newspaper articles, persecution, and lawsuits. After about a year the furor died down, and a new organization known as the Brahma Kumaris was created. After the partition of India into India and Pakistan, it moved to Mount Abu in Rajasthan, where the BKWSU headquarters is still located.

In 1971 branches were established beyond India, and in 1980, as a result of its work promoting spiritual values in society, the BKWSU became affiliated with the United Nations, through which it runs several international projects. By the year 2000, over 450,000 people worldwide were said to be practicing Raj Yoga as taught by the Brahma Kumaris.

The Brahma Kumaris' lifestyle is ascetic. A few live in centers and work full-time for the movement; most live outside and have normal jobs but will rise early to meditate at a local center. Fully committed members practice celibacy, are strict vegetarians, and wear white when teaching. Nearly all those in positions of spiritual authority are women. Although donations are accepted and members give regularly to the organization, meditation courses and retreats are offered free of charge. Those running the activities are all volunteers.

The Brahma Kumaris are certainly not aggressive proselytisers, but they do have an extensive outreach, serving in education, health care, prisons, and other areas of the community. They produce an impressive array of books, pamphlets, magazines, newsletters, cassettes, and videos; they also organize a large number of meetings, retreats, and conferences, and offer numerous classes in Raj Yoga and other spiritual and practical skills.

The Raj Yoga embraced by the Brahma Kumaris does not involve any mantras, special postures, or breathing techniques. It is usually practiced in a sitting position with the eyes open, facing a picture of red and orange rays emanating from a center of light. Meditators are encouraged to focus on a "third eye" behind their forehead, the objective being to practice "soul consciousness"—recognizing the self not as a body but as a soul. The Raj Yogi is one who has a mental link with Siva, God the Supreme Soul, the source of all goodness. Om shanti, used as a greeting, is a reminder of the original state of peace of the soul.

Address:

Brahma Kumaris
Mount Abu
Rajasthan 307501
India
<http://www.bkwsu.com>

Eileen Barker

Sources:

Church, Anthea. Inner Space: A Book of Hope for Busy People.

London: Brahma Kumaris Information Services, 1997.

Hodgkinson, Liz. Peace and Purity: The Story of the Brahma Kumaris: A Spiritual Revolution. London: Rider, 1999.

O'Donnell, Ken. New Beginnings: Raja Yoga Meditation Course.

London: Brahma Kumaris Information Services, 1987; 6th ed., 1999.

Brahmo Samaj

The Brahma Samaj (The Society of Worshipers of One God) was founded in 1828 by Raja Rammohun Roy in Calcutta, India. The Brahma Samaj started as an attempt at religious and social reconstruction in the nineteenth century, in response to the challenges posed by Christian missionary work and Western ideas, both of which entered India in the wake of British colonialism. Part of the Bengal renaissance, it aimed to reform Hinduism, purging it of its idolatry, caste system, and other debasing features, and preserving its higher elements of truth, spirituality, and essential religion. It takes its stand distinctly on theism—the worship of one God, omniscient and omnipotent. Though distinctly Hindu in its origins, the Brahma Samaj has adopted concepts from other religions, especially from Christian reform movements. It believes that all truth is of God and respects the prophets of all religions. Raja Rammohun Roy (1772–1833), Devendranath Tagore (1817–1905), and Keshub Chunder Sen (1838–1884) were especially important in shaping the Brahmo Samaj.

Branch Davidians

Rammohun Roy was born in the eastern state of Bengal. He acquired an intimate knowledge of Hinduism, Islam, and Buddhism, and learned Sanskrit, Arabic, Persian, and English. He developed a zeal for reform, in part from Hindu and Muslim thought and later from Unitarian doctrine. In the religious sphere, his reforming zeal took the form of rejection of image worship as indicative of prejudice and superstition and contrary to reason and common sense. He rejected also the violation of human rights perpetrated in the name of religion involving sati, or suttee, the burning of widows on the funeral pyres of their husbands. Roy and his followers formed the Brahmo Sabha (later, Brahmo Samaj) to promote these ideals and reform society. The followers met regularly for religious services, during which passages were read from the Upanishads, sermons delivered, and hymns sung.

The Brahmo Samaj went into decline after Roy's death. In 1838, Devendranath Tagore, father of the famous Indian poet Rabindranath Tagore, revived and reorganized the Samaj. Tagore did not share the cosmopolitan vision of Rammohun and was definitely opposed to Christian missions. He believed firmly in the infallibility of the Hindu scriptures and developed the Samaj's identity in accordance with his beliefs. Under his guidance and leadership, the Samaj became an active Hindu missionary organization, drawing adherents from among educated Hindus, and it established branches in several towns in Bengal and other states.

Keshub Chunder Sen's work had a mixed impact on the society, which ultimately fragmented into three factions. Sen rejected the caste system and child marriages and promoted remarriage of widows and women's education. He gave the Samaj a universal character by drawing upon world scriptures. In 1865 the differences between him and other members of the Brahmo Samaj became sufficiently acute that he split off from the parent group and formed the Brahmo Samaj of India. A further schism occurred as a result of the marriage of his underage daughter to the maharaja of Kuch Bihar. Sen's claims that the marriage was in accordance with God's will disenchanted some of his associates, and they, in 1878, founded the Sadaran Brahmo Samaj. Sen continued as leader of the Brahmo Samaj of India, and in 1881 his group adopted the name the Navavidhan Samaj, or Church of the New Dispensation.

Sivanath Sastri was one of the prime movers of the Sadaran Brahmo Samaj, the largest group in existence today. While maintaining traditional Brahmo practices of faith in a personal God, congregational worship, and condemnation of idol worship, the Sadaran Samaj also emphasized brotherhood, opposed caste distinctions, and promoted a well-ordered organization.

Today, the Brahmo Samaj is a very small minority with mostly hereditary membership. Though it was not able to reform Hinduism of what it saw as its idolatry and superstition, the Brahmo Samaj provided the basis for a rational critique of religious thought and practice that contributed to the establishment of a secular, democratic Indian society. The address of its headquarters is Sadaran Brahmo Samaj, 211, Bidhan Sarani, Calcutta 700 006, India. There is a related Brahmo Samaj chapter in London, England, some members of which maintain a Web site at <http://www.chanda.freeseerve.co.uk/brahmoframe.htm>.

Abhi P. Janamanchi

Sources:

- Kopf, David. The Brahmo Samaj and The Shaping of the Modern Indian Mind. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1979.
- Lavan, Spencer. "The Brahmo Samaj: India's First Modern Movement For Religious Reform." In Religion In Modern India, edited by J. L. Baird. New Delhi, India: South Asia Publications, 1981.
- . Unitarians and India: A Study In Encounter and Response. Chicago, IL: Exploration Press, 1991.
- Sastri, Sivanath. History of the Brahmo Samaj. 2d ed. Calcutta, India: Sadharan Brahmo Samaj, 1974.

Branch Davidians

The Branch Davidians are a splinter of the SEVENTH-DAY ADVENTIST CHURCH that sought to reform the parent denomination. Victor Houteff (1885–1955) is the theological and organizational force behind the Davidian and Branch Davidian movements. In 1907 he immigrated to the United States from Bulgaria, converted from Orthodoxy to Seventh-day Adventism, moved to Los Angeles, and in 1929 began to publish his views. Houteff affirmed the truth of leading Adventist teachings: the imminent return of Christ, Saturday worship, pacifism, and observance of Old Testament dietary regulations. But Houteff believed that the denomination had grown lax in its observances and that Christ would never return to an impure church to begin his millennial reign. Hence Houteff stressed strict observance of church regulations and a simple style of life that allowed no compromise with the world.

Moreover, he believed that scripture held hitherto unrevealed truth that he could reveal. His message was that a remnant of 144,000 faithful and holy Adventists—the Davidians—would form the true church and would receive preferential treatment when Christ returned. His life mission was therefore to convert Seventh-day Adventists to his views. His followers believed his message and viewed him as a prophet. The Adventist church rejected Houteff's reform initiative. In 1935 he moved with 37 followers to Mount Carmel, near Waco, Texas. There the Davidians created a viable community of about 65 people. They printed Houteff's teachings. They hoped that the prophet's truth would enlighten the Adventists, but their missionary effort produced meager results.

June 2001: This small chapel in Waco, Texas, stands on the spot of David Koresh's Branch Davidian compound that was stormed and subsequently burned to the ground by the FBI and ATF in April 1993. (AFP/CORBIS)

When Houteff died in 1955, Ben Roden announced a new name for the group—the Branch Davidians. In fact, Houteff's wife, Florence, retained power until 1959, when the Davidians split into many factions. Roden's group won control of Mount Carmel. Each new prophet legitimated leadership by locating new interpretations in scripture. Roden stressed the importance of the founding of Israel as prelude to asserting that the Holy Spirit is female, and that women should be ordained. Her son, George, succeeded her and taught that he was the messiah.

Lois befriended a new follower, Vernon Howell (1959–1993). George drove Howell away at gunpoint in 1985. But Howell and his followers returned and exchanged gunfire with Roden in 1987. Roden was jailed, and the Branch Davidians reorganized under Howell, their new leader (1987–1993). In 1990 Howell changed his name to David, suggesting his messianic role, and Koresh (the Hebrew for Cyrus), suggesting one who frees God's people from their enemies (as Cyrus the Great freed the Hebrews from the Babylonian captivity). The tradition of deferring to the new teachings of a prophet allowed Koresh to develop new lines of thought and practices that diverged radically from the older Branch David-ian tradition. Koresh stressed his prophetic role in opening the Seven Seals, which for him meant properly interpreting the symbolic language of Revelation. He also taught that he was one of several Christs. Whereas the first one was sinless and pacifist, he said that he would destroy God's enemies. In place of pacifism Koresh stockpiled weapons. Whereas Houteff taught strict traditional morality, Koresh taught that he should father the children of his new kingdom. Thus he announced that he alone would have sexual relations with the Branch Davidian women. The core idea of millennialism remained central for Koresh, but he changed much of traditional Branch Davidian thought and practice.

In February, 1993, the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, and Firearms (BATF) raided the Branch Davidians for possession of illegal firearms. The two groups exchanged gunfire, and ten people died. A 51-day standoff followed. It ended on April 19 when government tanks began knocking down the Davidian home. Fire broke out, and some eighty-one Davidians died. The Branch Davidian standoff received worldwide coverage. The event raised many issues for reflection: the nature of religious authority, the limits of arms accumulation, the responsibility of the media, the staying power of millennial ideas, and the government treatment of minority religions. The fallout of the event included a temporary rise in the militia movement and the bombing of the Oklahoma City Federal Building (which occurred in 1995 on the second anniversary of the Waco fire). The Branch Davidians are known around the world, not because of their religious ideas but because of the deadly 1993 confrontation.

Branham Tabernacle and Related Assemblies

Following the fire at Waco, the few survivors of the Branch Davidian group reorganized. Some faced trial on charges growing out of their confrontation with the BATF and FBI and are serving prison sentences. Others have taken possession of the property upon which Mount Carmel had existed and have tried to rebuild. There are fewer than fifty members.

Davidians do not reveal statistics, but the combined membership appears to be fewer than a thousand. They typically gather in small communities, led by forceful personalities. There is no national organization. Rival factions exist at Mount Carmel near Elk, Texas. Other groups exist in Missouri, South Carolina, and New York, as well as in the United Kingdom and Australia.

Address:

<http://www.branchdavidian.com/>

William L. Pitts Jr.

Sources:

Note: Extensive sources on every aspect of the Branch Davidians are now available on various Internet sites and in the several U.S. government reports. The following items represent a selection of some of the better books for developing an overview of the group and the final conflagration.

- Houteff, Victor. The Shepherd's Rod Series. Reprint, Salem, SC: General Association of Davidian Seventh-day Adventists, 1990.
- . The Symbolic Code Series. Reprint, Tamasee, SC: General Association of Davidian Seventh-day Adventists, 1993.
- Lewis, James R., ed. From the Ashes: Making Sense of Waco. Lanham, MD: Rowman and Littlefield, 1994.
- Reavis, Dick J. The Ashes of Waco: An Investigation. New York: Simon and Schuster, 1995. Reprint, Syracuse, N.Y.: Syracuse University Press, 1998.
- Wright, Stuart A., ed. Armageddon in Waco: Critical Perspectives on the Branch Davidian Conflict. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1995.
- Tabor, James D., and Eugene V. Gallagher. Why Waco? Cults and the Battle for Religious Freedom in America. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1995.

Branham Tabernacle and Related Assemblies

The Branham Tabernacle was established in Jeffersonville, Indiana (USA), by William Marrion Branham (1909–1965), a prominent Pentecostal healing evangelist in the decade following World War II. Branham, the son of a Baptist minister, began to hear a voice he identified as an angel of the Lord during his childhood. Then as a young man he was healed in a Pentecostal church and became a preacher. He was visited by an angel in 1946, and the event led to becoming an evangelist who emphasized healing in the revival services he conducted.

In Oregon, he encountered Gordon Lindsey (d. 1973), pastor of an ASSEMBLIES OF GOD congregation. Lindsey joined Branham's team and began editing the Voice of Healing magazine in 1948. Branham's work created the movement that in the 1950s led Oral Roberts (b. 1918) and others to fame as healing evangelists. Around 1960, a split developed between Branham and the majority of the healing evangelists, as Branham began to express divergent theological opinions in his sermons. He denounced denominationalism and the doctrine of the Trinity and promoted the "Oneness" Pentecostal position of baptism in the name of the Lord Jesus Christ.

The split between the other evangelists and Branham widened in 1963, when he began to focus upon God's promise in Malachi 4:5 to send his prophet, Elijah. Although Branham never identified himself as that messenger, he hinted that it was acceptable to believe that he was the one spoken about by Malachi. In the midst of the controversy, he was killed in a car accident in 1965. Those who believed that Branham had been one with the spirit of Elijah immediately began to preserve and spread his message. To accomplish this task, tapes of sermons were reproduced and circulated by The Voice of God Recordings, Inc. (Box 950, Jeffersonville, IN 47130), while sermon transcripts were distributed by Spoken Word Publications. In 1986, Spoken Word merged into The Voice of God, which now houses the complete archive of Branham's tapes and written material. It is headed by Branham's son, Joseph M. Branham. Voice of God Recordings has an internet presence at <http://www.branham.org/>.

The William Branham Evangelistic Association, led by another of Branham's sons, Billy Paul Branham, was formed to perpetuate Branham's missionary work. That work is centered upon the Branham Tabernacle, and a large a number of independent churches also follow the Branham teachings. Although the movement is concentrated in North America (with more than 300 congregations), there are many Branhamite congregations around the world. There is no organization, only an informal fellowship of congregations that support the Voice of God and receive and distribute the Branham tapes and sermon booklets. The literature is regularly translated into more than thirty languages. There are numerous Branhamite sites on the Internet.

Address:

Voice of God
Box 950
Jeffersonville, IN 47131
<http://www.branham.org>

James R. Lewis

Sources:

Harrell, David Edwin, Jr. All Things Are Possible.

Bloomington: University of Indiana Press, 1975.

Lindsey, Gordon. William Branham, a Man Sent from God. Jeffersonville, IN: William Branham, 1950.

Weaver, C. Douglas. The Healer-Prophet, William Marrion Branham: A Study in the Prophetic in American Pentecostalism. Macon, GA: Mercer University Press, 1987.

Brazil

During the course of the Portuguese colonization of Brazil, the ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH established itself as the single official religion and held this status for nearly four centuries. The ideological role of the Catholic Christianity brought by the Europeans and the intimate relationship between the Portuguese crown and the church was already evident in the first name the colonizers initially gave the newly discovered territory: Terra de Santa Cruz, or Land of the Sacred Cross. As if it were the most natural thing in the world, the early cities are named after saints (for example Sao Vicente), or even after the sum total of all the saints (Santos). These and other newly founded villages were laid out in a manner that put the church at the geographic center of the community.

Catholicism kept its monopoly until the proclamation of the republic in the year 1889 and the constitution of 1891, which legally confirmed the religious neutrality of the Brazilian State. This political development had already begun near the beginning of the century, when trade agreements with the British led to the toleration, within certain limits, of non-Catholic Christian communities in Brazil. The prohibition against religious persecution enacted in the first constitution of 1824 was an important milestone in this process of religious liberalization.

On the other hand it is revealing that the first national census, taken in 1872, classified only 0.28 percent of the total population as non-Catholic. Everyone else was considered a member of the Catholic Church. Eighteen years later the Census indicated that 98.92 percent of the population was Catholic and 1.08 percent non-Catholic. In 1940 more than 95 percent of the population was still Catholic and in 1960 it was slightly more than 93 percent. In 1980, this fig-

Status of religions in Brazil, 2000-2050

Followers	2000			2025	2050
	total	%	rate
Christians	155,545,000	91.4	1.31	195,848,000	213,509,000
Roman Catholics	153,300,000	90.1	1.35	190,000,000	208,000,000
Protestants	30,200,000	17.8	1.67	45,000,000	53,500,000
Independents	25,500,000	15.0	1.72	36,000,000	43,000,000
Spiritists	8,327,000	4.9	2.32	11,200,000	15,000,000
Nonreligious	3,998,000	2.4	3.26	7,500,000	11,000,000
Atheists	575,000	0.3	1.61	850,000	1,200,000
Neoreligionists	439,000	0.3	1.72	700,000	1,000,000
Buddhists	426,000	0.3	1.43	720,000	1,100,000
Jews	357,000	0.2	1.43	450,000	500,000
Ethnoreligionists	177,000	0.1	1.64	220,000	280,000
Muslims	173,000	0.1	1.45	270,000	380,000
Chinese folk-religionists	37,000	0.0	1.46	65,000	90,000
Baha'is	36,700	0.0	2.05	70,000	110,000
Hindus	9,800	0.0	2.07	15,000	25,000
Shintoists	6,800	0.0	1.27	10,000	16,000
other religionists	8,800	0.0	0.96	12,000	20,000
Total population	170,115,000	100.0	1.41	217,930,000	244,230,000

ure fell below the 90 percent mark for the first time. In the following decade, Catholicism witnessed a dramatic statistical decline of 5.6 percent. According to the Brazilian Institute of Geography and Statistics (IBGE), only 83.3 percent of the total Brazilian population associated itself with the Catholic Church in 1991.

Later studies confirmed the basic trend. From 1990 to 1992 a regional count of newly founded local churches and parishes was undertaken in the Rio de Janeiro metropolitan area. It focused on newly founded facilities of both the Catholic Church and Pentecostal denominations. Of every ten new parishes only one was Catholic and the rest were Pentecostal. From 1992 to 1995 a similar study was undertaken in the state of Rio Grande do Sul. It addressed a wider spectrum of recently founded religious institutions. Only one new local Catholic church was inaugurated annually. Meanwhile, Pentecostal Christians established 125 temples, Spiritists founded 79 new centers, and Afro-Brazilian circles opened 125 new terrenos during the same period.

The last nationally representative data on religious preference were collected in August and September 1994 by Datafolha. They referred to the adult population entitled to vote. The survey indicated that 74.9 percent of this population was made up of Catholics. However, there were differences according to geographical regions. In percentage terms, the northeast (80.4 percent) is the most Catholic part of Brazil. The city of Salvador (65.3 percent), capital of the state of Bahia, is a notable exception. The percentage of Catholics is also relatively high in the south (78.4 percent). On the other hand, the southeast, at 71.4 percent, is clearly below the national average. This figure is strongly influenced by the region's two major cities, São Paulo and Rio de Janeiro, where Catholics make up 65.2 percent and 59.3 percent, respectively, of adults entitled to vote. In the Rio de Janeiro metropolitan area, the last representative study, conducted in 2000 by the Higher Institute of Religious Studies (ISER), counted only 55.7 percent Catholic.

These figures appear in a clearer light if one considers that the project undertaken by Datafolha found that of the 74.9 percent of adult Brazilians who call themselves Catholics, 61 percent were "traditional" believers, characterized by a lack of commitment to the church as an institution. This majority attends religious services only sporadically, usually on the occasion of rites of passage. Only the other 14 percent are considered engaged members of the Church. These consciously identify themselves as Christians within an increasingly secularized society, and they actively take part in one of the church's subsidiary organizations and movements. Thus, from the 14 percent engaged Catholics, 1.8 percent are connected to a Base Community (CEB), and 3.8 percent represent the Charismatic Renewal Movement (RCC). The remaining 7.9 percent belong to one of the minor, more specific Catholic groups that, for example, promote a certain devotional practice or attend to the needs of families, couples, or adolescents.

The CEBs emerged in the 1960s and 1970s. In principal these groups, which average 20 members, are orientated toward liberation theology, which means they side with the worries, needs, and rights of the poor. The leaders of the CEB movement plead for greater political participation among Catholics in the here and now in order to contribute to the construction of a more equitable, humane society. Datafolha results show that neither the previously estimated number of up to 4 million CEB members nor the other extreme assumption that there are only about 250,000 CEB members is adequate. Rather, based on the Datafolha results, it seems fair to assume that around 2 million Catholics are affiliated with a CEB. However, it appears that, compared to the past, many CEBs have become less political, while still offering a space where members can share their religious aspirations in an intimate setting.

The RCC spilled over from the United States in the 1970s. Since the second half of the 1980s it has witnessed a steady increase in members. Its impact on the general public has to do with the popular success of its most prominent representatives, first and foremost Father Marcelo Rossi (Padre Marcelo). Like a number of other, lesser-known singing priests, Padre Marcelo attracts a growing number of fans with his show-like masses, television presentations, and best-selling CDs. From two different perspectives the RCC can be seen as a religious antithesis. From within the Catholic Church it is in a certain sense at the opposite pole from the CEBs, since it propagates an individual apolitical spirituality and a conservative Catholic morality, with a focus on family life. At the same time it competes with PENTECOSTALISM. Like the latter, the RCC emphasizes the Holy Spirit and its gifts, such as healing and glossolalia. On the other hand, the RCC's members are devoted to Our Lady (the Virgin Mary) and stress their Catholic identity and loyalty to the pope.

If one leaves aside the relatively brief colonial-era invasions by the Dutch and French, as well as the rare cases of individual Protestant immigrants, the history of manifest Protestant religious activities in Brazil begins early in the nineteenth century.

The first Protestant place of worship was an Anglican chapel established in 1819 in São Paulo. In order to avoid provoking a Catholic backlash, the chapel, used only by Englishmen working in the city, was not recognizable as a religious building from the outside. Lutherans who had emigrated from Germany inaugurated the second (1823 in Nova Friburgo) and the third (1824 in Sao Leopoldo) Protestant churches on Brazilian territory, both in the state of Rio de Janeiro. Waves of immigration, ongoing until the 1930s, brought approximately 70,000 German and Swiss Lutheran Christians to Brazil. As a result of the regional concentration of Lutheran settlement and their efforts to preserve their cultural identity, there emerged relatively self-sufficient Lutheran enclaves. From a religious point of view, these communities have succeeded until today. Currently, the Lutheran church in Brazil numbers about one million members, or more than one quarter of the total membership of all the denominations of the so-called historic branch of Protestantism combined. Regional variation in the density of Lutheran population is a result of historic immigration patterns. Because German immigrants preferred the south, about 80 percent of all Lutheran Christians in Brazil live in this region. Next is the southeast, with about 12 percent.

Besides immigration Protestantism, predominantly of European origin, other denominations associated with a so-called conversion Protestantism, of North American origin, also left their mark on Brazil. Immigration from the United States occurred almost exclusively between 1865 and 1867 (following the American Civil War) and in very limited numbers. Only two thousand North Americans came to Brazil, either individually or in single families. They dispersed throughout the country and assimilated quickly into the host society. Thus, the arrival of Presbyterian, Methodist, and Baptist ministers was not connected to immigration but possessed from the very beginning the character of missionary work.

The first three Presbyterian ministers arrived in Brazil between 1859 and 1860. The first Presbyterian meeting took place in 1865 in the English Reading Room in São Paulo, and led to the formation of the PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH IN BRAZIL. Their desire to emancipate themselves from North American patterns and financial dependency led some Presbyterian ministers to found a national branch of the church, the Independent Presbyterian Church of Brazil (Igreja Presbiteriana Independente), in 1903. Today it coexists with the Igreja Presbiteriana Conservadora, founded in 1940. Together, the three churches contain approximately 13.5 percent of all Brazilians who declare themselves members of what is usually termed a historic Protestant church (about 3,700,000 people).

In 1871 Baptist missionaries became active in the eastern part of the state of São Paulo. However, the first church was established only in 1892, in Salvador, Bahia. According to the national census of 1991, the BAPTISTS (divided into some fourteen denominations) make up the strongest group within the historic Protestant spectrum. It has about 1.5 million members, or approximately 41.5 percent of the combined membership of all the historic Protestant denominations in Brazil.

Statistically much less significant is the METHODIST CHURCH IN BRAZIL, whose first chapel was established in 1876, in Rio de Janeiro. In 1991 they numbered only 140,000 members, or about 3.7 percent of the membership of all the historic Protestant churches. Although exact figures do not exist, it is evident that, in terms of membership, the EPISCOPAL ANGLICAN CHURCH OF BRAZIL and the Congregational Christians are even less important. In the 1991 census both denominations were included in the category "other traditional Protestants," which altogether represent only 2.9 percent of all historic Protestants.

The category "Protestants" appeared in a national census for the first time in 1872. The corresponding value was only 1 percent. Fifty years later 2.6 percent of the population declared themselves Protestants. The censuses of 1950, 1960, and 1970 indicated a steady growth of approximately one percentage point per decade. During the 1970s the increase was 1.5 percent and in the 1980s it was 2.4 percent. Thus, the census in 1991 revealed the existence of 13,189,282 Protestants in Brazil, which corresponds to 8.98 percent of the total population. The results of the 1994 Datafolha study revealed that 13.3 percent of voting-eligible respondents were Protestant. This figure was confirmed by Brasmarkt, a private research firm, in 2000. The survey of 200,000 voting-eligible adults in 449 Brazilian cities found that 13.6 percent were Protestants.

The national census of 1980 was the first IBGE study that distinguished between historic and Pentecostal Protestants. Although at that time 51 percent of Protestants were of historic denominations, the situation had changed dramatically by 1991 in favor of the Pentecostals, who made up more than 60 percent of the total. According to Datafolha, in 1994 the Pentecostals were more than three times more numerous than historic Protestants among the approximately 21,000 voting-eligible adults sampled. Even in Rio Grande do Sul, characterized by a very high rate of membership in historic Protestant denominations, mainly the Lutheran Church, Pentecostals represent today about 70 percent of all Protestants.

The dynamics within the wider field of Brazilian Protestantism were already becoming visible during the 1980s, when Pentecostalism grew almost three times faster than the population, while historic Protestant denominations stagnated or even witnessed a decline relative to the growth of the total population. The study in the Rio de Janeiro metropolitan area conducted by ISER in the mid-1990s indicated that the Pentecostal denominations are especially successful among people who are underprivileged, both in terms of income and education.

The development of Pentecostalism in Brazil went through three different phases. It began with the arrival of European missionaries who, inspired by the first outbreak of Pentecostalism in the United States at the beginning of the century, had converted to this movement in Chicago. In 1910 the CHRISTIAN CONGREGATION OF BRAZIL (Congregação Cristã do Brasil) was founded as the first Pentecostal church on Brazilian soil, followed only one year later by the ASSEMBLIES OF GOD (Assembléia de Deus), established in Belém, the capital of the state of Pará. Since these two denominations generally reproduced North American patterns of Pentecostalism, Brazilian sociologists see them as paradigmatic for the first wave (1910–1950) of Pentecostalism, considered "classic." Emphasizing the gift of glossolalia and believing in the imminent return of Christ, both churches were initially characterized by a sectarian rejection of the outer world and a strong anti-Catholicism. Today, these groups have a less strained relationship with the rest of Brazilian society.

The case of the Assembléia de Deus, today split into two subdenominations, is particularly notable. This church is an integral part of Brazil's religiously tolerant society. However, what has remained is a conservative morality and relatively strict rules of social behavior, visible even in a particular type of hairstyle and apparel, which in common fashion catalogs sometimes appears under the category “gospel.” The last national census of 1991 revealed that together the two denominations possessed more than 4 million adherents and that each possessed more members than any of the historic Protestant churches. A total of 1,635,977 Brazilians declared themselves members of the Congregação Cristã. That number equals about 20 percent of all Brazilian Pentecostal Christians and approximately 12 percent of all Brazilian Protestants. The Assembléia de Deus, with about 2.5 million adherents, is not only the largest Pentecostal church by far (with 59 percent of the total Pentecostal population) but also the largest Protestant denomination (with about 18.5 percent of the total Protestant population).

The second wave of Pentecostalism (1950–1970) coincided with radical demographic and economic changes that transformed Brazil from a largely rural to an industrial and mass society. In this period Pentecostalism gained momentum, particularly in São Paulo. The churches began to use modern means of communication and started to organize mass events in theaters, cinemas, and even soccer stadiums. As for spiritual practice, the emphasis shifted from the gift of glossolalia to the gift of healing. The Brazilian Branch of the INTERNATIONAL CHURCH OF THE FOURSQUARE GOSPEL, founded in 1953 under the name Igreja do Evangelho Quadrangular (c. 300,000 members in 1991) represents a particularly notable example of Pentecostal churches imported from the United States. However, the majority of newly established denominations, such as Brazil for Christ (Brasil para Cristo) (1955), God Is Love (Deus é Amor) (1962) and Casa de Bênção (1964), are of Brazilian origin. With regard to these and other churches founded during the second phase of Pentecostalism, there exist official numbers only for Deus é Amor, which in 1991 had almost 170,000 members, or about 2 percent of all Brazilian Pentecostal Christians and 1.2 percent of all Protestants.

From the mid-1970s on, Brazil witnessed the third wave of Pentecostalism, frequently designated neo-pentecostalismo. In terms of doctrine, this wave has been characterized by an emphasis on the spiritual battle against the devil and based on the “Health and Wealth Gospel,” on the “birthright” of a “true” Christian to live his life here and now in happiness, material affluence, and perfect health. The geographical center of neo-Pentecostalism is Rio de Janeiro, and its most successful and polemical expression is undoubtedly the UNIVERSAL CHURCH OF THE KINGDOM OF GOD (Igreja Universal do Reino de Deus [IURD]). Founded in 1977 by Edir Macedo, the church expanded dramatically in the 1980s. At the beginning of the decade it had 21 temples in 5 states. By 1990 there were about 600 local churches all over the country. In the 1991 census it was ranked, due to its approximately 270,000 members, in fourth place among Pentecostal churches. However, this figure does not accurately reflect the influence of the IURD on politics and public opinion, which is impressive. In 1989

Edir Macedo acquired TV-Record, Brazil’s third largest national television network.

Syrians and Lebanese who began to immigrate at the end of the nineteenth century brought Orthodox Christianity to Brazil. Later, especially after World War I, they were joined by other nationalities, such as Russians, Ukrainians, Armenians, Greeks, and Romanians. In 1897, the first official Orthodox service was held in a rented hall in São Paulo. In the same year, members of the São Paulo community realized the first Orthodox procession ever on Latin American soil. The first official Orthodox church was established in 1904, also in São Paulo. In 1915, the second church was founded in São Nicolao, state of Rio de Janeiro. Ten years later the third church was founded in São Jorge, state of São Paulo. Between 1933 and the mid-1980s, sixteen more Orthodox churches were founded in different parts of the country, including the Orthodox cathedral in São Paulo, in 1958. The total number of Orthodox Christians in Brazil is rather low. In 1991 there were at most 35,396, or only 0.02 percent of the Brazilian population. In terms of membership, the Orthodox Church has its strongholds in the states of São Paulo, Minas Gerais, Goiás, and Paraná.

As for other Christian minorities, at least three should be mentioned here because of their statistical relevance. The CHURCH OF JESUS CHRIST OF LATTER-DAY SAINTS, whose first missionary activities go back to the year 1928 and who established their first church in Brazil in 1935, experienced especially strong membership growth in the 1980s. However, the official figures and those released by the church itself are highly contradictory. Although the 1991 census counted 93,190 members, the church claimed to have 600,000 adherents.

The SEVENTH-DAY ADVENTIST CHURCH began its mission work in 1879 in Santa Catarina and established their first church in 1896 in the same state, in the city of Gaspar Alto. In 2000 it was estimated that there were 958,000 Adventists in Brazil, organized in 3,696 parishes. However the 1991 Census indicated only 706,409 members.

North American mariners who testified their faith in the harbor district of Rio de Janeiro in 1923 became the first known JEHOVAH’S WITNESSES in Brazil. Today the denomination is represented all over the country and has its headquarters in Cesário Lange, state of São Paulo. In 1991 the IBGE counted 725,576 Brazilian Jehovah’s Witnesses. Since the denomination is considered one of the fastest growing religious organizations, the number should be considerably higher today.

Due to various common characteristics, particularly the significance of human mediators between the worldly and spiritual spheres, Brazilian scholars subsume SPIRITISM (in the tradition of Allan Kardecistic), CANDOMBLÉ, and UMBANDA in the category of mediumistic religions. In 1991, 1,644,354 Brazilians, or 1.12 percent of the population, declared themselves Kardecists, while the Datafolha study of 1994 identified 3 percent of the adults entitled to vote as adherents of Kardecistic Spiritism. As for the other two religions, the 1991 census, which treated Candomblé and Umbanda as a statistical unit, counted 648,463 members (0.44 percent of the total population). According to the 1994 Datafolha study, about 1 percent of Brazil's adult population was associated with Candomblé and 1 percent with Umbanda. In striking contrast, the Federação Nacional de Tradição e Cultura Afro-Brasileira estimates that 70 million Brazilians are participants of either Candomblé or Umbanda.

In 1812, an initial group of Spanish Jews settled in the Amazon region. From 1850 onward, Jews of different origin immigrated, and at the beginning of the twentieth century Jews from Eastern Europe arrived in considerable numbers. After 1933, the immigration of German Jews escaping from the Nazis increased. The first synagogue was established in 1910, in Rio de Janeiro. According to the last national census, in 1991 there were 86,421 Jews living in Brazil. The Federação Israelita do Estado de São Paulo estimates that in 2001 there were about 120,000 Jews in Brazil. The highest numbers are found in the states São Paulo, Rio de Janeiro, and Rio Grande do Sul.

During the eighteenth and the nineteenth centuries an Islamic minority arrived along with other African slaves brought to Bahia. Their beliefs were interspersed with elements of African tribal religiosity, and after the slave trade came to an end, they did not survive as a religious group. In 1880 Arabic immigration began. Even today most Brazilian Muslims are of Syrian, Lebanese, or Palestinian origin. The first mosque was inaugurated in 1929 in São Paulo. Today there are about fifty mosques in Brazil. The figures produced by the IBGE are extremely unsatisfactory and do not even remotely correspond to the numbers estimated by Brazilian scholars. The national census from 1940 to 1991 subsumed Islam in the category "other Oriental religions," and in 1991 the IBGE identified 50,829 persons within this general rubric, without any further differentiation. However, other serious sources assume a total number of about 500,000 Brazilian Muslims, including approximately 200 non-Arabic descendents who, from the 1970s onward, have converted from Catholicism. Since the state of Paraná was once the preferred destination of Arabic immigrants, the border area next to Paraguay has today the highest concentration of Muslims in Brazil.

The first Bahá'í group was founded in 1940 in Salvador, Bahia, by a North American adherent. In 1955, twenty Persian families came to Brazil in order to establish themselves in different cities and to work as missionaries among the local people. Their activities led to the establishment of various Bahá'í Centers, the first of which was inaugurated in 1957 in Curitiba. Four years later a national umbrella organization was founded. In 2000 the BAHÁ'Í FAITH community counted 50,766 members.

However, there are considerable regional differences. For example, the Bahá'í headquarters indicated that 13,407 members lived in the state of Bahia, but only 496 in the state of Rio de Janeiro.

About 1.26 million Brazilian inhabitants are of Japanese origin. According to data published by the Japanese embassy in 1985, 90 percent of them hold onto their traditional religions, mostly Shintoism and Buddhism. However, empirical research disproves this statement. No data whatsoever is available regarding Shintoism, except the information that there are about 150 Shinto-shrines in Brazil. With regard to Buddhism, a detailed analysis by the IBGE in 1991 indicated a total of 236,408 Buddhists. Only 89,971 were of Asian origin. Within this category, Japanese Buddhists were dominant. Although most Chinese temples and the one Korean Buddhist institution in existence appeared after 1980, several Japanese Buddhist temples were founded as early as the 1950s. The wave of Japanese temple foundations was stimulated by a fundamental change of mentality, stemming from Japan's defeat in World War II. Initially intending to stay only as long as necessary to acquire a considerable amount of wealth, the immigrants suffered a profound identity crisis, which in turn led to the decision to settle permanently in Brazil. Today, the Japanese Buddhist field contains temples and centers of almost every type, including various neo-Buddhist groups. All told, there are about 160 Buddhist institutions in Brazil. There are differences in terms of orientation, size, and level of organization, ranging from small circles, such as the Casa de Dharma in São Paulo (one of only three Theravada groups in Brazil), to highly frequented Amida temples, with dozens of affiliated centers all over the country, especially in those states in which the Japanese influence is strong.

Due to its frequent appearances in the media, TIBETAN BUDDHISM is often considered the fastest growing branch of Buddhism. However, in terms of individuals affiliated with a local group, the total of 3,000 is not very significant. This is especially true when one compares this figure with that of the Brazilian branch of Sōka Gakkai. When the movement was formally established in 1960, the association had less than 150 members, all of Japanese origin. In the last few decades, the Associação Brazil Sōka Gakkai International has evolved into a Buddhist group with centers in almost every region of Brazil. According to official information from SOKA GAKKAI INTERNATIONAL, there are currently 140,000 Brazilian adherents.

A similar relation between Japanese and non-Japanese members can be found in some new religions of Japanese origin, particularly in the cases of PERFECT LIBERTY KYODAN, SEICHI-NO-IE, and SEKAI KYUSEI KYO (Igreja Messiânica, or Messianic Church).

Perfect Liberty was introduced to Brazil by Japanese immigrants at the end of the 1950s. Just one decade later, more than half of its members were Brazilians of non-Japanese origin. In the 1990s only 5 percent of the estimated 360,000 members were born in a Japanese family. Seichō-No-Ie became active in Brazil in 1932, and at the time was exclusively supported by Japanese immigrants. In 1999, there were 2,000 Seichō-no-Ie centers nationwide with a total staff of 5,000, 70 percent of whom were Brazilians of non-Japanese origin. The national headquarters indicates that Seichō-no-Ie in Brazil currently has about 1 million practitioners. This figure is obviously an overestimate, but serious independently investigated numbers do not exist. Nonetheless, Brazilian scholars assume that only 20 percent of the Seichō-no-Ie adherents are of Japanese origin. Japanese immigrants established the Brazilian branch of the Messianic Church in 1955, in Rio de Janeiro. In 2000 there were 659 local centers. The Messianic Church is the only Japanese New Religion that appeared in the 1991 IBGE study, which counted 81,344 members. Ninety percent are Brazilians who are not descendents of Japanese immigrants.

The situation is different for SUKYO MAHIKARI and TENRIKYO. Mahakiri was introduced to Brazil in 1974, Tenrikyō was brought by immigrants in 1929. In both cases, the great majority of the members come from a family of Japanese immigrants. However, precise numbers are still unavailable.

The various groups of Hindu origin have as yet not been sufficiently investigated. Hence, while the Brazilian branch of the INTERNATIONAL SOCIETY FOR KRISHNA CONSCIOUSNESS (ISKCON) has been studied in detail, not much is known, for example, about the Ramakrishna Movement, BRAHMA KUMARIS, or ELAN VITAL (formerly the Divine Light Mission).

The first Brazilian disciples of Bhaktivedanta Prabhupada belonged to the counterculture, and they came in contact with the ISKCON in Europe or the United States. Only in the second half of the 1980s did the movement increase rapidly, as temples were opened in every large city. In the 1990s, the ISKCON witnessed a decline, but the remaining devotees laid the groundwork for a more stable and future-oriented movement. This is due to a well-planned and suitably organized farm project called Nova Gokula. In the 1980s as many as 800 ISKCON members were engaged in the farm. Today, the community is composed of about 200 individuals who have decided to stay there permanently. One indicator of the durability of the project is the fact that the Nova Gokula community runs a primary school authorized by the government.

The religious search within the counterculture also led to the spread of the three Brazilian Ayahuasca religions, SANTO DAIME, Barquinha, und União do Vegetal, which emerged in the decades after 1930 in the Amazon region. The core of these religions is an intoxicating tea extracted from two rainforest plants. The União do Vegetal, in particular, has various adherents among middle-class Brazilians, and it has about 7,000 groups, found in nearly every large city. It is currently the most significant Ayahuasca line.

In a highly dynamic religious country such as Brazil, it is difficult to find reliable data on the sociologically diffuse phenomenon often described using terms like New Age and discussed elsewhere in this encyclopedia as WESTERN ESOTERIC TRADITION. As in other countries, in Brazil this complex is subject to constant changes, and in many cases it manifests itself only sporadically, for example when “esoteric fairs” are held in São Paulo or Rio de Janeiro. Thus, often, only indirect indicators can verify the existence of a New Age boom. In this context, scholars refer to the dramatic increase in the production of esoteric literature since the mid-1980s and the fact that a considerable proportion of calls to “0900” numbers are associated with New-Age issues. However, the New Age movement’s appeal to Brazilians has taken a concrete, institutional form for the first time in the area of Planaltina, about 60 kilometers away from the federal capital, Brasília. In this region, there exists a gigantic subterranean crystal, and local inhabitants believe that this rock transforms cosmic rays into life-supporting energy and makes the area the world of New Age culture. This explains why, since the mid-1970s, more than 500 religious groups have established their centers there.

Frank Usarski

Sources:

- Berryman, Phillip. Religion in the Megacity: Catholic and Protestant Portraits from Latin America. Maryknoll, NY: Orbis Books, 1996.
- Brown, Diana DeGroat. Umbanda: Religion and Politics in Urban Brazil. New York: Columbia University Press, 1994.
- Clarke, Peter B. “Japanese ‘Old,’ ‘New,’ and ‘New, New’ Religious Movements in Brazil.” In Japanese New Religions in the West, edited by Peter B. Clarke and Jeffrey Somers. Kent, UK: Japan Library, 1994.
- Lehmann, David. Struggle for the Spirit: Religious Transformation and Popular Culture in Brazil and Latin America. Cambridge, MA: Blackwell Publishers, 1996.
- Smith, Christian, and Joshua Prokopy, eds. Latin American Religion in Motion. New York: Routledge, 1999.

Brethren

The term Brethren has been applied to several distinct Christian FREE CHURCHES that emerged in Europe at various times, groups that protested against the state church system and were motivated by a desire to return to the organization and practice of the early church as they saw it portrayed in the Bible.

In the 1520s in Switzerland, some of those who participated in the Reformation of the Roman Catholic Church wished to break both with Rome and with the state and form a simple church of believers only. Conrad Grebal (1498–1526) initiated the movement that was later known as the Swiss Brethren by performing the first baptisms in 1525. The movement was persecuted in Switzerland, and it spread as believers scattered to escape the legal authorities. It finally found a place of relative safety in the Netherlands, and there it was eventually transformed into the Mennonite movement, after the Dutch leader, Menno Simons (1469–1561). Periodically, a new Mennonite group would take a name reminiscent of their Swiss Brethren origins, the most significant one being the BRETHREN IN CHRIST.

At the beginning of the eighteenth century a similar Free Church impulse grew up in the Palatinate (western Germany) when a group decided to separate from the state church. They found the church spiritually dry and wished to found a group that emphasized personal piety over doctrinal conformity. In 1708, under the leadership of Alexander Mack, eight people covenanted together and formed a “church of Christian believers.” As part of their new beginning, they were rebaptized. They found their homeland as unwilling to accept them and their new church as had the Swiss Brethren, and many moved to America, where they were informally known as the Brethren or the German Brethren and over the years organized as the CHURCH OF THE BRETHREN. Through the nineteenth and twentieth centuries, the church became the birthing ground of a spectrum of new denominational bodies, some of whom argued for further change, but most of whom rejected such change as had occurred.

In the nineteenth century, a group emerged in the British Isles who wished to separate from the state church and to return to what it saw as the simple life of the biblical church, including the rejection of the various denominational labels (Baptist, Anglican, Methodist, etc.). Rejecting any name, they were commonly referred to as the brethren. The first congregation was at Plymouth, England, and outsiders commonly called the group the Plymouth Brethren. As the group grew and splintered, a variety of designations were used to distinguish the different factions; among the more interesting was a numbering system adopted by the United States census early in the twentieth century. During the late twentieth century most of the factions have yielded to society’s need for labels and adopted (at least informally) a designation, the largest group now being known as the CHRISTIAN BRETHREN.

Although the informal designation of any Christian group as the brethren is widespread, where it is used in a formal sense, the group almost always fits into one of the three traditions mentioned above.

Sources:

- Durnbaugh, Donald F., ed. The Brethren Encyclopedia. Philadelphia, PA: Brethren Encyclopedia, 1983.
 Wilson, Bryan R. The Brethren: A Current Sociological Appraisal. Oxford: All Souls College, 1981.

Brethren in Christ

The Brethren in Christ is a small American denomination in the Mennonite tradition. Many of the original members had been influenced by the Dunkers (now the CHURCH OF THE BRETHREN) and had come to accept their practice of baptism by triune, or triple, immersion. Peter Witmer and Jacob Engel were among the first of the small group, which met in Engel’s home in Lancaster County, Pennsylvania, to act upon their new insight. When the group organized formally in the 1770s, the members designated Engel as their first bishop.

The River Brethren, as they were originally known, drew most of their doctrine from the Anabaptist tradition, but a century later the members were dramatically influenced by the Methodist HOLINESS MOVEMENT and came to believe in its teaching on sanctification. Holiness teachings emphasized the possibility that by an act of the Holy Spirit it was possible for a believer to become perfected in love in this life. Such an experience became the norm of Christian life within the Holiness churches. The adoption of Holiness teachings by the Brethren led to a number of members withdrawing and forming other new churches.

The church accepted its present name in 1865. It finally incorporated in 1904. Through the twentieth century members began to move to different parts of the United States and Canada, and during the last half of the century its membership in North America tripled to its present level of 23,000. While having an evangelical thrust in North America, it also developed an extensive mission program, which now includes work in more than fifteen countries in Africa, Asia, and Latin America. A majority of the members (65,000) now reside outside of North America.

The Brethren in Christ church supports Messiah College in Grantham, Pennsylvania, and Niagara Christian College in Canada. It is a member of the CHRISTIAN HOLINESS PARTNERSHIP, the Mennonite Central Committee, and the National Association of Evangelicals, through which it relates to the WORLD EVANGELICAL ALLIANCE.

Address:

Brethren in Christ
 431 Grantham Rd. P.O. Box A
 Grantham, PA 17027–0901
<http://www.bic-church.org>

Sources:

- Wittlinger, Carlton O. Quest for Piety and Obedience. Nappanee, IN: Evangel Press, 1978.

British Forest Sangha

The origins of the British Forest Sangha began in 1977 when Ajahn Chah (1917–1992), founder of a famous hermitage monastery in the tradition of THERAVADA BUDDHISM, Wat

Pah Pong in Northeast Thailand, arrived in Britain. He was accompanied by a small group of Western disciples who had been ordained as monks in Thailand. The visit was arranged by the English Sangha Trust (EST), formed in 1956 with the express intention of establishing an indigenous Theravada Buddhist monastic order in Britain. In the intervening years lay members of EST sponsored a series of lone Western monks as incumbents of a vihara (Pali: monk's dwelling) at premises in Hampstead, London. Each encountered problems in maintaining monastic rules. Most were junior, in terms of the length of time that they had spent as monks in Asia. In Britain they had no teachers to guide them. In addition, individual monks could not perform the important corporate rituals, which require a quorum of four.

Ajahn Chah returned to Thailand leaving his disciples at the Hampstead vihara. The most senior was the American monk, Ajahn Sumedho (b. 1934), who had acted as abbot of Wat Nanachat, a branch monastery that Ajahn Chah had established to accommodate his Western disciples. Ajahn Sumedho and his monks gained a reputation as effective meditation teachers, a reputation that, together with their strict interpretation of the monastic rules (in Pali, vinaya) attracted a growing number of British lay supporters. British lay supporters are attracted to Buddhism by a strong desire for self-cultivation that leads them toward the practice of meditation. Many small meditation groups scattered across Britain became affiliated to the Forest Sangha monasteries.

In the summer of 1979, the EST exchanged the Hampstead premises for larger quarters in Chithurst, Sussex. Adjoining woodlands were donated to the trust, and the monks began referring to themselves at the British Forest Sangha. A key event took place at Chithurst in 1981 with the first ordination ceremony, held in front of a crowd of a hundred lay people. Since then ordination ceremonies have been conducted regularly. Branch monasteries were founded in Devon and Northumberland. In 1984 the EST purchased extensive premises in Hertfordshire to found Amaravati Buddhist Centre, a monastery designed to receive large numbers of lay visitors. Currently, about forty affiliated meditation groups exist throughout Britain, and some 1,500 recipients receive the Forest Sangha Newsletter.

The success of the British Forest Sangha was facilitated by innovations, introduced in consultation with Theravadin ecclesiastical authorities in Thailand. Among the most notable of these are the founding of a nuns' order and the institution of a new kind of postulancy in the form of the anagarika (homeless). A nun is known as a siladhara (upholder of virtue). The nuns follow rules elaborated from the Ten Precepts of the traditional samanera (novice) ordination. An anagarika is permitted to handle money and to cook food, activities forbidden to monks. The introduction of the anagarika meant that lay people did not have to be consistently available to assist with the upholding of monastic rules, as they had during EST's earlier attempts to support monks. These adaptations have been important to the successful establishment of branch monasteries in Italy, Switzerland, North America (California), Australia, and New Zealand.

Address:

Great Gaddesden
Hemel Hempstead HP1 3BZ
Hertfordshire
United Kingdom

Sandra Bell

Sources:

- Ajahn Chah, Disciples of. Seeing the Way: Buddhist Reflections on the Spiritual Life. Hertfordshire, UK: Amaravati Publications, 1989.
- Batchelor, Stephen. The Awakening of the West: The Encounter of Buddhism and Western Culture. Berkeley, CA: Parallax Press, 1994.
- Bell, Sandra. "Being Creative with Tradition: Rooting Theravada Buddhism in Britain." The Journal of Global Buddhism 1 (2000): 1–30. On-line journal posted at <http://jgb.la.psu.edu/1/bell00.html>.
- . "British Theravada Buddhism: Otherworldly Theories, and the Theory of Exchange." Journal of Contemporary Religion, 13, 2 (1998): 149–170.

British Indian Ocean Territory

The British Indian Ocean Territory (BIOT) consists of a set of islands in the middle of the Indian Ocean that have been colonized by the United Kingdom for their strategic military value. The islands are uninhabited, and the only residents are the several thousand British and American Navy personnel, including workers from India, who are temporarily stationed there. They all reside on the single island of Diego García.

Diego García had been a French colony; it was turned over to the British following the defeat of Napoleon. Through the nineteenth century, a number of Madagascans and Africans came to the island, where they developed as a distinct group known as the Ilios. It was considered part of

Status of religions in the British Indian Ocean Territory, 2000–2050

Followers	2000			2025	2050
	total	%	rate
Christians	920	46.3	0.27	970	1,000
Roman Catholics	700	35.0	0.00	720	760
Anglicans	200	10.0	0.00	210	220
Hindus	760	38.3	-0.45	720	650
Muslims	180	8.8	-1.33	150	120
Nonreligious	140	6.8	3.05	160	200
Total population	2,000	100.0	0.00	2,000	2,000

Mauritius (which was in the process of becoming independent that was completed in 1968) until 1965, when it was separated as part of the new BIOT. At this time, the Ilios were removed to Mauritius, where, much to the scandal of both governments, they were abandoned by the authorities and largely forgotten. Two years later, the British leased the island to the Americans for a fifty-year period.

The religious among the British and Americans are primarily Christians, drawn from across the spectrum of Christian churches in their home countries. There are no clergy among those stationed on the island, however, Roman Catholic priests and Anglican ministers visit the island from Mauritius (where the ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH's Diocese of Port Louis is headquartered and the Diocese of Mauritius of the CHURCH OF THE PROVINCE OF THE INDIAN OCEAN are located).

It is also the case that military personnel are drawn from across the religious community in the United States and the United Kingdom, but there are no organized services for these other faiths. The religious among the Indian workers are primarily Hindu, Muslim, and Sikh, but none have developed any permanent religious facilities or organized regular events for worship.

Source:

Edis, Richard. Peak of Limuria: The Story of Diego Garcia. London: Bellew, 1993.

British Israelism

British Israelism, or Anglo-Israelism, refers to a strain of thought within millenarian Christian thought that identifies the British people and the related peoples of the Commonwealth nations and the United States as the true lineal descendents of the ancient Israelites. Although the notion that the English have been chosen by God for a special destiny dates back somewhat further, the first individual to articulate the British Israel ideology in a formal way was the Canadian Richard Brothers (1757–1824). Brothers remained an isolated figure with few followers, and it was not until the publication of Lectures on Our Israelitish Origin by Scotsman John Wilson (d. 1871) in 1840 that British Israelism as a religious movement can really be said to have begun.

In the years following the publication of Wilson's book, a number of organizations were formed to promote British Israel ideology and to foster communication among adherents. The movement never developed into a sect or denomination but remained a loose network of people with a common interest in, but often different interpretations of, the British Israel idea. At the peak of its popularity in England in the 1920s, British Israelism may have had as many as 5,000 adherents, in addition to smaller followings in the Commonwealth nations and the United States.

Although British Israel organizations never boasted many members, British Israel thinking had some influence upon William Miller (1782–1849), whose ideas gave rise to the Adventist tradition within Protestantism, and upon Charles F. Parham, founder of PENTECOSTALISM. Herbert W. Armstrong (1892–1986), founder of the WORLDWIDE CHURCH OF GOD, accepted British Israelism and introduced his 100,000 followers to the doctrine, but since Armstrong's death, the Worldwide Church of God has repudiated British Israelism. Although not all versions of British Israelism are explicitly racist and anti-Semitic, British Israelism has been a major source of inspiration for the Christian Identity Movement, which has developed it in a decidedly racist direction. Such small, but militantly rightist organizations in the United States as "The Order," "The Church, The Sword, and The Arm of the Lord," and "The Church of Jesus Christ, Christian, Aryan Nations" derive their religious and political stances from a radicalized version of British Israelism.

The core tenet of British Israelism is the belief that the Anglo-Saxon people can trace their lineage back to the ten lost tribes of Israel. The Jews themselves are the heirs of the Kingdom of Judah rather than the Kingdom of Israel and are therefore not the group referred to in the Biblical book of Revelation. To those who interpret Revelation as a blueprint for the millennium, this is significant because it means that prophecies concerning Israel refer to the British and related peoples. Christian Identity groups have taken the anti-Semitism implicit in this point of view to its extreme by positing that Jews are not only not really Israelites but are in fact the biological descendents of the Devil.

British Israelism has also sometimes been associated with Pyramidism, the belief that the Great Pyramid of Cheops was built for a divine purpose and that the proper interpretation of its measurements has much to reveal about the unfolding of sacred history.

Address:

British Israel Federation
8 Blades Ct. Deodar Rd.
London SW15 2NU
United Kingdom
<http://www.british-israel-world-fed.ca>

Arthur L. Greil

Sources:

- Allen, J. H. Judah's Sceptre and Joseph's Birthright. A. A. Beauchamp, 1930.
- Barkun, Michael. Religion and the Radical Right: The Origins of the Christian Identity Movement. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1997.
- Kaplan, Jeffrey. Radical Religion in America. Syracuse, NY: Syracuse University Press, 1997.

British Virgin Islands

When Christopher Columbus visited the Virgin Island in 1493, he found them inhabited by the Carib and Arawak peoples. Both were exterminated over the next two centuries. He also gave the islands their present name, a reference to the legendary St. Ursula and the eleven thousand virgins associated with her. The Spanish took control of the islands but created only one settlement for the purpose of mining copper. The Dutch took an interest in them, and in 1648 they established a settlement on Tortola Island.

Finally in 1672 the British began to push the Dutch out, a feat finally accomplished in 1680. The British introduced sugar cane and its seemingly necessary component, slavery. They began the introduction of African workers, who today constitute the largest segment of the population. Slavery was abolished in the 1830s.

British rule continues. In 1872 the islands were incorporated into the Leeward Islands colony but separated in 1956. Since 1960, the British government has appointed a governor, but legislative matters have been placed in the hands of a locally elected legislature. The United Kingdom bears responsibility for defense, foreign affairs, and internal security.

British Methodists came to the islands in 1789 as part of METHODISM's initial missionary thrust into the Caribbean, prompted in part by the separation of the Methodists in the former American colonies. Openly allied to the African peoples, they grew to claim the great majority of the population (at one point more than 70 percent), though their percentage dropped as the island secularized in the later twentieth century. Today the Methodist work has been incorporated into the larger METHODIST CHURCH IN THE CARIBBEAN AND THE AMERICAS.

The CHURCH OF ENGLAND was established in 1700, many decades before the Methodists, but largely identified with the ruling white elite. Their membership was concentrated on Virgin Gorda Island. In 1916, administration of the Anglican work was turned over to the EPISCOPAL CHURCH based in the United States, which had developed work in the American Virgin Islands (purchased from the Dutch in 1917). In 1947 a diocese serving both the British and American territory was created. That diocese is today apart of Province II in the Episcopal Church, which includes New York, New Jersey, Haiti, and the congregations in Europe.

Only a few additional churches have entered the British Virgin Islands, its small population of twelve thousand offering little prospect for growth. The ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH established a parish in 1960 that is currently attached to the Diocese of St. John's (Antigua). There are also a few members of the JEHOVAH'S WITNESSES, the CHURCH OF GOD (CLEVELAND, TENNESSEE) the CHURCH OF THE NAZARENE and the SEVENTH-DAY ADVENTIST CHURCH. A small group of BAPTISTS are divided between the SOUTHERN BAPTIST CONVENTION and the Baptist Missionary Association of America.

Immigrants from India and Pakistan have introduced Hinduism and Islam into the islands, and there is a small community of the BAHÁ'Í FAITH.

Sources:

Blackman, F. W. Methodism: Two Hundred Years in the British Virgin Islands. Bridgetown, Barbados: Methodist Church of the British Virgin Islands, 1989.
 Mason, D. G. The Church in the Process of Development in the British Virgin Islands. S.T.M. thesis, Drew University, 1974.

Brotherhood of the Cross and Star

Apart from some outward similarities, such as members wearing white soutanes (robes), the Brotherhood of the Cross and Star (BCS) in southeastern Nigeria is not one of the ALADURA CHURCHES, but a messianic and deliberately syncretistic movement that claims not to be a church, although it does claim to be Christian. The organization was founded in 1956 in Calabar by Olumba Olumba Obu (b. 1918), a healer and miracle worker known as O.O.O. (members paint these letters on homes and cars for protection) and as Leader Obu, "Sole Spiritual Head" of this movement.

Unlike most founders of African new religious movements, Obu did not belong to a church, did not receive a divine call, and did not undergo a period of seclusion and training. He is believed to have become aware of his divine mission and to have performed miracles at the age of five, and to know the Bible because he is its author. Nevertheless, Obu teaches that all of the Bible, except the Book of Revelation, is a closed and useless book, and he teaches a pantheistic idea of God, the fallibility of Jesus, and reincarnation. He lives simply in Calabar, which he has not left since 1954; he preaches always in his native Efik; and he rejects Western clothing, watches, and footwear.

Obu stands at the center of this movement. His followers believe him to be the Messiah and the eighth and final incarnation of God—the seventh incarnation being Jesus. Although he at first denied his deity, Obu began to proclaim it

Followers	2000			2025	2050
	total	%	rate
Christians	18,500	86.4	2.70	31,100	38,100
Protestants	9,800	45.8	1.99	16,100	17,900
Anglicans	2,800	13.1	1.99	3,600	4,000
Independents	1,000	4.7	3.93	2,500	3,500
Spiritists	1,800	8.4	2.89	3,200	4,200
Nonreligious	810	3.8	5.67	1,800	2,700
Baha'is	190	0.9	2.50	400	520
Muslims	60	0.3	1.67	80	120
Hindus	50	0.2	1.46	90	140
Total population	21,400	100.0	2.83	36,700	45,800

publicly in 1977, and the BCS hymnbook abounds with references to him as divine. Apart from its central emphasis on the person of Leader Obu, the movement emphasizes spiritual and material prosperity, healing, and deliverance from witchcraft; it has aroused opposition from most other Nigerian churches. BCS practices baptism by immersion, foot washing before a Sunday congregational feast, the use of holy oil and holy water, and healing in the “powerful name” of Obu. Obu rejects some traditional beliefs, such as the existence and powers of witchcraft, and condemns cultural societies and traditional diviners, as well as polygyny. He has also proclaimed an apocalyptic fulfillment, to occur in 2001.

The BCS may have had over a million members worldwide in 2000 (BCS sources put this figure much higher), and it has expanded in West Africa, Europe, Asia, and North America. It has more recently developed links with other religious bodies, including several groups led by Hindu teachers, Rosicrucianism, and the UNIFICATION MOVEMENT. Olumba Olumba Obu and various leaders in the Brotherhood have published numerous small publications through Brotherhood Press over the years.

Address:

Brotherhood of the Cross and Star
34 Ambo St.
P.O. Box 49
Calabar
Nigeria

Allan H. Anderson

Sources:

- Amadi, Gabriel I. S. “Power and Purity: A Comparative Study of Two Prophetic Churches in Southeastern Nigeria.” Ph.D. dissertation, University of Manchester, 1982.
- Hackett, Rosalind I. J. Religion in Calabar. Berlin: Mouton de Gruyter, 1989.
- The Handbook of the Brotherhood of the Cross and Star*. Calabar, Nigeria: Brotherhood Press, n.d.
- Mbom, Friday M. Brotherhood of the Cross and Star: A New Religious Movement in Nigeria. Frankfurt am Main: Peter Lang, 1992.

The Bruderhof

In 1920 Eberhard Arnold (1883–1935) and his wife Emmy Arnold opened a Christian commune in a rented German farmhouse. A few years later, members of the group began reading Anabaptist history and became fascinated with the communal HUTTERITES, whose vision seemed much like their own. Later they learned that the Hutterites still existed, in North America, and in 1930 Arnold spent a year visiting Hutterite colonies.

The rise of the Nazis to power in 1933 led the Bruderhof members, as they now called themselves, to move to Liechtenstein, and then to England. With the outbreak of World War II, the community, now without Arnold, who had died following unsuccessful surgery, bought a 20,000-acre ranch in Paraguay on which they developed three separate hofs, or colonies, to house their growing population. In 1954 they emigrated yet again to Rifton, New York, in the United States. Thereafter they expanded rapidly, soon operating nine hofs in five countries.

Many of the new members of the Bruderhof had been participants in existing American intentional communities. One of them was the Macedonia Cooperative Community in Georgia, and when about half of Macedonia’s members joined the Bruderhof, they brought with them Community Playthings, a business that manufactured high-quality children’s toys. Community Playthings has been the most important Bruderhof industry ever since.

Internal and external turmoil has marked a good deal of the Bruderhof’s history. A conflict over the leadership claims of Eberhard Arnold’s son Heini led to mass resignations and expulsions between 1959 and 1961. In the late 1980s a large group of critical ex-members began to publish a newsletter and hold periodic reunions. Relations with the Hutterites have been uneven, with positive ties for a decade or two after Arnold’s initial contact with them, followed by antagonism, then renewed alliance, and another break in the 1990s.

International expansion of the Bruderhof after it had become well established in the United States met mixed results. In the 1980s the organization went back to its homeland, establishing Michaelshof, in Birnbach, Germany. It met with stiff resistance from its neighbors, and after several stormy years of conflicts over building plans and other matters the Bruderhof finally withdrew in the mid-1990s. Meanwhile, in 1991 the Bruderhof established a relationship with a Nigerian Christian community called Palmgrove and soon granted it membership in the Bruderhof movement. Cultural differences, however, proved problematic, and in 1994 the Bruderhof severed its relations with Palmgrove amid recriminations on both sides. On the other hand, projects in other countries were better received.

Overall, the Bruderhof has remained prosperous and has grown over the years. In 2000 it had some 3,000 members in nine hofs (six in the United States, two in England, one in Australia). Contact with the Bruderhof may be made through any of their communities, a list of which may be found on their Web site, though the Woodcrest Bruderhof in the United States has served informally as the group’s headquarters.

Address:

Woodcrest Bruderhof
Rifton, NY 12471
<http://www.bruderhof.org>

Timothy Miller

Sources:

Arnold, Emmy. Torches Together: The Beginning and Early Years of the Bruderhof Communities. Rifton, NY: Plough, 1964.

Eberhard, Arnold. Why We Live in Community. Farmington, PA: Plough, 1995.

Zablocki, Benjamin. The Joyful Community. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1971.

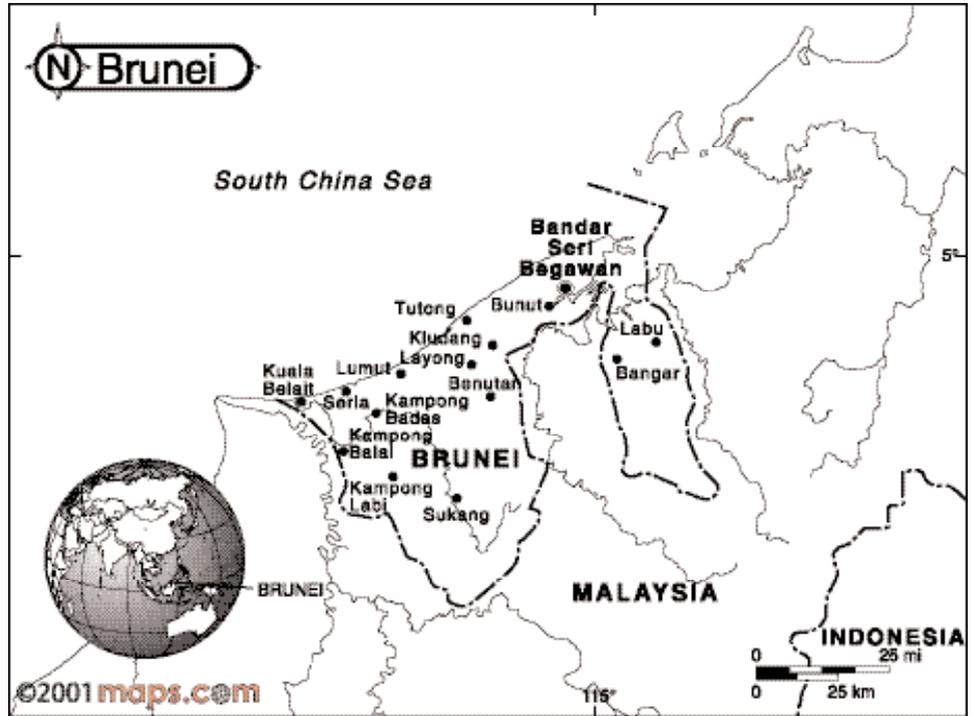

Brunei

The Sultanate of Brunei Darussalam, located on the island of Borneo, is the smallest country in Southeast Asia, in terms of population. It is the remnant of a fifteenth-century sultanate, which lost control over Borneo during the colonial period that began in the seventeenth century. The British created a protectorate over Brunei in 1888, that lasted until 1984, when Brunei became an independent country.

Brunei is home to approximately 323,600 citizens. Of this number 67.2 percent are ethnic Malays, the absolute majority of which are Muslims. Other ethnic Malay groups, which include the Kadayans, Dusuns, Muruts, Bisayas, Belaits, and Tutongs, account for six percent of the population. A majority of this group practice traditional premodern religions, although a marginal number among them have converted to Christianity and Islam. Among the immigrant population, ethnic Chinese (who have arrived in the area through the twentieth century from China, Hong Kong, and Taiwan) now account for 15 percent of the population. Members of this group practice a spectrum of religions traditionally associated with China (BUDDHISM, DAOISM, Confucianism). Some are also Christians, while a handful among them have converted to Islam. Freethinkers, Hindus, and others of unstated faiths account for the remaining 11.8 percent of the total population.

The most recent census of Brunei in 1991 indicated that 67 percent of the population identified themselves as Muslims, 13 percent as Buddhists, 10 percent as Christians, and the remaining 10 percent "other," which includes freethinkers, Hindus, Sikhs, members of the BAHAI FAITH, undeclared, and so on.

Although Islam is the official religion of the country, and the state funds many Muslim religious organizations through the Ministry of Religious Affairs, religious minorities have the right to observe their religious values and tra-

Status of religions in Brunei, 2000-2050

Followers	2000			2025	2050
	total	%	rate
Muslims	211,000	64.4	2.64	306,000	346,000
Ethnoreligionists	36,600	11.2	2.46	50,000	55,000
Buddhists	29,800	9.1	1.87	38,000	43,000
Christians	25,200	7.7	1.81	33,500	44,000
Independents	8,300	2.5	2.63	11,500	17,000
Protestants	6,000	1.8	2.26	9,000	12,000
Roman Catholics	5,600	1.7	1.14	7,000	7,500
Chinese folk-religionists	11,600	3.5	1.66	11,500	12,500
Confucianists	5,800	1.8	2.57	8,000	11,000
Nonreligious	4,000	1.2	4.45	6,000	8,000
Hindus	2,800	0.8	3.25	4,500	6,000
Baha'is	980	0.3	2.72	1,500	2,500
Neoreligionists	70	0.0	2.12	100	150
Total population	328,000	100.0	2.47	459,000	528,000

ditions. According to the Constitution of the State of Brunei (1959), "the religion of the State shall be the Muslim religion, provided that all other religions may be practiced in peace and harmony by the persons professing them in any part of the State."

Religious and educational institutions for both Muslims and non-Muslims are scattered around the country. There are 102 mosques and Muslim prayer halls, and 7 churches (two in Bandar Seri Begawan [BSB], 3 in Seria and 2 in Kuala Belait), the majority being of the Catholic denomination. In addition to the above, there are 3 Chinese temples (the Kuan Yin or the Goddess of Mercy temple in BSB, the Ching Nam in Muara and the Fook Tong Keng temple in Tutong) and two small Indian temples located in BSB and Seria. Although the small Sikh community in Brunei (approximately 500 people) has no official religious institutions, weekly services are held in member's homes.

Of the religious educational institutions, 115 are Islamic religious schools, which operate in conjunction with the government schools. In addition, a number of Christian-based schools established during the colonial period are still in operation today. Such schools include St. George's and St. Andrew's in BSB, St. Michel's and St. Angela's in Seria. There are 8 Chinese schools in Brunei managed by the Chinese community in the country, including the well-known Chung Hwa Middle School in the capital.

Dr. Niew Shong Tong, a senior lecturer at Universiti Brunei Darussalam (UBD), has discovered more than forty socioreligious and cultural Chinese associations established in Brunei. These include dialect-locality groups, trade-occupational, cultural-recreational, mutual help-benevolent, religious, and community-wide associations.

The primary Christian association operating in Brunei is the Borneo Evangelical Society, which is essentially an umbrella organization operating on behalf of Christians on the Island of Borneo (i.e., including the East Malaysian states of Sabah and Sarawak).

There are two Indian-related organizations/associations in Brunei. The oldest is the fifty-year-old Hindu Welfare Board in Brunei, which functions as a Hindu religious organization and has approximately 3,000 members, both foreigners and locals. The second major Indian organization is the forty-three-year-old Indian Association, which is considered as a social organization for the Indian community and has 300 registered members.

Brunei annually celebrates a number of religious holidays, including Eid al-fitrī (festival that marks the end of Ramadan), Eid al-Adha (The Festival of Sacrifice), the Prophet's birthday, the First of Muharram, Nuzul al Qur'an (descension of the Qur'an), the First of Ramadan, and Isra (the night journey) and Miraj (ascension) for Muslims. The Christian New Year and Christmas are also officially recognized holidays, as is the Chinese New Year. Although they are not recognized as national holidays, the Hindu community in Brunei celebrates both Thaipusam (a celebration of exotic rituals) and Deepavali (festival of lights). On a regional and local level, Hari Gawai, an annual festival commemorating the rice harvest, is celebrated by the Iban tribe.

Ahmad F. Yousif

Sources:

Brunei Darussalam Statistical Yearbook. Brunei: Statistic Division, Ministry of Finance, 1998.

Carrie C. Brown. "Notes on the First Chinese Temple of Brunei Town." In From Buckfast to Borneo: Essays Presented to Father Robert Nicholl on the Eighty-Fifth Anniversary of His Birth, edited by Victor T. King and A. V. M. Horton. Hull, UK: University of Hull Press, 1995.

Niew Shong Tong. "Brunei." In The Encyclopedia of the Chinese Overseas, edited by Lynn Pan. Singapore: Archipelago Press, 1998.

———. "Chinese Society in Brunei: A Survey." In Southeast Asian Chinese: The Socio-Cultural Dimension, edited by Leo Suryadinata. Singapore: Times Academic Press, 1995.

Tan Pek Leng. "A History of Chinese Settlement in Brunei." In Essays on Modern Brunei History, edited by Tan Pek Leng, et al. Brunei Darussalam: University Brunei Darussalam, Department of History, 1992.

Brunei, Islam in

Historical documents dating back to 414 C.E. show that Brunei, an independent sultanate in Borneo, was originally a Hindu-Buddhist city-state. Historians have suggested different theories regarding the coming of Islam to Brunei. Some say that Islam came to Brunei from China during the tenth century, while others trace it to Arab traders who came to Southeast Asia during the fourteenth century from Yemen and possibly Hujurat, India. Still others argue that Islam first came to Brunei during the fourteenth century, with the conversion of Awang Alak Betatar and his brother, Bateh Berbai. Awang Alak Betatar, who changed his name to Muhammad Shah, subsequently became the first Muslim Sultan of Brunei.

Whatever the origins of Islam in the region, it is certain that from the fifteenth to the mid-sixteenth century, the Sultanate of Brunei became a dominant regional power, with sovereignty over the whole island of Borneo and the Philippines. During this period, there were a number of sultans who were particularly active in the promotion of Islam. For example, Sultan Sharif Ali (1425–1432), the third leader of Brunei (said to be a descendent of the Prophet's grandson, Hussein), established religious institutions such as mosques and schools, and implemented the Shari'ah (Islamic law code based on the Qur'an) in Brunei.

With the coming of the Spanish and the British to the region in the latter half of the sixteenth century, Brunei's power gradually eroded, until it became little more than a British protectorate in 1888. During the initial period of British penetration, two sultans, Saiful Rijal (1533–1581) and Hassan (1582–1598), played a significant role in promoting Islam, as well as protecting the people from Christianization.

As in the past, Islamic values and ethics continue to be incorporated and manifested within Brunei culture, society, and politics, in the modern period. No greater proof of the continuous link between religion and state, past and present, exists than the continuation of the MIB (Melayu Islam Beraja, or Malay Muslim Monarchy) concept, which has been in existence since Brunei first declared itself a Muslim Malay Sultanate six centuries ago. MIB is the cornerstone of the religio-political philosophy of Brunei, which stresses the importance of maintaining the Malay race, language, and culture, and the Muslim religion of the nation. The significance of this concept was reaffirmed during the reign of

An aerial view of the Sir Omar Ali Saifuddien Mosque in Brunei (TRIP)

Sultan Haji Omar Ali Saifuddien (1950–1967), when it became officially recognized in the 1959 Brunei Constitution.

Today Islam, primarily of the SHAFIITE SCHOOL OF ISLAM, is alive and thriving in Brunei. Birth, marriage, divorce, burial, and other social ceremonies in Brunei are generally done according to the Islamic law. According to the Department of Mosque Affairs, the number of mosques and prayer halls reached 102 in 1999. This number includes two major state mosques, Masjid Omar Ali Saifuddien (Kampong Sultan Lama, Bandar Seri Begawan, Brunei Darussalam) and Jame'Asr Hassanal Bolkiah (Kampong Kiarong, Bandar Seri Begawan, Brunei Darussalam), both of which are considered major tourist attractions for visitors to Brunei.

The majority of Islamic organizations or departments in Brunei are established and funded by the government. For example the Ministry of Religious Affairs (Kementrian Hal Ehwal Ugama, Jalan Mentri Besar, Barakas, BB3910, Bandar Seri Begawan, Brunei Darussalam), established in 1986, is comprised of five different departments, namely, Mosque, Hajj, Islamic Studies, Islamic Law, and Islamic Da'wah Center (propagation center). As far as nongovernmental Islamic religious organizations are concerned, they are few in number. These include the National Association of Qur'anic Reciters and Memorizers (IQRA'), which trains and assists members to properly read and memorize the Qur'an, the New (Muslim) Converts Association, and the Ikhwan al-Muslimeen, which is based in the district of Kuala Belait. Of these groups, only the first two can be genuinely classified as active.

A number of Islamic institutions of an economic nature have also been established in Brunei. These include Tabung Amanah Islam Brunei (TAIB) an Islamic trust fund founded in 1991, and Insurance Islam Taib and the Islamic Bank of Brunei (IBB), both of which were established in 1993.

Islam in Brunei is well represented in the local print and electronic media. For example, Radio-Television Brunei (RTB) devotes more than twenty hours a week to religious or religion-related television programming. Such programs include coverage of the weekly Friday khutbahs, or religious sermons, the annual Qur'an competition, Muslim festivals and celebrations, and the like. In addition to the above, the government also funds the religiously oriented Nurul-Islam (Light of Islam) radio station.

In addition to the above organizations and groups, Sufi groups, or tariqahs (mystical orders), such as the al-Ahmadiya and al-Naqshabandiyya, have also established themselves in the country. Some of these tariqahs trace their roots directly to the Middle East, while others entered Brunei via neighboring countries such as Indonesia and Malaysia. Many of these groups engage in Mawlut Dhikir, a socioreligious ceremony in which religious poems are read and chanted. In this century, the Ahmadiyya Muslim Movement has also established itself.

The twentieth century has witnessed the growth and development of Islamic religious education in Brunei. In 1956, 7 full-time Islamic schools were officially opened. By 1999, the number of religious schools had increased to 115. Islamic education is also promoted under schools and colleges affiliated with the Ministry of Religious Affairs, where traditional Islamic subjects are taught in both Malay and Arabic languages. Some of the more renowned religious institutes in the country are the Sultan Haji Hassanal Bolkiah Tahfiz al-Quran Institute in Bandar Seri Begawan (BSB), the Brunei College of Islamic Studies (Ma'had) in Tutong, and the Religious Teachers Training College (Maktab Perguruan Ugama) in BSB.

Religious (ugama) classes are also taught in the public schools. The majority of students study under the “old system” and accordingly have four hours a week of Islamic studies at the elementary level and three hours at the secondary level. Under the “new system,” which is presently in operation in fifteen schools in the country, the amount of Islamic instruction has been increased to eight hours per week for elementary students and six hours per week at the secondary level. In addition to the above, a Kefahaman Islam (Islamic understanding) course has recently been introduced for non-Muslim students on a trial basis in three schools, St. George, St. Andrew, and Chung Hwa, all of which are located in the Bruneian capital.

At the tertiary level, the University of Brunei Darussalam (UBD) has established the Sultan Haji Omar Ali Saifuddin Institute of Islamic Studies, which provides three different areas of specialization—Islamic Law (Shari'ah), Theology and Propagation (Usuluddin and Da'wah), and Arabic Language.

Ahmad F. Yousif

Sources:

- Ahmad, Mohamed Deli, ed. Brunei Darussalam in Brief. 7th ed. Brunei: Information Department, 1997.
- Brown, Donald E. Brunei: The Structure and History of Bornean Malay Sultanate. Brunei: Brunei Museum, 1970.
- Hughes-Hallett, H. R. “A Sketch of the History of Brunei.” In Papers Related to Brunei (with an introduction by Cheah Boon Kheng). Malaysia: Malaysia Branch of the Royal Asiatic Society, 1998.

Ibrahim, Yahya. “Islam in the History of Brunei: A Study of the History of the Administration of Islamic Law up to the Promulgation of the Constitution of 1959.” In Constructing the Past: National History and Historiography in Brunei, Indonesia, Thailand, Singapore, the Philippines, and Vietnam, edited by Putu Davies. Brunei: University Brunei Press, 1996, pp. 158–174.

Mansurnoor, Iik Arifin. “Islamic Education, State and Society in Brunei.” Paper presented at the International Seminar of Islamic Studies in the ASEAN: History, Approaches and Future Trends, Pattani, Thailand, 1998.

Osman, Mohd Taib. “The Malay Sultanate: Past and Present Functions, with Particular Reference to Negara Brunei Darussalam.” In Proceedings for the International Seminar on Brunei Malay Sultanate, vol. II. Brunei: University Brunei Press, 1994.

Tuah, Duraman. “The Development of Melayu Islam Beraja (MIB) in Upholding Negara Brunei Darussalam as an Independent and Sovereign Nation.” In Jurnal Institut Perkhidmatan Awam. (February 1999): 27–47.

Buddhasasananuggaha Association (Venerable Mahasi Sayadaw)

The Venerable U Sobhana Mahathera, more widely known as Mahasi Sayadaw (1904–1982), was born on July 29, 1904, in a Seikkhun village, near Shwebo, in northern Burma. After demonstrating extraordinary precociousness in the mastery of Pali Buddhist texts as a novice monk (samanera), he became an ordained bhikkhu (monk) in 1923. Although U Sobhana continued to excel in his scholastic achievement and the intellectual mastery of the texts of THERAVADA BUDDHISM, and remained steadfastly committed to this pursuit throughout his entire life, he was also determined to apply the practical aspects of those texts in the practice of meditation. He therefore set out to find an appropriate meditation teacher, a most difficult task due to the unfortunate fact that methodical meditation training had become nearly extinct in Theravada Buddhist countries by the early twentieth century. However, eight years after his ordination the opportunity arose for U Sobhana to enter what he later described as “a most intensive practical course of satipatthana (Foundations of Mindfulness) meditation under the personal guidance of the Most Venerable Mingun Jetavan Sayadaw of Thaton.” In 1938 he began his own career as a teacher of the intensive practice of satipatthana, directing his efforts largely toward lay people, who had essentially no means of learning rigorous meditation technique.

He began teaching meditation at a monastery in Seikkhun village known as Maha-Si Kyaung, due to a large (maha) drum (Burmese: si) located there. The many practitioners who learned meditation under him at this location thus came to call him Mahasi Sayadaw (“Sayadaw” being Burmese for Great Teacher). In 1944, in response to requests from students, Mahasi Sayadaw completed his great treatise, The Method of Vipassana Meditation. Some brief quotes from this work may suffice to demonstrate the essence of the meditation technique he taught:

Try to keep your mind (but not your eyes) on the abdomen. You will thereby come to know the movements of rising and falling of this organ. . . . Then make a mental note, rising for the upward movement, falling for the downward movement. . . . What you actually perceive is the bodily sensation of pressure caused by the heaving movement of the abdomen, . . . and do not think of rising and falling as words. Be aware only of the actual process of the rising and falling movement of the abdomen.

This method, adapted from Mingun Jetavan, was further developed by Mahasi Sayadaw to include making mental notes for all activities throughout the day. Thus, for example, while eating:

When you bring the food to the mouth, bringing
 When you bend the neck forward, bending
 When the food touches the mouth, touching.

In this way insight (vipassana) into the impermanent (anicca), unsatisfactory (dukkha) and unsubstantial (anatta) nature of all conditioned (i.e., nonnibbana) phenomena is developed.

Venerable Mahasi Sayadaw succumbed to a sudden heart attack on August 14, 1982. His life exemplified a rare combination of profound erudition in Pali Buddhist texts, deep meditation experience, and practical teaching ability.

In 1947, Sir U Thwin and others founded the Buddhasasananuggaha Association in Rangoon. Sir U Thwin served as its first president and donated a plot of land for the erection of a meditation center. He also proposed that Mahasi Sayadaw be invited to teach at the center. Subsequently, the Buddhasasananuggaha Association became the vehicle for the dissemination of the Mahasi Sayadaw Vipassana technique around the world.

The Buddhasasananuggaha Association is located in Yangon (Rangoon). Affiliated centers are found in forty-one countries in Asia, Europe, and the United States. Approximately one million people have received formal training in the Mahasi Sayadaw Vipassana technique at meditation centers around the world devoted to teaching this approach to meditative practice. Over the two decades since his death, as the Mahasi Sayadaw meditation technique has become increasingly influential in the Occident, there has been a concomitant propagation of some of the hermeneutical disputes that arose during his life within the Burmese Sangha concerning the precise textual/scriptural basis of his approach to Vipassana practice.

Address:

Buddhasasananuggaha Association
 No. 16, Sasana Yeiktha Rd.
 Bahan, Yangon 11201
 Myanmar
<http://web.ukonline.co.uk/buddhism//mahasi.htm#biography>

Jeffrey M. Schwartz

Sources:

- Mahasi Sayadaw. Practical Insight Meditation, Kandy, Sri Lanka: Buddhist Publication Society, 1971. (Excerpt from The Method of Vipassanā Meditation, 1944).
- . Insight through Mindfulness. Kandy, Sri Lanka: Buddhist Publication Society, 1990. Posted at <http://www.accesstoinsight.org/lib/bps/wheels/wheel370.html>. Accessed November 28, 2001.
- Nyanaponika Thera. The Heart of Buddhist Meditation. York Beach, ME: Samuel Weiser, 1973.
- U Sulananda Sayadaw. The Four Foundations of Mindfulness. Boston, MA: Wisdom Publications, 1990.

BUDDHISM

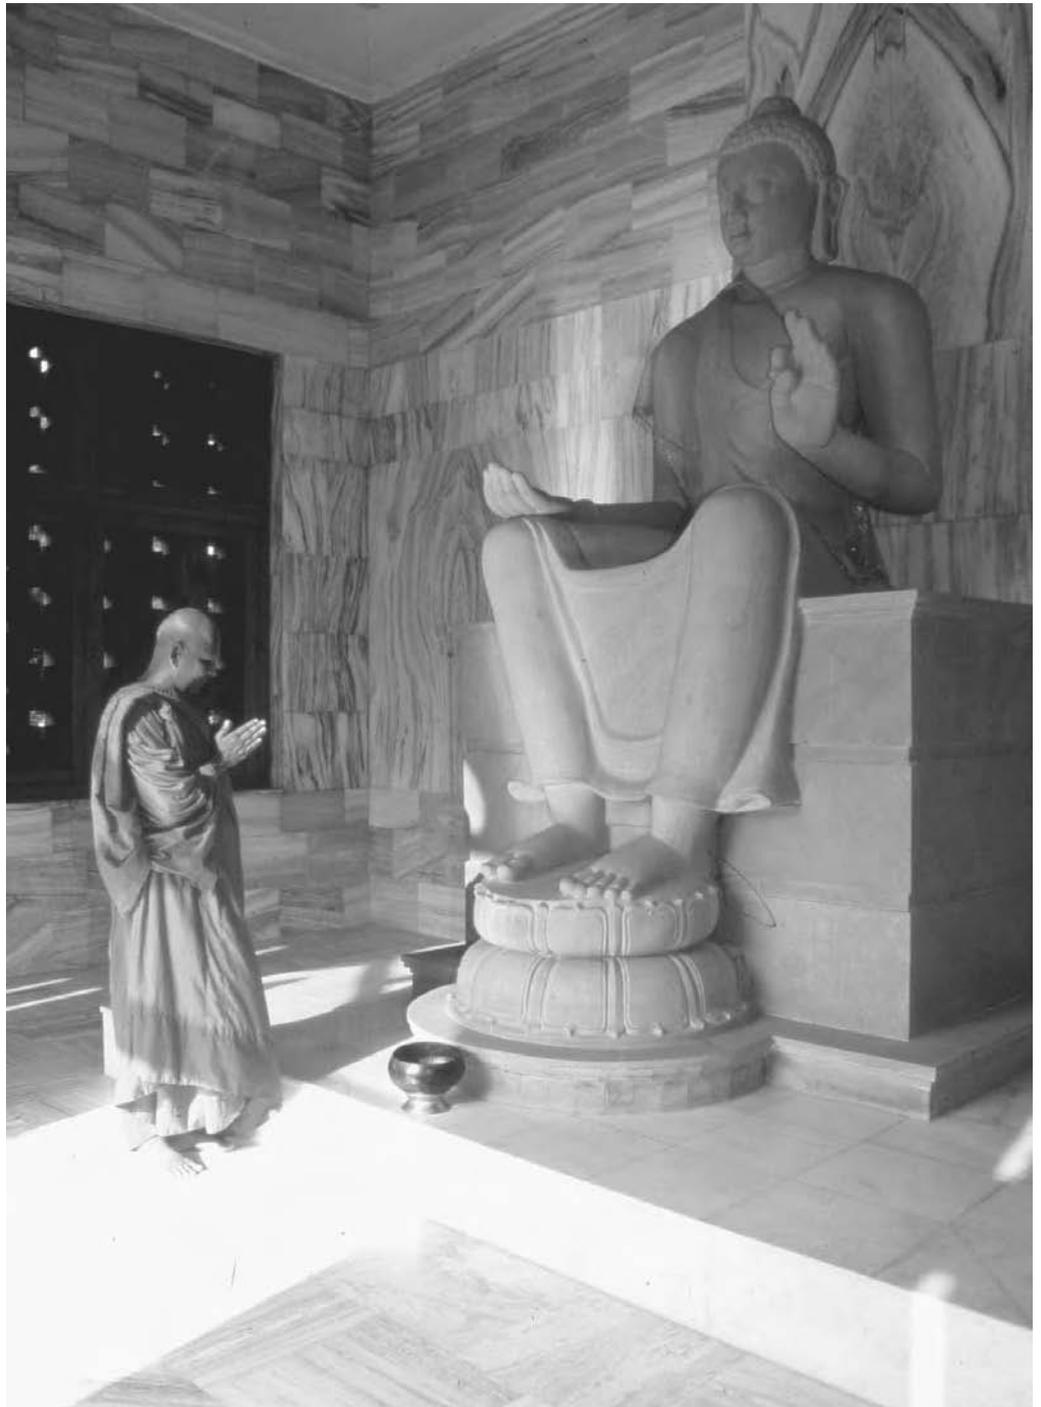

Today's approximately 400 million Buddhists can look back on two and a half thousand years of history with diverse developments and a wide spectrum of cultural expressions. Although the different traditions emphasize specific concepts, practices, and lifestyles, all Buddhists relate back to these three fundamental principles: the Buddha, the Teachings, and the Order. They call these principles the three "Jewels" or "Gems" of Buddhism.

It is generally assumed that Buddha Shakyamuni lived from 560 to 480 B.C.E. However, in the later twentieth century, Indological research questioned those dates and placed the lifetime of the Buddha at the turn of the fifth to the fourth century B.C.E. And though the debate has not yet come to an end, scholars provide good evidence to adopt as the lifetime of the historical Buddha the span between 448 and 368 B.C.E., with a margin of ten years. As a consequence of this recalculation, the Buddha's life, the order's development, and Buddhist history in general move much closer to the reign of King Ashoka (c. 268–239 B.C.E.), and thus to the earliest reliably datable accounts in Indian history.

The name "Buddha" is an honorific title meaning "the Awakened One." Born as Siddhartha Gautama in a royal family in a region of northern India (in Lumbini, now southern Nepal), Siddhartha spent his childhood and youth in luxury. He was married at sixteen and became the father of his son Rahula twelve years later. Upon leaving—and while away from—the protected world of the palaces, the "four sights" provoked a major change in the course of his life. The twenty-nine-year-old saw an aged man bent by the years, a sick man scorched by fever, a corpse followed by mourners weeping, and a mendicant ascetic. Becoming aware of the transitoriness of life, Siddhartha left the palace and became a wandering monk. In those days monks and ascetic orders commonly sought to find and teach final solutions to the human sufferings of old age, sickness, and death, and their perpetual recurrence. For six years Siddhartha engaged in strict practices of asceticism designed to deny the pleasures of the senses. When that severe self-denial failed to bring the solution desired, he withdrew to a balanced form of asceticism, called the Middle Path. This approach avoids the extremes of self-denial and self-indulgence. At the age of thirty-five, while meditating in a resolved manner under a tree known as the Bodhi Tree (ficus religiosa), Siddhartha attained enlightenment (Skr./Pali: bodhi). In Buddhist accounts, here at Bodhi Gaya he became "awakened" from the sleep of delusion—that is, from the ignorance that binds living beings to the suffering of this world.

From then on, the homeless ascetic was called "the Buddha," the Enlightened or Awakened one. Buddha spread his insight and the teaching of the Middle Path through conversation, parable, and speech. He preached for forty-five years in northern India, where he founded an order of monks and nuns. Laymen and laywomen supported the newly founded order by donating food and clothes and offering accommodations. For centuries the Teachings were transmitted orally, and it was no earlier than about three hundred years after the Buddha's death that they were written down in Pali, and later in Sanskrit. Buddha did not nominate a successor. It was rather his Teachings that succeeded him, after the "extinction" of his physical death.

Buddha adapted the Vedic and Brahmanic concepts of rebirth and dependent origination—that is, the principle of cause and effect. According to those theories, the next life is dependent on the meritorious and bad deeds (Skt.: karma) of the present life. In order to leave the endless cycle of rebirths (samsara), a practitioner would have to fully understand and follow the Buddhist teachings. Thus the aim of the teaching is to overcome the suffering or dissatisfaction (dukkha) that is caused by being imprisoned in the cycle of rebirths. The Four Noble Truths describe and analyze the existence of suffering and provide a way to extinguish it. According to Buddhist tradition, in his very first sermon at Deer Park in Sarnath (near Varanasi), the Buddha had preached these Truths, a sermon later known as the “first turning of the Wheel of Dharma.” The truth of Suffering points to the fundamental reality that nobody is able to escape birth, old age, illness, and death. The truth of the Origin of Suffering states that desire (tanha) and thirst after life are the causes of suffering. The truth of the Cessation of Suffering says that it is possible to put an end to suffering by overcoming desire and thirst. The fourth truth, the truth of the Path to the Cessation of Suffering, consists of eight parts. Called the Noble Eightfold Path, it is pictured as an eight-spoked wheel, an important Buddhist symbol. This Path consists of: (1) right view, (2) right intention, (3) right speech, (4) right conduct, (5) right livelihood, (6) right effort, (7) right mindfulness, and (8) right concentration. For convenience and clarity, the Path’s eight components are re-grouped into three categories: wisdom (1–2), ethics (3–5), and meditation (6–8).

A monk visits the Buddha at a monastery in Sarnath, Uttar Pradesh, India. (Resource Foto/TRIP)

Basic to the Four Noble Truths and Buddhist teaching is that every existence is unsatisfactory (duhkha). This is because nothing has an enduring substance or self (anatman), because of the fact that everything is subject to change and is transitory in the final end (anicca). These three “characteristics of existence” are to be found in everything that is born and comes into existence. Clinging to the idea of a lasting satisfaction or something that is enduring in perpetuity is both desire and a false view—that is, ignorance (avidya). The Noble Eightfold Path provides practical advice and exercises both to acquire an understanding of these principles and to embark on the liberating path to extinguish the “thirst” (trishna). This path is directed to reach the ultimate goal, nirvana (Skt.) or nibbana (Pali), the “blowing out” of the fire of desire and ignorance.

Strictly speaking, only the monks (bhiksu) and nuns (bhiksuni) constitute the members of the sangha, the Buddhist monastic order. They have undergone a formalized ordination and taken vows to live in celibacy and simplicity. Monks and nuns are responsible for preserving and passing on the teaching and providing the social context for its practice. The ordained are intended to serve as inspiring ideals to the laity and to teach them the dharma. The sangha is an autonomous body that is, ideally, self-regulating. There is no individual or collective body that can make decisions for the sangha as a whole. As a consequence, divisions according to different monastic rules (vinaya) and ordination lineages occurred, resulting in a variety of monastic traditions and schools (nikaya).

According to Mahayana Buddhist interpretation, however, not only the ordained but also male and female lay-supporters are a part of the sangha. All Buddhists, the ordained as well as the lay-people, take refuge in the “threefold refuge”: the Buddha, the Teachings (dharma), and the community (sangha). Tibetan Buddhists additionally take refuge in the teacher (Tib.: bla ma, pronounced lama). All Buddhists promise to refrain from killing, stealing, undue sexual contacts, lying, and taking intoxicants. The ordained pledge themselves to numerous further self-disciplines, the number of precepts varying according to the monastic tradition they belong to. In the southern tradition (Theravada), the monks have to observe 227 rules and the nuns 311.

The Primary Buddhist Traditions. During the tradition’s first two centuries of existence, a fair number of distinct branches or schools (nikaya) evolved. The various schools of so-called “early Buddhism”—Buddhist tradition speaks of eighteen and the texts state names for about thirty different schools—differed according to their interpretation of monastic rules and later of specific doctrines. All these schools may be summed up under the designation of Shravakayana, “the Vehicle of the listeners (of Buddha’s word).” Of these, the “school of the Elders,” the Sthaviravadin (Skt.) or THERAVADA BUDDHISM (Pali), is the only to have continued until today.

Around the beginning of the common era, the reformist movement of MAHAYANA BUDDHISM, the “Great Vehicle,” emerged within the Buddhist community in India. The followers of the Mahayana criticized the established schools to the effect that the ultimate goal of liberation was granted only to monks and nuns—that is, that the ordained ascetic, the self-sufficient arhat (Skt.: “worthy”) was exclusively held to have attained nirvana. Pejoratively they designated these schools as “Hinayana,” the Lesser Vehicle. In contrast, Mahayana Buddhists emphasized the ideal of the unselfish bodhisattva (Skt.: “a living being committed to awakening”). The bodhisattva, though capable of reaching enlightenment, has delayed entering nirvana. Motivated by compassion for the suffering beings, the bodhisattva remains in the world in order to help these beings attain enlightenment. Mahayana Buddhism also enhanced the status of lay-people, as it declared that not only an ordained but also a lay-person is able to become a bodhisattva. The new emphasis and interpretation praised itself as the “second turning of the Wheel.”

Responding to the new ideal and soteriological path, Shravakayana Buddhists laid emphasis on the view that it is only they who painstakingly had passed on the teaching of the Buddha. Advocates of the Shravakayana, and the surviving Theravada tradition, placed its legitimacy on the Pali-canon that was (and is) held to have preserved the “original” word of the Buddha. This canon was written down on palm-leaves and collected in three thematic “baskets” (Skt.: Tripitaka). First is the basket of the monastic rules (vinaya); the second basket contains discourses attributed to the Buddha and his immediate disciples (sutra); the third basket consists of treatises expounding Buddhist doctrine in abstract and theoretical terms (abhidharma). Within early Buddhism, there had existed other collections with different text groups. The Pali Tipitaka of the Theravada school is the only surviving closed canon, first committed to writing in the first century B.C.E. in Sri Lanka. The Mahayana Buddhism refers not only to the Pali scriptures but also to the sutras (teachings) written in Sanskrit and later translated into Chinese and Tibetan. This new genre of scriptures, among them the Prajnaparamita sutras, the Saddharmapundarika sutra, and the Lalitavistara were composed between the first and fifth centuries C.E. They hold that the sutras present the teachings of the Buddha in a more appropriate way than the former texts.

TIBETAN BUDDHISM looks upon the transplantation of tantric Mahayana Buddhism from northern India beginning in the seventh century onward as a “third turning of the Wheel.” The use of tantric practices that makes use of bodily experiences, mantras (Skt.: instrument of thought, sequence of sounds), and mandalas (Skt.: circle) are based on late Indian Mahayana teachings. They are held to provide a quick path to final liberation. The lama plays a central role in guiding the disciple and giving initiations. Like Mahayana Buddhism in China and East Asia, the self-designated Vajrayana (Skt.: Thunderbolt or Diamond Vehicle) lays emphasis on the selfless actions of the bodhisattva. Its primary reliance is upon texts called tantras rather than upon the sutras. Emphasis is laid on meditation practices as visualizations and a characteristic type of liturgical meditation (Skt.: sadhana). While becoming established over a period of five hundred years, a variety of syncretic forms evolved in absorbing native BON concepts and rituals then current in Tibet. These forms remained basic, on a popular, lay-oriented level, with rites to accumulate merit, honoring local and personal tutelary deities, wearing protective amulets, conducting pilgrimages, and much more.

Finally, at the turn of the twenty-first century, western Buddhists in North America and Europe began to outline the contours of a new, fourth yana (Skt.: vehicle). According to them, the encounter of Western culture and Buddhist ideas, ethics, and practices is currently molded into a new Buddhism, self-consciously named the “fourth turning of the Wheel.” This Navayana (Skt.: new Vehicle) or Lokayana (Skt.: World or Global Vehicle) takes impulses from socially and politically engaged Buddhists, feminist interpretations of Buddhist concepts and practices, psychological and scientific approaches, and, last but not least, the meeting and encounter of Buddhist schools and traditions in Western localities.

Monks at the Bir Tibetan Monastery in Himachal, Pradesh, India ring bells during prayer. (Dinodia/TRIP)

Spread and Local Development. Buddha and the members of his order preached the dharma in northern India on the plain of the River Ganges, in Magadha and Kosala. Compared with competing ascetic orders in the fifth and subsequent centuries B.C.E., the Buddhist community grew fairly rapidly. It gained support from the economically better-off strata of society. This enabled the building of residences (vihara) and later monasteries. Parallel to the settled monks and nuns, dwelling in monastery, a tradition of forest-dwelling monks practicing intense austerities and meditational practices persisted throughout Buddhist history.

During the time of Ashoka in the third century B.C.E., the model of rulers who assumed the role of “righteous king” (dharmaraja) came into being. These rulers supported the sangha and protected the monasteries. In return, the king received a sense of moral and religious legitimacy. This relationship, beneficial for both sides, was confirmed and celebrated in festivities and processions. The spread of Buddhism in China, Korea, Japan, and Tibet was greatly assisted by the patronage of Buddhist rulers. In Southeast Asia a close association between the practice of Buddhism and the institution of monarchy existed throughout its history.

With the encouragement of King Ashoka, Buddhist monks and nuns started to spread the dharma beyond the borders of the vast empire, covering the whole of northern and central India. The ordained reached the northwestern parts of the subcontinent, and from the first century onward, order members and Buddhist traders traveled from the Kusana Empire’s center, Bactria (today’s northern Afghanistan), to Chinese Turkestan.

In India itself, Buddhism blossomed with the development of the philosophical Mahayana schools of Madhyamika and Yogacara. Also, for the whole of the second half of the first millennium, the monastic University of Nalanda (in the north of India) became the center of learning. There and in other huge monasteries of the time, monks and nuns adhering either to schools of the Mahayana or Shravakayana lived side by side, following the same vinaya rules. The seventh century gave rise to tantric ideas and practices within Buddhism. This new emphasis, with its focus on mantras, body-based experiences, and ritual, brought Buddhism nearer to concepts and devotional forms current in Hindu traditions. The gradual absorption of Buddhism into Hinduism and the destruction of the Buddhist centers of learning by Muslim invaders in the twelfth century brought about the end of Buddhism in India as a lived religious tradition. In Nepal, Tibet, and Bhutan, however, the forms of Indian Buddhism survived and continued in culturally translated versions. It was no earlier than the late nineteenth and mid-twentieth century that Buddhism gained a new footing in its land of origin. In 1891 the Sinhalese Anagarika Dharmapala (1864–1933) founded the MAHA BODHI SOCIETY with the purpose of regaining control of the Maha Bodhi temple at Bodhi Gaya and resuscitating Buddhism in India. In 1956, Bhimrao Ramji Ambedkar's (1891–1956) conversion to Buddhism set in motion a mass conversion movement among the West Indian Mahars, a caste of unskilled laborers designated as untouchables. Mainly because of that development, in 1991 the census counted some six and a half million Buddhists in India.

According to Buddhist tradition, the monk Mahinda, declared to be a son of Ashoka, brought Buddhism in its Theravada form to the island of Ceylon in the mid-third century. Mahinda built a monastery in the capital, Anuradhapura, and propagated Buddhist teachings and practices at the court and among the elite. Of utmost symbolic importance, during this time a cut from the Bodhi tree at Bodhi Gaya was planted in the ancient capital. Later, the relic of a tooth of Buddha, venerated to this day, was brought in an annual grand procession to Kandy. The sacred status of the tooth is symbolic of the close relationship between the sangha and the king. It represented the royal protection of the sangha and the king's legitimation on religious grounds. During succeeding centuries, the interweaving of kingdom and monastic order resulted in the establishment of prosperous monasteries, the monks of which becoming landlords with endowed villages and lands. With European colonialism from the sixteenth century onward, a process of disestablishment and loss of privileges of the sangha began. In the late nineteenth century, as Western technologies (such as the press), scientific concepts, and Christian missionaries arrived, a Buddhist revival gained momentum. Responding to these challenges, Buddhist monks and lay-persons like Anagarika Dharmapala (1864–1933) emphasized rationalist elements in Buddhist teachings, accompanied by a tacit elimination of traditional cosmology, a heightened recognition and use of texts, a renewed emphasis on meditational practice, and a stress on social reform and universalism. The two broad strands of Buddhism—that is, modernist and traditionalist, or village-based Buddhism—existed side by side, at times in tension. The involvement of the monastic order in the politics of the country has lasted, especially as certain parts highlight the status of Sri Lanka as a “Buddhist nation” and the custodian of Buddhist tradition. This claim is to the detriment of ethnic and religious minorities in present-day Sri Lanka, observable also in the current Sinhalese–Tamil civil war.

Burma/Myanmar. Buddhism spread in the form of Theravada to Burma. As in Sri Lanka, a close relationship with the kings and dynasties evolved. Although Theravada seems to have been introduced to the region around the start of the common era, it was in the eleventh century that Buddhist teachings and practices began successfully to penetrate the nations and devotional forms. The Burmese King Anuruddha (1044–1077) was converted by a Buddhist monk from the Mon people, resulting in a lasting patronage of the sangha. Succeeding kings were also influential in sangha reforms and the introduction of an important ordination lineage from Sri Lanka (1476). Burma, like Sri Lanka, has been widely recognized among South Asian Buddhists as a guardian of Theravada Buddhism and of the Pali texts. The fifth and sixth Buddhist councils, with the recitation of the authoritative texts, were held in Mandalay in 1868–1871 and in Rangoon in 1954–1956. Unlike Thailand, Burma became a colony of the British Empire in the second half of the nineteenth century. The disestablishment of the sangha led to a revival of Buddhism and a renewed emphasis on meditation practices. Buddhism and Buddhist monks became an influential factor in the political independence movement. On a global scale, Burmese meditation masters such as Sayagyi U Ba Khin (1899–1971) and Mahasi Sayadaw (1904–1982) instigated the spread of Theravada meditation practices through their western disciples to North America and Europe.

Thailand, Cambodia, and Laos. Traveling Buddhist monks and traders had introduced Buddhism in its Mahayana form from India in the first millennium C.E. in Southeast Asia. In a parallel way, Hindu traditions and their ritual forms had become established. Both enjoyed privileged status at the royal courts and strengthened the political legitimation of the rulers.

In Thailand (then Siam), Theravada Buddhism became powerful from the mid-thirteenth century onward, also holding a paramount influence in Cambodia and Laos. Several times, the Siamese kings reformed the sangha with the import of Sri Lankan monks and their ordination lineage. In the mid-nineteenth century, King Mongkut (1804–1868, reigned 1851–1868), having been a monk for twenty-seven years before ascending to the throne, established the Dhammayuttika (Thai: Thammayut) as the most influential school. This school follows a strict compliance with the monastic rules (vinaya), whereas a majority of monks and schools, summarized under the designation Mahanikaya (Thai: Mahanikai), opposed the imposed reforms. Monkut's son, King Chulalongkorn (1868–1910), continued the reform for a more standardized and Bangkok-centralized Theravada Buddhism in Thailand. The Sangha Act of 1902 created a sangha bureaucracy with a “Supreme Patriarch,” bringing the hitherto decentralized sangha with its diverse lineages into line with the civilian government hierarchy. In contrast to this monastery-based Buddhism, the austere life of monks, living as wandering ascetics in the forest and dedicated to the practice of meditation, continued, and it even witnessed an efflorescence. In the early 1970s, new Buddhist foundations or movements, such as the Dhammakaya and the Santi Asoka, were formed, and Thai meditational practices and approaches of engaged Buddhism became globally known through the work of Ajahn Chah (1924–1993) and Buddhadasa (1906–1993). Parallel to these forms of “official” Buddhism, a multitude of “popular” Buddhist practices, such as healing, warding off malevolent spirits, and bespeaking protective amulets, persist and take importance for the laity.

Cambodia. In Cambodia, most widely known are the monuments of Angkor Wat (twelfth century), providing evidence in stone of the syncretism of Hindu and Indian Mahayana traditions, the cult of the devaraja (Skt.: divine king) forming the most important ritual. From the thirteenth century onward, Theravada Buddhism was introduced and adopted by the royal Khmer court. Political and cultural influences from neighboring Siam (Thailand) increased and pushed back the ruling Khmer. Also via Thailand, the ordination lineages from Sri Lanka were adopted, and in 1855 King Norodom imported the reformed Dhammayuttika-Nikaya (Cam.: Thommayut) from Thailand. The sangha-state relationship and its administrative structure was formed along the Thai model, although not without opposition from the Mohanikay school. The reign of terror of the Khmer Rouge from 1975 to 1979 aimed to annihilate all religious expression, resulting in the murder of most monks and the destruction of the wats (Thai: temple-monastery) and traditional Khmer Buddhism. During the 1980s, Buddhist practices remained constrained by the communist government installed by Vietnam in 1979. The restrictions were lifted in 1988, enabling the rebuilding of wats and ordaining Buddhist novices and monks.

Laos. Although the earliest traces of Buddhism in Laos date back to the tenth century, it was around 1350 that, with the creation of the kingdom of Laos, Theravada became the dominant religious tradition. The sangha enjoyed political patronage and high social prestige. Thailand had a strong political and religious influence till the late nineteenth century, when in 1893 Laos became a French colony. In 1953, Laos gained independence and Buddhism became the state religion. With the communist takeover in 1975, the sangha and Buddhist traditional lifestyle lost much of its former dominance. However, some of the monasteries were allowed to continue their work, albeit under restrictions. Since the mid-1980s, less restrictive policies have enabled a moderate resurgence of Buddhism.

Whereas Theravada Buddhism dominates in these countries of South and Southeast Asia, and therefore at times is also designated as southern Buddhism, so-called northern Buddhism, or Mahayana Buddhism, is prevalent in Central and East Asia.

China. Monks and pious laypersons from central Asia had brought Buddhist teachings and practices along the trade route to China in the first century C.E. The Indian concepts of rebirth and personal awakening, as well as the monastic lifestyle of a person who is not manually productive and does not fulfill filial duties, aroused at best curiosity among the Chinese. With the end of the Han Empire (220 C.E.), Buddhism having existed in China for at least 150 years, Buddhism still remained a marginal, foreign, and exotic phenomenon. During the period of political disunity (311–589) Buddhism gained a footing among the educated elite and higher aristocracy. Monks no longer were exclusively “foreigners,” but also sons and daughters of Chinese origin. Sanskrit texts were translated into Chinese, and wealthy monasteries came into existence as centers of learning, sponsored by local courts and the cultural elite. The number of monastics and local temples rose considerably, so that with the reunification of China in 589, Buddhism had become an established religious community, on par with other CHINESE RELIGIONS such as Confucianism and DAOISM. Imperial patronage, coupled with bureaucratic control of the sangha and Buddhism’s alignment to Chinese indigenous concepts, developed into a Sinicized Buddhism. During the T’ang Dynasty (618–906), Buddhist masters elaborated proper Chinese Buddhist traditions, mainly on the basis of Mahayana concepts. Zhiyi (538–597) advocated the centrality of the Lotus sutra and formed the Tiantai school. In the seventh century, Pure Land Buddhism (Ching-tu) developed, focusing on devotion and faith in Buddha Amitabha. Although the actual school reached the end of its life in the ninth century, it remained indirectly influential in the way that virtually all Chinese schools had accommodated aspects of it. In Japan, ideas of Pure Land Buddhism developed into proper schools from the twelfth century onward. During the seventh century, Ch’an Buddhism arose as a blending of Chinese (notably Taoist) and Mahayana concepts and practices. The school emphasized meditational practice and developed a genealogical lineage of “patriarchs,” placing the sixth-century semilegendary Indian monk Bodhidharma in the position of its first patriarch. A variety of schools and branches developed in due course. In thirteenth-century Japan, Ch’an Buddhism was elaborated into different schools of ZEN BUDDHISM—SOTO ZEN BUDDHISM and RINZAI.

Following the flourishing of Buddhism during the T’ang period, Confucianism regained strength during the succeeding dynasties. Buddhist and Daoist schools faced repeated oppressions during the Ming (1368–1644) and Qing dynasties (1644–1912). Monasteries were deprived of their privileges, and Buddhism steadily declined. In the early twentieth century a revival of Buddhism began, with the reformist monk Tai Hsu (or Taixu, 1890–1947) playing a leading role. The Sino-Japanese War (1937–1945) and the establishment of the communist Chinese People's Republic in 1949 brought an end to those activities. The Cultural Revolution, 1965–1969, had a devastating effect on Buddhist clergy and institutions. Since the late 1970s, however, restrictions on religious activities have become less stringent, and Buddhism has started to recover. In line with the Chinese aims of political stability and control, Buddhist clergy and laypersons are organized in a paragovernmental association.

Republic of China (Taiwan). Following the communist victory on mainland China, Buddhist monks and nuns moved to Taiwan in 1947 along with the Kuomintang. The Buddhist Association of the Republic of China was designed to represent all Buddhists in the Republic. It mainly served to communicate the official politics to the sangha and laypeople and to report concerns to the party. The association had the right to ordain only monks and nuns. In 1989 the Law on Civic Organizations removed restrictions on all forms of Buddhist institutionalization and ordination. As a result, during the 1990s a dynamic emergence of hitherto marginalized Buddhist organizations and movements has come to the fore. Organizations such as THE BUDDHIST COMPASSION RELIEF TZU CHI ASSOCIATION, THE DHARMA DRUM MOUNTAIN, and the FOGUANGSHAN have been able to gather a substantial membership in the Republic, as well as to establish branches and monasteries globally.

Vietnam. Buddhism reached the region of today's Vietnam via the north, from China, and via the sea, from India, during the first millennium. The north of Vietnam formed the southernmost part of the Han Empire, resulting in a Sinization of the elite and the adoption of Confucian, Taoist, and Ch'an Buddhist concepts. Sea-traveling monks and traders had brought Buddhism in its Theravada tradition. The flourishing of Buddhism started with Vietnam's independence in the mid-tenth century. The Dinh Dynasty (968–980) introduced royal sponsorship of Buddhism, which reached its apogee under the Ly Dynasty (1009–1224). The Ly court lavishly patronized the sangha, supported the building of monasteries, and elevated Buddhism to the rank of official state religion. In due course, Buddhism spread among the population. The evolved Vietnamese synthesis of Ch'an and Pure Land Buddhism mixed with local creeds and customs, notably the cult of spirits and divine village partons. The later Le Dynasty adopted neo-Confucianism as its central ideology, causing a steady decline of Buddhism. Under French colonialism (1860–1940), Catholicism was introduced, which provoked a Buddhist revival movement in the 1930s. In 1951, Buddhist leaders formed the National United Sangha (Viet.: Tong Hoi Phat Giao Viet Nam), which included all Ch'an, Pure Land, and Theravada groups. The division of Vietnam at the seventeenth parallel in 1954 split the newly formed association into a renamed northern part, controlled by the communists, and a southern part, under strong pressure by the regime of the Catholic Ngo Dinh Diem. Antigovernmental demonstrations by monks and nuns protested imposed restrictions, culminating in the public self-immolation of Buddhist monks in 1963. The formation of the UNIFIED BUDDHIST CHURCH OF VIETNAM (UBC) in 1963 in Saigon sought to provide peaceful answers to the military government, increasing U.S. involvement in Vietnam, and the Second Indo-Chinese War (1964–1975). One of the early leaders was Thich Nhat Hanh. With the fall of Saigon in 1975 and the establishment of the Socialist Republic of Vietnam, Buddhist activities faced restrictions; numerous monks and nuns were imprisoned, and the UBC had to continue underground. A large-scale exodus of south Vietnamese people via unseaworthy boats across the Chinese Sea began in 1978, bringing refugees to Europe, Australia, and North America. In 1986 the Vietnamese Communist Party launched a national economic renovation (Viet.: doi moi) policy that since the 1990s has lifted some of the restrictions on religious activities.

Korea. Buddhism was introduced from China at the three Korean courts in the late fourth century. The cultural elites regarded the new religious teachings and practices as part of advanced Chinese civilization, including in particular the use of Chinese script. The seventh century saw the unification of Korea under the royal house of Silla (688–917) and the sending of Korean monks for study in T'ang China. Some monks even traveled to India. All Chinese Buddhist traditions, including Ch'an, Tientai, Pure Land, and tantric Chen-yen, gained a footing in Korea. Patronized by the royal court, many Chinese-style temples and monasteries were built. This period and the following Koryo Dynasty (918–1392) formed the classical age of Korean Buddhism. As evidence of this, in the eleventh and again in the thirteenth century, official sponsorship made possible the production of complete printed editions of the Buddhist canon. The more than eighty thousand printing blocks are still preserved in the Haein Monastery near Taegu. The popularity of Ch'an Buddhism led to the gradual absorption of most other schools. Under the Yi or Choson Dynasty (1392–1910), much as in China, neo-Confucianism gained status as the official ideology, leading to a steady decline and marginalization of Korean Buddhism. Since the late nineteenth century and during Japan's annexation of the peninsula (1910–1945), Japanese Buddhist traditions such as the NICHIREN SHŌSHŪ and the JODO-SHINSHU (TRUE PURE LAND SCHOOL) sent their missionaries, the Tokyo government using religion as a tool of colonization. Following the Japanese capitulation, the communists took power in the northern part of the Korean Peninsula. Under the Stalinist leadership of Kim Il-sung (reigned 1945–1993), all religious institutions were subjected to governmental control, later closed or destroyed. Religious believers were prosecuted and killed, and Buddhism had come to an end as a lived and practiced tradition. In the south, the reign of Park Chung-hee (reigned 1962–1979) strongly supported Buddhism for nationalist and anticommunist reasons. Under the next president, the staunch anti-Buddhist Chun Doo-hwan (reigned 1980–1987), Buddhism and the CHOGYE ORDER in particular came under the strict surveillance of government agents. As a consequence, order members became politicized and led antigovernmental rallies. Since the late 1980s, however, the succeeding governments aimed less to use Buddhism and Buddhist orders for their political purposes. Despite the strong rivalry by Christian churches, Buddhist traditions such as the dominating Chogye Order; WON BUDDHISM; the POMUN ORDER, founded 1971; and the globally spread KWAN UM SCHOOL, founded 1983 have been able to arouse a growing interest.

Japan. Korea served as the transmission belt of Buddhism to Japan. Following a Korean embassy to the Japanese emperor in the mid-sixth century, carrying with it Buddhist texts and items, Buddhism began to be spread as a foreign faith among the imperial court and nobility during the reign of Prince Shotoku-Taishi (574–622). The newly ruling family was looking for a philosophy that would serve as an ideological basis for a centralized state and a legitimation of its power. Under Shotoku's regency, grand temples were built, a first embassy was dispatched to the court of Sui China in 607, and Chinese script, art, and science were adopted. The seventh and eighth centuries saw the introduction of the six Chinese schools, all Mahayana based, existent in those days. The cultural translation of these and other Buddhist traditions imported to Japan went along with an adoption of native religious concepts, and it led to numerous varieties of Shinto-Buddhist amalgamation. This trend intensified during the Heian period (794–1185), especially after the transmission of the Lotus sutra-based Tiantai school by Saicho in 805 and the Chinese tantric tradition of Chen-yen by Kukai in 806. These two traditions incorporated numerous aspects of Shintoist devotional faith and of the formerly imported Buddhist schools. With this, decisive steps had been taken to spread Buddhist teachings and practices to all social strata. A close interweaving between the imperial court and Buddhist temples, some of which maintained monastic armies, was also characteristic. The Tendai or Tiantai school or sect (Jap.: shu) developed into the dominant religious tradition in Japan. Tendai perspectives were superseded in the mid-eleventh century by the apocalyptic notion of living in the final period of the dharma (mappo). Only the invocation of the devotional formula namu-amida-butsu (surrender to the Buddha Amida) would make possible entrance to the Western Paradise of the Buddha Amida—that is, the “Pure Land.” Based on this picture, Honen (1133–1212) systematized the idea of relying only on the “Other Power” (tariki)—that is, on the compassionate Buddha Amida—and established the JŌDO-SHŪ, or Sect of the Pure Land in 1175. His disciple Shinran Shonin (1173–1262), with a different emphasis, founded the Jōdo-Shinshū, or True Sect of the Pure Land in 1207.

As Japanese culture had started to emancipate itself from Chinese tutelage during the Heian period, it was during the early Kamakura period (1185–1333) that other Japanese Buddhist schools were set up. Following studies in China, the Tendai monks Eisai (1141–1215) and Dogen (1200–1253) brought to Japan the teachings and practices of Ch’an Buddhism, forming the meditational schools of Rinzai Zen and Soto Zen. In contrast to the Jōdo schools, Zen placed its emphasis on “Own Power” (jiriki)—that is, the ability to reach enlightenment through one’s own efforts. Later, importantly devotional forms of worship to local deities (kami) and rites for deceased family members were incorporated, placing emphasis on temple rituals rather than on austere meditational practice. Finally, in 1253 the Tendai-trained Nichiren (1222–1282) proclaimed that the title of the Lotus sutra (Jap.: Myoho-renge-kyo, Hokekyo for short) embraced the essence of the whole sutra. The invocation of the title (daimoku) by way of uttering namo-myoho-renge-kyo (homage be paid to the Lotus sutra of the Wonderful Dharma) would be sufficient to find oneself in the state of the highest enlightenment of the Buddha Shakyamuni.

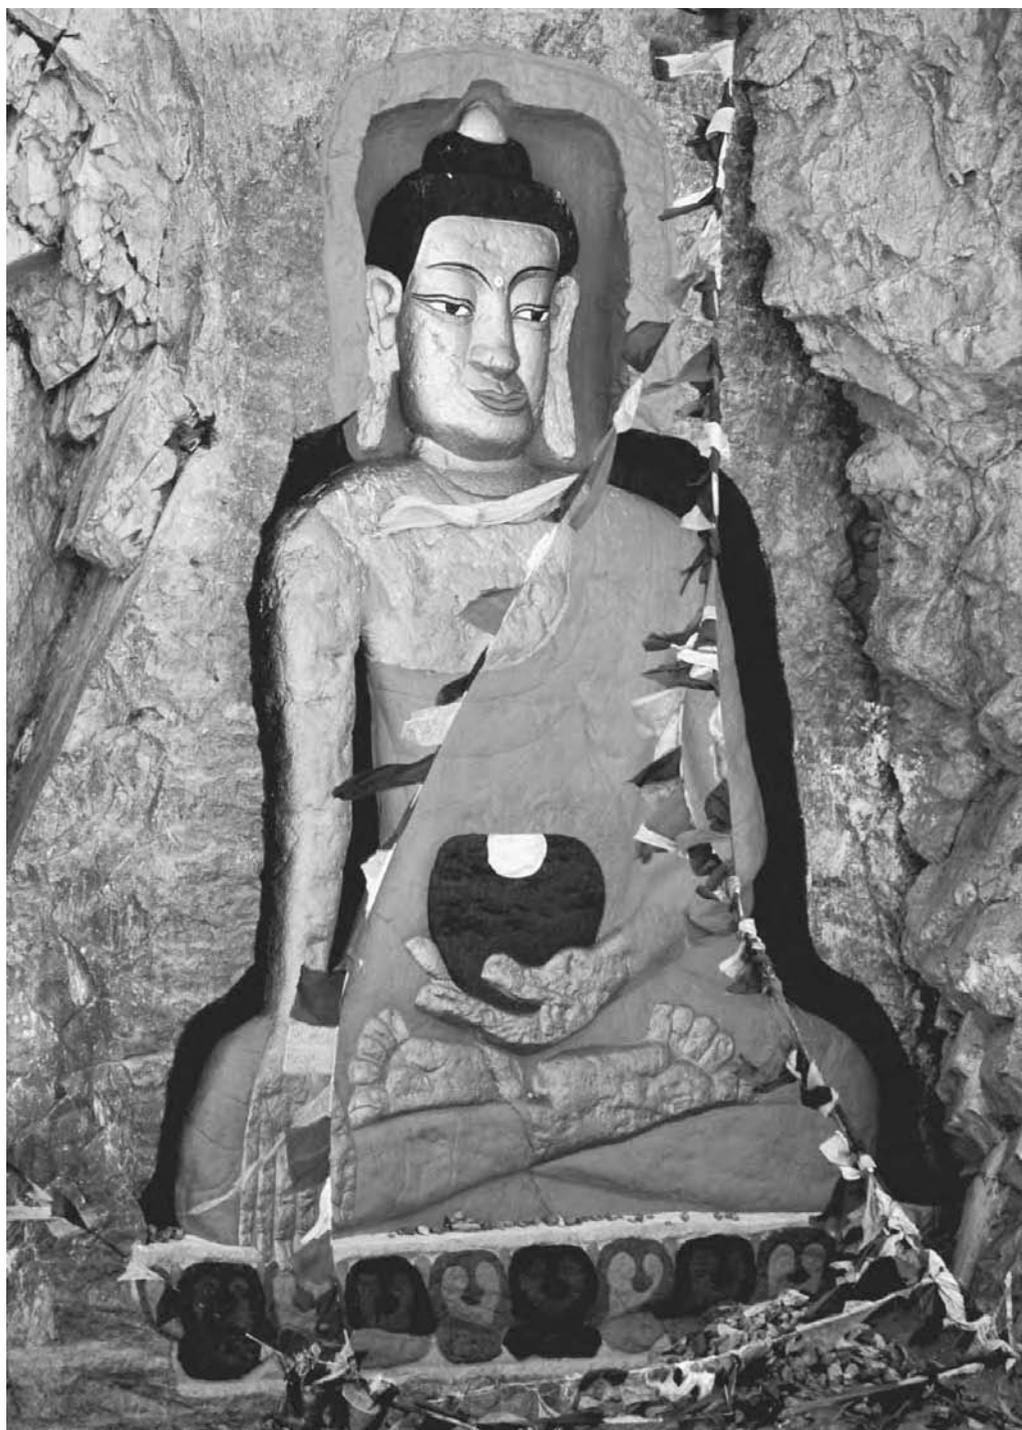

During the Muromachi period (1336–1573) the various Buddhist schools became firmly established, the Rinzai school being lavishly supported by the military government. The Tokugawa or Edo period (1573–1867) saw the closing of Japan to foreigners, the strengthening of neo-Confucianism, and a bureaucratic control of Buddhist temples and monasteries. The enforced opening of Japan to foreign trade (1853) sounded the end of the rigid feudal system. During the Meiji period (1868–1912) the new imperial regime modernized Japan’s political, economic, and social system. Ideologically, a restoration was carried out in establishing Shinto as state cult, to the detriment of Buddhism. The picturing of Buddhism as a foreign, non-Japanese element forced Buddhist leaders into reforms. Most brought Buddhism in close relationship to nationalistic tendencies, reaching a disastrous climax in the fatal support of fascism during World War II. During the Taisho (1912–1926) and Showa (1926–1945) periods, individual Nichiren priests and lay-leaders founded various new societies, among them the NIPPONZAN MYOHOJI, REIYUKAI, SOKA GAKKAI INTERNATIONAL, and RISSHO KOSEI-KAI. Within the tradition of Shingon, the SHINNYOEN and GEDATSU KAI were founded in the 1930s. Earlier on, reforms of Zen had set on, similar in terms to the modernization of South Asian Theravada in the late nineteenth century. Zen modernists emphasized rational, scientific, demythologized, and lay-based elements, paving the way for the global spread of Zen meditational practices since the 1950s. Since 1945, Japan has witnessed a continuous proliferation of other Buddhist subsects. This contrasts with the steady decline of long-established Buddhist schools, which are seen to have become commercial, worldly, and unspiritual in the eyes of their critics. Finally, worldwide migration, already begun in the late nineteenth century, and the travel of Japanese masters to teach Westerners, have spread many of the Buddhist traditions and schools globally.

Tibet. Buddhism in its Indian, tantric Mahayana form reached the vast, mountainous regions north of the Himalayas from the seventh century onward. King Songtsen Gampo (c. 618–650) established Tibet as a powerful empire and, according to tradition, his two wives, one from Nepal, the other from China, introduced Buddhism to the royal court. The court adopted the Indian script, and the Jo-khang was built as the first Buddhist temple in 653 in Lhasa. Patronage of Buddhism continued during the eighth century, though rivaled by families and priests of the native BON RELIGION. King Trisong Detsen (c. 740–798) invited Santaraksita and Padmasambhava, an Indian scholar-monk and a tantric master, to spread Buddhist teachings and practices. Following the foundation of the first Buddhist monastery at Samye in 775, monks took residence and established the order of the NYINGMA TIBETAN BUDDHISM (adherents of the Old [Tantras]). Tantric Buddhism absorbed many of the native Bon ideas and ritual practices, thus paving the way for a culturally translated form of the Buddhist teachings and practices. Up until the mid-ninth century, Buddhist monks were able to gain a strong influence in the political sphere. The assassination of King Relbachen (reigned 815–836) was followed by a temporary persecution of Buddhism. This brought to an end the “first dissemination” of Buddhism.

It took two centuries until, with the arrival of the Indian monk Atisa (982–1054) in 1042, the restraining of strengthened Bon began and a renewal of monastic discipline was initiated. During this “second dissemination,” outstanding teachers, supported by local ruling families, formed the new orders of the Kadampa (later absorbed by the GELUKPA), the SAKYAPA, and the KAGYUPA TIBETAN BUDDHISM with its various suborders (such as the Karmapa). A close contact with the Buddhist centers of learning in India existed during this time, and a steady flow of Tibetan pilgrims crossed the Himalayas. A multitude of Buddhist Sanskrit texts were translated into Tibetan, collected in the Tibetan Canon of the Kanjur (108 volumes, vinaya texts, sutras, and tantras) and the Tanjur (225 volumes, treatises, and commentaries). The Nyingmapa compiled their voluminous “Compendium of Old Tantras” and thus codified their own doctrines. Although the schools differed in their emphasis on specific teachings and methods of practice, they all followed the same monastic rule (the vinaya of the Mulasarvastivadin). In the early fifteenth century, Tsong Khapa (1357–1419) founded Ganden monastery and established the reformist order of the Gelukpa. The school placed a strong emphasis on scholarship and monastic life.

In 1577, the Gelukpa abbot Sönam Gyatso (1543–1588) converted the Mongolian ruler Altan Khan to Tibetan Buddhism. The ruler bestowed the honorary title of Third Dalai Lama (ocean of wisdom) on the abbot, thus establishing the lineage of reborn Dalai Lamas. With the support of the Mongolian ruler Gusri Khan, in the mid-seventeenth century the dominant Red Hat Karmapa was deprived of power and the Gelukpa gained supremacy in Tibet. The Fifth Dalai Lama, Ngawang Losang Gyatso (1617–1682), became the undisputed master of Tibet. During this time, Mongolian-backed Tibet established a far-reaching empire, acknowledged by the Chinese Manchu Dynasty as a politically independent territory in 1653. Nevertheless, during the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries, Tibet came under temporary foreign control, and the Manchus were able to establish a “patron-and-priest” relationship.

Until the late eighteenth century, the system of government (with the Dalai Lama as ruler) and religious and social life remained virtually unchanged, reinforced by the sealing off of Tibet to foreigners from 1792 onward. Under the Thirteenth Dalai Lama, Tupden Gyatso (1876–1933), Tibet gained political independence as the Manchu Dynasty collapsed in 1911. The incipient steps of the Thirteenth Dalai Lama to reform political and social life came to an abrupt end as, in the autumn of 1950, the communist regime of China sent its army into Tibet. Following the Chinese annexation, a systematic looting of monasteries, the execution, imprisoning, or forceful disrobing of monks and nuns, and a suppression of religious life took place. The years of the so-called Cultural Revolution had been disastrous to Buddhism in Tibet, though antireligious campaigns during the 1950s had already been intense and destructive.

Rock painting of Buddha at a monastery in Tibet (Photodisc)

In 1959, the Fourteenth Dalai Lama, Tenzin Gyatso (born 1935), fled to India and established a government-in-exile in Dharamsala. Tens of thousands of Tibetans have since fled from Tibet. They were resettled in various camps and villages in the Himalayan foothills, in Nepal, and in South India (Karnataka). Some of the head monasteries have been rebuilt, and monks and nuns work to preserve Tibetan culture and its specific religious tradition. Small exile communities also came into being in Switzerland, Canada, and the United States. Since the late 1960s, numerous Tibetan lamas have come to the West to teach Westerners. The lamas and their Western disciples have founded a multitude of teaching centers, monasteries, and groups globally.

Buddhism in the West. Currently, Buddhism in the West is experiencing an enthusiastic growth of interest and a dynamic proliferation of groups and centers. During the 1990s the news media have repeatedly declared Buddhism as “in” and as the “trend religion” of the twenty-first century. In this wave of positive adoption, it is worthwhile to remember that Europeans and North Americans had no coherent conception of Buddhism until 150 years ago.

Europe. First information about Buddhist concepts can be traced to the records of the Greek philosopher Plutarch (first century C.E.). Plutarch writes about the Indo-Greek king Menander (second century B.C.E.) and his commitment to Buddhist ideas. The Pali text Milindapanha (Menander’s Questions) gives a detailed account of this conversation between the Buddhist monk Nagasena and the king. The rise of Christianity and later of Islam blocked any further exchange until the travels of Franciscan friars to Mongolia in the thirteenth century. Reports by Jesuit missionaries to Tibet, China, and Japan from the sixteenth century onward provided further data, although fragmentary and distorted in nature. In the course of European colonial expansion, information was gathered about the customs and history of the peoples and regions that had been subjected to British, Portuguese, and Dutch domination. Around 1800, texts and descriptions about Indian religions had become known in literate and academic circles in Europe, and a glorifying enthusiasm for the East took hold. In particular, the Romantic movement and the Oriental Renaissance discovered the Asian world and its religious and philosophical traditions. In the 1850s, Europe witnessed a boom of studies and translations, paving the way for an enhanced knowledge of and interest in Buddhist teachings.

The sudden discovery of “Buddhism”—a concept systematized and coined by the French philologist Eugène Burnouf (1801–1852) in 1844—was essentially treated as a textual object, being located in books and Oriental libraries. During the 1880s, first Europeans, self-converted by reading Buddhist treatises of the Pali canon, took up Buddhism as their guiding life-principle. Around the turn of the century initial Buddhist institutions were founded, the first being the Society for the Buddhist Mission in Germany, established in 1903 in Leipzig. The close contact of early Western Buddhists with the revival of Theravada Buddhism in South Asia was of much importance. European men traveled to South Asia to be ordained as Buddhist monks. On their return to Europe, they were active in propagating Buddhist ideas. The Ceylonese Anagarika Dharmapala traveled to Europe and the United States numerous times, founding sister branches of his Maha Bodhi Society, first established in 1891. During this time a philosophical interest in Buddhist ideas and ethics dominated. The texts of the Pali canon rather than the actually lived and practiced Theravada tradition formed the focus of interest. The few Buddhists came mainly from the educated middle strata, some from the upper strata of society.

After World War I (1914–1917) Buddhists in Germany and Great Britain started to take up religious practices such as spiritual exercises and devotional acts. Outstanding Buddhists during the 1920s and 1930s were Paul Dahlke (1865–1928) and Georg Grimm (1868–1945) in Germany and Christmas Humphreys (1901–1983) in Great Britain. In other European countries, Buddhist activities remained low-key (if present at all) until the 1960s.

The postwar years saw the influx of Mahayana traditions from Japan and a growing interest in meditational practice. Zen in particular caught the interest of many spiritual seekers. The Zen boom of the 1960s was followed by an upsurge of interest in Tibetan Buddhism since the mid-1970s. Within only two decades, converts to Tibetan Buddhism were able to found a multitude of centers and groups, at times outnumbering all other traditions in a given country. This rapid increase, accompanied by an expansion of the already existing institutions of Theravada Buddhism and nonsectarian societies, led to a considerable rise in the number of Buddhist groups and centers on the side of convert Buddhists. In Britain, for example, within only two decades the number of organizations quintupled from seventy-four to four hundred groups and centers (1979–2000). In Germany, interest in Buddhism resulted in an increase from some forty to more than five hundred groups, meditation circles, centers, and societies (1975–2001). Often ignored and hardly noticed in public, considerable numbers of Buddhists from Asian countries have come to Western Europe since the 1960s. In France, as a former colonial power in Indo-China, strong communities of refugees from Vietnam, Laos, and Cambodia have emerged; Paris has become the central place for South-east Asian Buddhist migrants. Informed estimates speak of a million Buddhists currently living in Europe, two-thirds of whom are made up of Buddhists from Asia and their offspring. Among the convert strand, Tibetan Buddhism and Zen are favored most. Buddhism in the country is heterogeneous and plural, with Buddhist schools from the Theravada, Mahayana, and Tibetan Buddhist traditions, as well as newly founded Western Buddhist groups. Buddhism is very well organized in many European countries, often with a national umbrella organization that works for mutual cooperation between the different Buddhist traditions.

North America. The intellectual approach toward Buddhism, dominant in Europe during the nineteenth century, also characterized the adoption of Buddhist ideas by American sympathizers and early convert Buddhists. Writers such as the transcendentalists Ralph W. Emerson (1803–1882) and Henry D. Thoreau (1817–1862) spread Buddhist ideas in their essays to members of the middle and upper classes. The THEOSOPHICAL SOCIETY (ADYAR), founded in 1875, additionally aroused an interest in Buddhist concepts. The Chicago World's Parliament of Religion in 1893 became important for the history of convert Buddhism in North America, as Buddhist speakers such as Dharmapala and the Japanese Zen master Soyen Shaku (1859–1919) presented Buddhism as a rational and scientific religion. It was in Chicago, as well, that the German-American Carl Theodor Strauss (1852–1937) became the first U.S.-American to take refuge formally in the Buddha, dharma, and sangha, in 1893. Although Dharmapala succeeded in founding an American branch of the Maha Bodhi Society in 1897, and three Rinzai Zen masters resided in the United States as of 1905, interest in Buddhist teachings and practices was minimal. It took until the lecture tours of Daisetz T. Suzuki (1870–1966) during the 1950s, who spread a modernist understanding of Zen Buddhism, that a broader interest in Zen came about among artists, poets, and members of the counterculture. Zen as a meditational practice started with the influence of the Beat Generation and increased in the 1960s with the arrival of Japanese teachers (Jap.: roshis) and American disciples returning from Japan to teach and establish meditation centers. The Zen masters were followed by Tibetan lamas and Theravada bhiksus from the 1970s onward, further enriching the increasingly plural spectrum of Buddhist options in North America.

Parallel to these processes, since the mid-nineteenth century Buddhism had spread along a very different line to North America. Chinese and later Japanese migrants had come to the West Coast to find work and gold. By the 1880s, the number of Chinese in Gold Mountain (California), Montana, and Idaho had grown to more than 100,000, with an additional 10,000 in Canada. Upon their arrival, Chinese temples were built, the first two in San Francisco in 1853. During the next fifty years, hundreds of so-called “joss houses,” where Buddhist, Taoist, and Chinese folk traditions mingled, came about throughout California and Canadian British Columbia. In striking contrast to the high esteem that Buddhist texts and ideas had gained among East Coast intellectuals, in the American West, residents devalued East Asian culture as strange and incomprehensible. In 1882 the Chinese Exclusion Act restricted further immigration of Chinese nationals to the United States. Japanese immigrants during this time were treated no better. For their religious guidance, two Jodo Shinshu priests were sent to the United States in 1899, and the Buddhist Mission to North America was formally established in 1914. Renamed the Buddhist Churches of America in 1944 during the internment of 111,000 people of Japanese ancestry, the Jodo Shinshu Buddhists have become a part of the broader middle class in U.S. society since the 1960s.

Following the change of U.S. immigration laws in 1965, further Buddhist traditions arrived from Asia with Sri Lankan, Thai, Chinese, Taiwanese, Korean, and Japanese teachers and adherents. Among these traditions and schools, one of the most vigorous turned out to be the SOKA GAKKAI INTERNATIONAL, gaining a stronghold with a claimed membership of 500,000 people in the mid-1970s. As in Europe, Buddhism is a heterogeneous and very diversified phenomenon. Although well established in a multitude of groups, centers, and monasteries, intra-Buddhist cooperation and exchanges are on a much lower level than in the “Old World.” Estimates of the number of Buddhists in the United States and Canada run from around one million to about four and a half million convert and immigrant Buddhists.

Australia. The history of Buddhism in Australia begins with the arrival of Chinese immigrants in 1848. As in North America, the Chinese came to work in the goldfields. Numerous joss houses were set up, followed by more established temples such as the one in Melbourne in 1856. During the 1870s other workers came from Sri Lanka and Japan, and a Sinhalese Buddhist community came into being in 1876 on Thursday Island. Two bodhi tree saplings were planted on the island, and Buddhist festivals were strictly observed. With the Immigration Restriction Act of 1901, the community slowly began to disperse. The same applied to the Chinese and Japanese communities, paying tribute to the racist “White Only” policy. Around the turn of the century, Theosophist ideas caught an increasing interest among the better educated citizens of the upper-middle class. Henry Steel Olcott (1832–1907), cofounder of the Theosophical Society, visited Australia in 1891 and spent several months lecturing. A strong influence of Theosophy remained until the 1950s, the Sydney Theosophical Lodge having been the largest and wealthiest in the world in the 1920s. Melbourne has credit for having staged the first two convert Buddhist organizations, the Little Circle of Dharma in 1925 and the Buddhist Study Group in 1938. In the early 1950s, Buddhist societies were set up in the states of Victoria, New South Wales, Queensland, and Tasmania, assisted by the visits of the American-born Theravada “nun” Sister Dhammadina (1881–1967) and prominent Theravada monks from Burma and Sri Lanka. At the end of the decade, in 1958, the Buddhist Federation of Australia was formed as a national body; it is still existent today. The first Buddhist organizations were made up with a membership of mainly well-educated citizens, emphasizing philosophical and ethical aspects of Southern Buddhism. In particular, Charles F. Knight (1890–1975) and Natasha Jackson (1902–1990) saw Buddhism as a triumph of rationalism, banishing all ritual and religious devotion as accretions of traditional Buddhism, an approach that dominated the small Buddhist scene until the early 1970s.

The 1960s and 1970s saw the introduction of Japanese Mahayana traditions to Australia. Zen meditational groups came into being, the DIAMOND SANGHA being one of its pioneers.

Jodo Shinshu and the Soka Gakkai formed their first institutions in Australia. With the 1970s, an increased influence of monastics on the hitherto lay-dependent presence of Buddhism in Australia began. Theravada monasteries were built to house residential monks, and Tibetan lamas began to visit incipient groups. The influx of more than 100,000 Vietnamese, Laotian, and Cambodian refugees during the 1980s proved to be decisive for Buddhism in Australia, however. The overall number of Buddhists grew from 35,000 to 200,000 between 1981 and 1996. Subsequently, the number of Buddhist groups and centers rose from 167 to 315 between 1991 and 2000. The largest Buddhist complex in the Southern Hemisphere came into being in the 1990s, the Taiwanese Fokuangshan order setting up the Nan Tien Temple at Wollongong, south of Sydney. Buddhism in Australia is well established with a wide spectrum of Buddhist traditions and schools, forming a multifarious part of Australia's plural society.

South Africa. Although the history of Buddhism in southern Africa can be traced back to 1686, when three Thai bhiksus were shipwrecked on the west coast and compelled to stay four months, Buddhist activities in organized form did not start until the twentieth century. In 1917, the Indian Rajaram Dass established the Overport Buddhist Sakya Society and called low-caste Hindus working in Natal to embrace Buddhism in order to escape the degrading social and religious positions imposed on them by Hindu custom. The movement did not really gain momentum, however, and after reaching its peak with some four hundred families during the 1930s (1 percent of the total Indian population), in the course of time it gradually declined. Buddhist activities started to take off from the 1970s onward as small, local meditational groups were founded in the main metropolitan areas. The important Buddhist Retreat Center near Ixopo (Natal) started operating in 1979, offering established Theravada meditation courses but also meditative practice combined with artistic expression and nature awareness. The 1980s saw an influx of visiting U.S. and Asian teachers, establishing a variety of Zen and Tibetan centers. Groups formerly rather open to a variety of Buddhist practices changed to sharpening their doctrinal identity and lineage adherence. Other traditions, such as the Sōka Gakkai and the Fokuangshan order, have established themselves, the latter working on building a huge monastery and the Nan Hua temple near Bronkhorstspuit since 1992. During the 1990s, Tibetan Buddhism was able to gain a comparatively strong following, as teachers began to stay on a permanent basis. Likewise, Zen teachers and Theravada monks settled and firmly established their traditions. Estimates on the number of Buddhists in 2001 range from six thousand to some thirty thousand, although the lower informed guess seems more reliable, especially in view of the 1994 census, giving a total of only twenty-four hundred Buddhists.

Buddhism has gained a footing in numerous other countries outside Asia, among them Brazil, Mexico, Ghana, Israel, Eastern Europe, and New Zealand. A rapid growth in terms of founding groups and centers took place in the 1980s and 1990s in particular. Buddhism in the West is deeply marked by its plurality and heterogeneity. A multitude of schools and traditions have successfully settled in urbanized, industrialized settings. The presence of the main traditions of Theravada, Mahayana, and Tibetan Buddhism is heavily subdivided according to country of origin (for example, Laos, Burma, Sri Lanka, or Thailand), lineage (Gelukpa, KARMA-KAGYUPA, Sakyapa, or Nyingma; Rinzai or Soto), teacher (Asian and Western, manifold), and emphasis on specific Buddhist concepts and practices. In addition to the publicly more visible convert groups, monasteries, and societies established by Asian migrant Buddhists and their offspring have increasingly come to the fore and claimed recognition in the presentation of Buddhism. The marked plurality of Buddhism outside Asia has been intensified by the globalization of once local organizations. The British-based Friends of the Western Buddhist Order and the French-based INTERNATIONAL ZEN ASSOCIATION have spread worldwide. This applies also to various Zen and Vipassana organizations with teachers from the United States and prominent Vietnamese and Korean meditation masters. In a similar way, Tibetan Buddhist organizations have created global networks with lamas untiringly touring the globe. Apart from institutional aspects, Buddhists in the West work to adapt and change Buddhism as they place emphasis on lay practice and participation, critically evaluate women's roles, apply democratic and egalitarian principles, favor a close linkage to Western psychological concepts, conceptualize a socially engaged Buddhism, and create an ecumenical, nonsectarian tradition. The study of Buddhism in the West has grown into a subdiscipline of Buddhist Studies, and the twenty-first century will prove to be most fascinating in following up on what ways and directions a "Western Buddhism" and possibly a "fourth turning of the Wheel" will emerge.

Martin Baumann

Sources:

The Three Jewels and Main Traditions

Bechert, Heinz, and Richard Gombrich, eds. The World of Buddhism. London: Thames and Hudson, 1984.

Gombrich, Richard F. How Buddhism Began: The Conditioned Genesis of the Early Teachings. London: Athlone, 1996.

Harvey, Peter. An Introduction to Buddhism: Teachings, History, and Practices. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1990.

———. An Introduction to Buddhist Ethics: Foundations, Values and Issues. New York: Cambridge University Press, 2000.

Prebish, Charles S. Historical Dictionary of Buddhism. Delhi: Indian Books Centre, 1995.

Reynolds, Frank E., and Jason A. Carbine, eds. The Life of Buddhism. Berkeley: University of California Press, 2000.

Strong, John. The Experience of Buddhism: Sources and Interpretations. Belmont, CA: Thomson, 1995.

Williams, Paul. Mahayana Buddhism: The Doctrinal Foundations. London: Routledge, 1989.

Spread and Regional Development

Harris, Ian, ed. Buddhism and Politics in Twentieth-Century Asia. London: Pinter, 1999.

Lamotte, Étienne. History of Indian Buddhism: From the Origins to the Saka Era. Louvain-la-Neuve, Belgium: Université Catholique de Louvain, 1988.

Lopez, Donald S. Jr., ed. Curators of the Buddha: The Study of Buddhism under Colonialism. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1995.

Queen, Christopher S., and Sallie B. King, eds. Engaged Buddhism: Buddhist Liberation Movements in Asia. Albany: State University of New York, 1996.

Sharf, Robert H. "Buddhist Modernism and the Rhetoric of Meditative Experience." Numen 42 (1995): 228–283.

Takeuchi, Yoshinori, ed. Buddhist Spirituality: Later China, Korea, Japan and the Modern World. New York: Crossroad, 1999.

South and Southeast Asia

Gombrich, Richard. Theravada Buddhism: A Social History from Ancient Benares to Modern Colombo. London: Routledge, 1988.

Gombrich, Richard, and Gananath Obeyesekere. Buddhism Transformed: Religious Change in Sri Lanka. Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1988.

Houtman, Gustaaf. Mental Culture in Burmese Crisis Politics. Tokyo: Institute for the Study of Languages and Cultures of Asia and Africa, Tokyo University of Foreign Studies, 1999.

Kamala, Tiyavanich. Forest Recollections: Wandering Monks in Twentieth-Century Thailand. Honolulu: University of Hawai'i Press, 1997.

Ray, Reginal. Buddhist Saints in India: A Study in Buddhist Values and Orientations. New York: Oxford University Press, 1994.

- Seneviratne, H. L. The Work of Kings: The New Buddhism in Sri Lanka. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1999.
- Tambiah, Stanley, J. The Buddhist Saints of the Forest and the Cult of Amulets. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1984.
- Trainor, Kevin. Relics, Ritual and Representation in Buddhism: Rematerializing the Sri Lankan Theravada Tradition. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1997.

China and East Asia

- Arai, Paula Kane Robinson. Women Living Zen: Japanese Soto Buddhist Nuns. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1999.
- Ch'en, Kenneth K. S. Buddhism in China: A Historical Survey. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1964, 1972.
- Dumoulin, Heinrich. Zen Buddhism: A History. 2 vols. 2d rev. ed. New York: Macmillan, 1988.
- Gernet, Jacques. Buddhism in Chinese Society: An Economic History from the Fifth to the Tenth Centuries. New York: Columbia University Press, 1995.
- Hanayama, Shinsho. A History of Japanese Buddhism. Tokyo: n.p., 1966.
- Jones, Charles Brewer. Buddhism in Taiwan: Religion and the State, 1660–1990. Honolulu: University of Hawai'i Press, 1999.
- Lancaster, Lewis R., and C. S. Yu, eds. Assimilation of Buddhism in Korea. Lancaster, CA: Asian Humanities Press, 1991.
- Payne, Richard, ed. Re-Visioning "Kamakura" Buddhism. Honolulu: University of Hawai'i Press, 1998.
- Victoria, Brian. Zen War Stories. Richmond, UK: Curzon Press, 2002.
- Watanabe, S. Japanese Buddhism. Tokyo: Kokusai Bunka Shinkokai, 1968.
- Welch, Holmes. Buddhism under Mao. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1972.
- . The Buddhist Revival in China. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1967.

Tibet

- Bishop, Peter. Dreams of Power: Tibetan Buddhism and the Western Imagination. London: Athlone, 1993.
- Godstein, Melvyn, and Matthew Kapstein, eds. Buddhism in Contemporary Tibet: Religious Revival and Cultural Identity. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1998.
- Lopez, Donald S. Jr. Prisoners of Shangri-La: Tibetan Buddhism and the West. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1998.
- Powers, John. Introduction to Tibetan Buddhism. Ithaca: Snow Lion, 1995.
- Samuels, Geoffrey. Civilized Shamans: Buddhism in Tibetan Societies. Washington, DC: Smithsonian, 1993.
- Snellgrove, David. Indo-Tibetan Buddhism: Indian Buddhists and Their Tibetan Successors. London: Serindia, 1987.

The West

- Adam, Enid, and Philip J. Hughes. The Buddhists in Australia. Canberra: Australian Government Publishing Service, 1996.
- Batchelor, Stephen. The Awakening of the West: The Encounter of Buddhism and Western Culture. Berkeley, CA: Parallax, 1994.
- Baumann, Martin. Deutsche Buddhisten: Geschichte und Gemeinschaften. Marburg: Diagonal, 1995.
- . "Global Buddhism: Developmental Periods, Regional Histories and a New Analytical Perspective." Journal of Global Buddhism 2 (2001): 1–43.
- Baumann, Martin, and Charles S. Prebish, eds. Westward Dharma: Buddhism Beyond Asia. Berkeley: University of California Press, 2002.
- Clasquin, Michel, and Kobus Krüger, eds. Buddhism and Africa. Pretoria: University of South Africa, 1999.
- Croucher, Paul. Buddhism in Australia: 1848–1988. Kensington, Australia: New South Wales University Press, 1989.
- Kraft, Kenneth. The Wheel of Engaged Buddhism: A New Map of the Path. New York: Weatherhill, 1999.
- Numrich, Paul David. Old Wisdom in the New World: Americanization in Two Immigrant Theravada Buddhist Temples. Knoxville: University of Tennessee Press, 1996.
- Obadia, Lionel. Bouddhisme et Occident: La diffusion du bouddhisme tibétain en France. Paris: L'Harmattan, 1999.
- Prebish, Charles S. Luminous Passage: The Practice and Study of Buddhism in America. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1999.
- Queen, Christopher S., ed. Engaged Buddhism in the West. Boston: Wisdom Publications, 2000.

- Seager, Richard Hugh. Buddhism in America. New York: Columbia University Press, 1999.
- Snelling, John. Buddhism in Russia: The Story of Agvan Dorzhiev—Lhasa's Emissary to the Tsar. Shaftesbury, Dorset: Element Books, 1993.
- Spuler, Michelle. Facets of the Diamond: Developments in Australian Buddhism. Richmond, UK: Curzon, 2002.
- Tweed, Thomas A. The American Encounter with Buddhism 1844–1912: Victorian Culture and the Limits of Dissent. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1992, 2000.
- Williams, Duncan Ryuukun, and Christopher S. Queen, eds. American Buddhism: Methods and Findings in Recent Scholarship. Richmond, UK: Curzon Press, 1999.

Buddhist Association of Thailand under Royal Patronage

The major normative and nongovernmental Buddhist association in Thailand, the Buddhist Association of Thailand under Royal Patronage was founded by a group of 33 devout Thai Buddhists, led by Phra Rajadharma-nidesa, a well-known nobleman, on February 28, 1933. The founders were scholars, noblemen, and people of high social status who, during their meeting at the Samagayacarya Club in Bangkok vowed to adhere to the Buddha's teachings and to propagate Buddhism throughout the country. Originally, the association was named Buddha-Dharma Society, but it was later changed to the Buddhist Association in order to embrace the Triple Gem, the name given to the three pillars of Buddhism: the Buddha himself, the basic principles of human life as he taught them (the dharma), and the fellowship of Buddhists who have chosen the perfected life of the monk or nun (the sangha).

The Buddhist Association of Thailand is supported by the Royal Institution and the Thai Sangha (monks' order). Its work is in accordance with national policies and the Thai Buddhist tradition. Its creative activities are the annual Visakha (Vesakh festival) Celebration at Phra Meru Ground, Bangkok, where people have joined the Thai Government in offering food to Buddhist monks. In 1935 this festival also included the establishment of the yellow Buddhist flag with the symbolic emblem of the Wheel of the Law at its center, which originally decorated the Phra Meru Ground during the Visakha Celebration, and, since then, has been used in all major Buddhist ceremonies and celebrations. In addition, in 1935 the Buddhist Association published palm-leaf books of the Buddhist doctrine in 1935 for distribution to all Thai provinces to be used as teaching manuals in Buddhist monasteries.

In 1950, the Buddhist Association of Thailand joined with Buddhist associations of other countries to found the WORLD FELLOWSHIP OF BUDDHISTS (WFB) in Colombo, Sri Lanka. As a WFB regional center, its work and activities are increasingly international.

Within Thailand, the Buddhist Association of Thailand works primarily for the benefits of Thai Buddhists, that is, monks and novices, students, and all the needy. Its primary objectives are (1) to support all Buddhist activities within the country and abroad; (2) to study, spread, and uphold Buddhist doctrine; (3) to provide unity; and (4) to render public services and serve social welfare. Regularly, it propagates the Buddhist doctrine at its office and outside, for example, at schools, in prisons, and around the country. Dharmic lectures and discussion are held at its office from 2 P.M. to 4:30 P.M. every Saturday and at some radio stations occasionally. Since 1934, it has organized a writing contest on Visakha Day and rewarded the winners. It opened a free clinic in its office building in 1975 to render services to monks, novices, and members from 2 P.M. to 5 P.M. on Sunday.

As to its international role beginning in 1950, the Buddhist Association of Thailand has published many Buddhist books in English, for distribution within Thailand and abroad, especially the Visakha Puja, the annual Buddhist text for the Visakha Celebration. The text is widely popular for its contents, which include Buddhist teaching, art, and literature. Apart from this, the Buddhist Association of Thailand also joins the World Fellowship of Buddhists Headquarters in hosting the WFB General Conference whenever the conference is held in Thailand.

There are now approximately 4,000 members registered at the main office of the Buddhist Association of Thailand, though the number of members in all of its seventy branches throughout the country is unknown.

Address:

Buddhist Association of Thailand
41 Phra Arthit Rd.
Bangkok 10200
Thailand

Pataraporn Sirikanchana

Source:

Buddhist Association of Thailand under Royal Patronage. The Yearbook of Activities. Bangkok: Suvanna-bhumi Printing, 1999.

A monk walks by the Grand Palace in Bangkok, Thailand. (A. Tovy/TRIP)

Buddhist Association of the Republic of China

The Buddhist Association of the Republic of China (BAROC) is not a religious denomination but an association that claims to represent all Chinese Buddhists. BAROC had sought after 1947 to rebuild in Taiwan an association that had been previously set up in China by the reformist monk Tai Hsu (1890–1947) in 1927, even though only a fraction of the original clergy could move to Taipei along with the Kuomintang (KMT) government in 1949. Tai Hsu, and later on his disciple Yin Shun (b. 1906), advocated a humanistic or this-worldly Buddhism that stresses the importance of the laity and of charitable activities in the propagation of the Buddhist way, the Dharma.

Although a few reformers subscribing to the ideas of Tai Hsu initially controlled BAROC, more traditionalist figures opposed to his innovations led the association after 1957. This clergy upholds a theologically conservative view in Chinese Mahayana Buddhism orthodoxy that is in tune with the Confucian tradition of deference to the secular leader. As a result of this, BAROC's leaders have designed their association in such a way that it has long served as a channel of transmission for the government. The association has been expected to communicate to members of the Sangha (order of monks and nuns) and lay devotees instructions from the KMT, and was in return expected to aggregate the concerns of the whole Buddhist community and express them to the ruling party.

Until 1989, the KMT granted the association the exclusive right to represent Buddhists in Taiwan, but this privilege was lost with the passing of the Law on Civic Organizations that year. As a result of this development, very few Buddhists in Taiwan now take seriously the assertion that BAROC represents them. Taiwanese Buddhists initially accepted the claims of BAROC because of the circumstances that prevailed in Taiwan when the KMT took control of the island: The monks who came from the continent in 1947 were then the only individuals with some measure of prestige among Buddhists. After 1989, however, other organizations could ordain monks and nuns, thus depriving the association of its monopoly on ordination, the only effective instrument with which it could control the sangha.

The BAROC also suffers from the fact that its leadership does not reflect the current dynamic of Taiwanese Buddhism, which embraces the reforms proposed by Tai Hsu. In particular, the leadership of the BAROC is under the control of ecclesiastics, even though the dynamism and the influence of the religion on the island are increasingly a function of lay people's activism. Two other characteristics of the BAROC leadership are also at odds with current trends in Taiwanese Buddhism. Firstly, men continue to govern BAROC, despite the fact that women significantly outnumber men among Taiwanese Buddhists. Secondly, the leadership of the association remains the preserve of people from the Chinese mainland, even though a majority of Buddhists in Taiwan, like most other inhabitants of the island, do not identify with China. As a response to its diminution of standing, BAROC has tried in vain during the mid-1990s to pressure the government into passing legislation that would help it reassert its authority over Taiwanese Buddhists, despite almost unanimous opposition from most other Buddhist organizations.

Address:

Buddhist Association of the Republic of China
6, North Shao-hsing St.
Taipei
Taiwan
<http://www.baroc.org.tw> (in Chinese)

André Laliberté

Sources:

- Jones, Charles Brewer. Buddhism in Taiwan: Religion and the State, 1660–1990. Honolulu: University of Hawai'i Press, 1999.
- Laliberté, André. The Politics of Buddhist Organizations in Taiwan, 1989–1997. Ph.D. dissertation, University of British Columbia, 1999.

The Buddhist Compassion Relief Tzu Chi Association

Founded in 1966 in the impoverished county of Hualien on the east coast of Taiwan, the Buddhist Compassion Relief Tzu Chi Association has grown to become the largest Taiwanese Buddhist organization in the Republic of China (ROC). Its founder and leader, a native Taiwanese woman known as Dharma Master Cheng Yen, is one of the most prominent public figures on the island. Tzu Chi is officially registered as a charitable foundation and a lay organization, but it is in fact a religious organization under the authority of its charismatic leader. Its activities in the provision of relief and free health care to poor people and vocational education for nurses, along with its campaign for a bone marrow registry, have made it the largest organization of its kind in Taiwan.

Cheng Yen, now in her sixties, originally established Tzu Chi to perform a mission of helping the poor and educating the rich, and the members of the organization enthusiastically perform their charitable activities because they believe it brings them spiritual merit. The enthusiasm of Tzu Chi members for charity work is not limited to the ROC. The provision of international relief started in 1991, when the American branch of Tzu Chi in Los Angeles helped victims of a cyclone in Bangladesh. In 2000, many people outside of the overseas Chinese communities of North America, Europe, and Asia have joined the association and are active in their own neighborhoods.

In 1966, Cheng Yen established her foundation with only five disciples and thirty followers. Today, Tzu Chi has an es-estimated membership of over four million people in Taiwan and abroad. Its core monastic community comprises only 110 nuns and is vastly outnumbered by the few thousand active lay members of the organization. The prestige of Cheng Yen and the success of her organization dramatically illustrate the ascendancy of humanistic or this-worldly Buddhism in Taiwan. This approach, developed by Tai Hsu (1890–1947) in China and later on by his disciple Yin Shun (b. 1906) in Taiwan, emphasizes the importance of the laity and charitable activities in the propagation of the Dharma. Although the members of Tzu Chi follow the precepts of Chinese Mahayana Buddhism, there is a distinctly Taiwanese dimension to the teachings of Cheng Yen, which are often transmitted in Minnanhua, the local language, rather than in Mandarin. Cheng Yen's theology does not rely on original scriptures, and can be summed up as a series of aphorisms that emphasize the performance of good deeds.

Another important distinguishing feature of Tzu Chi is the seemingly matriarchal nature of the organization. Because of a Buddhist practice that allows nuns to initiate only women, Cheng Yen's following within the small monastic community she leads is exclusively female. Indeed, the prevalence of women in Tzu Chi is not limited to the monastic community, but extends to the whole of the lay organization. Despite this reliance on lay women, the functioning of Tzu Chi rests entirely on the authority of Cheng Yen, whose decisions are not questioned. Her awe-inspiring authority is sustained by devotion to her within the organization and admiration from members of the Taiwanese media, who dub her the Mother Teresa of Taiwan. Despite this prestige, however, the lifestyle of Cheng Yen is modest, and the simplicity of the architecture in Tzu Chi's headquarters and its various branches contrast markedly with the opulence of the temples and shrines of other religious organizations in Taiwan.

Address:

Buddhist Compassion Relief Tzu Chi Association
21, Kang Leh Village
Shin Cherng Shiang
Hualien County
Taiwan
<http://www.tzuchi.org.tw> (in Chinese and English)

André Laliberté

Sources:

Jones, Charles Brewer. Buddhism in Taiwan: Religion and the State, 1660–1990. Honolulu: University of Hawai'i Press, 1999.
Laliberté, André. The Politics of Buddhist Organizations in Taiwan, 1989–1997. Ph.D. dissertation, University of British Columbia, 1999.

Buddhist Institute (Cambodia)

The Buddhist Institute was founded in 1930 as part of a reorganization of the Royal Library established in 1921. Coordinated by librarian Suzanne Karpelès, the institute was the first research and publications center in Cambodia, with branches established in Laos and Cochinchina (in southern Vietnam, locus of a large ethnic Khmer community). Together with the School of Higher Pali Studies established in 1922, it was initiated by the French in part to sever an educational, cultural, and political dependence, by monks in particular, on Siam (Thailand) and as a means to promote an Indochinese identity. The institute incorporated the Tripitika Commission, established in 1929 to translate the Pali canon into Khmer, a vast oeuvre (110 volumes) completed in 1969. Its general editor, Ven. Chuon Nath, the reformer of Buddhism in Cambodia, also produced the first Khmer dictionary, published by the institute, in 1934.

The institute took over Cambodia's first literary periodical, Kambuja Suriya (Sun of Cambodia), a monthly published since 1926 at the Royal Library. In 1934, a Mores and Customs Commission was established with the help of Eveline Porée Maspéro to collect ethnographic and literary materials, and by 1938 it published a seven-volume Collection of Cambodian Tales and Legends. On a political level, intellectuals associated with the institute (Pach Chhoeun, Sim Var, Son Ngoc Thanh) created a moderate nationalist movement in the mid-1930s with the publication of Nagaravatta, the first Khmer-language newspaper. After the July 1942 monks' "umbrella" demonstration calling for the release of an incarcerated monk, Hem Chieu, the French authorities banned the paper.

By the 1970s, the institute's library, with its 40,000 titles and collection of ethnographic materials, was the largest of its kind in the country. The 1975 Communist revolution ended work at the institute until its formal reappearance in 1992, together with its parent Ministry of Cults and Religious Affairs. Although plagued by the loss of qualified personnel, the semi-autonomous institute has received Japanese and German assistance to reprint books, rebuild the library, and gradually reestablish its previous structure, if not stature. Kambuja Suriya resumed publication as a quarterly in 1994, and a more spacious Japan-financed building was opened in 1998.

Address:

Buddhist Institute
P.O. Box 1047
Phnom Penh
Kingdom of Cambodia

Peter Gyallay-Pap

Sources:

Centers of Buddhist Studies in Cambodia. Phnom Penh: Buddhist Institute, 1963.
Karpelès, Suzanne. "The Revival of Buddhism in Cambodia and Laos." Jayanti, I, 7 (1955).

Loeschman, Heike. "Re-establishing the Buddhist Institute."
Cambodia Report (Phnom Penh) II, 2 (March–April 1996).

Buddhist Missionary Society Malaysia

The Buddhist Missionary Society (BMS), with headquarters at the Buddhist Maha Vihara, a Sinhalese Buddhist Temple, in Brickfields, Kuala Lumpur, Malaysia, was registered on April 3, 1962. In 1996, following an amendment to its constitution to allow it to establish branches, its name was changed to Buddhist Missionary Society Malaysia (BMSM). It has now two branches in Malaysia. The founder of BMSM is the Venerable Dr. K. Sri Dhammananda Maha Nayaka Thera (b. 1919), a Sri Lankan monk who came to Malaysia in 1952 as a Buddhist missionary. The most senior Theravada monk in Malaysia today, Dhammananda is a prolific writer with over 50 books on Buddhism to his credit.

The objectives of BMSM are as follows: (1) to study and promote Buddhism and Buddhist culture; (2) to encourage, foster, and develop the qualities of Truth and Compassion, and to cultivate religious harmony and understanding in the practice of Buddhism; (3) to print Buddhist literature; (4) to provide proper guidance in practicing the Buddhist way of life; and (5) to render spiritual solace, guidance, and advice to Buddhists in case of sickness or death.

The official organ of the society is its biannual journal, Voice of Buddhism, which first appeared in 1963. However, BMSM is well known for the millions of Buddhist pamphlets written by Dhammananda that it has distributed free to different parts of the world. Many of the titles are now translated into various foreign languages.

With regard to temple activities and projects, BMSM organizes on an annual basis the Wesak Celebrations, All-Night Chanting, the Buddhist Novitiate Program, and the Kathina ceremony. This is done jointly with the Sasana Abhiwurdhi Wardhana Society (SAWS), which manages the Buddhist Maha Vihara. Other activities held at the temple include the New Full and Full Moon services, Dharma talks on Friday evenings, and Sunday morning service and talks.

The society established the Endowment Fund in 1996 to assist needy students, the physically handicapped, and victims of natural disaster. In 1997, a similar Scholarship and Loans Fund was set up. The BMSM, together with SAWS and the Malaysian Buddhist Association, is represented in the Malaysian Consultative Council of Buddhism, Christianity, Hinduism, and Sikhism (MCCBCHS). This forum was formed in 1983 to promote interreligious harmony in Malaysia.

The BMSM began with 27 members in 1962. As of January 1, 2001, its membership had grown to more than 10,000 members all over the world.

Address:

Buddhist Missionary Society Malaysia
c/o Buddhist Maha Vihara
123 Jalan Berhala
Brickfields, Off Jalan Tun Sambanthan
50470 Kuala Lumpur
Malaysia
<http://www.bmsm.org.my>

Benny Liow Woon Khin

Sources:

- Liow, Benny. K. Sri Dhammananda Felicitation: Essays in Honour of His Eightieth Birthday, Petaling Jaya: Buddhist Gem Fellowship, 1999.
- Liow, Benny, ed. Pictorial Retrospect of K. Sri Dhammananda. Petaling Jaya: Buddhist Gem Fellowship, 1997.
- Voice of Buddhism*. Kuala Lumpur: Buddhist Missionary Society, biannually, 1963–present.

The Buddhist Society

The Buddhist Society is the oldest existing Buddhist institution in the United Kingdom, having been founded in 1924 by Christmas Humphreys (1901–1983). His interest in Buddhism drew him to the THEOSOPHICAL SOCIETY and the work of Helena P. Blavatsky. His conviction that Buddhism was "the noblest and least defiled of the many branches of an Ancient Wisdom Religion" led him to set up a Buddhist Lodge within the Theosophical Society. An earlier Buddhist Society of Great Britain and Ireland (1907–1926) had consisted primarily of scholars. However, with the growth of the Buddhist Lodge the emphasis shifted, and the beginnings of a community of practicing Buddhists in Britain emerged. The Lodge's "threefold object" stated that it was founded "to form a nucleus of such persons as wished to study, disseminate and attempt to live the fundamental principles of Buddhism." In 1925 the Society opened a public shrine room at Lancaster Gate. However in 1926, due to certain philosophical differences, the Buddhist Lodge parted company with the Theosophical Society, and in 1943 the Buddhist Society of today came into being. Over the following years the society was housed in various London locations, finally settling at 58 Eccleston Square in London in 1956. Organizationally it is structured around a council of twelve members, a general secretary, and two vice presidents.

The Buddhist Society is a lay organization, and being nonsectarian in nature, it aims to "publish and make known the principles of Buddhism and to encourage the practice of those principles." In its early years it did have a stronger connection with the Theravada school and with the monk, Anagarika Dharmapala (1864–1933). However, with a rise in interest in the Mahayana, the society became increasingly inclusive. Consequently, today classes and courses are offerred in Rinzaï Zen, Theravada, Tibetan Gelugpa, and Pure Land Buddhism, as well as a general introduction to Buddhism. Various teachers from these traditions, both ordained and lay, are invited to give classes. Other activities include special study and practice days, retreats, an annual summer course, and occasional major study courses on topics such as Indian Mahayana, and Chinese Buddhism. A correspondence course covering the fundamental principles of Buddhism, including characteristics of the major schools and an outline of its history, is also available.

Current membership stands today at around 2,000, though many of these people may also be members of other Buddhist groups. Its publishing activities, however, including a magazine called The Middle Way (issued thrice annually) and the Buddhist Directory, have meant that many people worldwide have come into contact with the society. The recent growth of Buddhism in the United Kingdom has meant that the society is no longer in a position to represent all schools and traditions. Its position of nonalignment with any one tradition or school means that the society does not have its own distinctive religious practices or texts. Rather it draws in and makes available teachers from various traditions and groups to teach both practice and doctrine as part of an eclectic program. Members do usually however align themselves with one or another of these traditions. For further details regarding the practices and sacred literature of the traditions presented within the Buddhist Society, please refer directly to the entries on the various traditions in this encyclopedia.

Address:

Buddhist Society
58 Eccleston Sq.
London SW1V 1PH
United Kingdom
<http://www.buddsoc.org.uk/>

Jamie Cresswell

Sources:

Biddulph, D., ed. The Middle Way. London: Buddhist Society, 1943–2000.
Buddhism in Britain. Vols.1–17. London: The Buddhist Lodge, 1926–1943.
Humphreys, Christmas. Sixty Years of Buddhism, 1907–1967: A History and Survey. London: Buddhist Society London, 1968.
Oliver, Ian P. Buddhism in Britain. London: Rider, 1979.

Builders of the Adytum

The Builders of the Adytum (BOTA) is a mystery school in the Western esoteric tradition and the major representative of the initiatory magical current originated by the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn (HOGD), a new magical group founded in England in the 1880s. The HOGD developed a membership throughout the English-speaking world before it fell apart early in the twentieth century. Paul Foster Case (1884–1954) was an American initiate of the HOGD. Several years after the disintegration of the HOGD, in 1922, Case founded BOTA as a school of practical occultism.

Like the HOGD, BOTA emphasizes the Christian Qabalah (or kabbalah) as it had been appropriated from Jewish mysticism in the sixteenth century. The Qabalah presents a system for understanding the universe grasped through numbers and letters. According to this system, the cosmos emanated from God as ten realms (called sephirot) that are connected to each other by twenty-two paths. These are pictured in a diagram called the Tree of Life, which is seen as a representation of both the outer visible world and the inner psychological world of each person. During the magical revival in France in the nineteenth century, the twenty-two paths of the Qabalah were identified with the twenty-two trump cards of the tarot. The basic work of the BOTA consists of introducing its members to the mystical workings of the Qabalah and tarot. The symbols of the tarot are believed to speak directly to the universal structure of the human soul.

The practical occultism of BOTA leads to an affirmation of the oneness of God, the brotherhood of man, and the kinship of all life. The order has posed as its objective the promotion of the welfare of humanity, as exemplified in its seven-part program of working for (1) Universal Peace; (2) Universal Political Freedom; (3) Universal Religious Freedom; (4) Universal Education; (5) Universal Health; (6) Universal Prosperity; and (7) Universal Spiritual Unfoldment. It is believed that work with the tarot and Qabalah will bring with it individual spiritual enlightenment and that the transformed person will be better able to influence the larger social environment.

BOTA is an outer school, behind which stands an inner mystery school that offers instructions for those members who wish to participate. Members may relate to BOTA either as individuals or through joining a group (a pronaos). After initiation in a pronaos, the member may participate in BOTA group rituals.

BOTA is headed by a Board of Stewards and the Procurator General, the primary link between the outer order and the inner school (which exists only in the invisible magical realms). BOTA was largely confined to Southern California until the mid-1970s, but in the last quarter of the twentieth century, groups were founded in most of the states of the United States and also in Canada, Great Britain, the Netherlands, New Zealand, Colombia, and Aruba.

Address:

Builders of the Adytum
5105 N. Figueroa
Los Angeles, CA 90042
<http://www.bota.org>

Sources:

- Case, Paul Foster. The Tarot. Richmond, VA: Macoy Publishing Company, 1947.
- . The True and Invisible Rosicrucian Order. Self-published, 1928.
- Frazer, Feliz J. Parallel Paths to the Unseen World. Los Angeles: Builders of the Adytum, 1967.

Bulgaria

Bulgaria was settled by Slavic peoples as early as the seventh century B.C.E. They found the area occupied by Traco-Illyrian people, some of whom were displaced and others absorbed into the new dominant Slavic community.

In the wake of the coming of Attila and his Huns into the region, the Bulgars, a non-European people known for their warlike character, settled in north of the Black Sea (fifth century C.E.). Several centuries later they were forced into present-day Bulgaria by the Kazars. The Byzantine emperor recognized their existence as an autonomous state in 681. Once established in the area between the Byzantines to the south and the Magyars (Hungarians) to the north, they adopted the Slavic language and eventually Christianity. The Bulgarian king was baptized in 870.

The borders of Bulgaria changed frequently. It expanded greatly in the tenth century during King Simeon's rule (893–927), reaching across the Balkans to the Adriatic. In 1014 the kingdom was incorporated into the Byzantine Empire. During the tenth-century expansion, Simeon's armies captured the Macedonian territory, which had become the home of a new Gnostic religious movement, the Bogomils, followers of a peasant named Bogomil. He taught a dualism similar to Manicheanism, which viewed the world as a battleground for the struggle between a good deity, who had created the heavens, and an evil one, who had created the earth. Leadership of the Bogomils was vested in an ascetic celibate priesthood. The movement spread through Bulgaria and on to Constantinople. Though frequently the target of persecution, the movement survived as a popular form of religious life until the Muslim invasion and capture of Bulgaria by the Ottoman Turks in 1393. Bulgaria remained a part of the Ottoman lands through the empire's decline in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries. Then in 1810 and again in 1823, Russian invaded, but did not stay.

Status of religions in Bulgaria, 2000-2050

Followers	2000			2025	2050
	total	%	rate
Christians	6,664,000	81.0	-0.10	5,888,000	4,749,000
Orthodox	5,886,000	71.6	-0.99	5,030,000	3,935,000
Independents	580,000	7.1	23.73	620,000	550,000
Protestants	95,000	1.2	1.73	115,000	125,000
Muslims	977,000	11.9	-0.39	850,000	720,000
Nonreligious	413,000	5.0	-4.18	200,000	150,000
Atheists	167,000	2.0	-6.60	80,000	50,000
Jews	3,900	0.1	-0.72	3,800	3,000
Baha'is	660	0.0	-0.05	1,000	1,300
Total population	8,225,000	100.0	-0.58	7,023,000	5,673,000

A spirit of independence emerged strongly in the nineteenth century, and Bulgarians aligned with the Russians in their ongoing battles with the Turks. In 1878, the Berlin Congress carved out a semi-independent Bulgarian state. A constitutional monarchy was installed, with a grandson of the Czar as the ruler. The state continued to change boundaries in the series of Balkan wars that occurred over the next generation. Bulgaria aligned with Germany in both World Wars. It was invaded by the Soviet Union in 1944. After the war the country aligned with the Soviet Union. As the Soviet Union was falling apart, in 1989–1990, the Marxist hold on Bulgaria also gave way to a new democratic government, which began a new relationship with the rest of Europe.

Christianity had entered what is now Bulgaria by the second century. As Christianity emerged to dominance in the Mediterranean Basin, both Roman and Greek missionaries established churches. Their almost equal strength was demonstrated in the ninth century when King Boris (828–907) (a Bulgar) first accepted baptism from the Greeks, then became a Roman Catholic, and still later returned to the Greek church, which in 870 named a Bulgar priest the archbishop of Bulgaria. Subsequently, priests were sent to Constantinople (Istanbul) for training. In 889, Boris abdicated in favor of his son Vladimir, who tried to reestablish Paganism and was deposed in 893 in favor of his brother, Simeon (r. 893–927). As part of building his empire, Simeon supported the establishment of a Bulgarian patriarchy independent of Constantinople. Thus the BULGARIAN ORTHODOX CHURCH came into existence.

When Bulgaria fell to Byzantium in 1186, the patriarchate was suppressed. It reappeared briefly in 1235 but was again suppressed during the days of the Ottoman Empire, when it was again made subordinate to the patriarch in Constantinople. It only reappeared in 1870, and it was not reconciled to the ECUMENICAL PATRIARCHATE until 1945. During the early twentieth century, the church claimed the allegiance of 85 percent of the Bulgarian people. It suffered greatly during and after World War II, and only began to recover after the fall of Marxism in 1990.

Non-Chalcedonian Orthodoxy is represented in Bulgaria by the ARMENIAN APOSTOLIC CHURCH, which originated with the movement of Armenians into Bulgaria as early as the fifth century, though the first church does not appear to have been built until the middle of the eleventh century. Through the centuries the Armenians have been able not only to remain, but to resist assimilation.

The ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH continued their presence in Bulgaria even after the country's alignment with Greek Orthodoxy. Missionaries came with the Crusaders, and priests of various orders arrived at different times. In the seventeenth century FRANCISCANS arrived in numbers and had the greatest success, most present Catholics being descendants of people converted during this period. In 1758 a vicariate was established in Sofia. The Diocese of Nicopoli was erected in 1789.

In the 1870s, Rome accepted a group of Orthodox believers who were allowed to keep their Bulgarian Orthodox rite. The Eastern Rite Bulgarians, now numbering around 7,000, constitute one of the small Eastern Rite enclaves in the Roman church.

The Roman church suffered the most damage under the post-World War II Marxist government. It lost all of its institutions, and most of its buildings. All foreign religious leadership were expelled in 1948. The bishop of Nicopoli was executed in 1952, and for several decades the church existed without episcopal leadership. Only in the 1970s was a new bishop consecrated.

Islam entered the country in force in 1393. Although there was no attempt to force conversion on the people, it is believed that many of the Bogomils and some Roman Catholics were among the converts. There are also many Gypsies who profess Islam. Through the years of Ottoman control, many Turks settled in Bulgaria. They created a large Muslim community, primarily in the eastern part of the country. This community numbered more than 500,000 in the mid-1960s. The Turks lived in somewhat segregated communities, and in 1989 there was a marked attempt to assimilate them into the larger society. They resisted, and the Bulgarian government moved to suppress their demonstrations with force. In June 1989 they began deporting the Turkish Bulgarians to Turkey. Over the summer some 300,000 were forced out, at which point Turkey closed its borders. The situation led to a demand by the Muslims for religious freedom, a demand now seen as one of the first steps in the downfall of the Marxist government.

The Bulgarian Muslims are primarily of the HANAFITE SCHOOL OF ISLAM. The community is headed by its Grand Mufti.

Meanwhile, in the 1850s, missionaries from the AMERICAN BOARD OF COMMISSIONERS FOR FOREIGN MISSIONS established a small mission in Bulgaria. Colleagues from the Methodist Episcopal Church (now a constituent part of the UNITED METHODIST CHURCH) followed the next year. However, the larger Protestant enterprise originated from Russia. Russian Baptists came in 1865, Seventh-day Adventists in 1891, and Pentecostals in 1921. The Pentecostals, though dividing into the Pentecostal Evangelical Church and the Free Pentecostal Church, became the largest element in the Protestant/FREE CHURCHES community.

The Jewish community in Bulgaria appeared in the second century C.E. As World War II began, there were some 50,000 members of the community, but in the decade after the war the great majority migrated to Israel. Today only about 6,500 remain. They are organized through the Central Jewish Religious Council and Synagogue in Sofia. The associated Organization of the Jews in Bulgaria operates a Jewish museum, publishing house, and resource center, also in Sofia. The Sofia Synagogue, which resembles the famous Sephardic house of prayer in Vienna, was opened in 1909.

In the wake of changes at the beginning of the 1990s, a number of both Eastern and Western religious groups have appeared in Bulgaria, beginning with an indigenous Bulgarian esoteric group, the WHITE BROTHERHOOD, which was able to revive. There is a spectrum of Hindu groups and several of the new religions, including THE FAMILY/CHILDREN OF GOD and the UNIFICATION MOVEMENT. The CHURCH OF JESUS CHRIST OF LATTER-DAY SAINTS established work that led to the creation of the Bulgaria Sofia Mission in 1990. The REORGANIZED CHURCH OF JESUS CHRIST OF LATTER DAY SAINTS also has a following.

A host of Christian Evangelical groups have begun missionary activity, among the most important being the Campus Crusade for Christ, the Greater Europe Mission and SEND International. The very conservative WISCONSIN EVANGELICAL LUTHERAN SYNOD began a mission in 1992. The sudden emergence of so many unfamiliar groups in Bulgaria in the 1990s has presented a new challenge to a country with little experience with the radical religious pluralism that has become the common life of most of the world's countries in the twentieth century.

There is no council of churches in Bulgaria, and no church headquartered in the country is a member of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES. However, Evangelical groups have formed the Bulgarian Evangelical Alliance, which cooperates with the WORLD EVANGELICAL ALLIANCE. The Evangelical Congregational Churches in Bulgaria, the outgrowth of the American Board mission, is a member of the WORLD ALLIANCE OF REFORMED CHURCHES.

Sources:

Mojzes, P. B. "A History of the Congregational and Methodist Churches in Bulgaria and Yugoslavia." Ph.D. dissertation, Boston University, 1965.

Oschlies, W. Kirchen und religiöses Leben in Bulgarien. Cologne: Bundesinstitut für Ostwissenschaftliche und Internationale Studien, 1983.

Stoyanov, P. Churches and Religions in the People's Republic of Bulgaria. Sofia: Synodical Publishing House, 1975.

Bulgarian Catholic Church

The Bulgarian Catholic Church is an Eastern Rite church, originally composed of members of the BULGARIAN ORTHODOX CHURCH who converted to Roman Catholicism in the 1850s. As had occurred elsewhere, the ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH (which had had a Latin Rite presence in the country for many centuries) allowed this group to keep a revised version of their Orthodox liturgy in Old Slavonic when the church was established in 1859.

As part of the process of founding the new church, Joseph Sokolsky was consecrated the first Bulgarian Catholic prelate in 1859. Unfortunately, soon afterward, he was abducted by the Russians and interned for the next eighteen years. Throughout the nineteenth century, the Bulgarian Orthodox had sought various means of freeing themselves from the control of the ECUMENICAL PATRIARCHATE in Istanbul. Then in 1870, the Turkish sultan finally allowed the Bulgarians to establish themselves independently of the patriarchate. This break occurred as the Bulgarian Catholic Church reached its peak at the beginning of the 1870s, when it counted some 80,000 faithful. Following the reestablishment of an independent Bulgarian Orthodox Church, 60,000 members of the Bulgarian Catholic Church left the fold and returned to Orthodoxy.

The number of members of the Bulgarian Catholic Church dwindled to around 7,000 in the 1970s. It has revived in the 1990s and now reports approximately 15,000 members. The church is headed by its Apostolic Exarch, who resides in Sofia.

Sources:

Roberson, Ronald G. The Eastern Christian Churches—A Brief Survey. 5th ed. Rome: Edizioni Orientalia Christiana, Pontificio Istituto Orientale, 1995.

Bulgarian Orthodox Church

Christianity came to Bulgaria as early as the second century C.E. Through the next centuries the area became a battleground in which Roman Catholicism and Eastern Orthodoxy vied for control, with the latter, due in large part to the proximity of Constantinople, the eventual victor. In 870, the orientation of Bulgaria toward the East was solidified when King Boris convinced Constantinople to appoint a Bulgar as archbishop of Bulgaria. Boris retired in 889 to become a monk. His son Simeon (r. 893–927) actively pursued the substitution of Slavonic for Greek in the church's liturgy (utilizing the translation by the Greek missionaries Methodius and Constantine). He also pushed the Bulgarian bishops to declare their autonomy, in spite of the opposition of the ECUMENICAL PATRIARCHATE in Constantinople.

In 1018, the Bulgarian kingdom fell to Byzantine forces, and the new authorities suppressed the Bulgarian Patriarchate. It was reestablished in 1235. But then in 1396 Bulgaria fell under the domination of the Ottoman Empire. After the fall of Constantinople, the Bulgarian Church once again came under the control of the Ecumenical Patriarchate in Constantinople. Only in 1870 did the Turkish authorities allow the Bulgarians again to set up independently. Then two years later, the Greek Orthodox authorities excommunicated the Bulgarians. Only in 1945 did the Bulgarian Orthodox Church reconcile with the Ecumenical Patriarchate. A new patriarch was elected and enthroned in 1953.

Unfortunately, by the time that it had the Ecumenical Patriarchate's approval, the country had fallen under the control of a Marxist government, with its antireligious perspective. All the monasteries were appropriated by the new government, though they were returned in 1953 after the church made a formal statement of allegiance to the new government. It is estimated that the church went from counting the adherence of 85 percent of the population to around 25 percent by the mid-1960s. Through the years to the overthrow of the Marxist government at the beginning of the 1990s, the church received financial support from the government, but only at a survival level. The two theological seminaries, Tcherepich Seminary and the Sofia Theological Seminary, were allowed to remain open.

Through the twentieth century, Orthodox church members became part of the diaspora that brought many Eastern Europeans to Western Europe and North America. Congregations began to appear soon after the beginning of the twentieth century. A diocese was created in America in 1937. In 1974, the American diocese incorporated separately as the Bulgarian Eastern Orthodox Diocese of the U.S.A., Canada, and Australia, and announced that it could no longer accept direction from the patriarchate in Sofia. The split was partially healed in 1962, when the patriarch recognized the independent jurisdiction. That reconciliation led to a schism within the American church and the formation of an anti-Communist Bulgarian Orthodox Church (Diocese of North and South America), which has not yet reconciled to the parent church. There is also a diocese for Western and Central Europe, now headquartered in Germany.

In 1998, the Bulgarian Orthodox Church claimed that its twelve dioceses held the loyalty of more than 85 percent of the people, though other estimates are considerably lower. The church is led by its patriarch, currently His Holiness Patriarch Maxim. The church supports the Theological Seminary St. John of Rila in Sofia.

Amid complaints of a lack of ecumenical openness, in 1998 the church withdrew from the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES in protest of its dominance by Protestants and its concentration on a set of liberal theological issues such as the status and role of women, liturgical reform, and sexuality.

Address:

Bulgarian Orthodox Church
 Oboriste 4
 090 Sofia
 Bulgaria
<http://www.aster.net:8080/ort.church.bg/> (in Bulgarian)
<http://www.bulch.tripod.com/boc/contentsen.htm> (in English)

Sources:

Raikin, S. T. "Nationalism and the Bulgarian Orthodox Church." In Religion and Nationalism in Soviet and East European Politics, edited by P. Ramet. Durham, NC: Duke University Press, 1989.

Slijepcevic, D. Die bulgarische orthodoxe Kirche, 1944–1956. Munich: R. Oldenburg, 1957.

Burkina Faso

Burkina Faso is a country of more than nine million people in central Africa, north of the Ivory Coast, Ghana, and Togo. More than sixty distinct peoples reside in the country, though the Mossi people established themselves as dominant in the eleventh century. Through its leadership in and organization of the various peoples, this group was able to fend off attempts by different African neighboring kingdoms to expand into its territory. It was not as successful in stopping invasion by the French in the years between 1895 through 1904. French forces burned villages, slaughtered livestock, and killed thousands of individuals. Their harsh rule was challenged in 1916, but the insurrection looking to throw off French control was violently repressed.

In 1919, Upper Volta, as it was called at the time, was incorporated into the colony of Upper Senegal-Niger. Its colonial status went through several changes prior to the area being granted freedom in 1960. A series of government coups followed. Thomas Sankara was brought to power by such a coup in 1983. The next year he changed the name from Upper Volta to Burkina Faso. In 1991, a new democratic constitution was adopted, and some stability appears to have been brought to the country.

Burkina Faso has been one of the more resistant areas of the world to both Muslim and Christian proselytization, understandable given the violent nature of its interactions with both its Muslim neighbors to the north and with Europeans in the twentieth century. Each of the different peoples has its own language and its own religion, though the different indigenous faiths have some similarities with each other. Among the more famous of the groups are the Dogon people (see DOGON RELIGION), whose traditional land reaches into neighboring Mali.

Islam entered the area in the eighteenth century, and toward the end of the century a mosque was built and an imam installed in Ouagadougou, the country's present capital. Islam spread successfully among some peoples, such as the Fulani, Masina, Sia, Songhai, Udalan, Wala, and Zerma. In 1962, the Muslim Community, a national organization, was founded. Most Muslims follow the Sunni MALIKITE SCHOOL, but there is a significant presence by the TIJĀNIYYA SUFI ORDER and QADARIYYA SUFI ORDER. The AHMADIYYA MOVEMENT IN ISLAM is also active in the capital.

Christianity appears to have been established in Upper Volta only in 1901, when the WHITE FATHERS opened a mission at Ouagadougou. From the center of the country the work reached out to various peoples, and in spite of the nature of the French domination of the country, steadily expanded. The vicariate of Ouagadougou was erected in 1921. The next year, an indigenous religious order, the Black Sisters of the Immaculate Conception, was formed. Ouagadougou became an archdiocese in 1955.

The ASSEMBLIES OF GOD (AOG) pioneered Protestant/FREE CHURCH presence in Upper Volta. AOG missionaries settled in the capital in 1921. In 1933 they opened a Bible school and began turning out numerous educated lay workers. The CHRISTIAN AND MISSIONARY ALLIANCE began work in Dioulasso in 1923, and joined their strength to the AOG in translating the Bible into the indigenous languages.

The first indigenous church was an independent congregation in the capital city, Temple Apostolic. Over the last half of the twentieth century several other independent groups emerged, and a number came in from neighboring countries. Very conservative Evangelical churches have

Bissio, Roberto Remo, et al. Third World Guide 93/94. Montevideo, Uruguay: Instituto del Tercer Mundo, 1992.

Flavien, T. I. Églises et mouvements évangéliques au Burkina Faso. Burkina Faso: Ouagadougou, 1990.

Kouanda, A. "L'état de la recherche sur l'Islam au Burkina." Islam et Sociétés du Sud du Sahara 2 (1988): 94-105.

Burma

See Myanmar

Burundi

Burundi, one of the poorer countries of the world, is located in central Africa between the northeast shore of Lake Tanganyika and Rwanda. Like its neighbor to the north, it was originally settled by the Hutu and Twa peoples and then overrun by the Tutsi (or Watusi) people in the fifteenth century. Much of the history of Burundi has been written in the continuing ethnic struggle between the conqueror and the conquered, the same struggle that has had such disastrous results in Rwanda. The Tutsi held sway until the late nineteenth century when Germany moved into the area and established the colony of Rwanda-Urundi. Following World War I, Belgium took over from Germany, divided Burundi from Rwanda and merged it into the Congo. Under the Belgian system, Tutsi, though a minority, were placed in all the local governing positions.

Burundi gained its independence in 1963. Following four years of instability, a Tutsi prime minister staged a coup, and as president purged the government of Hutu officials. In 1971, still during the rule of the Tutsi Michael Micombero (r. 1966-1976), more than 350,000 Hutu were killed and an additional 70,000 fled the country. Jean-Baptiste Bagaza (r. 1976-1987), supported by the Hutu majority, succeeded Micombero. More recent decades have been marked by attempts to hold democratic elections and several coups; the most recent saw President Sylvestre Ntibantunganya replaced in 1996 by the current president, Pierre Buyoya, who has the backing of the Tutsi majority, which controls the government, army, and security forces. During most of the 1990s, the country was involved in a civil war.

The original religions of the several groups that constitute Burundian society have survived, to some extent

Status of religions in Burkina Faso, 2000-2050

Followers	2000			2025	2050
	total	%	rate
Muslims	5,796,000	48.6	2.85	12,370,000	19,741,000
Ethnoreligionists	4,070,000	34.1	2.49	6,005,000	6,572,000
Christians	1,988,000	16.7	3.21	4,760,000	8,768,000
Roman Catholics	1,129,000	9.5	3.06	2,600,000	4,800,000
Protestants	799,000	6.7	3.43	2,000,000	3,700,000
Independents	54,000	0.5	3.31	150,000	250,000
Nonreligious	78,700	0.7	4.64	180,000	400,000
Baha'is	2,800	0.0	4.39	5,000	8,000
other religionists	550	0.0	3.29	1,000	1,700
Total population	11,937,000	100.0	2.80	23,321,000	35,491,000

dominated the Christian community in Upper Volta, and they created the country's primary Christian cooperative association, the Federation of Evangelical Churches and Missions in the Upper Volta, in 1961. The federation is associated with the Association of Evangelicals of Africa and Madagascar and the WORLD EVANGELICAL ALLIANCE. Burkina Faso is one of the few countries of Africa that does not have a church in the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES, though the Association des Églises évangéliques réformées du Burkina Faso, an indigenous church formed in 1977, is a member of the WORLD ALLIANCE OF REFORMED CHURCHES.

In the relatively free religious environment created by the country's constitution, Burkina Faso has become home to different global religious groups such as the BAHÁ'Í FAITH, the JEHOVAH'S WITNESSES, and the ANCIENT AND MYSTICAL ORDER OF THE ROSAE CRUCIS.

Sources:

Barrett, David. The Encyclopedia of World Christianity. 2d edition. New York: Oxford University Press, 2001.

among the Hutu, but especially among the Twa. Prior to 1966, the country was ruled by a king who was assisted by a set of priests (called ganwa), and the overthrow of the king did not help the survival of traditional religion. Among the Twa, the Creator is known as Imana. A popular form of the traditional religion that originated in Rwanda is focused on a hero figure known as Kiranga. The Kiranga religion is a semisecret group with a hierarchical organization. Followers are known as Abana b'Imana (children of Imana). Kiranga, who is seen as an intermediary, is assigned the ability to facilitate or stop a person's access to Imana.

The original attempt to establish a Christian mission in Burundi was launched in 1879 by the WHITE FATHERS. Two years later, two priests were killed, and no further efforts were made to evangelize the land until 1899. By this time Burundi had come under German control. When the Belgians took over, they forced the closure of the German missions, and French priests began to flow into the area. In 1922 the ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH in the area was formed into a vicariate apostolic. Suddenly, in 1930, the number of adherents began to grow rapidly, and by 1937 almost a half million new members had been added. The present University of Bujumbura was originally founded as a Catholic institution by priests from the Society of Jesus (JESUITS).

The first African bishop (a Tutsi) was appointed in 1959. The church has been deeply affected by the intertribal warfare that erupted into violence in 1972–1973. Eighteen priests were killed in massacres that took 100,000 lives. Most of the Hutu intelligentsia were killed, including a number of Catholic medical workers. The church has tended to favor the Tutsi elite, and during the early 1980s it opposed a number of reforms instituted by then president Bagaza that attempted to end discrimination against the Hutu. Bagaza forced a number of missionaries from the country and confiscated church property. The government and church were not reconciled until 1989, at which time the church's former property was returned.

Protestantism entered the country in 1907 when German Lutherans opened a mission, but they were soon forced out by the Belgians. Since Belgian Protestants were unable to

Status of religions in Burundi, 2000-2050

Followers	2000			2025	2050
	total	%	rate
Christians	6,138,000	91.7	2.21	10,851,000	14,770,000
Roman Catholics	3,828,000	57.2	1.81	6,600,000	8,500,000
Protestants	800,000	12.0	3.27	1,600,000	2,400,000
Anglicans	500,000	7.5	3.63	1,000,000	1,500,000
Ethnoreligionists	450,000	6.7	0.23	500,000	400,000
Muslims	92,300	1.4	2.51	190,000	350,000
Hindus	5,600	0.1	1.18	10,000	17,500
Baha'is	5,400	0.1	3.07	10,000	20,000
Nonreligious	3,800	0.1	1.84	8,000	14,000
Total population	6,695,000	100.0	2.07	11,569,000	15,571,000

take over from their German colleagues, Danish Baptists established work in 1928. In the meantime SEVENTH-DAY ADVENTIST missionaries had found their way into the country (then a part of the Congo). During the 1930s, a variety of Protestant and FREE CHURCHES bodies established missions, including the Kansas Yearly Meeting of Friends (now the EVANGELICAL FRIENDS INTERNATIONAL) (1932), the FREE METHODIST CHURCH OF NORTH AMERICA (1935), the Swedish Free Mission (1935), and the CHRISTIAN BROTHERS (1938). The Swedish Free Mission, a Pentecostal body now known as the Églises de Pentecoste, has become the second largest church in the country. Three American churches with a Wesleyan Holiness background, the Churches of Christ in Christian Union, the Congregational Methodist Church and the Evangelical Methodist Church, supply support to the Église Évangélique Mondiale.

The CHURCH OF ENGLAND also entered the country in 1934 with the arrival of CHURCH MISSIONARY SOCIETY missionaries and was greatly assisted by a religious revival that swept through East Africa right at the time they were setting up work. The mission founded a variety of medical facilities and a teacher training school, Warner Theological College. The first African bishop was named in 1965, and the following year Burundi became a diocese in the Church of the Province of Uganda, Rwanda, and Burundi. As the work grew, Uganda was separated and the Congo (Zaire) added. More recently, Burundi was established as a separate province. The CHURCH OF THE PROVINCE OF BURUNDI, now the third largest religious group in the country, is a member of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES.

The KIMBANGUIST CHURCH, which entered in 1965 from the Congo (then Zaire), was the first of the African Initiated Churches to gain a significant following. Three years earlier, there had been a schism from the Anglican church in southern Burundi, but the Église de Dieu au Burundi, as the new church was called, lost most of its members when it was officially suppressed in 1965. Even earlier there was a schism from the Friends church, but it soon died out.

Approximately two-thirds of Burundi's 5,500,000 citizens are Christian, the majority being Roman Catholics. Many of the Protestant churches are united in the National Council of Churches of Burundi, which in turn is affiliated with the World Council of Churches. The majority of the remaining population follow traditional African faiths. There are about 50,000 Muslims. Most of the African Muslims are Sunnis who follow the MALIKITE SCHOOL OF ISLAM. There is a minority of Asians who follow Ismaili and SHI'A ISLAM and a few BOHRAS (members of the SHIAH FATIMI ISMAILI TAYYIBI DAWOODI BOHRA). Most Muslims live in western Burundi near Lake Tanganyika.

Sources:

- Barrett, David. The Encyclopedia of World Christianity. 2d edition. New York: Oxford University Press, 2001.
- Bikangaga, J. The Church of Uganda, Rwanda, and Burundi: Survey on Administration and Finance of the Church in Uganda. Kampala, Uganda: Uganda Bookshop, 1969.
- Bissio, Roberto Remo, et al. Third World Guide 93/94. Montevideo, Uruguay: Instituto del Tercer Mundo, 1992.
- Hohensee, D. Church Growth in Burundi. South Pasadena, CA: William Carey Library, 1978.
- Perraudin, J. Naissance d'une église: histoire du Burundi Chrétien. Usumbura, Burundi: Presses Lavigerie, 1963.

Bwiti

One of the largest new religious movements in Gabon, in western equatorial Africa, is the syncretistic and ethnically based Bwiti movement, also known as Église de Bwiti (Church of the Initiates) and the Eboga religion, after the bitter hallucinogenic root known as eboga, which is used ritually in all-night vigils. Found among the southern Fang people, Bwiti is a group of several religious movements named after a traditional initiation society. It is essentially a revitalization of ancient Fang ancestor rites, a movement originating at the end of the nineteenth century and persecuted by colonial and Catholic authorities alike. By 1945 it had incorporated some Christian (especially Catholic) elements, and the religion is constantly changing. The Gabon government legalized it in 1970 on an equal footing with Christianity and Islam.

Bwiti members meet all night with traditional music and dance, have an elaborate mythology, and use traditional narcotic drugs to acquire religious power and encourage communication with the ancestors. The Bwiti savior, identified with Christ, is called Nzambia-Pongo, and is at the heart of initiation and other rituals, as is the eboga drug. In these vigils, traditional music on a sacred harp and dancing led by the Nganga, who represents Christ, together with the consumption of eboga, prepare initiates, known as banzie (angels), to fly away to another world, where they achieve a state of "one-heartedness" and are reunited with the ancestors and the Mother of God.

In 1983 a Catechism of the Bwiti Religion was publicly displayed. The movement spawned a united organization called the Association of Eboga Members, founded by Ovono Dibenga Louis-Marie in 1984. By 2000, the movement was thought to have some 60,000 members in Gabon and Equatorial Guinea, perhaps 20 percent of the Fang people. There is a related initiation movement known as Mbiri (named after spirit beings known collectively as imbwiri), which also is found among the southern Fang, uses eboga in rituals, and is primarily a healing and antisorcery cult seeking direct communication with the ancestors.

The headquarters of the Bwiti movement is in Libreville, Gabon.

Allan H. Anderson

Sources:

- Fernandez, James W. Bwiti. Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1982.
- Stanislaw Swiderski. "L'Ombwiri société d'initiation et de guérison au Gabon." Studi e Materiali di Storia della Religione (Rome) 1, 40–41 (1971): 125–204.
- . La Religion Bwiti, Tome 1: Histoire. Ottawa: Editions de l'Université d'Ottawa, 1990.

Byakkō Shinkō Kai

Byakkō Shinkō Kai is a Japanese new religion founded by Goi Masahisa (1916–1980) in 1951. As a teacher of SEICHONO-IE, Goi devoted himself to others who were suffering, but he gradually doubted the practice and teachings of the religion, and then he broke away from it. After various spiritual experiences he received a special message from God, "May Peace Prevail on Earth," and founded his own religious movement. According to Goi's teachings, words and thoughts are waves vibrating at different frequencies, and peace prayer vibrating at the highest possible level has a purifying effect on people and the world. Byakkō Shinkō Kai emphasizes prayer for world peace and teaches that human beings derive from the universal Kami (Deity) and that everyone has Shugorei (guardian spirits) and Shugoshin (guardian deities). The prayer for world peace is as follows:

May peace prevail on earth
 May peace be in our homes and countries
 May our missions be accomplished
 We thank thee, Guardian Deities and Guardian Spirits.

Following Goi's death in 1980, his adopted daughter Saionji Masami became the spiritual leader. It is believed that Goi sends spiritual messages to the Earth using Saionji as a medium. Byakkō Shinkō Kai adherents distribute stickers and erect Peace Poles and have conducted world peace prayer ceremonies in such cities as Los Angeles and Assisi.

As the new century began, Byakkō Shinkō Kai claimed some five hundred thousand members. Although the great majority of members reside in Japan, some have joined the Japanese diaspora and may now be found in the United States, South America, and Europe.

Address:

Byakkō Shinkō Kai
 5-26-27 Kokubunn
 Ichikawa-shi, Chiba prefecture
 Japan 272
<http://www.byakko.or.jp> (in Japanese)

Keishin Inaba

Sources:

- Numata, Kenya. "Shinshūkyō ni okeru Charisma to Shamanism: Byakkō Shinkō Kai wo chūshin tosite." Bunkajinruigaku vol. 6 (1989).
- Reader, Ian. "The Rise of a Japanese 'New New Religion.'" Japanese Journal of Religious Studies 15, 4 (1988): 253-261.

Cambodia

Located in mainland Southeast Asia, the Kingdom of Cambodia (Kampuchea in Khmer, Kambuja in early Khmer) in 2000 had a population of 11.6 million people, of whom 90 percent were Theravada Buddhist. Indigenous/highland peoples constituted approximately 5 percent of the population, followed by Muslim Chams with 500,000 adherents and some 60,000 Christians. The country is 85 percent ethnic Khmer.

The indigenous belief system of the Khmers was challenged, principally through court circles, where many adopted Brahmanism and Indian social customs and mores during, in particular, India's Gupta period (second to seventh centuries C.E.). Pockets of Buddhism were also evident. A Hindu-Mahayana Buddhist cosmology reached its apogee during the so-called classical period of Cambodian (and Southeast Asian) history, between the ninth and fourteenth centuries. The Khmer rulers of the Angkor Empire claimed, as adherents of the *deva-raj*a, or god-king cult, to be incarnations of Siva, Vishnu, or in some cases, future Buddhas (bodhisattvas) ruling as Buddha-raj

The current Sinhalese-rooted, Pali-language Theravada Buddhism came to Cambodia via Siam in the twelfth and thirteenth centuries from its foothold among Talaing (Mon) monks in southern Burma. Along with Islam in the southern, insular reaches of Southeast Asia, this older, Council of Elders (= Theravada) form of Buddhism spread on the mainland as a popularly based religious movement. If the Hindu-Mahayana Buddhist tradition of Angkor was court-centered and based on a priestly class, Theravada Buddhism was village-based and monastic, with monks identifying with and catering to the needs of the people, their service being seen as a means of gaining merit. It was not until the mid-fourteenth century that the Khmer court formally adopted Theravada Buddhism. The Angkor Empire, under siege by Siamese forces, succumbed in 1432,

Status of religions in Cambodia, 2000-2050

Followers	2000			2025	2050
	total	%	rate
Buddhists	9,462,000	84.7	2.65	13,989,000	17,272,000
Chinese folk-religionists	524,000	4.7	2.49	750,000	900,000
Ethnoreligionists	485,000	4.4	1.22	600,000	650,000
Nonreligious	263,000	2.4	2.79	470,000	800,000
Muslims	259,000	2.3	2.61	420,000	600,000
Christians	119,000	1.1	5.09	231,000	358,000
Independents	74,700	0.7	5.80	140,000	220,000
Roman Catholics	22,000	0.2	3.90	45,000	65,000
Protestants	21,500	0.2	4.02	45,000	70,000
Neoreligionists	34,600	0.3	-0.39	36,000	40,000
Hindus	28,700	0.3	3.68	60,000	120,000
Atheists	27,400	0.3	0.91	30,000	35,000
Baha'is	12,900	0.1	1.58	15,000	25,000
Total population	11,168,000	100.0	2.58	16,526,000	20,700,000

after which remnants of the Hindu-Mahayana Buddhist belief system died out.

The politically unstable post-Angkor period, which lasted until the onset of the French protectorate in 1863, was marked by territorial encroachments from Theravada Buddhist Siam and Sinitic Vietnam and attempted introductions of Christianity by Spanish and Portuguese missionaries and traders in the sixteenth and early seventeenth centuries; as well as by an interlude of Islamic rule in the mid-seventeenth century. Islamic traders from the Malay Archipelago and refugees from Champa, conquered by Vietnam, form the basis of Cambodia's Muslim community today. The indirect rule of the French, which lasted until 1953, coincided with a Buddhist revival, spurred in part by a largely passive resistance to the European presence. Monks succeeded in thwarting French attempts to replace the Buddhist education system. But influenced in part by the Dhammayutikaya reform sect initiated by Siam's Western-influenced King Mongkut IV in the 1850s, the Khmer Sangha (community of monks) in the capital replaced a mythopoeic approach to Buddhism with a more rational, scriptural approach after the turn of the century. The BUDDHIST INSTITUTE became the principal instrument for a print-based Buddhism.

A Buddhist monk at a temple in Phnom Bok, Cambodia, 1993 (Corel)

In the interest of Western-style "nation-building" following independence in 1953, the Buddhist sangha became marginalized and co-opted by a more secular, modernizing state. The monk-based educational system was replaced by secular instruction. Extreme forms of nationalism erupted following the overthrow of the monarchy in 1970; the millenarian Communist movement that overthrew the republic in 1975, the Khmer Rouge, was especially extremist and carried out a reign of terror, which included targeting all forms of religious expression. Of the 65,000 Buddhist monks and novices registered in 1969, when the country's population was seven million, very few (most estimates do not exceed 3 to 5 percent) survived the 1970s, and of those who did, many chose to emigrate to the West in the 1980s. A majority of the country's 3,369 wats (temple-monasteries) were destroyed in the 1970s.

Since the lifting of restrictions on Buddhist practice in 1988 by the Communist government installed by Vietnam in 1979, nearly all wats have been rebuilt, and villagers' sons have again been ordained. (The Vietnamese withdrew from Cambodia in 1989.) The number of monks increased from approximately 6,000 in 1988 to more than 51,000 in 3,685 wats in 2000. Freedom of religion was fully restored in 1993 following UN-sponsored elections, the formation of a new government under a new constitution, and the restoration of the monarchy. At the same time, the government-controlled sangha remained a weak institution and force in society in 2000, with the Buddhist revival propelled largely by tradition-bound villagers. Nonetheless, formal monastic education resumed in the early 1990s, and in 2000, there were 272 primary schools with more than 9,000 students and 8 secondary schools with 1,460 enrollees. Although the Buddhist university founded in 1954 reopened with preparatory classes in 1997, the first 30 monks formally began undergraduate studies only in 2000. Sri Lankan monks have assisted with Pali and Sanskrit studies in secondary and tertiary education in Phnom Penh, the capital.

The ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH had only four congregations and some 200 members by 1840. However, an apostolic prefecture was created in 1850, which was elevated to a vicariate in 1924. It functioned primarily among Vietnamese and French residing in Cambodia, and the first Khmer priest was not ordained until 1957. The Vietnamese Roman Catholics were among the first attacked following the change of government in 1970, and the church was decimated over the next five years. Protestant work began in 1923 when missionaries from the CHRISTIAN AND MISSIONARY ALLIANCE (CMA) began work in Phnom Penh, and that work led to the formation of the Église Évangélique Khmère. Missionaries were expelled in 1965 when the United States and Cambodia broke diplomatic relations, but returned in 1970. CMA efforts fared better during the 1970–1975 period, as its work was among Cambodians. The SEVENTH-DAY ADVENTIST CHURCH and the Anglicans also have congregations, the latter attached to the Anglican diocese in Singapore. Evangelical and apostolic Protestant missionary activity has increased rapidly since the 1990s.

Peter Gyallay-Pap

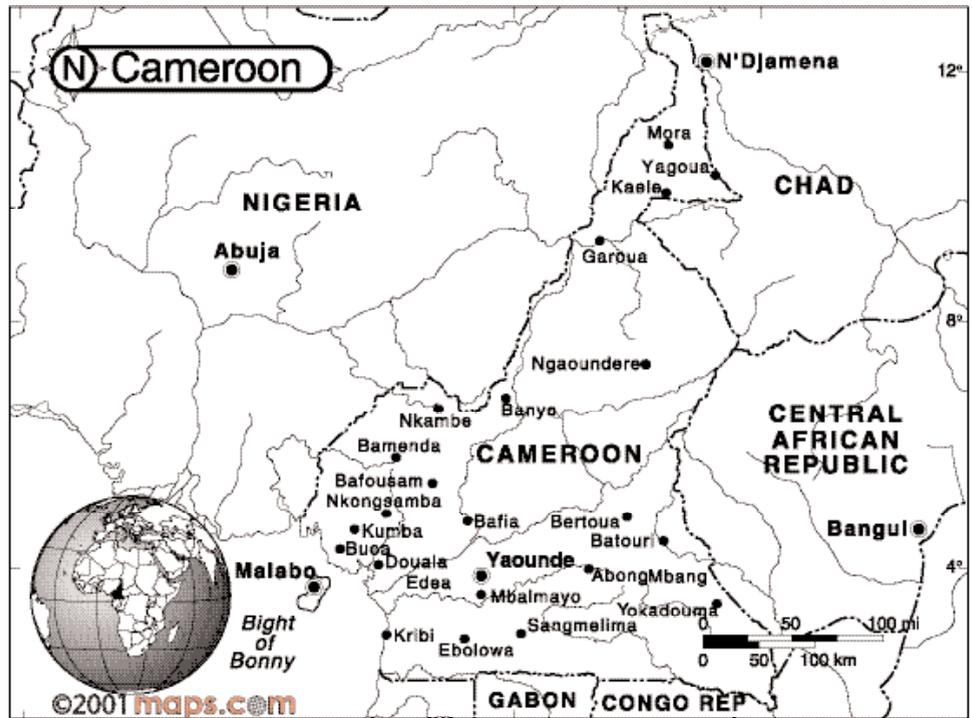

Sources:

Ebihara, May. "Interrelations between Buddhism and Social Systems in Cambodian Buddhist Peasant Culture." In Anthropological Studies in Theravada Buddhism, edited by Manning Nash. New Haven: Yale University Southeast Asia Studies, 1996.

Harris, Ian. "Buddhism in Extremis: The Case of Cambodia." In Buddhism and Politics in Twentieth-Century Asia, edited by Ian Harris. London and New York: Pinter, 1999.

Leclère, Adhémar. Le Bouddhisme au Cambodge. Paris: E. Leroux, 1899. Reprint, New York: AMS Press, 1975. English translation by Renata von Scheliha in Human Relations Area Files (New Haven, Connecticut, 1970), microfiche AM1, Indochina: 148.

Cameroon

Cameroon was the original home of the Bantu peoples (now found throughout sub-Saharan Africa), and more than a hundred of the groups now found in the country are part of the larger Bantu culture. Other important groups include the Fulani in the north and the Baka Pygmy people in the southeast.

The Portuguese arrived in 1429, but significant European penetration of the country awaited the coming of the Germans in 1884. At that time there existed in the interior the Emirate of Adamaua, established a century earlier when the Muslim Fulani moved into the region from Nigeria. European powers recognized German hegemony in the coastal region but not until 1894 did the British relinquish their claim over the emirate. Then in the mid-1890s the Germans attempted to exercise their power in the region, and a war ensued (1897–1901). German takeover of the more fertile regions led to widespread hunger and resultant deaths among the Cameroon peoples.

France and England took control of parts of Cameroon as a result of World War I. Movements for independence, which became prominent following World War II, led to the establishment of an independent nation in 1960. At that time, Alhaji Ahmadou Ahidjo (a Muslim) emerged as the president and strongman and retained power until 1982. His successor, Paul Biya (a Christian), continued Ahidjo's repressive policies while dropping many of Ahidjo's colleagues from the government. In 1992, Biya allowed more open elections, and opposition parties proved in the majority, though Biya was reelected as president. He continues in office with powers to override the legislature.

Status of religions in Cameroon, 2000-2050

Followers	2000			2025	2050
	total	%	rate
Christians	8,174,000	54.2	3.07	16,043,000	25,649,000
Roman Catholics	3,989,000	26.5	2.99	7,600,000	12,398,000
Protestants	3,120,000	20.7	3.84	6,500,000	9,500,000
Independents	590,000	3.9	3.96	1,400,000	3,000,000
Ethnoreligionists	3,582,000	23.7	2.11	4,000,000	2,195,000
Muslims	3,202,000	21.2	2.78	6,123,000	9,000,000
Baha'is	64,300	0.4	2.96	150,000	150,000
Nonreligious	45,800	0.3	3.99	140,000	250,000
Atheists	14,200	0.1	2.61	22,000	35,000
other religionists	3,200	0.0	4.24	6,000	11,000
Total population	15,085,000	100.0	2.78	26,484,000	37,290,000

Traditional religions continue to be practiced by around one-fifth of the Cameroon people; several groups such as the Bugudum and Duru have been unresponsive to either Christianity or Islam. Among the religious functionaries noted in traditional Cameroon societies is the blacksmith, who not only engages in iron smelting but in divining the future. As in traditional religions in other African lands, magic forms a significant aspect of the belief systems. The tension between traditional religions and the more dominant Christianity and Islam is reflected in the legal system, where specific provisions exist against the practice of witchcraft (malevolent ritual or magic). Indications are that no moves are made against the practice of magic unless it is accompanied by the commission of otherwise illegal acts.

Islam, of the Sunni MALIKITE SCHOOL, was introduced into Cameroon from Nigeria and Mali with the migration of the Fulani people in the eighteenth century. The several Fulani fiefdoms evolved into the Emirate of Adamaua, which was headquartered in what is now Nigeria. In Cameroon, the religious and secular authority was united in the persons known as lamidos.

In the nineteenth century, the Fulani leadership began to push the local population to convert to Islam. Many who refused to convert moved to the mountainous region in order to continue their traditional religious practices. They had particular success among the Bamum and Shoa people.

Besides the Sunnis, there are several Sufi brotherhoods that are active in Cameroon, the most prominent being the QADIRIYYA and the TIJANIYYA. The BAHAI FAITH began to grow in the 1960s and now has almost two hundred spiritual assemblies.

Christianity was introduced into Cameroon in 1841 when missionaries from Jamaica representing the Baptist Missionary Society (UK) arrived. In 1884, owing to the new German hegemony, the work was transferred to the control of the BASEL MISSION. Some who did not like the changes wrought by the Basel Mission separated and sought help from German and German-American BAPTISTS, who in 1898 organized the Mission Society of the German Baptists. Meanwhile a third group separated from mission control altogether. The Baptist missionaries were expelled during World War I. The work of both missions in what became French territory was ceded to the PARIS MISSION after World War I, but the work remained separate, and both eventually matured (1957) as separated organizations, the EVANGELICAL CHURCH OF CAMEROON (by far the largest Protestant Church in Cameroon) and the UNION OF BAPTIST CHURCHES OF CAMEROON. Meanwhile, the work in the British West Cameroon eventually fell into the hands of missionaries representing the North American Baptist General Conference, a German-American organization. In 1954 that work reorganized as the CAMEROON BAPTIST CONVENTION.

Presbyterians entered the country from the United States in 1879 and began what became a French-speaking church, now known as the PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH OF CAMEROON. The Basel Mission began in 1884, and its mission became what is now an English-speaking church whose congregations are primarily in the western part of the country. Both the French-speaking church and the English-speaking church became autonomous churches in 1957.

There are also two Lutheran churches in Cameroon, and the SEVENTH-DAY ADVENTIST CHURCH has built a respectable presence. Pentecostals are present, but no one church has pushed out ahead. Possibly the APOSTOLIC CHURCH (from the United Kingdom) has been as successful as any. Independent churches began with separations of Baptists from missionary authority in 1864 and 1888 that led to the NATIVE BAPTIST CHURCH OF CAMEROON and of the Presbyterians in 1934 that led to the formation of the AFRICAN PROTESTANT CHURCH. More recently, a variety of AFRICAN INITIATED CHURCHES have appeared, most, such as the CHERUBIM AND SERAPHIM, having come to Cameroon from neighboring Nigeria.

Members of the Society of the Catholic Apostolate (an order founded by St. Vincent Pallotti in 1835 in Italy and popularly known as the Pallotines) initiated the work of the ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH in Cameroon in 1890. The work grew slowly until the 1930s, when something like a mass movement into the church began. It grew particularly strong in the area around the capital, Yaoundé. The church pushed into the north after World War II, but has encountered stiff resistance in that predominantly Muslim area. It has gone on to become the largest Christian body in the country. In the 1980s it began a self-conscious effort to build an indigenous priesthood and hierarchy.

The WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES (WCC) is represented in the Federation of Protestant Churches and Missions in the Cameroon, which includes WCC member churches such as the Evangelical Church of Cameroon, the Native Baptist Church of Cameroon, the African Protestant Church, and both the PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH IN CAMEROON and the Presbyterian Church of Cameroon.

Apart from the ANCIENT AND MYSTICAL ORDER ROSAE CRUCIS, which has chapters in most French-speaking countries, there are few Western Esoteric or Eastern religions that have a presence in Cameroon. The UNIFICATION CHURCH has opened an office of its International Relief Friendship Foundation to work among the poor. There is one center each of the INTERNATIONAL SOCIETY FOR KRISHNA CONSCIOUSNESS and of SAHAJA YOGA.

Sources:

- Kwast, Lloyd E. The Discipling of West Cameroon: A Study of Baptist Growth. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans, 1971.
- Mveng, E., and J. Messina. Album of the Century, 1890–1990: The Catholic Church in Cameroon. Cameroon: Privately printed, 1990.
- Nyansako-ni-Nku, ed. Journey of Faith: The Story of the Presbyterian Church in Cameroon. Yaoundé, Cameroon: Buma Kor, 1982.
- Okafor, G. M. Christians and Muslims in Cameroon. Würzburg, Germany: Echter, 1994.

Cameroon Baptist Convention

BAPTISTS in Cameroon were greatly affected by the changing European interventions in the region. Work begun in the nineteenth century by British Baptists was turned over to the BASEL MISSION in the 1880s. The Germans were asked to leave during World War I and the land divided between the British and French. In British West Cameroon the mission was under the leadership of German Americans associated with what is now known as the North American Baptist Conference. Over the next decades, the American missionaries expanded the mission and founded a variety of institutions, including two hospitals, two colleges and other schools, and a center for the treatment of Hansen's disease. The steps toward the independence of the mission began with the formation of the Cameroon Baptist Convention in 1954.

In the mid-1990s, the Cameroon Baptist Convention reported some 65,000 members, making it the largest of the several Baptist groups currently operating in the country. It supports the Baptist Bible Training Center at Ndu, and is a member of the BAPTIST WORLD ALLIANCE.

Address:

Cameroon Baptist Convention
P.O. Box 1
Bamenda-Mezam, Northwest Province
Cameroon

Sources:

Kwast, Lloyd E. The Discipling of West Cameroon: A Study of Baptist Growth. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans, 1971.
Wardin, Albert W., ed. Baptists around the World. Nashville, TN: Broadman and Holman Publishers, 1995.

Canada

Canada is the second largest country in the world and now home to all major world religions and many new religious movements. In 1900 almost 99 percent of the population identified in one way or another with a Christian body. That number is now down to about 80 percent, and, based on social trends, David Barrett predicts that percentage will fall to 63 percent by 2025.

Census reports from 1981 and 1991 reflect the relative decline of Christian faith in Canada. Of the six major Protestant groups, only Pentecostals experienced both numerical and percentage growth, from 338,790 (1.4 percent) in 1981 to 436,435 (1.6 percent) a decade later. The UNITED CHURCH OF CANADA, formed in 1925 and Canada's largest Protestant group, experienced a drop of 17 percent in total membership and over 4 percent of the national population. Anglicans, Presbyterians, Lutherans, and Baptists also lost ground in both numbers and percentage. The ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH, accounting for over 45 percent of the population, gained almost 1 million members in the ten-year period, but went down 1.3 percent, with a membership of just over 12 million.

Canada achieved nationhood in 1867. Before and since, the land's native peoples have faced enormous difficulty in maintaining social and cultural independence. As in the United States, the arrival of the European explorers in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries forever altered the religious and social identity of the Inuit and other native peoples. Over time, most natives adopted some form of identification with Christianity, though there is evidence that the rituals of particular Christian traditions are mixed with abiding native rites and practices.

Status of religions in Canada, 2000-2050

Followers	2000			2025	2050
	total	%	rate
Christians	24,762,000	79.5	0.91	28,864,000	31,020,000
Roman Catholics	13,018,000	41.8	1.06	15,500,000	16,800,000
Protestants	5,350,000	17.2	0.96	5,700,000	5,800,000
Independents	1,680,000	5.4	1.84	2,700,000	3,400,000
Nonreligious	3,391,000	10.9	2.21	4,850,000	6,360,000
Chinese folk-religionists	775,000	2.5	1.32	880,000	900,000
Atheists	531,000	1.7	2.37	650,000	698,000
Jews	403,000	1.3	1.42	460,000	460,000
Muslims	318,000	1.0	2.43	600,000	800,000
Hindus	295,000	1.0	2.75	550,000	720,000
Sikhs	294,000	0.9	2.04	450,000	500,000
Buddhists	251,000	0.8	3.39	420,000	600,000
Baha'is	31,400	0.1	1.15	50,000	75,000
Neoreligionists	31,300	0.1	7.64	31,000	48,000
Zoroastrians	24,900	0.1	2.75	40,000	60,000
Spiritists	10,900	0.0	1.39	15,000	20,000
Ethnoreligionists	8,600	0.0	-0.49	6,000	5,000
other religionists	19,800	0.1	2.17	30,000	45,000
Total population	31,147,000	100.0	1.15	37,896,000	42,311,000

St. Peter's Roman Catholic Cathedral in Muenster, Canada (Corel)

The first permanent European religious structures were Roman Catholic, coming with the establishment by the French of Arcadie (1603) in Nova Scotia and Québec (1608). In 1633 Charles I decreed that worship in Newfoundland, which England and France both laid claim to, should be according to the customs of the CHURCH OF ENGLAND, but France and Catholicism continued to dominate. In 1749 the British established the city of Halifax and brought in subjects, not only from the British Isles, but also from Hanover in Germany, who in turn brought a variety of Protestant churches, including Lutheran, Congregational, Reformed, and Presbyterian.

Baptists arrived in Nova Scotia in 1760, the Quakers in 1762, the Moravians in 1771, and the Methodists in 1775. The Quebec Act of 1774 provided a much greater level of toleration for the Catholics, who continued to grow, primarily in the Québec region. The Constitutional Act of 1791 divided Canada into Lower Canada (Québec), where most of the French lived, and Upper Canada (Ontario), where most of the English lived, and for both areas the government provided support for the structures and clergy of the Church of England, which, of course, gave the Anglicans an immediate advantage in determining the future shape of religious life in Canada.

Because of an early French ban on Jewish settlement, the Jewish population did not become established until around 1760, when Samuel Jacobs began Congregation Shearith Israel near Montreal, and Samuel Hart began a congregation in Three Rivers. In 1829 Jews received full recognition as a religious community (prior to the Jews in England). By 1860 there were 1,200 Jews. There are now about 350,000 Jews in Canada. The Nazi Holocaust has received significant attention in Canadian society through major legal cases brought against several people who denied the Holocaust.

In the 1800s there was a growing movement to unify Canada and make it semiautonomous. This shift meant rethinking government support of the Church of England. In 1853 all clergy land reserves were secularized, and the church was forced to develop an internal, self-supporting government that, as a missionary arm of the Church of England, it previously had not needed. In 1867 the various Canadian provinces were united into a single federation, and with the completion of the transcontinental railroad in 1885, the western lands were ready for settlement.

Increased ease of transportation helped Western Canada increase its ethnic and religious pluralism. Russian Mennonites arrived in 1874, Utah Latter-day Saints in 1887, and Orthodox Church members from Eastern Europe about the same time. The Orthodox now number over 400,000. Buddhism was introduced into British Columbia by the Chinese rail workers and gold seekers in the 1880s. The 1991 census shows about 160,000 Buddhists in Canada, similar to the number of Hindus.

The first Sikh gurdwara (worship center) was built in Vancouver in 1908. There are now over 225,000 Sikhs in the country. The Sikh community in Canada gained international attention in 1996 after violent clashes among Sikhs in British Columbia over whether chairs can be used in religious ceremonies. Muslims began entering Canada in the 1880s, mostly from Syria, followed after World War I by others from Albania and Yugoslavia and after World War II by Muslims from all over the globe, reaching over a quarter of a million, according to the 1991 census. They represent the full range of Sunni, Shi'a, Ismaili, and Sufi groupings.

The Christian Protestant fundamentalist-modernist conflict played itself out in Canada in the early decades of the twentieth century. The center of the storm revolved around T. T. Shields (1873–1955), the fiery and eloquent pastor of Toronto's Jarvis Street Baptist Church. Shields accused his fellow Convention Baptists of liberalism, targeting certain faculty at McMaster Divinity School. Shields eventually withdrew from the Baptist Convention of Ontario and Quebec. Canada duplicated American religious life in the growth of the Bible College movement in the late 1800s and early 1900s.

As with the United States and many other countries, Canada has seen a constant increase in the number of religious groups, either by the splintering of existing groups, or the intrusion from the outside of missionary agencies (Christian and otherwise), or the quieter proliferation of immigrant groups bringing their native beliefs along to their new home. David Barrett's Encyclopedia of World Christianity lists about 130 different Christian groups in Canada. Many of these groups belong either to the Canadian Council of Churches (formed in 1944 and generally aligned with the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES) or the Evangelical Fellowship of Canada (founded in 1964 and aligned with the WORLD EVANGELICAL ALLIANCE).

The multifaceted religious identity of Canada must not be overstated, however. According to the 1991 census, only 0.1 percent of the population identify with new religious movements, a fact that says something about the hysteria of the cult scare in the 1970s and 1980s. There has been little violence connected with new religious movements in Canada, though the majority of the members of the SOLAR TEMPLE (which lost some 70 members in Europe to the mass murder/suicides of 1994–1995) resided in Québec. The CHURCH OF SCIENTOLOGY headquarters in Toronto was raided by police in March 1983, leading to lengthy court battles between the province and the church.

The increasing diversity of religious groups in Canada has been both praised and scorned. William Closson James, a scholar at Queen's University in Kingston, Ontario, celebrates the fact that "the locations of the sacred are found to be everywhere and nowhere, multiple rather than single, fluid rather than fixed, ephemeral rather than permanent, or at the margins rather than the centre." Reginald Bibby, a sociologist at the University of Lethbridge in Alberta, has been sharply critical of what he calls an overstatement of the Canadian mosaic. He has argued that Canadian politicians and many academics ignore the simple fact that the vast majority of Canadians still claim allegiance to a Christian worldview.

The most significant increase in religious identity in the last census involves those who claim "no religious affiliation." Over 3 million Canadians chose this category, a jump of over 5 percent, to 12 percent of the population. Although the power of secularization has been overstated, there is no doubt that the grip of religion on Canada's identity has weakened in the last half century. This is especially true in Québec with the demise of the power of the Roman Catholic Church in the 1960s, a radical change that has made Québec society open to many new religious movements and to radical innovations in Catholicism.

James A. Beverley

Sources:

- Barrett, David. The Encyclopedia of World Christianity. 2d edition. New York: Oxford University Press, 2001.
- Beverley, James A., J. Gordon Melton, and Donald Wiebe, eds. The HarperCollins' Encyclopedia of Religions in Canada. Toronto: HarperCollins, 2002.
- Bibby, Reginald. Fragmented Gods. Toronto: Irwin, 1987.
- Grant, John Webster. The Church in the Canadian Era. Vancouver: Regent College Publishing, 1998.
- Hewitt, W. E., ed. The Sociology of Religion: A Canadian Focus. Toronto: Butterworths, 1993.
- Lyon, David, and Marguerite van Die, eds. Rethinking Church, State and Modernity. Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 2000.
- "Maclean's Special Report 'God Is Alive' (Angus Reid Poll)." Maclean's 12 (April 1993): 32–50.
- O'Toole, R. "Religion in Canada: Its Development and Contemporary Situation." Social Compass 43, 1 (1996): 119–134.

Canadian Baptist Ministries

Canadian Baptist Ministries (CBM) is a national body of over 130,000 Baptists formed by the amalgamation of Canadian Baptist Federation (CBF) and Canadian Baptist International Ministries (CBIM) in 1994. The member bodies are the Atlantic Convention of Baptist Churches, the Baptist Union of Ontario and Quebec, the Baptist Union of Western Canada, and the UNION D'ÉGLISES BAPTISTES FRANÇAISES AU CANADA. CBM provides an integrated vision of home and overseas mission.

The progenitor of CBIM was the Canadian Baptist Foreign Mission Board. Founded in 1911, the Canadian regional missionary societies and boards combined with their over one hundred missionaries overseas, about 25 percent of whom were single women missionaries who were supported by the Woman's Baptist Missionary Unions.

After World War II, the board had missionaries in India and Bolivia and added Angola in the 1960s. Responding quickly to the rising tide of nationalism in the Third World, the name was changed to the Canadian Baptist Overseas Mission Board and the approach changed to team ministries as Canadian Baptists worked with indigenous groups by assisting in theological education, agricultural work, pioneer team missions in new areas, Bible translation, and so on. Missionary service was for a specific term with clear objectives and with a commitment of resources and personnel from all participating groups. The name was again changed to Canadian Baptist International Ministries, allowing workers to go where missionaries were not traditionally welcomed. Short-term volunteer missionaries or workers also reshaped the pattern of how Canadian Baptists think of missions. CBM works with over sixty partners in twenty-nine countries.

The second part of CBM was the Baptist Federation of Canada (BFC), which was founded at Saint John, New Brunswick, on December 7, 1944. The objective of the organization was to create a new sense of Canadian Baptist identity and to contribute to the national, international, and ecumenical agendas with committees for social service, war services and rehabilitation, law, radio and publicity, evangelism, chaplaincy, finance, and world peace. It operated chiefly as a fellowship group, because the conventions and unions and the Mission Board were unwilling to give up power to a new central agency. For fifty years it coordinated some ministries and held triennial conferences across Canada.

BFC joined the BAPTIST WORLD ALLIANCE as a national body and became the official Baptist denomination within the newly created Canadian Council of Churches (CCC). It withdrew from the CCC in 1973. Through the Public Affairs Committee it spoke in the public arena and lobbied members of Parliament. Some of its most significant work was in the calling together of various interest groups from across Canada to discuss theological issues, social problems, and joint ministries.

The federation built on the long Baptist tradition of social action. Early in the century they ministered to immigrants, prisoners, and the poor. During the wars, they brought comfort to soldiers and their families and responded generously to refugee crises. The federation created The Sharing Way, through which Canadian Baptists contributed millions of dollars each year to caring and development ministries around the world. Its ministry overlapped with CBIM, and that overlap provided one reason for a new integrated organization in 1994. Canadian Baptists have also played a leading role in military, hospital, and prison chaplaincy ministries.

Address:

Canadian Baptist Ministries
7185 Millcreek Dr.
Mississauga, Ontario L5N 5R4
Canada
<http://www.cbmin.org>

Robert S. Wilson

Sources:

- Bentall, Shirley. From Sea to Sea: The Canadian Baptist Federation, 1944–1994. Mississauga, ON: Canadian Baptist Federation, 1994.
- Grant, John Webster. The Church in the Canadian Experience. Vancouver, BC: Regent College Publishing, 1998.
- Moody, Barry M., ed. Repent and Believe: The Baptist Experience in Maritime Canada. Hantsport, NS: Lancelot Press, 1980.
- Renfree, Harry A. Heritage and Horizon: The Baptist Story in Canada. Mississauga, ON: Canadian Baptist Federation, 1988.
- Zeman, Jarold Knox. Baptists in Canada: Search for Identity amidst Diversity. Burlington, ON: G. R. Welch, 1980.
- . Costly Vision: The Baptist Pilgrimage in Canada. Burlington, ON: G. R. Welch, 1988.

Canadian Yearly Meeting of the Religious Society of Friends

The Religious Society of Friends (Quakers) arose in mid-seventeenth-century England during the religious ferment of the Cromwellian Civil War. “Quaker” was a derisive name given to George Fox (1624–1691, the founder of the Society of Friends) by an examining judge whom Fox called upon “to tremble before the Lord.” The central message was that “Christ is come to teach His People himself” and that there is “that of God in every man and woman” that enables them to respond to God’s Inward Voice.

The Canadian Yearly Meeting (Assembly) is part of the worldwide Society of Friends through the FRIENDS WORLD COMMITTEE FOR CONSULTATION and holds membership in both the FRIENDS GENERAL CONFERENCE and the FRIENDS UNITED MEETING. Quakers have been in Canada for more than two hundred years. They arrived during the American War of Independence as refugees from the rebellious colonies and later from the British Isles and Europe. Canadian Yearly Meeting was founded in 1955 from the union of three nineteenth-century Yearly Meetings. The Yearly Meeting is held annually in different locations across Canada. There are twenty-four Meetings (congregations) and thirty-three Worship Groups across Canada from coast to coast. Membership remains constant at about 1,200, and there are many attendees.

Worship is held on the basis of silent waiting upon the Lord, which enables ministry to be given in a spirit of devotion by any worshipper present.

Canadian Yearly Meeting (CYM) has a summer camp for Young Friends situated on Georgian Bay (Lake Huron). The Canadian Friends Historical Association, founded in 1972, maintains the Quaker Archives at Pickering College, Newmarket, Ontario. As a founding member, CYM holds membership in the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES and in the Canadian Council of Churches.

The Canadian Friends Service Committee (CFSC), a committee of Canadian Yearly Meeting, witnesses in words and in action to the Testimonies of Friends: It witnesses to the Quaker Peace Testimony, through peace education and by international service and relief to victims of war and to the poor; it works for reconciliation and in justice and prison issues, in social and economic justice and aboriginal concerns, and currently in ecological questions (e.g., biodiversity and genetically manipulated seeds) at the CFSC Office in Ottawa. CFSC cooperates in the international affairs work of the Quaker International Programs at the United Nations in Geneva and New York.

Address:

Canadian Yearly Meeting of the Religious Society of Friends
91A Fourth Ave.
Ottawa, Ontario K1S 2L1
<http://www.quaker.ca>

Kathleen Hertzberg

Sources:

- Dorland, Arthur G. The Society of Friends in Canada: A History. Toronto: The Macmillan Company of Canada Limited, 1927.
- Grant, John W. The Church in the Canadian Era. Vol. 3. A History of the Christian Church in Canada. Toronto: McGraw-Hill Ryerson, 1972.
- Walsh, H. H. The Christian Church in Canada. Toronto: Ryerson Press, 1956.

Candomblé

Candomblé is rooted in the spiritual heritage of the at least 3 million African slaves who came to Brazil between the first half of the sixteenth and the end of the nineteenth century. It is the result of a process of cultural assimilation that took place under the pressure of a White-dominated society. In the course of this process the collective memory of the Black people was diluted, and their former tribal spirituality gave rise to a syncretism, which included elements of other religions, particularly Roman Catholicism and SPIRITISM.

Today, this form of worship appears in different geographical areas under varying designations. The term Candomblé refers originally to the Afro-Brazilian religiosity in the state of Bahia, but is also frequently used as a collective name for all Afro-Brazilian religiosity. In Pernambuco and Alagoas the word Xango is popular; people in Maranhão and the states of the Amazon area prefer Tambor de Mina, while in Rio Grande do Sul the word Butuque is applied. Macumba, a term coined in Rio de Janeiro outside of Afro-Brazilian circles, carries a pejorative undertone and is not appropriate to an unbiased academic approach.

It took some time until Afro-Brazilian religiosity gained an institutionalized form. Although the slaves on the isolated and enclosed fazendas suffered from considerable social control, urban slaves were normally more independent. As a consequence, in the second half of the nineteenth century, Afro-Brazilian places of worship (called terrenos) and their hierarchies were first established in the cities of the northeast. They became numerically even more significant after the abolition of slavery in 1888, when former slaves migrated to urban areas en masse.

Until the 1960s the affiliation with a terreno normally implied African ancestry. Thereafter, the social dynamics within the Brazilian society in general and its religious field in particular led to a change in the essential character of Afro-Brazilian religiosity. Freeing itself of the previous ethnic limitations of its doctrines and practices, Candomblé became an option for urban middle-class people searching for a religious alternative. This change also reflected the greater social mobility within Brazilian society. The shift in Candomblé's social base is reflected in the results of the 1994 Datafolha study, which showed that in 1994 51 percent of all Candomblé practitioners were White and 74 percent lived in large cities. Currently, there are efforts within Candomblé circles to re-Africanize their actual religious repertoire, but the effectiveness of these attempts cannot yet be evaluated.

Brazilian scholars treat Candomblé as one of the several "mediumistic religions"; UMBANDA also falls into that category. The 1991 census, which treated Candomblé and Umbanda as a statistical unit, counted 648,463 members, or 0.44 percent of the total population. According to the 1994 Datafolha study, about 1 percent of Brazil's adult population was associated with Candomblé and 1 percent with Umbanda. In striking contrast, the Federação Nacional de Tradição e Cultura Afro-Brasileira estimates that 70 million Brazilians participate in either Candomblé or Umbanda.

Frank Usarski

Sources:

- Bastide, Roger. The African Religions of Brazil. Baltimore, MD: Johns Hopkins Press, 1978.
- Hess, David J. Samba in the Night: Spiritism in Brazil. New York: Columbia University Press, 1994.
- Voeks, Robert A. Sacred Leaves of Candomblé: African Magic, Medicine, and Religion in Brazil. Austin: University of Texas Press, 1997.

Caodaiism

Caodaiism (also called Dao Cao Dai) is Vietnam's largest indigenous religion. Revealed in 1926, it is concentrated in the south of the nation. Doctrine describes the faith as a Dai Dao, or Great Way—a self-admittedly syncretistic system that unites all previous world faiths within a millennial framework understood by Caodaists as the third period of world religious development—hence its official name: Dai Dao Tam Ky Pho Do (Great Way, Third Period, Salvation). Caodaiism makes exceptional use of Daoist mediumistic techniques wedded to Western SPIRITISM introduced by the French. The Thanh Ngon (Compilation of Divine Messages), Tan Luat (New Canonical Code), Giao Ly (Book of Principal), and Phap Chanh Truyen (Religious Constitution), together with the prayers and rituals, were all either suggested or confirmed by séance. The administration of the religion is divided into three bodies: A college of mediums, Hiep Thien Dai, also acts as the judicial branch of the religion; an administrative hierarchy, Cuu Trung Dai, headed by a Giao Tong, or pope; and a heavenly organization, Bat Quai Dai, headed by the spirit of Li Po (the famous Daoist Chinese poet of the eighth century). The administrative section is divided at every level into male and female streams, allowing Caodaists to claim that their religion is not sexist.

The origins of the faith can be traced to the meeting in late 1925 of Ngo Van Chieu (1878–1932), a French-educated Vietnamese regional administrator who had been involved in Daoistic mediumship for many years, and a group of younger French-speaking Vietnamese clerks enthusiastic about European trends in Spiritism and séance. The latter group, which included Caodaiism's greatest charismatic leader, Pham Cong Tac (1890–1959), developed Caodaiism as a popular movement; this did not suit Chieu well, and he departed.

During the early years, the séance was used as a brilliant recruitment technique. This partly explains the initial rapid growth—up to five hundred thousand adherents in the first four years. Some Western commentators see this phenomenal rise as a reaction to French colonialism and world crises, while others speak of Caodaiism as a disguised political movement. The rapid growth of the faith also led to much sectarianism. From the followers of Ngo Van Chieu, the Chieu Minh, to those groups that broke from Pham Cong Tac's increasing control during the late 1930s (e.g., Ben Tre), Caodaiism's schisms have become numerous.

Very early on, séance messages drew the religion out of Saigon to Tay Ninh, ninety-odd kilometers to the northwest of the city where, over the next sixty years, a vast, autonomous community was established. The jewel of this area is the religion's Holy See, Toa Thanh, the most splendid religious complex in the region (Angkor excepted). Caodaist architecture is highly individual, and temples resemble small cathedrals with pagoda-like decorations. Inside, ritual focuses upon offerings of flowers (symbolizing the body), tea (the mind), and wine (the spirit) to the altar of Duc Cao Dai (literally, Venerable High Palace—a very mystical appellation). The Supreme Being is represented by a Great Eye (Thien Nhan). Adepts concentrate their vision on this eye to effect internal alchemical changes. Prayers are also said to a canon of deities that includes Kung Zi (Confucius), Lao Zi (Lao Tzu), the Buddha, Jesus Christ, and the novelist Victor Hugo.

Since 1975, Caodaiism, like other religions in Vietnam, has been subject to sometimes quite brutal repression by the Communists. Most activity today is centered in the West, with the most active communities located in North America and Australia. Current numbers are hard to pinpoint, but cautious estimates range between two and four million. The Vietnamese government has moved to suppress Cao Dai in its homeland, and in response many members have moved to other countries. A replica of the Vietnamese headquarters temple is in process of construction; the site is at 9980 Mission Boulevard in Riverside, California.

People gather to pray at the Caodai Great Temple in Tay Ninh, Vietnam. (T. Bognar/TRIP)

Address:

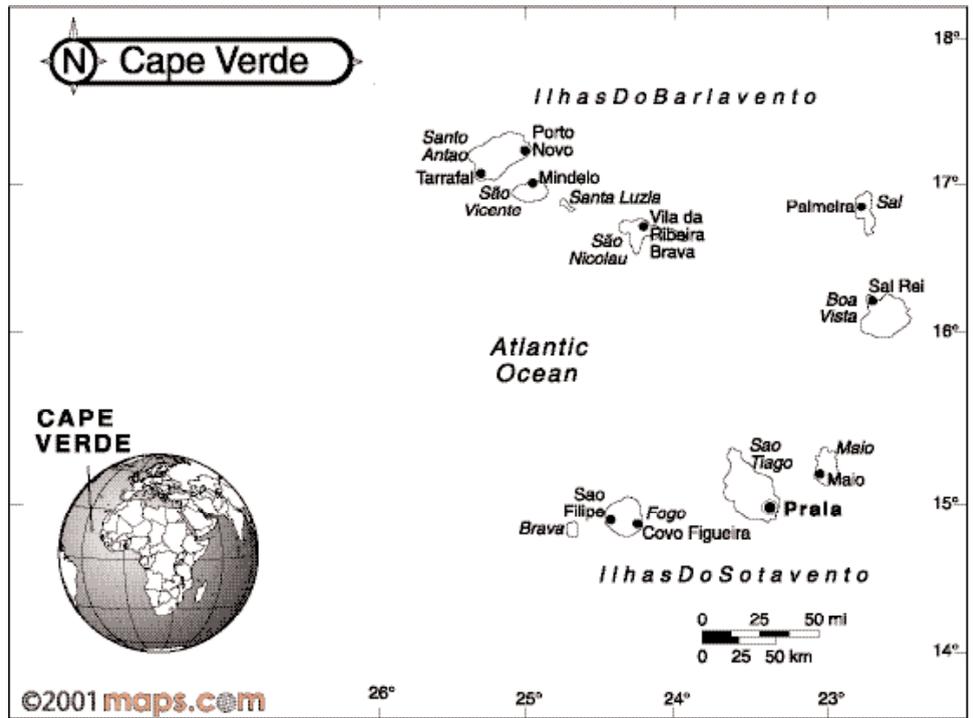

Cao Dai Overseas Headquarters
1608 Smiley Heights Dr.
Redlands, CA 92373
<http://www.caodai.org/active.htm>

Christopher H. Hartney

Sources:

- Blagov, Sergei. The Cao Dai: A New Religious Movement. Moscow, 1999.
- Smith, R. B. "An Introduction to Caodaism." Bulletin of the School of Oriental and African Studies, University of London 33, 2-3 (1970).

Cape Verde Islands

The Cape Verde Islands were discovered by the Portuguese explorer Diogo Gomes in 1460. Prior to that time, they were inhabited by several peoples of related Bantu heritage. In the next century the islands, like São Tomé and Príncipe, became an important point for processing slaves captured along the west coast of Africa and redirecting them to various places in the Americas. Farmers from Portugal arrived to establish plantations, and their methods destroyed much of the islands' fertility. As the plantation culture failed, many islanders migrated to Guinea-Bissau, other Portuguese colonies (Angola, Mozambique, Brazil), or the United States. In the twentieth century, Cape Verdeans began to agitate for independence and developed close ties to their counterparts in Guinea-Bissau. They became independent in 1975. Major droughts through the 1980s and into the 1990s have kept the islands poverty-stricken and dependent to some extent on foreign assistance. This poverty has also led to further migrations, and currently more citizens live outside of the country than on the islands.

In 1462, just two years after the Portuguese discovered the existence of the islands, clergy of the ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH who were affiliated with the FRANCISCAN Order arrived to begin a mission to the islands, inhabitants. At the time, the islanders followed a form of West African religion that recognized a Supreme Being, but centered upon the acknowledgement of ancestors and lesser deities. Magic was integral to the belief, and Europeans saw it as rank heathenism.

Conversion of the indigenous population proceeded over the next century, and a diocese that included Gambia and Cape Palmas was erected in 1532. JESUITS arrived in 1604

Status of religions in Cape Verde, 2000-2050

Followers	2000			2025	2050
	total	%	rate
Christians	407,000	95.1	2.22	637,000	824,000
Roman Catholics	417,000	97.5	2.31	650,000	820,000
Protestants	15,500	3.6	3.97	30,000	45,000
Independents	12,800	3.0	3.58	25,000	40,000
Muslims	11,800	2.8	4.27	19,000	25,000
Ethnoreligionists	4,800	1.1	3.46	6,000	6,800
Nonreligious	3,500	0.8	2.88	7,000	10,000
Baha'is	660	0.2	5.06	1,500	3,000
Jews	60	0.0	0.96	50	50
Total population	428,000	100.0	2.29	671,000	869,000

and Capuchins in 1656. More recently they have been joined by HOLY GHOST FATHERS and nuns from several different orders. The present Diocese of Santiago de Cabo continues the original diocese, Gambia having been separated early in the twentieth century. Through the twentieth century, an increasing percentage of the clergy have been Africans, though a number have arrived from Goa (India).

The CHURCH OF THE NAZARENE, a Holiness denomination from the United States, was the first Protestant/FREE CHURCH to establish work on the islands. They remain the largest dissenting group, and primary leadership has been assumed by local leaders. They were joined by the SEVENTH-DAY ADVENTIST CHURCH (1935) and the JEHOVAH'S WITNESSES (1955). The primary non-Christian group on the islands is the BAHAI FAITH.

Sources:

- Friberg, H. R. Like a River Flowing: The Church of the Nazarene in Africa and the Republic of Cape Verde. Kansas City, MO: Nazarene Publishing House, 1982.

Motley, S. L. "Because We Are the True Catholics: Os rebelandos of the Cape Verde Islands." M.A. thesis, University of California at Los Angeles, 1993.

Catholic Apostolic Church

The Catholic Apostolic Church was founded around 1832 in London, England, by the followers of a former Presbyterian minister, Edward Irving (1792–1834), after he was forced to leave his London church over doctrinal issues; in the fashion of small sects of the time, it was sometimes known as "the Irvingites." Rather than setting out to be a new church, it was intended to be a wake-up call to the main Christian denominations in the Last Days. Leading members included Sir Henry Drummond, MP (1786–1860), on the grounds of whose estate at Albury, Surrey, in southern England, the church's Apostles' Chapel was built, and also the son of Spencer Perceval, Britain's only assassinated prime minister.

Theologically the Catholic Apostolic Church was what today would be called Charismatic Evangelical, with exercise of the gifts of the Spirit, including speaking in tongues and prophecy; but unlike most churches of this type it also developed a rich liturgy and ceremonial, borrowed and adapted from the Catholic, Orthodox, and Anglican churches. Its main emphasis, however, was on the imminent return of Christ.

It appointed twelve apostles to take "the Great Testimony," "couched in lofty language, for presentation to the Potentates of the world and the bishops of the Church universal," in an effort "to seek to unite the entire Christian Church in preparation for the Lord's arrival." The testimony met with minimal response. (Irving himself was only appointed an "angel," or bishop, rather than to the higher offices of apostle or prophet. Disappointed by this, and by the lack of evangelistic results, he died a broken man at age forty-two, in Glasgow, Scotland, in 1834.)

The apostles believed that Christ might return at the end of 1838, and returned to Albury from their separate (but uniformly unsuccessful) tours of European countries, before Christmas that year. A major dispute arose in the church, as the prophets, who had appointed the apostles, criticized them for their failure; the apostles, who outranked the prophets, pointed out severely that the prophets had no authority over them. The church lost its unity and much of its impetus.

Over the following years some apostles retired, and all eventually died. As the work of the apostles was to spread the message of Christ's imminent return while there was still time, the church had made no provision for replacing apostles as they died—and without apostles, they could not appoint new bishops, elders, shepherds, evangelists, priests, and deacons. The last apostle died in 1901, aged ninety-five, and the last active priest in 1970. Before that, most of the few remaining members had been absorbed into the Church of England. It is thought unlikely that any members still exist at the beginning of the twenty-first century.

Although the Catholic Apostolic Church dissolved away, its work has been continued quite successfully by the NEW APOSTOLIC CHURCH. In 1863 the Catholic Apostolic Church in Germany, believing that new apostles could and should be appointed, split from its UK parent in the "Hamburg Schism" and reorganized. Today the New Apostolic Church claims to be one of the largest dissenting religious groups in Germany and has members worldwide in some 170 countries.

David V. Barrett

Sources:

- Barrett, David V. The New Believers. London: Cassell, 2001.
- Dallimore, Arnold. Forerunner of the Charismatic Movement: The Life of Edward Irving. Chicago: Moody Press, 1983.
- Miller, Edward. "Irvingism: The Catholic Apostolic Church." In Religious Systems of the World. London: Swann Sonnenschein, 1889; 9th ed., 1908.
- Newman-Norton, Seraphim. The Time of Silence: A History of the Catholic Apostolic Church, 1901–1971. Studies in Charismatic Renewal, privately published, 1974.
- Shaw, P. E. The Catholic Apostolic Church, Sometimes Called Irvingite: A Historical Survey. New York: King's Crown Press, 1946.

Catholic Diocese of the Old Catholics in Germany

The center of the movement in reaction to the declaration of papal infallibility by the Vatican Council (1870–1871) of the ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH was led by German Catholics, most notably church historian Johann Joseph Ignaz von Döllinger (1799–1890). He was excommunicated on April 17, 1871. An initial Old Catholic Congress met at Munich, Germany, September 22–24, 1871. More than 300 delegates and observers attended, primarily from German-speaking countries—Germany, Austria, and Switzerland. The conference affirmed its allegiance to the ancient Catholic faith, along with rejection of the new dogmas promulgated by the Vatican Council. It went even further, however, in repudiating every dogma of faith not in harmony with the actual consciousness of the church, a proposition that was to allow them to make other changes in the years ahead. Most importantly, the conference decided to seek control of the property of the churches that served their members. Thus, they indicated their aim to ask for state support for their actions. Some in Germany hoped that the movement would claim the allegiance of the majority of Roman Catholics and thus allow for the nationalization of Catholic interests in the various German states.

At a second congress at Cologne, September 20–22, 1872, the 350 delegates made decisions on the election of a bishop and the organization of the clergy and parishes. Immediately after this congress, efforts were made to obtain recognition by the several governments, especially Prussia, Baden, and Hesse. The following year, Professor Josef Hubert Reinkens (1821–1896) of Bonn was elected bishop; he was consecrated at Rotterdam by the independent bishop of Deventer, Hermann Heydekamp, on August 11, 1873. He was soon officially recognized as a Catholic bishop by Prussia, and he selected Bonn as his residence. The bishop and his diocese were recognized by Prussia and granted an annual sum for support. The eventual support offered by other German states and Swiss cantons led to the transfer of local church property to the Old Catholics, in spite of strong Roman Catholic opposition.

Subsequent congresses were held at Freiberg (1874), Breslau (1876), Baden-Baden (1880), and Krefeld (1884). Clerical celibacy was abolished in 1874, and in 1877, Reinkens founded a seminary for theological students, and a theological faculty developed at the University of Berne. It was also the case that changes introduced among the Old Catholics, such as allowing priests to marry and the use of the vernacular, alienated Döllinger, who refused to participate in these additional church congresses or lend his name to their promulgations.

The Old Catholic Church of Switzerland organized in 1875, and Reinkens consecrated a bishop for it the following year. Initially all of the Old Catholic parishes (other than those in the Netherlands) were part of the German diocese, but during the twentieth century they separated into their own independent national churches. After an initial surge in membership, the movement declined, as many members decided to return to the papal jurisdiction. In 1878 there were in Germany some 122 congregations (including 44 in Baden, 36 in Prussia, 34 in Bavaria) and about 52,000 members. By 1890 the number of members had shrunk to about 30,000. In the early twenty-first century it has approximately 24,000 members.

The diocese is a member of the Union of Utrecht, founded by the Old Catholic bishops in 1880, through which it has been since 1931 in communion with the CHURCH OF ENGLAND. It now has full sacramental communion with all of the churches of the ANGLICAN COMMUNION. It is also a member of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES. As had other Old Catholic bodies, the German Old Catholics initially had problems with the ordination of females, and during the 1980s tensions developed with the Anglicans, as the Anglicans moved forward on this issue. In the 1990s, however, their problems with admitting females to the priesthood and bishopric were resolved, and in 1996 the first German Old Catholic female priest was ordained.

Address:

Catholic Diocese of the Old Catholics in Germany
Gregor-Mendel-Straße 28
53115 Bonn
Germany
<http://www.alt-katholisch.de/index.html>

Sources:

Huelin, George. Old Catholics and Anglicans, 1931–1981. New York: Oxford University Press, 1983.
Moss, C. B. The Old Catholic Movement. Eureka Springs, AK: Episcopal Book Club, 1977.
Pruter, Karl, and J. Gordon Melton. The Old Catholic Sourcebook. New York: Garland Publishing, 1983.

Cayman Islands

The Caribbean islands that constitute the present country of the Cayman Islands were uninhabited prior to the sighting of them by explorer Christopher Columbus in 1503. The first settlers were buccaneers, and through the eighteenth century the islands were a headquarters and haven for pirates. Though Spain formally ceded the islands to the British (along with Jamaica) in 1670 by the Treaty of Madrid, it was not until 1833 that a settlement on Grand Cayman was started by Jamaicans. The land remained a Jamaican dependency until 1959, when it became a British dependent territory. It retains its relationship to the United Kingdom in spite of some local efforts to attain full independence.

Presbyterians, representatives of the Scottish settlers in Jamaica, began work on Grand Cayman around 1800 and have continued to dominate the religious life of the islands. In 1965, the Presbyterian Church of Jamaica and Grand Cayman and the Congregational Union of Jamaica merged to form the UNITED CHURCH IN JAMAICA AND THE CAYMAN ISLANDS. The Presbyterians were joined in 1870 by the Baptists, the second largest group on the islands. Only a small number of Anglicans have come to the Caymans over the years, and there is but a single Anglican congregation, attached to the CHURCH IN THE PROVINCE OF THE WEST INDIES (now headquartered in the Bahamas). Similarly, the Status of religions in the Cayman Islands, 2000–2050

Followers	2000			2025	2050
	total	%	rate
Christians	29,800	77.6	3.64	59,000	75,100
Protestants	20,700	53.9	3.62	41,300	50,000
Independents	4,000	10.6	3.22	7,800	9,500
Anglicans	500	1.3	4.56	900	1,200
Spiritists	5,800	15.2	4.10	12,000	15,800
Nonreligious	1,600	4.2	7.55	5,000	8,000
Jews	660	1.7	3.17	800	900
Baha'is	340	0.9	5.32	700	1,400
Hindus	100	0.3	2.71	250	500
Muslims	70	0.2	4.00	150	300
Total population	38,400	100.0	3.84	77,900	102,000

ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH has had only a few members and has a single congregation attached to the Archdiocese of Kingston (Jamaica).

Through the twentieth century, two American-based Holiness churches have had a significant impact on the Caymans. THE CHURCH OF GOD (ANDERSON, INDIANA) and the Church of God Holiness arrived in the 1930s and now claim a combined membership almost equal to that of the United Church. They had joined the WESLEYAN CHURCH, a Holiness body that began work in 1911. As the population of the Caymans has grown since World War II (and its role as a vacation and banking center have become known), a variety of Protestant and Free Church denominations from the United States have organized congregations, including several predominantly African American churches such as the CHURCH OF THE LORD JESUS CHRIST OF THE APOSTOLIC FAITH.

The CHURCH OF JESUS CHRIST OF LATTER-DAY SAINTS came to the Caymans late (1981), and the single center is attached to their larger work in Jamaica. There is also a small work supported by the REORGANIZED CHURCH OF JESUS CHRIST OF LATTER-DAY SAINTS. The JEHOVAH'S WITNESSES opened work in the 1930s. For many years there was a single practitioner of the CHURCH OF CHRIST, SCIENTIST, but no Christian Science presence was reported as the new millennium began.

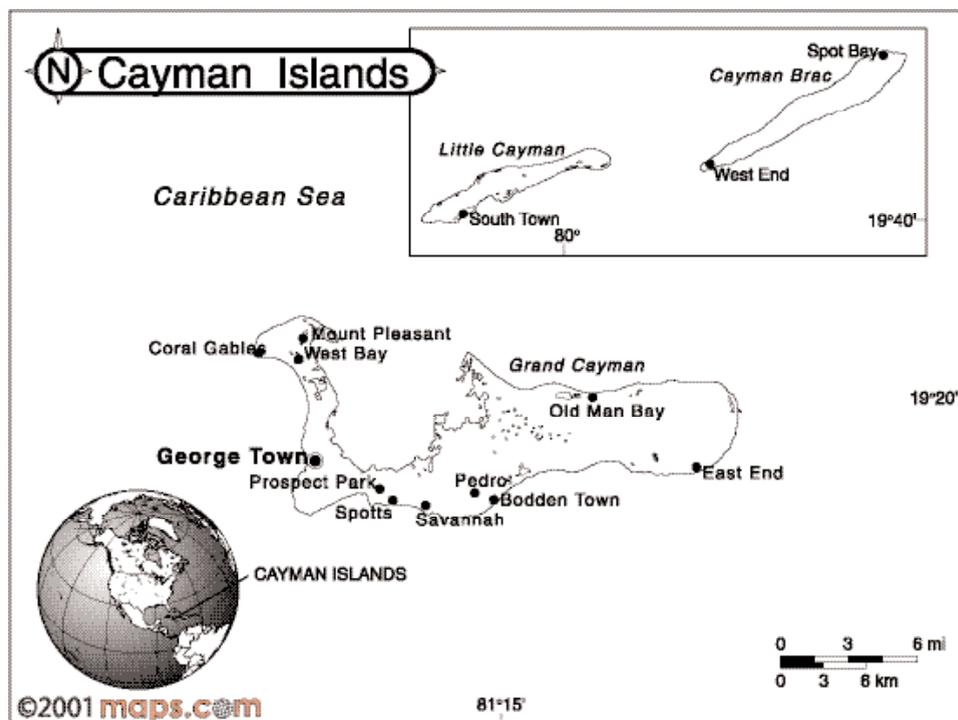

There are approximately thirty-five Jewish families on Grand Cayman, but no synagogue. They hold services in private homes. There is also a small RASTAFARIAN community.

Sources:

- Hirst, G. S. S. Notes on the History of the Cayman Islands. Grand Cayman: Hobbies and Books, 1910. Reprint, Kingston, Jamaica: P. A. Benjamin, n.d.
- Thompson, J. K. The Rise of the Seventh-day Adventist Church in the Bahamas and the Cayman Islands. Nassau, Bahamas: privately published, 1992.

CBAmerica

During the height of the fundamentalist-modernist controversy, conservative Baptists fought for a missionary society that would exclusively commission missionaries who held to an orthodox Christian theology. Given the unsatisfactory response of the primary organizations of North Baptists (now combined in the AMERICAN BAPTIST CHURCHES IN THE U.S.A.), many of the more conservative congregations began to turn to various independent missionary organizations to place their missionary giving. Finally, in 1943, Richard Beal, pastor of the First Baptist Church in Tucson, Arizona, and Albert Johnson, pastor of Hinson Memorial Baptist Church, took the lead in calling for the formation of the Conservative Baptist Foreign Mission Society (CBFMS), now known as Conservative Baptist International. The next year, at the meeting of the Northern Baptist Convention, consideration of the new society was excluded from its agenda.

The action of the Northern Baptists against the CBFMS became the catalyst for the several hundred churches that had chosen to support it to move on toward the formation of a new congregational association that would in effect create a new denomination. The Conservative Baptist Association (CBA) was formed in 1947. The creating of the Conservative Baptist Home Mission Society in 1948 completed the development of an alternative to the Northern Baptist structures. Congregations began to withdraw from their former relationships and reorient their life to the new association. As the association grew, Bible schools and seminaries for the training of ministers were opened, and missionaries were sent into a steadily growing number of countries.

The CBA played an important role in the formation of the National Association of Evangelicals, which united the new Evangelical consciousness in the years after World War II. In the 1960s the headquarters of the three related organizations were moved to adjacent properties in Wheaton, Illinois, though further attempts to unite them into a single corporation failed. In the 1990s the association assumed its present name and moved its headquarters to Colorado. In 2001 CBA had more than 1,200 affiliated congregations in the United States. The association supported three seminaries and three colleges. Congregations are organized into twenty-three state associations.

Conservative Baptists support missionary personnel around the world. Some are working specifically in Conservative Baptist missions and others are working with various projects initiated by like-minded Evangelicals.

The Conservative Baptists have resisted attempts by some members to move toward a more stringent fundamentalist position, and in 1964/1965 more than a hundred churches left the association to form the New Testament Association of Independent Baptists.

Address:

CBAmerica
1501 West Mineral Ave., Suite B
Littleton, CO 80120
<http://www.cbamerica.org>

Sources:

Finzel, Has W., ed. Partners Together: 50 Years of Global Impact, the CBFMS Story. Wheaton, IL: Conservative Baptist Foreign Missionary Society, 1993.
Founded for the Word, Focused on the World. Wheaton, IL: Conservative Baptist Foreign Missionary Society, 1978.
Shelley, Bruce L. A History of Conservative Baptists. Wheaton, IL: CB Press, 1971.

Celestial Church of Christ

The Celestial Church of Christ (CCC), one of the ALADURA CHURCHES in Western Nigeria, was inspired by the life, visionary experience, and charismatic personality of its pastor-founder, Samuel Bilewu Joseph Oschoffa (1909–1985). The founder (a Yoruba carpenter turned prophet) claimed to have received a vision while marooned in a mangrove forest in Dahomey in his quest for timber for his lumber trade. Following this spiritual experience, he claimed to have received a divine commission to found a church specifically charged with cleansing the world. The church itself emerged in 1947 in Porto-Novo (now Republic of Benin) and later in 1950 in Makoko (Nigeria), where the movement gained its present popularity and worldwide fame. The members of the church were originally for the most part members of the Yoruba and Egun peoples, and their culture shaped it, but it has now transcended ethnic and national boundaries. Nor is the church limited to one socioeconomic class; the membership now cuts across all the social strata of the society. The total membership of the church has been estimated at several millions, while its parishes (branches) are spread widely in Africa (Nigeria, Benin Republic, Cote d'Ivoire, Togo, Ghana, Cameroon, Niger, Gabon, Zaire, Burkina Faso, Sierra Leone, Senegal, and others), Europe (United Kingdom, France, Germany, Austria, Italy, Belgium, and others), and North America.

With the demise of the pastor-founder in 1985, the CCC is now headed by Pastor Alexander Abiodun Bada. CCC organization is structured around the centralized authority of the pastor. As both the spiritual and administrative head of the church, the pastor has the unchallengeable authority on all matters and legitimates this authority through his personal charisma. His position remains the constant reference point of the church. The Pastor-in-Council, under the ultimate authority of the pastor, represents the highest organ of government. It comprises the diocesan heads and their deputies, the Board of Trustees, and members chosen by the pastor, who also serves as the chairman.

The internal organization of the church involves a complex hierarchical structure that could be classified into upper and lower cadres. CCC Worldwide is run through the international headquarters located at the Mission House at Ketu, in Lagos (Nigeria), though a new International Headquarters Secretariat complex is under construction at an acquired parcel of land near Sagamu, on the Lagos-Ibadan Expressway. The Supreme Headquarters of the CCC is located in Porto-Novo (Republic of Benin) by virtue of its birth there. Other sacred spaces of the church include the church building, the Mercy land, and the Celestial City (New Jerusalem).

CCC beliefs are of immense significance to its members, as they lie behind the praxis, rituals, worship, membership, and decisions of the church. The members see the Bible as the source of all their knowledge, the foundation of all their beliefs and of their mode of worship. The CCC Constitution (p. 29) explicitly states the belief that the name and organization of the church, as well as its doctrines, beliefs, and rituals, are derived primarily from the inspiration of the Holy Spirit. One peculiarity of the CCC is in their hymnody. All CCC hymns are believed to have been revealed, or channeled, through certain individuals such as the pastor-founder and various prophets and prophetesses from a divine source, that is, under the influence of the Holy Spirit.

Address:

Celestial Church of Christ
Mission House, Ketu
P.O. Box 1237
Ikeja
Lagos
Nigeria
<http://www.celestialchurch.com>

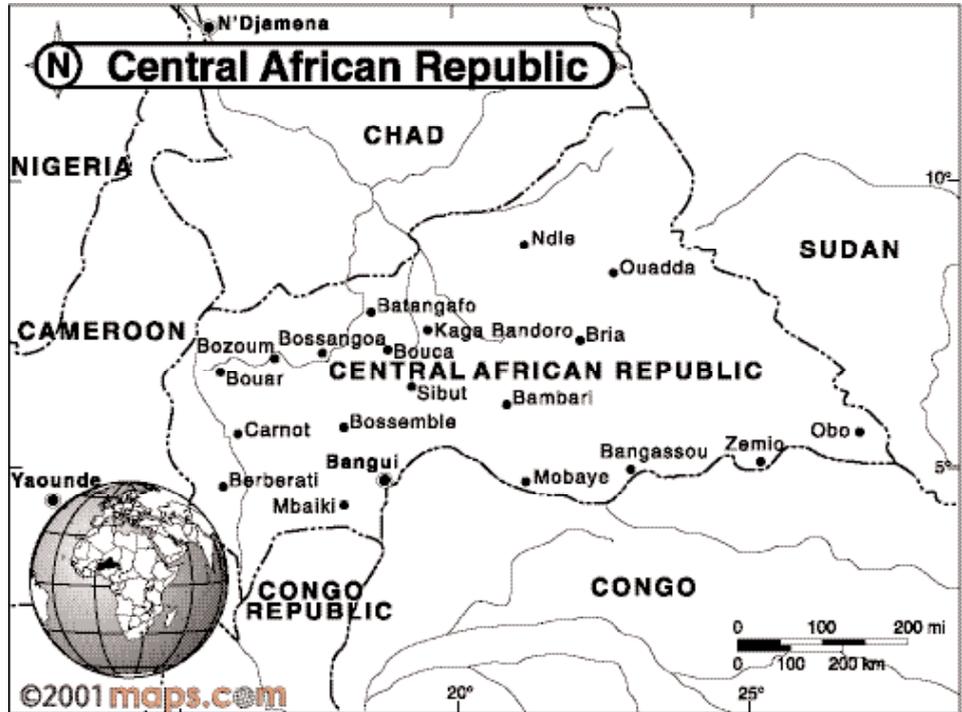

Sources:

- Adogame, A. U. Celestial Church of Christ: The Politics of Cultural Identity in a West African Prophetic-Charismatic Movement. Frankfurt am Main: Peter Lang, 1999.
- Odeyemi, S. O. The Coming of Oschoffa and the Birth of the Celestial Church of Christ. Lagos, 1992.

Central African Republic

As its name implies, the Central African Republic (CAR) is located in almost the geographical center of the continent. It is a landlocked country surrounded by Chad, the Sudan, Cameroon, and the two Congo states. Various archaeological sites indicate that the country has been inhabited since prehistoric times, but the real history of the region begins around the end of the first millennium C.E., as people from both Sudan and Cameroon began moving in. During the Middle Ages, slavers from both Europe and the Middle East were capturing individuals among the CAR peoples and carrying them into obscurity in faraway lands.

In the nineteenth century, France was awarded hegemony over Central Africa and granted concessions to different companies to exploit the region economically. Caring little for the population, they killed, tortured, and enslaved many. French rule was more firmly established after World War I and was able to hold on through World War II, but then the CAR was granted partial autonomy and in 1960 complete independence. In 1965 a successful coup brought the infamous Jean Bekel Bokassa to power. In 1972 he declared himself president for life. Five years later he renamed the country the Central African Empire and had himself crowned as Emperor Bokassa I. His repressive and corrupt government was brought down with the assistance of the French government two years later. He later died in prison, convicted of murder, torture, and cannibalism. David Dacko, whom Bokassa had pushed out of office, returned, and the country resumed its previous name. Dacko was deposed a second time in a coup in 1981. His successor, André Kolingba, did little better in moving the country toward democracy and out of poverty. It remains in turmoil and poverty as the new millennium begins.

Followers	2000			2025	2050
	total	%	rate
Christians	2,450,000	67.8	2.29	4,066,000	5,505,000
Roman Catholics	665,000	18.4	2.89	1,421,000	2,200,000
Protestants	521,000	14.4	2.57	1,050,000	1,600,000
Independents	418,000	11.6	2.39	820,000	1,220,000
Muslims	564,000	15.6	2.17	920,000	1,324,000
Ethnoreligionists	557,000	15.4	1.03	620,000	650,000
Nonreligious	32,000	0.9	3.36	70,000	140,000
Baha'is	11,800	0.3	3.99	28,000	70,000
Total population	3,615,000	100.0	2.08	5,704,000	7,689,000

Much of the strife in the CAR has reflected the rivalries between the different peoples who live there. Major groups include the Banda, Baya, Mandja, Sara, Mbaka, Mbum, Nzakara, and Azande. The Binga are significant as a people who have held on most tenaciously to their traditional beliefs in the face of Christian missions. Each of these groups holds to a distinctive faith (though all are related) that includes a belief in a Supreme Creator and a pantheon of lesser deities. One relatively new movement related to the traditional beliefs is the Nzapa to Azande movement, which the government has recognized as an authentic African religion.

Islam was introduced in the Middle Ages by Arab traders and found some support in the towns and cities, though to this day the primary support for Islam comes from CAR citizens of Arab heritage. Primary Islamic support among the Central African peoples is found among the Hausa and Bororo people in the northern part of the country. Muslims are Sunnis of the MALIKITE SCHOOL.

The ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH entered the country in 1894 as the French were asserting their hegemony over the region. An initial mission was opened at Bangui and through the twentieth century grew into a vicariate (1937) and a multidiocese organization under the archbishop of Bangui.

Protestants entered the country in the 1920s through the efforts of Baptist Mid-Missions, a conservative missionary agency based in the United States, and the following year with the Brethren Church (now the Fellowship of Grace Brethren Churches). Baptist Mid-Missions continues to be the largest single supplier of Christian missionary personnel. The Brethren pioneered the effort to have the Bible translated into the various languages spoken in the CAR. They were later joined by representatives of various denominations and missionaries sent by several interdenominational sending agencies. The Swedish Baptist Mission opened their first station in 1923, and workers from the Africa Inland Mission arrived in 1924 and established work among the Zande people. Their efforts are now known, respectively, as the Union of Baptist Churches and the Église Evangélique Centrafricaine.

Independent African churches first appeared in 1956 when a group left the Baptist Mid-Mission fellowship to found the Comité Baptiste. Other AFRICAN INITIATED CHURCHES include the KIMBANGUIST CHURCH (from the Congo [Zaire]), the Christianisme Prophétique en Afrique, and Kanda Dia Kinziga (People for Eternal Life).

The majority of CAR citizens are members of the various Protestant and independent churches. The Christian community is notable for the relatively small number of churches representative of the liberal Protestant community, the primary representative being the Église Luthérienne de la RCA. It began as an effort by the Sudan Mission and later received support from the American Lutheran Church (now a constituent part of the EVANGELICAL LUTHERAN CHURCH IN AMERICA) and the CHURCH OF NORWAY. No church based in the CAR is a member of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES (WCC). Groups such as the Fellowship of Grace Brethren Churches and Baptist Mid-Mission are strongly opposed to the WCC.

The continued political instability in the Central African Republic has contributed to its not being an attractive site for new religious movements from outside of the region to establish work there. Hence the older churches have grown through the last decades of the twentieth century with relatively little competition. Those that have initiated activity include the JEHOVAH'S WITNESSES (1945), the BAHÁ'I FAITH (1961), the SEVENTH-DAY ADVENTIST CHURCH (1962), and most recently, the CHURCH OF JESUS CHRIST OF LATTER-DAY SAINTS (1995). The Baha'i work, including some missionaries from Haiti, grew rapidly during its first decade, establishing more than twenty spiritual assemblies.

Sources:

Album du Centenaire l'Église Catholique en Centrafrique, 1894–1994. Bangui, C.A.R.: Commission du Centenaire de l'Église de Centrafrique, 1994.

Hill, R. W. "The Christianization of the Central African Republic." M.A. thesis, Fuller Theological Seminary, 1969.

Chad

The area now constituting the northern African nation of Chad has been inhabited for millennia. Archaeological evidence indicates that humans were in the area a million years ago. Over the last few millennia the expanding Sahara desert has pushed the population farther and farther south. More than 200 different peoples now live in the country.

Muslims found their way to Chad in the eleventh century, but Islam only became a national religion during the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries. The primary routes established to transport slaves from Africa to the Middle East ran through Chad, and the peoples of southern Chad became traditional victims of the slavers. In 1885, France was assigned hegemony over Chad by the Berlin Treaty, but did not become an active presence until after World War I, by which time Chad was designated a territory in the colony of French Equatorial Africa. In 1920, the French Foreign Legion invaded the region and defeated the powerful Muslim groups that controlled the north. The southern tribes aligned themselves with the French, whom they saw as liberators.

French rule continued until France granted Chad political independence in 1960. France has, however, continued to meddle in the country's affairs because of ongoing economic interests. The years of independence have been ones of war with Libya, civil war, and political instability. The country remains largely divided between the northern Muslims and southern groups.

Muslims experienced considerable success in the early modern era, and about 45 percent of the population became adherents to Islam, a figure that has remained stable in recent centuries. The largest number are Sunnis of the MALIKITE and SHAFIITE schools. Islamic Affairs Committee of Chad (Comité Islamique du Tchad), based at N'Djamena, the capital, provides a point of unity for Muslim believers. As with much of Africa, Sufi brotherhoods are an important part of the Muslim population, the Hamilliyya, TIJANIYYA, QADIRIYYA, and Sanusiya being the more important ones.

Capuchin priests of the ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH had attempted to establish a mission in Chad in 1663, but were unsuccessful. Only after the French established their governance of the region did the HOLY GHOST FATHERS, in 1929, establish permanent work, at Kopu.

Protestants came to Chad in 1925 through the efforts of missionaries sent out by Baptist Mid-Missions. Work was started at Fort Archambault. Although the people were receptive, no progress was made until the then chief of the Sara people died in 1937. Suddenly the work grew rapidly. The mission became autonomous in 1964 as the Association of Baptist Churches of Chad (Églises Baptistes du Tchad). The Sudan United Mission entered Chad in 1927. The mission later united its work to the missions of the French Mennonites and the Worldwide Evangelism Crusade to form the EVANGELICAL CHURCH OF CHAD (Églises Évangéliques du Tchad), the largest Protestant group in the country. The Christian Brethren, through their international missionary arm, Christian Missions in Many Lands, quietly moved into Chad in the 1920s from their mission in Nigeria. Work had been established at Fort Lamy by 1925. Today, the Assemblées Chrétiennes du Chad is the second largest Protestant body in Chad. In addition, the United States-based Church of the Lutheran Brethren has built an expansive work as the Église Fraternelle Luthérienne du Tchad.

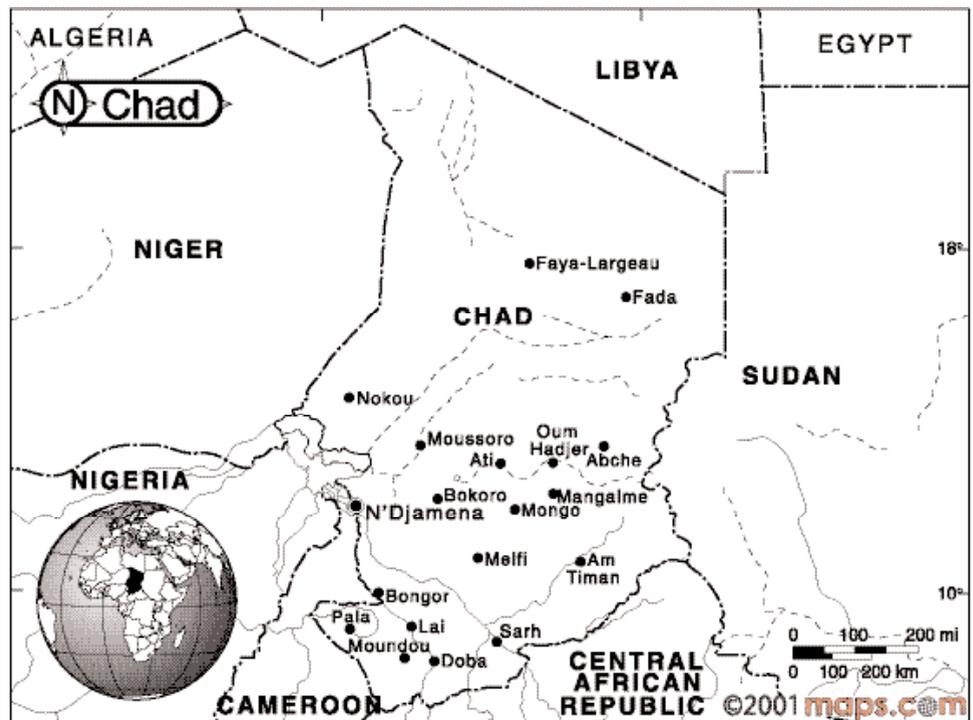

Evangelical Christianity dominates within the Protestant/FREE CHURCHES community, and no Chad-based churches are members of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES. Several of the Protestant groups have formed a Fédération des Églises Évangéliques du Tchad, affiliated with the WORLD ALLIANCE EVANGELICAL.

JEHOVAH'S WITNESSES have been active in Chad since the end of World War II. The SEVENTH-DAY ADVENTIST CHURCH established its Chad Mission in 1967. It is now part of the Central African Union Mission, which includes a number of predominantly French-speaking African countries.

During the post-World War II era, the BAHAI FAITH also expanded rapidly. It reported more than fifty spiritual assemblies (local centers) by the mid-1970s.

Sources:

- Barrett, David. The Encyclopedia of World Christianity. 2d edition. New York: Oxford University Press, 2001.
- Bissio, Roberto Remo, et al. Third World Guide 93/94. Montevideo, Uruguay: Instituto del Tercer Mundo, 1992.

Status of religions in Chad, 2000-2050

Followers	2000			2025	2050
	total	%	rate
Muslims	4,519,000	59.1	3.01	9,060,000	13,639,000
Christians	1,746,000	22.8	2.78	3,150,000	4,250,000
Protestants	783,000	10.2	2.95	1,350,000	1,850,000
Roman Catholics	502,000	6.6	3.10	950,000	1,400,000
Independents	152,000	2.0	3.29	400,000	650,000
Ethnoreligionists	1,300,000	17.0	2.66	1,538,000	1,534,000
Baha'is	80,700	1.1	3.72	150,000	250,000
Nonreligious	5,300	0.1	2.88	10,000	20,000
Total population	7,651,000	100.0	2.91	13,908,000	19,693,000

Chaldean Catholic Church

The Chaldean Catholic Church is an Eastern Rite church in full communion with the ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH that emerged in Iraq in the 1550s. The Christian community in Iraq had separated from the main bodies of EASTERN ORTHODOXY in the fifth century, following its unwillingness to affirm the promulgations of the Council of Ephesus (431 C.E.), one of the international gatherings of bishops of the Christian church at which decisions on essential Christian doctrines were made. The Iraqi (or Assyrian) church rejected the Orthodox formula concerning the nature of Christ. That church, now known as the APOSTOLIC CATHOLIC ASSYRIAN CHURCH, included Christians in Iran and Lebanon, and has survived through the centuries in spite of the conquest of the region by Islamic forces.

In the thirteenth century, Roman Catholic missionaries began work within the Iraqi Christian community. In the 1550s they were present and able to take advantage of a pecular situation that arose. The Assyrian Church had developed a mode of passing the office of patriarch (the highest office in the church) from uncle to nephew in a single family. On occasion this practice led to the selection of an untrained youth as the new patriarch. Such a youth was selected in 1552. As a result, a group of bishops declined to acknowledge the new patriarch and instead turned to Rome. They selected a new patriarch, and in 1553, the pope consecrated him as Patriarch Simon VIII of the Chaldean Church. The new church accepted Catholic doctrine, especially its understanding of the person and work of Christ, but retained its own rite, the ancient East Syrian liturgy of Addai and Mari (with a few minor changes).

The new patriarch survived only two years, before being arrested and executed by Iraqi authorities. However, the church survived and grew, primarily at the expense of the Assyrian church.

Today, the Chaldean Catholic Church is headquartered in Baghdad, Iraq. It does not have an Internet site, but its American diocese has a presence at <http://www.chaldeandiocese.org/>. It sponsors a seminary in Baghdad and oversees two religious orders. There are ten dioceses in Iraq, four in Iran, and seven additional dioceses in the Middle East. There are some 500,000 members. The church is active in the Middle East Council of Churches. Outside the Middle East there is one diocese, the Diocese of St. Thomas the Apostle, serving the church's members in the United States (<http://www.chaldeandiocese.org>).

Address:

Chaldean Catholic Church
P.O. Box 6112
Baghdad
Iraq

Sources:

- Liesel, N. The Eastern Catholic Liturgies: A Study in Words and Pictures. Westminster, MD: Newman Press, 1960.
- Roberson, Ronald G. The Eastern Christian Churches—A Brief Survey. 5th ed. Rome: Edizioni Orientalia Christiana, Pontificio Istituto Orientale, 1995.

Channel Islands

The Channel Islands is the name given an archipelago in the English Channel off the French coast, west of Normandy and north of Brittany. Two islands, Jersey and Guernsey, share the majority of acreage and people. The islands have been inhabited since prehistoric times, and they are dotted with the same monoliths that may be found across England and western France.

Christianity was introduced by St. Marculf in the sixth century. He founded an abbey and was instrumental in having St. Helier (d. c. 550) come to the islands. A cave-dwelling hermit, Helier was killed by the pagan residents of Jersey, among whom he was engaging in evangelical activity. Later St. Samson and St. Magloire worked on Jersey, as did Pretexatus, archbishop of Rouen, who settled at the Monastery of St. Helier after a quarrel with the king of the Franks. The monastery appears to have been destroyed in the ninth century when the Normans invaded and took control of the islands, but it was rebuilt in the twelfth century.

The islands became dependencies of England in 1066 and remain in a relationship with the United Kingdom. The 125,000 residents of the islands have their own constitution. Prior to the Reformation, the ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH in the islands was a part of the Diocese of Coutances (France). French Calvinist Protestants came to the islands in the sixteenth century and in 1564 organized the Presbyterian Church. The Presbyterian Church remained the dominant force in the Channel Islands until displaced by the Anglicans. The CHURCH OF ENGLAND had been organized in Jersey in 1623 and Guernsey in 1663, but during the nineteenth century grew considerably. Today half the islanders are affiliated with the Church of England, and its parishes have been incorporated into the Diocese of Winchester. Both Guernsey and Jersey have deaneries, and the bishop has delegated some episcopal authority to the deans in their administration of the church.

METHODISM arrived in the island in the eighteenth century and had a deep influence among the population in the next century. The METHODIST CHURCH of the United Kingdom is now the third largest church in the Island.

The remaining population of the islands is found along the spectrum of religions present in the United Kingdom, though given the limited size of the population, the number of individual groups is quite limited. There are congregations of the UNITED REFORMED CHURCH, the Greek Orthodox Church, the ELIM PENTECOSTAL CHURCH, and the BAPTIST UNION OF GREAT BRITAIN. Among the smaller religious communities, one can find the CHURCH OF CHRIST, SCIENTIST, the CHURCH OF JESUS CHRIST OF LATTER-DAY SAINTS, the Greater World Christian Spiritualist Church, and the New Church (part of the larger SWEDENBORGIAN MOVEMENT). There is one Jewish synagogue

Followers	2000			2025	2050
	total	%	rate
Christians	132,000	86.1	0.51	134,000	131,000
Anglicans	67,500	44.2	0.38	70,000	72,000
Roman Catholics	22,300	14.6	0.14	24,000	25,000
Protestants	10,500	6.9	-0.37	10,000	10,000
Nonreligious	18,900	12.4	2.34	35,000	45,000
Atheists	1,500	1.0	1.75	2,200	2,800
Baha'is	520	0.3	2.66	1,000	1,600
Hindus	120	0.1	1.92	220	370
Muslims	120	0.1	1.75	230	400
Jews	100	0.1	1.36	200	320
Buddhists	10	0.0	0.00	20	40
Total population	153,000	100.0	0.72	173,000	173,000

and one Buddhist center, connected with SOKA GAKKAI INTERNATIONAL, on Guernsey.

Jews were noted on the islands as early as the 1760s, but it was not until the early nineteenth century that a community emerged. It took the lead in building a synagogue at St. Helier, Jersey, in 1842. The majority of Jews left the islands prior to June 1940, due to the Nazi threat. Among those left, deportations to the death camps began in April 1943. Several dozen were eventually killed, though some survived by being hidden and protected by their neighbors. Those religious Jews that now reside in the islands are members of the Jersey Jewish congregation.

There is a council of churches on both Guernsey and Jersey, and both are associated with the Council of Churches for Britain and Ireland.

Source:

Barrett, David. The Encyclopedia of World Christianity. 2d edition. New York: Oxford University Press, 2001.

Charismatic Movement

During the 1970s, a wave of Pentecostal enthusiasm swept through Christian groups that were not part of the classical Pentecostal tradition. This movement was characterized by the appearance of the gifts of the Spirit, as mentioned in the Bible in chapter 12 of Paul's first epistle to the Corinthians (healing, prophecy, discernment, working of miracles, and the rest), including speaking in tongues. Accompanying the revival was a theological critique of various points of Pentecostal doctrine, especially the idea that speaking in tongues was always present when the baptism was received and that it was evidence of the Spirit's presence.

The movement is generally traced to the manifestation of the gifts in the life of a small group of Episcopalians in California in 1959. Included in the group were two pastors, Frank Maguire and Dennis Bennett (1917–1991). On April 3, 1960, Bennett shared what had happened to him with his congregation at the morning services at St. Mark's Episcopal Church in Van Nuys, California. At the close of the third service, he also announced his resignation. The story was later covered by several national newsmagazines, by which time Bennett had moved to a church in Washington State. Meanwhile, in Van Nuys, Jean Stone, a laywoman who had received the baptism of the Holy Spirit, organized the Holy Trinity Society and began sending the society's periodical to ministers across the country.

Bennett and Stone found immediate support from the Full Gospel Business Men's Fellowship International (FGBMFI), a Pentecostal association founded by California layperson Demos Shakarian (1913–1993), known for holding prayer luncheons attended by a variety of Christians from different backgrounds. FGBMFI was conceived as an evangelistic organization designed to spread the Pentecostal message. As members and ministers of non-Pentecostal churches began to receive the baptism of the Holy Spirit, the FGBMFI periodical, Voice, became the major instrument for spreading the word.

The Charismatic revival grew slowly through the 1960s, and church leaders in all of the major Protestant denominations became aware that Charismatic fellowships were developing within their congregations. Through the decade a number of national denominationally oriented Charismatic fellowships came into existence. The American Lutheran church (now an integral part of the EVANGELICAL LUTHERAN CHURCH IN AMERICA) became the first body to officially discourage its members and ministers from participating in Charismatic events or promoting Charismatic experiences in the church.

As the Charismatic Movement emerged among Protestants, some Roman Catholics, caught up in the spirit of renewal fostered by the changes inaugurated by the Second Vatican Council, also began to experience the gifts of the Spirit. The early recipients of the Spirit had been associated together in the mid-1960s, and in 1967, several of these formed the Word of God Community in Ann Arbor, Michigan, and began holding Days of Renewal Conferences to spread their experience. In 1969 an initial Center for Service and Communion was opened to serve the expanding movement within the ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH. Through the 1970s, the movement spread around the world, assisted immeasurably by the support of Leon-Joseph Cardinal Suenens (1904–1996), archbishop of Malines-Brussels and primate of Belgium.

The mixed reactions in the larger denominations, from open hostility to benign neglect, provided some with hope that their denomination would either become a charismatic church or at the least welcome charismatics as a vital element in the membership. Others, however, reacted to real and perceived hostility by leaving their former church and founding new congregations, most of which eventually became part of new charismatic denominations. Among the first such proto-denominational fellowships was Christian Growth Ministries, based in Fort Lauderdale, Florida. Most of the new denominations, with prominent exceptions, were organized congregationally and opposed any move toward hierarchical structures. As one by one the established denominations increasingly expressed their unhappiness with the movement, a growing number of people affected by the revival left to found new congregations and denominations.

The emergence of the Charismatic Movement led necessarily to a theological critique of Pentecostalism, as people in the older churches experienced the baptism of the Holy Spirit and attempted to reconcile it to their previous theological perspective. Many charismatics jettisoned any necessary connection between the experience of the baptism of the Holy Spirit and speaking in tongues. While allowing for the tongues experience, they suggested that the Spirit could empower people who might manifest various gifts of the Spirit other than tongues. Roman Catholic doctrine taught that all Christians had been baptized by the Spirit, and it thus had to produce new language to talk about the “release” of the Spirit among those who had experienced the empowerment of the Spirit through their involvement in the Catholic Pentecostal prayer groups. These developments took place amidst ongoing research by psychologists into the nature of glossolalia (speaking in tongues) and the related phenomenon of xenoglossia (speaking in a language unknown to the speaker).

In the early 1980s, a new emphasis in the movement developed out of the ministry of John Wimber (1934–1997), a teacher at Fuller Theological seminary in Pasadena, California, and founder of the Vineyard Fellowship. Wimber emerged as a leader as older Evangelical denominations were resolving differences with Pentecostals, and attempted to reconcile Evangelical theology with Pentecostal experience. In his classes at Fuller, a leading Evangelical school, he highlighted the normalcy of miraculous activity (“signs and wonders”) in evangelism. His work influenced many ministers during the decade, and the Vineyard grew into an international denomination.

The Charismatic Movement, in both its Protestant and Catholic phases, spread around the world in the 1970s, and through the last two decades of the century brought literally millions of believers into Pentecostal and Charismatic churches. In the United States, more than a hundred new Charismatic denominations emerged, and the older Pentecostal churches experienced a surge in membership, as several million people were affected by the movement. Two Christian cable television networks helped to encourage a generation of new believers.

The movement also spread across Europe, where it generally met strong opposition from Protestant state churches. In spite of such resistance, a Pentecostal and Charismatic church became the largest non-established religious group in countries such as Sweden, Norway, Finland, and Italy, while making a strong showing in other countries, such as France, the Netherlands, and Spain.

The movement has had its most dramatic effect in Latin America, where new churches developed quickly from initial charismatic missionary endeavors and older Pentecostal churches founded in the first half of the century developed heightened growth profiles. In Brazil, five different Charismatic denominations, each with a membership of over two million members, came to the fore late in the twentieth century, including the ASSEMBLIES OF GOD IN BRAZIL, the largest Protestant body in the country. A similar dramatic emergence occurred in Guatemala, where approximately 60 percent of the Protestant community is Charismatic/Pentecostal, and like observation could be made about, for example, Chile, Argentina, and Mexico (from where the five-million-member LIGHT OF THE WORLD CHURCH is spreading in Spanish-speaking communities worldwide).

The Charismatic Movement has also spread across sub-Saharan Africa, where a much more complicated picture has arisen. Africa has nurtured literally thousands of independent churches, the majority of which have incorporated elements of Pentecostalism and the Charismatic Movement. At the same time, numerous Pentecostal missions have been started by American and European bodies. Although Pentecostalism is an important phenomenon across the land, it is a highly diverse community, and no individual churches have assumed dominant positions in the various countries, as has occurred in South America. Prominent churches would include the ZIMBABWE ASSEMBLIES OF GOD, the AFRICAN APOSTOLIC CHURCH OF JOHANE MARANGE, the AFRICAN ISRAEL CHURCH, NINEVAH, and the AFRICAN INDEPENDENT PENTECOSTAL CHURCH OF AFRICA.

The Charismatic Movement launched Pentecostalism on a new worldwide growth phase, which continues as the new century begins.

Sources:

- Bennett, Dennis. Nine O’Clock in the Morning. Plainfield, NJ: Bridge Publishing, 1970.
- Bradfield, Cecil David. Neo-Pentecostalism: A Sociological Assessment. Washington, DC: University Press of America, 1979.
- Burgess, Stanley M., and Gary McGee, eds. Dictionary of Pentecostal and Charismatic Movements. Grand Rapids, MI: Regency Reference Library, 1988.
- Martin, David. Tongues of Fire: The Explosion of Protestantism in Latin America. Cambridge, MA: Basil Blackwell, 1990.
- O’Connor, Edward. The Pentecostal Movement in the Catholic Church. Notre Dame, IN: Ave Maria Press, 1971.
- Synan, Vinson. The Century of the Holy Spirit: 100 Years of Pentecostal and Charismatic Renewal. Nashville, TN: Thomas Nelson, 2001.

Chen Tao

Chen Tao (Chinese; True Way), also known as God’s Salvation Church, is a small Taiwanese millennial group originally founded by Yu-Hsia Chen, who led the Association for Research on Soul Light during the 1950s. In 1995 Hon-Ming Chen (b. 1956), a retired sociology professor, assumed prophetic leadership. Master Chen made international news headlines by proclaiming that God would land a flying saucer in his yard on March 31, 1998. Concurrently with this theophany, Chen said he would personally perform three miracles: He would become invisible, duplicate his body and simultaneously shake hands with everyone present, and be able to speak each person’s native language. Furthermore, Chen predicted that God would announce His descent during a worldwide television broadcast on March 25, 1998. This prediction insured that the media would provide sensational coverage, while allowing Chen sufficient time to revise the March 31 prophecy, which he found necessary to do when God failed to appear on TV. At the time, he said that his prophecies should be considered “nonsense,” even though God had indeed appeared in the spirit world.

Chen Tao’s religious roots can be found primarily in Buddhism, although its millenarian doctrine comes from Christianity and faith in flying saucers seems derived from popular culture. Chen’s books predominantly discuss karma, antediluvian civilizations, eschatology, and the belief that “heavenly devil kings” rule over humanity. Politically, Chen is an anti-Communist who fears that a nuclear war between China and Taiwan will spark the apocalypse. All but one of the known members of Chen Tao have been citizens of Taiwan. Since no Americans have been invited to join, its evangelical practices should be considered either selective or nonexistent.

Chen and as many as 150 of his followers originally traveled to North America in search of the reincarnation of Jesus Christ. Later, Chen announced that in a previous life he had fathered Jesus and that two children within the group were, in fact, the reincarnations of Christ and the Buddha. Eventually, the group moved to Garland, Texas, because to them it sounded like “God Land.” There, the publicity seeking backfired when anticultists, the media, and local police promoted fears that the “cult” would commit mass suicide, as the Heaven’s Gate adherents had done the previous year in Rancho Santa Fe, California.

Although members of both of these marginal faiths believed that flying saucers would transport their bodies to spiritual realms, Chen Taoists conspicuously and continuously wore white clothes, in contrast to the black uniforms of the suicidal Heaven’s Gate Away Team. In a curious effort to blend in with their Texan neighbors, most Chen Taoists wore white cowboy hats. Two or three of the presumed leaders sported traditional Chinese straw hats, which they said resembled flying saucers. Additionally, adherents wore rhinestone rings in emulation of Chen, who claimed he spoke with God via the jewels in his ring.

On March 31, 1998, hundreds of neighbors, police officers, and news representatives attended a press conference at which Chen said (via interpreter Richard Liu) that his miraculous prophecies had indeed come true because, unbeknownst to those in attendance, all people were gods who could shake their own hands and greet themselves in their native tongues. He did not address the issues of his becoming invisible or welcoming flying saucers. For the remainder of his nearly three-hour speech, Chen stared directly at the sun (which he said would not hurt his eyes), surmised that inanimate objects such as furniture and televisions would become animated in the near future, and warned that strict vegetarianism was the only way to purify one’s soul before the commencement of the Great Tribulation. Finally, when Chen invited nonbelievers to crucify or stone him to death, the Garland Police crowded around him protectively.

The next day, about ten members flew to the state of New York to search for new headquarters. One year after moving to New York, the membership had dwindled to between thirty and forty faithful adherents. At present, Hon-Ming Chen continues modifying his predictions of world destruction.

Address:

Chen Tao
Office of God’s Kingdom
P.O. Box 1608
Lockport, NY 14095

Forrest Jackson

Sources:

- All the Gods. The Appearing of God and Descending of the Kingdom of God: Saving Human Beings by Means of God’s Space Aircrafts.* Lockport, NY: Office of God’s Kingdom, 1998.
- Chen, Hon-Ming. The Practical Evidence and Study of the World of God and Buddha: God’s Salvation and Education. N.p., n.d.
- Cook, Ryan J. “Chen Tao in Texas: A New Religious Movement, Its Host Community, and Mass-Mediated Adaptation.” Paper presented at the annual conference of the Center for Studies on New Religions, Bryn Athyn, Pennsylvania, June 3, 1999.
- God, the Supreme Being. God’s Descending in Clouds (Flying Saucers) on Earth to Save People.* Garland, TX: Kingdom of God, 1997.
- Perkins, Rodney, and Forrest Jackson. Cosmic Suicide: The Tragedy and Transcendence of Heaven’s Gate. Dallas, TX: Pentaradial Press, 1997.

Cherubim and Seraphim/Eternal Sacred Order of the Cherubim and Seraphim

In 1925 in Yorubaland the first ALADURA CHURCH started with the Eternal Sacred Order of Cherubim and Seraphim (C&S) Society founded by an Anglican, Moses Orimolade Tunolashe (d. 1933) and the fifteen-year-old young woman Abiodun Akinsowon, later called Captain Abiodun, also an Anglican. Orimolade began preaching in about 1915 after partially recovering from a long illness. Crowds came to him for prayers for healing during the influenza epidemic of 1918. He was called upon to pray for Abiodun to awaken from a trance, after which she related her visions of heaven, out-of-body experiences, and instructions to use special prayers and holy water for healing.

The movement began as a prayer group within the Anglican church, but withdrew from it because of heavy criticism by Anglican priests. Orimolade and Abiodun associated for a time with African American missionary Daniel Coker (c. 1780–c. 1846) and the United Native African Church in Lagos, where they were given the name “Seraph,” to which “Cherub” was later added, after a revelation that these two words should go together. The members of this prayer movement claimed a special relationship with angels, whom they represented on earth. Abiodun and Orimolade took the revival to other parts of Yorubaland on extended missionary journeys, and they challenged witchcraft openly. This brought them into considerable conflict with both traditional and colonial authorities. The two leaders parted company in 1929, and Abiodun founded the Cherubim and Seraphim Society, the first of several schisms in this movement. This was followed in rapid succession by the Redemption Band of C&S, the Praying Band of the C&S under Ezekiel Davies in 1930, and the Holy Flock of Christ Church in 1932 under Major A. B. Lawrence. Orimolade died in 1933, after which Abiodun made an unsuccessful attempt to reunify the C&S movement, but by 1935 there were six independent C&S churches. Orimolade’s emphases caused him to be known as Baba Aladura (praying father)—a title used by subsequent leaders of his church.

At this time the influential daughter of a chief, prophetess Christianah Olatunrinle (d. 1941), known as Mama Ondo, became Iya Alakoso (mother superintendent) of the Western Conference of the C&S, a separate conference set up to protest against the increasing secessions. She was responsible for guiding the movement in the direction of PENTECOSTALISM until her death in 1941. Her presence in the C&S leadership was evidence of the powerful influence of women in the Aladura movement—although she was denied the title of chairperson.

In 1943, another schism took place in Ilaje, where C&S members began to condemn the traditional practice of twin killing, resulting in the Holy Apostles Community at Aiyetoro (Happy City). There, starting in 1947, an internationally renowned and thriving commercial commune was developed, particularly known for its fishing and transportation industries, with community of ownership under its first Oba, Ethiopian Ojagbohun Peter. After the third Oba introduced private property to the community in 1968, members began to leave, and the community gradually disintegrated.

The various C&S groups came together in 1965 to form what became the National Council of Cherubim and Seraphim. By 1996, all but four of fifty-two C&S groups had reunited in the Eternal Sacred Order of the C&S, under the Baba Aladura, Dr G. I. M. Otubu. The C&S movement continues to be very influential in Nigerian society, with schools and other community projects under its care.

Address:

Eternal Sacred Order of the Cherubim and Seraphim
P.O. Box 577
Lagos
Nigeria

Allan H. Anderson

Sources:

- Authority, S. O. A. ‘Aiyetoro’: The Happy City. Lagos, Nigeria: Eruobodo Memorial Press, 1966.
Omoyajowo, Akin. The Cherubim and Seraphim Church in Relation to Church, Society and State. Ibadan, Nigeria: Claverianum Press, 1975.
Peel, J. D. Y. Aladura: A Religious Movement among the Yoruba. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1968.

Children of God

See The Family

Chile

What is now the nation of Chile was until recently two very different lands. The northern part, largely desert country, had been incorporated into the Incan Empire and was until the late nineteenth century a part of Bolivia and Peru. The middle part of the country was inhabited by the Mapuche people and the southern region by the Yamanas and Alakalufes.

The Spanish made an incursion into Chile from Peru in 1535, but a more effective effort to settle the land began in 1540, when Pedro de Valdivia settled at Valparaiso. Soon afterward he founded the present capital, Santiago. The Mapuches fiercely resisted the Spanish, and it was not until the end of the 1550s that the majority of the land was conquered. Pockets of resistance continued into the nineteenth century. Nationalists of Spanish descent drove Spanish authorities out in 1818 and established an oligarchic state. The new rulers maintained power through an economic alliance with the British. The British supported Chile in the war with Bolivia and Peru in 1879–1884 that resulted in the acquisition of the mineral-rich northern third of the country.

During the twentieth century, the democratization of the country came slowly, through painful steps, and Marxism gained broad support in the face of the refusal of the older aristocratic ruling elite to share power. In 1970 leftists put together a winning coalition government under the leadership of Salvador Allende. They began land reforms and moved the country to socialism. With the help of America’s Central Intelligence Agency, a coup d’état was carried out by Augusto Pinochet. Allende was killed, and a repressive dictatorship imposed on the country. However, in the 1980s, the country was deep in the midst of an economic crisis and was becoming increasingly isolated by the criticisms of its human rights policies. Pinochet was finally forced out in 1988, and a new democratic government took charge in 1989 and began a process of making public the crimes of the Pinochet era.

The traditional religions of the Native Chileans have survived. Mapuche religion is a polytheistic faith, with Nenechen at the head of a pantheon of gods and goddesses. Among the prominent deities is Pilan, who has power over thunder and volcanoes. The religion also involves a strong relationship to ancestors. In the north, the Quechua and Aymará peoples (who make up a substantial portion of the population of Bolivia) also have a polytheistic belief system and a worldview built around the existence of spirits that inhabit various aspects of the world. The religious leaders combine the functions of healers, diviners, and shamans.

The ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH arrived in 1541, and twenty years later the first diocese was established in a suffragan relationship to the Diocese of Lima (Peru). The first seminary was opened in 1584. The oligarchy that led independent Chile in the nineteenth century was Catholic, and the Catholic Church was named the official state religion. Criticism of the government that began in 1878 led to a generation of strained relationships, and finally, in 1925, a separation of the church from the state occurred, with religious freedoms granted to other religious communities (an immediate benefit to Protestantism). The church has continued to receive considerable subsidies for its educational and other charitable work. In the 1970s, the church risked its position by attempting to negotiate the end of the Pinochet government, and though its efforts failed, it emerged as a vocal critic of the government's human rights record. The great majority of Chileans consider themselves Roman Catholics at present.

In 1821, James Thomson (d. 1825), an agent of the British and Foreign Bible Society, came to Chile at the request of the president, who asked him to start some schools. However, it was 1845 before a missionary, David Trumbull (1819–1889), took up permanent residence in the country. His work became the basis upon which missionaries from the Presbyterian Church in the U.S.A. (now a constituent part of the PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH [U.S.A.]) built, beginning in 1873. Lutherans arrived in 1846, but built a German-speaking organization largely limited to the expatriate community.

The beginning of the Methodist Episcopal Church (now a constituent part of the UNITED METHODIST CHURCH) can be traced to the schools started by lay missionary

Status of religions in Chile, 2000-2050

Followers	2000			2025	2050
	total	%	rate
Christians	13,563,000	89.2	1.47	17,246,000	19,185,000
Roman Catholics	11,800,000	77.6	1.47	14,800,000	16,500,000
Independents	3,820,000	25.1	1.79	5,700,000	6,600,000
Marginal Christians	420,000	2.8	2.29	720,000	860,000
Nonreligious	1,063,000	7.0	1.97	1,610,000	2,225,000
Atheists	383,000	2.5	1.65	480,000	575,000
Ethnoreligionists	134,000	0.9	0.91	130,000	120,000
Jews	33,400	0.2	0.68	32,000	33,000
Baha'is	17,900	0.1	1.81	25,000	36,000
Buddhists	5,400	0.0	1.91	7,500	11,000
Muslims	4,800	0.0	1.86	8,000	14,000
Chinese folk-religionists	330	0.0	2.69	500	800
other religionists	6,600	0.0	1.31	9,000	15,000
Total population	15,211,000	100.0	1.51	19,548,000	22,215,000

William Taylor (1821–1902) in Bolivia in 1877. That work was located in the part of the country ceded to Chile in the 1880s. The church experienced growth through the first decade of the twentieth century. However, in 1910, it experienced a schism that both stopped its growth and gave a unique cast to Chilean Protestantism. Chile became one of the first places in South America where news of the Pentecostal revival in Los Angeles, California, found a response. That response was among the Methodists. By 1910 the majority of Methodists in Chile had opened themselves to the Pentecostal experience and that year left the Methodist Episcopal Church to form the METHODIST PENTECOSTAL CHURCH OF CHILE. From this beginning PENTECOSTALISM gained a relatively early position of strength in the country, and the Methodist Pentecostal Church in turn became the parent of several other large Pentecostal bodies

The first church built in Chiu-Chiu, Chile in 1675, after remodeling (Ask Images/TRIP) such as the Evangelical Pentecostal Church, the PENTECOSTAL CHURCH OF CHILE, and the PENTECOSTAL MISSION CHURCH, and numerous smaller churches.

The favorable climate for Pentecostalism in Chile also led various European and American Pentecostal groups to launch work in Chile. These include the Swedish Assemblies of God, the CHURCH OF GOD (CLEVELAND, TENNESSEE), and the UNITED PENTECOSTAL CHURCH INTERNATIONAL.

While Pentecostalism was coming to dominate the Protestant/FREE CHURCHES community, the SEVENTH-DAY ADVENTIST CHURCH had entered the country in 1890 and for a short period was the largest non-Catholic group in the country. Baptists from Germany arrived in 1892, and a Chilean Baptist Convention was formed in 1908. This church aligned itself with the SOUTHERN BAPTIST CONVENTION in 1917, but has not been as successful as have Baptists elsewhere. Other groups that have had some success are the JEHOVAH'S WITNESSES and the CHURCH OF JESUS CHRIST OF LATTER-DAY SAINTS.

There is a small Jewish community in Chile centered upon Santiago, which includes Hungarian, German, and Sephardic elements. Though suffering losses from the immigration to Israel in recent years, it still includes some 17,000 residents. The community has its focus in the Comité Representativo de las Entidades Judias de Chile, headquartered in Santiago. There is a program of Jewish Studies at the University of Chile in Santiago.

During the twentieth century, the wider spectrum of religion was introduced to Chile. A small pocket of Buddhism emerged among Chinese immigrants. The BAHÁ'Í FAITH has had a steady growth since its introduction after World War II. The Western Esoteric tradition appeared early in the twentieth century with the first adherents of SPIRITISM and the opening of a lodge of the THEOSOPHICAL SOCIETY in India. More recently the ANCIENT AND MYSTICAL ORDER ROSAE CRUCIS has gained a following.

Sources:

Fleet, M. Christian Communities in Chile and Peru. Notre Dame, IN: Helen Kellogg Institute for International Studies, Notre Dame University, 1992.

Johnson, N. E. The History, Dynamic, and Problems of the Pentecostal Movement in Chile. Richmond: Union Theological Seminary in Virginia, 1970.

Kessler, J. B. A., Jr. A Study of the Older Protestant Missions and Churches in Peru and Chile. Goes, Netherlands: Oosterbaan le Cointre, 1967.

China

China is a nation with diverse religious beliefs; some originated in China and others were introduced from elsewhere. Both indigenous and introduced religions continue to play a significant role as the new century begins, especially in the era initiated by the establishment of the People's Republic of China in 1949.

Confucianism could be considered a philosophy rather than a religion, but in either case, it is central to any consideration of the Chinese cosmic view. Originally the teachings of Confucius (c. 550–480 B.C.E.) focused on humanistic ethics and moral conduct. He dismissed speculation about the supernatural and insisted on the need for personal responsibility in the context of formal relationships between men and women, parents and children, rulers and subjects. In later centuries, Confucianism was adopted as the state orthodoxy and came to dominate official thinking, culture, and education. Its political expression was the veneration of the emperor as the supreme ruler by virtue of a heavenly mandate and the creation of an elaborate ritual around him.

Folk Religion profoundly influenced society throughout China. Every district had its own particular traditions, practices, and beliefs related to gods, ghosts and ancestors. All over China, local deities made up a varied pantheon including spirits of local heroes, versions of Daoist and Buddhist deities, and local, or animistic, spirits. Celebrations of gods often took the form of colorful processions. Ancestor worship was most common in Southern China, where it played a central role in kinship, lineage, and clan systems. Most households had a small altar where respect would be paid to previous generations. Ancestors and deities were expected to answer petitions. If they failed to do so, the supplicant was perfectly entitled to switch allegiance to others. Temples were often dedicated to several gods, and there was no concept of exclusivity. The entire system was decentralized, unsupervised, and subject to local conditions. The complexities of rituals and divination gave rise to religious specialists such as shamans, diviners, mediums, ritual leaders, astrologers, and healers.

Daoism is a term applied to the philosophy attributed to figures of uncertain historicity, Lao Zi (known to most

Status of religions in China, 2000–2050

Followers	2000		2025	2050
	total	% rate
Nonreligious	532,568,000	42.2 0.88	594,163,000	556,746,000
Chinese folk-religionists	359,618,000	28.5 0.99	418,000,000	420,000,000
Buddhists	105,829,000	8.4 1.19	125,000,000	121,000,000
Atheists	102,238,000	8.1 0.49	110,000,000	115,000,000
Christians	89,056,000	7.1 3.22	135,190,000	168,655,000
Independents	80,708,000	6.4 3.36	120,000,000	150,000,000
Roman Catholics	7,500,000	0.6 1.92	14,000,000	17,050,000
Protestants	640,000	0.1 2.10	900,000	1,200,000
Ethnoreligionists	54,152,000	4.3 0.22	60,000,000	55,000,000
Muslims	19,169,000	1.5 0.52	21,000,000	21,000,000
Daoists	360,000	0.0 1.03	500,000	550,000
Neoreligionists	333,000	0.0 7.87	225,000	230,000
Hindus	15,700	0.0 0.26	20,000	25,000
Baha'is	6,500	0.0 5.02	12,000	20,000
Spiritists	1,900	0.0 0.21	3,000	4,000
Jews	920	0.0 0.18	1,000	1,000
Sikhs	760	0.0 0.33	900	1,200
Zoroastrians	570	0.0 0.30	700	900
Confucianists	60	0.0 0.49	100	200
other religionists	11,400	0.0 0.65	15,000	18,000
Total population	1,262,557,000	100.0 1.02	1,462,931,000	1,456,901,000

Westerners as Lao Tzu) and Zhuang Zi (known as Chuang Tzu), who asserted the existence of an unseen, inexpressible absolute, known as the Dao, pervading the Universe. Their works, dating from about the third century B.C.E., discuss how a person could become a sage by following the Dao, abandoning worldly desires, and acting spontaneously. Daoism later evolved into an esoteric system of religious beliefs centered on the achievement of immortality by a variety of occult means including alchemy, rituals, exercises akin to yoga, and chanting of scriptures. All these practices greatly influenced the various Daoist-like sects popularized as forms of folk religion. The poem Dao De Jin (XX Dao De Jing), attributed to Lao Zi, is one of the most celebrated works of Chinese spirituality. The typical Daoist figure is the hermit, and Daoism was regarded by many of the elite as an alternative to the conventional state philosophy of Confucianism. Scholars who became disillusioned with the life of the court had the option of wandering away from the mundane world. There are many accounts of such men, telling how they retired to remote rural areas where they devoted themselves to meditation, the study of the Dao, medicinal herbs, and music or poetry. These sages, it was thought, could attain the blessed state of immortality.

To turn now to the foreign religions, Buddhism was introduced to China in the early centuries of the Common Era. Having originated in India in the fifth century B.C.E., it was at first mostly confined to foreign residents, but in the fifth century C.E. began to spread among native Chinese. The following centuries saw a rapid expansion of Buddhism, which reached its peak in the Tang dynasty (seventh to ninth centuries). The most popular sects were the PURE LAND and the Chan (later known in the West via its Japanese derivative, ZEN BUDDHISM). It is difficult to summarize the range of doctrines preached by different schools, but most of them advocated compassion, piety, and devotion to Buddha.

When Buddhism was introduced to Tibet, it became influenced by Tibet's own traditional religion and developed into the unique branch of Buddhism that is predominant among the Buddhists in Tibet, Nepal, Bhutan, Sikkim, and Northern India. TIBETAN BUDDHISM also spread into China, under the patronage of several emperors. Today, Tibetan-influenced forms of Buddhism play a significant role, together with Chan and Pure Land, even in mainstream Chinese monasteries. Buddhism never fully recovered from a severe persecution in the ninth century, but it still remained an integral part of the Chinese religious scene, with thousands of temples and monasteries all over the country.

The first documented Christian missionary to China was the Nestorian Alopen (or Alopen) of Persia, who came to China in 635 C.E. Later, Nestorian Christianity flourished in China until the ninth century, when the emperor suppressed all non-Daoist religions, including Nestorianism. Many Nestorians, including Mongolians, were exiled to Central Asia and only returned to China with Genghis Khan in 1215, after which they built a sizable Nestorian Church in China. However, when the Mongolians left China as the ruling class in 1385, the Nestorian Church in China also ceased to exist. What remains in China is the Nestorian Tablet and the Nestorian Pagoda (built in 700 C.E.)—the only standing architectural monument of the ancient Nestorian Church in the world.

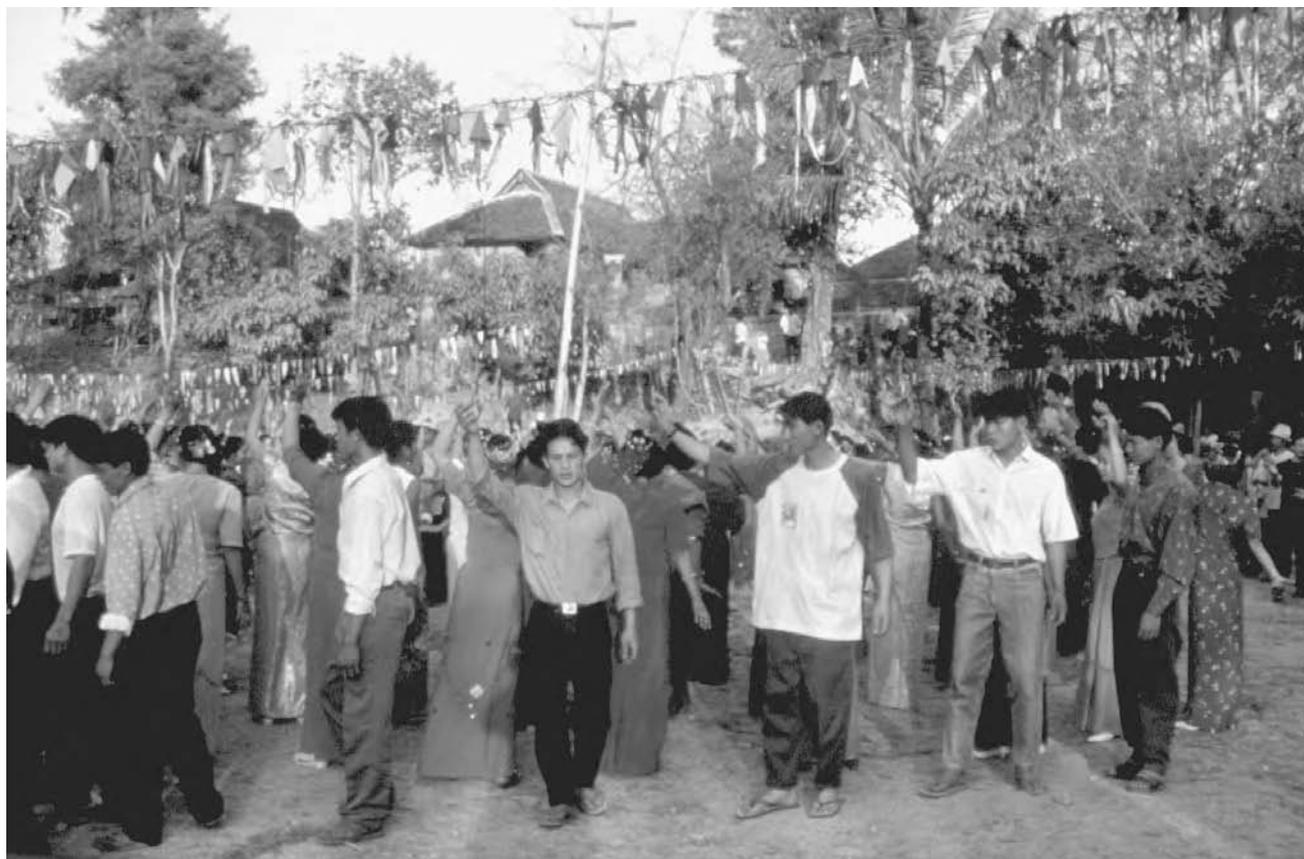

Zoroastrianism was introduced to China in 516 C.E. and enjoyed a steady development for several hundred years. Beginning in the tenth century, it gradually declined in China, and it totally disappeared during the thirteenth centure. Manichaeism came to China in the sixth century C.E., flourished for a few hundred years, and disappeared in the sixteenth century. Starting in the seventh century C.E., Judaism came to China along with Jewish merchants. The Jews had synagogues in China for more than a millennium. Apart from those Jews who came to China in the mid-nineteenth century as merchants, there has been a Chinese Jewish community in Kaifeng, Henan province, with its rabbi and synagogue, since at least the late eighteenth century, and it lives as a distinct community even at the beginning of the twenty-first century.

Arab and Persian merchants took Islam to China in the eighth century C.E. By the sixteenth century, many Muslims were integrated into Chinese society; these sinicized Muslims are known as the Hui people. The Hui are descendants of Muslims who settled in China, often gaining administrative posts under the Mongol regime. They intermarried with Han; quite often the only sign of their former belief in Islam is some lifestyle feature such as headdress or diet. Several minority groups, such as the Uygurs and Salas, are people of Turkic ethnicity who were Muslim far back in history, and who occupied the oasis regions of what was formerly Turkestan, an area that was integrated into China in the nineteenth century. In the nineteenth century, under the influence of the NAQSHBANDIYYA SUFI ORDER, there was a fierce Muslim revolt by the Chinese Muslims. Some have since been exiled to present Kazakhstan and are now known as the Donggan People. There has since been tension between the Muslims and the non-Muslims in China.

Among the prisoners of war from the czar's army in Siberia taken by the Chinese Qing army in 1685 was a Russian Orthodox priest, Maksim Leontbev, who brought with him into captivity an icon of St Nicholas and a few Bibles. These few captives formed the first Russian Orthodox community in Beijing, where the emperor granted them a special area to live, as well as a temple to be used as an Orthodox church. Orthodoxy in China grew steadily and attracted many Chinese followers until the Boxer Rebellion in 1900, when many of the Chinese Orthodox were killed; 120 of the Chinese Orthodox martyrs were canonized as saints. The ORTHODOX CHURCH IN CHINA remained under the authority of the Moscow Patriarch until 1956, when the Eastern (Russian) Orthodox Church of China (KHP) became an independent ecclesiastical entity, headed by Archimandrite Vasyliy.

The ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH sent a Franciscan, Bishop John of Monte Corvino (1247–1328), as the first missionary to China. He arrived in 1294. However, the first Roman Catholics in China were the Catholic merchants from Europe, such as Marco Polo, who was in China in the mid-thirteenth century. Bishop John built a small Catholic community, but it died off when the Mongol Empire collapsed a few decades later. The Catholic mission to China was reestablished by the JESUITS in the late sixteenth century and was based in Macao. Michael Ruggerius, later joined by Matteo Ricci, established themselves in China in 1583.

Dancers at a Buddhist celebration, the Dai Festival, in Yunnan, China (J. Moscrop/TRIP)

Other Jesuits as well as missionaries from other religious orders such as the DOMINICANS and FRANCISCANS followed them. Soon these missionaries had different views on the Chinese tradition of ancestral worship, disputing whether it was a form of pagan worship and so condemned by Catholic teaching, or a nonreligious tradition that could be tolerated if not honored. This conflict gave rise to the famous Rites Controversy, which led to an official ban on Catholicism in China for almost a century, along with intense persecution. The Catholic mission continued only when China was opened up to foreign merchants and missionaries after losing the Opium War in 1842. The Catholic population grew rapidly, in spite of the Boxer Rebellion, which killed at least 25,000 Catholics. When the Holy Hierarchy of the Chinese Catholic Church in China was established in 1946, it numbered 3 million followers.

The first Protestant mission to China comprised the Dutch missionaries who came to Taiwan (then called Formosa, and occupied by Dutch colonial forces) in 1626 and established churches and schools with more than a thousand converts. They were driven away by Chinese military forces in 1662 and failed to reestablish their mission despite several later attempts. In 1807, Robert Morrison (1782–1834) of the LONDON MISSIONARY SOCIETY went to Guangzhou (Canton) via Macao as a staff member for the East India Company and claimed to be the first Protestant missionary to China. In 1808 he returned to Macao. It was not until after 1842, when China signed the Nanjing (Nanking) Treaty after the defeat in the Opium War, that Protestant missionaries were allowed to work in China. After that, China became the largest mission field, with more than 10,000 missionaries, mostly from the United Kingdom and the United States, in the 1930s establishing the Protestant presence through building churches, schools, hospitals, and other social service agencies. By 1949, there were slightly less than one million believers under virtually all major denominational banners—from Anglican, Lutheran, and Pentecostal, to FREE CHURCHES. There were also major indigenous groups such as the Little Flock (the LOCAL CHURCH), the TRUE JESUS CHURCH, the Jesus Family, and the Church of Christ in China.

Since the establishment of the People's Republic of China in 1949, the Chinese Communist Party has governed China. Marxism-Leninism is the state orthodoxy, so atheism, rather than religious belief, is the official ideology. The party has formulated the “Policy of Freedom of Religious Belief,” and the government has established the Religious Affairs Bureau to implement that policy, which is as follows:

1. All citizens have the right to believe, and not to believe religion. The government officially recognizes only five religions in China—Buddhism, Daoism, Islam, Catholicism, and Protestantism. The government has the authority to define what is, and what is not, a religion. Those that are not defined as falling under the five accepted religions are regarded as cults or feudal superstitions and are punished by law. The only exception is the Orthodox Church of China, which is registered with the Harbin Municipal Government to represent the only recognized Orthodox community in China.
2. Each of the five religions is organized into its own patriotic organization under the supervision of the government: the BUDDHIST ASSOCIATION OF THE REPUBLIC OF CHINA, the CHINESE DAOIST ASSOCIATION, the CHINA ISLAMIC ASSOCIATION, the CHINESE CATHOLIC PATRIOTIC ASSOCIATION, the Chinese Catholic Bishops’ College, and the CHINESE PROTESTANT THREE-SELF PATRIOTIC MOVEMENT COMMITTEE of the Protestant Churches of China/China Christian Council. All religious groups have to affiliate with one of these groups and to register with the government. All religious groups have to support the party and cooperate with the government’s interests.
3. Religious activities are allowed within designated religious venues under the auspices of these organizations.
4. Religions are not allowed to instruct people less than eighteen years of age. Religions are not allowed to interfere with the government’s social, education, and marriage policies.
5. Party members, government cadres, military personnel, and public security officers are not allowed to embrace religious belief.
6. National minority groups have special permission to embrace a religion that is not one of the five officially recognized ones, as long as that religion symbolizes the cultural heritage of the particular minority group.
7. Foreigners in China are under separate ruling. They are allowed to have their own sanctioned religious activities, even outside of the five officially accepted religions, but foreigners’ religious activities cannot involve local nationals. Further, all missionary activity is forbidden in China, and contacts between foreign and national religious groups must receive prior approval from the civil authority.

Currently, the government reports that there are more than 100 million followers of various religious faiths, more than 85,000 sites for religious activities, some 300,000 clergy, and over 3,000 regional religious organizations (under the above-mentioned national religions organizations). In addition, there are more than 75 religious schools to train religious personnel. Buddhist groups are separated into three divisions: Tibetan Buddhism, Mahayana Buddhism and Theravada (Pali) Buddhism. There are 13,000 temples and 200,000 monks and nuns (among them 120,000 are lamas, nuns, and 1,700 living Buddhas of Tibetan Buddhism, and 10,000 Bhiksu of Pali Buddhism). There are 25,000 Daoist priests and nuns with 1,700 temples, and the priests are classified into two groups: ZHENGYI and QUANZHEN. The Muslims are mostly Sunnis with a few Shiites; the total population is more than 18 million. Most of the Muslims are Hui and Uygur; in addition there are another 10 national minority groups who are all Muslim. There are 30,000 mosques, with 40,000 imams and Akhunds. These statistics, supplied by the government, are only approximate; accurate numbers of religious believers and their institutions have not yet been ascertained by reliable surveys.

The Protestant Church, with 15 million members, is officially declared to be postdenominational, but various traditions do exist within this context. The SEVENTH-DAY ADVENTIST CHURCH is treated as a separate entity within the China Christian Council. Similarly, the followers of the True Jesus Church and the Local Church (also known as the Assembly and the Little Flock, respectively) have their separate churches in many places. There are many Protestant groups, with a collective membership of perhaps 10 million, not affiliated with the TSPM/CCC; these groups operate clandestinely and illegally.

The Catholic Church in China broke its formal relationship with the Holy See in 1957 when it consecrated its bishops without papal approval. From the mid-1950s until now, relations between Beijing and the Vatican have been very bad, as the Vatican has kept diplomatic relationships with the Republic of China (Taiwan) as the legitimate representative of China.

Currently there is an underground Chinese Catholic hierarchy in full communion with Rome claiming a membership of more than 6 million. There is also a separate government-approved Catholic Church in China with independently consecrated bishops (the majority of them, however, having received papal approval) with a total membership of 6 million and at least 5,000 clergy.

Sino-Vatican rapprochement was on the horizon in 1999–2000, as both parties engaged in intensive negotiations, but both parties broke negotiations off over the controversy created by the pope’s canonization of 120 martyred saints of China on October 1, 2000, the National Day of the People’s Republic of China.

Since the death of the last government-recognized Chinese Orthodox Priest—Gregory Zhu—in October 2000, there is, officially, no longer a functional Orthodox Church of China. There are, however, a dozen communities of Orthodox believers in Beijing, Shanghai, Heilongjiang, Inner Mongolia, and Xinjiang Uygur as well as several validly ordained Chinese Orthodox priests that the government has not (as of 2001) recognized. In February 1997 the Synod of the RUSSIAN ORTHODOX CHURCH (Moscow Patriarchate) declared that it had the religious obligation to care for the Orthodox Church of China (KHP). In 2000 the Moscow patriarch informed the Chinese Ministry of Foreign Affairs of his willingness to send Russian Orthodox clergy to China, but the Chinese authority rejected such a proposal. The current status of the Orthodox Church of China is in limbo.

Kim-Kwong Chan and Alan Hunter

Sources:

Hunter, Alan, and Kim-Kwong Chan. Protestantism in Contemporary China. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1993.

Information Office of the State Council of the People's Republic of China. Freedom of Religious Belief in China. Beijing: State Council of People's Republic of China, 1997.

MacInnis, Donald E. Religion in China Today: Policy and Practice. Maryknoll, NY: Orbis Books, 1989.

Madsen, Richard. China's Catholics. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1998.

Yang, C. K. Religion in Chinese Society. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1961.

Zhufeng, Luo, ed. Religion under Socialism in China.

Translated by Donald E. MacInnis and Zheng Xi'an. Armonk, NY: M. E. Sharpe, 1991.

the whole spectrum of religion that was present in China as a whole became visible in Hong Kong.

Unlike the rest of the People's Republic of China (PRC), where there are specific policies regarding religion, the Hong Kong Special Administrative Region Government, although under the political rule of the PRC, follows the Basic Law in regard to religion. Hong Kong's official policy is religious freedom, without any religious law or governmental division supervising religious groups.

Traditional Chinese religions play a major role in Hong Kong. There are several Buddhist organizations representing various branches of Buddhism, and they operate hospitals, schools, charitable organizations, temples, and monasteries. The Buddhist Po Lin Monastery is home to the world's largest outdoor bronze statue of the Buddha. The Daoists run several Daoist temples and schools. However, the majority of the six hundred temples do not make clear distinctions between Buddhism and Daoism, as they venerate local deities. These temples are manifestations of Chinese Folk Religion—a syncretistic religion of Daoism, Buddhism, ancestor worship, and polytheism from folk legends. The most popular deities are Budhisattva (the Buddha), Guang Yin (Protector of Seafarers), Guang Gong (God of War and source of righteousness), Beidi (Supreme Emperor of the Dark Heaven), Che Gong (a general in the twelfth century C.E.), and Wang Daxian (a local deity). Confucianism is registered as a religious group, and its followers promote the teaching of Confucius. There are also many branches of neo-Daoist groups such as Tin Tak Saint Kau (also known as TIAN DAO or Yiguandao in China), which teaches a form of

China: Hong Kong

Hong Kong resulted from the British settlement of Hong Kong Island beginning in 1841. The following year China formally conceded it and the Kowloon peninsula to Britain. In 1898 British territory was extended by a lease of additional land, the New Territories, for ninety-nine years. Over the years, syncretistic religion. The FALUN GONG registered with the Hong Kong government in the late 1990s as a social organization with a few hundred followers. Since 1998 the birthday of the Buddha has been observed as a public holiday.

The Tin Hau Temple in Hong Kong (P. Treanor/TRIP)

Christianity also plays a substantial role. Protestantism (in the form of Anglicanism) entered with the British in 1841 and has a current membership of 320,000 believers. The Protestant community is composed of more than 50 denominations, 1,300 congregations, 25 theological seminaries/Bible schools, and at least 150 Christian organizations. Most of the mainline denominations have branches here, including the BAPTISTS, Anglicans, Methodists, Lutherans, Presbyterians, and Pentecostals. There are many indigenous denominations, such as the Church of Christ in China (representing Presbyterian and Congregational tradition), the TRUE JESUS CHURCH, and the LOCAL CHURCH (commonly known as the Little Flock). The Protestant community operates more than 500 schools (kindergarten, primary, and secondary), three post-secondary institutions, five hospitals, more than 200 social service centers, and a whole range of charitable institutions. There are two major ecumenical bodies—the Hong Kong Christian Council and the Hong Kong Chinese Christian Church

Union—and two Christian weekly papers, the Christian Times and Christian Weekly.

The ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH began as a mission vicariate in 1841 and was elevated to a diocese in 1946. Cardinal John Wu, assisted by two bishops and close to 1,000 religious persons (about 300 are priests), shepherds 227,000 Hong Kong Catholics in 59 parishes and 30 centers for Mass. There are also an additional 100,000 Filipino Catholics, who are mostly domestic workers serving in Hong Kong. The Catholic Diocese operates more than 320 schools (kindergarten, primary and secondary), six hospitals, a seminary, and a whole range of social service operations. It publishes two weekly newspapers: Kung Kuo Po and the Sunday Examiner. It is in full communion with the Holy See.

The Orthodox Church has a small congregation established in 1997. It is headed by a metropolitan, who is also in charge of the Metropolitanate of Hong Kong and South East Asia under the ECUMENICAL PATRIARCHATE OF CONSTANTINOPLE. The Seventh-day Adventist Church's congregations are part of the Hong Kong–Macao Conference and sponsor a hospital and college, independent from other Christian groups. The CHURCH OF JESUS CHRIST OF LATTER-DAY SAINTS and the JEHOVAH'S WITNESSES have also made their presence known to the public for decades. Christmas Day, Good Friday, and Easter Monday are public holidays.

Other religions are also present. There are five major Muslim organizations in Hong Kong—the Islamic Union of Hong Kong, the Chinese Muslim Cultural and Fraternal Association, the Pakistan Association, the Indian Muslim Association, and the SHIAH FATIMI ISMAILI TAYYIBI DA-WOODI BOHRA Association. Islam has about 80,000 followers, with four major masjids, several charitable organizations, and six schools. The Hindu community numbers 12,000 and has its own temple. The Sikh temple has been serving the small Punjabi community for over a century. The Jewish community, dating from the 1840s, operates three synagogues (one Orthodox and two Reform), a community center, and a religious school. The BAHÁ'Í FAITH has been in Hong Kong since 1923 and formally registered with the government in 1974; it has a few dozen followers with its own religious center. The Zoroastrians registered with the government in 1842 and currently have a center in charge of Hong Kong and Macao affairs; there is a priest with a few followers. Shinto is practiced among the Japanese in their homes in Hong Kong, but there is no Shinto temple. Among the new religious movements, SOKA GAKKAI INTERNATIONAL operates two large centers with an increasing number of followers. The INTERNATIONAL SOCIETY FOR KRISHNA CONSCIOUSNESS established itself in the mid-1970s and is still active with a small number of followers. The NEW AGE MOVEMENT is becoming popular among the youth and intellectuals.

Kim-Kwong Chan

Source:

Information Services Department, ed. Hong Kong 2000. Hong Kong: Hong Kong Government, 2001.

China: Macao

Macao became a Portuguese colony in 1557, but in 1997 was reincorporated into China. It lives under the political rule of the People's Republic of China, but follows the Macao Basic Law in religious affairs. The Basic Law states that the Macao government does not intervene in the internal affairs of religious groups unless activities conducted by these groups are in violation of other laws. A wide spectrum of religious groups now manifests in the former colony.

The major Buddhist group in Macao is ZEN BUDDHISM; the Puzhi Zen Monastery was built in 1622. The second major Buddhist branch—PURE LAND BUDDHISM—started in Macao in 1928. Several smaller Buddhist branches subsequently were introduced in Macao. The Macao Buddhist Association was established in 1997. Daoism has been popular in Macao in various forms of Folk Religion, with worshippers venerating various deities in the different temples. The most popular temple is A-Ma Temple, built in 1605, venerating Mazu—the goddess of seafarers. There are some deities from local legends, such as Zhu Daxian and Sanbu Shen, worshipped by Macao inhabitants. There is no formal Daoist organization except a loosely formed Macao Federation that is now dysfunctional. There is no organized Confucian activity.

The first missionary of the ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH in Macao was the JESUIT Gregorio Gonzales, who came to Macao in 1553. Pope Pius V appointed Melchior Carneiro as the first bishop of Macao in 1566. Pope Gregory XIII formally established the Macao Diocese in 1567, with jurisdiction over the missionary territory of China, Japan, and Indochina. The diocese became the center to train and send missionaries to these mission regions for several hundred years until the gradual formation of regional Catholic hierarchies. The Diocese of Macao currently has 2 bishops, about 250 religious persons (80 priests), and a membership of 23,000. It operates several schools and several social service centers.

The first Protestant missionary to come to Macao was Robert Morrison (1782–1934) of the LONDON MISSIONARY SOCIETY. He arrived in September 1807 and was followed by other missionaries and mission agencies. Currently there are about 3,000 Protestants and 200 pastors and missionaries belonging to about fifty churches or preaching points, three Bible schools, and a dozen church organizations and at least ten mission agencies. The main denominations are the Anglicans, BAPTISTS, Church of Christ in China, Pentecostals, and Christian Mission Church (an indigenous denomination). In 1990, several churches and organizations formed the Macao Christian Association, with a current membership of twenty-nine churches and organizations. The Protestant churches operate schools, social service centers, and drug-rehabilitation centers.

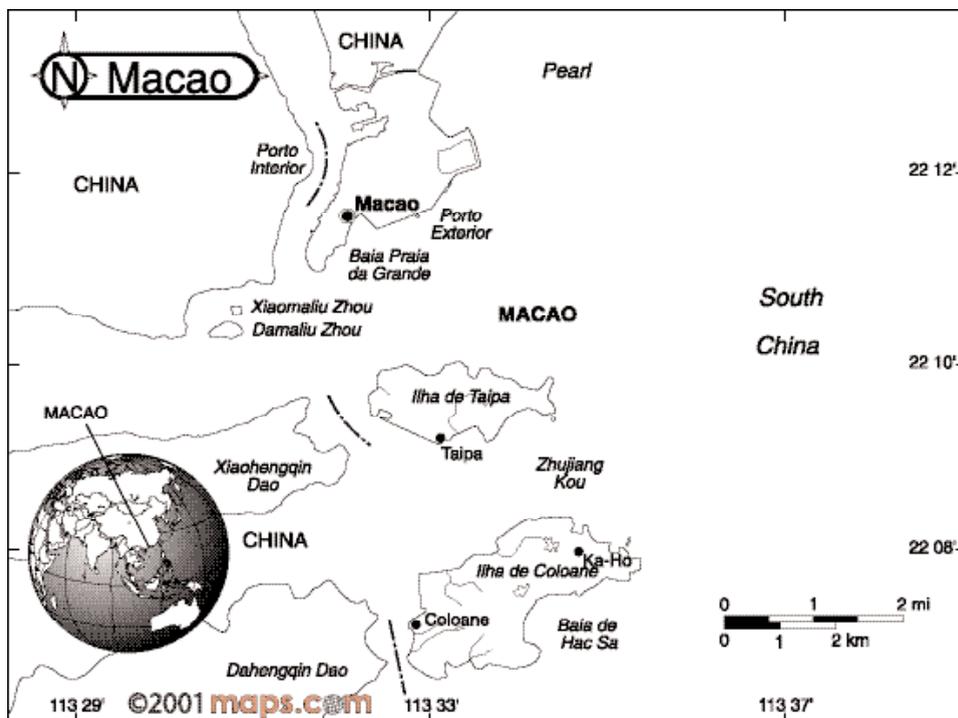

The presence of Islam in Macao can be traced back to the late sixteenth century. Currently there are several hundred Muslims in Macao affiliated with the Macao Islam Association. Zoroastrianism began its presence in Macao in the seventeenth century, and Zoroastrian merchants once had significant impact in Macao, especially in the nineteenth century. Currently they have no religious activity in Macao other than the upkeep of the Zoroastrian Cemetery through the Zoroastrian Center in Hong Kong. The first missionary of the BAHÁ'Í FAITH, Frances Heller, arrived in Macao in 1953. The Baha'is established their first local chapter in 1958 with 24 believers. Currently there are more than 2,000 followers, with four local chapters under the Macao Regional Chapter. There is a branch of SOKA GAKKAI INTERNATIONAL in Macao under the auspices of Hong Kong Soka Gakkai Center. The CHURCH

OF JESUS CHRIST OF LATTER-DAY SAINTS came to Macao in the mid-1980s and is still growing. There is a NEW APOSTOLIC CHURCH congregation, mainly attended by Filipino followers living in Macao. The INTERNATIONAL SOCIETY FOR KRISHNA CONSCIOUSNESS began work in Macao in the late 1980s and now reports a small number of followers.

Kim-Kwong Chan

Source:

Cheng, Y. M., and K. S. Huang. Religios De Macau. Macao: Macao Foundation, 1994.

China: Taiwan

Taiwan is an island 140-odd kilometers (90 miles) to the southeast of the Chinese mainland, across the Taiwan Strait from Fukien province. The religious history of Taiwan is marked by an indigenous tradition overlaid by both Western colonial and Chinese influences. The Chinese influences have resulted from an ongoing need for various groups of mainlanders to seek refuge, both political and economic. This influx from the mainland has included the establishment of pirates' bases, rebel army refuges, and even, after World War II, the site for the National Government in Exile, as the government of the Chinese Nationalist Party has been called. Taiwan's recent religious developments have been most strongly influenced by those fleeing the political situation on the mainland and by the island's continued economic growth.

The indigenous group that until the ninth century C.E. inhabited the fertile southern plains of Taiwan has been identified as being of proto-Malayan ancestry. Familial life was matriarchal, and religious life was centered on the priestess of the village. In his Formosa: A Study in Chinese History, William B. Goddard describes her role: "Under the influence of the sacred samshu, a spirit distilled from the sweet potato, the priestess held communion with the ancestral spirits and interpreted their will to the chiefs."

Tribes not of proto-Malayan stock settled in the north. They have a myth of the "cutting of the sun," which refers to an extended night, and that has led some to infer that this group came from the far north. Other theories, held predominantly by Chinese scholars, suggest that these tribes originated on the mainland. Their evidence relies on the interpretation of annals that refer to the political life and population movements that occurred under the (mainly mythical) emperors of the Xia and Shang dynasties (from before the eighteenth to the eleventh century B.C.E.). These northern tribes, often headhunting groups, demonstrate cultural practices similar to the Yueh, a group that settled throughout southern China and northern Vietnam. From an account of 1904 we hear of one of these northern tribes worshipping a dog that was believed to embody the spirit of the founder of the tribe.

In 611 C.E. there are Chinese records of an expedition launched from the mainland, which returned after encountering strong opposition. From the chaos, famine, and migration that accompanied the end of the Tang dynasty (907), the Hakkas (strangers), a racial group that for centuries had been denied social rights on the mainland, moved to Taiwan and pushed the indigenous peoples out of

Status of religions in Taiwan, 2000-2050

Followers	2000			2025	2050
	total	%	rate
Chinese folk-religionists	11,356,000	50.7	1.00	12,896,000	13,498,000
Buddhists	4,686,000	20.9	0.91	5,040,000	5,400,000
Daoists	2,282,000	10.2	1.00	2,550,000	2,700,000
Neoreligionists	1,520,000	6.8	1.13	1,900,000	2,250,000
Christians	1,410,000	6.3	0.82	1,700,000	1,850,000
Independents	451,000	2.0	1.47	665,000	750,000
Protestants	400,000	1.8	0.78	425,000	440,000
Roman Catholics	300,000	1.3	0.00	300,000	320,000
Nonreligious	945,000	4.2	1.64	1,400,000	2,000,000
Muslims	86,900	0.4	0.83	90,000	95,000
Ethnoreligionists	60,300	0.3	1.66	65,000	68,000
Atheists	42,100	0.2	1.87	68,000	90,000
Baha'is	12,600	0.1	3.38	20,000	30,000
Jews	180	0.0	1.24	250	320
Total population	22,401,000	100.0	1.01	25,730,000	27,981,000

the fertile plains in the west. These people resettled in the foothills of the central and eastern mountains. The approach of Mongols on the mainland during the 1200s hastened this process and saw the arrival of the Hoklos peoples from Amoy and other parts of Fukien. Now it was the turn of the Hakkas to be pushed into the foothills. With this last movement the cult of Mazu Tianfei was introduced. Often presented as a virtuous young girl who risked her life to save shipwrecked sailors, she became the patron deity of all who used the sea and was elevated to the position of “heavenly mother.”

In the early sixteenth century, Taiwan was “discovered” by the Dutch, Spanish, and Portuguese—Ilha Formosa, as the island has been called, being the Portuguese for “beautiful island.” The Dutch established an administration on the south of the island in 1622, the Spanish in the north in 1626. The Christian presence on the island is thus more than four hundred years old, and many of the indigenous peoples were converted to Christianity centuries ago.

The interest from mainland China increased during the disturbances that accompanied the establishment of the Qing dynasty (1644–1911). Many Chinese, particularly in the south of the country, considered this Manchu dynasty illegitimate. Koxinga, a merchant adventurer and supporter of the Ming dynasty, was forced to flee to Taiwan after being routed by the Manchus. He expelled the Dutch East India Company and made the island his kingdom, renaming it Taiwan (terraced bay). Many religio-political secret societies that were anti-Qing in intent and that held Lord Guan (Guan di Gong), the Chinese god of loyalty, as their special patron found refuge on the island. Lord Guan is immortalized in the popular novel Romance of the Three Kingdoms as guarding the throne for the rightful heir. Thus he represented the return of legitimacy. Under Koxinga a military and civil administration was established. Much like Lord Guan, Koxinga himself was deified, at first by the people of Taiwan; after the capture of the island by Manchu forces in the 1690s, his cult was made official. In 1930 a Japanese survey discovered fifty-seven temples dedicated to the worship of this nationalist figure.

After the descendents of Koxinga were defeated, secret societies with a strong millenarian component, such as the White Lotus Society and the Tian-di Society, increased their activity; despite this unrest, during the ensuing decades living standards improved, and the island returned to peace under the Qing. The coming of the official Chinese bureaucracy brought state-supported temples dedicated to Confucius and the further development of Buddhism, as well as of Daoism, both in its popular and philosophical forms.

Religious life under the Chinese in Taiwan involved many layers: At the most basic level, ancestor worship operated primarily as a family cult and secondarily as a clan cult. Above the familial level there were many layers of state worship, the most immediate being the worship of the village or town deity. For example, the patron deity of Taipei is famous for his reputation of preventing the spread of epidemics through the town.

By the terms of the treaty of Shimonoseki (1894), Taiwan became a Japanese possession, and during the World Wars the island was developed as a highly industrialized supply base for the Japanese war effort. Returned to the control of the Chinese Nationalist Government in 1945, Taiwan became the place that this government fled to in 1949. As a part of China that has remained free from Communist control, Taiwan has become the most significant center for Chinese religious development. This became especially true after the Cultural Revolution.

Today, about 70 percent of Taiwan's residents follow the popular combination of Daoism and Buddhism, sometimes referred to as Chinese Folk Religion, that was at one time so evident on the Chinese mainland, or one of the popular new movements such as TIAN DAO. Since 1949 the growing prosperity of the island has allowed Taiwanese religious organizations to encourage the study of Chinese religions and their dissemination to the world. Such organizations as the BUDDHIST COMPASSION RELIEF TZU CHI ASSOCIATION, DHARMA DRUM MOUNTAIN, FOGUANGSHAN (International Buddhist Progress Association), and the highly structured Buddha's Light International Association have now become large international organizations, which are constructing Buddhist temples throughout the island and around the world.

Christianity came to Taiwan in 1621, when some DOMINICANS began a small mission, but the Dominicans were driven out by Dutch Protestants during their period of hegemony (1624–1662). However, the Christian community was totally wiped out by pirates later in the century. The ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH returned in 1859 and Protestants (Presbyterians) in 1865. Christianity thrived even when the Japanese tried to suppress it, first in the 1890s and then during World War II. Christianity burgeoned after 1949, when many missionaries and lay Christians moved to Taiwan with the Nationalist government, and since then Taiwan has been home to numerous Western missionary efforts and a variety of indigenous Chinese churches such as the TRUE JESUS CHURCH and THE LOCAL CHURCH. As the new century begins, however, only about 6 percent of the inhabitants of the island are professed Christians.

There is a small Muslim community, which began with refugees in 1949.

Christopher H. Hartney

Sources:

- Goddard, William G. Formosa: A Study in Chinese History. London: Macmillan, 1966.
- Jordan, David K., and Daniel L. Overmyer. The Flying Phoenix: Aspects of Chinese Sectarianism in Taiwan. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1986.
- Lin, April C. J., and Jerome F. Keating. Island in the Stream: A Quick Case Study of Taiwan's Complex History. Taipei: SMC Publishing Company, 2000.
- Wolf, Margery. Women and the Family in Rural Taiwan. Stanford, CA: Stanford University Press, 1972.

China: Tibet

Throughout most of Chinese history, the three religions of Confucianism, Daoism, and Buddhism have dominated the religious scene. Their fortunes have been closely linked to government sponsorship or persecution, a situation that continues to the present day. In addition to these traditions, various local cults and popular practices have existed alongside the major religions, often borrowing from them or influencing their development.

Confucianism, commonly referred to as the “tradition of the scholars” (rujia), traces itself back to Confucius (Kung Fuzi, 551–479 B.C.E.), who lived during a time in which the traditions of the Zhou dynasty (1122–221 B.C.E.) were breaking down and China had split up into various smaller states, which were often at war with each other.

Confucius lamented what he perceived as a breakdown of social order and proposed that China consciously return to the traditions of the past, a return that he believed would reverse the moral decay. The two key virtues that he thought would restore the country were human-heartedness (ren) and propriety (li). The former term characterizes the Confucian ideal of a person who acts solely in the public interest, who does not seek to put himself forward, but instead only strives to do what is right. Li encompasses a range of attitudes and behaviors, which are mainly connected with how one ought to act in society and the performance of rituals.

Confucius hoped to put his ideas into practice by securing a position of political power, but he was unsuccessful in this. Instead, he devoted most of his life to teaching a group of disciples, and they in turn continued the educational emphasis of the tradition. This proved to be decisive for the fortunes of Confucianism when in 136 B.C.E. the Han emperor Wudi ordered that the Confucian classics be adopted as the basis for state education. This established a pattern of Confucian dominance of the educational system that continued (with some interruptions) until the end of the imperial period in 1911.

Confucius's teachings were mainly concerned with personal cultivation and political theory, but his followers developed the tradition in other directions. Following a Confucian revival that began in the Sung dynasty (960–1279), a movement generally referred to as Neo-Confucianism arose, and this developed a range of ceremonies that became the basis of the state cult. Neo-Confucian scholars played key roles in the political life of China throughout the dynastic period.

The origins of Daoism are often traced back to the ancient sages Lao Tzu (Laozi, c. 6th century B.C.E.) and Chuang Tzu (Zhuangzi, c. 3rd century B.C.E.), but it only emerged as an organized religion during the latter part of the Han dynasty (206 B.C.E.–220 C.E.). Both Lao Tzu and Chuang Tzu outlined a philosophy based on the notion that the universe is created from and sustained by an omnipresent and primordial force called the Dao (literally, “way”). The Dao is the origin of all things and sustains them through the vital energy (qi) that emerges from it. The various religious traditions of Daoism, such as the Celestial Masters (Tianshi) and Highest Clarity (Shangqing), developed these ideas into systems that were mainly concerned with physical well-being and the pursuit of immortality. They were often highly organized movements, and in some cases they challenged imperial authority, but Daoism was also directly sponsored by several Chinese emperors. The Tang dynasty (618–907) was the most ardent supporter of Daoism: It traced its ancestry back to Lao Tzu, and Daoism was used by the Tang emperors as a tool of political legitimization.

Prayer flags are strung across the road and up the hill toward Potala Palace in Lhasa, Tibet. (Brian A. Vikander/CORBIS)

Buddhism first entered China through the efforts of missionary monks from Central Asia. One of the most influential of these was An Shigao, who arrived in Ch'ang-an in 148 C.E. and established the first translation bureau for Buddhist texts. He and his cohorts translated a number of Indian works, but Buddhism did not begin to attract a large number of Chinese adherents until the fourth century. One of its disadvantages was the fact that it came from outside China, and Chinese have traditionally viewed all non-Chinese as barbarians. In order to gain acceptance, Buddhism began adopting terminology and practices from indigenous religious traditions, particularly Daoism. One result of this was that Chinese Buddhism has a distinctively syncretic character.

Syncretism became a dominant theme in Chinese religions during the Tang dynasty, when many Chinese came to believe that the "three traditions" (sanjiao) of Buddhism, Daoism, and Confucianism are not really distinct religions, but rather three aspects of a harmonious religious paradigm. According to this notion, Confucianism relates primarily to one's activities within society, Daoism is concerned with one's relations with the natural world, and Buddhism is connected with death and the afterlife. This belief continues today in Chinese communities, and one commonly sees images of all three traditions in Chinese temples, no matter what their purported affiliation.

This syncretic system predominated in China throughout the imperial period and during the reign of the Nationalists (1911–1947). When the Nationalists were overthrown by the Communists, led by Mao Zedong, however, the new government began actively to persecute religion. Following the Marxist dictum that "religion is the opiate of the masses," the Communists declared that all religious practice was a remnant of China's "feudal" past, which must be eradicated in order that China could move forward into its socialist future.

Persecution of religion was particularly severe during the Cultural Revolution period (1969–1979), and continued until the late 1980s. When the government began to allow limited practice of religion again, authorities were surprised to find that large numbers of people returned to their former devotions, and religious practice underwent a cautious resurgence. Since that time, government tolerance of religion has varied from relative openness to severe repression, but every time the repression eases there is a new flourishing. Today

Buddhist and Daoist temples in China are full of crowds of people praying, lighting joss sticks, and engaging the services of ritual specialists. The only religion that has not benefited from the new openness is Confucianism. Because it was strongly linked to the imperial period, it was singled out for particularly harsh repression during the Cultural Revolution. Moreover, its strength lay in its control over the educational system and its central role in the imperial state cult, and once these functions were taken away there was little popular support.

Confucian ideas continue to influence the attitudes and behavior of many Chinese people, but it can no longer be said to be a living religious tradition in mainland China, though there are still functioning Confucian temples in Taiwan and in overseas Chinese communities.

The religious situation of Tibet is closely linked with events in China. Throughout most of its history, Buddhism has been the dominant religion in Tibet. The introduction of Buddhism is traditionally thought to have begun in the seventh century C.E., during the reign of King Songtsen Gambo (c. 618–650), who is believed to have initiated the “first dissemination” (ngadar) of Buddhism into Tibet. Following the demise of the first ruling dynasty of Tibet, Buddhism went into decline, but it was revived in the eleventh century by the Indian scholar-monk Atisa, who traveled to Tibet in 1042 and initiated the “second dissemination” (chidar) of Buddhism. In addition, Indian tantric teachers had a powerful influence on the development of the tradition. The monastic tradition championed by Atisa and the tantric lineages of such masters as Naropa are the two main paradigms in Tibet to the present day.

Over the centuries, the Buddhist tradition divided into four major schools and a variety of subschools. The major schools include the NYINGMA, GELUKPA (the school to which the Dalai Lama belongs), the SAKYAPA, and the KAGYUPA. The KARMA-KAGYUPA subschool has shown remarkable growth worldwide during the last generation. The BON RELIGION has survived as a Buddhist-influenced form of Tibet’s pre-Buddhist religion.

Prior to the Chinese invasion of Tibet in the 1950s, approximately 20 percent of the adult male population of Tibet were monks, and there were thousands of monasteries throughout the country. During the Cultural Revolution, all but a handful of Tibet’s religious monuments were destroyed, mostly by Chinese Red Guards who sought to smash all symbols of the old society and thus make way for the new Communist millennium. In 1959, following an unsuccessful popular uprising, China dissolved the Tibetan government and took direct control. Following this, the Dalai Lama—Tibet’s temporal and spiritual leader—fled to exile in India, along with almost one hundred thousand of his people.

The religious situation in Tibet today is grim: Human rights organizations report—contrary to the official statements of the Chinese government—that there is virtually no religious freedom in the country. The few monasteries that remain are closely watched by the government, and many have Chinese military personnel in residence to monitor the monks’ behavior. In addition, monks and nuns are generally allowed to study for only a short period each day and are required to attend political indoctrination sessions. The overall impression is that they are only allowed to engage in colorful ceremonies for the benefit of tourists, but that the sort of intensive study and meditative practice that was central to Buddhism prior to the invasion is no longer permitted. The Chinese government is deeply suspicious of any religious group, particularly those that become popular. The suppression of followers of FALUN GONG is a result of this attitude, as is the destruction of a small but popular Buddhist study center in the remote Tibetan valley of Sarthar in 2001.

John Powers

Sources:

- Bokenkamp, Stephen R. Early Daoist Scriptures. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1997.
- Ch’en, Kenneth. Buddhism in China: A Historical Survey. Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1984.
- Kohn, Livia, ed. Daoism Handbook. Leiden: E. J. Brill, 2000.
- Lam, Joseph S. C. State Sacrifices and Music in Ming China: Orthodoxy, Creativity, and Expressiveness. Albany: State University of New York Press, 1998.
- Powers, John. Introduction to Tibetan Buddhism. Ithaca: Snow Lion, 1995.
- Schwartz, Benjamin I. The World of Thought in Ancient China. Cambridge: Harvard University Press, 1985.
- Yao, Xinzhong. An Introduction to Confucianism. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2000.

China Islamic Association

The China Islamic Association was founded in 1953, soon after the formation of the People’s Republic of China in 1949. It coordinates the activity of the Muslim community in China with the central government.

Islam reached the Chinese province of Xinjiang (Sinkiang) during the seventh century, by tradition in 650, with the arrival of Saad ibn Abi Waqqas, one of the companions of Muhammad. The Chinese emperor subsequently approved the building of the country’s first mosque at Ch’ang-an, which remains open today. Subsequently Muslim merchants from as far away as Persia settled in China along the fabled Silk Route, created small autonomous communities, and began to convert the local population. Later Sufis from Baghdad arrived. The community expanded rapidly during the Sung dynasty (960–1279), and were especially valued in the government of Kublai Khan (c. 1216–1294), who recruited thousands of learned Muslims to help build the government infrastructure. By the fifteenth century, Islam had spread among a substantial number of the residents of Xinjiang and gradually became the dominant faith in the region.

Islam established itself among the Han Chinese, who became known as the Hui people. During the Ming Dynasty (1368–1644), the Hui took major steps to integrate culturally back into the dominant Han culture, a process that included their adoption of Chinese names, while keeping their religion. The Hui are now found scattered throughout China but are especially important in Ningxia Hui (an autonomous region and the only Muslim province in China), Yunnan, and Inner Mongolia. The Hui now constitute half of the Muslim community in China and outnumber the Turkish groups, primarily the Uighurs and Tadjiks, who remain a strong minority in Xinjiang. Eventually, some ten different ethnic groups (including the Kirgiz, Uzbeks, Tatars, Tungsiang, Paoans, and Salars) also became predominantly Muslim.

In 1953, the China Islamic Association was assigned the task of seeing to the needs of the Muslim minority, including the care and upkeep of mosques, the printing of the Qur'an, and, most importantly, the supervision of the Muslim leadership. Among its accomplishments was the translation and publication of the Qur'an into the vernacular. It ceased to function from 1966 to 1979, and the government organized a short-lived Revolutionary Group for the Abolition of Islam. Following the closing of the country's mosques, many Muslims fled to the Soviet Union and Taiwan while the Cultural Revolution ran its course.

The lessening of hostility toward Islam began to manifest rather quickly, and as early as 1967 a mosque (for diplomats) was opened in Beijing and one in Shanghai the following year. At the beginning of the 1970s some mosques serving the Hui people were reopened. Broad reorganization of the community, however, only occurred at the end of the 1970s, when a degree of religious freedom was again allowed.

The China Islamic Association was reorganized in 1979 and held its first gathering since the 1960s the following year. Its headquarters is in Beijing. There are, it is estimated, between 10 and 35 million Muslims in China, most Sunnis of the HANAFITE school. Most Tadjik people are Shi'as, but several Sufi orders are also present. In the 1980s pilgrimages to Mecca began to occur, and in 1986 some 2,300 Chinese made the journey. In 1995 the China Islamic Association of China reported that China has 30,000 mosques, 30,000 imams, and 30,000 mullahs. The association oversees the Institute of Islamic Theology.

Address:

China Islamic Association
No. 103 Nan Hen Xi Street
Xuan Wu District
Beijing
100053
People's Republic of China

Sources:

Gladney, Dru C. Muslim Chinese: Ethnic Nationalism in the People's Republic. Cambridge: Harvard University Press, Council on East Asian Studies, 1991, 1996.
Rahnian, Yusuf Abdul. "Islam in China." Posted at <http://users.erols.com/ameen/islchina.htm>.

Chinese Buddhist Association

The Chinese Buddhist Association (CBA) is not a religious denomination but a paragovernmental association that includes clergy and laypersons. It claims to represent the interests of all Buddhist practitioners in the People's Republic of China (PRC). The association is present at national and local levels. Its headquarters are usually located in one of the main temples in each provincial capital.

During the early decades of the twentieth century, Chinese Buddhists made a few attempts at establishing a national association, mainly in response to the threats to monastic property. Amongst other organizations, a Chinese Buddhist Association saw the light in 1929, when delegates from seventeen provinces convened in Shanghai. Although the association was open to lay membership, the clergy were firmly in control. Altogether, there were eight national conferences, until the association was brought under the control of the Nationalist party and government. In 1937, after the Japanese attack on China, it became almost completely inactive.

In 1945, the Venerable Taixu (1890–1947), an important figure within modern institutional Buddhism in China, was appointed the head of the Committee for the Reorganization of Chinese Buddhism. During a general meeting of the Committee in 1947, a new Chinese Buddhist Association emerged. Soon after the Communist victory in 1949, there were various attempts at resurrecting the CBA. After a few years of political skirmishes, an inaugural meeting of the new association was held in Beijing in 1953. Its primary goal was to serve as an intermediary between the Buddhists and the government. The famous lay Buddhist Zhao Puchu (1907–2000) was secretary-general during the entire life of the organization. Its official organ was the magazine Modern Buddhism. An important feature of the CBA of this period was that it did not have ordinary membership. In 1966, as the Cultural Revolution began, the organization ceased all its activities again.

Institutional Buddhist activities finally resumed after 1978. In 1980 a national CBA congress was held in Beijing. The association was essentially a reincarnation of the one that had ceased to operate in 1966. The chairman, Zhao Puchu, and other senior figures had retained their former posts. The leaders of the CBA announced a program for the restoration of Buddhism in the PRC, which was endorsed by the party and reported in the media. The official organ changed its name to Dharma Voice. Since the end of the 1980s, the CBA seems to have engaged mainly in temple administration and cultural and educational activities, keeping a generally low profile with regard to politics. However, many officers are appointed by the government, with no regard for their understanding of Buddhist practice and doctrine. A report published in 1982 listed five major tasks of the national CBA: to help the government to implement the policy of freedom of religious belief; to train monks and nuns; to produce and circulate Buddhist scriptures and other publications; to foster Buddhist research; and to promote exchanges with Buddhists from various countries.

Address:

Chinese Buddhist Association
No. 25 Fu Nei Street
Xi Shi Section
Beijing
100034
People's Republic of China

Francesca Tarocco

Sources:

MacInnis, Donald E. Religion in China Today. New York: Orbis Books, 1989.
Welch, Holmes, The Buddhist Revival in China. Cambridge: Harvard University Press, 1968.

Chinese Catholic Patriotic Association

During the Yuan dynasty (1260–1368 C.E.), the Mongol Empire included not only all of China but extended eastward to include parts of Europe. Thus China was brought into contact with Western Christianity. Through Marco Polo, Kublai Khan (c. 1216–1294) invited Western religious and scientific teachers into his land. In 1289 the pope sent the Franciscan John of Monte Corvino (1247–1328) to China, where he was welcomed by the court. He settled, translated the Bible, and built a church of some six thousand members. He also ran into conflict with the leadership of the Nestorian Church of the East, which had previously established a widespread presence in China. The work prospered until the fall of the Mongols, when all the Catholics were expelled.

Catholicism reentered in the sixteenth century, after the Portuguese established a trading relationship with the Chinese in 1517, but missionaries were limited to Macao. A breakthrough only came in 1574 with the arrival of the JESUITS, who first attempted to build a de-westernized church. Under the Jesuits and other orders the church made modest gains. The Jesuits also initiated a policy of purchasing land and creating close-knit, self-sustaining communities, in which their converts were encouraged to settle. What had originally been an innovative theological approach to Chinese culture became over the centuries a conservative form of Catholicism that was largely isolated from the intellectual currents of the nineteenth and twentieth centuries, both Chinese and Western. By the mid-nineteenth century the church had a quarter of a million members. It had almost tripled by the end of the century.

During the Chinese revolution, the Catholic Church supported the Nationalists led by Chiang Kai-Shek, rather than the Chinese Communist Party. No attempt was made to accommodate to the new government when the war ended in 1949. Because of their obstinacy, Roman Catholics became targets for persecution, and the church was severely repressed. The move to find a more supportive leadership led the government to establish the Chinese Catholic Patriotic Association in 1957. This new organization acknowledged the spiritual authority of the pope but denied his power to directly interfere with the church in China. Most importantly, the new association claimed the right to consecrate bishops without Vatican approval. Although many Chinese Catholics adhered to the association, the pope condemned it as schismatic.

During the Cultural Revolution, the churches were closed, and many buildings were confiscated for other uses. Some priests were arrested, and others forced to marry. A number of loyal Roman Catholics were killed. Both the ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH (sub rosa) and the Chinese Catholic Patriotic Association (CCPA) revived in 1979, when open religious activities were again allowed in China. However, the church faced a severe shortage of priests. The church was also still attached to pre-Vatican II structures, especially the Latin Mass. The vernacular Mass was introduced in the 1990s.

In the wake of the revival of the CCPA, two additional organizations, the National Administrative Council of the Catholic Church in China and the Chinese Bishops College, were created. Together, these three organizations represent the concerns of Catholics to the government. In the meantime, bishops loyal to Rome created a structure that they hoped would allow the Roman Catholic Church to continue. Their actions have challenged the authority of the CCPA. The pope showed his support on October 1, 2000, by canonizing 120 Chinese martyrs on a national Chinese holiday. His actions were denounced by the Chinese government and the CCPA. Since that time, several of the loyal Chinese Roman Catholic bishops have been arrested.

In 1995 the bishop's conference of the CCPA issued its first pastoral letter, on the status and role of women. Issued just before the Fourth World Conference on Women held in Beijing, it called for the union of the Chinese people in the implementation of "China's Platform for the Development of Women" as formulated by the government.

The Chinese Catholic Patriotic Association has approximately four million adherents. It is currently led by Bishop Fu Tieshan. An estimated twelve million Catholics remain loyal to the pope.

Address:

Chinese Catholic Patriotic Association
No. 14 Niou Yin Street
Xi Chen District
Beijing
100009
People's Republic of China

Sources:

Hoke, Donald, ed. The Church in Asia. Chicago: Moody Press, 1975.
Hunter, Alan, and Kim-Kwong Chan. Protestantism in Contemporary China. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1993.
Zhufeng, Luo, ed. Religion under Socialism in China. Translated by Donald E. MacInnis and Zheng Xi'an. Armonk, NY: M. E. Sharpe, 1991.

Chinese Daoist Association

The Chinese Daoist Association is the government organization that regulates Daoism in the People's Republic of China (PRC). Based in Beijing's Baiyunguan District, the Chinese Daoist Association (CTA) was founded in 1932, then re-founded under the auspices of the PRC in 1957. After the antireligious fervor of the Cultural Revolution had subsided, the new directives on culture handed down from the paramount leader Deng Xiaoping resulted in the reestablishment of the CTA in 1979 as well as the establishment of regional counterparts in various states and provinces. The CTA publishes a journal and sponsors conferences to serve scholars as well as Daoists themselves.

The CTA is subject to directives from the government's Bureau of Religious Affairs, which in turn bows to the Department of Propaganda and the Cultural Planning Committee. Also, as many Daoist sites in China are tourist attractions, the Daoist leadership must deal with tourism bureaus. (Note that the Chinese state has always attempted to exercise control over Daoism. See the general article on DAOISM for more details.)

As of early 2001, the director of the Chinese Daoist Association was Min Zhiting, a practicing Daoist, originally from Qingcheng Mountain in Sichuan. The director of the standing committee is Yuan Zhihong, a bureaucrat whose job it is to see that Daoism operates within the limits set by the Chinese government.

Address:

Chinese Daoist Association
White Cloud Temple
Xi Bian Men Wai
Xuanwu District
Beijing
100045
People's Republic of China

Source:

Pas, Julian F. Historical Dictionary of Taoism. Lanham, MD: Scarecrow Press, 1998.

Chinese Protestant Three-Self Patriotic Movement Committee

After the founding of the People's Republic of China in 1949, the Chinese Communist Party (CCP) launched a political campaign to transform China into a socialist society that took a pro-Soviet and anti-Western political stance. Other than a few indigenous Christian groups, most of the Protestant churches in China were mainly composed of denominations heavily linked with Western counterparts and foreign support. Therefore the Protestant community was under intense government pressure to convert into a politically acceptable organization. In September 1950 some Christian leaders, headed by YMCA lay staff Wu Yaozong (1893–1979), who was well known for his pro-Communist view, advocated a pro-Communist declaration entitled, "The Direction Which the Protestant Church in China Should Strive At in New China." This declaration called for both the independence of the Chinese church from its Western parental denomination/mission groups and the education of Christians on the crimes committed by the imperialistic missionaries in China.

The term Three-Self (self-administered, self-supporting, and self-propagating) was introduced as a guiding principle for the independence of the Chinese church from the West. At the outbreak of the Korean War in April 1951, Christian leaders—guided by the government—formed a national organization called "The Chinese Protestant Church Anti-America, Aid-Korea Three-Self Reform Movement Committee." This national committee, headed by Wu Yaozong, established branches all over China to prepare for the First Chinese Protestant Church National Conference, attended by 230 delegates and held from July to August of 1954 in Beijing. This conference established the Chinese Protestant Three-Self Patriotic Movement Committee, with Wu Yaozong as chairman. The committee passed a resolution to (1) lead the Protestant church in China to operate under the Three-Self principle, (2) merge the different denominations into one church body, (3) support the government to build a socialist China, and (4) promote patriotic education among Christians to root out the poisons of imperialism in the church.

Membership of the Three-Self Patriotic Movement Committee (TSPM), as the new organization was called, was restricted to those who had secured party approval by enthusiastic support for the new regime. Many were "progressive" Christians who sympathized with the CCP objectives of social reform and national independence; some were conservative church leaders who decided to cooperate with the new regime; others were underground party personnel infiltrated into Christian circles. The most active and politically reliable members were selected to form the Standing Committee of the TSPM, led by Wu Yaozong and based in Shanghai. Soon the TSPM established regional chapters and published the only national Protestant magazine: Tien Feng (Celestial Wind). Although TSPM was technically not an ecclesiastical, but rather a lay political organization, it functioned as the government-endorsed organ that effectively ruled over the Protestant population in China. All denominational structures and the old National Christian Council were abolished by the TSPM, and churches were merged. Those who refused to cooperate with the TSPM were punished as antirevolutionaries by the secular judiciary apparatus.

The Second Chinese Protestant National Conference was held in Shanghai from November 1960 until January 1961 with 319 delegates. Wu Yaozong was again elected as the chairman, and Bishop Ding Guangxun (K. H. Ting, b. 1915) was elected as one of the seven vice-chairmen. This conference revised the constitution of the TSPM to define it as a patriotic anti-imperialist political organization under the leadership of the CCP and the People's Government. Among its missions were (1) to oppose the American occupation of Taiwan and the conspiracy of the Two-China Policy, (2) to guide Christians to follow the CCP's leadership, (3) to strengthen the political education within the Christian circles, and (4) to give priority to the government's policy of putting production over the needs of religious activity. The TSPM ceased to function from 1966 till 1980 due to the Great Proletarian Cultural Revolution.

The Third Chinese Protestant National Conference was held in 1980 in Nanjing with 176 delegates. It amended the TSPM constitution and established a new organization: the China Christian Council (CCC). The amendments affirmed the political mission of TSPM as the agent that implemented the political policy of the party among the Protestants, reflected new national political objectives such as the Modernization program, and confirmed the newly formed CCC as a parallel organization that would carry the pastoral duty of the church. The constitution of the CCC defined this new organization as the ecclesial body that has authority over the pastoral ministries of the church. In effect, the CCC later organized pastoral ministries such as printing of the Bible, establishing of seminaries and Bible schools, drafting Church polity, and organizing ordinations and consecrations. CCC, like TSPM, established regional and local branches. Both TSPM and CCC are under the authority of the China Protestant Representative Conference. Bishop Ding Guangxun was both the chairman of TSPM and the president of CCC from 1980 until he retired in 1996. The current president of CCC is Han Wenzao, and the chairman of TSPM is Lou Guanzong. Their terms are from 1996 to 2001. The national headquarters of TSPM/CCC are located in both Shanghai and Nanjing.

The relationship between the national TSPM/CCC and regional TSPM/CCCs is one of providing political and ecclesiastical guidance. A regional TSPM/CCC may enjoy a certain degree of autonomy, depending on its relationship with its local government. The regional (provincial and municipal) and local (county and village) branches of the TSPM/CCC run the daily local ecclesiastical affairs. Technically speaking the TSPM is a lay political group, which deals with political matters between the government and the church, while the CCC concentrates on pastoral and religious issues within the church community. In reality, in most places there is little difference between their functions at the local level, for very often it is the same group of church leaders who hold office in both organizations.

In 1993, the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES formally accepted the China Christian Council as a full member to represent the Protestant church in China. In 1994, the government passed a national ordinance stating that all religious groups have to register with the government through the recognized religious organization. Therefore, all Protestant communities in China have to join TSPM/CCC in order to legally exist. Many Protestant groups have refused to join and are operating illegally in China. The CCC, in 2001, declared that there are 15 million Christians, more than 20,000 clergy, at least 40,000 churches/meeting points, a printing press, and 20 seminaries and Bible schools under its jurisdiction. It also recognized that there are a small number of Protestants who have refused to join TSPM/CCC. Other sources have suggested that the non-TSPM/CCC faction might have a population as large as, if not larger than, the TSPM/CCC group.

Address:

China Christian Council
c/o Amity Foundation
71 Han Kou Rd.
Nanjing JS
210029
People's Republic of China

Kim-Kwong Chan

Sources:

- Directorate of the Policy and Regulation of the State Administration of Religious Affairs. Source Materials on China's Religious Organizations. Vol 1. Beijing: China Social Press, 1993. (In Chinese)
- Hunter, Alan, and Kim-Kwong Chan. Protestantism in Contemporary China. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1993.
- Zhufeng, Luo, ed. Religion under Socialism in China. Translated by Donald E. MacInnis and Zheng Xi'an. Armonk, NY: M. E. Sharpe, 1991.

CHINESE RELIGIONS

Visit any Chinese temple in Hong Kong, Taiwan, South East Asia, or any Chinese community anywhere in the world. Observe the religious activities, the attitudes and organizational structures. The temple may be called Daoist or Buddhist, or be named after any of a plenitude of divinities. What you are witnessing is Chinese religion in action. Chinese religion is the religion of the Chinese people. It is different from DAOISM, treated in another article, and Confucianism, dealt with below, although it incorporates elements of both and has influenced both.

China is the oldest continuous civilization on earth (imagine if Greece and Rome had never fallen), and religion is at its heart. The very first Chinese dynasties, long thought of as legendary, are now being confirmed as historical. (Archaeology in China is in its infancy compared to Egypt, for example, and new finds are periodically putting the earliest dates of Chinese civilization further and further into the past).

The concept of “China” itself began with the first emperor, Qin Shi Huangdi, who in 221 B.C.E. conquered several smaller kingdoms to form a unified state. The new empire was called Zhongguo, the Middle Kingdom, still the Chinese name for China, which conveys its geographic and cosmic centrality. It was also referred to as Tian Xia, Under Heaven, which shows, perhaps, that Chinese self-conception was fundamentally religious.

China has seen virtually every major religion practiced in its borders. Indeed, the capital of China during the Tang dynasty (618–907) was at the time the largest city in the world and quite possibly as religiously diverse as New York City is today. Zoroastrians, Nestorian Christians, Manicheans, different kinds of Muslims, and Buddhists all lived together in relative harmony under the authority of the emperor. Later, the Chinese were exposed to Jews, Catholics, and Protestants. But all these religions, with the exception of Buddhism, remained foreign, and did not become part of Chinese religion properly so called, the subject of this article.

Chinese religion is not a specific religion in the Western sense, with an articulate doctrine and confession of faith. Rather, it is a worldview that encompasses the rhythm of agricultural cycles, the primacy of the family, and the idea of China itself. In Chinese discourse, the idea of religion is often placed under the larger category of traditional culture.

The Earliest Dynasties: Divination, Sacrifice, and Ancestor Worship. China’s first three dynasties, the Xia, the Shang, and the Zhou, in many ways laid the foundation for Chinese religion, practice, and worldview for the next two millennia. The Xia dynasty was the time of legendary culture heroes. Fu Xi first established the family unit and bred animals; Shen Nong invented agriculture; Huang Di, the Yellow Emperor, created medicine. There is not yet any archaeological evidence proving the existence of the Xia.

There is evidence that the Shang dynasty was founded around 1600 B.C.E. in the present-day Yellow River Valley provinces. The Shang dynasty was a theocracy based not on military might but on religion and ritual. The ruler was a priest-king who had power to communicate with the high god Di. Like many other civilizations around the world, the Shang dynasty engaged in human and animal sacrifice, which was a form of transaction: Deities were offered goods in hopes of obtaining immediate or long-range benefits. Official sacrifices included meat, grain, and wine. Important people were buried with texts, food, jewels, and human figures. Today, sacrifices are part of all temple services and usually consist of fruit, foodstuffs, and incense.

During the Chinese New Year season, worshippers pray and make offerings at Wong Tai Sin Temple in Kowloon, Hong Kong. (Dave G. Houser/CORBIS)

Another hallmark of Chinese religion from prehistory until today is divination. Definite evidence from the Late Shang shows that rulers used scapulamancy, that is, reading cracks on bones or turtle shells to predict the future. When the Zhou overthrew the Shang, besides ending the practice of human sacrifice, the Zhou kings introduced a new form of divination. By randomly picking from a pile a number of stalks of the milfoil plant, the diviner would generate odd or even numbers, which when repeated several times, would turn into a series of broken or unbroken lines. A diagram of six lines made up a hexagram. The text that interpreted the meaning of the sixty-four possible hexagrams was called the Yijing (more commonly known in the West as the I Ching; the Book of Changes). This Zhou dynasty classic also marked a shift from seeing the forces believed to control divination anthropomorphically to seeing them as impersonal forces and from assuming a relationship of interdependence with deities to questioning the nature of that relationship.

The Yijing is a moral and metaphysical text that links human action to cosmic cycles. It sees the universe as continuously changing and perpetually active. It has probably been the most used book in China (perhaps even the world), consulted by emperors, fortune-tellers, and common folk alike. It was appropriated by Confucians, Daoists, and Buddhists but predates all these traditions. In more modern times, the Yijing has become popular in the West as part of the counterculture. In China today, using the Yijing (but not studying it academically) is technically illegal, though prevalent. Mao Zedong himself is said to have used it to plot military strategy.

Related to divination and sacrifice is ancestor worship. Ancestors were asked about which sacrifice was appropriate, and they were also asked to predict the future. Gods were asked too, but through the ancestors as intermediaries. Ancestor worship is the true bedrock of belief in China. Evidence of such devotion can be found in the burial practice of Neolithic times. The more archaeological evidence has been uncovered, the more support has been found for the hypothesis that the ancestral cult is one of the few constants of Chinese civilization from earliest times to the present. Ancestor worship is a demonstration of the mutual dependency between the living and dead. The dead have more power than when alive, but need supplies and sacrifice; the living need protection.

There is no concept of man's immortal soul in Chinese religion. So what then is worshipped in ancestor worship? Traditional Chinese religion holds that humans have several kinds of souls (or energies) that constellate together to form a human. The po souls are physical energies that disperse back to the earth. The hun souls are the mental energies, which can be stored in ancestral tablets and remain part of the family lineage.

Around 1050 B.C.E. the Zhou tribe conquered the Shang kingdom from the west and set up the Zhou dynasty. Their sacrificial rites were conducted by a young descendant of the royal family, who acted as a kind of medium, or shaman (the Chinese word is wu). Men or women could be possessed by spirits or deities, or send their souls on journeys. In ritual settings, shamans could heal and could also consult with the ancestors. Emperors used them right up until their suppression in the eleventh century. In fact, many Chinese religions have their origins in mediumistic revelations, from the Heavenly Master Daoists of the third century C.E. to the quasi-Christian Taiping Rebellion in the nineteenth century. Several spirit-writing cults active in Hong Kong today are equally based on revelations from shamanic figures.

The Early Confucian Tradition. The Warring States period (403–221 B.C.E.) of the Eastern Zhou dynasty (770–221) was a time of social disorder and political disunity. The Zhou king had little real power; rival states jostled for power. The Warring States was also China's richest era in religious and philosophical doctrine. Counselors for hire went from court to court promoting their own political philosophy and denigrating their rivals. This era has traditionally been referred to as the Hundred Schools period. (551–233). The schools included logicians, hedonists, advocates of universal love, and cynical statesmen. Sunzi, the military strategist who wrote The Art of War, dates from that period as well. The two religious-philosophical systems of this period that survive down to the modern day are those of the philosophical Daoists, as they are often referred to, and the Confucians. The philosophical Daoists are covered in the article on Daoism.

The Confucian tradition has shaped the ethical and ritual norms of China for over two millennia. Its founder, Master K'ung (551–479 B.C.E.) or Kongzi, better known by his latinized name, Confucius, often serves as the emblem of Chinese religion and civilization. Confucius was a petty official in the state of Lu from an impoverished noble family. He became a teacher whose students wrote down his teachings. About one hundred years after his death, Confucius's sayings were compiled into a book of 497 verses in 20 chapters known as the Lunyu, or in English, the Analects.

Confucius spoke of certain virtues that all humans can and should cultivate. These include shu (reciprocity), chung (loyalty), li (ritual propriety or decorum), ren (human-heartedness, humanity, or benevolence), and xiao (filial piety). To practice these virtues means to become a gentleman, the Confucian ideal. Being a gentleman is not a result of mere birth or social position, it is rather a matter of character. These virtues can be taught, thus the importance the Confucian tradition has always placed on pedagogy. The idea of virtue being a matter of character and education, not noble birth, was revolutionary at the time, and constitutes the biggest contribution Confucius made to world civilization.

Note too that all Confucian virtues are based on relationships and action. He advocated morality of and in human relationships. Wholly absent from Confucianism are such Western solitary virtues as innocence and purity. In Confucianism, and in the Chinese religious worldview in general, there is no distinction between secular and sacred. All life becomes a holy ritual, man a holy utensil. Unlike Christianity or Buddhism, the original teachings of Confucianism posit no inner life, and no special relationship between man and God.

The two most important Confucian thinkers after Confucius himself were Mengzi and Xunzi. Mengzi (Latinized to Mencius) (372–289 B.C.E.) believed in the natural human potential for goodness, most notably expressed in his story about how any human being would respond, seeing a baby fall into a well. The most natural, automatic response is to rescue the baby. Mencius taught the natural equality of all things and the immanence of a benevolent divine power referred to as heaven. He fleshed out and standardized many of the ideas of the Analects, and in many ways he is more important than Confucius.

Xunzi (or Sun-tzu; 310–220 B.C.E.) was generally more pessimistic. He saw human nature as fundamentally evil. Only with education can man learn to restrain his impulses. He was also known for his rational AGNOSTICISM, denying any kind of active heavenly principle. From the Sung dynasty on, Xunzi was not as popular as Mencius.

Chinese Cosmology: Yin-Yang and the Five Agents. The Han dynasty (206 B.C.E.–220 C.E.) saw the rise of religious Daoism, as well as the arrival of Buddhism from India via Central Asia. The Han also saw the development of a synthetic cosmology, a grand philosophy for a grand empire, which influenced all aspects of Chinese life from then on, from philosophy to medicine to architecture.

The most important element incorporated into Han cosmology was the theory of yin and yang. Originally referring to the shady (yin) and sunny (yang) sides of a mountain, by the Zhou dynasty yin and yang were the metaphysical building blocks, symbolizing a fundamental polarity that manifests in many ways: dark and light, passive and active, female and male, earth and heaven. Yin and yang are not moral qualities: they do not refer to good and evil. Nor should they be construed as opposites: yin and yang exist in dynamic tension with each other, each containing the essence of the other and each becoming the other.

The other consistently important metaphysical principle is the composition of the universe from the five agents (wu xing). These are water, fire, wood, metal, and earth. They are emphatically not the equivalent of the four elements of Greek cosmology: water, fire, earth, and air. The five agents are not essences, but phases that all things pass through. They were used to explain the succession of dynasties, the astronomical procession, and indeed all processes of growth and change.

Buddhism in China. BUDDHISM was the first portable faith; it was not tied to any particular people or location. Thus it became the first world religion. It arrived in China from India through the trade routes of Central Asia. The meeting between China and Buddhism was one of the great cultural encounters in world history. Both were changed significantly.

Buddhism first entered China in the first century C.E. At first it was regarded as a sect of Daoism (one Daoist scripture told of the legendary founder of Daoism, Laozi [Lao Tzu] going to India and teaching the Buddha). Soon, however, a deeper understanding of Buddhism was developed, promoted by translations of the sutras, the holy texts of Buddhism, into Chinese.

The late Han dynasty, disintegrating and decadent, was ready for Buddhism. Still, there were huge differences to be overcome. The Chinese and Indian civilizations were opposite in many ways. Their languages, including grammar, alphabet, and use of metaphor, were completely different. Their worldviews were similarly opposed. Chinese philosophy posited the existence of the universe and left it at that. Religious debate in China centered on the definition of the good life and questions of family and society. Its cosmology was finite. Indian philosophy was more cosmic, inquiring into the origins of the world. It cared more about an afterlife and salvation.

Po Lin, a Buddhist monastery in Hong Kong (Corel)

Also, Chinese religion was and is nonpsychological, with little analysis of individual personality. Buddhism involves and has always involved a sophisticated psychological analysis. Monasticism, one of the foundations of Buddhism, included many extremely un-Chinese practices, such as cutting off hair and burning of corpses. Worst of all though, from the Chinese perspective, becoming a monk meant leaving one's family, renouncing one's name, and not bearing children. Buddhism justified monasticism by making the sangha (the community of monks) into a kind of family. (Daoism adopted a quasi-Buddhist style of monasticism only in the twelfth century [QUANZHEN DAOISM]).

These differences were the source of Buddhism's appeal as well. Buddhism addressed questions of suffering, death, salvation, and the afterlife that Chinese religion had heretofore ignored. The monkhood promoted social equality; sources show that the monasteries were filled by people from all segments of society: from ethnic minorities, to officials, to farmers. For Chinese women, Buddhism provided (as it still does) a way out of patriarchal Chinese society.

Buddhist monasteries flourished or shut down depending on state policy and imperial whim. To cite one notable example: In 845 the emperor, looking for immortality from the Daoists, decided to persecute the Buddhists. Records show that a quarter of a million monks and nuns were returned to lay life (out of a population at the time of sixty million). Five thousand monasteries were demolished or converted to other purposes. Monastic Buddhism never recovered. More popular sects flourished, notably Ch'an, the meditation tradition, which in Japan is known as ZEN BUDDHISM, and PURE LAND BUDDHISM, the devotional school, which posits that anyone can be reborn in Paradise. These sects continue to exist in China.

Although the previous paragraphs have dealt with MAHAYANA BUDDHISM, China has known all three main branches of Buddhism. THERAVADA BUDDHISM has had a presence in China, though it now only exists in Southwest China's Yunnan province, among ethnic minorities related to the Thai and Burmese. Vajrayana, or TIBETAN BUDDHISM, is of course the religion of the Tibetan people, and has been the religion of choice of Mongols, Manchus, and even Han.

Literati and Neo-Confucianism as Religion. The continuity of Chinese religion is unthinkable without the Classics of the literati, a series of books that formed the basis of classical education from the Han dynasty until the early twentieth century. This canon is somewhat analogous to the Bible, in that it was studied, memorized, and commented on by the elite of Chinese society.

The Five Classics (Wu Jing) consists of Zhou dynasty texts, all of which were said to be edited by Confucius. They include the Book of History, the Book of Changes, the Book of Songs, the Spring and Autumn Annals (another history), and the Book of Rites.

Neo-Confucianism was an attempt to revitalize Confucianism through increasing its focus on social reform, and personal improvement. It developed during the Sung dynasty, after the Confucian tradition had for several hundred years been eclipsed by Buddhism and Daoism.

Neo-Confucians promoted the Four Books (Se Shu) to canonical status. These are the Analects of Confucius, the Book of Mencius, and two short chapters extracted from the Book of Rites, dealing with self-cultivation: the Great Learning and the Doctrine of the Mean. These texts became the basis of the civil service exams for the next seven hundred years.

The Four Books were edited and commented on by the most important neo-Confucian, Zhu Xi (Chu Hsi; 1130–1200). His thought has been called the crowning achievement of the Sung, and his influence has been felt not only in China but in Japan and Korea. Zhu Xi believed all phenomena were made up of principle or pattern (li) and material force (qi). He advocated self-cultivation through an external “investigation of things.” Wang Yangming (1472–1529) challenged Zhu Xi’s metaphysics and program of self-cultivation. Both agreed on moral principles, and the ideal of sagehood, but Wang held that the mind was the source of all things (like the idealist school of Western philosophy) and so objected to Zhu Xi’s program of external study, which depended so much on books. Wang thought all universal principles were already present in everyone’s mind (and so could not be known only by those who could afford to study). Therefore, even ordinary people could self-cultivate while working in the fields, for example.

Another prominent Neo-Confucian philosopher came up with a systematic metaphysics (something the original Confucians were lacking) based on the Yijing. Everything was made up of yin and yang, but prior to that was the Supreme Ultimate, or Taiji, represented visually by the famous diagram of swirls of light and dark forming a circle, each swirl with a dot of the opposite color. This represents the undifferentiated cosmos out of which all things arise. Erroneously known in the West as the “Tai Chi Symbol,” it can be found on everything from surfboards to tattoos.

Take taiji—the word and the concept—and add chuan, meaning fist, to get the name of the slow-moving martial art now taught all over the world, which is said to accelerate the embodiment of the powers of the cosmos within the human frame.

State Confucianism was overthrown in 1905, and the civil examinations emphasizing the four Confucian classics were abolished. Twentieth-century Chinese literati are often called “New Confucians.” Most of them left mainland China and went to Hong Kong and Taiwan and often from there to the United States. New Confucians work toward advancing Confucianism as a Third Way for the development of modern Asian society, as an alternative to both Western market capitalism and communism. They also are bringing their ancient philosophy into the global sphere, and proving it can coexist with democracy, environmentalism, and feminism. New Confucians are mainly university professors, though they have been called upon to make policy in Asian countries, particularly Singapore. The most prominent is Tu Wei-Ming, a professor at Harvard University.

When comparative religion departments were created in the 1960s and 1970s, courses in Chinese religion were generally taught by Chinese professors from the philosophy departments, who were themselves products of either secular or Christian education and came from a Confucian literati tradition. Thus the study of Chinese religion in North America for many years ignored Chinese religion—sometimes even proposing that “the Chinese don’t have a religion.” The Confucian bias was evident in the way Buddhism was minimized and Daoism ignored or reviled. Philosophy was studied at the expense of ritual. The fact is that, although from the time of Xunzi Confucian literati sometimes criticized the “superstition and mysticism” of other Chinese religions, Confucians have traditionally been as religious as any other Chinese. They engaged in divination, sacrifice, and ancestor worship as much as anyone in China. Neo-Confucians even had prayers for rain. In fact, Neo-Confucianism shares many characteristics with Daoism and Buddhism. Neo-Confucians stress the importance of lineage; they dedicate temples to perform rites; they emphasize meditation traditions (in Neo-Confucianism meditation is called “quiet sitting”).

Popular Religion. During the Sung dynasty, popular religion, often referred to as Chinese Folk Religion, evolved into a tradition in its own right, something recognizable today. A pantheon of personified deities and household gods was worshipped in a plethora of local shrines. Popular religion became, in effect, the religion of everyone except clergy and literati.

But much mutual influence existed between these spheres. In the sixteenth century, an explicitly syncretistic religion evolved, combining Buddhism, Daoism, and Confucianism. The founder was known as the “Master-of-the-Three-in-One.” There are still temples in South-east Asian Chinese communities dedicated to this three-in-one religion.

The most important aspect of popular religion is the festival year, based on the lunar calendar. The most important festival marks, of course, the New Year, preparation and celebration of which takes several weeks, incorporating many religious traditions and rituals. There are also three different festivals during the year involving visits to ancestral tombs. Today, of course, many holidays are thoroughly secularized, involving no more than the consuming of special foods. Chinese funerals are huge events, complete with special clothes, various protocols for mourners based on degree of relatedness, continuing sacrifices (at domestic altars, gravesites, and clan ancestral halls), and eventually reburial.

Religion and Rebellion (Sectarianism). Often overlooked in Western discourse about Chinese religion is the fact that it is quite often political and even revolutionary in nature. The Han dynasty saw the Daoist sects of the Heavenly Masters and the Yellow Turbans try to bring about an ideal theocracy on earth.

Millenarian movements increased during the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries. These movements, whether inspired by Daoism or Buddhism, often worshipped goddesses, notably the Queen Mother of the West (Xiwangmu). Perhaps the most famous of such movements was actually Protestant-inspired: the Taiping Rebellion. Hong Xiuquan (1814–1864) had visions inspired by a Christian tract given to him by a missionary. He saw himself as God’s younger son. Inspired by mediumistic trances, he raised an army and took over a good portion of China, burning temples wherever he went. He eventually set up a capital in Nanjing. In 1864 the Imperial army, aided by foreign troops, put him down.

One of the most important of these “heterodox” groups is the White Lotus Society, which began during the Southern Sung dynasty (1127–1279) and has spawned numerous sects ever since. These sects expect the coming of Mi-lo-fo (in Pali, Maitreya), the Buddha of the future, and their leaders have often claimed to be Maitreya himself, or at the least a ruler who will found a virtuous dynasty and thereby usher in a new age. These sects, of course, have always been persecuted by the government, which has driven them further underground, and often made them more popular.

These groups were known for their clinics, schools, and other social services, as well as for their married leadership. The White Lotus groups helped overthrow the Mongols and institute the Ming dynasty in 1368. The first Ming emperor then instituted a strict law against heterodoxy. Still, White Lotus groups were active up to the nineteenth century in North China. Also, they were the inspiration for early twentieth-century millenarian groups, which, though combining elements of many religious groups, are in essence Maitreyist (for example, TIAN DAO).

Religion in the PRC Today. Freedom of religion is officially guaranteed by the constitution of China; however, the government has the power to define what religion is. The five officially recognized religions in China are “Protestantism,” “Catholicism,” Daoism, Buddhism, and Islam. (The first two are in quotation marks because the Protestant Church of China is not affiliated with any denomination, and the Catholic Church is not affiliated with the Vatican. Catholics who remain loyal to Rome are often persecuted.)

Religious groups in China, like all other organizations, from opera troupes to universities to oil refineries, are controlled by a centralized bureaucracy, overseen by the Communist party. Every religious denomination has an organization at the local, provincial, and national level made up of councils of believers who are both lay and clergy, overseen by nonbelievers (party members) responsible for instituting government regulations. Overseeing it all, also at all three levels, is the Bureau of Religious Affairs, made up of bureaucrats, academics, and social scientists specializing in religious studies.

Daoism and Buddhism are the two largest religions in China, but because neither is a membership religion, accurate population counts are difficult to make (in fact by some counts Islam is the largest religion in China). Buddhism seems to have a higher profile, perhaps because of its internationalism and growing popularity in the West. Even during the height of antireligious fervor during the Cultural Revolution (1965–1975), a few monasteries were kept open for show. Daoism is more parochial, with fewer international exchanges and contacts. Throughout the twentieth century, it was more likely to be suppressed as a heterodox cult or as superstition.

Daoist and Buddhist monks must be over eighteen, unmarried, have parental approval, and have lived in a monastery for a two-year trial period. Some outside observers have claimed that Daoist and Buddhist monks today serve more as museum guards and ticket takers than as religious contemplatives. Unquestionably, China has developed monasteries as income-generating tourist attractions and outfitted previously inaccessible sacred mountains with cable cars, hotels, and karaoke bars.

Confucianism is not recognized as a religion in China but as a philosophy and method of pedagogy, although there are some ancestral temples that claim to enshrine the Kong family. After the 1949 revolution, Confucian ideals were attacked as examples of backward feudalism. Lately Confucius has been on a rebound as a moral exemplar, advanced by the government as a model of rectitude and selflessness, as part of their “rebuild spiritual civilization” campaign, an antidote to the corruption and materialism rampant in Chinese society today. In Taiwan, Confucius is a national hero, and his birthday is celebrated as a holiday. Confucianism is much more of a religion among Chinese communities in Southeast Asia.

An important current development in modern China is the rise of quasi-religious institutions. These are neither officially sanctioned religions, nor proscribed “evil cults” (such as FALUN GONG, the Home Church, and the like). They include private charities, temple and lineage associations, nongovernmental organizations, and foreign businesses that surreptitiously promote religion (e.g., Taiwanese-owned factories that include temples on their grounds at which workers are coerced to worship). Most qigong groups also fall in this quasi-religious category (as did FALUN GONG before it was proscribed in 1999). So too do village or lineage festivals, which are officially called cultural or community events in order to maintain a legal status, although they may have very religious elements.

The most important quasi-religious movement in the PRC during the last half of the twentieth century could be said to be Maoism. Chairman Mao Zedong (1893–1976) founded the People’s Republic of China on October 1, 1949. Especially during the years of the Cultural Revolution, religious energies and activities were channeled into the Mao cult. Quotations from Chairman Mao, making up the famous “little red book,” were memorized and recited in groups. Families would bow daily to a poster of Mao. The chairman wanted to be cremated, but after he died his body was put on display in the middle of Tiananmen Square in Beijing. More recently, he has become a domestic folk god, like St. Christopher, his image adorning medallions hanging from rearview mirrors.

The power of religion should never be underestimated in Zhongguo Tian Xia, the Middle Kingdom under Heaven.

Sources:

Ching, Julia. Chinese Religions. New York: Macmillan, 1993.

———. “East Asian Religions.” In World Religions: Eastern Traditions, edited by Willard G. Oxtoby. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1996.

De Bary, William, ed. Sources of Chinese Tradition. 2d ed. 2 vols. New York: Columbia University Press, 1999.

Granet, Marcel. The Religion of the Chinese People. New York: Harper and Row, 1975.

Lopez, Donald, ed. Religions of China in Practice. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1999.

Paper, Jordan. The Spirits Are Drunk: Comparative Approaches to Chinese Religion. Albany: State University of New York Press, 1995.

Pas, Julian F. Turning of the Tide: Religion in China Today. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1989.

Thompson, Laurence G. Chinese Religion: An Introduction. 5th ed. Belmont, CA: Wadsworth, 1996.

Yang, C. K. Religion in Chinese Society. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1961.

Yao Xinzhong. An Introduction to Confucianism. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2000.

Chistiniyya Sufi Order (Cishtiya)

Although the Sufi brotherhood of the Chistiniyya originated in Khurasan and developed some short-lived branches in the Iranian world too, it is primarily an Indian order. It was founded in Khwaja Cisht, today's Cisht-i Sharif in Western Afghanistan, by the Syrian Shaykh Abu Ishaq Shami (d. 329/940), who traced his spiritual lineage back to the early Sufi Hasan al-Basri (d. 110/728).

In the early thirteenth century, when South Asia became a center of armed conflicts between the dynasty of the Ghurid and the Khwarezmshahs, the eighth in the line of Chishti-Shaykhs, Mu'in ad-din Cishti (d. 633/1236), shifted the center of the order to the eastern periphery of the Ghurid empire; the new center became Ajmer in today's Indian state of Rajasthan. At this time already one distinctive feature of the formative period of this tariqa became apparent: The centers of the Chistiniyya have, due to doctrinal reasons, mainly been situated on the periphery of their respective empires. Here the example of leading a pious life became an important factor on the consolidation of Islamic values among an only superficially Islamized population. From Ajmer, Mu'in ad-din sent his spiritual successors (khalifa) to different parts of the emerging Delhi Sultanate, and soon the tariqa spread all over North-western India. One of those khalifas Qutb ad-din Bakhtiyar Kaki (d. 633/1235), gained considerable influence on Sultan Iltutmish in Delhi and thus extended the impact of the Chistiniyya on the society. Nevertheless, his major khalifa, Baba Farid ad-din 'Ganj-i Shakkar' (d. 664/1265), again turned to the less crowded rural areas of Punjab. He is considered a good example for Cishtiya doctrine and practices.

The doctrines of the Cishti-tariqa in its classical period are best summed up in the "Khayr al-majalis" of Nasir ad-din Mahmud 'Ciragh-i Dihli' (d. 757/1356). Two things are to be rejected: sufiah without having been properly initiated by a Shaykh (taqlid) and an initiated Sufi who begs a worldly ruler for money and thus sells his belief (jirrat). Everything, the spiritual and the material too, will be provided by God to him who focuses his mind entirely on God. This absolute concentration on God can best be achieved by the renunciation of all worldly affairs and by leading an ascetic and pious life that relies only on donations (futuh). The community of Sufis lives together in a rather closed-up hall, the jama'at-khana.

At the lower stage of the consciousness of God the primary aim consists in the cutting off of the animal soul (nafs) and the purification of the human soul (qalb) by means of prayer, loud dhikr (dhikr-i jahr), contemplation (muraqaba), and certain exercises to control the breath (pas-i anfas). At a higher stage sama', as a special type of dhikr that uses religious music (qawwal) and dance some very difficult types of ascetic exercises are performed as well. The monistic philosophy of Muhyi d-din b. 'Arabi (d. 638/1240) became most popular especially his famous philosopheme of the "Oneness of Existence" (wahdat al-wujud), which allows for equal knowledge of the creation with knowledge of the creator. The last two aspects, together with a great sense for equality between men in the face of their creator, draw the Cishtiya near to Hindu thoughts and practices and thus made this tariqa adaptable and popular in South Asia.

Baba Farid ad-din appointed a long list of khalifas, but two of them require special attention, as they laid the foundation for the two major silsilas of the Cishtiya-tariqa. The first one, Shaykh Nizam ad-din Awliya' (d. 425/1325) of Delhi, was at the same time his most important khalifa and thus marks the peak of the classical period in the history of the tariqa. In Nizam ad-din the silsila of the Nizamiya is rooted. His tomb is, together with the shrine of Mu'in ad-din in Ajmer and the burial ground of Khuldabad in the Deccan, the main pilgrim's site for the order. The second important khalifa was Shaykh 'Ala' ad-din 'Ali b. Ahmad Sabir (d. 691/1291), to which the Sabiriya-silsila is traced back, though it gained considerable importance only from the fifteenth century onwards, with the activities of Shaykh Ahmad 'Abd al-Haqq (d. 838/1434) of Rudawli in Awadh.

After the time of Nizam ad-din Awliya', due to political developments, new centers of the Cishtiya emerged, although with the above mentioned Nasir ad-din Mahmud 'Ciragh-i Dihli', the city of Delhi remained a main center. Khuldabad in the Deccan became one new important center from the fourteenth to at least the seventeenth century, connected with names such as Burhan ad-din Gharib (d. 738/1337), who standardized the typical genre of Sufi writing among the Cishtis, the oral discourse (mal'fuzat). Another important center in the South became Gulbarga, from which Muhammad Gesu Dazaz (d. 825/1422) propagated the idea of the "Oneness of Testimony," (wahdat ash-shuhud) that was developed by the Kubrawiyya-Shaykh 'Ala' ad-din Simnani (d. 736/1336) against the widely acknowledged teaching of the wahdat al-wujud.

The Era of the Mughals seems to be connected to the rise of the Sabiriya-silsila in North India, though the relation between the emperors and the Sabiri-Shaykhs was not always a warm one. Around this period a considerable number of treatises in passionate defense of the concept of wahdat al-wujud have been written by Sabiris. Even if some of the most outstanding and reform-oriented Sufi personalities in post-Mughal times, such as the founders of the seminary at Deoband, stood also in the line of this silsila, it must be emphasized that they belonged to the Naqshbandiyya-tariqa as well; this fact seems more likely to be responsible for their orientation toward religious reformism is in fact a very common feature in South Asian Sufism.

Pilgrims visit the tomb of a Sufi saint, Mu'in ad-din Cishti, in India. (Helene Rogers/TRIP)

Nonetheless, the founder of today's missionary movement Tablighi Jama'at, Mawlana Muhammad Ilyas Kandhlawi (d. 1363/1944), belonged to the Cishtiya-Sabiriya.

In the eighteenth century the Nizamiya branch saw a revival, which is strongly connected to the activities of Shaykh Kalim-allah Jahanabadi (d. 1142/1729). His "Kashkul-i Kalimi" soon became regarded as the new standard manual for Cishtiya doctrines and practices. The late eighteenth-century philosophical school of Khayrabad/Awadh, to name a prominent example, belonged to this line.

Jan-Peter Hartung

Sources:

- Currie, P. M. The Shrine and Cult of Mu'in al-Din Chishti of Ajmer. Delhi: Oxford University Press, 1989.
- Ernst, Carl W. Eternal Garden: Mysticism, History, and Politics at a South Asian Sufi Center. New York: State University of New York Press, 1992.
- Lawrence, Bruce. Nizam ad-Din Awliya: Morals for the Heart. Translated and annotated. New York: Paulist Press, 1992. (English translation of Nasir ad-din Ciragh-i Dihli's "Khayr al-majalis.")
- Nizami, Khaliq Ahmad. The Life and Times of Shaikh Farid-u'd-Din Ganj-i-Shakar. Delhi: Idarah-i Adabiyat-i Delli, 1955. Reprint, 1973.

Chogye Order (Chogye-Jong)

The origins of Korea's Chogye Order (Chogye-jong) date back to the arrival of the Son Buddhist monk Chinul (1158–1210), later known as State Master Puril Pojo, at Kilsang Monastery on Mt. Songgwang in 1200. This monastery was renamed Son Cultivation Community (Suson-sa) by the king in 1205. It soon became known as Songgwang Monastery. The early Chogye school soon subsumed the remnants of the "Nine Mountains of Son," practitioners associated with the lineages of the "Five Houses" of Chinese Ch'an Buddhism (which came to be known in Japan as Zen Buddhism). Since the Chogye school received royal patronage during the Koryo period (918–1392), it was able to build a foundation strong enough to endure the oppression of Buddhism that came with the adoption of Neo-Confucianism as the state ideology during the Choson period (1392–1910). The Chogye Order preserves a strand of traditional mainstream East Asian Mahayana Buddhism that stretches back several hundred years.

Chinul's systemization of Buddhist doctrine was based on the Platform Sutra of the Sixth Patriarch, the Avatamsaka-sutra and its exposition by Li Tongxuan, and Dahui's Discourse Records. His approach was the concurrent development of samadhi (Sanskrit; the highest state of meditation) and prajna, the faith and understanding of the complete and sudden teachings, and the shortcut hwadu method, which focuses on the critical phrase or headword of a public case (kongan). Although Linji-style Ch'an (Zen) has been promoted by various leaders, Chinul's approach of sudden enlightenment and gradual cultivation remains the doctrinal mainstay of the school. Monks, however, trace their dharma lineage to T'aego Pou (1301–1382), who returned from China in 1348 bearing the lineage in the Yangqi line of the Linji school and who became state preceptor in 1371. In 1372, the community was officially named the Chogye school.

Over a period of two hundred years the school came to control more monasteries and land than any other school in Korea. However, by royal order in 1426, the Chogye school was combined with two other schools, its land and economic holdings were reduced, and it was renamed the Son school. In 1911, control of the monasteries in the school was turned over to the Japanese and the headquarters were moved to the capital. In 1941, the school was renamed the Chogye Order of Chosen Buddhism. After liberation in 1945, the school was again renamed the Chogye Order of Korean Buddhism. Following Japanese policies, married monks and nuns were introduced into the school during the colonial period. This led to a great schism beginning in 1954 between the celibate monks and the married monks. This issue was partially resolved in 1962, when the married monks were officially expelled from the order.

As of May 1997, the Chogye Order administered twenty-five main monastic complexes and more than two thousand branch temples and shrines in the Republic of Korea. The order also sponsors many hospitals, social welfare organizations, schools, and universities, including Dongguk University. These religious sites and other institutions serve and are served by 3,609 monks, 3,483 nuns, 2,413 male novices, and 1,961 female novices. There is no accurate count of the lay followers of the Chogye Order, but most of the more than 10 million Buddhists in Korea are adherents of Chogye monks, monasteries, or temples. Additional branch shrines and monastic establishments overseas serve Korean populations and converts in Japan, North America, and Europe.

Address:

Chogye Order
Taehan Pulgyo Chogye-jong
Chongno-gu Kyonji-dong 45
Seoul, 110-170
Republic of Korea
<http://www.buddhism.or.kr>

Richard McBride

Sources:

Buswell, Robert E., Jr. Tracing Back the Radiance: Chinul's Korean Way of Zen. Honolulu: University of Hawai'i Press, 1991.

———. The Zen Monastic Experience. Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1992.

Mok Jeong-bae. "Buddhism in Modern Korea." Korea Journal 33, 3 (Autumn 1993): 23–49.

Chondogyo

Chondogyo, the most successful of a number of new religions that arose in Korea in the nineteenth century, was founded by Ch'oe Suun (1824–1864). Reacting to what he saw as both the influx of Western ways (especially Christianity) and the moral decay of the nation, he wandered the country for ten years and then spent six years in meditation. While meditating he had a mystical experience during which he was given a mystical book. In 1860 he had a visit from Hanulnim (the supreme deity), receiving a spiritual symbol and instructions to save humankind from sickness. He received the culminating great awakening on April 5, 1860. He began to spread his teachings the next year, but was immediately opposed by Confucian leaders and the government. He subsequently authored Nonhakmoon, a part of the Chondogyo scripture in which he declared his way as the Heavenly or Eastern Way (Tonghak) as opposed to the Western Way (Catholicism).

Tonghak was organized in jops, each composed of thirty to fifty believers. In June 1862, Ch'oe Suun appointed fifteen jop leaders. By this time the new movement had aroused the concern of the authorities, who saw it as a challenge to the government's power. In 1864 the government moved to suppress it. Ch'oe Suun was arrested and executed. His family and most of the group leaders were also arrested and exiled. However, Ch'oe Si-Hyung (1827–1898), Ch'oe Suun's appointed successor, was able to carry on underground. The scriptures were published in 1880–1881, and slowly the movement was rebuilt. In 1893 it emerged as a movement to protect the nation from foreign influence. In 1894 a protest movement against government corruption erupted in Chulla province that became identified with Tonghak. Tonghak continued its attempt to reform the nation through the end of the century.

In 1897 Ch'oe Si-Hyung ordained his successor, Son Byong-hi. The following year Ch'oe Si-Hyung was arrested and executed by the government. Finally in 1904, Son Byong-hi officially renamed Tonghak. The new name, Chondogyo, was a signal to the government that it had been reformed as a nonpolitical religious movement. Although this solved many of its problems with the Korean government, the movement still ran into problems with the Japanese authorities, who, beginning in 1910, occupied Korea. In 1919 Chondogyo leaders organized an independence movement, which was met with a harsh response by the Japanese. Son Byong-hi and many leaders were arrested. Prior to his arrest, he ordained Park In-ho as his successor. Chondogyo continued to work for Korean freedom underground.

Chondogyo is derived from its two scriptures, the Tonggyung Tae-jon (Great Eastern Scripture) and Yongdam Yusa (Memorial Songs of Yopngdam), both penned by Ch'oe Suun. Worship centers on Hanulnim, the Lord of Heaven. Hanulnim is the Great Totality innate in humans who were caused to be by God. Human beings are called upon to improve the quality of their life here and now rather than focus upon an afterlife. They are seen as identical with God but not the same as God. Every person bears Hanulnim, and each is called upon to act toward others as they would act toward God. The people of Chondogyo are attempting to build the paradise of heaven on earth.

Members of the faith practice a spiritual discipline aimed at spiritual cultivation. Basic is the repetition of the Chondogyo Incantation formula, which consists of twenty-one syllables calling the person reciting it to harmonize his/her mind with God. The date of the founding of the religion (April 5) and of the ordination of the second, third, and fourth leaders are celebrated as holidays.

At the end of World War II, Chondogyo's strength was in North Korea, where it had more than a million adherents. A headquarters building had been opened in 1921 in Seoul. That building remains the headquarters of Chondogyo in South Korea. The movement grew rapidly in the postwar years: It had more than 700,000 member in the 1970s and more than a million at the beginning of the twenty-first century. It is estimated that more than two million adherents remain in North Korea. There is in P'yongyang a government-sponsored Chondogyo organization, but its relationship to believers across North Korea is uncertain.

Address:

Chondogyo
88 Kyongun-dong
Chung-Gu, Seoul
Republic of Korea
<http://www.chondogyo.or.kr/>

Sources:

Focus on Korea. 3 vols. Seoul: Seoul International Publishing House, 1988.
Grayson, James H. Korea: A Religious History. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1989.
Palmer, Spencer J., ed. The New Religions of Korea. Transactions of the Korea Branch of the Royal Asiatic Society, vol. 43. Seoul: Korea Branch of the Royal Asiatic Society, 1967.

Christ Apostolic Church

An Anglican lay leader at Ijebu-Ode, Joseph Shadare (d. 1962), formed a prayer group in 1918 together with a female schoolteacher, Sophia Odunlami, who had a vision in which she was commanded to preach healing through holy water only, and to reject medicines. This group, known as the Precious Stone (Diamond) Society, was created to provide spiritual support and healing for victims of the influenza epidemic. In 1922 the society left the Anglican church (present in the form of the CHURCH MISSIONARY SOCIETY) over the issues of infant baptism and the rejection of medicines, both Western and traditional. It began a branch in Lagos and affiliated with a North American non-Pentecostal fundamentalist group called Faith Tabernacle, whose literature had reached Nigeria and who emphasized divine healing and adult baptism by immersion. Contact with the church in the United States was severed in 1925 after doctrinal differences over the Pentecostal gifts of the Spirit (particularly speaking in tongues), the apparent failure of the Americans to support the church in Nigeria, and the American leader's alleged immorality.

The greatest expansion of the ALADURA, or prayer people, movement took place after a revival beginning in 1930 in which Shadare and the Precious Stone Society had a central role. After a series of divine visions, former road construction driver Joseph Ayo Babalola (1906–1959) contacted Shadare, became a member of the Precious Stone Society, and began preaching at Ilesa. He later became general evangelist of the Christ Apostolic Church (CAC), constituted in 1941 and soon the largest Aladura church in Nigeria. Babalola heard a voice calling him to preach using prayer and the “water of life” (blessed water), which would heal all sicknesses. The ensuing revival resulted in thousands of people becoming Christians and burning traditional charms. The colonial authorities became disturbed, for the revival activities were alleged to include witch-hunting and opposition to hospitals and medicine, and therefore they endangered public health. Some of the leaders of the revival, including Babalola, were arrested and jailed. This movement invited British Pentecostals to Nigeria, and missionaries from the APOSTOLIC CHURCH of Great Britain arrived in 1932, supported by the Nigerian church. The association was broken in 1939 over the British missionaries' attempt to control the church and their opposition to the use of the water of life. The African leaders also found the missionaries' use of medicine and quinine objectionable, and this problem led to Peter Anim in Ghana founding the CAC there.

Sir Isaac Babalola Akinyele (1882–1964), the first president of the Christ Apostolic Church (since 1940) became ruler (Olubadan) of Ibadan; he was one of the first converts in Ibadan and a strong financial supporter of the church. Akinyele had become a member of Shadare's Faith Tabernacle in 1925. Babalola died in 1959 and Akinyele in 1964, but the CAC continued to grow. By 1990 it had over a million affiliates, one of the largest churches in Nigeria, and it had spread to several other countries in Africa, Europe, and North America. There were also inevitable schisms, one of the most significant being the Christ Gospel Apostolic Church, founded by the prophet Peter Olatunji, a prominent CAC leader, in 1948.

The CAC tends to distance itself from other Aladura churches and has been regarded more favorably by government and mainline church leaders than other Aladura churches because of its more definite Christology and emphasis on the Bible, its educated leadership, and its considerable involvement in education. Unlike those who belong to most other Aladura churches, CAC members and ministers do not wear white gowns, and they do practice monogamy. However, the church shares the customs of other Aladura churches of prayer, fasting, water and oil for healing purposes, sacred hills and mountains, and the rejection of medicines, alcohol, and tobacco.

Address:

Christ Apostolic Church
P.O. Box 530
Ibadan
Nigeria

Allan H. Anderson

Sources:

- Ayegboyin, Deji, and S. Ademola Ishola. African Indigenous Churches: An Historical Perspective. Lagos, Nigeria: Greater Heights Publications, 1997.
- Oshun, Christopher O. "Christ Apostolic Church of Nigeria: A Pentecostal Consideration of its Historical, Theological and Organisational Developments, 1918–1978." Ph.D. dissertation, University of Exeter, 1981.
- Peel, J. D. Y. Aladura: A Religious Movement among the Yoruba. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1968.

Christian and Missionary Alliance

The Christian and Missionary Alliance (CMA) was founded in 1887 by people who had been attracted to the evangelical and healing ministry of Presbyterian minister Albert Benjamin Simpson (1843–1919). Simpson, a Canadian, began his ministry in Hamilton, Ontario, but moved to Louisville, Kentucky (U.S.) in 1875. During his years in Louisville, he associated with the HOLINESS MOVEMENT, and at one point, while attending a camp meeting at Old Orchard, Maine, experienced a physical healing. In 1882, he left the Presbyterian Church and founded an independent congregation that would embody his ideal of a Christian people centered on evangelical and missionary concerns.

In 1882, Simpson began to issue a magazine calling for interdenominational support for missions. He held the first of a series of missionary conventions in 1884 in New York, and similar conventions were held in other cities over the next few years. These led to the formation of the Christian Alliance, a fellowship of like-minded congregations, and the Missionary Alliance, an agency to send missionaries to different countries. These two organizations came together to create a new denomination, the Christian and Missionary Alliance, in 1887.

Simpson had been deeply affected by Holiness teachings that looked for a deeper Christian life in the experience of sanctification, an experience of the love of God that led to a life of holiness. He developed a theological perspective around the All-Sufficiency of Christ as Savior, Sanctifier, Healer, and Coming King. That theology led to a life of evangelism and missionary support, the experience of the holy life, spiritual healing, and an expectancy of the return soon of Jesus Christ. Within a decade, the alliance had sent more than two hundred missionaries into the field.

During the twentieth century, the alliance sponsored missionaries in more than fifty countries. In the United States, it operated as a loose confederation of independent congregations, but beginning in the 1960s it began to react to a changing world situation. The first sign of change was the separation of mission churches into new autonomous church bodies. Then in 1974, the alliance went through a reorganization in the United States. It dropped its self-image as the focus of an interdenominational movement and declared itself a denomination. In 1980 the Canadian Alliance became an autonomous organization. As more and more mission fields became independent, the missionary endeavor was reorganized as an effort among cooperating national churches, though many of the churches in Third World countries remain heavily dependent on North American support. The former CMA missions are now associated in the ALLIANCE WORLD FELLOWSHIP.

In the early 1990s, the CMA reported 268,000 members in some 1,900 churches. Around 15 percent of the churches were functioning among a variety of Asian Americans and other ethnic groups. There were an additional 335 churches in Canada. The members of the Alliance World Fellowship reported more than 1.9 million members in fifty-three countries. As of 1998, CMA personnel were located in thirty-nine countries.

The CMA has its main headquarters in Colorado Springs, Colorado. The Canadian CMA is headquartered at #510–105 Gordon Baker Rd., North York, ON M2H 3P8 (English-speaking), and 5473 Royal Mount, Ville Mont Royal, PQ H8P 1J3 (French-speaking). It supports three colleges and a theological seminary in the United States and a college and seminary in Canada. The CMA and the member churches of the Alliance World Fellowship generally support the WORLD EVANGELICAL ALLIANCE.

Address:

Christian and Missionary Alliance
8595 Explorer Dr.
Colorado Springs, CO 80920
<http://www.cmalliance.org>

Sources:

- Manual*. New York: Christian and Missionary Alliance, 1965.
- Simpson, Albert Benjamin. The Four-Fold Gospel. Harrisburg, PA: Christian Publications, n.d.

———. A Larger Christian Life. Harrisburg, PA: Christian Publications, n.d.

Christian Brethren

Christian Brethren is the unofficial but increasingly used designation for a resolutely “free church” movement within Evangelicalism, often referred to (by others) as “Plymouth Brethren” after the English port where a prominent early congregation was located. They began in the 1820s in Ireland and Britain, but quickly spread so that by the early twentieth century BRETHREN were found in most parts of the world. Some of this was due to migration, but mostly to evangelistic and missionary work. (At times the Brethren may well have had the largest percentage of their adherents serving abroad since the early Moravians. Currently there are perhaps 2,000 missionaries from their ranks.) Besides the British Commonwealth and the United States, Brethren are found throughout most of Europe (especially Germany and the Romance-language lands from Portugal to Romania), almost all of Latin America and the Caribbean, most of Africa (notably Angola, Chad, Congo, Egypt, Zambia), and much of South and East Asia (especially India and Malaysia). They have remained relatively small, totaling by 2000 perhaps 1 to 1.5 million or so adult adherents in perhaps 20,000 congregations, but they are widely recognized to have had a disproportionate influence on the broader Evangelical movement.

Because of some distinctive ecclesiological emphases, the Brethren have been a very difficult movement for scholars, governments, and fellow Evangelicals to interact with. Yet many emphases of the Brethren have been adopted elsewhere, often without awareness of their origin.

In view of their many internal divisions, and of the minimal relations with other Evangelicals that some Brethren have, it is ironic that one of the two most significant emphases that launched the movement was an insistence upon the unity of all true Christians. This unity was to be visibly and practically manifested not by some formal organization (as Catholics and Orthodox have always advocated), nor by fairly complete agreement on distinctive doctrines or practices (as most Protestant confessions traditionally insisted). Instead unity was based on stressing what believers shared in common (rather than their differences) and was to be shown in at least three ways. (1) The Lord’s Supper should be observed weekly as a significant meeting (often called the “breaking of bread” or the worship meeting) as a regular reminder of the Lord’s sacrifice to create His one body. (2) Distinctive names (like Baptist or Methodist) that could not be equally applied to all Christians should not be used for this encouraged sectarianism. Any biblical terms could have sufficed, but “brethren” prevailed at a time when it clearly included sisters. (3) Formal comprehensive organizations (whether historic as with Catholics or recent as with Lutherans or Friends) were likewise felt to be sectarian and to diminish the role of the Holy Spirit who was thought to be actively leading the body of Christ.

Specialized service agencies (such as publishers, camps, missionary liasons, and, by many, Bible colleges) were seen as the appropriate organizations for ministries beyond what congregations could do. In the English-speaking world this still prevails (hence making it difficult to find details of membership or even numbers of congregations). But through pressure from colonial and other governments, in non-English lands branches of the Brethren have formed central organizations, often with the translation of the term “Brethren” not being part of the name (thus compounding difficulties for statisticians)! Similarly their congregations (which they commonly refer to as “assemblies”) do not use “Brethren” on their buildings, which are usually a “Gospel Hall” or “Bible Chapel” or the like, only sometimes a “Church.” (The Restoration Movement [“Campbellite”] arose in America about the same time as the Brethren did in Britain and with many of the same emphases—and consequences. However, it became more diverse and much larger, but not nearly so widespread globally or [perhaps because of its very strong insistence on believer’s baptism] so influential in the broader Evangelical movement.)

The Brethren emphasis on unity has led in two opposite directions. Many have little cooperation with others—even though they acknowledge them as Christians—because they feel their way to express unity is the only biblically valid one. By contrast, other Brethren have always made a disproportionate contribution to Evangelical non-denominational ministries, both evangelistic and instructional, whether aimed at youth or adults. Their emphasis on unity coupled with fewer Brethren organizational structures facilitates this. Those with this cooperative emphasis are more likely to use the label “Christian Brethren” when they must identify themselves. But often their Brethrenness is unheralded, such as with biblical scholar F. F. Bruce or Ecuador missionary martyr Jim Elliot.

The other key emphasis that created and sustained the Brethren is the insistence on the diverse gifts given by the Spirit to all Christians for ministries. Though such giftedness is now widely accepted, only a few others apply it as thoroughly as Brethren, at least as regards gifts of evangelism, teaching, serving, leading. This is because Brethren find no basis in the New Testament, nor theologically nor practically, for a distinction between clergy and laity. (Traditionally they have seen such bases for distinguishing the exercise of gifts by men and women, though in their case the current discussion does not involve the term “ordination” as it does in other groups.) But despite their insistence on the active role of the Spirit, Brethren do not generally accept the Pentecostal understanding of such gifts as tongues (though in a few countries, Brethren have added Charismatic features, or have divided over whether to do so).

Brethren do however have those “commended” to full-time ministry (besides numerous overseas missionaries), but among the more conservative it usually involves itinerancy. Among those who are more “progressive” full-time ministry primarily with one congregation (still usually with a plurality of “elders”) has been increasingly possible in the last generation or so (and indeed was found in some places from earliest days). But this did not develop rapidly or widely enough to avoid “exporting” many gifted preachers to serve non-Brethren congregations. And while in many countries the Brethren are growing, in others where they were once prominent their numbers and influence are decreasing as “lay” leaders as well as full-time workers see better opportunities to serve elsewhere. The historic emphasis on both unity and exercise of giftedness eases such a transition from the movement of ones natural and/or spiritual birth.

Besides ecclesiology, the only other area of theology to which the Brethren have made a significant distinctive contribution is eschatology. It is they who are generally credited (or blamed) with developing what is known as Dispensationalism. However, its popularizing within much of Evangelicalism was undertaken mostly by Congregationalists, Baptists, Presbyterians and others. They did not stress the Brethren origins both because they believed it to be the biblically correct view and because the Brethren were developing a reputation for divisiveness in many places. (Not all Brethren espouse Dispensationalism.) In other areas of theology, probably most Brethren tend to have a moderately Reformed outlook but with a strongly Pietistic bent. Many have an Anabaptistic aversion to civil government, while some are politically active.

Though not the founder, John Nelson Darby (1800–1882) an Anglo-Irishman who was educated as a lawyer but became for a while an Anglican priest, early came into association with the first Brethren meeting, which was in Dublin, Ireland. Darby soon began a lifetime of global travelling by spreading the movement to the Continent. Another early leader was a German emigrant, George Mueller (1805–1898) of orphanage house fame in Bristol, England. But in the 1840s, the young movement was permanently divided into “Exclusives” or “Closed” (who stressed the informal though strong connections among the assemblies that were meeting “on the ground of the one body”) and the “Opens” (who stressed the independence of each assembly and the willingness to cooperate actively with non-Brethren). Exclusives felt this undercut the emphasis on unity and opened the door to false teaching. Darby was clearly the Exclusive leader, and Mueller (and his various ministries) represented the Open outlook. At first, the Exclusives were much larger and most of the movement’s teachers (who were to influence the development of Dispensationalism) were with them. But because of a much greater missionary and evangelistic emphasis, as well as a tendency for some Exclusives to become Open, the Opens eventually became the larger. By 2000, they probably comprise more than 90 percent of the Brethren, although it must be admitted that many of these are now essentially “exclusive” rather than cooperative in outlook.

Until almost the end of Darby’s long life, the Exclusives held together, but by 1890 they had divided into five major factions, two of which divided again in a generation. But a century later there were only two global circles of Exclusives. One, nicknamed the Taylor Brethren (see PLYMOUTH BROTHERS [EXCLUSIVE]), had prevailed in the English-speaking world (except the United States and Canada, where the Grants were more numerous). The other, often known as Continentals because they prevailed on the European mainland (from which they send forth some missionaries), with difficulty and splintering have gradually reunited most from the six major factions other than the Taylors). In some places they could be involved with other Evangelicals, though this has often led (sometimes through government pressure) to gradually joining with Open or Christian Brethren, even as many Grants had earlier done.

Meanwhile, Opens had only one small official separation (in the 1890s in Britain, calling themselves the “Churches of God”), but throughout the twentieth century probably most countries saw informal and partial divisions into conservative and centrist and progressive groupings. The first can be practically “exclusive” even if not historically derived from them, exhibiting the very sectarianism that was originally opposed. The last can so deemphasize certain Brethren features that they become practically like any other nondenominational Evangelical congregation. The middle group often appears as simply one more Evangelical denomination with a strong emphasis on its own distinctives and institutions. This process is similar to what has happened to most other renewal and free church movements over the centuries that had begun with high aspirations.

There is no central headquarters, but among the several agencies serving them is the missionary organization Christian Missions in Many Lands (P.O. Box 13, Spring Lake, NJ 07762).

Donald Tinder

Sources:

- Baylis, Robert H. My People: The History of Those Christians Sometimes Called Plymouth Brethren. Wheaton, IL: Harold Shaw, 1995, revised ed. 1997.
- Coad, F. Roy. A History of the Brethren Movement. Exeter, England: Paternoster, 1968, 2d ed., 1976.
- Rowdon, Harold H. The Origins of the Brethren. London: Pickering and Inglis, 1967.
- Tatford, Frederick A. That the World May Know. 10 vols. Bath, England: Echoes of Service, 1982–1986.

Christian Church (Disciples of Christ)

The Christian Church (Disciples of Christ) is one branch of the Restoration movement that grew out of the revivalist activities of Barton Stone (1772–1844), Thomas Campbell (1763–1854), and Alexander Campbell (1788–1866) on the American frontier in the early nineteenth century. The leaders of the movement all had Reformed theological backgrounds, but rejected the presbyterian hierarchical polity in favor of a loose congregationalism. They understood the church as consisting of autonomous congregations of members who had made a profession of faith in Jesus Christ. This FREE CHURCH perspective led them to accept the view previously adopted by the Baptists that baptism should be by immersion and limited to adults.

In the middle of the nineteenth century, the churches of the Restoration movement tended to divide over two issues, the use of instrumental music (which the more conservative churches rejected) and the development of any organizations that tended to resemble denominational structures. The more conservative churches tended to be in the southern United States and to consist of poorer elements of the population. The more affluent churches in the northern states were more accepting of instrumental music, especially the use of organs in church worship. During the latter part of the nineteenth century, the northern churches were more accepting of historical critical approaches to understanding the Bible and to more liberal trends in theology.

Through the 1840s the movement experienced rapid growth. A variety of associated schools and publishing concerns were founded. In 1849 a general convention was called to discuss coordinated support of the various forms of missional work in the areas of evangelism, foreign missions, and church extension. That convention adopted the name American Christian Missionary Society. Through the next sixty years, additional boards and agencies were created to oversee other joint programs supported by the churches. In 1910, many demanded that one general convention be formed that would centralize and coordinate the work of the various boards and agencies. That demand led to the creation in 1917 of the International Convention of the Christian Churches.

By the time of the formation of the International Convention, the more conservative wing of the movement, which rejected participation in organizations like the American Christian Missionary Society, had broken away under the name CHURCHES OF CHRIST (NON-INSTRUMENTAL). Besides those who supported the International Convention, there was a third group that rejected the trend toward centralization of activities in a denominational organization. They began increasingly through the century to identify themselves separately as the CHRISTIAN CHURCHES AND CHURCHES OF CHRIST.

The churches that supported the International Convention increasingly came to resemble a denominational organization with a congregational polity. This was finally recognized in 1968 when the International Assembly of the Convention voted itself out of existence and reorganized as the Christian Church (Disciples of Christ). The Disciples formed a representative general assembly, which meets biennially. It elects a general board, which administers all of the programs of the church and represents it to other churches and the government.

The Disciples have been active ecumenically in both the National Council of Churches of Christ in the U.S.A. and the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES. The church supports nineteen institutions of higher learning. In 1990 it reported 1,043,943 members in the United States.

Beginning in the nineteenth century, the Disciples began to support missionary programs around the world. In the later twentieth century, most of these missions have become autonomous churches and in several cases have become a part of united churches (in the Philippines and India, for example). The Disciples retain a partnership relationship with many of these former mission churches. In 1985, the General Synod of the UNITED CHURCH OF CHRIST and the General Assembly of the Christian Church (Disciples of Christ) issued a declaration of ecumenical partnership and four years later affirmed their full communion. In 1995 their world mission agencies merged as a Common Global Ministries Board.

Address:

Christian Church (Disciples of Christ)
222 S. Downey Ave.
P.O. Box 1986
Indianapolis, IN 46206
<http://www.disciples.org>

Sources:

- Garrison, Winfred. Heritage and Destiny. St. Louis, MO: Bethany Press, 1961.
- Harrell, David Edwin, Jr. The Social Sources of Division in the Disciples of Christ, 1863–1900. Atlanta, GA: Publishing Systems, 1973.
- McAllister, Lester G., and William E. Tucker. Journey in Faith. St. Louis, MO: Bethany Press, 1975.
- Short, Howard Elmo. Doctrine and Thought of the Disciples of Christ. St. Louis, MO: Christian Board of Publication, 1951.
- Sprague, William L., and Jane Heaton, eds. Our Christian Church Heritage: Journeying in Faith. St. Louis, MO: Christian Board of Publication, 1978.

Christian Church (Disciples of Christ) in Canada

The Christian Church (Disciples of Christ) in Canada is one region of the larger 823,000-member CHRISTIAN CHURCH (DISCIPLES OF CHRIST) that is spread throughout the United States. The international headquarters for the denomination is in Indianapolis, Indiana. The Christian Church in Canada has congregations in six provinces, with the greatest number located in Ontario.

The first Disciples congregations in Canada were in the Maritimes, and were primarily founded by Scottish Baptist immigrants. The first Canadian congregation was formed near Charlottetown, Prince Edward Island, in 1811, under the leadership of a Scottish Baptist preacher, Alexander Crawford. These Scottish immigrants were very receptive to the early nineteenth-century Restoration movement in the United States, a movement led by Americans Barton Stone (1772–1844) and Alexander Campbell (1788–1866). Many Scottish Baptist churches had become a part of the Restoration movement by 1840. The growth of the denomination was slow, limited by its small size and the vast distances between churches. In 1922 the All-Canada Movement was begun as a way to coordinate and unite the churches and their efforts. Plans were discussed in the early part of the century to unite with the United Church, the Baptists, and the Anglicans, but after 1925 these talks ended. At the end of the twentieth century there were twenty-six congregations in Canada, with around 2,700 members. The Christian Church in Canada is a member of the Canadian Council of Churches and the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES. Its publication is the Canadian Disciple.

Disciples desire the church to live as it is described in the New Testament. Convinced that creeds and theological formulas divide the Body of Christ, they consider the Bible the only authority for faith and practice. This reflects the early Disciple motto, "Where the Scriptures speak, we speak; where the Scriptures are silent, we are silent." Believer's baptism is practiced, and is administered by immersion (although other forms are recognized for church membership). The Lord's Supper is a weekly celebration. These two ordinances are considered to be in obedience to Christ's commands. Lay elders and deacons, both male and female, provide leadership for the church, as well as presiding over the Lord's Supper. Clergy are ordained and granted credentials by each region. Service and mission work in the community and world are also considered to be important.

Address:

Christian Church (Disciples of Christ) in Canada
P.O. Box 23030
417 Wellington St.
St. Thomas, Ontario N5R 6A3
Canada
<http://www.web.net/~disciple/canada.html>

Gordon L. Heath

Sources:

Butchart, Reuben. The Disciples of Christ in Canada Since 1830. Toronto: Canadian Headquarters' Publications, 1949.

McAllister, Lester G., and William E. Tucker. Journey in Faith: A History of the Christian Church (Disciples of Christ). St Louis: Bethany Press, 1975.

Christian Church in Central Sulawesi

The Christian Church in Central Sulawesi began as a Reformed church mission at the end of the nineteenth century, the mountainous terrain making the country one of the last areas over which the Dutch attempted to establish their hegemony. It also became important for the pioneering work of Albertus C. Kruyt (1869–1949), a Dutch missionary who broke with his missionary colleagues and approached the people of Sulawesi and their culture in a more positive manner. He worked on the island for forty years (1892–1932) and built a movement that was integrated into the local culture and society.

Kruyt gained converts for many years, but did not hold an initial baptismal service until 1909, when he had gathered a large group ready to make a public profession of their faith. That event marked the beginning of a new growth phase that continued until World War II, by which time there were 42,000 church members. They were able to survive the war in better shape than other parts of Indonesia through the help of a Japanese civil servant who went out of his way to protect them.

The synod of the Christian Church in Central Sulawesi was organized in 1947, but was immediately plunged into a period of instability, due both to the Islamic revolt centered in the southern part of the island and the secessionist movement against the Indonesian government. Not until the 1970s was Sulawesi to return to a time of relative calm. In 1974, the church finally adopted a formal presbyterial church order. To assist the general recovery of the region from the troubled period through which it had passed, the church founded an agricultural college, which supplemented its older educational program that had included a number of primary and secondary schools. It also sponsors a hospital.

In the 1990s the church reported 160,000 members in 342 congregations. It is a member of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES and the WORLD ALLIANCE OF REFORMED CHURCHES.

Address:

Christian Church in Central Sulawesi
Jalan Setia Budi 93
Tentena Sulawesi Tengah 94663
Indonesia

Sources:

Bauswein, Jean-Jacques, and Lukas Vischer, eds. The Reformed Family Worldwide: A Survey of Reformed Churches, Theological Schools, and International Organizations. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans Publishing Company, 1999.

Van der Bent, Ans J., ed. Handbook/Member Churches/World Council of Churches. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 1985.

Christian Church in East Timor (GKTT)

The ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH arrived on Timor around 1660, in the form of priests of the Dominican Order who came to the East Indies with the Portuguese. When the Dutch took over in 1613, they did not in fact take over nearly as completely as in much of the rest of their territory; they allowed the Portuguese to retain control of Timor and the Catholic Church to keep its mission on Timor. The Portuguese suppressed any attempt of Protestants to organize, and Roman Catholicism remains the dominant religious group. In East Timor, Protestant churches began to appear only in the twentieth century.

Protestantism had gained a following by 1975, when Portugal abandoned East Timor and it was annexed to Indonesia. There were some Protestants among the government officials who moved to the island in 1975, and they took the lead in forming congregations. Also, a number of nominal Roman Catholics identified with the new church. In 1979, the Protestant Church in Indonesia established the Coordinating Agency of Protestant Christian Congregations in East Timor. This agency moved to establish a regional church of the kind that operated on other Indonesian islands. The first synod of what became the Christian Church in East Timor (Gereja Kristen di Timor Timur [GKTT]) met in 1988.

The church adopted a presbyterian form of church order and followed other Protestant bodies in the countries by making the ancient Christian creeds its standards of doctrine and not adding any of the sixteenth-century Protestant confessions. The church adopted an ecumenical stance, and in 1989 it identified with the WORLD ALLIANCE OF REFORMED CHURCHES. It joined the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES in 1993.

The church has grown rapidly. It had less than 7,000 members when organized in 1979. In 1996, it reported 34,625 members in its sixty-seven congregations. It oversees four maternity schools and one clinic as part of its commitment to the larger community in East Timor.

Address:

Christian Church in East Timor
P.O. Box 1186
Jalan Martires de Patria
Dili 88110 Timor Timur
Indonesia

Source:

Bauswein, Jean-Jacques, and Lukas Vischer, eds. The Reformed Family Worldwide: A Survey of Reformed Churches, Theological Schools, and International Organizations. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans Publishing Company, 1999.

Christian Church in South Sulawesi (GKSS)

The Christian Church in South Sulawesi (Gereja Kristen in Sulawesi Selatan, [GKSS]) began in 1933, but built on a century of Protestant contact with the people of the southern part of Sulawesi. In 1848 a translator arrived at the Dutch settlement in Makassar and translated the Bible into the two local languages. At the time Islam was spreading through the region, and the Dutch authorities prevented the Protestants from opening a mission station, as they tried to do in 1858. Another attempt was made in 1895, but had little success and was abandoned in 1905.

Finally in 1933 a mission was established on the nearby island of Salayar among a group of heterodox Muslims. That mission provided a point of contact with the main island. Simultaneously, a congregation of the REFORMED CHURCHES IN THE NETHERLANDS in Java started a mission in South Sulawesi. Several hundred people converted prior to the Japanese occupation. Following World War II, South Sulawesi became the site of an Islamic revolt that lasted through the 1950s. It was not until the mid-1960s that the Christian community recovered. In 1966 the two missions merged and formed the Christian Church in South Sulawesi. It has grown slowly, but has been unable to effectively penetrate the Muslim community.

The church has a presbyterian organization, with a synod as the highest legislative body. In the 1990s it reported 6,500 members in forty-one congregations. It is a member of the WORLD ALLIANCE OF REFORMED CHURCHES and the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES.

Address:

Christian Church in South Sulawesi
P.O. Box 11186
Jalan Ketilang No. 4
Ujang Pandang 90011 Sulawesi Selatan
Indonesia

Source:

Bauswein, Jean-Jacques, and Lukas Vischer, eds. The Reformed Family Worldwide: A Survey of Reformed Churches, Theological Schools, and International Organizations. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans Publishing Company, 1999.

Christian Churches and Churches of Christ

The Christian Churches and Churches of Christ form a single branch of the Restoration movement that grew out of the revivalist activities of Barton Stone (1772–1844), Thomas Campbell (1763–1854), and Alexander Campbell (1788–1866) on the American frontier in the early nineteenth century. The leaders of the movement all had Reformed theological backgrounds, but rejected the presbyterian hierarchical polity in favor of congregationalism. They also adopted a FREE CHURCH perspective that saw the church as made up of autonomous congregations of members who had made an adult profession of faith in Jesus Christ.

As the movement developed it associated with some similar antiauthoritarian movements that had developed in the eastern part of the United States under James O'Kelly (1757–1826) in Virginia and Abner Jones (c. 1772–1841) and Elias Smith (1769–1846) in New England. These groups identified themselves as simply the Christian Church. Thus they had a natural affinity with the larger Restoration movement, which rejected all denominational labels. They also rejected church creeds, preferring to rely upon the Bible alone as their guiding authority. Alexander Campbell had stated their position: "Where the Scriptures speak, we speak; where the Scriptures are silent, we are silent."

As the movement developed, it divided over several important issues resulting from variant interpretations of the basic guiding principle. The most conservative wing rejected the use of instrumental music in worship and the organization of an association or fellowship of churches that offered the possibility of developing into a denominational structure. This conservative wing is now known as the CHURCHES OF CHRIST (NON-INSTRUMENTAL). The more liberal wing had no problem with instrumental music (especially organ music) and in the 1840s began to develop annual meetings of congregational representatives that led to the emergence of a new denomination, the CHRISTIAN CHURCH (DISCIPLES OF CHRIST). The Christian Churches and Churches of Christ fit between these two groups. The congregations do not have an issue with instrumental music. They are opposed to the development of denominational machinery, but are not opposed to voluntary gatherings at which representatives of the churches facilitate cooperative activities in missions and ministries. Such an annual gathering is coordinated by the North American Christian Convention (4210 Bridgetown Rd., Cincinnati, OH 45811). There is also an annual National Missionary Convention that focuses upon programs outside the United States.

In the absence of denominational machinery, the congregations have created a variety of outreach programs beyond the local churches. Members have organized colleges and a variety of missionary societies. Each school and missionary agency is independent and seeks support by a direct appeal to local congregations. In this manner missionaries are now supported in more than fifty countries.

In 1931 many of the Christian Churches merged with the Congregational Church to form the General Council of the Congregational-Christian Churches (now a constituent part of the UNITED CHURCH OF CHRIST). Those that did not join the merger identified with the more moderate congregations, which called themselves Churches of Christ, and in the last half of the twentieth century emerged as a third significant branch of the Restoration movement.

The Christian Churches and Churches of Christ do not have a central headquarters. Among thirty-eight colleges identified with this movement are the Cincinnati Bible College and Seminary in Cincinnati, Ohio, and Lincoln Christian College and Seminary in Lincoln, Nebraska. Among the prominent periodicals identified with it are the Christian Standard and the Lookout, both published by the Christian Standard Publishing House (8121 Hamilton Ave., Cincinnati, OH 45231), which also publishes much Christian education material used by the congregations. In 1995, the Christian Churches and Churches of Christ reported 1,100,000 members in the United States and 6,000 members in Canada. Over 1500 missionaries were supported by the churches in fifty-three additional countries. Mission Services Association (Box 2427, Knoxville, TN 37901–2427) promotes the missionary programs operating among the churches.

Sources:

- Dowling, Enois E. The Restoration Movement. Cincinnati, OH: Standard Publishing, 1964.
- Leggett, Marshall. Introduction to the Restoration Ideal. Cincinnati, OH: Standard Publishing, 1986.
- Murch, James DeForest. Christians Only. Cincinnati, OH: Standard Publishing, 1962.
- NACC, History and Purpose. Cincinnati, OH: North American Christian Convention, 1973.

Christian Churches of Java (GKJ)

The Christian Churches of Java (Gereja-Gereja Kristen Java [GKJ]) as a movement has its roots in the various missionary efforts that were started by different missionary groups in the first half of the nineteenth century. One product of those missions was a man named Sadrach who broke with the Europeans and started his own Christian movement. At a time when most Europeans had a low opinion of Javanese culture, Sadrach was a product of it. His movement spread through central Java in the 1870s and 1880s.

In the 1880s a Dutch missionary agency, the Nederlandse Gereformeerde Zendingsvereniging, moved into Java in an attempt to organize the scattered Christians into a single organization. It immediately came into contact with Sadrach's movement, but around 1890 rejected him and his work. With those Christians who adhered to it, the agency decided to make a new beginning. In 1894 the agency was absorbed into the Zending der Gereformeerde Kerken in Nederland. In 1900 the missionaries decided to build their church on a decidedly Dutch model. It introduced Western education and opened a number of medical facilities. However, it attached many elements of traditional culture. It also adopted a stance against Indonesian nationalism.

In spite of its opposition to the culture, the new church, now known as the Christian Churches of Java, slowly grew. In 1931 the synod was organized with Javanese leadership.

The presbyterian church order was adopted the following year. The missionaries remained in place until the arrival of the Japanese in 1942. When the missionaries returned following the war, they were placed in subordinate positions in the autonomous church, whose members were active participants in the establishment of an independent Indonesia.

In the 1990s the church reported 212,000 members. An ecumenically minded body, it joined the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES in 1948 and the WORLD ALLIANCE OF REFORMED CHURCHES in 1959. It participated in talks that aimed at uniting the several Javanese-speaking churches of Reformed background, but negotiations failed to produce positive results.

Address:

Christian Churches of Java
 Jalan Dr. Samardi No. 10
 Salatiga 50711 Java Tengah
 Indonesia

Source:

Bauswein, Jean-Jacques, and Lukas Vischer, eds. The Reformed Family Worldwide: A Survey of Reformed Churches, Theological Schools, and International Organizations. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans Publishing Company, 1999.

Christian Community

In 1922 a group of pastors and theology students approached Rudolf Steiner (1861–1925), the founder of Anthroposophy, to find ways to renew the church after the tragedy of World War I. Although Steiner was not inclined to involve himself in the institutional structure of Christian denominations and was quite uninterested in beginning a Christian sect centered on himself, he nevertheless had ideas as to how Christianity might reinvigorate itself in the light of Anthroposophy. He worked with a Lutheran pastor, Friedrich Rittelmeyer, Emil Bock, and others to initiate what eventually came to be called the Movement for Religious Renewal and then the Christian Community (CC). Since 1922, the CC has spread to other countries, particularly Germany and the United States. There is also a growing presence in the Czech Republic, where the CC sees the possibility of becoming an influential Christian movement. There are about 350 independent CC congregations worldwide, 12 of which are in the United States. The first congregation was founded in New York in 1948.

Steiner’s own understanding of Christianity through his study of esotericism and his clairvoyant experiences became the basis for reinterpreting what the foundations of Christianity were about. In contrast to other Christian revival efforts—for example, the evangelical fundamentalists, the neo-orthodox such as Karl Barth (1886–1968), or existentialists such as Paul Tillich (1886–1965)—which emphasize a particular understanding of Christian doctrine, the distinctive feature of this renewal movement is the centrality of the sacraments in the Christian experience. The traditional seven sacraments were infused with a broader meaning through esoteric Christianity as understood by Steiner. Most strikingly, the Mass, centering on the Eucharist, becomes “the Rite of the Consecration of Man,” now the central sacrament of the CC.

The CC emphasizes freedom of thought and reflection within the framework of Christian symbolism. The work of Rudolf Steiner is a continuing source of inspiration and insight, and he is freely cited and acknowledged by the Community. They emphasize, however, as Rudolf Steiner himself insisted, that his work is to be a launching point for further reflection, not simply a new rote orthodoxy. So much is freedom of thought encouraged and respected that the priests of the Community, when speaking or writing, are said to be sharing their own understanding of what the Community is about and not speaking in some definitive way for the Community as a whole. The unity and continuity of their church lies in the definitive form of the sacraments. Rather than laying emphasis upon normative doctrine, the Christian Community has what might be called normative practice.

For the CC, religious experience is central to what they are about. They invite people to come to their services on the basis of the experience of the sacraments that they will receive. They practice open communion—all who feel they may benefit from participating in the sacrament are both free and encouraged to partake of it.

Whereas the practice of esoteric Christianity as understood by Steiner and the ANTHROPOSOPHICAL SOCIETY involved a more solitary spiritual journey, the CC offers spiritual experience in the context of a congregation of believers, making that esotericism more accessible to people in their everyday circumstances. As with Steiner’s own thought, the education of children to grow into loving free individuals is an important part of the work of the Christian Community.

Their religious leaders are called priests, though they often use the German word Lenker, or guide, to describe them. Priests are given specific ordination, and since the days of its founding, men and women have both been eligible for ordination. At present, although there are Christian Communities in the large urban centers of the United Kingdom and United States, the education and ordinations are carried out in German, and so a knowledge of German is a prerequisite for CC theological training. Issues and problems are dealt with by synods of priests, and as much as possible, decisions are made by consensus.

The central coordinators for the guidance of the Christian Community worldwide are at the international headquarters in Stuttgart, Germany. The CC in North America maintains an Internet site at <http://www.thechristiancommunity.org>.

James Burnell Robinson

Sources:

- Bock, Emil. Caesars and Apostles. Edinburgh: Floris Books, 1999.
- Frieling, Rudolf. New Testament Studies. Edinburgh: Floris Books, 1994.
- Hindes, James. Renewing Christianity. Herndon, VA: Anthroposophical Press, 1996.
- Steiner, Rudolf. The Christian Mystery. Translated by James Hindes. Herndon, VA: Anthroposophical Press, 1999.

Christian Congregation of Brazil

The Christian Congregation of Brazil (Congregação Cristã do Brasil) began among Italians who had migrated to Brazil in the nineteenth century. Luigi Francescon (1866–1964) had migrated to the United States and while living in Chicago had converted to Protestantism; then in 1907 he had received the Pentecostal baptism of the Holy Spirit (with the accompanying evidence of speaking in tongues) while attending services at the church pastored by William H. Durham (1863–1912). In 1909 he migrated to Argentina and began the Pentecostal movement there before moving to São Paulo, Brazil, in 1910. A short time after making contact with the Italian community he founded initial congregations in Santo Antonia da Platina and São Paulo.

Growth was primarily in southern Brazil (as most Italians lived in the São Paulo area), but expansion took the movement to Uruguay, Argentina, Chile, and Bolivia. By the mid-1930s there were some two thousand members and by the mid-1950s, sixteen thousand. The church spread among the lower economic classes, and its services were designed to meet the needs of the illiterate. The church has also developed programs to create jobs for the unemployed.

The church was organized as a lay movement, with leadership being provided by deacons and elders, there being no officially ordained pastors or ministers. The church grew primarily by word of mouth and has always eschewed the public evangelistic meetings so characteristic of most Pentecostal churches. The church opposes legalistic practices, including the observance of Sunday as a special day and tithing. Services have an air of spontaneity.

The church follows Pentecostal doctrine and practice, but has developed some rules that reflect its unique circumstance. Critics have noted that Bible study is not emphasized, the work of the church being carried on as a nonliterary movement. Much that happens in worship, including who will preach on a given occasion, is not decided ahead of time; rather the congregation allows the Spirit to designate the preacher and the message.

The Christian Congregation has grown at a spectacular rate in the last half of the twentieth century, with more than 1.5 million members by the end of the 1990s. It is the third largest Protestant Free Church body in the country, having transcended its Italian roots.

Sources:

- Hollenweger, Walter J. Pentecostalism: Origins and Developments Worldwide. Peabody, UK: Hendrickson, 1997.

Christian Evangelical Church in Bolaang Mongondow (GMIBM)

During the Dutch era in the East Indies, the kingdom of Bolaang Mongondow was neglected by Dutch authorities, and Islam was established as the dominant religion. Then in 1904, the Muslim king asked the Protestant mission to establish schools in his realm. Protestants responded by moving to the area from the Sangir Islands and the Minahasa peninsula. They founded schools and, at the same time, the Christian Evangelical Church in Bolaang Mongondow (Gereja Masehi Injili di Bolaang Mongondow [GMIBM]), but they did almost no proselytizing among the general population. Worship continued in the Sangir and Minahasa language. As late as 1970 the membership of the church consisted primarily of the descendants of the original Protestant settlers.

In 1950, when Indonesia became an independent country, the church became an independent body. It adopted (or rather continued) a Reformed doctrine and church order, with a synod as the highest legislative body. The church joined the WORLD ALLIANCE OF REFORMED CHURCHES in 1974 and is also a member of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES.

In the mid-1990s the church reported 86,000 members in 176 congregations in an area that is still predominantly Muslim. It supports the Fakultas Theologia Universitas Kristen at Tomohon, Indonesia.

Address:

Christian Evangelical Church in Bolaang Mongondow
P.O. Box 104
Jalan Ahmad Yani No. 720
Kotamobagu 9571 Sulawesi Utara
Indonesia

Source:

- Bauswein, Jean-Jacques, and Lukas Vischer, eds. The Reformed Family Worldwide: A Survey of Reformed Churches, Theological Schools, and International Organizations. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans Publishing Company, 1999.

Christian Evangelical Church in Halmahera (GMIH)

Halmahera, an island in the midst of Indonesia, was Muslim territory when the Dutch arrived in the area at the beginning of the seventeenth century. They made no attempt to establish a Christian presence on the island, and it was not until 1866 that some Dutch Protestants established a mission station. The missionaries had very little response through the rest of the century, a result that has been attributed in large part to their denigration of the dominant Islamic culture. After a generation of work, only 150 people had become Christians.

In 1896 a movement into the church began, and during the next generation some 17,000 people identified with the church. The group suffered during World War II, as the Japanese placed a key military base on Halmahera. Many citizens were forced to work for the Japanese, and their home became targets for Allied bombs. During this period, the church members formed an independent church. Following the war, local church leaders renegotiated their relationship with the missionaries, and in 1949, the present Christian Evangelical Church of Halmahera (Gereja Masehi Injili Halmahera [GMIH]) emerged. It had some 30,000 members. Shortly thereafter all of the missionaries withdrew, Halmahera being a major point of conflict between the Netherlands and the Indonesians who were bent on independence.

In 1965 the Indonesian government pressured those on Halmahera who continued to follow one of their traditional religions to choose one of the modern religions recognized by the government. Many chose the Evangelical Church, which enjoyed a sudden and unexpected spurt in growth. By the 1990s the church reported some 150,000 members in 328 congregations. It now manages a set of schools, including one university and two theological schools. It sponsors a hospital and a home for the elderly.

The church has a presbyterian polity, and a synod serves as the highest legislative body. It accepts the ancient Christian creeds as its doctrinal standard. It is a member of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES and the WORLD ALLIANCE OF REFORMED CHURCHES.

Address:

Christian Evangelical Church in Halmahera
Jalan Kemakmuran
Tobelo
Halmahera Maluku Utara 97762
Indonesia

Source:

Bauswein, Jean-Jacques, and Lukas Vischer, eds. The Reformed Family Worldwide: A Survey of Reformed Churches, Theological Schools, and International Organizations. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans Publishing Company, 1999.

Christian Evangelical Church in Minahasa (GMIM)

The present Evangelical Church in Minahasa (Gereja Masehi Injili di Minahasa) traces its history to the original introduction of Christianity in that area on the northern peninsula of Sulawesi in Indonesia. In 1563, the Portuguese had established a mission of the Roman Catholic Church in Minahasa and baptized some 1,500 people, but a war with the Muslims on another island in 1570 prevented the spread of the mission. Much of northern Sulawesi subsequently became Islamized. The Catholics also gave the church members very little care. Eventually, in 1666, the Dutch, who had taken control of Indonesia, led in the conversion of all the Christians in Minahasa to the Reformed Protestant faith. However, they too neglected the community of believers.

It was in 1817 that a Reformed minister, Joseph Kam (1769–1833) of the Nederlandsche Gereformeerde Zendingsvereniging, visited the community and arranged for permanent missionary care. The work revived quickly, and through the remainder of the century some 80 percent of the people became Christians. In 1875 the work came directly under the care of the Reformed Churches of the Netherlands. Through the next decades, the church developed outstanding local leadership and itself sent missionaries to other parts of Indonesia. In 1927 it became an independent church, though a Dutch minister was chosen to head the synod until 1942, when the first Minahasan assumed that post. A. Z. R. Wenas went on to become the church's most visible leader for the next generation. It became his job to negotiate with the Japanese and then to see the church through the period in which forces seeking secession from the new state of Indonesian arose on Sulawesi. He also led the church in its opposition to Marxism.

The church is organized presbyterially, and has over the years wavered on the amount of congregational autonomy it allowed. Typical of Indonesian churches, it has developed a primary and secondary school system and sponsors several hospitals and other medical facilities. In the 1990s it reported 633,000 members in 677 congregations. It is a member of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES and the WORLD ALLIANCE OF REFORMED CHURCHES.

Address:

Christian Evangelical Church in Minahasa
P.O. Box 5
Tomohon
Minahasa

Sources:

Bauswein, Jean-Jacques, and Lukas Vischer, eds. The Reformed Family Worldwide: A Survey of Reformed Churches, Theological Schools, and International Organizations. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans Publishing Company, 1999.
Van der Bent, Ans J., ed. Handbook/Member Churches/World Council of Churches. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 1985.

Christian Evangelical Church in Timor (GMIT)

The Christian Evangelical Church in Timor (Gereja Masehi Injili Timor [GMIT]) dates from the coming of the Dutch into Indonesia and specifically to the Timor archipelago in the second decade of the seventeenth century. The ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH had previously established work, and in this area, unlike other islands, the Dutch allowed them to remain. Thus the Reformed church mission developed beside that of the Catholic Church. The mission was centered on Kupang, and it grew slowly, except on the island of Rote, where a large number of people became Christian in the 1740s. Attempts to build a more effective mission in the nineteenth century failed.

Then early in the twentieth century, after the Dutch government had finally established an effective administrative system, the Reformed church missionaries launched a comprehensive program that utilized all they had learned from work on the other Indonesian islands. The year 1912 marked the beginning of a quarter century of growth, during which time the church grew tenfold. The first steps toward an autonomous church were made in the 1930s, but interrupted by World War II. The church's synod met for the first time in 1947. After a period of stagnation, the church experienced a revival in the late 1960s, when in a few years' time the membership doubled. In the 1990s it reported 850,000 members in 1,500 congregations.

The church oversees a number of institutions, including kindergartens, hospitals, homes for the elderly, and orphanages. Ministerial education is handled through the theological faculty at the Artha Wacan Christian University in Kupang. The church is a member of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES and the WORLD ALLIANCE OF REFORMED CHURCHES.

Address:

Christian Evangelical Church in Timor
P.O. Box 85228
Jalan Perintis Kemerdekaan Walikota Baru
Kupang 85228 NTT
Indonesia

Source:

Bauswein, Jean-Jacques, and Lukas Vischer, eds. The Reformed Family Worldwide: A Survey of Reformed Churches, Theological Schools, and International Organizations. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans Publishing Company, 1999.

Christian Holiness Partnership

The Christian Holiness Partnership (CHP), the cooperative fellowship of Holiness churches and organizations, is one of the oldest of Holiness organizations, having been founded in 1867 as the National Camp Meeting Association for the Promotion of Holiness. The Holiness movement had developed slowly in the decades just prior to the American Civil War (1860–1865), but had enjoyed a sudden spurt of growth in the late 1850s. Immediately after the war, it quickly revived and spread through camp meetings that operated independently of the Methodist Episcopal Church and the Methodist Episcopal Church, South (both now constituent parts of the United Methodist Church), the churches in which most Holiness people then held membership. Over the next decades, people from other denominational backgrounds (especially Baptists and Quakers) associated with the movement. In the 1870s work extended to India and Australia, and by the end of the 1880s, the first Holiness denominations were formed.

The changes in the Holiness movement were reflected in the changing names and orientation of the Christian Holiness Partnership. In 1894, the words "Camp Meeting" were dropped. It operated through the first half of the twentieth century as the National Holiness Association, becoming the Christian Holiness Association in 1971, a name that accommodated Canadian members. The present name was adopted in 1997, and reflects the reorientation in the late twentieth century of North American thinking about former mission churches in the rest of the world.

The partnership now exists as a cooperative fellowship of Holiness churches worldwide. Membership currently consists of twenty-one churches, three missionary agencies, forty-eight colleges and seminaries, six Holiness publishing houses, and some two thousand camp meetings. The CHP allows independent congregations and local churches to affiliate, whether their parent denominational bodies are part of the CHP or not. Approximately 10 percent of the individual members are also members of the United Methodist Church.

Address:

Christian Holiness Partnership
263 Buffalo Rd.
Clinton, TN 37716
<http://www.holiness.org>

Source:

Jones, Charles Edwin. A Guide to the Study of the Holiness Movement. Metuchen, NJ: Scarecrow Press, 1974.

Christian Life Churches International

Christian Life Churches International is one of the larger church bodies to emerge out of the Charismatic Movement in Australia. The fellowship began in 1970 when New Zealander Trevor Chandler came to Brisbane in January 1970 as pastor of a Pentecostal church. He was assisted in his work by Clark Taylor, who later left to found the CHRISTIAN OUTREACH CENTRE. The church in Brisbane adopted the name Christian Life Center in 1972. Additional associated centers were opened in other nearby communities, and by 1975 there were seven congregations (five in Queensland and two in New South Wales) associated with each other.

In 1986 the various churches that were fellowshiping with each other adopted the name Christian Life Churches International. They remain a loose association of autonomous congregations that share a common faith and life. Their doctrine is like that of mainstream PENTECOSTALISM.

Christian Life Churches International has continued to grow both by initiating new congregations and by the affiliation of older congregations with the fellowship. In the mid-1990s, there were some thirty-six churches with a membership of four to five thousand. Work outside the country had just begun.

Address:

Christian Life Churches International
176 Sydney St.
New Farm 4005
Australia

Source:

Humphries, R. A., and R. S. Ward, eds. Religious Bodies in Australia: A Comprehensive Guide. Wantirna, Australia: New Melbourne Press, 1995.

Christian Methodist Episcopal Church

“Set up, but not set off” is the way the Christian Methodist Episcopal (CME) Church characterizes its emergence as an independent Methodist body. The phrase reflects the communion’s assertion that it is a legitimate offspring of its parent body, the Methodist Episcopal Church, South (MECS) (now a constituent part of the UNITED METHODIST CHURCH).

The slavery establishment in the pre-Civil War United States resisted the evangelization of African bondspersons, largely out of fear that the Christian gospel of the unity of humanity under God would have an unsettling, insurrectionary effect on the enslaved. There was a particular antipathy to such a message being delivered by persons from the free North and from others sympathetic to abolition. On the other hand, the South, which argued on biblical and theological grounds the validity of slavery, did not want to appear to undermine the work of evangelism among enslaved Africans, the need to Christianize them being one of the chief justifying rationales long advanced in support of their forcible importation to the West. So, by 1830, while barring “outside” evangelists, the southern churches were investing considerable energy in converting and taking into membership the slave population, albeit on terms that were consonant with their slave status. As in the society more broadly, Methodists scored notable numerical successes for their efforts.

But following the close of hostilities in the Civil War, African American members in the White churches of the South began flooding out of those bodies and affiliating with established Black congregations and denominations, who used their access to the South to do active recruitment. In opting for black denominations, the formerly enslaved were affirming their newly acquired freedom to choose and their sense of identity with and pride in institutions founded by African Americans. The black members of the MECS seem to have been impelled by these same motives, and most left the communion. But others also valued their Methodist identity and their association with the institution by which had come their spiritual rebirth. Thus, in 1866, those 78,000 remaining requested that they be granted a separate ecclesiastical structure and the ordination of their own clergy and bishops. The MECS General Conference granted the request, and in December of 1870 the new denomination was organized in Jackson, Tennessee. The parent body transferred to this new Colored Methodist Episcopal Church in America all properties that had formerly been used by the black members. In subsequent decades the MECS and its successor bodies sustained close ties with the CMEC (the name changing in the mid-twentieth century from Colored to Christian to honor current racial nomenclature). Material assistance and consultation continued to be extended; warm association continued to be shared.

The initial focus of the CMEC was the American South, its birthplace. But as the primarily southern African American population migrated slowly to other regions in the postwar years, the CMEC sought to follow with its ministry. Congregations were established along both coasts, in the Southwest, and in the Midwest, though the numerical strength of the denomination in the United States has remained in the South.

The CME General Conference established in 1873 a General Missionary Board to coordinate the church’s expansion efforts. The 1886 General Conference authorized Women’s Missionary Societies to be organized at all levels of the church’s structure to assist in the support of missional efforts. To this point, the vision was for home missions, that is, evangelizing and addressing the pervasive needs of the American black population. However, the 1898 General Conference considered that the time had come for the church to undertake mission work in Africa, the homeland. And in 1902, the Vanderhorst Foreign Missionary Society was organized to pursue that purpose. Nonetheless, the effort did not come to fruition at that time. The leadership of the church, in assessing the resources of the denomination and the still pressing, far-ranging needs of the African American population, decided that for the time being the priority should remain with home missions.

In 1910, the MECS initiated a plan of cooperation between itself and the CMEC for inaugurating mission work on the African continent. The CME General Conference of that year voted to participate. Some preparatory steps were taken, and there was even an exploratory journey to the Belgian Congo. But the work languished. A subsequent effort in 1926 to establish the CME Church in Trinidad had a promising beginning but also fell into quietude.

Then in 1947, a minister in the Gold Coast (later renamed Ghana) wrote to invite the CMEC to come to that place. In a series of positive responses, the CMEC supported the zeal for missions of the Rev. M. L. Breeding, who in 1954 began the active establishment of the church in Ghana. In his statement to the 1958 General Conference, Breeding declared: "The time is ripe for us to move into Ghana to help build this little country into a strong Christian nation so that it can link up with the total liberation of Africa." In that year, lasting CME mission work in Africa began.

In 1978, the CMEC accepted the request of some independent congregations in Haiti to be bought into the denomination. In 1980, the same response was given to congregations applying from Jamaica

The concern for African American identity and well-being that led to the call for setting up an independent CME Church also continued to find expression in the founding of multiple primary and collegiate educational institutions, such as Paine College, in Augusta, Georgia, and Lane College, in Jackson, Tennessee. It also found expression in a record of CME clergy and lay involvement in public advocacy for civil rights and racial advancement.

Today, the CMEC has approximately 850,000 members spread among some three thousand congregations in the United States, Jamaica, Haiti, Liberia, Ghana, and Nigeria.

Address:

Christian Methodist Episcopal Church
564 Frank Ave.
Memphis, TN 38101
<http://www.cmsonline.org>

Larry G. Murphy

Sources:

- Lakey, Othel Hawthorne. The History of the CME Church. Revised ed. Memphis, TN: The CME Publishing House, 1996.
- Murphy, Larry, J. Gordon Melton, and Gary L. Ward, eds. The Encyclopedia of African American Religions. New York: Garland Publishing, 1993.
- Phillips, C. H. The History of the Colored Methodist Episcopal Church in America. Jackson, TN: Publishing House of the CME Church, 1925.
- Richardson, Harry V. Dark Salvation: The Story of Methodism as It Developed among Blacks in America. Garden City, NY: Anchor Press/Doubleday, 1976.

Christian Outreach Centre

One of several products of the charismatic revival in Australia, the Christian Outreach Centre traces its beginning to a congregation organized by Rev. Clark Taylor (b. 1937) in Brisbane in 1974. Taylor had formerly been a Methodist minister and in the 1960s had been healed of cerebral malaria. In 1970, he joined with Rev. Trevor Chandler in the founding of CHRISTIAN LIFE CHURCHES INTERNATIONAL, which originated in Brisbane. Two years later he became independent and began a period as an itinerant evangelist. He proved to be an appealing speaker who placed an emphasis on the visible manifestations of the Holy Spirit, especially the phenomenon of "slaying in the Spirit," in which people appear to faint under the Spirit's power.

In 1974 he founded the original Christian Outreach Centre in Brisbane. Through the next fifteen years, additional congregations joined together, and the association known as Christian Outreach Centre was formed, primarily in Queensland and New South Wales, including a large congregation of several thousand at Mansfield, possibly the largest congregation in the country. Then in 1990, Taylor was accused of sexual immorality and removed from all leadership positions. Neil Miers was selected to head the fellowship, and he has continued as the international president since that time.

The church affirms a mainline Pentecostal doctrinal position, with an emphasis on the gifts of the Spirit and the freedom and joy that the Holy Spirit brings to the life of the believer. Unlike many Charismatic groups, the Centre has a centralized government, with all the local church property held in the name of the whole body by a Property Commission. A committee of pastors oversees denominational matters, including the ordination, appointments, and discipline of the ministers.

In the 1980s, the Christian Outreach Centre began work in the Solomons and other islands of the South Pacific, and as the new century begins, work in the United States has been launched in Denver, Colorado. There are approximately twenty-five thousand members.

Address:

Christian Outreach Centre
P.O. Box 2111
Mansfield 4122, Victoria
Australia
<http://www.coc.org.au>

Source:

- Humphries, R. A., and R. S. Ward, eds. Religious Bodies in Australia: A Comprehensive Guide. Wantirna, Australia: New Melbourne Press, 1995.

Christian Protestant Church in Indonesia (GKPI)

The Christian Protestant Church in Indonesia (Gereja Kristen Protestan Indonesia [GKPI]) grew out of several attempts at revival and reform by members of the PROTESTANT

CHRISTIAN BATAK CHURCH (HKBP), one of the larger churches in Indonesia, with the majority of its two million members residing in northern Sumatra. When the church did not respond positively to the concerns of the reformers in the early 1960s, several of the movements for reform made common cause in a Coordinating Body for Reformation within the HKBP. That organization proved the proto-organization of the Christian Protestant Church, which was formed in 1964. The new church existed in a state of tension with its parent body for a decade before a reconciliation (but not a reunion) occurred.

The church is headed by its general synod, which meets every five years, and its bishop. Its congregations are organized into circuits and the circuits into districts. The pastors choose the bishop, whose election is then ratified by the synod. The synod also elects an executive committee, which administers the church's affairs between synod meetings.

Doctrinally, the church follows the Lutheran perspective of its parent body. It has an expansive evangelical program that has carried it across Sumatra into Java. By the end of the 1980s more than 220,000 people had joined the new church. It joined the LUTHERAN WORLD FEDERATION in 1975 and established a similar relationship with the United Evangelical Mission that its parent body enjoyed. The church has also joined the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES.

Address:

Christian Protestant Church in Indonesia
 Jalan Kapt. M. H. Sitorus 13
 P.O. Box 36
 Pematangsiatar 21115 Sumatera
 Indonesia

Christian Reformed Church in North America

The Christian Reformed Church in North America dates to the 1830s and the Succession of members of the NETHERLANDS REFORMED CHURCH who rejected the attempt of the Dutch monarchy to bring the church under state control. In 1834, the Reverend Hendrik de Cock (1801–1842) was suspended from the ministry, and his congregation in Ulrum subsequently withdrew from the state church. Within two years a number of other pastors had also withdrawn, and more than a hundred independent congregations had emerged. They became known informally as the Christelijke Afscheiden Gemeenten. In 1869, many of these independent congregations organized as the Christian Reformed Church.

In 1846, encouraged by the failure of the potato crop, de Cock and associated pastors Henrik Scholte and Albertus C. van Raalte led a migration of church members who had supported the Succession to the United States. They finally settled in the state of Michigan and in 1848 organized the Classis (synod) Holland. They found existing in the United States a church with common roots, the REFORMED CHURCH IN AMERICA, and in 1850 affiliated with it. At the time of affiliation, it was agreed that should the interests of Classis Holland and the church ever come into significant conflict, the Classis could withdraw.

The Classis Holland found a happy home within the Reformed Church in America, but a minority of its members began to dissent in the mid-1850s. Specifically, Gysbert Haan charged the Reformed Church in America with practicing open communion, using a collection of hymns that included some that were not altogether sound, and neglecting catechism preaching. He further accused the church of aligning itself with the state church in the Netherlands and claiming that the Succession was illegitimate. The Classis as a whole did not agree with Haan, but beginning in 1857, individual congregations began to disaffiliate with the Reformed Church in America.

The several congregations affiliated in 1859 as the Dutch Reformed Church, assuming its present name, the Christian Reformed Church in North America, in 1904. The church grew primarily through the continued emigration from the Netherlands. It assumed a conservative Reformed doctrinal position based on the Belgic Confession, the Heidelberg Confession, and the Canons of the Synod of Dort. Rejecting the hymnology of the Reformed Church in America, the new church relied on a selection of hymns derived from the biblical Book of Psalms, though it has more recently expanded its hymnology considerably. It stresses the teachings of the catechism to its youthful members.

The Christian Reformed Church of North America is organized presbyterially. The general assembly is the highest legislative body in the church. The church supports an active mission program, which includes two seminaries, four colleges, and several hospitals and homes. In 1995 the church reported 295,000 members, of whom 84,000 resided in Canada.

The church began an expansive mission program during the twentieth century. As of 1998, it had more than 200 missionaries serving in twenty-three countries. Many of these missionaries were working to support national churches that had developed from older missionary activity, either by the Christian Reformed Church or the REFORMED CHURCHES IN THE NETHERLANDS and the DUTCH REFORMED CHURCH in South Africa, with which it is closely affiliated. The Christian Reformed Church took the lead in creating the REFORMED ECUMENICAL COUNCIL, through which it unites many conservative Reformed churches throughout the world.

Address:

Christian Reformed Church in North America
 2850 Kalamazoo Ave., SE
 Grand Rapids, MI 49560
<http://www.crcna.org/cr/crwb/index.htm>

Source:

One Hundred Years in the New World. Grand Rapids, MI:
Centennial Committee of the Christian Reformed Church, 1957.

Christian Science

See Church of Christ, Scientist

Christian Service Society

The Christian Service Society (formerly the Bengal Orissa Bihar Baptist Convention) began as a missionary thrust of American Free Will Baptists. The first missionaries arrived in the late nineteenth century in the area where the states of Bengal, Orissa, and Bihar come together. Besides English, four other languages are spoken, Bengali, Hindi, Oriya, and Santali, as well as some Telegu. By 1911 the missionaries had founded twenty-three churches with 1,600 members. In that year, in America, the Free Will Baptists in the northern United States merged into the Northern Baptist Convention (now the AMERICAN BAP-TIST CHURCHES IN THE U.S.A.), and they brought the Indian mission with them.

The mission grew slowly during the twentieth century, hindered to some extent by the multilingual nature of the work, which has made the development of leadership difficult. The largest growth has been among the Santali-speaking people. The primary projects supported by the church are the Balasore Industrial School and several secondary schools at Balasore and Bhimpore.

In the 1990s the church reported 8,000 members in sixty-nine churches. It is a member of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES.

Address:

Christian Service Society
Sepoy Bazatr
Midnapore
West Bengal, 721 101
India

Source:

Wardin, Albert W., ed. Baptists around the World. Nashville, TN:
Broadman and Holman Publishers, 1995.

CHRISTIANITY

Christianity, which claims the allegiance of some 30 percent of the world's population, traces its origins to the ministry of Jesus, a Jewish teacher who lived in Palestine at the beginning of the Common Era. He built a small following during his brief ministry, but in the context of the Roman occupation of Judea ran afoul of the authorities and was put to death around 30 C.E. Shortly after his death and burial, a number of his followers had an intense experience of Jesus, and they claimed he had been resurrected physically. Some also claimed to have been present when Jesus was seen ascending into the clouds and disappearing in the heavens. Those who were his close associates in his earthly ministry and who professed to have seen him in his resurrected state became known as apostles (from the Greek apostolos, delegate, one sent by another, in this case Jesus, to represent him).

The apostles assumed leadership of the discouraged followers. Following a time of internal prayer and consultation, the apostles, now headquartered in Jerusalem, made a profession of their faith in Jesus and in his resurrection. They identified him as the expected Anointed One, the Messiah in the Jewish tradition, termed in Greek the Christ. The launching of their public ministry during the Jewish festival of Pentecost was accompanied by an extraordinary manifestation of what they believed to be the Holy Spirit: When the apostles taught, many who did not speak Aramaic (the apostles' common tongue) heard them speaking in their own language.

The church (in Greek, the common language of the Eastern Roman Empire, ecclesia), as the collectivity of Jesus's followers has been called in English, grew quickly in Jerusalem and then in other nearby towns. In Antioch, in what is now Syria, they were first termed Christians, followers of the Christ.

The growth of the Christian Church was marked by several turning points. The first occurred when the Apostle Peter convinced his fellow apostles and the members, all of whom were Jews, that following the Jewish law should not be a requirement of membership in the church and that the Christians should admit Gentiles to their fellowship. Following on that decision came the conversion of Saul, a Jewish leader who had actively joined the efforts to suppress the movement. Following a dramatic visionary experience around 41 C.E., he took a new name, Paul, and became the most prominent advocate of the faith he had previously persecuted. His experience included a vision of Jesus, and thus it became the basis of his apostolic authority. Though he had never met Jesus prior to his death, based upon his encounter with the resurrected Christ, Paul now termed himself an apostle "out of season."

Paul, who was born and raised in Tarsus (in present-day Turkey), traveled on three missionary journeys from Jerusalem and Syria across the Mediterranean to Greece (where he introduced Christianity to Europe) and on to Rome. Legends suggest he may have also traveled to Spain, though he is believed to have been executed in Rome around 65 C.E. He nurtured the people and congregations he had called to faith with a set of letters, or epistles, now a part of the Christian scriptures.

No writings are attributed to Jesus directly, but soon after the church began, collections of sayings attributed to him were collected, and commemorations of the events of the last week of Jesus's life constructed. Jesus was remembered for his compassion, his healing of those who came to him, including some with leprosy, and his proclamation of the imminent arrival of the kingdom of God. Many of his teachings were delivered in pithy statements, others as parables. The major events at the end of his earthly existence, which occurred during the annual Jewish Passover festival, were named and commemorated with ritual, beginning with Palm Sunday (when Jesus arrived in Jerusalem), Good Friday (when he was executed by being nailed to a cross), and Easter (when he was believed to have risen from the dead). The collections of sayings and stories would later be collected in chronicles of Jesus' life called gospels (from Old English god spel, good news, from the Greek word of the same meaning, euangelion).

Through the first century, Christianity gradually separated itself from its rootedness in the Jewish community. That separation was spurred both by the spread of the church across the Roman Empire, which involved its penetration of Gentile society, and the destruction of the Jewish temple in Jerusalem in 70 C.E. Roman persecutions of the Christian community served to further distinguish it from the Jews. Anti-Jewish statements made as the church became a distinctive community were used in later centuries by Christian rulers to legitimize actions against Jews.

Through the first several centuries a large spectrum of Christian writings appeared, including a number of gospels and documents offering instructions on the managing of church life. Already in the second century, the question of which writings were authoritative came to the fore. The importance of choosing the correct writings to guide the church was accentuated by the rise of Christian Gnosticism, a teaching that challenged the worldview of the older Christian writings but appealed to many in the context of the time. Over the next centuries, those books determined to have been written by Paul, the original apostles, and their honored colleagues (such as the physician Luke) were brought together to constitute the Christian New Testament, which, placed together with the Jewish Bible (called the Old Testament by the Christians), constituted the Christian scriptures. In this process, a variety of writings, including those written from the Gnostic perspective as well as some popular Christian writings deemed non-Apostolic, were rejected.

Christianity operated as one among many minority religions in the Roman Empire, and on several occasions experienced widespread persecution, especially under the emperors Nero (r. 54–68), Decius (r. 249–251), and Diocletian (r. 248–305). However, the situation changed radically under the emperor Constantine (r. 306–337), who in 313 issued the Edict of Milan, which made Christianity a legitimate religion in the empire. He later gave strong support to the Christians, and through the fourth century Christianity was increasingly identified with the empire, now headquartered in Constantinople (previously Byzantium, now Istanbul), as the state religion.

While Christianity spread around the Mediterranean Basin, it also moved eastward from Jerusalem and Antioch into Mesopotamia and Persia. Edessa (modern Urfa, Turkey), the first center of Christianity outside of the Roman Empire, became the point from which Christianity found its way into the Persian Empire and beyond. Very early in the Christian era, the town was associated with Thomas, one of the apostles, and Thaddeus (or Addai), an early Christian also mentioned in the Bible (Luke 10:1). According to legend, Addai came to Edessa and became the instrument of the healing of the ruler, King Abgar, leading to the conversion of the tiny kingdom of Osrhoene. Addai is revered as the founder of the Church of the East, and his disciples Addai and Mari with the further expansion of the church among the Armenians and Persians as far east as India.

Vying with Edessa in the East was Arbela, capital of another small kingdom, Adiabene, whose ruler had in the first century of the Common Era converted to Judaism. In the second decade of the second century, the bishop of Arbela, Semsoun, is said to have become a martyr to his faith. It is also near Arbela that Tatian the Assyrian (c. 110–180) opened a school.

His most lasting contribution was a translation of the four Gospels that had emerged as authoritative in the West into a single harmonized gospel, the Diatessaron. The Diatessaron was used for several centuries as the gospel section of the New Testament for the Eastern church. Tatian also impressed upon the Eastern church his own asceticism, which became an early impetus to monasticism.

By the end of the second century, the Christian community had spread eastward as far as Bactria, in what is now Afghanistan. It had gained strength throughout the Persian Empire. One of the oldest traditions within this community also spoke of the Apostle Thomas continuing his mission to the East by traveling to the Malabar coast of India and there establishing Christianity in what undoubtedly became its easternmost outpost. Landing around 50, he is said to have founded seven churches and to have eventually been martyred. The legendary origins of the Indian church underlay the more firmly historical accounts of the arrival of the theologian Pantenus (d. c. 200) from Alexandria on a missionary journey toward the end of the second century. By the end of the fourth century regular communications between the Indian Christians and the Church of the East indicate a developing relationship, one that continues to the present through the SYRIAC ORTHODOX PATRIARCHATE OF ANTIOCH AND ALL THE EAST.

Doctrinal Development. The rise of Christianity as an international movement also coincided with the church's development of a maturing theological outlook, as it turned its attention to the issuance of a consensus statement of Christian belief. As the church spread around the Mediterranean Basin and moved eastward through Persia to India and Central Asia, various movements had challenged the central tradition, including the very popular Gnostic movement and the third-century Montanist movement championed by Tertullian, one of the early church's intellectual leaders. Then, at the beginning of the fourth century, a controversy arose concerning the nature of Christ, whom the church termed the son of God and worshipped as divine. This controversy flowered in the aftermath of the legalization of Christianity throughout the Roman Empire.

Arius (c. 260–336), an Egyptian Christian priest, challenged the generally held belief in Christ's divinity. He argued that such a belief contradicted monotheism. He suggested instead that Christ was a superior creation of God, properly called the son of God but not God. To resolve the controversy caused by the popular spread of Arian ideas, Constantine called a church council to meet at Nicaea (in what is now Turkey). The Council of Nicaea (325 C.E.) condemned Arius and issued a creedal statement that became the most widely accepted summary of the orthodox Christian belief in the Triune God. The Nicene Creed found its way into the liturgies of the church, both East and West. The orthodox position, generally associated with Athanasius (c. 300–373), the bishop of Alexandria, defined God as one, yet manifesting as Father, Son, and Holy Spirit, and Jesus Christ as both fully God and fully human.

The Nicene Creed set the direction for the church as a whole, but did not solve all of its problems. Arianism gathered strength as a movement, especially among the people who lived on the northern edge of the Roman Empire. It peaked in 410, when Germanic Arian Christians (seen by the Romans as barbarians) invaded Italy from the north and sacked Rome. The fall of Rome was the beginning of the end of the empire in the Western Mediterranean. Meanwhile, in the surviving Eastern Byzantine Empire, church leaders were concerned with the theological debates that grew out of the decisions at Nicaea. Subsequent councils were called in 381 (Constantinople) and 431 (Ephesus). The Council of Ephesus condemned the opinions of Bishop Nestorius (c. 381–451), who was accused of dividing the human and divine natures of Christ, thus destroying the unity of his personhood. He had also attacked the use of the term theotokos (Greek; Mother of God) to describe Mary, the mother of Jesus. He feared the increasing veneration of Mary as a semidivine figure in Christian mythology. A fourth council gathered at Chalcedon in 451, which accepted a further definition of the Trinity and branded a new heresy, Monophysitism (from the Greek monophysis, one nature; the belief that Christ's nature remained altogether divine, even though he assumed a human body).

The decisions promulgated by the councils of Ephesus and especially Chalcedon were accepted neither by the dioceses that lay beyond the Roman Empire to the east, whose bishops had been unable to attend, nor by the church in Egypt, the primary loser at Chalcedon. As a result, a number of churches separated from the main body of Christians within the Roman Empire, including the ARMENIAN APOSTOLIC CHURCH, the APOSTOLIC CATHOLIC ASSYRIAN CHURCH, and the COPTIC ORTHODOX CHURCH. Although these churches have traditionally been condemned by the Roman Catholic Church and the Eastern Orthodox churches as heretical bodies (Nestorian and Monophysite), in recent years their leaders have argued that they were not opposed to Chalcedon and that the heresies there condemned falsely characterized their actual position. In the twentieth century, these non-Chalcedonian churches were fully admitted into the larger ecumenical world.

The Church of the Early Middle Ages. Although the councils at Nicaea, Constantinople, Ephesus, and Chalcedon were the most important in shaping the Christian theological perspective, they were by no means the only ones. Three additional councils (two in Constantinople, 553 and 680–81, and a second one in Nicaea, 787) convened to further refine Trinitarian belief, and the promulgations of these Seven Ecumenical Councils were accepted by the main body of the church in both the East and the West, which had not yet split into the Roman Catholic and Eastern Orthodox churches. Meanwhile, the synods of Hippo Regius (393) and Carthage (397) completed the process of assembling the Christian New Testament and canonizing twenty-seven writings as a body of Apostolic and authoritative literature.

With the setting of the canon of the Christian New Testament and the definition of Christian orthodoxy, the church was set to continue its expansion for the next several centuries. In the West, that expansion was resisted by the indigenous leadership of the traditional pagan religions of Europe, but over the remaining centuries of the first millennium C.E. it became the dominant religious force throughout Europe, from Constantinople to Spain, Ireland, and Scandinavia. Five leading centers of the faith emerged, at Rome, Alexandria, Jerusalem, Antioch, and Constantinople. To the east and south, however, that dominance was checked by the sudden rise of Islam.

Islam was established in Arabia by the time of Muhammad's death in 632. Under his successors, the four caliphs, expansion began. Syria, Egypt, and Iraq fell relatively quickly. During the Umayyad dynasty (661–750), the Arab Muslim kingdom was extended across North Africa and moved into Spain. Its expansion was finally turned back north of the Pyrenees. Eastward, it crossed Persia and moved into central Asia and what is today Pakistan. While not, at least initially, moving against the religion of the Christian communities it conquered, Islam effectively blocked further Christian expansion in Africa and the Middle East for the time being. Under Islam, the Christian community survived, and those churches that had dissented from the ruling of Chalcedon, though heavily taxed, fared much better than they had within the Byzantine Empire.

Three of the ancient Christian centers (Antioch, Jerusalem, and Alexandria) fell into Muslim hands, leaving the Patriarchate at Constantinople the unquestioned leading voice of Christianity in the Byzantine Empire, where Greek was still the common language. The effective leadership of Constantinople extended into the Balkans and then to the northern Slavic lands, and then to Russia (by the end of the first millennium C.E.). As the territory brought under the bishop of Constantinople grew, the bishop faced constant rivalry with the leader of the Western church (in which Latin was the common language), the bishop of Rome.

The rise of the Roman Church occurred in many stages, but was punctuated by a variety of events. The fall of the Western Roman Empire, generally dated at 476, left the church as the most important international organization, its authority built on its assumption of many civic functions formerly performed by officials of the empire, its acquisition of lands, and its claims to primacy through the apostles Peter and Paul. Seen as the heir of Peter and Paul, the bishop of Rome began to be referred to as the pope (from papa, as bishops were traditionally called). The authority of the Roman Church and its head were more firmly established during the reign of Pope Gregory I (c. 540–604), known as Gregory the Great, who reformed the church both organizationally and financially during his pontificate (590–604). Over the next four hundred years, as the church extended its control over Europe, allegiance to Christ and his church went hand in hand with an acknowledgment of papal hegemony.

The rivalry between the Eastern and Western churches was marked by the cultural distinctions between the then Latin-speaking West and the Greek-speaking East; however, it was fueled by mutually exclusive claims of primacy by Jerusalem (where the church began), Rome (where Peter and Paul ministered), and Constantinople (the seat of power in the continuing Roman Empire). Pope Leo I (440–461) asserted Rome's primacy. In the East, a collegiality of authority was claimed for the five Patriarchies (Alexandria, Jerusalem, Antioch, Constantinople, and Rome). However, the relationship between the Patriarchies shifted significantly after Alexandria, Antioch, and Jerusalem were incorporated into the Arab Muslim Empire. Real power was left in the hands of Rome and Constantinople.

The very different situations of Rome and Constantinople also began to be reflected in their approach to church-state relations. The church remaining under the jurisdiction of the bishop in Constantinople operated essentially in one political realm, in a land with a strong secular ruler, while other Eastern communities survived as minorities in a hostile Muslim environment. In both cases, their situation tended to blunt their assertiveness relative to the state. On the other hand, the Roman Church emerged as a strong political force, regularly asserting its prerogatives and autonomy in the many kingdoms, princedoms, principalities, and city-states of the West.

Over the centuries numerous distinctions, each in itself relatively minor, accumulated to give the Western and Eastern churches a somewhat different flavor. Differences were reflected in theological concerns, liturgical variations, and the relative emphasis on mysticism (stronger in the East). Monasticism also grew in both East and West, but the monasticism of the East placed more emphasis on asceticism and mysticism, whereas Benedict (c. 480–547), traditionally considered the father of Western monasticism, emphasized a balance between activity and contemplation. One visible difference was the use of statues of the saints in Western churches and the use of icons (two-dimensional pictures of the saints) in Eastern churches. The accumulating differences culminated in a break between the two churches in 1054 over a seeming minor theological conflict, focused on a discrepancy in wording of the Nicene Creed. In the West, the phrase “and the Son” (filioque in Latin) was inserted into the creed to indicate a belief that the Holy Spirit, the third person of the Trinity, proceeds from the Father “and the Son.” That phrase was not present in the Eastern text of the creed.

The adoption of the filioque clause by the Western church included an assertion of the power to make the change; the Eastern church claimed that only an Ecumenical Council could make such a decision. The ensuing controversy resulted in a hostile break in 1054, with each side issuing anathemas and excommunications against the other. This critical break in Christian unity created in fact what had largely already existed in substance. The ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH now emerged as the single religious institution of note in the West. In the East, four separate churches representative of Eastern Orthodoxy appeared—the Patriarchate of Constantinople (generally referred to as the ECUMENICAL PATRIARCHATE), the GREEK ORTHODOX PATRIARCHATE OF ALEXANDRIA AND ALL AFRICA, the GREEK ORTHODOX PATRIARCHATE OF JERUSALEM, and the GREEK ORTHODOX PATRIARCHATE OF ANTIOCH AND ALL THE EAST.

As the Roman and Byzantine churches assumed control of Europe, the non-Chalcedonian churches existing in Muslim lands were largely stymied in any further attempts to expand. One notable exception occurred in the seventh century, when Alopen, a Christian missionary from the Nestorian Church of the East, arrived in China around 635 and presented the Christian message to the Emperor T'ai-tsung (of the Tang dynasty). Three years later, T'ai-tsung, in what was a reversal of the policy of the former emperor, issued an edict granting universal toleration for religions, specifically mentioning the Way (Christianity). He had previously ordered a Chinese translation of the Christian scriptures be prepared. The Christian mission seems to have flourished in the eighth century, but at some point in the tenth century, for reasons not altogether understood, the first establishment of Christianity in China disappeared.

The Later Middle Ages. In the centuries immediately following the split between the Eastern and Western churches, much of the energy of both bodies was spent upon the creation of a Christian culture in the lands over which they had religious hegemony. In the West, a number of universities emerged, and theology flourished. The work of building the church (including the stamping out of pockets of heresy) fell to the DOMINICANS and FRANCISCANS, the first of the preaching orders (as opposed to the cloistered monastic orders inspired by Benedict), whose activity served to strengthen the church immeasurably.

The stability of the Western church allowed it to turn some of its attention to Islam. In 1095, Pope Urban II (r. 1088–1099) proclaimed a Crusade against Islam, aimed specifically at reclaiming prominent Christian sites in Palestine from the then rulers. The goal was accomplished in 1099. Unfortunately, in the process, a Jewish community in Germany along the route chosen by some of the would-be crusaders became victims of a massacre. Over the next centuries, as conflict continued and subsequent Crusades led additional armies into the region, the focus of the original Crusade was lost. In 1204, for example, the crusaders were diverted to Constantinople, which they sacked. Previously, in 1187, Saladin (or Salah ad-Din, 1138–1193) had recaptured Jerusalem, an early signal of a new period of expansion for Islam.

The Crusades had one positive effect in the West. They served to introduce scholars to a number of lost texts, including Aristotle's philosophical writings and other Greek texts that had not survived the fall of Rome in the West. Also, the Crusaders returned with a number of writings by Arab scholars, most notably Avicenna (980–1073) and Averroes (1126–1198). These new materials stimulated further philosophical and theological work in the West, culminating in the monumental system created by Thomas Aquinas (c. 1224–1274). Aquinas, a Dominican monk, used his new knowledge of Aristotle to create a synthesis of classical and Christian thought that came to dominance within the Roman Catholic Church and has retained some degree of popularity to the present day.

During this same period, the Eastern church was enjoying a great expansion. Around 988, Prince Vladimir of Kiev (r. 980–1015) converted to Christianity, in its Eastern Orthodox form. This expansion of Christianity into Russian territory coincided with a favorable political alliance with Constantinople. That alliance unfortunately did not deter the Mongol invasion of the region in the thirteenth century. When the Russians were finally able to throw off the Mongol rule in 1449, Moscow replaced Kiev as the center of a modern Russian state, just in time to develop their independency in the face of a greatly weakened Patriarchate in Constantinople.

After pushing the crusaders out of Jerusalem, the Islamic kingdom had put increased pressure on the Byzantine Empire, centered in Constantinople. Finally, in 1453, the Muslims overran Constantinople and thus finally and completely ended the old Roman Empire. The fall of Constantinople began a period of transition in European society and Christianity, which in the next century remade the structure of the whole Christian world. The immediate effect of the capture of Constantinople was the movement of Islam north and west along the Danube River. Bulgaria, Romania, the Balkan lands, and Hungary were incorporated into the Ottoman Empire. Early in the sixteenth century, Muslim armies were sitting at the gates of Vienna. The Russian Church, far outside the Muslim borders, proclaimed Moscow the new Rome.

But first, across the continent on the Iberian Peninsula, ruled by Muslims for many centuries, Christian forces converged to push the Muslims out of Spain and Portugal; the completion of the process was signaled by the fall of Granada in 1492. That year proved a significant year, also marked not only by the discovery of the Americas by Columbus (who had been backed by Spain) but by the expulsion of the Jews from the country.

Events in Spain did not deter Muslim forces in their drive into central Europe. In the 1520s they moved to the gates of Vienna, but failed to capture it in 1529. The attention given to the Islamic threat distracted Catholic attention from the new threat coming from Germany.

The Drive for Reform. Almost as soon as the Roman Catholic Church constructed the organizational, liturgical, and theological system through which it exercised its spiritual authority throughout Western Europe, problems began to manifest. Although the church dominated society in many ways, one could hardly speak of its having created a holy or spiritual community. The church, having grown wealthy, had also developed signs of corruption. One symbol of its corruption was its failure in the face of the rising power of France, which all but controlled the papacy in the fourteenth century. Clement V (r. 1305–1314) was the first of seven popes who resided at Avignon in France rather than Rome. Only in 1377 did Gregory XI (r. 1370–1378), himself a Frenchman, find the strength to return to Rome. However, two years later, two contenders for the papal office emerged. The lineages of these two competing popes continued for a generation, as different countries lined up behind each. The problem was only solved in 1414 when a broadly based council gathered at Constance (in present-day Germany). By this time even a third pope had appeared. The council declared its right to act, saw to the disposal of the three contenders, and elected a new pope.

However, even though the council returned organizational unity to the church, it was unable to still the calls for reform. In fact, it called one of the leading voices of reform, John Hus (c. 1373–1415), to present his case. After hearing him, the council condemned his views, revoked his safe passage, and saw to his execution at the stake. Hus, however, was just one of a series of voices of reform with whom the church had to contend, ranging from Englander John Wycliffe (c. 1329–1384) to the Florentine Girolamo Savonarola (1452–1498).

To understand the cry for reform, it is somewhat helpful to understand the organization and belief system out of which the church operated. Europe was divided into a set of geographical parishes, each parish having a church whose priest(s) served the people residing in the parish. Parishes were grouped into dioceses, each diocese headed by a bishop; the older and more prominent dioceses were designated archdioceses headed by archbishops. Only men could enter the priesthood, and both priests and bishops were expected to lead celibate lives. Within his own diocese, the bishop was the ultimate authority, but he himself owed authority to the pope, the bishop of Rome. The ultimate authority in the church was a church council, consisting of all the bishops meeting in assembly, but such assemblies were rarely held.

The church had evolved around a sacramental system in which worship centered on a series of ceremonies that were believed to make available the grace of God to those who participated in them. The sacraments were designed to meet the needs of each individual from birth to death. Soon after birth, infants were baptized and welcomed into the realm of God's fellowship, the church. As they entered their teen years, individuals were confirmed in the faith. Along the way, they were introduced to the practice of confession of sins and penance (making restitution for sin) and the reception of the Eucharist.

In the Eucharist, the Last Supper of Christ with his disciples was reenacted daily. In that supper, Jesus had likened the bread and wine that he shared with those present to his body and blood. The reenactment of the meal was meant to recall his death and resurrection. Through the centuries, the church had come to believe that Christ was somehow present in the elements of bread and wine. Drawing a philosophical distinction between the essence and the appearance of different substances, the Roman Catholic Church had articulated a belief in transubstantiation: As the words of consecration were pronounced in the Eucharistic ceremony, the substance (though not the appearance) of the bread and wine was transformed (transubstantiated) into the body and blood of Christ.

Ideally, each person was to regularly confess all sins to a priest, receive forgiveness of sins, and do the penance required, after which the person would attend the Eucharist. The regular reception of the Eucharist was seen as leading to the increasing holiness of the individual.

During one's life, one usually also went through at least one additional sacrament. Those who wanted to establish a family participated in the sacrament of marriage. Those who entered the priesthood participated in the sacrament of ordination, also called taking holy orders. Those women who entered a religious order went through a ceremony in which they were symbolically married to Christ.

At the end of one's life, the sacrament of final unction offered forgiveness of as yet unconfessed sins, thus preparing one for the next life. Following death, the church would oversee the funeral and burial of one's body in consecrated ground. At death, it was believed that one passed to one of three realms. Those who refused the grace mediated through the church went to eternal damnation in hell. Those who died in a state of holiness went to heaven. The great majority, however, were seen as moving to an intermediate state, purgatory, where any remaining penance for sins was completed prior to entering heaven.

Given the structure of the church, corruption had a tendency to assume some predictable forms. Charges of simony, the buying and selling of church offices, were widespread. Many priests found ways to avoid their vows of celibacy, and those in religious orders also subverted their vows of poverty. However, by the 1520s, the belief that the church, thanks to the merits of the saints, possessed a storehouse of grace that it could at will dispense to believers and thus reduce their time (or that of their loved ones) in purgatory became the object of widespread criticism. Typically, a believer could receive an indulgence, a dispensation from the storehouse of grace, by the performance of some act of piety such as a pilgrimage or the repetition of a number of prayers. However, increasingly the church began to exchange indulgences for gifts of money, a practice that soon allowed the development of fund-raising projects through the systematic selling of indulgences. What became known as the Protestant Reformation was occasioned by such a fund-raising project.

The Protestant Reformation. In the second decade of the sixteenth century, the pope took up the idea of building St. Peter's Cathedral in the Vatican. In 1517, a Dominican friar, Johann Tetzel (c. 1465–1519), arrived in Saxony (Germany) to raise funds for the project by selling indulgences. A professor of theology at the University of Wittenberg objected to Tetzel's activity and in reaction posted a set of theses (debating points) on the door of the local castle's chapel. His action set off a series of events. Many church leaders looked with favor on Luther's perspectives, which were widely debated. Finally, in 1521, he was summoned to present his ideas before the Diet of Worms, an assembly of secular and church officials who advised Charles V (r. 1519–1559), the emperor of the loosely organized Holy Roman Empire.

By the early 1520s, Luther's perspective had matured into a broad attack on church authority. He challenged the church traditions that had created the sacramental system in the name of the Bible, which he saw as the highest authority, taking precedence over the authority of the pope, the church councils, and church tradition. He attacked the sacrament of penance, for example, with an assertion of the priesthood of all believers. He undermined the role of the church in human salvation by his assertion of salvation by grace through faith alone.

The Diet rejected Luther's teachings. He was outlawed by the secular authorities and excommunicated by the church. However, he had found many allies, including the ruler of Saxony, who disapproved, among other things, of Saxon money flowing out of Germany to Rome. This ruler's initial protection of Luther allowed his ideas to spread in the face of religious and secular authorities distracted by the immediate threat of Muslim forces on the Danube. Over the next twenty years, Luther's initial challenge to Roman authority divided the church into five competing communities.

Luther's own teachings came to dominate in Germany and flow northward into Scandinavia. In German-speaking Switzerland, Ulrich Zwingli (1484–1531) emerged as the leader of a Reformation effort that offered further challenges to the sacramental system. Zwingli's effort was cut short by his untimely death in 1531. However, his cause was then taken up in Geneva (in French-speaking Switzerland) by John Calvin (1509–1564) whose Institutes of the Christian Religion (1536) was the first systematic presentation of the Protestant faith and the bedrock of the Reformed Church. The Reformed Church became the dominant form of Protestantism in Switzerland and Holland, and (as Presbyterianism) in Scotland. Although never the majority faith, it gained significant followings in a number of countries such as France and Hungary, and exerted considerable influence in some of the German states.

The Reformation reached England by a very different route. At the time that Luther emerged, England and its king, Henry VIII (r. 1509–1547), were firmly in the Catholic camp. However, Henry ran into several problems, including the need to fill government coffers emptied by war and the desire to perpetuate his line with a male heir. The latter became the occasion of the break with Rome, when the pope refused to sanction Henry's attempt to set aside Catherine of Aragon as his wife (which would have been an insult to the Spanish crown). Henry forced Parliament to pass an act declaring him the supreme head of the church in England in 1534, and then moved against the monasteries, whose property he confiscated to bolster the treasury. As he began to take steps to alter church practices (such as changing the language of the church's liturgy from Latin to English), Protestant forces gained strength, though only after Henry's death did they gain ascendancy.

During the reign of Henry's son, the youthful and sickly Edward VI (r. 1547–1553), Protestants emerged and attempted to bring the church into the Reformed camp. During her brief reign, Edward's sister Mary (r. 1553–1558) tried to return the church to Catholicism. Then, during the lengthy reign of his other sister, Elizabeth I (r. 1558–1603), a new form of the faith, a via media that attempted to mediate between Roman Catholic and Protestant demands, was articulated. The new CHURCH OF ENGLAND was intended to remain the only form of British Christianity, and it became the source of what has come to be known as the Anglican tradition.

The Lutheran, Reformed, and Anglican churches did not challenge the Roman Catholic tradition in one respect. Each continued to view itself as an established church with close ties to the secular government, and understood itself to be, at least officially, the church of all the citizenry, with responsibility for the religious needs of the entire population. However, a much smaller group of people challenged the very idea of an established church. Generally referred to collectively as the Radical Reformation, a spectrum of individual leaders called for a church consisting only of those adults who professed the Christian faith and agreed to try to live the Christian life.

This more radical call for reforming the church lost much support, due to several violent incidents when followers attempted to revolt against the state's authority. Quite apart from the violence, however, the radical reformers found themselves opposed by the Lutherans, the churches of the REFORMED/PRESBYTERIAN TRADITION, and the Catholics alike. They experienced severe repression and survived only in small pockets in the lands of a few tolerant rulers. The primary group assembled in Holland, where their cause was championed by a former Catholic priest, Menno Simons (1496–1559), whose community became known as MENNONITES.

The Roman Catholic Church initially opposed the spread of Protestantism with the power of the state. Charles V took the lead, and war broke out in Germany, a war that continued with neither side winning. Eventually, the peace of Augsburg of 1555 took the first step in establishing an important principle that was to operate in Europe for the next several centuries, the right of the ruler of each of the German states to choose the faith, Lutheran or Catholic, that would be observed within his realm. Although the peace of Augsburg established the right of LUTHERANISM to exist, wars between Protestants and Catholics continued to break out intermittently for the next century. The most devastating conflict was the Thirty Years' War (1616–1648), which left large sections of the continent devastated, though the Peace of Westphalia (1648) would establish the legal rights of the Reformed Church.

The Catholic Church also responded to the theological challenge posed by Protestantism. In 1545 it called a general church council that met in several sessions at Trent (Italy). The council laid out the church's teachings over against the Protestants, including its position on the value of tradition, the authority of the popes, the sacramental life, worship in Latin, and clerical celibacy. The action of the council coincided with a revival of Catholic church life (whence the name given to the whole movement—Counter-Reformation), signaled by attempts to root out the corruption in the priesthood and hierarchy, by the establishment of new religious orders, and by the development of a expansive evangelistic effort.

The most important of the new orders was undeniably the Society of Jesus. Founded by Ignatius Loyola (1515–1582), the JESUITS took a special oath of allegiance to the pope and dedicated themselves to reversing the gains of the Reformation with their evangelistic and educational efforts. They also took the lead, along with the Franciscans, in what became a new world missionary expansion of Catholicism.

The Age of Exploration. At the time of the Reformation, Christianity was primarily a European enterprise. Although Christian communities were to be found in the Middle East and at several places in southern Asia, the growth of the Christian community had been largely blocked by the rise of Islam. However, with the discovery of the Americas and the possibilities it offered, a burst of exploratory activity began to occur, with Portugal and Spain taking the lead. Portuguese sailors headed southward along the African coast, and the Spanish directed their efforts across the Atlantic. So significant was this effort and so loaded with the possibility of conflict, that the pope took upon himself the task of dividing the worlds yet to be discovered. In 1493 he drew a line in the middle of the Atlantic Ocean (moved westward in the next year) and declared that all lands discovered east of the line belonged to Spain and all to the west to Portugal.

The pope's line, confirmed in the 1494 Treaty of Tordesillas, led to the extensive exploration of the Americas by Spanish conquistadors, with the resultant spread of the Roman Catholic Church as an adjunct to that exploration. The result was the establishment of Roman Catholicism in Spanish colonies in Central and South America and many of the Caribbean islands.

The line finally agreed to in 1494 left the shore of Brazil in the region assigned to Portugal. However, the majority of Portuguese efforts were made to the south. Eventually Portuguese sailors rounded the Cape of Good Hope (South Africa) and made their way into the Indian Ocean. The subsequent invasion of various African and Asian lands by the Portuguese opened the way for Catholicism to gain its initial footholds in east Africa and southern Asia from India to Indonesia. Francis Xavier (1552–1610) and Matteo Ricci (1552–1610), two Jesuits, are most remembered for their initial efforts to spread Christianity in Asia and adapt Christian thought to the Asian context. Although the Portuguese led the way, the Spanish soon followed the Portuguese in the lucrative trade with the lands found along the coasts of the Indian and Pacific oceans.

Much of the work accomplished by Christian missions was negated by the establishment of the slave trade, through which Spanish and Portuguese dealers transported hundreds of thousands of Africans to the Americas in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries. Christianity has been severely criticized in recent centuries for its seeming cooperation with the slave trade and the slowness of its response to the abolitionist cause. The church placed its emphasis on ameliorating the condition of the slaves and converting them to Christianity rather than working toward the destruction of the institution itself.

France, somewhat late, joined in the exploration effort and initially established colonies in Canada, the Caribbean, and the South Pacific. Even later, Great Britain entered the European effort to establish global empires. The British colonized the eastern coast of North America and eventually drove the French from Canada. Conflict with Spain led them to the Caribbean, and then the search for trade led them to Africa, the Middle East, southern Asia, and the South Pacific. Globally, the British built the most expansive network of colonies. To a lesser extent the Dutch and, in the nineteenth century, the Germans, attempted to also build colonial empires.

Protestant Expansion. The effect of Portuguese, Spanish, and French expansion, especially in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, transformed the Catholic Church into a global religious organization. Protestant expansion beyond Europe began almost simultaneously with the expansion of Catholicism, but in the first centuries was for the most part limited to the movement of Dutch, Swedish, and British Protestants to colonies their governments established, primarily in the Americas.

A change began, however, in the eighteenth century, when members of the Moravian Church launched a mission among the African Americans who had been brought to the Caribbean to work plantations. At the same time, German pietists, similar in faith and practice to the Moravians, began the original Protestant mission in Asia, their representatives reaching India in 1706. Then at the beginning of the nineteenth century, the British took the lead in what became a massive movement that transformed Protestantism into a global faith.

In the decades after the establishment of the via media of the Anglican Church, a process that emphasized the politics of ecclesiology at the highest level, many felt that the process of reformation should continue, and others felt that the spiritual life of the British people had been neglected. There arose in England, even before the end of Elizabeth's reign, a call for further purification of the church. Some Puritans called for a renewed emphasis on the spiritual life of the laity, some wanted to rid the church of bishops, some wanted to create a church of purely dedicated professing Christians that would be separated from the government. Those who wanted to see a Protestant church modeled somewhat on the Reformed model (with direct reference to the Presbyterian church that had emerged in Scotland) helped to defeat Charles I in the English Civil War (1642–1648), but after the execution of the king in 1649 the various sects of Puritans had a hard time agreeing on anything. Oliver Cromwell (1599–1658), who had led the victorious army, took control of the new Commonwealth as Lord Protector in 1653, and tried to establish a reformed but moderate and relatively tolerant state church. Following the end of the Commonwealth, England returned to the monarchy in 1660, and Anglicanism has since been the established church in England, but never with the old power to enforce uniformity.

Following the Restoration, those groups dissenting from Anglicanism did not go away but formed a spectrum of tolerated sectarian bodies, or dissenters, each with its distinctive emphasis. Included were the Presbyterians, the CONGREGATIONALISTS, the BAPTISTS, and the FRIENDS. They were joined in the eighteenth century by METHODISM, the spearhead of the Evangelical Awakening that touched every segment of British life.

The British missionary thrust began with the felt need to serve British citizens in the American colonies. That need led to the formation of the SOCIETY FOR THE PROPAGATION OF THE GOSPEL IN FOREIGN PARTS (1699) and the Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge, which between them recruited Anglican ministers to serve American parishes and nurtured them with books and literature. As the colonial empire developed, Anglican chaplains were recruited to accompany the initial settlers and keep the Church of England alive in their hearts.

By the end of the eighteenth century, however, some consciousness of the larger world community, limited as it was, was present in British society, and the leaders in the dissenting churches began to organize structures for world evangelism. This effort is usually traced to a sermon preached by William Carey (1761–1834) in 1792 to a group of Baptists in Nottingham. Following the sermon, twelve ministers who were present met and organized what became the Baptist Missionary Society. As their first endeavor, they commissioned Carey to begin work in India. Over the next few years Congregationalists formed the LONDON MISSIONARY SOCIETY (1795), and Anglicans founded a second missionary organization, the CHURCH MISSIONARY SOCIETY (1799). The Methodists organized in 1813, and the Presbyterians of the CHURCH OF SCOTLAND in 1823. During the nineteenth century, the work initiated in England also inspired the formation of like organizations on the European continent (possibly the first being the Netherlands Missionary Society, in 1797) and in North America. As the colonial empires expanded, typically missionaries from the country that had established the colony arrived and initiated evangelistic activities among the indigenous population. If colonial territories changed hands, it was common for missionary agencies to turn their work over to a doctrinally aligned society from the new ruling country.

Through the nineteenth century European missionary agencies succeeded in establishing Christian churches in almost every country of the world, the great majority of those countries either becoming dominantly Christian in religious affiliation or becoming home to a significant Christian minority. Through the twentieth century, Catholic and Protestant missions combined to change the world's Christian population from approximately 20 percent to some 35 percent, most of that growth being at the expense of the many indigenous ethnically based religions.

The Twentieth Century. While Christianity was experiencing a remarkable world growth, back home in Europe and North America, the church was being rent by various developments in the modern world, the work of forces collectively grouped under the labels secularization and modernity. Protestantism, especially the thought that grew from the direction laid out by John Calvin, had already developed a much more mundane and less mystical and supernatural view of the world than that perpetuated by medieval Catholicism. This trend was pushed forward by the French Enlightenment and the rise of science and technology, which saw the world much more in terms of natural law than of God working in nature. The subsequent rise of the social sciences served to push God further aside as an active force in history and the individual.

One product of the new worldview was the rise of biblical criticism, with its questioning of both miracles in general and the miracles recorded in the Bible in particular. Work in geology and archaeology called the creation stories of the biblical Book of Genesis into question, at least as literal events. Scrutiny of the biblical texts led to a much more complicated view of the assembling of the various books of the Bible and their compilation into the Jewish Bible and the Christian New Testament.

A group of children receives first communion at St. Bernard's Church in New York. (Helene Rogers/TRIP)

Although many clung to traditional affirmations, by the end of the nineteenth century voices on both sides of the Atlantic were calling for a transformation of Christian thought that would acknowledge the new information that was coming out of the centers of learning across the Christian world. The Christian community began to be split between those who began to be called traditionalists or fundamentalists and those who were termed modernists. Although they lived together for some decades in an uneasy tension, during the twentieth century, disagreements on how to approach the Bible, the faith, and the world divided the Protestant world into two camps, today grouped around the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES (whose member bodies have tended to follow the modernist approach) and the WORLD EVANGELICAL ALLIANCE (whose members tend toward the conservative Bible-oriented camp). Meanwhile, deep fractures within the Roman Catholic Church between modernists and traditionalists have appeared, though the church has largely been held together by its very flexible organization, which has shown a remarkable ability to be inclusive of a range of opinions.

By the beginning of the twentieth century, as a result of the global missionary endeavor, a relatively small number of churches and missionary agencies had established missions in countries around the world. The larger Protestant bodies existed as international bodies, whose membership overseas in many cases already outnumbered its membership in its home country. Through the twentieth century, that situation dramatically changed. First, in most countries, these churches became the objects of independency movements, as the people who had become Christians in missionary situations broke with the sending church and established new churches that they believed better served the members in their own country, be it China or India or Kenya. Second, as the missionary churches developed their own leadership, they were released from their organizational ties to the church from which they originated and became autonomous bodies. That latter trend became most noticeable in the last half of the twentieth century, as European countries largely divested themselves of their colonies.

Early in the twentieth century, the missionary movement had been the major impetus for another movement, ecumenism. Lone voices had, through the nineteenth century, decried the fragmentation of Protestantism, a process that has continued to the present. However, missionaries became the most vocal about keeping the issues that had so divided the European and North American churches into numerous competing denominations away from the mission field, where they distracted from the primary work of evangelism. During the nineteenth century, the various churches had tried to handle the situation by dividing the vast missionary territory between missionary agencies. However, as missions grew, they inevitably moved into each other's areas.

The growing demands for ending the competition and finding some way to get around the sectarian differences among the larger churches led to the call for the development of cooperative councils and even the merger of churches in Africa and Asia. Several notable mergers across denominational lines occurred in India (CHURCH OF NORTH INDIA, CHURCH OF SOUTH INDIA) and Pakistan (CHURCH OF PAKISTAN), while governmental pressure forced mergers in Japan, China, and the Congo. In the older countries, notable mergers across denominational lines occurred in Canada (UNITED CHURCH OF CANADA) and Australia (UNITING CHURCH IN AUSTRALIA). Numerous additional mergers also occurred, but they tended to bring together churches of the same denominational tradition (with the least doctrinal differences to resolve), such as the five churches in the Wesleyan tradition that merged in several steps to form the UNITED METHODIST CHURCH in 1968.

The ecumenical movement peaked in the 1950s and was subsequently given new life in the era of good feeling between Protestants and Roman Catholics that began with the

Holy Night by Antonio Allegri da Correggio (Corel)

Second Vatican Council in the 1960s. Ultimately, it was unable to halt the process of setting up new Christian denominations, the number of new churches still growing decade by decade. However, it has succeeded in bringing most of the larger denominations into a working relationship with each other through local and regional church councils and the international fellowships of the churches of the same denominational traditions (such as the WORLD ALLIANCE OF REFORMED CHURCHES and the LUTHERAN WORLD FEDERATION). Most importantly, it has succeeded somewhat in lessening the animosity that developed in the sixteenth through the eighteenth centuries, when the establishment of new denominations was accompanied by intense polemics and in many cases the attempts of governments to suppress the newer bodies.

The Future of Christianity. In spite of predictions to the contrary, Christianity continued to grow through the twentieth century, but most of that growth has followed population trends, and unlike the nineteenth century, there has been little growth in the percentage of Christians relative to the world's population. Real growth in places such as Africa has been balanced by losses in Europe and those countries that fell under Marxist rule (though there is every reason to believe that significant growth in post-Marxist societies will occur in the twenty-first century). Many churches that have shown a notable growth have gained their members from other Christian bodies rather than converting non-Christians.

In the meantime, the church in dominantly Christian lands continues to be affected by renewal and revival movements that periodically inject new life into the larger community. Among the more noticeable such movements in the twentieth century have been the Marian movement in the Roman Catholic Church and PENTECOSTALISM and the CHARISMATIC MOVEMENT within the larger Protestant world. Marian devotion, punctuated by claims of apparitions of the Blessed Virgin made by hundreds of individuals around the world, has become an integral part of the life of the Catholic Church, involving every parish and affecting the church's hierarchy all the way to the papal office (see MARIAN DEVOTION, WORLD NETWORK OF). Beginning in a small Bible school in Topeka, Kansas, the Pentecostal/Charismatic movement has brought the religious life to literally millions of people around the world.

Primary challenges for Christianity in the next century include the retention of its intellectual leadership and the development of a rapport with the world's other religious communities without losing its evangelical mandate. Christianity has in every generation produced a cadre of outstanding philosophers and theologians who have been able speak not just as church leaders but as spokespersons amid the world's intellectuals. To maintain Christianity's place in the future, such voices will continually have to arise. Their chief task will be to restate the Christian perspective in terms appropriate to a globalized and pluralistic world. The imperative to relate to other believers became vividly manifest following the death of six million Jews in the Holocaust. That event not only focused the tragedy of centuries of bad relations between the two communities, for which many Christian leaders have subsequently acknowledged the church's guilt, but also forced remembrance of the suffering and deaths that had been caused over the centuries by the conflict between competing religions. Thus it was that Pope John Paul II opened the new century with a series of public statements calling the Christian community to admit sins relative to the church's work in the past, and asking forgiveness for that history as a foundation for its future efforts.

Sources:

- Atwood, Craig D. Always Reforming: A History of Christianity since 1300. Macon, GA: Mercer University Press, 2001.
- Bachmann, E. Theodore, and Mercia Brenne Bachmann. Lutheran Churches in the World: A Handbook. Minneapolis, MN: Augsburg Press, 1989.

- Barrett, David. The Encyclopedia of World Christianity. 2d ed. New York: Oxford University Press, 2001.
- Bauswein, Jean-Jacques, and Lukas Vischer, eds. The Reformed Family Worldwide: A Survey of Reformed Churches, Theological Schools, and International Organizations. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans, 1999.
- Bettenson, Henry. Documents of the Christian Church. 2d ed. London: Oxford University Press, 1973.
- Burgess, Stanley M., and Gary McGee, eds. Dictionary of Pentecostal and Charismatic Movements. Grand Rapids, MI: Regency Reference Library, 1988.
- Cross, Lawrence. Eastern Christianity: The Byzantine Tradition. Sydney: E. J. Dwyer, 1988.
- Dwyer, J. C. Church History: Twenty Centuries of Catholic Christianity. New York: Paulist Press, 1985.
- Ferguson, Everett, ed. Encyclopedia of Early Christianity. New York: Garland, 1990.
- Grimm, Harold J. The Reformation Era, 1500–1560. 2d ed. New York: Macmillan, 1973.
- Harmon, Nolan B. Encyclopedia of World Methodism. 2 vols. Nashville, TN: United Methodist Publishing House, 1974.
- Hart, D. G., and Mark A. Noll, eds. Dictionary of the Presbyterian and Reformed Tradition in America. Des Plaines, IL: InterVarsity Press, 1999.
- Hoke, Donald, ed. The Church in Asia. Chicago: Moody Press, 1975.
- Isichel, Elizabeth. A History of Christianity in Africa: From Antiquity to the Present. Grand Rapids, MI: Africa Word Press, 1995.
- Johnson, Paul. A History of Christianity. New York: Touchstone Press, 1995.
- Kane, J. Herbert. A Global View of Christian Missions. Grand Rapids, MI: Baker Book House, 1971.
- Koester, Helmut. History and Literature of Early Christianity. 2 vols. Berlin, Germany: Walter De Gruyter, 2000.
- Lynch, Joseph. The Medieval Church: A Brief History. Boston, MA: Addison-Wesley, 1992.
- McBrien, Richard P., ed. Encyclopedia of Catholicism. San Francisco: HarperSanFrancisco, 1995.
- Marty, Martin E. A Short History of Christianity. Philadelphia: Fortress Press, 1987.
- McManners, John. The Oxford Illustrated History of Christianity. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1990, 2001.
- Moffett, Samuel Hugh. A History of Christianity in Asia: Beginnings to 1500. San Francisco: HarperSanFrancisco, 1992.
- Pelikan, Jaroslav. The Christian Tradition: A History of the Development of Doctrine. 5 vols. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1971–1989.
- Sanneh, Lamin. Western African Christianity: The Religious Impact. London: C. Hurst, 1983.
- Stark, Rodney. The Rise of Christianity: How the Obscure, Marginal Jesus Movement Became the Dominant Religious Force in the Western World in a Few Centuries. New York: HarperCollins, 1997.
- Sunquist, Scott W., ed. A Dictionary of Asian Christianity. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans, 2001.
- Wardin, Albert W., ed. Baptists around the World: A Comprehensive Handbook. Nashville: Broadman and Holman, 1995.
- Williams, George H. The Radical Reformation. 3d ed. Kirksville, MO: Thomas Jefferson University Press, 2000.

Christmas Island

Christmas Island, since 1958 a dependency of Australia, is located in the Indian Ocean south of Java. Like Malaysia and Indonesia, it has a very mixed population, the largest number being Chi and Euro-Australians. The island existed for many years as part of the British colony of Singapore, but in 1958, as Singapore moved toward independence, the island was transferred to Australia. The major industry on the island is phosphate mining.

Buddhism, in its Chinese incarnation, is the primary religion on Christmas Island and is largely confined to the Chinese community. The Malaysians, approximately 20 percent of the population, are primarily Sunni Muslims of the SHAFIITE SCHOOL.

Christianity is the faith of less than 20 percent of the population. The CHURCH OF ENGLAND work, established in 1888, is now within the jurisdiction of the Diocese of Perth of the ANGLICAN CHURCH OF AUSTRALIA. The ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH also has work, including a substantial presence in the Chinese and Malaysian community. It is attached to the Archdiocese of Singapore. Less formally organized groups of Methodists, Congregationalists, and Presbyterians can also be found.

Sources:

Adams, J. Christmas Island: The Early Years, 1888–1958.
 Chapman, ACT: B. Neale, 1993.
 MacKenzie, A. A. The MacKenzies' History of Christmas Island Parish. Sudbury, ON: MacKenzie Rothe, 1984.

Church in the Province of Kenya

Evangelical members of the CHURCH OF ENGLAND pioneered Anglican presence in Kenya. The CHURCH MISSIONARY SOCIETY began work in Mombasa in 1844 and built an extensive ministry and educational system over the next century. Work was strongest among the Kikuyu, Luo, and Luhya peoples. The church moved very early to build indigenous leadership, and the first African priests were ordained in 1885. In 1931, the Bible Churchman's Missionary Society added its strength.

The Church in the Province of Kenya developed under the jurisdiction of the archbishop of Canterbury. The initial Diocese of Mombasa was established in 1926. The first two African bishops for Kenya were consecrated in 1955, just five years before the several dioceses were set apart as the Province of East Africa (including the churches in neighboring Tanzania). The work in Tanzania was separated in 1970 and the present Province of Kenya emerged at that time.

The church is led by its archbishop, currently Mt. Rev. David Gitan. Churches are divided into twenty-seven dioceses. As the new century began, the church reported 1.5 million members. It is a member of the worldwide AN-

Status of religions in Christmas Island, 2000-2050

Followers	2000			2025	2050
	total	%	rate
Chinese folk-religionists	1,000	29.8	2.73	1,200	1,400
Buddhists	690	20.2	2.15	820	940
Nonreligious	580	16.8	2.04	740	1,000
Muslims	550	16.0	1.99	650	800
Christians	530	15.4	0.53	600	700
Roman Catholics	250	7.3	1.76	260	310
Protestants	120	3.5	0.87	130	140
Anglicans	70	2.1	0.28	90	100
Hindus	30	1.0	5.14	40	50
Neoreligionists	30	0.8	2.66	50	70
Total population	3,400	100.0	1.96	4,100	5,000

GLICAN COMMUNION and the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES.

In 1999, the province made history as the first Anglican province to appoint a female to the office of provincial secretary, the office responsible for all of the administrative work of the province.

Address:

Church in the Province of Kenya
 P.O. Box 40502
 Nairobi
 Kenya

Sources:

The Church of England Yearbook. London: Church Publishing House, published annually.
 Van der Bent, Ans J., ed. Handbook/Member Churches/World Council of Churches. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 1985.

Church in the Province of Melanesia

Protestant work in the Solomon Islands dates to the establishment of New Zealand as a separate Anglican province in 1858. George A Selwyn (1809–1878), the first New Zealand bishop, established a Melanesian Mission and made several personal trips through the Solomons and other nearby islands. In 1861 John C. Patterson (1827–1871) was consecrated as a missionary bishop to oversee the development of the work throughout Melanesia. He carried out his duties until he was killed in 1871 by residents of the Santa Cruz islands. He was succeeded by Bishop Selwyn's son, John Richardson Selwyn, who continued Patterson's program for developing indigenous leadership.

The mission developed for more than a century as part of what is now the ANGLICAN CHURCH IN AOTEAROA, NEW ZEALAND, AND POLYNESIA, eventually growing to become the sixth diocese in that church. Although the diocese was centered on the Solomons, its boundaries changed over the years as work was shifted from one jurisdiction to another. The strongest work was developed on the eastern islands, Santa Isabel, Malaita, Guadalcanal, and San Cristóbal. Here the church developed an extensive primary and secondary school system (mostly now secularized) and a teacher training college.

Extensive discussions concerning the independence of the Solomons were held in the 1970s and culminated in independence being granted in 1978. It was in this atmosphere that the Diocese of Melanesia was set apart in 1975 as the independent Church in the Province of Melanesia. It continues as one in faith and practice with its parent body.

The church is led by its archbishop and now includes five dioceses, one of which comprises the Anglican work in neighboring Vanuatu. Ministers are trained at the Bishop Patteson Theological Centre in Honiara.

The church is a member of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES.

Address:

Church in the Province of Melanesia
P.O. Box 19
Honiara
Solomon Islands

Sources:

The Church of England Yearbook. London: Church Publishing House, published annually.
Forman, Charles H. The Island Churches of the South Pacific: Emergence in the Twentieth Century. Maryknoll, NY: Orbis, 1982.
Van der Bent, Ans J., ed. Handbook/Member Churches/World Council of Churches. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 1985.

Church in the Province of Nigeria

Anglican work in Nigeria began with the migration of former slaves from Sierra Leone; shortly thereafter, in 1845, Henry Townsend (1815–1886) of the CHURCH MISSIONARY SOCIETY opened the first station among the Yoruba people. The work progressed quickly, and additional stations were soon opened in Abeokuta (1846), Lagos (1852), and Thadam (1853). The first African bishop for an Anglican church, Samuel Crowther (1808–1891), was consecrated in 1864 and gave yeoman service for almost three decades.

The Diocese of Lagos, which for many years operated directly under the jurisdiction of the archbishop of Canterbury, was among the five dioceses that after World War II petitioned the archbishop for status as an autonomous church. In 1951, the CHURCH IN THE PROVINCE OF WEST AFRICA was declared to be in existence, and the next decade was spent making it a reality; the synod had its first meeting in 1957, and the constitution was published in 1962. The constitution was accepted and went into effect in 1963.

In 1952, the Diocese of Lagos was divided into four dioceses. Through the 1960s and 1970s, further dioceses were carved out of the still growing church. This development of the episcopacy culminated in 1979, when the work in Nigeria was set apart as a new province, the Church in the Province of Nigeria.

The church is headed by its archbishop, currently Mt. Rev. J. A. Omoyajowo. At the beginning of the twenty-first century, it reported 5,000,000 members. It supports three theological schools, Immanuel College (Ibadan), Trinity College (Umuahia), and Vining College (Zana). The province is a member of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES and the worldwide ANGLICAN COMMUNION.

Address:

Church in the Province of Nigeria
29 Marina
P.O. Box 13
Lagos
Nigeria
<http://www.nigeria.anglican.org>

Sources:

The Church of England Yearbook. London: Church Publishing House, published annually.
Van der Bent, Ans J., ed. Handbook/Member Churches/World Council of Churches. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 1985.
Wingate, Andrew, et al., eds. Anglicanism: A Global Communion. London: Moberly, 1998.

Church in the Province of Rwanda

Anglican work in Rwanda was launched in 1926 by the Rwanda General and Medical Mission, a group representing the most theologically conservative wing of the CHURCH MISSIONARY SOCIETY. Its early growth was spurred by a revival that swept through Rwanda in the later 1920s, and growth was remarkable through the 1930s, continuing for several decades. In 1968, the church reported 85,000 members.

The church also stepped into a unique situation relative to the indigenous population. The population was divided between two groups, the Tutsi (Watusi) and the Hutu, the latter constituting approximately 85 percent of the population. Though a distinct minority, the Tutsi were the ruling elite and remained so after colonization. In 1963, a year after the country gained its independence, a civil war broke out. Some 160,000 Tutsi were expelled, most relocating to Burundi. Relative peace followed for the next three decades, but in 1994, the president of Rwanda (a Hutu) died under mysterious circumstance in a plane crash. Subsequently, death squads were released throughout the country, and hundreds of thousands, the majority of the Tutsi, were killed. When a Tutsi army countered and took control of the government, some 200,000 Hutu fled the country.

Through the 1950s, the work of the church in Rwanda was under the direct jurisdiction of the archbishop of Canterbury. In 1961, he led in the formation of the Church of the Province of Uganda, Rwanda, and Burundi. The first bishop for Rwanda was appointed in 1965. In 1980, the Province of Uganda was set apart as an independent jurisdiction, and the new Church of the Province of Burundi, Rwanda, and Zaire constructed. This province was divided into three new provinces in 1992, and the present Church in the Province of Rwanda emerged.

The Church of Rwanda is headed by its archbishop. That post, then held by Most Rev. Augustin Nshamihogo, was vacated in 1994, and remained vacant until 2000, when the present archbishop, Mt. Rev. Emmanuel Mbona-Kolini, was selected to assume the post. As the new century begins, the church reports oversight of 1,275,000 members in its eight dioceses. It is a member of the worldwide ANGLICAN COMMUNION and the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES. Since 1994, the church has reoriented its program to deal with the trauma of 1994 and the poverty into which the country has been plunged. It supports eight primary schools, Stanley Smith College, and United Theological College of Butare.

Address:

Church in the Province of Rwanda
P.B. 2487
Kigali
Rwanda

Sources:

The Church of England Yearbook. London: Church Publishing House, published annually.
Van der Bent, Ans J., ed. Handbook/Member Churches/World Council of Churches. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 1985.

Church in the Province of South Africa

Anglican presence is traced to the establishment of British hegemony in Cape Town in 1806. During the ensuing years, the group of members of the CHURCH OF ENGLAND in the Cape met for worship in the building that had been erected by the members of the NETHERLANDS REFORMED CHURCH. The first missionaries of the SOCIETY FOR THE PROPAGATION OF THE GOSPEL IN FOREIGN PARTS arrived in 1821 and of the CHURCH MISSIONARY SOCIETY shortly thereafter. The initial growth phase is dated from the consecration of a bishop, Robert Gray, in 1847, one of the first Anglican bishops appointed for work outside of the British Isles. During his first two years he promoted the training of clergy, ordained, tripled the number of functioning priests, and saw to the erection of twenty churches.

During the nineteenth century, the South African church tended to have a preference for High-Church Anglicanism, and in 1870 a group of Low-Church Evangelicals separated and has continued to the present as the Church of England in South Africa. In spite of the schism, the church continued to grow, and by the beginning of World War I had churches across the Union of South Africa. Its jurisdiction has also extended into neighboring Botswana, Mozambique, Lesotho, and Namibia. Its present jurisdiction also includes the islands of St. Helena, Ascension, and Tristan da Cunha.

The church is headed by its primate, Archbishop Winston Hugh Njongonkulu Ndungane. As the new century began, the church reported 2,400,000 members. There are twenty-three dioceses, including two in Mozambique, one in Namibia, and an archdeaconry in Angola. The church is a member of the worldwide ANGLICAN COMMUNION and the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES.

The Anglican Church made history in 1986 when it elected Rev. Desmond Tutu (b. 1931) as its new primate and archbishop of Cape Town. After completing his studies in London, Tutu returned to his native South Africa as a lecturer at the Universities of Botswana, Lesotho, and Swaziland. His subsequent rise was due both to his scholarly abilities and to the oratorical skills that manifested as the Anglican Church decided to confront the government on apartheid. In 1975 the church appointed him the Anglican dean of Johannesburg, the first native African to hold that position. The following year he became bishop of Lesotho. He then became the general secretary of the South African Council of Churches (1978–1985). In 1984 he was named the Nobel Peace Prize laureate. He was appointed bishop of Johannesburg in 1985, then archbishop of Cape Town in 1986. In this latter post he became a global spokesperson, not only for the people of his own country, but for suffering people worldwide, and attained a status in South Africa similar to that held by Martin Luther King in the United States.

Address:

Church in the Province of South Africa
16–20 Bishopscourt Dr.
Claremont, Cape 7700
South Africa
<http://www.cpsa.org.za/>

Sources:

Kruger, J. S. Along Edges. Religion in South Africa: Bushman, Christian, Buddhist. Pretoria: Unisa Press, 1995.
Prozesky, Martin, and John De Gruchy. Living Faiths in South Africa. New York: St. Martin's Press, 1995.

Church in the Province of Sudan

The CHURCH MISSIONARY SOCIETY of the CHURCH OF ENGLAND opened its first station in Sudan in 1899 at Omdurman, which became the launching point of an extensive mission work through the southern part of the country. A growth phase began in 1916 that led to the establishment of strong churches among six different Sudanese peoples.

In 1920, the work in the Sudan, which had grown up under the jurisdiction of the Anglican bishop in Jerusalem, was separated, along with that in Egypt, in a new Diocese of Egypt and Sudan. Through the next decades the work in the Sudan continued to grow, while that in Egypt was stifled. In 1945, Sudan was set apart as a separate diocese. It was again attached to Jerusalem in 1957, at which time the Jerusalem diocese became an archdiocese. In 1964, the Muslim government expelled all foreign missionaries. At the time there were two Sudanese bishops and forty-four priests.

In 1974, however, the Diocese of the Sudan, with more than one hundred thousand communicants, was separated from Jerusalem and placed under the direct authority of the archbishop of Canterbury. That change was in preparation for the establishment of the Church in the Province of Sudan and the designation of four new dioceses. The new independent province was inaugurated in October 1976. (That same year the EPISCOPAL CHURCH IN JERUSALEM AND THE MIDDLE EAST was given provincial status.)

The province (also known as the Episcopal Church of Sudan) is headed by its archbishop, Mt. Rev. Joseph Marona. There are currently twenty-three dioceses. As the new century begins, the church reports 390,000 members. The church supports the Bishop Gwynne College in Juba. In 1998 it passed a resolution favoring the ordination of women. It is a member of the worldwide ANGLICAN COMMUNION and the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES.

Address:

Church in the Province of Sudan
Bishop's House
P.O. Box 110
Juba
Sudan

Sources:

The Church of England Yearbook. London: Church Publishing House, published annually.
Wingate, Andrew, et al., eds. Anglicanism: A Global Communion. London: Moberly, 1998.

Church in the Province of Tanzania

Anglicanism came to Tanzania when the Universities Mission to Central Africa (UMCA) initiated work in Zanzibar in 1864. The UMCA had been formed at Cambridge University in response to a sermon preached by David Livingstone in 1858. It drew its support primarily from High-Church members of the CHURCH OF ENGLAND. The mission was supplemented by the arrival of representatives of the SOCIETY FOR THE PROPAGATION OF THE GOSPEL IN FOREIGN PARTS (another High-Church sending agency) in 1875. Then in 1878, Low-Church Evangelicals within the Church of England established work through the CHURCH MISSIONARY SOCIETY, drawing additional support from Australia and New Zealand. Finally, the Bible Churchman's Missionary Society (now known as Crosslinks), an Evangelical sending agency founded in 1922, began work.

In 1960 all of these efforts were incorporated into the Church of the Province of East Africa, which also included the Anglican missions in neighboring Kenya. In 1969, the government nationalized the extensive educational system that had been developed by the church. The following year, the work in Kenya and Tanzania was divided and the present Province of Tanzania emerged.

The Church in Tanzania is headed by its archbishop, currently Mt. Rev. Donald L. Mtetemela. Congregations are divided into sixteen dioceses. As the new century begins, the church reports 1,000,000 members and is the third largest Christian body in the country. The church is a member of the worldwide ANGLICAN COMMUNION and the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES.

Address:

Church in the Province of Tanzania
P.O. Box 899
Doduma
Tanzania

Sources:

The Church of England Yearbook. London: Church Publishing House, published annually.
Van der Bent, Ans J., ed. Handbook/Member Churches/World Council of Churches. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 1985.

Church in the Province of the West Indies

The Church in the Province of the West Indies includes Anglicans from around the Caribbean basin. It includes a number of island nations, one Central American country, and three South American countries. Anglicans came into the Caribbean in the sixteenth century as Britain began to challenge Spanish hegemony in the region. Through the next century, they successively established themselves in Bermuda (1609), Barbados (1626), Antigua (1634), Jamaica (1655), and the Bahamas (1670s). From these islands, the church spread through the region. It reached such places as Trinidad and Tobago rather late (in 1797), and came to Belize in the nineteenth century along with Africans from Jamaica. Work on the coast of Guyana was begun by the SOCIETY FOR THE PROPAGATION OF THE GOSPEL in 1807 and moved on to Georgetown three years later. It is now the second largest church in the country.

In the nineteenth century, as part of the CHURCH OF ENGLAND, the Anglican West Indies was centered on Jamaica and Barbados, where the first bishops were appointed in 1824. The work grew through the next century under the protective umbrella provided by the colonial government. It was also one of the first parts of the Church of England that was set apart as an independent province, in 1883. It remained the established church until colonial rule was ended and the various nations became independent.

The province is headquartered at the residence of the provincial archbishop, who resides in Nassau, in the Bahamas. The headquarters has moved periodically, depending on the residence of the person who is elected archbishop (the previous archbishop residing on Antigua). The province includes the Dioceses of Belize, Guyana (which includes work in Surinam and French Guinea), Jamaica, Barbados, the Bahamas, the northeast Caribbean and Aruba, Trinidad and Tobago, and the Windward Islands. For a short period, Venemela was a ninth diocese, but in 1982 it left the province to affiliate with the EPISCOPAL CHURCH, based in the United States. Not included in the province are the Episcopal Church of Cuba and the Anglican Church of Bermuda, both of which currently exist as extraprovincial dioceses directly related to the archbishop of Canterbury.

The province supports two seminaries, Codrington College in Barbados, and United Theological Seminary of the West Indies in Jamaica. It is a member of the worldwide ANGLICAN COMMUNION and the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES.

Address:

Church in the Province of the West Indies
Church House
East St. and Sands Rd.
P.O. Box N1707
Nassau, N.P.
Bahamas

Source:

Newman, Las. "The Church as a Source of Identity: Reflections from the Caribbean." In Anglicanism: A Global Communion, edited by Andrew Wingate et al. London: Mowbray, 1998.

Church in the Province of West Africa

The Church in the Province of West Africa brings together the Anglicans of Ghana, Sierra Leone, Gambia, and Guinea. Anglican presence in the area began as early as 1752 but was confined to the Cape Coast, a Ghanaian coastal settlement. Work began in Sierra Leone in 1804, but was primarily focused upon Freetown and the community of freed slaves there. Work in Gambia began as a chaplaincy for British troops stationed there in 1816.

The church in Ghana grew during the nineteenth century, missionary personnel being primarily supplied by the CHURCH MISSIONARY SOCIETY (CMS) and later by the SOCIETY FOR THE PROPAGATION OF THE GOSPEL IN FOREIGN PARTS. Work in Sierra Leone prospered through the nineteenth century, but growth stagnated during the twentieth. Progress in Gambia was stopped by the growth of Islam as the majority religion. It was not until the twentieth century that CMS missionaries entered Guinea, a French colony. Work in the small mission was slowed for a time when in 1967 the government expelled all foreign missionaries.

Through the twentieth century, the work in West Africa was organized into five dioceses. (The Diocese of Gambia and Rio Pongas included the work in Guinea, the minuscule Anglican community in Guinea-Bissau, and the single congregation in the Senegal that serves Anglican expatriates in the country.) These dioceses were under the direct supervision of the archbishop of Canterbury. In 1951, the archbishop began the process of creating a new province for West Africa, the synod of which met for the first time in 1957. The constitution was promulgated in 1962 and came into effect the following year.

As originally formed, the Diocese of Nigeria was part of the province, but in 1979 it was set apart in a separate CHURCH IN THE PROVINCE OF NIGERIA. In 1982, the Diocese of Liberia was accepted into the Province of West Africa. It had a separate origin, being the product of the world of the EPISCOPAL CHURCH of the United States, which had started numerous schools among various Liberian peoples.

Over the years, the province has designated new dioceses, there being eleven at present. It is led by the its archbishop, currently the Most Reverend Robert Okine. The church supports Trinity College (Ghana), Cuttington University College (Liberia), and St. Nicolas Anglican Theological College (Ghana). As the new century began, the church reported 132,00 members. The province is a member of the worldwide ANGLICAN COMMUNION and the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES.

Address:

Church in the Province of West Africa
Bishop's Lodge
P.O. Box 980
Koforidua
Ghana
<http://www.netministries.org/see/churches/ch00609>

Sources:

The Church of England Yearbook. London: Church Publishing House, published annually.
Van der Bent, Ans J., ed. Handbook/Member Churches/World Council of Churches. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 1985.

Church in Wales

The Church in Wales dates to the arrival of Christianity in the second century C.E. Real growth did not take place until the sixth century, the time of St. David, the church's patron saint. Little is known of David's life, not even his birth and death dates, but he is known for having founded a monastery in Pembrokeshire and for having lived a godly life. His feast day, March 1, is a holiday in Wales.

The church was integrated into the ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH, and by the twelfth century its four dioceses were part of the province of the archbishop of England. The Church in Wales felt the effect of the Protestant Reformation by way of England, and its dioceses were incorporated into the CHURCH OF ENGLAND following the split with Rome. During Elizabeth I's reign, The Book of Common Prayer (1567) and the Bible (1588) were published in Welsh. These two publications are credited with helping to save the Welsh language.

During the nineteenth century, dissenting churches (Methodists, Congregationalists, Baptists) experienced significant growth in Wales, to the point that the Church of England, while still the largest church in Wales, no longer spoke for the majority of its citizens. The dissenting churches petitioned for the disestablishment of Anglicanism in Wales. The act to disestablish passed the British Parliament in 1914, but awaited the end of World War I for implementation. In 1920, the Church in Wales was separated from the Church of England. As a result, its bishops lost their seats in the House of Lords, and the church lost its tax revenues and favored legal status.

The Church in Wales is headed by its primate archbishop, Mt. Rev. Rowan Williams. There are six dioceses, and at the beginning of the new century, the church reported 120,000 members. The first women were ordained to the priesthood in 1997. It is a member of the Worldwide ANGLICAN COMMUNION and the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES.

Address:

Province of the Church in Wales
39 Cathedral Rd.
Cardiff CF1 1 9XF
United Kingdom
<http://www.churchinwales.org.uk/>

Sources:

The Church of England Yearbook. London: Church Publishing House, published annually.
Van der Bent, Ans J., ed. Handbook/Member Churches/World Council of Churches. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 1985.

Church Missionary Society

The CHURCH MISSIONARY SOCIETY (CMS) is one of the two major Anglican missionary societies that were important in the spread of the CHURCH OF ENGLAND globally during the nineteenth century. The society grew out of the Evangelical Awakening, a national revival in Great Britain, of which the METHODIST CHURCH was the primary organizational product. However, many affected by the revival and its emphasis on a personal relationship with God chose to remain in the established church. Among the products of the revival was a new interest in Christian evangelization of the world.

The beginning of the CMS is usually traced to the posing of a question by John Venn, a Church of England minister at Chapham: "What methods can we use more effectively to promote the knowledge of the gospel among the heathen?" The result of the discussion of that question was the founding of the Society for Missions in Africa and the East in 1799. That organization became the Church Missionary Society in 1812. There was already an Anglican missionary society, the SOCIETY FOR THE PROPAGATION OF THE GOSPEL IN FOREIGN PARTS, but it was identified with High-Church Anglicanism. The support for the CMS was decidedly Low Church. However, in many fields, the two societies worked side by side, and the CMS served as a bridge between missionaries from various Protestant and FREE CHURCHES and the larger Anglican community.

Early successful work was established in Canada and China, but soon spread worldwide, primarily in areas where the British were establishing their hegemony—most importantly in Africa and India. By the end of the nineteenth century, efforts were well under way to train indigenous leadership. A symbol of desires in this direction was the commissioning of an African, Samuel Adjai Crowther (1808–1891), with the responsibility of opening the CMS mission in Niger. Crowther went on to become the first Anglican bishop of African background to be consecrated.

Early in the twentieth century, the CMS began to place great emphasis upon education and medical care for women in the lands where their missions were located. In this endeavor it came into close association with the Zenana Missionary Society of the Church of England. The two organizations eventually merged in 1957. At this same time the CMS had to adjust to the maturation of the missions and their transformation into dioceses and, especially after World War II, into independent Anglican churches (called provinces). In this new setting, the work of the society has been refocused upon numerous social service projects in cooperation with the new churches that have been established in the old missionary fields.

The CMS was a leading force in the development of cooperation and coordination among Protestant missionaries around the world. It supported the formation of the various united churches in which Anglicans merged with Methodists, Presbyterians, Congregationalists, and other churches to form new bodies such as the CHURCH OF SOUTH INDIA and the CHURCH OF SRI LANKA.

Address:

Church Mission Society Partnership House
157 Waterloo Rd.
London SE1 8UU
United Kingdom
<http://www.cms-uk.org/>

Source:

Ward, Kevin, and Brian Stanley. The Church Missionary Society and World Christianity, 1799–1999. Richmond, Surrey, UK: Curzon Press, 2000.

Church of Bangladesh

The Church of Bangladesh continues the history of the movement of Protestants into India early in the nineteenth century. The Protestant community in what is now Bangladesh has been dominated by the Baptists, but the CHURCH OF ENGLAND and the Presbyterians were also active. In 1947, Bangladesh became the eastern province of the bifurcated nation of Pakistan, but in 1972 it officially separated as an independent nation.

In 1970, the Presbyterians and Anglicans in Bangladesh united (as part of the general union of Christians in Pakistan) to form the Diocese of Dhaka of the CHURCH OF PAKISTAN. The creation of Bangladesh involved a civil war and the development of harsh relations between the two countries. Although officially continuing as a diocese of the Church of Pakistan for some years, the church in Bangladesh began almost immediately to function as an autonomous organization, which gradually emerged as the independent Church of Bangladesh.

The church is led by Most Rev. Barnabas Dwijen Mondal, the bishop of Dhaka. Recently the church designated a second diocese (Kushtia). The church has approximately 12,000 members. It is a member of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES, and functions as part of the larger worldwide ANGLICAN COMMUNION.

Address:

Church of Bangladesh
St. Thomas Church
54 Johnson Rd.
Dhaka 1100
Bangladesh

Source:

The Church of England Yearbook. London: Church Publishing House, published annually.

Church of Central Africa Presbyterian (General Synod)

In 1875 the Free Church of Scotland established a mission in northern Malawi with its headquarters at Khondowe. The following year the CHURCH OF SCOTLAND began work in the southern part of the country with headquarters at Blantyre. The Cape synod of the Dutch Reformed Church in South Africa opened a third mission in 1889 with headquarters in Mvera (later moved to Nkhoma). As these missions grew, they worked to combat the slavery business that had first attracted the world's attention to the region, and as one of their tactics they cooperated in the building of alternative forms of business that would undermine slavery's economic base. In the early twentieth century, their critique was turned on the government and British businessmen, whom they had come to see as exploiting the native population. The missions also opened Western-style medical facilities and schools.

In 1924 the two Scottish missions, both of which had been organized with a synodal structure, merged to form the Church of Central Africa Presbyterian. The Dutch synod joined two years later. In 1956, three years after Malawi (then known as Nyasaland) had been merged with Rhodesia into the Federation of Rhodesia and Nyasaland, the church organized the General Synod. Since then, the Presbyterian Synod of Harere (Zimbabwe) has joined the General Synod, as has the Synod of Zambia.

The General Synod is a loose organization that allows a great deal of autonomy to the five synods that constitute it. In Malawi, three different liturgies and catechisms and three church school curricula are being used. The General Synod does manage Zomba Theological College and Seminary. Ecumenically, the synod has observer status with the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES. It is a member of the WORLD ALLIANCE OF REFORMED CHURCHES, and the former Dutch synod is also a member of the REFORMED ECUMENICAL COUNCIL.

During the years of the Federation of Rhodesia and Nyasaland, Presbyterian ministers were vocal critics of the political situation and a number were detained by the authorities. However, the federation came to an end in the early 1960s when Nyasaland was separated from Rhodesia and became a self-governing country and then the independent republic of Malawi.

The General Synod worked with the Malawi Congress Party, the ruling party in the country during the first generation of Malawi's independence. Through the 1970s and 1980s, however, the government was frequently cited for human rights violations. At one point the president, a Presbyterian, outlawed the JEHOVAH'S WITNESSES organization. Finally in 1992, the General Synod, along with the World Alliance of Reformed Churches, presented a letter to the president calling for the establishment of a commission that would make recommendations to reform the single-party system of governance. A referendum in 1993 and elections in 1994 spelled the end of the era of the Congress Party, and a democratic government came to the country.

In the 1990s the General Synod reported 770,000 members in 503 congregations. There are an additional 20,000 members in Zambia and 12,000 in Zimbabwe.

Address:

General Synod
P.O. Box 30398
Capital City, Lilongwe 3
Malawi

Source:

Bauswein, Jean-Jacques, and Lukas Vischer, eds. The Reformed Family Worldwide: A Survey of Reformed Churches, Theological Schools, and International Organizations. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans Publishing Company, 1999.

Church of Christ in Thailand

The Church of Christ in Thailand began in the attempts of Protestants to establish missions in Siam (as Thailand was called at the time). The first mission, initiated by the LONDON MISSIONARY SOCIETY, was started in 1828. American Presbyterians arrived three years later. Over the next several decades, most of the groups that had originally come to Thailand abandoned the field, and the Presbyterians came to dominate the Protestant scene. They expanded throughout the country and followed a pattern of creating schools and hospitals with each of their churches. One of their missionaries, Daniel McGilvary (1828–1911), assumed the task of translating the Bible into Thai.

The Presbyterians were joined by other churches in the twentieth century. The Churches of Christ, the British church inspired by the CHRISTIAN CHURCH (DISCIPLES OF CHRIST), arrived in 1903. Baptists began to form congregations, which became the Thailand Baptist Fellowship. Representatives of the Marburger Mission came from Germany. In the early 1930s the Presbyterians invited the other Protestant groups in the country to create a national Protestant Church. The Baptist mission in Bangkok was the first to accept. Then other Baptist congregations and members from the work of the Marburger Mission agreed. In 1934 they constituted the Church of Christ in Thailand. In 1951 the Christian Church (Disciples of Christ) took over the work of the Churches of Christ. In 1962 they merged into the Church of Christ in Thailand.

In the 1950s the local leadership that had been generated by the church expressed their desire to have an autonomous church under Thai management. That wish was granted. Then in 1957 the Presbyterians placed all their mission work under the authority of the Church of Christ in Thailand, and when the Disciples merged into the Church of Christ they followed suit.

The church is organized on a presbyterial system with a General Assembly as the highest legislative body. The church has expanded to include various language groups other than Thai, including the Karen- and Lahu-speaking peoples. Continued growth through the last half of the twentieth century was assisted by the support of missionaries from various churches around the world.

In the 1990s the church reported 69,000 members in 480 congregations. It supports the McGilvary Faculty of Theology at Payup University and the Chiang-Mai and Bangkok Institute of Theology. It is a member of the WORLD ALLIANCE OF REFORMED CHURCHES and the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES.

Address:

Church of Christ in Thailand
14 Pramuan Rd.
Bangkok 10500
Thailand
<http://netra.payap.ac.th/cct/cct.html>

Church of Christ in the Congo—Baptist Community of the Congo River

In the 1870s, just as the king of Belgium was asserting hegemony over the Congo, the Baptist Missionary Society (BMS) in England started two efforts. One, launched by the independent Livingstone Inland Mission, founded by a member of the BMS committee, led to what is today known as the Church of Christ in the Congo—Baptist Community of the Zaire River. The other began with a gift of £1000 to the BMS, which in turn used the money to send Thomas J. Comber (1852–1887) and George Grenfell (1849–1906) on an exploratory trip up the Congo River to Sao Salvador. In 1880, Grenfell opened a station at Musuki.

Since navigation on the river is blocked one hundred miles inland by rapids, the BMS sent a steam-powered boat to Grenfell, which was carried in pieces to Stanley Pool and reassembled. With this boat, named The Peace, Grenfell explored more than 3,400 miles of the Upper Congo River system (for which he was honored by the Royal Geographical Society). In 1886, the BMS began founding mission stations on the upper river. The early work focused upon the establishment of elementary schools. Since government money for schools only went to Roman Catholics, the BMS had to raise the funds to support the Baptist schools. The first medical facility opened at Bolobo in 1921.

The first Bible translation in a local language, Kikongo, was published in 1893. Works in eleven other languages followed over the next twenty-five years. The mission presented a conservative Christian perspective and asked believers to follow a strict discipline, which included refraining from alcohol, polygamy, and sexual promiscuity.

The Congo became independent in 1960. The BMS transferred its mission to three new Baptist bodies, the Baptist Church of the Lower River, the Baptist Church of the Middle River, and the Baptist Church of the Upper River. However, soon afterwards, the government decreed that all Protestants groups, in order to receive state recognition, had to join in one organization, the Church of Christ in the Congo. The three Baptist churches united as the Baptist Community of the Zaire River (Communauté Baptiste du Fleuve Zaire) and then affiliated with the Church of Christ, whose organizers had worked out a means by which the member organizations could retain their separate existence. Those missionaries that remained in the Congo (then known as Zaire) were now responsible to the community rather than the BMS.

The community has survived the regime of Mobutu Sese Seko, the successful revolution in the 1990s, and the establishment of the present Republic of the Congo. In the mid-1990s, it reported 252,000 members. It is a member of the BAPTIST WORLD ALLIANCE.

Address:

Church of Christ in the Congo—Baptist Community of the Congo River
 B.P. 205
 Kinshasa 1
 Democratic Republic of the Congo

Source:

Stanley, Brian. The History of the Baptist Missionary Society, 1792–1992. Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark, 1992.

Church of Christ in the Congo—Baptist Community of the Western Congo

The king of Belgium asserting hegemony over the Congo alerted Baptists in England of the possibility of opening missionary work in this then relatively unknown area of the world. The Baptist Missionary Society (BMS) started a work there that grew into what is known today as the CHURCH OF CHRIST IN THE CONGO—BAPTIST COMMUNITY OF THE CONGO RIVER. Almost simultaneously, however, Alfred Tilly (1825–1899), a Baptist minister from Wales and a member of the committee guiding the BMS, founded the independent Livingstone Inland Mission. Believing that the BMS effort would be limited to the coastal region, Tilly directed the mission’s efforts upriver. Cooperating with the East London Institute for Home and Foreign Missions, Tilly recruited fifty missionaries and sent them to establish stations along the hundreds of miles of the riverfront.

Beginning in 1878, seven stations had been established within the first five years. Then in 1884 the work was turned over to the American Baptist Missionary Union (ABMU; now an integral part of the AMERICAN BAPTIST CHURCHES IN THE U.S.A.) As it turned out, the BMS did focus its mission along the same riverfront; however, the territory was so large that a situation of potential competition became one of cooperation. The ABMU work received its first breakthrough in 1886 when a revival broke out at their station at Banza Mantেকে. Over a thousand people converted.

Horrified at the practices of the traditional religions of the peoples among whom they worked, the ABMU missionaries, like the BMS missionaries, insisted that their converts make a strong break with their past. Members were taught to refrain from drunkenness, polygamy, what was considered pagan dancing, witchcraft, and any other practices that the missionaries saw as remnants of their religious past. Like the BMS mission, the ABMU effort founded a number of elementary schools. They also discovered that people would often associate with the mission for many years before making the decision to formally convert to Christianity, a decision symbolized by their being baptized.

The ABMU mission took a major step in 1947 with the formation of the Convention of Baptist Churches. When the Belgian Congo gained its independence, the convention became the Association des Églises Baptistes du Congo Ouest, and a formal separation from the mission occurred. In 1966, the ABMU formally gave the association all of its assets in the Congo. When the government decreed that all Protestants groups, in order to receive state recognition, had to join in one organization, the Church of Christ in the Congo, the association became a charter member of the new church. It was structured in such a way that its members were able to keep their denominational identity. The former association became known as the Church of Christ in the Congo—Baptist Community of Western Zaire.

In 1909, the two missions cooperated in the formation of the Kimpese Evangelical Training Institution to provide training in evangelism and the Bible. The institution is known today as the Evangelical Center of Cooperation and operates a number of schools throughout the country. The mission also opened several hospitals and a leprosy camp. In the post-independency era, medical work developed a focus on preventive health care.

In the 1990s, a successful revolution ended the long regime of Mobutu Sese Seko, and with the new government the country’s name was changed to the Republic of the Congo. Church names were adjusted accordingly.

In the mid-1990s the Church of Christ in the Congo—Baptist Community of the Western Congo reported 252,000 members in 600 churches. It is a member of the BAPTIST WORLD ALLIANCE and the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES.

Address:

Church of Christ in the Congo—Baptist Community of the Western Congo
 Avenue de l’Avenir 537
 B.P. 4728
 Kinshasa 2
 Democratic Republic of the Congo

Sources:

Stanley, Brian. The History of the Baptist Missionary Society, 1792–1992. Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark, 1992.

Torbet, Robert. Venture of Faith. Philadelphia: Judson Press, 1955.

Van der Bent, Ans J., ed. Handbook/Member Churches/World Council of Churches. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 1985.

Church of Christ in the Congo—Community of Baptist Churches in the Eastern Congo

The Conservative Baptist Foreign Mission Society (CBFMS; now Conservative Baptist International), associated with the Conservative Baptist Association of America, began work in the Congo in 1946 by assuming control of the mission previously established by Unevangelized Africa Mission. In 1928 Paul Hurlburt Sr. (b. 1927) had begun the work in Kivu province in the eastern part of the country. By the 1940s he had gathered some 2,600 missions and established several hundred schools and a clinic for people suffering from Hansen's disease (leprosy). Once the CBFMS took over the work, they opened secondary schools, expanded the evangelism program, and distributed literature. In 1948 the missionaries founded Rwan-guba Bible Institute, from which several regional Bible schools were opened. The mission was organized as the Association of Baptist Churches of Kivu for purposes of seeking government recognition.

The progress of the mission was interrupted several times in the 1960s due to the warlike conditions in that part of the Congo. On at least four occasions the missionaries withdrew and returned. In the midst of this unrest, the church suffered a schism over the continuing role of the missionaries. The greater number of church members no longer wished to cooperate with the missionaries and left to found the Baptist Community in Kivu. The group continuing to work with the Conservative Baptist missionaries continued as the Association of Baptist Churches.

In 1970 the government granted recognition to the association. It also demanded that all Protestant and FREE CHURCH groups come together in a new government-sponsored structure, the Church of Christ of Zaire (now the Community of Christ of the Congo). In 1973 the association changed its name to the Community of Baptist Churches in Kivu and affiliated with the Church of Christ. The Baptist Community in Kivu also affiliated.

In the 1990s, the Community of Baptist Churches in Kivu, more recently known as the Community of Baptist Churches in the Eastern Congo, reported 53,000 members in 196 churches. The Baptist Community in Kivu is a member of the BAPTIST WORLD ALLIANCE. In the 1990s it had 94,00 members in 274 churches.

Address:

Church of Christ in the Congo—Community of Baptist Churches in the Eastern Congo
B.P. 485
Goma
Democratic Republic of the Congo

Sources:

Founded on the Word: Focused on the World. Wheaton, IL: CBFMS, 1978.

Nelson, Jack E. Christian Missionizing and Social Transformation. New York: Praeger, 1992.

Church of Christ in the Congo—Community of Disciples of Christ

In 1884 the Foreign Christian Missionary Society, the missionary arm of what later came to be known as the CHRISTIAN CHURCH (DISCIPLES OF CHRIST), considered the possibility of opening an African mission. After commissioning an exploratory visit, the society sent Ellsworth Faris and Harry N. Biddle to establish the work. Unable to obtain the Belgian government's approval, they were blocked until the American Baptists abandoned some of their work in the central Congo and turned it over to Faris (Biddle having died, unable to cope with the climate). Initial work was established at Bolenge. The formal transfer of property was made in 1899, with the Disciples reimbursing the Baptists for part of the money that had been put into the facilities.

The original station expanded to six by 1925, at which time there were sixty-four self-supporting churches and almost 8,000 native workers. Expansion was assisted by the construction of several large boats to navigate the Ruki River system. As the mission grew, its headquarters was moved to Coquilhatville, now known as Mbandaka.

The church in the United States very early adopted as its goal the building of an indigenous church, and soon saw that in terms of the mission becoming self-supporting and self-governing. Leadership began to be trained soon after a congregation was formed, and from early on the number of native workers far outnumbered the missionaries, and many were ordained as ministers. The church was granted autonomy in 1964, though it has continued to receive support both from the Christian Church and from Germany through the United Evangelical Mission.

In 1971, following the rise to power of Mobutu Sese Seko and the change of the country's name to Zaire, the Disciples of Christ merged into the Church of Christ in Zaire as the Community of Disciples of Christ. The Disciples of Christ had grown into one of the largest of the Protestant churches in the Congo, with more than 650,000 members by the mid-1980s.

The Church of Christ in the Congo—Community of Disciples of Christ operates an extensive system of primary and secondary schools, and a theological school at Bolenge. It has placed great emphasis on assisting people in the development of modern agricultural techniques.

Church of Christ in the Congo—Community of Light

The church is a member of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES.

Address:

Church of Christ in the Congo—Community of Disciples of Christ
B.P. 178
Mbandaka
Democratic Republic of the Congo

Sources:

Survey of Service. St. Louis, MO: Christian Board of Publication, 1928.
Van der Bent, Ans J., ed. Handbook/Member Churches/World Council of Churches. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 1985.

Church of Christ in the Congo—Community of Light

The Community of Light was founded in 1931 in the Congo, but it traces its beginning to 1918, when the father of Kayuwa Tshibumbu Wa Kahinga, the present patriarch of the church, gave his life to the service of God. The elder Kayuwa began to preach in the town of Kafinga and to gather a congregation. He taught that Sunday was the holy day instituted by God in the fourth commandment (Exodus 20:8) and that it was the church's duty to preach the Gospel for the liberation of the whole person.

The Community of Light, formally organized in 1931, adopted an orthodox Christian, Bible-based perspective. As it grew it developed a program that was integrated into the life of the society. Wednesday became a day for Bible studies and prayer meetings, and the first Friday of each month was a time for the whole congregation to gather for a special spiritual meeting.

As the church spread, the various congregations organized a general assembly, the highest legislative body. The assembly meets annually. The church is led by its patriarch and the bishops. The bishops gather twice annually. Each parish has a monthly gathering to conduct any immediate business. The church carries on a program of health care for the public and has sponsored programs in agricultural development and cattle breeding.

The church has a strong evangelistic program, which includes organized meetings for women and for youth, vacation Bible schools, and evangelistic campaigns. Churches offer literacy courses for adults.

In the 1980s the church had more than 220,000 members. In the 1970s, as mandated by the government, it joined with the other churches in the Church of Christ in the Congo, but has an ecumenical outlook, indicated by its membership in the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES. Additionally, it has a close relationship with the CHRISTIAN CHURCH (DISCIPLES OF CHRIST).

Address:

Church of Christ in the Congo—
Community of Light
B.P. 10498
Kinshasa
Democratic Republic of the Congo

Source:

Van der Bent, Ans J., ed. Handbook/Member Churches/World Council of Churches. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 1985.

Church of Christ in the Congo—Community of Presbyterians

The Church of Christ in the Congo—Community of Presbyterians grew out of the missionary thrust of American Presbyterians (now the PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH [U.S.A.]) who opened a station at Luebo in 1891. The church began to move quickly to develop indigenous leadership, and the appointment of teaching evangelists and the ordination of pastors occurred before the organization of local churches. The missionaries pursued a policy of recruiting capable leaders and placing them in charge of areas in which they served as evangelistic arms of the mission endeavor.

More formal congregations began to emerge in the years after World War I, and the more complete presbyterian church order, complete with local church elders and deacons, began to appear. These congregations could also take the more formal step of calling their pastors. Presbyteries were organized, and they in turn came together to constitute a synod. In 1959, the missionaries relinquished control, and the Presbyterian Community became an autonomous body. It received government recognition the following a year.

Presbyterians in the Congo were among the leaders in the ecumenical movement and participated fully in the Protestant Council of the Congo formed in 1924. This council was one of the first formal attempts outside the West of Protestant churches to coordinate their work in missions. It was also one of the first places in which the split between the more liberal socially active churches and the more conservative evangelistically oriented churches began to appear.

The Presbyterians were among the more liberal groups, their stance emphasizing the need for broad ecumenical relationships among the churches. They were among the churches giving their support to the idea of the creation of the Church of Christ in Zaire, soon after the coming to power of Mobutu Sese Seko in 1970. Mobutu forced all of the churches into a single ecclesiastical organization much more closely tied together than a mere council of churches, though the former denominations were able to keep some denominational identity. As they later saw the attempts of the Mobutu regime to use the new united church for political purposes, church leaders became critics of the arrangement.

The Presbyterian Community has suffered two schisms. First, in 1967, a group in Eastern Kasai withdrew to form the Presbyterian Community of Eastern Kasai. Then, in 1982, the leadership of the Church of Christ in Zaire attempted to impose an episcopal polity on the Presbyterian Community. Although most Presbyterians opposed this proposal, Pastor Jean Bakatushipa liked the idea and was consecrated as a bishop. He was then excommunicated from the Presbyterian Community and with his supporters established the Presbyterian Community in Western Kasai.

Over the years various Presbyterian and Reformed churches established missions apart from the American Presbyterian effort, and several of these grew into independent churches. A number of these formed the Reformed Conference of Zaire (now the Alliance Réformée du Congo-Kinshasa) in 1988.

The Presbyterian Community is the largest Presbyterian body in the Congo and one of the largest non-Catholic churches in the country. In the mid-1990s it reported 1,250,000 members. Its General Assembly is its highest legislative body. It is a member of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES and the WORLD ALLIANCE OF REFORMED CHURCHES.

Address:

Church of Christ in the Congo—
Community of Presbyterians
c/o Procure CPZa
B.P. 1799
Kinshasa
Democratic Republic of the Congo

Sources:

Bauswein, Jean-Jacques, and Lukas Vischer, eds. The Reformed Family Worldwide: A Survey of Reformed Churches, Theological Schools, and International Organizations. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans Publishing Company, 1999.

Van der Bent, Ans J., ed. Handbook/Member Churches/World Council of Churches. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 1985.

Church of Christ in the Congo— Episcopal Baptist Community of Africa

The Episcopal Baptist Community of Africa is a relative new missionary endeavor, founded in 1956 by a Swiss Baptist minister, E. Clemann, assisted by Kabwe-ka-Leza and other Congolese Christians. Though Baptist in belief and maintaining close relationships with Baptist churches in Europe, it has adopted an episcopal mode of organization. The church grew quickly, and as congregations were formed it developed an extensive educational program of primary and secondary schools, Bible schools, and maternity schools. It also manages a variety of medical and diaconal facilities. Work is conducted in French, Swahili, and Kiluba.

The church is led by its bishop, three auxiliary bishops, and the general auxiliary conference. The conference meets every five years. There is an episcopal cabinet that carries on the administration of the church on a day-to-day basis. There is also a council for each region of the church. The bishop nominates candidates for auxiliary bishop, and they are approved by the episcopal conference. Candidates for the ministry are approved by the episcopal cabinet. Both male and female candidates are accepted. Ministers must have a thorough education in the Bible and theology, given through the church's Higher Theological Institute. Some also study with the Theological Faculty at the University of Kinshasa or the Theological School in Kananga.

By the mid-1980s the church reported 70,000 members. It retains close ties with the European Association of Baptist Churches and with various Baptist unions, especially those in French-speaking countries, from which it receives volunteer workers. It was a founding member of the Church of Christ in the Congo, the united church mandated by the government in 1970. However, the church has an ecumenical outlook and has also joined the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES.

Address:

Church of Christ in the Congo—
Episcopal Baptist Community of Africa
B.P. 2809
Lubumbashi
Democratic Republic of the Congo

Sources:

Van der Bent, Ans J., ed. Handbook/Member Churches/World Council of Churches. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 1985.

Wardin, Albert W., ed. Baptists around the World. Nashville: Holman Publishers, 1995.

Church of Christ in the Congo— Evangelical Community

The Evangelical Community in the Congo began in the 1880s with the arrival of missionaries in the then Belgian Congo from the MISSION COVENANT CHURCH OF SWEDEN, which emerged in the nineteenth century from the spread of the Pietist Movement into Scandinavia. The first missionary, Carl Johann Engvall, worked in cooperation with the Livingstone Inland Mission, an interdenominational Protestant mission founded in 1878 by Baptist minister Alfred Tilley (1821–1905). Their initial work in the Congo was eventually turned over to the American BAPTISTS. As the Swedish work grew, some of the American Baptist work was turned over to the Swedish Mission.

The Swedish Mission became an independent Evangelical Church in 1961, after the Congo became an independent nation as Zaire (now the Democratic Republic of the Congo). Soon afterwards, the government ordered the nation's Protestant groups to join in one organization, the Church of Christ in the Congo, as a prerequisite for receiving state recognition in the new independent state. Each of the member units of the Church of Christ became known as a community.

The church's centers are primarily located in the countryside, where it supports several hospitals and a large medical ministry. The Evangelical Community also maintains close connection with the Evangelical Church of the Congo in the neighboring Republic of the Congo (formerly Middle Congo). It is through that church that it may be reached. In the 1990s, it reported some 115,000 members. It is a member of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES and the WORLD ALLIANCE OF REFORMED CHURCHES.

Address:

Church of Christ in the Congo–Evangelical Community
c/o Pastor Alphonse Mbama
B.P. 3205
Brazzaville
Republic du Congo

Sources:

Bauswein, Jean-Jacques, and Lukas Vischer, eds. The Reformed Family Worldwide: A Survey of Reformed Churches, Theological Schools, and International Organizations. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans, 1999.
Van der Bent, Ans J., ed. Handbook/Member Churches/World Council of Churches. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 1985.

Church of Christ in the Congo–Mennonite Community

The Church of Christ in the Congo–Mennonite Community dates to the arrival of the first Mennonite missionaries in the 1890s. However, in 1912 the Defenseless Mennonite Church (now known as the Evangelical Mennonite Conference) and the Central Illinois Mennonite Conference (now an integral part of the General Conference Mennonite Church), both based in the United States, organized the Congo Inland Mission. The mission assumed hegemony of the Mennonite work that was located southeast of Kinshasa and west of the Kasai River. In 1914, the missionaries supported by the Swedish Baptist Mission merged their work into the Congo Mission. The work grew slowly but steadily for the next half century. A number of Mennonite churches contributed both money and personnel to the Congo Mission.

In February 1960, in anticipation of the forthcoming independence, the mission was turned over to local control, and it emerged as an independent Mennonite church in the Congo, though the missionaries remained in the field to supply continuing support. The action proved fortuitous, as the missionaries were expelled before the end of the year. They returned briefly before being expelled again. In 1970, like other churches in the Congo, the Mennonite Church became a community in the Church of Christ in the Congo and assumed its present name.

The Mennonite Community headquarters are in the city of Tshikapa in West Kasai, but is best contacted through the Mennonite Central Committee in Kinshasa. As the new century begins, it has approximately 85,000 members. It is a member of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES.

Address:

Church of Christ in the Congo–Mennonite Community
c/o Mennonite Central Committee
B.P. 4081
Kinshasa
Democratic Republic of the Congo

Sources:

Dyck, Cornelius J. An Introduction to Mennonite History: A Popular History of the Anabaptists and the Mennonites. Scottsdale, PA: Herald Press, 1967.
Loewen, Melvin J. Three Score: The Story of an Emerging Mennonite Church in Central Africa. Elkhart: Congo Inland Mission, 1972.
Van der Bent, Ans J., ed. Handbook/Member Churches/World Council of Churches. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 1985.
Weaver, William B. Thirty-Five Years in the Congo: A History of the Demonstrations of Divine Power in the Congo. Chicago: Congo Inland Mission, 1945.

Church of Christ in the Congo–Presbyterian Community of Kinshasa

In 1955 the Presbyterian mission that had been established by the American Presbyterians (now the PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH [U.S.A.]) was shaken by a controversy in Leopoldville (now Kinshasa). Leadership in the area of the capital wanted to redirect its program to meet the needs of what it saw as an emerging urban area and of the growing educated middle class. This controversy led to a break with the mission, and the African leadership established an independent church. The lay membership of the church provided some of the dynamism for which the church became known, and that drive, coupled with the strength of the church because of its location in the major city of the country, gave it a level of influence beyond that which its actual size might suggest.

The church cultivated an emphasis on worship, but it was hurt in the 1960s when a wave of Pentecostalism swept through the membership; in 1962 some 1,500 members left to form a Charismatic church. On the other hand, the church rebounded under the able leadership of the Rev. Josue Tashimungu in the 1970s. Tashimungu emerged as one of the major architects of the Church of Christ in the Congo, the federation of Protestant churches that was forced upon the country in the 1970s following independence and the emergence of Mobutu Sese Seko as the country's strongman.

The Presbyterian Community of Kinshasa moved from being a leading voice in the formation of the federated church to being one of its strongest critics as the church's leadership began to impose an authoritarian rule on the church and the Mobutu government tried to use the church to manipulate the Protestant community. Among the significant issues it confronted was the 1980s attempt by the government to transform the Church of Christ into an episcopally led organization.

In the 1990s the Presbyterian Community of Kinshasa reported approximately 65,000 members. An ecumenically active body, it has joined the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES and WORLD ALLIANCE OF REFORMED CHURCHES and has been very active in the Alliance Réformée du Congo-Kinshasa, a cooperative body for churches of the Reformed tradition in the country.

Address

Church of Christ in the Congo—
Presbyterian Community of Kinshasa
B.P. 91
Boulevard Lamumba no. 2860
Limete
Kinshasa
Democratic Republic of the Congo

Source:

Bauswein, Jean-Jacques, and Lukas Vischer, eds. The Reformed Family Worldwide: A Survey of Reformed Churches, Theological Schools, and International Organizations. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans, 1999.

Church of Christ in the Congo— Province of the Anglican Church of the Congo

Of all the Anglican provinces, the one serving the Congo had the most unique beginning. In 1895, the chief of Boga invited the two Ugandan Anglican evangelists to preach and to teach his people, who resided in the Semliki River valley. The chief did not like their message, and stopped their support. They returned to Uganda. At that point, Apolo Kivebulaya, a former soldier, offered himself as a catechist (lay instructor). He was subsequently sent to Boga, in 1896. Kivebulaya's opposition to some of the traditional religious practices hindered his progress for a period, and for a time he was jailed on charges that later proved to be unfounded. His example under pressure proved persuasive to many, including the chief who had originally opposed him.

Then in 1915, the border between Uganda and the Congo was altered, and Boga, formerly in western Uganda, became part of the eastern Congo. By this means, Anglicanism came to the Congo, though the work remained under the jurisdiction of the bishop in Uganda. Kivebulaya lived until 1993 and spent the better part of his life training a new generation of leaders.

In 1969, Theodore Lewis, an American Foreign Service officer, visited Boga, and found approximately a dozen ministers caring for some 25,000 members. He petitioned the CHURCH OF ENGLAND to place a bishop in the Congo. In 1972, with the support of the CHURCH MISSIONARY SOCIETY, Philip Ridsdale, an English missionary, arrived as the first bishop. He was subsequently succeeded by a lineage of African bishops.

In 1970, the government of what was then Zaire demanded that all of the Protestant churches unite into the Church of Christ in Zaire (now the Church of Christ in the Congo). This body succeeded the former Congo Protestant Council (founded in 1924), and the Anglican Church became Church of Christ in Zaire—Anglican Church of Zaire. In 1992, the Anglican Church of Zaire became a province with its own archbishop, Patrice Njojo Byankya. With the overthrow of Zairean leader Mobutu Sese Seko in 1997 and the reorganization of Zaire as the Democratic Republic of the Congo, the present Church of Christ in the Congo—Province of the Anglican Church of the Congo emerged.

The Province of the Congo is headed by its archbishop, Most Rev. Njojo Byankya (B.P. 154, Bunia, Democratic Republic of the Congo). As the new century begins, it has grown substantially and now reports a membership of 300,000. There are five dioceses. The church is supported by the Congo Church Association, based in the United Kingdom, which serves as an advocate for the Congo within the Church of England and maintains an Internet site providing history and other information on the church at <http://www.congchurchassn.org.uk/>. The church is a member of the worldwide ANGLICAN COMMUNION and the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES.

The church remembers Apolo Kivebulaya as its apostle on the anniversary of his death, May 30.

Address:

Church of Christ in the Congo—
Province of the Anglican Church of the Congo
P.O. Box 25586
Kampala
Uganda

Sources:

The Church of England Yearbook. London: Church Publishing House, published annually.
 Kane, J. Herbert. A Global View of Christian Missions. Grand Rapids, MI: Baker Book House, 1971.

Church of Christ, Scientist

Christian Science is a metaphysical religion with a spiritual healing component based on the revelations of Mary Baker Eddy (1821–1910), revelations received after a fall on the ice in 1866. Eddy, a semi-invalid, had in the past been assisted in her health problems by Phineas Parkhurst Quimby (1902–1866), a mesmerist and spiritual healer in Belfast, Maine. Since he died in 1866, Eddy was confined to bed without his services after her fall. While she was reading the Bible, she received what she saw as a divine healing. After the healing, she got up and walked. Later, perceiving her mission to be divine, she began to explore Scripture and wrote her first major treatise, Science and Health (later expanded as Science and Health with Key to the Scriptures), in 1875. Her work formed the theological cornerstone for the church and today is believed by Christian Scientists to be a companion volume to the Bible.

Eddy believed that Christian Science had been revealed to her alone and started the Christian Science Association for her students near Boston in 1876. Her religion was a controversial one, frequently called the “Boston Craze” by newspaper writers. She suffered attacks from former Quimby student Julius Dresser (1838–1893), who accused her of pirating the healing work of Quimby without giving him credit. The polemics continued for a number of years, even after the death of Eddy, and the historical repercussions eclipsed the history of New Thought (i.e., those metaphysical churches like the UNITY SCHOOL OF CHRISTIANITY and RELIGIOUS SCIENCE whose history parallels Christian Science) and tainted Christian Science itself until late in this century.

Eddy trained others how to heal in silence using her specific methodology when she formed her first class in 1870. In 1879 she organized the Church of Christ, Scientist, in Lynn, Massachusetts, later, in 1881, moving it to Boston, where she allowed her students to ordain her as the sole pastor. (Church services today are conducted by readers, who follow her precise lessons for each Sunday of the year.) In 1882 she founded the Massachusetts Metaphysical College, where she taught her students to be Christian Science practitioners. It flourished for several years, and then Eddy closed its doors in 1889.

Many of her brightest students, such as Emma Curtis Hopkins (1853–1925), Ursula Gestefeld (1845–1921), and Augusta Stetson (1842–1928), left Christian Science to found other churches or academies for spiritual training. Later these religious entrepreneurs and others like them became strong influences of the eclectic New Thought movement. Despite Eddy’s attempt to wed Christian Science with Christianity and divorce it from New Thought, it differs from normative Protestantism because of the interpretation of God as monistic, not monotheistic, that is, because God is seen as the one underlying reality of the whole universe, rather than as a Creator separate from his creation. In other words, God is a principle, not a person, and that principle is Life, Truth, Love, Substance, and Intelligence.

Eddy fully reorganized her church in 1892 and developed the Church Manual and bylaws, which gave it the organizational configuration that it has today. There is a five-member governing board, which runs the administration by the authority vested in it by the Mother Church. The board charters branch churches, which operate with democratic control within the framework of the Church Manual. Perhaps the most well-known component of the church is the Christian Science Publishing Society, which has its own board of directors. Publications include the award-winning newspaper the Christian Science Monitor, the Herald of Christian Science (published in twelve languages and braille), the Christian Science Journal (whose first full-time editor was Emma Curtis Hopkins, who later went on to found organizational New Thought), the Christian Science Sentinel, and the Herald of Christian Science Quarterly, all published in Boston.

A major controversy hit the church’s leadership in the early 1990s, and some administrators resigned in protest or were fired. Several of the issues concerned the expansive development of television as a promotional device, the spending of church monies in ventures that were considered speculative by some, and most importantly what appeared to be autocratic control by the board of directors.

There are approximately three thousand churches worldwide. Membership is unknown. The complex housing the church headquarters (address given below) has become a mecca for tourists as well as visiting Christian Scientists and features a number of educational and religious exhibits. Mary Baker Eddy as a religious entrepreneur earned the longest entry in Notable American Women.

Address:

Church of Christ, Scientist
 Christian Science Church Center
 175 Huntington Ave.
 Boston, MA 02115
<http://www.tfccs.com>

Gail M. Harley

Sources:

Christian Science: A Sourcebook of Contemporary Materials. Boston, MA: Christian Science Publishing Society, 1990.

- Gill, Gillian. Mary Baker Eddy. Reading, MA: Perseus Books, 1998.
- Gottschalk, Stephen. The Emergence of Christian Science in American Religious Life. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1978.
- Peel, Robert. Mary Baker Eddy. 3 vols. New York: Holt, Rinehart and Winston, 1971.

Church of England

The Church of England, the primary religious organization in the United Kingdom, originated with the movement of Christianity to the British Isles during the years of the Roman occupation. Scattered communities of Christians were known by the second century, and the first martyr, Saint Alban, was killed during one of the periods of persecution in the third century. Bishops from London and York participated in the councils held at Arles (314) and Ariminum (359).

The miniscule British church experienced what is considered a new beginning at the end of the sixth century with the arrival of Augustine (d. 604; not to be confused with the North African bishop/theologian of the same name, 354–430), who came to Canterbury at the request of Pope Gregory the Great (c. 540–604). He converted Ethelbert, the local ruler, was named archbishop, and established Canterbury as the center of the British church. Following Gregory's plan for organizing the work in Britain, a second major episcopal see for the north was established in York, the primary Roman city in the north. Augustine began the task of bringing the church as it then existed under the more direct authority of Rome and of evangelizing the mass of the island's inhabitants, who still followed their pagan faith. Through the seventh century, much of the island was evangelized and the subordination to Rome completed. A rich monastic life developed.

The conquest of England by William the Conqueror in the eleventh century brought French Norman influence to the fore in England. Normans succeeded to the major offices in the church. The church was, if anything, made even more Roman, due to the special ties that the Normans had to the pope. William appointed the Norman Lanfranc as the new archbishop of Canterbury in 1070, and Lanfranc set about the reorganization of the church, which included the imposition of clerical celibacy and the separation of the ecclesiastical courts from the secular. The church also took part in the reorganization of the land along feudal lines. Bishops and abbots assumed a new importance as large landowners. It also set up the significant struggles between church and state that led to the assassination of archbishop of Canterbury Thomas à Becket in 1170 and the withdrawal by King Henry I of the demands he had made for the submission of the church.

Although the church experienced many issues and changes in the next five centuries, none were so critical for its future as its response to the Protestant Reformation in the sixteenth century. Initially, Reformation ideas made little headway in England, as both king and bishops were loyal to Rome. However, for a variety of political and personal reasons, King Henry VIII (r. 1509–1547) began to separate the church from papal authority. The initial crisis came when he decided to divorce Catherine of Aragon (1485–1536), the daughter of the king and queen of Spain. When the pope refused to alienate the Spanish crown by granting a divorce, Henry forced the parliament to enact a series of legislative acts (1534–1535) that changed the allegiance of the British church from the pope to the king. There was no change in doctrine, and no softening of the harsh attitude toward Lutherans in the country. He then moved against the monasteries to claim their land revenues for his own depleted treasury.

Even though Henry flirted with Protestantism, it was not until the reign of his son, Edward VI (r. 1547–1553), that Protestantism made any real progress. During his brief reign, the Protestants who had become his chief counselors and guardians promulgated Protestant belief and practice with a vengeance. However, after five years, the sickly Edward died, to be replaced by his sister Mary (r. 1553–1558), a loyal Roman Catholic. She and her supporters attempted to return the Church of England to its former position within the ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH and in the process executed a number of Protestant leaders. So extensive was the persecution that it earned her the lasting hatred of the Protestant community and her popular designation as Bloody Mary.

In 1558, Elizabeth I (1533–1603) inherited a land divided between Catholics and Protestants. Her great accomplishment was the articulation and enforcement of what became known as the via media, the middle way, a new path drawing upon both Protestantism and Roman Catholicism that led to the unique Anglican tradition of the modern world. She reinstated the Act of Supremacy that had established her father as head of the British church and assumed the title of supreme governor of the church. She also authorized a new Protestant edition of the Prayer Book, the primary liturgical document for the church. In 1559, the Roman Catholic bishops resigned, and new bishops loyal to Elizabeth were installed in their place. Pope Leo XIII declared the orders of the new bishops invalid. In 1570, Elizabeth was excommunicated from the Roman Catholic Church.

In the meantime, Calvinist Protestantism gained a foothold in Scotland, and in 1580 the CHURCH OF SCOTLAND became officially Presbyterian in belief and worship. In England, some Protestants proposed various programs for further purifying the Church of England (whence their popular name of Puritans), most of which involved the replacement of bishops with an alternate form of church authority. The largest grouping among the Puritans were the Presbyterians. In the 1640s, they came to the fore in England and became the dominant force in Parliament, which entered into the open conflict with King Charles I (r. 1625–1649) known as the English Civil War, which ended in the overthrow and execution of the king. In 1645, Parliament forbade the Prayer Book and outlawed Anglicanism. In 1647, an assembly of Presbyterian leaders issued the Westminster Confession of Faith and the Westminster Catechism, the primary statements of British Presbyterianism.

Anglicanism reached its lowest ebb during the years of the Commonwealth under Protestant Oliver Cromwell (r. 1649–1658). However, his successor proved inept, and a new king restored the monarchy. Charles II (r. 1660–1685) reestablished Anglicanism in 1662. The Church of England has remained the official church of the land since that time. The Puritans now faced official disapproval, and they went through a period of persecution and discrimination until the Act of Toleration of 1689 established a system by which dissent from the established church could be institutionalized in different churches as long as they basically accepted the Anglican statement of faith as embodied in the Thirty-nine Articles, drawn up under Elizabeth I. These articles present a set of orthodox Christian affirmations concerning God and Christ, affirm two sacraments (baptism and the Lord's Supper), make no mention of bishops, and specifically deny a variety of Roman Catholic beliefs, most notably transubstantiation and the veneration of the Virgin Mary.

The reestablishment of Anglicanism, the continued outlawing of Roman Catholicism, and the period of official disapproval of Protestantism led many to come into the reestablished Anglican Church while retaining their Roman Catholic and Protestant tendencies. This led to the development of three recognizable groupings within the church and its leadership. Those favoring Protestantism formed a Low-Church wing. They enjoyed a period of prominence in the eighteenth century during the Evangelical Awakening associated with the rise of METHODISM. Those who favored an emphasis on ritual that brought them closer to Roman Catholic practice formed the High-Church or Anglo-Catholic wing. They experienced a period of marked revival in the nineteenth century. In the middle were the latitudinarians who attempted to mediate between the two extremes. These three groupings continue in strength to the present in both the Church of England and the worldwide Anglican movement

Soon after their reestablishment in power, Anglican leaders became aware of the significant number of British citizens who now resided outside of the country, especially in the newly discovered lands of the Americas. The large number of Anglicans who had settled in the American colonies were especially in need of leadership. Following a period of work in the American colonies in the 1690s, Dr. Thomas Bray (1656–1730) returned to England and led in the founding of two organizations to assist in the development of the church and clergy outside of England, the Society for the Promotion of Christian Knowledge and the SOCIETY FOR THE PROPAGATION OF THE GOSPEL IN FOREIGN PARTS (SPG). The former set itself the task of producing inexpensive Christian literature for mass circulation. The latter began the recruitment of Anglican ministers for service abroad, especially in America.

The establishment of Anglican parishes abroad was initially seen as simply an extension of the church at home, and foreign churches were attached to British dioceses. No bishops were consecrated for service overseas until 1787, when Charles Ingalls became the bishop of Halifax, Nova Scotia. Prior to his taking office, however, the American Revolution had swept the Anglicans in the new United States into a very different situation. They reorganized as the Protestant Episcopal Church (now the EPISCOPAL CHURCH), the first Anglican church independent of the administrative authority of the Church of England.

The American Revolution and the loss of its work in the American colonies, coupled with the development of the British Empire, led to the reorientation of the SPG and the founding of two additional organizations focused upon building the church worldwide, the CHURCH MISSIONARY SOCIETY (1799) and the British and Foreign Bible Society. The SPG having become identified with the High-Church wing of the church, the Church Missionary Society channeled the energies of the Low-Church wing and became the single most important agency of the church in establishing the Church of England throughout the colonies.

The nineteenth century became the era of the great spread of the Church of England internationally. With the appointment of a bishop for Australia (in 1835), New Zealand (1841), and South Africa (1947), the changing global nature of the church became evident to all. This change was further signaled by the meeting in 1867 of the first Lambeth Conference, calling together the whole Anglican episcopate. That conference has continued to meet at ten-year intervals. In 1888, the bishops issued an important statement concerning the basis of the Anglican tradition in four principles: (1) the Holy Scriptures, (2) the Apostles' and Nicene Creed, (3) the two sacraments of baptism and the Lord's Supper, and (4) the historic episcopate.

The Lambeth Quadrilateral (as it came to be known), as articulated in 1888, became the basis from which the Church of England has in the twentieth century become a leader in the ecumenical movement. The church participated (on many occasions as host) in the conferences that led to the creation of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES in 1948. It has also moved to establish special relationships with the Moravian Church, the Old Catholic Church, and the several Orthodox churches. It has also carried on a long-standing dialogue with the Roman Catholic Church, in the hopes of healing the rift brought on by the Reformation.

Although still the state church and the largest church in England, the Church of England has been stung by the widely reported findings of the steady erosion of public support for the church indicated by low attendance and the steady decline in the percentage of babies baptized and youth confirmed in the church. Nevertheless, the archbishop of Canterbury remains one of the more important world Christian leaders. In 1968, the Lambeth Conference recommended that the various Anglican bodies, including the Church of England, consider the ordination of females to the offices of deacon and priest. Subsequently, in 1994, the Church of England ordained the first female to the priesthood. To date it has not selected a female for the office of bishop.

The Church of England has 43 dioceses, which include some 13,000 congregations across England, the Isle of Man, the Channel Islands, the Isles of Scilly, and a small part of Wales. An additional diocese in Europe includes 260 congregations across Europe, Morocco, Turkey, and the Asian countries of the former Soviet Union. An estimated 25 million people currently residing in the United Kingdom (approximately half the residents) have been baptized in the Church of England. Active membership, as measured by reception of Holy Communion on Easter Day, is far lower. In 1997, 1,172,000 people received communion.

At the beginning of the twentieth century, the Church of England was a global body, with branches throughout the British colonial empire. Since World War II, that empire has been dismantled, and in keeping with the changes in missions throughout Christendom, the church granted autonomy to its affiliated branches in different countries and reorganized the whole of the world ANGLICAN COMMUNION as a fellowship of like-minded bishops and churches. In a somewhat different status are the Anglican parishes throughout continental Europe. These parishes, usually one or two per country, serving primarily expatriates, have been organized into the Diocese of Europe, whose headquarters is in London.

Address:

General Synod of the Church of England
Church House
Great Smith St.
London SW1P 3NZ
United Kingdom
<http://www.england.anglican.org/>

Source:

Wakeman, Henry Offley. An Introduction to the History of the Church of England. London: Rivingtons, 1947.

Church of God (Anderson, Indiana)

The Church of God (Anderson, Indiana), one of the leading representatives of the nineteenth-century HOLINESS

MOVEMENT, was founded in 1880 by Daniel Warner (1842–1925), formerly a minister of the Church of God, General Council. The Holiness movement had emerged among the several Methodist churches in the middle of the century and emphasized the belief that God could impart sanctification (holiness) to Christian believers as a special work of the Holy Spirit. Within Holiness churches, the experience of sanctification has been seen as the common experience of the Christian life.

Because of his belief in sanctification, Warner was expelled from the Church of God, General Council. He organized the new Church of God with a congregational polity. The highest legislative body for the church is the General Assembly, which meets annually. The assembly oversees the various agencies and schools established by the church. The church did not adopt a creed, but generally follows Holiness teachings and places a central emphasis upon evangelism and missionary endeavors. It celebrates three ordinances, all seen as symbolic acts of obedience: baptism, the Lord's Supper, and the washing of feet. Baptism is by immersion, the Lord's Supper is open to all Christians, and foot washing occurs annually on Maundy Thursday (during the week preceding Easter).

The church quickly developed an expansive missionary program and currently sponsors missionaries in 87 countries, the majority in Central and South America and the Caribbean Islands. It is one of the few Protestant churches sponsoring work in Egypt.

The church has 2,297 congregations in the United States (2000) and 50 congregations in Canada, with approximately 230,000 members. The church is affiliated with the CHRISTIAN HOLINESS PARTNERSHIP and the National Association of Evangelicals, through which it is additionally related to the WORLD EVANGELICAL ALLIANCE.

Address:

Church of God
P.O. Box 2420
Anderson, IN 46018
<http://www.chog.org>

Sources:

Callen, Barry L., ed. The First Century. 2 vols. Anderson, IN: Warner Press, 1979.
Miller, Milburn H. Unto the Church of God. Anderson, IN: Warner Press, 1968.
Stern, R. Eugene. We Reach Our Hands in Fellowship. Anderson, IN: Warner Press, 1960.

Church of God (Cleveland, Tennessee)

The Church of God traces its origin to August 19, 1886, when Missionary Baptist ministers Richard Green Spurling (1857–1935) and his father, Richard Spurling (1810–1891), organized the Christian Union in Monroe County, Tennessee. Reacting to the exclusivism of the Landmark Baptist movement, the Spurlings called for Christian unity based on a testimony of Jesus Christ as savior and a covenant to take the New Testament as the basis of doctrine and practice.

Over the next few years R. G. Spurling founded several congregations in eastern Tennessee. In 1902 he organized the Holiness Church at Camp Creek, North Carolina, in the home of William F. Bryant (1863–1949). This congregation conserved the results of a 1896 revival that had introduced the doctrine of sanctification as a second definite work of grace and located the group in the American Holiness movement and its growing use of Pentecostal language (i.e., baptism of the Holy Spirit) to describe the sanctification experience. Following this revival, many people testified of speaking in tongues and of experiences of divine healing. When Indiana-born Ambrose J. Tomlinson (1865–1943) joined the group in 1903, he was immediately selected as pastor and served as leader of the denomination until his ouster in 1923, amidst controversy over polity and financial management. Activities moved to Cleveland, Tennessee, in 1904 when Tomlinson relocated there. Reflecting a belief that it was restoring the New Testament Church of God as addressed by Paul in the Scriptures, the Assembly chose the name Church of God in 1907, and the denomination became firmly established in the Pentecostal movement following the Spirit baptism experience of Tomlinson in 1908. Publication of the Church of God Evangel began in 1910. A list of Teachings was published in 1910, and a Declaration of Faith was approved in 1948, following debate over the nature of sanctification.

International efforts began in late 1909 and early 1910, when a missionary team composed of Edmond and Rebecca Barr and R. M. and Ida Evans, along with Carl M. Padgett, took the Pentecostal message to the Bahamas. Over the years the movement supported various missionaries and finally established a standing missions board in 1926. The last half of the twentieth century saw the development of amalgamation agreements with several indigenous Pentecostal organizations, including the Full Gospel Church of God in Southern Africa (1951) and Gereja Bethel Indonesia (Indonesian Bethel Church of God) (1970). These national organizations assent to Church of God doctrine and practice with some minor variations. In 2000 the Church of God had 31,560 congregations in 159 countries and claimed 5,766,680 members worldwide.

Although continuing many practices of Appalachian Baptists, such as believer's baptism, shouting, and foot washing, Tomlinson developed a modified episcopal form of church polity, which combines an assembly composed of all members who wish to attend and an episcopal system of appointments. The general overseer and many other officials are elected biennially at the International General Assembly. Field directors, superintendents, and state and national overseers supervise in various geographical divisions.

Address:

Church of God (Cleveland, Tennessee)
Keith and 25th Sts.
P.O. Box 2430
Cleveland, TN 37320–2430
<http://www.churchofgod.cc>

David G. Roebuck

Sources:

- Conn, Charles W. Like a Mighty Army: A History of the Church of God, Definitive Edition, 1886–1995. Cleveland, TN: Pathway Press, 1996.
- Minutes of the 68th General Assembly of the Church of God*. Cleveland, TN: Pathway Press, 2000.
- Roebuck, David G. "Restorationism and a Vision for World Harvest: A Brief History of the Church of God (Cleveland, Tennessee)." Cyberjournal for Pentecostal-Charismatic Research, volume 5: <http://www.pctii.org/cyberj/index.html>.

Church of God in Christ

The Church of God in Christ ranks among a rare cadre of African American Christian denominations that have congregations on six continents. With over six million members worldwide, the membership of the Church of God in Christ (or COGIC) consists of myriad nationalities in some sixty countries. COGIC has become a global church through the ministry of its missionaries, nationals, and U.S. military families serving around the world.

The Church of God in Christ began as a Holiness fellowship among African American Baptists in Mississippi in 1896. In 1897 its first independent congregation was established as a Holiness church, and the Church of God in Christ has identified 1897 as its founding date. This was also the year that the name Church of God in Christ was given to Charles Harrison Mason (1861–1961), one of the leaders of the fellowship. The fellowship grew throughout the mid-South region of the United States, in addition to establishing a mission in Liberia. During this time, the fellowship became interdenominational, attracting Methodist as well as Baptist congregations into its organization. Theological controversies, however, over the compatibility of Baptist doctrine and Holiness teaching led the African American Baptist state conventions in Mississippi and Arkansas to disfellowship leading Holiness Baptist clergy such as Mason and Charles Price Jones (1865–1949).

In 1907 Mason and two other clergy from the fellowship attended the Azusa Street Revival in Los Angeles. All three clergy received the Pentecostal experience. Mason returned to the South and introduced the Pentecostal message to his Holiness fellowship. Only a minority of the clergy embraced the message; the majority requested that the Pentecostal faction withdraw. Mason retained the name Church of God in Christ and began the process of transforming his faction of the fellowship into a Holiness-Pentecostal denomination. During the next decade (1907–1917), COGIC functioned as an interracial network of Black and White fellowships. One of the White fellowships served as the core faction in organizing the ASSEMBLIES OF GOD in 1914. Even though COGIC has remained a predominantly African American denomination, it has always had white and Latino members within its American congregations; during various periods of its history, especially the pre–civil rights era, COGIC included white and Latino congregations within its American membership.

Since its reorganization in 1907, COGIC has been led by six leaders, with sixty-six years being divided between two leaders: Mason for forty-four years and J. O. Patterson (1912–1989) for twenty-two years. The current presiding bishop, Gilbert Earl Patterson (b. 1939), was elected in November 2000. Within COGIC ranks have been pioneers and leaders of the gospel music movement in the United States and Great Britain. COGIC has expressed an ecumenical impulse in its earlier involvement in the Fraternal Council of Negro Churches and its present membership in the Congress of National Black Churches. Since 1970, the denomination has sponsored Charles Harrison Mason Theological Seminary, the first accredited Pentecostal seminary in the world. The seminary is a member of the Interdenominational Theological Center, an ecumenical consortium of seminaries affiliated to Presbyterian, Baptist, and Methodist denominations.

COGIC as a Holiness-Pentecostal denomination began to expand beyond the United States during the 1920s, the decade that it established a presence in some of the anchoring countries within its global orbit. By the mid-1920s, it had already been introduced into various countries: Mexico, Jamaica, Panama, the Turks Islands, and Trinidad. In 1924 Alfred B. Cunningham, a Jamaican, returned to Jamaica in order to introduce COGIC to the island. By 1925 Hall, a Turks Islander, returned to the Turks Islands to introduce COGIC there as well as in some other islands in the area. Also in 1925 Mattie McCauley [McCauley], an African American, became the first nonnational commissioned by COGIC; she served in Trinidad.

In 1928 COGIC commissioned Joseph Paulceus, a Haitian, as a missionary to Haiti; he established a congregation on the island in 1929. Paulceus had served as a COGIC elder in Connecticut. In 1929 COGIC entered Canada. C. L. Morton Sr., a Black Canadian, established a congregation in Windsor, Ontario, after serving as a COGIC clergyman in Detroit, Michigan.

Within the Caribbean, Haiti came to take the lead, with currently over 150 congregations, 42 primary and secondary schools, and an orphanage. Dorothy Webster Exume served as the first COGIC missionary to Haiti. In 1947 she opened the first COGIC school, the C. H. Mason School. COGIC personnel later established a presence in other Caribbean islands, including the Bahamas, Bermuda, the Virgin Islands, Cuba, and the Dominican Republic.

In the 1920s Ms. January, a COGIC member, went to Liberia as a faith missionary without denominational support; in 1930 she was joined by Elizabeth White. Liberia remained the focus of COGIC's African missions until the post–World War II era, when, in 1952, the denomination was introduced to South Africa. It would move into Ghana and Nigeria in the 1960s, and by the 1990s it was present in eighteen African countries. Currently, COGIC's ministry in Africa is led by African nationals.

Among Central and South American countries, COGIC first established a presence in Panama and Mexico. Alfred B. Cunningham of Jamaica opened work in Panama in 1924, and the next year E. L. Strait started work at Las Cruces, Mexico. The ministry in Mexico was assisted by Latino COGIC congregations in Colorado. During the late 1920s, Mattie McCauley shifted her focus to Costa Rica. In 1956/1957 Rev. Richard Fidler introduced the church to Cuba. Through his contacts on the island, 40 congregations joined or were established. During the early 1970s, work expanded to Belize, Guatemala, Panama, Colombia, Guyana, Brazil, Argentina, and Chile.

COGIC spread to Asia through the ministry of Archie Buchanan, a soldier stationed in Japan in the 1950s. During the 1960s, COGIC worked in India with an affiliated Pentecostal movement, the INDIAN PENTECOSTAL CHURCH OF GOD, led by K. E. Abraham. With over 110 congregations in India, India has the largest COGIC presence in Asia; these congregations joined COGIC after the affiliated relationship with the Indian Pentecostal Church changed. The COGIC presence in the Philippines, begun in the 1960s, was strengthened through the activities of COGIC military personnel at U.S. bases in the Philippines. Then Buchanan, along with Paul K. Hong, introduced the ministry to South Korea in 1970. Work later spread to Thailand, Sri Lanka, and New Guinea. The COGIC presence in Australia originated from South African congregations.

COGIC entered Europe in 1948 through a COGIC family, the McLachlans, from Jamaica, who immigrated to England. In subsequent years COGIC expanded within the Afro-Caribbean immigrant community. It spread to Germany among military personnel, and then to Italy and Bulgaria.

Currently, the nationality of COGIC membership varies significantly from country to country. In Africa, the Caribbean, Latin America, India, and Sri Lanka, its members are all nationals. In Japan, South Korea, Germany, and Italy, members tend to be African American expatriates or military families. Afro-Caribbeans and their British-born descendents make up the majority in Great Britain. COGIC finds its largest concentration of congregations outside of the United States in Haiti, India, Liberia, South Africa, Nigeria, and Mexico.

Address:

Church of God in Christ
938 Masoin St.
Memphis, TN 38126
<http://www.cogic.org/main.htm>

Sources:

Clemmons, Ithiel C. Bishop C. H. Mason and the Roots of the Church of God in Christ. Bakersfield, CA: Pneuma Life Publishers, 1996.
Cornelius, Lucille J., comp. The History of Church of God in Christ. N.p., 1975.
Pleas, Charles H. Fifty Years Achievement: Church of God in Christ. N.p., 1957.

Church of God, International (plus Churches of God Outreach
Ministries, Intercontinental
Church of God)

The Church of God, International (CGI), was founded in 1978 by Garner Ted Armstrong (b. 1930) after he was ousted from the WORLDWIDE CHURCH OF GOD by his father, Herbert W. Armstrong (1892–1986). The church is Sabbatarian and millenarian.

During most of the 1970s Garner Ted had effectively run the Worldwide Church of God, including making most of the World Tomorrow radio and TV broadcasts, while his aged father traveled the world on publicity trips meeting princes, prime ministers, and presidents in what Garner Ted was later to call “the world’s most expensive autograph hunt.” But this was also a decade of turmoil and scandal. After revelation of his extramarital affairs, Garner Ted was suspended from all his church duties in 1974; when church income plummeted, he was reinstated to his preaching on the broadcasts after making a confession of his misbehavior. To ministers who complained that his immoral behavior made him unsuitable to be a minister, it was said that as one doing God’s work, he was exempt from biblical strictures on morality.

However, father and son frequently clashed, and Herbert W. Armstrong would often overturn decisions made by his son. Although still very conservative in the world’s eyes, Garner Ted took a more liberal view than his father of some of the church’s doctrines, and was involved in an internal review of doctrines, the Systematic Theology Project, which his father later repudiated. But in a church characterized by an authoritarian and ambitious leadership, some of Herbert W. Armstrong’s closest advisors, according to Garner Ted, were telling his elderly father lies about him. In 1978 Herbert W. Armstrong said that his son “has accused his father of senility” and that “his sole effort has been to destroy his father and God’s Church.” Garner Ted was banished, and went on to found the Church of God, International, headquartered in Tyler, Texas, which eventually grew to perhaps three thousand members worldwide. This church and its offshoots are at the liberal end of the spectrum in comparison with most of the other Worldwide offshoots.

In 1995 Garner Ted Armstrong was again embroiled in sexual scandal. A masseuse released a videotape to the media, showing him in a compromising situation. She pressed charges of sexual assault. Many of the ministers of CGI asked Armstrong to step down as church president. When he refused, around two-thirds of them left in early 1996; in May 1997 they formed a loose confederation of independent churches that were each individually known as “Church of God (location)”; the umbrella group is called Churches of God Outreach Ministries (CGOM).

Armstrong continued with CGI until the end of 1997, when the Council of CGI unanimously voted him out of all positions in his church. He then withdrew from CGI, founded the Garner Ted Armstrong Evangelistic Association, and shortly after that set up the Intercontinental Church of God (ICG). A charismatic preacher, Garner Ted Armstrong attracts a strong personal following whatever his checkered history. CGI, which he had founded, continues to be much smaller without him.

The Church of God, International, has an estimated one thousand members as the new century begins. It may be contacted at the address given below; it is most easily approached through its Web site. It also sponsors a radio and television broadcast, Armor of God, through which it is also easily approached. The Church of God Outreach Ministries may be contacted at P.O. Box 54621, Tulsa, OK 74155–0621. It supports a website at <http://www.cgom.org>, through which it offers its periodicals, New Horizons and Fountain of Life, as well as other publications. The Intercontinental Church of God may be contacted at P.O. Box 1117, Tyler, TX 75710. Garner Ted Armstrong puts out two periodicals, the Intercontinental News and Twenty-First Century Watch, and appears on a radio show that bears his name. The ICG and Garner Ted’s evangelistic association both have Web sites—<http://www.coginterlink.org> and <http://www.gtaea.org>. It has an estimated fifteen hundred members.

Address:

The Church of God, International
P.O. Box 2525
Tyler, TX 75710
<http://www.cgi.org>

David V. Barrett

Sources:

Armstrong, Garner Ted. The Origin and History of the Church of God, International. Tyler, TX: Church of God, International, 1992.

Armstrong, Herbert W. Autobiography. 2 vols. Pasadena, CA: Worldwide Church of God, 1986, 1987.

Barrett, David V. The New Believers. London: Cassell, 2001.

Hopkins, Joseph. The Armstrong Empire: A Look at the Worldwide Church of God. Grand Rapids, MI: William. B. Eerdmans, 1974.

Robinson, David. Herbert Armstrong's Tangled Web. Tulsa, OK: John Hadden, 1980.

Church of God of Prophecy

The Church of God of Prophecy (the name since 1952) often claims to share the early years of the CHURCH OF GOD (CLEVELAND, TENNESSEE). As a result of numerous sociological, theological, historical, and personal factors, the Church of God of Prophecy (CGP) came into existence in 1923–1924. It is an orthodox Christian body in the Holiness Pentecostal tradition.

A. J. Tomlinson (1865–1943) served as general overseer of the church until his death, at which time his youngest son, Milton A. Tomlinson (1906–1995), was chosen for the position. Tomlinson remained the head of the 424,777-member (as of 1998) international church (with a presence in 105 countries) until retiring in 1990. Tomlinson oversaw international departments that directed prayer groups, organized missions, worked with young people, utilized modern media, sought out military personnel, and encouraged Bible study and evangelism. CGP still maintains the multi-million-dollar, 216-acre biblical theme park in western North Carolina known as the Fields of the Wood.

Under the Tomlinsons, the term Atheocracy was employed to describe an ecclesiastical government that proclaimed the annual general assembly to be the highest tribunal, while at the same time the entire ecclesiastical structure collapsed on the office of the general overseer. All of the general assembly resolutions, which were considered to be unanimous decisions of all males who attended the assembly, were predicated on Holiness Pentecostal thought, like the prohibition of multiple marriages of adulterous persons and affirming immanence-oriented eschatologies. The Holiness influence was keenly felt in matters of clothes and recreation, while the restorationist impulse was manifested in an exclusive body ecclesiology. The latter influenced the fact that the CGP has had a high percentage of female pastors and may be the most racially inclusive Pentecostal church at the leadership level in the United States.

Billy D. Murray was chosen to fill the position of general overseer when M. A. Tomlinson resigned in 1990. The church subsequently experienced rapid changes like the closing of Tomlinson College, financial restructuring with an emphasis on local churches, plurality of office of general overseer, and relaxing of some previous taboos. CGP is active in the Pentecostal Charismatic Churches of North America (PCCNA), the PENTECOSTAL WORLD FELLOW-SHIP, and the North American Renewal Service Committee (NARSC). Women ministers may now administer sacraments but are excluded from the elevated rank of presbyter.

Address:

Church of God of Prophecy International Offices
P.O. Box 2910
Cleveland, TN 37312
<http://www.cogop.org>

Harold D. Hunter

Sources:

Cyclopedic Index of Assembly Minutes and Important Business Acts of the Church of God of Prophecy: 1906 to 1974. Cleveland: White Wing Publishing House and Press, 1975.

Davidson, C. T. Upon This Rock. 3 vols. Cleveland, TN: White Wing Publishing House and Press, 1974–1976.

Church of Ireland

The Church of Ireland, the representative of the ANGLICAN COMMUNION in both the Republic of Ireland and Northern Ireland, traces its history to the earliest entrance of Christianity into Ireland and especially to the work of St. Patrick in the fourth century. In this regard, until the sixteenth century, it shares its history with that of the ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH in Ireland. In the sixteenth century, the Protestant Reformation spread to Ireland from England, and in 1637, the king of England (Henry VIII) was declared head of the Church of Ireland. Under Elizabeth I (r. 1558–1603), the Anglican way (discussed under CHURCH OF ENGLAND) was imposed on the church, though it did not win the hearts of the people.

In the eighteenth century, immigration to northern Ireland was encouraged by the British government. Through the nineteenth century the Anglican cause suffered, as Catholicism became identified with the fight for Irish independence. An important step came in 1829 with the granting of legal status to the Roman Catholic Church. In 1867, the Church of Ireland was formally disestablished as the state church of Ireland and became administratively independent of the Church of England. The great majority of the former members of the Church of Ireland reverted to Roman Catholicism.

In 1921, what became the present Republic of Ireland emerged as the Irish Free State, but six counties in the northern part of the island remain part of the United Kingdom. The Church of Ireland retains most of its strength in Northern Ireland. The subsequent decades of war and terrorism have given the church, with members in both parts of Ireland, its primary agenda item through the later decades of the twentieth century to the present. In 1995, it passed a statement concerning the ongoing peace process and the role that various church bodies have played in the past: "We are all called, without exception, to be peacemakers and agents of healing. The involvement of each and every Christian in peacemaking is essential to ensure that the cyclical nature of sectarian violence, which has been exploited for political purposes and has dominated this island's history, is broken once and for all."

The Church of Ireland is headed by its primate, presently Mt. Rev. Robert Henry Alexander Eames. There are two provinces in the church. The primate also serves as the archbishop of the Province of Armagh that includes the seven dioceses in the northern half of the island. The Province of Dublin includes five dioceses in the southern half of Ireland. As the new century begins, the church reports 410,000 members. It is a member of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES and the worldwide Anglican Communion.

Through the 1980s and 1990s, the church engaged in a lengthy process through which women were admitted to the ordained ministry. Legislation to admit women to the diaconate was initially passed by the General Synod in 1984. The first woman to be made a deacon, Katharine Poulton, was ordained in 1987. After further legislation was passed, the first women priests, Irene Templeton and Kathleen Young, were ordained in 1990. Thus, the Church of Ireland became the first Anglican Church in Europe to ordain women as priests.

Address:

Church of Ireland
 Church of Ireland House
 Upper Ratbmines
 IRDublin 6
 Republic of Ireland
<http://www.ireland.anglican.org>

Source:

Van der Bent, Ans J., ed. Handbook/Member Churches/World Council of Churches. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 1985.

Church of Jesus Christ in Madagascar

The Church of Jesus Christ in Madagascar began with the protection given by King Radama I to missionaries from the LONDON MISSIONARY SOCIETY (LMS) who arrived in 1818. David Jones and Thomas Bevean established their initial missionary station at Toamasina on the island's eastern coast. Their school soon attracted many youth from the country's leading families. As additional missionary personnel arrived, the Malagasy language was reduced to writing, and a translation of the Bible was finally published in 1835. Unfortunately, however, Radama died in 1828 and was succeeded by his widow, Queen Rannavola I. She disliked the missionaries and turned on them. Finally in 1835 she banished the missionaries and killed many who had converted. This period forced the indigenous leadership to take over and created a memory of a generation of persecution, a generation that only ended with Rannavola's death in 1861.

Rannavola's son invited the missionaries to return, and in 1869 his wife, Rannavola II, converted to Reformed Christianity. However, now a new force entered the picture, the government of France, which was asserting its hegemony in the region. As that government favored the ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH, the LMS moved to protect its mission by inviting the PARIS MISSION (of the REFORMED CHURCH OF FRANCE) to begin work in 1895. The following year, Madagascar's status as a French colony became official.

In spite of Roman Catholic dominance, both the LMS's work and the Paris Society's mission prospered. In the meantime, the FRIENDS had formed a small mission. During the 1950s these three entities constituted themselves as independent churches, the Church of Christ of Madagascar, the Evangelical Church in Madagascar, and the Malagasy Friends Church. During the 1960s, these three groups saw themselves as essentially one in doctrine and entered into merger talks. In 1968, as part of a celebration of the 150th anniversary of the original LMS mission, the three churches formally created the new Church of Jesus Christ in Madagascar.

The new church immediately ran into problems with the French authorities. The problem concerned a minor clause in the constitution eliminating any manifestation of the state's authority in the church's buildings. The primary manifestation of the state under question was the flying of the state flag during visits by state officials to the church during various celebratory occasions. Only after the change in the government that brought a new socialist regime was the church allowed registration. In 1972, the church turned over all its schools to the state. That same year it moved to become self-sufficient by no longer employing non-Malagasy personnel, though it still received considerable foreign financial support.

In 1980, following the establishment of the National Council of Christian Churches in Madagascar, the church participated in conversations to clear up a nagging problem, the need of a common spelling of Jesus Christ in the Malagasy language. In Malagasy, the Church of Jesus Christ's name became Fiangonan'I Jesoa Kristy Eto Madagasikara.

In 1991, the church participated in the overthrow of the government (not an altogether peaceful process) and in the writing of a more democratic constitution for the new government.

In the 1990s the church reported 2,500,000 members. It supports three theological schools and the graduate Faculty of Theology at Antananarivo. It is a member of the WORLD ALLIANCE OF REFORMED CHURCHES and the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES.

Address:

Church of Jesus Christ in Madagascar
 P.O. Box 623
 Lot II B 18
 Tohatohabato Ranavalona I
 Trano
 Anakaly 101 Antananarivo
 Madagascar

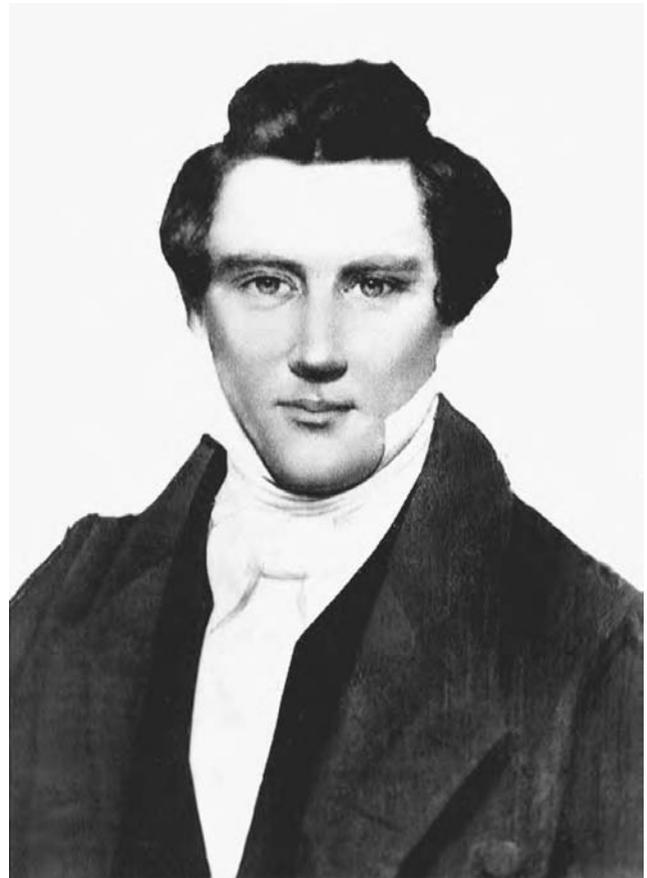

Source:

Bauswein, Jean-Jacques, and Lukas Vischer, eds. The Reformed Family Worldwide: A Survey of Reformed Churches, Theological Schools, and International Organizations. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans Publishing Company, 1999.

Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints

Joseph Smith Jr. (1805–1844) founded the religion that became known as the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints (LDS) on April 6, 1830, in the area of western New York referred to as the Burned-Over District, from the fires of revivalist enthusiasm that had swept through the region in the previous decades. Following a vision of God and Jesus Christ, according to Smith an angel directed him to translate Golden Plates, an ancient religious history explaining the Hebraic origins of the American Indians and their important role in the Second Coming. Published as the Book of Mormon, the scripture gave Smith's religion its popular name of Mormonism and established him as a "prophet, seer and revelator" to his followers. In order to escape persecution and his reputation as a money digger, Smith moved to Kirtland, Ohio, where missionaries achieved great success recruiting followers from what later became the CHRISTIAN CHURCH (DISCIPLES OF CHRIST), founded by Alexander Campbell. Smith's "new and eternal covenant" made his followers the modern Israel, God's chosen people. He laid plans to build a communal society and temple to welcome Christ's return in Independence, Missouri, site of the Garden of Eden. Financial reverses encouraged Smith's departure from Ohio, and political conflict and persecutions in Missouri ultimately resulted in the expulsion of all Mormons from the state in 1839.

Smith rallied to a new "gathering place" at Nauvoo on the Mississippi River and implemented revolutionary extensions of his theology. He developed the doctrine of eternal progression based on a "multiplicity of gods" and an evolving deity. Revelations directed Smith to "do the works of Abraham," and polygamy became required of those who sought the highest levels of salvation. The Mormon prophet in 1844 was ordained king of the Kingdom of God, the political organization he created to rule the earth following Christ's return. Smith was running for president of the United States when he was killed by a mob on June 27, 1844. His enemies accused him of being an imposter, but his followers claimed that Smith had "done more, save Jesus only, for the salvation of men in this world than any other man." Today Smith is widely viewed as a genius who some believe defined a religious tradition as different from Christianity as Christianity was different from Judaism.

Joseph Smith, founder of the Mormon Church (Library of Congress)

Several candidates contested for Smith's legacy, but Brigham Young (1801–1877) consolidated his power as head of the Twelve Apostles and assumed control of the main LDS church shortly after Smith's murder. Although several dozen "Restoration" churches claim Smith as their founder, the branch led by Young became today's largest LDS Church. Young directed the completion of the Nauvoo temple, where thousands of members received Masonic-style "endowments"—which had been revealed by Smith before his death—prior to the movement west. Young personally directed the initial migration and established a new gathering place at Great Salt Lake City (as Salt Lake City was first called) in the Great Basin. For two decades Young was one of the most powerful men in the western United States and insisted that polygamy—which Smith had initiated but had kept secret—be acknowledged.

Young served as governor of Utah Territory from 1850 to 1857, ruling a frontier theocracy that combined the powers of church and state. His defiance of federal authority and abuse of appointed officials ultimately persuaded President James Buchanan to send one-third of the U.S. Army to Utah to insure Young's acceptance of his non-Mormon replacement. In spite of the government's blocking of his overall plan, by his death in 1877 Young had established Mormonism as the region's dominant cultural force. His successors battled the American authorities over polygamy until the manifesto issued by President Wilford Woodruff (1807–1898) declared in 1890 that the church would discontinue the practice. The hard work of bringing Mormonism into the mainstream of American society and making it a viable world religion fell to the church presidents of the twentieth century.

A photo of the Temple and Temple Square in Salt Lake City, Utah (B. Turner/TRIP)

The Mormons faced new political problems related to polygamy when church officials Brigham H. Roberts (1857–1933) and Reed Smoot (1862–1941) were elected to the United States Congress. In response, in 1904, the church issued a second manifesto to finally restrict practice of plural marriage throughout the world, although the actual revelation that Smith relied on to justify the practice remains part of Mormon scripture. Between 1900 and 1950, the church shed its controversial heritage as a radical sect to become a powerful religious community under astute conservative leaders such as Heber J. Grant (1856–1945) and David O. McKay (1873–1970). Grant, the last polygamist to lead the church, systematically unchurched those who practiced polygamy and elevated the proscription of alcohol, tobacco, and “hot drinks” in the “Word of Wisdom” from advice to commandment. In the second half of the twentieth century the LDS Church rapidly gained wealth and members, with notable success in Central and South America, enlisting by century's end more than ten million souls. More than 85 percent of the membership is concentrated on the American continents.

As the millennium ended, the LDS Church built temples at an increasing rate, establishing one hundred by the year 2000. The temple endowment's purpose, creating eternal families, is unique to Mormonism. The ceremony is closed to outsiders, and even members lacking “temple recommends” cannot attend their children's temple marriages. Beginning with Brigham Young, the church refused to ordain black males to the priesthood or allow black members to participate in the temple endowment. President Spencer Kimball terminated this policy in 1978.

The LDS Church has played a significant role in conservative American politics and was instrumental in defeating the Equal Rights Amendment. It actively opposes the gay and lesbian rights movement, gambling, liquor sales, abortion rights, and commercial activities on Sunday. It has also excommunicated intellectuals who have published works critical of church leaders or have presented views of history inconsistent with the church's own interpretation.

The current leadership has struggled to win acceptance as a mainstream religion. It has deemphasized the doctrine of eternal progression expressed in the epigram, “As man now is, God once was; as God now is, man may be,” and has called polygamy evil. As it works to overcome its controversial past, the church promotes traditional families and conservative moral values in sophisticated public relations campaigns. It considers itself as different from Protestantism and Catholicism as Christianity was from Judaism. Some sociologists and historians and other unofficial spokespersons for the church have claimed that this uniquely American faith will be the world's next great religion.

The church teaches that baptism by immersion for persons eight years and older is required for church membership. Belief in the divinity of Jesus Christ, the prophetic calling of Joseph Smith, and the Book of Mormon is central to conversion. The church's canon of scripture includes not only the Bible and Book of Mormon but also additional revelations given to Joseph Smith and his successors contained in the Doctrine and Covenants and the Pearl of Great Price. The church also believes in an open canon and proclaims that the teachings of the church prophet are binding on the members. Blessings to heal the sick or infirm are often given by Priesthood holders to the general church membership. The sacrament of the Lord's Supper is administered each week in local wards (congregations). Bread and water are blessed and administered in remembrance of Christ. Members are encouraged to pay a full tithing, and no members are permitted to enter church temples unless they confirm that they have complied with this, and other church commandments, on a yearly basis. Members are endowed and married in the temple for time and eternity.

The church is governed by a First Presidency, which consists of the president-prophet and his two counselors; twelve apostles; various Quorums of Seventies (who direct the missions of the church); and a Presiding Bishopric (which governs the temporal affairs of the church). These leaders are collectively referred to as General Authorities. When the prophet dies the senior apostle is ordained as his successor.

Missionaries, who represent the church for two years during full-time missions, present a series of gospel lessons to investigators. Their primary objective is to baptize converts into the worldwide church, but some missionaries are also called to provide assistance on a more temporal level. In 2000, the church reported eleven million members worldwide, of which approximately five million resided in the United States. The church is active in more than two hundred countries and publishes literature in more than 175 languages.

Address:

Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints
Church Office Building
50 East North Temple St.
Salt Lake City, UT 84150
<http://www.lds.org>

Michael W. Homer and Will Bagley

Sources:

- Allen, James B., and Glen M. Leonard. The Story of the Latter-day Saints. 2d ed., rev. and enl. Salt Lake City: Deseret Book Company, 1992.
- Bigler, David L. Forgotten Kingdom, The Mormon Theocracy in the American West, 1847–1896. Spokane, WA: Arthur H. Clark, 1998.
- Gospel Principles*. Salt Lake City: The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, 1995.
- Introvigne, Massimo. I Mormoni. Vatican City: Libreria Vaticana, 1992.
- Marquardt, H. Michael, and Wesley P. Walters. Inventing Mormonism: Tradition and the Historical Record. San Francisco: Smith Research Associates, 1994.
- Ostling, Richard N., and Joan K. Ostling. Mormon America: The Power and the Promise. San Francisco: Harper, 1999.

Church of Moshoeshoe (Lesotho)

The Moshoeshoe Berean Bible Readers' Church, commonly shortened to Kerekeng ea Moshoeshoe, or the Church of Moshoeshoe, is named after King Moshoeshoe (1786–1870), the highly revered first chief of the Lesotho nation. King Moshoeshoe was to the peoples and history of the region what Moses was to the Israelites in pre-Davidic times. The Church of Moshoeshoe was founded by a man from the Berea District named Walter Matitta (1885–1935). It is not clear whether Matitta, born Matitta Phakoa, was raised as a Methodist or as a "heathen." At approximately the age of twenty-five, he began to experience powerful visions. One vision in particular, in which Matitta "died" and went to heaven where he witnessed God and Satan arguing over to whom Matitta belonged, seems to have been formative in his decision to become an evangelist under the PARIS MISSION (PEMS). In 1922 Matitta formed the Moshoeshoe Berean Bible Readers' Church in response to the more charismatic style of worship that his followers preferred and in response to the theological discrepancies he discovered between what he read in the Bible and what the missionaries had been teaching.

Although the Bible appears in a place of prominence in the church's title, and although it is read or recited with ritualistic prominence in worship services, members of the Church of Moshoeshoe do not appear to be more biblically literate than the average member of an African Initiated Church (AIC). Due to a lack of historical perspective, the Gospel story, that is, the particular story of Jesus Christ, is to a great extent lost within the larger biblical story. Heavy emphasis is placed on the role of law, especially on the laws from the Old Testament. The Ten Commandments, which are seen to be consistent with the traditional African worldview and its emphasis on social order, are read at each worship service. The trinitarian formula may be readily affirmed by members of the Church of Moshoeshoe, but in reality the church functions with a binitarian understanding, relating primarily to God and the Holy Spirit. Members are generally unclear about the incarnation and are not concerned with having a personal relationship with Jesus Christ. However, unlike many AICs in Botswana, the Church of Moshoeshoe strongly discourages the practice of performing animal sacrifices, believing that Jesus's death negates the need to perform sacrifices today. Attraction to the Church of Moshoeshoe can be attributed largely to its healing ministry, thanks to which it draws members from mission churches and traditional religions alike. The church acknowledges the traditional African understanding of spiritual causation, recognizing fears of defilement associated with contacting certain objects and the fear of sorcery, and responding with methods of purification and protection.

In 1982 the membership of the Church of Moshoeshoe in Lesotho was estimated to be 2,200, with 5,500 affiliates, in fifteen congregations. There have been at least five major schisms in the church. The Church of Moshoeshoe has spread to the Orange Free State of the Republic of South Africa, with eight pastors in ten congregations in 1982. Membership in the church is primarily made up of the Sotho people, with a few Zulu and Pedi congregations as well. An interdenominational and international body known as the Mokhatto oa Banazari was established to encourage Bible study, memorization of Bible passages, prayer, and healing in AICs in Lesotho, Orange Free State, and the Transvaal. This body, however, operates predominantly within the Church of Moshoeshoe. The Church of Moshoeshoe also has had connections with the SPIRITUAL HEALING CHURCH OF BOTSWANA since the prophet Harry Morolong visited Matsiloje, Botswana, in 1923. Matitta is still considered a great prophet in the Spiritual Healing Church today.

Andy Brubacher Kaether

Sources:

- Haliburton, Gordon Mackay. "Walter Matitta and Josiel Lefela: A Prophet and a Politician in Lesotho." Journal of Religion in Africa 7 (1975): 111–131.
- Nussbaum, Stan. Toward Theological Dialogue with Independent Churches: A Study of Five Congregations in Lesotho. Ph.D. dissertation, University of South Africa, 1985.

Church of North India

The Church of North India, formed in 1970, was the product of more than four decades of merger negotiations among various churches that had grown out of nineteenth-century Protestant Christian missions. The CHURCH OF ENGLAND entered India through the CHURCH MISSIONARY SOCIETY in 1813 and within a few decades had thriving work in such places as Benares, Lucknow, Meerut, and Allahabad. Its work was supplemented by the efforts of the SOCIETY FOR THE PROPAGATION OF THE GOSPEL IN FOREIGN PARTS. British Methodists entered in 1819, after beginning work in Sri Lanka prior to their being allowed into India proper. Although their work was concentrated in the south, it eventually moved into Bengal, Benares, and Lucknow.

The Baptists initiated their world missionary enterprise in India with the formation of the Baptist Missionary Society in London in 1792. William Carey (1761–1834) and John Thompson landed in Bengal the next year and established their headquarters at Serampore. The work expanded greatly in the 1820s, after a college to train Indian national leadership had been established in 1818. One of the larger bodies to grow out of the original mission was the Council of Baptist Churches in North India.

The AMERICAN BOARD OF COMMISSIONERS FOR FOREIGN MISSIONS (supported by American Congregationalists) sent missionaries to Sri Lanka in 1818. The first to transfer to India was Dr. John Scudder (1793–1855), who arrived in Madura in 1835. From there, the work spread across India to include a variety of educational and social service institutions, the most notable in the north being a medical college at Ludhiana. Ludhiana had been the site of the original mission station established by the Presbyterians from the United States in 1834. Subsequent stations were opened in Allahabad (1836), Mussoorie (1847), Lucknow (1870), and Vengurla (1900). In 1924, the Presbyterian and Congregational missions merged their efforts and formed the United Church of North India.

The Moravians did not intend to initiate work in India, but the Moravian German office directed missionaries to Western Tibet in the 1850s. However, because of the problems involved in entering Tibet, they made Kyelang, India, their original headquarters, and worked among the Tibetan-speaking residents on the Indian side of the border. Work continued among the Ladakh people in the area of the China-Tibet border, though few converts were made. World War I proved a crisis for the German missionaries, and after the war steps were made to develop indigenous leadership. In 1953, the congregation at Leh, the capital of Ladakh, affiliated with the United Church of North India.

Wilbur Stover (1866–1930), Mary Stover (1871–1960), and Bertha Ryan (1871–1953) launched the CHURCH OF THE BRETHREN mission at Bulsar in 1895. Their work was quickly supplemented with additional personnel, who expanded the number of stations throughout the Gujarati-speaking region in northwest India. Early in the twentieth century, a number of stations were created in the Marathi-speaking area along the coast north of Bombay. Eventually some twenty-five congregations and twenty evangelistic stations were organized.

The CHRISTIAN CHURCH (DISCIPLES OF CHRIST) began its work in India at Harda (northeast of Bombay) in 1882. From the initial station, missionaries established additional centers of activity across a vast area in the central part of the country.

As in South India, negotiations looking to a union of Protestant and Free Church missions in North India began early in the twentieth century. They were spurred by the formation of the CHURCH OF SOUTH INDIA, but had additional theological and organizational problems to surmount. Finally, in 1970, the Plan of Union was completed and approved by six bodies—the Council of Baptist Churches in North India, the Church of the Brethren, the Disciples of Christ, the Methodist Church, the United Church of Northern India, and the Church of India, Pakistan, Burma, and Ceylon. The latter body, a very large multinational Anglican body, was while pursuing merger in India also dividing along national lines. The merger that produced the CHURCH OF PAKISTAN occurred almost simultaneously with the formation of the Church of North India. The Anglican CHURCH OF THE PROVINCE OF MYANMAR and what is now the CHURCH OF SRI LANKA were also established in 1970.

The new church adopted an episcopal polity, and in 1988 it was accepted as a full member of the worldwide ANGLICAN COMMUNION. The church also retains membership in the WORLD METHODIST COUNCIL and the WORLD ALLIANCE OF REFORMED CHURCHES and cooperates with the Council on World Ministries, reflecting the continued recognition of its Methodist, Congregational, and Presbyterian heritage. The church developed its own ecumenical statement of faith, which was included in the Basis of Union document promulgated in 1970. Its commitment to ecumenicity led it in 1978 into full communion with the Church of South India and the MAR THOMA SYRIAN CHURCH OF MALABAR. The three churches accept the validity of each other's sacraments and ministerial credentials.

As the new century begins, the Church of North India reports 1.25 million members. Churches are organized into twenty-six dioceses. The General Synod, the highest legislative body, meets every three years.

Address:

Church of North India
P.O. Box 311
CNI Bhavan
16 Pandit Pant Marg
New Delhi 110 001
India
<http://www.cnisynod.org>

Sources:

- Marshall, W. J. A. United Church: Faith and Order in the North India/Pakistan Unity Plan: A Theological Assessment. New Delhi: I.S.P.C.K., 1987.
- Neill, Stephen C. A History of Christianity in India. 2 vols. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1984–1985.
- Webster, J. C. B. The Christian Community and Change in Nineteenth Century North India. Delhi: Macmillan, 1976.

Church of Norway

The life of the Church of Norway, the state church of the country, was shaped by two important events, the coming of Christianity to the northernmost reaches of Scandinavia and the Protestant Reformation of the sixteenth century. Christianity came to Norway from England, where Viking raiders had established a foothold in the tenth century. Christian missionaries had slow success at first, but King Olaf Haraldsson (d. 1030) accepted the faith for his people early in the next century. He was later canonized as the country's first saint and spiritual patron. Olaf's successors served as heads of the Norwegian Church and along with his nobles, who built and kept up most of the church buildings, largely controlled its development.

In 1104, Denmark incorporated the Church of Norway into the province of Lund (Sweden). Finally in 1152, however, the Diocese of Nidaros (now Trondheim, Norway's major seaport), whose bishop was responsible directly to Rome, was erected. The diocese included Greenland, the Faeroes, and Iceland. Norway was still under Danish control when, early in the sixteenth century, the Reformation, in the form of LUTHERANISM, spread northward. In 1537, the Danish government passed the Danish Church Ordinance making the EVANGELICAL LUTHERAN CHURCH IN DENMARK official. The Norwegian diets meeting in Oslo and Bergen accepted the ordinance two years later. That action effectively ended the ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH's control of Scandinavia.

The Catholic bishops of the Church of Norway were replaced by superintendents. They later assumed the title of bishop, but they had lost any claim to apostolic succession. Danish hymnals and Bibles were in common use, and Danish was the language of worship and instruction in the faith. The integration of the new faith into the hearts of the people, however, is credited to the Pietist movement of the eighteenth century, expressed in Norway in the popular explanation of Luther's Small Catechism written by Erik Pontoppidan, as well as in the ministry of popular evangelist Hans Nielsen Hauge (1771–1824).

The nineteenth century launched a period of struggle for Norway's independence, the major steps being the ceding of Norway to Sweden by Denmark in 1814 and the establishment of a constitutional monarchy under Haakon VII (1872–1957, r. 1905–1957). At that time, the parliament and the king were assigned a number of powers in the administration of church affairs. Two years after the Swedes took control, the Norwegian Bible Society was created, and work began on a Norwegian Bible. The Old Testament appeared in 1891 and the New Testament in 1904.

The Church of Norway extended its influence internationally through a set of missionary organizations, many lay-inspired, that began to form in the 1840s. The Norwegian Missionary Society, formed in 1842, launched the church's cooperation with the worldwide spread of Protestantism. The first missionaries were sent to South Africa, and work later expanded to Madagascar, Cameroon, and Ethiopia. A secondary emphasis on the Orient led Norwegians to China, Taiwan, and Hong Kong. As late as the 1970s, new work was launched in Thailand and Brazil. Early interest in the Jews also led to the founding of the Norwegian Mission to Israel (1844), now known as the Norwegian Church Ministry to Israel. Christian Hebrew congregations were formed in Hungary and Romania, which later moved to Palestine/Israel. The Norwegian Seaman's Mission created chapels in ports around the world frequented by Norwegian sailors. The Norwegian Santal Mission launched work in India in 1867, which led to the formation of a Lutheran presence that still remains in Bengal and Bangladesh. The Norwegian Lutheran Mission (founded 1891) began work in China, Ethiopia, Tanzania, Japan, and Hong Kong. Work in China was extended through the Christian Mission to Buddhists founded in 1922. Most recently, the Norwegian Christian Mission to Muslims, founded in 1940, began work in India, Pakistan, and Indonesia.

Today, the Church of Norway is divided into a set of dioceses, each led by a bishop and a diocesan council. The bishops form the bishops' conference, led by the church's primate, the bishop of Oslo. There is also a national church council. In 1984, parliament established a national church synod, and the church council now serves as the synod's executive body. Pastors are trained at the Free Theological Faculty and at the University of Norway. Most missionaries are trained at the School of Mission and Theology at Stavanger. Through its Council on Foreign Relations, the church is related to the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES, the LUTHERAN WORLD FEDERATION, and other ecumenical structures.

At the end of the 1990s, the church claimed a membership in excess of 3,800,000, the great majority of Norway's citizens. Although more than 90 percent of the population are baptized members, ongoing support, as indicated by church attendance, is much lower. The church remains in a cooperative relationship with the state and is supported with public funds. The church is an inclusive body, accommodating both liberal Protestant theologians and conservative Pietist lay organizations.

Address:

Church of Norway
P.O. Box 5913
Majorstua
0308 Oslo
Norway
<http://www.kirken.no/> (in Norwegian)
<http://www.kirken.no/engelsk/engelsk.html> (in English)

Sources:

- Bachmann, E. Theodore, and Mercia Brenne Bachmann. Lutheran Churches in the World: A Handbook. Minneapolis, MN: Augsburg Press, 1989.
- Wilson, T. B. History of Church and State in Norway from the Tenth to the Sixteenth Century. Westminster, London: A. Constable, 1903.

Church of Pakistan

The Church of Pakistan was formed in 1970 by the merger of mission churches previously initiated by the Presbyterians, Anglicans, Lutherans, and Methodists.

Protestant Christian missionaries had pushed into what is now Pakistan in the 1830s from the Punjab. The first appears to have been John C. Lowrie (1808–1900), who moved to Lahore in 1834, though he soon had to retire. Then in 1849 Charles W. Forman opened the first permanent missionary station and went on to develop the impressive educational program that led to the founding of a string of elementary and secondary schools, several colleges, and a seminary. Forman led in the founding of the Lahore Church Council. In 1904 the Lahore Church Council joined the United Church of Northern India (a union of Congregational and Presbyterian missions that later became part of the CHURCH OF NORTH INDIA).

A second missionary thrust began in the Sialkot in 1855 under Andrew Gordon (1828–1887). This work grew to become the Presbytery of Sialkot, organized in 1859. In 1893, the presbytery was incorporated as one presbytery in the Synod of the Punjab, affiliated with the United Presbyterian Church in the U.S.A. (now a part of the PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH [U.S.A.]). That synod became independent in 1961 as the United Presbyterian Church of Pakistan.

A third Presbyterian effort began in 1856, when missionaries of the CHURCH OF SCOTLAND settled in. In 1953, the Sialkot Presbytery was eventually incorporated into the United Presbyterian Church of North India and Pakistan.

The CHURCH OF ENGLAND initiated work through the CHURCH MISSIONARY SOCIETY, which opened its initial station at Karachi in 1850. The initial Diocese of Lahore was erected in 1877. The Anglicans in New Zealand and Australia added their strength to the missionary effort. Those Anglicans leading the work in Pakistan became known as among the most conservative in the world Anglican community.

METHODISM began in Karachi in 1874 among British troops stationed in the city who responded to the preaching of lay evangelist William Taylor (1821–1902). Daniel O. Fox (1835–1909) arrived as a missionary from the Methodist Episcopal Church and secured Taylor's initial works and before the year was out had built the first church. He also soon attracted a following among the Pakistanis. The work was attached to the center in Bombay. The work grew slowly until the first mass conversion of Hindus into the church. The work was organized into the Indus River Conference in 1988.

Methodist work was shattered by the partition of India that set up the nation of Pakistan. Most of the leadership of the Indus River Conference chose to remain in India, and the Pakistan work had to quickly rebuild. Work centered in Karachi and Lahore and along the railroad line that connected them. In 1956, a second conference, the Karachi Provisional Annual Conference, was established, and in 1960 the two conferences were tied together through the Central Provisional Conference of the Methodist Church in Pakistan. Meanwhile in the United States, in 1968, Methodists took a further step toward union with the creation of the UNITED METHODIST CHURCH. That church's General Conference passed legislation allowing Pakistani Methodists to enter the Church of Pakistan merger.

In 1903, Maria Hoist, a Lutheran physician serving with the Danish Pathan Mission, began working among the females of the Pathan people around Peshawar. From her initial work, an indigenous movement among the Pathan people (formerly Muslim) developed. The first Pathan minister was ordained as a Lutheran minister in 1937. The Norwegians added their assistance in 1940. The World Mission and Prayer League, an interdenominational society composed mostly of American Lutherans of Scandinavian descent, also started work. In 1955, the Lutherans formed the Pakistani Lutheran Church and elected pioneer missionary Jan Christensen as their first bishop.

In 1970, the Pakistani members of the Anglican, Methodist, and Lutheran churches and the United Presbyterian Church of North India and Pakistan joined in creating the Church of Pakistan. (The Presbyterians associated with the Lahore Church Council and the United Presbyterian Church of Pakistan did not join in the merger. These two bodies later merged in 1993 to form the PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH OF PAKISTAN.) By this time the Anglican work had been organized in what was known as the Church of India, Pakistan, Burma, and Ceylon. That same year, the remaining work in India was incorporated into the Church of North India. Like the other united churches carved out on the Indian subcontinent, the Church of Pakistan accepted an episcopal polity as the Anglicans had demanded. It originally had four dioceses. There are now eight.

In the late 1990s, the church reported 1,500,000 members. It is a member of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES, the WORLD METHODIST COUNCIL, the WORLD ALLIANCE OF REFORMED CHURCHES, and the ANGLICAN COMMUNION.

Address:

Church of Pakistan
17 Warns Rd.
P.O. Box 2319
Lahore 3
Pakistan

Sources:

- Kane, J. Herbert. A Global View of Christian Missions. Grand Rapids, MI: Baker Book House, 1971.
- Van der Bent, Ans J., ed. Handbook/Member Churches/World Council of Churches. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 1985.
- Wingate, Andrew, et al., eds. Anglicanism: A Global Communion. London: Mowbray, 1998.

Church of Pentecost

A Pentecostal church, initiated by James McKeown (1900–1989), a British Pentecostal missionary from the APOSTOLIC CHURCH who went to the Gold Coast (now Ghana) in 1937 after being invited by an African preacher, Peter Anim (1890–1978). Anim had been associated with the Faith Tabernacle, a non-Pentecostal healing church based in the United States. He left the Apostolic Church in 1939 because of McKeown's use of medicines (instead of relying on God for healing), and established the CHRIST APOSTOLIC CHURCH in Ghana, in association with the Nigerian church of the same name. McKeown continued as a missionary with the Apostolic Church until 1953, when he was dismissed for refusing to abide by the church's constitution. With the support of most of the African preachers, McKeown seceded and established the Gold Coast Apostolic Church that year, to be renamed the Ghana Apostolic Church after independence in 1957. A dispute with the Apostolic Church over the name led, with President Nkrumah's intervention, to the church being renamed the Church of Pentecost in 1962.

The church grew rapidly, through both the efficient administration of the church and the work of Ghanaian pastors and evangelists. Through the mediation of McKeown, it formed a cooperative agreement with the British ELIM PENTECOSTAL CHURCH, an agreement that continues today. McKeown continued to lead the church until 1982, when, in his eighties, he retired in favor of F. S. Safo, a Ghanaian. McKeown was an unusual figure: a European missionary working for three decades for an African church.

Membership in 2000 was estimated at over 700,000, which makes this possibly the largest church in Ghana. Because of its long association with British Pentecostals, the church may be considered a classical Pentecostal church in theological orientation, but it has nevertheless become an African church with its own distinctive features. Branches of the church are now found in many other parts of West Africa, as well as in Europe and North America, where the members are mainly Ghanaian migrants.

Address:

Church of Pentecost
P.O. Box 2194
Accra
Ghana

Allan H. Anderson

Sources:

- Leonard, Christine. A Giant in Ghana. London: Alpha Typesetting, 1989.
- Ter Haar, Gerrie. "Standing Up for Jesus: A Survey of New Developments in Christianity in Ghana." Exchange 23, 3 (1994): 221–240.
- Wyllie, Robert W. "Pioneers of Ghanaian Pentecostalism: Peter Anim and James McKeown." Journal of Religion in Africa 6, 2 (1974): 109–122.

Church of Satan

The Church of Satan was largely responsible for the development of modern SATANISM in the 1960s. Its founder,

Anton Szandor LaVey (1930–1997), gladly told the media flamboyant details about his life, all of which went unchallenged until the 1990s, when New Yorker investigative journalist Larry Wright proved that most of the claims were totally false. LaVey's real name was Howard Stanton Levey. There is no evidence, contrary to what he later claimed, that he was born with a tail, and had traveled extensively throughout Europe as a teenager. According to Wright, stories told by LaVey about having been a lion-tamer in a circus, a photographer for the San Francisco Police Department, and the lover (if only for a short time) of Marilyn Monroe (1926–1962), as well as the official organist for the city of San Francisco, are all apocryphal tales. It is true that in the 1950s he did play the organ for a living in San Francisco nightclubs and carnivals, as well as for occasional city events, and had made enough money by 1956 to be able to buy the later famous (or infamous) "Black House" at 6114 California Street in the same city. In 1960, he divorced his first wife, Carole Lansing, and took seventeen-year-old Diane Hegarty as his live-in girlfriend (the union lasted until 1984).

In 1951, LaVey became interested in the ideas of Aleister Crowley (1875–1947), and joined a Berkeley group of the Ordo Templi Orientis (OTO) connected to the Pasadena Agapé Lodge established by Wilfred Talbot Smith (1885–1957) and Jack Parsons (1914–1952). In subsequent years, LaVey became somewhat disillusioned with Crowley and the OTO, although it was this milieu that brought him into contact with Hollywood underground director Kenneth Anger (pseudonym of Kenneth William Anglemeyer, b. 1927). In 1961, LaVey and Anger founded an organization known as the Magic Circle, which gradually evolved into the Church of Satan, formally established on April 30, 1966.

In the tolerant 1960s, Satanism became somewhat fashionable in California (one of LaVey's early converts was actress Jayne Mansfield, 1933–1967), and he received surprisingly sympathetic treatment from the local media. LaVey was even hired as a consultant for Roman Polanski's 1968 movie Rosemary's Baby, based on Ira Levin's novel, which added to his fame. In fact, as clarified by the publication of LaVey's The Satanic Bible in 1969, the Church of Satan did not promote evil, nor did it literally believe in the existence of the Devil. It was more an idiosyncratic and militantly anti-Christian human potential movement, devoted to the exaltation of human beings, who, having been freed from religious superstitions and the false Christian notion of sin, would eventually become empowered to be happy, enjoy life, and flourish. LaVey was deeply influenced by procapitalist writer Ayn Rand (pseudonym of Alice Rosenbaum, 1905–1982), and (largely based on her writings) concluded that selfishness, rather than altruism, is at the root of both personal and social happiness. LaVey's rituals honored Satan in a purely symbolic way, although The Satanic Ritu- als published in paperback form in 1972 underwent considerable editing, whereby certain references to practices of sexual magic in the Crowley tradition (included in the confidential private versions) were omitted.

In 1968, LaVey met Michael Aquino, an officer and intelligence specialist in the U.S. Army with an academic education. Aquino gradually became the main organizer of the Church of Satan, which he structured into local chapters known as grottos, thus recruiting some two or three hundred active participants (with many more limiting their activity to the payment of a yearly membership fee and to receiving information by mail). During the early 1970s, however, a conflict developed between LaVey and Aquino. Ideologically, Aquino believed in the real, physical existence of a character known as Set, or Satan, an entity also believed to communicate in mystical ways with selected devotees, and he became increasingly disillusioned with LaVey's "rationalist" Satanism. Organizationally, Aquino was a firm believer in the system of the grottos, while LaVey was not particularly interested in running a church-like organization, even less so after some local grotto leaders found themselves in trouble with law enforcement agencies for a number of offenses. In 1975, Aquino and several important grotto leaders left LaVey, and went their separate way into the newly established Temple of Set (P.O. Box 470307, San Francisco, CA 94147; Web site: <http://www.xeper.org>). With its "occult" Satanism, the temple may be the largest international Satanist organization still active today.

Despite Aquino's grim prophecies, however, the Church of Satan did not disintegrate. Although it is true that it remained a largely mail order organization for several years, the disappearance of local chapters actually helped LaVey to keep a low profile, as the media began to take a less tolerant attitude toward Satanism in the aftermath of the Charles Manson trial (1971) and with the increased activities both of a Christian countercult movement, and of secular anticult organizations. In the 1980s, when anti-Satanism became somewhat disreputable because of its tall tales and gross exaggerations, LaVey was able to stage a comeback. Crucial in this revival was Blanche Barton, who had become LaVey's new companion after he left Diane in 1984. LaVey's daughters, Karla (b. 1952) and Zeena (b. 1964), although very different in character, also cooperated in reestablishing the Church of Satan as a national presence in the 1980s. In 1990, however, Zeena publicly denounced both the Church of Satan and what she called her "un-father"; after several short-lived occult ventures with her husband, Nikolas Schreck, she eventually joined Aquino's Temple of Set and became one of its high priestesses.

In the same year, 1990, LaVey suffered a heart attack, which very much reduced his activities. Once again, it seemed that the Church of Satan was about to collapse. It was kept alive, albeit with difficulty, by Blanche Barton and by one of LaVey's closest disciples, Peter Gilmore. It is currently a largely mail order organization, but ritual activities are going on in a limited number of U.S. cities, where a grotto system has been put into operation once again. It maintains a Web site at the address given below. The Web site <http://www.churchofsatan.org>, on the other hand, does not belong to LaVey's original organization, but to a splinter group, known as the First Church of Satan, led by Daemon Egan (pseudonym of John Dewey Allee) and headquartered at PMB 172, 203 Washington St., Salem, MA 01970. Critics have described the First Church of Satan as a commercial organization, mostly engaged in selling Satanic paraphernalia via the Internet, although Egan maintains that he is keeping LaVey's original spirit alive.

Karla LaVey originally cooperated with Blanche Barton, but eventually they parted company, based inter alia on a legal dispute about LaVey's inheritance, and in 1999 Karla established her own First Satanic Church (P.O. Box 475177, San Francisco, CA 94147; Web site: <http://www.satanic-church.com>). The dispute over the inheritance also involved Zeena, and Barton represented (in addition to herself) her son, Xerxes LaVey, born in 1993, who, according to his father, would one day inherit his Satanic leadership mantle; it was later settled. In addition to the Church of Satan, the Temple of Set, the First Church of Satan, and the First Satanic Church, several dozen minor splinter or independent Satanist groups, all tracing their origins to the original 1966 foundation event, still operate throughout the world. Most of these organizations are quite small, however, and the current combined active membership of all branches probably reaches no more than one thousand, even though many more nonactive members have joined by mail (or, most recently, by completing a form on the Internet), and thus remain on the mailing lists of the various groups.

Address:

Church of Satan
P.O. Box 499
Radio City Station
New York, NY 10101-0499
<http://www.churchofsatan.com>

Massimo Introvigne

Sources:

- Aquino, Michael A. The Church of Satan. Los Angeles: self-published, 1989.
- Barton, Blanche. The Church of Satan. New York: Hell's Kitchen Production, 1990.
- . The Secret Life of a Satanist: The Authorized Biography of Anton LaVey. Los Angeles: Feral House, 1990.
- Introvigne, Massimo. Enquête sur le Satanisme. Satanistes et antisatanistes du 17e siècle à nos jours. Updated ed. Paris: Dervy, 1997.

LaVey, Anton Szandor. Satan Speaks! Venice, CA: Feral House, 1998.

———. The Satanic Bible. New York: Avon Books, 1969.

———. The Satanic Rituals. New York: Avon Books, 1972.

Church of Scientology

Scientology is a religious and therapeutic system of ideas and ritual practices developed, starting in the early 1950s, by American writer, adventurer, and philosopher L. Ron Hubbard (1911–1986). The first church was founded in Los Angeles, California, in 1954. At the beginning of the new century Scientology is represented on all continents, in 145 countries. The church estimates that 8 million people worldwide are, in some way, using Hubbard's life-improvement techniques, but not all of these people are devoted members. Most of them are buying books and taking courses in the church facilities on a regular basis without considering themselves devotees.

Scientology was reorganized in the beginning of the 1980s, and today the organizational structure is divided into two major units. The first is the Church of Scientology International, founded in 1991, with its headquarters in Los Angeles. This unit oversees public relations, legal affairs, organizational expansion, and other practical affairs. The second unit, Religious Technology Center, appeared in 1982. This unit owns all trademarks and service marks of the religion and controls the licensing of these items worldwide. Together these two units control all Scientological activities, from field activities to missions and churches and advanced churches, in order to secure what are considered the unique teachings of Hubbard.

In the 1960s a religious order of dedicated Scientologists, the Sea Organization, was founded, and in the 1980s its members assumed control of the church internationally. All executives and most of the staff of the Church of Scientology International, the Religious Technology Center, and those facilities that deliver the more advanced training for Scientology leaders and facilitate access to what are considered the higher levels of Scientology teachings are Sea Organization members. Members of the Sea Organization take vows of commitment to the faith similar to those expected of members of ordered communities in other religions.

During the late 1930s and 1940s Hubbard developed his do-it-yourself therapy, Dianetics, according to which every human being is suffering from severe mental and psychosomatic traumas because of the functions of what Hubbard calls the reactive mind. In the memory bank of this mind are stored the engrams, that is, all the pieces of a person's memory involving mental or physical pain. In the book Dianetics: The Modern Science of Mental Health, published in May 1950, and still figuring on bestseller lists, Hubbard presented his ideas on how one can eliminate the engrams through dianetic therapy, called auditing.

Founder of the Church of Scientology, L. Ron Hubbard, December 22, 1952 (Bettmann/CORBIS)

From 1951 Hubbard carried his ideas further and began the transformation of the therapy to a fully developed religious soteriological system by including metaphysical ideas and axioms about the individual and the universe in his representations. In 1954 Hubbard announced the full transformation into a religion. The new religion got the name Scientology (from Latin scio, to know, and from Greek logos, word or thought), knowing about knowing.

The basic idea in Scientology is the idea that the human being, a composite of body, mind, and spirit, is a spiritual, individual being (called a Thetan). Each individual, or Thetan, has existed through an endless number of incarnations on this and other planets through hundreds of millions of years. Scientology's mythological texts tell, for instance, how the Thetans in a remote past made the mistake of identifying themselves with a physical universe and physical bodies and how the different states of existence and mytho-evolutionary history have influences on the present condition of the individual. For each incarnation, the Thetan is suffering a series of karmic experiences hidden on what is called the timetrack. Through the ritual practices of Scientology one can get insight into these matters, confront one's mythological past on one's individual timetrack, and thereby improve one's happiness, relationships, and general well-being, as well as find one's individual path to ultimate truth.

Scientology, inspired by, to name a few, Buddhism, Hinduism, Western Esotericism, science fiction, and psychotherapy, offers an individual salvation to its practitioners through a number of ideas and related practices by means of which individuals can recognize and change various existential conditions of their lives. The salvational path to ultimate spiritual salvation, called the Bridge to Total Freedom, represents an extensive soteriological hierarchy of ritual steps to which each individual is gradually initiated in a codified prescribed sequence. Through these initiations one can move oneself into higher and higher states of awareness and orders of existence, toward an ultimate recognition of oneself as a spiritual being and of the universe.

As the new century begins, Scientology is probably the new religion most exposed to the controversy among anti-cultists and most discussed in the media in the Western world. The organization has been accused of controlling its parishioners, financially and mentally, as well as of having an opaque organizational structure and using shady financial transactions between the different organizational units. These accusations prompted a prolonged and thorough examination of the church's financial and organizational practices in the United States by the Internal Revenue Service (IRS). When that examination was completed, in the mid-1990s, the IRS concluded that Scientology is, as it claims, a religion that works for charitable purposes, that the income is used for these purposes, and that the organization does not operate in order to damage public policy or society. Although the conclusion reached by the IRS was clear, it does not seem to have influenced the church's reputation in many countries of Europe. In most European countries Scientology is not recognized as a religion, although the church continuously strives to win recognition, and has done so in such places as Italy, Sweden, and South Africa. In several countries, among them France, Germany, and Russia, not only the organization but individual Scientologists are exposed to different kinds of more or less sophisticated restrictions and discrimination.

The Church of Scientology International supports the official Internet site given below, and there are numerous additional sites concerning the church sponsored by the church, its members, and its critics. Congregations and missions of the church are now located in more than 120 countries.

Address:

Church of Scientology International
6331 Hollywood Blvd., Ste. 1200
Los Angeles, CA 90028-6329
<http://www.scientology.org/home.html>

Dorthe Refslund Christensen

Sources:

- Christensen, Dorthe Refslund. Rethinking Scientology: Cognition and Representation in Religion, Therapy and Soteriology. Forthcoming, 2002.
- . Scientology: Fra Terapi til Religion. Copenhagen: Gyldendal, 1997.
- Church of Scientology International. The Scientology Handbook. Los Angeles: Bridge Publications, 1994.
- . What is Scientology? Los Angeles: Bridge Publications, 1992.
- Hubbard, L. Ron. Dianetics: The Modern Science of Mental Health. Copenhagen: New Era Publications International, 1950, 1989.
- . Science of Survival: Prediction of Human Behaviour. Copenhagen: New Era Publications International, 1951, 1989.
- . Scientology: A History of Man. Copenhagen: New Era Publications International, 1952, 1989.
- . Scientology: The Fundamentals of Thought. Copenhagen: New Era Publications International, 1956, 1989.
- Melton, Gordon. The Church of Scientology. Salt Lake City, UT: Signature Books, 2000.
- Wallis, Roy. The Road to Total Freedom. London: Heinemann Educational Books, 1976.

Church of Scotland

The Church of Scotland traces its heritage back to the initial evangelization of Scotland by the Celtic church and through its pre-Reformation history, but dates its present form from the Scottish Reformation of 1560. John Knox (c. 1514–1572), a disciple of John Calvin (1509–1564) and Theodore Beza (1519–1605), led the initial Reformation in the face of opposition from the Queen Regent of Scotland, Mary of Guise, and subsequently from Mary Queen of Scots (1542–1587), who was a passionate defender of the ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH. Over the course of a further generation, the recognizably presbyterian form of church government was developed, particularly by the church leaders who gathered around Andrew Melville (1545–1622). The principal accommodation of church and state was made in 1592, which may conveniently be regarded as the point at which the Protestant system of the Church of Scotland was established.

The seventeenth century was characterized in Scottish history as the era of tension between the emergent presbyterian church and the episcopal polity (like that of the CHURCH OF ENGLAND) preferred by the Scottish king, James VI (later James I as king of both Scotland and England), and by his immediate successors, the Stuart kings of Scotland and England. The Wars of the Covenant of the 1640s and 1650s can be regarded as both a struggle over church government and a conflict for sovereignty between church and crown. With the Restoration of 1690, the struggle resolved in favor of Presbyterianism in Scotland.

The eighteenth and nineteenth centuries witnessed a modified version of the conflict, in the disputes over the system of patronage that allowed secular authorities, especially major landowners, to appoint parish ministers. At the peaks of this argument three significant ruptures took place: The two lesser ones are called the First and Second Secessions of the Eighteenth Century, and the most celebrated is known as the Disruption of 1843, when about one third of the church's congregations removed themselves from the Establishment. Most of the secessionists returned through a process of reunion that culminated in the Union of 1929, which created the modern Church of Scotland. Though no longer established in a legal sense, the church retains a carefully defined relationship with the state, being simultaneously national and free, with responsibilities to the whole nation but with an independent spiritual jurisdiction under church law.

Church government is by a conciliar hierarchy of three courts: The Kirk Session is the body of ruling elders in the local congregation; the Presbytery is the local grouping of congregations and consists of equal numbers of ministers and elders, plus members of the diaconal ministry; the General Assembly is the annual national meeting, again made up of equal numbers of ministers and elders, and including deacons. Each court fulfils primary functions, and the superior courts exercise both judicial and appellate functions. As oversight (a translation of the Greek episkopé) is exercised by courts, not individuals, there is no great emphasis on a leading figure; the strength of the system lies rather in ordered government, largely through the committees and agencies of the courts of the church.

The principal doctrinal standard of the Church of Scotland is the scriptures of the Old and New Testaments, not including the Apocrypha, and the subordinate standard is the Westminster Confession of Faith (1647), subject to a degree of liberty of interpretation. Worship follows the REFORMED/PRESBYTERIAN TRADITION, with a variety of styles, each reflecting the theological opinions, attitude toward progressive development, and preferences of the local minister.

The influence of the Church of Scotland is recognized in the many denominations that now constitute the WORLD ALLIANCE OF REFORMED CHURCHES, where the founding initiative is often traced to Scottish missions during the British colonial era. Therefore ties are particularly strong with churches in Commonwealth countries, though the Church of Scotland has a presence at the congregational level in about fifteen countries, mainly in continental Europe and Israel. The church's commitment to ecumenical dialogue and cooperation is demonstrated in its membership in the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES, the Council of Churches in Britain and Ireland, and the Scottish Churches Council.

In 1988 the church reported approximately 660,000 adult communicant members. The inclusion of baptized persons not having proceeded to adult profession of faith would increase this number beyond one million, making the denomination the largest numerically in Scotland.

Address:

General Assembly of the Church of Scotland
121 George St.
Edinburgh EH2 4YN
Scotland
<http://www.cofs.org.uk/>

Marjory A. MacLean

Sources:

- Burleigh, J. H. S. A Church History of Scotland. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1960.
The Church of Scotland Yearbook. Edinburgh: Church of Scotland Board of Communication, issued annually.
Common Order. Edinburgh: Saint Andrew Press, 1994.
Weatherhead, James. The Constitution and Laws of the Church of Scotland. Edinburgh: Board of Practice and Procedure, 1997.

Church of South India

The Church of South India (CSI), founded in 1947 by the merger of Anglican, Methodist, Congregationalist, and Presbyterian churches operating in the southern half of the Indian subcontinent, continues the traditions of Indian Protestant missions that began early in the nineteenth century.

As the global missionary impulse grew among Protestant groups at the end of eighteenth century, India was among its early targets. As a matter of fact, India was the site of a singular effort by two Danish graduates of the University of Halle (the seat of continental Pietism) who came to India in 1706 and began a mission among the Tamil-speaking people on India's east coast. Their work was later supported by the early Anglican organizations, the SOCIETY FOR THE PROPAGATION OF THE GOSPEL IN FOREIGN PARTS and the Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge. However, a new beginning came with the arrival of Baptist minister William Carey (1761–1834) in 1795. He settled at the Danish settlement at Serampore, some fifteen miles inland from Calcutta.

The beginning of what became the Church of South India came only three years after Carey began his work, with the arrival of Nathaniel Forsyth, the first missionary sent to India by the newly formed and Congregational Church-based LONDON MISSIONARY SOCIETY (LMS). He settled in Calcutta and worked alone until the arrival of additional missionaries, who settled in Madras (1814) and Travancore (1818).

Anglicans came to India through the CHURCH MISSIONARY SOCIETY (CMS), which had earlier begun a mission in the Middle East. Abdul Masih, a convert from that mission, arrived in 1913 to begin his labors in the United Province (immediately south and west of Nepal). As with previous efforts, the CMS concentrated its initial activities in centers where Europeans had already settled—Calcutta, Travancore, Cochin, and so on. The church tried to work with the indigenous SYRIAN ORTHODOX CHURCH OF MALABAR, but they soon parted ways.

India was at this time under the control of the East India Company, which was somewhat hostile to interference in its operation from clergymen; in 1813, however, Parliament had forced the company to open the land to missionaries. The coming of the CMS and the expansion of the LMS to Madras had been based upon that decision.

The Methodists also took advantage of the change of policy. Thomas Coke (1747–1814), who had taken the lead in building Methodist support for foreign missions, had given the last of his financial resources to support a mission to India. After Parliament's action he won the support of his brethren, and in December he sailed for India with a group of missionaries. The group arrived in Sri Lanka a few months later, but unfortunately Coke died during the voyage. After METHODISM was established among the Ceylonese, one of their number, James Lynch, moved on to Madras in 1817, where he found a small group of Methodists who had been brought together by an expatriate merchant.

Missionaries from the Scottish Missionary Society (Presbyterians affiliated with the CHURCH OF SCOTLAND) arrived in 1823. They settled in Bombay. Among the prominent leaders was Alexander Duff (1806–1878), who developed an outreach program to the upper classes of Indian society. Although he made few converts, through the schools he founded he was able to bring Western education to Maharashtra and influence a generation of Indian leadership.

In 1833, the East India Company opened its territory to non-British missionaries. American Presbyterians and Congregationalists were the first to take advantage of the new opportunity. Missionaries supported by the AMERICAN BOARD OF COMMISSIONERS FOR FOREIGN MISSIONS had opened work in Sri Lanka in 1819. The leader of the work, John Scudder (1793–1855), moved on to Madura in 1835 and then on to Madras, where he opened a mission station in 1836. American Presbyterians came to India, their first foreign mission enterprise, in 1934. They settled at Ludhiana. A mission was opened in Allahabad two years later.

The British and American Congregationalist, the Scottish and American Presbyterian, and the Methodist and Anglican missions grew side by side through the nineteenth century. Each began work among expatriates, but soon turned their eyes toward the masses of the Indian people. Occasionally, their activity was rewarded by what became known as a “mass movement,” the sudden movement of a large number of Hindus into the Christian church. It has been estimated that as much as 80 percent of the members of all the Christian churches by the end of the nineteenth century were to be accounted for by such mass movements. Many of them were large-scale defections by the members of the lower castes and the untouchables from a religion that put them in so bad a situation that they had little to lose.

The churches were also affected by negative events. The Presbyterians were particularly hurt by the Sepoy Rebellion, and many of the missionaries lost their lives, caught in the middle of an attempt to overthrow foreign rule.

At the beginning of the twentieth century, the missions moved to reduce the duplication of effort and competition among them. In 1901, the American and Scottish Presbyterian missions merged to form the South India United Church, and four years later, the British and American Congregationalists united to form the Congregational General Union of South India. These two churches united in 1924 as the United Church of South India. By this time negotiations were under way for a broader union that would include the Anglican and Methodist churches. Prominent issues to be resolved included the nature of the polity of the new church and the resolving of ministerial orders; the Anglican church differed from the others because of its belief that its bishops held special authority because they could trace their lineage back to Christ's twelve apostles, in what is known as the apostolic succession.

In the end, the Anglicans emerged as the dominant body. The Church of South India that emerged in 1947 had an episcopal polity; that is, the church was led by bishops and organized into dioceses. A means of accepting those ministers not ordained by bishops in the apostolic succession was finally agreed on, and the church emerged as a model for Christian cooperation throughout the Protestant world. The basis of the union was the Lambeth Quadrilateral, the historic statement of the bases of Anglican belief (discussed in the entry on the CHURCH OF ENGLAND), which includes acknowledgment of the ancient Christian creeds.

In 2000, the Church of South India reported 3,800,000 members in 14,000 congregations. The congregations are divided among sixteen dioceses (with one diocese reaching into Sri Lanka). The synod is the highest legislative body. It meets biennially, at which time a presiding bishop is designated. The church supports a number of educational and medical facilities, and in the 1960s initiated a vast program of rural development across India.

The church was a model for similar union attempts around the world, and it has remained a staunch supporter of the ecumenical movement. It is a member of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES, the ANGLICAN COMMUNION, the WORLD ALLIANCE OF REFORMED CHURCHES, and the WORLD METHODIST COUNCIL. Initially, many Anglicans outside of India had expressed concern over the provisions of the church's constitution, but in 1971, the Anglican Consultative Council called upon all Anglican churches worldwide to reexamine the Church of South India with a view to entering into full communion with it. In 1972, the Church of England's General Synod voted full communion. The problem for Anglicans had been the many ministers who had not been re-ordained by a bishop in the apostolic succession. That problem had been taken care of over time by the ordination of all new ministers since 1947 by the church's bishops.

A number of the CSI members have moved to the United States. At first they worshipped in Indian Orthodox parishes, but then began to form informal Protestant groups, which gradually formed into churches. In 1981, the Diocese of Kerala recognized the existence of these parishes and began to include them in their pastoral concern. In 1988, the CSI Synod placed all of the parishes of the church outside of the country directly under the presiding bishop.

Address:

Church of South India
CSI Centre
No. 5 Whites Rd.
P.O. Box 688
Royapettah, Madras 600 014
India
<http://www.csichurch.com>

Sources:

- The Church of England Yearbook.* London: Church Publishing House, published annually.
Van der Bent, Ans J., ed. Handbook/Member Churches/World Council of Churches. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 1985.
Wingate, Andrew, et al, eds. Anglicanism: A Global Communion. London: Mowbray, 1998.

Church of Sri Lanka

The Church of Sri Lanka continues the initial attempts of representatives of the Church of England to establish Anglicanism on the island of Ceylon. Several years after the Dutch ceded power over the island to the British, the CHURCH MISSIONARY SOCIETY began work in Candy (1818). Many formerly affiliated with the Dutch Reformed mission affiliated with the Anglicans. Stations were subsequently opened among the Sinhalese (who were Buddhists) at Baddegama (1819), Kotte (1822), and Kurunegala (1880), and among the Tamil (who were Hindus) at Jaffna (1818) and Colombo (1850). Education was an early and persistent concern, and the mission supported four men's colleges, two women's colleges, and two women's middle schools. A teacher training school was opened for both the Tamils and the Sinhalese.

In 1930, the work separated from the Church of England and was incorporated into the new independent Church of India, Burma and Ceylon. Then in 1947, the Anglican diocese in southern India became part of the new CHURCH OF SOUTH INDIA. Two of the Ceylonese dioceses (Colombo and Kurunegala) did not join the new united church, preferring instead to concentrate on the effort to unite with the other churches in Sri Lanka that were members of the National Christian Council (Methodists, Baptists). In 1947, the Jaffna diocese (serving Sri Lankan Tamils) did affiliate with the Church of South India.

Various conversations aimed at uniting the Church of Sri Lanka, the METHODIST CHURCH, SRI LANKA, the Baptists in Sri Lanka, and the Jaffna Diocese of the Church of South India have proceeded, but a plan for a united church acceptable to all parties has yet to mature. The continuing violence in the country has contributed to the failure of union attempts.

With slightly more than fifty thousand members, the church is second only to the ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH in the Sri Lankan Christian community. The church is a member of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES and the worldwide ANGLICAN COMMUNION.

Address:

Church of Sri Lanka
Bishop's Office
358/2 Bauddhaloka Mawatha
Colombo
Sri Lanka

Sources:

- The Church of England Yearbook*. London: Church Publishing House, published annually.
- Kane, J. Herbert. A Global View of Christian Missions. Grand Rapids, MI: Baker Book House, 1971.
- Van der Bent, Ans J., ed. Handbook/Member Churches/World Council of Churches. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 1985.

Church of Sweden

The coming of Christianity to Sweden is generally traced to the efforts of St. Ansgar (801–865), the archbishop of Hamburg (Germany), who earned the title of “Apostle to Scandinavia” for his missionary efforts. However, the traditional religion of the northern people was firmly entrenched, and it was not until two hundred years later that Christianity made real progress in gaining a foothold in the country. An early center was established at Uppsala, where the first diocese was erected and later (1477) a university opened. The church was thus still in process of establishing itself within the ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH when the Reformation swept through Germany.

Two Swedes who had studied with Martin Luther at the University of Wittenberg, Olavus (1493–1552) and Laurentius Petri (1499–1573), had the ear of King Gustavus Vasa (1496–1560), and the three took the lead in aligning Sweden behind the Reformation. Olavus Petri wrote pro-Reformation books and assumed the task of translating the Bible (1541) and Luther's Small Catechism (1537) into Swedish. Laurentius Petri became the administrative leader as archbishop of Uppsala (1531). The reorientation of the church was secured over the remaining decades of the centure. In 1593, a convocation of the church firmly established the church in the camp of LUTHERANISM. It adopted the Unaltered Augsburg Confession as its doctrinal standard and decreed that adherents to “foreign” religions were not to be tolerated in the land.

From the reign of Gustavus Adolphus (r. 1594–1632) forward, the fate of the Lutheran Church of Sweden was largely tied to that of the government, especially its spread with the establishment of the present boundaries of the country. Its exclusive rights to operate in Sweden were loosened only slightly by the introduction of an act of toleration in 1781 that granted other Christians the privilege of residing in Sweden. Toleration to Jews was granted the following year.

Secularization of the church began in the nineteenth century. In 1866, the Swedish parliament created the church's synod as a new legislative body and dropped the church's direct representation in the government. At the same time, the Church was hit with a variety of criticisms from pietist and conservative theological perspectives. Many called for a revival of personal spirituality, and others condemned the church for a departure from the faith. A number of dissident groups formally separated from the church. In response, new church leadership arose, articulating the church's position as an instrument offering Christianity to all the people of the country. Outstanding twentieth-century leaders included Einar Billing (1871–1939) and Nathan Söderblom (1866–1931).

The Church of Sweden continues to hold the allegiance of the Swedish people, and some 90 percent are members. It keeps many of the statistical records on the Swedish population (for which taxes are collected and paid to the church), and most people turn to the church for baptism, marriages, and funerals. However, the church does not attract many (less than 10 percent) to regular attendance at worship. Widespread official church membership exists side-by-side with an extreme secularization of the country.

The church has an episcopal polity, its bishops having received apostolic succession from a lineage of bishops considered to be in direct line from Christ's apostles in the sixteenth century. One bishop is chosen as the church's archbishop. The king of Sweden is considered the first member of the church, and the government confirms the appointment of bishops. In 1982, the church was given more independence to make decisions in areas of worship, doctrine, sacraments, evangelism, and world mission activities. The synod formed in the nineteenth century has evolved into the General Assembly, which meets annually. The assembly opened the ministry to ordained female clergy in 1960.

Entrance into the worldwide missionary movement was made formally in 1874 with the establishment of the Church of Sweden Mission, which focused on efforts in Africa, India, and Malaysia. The work of that mission has led to the formation of a number of now independent churches. Its work is supplemented by that of the Swedish Evangelical Mission and the Swedish Jerusalem Society. It is challenged by the Swedish Mission of Bible True Friends, a movement protesting the dominance of liberal theology in the Swedish church. The Church of Sweden also oversees a number of Swedish-speaking congregations that serve expatriates in various European countries.

At the end of the twentieth century the church reported 7,505,930 members. It is a member of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES and the LUTHERAN WORLD FEDERATION.

Address:

Church of Sweden
Sysslomansgatan 4
751 70 Uppsala
Sweden

Sources:

Murray, Robert, ed. The Church of Sweden: Past and Present. Malmö, Sweden: Allhem-Malma, 1960.
Waddams, Herbert M. The Swedish Church. London: S.P.C.K., 1946.

Church of the Augsburg Confession of Alsace and Lorraine

During the sixteenth century the Protestant Reformation dominated by LUTHERANISM based in Germany spread into adjacent French territories, even though the Reformed Church based in French-speaking Geneva gathered the bulk of the response from Protestants in France. Lutheran congregations appeared especially in the provinces of Alsace and Lorraine and the Montbéliard region further south. Persecuted throughout the century, Lutheranism experienced some reprieve following the issuance of the 1598 Edict of Nantes, which gave Protestants some degree of toleration. Nevertheless, the church continued to suffer some persecution until the French Revolution and the subsequent establishment of a set of regulations under Napoleon that provided for the existence of Protestant churches. The regulations did not, however, allow the Protestants (either Reformed or Lutheran) to develop a national synod.

In 1871, as a result of the Franco-Prussian War, Alsace and Lorraine became German territory. The Lutheran Church continued under the Napoleonic regulations and, apart from the ravages of war, survived with relative ease until the region was returned to France following World War II. There Lutherans, united by their allegiance to the sixteenth-century Augsburg Confession of Faith, were finally able to organize, but chose to remain separate from the other French Lutherans in the Reformed Church of France.

Through the last half of the twentieth century, making use of its strength in the Strasbourg area, the church has committed itself to working with Protestants in the Rhine Valley (including churches in Germany, the Netherlands, and Switzerland). It is an active member of the Conference of Churches along the Rhine and shares its headquarters building with the REFORMED CHURCH OF ALSACE AND LORRAINE, with whom it shares several centuries of history. The church is also a member of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES. It has approximately 40,000 members.

Address:

Church of the Augsburg Confession of Alsace and Lorraine
1 quai St. Thomas
67081 Strasbourg Cédex
France

Sources:

Bachmann, E. Theodore, and Mercia Brenne Bachmann. Lutheran Churches in the World: A Handbook. Minneapolis, MN: Augsburg Press, 1989.
Van der Bent, Ans J., ed. Handbook/Member Churches/World Council of Churches. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 1985.

Church of the Brethren

The Brethren Church dates to the year 1708, when a group of German Lutherans decided to separate themselves from the church. In the process of establishing the new church, they showed some influence from the Anabaptist and FREE CHURCH tradition in their practice of conducting an act of rebaptism. Their leaders had ties to the Mennonites and had read the Mennonite confessions of faith, and critics connected them immediately with their Anabaptist roots.

The Brethren found little support from the more dominant church bodies (the ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH, LUTHERANISM, and the churches in the REFORMED/PRESBYTERIAN TRADITION). As hostility turned to active persecution, they sought shelter, as had the Mennonites before them, in Holland. By 1719, the Brethren began considering immigration to the British American colonies, and received with some joy the invitation of William Penn (1644–1718) to take advantage of his experiment in religious freedom in Pennsylvania. Before the year was out, the first group migrated to Pennsylvania and settled in Germantown (now a part of Philadelphia). Over the next fifteen years, most of the Brethren migrated to Pennsylvania. Those few who chose to remain in Europe were absorbed into the MENNONITE CHURCH.

The first Brethren congregation in North America was established on Christmas Day, 1723, in Germantown. It became the mother congregation of the Church of the Brethren. Peter Becker (d. 1758) emerged as the pastor, and he baptized the first American converts and presided over the first love feast, a distinctive feature of Brethren worship.

The love feast (variations of which were later adopted by Moravians and Methodists) is a service that includes foot washing, a group meal, and the Lord's Supper. Neighbors called the Brethren "Dunkers," in reference to another distinctive practice, triune baptism, wherein the believer, on his knees in the water, is immersed three times in the name of the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit.

Like the FRIENDS and the Mennonites, the Brethren shared a commitment to peace and simplicity, sought separation from secular influences (an attitude manifested in the plain clothing they wore), opposed slavery, and refrained from voting, taking oaths, or entering lawsuits. Brethren instituted a strict system of church discipline. Problems from their refusal to bear arms in war began at the time of the American Revolution and periodically reappeared through World War II. As the church spread, the Brethren began to hold an annual meeting for business and worship during the 1740s. Their ministers received no salary and were not expected to have a formal education.

Following the establishment of the church in the United States, the Brethren expanded westward, establishing centers in Kentucky and Ohio in the 1790s, and Indiana, Missouri, and Illinois in the 1810s. Brethren reached the West Coast by mid-century, though the main strength of the church is still found in Pennsylvania, Ohio, and Indiana. The first schism among the Brethren occurred in the 1880s, and the church subsequently lost those members who either rejected any change or who felt that the church was changing too slowly. The Church of the Brethren remains the largest of the several Brethren denominations. In 1996 it reported 142,000 members in 1,100 congregations in the United States.

In the 1890s the Church of the Brethren began mission work in Denmark. They followed with efforts in China, Nigeria, India, and Ecuador. The China work was lost with the changes at mid-century. Nigeria emerged as the most successful mission and has resulted in the present independent CHURCH OF THE BRETHREN IN NIGERIA. Work in India was merged into the CHURCH OF NORTH INDIA (1970), and the work in Ecuador into the United Evangelical Church of Ecuador. The Brethren have become known for their work in relief, rehabilitation, and reconstruction after disaster. They earned special respect from their colleagues in other denominations for their efforts in Europe following World War II. They have an extensive publishing program through Brethren Press, established in the 1890s. The church is ecumenically active and was a founding member of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES.

Address:

Church of the Brethren
1451 Dubdee Ave.
Elgin, IL 60121-1694
<http://www.brethren.org>

James R. Lewis

Sources:

- Durnbaugh, Donald F., ed. The Brethren Encyclopedia. Philadelphia, PA: Brethren Encyclopedia, 1983.
- Mallot, Floyd E. Studies in Brethren History. Elgin, IL: Brethren Publishing House, 1954.
- Sappington, Roger E., ed. The Brethren in the New Nation. Elgin, IL: Brethren Publishing House, 1976.

Church of the Brethren in Nigeria

The Church of the Brethren in Nigeria began in 1922 with the arrival of H. Stover Kuip and Albert D. Helser as the first missionaries of the American-based CHURCH OF THE BRETHREN in Africa. The first congregations, which consisted of but four members, were founded at Garkida in 1927. In 1932, a school to train primary school teachers was founded. Through the next generation additional missionary personnel arrived, and in the decades following World War II, an expansion of institutional life aimed at building indigenous leadership. A pastor's school opened in 1950. The first of the Waka schools, to train teachers, church workers, and public officials, opened two years later. An expansive agricultural program was initiated in 1957. Kuip Bible School was opened in 1960 and the Theological School of Northern Nigeria in 1969.

In its second generation, the Church of the Brethren pursued the process of building indigenous leadership. In 1955 the first Nigerian was elected chairperson of the Nigerian synod, and the first Nigerian pastors were ordained. In 1972 the church in Nigeria was recognized as an autonomous sister church to the Church of the Brethren in America. In 1976 it adopted its present name, in the local language, Ekklesia Yanuwa a Nigeria. It continues the faith and practice of the Church of the Brethren.

The Church of the Brethren in Nigeria has approximately 80,000 members. It joined the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES in 1985.

Address:

Church of the Brethren in Nigeria
P.O. Box 1
Mubi
Adamawa
Nigeria

Sources:

- Durnbaugh, Donald F., ed. The Brethren Encyclopedia. Philadelphia, PA: Brethren Encyclopedia, 1983.
- Van der Bent, Ans J., ed. Handbook/Member Churches/World Council of Churches. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 1985.

Church of the Disciples of Christ

A missionary affiliated with the Christian Church (Disciples of Christ), Willie Burner, with his family, settled in Buenos Aires in 1906. The work was expanded by the arrival of additional personnel in 1910. Evangelism concentrated in Buenos Aires and its suburbs and was marked by cooperation with the Methodist Episcopal Church (now an integral part of the UNITED METHODIST CHURCH). In 1918, the two churches founded Colegio Americano and, along with the Waldensians, Union Seminary. Colegio Americano, a school for boys, was supplemented by El Instituto Modelo, a school for girls; the two later merged into the present Colegio Ward. In the 1930s, the church expanded into the province of Chaco, adjacent to the Paraguayan border.

The mission became an autonomous church in 1959, though the church maintains a strong relationship with its parent body. Its strength still lies in its social service work in the capital. It cooperates with other Protestant churches in supporting Aurora Publishing House.

This small church has been on the decline since the last decades of the twentieth century and now has approximately one thousand members. It is a member of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES.

Address:

Church of the Disciples of Christ
Terrada 2324
1416 Buenos Aires
Argentina

Source:

Van der Bent, Ans J., ed. Handbook/Member Churches/World Council of Churches. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 1985.

Church of the Kingdom of God

In 1916, Charles Taze Russell (1852–1916), the founder of the Bible Student Movement whose main branch later evolved into the JEHOVAH'S WITNESSES, died quite unexpectedly, and a struggle for the succession followed. Although the great majority of the Bible Students eventually followed Judge Joseph F. Rutherford (1869–1942) as Russell's successor (who later went on to establish the Jehovah's Witnesses), a number of other Bible Students leaders created splinter organizations. One of them was the leader of the Bible Students in Switzerland, F. L. Alexander Freytag (1870–1947). Attempts to resolve his differences with Rutherford failed, and in 1920 Freytag published the Laodicean Messenger, a book marking the beginning of the separation. Rutherford answered with The Harp of God, his first mature doctrinal work.

In 1921, Freytag established the independent Church of the Kingdom of God (also known in certain countries as the Philanthropic Association of the Friends of Man). The organization has been quite successful in Switzerland, with several thousand members, and expanded to a number of other countries, including the United States and Italy, where, thanks to the efforts of Sebastiano Chiardola (1914–1993), it also enjoyed a membership of several thousands. In subsequent years, Freytag not only denounced what he regarded as Rutherford's innovations, but also reinterpreted most of Russell's peculiar doctrines, so that his movement has been regarded by some scholars as Russellism evolving toward Fundamentalist Evangelical Protestantism.

The Monitor of the Kingdom of Justice, the movement's magazine, is published in several languages.

Address:

Church of the Kingdom of God
Le Château
1236 Cartigny
Switzerland

Massimo Introvigne and PierLuigi Zoccatelli

Sources:

Freytag, F. L. Alexander. The Divine Revelation. Geneva, Switzerland: Disciples of Christ, 1922.
———. Eternal Life. Geneva, Switzerland: Messenger of the Lord, 1933.
———. The New Earth. Geneva, Switzerland: Bible and Tract House, 1922.

Church of the Lamb of God

The Church of the Lamb of God was a small POLYGAMY-PRACTICING MORMON church, which attained a level of fame because of the violence in which it became involved as a result of some of its members murdering members and leaders of other polygamy-practicing groups. The church was founded in 1970 by Ervil LeBaron (d. 1981), formerly the patriarch of the Church of the First Born of the Fullness of Times. The Church of the First Born grew out of the participation of the large LeBaron family in polygamy, which dated to the 1930s. In the 1950s, they had resided at a colony in Mexico associated with the Apostolic United Brethren, the group led by Rulon C. Allred (d. 1977). In 1955, three LeBaron brothers, Joel (d. 1972), Ross Wesley, and Floren, left the colony and incorporated the Church of the First Born. Eventually Joel claimed to possess the Patriarchal Priesthood through a line of succession in the family that led back to Joseph Smith Jr., the founder of the CHURCH OF JESUS CHRIST OF LATTER-DAY SAINTS.

In 1970, Joel and Ervil parted after Joel accused his brother of taking undue liberties with the women in the church. After establishing the Church of the Lamb of God, Ervil issued a manifesto claiming leadership over all of the polygamy-practicing groups and the authority to execute any who did not acknowledge that authority. Soon afterward a series of attacks, some causing deaths, began to plague the other polygamy groups. In 1972, Joel LeBaron was murdered. A close associate of his, Dean Vest, was killed in 1975. Then in 1977, several individuals entered the office of Rulon Allred in suburban Salt Lake City, Utah, and killed him. A few days later an attempt to kill Merle Kilgore, another polygamy leader, was foiled. Eventually, all of these deaths were traced to orders given by Ervil LeBaron. In 1980 he was tried and convicted, but died the following year in prison.

The church did not die with Ervil. He was succeeded by his son Aaron LeBaron, and deaths associated with the group continued through the 1980s. The most prominent deaths were of four members of the Chynoweth family in 1988. Aaron LeBaron was eventually convicted (1997) of conspiracy to kill the Chynoweths.

In recent years there have been conflicting reports of the church's disbanding. Its present status is unknown, and it may survive as a small informal organization of devoted followers.

Sources:

Bradlee, Ben, Jr., and Dale Van Atta. Prophet of Blood: The Untold Story of Ervil LeBaron. New York: Putnam's, 1981.

Chynoweth, Rena. The Blood Covenant: The True Story of the Ervil LeBaron Family and its Rampage of Terror and Murder. Austin, TX: Diamond Books, 1990.

Fessier, Michael, Jr. "Ervil LeBaron, the Man Who Would Be God." New West (January 1981): 80–84, 112–117.

LeBaron, Garn, Jr. "Mormon Fundamentalism and Violence: Historical Analysis." Posted at <http://www.exmormon.org/violence.htm>. Accessed November 1, 2001.

LeBaron, Verlan. The LeBaron Story. Lubbock, TX: self-published, 1981.

Church of the Lord (Aladura)

A prominent ALADURA CHURCH, founded by Josiah Ositelu in 1930. Ositelu, an Anglican schoolteacher who had thousands of visions, became involved in the prophetic exposure of witchcraft. He was associated with Joseph Shadare (d. 1962), founder of Christ Apostolic Church (Ghana), and Joseph Ayo Babalola during the revival of 1930. Ositelu was known as a powerful healer, and he broke his short affiliation with Faith Tabernacle, an American non-Pentecostal church that emphasized faith healing in its teachings, in the same year, when the other leaders challenged his authority and practices. They objected to his concern with exposing witches, the use of holy names and seals to guarantee miracles, and his acceptance of polygyny. Ositelu then founded the Church of the Lord (Aladura) (CLA) and eventually took seven wives, for which he claimed divine permission.

Ositelu died in 1966, to be succeeded by Apostle Adeleke Adejobi (1921–1991), who had just completed a two-year theological training course at an evangelical Bible college in Glasgow, Scotland, and had established a church among West African immigrants in London in 1964. Adejobi was a man of considerable spiritual and administrative gifts and one of the most widely traveled Aladura leaders. He built the largest church building of the CLA in Lagos in 1942, planted the CLA in Freetown, Sierra Leone, in 1947 and in Accra, Ghana, in 1953. Adejobi's work in Ghana resulted in one of the most successful of the non-Nigerian CLA churches, and the daughter of the king of Ashanti, Princess Victoria Prempeh, became an avid supporter and eventually a minister.

The CLA was admitted to the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES in 1975. Adejobi was also involved in the creation of two ecumenical associations for AICs, the Nigeria Association of Aladura Churches and the intercontinental ORGANIZATION OF AFRICAN INSTITUTED CHURCHES (OAIC), created in Cairo in 1978, with offices in Nairobi. Primate Adejobi became the OAIC's first chairman (1978–1982). The CLA was also responsible for the creation of the Aladura Theological Seminary and the Prophets and Prophetesses Training Institute, originally established by Adejobi in 1965. On Adejobi's death in 1991, Ositelu's eldest son, Gabriel Segun Ositelu (1938–1998), an agriculturist and head of an Ibadan research institute, took his place as primate. On his death in 1998, his brother Rufus Ositelu became primate. The CLA seems to have evolved from a charismatic leadership pattern to a hereditary one.

Address:

Church of the Lord (Aladura)
 P.O. Box 71
 Sagamu Remo
 Ogun
 Nigeria
<http://www.aladura.de>

Allan H. Anderson

Sources:

Peel, John D. Y. Aladura: A Religious Movement among the Yoruba. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1968.

Pobee, John S., and Gabriel Ositelu II. African Initiatives in Christianity: The Growth, Gifts and Diversities of Indigenous African Churches—A Challenge to the Ecumenical Movement. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 1998.

Turner, Harold W. History of an African Independent Church. Vol. 1, The Church of the Lord (Aladura). Oxford: Clarendon, 1967.

Church of the Lord Jesus Christ of the Apostolic Faith

A predominantly black Oneness Pentecostal denomination founded by Sherrod C. Johnson (1897–1961) in 1933, the Church of the Lord Jesus Christ of the Apostolic Faith (CLJCAF) began with the congregation that Johnson established in Philadelphia in 1919. He and his church were originally affiliated with Refuge Churches of Our Lord in New York City, itself a split from the original Oneness organization, the PENTECOSTAL ASSEMBLIES OF THE WORLD.

Johnson was born in North Carolina and began his ministry in 1917 in a predominantly White congregation in Philadelphia. Two years later he founded another congregation, mostly Black, which he pastored until his death.

The growth and oversight of the CLJCAF was largely a result of Johnson's radio ministry, which began in 1935. By the time of his death he was heard weekly over seventy church-owned stations worldwide. As he was reluctant to appoint elders and bishops, his taped messages became an important means of oversight of affiliated congregations. Johnson was a controversial leader and product of the doctrinal and racial tensions within the early Oneness movement. With his fellow Black leaders, he staunchly opposed the divisions that were emerging and fought for a multiracial church.

Many of Johnson's views were inherited from his previous affiliation with Refuge Churches. Notable among them was his strict opposition to ordaining women and remarrying after divorce. He also insisted upon the ordinance of foot washing and the use of wine instead of grape juice in Communion. Other teachings were more radical. Women were required to dress modestly in plain, full-length dresses, wear head coverings in church, and refrain from all forms of jewelry and rings. Johnson condemned the observance of various traditional Christian festivals, especially Christmas and Easter. He rejected all forms of military service and the practice of funeral services.

Johnson held a variant position on the traditional Oneness teaching of the sonship of Christ. He agreed that sonship is temporal, not eternal. But he taught that, since the kingdom of God is spiritual, sonship ceased the moment Jesus died on the cross and his flesh was glorified.

Upon his death, the church's secretary-general, S. McDowell Shelton (d. 1991), succeeded Johnson as apostle and general overseer. His appointment was not well received by the southern elders, and the CLJCAF has witnessed six, mostly small, schisms since 1961. Under Shelton, succession was established according to family lineage. Consequently, his youngest son, Bishop Omega, has been bishop since 1992.

Many of Johnson's teachings and practices continue. Christmas and Easter are not celebrated. The church does not participate in funeral services, but may conduct memorial services. Members are free to hold funerals elsewhere. Women are still encouraged to wear a head covering when they pray, but have more freedom to decide individually the standard for modesty in apparel.

Johnson's historic radio ministry has been downsized to four U.S. cities—Los Angeles, New York, Philadelphia, and Washington, D.C. It is being replaced by a closed-circuit network that simultaneously beams the bishop's weekly message to all seventy churches throughout the United States. Video is soon to be added to the current audio format.

The CLJCAF officially claims a membership of 5,000 and 70 congregations in the United States. Of this number, 2,500 belong to the mother church in Philadelphia. The CLJCAF neither counts members abroad nor holds church property. Its followers and supporters are concentrated in Belize, the Bahamas, Jamaica, Nassau, Ghana, Liberia, Nigeria, South India, and England. The church does not have an Internet presence. The church's quarterly magazine, The Whole Truth, has a circulation of 5,000.

Address:

Church of the Lord Jesus Christ of the Apostolic Faith
22nd and Bainbridge Streets
Philadelphia, PA 19146

David A. Reed

Sources:

- French, Talmadge L. Our God Is One: The Story of the Oneness Pentecostals. Indianapolis, IN: Voice and Vision Publications, 1999.
- McCoy, L. A. A True History of the True Church. Rev. ed., 1977.
- Reed, David A. "Oneness Pentecostalism." In Dictionary of Pentecostal and Charismatic Movements, edited by Stanley M. Burgess and Gary B. McGee. Grand Rapids, MI: Zondervan Publishing House, 1988.
- Richardson, James C., Jr. With Water and Spirit. Martinsville, VA: self-published, n.d.

Church of the Nazarene

The Church of the Nazarene is one of the leading representatives of the HOLINESS MOVEMENT in American Christianity; during the twentieth century, it became a global church with affiliated churches in more than a hundred countries.

The church was founded in 1895 by Rev. Phineas F. Bresee (1838–1915), a former pastor in the Methodist Episcopal Church (now a constituent part of the UNITED METHODIST CHURCH). Bresee had been a leading minister in the Methodist Episcopal Church in the years following the American Civil War, when the Holiness movement had the support of Methodism's leadership. By the 1890s, however, that support was waning. In 1894, Bresee asked the church to allow him to take charge of an independent mission in downtown Los Angeles, and when they refused his request, he withdrew from the Methodist Church. After a year at the mission, he founded the First Church of the Nazarene in Los Angeles. The aging Bresee, having previously served the Methodist church for three decades, started a second career as the head of a new Holiness movement. The initial congregation grew rapidly, and a second congregation was started in 1897 in northern California at Berkeley. Several other congregations soon followed, and Bresee saw the possibility of developing a Holiness church along America's West Coast.

The first delegated assembly of the associated churches gathered in 1898, at which time Bresee was named superintendent. In 1907, the West Coast group merged with a similar Holiness group on the East Coast, the Association of Pentecostal Churches of America. Their union produced a new national organization, the Pentecostal Church of the Nazarene. By this time, the Church of the Nazarene had already become involved with foreign missions. In 1897, it had sent a team of five workers to open a mission in India.

The twentieth century was a time of steady growth in the United States. That growth was punctuated by a series of mergers, which have brought a number of smaller Holiness bodies into the church. These include the Holiness Church of Christ (1908), the Pentecostal Church of Scotland (1915), the Pentecostal Mission of Nashville (1915), Laymans Holiness Association (1922), the International Holiness Mission (1952), the Calvary Holiness Church (1955), and the Gospel Workers Church of Canada (1958). Most recently, the Church of the Nazarene (Nigeria), an indigenous church that had developed by using the 1944 edition of the church's Manual, came into the larger church (1988). The Pentecostal Church of Scotland, the International Holiness Mission, and the Calvary Holiness Church were all products of the Holiness movement's earlier spread in the United Kingdom.

In 1996, the church reported 608,008 members in the United States, 11,931 members in Canada, and 1,138,504 members worldwide. The church is organized into districts, each headed by a district superintendent. The highest legislative authority is the General Assembly, which elects the general superintendents (who function somewhat like bishops) and the General Board, the primary executive body. Under the General Board are a spectrum of boards and agencies. The church sponsors a number of colleges and seminaries, the majority of which are located outside of the United States. The church is affiliated with the CHRISTIAN HOLINESS PARTNERSHIP and the National Association of Evangelicals, through which it is additionally related to the WORLD EVANGELICAL ALLIANCE.

Address:

The Church of the Nazarene
6402 The Paseo
Kansas City, MO 64131
<http://www.nazarene.org>

Sources:

Purkiser, W. T. Called unto Holiness, II. Kansas City, MO: Beacon Hill Press, 1983.
Redford, M. E. The Rise of the Church of the Nazarene. Kansas City, MO: Beacon Hill Press, 1948.
Smith, Timothy. Called unto Holiness. Kansas City, MO: Nazarene Publishing House, 1962.

Church of the Province of Burundi

Anglican work in Burundi began in 1934 with the arrival of missionaries of the Rwanda General and Medical Mission, the theologically conservative wing of the CHURCH MISSIONARY SOCIETY, which had initiated work in Rwanda in 1926. At this time a notable spiritual revival that had originated in Rwanda was sweeping through the country, and the mission experienced rapid growth among the Tutsi people (the smaller of the two ethnic groups in the country). The mission went on to found three hospitals. In 1961, the work was incorporated into the Church of Uganda, Rwanda, and Burundi.

Like other churches operating in Burundi, the Anglicans were directly affected by the sudden influx of more than 100,000 refugees during the period of disturbances that followed the gaining of independence by Rwanda in 1962. Burundi gained its independence the following year, followed by four more years of violence, which followed the pattern of older conflicts between the Tutsi and Hutu people. Many of the Anglicans were killed in this era.

In 1965, a coup led by strongman Michael Micombero ended the violence temporarily. That same year, the first African bishop was consecrated for Burundi, and the Diocese of Burundi became an independent diocese within the church the next year. In 1971–1972, a Hutu uprising was put down brutally, with more than 300,000 killed. Half of the Anglican clergy and more than a hundred catechists were killed, and the church was forced to rebuild without trained leadership. There were over five hundred parishes to be served by less than twenty ordained priests.

In 1980, the Church of the Province of Uganda was separated, and the new Church of the Province of Burundi, Rwanda, and Zaire erected. This province was divided into three provinces along national boundaries in 1992. The Church of the Province of Burundi is led by its primate, currently the Most Reverend Samuel Sidamuka and has four dioceses. This province is one of the few Anglican bodies that is not a member of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES, though it participates fully in the worldwide ANGLICAN COMMUNION. The church, with approximately 50,000 members, is the third largest religious body in Burundi. It sponsors Warner Theological College.

Address:

Church of the Province of Burundi
DS 12
Bujumbura
Burundi

Sources:

The Church of England Yearbook. London: Church Publishing House, published annually.
Van der Bent, Ans J., ed. Handbook/Member Churches/World Council of Churches. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 1985.

Church of the Province of Central Africa

The Church of the Province of Central Africa unites Anglican churches in four countries—Botswana, Malawi, Zambia, and Zimbabwe. The beginning of work in Central Africa dates to a sermon by David Livingstone (1813–1873) delivered in 1858 to students of Cambridge University. In response, the Universities' Mission to Central Africa was organized under Bishop Charles MacKenzie (1825–1862). MacKenzie accompanied Livingstone to Africa in 1861 and began work south of Lake Nyasa. However, MacKenzie died in 1863, and the mission withdrew to Zanzibar. A second attempt at the end of the 1870s by the SOCIETY FOR THE PROPAGATION OF THE GOSPEL IN FOREIGN PARTS led to a permanent mission being established.

Bishop George W. H. Knight-Bruce (1852–1896), bishop of Bloemfontein (South Africa), journeyed to Zimbabwe in 1888, and three years later became the first bishop of a new Diocese of Rhodesia. His work was somewhat overshadowed by that of one of the African catechists he recruited to assist in building the church, Bernard Mizeki (1861–1896). Assigned to the village of Nhowe, he built a mission complex, learned the local language, and opened a school. Then in 1896, after refusing to flee, he was killed during a local uprising. His death was attributed partly to his having cut down some trees held sacred by followers of the traditional religion. He is remembered to the present on the calendars of the church in Zimbabwe as a martyr. The work in Zimbabwe was eventually put together with the work in Botswana and Mozambique in the Diocese of Southern Rhodesia, which was incorporated into the CHURCH IN THE PROVINCE OF SOUTH AFRICA.

Work in Botswana had begun in 1899 as an extension of the work in South Africa. The Diocese of Botswana was formed in 1972.

In 1910, John Hine, the bishop of Nysaland and Zanzibar, initiated work in Zambia (then known as Northern Rhodesia), the occasion being the fiftieth anniversary of the Universities' Mission to Central Africa. He was assisted by Leonard Kamungu, one of the first Africans in the region to be ordained to the priesthood.

Work in Central Africa developed under the jurisdiction of the Church in South Africa and the archbishop of Canterbury. The Church of the Province of Central Africa was established in 1955, with Edward Paget named as the first archbishop.

The church is led by its archbishop, currently Mt. Rev. Walter P. K. Makhulu. There are twelve dioceses, and as the century began, the church reported 600,000 members. The church supports the National Anglican Theological College of Zimbabwe, Zomba Theological College (Malawi), and St. John's Seminary (Zambia). In 1998, the church voted against the ordination of females. It is a member of the worldwide

ANGLICAN COMMUNION and the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES.

Address:

Church of the Province of Central Africa
P.O. Box 769
Gaborone
Botswana

Sources:

The Church of England Yearbook. London: Church Publishing House, published annually.
Van der Bent, Ans J., ed. Handbook/Member Churches/World Council of Churches. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 1985.

Church of the Province of Myanmar

An Anglican presence in Myanmar (then known as Burma) was initiated in 1825 by chaplains serving British expatriates, but a meaningful mission was not established until 1859, when representatives of the SOCIETY FOR THE PROPAGATION OF THE GOSPEL IN FOREIGN PARTS arrived at Moulmein, five years after the British annexed the region. The first bishop was consecrated in 1859 and took his place in Rangoon (Yangon). Work began among the Burmese people, but was later extended to the Karin and Chin people. In 1924, the Bible Churchman's Missionary Society, a Low-Church Evangelical sending agency supported by members of the CHURCH OF ENGLAND, opened work in the northern part of the country and among the Khumi people in western Burma.

The Diocese of Burma grew under the jurisdiction of the archbishop of Canterbury, but was eventually incorporated into the Church of India, Pakistan, Burma, and Ceylon. That church was broken apart by the establishment of the Church of North India and the Church of Pakistan. At the same time, the Church of the Union of Burma was established, which continues as the Church of the Province of Myanmar.

The church is led by its archbishop, currently Mt. Rev. Andrew Mya Han. Congregations are divided into six dioceses. As the new century began, the church reported 42,000 members. The church is a member of the worldwide ANGLICAN COMMUNION and the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES.

Address:

Church of the Province of Myanmar
140 Pyidaungsu Yeiktha Rd.
Dagon P.O. 11191, Yangon
Myanmar

Sources:

The Church of England Yearbook. London: Church Publishing House, published annually.

Van der Bent, Ans J., ed. Handbook/Member Churches/World Council of Churches. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 1985.

Church of the Province of Southeast Asia

Anglicanism arrived in what is now Malaysia following the establishment of the first British settlement in Malaya on Penang, an island off the western coast of the Malay Peninsula, by the British East India Company in 1786. The local magistrate, an active layman in the CHURCH OF ENGLAND named George Caunter, took the leadership as Lay Clerk and Acting Chaplain. Supervision of the fledgling work was assumed by the Diocese of Calcutta. The Church of St. George the Martyr was constructed in 1819. The East India Company secured an Anglican chaplain for Singapore in 1826 and supported the building of its first church, St. Andrew's.

The church operated primarily among British expatriates until 1848, when more formal missionary work was commenced by the SOCIETY FOR THE PROPAGATION OF THE GOSPEL IN FOREIGN PARTS (SPG) among the Chinese and Tamil-speaking Indians. Their efforts were boosted by missionaries from the CHURCH MISSIONARY SOCIETY and the Church Missionary Society of Australia. The SPG settled in Singapore in 1856.

In 1855 a Diocese of Singapore, Labuan, and Sarawak was created for better administration of the work. It operated as a missionary diocese of the Archdiocese of Canterbury. The East India Company closed in 1867, and Penang came under direct British rule. At that point, the SPG assumed the active role of procuring chaplains for the church in the region. The diocese was again reorganized into the Diocese of Singapore in 1909.

Malaysia became independent in 1957, and three years later the diocese was renamed the Diocese of Singapore and Malaya, the name selected to give due recognition to the political importance of Malaya. In 1970 the Diocese of West Malaysia was separated from Singapore (which by that time had become an independent country). Subsequently the Dioceses of Sabah and Kuching (Sarawak) in Eastern Malaysia were designated. In 1996, the dioceses of Singapore, West Malaysia, Sabah, and Kuching (previously existing as extraprovincial dioceses) were brought together as the Church of the Province of Southeast Asia. The Diocese of Singapore includes Anglican work in Thailand, Laos, Cambodia, Vietnam, and Indonesia.

The Province of Southeast Asia has emerged as one of the most conservative in the worldwide ANGLICAN COMMUNION. It has been particularly critical of the EPISCOPAL CHURCH (U.S.). The province does not ordain women, and made headlines in March 2000 when Moses Tay (b. 1938), the province's then archbishop, along with Emmanuel Kolini, archbishop of the CHURCH IN THE PROVINCE OF RWANDA, consecrated two U.S. priests, Charles H. "Chuck"

Murphy III and John H. Rodgers, in Singapore for service in the United States. The two subsequently formed the Anglican Mission in America, which superseded two other conservative Episcopal organizations: First Promise Roundtable and the Anglican Association of Congregations on Mission (AACOM). Murphy (for the Province of Rwanda) and Rodgers (for the Province of Southeast Asia) were given the joint charge of planting churches and receiving congregations and clergy who felt unable to remain in the Episcopal Church. Archbishop Tay justified the action as an attempt to halt the exodus of unhappy members from the very liberal American church.

The Church of the Province of Southeast Asia is headed by Most Rev. Datuk Yong Ping Chung, who also serves as bishop of Sabah. The province is not a member of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES. The Anglican Mission in America may be reached at P.O. Box 3427, Pawleys Island, SC 29585. It has a Web site at <http://anglicanmissioninamerica.org>.

Address:

Church of the Province of Southeast Asia
c/o Most Rev. Datuk Yong Ping Chung
P.O. Box 10811
88809 Kota Kinabalu, Sabah
East Malaysia

Sources:

- The Church of England Yearbook*. London: Church Publishing House, published annually.
- Hurt, R., L. K. King, and J. Roxborough, eds. Christianity in Malaysia: A Denominational History. Selagor Darul Ehsan, Malaysia: Palanduk Publications, 1992.
- Loh Keng Aun. The Anglican Church in Singapore Island, 1909–1959. Singapore: University of Singapore, 1960.
- Ong, Eddie. "Anglicanism in West Malaysia." In Anglicanism: A Global Communion, edited by Andrew Wingate et al. London: Mowbray, 1998.

Church of the Province of the Indian Ocean

The Church of the Province of the Indian Ocean, formed in 1973, brings together the Anglican churches established in the islands of the westernmost part of the Indian Ocean, including Madagascar, Mauritius, and the Seychelles. These areas had previously been opened to Christianity by French-speaking missionaries of the ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH. The first Anglican work began on Mauritius in 1810, just a few years before England gained control following the defeat of Napoleon. It was 1843 before CHURCH OF ENGLAND missionaries arrived in the Seychelles, in spite of England having gained control in the 1790s. For many years, the work in the Seychelles was included in the Diocese of Mauritius, but a separated diocese for the islands was created in 1973.

The Church of England arrived on Madagascar in 1864 through representatives of the SOCIETY FOR THE PROPAGATION OF THE GOSPEL (SPG) and the CHURCH MISSIONARY SOCIETY (CMS). The CMS withdrew in the 1870s and left the field to the SPG. The SPG concentrated its efforts along the east coast, the area around the capital of Antananarivo, and in the far north. In the twentieth century it emerged as the Ekklesia Episkopaly Malagasy with three dioceses. By 1973 it had some 30,000 members.

The church is at one in belief and practice with the churches of the wider ANGLICAN COMMUNION. There are five dioceses, three of which serve Madagascar. There are approximately 80,000 members. It sponsors three theological schools for the training of ministers. The church, especially in Madagascar, serves some of the poorest segments of the population and continues to receive support from other Anglican churches through the Province of the Indian Ocean Support Association. The Church is a member of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES.

Address:

Church of the Province of the Indian Ocean
Evâche anglican
Loy VK57/ter
Ambohimano, 101 Antananarivo
Madagascar

Sources:

The Church of England Yearbook. London: Church Publishing House, published annually.
Van der Bent, Ans J., ed. Handbook/Member Churches/World Council of Churches. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 1985.
Wingate, Andrew, et al., eds. Anglicanism: A Global Communion. London: Mowbray, 1998.

Church of the Province of Uganda

Anglicanism came to Uganda in 1876 in the person of Alexander Mackay (1849–1890), a representative of the CHURCH MISSIONARY SOCIETY, and a party of missionaries, all of whom except Mackay died during the first two years. He carried on until additional missionaries could be sent. The mission made substantial progress under the leadership of Bishop Alfred R. Tucker, who headed the work for more than twenty years (1890–1911), during which time the number of members of the Church of England grew from 200 to 65,000. The work was further supplemented in 1929 when representatives of the Bible Churchmen's Missionary Society, representing the Evangelical wing of the church, opened work among the Karamopong people. Over the years, the tragedy suffered by the original missionaries has been repeated in a more tragic mode. In 1886, for example, the first bishop, James Hannington, and his companions were murdered. More recently, in 1977, Archbishop Janani Luwum was killed by Ugandan president Idi Amin.

In 1961, the Church of Uganda, Rwanda and Burundi was inaugurated by the archbishop of Canterbury. At the time, there were ten dioceses in Uganda. In 1980, the church became the province of Uganda, Rwanda, and Burundi. In 1994, that province was divided into three units, and the present Church of the Province of Uganda emerged.

The Church of Uganda is headed by its primate, currently Rt. Rev. Livingstone Mpalanyi-Nkoyoyo. The church consists of twenty-seven dioceses. As the new century began, it reported a membership of 2,200,000. The church supports Bishop Theological College, founded in 1923, and Uganda Christian University, founded in 1997.

Address:

Church of the Province of Uganda
P.O. Box 14123
Kampala
Uganda

Sources:

The Church of England Yearbook. London: Church Publishing House, published annually.
Van der Bent, Ans J., ed. Handbook/Member Churches/World Council of Churches. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 1985.
Wingate, Andrew, et al., eds. Anglicanism: A Global Communion. London: Mowbray, 1998.

Church of the White Eagle Lodge

The Church of the White Eagle Lodge grew out of the work of Ivan Cooke (d. 1981) and Grace Cooke (d. 1979), two Spiritualist mediums. From the beginning of her career as a medium, Grace Cooke, known to church members as Minestra, was associated with the Spiritualist Church of England and the Stead Borderland Library in London. In 1930, she was contacted by a French member of the Polaire Brotherhood who informed her that a recently deceased author, well known in Spiritualist circles, Arthur Conan Doyle (1859–1930) (known to the rest of the world as the author of the Sherlock Holmes stories), had chosen her as his instrument to speak to the living from his spirit existence. The result of this contact was later published as a book, The Return of Arthur Conan Doyle (1956).

As a medium, Cooke had been guided by a spirit being named White Eagle, a spirit identified as a Native American. White Eagle is believed to be the symbol of St. John the Divine (one of the twelve apostles who were the main disciples of Jesus Christ) and a sign of a coming age of brotherhood. Minestra channeled numerous messages from White Eagle, which became the basis of the work and teachings at the Church of the White Eagle, founded in 1934. At the time of her contact with the Polaire Brotherhood she was also given a six-pointed star, described as the Christ star of balance, which became the church's symbol. She was also asked to train men and women to work in the light of Christ and to aid the world in the "years of fire" that were approaching.

The church conveys the teachings of what is called the Great White Brotherhood, a group of evolved beings who reside on a higher plane and who guide the development of the human race. They offer the hope of a coming golden age, when intuition will arise as a greater force in human affairs. The church affirms belief in God as Father and Mother, the Cosmic Christ, and the five cosmic laws of reincarnation, cause and effect (karma), opportunity, correspondences, and compensation. The church also affirms that every person has a spark of divine light, the spirit of Divine Love, within. These teachings place the church firmly within the Western esoteric tradition.

The Church of the White Eagle has its headquarters in the United Kingdom. Soon after World War II, the church spread to North America, and centers opened in the United States and Canada. Additional centers appeared across Europe and in the lands of the British Commonwealth (including Australia and South Africa). The international work is led by ministers ordained by the church in England. Worldwide membership is in excess of fifteen thousand.

Address:

Church of the White Eagle
New Lands Lodge
Brewells Lane, LISS
Hampshire GU33 7HY
United Kingdom
<http://www.whiteaglelodge.org>

Sources:

Cooke, Grace. Minestra's Vision. Liss, Hampshire, UK: White Eagle Publishing Trust, 1992.
Lind, Ingrid. The White Eagle Inheritance. Wellingborough, Northamptonshire, UK: Turnstone Press, 1984.
The Story of the White Eagle Lodge. Liss, Hampshire, UK: White Eagle Publishing Trust, 1986.

Church of Tuvalu

Christianity in Tuvalu, a group of islands in the western Pacific formerly known as the Ellice Islands, began in 1861 with the landing of nine people who had been shipwrecked and drifting in the ocean for eight weeks. One, a deacon in the church on the Cook Islands named Elekama, received permission from the island chief to evangelize. After four months' work, he seized the opportunity to go to Samoa, where the LONDON MISSIONARY SOCIETY (LMS) had built a very successful missionary work, to receive more formal training. He returned with other Samoans to the Ellice Islands. They were joined by J. S. White, a missionary with the LMS, in 1870.

Previously, in the 1850s, the AMERICAN BOARD OF COMMISSIONERS FOR FOREIGN MISSIONS, the American equivalent of the LMS, had developed a mission in the Gilbert Islands. In 1917, they turned that work over to the LMS, and afterward the mission in the Gilbert and Ellice Islands operated as a single unit. Among the primary contributions of the missionaries was the translation of the Bible into the Tuvaluan language (closely related to the languages of Samoa and Kiribati).

The mission became independent as the Church of Tuvalu in 1969. It has a congregational polity and has written its own Tuvalu Church Creed, which places it squarely in the Reformed theological tradition.

The church, also known as the Tuvalu Christian Church, publishes a periodical, Te Lawa (in Tuvaluan). It is a member of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES and the WORLD ALLIANCE OF REFORMED CHURCHES. It claims some 97 percent of the islands' 10,000 residents as members.

Address:

Church of Tuvalu
P.O. Box 2
Funafuti
Tuvalu

Sources:

Barrett, David. The Encyclopedia of World Christianity. 2d edition. New York: Oxford University Press, 2001.
Bissio, Roberto Remo, et al. Third World Guide 93/94. Montevideo, Uruguay: Instituto del Tercer Mundo, 1992.
Kofe, L. The Tuvalu Church: A Socio-Historical Survey of Its Development towards an Indigenous Church. Suva, Fiji, 1976.

Church Universal and Triumphant

Founded in 1958 by Mark L. Prophet (1819–1973), the Church Universal and Triumphant began as Summit Lighthouse. The Summit Lighthouse traces its roots to the I AM RELIGIOUS ACTIVITY of Guy (1878–1939) and Edna (1886–1971) Ballard. Guy claimed that he had encountered the Ascended Master St. Germain on Mt. Shasta in northern California in 1929. The latter instructed him to give out various teachings that resemble those of Theosophy—for example, that a hierarchy of advanced entities called Ascended Masters guides the evolution of life on earth—and New Thought—that affirming healing and other realities verbally makes them so, thought influencing the material world. After Guy Ballard's death in 1939, various splinter factions arose. One, the Bridge to Freedom, led by Geraldine Innocente (d. 1961), included a young World War II veteran from Wisconsin named Mark L. Prophet (1918–1973). His messages, or dictations, given to him by Ascended Masters, were published in the magazine of another I AM splinter group, Lighthouse of Freedom.

In 1958 Mark began his own movement, the Summit Lighthouse, in Washington, D.C. In 1961 he married Elizabeth Clare Wulf (b. 1940), and in 1962 they moved to Fairfax, Virginia, and expanded their publishing activities, their most important publication being a periodical, The Pearls of Wisdom, in which were published the dictations Mark received from Ascended Masters, especially El Morya, one of the Ascended Masters who guided Helena P. Blavatsky of the THEOSOPHICAL SOCIETY. In 1962 they established the Keepers of the Flame, an inner circle of followers seen as serving as volunteers for the work of God on planet Earth millions of years ago in previous incarnations. In 1966 they moved their organization's headquarters to Colorado Springs. In 1970 they established a Montessori preschool in order to educate the children of Keepers of the Flame. They began Summit University in Santa Barbara, California, in 1971 as a series of training workshops for followers who completed basic lessons in the organization's beliefs.

In the late 1960s and early 1970s, the Prophets and some of their staff visited India, the Middle East, Africa, and Europe to expand their teachings and organization. They incorporated ideas from Asian religions and various New Age beliefs. Unlike the NEW AGE MOVEMENT, however, the Summit Lighthouse organization developed a structured and complex belief system that did not allow for the New Age's individualistic and eclectic doctrinal experimentation. Mark died suddenly in 1973, suffering a fatal stroke and leaving the movement in Elizabeth's hands. In 1974 the Summit Lighthouse became the Church Universal and Triumphant, with Elizabeth as the messenger, in retrospect appointed jointly with Mark, and Mark now elevated to Ascended Master status and given a new name, Lanello. In 1972, shortly before Mark's death, the Prophets coauthored Climb the Highest Mountain, the first exposition in book form of their cosmology. Subsequent books contained dictations and teachings from both Elizabeth and Mark/Lanello. Under Elizabeth's leadership the church grew significantly in numbers, reaching 25,000 by 1980. She moved headquarters to Santa Barbara, later Pasadena, and then Malibu, where their headquarters complex, called Camelot, remained until 1986, when they made their final move to the headquarters' present location, the Royal Teton Ranch, near Corwin Springs, Montana.

During the years that followed, the organization experienced a major controversy sometimes called the "shelter cycle." The Prophets taught that evil, fallen entities work against the Ascended Masters and enlist souls lagging behind in their evolution from Maldek, a planet that rebelled against God and was destroyed, and whose pieces are now the asteroid belt between Mars and Jupiter. The corrupted entities, Luciferians, and their minions, the Nephilim, or "soulless ones," work to deprive humanity of its rightful evolution toward God. Elizabeth found evidence of the evil ones' work in the current state of affairs in the world, especially the advance of communism. In some of the dictations given to her, she warned of the nuclear threat posed by the Soviet Union, leading some members to conclude that they should arm themselves for a post-nuclear holocaust world and dig shelters on the church's Montana property to protect themselves from nuclear attack. This activity resulted in the events of 1989, when two high-ranking church officials were arrested for illegally purchasing arms. Elizabeth meanwhile predicted that a surprise nuclear attack could occur in 1990. Two thousand of the church's faithful sold their possessions and moved to Montana, renting space in the shelters for the possible day of disaster. But nothing occurred during the period that Elizabeth had said was most likely for an attack. Some church members left the organization disillusioned. The controversy dragged the church's name through lurid media stories about harmful cults.

In the aftermath, several high-ranking officials resigned their offices in 1995, and Gilbert Cleirbaut, a Belgian managerial consultant, assumed the presidency. Elizabeth retired from active administrative leadership but retained her role as messenger of the Ascended Masters. Cleirbaut overhauled the organization's structure and finances, made it more accountable to the general public as well as to the membership at large, and led in the establishment of new subunits within the organizational chart dedicated to strengthening local centers and their ministries. Recently Cleirbaut stepped down, and organizational change continues, but the church seems to have regained its momentum after the difficult period in the late 1980s and early 1990s. Elizabeth was recently diagnosed with Alzheimer's disease but remains the messenger of the movement and the Guru Ma, their beloved maternal leader.

The organization currently has over 200 centers in forty countries. They boast offices in Argentina, Australia, Belgium, Brazil, Canada, England, Finland, the Philippines, South Africa, Spain, and other countries, but their world headquarters remains in Corwin Springs.

The Church Universal and Triumphant teaches that human beings are sparks of the light given off by the Great Central Sun, the hub of the universe, which is God, also called the Father/Mother God, because God combines both masculine and feminine energies perfectly and expects the individual to balance them in his/her life as well. These individualized sparks of divine light are the I AM Presences, which endure numerous incarnations. Each human being is also composed of four lower bodies: emotional, physical, mental, and etheric frequencies of spirit and matter surrounding a core, the soul. In each lifetime, the soul achieves progress by strengthening the Christ Self or Real Self, energy vibrations that are purified in the light of the I AM Presence. At death, the four bodies disperse and the individualized I AM Presence continues. The ultimate objective of human life is for the I AM Presence to reunite with God, fortified and matured through its journey in various incarnations.

Millions of years ago, a number of sparks from God were earmarked to exist in several lifewaves, or root races, on earth. The first three existed in near perfection and harmony, but the fourth, on the ancient continent of Lemuria, rebelled against God and introduced evil and corruption into human history. This corruption serves as astral substance or negative karma weighing down the individual, who must overcome these negative effects through ethical living and spiritual disciplines. Ascended Masters, collectively called the Great White Brotherhood, are advanced entities from other planets who have volunteered to guide humanity's lifewaves through their evolutions. They have achieved coordination of karma and attuned their own I AM Presences to the light of God to such a degree that they are no longer bound by the limits of time and space. After the rebellion of the fourth root race, the Lemurians, an Ascended Master from Venus named Sanat Kumara volunteered to come to earth with many helpers to salvage earth's sorry state. The Prophets are among those original volunteers, who have subsequently been through many incarnations.

St. Germain, the Ascended Master who communicated with Guy Ballard, is also important in the church's beliefs. He determined more than a hundred years ago that humanity needed democracy, because this political arrangement would be most conducive to individualized I AM Presences achieving spiritual advance. St. Germain supported the American Revolution and insists that the United States will continue to play a crucial role in humanity's spiritual evolution because it preserves the teachings of democracy in its governmental system. Therefore, like the I AM movement, the Church Universal and Triumphant fosters patriotism.

St. Germain and other Ascended Masters maintain centers, or retreats, in the etheric plane above earth, from which they guide humanity and to which various advanced human beings can travel in dreams or meditation for further instruction. Those members of humanity who advance the most will someday become Ascended Masters in their own right, as exemplified by Mark Prophet. As followers increase in spiritual and moral purity, so they also increase the vibrational strength of light and sound from God and help the earth to overcome the deleterious effects of earlier evil ones. They can achieve this growth by charging the seven chakra centers of energy, located along the spine from spinal base to the crown of the head, each corresponding to a particular ray emitted from the Great Central Sun. These energy foci in the human etheric body cycle divine energy in such a way as to render the devotee more attuned to cosmic reality. The seat of all spiritual activity in the human being is the heart, midway along the chakra stack, containing the threefold flame of power, wisdom, and love.

Elizabeth Prophet teaches that all human beings can potentially achieve Christlike status. Christ himself was but one of many Ascended Masters, but because of his particularly insightful teachings and crucial place in cosmic history, his words and example continue to be especially formative for church members. Church rituals include hearing Elizabeth deliver dictations from the Masters, either in person or via satellite linkup. Members also "decree," a form of prayer in which thoughts are expressed intentionally to alter existing states in order to effect healing and world peace, among other worthy goals. These rituals incorporate various elements of Christian liturgy as well as meditative practices reminiscent of Buddhism and Hinduism. Liturgical objects include statuary of Jesus and figures from other world religions. The church structure is hierarchical, with some of the Keepers of the Flame of the rank of Communicants, the most committed members. From this group, the inner core of church leaders and members of the headquarters' staff are chosen.

Address:

Church Universal and Triumphant
P.O. Box 5000
Corwin Springs, MT 59030
<http://www.tsl.org>

W. Michael Ashcraft and Leah Shaw

Sources:

- Melton, J. Gordon. "The Church Universal and Triumphant: Its Heritage and Thoughtworld." In Church Universal and Triumphant in Scholarly Perspective, edited by James R. Lewis and J. Gordon Melton. Stanford, CA: Center for Academic Publications, 1994.
- Prophet, Mark L., and Elizabeth Clare Prophet. Climb the Highest Mountain: The Path of the Higher Self. Livingston, MT: Summit University Press, 1972. Reprint, 1986.
- . Foundations of the Path. Corwin Springs, MT: Summit University Press, 1999.
- Whitsel, Bradley Christian. "Escape to the Mountains: A Case Study of the Church Universal and Triumphant." Ph.D. dissertation, Syracuse University, 1998.

Churches of Christ (Non-Instrumental)

The Churches of Christ (Non-Instrumental) is one of four large international church bodies to emerge from the revival work of three former Presbyterian ministers on the American frontier. Thomas Campbell (1763–1854) and his son Alexander Campbell (1788–1866) were Irishmen trained in Scotland and heavily influenced by the FREE CHURCH tradition in Scottish Presbyterianism. Thomas Campbell came to America in 1807 and, after a very brief association with the Presbyterians, founded the Christian Association of Washington (Pennsylvania). He was soon joined by his son, and they led their followers into an association with the Red Stone Baptist Association. A lengthy affiliation with the Baptists assisted in grounding them in democratic Free Church perspectives.

Barton Stone (1772–1844) was a Presbyterian minister who in the frontier atmosphere found the Presbyterian structure too confining. In 1809 he left the Presbyterians and began to found local churches that were simply called Christian churches. Authority was vested in the local church, and any association between congregations was for fellowship and edification only. The Campbells left the Baptists in 1830 and consummated a merger with Stone's group in 1832. The churches associated with Stone and the Campbells adopted an anticreedal Bible-based perspective. Thomas Campbell summed up their position: "Where the Scriptures speak, we will speak; where the Scriptures are silent, we are silent." They were antiauthoritarian and distrusted any authority apart from the local church. They also protested the many divisions of Christianity, which they attributed to creeds and unbiblical forms of church organization (episcopal and presbyterial). They refused to adopt what they considered sectarian denominational names (Methodist, Baptist, Presbyterian) and began to give themselves non-sectarian names, such as the Christian Church, Churches of Christ, or Disciples of Christ.

The movement spread during the nineteenth century. It saw itself as restoring primitive Christianity, and is often designated the Restoration movement. The movement was served by numerous schools, publishing concerns, and missionary agencies. As there was no denominational structure, each institution was formed and sponsored by a small group of the churches' leaders or by a single local congregation. The different periodicals that appeared represented the spectrum of opinion within the churches. Important differences of opinion developed over the use of instrumental music and the development of centralized boards and agencies carrying out the evangelistic, missionary, and charitable work of the churches.

In the late nineteenth century, the movement began to divide into three groupings. The Churches of Christ (Non-Instrumental) represented the most conservative wing of the Restoration movement. Concentrated in the American South, the leaders of the Churches of Christ opposed the introduction of organs (as well as other musical instruments) into worship services. They were also the wing most opposed to any attempts to organize congregations into conferences and associations, even the rather limited associations that had appeared among the Baptists. Although the Churches of Christ had been differentiating themselves through the last decades of the twentieth century, 1906 is usually taken as the date when the separation of the Churches of Christ from the rest of the Restoration movement, primarily the CHRISTIAN CHURCH (DISCIPLES OF CHRIST), was formalized.

In the years after the Civil War, David Lipscomb (1831–1917), the editor of the Christian Advocate in Nashville, Tennessee, emerged as the leading spokesperson of the conservative branch of the Restoration movement in the last half of the nineteenth century. Lipscomb opposed many trends he saw developing, primarily among the brethren in the North, including the installation of organs in church sanctuaries, the larger role given to women in worship and church leadership, the use of historical critical methods in Bible interpretation, and the acceptance of liberal theological beliefs. Lipscomb also emphasized the uniqueness of the Churches of Christ, which as the true church required converts who had previously been baptized in another church to be rebaptized. Through the twentieth century, the Churches of Christ became the focus of a series of controversies, both with other branches of the Restoration movement and internally. The internal controversies over premillennial eschatology, Sunday schools, and the use of individual communion cups in the Lord's Supper led to divisions within the Churches of Christ in the United States.

The Churches of Christ particularly opposed the development of the American Christian Missionary Society, which coordinated the work of a number of missionary evangelism and charitable activities supported by those Restoration congregations that chose to gather at its annual convention. The society became the focus of an expanding number of shared activities, which led in the twentieth century to the emergence of its supporting congregations as the Christian Church (Disciples of Christ). Between the two stands the third large Restoration group, the CHRISTIAN CHURCHES AND CHURCHES OF CHRIST.

The Churches of Christ are decentralized, and have no headquarters or denominational executives. There are a variety of representative institutions. The Gospel Advocate (Box 150, Nashville, TN 37202) and Firm Foundation (PO Box 690102, Houston, TX 77269) are leading periodicals. David Lipscomb University in Nashville, Tennessee, and Harding University in Searcy, Arkansas, are among thirteen institutions of higher learning identified with the movement in the United States.

In the later nineteenth century, like other conservative Free Church groups, the Churches of Christ became interested in world missions. Without a denominational structure, the founding of missions became the responsibility of individuals with a missionary calling who were willing to found individual missionary societies and gain the support of individual congregations. That effort has born fruit, and Churches of Christ congregations are now found around the world.

In 1990, the Churches of Christ reported 1,300,000 members in the United States and 747,000 members in other countries.

Sources:

Churches of Christ around the World. Nashville, TN: Gospel Advocate Company, 1990.

- Hatch, Nathan O. The Democratization of American Christianity. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1989.
- Mac, Lynn, comp. Churches of Christ in the United States. Nashville, TN: Gospel Advocate Company, 1990.
- Reed, Forest. Background of Division, Disciples of Christ and Churches of Christ. Nashville, TN: Disciples of Christ Historical Society, 1968.
- West, Earl. Search for the Ancient Order. 4 vols. Nashville, Indianapolis, and Germantown, TN: Gospel Advocate Company/Religious Book Service, 1950–1987.

Circle Sanctuary

Circle Sanctuary, also known as Circle, is an international WICCAN church with a worldwide Ecospirituality ministry that includes publishing and providing contacts and other networking support to contemporary Pagans of many paths, as well as to practitioners of Nature Spirituality paths rooted in Celtic Christianity, Unitarian Universalism, and other religious traditions. Founded in 1974 by senior minister Selena Fox and others, Circle Sanctuary is one of the first Wiccan churches and Pagan centers in the United States to become legally established and develop as a religious institution with full-time ministers and other professional staff. Through its Lady Liberty League, Circle Sanctuary has emphasized religious freedom endeavors on behalf of many forms of the Wiccan religion, contemporary Paganism, and Nature religions. Throughout its history, Circle Sanctuary has been active in international interfaith work. It has participated in projects, networks, and conferences, including those sponsored by the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES, the UNITED RELIGIONS INITIATIVE, and the COUNCIL FOR A PARLIAMENT OF THE WORLD'S RELIGIONS. In 1999, Rev. Selena Fox became the first head of a Wiccan denomination to become part of the Assembly of Religious and Spiritual Leaders associated with the Parliament of the World's Religions.

Circle Sanctuary also engages in academic research across a variety of disciplines and nurtures the Nature Religions Scholars Network associated with the American Academy of Religion. Circle Sanctuary consists of both the Circle Sanctuary Community, which convenes at events and assists with ministry services, and Circle Network, consisting of thousands of practitioners and groups throughout the United States and more than thirty other countries around the world. The Sanctuary is headquartered on a 200-acre sacred nature preserve in the forested hills in south central Wisconsin.

The spiritual foundation of Circle Sanctuary is the Circle Craft tradition, a Wiccan denomination that is a blend of old European Pagan folkways, multicultural shamanism, and transpersonal psychology. Combining scientific and spiritual practices, it is engaged in prairie restoration, forest and wetland preservation, and other environmental work. Spiritual education services of Circle Sanctuary include producing a variety of spiritual publications and recordings, maintaining a family of Web sites, and sponsoring workshops, courses, leadership institutes, and other training throughout the year. Circle Sanctuary publishes a variety of periodicals, including two that are among the oldest and largest serving Pagans worldwide: the quarterly CIRCLE Magazine, and the annual sourcebook, Circle Guide to Pagan Groups. Seasonal celebrations, rites of passage, Full and New Moon circles, Nature meditations, study groups, and other activities are held at Circle Sanctuary Nature Preserve, and at other locations throughout the year.

Circle Sanctuary festivals include Samhain (late October), Yule (mid-December), Imbolc (early February), Spring Equinox (mid-March), Earth Day (mid-April), Beltane (early May), Summer Solstice (June), Lughnassad (early August), and Fall Equinox (mid-September). Circle Sanctuary's annual conference and international grand gathering is the Pagan Spirit Gathering, held during Summer Solstice week at a campground in southeastern Ohio. Circle Sanctuary ministries also include spiritual healing and counseling and maintaining one of America's most extensive library and archives of Wiccan and Pagan materials.

Address:

Circle Sanctuary
P.O. Box 219
Mt. Horeb, WI 53572
<http://www.circlesanctuary.org>

Selena Fox

Sources:

- Adler, Margot. Drawing Down the Moon. Boston, MA: Beacon Press, 1997.
- Campanelli, Dan, and Pauline Campanelli. Circles, Groves and Sanctuaries: Sacred Spaces of Today's Pagans. St. Paul, MN: Llewellyn Publications, 1993.
- Carpenter, Dennis D. "Spiritual Experiences, Life Changes, and Ecological Viewpoints of Contemporary Pagans." Ph.D. dissertation, Saybrook Institute, 1994.
- Fox, Selena. Goddess Communion: Rituals and Meditations. Mt. Horeb, WI: Circle Publications, 1989.
- Fox, Selena, Dennis Carpenter, and Theresa Berrie, eds. Circle Guide to Pagan Groups. Mt. Horeb, WI: Circle Publications, issued annually.
- Guiley, Rosemary Ellen. The Encyclopedia of Witches and Witchcraft. New York, NY: Checkmark Books/Facts on File, 1999.
- Krippner, Stanley, and Patrick Welch. Spiritual Dimensions of Healing: From Native Shamanism to Contemporary Health Care. New York: Irvington Publishers, 1992.

The Clan of Ausrans (Poland)

The Clan of Ausrans constitutes a form of revived pre-Christian paganism. The Clan was formed in 1954 in Lodz, Poland, among the founders being the present leader, Ryszard Ignacy Danka, a linguist. The name of the group comes from Ausra, or “dawn.” The Clan members see themselves as trying to restore the spiritual heritage of their Indo-European forefathers. They feel obliged to know both themselves and their ancestors, as “he who for genetic or cultural reasons sees himself as an Indoeuropean has the Being’s given right and obligation to take from and give thanks to the sources which used to feed his ancestors.” In accordance with its statute, since 1960, the Clan has used a reconstruction of the Indo-European language, which appears in its printed calendars and poetry, as well as in the religious songs (as many as 200 so-called mentlas) that they sing during ritual meetings. Worship is directed toward the Powers of the World conceived as gods. Among the worshipped deities are Dieus, Sawelijos, Worynos, and Pussan. The religious life is considered to be one of the ways of the soul toward higher perfection.

The worship (deiwovolia) consists of recitation and singing of mentlas and other religious formulae, sacrifices, and sometimes teachings in parables about gods or classes on morality or philosophy. The priests obtain their own patron deities. Priests (deiwovolts) and believers (peristants) are allowed to take part in religious ceremonies of other religions. However, they should abstain from participation in actions spreading intolerance or destruction. Christianity is considered either a punishment for bloody pagan sacrifices or an attempt, as valid as the pagan ones, at describing the Absolute.

Both priests and laymen can improve themselves through an ascetic life, which should be based on the Indo-European culture and nutrition. There are 200–500 members of the whole Clan. However, only a small minority of them (15–30) accept the religious character of the group.

Leslaw Borowski

Source:

Beznic, Szymon. “Przegląd nowych ruchów religijnych w Polsce-wybor.” In Eileen Barker, Nowe Ruchy Religijne. Krakow: Zakład Wydawniczy “Nomos,” 1997.

Cocos Islands

The Cocos Islands, sometimes called the Keeling Islands, are two coral atolls in the Indian Ocean that are now an external territory of Australia. They were discovered in 1609 by William Keeling of the East India Company. They remained uninhabited until 1827, when settled by the Clunies-Ross family, headed by John Clunies-Ross (1786–1854), the founder of the Clunies Ross Company. The riches afforded by the islands were their coconut groves. In 1857, the British assumed control over the islands, but then

Status of religions in Cocos (Keeling) Islands, 2000-2050

Followers	2000			2025	2050
	total	%	rate
Muslims	480	66.7	2.21	570	700
Christians	170	23.1	0.49	180	210
Anglicans	80	11.4	0.37	80	100
Roman Catholics	40	5.5	0.00	40	60
Protestants	0	0.0	0.00	0	0
Nonreligious	40	5.5	1.34	60	90
Baha'is	30	3.7	3.05	50	80
Chinese folk-religionists	10	1.0	3.42	10	20
Total population	730	100.0	1.77	870	1,000

granted them in perpetuity to the family. Australia purchased the islands in 1978, but the company retained control of the production from the coconut trees. In 1984, residents voted in favor of annexation to Australia.

In the nineteenth century, the company brought in laborers from Malaysia to work the coconut trees. These were Muslims, primarily of the SHAFIITE SCHOOL. They constitute more than half of the present residents, approximately 650 people. The remainder of the population are primarily Australians, and the largest group are adherents either of the ANGLICAN CHURCH OF AUSTRALIA or the ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH. For Roman Catholics, a priest from the Archdiocese of Perth occasionally visits the islands to say Mass.

Sources:

Barrett, David. The Encyclopedia of World Christianity. 2d edition. New York: Oxford University Press, 2001.

Bissio, Roberto Remo, et al. Third World Guide 93/94.

Montevideo, Uruguay: Instituto del Tercer Mundo, 1992.

Hughes, John Scott. Kings of the Cocos: the Story of the Settlement on the Atoll of Keeling-Cocos in the Indian Ocean. London: Methuen, 1950.

Colombia

Like other South American countries, Colombia was originally inhabited by a variety of Native peoples, of which the Chichas, who inhabited the northern part of the region along the Caribbean Sea, were the first to encounter the European invaders in the sixteenth century. Today, some 450,000 Native peoples representing more than eighty ethnic groups have survived. Most inhabit the upper reaches of the Amazon. Gonzalo Jiménez de Quesada (1499–1579) led the Spanish forces that subdued Colombia in the 1540s and founded the city of Santa Fe de Bogotá in the country’s interior. The Colombian people, unwilling to fit into the Spanish plans for exploiting the land, were soon joined by many Africans brought in to work the plantations.

In 1718 the Viceroyalty of New Granada was organized with Venezuela, Panama, and Ecuador, and Colombia as its center. By the end of the century, Colombia had become a land struggling to leave its colonial life behind. Civil war waxed and waned for the decade prior to Simon Bolívar's marching on Bogotá in 1816. His victory led to the establishment of the Republic of Greater Colombia. Venezuela and Ecuador became independent countries in 1830, and the Republic of New Granada emerged. Colombia adopted its present name in 1886.

The changes of territorial boundaries and name were a sign of the general instability that plagued the country during the nineteenth and twentieth century. The 1960s saw the emergence of various private armies, including liberation movements and forces to protect the interests of the wealthy. The country has become well known for its underground economy, based on the sale of drugs. As recently as 1991, a new constitution that extended human rights guarantees and offered equality to women was adopted.

Especially in the more remote regions of the country, the Native groups have been able to resist the influx of Christianity and have kept their traditional religion. The Guajiros are the largest group. They and their fellow Colombians have been targeted by Evangelical Christians in recent decades.

The ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH entered Colombia with the Spanish, and the first diocese was established in 1534. The church grew steadily through the eighteenth century, but ran into trouble with the new government following independence. Independence cut the flow of money from Spain, and the new government had troubled relationships with the papacy. In 1853 church and state separated, and in 1861 the government appropriated all church property. It was not until 1887 that a new concordat was established with Rome. The period of the conflict between church and state provided the opening that allowed Protestantism to enter the country.

The Catholic Church was able to weather the stormy period of Colombian anticlericalism because of its hold on the hearts of the majority of the people. In the twentieth century it has emerged as the guardian of conservative values and the protector of the people against what are considered harmful ideas and practices, from pornography to communism. It has also, especially since the 1960s, become

Status of religions in Colombia, 2000-2050

Followers	2000			2025	2050
	total	%	rate
Christians	40,943,000	96.7	1.90	57,714,000	68,588,000
Roman Catholics	40,670,000	96.1	1.92	56,172,000	65,826,000
Protestants	1,100,000	2.6	4.04	2,500,000	3,500,000
Independents	535,000	1.3	2.33	900,000	1,400,000
Nonreligious	490,000	1.2	2.71	900,000	1,600,000
Spiritists	407,000	1.0	2.94	600,000	720,000
Ethnoreligionists	256,000	0.6	2.74	250,000	250,000
Atheists	85,000	0.2	2.56	105,000	130,000
Baha'is	64,800	0.2	3.04	100,000	150,000
Muslims	48,400	0.1	1.92	60,000	70,000
Jews	10,300	0.0	1.64	8,000	7,000
Hindus	10,200	0.0	2.51	12,500	20,000
Chinese folk-religionists	2,100	0.0	2.36	3,000	5,000
Buddhists	1,700	0.0	2.64	2,500	4,000
other religionists	2,900	0.0	3.11	3,500	6,000
Total population	42,321,000	100.0	1.93	59,758,000	71,550,000

an advocate for the liberation of people and the end to government and economic oppression. Colombia became a center of the more radical approaches of liberation theology (a Christian theology that attempts a positive appropriation of Marxism), which found strong support among priests working with the poorest elements of society. Not until 1973 was a priest ordained from among the Native peoples.

James Thompson (d. 1850), the agent of the British and Foreign Bible Society, who introduced Protestantism in several other South American countries, was also active in Colombia in 1825. However, it was not until 1856 that the first permanent missionary settled in the country, a representative of the Presbyterian Church in the U.S.A. (now a constituent part of the PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH [U.S.A.]).

It was the only Protestant church for many years, and it succeeded through its creation of a school system and the opening of medical facilities. However, it attracted relatively few members.

Evangelical Protestants entered Colombia in 1906 and 1908, respectively, in the form of the Evangelical Alliance Mission and the Gospel Missionary Union, two independent missionary organizations based in the United States. The CHRISTIAN AND MISSIONARY ALLIANCE opened a mission in 1923 and became the major disseminator of Protestant and Free Church literature in the country through the century. They were soon joined by the CUMBERLAND PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH, the SALVATION ARMY, and the SEVENTH-DAY ADVENTIST CHURCH.

The United Pentecostal Church, an Apostolic Pentecostal group, entered Colombia in 1936 and soon became the largest non-Catholic body in the country. However, in 1970 more than 90 percent of the members dropped their tie to the American international headquarters and created an independent United Pentecostal Church of Colombia.

The Protestant situation was markedly improved by the coming to power of the Liberal Party government in 1930, but suffered greatly during the civil war that divided the country in 1948–1952. The Gospel Missionary Union lost the majority of its church buildings, and many Protestant schools were closed. The situation has eased in the last generation, and the number of both Protestant adherents and groups have multiplied. Evangelicals have especially attempted to extend work among all the Native peoples.

An extension of the spectrum of religious life in Colombia was led by the JEHOVAH'S WITNESSES (1895) and the CHURCH OF JESUS CHRIST OF LATTER-DAY SAINTS (1967). However, since World War II, a much more diverse religious situation has developed, with the arrival of a small community of Chinese Buddhists and as many as 50,000 Muslims from the Middle East. The very diverse Jewish community, which numbered some 12,000 in the 1970s, had shrunk to around 10,000 by the end of the century, in part due to migration to Israel and elsewhere. The majority reside in Bogotá, where the Centro Comunitario Israelita de Bogotá is located. The BAHÁ'Í FAITH spread rapidly in the 1970s, a development partially occasioned by a mass movement into the group by some Gaujiro people. The Western esoteric tradition became visible with the emergence of the ANCIENT AND MYSTICAL ORDER ROSAE CRUCIS.

Colombia was among the first countries in Latin America to receive the new religions that spread across Europe and North America in the 1960s. Both the Divine Light Mission (now ELAN VITAL) and the INTERNATIONAL SOCIETY FOR KRISHNA CONSCIOUSNESS (ISKCON) enjoyed early success, and one of the larger groups to grow out of ISKCON, VRINDA, has its international headquarters in Bogotá.

Sources:

- Directorio nacional cristiano*. Bogotá: Dinal, issued annually.
- Eykel, McVanden. "A Comparative Study of the Political and Social Activism of New Religious Groups in Colombia." Ph.D. dissertation, George Washington University, Washington, DC, 1986.
- Flora, C. B. Pentecostalism in Columbia: Baptism by Fire and Spirit. Rutherford, NJ: Fairleigh Dickinson University, 1976.
- Levine, D. H. Religion and Politics in Latin America: The Catholic Church in Venezuela and Colombia. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1981.
- Worthington, A. E. "Goliath Meets David: Secularization and the Rise of Protestantism in Colombia." M.A. thesis, Vanderbilt University, Nashville, TN, 1995.

Communauté Évangélique d'Action Apostolique

See Paris Mission

Comoros

Officially known as the Federal Islamic Republic of the Comoros (République Fédérale et Islamique des Comoros), Comoros comprises an island group in the Indian Ocean north of Madagascar and off the coast of Mozambique. The islands were originally settled in the fifth century C.E. by Indonesians. They lived a rather isolated existence until they were joined by Muslims in the twelfth century. By the fourteenth century the Zandj culture of East Africa (and Islam) had been established. The Comoros remained a prosperous trading center, though briefly seized by the Portuguese in the sixteenth century. Through the centuries since the Portuguese first arrived, a number of Africans, mostly Bantu, came to the islands as workers.

The French occupied the island of Mayotte, a first step to taking control of the entire Comoros. They remained in control until 1975. Even before the results of the 1974 plebiscite, in which the overwhelming majority of the people voted for independence, were announced, the local government proclaimed independence. The French decided to

Status of religions in the Comoros, 2000-2050

Followers	2000			2025	2050
	total	%	rate
Muslims	581,000	98.1	2.81	970,000	1,206,000
Christians	7,200	1.2	4.13	14,800	20,800
Roman Catholics	5,800	1.0	4.23	11,600	16,000
Protestants	900	0.2	3.47	2,000	3,000
Independents	400	0.1	4.81	900	1,400
Ethnoreligionists	2,900	0.5	0.16	4,000	4,500
Nonreligious	760	0.1	6.61	800	1,500
Baha'is	520	0.1	1.70	800	1,500
Total population	593,000	100.0	2.81	990,000	1,234,000

Congo (Brazzaville), Republic of the separate Mayotte, on which they had air and naval bases, from the rest of the Comoros, and the status of that island remains in dispute.

Sunni Islam of the SHAFI-ITE SCHOOL dominates the life of the Comoros. There is a mosque for every 500 inhabitants.

Christianity was introduced by the Portuguese in 1517 and reintroduced by the French. There are, however, only a few thousand members in a population of more than half a million. The Africa Inland Mission, an Evangelical missionary organization, initiated work in 1975, but its missionaries were expelled by the government in 1978. In the same way, work begun by the SEVENTH-DAY ADVENTIST CHURCH was terminated.

Sources:

- Adihani, S. H. M. L'Islam aux Comores. Port Louis, Ile Maurice, Océan Indien: New Print, 1980.
- Ferrand, G. Les Musulmans à Madagascar et aux Iles Comores. 3 vols. Paris: E. Leroux, 1981–1902. Algiers Université Faculté des lettres Publications. Ser. 1, t. 9.
- Metz, Helen Chapin. Indian Ocean: Five Island Countries. Washington, DC: U.S. Government Printing Service, 1995.

Congo (Brazzaville), Republic of the

The present Republic of the Congo is located north of the Congo River (as opposed to the Democratic Republic of the Congo, formerly Zaire, located south and east of the river); it was originally settled by the San people (often referred to as Bushmen) and Pygmies, who were pushed aside by Bantu people, who easily came into control of the region in the first millennium C.E. By the fourteenth century there were a variety of Bantu states in central Africa, the Luango ruling over the Congo and much of neighboring Gabon. The Luango state was subservient to and paid tribute to the Manicongo state, centered farther south in what is now Angola and the Democratic Republic of the Congo.

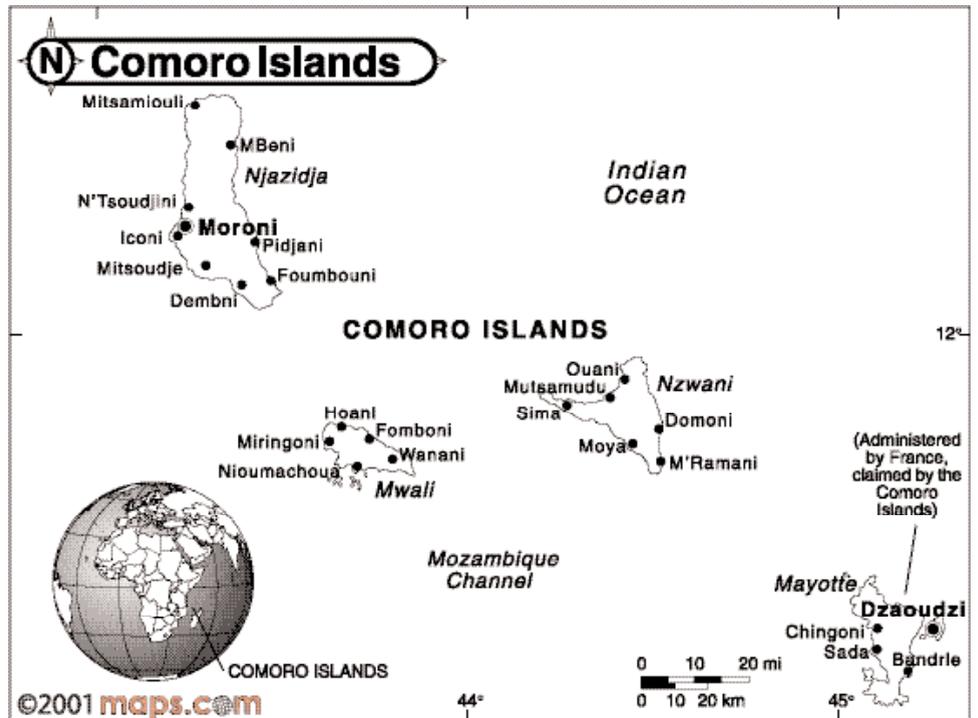

The Portuguese visited the Atlantic coast in the 1490s and early in the next century established a profitable slave trade. Meanwhile, in the sixteenth century, the Luango state rose in strength and became increasingly autonomous. Eventually it replaced the Manicongo as the dominant nation in the region. As the Portuguese worked to establish their power in Angola, the Luango resisted any attempt at colonization north of the Congo River, although they continued to cooperate with the slave traders.

Late in the nineteenth century, rubber and palm oil became the main export items from the Congo, and the French, desiring control of the market, moved in and set up a colony. Over the next generation, two-thirds of the Native population were killed in the attempt to pacify the country. The brutality of the French regime led to a series of religious independence movements in the decades prior to World War II.

After World War II, socialism came to the fore. Three years after independence (achieved in 1960), a socialist government came into power and created a single-party system. A series of governments have followed. In 1992, a new constitution was adopted that called for a president and a bicameral legislature. The new government was overthrown in 1997 by former Marxist ruler Denis Sassou Nguesso in a military coup. At the beginning of the new century, Nguesso remains president, and a democratic rule has not returned.

Christianity was introduced into the Congo in 1491, when a Portuguese missionary expedition began an attempt to reach the people of the Congo River valley. Although highly successful to the south, the mission had little success in the area of the present-day Republic of the Congo. However, with the coming of the French, the Holy Ghost Fathers launched a new mission in 1883, which was designated a vicariate in 1886. Work was extended to the upper Congo in 1889, and a second vicariate erected the following year. The first Congolese priest was ordained in 1895. The church experienced a period of growth in the years after World War II, and in 1955 the Archdiocese of Brazzaville was created. The first Congolese bishop was consecrated in 1961. The ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH, with almost a million and a half members, is now the largest church in the country.

In 1909, the Swedish Evangelical Mission (of the MISSION COVENANT CHURCH OF SWEDEN) expanded their work from the Belgian Congo (now the Democratic Republic of the Congo) northward. The church grew in spurts over the next decades; its membership fluctuated, first with the growth of the independent church founded by Simon Kimbangu (1889–1951) and then influenced by a popular movement into the SALVATION ARMY, which had arrived in 1935. The KIMBANGUIST CHURCH, from neighboring Belgian territory, has been one of the most successful of the AFRICAN INITIATED CHURCHES in the region and was the first to be admitted to the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES (WCC). The Salvation Army in the Congo developed a strong emphasis on congregation building, which gave it an early leadership position in the Protestant community. The EVANGELICAL CHURCH OF THE CONGO, created in 1961 when the Swedish mission became autonomous, is the only Congo-based church in the WCC.

Beginning in the late twentieth century, Pentecostalism has attracted a large following. The ASSEMBLIES OF GOD began work in the 1960s, but have been eclipsed by the independent Église Charismatique de Brazzaville and Assemblées du Dieu de Pentecost. There are several interesting new church groups, such as the Movement Crois-Koma (founded by former Roman Catholics) and the Église Matsouaniste, a messianic political movement founded in the 1930s. There is also a fairly large Eastern Orthodox community under the GREEK ORTHODOX PATRIARCHATE OF ALEXANDRIA AND ALL AFRICA.

The traditional religions of the several native peoples of the Congo have almost disappeared, with over 90 percent of the population professing Christianity. The Bakwili and Ngwilli have been most loyal to their traditional religious life. More evident is the admixture of traditional elements of belief and practice in the life of professing Christians.

Status of religions in Congo-Brazzaville, 2000-2050

Followers	2000			2025	2050
	total	%	rate
Christians	2,683,000	91.1	2.85	5,160,000	7,668,000
Roman Catholics	1,451,000	49.3	3.00	3,000,000	4,700,000
Protestants	500,000	17.0	3.25	1,050,000	1,650,000
Independents	370,000	12.6	3.39	800,000	900,000
Ethnoreligionists	142,000	4.8	2.23	188,000	189,000
Nonreligious	58,700	2.0	3.91	186,000	450,000
Muslims	37,100	1.3	4.02	95,000	160,000
Baha'is	12,900	0.4	3.69	40,000	100,000
Neoreligionists	4,700	0.2	6.51	10,000	15,000
Atheists	2,200	0.1	3.39	4,000	7,000
Chinese folk-religionists	210	0.0	1.94	400	800
Buddhists	130	0.0	2.42	250	500
other religionists	2,700	0.1	5.44	5,000	7,000
Total population	2,943,000	100.0	2.86	5,689,000	8,597,000

A Bantu-based religion had been alive in most of the Congo's peoples. It professed a belief in an all-powerful creator deity (Nzama or Nzambi) who is manifest in two aspects, the beneficent and the malevolent, God's nature explaining the alternating aspects of human experience. Integral to the worldview are the spirits of the ancestors, who are divided into those who reside in the abode of the dead and wandering spirits (Bakuyu) who have not been admitted to their proper home in the spirit world, and who thus wander around the countryside causing all manner of mischief. The Christian traditionalist movement known as Nzambi ya Bougie (God of the Candle), begun by prophet Zepherin Lassy in 1953, once claimed 8.7 percent of the population of the Congo, though it has declined significantly in more recent years.

Islam has yet to make a significant impact in the Congo, though there is a small community, primarily of followers of the Sunni MALIKITE school who reside in the Congo as expatriates. They have been organized under the Muslim Committee of the Congo. The Congo has become one of the few places in Africa that host one of the Japanese new religions. In 1966, TENRIKYO, a Shinto-based new religion, founded a center in Brazzaville and today has several hundred followers. It supports a dispensary as part of its larger emphasis upon health.

In the fluctuating political climate of the Congo, the churches have been in a somewhat precarious position. In 1965, for example, the government nationalized all of the schools that had been founded by the Catholic Church, the Salvation Army, and the Evangelical Church (except for several professional training schools). More than half of the primary school pupils in the country attended these schools. In 1978, the government banned all but seven religious bodies (the Roman Catholic Church, the Evangelical Church, the Salvation Army, the Muslim Committee, the Kimbanguist Church, the Nzambi ya Bougie, and TENRIKYO). All religious youth organizations were banned, and all religious instruction to the young forbidden. Groups such as the BAHÁ'Í FAITH, the SEVENTH-DAY ADVENTIST CHURCH, and the JEHOVAH'S WITNESSES were particularly affected by this ruling. The religious situation has changed for the better since the adoption of a new constitution in 1992 that guarantees religious freedom.

The Ecumenical Council of Christian Churches of Congo (which includes the Salvation Army, the Evangelical Church, and the Kimbanguist Church) is affiliated with the World Council of Churches.

Sources:

Anderson, E. Churches at the Grass-Roots: A Study in Congo-Brazzaville. London: Lutterworth, 1968.

MacGaffey, Wyatt. Modern Kongo Prophets: Religion in a Plural Society. Bloomington: University of Indiana Press, 1983.

Congo (Zaire), Democratic Republic of the

The Democratic Republic of the Congo is a large country in West Central Africa that brings together the traditional lands of more than 200 ethnic and language groups who lived along the Congo River and its tributaries. Most of these peoples are of Bantu origin, though there are other important groups such as the Nilo-Hamites in the far eastern part. During the modern era, a variety of Bantu kingdoms had come and gone.

The history of the region had a new beginning in the 1840s when Scottish missionary and doctor David Livingstone (1813–1873) began to make Europeans aware of its existence. Then in 1876 King Leopold of Belgium financed the explorations of Henry M. Stanley (1841–1904). While in the area he signed hundreds of trade agreements with African leaders. Subsequently, Belgium established trading posts along the mouth of the river, and the king began to treat the Congo Basin as his personal property. In 1897 it became a Belgian colony, and troops of the Belgian Army arrived to prevent any opposition, especially in the area of a prosperous copper mining operation in the province of Katanga.

Belgium liberalized its policies in 1957, and three years later the Belgian Congo became an independent nation. A period of civil war and political instability followed until 1965, when Sese Seko Mobutu (1930–1997) came to power in an Army coup. He changed the name of the country to Zaire and his own name to Mobutu Sese Seko. Mobutu ruled as a dictator, and the government became increasingly corrupt and repressive. Through the 1980s, opposition grew, and Mobutu responded with more repressive measures. He was finally overthrown in 1997 by Laurent Kabila (b. c. 1940), who changed the name of the country to the Democratic Republic of the Congo. However, hopes for a new democratic government have not been realized. A rebel army opposed to the Kabila regime still holds part of the country in the east, near the border of Uganda and Rwanda.

A variety of traditional religions remain strong in the Congo, especially in the more rural areas. As Christianity entered and European rule was imposed, traditionalists responded with a variety of new movements that promoted religion but decried the practice of malevolent magic (i.e., witchcraft). The first such movement, called Kiyoka (or Burning), swept through the southern part of the country along the Angola border in the late nineteenth century. Similar movements have appeared sporadically throughout the twentieth century. Also, new traditionalist movements emphasizing spirit possession have arisen.

The ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH was the original Christian church introduced into the Congo. In 1482 a Portuguese explorer discovered the Congo River, and in 1491 a number of priests came, mostly DOMINICANS, FRANCISCANS, and Canons of St. John. They made their way to the king of the nation of M'banza Congo, whose capital was in what is today northern Angola. He was eventually baptized, and a large stone church was constructed. Afonso I (r. 1506–1545) came to the throne in 1506. He sent his son to Europe for education, and the son was ordained and became the first modern African bishop. The capital, now renamed San Salvador, became the headquarters for the church in the region.

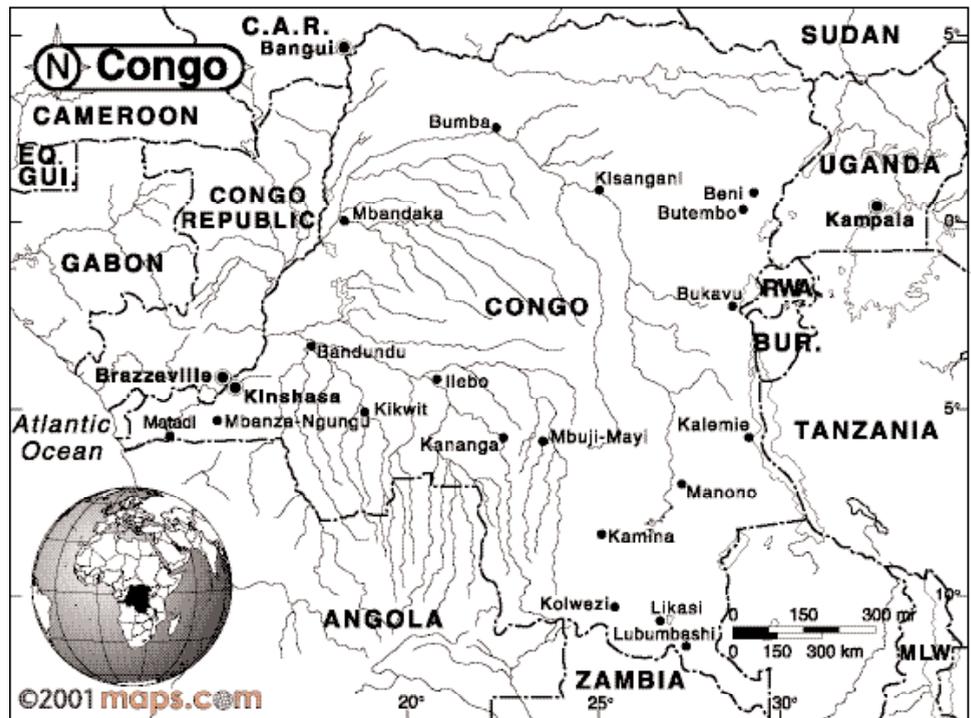

The Roman Catholics suffered as the slave trade grew, and only a remnant was left when a new wave of Catholic missionaries arrived in 1865. Their work was supported by the Belgian king, who assigned missionaries (both Catholic and Protestant) to specific areas, granted land, and gave concessions for education and medical work. Leopold II (1835–1909) negotiated an agreement with the Vatican that limited Roman missionaries to Belgian nationals and those orders headquartered in Belgium. In the 1950s, the church finally began official opposition to the injustices it saw perpetrated by the government, and in 1956 it published a long list of grievances. Siding with the laboring classes cost the church support among the elite, and during the period of civil war and instability in the 1960–1965 period, more than two hundred Catholic priests and religious were killed. In spite of Mobutu's attempts to subvert the church, it retained popular support and today counts approximately half of the population as adherents.

British Baptists took the lead among Protestants for Zaire. Beginning in 1878 they built mission stations along the Congo River. They were soon joined by American Baptists, who worked along the Lower Congo River. Presbyterians from the Presbyterian Church in the U.S.A. (the main Presbyterian body in the southern United States, now an integral part of the PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH [U.S.A.]) arrived in 1891 and centered their work along the Kasai River, with headquarters at Kananga. The CHRISTIAN CHURCH (DISCIPLES OF CHRIST) came just before the turn of the century and took control of a former Baptist station at Bolenge. The CHURCH OF ENGLAND did not have the presence in the Congo that it had in British-controlled areas, but the work initiated by the Anglican CHURCH MISSIONARY SOCIETY in 1895 has grown into the CHURCH OF CHRIST IN THE CONGO—PROVINCE OF THE ANGLICAN CHURCH OF THE CONGO.

Newly appointed missionary bishop William Taylor (1821–1902) surveyed the Congo River in 1885, which led to the Methodist Episcopal Church establishing several stations along the river between the ocean and Kinshasa. However, much of this work died out as missionaries succumbed to the land's climate and rigors. In 1911 a couple previously assigned to Rhodesia, Helen and John Rasmussen, pioneered a mission at Lukoshi in the Lunda country (north of the Zambian border). The Methodist mission did not really take off, however, until the Congo Mission was organized in 1915 and eventually grew to become the South Congo Annual Conference.

Meanwhile, the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, established work in the Kasai and Kivi provinces, which in-

Status of religions in Congo-Zaire, 2000–2050

Followers	2000			2025	2050
	total	%	rate
Christians	49,256,000	95.4	3.36	100,936,000	154,855,000
Roman Catholics	26,300,000	50.9	3.44	55,000,000	88,000,000
Independents	12,050,000	23.3	3.41	27,000,000	45,000,000
Protestants	10,485,000	20.3	3.03	18,862,000	27,000,000
Ethnoreligionists	1,261,000	2.4	0.93	1,500,000	1,000,000
Muslims	569,000	1.1	2.72	900,000	1,300,000
Nonreligious	226,000	0.4	5.29	750,000	2,000,000
Baha'is	225,000	0.4	2.82	450,000	700,000
Hindus	93,000	0.2	3.81	200,000	400,000
Atheists	16,400	0.0	4.05	35,000	70,000
Buddhists	3,300	0.0	4.77	7,000	15,000
Jews	460	0.0	0.98	300	300
other religionists	5,000	0.0	5.28	10,000	20,000
Total population	51,654,000	100.0	3.29	104,788,000	160,360,000

cluded the land of the large Otatela people. In 1939 the two Methodist churches in the United States merged, and in 1964 the two Congo conferences received their first African bishop, Wesley Shingu. They continue as part of the UNITED METHODIST CHURCH formed in 1968.

The independent African Inland Mission began their large and important work in 1912. Their first station was at Kasengu, from which they moved inland and built a considerable following throughout the northeast part of the country between the Congo River and Uganda. This church is a sister to the AFRICA INLAND CHURCH in Kenya.

Pentecostals penetrated the country in 1915, the first coming from Great Britain and supported by the Congo Evangelistic Mission. The ASSEMBLIES OF GOD IN GREAT BRITAIN AND IRELAND opened work three years later, and the ASSEMBLIES OF GOD from the United States, which had only formed in 1914, sent people to the Congo in one of its first missionary enterprises.

The large country attracted a number of Protestant and FREE CHURCH groups through the twentieth century, among the larger churches being those developed by the CHRISTIAN BROTHERS, the MENNONITES (through the Congo Inland Mission), and the SEVENTH-DAY ADVENTIST CHURCH. Equally important, a number of indigenous churches developed, beginning with the KIMBANGUIST CHURCH, by far the largest independent church in Zaire, and the second largest Christian body in the country. The church began with the preaching activity of Simon Kimbangu in 1921. The success of his work led the Belgian authorities to arrest him. He spent the last part of his life in prison, but his church persisted, spread across the Congo and throughout central Africa, and became the first indigenous African church welcomed into the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES.

In the half century after Kimbangu launched his work, more than 500 independent denominations appeared, and that number has continued to grow, both from schisms of the larger mission churches and from the influx of AFRICAN INITIATED CHURCHES found in neighboring countries. Among the latter are the AFRICAN APOSTOLIC CHURCH OF JOHANE MARANGE, the LEGION OF MARY, and the Église Lumpa. Many of the newer indigenous churches have developed unique approaches to Christianity or have blended Christianity with elements of traditional religions in such a manner as to distance them from the older mission churches.

In 1970, five years after Mobutu took control, the government demanded that all of the Protestant churches unite into the Église du Christ au Zaire (now the Église du Christ au Congo, or Church of Christ in the Congo). This body succeeded the former Congo Protestant Council (founded in 1924), but came to be an association including churches of the most diverse theological perspectives. Eight churches that attempted to withdraw and found an alternate body in 1971 were refused recognition by the government and had to return to the state-mandated church. In addition to the Protestant church, the government recognized three other bodies: the Roman Catholic Church, the Church of Christ on Earth through the prophet Simon Kimbangu, and the Greek Orthodox Church (a branch of the GREEK ORTHODOX PATRIARCHATE OF ALEXANDRIA AND ALL AFRICA, which has been present in the country since 1958).

Churches that joined the Church of Christ in the Congo became known as communities. Those church bodies that affiliated with the new church added the name to their former name. Thus the former Church of Light became the CHURCH OF CHRIST IN THE CONGO—COMMUNITY OF LIGHT. In many ways they continued to operate as distinct denominations within the new structure. Several of the groups are members of the World Council of Churches and other ecumenical bodies. Churches that did not join the Church of Christ in the Congo were not granted government recognition and either went out of business or operated unofficially. Many groups, including the JEHOVAH'S WITNESSES, have operated apart from official recognition. Many have survived because of the government's lack of resources to enforce the law. The government stopped attempts to build an Evangelical alliance that would have been affiliated with the WORLD EVANGELICAL ALLIANCE and an attempt to form an association of independent AFRICAN INITIATED CHURCHES.

The Congo, because of the unrest there, has not been a magnet drawing new or Eastern religions. However, two European new religions have established work in Kinshasa, the GRAIL MOVEMENT and UNIVERSAL LIFE. During the Belgian years, there was a Jewish community that grew to some 2,500 members, most residing at Lubumbashi. Since 1960, however, most have left the country. Of the 460 that remain, 300 live in Kinshasa and remain in contact with the chief rabbi in Brussels, Belgium.

Islam is present; missionaries arrived in the northern part of the country in the nineteenth century. Most are found in the northeast, where the Congo shares a border with the Sudan. Most Muslims are of the Sunni SHAFIITE SCHOOL, but there is a small community of Indian and Pakistani expatriates who are Ismailis. Two Sufi Brotherhoods, the TIANIYYA and the QADIRIYYA, are also present among the estimated 200,000 Muslims. Several movements that include roots in Islam as also present, including the AHMADIYYA MOVEMENT IN ISLAM, SUBUD, and the BAHÁ'Í FAITH. IN 1963 there was a mass movement that brought 20,000 Congolese into the Baha'i movement.

Sources:

- Braekman, E. M. Histoire du Protestantisme au Congo. Brussels: Eclaireurs Unionistes, 1961.
- Niklaus, R. L. "Zaire's Super-Church." Christianity Today 16, 14 (1972): 4–10.
- Slade, R. M. English-Speaking Missions in the Congo Independent State. Brussels: Duculot, 1959.

Congregational Christian Church in Samoa

The Congregational Christian Church in Samoa dates to the arrival of a team of Tahitian and Cook Islander Christian teachers and British missionary John Williams (1796–1839) in Samoa in 1830. Williams, a representative of the LONDON MISSIONARY SOCIETY (LMS), stationed the members of the team throughout the archipelago and then left the work in their care. Their work grew slowly for the first five years, and only some 2,000 were converted. However, by the end of the decade the overwhelming majority of the population had become Christians. In the meantime, the officials from the Methodist church and the LMS met in Tonga and agreed to divide labors in the South Pacific in order to avoid competition. Work in Samoa was to be assumed by the LMS.

At the time of this decision, the Methodists had a thriving work led by a European, Peter Turner (d. 1873). He withdrew, but most members of the Methodist movement refused to join the LMS mission and continued to operate as a Methodist church apart from the work on the other islands. However, the Methodist work stopped growing, while the LMS work spread throughout the whole archipelago. It remained a single mission even after the eastern islands were set apart as American Samoa in 1899.

The Samoan mission remained under the guidance of the LMS until 1962, the same year that Samoa became an independent nation. That year the mission was reorganized on a congregational model as the Congregational Christian Church in Samoa. Shortly after it became autonomous, it was accepted as a member of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES. In 1980 the churches in American Samoa separated as the Church of Tutuila and Manua (now the CONGREGATIONAL CHRISTIAN CHURCH OF AMERICAN SAMOA). Efforts to reunite the two bodies have been unsuccessful to date.

With some 70,000 members, the Congregational Christian Church in Samoa is the largest religious body in Samoa, and the leading member of the Samoa Council of Churches.

Address:

Congregational Christian Church in Samoa
Box 486
Apai
Samoa

Sources:

- Bauswein, Jean-Jacques, and Lukas Vischer, eds. The Reformed Family Worldwide: A Survey of Reformed Churches, Theological Schools, and International Organizations. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans, 1999.
- Sopoaga, E. M. "The Church in the New Testament as the Basis of the Church Today: With Special Reference to the Congregational Christian Church in American Samoa." B.D. thesis, Pacific Theological College, 1986.

Congregational Christian Church of American Samoa

The Congregational Christian Church of American Samoa shares a history with the CONGREGATIONAL CHRISTIAN CHURCH IN SAMOA until 1980. At that time American Samoa had existed as a distinct entity for more than eight decades, during which time Samoa had become an independent country (1962). In 1980 the congregational churches of American Samoa voted to become independent and reorganized as the Church of Tutuila and Manua. It soon assumed its present name. The new church remains similar to the parent body, as there were no theological or polity issues in the division. In the 1990s the two churches pursued attempts to reunite, but were unsuccessful.

The Congregational Christian Church is the largest religious body in American Samoa, with approximately 50 percent of the population related to it. It is a member of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES.

Address:

Congregational Christian Church of American Samoa
P.O. Box 1537
Pago Pago
American Samoa

Sources:

- Bauswein, Jean-Jacques, and Lukas Vischer, eds. The Reformed Family Worldwide: A Survey of Reformed Churches, Theological Schools, and International Organizations. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans, 1999.
- Sopoaga, E. M. "The Church in the New Testament as the Basis of the Church Today: With Special Reference to the Congregational Christian Church in American Samoa." B.D. thesis, Pacific Theological College, 1986.
- Van der Bent, Ans J., ed. Handbook/Member Churches/World Council of Churches. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 1985.

Congregationalism

The Congregationalists emerged in the seventeenth century as one branch of the Puritan movement, that movement that wished to further purify the Church of England, then based in the Anglican tradition as it had emerged during the reign of Queen Elizabeth I (1558–1603). The Anglican tradition drew upon both the Roman Catholic tradition (especially in maintaining an episcopal hierarchy) and continental Protestant traditions (in the latter case, primarily on the Reformed tradition as developed in Switzerland by John Calvin).

It was the desire of many Puritans that the Church of England become a Protestant church in the Reformed tradition. In addition, the Congregationalists believed that the local congregations of the church should operate administratively as autonomous units, though they should keep their intimate connection with the state and maintain fellowship with each other through geographically based associations. They differed from the Presbyterians (who wanted to establish the leadership of lay and clergy elders, or presbyters, and not allow independence to local congregations) and the Baptists (who wished to end the church's connection to the government).

Congregationalism was first established in the American colonies, especially Massachusetts, and then later developed in the British Isles after the failure of the Presbyterians to retain their favored place following the restoration of the monarchy in 1660. American Congregationalists experienced several mergers in the twentieth century, which led to the formation of the UNITED CHURCH OF CHRIST. The main branch of British Congregationalists merged into the UNITED REFORMED CHURCH, though several groups such as the Scottish Congregational Church and the UNION OF WELSH INDEPENDENTS still exist.

Congregationalists became an important part of the massive Protestant missionary movement through their two missionary organizations, the AMERICAN BOARD OF COMMISSIONERS FOR FOREIGN MISSIONS and the LONDON MISSIONARY SOCIETY. The work of their missionaries led to the formation of Congregational churches around the world, many of which are now tied together through the Council on World Missions. Most Congregational churches have joined the WORLD ALLIANCE OF REFORMED CHURCHES, reflecting the Reformed theological heritage they share with Presbyterians and other Reformed churches. Some of the more conservative Congregational churches have formed the INTERNATIONAL CONGREGATIONAL FELLOWSHIP.

Sources:

Bauswein, Jean-Jacques, and Lukas Vischer, eds. The Reformed Family Worldwide: A Survey of Reformed Churches, Theological Schools, and International Organizations. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans, 1999.

Von Rohr, John. The Shaping of American Congregationalism, 1620–1957. New York: Pilgrim Press, 1994.

Walker, Williston, ed. Creeds and Platforms of Congregationalism. New York: Pilgrim Press, 1991.

Conservative Judaism

Conservative Judaism arose in the nineteenth century in Germany as a mediating position between traditional ORTHODOX JUDAISM and the more radical program of REFORM JUDAISM. It resembled Reform in that it espoused a more positive attitude toward modern culture and accepted the critical secular scholarship that had transformed the understanding of the historicity of the texts of the Jewish Bible (especially the Torah, the five books traditionally believed to have been written by Moses). However, it was committed to the observance of Jewish law and ceremony.

Largely in reaction to the growth of Reform Judaism in America, Rabbis Sabato Morais, Marcus Jastrow, and Henry Pereira Mendes took the lead in founding the Jewish Theological Seminary as a more traditional school, but found little support until 1902, when they invited Rabbi Solomon Schechter (1848–1915), then a lecturer at Cambridge University, to become the school’s president. He gathered a strong faculty and made it the center for the Conservative, or Historicist (the German name), movement.

After Schechter succeeded in attracting an outstanding group of scholars to teach, the Jewish Theological Seminary became a recognized center of Jewish learning. As a staunch traditionalist, Schechter attacked the problem of change in response to modernity. Changes could not be introduced arbitrarily or deliberately. He suggested that change has been a constant in Jewish practice and articulated a principle by which further change could occur, namely, that decisions on Jewish law can be made by reference to the practices of the whole of the observant Jewish community. Schechter’s approach to legal decisions necessitated changes in what is termed the Halachic process (the system of legal reasoning and interpretation) as regards the Torah. The changes in the Halachic process constitute the primary distinction between Conservative and Orthodox Judaism.

In 1913 Solomon Schechter took the lead in founding the United Synagogue of America (now the United Synagogue of Conservative Judaism) as an association for Conservative synagogues. Cyrus Adler (1863–1940) became the first president of the United Synagogue and in 1915 succeeded Schechter as head of the seminary.

Through the twentieth century, Conservative Judaism spread across the United States and at the beginning of the new century reported some 800 synagogues and 1.5 million members. Rabbis associate professionally in the Rabbinical Assembly. It has found some response in Europe, the Conservative position having originally been developed in Germany in the middle of the nineteenth century by Rabbi Zacharias Frankel (1805–1875). There it is usually called Masorti, except in Hungary where the term Neolog is used. The Neolog movement originated independently of Conservative Judaism in the rest of Europe but took its inspiration from Frankel. The European and North American phase of the movement have come together in the World Council of Conservative/Masorti Synagogues, recently renamed Masorti Olami.

Conservative congregations became an important part of the faith community in Israel in the 1970s, though the first Israeli Conservative synagogue, Congregation Emet Ve’emuna, dates to 1936. Conservative Judaism began in a community of German Jews who were students of Frankel’s historicist position. As the number multiplied, a United Synagogue of Israel was organized to provide them with some associated structure and rabbis affiliated in a Rabbinical Assembly. These two structures merged in 1979 to form the Masorti Movement in Israel, which is also a part of Masorti Olami.

The headquarters of the United Synagogue of Conservative Judaism is in New York. An integral part of the United Synagogue is MERCAZ USA, the American Zionist Organization for the Conservative Movement. It nurtures Zionism within U.S. Conservative Jewry, and represents its interests in both the World Zionist Organization and the Jewish Agency for Israel. The Association of European Masorti Communities includes congregations in France, Germany, Spain, and Sweden; in the United Kingdom, the Assembly of Masorti Synagogues is headquartered at 1097 Finchley Rd., London, NW11 0PU. The Assembly's Internet site is at <http://www.masorti.org.uk>. The Masorti Movement in Israel may be contacted at P.O. Box 7559 Jerusalem 91074, Israel. Its Internet site is at <http://www.masorti.org/mason/index.asp>. In 2001 it reported some 50 affiliated congregations. There are several Conservative synagogues in various Latin American countries, including Mexico, Brazil, and Argentina.

Address:

United Synagogue of Conservative Judaism
155 Fifth Ave.
New York, NY 10010
<http://www.uscj.org>

Sources:

David, Moshe. The Emergence of Conservative Judaism. Philadelphia: Jewish Publication Society of America, 1963.
Karp, Abraham J. A History of the United Synagogue of America, 1913–1963. New York: United Synagogue of America, 1964.
Schechter, Solomon. Studies in Judaism. Philadelphia: Jewish Publication Society of America, 1938.
Sklare, Marshal. Conservative Judaism. Glencoe, IL: Free Press, 1955.

Convention Baptiste de' Haiti

Baptist work in Haiti can be traced to 1823, when the Massachusetts Baptist Missionary Society, one of the older Baptist state conventions in the United States, sent Thomas Paul to the island nation. He preached and distributed Bibles, but after six months returned to Massachusetts. It was not until 1853 that the Triennial Convention (now an integral part of the AMERICAN BAPTIST CHURCHES IN THE U.S.A.) sent an African American preacher, William C. Monroe, to Port-au-Prince. He formed the first church, but also decided in 1837 to return to the United States.

More permanent work began with the American Baptist Free Mission Society, an abolitionist organization that had arisen in the context of the slavery debates among American Baptists, debates that eventually split them into two factions. The society sent William M. Jones, who arrived in Port-au-Prince in January 1845. He was soon joined by William L. Judd and his wife, and in 1890 they were succeeded by one of their converts, Lucius Hippolite. During this period, British and Jamaican Baptists had also worked on creating a mission. The Jamaican work centered on the town of Jacmel, and then spread to St. Marc and Cap Haitien.

Following World War I, in 1923, the American Baptist Home Mission Society sent A. Garves Wood to Haiti. He was able to find more than a thousand Baptists in the country. He gained the support of two pastors he located, Elie Marc and Nosirel L'Herrison. Traveling around the country, he trained Haitian pastors and created a national movement. Real growth came after World War II, signaled by the establishment of a seminary (1947), a hospital (1953), and an eye clinic (1989).

The Convention Baptiste de' Haiti was founded in 1964. It currently supports more than eighty-five schools. It has taken the lead in training people in modern agricultural techniques and in creating safe drinking water in rural communities.

In the 1990s the convention reported 83,000 members in 104 churches. It is a member of the BAPTIST WORLD ALLIANCE. It maintains a close working relationship with the Board of International Ministries of the American Baptist churches.

Even though the Convention Baptiste de' Haiti is the largest Baptist group in Haiti, it is by no means the only one. Several Baptist groups from the United States have begun missions, and a sending agency then known as Worldteam, now World Team, found their motivation to enter Haiti from converts in Cuba in the 1930s. The World Team effort, now known as the Evangelical Baptist Mission of South Haiti, has some 60,000 adherents.

Address:

Convention Baptiste de' Haiti
Angle Rue 15 et Rue de Quai
Cap Haitien, P.O. Box 2101
Haiti

Sources:

Russell, Horace O. The Baptist Witness. El Paso, TX: Carib Baptist Publications, 1983.
Wardin, Albert W., ed. Baptists around the World. Nashville, TN: Broadman and Holman Publishers, 1995.

Convention of Philippine Baptist Churches

Baptists affiliated with the American Baptist Missionary Union (ABMU) (now a constituent part of the AMERICAN BAPTIST CHURCHES IN THE U.S.A.) entered the Philippines immediately after the Spanish-American War opened the country to non-Catholic work. Eric Lund (1852–1933), a Swede who had worked with the ABMU in Spain, and Braulio Manikan, a Philippine national, opened a mission in Jaro on the island of Panay. It became the first Baptist church in the Philippines the next year. Lund, an accomplished linguist, soon translated the Bible into the local language, the Panayan dialect of Visayan. In 1905, the church organized a school, which later grew to become the Central Philippines University.

The educational work of the church expanded during the first decade, and membership expanded through the central Philippines. In 1935, the Convention of Philippine Baptist Churches was founded. All the work came to a sudden halt when the Japanese invaded the islands during World War II. Much of the convention's property was destroyed and many of the leaders interned. In December 1943, the Japanese executed twelve of the missionary personnel discovered hiding on Panay.

After the war, the work revived, and in the 1950s the convention entered a growth phase. In 1969, the convention launched its own foreign mission program and has subsequently sponsored missionaries in Indonesia, Japan, Laos, Thailand, Germany, and the United States. The expansion of the missionary effort led to the organization of a Commission on Overseas Mission and Evangelism. The missionary thrust is done in cooperation with the Board of International Ministries of the American Baptist Churches and the Australian Baptist Missionary Society, with which the convention has a close working relationship.

The convention was invited to join the merger that led to the formation of the United Church of Christ in the Philippines, but declined. It did however join the National Council of Churches in the Philippines, the only one of the several Philippine Baptist groups affiliated with the council. The convention is also a member of the BAPTIST WORLD ALLIANCE.

In the mid-1990s the convention reported 89,000 members in 677 churches.

Address:

Convention of Philippine Baptist Churches
P.O. Box 263
Iloilo City, 5000
Philippines

Source:

Wardin, Albert W., ed. Baptists around the World. Nashville, TN: Broadman and Holman Publishers, 1995.

Cook Islands

The Cook Islands consist of a set of islands settled by Polynesians in the prehistoric past. Most of the population are Maori and share a natural kinship with the original inhabitants of New Zealand. European knowledge of the islands began in 1779, following the visit of British explorer Captain James Cook (1728–1779). Missionaries from the LONDON MISSIONARY SOCIETY (an interdenominational organization, but primarily based in CONGREGATIONALISM) arrived in 1823. Over the next half century the mission campaigned against the indigenous faith and virtually eradicated it. Organized as the COOK ISLANDS CHRISTIAN CHURCH, it was unopposed until the end of the century

Status of religions in the Cook Islands, 2000-2050

Followers	2000			2025	2050
	total	%	rate
Christians	19,100	97.8	0.61	22,800	26,500
Protestants	14,200	72.7	0.43	16,200	18,500
Roman Catholics	3,600	18.7	1.32	4,800	6,400
Marginal Christians	1,600	8.5	2.03	2,200	2,300
Nonreligious	270	1.4	2.66	600	1,100
Baha'is	160	0.8	2.16	350	700
Total population	19,500	100.0	0.63	23,700	28,300

and beginning in the 1870s began to send missionaries to other islands, especially Papua.

The islands became a British protectorate, and the country was incorporated as part of New Zealand in 1901. For a few years it was administered jointly with Niue, but that administration was divided in 1904. In the 1890s two new Christian groups arrived, the SEVENTH-DAY ADVENTIST CHURCH (1892) and the ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH (1894). The SDA Cook Islands Mission was formally organized in 1923 and exists today as part of the Central Union Pacific Mission. Roman Catholics established a prefecture in 1922. A bishop resides on Rarotonga, the largest of the islands, and serves as suffragan to the archbishop of Suva (Fiji Islands). Pentecostalism was introduced in 1963 by representatives of the ASSEMBLIES OF GOD.

There is only one indigenous church in the islands, the Amuri Free Church, founded at the beginning of the 1940s by former members of the Cook Islands Christian Church. It remains small. There is also a small Anglican community, consisting primarily of expatriates and existing as part of the Church of the Province of New Zealand. There is no formal ecumenical structure on the Cook Islands, but the Cook Islands Christian Church is a member of the National Council of Churches in New Zealand.

The overwhelming majority of the Cook Islanders are members of one of the more traditional Christian churches. In 1952, however, the CHURCH OF JESUS CHRIST OF LATTER-DAY SAINTS launched an aggressive mission and has now become the second largest church in the islands. There is also a small community of the BAHAI FAITH.

In a plebiscite in 1965, the Cook Islands voted against independence, and the country continues as a New Zealand dependency.

Sources:

- Barrett, David. The Encyclopedia of World Christianity. 2d edition. New York: Oxford University Press, 2001.
- Bissio, Roberto Remo, et al. Third World Guide 93/94. Montevideo, Uruguay: Instituto del Tercer Mundo, 1992.
- Makirere, T. "Worship in the Culture and Church of the Cook Islands, with Special Reference to the Needs of the Cook Islands Christian Church Today." B.D. thesis, Pacific Theological College, 1971.
- Maratu. Cannibals and Converts: Radical Change in the Cook Islands. Translated and edited by M. T. Crocombe. Suva, Fiji:

Institute of Pacific Studies, University of the South Pacific, 1983.

Cook Islands Christian Church

The Cook Islands Christian Church owes its beginning to the South Pacific work of the LONDON MISSIONARY SOCIETY (LMS) and the efforts of its famous pioneer missionary John Williams (1796–1839). Williams had advanced the use of native workers and in 1821 facilitated the arrival in the Cook Islands of Papeiha, a Tahitian Christian. Papeiha began work on Aitutaki with successful results. Williams and his associated missionaries pursued Bible translation (completed in 1890). Meanwhile the LMS established the Tacamoa Theological College at Rarotonga (the capital of the Cook Islands). Graduates not only served in the Cook Islands but became missionaries in various island nations across the Pacific.

The LMS mission became an independent church in 1963. Through the twentieth century, the mission (like the Cook Islands as a whole) had developed a strong relationship with the LMS-related churches in New Zealand, and there are two congregations of the church in New Zealand. The church was especially affected by the 1970 merger of some of the churches of the Congregational Union of New Zealand into the PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH OF AOTEAROA NEW ZEALAND. The Cook Island mission adopted a presbyterian form of church government.

Festivals form an important part of the celebrative life of the church. October 26 is Gospel Day, a public holiday in the islands commemorating the coming of Christianity to the islands.

In the 1990s the church reported 11,000 members out of a population of approximately 20,000. It sponsors both a radio and a television show. It is a member of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES.

Address:

Cook Islands Christian Church
Box 780
Rarotonga
Cook Islands

Sources:

- Bauswein, Jean-Jacques, and Lukas Vischer, eds. The Reformed Family Worldwide: A Survey of Reformed Churches, Theological Schools, and International Organizations. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans, 1999.
- Makirere, T. "Worship in the Culture and Church of the Cook Islands, with Special Reference to the Needs of the Cook Islands Christian Church Today." B.D. thesis, Pacific Theological College, 1971.

Cooperative Baptist Fellowship

The Cooperative Baptist Fellowship (CBF) is an association formed in the aftermath of a major conflict within the SOUTHERN BAPTIST CONVENTION (SBC). After a decade of struggle between an older "moderate" leadership group and an insurgent fundamentalist movement, SBC moderates had, by 1990, lost every presidential election in the denomination since 1979; and by virtue of that, they had lost substantial ability to influence the Southern Baptist Convention's various theological schools and program agencies. In the summer of 1990, a call went out for "concerned Baptists" to gather in Atlanta. The two thousand persons who responded created a rudimentary financial structure and an ad hoc interim steering committee. In May, 1991, the organization was officially chartered as the Cooperative Baptist Fellowship.

Almost all the founding delegates belonged to churches that were still part of the Southern Baptist Convention. However, over the following decade, an increasing number of those churches decreased or cut off their giving to the parent body, and many officially cut their ties. A few were ousted for their progressive practices, primarily related to women in ministry and the acceptance of homosexuality (both of which the SBC strongly condemned). Those who formed the fellowship were disproportionately the best educated, most urban, and most progressive of the SBC's churches. Before the denomination's conflict, they were among its most generous contributors. Although still conservative and evangelical relative to the mainstream of American Protestantism, these Southern Baptists were much less likely than those who remained within the SBC to believe the Bible to be inerrant, and they were virtually unanimous in their support for women's leadership, including many women pastors.

Early in its history, the CBF became a mission-sending organization, placing career missionaries and short-term volunteers around the world. The focus was on "unreached people groups" (such as the Romany or the Kurds), rather than on nations, and many of the missionaries were assigned to immigrant (and native-born) communities in the United States. By 2000, the mission force had grown to 140.

Other organizational functions were largely accomplished through a network of related, but independent, agencies. In the early 1990s, a wide variety of new organizations were founded to service the growing number of churches no longer seeking resources from the SBC. From a press agency to an ethics center to an educational publishing house to several institutions for theological education, CBF became a hub and clearinghouse for a growing network of disaffected Southern Baptists.

Both churches and individuals can join the fellowship, and governance is by a Coordinating Council, elected by those who attend the annual CBF meeting. Elected presidents have been both clergy and laity and both men and women. A professional staff of more than a dozen (along with numerous support staff), located in Atlanta, is led by a chief executive who is called a coordinator. In addition, twenty state and regional organizations exist throughout the United States. Ten years into its history, a budget of $17 million was supported by approximately 1,800 contributing churches, placing it within the thirty largest religious bodies in the United States.

Its increasing distance from the SBC and its increasingly comprehensive range of activity mean that CBF is often treated as a new denomination. By the late 1990s, for instance, the U.S. military had recognized the CBF as an official endorsing body for chaplains. Although many of its member churches remain tied to the SBC, its national and regional structures are, in fact, a separate and rather comprehensive religious organizational system.

Address:

Cooperative Baptist Fellowship
P.O. Box 450329
Atlanta, GA 31145-0329
<http://www.cbfonline.org>

Nancy T. Ammerman

Sources:

- Ammerman, Nancy T. "SBC Moderates and the Making of a Post-Modern Denomination." Christian Century 110, 26 (1993): 896-899.
- Lolley, W. Randall, ed. FINDINGS: A Report of the Special Study Commission to Study the Question: "Should the Cooperative Baptist Fellowship Become a Separate Denomination?" Atlanta, GA: Cooperative Baptist Fellowship, 1996.

Coptic Catholic Church

The Coptic Catholic Church, a church in full communion with the ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH, dates to the conversion in 1741 of a bishop of the Coptic Orthodox Church to Roman Catholicism, but has its roots in Roman Catholic attempts to establish missions in Egypt during the medieval period. In the fifth century, the majority of the Christians in Egypt were separated from the larger body of the Christian community (represented by the Eastern Orthodox churches and the Roman Catholic Church) by their refusal to affirm the promulgations of the Council of Chalcedon (451) concerning the nature of Christ. The orthodox Christian formulation taught that the divine and human natures were present in the one person of Christ. Egyptian Christians tended to follow a position called Monophysitism, which affirmed that Christ had only the divine nature. In the eyes of the rest of Christianity, the members of the Coptic church were heretics.

Representatives of the Coptic Orthodox Church attended the council of Florence in 1442 and signed a document of reconciliation with Rome, but upon their return found that their action was not supported by the church's leadership. Then in the 1600s, Roman Catholic missionaries began to work in Egypt, but a breakthrough only came in 1741 with the conversion of a Coptic bishop, who was subsequently appointed vicar apostolic of a Coptic Catholic Church. The church adopted Catholic doctrine but continued to use the Coptic liturgy with some minor changes.

In 1824, Pope Leo XIII established an Egyptian patriarchate, but it remained inoperative until 1899, when Cyril Makarios was named patriarch of Alexandria of the Copts. He retained the office until 1908, when he resigned. The office was again vacant until 1947, when a new patriarch was named. By the end of the 1990s, the church had approximately 180,000 members, and was far larger than the Latin Rite Catholic Church in Egypt. Parishes are also found in neighboring Libya.

Membership in the church is divided into nine dioceses. The church supports six religious orders, an extensive parochial school system, a set of medical facilities, and St. Leo's Theological Seminary in Maadi (a Cairo suburb). There is no official Internet site, but an unofficial site at <http://www.opuslibani.org.lb/copticmenufr.html> provides valuable information. The church is an active member of the Middle East Council of Churches.

Address:

Coptic Catholic Church
B.P. 69
Rue Ibn Sandar
Pont de Koubbeh, Cairo
Egypt

Sources:

- Liesel, Nikolaus. The Eastern Catholic Liturgies: A Study in Words and Pictures. Westminster, MD: Newman Press, 1960.
- Roberson, Ronald G. The Eastern Christian Churches—A Brief Survey. 5th ed. Rome: Edizioni Orientalia Christiana, Pontificio Istituto Orientale, 1995.

Coptic Orthodox Church

The Coptic Orthodox Church traces its history to two important foundational events. According to the Bible, Jesus's parents fled to Egypt to keep him safe from the slaughter of Hebrew babies ordered by King Herod (Matthew 2:14). Then, following Jesus's death and resurrection, tradition attributes the founding of the Christian church in Egypt to the preaching of St. Mark, the author of the Gospel that bears his name. It is known that Christianity spread through Egypt during the first century C.E. More recently, a fragment of the Gospel of Mark in the Coptic language dated to the second century has been discovered.

Through the fourth century, Egypt was among the more important parts of the larger Christian community, and the city of Alexandria an important center of Christian learning. Athanasius, the major defender of what became orthodox Christian theology, was the bishop of Alexandria for almost half a century. However, in the fifth century, the Egyptian church was accused of holding the Monophysite position concerning the nature of Christ (that is, of holding that Christ's nature is only divine, not both divine and human), after its refusal to affirm the documents promulgated by the Council of Ephesus in 431 and the later Council at Chalcedon. The Coptic church became somewhat isolated from the rest of Christendom from that time forward.

A Coptic Christian prays in Aswan, Egypt. (L. Jackson/TRIP)

The Coptic church's isolation was increased by the move of Islam into Egypt in the seventh century. The Christian community has since existed as a minority community in a Muslim nation. The Egyptian church enjoyed a special status, due in part to the special place that Egypt had in the experience of Muhammad (who married a maiden sent to him by Coptic Christian ruler Muqawqis), but nevertheless frequently through the centuries became the object of persecution. The Copts were a semiautonomous community, but each member was required to pay a special tax. Those who did so were regarded as dhimmis, or protected ones. Individuals who were unable to pay were faced with the choice of converting to Islam or losing their status as dhimmis. Thus, although they have had periods of prosperity, they have continually lived under the threat of the government turning on them.

The position of the Copts improved during the nineteenth century under the stability and tolerance of Muhammad Ali's dynasty. The Coptic community ceased to be regarded by the state as an administrative unit and by 1855 the Gezya tax, the main mark of Copts' inferiority, was lifted, and shortly thereafter Copts started to serve in the Egyptian army. The 1919 revolution in Egypt, the first grassroots display of Egyptian identity in centuries, stands as a witness to the homogeneity of Egypt's modern society as including both its Muslim and Coptic sects. Today, this homogeneity is what keeps Egyptian society united against the religious intolerance of extremist groups, who occasionally subject the Copts to persecution.

The Christian monastic movement started in Egypt toward the end of the third century and from there spread to Asia Minor through the efforts of St. Basil and to Europe by way of St. Jerome and later St. Benedict. Like many Eastern Orthodox Churches, the Coptic Church draws its episcopal leadership from its monastic ranks.

Doctrinally, the church adheres to the Nicene Creed, and insists that it has never adhered to the Monophysite position. It attributes the break with the remainder of Christendom in the fifth century to both politics (a desire to eliminate the independent Egyptian patriarch) and a linguistic misunderstanding. Coptic theology affirms that Christ the Lord is perfect in His divinity, and He is perfect in His humanity, but His divinity and His humanity were united in one nature, called “the nature of the incarnate word,” a belief that was reiterated by Saint Cyril of Alexandria (376–444). Copts, thus, believe in two natures, human and divine, that are united in one “without mingling, without confusion, and without alteration.” Contemporary church leaders from both Eastern Orthodox and Roman Catholic churches have tended to accept the Coptic Church’s explanation. These more positive relations began in 1971 with the visit of Pope Shenouda to Rome.

Copts observe seven sacraments: baptism, chrismation (or confirmation), the Eucharist, confession, Holy Orders, matrimony, and unction for the ill. Baptism is commonly performed for infants a few weeks after birth, and chrismation immediately thereafter. Weddings may not take place during a fasting season. Polygamy is not allowed, though recognized by the civil law in Egypt. Divorce is eschewed, except in the case of adultery or other extreme circumstances.

The church’s leader, currently Shenouda III, is designated the pope of Alexandria. The church has some 9 million members scattered across Egypt and an additional 1.5 million members across Africa, Europe, North America, Brazil, and Australia. Members are divided into more than forty dioceses, some bishops serving as abbots of monastic communities. There are also dioceses headquartered in Kenya, Israel, Sudan, France, Italy, the United Kingdom, Germany, Ireland, and the United States.

The church is active in both the Middle East Council of Churches and the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES.

Address:

Coptic Orthodox Church
St. Mark’s Cathedral
222 Ramses St.
Abbassia, Cairo
Egypt
<http://pharos.bu.edu/cnl>

Sources:

- Bediako, Kwame. Christianity in Africa. Maryknoll, NY: Orbis, 1995.
- Hastings, Adrian. African Christianity. London: Geoffrey Chapman, 1976.
- Isichei, Elizabeth. A History of Christianity in Africa: From Antiquity to the Present. Grand Rapids: William B. Eerdmans, 1995.
- St. Mark and the Coptic Orthodox Church*. Cairo, Egypt: Coptic Orthodox Patriarchate, 1968.

Costa Rica

Called the “Switzerland of the Americas,” Costa Rica is located in Central America, between Nicaragua to the north and Panama to the south. This largely mountainous country, about the size of West Virginia, is home to about four million people as the twenty-first century begins, two-thirds of whom live in the fertile Central Valley.

European discovery of Costa Rica was made by Christopher Columbus during his fourth voyage to the Americas in 1502, when he sailed from Honduras to Panama and anchored briefly off the Caribbean coast of a land that was later called the Rich Coast, due to its lush tropical vegetation. However, it was on the Pacific coast that the Spanish conquistadors first explored the territory of Costa Rica: Gáspar de Espinosa, accompanied by Hernán Ponce de León and Juan de Castañeda, in 1519, and Gil González Dávila in 1522. Participating in the later expedition was the Spanish Roman Catholic priest Diego de Agüero, who became the first foreign religious worker to visit present-day Costa Rica and Nicaragua. After exploring the Nicoya Peninsula (extending southeast from the northwestern territory of Costa Rica), the Spaniards established a temporary settlement among the Chorotega people, where the priest claimed to have converted and baptized about 6,000 individuals—although neither the Spaniards nor the Chorotegas understood each other’s language. The first Roman Catholic church in Costa Rica was built in 1544 in the village of Nicoya during the administration of the first governor, Diego Gutiérrez.

In addition to the Chorotegas, Costa Rica was inhabited by several other ethno-linguistical groups: the Huetares in the Central Valley and Caribbean coast, and the Brunecas in the southern region along the Pacific coast. Although scholars disagree about the size of the indigenous population in Costa Rica at the beginning of the Spanish Conquest, some early records (1569) indicate that there were probably no more than 30,000 Chibchan-speaking peoples present in 1502. Many of the Indians later died of disease or warfare at

Status of religions in Costa Rica, 2000–2050

Followers	2000			2025	2050
	total	%	rate
Christians	3,885,000	96.6	2.81	5,684,000	6,726,000
Roman Catholics	3,660,000	91.0	2.71	5,200,000	6,200,000
Protestants	330,000	8.2	3.24	600,000	900,000
Independents	108,000	2.7	2.67	220,000	300,000
Nonreligious	60,300	1.5	3.38	150,000	340,000
Chinese folk-religionists	46,300	1.2	2.83	55,000	70,000
Baha’is	11,600	0.3	2.10	17,000	27,500
Atheists	9,400	0.2	2.54	13,000	18,500
Jews	4,500	0.1	1.80	5,000	6,200
Spiritists	3,100	0.1	1.07	2,000	2,000
Buddhists	2,300	0.1	1.60	2,500	3,200
Ethnoreligionists	910	0.0	1.34	500	350
Hindus	120	0.0	4.22	500	1,500
Total population	4,023,000	100.0	2.81	5,929,000	7,195,000

the hands of the Spaniards, which led to a decline in the total population. By 1611, the entire population of Costa Rica was reported as 15,000, including Indians, Spaniards, and mestizos. Today, the descendants of these peoples number about 40,000 and are known as Cabécares, Bribris, Guaymí, Borucas, Téribes, Guatusos, and Huértares.

Although the ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH is the dominant religion of Costa Rica and the official state religion, the growth of the Protestant movement during the twentieth century—especially since the 1960s—has led to the current religiously pluralistic situation. According to a public opinion poll by CID-Gallup in July 1999, the Catholic population was 74 percent, Protestants 16 percent, other religions 3 percent, and no religion (or no answer) 7 percent. In mid-2001, Protestants were estimated by some to be as high as 18–20 percent of the national population.

The earliest Protestant missionary efforts in Costa Rica took place in the 1880s among English-speaking West Indians (Afro-Caribbean peoples), who came from the British West Indies to work on the construction of a railroad (1870–1890) between the capital city of San José in the Central Valley and Port Limón on the Caribbean coast. Many of these laborers remained on the Caribbean coast to work in railroad maintenance, agriculture (cacao and banana plantations), fishing, and other endeavors, and they brought their own belief systems with them: Myalism (an African adaptation of Christianity), Obeah (witchcraft), and Protestant Christianity. The Jamaican Baptist Missionary Society sent its first worker to Costa Rica in 1887, the British Methodists in 1894, the Anglicans in 1896, the Seventh-day Adventists in 1903, and the Salvation Army in 1907.

The first Protestant worship services were conducted in San José, the nation's capital, in the 1840s among English-speaking foreigners, mainly American, British, and German citizens. The first Protestant chapel, Church of the Good Shepherd, was constructed in San José in 1865 to serve the expatriate community. Although this church was founded as a nondenominational worship center, in 1896 it became part of the Anglican Communion.

The activities of the British and Foreign Bible Society, beginning in 1845, and the American Bible Society (1890s) in San José and other major cities helped to promote Bible reading among Costa Ricans, and to strengthen the resolve of early Protestants to maintain their faith in an environment of religious intolerance created by Roman Catholics.

The first Protestant mission agency (nondenominational) to work in the Central Valley of Costa Rica was the Central American Mission (now CAM International), founded in Dallas, Texas, by Dr. C. I. Scofield and three friends “to pursue evangelism in Central America” (The Central American Bulletin, vol. 1, no. 1, 1891). The first CAM missionary couple was the Rev. and Mrs. William McConnell, who arrived in Port Limón on February 24, 1891, and located in San José with “a vision to evangelize the nation's 280,000 souls.” This work progressed very slowly and with great difficulty.

By 1950, at least 15 Protestant mission agencies had begun work in Costa Rica, including those mentioned previously. Five missionary societies concentrated on the West Indians along the Caribbean coast, and the other societies devoted their efforts to the Spanish-speaking population, largely in the Central Valley. The Methodist Episcopal Church (now an integral part of the UNITED METHODIST CHURCH) arrived in 1917, followed by independent Pentecostal missionaries in 1918 (work now under the INTERNATIONAL PENTECOSTAL HOLINESS CHURCH), the Latin American Evangelization Crusade (now known as the Latin America Mission, founded by Mr. and Mrs. Harry Strachan, Scottish Presbyterians) in 1921, the CHURCH OF GOD (ANDERSON, INDIANA) in 1939, the CHURCH OF GOD (CLEVELAND, TENNESSEE) also in 1939, the SOUTHERN BAPTIST CONVENTION in 1943, the ASSEMBLIES OF GOD in 1944, the PENTECOSTAL CHURCH OF GOD (from Puerto Rico) in 1945, and the AMERICAN BAPTIST ASSOCIATION in 1946.

Between 1950 and 1985, at least twenty-eight additional Protestant mission agencies started work in Costa Rica, and numerous church bodies came into existence as the result of the nationalization of missionary efforts, as a reaction to missionary domination, or as a result of independent efforts.

The latest survey of Protestant churches in Costa Rica (2000–2001 by PROLADES) reveals at least 210 church associations with 2,367 local congregations distributed as follows: non-Pentecostal groups (908 or 41.5 percent) and Pentecostal (1,459 or 58.5 percent). Total Protestant church membership (over fifteen years of age) was estimated at 235,000, and the total Protestant population at about 800,000. Many of the more conservative Protestant churches are associated together in the Alianza Evangélica Costarricense, which is affiliated with the WORLD EVANGELICAL ALLIANCE. The EVANGELICAL METHODIST CHURCH OF COSTA RICA is the only church headquartered in the country that is a member of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES.

About 3 percent of the population belonged to “other religions,” which in the context of Costa Rica includes “marginal” Christian groups (such as the Jehovah’s Witnesses, the CHURCH OF JESUS CHRIST OF LATTER-DAY SAINTS, the UNITY SCHOOL OF CHRISTIANITY, MITA CONGREGATION, Voice of the Chief Cornerstone, LIGHT OF THE WORLD CHURCH, God is Love Church, UNIVERSAL CHURCH OF THE KINGDOM OF GOD, and others) and non-Christian religions (about 80 distinct groups), including the following: various Native religions (7), the BAHÁ’Í FAITH (3), Islam (2), Buddhism (5), Hinduism (at least 25 groups), Chinese religions (10), and Western Esoteric groups (more than 20). The small Jewish community (4,500) is centered on San José. In addition, Obeah and Myalism are still practiced among some of the West Indians on the Caribbean coast.

A recent public opinion poll conducted by IDESPO, a research institute of the National University, showed that between 1995 and 2001 about 8 percent of the population of the San José metropolitan area (population 1.1 million) had changed their religion: Catholics declining and Protestants increasing, as well those with “No Religion” (10.8 percent).

The total population of Costa Rica (3,824,593 in June 2000) is composed of the following ethnic groups: Spanish-speaking Costa Ricans, 77.7 percent; Spanish-speaking Nicaraguans, 13.8 percent; other Spanish-speakers (Central and South Americans, Cubans, and Puerto Ricans), 2.8 percent; Native Americans, 1.1 percent; Asians (Chinese and Koreans), 1.0 percent; Afro-Americans (English-speaking), 2.0 percent; and Caucasians (citizens of the United States, Canadians, Europeans, Jewish), 2.0 percent. The literacy rate is 93 percent.

Clifton L. Holland

Sources:

Biesanz, Mavis Hiltunen de, et al. Los Costarricenses. San José, Costa Rica: EUNED, 1979.

Holland, Clifton L. “Religion in Costa Rica.” Documents posted on the PROLADES (Latin American Socio-Religious Studies Program) Web site at <http://www.prolades.com>.

Holland, Clifton L., ed. World Christianity: Central America and the Caribbean. Monrovia, CA: MARC-World Vision, 1981.

Nelson, Wilton M. A History of Protestantism in Costa Rica. Lucknow, India: Lucknow Publishing House, 1963.

Read, William R., et al. Latin American Church Growth. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans, 1969.

Council for a Parliament of the World's Religions

The Council for a Parliament of the World's Religions grew out of informal discussions in Chicago among scholars and religious leaders who began to discuss appropriate ways to acknowledge and celebrate the centennial of the Parliament of the World's Religions. That initial gathering in 1893 was a watershed in the spread of the major religious communities globally and initiated a century of efforts to create structures through which different religious communities could resolve their differences through dialogue rather than violence and move beyond tolerance to genuine respect and cooperative activity.

The initial conversation led to the founding of the council in 1988 with the single goal of planning the 1993 celebration. Held in Chicago, August 28–September 5, 1993, the Centennial Parliament brought together eight thousand people from around the world and culminated in the mass signing of a document, “Toward a Global Ethic.” Following the event, the council responded to the expressed desire of many attending the 1993 event that the work of that gathering might continue. The council agreed to continue and to convene a similar conference every five years at some place in the world. The second gathering occurred in Cape Town, South Africa, on December 1–8, 1999.

In preparation for the 1999 Parliament, the council called for individuals, organizations, and different faith communities to create gifts of service to the world. These were formally recognized at the Parliament. A summary of the activities of the Parliament was published on the council's Web site, given below.

Centered as it has been in the Chicago metropolitan area, the council has developed a second program especially for people in the Chicago area. Its local and global commitment is to promote understanding and cooperation among different religious and spiritual communities; to celebrate the diversity of the various religious and spiritual traditions; and to renew the role of these traditions in relation to personal growth and the broad challenges facing humanity.

The council's headquarters continue to be in Chicago. It is led by a board that includes local, national, and international trustees.

Address:

Council for a Parliament of the World's Religions
P.O. Box 1630
Chicago, IL 60690-1630
<http://www.cpwr.org>

Sources:

Barney, Gerald O., et al. Threshold 2000: Critical Issues and Spiritual Values for a Global Age. Ada, MI: CoNexus Press, 2000.

Teasdale, Wayne, and George Cairns. The Community of Religions. Ada MI: CoNexus Press, 1996.

Council for Secular Humanism

The Council for Secular Humanism was formed at the end of the 1970s as the Council for a Democratic and Secular Humanism by Paul Kurtz (b. 1925) and others formerly associated with the American Humanist Association. Kurtz, a professor of philosophy, was also the head of Prometheus Books, a prominent humanist/atheist publishing house. He had gained a high profile for his public attacks on psychic and occult phenomena and his leadership in the establishment of a watchdog group, the Committee for the Scientific Investigation of the Claims of the Paranormal. He had also been a prominent Humanist spokesperson. In 1973 he circulated "Humanist Manifesto II," a document seeking to update the original "Humanist Manifesto" of 1933. Then in 1980, on the heels of the council's founding, he wrote a Secular Humanist Manifesto that sought to define his evolving position.

The term secular has been added as a descriptor to Humanism in the last half of the twentieth century as a means of distinguishing it from forms of Humanism that are now seen as religions, albeit nontheistic religions. Secular Humanists are naturalists and as such do not accept the existence of any metanatural laws or principles, that is, laws or principles that transcend the natural realm, or of supernatural entities (gods, spirits, demons, and the like) beyond the material universe. As a corollary, they believe that most events described as miracles or as psychic in origin have a more mundane explanation. More important than any specific conclusions about the universe, however, secularists would hold that the method of arriving at conclusions is all-important. They demand the use of reason, the examination of evidence, and a scientific methodology, which are seen as opposed to faith or mysticism.

Secularists see their philosophical approach to life as the opposite of religion and not to be confused with it. That approach includes a concern for both individuals and humankind, and they search for ways to find fulfillment, growth, and a creative existence. They also search for an ethical existence and discuss among themselves options for leading the ethical life apart from revelation and God-given rules of conduct. They are committed to the democratic ideal and see in the give and take of a free society the best path to human progress. Secular humanists are often united more by what they do not believe (theism) than by what they do believe, there being a wide range of outlooks among those who consider themselves secularists.

The council has helped organize a variety of affiliated organizations. The Academy of Humanism recognizes prominent Humanist thinkers and leaders. The Committee for the Scientific Examination of Religion attempts to focus upon the claims of religions in the light of reason and science. The Biblical Criticism Research Project tries to disseminate the findings of critical Bible research, which it feels will further undermine the claims of both the Jewish and Christian faiths. The Secular Organization for Sobriety provides an atheist alternative to twelve-step programs, which require the acknowledgement of a Higher Power as part of their instructions to those recovering from alcoholism. It sponsors the Center for Inquiry Institute in Amherst, New York.

The council has promoted the formation of local affiliate groups that are associated together in the Alliance of Secular Humanist Societies. There is also a program to meet the special needs of African American members, African Americans for Humanism. The council is in turn a member of the International Humanist and Ethical Union.

The council publishes Free Inquiry, a monthly periodical.

Address:

Council for Secular Humanism
P.O. Box 664
Amherst, NY 14226-0664
<http://www.secularhumanism.org>

Sources:

Kurtz, Paul. In Defense of Secular Humanism. Buffalo, NY: Prometheus Books, 1983.

———. Transcendental Temptation: A Critique of Religion and the Paranormal. Buffalo, NY: Prometheus Books, 1986.

Kurtz, Paul, ed. The Humanist Alternative: Some Definitions of Humanism. Buffalo, NY: Prometheus Books, 1973.

Kurtz, Paul, et al. A Secular Humanist Declaration. Privately published, 1980.

Council for World Missions

See London Missionary Society

Council of Baptist Churches in North East India

370

There are more Baptists in India than any country except the United States, and the largest group of Baptists in India belongs to the church associated together in the Council of Baptist Churches in North East India. These churches originated somewhat accidentally, and the initial missionaries who had been sent by the American Baptists in 1836 were in fact headed for Burma. Unable to find their way into the land of the Shan people on the Burma-China border, they turned to the Indian state of Assam and began to evangelize the people. They baptized their first convert in 1841. The first church, with three branch congregations, was formed in 1845. Their first success was among the laborers of the tea gardens in Assam and among the Garos people in the state of Meghalaya.

Toward the end of the century, the work expanded to Nagaland and Manipur, and gradually included more and more of the different peoples, many of whom resided in rather remote hill country. Most of these people did not have a written language, and a considerable amount of time was spent reducing their languages to writing and producing the first pieces of literature, often portions of Scripture, in the language. The mission also opened many elementary and secondary schools, and the graduates went on to become leaders among their people. The educational work took on additional importance in Nagaland, Manipur, and the Garos Hills area, where the mission was given the total educational responsibility by the British colonial authorities.

The area covered by the mission expanded greatly in the decades after World War I and continued to grow during the last half of the twentieth century. An educational center developed at Jorhat, where the Bible school matured into a seminary for the training of pastors. Eventually Bible schools were created for each of the major language areas throughout the five-state region covered by the mission—Assam, Arunachal Pradesh, Manipur, Meghalaya, and Nagaland.

In 1950, prompted in part by the establishment of India as an independent nation, the mission was turned over to a locally controlled body, the Council of Baptist Churches in North East India. The council consisted of five conventions, one in each of the five states. Each convention had a number of associations, many representing a single language group. Over fifty languages are spoken by Baptists in the council, English being the language most shared in common.

The council churches have continued their missionary emphases, and currently have workers in Myanmar and other parts of India. They participate in the United Mission to Nepal, a cooperative Christian agency drawing support from more than thirty denominations, which supplies educational and medical services to a land where evangelism is against the law.

In 1992 the council downgraded its status and the five regional conventions assumed more responsibilities. Among the visible results of this change, the council dropped its membership in the BAPTIST WORLD ALLIANCE. Three of the regional conventions have applied and been accepted as members. Neither the council nor any of its member conventions are members of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES, though they cooperate with some World Council projects.

The Baptists had their greatest growth in Nagaland. Of the 550,000 members in the five conventions, 270,000 are in Nagaland, where the Baptists are now the largest religious body. Christians now hold positions of political and economic influence in the state.

Address:

Council of Baptist Churches in North East India
44 Acharya Jagadish Church
Bose Rd.
Calcutta 700 017
India

Sources:

Downs, Frederick S. The Mighty Works of God: A Brief History of the Council of Baptist Churches in North East India: The Mission Period, 1936–1950. Gauhati, India: Christian International Centre, 1971.
Puthenpurakal, Joseph. Baptist Missions in Nagaland. Calcutta: Firma KLM, 1984.

A Course in Miracles

A Course in Miracles is designed as a self-study course, intended to span one year, with a lesson for each day. The Course was “channeled” by Helen Schucman (1909–1981), a psychiatrist, from a source identified as Jesus over the course of seven years. The three books that make up the Course, the Textbook, the Workbook, and the Teacher’s Manual, were first published in 1975. Although the Course is designed for self-study, there are study groups that meet once a week to discuss what they’ve read during the week and how the Course is impacting their lives.

As is the case with many metaphysical religions, adherents to A Course in Miracles do not consider the Course to offer a theology, nor in fact do they consider the Course to be a religion at all. Rather, the Course is considered to be one path to ultimate reality. Helen Schucman was reportedly an unwilling medium for the message that claimed to come from Jesus Christ. This message was transcribed over time by Bill Thetford, and after seven years was published and distributed by a small group of people who believed the message was important. Much of the message of A Course in Miracles is meant to correct orthodox Christian teachings and to inspire a new world-view based in love.

Those who choose to take the Course can find information about it online; there is information about how to purchase the books, about the nearest place one can join a discussion group, and about chat groups. Many congregations affiliated with the Association of Unity Churches offer the Course as a part of their study activities, although they are not officially affiliated with the group that publishes the Course, the Foundation for Inner Peace

Although Schucman finished transcribing the Course in 1975, her involvement with the Course evidently stopped there. The Foundation for Inner Peace has been responsible for the publishing and distributing of A Course in Miracles, as well as other materials related to the Course, since the beginning. The foundation maintains an Internet presence at <http://www.acim.org/>. In 1999, the foundation assigned the copyright and trademark to the Foundation for A Course in Miracles (41397 Buecking Drive, Temecula, CA 92590, <http://www.facim.org>).

Although it is difficult to estimate the number of people who have taken the Course, according to the foundation, there are about one and a half million copies of A Course in Miracles in circulation worldwide. Translations have been made in Chinese, Dutch, German, Hebrew, Italian, Portuguese, Russian, and Spanish.

The main objective of the Course is to teach universal love and peace, which can be achieved primarily through forgiveness. The Course works at teaching how to overcome fear and guilt through the practice of miracles; a miracle is defined as a “shift in perception from fear to love.” Although the Christian overtones are clear throughout the text, it is considered to be a universal teaching.

The Course makes the fundamental distinction between the real and the unreal: “Nothing real can be threatened. Nothing unreal exists. Herein lies the peace of God.” According to the text, there are two worlds: the world of Truth, which applies to the collective of God’s creation, and the world of perception. Since Reality in the Course only refers to God and the Totality, all else is an illusion. The term “Creator God” is used throughout the text, not to describe the God who created the material universe, but to describe God as the creator of the Totality. The Totality encompasses God and everything that is. This is Reality. The concept that there are two forces in the world, good and evil, is false. The illusion that we must be saved from evil, then, is false as well. The world around us does not exist. Rather than deny the body’s presence in the world, however, adherents of the Course subscribe to the statement in John 15:19: “Be in the world, but not of the world.”

Since the Course maintains that Jesus was the son of God as we ALL are sons and daughters of God, it is believed that we are each part of the divine Totality. All have been caught in the world of perception, and therefore have forgotten their divinity. Miracles, forgiveness, and prayer are corrective measures, meant to replace fear with love and to help human beings to remember that they are still a part of the Totality. It is believed that as soon as each person in the world realizes that all are living in a world of illusion, the illusion will disintegrate, and all will return to the Totality, which is Reality.

Address:

Foundation for Inner Peace
P.O. Box 598
Mill Valley, CA 94942-0598
<http://www.acim.org>

Dawn L. Hutchinson

Sources:

- A Course in Miracles*. Volume One: Text. Volume Two: Workbook for Students. Volume Three: Manual for Teachers. Tiburon, CA: Foundation for Inner Peace, 1975.
- Miller, Patrick A. The Complete Story of the Course: The History, the People, and the Controversies behind A Course in Miracles. Berkeley, CA: Fearless Books, 1997.
- Wapnick, Kenneth. Absence of Felicity: The Story of Helen Schucman and Her Scribing of A Course in Miracles. New York: Foundation for A Course in Miracles, 1991.

Covenant of the Goddess

The Covenant of the Goddess (CoG) was founded in 1975 as an umbrella organization of contemporary Pagan Witches in the United States and is incorporated as a California nonprofit religious organization. Its founders deliberately copied the Congregational Church model of autonomous congregations. (According to an internal legend, this choice was based on a remark attributed to the seventeenth-century theologian Cotton Mather, that “the witches were organized like congregational churches.”) The chief reason for CoG’s foundation was to give Witches of different traditions some form of nationally recognized credentials as “clergy” so that they could perform marriages, serve as prison and hospital ministers, and carry out other clerical functions.

Both individuals and covens are accepted as members, with applicants admitted upon testimonial of current members that they are Witches and Goddess-worshippers. Criteria for coven membership require that the coven must “generally focus theology and ritual, etc., around the worship of the Goddess and the Old Gods (or the Goddess alone),” follow a code of ethics compatible with that of the larger organization, and have been in existence at least six months. Since covens frequently dissolve and reform, CoG’s membership rolls tend to be in a state of flux, but a handful of covens have been members for as long as two decades.

Covens in some areas form local councils. As of 2001, local councils existed in the San Francisco Bay Area, Los Angeles (two councils), San Diego, Minneapolis–St. Paul, and Seattle, as well as state-level councils in Florida, Michigan, Massachusetts, and Ohio. As of 2001, membership totaled about sixty-one covens and nearly a hundred solitary members.

Coven representatives meet each year in a Grand Council, called MerryMeet, where decisions are made through consensus methods based on those of the Society of FRIENDS (Quakers). A first officer, elected annually, heads the organization.

The Covenant of the Goddess maintains an Internet site, as well as publishing a newsletter, the circulation of which is not limited to members.

Address:

Covenant of the Goddess
P.O. Box 1226
Berkeley, CA 94701
<http://www.cog.org>

Chas S. Clifton

Sources:

Adler, Margot. Drawing Down the Moon. New York: Penguin, 1997.

Amber, K. Covencraft: Witchcraft for Three or More. St. Paul, MN: Llewellyn Publications, 1998.

Status of religions in Croatia, 2000-2050

Followers	2000			2025	2050
	total	%	rate
Christians	4,259,000	95.2	0.03	4,031,000	3,541,000
Roman Catholics	3,960,000	88.5	0.28	3,775,000	3,331,000
Orthodox	250,000	5.6	-3.23	200,000	150,000
Protestants	26,000	0.6	0.08	26,000	27,000
Muslims	103,000	2.3	-2.34	70,000	60,000
Nonreligious	80,500	1.8	-2.14	75,000	60,000
Atheists	28,700	0.6	-3.27	15,000	10,000
Jews	2,000	0.1	0.06	2,000	2,000
Total population	4,473,000	100.0	-0.10	4,193,000	3,673,000

the beginning of the sixteenth century, Croatia came under Turkish control. Austria drove the Turks out in the seventeenth century, but Croatia was then incorporated into the Austro-Hungarian Empire, where it remained (except for a brief period during the Napoleonic era) until after World War I. In 1918 Croatia became part of the Yugoslavian (southern Slavic) Kingdom, but remained an unwilling member, as Croats were looking for independence. They received instead four years of German occupation and membership in the Federated Republic of Yugoslavia under Marshal Tito's Communist government.

Finally in 1991, with the breakup of the former Yugoslavia, Croatia emerged as an independent nation. Unfortunately, during much of its first decade it was involved in a war with Serbia that slowed its attempt to take its place in the post-Communist world.

Croats, like their neighbors to the north, the Slovenians and Hungarians, are members of the Roman Catholic Church. However, unlike the Slovenians, they had been heavily influenced by Italian Catholicism with its differ-

Croatia

The present Republic of Croatia was established in 1991 when it declared independence from the People's Federated Republic of Yugoslavia. However, the Croatian people had inhabited the territory of the present country since the sixth century of the Common Era. In the seventh century, as they were becoming the ruling force in the region, they were also converted to the ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH. Various Croatian tribal groups began to merge into larger units, and a Croatian kingdom appeared in the mid-ninth century. The new kingdom had to defend itself against the growth of the prosperous Venetians across the Adriatic, the Hungarians in the north, and the Byzantines, who were already in control to the south and west.

In the fifteenth century, the Croats joined the Hungarians in an attempt to stave off the Turkish advance, but at ences from the German/Austrian variety. Also, at the time the first Croatian diocese was established at Nin in the seventh century, the Croats received the right to retain worship in their own language. Their Catholicism differentiated them from the Eastern Orthodox believers to the south. The church today is led by the archbishop of Zagreb and the Croatian Episcopal Conference. It retains the allegiance of the majority of the country's citizens.

Also, in the sixteenth century, an Eastern Rite Catholic church emerged in the Archdiocese of Zagreb as a Roman counterpart of the Serbian Orthodox Church. In 1611 a bishop was appointed and attached to the bishop of Zagreb. From his headquarters at the Marcha monastery, he spearheaded efforts to convert members of the Serbian Church to Roman Catholicism. The Eastern Rite church was given its own diocesan bishop, with his seat at Krizhevci, in 1777. When the twentieth century nation of Yugoslavia was created, the diocese was extended to include all of the country, and drew members from a variety of predominantly Orthodox ethnic groups (Ukrainians, Serbians, Macedonians, Romanians) found in Yugoslavia. It continues as the Byzantine Catholic Church of the Diocese of Krizhevci in the new nations of the former Yugoslavia.

Croatia was on the boundary between the Roman Catholic and Eastern Orthodox world formally created by the split between the two churches in 1054. However, as Croatia was brought into a united Yugoslavia and stayed there through much of the twentieth century, Croatian Catholics found Orthodox believers moving into their region. The SERBIAN ORTHODOX CHURCH has established a significant presence, but there are also lesser communities of the ALBANIAN ORTHODOX AUTOCEPHALOUS CHURCH, the BULGARIAN ORTHODOX CHURCH, the Macedonian Orthodox Church, and the ROMANIAN ORTHODOX CHURCH.

The Protestant movement, in the form of LUTHERANISM, came into Croatia in the sixteenth century. Lutheranism did not, however, have much impact until the eighteenth century, when thousands of Germans moved into the region to assist in the process of rebuilding after the Turkish forces were driven out. Included among the new German residents were some 100,000 Lutherans. They gave the church a decidedly German cast. After World War II, many German people returned to Germany. Through the years of Communist domination of the country, the once vital church went from 130,000 members to less than 5,000. Today, the Evangelical Church in Croatia has some 7,500 members.

The Reformed church in Croatia grew among Hungarian-speaking residents of Croatia and was for many years an integral part of the REFORMED CHURCH OF HUNGARY. In 1993 the church reorganized in light of the establishment of an independent Croatia. It has less than 5,000 members. It cooperates with the Lutheran church in the Protestant Evangelical Council.

Baptists entered Croatia in 1883 when Filip Lotz, who had been converted and baptized in Vienna, returned to his home in Daruvar. A second center developed in 1890 in Zagreb under Ivan Zrinscalk, who like Lotz had been converted while out of the country. A Serbo-Croatian Baptist conference was founded in 1921. The conference cooperated with a Yugoslav Baptist association founded in 1924. The Baptist movement was suppressed during the German occupation in World War II but revived after the war. Following independence in 1991, the Union of Baptist Churches was created by the several thousand Baptists in the new nation.

JEHOVAH'S WITNESSES have been active in Croatia since the 1920s. Suppressed by the Marxists in the last half of the nineteenth century, they revived and entered a growth phase in the 1990s. After a brief attempt to plant the CHURCH OF JESUS CHRIST OF LATTER-DAY SAINTS in 1889, the church had to wait for some ninety years for the opportunity to reenter the region. The Yugoslavian government recognized the church in 1975. By this time, there were LDS members residing in Croatia who had been converted while traveling abroad. The most prominent was Kresimir Cosic, a member of the Yugoslavian basketball team in the Olympics. He later became the deputy ambassador to the United States from Croatia.

Numerous Protestant and FREE CHURCHES turned their attention to the country during the war in the 1990s. A variety of new churches emerged, including several Pentecostal bodies. Free churches had come into the country at the turn of the century, the CHRISTIAN BRETHERN had arrived around 1901, and an initial Pentecostal congregation opened in 1910. Many of these were severely suppressed and ceased to exist in the 1940s and 1950s. However, by the end of the 1990s, numerous new independent missions and congregations had emerged. Many of these cooperate with the Protestant Evangelical Council of Croatia, associated with the WORLD EVANGELICAL ALLIANCE.

There had been a Jewish community in Croatia prior to the German occupation; it was almost wiped out during the Holocaust. Today approximately 2,500 Jews remain scattered in nine centers around the country. The Jews of Zagreb have erected a Holocaust memorial in the cemetery of Mitrogoj.

Some Croatians converted to Islam during the years of Turkish rule, though they are a distinct minority, unlike the many in the neighboring countries of Bosnia and Albania. Islamic believers in Croatia follow the Sunni HANAFITE SCHOOL. There is also a small BAHÁ'Í FAITH presence.

In spite of the conflict in the 1990s, a variety of Eastern groups found their way to Croatia, primarily Zagreb. Among the groups that have opened centers are the KWAN UM SCHOOL OF ZEN, the Croatian Shingon Buddhist Association, the ART OF LIVING FOUNDATION, the Gaudiya Vaisnava Association, and the INTERNATIONAL SOCIETY FOR KRISHNA CONSCIOUSNESS. There is also a center of the UNIFICATION MOVEMENT, and THE FAMILY has conducted an ongoing relief program through the 1990s from their centers in Budapest and Bucharest.

Sources:

- Eterovich, Francis, and Christopher Spalatin, eds. Croatia: Land, People, Culture. 2 vols. Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 1964, 1970.
- Shenk, N. G. "The Social Role of Religion in Contemporary Yugoslavia." Ph.D. dissertation, Northwestern University, 1987.

Cuba

The largest of the Caribbean islands, Cuba was originally inhabited by the Taino and Ciboney people. Their encounter with the Spanish after 1492 was disastrous, and during the sixteenth century they were largely eradicated. Cuba became the staging ground for the conquest of Mexico and Central America and the establishment of a Spanish presence in North America. Sugarcane plantations became the backbone of the economy in the seventeenth century and were one of the reasons for Cuba's being one of the last counties to abolish slavery (1886). The drive for independence from Spain culminated in the 1890s, with intervention by the United States. Following the successful Spanish-American War, the United States remained in Cuba until the new constitution was adopted in 1902.

The twentieth century was marked by the harsh dictatorship of Fulgencio Batista (r. 1934–1958) and the rise of Fidel Castro, who overthrew Batista in 1958 and continues to lead the country. Castro's Marxism has been antireligious, and he promulgated repressive laws, which only began to show signs of being loosened in the 1990s. The country has been strongly affected by the American boycott of Castro, which attempted to isolate him from the rest of the world. That boycott included a ban on travel to Cuba by United States citizens.

The ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH came to Cuba in 1512, some twenty years after Columbus first sailed the Caribbean. The first priests were DOMINICANS, but they were soon joined by FRANCISCANS. They served the colonial settlements, as the native population was killed rather than converted. The Diocese of Santiago de Cuba was established in 1522. A conservative Spanish Catholicism

Status of religions in Cuba, 2000-2050

Followers	2000			2025	2050
	total	%	rate
Christians	4,984,000	44.5	0.47	5,600,000	5,700,000
Roman Catholics	4,368,000	39.0	0.27	4,800,000	4,500,000
Protestants	190,000	1.7	1.12	250,000	400,000
Independents	135,000	1.2	1.18	230,000	370,000
Nonreligious	3,338,000	29.8	0.67	3,158,000	2,516,000
Spiritists	2,008,000	17.9	0.40	2,100,000	2,000,000
Atheists	808,000	7.2	0.60	850,000	770,000
Hindus	23,200	0.2	0.99	35,000	40,000
Chinese folk-religionists	21,400	0.2	0.67	30,000	35,000
Muslims	9,100	0.1	1.27	15,000	22,500
Buddhists	6,100	0.1	0.14	6,000	6,000
Baha'is	1,100	0.0	3.60	2,000	3,200
Jews	820	0.0	-1.93	800	800
other religionists	800	0.0	0.69	1,000	2,000
Total population	11,201,000	100.0	0.53	11,798,000	11,095,000

spread across the island during the nineteenth century. Following the Spanish-American War, when the new government, under American influence, adopted a policy of separation of church and state, the church actually experienced a revival, though its conservatism remained. The archbishop of Havana is also generally named a cardinal.

Following the coming to power of Castro, the church was accorded some approbation because of the Catholic laity and priests who identified with and assisted the revolution. However, Castro took note of the past identification of the church's hierarchy with the Batista regime, and the relations between the church's leaders and the government were hostile through the 1960s. After the church issued some pastoral letters in 1969 that offered a new direction to the Catholic faithful, especially a letter calling for Catholics to work for the development of Cuban society, relationships began to improve. The church was also helped by the rise of liberation theology, a theology that was based on a Marxist critique of society, and its spread among radical priests in South America.

The Catholic Church is by far the largest religious community in Cuba, though it has experienced a steady decline, directly related to the growth of atheism during the last decades of the twentieth century.

The CHURCH OF ENGLAND began holding services in Cuba in 1741, though they were limited to expatriate Anglicans. In 1871, the Episcopal Church in the United States sent a pastor to reside in Cuba and serve British and American residents. During the last decades of the nineteenth century, many Cubans fled to the United States, and many found the EPISCOPAL CHURCH to be an acceptable substitute for the Catholicism of their youth. Several chose to return to Cuba and preach to their fellow citizens. By 1906, the work had grown to the point that a resident bishop was named. The first Cuban bishop was appointed in 1967. Today, the Episcopal Church of Cuba has an unusual status; it is headed by its bishop, who resides in Havana, and a Metropolitan Council. That council includes the primate of the ANGLICAN CHURCH OF CANADA, the archbishop of the Episcopal Church's Province of the Caribbean, and the archbishop of the CHURCH IN THE PROVINCE OF THE WEST INDIES.

In 1873, ministers of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South (now a constituent part of the UNITED METHODIST CHURCH), began working with Cuban exiles in Florida. In 1883, two Cubans, Enrique B. Someillan and Aurelio Silveira, returned to Cuba and began to preach. As the work grew, the church began to build schools and medical dispensaries in rural areas. The rise of Castro became the occasion of rethinking the church's position, and it was granted independence as the Methodist Church in Cuba in 1964 by the Methodist Church (1939–1968) (since 1968 a part of the United Methodist Church).

As with the Anglicans and Methodists, Baptists found their initial converts working among Cuban exiles in Florida, and in 1883 a Baptist who returned to Cuba as a Bible distributor developed the first Baptist Church in Cuba, which soon aligned itself with the Southern Baptist Convention. At about the same time, missionaries with the American Baptists began work in northern Cuba. These two Baptist groups united to form the Baptist Convention of Cuba, the largest of the non-Catholic churches.

Only a year after Baptist beginnings, a similar beginning was made by a Cuban representing Presbyterianism. In 1898, when the first Presbyterian missionaries arrived, they founded groups that became the core of a set of new congregations. The Congregationalists and the CHRISTIAN CHURCH (DISCIPLES OF CHRIST) also initiated work in Cuba, but abandoned it in 1909 and 1918, respectively. They passed their work to the Presbyterians. The church became independent in 1967 as the PRESBYTERIAN REFORMED CHURCH IN CUBA.

Numerous churches entered Cuba after religious freedom came to the island in 1898. They ranged from the AFRICAN ORTHODOX CHURCH to the LUTHERAN CHURCH—MISSOURI SYNOD and FRIENDS UNITED MEETING. More than twenty-five different Pentecostal churches arrived from the United States, and new Cuban-based Pentecostal churches emerged. All of the churches suffered in the 1960s, when more than half a million Cubans (including many church leaders) left the country for the United States.

The Cuban Council of Protestant Churches was founded in 1941. In 1977, when it was renamed the Ecumenical Council of Cuba, it had fourteen members, including the Greek Orthodox Church. Today, as the Council of Churches of Cuba, it is an affiliate of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES. Of the Cuban-based denominations, only the METHODIST CHURCH OF CUBA and the Reformed Presbyterian Church of Cuba are also members of the World Council.

The new government cited three groups as falling outside of the consideration of the laws guaranteeing religious freedom and the separation of church and state. Those laws could not be absolute, since they were subordinated to the basic need of building a socialist society. The SEVENTH-DAY ADVENTIST CHURCH, the JEHOVAH'S WITNESSES, and the Bando Evangelistico Gedeón were cited as advocating a counterrevolutionary ideology and working among the poorest of the society. The pronouncement against these three groups led to the disappearance of any public manifestations of their prior efforts.

A black Virgin Mary doll makes up part of a small shrine in a private house in Cuba. (M. Barlow/TRIP)

Although guaranteeing religious freedom, the Castro regime passed a number of laws that had a direct effect upon the various churches. It nationalized all schools in 1961. It banned public religious festivals and demonstrations. It also passed regulations that took much of the churches' property away. Even though there has been sporadic persecution of church leaders, the churches that were in place in 1958 have been allowed to survive, and there is every hope of an improved atmosphere in the foreseeable future.

While Christianity spread across Cuba, an undercurrent of religion grew among the descendents of African laborers. Various forms of Afro-Cuban religion emerged, primarily SANTERÍA, PALO MAYOMBE, Arara, and Nanguismo. These groups operate as semisecret religious communities, and their actual size is difficult to assess.

Jews settled in Cuba in the sixteenth century, having been expelled from Spain in 1492. However, the growth of the community did not begin until the nineteenth century. Most members of the present community of approximately 1,000 reside in Havana.

A variety of different groups have survived from earlier in the century, including the CHURCH OF CHRIST, SCIENTIST (one congregation), the THEOSOPHICAL SOCIETY, and the ANCIENT AND MYSTICAL ORDER ROSAE CRUCIS. Among the newer groups to enter Cuba is SUBUD. There are also a small community of the BAHÁ'Í FAITH and expatriate communities of Muslims, Hindus, and Buddhists (Chinese).

Sources:

- Bazdresch, S. J., and E. S. Sweeney. "The Church in Communist Cuba: Reflections on the Contemporary Scene." Thought 63, 250 (September 1988).
- Crahan, M. E. "Catholicism in Cuba." Cuban Studies 19 (1989).
- Ramos, M. A. Protestantism and Revolution in Cuba. Miami, FL: Research Institute for Cuban Studies, University of Miami, 1989.
- Weare, K. M. "The Church in Castro's Cuba." Thought 59, 233 (June 1984).
- Yaemko, Jason M. U.S. Protestant Mission in Cuba: From Independence to Castro. Gainesville: University Press of Florida, 2000.

Cumberland Presbyterian Church

The Cumberland Presbyterian Church grew out of an attempt of Presbyterian ministers on the American frontier early in the nineteenth century, who were reacting to the fact that only a small percentage of Americans (less than 20 percent) were affiliated with any church or religious organization. In the years after, the Methodists and Baptists experienced some growth through the use of evangelical preaching, and revivals of religions swept thousands into the churches. Most of the Methodists and Baptists also lacked formal theological education.

The revivals, though originating primarily in Baptist and Methodist meetings, quickly became ecumenical affairs involving Presbyterians, Congregationalists, and others. One Presbyterian minister, the Rev. James McGready (c. 1758–1817), became deeply involved in the revivalist culture in Kentucky. He was originally licensed as a minister by the Redstone Presbytery. After 1802, he became associated with the Cumberland Presbytery. As the revivals swept through Kentucky, the Cumberland Presbytery licensed some untrained ministers. Other Presbyterians complained about what the Presbytery was doing and charged that these ministers had also departed from Presbyterian belief, as contained in the Westminster Confession. In 1805, the Kentucky Synod, of which the Cumberland Presbytery was a part, agreed that the Cumberland Presbytery was acting irregularly. It also demanded to examine the untrained ministers on the question of their orthodoxy. When the Cumberland Presbytery refused to submit to the Kentucky Synod's ruling, the synod dissolved the Cumberland Presbytery. The presbytery appealed to the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church. When that appeal went unheeded, some of the ministers from the presbytery withdrew from the Presbyterian Church. In 1810, Finis Ewing (1773–1841), Samuel King (1775–1842), and Samuel McAdow (1760–1844) constituted a new independent Cumberland Presbytery. Over the next few years, those still at odds with the Kentucky Synod formed two additional synods, and in 1813 the members of the three presbyteries formed the Cumberland Synod.

Continuing to participate in the revivals on the frontier, the Cumberland Synod spread throughout Tennessee and Kentucky and to neighboring states. In 1929, the leaders of the synod gathered to constitute the General Assembly of the Cumberland Presbyterian Church. The church was strongly affected by the Methodists, who rejected traditional Calvinist Presbyterian ideas about predestination and emphasized human ability to respond to the free grace of God. Over the nineteenth century, most Presbyterians tended to make a place for human freedom.

In the last half of the nineteenth century, some Cumberland Presbyterian leaders began to pursue reconciliation with their parent body, the Presbyterian Church in the United States. In 1906, by a slim majority, the Cumberland Presbyterians voted to merge back into the larger Presbyterian body, and today their group constitutes an integral part of the PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH (U.S.A.). However, a significant minority refused to participate in the union and reorganized under their former name. It is this continuing faction who constitute the present-day Cumberland Presbyterian Church.

In the mid-1990s, the church reported 83,000 members in the United States. There were more than 6,000 members in related congregations in Hong Kong, Colombia, Japan, and Liberia. The church continued a fraternal relationship with the Cumberland Presbyterian Church in America. This church was a result of a mission developed by Cumberland Presbyterian ministers to African Americans in the pre-Civil War South, many of whom were slaves. After the Civil War, these members were assisted in developing presbyteries and synods, and in 1874 these members (a remnant of some 30,000 who had been affiliated with the church prior to the war) organized what was originally called the Second Presbyterian Church. The Cumberland Presbyterian Church in America has its headquarters at 226 Church St., Huntsville, AL 33801.

Address:

Cumberland Presbyterian Church
1978 Union Ave.
Memphis, TN 38104
<http://www.cumberland.org>

Sources:

- Campbell, Thomas. Good News on the Frontier. Memphis, TN: Frontier Press, 1965.
- Gore, Matthew H. History of the Cumberland Presbyterian Church in Kentucky to 1888. N.p.: Joint Heritage Committee of Covenant and Cumberland Presbyteries, 2000.
- A People Called Cumberland Presbyterians*. Memphis, TN: Frontier Press, 1970.

Status of religions in Cyprus, 2000-2050

Followers	2000			2025	2050
	total	%	rate
Christians	566,000	94.2	1.63	636,000	600,000
Orthodox	525,000	87.5	1.60	582,000	528,000
Roman Catholics	9,800	1.6	2.05	13,000	20,000
Marginal Christians	8,200	1.4	2.04	13,500	18,000
Nonreligious	23,400	3.9	3.07	34,000	48,200
Muslims	5,800	1.0	0.94	8,500	10,500
Atheists	4,700	0.8	1.11	6,000	8,000
Baha'is	830	0.1	1.69	1,500	3,000
Jews	160	0.0	0.77	200	300
Total population	601,000	100.0	1.68	688,000	670,000

thodoxy through subsequent centuries. Cyprus became a jumping-off point for Europeans engaged in the Crusades, one result of which was the coming of members of the ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH to the island in significant numbers. In the twelfth century, some 80,000 Maronites (Eastern Rite Roman Catholics from Lebanon) arrived, and a Maronite archdiocese was erected in 1352. Control of the island by Roman Catholics also led to the establishment of a Latin Rite church that enjoyed political favor.

Venice was the last of a succession of European powers to rule Cyprus. The Venetians' rule of almost a century was brought to an end in 1572 by the invasion and conquest of the island by the Ottoman Turks. The Turks favored the Orthodox Church and actively repressed the Roman Catholic dioceses, both Latin and Maronite. Only small communities of each survived, many Maronites returning to the Orthodox Church in the process. The Turks gave the head of the Cypriot church considerable secular power, a fact increasingly resented by the growing number

Cyprus

Cyprus was home to one of the oldest civilizations in the Mediterranean Basin. The island was populated as early as 3,000 B.C.E. It was an early home to Christianity, St. Paul having recorded a visit in his travels in the first century C.E. In the fifth century, the church in Cyprus, formerly attached to the church in Antioch, received autonomous status and has been a small but honored part of Eastern Or-of Turkish Muslims residing on Cyprus. In 1821, the archbishop (generally called the ethnarch) was executed.

Cypriot history changed again in 1878 when Britain gained control. It formally annexed Cyprus in 1914. That status remained until the independence of the island in 1960. The new nation inherited a major problem, caused by the presence of a significant Muslim minority (some 18 percent of the population). Though the majority of the islanders were Greek and favored an alignment with Greece, the island was but a short distance from the Turkish coast. The new constitution provided a set of guarantees for the Turkish minority. It established two communities, and each citizen had to choose to which community he would belong.

In 1974, the Orthodox archbishop and president of Cyprus, Ethnarch Makarios, was deposed, the culmination of a longstanding feud with other church leaders. As a result, Turkish forces invaded the island and reestablished Makarios in the presidency; the events of the year drove a deep wedge between the Greek/Christian and Turkish/Muslim citizenry, and the Muslims residing in the northern part of the island proclaimed the existence of an autonomous Turkish state. The new government was not recognized by anyone except Turkey, but at the same time, the Cypriot government was unable to organize the support to reestablish their authority over the Turkish community. To this day the unofficial government controls the northern third of the island.

The ORTHODOX CHURCH OF CYPRUS remains the dominant religious force on Cyprus, with approximately 87 percent of the population identifying with it. The church is led by its patriarch His Beatitude Chrysostomos, archbishop of Nea Justiniana and All Cyprus, who is assisted by the five bishops who preside over the five dioceses. The church is at one with the other Orthodox Churches in faith and practice (apart from language). The ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH has survived only as a remnant. Its Latin Rite churches are attached to the patriarch of Jerusalem. There is an Eastern Rite diocese and a resident bishop in Nicosia, the capital of Cyprus.

Protestantism was introduced to Cyprus after the British took control. The Anglicans now constitute a diocese in the EPISCOPAL CHURCH IN JERUSALEM AND THE MIDDLE EAST. The Reformed Presbyterian Church initiated work in 1887, but the GREEK EVANGELICAL CHURCH has been the most successful Protestant group.

In the twentieth century, the JEHOVAH'S WITNESSES and the SEVENTH-DAY ADVENTIST CHURCH began missions, part of a spectrum of American-based FREE CHURCHES, such as the CHURCH OF GOD OF PROPHECY and the CHRISTIAN BRETHREN (Open Brethren). Noteworthy among them were the Armenian refugees who came to Cyprus to escape the Turkish massacre of Armenians in 1914–1915. They founded a branch of the UNION OF THE ARMENIAN EVANGELICAL CHURCHES IN THE NEAR EAST.

The Muslim community of Cyprus is dominated by Sunni Muslims of the HANAFITE SCHOOL, the same school that dominates Turkey. Also as in Turkey, there are numerous Sufi brotherhoods, including the MEVLEVI (whirling Dervishes), Fufai (howling Dervishes), BEKTASHIS, and Ticani.

There is a small community of the BAHAI FAITH on Cyprus and an equally small Jewish community. At one time a large Jewish community existed on Cyprus, but in 117 C.E. it revolted against Roman authority and was ruthlessly suppressed. There was a revival of the Jewish culture in the twelfth century, which ended during the years of Venetian rule. As the Muslim rule began, only twenty-five families were left. During the nineteenth century, Cyprus was targeted for the settlement of Jewish agricultural colonies, largely unsuccessful. Today there are some fifty Jewish families on Cyprus.

The newer religions have discovered Cyprus. The CHURCH OF JESUS CHRIST OF LATTER-DAY SAINTS organized work within the English-speaking community in Nicosia in 1962 and remains primarily a church of expatriates. The two congregations are attached to the Greece Athens Mission. Among the other new religions are SUBUD. Among the more unique religious groups are the Linobambakoi, a group of Orthodox believers who concealed their true faith through the centuries of Muslim rule by taking Muslim names and visibly participating in keeping Islamic festivals (somewhat like the Marranos, the Christianized Jews of medieval Spain).

Sources:

- Englezakis, B. Studies on the History of the Church of Cyprus, 4th–20th Centuries. Edited by S. Ioannou and M. Ioannou. Aldershot, UK: Variorum, 1995.
- Hackett, J. A History of the Orthodox Church of Cyprus. New York: Burt Franklin, 1972.

Czech Republic

The dominant religion in the Czech Republic is Christianity, especially Catholicism. The beginnings of Christianization of Slavic tribes in the region can be traced back to the ninth century, when Moravian and Bohemian duces (Latin; leaders, or dukes) accepted baptism. Geopolitically, the region, which had formed into what is called the Great Moravian State, was located at the intersection of two powerful forces, the Frankish Empire and the Byzantine Empire. Although the first missions (the so-called Irish-Scottish and Bavarian missions) came from the Frankish Empire, in 863 the great Moravian duke Rostislav invited two Byzantine Christian missionaries, Cyril (d. 869) and Methodius (d. 885), in an effort to strengthen the influence of Byzantium. They stressed the right of Slavic people to their own liturgical language (Old Slavonic) and culture. In 869, an independent diocese was founded, for the region of Pannonia and Moravia, and Methodius was appointed as its bishop. After his death, however, his disciples and the Slavonic priests were exiled into Bulgaria with the consent of Pope Stephen VI. As a result, the promotion of Latin liturgy followed, and under the rule of Wenceslas I (c. 907–929), the Czech kingdom was increasingly oriented toward the ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH. The Holy Roman emperor, Charles IV, who was pronounced the king of Bohemia in 1346, played a prominent role in further developments. He founded an archdiocese in Prague (1344) and the first university in Central Europe (1348).

A short time afterwards, Charles IV's (1316–1378) daughter, Anne (1366–1394), married the English king Richard II, which, among other things, brought the doctrines of John Wycliffe (c. 1330–1384), forerunner of the Protestant Reformation, into Bohemia. Influenced by his teachings, Jan (John) Hus (1372/1373–1415) started his critique of Catholic Church. Although Hus was burned to death as a heretic after the Council of Constance, his teachings inspired a mass reform movement (the Hussite movement) in the fifteenth century. Formal attempts to suppress the movement began in 1420 on the heels of the promulgation of two anti-Hus declarations (bulls) in 1418.

In spite of the Catholic reaction, the Czech Reformation continued. In 1457, a small group of Christians founded a village on the principles of early Christianity, which started the tradition of Unitas Fratrum (from the Latin for the unity of brethren; later also known as the Moravian Brethren). Among its most significant representatives was its bishop, Jan Amos Komensky (1592–1670) (usually referred to as Comenius, his Latin name), known also for his works on education. Along with many other Protestants, Comenius was forced into exile in 1628, in a period of increasing strength for the Counter-Reformation. During the following years of rule by the German Hapsburgs, who championed Catholicism, Protestants were persecuted severely. This situation ended only with the Edict of Toleration issued by Joseph II in 1781, which introduced civic and religious equality.

Status of religions in the Czech Republic, 2000-2050

Followers	2000			2025	2050
	total	%	rate
Christians	6,457,000	63.0	0.33	7,102,000	6,315,000
Roman Catholics	4,136,000	40.4	0.01	4,800,000	4,300,000
Protestants	320,000	3.1	0.00	400,000	500,000
Independents	270,000	2.6	0.77	350,000	450,000
Nonreligious	3,264,000	31.9	-0.40	2,200,000	1,400,000
Atheists	514,000	5.0	-2.32	200,000	100,000
Jews	7,100	0.1	-0.25	6,000	6,000
Muslims	1,300	0.0	4.98	2,000	4,000
Baha'is	950	0.0	1.48	2,000	4,200
Total population	10,244,000	100.0	-0.06	9,512,000	7,829,000

Meanwhile, the Lutheran Protestant tradition, in part inspired by the teachings of Jan Hus, had also come to the Czech countries. The Toleration Edict, however, legalized only two confessions of faith from all Protestant denominations: the Lutheran Augsburg Confession and the Calvinist Helvetic Confession. An actual equality of Protestants with Catholics was reached only after 1848.

These historical events had their influence on the present situation. The most significant religious tradition is Roman Catholicism, but an important role is also played by the Protestant tradition, which had been connected with nationalist efforts to counter the German Catholic influence. The break-up of the Austro-Hungarian Empire in 1918 was then favourable to the Protestants. After the foundation of an independent Czechoslovak Republic, two new churches were established: the Evangelical Church of Czech Brethren in 1918, and the Czechoslovak Church (nowadays, the CZECHOSLOVAK HUSSITE CHURCH) in 1920, churches that evolved into the biggest Protestant churches.

The period of the Communist regime following World War II, in which religious life was deliberately and often violently suppressed, also had a strong impact on the present situation, which is marked by the prevalence of AGNOSTICISM. The census data from the years 1921, 1930, 1950, and 1991 serve to illustrate the decline of church membership. Although in 1921, 92.8 percent of the population declared themselves as belonging to a religious denomination, by the year 1991 this number dropped to a mere 43.9 percent. A similar decrease in membership can be documented within the individual churches: The Roman Catholic Church went from 82 percent (1921) to 78.9 percent (1930) to 76.4 percent (1950) to 39 percent (1991); the CZECHOSLOVAK HUSSITE CHURCH, from 5.2 percent (1921) to 7.3 percent (1930) to 10.6 percent (1950) to 2.5 percent (1991); the EVANGELICAL CHURCH OF THE CZECH BROTHERS, from 4 percent (1921) to 4.7 percent (1930), to 5.7 percent (1950) to 1.8 percent (1991).

After the fall of the Communist regime in 1989, the Czech Republic witnessed the alleviation of obstacles to free religious life. Under the new conditions, a large number of religious forms appeared. The state regulates their activities by means of several fundamental pieces of legislation: by the Charter of Human Rights (Articles 15 and 16), by Act No. 308/1991, concerning the freedom of religious belief and the status of churches and religious societies, and by Act of Czech National Council No. 161/1992, concerning the registration of churches and religious societies. According to this legislation, churches and religious societies registered by the state can, among other things, teach and educate their clergy and laypeople in their own schools and other institutions, as well as in tertiary theological schools and faculties. They also have the right to establish and run health and social-care facilities, or participate in providing services in such institutions established by the state. Entitled persons doing priestly work can further be admitted into public health and social-care facilities, children's homes, army barracks, places of imprisonment, detention, legally imposed therapy, and the like.

The above-mentioned rights are granted only to those societies that are acknowledged by the state as churches or religious communities. To achieve this status, a given religious society must prove that it has collected at least 10,000 signatures of allegiance by adult citizens permanently living in the Czech Republic. If a society is a member of WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES, it is sufficient for it to submit 500 signatures of adult citizens with permanent residence in the Czech Republic. At the beginning of the twenty-first century, twenty-one churches and religious societies were registered. However, nineteen of them were already declared to be registered in the appendix of the Act of 1991, on the basis that they had been operating earlier with state consent.

Among the churches and religious societies acknowledged by the state are the following: Roman Catholic Church, Evangelical Church of the Czech Brethren, Czechoslovak Hussite Church, SILESIA EVANGELICAL CHURCH OF THE AUGSBURG CONFESSION, ORTHODOX CHURCH IN THE CZECH LANDS, Religious Society of JEHOVAH'S WITNESSES, SEVENTH-DAY ADVENTIST CHURCH, GREEK CATHOLIC CHURCH, Christian Corps, Methodist Evangelical Church in the Czech Republic, Brotherhood Union, APOSTOLIC CHURCH (UK), Federation of Jewish Communities in the Czech Republic, NEW-APOSTOLIC CHURCH, Religious Society of Czech Unitarians, the CHURCH OF JESUS CHRIST OF LATTER-DAY SAINTS, Lutheran Evangelical Church of the Augsburg Confession in the Czech Republic, and Old Catholic Church in the Czech Republic. The Evangelical Church of the Czech Brethren, the Czechoslovak Hussite Church, the Orthodox Church in the Czech Lands, and the Evangelical Church of the Augsburg Confession in the Czech Republic are members of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES.

Apart from these churches, a whole range of nonregistered religious groups are active in the Czech Republic (Muslims, Buddhists, and so on), as well as a number of new religious movements (the INTERNATIONAL SOCIETY FOR KRISHNA CONSCIOUSNESS, the UNIFICATION MOVEMENT, the CHURCH OF SCIENTOLOGY, the GRAIL MOVEMENT, and the like).

At the present time, a new bill is being prepared by the parliament on the registration of churches and religious movements. It will introduce a two-level registration, which should make possible easier registration for small religious societies (which will be on the first level), while keeping the privileges of the already registered churches and religious societies, which will be on the second level.

Dusan Lužný

Sources:

- Dittrich, Z. R. Christianity in Great Moravia. Goringen: J. B. Wolters, 1962.
- Kontor, M. The Origins of Christianity in Bohemia: Sources and Commentary. Evanston, IL: Northwestern University Press, 1990.
- Navrat, M. Religion in Czechoslovakia. Prague: Orbis Books, 1984.

Czechoslovak Hussite Church

The Czechoslovak Hussite Church was formed in 1920 by some former Roman Catholic priests who drew upon the tradition of Czech church reformer Jan (John) Hus (c. 1373–1415). Their action in setting up an independent ecclesiastical body was made possible by the collapse of the Hapsburg Empire and the end of its rule over what is now the separate countries of the Czech Republic and Slovakia. The church saw itself as a progressive Catholic body, whose establishment followed the pope's rejection of a set of proposals for reform. Among the proposals was one for the Mass in the vernacular rather than Latin. The Hussite Mass was used, which included serving of both bread and wine to all communicants at the Lord's Supper.

The new reformed church continues to have an episcopal polity. One of the bishops is designated as the patriarch. A scholar, Karel Farsky, was elected as the church's first patriarch. Parishes are grouped into dioceses, each led by a bishop and diocesan council. The highest legislative body is the general synod, which meets every ten years.

The church is a member of the World Council of Churches. In 1991 it showed 185,000 members and 317 congregations in the state census. The church supports the Czechoslovak Theological Faculty in Prague. It introduced the ordination of women in 1947.

Address:

Czechoslovak Hussite Church, Central Council
Wuchterlova 5
P.O. Box 255
166 26 Praha 6 – Dejvice
Czech Republic
<http://www.ccsch.cz> (in Czech)

Source:

Van der Bent, Ans J., ed. Handbook/Member Churches/World Council of Churches. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 1985.

DahnHak

DahnHak, a movement that originated in Korea, is based upon the ancient Eastern practice of qigong. Although related to ancient traditions, the modern DahnHak movement was founded by Seung-Han Lee, who opened the first center in Seoul, Korea, in 1985. Following an enlightenment experience at Mo Ak mountain in Korea, he took the spiritual name Ilchi (literally, “a finger pointing to the truth”) by which he is now known. Lee had engaged in a process of spiritual seeking and development that led him to explore older approaches to spirituality. He modernized what he had discovered to create DahnHak. The movement has subsequently spread to both North and South America.

The practice of DahnHak centers upon the appropriation and use of ki (also known as chi) the life force, a common element in various Eastern meditation systems, exercise formats, and martial arts. DahnHak defines ki as the cosmic energy that circulates throughout the universe, the energy that is the true essence of every living entity. DahnHak practice follows a five-step program in which qigong exercises are introduced successively in order to introduce the individual to ki energy, to allow the accumulation of ki in the body’s lower energy center (the Dahn-Jon), and the awakening and development of the Middle Dahn-Jon. The result of basic practice is supposed to be a state of habitual joy and peace. At a more advanced stage, the body energy meridians (the same energy paths identified in acupuncture systems) are opened, so that the body is fully aligned to the energy flow of the universe. The goal of DahnHak practice is human perfection, a state in which the illusion of the ego is released and one identified with the True Self, at which point there is a mystic realization of one’s unity with all that exists.

Lee moved to the United States in 1994 and in 1997 established the Sedona Dahn Institute, still located in Sedona, Arizona, but now known as the Healing Society in Action, which has become the center of the movement in the West. There are currently more than three hundred DahnHak centers worldwide, operating in Korea, Japan, the United States, Canada, Brazil, and the United Kingdom. The many centers are headed by DahnHak master teachers trained by Lee.

In 2000, Lee and Neale Donald Walsch, who channeled the popular New Age Conversations with God series, established the New Millennium Peace Foundation, dedicated to building a lasting world peace by raising human awareness.

Address:

Healing Society in Action
2450 W. Broadway #108
Sedona, AZ 85202
<http://www.healingsociety.com>

Sources:

Lee, Seung-Heun. DahnHak: The Way to Perfect Health. Seoul, Korea: Dahn Publications, 1999.
———. Healing Society: A Prescription for Global Enlightenment. Charlottesville, VA: Hampton Road Publishing, 2000.

Damanhur

Damanhur is an esoteric New Age community founded in 1976 in the Valchiusella valley, some thirty miles north of Turin, Italy, by Oberto Airaudi (b. 1950). According to Airaudi, Damanhur is neither a religion nor a movement, but rather a social experiment and a community. In fact, Damanhur has its own constitution, its own government, and even a currency, known as “credit” (largely symbolic). There is little doubt, however, that Damanhur’s “citizens” live together on the basis of a peculiar religious philosophy and worldview. From the original twenty members, Damanhur has expanded to become the largest esoteric New Age communal group in the world, with some five hundred members living in four communities all located in the same valley, and another four hundred in communal houses nearby. Another satellite community has been founded in Berlin, Germany, and there are groups of sympathizers sharing the same worldview spread throughout Europe, the United States, Japan, and Australia. There are four levels of membership (indicated by the letters A, B, C, and D), the letters A and B indicating those living communally in Damanhur.

The central community in Piedmont is located in a series of highly symbolic buildings, including a large open-door temple. The existence of the most important facility, the construction of which was started in 1978, became known to the outside world only in 1992, following the revelations of a disgruntled ex-member. It is the Tempio dell’Uomo (Temple of Humankind), a huge subterranean temple comprising a fantastic collection of richly decorated rooms and galleries. Although Italian authorities originally regarded it as having been built in breach of zoning regulations, Damanhur managed to either win or settle all the ensuing court cases and is now legally allowed both to operate and expand its underground temple. For Damanhur’s citizens, the temple is much more than a means of expressing their artistic creativity; it is a “mystical pole,” at which ritual work takes place for the benefit of the whole of humanity. A number of different rituals express a worldview based on the sanctity of nature, karma, reincarnation, and the tradition of Western esotericism in general.

Damanhur runs its own kindergarten, primary, and intermediate schools, which have succeeded in developing friendly relations with local school authorities. Relationships with neighbors in the Valchiusella valleys have been more difficult. As has happened historically in the case of similar large communal settlements, some local residents initially welcomed Damanhur in the hope of reviving a struggling local economy. Damanhur has, in fact, become very much of a tourist attraction, receiving more than 50,000 visitors in the year 2001. Other local residents, however, fear that Damanhur's citizens will quickly become the majority of the valley's voters, thus eventually controlling the city councils in several local small towns. The town closest to Damanhur, Vidracco, for instance elected in 1999 a citizen of Damanhur as its mayor. There is also some Roman Catholic opposition to a religious system perceived by Catholic countercultists as magical and Neo-Pagan, as also to the fact that Damanhur celebrates "temporary weddings," which are supposed to last one or two years (although they can be renewed an unlimited number of times, and several Damanhurian couples have actually remained together for decades).

Address:

Damanhur
Via Pramanzo 3
180 Baldissero Canavese
Turin
Italy
<http://www.damanhur.org>

Massimo Introvigne and PierLuigi Zoccatelli

Sources:

- Berzano, Luigi. Damanhur. Popolo e comunità. Leumann, Italy: Elledici, 1998.
- Cardano, Mario. Lo specchio, la rosa e il loto. Uno studio sulla sacralizzazione della natura. Rome: SEAM, 1997.
- Introvigne, Massimo. "Children of the Underground Temple: Growing Up in Damanhur." In Children in New Religions, edited by Susan J. Palmer and Charlotte Hardman. New Brunswick, NJ, and London: Rutgers University Press, 1999.
- . "Damanhur: A Magical Community in Italy." In New Religious Movements: Challenge and Response, edited by Bryan Wilson and Jamie Cresswell. London and New York: Routledge, 1999.
- Merrifield, Jeff. Damanhur: The Real Dream. London: Thorsons, 1998.
- La Via Horusiana. Principi, concetti e tradizioni della Scuola di Pensiero di Damanhur secondo gli insegnamenti di Oberto Airaudi*. Italy: Damanhur, 1999.

DAOISM

Daoism (or Taoism, as many in the West still call it) is the least understood of all the world's religions, and a considerable misinformation about Daoism exists in the mass culture. To most Westerners (and some Chinese), Daoism suggests an ancient philosophy of spontaneity and naturalness that emphasizes playfulness and going with the flow. That is not an accurate description of Daoism. At the same time, there is much disagreement about what an accurate description of the essence of Daoism would be. Although the basic historical contours, major figures, beliefs, rituals, and so on are not contested, fundamental issues remain a matter of scholarly debate. For example, is Daoism the deep undercurrent of Chinese culture or is it a rare jewel? Did it come from the people or from an elite minority? Has it been a countercultural, revolutionary force, has it aided the political status quo, or is it inherently apolitical? Did Daoism influence popular religion, or did popular religion influence Daoism? These questions raise issues of interpretation and emphasis, of course, and cannot (and should not) be answered definitively. They indicate a continuing quest for deeper understanding in Daoist studies, and reflections upon them will be included in the presentation below.

Daoism (in Chinese, dao-jiao) is the indigenous religion of China. A tradition with many subtraditions, Daoism comprises many sects and schools united by a similar cosmology and a shared goal of union with the Dao, which takes the form of a quest for either physical immortality or mystic transcendence, or both. The belief in immortality and transcendence predates Daoism and is found in every aspect of Chinese culture from medical theory to popular literature. But Daoist texts are most explicit not only in defining transcendence but in providing methods of attaining it. Daoism has embraced many diverse practices and ideas, including a wide variety of medical, gymnastic, and alchemical recipes.

Daoist doctrine owes much to Han cosmology and divination, which is based on the idea of the correspondence of all forces under Heaven (in many ways similar to the Western metaphysical tradition of seeing a correspondence between the microcosm, the “small world” of the individual human being, and the macrocosm, the universe as a whole). The single most important term in the Daoist (and Chinese) worldview is qi (variously translated as energy, breath, pneuma), which has both physical and spiritual aspects. The first known usage of the word qi is in the Neiye, a manual of self-cultivation that predates Laozi (also known as Lao Tzu; usually dated to the sixth century B.C.E.), the fabled founder of Daoism.

Zhang Daoling's vision of a deified Laozi in 142 C.E. in Sichuan province is traditionally thought of as the founding event of religious Daoism. (Indeed one sinologist's famous definition of Daoism begins with a recognition of Zhang Daoling and excludes Laozi). Daoists began to identify themselves as Daoists and became self-conscious bearers of a tradition in the fifth century C.E., and they continue to define themselves that way all over the Chinese world.

Hallmarks of Daoism, then and now, include divination through astro-geomantic principles, longevity techniques, rituals performed by clergy on behalf of the community, and a rich pantheon of divinities. The definition of the Daoist community remains one of the difficult questions. Daoism is not a membership religion. On one hand, clergy are easily identifiable; they wear long hair with a topknot and traditional robes. Their congregation, if one exists, might be a village or neighborhood. In the West, and more and more in China, people with an interest in Daoist philosophy or physical practices may call themselves Daoist.

The sacred books of Daoism are not the ones Westerners are most likely to know, the Daodejing (also known as the Tao Te Ching), supposedly written by the mythical Laozi, and the Zhuangzi (also known as the Chuang Tzu), supposedly written by Zhuangzi, the chief speaker in the book, a philosopher of the fourth century C.E. Rather they are the appendices to the Daozang (Daoist Canon), which includes 1120 titles in 5,305 volumes (making it one of the largest sacred canons in the world). Those texts include philosophy, scriptures, biographies (hagiographies), and ritual texts. Starting in the Tang dynasty (618–906 C.E.), emperors commissioned this evolving library of Daoist works. The latest extant edition was completed in 1445 and until recently had been preserved in only a few monasteries. It was little known to Western or Asian scholars until the 1930s. Complete editions now exist in libraries in China, Japan, and France.

Most textbooks and reference works begin their entry on Daoism by noting the distinction between religious and philosophical Daoism. This is an artificial division used in China today, based on words that have existed in Chinese (daojiao and daoia) only since the late nineteenth century. Most scholars have discarded this distinction.

The idea of religious Daoism as superstition derives from the Confucian literati who served as native informants for Protestant missionaries in China, missionaries who in turn became the first interpreters of Chinese religion to the West. They elaborated on the colorful rituals performed by Daoist priests and were surely reminded of Catholicism. Their informants believed that contemporary Daoism was backwards and a degeneration of pure philosophical Daoism, which was represented by two compilations of ancient provenance mentioned above, the Daodejing and the Zhuangzi. (In fact these books, enormously influential though they are, are not strictly Daoist at all, but only considered such insofar as Daoism is a retrospective bibliographic category.) For most of the twentieth century then, these two books became the only accepted sources of Daoism among scholars, and indeed in society at large.

In the early twentieth century, Chinese intellectuals saw religious Daoism as superstitious and regressive. Communists later adopted this idea, with devastating results for religious Daoism in mainland China. This article (along with related ones in this encyclopedia) emphasizes Daoism as a living religion over Daoism as an abstract philosophy. Still, some basic philosophical terms will be explained.

Dao literally means “way” or “path.” It is a road to follow, or a method, or a principle. By the Zhou dynasty (c. 1050–256 B.C.E.), Dao had the connotation of a “correct or natural way of doing something” (as in today’s popular Daoist texts). The Confucians and other philosophical schools used it to mean guide, teaching, doctrine, or moral truth. Only later did Dao come to mean the way the whole universe operates, or nature. In its cosmological definition, the Dao exists before the creation of the world, and is the origin of all transformation. The Dao, too, has come to be seen as an object to be worshipped: the ultimate reality behind or a part of everything. Thus deities and elements are but various manifestations of the Dao.

History of Daoism. Although there are some earlier texts now coming to light, the Daodejing (literally translated as Tao Virtue Classic) remains the most written about of Chinese classics, with 750 commentaries and counting. It has been read as a self-cultivation manual, a metaphysical treatise, a handbook of political rulership, an agrarian polemic, a chapbook of aphorisms, and a journal of quietist philosophy. Due perhaps to its brevity and lack of proper names, it has become the second most translated text in the world, after the Bible, and is considered a classic of world literature.

Laozi (literally The Old Master, or The Old Guy) reputedly wrote the Daodejing in the sixth century B.C.E. For reasons mentioned above, for a long time the Daodejing was considered the sacred book of Daoism, and Laozi its founder. The legends of Laozi include elements found in founders' hagiographies from around the world, including a virgin birth and astrological signs. With Laozi, however, unlike Jesus or Buddha, there is no evidence for his existence at all.

Many scholars think the Daodejing is a compilation of axioms in no particular order, a composite work by many authors over many years. But its consistent philosophical position and penetrating insight have made it the foremost Daoist scripture. Paradox is its hallmark: Humans are limited yet limitless; we can know through not knowing, act by not acting, achieve by letting go (indeed one of the key terms is wuwei, which means nonaction).

Recent scholarship has shown that the Daodejing was used for the last two millennia as a sacred text, not just a philosophical one. It was considered revealed scripture and chanted and memorized. Beginning in the Han dynasty, Laozi was deified, as Laojun (Lord Lao), a sovereign god who in one incarnation came down from Heaven to instruct sovereigns and reveal sacred scriptures. Laojun was seen as an emanation of pure Dao, and worshipped along with three other manifestations, as the "Three Pure Ones."

The second text of "Classical Daoism" is the Zhuangzi (the Chuang Tzu), as prolix as the Daodejing is terse, bursting with legends, jokes, and satire. As a literary text, its influence has been unequalled. Its vocabulary impacted Daoist imagery and alchemy, but in general, it has been much less important than Laozi to religious Daoism. Its hallmark is a skepticism directed toward religion, language, logic, and reality itself. In the work, Zhuangzi mentions meditative and gymnastic techniques, which has inspired people to practice these techniques under his name. But the author of the Zhuangzi may have made the references ironically and as a way of making light of those who wished to prolong the physical body.

In the last two centuries B.C.E., Huanglao Daoism became a political movement, named for the culture hero Huangdi (the Yellow Emperor) and Laozi. It competed with the Confucians for imperial sponsorship during the Han dynasty.

Two important early popular movements show how Daoism has long been associated with political uprisings. The Yellow Turbans, also known as the Tai ping (Great Peace), was a messianic movement that rose up in what is now Shandong province. It was crushed by the government. The Celestial (or Heavenly) Masters (Tianshi) in what is now Sichuan, begun by Zhang Daoling, ran, for several decades, an independent theocratic state. Zhang divided his territory into twenty-four districts, in imitation of Han dynasty bureaucracy. All member families had to contribute five bushels of rice (hence its nickname Wudoumi, or "Five Pecks of Rice" Daoism) for which they were provided spiritual and military protection and healing. These were the first regular communities of Daoists. Tianshi Daoism included conventionally moral precepts, not too different from Confucianism, thereby reinterpreting the amorality of Laozi and Zhuangzi.

After being forced to settle in other parts of the country, the Celestial Masters gave rise to other medieval Daoist sects. The Celestial Masters are considered to have had great influence until the tenth century, and even today Orthodox Daoists claim direct descent.

Early Daoist groups were millenarian. They shared much in common with Western religions for which the word millenarian was coined, namely a revealed truth, an imminent eschatology, a cosmological dualism, and the prediction of cataclysm in which only members of the group will survive. Indeed, such tendencies are prominent throughout Chinese history and are observable today in such religious groups as TIAN DAO and FALUN GONG. This image of Chinese religion runs counter to the gentler picture usually painted in introductory textbooks and reference works.

Around the same time, Ge Hong (288–343 C.E.) wrote the first systematic treatise on alchemy as a means of seeking immortality. This book, called Baopuzi (The Master who Embraces Simplicity), was for many years considered in Western scholarship to be the epitome of religious Daoism. In fact, the Southerner Ge Hong was more of a freethinking Confucian interested in reenacting the cosmic processes in the laboratory. Although interested in many aspects of Daoism, he was not known to be affiliated with any organized movement.

Two famous medieval Daoist traditions are Shangqing and Lingbao, both dating from the second half of the fourth century C.E. Shangqing began as a series of revelations to the medium Yang Xi (330–386). It is sometimes inaccurately called “Maoshan” Daoism, because Mount Mao (shan means mountain in Chinese), southeast of present-day Nanjing, was one of its main centers.

As studied and translated by Isabelle Robinet and others, these revelations had a high literary quality, engaging in poetic flights of fancy. (The existence of such texts makes Shangqing Daoism different from that of the Celestial Masters, also from contemporary Chinese Buddhism.) Shangqing developed the idea of physical immortality into spiritual salvation. Its texts describing visualization practice of a colorful Daoist pantheon and ecstatic journeys throughout the universe remain an important part of the Daoist Canon.

Lingbao (Numinous Treasure) is the other major school of early medieval Daoism. It borrowed heavily from MAHAYANA BUDDHISM, which by that time had made great inroads in China. Ideas included universal salvation and the liberation of one’s ancestors from the hardships of transmigration. Its precepts were clearly inspired by Buddhist precepts. Lingbao was absorbed into the Shangqing by the mid-sixth century; its liturgy is still an essential part of Daoist ritual, even today.

The Tang dynasty (618–906) was a great period for the Daoist religion, as it was for Chinese culture in general. Daoism became the official state religion. Emperors shared the same surname of Laozi (Li), and considered him as an ancestor. All emperors and their wives took formal Daoist initiation, and thus became great patrons of Daoism. There were no new Daoist revelations or founding of new movements in the Tang, but Daoism became more of a unified tradition. Daoists could be government officials, priests, or hermit poets. (The famous poet Li Po (Li Bai) was an ordained Taoist.)

In the mid-eighth century, the emperor decided that a temple to Laozi was to be erected in both capitals and every prefecture and also published a compendium of all scriptures, known as the Daozang (Daoist Canon). The Tang dynasty also saw the rise of internal alchemy (see below).

The Song dynasty (960–1279) is generally seen as a period of decline. It was also a time when local gods became part of the bureaucracy of the Daoist heaven. Most famously, in the late twelfth century, a local god from Sichuan became known as Wenchang, the god of literature, who is still a regular feature in Daoist temples. Over the next several hundred years, Daoism became more regional, integrated into local communities. At the same time, the Zhang family, who claimed direct descent from the first Celestial Master Zhang Daoling, became the authorizing center of many of the new cults, at first unofficially and then through official decrees. They were based not in Sichuan, but in Jiangxi province, on Dragon Tiger Mountain (Longhushan). The Emperor recognized them as the ZHENGYI (Orthodox Unity) sect.

The Yuan dynasty (1260–1368) saw China, including its religions, come under the control of Mongols. The rulers, called khans, favored a reformed sect called QUANZHEN DAOISM (Complete Reality).

It has been traditional to see Daoism during the Ming dynasty (1368–1644) as in decline, but in fact popular Daoist associations flourished. Official Daoism was severely restricted by the government, but folk festivals and annual pilgrimages, many of which are still celebrated today, sprang up. One example is the promotion of Mount Wudang as a major center of Daoism, associated with internal arts. One important figure associated with the mountain is Zhang Sanfeng, the legendary founder of internal martial arts, including taijiquan (tai chi chuan). Zhang's fame spread through the distribution of collections of esoteric works attributed to him. He is still enshrined in many Daoist temples today.

Also in the Ming, scholars compiled another version of the Daoist Canon (Daozang), containing at least 1,500 separate works from all periods of Daoist history. This edition, which is the earliest one that survives, has been called the great encyclopedia of Chinese indigenous culture.

The Qing dynasty (1644–1911), when China was ruled by Manchus who practiced esoteric Buddhism, continued the trends set in the Ming. The government increased control and unified and standardized Daoist schools, even as more lay associations thrived. By the end of the Qing, only two Daoist sects were extant: the Orthodox Unity school (Zhengyi dao), which predominates in Taiwan and parts of Eastern China, and the Complete Reality school (Quanzhen dao), which makes up 80 percent of Daoists in China today and predominates in Hong Kong.

Daoism Today. The twentieth century saw the somatization and secularization of Daoism through the new conceptual frameworks of qigong (energy work) and traditional Chinese medicine (TCM). The former is a series of longevity and meditative practices derived from Daoism, which spread throughout China beginning in the mid-1950s. The latter was a standardization of Daoist herbal lore and body energetics. Both approaches the Communists advanced as alternatives to Western (bourgeois) medicine.

The constitution of the People's Republic of China officially guarantees freedom of religion, but it is the government that defines religion. Daoism in China is one of five officially sanctioned religions (Buddhism, Islam, Christianity [Protestantism], and Catholicism) are the other four. Fortune telling, divination, and many other activities of Daoist priests were classified as superstition and therefore made illegal.

Since Deng Xiaoping and his liberalization policies came to power in the late 1970s, Daoism has made a comeback in Mainland China. Monasteries have been reopened, and new clergy have been ordained. Still, recent government statistics show that Daoism is relatively tiny compared to Buddhism. There are 600 Daoist temples in all of China, compared to 9,500 Buddhist ones, and 6,000 Daoist priests and nuns, compared to 170,000 Buddhist clergy. Cities that once had a hundred Daoist temples now have one.

And yet Daoist traditions permeate everyday life in China. Calendars listing auspicious days are readily available once again. New sectarian qigong movements, such as Falun Gong, with followers that sometimes number in the millions, draw much of their teachings from Daoism, as well as Buddhism. Popular literature and film, particularly of the martial arts and ghost story genres, are indebted to Daoism.

Mainland China has also seen the growth of the academic study of Daoism since 1979, the beginning of liberalization. (This also coincides with the refounding of the CHINESE DAOIST ASSOCIATION. In 1980, Daoist studies became a permanent part of the curriculum at Sichuan University in Chengdu and at the Beijing Academy of Social Sciences.

Taiwan and Hong Kong never saw any legal restrictions on Daoist practice. In Taiwan, there is little monastic tradition: Daoist priests (primarily of the Zhengyi tradition) are householders who perform rituals for the community. Hong Kong has many active temples

(most of the Quanzhen tradition), which, since the 1997 handover, have tried to extend their influence over Daoism on the Mainland.

The academic study of Daoism in the West, after years of considering religious Daoism of little interest, is now flourishing. As of 2001, several comprehensive reference works and accurate textbooks by top scholars (Livia Kohn, Kristopher Schipper, Fabrizio Pregadio) have recently appeared.

Daoist Practices. Longevity techniques (yangsheng) have always been among the most important concerns within Daoism. Indeed, the earliest Daoist texts extant, those found in the Mawang Dui manuscripts, unearthed from a tomb filled in 168 B.C.E., include not only the Daodejing but the Daoyin Tu (a gymnastics chart). The techniques may include breathing exercises, sexual hygiene, gymnastics, massage, diet, and herbs, but their aim is always to guide the qi. The ideal of the body functioning in harmony was a moral as well as a physical ideal, and the first stage in the quest for immortality.

Sexual techniques (fangzhong: the arts of the bedchamber) have also been known since earliest times. From the Celestial Masters on, formal sexual rites were used to codify marital relations. In the case of celibate practitioners, imaginary union with a divine partner was practiced. Group sex was also practiced: In a ritual called harmonizing the energies (heqi), community members joined in formal sexual intercourse.

The notion of Daoist alchemy has become somewhat popular in the West, but it is widely misunderstood. Jindan (literally, golden elixir or medicine, but translated as alchemy) refers to a range of esoteric doctrines. There are several streams that have contributed to its development.

Alchemy in China has a two thousand-year history. The earliest practices are called waidan (external alchemy), which were the compounding of elixirs through the refining of natural substances: notably, the refining of mercury from cinnabar (both of which were also cosmological symbols) in a search for the pill of immortality. The aim of waidan was not only to change the elixir but also the person who achieves it.

The Tang dynasty was the golden age of alchemy. Literati and certain emperors became interested (sometimes with fatal results). The Tang also saw the shift from waidan to neidan (internal or inner alchemy). (Although as early as the second century C.E., meditation was described in alchemical language—furnace, elixir, and so forth.) The term refers both to the oral and written teachings, the practices derived from the teaching, and the inner state realized through these practices. Neidan held that the laboratory for making transformation was in the human body. Through meditation and concentration, the practitioner could crystallize the ingredients from his own energies (qi).

The most controversial and misunderstood aspect of inner alchemy is sexual practice. Some have said that the “arts of the bedroom” were key to the whole process. But references to these were expurgated from the texts and passed on orally. Certainly one of the key principles of internal alchemy is conserving jing, which translates as essence and also semen. Avoiding ejaculation during coitus is one way to do that. (This technique is perpetuated by popular Daoist groups in the West such as the HEALING TAO).

In general though, the scholarly consensus seems to be that sexual practices are not central to mainstream alchemical traditions, even though those traditions retain the symbolism of sexual union. Indeed, some have said that redirecting semen into the bladder is a case of reading metaphor literally and that the practice is worthless at best and physically harmful at worst.

Inner alchemical texts listed separate practices for women (called nudan). This involved the control of menstrual blood, seen as the source of a woman’s energy, just as seminal fluid is a source in a man's. Women were taught also give birth to a being of light through the top of the head.

Ritual is a key aspect of Daoism. The Daoist canon contains a huge number of liturgical rituals for all aspects of life, including exorcisms, funerals, and thanksgivings. Early Daoist ritual rejected blood sacrifice and the acceptance of money for ritual services and instead emphasized the burning of writings and scriptures, still an important feature of Daoist ritual. Indeed, priests are seen as cosmic bureaucrats and must prepare all documents in triplicate. In fact, they visualize themselves in the courts of the Daoist gods. Ritual is also said to transform the body of the ritualist, and thus ritual is a form of alchemy (or vice versa).

Divination is not a form of Daoist practice, but rather supports and informs Daoism (like traditional Chinese medicine). Divination is an integral part of all Chinese culture, high or low, Buddhist or Daoist. All Daoist services, especially funerary ones, are performed on proper and auspicious dates. Divinatory methods include technical instruments, spirit possession, and more recently spirit writing. Topics in the Daoist canon that deal with divination include the Yijing (I Ching, also called the Book of Changes), calendrics, astrology, weather predictions, geomancy, and physiognomy.

One popular form of divination includes oracle slips; it involves pulling out a wooden stick with a number on it from a box, which refers one to a slip of paper with advice, sometimes in the form of a poem. This practice is officially outlawed in Mainland China. But it plays an important role among both popular and Daoist practitioners in Taiwan and Hong Kong, as well as in overseas Chinese communities. All temples offer these oracle slips (even now on the mainland).

Elijah Siegler

Sources:

- Bokenkamp, Stephen R. Early Daoist Scriptures. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1997.
- Kirkland, Russell. "The Historical Contours of Taoism in China: Thoughts on Issues of Classification and Terminology." Journal of Chinese Religions 25 (Fall 1997): 57–82.
- Kohn, Livia. Daoism and Chinese Culture. Boston: Three Pines Press, 2001.
- , ed. Daoism Handbook. Leiden: Brill, 2000.
- . The Taoist Experience: An Anthology. Albany: State University of New York Press, 1993.
- Little, Stephen. Taoism and the Arts of China. Chicago: The Art Institute of Chicago, 2000.
- Pas, Julian F. Historical Dictionary of Taoism. Lanham, MD: Scarecrow Press, 1998.
- Robinet, Isabelle. Taoism: Growth of a Religion. Stanford, CA: Stanford University Press, 1997.
- Schipper, Kristopher. The Taoist Body. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1993.

Deeper Life Bible Church (Nigeria)

The growth of new Pentecostal and Charismatic churches all over Africa since the 1970s has been most dramatic, but most so in West Africa, especially in Nigeria and Ghana. In these countries, many new churches originated within interdenominational university student groups, most notably the Scripture Union and the Christian Union. These groups later became fellowships, which then grew into full-blown denominations, often led by lecturers and teachers. One of the most remarkable and earliest of these movements in Nigeria is the Deeper Life Bible Church, with branches all over West Africa and intercontinentally, and with over half a million members in Nigeria only ten years after its founding.

William Folorunso Kumuyi (b. 1941) was a former education lecturer at the University of Lagos and an Anglican who became a Pentecostal in the APOSTOLIC FAITH MISSION. He began a weekly interdenominational Bible study group in 1973, which spread to other parts of Nigeria and was called Deeper Christian Life Ministry. The Apostolic Faith Church expelled him in 1975 for preaching without being an ordained minister. Kimuyi began holding retreats at Easter and Christmas, emphasizing healing and miracles and living a holy life. His followers distributed thousands of free tracts, evangelized, and established Bible study groups all over western Nigeria. The first Sunday service held in Lagos in 1982 is regarded as the foundation date of the new church. The following year, Kumuyi sent some of his leading pastors to Yonggi Cho's Full Gospel Central Church (now YOIDO FULL GOSPEL CHURCH) in Seoul, Korea (the largest Christian congregation in the world), and after their visit a system of 5,000 "home caring fellowships" based on the Korean model was instituted.

Unlike more recent new Charismatic churches, which tend to be less prescriptive, Deeper Life emphasizes personal holiness, as evidenced by rejection of the world and the keeping of a strict ethical code—and in this respect it is more like classical Pentecostal churches and some older AFRICAN INITIATED CHURCHES. Kimuyi's own congregation in Lagos was the largest single congregation in Africa. The church prides itself on being a wholly African church, totally independent of Western links, and here again it differs from other newer Pentecostal churches, many of which regularly promote Western Pentecostal media. It has tended to be exclusive in its approach to other churches, but its more recent involvement in ecumenical organizations has tempered this exclusivism somewhat. It considers itself part of the worldwide Pentecostal movement.

Address:

Deeper Life Bible Church
P.M.B. 1004

Yaba, Lagos
Nigeria

Allan H. Anderson

Sources:

- Allan H. Anderson. African Reformation: African Initiated Christianity in the Twentieth Century. Trenton, NJ: Africa World Press, 2001.
- Marshall, Ruth. "Pentecostalism in Southern Nigeria: An Overview." In New Dimensions in African Christianity, edited by Paul Gifford. Nairobi: All Africa Conference of Churches, 1992.
- Ojo, Matthews A. "Deeper Life Bible Church of Nigeria." In New Dimensions in African Christianity, edited by Paul Gifford. Nairobi: All Africa Conference of Churches, 1992.

Deima Church [Église Déimatiste]

