Christians	382,000	98.3	0.88	420,000	405,000
Roman Catholics	368,000	94.6	0.84	404,000	385,000
Anglicans	1,100	0.3	-1.66	800	700
Protestants	1,000	0.3	4.40	1,600	2,000
Nonreligious	3,800	1.0	6.74	6,000	10,000
Muslims	1,900	0.5	4.53	3,000	4,000
Atheists	360	0.1	1.98	700	1,000
Baha'is	260	0.1	1.49	600	1,000
Jews	60	0.0	1.32	80	100
Hindus	40	0.0	0.25	50	60
Total population	389,000	100.0	0.93	430,000	421,000

primary education. Two years later, the church signed an agreement with the government that led to the secularization of secondary education.

Although recognizing the primary role of the Roman Catholic Church, the country's constitution also guarantees freedom of religion to all other religions. However, almost all other religions on the main island are operative primarily among expatriate communities. Within the English-speaking community, the CHURCH OF ENGLAND, the CHURCH OF SCOTLAND, THE SALVATION ARMY, and the METHODIST CHURCH have congregations. The Church of England has been present since 1798. There is a single congregation of the Greek Orthodox Church under the ECUMENICAL PATRIARCHATE and also an Evangelical congregation associated with the CHRISTIAN BRETHERN.

The JEHOVAH'S WITNESSES entered the country just before World War II and have carried on a program of proselytization among the general public, though with no spectacular success. For many years there has also been a group associated with the CHURCH OF CHRIST, SCIENTIST.

The Jewish presence on Malta dates to the Roman period, though it all but died out during the period of control by the Knights of Malta. The present community dates from the end of the eighteenth century, when Malta received Jews who moved from North Africa. The community opened a new synagogue in 1912, but it was demolished in 1979 as part of a development scheme. There are now approximately fifty Jews on the island. There is an equally small Hindu community on Malta, made up of expatriates from India.

Sources:

- Bonnici, M. A. History of the Church in Malta. 2 vols. Valletta, Malta: Empire Press—Catholic Institute, 1967, 1968. Vol. 3. Zabbar, Malta: Veritas Press, 1975.
- Gonzi, M. What Is Happening to Religion in Malta? Valletta, Malta: Pastoral Research Services, 1969.

Manavta Mandir

Manavta Mandir (Be Man Temple) was founded by Faqir Chand (d. 1981), the chief spiritual successor of Shiv Brat Lal, in 1962 in Hoshiarpur, Punjab, India. Originally designed by Faqir to present the spiritual teachings of RADHASOAMI in a more ecumenical and nonsectarian fashion, Manavta Mandir represents a radical interpretation of guru-based spirituality. Faqir argued that all gurus of whatever stripe were ignorant about the real cause of the miracles and visions attributed to them. And because of this ignorance (and what Freud called “transference”), the guru gained power, attention, and devotion from disciples who incorrectly imputed omniscience and omnipresence upon such masters, even though they had neither.

In 1939 Faqir succeeded his guru, Shiv Brat Lal, an initiate of Rai Salig Ram, who was the chief disciple of Shiv Dayal Singh, the founder of Radhasoami. After establishing his main center in Hoshiarpur, Faqir went on yearly trips throughout India and abroad, preaching his unique brand of Radhasoami, which besides the usual moral vows (vegetarianism, sexual purity, no drugs or alcohol, and daily meditation), included a frank admission of ultimate unknowingness. Even after seventy years of meditation and countless admirers, Faqir admitted that he was still unsure what would happen to him after death and did not know whether God really existed.

During his fifth tour of the United States in 1981, Faqir died at the age of ninety-five in Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania. Shortly before his death, Faqir appointed Dr. I. C. Sharma, a philosophy professor residing in the United States, as his chief spiritual successor at Manavta Mandir. Faqir also appointed several other men and women to serve as initiating gurus in his lineage. Dr. Sharma departed significantly from his guru’s teachings and taught a more traditional interpretation of shabd yoga and spirituality. After his wife’s death and because of his increasing health problems, Dr. Sharma appointed Shoonyo Maharaj as his spiritual successor. Since Sharma’s recent death, Shoonyo has been the chief resident guru at Manavta Mandir.

Today, the Manavta Mandir boasts over one hundred thousand followers worldwide.

Address:

Manavta Mandir
c/o Be Man Temple
Sutehri Rd.
Hoshiarpur 146001
Punjab
India

David Christopher Lane

Sources:

- Juergensmeyer, Mark. Radhasoami Reality. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1991.
- Lane, David C. The Radhasoami Tradition. New York: Garland Publishers, 1992.
- The Unknowing Sage: The Life and Work of Baba Faqir Chand*. Walnut, CA: MSAC, 1993.

Mandaeans

The Mandaeans are possibly the only surviving group representing the ancient Mediterranean movement known as Gnosticism. Discovered by Western scholars in the seventeenth century, the community survives in Iraq, with major centers in Baghdad and Basra and members in the towns along the Tigris and Euphrates Rivers between these two cities. Christian missionaries saw them as surviving remnants of the followers of John the Baptist, and the surrounding Muslim community has seen them as “baptizers.” This term, used in the Qur’an, has allowed the group to persist in the otherwise Islamic environment.

The origin of the Mandaeans is somewhat obscure, but they appear to have originated in Palestine as a heretical Jewish sect in the first century B.C.E. They apparently absorbed material, including the practice of baptism, from the movement begun by John the Baptist and from the early Christians. They appear to have left Palestine toward the beginning of the first century or the beginning of the second century C.E. Baghdad became an early center for Mandaeanism following the migration. However, many of their early temples were destroyed in the third century during the period of Zoroastrian ascendancy. Once the Muslims conquered Mesopotamia, the Mandaeans were recognized as a “people of the Book” and hence entitled to official toleration.

In a hierarchical structure, the Mandaean community has been led by the ethnarch (the head of the people) who oversees the bishops and priests. The office of ethnarch has, however, remained vacant since the beginning of the twentieth century. According to the oral history, the destruction of the hierarchy began in 1830, when most of the clerical leadership was killed in an epidemic. At that time, educated laypeople assumed a significant leadership role.

In Mandaean teachings, the cosmos is divided into the world of light (the North) and the world of darkness (the South). Each of the two realms is led by a ruler who heads a hierarchy of powers. The world emerged in the battle between light and darkness (good and evil). Humans are a product of darkness, but they possess a soul, a core of light. At death, the soul is freed and begins a pilgrimage to the realm of light.

Baptism is central to Mandaean worship. Unlike Christian baptism, it is not a once-in-a-lifetime event. Baptisms occur each Sunday, and every member participates several times a year.

A set of sacred books is used by the Mandaeans, but the Ginza (Treasure) is the central book. It is centered in the mass for the dead (masiqta), a ceremony marking the release of the soul from the body and its ascent on its afterlife journey. The Mandaeans' Jewish roots are also marked by dietary laws, including the ritual slaughter of animals and alms giving. Worship occurs in a sanctuary (mandi), a fenced-in area usually built adjacent to a river, the water of which is diverted to provide a baptismal pool with flowing water.

Today an estimated fifteen to twenty thousand Mandaeans remain in southeastern Iraq. There is one small community in Khuzistan, Iran. Several hundred Mandaeans migrated to the United States in the 1980s, and others have migrated to Canada, Australia, New Zealand, and various locations in Europe including the United Kingdom, Sweden, and the Netherlands.

Addresses:

<http://www.mandaeen.com.au/home.htm>

<http://www.geocities.com/usamandaeen/who.html> (unofficial informational site)

Sources:

Foerster, Werner. Gnosis: A Selection of Gnostic Texts. Vol. 2. Coptic and Mandaean Sources. London: Clarendon Press, 1974.

"Mandaean Scriptures and Fragments." The Gnostic Society Library Web site. Posted at <http://www.webcom.com/~gnosis/library/mand.htm>. Accessed December 1, 2001.

Rudolph, Kurt. Gnosis: The Nature and History of Gnosticism. San Francisco: HarperSanFrancisco, 1987.

Yamauchi, E. M. Gnostic Ethics and Mandaean Origins. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1970.

Maori Religion

Aotearoa (New Zealand) was settled late in the first millennium of the Common Era by one or more expeditions from central Polynesia. These settlers over time developed their own distinctive culture utilizing their Polynesian inheritance. Traditional Maori religion, like Maori society, was tribal in character and varied in detail from region to region. Nonetheless, key concepts and practices were evident throughout the country.

Maori stories of creation often begin with the embrace of the Sky-father, Ranginui, and the Earth-mother, Papatuanuku. The offspring of their union and other early descendants include a number of figures common to many regions. Early sources usually refer to these as ancestors (in Maori, tupuna) rather than gods (atua). They were, however, invoked in ritual chants (karakia), and the line between an ancestor and a god was rather thin. These early ancestors often personified natural elements and forces and human values. Tane (whose name means "Man" or "Male") is the main creator in Maori religion and mythology, and he is usually credited with creating the first human being (often making her his wife) out of soil. Other important figures include Tu-mata-uenga, the archetypal human being and warrior; Rongo, the peacemaker from whom the kumara (a highly valued, cultivated sweet potato) originated; Tangaroa, the father of the fish and sea creatures; Tawhirimatea, the father of the winds; and Hine-nui-te-po (literally "Great Woman the Night"), the guardian of the dead.

The more recent ancestral dead, especially dead chiefs, are frequently referred to as gods (atua) in early sources. These more recent ancestors were thought to continue their interest in tribal affairs even after death. They could be called upon to protect their relatives in times of need, such as war or illness. They also communicated advice and predictions using their living relatives as mediums.

Offerings, often of food, were made to atua. In the case of the more recently dead, the food was offered by suspending it near the sacred place where the body was kept. In the case of earlier ancestral figures, these offerings might be made to carved figures, stones, or other objects representing them. Every community had at least one shrine (tuahu) that was the main site where offerings were made to atua and where the priests (tohunga) performed rituals. The exact form and location of the shrine varied considerably from region to region, but a typical feature was a mound or hillock.

The Maori had a cyclic view of life and death. Spirits of the dead were said to go either to Te Po (the underworld) or to Hawaiki (a paradisiacal homeland). Hawaiki was not only the realm of the ancestors but also a source of life and fertility. Like Hawaiki, Te Po was thought to be a place from where infants originated.

A near male relative of the chief often took the role of chief priest. A special role was also accorded one or more high-ranking women. These women performed protective rites and often removed the tapu at the close of sacred activities such as warfare, house-building, and childbirth.

The interior of a Maori meeting house in Waitangi, New Zealand (W. Jacobs/TRIP)

Other men and women also built reputations for their skill in healing, communicating with atua, and prophesying.

The distinction between tapu (sacred) and noa (ordinary) was particularly important in Maori religion and ritual. These concepts also reflected and shaped Maori social structure and the division of labor. The lives of rangatira (chiefs and their near relatives), who had the closest connection to the tribal gods, were the most ritualized. Tutua (ordinary people) pursued their own rituals and observed tapu restrictions to a lesser extent.

Enslaved captives (taurekareka) seem to have been excluded from this ritual life. Gender also affected one's ritual status. Free men generally had a closer association with tapu and a more elaborate ceremonial life than did free women of the same rank.

British missionaries first arrived in the north of New Zealand in 1815. Christianity began to spread rapidly in the 1830s, reaching even those areas of the country remote from Western contact by the mid-1840s. Considerable religious ferment followed, and many new indigenous religious movements developed in the latter half of the nineteenth century.

The Hauhau Church was the first instance of an organized, independent Maori Christianity. Founded in the early 1860s by Te Ua Haumene, a prophet and visionary, the church was Pentecostal and millennialist in orientation. The guiding principle of Te Ua's faith was goodness and peace (Pai Marire). He supported indigenous traditional practices where he thought them congruent with this principle. Because the Hauhau fought against the British settler government and its supporters, and because of settler outrage at the acts of some militant Hauhau, the popular image of the Hauhau became one of a violent apostate cult. In fact, Te Ua founded a tradition of spiritual vision and biblical prophecy that continued to influence subsequent Maori religious leaders after his death.

In 1996, 60 percent of Maori identified as Christian, constituting the vast majority of Maori who identified themselves as having a religion. Over half of Maori Christians belonged to mainline denominations: Anglican, Catholic, a number of Protestant churches, and the CHURCH OF JESUS CHRIST OF LATTER-DAY SAINTS. Two independent Maori churches continue. A substantial minority belong to the Ratana Church, which was founded in the 1920s by Tahupotiki Wiremu Ratana, a visionary and faith healer. A smaller number adhere to the Ringatu Church, founded in the 1860s by the prophet and military leader Te Kooti Arikirangi Te Turuki. Membership is concentrated in North Island in the Bay of Plenty and East Coast regions, particularly among the Tuhoe, Ngati Awa, and Whakatohea peoples. Within this generally Christian context, Maori continue to draw on older indigenous traditions.

Address:

Ratana Church
 Waipounamu St.
 Ratana Pa, Whangaehu
 New Zealand

Adele Fletcher

Sources:

- Elsmore, Bronwyn. 1999. Mana from Heaven: A Century of Maori Prophets. 2d ed. Auckland, New Zealand: Reed Books, 1989, 1999.
- Head, Lyndsay. "The Gospel of Te Ua Haumene." Journal of the Polynesian Society 101, 1 (1992): 7–44.
- Johansen, J. Prytz. The Maori and His Religion in Its Non-ritualistic Aspects. Copenhagen: Munksgaard, 1954.
- Orbell, Margaret. The Illustrated Encyclopedia of Maori Myth and Legend. Christchurch, New Zealand: University of Canterbury Press, 1995.
- Shortland, Edward. Traditions and Superstitions of the New Zealanders: With Illustrations of Their Manners and Customs. 2d ed. London: Longman, Brown, Green, Longmans & Roberts, 1856.

Mar Thoma Syrian Church of Malabar

During the second decade of the nineteenth century, the MALANKARA ORTHODOX SYRIAN CHURCH, a large Orthodox body centered upon the state of Kerala in southern India, came into contact with members of the CHURCH MISSIONARY SOCIETY (CMS) who arrived after Great Britain established its hegemony over the subcontinent. For a period, the CMS attempted to work through the Malankara Church but eventually withdrew and began to work independently. However, the CMS assisted in the formation of the Malankara seminary and in 1829 published the Bible in Malayalam.

One British missionary, Abraham Malpan (1796–1843), initiated a movement to reform the Malankara Church. Citing biblical authority, he suggested a number of changes, especially the abandonment of a variety of observances and ceremonial practices that had been added to the church over the centuries, which he considered corrupt. In response, a reformist wing appeared in the Malankara Church, and the conflict was not resolved. The separation of the two factions was formalized late in the nineteenth century.

By this time a new issue had emerged, namely the authority of the SYRIAC ORTHODOX PATRIARCHATE OF ANTI-IOCH AND ALL THE EAST, from which the Malankara Church had received its episcopal authority. In the 1880s, the Syrian Church asserted a new level of hegemony over the affairs and, more importantly, the property of the Malankara Church. The reformist group, which took the name Mar Thoma Syrian Church of Malabar, rejected the patriarch's authority.

Although continuing in the tradition of the Syrian Church, the Mar Thomas Church has revised its liturgy by removing "unscriptural" elements such as the invocation of the saints. It continues to worship in the Syriac language. Through the twentieth century it moved closer toward the CHURCH OF ENGLAND in India. In 1937 it established a formal relationship, including a partial intercommunion, with the Church of India, Pakistan, Burma, and Ceylon—the Anglican body that eventually merged into the CHURCH OF SOUTH INDIA, the CHURCH OF NORTH INDIA, and the CHURCH OF PAKISTAN. The Mar Thoma Church is now in full communion with each of these united churches, though it refused to enter the merger as it wished to continue its unique liturgical heritage. Full communion with the Church of England was granted in 1974.

The Mar Thoma Church has approximately five hundred thousand members. It sponsors a broad program of general education, social service, and social reform. It is a member of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES.

Address:

Mar Thoma Syrian Church of Malabar Poolatheen

Tiruvalla 689 101
Kerala
India
<http://www.marthomachurch.com/>

Sources:

- Hoke, Donald, ed. The Church in Asia. Chicago: Moody Press, 1975.
- Moffett, Samuel Hugh. A History of Christianity in Asia. Vol. 1, Beginnings to 1500. San Francisco: HarperSanFrancisco, 1992.
- Neill, S. C. A History of Christianity in India. 2 vols. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1984, 1985.

Marian Devotion, World Network of

From its earliest days, the ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH has given an important place to the veneration of the Blessed Virgin Mary, the Mother of Jesus. Marian devotion has become the most significant and popular devotion directed toward the saints in the church. Many Catholics believe that at certain times Mary reveals herself to individual Catholics through visions and messages. The places where these apparitions occur generally develop into shrines acknowledged by the church, sometimes of international importance, such as the shrines of Guadeloupe, FATIMA, and Lourdes.

Since World War II there has been an exponential increase in the number of apparitions of Mary and also in the number of apparitions of other saints and Christ, although these are less frequent. In addition to this quantitative change, there has also been a sociographic shift with regard to those receiving the visions: instead of coming to children, the revelations increasingly come to adults. These visionaries not only spread the messages widely but also interpret them in relation to their own personal views on the church and the world. Messages and interpretations can be distributed much more widely and intensively by adult visionaries and, with or without the support of the media, they are often able to organize the resources necessary to create organizations and publish materials to spread Mary's message.

The Catholic Church has become increasingly wary of the boom in such private devotional activity and groups. Presently one can distinguish two devotional circuits. First, activity focuses on sites of acknowledged apparitions—in Mexico around Guadeloupe, in France around Lourdes, in Ireland around Knock, in Japan around Akita, and so on. Second, activity focuses on devotions connected with apparitions and private revelations not acknowledged by the church—as in Necedah, Wisconsin; Garabandal, Spain; and Conyers, Georgia, (U.S.A.).

The various cults in the latter circuit are each independent, but informally they do make up a network. Their collectivity lies in the type of visitors they attract, visitors who generally can be characterized as devotees and believers with conservative or fundamentalist views. These people often visit several sanctuaries in an eclectic manner, participating in the devotional life of each place. Thus, through their prayer groups and publications, the shrines collectively create an informal devotional network. On the global level the network is quite informal, there being no institutional umbrella organization apart from several publishers who tailor their book lists to these interests. The network is also to a large extent independent of, or parallel to, mainstream Marian devotions.

This network of modern devotions is not static, however. There is continued interaction with the institutional church: on the one hand the Catholic Church ignores or impedes these devotions; on the other hand there are also forces within the church that wish to give elements of this vox populi dei a stronger role because of its indirect benefits for the church. During the pontificate of John Paul II, this interaction has led to the formalization of the devotions of some highly controversial persons (such as Faustina Kowalski and Padre Pio), while some previously “banned” sites of apparitions (such as that of OUR LADY OF ALL NATIONS in Amsterdam and the Queen of Love at Schio, Italy) have received positive toleration, or at least a level of acknowledgment.

Within the network, the messages given at Fatima (and before that yet, the Rue du Bac visions in Paris in 1830 and at La Salette, France, in 1846) are an important source of inspiration. Central themes such as penitence, prayer (particularly the rosary), war, and the activity of the Devil point to an approaching end of time and a definitive separation of good and evil persons. Since the fall of communism, new enemies have also been found, including apostasy, social degeneracy, abortion, homosexuality, euthanasia, and the corruption of the church and many of its priests, this last concern producing a countermovement: the Marian Movement of Priests. In addition to Fatima, in the course of the twentieth century the Italian Franciscan Padre Pio has also become an important factor or spiritual guide for many “deviant” devotions.

Important devotions and shrines in the network include, among many others, Kérizien, France (established 1938); Amsterdam, the Netherlands (1945); Montichiari, Italy (1946); Marienfried, Germany (1946); Heroldsbach, Germany (1949); Necedah, Wisconsin (1949); Eisenberg, Austria (1955); Garabandal, Spain (1961); San Damiano, Italy (1961); Akita, Japan (1969); Bayside, Wisconsin (1970); MEDJUGORJE, Bosnia-Herzegovina (1981); Soufaniyé, Syria (1982); Maasmechelen, Belgium (1982); Melleray, Ireland (1985); Schio, Italy (1985); and Manduria, Italy (1992).

Among the organizations supporting the world Marian network are the APOSTLES OF INFINITE LOVE, based in Quebec, Our Lady of the Roses Shrine in Bayside, New York, and the Order of Saint Charbel in Australia, which supports the papal claims and Marian contacts of William Kamm, known as the Little Pebble. The network has popular support among Roman Catholics in Africa who have an approved shrine at Kibeho, Rwanda. The Ugandan Marian movement took a tragic turn when the members of THE MOVEMENT FOR THE RESTORATION OF THE TEN COMMANDMENTS were killed in March 1999.

Addresses:

By its very nature, this informal network has no address of its own, though each of the individual devotional sites does. Relevant international network publishers include the following:

Parvis-Verlag
1648 Hauteville
Switzerland
<http://www.parvis.ch> (in French and German)

Miriam-Verlag GmbH
Brühlweg 1
Jestetten
Germany
<http://www.miriam-verlag.de> (in German)

Segno Ed.
Via E. Fermi 80
33010 Tavagnacco (UD)
Italy
<http://www.edizionisegno.it> (in Italian)

TAN Books & Publishers
P.O. Box 424
Rockford, IL 61105
<http://www.tanbooks.com/> (in English)

Peter Jan Margry

Sources:

Ferrarotti, Franco, et al. Studi sulla produzione sociale del sacro. Vol. 1. Naples: Liguori, 1978.

Kohle, Hubert. "Fundamentalistische Marienbewegungen." In Handbuch der Marienkunde, edited by Wolfgang Beinert and Heinrich Petri, 60–106. Vol 2. Regensburg, Germany: F. Pustet, 1997.

"Major Apparitions of Jesus and Mary." Posted at <http://www.apparitions.org>. Accessed February 6, 2002.

Margry, Peter Jan. "La terra di nessuno dei devoti: Devozioni informali tra localismo e transnazionalismo nell'Europa contemporanea." Sanctorum (2002).

Marian Library/International Marian Research Institute. "Marian Apparitions of the Twentieth Century." Posted at <http://www.udayton.edu/mary/resources/aprtable.html>. Accessed February 6, 2002.

Perry, Nicholas, and Loreto Echeverría. Under the Heel of Mary. London: Routledge, 1988.

Walsh, Brian. "Appearances of Mary." Posted at <http://www.members.aol.com/bjw1106/marian.htm>. Accessed February 6, 2002.

Zimdars-Swartz, Sandra L. Encountering Mary: Visions of Mary from La Salette to Medjugorje. New York: Avon Books, 1992.

Maronite Catholic Church

The Maronite Catholic Church, one of several Eastern-rite churches in communion with the ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH, originated in the charismatic ministry of a man later canonized as Saint Maron (d. 5th century). He gathered a religious community in what is today Syria, and his followers founded a monastery west of Antioch (in present-day Turkey). When Muslims came into the area, the community relocated to the mountainous region of Lebanon and survived as a somewhat isolated community. From among their bishops, they elected a leader who assumed the title of patriarch of Antioch and all the East.

Following the establishment of a Crusader kingdom headquartered at Antioch in the twelfth century, Maronite church leaders came into contact with bishops of the Roman Catholic Church. Subsequently, in 1182, the Maronites affiliated with the Catholic Church. They retained their Syriac liturgy, with modifications to bring them into alignment with the Church of Rome, and they affirmed those beliefs of the Roman Catholic Church that distinguished it from the Eastern Orthodox churches. The isolated Maronites saw themselves as having never been out of communion with Rome, though no active relationship had existed since the Islamic move into the region.

In the sixteenth century, the Maronite homeland was incorporated into the Ottoman Empire and periodically suffered persecution from Turkish authorities. The most notable incident of persecution, a massacre of thousands of Maronites in 1860, led to the intervention of French forces in the area and the formal establishment of French control over Lebanon following World War I. Following the massacre, Maronites also began to migrate away from their homeland, and by the end of the century, they had founded expatriate communities in North and South America and Australia. The establishment of an independent Lebanon in 1944 and the civil war that began in 1975 further encouraged migration.

At the end of the 1990s, the Maronite Church claimed some 3 million members. The church has ten dioceses in Lebanon and six additional dioceses in neighboring countries. Overseas dioceses now exist in Cyprus, Greece, Argentina, Brazil, Mexico, Canada, the United States, and Australia. There are scattered congregations across Europe.

The church sponsors two seminaries and a college in Rome. The University of the Holy Spirit at Kasnik offers advanced theological training. There are a number of Maronite religious orders and one missionary community, the Maronite-Lebanese Missionaries. The church is active in the Middle East Council of Churches. Unlike most Eastern Rite churches affiliated with the Roman Catholic Church, there is no Maronite church that exists as an Eastern Orthodox body.

Address:

c/o His Beatitude Mar Nasrallah
Boutros Cardinal Sfeir
Bkerkē
Lebanon
<http://www.bkerke.org.lb/>

Sources:

Liesel, N. The Eastern Catholic Liturgies: A Study in Words and Pictures. Westminster, MD: Newman Press, 1960.
Roberson, Ronald G. The Eastern Christian Churches: A Brief Survey, 5th ed. Rome: Edizioni Orientalia Christiana, Pontificio Istituto Orientale, 1995.

Marshall Islands

Until 1978, the Marshall Islands shared a history with the rest of Micronesia (including the Caroline Islands, Guam, and the Marianas). Since the Spanish first came into Micronesia in the sixteenth century, these islands had been successively under Spanish, German, U.S., Japanese, and then again, U.S. control. Toward the end of World War II, the Marshalls were the site of some of the bloodiest battles leading up to the Japanese defeat. After the war they were also part of the Micronesian Trust Territory given the United States. The Marshalls came to have a special role after the Bikini and Kwajalein atolls became the sites of extensive nuclear bomb tests beginning in 1946.

In 1979 a referendum led to the establishment of the Federated States of Micronesia, but the Marshall Islands did not become a part of the new nation. The Marshalls remained in a trust relationship with the United States. The islands were granted local autonomy, but the United States still controlled their security, and for a period it continued to use Kwajalein as a missile-testing site and a dump for toxic wastes. In 1986 the Marshalls became a Free Associated State of the United States. Although it still has a special relationship with the United States, the Marshalls now control their own foreign policy. In 1990 the nation was admitted to the United Nations.

Roman Catholics arrived in the Marshalls in the 1500s and began the Christian church's warfare against the indigenous religion, a form of polytheism that gave central

Status of religions in the Marshall Islands, 2000-2050

Followers	2000			2025	2050
	total	%	rate
Christians	62,000	96.6	3.39	123,000	174,000
Protestants	67,400	105.0	3.65	124,000	175,000
Independents	8,100	12.6	4.14	16,000	23,000
Roman Catholics	5,200	8.2	3.56	11,000	17,000
Baha'is	1,000	1.6	4.14	2,500	5,000
Ethnoreligionists	620	1.0	-1.41	500	500
Nonreligious	530	0.8	4.85	1,200	2,500
Total population	64,200	100.0	3.34	127,000	182,000

place to two deities, the Great Spirit and the Lord of the Nether Regions. That religion has all but disappeared. In 1905 the Catholic work in the Marshall and Caroline Islands was set apart as a separate diocese, with a bishop residing on Guam. More recently, reflecting the different courses taken by those two sets of islands, the work in the Marshalls has been separated from the diocese and placed under an apostolic prefecture.

Missionaries from Hawaii connected to the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions, a Congregationalist organization, arrived in the Marshalls from the Caroline Islands in 1857. That work has grown into the United Church of Christ–Congregational in the Marshall Islands, which became independent following the formation of the UNITED CHURCH OF CHRIST in 1957. It is now a member of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES.

The CHURCH OF JESUS CHRIST OF LATTER-DAY SAINTS opened a mission in the Marshalls in 1977 as part of its general expansion in Micronesia at the time. The work began on the island of Majuro, and it moved on to Kwajalein the following year. Finally it expanded to Arno and Mili, on the eastern edge of Micronesia.

Missionaries of the SEVENTH-DAY ADVENTIST CHURCH arrived in Micronesia, including the Marshalls, in 1930. Their work is now part of their Guam Micronesia Mission. The ASSEMBLIES OF GOD opened work in 1964. There is one center of the AHMADIYYA MOVEMENT IN ISLAM Mission on the island of Majuro.

Sources:

Barrett, David. The Encyclopedia of World Christianity. 2d ed. New York: Oxford University Press, 2001.

Sam, H. "A New Dawn: Christianity in the Marshall Islands, 1857–1885." M.A. thesis, Pacific Theological Seminary, Suva, Fiji, 1988.

Martinique

Martinique, an island in the Lesser Antilles on the eastern edge of the Caribbean Sea, is an overseas department of France. It was originally inhabited by the Arawak people, but they were displaced by the Carib people around 1000 C.E. They called the island Madinina. Columbus visited the island in 1502.

The French first settled on the island in 1635. After slavery was declared legal in 1664, enslaved Africans began to arrive, and the French began to develop the sugarcane business. Through the 1700s, Africans became the major element in the population and were responsible for a series of antislavery revolts. Slavery was abolished in 1794 but was reintroduced by Napoleon in 1802. It is believed that Napoleon's decision was strongly affected by his wife, the empress Josephine, who was born on Martinique. Slavery was finally abolished in 1848. Chinese and Indian (primarily from Tamil Nadu) laborers were brought to Martinique to replace Africans who refused to work on the plantations.

The island became the sight of one of the most famous of modern disasters when on May 8, 1902, Mount Pele erupted and within a matter of minutes killed all but one of the inhabitants of the town of Saint Pierre.

The ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH came to Martinique with the French and was established by members of the Dominican, Jesuit, and Capuchin orders. A diocese was estab-

Status of religions in Martinique, 2000-2050

Followers	2000			2025	2050
	total	%	rate
Christians	383,000	97.0	0.89	430,000	429,000
Roman Catholics	366,000	92.6	0.93	410,000	410,000
Protestants	23,700	6.0	1.45	30,000	35,000
Marginal Christians	8,000	2.0	1.64	15,000	20,000
Nonreligious	5,400	1.4	2.78	9,000	12,500
Baha'is	2,000	0.5	4.56	3,500	5,000
Atheists	1,800	0.5	1.35	2,500	3,000
Hindus	940	0.2	1.61	1,600	2,600
Muslims	860	0.2	2.06	1,600	2,500
Spiritists	420	0.1	2.11	700	1,000
Chinese folk-religionists	240	0.1	1.71	400	600
Buddhists	160	0.0	1.22	300	500
Neoreligionists	20	0.0	7.18	60	120
other religionists	210	0.1	0.44	300	400
Total population	395,000	100.0	0.93	450,000	457,000

lished in 1850, but the church had a significant problem recruiting priests. In 1909 the island was placed under the Congregation for the Propagation of the Faith at the Vatican, which asked the Holy Ghost Fathers to assume responsibility for the island. Though the overwhelming majority of the population professes the Catholic faith, church attendance is relatively low. The single bishop for Martinique resides in Fort-de-France.

The Reformed Church of France entered the island informally, as French government and military personnel were stationed there, and continues primarily as an expatriate church. The SEVENTH-DAY ADVENTIST CHURCH began missionary work on the island in 1924. The Martinique Conference was organized in 1974. The conference is now part of the French Antilles-Guiana Union Mission. Both the Baptists and the JEHOVAH'S WITNESSES entered Martinique at the end of World War II and have since built a substantial presence. There are also congregations of the ASSEMBLIES OF GOD and the CHURCH OF THE NAZARENE.

Possibly the most interesting movement on the island is the Maldevidan religion, a mixture of Hinduism and Catholicism found primarily in the northern part of Martinique. The principal deity is Maldevidan, who is pictured riding a horse and is often identified as Jesus Christ. Marieman, the principal female deity, is also identified as the Virgin Mary and the mother of Maldevidan. As with Vodou, Maldevidan ceremonies involve drumming, ritual possession by spirit entities, and animal (sheep, roosters) sacrifice.

There is a small Jewish community on Martinique that finds its focus in a single Orthodox center in Fort-de-France. Islam is present in a small community of Syrian expatriates. The first spiritual assembly of the BAHAI FAITH opened in the late 1960s. And as is true of most French-speaking lands, the ANCIENT AND MYSTICAL ORDER ROSAE CRUCIS has established several lodges.

Sources:

Horowitz, M., and M. Klaus. "The Martinique East Indian Cult of Maldevidan." Social and Economic Studies 10, 1 (March 1961): 93–100.

La Croix, O. "The French Presence and the Church in Martinique and Guadeloupe." In New Mission for a New People: Voices from the Caribbean, edited by D. I. Mitchell. New York: Friendship Press, 1977.

Martinism

Martinism is an esoteric system derived from the teachings of three French masters active between the late eighteenth and early nineteenth centuries, namely Jacques Martinez de Pasqually (1727–1774), Jean-Baptiste Willermoz (1730–1824), and Louis-Claude de Saint-Martin (1743–1803). In 1754 Martinez de Pasqually established the Masonic Order of the Elected Knights Cohen, a new Masonic system with three degrees beyond the three traditional Masonic degrees. The second and third Cohen degrees taught an esoteric doctrine called "reintegration," which included both kabbala and theurgy. A Cohen priesthood enabled initiates to control evil spirits and to communicate with angels. Silence, prayer, and fasting prepared the initiate for the mysterious apparition of la Chose (the Thing).

Differences do exist between Martinez's system (Martinism) and the more typically Masonic and Christian teachings of Willermoz, which eventually led to the establishment of the Reformed Scottish Rite of Freemasonry. Saint-Martin joined the Elected Knights Cohen in 1768 and eventually became Martinez's personal secretary. After Martinez's death, Saint-Martin became suspicious of all forms of occultism, and his ideas evolved into an idiosyncratic form of mystical Christianity. The Martinist tradition, in line with these developments, includes both a Martinezist wing, which maintains the kabbalistic practices, and a Saint-Martinist wing, more interested in mysticism than in theurgy.

In 1891, only one century after Martinez's own initiatives, the Spanish-born French esoteric master Gérard Encausse, called "Papus," (1865–1916), together with Augustin Chaboseau (1869–1946), established an organization known as the Martinist order. Both Papus and Chaboseau claimed to have been initiated into a chain going back to Martinez and Saint-Martin, although historians dispute their claims. After Papus's death in 1916, the Martinist order fragmented into an extremely complicated series of splinter groups. Most Martinists recognized Charles Détré, known as "Téder" (1855–1918), as Papus's successor, but he died only two years after taking office.

Téder and his successor, Jean Bricaud (1881–1934), changed the rituals in order to make them more Martinezist, closed the doors of their order to non-Freemasons and women, moved the headquarters from Paris to Lyons, and fought attempts by the American Rosicrucian order (AMORC) to create and lead an international federation of esoteric orders. Favorable to AMORC, on the other hand, was another Martinist branch known as the Martinist (and) Synarchist order, led by Victor Blanchard (1878–1953), who in 1937 transferred his Martinist authority to Harvey Spencer Lewis (1883–1939), founder of the ANCIENT AND MYSTICAL ORDER ROSAE CRUCIS (AMORC). In 1939, however, AMORC officially recognized as an allied Martinist order a group known as the Traditional Martinist order, founded by Chaboseau and Victor-Émile Michelet (1861–1938). This organization has continued its activities to the present day, in close cooperation with AMORC.

As for Bricaud's order, his successor, Constant Chevillon (1880–1944), renamed it the Martinist Martinezist order, underlining once again the coveted connection with Martinez. Assassinated by Nazi collaborators in 1944, Chevillon was succeeded by Henri-Charles Dupont (1877–1960). In 1952, Papus's son Philippe Encausse (1906–1984) reestablished a Martinist order in a form similar to his father's, open to both non-Freemasons and women. In 1960 Dupont supervised the merger of his Martinist Martinezist order with Encausse's Martinist order, which remains to this day the largest Martinist organization worldwide. In 1942 Robert Ambelain (1907–1997) established a Martinist Order of the Elected Cohens, which after 1960 remained the sole Martinezist organization in the world. In 1962 the Ambelain and Encausse orders entered into a short-lived union, going their separate ways again in 1967. Thus the Martinist scenario appears to be divided today between two large organizations, Encausse's Martinist order and AMORC's Traditional Martinist order, as well as a number of smaller Martinezist groups.

Some scholars use the category of Kremmerzian Martinism to indicate the different competing occult orders following the traditions of the Italian esoteric master Giuliano Kremmerz (pseudonym of Ciro Formisano, 1861–1930). Kremmerz was influenced by a number of esoteric authors connected with a branch of the Martinist tradition in Naples, Italy. Most of the Kremmerz-inspired orders go under the name Brotherhood of Myriam (one is called Martinist Kremmerzian order, however) and have a Martinist connection, and in turn Kremmerz influenced several branches of Italian Martinism. Some but by no means all of the Kremmerzian orders appear to be mostly interested in practices of “internal alchemy,” including forms of sexual magic.

Among the several contemporary Martinist groups whose relationship to the older Martinist groups is a matter of claims and counterclaims is the Martinist Order of the Knights of Christ. The International College of Esoteric Studies is a Martinist educational organization. There are also several groups calling themselves the British Martinist order.

Addresses:

Martinist Order of the Knights of Christ
P.O. Box 514
New Providence, NJ 07974
<http://home.att.net/~omccusa/>

International College of Esoteric Studies
P.O. Box 1201
Bridgetown
Barbados
http://www.geocities.com/hiram_abyss/ICES.html

British Martinist Order (one of several) BMO Administration
P.O. Box 1
Oldham, Lancashire OL4 4WW
United Kingdom
<http://www.bmosite.org/>

Massimo Introvigne and PierLuigi Zoccatelli

Sources:

- Amadou, Robert, and Alice Joly. De l'Agent Inconnu au Philosophe Inconnu. Paris: Denoël, 1962.
- Ambelain, Robert. Le Martinisme, Histoire et doctrine. Paris: Niclaus, 1946.
- Encausse, Philippe. Science occulte ou 25 années d'occultisme occidentale: Papus, sa vie, son œuvre. Paris: OCIA, 1949.
- Le Forestier, René. La Franc-Maçonnerie occultiste au XVIIIe siècle et l'Ordre des Elus Coëns. Paris: La Table d'Émeraude, 1987.
- Melchior, Frater. “Survey on Modern Martinists Orders.” The Enlightened Page Web site. Posted at <http://www.geocities.com/Athens/Acropolis/1896/mart.html>. Accessed September 25, 2001.

<http://www.geocities.com/Athens/Acropolis/1896/mart.html>. Accessed September 25, 2001.

Van Rijnberk, Gérard. Martinés de Pasqually: Un thaumaturge au XVIIIe siècle. 2 vols. Hildesheim, Germany: Georg Olms, 1982.

Master Ching Hai Meditation Association

The Master Ching Hai Meditation Association emerged in the 1980s around the teachings and person of Master Ching Hai Wu Shang Shih, a Vietnamese teacher in the Sant Mat tradition. Raised as a Roman Catholic in Vietnam, Ching Hai was introduced to Buddhism by her grandmother. As a young adult, she moved to England to continue her education and then lived for a short time in France and Germany. While in Germany she was married to a Buddhist.

During the early years of her marriage, she pursued a spiritual quest at the feet of several different Eastern teachers, after which she left home to find Enlightenment. Her quest had been determined by her reading of the Buddhist Surangama Sutra, which spoke of the Quan Yin Method as the surest means to Enlightenment, but she could locate no Buddhist teacher who could inform her of the nature of the method. Finally she visited India, where she met Thakar Singh, a teacher in the RUHANI SATSANG Sant Mat tradition, who instructed her in the shabd yoga of the sound current. The Sant Mat teaches that the world was brought into existence by the Creative Word or divine Sound Current. Through the use of mantras (japa yoga) and associated meditative techniques, individuals can reconnect to the spiritual realms.

Ching Hai concluded that shabd yoga was the Quin Yin Method she had been seeking. After her initiation by Thakar Singh, she moved to Taiwan and began to teach. Through the 1980s she met with an increasingly positive response, and her following expanded through Southeast Asia and by the early 1990s, around the world. While followers learn and practice shabd yoga, they are also asked to adhere to five precepts: to refrain from (1) taking the life of any sentient beings, (2) lying, (3) stealing, (4) illicit sex, and (5) intoxicants. Followers adopt a vegan or lactovegetarian diet.

Ching Hai is regularly pictured in the movement's literature as wearing designer clothing. In 1995 she created an organization to sell the clothing, which she had herself designed, with the understanding that the income would be used to support humanitarian activities, primarily Vietnamese refugee camps and flood victims in Southeast Asia. In December 1999 she attended and spoke at the meeting of the Parliament of the World's Religions in Cape Town, South Africa. The growth of the Master Ching Hai Meditation Association has not always been smooth, however; it has been accused of financial irregularities in Taiwan and has been banned since 1999 in the People's Republic of China, where it has been added to the list of cult-like organizations.

Address:

Ching Hai Meditation Association
P.O. Box 9
Hsihu, Miaoli County
Taiwan
<http://www.chinghai.com> (English and Chinese)

André Laliberté and David Christopher Lane

Source:

The Supreme Master Ching Hai. The Key of Immediate Enlightenment. 2 vols. Miaoli Hsien, Taiwan: Meditation Association in China, 1991.

Mata Amritanandamayi Math

The network of centers around the world devoted to extending the ministry of Indian spiritual teacher Mataji Amritanandamayi (b. 1951; often called “Amma”), emerged in India in the 1960s. Mataji grew up in Kerala in an atmosphere of family devotion to Krishna, but unlike the other children, at the age of seven she began to compose bhajans (holy songs) to him. She identified with him closely and seemed to be able to assume various moods attributed to him or to his consort Devi in a way that facilitated the devotion of others. In the early 1970s, when Mataji had just entered her young adulthood, her neighbors began to recognize her as an enlightened being. Among these was her father, who gave her land upon which to create an ashram (religious community).

Mataji’s local ministry began to spread, first throughout Kerala and then all of India. In 1988 she built the first of the unique temples associated with her. These Brahmastanams, or Abodes of the Absolute, are the residence of four deity forms, each installed as part of a single image representing the principle of the Unity of God. In the temples, devotees practice a form of bhakti yoga, a spirituality based in devotional service to God, by meditating and singing Mataji’s bhajans. Devotion to a wide variety of deity figures, including Jesus, Buddha, the Virgin Mary, and so on, is allowed and even encouraged, as Mataji believes that all religions are spiritual paths that lead to the same One God.

International expansion began in 1987, when Mataji made her first tour in the West, centered in the United States, France, and Switzerland. This tour had been made possible by Western disciples who had encountered her in India. Through the 1990s more than one hundred centers emerged across Europe, the Middle East, Singapore, and Australia. In 2001, there were more than thirty such centers in North America.

The Mata Amritanandamayi Math supports several social agencies in India—the Amrita Institute of Medical Sciences and Research Centre in Cochin, Kerala; Amrita Niketanam, an orphanage in Parippally; and Anbu Illam, a home for the aged in Sivakasi, Tamil Nadu. In 1996 Mataji inaugurated a project called Amrita Kuteeram, which within five years (2001) constructed some twenty thousand houses in different parts of India. The Math has also instituted a program to provide pensions for widows and elderly women who are not receiving government support. These and like programs are seen as a manifestation of Mataji’s compassion for all people.

Address:

Mata Amritanandamayi Math
Amritapuri, Kollam
Kerala
India
<http://www.amritapuri.org/>
<http://www.ammachi.org>

Sources:

Amritanandamayi, Mataji. Awaken Children! 2 vols. Valickavu, Kerala: Mata Amritanandamayi Mission Trust, 1989–1990.
Balagopal. The Mother of Sweet Bliss. Valickavu, Kerala: Mata Amritanandamayi Mission Trust, 1985.
“Holy Woman Brings the Mother Spirit to the West.” Hinduism Today 9, 4 (July 1987): 1, 15.

Mauritania

The present state of Mauritania lies on the western edge of the Sahara Desert in North Africa. It gained independence in a process that began following World War II, when it was named a French overseas province. It gained independence in 1960 and over the next six years struggled to free itself from French economic control. However, the history of the region begins in the fifth century C.E., when the Berber people who inhabited the region organized the ancient kingdom of Uagadu, centered on the city of Koumbi-Selah in southern Mauritania, near the Mali border. At its height, Koumbi-Selah was one of the largest cities in the world. During the years of this kingdom, Islam swept across Africa.

In 1076 the armies of the Almoravid Empire, centered on Marrakesh (present-day Morocco), conquered Uagadu and

Status of religions in Mauritania, 2000–2050

Followers	2000			2025	2050
	total	%	rate
Muslims	2,646,000	99.1	2.81	4,738,000	6,550,000
Ethnoreligionists	13,900	0.5	2.36	15,000	16,000
Christians	6,600	0.3	-0.53	7,600	9,000
Roman Catholics	4,200	0.2	-1.69	4,000	4,000
Independents	1,700	0.1	1.26	2,500	3,500
Protestants	600	0.0	4.14	1,000	1,400
Nonreligious	2,300	0.1	0.51	5,000	8,000
Baha'is	270	0.0	5.94	500	1,000
Atheists	200	0.0	2.26	300	500
Total population	2,670,000	100.0	2.80	4,766,000	6,585,000

introduced Islam to central Africa but left a decade later to concentrate on the conquest of Spain. However, in the next century the Almoravids were replaced by a new Muslim empire, the Almohad, which brought all of Mauritania under its hegemony. This second empire collapsed in the next century, leaving Islam as its enduring legacy.

Over the next centuries, the region experienced intermittent wars between the Berbers and the Arabs. Their conflict came to a head at the end of the fifteenth century, when the Arabs won the Cherr Baba War. Their victory led to the establishment of a stratified society, with the Arabs (the hassani) at the top, the Berbers in the middle, and the residents in the south, the Fulah and the Soninkes, at the bottom. In 1858 the French invaded Mauritania, but they were not able to pacify the land until the 1930s.

Islam has been the religion of the region for a millennium and remains the official religion of the independent nation of Mauritania. As the leader of an Islamic state, the president must be a Muslim. He is assisted by a High Islamic Council. Muslims are prohibited by their religion from converting to another religion. The government provides some support to the Central Mosque in the capital city, but other mosques are supported by their members. Most Muslims in Mauritania are followers of the Maliki school, although the Sufi orders of QADIRIYYA, TIJANIYYA, and SHADHILIYYA are also prominent.

The ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH came into Mauritania with the French army but only established a settled organization at the beginning of the twentieth century. The church has been able to continue a presence in the post-French years, primarily serving expatriates from France, Senegal, and the Canary Islands. Protestants attempted to evangelize the country on several occasions but have failed to establish any work apart from the expatriate community. Attempts at proselytization are controlled by a law that bans the publication of any material that is considered against Islam or that contradicts or otherwise threatens Islam. Christian churches (mostly Catholic) now exist in Nouakchott, Atar, Zouirat, Nouadhibou, and Rosso. The expatriate community of Christians and the few citizens who are considered Christians from birth practice their religion without government interference and may possess Bibles and other Christian religious materials in their homes.

Sources:

- Sakho, M. A. La littérature religieuse mauritanienne. Nouakchott, Mauritania: Imprimerie Nouvelle, 1986.
- Status of Christianity Profile: Mauritania*. Nairobi, Kenya: Daystar University College, 1988.
- Stewart, C. C., with E. K. Stewart. Islam and Social Order in Mauritania: A Case Study from the Nineteenth Century. Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1983.

Mauritius

Mauritius, an island in the Indian Ocean east of Madagascar, was uninhabited until it was settled by the Portuguese in the 1500s. The independent nation of the same name includes this island and several nearby islands, the largest of which is Rodriguez Island. Abandoned by the Portuguese, it was resettled in 1598 by the Dutch, who gave it its name. The French recolonized it in 1715, and the British won control in 1814 as part of their prize after the defeat of Napoleon. By 1835, when slavery was abolished, Africans constituted 70 percent of the population. To deal with the labor shortage after the abolition of slavery, sugar plantation owners turned to India. Over the next century almost half a million Indians from Tamil Nadu and Andhra Pradesh in southern India and from various spots in northern India entered the country as indentured servants. They eventually constituted the majority of the island's population, by latest count some 68 percent.

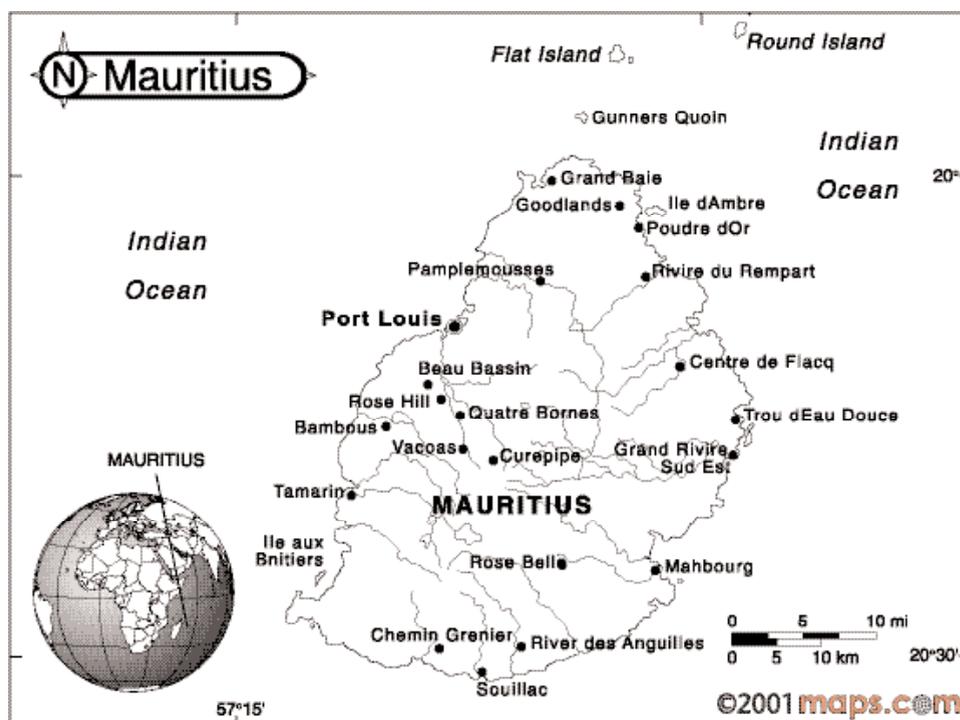

Hinduism is now the dominant religion of Mauritius. The Indian immigrants brought with them the spectrum of traditional Hindu beliefs and practices and have established both VAISHNAVISM and SAIVISM throughout the country. There are also a large number of adherents of the ARYA SAMAJ, a nineteenth-century reform movement that has found an affinity with American Unitarianism. Most Arya Samaj members have northern Indian heritage.

In the twentieth century, a variety of new Hindu movements have appeared in Mauritius. The country was an early home of the INTERNATIONAL SOCIETY FOR KRISHNA CONSCIOUSNESS, an American movement with roots in Bengali devotional (bhakti) yoga. There is also a group attached to the VEDANTA SOCIETIES/RAMA-KRISHNA MATH AND MISSION, also based in Bengal.

The Indians also brought Islam with them. Muslims constitute about 16 percent of the Mauritian population, the great majority being Sunni Muslims of the Hanafite school. There are also Sunnis of the Shafiite school, some Shi'as, and a few Ismailis, affiliated with the SHIAH FATIMI ISMAILI TAYYABI DAWOODI BOHRA. The largest dissenting group are the Ahmadiyyas, not recognized as orthodox Muslims by the rest of the community.

Christianity was established on Mauritius following the colonization by the French. The Lazarist Fathers, a Catholic order, arrived in 1722. They surrendered their work to the BENEDICTINES in 1819, following the change of political control from France to Great Britain. At the same time, a vicariate was established that included Madagascar, South Africa, and Australia, with Port Louis, the Mauritian capital, as its center. Port Louis was named a diocese in 1852. The ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH is the largest Christian body on the island of Mauritius and claims the allegiance of most of the residents of Rodriguez Island as well.

The CHURCH OF ENGLAND initiated work on Mauritius in 1810 and remains the largest Protestant church. In the twentieth century the Church of England granted autonomy to its overseas affiliates and the Mauritian parishes are now part of the CHURCH OF THE PROVINCE OF THE INDIAN OCEAN. Mauritius has been set aside as a diocese. The archbishop resides in the Seychelles. Shortly after the Church of England was established in Mauritius, mission-

Status of religions in Mauritius, 2000-2050

Followers	2000			2025	2050
	total	%	rate
Hindus	508,000	44.0	0.69	529,000	446,000
Christians	377,000	32.6	1.07	490,000	550,000
Roman Catholics	310,000	26.8	0.74	340,000	334,000
Protestants	110,000	9.5	1.48	150,000	180,000
Anglicans	5,000	0.4	-0.77	4,500	4,000
Muslims	195,000	16.9	1.08	240,000	260,000
Nonreligious	29,300	2.5	1.19	50,000	70,000
Baha'is	21,800	1.9	1.96	35,000	65,000
Chinese folk-religionists	15,400	1.3	1.10	20,000	30,000
Buddhists	2,900	0.3	0.61	2,500	2,000
Sikhs	2,500	0.2	1.46	3,600	4,800
Ethnoreligionists	2,300	0.2	0.97	2,800	3,000
Atheists	1,400	0.1	1.47	3,000	5,000
other religionists	660	0.1	0.94	1,000	1,800
Total population	1,156,000	100.0	0.93	1,377,000	1,438,000

aries from the LONDON MISSIONARY SOCIETY arrived. Their work fed the development of the CHURCH OF SCOTLAND, a Presbyterian body. In the mid-nineteenth century, the Church of the New Jerusalem also began a mission, now related to THE GENERAL CHURCH OF THE NEW JERUSALEM.

Through the twentieth century, a number of Protestant and Free Church groups began work, including the ASSEMBLIES OF GOD, the SEVENTH-DAY ADVENTIST CHURCH, and the JEHOVAH'S WITNESSES. The Adventists entered Mauritius in 1914, and their Mauritius Conference, part of the Indian Ocean Union Mission, is now the third largest Christian body on the island.

Other religious groups that have formed congregations on the islands include the BAHÁ'Í FAITH, the CHURCH OF CHRIST, SCIENTIST, the CHRISTADELPHIANS, and the CHURCH OF JESUS CHRIST OF LATTER-DAY SAINTS (LDS). Since its entrance in 1995, the LDS has built a thriving branch now connected to the South Africa Durban Mission.

The ethnic and religious pluralism on Mauritius has dictated the necessity of interreligious contact, and an interreligious committee has functioned for many years. The country's constitution guarantees freedom of religion, including the freedom to propagate one's religious views to others. Registered religious groups receive some support from state funds.

Sources:

Emrith, M. History of Muslims in Mauritius. Vacoas, Mauritius: Editions Le Printemps, 1994.
 Hazareesingh, K. The Religion and Culture of Indian Immigrants in Mauritius and the Effect of Social Change. Port Louis, Mauritius: Indian Cultural Association, 1966.
 Metz, Helen Chapin. Indian Ocean: Five Island Countries. Washington, DC: U.S. Government Printing Service, 1995.
 Selvon, S., and L. Rivière. Historical Dictionary of Mauritius. Metuchen, NJ: Scarecrow Press, 1991.

Mayotte

Mayotte, an island traditionally considered part of the Comoro Islands, became the center of French culture during the several centuries of French rule. In 1974 Comoros Islanders decided to become independent of French rule, but France kept control of Mayotte, where it had established both a naval and an air base. The status of the island remains a matter of intense dispute. France has refused to back away from its control of the island in spite of a United Nations resolution in 1991 recognizing the Comoros's claim to the land.

Prior to 1975, Mayotte shares a common history with the Comoro Islands. Both are overwhelmingly Muslim, most being SHAFIITE Sunnis. However, the Christian presence in Mayotte is stronger than it is in the Comoros, especially since the expulsion of Protestant missionaries there in 1978. The ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH is the largest Christian body, its work being attached to the Diocese of Ambanja (Madagascar). There are only a few thousand members out of a population of almost seventy-five thousand.

Followers	2000			2025	2050
	total	%	rate
Muslims	98,400	96.9	2.72	180,000	328,000
Christians	2,200	2.2	3.34	4,900	10,000
Roman Catholics	1,300	1.2	3.62	3,000	6,000
Protestants	350	0.3	3.42	800	1,800
Independents	160	0.2	4.81	400	900
Ethnoreligionists	710	0.7	2.60	1,200	1,900
Nonreligious	270	0.3	3.12	800	2,000
Total population	102,000	100.0	2.73	187,000	342,000

Sources:

Barrett, David. The Encyclopedia of World Christianity. 2d ed. New York: Oxford University Press, 2001.
 Beslar, J. "An Ethnography of the Mahorais (Mayotte, Camaro Islands)." 3 vols. Ph.D. dissertation, University of Pittsburgh, 1981.

Mazdaznan

Otto Hanisch (1844–1936), later known under the pen name of Otoman Zar-Adusht Ha'nish, was born in 1844, probably in Teheran, to a Russian father and a German mother. His place of birth was later disputed, and nothing certain is known about his life until he surfaced in 1900 in Chicago. There, he claimed to have been initiated while in Iran (or Tibet) into a mysterious Zoroastrian order. He quickly gathered a number of American followers and in 1917 established, in California, an organization known as Mazdaznan. Among the early followers were Maud Meacham (1879–1959) and Swiss-born David Ammann (1855–1923), the latter being instrumental in spreading Mazdaznan into Europe. Hanisch died in 1936, and his successors are known as Electors.

While Mazdaznan led a comparatively quiet existence in the United States, it became quite controversial in Europe. Critics claimed that Mazdaznan was not a genuinely Zoroastrian religion, putting great stress on Hanisch's idiosyncrasies. Because of his ideas about the Aryan race, Hanisch was accused in several European countries of being racist and anti-Semitic, although he was also critical of Nazism. In fact, the Mazdaznan organization was banned in Nazi Germany as early as 1935.

Crucial to Mazdaznan philosophy is the idea of reconverting Earth into a garden, where God will converse and cooperate with humans. Breathing exercises are also very important, and in fact this practice spread from Mazdaznan to a number of other groups, in German-speaking Europe particularly. Also popular were Mazdaznan songs and ideas about food and diet, which attracted a number of medical doctors to the movement.

Address:

Mazdaznan
 4364 Bonita Rd., #617
 Bonita, CA 91902-1421
<http://www.mazdaznan.org>

Massimo Introvigne and PierLuigi Zoccatelli

Sources:

Ha'nish, Otoman Zar-Adusht. Avesta in Songs. Los Angeles: Mazdaznan Press, 1946.
 ———. God and Man United: A Study of the Evolution of Religion from 10,000 B.C. Los Angeles: Mazdaznan Press, 1975.
 ———. The Philosophy of Mazdaznan. Los Angeles: Mazdaznan Press, 1960.

Medjugorje (Bosnia-Herzegovina)

The authenticity of the apparitions that have taken place since 1981 in Medjugorje, Bosnia-Herzegovina (then a part of the Marxist Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia), is among the most contentious topics in the contemporary ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH. In 1981 two boys and four girls, then between ten and seventeen years old, began receiving daily messages from Mary, who appeared under the title of Queen of Peace (feast day: June 25). These messages continue today. Like those of the apparitions at Fatima, their themes include conversion, penance, prayer, the rosary, the family, and, particularly, peace. At first the Tito regime acted against the devotion and against Franciscan Jozo Zovko, the “counter-revolutionary” parish priest and spiritual advisor to the visionaries. After 1984 the government left the cult alone, possibly in part because of the hard currency that its pilgrims brought in, at that time primarily from Italy, Austria, and France.

A controversy about the cult also arose within the church. In this region of Europe, the Franciscan order has a strong tradition of local pastoral care. The Fathers, popular for their spiritual care, refused to turn over parts of their pastoral responsibilities to the bishop of Mostar-Duvno. Against the background of this controversy, the bishop had growing doubts about the authenticity of the appearances, and suspicions of manipulation by the FRANCISCANS arose.

Over the years many influential persons in the Catholic Church, right up through Pope John Paul II, have spoken out on the cult, while others have expressly refused to take a position on it. The church is caught in a field of interests, which include those of the adherents who really “see” Mary, other Catholics who consider it all the work of Satan, yet others who hypothesize pious deception on the part of the visionaries and their advisors, and still others who assume machinations by the Franciscans are involved. Whichever view is correct, three diocesan investigative committees have declared the appearances and messages inauthentic, and in 1998 the Vatican itself also accepted that standpoint.

However, over against the negative position of the church hierarchy stands a massive following of devotees and believers who find considerable strength in the shrine. In 1987 a total of about 5 million pilgrims had visited Medjugorje; in 1991 that number had reached 15 million; and in 2001, more than 35 million, including thousands of regular priests and hundreds of bishops. The vast majority were Catholics of conservative or fundamentalist outlook. Because of the opposition of the hierarchy, organized devotional activity exists in a problematic spiritual vacuum, and links have arisen with other unacknowledged, variant apparitions and devotions around the world, such as OUR LADY OF ALL NATIONS in Amsterdam.

The spiritual and theological autonomy of the devotion is further stimulated by a powerful relation between the devotion to Our Lady of Peace and the Charismatic movement, a revivalist endeavor that tends to disassociate itself from institutional ecclesiastical structures. Charismatic prayer groups, initiated from Medjugorje, function as models for other groups elsewhere in the world and serve to further spread word of the Medjugorje apparitions. Intensive mission activities are supported by world tours by the visionaries and the Fathers themselves. Medjugorje prayer groups, foundations, committees, and magazines have been established all over the world, and branch shrines have been created, giving the millions of devotees who cannot come to Medjugorje opportunities for frequent and nearby devotion.

As a result of the massive growth of interest in Medjugorje, it is no longer possible for the movement to retreat from its position and continued rejection by the Vatican is less likely. The movement’s position is strengthened by the constant reference to the “fruits” its activity has borne for the Catholic Church, such as conversions, vocations for the priesthood, and miraculous healings. In 2000 the Belgian cardinal Godfried Danneels, influential in the church hierarchy, therefore argued for breaking through the deadlock and reopening the discussion of Medjugorje.

Addresses:

St. James Parish
Zupni Ured
88266 Medjugorje
Bosnia-Herzegovina
<http://www.medjugorje.hr> (multilingual)

Information Center MIR Queen of Peace
Gospin Trg 1
88266 Medjugorje
Bosnia-Herzegovina

Peter Jan Margry

Sources:

- Bax, Mart. Medjugorje: Religion, Politics, and Violence in Rural Bosnia. Amsterdam: VU Uitgeverij, 1995.
- Craig, M. Spark from Heaven: The Mystery of the Madonna of Medjugorje. London: Hodder & Stoughton, 1988.
- Jones, E. Michael. The Medjugorje Deception: Queen of Peace, Ethnic Cleansing, Ruined Lives. South Bend, IN: Fidelity Press, 1998.
- Laurentin, René, and René Lejeune. Messages and Teachings of Mary at Medjugorje: Chronological Corpus of the Messages. Milford, OH: The Riehle Foundation, 1988.
- Servic, Ivo. The Hidden Side of Medjugorje. Saint Francis du Lac, Canada: Psilog, 1989.

Meher Baba, Friends of Meher Baba (1894–1969) was an Indian spiritual teacher who synthesized various strains of religious and spiritual wisdom to later become the Perfect Master (an Avatar) for his followers. In his youth he studied with a string of teachers including Hazrat Babajan, a female Muslim teacher, and Upasani Maharaj. Meher Baba began to gather students of his own around 1921 and three years later opened a colony at Ahmadnagar, India, which came to be known as Meherland. It became a place of service with a hospital and free clinic, as well as a place where those attracted to Meher Baba could interact with him.

In 1925, Meher Baba imposed silence upon himself. He did not speak for the rest of his life. He communicated at first by use of a board of letters to which he would point. He later adopted a system of hand gesturing. His muteness called attention to the emphasis upon God's word to be not language but a realization in the heart of believers.

Meher Baba is often called "the Awakener," a reference to the claim he made that he was not a religious founder but had come to awaken people to God's love. He accepted the title Avatar, and thus identified himself with the same spiritual entity manifest in the likes of Rama, Krishna, Jesus, and Zoroaster. His service-oriented activity grew out of his belief in the oneness of all life. He spent a considerable amount of time assisting the poor, those afflicted with Hansen's disease, and the mentally disturbed, whom he referred to as "God-intoxicated." He emphasized love as a means of becoming one with God, and his devotees have often been called the "lovers of Meher Baba."

Except for the center at Ahmadnagar, no formal organization of followers has taken place. Rather, individuals who have moved from the center have formed new centers for the study and practice of his teachings and have created magazines to serve the loose-knit community. Centers have arisen across Europe, North America, Australia, and throughout the Indian diaspora. An important U.S. center was created in South Carolina that serves informally as a national headquarters, and a similar center has emerged in London, England.

Meher Baba, during his visit to America, also met a group of Sufis that had been originally called together by Hazrat Inayat Kahn (1882–1927), but who had been cut off by their leader's untimely death in his mid-forties. When their leader, Rabai Martin, became a follower of Meher Baba, the group took a new direction and survives today as Sufism Reoriented (3500 Boulevard Way, Walnut Creek, CA 94595).

Addresses:

Avatar Meher Baba Trust
King's Road, Post Bag 31
Ahmadnagar Maharashtra 414001
India

Meher Spiritual Center
100200 Hwy. 17 N.
Myrtle Beach, SC 29572

Meher Baba Association UK
c/o The London Baba Centre
228 Hammersmith Grove, Flat 1

London W6 7HG
United Kingdom
<http://www.meherbaba.co.uk/>.

Sources:

Anzar, Naosherwan. The Beloved. Myrtle Beach, SC: Sheriar Press, 1974.
Avatar Meher Baba. Posted at <http://www.avatarmeherbaba.org/>. Accessed April 18, 2002.
Chapman, Rick M. The Compassionate One. Berkeley, CA: White Horse, 1987.
Duce, Ivy Oneita. How a Master Works. Walnut Creek, CA: Sufism Reoriented, 1975.
Meher Baba. Listen, Humanity. Narrated and ed. by D. E. Stevens. New York: Dodd, Mead and Company, 1957.
———. Universal Message. Myrtle Beach, SC: Meher Spiritual Center, n.d.
Purdum, C.B. The God-Man. London: Unwin Brothers, 1964. Trust Meher. Posted at <http://www.trustmeher.com/>. Accessed April 18, 2002.

Melkite Catholic Church

The Melkite Catholic Church is a Byzantine Catholic church centered in Syria and Lebanon. It is termed Byzantine because its liturgy is derived from the Greek liturgy developed by the ECUMENICAL PATRIARCHATE and widely utilized by the several Greek churches in the Middle East. It is Catholic in that it is in full communion with the ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH. The Melkite Church emerged in the eighteenth century in Syria following a schism within the SYRIAC ORTHODOX PATRIARCHATE OF ANTIOCH AND ALL THE EAST. Antioch is an ancient center of Christianity and the seat of one of the four ancient patriarchates of Eastern Orthodoxy.

In 1724 a schism developed in the Syrian Church when two parties, one centered in Aleppo and one in Damascus, each elected a patriarch. The ecumenical patriarch stepped in and declared the candidate of the Aleppo party to be the new patriarch of Antioch. The other candidate, Cyril VI, was deposed and forced into exile in Lebanon. However, in 1729 Pope Benedict XIII (1649–1730) recognized Cyril as the new patriarch of Antioch, and with his followers, he formed the Melkite Catholic Church. (The word Melkite derives from the word for king in the Syriac and Lebanese languages.) The new church retained its Eastern liturgy and traditions (including the ordination of married priests) but adopted Roman Catholic doctrine, especially on those matters in which the Roman Catholic Church and Eastern Orthodoxy have disagreed since the eleventh century.

The Melkite Catholic Church has approximately 1 million members worldwide. The church is centered in Syria and Lebanon and has expanded into Palestine and Egypt. Its patriarch was given the additional titles of patriarch of Jerusalem and patriarch of Alexandria (two of the sites of the other ancient Christian patriarchates). In 1848 the church was granted recognition by the authorities of the Ottoman Empire and headquarters were moved to Damascus from its original site in Sidon, Lebanon. Beginning late in the nineteenth century, Melkite Christians joined in the dispersion of Syrians and Lebanese around the world. Communities were established in Brazil, Venezuela, Canada, and the United States, all of which evolved into new dioceses.

The church supports eight religious orders, a seminary at Raboué, Lebanon, and a theological institute in Harissa, Lebanon. For many years it sent its candidates for priesthood to Saint Anne's Seminary in Jerusalem, operated by the WHITE FATHERS, but that school closed in 1967. The church is active in the Middle East Council of Churches.

Address:

Melkite Catholic Church
B.P. 22249
Damascus
Syria
<http://www.melkite.org.au/> (Australian affiliate)
<http://www.melkite.org/default.html> (U.S. Eparchy of Newton)

Sources:

Descy, Serge. The Melkite Church: An Historical and Ecclesiological Approach. Newton, MA: Sophia Press, 1993.
Liesel, N. The Eastern Catholic Liturgies: A Study in Words and Pictures. Westminster, MD: Newman Press, 1960.
Roberson, Ronald G. The Eastern Christian Churches: A Brief Survey. 5th ed. Rome: Edizioni Orientalia Christiana, Pontificio Istituto Orientale, 1995.

Mennonite Church

The Mennonite Church is the oldest and largest of the several Mennonite groups in the United States. MENNONITES came to America as early as 1643, though it was not until forty years later that the first Mennonite settlement appeared—in Germantown, Pennsylvania (now part of Philadelphia). This early community became known for their stance against the introduction of slavery into the American colonies and it influenced later opposition to slavery by the FRIENDS.

Mennonite ecclesiastic organization emerged as needed. In 1725 the congregations in Pennsylvania called a conference in which the major issue was the publication of an English translation of the Confession of Dortrecht, the primary statement of Mennonite beliefs. It was not until the nineteenth century, however, as the Mennonites moved to different sections of the country and issues of accommodating to American life began to emerge, that a regular conference structure developed. The conferences evolved into the present biennial General Assembly, the highest legislative body in the church. The assembly elects a General Board, which oversees denominational agencies and programs.

The Mennonite Church has traditionally been a largely rural church whose members worked primarily in agriculture. However, during the last half of the twentieth century, it evolved into a church with a significant urban membership. That change has been accompanied by a more liberal approach to traditional behavioral norms, especially manifest in the abandonment of the “plain clothing” that has distinguished many Mennonite groups and the acceptance of modern conveniences, including automobiles and electricity (still rejected by more conservative Mennonites).

The Mennonite Church supports five colleges and two seminaries. It has developed a set of urban ministries in the United States and supports a number of overseas personnel who work with Mennonite churches in more than fifty countries. Affiliated congregations are located in different countries on every continent. The church cooperates with the MENNONITE WORLD CONFERENCE.

Address:

Mennonite Church
421 S. 2nd St., Ste. 600
Elkhart, IN 46516
<http://mcusa.mennonite.net/>

Sources:

The Mennonite Encyclopedia. 4 vols. Scottsdale, PA: Mennonite Publishing House, 1955–1959.
Wenger, John Christian. The Doctrines of the Mennonites. Scottsdale, PA: Mennonite Publishing House, 1950.
———. The Mennonite Church in America. Scottsdale, PA: Herald Press, 1966.

Mennonite Church in the Netherlands

The Protestant Reformation called for a break between church and state and for a church consisting of those adults who had turned to God with faith. One radical movement within the Reformation, Anabaptism, began in Switzerland. Anabaptists took their name from the second baptism they offered to adherents who had previously been baptized as infants. Their new ideas led both the ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH and Protestant churches to attempt the suppression of Anabaptists. The course of the movement was deeply affected by an incident at Münster, Germany, where the most radical branch of the movement attempted to set up the Kingdom of God and awaited Christ's intervention as secular authorities attempted to retake the city.

Anabaptism was brought to the Netherlands by Melchior Hoffman (c. 1500–1545) a leader who differed from some of his Anabaptist colleagues by his emphasis on the imminent end of the world. It was in the Netherlands that the movement was to be revived and reformed by a Dutch convert, Menno Simons (1496–1559), who would lend his name to the movement. As a Roman Catholic priest, he had begun to study the Bible on the question of the sacraments and concluded that the Roman Catholic doctrines of infant baptism and the physical presence of Christ in the Eucharist were not supported by Scripture. He came to the fore as a dissident leader in the mid-1530s, when he spoke out against the Münsterites. By 1536 he fully identified with the more moderate Anabaptists, and the next year he was ordained as their leader, and gave them a new name.

Simons assumed the task of articulating a theology to defend the idea of a separated church. This theology emphasized biblical authority and the justification of believers by faith in Christ. The immediate question, however, was survival, and Simons attempted to answer all the major attacks made on the group by leaders in the established churches.

Indeed, life for a Mennonite leader was still dangerous, and Simons had to be on the move constantly. The community suffered repression and produced a number of martyrs. Persecution in Holland finally ended in 1674 with the country's independence from Spain, and Holland emerged as the most tolerant nation in Europe. Galenius Abrahamsz de Haan (d. 1706) was the dominant leader of the Mennonite Church through the end of the seventeenth century. In 1699 he wrote an important defining statement of the Mennonite position. As the community prospered, it also was able to aid MENNONITES in other, less hospitable locations around the continent.

In the relatively tolerant climate of the eighteenth century, the church declined radically from 180,000 to fewer than 30,000 members. Many members converted to the NETHERLANDS REFORMED CHURCH, and others left for America. To deal with the decline, in 1811 an all-Mennonite conference, the Algemeene Doopsgezinde Sociëteit, was founded. By midcentury the decline had been stopped, and some growth occurred through the twentieth century. In 1847 a group had organized the Mennonite Missionary Association to focus interest on foreign missionary activity. The first missionary was sent to Java in 1851. In the 1950s it was superseded by the European Mennonite Evangelism Committee, a cooperative effort of the Dutch, French, German, and Swiss Mennonites.

At present, the Dutch Mennonites are the largest Mennonite body in Europe, with thirty-two thousand members. The Algemeene Doopsgezinde Sociëteit is a member of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES and cooperates with the MENNONITE WORLD CONFERENCE.

Address:

Algemeene Doopsgezinde Sociëteit
Singel 454
1017 AW Amsterdam
The Netherlands
<http://www.ads.nl/> (in Dutch)

Sources:

Dyck, Cornelius J. An Introduction to Mennonite History.
Scottsdale, PA: Herald Press, 1967.

Hoekstra, E. G., and M. H. Ipenburg. Wegwijs in religieus en levensbeschouwelijk Nederland. Handboek religies, kerken en stromingen. 3rd ed. Kampen, the Netherlands: Kok, 2000.

Krahn, C. Dutch Anabaptism: Origin, Spread, Life and Thought (1450–1600). The Hague: Martinus Nijhoff, 1968.

Mellink, A. F. Documenta Anabaptistica Neerlandica. Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1975.

Zeeuw, R. de. Nederland en de Doopsgezinden: Holland und die Mennoniten. Amsterdam: Algemeene Doopsgezinde Sociëteit, 1967.

Mennonite World Conference

The Mennonites are the main group inheriting the tradition of the Swiss Brethren and other sixteenth-century groups that rejected the idea of a state-aligned church as well as infant baptism (thus they are called Anabaptists). From the earliest times, Mennonites have been pacifists and activists in peacemaking endeavors.

The Mennonite World Conference (MWC) grew out of suggestions circulated in the years immediately prior to World War I that communication and fellowship should be facilitated among the many churches of the Mennonite heritage (including some such as the BRETHREN IN CHRIST that do not have the word Mennonite in their names). Tabled during the war, the proposals finally came to fruition in 1925, with the first international gathering of Mennonites, which was held in Switzerland on the anniversary of the first Anabaptist baptism in 1625. The initial conference was attended primarily by German, Dutch, French, and Swiss delegates. Only one North American was at the conference.

The idea of cooperative activity among Mennonites grew considerably after World War II with the transformation of Mennonite missions into autonomous churches and the development of a consciousness of the Mennonite family as a global community. As the twenty-first century begins, some eighty-four Mennonite and Brethren in Christ churches from forty-nine countries on five continents cooperate through the Mennonite World Conference.

The conference promotes international meetings; cooperative action in social service, issues of world peace, and community reconciliation; the creation of professional networks of pastors, educators, women, peace workers, and historians; and the communication of news, testimony, and teaching from churches around the world. The MWC has two headquarters, one in France and one in Canada. Its Web site includes an extensive directory of Mennonite and Brethren in Christ churches worldwide, as well as other demographic data.

Addresses:

Mennonite World Conference
8, rue du Fossé des Treize
67000 Strasbourg
France

Mennonite World Conference
 50 Kent Ave.
 Kitchener, Ontario N2G 3R1
 Canada
<http://www.mwc-cmm.org/>

Sources:

Bender, Ross T., and Alan P. F. Sell, eds. Baptism, Peace, and the State in the Reformed and Mennonite Traditions. Waterloo, ON: Wilfrid Laurier University Press, 1991.

Mennonite World Handbook: Mennonites in Global Mission. Carol Stream, IL: Mennonite World Council, 1990.

Snyder, C. Arnold. From Anabaptist Seed. Kitchener, ON: Pandora Press; Scottsdale, PA: Herald Press, 1999.

Mennonites

The Mennonite movement emerged in the 1540s as the more moderate and theologically sophisticated branch of the Anabaptist movement that had begun in Switzerland two decades earlier. As the Protestant Reformation divided Christianity into three larger communities, the ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH, Lutheranism, and the Reformed movement, Anabaptism emerged as a fourth option. It accepted the Reformation emphases on the authority of the Bible and the centrality of justification of the believer by faith in Christ. However, it differed from all three by its critique of the sacraments, which it replaced with two ordinances. Baptism was not for everyone but was limited to those adults who made a profession of faith. The Lord's Supper was a memorial meal recalling the events of the crucifixion and resurrection of Christ.

In the intense atmosphere of the Reformation's first decade, the decentralized Anabaptist movement was carried away by theological radicalism. Most importantly, it very nearly became a millennial movement. One of the most important leaders, Melchior Hoffman (c. 1500–1545), developed an emphasis on the imminent second coming of Christ. Hoffman's imprisonment in 1533 occasioned the rise of Jan Matthys of Haarlem (Netherlands; d. 1534), who found support for his millennial ideas in Münster, Germany. Matthys called upon the people to prepare Münster, by force if necessary, for the coming Kingdom of God. The city armed for the battle to come, which came in the form of a siege. Matthys was killed early in the fighting and was replaced by an even more radical leader, Jan Beuckelson of Leiden (c. 1509–1536). Beuckelson proclaimed himself King David returned, introduced polygamy, and ruled the besieged city as an Oriental potentate. The city eventually fell, and with it, seemingly, the Anabaptist cause.

However, in Holland, a former Roman Catholic priest named Menno Simons (1492–1561) became convinced of the Anabaptist basics. Simons emerged as the anti-Münster spokesperson, and with his theological training he was able to work out a viable alternative. He developed the ideal of the believers' church, a Christianity consisting of those people who have experienced faith and choose in their adult lives to live as Christ's disciples. The church should operate apart from the state and accept only the faithful who are willing to accept its discipline for baptism and membership. Simons articulated the importance of love and nonresistance as signs of the Christian life, the latter leading to pacifism and an unwillingness to bear arms. In place of the sword and other coercive powers of the state, he instituted the ban as a means of chastising errant members. Members had to radically limit their contact with anyone under the ban, a rule that most affected spouses, who could neither eat nor sleep with a spouse who had been banned until he or she had been reinstated.

The Mennonites suffered severely under intolerant governments, which were especially upset with their refusal to serve in the military, and they were forced to move from place to place as rulers came and went and occasional campaigns of repression and persecution arose. Military service was foremost among issues that led the first Mennonites to accept the invitation to settle in Russia and Pennsylvania at the end of the seventeenth century, and thus the center of Mennonite life shifted away from Western Europe. But by the nineteenth century conditions in Russia became increasingly hostile as the czarist government put aside the agreement that first led the Mennonites to migrate there. Thus many Russian Mennonites (and the related HUTTERITES) began to move to North America and develop a new set of communities in Canada and the United States.

The Mennonites in North America survived the crisis of World War I, when authorities had trouble understanding and appreciating their pacifist ways, and the continent became the new center of their community. However, in the relatively free conditions of both the United States and Canada, the small Mennonite community, which numbered only several hundred thousand, splintered into numerous denominations. The largest body is the MENNONITE CHURCH, followed by the General Conference Mennonite Church, the most liberal body. On the more conservative side are the Old Order Mennonites and the AMISH, who have attempted to perpetuate the agricultural and communal aspects of church life in eighteenth-century Europe. In the nineteenth and twentieth centuries, Mennonites spread to Africa and South America, and they have had a significant impact in Paraguay. Attempts to assist the smaller Mennonite communities around the world and to provide some sense of fellowship and unity among the many Mennonite groups led to the formation of the MENNONITE WORLD CONFERENCE.

There are an estimated 850,000 Mennonites in the world as the twenty-first century begins. This number includes 266,100 U.S. Mennonites; 114,400 in Canada; 112,906 in the Democratic Republic of the Congo; and 76,670 in India. Over 320,000 Mennonites reside in Africa and Asia. In the 1990s, more than 75,000 Mennonites moved from Russia to Germany. The Mennonite Central Committee was founded in the 1920s to serve Mennonites in the former Soviet Union and now operates as an inter-Mennonite relief agency in the global context.

Sources:

The Complete Writings of Menno Simons, 1491–1561. Scottsdale, PA: Herald Press, 1956.
 Dyck, Cornelius J. An Introduction to Mennonite History. Scottsdale, PA: Herald Press, 1967.
The Mennonite Encyclopedia. 5 vols. Scottsdale, PA: Herald Press, 1955–1959.
Mennonite World Handbook: Mennonites in Global Mission. Carol Stream, IL: Mennonite World Council, 1990.
 Snyder, C. Arnold. Anabaptist History and Theology: An Introduction. Scottsdale, PA: Herald Press, 1995.

Mennonites in Paraguay

The Mennonite community of Paraguay is both one of the world’s largest Mennonite communities outside of North America and one of the largest non-Catholic communities in Paraguay. The movement of Mennonites to Paraguay began in 1926, when the first group arrived from Manitoba, Canada. However, what was to become the numerically stronger group, Russian Mennonites who had fled to Germany in 1929, arrived in Paraguay in 1930. They were able to settle in the country after the provisions of a special law passed for the Canadian group were applied to them as well. They established an initial settlement in western Paraguay called Colony Fernheim. In 1937 a second colony, named Friesland, was established in eastern Paraguay. An additional group of Russian Mennonites arrived after World War II.

The Russian settlers brought with them some of the divisions that had splintered the Mennonite community in their previous homeland. Some were affiliated with the Mennonite Brethren, a group that dated from a Pietist revival that had swept through the community in the 1860s. Other groups had been influenced by the attempts of Baptists from Germany to convert the Mennonites, leading to a difference of opinion on baptism. Although few became Baptists, some Mennonites accepted the idea that baptism should be by immersion, as Baptists taught, while most Mennonites continued to baptize by pouring. Once in Paraguay, language differences would also appear; as some continued to use German, others adopted Spanish, and still others chose to use one of the native languages (primarily Guaraní, which is spoken by more Paraguayans than Spanish, or Lengua).

All of the colonies established by both the Canadian and Russian groups were agricultural settlements, which prospered with little modern farming equipment. The colonies also attempted to rebuild the movement’s social, cultural, and religious life (which operated as a German-speaking enclave in Russia), and Sunday schools, Bible-study programs, and efforts to evangelize the native peoples were launched. Although the very conservative Canadian groups have remained somewhat aloof, those groups originating in Russia have continued to work together while maintaining separate ecclesiastical organizations.

Of the several groups, the Mennonite Brethren (Vereinigung der Mennonitengemeinden von Paragua, or Hermanos Menonitas) is possibly the largest, with some eight thousand people affiliated. Some forty-six hundred are associated with the Convención de las Iglesias Evangélicas Unidas, which has adopted Lengua as its primary language. Some three thousand people worship with the Convención Evangélica de Iglesias Paraguayas Hermanos Menonitas, which uses Spanish and Guaraní. The remainder of the approximately twenty-eight thousand Mennonites in Paraguay are divided among more than a dozen smaller groups.

Addresses:

Mennonite Brethren
 c/o Gerhard Ratzlaff
 Casilla de Correo 1154
 Asunción
 Paraguay

Convención de las Iglesias Evangélicas Unidas c/o Oficina ASCIM
 Filadelfia, c.d.c. 984
 Asunción
 Paraguay

Convención Evangélica de Iglesias Paraguayas Hermanos Menonitas
 Juan Diaz de Solis 2150
 C.C. 1154
 Asunción
 Paraguay

Sources:

Dyck, Cornelius J. An Introduction to Mennonite History: A Popular History of the Anabaptists and the Mennonites. Scottsdale, PA: Herald Press, 1967.
 Fretz, J. W. Pilgrims in Paraguay. Scottsdale, PA: Herald Press, 1953.
 Klassen, Peter P. Die Mennoniten in Paraguay: Reich Gottes und Reich Dieser Welt. Bolanden Weierhof, Germany: Mennonitischer Geschichtsverein, 1988.

Messianic Judaism

See Union of Messianic Congregations

Methodism

The Methodist movement grew out of the life and work of John Wesley (1703–1791), an Anglican minister who in 1738 had an intense religious experience that culminated a period of spiritual searching. Once he settled his own faith questions, Wesley began an itinerant ministry throughout England and Ireland that led to the establishment of a host of religious societies or revitalization groups within the CHURCH OF ENGLAND. Wesley called people to a personal experience of the faith into which many had already been baptized and to a life of growth in grace toward holiness or perfection. As the movement grew, Wesley commissioned a number of lay preachers to assist him.

Methodism grew for several decades as a fellowship within the Church of England, and in the 1760s it spread to the American colonies, where Wesley sent preachers to nurture the gathered believers. The crisis of the American Revolution and the establishment of the United States led Wesley to assume the role of a bishop, as he ordained ministers to facilitate the formation of an independent American Methodist organization. In 1784 the American leaders organized the Methodist Episcopal Church, now a constituent part of the UNITED METHODIST CHURCH, and accepted orders from Wesley through his representative, Thomas Coke (1747–1814).

British Methodists remained a fellowship within the Church of England until 1795, when the Wesleyan Conference was reorganized as a dissenting church. Through the nineteenth century, both the Methodist Episcopal Church and the Wesleyan Conference would experience a number of schisms, and a spectrum of Methodist bodies would arise in both the United States and the United Kingdom. The U.S. Methodists would also become the fertile ground upon which the HOLINESS MOVEMENT and then PENTECOSTALISM would develop. During the twentieth century, the larger Methodist bodies in both countries would go through a series of mergers resulting in the United Methodist Church in the United States and the METHODIST CHURCH of Great Britain.

In the nineteenth century, the several Methodist churches became active participants in the worldwide spread of Protestantism, and the movement spread to Africa, the South Pacific, and Asia. To a lesser extent, it was established across Europe. Many of the churches that resulted from that movement are members of the WORLD METHODIST COUNCIL.

Methodists inherited a Calvinist theological tradition, but Wesley adopted a form developed by Dutch theologian Jacobus Arminius (1560–1609) that rejected the emphasis upon predestination. The Wesleyan emphasis on the free grace of God became the basis of a focus on evangelism that led Methodism to become the largest religious grouping in the United States in the early nineteenth century. Wesley also developed a doctrine of perfection as the goal of the Christian life, leading to an emphasis on both holy living and social action.

Sources:

Harmon, Nolan B. Encyclopedia of World Methodism. 2 vols. Nashville, TN: United Methodist Publishing House, 1974.
World Methodist Council. Handbook of Information. Lake Junaluska, NC: World Methodist Council, 1997.

Methodist Church

The Methodist Church of Great Britain is the primary body continuing the Methodist movement launched by the ministry of John Wesley (1703–1791). During his lifetime, Wesley had called together the preachers who worked with him into regular conferences, where they resolved both doctrinal issues and more practical matters about ordering the Methodist religious societies, the local organizations that would at a later date become congregations. Although Wesley took steps to establish the American work as a separate organization, he was always careful to view the British work as a movement within the CHURCH OF ENGLAND. As early as 1752, he began to hold a separate conference for the Methodist preachers in Ireland.

In 1791 the conference assumed control of the movement. Four years later it authorized the serving of the sacraments in the society meetings, an act that is generally considered to mark the formal separation of Methodism from the Church of England and the point at which the Methodist Church became a separate denomination in Great Britain and Ireland. This act also brought the Methodists under a set of British laws regulating dissenting Christian churches, though by this time those laws were falling into obsolescence.

In 1797 the debate over the church's constitution led one group to break away and form the Methodist New Connexion, seeking a more democratic organization. In the Wesleyan Conference, which retained its hold on the movement, only the ministers were members of the conference. Jabez Bunting (1810–1885), who emerged as the leading minister of the conference, founded the Wesleyan Methodist Missionary Society in 1814. He held the movement together but opposed any move to democracy. As a result, the Wesleyan Methodist Association (1837) and the United Methodist Free Church (1857) were set up by dissenting groups. Lay representation was finally granted in the 1870s.

Through the nineteenth century, the Methodists remained theologically conservative, and although organizationally separate from the Church of England, they were supportive of its role as the country's national church. They were known for their religious fervor and their commitment to social reform, rather than their theological prowess. In 1896 they joined with the other dissenting churches in an ecumenical endeavor, the National Council of Evangelical Free Churches.

Pan-Methodist union in Great Britain was raised as an issue as the ecumenical Methodist conferences began to meet in 1881. After the meeting in London in 1901, three of the smaller British Methodist bodies began a process that led in 1907 to the creation of the United Methodist Church. In 1918 the Wesleyan Methodist Conference invited the Primitive Methodists (a British group that had imported American-style revivalism and camp meetings to England) and the United Methodists to consider a larger merger. A plan of union was approved by the three churches in 1828 and 1829, but it took three more years to complete the process, which included the approval of Parliament. The united body was called the Methodist Church.

A wedding party stands outside a Methodist church in Accra, Ghana. (M. Barlow/TRIP)

The Wesleyan Conference had been a pioneer in world missions even prior to the founding of the Wesleyan Methodist Missionary Society. As early as 1794, Thomas Coke (1747–1814) published A Plan of the Society for the Establishment of Missions Among the Heathen. Because the American work had developed an independent direction after the American Revolution, Coke turned his attention to building Methodism throughout the Caribbean. The work began on Antigua, from where it spread to other islands. Early in the nineteenth century, he began to advocate the establishment of work in Africa, and in 1811 George Warren (d. 1812) was appointed to Sierra Leone. In 1813 Coke gave the last of his savings to that cause; he died the following year on his way to Ceylon (Sri Lanka).

Methodism spread as the British Empire expanded, and throughout the nineteenth century, Wesleyan missions turned Methodism into a global movement. Work was successively opened in Cape Colony, Ceylon, Australia, New Zealand, and the South Pacific islands. In the 1840s Thomas Birch Freeman (1809–1890) led in the spread of Methodism along the West African coast. In the twentieth century many of these missions would grow into the autonomous church bodies that now carry the tradition in most countries of the world.

In the late 1990s the Methodist Church of Great Britain reported 380,000 members in its congregations in England, Scotland, and Wales. It is the largest of the Free Churches in the United Kingdom. It is a member of the Council of Churches for Britain and Ireland, the WORLD METHODIST COUNCIL, and the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES. The conference in Ireland evolved into the Methodist Church in Ireland in the early nineteenth century; it has always included the Methodists of Northern Ireland.

Address:

Methodist Church of Great Britain
25 Marlebone Rd.
London NW1 5JR
United Kingdom
<http://www.methodist.org.uk/>

Sources:

Davies, Rupert, and Gordon Rupp, eds. A History of the Methodist Church in Great Britain. 4 vols. London: Epworth Press, 1965–1992.
Harmon, Nolan B. Encyclopedia of World Methodism. 2 vols. Nashville, TN: United Methodist Publishing House, 1974.
Turner, John Munsey. Modern Methodism in England. London: Epworth Press, 1997.

Methodist Church, Ghana

Methodism was introduced to what is now the nation of Ghana in 1835, when the Wesleyan Methodist Missionary Society in England responded to the request of a Ghanaian who had previously organized several groups for Bible study. Joseph R. Dunwell (1806–1835) arrived on January 1, 1835, but unfortunately he died six months later. His successors also succumbed to the climate and shared a similar fate. Then in 1838, Thomas Birch Freeman (1809–1890), an African who had lived in England, arrived in Ghana with his wife. He worked among the Mfantse-speaking people along the coast and the Ashanti people further inland, and from his base in Ghana he introduced Methodism to many places along the West African coast.

Once planted, the church grew steadily and by the end of the century had become one of the largest churches in the country. It developed an extensive educational system that included both primary and secondary schools. It supports the cooperative Trinity College with the Presbyterian and Anglican Churches.

The church was granted autonomy in 1961. Since that time it has increased its membership from around eighty thousand to around four hundred thousand. Work is divided into thirteen districts. The church is an active member of the Ghana Council of Churches, the WORLD METHODIST COUNCIL, and the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES.

Address:

Methodist Church, Ghana
E252/2 Liberia Rd.
P.O. Box 4043
Accra
Ghana

Sources:

Bartels, F. L. The Roots of Ghana Methodism. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1965.
Harmon, Nolan B. Encyclopedia of World Methodism. 2 vols. Nashville, TN: United Methodist Publishing House, 1974.
Southon, A. E. Gold Coast Methodism. London: Hodder & Stoughton, n.d.
World Methodist Council. Handbook of Information. Lake Junaluska, NC: World Methodist Council, 1997.

Methodist Church in Brazil

In 1835 the Tennessee Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church (MEC, now an integral part of the UNITED METHODIST CHURCH) sent Fountain E. Pitts (1808–1874) to survey the situation in Brazil, Uruguay, and Argentina. While in Brazil, Pitts organized a congregation of English-speaking residents of Rio de Janeiro. Following his return to the United States, the church then commissioned Justin Spaulding (1802–1965) to expand the small beginning. He was joined in 1839 by Rev. (and later Bishop) Daniel P. Kidder (1815–1891), his wife, Cyndy Kidder, and two teachers. However, when Cyndy Kidder died and left her husband with an infant, he returned to the States and the mission only lasted a few more years.

The reopening of the work came by unusual means, following the American Civil War. Confederates who were unwilling to swear allegiance to the United States government left for Brazil, where they founded several expatriate communities. Joining the exodus was Rev. Junius E. Newman (1819–1895), of the Alabama Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South (MECS, now a constituent part of the United Methodist Church). He settled in the Province of São Paulo, where most of the Americans had moved. He began preaching in several locations and in 1871 organized the first church. He also began to ask for additional personnel. The General Conference of the MECS sent the first set of missionaries in 1876. At about the same time, an independent layman, William Taylor (1821–1902), became interested in Brazil as part of an overall effort to build a mission in South America. The MEC would later make him a bishop and his work would later be absorbed into the expanding mission of the MECS.

In 1886 Bishop John C. Granbery (1829–1907) organized the Brazil Annual Conference (the basic organizational unit in Methodism), known within Methodism as the smallest conference ever formed, there being only three ministerial members. Growth was steady from that year forward, in spite of opposition from the ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH and deaths from yellow fever. It was assisted by three Brazilian converts, Bernardo and Ludgero Miranda and Felipe de Carvaiho, who became preachers of note.

At the beginning of the twentieth century, the conference began to ask for a resident bishop. The action was opposed by the MECS General Conference and did not occur until 1930, when the work was set apart as the autonomous Methodist Church in Brazil. In 1935 the first Brazilian bishop, Cesar Dacorso, was elected. A council was created to continue the fraternal relations between the Brazilian Church and the parent body. In succeeding years, the MECS assisted with funds to open a publishing house and to extend the educational program. A theological school opened in 1942 in São Paulo. In 1955 the annual conferences were designated as regions. Today there are six.

Methodist Church in Chile

The church's General Conference is the highest legislative body. The College of Bishops administers the policies and decisions of the General Conference, which are collected in three documents, the Social Creed, the Plan for Life and Mission of the Church, and the Guidelines for Program. The Methodist Church in Brazil was the first organization in Latin America to join the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES and is also a member of the World Methodist Council. In the 1990s, the church reported approximately one hundred thousand members.

Address:

Methodist Church in Brazil
Rua Espirito Santo 1989
C.P. 3175, Bairro de Lourdes
30112-970 Belo Horizonte
Minas Gerais
Brazil

Sources:

- Barclay, Wade Crawford. History of Methodist Missions. 3 vols. New York: The Board of Missions and Church Extension of the Methodist Church, 1949-1950.
- Copplestone, J. Tremayne. History of Methodist Missions. Vol. 4, Twentieth-Century Perspectives. New York: The Board of Global Ministries, The United Methodist Church, 1973.
- Harmon, Nolan B. Encyclopedia of World Methodism. 2 vols. Nashville, TN: United Methodist Publishing House, 1974.
- Jaime, E. M. B. Metodismo no Rio Grande do Sul. N.p., 1963.
- Kennedy, J. L. Metodismo no Brasil. N.p., 1928.

Methodist Church in Chile

The Methodist Church in Chile began with the 1887 plan of William Taylor (1821-1902), a layman in the Methodist Episcopal Church who wanted to organize missions along the west coast of South America. The first group of missionaries landed in Chile the following year, just as what was to become known as the Nitrate War was about to break out. The war led to the annexation of what is now the northern third of Chile from Bolivia and Peru, and as a result the initial work that had been established in Iquique had to be abandoned. More permanent work was established in Valparaiso and Santiago. The work spread as additional missionaries arrived.

The missionaries gathered in 1880 to create a conference structure and elect a president. This work was independent of the Methodist Episcopal Church. However, at the 1884 General Conference, Taylor was suddenly raised from layman to minister and was then elected bishop. He was sent to Africa as a missionary bishop. The Methodist Episcopal Church then moved to adopt his independent work in Chile, which in 1889 became the Chile district of the Cincinnati (Ohio) Conference. James P. Gilliland was named the first district superintendent.

The work in Chile was integrated with a Methodist mission in Argentina in 1892, and the South America Annual Conference was created in 1893. Later, Chile was set apart as an annual conference (the basic organizational unit in Methodism). The church entered a growth phase, though it experienced a major schism in 1909, when churches and members influenced by Pentecostalism left to found the METHODIST PENTECOSTAL CHURCH OF CHILE. This schism took with it the most conservative wing of the church.

In 1924 the work in South America was set apart as a central conference, which meant that rather than bishops from the United States coming to South America to head the conference sessions, resident South American bishops were to be elected. The first bishops for the central conference were elected in 1932. The work suffered greatly from a massive earthquake in 1939, in which two Methodist schools, Concepción College and Colegio Americano, and a number of church buildings were destroyed. An earthquake in 1960 likewise did severe damage to church property.

In 1968, the year of the merger that created the UNITED METHODIST CHURCH, the Chilean Conference joined in the request of the other South American conferences for independence. The uniting conference granted that request, and the completion of the process occurred at the Annual Conference meeting in 1969. That meeting was held in connection with the last meeting of the Latin American Central Conference and the creation of a new Methodist ecumenical structure, the Council of Latin American Evangelical Methodist Churches.

At the end of the twentieth century, the Methodist Church of Chile reported fifteen thousand members in 115 churches. The church is headed by a bishop. It is a member of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES and the WORLD METHODIST COUNCIL. In the meantime, the Pentecostal Methodist Movement, divided into a number of denominations, has become the largest segment of Chilean Protestantism—the eight-hundred-thousand-member Pentecostal Methodist Church of Chile being the largest organization.

Address:

Methodist Church of Chile
Sargento Aldea 1041
Casilla 67
Santiago
Chile

Sources:

- Barclay, Wade Crawford. History of Methodist Missions. 3 vols. New York: The Board of Missions and Church Extension of the Methodist Church, 1949–1950.
- Copplestone, J. Tremayne. History of Methodist Missions. Vol. 4, Twentieth-Century Perspectives. New York: The Board of Global Ministries, The United Methodist Church, 1973.
- Harmon, Nolan B. Encyclopedia of World Methodism. 2 vols. Nashville, TN: United Methodist Publishing House, 1974.
- World Methodist Council. Handbook of Information. Lake Junaluska, NC: World Methodist Council, 1997.

Methodist Church in Fiji and Rotuma

Methodism was brought to Fiji in 1835, after negotiations among various British Protestant groups working in the South Pacific had led to the assignment of the islands to the Methodists. Thus, in 1835 William Cross (d. 1842) and David Cargill (d. 1843), previously working on Tonga, replaced two missionaries of the LONDON MISSIONARY SOCIETY who had set up work in Fiji in 1830. Their work was initially assisted by several Fijians they had met while on Tonga. In 1841 the work on Rotuma, just north of Fiji, was assigned to the Fiji Mission.

The Methodists arrived during the reign of Na Ulivau, who had united the islands into one community. The missionaries made little progress until 1854, when they effected the conversion and baptism of Ratu Seru Cakobau, Na Ulivau's son and successor. Ratu Seru Cokobau developed a great love for Western culture, at one point offering his kingdom for annexation by the United States. Caught in the grip of an impending civil war, Washington ignored his overtures. Great Britain accepted his invitation in 1874. They began to bring Indian laborers to the island, which in 1892 prompted the Methodists to begin an Indian mission there.

In 1854 the Australian Methodists (now a constituent part of the UNITING CHURCH IN AUSTRALIA) assumed responsibility for the work in Fiji and work continued under their guidance until 1964. It then became one of the independent island conferences affiliated with what was known as the Methodist Church of Australasia. As each of the island groups gained political independence, the conferences became national churches and the Methodist Church of Australasia was discontinued.

The Methodist Church in Fiji and Rotuma follows the beliefs of other Methodists, as embedded in the writing of John Wesley (1703–1791) and the Methodist Articles of Religion. The church has strong fraternal relationships with the Uniting Church in Australia, the UNITED METHODIST CHURCH (U.S.A.), and the METHODIST CHURCH in Great Britain.

As the church became established, it became a missionary sending organization. The first missionaries from Fiji arrived on New Guinea in 1875. Subsequently, Fijian missionaries served in Papua, the Solomons, and northern Australia. In 1924 it founded the Navuso Agricultural School.

Over the years, beginning with its close relationship with Ratu Seru Cakobau, the church was often identified with the Fijian government. The church had developed the country's educational system, which was taken over by the government in 1846. That close relationship became somewhat of a problem as the Indian segment of the islands came to numerical majority. Methodism, the largest Christian faith in the islands, became second to the Hinduism brought from India.

This identification with the government has been critical to the public understanding of the church, beginning with the government coup in 1987 and in subsequent years, as the conflict between the native Fijians and Indian-Fijians has flared. The church was accused of identifying with the coup leaders in 1987 and of attempting to replace the religious freedom enjoyed in the islands with a government preference for Christianity. The same accusation emerged in 2000, when a native Fijian, George Speight, attempted a second coup. The church had to publicly distance itself from the coup attempt and the taking of hostages, while at the same time minister pastorally to supporters of the coup, many of whom were Methodists. Speight was himself identified with the SEVENTH-DAY ADVENTIST CHURCH.

The church reports 215,000 members as the new millennium begins. This ecumenically minded Methodist body is a member of the Fiji Council of Churches, the Pacific Conference of Churches, the WORLD METHODIST COUNCIL, and the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES.

Address:

Methodist Church in Fiji and Rotuma
G.O.P. Box 356
Suva
Fiji

Sources:

- Barclay, Wade Crawford. History of Methodist Missions. 3 vols. New York: The Board of Missions and Church Extension of the Methodist Church, 1949–1950.
- Copplestone, J. Tremayne. History of Methodist Missions. Vol. 4, Twentieth-Century Perspectives. New York: The Board of Global Ministries, The United Methodist Church, 1973.
- Harmon, Nolan B. Encyclopedia of World Methodism. 2 vols. Nashville, TN: United Methodist Publishing House, 1974.
- World Methodist Council. Handbook of Information. Lake Junaluska, NC: World Methodist Council, 1997.

Methodist Church in India

Methodist interest in India began with British minister Thomas Coke (1747–1814), who died at sea on his way to establish work at Madras. James Lynch (1775–1858) and others who were traveling with Coke settled in Ceylon (Sri Lanka) and initiated the Methodist Church Sri Lanka. In 1817 Lynch moved on to Madras and initiated an extensive Methodist work associated with the British Methodists. Over one hundred years later, as India was attaining its independence, that work would merge with missions from several other Protestant churches to become the CHURCH OF SOUTH INDIA and the CHURCH OF NORTH INDIA. Methodists from the United States, associated with the Methodist Episcopal Church (MEC; now a constituent part of the UNITED METHODIST CHURCH), arrived in 1856. Among the volunteers were Rev. William Butler (1818–1899) and his wife, Clementina Rowe. They had moved to the United States from Ireland, where Butler had been the assistant to James Lynch after Lynch's stay in India. The Butlers began their work in Lucknow and Bareilly and were able to take advantage of the East India Company's new impetus to found schools in the country. The company gave both official sanction and resources for the development of the mission's extensive education program, which included primary and secondary schools and several colleges.

By 1864 an annual conference (the basic unit of organization in Methodism) was organized and four Indian ministers were received as members. In 1870 the famous lay preacher and future Methodist bishop William Taylor (1821–1902) began his four-year stay in India, during which time the mission was energized and expanded. The conference began to experience spurts of growth, as whole groups of people would often make their decisions to become Christians together. These group conversions, sometimes inappropriately termed "mass movements," led to the rapid growth of the church in northern India. In 1870 the movement was first joined by the female missionaries of the newly formed Woman's Foreign Missionary Society. The first of these missionaries were Isabella Thoburn (1840–1901), the sister of the missionary and future bishop James Thoburn (1836–1922), and Clara A. Swain (1834–1910), one of the first American female physicians. Isabella Thoburn founded the first college for women in India, today known as Thoburn College. Swain formed the first hospital for women in the country, which also today bears the name of its founder.

In 1884 the MEC General Conference passed legislation that allowed the formation of a semiautonomous central conference in areas of the world where there were multiple annual conferences. The South Asia Central Conference was organized in 1885 in India and covered work eastward to Malaysia and eventually to the Philippines. The central conference assumed the duty of electing bishops in the area, and in 1930 the first Indian national, Jasant Rao Chitambar, was elected to the episcopacy.

The church in India remained affiliated with the United Methodist Church formed in the United States in 1968, but in 1980 it received permission to consider reorganization as an independent body. It voted in favor of independence, and in 1981 the Methodist Church in India came into existence. It continues its cordial and interactive relationship with the United Methodist Church and maintains the structure that was set in place during the days of the central conference.

In the late 1990s the Methodist Church in India reported six hundred thousand members. It is a member of the WORLD METHODIST COUNCIL and the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES.

Address:

Methodist Church in India
 Methodist Centre
 21 YMCA Rd.
 Mumbai Central
 Bombay 400 008
 India

Sources:

Barclay, Wade Crawford. History of Methodist Missions. 3 vols. New York: The Board of Missions and Church Extension of the Methodist Church, 1949–1950.

Copplestone, J. Tremayne. History of Methodist Missions. Vol. 4, Twentieth-Century Perspectives. New York: The Board of Global Ministries, The United Methodist Church, 1973.

Harmon, Nolan B. Encyclopedia of World Methodism. 2 vols. Nashville, TN: United Methodist Publishing House, 1974.

World Methodist Council. Handbook of Information. Lake Junaluska, NC: World Methodist Council, 1997.

Methodist Church in Ireland

John Wesley (1703–1791), the founder of the Methodist movement, made his first visits to Ireland in 1747, prompted by the fact that some Methodist preachers had already organized a Methodist religious society in Dublin. Both he and his brother Charles spent a great deal of time in Ireland through the rest of the decade, and Wesley returned there on nineteen subsequent occasions. Wesley held the first Irish conference in 1752, and either he or Thomas Coke (1747–1814) presided each year through the rest of the century. In the years after Wesley's death, Coke worked with the conference that became the inheritor of Wesley's authority.

Following Coke's death, the relationship of Irish Methodists to the ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH, the Anglican Church of Ireland, and the dissenting Free Churches dominated its discussions. In 1816 the conference gave permission for the celebration of the Lord's Supper at the local Methodist societies. When that action had been taken in England some years earlier, it had signaled the movement's separation from the CHURCH OF ENGLAND. Those Methodists in Ireland who opposed this action formed the Primitive Wesleyan Methodist Connexion and kept their identification with the Church of Ireland. By the 1870s that relationship was no longer operative, and in 1878 the two branches of Irish Methodism united to form the present Methodist Church in Ireland.

In the meantime, Irish Methodists kept a cordial relationship with British Methodists. Rather than creating a separate missionary society, they supported the Wesleyan Methodist Missionary Society, through which they made their contribution to the worldwide spread of Wesley's movement. The Irish Methodists founded their first school in 1784, and elementary education remained an important concern through the nineteenth century. In 1868 the Methodist College at Belfast was opened. The Wesleyan Connexional School (secondary school) evolved into Wesley College, Dublin. During this time Irish Methodists had to continually overcome the effects of emigration of its members, especially to the United States.

Methodist organization is based in the annual conference, now consisting of an equal number of ministers and laypeople. The Methodist Church in Ireland maintains a traditional and somewhat unique relationship with the Methodists in the United Kingdom. The president of the METHODIST CHURCH of Great Britain presides as president of the Irish Conference, and eight Irish ministers sit in the British Conference. The Irish elect the vice president of the Conference, who acts as president of the church except when the conference meets.

In the late 1990s, the Methodist Church in Ireland reported thirty thousand members. From the nineteenth century to the present, in large part due to immigration patterns, Methodism has shifted its center from Dublin and southern Ireland to the Belfast area. It is a member of the WORLD METHODIST COUNCIL and the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES.

Address:

The Methodist Church in Ireland
3 Upper Malone Rd.
Belfast BT9 6TD
United Kingdom
<http://www.irishmethodist.org/>

Sources:

- Cole, R. Lee. Methodism in Ireland. Belfast: Irish Methodist Publishing, 1960.
- Jeffrey, F. Irish Methodism: An Account of Its Traditions, Theology, and Influence. Belfast: Epworth House, 1964.
- Vickers, John A. A Dictionary of Methodism in Britain and Ireland. London: Epworth Press, 2000.
- World Methodist Council. Handbook of Information. Lake Junaluska, NC: World Methodist Council, 1997.

Methodist Church in Samoa

The Methodist Church in Samoa dates to the arrival of a Samoan chief on Tonga in 1826 and his conversion by the Methodist missionaries he found there. Upon his return to Samoa in 1828, he began to preach and raise churches. Peter Turner, the first European Methodist to arrive and settle in Samoa, found a thriving Methodist movement of more than two thousand believers. About that same time representatives of the LONDON MISSIONARY SOCIETY (LMS), a Congregationalist organization that had established work in Samoa in 1830, and the Methodist leadership in Tonga agreed to divide the land upon which they would work. To avoid competition, the LMS would work on Samoa and the Methodists would work in Tonga. Turner was asked to withdraw from Samoa.

In part because communication at the time was slow and primitive and in part because they identified with Methodism, the Methodists of Samoa did not accept the decision to join with the LMS work. Thus they found themselves cut off from the mainstream of Methodist life. Then in 1855, the Methodist Church in Australia became independent of the mother church in Great Britain. John Thomas (1796–1881), the leader of the Methodist missionaries in Tonga, became the advocate of the Samoan Methodists, and the Australians voted to resume relations with the small group. Thomas argued that the new independent body was not bound by the agreement their British forebears had made with the LMS. Martin Dyson arrived in Samoa in 1857 and was succeeded by George Brown (1835–1917), who was most successful in building the church while keeping cordial ties to the LMS missionaries. The LMS remained by far the larger body.

The church continued to grow even after the division of Samoa in 1899, when the eastern islands were set apart as American Samoa. In 1964, two years after the western islands became the independent nation of Samoa, Samoan Methodists became the independent Methodist Church in Samoa.

At the end of the twentieth century, the Methodist Church in Samoa reported approximately thirty-two thousand members. The majority of members live in Samoa, but there are congregations across American Samoa and in the United States, where many Samoans have migrated. The church is a member of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES,

Address:

The Methodist Church in Samoa
P.O. Box 167
Apia
Samoa

Sources:

- Barclay, Wade Crawford. History of Methodist Missions. 3 vols. New York: The Board of Missions and Church Extension of the Methodist Church, 1949–1950.
- Copplestone, J. Tremayne. History of Methodist Missions. Vol. 4, Twentieth-Century Perspectives. New York: The Board of Global Ministries, The United Methodist Church, 1973.

Harmon, Nolan B. Encyclopedia of World Methodism. 2 vols. Nashville, TN: United Methodist Publishing House, 1974.

Methodist Church in Singapore

The Methodist Church in Singapore began in 1885 with the arrival of William F. Oldham (1854–1937) and James M. Thoburn (1836–1922) of the Methodist Episcopal Church (now an integral part of the UNITED METHODIST CHURCH). Oldham established a multiethnic congregation, and a building was erected before the year was out. A school for Chinese members was opened, and members of Tamil (Indian) background soon organized a Tamil-speaking congregation and school. These became the start of an extensive education system serving the Chinese and Indian communities within the small island state. The missionary thrust soon carried the Methodists across the Malaysian Peninsula.

The work in Singapore was originally included in the South India Annual Conference. In 1902 the Malaysia Annual Conference was organized. In 1950, the church in the region took a step toward independence with the establishment of the Southeast Asia Central Conference, which elected its own bishop. Autonomy finally arrived in 1968 when the Methodist churches and institutions in Malaysia and Singapore were set apart as the Methodist Church in Malaysia and Singapore. This was the same year that the United Methodist Church was formed in the United States. In 1976 the Malaysian and Singapore works were separated and the Methodist Church in Singapore was formed. Theodore R. Doraisamy was the new church's first bishop.

In the late 1980s, the Methodist Church in Singapore reported 27,700 members. The church continues to support an extensive educational system. Ministers are trained at Trinity Theological College, a joint venture of Methodists, Anglicans, Presbyterians, and Lutherans. Members are organized in three conferences, one serving mostly Anglo members, one primarily serving the Chinese, and one serving Tamil members. The church is a member of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES and the WORLD METHODIST COUNCIL.

Address:

The Methodist Church in Singapore
10 Mount Sophia
Singapore 228459
<http://www.methodist.org.sg/>

Sources:

Barclay, Wade Crawford. History of Methodist Missions. 3 vols. New York: The Board of Missions and Church Extension of the Methodist Church, 1949–1950.

Copplestone, J. Tremayne. History of Methodist Missions. Vol. 4, Twentieth-Century Perspectives. New York: The Board of Global Ministries, The United Methodist Church, 1973.

Doraisamy, T. R. Forever Beginning: One Hundred Years of Methodism in Singapore. Singapore: Methodist Church in Singapore, 1986.

World Methodist Council. Handbook of Information. Lake Junaluska, NC: World Methodist Council, 1997.

Methodist Church in the Caribbean and the Americas

The Methodist Church in the Caribbean and the Americas incorporates the work launched in the late nineteenth century by British Methodists in the Caribbean and Central America. In the years immediately after the American Revolution, after overseeing the process of setting up an independent American Methodist church, Thomas Coke (1747–1814) emerged with a world missionary vision. As early as 1784 he published the Plan of the Society for the Establishment of Missions among the Heathen. Following up on that plan, in 1786 he made his first trip to the West Indies, landing in Antigua on Christmas Day. There he visited an Antiguan slave owner named Nathaniel Gilbert (d. 1774), who for several decades had pursued a Methodist-inspired Christian work among the Africans on his land. In his second trip in 1789, Coke visited Jamaica, where William Hammett (d. 1803), the first Methodist missionary in the region, would be assigned. From Antigua and Jamaica, Methodism spread to other Caribbean islands, especially the Bahamas (1799) and Trinidad and Tobago (1812). Methodism became identified with the antislavery cause in the Caribbean, and many former slaves joined the church after their emancipation.

Methodism ventured to Guyana in the persons of two laymen, who moved there from Nevis in 1801. The first minister was assigned by the British Conference in 1815. Much of his effort was directed to the slave population, and he joined the Moravians in the attempt to overcome the plantation owners' opposition to missionary activity. Work then extended to British Honduras (now Belize) when a Methodist layperson asked the British Conference to appoint a minister to the region. Thomas Wilkinson arrived in 1825.

The work in the various British colonies around the Caribbean developed somewhat independently. In 1885, an autonomous West Indian Conference was formed, but it was disbanded in 1904, and the work returned to the direct control of the British Conference. Then in 1967, a new effort at independence was inaugurated when Jamaica, Guyana, Honduras, and the South Caribbean sub-district that included Haiti, the Leeward Islands, Panama, and Costa Rica combined to form the Methodist Church in the Caribbean and the Americas. The Bahamas were added in 1968. The church's work now extends throughout the Caribbean, in some thirty-five nations.

Address:

Methodist Church in the Caribbean and the Americas
 Methodist Conference Center
 Scott's Hill, P.O. Box 9
 St. John's
 Antigua

Sources:

Forever Beginning: Two Hundred Years of Methodism in the Western Area. Kingston, Jamaica: Literature Department of Methodist Church, 1960.
 Walker, F. Deaville. The Call of the West Indies. London: Corgate Press, 1910.

Methodist Church in the Union of Myanmar

Methodist work in Myanmar (then Burma) began in 1873, when James M. Thoburn (1836–1922), a missionary (and later bishop) in India, responded to requests for support from Indian Methodists who had relocated to the Burmese city of Rangoon (now Yangon). In 1879 William Taylor (1821–1902), an independent Methodist lay evangelist, sent a colleague, Robert E. Carter, to Rangoon, and Thoburn acted quickly to coordinate the two efforts. Soon a building was secured and services were begun in Tamil and Telegu, both Indian languages. The Burma work was seen as an outpost of the South India Conference, assigned to the new Bengal Conference in 1888.

Although based in the Indian expatriate community, the work soon extended to the Amoy-speaking people and the Chinese community. Because of this growth, it was designated as a mission conference in 1901 and an annual conference (the basic unit of organization in Methodism) in 1927. In 1951 the Indian government opened the Andaman Islands to civilian settlement, and a number of the Burmese Indian Methodists moved there to found the first Christian community in the new community.

In the early 1960s, as Burma moved to national independence, the Burma Annual Conference of what was then the Methodist Church (1939–1968; now a constituent part of the UNITED METHODIST CHURCH) requested autonomous status. That request was granted by the 1964 General Conference. The independent Burma Methodist Church was constituted in 1965. Lim Si Sin was elected as the first bishop. The church had approximately twenty-eight hundred members (adults and children) at the time, and it sponsored a string of elementary and secondary schools across the country. The church was organized into four districts according to language groups.

Burma had become an independent nation in 1948. However, in 1962 General Ne Win (b. 1911) overthrew the government and abrogated the democratic government and constitution. Through the 1960s, a number of the English-speaking Methodists left the country, and in 1966 all missionaries were expelled by the new socialist government. In the 1980s the country passed through difficult economic times and was cited for numerous human rights violations. In 1990 the name of the country was changed to the Union of Myanmar. During the 1990s the government massacred members of various ethnic groups residing in Burma. The Methodist Church, based as it has been in the ethnic communities, suffered accordingly.

In 1986, the church opened a theological institute for the training of ministers. In the 1990s it reported approximately three thousand members (adults and children). It is a member of the WORLD METHODIST COUNCIL and the Christian Council of Asia, but it is not a member of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES. The church is also known as the Methodist Church of Lower Myanmar, not to be confused with the METHODIST CHURCH, UPPER MYANMAR, the product of British Methodist missionary activity.

Address:

The Methodist Church in the Union of Myanmar
 22 Alanpya Pagoda Rd.
 Yangon
 Myanmar

Sources:

Barclay, Wade Crawford. History of Methodist Missions. 3 vols. New York: The Board of Missions and Church Extension of the Methodist Church, 1949–1950.
 Copplestone, J. Tremayne. History of Methodist Missions. Vol. 4, Twentieth-Century Perspectives. New York: The Board of Global Ministries, The United Methodist Church, 1973.
 Harmon, Nolan B. Encyclopedia of World Methodism. 2 vols. Nashville, TN: United Methodist Publishing House, 1974.
 World Methodist Council. Handbook of Information. Lake Junaluska, NC: World Methodist Council, 1997.

Methodist Church in Zimbabwe

British Methodists Owen Watkins (1842–1915) and Isaac Shimmin introduced Methodism into present-day Zimbabwe (then Southern Rhodesia) in 1891. They had responded to an offer from Cecil Rhodes (1853–1902) of one hundred pounds sterling per annum for the Wesleyan Methodists (now the METHODIST CHURCH in Great Britain) in support for such an endeavor. Rhodes's British South Africa Company had also made a grant of land for the development of missionary stations. The original stations were opened at Epworth near Salisbury and at Sinoia in the Lamagundi district. The following year, stations were opened at Nengubo (or Waddilove), Kwenda, and Bulawayo. The work was assigned to the Transvaal District of the South African Conference.

The most notable Methodist leader of the first generation was John White (1866–1933), who served for almost forty years and became known for his defense of the resident Zimbabweans in the face of an often abusive colonial regime. He also developed the Waddilove Institute, where the first Zimbabwean ministers were trained. In 1904 the first African ministers were ordained by the church.

The church grew steadily through the twentieth century in the area west and south of Salisbury. It developed a cooperative relationship with an American Methodist mission (now an integral part of the UNITED METHODIST CHURCH) that had begun in 1897 and concentrated its work north and east of Salisbury. In 1964 the church became a charter member of the Christian Council of Rhodesia, which earned the wrath of the government by declaring its disapproval of the country's unilateral declaration of independence in 1965. In 1968 it joined other members of the council in forming a college.

The Methodist Church in Zimbabwe became independent of the British Conference in 1977. It organized in a manner similar to the parental body and was led by a president rather than a bishop. That changed in 1989 when Farai J. Chirisa was named the church's first bishop. In the mid-1990s, the church reported seventy-five thousand members. It is a member of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES.

Address:

Methodist Church in Zimbabwe
Central Ave.
P.O. Box 712
Causeway, Harare
Zimbabwe

Sources:

- Barclay, Wade Crawford. History of Methodist Missions. 3 vols. New York: The Board of Missions and Church Extension of the Methodist Church, 1949–1950.
- Copplestone, J. Tremayne. History of Methodist Missions. Vol. 4, Twentieth-Century Perspectives. New York: The Board of Global Ministries, The United Methodist Church, 1973.
- Harmon, Nolan B. Encyclopedia of World Methodism. 2 vols. Nashville, TN: United Methodist Publishing House, 1974.
- World Methodist Council. Handbook of Information. Lake Junaluska, NC: World Methodist Council, 1997.

Methodist Church, Nigeria

The beginnings of Methodism in Nigeria can be traced to several Africans who had spent time in the Americas as slaves before being freed and returned to Sierra Leone by the British. In 1838 they made their way back to their homeland at Abeokuta, in the southwestern part of present-day Nigeria. They subsequently asked that a missionary be sent to their people.

In 1942 Thomas Birch Freeman (1809–1890), the British African missionary who introduced Methodism to much of West Africa, traveled to Abeokuta and established a mission station there and at Badagry. In its first generation, the work spread in the territory west of the Niger River, growing so successfully that a separate district was set apart in 1878. By 1913 the mission had more than six thousand members. Meanwhile, in 1893 two British ministers from the Primitive Methodist Church arrived in Nigeria from their center on the island of Fernando Póo. They settled at Archibong and began to build a missionary movement east of the Niger.

These two missions were brought together in 1932 by the union in the United Kingdom of the Wesleyan Methodists and the Primitive Methodists to form the Methodist Church. The mission established an expansive system of primary and secondary schools and opened a number of medical facilities, including a colony at Uzuakoli for those suffering from Hansen's disease (leprosy).

The mission became the independent Methodist Church, Nigeria in 1962. Joseph Soremekun was elected as the first president of the new church. In 1976 the church adopted an episcopal church governance system. Churches are grouped into circuits, and circuits are grouped into dioceses, each headed by a bishop. The bishop presides at the annual synod meeting. Dioceses are grouped into six archdioceses, which meet annually under the archbishop. The conference of the whole church meets biennially and is presided over by the church's prelate. In the late 1990s, the church reported 1.5 million members.

The Methodist Church, Nigeria oversees two colleges, Immanuel College at Ibadan, cosponsored with the Anglican Church of the Province of Nigeria, and Trinity Theological College at Umuahia, cosponsored with the Anglicans and the Presbyterian Church of Nigeria. The church is ecumenically minded, and it is a member of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES and the WORLD METHODIST COUNCIL.

Address:

Methodist Church, Nigeria
Wesley House
21/22 Marina
P.O. Box 2011
Lagos
Nigeria

Sources:

- Barclay, Wade Crawford. History of Methodist Missions. 3 vols. New York: The Board of Missions and Church Extension of the Methodist Church, 1949–1950.
- Copplestone, J. Tremayne. History of Methodist Missions. Vol. 4, Twentieth-Century Perspectives. New York: The Board of Global Ministries, The United Methodist Church, 1973.
- Harmon, Nolan B. Encyclopedia of World Methodism. 2 vols. Nashville, TN: United Methodist Publishing House, 1974.
- World Methodist Council. Handbook of Information. Lake Junaluska, NC: World Methodist Council, 1997.

Methodist Church of Cuba

The Methodist Church of Cuba originated among Cubans living in Key West, Florida, in the 1870s. Around 1883 several of these Cubans, including the Reverends Enrique B. Someilan (1856–1928) and Aurelio Silvera, returned to their homeland and began to lead worship services. The first church was opened in Havana in 1888 with 194 members. Other Cuban pastors arrived soon afterward to expand the work.

Spain's defeat in the Spanish-American War in 1898 forced it to relinquish control of the island, which became an independent country. Immediately after the war, Bishops Warren A. Candler (1859–1941) and Walter R. Lambuth (1854–1921) of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South (MECS, now a constituent part of the UNITED METHODIST CHURCH) went to Cuba to inspect and reorganize the work there. Two missionaries arrived in 1899 to further expand the work geographically. The Cuba Mission of the MECS was organized in 1907. It became a mission conference in 1919. In 1939 the MECS united with the Methodist Episcopal Church and the Methodist Protestant Church to create the Methodist Church (1939–1968), then the largest Protestant church in the United States. The Cuban work became the Cuba Annual Conference of the merged body.

In 1959 Fidel Castro became the prime minister of Cuba, and relations between Cuba and the United States have since remained hostile. In 1962 most of the U.S. missionaries were withdrawn, leaving the church in a somewhat weakened condition. Women became an even more important part of church leadership and were welcomed as lay ministers. In 1964 the General Conference of the Methodist Church, partially in response to the needs of the Cuban Methodists now worshipping under a regime hostile to religion, passed a resolution allowing the Cuban work to become autonomous. In 1968 the newly independent church reorganized as the Methodist Church of Cuba. It recognized one of its recently deceased leaders, Angel Foster, as its first bishop, and then elected Armando Rodriguez as its new bishop.

Although somewhat hampered by the Castro regime, the church has revived, joining the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES and the WORLD METHODIST COUNCIL and participating in missionary activities in Colombia and other areas that lack a Methodist church. In 1995 the church had approximately ten thousand members.

Address:

Methodist Church of Cuba
Calle K. #502
Entre 25Y27 Venado
Ciudad de la Habana, 10400
Cuba

Sources:

Barclay, Wade Crawford. History of Methodist Missions. 3 vols. New York: The Board of Missions and Church Extension of the Methodist Church, 1949–1950.

Copplestone, J. Tremayne. History of Methodist Missions. Vol. 4, Twentieth-Century Perspectives. New York: The Board of Global Ministries, The United Methodist Church, 1973.

Harmon, Nolan B. Encyclopedia of World Methodism. 2 vols. Nashville, TN: United Methodist Publishing House, 1974.

World Methodist Council. Handbook of Information. Lake Junaluska, NC: World Methodist Council, 1997.

Methodist Church of Kenya

Methodist work in Kenya was initiated in 1857 by the United Methodist Free Churches, one of several splinter groups among the British Methodists that had come into existence as part of the struggle of laypeople to gain a greater voice in the running of the church. The United Methodist Free Churches commissioned missionaries to work in East Africa in 1862. The nineteenth-century mission was largely confined to the coastal region, but around 1912 work was established in the center of the country, north of Mount Kenya. As the mission developed, schools, medical facilities, and programs in agriculture were started.

Early in the twentieth century, the United Churches would participate in a series of mergers, leading in 1932 to the formation of the present METHODIST CHURCH of Great Britain and bringing the African mission with it. The Kenyan church became autonomous in 1967, four years after Kenya became an independent country. The next year the government assumed hegemony over all schools in the country, including the Methodist schools, though a cooperative management arrangement was retained. The church now works with over two hundred schools and in addition sponsors agricultural training institutes, technical schools, and special schools for the physically disabled. It cosponsors the ecumenical Theological College at Limuru. In the 1990s it opened a major new national venture, Kenya Methodist University.

Following the British model, the church was originally headed by a president, but it has since moved to an episcopal system. The church is currently led by a presiding bishop, and a bishop heads each of the eight synods (districts). In the mid-1990s, the church reported three hundred thousand members. It is a member of the WORLD METHODIST COUNCIL and the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES.

Address:

Methodist Church of Kenya
P.O. Box 47633
Nairobi
Kenya

Sources:

Harmon, Nolan B. Encyclopedia of World Methodism. 2 vols. Nashville, TN: United Methodist Publishing House, 1974.

World Methodist Council. Handbook of Information. Lake Junaluska, NC: World Methodist Council, 1997.

Methodist Church of Malaysia

858

The Methodist Church of Malaysia traces its beginnings to the visit of William F. Oldham (1854–1937) and James M. Thoburn (1836–1922), both later bishops, to Singapore in 1885. They founded a church under the auspices of the South Indian Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church (MEC), now a constituent part of the UNITED METHODIST CHURCH. From its base in Singapore, then part of the Straits Settlement, work was launched northward into the Federation of Malaysia. The work grew quickly and in 1889 was named the Malaya Mission of the newly formed Bengal Conference; in 1894 it was set apart as the Malaysia Mission Conference. It became an annual conference (the basic organizational unit in Methodism) in 1902.

Important to the work was William G. Shellabear, an Englishman who met Oldham in Singapore. A talented linguist, Shellabear was soon fluent in Malay and several dialects. Until he was overcome by the hot and humid weather, he gave valuable service translating Christian literature into Malaysian. Meanwhile, in 1890 Benjamin F. West and H. L. E. Leuring traveled through Dyak (Iban) country in Sarawak.

Then in 1901 a number of Chinese, including some Methodists from the China mission, were forced out of their homes by the Boxer Rebellion. Bishop Frank W. Warne (1854–1932) accompanied them and assisted in their resettlement in Sarawak. New congregations of Methodists arose almost immediately. As a result, James M. Hoover (1872–1935) was transferred from the Malaysia Conference to Sarawak, where he would remain for the next thirty-five years. As he spoke Malaysian, he was able to begin work among them and then extend his evangelistic efforts to the Dyak (Iban) people. Work was especially fruitful among the ethnic Chinese, who constitute a sizable minority in Malaysia. In 1936 the Chinese work was set apart as a second Malaysia Mission Conference. It became an annual conference in 1948.

In 1968, as U.S. Methodists moved to reunite into the United Methodist Church, the work in Malaysia was granted permission to become an autonomous church. That year, the Malaya Chinese Annual Conference, the Singapore-Malaya Annual Conference, the Tamil Provisional Annual Conference in West Malaysia and Singapore, the Sarawak Annual Conference, and the Sarawak Iban Provisional Annual Conference in East Malaysia united to form the new Methodist Church of Malaysia and Singapore. Dr. Yap Kim Hoa was elected as the first bishop. The conferences continued as units in the new church. The work in Singapore was set apart as the Methodist Church in Singapore in 1976. In 1996, the Methodist Church of Malaysia moved to establish mission conferences to organize the Chinese work in Sabah and the Sengois work on the peninsula of Malaysia.

In the late 1900s the Methodist Church of Malaysia reported 107,000 members. It is a member of the WORLD METHODIST COUNCIL and the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES.

Address:

Methodist Church of Malaysia
69 Jalan 5/31
46000 Petaling Jaya
Senlangor, D.E.
Malaysia

Sources:

- Barclay, Wade Crawford. History of Methodist Missions. 3 vols. New York: The Board of Missions and Church Extension of the Methodist Church, 1949–1950.
- Copplestone, J. Tremayne. History of Methodist Missions. Vol. 4, Twentieth-Century Perspectives. New York: The Board of Global Ministries, The United Methodist Church, 1973.
- Harmon, Nolan B. Encyclopedia of World Methodism. 2 vols. Nashville, TN: United Methodist Publishing House, 1974.
- World Methodist Council. Handbook of Information. Lake Junaluska, NC: World Methodist Council, 1997.

Methodist Church of Mexico

The Methodist Church of Mexico traces its beginning to the country's Constitution of 1857, which included provisions for the separation of church and state and for the freedom of religion. U.S. Methodists immediately expressed an interest in establishing missions in Mexico, but this work awaited the outcome of the American Civil War and the readjustments of the church in the war's aftermath. In 1871 Bishop Matthew Simpson (1811–1884) of the Methodist Episcopal Church (now a constituent part of the UNITED METHODIST CHURCH) led the process of allocating church funds for a missionary to Mexico. As a result, Bishop Gilbert Haven (1821–1880) went to Mexico the next year. He was soon joined by William Butler (1818–1899), who was designated as the superintendent of the soon-to-be established mission. Butler opened the first church on Christmas Day, 1873.

At the 1873 Louisiana Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South (MECS, now also a constituent part of the United Methodist Church), money was raised to send Bishop John C. Keener (1819–1906) to Mexico to launch another mission. Keener secured the first church of the MECS mission, a former monastery chapel. Alejo Hernandez, a Mexican who had been converted during a stay in Brownsville, Texas, returned to Mexico City to become the pastor of this Methodist congregation. J. L. Daves arrived in 1875 as the superintendent of the movement.

Although church and state were formally separated in Mexico, the Catholic Church remained a strong establishment, and the building of Protestant churches was plagued by obstacles. However, by the end of the century, churches and associated schools and medical facilities had been established in most of the major cities. In 1930, anticipating the union in the United States of the Methodist Episcopal Church and the Methodist Episcopal Church, South (which occurred in 1939), the missions of the two churches in Mexico united and became the Methodist Church of Mexico. For a number of years the two missions had held an annual joint national convention.

Shortly after the union, the new church published a Discipline, the book of church law, and established two annual conferences, the basic organizational unit in Methodism. Bishops are elected for four-year terms. Currently the church is divided into six episcopal areas that include parishes in all but two of the states of Mexico.

Education has been an important emphasis since the beginning of the church, and above its system of primary and secondary schools, the church founded several institutions of higher learning, including Colegio Palinore in Chihuahua and the Union Theological Seminary in Mexico City, the latter created in cooperation with the CHRISTIAN CHURCH (DISCIPLES OF CHRIST) and the Congregational Church (now a constituent part of the UNITED CHURCH OF CHRIST). The Methodist Church of Mexico currently oversees a university and two theological seminaries.

In the late 1990s the Methodist Church of Mexico reported 150,000 members in four hundred churches. It is a member of the WORLD METHODIST COUNCIL and the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES.

Address:

Methodist Church of Mexico
Fray Bartolomé de Olmedo 149
Quintas del Marques, C.P. 76050
Querétaro, Querétaro
Mexico

Sources:

- Barclay, Wade Crawford. History of Methodist Missions. 3 vols. New York: The Board of Missions and Church Extension of the Methodist Church, 1949–1950.
- Copplestone, J. Tremayne. History of Methodist Missions. Vol. 4, Twentieth-Century Perspectives. New York: The Board of Global Ministries, The United Methodist Church, 1973.
- Lee, Elizabeth M. Methodism in Mexico. New York: Board of Missions of the Methodist Church, n.d.
- Libro conmemorativo de las bodas de diamante de la Iglesia Metodista de Mexico*. Imprenta Nueva Educacion, 1948.
- World Methodist Council. Handbook of Information. Lake Junaluska, NC: World Methodist Council, 1997.

Methodist Church of New Zealand

The Methodist Church of New Zealand (Te Haahi Weteriana o Aotearoa) traces its beginning to the arrival of Samuel

Leigh (1785–1852), who had also introduced Methodism into Australia. Leigh settled at Kaeo in the 1820s, where he established an initial station, called Wesleydale. The station was destroyed by Maori warriors in 1827, and the missionaries moved their work to Mangungu, from which it spread throughout the island. Despite the animosity of their initial encounter with the missionaries, many Maoris became Methodists.

The Methodist missionaries played a significant role in facilitating the signing of the 1840 Treaty of Waitangi, which placed New Zealand under British protection and guaranteed the Maori a broad set of rights. However, the mission was hurt significantly in the fighting between the Maoris and the Pakela people, and the mission never really recovered. By the mid-1900s, there were approximately fifteen thousand Maori Methodists.

In the meantime, Methodism spread among the European settlers in New Zealand. In 1854 oversight was transferred from England to Australia, and in 1873 a New Zealand Conference was established. Also, several schismatic Methodist churches, the United Methodist Free Churches, the Bible Christian Church, and the Primitive Methodist Church, had spread to New Zealand from England. In 1896 the United Methodist Free Churches and the Bible Christians merged into the Methodist Conference. One January 1, 1913, the New Zealand Methodists became autonomous from Australia as the Wesleyan Methodist Church of New Zealand. A month later, that church merged with the Primitive Methodists to form the presently existing Methodist Church of New Zealand.

The church continues the beliefs and practices of the parent bodies in Australia (now part of the UNITING CHURCH IN AUSTRALIA) and the United Kingdom (now the METHODIST CHURCH of Great Britain). A college for training ministers was founded in 1912. Prior to 1913, New Zealanders also supported the Australian missions on several South Pacific islands. In anticipation of autonomy, the New Zealand church was assigned hegemony over the mission in the Western Solomon Islands. After World War II, the New Zealanders cooperated with the Australians in work in New Guinea, the personnel of which included Solomon Islanders.

Today, the Methodist Church of New Zealand has associated work in Samoa, Tonga, and Fiji. As the twentieth century came to an end, it reported some twenty-four thousand members. It is a member of the WORLD METHODIST COUNCIL and the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES.

In 1972, a new recognition of the importance of the Maori membership was made with the designation of a Maori Synod (the Taha Maori). Then in 1983, the church officially committed itself to continue a bicultural program in which the Maori culture is equal to that of the more dominant Anglo culture.

Address:

Methodist Church of New Zealand
 Morley House
 21/22 Marina
 P.O. Box 931
 Christchurch 1
 New Zealand

Sources:

Harmon, Nolan B. Encyclopedia of World Methodism. 2 vols.
 Nashville, TN: United Methodist Publishing House, 1974.
 World Methodist Council. Handbook of Information. Lake
 Junaluska, NC: World Methodist Council, 1997.

Methodist Church of Peru

The Methodist Church of Peru (Iglesia Metodista del Peru) grew out of the visits of William Taylor (1821–1902), an American Methodist layman, to the west coast of South America in 1877. Taylor established work at Iquique, but soon afterward that part of Peru became the subject of a war between Chile and Peru and was annexed to Chile. In the 1880s, Francisco G. Penzotti (1851–1925), a Methodist and agent of the American Bible Society, began to travel through Peru, distributing Bibles. In 1890 he was arrested and became the focus of international concern about freedom of religion in the country. His work resulted in the first Methodist congregation in Peru being organized in 1889 in Callao.

The next year, Thomas B. Wood (1844–1922), a Methodist who had been working in Argentina and Uruguay, arrived in Peru. He had been designated the superintendent of the new Western District of the South American Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church (now a constituent part of the UNITED METHODIST CHURCH). With his daughter, Elsie Wood, he founded several schools, the first Protestant institutions in the country. Although the educational work grew, evangelism was hampered through the first generations of this mission. By 1945 there were still only some four hundred members. However, in the decades after World War II, missionaries moved into the countryside and the church began to grow among several of the native peoples, especially the Campa people. In the 1960s the work in Peru was named a provisional conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church.

In 1961 the church added to its school system the Panamericana Normal School, which focused on the training of teachers for its elementary and high school systems. Meanwhile, other work was growing into five institutions of higher education: Colegio America del Callao, Colegio Alverado, Colegio Andino, Colegio Americo de la Victoria, and Colegio Daniel Alcides Carrion. The Peruvian conference also supported a theological center, Comunidad Biblico Teológica Wenceslao Bahamonde.

At the same time, the conference developed a new emphasis on social service and social change. In 1965 it issued a document unique among South American Protestants called the “Manifesto to the Nation,” outlining the church’s role as an active force in affecting the social and economic order. This document, which argued that effective revolution should spring forth from the power of God, was issued in the midst of large-scale social protest over what many perceived as an unjust social system.

By 1968 the work in Peru had been organized as an annual conference in the Methodist Church (1939–1968). That same year the Methodist Church entered into the merger that produced the United Methodist Church, which gave its South American conferences the option of becoming autonomous. The Peruvian Conference opted for independent status. The new Methodist Church of Peru was organized in 1970. Dr. Wenceslao Bahamonde was elected as the church’s first bishop.

At the end of the twentieth century the church reported five thousand members. It is a member of the WORLD METHODIST COUNCIL and the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES.

Address:

Methodist Church of Peru
 Apartado 1386
 Lima 100
 Peru

Sources:

Barclay, Wade Crawford. History of Methodist Missions. 3 vols.
 New York: The Board of Missions and Church Extension of the Methodist Church, 1949–1950.
 Coplestone, J. Tremayne. History of Methodist Missions. Vol. 4, Twentieth-Century Perspectives. New York: The Board of Global Ministries, The United Methodist Church, 1973.
 Harmon, Nolan B. Encyclopedia of World Methodism. 2 vols.
 Nashville, TN: United Methodist Publishing House, 1974.
 World Methodist Council. Handbook of Information. Lake
 Junaluska, NC: World Methodist Council, 1997.

Methodist Church of Sierra Leone

Methodism in Sierra Leone began with the efforts of U.S. Methodists to extend their ministry into Canada. In 1781 William Black (1760–1834) was assigned to pioneer work in Nova Scotia, where he discovered at Sherburne and other communities a number of Africans who had been brought to Canada by the British army at the end of the American Revolution. They had supported the British in return for a promise of freedom.

With the help of British antislavery organizations, the Africans living in Nova Scotia were offered transportation to the new colony of Sierra Leone. In 1792 many accepted the opportunity and were taken to Freetown, including some two hundred Methodists. Soon thereafter they began to correspond with the Wesleyan Methodists in England (now the METHODIST CHURCH of Great Britain), and in 1811, George Warren (d. 1812) was finally assigned as a missionary. He arrived with three schoolmasters, who began the Methodist educational enterprise in Sierra Leone.

Warren died some eight months after his arrival in Sierra Leone, but the church survived and grew over the next decade. In addition to the former slaves from Nova Scotia, the missionaries served other groups in Sierra Leone: A number of Maroons, former slaves who had escaped plantation life in Jamaica only to be recaptured and transported to Sierra Leone in 1800, came under the influence of the Methodists, as did the “recaptures,” those slaves captured in the process of being transported to the Americas and returned to Africa. What looked like the blossoming of a prosperous mission, however, quickly disintegrated. In 1821 the older members of the Methodist Church in Freetown argued with the missionaries, who then attempted to dissolve the congregations. They continued as an independent organization. Then the Maroons (1835) and “recaptures” (1844) left the Freetown society because they felt they were being treated as second-class citizens.

The Methodists had thus split into four separate groups: the original Freetown society, the Wesleyan mission, the Maroon church, and the “recaptures” church (known as the West African Methodist Church). In addition, in 1841, following public excitement over the Amistad incident, American Methodists founded a fifth Methodist church among the Mende people at Sherbro, Sierra Leone. This work now exists as the Sierra Leone Conference of the United Methodist Church.

Eventually, the problems of the Freetown society and the Maroon church with the Wesleyan mission were resolved, and they reunited. The West African Methodist Church, however, affiliated with the United Methodist Free Churches in the United Kingdom. In 1932 the Wesleyans in England merged with the United Methodist Free Churches to create the Methodist Church of Great Britain. In Africa, their two affiliates also merged, but in 1934, the West African Methodist Church again went its separate way.

The Wesleyan mission experienced a period of growth in the 1930s, when it also began work in Mende country. Because of this opening, the missionaries launched work on a Mende edition of the Bible, published in 1959, and opened a hospital at Segbwema. In 1967 the former mission became an independent church, the Methodist Church of Sierra Leone. It has continued in a working relationship with British Methodists.

Like all religious bodies in the country, the Methodist Church of Sierra Leone has suffered from the civil war that has continued through the 1990s into the new century. Many church members have been killed, and many church facilities have been damaged or destroyed.

In the mid-1990s, the church reported twenty-eight thousand members, with a constituency of 1.5 million. It is a member of the WORLD METHODIST COUNCIL and the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES.

Address:

Methodist Church of Sierra Leone
4 George St.
P.O. Box 64
Freetown
Sierra Leonea

Sources:

- Barclay, Wade Crawford. History of Methodist Missions. 3 vols. New York: The Board of Missions and Church Extension of the Methodist Church, 1949–1950.
- Copplestone, J. Tremayne. History of Methodist Missions. Vol. 4, Twentieth-Century Perspectives. New York: The Board of Global Ministries, The United Methodist Church, 1973.
- Harmon, Nolan B. Encyclopedia of World Methodism. 2 vols. Nashville, TN: United Methodist Publishing House, 1974.
- Marke, Charles. The Origins of Wesleyan Methodism in Sierra Leone. London: C. H. Kelly, 1913.
- “The Spirit of Amistad in the United Methodist Church.” Web site of the General Board of Global Ministries, United Methodist Church. Posted at <http://gbgm-umc.org/umhistory/sierra-leone/amistad.html>. Accessed December 3, 2001.
- World Methodist Council. Handbook of Information. Lake Junaluska, NC: World Methodist Council, 1997.

Methodist Church of South Africa

The Methodist Church of South Africa traces its origins to a small religious society founded in 1806 in Cape Town by members of the Seventy-second Regiment of the British Army under the leadership of George Middlemiss. A decade later Barnabas Shaw (1788–1857) arrived in Cape Town to serve as the minister for the Methodists. However, Shaw wanted to work among the native Africans and soon left Cape Town to establish the Leliefontein mission station some 250 miles north among the Namaqua. As other missionaries arrived, work was concentrated in what is now known as Namibia and Bechuanaland. The Namibian work was eventually turned over to the Lutheran-based RHENISH MISSION, and the work in South Africa was expanded among both white settlers and the native population.

In 1820 William Shaw (1798–1872) arrived to become the chaplain to a group of settlers. His work became a second beginning for Methodism. He organized a series of preaching stations eastward all the way to Durban, many located in hostile territory. The work among the native population was slow, but the church grew as more British settlers arrived. Shaw organized the Wesleyan Methodist Church, which experienced sporadic growth. A Methodist congregation was often the first English church to appear in the new settlements, attracting members of a variety of Protestant churches. As Presbyterian, Congregational, and Anglican congregations emerged, these members would leave the Methodist church to rejoin their own denominations. In 1862, the church launched a mission among the new settlers from India.

The church grew up as a mission of the British Wesleyan Conference. As the districts multiplied, triennial meetings were held, beginning in 1873. In 1883 the districts were tied together by what was called the Affiliated Conference. Ties to Great Britain were loosened until complete autonomy was granted in 1927 with the formation of the Wesleyan Methodist Church of South Africa. A merger in 1932 with the Primitive Methodist Mission and with the work in the Transvaal that had not joined in the 1927 reorganization led to the formation of the present Methodist Church of South Africa.

The South African church followed the belief, practice, and organization of the Methodist Church of Great Britain. Until 1988 it was headed by a president, who was elected at the annual conference, the basic organizational unit in Methodism. After 1988 the district heads were redesignated as bishops, and a presiding bishop, elected for a three-year term, replaced the national president.

In the 1990s the Methodist Church of South Africa reported a membership of 620,000. It has jurisdiction over Methodist work in Mozambique and Namibia. Its extensive educational and medical programs were lost when the government nationalized the schools and hospitals. In 1978 the church was outlawed in Transkei, and Methodists there reorganized as the United Methodist Church of South Africa. Most of that church reunited with the main body when the ban was lifted in 1988. The church is a member of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES and the WORLD METHODIST COUNCIL. It currently supports the Federal Theological Seminary of Southern Africa, a cooperative venture with Congregationalists, Presbyterians, and Anglicans.

Address:

Methodist Church of South Africa
P.O. Box 1771
Sasolburg 9570
South Africa

Sources:

- Barclay, Wade Crawford. History of Methodist Missions. 3 vols. New York: The Board of Missions and Church Extension of the Methodist Church, 1949–1950.
- Copplestone, J. Tremayne. History of Methodist Missions. Vol. 4, Twentieth-Century Perspectives. New York: The Board of Global Ministries, The United Methodist Church, 1973.
- Harmon, Nolan B. Encyclopedia of World Methodism. 2 vols. Nashville, TN: United Methodist Publishing House, 1974.
- South African Methodism—Her Missionary Witness*. Cape Town: Methodist Publishing House, 1966.

World Methodist Council. Handbook of Information. Lake Junaluska, NC: World Methodist Council, 1997.

Methodist Church of Togo

The Methodist Church of Togo began in the 1840s, when Thomas Birch Freeman (1809–1890) arrived as a representative of the Wesleyan Methodists in Great Britain. Freeman, the son of an African father and a British mother, developed a friendship with a chief of the Mina people at Anécho, who granted him permission to begin preaching to the people and to establish a school. Birch's original work was soon supplemented by other Methodists who were moving along the coastal communities from Nigeria to the Gold Coast. As the work developed, it was seen as part of the developing church in Dahomey (present-day Benin). That identification was increased by the French takeover from the Germans after World War I.

In 1957 the Dahomey and Togo work was set aside as a separate district of the Methodist Church of Great Britain. After Togo gained its independence in 1960, the Togo work became independent as the Methodist Church of Togo. Still primarily focused on serving the Mina people, the church has not grown, as have the Presbyterian Evangelical Church of Togo and the Assemblies of God mission.

In the 1990s the Methodist Church of Togo reported nineteen thousand members. In the late 1990s it joined the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES.

Address:

Methodist Church of Togo
B.P. 49
Lomé
Togo

Sources:

- Barclay, Wade Crawford. History of Methodist Missions. 3 vols. New York: The Board of Missions and Church Extension of the Methodist Church, 1949–1950.
- Copplestone, J. Tremayne. History of Methodist Missions. Vol. 4, Twentieth-Century Perspectives. New York: The Board of Global Ministries, The United Methodist Church, 1973.
- Harmon, Nolan B. Encyclopedia of World Methodism. 2 vols. Nashville, TN: United Methodist Publishing House, 1974.
- World Methodist Council. Handbook of Information. Lake Junaluska, NC: World Methodist Council, 1997.

Methodist Church, Sri Lanka

The Methodist Church in Sri Lanka originated early in the nineteenth century, when Britain ruled the island nation, then called Ceylon. Thomas Coke (1747–1814) had motivated British Methodists (now the METHODIST CHURCH of Great Britain) to develop an Indian mission, giving the last of his savings to the Wesleyan Conference to help sway them to accept his vision. At the end of 1813 he sailed for Ceylon, but unfortunately he died on the voyage before reaching his destination. Six ministers accompanied Coke, and after their arrival they made two important decisions. They agreed to open schools (a suggestion of the British governor), and they parceled themselves out across the island in both predominantly Buddhist and predominantly Hindu communities.

The group was soon joined by William Harman, who settled in Colombo and opened a printing establishment. The first church in Sri Lanka, and the first Methodist church in all of Asia, was opened in Colombo in 1816. An extensive school system using Ceylonese teachers was established, and from the school came many of the early converts and many ministers. The elementary schools led to the formation of secondary schools, colleges, and a theological school. The work grew slowly but steadily through the century. Of interest was a Christian-Buddhist debate in 1873 in which a Methodist, David de Silva, participated. The debate attracted the attention of Henry Steel Olcott (1832–1907) of the Theosophical Society, leading to his conversion to Buddhism and to his support of Anagarika Dharmapala (1864–1933) in his development of the Maha Bodhi Society.

Through World War II the work in Ceylon continued as a district attached to the work in India. Ceylon became independent in 1948, but not until 1964 was a separate Ceylon Conference constituted. At that time the conference became autonomous as the Ceylon Methodist Church. F. S. de Silva was its first president. He was followed by Daniel T. Niles (1908–1970), one of the most famous Asian Christians of the twentieth century and a president of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES. The church was invited to join in the formation of a United Church of Ceylon (now the CHURCH OF SRI LANKA), but the necessary majority needed to support the effort failed to appear.

In 1972 Ceylon withdrew from the British Commonwealth and renamed itself Sri Lanka. The Methodist Church changed its name soon thereafter. In the late 1990s the Methodist Church, Sri Lanka, reported twenty-eight thousand members in what is still a predominantly Buddhist country. The church is a member of the WORLD METHODIST COUNCIL and the World Council of Churches.

Address:

Methodist Church, Sri Lanka
252 Galle Rd.
Colombo 3
Sri Lanka

Sources:

Barclay, Wade Crawford. History of Methodist Missions. 3 vols. New York: The Board of Missions and Church Extension of the Methodist Church, 1949–1950.

Copplestone, J. Tremayne. History of Methodist Missions. Vol. 4, Twentieth-Century Perspectives. New York: The Board of Global Ministries, The United Methodist Church, 1973.

Small, W. J. T. The History of the Methodist Church in Ceylon. London: Kelly, 1913.

World Methodist Council. Handbook of Information. Lake Junaluska, NC: World Methodist Council, 1997.

Methodist Church, Upper Myanmar

In 1887 the Wesleyan Methodists in England (now known as the METHODIST CHURCH of Great Britain) responded to the opportunity to establish work in Upper (or northern) Myanmar (then called Upper Burma) by sending two missionaries and two Sri Lankan ministers. They began to establish churches in the dry zone of Upper Burma, also building a number of accompanying schools and medical facilities. The work grew steadily and quietly through the mid-twentieth century. It became the autonomous Methodist Church in Upper Myanmar in 1964.

In 1948 Burma became an independent country. In 1962 the government was overthrown in a military coup and the new leader, General Ne Win (b. 1911), instituted a socialist regime that discarded the democratic guarantees of the country's constitution. In 1966 he ordered all foreign missionaries to leave the country.

Fortunately, by 1966 the church had largely become an indigenous institution among the Burmese people. After the church became independent in 1964, the emergence of the indigenous leadership led to an increase in membership, which grew by one-third in 1967 alone. So, unlike its American Methodist counterpart in the southern part of the country (now called the METHODIST CHURCH IN THE UNION OF MYANMAR), the church did not suffer the loss of a large number of English-speaking members and quickly recovered from the departure of the missionaries. It did lose its schools and the Methodist Leprosy Home and Hospital, all of which were nationalized.

The Methodist Church, Upper Myanmar, is led by a president rather than a bishop, following the British Methodist practice. It is a member of the WORLD METHODIST COUNCIL, the Christian Conference of Asia, and the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES. Now known as the Methodist Church, Upper Myanmar (Myanmar having become the name of the country in 1990), it is not to be confused with the Methodist Church, Lower Myanmar (also known as the Methodist Church of the Union of Myanmar), the other Methodist church operating in the country. The church reported thirty-eight thousand members and constituents in the 1990s.

Address:

Methodist Church, Upper Myanmar
P.O. Box 9
28th Street, between 68th and 69th Streets

Mandalay
Myanmar

Sources:

- Barclay, Wade Crawford. History of Methodist Missions. 3 vols. New York: The Board of Missions and Church Extension of the Methodist Church, 1949–1950.
- Copplestone, J. Tremayne. History of Methodist Missions. Vol. 4, Twentieth-Century Perspectives. New York: The Board of Global Ministries, The United Methodist Church, 1973.
- Harmon, Nolan B. Encyclopedia of World Methodism. 2 vols. Nashville, TN: United Methodist Publishing House, 1974.
- World Methodist Council. Handbook of Information. Lake Junaluska, NC: World Methodist Council, 1997.

Methodist Pentecostal Church of Chile

The Methodist Pentecostal Church of Chile (Iglesia Metodista Pentecostal de Chile) developed early in the twentieth century, when the Pentecostal experience emerged within the Methodist Church of Chile (then still a district in the American-based Methodist Episcopal Church). In 1909 Willis C. Hoover (1856–1936), a missionary who pastored a Methodist church in Valparaíso, was influenced by the spread of Pentecostalism through Europe and India soon after its emergence in Los Angeles, California. He began to correspond with Pentecostal leaders in other countries and instituted prayer meetings and Bible study around the issue of the baptism of the Holy Spirit and the experience of speaking in tongues. Those in attendance soon professed to manifest the gifts of the Spirit.

The Pentecostal movement spread from Hoover's congregation to other Methodists in Chile, and in 1911, bowing to pressures from the United States, the leaders of the church in Chile expelled Hoover and his Pentecostal followers, who then reorganized as the Methodist Pentecostal Church. The church suffered through a period of discrimination until 1925, when a new constitution established the separation of church and state in Chile. The church experienced a growth phase through the 1930s, expanding across Chile and into Argentina, Uruguay, Paraguay, Bolivia, and Peru. In the years since World War II, the church's membership has doubled annually, and it has become one of the most successful indigenous churches in South America. The Jotabeche Pentecostal Evangelical Church in Santiago is one of the largest congregations of any kind in the world, rivaling in size the YOIDO FULL GOSPEL CHURCH in Seoul, Korea. The church has also experienced a number of schisms that have effectively spread Pentecostalism further, as several of the daughter churches have also grown into large bodies.

Address:

Methodist Pentecostal Church of Chile
Bernal del Mercado 139

Santiago Casilla 213–2
Santiago
Chile

Sources:

- Barclay, Wade Crawford. History of Methodist Missions. 3 vols. New York: The Board of Missions and Church Extension of the Methodist Church, 1949–1950.
- Copplestone, J. Tremayne. History of Methodist Missions. Vol. 4, Twentieth-Century Perspectives. New York: The Board of Global Ministries, The United Methodist Church, 1973.
- Harmon, Nolan B. Encyclopedia of World Methodism. 2 vols. Nashville, TN: United Methodist Publishing House, 1974.
- Hoover, Willis C. History of the Pentecostal Revival in Chile. Translated by Mario G. Hoover. Santiago: Imprenta Eben-Ezer, 2000.

Metropolitan Community Churches

See Universal Fellowship of Metropolitan Community Churches

Mevlevi Sufi Order

The Mevlevi Sufi Order was founded by mystic and philosopher Jalal ad-din ar-Rumi (c. 1207–1273) in Konya, Turkey. Rumi was born into a learned family in Balkh, Afghanistan. In the face of Mongol incursions into the region, his family moved on several occasions before finally settling in Konya. Rumi succeeded his father as a professor in religious sciences in 1231. Rumi is considered the most eminent poet produced by the Sufi movement, the height of his work being his momentous mystical work, Mathnawi.

The Mevlevi order of SUFISM adopted their name from the term Mevlana (our Master). Their main Sufi tenets consist of unconditional love and tolerance, positive reasoning, charity, and spiritual enlightenment through love of all of God's creation. According to Rumi, human beings consist of the tripartite components of spirit, reason, and love. The spiritually advanced Mevlevi Sufis are supervised by the leading sheikh (celebi) as they whirl in circles during a devotional liturgy (sema); hence they have been called the Whirling Dervishes. Their dancing represents the mystical journey of turning oneself completely toward the One. Through eternal love, devotion, integrity, and generosity, the Mevlevis aspire to maintain their focus on the divine.

The international headquarters of the Mevlevi order is in Konya, Turkey. Members are found primarily in Turkey, Syria, and in central Asia, but in recent years they have also established centers in Europe and North America. Today, the order is headed by Faruk Hjemden Celebi, a direct descendent of Rumi, who succeeded to his post in 1996 following the death of his father, Celaleddin Celebi (1926–1996). Celaleddin Celebi was responsible for bringing the order to the West with the appointment of Edmund Kabir Helminski as the order's representative in North America. Helminski founded the Threshold Society, which has become a major force for the publishing and circulation of Mevlevi literature in the English-speaking world. In 1994, in honor of the success of the Threshold Society, the Threshold Center in Battleboro, Vermont, was designated Konya West by the order.

The Turkish whirling dervishes perform at the Sadler's Wells Theatre at the start of their one-week season in London. (Hulton-Deutsch Collection/CORBIS)

Address:

Threshold Society
151 Emerald City Way
Watsonville, CA 95076
<http://www.sufism.org/>

Qamar-ul Huda

Sources:

Chittick, William. The Sufi Path of Love: The Spiritual Teachings of Rumi. Albany: State University of New York Press, 1983.
Hakim, Khalifa Abdul. The Metaphysics of Rumi: A Critical and Historical Sketch. 2d ed. Lahore, Pakistan: The Institute of Islamic Culture, 1959.

Harvey, Andrew. Light Upon Light: Inspirations from Rumi. Berkeley, CA: North Atlantic Books, 1996.

Lewis, Franklin. Rumi: Past and Present, East and West. Oxford: Oneworld Publications, 2000.

Mevlana Caeleddin Rumi. Posted at <http://www.mevlana.net>. Accessed February 1, 2002.

Schimmel, Annemarie. The Triumphal Sun: A Study of the Works of Jalaloddin Rumi. Albany: State University of New York Press, 1993.

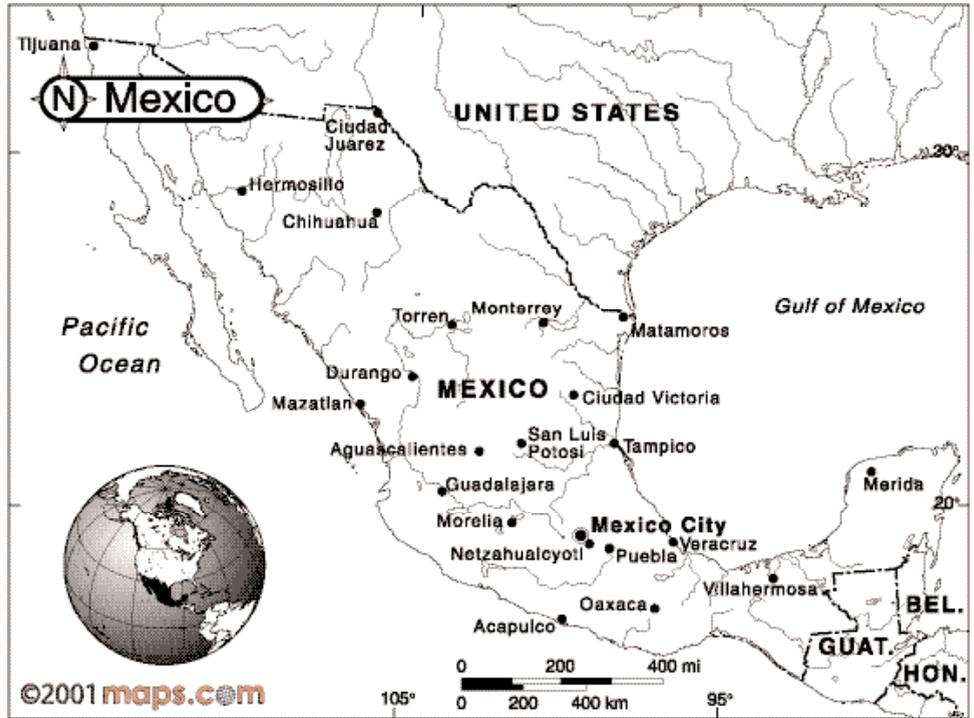

Mexico

The United Mexican States constitutes one of the largest countries in the Americas, located geographically in North America between the United States of America in the north and Guatemala and Belize in the southeast. Mexico's population in mid-2000 was estimated at at 99.6 million, third in size in the Americas after the United States and Brazil. Mexico is home to a diversity of ethnic groups: mestizos (people of mixed Spanish-Indian blood who are native Spanish-speakers), 88 percent; Amerindians (native peoples speaking 239 living languages among thirteen linguistic families), 9 percent; and others (including Anglos, African Americans, Middle Easterners, and Asians), 3 percent. The predominant Indian languages are Náhuatl, Maya, Mixteco, Zapoteco, Otomí, Tzeltal, Tzotzil, Totonaco, Chol, Mazahua, and Huasteco.

When the Spanish conquistadors arrived in Mesoamerica in the early 1500s, they discovered some of the greatest cultures in human history, beginning with the Olmec civilization, which flourished between 1200 and 900 B.C.E., and continuing through the Aztec Empire, which dominated the central region of the country at the time. Their power base was an elaborate ceremonial and political center—Tenochtitlán—built on a fabricated island in Lake Texcoco in the Valley of Mexico. Explorer Hernán Cortés (1485–1547) and his army conquered the Aztecs in 1519–1520 and established Spanish rule on the ruins of the Aztec capital. The new capital was renamed Mexico City, and today it is one of the largest cities in the world, home to about 20 million people. At the time of the Spanish arrival, there were an estimated 25 million Amerindians in the territory known today as Mexico, but hundreds of thousands died through warfare and disease during the first one hundred years of Spanish rule.

During the Spanish colonial period (1520–1821), there were close ties between the Catholic Church and the state in Mexico. However, the original culture continued to influence Mexican Catholicism; it was easier to build Catholic churches on top of the ruins of ancient Indian worship centers than to impose a new culture, religion, and government upon a civilization that predated Spanish rule by centuries. The persistence of Indian cultures and belief systems is a vital force in modern Mexican society, as seen by the prevalence of traditional practices such as magic, herbal healing (in Spanish, curanderismo), and shamanism (bujería) throughout Mexico. In 1555–1556 the Catholic clergy attempted to bridge the gap between the Spanish and Indian cultures by establishing a chapel to Our Lady of Guadalupe at Tepeyac, where, according to the legend, the Virgin Mary miraculously appeared to a group of shepherds in 1531. The site would become the most sacred site for Catholics in Mexico. Future generations of clerics embellished the legend of Our Lady of Guadalupe, so that by 1648 Mexican

Status of religions in Mexico, 2000–2050

Followers	2000			2025	2050
	total	%	rate
Christians	95,169,000	96.3	1.72	123,979,000	138,100,000
Roman Catholics	92,770,000	93.8	1.74	121,200,000	135,000,000
Protestants	3,280,000	3.3	2.35	5,500,000	7,400,000
Independents	2,900,000	2.9	2.13	5,200,000	7,300,000
Nonreligious	3,069,000	3.1	2.27	5,170,000	7,063,000
Muslims	257,000	0.3	2.05	500,000	750,000
Jews	122,000	0.1	1.51	130,000	150,000
Atheists	106,000	0.1	2.81	200,000	300,000
Ethnoreligionists	72,400	0.1	3.18	60,000	50,000
Baha'is	33,900	0.0	1.93	60,000	80,000
Buddhists	22,900	0.0	1.90	40,000	60,000
Neoreligionists	10,300	0.0	1.34	20,000	30,000
Chinese folk-religionists	10,100	0.0	1.73	20,000	35,000
Hindus	6,000	0.0	1.08	10,000	16,000
other religionists	3,000	0.0	1.72	7,000	11,000
Total population	98,881,000	100.0	1.74	130,196,000	146,645,000

peasants considered the shrine to have supernatural significance and to be a sign of divine approval. They regarded themselves as the new chosen people, whom God had selected through the agency of the Virgin Mary.

After Mexico's independence from Spain in 1821, the ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH began to lose its place of privilege in Mexican society because citizens were no longer obligated to pay tithes or to work for the church as serfs in a feudal society. However, the church did maintain its monopoly on religion in Mexico, as affirmed by the Constitution of 1824, which declared that religion "will perpetually be Catholic, Apostolic, and Roman." Full diplomatic relations were maintained with the Vatican until 1867, when ties were broken following the period of French intervention in Mexican politics.

From independence until the Mexican Revolution (1821–1910), the Roman Catholic Church sided with the more conservative political parties, but certain elements with the church identified with the revolutionary struggle of the peasants against the landed aristocracy. These included Father Miguel Hidalgo (1753–1811) and other liberal-minded priests like Father José María Morelos (1765–1815). The historic division between the hierarchy of the Catholic Church and the grassroots church—the popular religion of the masses—has continued to the present.

During the rest of the nineteenth century, the Catholic Church was heavily involved in conservative politics, opposing the liberal movement and Freemasonry, which had gained popularity among the wealthy elite. The Catholic hierarchy opposed the reform movement led by Benito Juárez (1806–1872) and welcomed the French occupation of Mexico in 1862 under Maximilian of Hapsburg (1832–1867). But the French imperial venture did not survive the stiff resistance of Mexican nationalistic forces and U.S. political pressure, and in 1867 Juárez returned to the presidency and counteracted the threat posed by the Catholic hierarchy by capturing and executing Maximilian. Although church-state tensions eased considerably during the conservative administration of Porfirio Díaz (r. 1877–1880 and 1884–1911) they flared up again after the Revolution of 1910. The Constitution of 1917 established a clear separation between religion and the government, guaranteed that public education would be secular and humanistic, and prohibited the clergy from participating in the nation's political life and from owning property.

The Cristero War (1926–1929) was an attempt by conservative Catholic forces to invalidate certain antireligious laws included in the Constitution of 1917, which were opposed by the Catholic bishops and their political allies. When attempts to amend the constitution failed, Catholics in the states of Jalisco, Guerrero, Michoacán, Colima, Guanajuato, Querétaro, Puebla, and Veracruz resorted to armed violence against the government of President Plutarco Elías Calles (1877–1945). The war ended in June 1929 when President Emilio Portes Gil (1890–1978) promised to end religious persecution and to respect liberty of conscience, which allowed the priests to save face and resume their religious obligations in Catholic churches throughout the country.

In the decades after the Mexican Revolution (1910–1917), the Institutional Revolutionary Party (known as PRI) came to power. A corporatist party machine, the PRI controlled national politics until 2001 when an opposition candidate, Vicente Fox, won the presidency under the banner of PAN, the National Action Party, which has a center-right orientation and close ties to the Catholic Church.

The systematic penetration of Protestant groups into Mexico began with the Constitution of 1857, which limited the power of the Catholic Church and broadened individual freedoms. By 1900 at least fifteen U.S. Protestant denominations had entered Mexico, some of which began along the U.S.-Mexican border, others on the coastlands, and some in Mexico City and other major cities.

One of the first missionaries to begin Protestant work along the border was Melinda Rankin (1811–1888), a Congregationalist from New England. She began work in Brownsville, Texas, in 1852, and in 1856 she joined the American and Foreign Christian Union. In the 1860s and 1870s she established Protestant schools in Matamoros, Tamaulipas (1862–1863), and Monterrey, Nuevo León (1866–1872). In 1862, an agent of the Texas Tract Society, James Hickey, who was affiliated with the CHRISTIAN BROTHERS, arrived in Monterrey to begin the task of Bible and tract distribution. In 1864 he also helped establish an independent Protestant church in Monterrey, which was later pastored by Thomas Westrup. By 1870 there were five Protestant churches in Monterrey and vicinity: Westrup's congregation, affiliated with the New York Baptist Missionary Society, and four others related to the joint efforts of Rankin, John Beveridge, and John Parke. In 1873 this latter work became associated with Presbyterian churches in Boston.

The first Protestant church in Mexico City was a German Lutheran congregation established in 1861. In 1868 the EPISCOPAL CHURCH established a relationship with an independent Catholic church (non-papal), known as the Mexican Church of Jesus, which had been organized in 1859 in Mexico City. By 1870, there were twenty-three Episcopal-Church of Jesus congregations in the Valley of Mexico.

During the 1870s, many more American-based Protestant mission agencies began work in Mexico. In 1871 the Society of Friends (Quakers) arrived in Matamoros, Tamaulipas, near the Texas border. Three missionary couples affiliated with the Northern Presbyterian Church (now an integral part of the PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH [U.S.A.]) arrived in Mexico City in 1872 and eventually began work in Zacatecas, San Luis Potosí, and Guanajuato. The AMERICAN BOARD OF COMMISSIONERS FOR FOREIGN MISSIONS (Congregational Church) sent two missionary couples to Guadalajara in 1872, and in 1873 five missionary couples were sent to Monterrey. In 1872, both the Methodist Episcopal Church North and the Methodist Episcopal Church South (both now part of the UNITED METHODIST CHURCH) began work in Mexico City, after purchasing from the government properties that formerly belonged to the Catholic Church. In 1874 the Southern Presbyterians began work in Matamoros, Tamaulipas. The Associated Reformed Presbyterian Church arrived in 1875, the SOUTHERN BAPTIST CONVENTION in 1880, the Plymouth Brethren (also known as the Christian Brethren) in 1890, the SEVENTH DAY BAPTIST GENERAL CONFERENCE in 1893, and the Christian Women's Board of Missions (CHRISTIAN CHURCH [DISCIPLES OF CHRIST]) in 1895.

A Mexican folk art sculpture incorporates Adam and Eve in a traditional Mayan Tree of Life. (Corbis)

All told, between 1900 and 1949, at least 30 Protestant church bodies or mission agencies were established in Mexico, and between 1950 and 1985, another 110 Protestant mission agencies arrived in Mexico, and scores of new Mexican denominations came into existence.

In 1910 there were about 24,000 baptized Protestant church members in Mexico: Methodists (12,500), Presbyterians (5,700), Baptists (2,630), Congregationalists (1,540), Disciples of Christ (900), and Quakers (670). However, by 1936 the total membership of these groups was only 22,882, which reflects some of the difficulties encountered by these denominations during the Mexican Revolution and the Depression. Nevertheless, according to a study published by the International Missionary Council in 1938, the total Protestant membership in Mexico for 1936 was an estimated 48,000. Some of the newer denominations reported the following membership statistics in 1936: ASSEMBLIES OF GOD, 6,000; Adventists, 4,000; Swedish Pentecostals, 4,000; CHURCH OF THE NAZARENE, 2,000; Pentecostal Holiness Church International, 1,300; Pilgrim Holiness Church (now an integral part of the WESLEYAN CHURCH), 1,200; and Mexican Indian Churches, 560, for a total of about 19,000 members. These are partial statistics because other denominations, with about 6,000 members, existed in 1936 that were not included in the study.

Protestantism grew considerably in the next few decades. In 1962 a study by Donald McGavran reported about 276,000 Protestant church members in Mexico. At that time, the largest denominational families were Presbyterian (42,000), Methodist (33,000), Adventist (22,700), Church of God (15,500), Swedish Pentecostal (15,000), Assemblies of God (15,000), and MIEPI (Movement of Independent Pentecostal Churches) (10,000). There were also scores of other groups with under 10,000 members each. At that time, Protestantism in Mexico was represented by about 40 denominations, 2,420 organized congregations, 1,622 mission stations, and 2,470 Sunday schools. In 1967 the total Protestant membership in Mexico was about 430,000, 64 percent of which was made up of Pentecostals and 36 percent of non-Pentecostals, indicative of the rapid growth of Pentecostals relative to non-Pentecostals in the thirty-year period between 1936 and 1966.

For 2000, Peter Brierly gives the following membership statistics for the larger Protestant groups in Mexico: Adventists, 383,000; Anglican-Episcopalians, 11,900; Baptists, 88,030; Lutherans, 2,190; Methodists, 51,590; Presbyterians, 167,170; Pentecostals, 588,600; and other non-Pentecostals, 538,150. The largest denominations were the following: SEVENTH-DAY ADVENTIST CHURCH (383,000), Union of Independent Evangelical Churches/Swedish Pentecostals (368,000), Assemblies of God (207,000), National Presbyterian Church (155,000), Church of God in the Mexican Republic (86,900), National Baptist Convention (82,900), Movement of Independent Pentecostal Churches/MIEPI (55,000), METHODIST CHURCH OF MEXICO (46,900), APOSTOLIC CHURCH OF FAITH IN JESUS CHRIST (46,400), National Christian Church of the Assemblies of God (39,200), CHURCH OF GOD (CLEVELAND, TENNESSEE; 37,600), and the Church of the Nazarene (32,500). All other Protestant denominations had fewer than 20,000 members in 2000.

The size of the Protestant population in Mexico for 2000 was estimated to be 7,148,980, or about 7.2 percent of the total population, compared to 4.9 percent in 1990, 3.3 percent in 1980, and 1.8 percent in 1970, based on statistics from the Mexican national census. Despite its growth relative to the population, the size of the Protestant population in Mexico remains much lower than in counties of Central America where Protestants are between 15 and 25 percent of the national population.

In 1990 about 37 percent of the Protestant population in Mexico was concentrated in the southeastern states of Chiapas, Tabasco, Campeche, Quintana Roo, Yucatán, and Veracruz; 22 percent resided in the central region of the Federal District and the states of Mexico, Puebla, and Morelos; and 19 percent in the northern border region of Tamaulipas, Nuevo León, Coahuila, Chihuahua, Sonora, and Baja California (North and South). The individual states with the largest Protestant populations were Chiapas (16.3 percent), Tabasco (15 percent), Campeche (13.5 percent), Quintana Roo (12.2 percent), and Yucatán (9.3 percent).

Overall, Mexico continues to be dominated by the Roman Catholic Church, with 89.7 percent of the total population identifying with Catholicism in the 1990 census. But clearly other religious groups, such as the Protestants, have experienced significant growth. Other religious groups registered 1,175,225 adherents, or about 1.4 percent of the total population. And about 3.9 percent of Mexicans claimed to have “no religion” or refused to answer the question.

Although some of the non-Protestant groups related to the Christian tradition were probably included in the “Protestant-Evangelical” category in the 1990 census, at least the following non-Protestant groups are present in Mexico today: JEHOVAH’S WITNESSES (with 1,349,998 adherents in 1993, second in size to Jehovah’s Witnesses in the United States), CHURCH OF JESUS CHRIST OF LATTER-DAY SAINTS (with 659,000 members in 1990), CHURCH OF CHRIST, SCIENTIST (Christian Science), Voice of the Cornerstone (a Branham-related group from Puerto Rico), MITA CONGREGATION (also from Puerto Rico), UNIVERSAL CHURCH OF THE KINGDOM OF GOD (from Brazil), Growing in Grace Churches (Miami, Florida), THE FAMILY, and the Prophet Elias Movement (with at least four registered church associations). Another religious tradition, founded in Monterrey in 1926 by Eusebio Joaquín González (known as the Prophet Aarón), has blended Mexican mysticism with Pentecostal fervor to create the LIGHT OF THE WORLD CHURCH, which grew from 80 members in 1929 to 75,000 in 1972, to 1.5 million in 1986, and to about 4 million members in 22 countries in 1990.

Other traditions in Mexico include at least 60 organizations representing Judaism, Islam, the BAHAI FAITH, Buddhism, Hinduism, Sikhism, Shintoism, and Western Esoteric groups, including the CHURCH OF SCIENTOLOGY, the UNIFICATION MOVEMENT, the THEOSOPHICAL SOCIETY, the Universal Gnostic Church, the NEW ACROPOLIS CULTURAL ASSOCIATION, the Grand Universal Fraternity, the Spiritual Magnetic School of the Universal Commune, and numerous other Spiritualist groups.

Marranos, those Jews who publicly converted to Christianity to avoid persecution in Spain but who retained their Jewish identity in private, accompanied the Spaniards into Mexico in the sixteenth century; however, the present Jewish community was largely built upon migration from the United States early in the twentieth century. The community was further enlarged by Jews from England and Germany, and two small groups from Syria, one from Damascus and a strict Orthodox group from Aleppo. In 1990 the Jewish community in Mexico, one of the largest in Latin America, numbered about 64,500 or 0.08 percent of the national population, with more than one third residing in Mexico City.

Although Muslims had migrated to Mexico throughout the twentieth century, it was not until the 1980s that organized worship became visible. In 1995 Mark (Omar) Weston, a convert to Islam, opened the Centro Cultural Islamico de Mexico in Mexico City as a center for the Muslim community. Dozens of other Islamic groups also exist throughout the country.

Present also are native Amerindian religions, which have been mixed with elements of Catholicism to create the nation’s unique blend of popular religiosity. Another religious tradition, the Marian Trinitarian Spiritualist Church, blends Catholicism with Spiritualism, or communication with the dead through the use of mediums and seances. The Marian Church has more than 30 registered groups.

The Inter-Religious Council of Mexico was founded in Mexico City in 1992 with representatives from the following traditions: Roman Catholic, Greek Orthodox, Anglican, Lutheran, Presbyterian, Mormon, Buddhist, Hindu, Sikh, Jewish, and Sufi-Muslim. Through the 1990s, the coordinator of the council was Jonathan Rose, the Jewish representative.

Clifton L. Holland

Sources:

- Bastian, Jean-Pierre. Protestantismo y Sociedad en México. Mexico City: CUPSA, 1983.
- Blancarte, Roberto. Historia de la Iglesia Católica en México. Mexico City: Fondo de Cultura Económica, 1992.
- Brierly, Peter, ed. World Churches Handbook. London: Christian Research, 1977.
- Giménez, Gilberto, ed. Identidades religiosas y sociales en México. Mexico City: Universidad Nacional Autónoma de México, 1996.
- Larson, Peter. El uso evangélico del XI Censo General de Población y Vivienda, 1990. Mexico City: VELA, 1993.
- McGavran, Donald, ed. Church Growth in Mexico. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans, 1963.
- Read, William R., et al. Latin American Church Growth. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans, 1969.
- Scheffler, Lilian. Magia y brujería en México. Mexico City: Panorama Editorial, 1994.
- Scott, Lindy. Salt of the Earth: A Socio-Political History of Mexico City Evangelical Protestants (1964–1991). Mexico City: Editorial Kyrios, 1991.

Micronesia

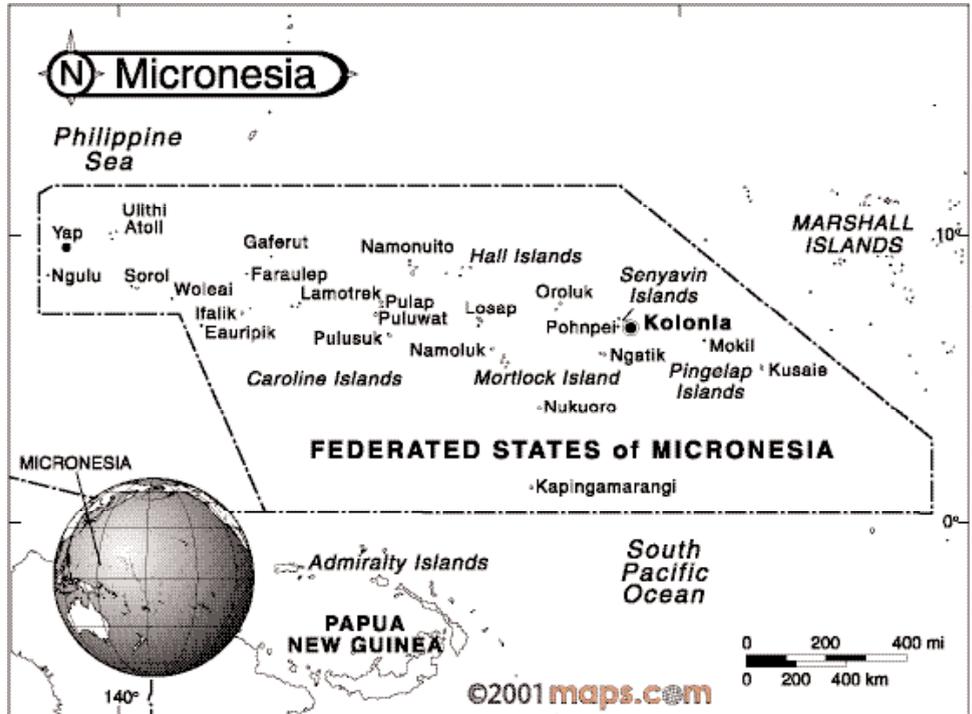

The term Micronesia (meaning “small islands”) describes three archipelagos: the MARSHALL ISLANDS, the Marianas Islands, and the Caroline Islands. They were inhabited in prehistoric times by Micronesians of various groupings.

The first Europeans, Ferdinand Magellan (c. 1480–1521) and his crew, visited the Marianas in 1521. They would be named for Queen Maria Ana of Austria (1667–1740) during her time as regent to the Spanish throne. The Spanish claimed hegemony over the islands and in 1885 were able to keep the Germans from trying to place a protectorate over them. The United States received GUAM from Spain in 1898 as a result of the Spanish-American War. Spain then sold the rest of the Marianas to Germany.

Japan occupied Micronesia in 1914 and actually launched the attack on Pearl Harbor from a base there. Before the war was over, several of the islands, like Saipan, became famous battlegrounds. At the end of World War II, the United Nations Security Council gave the islands to the United States as a trust. The United Nations mandated that the U.S. government manage the trust so as to prepare the islands for independence. In 1975, as a result of a referendum, the Marianas were set aside as the NORTHERN MARIANAS. In 1978, following another referendum, the Federated States of Micronesia, constituting the Caroline Islands, came into being. PALAU and the Marshall Islands stayed out of the federation and now exist as independent countries. In 1982 the U.S. government signed an agreement with the Federated States that gave them local autonomy but assigned to the United States responsibility for defense and foreign relations. There are four states in the Federated States of Micronesia—Chuuk, Yap, Pohnpei, and Kosrae.

The traditional religions of Micronesia followed a polytheism that recognized a variety of deities under a supreme being known as Ialulep. The traditional religions have largely been replaced by Christianity, but they continue to exert influence through the survival of traditional healing practices.

Christianity came to Micronesia in 1668 with the opening of the first ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH mission. The missionaries had their greatest success among the Chamorros of the Marianas, who developed their own form of Spanish Catholicism. Work in the Marianas grew into a separate diocese headquartered at Agana, the capital of Guam. The work on the Carolinas and Marshalls was combined in a vicariate. More recently, the Caroline Islands were set

Status of religions in Micronesia, 2000-2050

Followers	2000			2025	2050
	total	%	rate
Christians	111,000	93.1	2.07	176,000	234,000
Roman Catholics	74,600	62.8	3.00	120,000	160,000
Protestants	47,000	39.6	2.42	76,000	100,000
Marginal Christians	3,300	2.8	3.45	9,000	13,000
Ethnoreligionists	4,100	3.5	1.38	6,000	7,000
Baha'is	1,900	1.6	4.33	3,600	6,000
Nonreligious	800	0.7	3.84	1,800	3,000
Buddhists	540	0.5	1.80	1,000	1,500
Neoreligionists	430	0.4	0.66	1,000	1,300
Chinese folk-religionists	360	0.3	0.46	800	1,200
Total population	119,000	100.0	2.08	190,000	254,000

aside as a separate diocese and the Marshalls as an apostolic prefecture.

In 1852 the AMERICAN BOARD OF COMMISSIONERS FOR FOREIGN MISSIONS (ABCFM), an association of American Congregationalists, sent a party of American and Hawaiian missionaries to the Caroline Islands, where they opened missions on Kusaie and Ponape. In 1857 they extended the work to the Marshall Islands. In 1865, administration of the Micronesian mission was assigned to the Hawaiian (Congregationalist's) Church's Board of Missions. German missionaries from the Liebenzell Mission entered and opened stations on the Truk Islands (or Chuuk), Palau, and the Yap Islands. They had come at the request of the ABCFM missionaries after Germany had asserted its claim to the area. The Germans worked cooperatively with the American missionaries until World War I, when all missionaries had to leave. They returned in 1925 and remained through World War II. Their work matured into the Protestant Church of East Truk.

The ABCFM was superseded by the United Church Board of World Missions in 1957, when the Congregational-Christian Churches in the United States united with the Evangelical and Reformed Church to form the UNITED CHURCH OF CHRIST. The United Church of Christ continued to support the work in Micronesia. In 1986, at the time the new Federated States of Micronesia was being formed, the mission work was reorganized as the United Church of Micronesia, modeled in both doctrine and polity after the United Church of Christ. The United Church of Micronesia included four churches, the United Church of Christ in Kosrae, the United Church of Christ in Pohnpei, the United Church of Christ in Chuuk, and the United Church of Christ–Congregational in the Marshall Islands.

Through the twentieth century, a number of U.S. churches across the Protestant–Free Church spectrum opened work in Micronesia. The SEVENTH-DAY ADVENTIST CHURCH, which arrived in 1930, now assigns the work to their Guam-Micronesia Mission. More recent arrivals include the General Baptists (1947), the ASSEMBLIES OF GOD (1960), the UNITED PENTECOSTAL CHURCH INTERNATIONAL (1965), the BAPTIST BIBLE FELLOWSHIP INTERNATIONAL (1972), and the Conservative Congregational Christian Church, an offshoot of the United Church of Christ (1984). The Baptist Bible Fellowship International Mission began at the request of Ermut Ikea, the mayor of Puluwat (one of the Chuuk Islands).

In addition, a variety of independent Evangelical and fundamentalist missionary agencies have started missions in Micronesia in recent decades. The JEHOVAH'S WITNESSES came in 1965 and the CHURCH OF JESUS CHRIST OF LATTER-DAY SAINTS (LDS) in 1976. Beginning its work on Pohnpei, the LDS extended its mission to include Chuuk and Yap in 1977 and Kosrae in 1985. By 1996 the church could report some three thousand members.

Several indigenous religious movements surfaced in the twentieth century. The first was Modekne, an attempt to synthesize Christian elements with the traditional religion on Palau. From its first appearance there, it spread through the islands, its appeal being attributed to its emphasis on healing, until it was suppressed by the government in 1945. It continues as an underground movement.

Following World War II, the BAHAI FAITH came to Micronesia, and some Chinese Buddhist/Taoist worship is present among Chinese expatriates.

Sources:

- Haynes, D. E., and W. L. Wuerch. Micronesian Religion and Lore: A Guide to Sources, 1526–1990. Westport, CT: Greenwood Press, 1995.
- Hazel, F. X. The Catholic Church in Micronesia: Historical Essays on the Catholic Church in the Caroline-Marshall Islands. Chicago: Micronesian Seminar/Loyola University Press, 1991.

Mueller, K. W. "The Protestant Mission Work on the Truk Islands in Micronesia: A Missiological Analysis and Evaluation." M.A. thesis, Fuller Theological Seminary, 1981.

Midway

The Midway islands became famous as the sight of the decisive naval battle of the war in the Pacific during World War II. Midway is a single atoll with two islands, Sand Island and Eastern Island. The great majority of the twenty-three hundred inhabitants are military personnel. The island was annexed in 1867 by the United States and is currently administered by the United States Navy.

There are no permanently organized churches or religious groups on Midway, but services are conducted by military chaplains of both the Catholic and Protestant/Free Church faiths. The Roman Catholic Church considers Midway as part of the Diocese of Honolulu. No Protestant denomination has established territorial jurisdiction on the island.

Sources:

- Barrett, David. The Encyclopedia of World Christianity. 2d edition. New York: Oxford University Press, 2001.
- Bissio, Roberto Remo, et al. Third World Guide 93/94. Montevideo, Uruguay: Instituto del Tercer Mundo, 1992.

Mission Covenant Church of Sweden

The Mission Covenant Church is a Scandinavian expression of the free religious impulse represented by the eighteenth-century Evangelical Revival in England and the Pietist movement in Germany. Essential to the Scandinavian revival was the work of Karl Olof Rosenius (1816–1868), editor of the periodical Pietisten. He organized conventicles—informal meetings outside the supervision of the state church—and led in the development of a new hymnology. A renewed emphasis on the spiritual life in Sweden in the mid-nineteenth century led in 1855 to the formation of a new congregation separate from the state-supported CHURCH OF SWEDEN. Other congregations emphasizing the free association of committed believers were soon organized, and in 1878, when these groups established a formal relationship, they agreed upon a congregational polity. Growth was somewhat inhibited by the high level of emigration of members to the United States.

The Mission Covenant Church looked upon the Bible as its sole rule of faith and life, neither composing nor adopting a creedal statement. A Protestant theological perspective much influenced by both its Lutheran heritage and Methodism developed, but through the twentieth century a Reformed perspective came to dominate. However, theology was always subordinated to the spiritual life. The church refrained from Baptist independency and continued to practice infant baptism.

At the end of the 1990s the Mission Covenant Church of Sweden reported approximately seventy thousand members. The church developed an extensive mission program, often in cooperation with its sister church in America, and its missionary efforts resulted in the development of related autonomous churches around the world, from India and Japan to Ecuador and the Congo. These churches have fellowship through the INTERNATIONAL FEDERATION OF FREE EVANGELICAL CHURCHES. The Mission Covenant Church of Sweden continues to provide support for its sister churches in poorer countries.

The pressure to provide training for ministers early in the twentieth century resulted in the organization of a seminary in 1908. Known since 1994 as the Stockholm School of Theology, the school is now a cooperative effort, jointly supported with the Baptist Union of Sweden. The church also supports Svenska Missionsförbundets Ungdom (Mission Covenant Youth), which has emerged as a broadly supported youth work with units throughout the country.

The general assembly is the highest legislative body in the church. Between meetings of the assembly, an executive board administers its policies. Congregations are divided into districts, each of which is led by a superintendent. The church is a member of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES and the WORLD ALLIANCE OF REFORMED CHURCHES.

Address:

Mission Covenant Church of Sweden
P.O. Box 6302
Tegnérsgatan 8
11381 Stockholm
Sweden
<http://www.smf.se/> (in Swedish)

Source:

Bauswein, Jean-Jacques, and Lukas Vischer, eds. The Reformed Family Worldwide: A Survey of Reformed Churches, Theological Schools, and International Organizations. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans, 1999.

Mission 21

See Basel Mission

Missionaries of Charity

The Missionaries of Charity are an ordered community of the ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH that has become world famous because of the attention directed to its founder, Mother Teresa (1910–1997). She was born Agnes (or Gonxha) Bojazhiu into an Albanian family residing at Skopje, now the capital of Macedonia. When she was eighteen, she became a nun with the Sisters of Loreto. In 1929, after learning some English, she entered the novitiate at Darjeeling, India, and two years later she was assigned to work in Calcutta.

In 1946 Sister Teresa experienced a new calling to serve the poor of Calcutta. Two years later, with the blessings of her order and church authorities, she left the Sisters of Loreto and settled in the slums of Calcutta. Several women who came to assist her became the nucleus of a new order that was formally approved as a diocesan congregation in 1950 and as a pontifical institute in 1965.

Over the next several decades the order grew rather quietly, with its first activities directed toward Calcutta's street children and then toward the dying, for whom Mother Teresa opened hospices. The order's concern grew for the homeless and those infested with the most despised diseases, such as Hansen's disease and AIDS. The order also expanded into other countries, and by the time of Mother Teresa's death it included more than twenty-three hundred sisters serving in more than eighty countries. There are novitiates in Rome, Italy; Manila, the Philippines; Warsaw, Poland; Tabora, Tanzania; and San Francisco, California.

Mother Teresa's work began to attract international attention, especially in Roman Catholic circles, in the 1970s, and she became the recipient of a series of awards, including the Pope John XXIII Peace Prize (1971), the Nehru Prize for her promotion of international peace and understanding (1972), and the Balzan Prize for promoting peace and brotherhood (1979). These were capped by the Nobel Peace Prize in 1979, which made her one of the most well-known women in the world.

Address:

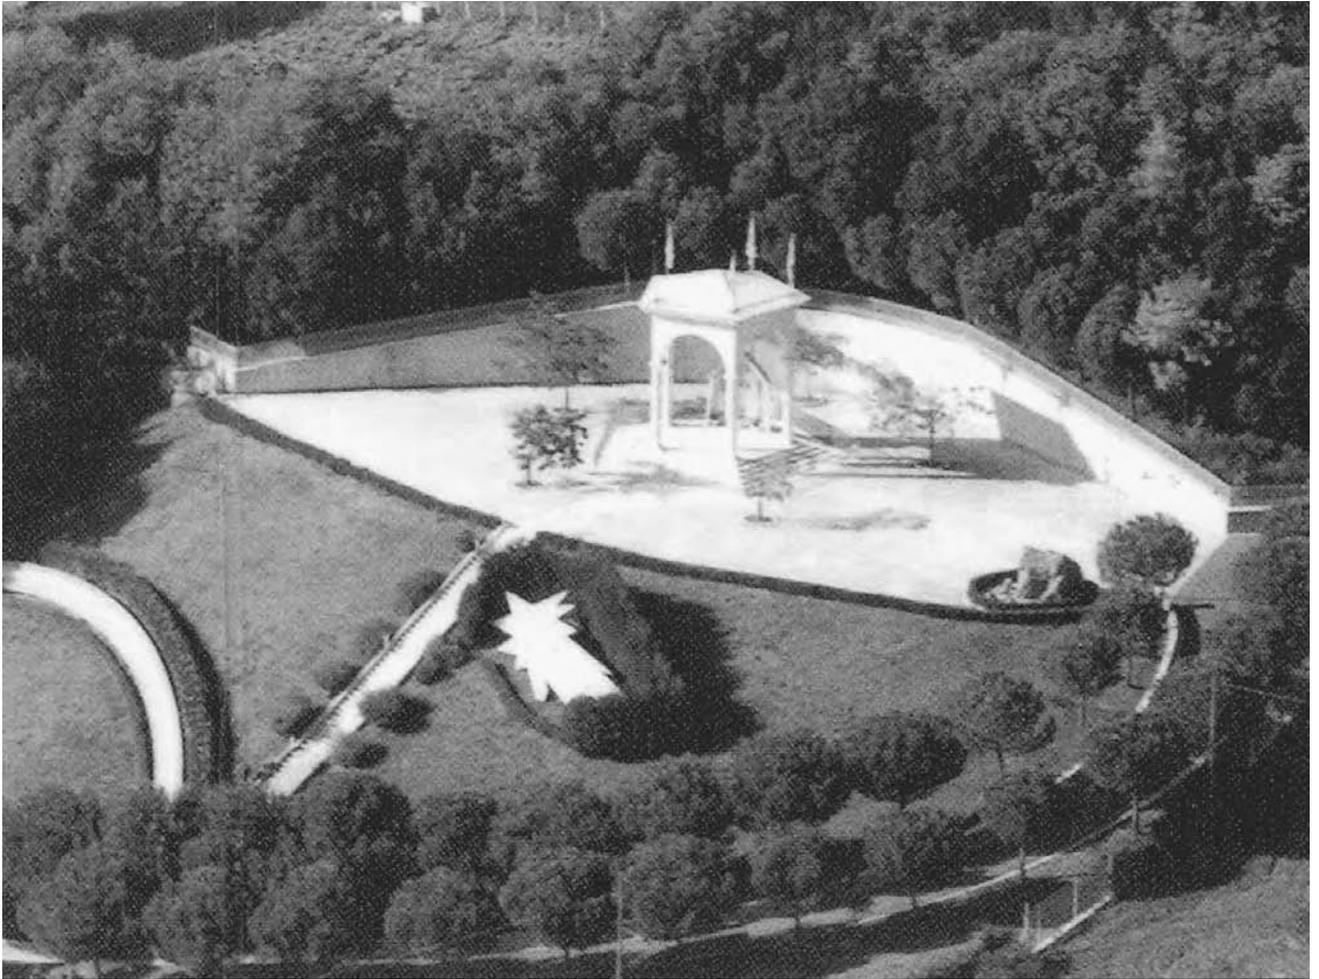

Missionaries of Charity, Motherhouse
c/o Sr. Nirmala, MC
54A, Acharya Jagadish Chandra Bose Rd.
Calcutta 700 016
India
<http://www.geocities.com/Athens/2960/mothert.htm>

Sources:

Collopy, Michael. Works of Love Are Works of Peace: Mother Teresa of Calcutta and the Missionaries of Charity. San Francisco: Ignatius Press, 1996.
Kumar, Sinita. Mother Teresa of Calcutta. London: Weidenfeld and Nicolson, 1998.
Le Joly, E. Mother Teresa of Calcutta: A Biography. San Francisco: Harper & Row, 1983.
Serrou, R. Teresa of Calcutta: A Pictorial Biography. New York: McGraw Hill, 1980.

La Missione—Luigia Paparelli

Luigia Paparelli (1908–1984) was born in Scranton, Pennsylvania, and was raised a Roman Catholic. In the 1940s, in

Aerial view of shrine at La Missione—Luigia Paparelli, Gambassi, Italy (Photo courtesy of Raffaella D. Marzio)

Rome, she met Basilio Roncaccia, the founder of the Divine Mission, who claimed to have received a divine mission mandate to share with his followers his newly found healing power. Roncaccia and Paparelli shared a special devotion to the Holy Trinity and to the idea of helping those who suffered, but their practices were different, and they separated after only a brief association. A charismatic figure, Paparelli subsequently gathered a significant number of followers around her. The first “sign” of her future mission dates back, in fact, to 1937, when, afflicted by a somewhat mysterious illness, she claimed that the Lord had visited and miraculously healed her. Seven years of penance followed, and on October 13, 1944, Paparelli had a new mystical experience and interpreted it as the Sacred Heart of Jesus giving her the mission to “heal bodies in order to save souls.”

The first cure ascribed to Paparelli’s miraculous powers took place in October 1944. In that year, she established a group called the Luigia Paparelli Mission (Missione Luigia Paparelli) and started calling her followers the “Brothers of the Mission.” For her followers, Paparelli became “the Master,” divinely invested with powers to heal and exorcise. She “signed” the sick with a cross on the forehead, lips, heart, and the afflicted part of their bodies in the name of the Holy Trinity. Paparelli also instructed those “signed” by her to visit a local Catholic parish in order to confess and receive Holy Communion.

In 1970 a letter from the Office of the Cardinal Vicar of Rome stated that Paparelli’s phenomena and “signs” were “superstitious” and could in fact “promote a form of superstition detrimental to religion.” In such phenomena, the declaration went on to say, there was “nothing supernatural.” The mission continued to grow, however, and modified its name to La Missione—Luigia Paparelli after Paparelli’s death. She died, surrounded by the Brothers of the Mission, on August 28, 1984, in Valmontone, near Rome.

Luigia Paparelli stated emphatically that she did not regard herself as the founder of a new religion; her faith, she said, was “the one and only religion of Jesus Christ, based on the Ten Commandments.” Paparelli’s teachings and her supernatural phenomena created a large community of believers who still regard themselves as members of the ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH, but whose individual perception of their Catholicism differs from person to person. Some Brothers of the Mission would simply claim that their feeling toward Paparelli is one of deep gratitude. For other Brothers, however, Paparelli is nothing less than divine, and some of them also have an absolute faith in her healing powers, to the exclusion of all mainstream medicine. These fringes of the larger movement live their lives quite separately from society as a whole, and often break ties with their own families in consequence. The relationship between the mission and the Roman Catholic hierarchy varies from place to place, shaped by the attitudes of Paparelli's followers and those of local parish priests and bishops.

After Paparelli's death, problems of succession generated several divisions among her followers. According to some witnesses, before her death the Master "called" Rina Menichetti Frizza (b. 1928) from Orvieto in central Italy, and it was to Menichetti that Paparelli addressed her last words. Those Brothers of the Mission who were called Apostolini (Little Apostles) recognized Menichetti as Paparelli's spiritual heir. However, other Brothers of the Mission assign no particular role to Menichetti.

Menichetti continues to welcome followers to her Orvieto home, where she also enjoys spiritual visions of Paparelli, whose messages she immediately writes down for the Brothers. Menichetti tells of her encounters with the Master, who "takes her on her coach" to "her Kingdom," together with God the Father and the Virgin Mary. In Menichetti's visions, Paparelli claims that she is the Son (not the Daughter) of the Father, and that the Brothers should anticipate her return: "My return will be your liberation." At the end of each "conversation," Menichetti receives a blessing from the Holy Trinity: "In the name of the Father, Luigia the Son, the Holy Spirit, and the Virgin Mary."

The stated aim of the La Missione–Luigia Paparelli is the promotion of the "Catholic, Apostolic, and Roman religion." Its main centers are located in Gambassi, Tuscany, and in San Venanzo, Umbria, both in central Italy. Temples of the mission, with statues of Jesus, the Virgin Mary, the Holy Trinity, and Luigia Paparelli herself, have been built and are regarded as sacred places, where both special yearly festivals and traditional Catholic feasts are celebrated. There are additional centers in Rome, Marches, and Sicily, as well as in other countries: Norway, Denmark, Sweden, Switzerland, France, and the United States. Brothers of the Mission, particularly the Little Apostles, do not proselytize. The mission's message is normally spread by those who have been healed and who, in turn, propagate its powers of healing. The Brothers of the Mission in Italy and abroad total approximately ten thousand.

Rina Menichetti's visions from July 8, 1986, to April 8, 1988, are informally and privately circulated.

Address:

La Missione–Luigia Paparelli
Via Montefalconi 21
50050 Gambassi terme
Florence
Italy

Raffaella Di Marzio

Source:

Di Marzio, Raffaella. "Gruppi ispirati a Basilio Roncaccia e a Luigia Paparelli." In Enciclopedia delle Religioni in Italia, edited by Massimo Introvigne, PierLuigi Zoccatelli, Nelly Ippolito Macrina, and Verónica Roldán, 66–75. Torino, Italy: Elledici, 2001.

Mita Congregation

The Mita Congregation, a Puerto Rican–based Christian Pentecostal church, was founded by Juanita García Peraza (1897–1970). When she was eight years old, García Peraza became ill with ulcers and was nursed to health with prayer. Once well, she began to attend a Pentecostal church, the Pentecostal movement having just come to the island. She grew to womanhood, married, and bore four children. As a young woman, she had a vivid religious experience: she was visited by the Holy Spirit, who informed her that her body was needed to carry out God's work. After she accepted this calling, she was given a choice. Her life trial would either be persecution or illness, and she chose the latter. One night a short time later, as she looked out the window, she saw a shooting star, which approached her and landed on her forehead. At that moment she became the incarnation of the Holy Spirit. She was also told the name of God for the new era: Mita. She subsequently began to perform a spectrum of miracles. She saw her experience as fulfillment of a prophecy in Revelation 2:17.

In the late-1930s García Peraza came into conflict with the Puerto Rican Pentecostal leaders, who were all male. One day while "in the Spirit," she designated Teófilo Vargas Sein as the First Prophet of God for the new era, renaming him Aarón. As the conflict grew, she was tried for heresy. In the midst of the trial, she and eleven followers walked out of the Pentecostal Church, and in 1940 she founded the Free Church. She later designated a site in San Juan where a temple would be built as the headquarters for the movement.

From the basic Pentecostal theology, Mita, as García Peraza became known, developed a new perspective. Drawing on an ideal initially articulated by Joachim of Fiore (c. 1135–1202), she divided history into three eras, that of Jehovah, God the Father; that of Jesus, God the Son; and now that of Mita, God the Holy Spirit and Mother. Members draw a distinction between García Peraza, the human woman, and Mita, the God who worked through her. Aarón, who succeeded her, is seen as having become the channel through which the Holy Spirit (Mita) continues to speak.

The special work of Mita has been to gather the scattered children of God, which is done under the three banners of Love, Freedom, and Unity. The new era initiated by Mita serves to relativize and somewhat supersede the revelation that previously came through Christ. In the new era, baptism, the Eucharist, and many of the trappings of the ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH (the dominant religious body in Puerto Rico) have been left behind. Mita's followers also see the arrival of Mita as equivalent to the Second Coming, fulfilling the prophecy of Jesus in John 14:16 concerning the coming Comforter. She is also identified with the woman in Revelation 12:1–2.

Mita's movement originally developed among the working classes of San Juan. Developed along with the church is a corporation, Congregación Mita, Inc., through which numerous businesses have been organized, membership in the church coinciding with membership in an economic cooperative. As the movement grew, a variety of businesses were formed apparently with a long-term plan of community self-sufficiency. These have diversified to include farms and cattle ranches in rural areas and both retail and wholesale businesses in the cities. Over the years the businesses have prospered and have also given birth to various social services, including health and counseling services, a nursing home, and several schools. Rather than withdrawing from society as many communal groups do, the Mita Congregation is thoroughly integrated into the surrounding community.

Once established in Puerto Rico, the church expanded to Colombia and the Dominican Republic, where it has had equal success, and from there to Mexico, Venezuela, Costa Rica, El Salvador, Curaçao, and Panama. The church has also followed the migration of Latin Americans to North America, where congregations have been planted in Spanish-speaking communities across the continent. In 1990, in commemoration of the fiftieth anniversary of the founding of the movement, a new temple was dedicated in San Juan. It seats six thousand people.

Mita Congregation has established its headquarters in Hato Rey, Puerto Rico, inland and south of San Juan. It has approximately fifty thousand members, the largest number of which are in Colombia. There are six congregations in the United States and one in Canada.

Address:

Mita Congregation
Calle Duerte 235
Hato Rey, 60919
Puerto Rico

Source:

Camayd-Freixas, Erik. "The Cult of the Goddess Mita on the Eve of a New Millennium: A Socio-Anthropological Look at a Caribbean Urban Religion." Latin American Issues 13 (1997). Posted at http://webpub.allegheeny.edu/group/LAS/LatinAmIssues/Articles/Vol13/LAI_vol_13_section_I.html. Accessed October 20, 2001.

Moldova

The eastern European nation of Moldava, also called Moldavia, has for centuries been home to the Vlach people, closely related to the Romanians. They emerged out of the silence of many centuries in the mid-1300s, when Vlach people northeast of Wallachia formed their own kingdom and separated themselves from Hungarian rule. Their territory was established between the Danube and Dniester Rivers and northwest of the Black Sea. Running through the middle of the land was the Prut River. The Vlachs enjoyed great success through the fifteenth century under Stephen the Great (1435–1504), reaching eastward into modern Ukraine east of the Dniester River. But the Vlach Kingdom constantly had to defend its borders from its neighbors and from the expanding Ottoman Empire. Early in the 1500s, it was overrun by Turkish forces and turned into a vassal state.

In the eighteenth century, Moldava aligned itself with Russia in an attempt to overthrow Ottoman rule. By the early nineteenth century, Russia had gained hegemony over Moldava and expelled the Turkish residents. The land between the Dniester and Prut Rivers became an autonomous region within Russia, Bessarabia, and then in 1873 it became a Russian province. During the twentieth century the population soared, from 250,000 to 2.5 million. A process of Russification led in 1966 to the discontinuance of the Moldavian language in the schools.

In the years immediately following World War I, an independent Moldava was established with Romanian assistance, but Moldava became contested territory between

Status of religions in Moldavia, 2000-2050

Followers	2000			2025	2050
	total	%	rate
Christians	3,014,000	68.8	1.01	3,726,000	3,760,000
Orthodox	1,951,000	44.5	0.81	2,400,000	2,600,000
Independents	670,000	15.3	1.11	1,000,000	1,200,000
Protestants	78,000	1.8	1.09	125,000	200,000
Nonreligious	894,000	20.4	-0.81	450,000	350,000
Muslims	240,000	5.5	0.80	280,000	340,000
Atheists	183,000	4.2	-7.21	50,000	20,000
Jews	48,700	1.1	-1.82	40,000	35,000
Ethnoreligionists	270	0.0	0.74	500	1,000
Total population	4,380,000	100.0	0.04	4,547,000	4,506,000

Romania and the Soviet Union. The land west of the Dniester and Prut Rivers became part of Romania, and that to the east of the Dniester was made a part of the Ukraine. In 1940 the Soviet Union annexed Bessarabia and created the Federated Republic of Moldava, with the approximate borders of the present state of Moldova.

Moldava proclaimed its independence from the Soviet Union in 1991. The land to the west (between the Prut River and the Carpathian Mountains) is a part of present-day Romania and the Moldavian land to the east of the Dniester River remains a part of the Ukraine.

Christianity spread along the western shore of the Black Sea in the third century C.E., and from there it moved north and west along the rivers. By the time a Moldavian nation emerged in the fourteenth century, Orthodox Christianity oriented toward Byzantium had been established there. The church in Moldava was influenced first by the ROMANIAN ORTHODOX CHURCH, but beginning in the eighteenth century, the RUSSIAN ORTHODOX CHURCH (MOSCOW PATRIARCHATE) had a greater impact. After Moldava was incorporated into Russia, the Moldavian Church was incorporated into the Russian Orthodox Church. During the years of harshest repression of religion in the Soviet Union, the Moldavian Church was least affected, and a larger percentage of its churches remained open than in other parts of the USSR.

By the time of the country's independence in 1991, the church in Moldava had been thoroughly integrated into Russian Orthodoxy and remains so to the present. There are four dioceses of the ROC in Moldava, which function under the Moscow Patriarchate as the Orthodox Church of Moldava. It has close to one thousand parishes. In 1992, some Moldavian priests left the church to form the independent Bessarabian Orthodox Church and sought to place themselves under the Romanian Patriarchate in Bucharest. The government has, however, refused to recognize this splinter.

More than 95 percent of the nation's 4.5 million citizens identify with the Orthodox Church. There are, however, many Romanian-speaking people in Moldava, and there is a diocese of the Romanian Orthodox Church with headquarters at Chisinau. There is also a diocese of the Russian OLD BELIEVERS Church.

German Baptists came to Moldava in 1876 and baptized nine believers in Turtino (now in Ukraine). A church was formed three years later as part of the larger Baptist community in the Ukraine. In 1907 three German-speaking Baptist churches in Bessarabia formed the first Moldavan Baptist association. The German Baptists continued to grow until World War II, when most Germans left the region.

The first Russian Baptist congregation was formed in 1908 in Chisinau. A Russian Baptist association was formed in 1920. By 1942 there were 347 Baptist churches and 18,000 members. In 1944 the Moldavian Baptists were forced into the All Union Council of Evangelical Christian-Baptists, the umbrella group for Evangelical churches in the Soviet Union. Following independence, Baptists in Moldava organized the independent UNION OF EVANGELICAL CHRISTIANS—BAPTISTS OF RUSSIA.

The SEVENTH-DAY ADVENTIST CHURCH also began work in Moldava, which in 1989 was organized at the Moldava Union Conference. The conference reported some seven thousand members as the twenty-first century began. JEHOVAH'S WITNESSES had opened work early in the twentieth century, but in 1951 they were deported from the region. Before the fall of the Soviet Union, they quietly began to return and evangelize and by the mid-1990s they had eighty kingdom halls.

Islam entered with the Turkish forces at the end of the fifteenth century, and a Muslim community grew up during the years of Turkish hegemony in the region, mostly among Turkish expatriates. Most of the Turks (and hence most of the Muslims) were expelled by the Russians, but a few thousand remain. Some 3.5 percent of the population speak Gagauz, a Turkish dialect.

A priest speaks at a Remembrance Festival or Radunitsa in Kishinev, Moldova. (V. Kolpakov/TRIP)

Jews began settling in Moldavia in the fifteenth century. The community grew rapidly during the nineteenth century, from some 20,000 to more than 220,000. It continued to grow through the first half of the twentieth century. Although Jews in the region had been perennially subjected to various forms of anti-Semitism, serious trouble began in 1940 with the exile of many Jewish leaders to Siberia. Nazi forces overran the area in 1941, and between 1941 and 1944, most of the remaining Jews were either killed or deported.

After the war, exiles returned and along with survivors reestablished the Jewish community. In 1989 migrations to Israel began, and the majority of younger Jews have left the country. By the mid-1990s, some sixty-five thousand Jews resided in Moldavia, the largest community residing in Chisinau. Most Jews are Russian-speaking in a land where the majority of the population speaks Romanian.

Sources:

Barrett, David. The Encyclopedia of World Christianity. 2d ed. New York: Oxford University Press, 2001.

Dima, Nicolas. From Moldavia to Moldova: The Soviet-Romanian Territorial Dispute. New York: East European Monographs/Columbia University Press, 1991. Posted at <http://www.lns.cornell.edu/~pvhp/mold/Moldova.hist.html>. Accessed December 1, 2001.

Molokans

The Molokans (milk drinkers), also spelled Molokons, one of the most prominent of the nineteenth-century Russian Christian sectarian groups, were named for their practice of drinking milk during Lent, a practice forbidden to the members of the RUSSIAN ORTHODOX CHURCH. The Molokans generally trace their beginnings to the career of Simeon Uklein (b. 1733), the nephew of a noted leader of the DOUKHOBORS. He grew dissatisfied with Doukhorbor attitudes toward the Bible and in the mid-eighteenth century, he began to preach in Tambov, southeast of Moscow. He proclaimed the Bible as his only authority, and by around 1780, the Molokans had arisen as an independent body.

Uklein was not a Trinitarian. Rather he taught that God the Father is the one God, that Christ is his Son and clothed with angelic flesh, and that the Holy Spirit is of the same substance as the Father but inferior to Him. He also held that at the time of resurrection all believers will receive a new body, different from their present one. Uklein suggested that Christians should obey the secular law when it does not contradict divine law. He ran into trouble with the Russian authorities because he opposed war and advised believers to refrain from military service. He denied the need for sacraments and ritual. Water baptism was replaced with instruction in the Word. Molokans opposed the veneration given to icons.

Concerned about both the Molokans and the Doukhorbors, the Russian government began to push them out of central Russia southward to the Ukraine and then further south into the Caucasus (present-day Georgia, Armenia, and Azerbaijan) and central Asia. Repression of the group initially peaked in 1826, when the Molokans refused to be recruited into the army or to pay taxes. Under repression they quickly reassessed the tax issue, but when pressed into the army would only take noncombat duties (hospitals, cooking, etc.). By the 1840s, the Russian government estimated that some two hundred thousand Molokans could be found in the Tambov region alone.

In the 1830s, a spiritual awakening spread through the Molokan communities. It was characterized by the practice of jumping about in spiritual ecstasy. It also coincided with the appearance of several charismatic prophets, some of whom had a millennial, apocalyptic message that tended to attract believers. The jumping phenomena split the Molokans into two major groups: the Postojannye (Steadfast), who rejected the jumping, and the Pryguny (Jumpers).

The Molokans may have had as many as half a million members by the middle of the nineteenth century. The problems with the government reached a new peak in 1878, when the government attempted to introduce universal military service, and this became a matter of most intense concern when the Molokans refused to bear arms during the Russo-Japanese War (1904–1905). At this time, many Molokans began emigrating to the United States. Some two thousand Pryguny migrated to southern California between 1904 and the beginning of World War I. Several hundred Postojannye moved to Hawaii in 1904, relocating to San Francisco, California, the next year. Today, some two thousand Postojannye reside in California and Oregon, and some ten thousand Pryguny reside in southern California, Arizona, and Baja California, Mexico. There are also seven Molokan centers in Australia.

The Molokans have survived in Russia, over the years becoming the foundation upon which a number of other groups built their Russian ministries. Many Molokans joined the Mennonites, Baptists, and Evangelical Christians. The Soviet government was no kinder to the Molokans than the Russian czarists had been. As the twenty-first century begins, however, over 150 Molokan communities exist in Russia and the countries of the former Soviet Union. Most Molokans who were in the Caucasus have been driven out and have relocated in the southern part of Russia. In Russia, some coordination of the Molokan communities is being provided by the Community of Spiritual Christians—Molokans. In 1926, the Pryguny Molokans in southern California organized into the United Molokan Christian Association. There are an estimated twenty thousand Molokans worldwide.

Addresses:

Community of Spiritual Christians—Molokans
c/o Head Minister Timofei
Schetinkin
Kochubeevka, Stavropol'skii krai
Russia

United Molokan Christian Association
16222 Soriano Dr.
Hacienda Heights, CA
91745-4840

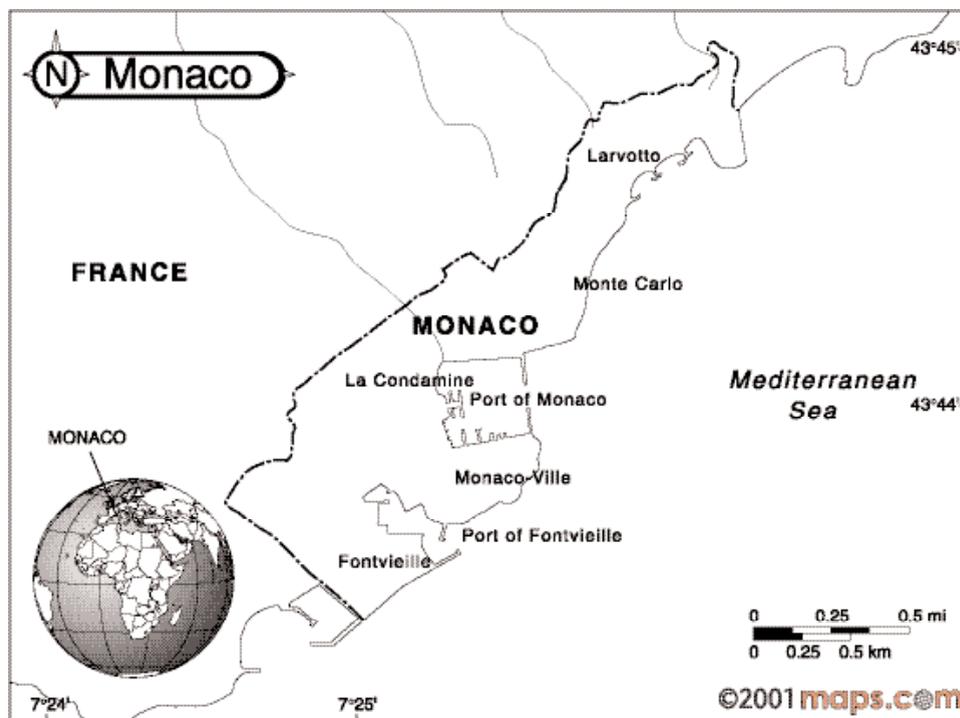

Sources:

Dunn, Ethel, and Stephen P.
Dunn. *The Molokan Heritage
Collection*. Vol. 1. Reprints of Articles and Translations.
Berkeley, CA: Highgate Road
Social Science Research Station, 1983.

Klibanov, A. I. History of Religious Sectarianism in Russia (1860s–1917).

Translated by Ethel Dunn. Oxford: Pergamon Press, 1982.

"Molokan Home Page." Posted at <http://gecko.gc.maricopa.edu/clubs/russian/molokan/>. Accessed December 19, 2001.

Monaco

Monaco, a small principality of only one square mile, is located on the French Mediterranean coast between Nice, France, and San Remo, Italy. Well-known for its casinos, it attained a high profile after its prince married American movie star Grace Kelly (1929–1982). The majority of Monacans are of French heritage, but in the twentieth century, Monaco has become a metropolitan community, with residents from many national backgrounds having moved there from Italy and several French-speaking countries.

Christianity spread along the French coast beginning in the first century. A Roman Catholic parish was established in 1247 as part of the Diocese of Nice. The Diocese of Monaco was established in 1887, though there are still a relatively small number of parishes. Protestantism was established in 1925 when the Church of England created Saint Paul's Anglican Church, which serves English-speaking residents and the many tourists who come to Monaco annually. Saint Paul's is attached to the Diocese of Europe. Greek residents organized a parish of the Greek Orthodox Church under the Ecumenical Patriarchate in 1957. French Protestants organized a congregation affiliated with the Reformed Church of France in 1959.

There is a small Jewish community in Monaco, but no synagogue has been erected. The BAHÁ'Í FAITH organized

Status of religions in Monaco, 2000-2050

Followers	2000			2025	2050
	total	%	rate
Christians	31,300	93.2	0.98	37,100	35,900
Roman Catholics	30,000	89.3	1.06	35,800	34,400
Protestants	680	2.0	-0.56	800	1,000
Anglicans	330	1.0	-0.30	300	300
Nonreligious	1,500	4.5	4.83	2,500	3,200
Jews	570	1.7	1.32	700	800
Muslims	150	0.5	2.32	280	400
Baha'is	60	0.2	3.61	120	200
Total population	33,600	100.0	1.15	40,700	40,500 in the mid-1950s. Many other different religious organizations are now represented among Monaco's diverse residents, but few have enough members to hold public worship or organize a center.

Source:

Barrett, David. The Encyclopedia of World Christianity. 2d ed. New York: Oxford University Press, 2001.

Mongolia

The Mongols are a group of peoples tied together by a common ancestry, culture, language, and residence in the land sandwiched between China and Siberia. As early as the fifth century B.C.E., the Huns established themselves in the valleys of the Selenga River. Over the succeeding centuries a Hun Empire emerged and became a major competitor of the Chinese Empire to the south. In the fifth century, the Huns under Attila (c. 406–453) turned their attention eastward and conquered most of Europe. Attila's successors were displaced by the Turks.

The Mongolians reached a new zenith under Genghis Khan (c. 1162–1227), whose kingdom stretched from Beijing to Tibet and Turkistan. As so often occurred, his successors were unable to keep his empire together. During the succeeding centuries, Mongolia and China were periodically at war. In the seventeenth century, some Mongolians sided with the Manchurians who took control of China in 1644, and over the next one hundred years, Mongolia was almost totally absorbed into China.

At the end of the nineteenth century, Mongolia became an object of dispute between Russia, China, and Japan, and following the Russo-Japanese War (1904–1905), Russia recognized Japanese hegemony over Inner (southern) Mongolia. In 1911, northern or Outer Mongolia revolted against China and proclaimed its independence. It again became a battleground between China and the troops of the czar at the time of the Russian Revolution. In the midst of continuing war, some Mongolians turned to Bolshevik Russia for help. In 1921 a combination of Russian and Mongolian troops seized Urga (now Ulaanbaatar), the capital of Outer Mongolia. Three years later, the People's Republic of Mongolia was proclaimed. It was able to resist the Japanese attempt to invade in 1939, and the assistance provided by the Soviet Union at that time cemented the cordial relationship that continued in subsequent decades. In 1992 a new constitution moved Mongolia from the one-party system and domination by the People's Revolutionary Party and introduced a variety of democratic reforms. Meanwhile, Inner Mongolia has become an autonomous region of the People's Republic of China.

Religious life in Mongolia was radically changed during the reign of Atlan Khan (1543–1583), who believed that the Mongols needed a unifying religion. After considering Chinese religion, he rejected it because of the possibility of Mongolia being absorbed by the Chinese. Instead he chose Tibetan Buddhism. He invited a Tibetan religious leader, Sonam Gyatso (1543–1588), to whom he granted the title of Dalai Lama (Ocean of Wisdom), to lead the religion. Sonam Gyatso is remembered today as the third Dalai

Status of religions in Mongolia, 2000-2050

Followers	2000			2025	2050
	total	%	rate
Ethnoreligionists	830,000	31.2	1.72	1,015,000	1,150,000
Nonreligious	816,000	30.7	1.54	1,116,000	1,128,000
Buddhists	599,000	22.5	2.56	950,000	1,300,000
Atheists	240,000	9.0	0.88	300,000	350,000
Muslims	126,000	4.8	2.90	250,000	360,000
Christians	33,900	1.3	2.50	62,900	89,000
Protestants	21,600	0.8	2.23	40,000	50,000
Independents	10,000	0.4	4.09	20,000	35,000
Orthodox	1,400	0.1	-1.33	1,500	1,700
Chinese folk-religionists	16,000	0.6	6.25	15,000	21,000
Baha'is	50	0.0	2.85	200	400
Total population	2,662,000	100.0	1.85	3,709,000	4,398,000

Lama, as the title was posthumously bestowed on his two predecessors.

Thus Tibetan Buddhism was wedded to the Mongol state. In this process, one of the heirs of the Khalkas, the leading Mongol group in Outer Mongolia, was claimed to be the first reincarnation of the Living Buddha of Urga. His successor, seen as the third most important Tibetan Buddhist leader after the Dalai Lama and the Panchen Lama, remained in power until 1921, when the office was reduced to a puppet status. The political status of the Living Buddha was completely eliminated in 1924.

Tibetan Buddhism had been present among the Mongols from the time of Genghis Khan's grandson, Kublai Khan (1215–1294), who became emperor in 1259. He installed lamas as religious advisors to his court and supported the rise of Tibetan religious leaders into political control of their homeland. The integration of previously existing shamanistic and magical practices into the new Buddhism among the People touching the cloth of a holy man at the Gandan monastery in Ulaan Baatar, Mongolia. (M. Cerny/TRIP)

Mongol peoples also contributed to the creation of Tibetan Buddhism as a separate branch of the Buddhist family.

As in Tibet, leadership in the Mongolian Buddhist and political realm was focused upon a set of lamas, venerated as incarnations of different bodhisattvas (highly evolved souls). When such a lama passed away, his successor, believed to be his reincarnation, was sought among the recently born male children of the region. Once designated, the infant would be taken to the local monastery for training.

At the time of the emergence of a Communist government in the 1920s, there were more than 2,500 temples and monasteries in the land and more than 120,000 Buddhist priests (lamas). Beginning in 1929, however, the new secular government began the suppression of Buddhist worship. During the 1930s more than 20,000 monks were killed and over 800 temples and monasteries destroyed or secularized. Lamas were integrated into the rest of the population. The heavy suppression of Buddhism was only relieved in the 1960s—one symbol of the new policy being the construction of the Gandan Monastery at Ulaanbaatar. It houses a community of some one hundred monks and a new temple for the Living Buddha. The monastery serves as headquarters of the Asian Buddhist Conference for Peace, which holds conferences for foreign Buddhists, published a journal that circulated internationally, and hosted visits by the Dalai Lama in 1979 and 1982.

Buddhism has experienced a remarkable comeback in Outer Mongolia in the generation since World War II and now claims more than 20 percent of the population as adherents. During the 1990s, the new monastic communities formed a Buddhist Association to assist with the Buddhist revival. This revivalist movement owes much to a Ladaki monk, Bakula Rinpoche, who also is the Indian Ambassador to Mongolia. He established a Buddhist school in Ulaanbaatar to train young monks and an associated temple. He is also credited with the idea of forming the Buddhist Association. In mid-1999, the FOUNDATION FOR THE PRESERVATION OF THE MAHAYANA TRADITION also became involved in the effort to revive Mongolian Buddhism.

In the meantime, the pre-Buddhist shamanistic religion has never been displaced as a living tradition among the Mongol people, and today it continues to claim the allegiance of almost one-third of the people. It grew considerably when Buddhist structures were dismantled, though the largest segment of the population think of themselves as atheist or nonreligious.

Christianity was originally introduced among the Mongols in the seventh century but in its original form did not survive. The ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH was introduced in the thirteenth century, and the RUSSIAN ORTHODOX CHURCH (MOSCOW PATRIARCHATE) came during the years of Russian influence. In 1817 the LONDON MISSIONARY SOCIETY, a Congregationalist organization, sent two missionaries who succeeded in translating the Bible into Mongolian, though few converts were ever made. This second wave of Christianity was formally suppressed in 1924, and virtually no Christians could be found in the country until the faith was introduced again in the 1990s.

The largest Christian group, the Mongolian Partnership, was initiated from Hong Kong by several cooperating Evangelical agencies. There is one parish of the RUSSIAN ORTHODOX CHURCH OUTSIDE OF RUSSIA, and the JEHOVAH'S WITNESSES have initiated a work.

The other measurable religion in Mongolia is Islam, mostly of the Sunni HANAFITE SCHOOL OF ISLAM, which is practiced by ethnic Uzbeks, Kazakhs, and Ulghurs who reside in the western part of Mongolia. The BAHÁ'Í FAITH began work in the 1990s following the collapse of the communist government.

Sources:

Heissig, W. The Religions of Mongolia. Translated by G. Samuel. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1980.
 Moses, L. W., and S. A. Halkovic, Jr. Introduction to Mongolian History and Culture. Bloomington: Research Institute for Inner Asian Studies, Indiana University, 1985.

Status of religions in Montserrat, 2000-2050

Followers	2000			2025	2050
	total	%	rate
Christians	10,200	96.1	-0.32	10,000	10,100
Protestants	5,500	51.8	0.00	5,500	5,500
Anglicans	3,100	29.2	-0.92	2,400	2,000
Roman Catholics	1,400	13.2	0.00	1,400	1,600
Nonreligious	240	2.2	2.51	410	740
Baha'is	160	1.5	0.39	220	350
Spiritists	20	0.2	0.65	40	60
Hindus	10	0.1	0.96	30	50
Total population	10,600	100.0	-0.30	10,700	11,300

Columbus in 1493. It was colonized in the eighteenth century by Irish people, driven from Saint Kitts, who began to plant sugarcane and cotton. They also imported slaves to work their plantations. The slaves were liberated in the middle of the nineteenth century, by which time they made up 90 percent of the population, the Carib's having all but disappeared.

Montserrat is still a colony of the United Kingdom, having previously been included with other colonies in the West Indian Federation. When the federation was dissolved in 1962, Montserrat's government was given semiautonomous status, though the governor is still appointed from London.

With the passing of the Caribs, Christianity became the dominant religion of Montserrat, with Anglicanism its first and foremost representative. Anglicanism claims approximately one-third of the twelve thousand residents of the island. The Methodists entered in 1820 and have about 20 percent of the islanders as members. The Anglican Diocese is attached to the CHURCH IN THE PROVINCE OF THE

Montserrat

Montserrat is an island of the Lesser Antilles on the north-eastern edge of the Caribbean Sea. The island was originally inhabited by the Carib people and was first sighted by WEST INDIES, and the Methodists are part of the METHODIST CHURCH IN THE CARIBBEAN AND THE AMERICAS, both headquartered on Antigua. In like measure, the ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH on Montserrat is an extension of the Diocese of Saint John's, also on Antigua.

Canadian Pentecostals came to Montserrat in 1910 and have built a thriving work, still related to the PENTECOSTAL ASSEMBLIES OF CANADA. Subsequently, missionaries from the SEVENTH-DAY ADVENTIST CHURCH, Pilgrim Holiness Church (since 1968 part of the WESLEYAN CHURCH), and the CHURCH OF GOD OF PROPHECY have also started churches. The JEHOVAH'S WITNESSES and the BAHAI FAITH have a limited presence on the island.

Sources:

- Demets, B. A. The Catholic Church in Montserrat, West Indies, 1756–1980. Plymouth, Montserrat: Montserrat Printery, 1980.
- Dobbin, J. D. "Religion and Cultural Identity: The Montserratian Case." Caribbean Issues 4, 1 (1980): 71–83.
- Lawrence, G. E. Montserrat and Its Methodism. Bristol, England: G. E. Lawrence, 1967.

Moravian Church, Eastern West Indies Province

Interest in the plight of Africans in the West Indies launched the entire Moravian missionary enterprise. In 1731 in Copenhagen, Moravian leader August Gottlieb Spangenburg (1704–1792) encountered an African man named Anthony, who told him of the deplorable conditions faced by Africans in the West Indies. Spangenburg's decision to respond to these conditions led Leonhard Dober (1706–1760) to offer his services as a missionary to the Dutch West Indies, thus becoming the first Protestant missionary of the modern era. Dober began his work on Saint Thomas. It was soon extended to Saint Croix (the site of a bloody slave revolt in 1833) and Saint John, the Virgin Islands then being in Danish hands. In 1734 a team of eighteen missionaries arrived on Saint Thomas, and Dober turned the work over to them and returned to Germany with his first convert, an orphan boy named Carmel Oly whose freedom Dober had purchased.

The work grew in spite of opposition from most of the plantation owners and the high toll of lives among the Moravians unable to cope with the climate. When Count Nikolaus Ludwig von Zinzendorf (1700–1760), the Moravian bishop, visited the islands in 1739, he found the missionaries in prison as a result of a conflict with the local Dutch Reformed Church minister. On a more positive note, he also found some eight hundred African converts.

In 1772 the islands were hit by a major hurricane that destroyed much property; indeed, bad weather would periodically produce temporary setbacks throughout the history of the mission. However, as the work was established in the Danish East Indies, it built up enough momentum to carry the mission to the neighboring islands of Barbados (1765), Antigua (1771), Saint Kitts (1777), and Tobago (1790). The effort on Tobago, then a French possession, was halted almost as soon as it began by the unrest at news of the French Revolution. The revolution also stimulated efforts that grew in England for the abolition of slavery. With the abolition of slavery on Haiti in 1793, hope for freedom spread throughout the Caribbean. Through the nineteenth century, one by one, the islands would become free states.

In 1830 the centennial of the mission was marked when the Danish king recognized the Moravians and granted them equal status with the state church (Lutheran). The next step in the mission's growth would be its maturation into an autonomous church, a process that began in 1879 when the West Indies work was organized as a province, accepted the challenge to become self-supporting, and established a semiautonomous governing board. The Europeans continued to provide some financial support, but they set a schedule to gradually decrease it. In 1886 the theological seminary was established at Nisky on Saint Thomas.

In 1899 the Moravians moved to restructure their international fellowship as a federation. This restructuring brought a new level of independence to the island church. In 1922 the Moravian British Province assumed responsibility for the work in the West Indies. In 1931 the International Missions Board was abolished. Finally, in 1967, the work in the Eastern West Indies was set apart as a fully autonomous province.

The Moravian Church, Eastern West Indies Province is at one with the beliefs and practices of Moravians worldwide. It now includes work in the U.S. Virgin Islands, Saint Kitts, Barbados, Antigua, and Trinidad and Tobago. It is a member of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES.

Address:

Moravian Church, Eastern West Indies Province
P.O. Box 504
Cashew Hill
Antigua
<http://www.candw.ag/~moravians/welcome.htm>

Sources:

- Hamilton, J. Taylor, and Kenneth G. Hamilton. History of the Moravian Church: The Renewed Unitas Fratrum, 1722–1957. Bethlehem, PA and Winston-Salem, NC: Interprovincial Board of Christian Education, Moravian Church in America, 1967.
- Maynard, G. O. A History of the Moravian Church: Eastern West Indies Province. Port of Spain, Trinidad: Yuille's Printerie, 1968.

Moravian Church, European Continental Province of the

The Moravian Church continues the attempts at reformation of the ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH that were made by Jan Hus (c. 1373–1415). Because of his oratorical skills as the preacher at the Bethlehem Chapel in Prague, Hus gained a popular following. His calls for reform came just as the papacy was divided between two claimants to Peter’s chair, and Prague was divided between its German-speaking and Bohemian-speaking populations.

After his excommunication in 1410, Hus became a popular hero among the populace. He attacked corruption in the church and its granting of indulgences as a means of raising money, and he upheld the authority of the Bible as a standard by which the church and its leadership could be judged. In 1414 Hus was invited to present his views at the Council of Constance, called by the Roman Catholic Church to deal with issues of reform. Though he was granted safe passage, when he arrived the protection was withdrawn, and he was condemned and executed.

Hus was condemned in part for his belief that the Eucharist, the sacrament recalling the sacrificial death of Jesus, should be served to the people in both kinds, that is, bread and wine, rather than just as bread, the common practice at the time. After Hus’s death, the serving of the Eucharist in both kinds became characteristic of his followers, known as Hussites, and the Roman Catholics were unable to suppress the revolt immediately. A temporary compromise was worked out in 1436. Amid the spectrum of opinion in Bohemia and neighboring Moravia arose a new mediating group, the Unitas Fratrum.

During the sixteenth century, the Reformed Church (with teachings based on John Calvin’s [1509–1564] theology) emerged in Bohemia and Moravia and held sway until the beginning of the seventeenth century. Then after the Thirty Years’ War, Protestant leaders in Prague encountered Catholic leadership in the Holy Roman Empire bent on Counter-Reformation. In 1620 a Catholic army defeated the Bohemian forces and began to impose Catholicism anew throughout the land. In 1652 the expulsion of all Protestants from Catholic-controlled lands was implemented. Many members of the Unitas Fratrum went underground, and others fled their land. They settled first in Poland, and then, after 1722, they found refuge on the Prussian estate of Count Nikolaus Ludwig von Zinzendorf (1700–1760), where they founded the village of Herrnhut. Here they developed an order to rule both their spiritual and secular lives. The acceptance of this new order in 1727 by the Czech brethren marks the beginning of the reorganized Moravian Church.

Within the church, new ministerial leadership soon developed. Zinzendorf wanted the church to remain as an ordered community within the Lutheran Church, while many of the community’s leaders looked for the development of a revived separate Moravian church. In 1835 the ancient episcopal lineage was passed to the community by Daniel Ernst Jablonski (1660–1741), a German Calvinist who had been consecrated by the Polish Moravians. Zinzendorf was consecrated in 1837. In 1845 the Moravian Church was more formally organized as a new episcopal body. It was recognized by the CHURCH OF ENGLAND and the British Parliament in 1749.

The Moravian Church would develop two important emphases. First, the church developed in Germany just as a scholastic approach to Protestantism was becoming dominant, and in reaction the Moravians absorbed the lively spirituality of the Pietist movement, which had spread through Germany in the seventeenth century from the University of Halle. Thus, Moravians would become known for their heart-felt religion, which would have a significant effect upon a youthful John Wesley (1703–1791), the founder of Methodism.

Second, beginning with Zinzendorf’s encounter with natives of the Danish West Indies and Greenland in 1731, the movement became enthusiastic proponents of a missionary enterprise. The Moravians sent the first missionaries to the West Indies in 1732 and to Greenland the next year. Through the rest of the century, the work would spread to England and the American colonies. Within the first generation, missions would follow to Labrador, South America, and Egypt. Stemming from this effort, the Methodists and then the Baptists would begin their own mission programs, and from this new venture would come the world-changing missionary enterprise of the nineteenth century, which would carry Protestantism around the globe.

During the mid-1700s, Zinzendorf assumed both temporal and spiritual powers as the leader of the Moravian Church. After his passing in 1760, the church organized its General Synod as the highest legislative body and appointed an executive board to administer the affairs of the synod. The executive board would in time evolve into the Unity Elders’ Conference. Doctrinally, the church saw itself in general agreement with the Augsburg Confession (Lutheran), though there was no attempt to enforce assent to every sentence of this lengthy statement. A brief statement of essential beliefs was accepted in 1775. In practice, the church made or confirmed many of its practical decisions, especially concerning the deployment of personnel, by the casting of lots.

Through the early decades of the nineteenth century, the Moravian Church continued to expand globally. Partly because of the slowness of response from Europe, the church faced an increasing number of requests for grants of self-government from mission centers abroad. In 1857 the church established four provincial synods—one in Continental Europe, one in England, and two in the United States, one in the north and one in the south. These provinces were given limited autonomy.

In 1879 the mission in Jamaica organized a governing board with a proto-provincial organization, indicating that in the future, missions would grow to become discrete provinces. The twentieth-century problems of continuing financial support for the ever-growing world membership, the transformation of Europe in the wake of two world wars, and the changing perspective on missions within ecumenical Christianity led the Moravians in 1957 to extend the process of dividing the church's membership geographically into autonomous provinces. Meanwhile, in Europe, the work was divided into two independent provinces, setting off the work in what was then the German Democratic Republic of Germany, including the headquarters church at Halle. The European work was again combined after the reunification of Germany in 1990.

The Continental Province continues to have responsibility for Moravian life in Europe apart from the British Isles. The Moravian Church in the United States maintains an Internet site with links to Moravians around the world. The church has been active ecumenically and is a member of the European Council of Churches and the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES.

Address:

European Continental Province of the Moravian Church
Zusterplein 20
3703 CB Zeist
The Netherlands
<http://www.moravian.org/> (Moravian Church in America Web site)

Source:

Hamilton, J. Taylor, and Kenneth G. Hamilton. History of the Moravian Church: The Renewed Unitas Fratrum, 1722–1957. Bethlehem, PA and Winston-Salem, NC: Interprovincial Board of Christian Education, Moravian Church in America, 1967.

Moravian Church in America

The Moravian movement, first established in Europe as a descendant of the reformism of Jan Hus (c. 1373–1415), was brought to North America in 1735, when a group under the leadership of Bishop August Gottlieb Spangenberg (1704–1792) moved to the new colony of Georgia. Because of the group's pacifism and refusal to serve in the militia, they left Georgia for Pennsylvania, where they initially settled on land owned by Methodist evangelist George Whitefield (1717–1770). They purchased five hundred acres for the original settlement of what became Bethlehem, Pennsylvania, in 1741, and shortly thereafter obtained another five thousand acres for the settlement they called Nazareth. Later, other settlements were created in neighboring New Jersey and Maryland, all positioned to carry out the primary goal of the movement from Germany, the evangelization of the Native Americans.

Spangenberg then led a group to North Carolina, where a large tract of land became the sight of three settlements—Bethabara, Bethania, and, most importantly, Salem (now known as Winston-Salem). Over the next century, Bethlehem, Pennsylvania, and Winston-Salem, North Carolina, emerged as the centers for the spread of the movement throughout North America and the headquarters of what would later become the two provinces (Northern and Southern) of the American Church. The Moravian Church in America became autonomous following the international Unity Synod of Moravian leaders in 1848. The church found its best response in communities of German immigrants, especially in the Midwest. Then at the end of the nineteenth century, the movement spread into Canada.

During its earlier years, the church adopted a communal organization that had been proposed by Spangenberg. The pooling of economic resources, which lasted for about two decades, allowed the church and its members to prosper quickly and led to a close communal life that persisted for several generations after the communal living experiment ended.

The Moravians retain the essentials of Protestant Christianity, but they have adopted a motto to govern their approach to theology: “In essentials unity; in nonessentials liberty; in all things love.” They accept the Bible as the source of Christian doctrine. Central to the Moravian life is what is termed “heart religion,” a personal relationship with Jesus being more important than doctrinal purity. They continue to hold simple communal meals called love feasts and developed an early emphasis on music.

The Moravian Church in America has two headquarters: one for the Northern Province and one for the Southern Province. The Northern Province is divided into an Eastern District, Western District, and Canadian District. Of the church's fifty thousand members, approximately half live in the states of Pennsylvania and North Carolina. The church regularly participates in the meeting of the Unity (the international Moravian movement), which is held every seven years. The Moravian Church supports the Moravian College and Theological Seminary in Bethlehem, Pennsylvania. It is a member of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES.

Addresses:

Moravian Church in America, Northern Province
1021 Center St.
Box 1245
Bethlehem, PA 18016–1245

Moravian Church in America, Southern Province
459 S. Church St.
Winston-Salem, NC 27108
<http://www.moravian.org/>

Sources:

Allen, Walter H. Who Are the Moravians? Bethlehem, PA: Walter H. Allen, 1966.
Hamilton, J. Taylor, and Kenneth G. Hamilton. History of the Moravian Church: The Renewed Unitas Fratrum, 1722–1957. Bethlehem, PA and Winston-Salem, NC: Interprovincial Board of Christian Education, Moravian Church in America, 1967.

Weinlick, John R. The Moravian Church through the Ages.
Moravian Church in America, 1988.

Moravian Church in Great Britain and Ireland

Moravian work in Great Britain formally began with the establishment of a religious society in London in 1742, from which it quickly expanded. Groups in Wiltshire, Yorkshire, and the Midlands had formed out of the preaching activity of several independent preachers affiliated with the Moravian movement: John Cennick, Benjamin Ingham, and Charles Delamorte. The first Moravian school was opened in 1742 in Essex. In 1746 Cennick visited Ireland and raised a congregation of some five hundred members in Dublin. A number of congregations emerged among the Protestants in the north.

In 1749 Count Nikolaus Ludwig von Zinzendorf (1700–1760), the Moravian leader, arrived in England to negotiate a statement from the government recognizing the church and granting its ministers and members exemption from military service on the grounds of conscientious objection. He presented documents to a parliamentary commission to the effect that the Moravian Church continued the ancient church of Bohemia and Moravia and was aligned doctrinally with the German Lutherans. Based upon a favorable report by the commission, Parliament passed legislation, signed by the king, recognizing the Moravian Church as an “Ancient Episcopal Church.” The church was thus accorded the status of a sister church of the Church of England and Zinzendorf was acknowledged as a bishop.

The British Moravians, now under the superintendency of Peter Böhler (1712–1774), experienced a period of rapid growth that in some ways paralleled that of the Methodists. A British synod of what would become the Province of Great Britain convened for the first time in 1752. The church expanded into Scotland in 1765 after members from Ireland moved there.

The British Moravians became intricately involved in the support of the church’s worldwide mission program. When financial problems hit the church on the European continent in 1817, the British organized the London Association in Aid of the Missions of the United Brethren, which reached out to the missionary-minded friends of the Moravians. The association was to prove invaluable in the extension of Moravian missions in the nineteenth and twentieth centuries.

In 1818 the Unity Elders’ Conference, then the central authority in the international church, moved to establish a provincial conference to administer the affairs of the British work. The first session, which met in 1824, was called upon to face both a decline in membership and a general pessimism that had swept through the congregations. Through the next decades, growth would be slight. In 1847, in light of its stagnation, the British provincial synod proposed that it be allowed to dissent from the Augsburg Confession and that its use of the drawing of lots, a time-honored practice among the Moravians, be discontinued for some decisions. A decade later the synod prepared to implement the change wrought by a new constitution. Over the next century, the church would drop many of its peculiar features, inherited from Germany, and adopt an organizational life more like that of other British churches.

Through the twentieth century, the British Moravians have built a strong ecumenical base. In 1919 they joined the Federation of Evangelical Free Churches of England, and in 1950, the British Council of Churches (now the Churches Together in Britain and Ireland). The church is a full member of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES.

Address:

Moravian Church in Great Britain and Ireland
5 Muswell Hill
London N10 3TJ
United Kingdom
<http://www.moravian.org.uk/>

Source:

Hamilton, J. Taylor, and Kenneth G. Hamilton. History of the Moravian Church: The Renewed Unitas Fratrum, 1722–1957. Bethlehem, PA and Winston-Salem, NC: Interprovincial Board of Christian Education, Moravian Church in America, 1967.

Moravian Church in Jamaica

The impetus for Moravian work in the West Indies came in the eighteenth century directly out of the church’s international center in Germany. The West Indian effort had spread through the easternmost islands but had not opened a station on Jamaica. Then in 1754, two plantation owners, John Foster Barham and William Foster, who resided in England and also happened to be Moravians, asked for missionaries to minister to the Africans residing on their lands in Jamaica. Zacharias George Caries and two companions pioneered the work, and with the initial support of Foster and Barham, they soon gained the support of other plantation owners.

The work got off to a slow start; there were frequent changes of personnel, disease took its toll, and on occasion the converts returned to the religions they had brought from Africa. Then in 1834, slavery was ended in all British colonies. The church had taken special efforts to prepare its members for the new era. Some twenty-six schools had been opened. Membership shot upward in the years immediately after emancipation. In 1847 a conference structure replaced the rule of the mission’s superintendent.

Representatives from Jamaica attended the 1863 conference on Saint Thomas (Virgin Islands), where the process of transformation in the Caribbean toward more indigenous leadership and eventual self-support was discussed.

The Jamaicans agreed to move toward self-support if the European church would continue to supply financial support for building and the travel of missionaries. As a first step, in 1876 a seminary was opened at Fairfield. In 1879 the work was reorganized as a separate province with semiautonomous status. The first bishop, Peter Larsen, was consecrated in 1901.

Most of the congregations were located in the western and especially the southwestern part of the island. The church developed under the most trying of conditions, including epidemics, hurricanes, and a devastating earthquake in Kingston in 1907. The bad times drew together the various denominations represented on the island, and in the 1920s union negotiations began between the Moravians and the Methodists, Presbyterians, Disciples of Christ, and Congregationalists. Though they did not bring union, these discussions did bring closer relations and a new commonly supported seminary.

Soon the work had grown enough to enable Jamaican Moravians to give more systematic attention to their responsibility for the church's world mission. In 1925 the Moravian Missionary Society held its initial gathering and focused concern for the missions in West Africa and Egypt.

The independent province of the Moravian Church in Jamaica was set apart in 1967. It is at one with the beliefs and practices of Moravians worldwide. It is a member of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES.

Address:

Moravian Church in Jamaica
3 Hector St.
P.O. Box 8369
Kingston C. S. O.
Jamaica
<http://www.jol.com.jm/moravian/>

Source:

Hamilton, J. Taylor, and Kenneth G. Hamilton. History of the Moravian Church: The Renewed Unitas Fratrum, 1722–1957. Bethlehem, PA and Winston-Salem, NC: Interprovincial Board of Christian Education, Moravian Church in America, 1967.

Moravian Church in Nicaragua

In 1947 the Moravians sent missionaries to the Caribbean coast of what is today Nicaragua. They landed at Bluefields, then the capital of a kingdom of native people, the Miskitos, which included other groups as well. The Anglicans had previously established a small work in the region, but the Moravian missionaries were appalled by the polytheism and polygamy they saw practiced there. They were welcomed by the Miskito king, who assigned them some land on which to begin their mission.

The work was substantially supplemented in 1856 with the arrival of African converts from Jamaica. Two years later they were given the first of several boats, which improved their movement up and down the coast. The mission progressed through the rest of the century in spite of several destructive hurricanes, diseases, political changes, and the opposition of many traders who made their livings off of the native population. In the 1880s the missionaries progressed in their mastery of the Miskito language, culminating in a translation of the four Christian Gospels and the Book of Acts in 1889. A grammar and dictionary soon followed.

The mission had a major setback in 1900, when the Nicaraguan government mandated that all instruction in grammar schools would be in Spanish and given only by teachers who had passed the government exams. The missionaries, being unprepared to comply, closed the numerous schools they had founded, and the schools did not reopen until 1910. This difficulty was offset somewhat in 1902 by the consecration of the first bishop for the evolving church, August Hermann Berkenhagen.

The Moravian Church in America assumed responsibility for the church during World War I. Through the twentieth century, the church moved to develop indigenous leadership. The first Nicaraguan bishop was consecrated in 1949, and the church became autonomous in 1974.

At the end of the twentieth century, the church reported thirty-two thousand members. It supports a hospital at Bilwaskarma, an extensive school system (including a seminary and university in Puerto Cabezas), and through the Institute for Social Development of the Moravian Church in Nicaragua, it supports a range of economic and developmental projects in remote villages. It is a member of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES.

Address:

Moravian Church in Nicaragua
Apartado 3696
Managua
Nicaragua
<http://www.moravianmission.org/nicaragua.htm>

Sources:

Hamilton, J. Taylor, and Kenneth G. Hamilton. History of the Moravian Church: The Renewed Unitas Fratrum, 1722–1957. Bethlehem, PA and Winston-Salem, NC: Interprovincial Board of Christian Education, Moravian Church in America, 1967.
Van der Bent, Ans J., ed. Handbook/Member Churches/World Council of Churches. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 1985.

Moravian Church in Southern Africa

As early as 1736, Moravian attention focused upon the Hottentot people of South Africa. These people, small of stature in comparison with both other African peoples and European settlers, were treated by many as less than human. Georg Schmidt (1709–1785), a former butcher turned evangelist, spent a year studying Dutch, and then traveled to Cape Town in 1737 to establish a rural mission at Genadendal. After a promising beginning, however, he was forced to return to Europe because of the Moravian clash with Reformed authorities in Holland.

Moravians did not return to South Africa until 1792, when they took up where Schmidt had left, even finding several people who had been converted by him. However, the quick improvement in the life of the Hottentots caused jealousy to arise among the European settlers. The hostile climate was not helped by the British occupation of Cape Town in 1795, but the British protected the colony that developed and gradually the settlers were won over as they benefited by the changes introduced into the Hottentot life. In 1800 a church that could accommodate fifteen hundred people was constructed. The missionaries worked constantly to counter the negative images of the Hottentots held by the Europeans.

By 1816 the work was well established and the Moravians made plans to start a fresh venture among the Bantu-speaking people along the White River some four hundred miles from Cape Town. The mission, called Enon, survived even though it was largely destroyed by armed raiders soon after opening. Work also expanded to the Tambookie people in Kaffraria. Subsequent stations, called Elim and Shiloh, were also opened in the 1820s and provided attention to the Fetkannas.

Gradually the original station at Genadendal grew into a small town with a gristmill and shops that included a variety of artisans. In 1838 a normal school (for the training of teachers) was opened, and other Protestant groups began to send their people for training. A printing press began to publish a periodical and produced a Harmony of the Gospels in the Bantu language. The work grew steadily over the next decades, the government often inviting the Moravians to open stations in specific locations. The missionaries also sent people to the leper colony set up on Robben Island in 1845.

In 1865 the now extensive work in South Africa was divided into two provinces. The attempt to build indigenous leadership finally culminated in the first ordinations of native South Africans in 1883. After 1900, the pressure to develop local leadership would be significantly increased by the church's international leadership, but it was continually thwarted by wars and the developing racial policies of the colonial government. It would not be until 1951 that a stable institution for ministerial training would be opened.

In 1910 the four distinct colonies located on the southern tip of Africa were united into the Union of South Africa. Although this move softened ties between the Dutch settlers (the Boers) and the British authorities, it created some deep racial divisions between native Africans and the European settlers. Despite this, the Moravians extended their work among the different African peoples and placed particular importance on the establishment of schools wherever possible. The school system would be nationalized in 1955.

In 1899 Ernst van Calker, the superintendent of the South Africa East Province, was consecrated as the church's first bishop, and in 1909 a new church constitution was adopted. It was not until 1921 that a constitution and church order was effected for the western province. After World War II, efforts to draw the two provinces together were launched, and in 1951 both provinces participated in the formation of a seminary. In 1956 representatives of both provinces met at Port Elizabeth and merged the two provincial boards into one South Africa Board, to be consulted on matters of mutual interest and concern. The united province became fully independent in 1967.

The Moravian Church in Southern Africa has a long history of Christian ecumenical endeavor, its two provinces having participated in the first General Mission Conference in South Africa in 1904. It joined the National Council of Churches in South Africa and is a member of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES.

Address:

Moravian Church in Southern Africa
P.O. Box 1217
4730 Matatiele
South Africa

Source:

Hamilton, J. Taylor, and Kenneth G. Hamilton. History of the Moravian Church: The Renewed Unitas Fratrum, 1722–1957. Bethlehem, PA and Winston-Salem, NC: Interprovincial Board of Christian Education, Moravian Church in America, 1967.

Moravian Church in Suriname

Moravians received an invitation to begin work in the Dutch territory of Suriname in 1836, and two years later missionaries arrived and settled on a plantation on the Berbice River. Their primary work was among the Africans on the plantation and nearby. Work expanded in 1848 with the arrival of Theophilus Salomon Schumann, a linguist who had mastered the language of the native people, the Arawak. He soon translated the Bible into their language. The mission ran into trouble, however, when the local traders told the Arawak that the Moravians planned to sell them into slavery and told the authorities that the Moravians were inciting the Arawak to rebellion. Once the problem was solved, Schumann moved into the interior and began his life's work among the Arawak people. He died an untimely death in 1760, after which the mission to the Arawak died away and the church in the capital, Paramaribo, took center stage.

The work among the Africans was continually thwarted by whites who saw it as subversive of the slave system. By the beginning of the 1800s, the original mission still counted only a few hundred people as members. Work in the interior was slow because of the inability of the missionaries to adjust to the climate. By the 1820s, work was limited to the capital and a few nearby estates.

However, a growth period followed the smallpox epidemic of 1820 and the fire that destroyed Paramaribo in 1821. Afterward, the plantations opened their doors to the missionaries. The Dutch Society for the Promotion of Christian Knowledge among the Negroes of Suriname gave them boats to facilitate their travel to the growing number of plantations. The work was also assisted by the translation of a portion of the New Testament into the new language, Sranana Tongo, which the Africans had developed. By mid-century, the work claimed some five thousand adherents. Overcoming significant opposition, missionaries began schools for the Africans to train a set of teachers, who had greater access to their fellow slaves. In 1856 the mission took on a new responsibility at the request of the government—fulfilling the spiritual needs of those suffering from Hansen's disease (leprosy) at the hospital at Batavia.

In 1857 the mission gained a convert named John King, of the Matuari people, who had arrived at the mission door one day, prompted by a dream. King studied with the missionaries over the next four years and was ordained in 1861. He then spent the next thirty-five years taking Christianity to the residents of the interior. His efforts led to the conversion of the chief of his people and the development of a strong Moravian presence in the interior.

As in other lands, Moravian membership on Suriname rose in the years immediately after the emancipation of the slave population, about 60 percent of which identified with the church. Some twenty-five thousand former slaves became Moravian in the decade during the transition to complete freedom (1863–1873). The mission also moved to evangelize the Chinese and Asian Indians who came into the country to replace the former slaves who left the plantations.

The changes adopted by the Moravian Church as a whole in 1899, to restructure their international fellowship as a federation, led the mission in Suriname to move toward autonomy. A new constitution was approved, and businesses that had been developed to support the work of the mission were formally separated from it. Shortly thereafter, the work was divided into the Old or Creole Mission and the New Mission. The former moved toward self-support, and in 1911 a church conference under the leadership of a resident bishop, Richard Voullaire, assumed authority. The development of indigenous leadership was assisted by the opening of a school to train teachers and ministers in 1902. Full autonomy came in steps through the next decades, held back by the general poverty of the land and political events, not the least of which was the German invasion of the Netherlands during World War II. The Old Mission became an autonomous Moravian province in 1963.

Although the Creole Mission also moved toward autonomy, it worked among the peoples residing in the interior, primarily Africans who had escaped plantation life during the days of slavery and reestablished an African-like existence, complete with their traditional African faith. Some groups resisted any relationship to the church, but they finally developed more positive relationships as they saw the mission as a source for education and medical assistance. The mission also developed a following among immigrants from East India, China, and Java, the latter forming some 17 percent of the Surinamese population at the beginning of the twentieth century.

In a joint venture with other Protestant groups, the Moravian Church in Suriname sponsors Bethesda, a hospital specializing in the treatment of Hansen's disease. The church is a member of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES.

Address:

Moravian Church in Suriname
P.O. Box 219/1811
Paramaribo
Suriname

Source:

Hamilton, J. Taylor, and Kenneth G. Hamilton. History of the Moravian Church: The Renewed Unitas Fratrum, 1722–1957. Bethlehem, PA and Winston-Salem, NC: Interprovincial Board of Christian Education, Moravian Church in America, 1967.

Moravian Church in Tanzania

In 1885 Germany was given hegemony over territory in east central Africa. The Moravian Church saw this action as an occasion for extending its missionary activity, and in 1891 it commissioned a team of missionaries to the new colony. They built their first station in Rungwe, in what was then called Tanganyika (now part of Tanzania), among the Konde people, a branch of the Bantu. Several additional stations were established in the southern highlands, but it was not until 1897 that the missionaries received their first convert. The missionaries developed the stations as self-supporting villages, utilizing the many skills that they brought with them from their homeland, such as farming and raising donkeys. In 1900 a clear separation was made between the mission and the economic enterprises that supported it. Simultaneously, the church inherited an older missionary station in western Tanganyika (south of Lake Victoria) from the (Anglican) CHURCH MISSIONARY SOCIETY. This work expanded rapidly, as the missionaries took advantage of government policy limiting each area to a single missionary group. The first converts were received in 1903.

In 1912 the missionaries in the south expanded their services to include a medical facility, and they also supported the centers set up to assist those suffering from Hansen's disease. Some worked with workers from other missions on translating the Bible and other literature into more of the many languages spoken in the colony. By 1913 the Moravian missionaries could report that from their nine main missionary stations, they had developed over one thousand preaching points and had a membership of 1,955. Meanwhile some eight thousand children attended the schools they had established. Work in the west proceeded more slowly. Though the number of stations expanded, a number of schools were opened, and a headquarters was established at Tabora, the number of converts was small.

In 1916 the British invaded East Africa. They interned all of the missionaries in the southern highlands, and the work of the mission was turned over to the Free Church of Scotland (now a constituent part of the CHURCH OF SCOTLAND). The church had few personnel and quickly expanded the role of the African teachers. Meanwhile, Belgium invaded the western territory being worked by the missionaries. Most were interned and sent back to Europe.

In 1923 the British allowed the first Moravians to return to Tanganyika, and in 1926 formal control of the mission was passed back into Moravian hands. Dutch Moravians assumed leadership in the west, and British Moravians in the south. As personnel and financial support arrived, stations were reopened and refurbished. The church focused attention on the school program, which was greatly expanded. In 1943 a teacher-training school was opened in cooperation with the Church Missionary Society.

During the 1930s, the mission emphasized the development of a self-supporting indigenous church. One step in that direction was the ordination of the first African ministers in 1935. This action proved fortuitous, as all the missionaries were again interned in 1939. A Danish couple sent from Great Britain was able to fill some of the need created by the internments, and they were joined by two more colleagues from South Africa the following year. They were able to work in conjunction with thirteen African ministers. After the war further steps toward the maturity of the mission were taken, as it accepted responsibility for paying the salaries of all the ministerial staff.

Work expanded in the decades after World War II. As the African leadership evolved, three synods were organized, one in the west and two in the south. These were then linked by a Joint Board, designed to oversee and coordinate all the Moravian work in the newly independent nation of Tanzania. Each synod elected a provincial board, and the three boards came together to form the Joint Board.

The Joint Board of the Moravian Church in Tanzania now oversees the largest Moravian church in the world, with some 120,000 members. It is a member of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES.

Address:

Moravian Church in Tanzania
P.O. Box 747
Mbeya
Tanzania

Source:

Hamilton, J. Taylor, and Kenneth G. Hamilton. History of the Moravian Church: The Renewed Unitas Fratrum, 1722–1957. Bethlehem, PA and Winston-Salem, NC: Interprovincial Board of Christian Education, Moravian Church in America, 1967.

Mormons

See Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-Day Saints; Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-Day Saints

Morocco

The Kingdom of Morocco is located on the northeast corner of Africa, immediately south of Spain and the Island of Gibraltar. The land was originally home to various Berber people. They were incorporated into the Roman Empire and later, after Rome fell, the land was overtaken by the Arab Muslims who swept into the area in the eighth century on their way to Spain. In the eleventh century, an Islamic movement among Berbers who had established themselves in present-day Senegal established control of all of the land between Senegal and Gibraltar. Their Almoravid Empire lasted for a century (1062–1147), only to be replaced by the Almohad Empire (1147–1258). The Almoravids took control of southern Spain and helped create the rich culture generally associated with Granada and Córdoba. Modern Morocco was largely shaped by Spain's conquest of the Iberian Peninsula in the fifteenth century and the annexation of Algeria by the Ottoman Empire a century later.

Morocco remained an independent state into the twentieth century, but in the decades prior to World War I it became a tantalizing target for colonization by various European nations. In 1912 Morocco became a French protectorate, while Spain retained Sahara, to the south of

Followers	2000			2025	2050
	total	%	rate
Muslims	27,736,000	98.3	1.72	37,733,000	44,079,000
Nonreligious	274,000	1.0	1.77	500,000	800,000
Christians	175,000	0.6	1.84	248,000	329,000
Independents	147,000	0.5	2.49	220,000	300,000
Roman Catholics	22,100	0.1	-1.14	20,000	20,000
Protestants	4,100	0.0	-0.48	5,000	6,000
Baha'is	28,700	0.1	1.98	50,000	80,000
Jews	16,800	0.1	0.48	12,000	10,000
Atheists	3,000	0.0	1.32	5,000	8,000
Total population	28,221,000	100.0	1.72	38,530,000	45,284,000

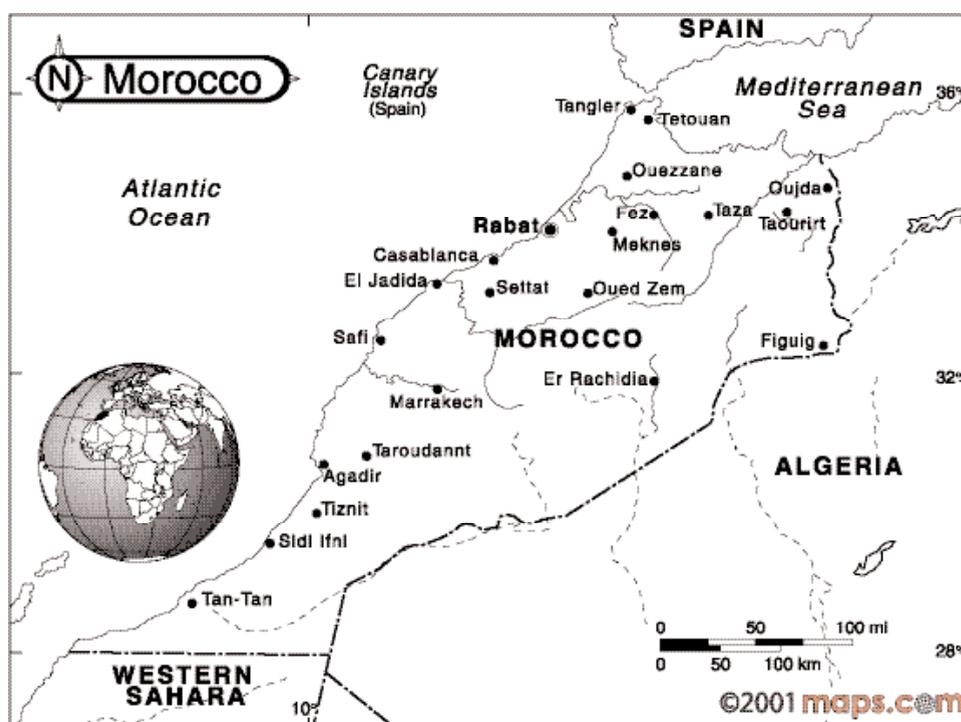

Morocco, and a small bit of land immediately south of Gibraltar. Tangier was declared an international city. French rule was never accepted, however, and nationalist opposition grew over the next four decades until the French finally recognized Moroccan independence in 1956. In stages the country gained control of Tangier and the remaining Spanish territory to the north.

Muhammad V (1909–1961) ascended the throne of independent Morocco in 1957. He was succeeded in 1961 by Hassan II, who ruled until his death in 1999. Hassan's rule was marked by his attempt to claim the Sahara, the former Spanish territory to the south. He invaded Sahara and, along with Mauritania, occupied the region. In 1976 Spain renounced its claim in favor of Morocco and Mauritania, but the Saharans proclaimed their own independence. The border between the two countries remains a disputed boundary. After King Hassan's death on July 23, 1999, his son, Muhammad VI, ascended the throne.

Islam became the dominant religion in Morocco late in the first millennium C.E., and today most Moroccans are Sunni Muslims of the MALIKITE SCHOOL OF ISLAM. Sufi Brotherhoods are also present in significant numbers, especially the QADIRIYYA and the Kattaniyya.

The king, known as the "Commander of the Faithful," is seen as the center of the Muslim community. Among his assigned duties is ensuring that Islam is properly respected. The Muslim community is given focus in the Université Ben Youssef at Marrakech and the Université al-Qarawiyyin, with campuses at Rabat, Fez, and Marrakech, both dedicated to Arabic and Islamic studies. The latter institution dates to the ninth century.

The Jewish community in Morocco predates the introduction of Islam, and over the centuries it has enjoyed a largely tolerant setting in which to develop, though there have been times of persecution. The community grew noticeably at the end of the fifteenth century, following the expulsion of Jews from Spain and Portugal. During the transition to independence, the great majority of Jews migrated to Israel, Canada, France, and Spain. The community shrank from 250,000 to 30,000 members. It continued to decline through the last quarter of the twentieth century and at the beginning of the new millennium numbered only 13,000. The Jewish community is centered at Casablanca, though there are smaller groups in Tangier, Fez, and other cities.

Christians came to Morocco during the days of the Roman Empire. Christian churches thrived in the northern part of the territory (Tangier, Rabat, and Fez). Through the centuries these churches were rent by both the Donatist and the Arian controversies and were finally overwhelmed by Islam. An attempt to reintroduce Christianity was made by priests of the Franciscan order in 1220, who actually built a following that justified the formation of a diocese at Marrakech in 1234. The diocese was suppressed in 1566, and the ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH barely survived. By the beginning of the nineteenth century there was only one priest in the whole country.

As the French began to operate in the country, a new attempt to grow the church was initiated, and in 1859 a prefecture was created. There was steady growth through the twentieth century. The Vicariate of Rabat, created in 1923, became an archdiocese in 1955. As the transition to independence was made, the church suffered greatly from the migration of many of its expatriate members. Membership declined from 420,000 in 1955 to 100,000 in 1970. However, church leaders supported independence, and consequently the new government looked with favor upon Christianity.

Protestants first entered Morocco in 1884, with missionaries from the North Africa Mission, an interdenominational missionary agency. They were joined by the Gospel Missionary Union in 1894 and the Emmanuel Mission Sahara in 1926. These two groups were expelled in 1969. After the declaration of the French protectorate, the Reformed Church of France entered the country and formed what became the Evangelical Church of Morocco (Eglise Evangélique au Maroc), now the largest of the several Protestant bodies. Several other groups such as the ASSEMBLIES OF GOD, the SEVENTH-DAY ADVENTIST CHURCH, the CHRISTIAN BRETHREN, and the JEHOVAH'S WITNESSES have attempted to build a following, but with limited response. Unable to do direct evangelism, several groups keep a Christian ministry alive through the operation of various humanitarian projects, the most famous being the Tullock Memorial Hospital and Nurses Training School in Tangier, operated by the North Africa Mission.

The Hassan II Mosque in Casablanca, Morocco (M. Barlow/TRIP)

Anglicans established work in 1929 through the efforts of the Bible Churchman's Missionary Society. Beginning as an extension of the Diocese of Sierra Leone, the Anglican parishes are now part of the Diocese of Egypt under the jurisdiction of the EPISCOPAL CHURCH IN JERUSALEM AND THE MIDDLE EAST. Morocco is also home to a range of Orthodox churches, which emerged through the century as groups of expatriates settled in the country from Russia, Belarus, and other North African nations. These churches are members of the GREEK ORTHODOX PATRIARCHATE OF ALEXANDRIA AND ALL AFRICA.

The Moroccan Constitution guarantees freedom of religion to all, but such freedom does not include the freedom to proselytize among Muslims. Non-Muslim religious groups are allowed to operate freely as long as they limit activity to serving their own present constituencies. Conversion from Islam is against the law. The Council of Churches of Morocco includes the several older, larger Christian bodies and is affiliated with the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES.

Sources:

Geertz, C. Islam Observed: Religious Development in Morocco and Indonesia. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1968.
 Holme, L. R. Extinction of the Christian Churches in North Africa. New York: Burt Franklin, 1969.
 Munson, H., Jr. Religion and Power in Morocco. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1993.
 Shahin, E. E. A. "The Restitution of Islam: A Comparative Study of the Islamic Movements in Contemporary Tunisia and Morocco." Ph.D. dissertation, Johns Hopkins University, 1990.

Mother Meera, Disciples of Mother Meera is a female Indian guru, born in 1960 in Chandepalle, Andhra Pradesh. Her parents named her Kamala. At the age of eight, she was adopted by a local family, the Reddys, and "discovered" at the age of twelve by Balgur Venkat Reddy, a member of the family who had been living for many years in the ashram of Sri Aurobindo Ghose (1872–1950). Kamala joined Reddy in the ashram and gradually acquired a reputation as an exceptional spiritual being. Drawing from the teachings of Aurobindo and the Hindu tradition, she came to be referred to as an avatar, or a divinity in human form who comes to save the world. Avatars (as opposed to gurus) are believed to be purely and originally divine and devoid of any sinful human nature. Kamala took the name Meera and was called Mother by her disciples, who believed that she was the incarnation of the original and supreme female power, Adiparashakti. Among the early disciples of Meera was Adilakshmi, a woman about twenty years her senior, who is still Meera's closest associate.

In the early 1980s, Meera, Balgur Venkat Reddy, and Adilakshmi visited disciples in Canada and Germany, where Reddy was hospitalized. In 1982 Meera married a German and henceforth remained in Germany. As her reputation spread in the West, she came to be visited by more than forty thousand visitors and devotees every year. Her house was moved from Thalheim to Diez to accommodate the growing number of visitors. Reddy died in 1985. Characteristic of Mother Meera is the complete silence of her dar- shan (spiritual encounter or audience). These darshan sessions take place every Friday through Monday, from 7 to 9 P.M. During this time each visitor approaches Mother Meera in turn while the other people present meditate in silence. The disciple kneels at the feet of Mother Meera. Darshan proper consists of two moments: first Meera holds the head of the disciple in her lap and presses it slightly with her fingers, after which the disciple sits up to look Mother Meera in the eyes. The total duration of each darshan is fifteen to twenty seconds, after which the person is seated with the others. The power of the darshan is believed to reside in the awakening of spiritual energy and the undoing of spiritual blockages. There are no religious symbols in the darshan room, no incense, and no music. There is no ashram and little or no opportunity for individual spiritual guidance.

The little teaching that is generated through publications reflects a mixture of the teachings of Aurobindo with popular Hindu devotion, or bhakti. The emphasis of Mother Meera's darshan lies in the discovery of one's own essential divine nature, in the manner of the Advaita Vedanta tradition. It is this absence of systematic teaching, organized ritual, or distinctive symbols that seems to constitute the appeal of Mother Meera throughout the West.

Address:

Mother Meera
Oberdorf 4a
65559 Dornburg-Thalheim
Germany
<http://www.mothermeera.com>

Catherine Cornille

Sources:

- Adilakshmi. The Mother. Thalheim, Germany: Mother Meera Publications, 1987.
- Brown, Mick. The Spiritual Tourist: A Personal Odyssey through the Outer Reaches of Belief. London: Bloomsbury, 1998.
- Harvey, Andrew. Hidden Journey: A Spiritual Awakening. London: Rider, 1991.
- . The Return of the Mother. Berkeley, CA: Frog, 1995.
- Mother Meera. Answers. 2 vols. Ithaca, NY: Meeramma Publications, 1991, 1997.

Mother of God Centre (Orthodox Church of Mother of God "Majestic")

The Orthodox Church of Mother of God "Majestic," commonly known as the Mother of God Centre (MGC), is an indigenous Russian new religious movement that emerged in the early 1990s in the wake of the introduction of the 1990 Law on Freedom of Religions. To some extent, it started as a breakaway movement from the Russian Free Orthodox Church, which in turn is a splinter of the RUSSIAN ORTHODOX CHURCH (MOSCOW PATRIARCHATE) that had operated underground since the 1920s. The Mother of God Centre was founded by Reverend Ioann Bereslavski (b. 1946), who became a Free Orthodox monk in the mid-1980s.

While claiming allegiance to the Eastern Orthodox tradition (the Nicene Creed, the apostolic succession, and the decisions of the seven ecumenical councils), MGC reinterprets this tradition in a revivalist and millenarian fashion in light of the church's "Marian faith." This "renewed faith" is based on a series of miraculous twentieth-century appearances and revelations of the Virgin Mary, in both Eastern Orthodox and Roman Catholic contexts, that taken together are believed to constitute "the White New Testament" or "the New Covenant." According to Bereslavski, the New Covenant signifies that the world has entered the "era of the Holy Ghost," in which God no longer dominates the world but reunites with it.

The theology and mythology of MGC have a prominent Russocentric and political dimension. Bereslavski claims that in her revelation in 1917 in Fatima, Portugal, the Virgin Mary predicted that Russia would become the battlefield of the final "cosmic" confrontation between the evil of communism and God as embodied in the Orthodox Church. However, he argues, the Moscow Patriarchate betrayed the Virgin's salvationist mission through collaboration with the Communist regime, which is symbolized in the image of the three-headed Dragon, representing the Communist Party, the KGB, and the Moscow Patriarchate. The defeat of the 1991 Communist coup signified the end of the first two heads, and the severance of the last head will make possible the salvation of humanity through acceptance of the "True Marian Faith." The revivalist interpretation of the Orthodox tradition by the MGC is also seen in the retention of the canonical Orthodox liturgy and the addition of the highly expressive "plastic prayer," with its exuberant rhythmic music and dance and colorful dress.

The MGC has seven bishops, including head archbishop Ioann (Bereslavski). The movement has an annual Church Council, which is a major religious festival for all its participants and sympathizers. Since 1990, it has developed an infrastructure that includes several small monasteries, a school, a theological academy, and several periodicals. There is no formal membership. It is estimated that in the 1990s the movement never attracted more than a few hundred core followers and between thirty-five hundred and four thousand more loosely affiliated participants in various parts of Russia, around four hundred of whom resided in Moscow. Since the early 1990s, the movement has been involved in the WORLD NETWORK OF MARIAN DEVOTION and churches.

In the early 1990s MGC was subject to controversy and became one of the main targets of anticult groups and the Moscow Patriarchate. This was partly due to the political activities that stemmed from its messianic anticommunism and its staunch opposition to the “Communist Church.” At the same time, the movement’s monarchist political views encouraged several of its members to proselytize in some units of the Russian army in order to “re-educate” officers in the spirit of Marian faith and the Russian monarchist tradition. However, the anticult groups mainly focused on allegations of hypnosis and assault on the family. Several investigations of the movement by the Office of the General Prosecutor, which were demanded by the anticult groups, found no evidence of criminal or antisocial activity. Currently, the anticultists recognize that MGC considerably moderated its beliefs and practices during the 1990s (Baklanova 1999, 96–99).

MGC is a prominent example of indigenous religious innovation in response to the opportunities and frustrations of the transitional period in Russia. In a way, MGC has created a religious mythology for Russian postcommunist society, drawing on elements of Russian traditional religious culture and those aspects of Russian culture that were common immediately before and after the collapse of communism.

Marat S. Shterin

Sources:

Baklanova, G. Pravoslavnaia Tserkov' Bozhiei Materi "Derzhavnaja." Moscow: Agent, 1999.

Filatov, S. “Sects and New Religious Movements in Post-Soviet Russia.” In Proselytism and Orthodoxy in Russia: The New War of Souls, edited by J. Witte Jr. and M. Bourdeaux, 163–184. Maryknoll, NY: Orbis Books, 1999.

Shterin, Marat. “New Religious Movements in the New Russia.” Nova Religio 4, 2 (April 2001): 310–321.

The Movement for the Restoration of the Ten Commandments

The Movement for the Restoration of the Ten Commandments (MRTC) was a small movement in Uganda that suddenly made international news in March 2000 when hundreds of its members were murdered. The MRTC traced its origin to visions of the Virgin Mary given to a young Ugandan woman, Credonia Mwerinde (1952–2000). As early as 1981, the Virgin told Mwerinde in a series of messages to renounce the sin in her life, change her ways, and prepare for a future mission. The messages also lamented the abandonment of the Ten Commandments by Christians, and they attacked the kind of malevolent magic that had spread from Rhodesia since the 1950s by the Mchape (witchcraft eradication) movement.

In the late 1980s, two other female visionaries, Angelina Migisha (1947–2000) and Mwerinde’s niece Ursula Komuhangi (1968–2000), identified with Mwerinde. In 1989 the three recruited to their cause Joseph Kibwetere (1932– 2000), who had independently received a vision of the Virgin. The MRTC was essentially established by these four people. Kibwetere, a Roman Catholic layman, functioned as a bishop for the group. Eventually eight additional leaders, all designated apostles, were chosen.

The visions shared by these twelve apostles described apocalyptic events that would befall the people in the near future. Beginning in 1989, the group began to share their visions publicly, and in 1991 they published them in a book, A Timely Message from Heaven: The End to the Present Times, which announced the initiation of the MRTC as a movement calling all believers back to observance of the Ten Commandments. The apostles were very loosely connected with the larger global network of groups that also received messages from the Virgin Mary.

The MRTC’s apocalyptic teaching became more defined through the 1990s. The group taught that the present generation would soon be brought to an end. They compared the earth to a tree that had become barren. One vision predicted three days of darkness, during which all the faithful were to go into a sanctuary prepared for this purpose, shut the doors, and remain secluded. At the end of that time, three-quarters of the world’s population would be dead. The remainder would inherit a new redeemed earth.

Kibwetere was reported to have predicted significant changes at the end of 1999. These reports appear to be false, as the group was in fact focused on the end of 2000, the actual end of the millennium. Indeed, in January 2000 the MRTC leadership sent a letter to the Ugandan government announcing that its mission was concluding and that there would be no year 2001.

The movement was headquartered at Kanungu, a village in the Rukungiri district of Uganda. Members constructed a complex of buildings, and eventually Kanungu became known as Ishayuriro rya Maria (Rescue Place for the Virgin Mary). They adopted a highly disciplined life that included celibacy and a simple uniform dress of green, black, and white. The movement also developed a form of sign language that replaced speech as much as possible (except during worship services), and contact with nonmembers was minimized.

Much about the movement remains unknown and is not likely to be discovered. However, MRTC leaders evidently made a decision early in 2000 to end the movement’s existence by systematically orchestrating the deaths of its membership. It has been further hypothesized that their decision may have been occasioned by the demand of some members for the return of their donations to the movement. Whatever the motivation, the deaths occurred in two phases. Members were killed at various movement centers around the country. Deaths occurred by poison, strangulation, and stabbing. Some four hundred members were killed and buried in mass graves at six different locations. The members residing in Kanungu were killed on March 17.

In the days prior to the Kanunga climactic event, word circulated that the Virgin was about to appear and members were urged to prepare for their deliverance at her hands. They slaughtered cattle, purchased a large supply of Coca Cola, indulged themselves with food, and purchased a supply of gasoline. Some members sold property and destroyed personal items. On the evening of March 15, they gathered for a party at which the food and drink were consumed. Two days later they gathered at their sanctuary, where the windows were already boarded up as prescribed in an early revelation. Shortly thereafter, there was a violent explosion and consuming fire from which no one escaped.

Initially, the reports of the event talked of a “ritual mass suicide.” But during the investigation of the event, the bodies of those who had been killed at the other MRTC sites around the country were also discovered. Only when these hundreds of additional bodies were uncovered did the interpretations shift to homicide. The final count of victims was 780. The MRTC leaders who planned the event appear to have perished in the fire with the believers, though their bodies have not been identified. Uganda issued warrants for their arrests. Given the group’s location and the limited resources available for the investigation, many questions about the group and its final days will probably never be answered. The movement was one of thousands of new African indigenous movements that began to appear at the end of the nineteenth century. There was little indication that the movement was headed toward a disastrous end.

Sources:

- Kabazzi-Kisirinya, S., R. Nkurunziza, K. Deusdedit, and B. Gerard, eds. The Kanugu Cult-Saga: Suicide, Murder, or Salvation? Kampala, Uganda: Department of Religious Studies, Makerere University, 2000.
- Mayer, Jean-François. “Field Notes: The Movement for the Restoration of the Ten Commandments of God.” Nova Religio 5, 1 (October 2001): 203–210
- A Timely Message from Heaven: The End of the Present Times. Rukungiri, Uganda: The Movement for the Restoration of the Ten Commandments of God, 1991.

Movement of Spiritual Inner Awareness

The Movement of Spiritual Inner Awareness (MSIA) is a contemporary religious movement that was founded by John-Roger Hinkins in 1971. Although often identified with the New Age movement, the MSIA’s core spiritual practices are more closely related to the RADHASOAMI tradition.

Hinkins, generally called Sri John-Roger, or more informally, J.-R., was born Roger Hinkins in 1934 to a Mormon family in Rains, Utah. He received his bachelor of science degree in psychology at the University of Utah and in 1958 moved to southern California, where he became an English teacher at Rosemead High School. In 1963, while undergoing surgery, he fell into a nine-day coma. Upon awakening, he announced that a new spiritual personality, named John, had merged with his old personality. The name John-Roger acknowledges this new transformed self.

Hinkins began to teach and counsel informally and for several years was associated with ECKANKAR, a westernized group within the Sant Mat tradition. After his break with ECKANKAR, he held gatherings as an independent spiritual teacher. In 1971 he formally incorporated the Movement of Spiritual Inner Awareness. He also founded a number of additional organizations out of the MSIA, including Prana (now Peace) Theological Seminary (1974), Baraka Holistic Center (1976), and Insight Training Seminars (1978). The John-Roger Foundation was created in 1982 in order to coordinate the several programs initiated by the MSIA. The foundation also initiated the Integrity Day celebrations, an effort to promote global transformation through the enrichment and uplift of individuals. Beginning in 1983, the foundation has held an annual Integrity Award banquet, giving awards to individuals for their achievements. In 1988 the John-Roger Foundation was divided into the Foundation for the Study of the Individual and World Peace and the International Integrity Foundation.

MSIA teachings are rooted in the general consensus among traditional Asian faiths—Hinduism, Buddhism, and especially Sikhism. The MSIA advocates the idea that the individual soul is trapped in the material world, which is a realm of suffering. Because of the related processes of reincarnation and karma, the death of the physical body does not free a person from suffering. Only through the practice of certain spiritual techniques, such as the practice of yogic meditation, can individuals liberate themselves from the cycle of death and rebirth.

In common with other Sant Mat groups, the MSIA pictures the cosmos as composed of many different levels or planes. Originally, these levels evolved from God along a vibratory “stream” until creation reached its terminus in the physical plane. The Sant Mat tradition teaches that individuals can be linked to God’s creative energy and that this stream of energy will carry them back to God. The Mystical Traveler Consciousness—which was originally manifested through John-Roger in the 1960s—accomplishes this link-up during initiation. Once this initial link is made, however, the individual gains its benefits through the practice of various spiritual exercises, particularly the repetition of the mantra “Hu.”

Each individual is seen as being involved in a movement of spiritual inner awareness, of which the MSIA is an outward reflection. Individuals who wish to develop a total awareness, including freedom from the cycle of reincarnation, seek the assistance of the Mystical Traveler, who is believed to exist simultaneously on all levels of consciousness in total awareness. He can teach them how to reach awareness and assists them in understanding and releasing themselves from their karmic responsibilities. He is believed to have the psychic ability to read the karmic records of each individual.

Some of the several New Age healing techniques focusing on different aspects of the self have been adopted by the MSIA. These include "aura balancing," which is a technique for clearing the auric (magnetic) field that exists around each individual; "inner-phasing," a technique through which the individual can reach into the subconscious to bring to consciousness and remove the dysfunctional patterns learned early in life; and "polarity balancing," which releases blocks in the physical body. A major emphasis upon holistic healing in the MSIA originated from the use of these techniques, leading to the development of the Baraka Holistic Center for Therapy and Research in Santa Monica, California.

What might be termed membership in the MSIA is accomplished when the individual is enrolled in a series of monthly lessons, referred to as Discourses. After studying the Discourses for specified periods of time, an individual may apply successively for the four formal initiations that mark a person's spiritual progress. Independently of the initiation structure, one may also become an MSIA minister. The basic MSIA gathering is the small-home seminar. MSIA ministers do not normally minister to congregations; rather, they are involved in some type of service work, which constitutes their ministry.

In the late 1970s, Sri John-Roger developed Insight Training Seminars (ITS), a program built around an intense transformational experience. The ITS emphasize the individual's ability to move beyond self-imposed limitations. In recent years, ITS has become a separate organization, independent of the MSIA.

The MSIA founded the University of Santa Monica, which has also developed into a separate institution. A second educational institution, Peace Theological Seminary (PTS), on the other hand, has become an integral part of MSIA outreach. Today PTS is the primary setting for MSIA seminars and workshops. Most recently, PTS has expanded its program through a new master's degree program.

In 1988, the mantle of the Mystical Traveler consciousness was passed to John Morton, one of John-Roger's students, and through the 1990s, Morton has increasingly taken the primary role in MSIA events.

As the anticult movement developed in the late 1970s, it paid little attention to the MSIA, then a small group compared to the more visible religious groups that had called it into existence. Then in 1988, the Los Angeles Times and then People magazine attacked the MSIA. Criticism centered on charges by former staff members that John-Roger had sexually exploited them. After the issues were aired, the controversy largely died. Then in 1994, the MSIA was again the subject of media attention when multimillionaire Michael Huffington ran for the United States Senate and it was learned that Arianna Huffington, his wife, was an MSIA member. About the same time, Peter McWilliams, a MSIA minister who had coauthored a series of popular books with John-Roger, dropped out of the movement and authored a bitter anti-MSIA book, LIFE 102: What To Do When Your Guru Sues You, which attracted some media attention. Shortly before his death in 2000, McWilliams appeared to have reconciled his differences with the organization.

At the end of the 1990s, some five thousand people were studying the Discourses, of which some twenty-seven hundred were in the United States.

Address:

Movement for Spiritual Inner Awareness and Peace Theological Seminary
3500 W. Adams Blvd.
Los Angeles, CA 90018
<http://www.msia.org>

James R. Lewis

Sources:

- Hinkins, John-Roger. Inner Worlds of Meditation. Los Angeles: Mandeville Press, 1977, 1997.
- . Spiritual Warrior. Los Angeles: Mandeville Press, 1998.
- . Interviews with John Morton and John Roger: Religious Scholars Interview the Travelers. Los Angeles: Mandeville Press, 1999.
- . An Introduction to the Movement of Spiritual Inner Awareness. Los Angeles: Peace Theological Seminary and College of Philosophy, 1999.
- Lewis, James R. Seeking the Light. Los Angeles: Mandeville Press, 1997.

Mozambique

Bantu peoples began to move into what is today Mozambique in the early centuries of the Common Era. They spread through the region and developed both agriculture and mining. Then in the tenth century, a prince from Shiraz, Persia (present-day Iran), founded the city of Sofala near present-day Beira, which became a trading center through which goods moved from the interior (Zimbabwe) to the spreading Islamic culture along the African coast. The area flourished until the Portuguese arrived and destroyed it in their attempt to take over the trade. The first European to see Mozambique, Vasco da Gama (c. 1460–1524), sailed along the coast in 1498. The Portuguese returned two years later and began the destruction of Mozambique and the Arab settlements northward up the coast.

Finally expelled from the lands to the north in the eighteenth century, the Portuguese in Mozambique turned to the slave trade. During the nineteenth century, the Portuguese ruled the coast but had little influence inland. They tried to assert their hegemony in the interior, including several failed attempts to connect Mozambique with Angola (a plan that countered British plans to connect South Africa with Egypt). In their attempt to gain authority over the interior, they gave many land grants (in Portuguese, prazos) to Portuguese colonists, and these ultimately became virtually independent lands. Finally, between 1890 and 1920 Portugal asserted its control over both the landholders (prazeiros) and the various native peoples.

Independence movements developed after World War II. A 1960 demonstration that led to the death of five hundred people convinced many that there would be no peaceful transition. In 1962, Eduardo Mondlane (1920–1969) was able to unite several groups into the Front for the Liberation of Mozambique (FRELIMO), which in 1965 launched a civil war. The war continued until the revolution in Portugal in 1974. The independent Republic of Mozambique was established the next year.

The new government began to reorganize the country along socialist lines, and in 1977 it proclaimed Marxism-Leninism as the nation's ideology. The country was soon involved with neighboring countries, supporting Zimbabwe's fight for independence and opposing the apartheid regime in South Africa. In the 1980s South Africa aligned with dissident former supporters of Portuguese rule, the Movement of National Resistance (RENAMO), and attacked Mozambique. The war continued through the 1980s and hundreds of thousands of people left the country.

Peace talks began under the auspices of Italy and the ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH. After a decade of conflict, FRELIMO and RENAMO agreed to a partial cease-fire in 1990, and finally, in October 1992, a general peace accord was signed. A UN peacekeeping force oversaw the cease-fire and the transition to multiparty elections, which took place in 1994. In the mid-1990s, over 1.7 million refugees who had sought asylum in neighboring countries returned to Mozambique—the largest repatriation ever seen in sub-Saharan Africa.

Traditional religions still hold sway in much of rural Mozambique, especially in the northern two-thirds of the country. During the twentieth century, a variety of revivalist movements have appeared in response to the White cul-

Status of religions in Mozambique, 2000-2050

Followers	2000		2025	2050
	total	% rate
Ethnoreligionists	9,909,000	50.4 3.21	14,226,000	18,955,000
Christians	7,552,000	38.4 3.44	13,000,000	19,300,000
Roman Catholics	3,110,000	15.8 3.11	4,800,000	6,800,000
Protestants	1,750,000	8.9 3.85	3,300,000	5,000,000
Independents	1,422,000	7.2 3.85	3,200,000	5,500,000
Muslims	2,068,000	10.5 3.26	3,031,000	4,000,000
Nonreligious	95,100	0.5 5.63	250,000	500,000
Hindus	31,700	0.2 3.72	50,000	80,000
Atheists	20,400	0.1 5.43	50,000	80,000
Baha'is	3,400	0.0 4.46	5,000	7,500
Jews	200	0.0 2.10	300	500
Total population	19,680,000	100.0 3.32	30,612,000	42,923,000

ture. One prophetic group arose among the Hlengwe around 1913. It was built around a belief in Mwirimi, the supreme being, who was believed to possess prophetic leadership. The movement included a campaign to rid the area of malevolent magic, tobacco smoke being the magical agent utilized. As the movement gained strength, the Portuguese moved to suppress it.

Islam came to Mozambique in the tenth century with the establishment of the city of Sofala. During the next centuries, the coastal region was controlled by representatives of the sultan in Zanzibar. To this day, many people who reside in the coastal area and along the Zambesi River are Muslim. In the nineteenth century, a new wave of Muslim belief entered the area. The Yao people, who operated as traders between Lake Malawi and the Muslim coastlands south of Zanzibar in Tanzania, converted to Islam. Today the Yao and related ethnic groups (including the Makua and the Makonde, the last hold-outs against the Portuguese pacification of the country) include some 8 million people in Mozambique and neighboring Malawi and Tanzania.

Muslims perform the Bavlito dance in Mozambique. (B. Seed/TRIP)

Most Yao people are Sunni Muslims of the SHAFIITE SCHOOL OF ISLAM, but there are also three other distinct factions of Muslims. The Sufis in Mozambique retain the Islam that was adopted at the time the Yao originally converted. They have kept many traditional rituals, over which Islamic practice has been added. They practice a form of Sufi worship called the dhikr (remembrance of God), which among the Yao includes a circle dance designed to produce an ecstatic state. A second group, the Sukutis (the quiet), rejected the dhikr. They are closer to the Sunnis but, like the Sufis, do not place a great emphasis on studying the Qur'an or on Islamic law. Finally, the Sunni community has in the last generation experienced a new wave of reform generated by teachers from Kuwait. They have emphasized orthodoxy and the study of Arabic, the Qur'an, and Islamic law. They reject all practices not sanctioned by the Qur'an.

Christianity was introduced to Mozambique by the DOMINICANS in 1506. They were later assisted by the JESUITS and Augustinians in building the ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH in Mozambique. They concentrated their efforts along the southern coast and in the Zambesi River valley. It was not until the end of the nineteenth century that stable work was established north of the Save River and began to penetrate inland, and in spite of the long history of Roman Catholicism, a bishopric was not established until the twentieth century. The process of placing priests in all parts of the country was not completed until the 1930s. However, today, the Roman Catholic Church is the largest Christian group in Mozambique. It is organized into three archdioceses and nine dioceses.

Protestant Christianity was introduced by missionaries of the AMERICAN BOARD OF COMMISSIONERS FOR FOREIGN MISSIONS (Congregationalists) in 1881, but the board eventually decided to relocate its missionaries elsewhere. In the meantime, as a result of the Berlin Treaty of 1885, authorities became more open to admitting non-Catholic missionary personnel. Bishop William Taylor (1821–1902) of the Methodist Episcopal Church (now an integral part of the UNITED METHODIST CHURCH) moved to secure the Congregationalist stations in 1889 and 1890, making them into the beachhead for a new missionary thrust. Originally attached to the Congo Mission, this work became a mission conference in 1920 and an annual conference in 1954. It remains a part of the United Methodist Church.

During the 1880s, the Episcopal Methodists were joined by missionaries from the FREE METHODIST CHURCH, the British METHODIST CHURCH, and the Swiss Reformed Church. In the 1890s, Anglican missionaries of the CHURCH OF ENGLAND visited the Yao people in northeast Mozambique and established work in 1893. Of the minority of Yao who have not accepted Islam today, many are Anglican. The Anglican work is now a diocese of the CHURCH IN THE PROVINCE OF SOUTH AFRICA.

After World War I, a host of European and North American churches initiated work in Mozambique. The Free Baptist Union (based in Sweden) entered southern Mozambique in 1921. Its work grew and prospered, and in 1968 it was in place to absorb the work originally begun by the CHURCH OF SCOTLAND in northern Mozambique. That work has passed through several hands and eventually came under the direction of the South Africa General Mission (SAGM, now known as the Africa Evangelical Fellowship). The government moved to close the mission and refused entry to SAGM missionaries. Thus, the Swedish Baptists came to oversee the northern missions. The resultant UNITED BAPTIST CHURCH faced a rough period during the civil war, but in the 1990s it had an explosive growth. It is now the largest Protestant church in the country, with some 4 million adherents.

Among the larger Protestant groups as the twentieth century came to a close were the PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH OF MOZAMBIQUE, the Full Gospel Church of God (Igreja do Evangelho Completo de Deus), which resulted from several Pentecostal efforts, and the JEHOVAH'S WITNESSES. Protestant Christians associate with each other across denominational lines through the Christian Council of Mozambique, an affiliate of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES. Conservative Protestants are associated in the Associação Evangélica de Moçambique, which is related to the WORLD EVANGELICAL ALLIANCE.

Neither the Portuguese colonial government nor the Marxist government of independent Mozambique were supportive of AFRICAN INITIATED CHURCHES. Nonetheless, more than one hundred indigenous, African-led churches and movements have appeared in Mozambique. Many, including the AFRICAN APOSTOLIC CHURCH OF JOHANE MARANGE and the APOSTOLIC FAITH MISSION OF SOUTH AFRICA, originated in neighboring countries. The African Portuguese Church was the first Mozambique-founded Christian church.

Jews began to enter Mozambique at the end of the nineteenth century. Though split between Sephardic and Ashkenazi, they were able to build a small synagogue in 1926, but they were never able to hire a rabbi. Following independence in 1975, most Jews left the country. The synagogue was confiscated and turned into a warehouse, and organized Jewish life in Mozambique was abandoned. Then, in 1989, a local non-Jewish businessman organized a campaign for the return of the synagogue to the city, with the idea that it would become a monument to the former Jewish community. Instead, it became the start of a revival of services among the small group of Jews remaining in the country.

During the 1990s, Mozambique became the scene of a unique adventure by the WORLD PLAN EXECUTIVE COUNCIL, the organization established by the Maharishi Mehesh Yogi for the saturation of the world with transcendental meditation (TM). Following the general peace agreement of 1992, Dutch representatives of the council offered TM to the new Mozambique government as a means of bringing order and quelling future conflict. Initially, TM was taught to various military personnel as the start of an attempt to produce the "Maharishi Effect," which is believed to occur when a critical mass of meditators is reached, a number high enough to radiate peace and harmony throughout the nation. The country's president, Alberto Joaquim Chissano (b. 1939), discovered TM in 1992 and continues to meditate twice daily. As of 2002, he remains an avid supporter of the program, which he holds up as a "non-religious" activity and hence an appropriate program for government support. He authorized the creation of the Prevention [of War] Wing of the military, and beginning in 1994, all military and police recruits were ordered to meditate for twenty minutes, twice a day. In 2001, for reasons not altogether clear, government support for TM was withdrawn, and it is no longer compulsory within the army, though a number of people continue to meditate.

Sources:

- Garcia, A. Historia de Moçambique cristão. Lourenço Marques: Diário Grafica, 1969.
- Le Fait Missionaire. "Religion in Mozambique." Posted at <http://ourworld.compuserve.com/homepages/emorier/religion.htm>. Accessed November 1, 2001.
- Thorold, Alan. "Metamorphoses of the Yao Muslims." In Muslim Identity and Social Change in Sub-Saharan Africa, edited by Louis Benner. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1993.

Mülheim Association of Christian Fellowships

The Mülheim Association of Christian Fellowships (Mülheim Bewegung), the original Pentecostal association in Germany, traces its beginning to a series of meetings held in Kassel in 1907. The meetings were facilitated by two women who had come to Germany from a Pentecostal revival in Norway, led by Thomas B. Barratt (1862–1940). The revival centered on participants' reception of the Pentecostal baptism of the Holy Spirit and the manifestation of the gifts of the Spirit (as mentioned in 1 Corinthians 12), such as prophecy, healing, and speaking in tongues. The local Evangelical (Lutheran) leader, Heinrich Dallmeyer, at first tried to work with the group but later rejected the manifestation of the gifts as diabolical. Observation of the Pentecostals over the next year led a number of other Evangelical leaders to reject the new movement as well, some rejecting the highly charged emotional nature of the meetings, others focusing on theological differences.

One major concern was the “Methodist” theology assumed by the Pentecostals, who taught an approach to salvation that included stages, with justification (the making right of a believer before God) followed by sanctification (the believer becoming holy in the sight of God) and the baptism of the Holy Spirit. Lutheran theology assumes that justification and sanctification occur at the moment of faith, and Lutherans had no theology to account for a subsequent baptism of the Holy Spirit. In 1909 a group of Evangelical leaders issued the Berlin Declaration, a strong denunciation of the new movement.

The declaration slowed but did not stop the spread of Pentecostalism, and Free Church congregations arose over the next years. Among the ministers who emerged as leaders were Eugen Edel, Jonathan Paul, Emil Humburg, and A. Frieme. Though the churches originally attempted to remain a spiritual movement that influenced life in both the established church and the various Protestant Free Churches, many of the churches came together in 1913 to form the Mülheim Association, which in stages emerged as a separate church body.

The Mülheim Association is not only the oldest but also the largest Pentecostal body in Germany. It also developed somewhat independently of the Pentecostal movement in the English-speaking world. For example, it rejected one of the major doctrinal foundations of Pentecostalism, which tied the baptism of the Holy Spirit to the visible evidence of speaking in tongues. The movement was also open to contemporary approaches to biblical scholarship and tried to reconcile with Reformation theology. As such, prior to the charismatic revival in the 1970s, it often found itself at odds with the larger international movement.

The Mülheim Association survived the Nazi era and the division of Germany following the war. Today it is headquartered in Nidenstein, Germany. In the 1990s it reported some thirty thousand members.

Address:

Mülheim Association of Christian Fellowships
Hauptstrasse 36
34305 Nidenstein
Germany

Sources:

Burgess, Stanley M., and Gary McGee, eds. Dictionary of Pentecostal and Charismatic Movements. Grand Rapids, MI: Regency Reference Library, 1988.

Eggenberger, Oswald. Die Kirchen Sondergruppen und religiösen Vereinigungen. Zürich: Theologischer Verlag, 1994.

Hollenweger, Walter J. Pentecostals: The Charismatic Movement in the Church. Minneapolis, MN: Augsburg, 1972.

Murīdiyya

Murīdiyya is the Arabic version of the name of a Muslim brotherhood or Sufi order (in Arabic, tariqa) that was founded toward the end of the nineteenth century by the charismatic Sheikh Ahmadou Bamba (c. 1853–1927) in Senegal (West Africa). In French, the official language of Senegal, the order is known as Mouridisme, and in English the followers of this Sufi order are referred to as Mourides. The basic meaning of the Arabic word murīd from which these terms are derived is aspirant, that is, one who seeks after progress on the mystical path of Islam.

Probably no Muslim community in sub-Saharan Africa has been the subject of more attention, both academic and non-academic, than the Murīdiyya. This seems to be one of the reasons why their importance and influence tend to be exaggerated. Although reliable statistical data is not available, it is likely that about one-third of the Muslim population in Senegal can be counted as followers of Bamba. We can thus estimate the membership of the Murīdiyya at about 3 million in 2001. Outside Senegal, the Murīdiyya has recruited few followers. However, Senegalese Mourides can now be found in many francophone African countries and in countries of the Middle East. Since the 1970s, they have established important diaspora communities in Europe, particularly in Italy, France, and Spain, and in the United States, most notably in New York and Chicago. The influence of Ahmadou Bamba has been further extended by the efforts of additional teachers such as Sheikh Abdoulaye Dieye, who founded the independent Islamic Society of Mourides of Reunion, from whence he has built an international following.

The life of Ahmadou Bamba is surrounded by countless legends that remain tremendously popular among Senegalese Muslims. Some of these legends have found their way into modern Senegalese literature, popular music, and arts such as glass painting. Bamba can in fact be described as a national saint of Senegal, and his portrait can be seen on the walls of shops and private houses all over the country. It is possible to distinguish four phases in the development of the Murīdiyya: the founding years (c. 1880–1912), the transition from rejection to acceptance of colonial rule (1912–1927), the cooperation with two successive political regimes and the expansion of peanut cultivation (1927–1970), and finally, the shift from agriculture to modern business and the establishment of diaspora communities around the world (c. 1970 to the present).

Bamba emerged as a religious leader after the death in 1882 of his father—a religious scholar, teacher, and adviser to a local ruler. In 1887, he founded the village of Touba in the region of Baol, which later became the capital of the Murīdiyya. At that time, he had not yet established his own Sufi order, but practiced the recitation formulas (awrād, sg. wird) of other groups, such as the QĀDIRIYYA SUFI ORDER, the SHĀDHILIYYA SUFI ORDER, and the TIJĀNIYYA SUFI ORDER.

Around the same time, the French succeeded in destroying the local kingdoms of the Wolof, the primary ethnic group in Senegal. In this situation, Bamba's mysticism became the rallying point for a rapidly increasing number of followers, mostly of Wolof origin. Because members of the former ruling elite and the warrior class were part of Bamba's entourage, Bamba himself came under suspicion of being the possible leader of an anticolonial revolt. As a result, he was exiled in 1895. Bamba spent seven years in Gabon and, after a brief stay in Senegal, another four years in Mauritania. He returned to Senegal in 1907.

The exile of Bamba did not lead to a decrease in the number of his followers, as the French had hoped. Nevertheless, from about 1910 onwards relations between the Murīdiyya and the French gradually improved. Bamba repeatedly declared his loyalty to the French cause and urged his followers to obey the orders of the administration. During World War I, Bamba recruited five hundred soldiers from among his disciples, and these were sent to Europe in order to fight for the French army. However, Bamba was never permitted to live in Touba again. When he died in 1927, the administration gave permission to bury him at Touba, where his tomb became the destination of an annual pilgrimage.

After the death of Ahmadou Bamba, his eldest son took over the leadership of the Murīdiyya, at that time numbering about one hundred thousand people, most of them Wolof. Up to the present day, the brotherhood's supreme leader (called the Khalife général) is one of Bamba's two surviving sons. Under this new leadership the Murīdiyya continued to expand rapidly into the so-called new territories, that is, into hitherto uncultivated areas of the Senegalese hinterland. New rural communities were established in these areas, and the members of these communities committed themselves to the cultivation of peanuts. The severe drought in the early 1970s and the later dramatic drop in the price of peanuts occasioned the move of many followers into the urban centers of Senegal, where they set up business enterprises in the modern sector, some migrating to Europe and the United States.

The doctrine of the Murīdiyya does not essentially deviate from what might be called standard Islamic mysticism, although a difference has been noted between the "official" doctrine and its popular interpretation. The former stresses compliance with the Islamic norms related to prayer, fasting, and so on and emphasizes the necessity of a "spiritual education" that in turn is based on the disciple's total obedience and submission to his master. The Murīdiyya also assign a central role to the Prophet Muhammad. On several occasions, Bamba claimed to have had an encounter with the Prophet, whom Sufis usually believe can still appear and talk to whomever he wishes. According to Murīdiyya hagiography, the first of these encounters took place in 1893. After that time, Bamba stopped practicing the liturgy (wird) of the other Sufi orders and began to present himself as the "servant of the Prophet." For the Murīdiyya, this encounter meant that Bamba had acceded to the position of the supreme Muslim saint (qutb al-aqtāb).

In popular imagery, the position of Bamba as the supreme qutb gave rise to the belief that Bamba and his living representatives can guarantee success in this world and salvation in the hereafter. Moreover, the members of a group within the Murīdiyya known as Baye Fall hold that they will go to paradise only on account of their total commitment to their spiritual master, without needing to comply with the ritual norms of Islam. This commitment usually takes the form of work for a Murīdiyya leader, be it in the peanut fields or in a modern profession. The Baye Fall justify their conduct by pointing to the alleged sayings of Bamba, including "Work is prayer," and "Work for me, then I will pray for you." Indeed, the extraordinary spiritual value attached to physical work—not only by the Baye Fall, but also by many other followers—is perhaps the most peculiar feature of Murīdiyya doctrine.

A spectacular event in Murīdiyya community life is the annual pilgrimage (magal) to the Holy City of Touba, which is a kind of state within a state. During the 1990s it developed into one of the biggest Senegalese cities. In recent years, the magal has brought together some two million people—including some of Senegal's most prominent politicians—who exalt the memory of Ahmadou Bamba. Another distinctive practice of the Murīdiyya relates to ritual: The Mourides regularly meet in groups to recite Bamba's religious poetry, known as khassaites (from Arabic qasā'id, sg. qasida, or poem). Some of this poetry is in praise of the Prophet Muhammad, and other poems can be described as vulgarizations of mystical teachings.

Address:

Murīdiyya Headquarters
c/o Son Excellence le Khalife Général de Mourides Touba
Senegal
http://touba-internet.com/top_contacts.htm (in French) <http://www.toubaislam.org/> (in French and English)

Ruediger Seesemann

Sources:

Bamba, Ahmadou. Diwān fi l-'ulūm ad-dīniyya: Recueil des poèmes en sciences religieuses. 2 vols. Casablanca: Dar el Kitab, 1989. (A collection of religious poetry, Arabic with French translation.)

- . Les itinéraires du Paradis. Translated by Serigne Sam Mbaye. Casablanca: Dar el Kitab, 1984. (Translation of Masâlik al-jinân, one of the most important works by Ahmadou Bamba on Sufism.)
- Cruise O'Brien, Donal B. The Mourides of Senegal. Oxford: Clarendon, 1971. (The standard monograph on the Mourides.)
- Dieye, Sheikh Abdoulaye. Ocean of Wisdom. Saint Louis, Réunion: Islamic Society of Mourids of Reunion, n.d. (A biography of Sheikh Ahmadou Bamba in English.)
- Dumont, Fernand. La pensée religieuse d'Amadou Bamba. Dakar: Nouvelles Editions Africaines, 1975. (The most complete work on the doctrine of Ahmadou Bamba.)
- Mbacké, Serigne Bachir. Les bienfaits de l'Éternel ou la biographie de Cheick Ahmadou Bamba Mbacké. Translated by Khadim Mbacké. Dakar: Imp. Saint-Paul, 1995. (Biography of the founder of the Muridiyya, written by one of his sons.)
- Schmidt di Friedberg, Ottavia. Islam, solidarietà e lavoro: I muridi senegalesi in Italia. Torino, Italy: Ed. della Fondazione Giovanni Agnelli, 1994. (So far the only monograph that addresses the Muridiyya diaspora communities.)
- Seeseman, Rüdiger. Ahmadu Bamba und die Entstehung der Muridiya. Berlin: Schwarz, 1993. (The only published monograph on the early history of the Muridiyya.)

Musama Disco Christo Church/ Army of the Cross of the Christ Church

The Musama Disco Christo Church (MDCC) is one of the spiritual churches in Ghana. In 1919 Prophet Jemisemiham Jehu-Appiah (1893–1948), born Joseph W. E. Appiah, a former Methodist preacher and schoolteacher, had a vision of three angels who sent him on a mission. He was filled with the Spirit and began to perform miracles, establishing the Faith Society with the assistance of a woman named Abena Bawa, whom he renamed Hannah Barnes. This prayer and Bible study group within Methodism became distinguished by its practice of prophecy, healing, and speaking in tongues. In 1922 the group's members were dismissed from the METHODIST CHURCH, GHANA, for alleged "occult practices."

Appiah and Barnes then founded the Musama Disco Christo Church (Army of the Cross of Christ Church), a name given by heavenly revelation. They established the holy city of Mozano (my [God's] town), which Appiah was given by the local chief to develop his own settlement. Appiah based his complex church organization on the traditional Fanti court and became the Akaboha I. Hannah Barnes, the Akatitibi (queen mother), was taken up into heaven and given instructions, including the revelation that she would marry Akaboha I, which she did after the prophet received a similar revelation. The movement spread and Akaboha I gave new heavenly names—each one unique and never repeated—to the thousands who joined, a practice that continues today. Members speak a special language in greeting and wear distinctive copper rings and crosses. Akaboha I died in 1948 and was succeeded by his son Matapoly Moses Jehu-Appiah (1924–1972), who was credited with a miraculous birth and became Akaboha II. In 1951 a new holy city, New Mozano, was established.

The MDCC is noted for its ban on ancestor rituals and its use of medicines. It has an elaborate system of angels, whose names are to be mentioned in prayer. The MDCC has complex rituals, involving several sacred objects, including an Ark of the Covenant in a holy shrine that only the Akaboha and senior ministers can enter to offer prayers and make petitions. The church has other sacred places and fast days, and its rituals involve sacrificial animals, candles, incense, rosaries, and elaborate ceremonial gowns. Healing rituals include the use of anointing oil and holy water. The office of the Akaboha, who is also called the General Head Prophet, is hereditary in the Jehu-Appiah family, and the Akaboha has both spiritual and political duties. On the death of Akaboha II in 1972, his eldest son became Akaboha III. Another son of Akaboha II, Jerisdan Jehu-Appiah, has established the MDCC in Britain.

The MDCC, together with the Twelve Apostles and the African Faith Tabernacle, are the largest of the spiritual churches in Ghana, with about 125,000 affiliates each in 1990.

Address:

Musama Disco Christo Church
c/o Mozano
P.O. Box 11
Gomoa Eshiem
Ghana

Allan H. Anderson

Sources:

- Ayegboyin, Deji, and S. Ademola Ishola. African Indigenous Churches: An Historical Perspective. Lagos, Nigeria: Greater Heights Publications, 1997.
- Baëta, G. C. Prophetism in Ghana: A Study of Some 'Spiritual' Churches. London: SCM, 1962.
- Jehu-Appiah, Jemisemiham. The History of the Musama Disco Christo Church. Translated by Jerisdan H. Jehu-Appiah, 1998. Koforidua, Ghana: Fanzar Press, 1939.

Muslim Brotherhood

The Muslim Brotherhood, Al-Ikhwan Al-Moslemoon, is one of the most important movements of contemporary ISLAMISM, the revival of ultraconservative Islam with the aim of recreating governments ruled by Islamic law throughout the Middle East. The Brotherhood was founded as a youth movement in 1928 in Egypt. Its founder, Hassan al-Banna (1906–1949) was a Muslim cleric concerned about the current drift of the Islamic public away from what he saw as Orthodox belief and practice, and he wanted to woo the next generation to the traditional Muslim way as defined in the Qur'an, the Muslim holy book, and the Hadith, the accounts of the Prophet Muhammad and his companions. Both are considered the authorities for the formation of a Muslim lifestyle.

The call for a return to the Qur'an appealed to many Muslims, and the Brotherhood built a large base nationally. In the 1930s, however, it began to focus more clearly on political issues, in part occasioned by the pullout of British forces from Palestine and the resulting conflict between Jewish settlers, many advocating a Jewish homeland, and Muslim Palestinians. The Brotherhood openly favored the Palestinian cause. The situation in Palestine called attention to the weakness of the Egyptian government, which was heavily influenced by Great Britain.

By the end of the 1930s, al-Banna had outlined a program for the Brotherhood summarized in "The Twenty Principles for Understanding Islam," which was included in his book The Message of the Teachings. According to al-Banna, Islam speaks to all of the spheres of life; from personal conduct to the running of government and the business world, the basics are plainly laid out in the Qur'an and Hadith. Recognition of Allah's existence is the primary attribute of the Muslim. Everything that has been introduced into the community that is without a base in the Qur'an or Hadith should be abandoned, especially the popular practices of folk magic. Further, the divisions of the four Sunni legal schools are considered relatively unimportant, and wasting time on minor legal matters should be discontinued. And, most importantly, from belief comes action, for although good intentions are important, they must generate righteous deeds.

As part of its program, the Brotherhood became involved on a more clandestine level in the conflict between Palestinians and the new Jewish settlers in Palestine that escalated after the formation of the nation of Israel. In 1948 members of the Brotherhood joined the forces that attempted to block Israel's stabilization. Meanwhile, in Egypt, it attempted to change the government by assassinating various officials, including one prime minister. The violence in Egypt came back on the Brotherhood in 1949 when al-Banna was himself assassinated.

The death of al-Banna set the context for the rise of Sayyid Qutb (1906–1966). Qutb was in the United States when al-Banna was killed, but upon his return to Egypt he devoted his life to the Brotherhood cause, having integrated the ideas of al-Banna with those of Indian Muslim leader Sayyid Abul A'la Mawdudi (1903–1979), founder of JAMAAT-E-ISLAM. Mawdudi had projected the ideal image of a state administered by Muslims who adhere to the Qur'an and Hadith and who would enforce Islamic law upon the land. Likewise, Qutb looked for nothing less than a total reformation of Egyptian government and society.

Qutb became the chief editor of the Muslim Brotherhood's periodical and authored the first books that represented this new perspective, built around al-Banna's theme of Islam as a complete way of life. In 1954, Gamal Abd an-Nasser (1918–1970) led the coup that overthrew the Egyptian government, but rather than move toward an Islamic regime, he declared a socialist and nationalist government. He also had been the victim of a failed assassination attempt by the Brotherhood, and soon after assuming the presidency he moved to crush them. He was additionally motivated by the fact that the Brotherhood was the one significant political force that could oppose his plans for a new Egypt. Included in the mass arrests that ensued was Qutb, who would spend the next decade in jail. While in jail, he penned his major work, published soon after he was released. In Ma'alim fi al-tariq (later translated into English as Milestones), he condemned the Nasser government as essentially un-Islamic and laid the foundation for the broad program of reform since advocated by the Brotherhood. Based upon his reading of the book, Nasser again moved against the surviving remnants of the Brotherhood. The top leaders, including Qutb, were arrested and executed.

In Milestones, Qutb explained the need for Muslim opposition to Western decadence, symbolized most clearly in the West's moral turpitude, its merchandising of women and sex, and its racism. One sign of Egypt's problem, he wrote, was the influx of Western degeneracy. More importantly, Qutb merged Mawdudi's call for an Islamic revolution with a Leninist approach, calling for an Islamic vanguard to organize and overthrow the un-Islamic political powers. Although stopping short of explicitly calling for the use of force and violence to implement his program, he provided a platform by which the use of violence could be justified.

In Egypt the presidency of Anwar Sadat (1971–1981) created hope. He released all the remaining Brotherhood prisoners and promised to implement Islamic law in Egypt. The Brotherhood in turn pledged to renounce violence. Sadat's public movement away from many of Nasser's policies somewhat concealed his own attempt to create a middle ground between the visions for Egypt of Nasser, on the one hand, and of Qutb, on the other. The Brotherhood's support of Sadat ended with the Camp David accords and peace with Israel in 1979. A variety of militant factions emerged, including one named Islamic Jihad, accused of Sadat's assassination two years later.

Eventually, after renouncing violence, the Brotherhood was allowed to become active again as a popular religious movement. It also integrated itself into the Egyptian government as a conservative Islamic political party. Although the writings of al-Banna and Qutb continue to inspire its members, the elements of its most radical past appear to have been largely inherited by other newer groups, not the least of which is AL QAEDA, the movement led by Saudi Arabian terrorist Osama bin Laden (b. 1957). Bin Laden's primary contact with the Brotherhood has come from his association with leaders of the Islamic Jihad, including Ayman Al-Zawahiri, who sits on Al Qaeda's Majlis-e Shura (consultative council), and other leaders like Abd al-Salam Faraj and Sheikh Omar Abdel Rahman, who contributed substantially to the Islamic perspective that bin Laden has come to hold, which legitimizes terrorist activity. Through the 1980s, Rahman carried the Brotherhood's banner, calling for an Egyptian state ruled by Islamic law. Under government pressure, he left Egypt and relocated to the United States. He is now in a U.S. prison after being convicted of charges related to the 1993 bombing of the World Trade Center.

In 1987 the Brotherhood supported the merger of several Egyptian political parties to form the Labour Islamic Alliance. Members of the Brotherhood won more than half of the Alliance's sixty seats in the national legislature, the People's Assembly, which has over four hundred members. However, in 1995, the Mubarak government again moved against the group on the grounds that it gave support to violence-prone militants. The government closed Brotherhood offices and confiscated its assets. In 1999 twenty of its most senior leaders were arrested, and as the twenty-first century begins its public presence in Egypt has come to an end.

At the same time, the Brotherhood claims to exist in more than seventy countries. People sympathetic to the Brotherhood in England maintain a Web site, <http://www.ummah.org.uk/ikhwan/>. In other Middle Eastern countries, it has had very different histories. It has been most successful in Jordan, where since 1989 it has developed a political party, the Islamic Action Front, and has been very active in national politics under its spiritual leader Abdul Majeed Thneibat. The Syrian branch, on the other hand, was brutally suppressed by the Syrian army following its involvement in an insurrection in 1982. Some of its members were finally released from prison as part of the celebration of the Syrian president's twenty-fifth anniversary in power, but the group remains marginalized and suspect.

Sources:

- Esposito, John, ed. Voice of the Resurgent Islam. New York: Oxford University Press, 1983.
- Kramer, Martin. "Fundamentalist Islam at Large: The Drive for Power." Middle East Quarterly (June 1996). Posted at <http://www.meforum.org/meq/june96/kramer.shtml>. Accessed November 1, 2001.
- Moussalli, Ahmad S. Radical Islamic Fundamentalism: The Ideological and Political Discourse of Sayyid Qutb. Syracuse, NY: University of Syracuse Press, 1994.
- Qutb, Sayyid. Milestones. Beirut, Lebanon: The Holy Koran Publishing House, 1978.
- Wiktorowicz, Quintan. The Management of Islamic Activism: Salafis, the Muslim Brotherhood, and State Power in Jordan. Albany: State University of New York Press, 2001.

Muslim World League

The Muslim World League was founded in 1962 as a relief organization working in several predominantly Muslim countries. However, over the years a secondary goal, that of advancing Muslim unity internationally, has come to dominate its program. The league has also devoted considerable time and energy to promoting Islam throughout the world and to defending Muslims, especially in those countries in which they are a minority.

The Muslim World League has its headquarters in Mecca, Saudi Arabia, in a building given by King Fahd bin Abdul Aziz (b. 1923), and the Saudi government supports the work of the league financially. That work is guided by a Constituent Council, composed of sixty-two members—all prominent scholars and thinkers from throughout the Muslim world. The executive branch of the council, the Secretariat-General, is charged with implementing the council's policies. The World Supreme Council of Mosques consists of twenty members representing various Muslim peoples and minority groups plus thirty additional members who seek a "uniformed Islamic interest" derived from the study of the Qur'an and the Sunna (Ways) of the Prophet. The World Supreme Council also strives to gain freedom to propagate Islam in various countries of the world and to preserve Muslim religious endowments (charitable funds). The Islamic Jurisprudence Council is a group of scholars and jurists who study Islamic problems and attempt to suggest solutions based upon their study of the Qur'an, the Sunna, and the consensus of the Muslim scholarly community.

Among the more interesting structures associated with the league is the Commission on Scientific Signs in the Holy Qur'an and Sunna, which was suggested by the World Supreme Council of Mosques. This commission is a body of Islamic scholars who investigate and circulate information on the scientific and natural phenomena discussed in the Qur'an and Sunna in the light of modern science.

The league's headquarters and several of its national chapters sponsor Web sites. It has opened offices in more than thirty countries around the world, including both those in which Muslims predominate and those in which they are a minority. It publishes the weekly World Muslim League Journal.

Address:

Muslim World League
P.O. Box 537
Makkah al-Mukarramah
Saudi Arabia
<http://www.arab.net/mwl/>

Source:

"An Introduction to the Muslim World League." Muslim World League Web site. Posted at <http://www.arab.net/mwl/about.htm>. Accessed July 15, 2001.

Mutima Walowa Wa Mukumbi [Sweet Heart of the Clouds]

Emilio Mulolani Chishimba (b. c. 1921), a Zambian of Bemba ethnicity, founded the movement known as Mutima Walowa Wa Mukumbi (Sweet Heart of the Clouds) in 1951. Sweet Heart represents the mystical experience of God available to believers through Chishimba. Clouds is a double reference to the barren spirituality of Europeans (i.e., white, rainless clouds practicing a male-focused Christianity) in contrast to the fecund spirituality of Africans (i.e., black, rain-bearing clouds practicing a balanced male/female Christianity).

In 1950, fourteen years before Zambian independence, Chishimba, a Roman Catholic lay leader, received a revelation from the Virgin Mary. Her message, which revealed the selection of Chishimba as her representative on earth, upheld God's androgynous nature and announced the Virgin's status as savior for Africa and her seniority over Jesus—revealer of God's male aspect and savior of Europeans—as well as the elevation of Africans over Europeans in world spiritual leadership. Chishimba rejected the bishops' authority, substituted a traditional Bemba meal for the Eucharist, and replaced gendered congregational seating with mixed-gender seating. He encouraged overnight worship gatherings, egalitarian relations between the sexes, and fasting leading to direct encounters with God. The Mutimas separated from the ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH in 1958.

Chishimba taught that a true relationship with God restores the innocence of Eden. He therefore promoted nude baptism. His church supported Simon Kapwepwe's (1922–1980) political message of African isolationism against the internationalism of Dr. Kenneth Kaunda's (b. 1924) postcolonial government. As a result of public outrage over nudity and government fears of internal instability, Chishimba's church was banned in the 1970s; believers were arrested and many followers defected. Chishimba dropped nude baptism but continues to teach its validity in principle. The church is still illegal in Zambia.

The story of Chishimba's birth is a paradigm through which he understands the Bible and the relationship between Africans and Europeans. Chishimba's mother, Chilufya, married a European named Stuart and gave birth to two children. Abandoned by her husband, Chilufya then married a Bemba, by whom Chishimba was born about 1921. Later Chilufya returned to Stuart. Chishimba was given to foster parents because Stuart threatened to drown him.

As Chishimba points out, the story of Rebekah's twins (Genesis 25 and 27) parallels his own. Chilufya, like Rebekah, gave birth to children representing two nations. The biblical prediction that the elder sibling would serve the younger supports the idea that Chishimba must usurp the spiritual position of the pope, while Africa must become the epicenter of Christianity. Jesus' words—"The first will be last" (Luke 13:30)—further confirm this view.

The lunar calendar regulates Mutima holy days. Believers consider the seventh day holy. Worship is influenced by the Catholic mass but venerates the female aspect of God manifested in Mary. Vegetarianism, prayer, and fasting are encouraged. Accepting church teaching, adherence to the Mutima ethical code, and suffering to liberate androgynous souls from gendered bodies all produce salvation. Chishimba is revered as Guide and Parent in whom the female aspect of God resides. He is the final religious authority and the source of all church liturgy.

A laity and celibate clergy comprise the church. The highest clerical rank is that of Apostle, a position open to women. Other church ranks are Disciple, some of whom are celibate while others lead a lay life and may marry more than one wife; Servant, a lay rank with authority over mundane issues at the local level; and Freed One, members without rank. Clergy live in rural and urban communes known as Queen's Villages and are supported by their own labors, lay contributions, and church-managed businesses. The church is administered hierarchically at the national, provincial, and local levels.

The Mutima Church is confined to Zambia and its membership numbers are unknown. Hugo Hinfelaar (1994) estimates the number at five thousand, but church leaders claim the number to be fifty thousand to one hundred thousand.

Gary Burlington

Sources:

- Chishimba, Emilio Mulolani. Kambelenge Nga Ni Mpelwa Ukucushako Amenso Ya Mubili Pa Kumfwa Icafikila Munyinefwe Umo Mu Calo Ca Zambia. N.p.: n.d. (A mimeographed autobiographical account of Chishimba's life; frequently referred to by the first word in the title, Kambelenge, that is, Let Me Read.)
- Garvey, Brian. Bembaland Church: Religious and Social Change in South Central Africa, 1891–1964. New York: E. J. Brill, 1994.
- Hinfelaar, Hugo F. Bemba-Speaking Women of Zambia in a Century of Religious Change (1892–1992). New York: E. J. Brill, 1994.

Myanmar

Myanmar (formerly Burma) is a multicultural country of 47 million people. Approximately 70 percent of the country is Ba-ma (Burmese), and the remaining 30 percent are members of various other ethnic communities. Official statistics claim 90 percent are Buddhist, 5 percent Christian, 3 percent Muslim, 0.5 percent Hindu, and 1 percent continue to follow pre-modern traditional faith. More likely estimates are 12 percent Muslim and 3.5 percent Hindu. In either case, demographic certainty about religion is difficult because many people do not want to tell the censor the truth lest it work against them. Burma is a troubled religious plurality, and combined with the latent, simmering power of a huge Buddhist sangha (monks order), three hundred thousand strong, this makes religion a serious political issue.

Important religious minorities notwithstanding, Buddhism is clearly the largest and most influential faith in Myanmar. Most Burmese and many from the minority communities are Theravada Buddhist. The religion has had a presence in Burma for over one thousand years, and it coexists alongside a rich indigenous, apotropaic, magical animism (nat and spirit worship). Early Pyu and Mon Buddhist kingdoms in lower Burma were replaced with the rise of Pagan, a golden age of Buddhism lasting from 800 to 1300 C.E., followed by the Ava period (to 1550), the Toungoo (to 1750), and finally the Konbaung (dissolved by the British in 1885).

The British ignored Buddhism, leaving the still-medieval theological and clerical structure ill-equipped to meet modernity and to work out its own destiny. Even so, Buddhism became a potent ingredient of nationalist ambitions, with key figures like the monks U Wissara (d. 1929) and U Ottama (d. 1939) taking leading roles in defying colonial rule in the 1920s and 1930s. The assassination of Bogyoke Aung San (c. 1914–1947) was a crucial tragedy because he alone had worked out a vision for the newly independent nation that brought together the various religio-ethnic constituencies.

The first prime minister of the independent Myanmar was U Nu (1907–1995), a well-meaning ardently pro-Buddhist but somewhat unrealistic leader. Unfortunately, the army (Tatmadaw) used his zeal for religion as an excuse to seize power in 1962. The new government withdrew recognition of Buddhism as the state religion. It also ordered all religions to register with the government. In 1966 the government nationalized all religious schools (except seminaries) and medical facilities, and ordered all foreign missionary workers (mostly Christians) to leave the country.

Attempts by the several military regimes to “purify” Buddhism through reform councils (in 1965, 1980, and 1985)

Status of religions in Myanmar, 2000-2050

Followers	2000		2025	2050
	total	% rate
Buddhists	33,145,000	72.7 1.22	40,018,000	42,203,000
Ethnoreligionists	5,749,000	12.6 0.47	6,977,000	7,500,000
Christians	3,773,000	8.3 2.05	6,382,000	9,215,000
Protestants	2,512,000	5.5 2.10	4,200,000	6,150,000
Roman Catholics	590,000	1.3 1.47	1,050,000	1,500,000
Independents	575,000	1.3 2.60	1,000,000	1,400,000
Muslims	1,076,000	2.4 -0.04	1,250,000	1,350,000
Hindus	893,000	2.0 3.07	1,500,000	2,000,000
Confucianists	676,000	1.5 1.20	1,250,000	1,400,000
Nonreligious	247,000	0.5 1.64	650,000	1,000,000
Chinese folk-religionists	117,000	0.3 -0.07	150,000	185,000
Baha'is	79,000	0.2 3.69	150,000	250,000
Atheists	23,200	0.1 -0.64	45,000	81,000
Sikhs	7,900	0.0 0.43	12,000	17,000
Jains	2,900	0.0 0.78	5,000	7,800
Jews	360	0.0 0.31	500	700
Zoroastrians	260	0.0 0.58	500	800
Total population	45,611,000	100.0 1.19	58,120,000	64,890,000

have brought the sangha under nominal government control. Yet in 1988 and 1990, the sangha showed vital support for the democracy movement, even “overturning the begging bowl” (patta ni kauz za na kan) to prevent the military from making merit, the most crucial Buddhist ritual aim. The present State Peace and Development Council knows that its authority must at least in part be established on its identification with Buddhism. An increasing engagement with the religion for political purposes is evident, with emoluments showered on cooperating monks and public displays of the junta’s religious piety.

Various Buddhist organizations in Myanmar reflect the several schools of thought within the country’s Theravada Buddhism. The largest number identify with the Thudharma, and the Shwegyin and Dwara sects are also important minorities. In the late twentieth century, several Burmese meditation masters, most notably Mahasi Sayadaw (1904–1982), U Ba Kin (1899–1971), and Satya Narayan Goenka (b. 1924), have built large international followings. These have become embodied in such groups as the INSIGHT MEDITATION SOCIETY, the INTERNATIONAL MEDITATION CENTRES, and the VIPASSANA INTERNATIONAL ACADEMY.

Of the minority faiths, Hinduism retains a close connection with Buddhism, despite serious pogroms against Indian expatriates in the past. Most of the remaining Hindus are descendants of immigrants from Tamil, Bengali and Telegu-speaking parts of India.

Christianity is chiefly represented by the ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH and an assortment of Protestant denominations linked with the Myanmar Christian Council. Christianity continues to grow, in part through natural increase and because of missionary success among the hill tribes. The first Christian missionaries entered the country in the sixteenth century. Representatives of the CHURCH OF ENGLAND came in 1825 and the result of their activity is now manifest in the CHURCH OF THE PROVINCE OF MYANMAR, created in 1970. Of the various Protestant and Free Churches that opened work through the nineteenth and twentieth centuries, that of the American Baptists attained legendary status as a landmark of the Protestant missionary movement. The MYANMAR BAPTIST CONVENTION now has almost five hundred thousand members, but a total Baptist affiliation is estimated at one million.

Islam in Myanmar is comprised of three distinct constituencies, all largely Sunni: the distressed and persecuted Rohingyas in the Arakan region on the Bangladeshi border, the Indian Muslims, and the mixed-marriage Burmese Muslims (called Zerbadees). There is a single Jewish synagogue in YANGON. Established in 1896, it now serves a small community of twenty-five to fifty persons. Taken together, religion is still a commanding force in this country, which has endured so much in recent decades.

Bruce Matthews

Sources:

- Houtman, Gustaaf. Mental Culture in Burmese Crisis Politics: Aung San Suu Kyi and the National League for Democracy. Tokyo: Institute for the Study of Languages and Cultures of Asia and Africa, 1999.
- Mendelson, E. Michael. Sangha and State in Burma, edited by John P. Ferguson. Ithaca, NY: Cornell University Press, 1973.
- Sarkisyanz, Emmanuel. Buddhist Backgrounds of the Burmese Revolution. The Hague: Martinus Nijhoff, 1965.
- Spiro, Melford E. Buddhism and Society: A Great Tradition and Its Burmese Vicissitudes. Berkeley and Los Angeles: University of California Press, 1982.

Suu Kyi, Aung San. Freedom from Fear and Other Writings. London: Penguin, 1991.

Yegar, Moshe. The Muslims of Burma: A Study of a Minority Group. Wiesbaden, Germany: Otto Harrassowitz, 1972.

Myanmar Baptist Convention

Baptist were the first Protestants to enter Burma (since 1989 known as Myanmar). The mission work actually began when Adoniram Judson (1788–1850), who had arrived in India under the auspices of the Congregationalist organization the AMERICAN BOARD OF COMMISSIONERS FOR FOREIGN MISSIONS, converted to the Baptist faith and upon his arrival in Calcutta was rebaptized by a British Baptist. Judson settled in India but was forced out by the authorities and in 1813 relocated to Rangoon (now Yangon). He eventually received the support of the American Baptists; in fact, his work became the occasion for the formation of the Triennial Convention (now a constituent part of the AMERICAN BAPTIST CHURCHES IN THE U.S.A.), through which American Baptists built their international missionary endeavor.

Judson set out to master the Burmese language and produced the first Burmese grammar and later the standard Bible translation. The British Baptists in India gave Judson a printing press in 1816, which allowed him to found the Baptist Mission Press. Judson would go on to publish the Bible in four additional languages.

Growth really began in 1828 with George Boardman (1801–1831) and his wife, Sara Hall Boardman, who began work with Ko Tha Byu, a convert from among the Karen people. The three soon had a flourishing work among the Karen. Work was later developed among the Zomi and Kachin. Members were also received among the Burmese and the Shan. To assist the mission, the Burman Theological Seminary (1936) and the Karen Theological Seminary (1845) were opened. These various missions were combined in 1865 into the Burma Baptist Convention. Among the first activities of the convention was the founding of Rangoon Baptist College, later Judson Baptist College. In 1880 representatives from the Karen people in Burma began work among their people residing in Thailand, resulting in the establishment of the Karen Baptist Convention in that country.

Early in the twentieth century, Dr. Gordon S. Seagrave (1897–1965) began his career as a medical missionary in the northeast part of the country near the Chinese border. The story of his work under relatively primitive conditions was told in two books, Tales of a Waste Basket Surgeon (1938) and Burma Surgeon (1943).

The mission suffered greatly through the mid-twentieth century. During World War II, the Japanese invasion led to the wide-scale destruction of property, which was slowly rebuilt after the war. In 1965 church property was again lost when all of the church's schools (including Judson College) and medical facilities were nationalized. In 1966 missionary personnel were deported, though the leadership and administration of the convention had already been turned over to the Burmese in the 1950s. The loss of the missionaries, however, seemed to spur growth. In 1963 there were around 216,000 members. In the next thirty years the membership more than doubled. In 1995 the convention reported more than 500,000 members.

The Convention is a member of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES, the BAPTIST WORLD ALLIANCE, and the Myanmar Council of Churches.

Address:

Myanmar Baptist Convention
143 Minye Kyawswa Rd., Lanmadaw
P.O. Box 506
Yangon
Myanmar

Sources:

- Seagrave, Gordon S. Burma Surgeon. New York: W. W. Norton, 1943.
- . Waste-Basket Surgery. Philadelphia: Judson Press, 1931.
- Tegenfield, Herman G. A Century of Growth: The Kachin Baptist Church of Burma. South Pasadena, CA: William Carey Library, 1974.
- Torbet, Robert G. Venture of Faith. Philadelphia: Judson Press, 1955.

Myōchikai Kyōdan

Myōchikai Kyōdan, a Japanese new religion, was founded by Miyamoto Mitsuru (1900–1984) in 1950. Along with her husband, Kōhei, Miyamoto joined REIYŪKAI in 1934 and practiced rigorously. In 1945 Kōhei died, and in 1950 Mitsuru broke away and became independent of Reiyūkai, taking three hundred followers with her.

Myōchikai Kyōdan has a sanctuary in Chiba Prefecture, and a religious pilgrimage to this sanctuary is important in the movement's practices. The main ceremonies held there are the Kaishu (Miyamoto Mitsuru) ceremony in the spring and the Daionshi (Miyamoto Kōhei) ceremony in autumn. Myōchikai Kyōdan values the Lotus Sutra, ancestor worship, and repentance.

The current leader of Myōchikai Kyōdan is Miyamoto Takeyasu. Its headquarters are in Tokyo, Japan. In 2000 it reported 1,070,813 members.

Address:

Myōchikai Kyōdan
3-3-3 Yoyogi
Shibuya-ku, Tokyo 151-0053
Japan

Keishin Inaba

Source:

- Inoue, Nobutaka, et al., eds. Shinshūkyō Kyōdan Jinbutsu Jiten. Tokyo: Kobundo, 1996.

Namibia

Namibia, a sparsely populated and largely desert land on the southwest coast of Africa, between Angola and South Africa, was inhabited by some eleven different African peoples in the nineteenth century, when Europeans began to finally turn their attention to it. The more populous groups were the Hereros, the Ovambos (making up approximately half of Namibia's population), and the Demaras.

Germany, which came late to the European quest for colonial glory, annexed Namibia in 1884. In the meantime, explorers found it to be wealthy in a variety of minerals, from diamonds to uranium. Following World War I, Germany was stripped of Namibia, which became a trust territory assigned to South Africa by the League of Nations. Then, after World War II, South Africa announced its intentions to completely annex the land, thus beginning a struggle with the United Nations, which had supported Namibia's independence. In 1968 the UN declared South Africa's presence in Namibia to be illegal, but was unable to act as the major Western powers supported South Africa. In the mid-1960s, Namibians organized the South West African People's Organization (SWAPO) to work for their liberation. A twenty-five-year struggle ensued that often erupted into warfare.

Finally, as changes in the region were undoing the apartheid regime, South Africa finally released its hold on Namibia. In November 1989 the first free elections were held, and SWAPO delegates were swept into power. Independence was formally proclaimed in 1990. The new leadership moved to deal with the effects of apartheid with government actions including the improvement of living conditions for the native Africans and the strengthening of literacy programs.

Religion in Namibia today is in many ways shaped by the country's colonial past. Traditional religions do survive among several of the Namibian peoples, especially the Ambo, the Herero, the Heikum, and the !Kung (or San) bushpeople. Although each group has its own particular religious community, they all share some common beliefs, such as that in a supreme God who is very distant. Because this deity is removed from everyday life, attention in the traditional religions in Namibia tends to be directed to more immediate realities, ancestor spirits, and magical operations. Traditional religion continues to decline in the face of Christian evangelism and is now followed by less than 5 percent of the population.

Christianity was introduced to Namibia by European missionaries. The LONDON MISSIONARY SOCIETY made an initial survey of Namibia early in the nineteenth century and was a catalyst in establishing the RHENISH MISSION,

Status of religions in Namibia, 2000-2050

Followers	2000			2025	2050
	total	%	rate
Christians	1,592,000	92.3	2.47	2,122,000	2,707,000
Protestants	820,000	47.5	2.43	1,090,000	1,350,000
Roman Catholics	306,000	17.7	3.04	450,000	650,000
Independents	187,000	10.8	2.83	300,000	450,000
Ethnoreligionists	103,000	6.0	2.44	139,000	180,000
Nonreligious	19,400	1.1	4.25	55,000	100,000
Baha'is	8,900	0.5	3.15	18,000	30,000
Jews	2,000	0.1	2.19	3,500	4,800
Muslims	340	0.0	5.36	700	1,500
Total population	1,726,000	100.0	2.49	2,338,000	3,023,000

which began missionary work among the Herero people in 1842. The mission, supported by members of the EVANGELICAL CHURCH IN GERMANY with a combined Lutheran and Reformed background, was soon joined by a second mission established by the Finnish Lutheran Mission. These two missions grew side by side, working with different African peoples. A third Lutheran group, serving only white members, arose in the twentieth century.

At the end of the nineteenth century the ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH began to build a presence in Namibia, in the area immediately south of the Angolan border, among the Ovambo people. Originally assigned to the Diocese of Cimbebasia (Angola), the mission was designated a prefecture in 1892. The Vicariate of Windhoek was established in 1926, becoming a diocese in 1994. A second missionary thrust in the southern part of Namibia was organized as the Vicariate of Keetmanshoop in 1909. Keetmanshoop was also elevated to diocese status in 1994.

Following the takeover of Namibia by South Africa, South Africans moved into the land and brought with them a number of churches, the largest of which was the DUTCH REFORMED CHURCH, whose membership was limited to whites though it had an all-black affiliate church. The METHODIST CHURCH OF SOUTH AFRICA established a black mission, and approximately half its membership was black. The UNITED CONGREGATIONAL CHURCH OF SOUTHERN AFRICA developed a membership that was 95 percent black. The APOSTOLIC FAITH MISSION OF SOUTH AFRICA, a Pentecostal church, has had a small black membership in what has remained in a predominantly white church.

The Anglicans, though the first Christian group in Namibia, did not develop a mission until the 1920s. Their work among the Ambo people was originally assigned to the Diocese of Damaraland (South Africa), but more recently a Diocese of Namibia within the CHURCH IN THE PROVINCE OF SOUTH AFRICA has been erected, with its bishop stationed at Windhoek.

AFRICAN INITIATED CHURCHES began to appear in Namibia with the successive waves of unrest among members of the Rhenish Mission, the majority of whom were Herero. In 1946 a group left the Rhenish Mission and affiliated with the AFRICAN METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH, a church based in the United States with affiliated work in South Africa since 1892. Then in 1955 a large group of Herero left to found the Oruano (Community). Then in the 1960s that church split into three factions.

Since World War II, a spectrum of Protestant churches have appeared, many if not most having grown from South African churches establishing congregations in Namibia. There are also a few independent churches from Botswana, on Namibia's western border, such as the Spiritual Healing Church and the Apostolic Spiritual Healing Church, as well as the Moshoeshoe Berean Bible Readers' Church from Lesotho. Both the CHURCH OF JESUS CHRIST OF LATTER-

DAY SAINTS and the JEHOVAH'S WITNESSES are also active in Namibia.

A Council of Churches in Namibia was organized in 1978. It is now an affiliate council to the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES. The Jewish community in Namibia emerged in the early 1920s, and a synagogue was established in Windhoek in 1924. The several hundred members continue their relationship to the community in South Africa. Namibia has not been considered a major target of Hindu and Buddhist groups, which are very active in South Africa, and support for Islam is minuscule. There are several assemblies of the BAHAI FAITH.

Sources:

Katjavivi, P. H., P. Frostin, and K. Mbuende, eds. Church and Liberation in Namibia. London: Pluto, 1990.
 Nammbala, S. V. V. Church and State in Namibia, 1806–1989. St. Paul, MN: Luther Northwestern Theological Seminary, 1990.
 ———. History of the Church in Namibia. Lutheran Quarterly, 1994.

Naqshbandiya Sufi Order

The development of the Sufi-tariqa Naqshbandiya can be traced back to Khwaja Abu Ya'qub Yusuf-i Hamadani (d. 535/1140), who has been the key figure for the genesis of Sufi associations in Transoxiana. After Hamadani's death, his tariqa split into two silsilas from which the two major tariqas in Transoxiana emerged: the Yassawiya, members of which were mainly Turkic-speaking nomads, and the Khwajagan, which found its followers predominantly among the Persian-speaking urban population. The seventh in the line of the Khwajagan Shaykhs was Shah Baha' ad-din-i Naqshband (d. 791/1389), the founder and name patron of the Naqshbandiya tariqa. His shrine is situated at Car Bakr near Bokhara in today's Republic of Uzbekistan.

Because of the urban social background of the Naqshbandiya, the interpretations of the normative Islamic texts made by the traditional Islamic scholars, the ulama, had a substantially greater influence on the population than, for instance, on the Yassawiya. This perhaps explains why the doctrines of the Naqshbandiya are often described as "pietistic," compared to those of other tariqas from a rural or even nomadic milieu. For example:

1. An absolute prerequisite for the knowledge of the esoteric dimension of Islam is, as it is in the teachings of the most Sufi tariqas, the conscientious execution of the daily religious duties (including fasting in the month of Ramadhan and performing the hajj).

2. Above that, the silent dhikr (dhikr-i khufiya), the remembrance of God by contemplative seclusion (khalwa), plays the central role. The aim is not, as in many other tariqas, to cut off the driving soul (nafs) by ascetic practices, but to purify the heart (qalb) by the way of love (ishq) in daily active life (hayat al-'amal).

By stressing a much wider interpretation of the Qur'anic term amal than was usual, the Naqshbandiya emphasized a much stronger inner-worldliness than most Sufi tariqas in the Middle Ages. This provided it with an immense potential for the reformation of the society (tajdid). Therefore it seems quite understandable that, from the late Timurid period (late fifteenth century) onward, the Naqshbandiya became ever more concerned with social, economic, and political issues. In fact, it appears that the Naqshbandi saw himself as mediator between the ruler and the ruled, whose task it was to make sure their actions corresponded with the normative requirements of the Qur'an and the prophetic Sunna. This political intervention of the Naqshbandiya in Transoxiana is connected to individuals such as 'Abd ar-rāhman-i Jami from Herat (d. 898/1492), his disciple 'Ali Shir Nawa'i (d. 910/1501) and, above all, Khwaja 'Ubayd-Allah Ahrar of Samarqand (d. 895/1490).

The third of the major doctrines concerning Naqshbandi practice is the projection of love (rabitat al-'ishq) by the adept on his spiritual master in order to obtain the experience of spiritual unity as a substitute to the ultimate entering into God (fana'). In the context of the third doctrine one must refer to the role played by the monistic philosophy of Muhyi d-din b. 'Arabi (d. 638/1240). His famous philosopheme of the "Oneness of Existence" (wahdat al-wujud) allows to equal knowledge of the creation with knowledge of the creator. The Naqshbandiya doctrine of the rabitat al-'ishq seems to be based on this theory of Ibn 'Arabi. Therefore his texts became quite popular among Naqshbandis by the fifteenth century, as we can see from statements made by such important figures as the above mentioned Jami, Nawa'i, and Khwaja Ahrar.

In the fifteenth century, with Khwaja Ahrar, the center of the Naqshbandiya shifted from Bokhara to Samarqand. He became a close confidant of the Timurid ruler and thus carried out mediation in armed conflicts. By this the Naqshbandis spread into the territory ruled by the last Caghatayid princes and were finally among the followers of Babur (d. 937/1530) to India, where Babur established the dynasty of the Mughals. The "Baburnama" gives the names of some of those Naqshbandis, among them two spiritual successors (khalifa) of Khwaja Ahrar.

Not much is known about the Naqshbandiya in India from that time until the appearance of Muhammad Baqi'-billah "Bi-rang" Sima'iqi (d. 1012/1603) in imperial Delhi, where he established a convent (khanaqah) and gathered a huge number of disciples around him. As an indirect khalifa, or successor, of Khwaja Ahrar, he openly advocated the idea of the wahdat al-wujud against the already known idea of the "Oneness of Testimony" (wahdat ash-shuhud) in India, which was developed by the Kubrawiya Shaykh 'Ala' ad-din Simnani (d. 736/1336).

Baqi'-billah's most famous and effective disciple was without doubt Shaykh Ahmad Faruqi Sirhindi (d. 1079/1668), who was later given the epithet "Renewer of the Second Millennium" (mujaddid-i alf-thani). By rigorously advocating the idea of the wahdat ash-shuhud, found primarily in his epistles ("Maktubat-i imam-i rabhani"), Sirhindi introduced a new doctrine into the Naqshbandiya and was thus responsible for the divide of the tariqa: The debate over the wahdat al-wujud issue became essential in doctrinal terms, and its advocates constituted the Ahrariya silsila whereas the followers of Sirhindi formed the Mujaddidiya silsila.

With the decline of the Mughal Empire in the eighteenth century, representatives of both silsilas tried to focus on more pragmatic issues and thus to reunite the Naqshbandiya. A central figure in this context was Shah Wali-Allah Dihlawi (d. 1176/1762), whose influence on the various political and intellectual trends in India is still undiminished. Dihlawi tried to resolve the debate over wahdat al-wujud and wahdat ash-shuhud by describing them as referring to two different objects: wahdat ash-shuhud designating an epistemological viewpoint while wahdat al-wujud is an ontological category. More important for Shah Wali-Allah Dihlawi the unity of the Muslim umma to become able to act.

Nevertheless, the two silsilas are still separate today. Although the Mujaddidiya began in the eighteenth century to establish itself in Transoxiana, where it is connected with names such as Sufi Allahyar Bukhari (d. 1136/1723), and in the Middle East and in Anatolia by mediation of the Indian Murtasa az-Zabidi (d. 1791), the Ahrariya can be found in many south Asian socioreligious movements and institutions that developed in the nineteenth century: for example, the Dar al-'ulum at Deoband, the Nadwat al-'ulama' in Lucknow, or the movement of the Ahl-i hadith.

Jan-Peter Hartung

Sources:

- Fusfeld, Warren E. "The Shaping of Sufi Leadership in Delhi: The Naqshbandiyya Mujaddidiyya 1750–1920." Ph.D. dissertation, University of Pennsylvania, 1981.
- Garborieau, Marc, A. Popovic, and Th. Zarccone, eds. Naqshbandis. Cheminements et situation actuelle d'un ordre mystique musulman. Istanbul: Institut Français d'Études Anatoliennes, 1990. (Most essays are in English.)
- Hermansen, Marcia K. The Conclusive Argument from God: Shah Wali Allah of Delhi's Hujjat Allah Baligha. Leiden: Brill, 1995.
- Paul, Jurgen. Doctrine and Organization. The Khwājagān/Naqshbandīya in the First Generations after Bahā'uddīn. Berlin: Das Arabische Buch, 1998.
- Rahman, Fazlur. Selected Letters of Shaykh Ahmad Sirhindi. Karachi: Royal Books, 1968.

Nation of Islam (Farrakhan)

In 1930 a charismatic salesman named Wallace Fard travelled the streets of Detroit, visiting homes and preaching a new religious doctrine that combined Islam and black nationalism. Within three years, he built a substantial following with a cohesive organizational structure that included a school and a security force. From this foundation, the Nation of Islam developed. Despite suffering many challenges over the course of the twentieth century, the Nation continues to be a powerful force in the United States today.

Minister Louis Farrakhan stresses a point as bodyguards look on during an address at University of Pittsburgh, November 14, 1985. (Bettmann/Corbis)

Fard disappeared in the early 1930s. His appointed successor, Elijah Muhammad (1897–1975), taught that Fard was Allah incarnate and that he was his Messenger. White Americans were identified as white devils, and black Americans as Allah's chosen people. The Muslims anticipated an imminent "Fall of America," which would see White America destroyed and black Americans rising to their rightful place as world leaders.

In Message to the Blackman in America, Muhammad directed the Muslims to adhere to a strict moral code and attain a "knowledge of self." They were encouraged to follow strict dietary regulations, which included prohibitions on pork and a "slave diet" (foods such as corn bread and black-eyed peas), and they were forbidden to smoke, drink alcohol, take drugs, and gamble. Muhammad also encouraged racial pride. Many members took the surname "X" to symbolize both the mysterious origins and the power of the black American community.

In the late 1940s, the Nation converted Malcolm Little. He adopted the name Malcolm X (1925–1965) and rapidly advanced through the movement's ranks. He was a minister and recruiter; among those he converted were Cassius Clay and Louis Farrakhan. A rift developed between Muhammad and Malcolm in the early 1960s, which eventually led to Malcolm's expulsion from the Nation. He converted to orthodox Islam and founded a new movement, but was assassinated on February 21, 1965.

Elijah Muhammad led the Nation until his death in 1975. His son Wallace succeeded him, and following trends that emerged late in Muhammad's leadership, rapidly moved the Nation toward orthodox Islam. Although most Muslims accepted these changes, some did not. Among those who did not was Louis Farrakhan. He left in 1978, returned to Elijah Muhammad's original doctrine, and reestablished the Nation of Islam.

Farrakhan's charisma, coupled with his attention to proselytism, saw the movement grow rapidly. Several events soon made him notorious with the American public. In 1984, when Jesse Jackson ran for the leadership of the American Democratic Party, Farrakhan declared that he would, for the first time, register to vote, and encouraged his followers to do the same. His vocal support for Jackson, however, brought media attention to anti-Zionist themes in his rhetoric. As well, during this period the Nation received several large financial gifts from Libya (including one loan for five million dollars). By the close of the 1980s, however, Farrakhan had moved the Nation closer to orthodox Islam, observing Friday prayers and Ramadan and encouraging members to engage in Quranic study.

In 1995, Farrakhan once again came to public attention when he orchestrated the Million Man March on Washington, a controversial “day of atonement” for black American men. The march highlighted Farrakhan’s status as a leader in the larger black American community, but the event was criticized by many, including moderate African American leaders, feminists, and Jewish community leaders.

In the late 1990s, Farrakhan and the Nation worked toward reconciliation with Wallace Muhammad (now known as Warith Deen Muhammad) and the more orthodox Muslim American Society, a notable milestone in Farrakhan’s move toward orthodox Islam. Many scholars suggest that this trend will culminate within the next decade, with Farrakhan moving the Nation’s followers to traditional Islam, much as Wallace Muhammad did in the mid-1970s.

The Nation of Islam has its headquarters in Chicago. The mosque had been used by Elijah Muhammad for many years. It has never made its membership numbers public, but it should be noted that it has mosques across the United States, as well as in Canada and the United Kingdom. It continues to publish The Final Call, a newspaper that publicizes its doctrine (available online at <http://www.finalcall.com>) and comments on current religious and political events.

Address:

Nation of Islam
7351 South Stony Island Ave.
Chicago, IL 60649
<http://www.noi.org>

Martha Lee

Sources:

- Farrakhan, Louis. Back Where We Belong: Selected Speeches by Minister Louis Farrakhan. Philadelphia: PC International Press, 1989.
- . A Torchlight for America. Chicago: FCN Publishing, 1993.
- Gardell, Mattias. In the Name of Elijah Muhammad, Louis Farrakhan and the Nation of Islam. Durham, NC: Duke University Press, 1996.
- Lee, Martha. The Nation of Islam, An American Millenarian Movement. Syracuse, NY: Syracuse University Press, 1996.
- Muhammad, Elijah. History of the Nation of Islam. Cleveland, OH: Sektarius Publications, 1994.

Turner, Richard Brent. Islam in the African-American Experience. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1997.

Nation of Yahweh

The Nation of Yahweh is a relatively small group that continues the tradition of Black nationalism within the African American community. It was founded by Hulon Mitchell Jr., better known by his religious name, Yahweh ben Yahweh (b. 1935). Raised as a Pentecostal, as a young man he joined the Nation of Islam and rose to become the leader of a mosque. However, he left the mosque and began to call African Americans together as Black Israelites, the followers of Yahweh.

Drawing themes from the teachings of Black Jews that had appeared throughout the twentieth century in the United States, Yahweh ben Yahweh taught that there was only one God, that his name was Yahweh, that he had black woolly hair, and that he had sent his son, Yahweh ben Yahweh, to the African American people as their savior and deliverer. He identified African Americans as the true lost tribes of Israel, and upon accepting Yahweh, members accepted the last name “Israel” as a means of rejecting their slave past. Those who oppose God, of whatever color, are the devil. Though Yahweh had a special love for black people and a special animus for white people as the oppressor, ultimately individual white people could be saved by faith in Yahweh ben Yahweh.

Through the 1980s, the Yahwehites spread across the United States, their white clothing becoming a familiar sight in the African American community. By the end of the decade, centers had been established in thirty-seven cities and members owned a number of businesses associated with the movement. Movement leaders saw themselves as establishing a united moral power within the African American community that would support voter registration, black-owned businesses, health education, scholarships for college, better housing, and strong family ties. They opposed the spread of drugs in the community.

However, during the late 1980s, stories began to circulate that leaders in the group had engaged in multiple acts of violence and murder, especially in the early 1980s. These rumors surfaced in 1986 after some people were shot during an eviction procedure in an apartment house owned by the Yahwehites. Then in 1988, a former member confessed to four murders and implicated Yahweh ben Yahweh and other leaders in twelve others. Yahweh ben Yahweh and several other members were arrested and in the early 1990s convicted in federal court of conspiracy to murder. They received lengthy sentences, though Yahweh ben Yahweh was released in 2001.

The group has survived, but it is no longer the growing enterprise that it had become at the time of the trial that brought down its founder. The Nation of Yahweh sells cassette tapes and books by Yahweh ben Yahweh through its Web site.

Address:

Nation of Yahweh
c/o The Abraham Foundation
P.O. Box 530883
Miami, FL 33153-0883
<http://www.yahwehbenyahweh.com/index02.htm>

Sources:

Freedburg, Sydney P. Brother Love: Murder, Money, and a Messiah. New York: Pantheon Books, 1994.
Hamill, Pete. "Mr. God Raises Hell." Esquire 115 (1991): 34.
"Nation of Yahweh." New Religions Web Site. Posted at <http://religiousmovements.lib.virginia.edu/nrms/nyah.html>. Accessed September 15, 2001.

National Association of Congregational Christian Churches

During the Puritan era in the seventeenth century, believers who agreed upon particulars of Reformed theology disagreed upon church polity, some opting for congregationalism and other the presbyterian system. While Presbyterians dominated in England, Congregationalists settled in the American colonies and became the favored elite in New England through the eighteenth century and into the nineteenth.

In the twentieth century, the Congregational churches took a leading role in the ecumenical movement and demonstrated their leadership with two important mergers. The first was in 1931 with congregations from the Christian Church, a church with a congregational polity from the Free Church tradition. Then in the 1950s the Congregational Christian churches moved toward union with the Evangelical and Reformed Church, a church with which they shared many theological affinities but one that had a presbyterian organizational background. At stake was congregational ownership of parish property versus some centralized ownership based in presbyteries and synods.

In 1957 the union was consummated and the UNITED CHURCH OF CHRIST came into being with mixed elements of congregational and presbyterian polity. Among the Congregationalists were individuals who feared and rejected any compromise on the congregational polity they had come to enjoy. Anticipating the 1957 union, they met in 1955 in Detroit and formed the National Association of Congregational Christian Churches. That meeting had been sponsored by two anti-union organizations, the League to Uphold Congregational Principles and the Committee for the Continuation of Congregational Christian Churches.

The National Association was formed as a fellowship of autonomous congregations that cannot and does not make pronouncements binding upon the local churches. However, it does undertake cooperative programs that extend the ministry of the local churches. Such programs have been initiated in ministerial career development, Christian education at all levels, church extension, and communications. One important area of cooperation has been in home and foreign missions. The association has supported the development of new congregational churches in the United States and missions in twelve countries in different parts of the world.

The National Association is a member of the INTERNATIONAL CONGREGATIONAL FELLOWSHIP.

Address:

National Association of Congregational Christian Churches
8473 S. Howell Ave.
P.O. Box 1620
Oak Creek, WI 53154-0620

Sources:

Burton, Malcolm K. Destiny for Congregationalism. Oklahoma City, OK: Modern Publishers, 1953.
Kohl, Manfred Waldemar. Congregationalism in America. Oak Creek, WI: Congregational Press, 1977.

National Association of Free Will Baptists

The National Association of Free Will Baptists continues the tradition of Arminian theology that has divided the Baptist community over the centuries. BAPTISTS emerged as one element in the larger Puritan community, the English phase of the spread of Reformed theology. Reformed theology, as originally stated by John Calvin (1509-1564), had emphasized the sovereignty of God and hence the predestination of those who would be saved by Christ's saving act. As the Reformation became established in Holland, Dutch theologian Jacobus Arminius (1560-1609) developed a Reformed theology that left a place for the human response in faith to God's grace. Arminian theology left the door open for the role of human free will in Protestant theology.

In the United States, the institutionalization of Free Will Baptist theology came in 1727 with the organization of a church at Perquimans, Chowan County, North Carolina by Paul Palmer (d. c. 1770). Other churches were subsequently formed, and in 1752 some sixteen churches associated together in a yearly meeting. As this growth continued, they formed a general conference in 1827. A statement of belief was issued in 1834. A similar development of Free Will Baptists occurred in the northern states, and an 1896 Triennial Convention included congregations from across the South and as far north as Ohio. In 1911 the Free Will Baptists in New England merged into the North Baptist Convention (now the AMERICAN BAPTIST CHURCHES IN THE U.S.A.). Meanwhile, a number of disconnected Free Will congregations in the West (Texas, Nebraska, Kansas, Oklahoma, and Missouri) joined together as the General Co-operative Association of Free Will Baptists. They established headquarters in Tecumseh, Oklahoma, where they opened a school.

In 1935 the general conference in the South united with the General Co-operative Association to form the National Association of Free Will Baptists. Like most Baptists elsewhere, the new association championed the autonomy of the local congregations while providing an effective instrument for cooperative action, especially in church growth, education, and missions.

Free Will Baptists had existed in Canada since the early nineteenth century. They came together in 1832 as the Christian Conference Church, later renamed the Free Christian Baptists. In the 1870s, George W. Orser, one of the ministers, began to call for a new biblical church order. He opposed formal education of ministers and the paying of ministerial salaries. He eventually withdrew from the Free Christian Baptists and formed the Primitive Baptist Conference of New Brunswick, Maine, and Nova Scotia. The church eventually centered on Hartland, New Brunswick, where it had formed its own educational institution, the Saint John Valley Bible College. In 1981 the church joined with the National Association of Free Will Baptists as its Canadian conference.

The association has its headquarters at Antioch, Tennessee. It supports four colleges. In 1997 it reported 210,000 members in some 2,500 congregations in the United States with an additional twelve congregations in the associated Atlantic Canada Conference. Although foreign missions had begun in the nineteenth century, the formation of the association allows a more effective mission program to develop. Currently, work is supported in Spain, Panama, Cuba, Brazil, Uruguay, France, the Ivory Coast, India, and Japan. The national associations from around the world are now united in the International Association of Free Will Baptist Churches (<http://www.ifofwbc.org/>).

Free Will Baptists are unique among Baptist bodies as one of the groups that supports three ordinances: baptism, the Lord's Supper, and foot washing (a practice derived from their reading of the Bible, John 13:4–17). The national association remains theologically conservative. It joined the National Association of Evangelicals for a period but eventually withdrew. It has not associated with the BAPTIST WORLD ALLIANCE.

Address:

National Association of Free Will Baptists
P.O. Box 5002
Antioch, TN 37011–5002
<http://www.nafwb.org/>

Sources:

Cox, Violet. Missions on the Move. Nashville, TN: The Woman's National Auxiliary Convention, 1966.

Davidson, William F. The Free Will Baptists in America. Nashville, TN: Randall House Press, 1985.

Picirilli, Robert E. History of the Free Will Baptist Associations. Nashville, TN: Randall House Publications, 1976.

National Baptist Convention of America

The National Baptist Convention of America emerged out of a controversy regarding the newly formed National Baptist Convention, U.S.A. When the latter convention formed in 1895, it followed the organization of the American Baptists, allowing a considerable amount of autonomy to its boards and agencies. Among these were the National Baptist Publishing Board, a structure incorporated prior to the formation of the convention. While serving as the convention's publishing arm, R. H. Boyd (1843–1922), the head of the board, increasingly operated independently and even contrary to the wishes of the convention.

The issues between the board and the convention culminated in 1915 with a court case that established the independence of the board. Following the ruling, Boyd and his supporters withdrew from the convention and formed the National Baptist Convention of America. There were no doctrinal issues at stake, and the two conventions developed parallel programs. Through the rest of the century, the National Baptist Convention of America would grow, but it never rivaled its parent body.

The new convention aligned itself with the Lott Carey Baptist Foreign Mission Convention, through which the convention would focus its foreign missionary activity. That cooperation ended in the 1940s, and the convention organized its own foreign missions board.

The strength of the convention has been the publishing concern, both the literature it prints and the leadership it provides. However, the issue of its independence arose again in the 1980s and led to a split and the formation of the National Baptist Missionary Convention in 1989. Again, no doctrinal issues were at stake in the controversy.

The National Baptist Convention of America is organized congregationally, and the convention facilitates fellowship and cooperation between affiliated congregations. The convention supports missionary work in Jamaica, Panama, and several African nations. It cosponsors two seminaries with the National Baptist Convention, U.S.A. The convention is a member of the BAPTIST WORLD ALLIANCE and the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES.

Address:

National Baptist Convention of America
7145 Centennial Blvd.
Nashville, TN 37209

Sources:

Fitts, Leroy. A History of Black Baptists. Nashville, TN: Broadman Press, 1985.

Pelt, Owen D., and Ralph Lee Smith. The Story of the National Baptists. New York: Vantage Press, 1960.

National Baptist Convention of Mexico

The National Baptist Convention of Mexico traces its roots to the organization of the first Baptist congregation in Mexico on January 30, 1864, in Monterrey. The congregation was formed by James Hickey, then in Mexico as an agent of the American Bible Society. This church would reproduce itself six times over the remainder of the decade. One member of the original church, Thomas Westrup, served as a missionary of the American Baptist Home Missionary Society (now a constituent part of the AMERICAN BAPTIST CHURCHES OF THE U.S.A.). John Westrup, Thomas's brother, organized three churches in northern Mexico during the late 1870s. In 1880 he was hired as a missionary by the SOUTHERN BAPTIST CONVENTION's Foreign Mission Board, but he was assassinated before the year was out. However, through the rest of the century, both Baptist organizations sent more than fifty missionaries into Mexico. The first regional conventions were organized in 1884 and 1885.

In 1903 representatives from congregations of both American groups and some independent congregations affiliated with the National Sunday School Convention met in Mexico City and formed what became the National Baptist Convention of Mexico. Among its first tasks was the election of delegates to the 1905 gathering of the Baptist World Association.

The Baptist work in Mexico spread until 1910 but was decimated during the Revolution (1910–1917), when both property and lives were lost. Meetings of the convention were suspended in 1912. The secular government established in 1917 nationalized church property, restricted church worship, and allowed only native Mexicans to lead congregations. Only fifty-four churches were represented at the 1919 meeting of the convention. Although the convention revived its evangelism in Mexico City and along the Rio Grande valley, the Southern Baptists extended its missionary activity independently, especially in the creation of several institutions. In 1977 two of these, a seminary in Mexico City and a hospital in Guadalajara, were turned over to the convention. The Southern Baptists also agreed to work in a coordinated fashion with the convention. By 1993 the Southern Baptist work was fully integrated into the convention, which that same year was registered with the government as a separate religious organization.

In the mid-1990s the convention reported 666,000 members in 888 churches. It publishes a periodical, La Luz Bautista, and supports two seminaries. It has extended its work to include ten of the different language groups of the native inhabitants of Mexico, which is a predominantly Spanish-speaking country. It also began missionary work in Honduras. The two American bodies continue to support the work of the convention, and other groups such as the North American Baptist Convention and the Baptist General Conference have added their support of personnel and money. At the same time, through the decade following World War II, a variety of other Baptist groups have launched independent missionary efforts, that of the fundamentalist BAPTIST BIBLE FELLOWSHIP INTERNATIONAL being the most successful. The convention is a member of the BAPTIST WORLD ALLIANCE.

Address:

National Baptist Convention of Mexico
Vizcainas Oriente No. 16 Ote.
060080 Mexico, D.F.
Mexico
<http://www.bautistas.org.mx/> (in Spanish)

Source:

Patterson, Frank W. A Century of Baptist History in Mexico. El Paso, TX: Baptist Spanish Publishing House, 1979.

National Baptist Convention, U.S.A.

The National Baptist Convention, U.S.A., the largest African American religious body in the world, is rooted in the efforts of American Baptists to evangelize African Americans throughout the nineteenth century. The first African American Baptists had appeared during the colonial era, and in 1758 the first congregation was formed in Virginia. A number of Blacks in the northern states were attracted to the church, and independent congregations began to form in communities with a significant African American presence. However, it was not until the 1830s that large numbers of Black people were attracted to the church. The first African American Baptist association was formed in Ohio in 1934.

Prior to the American Civil War, most African American Baptists were members of the several predominantly White Baptist bodies, and after the war the American Baptists (now the AMERICAN BAPTIST CHURCHES IN THE U.S.A.) made special efforts to cultivate Black Baptist membership. However, although many Blacks were happy to remain a part of the larger American Baptist Fellowship, others rejected their exclusion from the highest levels of the denomination and began to create institutions controlled by African Americans.

A variety of organizational attempts led in 1880 to the formation of the Baptist Foreign Mission Convention of the U.S.A. (generally accepted as the founding date of the National Baptists). A structure for congregational fellowship, the American National Baptist Convention, was formed in 1886. The Baptist National Educational Convention emerged in 1893. These three bodies merged in 1895 to form the National Baptist Convention, U.S.A. (Many African Americans continued to affiliate with the American Baptists and today constitute approximately one-third of that body's membership.)

The new denomination followed the organizational pattern of the American Baptists, with the semiautonomous boards that served the cause of Christian education and foreign missions relating directly to the affiliated congregations. Controversy arose immediately, and those who wished to continue a relationship with the American Baptists in the area of missions withdrew to form the independent Lott Carey Baptist Foreign Mission Convention.

The next major controversy to hit the convention occurred because of its failure to create a publishing house. Publishing for the convention was primarily handled by the National Baptist Publishing Board, which had been incorporated separately under the leadership of R. H. Boyd (1843–1922). He began to operate independently of the directions offered by the convention, and in 1915 the board's independence was upheld in court. The trial became the occasion for Boyd and his supporters to found the rival NATIONAL BAPTIST CONVENTION OF AMERICA.

Under the leadership of Rev. Elias Camp Morris (1855–1922), however, the National Baptist Convention, U.S.A., recovered from its losses and moved forward with a newly founded, convention-controlled publishing house and went on to eclipse the older Methodist denominations in membership. The Morris era was followed by lengthy presidential terms for Lacey K. Williams (1871–1940), D. V. Jemison (1875–1954), and Joseph H. Jackson (1900–1990).

During Jackson's lengthy tenure (1953–1982), opposition to his philosophy of civil rights developed with the rise of Martin Luther King Jr., a young Baptist pastor in Alabama who had become the center of a movement centered on nonviolent confrontation with the authorities and the demand for the immediate end to racial segregation in the American South. King's approach ran counter to Jackson's belief in the gradual elimination of discriminating structures. Those most supportive of King and most opposed to Jackson's continued domination of the convention left in 1961 to form the PROGRESSIVE NATIONAL BAPTIST CONVENTION OF AMERICA.

Jackson's lengthy tenure finally ended in 1982, and he was succeeded by Theodore J. Jemison. The election of Jemison, an activist in the Civil Rights Movement in Louisiana, represented a change of direction for the formerly conservative convention. Jemison also led the National Baptists into finally building a national headquarters building in Nashville, Tennessee, though the official headquarters of the convention continues to be centered in the church pastored by the president.

In the 1990s, the convention was traumatized when its president, Henry Lyons, was arrested and convicted of embezzling church funds. In 1999, the current president, William Shaw, pastor of White Rock Baptist Church in Philadelphia, assumed office and immediately moved to reorganize the convention's financial affairs to pay off the debt incurred by Lyons and to create a system that would prevent such occurrences in the future.

The National Baptist Convention, U.S.A., is led by its president but is organized congregationally. There are various estimates of the membership of the convention's churches, ranging from 1 million to 7.5 million. It supports one college, two universities, and four theological seminaries. The convention is a member of the BAPTIST WORLD ALLIANCE and the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES.

Address:

The National Baptist Convention, U.S.A.
5240 Chestnut St.
Philadelphia, PA 19139–3488
<http://www.nationalbaptist.org/>

Sources:

- Fitts, Leroy. A History of Black Baptists. Nashville, TN: Broadman Press, 1985.
Jackson, Joseph H. A Story of Christian Activism. Nashville, TN: Townsend Press, 1980.
Pelt, Owen D., and Ralph Lee Smith. The Story of the National Baptists. New York: Vantage Press, 1960.

National Evangelical Synod of Syria/National Evangelical Union of Lebanon

Protestantism entered the territory of the former Ottoman Empire early in the nineteenth century, when Reformed missionaries from the United States and the British Isles established a mission. Missionaries working in what is today Lebanon and Syria were recognized by the Ottoman authorities in 1848. That year, an initial congregation was established in Beirut. Throughout the rest of the century additional missions were initiated by various Protestant bodies from France, Switzerland, Denmark, and Holland.

Following the fall of the Ottoman Empire, the present state of Lebanon was carved out of the empire's former territory. At that time, the National Evangelical Synod of Syria and Lebanon was formed by the association of several small presbyteries that had been established in Lebanon. In 1959 the synod assumed responsibility of a number of the missions that had been established in Lebanon and Syria. Worship in these churches is primarily in Arabic.

In the 1990s the synod reported approximately eight thousand members in thirty-six congregations. It has a presbyterian polity and directs a ministry through its many schools and medical facilities. The synod is a member of the WORLD ALLIANCE OF REFORMED CHURCHES, the Middle East Council of Churches, and the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES.

The synod is closely related to the National Evangelical Union of Lebanon. The original congregation in Beirut became a center around which a small number of congregations gravitated. These congregations made their relationship official in the early 1960s with the formation of the National Evangelical Union of Lebanon. In contrast to the synod, the union is organized with a congregational polity. In the 1990s it reported nine congregations and 2,000 members. The union is a member of the WORLD ALLIANCE OF REFORMED CHURCHES and the Middle East Council of Churches.

The union and the synod are related to each other through the Supreme Council of the Evangelical Community in Syria and Lebanon, which also includes the Armenian Evangelical churches in the Near East. The members of the council support the Near East School of Theology in Beirut. All three churches suffered during the civil war (1975–1991), which led to the destruction of much church property and the migration of many members to the United States and Australia.

Addresses:

National Evangelical Synod of Syria
P.O. Box 70890
Rabieh, St. 34
Antelias
Lebanon

National Evangelical Union of Lebanon
P.O. Box 11 5224
Al Kanissa Al Injiliah
Beirut
Lebanon

Source:

Chopourian, G. H. The Armenian Evangelical Reformation: Causes and Effects. New York: Armenian Missionary Association of America, 1972.

National Presbyterian Church in Mexico

The National Presbyterian Church in Mexico dates to the beginning of presbyterian work in Mexico by the United Presbyterian Church of North America (now an integral part of the PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH [U.S.A.]) in Mexico City following the granting of religious freedom in the country in 1857. Other churches soon followed, including the Presbyterian Church in the U.S. (now also a part of the Presbyterian Church [U.S.A.]), the Congregationalists (now part of the UNITED CHURCH OF CHRIST), and the Associate Presbyterian Church. The work of the United Presbyterians spread south and east from Mexico City toward Yucatán.

The first presbytery was established in Zacatecas in 1883, and others soon followed. The previous year a theological seminary was opened in Mexico City. What became the National Presbyterian Church began in 1901 when the United Presbyterian Church and the Presbyterian Church in the U.S. decided to unite their work in Mexico. The process of developing indigenous leadership that had begun with the founding of the seminary was greatly accelerated by the adoption of a new constitution by Mexico in 1917, which allowed only native Mexicans to lead congregations. In 1920, with the assistance of the Reformed Church in America, the National Presbyterian Church expanded into Chiapas.

In the years immediately after World War II, the church experienced two schisms. A local controversy led to the formation of the Independent Presbyterian Church in 1947. Then in the 1950s, Rev. Carl McIntire (b. 1906), a fundamentalist Presbyterian from the United States, brought to Mexico his fight against the modernist tendencies he saw invading mainstream Presbyterianism and found some support among Mexican Presbyterians. In the early 1950s his supporters formed the National Conservative Presbyterian Church.

The National Presbyterian Church in Mexico has become a part of the world ecumenical community, joining both the WORLD ALLIANCE OF REFORMED CHURCHES and the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES. Closer to home, in 1995 it joined with the Presbyterian Reformed Church and the Associate Presbyterian Reformed Church to create the Alliance of Presbyterian and Reformed Churches in the Republic of Mexico.

The church has a presbyterial polity and its general assembly is the highest legislative body. It recognizes the Heidelberg Catechism, the Canons of the Synod of Dort, the Westminster Confession, and the Belgic Confession and statement it authored on its doctrinal perspective. In the 1990s it reported 1.2 million members in forty-eight hundred congregations. The seminary in Mexico City has now been joined by five additional ministerial training schools.

Address:

National Presbyterian Church in Mexico
Arenal 36
Col. Agri. Chimalistac
01050 Mexico, D.F.
Mexico

Source:

Bauswein, Jean-Jacques, and Lukas Vischer, eds. The Reformed Family Worldwide: A Survey of Reformed Churches, Theological Schools, and International Organizations. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans Publishing Company, 1999.

National Spiritualist Association of Churches

The National Spiritualist Association of Churches (NSAC) is the oldest and largest organization of churches to emerge out of the nineteenth-century Spiritualist movement in the United States. As SPIRITUALISM developed, it was given structure by a number of state Spiritualist associations. The movement was seen by many of its earliest exponents as having a “scientific” purpose—to demonstrate life after death—rather than as a new religion. However, in the decades after the Civil War, Spiritualist churches were founded and many began to advocate a Spiritualist approach to theology. Thus, in 1893, a number of leading Spiritualists, including Chicago medium Cora L. Richmond (1840–1923) and two former Unitarian clergymen, James M. Peebles (1822–1922) and Harrison D. Barrett (1863–1911), founded the National Spiritualist Association (later adding the words of Churches to the title). They initially drew support from some of the state associations and a few of the prominent camp meeting establishments. Among the reasons for forming such a national movement was the need to attack fraudulent mediumship, which many had seen as harming the movement.

In 1899, the association adopted a six-article Declaration of Principles, later expanded to nine articles. These articles expressed the authors’ faith in life after death as being a proven fact, demonstrated by the phenomena of Spiritualism. The NSAC has tended to focus upon mental phenomena, that is, mediumship, rather than the physical phenomena that was so much at issue in charges of fraud directed at the larger Spiritualist movement. The association also called for a moral life based upon the biblical Golden Rule, “Do unto others as you would have them do unto you.” Drawing upon contemporary science, the Declaration of Principles looked upon Nature as an expression of God or infinite intelligence, and it noted that happiness is a result of following Nature’s laws. It affirmed the existence of both physical and spiritual laws.

The NSAC has generally taken a negative stance toward two issues of importance to Spiritualists. First, it has not upheld the belief in reincarnation that is so staunchly advocated by the THEOSOPHICAL SOCIETY (ADYAR) and some Spiritualists early in the twentieth century who accepted the idea from competing organizations. Second, Spiritualists have carried on a lengthy debate over the relation of Spiritualism to Christianity. Many individual Spiritualists see the experiences that are common in the movement as similar to experiences described in the Bible. However, the association as a whole sees Spiritualism as distinct from Christianity, though they draw a distinction between primitive Christianity (with which they feel an affinity) and contemporary Christianity, which they see as a very different reality.

The association has a fraternal connection to the National Spiritualist Church of Canada in Ontario and Quebec but has only cursory relationships with the Spiritualist movement in Great Britain and has been at odds with Spiritualists in France and Brazil where reincarnation is widely accepted. In the early 1990s, the NSAC reported 144 member congregations. Ten state associations and eleven camps are affiliated with the NSAC.

Address:

National Spiritualist Association of Churches (U.S.)
Morris Pratt Institute
11811 Watertown Plank Rd.
Milwaukee, WI 53226
<http://www.nsac.org/>

Sources:

Holms, A. Campbell. The Fundamental Facts of Spiritualism. Indianapolis, IN: Stow Memorial Foundation, n.d.
Judah, J. Stillson. The History and Philosophy of the Metaphysical Movements in America. Philadelphia: Westminster Press, 1967.
One Hundredth Anniversary of Modern American Spiritualism. Chicago: National Spiritualist Association of Churches, 1948.

Native American Church

In the early 1890s many of the traditional Indian ways of worship were being banished. However, at that time, the longstanding ritual use of the cactus plant peyote (Lophophora williamsii) was formalized into new ceremonies. Under the inspiration of the medicine men Quanah Parker (c. 1845–1911; parents: Comanche, White) and John Wilson (c. 1840–1901; parents: Delaware, Caddo-French), two different traditions of the new peyote religion, which today is called the Native American Church (NAC), diverged into distinct practices known as the Comanche Half Moon (also Little Moon and Way of the Sioux) and the Wilson Big Moon (also Cross Fire and Old Way). Both ritual forms fuse ancient Mexican, Plains Indian, and Christian themes. The Wilson Big Moon variant typically omits the water ceremonies that Quanah Parker had established, including the ritual water-call and the blessing of people with water, celebrating an old Indian belief that water is a life-giving substance.

Peyote grows naturally only in north-central Mexico and in a limited area on the dry, rocky hills north of the Rio Grande near Laredo, Texas. It contains at least fifty-seven alkaloids, including the psychoactive alkaloid mescaline. Since the 1880s peyote from this region was cut and dried for shipment to communicants in the United States. Probably the Carrizo culture, which once occupied the area that extends from Laredo to the Gulf of Mexico, was instrumental in the early development of peyote meetings. Carrizo peyote rituals that were observed in 1649 included all-night dancing around a fire, but without the tepee or lodge used today. The western neighbors of the Carrizo, the Lipan Apache, seem to have transformed the Carrizo ceremony before teaching it to the Kiowa, Kiowa-Apache, and Comanche.

The Half Moon ritual appears to have been formalized by the Comanche in the 1880s. The Big Moon rite was also formalized about 1880. It spread between 1890 and 1908 among the Shawnee, Caddo, Seneca, Delaware, Quapaw, Potawatomi, and above all the Osage, and it was carried and transformed by different local “prophets,” such as Jonathan Koshiway (b. 1886; father: Sauk and Fox, mother: Otoe) and John Rave (c. 1855–1917; Nebraska Winnebago). From the Kiowa, the Comanche, and the Caddo, the new religion spread to the eastern Great Basin, in Colorado, by 1896. It appeared throughout the Great Basin and into southern Canada beginning in the 1910s.

In 1918 the State of Oklahoma repealed an earlier territorial ban against the peyote sacrament and granted a charter authorizing the NAC. Peyotists in other states received similar authorization, and a national church was formed in 1934–1944. In 1945–1955 the NAC was organized into the NAC of Oklahoma and the NAC of North America. The main purpose of those incorporations was to legalize peyote as a sacrament.

The NAC ethical code constitutes a way of life, which is called Peyote Road. This ethic has four main parts: brotherly love, care of family, self-reliance, and avoidance of alcohol, in addition to truthfulness, economic self-sufficiency, praying for the sick, and praying for peace. There is no formal teaching or learning of the rituals through books, schools, or lectures. In the Christian element, which is mostly confined to Siouan-speaking groups, members are free to interpret Bible passages according to their own understanding.

From its earliest days the ceremony has consisted of an all-night prayer meeting in a tepee, lodge, or hogan around a crescent-shaped mound of earth, a sacred fire, and a special peyote button, today called Grandfather Peyote or Chief. Roadman, Cedar Chief, and Drummer Chief sit together opposite the door. The Fireman sits on the opposite side of the circle next to the door. Around the sacred elements in the center of the lodge, the water drum, gourd rattle, and staff are passed while peyote songs are sung, prayers are offered, sacred tobacco is smoked, cedar is burned, and peyote is ingested. At midnight the ritual is interrupted by special songs and a bucket of water is brought in to be blessed, mostly by the Fireman. At dawn there is another water ceremony, as the Water Woman carries holy water into the meeting along with her prayers. The morning water is followed by a ritual breakfast of corn, water, fruit, and meat, prepared by women. The singing, drumming, and praying last all night (ten to fourteen hours). Finally the morning sun is greeted with hands raised to heaven and thanks given to the Creator.

In the first part of NAC history, women were usually not allowed to take part in the ritual. Yet the importance of male and female complementarity is reflected in NAC myth and ritual. It is widely believed that being inside the tepee represents being inside the womb of the Mother, and the drum is the sound of the fetal heartbeat. According to many peyote origin myths, this religion was brought to the Indians by a woman, called Peyote Woman, and it is kept by men. In Navajo peyotism the cactus itself is referred to as Female Medicine (‘azee’ ba’áád) or Mother (shimá ‘azee’).

For some, the NAC serves as a bridge between the ancient and modern systems of belief. Praying in peyote meetings appears to have much of the psychological flavor of the old vision quest. The NAC has often been bracketed with the Ghost Dance religion, which also taught the value of peaceful intertribal relations. (Although many other authors have repeated this idea, first set forth by Shonle (1925), historical documents establish that Peyotism had become an active ritual before Wovoka had directed the first Ghost Dance about 1889.) However, claims for the therapeutic effect of peyote are controversial, although several published reports have attempted to determine whether peyote used in the ritual of the NAC is effective in the treatment of alcoholism.

After 1965, the ceremonial use of peyote by Indians was protected by federal regulation. Although twenty-eight states had by then enacted laws in conformance with the federal regulation, twenty-two states had not done so. In 1990 the Supreme Court prohibited the use and possession of peyote for all Americans. A 1995 law provided an exemption, declaring that although possession of peyote and its derivatives is illegal in the United States, Native Americans may use it for religious purposes.

The NAC has no professional paid clergy. Beyond the Roadmen, who lead the meetings, there are official leading positions for chairmen and the president of the NAC. The church is organized into regional, state, and national groups throughout North America. The members belong to some seventy Native American nations. In the continental United States, every state west of the Mississippi has at least one chapter; in all there are eighty chapters.

The NAC is the most widespread religion currently practiced by American Indians. By 1930, it was estimated that half the Indian population belonged to the church. The NAC membership in Navajoland ranged from 12–14 percent in 1951 to 40–50 percent in the 1980s. At the end of the 1960s there were an estimated 250,000 Peyotists, one quarter of all Indians in the United States and Canada. In the 1980s the membership from over fifty North American Indian tribes included some 100,000 adherents. In 1995 there was again a total membership of around 250,000, belonging to over seventy Native American nations.

The spread of Peyotism beyond North America is not known. An example of non-Indian membership can be found in 1968, when a group with young Whites took peyote in a ritual way, which was incorporated in New Mexico as the American Church of God and had a steady membership of some two hundred people. Four-fifths of the group were Whites. The rest were Indians, mostly fifty to seventy years old, from tribes all over the Southwest.

Sources:

The peyote ritual in the United States was first reported by J. Lee Hall in 1886, an Indian agent for the U.S. government. Then in 1890 it was described by James Mooney, who researched peyote meetings among the Kiowa in Oklahoma. The earliest general historical and comparative study was written by Weston La Barre, who traveled to and studied peyote meetings among fifteen tribes in the United States in 1935 and 1936. During the years after 1936 Omer Stewart visited peyote meetings; since 1960 he appeared in court to help defend the right of Peyotists (see, for example, Stewart 1987). Slotkin published a famous fieldwork report in 1956. Fieldwork accounts written by David Aberle (e.g., 1966) specialized in Navajo Peyotism.

Among more recent work, a study about the NAC written by Silvester Brito (1989) is remarkable as he is the first Indian Peyotist to write an academic work about his religion. Peter Gerber (1980) explains the NAC as a crisis movement. In 1996 Huston Smith and the NAC Roadman Reuben Snake compiled testimonies of NAC members showing the church's struggle to survive in the face of constitutional debates. Marika Speckmann (1999) regards the NAC morning water ceremony, comparing it with other Indian rituals and myths.

Aberle, David F. The Peyote Religion among the Navaho. Chicago: Aldine Publishing Company, 1966.

Brito, Silvester. The Way of a Roadman. American University Studies series 21, Regional Studies vol. 1. New York, Bern, Frankfurt am Main, Paris: Peter Lang Publishing, Inc., 1989.

Gerber, Peter. Die Peyote-Religion. Nordamerikanische Indianer auf der Suche nach einer Identität. Zurich: Lang Druck, 1980.

La Barre, Weston. The Peyote Cult. Hamden, CT: Archon Books, 1975.

Shonle, Ruth. "Peyote—Giver of Visions." American Anthropologist 27 (1925): 53–75.

Slotkin, J. S. The Peyote Religion: A Study in Indian-White Relations. Glencoe, IL: The University of Chicago, The Free Press, 1956.

Smith, Huston, and Reuben Snake, eds. One Nation under God: The Triumph of the Native American Church. Santa Fe, NM: Clear Light Publishers, 1996.

Speckmann, Marika. Panindianische Mythologie am Beispiel der Peyote-Religion. Stuttgart: Ibidem, 1999.

Stewart, Omer C. Peyote Religion: A History. The Civilization of the American Indian Series, 181. Norman: The University of Oklahoma Press, 1987.

formed their own independent church, the Native Baptist Church (NBC) in 1888, the same year that a similar church began in Lagos. The German colonial authority moved to restrict its activities.

The first leader of the NBC was Joshua Diboundou, who resigned his leadership in 1910 when he became a polygamist, and was followed by Albert Tobo Diedo. For a brief period (1917–1932), the NBC was in federation with Baptists of the Berlin Mission and the Basel church. Adolph Lotin Samé (1882–1946), a pastor in the Berlin Baptist Mission, was excluded from the pastorate by the missionaries in 1922 because of a "desire to earn money" and his practice of baptizing polygamists. Refusing to comply, Lotin began to reorganize the NBC, which was revived in 1932 with Lotin as its president. He composed many hymns sung to traditional Douala tunes. When he died in 1946, his place was taken by Moise Mathi Mathi, who changed the name of the NBC to Cameroon Baptist Church in 1949. The CBC was almost exclusively Douala and had over five thousand members by 1945, but it was in a state of decline in the 1990s.

Estimates of membership in 2000 ranged between ten and forty thousand. In 1995 the Native Baptist Church was admitted to the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES and began a process of internal reform, including renewing links with the Baptist Missionary Society in Britain.

Address:

Native Baptist Church
B.P. 4237
Douala Akwa
Cameroon

Allan H. Anderson

Sources:

Brutsch, L. R. "Origine et Developpment d'une Église Independante Africaine." Le Monde Non-Chrétien N.S. 12 (Oct.–Dec. 1949): 408–424.

Gifford, Paul. African Christianity: Its Public Role. London: Hurst, 1998.

Joseph, Church, and A. Richard. "State and Society in Colonial Cameroon." International Journal of African Historical Studies 13 (1980): 5–32.

Native Baptist Church [Église Baptiste Camerounaise] (Cameroon)

The English Baptist Alfred Saker (1814–1880) began work in Cameroon in 1845 and continued for the next three decades. Then in 1884, the Baptist churches that had been founded were handed over to the German-based BASEL MISSION when the Germans began their colonial rule, and these churches soon found their local autonomy threatened by the Basel Mission structures. In response, members

Nauru

Nauru is an island republic in the South Pacific, northwest of Australia, home to some eighty-five hundred people. The island was originally settled by Polynesians and Micronesians. It was called to the attention of the West after its initial visit by American whalers, who called it Pleasant Island. In 1888 it was annexed by Germany. At the beginning of World War I, Australia took control of Nauru, a suddenly wealthy land due to the discovery of rich deposits gregational Church, which is still the only Protestant body on the island.

The ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH began work on Nauru in 1902. At present the parishes are part of the Diocese of Tarawa (Gilbert and Ellice Islands). Members of the Anglican Church moved to Nauru following the takeover of the island by Australia. Its work is now a part of the Anglican Church in Aotearoa, New Zealand, and Polynesia.

Besides the three Christian church bodies, there is also a small group practicing the BAHÁ'Í FAITH and some Chinese who follow the ubiquitous Chinese folk religion (a mixture of BUDDHISM, Taoism, and Confucianism).

Status of religions in Nauru, 2000-2050

Followers	2000			2025	2050
	total	%	rate
Christians	8,600	75.0	1.74	13,100	16,800
Protestants	5,800	50.7	1.87	9,200	12,500
Roman Catholics	2,900	25.4	2.15	4,800	6,700
Independents	380	3.3	2.39	900	1,600
Chinese folk-religionists	1,200	10.5	1.70	1,700	2,400
Baha'is	1,100	9.6	2.79	2,000	3,000
Nonreligious	410	3.6	2.51	800	1,200
Buddhists	160	1.4	0.58	200	250
Total population	11,500	100.0	1.89	17,800	23,600

Source:

Petit-Skinner, S. The Nauruans. San Francisco: MacDuff Press, 1981.

Nauru Congregational Church

The Nauru Congregational Church dates to the arrival on Nauru island of Timoteo Tabwia, a Gilbert Islander who had been converted by missionaries of the AMERICAN BOARD OF COMMISSIONERS FOR FOREIGN MISSIONS (ABCFM), an association of American Congregationalists. He was later joined by two Americans, Philip A. Delaporte and Salome Delaporte, who mastered the Nauruan language and translated the Bible. The ABCFM continued their work through the rest of the century, during which time the island was invaded by a variety of European companies who wanted to mine the calcium phosphates discovered in 1900. Then in 1917, the ABCFM turned over its responsibilities in Nauru to the LONDON MISSIONARY SOCIETY, a British Congregationalist group. Through mid-century and following Japanese occupation of the island, Nauruan Congregationalists became closely affiliated with the Congregational Union of Australia.

Although the church had grown significant indigenous leadership during this time, the first Nauruan minister to receive seminary training, Itubwa Amram, was not ordained until 1956. Subsequently, the church became autonomous of the LMS but kept close ties with Australia. It is a member of the International Congregational Council and of phosphate. It would remain under Australian control until 1968, except for a period under Japanese rule during World War II. Australia brought in a number of immigrant workers, including many Chinese, to work the mines.

Nauru, which became independent in 1968, is a most unusual land. It has retained its rural character, and no cities have been built. The mining has made the nation wealthy, paying for all education, medical care, and housing. The influx of immigrants from many places to work in the mines has given the Nauru a very ethnically pluralistic culture. Only about 50 percent of the residents are native Nauruans.

The indigenous religion of the Nauruans survived into the twentieth century but appears to have disappeared in the decades since World War II. Although Germany controlled the island early on, the first missionaries were Congregationalists from the London Missionary Society. They assumed the work of translating the Bible into the native language. Their work grew into the NAURU CONGREGATIONAL CHURCH. As expatriates of other Protestant traditions moved to Nauru, they were welcomed into the Con-the Council for World Mission (the successor body to the LMS). It is also a member of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES and the Pacific Conference of Churches.

Some 65 percent of the island's ten thousand residents are members of the church. The church faces the challenges of diminishing mineral resources, the likely negative economic impact of the ending of mining operations, and the destruction of the majority of the island by the mining operations.

Address:

Nauru Congregational Church
P.O. Box 232
Nauru
Central Pacific

Source:

Bauswein, Jean-Jacques, and Lukas Vischer, eds. The Reformed Family Worldwide: A Survey of Reformed Churches, Theological Schools, and International Organizations. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans Publishing Company, 1999.

The Navajo

The Navajo refer to themselves as the Dine (the People). Originally a seminomadic tribal group of Athapascan stock from western Canada and Alaska, they began settling in the Four Corners region of the American southwest in the eleventh century C.E.

The Navajo world was created when the Diyin-Dine (Holy People) emerged from four underworlds into this, the fifth world. The most important of these Holy People are First Man and First Woman, whose inner natures are, respectively, "Thought" and "Speech." Together they created a world where the most important value is hozho. Most commonly translated as "beauty," hozho encompasses much more—harmony, peace, health, happiness, balance, and the general good.

For the Navajo, life itself is movement, and it is through good intentions and prayer that men and women participate in keeping the world in harmony. Although the original harmonic patterns were created when the Holy People emerged into this world, the Navajo continue to participate in this ongoing creative act by ritually associating themselves with these supernatural beings through thought and speech. Beauty is not something to be discovered in nature, but is to be created, first in the mind as thought and then projected out into the world as speech. Speech is, in fact, the outer form of thought.

The Navajo walk in harmony and beauty through everyday activities that are rich with symbolism. Symbols seem to be the very grounding and basis for thought. Every morning, for example, men and women emerge from their hogans, circular homes, each of which is the symbolic center of the cosmos, to chant the world into existence by identifying themselves with First Man and First Woman. Through such ritual actions as scattering cornmeal in four directions and chanting beauty into the world at sunrise, the Navajo become active participants in creation itself.

An abandoned hogan in the Navajo National Monument Valley in Arizona (M. Barlow/TRIP)

All Navajos should work to create hozho, because then they will live long and prosperous lives, and their communities will continue in harmony. In this context, illness signifies a disruption in the harmonious fabric of living. A sick person, with the assistance of friends and family, will try to determine why their world is out of balance. Perhaps the ill person failed to fulfill some social or religious obligation. Or perhaps, even more seriously, a man returning from war has been polluted by violence and death. In the first instance only a portion of a Blessingway ritual might need to be performed some evening. In the second case a full-blown Enemyway ceremony of three or four days' duration will be needed to restore hozho.

There are at least sixty major ceremonies among the Navajo that preserve and restore hozho. It usually takes several years of apprenticeship for the ritual specialist, called a singer, to master one of these rites. Although both men and women may become singers, only men will prepare the sandpaintings that are usually integral to the ceremonies.

N Nazareth (Nazarite) Baptist Church

Few singers learn more than one major rite, and only very rarely will any individual know more than a couple. Religious knowledge is therefore widely dispersed across the Navajo nation. A singer will diagnose the cause of illness and determine whether the patient should be referred to another singer or undergo this specialist's ceremony. This is critical, because the person will be healed if the diagnosis is correct, if the singer does the ritual properly, and if the wills of the singer and the people taking part in the healing are strong enough to forge a connection between the patient and the Holy People.

The singer creates the conditions for the complete merger of this world and the supernatural world by purifying the patient, most commonly through chanting prayers in a sweat lodge and by overseeing the drawing of a sandpainting in the center of a hogan that recreates the activities of the first Holy People in an action corresponding to the cause and cure of the patient's illness. The nearly naked patient then sits or lies on his or her corresponding deity in the sandpainting. Chanting, shaking rattles, touching, and other symbolic activities effect the cure by restoring hozho to the patient's life.

The Navajo do not fear dying when their cycle of life is completed. But a premature death signals the malevolent activity of sorcerers. The most common way for a sorcerer to harm an individual is to sing the parts of a religious ceremony in reverse order, thereby creating chaos in the place of harmony. Sorcerers must operate in secret because they cannot resist the direct onslaught of a singer's benevolent energy and will be destroyed by their own evil energy when it is returned to them.

Despite the many ways that hozho can be disrupted, the Navajo are remarkably optimistic. As long as they continue to participate with the Holy People in maintaining and creating hozho in the world, they can be assured that their world will be beautiful and harmonious and that they will live healthy and prosperous lives.

According to the 1990 census, there were over 225,000 Navajo, of whom nearly 145,000 live on reservation and trust lands in Arizona, New Mexico, and Utah. Since religious and cultural practices are indistinguishable for the Navajo, most attend rituals at least occasionally, even though some also practice forms of Christianity. Not infrequently, Navajo feel the need to return to a ritual healing when they feel polluted by death. Numerous healing chants, for example, were held for veterans who returned from Vietnam, even those who lived in cities away from the reservation.

Thomas V. Peterson

Sources:

Gill, Sam. Sacred Words: A Study of Navajo Religion and Prayer. Westport, CT: Greenwood Press, 1981.

Reichard, Gladys A. Navaho Religion: A Study of Symbolism. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1974.

Witherspoon, Gary. Language and Art in the Navajo Universe. Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press, 1977.

N Nazareth (Nazarite) Baptist Church/AmaNazaretha (South Africa)

The largest of the AFRICAN INITIATED CHURCHES (AIC) among the Zulu, the Nazareth Baptist Church, better known as the amaNazaretha, Isonto LamaNazaretha, or Shembe Church, was founded by Mdliwamafa Mloyisa (Isaiah) Shembe (c. 1869–1935), who experienced several visions and audible inner voices from an early age. These revelations later told him to leave his four wives and children and to use no medicine, and they showed him people in white gowns who would follow him. He began his Christian life as a Methodist but was baptized in William Leshega's African Native Baptist Church (an early African secession from the White Baptists) in about 1900, by which time he was already a renowned healer. He was ordained an evangelist and began to baptize in the sea near Durban, a practice of many coastal African churches today.

In about 1911, Shembe seceded from the African Native Baptist Church, which did not insist as he did in putting off shoes in worship, leaving the hair uncut, not eating pork, night Communion services with foot washing, and the seventh-day Sabbath. He founded the amaNazaretha and applied biblical references to Nazarites to his followers, who were to obey these laws. In 1916 he established a "high place," called Ekuphakameni, outside Durban, and a holy mountain, Nhlankakazi—sites for annual festivals in July and January, respectively. Shembe wielded great influence in Zulu society. When he died in 1935, a sacred mausoleum was built over his grave at Ekuphakameni, now the headquarters of the church, and his son Johannes Galilee Shembe inherited the leadership.

Upon Galilee's death in 1976, a fierce and acrimonious schism resulted, with court cases, violent clashes, and even killings between the two factions. A small part of the church followed Galilee's son Londa Shembe, who was murdered in 1989 in the midst of the KwaZulu Natal violence, leaving no clear successor. The majority of members followed Isaiah Shembe's other son, Amos Khula Shembe. As an indication of the prestige attained by the Shembe family, Nelson Mandela attended Amos's funeral in 1995. Amos's son Mbusi Vimbeni Shembe, who seems to have retained the loyalty of the vast majority of the church, succeeded him.

The amaNazaretha's great veneration for their founder has been interpreted to mean that he is seen as an African Christ, a mediator between his people and God, standing at the gate of Heaven to admit only his followers. AmaNazaretha greet their leader with the shout "He is holy!" Isaiah Shembe is believed to have "risen from the dead"; he appears to people in revelations and is believed to reveal God to the Zulus; in his name prayer is directed. The criticisms of this movement have centered on the person of Isaiah Shembe and reflect prevalent assumptions made by earlier Western theologians about the AICs.

Evidence from the amaNazaretha themselves, however, is ambiguous. In the opinion of at least some of his followers, Shembe has very extraordinary, perhaps even divine powers, and divine and messianic titles are ascribed to him. But most frequently, amaNazaretha describe Shembe in lesser, more mortal terms. Instead of being a divine Messiah or Black Christ, Isaiah Shembe is a human “servant of the Lord,” “the man sent by God,” who is obedient to the bidding of God.

AmaNazaretha wear white robes and remove their shoes in worship, men are circumcised (a custom not practiced elsewhere in Zulu society), polygyny is allowed, and members may not shake hands with outsiders, eat pork, or take alcohol or medicines. Isaiah Shembe composed over two hundred hymns that are sung by church members, some of which are accompanied by sacred dancing in African dress, and some of which are believed to have been written after his resurrection. Baptism by immersion, communion at night, and foot washing are practiced as sacraments, and the Sabbath is observed as well as the hlonipha (respectful avoidance) rules of the Zulu. The amaNazaretha have greatly influenced the rituals of other Zulu AICs (especially Zionists), and they represent a unique blend of Christianity with the best of Zulu culture.

Allan H. Anderson

Sources:

Anderson, Allan H. African Reformation: African Initiated Christianity in the Twentieth Century. Lawrenceville, NJ: Africa World Press, 2001.

Hexham, Irving, and G. C. Oosthuizen, eds. The Story of Isaiah Shembe: History and Traditions Centered on Ekuphakameni and Mount Nhlankakazi. Lewiston, NY: Edwin Mellor Press, 1996.

Sundkler, Bengt G. M. Bantu Prophets in South Africa. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1961.

Nepal

The modern state of Nepal, strung out along the Himalayas northwest to southeast between Tibet to the north and India to the south, was created by King Prithvi Narayan Shah of Gurkha (1723–1775). He conquered the Kathmandu Valley in 1768–1769 and went on to conquer great swaths of the Himalayan foothills, west as far as Kangra and east to Sikkim. After a war with the British East India Company in 1814–1816, the boundaries of the state of Nepal were fixed pretty much as they are today, Nepal’s autonomy was recognized, and the British right to recruit soldiers within Nepal was also granted.

The Swayambhunath Stupa in the Kathmandu Valley, Nepal (Tibor Bogner/TRIP)

In the period preceding 1769 and the unification of the country as seen by nationalist historians, there were numerous small kingdoms in the hills, ruled by families claiming prestigious Hindu descent from Indian Rajputs, who had supposedly fled to the Himalayas to escape Muslim depredations in Rajasthan. The high mountain region was inhabited by small pockets of Tibetan people, most of whom practiced NYINGMA TIBETAN BUDDHISM. The Sherpas, for instance, were migrants from Tibet who came over the high passes in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries. In the middle hills to the south there were a number of tribal peoples: from west to east, the Magars, Gurungs, Tamangs, Rai, and Limbu, as well as other smaller groups. (These are the names that are used for these groups today; in some cases the names were not current before the nineteenth, or even early twentieth, century and the groups did not see themselves as a distinct group until so classified by the Hinduizing state.) Of these tribal groups, the Magars were the most Hinduized, the Tamangs the most Tibetanized. All of them possessed lively shamanic traditions, which loomed largest among the Rai and Limbu, collectively known as Kirantis. (See separate entry on INDIGENOUS RELIGIONS IN NEPAL.)

In this early period the largely forested plains (Tarai) region was inhabited mainly by tribal groups practicing shifting agriculture, most of whom now think of themselves as Tharus. There were, however, some areas of longer settlement, notably around Janakpur, where the populations were Hindu and culturally similar to those over the border in India. Finally, in the Kathmandu Valley, housing the three cities of Kathmandu, Lalitpur (Patan), and Bhaktapur, the Newar people practiced both Hinduism and BUDDHISM, both strongly influenced by tantric ritualism.

Both of these forms of religion were highly conservative, harking back to forms of religious practice once much more widespread on the subcontinent. Newar Buddhism is of particular significance as the last direct descendant of Indian MAHAYANA BUDDHISM, which was exported and translated to the rest of Asia before dying out in the land of its birth. As the great French Sanskritist, Sylvain Lévi (1863–1935), pointed out, studying Newar Buddhism is a window onto early Indian Mahayana Buddhism and the Hindu-Buddhist context in which it grew up and eventually went into decline. Also present in the Kathmandu Valley since at least the seventeenth century, and perhaps from the sixteenth, was a minority of Muslim traders.

From 1845 to 1951 Nepal was ruled by a hereditary system of Rana prime ministers. State-sponsored Hinduism played a key role in legitimating the rule of the Ranas and in welding their culturally and linguistically diverse kingdom into some form of unity. This sponsorship took the form of encouraging the countrywide observance of major festivals, in particular that of Dasain, focusing on the goddess Durga, which legitimated royal power as well as the position of leading men within patrilineages. It also took the form of introducing a national legal code that gave formal judicial backing to hierarchical Hindu notions of status.

The Rana regime fell in 1951, and after an abortive experiment with parliamentary democracy, King Mahendra (1920–1972) introduced Partyless Panchayat Democracy in 1960. The new constitution declared Nepal a Hindu state.

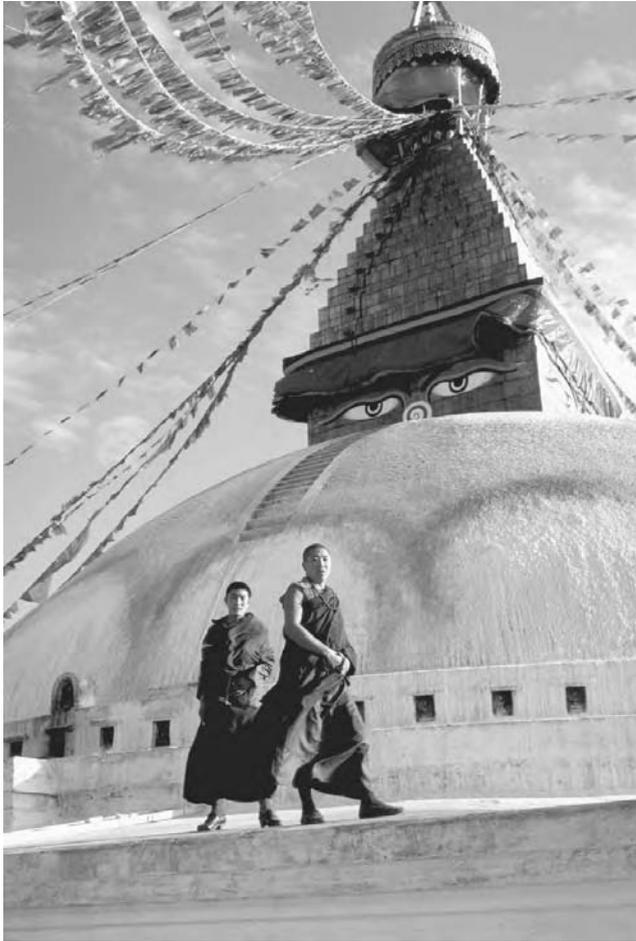

Status of religions in Nepal, 2000-2050

Followers	2000			2025	2050
	total	%	rate
Hindus	18,354,000	76.7	2.38	28,460,000	36,331,000
Ethnoreligionists	2,244,000	9.4	2.52	3,600,000	4,700,000
Buddhists	1,967,000	8.2	2.48	3,150,000	4,100,000
Muslims	926,000	3.9	2.70	1,500,000	2,000,000
Christians	577,000	2.4	4.43	1,525,000	2,392,000
Independents	551,000	2.3	4.35	1,450,000	2,250,000
Protestants	14,600	0.1	6.17	50,000	90,000
Roman Catholics	7,000	0.0	6.88	15,000	30,000
Nonreligious	76,600	0.3	2.47	160,000	300,000
Atheists	16,900	0.1	1.54	30,000	40,000
Chinese folk-religionists	16,700	0.1	1.22	30,000	50,000
Sikhs	8,400	0.0	1.67	15,000	25,000
Baha'is	6,200	0.0	2.11	11,000	17,000
Jains	4,800	0.0	1.82	8,500	15,000
Total population	23,930,000	100.0	2.46	38,010,000	49,320,000

The legal code was modernized and caste was no longer recognized. But there was no positive discrimination on behalf of Untouchables or other disadvantaged groups, as in India, and the entire population was governed by the same civil code. The Panchayat period was one of conscious nation-building. A Hindu cultural identity was a part of this; Buddhism, along with JAINISM and SIKHISM AND THE SANT MAT TRADITION (barely present in Nepal), was declared to be a branch of Hinduism—a point that modernist Buddhist activists were not at all happy to concede.

In the 1930s THERAVADA BUDDHISM was first introduced, initially by Newars, but from the 1980s onward there were increasing numbers of recruits from non-Newar backgrounds. A major expansion of Tibetan Mahayana Buddhism also occurred in Kathmandu and other major towns, sponsored both by Tibetan refugees and by urbanized and upwardly mobile Nepalis from Buddhist backgrounds (Gurungs, Tamangs, and others). Rais and Limbus began to organize in the 1990s around their shamanic indigenous religion, which they named Kirantism. After 1990 and the fall of the Panchayat regime, it became increasingly possible to assert a non-Hindu or even anti-Hindu identity, and many started to do so.

Boudhanath with monks, Nepal (Corel)

The 1991 census, out of a total population of 18.4 million, revealed 86.5 percent Hindus, 7.8 percent Buddhists, 3.5 percent Muslims, 1.7 percent Kirantis, and 0.2 percent Christians. (Buddhist activists have long claimed that the censuses, even that of 1991, underestimate the numbers of Buddhists.) Inducing people to convert remained illegal, but the penalties for conversion were no longer applied. Large numbers began to convert to Christianity, and a number of individuals from non-Muslim backgrounds also converted to Islam. The influx of the modern world and global culture meant that various new religions, such as REIYUKAI and TENRIKYO from Japan, Sai Baba, Rajneesh (now OSHO COMMUNE INTERNATIONAL), S. N. Goenka's VIPASSANA INTERNATIONAL ACADEMY, and many others, established a presence in the capital and elsewhere. The new constitution of 1990 continued to define Nepal as a Hindu state, but this was more controversial than ever before.

David N. Gellner

Sources:

- Bennett, L. Dangerous Wives and Sacred Sisters: Social and Symbolic Roles of High-Caste Women in Nepal. New York: Columbia University Press, 1983.
- Gellner, D. N. Monk, Householder, and Tantric Priest: Newar Religion and Its Hierarchy of Ritual. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1992.
- Gellner, D. N., J. Pfaff-Czarnecka, and J. Whelpton, eds. Nationalism and Ethnicity in a Hindu Kingdom: The Politics of Culture in Contemporary Nepal. Amsterdam: Harwood, 1997.
- Hitchcock, J., and R. L. Jones, eds. Spirit Possession in the Nepal Himalayas. Warminster, UK: Aris and Phillips, 1976.
- Höfer, A. The Caste Hierarchy and the State in Nepal: A Study of the Muluki Ain of 1854. Innsbruck: Universitätsverlag Wagner, 1979.
- Ortner, S. High Religion: A Cultural and Political History of Sherpa Buddhism. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1989.

Nepal, Indigenous Religions in Nepal is the only kingdom in the world to be officially Hindu. Indigenous religions in Nepal, however, deny such uniformity and the numerous tribal groups in the Nepalese hills present complex religious systems, which interrelate the various key influences of Hinduism, Buddhism, spirit possession, shamanism, and “folk” traditions. Each religious system of hill Nepal, whether that of the Rai, Limbu, Tamang, Magar, Sherpa, Gurung, Newar, Sunuwar or of the Indo-Nepalese Damai, Sarki, Bahun or Chetri combines these strands in their own unique way depending, amongst other things, on their location, history, myths and social structure. Studies of religion in hill Nepal have so far tended to focus on the separate strands of Hinduism, Buddhism and spirit possession. They have shown that for many groups there is a particular “tribal” identity and culture represented for example in their myths, rituals and through tribal ritual specialists.

One of the key features of Nepal religions, however, as with South Asian religions in general, is the use of multiple specialists to communicate with the spiritual world, to carry their tribal knowledge, to propitiate divinities, and to act as psychopomp. These specialists are of central significance since for those living in Nepal, the world is teeming with spirits of all kinds—including evil spirits, malevolent divinities, protective ancestors, moody ancestors, and ghosts of the dead (some shared with other groups and some tribal specific), as well as Buddhas and Hindu gods and goddesses. The tribal practitioners tend toward inclusivity in their rituals since omission of any god or spirit is likely to incite the wrath of the neglected. Common ailments such as diarrhea, backache, fever, or indigestion, as well as severe illnesses, are understood in terms of disturbance in the relationship between humans and one or more of these superhuman beings. To counter illness and misfortune people in the hills may seek support from Buddhist lamas and the authority of sacred texts, from Hindu practices, or from the power of shamans and ritual sacrifice. Shamans are the spiritual specialists who are able to enter a trance state at will to communicate with spirits and gods on behalf of the community. They specialize in dreamlike revelatory states; from their journeys into the cosmos they can divine the future or sources of misfortune and illness and return lost souls. Soul flight and spirit possession are prevalent and shamans from any ethnic group may be sought out. The Nepalese term for the magico-religious specialist who is prevalent throughout the Nepalese hills is jhankri. These specialists are usually initially possessed involuntarily by spirits or gods and often undergo prolonged periods of illness before they learn to control the unintegrated dead or malevolent divinities.

Charlotte Hardman

Sources:

Desjarlais, Robert. Body and Emotion: The Aesthetics of Illness and Healing in the Nepal Himalaya. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1992.

Hardman, Charlotte E. Other Worlds: Notions of Self and Emotion among the Lohorung Rai. Oxford: Berg, 2000.

Hitchcock, J.T., and Rex Jones. Spirit Possession in the Nepal Himalayas. New Delhi: Vikas Publishing House, 1976.

Holmberg, David H. Order in Paradox: Myth, Ritual and Exchange among Nepal's Tamang. Ithaca and London: Cornell University Press, 1989.

Macdonald, A. W. The Ethnology of Nepal and South Asia. Kathmandu: Bibliotheca Himalayica, 1975.

Status of religions in the Netherlands, 2000-2050

Followers	2000			2025	2050
	total	%	rate
Christians	12,694,000	80.4	0.46	12,199,000	10,385,000
Roman Catholics	5,450,000	34.5	0.19	5,200,000	4,300,000
Protestants	4,239,000	26.9	0.38	3,900,000	3,300,000
Independents	490,000	3.1	3.60	600,000	700,000
Nonreligious	2,032,000	12.9	0.67	2,222,000	2,200,000
Muslims	595,000	3.8	1.10	762,000	900,000
Atheists	205,000	1.3	1.25	250,000	260,000
Hindus	92,300	0.6	1.44	140,000	160,000
Buddhists	76,400	0.5	4.76	100,000	120,000
Jews	24,900	0.2	-0.41	20,000	15,000
Spiritists	23,200	0.2	2.59	29,000	35,000
Neoreligionists	22,700	0.1	1.29	26,000	32,000
Chinese folk-religionists	6,600	0.0	0.88	14,000	22,000
Baha'is	5,500	0.0	3.78	9,000	13,000
Ethnoreligionists	630	0.0	0.85	1,000	1,500
Zoroastrians	60	0.0	0.96	150	300
other religionists	7,700	0.1	0.93	10,000	12,000
Total population	15,786,000	100.0	0.54	15,782,000	14,156,000

cultural society as well. The country has a wide spectrum of religious groups representative of the variety of the world's religions. Most Dutch citizens accept the presence of the different religions, and a spirit of tolerance exists side by side with a special attachment to the Reformed branch of Christianity.

As early as the Middle Ages, the Low Countries (a former name for the Netherlands, Belgium, and Luxembourg) were a special place in the field of religion. At that time the ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH was the only religion legally allowed. But many heretical movements of all kinds emerged, especially in the many towns. In the fourteenth century the Brethren of the Common Life, with Geert de Groot (1340–1384) as its “founding father,” gained many

The Netherlands

The Netherlands is a typical trade country, and therefore it is an open society; since around 1970, it has been a multiadherents, primarily in the towns and villages. That movement became very popular in many parts of Europe, from Sweden to Spain and Portugal. The Brethren promoted education in elementary schools, a modest way of life for the priests, and a personal faith. Of special importance to the Brethren was the now-classic devotional text The Imitation of Christ, written by Thomas à Kempis (1379/80–1471) and now available in numerous languages.

The Lutheran Reformation drew significant response for a short time, again especially in towns like Amsterdam. But the reformers John Calvin (1509–1564), Ulrich Zwingli (1484–1531), Heinrich Bullinger (1504–1575), and others drew the attention away from the Lutherans. Their views on personal obedience to God and personal responsibility provided a rationale for denying allegiance to the lord of the Low Countries—that is, the king of Spain. The Eighty Years' War (1568–1648) found support from those who believed in a right of resistance when the king or other authorities do not obey the will of God. At the same time, the Bible-oriented humanism of Desiderius Erasmus (1469–1536) and Dirck Coornhert (1522–1590) rose in importance, influencing especially the upper classes, who generally reigned in the cities.

During the post-Reformation era, the Netherlands was relatively tolerant of other beliefs: while churches other than the Reformed Church were officially forbidden, they were in practice tolerated. At that time the Low Countries knew Lutherans; revolutionary Anabaptists, ultimately reorganized as the MENNONITE CHURCH under the guidance of Menno Simons (1496–1559); Roman Catholics; and the (Ashkenazi) Jews.

After the fall of Antwerp in 1585 (Spain occupied that important trade city and harbor), many strict Calvinists took refuge in the Low Countries and became important to the wealth of those regions. In 1598 many Huguenots (French Calvinists) came to this region because of the abolition of the Edict of Nantes. They organized themselves into the Eglises Wallones, now one of the classes of the NETHERLANDS REFORMED CHURCH. At that time another important part of what was to become part of the Dutch population fled from Spain: the Portuguese (Sephardic) Jews built their famous synagogue in Amsterdam. Amsterdam and other towns therefore had two important Jewish groups: the Ashkenazi and Sephardic Jews. The Low Countries became very important through their publishers (Elzevier and others); books forbidden in other countries could be published there. All the foreigners and refugees made the Golden Age of 1600 to 1650 possible.

Through the seventeenth century, the leaders of the country were moderate Calvinists and somewhat tolerant, although most of the common people and the ministers were strict Calvinists. The leaders had been strongly influenced by the mainly English writers of the Nearer or “Nadaer” Reformation Puritans, who were important because of their personal beliefs and emphases upon the necessity of experiencing conversion.

During the seventeenth century the northern Netherlands became for the Roman Catholic Church partes infidelium. Some Catholics disagreed and decided to schism, the result being the founding of the OLD CATHOLIC CHURCH OF THE NETHERLANDS in 1723. Of particular influence in that action was the theological perspective of Cornelius Jansen (1585–1638), a Dutch Roman Catholic bishop whose study of the works of St. Augustine convinced him that the Roman Catholic Church had deviated from orthodox traditions.

The nineteenth century became for the Reformed Church an age of schisms, marked by the Separation movement of 1834 and the movement of Nonconformism in 1886. Both movements nurtured the beginnings of Reformed denominations with their distinct names. Since the Reformation, the Roman Catholic Church had been only tolerated, but in 1853 it was allowed the legal right of its own organization. Since that time of emancipation, the church has constructed a number of new buildings (to replace the churches that had been confiscated in the sixteenth century), and Catholics founded many denominational schools (from primary schools to universities such as Tilburg and Nijmegen), newspapers, and a political party. For the next century, The Netherlands was divided into four sociopolitical and socioreligious groups: the Roman Catholics; the Reformed believers; the socialists; and the so-called common group. Each group had its own broadcasting company, newspapers, and organizations in every possible field. The Roman Catholics and Reformed groups had their own schools.

At the end of the nineteenth century some new religions (primarily Christian sectarian expressions) from North America and other Anglo-Saxon countries attained some popularity, but only in small groups. These were the JEHOVAH'S WITNESSES, the SEVENTH-DAY ADVENTIST CHURCH, several Pentecostal movements (which have led to the formation of many independent communities), and to some extent, the CHURCH OF JESUS CHRIST OF LATTER-DAY SAINTS.

World War II caused dramatic changes in Dutch religious life, and in the subsequent half-century, several dominant trends have been documented: (1) an increase of the process of secularization, so that about 50 percent of the Dutch consider themselves unbelievers, and humanist organizations have begun to appear; (2) Indian religions have gained a noticeable popularity among young adults, and Hindu-based movements (such as the ANANDA MARGA YOGA SOCIETY, the INTERNATIONAL SOCIETY FOR KRISHNA CONSCIOUSNESS, and the movement around Bhagwan Rajneesh) have emerged; (3) So-called youth religious groups, such as the Children of God (now THE FAMILY) and the CHURCH OF SCIENTOLOGY, have grown in popularity; (4) Christian ministers and evangelists from the United States (Billy Graham and others) have achieved great popularity among many independent communities, utilizing a common broadcasting organization (Evangelische Omroep, the Evangelical Broadcasting Company); and (5) There are many new religions originating from the Far East (such as ZEN BUDDHISM and the UNIFICATION MOVEMENT), some arriving by way of the United States and already assimilated into the Western world.

Oud Kerk, the oldest church in Amsterdam (Tibor Bognar/TRIP)

In addition, in about 1948 the process of decolonization began for the Netherlands. First from the East Indies, many so-called South Moluccans came to the Netherlands with their own Christian denominations and forms of worship. Only a very small group of the Moluccans were Muslims. In the 1960s the decolonization of Suriname began. Many Surinamese of many different religions moved to The Netherlands. At that time, many “guest workers” from countries around the Mediterranean migrated to the Netherlands. They became the major source of the current Dutch Islamic community. In the 1980s many refugees found the Netherlands a safe haven. They came (and continue to arrive) from several countries in Africa and Asia. Although some of these refugees are Christians, others are Hindu, Buddhist, and Muslim. Many Chinese refugees—very visible because of the Chinese restaurants now found throughout the country—are adepts of Confucianism and the unique Chinese mixture of Daoism and Buddhism. African and Asian Christians have formed tight communities that provide essential social contacts and a range of services. They have also developed an active program to re-Christianize the Dutch people, whom they see as having lost their original belief.

The Dutch government allows all religions and spiritual perspectives to build their own places of worship, and the Buddhists, Hindus, and Muslims have their own (small) broadcasting organizations modeled on the larger ones sponsored by Catholic and Reformed believers. For many centuries the Dutch people have provided an ongoing example of toleration in the midst of the world's growing religious pluralism.

E. G. Hoekstra

Sources:

- Brienen, T. De Nadere Reformatie: Beschrijving van haar voornaamste vertegenwoordigers. Zoetermeer: Boekencentrum, 1986.
- De Jong, O. J. Nederlandse kerkgeschiedenis. 3d ed. Nijkerk: Callenbach, 1983.
- De Vries, Theun. Ketters: Veertien eeuwen ketterij, volksbeweging en kettergericht. Amsterdam: Em. Querido, 1982.
- Hoekstra, E. G., and M. H. Ipenburg. Wegwijs in religieus en levensbeschouwelijk Nederland: Handboek religies, kerken en stromingen. 3d ed. Kampen: Kok, 2000.

Jongeneel, J. A. B., R. Budiman, and J. J. Visser, eds.

Gemeenschapsvorming van Aziatische, Afrikaanse en Midden— en Zuidamerikaanse christenen in Nederland: Een geschiedenis in wording. Zoetermeer: Boekencentrum, 1996.

Knippenberg, Hans. De religieuze kaart van Nederland: Omvang en geografische spreiding van de godsdienstige gezindten vanaf de Reformatie tot heden. Assen/Maastricht: Van Gorcum, 1992.

Michman, Joseph, Hartog Beem, and Dan Michman. Pinkas: Geschiedenis van de joodse gemeenschap in Nederland. Ede/Antwerpen: Kluwer, 1985.

Schaeffer, Hein, ed. Handboek godsdienst Nederland. Amersfoort: De Horstink, 1992.

Stoutenbeek, Jan, and Paul Vigeveno. Joods Nederland: Een cultuurhistorische gids. Amsterdam: Em. Querido, 1989.

Netherlands Antilles

The Netherlands Antilles consists of two sets of islands on opposite sides of the Caribbean Sea tied together by their relationship to the Netherlands. One group, located off the coast of Venezuela, consists of Curaçao and Bonaire. The other group, located between Anguilla and Antigua consists of Saba, St. Martin, and St. Eustatius islands. The total population today includes some 150,000 residents. The original inhabitants of Curaçao and Bonaire, the Caiqueti people, were enslaved by the early Spanish explorers and deported to Hispaniola. The original inhabitants of St. Martin and St. Eustatius met a similar fate.

The Dutch took Curaçao from the Spanish in 1634. After receiving Bonaire in the Treaty of Westfalia in 1648, the Dutch began to repopulate the islands with enslaved Africans. Slavery was not abolished until 1863. Economically depressed over several generations, the islands came alive when refineries were built to handle the oil being produced in Venezuela.

In 1954, the islands were granted local autonomy. Later a move was afoot to grant the islands complete independence, but in 1986 Aruba, which had been part of the Antilles,

Status of religions in the Netherlands Antilles, 2000-2050

Followers	2000			2025	2050
	total	%	rate
Christians	205,000	94.4	1.35	241,000	243,000
Roman Catholics	151,000	69.6	1.28	171,000	170,000
Protestants	23,000	10.6	1.36	26,000	26,000
Marginal Christians	6,400	3.0	1.81	11,000	15,000
Nonreligious	6,200	2.9	4.20	9,200	14,000
Spiritists	1,900	0.9	1.66	2,800	3,200
Buddhists	1,100	0.5	2.39	1,600	2,000
Jews	810	0.4	1.43	800	800
Baha'is	580	0.3	3.77	660	880
Hindus	450	0.2	1.73	600	800
Muslims	420	0.2	1.67	800	1,000
Chinese folk-religionists	320	0.2	0.12	200	200
Atheists	140	0.1	3.20	200	300
other religionists	180	0.1	1.61	300	400
Total population	217,000	100.0	1.45	258,000	267,000

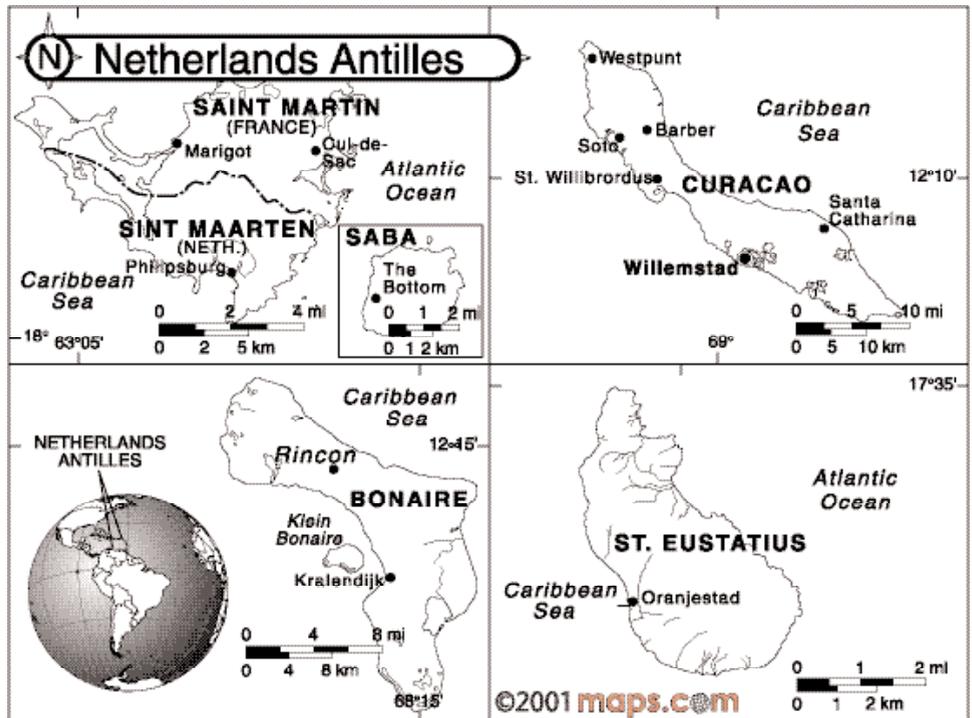

pulled out and became a separate country. That left Willemstad, on Curaçao, as the only city in the Antilles.

A variety of religions have been represented on the islands over the years. The ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH began a mission in the sixteenth century but was expelled when the Dutch took control of Curaçao in 1634. Several Jesuits reestablished the Catholic presence in 1705. A vicariate was created on Curaçao in 1842, and the Diocese of Willemstad in 1958. Among Curaçaoans, 85 percent profess Catholicism, with lesser percentages on the other islands.

Protestantism came to Curaçao following the Dutch takeover, when the Dutch began settlement in 1650. Eventually, Reformed churches were established on Curaçao and Bonaire. Dutch Lutherans also migrated to the islands, and in 1825 Dutch authorities forced a union of the Reformed and Lutheran churches that produced the Protestant Church. In 1931, members of the Protestant Church in Curaçao created the Reformed Church in Curaçao and assumed as a major task the ministry to members of the NETHERLANDS REFORMED CHURCH (one of the several Reformed denominations operating in Holland) who had migrated to the Antilles. This group merged with the Protestant Church to create the UNITED PROTESTANT CHURCH OF NETHERLANDS ANTILLES in 1984. It is the largest Protestant church in the Antilles.

Methodists began work in the Antilles among Africans in St. Eustatius. In the mid-1780s, an African slave known only as Black Harry (and not to be confused with Black Harry Hosier, the contemporary Methodist preacher in the United States) had gathered a small group that the Methodists termed a "class." When Methodist superintendent Thomas Coke (1747–1814) arrived in 1787, he found twenty people in this group and during his visit organized additional similar classes. He returned a year later to find Harry had been banished by slave owners fearful of religious organization among the slaves.

Although Methodism grew in the Antilles during this time, it was not until the early 1800s that nonhostile relations with the Dutch authorities developed. Methodism spread to St. Martin in the 1840s and to Curaçao in the 1930s. Methodist work there is now included in the METHODIST CHURCH IN THE CARIBBEAN AND THE AMERICAS.

Through the twentieth century, a spectrum of churches began work in the Netherlands Antilles, THE SALVATION ARMY, the ASSEMBLIES OF GOD, and the SEVENTH-DAY ADVENTIST CHURCH being among the more successful.

The Jewish community in the Antilles originated in the short-lived Dutch settlement of Brazil. Jews who had been living quietly under Portuguese rule in Recife openly organized after the Dutch arrived. When the Dutch were forced out of Brazil, many Jews left and came to Curaçao, where in 1651 João d'Ylan led in the construction of what is now the oldest synagogue in the Western Hemisphere.

Islam in the Antilles developed in the twentieth century with the movement of laborers from Lebanon and Syria to Curaçao. They formed the Muslim Community of Curaçao, which sponsors a mosque in Willemstad.

There are a few adherents of the BAHÁ'Í FAITH and some members of the LIBERAL CATHOLIC CHURCH, the theological body that has one of its strongest followings in the Netherlands, and the ANCIENT AND MYSTICAL ORDER ROSAE CRUCIS.

Source:

Bauswein, Jean-Jacques, and Lukas Vischer, eds. The Reformed Family Worldwide: A Survey of Reformed Churches, Theological Schools, and International Organizations. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans, 1999.

Netherlands Reformed Church

The Netherlands Reformed Church (Nederlandse Hervormde Kerk) is the oldest and largest Protestant church in the Netherlands. At the beginning of the twenty-first century it had approximately 2 million members served by 1,750 ministers in 1,340 local communities. The church originated as the Dutch phase of the Reformation in the sixteenth century, and the history of Protestantism in the Netherlands is almost fully synonymous with the history of the church. In 1816 King William I (1772–1843) reorganized the church and gave it its present name, and the Netherlands Reformed Church was the national church until 1951. The Dutch Reformed Church has left its imprint on Dutch civilization and as an internationally influential body is the source for a number of contemporary Reformed churches, especially in Indonesia, South Africa, and the United States. An inclusive church, it includes a spectrum of theological perspectives, from very liberal to very strict and traditional.

The beginning of the Reformation in the northern Netherlands (the later Dutch Republic) is somewhat complicated. Sacramentalism, biblical-humanism, Anabaptism and Lutheranism all played their part, but eventually Calvinism (Reformed Protestantism) found the largest constituency. Swiss reformers Huldrych Zwingli (1484–1531) and Heinrich Bullinger (1504–1575) influenced several Dutch theologians, including Cornelis Hoen (d. 1524), Johannes Anastasius Veluanus (1500–1575), and Hendrik van Bommel (c. 1490–1570). At the beginning of the seventeenth century, the life of the church was marked by the conflict between the liberal theologian Jacobus Arminius (1560–1609), the “grounding father” of the Remonstrant Brotherhood, and Franciscus Gomarus (1563–1641), a strict Calvinist. Arminius proclaimed that the practices of confession and catechism should be revised. He taught that all people are included in God’s reconciling act in Christ (though God ultimately chooses only those who turn in faith to Him), that humans are not totally perverted by sin (that a part of God’s image remains undistorted by sin), and that perseverance in belief is a matter of free will. The Synod of Dordrecht (1618–1619) condemned these beliefs in its five articles against the Remonstrants (Cannones synodi Dordracenae), which, together with the Dutch Confession of Faith and the Heidelberg Catechism, remains as the doctrinal standard of the church. At the Synod of Dordrecht it was also decided to translate the Bible into Dutch. The Dutch Bible, called the Statenvertaling, became very important for the development of the Dutch language and is still used in a revised form in some of the more strict Reformed churches.

The Netherlands Reformed Church includes several recognizable movements or wings: a strictly orthodox one, a liberal one, and a moderate one in between. The strictly orthodox wing has several origins, the most important being the Nearer Reformation, which looks for the radical reformation of doctrine and life in a manner similar to the Puritanism of the Anglo-Saxon countries and the Pietism of Germany. This wing teaches that believers should seek a mystical experience of God and avoid worldliness. Believers affirm the need for a spiritual rebirth, the visible marks of faith, and the practice of a God-fearing life. They also believe in the most strict form of predestination. They look to the government to promote the Reformed religion and to banish every false religion. The Nearer Reformation supporters have also been the strongest critics of the move toward unity, called the Samen op Weg (Together on the Way), with the REFORMED CHURCHES IN THE NETHERLANDS (GKN) and the EVANGELICAL LUTHERAN CHURCH IN THE KINGDOM OF THE NETHERLANDS. The perspective of the Nearer Reformation is represented within the church through the Reformed Federation (Gereformeerde Bond), supported by some 400 ministers, 312 local churches, and 450 local parishes.

The Nearer Reformation perspective also underlies a small, very strict orthodox denomination founded in 1962 around the periodical Het gekrookte riet, a title borrowed from one of the important books of 145 sermons of Bernardus Smijtegelt (1665–1739). This group rejects television, radio, and other forms of enjoyment and culture. Only those chosen by God are believed to come to real conversion. All believers must therefore doubt their eternal salvation. The denomination counts some ten ministers. Finally, the Confessional Unity (Confessionele Vereniging), founded in 1864, emphasizes obedience to the Holy Scriptures and strict community within the confession of the church and looks to the restoration of the church along biblical standards. It counts 165 active ministers and around four thousand members.

The more progressive wing of the church has its origins in nineteenth-century theological liberalism. It also draws upon the tradition of free thinking in the Dutch Republic in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries associated with the biblical-humanism of Erasmus (1467–1536), Sebastian Franck (c. 1499–c. 1542), Dirck Volkertszoon Coornhart (1522–1590), Baruch de Spinoza (1632–1677), and others. The most prominent representative of this wing is the Unity of Liberal Protestants (Vereniging van Vrijzinnig Hervormden), officially founded in 1913. The unity advocates freedom of belief and confession and argues against the infallible authority of church and Scriptures. The unity was most significant in the decades prior to World War II. As the twenty-first century begins, it counts some six thousand members.

The Zwingli-Unity (Zwingli Bond), founded in 1948, is the more radical modernist wing of the Netherlands Reformed Church. It advocates a Unitarian perspective that rejects the Trinity of God and therefore denies the divinity of Jesus and the Holy Spirit. It teaches that God is too great to be known and that Jesus is the ideal human being and our example in faith. The Scriptures are not inspired by God but are only a collection of human writings that include all the aspects of human desire and passion. The Zwingli-Unity is a small group inside the church, with only three hundred members.

The moderate wing of the church, called Midden-Orthodox, stands between the strict orthodox and the free-thinking wings. It advocates biblical preaching about subjects bearing on the problems of the modern society, such as homosexuality, abortion, euthanasia (active and passive), and racial questions.

The Walloon churches (Églises Wallones) have a special place in the Netherlands Reformed Church. They originated after the fall of Antwerp in 1585, when many Flemish- and French-speaking Protestants from the Southern Netherlands (Belgium) fled to the Northern Netherlands. The French-speaking believers organized their own denomination. Additionally, after the revocation of the Edict of Nantes in 1685, some one hundred thousand French Huguenots (Protestants) also fled to the Northern Netherlands. The denomination flourished through the nineteenth century, with eighty-two local parishes. In 2000 the French-speaking Églises Wallones, now one of the fifty-four classes of the Dutch Reformed Church, counts thirteen parishes, twelve ministers, and around two thousand believers.

The Netherlands Reformed Church has a synodal-presbyterian government with an emphasis on local ministries. At the congregational level, the elders, who form the church council, are chosen from the practicing members. The minister is chosen by the local community and is part of the council. The deacons care for the poor in the parish. The local parishes are organized into fifty-four classes (presbyteries), which in turn constitute the nine provincial synods. The members of the General Synod, the highest governing body in the church, are chosen by the provincial synods. The General Synod is assisted by many councils in dealing with specific issues and problems. The classes, the provincial synods, and the General Synod are named "greater councils" to emphasize the independence of the local parishes. The ministers (both men and women) are educated at the state universities and in the near future also at the Reformed University in Kampen.

The Netherlands Reformed Church was one of the founding members of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES and is still a very active member. It is also a member of the Council of Churches of the Netherlands, the WORLD ALLIANCE OF REFORMED CHURCHES, and the Conference of European Churches. In the Netherlands, the church is also very active in Together on the Way (Samen op Weg), a group looking toward possible unity between the Netherlands Reformed Church, the Reformed Churches in the Netherlands, and the Evangelical Lutheran Church in the Kingdom of the Netherlands. The process has encountered a number of obstacles.

Address:

Netherlands Reformed Church
Dienstencentrum SOW-kerken
Joseph Haydnlaan 2 A

3533 AE Utrecht
The Netherlands

E. G. Hoekstra

Sources:

- Bakhuizen van den Brink, J. N., et al. Documenta reformatoria: Teksten uit de geschiedenis van kerk en theologie sedert de Hervorming. 2 vol. Kampen: Kok, 1960–1962.
- Blei, Karel. De Nederlandse Hervormde Kerk: Haar geschiedenis en identiteit, series Wegwijs. Kampen: Kok, 2000.
- de Jong, O. J. Nederlandse kerkgeschiedenis. Nijkerk: Callenbach, 1985.
- Hoekstra, E. G., and M. H. Ipenburg. Wegwijs in religieus en levensbeschouwelijk Nederland: Handboek religies, kerken, stromingen en organisaties. Kampen: Uitgeverij Kok, 2000.
- Rasker, A. J. De Nederlandse Hervormde Kerk vanaf 1795. Kampen: Kok, 1986.

Netherlands Reformed Churches

The Netherlands Reformed Churches (Nederlands Gereformeerde Kerken) were founded in 1979 through a conflict in the REFORMED CHURCHES IN THE NETHERLANDS (LIBERATED). Some members wanted to enter into conversation with the General Synod of the REFORMED CHURCHES OF THE NETHERLANDS (GKN). They were suspended from membership and some 20 percent of the members and 30 percent of the ministers left the church. The Dutch Reformed Churches represent, on the whole, the perspective of the Reformed Churches in the Netherlands around the 1970s. Like most Reformed groups in the Netherlands, it accepts the authority of the Catechism of Heidelberg, the Canons of the Synod of Dort, and the Dutch Confession.

In 2000, the church included thirty thousand members, seventy ministers, and ninety-three local parishes. Ministers are educated at the Theological University of the Christian Reformed Churches in the Netherlands at Apeldoorn. The church is not a member of any of the several international ecumenical organizations, but it maintains ecumenical contact with the CHRISTIAN REFORMED CHURCH IN NORTH AMERICA, the Reformed Churches in Australia and New Zealand, the ORTHODOX PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH in America, the Églises Reformées Evangéliques Indépendantes in France, and the Geredja Bebas in Eastern Soemba, Indonesia.

Address:

Netherlands Reformed Churches
Koekoekstraat 25
3136 XP Vlaardingen
The Netherlands
<http://www.ngk.nl/ngken.html>

E. G. Hoekstra

Sources:

- Algra, A. H. Van Nederlands Hervormd tot Nederlands Gereformeerd. 1984.
- Hoekstra, E. G., and M. H. Ipenburg. Wegwijs in religieus en levensbeschouwelijk Nederland: Handboek religies, kerken, stromingen en organisaties. Kampen: Uitgeverij Kok, 2000.
- Moggré, A. J. Kinderen van één Vader. 1994.

Neturei Karta

Neturei Karta (Aramaic: Guardians of the City) is the name adopted by a group of Orthodox Jews who have resided in Palestine for many generations but who refuse to recognize the existence or authority of the State of Israel. They have become well known for their history of demonstrating in support of their position. Neturei Karta was founded in Jerusalem in 1938 as a splinter group of Agudath Israel (or Agudas Yisroel), an Orthodox Jewish organization that was originally opposed to Zionism, the movement for the return of the Jewish people to Palestine and Jewish sovereignty over the territory of ancient Israel. In the early twentieth century, Agudath Israel dropped its opposition to Zionism.

The Neturei originally were known as Hevret ha-Hayyim, only assuming their present name over the years. Their leader was Rabbi Amram Blau (1895–1976), who spent much of his life planning and leading demonstrations against the Israeli authorities. Following the establishment of the modern State of Israel, Neturei Karta members found themselves in a high state of tension with authorities. They tended to describe the founders and leaders of the state as Zionists rather than as fellow believers.

Neturei Karta has opposed the State of Israel on the grounds that the idea of a sovereign Jewish state is contrary to Jewish law, and it stands against the practice of uprooting centuries-old Jewish communities around the world in order to build the Jewish population in Israel. Members continue the position assumed by many nineteenth-century Jewish rabbis who believed Zionism was contrary to the Talmud—the oral tradition believed by Orthodox Jews to have been given to Moses while he was on Mount Horeb receiving the Torah (the Law). They believe that the true state of Israel will only be established without the use of human force, and they claim that Jews should not revolt against established nations but rather seek to live as loyal citizens.

Over the years, many Neturei Karta members have left Israel for more hospitable environments. Neturei Karta centers have now been established in several countries, including the United Kingdom and the United States. There are three synagogues in Brooklyn, New York. Closely associated with Neturei Karta is the Friends of Jerusalem, an organization that has taken the lead in furthering the various causes of the Neturei Karta by organizing demonstrations against Israel and participating in a spectrum of activities (including meetings with heads of state) to advocate strong opposition to Zionist programs.

The Neturei Karta claims several thousand committed members and a sympathetic constituency in the hundreds of thousands, which would include some of the anti-Zionist Hassidic movements such as Satmar. As SATMAR HASIDISM grew, the Neturei Karta placed itself under its care and guidance. The relationship had unforeseen consequences in 1965, when Rabbi Blau married a former Roman Catholic who had converted to Judaism. Satmar Rabbi Yoel Teitelbaum (1887–1979) forced the ouster of Blau from his leadership role.

Address:

Neturei Karta and the Friends of Jerusalem
P.O. Box 1030
New York, NY 10009
<http://www.netureikarta.org/>

Sources:

- Domb, I. The Transformation: The Case of the Neturei Karta. London, 1958.
- Lawrence, Bruce. Defenders of God: The Fundamentalist Revolt against the Modern Age. Colombia: University of South Carolina Press, 1995.
- Zimmer, Uriel. "The Guardians of the City." Posted at http://www.jewsnotzionists.org/the_guardians_of_the_city.htm. Accessed October 25, 2001.

New Acropolis Cultural Association
[Asociación Cultural Nueva Acrópolis]

Founded in 1957 in Buenos Aires by Jorge Angel Livraga Rizzi (1930–1981) and his wife, Ada Albrecht, the New Acropolis Cultural Association, with international headquarters in Buenos Aires, claims to have more than ten thousand members in more than forty countries. Professor Livraga Rizzi was born in Buenos Aires of Italian ancestry, and he died in Madrid, Spain. He allegedly studied medicine, philosophy, and the history of art at a university in Buenos Aires and was the author of numerous books and articles—studies of ancient cultures and civilizations, novels, philosophical essays, and reflections on the contemporary world, among others. His house in Buenos Aires is now a museum, maintained by the New Acropolis Cultural Association, where his achievements are honored and preserved. Some of Livraga's books and articles, as well as those of some of his disciples, are available in an electronic format on the organization's expansive Web site at: <http://www.acropolis.org>.

New Acropolis is a post-Theosophical movement that combines elements from many sources: theosophy, esoteric thought, alchemy, astrology, and oriental and Greek philosophy. Although it claims to be a humanist organization, independent of political and religious ties, some of its former members in France have accused the organization of being right-wing and of promoting Fascist and neo-Nazi ideas. The alleged use of paramilitary language, symbols, and forms of organization, along with recent charges of brainwashing, have led to many criticisms of New Acropolis in Europe, especially in France, since the mid-1970s.

The New Acropolis movement promotes the idea of a universal philosophy or tradition upon which the world's different religions and esoteric traditions are based. However, it emphasizes Western rather than Eastern esotericism and particularly focuses on Greek philosophy in the tradition of Pythagoras and Plato. As Massimo Introvigne notes,

The stated aim of New Acropolis is to help each member reach his or her Higher Self and to reclaim a higher consciousness that, while normally dormant, is preserved in the esoteric schools and accessible through symbols, the active use of imagination, the study of one's own dreams, and other techniques. The Higher Self, in turn, is a gateway to the Cosmic or Universal Self, described as a collective archetypal reality. When an adequate number of human beings achieve that Higher Self, the Universal Self may emerge as collective consciousness and may have important social and political implications. Although the society inspired by the collective consciousness of the archetypal Universal Self has been described in different ways throughout the history of the movement, it is certainly different from modern democracy. Indeed, the founder's criticism of contemporary democracy (quoting Plato and other authors) is often offered by critics of New Acropolis as evidence of the movement's 'reactionary' or 'fascist' attitude, although other texts by Livraga and his successors unequivocally condemn nazism, fascism and more recently the National Front in France.

The New Acropolis reports member organizations in Argentina, Costa Rica, Japan, Paraguay, Slovenia, Sweden, Turkey, the United States, and Venezuela. Similar organizations that use the same name are known to exist in Mexico, Colombia, Belgium, and France.

Address:

New Acropolis Cultural Association
 Amenabar 863
 1426 Buenos Aires
 Argentina
<http://www.acropolis.org>

Clifton L. Holland

Sources:

Faivre, Antoine. "Nouvelle Acropole en France." In Pour en finir avec les sectes: Le débat sur le rapport de la commission parlementaire, edited by Massimo Introvigne and J. Gordon Melton, 236–246. 3rd ed. Paris: Dervy, 1996.

Introvigne, Massimo. "Defectors, Ordinary Leavetakers and Apostates: A Quantitative Study of Former Members of New Acropolis in France." Nova Religio: The Journal of Alternative and Emergent Religions 3,1 (1999). Posted at <http://www.cesnur.org>. Accessed August 15, 2001.

Livraga, Jorge Angel. The Alchemist. Coral Gables, FL: New Acropolis Cultural Association, 2001.

———. The Spirits of Nature. Coral Gables, FL: New Acropolis Cultural Association, 2000.

———. Thebes. Coral Gables, FL: New Acropolis Cultural Association, 1998.

New Age Movement

The New Age movement, which rose to public prominence in the West in the 1970s and 1980s, was a millennial revivalist movement that swept through the groups of the Western Esoteric tradition, leading to the expansion of many older groups, the emergence of a new set of Esoteric organizations, and a general reappraisal of the tradition by the general public. The movement's name derived from its orientation around a vision of a coming New Age of peace and wisdom, which was believed to be dawning upon humanity as the twenty-first century approached. The initial exponents of the movement were followers of offshoots of older Esoteric groups (the THEOSOPHICAL SOCIETY (ADYAR), the ARCANES SCHOOL, and others) and the churches of the New Thought tradition. The movement waned in the 1990s as the idea of an imminent New Age lost support and the movement as a whole was attacked for some of its more questionable assertions.

The Western Esoteric tradition, at least in its popular phase as the purveyor of occult teachings over the dominant Christian worldview, experienced a new rebirth in the nineteenth century following a century of decline under the combined challenge of Protestant Christianity and the Enlightenment. Its reemergence paralleled that of science, and the new occultists attempted to align magical teachings with the emerging scientific world. Leading the way was Austrian physician Franz Anton Mesmer (1734–1815), who proposed the existence of a universal magnetic force that he believed underlay spiritual healing. Though denounced by the French Royal Academy of Science, “mesmerism” became a popular movement throughout the West in the early nineteenth century.

A tent city in Los Angeles, California, houses a thousand Krishnamurti followers in May 1928. (Corbis)

Building upon Mesmer’s thought, Eliphas Levi (1810–1875) identified the universal energy with the cosmic agent evoked while working magic. Levi’s several books launched a revival of magic in Europe. A century later, the elitist initiatory magic promoted by Levi and later exponents such as Aleister Crowley (1875–1947) would find its popular expression in neopagan WICCAN RELIGION or witchcraft. The renewed practice of magic supported the simultaneous rebirth of interest in various divinatory practices such as palmistry, astrology, and tarot reading. Astrology has been the most popular occult belief, and the very visible rise of the new twentieth-century “science of astrology” provides a framework for understanding the appeal of occultism as a whole.

In North America, the very successful mesmerist movement was superseded in the middle of the nineteenth century by a movement centered upon contact and communication with the spirits of the recently deceased. SPIRITUALISM began in Hydesville, New York, in 1848, and through the 1850s it spread across America and then to England and France, where it enjoyed an even greater response. Over the last decades of the nineteenth century, Spiritualist activity could be found in the major cities of Europe and in such unlikely places as Cairo and Rio de Janeiro.

The alternative healing emphasis of the magnetist movement that popularized Mesmer’s ideas supported the development of a host of alternative healing practices in nineteenth-century America, setting the context for the discovery by Mary Baker Eddy (1821–1910) of a new kind of healing. After decades of fighting illnesses, in 1866 she came to a realization of the Allness of God, from which she concluded that all illness was a monstrous illusion of limited minds, an erroneous perception of the nature of reality. To embody her new insight, Eddy founded the CHURCH OF CHRIST, SCIENTIST. In the 1880s, one of her leading students, Emma Curtis Hopkins (1849–1925), began an independent ministry, now seen as the beginning of a new movement, New Thought, today embodied in several metaphysical church/movements: the UNITY SCHOOL OF CHRISTIANITY, DIVINE SCIENCE FEDERATION, SEICHONO-IE, and RELIGIOUS SCIENCE.

To esotericists and occultists of the nineteenth and twentieth centuries, history was of secondary interest at best, a practical means of relating to a mundane world from which they were trying to escape. Attention was focused on a set of occult (hidden) realities believed to lie behind the visible universe. However, toward the end of the twentieth century, an attempt to ascribe some importance to the mundane world as a place of spiritual unfolding began with Madame Helena Petrova Blavatsky (1831–1891), a cofounder of the Theosophical Society. She suggested that the real goals of the Theosophical Society were to cooperate with the evolution of the race and to prepare for the coming of Lord Maitreya, one of the Masters of the Great White Brotherhood, the adepts who from a lofty estate actually guide humanity on its way. Maitreya’s coming would initiate a new cycle for humanity.

Blavatsky’s initial idea about Maitreya was developed more fully by Annie Besant (1847–1933), who became the president of the society early in the twentieth century, and by a former Anglican priest, Charles Webster Leadbeater (1854–1934). Leadbeater identified the vehicle of the coming Maitreya as one Jiddu Krishnamurti (1895–1986), a young boy whom Leadbeater spotted on a beach near the Theosophical Society’s international headquarters at Adyar, India. Besant took control of the situation and provided for Krishnamurti’s education. The society prepared him for his role as the coming World Savior, and through the 1920s, Krishnamurti appeared at numerous society-sponsored events.

Initially, Krishnamurti appeared to be following the Theosophical program, and the society mobilized international support for the designated Savior figure. Then in 1929, he suddenly abandoned his predestined role and left the society to deal with both the problems of his resignation and the Great Depression. The society never recovered. Meanwhile, a new teacher, Alice A. Bailey (1880–1949), was just emerging as a prominent figure in the movement. Bailey had left the Theosophical Society to begin an independent effort built around her direct communications with one of the Masters, Djwhal Khul, whom she usually referred to as the Tibetan. Annie Besant disapproved both of the material received from the Tibetan and the process by which it was received—channeling, or mediumship. Bailey withdrew from the society in 1923 and with the assistance of her husband, Foster, founded the ARCANES SCHOOL.

Toward the end of her life, Bailey began to call her students’ attention to the reappearance of the Christ, which she believed would occur during the last years of the twentieth century. In the 1950s, many left the Arcane School, and students of her works founded a spectrum of independent Baileyite organizations—the “Light” groups—which engaged in channeling spiritual light (cosmic energy) into the world for its uplift and healing. The members of these groups also prepared for the expected World Savior.

As early as the 1960s, leaders of several British Baileyite groups would be the first to propose the New Age vision of a transformed world. They suggested that a transformation could result if an international network of Light groups would channel spiritual energy to the planet. A rudimentary vision began with the networking of several groups: the Wrekin Trust (England), the Universal Foundation (London), and the Findhorn Foundation (near Inverness, Scotland). By the end of the decade, Anthony Brooke (b. 1912), the former ruler of Sarawak and the head of the Universal Foundation, was touring and promoting the formation of additional Light groups. Groups emerged in several countries around the world.

In the mid-1970s, David Spangler (b. 1945), codirector of the Findhorn Foundation, authored several books that elucidated a broad vision of an emerging New Age. His 1976 volume, Revelation: The Birth of a New Age, and several subsequent titles offered a more fully developed statement of New Age possibilities, which became immediate fuel for an emerging revival. Spangler suggested that in the generation maturing in the last quarter of the twentieth century, human beings could seize a unique opportunity to create a new social order that would replace the current world, characterized so much by war, poverty, starvation, and other social ills.

The New Age would begin with the transformation of individuals, who would be healed, changed, uplifted, and enlightened. Their transformation would be accomplished by the use of many old occult tools (astrology, palmistry, meditation, and concentration practices), new information received through channeling from evolved spiritual beings, and an array of alternative healing disciplines. Transformation could on occasion be quick and dramatic, but any change was but the beginning of a long-term process of development that would lead to new levels of spiritual experience and realization.

As ever-greater numbers of individuals were transformed, the larger goal, the transformation of society, would follow. The emergence of this new social and cultural situation was the real New Age. Spangler argued that if individuals would share the wisdom and energy they received as they were transformed, through the uniting of light and love, the entire planet would be transformed into a New Age for humanity.

Spangler cited two sources for the New Age. First, the present moment (the late twentieth century) was a propitious moment, when the heavens were being aligned for release of new levels of cosmic spiritual energy, which would power the New Age. Thus the idea of the New Age aligned with the notion of the Aquarian Age, which astrologers had predicted as occurring at some imprecise time in the twentieth or twenty-first century. Significant points in the progression of the Earth through the zodiac and the initiation of a new astrological age are seen as occurring about every two thousand years.

However, the cosmic energy of the stars could not do it alone. The second source for the New Age would be people—working, cooperating, and uniting. The New Age would require the effort of large numbers of transformed people channeling the cosmic energies. If people failed to act, the opportunity would be lost.

The New Age movement reached its zenith in the 1980s. During the decade people who had previously adhered to the Western Esoteric tradition caught the vision of the New Age, while hundreds of thousands of others around the world who had no background in the tradition also discovered the movement. New Age publishers and bookstores appeared in urban centers throughout the Western world, and New Age networks linked the largely decentralized movement. New Agers gathered annually in large New Age expositions that were organized so the various, often divergent elements of the movement could share experiences.

Under its new label, the Western Esoteric tradition continued to promote the older occult arts but remolded them for the New Age world. Ancient divinatory practices, including astrology and the tarot, were now offered to the public as scientific transformative tools. They were taken from their former deterministic worldview, in which they offered predictions of the future, and were now utilized primarily as instruments of personal insight and self-revelation.

Crystals emerged in the 1980s as a prominent New Age tool. Crystals had been mentioned in the channeled readings of seer Edgar Cayce (1877–1945), whose insights were published in a small booklet by the ASSOCIATION FOR RESEARCH AND ENLIGHTENMENT. Cayce's linkage of crystals and ancient Atlantis inspired Frank Alper, of the Arizona Metaphysical Center, who claimed that crystals had great potential for their ability to store and release transformative spiritual energies. Enthusiastic New Agers added crystals to their attire, meditated in their presence, and placed them in their ritual spaces in the belief that their energizing powers would thus effect spiritual evolution.

Mediumship, now termed channeling, emerged as the most definitive practice of the New Age movement. Channelers brought messages from a spectrum of authoritative spiritual entities (God, the Ascended Masters, spirits, extra-terrestrial beings, the channeler's higher self) who provided guidance and direction for the movement. Some channels provided individuals with personal messages for their own particular and immediate concerns. The most well-known channels (JZ Knight, Jach Pursel, Kevin Ryerson, Ken Carey, Pat Rodegast, and others) brought more philosophical teachings that were applicable to the larger New Age public.

Among the more interesting New Age organizations was Share International, which structured the teaching activity of Benjamin Crème (b. 1922), a student of the Bailey writings, who in the 1970s began channeling messages from Maitreya and announcing his imminent appearance. When Crème's prediction of Maitreya's appearance in 1982 failed, he was largely dismissed by the rest of the movement.

The New Age culminated in 1989 with the airing of the television version of actress Shirley MacLaine's autobiographical book, Out on a Limb. MacLaine (b. 1934) had followed a New Age pilgrimage for a decade; however, her own transformation coincided with a very different change undergone by the movement itself. During the 1980s leaders were feeling the critiques of reporters and scholars, especially those directed at the underlying claims of paranormal realities related to crystals and channeling. Scientists denounced pseudoscientific claims about the power of crystals to store and release energy and raised doubts about the existence of the spiritual entities who spoke through channels. As the 1980s came to a close, several prominent New Age spokespersons (including writer David Spangler and publisher Jeremy Tarcher) revealed their conviction that they had erred in believing in the possibility of social transformation. That so many people had experienced a personal transformation justified the existence of the New Age movement, but it was time to give up any hope in a more pervasive social transformation.

In the 1990s the great majority of New Agers came to agree with Spangler and Tarcher, and they abandoned hope in a coming New Age. By this time millions of people across the Western world had been attracted to the Western Esoteric tradition, still called the New Age in the larger society. (Adherents remained a small minority in the West, still dominated by Christianity.)

The great majority of New Agers were content with the personal spirituality they had found. Many were associated with the organizations most identified with the movement—the Association for Research and Enlightenment, the CHURCH UNIVERSAL AND TRIUMPHANT and RAMTHA'S SCHOOL OF ENLIGHTENMENT, to name just a few. Through the 1990s, new groups emerged that attempted to continue belief in the New Age, now defined as an ever-increasing global interest in spirituality that over the next centuries will lead to new levels of spiritual awareness and produce a flourishing new culture. This transformed New Age vision was given voice in a book by James Redfield, The Celestine Prophecy (1994), which became a bestseller and spawned a set of related texts and a new movement, the New Civilization Network. This new phase of the movement has been referred to as the Next Age, especially in Europe.

The New Age is best seen as a burst of growth in the Western Esoteric tradition. The movement greatly enlarged the number of people adhering to an esoteric worldview, created new currents of esoteric expression, and bequeathed to the tradition a fresh, more positive image in the Western world. As the New Age movement emerged, older adherents of the Western Esoteric tradition expressed a range of opinions about it. Some openly supported it, others watched and observed from a distance, and not a few voiced their strident hostility to the movement's shallowness. In any event, the movement created a new situation out of which future Western Esoteric activity will operate.

Sources:

- Hanegraaff, Wouter J. New Age Religion and Western Culture. Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1996.
- Heelas, Paul. The New Age Movement. Oxford, UK: Blackwell Publishers, 1996.
- Introvigne, Massimo. New Age and Next Age. Casale Monferrato, Italy: Piemme, 2000.
- Klimo, Hjon. Channeling: Investigations on Receiving Information from Paranormal Sources. Berkeley, CA: North Atlantic Press, 1998.
- Lewis, James, and J. Gordon Melton, eds. Perspectives on the New Age. Albany: State University of New York Press, 1992.
- Melton, J. Gordon. Finding Enlightenment: Ramtha's School of Ancient Wisdom. Hillsboro, OR: Beyond Words, 1998.
- Melton, J. Gordon, Jerome Clark, and Aidan Kelly, eds. New Age Encyclopedia. Detroit: Gale Research Company, 1990.
- Redfield, James. The Celestine Prophecy. New York: Warner Books, 1994.
- Spangler, David. Revelation: The Birth of a New Age. San Francisco: Rainbow Bridge, 1976.

New Apostolic Church

The CATHOLIC APOSTOLIC CHURCH, established in England in the wake of the revival led by Edward Irving (1792–1834), though he was not its founder, was particularly successful in Germany. It taught, however, that no new Apostles should be appointed after the death of its twelve original founders. This created serious problems, since only the Apostles were empowered to consecrate bishops, and only bishops can ordain priests. This was not a major problem for the Catholic Apostolic Church, however, because the end of the world was expected to occur quite soon. This did not happen, of course, and one after the other the original Apostles died. Following short-lived attempts to solve the problem within the German branch, between 1897 and 1898 Fritz Krebs (1832–1905) proclaimed himself an Apostle and proceeded to appoint other Apostles who, in turn, elected him as Stammapostel (Root-Apostle and chief of the church). In order to distinguish this splinter group from the Catholic Apostolic Church, it was legally established as the New Apostolic Church.

The New Apostolic Church's success was outstanding, thanks to the efforts of Krebs and his successors Hermann Niehaus (1848–1932) and Johann Gottfried Bischoff (1871–1960). Although the Catholic Apostolic Church almost died out (and is currently reduced to a small remnant), the New Apostolic Church gathered millions of members throughout the world. Around the end of Bischoff's life, a millenarian movement erupted within his church, in the expectation of an imminent end of the world. Schisms followed, although Bischoff's successor, Walter Schmidt (1891–1978), was eventually able to explain why the prophecy had failed (God had changed his plans) and to keep most of the members within the fold. Today the New Apostolic Church, the current Stammapostel being Swiss-born Richard Fehr, includes, according to most outside observers, some eight million members (its own claim is that there are more than ten million members), with 66,000 local communities throughout Europe (with the strongest concentrations in Germany and Switzerland) and the world (with the largest communities in Australia, the Philippines, the United States, and Canada).

The New Apostolic Church has come to the conclusion that Apostles in today's world should number more than twelve. There are at present 28 main District Apostles and 292 other Apostles. Under the Apostles's leadership are bishops, elders, pastors, evangelists, priests, and deacons. Although the structure of the New Apostolic Church is reminiscent of the Catholic Apostolic Church (except, of course, that in the latter the number of Apostles never exceeded twelve), the doctrine is more similar to Evangelical Protestantism and includes a pre-millennial, pre-tribulationist belief in the rapture. The liturgy, on the other hand, maintains elements of the Catholic Apostolic Church (in turn derived from the CHURCH OF ENGLAND) and includes the celebration of three sacraments: baptism, a kind of confirmation celebrated eighteen months after baptism, and communion. It is because of these liturgical elements and its belief in the crucial role of the apostolic hierarchy that Evangelical Protestants do not normally regard themselves as being in communion with New Apostolics.

The New Apostolic Church's headquarters are located at Gutleutstrasse 298, 60327 Frankfurt am Main, Germany. It has a Website at <http://www.nak.org>.

Massimo Introvigne and PierLuigi Zoccatelli

Sources:

Guide for the Administration Brothers of the New Apostolic Church.
Frankfurt am Main, Germany: Apostles College of the New Apostolic Church, 1967.

Question and Answers Concerning the New Apostolic Church.
Frankfurt am Main, Germany: J. G. Bischoff, 1978.

Rockenfeller, Gottfried. Geschichte der Neuapostolischen Kirche.
Frankfurt am Main, Germany: Neuapostolische Kirche, 1953.

New Kadampa Tradition

The New Kadampa Tradition (NKT) was founded in the United Kingdom by the Tibetan national, Gelukpa monk, and teacher Geshe Kelsang Gyatso (b. 1932). Geshe Kelsang was brought to the UK in 1977 by the Foundation for the Preservation of the Mahayana Tradition (FPMT) to head one of their centers. He and his students declared independence from the FPMT in 1991. The headquarters of the NKT remain in the UK, providing an international coordinating focus for nearly 370 groups of varying size. About half the groups are located in the UK; twenty-six of these provide residential accommodation. There are an estimated eight thousand people affiliated with the NKT worldwide.

NKT practices include meditation, the taking of refuge in Buddha, acknowledgment of the Dharma (or truth of impermanence), participation in the Sangha (or community of truth-seekers), and the recitation of ritual texts (*sadhana*s). Practitioners may receive empowerments for such rituals, which carry concomitant commitments to regular practice, from Geshe Kelsang or his senior followers. The texts, which are spoken in the vernacular, are represented as translations of traditional GELUKPA practices.

Central to the movement are three graded study programs: the open and introductory General Programme, the Foundation Programme for more committed practitioners, and the demanding Teacher Training Programme. Successful completion of the study programs is the primary goal for practitioners since only those who know the teachings can pass them on to others. The programs are based on commentaries by Geshe Kelsang on traditional Gelukpa texts such as the Lamrim. NKT teachers may be lay or monastic followers. There are approximately 250 ordained monastics in total, half of whom are women. Monks and nuns wear traditional Tibetan robes and take identical novice ordination precepts that have been developed by Geshe Kelsang for the Western context.

The NKT promotes an exclusive path, stressing the need to study and practice only within Geshe Kelsang's teaching lineage and to avoid "mixing" NKT practices with those of other schools. This contrasts with the approach of the Dalai Lama, who favors an inclusive, nonsectarian presentation of TIBETAN BUDDHISM. This difference in emphasis, which is rooted within long-standing Tibetan debates, has become focused on the nature and status of the protector deity, Dorje Shugdan. Although some Gelukpa practitioners, including the Dalai Lama, regard Dorje Shugdan as a troublesome and sectarian worldly deity of dubious origin, for Geshe Kelsang and his teachers before him, Dorje Shugdan is a manifestation of the Buddha and also the most powerful and appropriate protector of Western practitioners. Practices focused on Dorje Shugdan have been firmly discouraged by the Dalai Lama among Tibetan Buddhist communities, but they remain central to NKT rituals. The NKT's uncompromising stance, which runs counter to some popular Western images of Buddhism and has been perceived to threaten the unity of the exiled Tibetan community, has attracted criticism from other Western Buddhist groups and from the Gelukpa school. The NKT is nonetheless a member of the UK Network of Buddhist Organisations and one of the largest schools of Buddhism in the UK.

Address:

New Kadampa Tradition
Manjushri Centre
Ulveston, Cumbria LA12 9QQ
United Kingdom
<http://www.kadampa.net>

Helen Waterhouse

Sources:

Kay, David. "The New Kadampa Tradition and the Continuity of Tibetan Buddhism in Transition." Journal of Contemporary Religion 12, 3 (1997): 277–293.

Waterhouse, Helen. Buddhism in Bath: Adaptation and Authority. Leeds, UK: Leeds Community Religions Project, 1997.

New Zealand

Religion in New Zealand begins with the history of Maori and Pakeha (non-Maori, especially White) immigrants. New Zealand was first settled by Polynesian people called Maori in the period between 500 and 1000 C.E. Traditional Maori religion is based upon two realms: the world of physical existence and the world of supernatural beings. The latter is populated by beings including atua (gods), wairua (spirits), tipuna (ancestors), and kehu (ghosts). There are no clear-cut divisions between the two realms; gods or spirits frequently visit the physical world. The majority of Maori rituals aim to influence the gods and spirits so that their actions in the physical world are beneficial. All things are considered sacred, including nature and the land.

Dutch sea captain Abel Tasman (c. 1603–1659) was the first European to discover New Zealand, in 1642, but it was not until the visit of Captain James Cook (1728–1779) in 1769 that moves were made toward settlement by the British. New Zealand's missionary period began in July 1814, when two tradesmen-missionaries, Thomas Kendall (1778–1832) and William Hall, distributed religious literature to Maori people and held shipboard services. It is claimed that the first Christian service was held in New Zealand on Christmas Day, 1814, by Samuel Marsden (1764–1838). Marsden was an Anglican chaplain from Australia and a representative of the CHURCH MISSIONARY SOCIETY. His sermon, delivered in English, was translated into Maori.

Representatives from other Christian churches began to arrive in the small European settlement that was mainly established in the north of the country. The year 1819 saw the arrival of the first ordained Anglican priest, John Butler, and the first Wesleyan missionary, Samuel Leighton. By 1838 two thousand settlers had come, including the first Catholic, Bishop Jean Baptiste Pompallier, in 1838.

Status of religions in New Zealand, 2000-2050

Followers	2000			2025	2050
	total	%	rate
Christians	3,224,000	83.5	1.31	3,800,000	4,174,000
Protestants	931,000	24.1	1.04	1,050,000	1,150,000
Anglicans	825,000	21.4	1.16	850,000	900,000
Roman Catholics	495,000	12.8	0.52	550,000	600,000
Nonreligious	492,000	12.8	1.78	700,000	850,000
Buddhists	37,600	1.0	3.49	55,000	65,000
Atheists	33,900	0.9	1.40	45,000	50,000
Hindus	22,300	0.6	2.26	33,000	40,000
Ethnoreligionists	19,300	0.5	1.28	21,000	20,000
Muslims	7,300	0.2	2.29	10,000	13,000
Chinese folk-religionists	7,200	0.2	0.27	7,000	7,000
Neoreligionists	5,400	0.1	5.99	6,000	7,500
Jews	5,300	0.1	1.33	7,000	7,500
Baha'is	3,900	0.1	2.95	6,000	8,000
Spiritists	1,300	0.0	1.11	2,000	2,500
Sikhs	390	0.0	1.89	700	1,000
other religionists	1,600	0.0	1.39	2,300	3,000
Total population	3,862,000	100.0	1.40	4,695,000	5,248,000

The first Presbyterian, John McFarlane, preached at Petone in 1840.

In 1840 Governor William Hobson (1793–1842) signed the Treaty of Waitangi with Maori chiefs, annexing New Zealand as a British colony. The treaty ceded Maori sovereignty to the British queen in return for guaranteed possession of their property and the rights of British subjects. These events are still controversial, particularly the interpretations of the treaty and the circumstances under which it was signed.

With the advent of organized settlement, a new period of religious colonization began. By 1840 a number of Maori had already professed to be Christian, their conversion being assisted by exposure to Christianity through schools, hospitals, and chapels. The major Christian denominations continued to grow. The first Anglican bishop was consecrated in 1841, and in 1848 the Presbyterians founded their own settlement at Otago. In 1850 Anglicans established themselves at Canterbury, and the first Baptist church formed in Nelson in 1851. At its first meeting, in 1854, the newly formed House of Representatives asserted the principle of religious equality for all denominations, endorsing the pluralism that was already a feature of the new colony.

Cathedral Square in Christchurch, New Zealand (Eric Smith/TRIP)

The Maori responded to the Christian influence by developing indigenous Christian sects that helped maintain their Maori identity. The basic theology of the Maori-Christian syncretism identifies the Hebrew Jehovah with Io, a figure in Polynesian myth. It is debatable whether Io's traditional role is that of a supreme being and thus comparable to the Christian God, but that is clearly the case in syncretistic Maori religious movements. This correlation then allows the genealogies of both traditions to be aligned, providing the Maori with an ethnic identity that can be placed within Jewish, Christian, Mormon, and even Rastafarian belief systems. Although the Maori have undoubtedly participated in this construction, the origin of these concepts can also be attributed to Samuel Marsden. An emphasis on charismatic prophets and imminent millenarianism is also a common feature of these movements.

From 1830 to 1850 ten religious movements arose based on this theology, and in the 1850s another nine arose, mainly based on healing. Disputes between the Maori and the new colonials regarding sovereignty, land ownership, and land confiscation led to the onset of the Land Wars from 1860 to 1865, a further catalyst for the Maori to develop religious movements that suited their circumstances. At least sixteen major prophetic movements arose, including the Pai-Marire, more commonly known as Hauhau. A prophetic movement, Hauhau transposed Old Testament prophecies about the Promised Land with the contemporary Maori situation. One of the most important movements arising in this period was Ringatu, a movement that has continued to thrive. Ringatu was founded in 1867 by Te Kooti, who identified himself with Moses and the Maori as Hurai (Jews), the lost tribes of Israel.

While indigenous Christian sects had been growing, so too had the major Christian denominations. By the 1860s Anglican, Presbyterian, Methodist, Catholic, and Baptist congregations were present in most major cities and towns. The 1877 Education Act established a free, secular, and compulsory national system of education, further evidence of the separation of church and state in New Zealand. By 1900 a number of religious groups including Congregationalists, Churches of Christ, Quakers, Plymouth Brethren, Seventh-day Adventists, Latter-day Saints, and Lutherans were also represented, in smaller numbers. A second major indigenous Christian sect was founded by Tahupotiki Wiremu Ratana in 1925. The Ratana Church understands itself as the mouthpiece of Jehovah and also stresses faith healing. Ratana is notable for its role as a major force in Maori politics and continuing growth. It holds a monopoly of the Maori parliamentary seats and is strongly linked with the New Zealand Labour Party.

In the 1960s there was a decline in the number of adherents to mainstream Christianity in New Zealand, with groups also splitting from the major denominations and forming evangelistic sects. The 1970s saw a growth in Pentecostalism and neocharismatic groups.

The 1996 census revealed that 60.5 percent (2,189,580) of the country identify as Christian. The four largest Christian denominations are Anglican (17.5 percent), Catholic (13.1 percent), Presbyterian (12.7 percent), and Methodist (3.4 percent). These figures have tended to decline over recent years, with the exception of Catholicism, which has remained fairly static. The next largest religious groups are Christian nondenominational (5.2 percent), Methodist (3.4 percent), Pentecostal and Assemblies of God (1.9 percent), Baptist (1.5 percent), Latter-day Saints (1.1 percent), Ratana (1 percent), Brethren (0.6 percent), and Jehovah's Witnesses (0.5 percent). An increase in the Christian nondenominational group from 1.3 percent in 1986 to 5.2 percent in 1996 may account for some of the decreases among the major denominations. However, some denominations are growing; the number of Pentecostals has more than quadrupled since 1981, when they accounted for 0.2 percent of the population. The percentage of people not specifying their religion has increased sharply, from 1.8 percent in 1991 to 5.2 percent in 1996, and a similar rise in the number of people professing to no religion has also appeared, from 17 percent in 1986 to 24 percent in 1996.

The Maori currently account for 9 percent of the New Zealand population, of which 60 percent are Christian, belonging to a variety of denominations: Anglicans (15.6 percent), Catholics (13.3 percent), Presbyterians (4.5 percent), Mormons (4.4 percent), Methodists (3.4 percent), Pentecostal and Assemblies of God (2.3 percent), and Christian nondenominational (5.3 percent). Of the indigenous churches, Ratana claims 6.7 percent and other indigenous Christian sects another 1.7 percent. Anglican and Catholic churches are becoming more Maori and Polynesian and less English or Irish. Buddhists have grown from 0.2 percent of the population in 1986 to 0.8 percent in 1996; Hindus, from 0.2 percent to 0.7 percent; and Islam, from 0.2 percent to 0.4 percent. The Jewish community, which dates to the arrival in 1831 of Sir Moses Montefiore (1784–1885), remains small, though a number of Jews have held high and responsible positions in the government and academia. The 3,300 Jews now account for 0.1 percent of the population. Adherents to Spiritualism and New Age religious movements add another 0.3 percent.

To a large degree the census figures reflect the effect of regional migrations. For example, the lack of immigrants from Continental Europe has resulted in comparatively low numbers of Lutherans, while the recent increase in the number of Buddhists is largely due to Asian immigration, not conversion. Religious practice in New Zealand can be characterized as the adoption of nominal religious identity; census statistics are much higher than actual church membership and attendance, which can be attributed to only 12–15 percent of self-identified Catholics and Presbyterians, for example. It can almost be argued that civil religious practices such as ANZAC Day or rugby are more important to contemporary New Zealanders than commitment to institutional religion.

Michelle Spuler

Sources:

- Colless, Brian, and Peter Donovan, eds. Religion in New Zealand Society. 2d ed. Palmerston North, NZ: Dunmore, 1985.
- Davidson, Allan K. Christianity in Aotearoa: A History of Church and Society in New Zealand. 2d ed. Wellington, NZ: Education for Ministry, 1997.
- Hill, Michael, and Wiebe Zwaga. "Religion in New Zealand: Change and Comparison." In The Changing Face of Religion, edited by James A. Beckford and Thomas Luckmann, 64–87. London: Sage Publications, 1989.

Newar Buddhism (Nepal)

The Newar society of the Kathmandu Valley in Nepal has a good claim to being the oldest continuous local tradition of Buddhism. Although the Buddhism of modern Newars is a diverse and evolving tradition, the term Newar Buddhism is used to refer to a distinct form of Vajrayana Buddhism. Its only professional religious are married priests of the Vajracarya/Sakya caste, who live in monastic courtyards carefully organized into public Mahayana and secret Vajrayana spaces. They draw their clients from mercantile, artisanal, and agricultural castes. They are unique among modern Buddhists in that their canonical language is Sanskrit, a trait that marks them as the last surviving descendants of the Indian Buddhist tradition. Together with Hindu Newars they draw on a common Indic inventory of gods and rituals. For example, all Newars worship Ganesha before any significant undertaking, worship the Eight Mother Goddesses, and take part in fasting vows (in Sanskrit, vratas) according to the lunisolar calendar.

Scholars believe that Buddhism took root in Nepal at the time of Aśoka (d. 232 or 238 B.C.E.). The great caitya (stupa or religious shrine) of Svayambhu, one of two foci of Newar Buddhist practice, may date from this time. The other great Newar site, the Lokeshvara at Bungamati, was well established as part of the pan-Asian Amoghapasa cult by the eighth century, and in this period Newar Vajrayana attained its early coherence. Nepalese Vajrayana retained its distinct local identity even as it helped to form high Pala Vajrayana of India, which returned to Nepal as refugees were driven from the great Indian Buddhist universities with their destruction around 1200.

From the thirteenth century on, Newar Vajrayana settled into its later form, emphasizing Chakrasamvara and the Mother Tantras but still preserving the Bodhisattva Amoghapasa Lokeshvara and the Buddha Vairocana as key figures. Nepal had long been a training ground for Tibetan Buddhists, but the Newar sangha (order) now turned inward, preserving Indic texts and forms while retaining strong commercial contacts with Tibet. By 1450 the extinction of Indian Buddhism led to a crisis in Newar Buddhism, which reinvented itself as an independent tradition and produced the last great Sanskrit Buddhist sutras (texts). These show a complex mix of Mahayana and Vajrayana ritual, thought, and iconography.

After 1768, with the advent of the modern Nepalese state, Newar Buddhism entered a long phase of decline. There was a period of intense creativity in the early 1800s, but the anti-Buddhist ideology of the Gorkha state pushed middle-class Buddhists to adopt Hindu names and affiliations.

In the twentieth century, the opening of Nepal fostered a more complex and indeterminate practice among Newar Buddhists. As a result of the emergence of Newar Theravada in the 1930s, the influx of Tibetan refugees after 1950, and the development of Kathmandu as a site on the “Hippy Trail,” Newar Buddhists found their homeland converted to a center of modern eclectic Buddhism. Even though traditional high Newar Vajrayana is still taught and practiced by Vajracarya priests, its transmission is closed and secret. However, middle-class Newar Buddhists may go to Theravada monasteries for life-cycle rituals, some Vajracaryas and Sakyas have links with charismatic Tibetan lamas, and Japanese Buddhist pilgrims now visit the great Newar monasteries.

Sources:

- Gellner, David N. Monk, Householder, and Tantric Priest: Newar Buddhism and Its Hierarchy of Ritual. London: Cambridge University Press, 1992.
- Lewis, Todd T. Popular Buddhist Texts from Nepal: Narratives and Rituals of Newar Buddhism. Albany: State University of New York Press, 2000.
- Locke, John K., S.J. Karunamaya. Kathmandu: Tribhuvan University, 1980.
- von Rospatt, Alexander. “On the Conception of Stupa in Vajrayana Buddhism: The Example of the Svayambhucaitya of Kathmandu.” Journal of the Nepal Research Centre 11 (1999): 121–147.

Ngunzist Churches (Congo)

At the same time that the KIMBANGUIST CHURCH was developing in the 1920s, an alternative Kimbanguist movement known as Ngunzism (from the Kikongo word ngunza, or prophet) began to appear. This movement, like some of the HARRIST CHURCH movements in West Africa, went much further than the prophet Simon KIMBANGU (c. 1887–1951) had intended, seeing Kimbangu as a political figure, a black Messiah who would dramatically return from prison and destroy the colonialists with a holy war. Some said he would restore the ancient Kongo Empire. He founded the Amical Balali movement for the liberation of the French Congo (Brazzaville). His movement, known as Amicalism, was at first a movement for political liberation. Matswa was imprisoned in 1930, where he remained until his death in 1942. He, like Kimbangu before him, was transformed by his followers into a religious figure—a savior and messiah who would come back to free his people from oppression and restore the old Kongo Empire. Many legends about miracles surrounding Kimbangu after his arrest were propagated. Borrowing elements from THE SALVATION ARMY, which had arrived in the Congo in 1934, several Ngunzist groups were formed, including the independent Congolese Salvation Army.

In 1939 Simon-Pierre Mpadi, who trained as a Salvation Army officer, founded the Mission of the Blacks, the best-known of the Ngunzi movements. The colonial authorities saw all these groups as belonging to one Kimbanguist movement and they sought to destroy them—even though the Kimbanguists and Kimbangu himself had repudiated the views of Ngunzism. Mpadi’s even more powerful movement was known as Mpadism or the Khaki movement, after the khaki uniforms worn by his followers. Mpadi became the second and “greater” prophet of this Congolese church, and he built on the traditions surrounding Kimbangu and Matswa. He tried to unite various Ngunzist groups and succeeded in bringing Amicalism into his movement after Matswa’s death. Mpadi himself was arrested in 1949 and imprisoned in the same prison as Kimbangu, and during that time his followers formed one of the most influential churches in the Congo.

A decree on Christmas Eve 1959 by the colonial administration gave recognition to the existence of religious “sects.” On his release from prison in 1960, when a general amnesty was given to African prophets in preparation for independence, Mpadi refused to join the Kimbanguists when invited to do so. He reorganized his Mission of the Blacks as the Church of the Blacks and Africa. He declared that Kimbangu had appointed him, Mpadi, head of the Kimbanguist Church. In contrast to the Kimbanguists, Mpadi’s church made polygyny compulsory and encouraged dancing, drumming, and displays of ecstasy. Mpadi was a messiah-like figure who wore a red gown and crown, held a scepter, and claimed to have been resurrected fourteen times.

Relationships between the prophetic churches and the government in the Congo (Kinshasa) were strained. In 1971 President Mobutu Sese Seko (1930–1997) forced the consolidation of most of the churches in the country by declaring an approved list of only six churches, one of which was the Kimbanguist Church. Even harsher laws were imposed in 1979, severely curtailing the activities of any unregistered religious groups. Several significant African Initiated Churches had to seek and obtain registration by affiliating with the Église du Christ au Congo (CHURCH OF CHRIST IN THE CONGO), the recognized Protestant ecumenical council.

The Ngunzist movement differs from the Kimbanguist Church in several ways. Unlike the latter, Ngunzism is a heterogeneous movement located largely in the western Congo basin, consisting mostly of small, unorganized groups loyal to a local prophet. Christian hymns, prayers, and the Bible are of secondary importance, and the main emphasis is on “organized quaking” and the beating of drums, accompanied by collective ecstasy, shrieking, and trance, which are believed to manifest possession by the Holy Spirit. Although many of these ecstatic manifestations were found in the ministry of Kimbangu, the Kimbanguists later discouraged any excessive emotionalism. Traditional African rituals and customs, including polygyny, are usually promoted in the Ngunzist movement.

Different religious groups in the region begin as movements of cultural and religious renaissance, others as political and anti-White protest movements, but most have made use of the mystique associated with the name of one of Africa’s greatest prophets, Simon Kimbangu.

Allan H. Anderson

Sources:

- Anderson, Allan H. African Reformation: African Initiated Christianity in the Twentieth Century. Lawrenceville, NJ: Africa World Press, 2001.
- Andersson, Efraim. Messianic Popular Movements in the Lower Congo. Uppsala: Studia Ethnographica Upsaliensia, No. 16, 1958.

- Ernest Wamba-dia-Wamba. “Bundu dia Kongo: A Congolese Fundamentalist Religious Movement.” In East African Expressions of Christianity, edited by Thomas Spear and Isaria N. Kimambo, 213–228. Oxford: James Currey, 1999.
- MacGaffey, Wyatt. Modern Kongo Prophets: Religion in a Plural Society. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1983.

Nicaragua

The Republic of Nicaragua is the second largest country in Central America, bordered by Costa Rica to the south and Honduras to the north. Plagued by a humid climate, perpetual poverty and underdevelopment, natural disasters (hurricanes, floods, earthquakes, and volcanic eruptions), dictatorships and corrupt governments, civil wars and foreign military intervention, many Nicaraguans decided to abandon their country beginning in the 1970s to seek refuge in Costa Rica, Miami, or Los Angeles. This mass exodus of Nicaraguan refugees caused families to be separated, but it has also generated millions of dollars of support from those living abroad to help their relatives in Nicaragua. Turmoil continues to plague the nation today as political factions wage unending verbal warfare against their opponents while seeking to gain advantage in the next elections.

In addition, Nicaragua has long been a nation divided by its geography and ethnicity. A central mountain range divides the country from north to south, and there are few roads on the broad Caribbean coastal plain—an area over half of the national territory that is dissected by hundreds of rivers and streams. Historically, the Caribbean coast and the central mountain region have been thinly populated, whereas the Pacific coastal region has been more heavily populated, originally by native peoples and later by Spanish settlers and their descendants.

Prior to Spanish colonization, the Caribbean coast was populated by the Miskito, Sumo, and Rama peoples of Macro-Chibchan origin (the predominant group in Colombia) who lived in scattered fishing villages on the coast and along the inland waterways, whereas the Pacific coast was largely home to linguistic family groups that migrated south along the Pacific coast from present-day Mexico as early as 1000 B.C.E.: Chontales, Chorotegas (Dirianes and Nagrañanos), and Nicaraos (Nahua-Náhuatl-Pipil speakers of Uto-Aztecian origins). Today, the descendants of these ethnic groups live in the southwest region of Matagalpa (Misumalpan), León (Subtiaba), and Masaya (Monimbó). Overall, there were about 194,000 native peoples in Nicaragua in 1990, the majority of whom were Roman Catholics (Pacific coast) or Protestants (Caribbean coast, mainly Moravian Miskitos).

Christopher Columbus (1451–1506) discovered the territory of Nicaragua during his fourth voyage to the New World in 1502, when he sailed along the Caribbean coast and explored the area of Cabo Gracias a Dios at the mouth of the Coco River. But it was not until 1523 that Spanish colonists, led by Andrés Niño and Gil González Dávila (c. 1570–1658), arrived on the west coast of Nicaragua from Panama to begin the arduous task of subjugating the Indians and converting them to Roman Catholicism and of creating Spanish settlements in Granada, León, and El Realejo. Although the Spanish conquerors were successful on the Pacific coast, their efforts were unfruitful on the Caribbean coast, which was dominated by the Miskito people and smaller native groups. Later, the British established an alliance with the Miskitos, who became their intermediaries with the Spanish, and the British established not only trading colonies but also a military presence on the Miskito Coast for several hundred years. The first Roman Catholic church was established in Granada in 1524 by FRANCISCANS, but most missionary work during the colonial period was done by the JESUITS.

Protestant missionary activity in eastern Nicaragua can be traced to Anglican efforts in the 1760s, although an Anglican influence was present as early as the 1620s among the scattered British trading settlements and logging camps on the Miskito Shore. The Wesleyan (British) Methodists made a weak and unsuccessful attempt to establish themselves in the port of Bluefields in the 1830s, mainly among the Creoles (English-speaking African Americans from the British West Indies). But serious efforts to evangelize the Creoles and Indians in eastern Nicaragua did not begin until the arrival of the German United Brethren (see MORAVIAN CHURCH IN NICARAGUA) at Bluefields in 1849. From their base in Bluefields, the Moravians began evangelizing the Miskitos, Sumos, Ramas, Garífunas (an African Caribbean people deported by the British from the island of St. Vincent to the Caribbean coast in 1789), and Creoles (concentrated in the port settlements). The Jamaican Baptists were active in the Corn Islands of Nicaragua during the 1850s, and the Anglicans (now a diocese in the EPISCOPAL CHURCH) renewed their efforts on the Miskito Shore during the 1880s.

Prior to 1900, few Protestant attempts had been made among the Spanish-speaking population of western Nicaragua, either in the Pacific coastal region or in the cen-

Status of religions in Nicaragua, 2000-2050

Followers	2000			2025	2050
	total	%	rate
Christians	4,886,000	96.3	2.83	8,289,000	10,956,000
Roman Catholics	4,320,000	85.1	2.81	7,050,000	8,800,000
Protestants	590,000	11.6	3.09	1,150,000	1,620,000
Independents	155,000	3.1	3.30	330,000	470,000
Spiritists	71,500	1.4	3.43	140,000	200,000
Nonreligious	67,900	1.3	3.74	180,000	320,000
Ethnoreligionists	26,800	0.5	3.75	40,000	50,000
Baha'is	9,600	0.2	2.79	20,000	30,000
Buddhists	5,800	0.1	3.34	12,000	20,000
Atheists	2,300	0.1	6.86	6,000	10,000
Chinese folk-religionists	2,300	0.0	2.99	4,500	8,000
Muslims	860	0.0	1.97	1,500	2,200
Jews	500	0.0	2.19	800	1,200
other religionists	920	0.0	2.11	2,000	3,000
Total population	5,074,000	100.0	2.86	8,696,000	11,600,000

tral highlands. However, several successful missionary efforts had begun to produce fruit among the Hispanicized population by 1940. The independent Central American Mission began its labors in 1900, independent Pentecostals in 1911, the American Baptists (now the AMERICAN BAPTIST CHURCHES IN THE U.S.A.) in 1917, and the ASSEMBLIES OF GOD in 1936. The SEVENTH-DAY ADVENTIST CHURCH, which initiated mission work on the Caribbean coast among the Creoles in 1904, did not begin to expand their efforts to western Nicaragua until the 1940s.

Protestant church growth was slow in Nicaragua prior to the mid-1960s. In 1937, only seven Protestant mission agencies had begun work on either coast; however, by 1965, twenty-six Protestant denominations were active in Nicaragua and, by 1978, forty-six new denominations had arrived. In 1980, there were at least seventy-two Protestant denominations in Nicaragua with about fifteen hundred organized congregations that were being served by over 300 ordained national pastors, 760 unordained lay workers, and 83 foreign missionaries (up from 41 missionaries in 1973). In 1936, 75 percent of the Protestant Church members were Indians and Creoles on the Caribbean coast, and only 25 percent were Hispanics on the western seaboard. In 1980, the situation was reversed: 70 percent of the Protestant membership lived on the Pacific coast (including the central mountain region) and only 30 percent on the Miskito Shore, which represented a drastic shift in the strength of Protestantism in Nicaragua during the previous forty-four years.

The main Protestant denominations in Nicaragua in 1980 were the MORAVIAN CHURCH IN NICARAGUA (12,950 members), Assemblies of God (8,500), the Seventh-day Adventists (6,073), CHURCH OF GOD (CLEVELAND, TENNESSEE; 5,250), BAPTIST CONVENTION OF NICARAGUA (4,659), Baptist International Mission (3,040), APOSTOLIC CHURCH OF FAITH IN JESUS CHRIST (3,600), the independent United Pentecostal Evangelical Mission (3,004), and the Free Apostolic Church (3,000). Pentecostals represented 45 percent of all Protestants; the Adventists, 7.8 percent; liturgical groups (Episcopalians and Lutherans), 2.4 percent; other non-Pentecostals, 44.2 percent; and unclassified groups, 0.6 percent. Many of the more conservative Protestant groups are associated together in the Consejo Nacional Evangélico de Nicaragua, which is affiliated with the WORLD EVANGELICAL ALLIANCE. The Baptist Convention and the Moravian Church in Nicaragua are members of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES.

By 1995, there were 220 Protestant church associations and at least 113 independent churches in Nicaragua, for a total of 4,402 churches with a Protestant population of 534,284 or 12.2 percent of the national population (1995 census). The largest denominations were the Assemblies of God (603 churches with 65,315 members), the Moravian Church (144 churches with 52,274 members), Church of God International (363 churches with 21,308 members), United Pentecostal Evangelical Mission (273 churches with 19,200 members), PENTECOSTAL CHURCH OF GOD of Puerto Rico (211 churches with 12,529 members), Apostolic Church of Faith in Jesus Christ (187 churches with 12,122 members), CHURCH OF GOD OF PROPHECY (170 churches with 11,870 members), Baptist Convention of Nicaragua (112 churches with 10,158 members), Association of Christian Churches (98 churches with 8,321 members), Pentecostal Mission of Christian Churches (117 churches with 6,024 members), Free Apostolic Churches (90 churches with 5,727 members), CHURCH OF THE NAZARENE (98 churches with 5,066 members), Seventh-day Adventists (75 churches with 4,946 members), independent Churches of Christ (37 churches with 4,718 members), Convention of Mennonite Churches (83 churches with 4,306 members), Fraternity of Central American Churches (102 churches with 4,257 members), Baptist International Mission (38 churches with 4,080 members), BRETHREN IN CHRIST (90 churches with 3,682 members), INTERNATIONAL CHURCH OF THE FOURSQUARE GOSPEL (55 churches with 3,198 members), and Faith and Hope Lutheran Churches (25 churches with 3,081 members).

Also present in Nicaragua are the JEHOVAH'S WITNESSES, the CHURCH OF JESUS CHRIST OF LATTER-DAY SAINTS, the Light of the World Church, the UNIVERSAL CHURCH OF THE KINGDOM OF GOD, the God Is Love Church, the Voice of the Cornerstone, and the Growing in Grace Church.

Other groups include BUDDHISM (primarily Chinese), JUDAISM, ISLAM, Myalism-Obeah, GARIFUNA RELIGION and Amerindian religions, the INTERNATIONAL SOCIETY FOR KRISHNA CONSCIOUSNESS, the BAHÁ'Í FAITH, Yoga, UNIFICATION MOVEMENT, and the Grand Universal Fraternity (an Esoteric group from Venezuela).

According to the National Census of 1995, religious affiliation in Nicaragua was as follows: Roman Catholic, 77.5 percent; Protestant, 12.2 percent; other religions (including marginal Christian), 1.9 percent; and none/no response, 8.4 percent. In addition, a 1998 public opinion poll on religious affiliation of the population in the capital city of Managua by the Institute of Social Studies in Population (Instituto de Estudios Sociales en Poblacion, IDESPO) at the National University of Costa Rica revealed the following: Roman Catholic, 56 percent; Protestant, 30 percent; other religions or no religion, 12.6 percent; and no response, 1.4 percent. The 1998 Evangelical Church Directory, produced by INDEF, listed 1,182 Protestant congregations in Managua, which had a population of 1,093,760 in 1995. The total estimated population of Nicaragua in mid-2000 was 5,074,000.

Clifton L. Holland

Sources:

- Grimes, Barbara F., ed. Ethnologue: Languages of the World. 12th ed. Dallas, TX: Summer Institute of Linguistics, 1992.
- Holland, Clifton L., ed. World Christianity: Central America and the Caribbean. Monrovia, CA: MARC-World Vision, 1981.
- INDEF. Directorio de las Iglesias Protestantes en Nicaragua, 1996-1997. Managua, Nicaragua: Departamento de Investigaciones Socio-Religiosas, Instituto Nicaraguense de Evangelismo a Fondo, 1998.
- Matamoros Ruiz, Bartolomé. Historia de las Asambleas de Dios en Nicaragua. Managua, Nicaragua: Distribidora Vida, 1984.
- Read, William R., et al. Latin American Church Growth. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans Publishing Company, 1969.
- Revista de Historia del Protestantismo Nicaraguense* [Journal of the History of Nicaraguan Protestantism]. Managua, Nicaragua: CIEETS, September 1993.

Nichiren Shōshū

948

Nichiren Shōshū is a Japanese Buddhist religious sect founded by Nikkō (1246–1333), one of the disciples of Nichiren (1222–1282). After the death of Nichiren, his disciples agreed that the guardianship of his tomb should rotate among his six senior disciples. Two years later when the rotation finished, Nikkō broke away from the NICHIREN-SHU and in 1290 he founded Taiseikiji Temple, the present head temple of Nichiren Shōshū, at the foot of Mount Fuji. Over the centuries other Nichiren sects also developed. After the Meiji Restoration in 1868, followers in Nikkō's lineage were forced into association with the other Nichirenist sects. However, in 1900 it became independent and took the name Nichiren Shōshū in 1912.

In the 1920s, Tsunesaburō Makiguchi (1871–1944), the founder of Sōka Gakkai, a Nichiren Shōshū lay association, was converted to Nichiren Shōshū. Although remaining small through the 1930s, after World War II SOKA GAKKAI INTERNATIONAL emerged as an aggressive proselytizing organization through which Nichiren Shōshū experienced dramatic growth and spread worldwide. Although Sōka Gakkai had provided funds and buildings to Nichiren Shōshū, friction between the two organizations occurred almost from the beginning of the foundation of Sōka Gakkai.

The conflict grew through the 1980s, and in 1991 Nichiren Shōshū pronounced excommunication on Sōka Gakkai, on the grounds that Sōka Gakkai had gone against Nichiren Shōshū teachings. The process of separating the two organizations took several years, and in 1997 the leadership of Nichiren Shōshū ordered all of its members to completely disaffiliate with Sōka Gakkai by November 30, 1997, or lose their membership status. In the break, the majority of members (especially those residing outside Japan) adhered to Sōka Gakkai, but a large minority of the non-Japanese believers remained loyal, and Nichiren Shōshū has retained its presence throughout the Japanese diaspora.

Members of Nichiren Shōshū believe that in mappō (the last period of history, a degenerate age in which the Buddhist law is no longer observed), only Nichiren and the Lotus Sutra can save this world and that the government should endorse Nichiren Buddhism and establish it as the state religion—a principle known as ōbutsu myōgo (a polity fundamentally united with Buddhism). This policy has led Nichiren Shōshū into the political arena, and in the last half of the twentieth century it had close relations with a new political party. That party, the Komei Kai, adhered to Sōka Gakkai after 1991. It has officially dropped any organizational ties to any religious organizations in the wake of the changes in Japan following the AUM SHINRIKYO disaster in 1995.

Nichiren Shōshū reveres Nichiren as the religious founder (shūso) and Nikkō as the sectarian founder (haso).

As with other Nichirenist sects and movements, the Daimoku, a chanting of namu myōhō rengekyō (adoration to the Lotus Sutra) is of central importance because it is believed that the invocation has a miraculous power to fulfill one's wish and lead to enlightenment.

Nichiren Shōshū is currently led by Abe Nikken. Its reported membership in 2000 was 338,000. It is a member of the JAPAN BUDDHIST FEDERATION.

Address:

Nichiren Shōshū Headquarters
Taiseikiji, 2057 Kamijo
Fujinomiya-shi, Shizuoka Prefecture 418-0116
Japan
<http://www.cebunet.com/nst/> (in English)
<http://www.nichirensoshu.or.jp/> (in Japanese)

Keishin Inaba

Sources:

Hori, Ichiro, et al., eds. Japanese Religion: A Survey by the Agency for Cultural Affairs. Tokyo: Kodansha International, 1972.
Wilson, Bryan, and Karel Dobbelaere. A Time to Chant: The Soka Gakkai Buddhists in Britain. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1994.

Nichirensū

The term Nichirensū refers to a collection of Japanese Buddhist sects that have grown out of the life and work of Nichiren (1222–1282). Nichiren studied Tendai Buddhism at Mount Hiei and came to believe that the Lotus Sutra, the most famous Buddhist Sanskrit text, was also the most important Buddhist scripture and that it taught the ways of transformation, bliss, and law. Followers were taught to call upon the Lotus Sutra through the Daimoku, a chanting of namu myōhō renga kyō (adoration to the Lotus Sutra). The repetition of this phrase is the most distinctive practice of the Nichirensū and groups derived from it, and it is believed that its frequent use has a miraculous power to lead to enlightenment. Worship and repetition of the Daimoku is performed in front of the Gohonzon, a mandala upon which the chant is inscribed along with the names of various Buddhas, bodhisattvas, and other Buddhist deities.

In 1260, Nichiren presented the teaching of Risshō ankoku ron (the establishment of righteousness and the security of the nation), stating that Japan would suffer from natural calamities and social ills if the government did not adopt the teaching. He also presented a view of world history divided into three millennia. The first, shobo, began with the Buddha's death and constituted the period of true law. The second, zobo (image law) followed. The third period, which began in 1052 C.E., is called mappō (the end of the law). It will last, not just one thousand years, but ten thousand. During mappo, the Lotus Sutra is the way of salvation.

During his lifetime, Nichiren harshly attacked other religious groups, and in turn Nichiren's sect itself later split into a number of subsects, including Kenpon Hokkeshū, NIPPONZAN MYOHOJI, NICHIREN SHOSHU, and Hokkeshū. There are also numerous Nichiren-related new religions such as REIYUKAI, RISSHO KOSEI-KAI, and SOKA GAKKAI INTERNATIONAL.

The head temple of Nichirenshū is Minobesan Kuonji located in Yamanashi Prefecture. It is currently led by Fujii Nikkō. With a membership in 2000 of 3,845,986, it is currently one of the largest Buddhist groups in Japan. It is also a member of the JAPAN BUDDHIST FEDERATION. It sponsors Risho University in Tokyo and Minobusan Junior College in Minobu, Yamanashi-ken.

Nichirenshū has a significant following overseas, especially in Korea, the United States, and Brazil.

Address:

Nichirenshū Headquarters
Ikegami Honganji
1-32-15 Ikegami
Ota-ku, Tokyo 146-8544
Japan

<http://www.nichirenshu.org/> (Los Angeles Temple)

<http://www.nichiren.or.jp/> (Headquarters in Tokyo, in Japanese)

Keishin Inaba

Sources:

Agency for Cultural Affairs. Shūkyō Nenkan [Yearbook of religions]. Tokyo: Gyosei, 2001.

Anesaki, Masaharu. History of Japanese Religion. London: Kegan Paul Trench Trubner & Co., 1930.

———. Nichiren, the Buddhist Prophet. Cambridge: Harvard University Press, 1949.

Buddhist Denominations and Schools in Japan. Tokyo: Bukkyō Dendo Kyokai, 1984.

Nichiren-Buddhist Service Companion. Chicago: Headquarters of the Nichiren Buddhist Temple of North America, 1968.

Niger

Niger is a large country in central West Africa. The largest part of its territory is in the Sahara Desert, and most people reside in the southern part of the country immediately north of the border with Nigeria. This area has been inhabited for several thousand years. A kingdom, the Nok Empire, arose in southern Niger and had hegemony for many centuries prior to its decline in the sixth century. Its cities were important stops on the trade routes across the Sahara to the north and eastward to the Nile River valley. Successive regimes appeared through the centuries of the modern era.

Sixteenth-century mosque in Agadez (Corel)

The French entered the area in the nineteenth century, in 1922 annexing Niger as a French colony. They attempted to introduce cash crops for export, leading to periodic food shortages. At the time it became an independent nation in 1960, Niger was among the poorest of the African nations. On the heels of a major drought in the early 1970s, the army took control of the government and introduced a number of reforms. An economic boom followed, which ended in 1980 with a fall in prices of uranium, one of the country's few mineral assets.

Islam entered Niger in the eleventh century along the trade routes from the Mediterranean coast. Most Muslims are of the Sunni MALIKITE SCHOOL OF ISLAM, but the TĪJANIYYA SUFI ORDER is especially strong among the Tuareg, Kanuri, Fulani, and Hausa peoples. A school for the training of religious leaders is found in Say, a Muslim holy city. Although Islam largely replaced the traditional beliefs of the various native peoples of Niger, traditional beliefs remain strong among the Kurfei and Mauri peoples. And resistance to Islam is notable among the Serma-Songhai and Beriberi.

It was not until the twentieth century that Christianity arrived in Niger. The Sudan Interior Mission, an independent Evangelical sending agency, sent its representatives into the area in 1923. They opened the initial mission station at Zinder the next year. Their work resulted in the present-day Evangelical Church of Niger, which supports a hospital at Galmi, one of the important medical facilities in the country, and a Bible school in Niamey. In 1991 the church faced a major schism that led to the founding of two additional denominations, the Union of Evangelical Protestant Churches of Niger and the Evangelical Church Salama of Niger.

Evangelical Baptist Missions, a sending agency dedicated to the spread of Christianity in French-speaking countries, began work in 1929 that led to the present-day Union des Églises Évangéliques Baptistes. A rather limited spectrum of Protestant churches entered through the remainder of the century, the CHERUBIM AND SERAPHIM, one of several African Initiated churches from Nigeria, and the NEW APOSTOLIC CHURCH from Germany showing some limited response. No churches or church associations based in Niger are members of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES or the WORLD EVANGELICAL ALLIANCE.

The ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH came to Niger from an earlier base in Dahomey (now Benin) in 1931. It had very little success among the local population, and the great majority of its members are expatriates residing in Niger, many from neighboring African states. Nevertheless, a diocese was created in 1961. In 1972 the ordination of the first Niger priest became a cause for national celebration. Among those in attendance was the grand imam of Niamey, a leading figure in the Muslim community.

There is a small community of the BAHÁ'Í FAITH in Niger, but other major religious traditions beyond those already mentioned are as yet unrepresented.

Sources:

Bauswein, Jean-Jacques, and Lukas Vischer, eds. The Reformed Family Worldwide: A Survey of Reformed Churches, Theological Schools, and International Organizations. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans Publishing Company, 1999.

Status of religions in the Niger, 2000-2050

Followers	2000			2025	2050
	total	%	rate
Muslims	9,732,000	90.7	3.37	20,146,000	30,464,000
Ethnoreligionists	929,000	8.7	2.94	1,200,000	1,300,000
Christians	58,600	0.6	3.36	124,000	213,000
Independents	25,000	0.2	5.24	60,000	110,000
Roman Catholics	19,700	0.2	1.12	30,000	40,000
Protestants	13,000	0.1	3.98	32,000	60,000
Nonreligious	7,400	0.1	4.48	20,000	40,000
Baha'is	3,000	0.0	3.07	6,000	12,000
Total population	10,730,000	100.0	3.33	21,495,000	32,029,000

Norris, H. T. Sufi Mystics of the Niger Desert: Sidi Mahmud and the Hermits of Air. Oxford, UK: Clarendon, 1990.

Nigeria

Nigeria, a country with an estimated population of over 120 million, is often referred to as “the Giant.” The most populous country in sub-Saharan Africa, it contains a vast diversity of ethnic and cultural backgrounds, comprising over four hundred languages. The religious landscape of this geopolitical entity is highly complex and dynamic. Essentially, it is characterized by a multiplicity of religious traditions, including the traditional local religions and worldviews, the various strands of Christianity and Islam, as well as newer Spiritual Science movements. Many of the most recent manifestations of these various religions have come to be subsumed under the category of new religious movements. Another recent phenomenon that is easily noticeable within Nigeria's multi-faith scenario is what has been described elsewhere as civil religion.

Accurate statistics for each tradition are difficult to come by and are largely a matter of conjecture. However, it is evident that the major religions in Nigeria are Christianity and Islam, both influenced in part by indigenous religious traditions. The politicization of religious statistics has become even more controversial with the enduring debate about whether Nigeria is a secular or a religious state. Whatever the case, religious ideas and worldviews continue to shape the ways that Nigerians explain, predict, and control the events and life circumstances that surround them. Religion has served and is still serving as a significant source through which many Nigerians seek understanding of their complex reality and existence, and it serves as a panacea for their various existential problems of day-to-day living.

The indigenous religions of the various ethnic and cultural groups in Nigeria are apparently the oldest religious form in the region. Examples of indigenous religion have come to be referred to, especially in academic circles, by the name of the respective language groups: YORUBAN RELIGION, Igbo religion, Edo religion, Kalabari religion, Hausa religion, Tiv religion, and so on. This categorization does not in any way presuppose a kind of uniformity of beliefs and rituals among these peoples. Indigenous religions are more or less localized; some beliefs may be more widespread while others may vary from one ethnic group or subgroup to another. What the categorization suggests instead is an aggregation of shared, similar, and related but sometimes quite different belief and ritual systems, often shaped by particular ethnic and social groups, power structures, and even the characteristics of natural phenomenon in each respective locality. The indigenous religions do not lay claim to any specific historical origins but are believed to have been transmitted from one generation to another. One essential characteristic shared by the Nigerian indigenous religions is the belief in a Supreme Being, as well as various divinities, spirits, ancestors, and mysterious powers such as witchcraft, sorcery, and magic. However, it must be noted that the names, attributes, and significance of these supramundane entities may vary from one locality to an-

Status of religions in Nigeria, 2000-2050

Followers	2000		2025	2050
	total	% rate
Christians	51,123,000	45.9 2.60	86,000,000	115,258,000
Independents	23,975,000	21.5 3.25	34,000,000	50,000,000
Anglicans	20,070,000	18.0 3.09	34,770,000	46,400,000
Protestants	14,050,000	12.6 2.76	25,000,000	36,000,000
Muslims	49,000,000	43.9 2.52	82,107,000	111,500,000
Ethnoreligionists	10,964,000	9.8 1.99	14,000,000	16,000,000
Nonreligious	326,000	0.3 5.02	700,000	1,100,000
Atheists	39,300	0.0 1.92	100,000	200,000
Baha'is	27,000	0.0 0.78	80,000	160,000
Buddhists	6,000	0.0 1.76	15,000	30,000
Chinese folk-religionists	3,300	0.0 0.93	7,000	14,000
Jews	800	0.0 0.04	2,000	4,000
other religionists	16,700	0.0 1.10	30,000	45,000
Total population	111,506,000	100.0 2.51	183,041,000	244,311,000

other. The concept of God is called Olodumare or Olorun among the Yoruba, Osanobua among the Edo, and Chukwu or Chineke among the Igbo.

The description of these groups as "indigenous" or "traditional" does not in any way suggest that they are static and moribund. Their dynamism is partly exemplified by their tendency toward growth and innovation, a development that has given birth to what is now described as neotraditional movements. A case in point is Ijo Orunmila, a movement founded in the 1930s by Yoruba Christians seeking to reestablish links with their traditional religious heritage. In 1963 the Arousa cult (Edo National Church), which developed from Bini indigenous religion, fused with another neotraditional movement, the National Church of Nigeria, to form what is now referred to as Godianism. The Bori cult, a neotraditional movement prominent among

An Oshun festival in the Oshun River, Nigeria (J. Highet/TRIP)

Hausa women, draws partly on Islamic beliefs and practices. Also significant here are the various transformations of the Nigerian indigenous religions in diaspora, including SANTERÍA, CANDOMBLÉ, and the numerous Orisa cults. These are only a few examples of the creativity and innovation inherent in these indigenous religions.

The prevailing wave of modernization and social change has resulted in the decline of some features of the indigenous religion even as it has brought about a revitalization and modification of other aspects of the indigenous practices and modes of thought. The claim that Christianity and Islam totally outweighed the indigenous religion in their religious encounter is somewhat problematic. It becomes especially questionable when one considers how and to what extent these “external” religious traditions have engaged the indigenous religion in their attempt to contextualize and to make their messages more intelligible and acceptable to the Nigerian people. The indigenous religious worldview or aspects of it still largely pervade, consciously or unconsciously, the religious outlook and vision of many Nigerians, irrespective of their new religious convictions and backgrounds. The pertinence and reality of the indigenous religions for many individuals and communities in contemporary Nigeria is evident in the growing popularity of cults of divinities such as Ogun, Osun, and Oya. Religious festivals such as the Osun Oshogbo festival are gaining prominence among adherents and non-adherents alike, and the annual event is assuming international popularity. Kingship rituals such as the Igue Festival in Benin City, secret societies such as the Ogboni Society in western Nigeria, masquerades such as Egungun and Eyo among the Yoruba, divination, healing, and oracle systems such as Arockukwu among the Igbo and Ifa among the Yoruba are instances of the various ways and avenues through which the indigenous religions manifest their resilience in the face of a complex, multireligious, and rapidly changing society.

Islam touched on the Nigerian soil long before Christianity. It made its debut as early as the eleventh century, entering from the interior of the continent across the West African savannahs and the Sahara Desert to the north. Through the activities of Arab and Berber merchants from western Sudan and North Africa, Islam made inroads in many cities in the north, especially in the kingdom of Kanem-Bornu. In the late fourteenth and early fifteenth centuries, Islam was also introduced through the influence of Wangarawa-Dyula traders in the city kingdoms of Hausaland. Before the sixteenth century, Islam in northern Nigeria was very much mixed with Hausa traditional religion. The earliest attempts at propagating Islam produced what remained essentially a religion of the merchants, of the towns, the ulama (learned men), and the ruling class. It was only in the seventeenth century that it started to expand among other segments of the population. By 1700, the Sunni MALIKITE SCHOOL OF ISLAM began to generate immense support among all levels of Hausa society. The influence of the religion started to be felt in southwestern Nigeria only in the eighteenth century through the incursion of Hausa traders.

During the nineteenth century, a number of reform movements aimed at purifying Islam and more or less characterized by militancy were launched throughout West Africa. Another motivation of these reform movements was to create theocratic states based on Shari'ah (sharia), the Islamic law. The successful jihad (holy war) under the leadership of Uthman Dan Fodio (d. 1817) in 1804 turned Islam into a religion of the masses and further resulted in a theocratic state, the Sokoto Caliphate. In this state there was extensive autonomy for emirates, who recognized the spiritual authority of the caliph (sultan). Over thirty emirates were created during the course of the nineteenth century. The successful execution of the jihad also enhanced the spread of Islam within and beyond the north. Through military conquest, the caliphate expanded south into the Middle Belt region, thus leading to the forceful incorporation of other ethnic groups and non-Muslims into the emirates of the Islamic polity.

During the seventeenth century, the Oyo Kingdom had already been in contact with Hausa Muslims through trade. In 1817 the revolt by the pastoral Fulani, Hausa slaves, and Muslim Yoruba converts in Ilorin dealt a death blow to the Oyo Kingdom, followed by a series of internecine civil wars around Yorubaland. By the twentieth century, Islam had spread to northern Yorubaland with an emirate in Ilorin, from where it moved on to other Yoruba towns such as Osogbo, Ibadan, Oyo, and Iwo. Islam experienced hostility in southeastern Nigeria because of the annexation of Ilorin and northern Yorubaland by the Sokoto Caliphate. However, Muslim traders gradually reestablished themselves into Yoruba commercial towns, thus leading to the integration of Yoruba Islam into traditional society. The evangelization of the southwest by Hausa traders and preachers was largely carried out through peaceful means and involved several Islamic organizations. Some of these towns reckoned predominantly Islamic populations, even in the face of competition with Christianity, which was already well established in Yorubaland at the time Islam came. The integration of Islam into Yoruba indigenous culture gave it a distinct character that makes it different from Islam in northern Nigeria.

The diversity and complexity of Islamic movements in Nigeria is partly exemplified by the Sufi orders or brotherhoods. Two major movements that were involved in the Islamization process in Nigeria were the QADIRIYYA SUFI ORDER and the TIJANIYYA SUFI ORDER. The former is much older and has spread widely in northern Nigeria since the nineteenth century. The Qadiriyya emphasizes intellectual pursuits more than the Tijaniyya and was also introduced in the nineteenth century. The two brotherhoods have witnessed tension and rivalry for several decades of their existence. Other Islamic organizations oppose these two brotherhoods on the basis of doctrine. Yoruba Muslims have formed various societies whose task is to provide Muslims with a modern education that does not conflict with Islamic values. The AHMADIYYA MOVEMENT IN ISLAM has made significant impact in the southwest, where it is very popular. In 1923 a group broke away and formed the Ansar-ud-Deen Society. Both movements have enhanced the development of secular education, particularly in southwest Nigeria. The Ansar-ud-Deen was probably the most popular of these Muslim educational organizations. By 1960 it already ran numerous primary and secondary schools and training colleges.

The Izala (Jamaatu Izalat al-Bida) emerged in 1978, enjoining its members to reject innovation and instead work for the preservation of the Sunna. The leading representative of Izala until his death in 1992 was Abubakar Gumi, whose most important concern was to try to unite Muslims politically. However, between 1978 and 1985, many northern Nigerian towns and cities were shaken by the armed insurrections led by Mohammed Marwa Maitatsine (d. 1980) and his Yan Tatsine movement. Maitatsine had a long history of fomenting Islamic unrest in northern Nigeria. The source of his inspiration was the belief, especially in Sufi Islam, that a mujaddid (reformer) will arise each century to purify and revitalize Islam. Maitatsine's brand of Islam seemed to largely combine traditional Muslim conceptions with local indigenous elements.

One of the very visible effects of Islam in Nigeria has been the demand and subsequent declaration of Shari'ah in some states of the federation, a development that has produced protests and huge criticisms from the Christian population. The incessant religious riots in northern Nigeria have been given an added impetus with this recent development. Religion has become a matter of political significance and a source of tension in Nigeria. This religious tension has a clear connection with the growth of uncompromising Muslim and Christian activism. The relationship between Islam and Christianity has led to a growing culture of religious violence, particularly in northern Nigeria. Since the 1980s, there have been many violent clashes between Muslims and Christians, especially in the northern cities of Kano, Kaduna, Kafanchan, and Zaria. Nigeria provides a fertile ground for exploring the role of religious organizations in civil society and politics. Although there are three major religions, religious and political issues and conflicts have revolved largely around the activities of and the inter-relationships between Islam and Christianity. Their involvement in regional and national politics is aptly illustrated by their activities in post-independence politics in Nigeria.

Christianity spread along the West African coast, via the Atlantic Ocean, to the south. The first attempt at planting Christianity in Nigeria was in the late fifteenth and sixteenth centuries, a period that witnessed the activities of Portuguese Catholics in the Warri and Benin kingdoms and the Niger delta area. The Portuguese missionaries placed political and economic considerations over and above religious interests, leading to a dismal failure of this first attempt at evangelization. A more profound attempt at Christianization was made in the nineteenth century, especially following the abolition of the obnoxious trade in human slaves.

Many of the liberated slaves who had already converted to Christianity worked with foreign missions and later became the “native agents” in the eventual spread of Christianity among their own people. An example is the case of Samuel Adjai Crowther (c. 1809–1891) and his missionary role within the CHURCH MISSIONARY SOCIETY (Anglican) in Yorubaland. Christianity was accompanied by Western education, a feature that was immensely attractive to potential converts. The success of this mission attempt was witnessed along the coastal towns of Lagos, Badagry, and Abeokuta, where a large number of people were attracted to Christianity and the accompanying Western education. This impact, which was first witnessed in Yorubaland, later spread to the Niger delta and eastern Nigeria. The early missionaries who spearheaded this second evangelization process were Anglicans of the Church Missionary Society, Methodists, Baptists, and later Roman Catholics. These different bodies competed among themselves in a bid to carve out spheres of influence. With the intensification of mission work into the hinterland in the early twentieth century, Christianity expanded rapidly throughout the southwest and the central areas of Nigeria.

The British administration, under the system of indirect rule, and the emirates deliberately prohibited Christian evangelization in Muslim areas. As a result, Western education developed very slowly in northern Nigeria as compared to the southwestern part of the country. It was only in the latter part of the twentieth century that Christianity started to make inroads in the north, already the stronghold of Islam. The missionary enterprise to northern Nigeria was carried out partly by the Sudan Interior Mission (SIM). The SIM, an independent sending agency, devoted its energies to spreading the Christian gospel in northern Nigeria via church planting, literature development and dissemination, general education, and medical work. The SIM gave birth to a number of churches that together adopted the name EVANGELICAL CHURCH OF WEST AFRICA (ECWA).

Just as the West African coast was the first home and indigenous breeding ground for the mission churches in the nineteenth century, so it fulfilled the same function for the indigenous African churches in the twentieth century. AFRICAN INITIATED CHURCHES can be understood basically by examining three phases of development. The first and earliest phase refers to the group of churches that broke away from the existing mission churches owing to a number of irreconcilable issues. These flourished mainly in South Africa (Ethiopian churches) and West Africa (African churches) in the nineteenth century. They all emerged out of similar circumstances, such as rigid White (European) missionary control and domination, discrimination against local African leadership, disputes over resources, a general feeling of marginalization among educated Africans, and apartheid (mainly in the South African context). Some of the churches that seceded from the historic churches in Nigeria are the United Native African Church (1891) and the African Church (Bethel) (1901) from the Anglican Church, and the United African Methodist Church (1917) from the Methodist Church. One notable feature of these churches was that in spite of the change in church leadership, they were still tied to the apron strings of the mission churches in their liturgical and hierarchical structures. Some of them still depended largely on the parent churches for financial resources.

The 1920s and 1930s witnessed the second wave of new beginnings within African Christianity, which includes the ALADURA CHURCHES in Nigeria. These are also variously referred to as “prophetic” and “healing” churches. The most dramatic aspect of twentieth-century Christianity in Nigeria was the growth of the prophetic churches. These churches share certain basic characteristics in their worldview that helped to create a rather Nigerian brand of Christianity. These basic features include the centrality of the Bible, prayers, healing, prophecy, visions and dreams, elaborate rituals, flexible modes of worship, unstereotyped liturgy, and a charismatic leader (that is, a prophet or prophetess). The prophetic churches embrace a functional theology, and their pragmatic approach to life and existential problems endeared them to many Nigerians. Though they utterly condemn and reject the traditional religion as “fetish” and “demonic,” their belief systems and ritual structure appear to have affinities with traditional cosmologies. That is why they derive much of their membership not only from within the mainline churches but also from other Christian and non-Christian groups (Islam and traditional religion).

In spite of the affinities that abound among the prophetic churches, it is important to note that each has its own religious dynamic. There are differences in specific doctrines and in the details of ritual acts and performances, just as in their histories of emergence. Their pattern of emergence is two-fold. The first were those that emerged from or had their nucleus as “prayer bands” or “fellowship groups” within a mainline church but that later broke away to form an independent group. In Nigeria, the Garrick Braide movement was the earliest movement in this category, breaking away from the Niger Delta Pastorate Church as early as 1916. Other churches that fall under this category include the CHERUBIM AND SERAPHIM (1925), the CHURCH OF THE LORD (1930), and the CHRIST APOSTOLIC CHURCH (1930). The second category refers to those groups that did not emerge out of conscious schism from an existing mainline church. They were founded through the visionary experience of a charismatic figure and independently of any existing mission church. A typical example is the CELESTIAL CHURCH OF CHRIST, founded by Samuel Bilewu Oschoffa (1909–1985) in 1947. Most of the indigenous churches of both categories belong to a continental ecumenical movement, the ORGANIZATION OF AFRICAN INSTITUTED CHURCHES (OAIC).

The most recent development within Nigerian Christianity is the emergence and increasing proliferation of Pentecostal and Charismatic churches, especially from the 1950s and onwards. A huge proliferation of new Pentecostal churches was witnessed in the last two decades of the twentieth century in Nigeria. In an attempt to forge ecumenical links and cooperation, both among themselves and between themselves and other churches, a majority of the churches have now come under an umbrella called the Pentecostal Fellowship Association of Nigeria (PFN).

There are two waves of Pentecostal movements. First there are the indigenous Pentecostal groups such as the Redeemed Christian Church of God, the DEEPER LIFE BIBLE CHURCH, and the Mountain of Fire and Miracles Church. Then there are Pentecostal groups and organizations that have established branches in Nigeria but have their headquarters situated in the West or elsewhere outside Nigeria. These include the INTERNATIONAL CHURCH OF THE FOURSQUARE GOSPEL, the Full Gospel Businessmen Fellowship International, Youth with a Mission, and Christ for all Nations. The former are largely independent and hardly rely on any external assistance, some even embarking on mission activities by planting branches in the United States, Canada, Europe, and other parts of the world. Many groups in the latter category rely heavily on their mission headquarters for funds, literature, and sometimes personnel.

One underlying feature of the Pentecostal churches is the emphasis on a specific conversion experience, spiritual rebirth (“born againism”), and the manifestation of charismatic gifts such as speaking in tongues (glossolalia), healing, and prophecy. Some are more or less Holiness movements, more interested in religious experiences than in rituals. Some are noted for the prosperity gospel they preach, which has become very popular among Nigerians.

The gospel of prosperity teaches that God is a rich God and intends his followers to prosper in all their endeavors in life. It promises a miraculous escape from poverty, unemployment, ill health, lack of promotion, poor examinations, and the like, offering a “short-cut” to riches by tithing and giving to the poor and less privileged. Some of these groups have assimilated some ideas and features originating in American Pentecostalism. On the other hand, their commitment to the gospel of prosperity fits in well with values of the African traditional culture, where elaborate religious rituals are engaged to ensure prosperity, health, and protection from malevolent forces. That is why Christian groups such as the Pentecostal churches, the Aladura, and prophetic churches that seek to address day-to-day, existential problems have continued to expand in contemporary Nigeria.

One difference between the prophetic and Pentecostal groups is that many founders of the prophetic churches were semiliterate, whereas their counterparts in the Pentecostal churches were in most cases university graduates and had worked in nonreligious professions. For instance, William Kumuyi, who founded the Deeper Life Bible Church in 1973, was a lecturer in mathematics at the University of Lagos. Chris Okotie, who founded the Household of God Fellowship in 1987, was a lawyer. Dr. David Oyedepo, the founder and bishop of the Winners Chapel (1983), was originally an architect by profession. The Christ Chapel Church (a.k.a. Voice of Faith Ministries) was founded in 1980 by a medical doctor, Tunde Joda. Following their callings, these founders have abandoned their erstwhile professions to undertake full-time church ministry. These churches are very appealing to youths, graduates, and professionals. The Pentecostal churches also emphasize in-depth study of the Bible through theological training, Bible courses, camp meetings, seminars, revivals, and retreats.

The Spiritual Science movements are an extremely heterogeneous collection of groups and organizations. One distinguishing feature of these movements is their quest for spiritual knowledge and power, higher states of consciousness and direct religious experiences, as well as the use of procedures, techniques, and practices that draw upon hidden or concealed forces in order to manipulate the course of events. Some of them are very eclectic in nature, drawing upon Western Esotericism, Eastern spirituality, and indigenous traditions. Groups primarily drawing on Western esoteric traditions are the ANCIENT AND MYSTICAL ORDER ROSAE CRUCIS (AMORC), the Aetherius Society, THE GENERAL CHURCH OF NEW JERUSALEM, the Institute of RELIGIOUS SCIENCE, and the Superet Light Mission. The largest Rosicrucian body internationally, AMORC has become quite popular in Nigeria, with headquarters in Lagos and branches in several parts of the country. AMORC does not claim to be a religion but describes itself as a “mystical philosophy,” a “worldwide cultural fraternity,” and an age-old brotherhood of learning. One of its main aims is to help people to discover their secret powers of inner vision and cosmic consciousness and to develop their psychic powers of attraction.

The eastern-related Spiritual Science movements include the ECKANKAR or Secret Science of Soul Travel, the INTERNATIONAL SOCIETY FOR KRISHNA CONSCIOUSNESS, the UNIFICATION MOVEMENT, the SUBUD Brotherhood, THE GRAIL MOVEMENT, the BAHÁ'Í FAITH, and SOKA GAKKAI INTERNATIONAL, a Japanese religion that has branches in Lagos and Zaria. The ECKANKAR Society of Nigeria, with headquarters in Lagos, began in 1973 in Benin City. In 1981 it began an extensive campaign to launch the movement in the country. It has over seventy branches scattered all over Nigeria. The Unification Church was registered in Lagos in 1980, and although it has existed in Nigeria for some years, it has not had much success.

A typical example of an indigenous Spiritual Science movement in Nigeria is the Sat Guru Maharaj (the "Perfect Master"), which combines Sat Mat and Hinduism with elements of Christianity and Islam. The headquarters of the group is situated at the Ibadan end of the Lagos-Ibadan expressway. Members of this group are easily identified by their red, flowing gowns and a distinct haircut. Although the presence and activities of the various Spiritual Science movements do not rival Christian and Islamic movements, the religious map of Nigeria would be incomplete without taking notice of their presence.

Afe Adogame

Sources:

Falola, T. Culture and Customs of Nigeria. Westport, CT: Greenwood Press, 2001.

Hackett, R. I. J., ed. New Religious Movements in Nigeria. Lewiston, NY: Edwin Mellen, 1987.

———. Religion in Calabar: The Religious Life and History of a Nigerian Town. New York: Mouton De Gruyter, 1989.

Isichei, E. A History of Nigeria. London: Longman, 1983.

———, ed. Varieties of Christian Experience in Nigeria. London: Macmillan, 1982.

Kalu, O. U. Christianity in West Africa: The Nigerian Story. Ibadan, Nigeria: Daystar, 1978.

Steed, C., and D. Westerlund. "Nigeria." In Islam Outside the Arab World, edited by David Westerlund and Ingvar Svanberg. Richmond, Surrey, UK: Curzon Press, 1999.

Nigerian Baptist Convention

Nigeria was one of the early mission fields selected by the newly formed (1845) SOUTHERN BAPTIST CONVENTION. Thomas Jefferson Brown arrived in 1850 as the convention representative and settled at Badagry in the southwestern part of the country. The work progressed slowly, due in part to the American Civil War, during which funds were cut off.

However, after 1874 the work began to make some progress. In 1888 the mission experienced a schism when some two hundred members left to form the Native Baptist Church (not to be confused with the church of the same name in Cameroon), one of the first of what are now referred to as African Initiated Churches.

Because of the schism, the mission increased its efforts, and the Native Baptist Church also adopted a vigorous evangelistic stand. Both groups had grown by the time they reunited in 1914 as the Yoruba Baptist Association. Five years later the Yoruba Association became the Nigerian Baptist Convention. Over the next twenty years, the membership grew from approximately three thousand to more than twenty-one thousand, more members coming from the Yoruba people. However, the work also began to expand into the rest of Nigeria, including the northern part of the country controlled by Muslims. In the 1930s a new rule against polygamy led to a schism among members in Oyo State, who established the United African Baptist Church.

During the last half of the twentieth century, the convention experienced significant growth and by the mid-1990s reported six hundred thousand members in 4,656 churches. During the last quarter of the century, the number of missionary personnel also dropped significantly, indicative of the convention's continued progress at recruiting indigenous leadership.

The convention has developed a major center of activity at Ogbomosho that includes a theological seminary, a medical center, a nursing school, a children's home, and a media center. Other similar institutions are found across the country. Literature is now published in English, Hausa, and Yoruban, with worship services being carried out in more than a dozen additional languages. The convention, after the pattern of the Southern Baptists, has encouraged the development of a Women's Missionary Union, which has emerged in spite of the secondary role generally assigned women in traditional Nigerian society. The union (WMU) carries out a variety of evangelistic and social programs, from teaching literacy to assisting mothers in homemaking and child care.

The convention has developed its own foreign mission program in Sierra Leone and Cote d'Ivoire. It is a member of the Christian Council of Nigeria, the BAPTIST WORLD ALLIANCE, and the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES.

Address:

Nigerian Baptist Convention
The Baptist Building
P.M.B. 5113
Ibadan, Oyo
Nigeria

Sources:

Cillins, Travis. The Baptist Mission of Nigeria, 1850–1993. Ibadan, Nigeria: Associated Book-Makers Nigeria Limited, 1993.

Duval, Louis M. Baptist Missions in Nigeria. Richmond: FMB, Southern Baptist Convention, 1928.
 Whirley, Carlton F. The Baptists of Nigeria: A Story to Tell. Nashville: Convention Press, 1988.

Nipponzan Myohoji

Nipponzan Myohoji is a Japanese Buddhist organization in the tradition of Nichiren (1222–1282) that maintains a conspicuous presence in the contemporary peace movement despite its small membership of approximately 150 celibate monks and nuns (predominantly Japanese) and 1,500 lay followers. Its beliefs and practices have been determined by the life and career of its founder, Fujii Nichidatsu (1885–1985).

Fujii was ordained a Nichiren priest at the age of nineteen and graduated from Nichiren University at twenty-three. In 1916, while fasting, praying, and performing austerities in a waterfall, he had a vision that would prove decisive: Jyogyo Bodhisattva appeared to him carrying the child Buddha on his back and beating a hand drum. Thereupon Fujii vowed to unify all people according to the teachings of the Lotus Sutra by instituting the practice of gyakku-senryo, beating a fan-shaped hand drum while chanting namu-myo-ho-ren-ge-kyo, the Sutra's title. This and periodic fasting continue to be prominent aspects of Nipponzan Myohoji practice.

Fujii went to Manchuria and established Nipponzan Myohoji temples in each of its districts, the first in 1918. These temples served as bases for proselytization and catered to the spiritual needs of the expatriate Japanese community. The first Nipponzan Myohoji temple in Japan was established in 1924 at the foot of Mount Fuji in Tagonoura. In 1930 he vowed to realize Nichiren's prophecy that Japanese Buddhism would return to India (saiten kaikyo). He arrived in India in 1931 and established temples in Bombay (1932) and Calcutta (1935). While in Ceylon he received Buddha relics that would be an integral part of his teaching thereafter. In 1933 he met Mahatma Gandhi and was impressed by his teachings of equality and nonviolence.

Despite Fujii's claims that he was opposed to World War II, the evidence suggests that Nipponzan Myohoji activities were conducted in full accord with national policy. Fujii supported Japanese expansion as the bringing of (Buddhist) "civilization" to the Asian continent. The role of Nipponzan Myohoji clergy before and during the war was closely connected to the military—clergy members conducted prayer services for victory, remembered war victims, and spiritually purified military and political leaders.

With the Japanese defeat in 1945, Fujii began to advocate absolute pacifism, and Nipponzan Myohoji became the first Japanese Buddhist group to campaign actively for peace. Fujii's teachings strongly denounce modern materialistic culture, and he identified the United States as the foremost embodiment and proponent of the values of materialism. The group first gained international notoriety when its yellow-robed, head-shaven monks and nuns protested nuclear and hydrogen bomb testing after Japanese fishermen were exposed to radiation off Bikini atoll in 1952, and it continues to campaign for a total ban on such weapons. Group members have also consistently opposed the presence of U.S. military bases in Japan, the most famous incident being in 1954 at the U.S. air base in Sunagawa, where protesting monks were attacked and seriously wounded by police. Nipponzan Myohoji was also prominent in demonstrations opposing the Vietnam War.

Walking is considered a spiritual discipline by Nipponzan Myohoji, and its members engage regularly in peace walks, some for up to a year, throughout Japan and the world. Their other main form of practice is the building of "peace pagodas"—stupas containing Buddha relics—as symbols of peace. Fujii initiated the building of the first pagoda in Japan immediately after the war in 1945. There are now over seventy worldwide, some of which maintain small communities. They do not proselytize. In the United States, the group has forged special ties with Native American communities. They also have ties with the Sarvodaya Shramadana movement based in Sri Lanka.

Nipponzan Myohoji has no head temple and there is no spiritual successor to Fujii. Administrative leaders are chosen from among senior members and are appointed for three-year terms.

Addresses:

Nipponzan Myohoji, Tokyo Office
 8-7 Shinsen-cho
 Shibuya-ku, Tokyo-to 150-0045
 Japan

Nipponzan Myohoji, Osaka Office
 1-3-11 Minami-Senba
 Chuo-ku
 Osaka-shi, Osaka-fu 542-0081
 Japan

<http://www.peacepagoda.org> (Nipponan Myohoji Sangha at Leverett, MA)

John LoBreglio

Sources:

Fujii. Buddhism for World Peace: Words of Nichidatsu Fujii. Translated by Miyasuku Yumiko. Tokyo: Japan-Bharat Sarvodaya Mitrata Sangha, 1980.

———. My Non Violence: An Autobiography of a Buddhist. Translated by Yamaori Tetsuo. Tokyo: Japan Buddha Sangha Press, 1975.

Green, Paula. "Walking for Peace: Nipponzan Myohoji." In Engaged Buddhism in the West, edited by Christopher S. Queen, 128–156. Somerville, MA: Wisdom Publications, 2000.

Kisala, Robert. Prophets of Peace: Pacifism and Cultural Identity in Japan's New Religions. Honolulu: University of Hawaii Press, 1999.

Niue

Niue is an autonomous island state in the South Pacific that has strong ties to New Zealand. It was originally settled in the prehistoric past by Samoans and Tongans. It was first visited by Europeans in 1774 when James Cook (1728–1779) arrived. The British established their hegemony in the nineteenth century and incorporated Niue into a protectorate jointly with the Cook Islands in 1900. Four years later Niue was separated from the Cook Island administration. It attained autonomy in 1974 as the Aotearoan Association Territory. It has an independent local government, with New Zealand continuing to handle its defense and foreign affairs.

The first effort to establish Christian missionary work on the island was in 1830. Unfortunately, the work of John Williams (1796–1839) of the LONDON MISSIONARY SOCIETY (LMS) was unsuccessful, as were periodic attempts over the next fifteen years. Finally, in 1846 a Niuean who had attended a school sponsored by the LMS on Samoa returned home. Three years later, a Samoan classmate came to the island, and together they were able to launch a missionary effort. It would not be until 1861 that a European missionary, William George Lawes (1839–1907), settled on the island. Lawes stayed for seven years and was succeeded by his brother, Frank E. Lawes (d. 1910).

Under the Laweses and their successors, the mission developed strong ties to the Congregational Union of New Zealand, as some fifteen thousand Niueans reside in New Zealand. The church attained independence in 1966 as the EKALIESIA NIUE. It is by far the largest religious body on the island and a member of both the Council for World Mission and the WORLD ALLIANCE OF REFORMED CHURCHES.

The dominance of the Ekalesia Niue has been challenged by the SEVENTH-DAY ADVENTIST CHURCH, whose Tonga-Niue Mission was started in 1895; the CHURCH OF JESUS CHRIST OF LATTER-DAY SAINTS, which began work in 1952; and the JEHOVAH'S WITNESSES, who arrived in 1960.

There is also a small Anglican presence, part of the Diocese of Polynesia of the ANGLICAN CHURCH IN AOTEAROA, NEW ZEALAND, AND POLYNESIA, serving mostly British and New Zealand expatriates.

Sources:

Chapman, T. M., et al. Niue: A History of the Island. Suva, Fiji: Institute of Pacific Studies of the University of the South Pacific and the Government of Niue, 1982.
 Forman, Charles H. The Island Churches of the South Pacific: Emergence in the Twentieth Century. Maryknoll, NY: Orbis, 1982.
 Loeb, E. M. History and Traditions of Niue. 1926. Reprint, New York: Kraus Reprint, 1978.

Nomiya Luo Church (Kenya)

The first African Initiated Churches (AICs) to emerge in Kenya were churches that began among Luo Anglicans around Lake Victoria in the province of Nyanza, an area administered at the time by the CHURCH MISSIONARY SOCIETY in the Diocese of Uganda. One of the earliest AICs was the Nomiya Luo Mission, founded by a former Catholic, Johana Owalo (d. 1920), in 1914 and emerging as a deliberate and consciously syncretistic movement combining elements of Unitarian Christianity, ISLAM, JUDAISM, and Luo traditional religion in reaction against both Catholic and Protestant forms of Christianity.

The angel Gabriel appeared to Owalo in 1907 and told him to preach that people should worship God only, not Jesus or Mary. In a vision of heaven, he was told to circumcise his male followers (contrary to Luo custom), teach people to obey the laws of Moses and keep the seventh-day Sabbath, and baptize them in rivers. Owalo died suddenly in 1920, and the church was plagued with division over who should succeed him as leader. Eventually Petro Ouma became bishop, to be followed after his death by Benjamin Oundo. By 1944 the movement had spread to Luo living in Tanganyika and had over fifty thousand members in Kenya by 1966.

In 1960 the Holy Spirit descended on several Nomiya people who began speaking in tongues, prophesying, revealing sins, and jumping in ecstasy. A former Catholic, Jaote Pesa, began preaching and healing, claiming to be the successor to Owalo, and in 1967 the supporters of this Holy Spirit movement were expelled from the church. They formed a new church called the Nomiya Luo Roho (Spirit) Church under Bishop Zablon Ndiege, who has been archbishop since 1978. This church has suffered several schisms: Jaote Pesa started the Holy Ghost Coptic Church, and Cornell Bunde began the Nomiya Luo Roho Gospellers Church. The Nomiya Roho Sabbath Church started in 1974 out of a desire to return to the Sabbath observance that had been abandoned by the Nomiya Luo Roho Church.

Allan H. Anderson

Followers	2000			2025	2050
	total	%	rate
Christians	1,800	97.2	-2.16	1,300	1,400
Protestants	1,100	57.4	-3.01	700	750
Marginal Christians	440	23.5	-0.44	320	320
Roman Catholics	150	8.0	-1.53	130	150
Baha'is	30	1.6	3.79	50	60
Nonreligious	20	1.1	7.70	30	40
Chinese folk-religionists	10	0.2	2.92	10	20
Total population	1,900	100.0	-2.00	1,400	1,500

Sources:

Clark, Debbie. "History of Nomiya Luo Roho Church." Unpublished paper, 1984. Harold Turner Collection, University of Birmingham, UK.

Hoehler-Fatton, Cynthia. Women of Fire and Spirit: History, Faith and Gender in Roho Religion in Western Kenya. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1996.

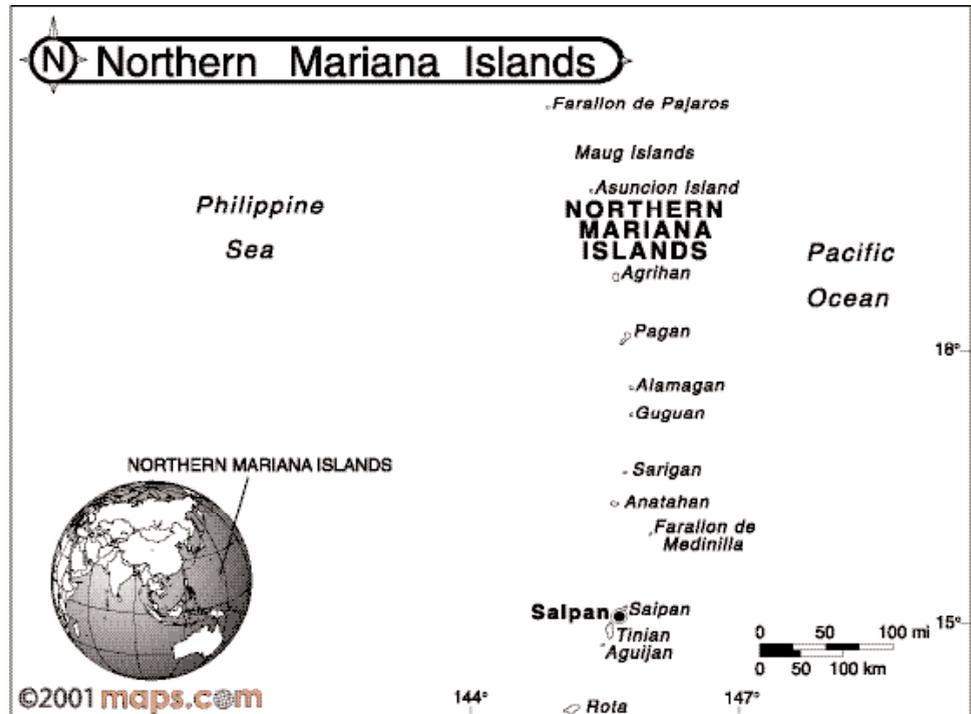

Northern Marianas

The Northern Marianas are a chain of islands in the Pacific Ocean generally designated Micronesia. Prior to World War II, the islands shared much of their history with Guam and the Federated States of Micronesia. They were claimed for Spain in 1521 by Ferdinand Magellan (c. 1480–1521). They were given their name in 1668 by Fr. Luis Diego Sanvitores (1627–1672) to honor the Austrian princess Maria Ana (1634–1696), then the regent of Spain.

The islands had originally been settled by the Chamorros people, possibly as early as 1500 B.C.E. They resisted the Spanish occupation that began in the mid-seventeenth century and carried on a twenty-year revolt that was finally quelled in the late 1680s. The indigenous population was greatly affected by the influx of Spanish culture, especially as it was reinforced by a growing number of Filipinos who came to the islands along the trade route that Spanish traders had established. The development of a new breed of Chamorros from the intermarriage of the native people with the Spanish and Filipinos was accelerated by the relocation of many of the Marianas people to Guam in the eighteenth century. They were not allowed to return until after 1885.

Germany claimed the islands in 1885 but did not receive official control until Spain sold them in 1899, following the loss of its other Pacific territories to the United States in the Spanish American War. Germany moved in government administrators early in the new century. The islands were lost to Japan as World War II began, and as the United States moved to end the war it fought fierce battles to take the islands, especially Saipan and Tinian. Tinian became the base from which the atomic bombs were dropped on Japan in 1945.

The Marianas were given to the United States as a trust following World War II. In a 1975 referendum they were

Status of religions in the Northern Mariana Islands, 2000–2050

Followers	2000			2025	2050
	total	%	rate
Christians	69,600	88.9	6.07	213,000	345,000
Roman Catholics	69,300	88.4	6.11	213,000	345,000
Independents	6,700	8.5	7.95	24,500	44,200
Protestants	6,500	8.3	4.72	14,700	20,000
Buddhists	4,100	5.3	6.23	13,800	24,000
Chinese folk-religionists	1,400	1.8	5.83	6,100	11,200
Nonreligious	1,100	1.4	8.14	4,800	9,200
Neoreligionists	880	1.1	6.96	3,400	6,000
Ethnoreligionists	640	0.8	5.55	1,700	2,000
Baha'is	310	0.4	8.34	1,400	2,800
Confucianists	250	0.3	6.14	850	1,600
Total population	78,400	100.0	6.10	245,000	402,000

separated from Guam (the southernmost island) and from the rest of Micronesia as a free associated state with a special continuing relationship with the United States. In 1986, the islands gained commonwealth status with the United States, and the citizens of the Marianans are now considered U.S. citizens (though without the right of voting in federal elections). The president of the United States is the official head of state, but there is a locally elected government that resembles a U.S. state government.

The Marianas have radically changed since 1970. The population has grown from approximately ten thousand to more than fifty thousand. Many of these new people are expatriates from Korea, China, and the Philippines.

The Roman Catholic Church initiated work in the Marianas in 1668, when six Jesuit priests, including Fr. Sanvitores, launched a mission. They had little success until after the local revolt was quelled in the 1680s. With the influx of Filipinos in the eighteenth century and intermarriage of the Spanish colonists with the local population, a very different indigenous culture developed and a unique form of Spanish Catholicism emerged, which is now practiced by the majority of the population. The church's parishes are included in the Diocese of Agaña (Guam).

Protestants appear to have begun work in the Marianas only after World War II. In 1947 the General Baptist Foreign Missionary Agency sent a couple to Saipan to launch a mission that has grown into the Saipan Baptist Mission and now the Marianas Association of General Baptists. More recently the SEVENTH-DAY ADVENTIST CHURCH and the ASSEMBLIES OF GOD have initiated work on the islands.

Work by the CHURCH OF JESUS CHRIST OF LATTER-DAY SAINTS began in the 1970s on Saipan but was then withdrawn. Restarted in 1975, it subsequently spread to Rota (1982) and Tinian (1986). It is attached to the Micronesia Guam Mission. There is also a small BAHÁ'Í FAITH community in the Marianas.

Sources:

Farrell, D. A. History of the Northern Mariana Islands. Saipan: Public School System/Commonwealth of the Northern Mariana Islands, 1991.

Forman, Charles H. The Island Churches of the South Pacific: Emergence in the Twentieth Century. Maryknoll, NY: Orbis, 1982.

Status of religions in Norway, 2000-2050

Followers	2000			2025	2050
	total	%	rate
Christians	4,208,000	94.3	0.43	4,441,000	4,265,000
Protestants	4,200,000	94.2	0.50	4,400,000	4,200,000
Independents	136,000	3.1	0.85	180,000	250,000
Roman Catholics	45,000	1.0	1.57	60,000	80,000
Nonreligious	84,600	1.9	1.49	130,000	180,000
Buddhists	67,200	1.5	3.42	100,000	120,000
Muslims	45,700	1.0	1.87	70,000	90,000
Atheists	25,000	0.6	0.83	30,000	40,000
Neoreligionists	21,500	0.5	2.08	30,000	40,000
Baha'is	2,200	0.1	2.51	3,000	6,000
Ethnoreligionists	1,200	0.0	2.40	1,400	1,600
Chinese folk-religionists	1,100	0.0	2.08	1,200	1,600
Jews	820	0.0	0.01	800	800
Spiritists	460	0.0	2.09	600	1,000
other religionists	3,100	0.1	4.52	4,000	6,000
Total population	4,461,000	100.0	0.51	4,812,000	4,752,000

expanded, explorers crossed the Atlantic to Greenland and even North America.

At the height of the Norwegian expansion, during the reign of Haakon IV (1204–1263), the kingdom included Iceland, Greenland, the Scottish islands, and the Faeroe Islands. The Black Death killed close to half of all Norwegians, hitting the upper classes especially hard. The Norwegian kingdom subsequently fell apart. In 1397 Norway was brought into a united Scandinavia and remained a province of Denmark for the next four centuries. At the close of the Napoleonic era in 1814, Denmark surrendered Norway to Sweden. Norway spent much of the nineteenth century in a struggle to free itself. In 1884 a constitutional monarchy was adopted, and in 1905 Norway gained its independence

Norway

Norway, the country along the westernmost edge of the Scandinavian Peninsula, appears to have been inhabited for some ten thousand years by the Germanic tribe that moved into the area following the retreat of the last Ice Age. A sense of nationality arose around 800 C.E. with the emergence of the Vikings, the seagoing people whose home base was Norway. Harald Harfagre is considered the father of the nation. He consolidated power in the 890s following a battle at Hafsfjorf, near Stavanger, and brought much of modern Norway into a single political entity. As the Viking kingdom and crowned Prince Carl of Denmark as King Haakon VII (1872–1957). Norway has remained a sovereign power ever since. It was overrun by Germany during World War II, and Haakon ran a government in exile from England. Christianity was introduced into Norway in the tenth century by a Roman Catholic representative of the archbishop of Bremen/Hamburg in Germany. The spread of Christianity was greatly aided by several Christian kings, especially Haakon the Good (d. c. 961), who had been educated in England. A certain resentment toward the church developed as the bishops assigned to administer the church, who were residing in Denmark, proved a significant force blocking Norway's attempt to free itself from Danish control. In 1523 the Norwegian administrative council acted to obtain independence. The Catholic bishops blocked the council's attempt to obtain Swedish support. Eventually, in 1536, the council was abolished. The Protestant Reformation gained control in Denmark the following year, and Norway quickly accepted the reorganization of the church along Lutheran lines and the dismissal of the Catholic bishops.

In 1937 the CHURCH OF NORWAY was established, with the king of Denmark and Norway at the head. The church, which was established on the basis of the Lutheran (Augsburg) Confession, was a rather staid institution, largely isolated from the various renewal and pietist movements that so affected the life of Lutheranism in Germany. The first renewal of significance appeared in the early nineteenth century under the leadership of Hans Neilsen Hauge (1771–1824). He organized pietist religious societies across the country that protested an emphasis upon liturgical worship and a rational orthodox theology. Other movements appeared periodically through the nineteenth century, some emphasizing enthusiasm for foreign missions.

The Church of Norway remains the dominant force in Norwegian life. The relatively high church membership, however, is contrasted with a very low church attendance. The Lutheran Church was established as the state religion, and the king and the majority of his cabinet were required to be professed members. The strong ties between church and state continue, but reforms through the twentieth century have given the church more autonomy.

In the mid-nineteenth century, FREE CHURCHES began to challenge the exclusive hegemony of the Church of Norway over the religious life of the citizenry. Possibly the first to appear were the Baptists. Danish sailor Frederick Ludvig Rymker began to preach in Norway in 1857 and founded several Baptist churches. By 1877, when the NORWEGIAN BAPTIST UNION was formed, churches had been founded in all parts of the country, though their actual membership was relatively small.

Methodism in Norway began in 1849 when Ole Peter Petersen (1822–1901), a sailor converted by Methodists in New York, returned to his hometown and began to share his new faith. A revival spread and Petersen began to preach. In 1850 he returned to the United States, pursued studies for the ministry, and was ordained. He returned to Norway in 1853. In 1856, Christian Willerup was sent from New York to superintend the work in Norway, and he eventually extended his work across Scandinavia. The first congregation was formally organized soon after Willerup arrived, and the annual conference first met in 1876. The church in Norway was founded as an extension of the Methodist Episcopal Church and has, through several mergers, become an integral part of the UNITED METHODIST CHURCH.

Two revival movements in the Lutheran Church led to new Free church bodies that more closely adhered to the core of Lutheran doctrine, the EVANGELICAL LUTHERAN FREE CHURCH OF NORWAY (1877) and the MISSION COVENANT CHURCH OF SWEDEN (1984). The latter church is related to the Covenant Church movement in Sweden that had roots in Methodist pietism.

THE SALVATION ARMY entered Norway in 1888. Although most know it as a social service agency, the army is also a Holiness church, and in Norway it had spectacular success in attracting members. By the middle of the twentieth century, it was by far the largest of the several Free church bodies in the country, with almost one hundred thousand members.

Pentecostalism came to Norway in 1906, when a Methodist minister who had been converted to the Pentecostal position in the United States returned home to Oslo and began to preach about his experience. As a result of his preaching, he was forced to withdraw from the Methodist Church. The growth of Pentecostalism in Norway led to the founding of the Norwegian Pentecostal Assemblies, which is now second only to the Salvation Army in size. Pentecostalism has also been strengthened by the addition of British missionaries with the APOSTOLIC CHURCH and American missionaries with the APOSTOLIC FAITH MISSION (PORTLAND, OREGON).

There is an active Christian ecumenical movement in Norway. More liberal Protestant churches that are members of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES are associated together in the Christian Council of Norway. More conservative churches are members of the Evangelical Alliance in Norway and affiliated with the WORLD EVANGELICAL ALLIANCE. A number of evangelical churches are indigenous to Norway, most founded by former members of the Church of Norway, including the Maranatha Revival Church, the Congregation of God at Vegardshei, and the Free Pentecostal Friends.

The Roman Catholic Church was allowed to reestablish itself in the early nineteenth century, and the first new parish was opened in 1842. The church experienced slow growth as there was still being a great deal of anti-Catholic prejudice in the nineteenth century. A vicariate was erected in Oslo in 1931 and a diocese in 1953. The national episcopal conference includes the diocese and the two territorial prelatures of Trondheim and Tromsø.

As in most other western European countries, twentieth-century Norway saw the development of a pluralistic religious culture that now includes the broad spectrum of the world's religions—from the CHURCH OF SCIENTOLOGY to TIBETAN BUDDHISM. The variety of organizations serving primarily expatriate communities include the Greek Orthodox Church and the Sikh community. The Jewish community, dating to the mid-nineteenth century, consists of approximately two thousand people, most residing in Oslo and Trondheim. There is a relatively new Muslim community centered on the Muslim Union of Oslo.

A variety of new Buddhist and Hindu groups, most seeking membership from young adults, including the INTERNATIONAL SOCIETY FOR KRISHNA CONSCIOUSNESS, have come to Norway since World War II, though most have only one or two centers. Esotericism is represented in the THEOSOPHICAL SOCIETY and the ANCIENT AND MYSTICAL ORDER ROSAE CRUSIS.

The CHURCH OF JESUS CHRIST OF LATTER-DAY SAINTS (LDS) has been active in Norway since 1850, although many of its nineteenth-century converts migrated to the United States and the church is not as strong as it could have been. Norway was the home of one of the more interesting LDS splinter groups, the Independent Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, which opened headquarters in Oslo and subsequently established congregations in Denmark and the United States.

Sources:

The Church of Norway. Hegdehaugen, Norway: Church of Norway Information Service, 1990.
 Hale, F. Norwegian Religious Pluralism: A Trans-Atlantic Comparison. Lewiston, NY: Edwin Mellen Press, 1992.
 Hunter, L. S. Scandinavian Churches: A Picture of the Development and Life of the Churches of Denmark, Finland, Iceland, Norway, and Sweden. London: Faber & Faber, 1965.
 Wilson, T. B. History of Church and State in Norway from the Tenth to the Sixteenth Century. London: A. Constable & Co., 1903.

Norwegian Baptist Union

Unlike many Baptist fellowships in Europe, those in Norway had American rather than German roots. However, prior to the arrival of any Baptists, G. A. Lammers (1802–1878), a Lutheran pastor, had built a Baptist-like movement in Norway. Lammers became convinced of the truth of believer's baptism (as opposed to infant baptism, then the standard practice in the state-sponsored CHURCH OF NORWAY), and in 1856 he left the state church. Lammers and his fellow believers formed an Apostolic Free Church, congregations of which began to appear in various locations through the mid-nineteenth century. As it grew, the movement split over the necessity of rebaptizing people who had been baptized as infants.

In 1857 Frederick Ludwig Rymler, a Norwegian who had been converted to the Baptist faith in the United States, returned to Norway and settled in Porsgrunn. Finding some initial support from those previously affiliated with Lammers's movement, Rymler organized the first Baptist church in Norway in 1860. The first association of churches was organized in 1872, and a Norwegian Baptist conference, including fourteen congregations, was established in 1877. The Norwegian church was greatly assisted by Swedish Baptists.

The Norwegian Baptists had a steady membership gain through the early twentieth century, in spite of losses to the Pentecostal movement. In 1910 they were able to open a theological school (superseded after World War II by a new seminary in Oslo). In 1963, in order to finally obtain government recognition, they adopted a confession of faith, thereby fulfilling one of the government's requirements. The church, a conservative body, has also issued a separate statement on the Bible as "God's inspired word." Membership peaked in the 1940s at around seventy-five hundred and has since declined.

In the nineteenth century, the Norwegian Baptist Union supported missionaries through the American Missionary Baptist Union. It formed its own missionary organization in 1915 and commissioned its first missionary, Bernard Aalbu, in 1918. Aalbu began work in the Congo (Zaire) in 1920. More recently, the union has tried to open work in Nepal. For many years it has worked with other Scandinavian Baptist churches in support of a Seaman's Mission in San Francisco, California (U.S.A.).

In the 1990s the Norwegian Baptist Union reported some fifty-five hundred members in sixty-four churches. It is a member of the BAPTIST WORLD ALLIANCE. In the changed atmosphere of Norwegian religious life in the last generation, the church has moved from a position of hostility in relation to the Church of Norway to one of dialogue and cooperation.

Address:

Norwegian Baptist Union
 Michelets vet 62
 1320 Stabekk
 Norway
<http://www.baptist.no/> (in Norwegian)

Sources:

McBeth, H. Leon. The Baptist Heritage: Four Centuries of the Baptist Witness. Nashville, TN: Broadman Press, 1987.

Rushbrooke, J. H. The Baptist Movement in the Continent of Europe. London: Kingsgate Press, 1923.

Stiansen, P. History of the Baptists in Norway. Chicago: Blessing Press, 1933.

Westin, Gunnar. The Free Church through the Ages. Nashville, TN: Broadman Press, 1958.

Nyingma Tibetan Buddhism

The earliest tradition of Tibetan Buddhism is known as Nyingma (in Tibetan, rNying ma), which literally means “old.” Its teachings and practices are said to represent those brought from India during the period of the early spread of Buddhism in Tibet (sa-dar). Although this tradition may have commenced as early as the seventh century, it is thought to have gained real momentum during the reign of King Trisong Detsen (Khri srong lDe brtsan; c. 740–798 C.E.). Tradition has it that this king invited the noted monk and abbot of Nalanda Monastery, Santarakṣita, to come to Tibet and found the country’s first Buddhist monastery, Samye (bSam yas). According to legend, the new religion was vigorously opposed by various autochthonous spirits and deities, who by night would pull down the walls of Samye that had been built during the day. In turn, Santarakṣita called upon the renowned Indian tantric master Padmasambhava (Lotus Born; eighth century) to subjugate the opposition. Padmasambhava became known as Guru Rinpoche, the “Treasured Guru,” and is venerated in Tibet as highly as the historical Buddha himself.

Guru Rinpoche inspired the translation of many Buddhist texts into Tibetan and hid many texts and blessed objects (gter-ma, pronounced terma, meaning treasure), with the intention that they would be thus protected and then rediscovered at an appropriate time. Gter-ma are of great importance within the Nyingma tradition. Although texts and sacred objects had been concealed in pre-Buddhist Tibet, this practice was strongly emphasized by Padmasambhava and his disciples. Those who discover these hidden gter-ma—called the treasure finders (gter ston, pronounced terton)—are held in high esteem and are often believed to be reincarnations of Padmasambhava’s disciples and other famous teachers. The texts themselves form an important part of the Nyingma textual collections. Although the term Nyingma indicates an emphasis on old traditions, the promotion of gter-ma texts creates the opportunity for innovation. These texts of mysterious authorship enable new practices to be introduced that are responsive to changing needs.

One of the most important gter-ma texts of recent times was the Longchen Nyinthig (rDzogs-pa Chen-po Klong-chen Thig-le, or Klong-chen sNying-thig), the Innermost Spirituality of Longchenpa, which was promulgated by Jigme Lingpa (Jigs med gling pa; 1730–1798). This text, coupled with the teaching legacy of Jigme Lingpa, established the main Dzogchen (rDzogs chen, or Great Completion) teachings in the contemporary period and laid the foundation for the ris med (nonsectarian movement). Dzogchen teachings emphasize recognizing intrinsic awareness.

The Longchen Nyinthig gave the ris med movement an emphasis on yogic self-discipline rather than imposed monastic discipline and emphasized a conception of the enlightened state as pure and open, beyond all logic and conventional description. Jigme Lingpa’s teaching lineage flourished in eastern Tibet around Dege (sDe dge), and after his death three incarnations were recognized as being his emanations. The most famous of these was Jamyang Khyentse Wangpo (‘Jam dbyangs mKhyen brtse’i dbang po; 1820–1892). Khyentse Wangpo joined with Jamgon Kongtrul (‘Jam mgon Kong sprul; 1813–1899) in an extensive search across Tibet for rare treasure teachings. This search resulted in the creation of the most valued collection of these materials, the Rin chen gTer mdzod, the Precious Collection of Treasures. This collection is still growing and was updated by important lamas in the twentieth century.

The Nyingma tradition, like that of its pre-Buddhist predecessors, the Bonpos, includes both noncelibate householder (sngags-pa) lamas and monastic communities. The most eminent twentieth-century Nyingma lamas, such as Dilgo Khyentse Rinpoche and other Khyentse incarnations, all carry this important heritage, which emphasizes treasure teachings, the Longchen Nyinthig, and Dzogchen. The current head of the Nyingma, appointed in 2001, is Minling Trichen Rinpoche (sMin gling Khri chen; b. c. 1920), now in his second term, the first being in the 1960s. Like so many other greats in this tradition, Minling Trichen is a yogi-householder. His residence is in a monastery in Clement Town, near Dehra Dun in northern India. The largest Nyingma monastery outside of Tibet is the Palyul Namdroling Monastery (P.O. Bylakuppe, Distt. Mysore, Karnataka, India 571–104), headed by the previous head of the Nyingma, Penor Rinpoche.

The emphasis in the Nyingmapa tradition on mystical experience and a deep appreciation of householder life has helped ensure its popularity in the West. Early residents in the West include Dudjom Rinpoche (1904–1987; a former head of the Nyingmapa), Tarthang Tulku (head of the Nyingma Institute, Berkeley, California), Sogyel Rinpoche (head of the RIGPA FELLOWSHIP), and Chagdud Tulku (head of the Chagdud Gonpa Foundation), all of whom have founded impressive institutions. There are also less well-known resident lamas and also regular visitors of no fixed address with retreat centers in places as diverse as France, the United States, Canada, Australia, India, and Tibet.

Some Western students have undertaken long retreats and are able to teach within the tradition, although few have had the time or enthusiasm to master entire canons in the Tibetan manner. Comparatively little of this work has been translated, but even at this early stage the signs for future growth are very good.

Keith Richmond and Diana Cousins

Sources:

Dudjom Rinpoche, Jikdrel Yeshe Dorje. The Nyingma School of Tibetan Buddhism, Its Fundamentals and History. 2 vols. Vol.1, The Translations. Vol. 2, Reference Material. Translated and edited by Gyurme Dorje with the collaboration of Matthew Kapstein. Boston: Wisdom Publications, 1991.

Snellgrove, David L. Indo-Tibetan Buddhism, Indian Buddhists and Their Tibetan Successors. Boston: Shambhala, 1987.

Snellgrove, David L., and H. E. Richardson. A Cultural History of Tibet. London: George Weidenfeld and Nicolson, 1968. Rev. ed., Boston: Shambhala, 1986.

Old Believers (Russian Orthodox)

The Old Believers (or Old Ritualists) originated out of an intense controversy within the Russian Orthodox Church during the seventeenth century. Over the centuries, various practices had been introduced into the Russian Church at variance from that of the Orthodoxy in the Mediterranean basin, especially in those churches in the jurisdiction of the Ecumenical Patriarchate. Shortly after assuming office in 1652, the new patriarch Tikon (1605–1681) moved to revise ritual books used in the church that had become corrupted over the years and bring them in line with the Greeks. A seemingly minor practice, the Russians had been making the sign of the cross with two fingers rather than three as was common to most of Orthodoxy. Nikon introduced the first reforms almost immediately and continued them through the work of several synods in 1654 and 1655. In 1655 he began to publish the revised liturgy books. A synod in 1656 ordered the excommunication of any who continued to make the sign of the cross with two fingers. Each change led to the opposition party growing stronger.

The execution of a priest named Avvakum in 1682 became a rallying point for those who opposed Tikon, a group that gradually became known as Old Believers, that is those who followed the rituals and practices as they were prior to his term of office. Those in sympathy with the Old Believers may have constituted as much as ten percent of the population. As the czar backed Tikon's reforms, the Old Believers found themselves under the government's thumb. Many were imprisoned, some executed and others exiled. Many more fled from the czar's land.

Over time, the Old Believers split into as many as a dozen recognizable groups, though the majority adhered to one of two main groupings: the Popovtsy (with priests) and the Bezpopovtsy (without priests). While loyal to the tradition, the Old Believers were presented with a major problem as no Orthodox bishop had aligned with their cause. Without a bishop they lost their apostolic succession and the Episcopal authority to ordain priests. The Popovtsy absorbed priests as they left the Russian Orthodox Church, and the Bezpopovtsy adapted to life without priest and sacraments. The Popovtsy found a friend in 1847 in the person of the former Orthodox metropolitan Ambrosios of Sarajevo (Bosnia) who consecrated two bishops, thus providing for the establishment of an Episcopal hierarchy.

Finally, in 1905, Czar Nicholas II issued an Edict of Toleration that allowed Old Believers to worship openly for the next decades. During the Soviet years, those who remained in Russia were wooed by the Russian patriarch who wished to heal the schism but also suffered the same persecution that all religious people underwent from an atheist government. The first trend led in 1971 to the lifting of the mutual anathemas both had previously pronounced.

As recently as 2000, Patriarch Alexy II, the present head of the Russian Orthodox Church, has taken visible steps to bring the Old Believers back into the church and had admitted the error of past persecution and restrictions. There are an estimated 2 to 2.5 million Old Believers in Russia. The headquarters of the largest priestly group of Old Believers, the Bielaia Krinitsia Church, is in the Ukraine, established at a time when the headquarters town was in Austrian territory, but the church is led by Metropolitan Alimpyj of Moscow and All Russia (b. 1929) who was elected in 1988. During his term a seminary has been opened in Moscow (1996) and Metropolitan Ambrosios was canonized as a saint (1997). The Bielaia Krinitsia Church is aligned with the Old Ritualist Orthodox of Romania who are led by Metropolitan Leonty of Braila, Romania. A second Russian group of Popovtsy is led by Archbishop Aristarch of Novozybkov, Moscow, and All Russia. He resides in Novozybkov and has associated bishops in several Russian communities as well as in Georgia and Belarus.

A number of Bezpopovtsy moved to Lithuania late in the seventeenth century. An initial community was established in the Anyksciai region in 1709, and a monastery was opened in the Ignalina region in 1728. In the 1930s some 53 communities of the Old Believers with about 34,000 people could be found. Today, they make up approximately 1.43 percent of the population. Leadership is found in the Supreme Council of the Old Believers (Volunges N9–68, 2055 Vilnius, Lithuania). Similar groups in neighboring countries are organized into the Union of Latvian Old Believer Congregations (Maskavas 116, Riga 1003, Latvia) and the Union of Old Believer Parishes of Estonia. The revival of the Old Believers in post-Soviet Estonia is being assisted by the Society of Old Believer Culture and Development (Soola 5, Tartu 50013, Estonia).

Old Believers have also moved to the West. Bishop Sofrony (elected 1996) heads Old Believers in the United States, Canada, and Australia from his residence in Gervais, Oregon. Some 10,000 members reside in Oregon and there is a small community in Alaska. There are approximately 500 in Canada and membership in the three countries exceeds 10,000 believers.

Addresses:

Old Believers Moscow
c/o Metropolitan Alimpyj of Moscow and All Russia

Rogozhovsky pos. 29
Moscow, Russia

Old Christ Rite Church (Romania)
c/o H. H. Leonti, Metropolitan
No. 5 Zidari St.
601 Braila
Romania

Old Believers Australia
c/o Old Orthodox Church of Holy Nativity 20 Norval St.
Auburn NSW 2144
Australia

Sources:

- Bolshakoff, Serge. Russian Nonconformity. Philadelphia: Westminster Press, 1950.
- Conybeare, Frederick C. Russian Dissenters. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1921.
- Pokrovsky, N. N., and Richard A. Morris, eds. Traditional, Spiritual, and Material Culture of Russian Old Believer Settlements in Europe, Asia and America. Novosibirsk: Nauka Press, 1992.
- Robson, Roy R. Old Believers in Modern Russia. Rockford: Northern Illinois University Press, 1996.
- Wigowsky, Paul J., comp. "Collection of Old Believer History and Tradition." Posted at <http://www.geocities.com/Athens/Agora/2827/collection.html>. Accessed March 10, 2002.

Old Catholic Church in Switzerland
[Christkatholische Kirche der Schweiz]

Confronted with the growing prerogatives entrusted to the papal institution and with the determined opposition of the leadership of the ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH to modern ideas in the nineteenth century, Catholic liberals—especially in Germany and Switzerland—had become increasingly suspicious of Rome. After the proclamation of the dogma of the infallibility of the Pope at the First Vatican Council in 1870, some did not accept the new doctrine and broke with the Roman Catholic Church. They founded national Old Catholic churches, which would join forces within the Union of Utrecht together with a group of Dutch Catholics who had separated from Rome in the eighteenth century and preserved the episcopate within their ranks.

In Switzerland, the leaders of the movement were primarily laymen, although a few priests joined the resistance too. The movement enjoyed strong political support in those cantons where liberals were at the helm. It built upon a long desire in liberal political circles to create a national church, not submissive to any foreign leadership: several proposals to erect a national diocese had already been advanced over the previous decades. Large meetings of liberal Catholics took place during the spring of 1871. In a few cantons (Berne, Geneva), the governments decided that parishes had to elect their own ministers and, since the Roman Catholic Church forbade its faithful to take part in such elections, the parishes were then entrusted to priests ready to comply with the wishes of the local governments. In such cases of government-enforced schism, only a minority of the faithful were ready to follow, and most of those parishes finally returned to the Catholic Church, once Rome allowed the faithful to vote in the elections for parish priests. In other cases, however, the movement had real popular support, and a few parishes freely decided to break with Rome.

Some participants in the movement wanted to go as far as to abolish the episcopate. But the episcopal function was finally preserved, although its power would be limited. The first National Synod took place in Olten in 1875 and marked the official beginning of the Old Catholic Church in Switzerland as a constituted body. Actually—this remains specific to the Swiss branch of Old Catholicism—it adopted the name Christian Catholic Church of Switzerland. The priest Eduard Herzog (1841–1924) was elected as the first bishop of the Christian Catholic Church and consecrated the same year by the Old Catholic bishop of Germany.

The newly formed church very soon introduced reforms, which had already been introduced on their own by some priests in their parishes: use of the vernacular in the Mass, abolition of clerical celibacy, etc. As early as 1874, the government of the Canton of Berne had decided to sponsor the creation of a liberal Catholic theological faculty at the local university, which allowed the church to develop a well-trained clergy. In 1948, the Old Catholic Church of Switzerland became one of the founding members of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES. It made the headlines in the Swiss media when it ordained its first woman priest in 2000.

The Christian Catholic Church still enjoys today a public law status in nine Swiss cantons, which means among other things the right to raise church taxes. The church forms an acknowledged part of the Swiss religious landscape, but the number of its adherents has constantly decreased over the years: while there may have been some 70,000 members in the mid-1870s and there were still more than 35,000 in 1930, there are today less than 14,000 Old Catholics in Switzerland.

Address:

Old Catholic Church in Switzerland
Willadingweg 39
3006 Bern
Switzerland
<http://www.christcath.ch/>

Jean-François Mayer

Sources:

- Flückiger, Wilhelm, and Carlo Jenzer. Christkatholisch: Die Christkatholische Kirche der Schweiz in Geschichte und Gegenwart. Zurich: Benziger Verlag, 1978.

Gschwind, Paulin. Geschichte der Entstehung der Christkatholischen Kirche der Schweiz. Solothurn: Verlag Gassmann, 1910.

Küry, Urs. Die Altkatholische Kirche: Ihre Geschichte, ihre Lehre, ihr Anliegen. 2d ed. Stuttgart: Evangelisches Verlagswerk, 1978.

Moss, Claude Beaufort. The Old Catholic Movement, Its Origins and History. London: S.P.C.K., 1948.

Old Catholic Church of Austria

The beginning of the Old Catholic Church of Austria dates to October 1871, when the Catholic minister Alois Anton celebrated the first Old Catholic liturgy in Vienna. In that same year religious services also started in Warnsdorf (now in the Czech Republic) and in Ried (Upper Austria). As early as 1877, the government of the Austrian monarchy accepted the Old Catholic Church as one of the official religions in Austria. The first official synod, in May 1879, introduced the first changes from the contemporary practices of the Roman Catholic Church, namely, the right of lay people to vote for and be elected to positions within the church, the use of the native tongue (in this case German) instead of Latin for the liturgy, and the abrogation of both priestly celibacy and confession. Though the church had gained followers, the Austrian government prohibited the election of a bishop for the diocese, refused to recognize the validity of marriages by Old Catholic priests, and did not allow members to direct tax money to the support of their priests.

During the next decades the church established several new parishes, but after World War I some of their territories were lost to Hungary and the Czech Republic. Thus in 1921 a new Austrian diocese had to be formed, and three years later Adalbert Schindelar was elected the first bishop to the Austrian Old Catholic Church. During World War II the church was incorporated within the CATHOLIC DIOCESE OF THE OLD CATHOLICS IN GERMANY, but since the end of that war the independent Austrian diocese is functioning again.

At present there are eighteen thousand members of the church living in Austria, organized within twelve parishes. Each parish is headed by a minister, who is supported in his or her pastoral works by a committee. The whole church is headed by a bishop who is elected by the synod and a committee (Synodalrat) consisting of three ordained and six lay persons. The bishop, the ministers, and the deacons serve as liturgical authorities. In 1991 and 1995 the synod decided to allow women to be ordained to these church offices, and in 1998 Karin Leiter and Dr. Elfriede Kreuzeder were ordained as the first female ministers. For the theological training of future ministers there are no special university facilities as there are in the Evangelical Church of the Augsburg and Helvetic Confession and the ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH, which have their own faculties of confessional theology at the state universities. A university degree in Old Catholic theology can be acquired, however, at the University of Berne (Switzerland).

The Austrian Old Catholic Church has long been involved in cooperation with other churches. Soon after the founding of the Union of Utrecht in September 1889, the representatives of the Austrian Old Catholic Church joined the union, rejoining it again after the reorganization of the diocese in 1921. (The Union of Utrecht was formed as a cooperative association of the Old Catholic bishops of the Netherlands, Germany, and Switzerland.) Since its beginning in 1958, the Ecumenical Council of Churches of Austria has recognized the Old Catholic Church as one of its members, and there are active ecumenical meetings throughout Austria, mainly with the Evangelical Church and the Anglican Church but also with the Roman Catholic Church. In 1986 the Evangelical and the Old Catholic churches agreed to intercommunion; the Roman Catholic Church did not join this agreement. The church is also a member of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES.

Address:

Old Catholic Church of Austria
c/o Bishop Bernhard Heitz
Schottenring 17
1010 Wien
Austria
<http://www.altkatholiken.at> (in German)

Manfred Hutter

Source:

Zankl, Wilhelmine. "Die altkatholische Kirche." In Religionen: Ein Friedensbuch, edited by Brigitte Hantschk-Vavra and Christian Hantschk, 96–101. Vienna: Horn, 1986.

Old Catholic Church of Mariavites/ Catholic Church of Mariavites

Mariavitism started as a Catholic movement aimed at the moral reform of Polish Catholicism at the end of the nineteenth century. The movement assumed a more formal existence on December 15, 1903, when Felicja or Feliksa (later Maria Franciszka) Kozłowska (1862–1921) established the Association of Mariavites of Continuous Adoration in Supplication. The new organization was denounced by the Vatican in 1904, and two years later Kozłowska was excommunicated. Following the excommunication, the movement became a legally independent "sect."

The highly controversial marriage of the Mariavite archbishop Johann Kowalski (1871–1942) and his three bishops to nuns in 1922 was followed by trials of the archbishop (1928) and other priests. In 1931 the archbishop was sentenced to three years of imprisonment, later reduced to two years. The first consecrations of women priests, including a bishop, took place in 1929. The split of the movement in 1935 resulted in formation of the Old Catholic Church of Mariavites (OCCM), critical of the activities of Kowalski, and the Catholic Church of Mariavites (CCM), the smaller of the two bodies, which adhered to all of the innovations introduced in the 1920s. OCCM discontinued the priesthood for women in 1938.

OCCM is based on principles of the Old and New Testaments as well as the tradition of the undivided church determined by the first seven general, or ecumenical, councils. The message received by Kozłowska on God's mercy is also fundamental; it says the sinful world can be saved through the veneration of the Holy Sacrament and by the help of the Virgin Mary. No new dogmas are accepted in the OCCM, as it is thought that the power to do so should rest only with a council that is ecumenical, that is, representative of the whole of Christianity. The church does not accept the primacy of any bishop in the truly Catholic Church or the infallibility of humanity in matters of faith and morality. Neither excommunication nor interdicts are administered in OCCM.

The aim of the church is to spread the worship of Jesus Christ hidden in the Holy Sacrament and to remind people of their need for constant help from the Most Holy Mother in the face of the worldly hostilities against God. The veneration of the Holy Sacrament consists of frequent Holy Communion. Every member has to devote one hour per week to individual adoration of the Holy Sacrament and one hour per month to communal and ceremonial adoration. Participation in the Sunday Mass is obligatory as well. Priests and nuns have to practice the adoration daily. The entire liturgy is conducted in Polish.

In 1924 the church dropped strictures requiring the celibacy of the clergy, despite the views of Kozłowska on this issue. Instead, the stress has been put on leading the Franciscan life. The variety of services offered by the church (baptism, marriage, burial, and so on) are free, and acceptance of any payment for the conduct of the Holy Mass (as has been common in the ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH) is forbidden.

There are seven sacraments. Confession received by a priest is obligatory for children and youth and optional for people older than eighteen. However, adults are obliged to make the general confession to Christ himself, which is followed by absolution of sins by a priest. The Holy Eucharist is distributed in two forms (bread and wine) to all believers. Though the church honors religious pictures and memorabilia of saints, it does not accept the claims made for so called wondrous relics and paintings. In the beginning, most controversies around the Mariavites concerned their erosive influence on the Roman Catholic Church. During the partition of Poland, many believed any movement directed against the church was antinational.

The OCCM is divided into three dioceses that cover forty-two parishes and have forty-five churches and chapels. There are thirty-two priests. OCCM counts approximately twenty-six thousand members (1997) who live in Poland, mainly in the area of Plock and Siedlce as well as Lodz, Lublin, and Warsaw. The highest supervising body of the church is the synod. In periods between synod meetings, the General Chapter (the organization to which all priests belong) provides supervision. The main administrative body is the Council of the Church. The church is led by its head bishop. The OCCM publishes the monthly periodical Mariawita and is a member of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES.

The CCM is divided into two "custodies," or dioceses, with twenty-three parishes. Among eighteen priests, twelve are women. The head of the church is the Highest Council of Superiors. The three thousand members of CCM reside in Poland.

Addresses:

Starokatolicki Kosciol Mariawitow
(Old Catholic Church of Mariavites)
ul. Kazimierza Wielkiego
09-400 Plock
Poland

Kosciol Katolicki Mariawitow w RP
(Catholic Church of the Mariavites)
Felicjanow k. Plocka
09-470 Bodzanow
Poland

Leslaw Borowski

Sources:

- Anson, Peter. Bishops at Large. London: Faber and Faber, 1964.
Ginter, Wladyslaw. Informator o Kosciole Starokatolickim Mariawitow. Plock, 1989.
Mazur, Krzysztof. Mariawityzm w Polsce. Krakow: Nomos, 1991.
Rybak, Stanislaw. Mariawityzm: Studium historyczne. Warsaw: Lege, 1992.

Old Catholic Church of the Netherlands

Old Catholic Church of the Netherlands (usually called Oud-Katholieke Kerk and officially titled Roomsche Katholieke Kerk van de Oud-Bisschoppelijke Clerezie) was founded on April, 23, 1723, but considers itself as the continuation of the Old Catholic Church that existed in Northern Netherlands before the Reformation. The church traces its beginnings to 695, with the nomination of the Irish missionary Willibrord (c. 658–739) to be the first archbishop of Utrecht. A problem arose in 1651 when the pope nominated Frederik Schenck van Toutenburg to the archbishop's chair, whereas since 1559, the year of the new grouping of the dioceses, the chapters of all the dioceses had been given the right to elect their own archbishops.

Another problem arose as a result of the introduction of the Reformation into the Republic of the Seven United Netherlands. Rome failed to nominate new bishops as vacancies appeared, and it also refused to accept the nominations of the king of Spain, who at that time still formally held the authority over the Netherlands. Eventually episcopal leadership fell to Sasbout Vosmeer (1548–1614), who in 1602 was appointed as the archbishop of Filippi in partibus infidelium (or in the regions of the infidels, a title usually given to bishops in non-Christian countries). Rome had intended to nominate him as archbishop of Utrecht, but the Peace of Münster in 1648 (ending the Thirty Years' War between Spain and the new Dutch Republic) blocked Vosmeer's elevation. Nevertheless, the Old Catholic Church claims that Vosmeer and his successors continued the Catholic worship and organization.

At the end of the seventeenth century the ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH tried to centralize its power over all Roman Catholics. Rome considered the Dutch Republic as a missionary country, to be governed by a nuncio directly out of Rome. The republic and the old Clerezie (priesthood) refused to accept the nuncio and instead acknowledged each other.

In the seventeenth century the Old Catholic Church adapted the perspective of Bishop Jansenius (1585–1638), popularly known as Jansenism. He emphasized a return to the authentic sources of Christian beliefs: the Bible and the writings of the fathers of the church, especially Augustine. Very important were his ideas about original sin: the fall of humanity has so depraved human nature that human beings, even after christening, cannot voluntarily do anything else but sin. Only the mercy of Christ makes it possible for humans to voluntarily do things that please God. Jansenius also championed spirituality and placed great emphasis on the inner life and on the dignified preparation for the receipt of the Holy Sacraments. In the field of the canon law, he stressed the governing power of the bishops and the council of prelates over and against that of the pope. This latter point became especially important later, as part of the schism between the Roman Catholic Church and the Old Catholic Church.

The definitive break with Rome occurred in 1723, when the Chapter of Utrecht elected Cornelis Steenoven (d. 1742) as archbishop. He was consecrated by Dominicus Maria Varlet, a French archbishop. Most Catholic believers in the Netherlands continued to follow Rome, even though there were no bishops until 1853, when the hierarchy of the Roman Church was reestablished in the Netherlands.

The early history of the Old Catholic Church as a separate entity was dominated by a series of internal and external problems. In 1742 the bishop of the Diocese of Haarlem and in 1758 the bishop of Deventer (without a diocese) were consecrated to secure the episcopal succession. Then began a period of struggle for the defense of the old beliefs and practices. The church refused to accept the dogma of the immaculate conception of the Blessed Virgin Mary proclaimed by Pope Pius IX on December 8, 1854.

Other Old Catholic churches arose from religious and ethical concerns over the decrees on the dogma of the infallibility of the pope, proclaimed by Rome at the First Vatican Council of 1870. For example, under the leadership of theologian Johann Joseph Ignaz von Döllinger (1799–1890), Catholics in Germany separated from the Roman Catholic Church in 1871. They sought connection with the Dutch Old Catholic Church, and subsequently J. H. Reinders was appointed as the first bishop in Germany, and in 1873 he was consecrated by Hermannus Heykamp, the bishop of Deventer (Netherlands). In Switzerland a fear of the loss of political freedom led to the formation in 1889 of the Union of Utrecht, a cooperative association of the Old Catholic bishops of the Netherlands, Germany, and Switzerland.

The Council of the Old Catholic Church of the Netherlands is the supreme ecclesiastical organ and can decide on binding points of doctrine. All Old Catholic churches are therefore members of the council. Old Catholics accept the Bible as the scriptural reproduction of the original revelation and therefore the primary source for the religious doctrine of the church and for personal life. The Bible is understood through the tradition of the church. The ideal ecclesiastical situation and the canon of faith for the Old Catholic Church is the old and undivided church of the first ten centuries; the conclusions of the councils of this early period provide the basics for Old Church believers. In this there is no difference with the tradition of the Roman Catholic Church.

Old Catholics also emphasize the doctrine of the redemption of humanity: no one can find the solution to life's problems and fulfillment in life without God. Only God can restore the broken relationship between God and humanity, and only through such restoration is some cooperation between God and humans possible. The redemption through faith is only possible in the community of the church.

The Old Catholic Church accepts seven sacraments, the intermediaries of salvation. They facilitate the construction of the community of saints. The sacraments support believers in their faith and equip them for holy conduct in life. In the sacrament of Holy Communion, Christ is seen as really present in the elements of bread and wine, though the Roman Catholic doctrine of transubstantiation is not accepted. The apostolic succession is essential for preaching and doctrine as well as for the succession of the priestly offices. The apostolic succession—very essential in the Old Catholic Church—is linked with the consecration of bishops.

Old Catholic buildings closely resemble Roman Catholic churches. The altar, as token of the mountain Golgotha

(where Jesus was crucified), has a central place. In the middle of the altar there is an open space where during the consecration of the altar some relics of martyrs are enclosed. The church is decorated with various liturgical colors reflective of the different periods of the ecclesiastical year. The celebration of the Eucharist is the essential act of Sunday worship services.

The Old Catholic Church has an episcopal structure. There are two dioceses: the Archdiocese of Utrecht and the Diocese of Haarlem. Until 1982 the church also had a titular bishop of Deventer. The archdiocese encloses the whole country except the province of North-Holland and has eighteen parishes, with eight priests, five deacons, and four priests for special services. The Diocese of Haarlem has twelve parishes, twelve priests, and one deacon. In addition, the church also supports stations with believers in regions without a priest or parish.

The bishops are elected by the priests and by some believers entitled to vote. The Chapter of Utrecht is very important in the organization of the church. Decisions are made by the provincial synod of the clergy and by the general synod, but they need the approbation of the episcopate. Clergy education is provided for by the church's seminary at Amersfoort, connected with the State University of Utrecht or the Catholic University of Utrecht. There are some ten thousand Old Catholic Church members in the Netherlands.

Internationally, the several Old Catholic churches around the world are associated in the Union of Utrecht promulgated on September 24, 1889. Now, as a new century begins, union member churches include Old Catholics in the Netherlands, Germany, Switzerland, Austria, countries of the former Yugoslavia, Poland, France, Sweden, Italy, the United States, and Canada. The International Conference of Bishops of the Old Catholic Church handles all questions with regard to other churches and makes decisions on matters of belief and ethics. Worldwide, the Old Catholic Church counts some six hundred thousand believers (with four hundred thousand in Germany and twenty-five thousand in the United States).

The Old Catholic Church has a special place in the ecumenical world as result of its genesis. As early as 1873 and 1874 the so-called Bonner Unionskonferenzen (Conferences) between the Roman Catholic Church, the Anglican Church, and the Eastern Orthodox churches had occurred. A special place in this process was assumed by the Anglican Church, though it was not until 1931 that full communion was restored between the CHURCH OF ENGLAND and the Old Catholics. The several Old Catholic churches have been active in the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES. Meanwhile, the relationship with the Roman Catholic Church remains laborious. The Old Catholic Church has made several attempts at reconciliation, without results until 1966. Relations have been hampered by the special proclamation of Pope Pius XII (1950) of the dogma of the physical assumption to heaven of the Blessed Virgin Mary. However, in 1966 Pope Paul VI removed the restrictions on dialogue between the two churches, and in 1972 the International Conference of Bishops of the Old Catholic Church and the Roman Catholic Secretary for the Unity of All Christians decided to cooperate in matters in the pastoral and sacramental spheres.

Address:

Old Catholic Church of the Netherlands
Kon. Wilhelminalaan 3
3818 HN Amersfoort
The Netherlands
<http://www.okkn.org/> (in Dutch)

E. G. Hoekstra

Sources:

- Kleef, B. A. Geschiedenis van de Oud-Katholieke Kerk van Nederland. Rev. ed. Assen, the Netherlands: Van Gorcum, 1953.
- Küry, U. Die alt-katholische Kirche: Ihre geschichte, ihre Lehre, ihr Anliegen. 1966.
- Maan, P. J., K. Ouwens, F. Smit, and J. Visser. De Oud-katholieke Kerk van Nederland: Leer en leven. Hilversum, the Netherlands: Gooi & Sticht, 1979.
- Moss, C. B. The Old Catholic Movement. Eureka Springs, AK: Episcopal Book Club, 1948.
- Tans, J. A. G., and M. Kok. Rome-Utrecht. Hilversum, the Netherlands: Paul Brand, 1966.
- Visser, J., F. Smit, and P. J. Maan. Onafhankelijk van Rome, toch katholiek: 250 jaar oud-katholieke geschiedenis. Hilversum, the Netherlands: Gooi & Sticht, 1973.

Old Catholicism

The Old Catholic movement traces its beginning to problems that developed in the ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH in France and the Low Countries around the teachings of Cornelius Jansen (1585–1638), who in the seventeenth century found himself in opposition to the Jesuits. However, the more immediate catalyst for the movement was the declaration of papal infallibility at the First Vatican Council in 1870–1871.

Jansen, a Dutch theologian residing at Port Royal, France, was accused by the Jesuits of Protestant tendencies because of his denial of free will. From that point the controversy surrounding his work expanded. Moving from France to Holland, Jansen found support in the person of Peter Codde (1656–1710), the bishop of Utrecht. Pope Clement XI (r. 1700–1721), however, favored the Jesuit position, deposed Codde, and did not replace him. Some years later, Dominique Marie Varlet, who had recently been consecrated the bishop of Babylon and was on his way to his new post, stopped in Holland, where he confirmed a number of children. A bishop is needed for confirmation, and there had been no confirmation in Codde's diocese since his being deposed. Varlet was consequently deposed, and he settled in Amsterdam. In 1724 he agreed to consecrate a new archbishop for Utrecht, and he subsequently consecrated bishops for Deventer and Haarlam as well. Thus, an administrative schism existed in Holland while Dutch Catholics appealed their situation to a church council.

In 1870 the first church council since the Council of Trent in the sixteenth century was called, in part a reaction to the problems the church encountered with the rise of secular governments in Europe and the resultant loss of its power. In Italy, the church was dealing with the loss of the papal state, as modern Italy was being created. The actions of the council strengthened the authority of the papal office, especially in the affirmation of papal infallibility, long sought in some parts of the church. This widely misunderstood doctrine stated that the pope was infallible on those rare occasions when he spoke "ex cathedra," or as the head of the church, in the act of defining doctrine. The doctrine elevated the pope's role as the prime teacher of the church and gave renewed importance to all of the documents, the encyclicals, issued by the pope, though these were not included among the documents declared infallible.

Some within the church opposed the new definition as a departure from tradition in ecclesiastical doctrine. In 1871, in anticipation of the council's pronouncement, a conference was called by those who saw themselves as the defenders of the status quo. The conference was attended by delegates from both the CHURCH OF ENGLAND and the schismatic diocese in Holland. The conference voted to organize the Old Catholic Church in hopes that large numbers of Catholics, including bishops and priests, would drop their alignment to Rome. That did not occur, but enough people did align with the Old Catholics to allow national churches to be formed in Germany, Switzerland, Australia, and several other countries. Receiving no acknowledgment of their protest from the Roman Catholic Church, the three dioceses in Holland reorganized as the OLD CATHOLIC CHURCH OF THE NETHERLANDS and supplied episcopal orders to the other Old Catholic churches. (The Old Catholic Church's episcopal orders are considered valid by the Roman Catholic Church, but it considers the exercise of the powers of their office by the various bishops illegal.)

Over the next decades, the Old Catholics began to make a number of changes in religious practice, such as dropping compulsory fasting and private confession of sins to a priest. In 1874 they dropped requirements for priestly celibacy, and in 1880 moved toward a mass in local languages in place of the Latin mass.

In 1874–1875, the Old Catholics organized two Union Conferences in Bonn, Germany, to which Eastern Orthodox, Anglicans, and even Protestants were invited. These conferences located a wide range of theological agreement among the participants, though no administrative moves toward closer alignment were made. Then in 1889, the Old Catholic bishops created the Union of Utrecht. They established an annual bishops' conference and established principles to guide their common life. The union was extended to include other Old Catholic bodies such as the POLISH NATIONAL CATHOLIC CHURCH and its European affiliate, the POLISH CATHOLIC CHURCH. Then in 1931, representatives of the Church of England signed the Bonn Agreement, which created full sacramental intercommunion between the Church of England and the Old Catholic churches. That intercommunion had been made possible by the Old Catholic recognition of Anglican orders in 1925.

The intercommunion has since been extended to the various churches of the worldwide ANGLICAN COMMUNION. The relationship between the two communions has been disturbed over the years by the Anglican moves to ordain and even consecrate women, though those issues were largely resolved in the mid-1990s when the Old Catholics began to admit women to the priesthood and the bishopric. The first Old Catholic woman was ordained by the CATHOLIC DIOCESE OF THE OLD CATHOLICS IN GERMANY in 1996. However, to monitor the ongoing relationship, in the late 1990s Anglican and Old Catholic authorities established the Anglican/Old Catholic International Coordinating Council. The Old Catholics have yet to come into communion with Protestants; however, in 1985 the Old Church in Germany reached an agreement with the EVANGELICAL CHURCH IN GERMANY that allows members of both churches to share in the Eucharist at congregations of either church.

In the last century, the Old Catholic movement has developed along two different paths. The churches of the Union of Utrecht exist as substantial church bodies, with thousands of members. The Dutch, Austrian, German, and Swiss churches are members of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES. Representatives of the INTERNATIONAL OLD CATHOLIC BISHOPS' CONFERENCE meet annually with the representatives of the other world Christian communions. A second group began in 1908, when the bishop in Holland consecrated Arnold Harris Mathew (1852–1919), a former Anglican priest, under the assumption that he was leading a substantial body of people who wished to be Old Catholics. No such following existed, and contrary to his agreement, without the sanction of Utrecht, he consecrated others to the episcopacy. These orders were then transferred to North America, where a series of new independent Old Catholic jurisdictions were established by bishops who founded dioceses in the hope that a church would emerge around them. Over the years more than one hundred such bodies have been founded, and over the twentieth century, the phenomena of bishops without churches has spread across Europe. The independent Old Catholic churches have been joined by independent Anglican and Orthodox churches that have followed a similar pattern.

Sources:

Anson, Peter F. Bishops at Large. London: Faber and Faber, 1964.
 Huelin, George. Old Catholics and Anglicans, 1931–1981. New York: Oxford University Press, 1983.
 Moss, C. B. The Old Catholic Movement. Eureka Springs, AK: Episcopal Book Club, 1977.
 Piepkorn, Arthur Carl. Profiles in Belief. Vol. 1. New York: Harper & Row, 1977.
 Pruter, Karl, and J. Gordon Melton. The Old Catholic Sourcebook. New York: Garland Publishing, 1983.
 Ward, Gary L. Independent Bishops: An International Directory. Detroit, MI: Apogee Books, 1990.

Old Rite Romanian Orthodox Church

The Old Rite Romanian Orthodox Church traces its beginnings to October 1924, when the ROMANIAN ORTHODOX CHURCH introduced the Gregorian calendar to its members. Prior to that time, the church had followed the Julian calendar (instituted by Julius Caesar in 46 B.C.E.). The Gregorian calendar, followed by most of the world by that time, differed from the Julian calendar by some thirteen days.

A number of the Orthodox faithful rejected the new calendar, and some monks left the monasteries that had instituted the new calendar and built new churches and monasteries. These Old Rite Romanian Orthodox Christians continued the Orthodox belief and practice, with the exception of the dates when the various church festivals and holy days were observed. Their leaders argued that the festivals of the church had been established by the councils of Nicaea (325) and Antioch (345) and could not be changed. Consequently, any alteration of the calendar was regarded as a violation of the decisions made by the Fathers of the church. In this matter, they made common cause with the Monastic Community on Mount Athos in Greece.

In 1930 the Romanian authorities began a period of harassment and persecution of the Old Rite believers. A number of their priests were arrested. However, the church persisted, and in 1936 the Romanian Council on Ministries decided that the Old Rite believers were to be integrated back into the Romanian Orthodox Church. More than thirty of the Old Rite church buildings were demolished. Following World War II, the priests were released from prison. They gathered the remaining body of believers (some twelve thousand) and demanded that their confiscated goods be returned. In 1945 the new Ministry of Cults granted the freedom to practice their faith to the Old Rite Church. A new center for the church was established at Suceava.

In 1948 a new General Status of Religious Denominations Law was passed, failing to recognize the Old Rite as a legal entity. A new wave of persecution hit the church in 1953. Again, most of the churches were closed and priests were arrested. Three church buildings were demolished, as were two monasteries. It was not until 1990 that Romanian authorities again officially recognized the church. The church quickly revived and by 1992 reported eighteen churches, eight monasteries, and 23,634 members, most of whom resided in the Suceava and Neamt districts.

At the same time as the Old Rite Church was forming in one part of Romania, others who similarly rejected the calendar change gathered in northern Moldavia, where they formed several large communities and monasteries. Although generally following Orthodox belief and practice, these believers have a special regard for the authority of the Synod of Constantinople and pay special attention to the Pilalion, a collection of religious canons approved by that synod, which they regard as the “guide of the church until the end of the world.” In 1945, during the reprieve in the persecution, they had been reduced to approximately two thousand believers and six associated monasteries. In 1990 the Moldavian believers were recognized as the Traditional Christian Church with an administrative center in Mincești.

The Old Rite Orthodox Church is currently led by its metropolitan, His Eminence Leonti Izot Zlavrente. The church is in communion with the TRUE (OLD CALENDAR) ORTHODOX CHURCH OF GREECE under the jurisdiction of Metropolitan Cyprian and the Old Calendar Church in Bulgaria.

Address:

Old Rite Orthodox Church
 No. 5, Zidari St.
 6100 Brasila
 Romania

Constantin Cuciuc

Sources:

Branzea, Nicolae I., and Stefan Lonita. Religious Life in Romania. Bucharest: Editura Paideia, 1999.
 Cuciuc, Constantin. Atlasul Religiilor și al Monumentelor Istorice Religioase din Romania. Bucharest: Editura Gnosis, 1996.

Oman

One of several countries on the Arabian Peninsula, Oman occupies its easternmost corner. It is bounded on the south and east by the Arabian Sea and on the north by the Gulf of Oman. To the west are the United Arab Emirates, Saudi Arabia, and Yemen. Even though much of the land is desert, the inhabitable portions were already a prosperous trading site as early as the third century B.C.E. Traders developed oceangoing routes across the Indian Ocean to Indonesia and Vietnam. Most residents of the area converted to ISLAM in the seventh century, and as a result, some dissidents left the country and founded the city of Zanzibar on the East African coast.

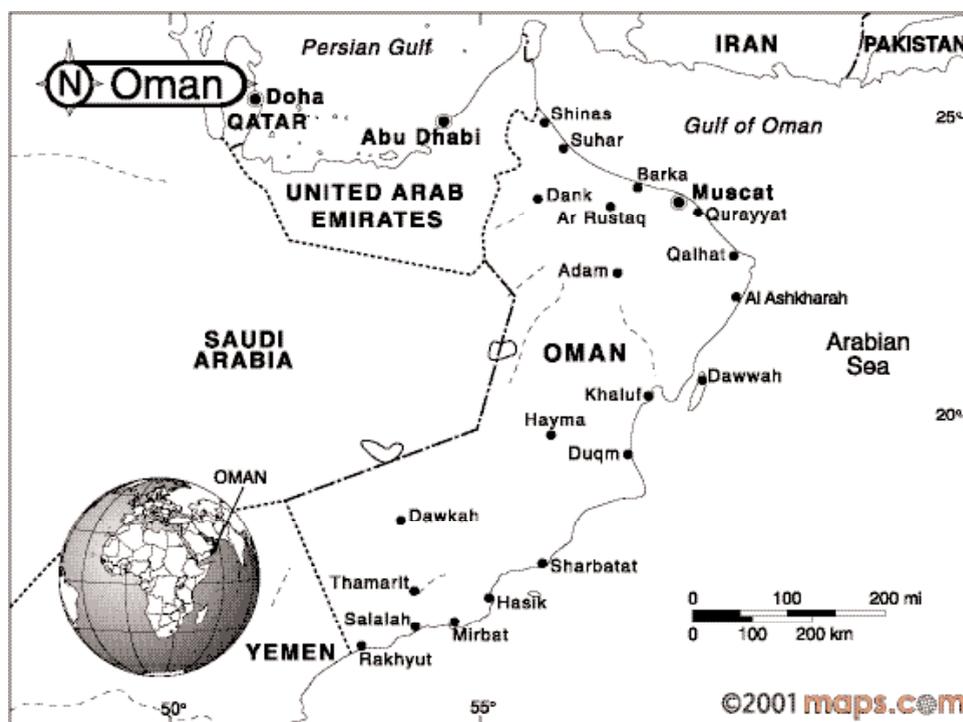

Since the eighth century, the secular and religious leadership in the country have been united in the person of the sultan. The area has been the scene of numerous wars, as different neighboring powers attempted to seize the country's wealth. Finally, in 1507 the Portuguese arrived and assumed control of the area for more than 150 years. A twenty-year revolt finally succeeded in driving the Portuguese out in 1650, and Omanis eventually recaptured related territory along the African coast, including Zanzibar (1698).

Through the eighteenth century, Oman expanded its territory, eventually stretching from the Gulf of Oman to Madagascar. In 1832 the capital was moved to Zanzibar. This occurred just as the British presence was growing in the lands surrounding the Indian Ocean, and in 1856, the two heirs to the throne divided the African and Arabian portions of their land, forming two separate countries. In 1891 the British made present-day Oman a protectorate. An internal fight for power led to the division of Oman in 1920, but it was reunited in 1955, primarily in response to British pressure.

The present sultan, Qaboos ben Said, came to power in 1970 after overthrowing his father. He has brought his country into a strong alliance with the United States, which has been interested in its oil reserves and its strategic location relative to Iran, the Persian Gulf, and Middle Eastern oil fields.

Oman appears to have accepted Islam in a relatively peaceful fashion in the year 630, when the two rulers agreed to submit to the faith. Islamic states in the region were dividing into Sunni and Shi'a (Shiite) camps. The primary issue dividing the community concerned succession, the Sunnis placing leadership in the hands of the descendants of the tribe of the Prophet Muhammad and the Shi'as placing it in the hands of members of the Prophet's family. Oman took a third option that has come to be known as the school of IBADHI ISLAM. The Ibadhis believe that leadership should go to the best candidate in the Muslim community. That belief allowed Omani leadership to rise, but it also meant that continual strife and even wars would be experienced during the process of choosing a new leader.

Dissent on the issue of succession placed the Ibadi leaders at odds with both the Shi'a and the Sunni peoples who

Status of religions in Oman, 2000-2050

Followers	2000		2025	2050
	total	% rate
Muslims	2,221,000	87.4 3.45	4,538,000	6,768,000
Hindus	145,000	5.7 4.90	350,000	600,000
Christians	124,000	4.9 4.70	318,000	651,000
Roman Catholics	53,000	2.1 4.24	130,000	250,000
Independents	43,900	1.7 5.80	120,000	260,000
Orthodox	16,500	0.7 5.14	45,000	100,000
Buddhists	19,400	0.8 4.10	55,000	100,000
Sikhs	16,800	0.7 4.31	40,000	80,000
Baha'is	9,100	0.4 5.19	25,000	60,000
Nonreligious	5,500	0.2 3.75	25,000	50,000
Ethnoreligionists	150	0.0 2.46	300	500
Atheists	80	0.0 -0.51	200	500
Neoreligionists	80	0.0 2.39	200	400
Total population	2,542,000	100.0 3.60	5,352,000	8,310,000

surrounded them, on the one hand, and on the other hand, it led them to develop a level of tolerance toward people of other religions that developed into a doctrine of quietism. Unlike those with extremely evangelical approaches to Islam, the Ibadi have tended to allow non-Ibadi people in realms under their control to retain their faiths. This approach also served the needs of Ibadi traders as they moved about non-Muslim areas of Africa. Today the majority of Omani Muslims are Idadi, but as many as one-third of the country's residents are followers of various Sunni (WAH-HABI, SHAFIITE, HANBALITE) and Shi'a beliefs.

Oman is officially a Muslim country, and Islamic law dominates the judicial system. Sultan Qaboos ben Said has voiced his opinion that various religious groups have a right to establish their faith communities in the country as long as they are law abiding. Religious life is guided from the government's Ministry of Awqaf and Religious Affairs (awqaf refers to religious endowments, such as mosques and schools and the state-administered revenues for their upkeep). Authorities monitor mosques for departures from orthodoxy. The sultan has granted land to a variety of different non-Muslim religious groups for the erection of religious facilities, but these must be placed behind high walls. Non-Muslims may not proselytize within the Muslim community—a regulation that also limits the circulation of any religious literature outside of the group's membership. Islam is a requirement for citizenship, but approximately 40 percent of the population are expatriates who have moved to Oman for various reasons, primarily to work in the oil fields.

There is no evidence that Christianity had penetrated Oman by the time that the country adopted Islam in the seventh century. Thus, Christianity is believed to have first entered the land with the coming of the Portuguese in 1507–1508 and also to have departed with them. A new era began in 1889–1890 with the arrival of James Cantine and Samuel Zwemer (1867–1952) in Muscat, Oman's capital. Their visit was part of their work with the American Arab Mission. In 1894 the REFORMED CHURCH IN AMERICA (RCA) assumed sponsorship of their work, which extended throughout the region. The RCA opened a hospital in Muscat, which became the center of the nation's Christian presence for many years. This work, now known as the Protestant Church of Oman, includes Protestants of many denominational backgrounds and continues to be served by RCA personnel. Its work is concentrated in Muscat and in the nearby communities of Ruwi and Ghala. The sultan also granted to the church parcels of land in Salalah and Sohar.

The ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH reestablished itself in the area in 1841 with the assignment of personnel to Aden (Yemen). That work grew successively into a prefecture (1854) and a vicariate (1888), and in 1889 it gave birth to the Vicariate of Arabia, now administered from Abu Dhabi (United Arab Emirates) and responsible for Catholics in Oman. The first Catholic church in Oman was erected in 1977 in Muscat, and subsequently, as the community has grown, other churches have appeared.

In the last decades, a number of religious communities have emerged among the expatriate population. The Anglican Church has been one of the strongest. Anglican congregations are under the jurisdiction of the EPISCOPAL CHURCH IN JERUSALEM AND THE MIDDLE EAST. In 1960, in response to the sultan's request for a physician, Dr. Bruwell Kennedy moved to the Buaimi Oasis in the northeast corner of Oman. Sponsored by The Evangelical Alliance Mission (TEAM), an American-based Evangelical sending agency, Kennedy was given unusual liberty to carry out both medical and religious work among the Bedouins of the area. The TEAM staff soon numbered more than twenty members.

A large percentage of the expatriate community has come from India. Among the first group to request and accept the sultan's recognition were Christians from Kerala State in India, who organized the initial congregation of the SYRIAN ORTHODOX CHURCH OF MALABAR and of the MAR THOMA SYRIAN CHURCH OF MALABAR. There are also various Indian-based Pentecostal and Evangelical groups. Many of the Indian residents in Oman are Hindus, and the sultan has been as generous to them as to the Christians. The Hindu community is centered on the Shiva and Bajrangbali Temple in Muscat and additional temples in other towns dedicated to Govindrayji, Shree Ganesh, and Devi Kalaka.

Sources:

- Bierschenk, T. Religion and Political Structure: Remarks on Ibadism in Oman and the Mzab (Algeria). Bielefeld, Germany: University of Bielefeld, 1983.
- Horner, N. A. "Present-day Christianity in the Gulf States of the Arabian Peninsula." Occasional Bulletin of Missionary Research 2 (April 1978): 53–63.
- Maamiry, A. H. Oman and Ibadhism. 2d ed. New Delhi: Lancers Books, 1989.

Ōmoto

Like TENRIKYO and TENSHO KOTAI JINGU-KYO, Ōmoto (Great Origin) was founded in Japan by a peasant woman, Deguchi Nao (1836–1918). Before she founded Ōmoto in 1892, Deguchi Nao had been involved in a new religion called KONKOKYO. In 1897, she met the mystic and spiritualist Ueda Kisaburo (1871–1948), who became her son-in-law by marrying her daughter Sumi. He later changed his name to Deguchi Onisaburo and from 1904 became known as the kyosu (doctrinal founder), of the movement while Deguchi Nao held the title kaiso (spiritual founder).

Although fiercely loyal to Japan and supportive of its expansionist policy in the Far East, both of these figures expressed literally and symbolically a deep hatred of the modernizing reforms introduced by the Meiji government (1868–1912) and its taxation policies in the rural areas. They challenged not only the government's modernization program but also the core myth on which the imperial system was based: that Amaterasu was the divine ancestor of the imperial line. Deguchi Onisaburo went so far as to claim that he himself was the authentic leader of Japan. This opposition led the movement to develop a powerful utopian vision of the ideal society and to construct a model of such a society in Kyoto Prefecture, at Ayabe City, at the center of which is the Miroku-den (Hall of the Future Buddha, Maitreya) and the Choseiden Sanctuary.

Government persecution followed the establishment of this center; the movement's buildings were destroyed in 1921 and in 1935, and Deguchi Onisaburo was imprisoned on the charge of lèse-majesté. In 1935 the movement was dissolved. At this stage the estimated size of the membership was 2 million. Ōmoto would never again attract so many people.

In January 1946 Deguchi Onisaburo reorganized the movement and registered it as a religious juridical entity with the name Ōmoto Aizenen (Grand Source of the Community of Love and Virtue). In 1952 it adopted its present name of Ōmoto.

Ōmoto's teachings are contained in the Ofudesaki (The Tip of the Divine Writing Brush), written by Deguchi Nao, who is said to have been illiterate, under the inspiration of the deity Ushitora-no-Konjin (Great Father God). In this sacred text Deguchi Nao predicts the destruction of humanity and calls for a return to traditional ways of living and for the construction of the Kingdom of Miroku.

Among Deguchi Onisaburo's contributions to the movement's spiritual development and teaching is his insistence on art as meditation and prayer, as a spiritual discipline in its own right. Ōmoto also practices a form of meditation known as chinkon kishin, which leads to union with God. Once a month Ōmoto holds a communal service with roots in classical Shinto beliefs that see the divine everywhere in nature. A number of annual festivals convey the same sense of Ōmoto's Shinto roots, the most important being the Spring Festival, or Setsubun, which commemorates the day on which God revealed himself to Deguchi Nao, the Miroku Festival in April, and the Harvest Festival during which a pilgrimage is made to the Hill of Ten'nodaira (Imperial Flat Hill) where Nao, Onisaburo, and Sumi are buried.

Since Deguchi Nao's death, the movement has been headed by her female descendants. Its current head is Kiyoko, her great, great granddaughter. Ōmoto's administrative headquarters are at Kameoka City, Kyoto Prefecture, where it has built the Ten-onkyo (Holy Grounds) and the Bansho-den (Hall of a Million Beatitudes). Although its membership in Japan has declined to around 150,000, Ōmoto has exercised great influence on the development of the teachings and practices of other Japanese new religions, particularly SEICHO-NO-IE (House of Growth) and SEKAI KYUSEI KYO.

Ōmoto has very few members outside Japan. It is nonetheless very active abroad in pursuit of its objectives. Among its main activities are programs for the protection of the environment, organic farming, the teaching of Esperanto, interreligious dialogue, and ecumenism. It participates in numerous joint projects with Christian, Muslim, and Buddhist movements, among others, and supports the construction of a world government. It sees the nation state and the teaching of specific languages as dangerously divisive.

Address:

Ōmoto Tokyo Headquarters
2-1-44 Ikenohata
Taito-ku, Tokyo 110-0008
Japan
<http://www.oomoto.or.jp/>

Sources:

- Berthon, Jean-Pierre. Ōmoto, esperance millenarists d'une nouvelle religion Japonaise. Paris: Cahiers d'Etudes et de Documents sur les Religions du Japon, 1985.
- Hardacre, Helen. "Gender and the Millennium in Ōmotokyo." In Japanese Civilization in the Modern World, edited by T. Humasao, H. Hardacre, and H. Nakamaki, 47-62. Osaka: National Museum of Ethnography, 1990.
- Hino, I. P. The Ofudesaki: The Holy Scriptures of Ōmoto. Kameoka, Japan: Ōmoto Foundation, 1974.
- Ooms, Emily Groszos. Women and Millenarian Protest in Meiji Japan: Deguchi Nao and Ōmotokyo. New York: Cornell University East Asia Program, 1993.

Ontakekyō

In the early nineteenth century, Shimoyama Osuke, a devotee of nature worship, founded Ontakekyō (Great Mountain Sect). Also known as Mitakekyo, Ontakekyō is one of the religious groups included among the "Sect Shinto" (kyoha shinto), those autonomous religious organizations that the Japanese government recognized between 1868 and 1945. The government recognized Ontakekyō as an independent sect within Shinto in 1882. By the late twentieth century, an extensive study of Japanese religions carried out by Hori and other Japanese scholars (1981) had identified about fifteen groups that were derived from Ontakekyō.

Ontakekyō is a mountain worship sect. Like many other religious movements in Japan, it was initially a voluntary association of people who were interested in climbing mountains as a religious discipline. As a devotional association, Ontakekyō encouraged the ritual climbing of Mount Ontake. The group's founder, Shimoyama, gathered like-minded devotees and established a permanent structure for the pilgrimage to Mount Ontake. Even today the popularity of Mount Ontake among the Japanese as a place of pilgrimage and religious practice is quite apparent in various areas, where small hills, such as the one in Nisshin-shi, Aichi Prefecture, are identified as Ontakesan. By climbing Ontakesan, pilgrims intend to produce newly empowered spiritual strength.

Mount Ontake, 3,063 meters high, is located on the border between Nagano and Gifu prefectures of central Japan. Among the Japanese, it is popularly called Ontakesan (Great Mountain) and has for centuries been regarded as a sacred mountain. From the latter part of the Sengoku (Civil War) period (1467-1568), the Shinto shrine on the summit of Ontakesan has functioned as an object of worship.

Characteristic features of the Ontakekyō include its stress on ascetic training and the worship of mountain deities. For the members of Ontakekyō, Ontake Okami (the Great Kami of Mount Ontake) is the primary object of worship. As a divine being, Ontake Okami combines three divine bodies: Kunitokotachi no Mikoto, Onamuchi no Mikoto, and Sukunahikona no Mikoto.

Japanese farmers believe mountains such as Ontakesan are holy places where divinities dwell. In early spring, they select a day to worship Ontakesan. This religious practice is connected with the folk belief that the god of the mountain (yama no kami) descends from the mountain to the rice fields in spring.

Even today, in summer, pious devotees dressed in white robes climb the mountain to reach Ontake Shrine as an act of religious piety. A bus takes the pilgrims part way up the mountain, but the remainder of the pilgrimage to the summit is an arduous one, particularly in the winter months. In winter, Mount Ontake is covered with snow and only very rarely do pilgrims climb the mountain, as it takes some twelve hours for the journey. Until the early nineteenth century, women were not allowed to climb Mount Ontake beyond the Mitake Shrine.

As a religious group, Ontakekyō aims to generate purity of heart, to realize divine virtues, and to contribute toward a stable nation, rich with spirituality. Members interpret the vicissitudes of life, such as fortune and misfortune, happiness and unhappiness, as indications of divine will. Although they engage in possession and healing, they also practice ascetic and purification rituals, such as chinka-shiki (rite of pacifying fire) and kugatachi-shiki (rite of sprinkling hot water), and a variety of divination and breathing exercises.

Address:

Ontakekyō
3775 Aza Obuchi
Futana-machi
Nara-shi, Nara-ken 631
Japan

Mahinda Deegalle

Sources:

Bocking, Brian. A Popular Dictionary of Shinto. Surrey, UK: Curzon Press, 1996.
Hori, Ichiro, et al., eds. Japanese Religion: A Survey by the Agency for Cultural Affairs. Tokyo: Kodansha International, 1981.

Organization of African Instituted Churches

The Organization of African Independent Churches (OAIC) was founded in 1978 in Cairo, Egypt. The link with Egypt was significant, for AFRICAN INITIATED CHURCHES (AICs) saw Egypt and Ethiopia as the birthplaces of the oldest independent churches in Africa, the COPTIC ORTHODOX CHURCH and the ETHIOPIAN ORTHODOX TAWAHEDO CHURCH, both established alternatives to Western Christianity. Many previous attempts to bring together AICs in ecumenical associations had ended in failure. By 1985, the All-Africa Conference of Churches (AACC) had accepted only fifteen AICs into membership and the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES (WCC) had admitted only seven, out of literally hundreds of applications to both organizations from across Africa.

Then AIC leaders Reuben Spartas of Uganda and Arthur Gathuna of Kenya pioneered the links with the Coptic Church, first visiting Cairo in 1943. AICs in several African countries began to form national councils, and by 1986 some ninety-five such councils had been formed, a remarkable achievement—although forty-one of these councils were in South Africa and Nigeria. The Kenya African United Churches was the first to be established in Kenya, in 1961, through the efforts of James Ochwatta of the AFRICAN ORTHODOX CHURCH. This success was short-lived, however, and in 1963 Ochwatta helped form the East African United Churches, which included all the large AICs in Kenya and was supported by politicians like Jomo Kenyatta (c. 1891–1978), first president of Kenya, and Oginga Odinga (c. 1911–1994). Zakayo Kivuli of the AFRICAN ISRAEL CHURCH, NINEVEH, was grand metropolitan of the organization, Lucas Nuhu of the Holy Spirit Church of East Africa was chairman, and Ochwatta was general secretary. This council unsuccessfully tried to register with the Kenyan government and to join the AACC and the WCC. In 1984 it was renamed the International Holy Spirit and United Indigenous Churches, with Nuhu as chair.

In 1976 Pope Shenouda III (b. 1923), Coptic patriarch of Alexandria, consecrated M. S. Mikhail as bishop of African affairs, and Mikhail took the name Bishop Antonious Markos. From his office in Nairobi, Bishop Markos began an extensive tour of AICs all over Africa, met political and mainline church leaders, and gained financial support for development projects for AICs. Two years later, Pope Shenouda invited twenty significant AIC leaders to the inauguration of the OAIC in Cairo, with the basic aim of facilitating teaching, training, and theological education. The executives elected at this time included (among others) Joseph Diangienda of the KIMBANGUIST CHURCH in the Congo as a member, Nigeria's primate E. O. A. Adejobi of the CHURCH OF THE LORD (ALADURA) as chairman, and Bishop Markos as organizing secretary. The second conference was held in 1982 in Nairobi, with representatives from seventeen African nations and thirty-one AICs. A constitution was approved and Bishop Mathew Ajuoga of the Church of Christ in Africa (Kenya) was elected chairman, a post he held for fifteen years.

In 1985 the name of the OAIC was changed to the Organization of African Instituted Churches at the request of the Kenyan government, and registration was effected. Bishop Markos resigned as OAIC executive secretary in 1990 after increasing tension with AIC leaders, and in 1995 the OAIC reorganized itself into eight regional groupings. The first issue of an official OAIC magazine, Baragumu: The African Independent Churches Voice, was launched in 1996. The third conference of the OAIC was held in 1997, when Nigerian Baba Aladura Dr. G. I. M. Otubu of the CHERUBIM AND SERAPHIM was elected chairman. The new general secretary was Kenyan archbishop Njeru Wambugu of the National Independent Church of Africa.

Then a significant shift in policy was made—member churches could become members of the OAIC only through their regional councils and could no longer join by applying directly to the international office. The OAIC office in Nairobi continues to be actively involved in projects for theological education by extension and development. One of the questions facing the OAIC and its member churches at the end of the millennium was how to progress with assistance from the north without losing precious independence and identity to the new form of dependency euphemistically called “partnership.” The question becomes all the more relevant as many African countries spiral into greater economic crisis and debt.

Address:

Organization of African Instituted Churches
P.O. Box 21736
Nairobi
Kenya

Allan H. Anderson

Sources:

- Anderson, Allan H. African Reformation: African Initiated Christianity in the Twentieth Century. Lawrenceville, NJ: Africa World Press, 2001.
- Barrett, David B., and T. John Padwick. Rise Up and Walk! Conciliarism and the African Indigenous Churches, 1815–1987. Nairobi: Oxford University Press, 1989.
- Consultation with African Instituted Churches, Ogere, Nigeria, 9–14 January 1996*. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 1996.
- “Organization of African Instituted Churches.” Baragumu: The African Independent Churches Voice (Nairobi). Vol. 1 (1996).

Orthodox Church in America

The Orthodox Church in America dates to the arrival of the first Orthodox priests into Alaska from Russia following the Russian discovery of Alaska in 1741. The first convert, an Aleut, was baptized in 1843. The mission expanded slowly through the rest of the century, and in 1794 seven monks came to Paul’s Harbor and formally consecrated the first church. In 1824, Father John Veniaminiov (1797–1879), later consecrated as the first American bishop, arrived. He oversaw the construction of the cathedral in Sitka and of a seminary that was opened in 1841. He later returned to Russia to become head of the RUSSIAN ORTHODOX CHURCH (MOSCOW PATRIARCHATE) and in 1977 was canonized as St. Innocent.

A significant change came to the mission diocese in 1867, when Alaska was purchased by the United States from Russia. The church was cut off from its parent, and in 1872 the bishop moved to San Francisco, California, and reorganized as the Russian Orthodox Church, Diocese of the Aleutian Islands and North America. The establishment of the church in San Francisco gave Russian Orthodoxy hegemony over the Orthodox community in North America, though that hegemony would later be challenged by the ECUMENICAL PATRIARCHATE, which has oversight over the Greek Orthodox outside of Greece proper.

Under Bishop Nicholas (r. 1891–1898), beginning in 1891, the church experienced a period of growth. As the mission work in Alaska expanded, thousands of Russians were pouring into the United States and Canada and new parishes were springing up rapidly in the eastern half of the nation. In addition, Orthodox Christians from other lands were also coming to the United States, and initially, most of these believers found their church home in the Russian churches. As the number of non-Russian Orthodox believers grew, ethnic parishes would be organized and eventually new ethnic dioceses formed as autonomous jurisdictions. During the first half of the twentieth century the whole spectrum of Eastern Orthodox church life appeared in America. In the process, the head of the American Russian Orthodox community was elevated to the office of archbishop and additional dioceses appeared—in Alaska, Cleveland (Ohio), Brooklyn (New York), and Pittsburgh (Pennsylvania).

The steady progress of the church was disrupted during World War I by events in Russia. The Russian Revolution swept the czar, with whom the Russian church had always had a special relationship, from power and left the Moscow Patriarchate under the thumb of an aggressively atheist regime. The American church found its funds cut off even as it had to accommodate a new wave of refugees from the revolution. In the 1920s the patriarch of Moscow was arrested, and in 1923 the American leadership was faced with the arrival of representatives of the Russian church loyal to the new government and demanding control of the church and its property. In 1924, the American Archdiocese rejected the Russian representatives, declared its autonomy from Moscow, and reorganized as the Russian Orthodox Greek Catholic Church of America.

Those priests and members who remained loyal to the patriarch in spite of the changes in Russia also reorganized and took the new schismatic (as they saw it) church to court. They scored a major victory, winning the headquarters property, St. Nicolas Cathedral in New York City. This small faction continued under the leadership of Bishop John Kedrovsky. Their position was somewhat undermined by the arrival in 1933 of yet another bishop from Moscow—Benjamin Fedchenkov, who represented a position of accommodation to the presence of the Communist government in Russia, but he was seen as less accepting of its domination of the patriarchate. He was thus able to build a following of Russians who wished to remain under the jurisdiction of Moscow. Eventually the Kedrovsky faction merged into what became known as the American Exarchate of the Russian Orthodox Church.

In 1970 the Russian Orthodox Greek Catholic Church and the American Exarchate reached an agreement, the result of many years of negotiation and consideration of the position of the Russian Church as the initial Orthodox body in the United States. The Russian Orthodox Greek Catholic Church changed its name to the Orthodox Church in America and recognized the spiritual leadership of the Russian Patriarchate. The patriarchate, in return, acknowledged the autonomy of the American church. The exarchate dissolved and its members and parishes merged into the new Orthodox Church in America. A small number of parishes wished to remain under the direct authority of the patriarch of Moscow and reorganized as the Patriarchal Parishes of the Russian Orthodox Church in the U.S.A. This group remained in possession of St. Nicolas Cathedral in New York City.

In the meantime, as the main body of Russian Orthodox believers had found their way to accommodate the changes in Russia, one group refused to acknowledge the changes in Russia. Under the leadership of several bishops who had been placed in charge of the Russian church in diaspora prior to the revolution, they reorganized as a continuing Russian Orthodox church in vocal opposition to the Moscow Patriarchate and its accommodation with the Communist government. Over the years, this faction, now known as the RUSSIAN ORTHODOX CHURCH OUTSIDE OF RUSSIA, came to embody the most conservative element of Russian Orthodoxy and has rejected the post-Communist emergence of the Russian Orthodox Church for its movement into the ecumenical world and its attachment to the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES.

The Orthodox Church in America is headed by its archbishop, and the U.S. parishes are grouped into nine dioceses. There is also one Canadian diocese and an exarchate in Mexico. The Diocese of South America includes one parish in Brazil and three in Venezuela. The church is a leading member of the Standing Conference of Canonical Orthodox Bishops, which includes most of the larger Orthodox bodies in the United States. Also operating under the canonical jurisdiction of the Orthodox Church in America are the Albanian Orthodox Archdiocese and the Romanian Orthodox Episcopate of America—the result of splits in the Romanian and Albanian churches after their home countries fell under Communist control.

The Orthodox Church in America reports some 2 million members while recognizing that its active membership, served by its eight hundred priests, is far less. It supports St. Tikkon's Orthodox Theological Seminary in South Canaan, Pennsylvania, and St. Vladimir's Orthodox Theological Seminary in Tuckahoe, New York. It is a member of the World Council of Churches.

Address:

Orthodox Church in America
P.O. Box 675
Syosset, NY 11791-0675
<http://www.oca.org/>

Sources:

- Koulomzim, Sophie. The Orthodox Christian Church through the Ages. New York: Russian Orthodox Greek Catholic Church of America, 1956.
- Tarasar, Constance. Orthodox America, 1794-1976: Development of the Orthodox Church in America. Syosset, NY: Orthodox Church in America, Department of Archives and History, 1975.

Orthodox Church in China

Orthodox Christianity came to China in the seventeenth century, brought in 1686 by Cossacks serving in the Chinese imperial guard. A permanent mission in Beijing was established in 1715, which over the course of several centuries welcomed some 5,000 converts. The church swelled enormously in the 1920s when some 300,000 believers fled into China from the effects of the Communist Revolution in Russia. By the time of the Chinese Revolution, there were some 106 Orthodox churches in China. Most participants were Russian expatriates, though some 10,000 members were also among the faithful.

Following the Chinese Revolution, all foreign missionaries were required to leave, and many of the members also returned to Russia. In 1957, the church was granted autonomous status, and bishops established in Beijing and Shanghai. The Cultural Revolution (launched in 1966) almost destroyed the church—the churches were closed and all property was confiscated.

It was not until the 1980s that a revival of Orthodoxy in China was possible. Fr. Grigori Zhu Shi Fu (d. 2000) began regular services again in October 1981, at the Church of the Holy Protection in Harbin-Nangang. A second church was opened later some 25 kilometers from Harbin where many Orthodox believers are buried in the cemetery. It is used on special occasions. The church in Beijing has been restored but turned into a museum.

In Xinjiang Province there are some 3,500 Orthodox believers and reconstruction of a church at Urumqi was completed in 1990, though there is no priest to conduct services. Believers in Shanghai and Beijing have as yet not been allowed to organize for services.

In February 17, 1997, the fortieth anniversary of the Orthodox Church in China was celebrated, and the RUSSIAN ORTHODOX CHURCH (MOSCOW PATRIARCHATE) accepted a new level of responsibility for the Orthodox believers in China, especially until a new leader of the church can be elected.

The Orthodox Church can be contacted at 270 Bolshoi Prospect, Harbin, China. It is not among the officially recognized religious bodies in the People's Republic of China.

Source:

Pozdinaev, Dionisy. "The Orthodox Church in China: It's Problems and Prospect." Posted at <http://www.chinese.orthodoxy.ru/ENGLISH/problems.hym1>. Accessed May 10, 2001.

Orthodox Church in Czech Lands and Slovakia

EASTERN ORTHODOXY was introduced into what is now the Czech Republic and Slovakia in the ninth century C.E. as part of the general spread of Christianity among the Slavic peoples. The area was overrun by the Hungarians in 906, and the ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH became the dominant religious community, though some churches retained the Eastern Rite. Only in the twentieth century, with the establishment of the independent state of Czechoslovakia in 1918, was Orthodoxy able to reassert its independent existence.

In 1925 the reestablished Orthodox church of Czechoslovakia came under the protection and guidance of the SERBIAN ORTHODOX CHURCH with the patriarch residing in Belgrade. The small church experienced a sudden growth when, in 1930, some twenty-five thousand Eastern Rite Catholics converted to Orthodoxy. The church's growth was halted during World War II when the Nazi government disbanded it and executed its leader, Bishop Gorazd (1879–1942), who had been the major force in founding the church.

The church was reorganized after World War II, and since the new government did not recognize Eastern Rite Catholicism, the remaining Eastern Rite Catholics were placed under the Orthodox bishop. Then in 1951, the Serbian Patriarchate recognized the autonomy of the Orthodox Church of Czechoslovakia. In 1968, as new freedoms were introduced into the country, many of the members returned to Roman Catholicism. The rebuilding of Eastern Catholicism created some harsh feeling, as buildings and property were turned over to the new Catholic body. Disputes over property between the two bodies continue to the present.

Following the separation of the former Czechoslovakia into the Czech Republic and Slovakia, the church adopted its present name. There is an archbishop in Prague and one in Presov, Slovakia. In the 1990s the church reported some fifty thousand members in the Czech Republic and twenty-two thousand in Slovakia. It supports the Orthodox theological faculty at Presov University and is a member of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES.

Address:

Orthodox Church in Czech Lands and Slovakia
V. Jamé 6
P.O. Box 655
111 21, Prague 1
Czech Republic

Sources:

Novak, G. "The Orthodox Church in Czechoslovakia." Orthodoxy (1964): 240–252.
Orthodoxia. Regensburg, Germany: Osrkirchliches Institut, issued annually.

Orthodox Church of Cyprus

Christianity on the island of Cyprus began with the arrival of the apostles Paul and Barnabas, who had been commissioned as missionaries at Antioch (Acts 13:2) and proceeded to Cyprus as one of the first stops on their initial tour. The church in Cyprus developed under the authority of Antioch until its autonomy was proclaimed by the church's Council at Ephesus in 431 C.E. The ruling had the effect of granting the synod of Cypriot bishops the right to select their own archbishop. The church developed in the Eastern Orthodox orb and shares the same faith and practices with other Orthodox bodies.

With the spread of ISLAM in the seventh century, Cyprus became a target of Muslim raiders. At one point, many of the Christians, including the archbishop, relocated to Nea Justiniana, a city on the Dardanelles, where the Byzantine emperor could more easily provide protection. When the crisis passed and the archbishop returned to Cyprus, he added the title of archbishop of Nea Justiniana to his own; the Cypriot bishop is known by that designation to the present.

As part of a crusade to recover Jerusalem, the British king Richard the Lionhearted (1157–1199) conquered Cyprus in 1191. The next year it was turned over to Guy de Lusignan (1129–1194), the former king of Jerusalem, whose Christian nation had been wiped out by the Muslim sultan Saladin (c. 1137–1193) in 1187–1188. De Luisgnan and his successors, who were Catholic, attempted to impose Latin Christianity on Cyprus, and for the next three centuries, the Orthodox Church found itself in retreat and fighting to survive.

The dominance of the ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH on Cyprus continued until 1571 when the emergent Turks, having captured Constantinople, overran the island. The new Muslim rulers removed the Roman bishops, recognized the Orthodox Church, and even granted it some degree of autonomy. As was common elsewhere in the expanding Turkish (Ottoman) Empire, Orthodox bishops were assigned a position in the civil government, with authority over the Greek-speaking Cypriots. This situation worked well until 1821, when the Greek citizens staged an unsuccessful revolt. In response, the Turks killed all the Orthodox bishops. New leadership that possessed the required apostolic authority (granted only by ordination and consecration by recognized bishops) had to be reintroduced from Antioch.

Real change came only in 1878, when the British leased the island from Turkey and subsequently annexed it (1914). The British granted independence to Cyprus in 1960. Archbishop Makarios III (1913–1977) became the first president of the new country, a move that continued the traditional political role played by Orthodox bishops but was nonetheless extremely controversial.

In 1973 the three other bishops of the Church of Cyprus created a national crisis by declaring that Makarios was no longer archbishop. The patriarchs of the other Orthodox churches in the region (Antioch, Jerusalem, Alexandria, and the Church of Greece) assumed authority to act and deposed the rebellious bishops. They also assisted in the appointment of three new bishops. However, this crisis was no sooner resolved than the continuing tension between the Greek and Turkish communities on the island became the excuse for Turkey to invade Cyprus and carve out a (still disputed) Turkish nation in the northern third of the island. The Orthodox Church lost many churches that were looted and/or destroyed in the takeover. For the next two decades no Orthodox priests were allowed into the area, though in 1994 two priests were allowed in to lead worship at St. Andrew Monastery, on the Karpas Peninsula.

The church is led by His Beatitude Chrysostomos, Archbishop of Nea Justiniana and All Cyprus (b. 1927). Besides the Archdiocese of Nicosia, there are five additional dioceses on Cyprus. As the new century begins, the church has approximately 475,000 members.

Address:

Orthodox Church of Cyprus, Office of the Archbishop
P.O. Box 1130
Nicosia
Cyprus
<http://www.church.cy.net>

Sources:

Hackett, J. A History of the Orthodox Church of Cyprus. New York: Burt Franklin, 1972.
Ioannou, M. Studies in the History of the Church of Cyprus, 4th–20th Centuries. Aldershot, England: Variorum, 1995.

Orthodox Church of Greece

The entrance of Christianity to Greece is recorded in the Bible (Acts 16:9 ff), which tells us that the apostle Paul responded to a dream calling him to Macedonia. The developing church eventually fell under the direct supervision of the Patriarchate at Constantinople, under whose authority it remained until the nineteenth century. In the meantime, Greece was conquered (1460) and incorporated into the Turkish Ottoman Empire.

The 1821 Greek revolution against Turkish rule culminated in the sultan's acceptance of Greek independence in the Treaty of Adrianople in 1829. The Orthodox Church had played a prominent role in the revolution and paid a heavy price for it: when the uprising began in 1821, the Ottoman government hanged Ecumenical Patriarch Gregorios V and a number of metropolitans at the gate of the patriarchal compound in Constantinople.

In 1833 the fledgling government of the new Greek kingdom declared the country's Orthodox Church autocephalous and established at its head a five-member permanent synod of bishops presided over by the king. This unilateral break with Constantinople and the establishment of a state-controlled church disrupted relations with the other Orthodox churches. After lengthy negotiations, the situation was regularized on June 29, 1850, when Constantinople granted a Tomos, or official declaration, of autocephaly to the Orthodox Church of Greece. This declaration specified that the archbishop of Athens would preside over the Holy Synod and restored relations with the other Orthodox churches.

As Greece annexed more territory at the expense of the Ottomans, more Orthodox dioceses were received into the Orthodox Church of Greece. The large area of northern Greece acquired in 1912 remained under the Ecumenical Patriarchate until 1928, when those dioceses were provisionally placed under the administration of the Greek church. The dioceses in Crete and the Dodecanese Islands, as well as the monastic republic of Mount Athos, have remained under the ECUMENICAL PATRIARCHATE to this day. Official statistics indicate that 96 percent of the Greek population today self-identifies as Orthodox, 2 percent as Muslim, and 1 percent as Catholic.

Over time, secular influence in church affairs has gradually decreased. However, the present Greek constitution (1975) continues to recognize Orthodoxy as the "prevailing" religion in Greece and forbids proselytism. It also specifies that the Orthodox Church of Greece is "governed by the Holy Synod of all functioning bishops, and by the permanent Holy Synod made up of members of the first," a structure that respects the provisions of the 1850 Tomos. The Greek Parliament enacted the current Charter of the Church of Greece in 1977. The Holy Synod is currently made up of twelve bishops and the archbishop of Athens, who presides over it.

The once-flourishing monastic tradition in Greece suffered greatly at the time of independence, when the new government closed most of the monasteries and convents. Subsequent wars and the Communist insurgency in the 1940s weakened it still further, and by the 1960s its future appeared bleak. But a modest revival has taken place since that time, with a significant influx of young men and women into the monasteries, especially on Mount Athos, where the number of monks has doubled since 1980.

A holy icon in the Kalopetras Greek Orthodox Church in Rhodes, Greece (Helene Rogers/TRIP)

There are theology faculties at the universities of Athens and Thessalonika, along with several seminaries for the training of parish priests. Most of the distinguished theologians of the Greek church are laymen. The church has been heavily involved in philanthropic activity, maintaining many orphanages, homes for the aged, and similar institutions. Total church membership is estimated at about 9 million. The Orthodox Church of Greece is a member of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES.

Address:

Orthodox Church of Greece
14 Ioannou Glennadiou St.
115 21 Athens
Greece
<http://www.ecclesia.gr/> (Greek and English versions)

Ronald Roberson

Sources:

- Frazer, C. The Orthodox Church and Independent Greece, 1821–1852. London: Cambridge University Press, 1969.
- Hammond, P. The Waters of Marah: The Present State of the Greek Church. London: Rockliff, 1956.
- Stavrou, T. "The Orthodox Church of Greece." In Eastern Christianity and Politics in the Twentieth Century, edited by Pedro Ramet, 183–207. Durham, NC: Duke University Press, 1988.

Orthodox Church of Poland [Polski Autokefaliczny Kosciol Prawoslawnny]

The Orthodox Church in Poland started with the conquests in the East by King Kazimierz the Great (1310–1370) in the fourteenth century. His efforts for an independent Orthodox church in Poland resulted in the appointment of a separate Polish metropolitan soon after his death. Some tension arose between the Orthodox and the ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH with the introduction of the Gregorian calendar by royal decree in 1582, though the major conflict emerged following the Union of Brzesc in 1596. A newly formed Uniate Church, combining its relationship with the pope with the Orthodox liturgy, started to attract Orthodox bishops. However, an independent Orthodox hierarchy was restored in 1620. In 1667 the metropolitan of Kiev accepted the authority of the patriarch of Moscow, which would later undergird interventions into Polish internal affairs by the Russian czar. The Orthodox Church was strongly supported by the czarist authorities during the partition of Poland. The Union of Brzesc was formally dissolved in the nineteenth century. Autocephalic status was given to the Polish Orthodox Church by the ecumenical patriarch in 1924, though the Synod of the Russian Church, the mother church for Poland, accepted the fact only in 1948.

The head of the Polish Orthodox Church, for almost a quarter of a century, was His Eminence, Highly Blessed Bazyli (Włodzimierz Dorosz Kiewicz, 1914–1998), the late metropolitan of Warsaw and the Whole of Poland. He was succeeded by the present metropolitan Sawa (Michał Hrycuniak, b. 1938). There are dioceses at Białystok, Gdansk, Lodz, Poznan, Wrocław, Szczecin, Przemyśl, and Nowy Sącz, as well as at Lublin and Chelm. The church's main administrative organization, the General Synod, consists of bishops and representatives of both clergy and laity. The Council of Bishops deals with matters exceeding the competence of particular bishops. The council is the executive body of the Synod of Bishops chaired by the metropolitan of Warsaw.

The Orthodox Church of Poland took under its jurisdiction the Diocese of Aquilei (Italy) in 1988, the Metropolia of Lisbon along with four Portuguese dioceses in 1991, and a missionary diocese in Brazil. The church counts around 555,000 members residing in 250 parishes. They use 325 churches and chapels supervised by 273 priests (1997). The main press organ is the monthly Przegląd Prawoslawny/Orthodoxia (5,000 copies). Additional periodicals include Biuletyn Informacyjny Kola Teologów Prawoslawnych (1,000 copies) and Wiadomosci Bractwa (1,500 copies).

In 1957, the Section of Orthodox Theology was formed in the Christian Academy of Theology (ChAT) in Warsaw, and there is also an Orthodox seminary in Warsaw. The biggest Polish Orthodox sanctuary and the best known pilgrimage center is the Holy Mountain Grabarka (south of Białystok), with its monastery of Saints Martha and Mary. Up to sixty thousand pilgrims gather here annually on August 19, the Day of the Lord's Transfiguration. Additional important pilgrimage centers include the Monastery of Saint Onufry in Jableczna, and Zabludow, the birthplace of the martyr Gabriel Zabludowski, the only Orthodox saint born within the boundaries of contemporary Poland. Other Orthodox sanctuaries are found at Rogacze, Suprasl, Odrynki, Krynoczka, Puchly, Nowa Wola, Stary, Kornin, Piatienska, Swieta Woda, Saki, and Tokary. The biggest center of Orthodox Christians in Poland is the Cathedral of Saint Nicolas at Białystok (c. 100,000 people).

Address:

Polski Autokefaliczny Kosciol Prawoslawnny (Orthodox Church of Poland)
al. Solidarnosci 52
03-402 Warszawa
Poland

Leslaw Borowski

Sources:

- Adamczuk, L., and A. Mirowicz. Kosciol Prawoslawnny w Polsce: Dawniej i dzis. Warsaw: GUS and Warszawska Metropolia Prawoslawnna, 1993.
- The Orthodox Eastern Church in Poland. Past and Present*. London: Polish Research Centre, n.d.

Orthodox Judaism

Through the nineteenth century, the European and American Jewish community experienced the challenges of post-Enlightenment modern life and an emerging, majority, secular culture that persistently sought to integrate and absorb the Jewish communities into itself. In partial response to this new situation, a new form of Judaism that consciously tried to adapt to modern culture developed. REFORM JUDAISM made a number of changes to traditional Jewish life, replacing traditional practices that were deemed nonessential to Jewish identity and inappropriate for the contemporary context. Included in the reforms were the cessation of kosher food standards, the introduction of the vernacular to worship services, and the ending of segregation between men and women at synagogue services.

Traditional Jewish leaders had been used to dealing with nonpracticing Jews, members of the Jewish community who for various reasons did not observe traditional religious rules, but they were taken aback when Jewish rabbis advocated the elimination of what they saw as major elements of Judaism's identity. As Reform Judaism spread, especially in Germany and among German-speaking Jews in North America, traditional rabbis emerged to start a counter-reform and reinvigorate commitment to traditional standards. Orthodox Judaism is the name now given to those elements of the religious Jewish community that emerged in opposition to modernist forms of the faith, especially Reform, RECONSTRUCTIONIST, and CONSERVATIVE JUDAISM.

Orthodox Judaism is distinguished by its attachment to the written Torah (the Jewish Bible or Tanakh) and the oral Torah, a tradition explaining what the written Scriptures mean. Orthodox Jews believe that God gave the Scriptures to Moses and then taught him the oral tradition, which has been passed down from generation to generation. Around the second century C.E., the oral tradition was committed to writing in what is today known as the Mishnah. Orthodox Jews also accept the Mishnah as the Word of God. In the centuries after the Mishnah was produced, additional commentaries elaborating on it, called the Gemara, were written down. The Mishnah and the Gemara together constitute the Talmud. Through succeeding centuries, Orthodox rabbis would apply what is termed the Halakic process (a system of legal reasoning and interpretation) to the Torah to determine how best to answer new questions as they arose. The Halakic process has given to the Orthodox community the means of dealing with changing situations.

Among the earliest champions of Orthodoxy in the face of reform were Rabbis Samson Raphael Hirsch (1808–1888) in Germany and Isaac Leeser (1806–1868) in the United States. For a quarter of a century, Leeser published The Occident and American Jewish Advocate. In the pages of this periodical, he opposed reform leader Isaac Wise (1819–1900) and the spread of Reform Judaism and advocated the unity of the American Jewish community around traditional Jewish practice. Hirsch is known for championing a fully Orthodox belief and practice while living in the modern world.

The Orthodox in German-speaking communities were the first to feel the full impact of modernity, and they developed an approach that has allowed Orthodox Jewry not only to survive but, apart from the devastation of the Holocaust, to thrive. Through the twentieth century, many flocked to an engaged Orthodoxy as they began to encounter the modern West. As modern Orthodoxy developed, it was distinguished on the one hand from the Reform and Conservative movements, and on the other hand from ultra-Orthodox organizations such as NETUREI KARTA and the GUSH EMUNIM.

Jewish Orthodoxy is split into a number of distinguishable communities, the major divisions being ethnic. The Jews of central Europe, eastern Europe, and the Iberian Peninsula (Sephardic Judaism) form the major divisions, all of which now appear in strength in North America. Over the centuries, these and other Jewish communities developed a variety of differences that do not affect their status as Orthodox but nevertheless are perpetuated.

Approximately half of the world's 2 million Jews reside in the United States. In the United States the majority of Orthodox Jews are represented by a congregational association and two rabbinical associations. The Union of Orthodox Jewish Congregations of the United States and Canada emerged in the 1880s, soon after the Reform congregations had organized. Rabbis are served by the Union of Orthodox Rabbis, primarily of eastern European origin, and the Rabbinical Council of America, primarily of German heritage. Other Orthodox congregations are associated with the YOUNG ISRAEL movement. Jews of Iberian heritage are associated with the American Sephardi Federation (15 W. 16th St., New York, NY 10010, <http://www.amsephfed.org>). HASIDISM represents a mystical form of Orthodox Jewry.

In most countries of the world, the Orthodox community is organized nationally. The Conference of European Rabbis represents Orthodox Jews in Europe. Some Jewish communities, though by no means all, have selected a chief rabbi. Such an organization is reflected in modern Israel, where Orthodox Jews are represented by the Israel Chief Rabbinate. Agudath Israel is an Orthodox Jewish organization that operates a variety of social service programs in the Jewish community worldwide and represents the interests of Orthodox Jewry to local, regional, and federal governments. Founded in 1912, it seeks to place the Torah in a lead position in the Jewish community as it faces the modern world. The organization has spread globally through the Agudath Israel World Organization.

One issue that has divided Orthodoxy internationally is Zionism, the movement for the return of the Jewish people to Palestine and for Jewish sovereignty over the territory of ancient Israel. Some believe Zionism is evil, while others argue that, though largely a secular movement, it is doing God's work. These latter believe that God's plan for history includes the rebirth of Israel as a prelude to the return of the Messiah. Others have assumed a more pragmatic stance, neither opposing nor supporting Zionism.

Addresses:

Union of Orthodox Jewish Congregations of the United States and Canada
333 7th Ave.
New York, NY 10001

Union of Orthodox Rabbis
235 E. Broadway

New York, NY 10002
<http://www.ou.org/>

Rabbinical Council of America
305 7th Ave.
New York, NY 10001
<http://www.rabbis.org/>

Conference of European Rabbis
Adler House
Tavistock Square
London WC1H 9HN
England
Israel Chief Rabbinate
Heikhal Shelomo
58 King George St.
Jerusalem
Israel

Agudath Israel World Organization
84 William St.
New York, NY 10038

Sources:

- Davidman, Lynn. Tradition in a Rootless World: Women Turn to Orthodox Judaism. Berkeley and Los Angeles: University of California Press, 1991.
- Donin, Hayim Halevy. To Be a Jew. New York: Basic Books, 1972, 2001.
- Katz, Jacob. A House Divided: Orthodoxy and Schism in Nineteenth-Century Central European Jewry. Hanover, NH: Brandeis University Press, University Press of New England, 1998.
- Sclossberg, Eli W. The World of Orthodox Judaism. Northvale, NJ: Jason Aronson, 1997.

Orthodox Presbyterian Church

The Orthodox Presbyterian Church is the major organizational product of the fundamentalist-modernist controversy in the Presbyterian Church in the United States of America (now a constituent part of the PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH [U.S.A.]) and currently a leading American representative of the Evangelical movement. As the fundamentalist controversy continued in the Presbyterian Church into the 1930s, it became evident that the modernists, who had aligned themselves with the contemporary trends in science, theology, and the critical study of the Bible, had largely taken control of the church.

In 1932 a new phase in the battle focused on the 1932 book Re-thinking Missions by William E. Hocking (1873–1966). Drawing on his experience of the changing needs of the world missionary enterprise, Hocking suggested that Protestant missionaries should not just work for the conversion of non-Christians but should develop Christian social services, especially medical missions. Challenging Hocking's conclusions was J. Gresham Machen (1881–1937), an eminent conservative professor at Princeton Theological Seminary. Machen had inherited the tradition of conservative theology that had been identified with the school, though more liberal theological spokespersons now dominated its faculty.

Machen charged that the church was sending missionaries to foreign fields who did not believe that Jesus Christ was the only way of salvation. He also began to support the Independent Board of Foreign Missions, an agency that attempted to garner support for the sending of conservative fundamentalist missionaries apart from the official missionary board of the Presbyterian Church. Machen also expanded his critique to the other agencies of the church. As his criticisms grew, church officials charged him with disturbing the peace of the church. He resigned from Princeton in 1929, and from the Presbyterian Church in 1936, and with his supporters he left to found the Orthodox Presbyterian Church. The new church adopted the Westminster Confession of Faith and the two Westminster catechisms (the Longer and Shorter) as its standards of faith.

Shortly after organizing the church, Machen entered into a second controversy with one of his prominent colleagues, Carl McIntire (b. 1906), pastor of a large congregation in Collinwood, New Jersey. Like many of his fundamentalist colleagues, McIntire had accepted the method of biblical interpretation that had been developed among the PLYMOUTH BRETHERN (EXCLUSIVE), called dispensationalism. He also had become a premillennialist. Machen rejected both views. McIntire also wanted to continue the work of the Independent Board of Foreign Missions. Machen felt that the work of the board had been superseded by the new Missionary Board of the Orthodox Presbyterian Church.

In 1937, before their differences were resolved, Machen died. The following year, McIntire left the Orthodox Presbyterian Church and with his followers founded the Bible Presbyterian Church. McIntire would be the leading spokesperson of the continuing fundamentalist wing of American Presbyterianism through the next generation. In the 1940s, he would lead the relatively small community of fundamentalists in the formation of two interdenominational organizations, the American Council of Christian Churches and the INTERNATIONAL COUNCIL OF CHRISTIAN CHURCHES. The Orthodox Presbyterians would, in the meantime, participate in the development of a new neo-Evangelical perspective that would retain its emphasis upon biblical authority and traditional Christian affirmation while attempting to engage in dialogue with contemporary intellectual currents and modern culture. That perspective became embedded in the National Association of Evangelicals.

A relatively small body, the Orthodox Presbyterian Church reported only around twenty-two thousand members in the 1990s; however, it supports missions in Korea, Japan, China, Eritrea, Ethiopia, Kenya, and Suriname. It is a member of the INTERNATIONAL CONFERENCE OF REFORMED CHURCHES.

Address:

Orthodox Presbyterian Church
AT 607 N. Eastern Rd.
Bldg. E, Box P
Willow Grove, PA 19090-0920
<http://www.opc.org/>

Sources:

Galbraith, John. Why the Orthodox Presbyterian Church?
Philadelphia: Committee on Christian Education, Orthodox Presbyterian Church, 1965.
The Standards of Government, Discipline, and Worship of the Orthodox Presbyterian Church. Philadelphia: Committee on Christian Education, Orthodox Presbyterian Church, 1965.

Osho Commune International

Osho, formerly known as Bhagwan Shree Rajneesh (1931–1990), was a controversial spiritual teacher from India whose disciples, called sannyasins, include thousands of Americans, Europeans, and Asians. The Osho spiritual movement is centered at the Osho Commune International located in Pune, Maharashtra, India. There are Osho centers in fifty-four nations. Though the centers are independent, they share common bonds through their common use of Osho's meditations and teachings.

Osho Commune International has a multiversity that offers a myriad of courses on personal and spiritual growth and on healing and creative arts. There are also meditation workshops and programs emphasizing meditative aspects of sport. An Inner Circle of 21 sannyasins, who pledged to carry on Osho's work, oversees the movement's practical organization. From 1958 to 1966, Osho, then known as Rajneesh, taught philosophy, primarily at the University of Jabalpur. He resigned his post in 1966 to travel throughout India as an independent religious teacher. In the early 1970s, he shifted headquarters from his Bombay apartment to the Shree Rajneesh Ashram in Pune.

His synthesis of spirituality with personal growth psychology attracted significant numbers of westerners, many in midlife transitions. Sannyasins often received new names signifying their spiritual rebirth. Rajneesh developed unique meditations, a number involving intense, emotionally cleansing activity preceding stillness. Before his death, Osho shifted his emphasis to meditative therapies encouraging individuals' responsibility for their own personal and spiritual growth. Meditation remains central to the movement, and Osho meditations have been taught in schools, corporations, and other venues. Osho's philosophical approach blends western and eastern traditions, with special emphasis on ZEN BUDDHISM. Important themes include dropping the ego and its conditioned beliefs and integrating the material and the spiritual. The ideal human is "Zorba the Buddha," a consummate being, combining Buddha's spiritual focus with the life-embracing traits of the Nikos Kazantzakis character Zorba.

At the height of his popularity, Osho was controversial throughout India because of his views on sexual freedom, which he published in books such as From Sex to Superconsciousness, and for the encounter groups that attracted so many foreigners to the country. However, the greatest international controversy developed in the United States when he settled at the Big Muddy Ranch in central Oregon. From the summer of 1981 until the fall of 1985, several thousand sannyasins labored to create the communal city of Rajneeshpuram and a model agricultural collective. Their dream disintegrated because of financial, legal, and political conflicts, and Rajneesh embarked on a world tour before returning to Pune in 1987. Two years later he took the name Osho, which means "dissolving into the totality of existence," that is, merging with all life. Osho died on January 19, 1990.

In the wake of the abandonment of Rajneeshpuram, a number of people left the movement. Several leaders were eventually convicted of crimes related to their response to some of the opposition to the community's existence. Several wrote books about their lives with Rajneesh. A few, such as Margo Anand and Swami Virato, have become popular independent teachers, though they draw heavily upon what they learned while associated with the movement.

Osho Commune International in Pune is an international meditation center where a core staff hosts thousands of visitors annually. Both sannyasins and seekers visit the international center to read some of the more than five hundred books that have been transcribed from Osho's lectures or written about him. Others communicate on the Internet or gather at Osho Meditation Centers throughout the world. In the United States, the largest centers are Osho Academy in Sedona, Arizona; Viha Meditation Center in Mill Valley, California; and Osho Padma Meditation Center in New York City.

Address:

Osho Commune International
17 Koregaon Park
Pune
India
<http://www.osho.org>

Marion S. Goldman

Sources:

Carter, Lewis. Charisma and Control in Rajneeshpuram. New York: Cambridge University Press, 1990.
Franklin, Satya Bahrti. The Promise of Paradise: A Woman's Intimate Story of the Perils of Life with Rajneesh. Barrytown, NY: Station Hill Press, 1992.

Goldman, Marion. Passionate Journeys: Why Successful Women Joined a Cult. Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press, 1999.
 Osho. Osho: Autobiography of a Spiritually Incorrect Mystic. New York: St. Martin's Press, 2000.

O.T.O. (Ordo Templi Orientis)

During his long occult career, British magus Aleister Crowley (1875–1947) ultimately took control of the Ordo Templi Orientis (O.T.O.). The organization had been established in Germany by Theodor Reuss (1855–1923), based on certain ideas developed by Austrian businessman Carl Kellner (1850–1905). Not all members of the O.T.O. accepted Crowley's flamboyant authority, however, and several "pre-Crowleyan" O.T.O.s are still in existence to this day. Crowley's death in 1947 was followed by a complicated struggle for succession. At present, there are more than one hundred rival "Crowleyan" O.T.O.s (in addition to several "pre-Crowleyan") throughout the world. The largest organization is known as the "Caliphate" O.T.O., based both on the title of "Caliph" granted to its leaders, and on a joke by Crowley himself on the phonetic similarity between "Caliph" and "California." The Caliphate has successfully claimed rights to the trademark O.T.O., at least in the United States, and to copyright on Crowley's writings in certain countries.

Forerunners of the Caliphate O.T.O. include the organization created in the US by Charles Stansfeld Jones (1886–1950), Crowley's one-time "magickal son," and the Agapé Lodge, founded in Pasadena by Wilfred Talbot Smith (1885–1957), and which claimed rocket scientist Jack Parsons (1914–1952) as its most famous (or notorious) member. The present-day Caliphate O.T.O. traces its direct origins back to German-born Karl Germer (1885–1962), a prominent disciple of Crowley who moved to California and claimed to be his successor (although he was not particularly active in running the O.T.O. as an organization). Germer's own succession is also a somewhat disputed matter. Both in American courts of justice and among a significant section of Crowley's followers in the U.S. (and several other countries), Grady Louis McMurtry (1918–1985) gained official recognition as Germer's legitimate successor, taking the name Hymenaeus Alpha. In 1982, the Caliphate O.T.O. (with McMurtry as its leader) was legally incorporated in the United States. McMurtry died in 1985, and French-born William Breeze, a member of its New York chapter, became his successor under the name of Hymenaeus Beta.

What is Crowleyan "orthodoxy" and who is, or is not, loyal to Crowley's teaching is a matter of endless debate among the many contentious O.T.O. branches throughout the world. But, be that as it may be, the Caliphate O.T.O. is certainly one of the organizations most loyal to Crowley, whose main writings, published in The Holy Book of Thelema, are regarded by the membership as holy scripture, with particular emphasis on the Book of the Law, received by Crowley through magical revelation in Cairo in 1904. The Caliphate's initiatory system, in thirteen degrees, is also quite similar to Crowley's, and includes the various teachings on sexual magic for which Crowley is both famous and infamous. At present (2001), the Caliphate O.T.O. counts 3,125 members throughout the world, of whom 2,678 are regarded as fully "initiated," in 149 official groups in 42 different countries.

Address

O.T.O. (Ordo Templi Orientis)
 Postfach 33 20 12
 14180 Berlin
 Germany
<http://www.otohq.org/oto/>

Massimo Introvigne and PierLuigi Zoccatelli

Sources:

Crowley, Aleister. Magick. York Beach, ME: Samuel Weiser, 1973.
 Heidrick, Bill. Magick and Qabalah. Berkeley, CA: Ordo Templi Orientis, 1980.
The Holy Book of Thelema. York Beach, ME: Samuel Weiser, 1988.
 Hymenaeus, Beta, ed. The Equinox 3, 10. New York: Thelema Publications, 1986.
 Reuss, Theodor and Aleister Crowley. O.T.O. Rituals and Sex Magick. Ed. by A. R. Naylor. Thame: I-H-O Books, 1999.
 Symonds, John. The Beast 666. The Life of Aleister Crowley. London: The Pindar Press, 1997.

Our Lady of All Nations (Netherlands)

The devotional life that surrounds Our Lady of All Nations arose from the apparitions and messages that a Dutch woman, Ida Peerdeman (1905–1996), received between 1945 and 1984. In these visions, Mary revealed herself as The Lady of All Nations and introduced a peculiar prayer that, coupled with the expected spread of the rosary, was intended to realize the swift promulgation of a new, fifth dogma of Mary as "Coredemptrix, Mediatrix, and Advocate." With this dogma, Mary would achieve a place of her own in God's acts of salvation, an accomplishment that many felt the apparitions at FATIMA, Portugal, had pointed toward in 1917. A painting of the apparition, showing The Lady standing on a globe, with her back against the Cross of Christ, functions as an icon for the devotions, and her feast days are celebrated on March 25 and May 31.

In view of the parallel themes between Our Lady of All Nations and Our Lady of Fatima, devotees consider the Amsterdam apparitions to be a continuation of Fatima, for the messages of both are concerned with a spectrum of evils in the world: natural disasters, wars, hunger, chaos, apostasy, communism and, above all, Satan, endanger the church and the world. However, after investigations in 1955 and 1973, the Diocese of Haarlem concluded that there was no ground for accepting a divine origin for the apparitions. Because of active support and promotion in several dioceses and noticeable activity in Third World mission fields, the veneration directed to Our Lady of All Nations became a concern for the Vatican as well, and in 1974 and 1987 it reiterated the conclusions of the Diocese of Haarlem. Nevertheless, The Lady continued to enjoy the support and devotion of tens of thousands of Catholics, primarily conservatives. Millions of copies of the prayer card in dozens of languages have been distributed around the world, mostly in Western Europe.

A turning point for the organization promoting Our Lady of All Nations came in 1996, with the death of the visionary, the arrival on the scene of a new administration for the group, and the development of a missionary order of nuns who manage its daily activities. However, of even more importance was the announcement by the bishop of Haarlem, with the assent of Rome, that there was no longer any objection against the public adoration of Mary under the title of "The Lady of All Nations." Although this was not intended as an acknowledgment of the apparitions and messages that allegedly came to Peerdeman, it was certainly interpreted in that way by the devotees.

The center of worship for Our Lady of all Nations, located in a mansion in Amsterdam, receives about nine thousand Dutch and foreign visitors each year. Beginning in 1997, international prayer days were organized in Amsterdam, with up to ten thousand visitors. In 2001 these days were split into national prayer days for the Netherlands, Germany, England, Austria, Ireland, the Ivory Coast, Japan, the Philippines, Slovakia, and Switzerland, with about twenty thousand participants in total. The largest number of adherents are found in these countries, but there are increasing numbers in Africa, Asia, and the United States. Following the events of September 11, 2001, more than a half million prayer cards of The Lady of All Nations were distributed in the United States. A missionary "world action" has also been undertaken, in which dozens of copies of the painting of The Lady are traveling the world to expand the devotion.

Within the World Network of MARIAN DEVOTION, one encounters devotion to The Lady among a spectrum of movements, among them the MEDJUGORJE devotees. Devotees of Medjugorje visit the Amsterdam shrine regularly, as they see a link among the three "most important" apparitions of the new Marian era: from its beginning in Fatima (in revelatory messages), through Medjugorje (recruiting "work apostles"), to the consummation in Amsterdam (the realization of the fifth dogma).

Addresses:

Sanctuary of the Lady of All Nations

Diepenbrockstraat 3

1077 VX Amsterdam

The Netherlands

<http://www.laudate.org/en/home> or <http://www.de-vrouwe.nl>

<http://www.ladyofallnations.org>

Lady of All Nations Action Center

P.O. Box 31481

St. Louis, MO 63131

Peter Jan Margry

Sources:

Auclair, Raoul. The Lady of All Nations. Quebec, Canada: Ed. L'Armée de Marie, 1978.

Klos, Peter. Our Lady of All Nations, Who Once Was Mary. Santa Barbara, CA: Queenship Publishing Company, 1998.

Künzli, Josef, ed. The Messages of the Lady of All Nations. Santa Barbara, CA: Queenship Publishing Company, 1996.

Margry, Peter Jan, and Charles Caspers. Bedevaartplaatsen in Nederland. Vol. 1. 161–170. Amsterdam: Verloren, 1997.

Pagan Federation

The Pagan Federation was founded in 1971 as the Pagan Front by John and Jean Score, Doreen Valiente, and others to provide information and to counter misconceptions about the WICCAN RELIGION. In 1981 the name was changed to the Pagan Federation and the organization began to represent contemporary Paganism in general. The membership has broadened, and only a minority of members now practice initiatory Wicca. Around half practice some form of Wicca or pagan religious Witchcraft, while the remainder practice various contemporary pagan spiritualities including DRUIDISM, the Northern Tradition (Odinism, Asatru, Vanatru, and Heathenism), Shamanism, and GODDESS SPIRITUALITY.

The aims of the Pagan Federation are (1) to provide contact between pagan groups and genuine seekers of the Old Ways, (2) to promote contact and dialogue between the various branches of European Paganism and other pagan organizations worldwide, and (3) to provide practical and effective information on Paganism to members of the public, the media, public bodies, and the governmental administration. Membership is open to anyone over eighteen years of age who agrees with the following three principles: (1) love and kinship with Nature, (2) reverence for the life force and its ever-renewing cycles of life and death, and (3) the Pagan Ethic: "If it harm none, do what thou wilt." This is a positive morality, expressing the belief in individual responsibility for discovering one's own true nature and developing it fully, in harmony with the outer world and community, and honoring the totality of Divine Reality, which transcends gender, without suppressing either the female or male aspects of Deity.

The Pagan Federation publishes a quarterly journal, Pagan Dawn (formerly The Wiccan, founded in 1968), and other publications. Conferences and other events for members take place frequently throughout the year. In many areas, the Pagan Federation provides services to celebrate the eight major festivals of contemporary Paganism.

From the late 1980s, the activities of the Pagan Federation have been expanding. In 1989 the Pagan Federation took part in a major interfaith festival at Canterbury Cathedral and performed the first public pagan religious ritual in Canterbury for many centuries. Since then, the Pagan Federation has been active in interfaith dialogue and has members in many interfaith organizations in the United Kingdom. It provides prison ministry for the UK Prison Service.

The Pagan Federation is run by an elected committee that reports to a policy-making council comprised of regional coordinators and honorary members. In 2000, the Pagan Federation had around forty-five hundred members/magazine subscribers, of whom 63 percent are women. Over 90 percent are UK-based. Pagan Federation International has national coordinators in most western European countries and in the United States and Canada. As the new century begins, the Pagan Federation continues its efforts for recognition as a religious charity (not-for-profit organization) in the UK. The Charity Commission, a non-governmental body that regulates applications for charitable status in the UK, has fought an ongoing battle to deny recognition of Paganism as a religion.

Address:

Pagan Federation
B.M. Box 7097
London WC1N 3XX
United Kingdom
<http://www.paganfed.demon.co.uk/>

Vivienne Crowley

Sources:

- Hutton, Ronald B. The Triumph of the Moon. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1999.
- Pagan Federation. The Pagan Federation Information Pack. London: Pagan Federation, 1992.
- Weller, Paul, ed. Religions in the UK: A Multi-Faith Directory. Derby, UK: University of Derby, 2001.

Pakistan

The modern state of Pakistan emerged in the 1930s with the suggestion that a Muslim state be set apart from India, then a British colony. The Indus Valley had been inhabited as early as the third millennium B.C.E., but its modern history begins with the conquest of the area by Alexander the Great (356–323 B.C.E.). In the middle of the next century, it would be incorporated into the empire of Indian Buddhist ruler Aśoka (d. 238 or 232 B.C.E.). The history of the rise and fall of the Indian kingdoms was somewhat interrupted at the beginning of the eighth century with the entrance of the Arab Muslims under al-Hajjaj (661–714), whose successors in the next generation came to dominate the whole of the Indus River Valley. From their foothold in Pakistan, Muslim rulers conquered most of India, residents of which were predominantly Hindu.

From the eighth century to the present, the struggle between Hindus and Muslims would be a major theme in the history of the Indian subcontinent. Through most of that history, the Muslim minority would form the ruling elite. Islam did not merge into Hinduism, as the religions of many earlier groups had, although it would give rise to SIKHISM AND THE SANT MAT TRADITION out of the effort of guru Nanak (1469–c. 1539) to find a synthesis between the two faiths. The decline of Muslim hegemony in India was evident in the eighteenth century, but its fate was sealed by the advent of the British and the conquest of India in the nineteenth century. Hindus were much quicker to identify with the British and to accept positions in the colonial administration.

In 1949 the modern state of Pakistan came into existence as an autonomous dominion within the British Commonwealth. The setting apart of Pakistan led to the deaths of hundreds of thousands in riots and the migrations of millions, as Hindus left the region and Muslims moved in. The future of the country was further hindered by the death in 1948 of Muhammad Ali Jinnah (1876–1948), who had led the fight for an independent Muslim nation. The new country was afflicted with internal disagreement, leading to the October 1958 assumption of power by General Muhammad Ayub Khan (1907–1974) and the imposition of martial law. Ayub Khan ruled the country for a decade but was pushed out of office in 1969. The new government was immediately faced with grievances in eastern Pakistan that would lead in 1971 to its separation and the formation of independent Bangladesh.

The separation of Bangladesh set the stage for the rise of Zulfikar Ali Bhutto (1928–1979), head of the Pakistan People's Party. His rule was interrupted by a 1977 coup led by General Zia-ul Haq (1924–1988). When the general was killed in an airplane accident in 1988, former president Bhutto's daughter, Benazir Bhutto (b. 1953), became the first female head of state in a predominantly Muslim country. Though her rule lasted only two years, she reestablished constitutional order in the country. Her successors in office attempted to try her for political corruption, but she survived and would briefly return to power in the mid-1990s. In 1999, after a decade of failure by the democratically elected government to deal with the country's economic problems, there was another military coup.

Status of religions in Pakistan, 2000–2050

Followers	2000			2025	2050
	total	%	rate
Muslims	150,365,000	96.1	2.75	251,594,000	328,631,000
Christians	3,851,000	2.5	3.11	7,450,000	11,410,000
Protestants	1,796,000	1.2	3.20	3,700,000	6,000,000
Roman Catholics	1,165,000	0.7	3.08	2,100,000	3,000,000
Independents	850,000	0.5	3.02	1,600,000	2,350,000
Hindus	1,868,000	1.2	2.78	3,130,000	4,100,000
Ethnoreligionists	170,000	0.1	2.34	280,000	320,000
Nonreligious	120,000	0.1	2.96	360,000	650,000
Buddhists	96,400	0.1	2.55	160,000	220,000
Baha'is	78,700	0.1	3.64	140,000	300,000
Zoroastrians	25,000	0.0	2.80	47,000	72,000
Atheists	6,300	0.0	2.27	10,000	14,000
Chinese folk-religionists	2,200	0.0	2.49	4,000	10,000
Sikhs	1,900	0.0	2.27	4,000	6,000
Jews	860	0.0	2.10	1,000	1,200
Total population	156,483,000	100.0	2.76	263,000,000	345,484,000

For more than one thousand years, the Indus River Valley has been dominated by Islam. With the immigration of most of its Hindu residents to India after partition in 1947 and the settlement of Indian Muslims in Pakistan at the same time, the country became overwhelmingly Muslim. In 1956 the country declared itself an “Islamic republic,” a unique designation in the Muslim world. The 1973 constitution emphasized Islam as the state religion, and periodically an emphasis on Islamization has been proclaimed by government leaders (and seen by many Shi'a Muslims as a move to impose Sunni values on the country). Only a Muslim can be president, and the state is mandated to provide Islamic education for all citizens. The government supports the Muslim establishment, oversees mosques and funds collected for charitable purposes, and takes responsibility for the schools at which clergy (imams) are trained. At the same time, the constitution guarantees the rights of religious minorities and of all citizens to profess, practice, and propagate their religions.

Studying the Qur'an at the tomb of Datta Gunj Buksh in Lahore, Pakistan (TRIP)

The Pakistani Muslim community is predominantly of the Sunni HANAFITE SCHOOL OF ISLAM, though it has manifested an extremely diverse nature. Some 18 percent of Pakistani Muslims are Shi'as and 6 percent are Sufis, with the NAQSHABANDIYYA SUFI ORDER and QADIRIYYA SUFI ORDER being the largest brotherhoods. The primary struggle in Pakistan has been between traditionalists and modernists, the traditional religious authorities being concerned that movement into the modern world will challenge allegiance to the Qur'an, the Islamic holy book and authority.

Pakistan is well known as the place of origin of the AHMADIYYA MOVEMENT IN ISLAM, founded in 1889 by Hazrat Mirza Ghulam Ahmad (1835–1908). In his early years, Ahmad had concluded that Islam was in a state of decline, and it certainly had been pushed aside in British India. He took upon himself a mission to demonstrate the truth of Islam and was termed mujaddid, the renewer of the faith in the present age. He launched a proselytization movement to bring his fellow citizens back into the Muslim fold and took his crusade to the West.

Ahmad attempted to challenge Christianity directly. He developed a number of arguments for the superiority of Islam and called a variety of Christian beliefs into question. He asserted, among other things, that Jesus had not died on the cross but had merely swooned and recovered after being placed in the tomb. Eventually, he traveled to Kashmir and died a natural death there.

The Ahmadiyyas existed for many years as an organization within the larger Pakistani Muslim community, but following the death of Ahmad in 1908, the group split into two factions over the status of Ahmad. One group, the Ahmadiyya Movement in Islam, wished to consider Ahmad as a prophet, a status equal to that of Muhammad. The other smaller group, while holding Ahmad in esteem, refused to consider him of such a lofty estate. The attempt to proclaim Ahmad a prophet met with considerable criticism from the larger Muslim community, and in 1974 the Pakistani government formally declared the idea to be heretical and declared those who believed it as existing outside of the Muslim community. In the wake of that declaration, the small group, the AHMADIYYA ANJUMAN ISHAAT ISLAM, LAHORE (headquartered in Lahore, Pakistan), has had to fight to avoid being included in the general condemnation heaped on the larger faction.

Pakistan is home to several important international Islamic organizations, including the WORLD MUSLIM CONGRESS, Tanzeem-e-Islami, the World Federation of Islamic Organizations, and the United Islamic Organization. Nationally, a variety of organizations represent the spectrum of Muslim opinion on political and economic issues, a number of which are dedicated to establishing Muslim law as the law of the land.

Christianity was introduced into the area now constituting Pakistan at several points, beginning in the eighth century, but no permanent work was begun until the conquest of India by the British in the nineteenth century was well under way. In 1834 the first permanent work was launched by Presbyterian John C. Lowrie (1808–1900). Over the next few years he was joined by John Newton (1810–1891), Charles Forman (1821–1894), and Andrew Gordon (1828–1887). Their efforts would eventually lead to the formation of the PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH OF PAKISTAN (formally established by a merger of two older Presbyterian bodies in 1993). It is now the second largest Protestant church in the country.

The CHURCH MISSIONARY SOCIETY brought Anglicanism into Karachi in 1850, and the missionaries, as representatives of the CHURCH OF ENGLAND, enjoyed the approbation of the British colonial authorities. The work spread through the region, and the Diocese of Lahore was formed in 1877. Representatives of the American-based Methodist Episcopal Church (now an integral part of the UNITED METHODIST CHURCH) arrived in 1873. They were particularly blessed by rapid growth early in the twentieth century. Lutheranism was introduced to Pakistan in 1903 by the Danish Pathan Mission (associated with the Church of Denmark). The work grew slowly but was supplemented by Norwegian and American Lutheran missions, and in 1955 the Pakistani Lutheran Church came into being by a merger of their work. In 1970 the Anglicans, Methodists, Lutherans, and Presbyterians whose work was initiated in 1856 by the Church of Scotland merged to form the CHURCH OF PAKISTAN, currently the largest Christian body in the country.

The larger Presbyterian body (then the United Presbyterian Church) was heading toward participation in the merger that produced the Church of Pakistan, when in 1968 it was hit with a major controversy over its participation in the ecumenical movement. A group headed by the church's moderator, Kundan Lall Nasir, attacked the liberal views present in the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES (WCC), and as a result of the disagreements, almost a third of the church members withdrew and established the United Presbyterian Church of Pakistan. The new church then aligned itself with the INTERNATIONAL COUNCIL OF CHRISTIAN CHURCHES, a fundamentalist rival of the WCC.

A variety of different churches began work in Pakistan throughout the twentieth century, many before the partition of 1947. Among those receiving the most response were the NEW APOSTOLIC CHURCH and the Associate Reformed Presbyterian Church. Pentecostalism has had less success in Pakistan in recent decades compared to other countries, and there are relatively few new indigenous churches. Among the several uniquely Pakistani churches is the National Virgin Church of Pakistan (1969), formed by former Presbyterians.

The ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH in Pakistan started anew in 1842. Administered under the Vicariate of Hindustan for many years, Lahore became a vicariate in 1886. By the time the new nation was created, the mission work had become centered in Karachi, the capital, and the first archdiocese was established there in 1950. The church rivals that of the slightly larger Church of Pakistan.

Christian ecumenism is manifested in the National Council of Churches in Pakistan, which includes the several larger churches and is affiliated with the World Council of Churches. More conservative groups are members of the Evangelical Fellowship of Pakistan, affiliated with the WORLD EVANGELICAL ALLIANCE. Several of the most conservative churches are members of the International Council of Christian Churches.

Despite the large-scale movement of Hindus out of Pakistan over the years, a large Hindu minority remains in Pakistan. Pakistani Hindus have continued to try to live in peace with their Muslim neighbors. Although only 1 percent of the population, the community numbers more than 1.7 million strong. There are significantly fewer members of the BAHÁ'Í FAITH and practitioners of BUDDHISM, JAINISM, and SIKHISM AND THE SANT MAT TRADITION. At the time of partition, most Sikhs left Pakistan, and most of those who remained were killed in the rioting. The Baha'is, who have been in the area for over one hundred years, are mostly people of Persian (Iranian) heritage.

Sources:

Iqbal, A. Islamization of Pakistan. Lahore, Pakistan: Vanguard Books, 1986.

Neill, Stephen C. The Story of the Christian Church in India and Pakistan. Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 1970.

Rooney, J. On the Heels of Battles: A History of the Catholic Church in Pakistan, 1780–1986. Rawalpindi, Pakistan: Christian Study Centre, 1986.

Schimmel, A. Islam in India and Pakistan. Leiden, the Netherlands: E. J. Brill, 1982.

Palau

The nation of Palau includes a chain of two hundred islands west of Micronesia and north of Papua New Guinea. They were settled as early as 1000 B.C.E. by Polynesians. The residents' first contact with Europeans occurred in 1543, when Ruy Lopez de Villalobos (d. 1546) of Spain landed. Spain claimed the islands but did not occupy them. In 1783 an Englishman, Henry Wilson, was shipwrecked off Ulong Island. The island's chief helped repair Wilson's ship and sent his son to be educated in Europe. The British put Palau in their trading network until the Spanish claimed their property in 1885. Spain turned Palau over to Germany in 1899 following its defeat in the Spanish-American War.

The Germans were overwhelmed by the Japanese as World War II began. The Palauans suffered most in the war, with more than 80 percent of their number being killed in the fighting. After the war the islands became part of the United States Trust Territory of Micronesia, but in 1978 it opted to become independent, despite U.S. protest. The people have continually fought the proliferation of any nuclear presence in their country.

Status of religions in Palau, 2000-2050

Followers	2000			2025	2050
	total	%	rate
Christians	18,600	95.7	2.43	31,300	42,300
Roman Catholics	8,600	44.3	3.00	15,500	21,400
Protestants	5,600	28.8	2.92	10,000	14,500
Independents	4,100	21.1	1.03	6,000	7,000
Nonreligious	350	1.8	7.46	1,000	1,600
Buddhists	160	0.9	3.24	350	600
Baha'is	150	0.8	2.26	400	700
Ethnoreligionists	120	0.6	-0.80	100	100
Chinese folk-religionists	50	0.3	5.03	90	140
Total population	19,400	100.0	2.48	33,200	45,400

The ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH in the Caroline Islands (now part of the Federated States of Micronesia) extended its mission to Palau, but not until 1891. The original Spanish priests were replaced by German Capuchins following the transfer of the islands to German control in 1899. The work, which involved a majority of the island's residents, is a part of the Diocese of the Caroline Islands.

Protestants arrived in 1929, also from the Caroline Islands, through a couple representing the Liebenzell Mission. They were accompanied by a convert from Chuuk Island. Later, the SEVENTH-DAY ADVENTIST CHURCH and the ASSEMBLIES OF GOD would begin work in Palau. Missionaries from Baptist Mid-Missions worked there briefly in the 1980s but have subsequently withdrawn. There are only 154,000 residents in Palau.

Sources:

Forman, Charles H. The Island Churches of the South Pacific: Emergence in the Twentieth Century. Maryknoll, NY: Orbis, 1982.

Kubary, John S. The Religion of the Paluans. Woodstock, NY:

Micronesian Seminar, Woodstock College, 1969.

Shuster, D. R. "Islands of Change in Palau Church, School, and Elected Government, 1891–1981." Ed.D. thesis, University of Hawaii, 1982.

Palo Mayombe

Palo Mayombe, now found in Brazil, across the northern shore of South America, in Mexico, and in Cuba continues the religion of the Kongo people of southwest Africa. Its main practitioners are people of West African descent, but it has also found a following among Hispanic people, who call it Palo Monte.

The traditional beliefs of the Kongo people are similar to those of the Yoruban religion in that they recognize a High God, a set of lesser deities (among the Kongo seen as the higher deities—personifying the forces of Nature—and the spirits of Nature that inhabit various natural objects) and the spirits of the dead. It is possible to communicate with these various spirits through particularly gifted people and by possession, when the deity is believed to possess and speak through an individual.

Worship in Palo Mayombe occurs around the nganga or prenda, a consecrated cauldron that contains various objects including sacred earth, sticks (palos), and bones. The cauldron is believed to be inhabited by a spirit, who is believed to be active in any act of worship or magic that the worshippers might perform. Initiates go through a ceremony that links them to the this spirit. After initiation, the new member is believed to be protected by the spirit.

Palo Mayombe has received a negative public image following the discovery in 1989 of the bodies of more than a dozen murdered men in Matamoros, Mexico (across the border from Brownsville, Texas). The murders were eventually traced to a gang deeply involved in the border drug trade. In a building on the site where the bodies were found, authorities found a nganga, and there was much speculation that the leader, Adolfo Constanzo (1962–1989), had molded the gang into a Palo Mayombe group and was using human sacrifice both to eliminate rival gang members and build confidence among the gang members that they were magically protected. It was also revealed that members of the group had to watch a movie, The Believers, that portrays a group practicing a Hollywood version of Afro-Cuban faith.

As the investigation into the life of Constanzo continued, it was discovered that during the 1980s he had operated in Mexico City as a psychic and that his services had included foretelling the future and clearing people of what they believed to be curses that had been placed upon them. His work often included animal sacrifices. Eventually his services expanded to include assistance to drug dealers and their staffs. For a fee, he offered to make them invisible to police or bulletproof against their enemies. It appears that he made Palo Mayombe part of his practice in 1985, at which time he is believed to have raided a graveyard for human remains to include in his first nganga.

In July 1987, Constanzo became acquainted with the Hernandez brothers, who ran drugs along the Mexico-Texas border. While continuing his activities in Mexico City, he instituted his form of Palo Mayombe at a center near the village of Rancho Santa Elena, twenty miles from Matamoros. Human sacrifices became a regular part of the activities of the group, each sacrifice tied to some benefit the group was to receive. Several months after the police uncovered the activities at Matamoros, Constanzo was killed during a shoot-out with police in Mexico City. Other members of the group received long prison sentences.

Although the events at Matamoros were horrendous, there is no record of parallel violence that would indicate that Palo Mayombe practice is similarly violent and dismissive of human life.

Sources:

Gallerne, Gilbert. Sacrifices humains à Matamoros. Paris: Editions Fleuve Noir, 1993.

Humes, Edward. Buried Secrets. New York: Dutton, 1991.

Schutze, James. Cauldron of Blood: The Matamoros Cult Killings. New York: Morrow/Avon, 1989.

Panama

Although the Republic of Panama, which is about the size of South Carolina, is now considered part of the Central American region, forming the narrowest part of the isthmus and located between Costa Rica to the west and Colombia to the east, until 1903 the territory was a province of Colombia.

Roman Catholic missionaries accompanied the early Spanish explorers and settlers, and this led to the establishment of the first Roman Catholic church in Panama in 1510, called Santa María la Antigua del Darién. This church became the seat of the first diocese to be formed on the mainland of the Western Hemisphere, when Bishop Juand Quevedo (d. 1519) arrived with Governor Pedro Pedrarias Dávila (c. 1440–1531) in 1514. Many of the colonial churches built by the Spanish were constant reminders of the wealth and power of the ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH in Panama and its temporal powers. One of these colonial treasures, the cathedral of Old Panama City, was ransacked and burned by Henry Morgan (1635–1688) and his pirate band in 1671, but its ruins are still the centerpiece of Panamá Viejo and a major tourist attraction.

Historically, Panama has played an important role in world commerce, starting in the Spanish colonial period when mineral treasures from the Andean region were brought by ship to Panama and carried overland from the Pacific to the Caribbean coast for transshipment to Spain. During the California Gold Rush in the 1840s and 1850s, would-be miners arrived by ship in the Caribbean port of Aspinwall, now called Colón, and walked or rode in wagons across the narrow isthmus to Panama City, located on the Pacific Ocean, where they boarded other ships to travel to the gold fields in northern California. In 1850 U.S. businessmen financed the construction of the Panama Railroad between these two major port cities in order to provide transportation for the growing numbers of people who were headed to California. Then, beginning in 1878, a French company acquired the exclusive right to build an interoceanic canal on the Isthmus of Panama. In 1903, the U.S. government bought out the French interests and proceeded to complete the construction of the Panama Canal, which was opened to shipping in 1914. The U.S.-controlled Panama Canal Company operated the international waterway until December of 1999, when, under the provisions of the Torrijos-Carter Treaty of 1977, the canal was turned over to the government of Panama.

The Roman Catholic Church dominated the religious life of Panama until work in the Panama Canal Zone (PCZ) brought many American citizens and other foreign nationals to the country. The rapid influx of thousands of Protestant immigrants to Panama in the early 1900s led to the construction of many Protestant chapels for the largely English-speaking population of the PCZ, including many African Americans from the British West Indies. The American occupation of the PCZ also provided an open door for many Protestant mission agencies to begin work in Panama, such as THE SALVATION ARMY, the SEVENTH-DAY ADVENTIST CHURCH (1904), the SOUTHERN BAPTIST CONVENTION (1905), the Methodist Episcopal Church (now an integral part of the UNITED METHODIST CHURCH; 1906), the CHURCH OF GOD (ANDERSON, INDIANA; 1906), and the NATIONAL BAPTIST CONVENTION, U.S.A. (1909). By 1911, about ten thousand residents in the PCZ were being served by thirty-nine churches: Protestant Episcopal (13), nondenominational (8), Roman Catholic (7), Baptist (7), Methodist (3), and Adventist (1). Three ad-

Status of religions in Panama, 2000-2050

Followers	2000			2025	2050
	total	%	rate
Christians	2,518,000	88.2	1.69	3,232,000	3,512,000
Roman Catholics	2,210,000	77.4	1.63	2,850,000	3,100,000
Protestants	340,000	11.9	1.96	490,000	600,000
Independents	73,000	2.6	3.25	142,000	205,000
Muslims	127,000	4.4	1.88	170,000	200,000
Nonreligious	72,300	2.5	3.71	150,000	250,000
Baha'is	35,300	1.2	2.17	56,000	80,000
Buddhists	21,800	0.8	1.78	30,000	40,000
Ethnoreligionists	19,900	0.7	1.58	27,500	30,000
Neoreligionists	14,800	0.5	2.11	30,000	40,000
Spiritists	13,600	0.5	2.15	20,000	23,000
Atheists	13,500	0.5	3.07	35,000	50,000
Hindus	9,100	0.3	1.34	14,000	20,000
Chinese folk-religionists	4,200	0.2	1.48	6,000	8,000
Jews	3,800	0.1	1.06	4,000	4,500
other religionists	2,600	0.1	2.85	5,000	6,000
Total population	2,856,000	100.0	1.76	3,779,000	4,263,000

ditional groups arrived in the next decade: the FREE METHODIST CHURCH OF NORTH AMERICA (1913), the Christian Mission of Barbados (1914), and the Christian Brethren (1918). Also in 1914, the Union Churches of the Canal Zone were organized as nonsectarian, interdenominational community churches. In 1935 the population of the PCZ numbered 14,816 and was served by fifty-four congregations.

However, the first Protestants to arrive in Panama were a group of twelve hundred Scottish Presbyterians, who attempted to build a commercial colony on the Caribbean coast of the Darien Peninsula in 1698. The colony was abandoned in late 1699. The next to arrive were Wesleyan (British) Methodists who were among African Caribbean immigrants to settle in the Bocas del Toro region of the Caribbean coast, beginning in the 1820s. The United Methodist Free Church of England (1870s), the Jamaican Baptists (1880s), and the Jamaican Wesleyan Methodists (1880s) also began work among West Indian immigrants in Panama. The CHURCH OF ENGLAND (through the SOCIETY FOR THE PROPAGATION OF THE GOSPEL IN FOREIGN PARTS) arrived in the 1850s during the construction of the Panama Railroad, and company officials helped to finance the construction of the first permanent Protestant church building in Panama: Christ's Church-by-the-Sea in Aspinwall, built in 1864–1865. This was the second-oldest permanent Protestant church in Central America, with the first being St. John's Anglican Cathedral in Belize City, built in 1825. However, occasional Anglican-Episcopal worship services had been held in Panama since 1849, conducted by clergymen en route to the gold fields in California, which led to the establishment of the first Episcopal congregation in 1851 in the port town of Taboga. An official "isthmian mission" of the Anglican Church was established in Panama in 1853, although missionary work was sparse until 1883.

Present among the West Indian population were the African Caribbean sects of Myalism, an Afro-Christian syncretic religion that appealed to all African ethnic groups in Jamaica; Obeah, a religion probably of Ashanti origin, characterized by the practice of sorcery and witchcraft, which had been outlawed in the British colonies during the slavery period; and the "revivalist" sects of Pocomania and Cumina, in which spirit possession was a central feature.

Prior to the 1950s, Protestant missionary activities were largely centered in the PCZ, where most of the English-speaking people were concentrated. However, over time some of the Protestant denominations began to evangelize and establish churches among the Spanish-speaking population, mainly in the canal region and in the western provinces of the country.

Prior to the 1940s, Southern Baptist work in Panama was largely limited to the PCZ and the port cities of Panama City and Colón, among North Americans and West Indians. In the 1940s increased efforts were made by the Southern Baptist Home Mission Board to launch work in Spanish-speaking communities, and in the 1950s efforts among the Kuna people on the Caribbean coast of northeastern Panama were initiated. Protestant efforts among the Kunas began in 1913, led by British and American independent missionaries under the sponsorship of the San Blas Mission. During the 1950s, the independent New Tribes Mission and several Mennonite groups began work among Native American groups in Panama, as well.

Pentecostal work in Panama began with the arrival of the Arthur Edwards family in 1928, sent out by the INTERNATIONAL CHURCH OF THE FOURSQUARE GOSPEL. Early evangelistic efforts by Edwards and his helpers proved quite successful among the Spanish-speaking population during the 1930s and 1940s, especially following revival meetings in the PCZ town of Frijoles, where supernatural "signs and wonders" were reported for several years in the mid-1930s. The mother church of the Panamanian Foursquare movement, the Calle Q Foursquare Church, was founded in 1937 in Panama City and became a training center for missionary efforts throughout the country. The Foursquare Bible School was established there in 1938. By 1981, the Foursquare Church had grown to about 21,700 baptized members, 206 organized congregations, and 201 preaching points in all nine provinces, and about 97 percent of the membership was composed of Spanish-speaking Panamanians. At that time, the Foursquare Church was not only the largest Pentecostal denomination in Panama but also the largest Protestant denomination in the country.

Other Pentecostal denominations in Panama include the CHURCH OF GOD (CLEVELAND, TENNESSEE; 1935), the Evangelistic Doctrinal Church of Puerto Pilón (an independent group, founded in 1940), the CHURCH OF GOD OF PROPHECY (1946), the INTERNATIONAL EVANGELICAL CHURCH, SOLDIERS OF THE CROSS (1950), the APOSTOLIC ASSEMBLY OF FAITH IN JESUS CHRIST (1960), the CHURCH OF GOD IN CHRIST (1964), the New Life Evangelical Church, a split from the Foursquare Church in the Province of Chiriquí (1967), the ASSEMBLIES OF GOD (1967), the World Wide Missionary Movement and Missionary Advance (1973) from Puerto Rico, and the Pentecostal Church of Jesus Christ (1974).

Small, non-Pentecostal Protestant denominations include the following: the LUTHERAN CHURCH—MISSOURI SYNOD (1942), the Central American Mission (1944), the independent CHURCHES OF CHRIST (NON-INSTRUMENTAL; 1945), the New Tribes Mission (1952), the Gospel Missionary Union (1952), the CHURCH OF THE NAZARENE (1953), the Society of Bible Churches (1958), the Mennonite Brethren Board of Missions and Services (1958), the CHURCH OF THE BRETHREN (1958), the United Gospel Church (1961), the Evangelical Mission of Panama (1961), Baptist International Missions (1961), the Association of Lutheran Churches of Panama (1963), and the Free Will Baptist Church (1964).

In 1980 the largest Protestant denominations in Panama were the Foursquare Church, the EPISCOPAL CHURCH (which assumed responsibility for the Anglican community early in the twentieth century), the SEVENTH-DAY ADVENTIST CHURCH, and the Baptist Convention (associated with the Southern Baptist Church).

According to a 1997 study of Evangelicals in Panama, the following information was reported. The Assemblies of God had become the largest Protestant denomination in Panama as a result of twenty years of strenuous evangelistic and church-planting efforts throughout the country, with 800 congregations and about 50,000 members. The Foursquare Church was second largest, with 529 congregations and 34,500 members. Third largest was the Seventh-day Adventist Church, with 120 congregations and 15,000 members. Fourth was the Church of God (Cleveland, Tennessee), with 250 congregations and 11,000 members. Other large denominations included the Baptist Convention (174 congregations with 6,500 members), the Episcopal Church (25 churches with 6,000 members), the Evangelical Church Association (34 congregations and 5,000 members), the Methodist Church (91 congregations and 4,100 members), and the United Pentecostal Church (46 congregations and 3,000 members). All other Protestant groups had fewer than 3,000 members in 1997.

Many of the more conservative Protestant churches are associated together in the Confraternidad Evangélica Panameña, which is affiliated with the WORLD EVANGELICAL ALLIANCE. No church based in Panama is a member of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES.

Non-Protestant Christian groups present in the country include the JEHOVAH'S WITNESSES (150 kingdom halls with 7,410 members), the CHURCH OF JESUS CHRIST OF LATTER-DAY SAINTS (52 temples with 10,960 members), the CHRISTADELPHIANS, and Voice of the Chief Cornerstone (followers of William Soto Santiago of Puerto Rico).

Other religious groups include traditional Amerindian religions, including those of the Kuna, who make up two linguistic groups, the Guaymí (Ngabere), Chocoes (Waukana and Embera), Teribe, and Buglere or Bokotá, along with traditional Chinese religions (Taoism, Confucianism, and BUDDHISM), HINDUISM, ISLAM, the BAHÁ'Í FAITH, the Sawan Kirpal Ruhani Mission (Science of Spirituality), the MASTER CHING HAI MEDITATION ASSOCIATION, the Superet Light Doctrinal Church (an American Spiritualist community), and the Parish of Divine Mercy and Mary the Mystical Rose (also Spiritualist). The small Jewish community (9,000 members), dating from the middle of the nineteenth century, includes synagogues of Orthodox, Conservative, and Reform traditions. There is also a small Greek Orthodox community connected with the ECUMENICAL PATRIARCHATE (two churches and 780 members).

According to a January 1996 public opinion poll conducted by the CID-Gallup company, the religious affiliation of the Panamanian population was as follows: Roman Catholic, 86.4 percent; Protestant, 7.3 percent; other religions, 2.1 percent; and none/no response, 4.2 percent. However, Evangelical sources in Panama reported the Protestant population at about 15 percent.

In 2000 the total population of Panama was estimated at 2,855,700, of which about 80 percent were Spanish-speaking, about 9 percent were Asian or Middle Eastern (Chinese, Japanese, Korean, East Indian, Jewish, and Arab), 8.3 percent were Amerindian (speakers of seven languages), and 3.7 percent were English-speaking West Indians and North Americans. The literacy rate was 90.8 percent.

Clifton L. Holland

Sources:

- Brierly, Peter, ed. World Churches Handbook. London: Christian Research, 1977.
- Butler, Charles O. "Protestant Church Growth and a Changing Panama: A Study of Foursquare Gospel and Methodist Patterns." Th.D. dissertation, Fuller Theological Seminary, 1964.
- "The Church in Central America and Panama." Pro Mundi Vita (Brussels) 46 (1973).
- Grimes, Barbara F., ed. Ethnologue: Languages of the World. 12th ed. Dallas, TX: Summer Institute of Linguistics, 1992.
- Holland, Clifton L., ed. World Christianity: Central America and the Caribbean. Monrovia, CA: MARC-World Vision, 1981.
- Ibarra, S. M. Muschett. "Church and Politics in a Time of Crisis: Noriega's Panama." Ph.D. dissertation, Notre Dame University, 1992.
- Read, William R., et al. Latin American Church Growth. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans, 1969.

Pangestu

Pangestu, which means "blessing" in Javanese, is both an acronym for the organization named Paguyuban Ngesti Tunggal (association focusing on union) and its common name. The organization was founded in 1949 but its origins lie in the revelation received by Raden Soenarto Mertowardojo, or Pakde Narto, on February 14 1932. Pakde Narto was born in 1899 near Boyolali in central Java, then lived in Surakarta, where he worked as a clerk in a series of government offices and died in the mid 1960s. Soon after his initial experience two close followers transcribed the teachings he received through the True Teacher (Sang Guru Sejati). These became Sasangka Jati (a text translated into English as True Light), which contains the core teachings of Pangestu.

Sasangka Jati begins with clarification of the three aspects of God: Suksma Kawekas (the source of life, or God the Father), Suksma Sejati (the True Teacher, messenger of God), and Roh Suci (the Holy Spirit). It proceeds to clarify five qualities essential to proper worship of God: non-attachment, acceptance, truthfulness, patience, and noble aspiration. It also clarifies five commandments (Paliwara); a version of genesis (Gumelaring Dumadi); the One Teaching (Tunggal Sabda); the safe path (Dalan Rahayu); the sixth is concerned with 'whence and whither' (Sangkan Paran); and the seventh prayer (Panembah).

Pakde Narto lived in a Surakarta world in which virtually all men of his position were involved in a variety of spiritual practices, often simultaneously. He was closely associated with the Mankunegaran, the lesser court of Solo, and through it also with Dutch Protestant missionaries and the THEOSOPHICAL SOCIETY. It is emphasized that Pangestu is neither a new religion nor "mystical." Those terms are disavowed in favor of spiritual to stress that it involves no relations with ancestral spirits or occult powers. Even the term meditation is avoided as in Pangestu this is associated mainly with Hindu and Buddhist philosophies that leaders believe do not focus sufficiently on God. At the same time teachings are presented as a newly received, direct transmission from God, which came without the mediation of an established religious system.

The organization became prominent in the 1950s when Dr. Sumantri Hardjoprakoso, a Dutch trained psychiatrist, became its leader. Since then Pangestu has particularly appealed to intellectuals with a modernizing agenda. Within the Javanist world of movements it could be described as the equivalent of Muhammadiyah, Indonesia's leading modernist Muslim movement. It synthesizes many elements of traditional philosophy and literature into a clear system, which appeals strongly to educated Javanists. From the 1950s on, but especially during the Suharto era, it became especially strong within both the army and the civil service. It was estimated in 1970 that membership was around 50,000, but in recent years it has claimed a following of twice that. It has a clearly structured organization throughout Indonesia and lists branches in Europe, but most members everywhere are ethnic Javanese.

Paul Stange

Sources:

- De Jong, Suffridus. Een Javaanse Levenshouding. Wageningen: H. Veenman & Zonen B.V., 1973
- Hadiwijono, Harun. Man in the Present Javanese Mysticism. Baarn: Bosch & Keuning N.V., 1967.
- Hardjoprakoso, Sumantri. Indonesisch Mensbeeld als Basis ener Psycho-Therapie. Leiden: N.p., 1956.
- Mertowardojo, Soenarto. True Light. Pangestu, Jakarta: N.p., 1972.

Pantheism

Pantheism is a widely discussed philosophical position that has rarely led to the formation of religious communities. It is the view that the universe is identical with God, and that God is identical with the universe. A slightly similar position, called panentheism, identifies the universe as divine but also assumes that God is more than the universe and hence remains an object of veneration and worship. Panentheism is often identified with the philosophy of Alfred North Whitehead (1861–1947) and Charles Hartshorne (1897–2000).

Alasdair MacIntyre (1967) suggests that pantheism includes the belief that everything that exists constitutes an all-inclusive “unity” that is in some sense divine. The first prominent pantheist is generally identified as the Dutch philosopher Baruch Spinoza (1632–1677), and British free-thinker John Toland (1670–1722) is credited with coining the term pantheist, which he used synonymously with Spinozist. However, a number of ancient philosophers, including Plato (c. 428–348 B.C.E.) and Plotinus (205–270 C.E.), are identified as pantheists, as are literary lights such as D. H. Lawrence (1885–1930), Walt Whitman (1819–1892), and Ralph Waldo Emerson (1803–1882).

Various movements, such as Daoism, are often identified as inherently pantheistic, as is much mystical and scientific thought. One movement often accused of being pantheistic is the CHURCH OF CHRIST, SCIENTIST, though its founder, Mary Baker Eddy (1821–1910), denied the charge. On the other hand, modern neopagan groups often identify themselves, in their worship of Nature, as pantheists.

Among the few groups identifying itself as pantheist is the Universal Pantheist Society, founded in 1975, which describes its beliefs as follows: “The cosmos, taken or conceived of as a whole, is synonymous with the theological principle of God. The Cosmos is divine, and the earth sacred. Pantheists do not propose belief in a deity; rather, they hold nature itself as a creative presence. Pantheism reconciles science and religion through ecology leading to strong environmental awareness” (<http://www.pantheist.net>). Another pantheist organization is the World Pantheist Union. The union supports an earth-honoring, life-affirming, naturalistic form of pantheism, which it hopes to make available as a religious option and a rational alternative to traditional religions.

Addresses:

- Universal Pantheist Society
P.O. Box 3499
Visalia, CA 93278
<http://www.pantheist.net/>
- World Pantheist Union
P.O. Box 55629
Riverside, CA 92517
<http://www.pantheism.net/>

Sources:

- Garrett, Jan. “An Introduction to Pantheism.” Posted at <http://www.wku.edu/~garreje/panthesm.htm>. Accessed December 1, 2001.
- Harrison, Paul. Elements of Pantheism. London: Element Books, 1999.
- MacIntyre, Alasdair. “Pantheism.” In Encyclopedia of Philosophy, edited by Paul Edwards. New York: Macmillan and Free Press, 1967.

Papua New Guinea

The modern nation of Papua New Guinea brings together the eastern half of the island of New Guinea, the islands of the Bismarck Archipelago, the northern Solomon Islands, and a variety of other island east of New Guinea. The modern state was constructed in steps, beginning with the merger of the former British protectorate of Papua with the German colony of New Guinea after the Germans were displaced during World War I. The land was administered by Australia until independence was proclaimed in 1975.

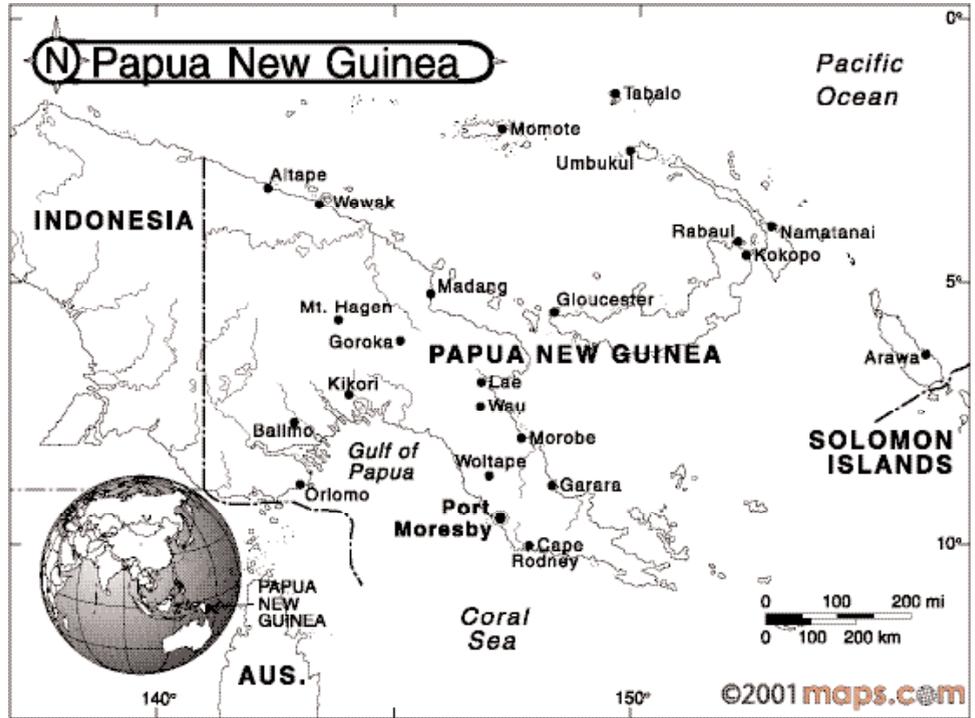

The islands covered by Papua New Guinea have been inhabited by Melanesian peoples since at least 2000 B.C.E. They traditionally tended to live in small groups separated by dense jungle, and modern scholars have identified more than seven hundred native languages and dialects. When Europeans made their initial contact with the island's inhabitants in the twentieth century, many of these groups had only limited use of tools. Some had yet to discover the wheel.

The traditional religions of the native population continue to be practiced by many of the islanders, but only a few (less than 5 percent) follow them exclusively.

Native religion came under heavy attack by the missionaries, the first of whom, Samuel McFarlane (1837–1911), arrived in 1871. McFarlane, representing the LONDON MISSIONARY SOCIETY, was joined within a few years by W. G. Lawes (1839–1907), and together they pioneered work on Murray Island and Port Moresby. Their work would grow into the present UNITED CHURCH IN PAPUA NEW GUINEA and the Solomon Islands.

Australian Methodists (now a constituent part of the UNITING CHURCH IN AUSTRALIA) chose New Guinea as their first mission field and sent George Brown (1835–1917) and a team of native church workers from Fiji and Samoa. The mission grew to include the Duke of York, New Britain, and New Ireland Islands. The work was spurred by the 1878 death of four of the Fijians, who were killed by those among whom they were working. Work expanded to Papua in 1890. This work was later incorporated into the UNITED CHURCH OF THE SOLOMON ISLANDS.

In 1886 German Lutherans working through the Neuen-dettelsau Mission Society began what would become one of the more successful missions in Papua New Guinea. Under the leadership of Johann Flierl (1858–1947), the German mission grew with a succession of mass movements early in the twentieth century. After World War I, the Australian Lutherans became the dominant force in leadership, and the American Lutheran Church (now a constituent part of the EVANGELICAL LUTHERAN CHURCH IN AMERICA) added its resources to assist in recovery from the Japanese occupation. The church became autonomous in 1956 as the Evangelical Lutheran Church

Status of religions in Papua New Guinea, 2000-2050

Followers	2000			2025	2050
	total	%	rate
Christians	4,380,000	95.1	2.29	6,902,000	8,786,000
Protestants	2,610,000	56.6	2.69	4,133,000	5,300,000
Roman Catholics	1,380,000	30.0	2.53	2,400,000	3,200,000
Anglicans	308,000	6.7	2.74	550,000	800,000
Ethnoreligionists	167,000	3.6	2.07	150,000	128,000
Baha'is	34,900	0.8	2.61	65,000	100,000
Nonreligious	12,400	0.3	3.28	32,000	55,000
Buddhists	7,400	0.2	3.03	13,000	18,000
Chinese folk-religionists	3,300	0.1	2.55	4,800	7,000
Neoreligionists	1,300	0.0	3.50	3,000	4,000
Muslims	1,200	0.0	2.94	3,000	4,500
Jews	560	0.0	2.06	800	1,000
Total population	4,608,000	100.0	2.29	7,174,000	9,103,000

of New Guinea. The United Church of Papua New Guinea and the Solomon Islands, the United Church of the Solomon Islands, and the EVANGELICAL LUTHERAN CHURCH OF PAPUA NEW GUINEA are all members of the World Council of Churches.

The last of the major Christian groups to enter New Guinea, also from Australia, were the Anglicans. Albert Maclaren (1853–1891) launched the Anglican Mission at Dogura on the island's northeast coast, and the Diocese of Papua-New Guinea was erected in 1898. The diocese existed within the Church of England in Australia until the independent Province of the Church of Papua New Guinea was formed in 1977.

Roman Catholic missionaries actually found their way to the Bismarck Archipelago in 1847 but had little effect until 1881, when representatives of the Missionaries of the Sacred Heart came. Thereafter, the work expanded rapidly and a vicariate of British New Guinea was established in 1889. The ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH experienced spectacular growth in Papua New Guinea in the 1960s, but it has had a continuing problem with the recruitment of indigenous priests; the first native Papuan priest was not ordained until 1937. He later became the first Papuan bishop (1970). As the new century begins, there are four archdioceses and twenty dioceses.

A shaman works a spell in the western highlands of Papua New Guinea. (Eric Smith/TRIP)

Through the twentieth century, a spectrum of Christian denominations launched missions in Papua New Guinea. Most of these originated in Australia, with a lesser number coming from the United States (including the BAPTIST BIBLE FELLOWSHIP INTERNATIONAL, the CHURCH OF THE NAZARENE, and THE SALVATION ARMY). Swedish and Finnish Pentecostals initiated work in the 1960s. The independent Bethel Pentecostal Temple, the first Pentecostal church in the state of Washington (U.S.A.) started a small mission in 1948, which has grown to be one of the largest Evangelical churches in Papua New Guinea, with almost three hundred congregations.

The primary indigenous religious movements grew out of World War II and the use of New Guinea as a staging area for the U.S. armed forces. The so-called cargo cults originated from the experience among native people of seeing cargo planes landing and leaving behind large amounts of supplies. In this context, a variety of local leaders, some with messianic pretensions, arose and began new movements. As the history of contemporary Papua New Guinea has been assembled, the cargo cults have been placed in the larger context of those movements, the first arising as early as the 1890s, through which the indigenous population attempted to respond to the coming of the Europeans. These movements fall in a spectrum, from dominantly Christian to dominantly traditional in belief.

Among the first of these new movements was the movement surrounding the Tokarau Prophet in 1893. Around the beginning of World War I, three new prophets appeared at Saibai on the southwest coast of Papua. However, during and in the years after World War II, more than one hundred such groups have appeared, the large number due in part to the many different culture groups inhabiting the various islands. Each group has a rather limited following.

Other groups also operate in the islands. There is a small Buddhist community, primarily made up of Chinese expatriates. The BAHÁ'Í FAITH has had a steady growth since the 1960s.

Paraguay

Sources:

Forman, Charles H. The Island Churches of the South Pacific: Emergence in the Twentieth Century. Maryknoll, NY: Orbis, 1982.

Williams, R. G. The United Church in Papua New Guinea and the Solomon Islands: The Development of an Indigenous Church. Rabaul, Papua New Guinea: Trinity Press, 1972.

Paraguay

Three peoples dominated the Paraguayan River valley before the arrival of Europeans. The Guaraní people were a settled agricultural people. In what is termed the Chaco region downriver, the more nomadic Guaycurús and Payaguás were hunters and fishers. Three other groups, united by language, were differentiated into more than one hundred subgroups. The Spanish entered the region by following the tributaries of the Río de la Plata, looking for silver. A fort established in 1537 would grow into the present-day capital of Paraguay, Asunción.

The Guaraní people were a settled agricultural people. In what is termed the Chaco region downriver, the more nomadic Guaycurús and Payaguás were hunters and fishers. Three other groups, united by language, were differentiated into more than one hundred subgroups. The Spanish entered the region by following the tributaries of the Río de la Plata, looking for silver. A fort established in 1537 would grow into the present-day capital of Paraguay, Asunción.

The early Spanish colonists recognized relatively little value in the area, and as a result the indigenous peoples suffered somewhat less than in other countries under Spanish control, at least in the beginning. However, in the late eighteenth century many of the native people were forced to become workers on the developing cattle plantations. In 1811 the Spanish governor in Asunción was forced out when the planters demanded a free trade policy for their tea and tobacco. The new government withdrew into a relatively isolated position in an attempt to escape the chaos it saw in the surrounding regions.

The country's isolationist policy worked for two generations, but then Brazil, Uruguay, and Argentina created an alliance, backed by England, to destroy Paraguay. The five-year war (1865–1870) led to the death of 60 to 80 percent of the Guaraní people. All the males who survived were sold into slavery. Those native groups in the more remote areas suffered fewer ill effects from the war, but to this day the number of women greatly outnumber the number of men in the country. As a result, family instability has contributed to the country's instability overall. The economy was destroyed, and 160,000 square kilo-

Status of religions in Paraguay, 2000-2050

Followers	2000			2025	2050
	total	%	rate
Christians	5,371,000	97.7	2.65	9,119,000	12,138,000
Roman Catholics	4,950,000	90.1	2.59	8,300,000	10,900,000
Protestants	200,000	3.6	3.38	500,000	900,000
Independents	70,800	1.3	3.33	140,000	240,000
Nonreligious	60,100	1.1	7.19	140,000	260,000
Ethnoreligionists	29,900	0.5	0.15	25,000	20,000
Buddhists	11,000	0.2	5.95	24,000	40,000
Atheists	9,900	0.2	3.84	13,000	20,000
Baha'is	9,000	0.2	2.86	25,000	50,000
Neoreligionists	2,900	0.1	1.94	6,000	12,000
Jews	2,700	0.1	1.30	3,200	5,000
Total population	5,496,000	100.0	2.68	9,355,000	12,565,000

meters of territory was lost. The decades of poverty and instability led the way to the emergence in 1954 of General Alfredo Stroessner (b. 1912), who led a brutal repressive regime until he himself was overthrown in a coup in 1989. That coup led to an opening for democracy, which has emerged step by step.

The traditional religions of the Paraguayan peoples have survived, though much has been mixed with the overlay of Roman Catholicism that now dominates the country. The ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH entered with the Spanish conquistadors, and a diocese was erected at Asunción in 1547, though the first bishop did not arrive for a decade. Most importantly for the development of the church, the Jesuits arrived in 1558 and began the work of evangelizing the Guaraní and other peoples. They developed a system of communal towns that closely paralleled the agricultural society previously developed among the Guaraní. They also developed a written form of the Guaraní language.

The Jesuit work system came into conflict with the growing desire of wealthy Spanish landowners to control Paraguay and contributed to the expulsion of the Jesuits in 1767. The church suffered greatly through the nineteenth century. It lost half its members in the 1865–1870 war and never had enough priests. Catholicism still dominates throughout the land, but the church remains relatively poor, and the folk Catholicism that has arisen in various parts of South America, mixing Catholic faith with traditional religion, is widespread.

A representative of the American Bible Society introduced Protestantism to Paraguay in 1856, but it was an American Methodist who became the first resident missionary, in 1886. Two years later, the CHURCH OF ENGLAND arrived when the South American Missionary Society shifted its focus from the Patagonian people of southern Argentina to the Chaco region of Paraguay. Among the society's accomplishments would be the development of a written language for the Lengua people and the production of a Lengua Bible.

German immigrants began to move into Paraguay at the end of the nineteenth century, and the first German Lutheran congregation was established in 1893. Notable among the groups to establish work in Paraguay in the twentieth century were the SEVENTH-DAY ADVENTIST CHURCH, the first to arrive in the new century, the New Testament Missionary Fellowship (1902) from Great Britain, and the CHRISTIAN CHURCH (DISCIPLES OF CHRIST), which eventually took over the Methodist work. After World War II, Paraguay became a magnet for Mennonites, the first being refugees from the newly established Soviet Union. After settling in, they opened work among the people of the Chaco region and appealed for assistance from American Mennonites. As a result an extensive work was developed around a set of colonies that eventually became the Evangelical Mennonite Church in Paraguay. Mennonite brethren, also from Russia, arrived in 1930. Baptists from Argentina came to Paraguay in 1920, and once a mission was opened, they appealed to the SOUTHERN BAPTIST CONVENTION for assistance.

World War II became a further catalyst for the development of religion in Paraguay. The Society of Brothers (now THE BRUDERHOF), a German communal group modeled on the HUTTERITES, escaped Germany and settled in Paraguay in 1941. They were joined by Russians and Ukrainians who found their way to Paraguay after the war. The arrival of Russian Pentecostals occasioned the introduction of American Pentecostals, who came to assist their Russian colleagues. Pentecostalism has grown in Paraguay, and a number of indigenous churches have arisen in recent years. Ukrainian immigrants organized the Ukrainian Orthodox Church, and immigrants also came to the country from Korea and Japan.

By 1912 enough Jews had migrated to Paraguay, primarily from Germany, to justify the organization of the initial Jewish community. Today there are some nine hundred Jews in Paraguay, whose primary structure is the Consejo Representativo Israelita del Paraguay, headquartered in Asunción.

The diversity of the world's religions began to be introduced to Paraguay in the post–World War II era. Along with the Christians from Japan and Korea were a number of Buddhists, including missionaries from the SOKA GAKKAI INTERNATIONAL and members of FOGUANGSHAN Buddhist order. The BAHÁ'Í FAITH spread among the Yanaigua, Chulupí, and Maka peoples. Among the new religions that have established centers in Paraguay are the UNIFICATION MOVEMENT and the INTERNATIONAL SOCIETY FOR KRISHNA CONSCIOUSNESS.

Sources:

- Brachettio, A. Die Missionsarbeit der katholischen Kirche bei den Indianern in Paraguay. Bonn, Germany: Holos, 1990.
- Browning, W. E. The River Plate Republics: A Survey of the Religious, Economic and Social Conditions in Argentina, Paraguay and Uruguay. London: World Dominion Press, 1928.
- Plett, R. El protestantismo en el Paraguay: Su aporte cultural económico y espiritual. Asunción, Paraguay: Instituto Biblico Asunción, 1987.
- Shumaker, J. T. "Church Growth in Paraguay." M.A. thesis, Fuller Theological Seminary, 1972.

Paris Mission

The Paris Mission, the Société de missions évangéliques de Paris, began with a number of prayer groups that had been established among Protestants (primarily members of the REFORMED CHURCH OF FRANCE) in support of the Basel Mission and the London Missionary Society, both products of the pietism and the Evangelical Awakening that had spread through European Protestantism in the late eighteenth century. As one component, the Awakening had spurred an interest in world missions, and as it was perpetuated would turn the Protestant movement into a worldwide phenomenon in the nineteenth century. The Paris Mission was formally organized in 1822 and soon established branches in Holland, Italy, and French-speaking Switzerland. The Society originally assumed an interdenominational stance, but in fact was largely supported by members of the Reformed churches.

The first missionaries supported by the society were sent to South Africa in 1829. From that original base, work expanded into Lesotho and Zambia. Through the remainder of the century, the mission grew primarily by assuming control of older missions established in what had become French territories. Various Congregational and Presbyterian missions turned work over to the Paris Mission in order to quiet the fears and prejudices of French colonial authorities directed to non-Catholic foreigners working among new French subjects. By this manner, the Paris Mission acquired work in Tahiti (and other South Pacific islands) and in Africa (Madagascar, Gabon, Togo, and Cameroon). Through the decades following World War II, the Paris Mission oversaw the maturing of most of its missions into independent churches. The end of this phase of its work contributed to its voting itself out of existence in 1971 and contributing its resources to two new organizations, the Département Français d'Action Apostolique, a common mission board serving several French Protestant denominations, and the Communauté Evangélique d'Action Apostolique, an international communion of 47 churches working in French-speaking lands. Both organizations are based in Paris.

Pashupata Saivism

Address:

Communauté Evangélique d'Action Apostolique
13, rue Louis-Perrier
CS49530
34961 Montpellier
France
<http://www.cevaa.org>

Pashupata Saivism

The Pashupatas (Sanskrit; adherents of Pashupati's [that is, Siva's] teaching) are a sect of saiva ascetics whose cult probably goes back to the second century C.E. They trace their origin to Pashupati, who is said to have appeared on earth as Lakulisha (b. c. 150 C.E.), the founder of the sect. According to this account, Lakulisha composed the Pashupata Sutra, the most authoritative work on this system. Together with the important commentary by Kaundinya (fifth century C.E.) and the Ganakarika, a text about the group's rituals and worship practices, the Pashupata Sutra seems to be the only internal source for our knowledge of this group. But although important works are lost, external sources like the Puranas, the Tantras, and epigraphical records show that it was once widespread on the Indian subcontinent.

The religious observance of the Pashupatas presupposed access to the Veda—its practice being centered on the Vedic Mantras of the five faces of Siva—and was restricted to Brahmin males. It aimed at liberation through several stages. In the first, the ascetic was to dwell near a Siva temple, with his body smeared with ashes. He would worship the deity by meditating on the five mantras but also by imitating Siva's boisterous laughter. The next phase served to purify the ascetic through a peculiar mechanism: leaving the temple without his sectarian marks, the Pashupata would pretend in public to be mentally deranged or play the lecher and thus invite the contempt of others. Through his initiation he was considered to have the power to transfer his bad karma to those who abused him. This he did until the purification was effected and he could devote the end of his life to meditation on the five mantras.

In a sense Pashupata Saivism stands between the Vedic and the Tantric saiva religions, not only systematically but also chronologically. Using an older indigenous terminology, Alexis Sanderson (1990) has proposed to classify them as belonging to the atimarga, in contradistinction to the later Tantric Saivism (mantramarga) that built upon it. Within this atimarga would fall a further branch of the Pashupatas, namely the Lakulas (also called Kalamukhas or Mahavratas), whose ascetic practice includes the Observance of the Skull' (kapalavrata), by which practitioners imitate Siva's penance by begging with a human skull as an alms bowl and vessel and by living in the impure cremation ground.

The Pashupata tradition spread to Nepal in the eighth century. The Pashupatinath Mandira along the banks of the Bagmati River in Kathmandu remains a primary pilgrimage site to this day. Today the followers of Pashupata Saivism may be found in all parts of India, but most are concentrated in Gujarat and the foothills of the Himalayas.

Jürgen Hanneder

Sources:

- Hara, M. Materials for the Study of Pasupata Saivism. Ph.D. dissertation, Harvard University, 1966.
Sanderson, Alexis. "Saivism and the Tantric Traditions." In The World's Religions: The Religions of Asia, edited by Friedhelm Hardy, 32–135. London: Routledge, 1990.

Pasundan Christian Church (GKP)

The Pasundan Christian Church (Gereja Kristen Pasundan) originated in missionary activity begun by the Nederlandsche Gereformeerde Zendingsvereniging, an independent Reformed missionary agency in the Dutch East Indies, now Indonesia. The agency entered western Java in 1863 but made little progress, partially because of the missionaries' very negative attitudes toward Islam, the dominant religion in the area, and the local culture. In the meantime, a second independent effort was begun by a Dutch layman who was a member of the Supreme Court of the Dutch Indies. He had notable success using methods that were considered by many to be unorthodox. The two works merged in 1885. Work was still slow, and in 1834 there were still only four thousand Sundanese members. That year the churches joined together in a synod.

Missionaries remained in charge and chaired the synod until the Japanese arrived in 1942. The end of the war did not lessen the synod's problems, as the war for independence and a West Java Islamic revolt followed soon thereafter. It was not until the 1950s that stability returned to the area. The church was able to reorganize and settle into a quiet life that includes the sponsoring of a hospital and school system.

In the 1990s the Pasundan Christian Church reported thirty thousand members. It is a member of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES and the WORLD ALLIANCE OF REFORMED CHURCHES.

Address:

Pasundan Christian Church
P.O. Box 1051
Jalan Pasirkaliki 121–123
Bandung 40010 Jawa Barat
Indonesia
<http://www.gkp.or.id/>

Source:

Bauswein, Jean-Jacques, and Lukas Vischer, eds. The Reformed Family Worldwide: A Survey of Reformed Churches, Theological Schools, and International Organizations. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans, 1999.

Pentecostal Assemblies of Canada

In November 1918, a meeting was convened in Mille Roche, a small town outside of Cornwall, Ontario. Its purpose was to begin to organize a cooperative fellowship and to obtain a government charter for Pentecostals in Canada. This action followed similar discussions in Montreal in 1917 and a previously failed attempt at Pentecostal union in 1909. Soon after the meeting, on May 17, 1919, the secretary of state of Canada signed the charter giving official sanction to Pentecostal leaders. They wished to organize on the basis of “fellowship, not doctrine” but agreed that “the baptism in the Holy Spirit with tongues as the initial evidence” was central to their identity. Thus Pentecostal Assemblies of Canada (PAOC) was born.

Revival had characterized a number of sectarian movements from the beginning of the twentieth century, a time of rapid urbanization and accelerated religious change. As in the United States, the Wesleyan Holiness denominations in Canada contributed significantly to the growth of Pentecostalism. So did the SALVATION ARMY, with its appeal to the uprooted urban masses, as well as the Mennonite Brethren in Christ and the CHRISTIAN AND MISSIONARY ALLIANCE. The outpouring of the Holy Spirit in 1906 at the Hebden Mission in Toronto left its mark on Canadian Pentecostalism, just as the Azusa Street Revival shaped PENTECOSTALISM in the United States. Hebden was the first of six Pentecostal missions started before 1910. As people from different religious traditions experienced spiritual phenomena in a new way, they sought common fellowship and common structures.

In 1919 a group of western Canadian Pentecostal churches formed as a district of the ASSEMBLIES OF GOD (AG). A year later the PAOC in the east voted to become the Assemblies Eastern Canada District Council. This structural arrangement continued until 1925, when the Canadian Pentecostals voted to become autonomous.

Because of doctrinal similarities, geographic proximity, and fraternal working agreements, the influence of the AG on the PAOC is unquestionable. The PAOC adopted the AG Statement of Fundamental Truths, a statement adhering to a finished work theory of sanctification. It also positioned the movement away from the Oneness tradition of Pentecostalism, reaffirming the Trinitarian view of the Godhead.

As the largest single group of Canadian Pentecostals, the PAOC grew rapidly after its formation in 1919. Two years after its inception it listed twenty-three assemblies in eastern Canada and ten in western Canada. According to census figures, the Pentecostals and Apostolic Brethren accounted for approximately 8,000 believers and adherents in Canada at this time. In 1951 the total Pentecostal constituency in Canada numbered 95,000 compared to 57,742 ten years previously. In 1988 the PAOC General Conference reported 1,058 congregations with 189,753 church members and adherents in Canada. By 1994 that figure had risen to 231,000.

Identified with classical Pentecostals in the United States, the PAOC gained greater favor after the AG were accepted into the National Association of Evangelicals in the mid-1940s. Evangelicals extended further openness toward Pentecostals in the 1960s with the rise of the CHARISMATIC MOVEMENT. Today the PAOC is an active participant in the Evangelical Fellowship of Canada, taking a leading role among its evangelical counterparts.

Address:

Pentecostal Assemblies of Canada
2450 Milltower Ct.
Mississauga, Ontario L5N 5Z6
Canada
<http://www.paoc.org/>

Irving A. Whitt

Sources:

- Atter, G. F. The Third Force. Peterborough, Ontario: College Press, 1965, 1970.
- Holm, Randall. “A Paradigmatic Analysis of Authority Within Pentecostalism.” Ph.D. dissertation, University of Lavel, 1995. Posted at <http://www.epbc.edu/rholm/holmphd.htm>. Accessed December 30, 2001.
- Kydd, R. A. N. “Pentecostal Assemblies of Canada.” In Dictionary of Pentecostal and Charismatic Movements, edited by Stanley M. Burgess and Gary B. McGee. Grand Rapids, MI: Zondervan Publishing House, 1988.
- . “The Canadian ‘Azusa’: The Hebden Mission in Toronto.” Pneuma 8, 1 (1986): 5–30.
- Miller, Thomas W. Canadian Pentecostals: A History of the Pentecostal Assemblies of Canada. Mississauga, Ontario: Full Gospel Publishing House, 1994.

Pentecostal Assemblies of the World

1004

Claiming to be the oldest of the “Apostolic” or “Jesus Only” churches, the Pentecostal Assemblies of the World was organized as a loose fellowship by several people who had experienced the Pentecostal blessing (with the accompanying phenomenon of speaking-in-tongues at the revival occurring at the Apostolic Faith Mission on Azusa Street in Los Angeles). In 1913, at a Pentecostal camp meeting in Los Angeles, a Canadian minister, R. E. McAlister (d. 1953) talked about the belief he had arrived at from his study of the Bible, namely that the commonly used trinitarian baptismal formula was unbiblical. He asserted that baptism should be in the name of Jesus. Two prominent ministers, Frank J. Ewart (1876–1947) and John C. Scheppe, immediately accepted the idea. Soon other leading ministers such as Garfield Thomas Hayward (1880–1931), E. N. Bell (1866–1923), Glenn A. Cook, and H. A. Goss, signaled their acceptance of it.

The new perspective on baptism led to the development of a new form of Pentecostalism, which denied the traditional Christian idea of the Trinity with an understanding of Jesus as identical with God the Father and the Holy Spirit as the power of God/Jesus. Baptism by immersion in the name of Jesus is considered essential for salvation.

In 1914, a number of unaffiliated Pentecostal leaders gathered in Little Rock to form the Assemblies of God. In the meantime, those who had allied themselves with the Pentecostal Assemblies had been holding their annual meetings in Indianapolis where Thomas G. Hayward, an African American, had emerged as the popular leader. Over the next year the two organizations would go their separate ways as the Assemblies of God adopted a Trinitarian position and the Pentecostal Assemblies moved into the Apostolic camp. The Pentecostal Assemblies also differed from the Assemblies of God in its interracial makeup. The Assemblies of God was, in fact, a fellowship of white Americans distinguished from the earlier predominantly African American group, the Church of God in Christ.

Through the decades of the twentieth century, in spite of significant pressure to split along racial lines, the Pentecostal Assemblies remained committed to its interracial character. A major challenge came in 1924 when many of the white members withdrew to form what became the United Pentecostal Church International. The remaining members reorganized with an episcopal polity and elected Hayward as the first presiding bishop. A second period of unrest followed Hayward’s death. However, in 1937, Samuel Grimes became the new presiding bishop. He would hold the office for the next three decades during which time the Assemblies experienced its greatest period of growth. It developed congregations across the United States and missions in Nigeria, Jamaica, the United Kingdom, Ghana and Egypt.

The current presiding bishop is Rev. Norman L. Wagner. As the twentieth century drew to a close, it reported 1.5 million members. Over 1,000 affiliated congregations were located outside of the United States. Today work is found in Germany, the United Kingdom, India, Togo, Nigeria, Liberia, Egypt, Sierra Leone, Zimbabwe, the Cook Islands, the Fiji Islands, Australia and New Zealand, Haiti, Jamaica, the Bahamas, and a number of the Caribbean islands. The church sponsors Aeon Bible School in Indianapolis, Indiana.

Address:

Pentecostal Assemblies of the World
3939 Meadows Dr.
Indianapolis, IN 46205
http://members.tripod.com/paw_inc/

Sources:

Dugas, Paul P., comp. The Life and Writings of Elder G. T. Haywood. Portland, OR: Apostolic Book Publishers, 1968.
Golder, Morris E. History of the Pentecostal Assemblies of the World. Indianapolis, IN: self-published, 1973.
———. The Life and World of Bishop Garfield Thomas Hayward. Indianapolis, IN: self-published, 1977.

Pentecostal Church of Chile

The Pentecostal Church of Chile (Iglesia Pentecostal de Chile) was founded in 1945 by former members of the METHODIST PENTECOSTAL CHURCH OF CHILE under the leadership of Bishop Enrique Chavez Campos. The church’s strongest early presence was in the city of Curicó, some 150 miles south of Santiago. Like its parent body, the church experienced significant growth in the last half of the twentieth century through its intensive evangelistic efforts among the poorer people of the country. By the mid-1980s it reported ninety thousand members.

The church resembles the Methodist Pentecostal Church in doctrine, but it has a commitment to Christian unity and thus has joined the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES, which is considered a very liberal body by many Pentecostal churches. The highest legislative body of the church is its general assembly. It elects the bishops and an executive committee who lead the church between assembly meetings. The bishops appoint the pastors to their posts.

The church is committed to dealing with the problems of poverty in Chile and with the educational needs of the nation’s youth. It supports the work of Evangelical Christian Aid in promoting social action programs among the poor, including agricultural education, skills training for women, and free-lunch facilities for the children of the poor.

Address:

Pentecostal Church of Chile
Calle Rodriguez 1177
Casilla 775
Curicó
Chile

Source:

Van der Bent, Ans J., ed. Handbook/Member Churches/World Council of Churches. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 1985.

Pentecostal Church of God

John C. Sinclair, a former Presbyterian originally from Scotland who pastored the “first Pentecostal church in Chicago,” went to the gathering of Pentecostal leaders held at Hot Springs, Arkansas, in 1914 and was appointed to the Executive Presbytery of the ASSEMBLIES OF GOD, as was George Brinkman. Five years later, on December 30, 1919, seven ministers and a few church delegates met in Chicago to organize as the Pentecostal Assemblies of the U.S.A. Sinclair emerged as general chairman, Brinkman as secretary, and J. A. Bell as treasurer.

Brinkman owned and operated the Herald Publishing Company, which beginning in 1913 published a monthly publication called the Pentecostal Herald. The Pentecostal Herald was accepted as the official publication of the Pentecostal Assemblies. In 1922 the name Pentecostal Church of God (PCG) replaced Pentecostal Assemblies of the U.S.A. In 1926 the Messenger Printing Company was established in Ottumwa, Iowa, by A. D. McClure, who now edited the Pentecostal Messenger, which in 1927 became the church’s official organ. Sinclair did not continue to associate with the church after its headquarters were relocated to Ottumwa.

In 1933 the PCG adopted a doctrinal statement. It had been previously thought that the 1914 meeting compromised the sovereignty of the local congregation and that the 1916 Assemblies of God Statement of Fundamental Truths was a move toward conventional ecclesiasticism. In 1950 the headquarters were moved to Joplin, Missouri. Across the street from the headquarters now sits Messenger College, which had opened in 1958 in Houston as Southern Bible College.

The PCG grants ordination to women ministers. Early on, the church adopted a view of divorce that allowed remarried people to become ministers, a position that barred the PCG from the Pentecostal Fellowship of North America (now Pentecostal/Charismatic Churches of North America) and the PENTECOSTAL WORLD FELLOWSHIP. The PCG will give the full range of licenses—from exhorters to ordained ministers—to divorced and remarried people on three grounds: (1) the divorce occurred prior to the first conversion experience, (2) fornication was the grounds for divorce, or (3) desertion was the grounds for divorce. A 1997 review of this policy on credentialing ministers who are divorced and remarried suggested that naming desertion implies that the spouse was not a Christian. The first point was also debated because many people report their first conversion in childhood. The question was, should the adult conversion, after one “backslides,” be definitive in such cases? And if only adult conversion matters, at what age is one an adult? In 1993 the denomination started naming apostles in their official list of ministers.

J. W. May, general superintendent of the PCG from June 1942 to June 1947, had been present in the meeting held by Charles Fox Parham (1875–1929), the original Pentecostal minister, in Topeka, Kansas, in 1901. R. Dennis Heard (1953–1975) was instrumental in leading the PCG into the National Association of Evangelicals, the Pentecostal Fellowship of North America, and the Pentecostal World Fellowship. The current general superintendent is James D. Gee.

In 1997 the PCOG reported 45,000 members in the United States and some 350,000 members in 238 countries worldwide. Its strongest missionary activity is in East Africa, Europe (especially Russia), East Asia, Mexico, Argentina, and the Caribbean.

Address:

Pentecostal Church of God
4901 Pennsylvania Ave.
Joplin, MO 64801
<http://www.pcg.org/>

Harold D. Hunter

Sources:

Martin, Larry. In the Beginning. Duncan, OK: Christian Life Books, 1994.
Moon, Elmer L. The Pentecostal Church: A History and Popular Survey. New York: Carlton Press, 1966.

The Pentecostal Mission

The Pentecostal Mission (TPM) was founded by an Indian later known as Pastor Paul (his surname is not found in any documents), a Hindu convert from the Ezhava caste, when he was employed in Sri Lanka in 1921. It was incorporated by an act of the Parliament of Ceylon in 1970 and originally called the Ceylon Pentecostal Mission (CPM) in India and Sri Lanka. The name of the denomination in India was changed in 1984 to The Pentecostal Mission probably to avoid any charge of extraterritorial affinity in the light of Tamil-Singhalese problems in Sri Lanka.

The denomination may be the only one of Indian origin that has both spread to different countries and established churches among the native residents. (The INDIAN PENTECOSTAL CHURCH OF GOD, whose origins parallel this movement, is also worldwide, but its membership is limited to the Indian diaspora.) The Pentecostal Mission has centers/branches in Malaysia, Singapore, France, the United Kingdom, the United States, Canada, the West Indies (Puerto Rico and the Dominican Republic), Sierra

Pentecostal Mission Church

Leone, Australia, Papua New Guinea, Nepal, Fiji, Mexico, El Salvador, Costa Rica, Kenya, and Switzerland. In each of these countries, it is known by a different name (for example, in the United States it is known as the New Testament Church).

Unlike most of the classical Pentecostal denominations contemporaneous with it, the mission is very conservative and takes a literal approach to the Bible, which it interprets from a dispensational perspective. The movement strongly advocates an ascetic life for its workers that includes a very strict dress code and strict obedience and submission to the elders. All workers are subject to the authority of the chief pastor.

The international headquarters of the denomination in Chennai (Madras) is also the office of the chief pastor, who is considered to be the "supreme spiritual head of the Mission throughout the world." The chief pastor "nominates a pastor to supervise the Church work in each country who shall carry out his function in consultation with the Chief Pastor." The international annual convention held in Chennai (Madras) draws thousands from all over India and representatives from all over the world.

Paulson Pulikottil

Sources:

- Martin, Paul C. "A Brief History of the Ceylon Pentecostal Church." In Christianity Is Indian: The Emergence of an Indigenous Community, edited by Roger E. Hedlund, 437–444. Delhi: ISPCK, 2000.
- Pastor Paul*. Chennai: Pentecostal Press Trust, 1986.
- The Pentecostal Mission. Rules and Regulations of the Church. Chennai: Pentecostal Press Trust, n.d.

Pentecostal Mission Church

The Pentecostal Mission Church (Misión Iglesia Pentecostal) is one of more than one hundred independent churches that originated with the METHODIST PENTECOSTAL CHURCH OF CHILE (MPCC), the largest of the Protestant/Free Church communities in Chile. In 1933 the MPCC experienced its first schism, which led to the formation of the Evangelical Pentecostal Church. The Pentecostal Mission Church was formed in 1952 by 125 members of the Evangelical Pentecostal Church, second in Chile only to the MPCC.

The church manifested an immediate readiness to cooperate with other Christian groups in serving the needs of the poorer people of Chile, who formed its major constituency. It immediately began to work with Evangelical Christian Aid, best known for its food distribution program, but also branched out to provide a number of social services, from education to improving agriculture. The church was one of several Pentecostal churches in 1967 to cooperate with the Methodists and Anglicans to found the Evangelical Theological Community of Chile, an ecumenical training center.

Like the PENTECOSTAL CHURCH OF CHILE, the Pentecostal Mission Church placed an emphasis on Christian unity that led it to affiliate with the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES. The church has taken the lead in exploring innovative approaches to Christian education, theological reflection, and pastoral care. In 1985 it reported twelve thousand members.

Address:

Pentecostal Mission Church
Passy 032, Casilla 238 C.3
Santiago
Chile

Source:

- Harmon, Nolan B. Encyclopedia of World Methodism. 2 vols. Nashville, TN: United Methodist Publishing House, 1974.

Pentecostal World Fellowship

After World War II many people wished to organize in some collective way the large amount of relief work and assistance being given to the suffering Pentecostal churches of Europe and to carry out the further rehabilitation work still needed. Added to this was the continuing fight in some countries for full religious freedom for Pentecostal believers and the hope that a worldwide conference could speak and act with more authority and influence with the governments concerned.

In September 1946 a world Pentecostal conference was called in Zurich, Switzerland, from May 6 to May 9, 1947. Leonard Steiner, the pastor of the Basel Church, acted as organizing secretary. Several European countries were represented.

Judging by the enthusiasm of the participants, the conference was a great success. Starting on May 5, large public meetings were held each evening in the Zurich city hall, which seated two thousand and was packed night after night. On May 11, the closing meetings were held in the famous Congress Hall, and the crowd of about three thousand was augmented by special trainloads of additional participants.

The work of the conference involved several key issues. First, it was agreed to appoint Leonard Steiner as the chairman, and he won quick approval by his tact and unrivaled knowledge of the three official languages, English, German, and French. He was assisted by Donald Gee (1891–1966), Lewi Pethrus (1884–1974), K. Schneider, and Ernest S. Williams (1885–1981).

The conference was deeply moved by the reports from the needy European countries, but a serious division arose over the best method for helping. The large Scandinavian Pentecostal churches have always steadily opposed any organization beyond that of the local assembly. A compromise was found in recognizing the Basel Church as an international center for coordinating relief work. Leonard Steiner undertook to superintend this work. The Basel office eventually opened on December 1, 1947.

The conference participants also decided to establish a magazine. Donald Gee was asked to do the editing and publication. The first issue of the new world magazine appeared in September 1947, Pentecost, and became World Pentecost in 1970. The magazine was discontinued in 1998.

René Fauvel served as host for the second meeting, which met in Paris in 1949. The meeting was held in a building that had an upstairs hall to accommodate the business sessions and a downstairs hall with seating for two thousand for public revival meetings. A key subject of discussion was the formation of some kind of world Pentecostal organization. The Scandinavians were there in force, and the northern European bloc emphatically opposed any organizational steps such as a mutual declaration of faith, election of officers, or anything from the tradition of the old denominations. Yet with equal vigor, those from other parts of the world desired such steps.

It was a surprise, then, that when the proposals for organizing were brought forward they were accepted unanimously. These stipulated that a World Pentecostal Conference should be held every three years in different parts of the world. For each conference, a secretary was to be elected, assisted by five advisors. It was emphasized that the committee should have no authority over individual movements or churches. South African minister David J. du Plessis (1905–1989) was unanimously elected as the first secretary.

At the London meeting of the conference in 1952, the theme “Into All The World” welcomed, for the first time, participants from Asia and Africa. At the 1955 meeting in Stockholm, under the theme “The Pentecostal Movement: A Revaluation,” Lewi Pethrus and the Swedish churches extended this welcome: “All accredited Pentecostal ministers will be members of the Conference by virtue of their personal status. The purposes of the Conference are not legislative but spiritual.”

The theme “The Purpose of God in the Pentecostal Movement for this Hour” was used in the 1958 meeting in Toronto, which was hosted by W. E. McAlister. Demos Shakarian (1913–1993), founder of the Full Gospel Business Men’s Fellowship International, was among the major speakers. The popular radio show Revivaltime was broadcast directly from the conference by the program’s host, C. M. Ward (1909–1996). About five thousand took part in a breaking of bread service, when Lewi Pethrus gave an address on the work of the Holy Spirit in the church.

Now called the Pentecostal World Conference, the group assembled in Jerusalem over Whitsuntide in 1961. The emphasis three years later in Helsinki was on world evangelization. Meetings were held in a “tent-cathedral” with a seating capacity of fifteen thousand. Speakers were asked to avoid reference to political issues, as it was stressed that the purpose of the conference was to “Magnify the Lord Jesus Christ.” A delicate matter occupying the minds of the leaders of the Pentecostal churches at the time was their relationship with the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES (WCC). Two small Pentecostal groups in Chile had been received in the recent WCC meeting in New Delhi, but it was clear that the overwhelming sentiment of those present in Helsinki was against joining the WCC.

The keynote address at the Nairobi meeting in 1982 was brought by conference chair Thomas F. Zimmerman, who cited figures from David Barrett’s newly published World Christian Encyclopedia. Zimmerman claimed that there were 62–100 million Pentecostals in the world, making them the largest single family of churches in world Protestantism. The theme was “Alive in the Spirit in Today’s World.” Reflecting upon the approaching end of the millennium, speakers offered little hope that the world could be changed before the Second Coming of Christ.

The most controversial message of the week was delivered by James A. Forbes, Jr., professor at New York’s Union Theological Seminary, who chided the world Pentecostal movement for its “drift toward pride and institutionalism” while occasionally supporting the “status quo of oppression and exploitation.” Forbes called on attendees to be “prophets” and further challenged Pentecostals to be “ecumenical.” Forbes’s message, though warmly applauded by the crowd, received a frosty reception from the platform.

Subsequent meetings have been held in Zürich (1985), Singapore (1989), Oslo (1992), Jerusalem (1995), and Seoul (1998). Zimmerman chaired the conference until 1989, when he was succeeded by Ray H. Hughes, who in turn was succeeded by Thomas Trask in 1998. A theology program track emerged at the 1995 gathering, which was augmented by a more substantive academic track during the sessions in 1988, hosted by the Yoido Full Gospel Church in Seoul, Korea, reportedly the largest Christian congregation in the world. The 2001 conference, planned as a celebration of the Pentecostal centennial, was hosted by Frederick K. C. Price at the Crenshaw Christian Center in Los Angeles, the site of the revival that launched Pentecostalism as a world movement. Most recently the Pentecostal World Conference changed its name to the Pentecostal World Fellowship.

Address:

The Pentecostal World Fellowship
1445 Boonville Ave.
Springfield, MO 65804
<http://www.pentecostalworldfellowship.org>

Harold D. Hunter

Sources:

Gee, Donald. Wind and Flame. Croydon, UK: Heath Press, 1967.
 Robeck, Cecil M. "Pentecostal World Conference." In Dictionary of Pentecostal and Charismatic Movements, edited by Stanley M. Burgess and Gary B. McGee, 707–710. Grand Rapids, MI: Zondervan Publishing House, 1988.

Pentecostalism

The Pentecostal movement developed at the beginning of the twentieth century, initially as a revitalization movement with the Holiness churches in the United States. The Holiness churches had placed a great emphasis upon the doctrine of perfection as derived from the teachings of John Wesley (1703–1791), the founder of METHODISM. This doctrine teaches that it is possible for Christian believers to be made perfect in love by an act of God, often described as the baptism of the Holy Spirit. However, within the Holiness churches the living of the holy life and perfection in love primarily is the keeping of a strict set of moral and behavioral codes. Many complained that the Holiness movement had fallen into legalism.

The first event of importance in the founding of the Pentecostal movement occurred at a Bible school in Topeka, Kansas, under the direction of former Methodist minister Charles F. Parham (1873–1929). After assigning his students to research the baptism of the Holy Spirit in the New Testament, Parham accepted their findings: that the baptism of the Holy Spirit was always accompanied by the experience of speaking in an unknown tongue. He then led his students in prayer for such an experience, and speaking in tongues began to be experienced on January 1, 1901. Agnes Ozman (1870–1937) was the first to speak in tongues, but eventually Parham and the others also received the baptism.

Parham began to preach about the baptism of the Holy Spirit through the south-central states. Then in 1906, one of his students, an African American preacher named William J. Seymour (1870–1922), took the teachings to Los Angeles, where a revival took place at an independent mission on Azusa Street. From this mission, the Pentecostal movement would spread across North America, and within a decade it was found around the world.

The original Pentecostal teachings built directly upon Holiness teachings. Pentecostalism offered to Holiness believers—who had already experienced sanctification as a second work of God's grace (their initial experience of faith in Christ being considered the first experience)—the baptism of the Holy Spirit and the accompanying experience of speaking in tongues as a third experience with God. Among Holiness Pentecostals, the experience of Holiness was considered a prerequisite for experiencing the baptism of the Holy Spirit. This understanding continues among such groups as the CHURCH OF GOD (CLEVELAND, TEN-NESSEE), the CHURCH OF GOD IN CHRIST, and the INTERNATIONAL PENTECOSTAL HOLINESS CHURCH.

Ghanaian visitors dance during a Pentecostal conference in London. (D. Butcher/TRIP)

Soon after the Pentecostal teachings emerged, a group of ministers dissented from the Holiness teachings and declared that the baptism of the Holy Spirit was available to every believer quite apart from the experience of sanctification. This perspective occasioned a split in the movement and resulted in new groups such as the ASSEMBLIES OF GOD.

Several years later, still another dissenting opinion was developed by ministers who rejected the orthodox understanding of the Christian doctrine of the Trinity. They placed a renewed emphasis on the Oneness of God and baptism in the name of Jesus, rather than in the name of the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit, which most churches follow. The Oneness or Apostolic churches are represented by such groups as the UNITED PENTECOSTAL CHURCH INTERNATIONAL and the PENTECOSTAL ASSEMBLIES OF THE WORLD.

The Pentecostal movement would find notable response in Scandinavia, Africa, and Latin America, where numerous independent Pentecostal churches would emerge. The Danish, Finnish, Norwegian, and Swedish Pentecostals would come to form the largest segment of Christians in those countries, apart from the state churches. In Africa, the ZIONIST AND APOSTOLIC CHURCHES would take the lead in the spread of Pentecostalism from South Africa north to the Sahara. Mexican believers at the Azusa Street Mission would take the movement to Mexico and Central America. In the last half of the twentieth century, Pentecostalism would become the major movement contesting the hegemony of Roman Catholicism across South America.

Pentecostals have found some international fellowship through the PENTECOSTAL WORLD FELLOWSHIP. The largest Christian congregation in the world is the YOIDO FULL GOSPEL CHURCH, a Pentecostal church in Seoul, South Korea. New life was given to Pentecostalism in the last decades of the twentieth century by the CHARISMATIC MOVEMENT.

Sources:

- Burgess, Stanley M., and Gary McGee, eds. Dictionary of Pentecostal and Charismatic Movements. Grand Rapids, MI: Regency Reference Library, 1988.
- Hollenweger, Walter J. Pentecostals: The Charismatic Movement in the Church. Minneapolis, MN: Augsburg, 1972.
- Hunter, Harold D. Spirit Baptism: A Pentecostal Alternative. Washington, DC: University Press of America, 1983.
- Synon, Vinson. The Century of the Holy Spirit: 100 Years of Pentecostal and Charismatic Renewal, 1901–2001. Nashville: Thomas Nelson, 2001.

Pentecostalism in Scandinavia

Pentecostalism, a Christian movement that emerged in the United States at the beginning of the twentieth century, spread around the globe in its first decade and through the century became an important force within the larger Christian community. It was carried to Scandinavia in 1907, and its new home became an important launching point for its development not only throughout Europe, but in both Africa and Latin America.

In 1906 Thomas B. Barrett (1862–1940), a prominent minister in the Methodist Episcopal Church (now a constituent part of the UNITED METHODIST CHURCH) in Norway, visited the United States, where he came into contact with the burgeoning Pentecostal revival that had begun in Los Angeles. When he returned to Oslo, he became the voice of the revival there and of its keynote experience, the baptism of the Holy Spirit as evidenced by speaking in tongues. Barrett operated as an independent evangelist for the next decade, before formally resigning from the Methodist Church and founding the Filadelfia Church in Oslo.

In 1907 a youthful pastor from Stockholm, Sweden, Petrus Lewi Pethrus (1884–1974), traveled to Oslo to meet Barrett. He experienced the baptism of the Holy Spirit and returned home to share the experience with the Baptist Church he pastored. His church eventually accepted the new teachings, and from Stockholm the movement spread to other churches in Sweden. However, the Baptist Convention expelled Pethrus and the congregation in 1913, though the reason was ostensibly their practice of open communion rather than Pentecostalism.

Pethrus's congregation, also called the Filadelfia Church, would be the largest Pentecostal church in the world until it was overtaken by several in the Third World, such as the YOIDO FULL GOSPEL CHURCH in South Korea. Pethrus founded a number of publishing ventures and a Bible school, and he went on to become the most prominent Pentecostal leader in northern Europe. His Filadelfia church became the center of the Pentecostal Revival movement (Pingstväckelsen), now the third largest religious group in Sweden. It commissioned missionaries who carried Pentecostalism to Africa and Latin America, where many churches developed under the name Assemblies of God (often confused with the American body of the same name). The Swedish Pentecostal assemblies have, like their American counterparts, evolved as a congregationally governed body.

Pentecostalism spread to Denmark as the result of the efforts of a prominent Danish actress, Anna Larssen (1879–1955). In 1908, she went to Oslo and under Barrett's preaching received the baptism of the Holy Spirit. Upon her return to Copenhagen, she began to hold Pentecostal meetings in her large home. She gave up her acting career in 1909 and in 1919 married Sigurd Bjorner, at the time the general secretary of the Danish YMCA. They traveled the country as evangelists, and congregations began to emerge out of their efforts. Then in 1919, while in Sweden, the couple submitted to rebaptism, which led to their exclusion from the Church of Denmark. In 1923 they brought the association of churches that they had raised up into fellowship with the APOSTOLIC CHURCH, headquartered in England. They broke relations with the Apostolic Church in the 1930s, and the fellowship continued as the Pentecostal Movement in Denmark (Pinsebevaegelsen).

Pentecostalism would spread to Finland within a few years, and the original groups, called the Pentecostal Revival of Finland (Helluntai Ystävät), were founded in 1911. The movement emerged in Iceland after World War I.

Besides bringing Pentecostalism to Scandinavia, Thomas Barrett also influenced its emergence in other European countries. Among those who came to Oslo to meet Barrett was Alexander A. Boddy (1854–1930), an British Anglican priest who had been active in the Welsh Revival of 1904. After his 1907 visit, Boddy brought the Pentecostal experience to the United Kingdom and was later active in the formation of the Pentecostal Missionary Union, the first Pentecostal organization in the country. About the same time, two Norwegian women who had become Pentecostals traveled to Kassel, Germany, where they held meetings for the Evangelical (Lutheran) congregation headed by Heinrich Dallmeyer. These meetings were widely reported in the press. Dallmeyer at first supported the revival that broke out but later renounced it. In spite of condemnation by Dallmeyer and other Evangelical leaders, the revival spread and eventually led to the formation of a spectrum of German Pentecostal groups such as the MÜLHEIM ASSOCIATION OF CHRISTIAN FELLOWSHIPS.

Barrett stands out as the fountainhead of the Pentecostal World Conference as in 1911 he wrote "An Urgent Call for Charity and Unity," in which he sought a manifestation of the unity of the spreading Pentecostal movement. This call would lead to initial attempts at international fellowship gatherings that culminated in the European Pentecostal Conference held in Stockholm in 1939, on the eve of World War II. The effort led to the holding of the triennial gatherings of the World Pentecostal Conference, beginning in 1946. Scandinavian countries have regularly taken their turn in hosting the conference.

Sources:

- Bloch-Hoell, Nils. The Pentecostal Movement. Oslo: Oslo University Press, 1964.
- Bundy, David D. "Thomas B. Barrett and Byposten: An Early Pentecostal Leader and His Periodical." In Pentecost, Mission and Ecumenism: Essays on Intercultural Theology, edited by Jan A. B. Jongeneel, 115–122. Frankfurt am Main: Peter Lang, 1992.
- Burgess, Stanley M., and Gary McGee, eds. Dictionary of Pentecostal and Charismatic Movements. Grand Rapids, MI: Regency Reference Library, 1988.
- Elbert, Paul, ed. Essays on Apostolic Themes. Peabody, MA: Hendrickson Publishers, 1985.
- Hollenweger, Walter J. Pentecostalism: Origins and Developments Worldwide. Peabody, UK: Hendrickson, 1997.
- Lindberg, Alf. "The Swedish Pentecostal Movement: Some Ideological Features." European Pentecostal Theological Association Journal 6, 2 (1987): 40–45.
- Matre, Frank. "A Synopsis of Norwegian Pentecostal History." European Pentecostal Theological Association Journal 9, 2–3 (1990): 53–62.
- Synan, Vinson. The Century of the Holy Spirit: 100 Years of Pentecostal and Charismatic Renewal. Nashville, TN: Thomas Nelson, 2001.

People of God (Paraguay)

Leonor Paredes ("Brother José," 1898–1970) was born in Villarica, Paraguay, in 1898. He received the baptism of the Holy Spirit in 1940 and moved to Argentina, where he worked for twenty years as an independent Pentecostal preacher. Following a prophetic warning, in 1963 he returned to Paraguay, where he established the People of God (Pueblo de Dios) community in Repatriación, a village located some 150 miles from the capital city, Asunción. Initially, the community comprised twenty-two families. Brother José died in 1970; his successor as leading elder was Mariano Bobadilla ("Brother Luke," 1915–1991), who had converted following a miraculous cure attributed to Brother José's "key of prayer" in Laguna Blanca, Argentina, in 1946.

Brother Luke's administration fell during a difficult time for Paraguay, then ruled by dictator General Alfredo Stroessner (b. 1912). The regime regarded the People of God as a "cult," potentially "Communist" due to its communal structure. Persecution followed, and several leaders, including Brother Luke, were arrested. The group managed to survive, thanks particularly to Carlos Marcial Russo Cantero, a distinguished law professor at the National University in Asunción. He was a lawyer and politician who not only successfully represented Brother Luke and other leaders in court but was eventually so impressed by their message that he too converted to the People of God. He joined its Santo Domingo Libertador congregation in Lambaré (near Asunción), the largest in the country after the Central Congregation in Repatriación. It was in this same community of Lambaré that Brother Luke died in 1991.

His successor was Severiano Estigarribia ("Brother Elias," 1931–1995), who managed to obtain legal recognition for the community in Paraguay according to Presidential Decree No. 14336 of July 28, 1992. Brother Elias died unexpectedly in 1995, and Andrés Fretes ("Brother Juan," b. 1941) was recognized as leading elder in his place. Fretes had been a successful missionary to Brazil, which, together with Argentina, Uruguay, Colombia, and Italy, was the main missionary field for the People of God. In 1996 he supervised the establishment of COPROSA (Cooperativa Multiactiva de Producción, Servicios Públicos, Consumo, Ahorros y Crédito San Andres, Ltda.), a cooperative enterprise that oversees most economic activities of the People of God.

People of God's theology is basically Pentecostal, although with some distinctive features. More than the insistence on demons and demonization (not uncommon in contemporary Pentecostalism), what is unique to the People of God is the practice of celibacy by a number of its members, although by no means all. The People of God emphasizes miracles, prophecy, the prophetic value of dreams, and the charismatic mission of Brother José and his successors. An important practice is the "key of prayer," whereby a prayer is repeated seven times while kneeling, followed by a spiritual conversation with God.

The daily life of the some five thousand church members living in Repatriación's Central Congregation includes communal singing, prayer, and work within a strict and rather austere lifestyle, often denounced by critics as "cultic." The work is mostly agricultural; the congregation grows cotton, corn, sunflowers, and soybeans. The Central Congregation includes schools, from kindergarten to high school, artistic and cultural centers, hospitals, and sports facilities. The leading elder (also called the leading apostle) oversees a hierarchy including twelve elder apostles and twelve lesser apostles; "messengers," or itinerant teachers, are also sent to the congregations in Paraguay and abroad.

Address:

People of God
2a Linea
Irrazabal Norte
Repatriación, Caaguazú
Paraguay

Source:

Cardozo Vera, Juan Diosnel. La Verdad sobre el Pueblo de Dios: Su historia, organización y doctrina. Asunción: Pueblo de Dios, 1999.

Peoples Temple

Peoples Temple was a multiracial utopian group, best known for the 1978 murders and suicides of over nine hundred members living in its agricultural project in Jonestown, Guyana. Originally incorporated in 1955 as Wings of Deliverance in Indianapolis, Indiana, by its charismatic leader James “Jim” Warren Jones (1931–1978), the organization was soon called Peoples Temple and attracted an interracial congregation. A vision of nuclear holocaust prompted Jones to move his family to Brazil in the early 1960s and then to relocate the congregation to northern California in 1965. About forty members followed Jones to Redwood Valley, where they ran homes for retarded youth, convalescent centers, and senior care facilities. From there the group evangelized the urban poor in San Francisco, opening a church in the heart of the Black ghetto in 1970 and dedicating a third branch in Los Angeles in 1972. The group officially joined the Disciples of Christ (Christian Church) in 1959, and by 1978 it was the largest congregational contributor in the denomination. At its height, the temple claimed to have five thousand members. Although Jones preached a social gospel message in a dynamic Pentecostal style that attracted Black churchgoers, a small cadre of young White leaders adopted a socialistic philosophy of egalitarianism and communalism.

In 1976 Peoples Temple signed a lease with the government of Guyana, a former British colony on the north coast of South America, to develop 3,852 acres of jungle in the interior. A small group of pioneers had already begun clearing land in 1974 in Guyana’s northwest district, close to the Venezuelan border. In the summer of 1977, large numbers of Peoples Temple members emigrated from the United States and resettled in the Peoples Temple Agricultural Project, which soon became known as Jonestown. The project boasted a school, a library, a furniture-making facility, and a basketball court, as well as a large farm and quarters for livestock. Despite the intensive investment of human labor and financial capital, however, the group was unable to become self-sufficient, and by 1978 it was importing rice and other food to supplement what it produced.

As the church grew in membership and influence in the 1970s, controversies began to grow along with it. Former members described all-night sessions of confession and punishment—called catharsis—and gave accounts of phony faith healings, financial misdealings, voter fraud, and even extortion and murder. Opposition to the temple was organized by a group of former members and relatives of members called the Concerned Relatives. This group focused its efforts on a custody battle over John Victor Stoen, the son of Grace Stoen and the presumptive son of Jim Jones, who was living in Jonestown. Throughout 1976, 1977, and 1978, the Concerned Relatives contacted state and federal government agencies, the news media, lawyers, and members of Congress with their fears about what was happening to relatives in Peoples Temple and in Jonestown. The most dramatic report came from former member Deborah Layton (Blakey) in June 1978, who said that residents of Jonestown were conducting suicide drills and planned to die in a collective ritual.

Layton’s report prompted the visit of Congressman Leo J. Ryan to Jonestown in November 1978. Accompanied by news reporters and members of Concerned Relatives, the congressman left Jonestown on November 18 with a generally favorable impression of the community. As he and a group of sixteen defectors from Jonestown were preparing to depart from a nearby airstrip, however, a group of Jonestown residents opened fire, killing Ryan, three members of the media, and one defector. Back in Jonestown, Jones had assembled the community and, according to a tape made at the time, exhorted his followers to drink a mixture of cyanide, tranquilizers, and fruit punch. Although the tape reveals some opposition to the plan, there was a general consensus to go forward with the “revolutionary suicide,” which would send the message that people would rather die than live in a capitalistic system. In all, 921 people died on November 18, 1978: 5 people at the airstrip, 913 in Jonestown, and 3 in Georgetown, Guyana (a mother who killed her children and herself).

Questions remain about the deaths, including whether coercion was involved and whether U.S. officials provoked the incident. A body of conspiracy theories has arisen to explain various gaps and discrepancies in the official story. The release of currently classified government documents may answer some questions, but the ultimate mystery will remain: How could people be persuaded to kill their parents and their children?

Rebecca Moore

Sources:

- Hall, John R. Gone from the Promised Land: Jonestown in American Cultural History. New Brunswick, NJ: Transaction Books, 1987.
- Maaga, Mary. Hearing the Voices of Jonestown. Syracuse, NY: Syracuse University Press, 1998.
- Moore, Rebecca. A Sympathetic History of Jonestown. Lewiston, NY: Edwin Mellen Press, 1985.
- Reiterman, Tim, with John Jacobs. Raven: The Untold Story of The Rev. Jim Jones and His People. New York: Dutton, 1982.
- Religious Studies Department at San Diego State University. “Alternative Considerations of Jonestown and Peoples Temple.” Posted at <http://www-rohan.sdsu.edu/~remoore/jonestown/>. Accessed November 6, 2001.

Perfect Liberty Kyōdan

1012

Perfect Liberty Kyōdan was founded in Japan in 1946, although its teachings reach back to 1912, when Kanada Tokumitsu (1863–1919) founded Shinto Tokumitsu-Ko (the Divine Wat), drawing elements from both Shintoism and Shingon Buddhism. He incorporated an emphasis on art and nature as well as a healing ritual called Ofurikae (the power of temporarily curing illness). Among those who received the benefits of this healing work was Miki Tokuharu (1871–1938), who joined Kanada’s movement and became a fervent disciple.

In the period immediately prior to his death in the early 1920s, Kanada urged Tokuharu to pray that the remaining precepts of the religion be revealed to him, and after receiving the revelation, to found a new organization that incorporated them. Tokuharu followed his teacher’s urging and in 1924 founded Tokumitsu Kyokai (in 1931 changing the name to Hitonomichi Kyokai).

In 1937, as World War II began, the Japanese government ordered Tokuharu to disband his religion, which conflicted with official Shinto beliefs at several points. Shortly thereafter, both Tokuharu and his son Miki Tokuchita (1900–1983) were arrested. Upon their release they refounded the religion under the name of Perfect Liberty Kyōdan, or Church of Perfect Liberty. Observers have noticed that of all the new Japanese religions to emerge after World War II, only this one chose to be known by an English name.

The basic perspective of the church is simple. It advises members to create a way of living that embodies the precept “Life is Art.” The accomplishment of this way of living is a state of “Perfect Liberty,” or total mental freedom. Such a life is characterized by creativity, balance, and aesthetic expression on both a personal and a social level. The way to freedom is summarized in the Twenty-One Precepts and Twenty-One Principles received by Kanada and Tokuharu. The artistic life finds expression in the asamairi, a morning service in which the pledge to the artistic life is renewed. August 1, Founder’s Day, is the church’s major annual holiday, celebrated with massive displays of art in its various forms.

Perfect Liberty headquarters are located in Osaka, Japan. Nearby in the Habikino Hills is the 590-foot Perfect Liberty Peace Tower, memorializing those who have died as a result of war. The movement reports some five hundred centers and 1 million members in Japan. Churches are also found in the United States, Canada, Brazil, Paraguay, Argentina, Peru, France, and Australia. By far the largest overseas community (350,000 members) is found in Brazil.

Address:

Perfect Liberty Kyōdan
2172–1 Shindou
Tondabayashi, Osaka 584–8651
Japan
<http://web.perfect-liberty.or.jp/>

Sources:

- Bach, Marcus. The Power of Perfect Liberty. Englewood Cliffs, NJ: Prentice-Hall, 1971.
- Clarke, Peter. A Bibliography of Japanese New Religious Movements with Annotations and an Introduction to Japanese New Religions at Home and Abroad. Richmond, Surrey, UK: Japan Library, 1999.
- Perfect Liberty: Guide to Perfect Liberty*. Glendale, CA: PL North American Headquarters, 1975.

Peru

The land now demarked as the nation of Peru has been inhabited for several millennia by people who over the centuries differentiated themselves into various social and linguistic groupings. However, in the twelfth century C.E., a new empire arose out of the Peruvian highlands around Cuzco and began a process of unifying the people not only of Peru but of the neighboring regions along the Andes Mountains to the north (Quito) and the south (Argentina). Similarities still shared by the native peoples of Peru are in part accounted for by the dominance of the Incan culture until the coming of the Spanish in 1524.

When Spanish conquistador Francisco Pizarro (c. 1475–1541) found the empire, it was in the midst of a leadership dispute, a fact he utilized quickly to conquer the empire. The Spanish viceroyalty was established in 1542, but it took the next two centuries to completely pacify the land. Peru quickly became an important part of Spain’s colonial system because of the mining of precious metals. The development of large estates by wealthy Spanish settlers also contributed to its significance. The ruling elite resisted any changes that would affect their situation negatively, and only after Simón Bolívar (1783–1830) and José de San Martín (1778–1850) combined their armies and marched on the country in 1824 were the Spanish authorities driven out.

The modern state of Peru was largely the product of Ramón Castilla (1797–1867), under whose leadership slavery was abolished and a constitution adopted. The discovery of saltpeter in the desert in the extreme south of Peru and neighboring Bolivia appeared to signal the coming of an economic boom, but instead it brought war with Chile and led to the loss of the desert land, which now forms the top third of the Chilean state.

The development of a democratic government in Peru has been thwarted by the military on several occasions. A return to a civilian government in 1978 has been followed by regular elections. However, President Alberto Fujimori, a Japanese Peruvian elected president in 1990, abolished Parliament in 1992 while announcing that he would return to a more democratic mode as the country’s economic condition improved.

The traditional religions of the native Peruvians have survived, especially in the more remote areas of the country. Support for those who wish to resist efforts to convert them have received massive support from Europeans and North Americans who have discovered and placed their own overlay of belief onto ancient Peruvian sites. In particular, the ruins of Machu Picchu have become a pilgrimage spot for New Age believers who see it as a power spot of great significance. The so-called Nasca lines in the Peruvian desert have joined a variety of Peruvian archaeological artifacts as indicators of visitations to Earth by extraterrestrials, according to many who believe in regular contact with Earth by humanoid beings from outer space. Others have come to learn of the psychoactive substances used by some practitioners of traditional religions, although many who follow traditional practices do so against a backdrop of nominal Catholicism.

Catholicism remains the dominant religion in Peru. The Spanish introduced the ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH to Peru when they arrived in the 1520s. The initial diocese was erected at Cuzco in 1536, and the Diocese of Lima came five years later. Lima became the controlling metropolitan chair for the Pacific coast from Nicaragua to Chile. The church spread among the people during the next century and produced two outstanding leaders—Rose of Lima (1586–1617) and Martín de Porres (1579–1639)—both later canonized as saints.

Peru became independent in 1824, but only with Ramón Castilla's rise to power did Catholicism become the official state religion. The Catholic Church continued its hegemony over religion through the century. It has been a conservative body, both religiously and politically, although amid the changes in the decades after World War II, it developed a noteworthy stance against oppressive government systems of the kind that came and went in both Peru and neighboring countries. In 1971 it issued a document suggesting that evangelism had to be accompanied by a fight against the oppression of people by governments. Soon afterwards it condemned those who would use violence to build and perpetuate "Christian civilization."

Today, Peru is considered overwhelmingly Catholic, but the church has suffered from an inability to recruit priests.

Status of religions in Peru, 2000-2050

Followers	2000			2025	2050
	total	%	rate
Christians	24,949,000	97.2	1.72	34,228,000	40,262,000
Roman Catholics	24,550,000	95.7	1.69	33,000,000	38,000,000
Protestants	1,480,000	5.8	2.03	2,800,000	3,800,000
Independents	456,000	1.8	2.22	775,000	1,100,000
Nonreligious	312,000	1.2	5.10	700,000	1,250,000
Ethnoreligionists	156,000	0.6	0.86	180,000	200,000
Neoreligionists	81,100	0.3	3.06	130,000	180,000
Buddhists	57,700	0.2	2.52	100,000	150,000
Atheists	38,000	0.2	2.39	75,000	100,000
Baha'is	36,500	0.1	2.68	60,000	90,000
Chinese folk-religionists	16,900	0.1	1.89	22,000	28,000
Jews	9,100	0.0	1.28	12,000	15,000
Muslims	650	0.0	2.61	1,500	2,500
other religionists	4,300	0.0	2.71	10,000	15,000
Total population	25,662,000	100.0	1.75	35,518,000	42,292,000

That has led to an inability to provide pastoral services, resulting in a very low participation level from its nominal membership.

Protestants were allowed to worship in Peru throughout the nineteenth century, but they were not allowed to proselytize. Members of the CHURCH OF ENGLAND (now a part of the ANGLICAN PROVINCE OF THE SOUTHERN CONE OF AMERICA) began work in 1849 under these conditions. The first resident Protestant missionaries, American Methodists, did not arrive until 1877. In 1888, a Bible Society agent, Francisco Penzotti (1851–1925), became the first Protestant to build a significant following, for which he spent various periods in jail. In the meantime the Methodists began to create a school system. Additional Evangelical groups arrived in the 1890s, including the SEVENTH-DAY ADVENTIST CHURCH, which found success among the Aymara people.

Philadelphia Church of God

Pentecostals entered Peru very early, with representatives of the ASSEMBLIES OF GOD coming in 1911. It has become the largest non-Catholic group in the country. Its success has been extended by the arrival of a host of other Pentecostal bodies from North America, Europe (Sweden), and other South American countries, most notably Chile. As could be expected, a number of independent indigenous Pentecostal churches have also arisen. The range of non-Pentecostal Evangelical churches includes the CHRISTIAN AND MISSIONARY ALLIANCE, the WESLEYAN CHURCH, THE SALVATION ARMY, the Evangelical Lutheran Synod, and the CHURCH OF GOD (ANDERSON, INDIANA). Baptist missions were initially opened in 1921, though Baptists had participated earlier in some of the independent missions.

Evangelical elements have dominated the non-Catholic Christian community. In 1940 the National Evangelical Council of Peru was founded to include all Protestant churches and Free Church missionary efforts, but it soon became the victim of the split between Evangelicals, who were predominately focused on missionary activity, and the older Protestant churches interested in building ecumenical relationships. Today in Peru there is no ecumenical organization related to the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES (WCC) or the WORLD EVANGELICAL ALLIANCE. The Methodist Church of Peru is the only church headquartered in Peru that is a member of the WCC.

The Jewish community of Peru can be traced to Marranos who immigrated to Peru from Spain, but only in the last century did a visible Jewish community come into existence. It includes both Sephardic and Ashkanazi segments. Most of the approximately five thousand Peruvian Jews live in Lima, where there are orthodox synagogues for the Ashkanazim, the Sephardic, and for LUBAVITCH HASIDISM, and are associated together in the Chabad-Lubavitch Synagogue and Communal Center.

Peru has benefited from the immigration of Japanese from around the Pacific; the Japanese community in Peru is the second largest in South America (behind Brazil). Japanese immigrants have established centers for a variety of Buddhist and Japanese new religious groups. SOKA GAKKAI INTERNATIONAL stood out early as the first group to begin proselytizing outside of the Japanese community. There is also a JODO-SHINSHU temple in Lima.

The BAHÁ'Í FAITH found its early success in the Cuzco area and in the 1970s expanded rapidly among the Quechua people. The Western Esoteric tradition has been represented by the ANCIENT AND MYSTICAL ORDER ROSAE CRUCIS and the ANTHROPOSOPHICAL SOCIETY. There are also centers of UNIVERSAL LIFE—The Inner Religion, the Sawan Ruhani Mission, and DIAMOND WAY BUDDHISM. The small Muslim community of Peru gathers at the Asociación Islámica del Peru.

Sources:

- Alonso, I., et al. La Iglesia en Perú y Bolivia. Fribourg, Switzerland: FERES, 1962.
- Carreras, J. M. Las nuevas sectas en el Peru. Lima, Peru: Compañía, 1983.
- Kessler, J. B. A., Jr. A Study of the Older Protestant Missions and Churches in Peru and Chile. Goes, the Netherlands: Oosterbaan le Cointre, 1967.
- Klaiber, J. L. Religion and Revolution in Peru, 1824–1976. Leiden, the Netherlands: E. J. Brill, 1979.

Philadelphia Church of God

The Philadelphia Church of God was founded in 1989 by Gerald Flurry, a pastor in the WORLDWIDE CHURCH OF GOD (WCOG). Flurry was dismayed by the WCOG's movement away from the teachings of its founder, Herbert W. Armstrong (1892–1986), after Armstrong's death in 1986, and he was particularly worried by the decision of the new pastor general Joseph W. Tkach Sr. (1927–1995) to cease publication of Armstrong's last book, Mystery of the Ages, about which Armstrong had said, "It may be the most important book since the Bible." Tkach's son Joe Jr. (b. 1951) (himself later to be pastor general of the WCOG) told Flurry that the book was "riddled with error."

Flurry left the WCOG to found the Philadelphia Church of God, which like most of the other offshoots of the WCOG believes in seven Church eras, of which the most faithful to God is the Philadelphia Church, as described in the Bible—"... for thou hast a little strength, and hast kept my word, and hast not denied my name" (Rev. 3:8b AV). The WCOG, according to the Philadelphia Church and most other offshoots, has become the Laodicean Church—"... because thou art lukewarm ... I will spue thee out of my mouth" (Rev. 3:16 AV).

Flurry distributed copies of Mystery of the Ages to inquirers, and when the church ran out in 1997, he had further copies printed. The WCOG challenged this as a violation of its copyright. A landmark district court judgment in favor of the Philadelphia Church of God in 1997, which distinguished between a religion as believers and a religion as a corporation, was overturned by a court of appeals in 2000. Philadelphia's request to the U.S. Supreme Court for a further appeal was turned down in 2001, though they are still determined to gain the right to distribute the book, which they regard as fundamental to their ministry.

Like most of the offshoots of the WCOG, the Philadelphia Church, which is sabbatarian and millenarian, claims that its teachings are those of the WCOG at the time of Armstrong's death. Unlike most of the other offshoots, Philadelphia also claims new revelations that "prove" that it is the legitimate successor to the WCOG. The Philadelphia Church of God is the most hard-line of the major offshoots of the Worldwide Church of God. It believes that Herbert W. Armstrong was the End Time Elijah as foretold in the Scriptures (Matt. 17:11), that the “apostasy” of the WCOG is also prophesied, as is the rise of the Philadelphia Church of God under Gerald Flurry, who claims that his own book about the apostasy of the WCOG, Malachi’s Message, is the “little book” mentioned in Revelations 10.

Although the church is happy to send its literature to any inquirers, it is not favorably disposed toward researchers and academics. It is believed to have had around 7,500 members at its height, and although this has probably been reduced by the secession of several senior ministers because of Flurry’s perceived authoritarianism, with the subsequent formation of further offshoot churches, it is still the second or third largest offshoot from the WCOG.

Flurry is heard on the Key of David radio show. The Philadelphia Church has an estimated six thousand members.

Address:

Philadelphia Church of God
P.O. Box 3700
Edmond, OK 73083
<http://www.keyofdavid.org>

David V. Barrett

Sources:

- Barrett, David V. The New Believers. London: Cassell, 2001.
Flurry, Gerald. Malachi’s Message to God’s Church Today. Edmond, OK: Philadelphia Church of God, 1990, 1995.
———. Worldwide Church of God Doctrinal Changes and the Tragic Results. Edmond, OK: Philadelphia Church of God, 1994.
The Journal: News of the Churches of God. Big Sandy, TX: JMC Associates.
Tkach, Joseph. Transformed by Truth. Sisters, OR: Multnomah Books, 1997.

Philippine Independent Church

In 1898 the United States took control of the Philippines from Spain. Some Filipinos, wishing for their country’s full independence, staged a revolt under the leadership of Emilio Aguinaldo (1869–1964). Aguinaldo in turn appointed Gregorio Aglipay (1860–1940) as a vicar general to head the ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH in the area of the country he controlled. In 1899 the archbishop of Manila excommunicated Aglipay, and he reorganized the church under his control as the Iglesia Filipina Independente (Philippine Independent Church, or PIC). Aglipay served as a leader in the rebel army and became a hero of the people in his failed endeavor to bring freedom to the country. After the revolt, he suffered another defeat when in 1906 the courts ordered most of the property being used by those loyal to him turned over to the Roman Catholic Church.

In spite of the loss of most of its property, the PIC survived in the atmosphere of religious freedom imposed on the islands by the Americans. In the meantime, Aglipay became influenced by Unitarian views, and the church opened itself to a rejection of its traditional Trinitarian theology. In 1939 Dr. Louis Cornish, president of the American Unitarian Association (now an integral part of the UNITARIAN UNIVERSALIST ASSOCIATION), was named the honorary president of the PIC. Aglipay died in 1940 and was succeeded by Isebelo de los Reyes (1864–1958), who was unsympathetic to the drift into Unitarianism. When the church reorganized in 1947, he led the church to adopt a new statement of faith that included a strong affirmation of the Trinity. The church also began to use the Apostles’ Creed and the Nicene Creed.

Reyes also led the church into a relationship with the EPISCOPAL CHURCH, the American representative of the ANGLICAN COMMUNION, which had established an Episcopal mission in the Philippines at the beginning of the century. In 1948 Episcopal bishops consecrated Reyes and two other PIC bishops, thus passing to them the Anglican lineage of apostolic succession. In 1959 the church followed members to the United States and, with the permission of the Episcopal bishop of Hawaii, opened their first foreign mission in Honolulu. As the church spread, its congregations met in local Episcopal parish facilities.

The church soon came into full relationship with the Episcopal Church, accepting the 1931 Bonn Agreement, which brought the Church of England into communion with the Old Catholic churches in Europe. Through that action the PIC came into communion with the EPISCOPAL CHURCH IN THE PHILIPPINES and the other churches of the worldwide Anglican Communion.

In 1985 the PIC reported 4.5 million members, most in the Philippines. More recent estimates acknowledge a far lower figure, approximately 2 million. The church is led by its supreme bishop, who is currently Thomas A. Millamena. The church ordained its first female priest in 1997.

In the 1970s, the church experienced problems growing out of the participation of its missionary bishop, Francisco Pagtakhan, and two other PIC bishops in the consecration of several individuals who had left the Episcopal Church to establish conservative Anglican churches in the United States. The first consecrations took place in 1978, and the new bishops went on to found the Anglican Catholic Church, the Diocese of Christ the King, and the United Episcopal Church of North America. The issues first raised by Pagtakhan’s actions culminated with the refusal of the church to reelect Marcario V. Ga as the supreme bishop. As a result, Ga led his followers out of the church and reorganized as the autonomous Philippine Independent Catholic Church.

Sources:

- Anderson, Gerald H., ed. Studies in Philippine Church History. Ithaca, NY: Cornell University Press, 1969.

Philippines

Deats, Richard L. Nationalism and Christianity in the Philippines. Dallas, TX: Southern Methodist University Press, 1967.

Philippines

The seven thousand islands of what is today the Philippines sprawl for approximately one thousand miles from the north to the south. Of these seven thousand islands only about one thousand are inhabited, and fewer than five hundred are larger than one square mile.

Diversity is perhaps the Philippines' most striking characteristic; the variety found in the flora, fauna, and terrain of these islands hosts a cultural and ethnic mosaic, and the Philippines are seen as an exemplar of human diversity. Scholars generally hold that the archipelago was once connected to the Asian continent by land bridges that were submerged over seven thousand years ago. It is believed that the proto-Malay people initially crossed over these bridges from Borneo. Although this is a matter of anthropological speculation, it is clear that successive migrations populated the islands as early as fifteen thousand years ago from the interior tribes of China.

Subsequent migrations from southern China and Vietnam brought stone and bronze tools and introduced rice farming and the water buffalo to the islands. These waves of early Chinese migrations settled in what is known today as Luzon, the northernmost island of the archipelago. Some two thousand years ago, Malays from both Indonesia and the west Malay Peninsula made their way to the central islands known as the Visayans. They brought a fishing culture that was structured around a small clan led by the clan chief. The barangay, the boat that brought them, became the name of the extended family unit that forms the basic political structure of society today in the Philippines.

By the middle of the fourteenth century C.E., Java, Sumatra, Malaya, Cambodia, Siam, and the Indochina states of Annam and Tonkin had entered into trade relations with the Philippines. The trade invariably left an imprint of Buddhist, Hindu, and Islamic religious culture on the Philippines. These traces can be seen in the Sanskrit loan words, such as dukkha (suffering), bodhi (soul), and katha (legend or story), that have been absorbed into the Tagalog language world. Recent archaeological evidence dated to the Status of religions in the Philippines, 2000-2050

Followers	2000		2025	2050
	total	% rate
Christians	68,151,000	89.7	2.23	96,611,000
Roman Catholics	62,570,000	82.4	2.15	87,400,000
Independents	14,330,000	18.9	2.52	22,000,000
Protestants	3,775,000	5.0	2.63	6,800,000
Muslims	4,729,000	6.2	2.48	7,000,000
Ethnoreligionists	2,050,000	2.7	2.51	2,600,000
Nonreligious	500,000	0.7	5.24	1,100,000
Baha'is	230,000	0.3	3.05	420,000
Atheists	140,000	0.2	2.47	300,000
Buddhists	97,700	0.1	2.02	160,000
Chinese folk-religionists	44,600	0.1	0.13	20,000
Neoreligionists	14,400	0.0	2.75	25,000
Confucianists	1,800	0.0	1.64	3,000
Hindus	1,500	0.0	2.39	3,500
Jews	1,000	0.0	1.62	1,200
other religionists	4,700	0.0	2.63	7,500
Total population	75,966,000	100.0	2.27	108,251,000

tenth century C.E. gives some credence to the arrival at that time of yet another culture—the Srivijaya Kingdom, a maritime power from Sumatra that dominated the Strait of Malacca.

Today Roman Catholicism is the dominant religion in the Philippines; it is claimed by about 80 percent of the population. The ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH was introduced in the islands in 1521, when Ferdinand Magellan (c. 1480–1521), a Portuguese explorer, led a Spanish expedition to the islands and planted the cross there, starting the Christianization of the native population. The systematic propagation of Roman Catholicism by missionaries from Spain eventually made the Philippines the only predominantly Catholic nation in Asia.

Well before Catholicism reached the Philippines, Arab missionaries had already introduced Islam among the inhabitants of the southern islands. It is claimed that Islam antedates Catholic Christianity by about three centuries, yet Islam remained principally confined in the Sulu Archipelago and some of the coastal areas of the island of Mindanao. After about seven centuries of existence in the Philippines, Muslims remain a numerically small portion of the religious population. Most Muslims follow the Sunni SHAFIITE SCHOOL OF ISLAM and are generally referred to as Moros (Spanish for Moors).

American Protestantism was brought to the country in 1898, when Spain ceded the Philippines to the United States in the Treaty of Paris. As the Americans began to assume dominance in the islands, they brought their new faith. The different Protestant churches divided the country among themselves to convert Catholics to Protestantism, just as the various Catholic orders had apportioned the territory during the 450 years of the Spanish regime. The difference, however, was that whereas the Catholic religious orders were converting the indigenous peoples to one church, Protestants wanted the Filipinos to choose among various denominations.

Among the more important denominations to arise from the Protestant efforts are the UNITED CHURCH OF CHRIST IN THE PHILIPPINES, the CONVENTION OF PHILIPPINE BAPTIST CHURCHES, and the EVANGELICAL METHODIST CHURCH IN THE PHILIPPINE ISLANDS. The EPISCOPAL CHURCH also began work in the country and over the years developed a relationship with a group that had left the Catholic Church to form a PHILIPPINE INDEPENDENT CHURCH (PIC). With more than 2.5 million members, the PIC is the largest non-Catholic church in the country. It claimed almost 4.5 million members before a split in the 1980s produced the Philippine Independent Catholic Church.

Despite the coming of the world's religions through colonial powers and the significant conversion of the population to a variety of forms of Christianity, some indigenous, pre-Magellan religious elements continue to thrive in the culture. Sixteenth-century Spanish missionary records provide the best clues to the religious substrata that influence the contemporary religious landscape in the Philippines. Most of these records are taken from the central islands of the archipelago, the Visayas.

When the Spanish arrived, Bisayans, native residents of the Visayan Islands, worshipped nature spirits, gods of particular localities, and their own ancestors. Religious practitioners were male or female mediums who contacted spirit patrons in a state of trance to determine the cause and cure of illness. Sacrifices included foodstuffs, beverages, and live fowl, hogs, or human beings. The ancestor spirits and deities were invoked at feasts in which these sacrifices were offered up. Ancestor spirits were also invited to partake of any meal, and their well-being in the next world depended on sacrifices offered by their descendants both before and after their deaths.

Good Friday celebrations in Manila, the Philippines (P.Treanor/TRIP)

Bisayans considered themselves vastly outnumbered by a variety of invisible beings. Gods and goddesses were called diwata, a word still in use among Bisayans living in the remote mountains of Panay. Diwata is a Malay-Sanskrit term for gods or godhead, and in the Bisayan language a maniwata or magdiwata is a shaman or human intermediary who invokes or defies the spiritual realm. The diwata were generally neutral and could be approached ritually for good crops, health, and fortune, but they also caused illness or misfortune if not given due respect. They thus functioned to sanction approved social behavior. Naturally, malevolent beings, ranging from the mischievous to the demonic, had to be avoided or kept off by precautionary acts. These beings had no single name as a class—Spanish lexicographers simply called them witches—brujas or hechiceros. Today Bisayans have supplied modern Spanish terms such as duende (goblin) and encanto (enchantment).

In some cases the diwata actually constituted a pantheon, with a hierarchy arranged by the specific roles each divinity played. Some were specifically connected with basic rights of passage such as birth, naming, marriage, death, and afterlife. Others were the patrons of specific human conditions, such as the Dalikmata, a diwata with many eyes, who was invoked in the case of eye ailments, or Makabosog, who moved a person to gluttony. The Cebuanos, the natives of the island of Cebu who first encountered Magellan's expedition, referred to the image of the Holy Christ Child as "the Spaniards' diwata." The Cebuanos supposedly rendered it homage after Magellan's death.

The earliest known records of the diwata were written by Miguel de in Panay in 1582. His records identified Si Dapa as a diwata who was said to mark out one's mortal lifespan on a tree trunk on Mount Madayaas at the time of birth. He also identified other beings including Magwayen, who was said to ferry the souls of the deceased across to a kind of inferno, and Pandaki, a diwata who rescued the deserving for a more pleasant afterlife. Loarca showed the linkage between the diwata and natural phenomena by describing a fire-breathing goddess as Mayong, a diwata of the volcano in Ibalon that bears her name.

Later interpreters have classified the pre-Magellan gods into a three-tiered system. The first tier is composed of the gods of the heavens, such as Bathala, MayKapal, Kabunian, Maguayen, and Sidava. These deities were the source and creators of things in the world. Events in the world were ultimately traced to their agencies. To reach the highest of the gods one had to go through channels or intermediaries—lesser gods. Thus, petitions and sacrifices were addressed to lesser gods.

A second tier of gods concerns those of the underworld, such as Sisiburnanen, Pandague, and Sumpay. These gods were connected with death. It was believed that when a person died, the soul or elan vital was brought to the underworld by one of the gods and would be kept there unless another minor underworld god liberated it. The "liberator god" would act in response to sacrifices offered by the living for the dead. The liberated soul would then reside in the high mountains.

The third tier of gods, located between heaven and the underworld, consists of the deities and spirits of the earth. The Spanish records refer to a goddess of harvest called Lalahon. Followers of Lalahon believed that as long as they pleased her, the fields would be fruitful and they would be assured of a bountiful harvest. If displeased, she would send swarms of locusts to destroy the crops. Hence, the people offered her sacrifices and invoked her blessings for a good harvest. The most widespread of the spirits in the middle tier is the anitos. Among the Tagalogs, natives of central Luzon, the anitos were considered agents of the high gods such as Bathala and could be found everywhere within the environment. The resources of nature thus belonged to the spirits, but humans might use them provided they made proper acknowledgment to the spirit owners.

Today, these Filipino indigenous religious beliefs and practices are incorporated into the world religions in a variety of regional folk practices. Once driven underground by colonial powers, these same beliefs and practices have reemerged in the last eighty years in an environment of religious tolerance and nationalism.

Indigenous beliefs and practices have also contributed to the rise of many new religious communities in the Philippines. The rapid growth of the IGLESIA NI CRISTO, established in 1914 by Felix Manalo (1886–1963), serves as the best illustration of the new indigenous communities. At the beginning of the twentieth century the various factions of Christianity in the Philippines collided in the life of Felix Manalo. Baptized a Roman Catholic in 1886, he became a Methodist in 1904 and a Presbyterian in 1905. After years of disillusionment with a variety of Protestant churches and during a time when the nation hungered for political independence, Manalo established an independent church. The Iglesia Kristo reflected his particular charismatic teachings, which identify "true religion." The Iglesia is considered a truly Filipino organization, drawing many indigenous beliefs and practices into its polity.

The rise of many new religions, coupled with the assault on the country by numerous Christian missionary agencies since World War II, has made the Philippines one of the most religiously pluralistic countries in the world.

Graham B. Walker Jr.

Sources:

- Anderson, Gerald H., ed. Studies in Philippine Church History. Ithaca, NY: Cornell University Press, 1969.
- Blair, Emma, and James Robertson, eds. The Philippine Islands, 1493–1898. 55 vols. Cleveland: Arthur H. Clark, 1903–1909.
- Demetrio, Francisco, S. J. Myths and Symbols in the Philippines. Manila: National Books, 1981.
- Scott, William H. Barangay: Sixteenth-Century Philippine Culture and Society. Manila: Ateneo de Manila University Press, 1994.
- Silliman, Robert B. Religious Beliefs and Life at the Beginning of the Spanish Regime in the Philippines. Dumaguete City: Silliman University, 1964.

Pitcairn Islands

The Pitcairn Island group consists of four volcanic islands that are now a dependency of New Zealand. The islands are located in the South Pacific, halfway between Australia and the coast of Chile. Pitcairn, the only inhabited island of the four, became world famous as the site chosen as a refuge by the mutineers of the HMS Bounty, made famous in the novel by Charles Nordhoff and later turned into several

Followers	2000			2025	2050
	total	%	rate
Christians	40	89.4	-3.82	40	40
Protestants	40	89.4	-3.82	40	40
Nonreligious	10	10.6	2.26	10	10
Total population	50	100.0	-3.34	50	50

movies. Following the mutiny in 1790, the crew settled briefly in Tahiti. From there, most of them took wives from among the natives and sailed to Pitcairn before the British could catch up with them. Though it had been discovered and named by Robert Pitcairn in 1767, at the time of the mutiny the island was not on the maps of the British navy.

Until the twentieth century, the island's entire population (which peaked at two hundred in 1937) consisted entirely of descendants of the Bounty crew. By the mid-1990s, approximately fifty inhabitants were left, many islanders having left to seek employment in New Zealand.

One of the Bounty mutineers, a devout member of the CHURCH OF ENGLAND, organized an Anglican parish. However, in 1877 some literature from the SEVENTH-DAY ADVENTIST CHURCH arrived on the island. As a result, in 1887 the population converted to Adventism and the Seventh-day Adventist Pitcairn Island Mission was formally organized in 1895. It is currently the only religion practiced on the island.

Sources:

Barrett, David. The Encyclopedia of World Christianity. 2nd ed. New York: Oxford University Press, 2001.

Forman, Charles H. The Island Churches of the South Pacific: Emergence in the Twentieth Century. Maryknoll, NY: Orbis, 1982.

Plymouth Brethren (Exclusive)

The Exclusive Brethren were officially founded in 1848, but their roots go back to 1825, when a small group of Christians met together in Dublin, Ireland, and also in Plymouth, England, for the Lord's Supper, without a priest. In 1827 they were joined by an ordained CHURCH OF IRELAND priest, John Nelson Darby (1800–1882), who broke with his church; he was later to write a tract entitled "The Notion of a Clergyman: Dispensationally the Sin against the Holy Ghost."

Like many others, the Brethren aimed to return to the simplicity of the early church: no clergy, no ceremonies, no fixed structure to their services. Theologically they were Evangelical and, like many nineteenth-century movements, strongly emphasized the imminent return of Christ.

Darby was a successful evangelist, taking his message around much of Europe, North America, the West Indies, and Australasia. Those within the movement consider his translation of the Bible to be his main contribution to Christian theology, whereas those outside the movement consider his main contribution to be dispensationalism, the belief that there are seven Ages of Man: the Age of Innocence, before the Fall, then the Ages of Conscience, Human Government, Promise, Law, and Grace—this last established through Christ. Still to come is the seventh age, the Millennial Age, or the reign of Christ. Dispensationalism was taken up by the great American evangelist Dwight L. Moody (1837–1899), was taught at the Moody Bible Institute, and it was incorporated in the highly influential Scofield Reference Bible. Dispensationalism became a standard part of Evangelical theology, particularly in North America.

In 1845–1848 the Brethren began a process that would characterize them thereafter: schism. The theological disputes involved were minor; the main issue was moral strictness and separation from the wickedness of the world. Those considered outside of full and true fellowship were to be "withdrawn from" or shunned. Darby and his minority of hard-line followers became known as the Exclusive Brethren, with each of the various offshoots usually being designated by the name of one of the leading figures. The majority group, who became known as the Open Brethren or CHRISTIAN BRETHERN, are now effectively integrated into the larger world of Evangelicalism and are similar to many other Free Church groups. Neither group (or any of the many other offshoots over the decades) likes the appellation Plymouth Brethren, which came about because many of the early Brethren tracts were published by the Plymouth Assembly.

One of the most significant, and most uncompromising, Exclusive Brethren groups today adheres to the Darby-Raven-Taylor-Symington-Hales succession. In 1881, the year before Darby's death, there was a further split in the Exclusive Brethren when his lifelong friend and colleague William Kelly (1820–1906) separated from Darby; today's "Continental" or "Kelly" Brethren stem from this split. The appointment of F. E. Raven (1837–1903) as leader and successor to Darby caused a further exodus in 1888–1890. On Raven's death in 1903, the leadership of the Exclusive Brethren was assumed by James Taylor Sr. (1870–1953), who was to remain in charge for exactly half a century. During that time there were many other splits, known by the names of their leaders, or of the towns or villages whose assemblies seceded; some of these later merged with each other. Watchman Nee's "Little Flock," now known as THE LOCAL CHURCH movement, was briefly associated with the Exclusive Brethren from 1932 to 1935.

James Taylor Sr. died in 1953. In 1959, after a bitter power struggle during which several thousand members left, the leadership passed to his son James Taylor Jr. (1899–1970). He was far stricter than his father and emphasized the separation of Brethren from those with whom they were not in fellowship, so that even husbands and wives had to eat at separate tables. The harshness of Taylor's regime, which sometimes caused families to break up, led to an inquiry in the British Parliament in 1964.

Scandal rocked the Exclusive Brethren in 1970. Taylor Jr. had long been known as a heavy drinker, possibly an alcoholic; there are reports that he openly drank whisky during church meetings. In July 1970 he visited Britain for a three-day conference in Aberdeen, Scotland. Reports that he insisted that women sit on his lap during meetings were eclipsed when he was discovered in bed with the wife of a local member. In the ensuing furor, Taylor returned to his native New York, and the Aberdeen Brethren, along with many others around the world, withdrew from him. Taylor not only denied the stories, but forbade members from having any contact with his critics. He insisted that members pledge loyalty to him; those who even asked the reason for making this pledge were shunned. The church's position today is that "Pure persons . . . rallied to the truth. Others wanting an easier way of life . . . abandoned the path and no longer formed part of the universal fellowship in which Taylor was a respected leader." The church admits that 28 percent of the membership left as a result.

Taylor Jr. died a few months later. He was succeeded by James Symington, who taught that computers are a tool of the anti-Christ and also discouraged postsecondary education. On his death in 1987 Symington was succeeded by Australian John S. Hales (b. 1921). Schisms continued throughout these years, with both individuals and groups withdrawing from each other. Despite this, the Darby-Raven-Taylor-Symington-Hales succession continues to regard itself as the "genuine" Exclusive Brethren.

An estimated thirty-five thousand members are associated with the Hales group. They constitute 20 to 30 percent of the total number of Exclusive Brethren. They may be contacted through their publishing house, the Bible and Gospel Trust. Given former leader Symington's position on the computer, it is not surprising that the group has no Web site.

Address:

The Bible and Gospel Trust
99 Green Ln.
Hounslow, Middlesex TW4 6BW
United Kingdom

David V. Barrett

Sources:

Barrett, David V. The New Believers. London: Cassell, 2001.
Eaton, Kent. "Beware the Trumpet of Judgement!: John Nelson Darby and the Nineteenth-Century Brethren." In The Coming Deliverer: Millennial Themes in World Religions, edited by Fiona Bowie. Cardiff: University of Wales Press, 1997.

Wilson, Bryan R. The Brethren: A Current Sociological Appraisal. Oxford: All Souls College, 1981.
Wyman, Dick. "Plymouth Brethren: Exclusive Raven/Taylor Sect." Exclusive Brethren Information Web site. Posted at <http://www.cloudnet.com/~dwyman/anonymous1.html>. Accessed November 7, 2001.

Poland

Christianized in the tenth century, Poland has had a long tradition of religious pluralism that existed even before the Reformation. Besides Catholics, there were a number of Orthodox, Jews, pagans (in some remote regions of the country) and, later, Protestants and Muslims. The degree of religious and ethnic pluralism gradually declined after the sixteenth century due to migrations, changes of borders, and the Holocaust, and the proportion of the population being both Roman Catholic and ethnically Polish approached 100 percent after World War II.

As the result, the role of the ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH, now comprising over 90 percent of the Polish population, has become greater than before. The fact that Catholicism has been viewed as an antidote to communism and as a defender of national identity against the danger of Sovietization also contributed to its growing importance. As a result, since the mid-1970s the surveys reveal a growing rate of participation in Catholic practices and a growing number of persons identifying themselves as believers and as firm believers. The election of Karol Wojtyla, a Polish national, as Pope John Paul II, the appearance of the Solidarity movement, and the role of the church during the martial law period further contributed to the Catholic revival that continued to the end of the 1980s. At the beginning of the twenty-first century, this dominant form of religiosity is still widespread, and during the last decade it has remained almost at the same level as before, which places Poland among the most religious Christian countries (together with Ireland and the United States).

Other religions, either traditional or new, comprise about 2 percent of the population. The biggest groups are the Orthodox Church of Poland, concentrated mainly in the eastern parts of the country, the JEHOVAH'S WITNESSES, and the EVANGELICAL CHURCH OF THE AUGSBURG CONFESSION, concentrated mainly in the southwest part of Poland.

The appearance of new religions in Poland provides some interesting patterns pertinent to theories of secularization. New religious movements (NRMs) seem to have emerged in Poland not on the ruins of a dominant religious tradition but parallel to it. The appearance of new religions in Poland in the 1970s may be seen as the reintroduction of religious pluralism, which had to a large extent vanished from Poland as an effect of World War II. The scale and character of the NRMs that began to appear at that time was, however, totally new. They usually represent more exotic and less established religious traditions, being often new not only in Poland but also throughout the West. Important changes in regulations concerning the freedom of religion were issued in 1989 that made the official registration relatively easy, but some groups still prefer informal ways of activity, being too small to be registered (initially, the law required a minimum of fifteen persons for registration, and now it requires one hundred).

The largest proportion of membership in NRMs can be observed among movements growing inside the Catholic Church. Their number grew from about 20 in the early 1980s to over 180 by 1994. Movements like the Apostles of Sobriety (present in 35.8 percent of the 7,579 Catholic parishes surveyed in 1988), Light-Life or Oases (present in 31.5 percent of parishes), God's Mercy Votaries (18.3 percent), Life and Family Apostles (9.4 percent), Family of Families (9.3 percent), Charismatic Renewal in the Holy Spirit (5.3 percent), Eucharist-Marian Crusade (4.1 percent), Maitri (2.1 percent), Neo-Catechumenal Community (1.9 percent), and others stress particular aspects of religious renewal and contribute to the growing endogenous pluralism of the Catholic Church (Firlit, et al. 1990). The majority are of Polish origin but some international Catholic religious movements are also present.

The development of the intrachurch Catholic movements is one of the most significant factors of change in the Polish religious context in recent years. Some spectacular conversions of popular journalists and rock musicians have garnered much publicity in the media. Therefore, the growing number of movements and their members (now over one million) constitutes, both quantitatively and qualitatively, perhaps the most effective alternative to the secularization trend mentioned earlier. These "small churches" inside the "the big church" create possibilities for pluralism within the Catholic Church, which may be conducive to better fulfillment of individual religious needs and the higher commitment of its members. Most of these groups are not negatively stigmatized as are some sects and cults, but others are to some extent. The groups contribute to better mobilization of

Status of religions in Poland, 2000-2050

Followers	2000			2025	2050
	total	%	rate
Christians	37,758,000	97.4	0.23	38,264,000	35,623,000
Roman Catholics	35,743,000	92.2	0.21	36,360,000	33,750,000
Orthodox	1,030,000	2.7	0.81	1,050,000	1,000,000
Independents	330,000	0.9	2.22	350,000	450,000
Nonreligious	864,000	2.2	-1.84	700,000	550,000
Atheists	115,000	0.3	-2.58	72,100	45,000
Spiritists	7,300	0.0	0.69	9,000	10,000
Jews	6,400	0.0	-3.39	6,000	6,000
Muslims	5,100	0.0	1.25	7,500	10,000
Buddhists	1,000	0.0	1.14	1,400	1,800
Baha'is	500	0.0	1.14	1,000	1,500
other religionists	7,000	0.0	0.71	8,000	9,000
Total population	38,765,000	100.0	0.17	39,069,000	36,256,000

resources within the church. According to some estimations, a large proportion (about 60 percent) of priestly vocations come from these movements. However, much of any group's success depends on the attitude of the church hierarchy toward it. As a whole, the groups have been supported by Pope John Paul II, who in a letter to the participants of the Congress of the Catholic Movements in 1994 stressed their significant role in religious renewal and compared them to the "spring in the Church." His support may have changed the reservations of some bishops toward these movements.

Some of these Catholic communities, however, become too radical to remain within the Roman Catholic Church, either due to their own decisions or due to the decisions of the local bishop. After the bonds with the institutional church have been broken, they often register as separate religious bodies and define themselves within the Protestant tradition.

The largest group of newly registered religious bodies belong to the Protestant tradition, both mainline and marginal. They constitute a variety of movements that often cluster in distinct families (Baptist, Adventist, Pentecostal, and so on). At least one of the reasons for their growth is their tendency to organize themselves on the basis of locality and to register as separate religious unions. Many of the local religious unions belong to this category of “congregational revival” and represent various evangelical groups that are not significantly differentiated in doctrinal terms.

Among the most dynamically growing Protestant families are those emphasizing Pentecostal forms of piety. Although not all of them are quite new, in the 1990s their rates of growth were the most visible and contrasted with those of the major Protestant churches (Lutheran, Reformed, and Methodist), which were experiencing a period of decline. Doctrinal differentiation among the Pentecostals is usually greater than among other groups, manifested in Trinitarian or Unitarian theologies while also emphasizing different theological formulations such as “prosperity theology” or “eternal security.” The Pentecostal movement in Poland also includes some formerly Catholic Charismatic or “Oases” groups.

One of the most spectacular cases of a marginal Protestant movement is the Jehovah’s Witnesses, which despite persecution in former decades now constitute the third largest denominational group in Poland. Although their appearance in Poland dates back to beginning of this century, the Jehovah’s Witnesses were officially registered in 1989, which has given the movement the principal impetus for growth (about 5 percent annually in the first years of the 1990s), most of the new converts having a Catholic background.

New religious movements related to other traditions are much smaller. The INTERNATIONAL SOCIETY FOR KRISHNA CONSCIOUSNESS is perhaps the biggest among Hindu groups, and KARMA-KAGYUPA is the largest among Buddhist groups. There are also a few NRMs of Polish origin. Together with movements that were born earlier and are now more respected denominations (such as the POLISH NATIONAL CATHOLIC CHURCH and two OLD CATHOLIC CHURCH OF MARIAVITE), they are examples of religious creativity, which seems in Poland somewhat less vigorous than in neighboring countries like Russia and Germany, perhaps due to the strength of the dominant Catholic religious tradition. The most numerous among these are neo-pagan groups, which have emerged as an attempt to reconstruct and revive old Slavonic religion from pre-Christian times. As part of the neo-pagan revival in the region, groups such as the CLAN OF AUSRANS (POLAND) have close relations with other neopagan movements in neighboring countries, especially the Baltic countries and Ukraine.

The number of officially registered religious communities in Poland has increased about four times in the last decade of the twentieth century, now numbering over 150, and a few have shown dynamic growth in membership. Recently, however, this growth has significantly decreased, due in large part to the growing social perception of religious minorities as a “sect problem” and to the resulting changes in legislation. The data on membership of particular movements that are registered as religious unions are gathered by the Main Statistical Office on the basis of annual reports presented by the movements themselves.

Thadeus Doktor

Sources:

- Adamczuk, L., P. Ciecielag, M. Chmielewski, T. Doktor, and G. Gudaszewski. Wyznania religijne: Stowarzyszenia narodowosciowe i etniczne w Polsce, 1997–1999. Warsaw: GUS, 2000. (A qualitative and quantitative description of religious panorama.)
- Braun, J. Poland in Christian Civilization. London: Veritas Foundation, 1985.
- Doktor, Thadeusz. “Buddhism in Poland.” In New Religions and New Religiosity, edited by Eileen Barker and Margit Warburg, 83–94. Aarhus, Denmark: Aarhus University Press, 1998.
- . State, Church and New Religious Movements in Poland. Kraków: Nomos, 1999.
- Korbonski, A. The Church and State in Poland after World War II. Washington, DC: Council for Soviet and East European Research, 1994.
- Zdaniewicz, W. and T. Zembrzusi, eds. Kościół i religijność Polaków 1945–1999. Warsaw: Pallotinum, 2000.

Polish National Catholic Church/ Polish Catholic Church [Kościół Polskokatolicki]

The Polish National Catholic Church (PNCC) was founded by former Roman Catholic clergyman Franciszek (Francis) Hodur (1866–1953) in Scranton, Pennsylvania, in 1897. The immediate reason for the formation of a national church among Poles in America was a conflict about non-Polish priests assigned to predominantly Polish American parishes. The Polish immigrant members of the parishes resented the fact that the priests made use of parish funds without consulting the members. The reaction to the felt discrimination against Polish Catholics was addressed mainly to the predominantly Irish/German hierarchy in the United States. However, beginning in 1919, the church started to spread in Poland as well. In the early 1950s, the former missionary diocese of the PNCC in Poland became a separate denomination called the Polish Catholic Church (PCC).

The PNCC had a somewhat conflictual beginning, and the missionary church in Poland also encountered notable obstacles. Its petitions to be recognized as a full-fledged denomination were ignored by the government. The church was harassed by the local authorities, being charged with unauthorized use of Catholic liturgical vestments and furnishings, and refused access to burial grounds that were under control of Roman Catholic parishes. Some local offices even refused to register births, marriages, and deaths of some Polish National Catholics.

Many years prior to Vatican II, the PNCC introduced the Polish tongue, as opposed to Latin, into rituals, catechism classes, and sermons. The General Synod in 1954 finally decided that Polish would be the sole language of the liturgy. However, English is now in more frequent use in worship in the United States. In doctrine, the PNCC is closest to the various Old Catholic churches with whom it has fraternal relationships. The church's major departure from the ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH, aside from breaking from its jurisdiction, has been discarding the dogma of papal infallibility. The PNCC recognizes Catholic teachings on the Highest Being, the salvation of the world, the work of the Holy Spirit, the responsibility of individuals for their actions before God, divine grace, and the need for a sacramental priesthood. Since 1909, however, the church has rejected the belief that people can eternally disappear or suffer in hell forever. More recently, the doctrines of original sin and the devil have been rejected as well. The year 1909 also marked the addition of a new sacrament, the Hearing and Announcing of the Word of God. In 1921 communal confession was introduced, and baptism and confirmation were joined into one sacrament. Celibacy was abolished in 1921.

In 1904 the church was given a synodal character, the Church Council was elected to exercise authority in the periods between synods, and the position of the elected bishop was introduced. The first bishop was consecrated in 1906. Since 1914, parishes cannot sell any of their estate without the consent of their bishop. They also cannot choose their pastor, though the bishop makes pastoral appointments only after consultation with the parish. In Poland, the parish council has less power than in the United States. Polish lay members have tended to be more subordinate to the clergy, as is the custom in the Roman Catholic parishes.

The highest authority in the PNCC is given to the Universal Synod (ordinary or extraordinary). The legislative authority in the diocese, limited by the requirements of the church constitution, belongs to the provincial synod, and in the parish it belongs to the parish assembly. When the synod is not in session, the responsible authority rests with the Church Council, chosen by the synod from among the priests and laymen. The executive authority covers church responsibilities as follows: the prime bishop with the Church Council has executive authority over the whole church, the diocesan bishop with the diocesan council has authority in dioceses, and parish committees have authority in parishes.

As of 2001, there were approximately 265,000 members in the PNCC. They were divided among 123 parishes and 37 missions, served by approximately 144 priests. There are four dioceses: Central, Eastern, Buffalo-Pittsburgh, and Western. Offspring of the church are the PNCC of Canada (previously an independent diocese consisting of six parishes and three missions) and the parishes in Brazil that remain a part of the church in the United States. The priests are trained in the Savonarola Theological Seminary in Scranton, Pennsylvania.

In Poland, the highest authority of jurisdiction and supervision rests with the General Polish Synod, which gathers every four years. The main executive body is the Council of Synod together with its president, who is both a bishop and the superior of the PCC. There are three dioceses in Poland: Warsaw, Wrocław, and Kraków. They cover eleven decanates. The PCC oversees 91 parishes and 92 churches and chapels. More than 52,000 members are served by 113 priests. The largest parishes and the largest number of parishes are to be found in the province of Lublin and the area around Rzeszów. Both the PNCC and the PCC are members of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES.

Addresses:

Polish National Catholic Church (U.S.A.)
1002 Pittston Ave.
Scranton, PA 18505
<http://www.pncc.org>

Polish Catholic Church (Poland)
Kosciol Polskokatolicki w RP
ul. Szwolezerow 4
00-464 Warszawa
Poland

Leslaw Borowski

Sources:

- Anson, Peter. Bishops at Large. London: Faber and Faber, 1964.
- Darczewska-Adamus, Krystyna. Kosciol Polskokatolicki (Polish Catholic Church in Poland). Warsaw: Instytut Filozofii i Socjologii PAN, 1968.
- Fox, Paul. The Polish National Catholic Church. Scranton, PA: School of Christian Living, 1955.
- Kubiak, Hieronim. The Polish National Catholic Church in the United States of America from 1897 to 1980. Warsaw-Kraków: Państwowe Wydawnictwo Naukowe, 1982.
- Włodarski, Stephen. The Origin and Growth of the Polish National Catholic Church. Scranton, PA: The Polish National Catholic Church, 1974.

Polygamy-Practicing Mormons

When Wilford Woodruff (1807–1898) announced the Manifesto of 1890 it began the end of official sanctioned polygamy within the CHURCH OF JESUS CHRIST OF LATTER-DAY

Tom Green, accused Utah polygamist, with his family of five wives and some of his 29 children in April 2000. (AFP/Corbis)

SAINTS. With that he drew a line that would be debated from that point forward about whether there was still authority to perform plural marriages. Within two decades those who continued in the principle and those who followed the Mormon church-prophet admonition to discontinue the practice of polygamy became deeply divided. These were decades of significant confusion as church-sanctioned marriages continued in some locations including in the Mexican colonies. Nevertheless, by 1904 in what was called the Second Manifesto, church policy was to excommunicate those who married additional women.

Many believed that the manifesto was an accommodation to the government, a gesture designed to pave the way for statehood, and certainly not based on a revelation from God. The ambiguous language of the document seemed to prove this belief—leaving room for continuing polygamy outside the confines of the United States in Mexico or Canada.

Fundamentalism (a popular designation of those continuing to practice polygamy) as a movement began in the 1920s when some polygamists gathered around the charismatic personalities of Loren C. Woolley (d. 1934), John Y. Barlow, and Joseph W. Musser (1872–1954), among others. Excommunicated after 1904 for their disobedience of the Mormon prophet, fundamentalists settled in a small southern Utah town—Short Creek—and in various places around the Great Basin.

During the 1920s, Loren C. Woolley claimed that he had received the special commission to continue plural marriage in Centerville, Utah, in 1886. There he allegedly witnessed a visit of Jesus Christ and Joseph Smith to John Taylor, then prophet of the church in hiding from the federal marshals. Although many rejected this claim, the division between the official church organization and those who chose to continue in the doctrine was distinct—sealed by both official church policy and by informal social division.

Distinguished first by the practice of plural marriage, the fundamentalists followed the teachings of the nineteenth-century presidents of the church, and some groups organized themselves communally in such organizations as the United Effort Firm of Short Creek. Separated by the Mormon Church by excommunication, the fundamentalists believe they have continued priesthood to perform sacred marriage ceremonies, which they believe are binding through eternity.

It is estimated by the Utah Attorney General's office that there are as many as 50,000 fundamentalists in Utah. While many of these belong to groups and live and worship together, there are also thousands of independent polygamists who practice the principle in isolation. What unites them is their continued belief that plurality is essential to their salvation, that it is a teaching of God, and that it is the best way to organize their family lives.

In the 1940s and again in 1953, the government attempted to end polygamy in Utah and Arizona by arresting many of the men in the groups on a variety of charges other than polygamy. Typically these charges included cohabitation, violations of the Mann and Lindberg statutes (designed to prohibit slavery and kidnapping), and statutory rape. More difficult to prove, polygamy was deemed justification for a community-wide roundup in 1953 under the auspices of the governor of Arizona, Howard Pyle. Since the 1950s Utah has had an unofficial policy of leaving the polygamists alone until 2001 when independent polygamist Tom Green was tried for bigamy. Convicted because of his marriages to underage girls and problems in supporting his very large family of more than twenty children, Green became a self-designated spokesperson for the movement—appearing on numerous national television talk shows advocating his unusual lifestyle. More typically, fundamentalists practice polygamy in private, separated from the mainstream, and avoid both publicity and public knowledge of the specifics of their family life.

Popular estimates suggest that polygamists may be 20- to 30,000 in number. Among the larger groups are the Apostolic United Apostolic Brethren, led by Owen Allred. They may be reached at 3139 W. 14700 S., No. A, Bluffville, UT 84065 (U.S.A.). They report approximately 6,000 members. The United Order Effort, also known as the Fundamentalist LDS Church is led by Rulon Jeffs and may be reached c/o Dan Barlow, Colorado City, AZ 86021. It has approximately 8,000 associated members. There are a variety of smaller groups located in Utah and adjacent states. One group, the Church of the First Born of the Fullness of Times, was decimated by violence when Ervil LeBaron (d. 1981), brother of founder Joel LeBaron (d. 1972), left the church, founded a rival group, and then masterminded a spree of violence at the church and other polygamy-practicing groups.

Martha Sonntag Bradley

Sources:

- Allred, Rulon C. Treasures of Knowledge. 2 vols. Hamilton, MT: Bitterroot Publishing Co., 1982.
- Bennion, Janet. Women of the Principle. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1998.
- Bradley, Martha Sonntag. Kidnapped from that Land: The Government Raids on the Short Creek Polygamists. Salt Lake City: University of Utah Press, 1993.
- Musser, Joseph W. Celestial or Plural Marriage. Salt Lake City, UT: Truth Publishing Co., 1944.

Pomun Order [Pomun-Jong]

The origin of the Pomun Order of Korean Buddhist nuns is found in the establishment of the Yuji Chaedan Taehan Pulgyo Pomun-won, a Korean Buddhist foundation and support center, on August 5, 1971, by the nun Unyong. The next year, on April 20, 1972, the Pomun Order was officially organized, with Pomun Nunnery, located in Seoul, Korea, as its headquarters. The nun Kungt'an (1885–1980) was named head of the order, and Unyong became the director of general affairs. By June 16 of that same year the nuns recreated the interior of the ancient Buddhist grotto of Sokkuram at Pomun Nunnery; by July 6 they were officially registered with the government as the Pomun Order.

The chapter titled “The Gateway to Everywhere of the Bodhisattva, He Who Observes the Sounds of the World” (Pomun-p’um) of the Lotus Sutra, also known as the Avalokitesvara Sutra (Kwanum-gyong), is the most important teaching of this religious group, suggesting that the nuns’ activities are focused on developing compassion like that of Avalokitesvara, the Bodhisattva of Compassion. Other teachings and doctrines of the order are essentially the same as those of traditional mainstream East Asian Mahayana Buddhism and the Korean Chogye order: they revere the Buddha Sakyamuni and encourage meditation and the study of the Diamond Sutra and Huineng’s Platform Sutra of the Sixth Patriarch. Special attention is given to the personal development of the three wisdoms (samhye): the wisdom that comes from hearing the Buddha’s teaching (munhye), contemplating and reflecting upon it (sahye), and directly experiencing it in meditation (suhye).

In May of 1997 the order reported a membership of 54,833 lay followers (18,586 males and 36,247 females), who are served by 207 religious specialists (113 nuns and 81 female novices). The order operates one main nunnery and thirty-five branch nunneries, one nursing home, one orphanage, and three kindergartens.

Address:

Pomun Order
Songbuk-ku Pomun-dong 3-ga 168
Seoul 136-083
Republic of Korea

Richard McBride

Sources:

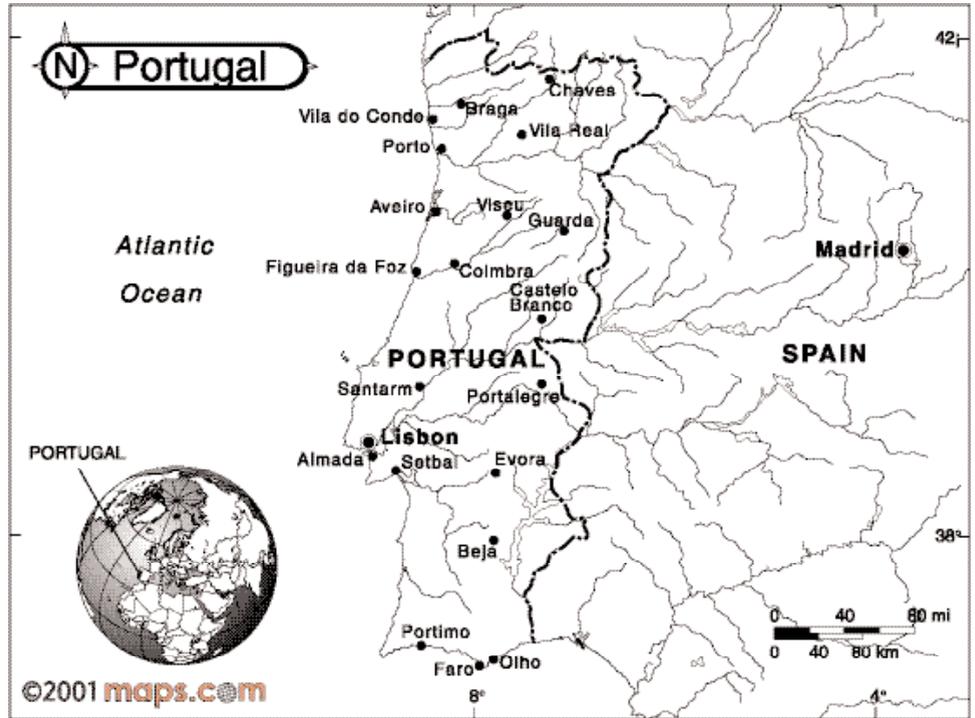

- Han’guk Chonggyo Sahoe Yon’guso (Korea Research Institute for Religion and Society), ed. Han’guk chonggyo yon’gam (The yearbook of Korean religions). 339–340. Seoul: Koryo Hallimwon (Korean Scholars Press), 1997.
- Sunim, Samu. “Euyeong Sunim and the Founding of Pomun-jong, the First Independent Bhikshumi Order.” Spring Wind Buddhist Cultural Forum 6, 1–3 (1986): 129–162.

Portugal

Portugal, the westernmost country of Europe, was imagined by the propaganda of the fascist regime (1928–1974) as a profoundly Catholic nation. However, more recently, its syncretism has been rediscovered by the scholars of the democratic period. Furthermore, the extensive 1998 ISSP survey on religious beliefs and attitudes seems to corroborate that canonical and noncanonical beliefs and practices coexist effortlessly in Portuguese society.

Prior to the foundation of the Portuguese state in 1139 C.E., the territory that corresponds to present-day mainland Portugal had already been subject to a cross-pollination of religious influences by the ways of conquest, trade, and migration. However, before the first Iron Age, which began as the Phoenician colonization of the Iberian Peninsula advanced, the history of the region is shrouded because of the absence of thorough archaeological research. The Phoenicians brought not only the technology of iron and the first form of writing known in the peninsula but also new rites, gods, and ways of worship. Contemporary scholarship emphasizes the survival of these practices in Christian garb. An infernal god named Endovellicus, the most documented indigenous deity (with seventy inscriptions extant), provides an example of the survival of this ancient religious strata; his cult not only thrived under the Roman Empire but took a later Christian spin and became a cult of Saint Michael.

The story of Priscillianism, a fourth-century Christian heresy that emerged in the northwest part of the peninsula, also demonstrates that almost anything could happen religiously in Portugal. In the second half of the fourth century, an Egyptian named Marcus arrived in the peninsula preaching Gnostic and Manichean ideas. Several well-off laymen and women paid him attention, and a religious movement began. Priscillian (c. 340–385), a landowner, took leadership of the movement and used his rhetorical gifts in proselytizing. In 380, twelve Catholic bishops met in Saragossa to write eight canons condemning Priscillianism. By 385 Priscillian and four of his followers were executed by decapitation in Treveros under accusations of maleficium (malevolent magic). Their remains were carried back home and revered by their followers. The move-

Status of religions in Portugal, 2000-2050

Followers	2000			2025	2050
	total	%	rate
Christians	9,121,000	92.4	-0.07	8,460,000	7,088,000
Roman Catholics	8,970,000	90.8	-0.09	8,300,000	7,000,000
Independents	277,000	2.8	0.41	350,000	400,000
Protestants	135,000	1.4	0.77	170,000	180,000
Nonreligious	537,000	5.4	0.79	617,000	721,000
Atheists	110,000	1.1	1.48	120,000	130,000
Buddhists	55,300	0.6	1.01	70,000	90,000
Muslims	24,000	0.2	1.85	45,000	60,000
Chinese folk-religionists	20,400	0.2	1.28	26,000	36,000
Spiritists	3,500	0.0	1.43	5,000	6,500
Baha'is	1,800	0.0	0.25	2,000	2,200
Ethnoreligionists	1,600	0.0	0.52	2,200	2,800
Jews	440	0.0	-1.38	400	400
Total population	9,875,000	100.0	0.01	9,348,000	8,137,000

ment continued, stronger if anything, and dwindled only in the sixth century. Historian José Mattoso has suggested that the main characteristic of the movement was a certain doctrinal formlessness that facilitated its trickling down from the upper strata of society and its blending with popular paganism.

Arab Muslims, or Moors, invaded Portugal in the eighth century as part of their spread across the Iberian Peninsula, and Islam continued to dominate the region for the next three centuries. Beginning in the eleventh century, a decades-long effort began that led to the expulsion of the Arabs and the virtual elimination of Islam from the country. Today, there is a small Muslim community, the Comunidade Islâmica de Lisbon, that originated in the twentieth century around expatriates from former Portuguese colonies.

The Knights Templar helped the first king of Portugal, Afonso Henriques (c. 1109–1185), to conquer the south-western part of the peninsula from the Moors, who had controlled it since 711. After the demise of the order in 1311, King Dinis (1261–1325) renamed the Portuguese branch the Order of Christ and left it to go about its business as usual. Henry the Navigator (1394–1460), mastermind of the sixteenth-century discoveries, was himself a leader of this order, and the ships that sailed off from Lisbon were flagged with the cross of the Order of Christ. These facts are the cornerstones of a vast literature of mystic nationalism that speculates about the real aim of the Portuguese discoveries.

In the beginning of the fourteenth century, Joachim de Fiore's (c. 1132–1202) theory of the Three Ages began to permeate Portugal. Cistercian and Franciscan monks were the first to succumb to its charms, but the royal family itself would not be unmoved. This theory proclaimed the imminent rise of an Age of the Holy Ghost, following the Ages of the Father and the Son. In this new aeon, humanity would receive a Fifth Gospel by a ceaseless and direct dispensation of the Holy Ghost, and the ideal of universal brotherhood would finally become a reality.

The Festivities of the Holy Ghost began during the reign of King Dinis (1261–1325) and Queen Saint Isabel (1270–1336), circa 1305, and the massive popular adherence that followed quickly spread the festivities throughout the mainland and, later on, into Portugal's overseas possessions, thus constituting a phenomenon unparalleled in other Christian countries. The main features of these festivities were the coronation of a child or man of low social standing, symbolizing that the Empire of the Spirit belongs to the "simple and ingenuous ones"; a collective banquet, symbolizing fraternity among men; and the unchaining of a prisoner, symbolizing the liberation of humanity.

Counter-reformism and, later on, nineteenth-century liberalism contributed to the progressive deterioration of these festivities, which eventually almost disappeared from mainland Portugal. They are still very much alive in the Azores, in some parts of Brazil, and in some Azorean emigrant communities in the United States. The Empire of the Holy Ghost, as a concept, would reemerge throughout the history of Portuguese mystic thought, namely under the guise of the Fifth Empire proclaimed by Sebastianism.

The Inquisition was established in 1536 and remained active until 1821, when it was abolished as a result of the liberal revolution of 1820. The estimates of the number of victims, mainly Jews, vary widely, but the national archive is reported to hold register of forty thousand inquisitorial processes. Many scholars track Portugal's decadence, a recurrent theme in discussions of national identity, to this source. The persecution focusing on witchcraft happened later and was milder (twelve casualties) than in the rest of Europe.

In 1578 the disappearance of King Sebastião (1554–1578) at the catastrophic Battle of Alcácer-Quibir, in Morocco, created one of the most serious succession crises in the history of the country, resulting in the appropriation of the Portuguese throne by King Filipe II of Spain. During this national eclipse, a belief spread among the population that King Sebastião had not died in North Africa and would return to claim his throne and to reconstitute Portugal's independence and grandeur. This period constituted the so-called first stage of Sebastianism, when the still reasonable belief in the physical return of the monarch fostered the emergence of diviners, fake King Sebastãos, and prophets, many of them newly converted Jews who saw in this new form of messianism a desperate solution for their miserable condition. Before the king's disappearance, Bandarra (1500–c. 1556), a village shoemaker, had composed a set of prophetic verses that after the battle was readily spread around the country and interpreted within a Sebastianistic context. This enthusiasm was severely repressed by the Inquisition, which, in the following centuries, would continue to look at Sebastianism as an undesirable popular belief and, in its later configurations, as a dangerous Christian heterodoxy.

As time went by, dwindling hope in the king's comeback led to the second phase of Sebastianism, which was no longer the simple belief in the return of a particular savior. Instead Sebastianism was now a political philosophy, of which the most influential figure is the Jesuit priest António Vieira (1608–1697). According to Vieira's comparative analysis of biblical texts and Bandarra's prophecies, the return of D. Sebastião, the Concealed One, will coincide with the advent of the Fifth Empire, a kingdom, both spiritual and temporal, that will establish a new ecumenical order upon earth. From this point on, Sebastianism and Fifth Empirealism became, for many, a foundation of national identity, presenting Portugal with the role of future redeemer of the world, a chosen but yet unfulfilled nation.

As Sebastianistic theories were built, their antitheses inevitably arose as well. In the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries, sour disputes were fought between Sebastianistic and anti-Sebastianistic politicians and scholars. Although popular belief in Sebastianism decreased until it disappeared, philosophy and literature continued to drink from this spring. In the twentieth century, poets such as Fernando Pessoa (1888–1935) and Teixeira de Pascoaes (1877–1952) and philosophical movements such as Renascença Portuguesa, Integralismo Lusitano, and Filosofia Portuguesa used Sebastianism in conceptualizing philosophical and aesthetic systems that were meant to reflect an idiosyncratically Portuguese vision and sensibility.

The hegemony of the ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH was severely disrupted by the rise of the liberal movement in the nineteenth century. Thus, 1834 saw the extinction of all male religious orders and the nationalization and auction of convents, monasteries, and colleges. Many holy days and religious processions were also abolished. This was not a mere action of secularization but a strong blow against the main pillar of absolutist rule, which relied on the male religious orders for the planning and development of the country's natural resources, the colonization of overseas possessions, and the management of education and culture. The masonically inspired First Republic (1910) separated state from church, no longer recognizing Catholic Christianity as the nation's official religion.

It was in this context that Theosophy and Spiritism rose and enjoyed some popularity among intellectuals, artists, and the military. The Portuguese Theosophical Society was founded in 1921, and the Portuguese Spiritist Federation in 1926. Although the Theosophical movement never showed significant adhesion or social impact, the Spiritist movement attracted important public figures and garnered rich physical resources. All this ended in 1953, when the fascist regime's Ministry of Education ordered the Spiritist Federation to cease all activities. Portuguese Spiritists were thus driven underground until the revolution in 1974. The same happened with other religious minorities, such as JEHOVAH'S WITNESSES. Although the Spiritist movement never regained its original splendor, it has developed into a very popular form of religiosity revolving around the noncorporeal figures of Sousa Martins, a famous Portuguese medical doctor, and Padre Cruz, a pious Catholic priest. What began as an elite movement (which included a society of psychical research in Oporto), is currently a phenomenon closer to popular healing traditions.

Theosophy, for its part, has played an interesting if subtle role. Fernando Pessoa, whose monumental oeuvre dwells on occult and Gnostic themes, acknowledged the influence of Helena P. Blavatsky (1831–1891) and Annie Besant (1847–1933), leaders of the THEOSOPHICAL SOCIETY (ADYAR), and was one of the first translators of their works. Much more recently, in 1988, the Centro Lusitano de Unificação Cultural, one of the most cosmopolitan of Portuguese new religious movements, was founded under Theosophical inspiration. The center's books, usually "channeled" by prominent figures of various times and cultures, explicitly utilize Theosophical terms and concepts.

Protestantism was initially established in Portugal by organizations serving expatriate communities such as the British Anglicans (1656) and German Lutherans (1763). Protestant movements seeking to evangelize Catholic Portuguese began in earnest in the nineteenth century with the arrival of Presbyterians (1838), Christian Brethren (1867), Methodists (1871), and Baptists (1888). They were joined by one important schism of the Roman Church, the LUSITANIAN CHURCH OF PORTUGAL (1871). The twentieth century saw the arrival of a spectrum of Protestant/Free Church groups, among the most successful being the ASSEMBLIES OF GOD, an American Pentecostal body.

While social chaos wrecked Portugal in 1917, three shepherd children witnessed the first of a series of Marian apparitions near the town of Fátima, on May 13. This event not only helped the Catholic Church to regain its local power but turned into an international religious phenomena bringing hundreds of thousands of pilgrims to Fátima in search of healing or in order to fulfill promises made to the Virgin in prayer. By 2000, two of the shepherds were beatified.

By 1926 a military coup initiated a forty-eight-year dictatorship. During this period the Catholic Church would regain its hegemony. Thus, by 1929 the religious orders were allowed to return and in 1940 the Holy See celebrated the Concordat with the Portuguese State. This document, which is still in use, though many of its articles are now obsolete, gave the Catholic Church exclusive privileges, including the right to celebrate marriages (which could not be terminated by a legal action of divorce); it also returned to the church control over confiscated assets and reintroduced religious education in public schools, which had been abolished by the First Republic.

The 1974 revolution brought in the right of religious association and the freedom of religious choice, thus permitting new religious movements based outside of the country to establish themselves in Portugal. Twenty-five years later, a new law of religious freedom was discussed in Parliament. Although an eventual approval of this new law will enhance equality of rights for all religious associations, it still acknowledges a special role for the Catholic Church.

In a 1998 survey, 89.3 percent of the population claimed to be Catholic, although weekly participation in the activities of the church is less than 30 percent. After Catholics, the second largest group, numbering 7.8 percent of the total, is made up of people with no religious affiliation. The number of individuals belonging to new religions may be less than 2 percent of the population, including older movements such as Jehovah's Witnesses and the SEVENTH-DAY ADVENTIST CHURCH. To date, new religions have not had significant impact at the political or social level, with the exception of two Pentecostal movements, the Brazilian Igreja Universal do Reino de Deus and the Portuguese Igreja Maná, which has had a significant expansion to Portuguese-speaking countries in Africa.

Finally, one of the most polychromatic aspects of Portuguese religiosity lies in the seasonal religious festivities, most of them celebrated locally with particular variants. Many of these, blending religious-magical motifs, still present the remains of ancient pre-Christian traditions while manifesting a creative syncretism with Catholic ceremonies and the cult of saints.

Sources:

- Gomes, Pinharanda. Dicionário de Filosofia Portuguesa. Lisbon: Publicações Dom Quixote, 1987.
- Mattoso, José, ed. História de Portugal. Vols. 1–7. Lisbon: Círculo de Leitores, 1994.
- Vasconcellos, J. Leite de. Religiões da Lusitânia. Vols. 1–3. Lisbon: Imprensa Nacional, 1878, 1905, 1913.

Presbyterian Church in Brazil

Reformed efforts to establish a presence in Brazil were initiated briefly in the 1550s and again in the mid-1600s, but it was not until the early nineteenth century and the introduction of a degree of religious liberty in the 1820s that permanent work could be established. In 1855, Robert Reid Kelly (1809–1888), a physician, settled in Rio de Janeiro. Out of his efforts the Igreja Evangelica Fluminense was founded. That congregation became the beginning of Congregationalism in Brazil. In 1859, Asbel Green Simonton (1831–1867), a missionary from the American Presbyterian Church (now the PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH [U.S.A.]) arrived in 1859 and four years later organized the first Presbyterian church in Rio. He and Kelly worked closely together, the latter supporting Green as he founded a Protestant periodical and opened a seminary to train church workers.

After the American Civil War (1860–1865), American Presbyterians from both the two large Presbyterian churches in the United States supported Green's work and contributed both finances and personnel. The Presbyterian movement in Brazil became the largest of the several Protestant missions. The work prospered through the nineteenth century, but as the new century began it was hit with a major controversy over local autonomy, which many Brazilian leaders began to demand. That controversy expanded as one group began to denounce Freemasonry. The dissenting faction left to form the Independent Presbyterian Church.

The church that continued under the guidance of the missionaries weathered the storm and continued to grow. After World War II, the process of creating the Presbyterian Church of Brazil was formally completed. The church adopted the Westminster Confession of Faith as its doctrinal standard.

The church was hit with another controversy in the 1970s when the more liberal wing of the church protested a set of doctrinal positions and the church's social stance. They joined with some ministers and congregations that had already left the Independent Presbyterian Church to form the UNITED PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH OF BRAZIL. However, with some forty thousand members, the Presbyterian Church of Brazil remains the largest of the several churches of the Reformed tradition in the country, though its place as the largest of the non-Catholic bodies has been eclipsed by a number of Free Church and Pentecostal movements. The church is a member of the WORLD ALLIANCE OF REFORMED CHURCHES.

Address:

Presbyterian Church in Brazil
C.P. 17
Rua Silva Jardim 23
Centro, 20050–060
Rio de Janeiro, RJ
Brazil

Source:

- Bauswein, Jean-Jacques, and Lukas Vischer, eds. The Reformed Family Worldwide: A Survey of Reformed Churches, Theological Schools, and International Organizations. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans, 1999.

Presbyterian Church in Cameroon

The Presbyterian Church in Cameroon (Église presbytérienne camérounaise) shares its early history with several churches, such as the EVANGELICAL CHURCH OF CAMEROON, that have their roots in the original Baptist mission begun in 1845. The Baptists were forced out in 1884 when Germany gained hegemony over the region, and they were replaced with missionaries from the Basel Mission, most of whom were of the Swiss Reformed tradition. The Baptist members were upset with the very different system of church discipline introduced by the Basel missionaries and by their introduction of infant baptism. (Baptists believe in the baptism only of adults who have made a profession of the Christian faith.) Many left, but the missionaries continued to work with the remaining members and initiated their own new mission stations.

With the outbreak of World War I in 1914, the British and French moved into the region and divided the territory. The Basel missionaries turned over fifteen of its stations in French Cameroon to the PARIS MISSION. These eventually became the core from which the Evangelical Church of Cameroon would emerge. The remaining work was turned over to African leaders who headed the church for the next decade. Finally, in 1925, the missionaries from the Basel Mission were allowed to return to the British controlled part of Cameroon. They continued to work with the church that they had nurtured through World War I but soon realized that it was time for the mission to become independent.

In 1957 the Presbyterian Church in Cameroon was constituted. It is organized with a presbyterial polity, with a synod as the highest legislative body. The mission continued to support the schools and medical facilities, both with financial aid and staff. In 1968 the schools were turned over to the church. Among the schools now sponsored by the church is the Theological Seminary at Kumba.

Presbyterian Church in Canada

In the 1990s the Presbyterian Church in Cameroon reported three hundred thousand members in its 291 congregations. It is a member of the World Alliance of Reformed Churches and the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES.

Address:

Presbyterian Church in Cameroon
P.O. Box 19
Buea
Cameroon

Source:

Bauswein, Jean-Jacques, and Lukas Vischer, eds. The Reformed Family Worldwide: A Survey of Reformed Churches, Theological Schools, and International Organizations. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans, 1999.

Presbyterian Church in Canada

The Presbyterian Church in Canada (PCC) has its origins in the sixteenth-century Protestant Reformation in Europe and in the teachings of reformers John Calvin (1509–1564) and John Knox (c. 1514–1572). The Presbyterian presence in Canada began with the arrival of Scottish Presbyterians in the Maritime Provinces and Ontario in the late eighteenth century. The various locations and organizations of Presbyterians in Canada followed trends in immigration from Scotland, as well as mirroring the doctrinal disputes occurring in Scotland.

The nineteenth century, however, saw a slow unification of the various diverse Presbyterian denominations. In 1875 these unions culminated in the formation of the Presbyterian Church in Canada. By the end of the nineteenth century the PCC was “neck and neck” with the Methodists in the race to be the largest Protestant denomination in Canada. In 1925 about one-third of the PCC membership refused to join with the Methodists and the Congregationalists in the formation of the UNITED CHURCH OF CANADA, instead remaining autonomous as the PCC. The PCC experienced a significant decrease in membership at the end of the twentieth century, with membership standing at around 135,000 in one thousand congregations.

Many famous Canadians have been Presbyterians, including George M. Grant (1835–1902), principal at Queens University, Prime Minister William Mackenzie King (1874–1950), and Charles W. Gordon, known as a novelist by the name Ralph Connor (1860–1937).

The word presbyterian comes from the Greek word presbyteros (meaning elder). The PCC is governed by elders elected from each congregation. These elders, along with the ordained clergy, provide leadership in the church and at the various levels of church government: the session, the presbytery, the synod, and the General Assembly, the highest court of the church, which meets once a year. The PCC teaches that the Bible is the most authoritative source for faith and practice, and its subordinate standards are expressed in the Westminster Confession of Faith and the statement of belief entitled Living Faith. Two ordinances are practiced: (infant) baptism and the Lord’s Supper, which is celebrated weekly, monthly, or quarterly.

Recent trends in the PCC include a growing ethnic diversity in the churches. Although still retaining much of its Scottish heritage, the modern PCC includes growing Korean, Chinese, Ghanaian, and other ethnic congregations. The church’s head office is in Toronto, Ontario. The PCC actively participates with the Canadian Council of Churches, the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES, and the WORLD ALLIANCE OF REFORMED CHURCHES.

Address:

Presbyterian Church in Canada
50 Wynford Dr.
Toronto, Ontario M3C 1J7
Canada
<http://www.presbyterian.ca>

Gordon L. Heath

Sources:

Congram, John. This Presbyterian Church of Ours. Hamilton, Ontario: N.p., 1995.
Moir, John. Enduring Witness: A History of the Presbyterian Church in Canada. Hamilton, Ontario: Presbyterian Press, 1987.

Presbyterian Church in Rwanda

The Presbyterian Church in Rwanda grew out of the work of the Bethel Mission, a German society created especially to missionize the lands of the expanding German colonial empire. Germany was given hegemony over Rwanda by the Berlin Conference of 1885, and the Bethel Mission established its work in 1907. The mission had hardly established itself when World War I began, and following Germany’s defeat, the missionaries were forced out. Rwanda was reasigned as a Belgian protectorate, and the Bethel Mission’s work was taken over by the Belgian Protestant Missionary Society. The missionary society remained in control until 1959, when the mission became independent as the Presbyterian Church in Rwanda.

For more than a generation the church experienced equal growth among the several major groups of Rwanda, the Hutu, Tutsi, and Twa peoples. It created a system of primary and secondary schools and several professional schools and medical facilities. However, in 1994 when the tribal war began, the church faced severe disruption, as it had members among both the persecuted Tutsi and the persecutor Hutu. In the years since, the major work of the church has focused upon the necessary reconciliation, healing, and restitution for all of the killing that took place in that year.

In the years following the events of 1994, the church has reported 120,000 members. It is organized with a presbyterian polity, and the general assembly is the highest lawmaking body in the church. The church is a member of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES and the WORLD ALLIANCE OF REFORMED CHURCHES.

Address:

Presbyterian Church in Rwanda
B.P. 56
Kigali
Rwanda

Source:

Bauswein, Jean-Jacques, and Lukas Vischer, eds. The Reformed Family Worldwide: A Survey of Reformed Churches, Theological Schools, and International Organizations. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans, 1999.

Presbyterian Church in Taiwan

The Presbyterian Church in Taiwan dates to the arrival of British Presbyterians in 1865. They were joined by their colleagues from Canada in 1872. The British started their mission work on the southern part of the island and the Canadians in the north. Both added medical work to their missionary enterprise.

In 1895 the Japanese invaded and occupied the island. After that date no new missions were allowed to enter, and thus the Presbyterian work developed without the competition that had characterized many early-twentieth-century settings. The mission continued to progress normally into the 1930s, but as war loomed and the authorities assumed a more militant stance, the missionaries withdrew and turned the church over to the Taiwanese leadership.

The missionaries returned after World War II. They picked up their work and in 1951 led in the uniting of the two missions under a single general assembly of what became the Presbyterian Church in Taiwan. The church now found itself in a radically changed environment. The population exploded, with thousands of refugees coming to Taiwan from mainland China. Not only did they bring new Christian movements with them, but a variety of missionaries from across the Protestant/Free Church spectrum also founded new missionary efforts on the island. The church doubled its membership in the decade from 1955 to 1965. It has since focused on evangelism and continued to grow through the last half of the twentieth century, though it is still very much a minority religion in a largely Buddhist country.

In the late 1990s the Church reported 222,000 members in a country of 21 million. It has a presbyterial polity with a biennial general assembly as the highest lawmaking body. It adheres to the Heidelberg Confession and the Westminster Confession as its standards of doctrine.

The church has shown a self-conscious desire to become an indigenous body and has continually expressed its concern for the Republic of China and the future of the people of Taiwan. Beginning in the 1970s it has issued a number of official statements on Taiwan, beginning with "Our National Fate" in 1971. It followed with "Our Appeal" (1975); "On Human Rights" (1977); "Recommendations Concerning the Present Situation" (1990); and "On the Sovereignty of Taiwan" (1991). It has worked on a variety of social issues concerning the working classes and the plight of prostitutes. Continuing the early medical work of the missions, it now sponsors a set of hospitals. The church is a member of the WORLD ALLIANCE OF REFORMED CHURCHES and the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES.

Address:

Presbyterian Church in Taiwan
3, Lane 269
Roosevelt Rd., Sec. 3
Paipei 106
Taiwan
<http://www.pct.org.tw/>

Source:

Bauswein, Jean-Jacques, and Lukas Vischer, eds. The Reformed Family Worldwide: A Survey of Reformed Churches, Theological Schools, and International Organizations. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans, 1999.

Presbyterian Church in the Republic of Korea

The most liberal of the various Presbyterian churches in Korea, the Presbyterian Church in the Republic of (South) Korea originated in a controversy of the Presbyterian Church in Korea in the years immediately following World War II. In 1938 the students and faculty of Chosun Seminary, then located in Pyongyang, Korea, refused to worship as ordered at the emperor's shrine. The seminary was closed down, and those associated with it scattered. A year later, they reopened the seminary in southern Korea. Its faculty adopted a liberal Protestant theological perspective.

In 1946 the reorganized Presbyterian Church of Korea recognized Chosun Seminary as its seminary. However, shortly thereafter, an intense theological debate developed over a document released by the president. Conservative members of the church accused the seminary of teaching heresy. One professor left and founded a new seminary, which the general assembly of the church also recognized.

In order to resolve its stance relative to the two seminaries, the assembly next withdrew its support from both schools and asked the leadership to resolve their differences. During the succeeding negotiations, however, it became obvious that the positions taken by the representatives of Chosun Seminary did not represent the stance of the church. In 1952 the seminary president, Dr. Kim Jae-Joon (1901–1984), was expelled from the church.

Presbyterian Church in the Sudan

In 1953 the supporters of the seminary formed the Presbyterian Church in the Republic of Korea. Its appearance came just a few years before the Presbyterian Church of Korea would split into two factions—the PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH OF KOREA (TONGHAP) and the PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH OF KOREA (HAPDONG). The Presbyterian Church in the Republic of Korea has aligned itself with the most liberal elements in Presbyterianism worldwide. It was the first of the Korean churches to invite females into the ordained ministry. In 1987 it adopted a new confession, similar in tone to the Confession of 1967 of the PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH (U.S.A.). It has backed efforts toward the reunification of North and South Korea.

At the end of the 1990s the church reported more than 325,000 members. The general assembly is the highest legislative body in the church. It supports Theological Seminary, Seoul and HanShin University, Suwon. It is a member of the WORLD ALLIANCE OF REFORMED CHURCHES and the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES.

Address:

Presbyterian Church in the Republic of Korea
#1501 Korean Ecumenical Building
136–56 YunJi-Dong
Chong Ro-Gu
Seoul 110–470
Republic of Korea

Source:

Bauswein, Jean-Jacques, and Lukas Vischer, eds. The Reformed Family Worldwide: A Survey of Reformed Churches, Theological Schools, and International Organizations. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans, 1999.

Presbyterian Church in the Sudan

American Presbyterians entered the Sudan in 1901 and established their initial station at Omdurman in the southern part of the country. The north was not open to them at the time, and evangelization was directed toward people living in the province of the upper Nile. There was a small educational effort in the north based in a community of expatriate Egyptians. It was connected with the EVANGELICAL CHURCH–SYNOD OF THE NILE, but it now exists as the independent Sudan Presbyterian Evangelical Church.

The work in the south spread among various peoples: the Shilluk, Nuer, Dinka, Anuak, and Murle. The work progressed slowly, but the first Sudanese pastor was ordained in 1942. Plans to unite the Presbyterian work with both the work in the north and the Anglican work were pursued but produced no positive results.

Since the time of national independence in 1956, the work of what became the Presbyterian Church in the Sudan has proceeded only under the most difficult of conditions. The country's constitution failed to give the non-Muslim area in the south, consisting primarily of Africans, any guarantees against encroachment from the Arab north. A civil war began that lasted until 1972. Peace lasted eleven years, and then the government declared its intention of making Muslim law the law of the land. In 1983 war was renewed, and a state of hostility has continued to the present.

The Presbyterian Church is headed by a general assembly that meets quadrennially. The congregations are divided into two presbyteries, one serving the area controlled by the government and the other, the area controlled by the rebel forces. All growth is in the latter area. The church has experienced one major schism, in 1986, when the members among the Dinka people left to found the independent Trinity Presbyterian Church of Sudan.

The Presbyterian Church of the Sudan reports approximately 450,000 members in 250 congregations. It is a member of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES and the WORLD ALLIANCE OF REFORMED CHURCHES, and it operates the Nile Theological College in Khartoum.

Address:

Presbyterian Church in the Sudan
P.O. Box 3421
Khartoum
Sudan

Source:

Bauswein, Jean-Jacques, and Lukas Vischer, eds. The Reformed Family Worldwide: A Survey of Reformed Churches, Theological Schools, and International Organizations. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans, 1999.

Presbyterian Church in Trinidad

The contemporary presence of the Presbyterian Church in Trinidad has its origins in the intertwined histories of the nineteenth-century British colonial economy and the evangelism of two Canadian missionaries: John and Sarah Morton. Presbyterian churches in Trinidad are also called East Indian churches because of the close association between Canadian mission work and migrants from South Asia who were imported by the British to work on sugar cane plantations. Despite the fact that less than half of all Christian Indians are Presbyterian, Christian Indians and Presbyterianism have a strong association in Trinidad. Certainly this is the impression given by the preponderance of literature on Presbyterian (East) Indians and by the fact that 95 percent of the Presbyterian population is ethnically Indian. According to the 1990 census 38,740 people identified themselves as Presbyterian. Since the vast majority of Presbyterians are Indian, this would represent about 8.5 percent of the Indian population and 3.3 percent of the total 1990 population.

The Canadian Mission began in the small village of Iere in south central Trinidad. At the time, the village of Iere was surrounded by cane fields, and southern Trinidad had the highest concentration of South Asian Indians on the island. Most laborers were Hindu, and a smaller proportion were Muslim. Early in the 1860s, Canadians John and Sarah Morton visited Trinidad when the ship they were on, which was headed to Barbados, was blown off course. They were distraught over the lack of mission work among the Indian laborers and decided to make this their life's work. After several failed attempts to gain support in Canada for their mission, they arrived in Iere, Trinidad, in 1868 in order to serve a small African population left by a failed American Presbyterian mission. As the Mortons did not have their own resources, the abandonment of the Presbyterian Church in the southern sugar district proved to be serendipitous. The Reverend Morton would make excursions into the village and to surrounding estate barracks, but he had little success at first. The Indians did not trust him, and they also were hesitant to mix with Africans, mainly for ritual and linguistic reasons.

Since Morton's goal was to evangelize among Indians and they were resisting his invitations to visit the church, he established a school on the church's doorstep within three months of arriving in Trinidad. The lessons were especially designed for the Indians and given in what was still broken Hindi. During his visits to Indians in their homes, shops, and estate barracks, Morton employed a number of techniques. These included learning Hindi, observing Indian religious life in order to converse freely with Indians, providing simple medical and legal assistance, denying caste, making a Hindi hymnal, and going anywhere to help Indians—the latter a practice that earned him both trust and respect. Sarah Morton gained the confidence of women and opened an orphanage for girls. They trained new converts as native evangelists and teachers, and they took advantage of the East Indians' great pride in their ethnic cohesiveness by providing them with their own East Indian Church.

Finally, the Mortons provided the single most important means for Indians to gain an education. The Mortons' Hindi would improve, and the number of schools would increase, eventually becoming the trademarks of the mission. Thus, the Iere village doorstep school was only the beginning of a process that would last for over a century under Canadian leadership. By 1915 there were 97 preaching stations, of which 89 had a separate church structure. Over the years the number of preaching stations/schools varied, with a peak of 129 by 1967 when the Canadian missionaries began the process of creating the Presbyterian Church in Trinidad. During this period Trinidad and Tobago had achieved independence (1962), and all schools were subsumed under the central government, although they retained their sectarian identities. The Mortons returned to Canada in 1875.

To this day, small Indian communities who wish to hold Presbyterian services, yet are not formally recognized as a congregation, will meet in someone's home with a minister, just as John Morton visited barracks on estates to hold the first services. As the community is able to build a structure, the congregation becomes formalized. Despite the active promotion of incipient congregations throughout Trinidad, there are now only 91 active congregations, some of them very small. The church is a member of the Caribbean Conference of Churches, the WORLD ALLIANCE OF REFORMED CHURCHES, and the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES. It supports St. Andrew's Theological College, also located in San Fernando.

The dual function of the Presbyterian Church as school and the Presbyterian School as church is as much a part of the contemporary identity of the East Indian Church in Trinidad as is its ethnic association and sectarian philosophy. Yet despite the success of the mission, as evidenced by the very existence of so many Presbyterian churches in Trinidad's landscape, it is also important to note that the missionaries converted only a small proportion of the Indian population, and the number of congregations has declined. Most native ministers are responsible for several congregations each, and new missionaries (mainly American Pentecostals) have targeted Indian Christians, so the number of congregations continues to decline. Presbyterian schools continue to be highly regarded by Indians, but today few choose to convert to the faith. Thus, one must conclude that the mission was of limited success.

Address:

Presbyterian Church in Trinidad
Box 92
Paradise Hill
Dan Fernando
Trinidad

Carolyn V. Prorok

Sources:

- Doodnath, S. A Short History of the Early Presbyterian Church and the Indian Immigrant, 1845–1945. Trinidad: n.p., 1983.
- Hamid, I. A History of the Presbyterian Church in Trinidad, 1868–1968: The Struggles of a Church in Colonial Captivity. Trinidad: Privately published, 1980.
- Morton, S. E. John Morton of Trinidad. Toronto: n.p., 1916.
- Prorok, Carolyn V. "The Significance of Historical Geography: A Case Study of the Church as School in the Diffusion of the Presbyterian Mission to Trinidad." Historical Reflections/ Reflexions Historiques 23, 3 (1997): 371–388.

Presbyterian Church of Africa

The Free Church of Scotland began missionary work in South Africa soon after its formation in the 1840s. In 1898, on the eve of its merger with the United Presbyterian Church (now a constituent part of the Church of Scotland),

Presbyterian Church of Aotearoa New Zealand

six Free Church African ministers under the leadership of Panibani Mzimba left the South African mission in a dispute that revolved around the use of the mission's financial resources. With a number of lay supporters they organized congregations and continued their ministries. A century later the church had become one of the largest in South Africa, with a reported 927,000 members.

The Presbyterian Church of Africa is a member of the WORLD ALLIANCE OF REFORMED CHURCHES and the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES, and it led in the founding of the African Independent Churches Association. Membership is concentrated among the African native peoples of the eastern cape and Natal, with a significant following also in Malawi. The church has accepted the Westminster Confession as its doctrinal statement. It began admitting females to the ordained ministry in the 1980s.

Address:

Presbyterian Church of Africa
21 St. Andrews St.
Durham 4001
South Africa

Source:

Bauswein, Jean-Jacques, and Lukas Vischer, eds. The Reformed Family Worldwide: A Survey of Reformed Churches, Theological Schools, and International Organizations. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans, 1999.

Presbyterian Church of Aotearoa New Zealand

Settlers who had been members of the CHURCH OF SCOTLAND in their homeland arrived in New Zealand in the 1830s. Their first church was founded in 1840 in Wellington. Meanwhile, back in Scotland, the church underwent a disruption that led many ministers and congregations to leave and found the Free Church of Scotland, and it was from the Free Church that ministers arrived to provide leadership for the New Zealand Presbyterians. The Free Church prospered in New Zealand, with two separate churches developing, one on the north island and one on the south island. The two churches merged in 1901 to form the present Presbyterian Church of Aotearoa New Zealand.

The church continues the doctrines and practices of the Church of Scotland. It affirms the Westminster Catechism and the Westminster Confession of Faith, but it has more recently composed its own contemporary statement, the "Faith We Affirm Together." The church is headed by a general assembly, which meets annually. Within the church, there is a Maori Synod (Te Aka Puaho) that oversees ministry to the Maori people, and a Pacific Islanders' Synod. The church also admits women fully to every level of ministry and service.

The church reports some forty thousand members, though in the 1996 Census, 458,289 people (some 12.7 percent of population) indicated they were Presbyterians. The church sponsors Knox Theological Hall (founded in 1876) and the Center for Advanced Ministry Studies. It is a member of the WORLD ALLIANCE OF REFORMED CHURCHES and the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES.

Address:

Presbyterian Church of Aotearoa New Zealand, General Assembly
P.O. Box 9049
Wellington
Aotearoa New Zealand
<http://www.presbyterian.org.nz/>

Sources:

Elder, John Rawson. The History of the Presbyterian Church of New Zealand, 1840–1940. Christchurch, NZ: Presbyterian Bookroom, 1940.
McEldowney, Dennis, ed. Presbyterians in Aotearoa New Zealand, 1840–1990. Wellington, NZ: The Presbyterian Church of New Zealand, 1990.

Presbyterian Church of Australia (Continuing)

In 1977, the majority of the Presbyterian Church of Australia merged into the Uniting Church in Australia. Approximately 30 percent of the church, the more conservative wing, refused to join in the merger and reorganized to continue as a strictly Presbyterian church. The Westminster Confession was reaffirmed as the church's doctrinal standard and congregations were regrouped in new presbyteries and nationally a general assembly was organized to meet every three years.

The church has taken a number of steps to reaffirm its role as a traditional Presbyterian body, not the least being its withdrawal from the WORLD ALLIANCE OF REFORMED CHURCHES and its joining the REFORMED ECUMENICAL COUNCIL in 1982. A renewed interest in Reformed theology has been noticed and an emphasis on world missions has led to the sponsoring of missionaries in more than 20 countries in the South Pacific and around the Indian Ocean.

The church has its headquarters at P. O. Box 100, 420 Elizabeth St., Surry Hills, Sydney, NSW 2001, Australia. It supports an Internet site at <http://www.presbyterian.org.au/>. As the new century begins it has some 70,000 members in more than 400 congregations. In 1991, the General Assembly rescinded its approval of the ordination of women, though some parts of the church still recognize them. It supports eleven colleges including three theological schools.

Sources:

Breward, I. A History of the Australian Churches. St. Leonards, Australia: Allen & Unwin, 1993.

Humphries, R. A., and R. S. Ward, eds. Religious Bodies in Australia: A Comprehensive Guide. Wantirna, Australia: New Melbourne Press, 1995.

Presbyterian Church of Cameroon

The Presbyterian Church of Cameroon grew out of the mission of the U.S. Presbyterians in Gabon. In 1875 a new missionary station was opened in Batanga, in southern Cameroon. A decade later Cameroon came under German hegemony. Subsequently, an agreement was reached to extend the Presbyterian work, including the formation of primary schools for the residents, further into Cameroon. The government demanded that Gennan be used as a primary language.

In 1892 work was launched among the Bulu people that prospered through the rest of the decade. The first works in the Bulu language, the Bible and some hymns, were published in 1894. However, in 1898 a revolt developed among the Bulu directed at the German authorities who were interfering with the trade between Yaoundé and the port city of Kribi. In their effort to quell the uprising, the Germans seized the mission station that had been opened at Lolodorf in 1897. The Presbyterians demanded compensation, at which point the U.S. government became involved. The Presbyterians received compensation, but their relations with the German authorities was ruined. Although the church-sponsored schools employed German teachers, the students were denied the privilege of sitting for the German examination that was necessary for admittance to European universities.

German control in Cameroon ended during World War I. The PARIS MISSION came into Cameroon and took over the work of the BASEL MISSION. In 1902 it released that work, consisting of some ninety-four congregations, to the Presbyterian Mission. It subsequently grew into one of the largest missionary enterprises in the country. In the 1950s the mission began the translation of the Bible (published in 1960) into the Bassa language used by many who had come to it from the Paris Mission.

In 1956 the mission was granted autonomy as the Presbyterian Church of Cameroon (Église presbytérienne camérounaise). It is organized with a presbyterial order, with congregations associated in five synods. Doctrinally, the church recognizes the Heidelberg Catechism and the Westminster Confession as doctrinal standards.

In the 1990s the church reported six hundred thousand members in five hundred congregations. It sponsors Dager Theological School in Bibia and the Faculty of Protestant Theology at Yaoundé. It is a member of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES and the WORLD ALLIANCE OF REFORMED CHURCHES.

Address:

Presbyterian Church of Cameroon
B.P. 519

Yaoundé
Cameroon

Source:

Bauswein, Jean-Jacques, and Lukas Vischer, eds. The Reformed Family Worldwide: A Survey of Reformed Churches, Theological Schools, and International Organizations. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans, 1999.

Presbyterian Church of Colombia

Henry Barrington Post, a missionary with the Presbyterian Church in the United States (now a constituent part of the PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH [U.S.A.]), arrived in Colombia in 1856 and settled in Santa Fe de Bogotá. Five years later he was able to open a church and begin a Protestant mission, which included a program of public education. He was assisted in this educational enterprise by Kate McFarren, who joined him in 1868. She founded a girls' school that later became known as the Colegio Americano. Additional schools were opened in Barranquilla, Bucaramanga, Ibagué, and Girardot. The mission grew slowly, the dominant ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH viewing it as an unwanted intrusion into its territory. Conditions changed only after the Second Vatican Council and the general improvement of Protestant-Catholic relations in general in the 1960s.

In the 1980s the mission, which had now become the independent Presbyterian Church of Colombia, experienced some internal turmoil over leadership. The issues were finally resolved by dividing the church and its properties between two jurisdictions. One, called the Presbyterian Synod, retained approximately one-third of the members in three presbyteries. The other, called the Reformed Synod, has four presbyteries. Apart from leadership personnel, the two synods are largely the same. Both have the Westminster Confession as their standard of faith. Both retain a presbyterial organization with a synod as the highest legislative body. Both recognize each other as parts of the same church. Both are members of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES.

In the mid-1990s, the Presbyterian Synod reported some forty-five hundred members in thirty-five congregations. It supports the Presbyterian Theological Seminary in Barranquilla, originally set up to train ministers in Colombia, Venezuela, and Ecuador. It is a member of the WORLD ALLIANCE OF REFORMED CHURCHES.

In the mid-1990s the Reformed Synod reported fifty-seven hundred members in fifteen congregations. It supports three schools: the Biblical Institute at Monteria, the Presbyterian Theological Faculty at Ibagué, and the Corporate Theological Faculty at Bogotá. In addition, the synod supports an extensive primary and secondary school system.

Addresses:

The Presbyterian Synod
AA 562 Carrera 46
No. 48–50
Barranquilla, Atlco
Colombia

The Reformed Synod
Carrera 4a #4–11
Ibangué, Tolima
Colombia

Source:

Bauswein, Jean-Jacques, and Lukas Vischer, eds. The Reformed Family Worldwide: A Survey of Reformed Churches, Theological Schools, and International Organizations. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans, 1999.

Presbyterian Church of East Africa

The Presbyterian Church of East Africa began in 1891 when a small group of independent Presbyterian missionaries initiated work at Kibwezi. Later in the decade they opened a second station at Kikuyu, the Kikuyu being the largest single group among Kenya's indigenous peoples. Through the Scottish Missionary Society, the Church of Scotland took responsibility for the mission in 1901. The Kikuyu proved a challenge, and only in 1907 was an initial baptism recorded. Only a few hundred became Christians in the first decades of the new century. In 1920 a presbytery was finally established, combining the mission with the church serving Scottish expatriates residing in what was then a British colony. Some progress was noted in 1926, when the first class of Kenyan pastors were ordained.

The upward trajectory recorded through the 1920s came to an abrupt end in 1929, when a controversy broke out in Kikuyu country over the practice of female circumcision. The presbytery issued a statement declaring the practice incompatible with Christian faith. The Kikuyu leaders declared that the church was against their culture and tradition. Only slowly, as the church passed to African leadership and the controversy died, did the church regain its initiative.

A new growth phase began in 1945, when the work of the Gospel Missionary Society, an independent U.S.-based missionary organization, merged into the presbytery. The Presbyterian Church of East Africa, as the mission had become known, became independent in 1956. At that time, the Overseas Presbytery of Kenya, a predominantly White body including one congregation each in Tanzania and Uganda that had been constituted separately in 1936, merged into the new church. The first Kenyan general secretary, John Gatu, took office. The church admitted women to ordination in 1976.

In the 1990s the Presbyterian Church of East Africa had 3 million members. It supports the Reformed College of East Africa and, with the Methodist, Anglican, and Reformed churches, St. Paul's United Theological College. It is a member of the WORLD ALLIANCE OF REFORMED CHURCHES and the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES.

Address:

Presbyterian Church of East Africa
P.O. Box 99
Kisumu Rd.
Eldoret
Kenya

Source:

Bauswein, Jean-Jacques, and Lukas Vischer, eds. The Reformed Family Worldwide: A Survey of Reformed Churches, Theological Schools, and International Organizations. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans, 1999.

Presbyterian Church of Ghana

In the 1820s, the Basel Mission, supported by Reformed and Lutheran churches in Germany and Switzerland, began one of its first Christian missionary efforts in what was then the Gold Coast among the Ga- and Twi-speaking peoples in the eastern part of the region. Stations were subsequently opened in other parts of the country. Some of the converts who showed promise were sent to Europe for training. One of these students, David Asante, who was trained at Basel, was in 1864 the first African ordained by the missionaries.

During World War I, German and Swiss missionaries had to leave the Gold Coast. In 1920 the Basel Mission turned its work over to the Scottish Mission. The mission matured into the Presbyterian Church of the Gold Coast in 1926. The Gold Coast became the independent nation of Ghana in 1957, and subsequently the Presbyterian Church changed its name.

The church has subsequently spread to all parts of the nation and has become one of the larger religious bodies in the country. Its 450,000 members are divided into thirteen presbyteries. A synod serves as the church's highest legislative body. The church has also developed an extensive educational and medical program. Worship is now conducted in a variety of languages. Most recently, the church has experienced both the new life and the disturbances that have come as the Charismatic movement has spread through its ranks. The church is a member of the WORLD ALLIANCE OF REFORMED CHURCHES and the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES.

Address:

Presbyterian Church of Ghana
P.O. Box 1800
Thorpe Rd.
Accra
Ghana

Source:

Bauswein, Jean-Jacques, and Lukas Vischer, eds. The Reformed Family Worldwide: A Survey of Reformed Churches, Theological Schools, and International Organizations. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans, 1999.

Presbyterian Church of India

The Presbyterian Church of India has its roots in the original Baptist mission that in 1813 had opened work in the area of the Kasai Hills, in the easternmost part of Bengal. Although there was some response to this work over the next two decades, in 1938 the mission was abandoned. In 1841 Thomas Jones (d. 1849) and his wife Anne (d. 1846), Presbyterians from Wales, arrived and started evangelistic work in the same area. They worked alone for nine years until they were joined by William Pryse. Their work had success over the next two decades, and in 1967 the first presbytery was formed. As the work continued to grow through the last half of the century, it was divided in 1895 into five presbyteries, and the following year a synod called the Assembly was created.

At the same time, work began in Sylhet and Cachar in what is now Bangladesh, where in the early twentieth century a second assembly developed. In 1894 missionary activity was extended to Mizoram in northeast India, growing rapidly through several mass movements of people into the church. Today the region is largely Christian. Early in the twentieth century, the work extended into the area around the North Cachar Hills, leading in 1930 to the creation of another assembly.

In 1926 the various segments of the work that had been developed for almost a century were brought together as the Presbyterian Church of North India, and an assembly for the entire church was created. The various geographic regions were reorganized as synods. The church had been extended to a number of Indian peoples speaking a variety of languages, and as the church continued to grow more than twenty languages were in regular use.

The post-World War II era brought a number of changes. A significant part of the church operated in what became Pakistan in 1947, and the partition separated this group from the main body of the church. In 1959 a number of Christians in Manipur of different denominational and linguistic backgrounds were organized as Presbyterians and in 1959 were included in the church. The Manipur Synod was created in 1978.

In the late 1990s the Presbyterian Church of India reported 797,700 members. The church has been part of the larger Protestant community of northern India, but it stayed out of the several mergers that led to the formation of the CHURCH OF NORTH INDIA in 1970. It is not a member of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES, but it is a member of the WORLD ALLIANCE OF REFORMED CHURCHES and a partner with the Council on World Mission.

Address:

Presbyterian Assembly House
Central Ward, OPP
State Library
Shillong Meghalaya, 793 001
India

Source:

Bauswein, Jean-Jacques, and Lukas Vischer, eds. The Reformed Family Worldwide: A Survey of Reformed Churches, Theological Schools, and International Organizations. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans, 1999.

Presbyterian Church of Korea (HapDong)

The Presbyterian Church in Korea was a united body until 1959, when a major split created the Presbyterian Church in Korea (HapDong) and the PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH OF KOREA (TONGHAP). Disrupted by the Japanese occupation and World War II, the Presbyterian movement was reconstituted as the Presbyterian Church of Korea (PCK) in 1949. During the 1950s the Korean War overshadowed a theological war that raged within the church, as some leaders associated with the newly founded INTERNATIONAL COUNCIL OF CHRISTIAN CHURCHES, a fundamentalist body founded by associates of U.S. minister Carl McIntire (b. 1906), wooed the conservative leadership of the PCK. At issue were ecumenism, membership in the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES, and the theological perspective of the church's seminaries.

Unable to arrive at an amicable solution, the church split into two bodies in 1959. The more conservative group aligned with the International Council of Christian Churches as the Presbyterian Church of Korea (HapDong). In subsequent years, it has had spectacular growth and is now the largest Presbyterian church in the country, with more than 2.1 million members.

Although the church has experienced growth, its history has had a tumultuous course. In 1961 a group withdrew to found the Bible Presbyterian Church (now the Presbyterian Church of Korea (Dae Shin)). In 1979 another fracture began when Kim Hee-Bo, the president of ChongShin Seminary, became an advocate of the historical-critical approach to the Pentateuch, the first five books of the Bible. As the controversy raged, some attempted to find a way to heal the breach. Eventually both the group supporting the seminary and the group that had attempted to make peace broke with the larger body of the church.

The Presbyterian Church of Korea (HapDong) is organized presbyterially. The Assembly is its highest legislative body. It adheres to the Westminster Confession of Faith.

Presbyterian Church of Korea

Though it retains its conservative theological stance, it is no longer associated with the International Council of Christian Churches.

Address:

Presbyterian Church of Korea (HapDong)
1007-3 DaeChi-Dong
KangNam-GU
Seoul
Republic of Korea

Source:

Bauswein, Jean-Jacques, and Lukas Vischer, eds. The Reformed Family Worldwide: A Survey of Reformed Churches, Theological Schools, and International Organizations. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans, 1999.

Presbyterian Church of Korea (TongHap)

The more liberal of the two large Presbyterian churches in the Republic of Korea, the Presbyterian Church of Korea (TongHap) is generally seen as carrying on the missionary tradition. The story of Presbyterianism in Korea begins in Manchuria, where a Korean, Suh Sang-Yoon, was converted in 1876 by missionaries of the Scottish Missionary Society (related to the CHURCH OF SCOTLAND) and in turn assisted in the translation of the New Testament into Korean. Upon his return to his homeland in 1883, he gathered the first Protestant community. American Presbyterian missionaries of the United Presbyterian Church in North America (now an integral part of the PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH [U.S.A.]) arrived in 1884, and Horace N. Allen (1858-1932) opened the first church-supported medical facility. The Americans were soon joined by colleagues from Australia and Canada. In 1893 the several Presbyterian groups organized a mission council for Presbyterian churches, the first product of their cooperation being the theological seminary located at Pyongyang.

The progress of the church was interrupted by the Japanese invasion of the country in 1910 and the subsequent invasion that lasted through World War II. Initially, the Presbyterian movement continued to grow, and in 1912 the missionaries and the Korean pastors established the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church in Chosun. In the 1930s, however, the church was continually faced with the issue of shrine worship. The occupation authorities demanded that everyone, especially the Christians, acknowledge the Shinto shrine. In 1938, under extreme pressure, the general assembly approved worship of the shrine. Some Korean pastors and lay people started a resistance movement, which led to their arrests and imprisonment. In 1941, as the war began, most of the missionaries were expelled. The general assembly was dissolved and its membership transferred to the newly founded Chosun Presbyterian Church of Christ in Japan.

After the war, momentous change ensued. The Japanese were expelled, but the country was divided. The Peoples Republic of Korea closed the Presbyterian Church and established an antireligious regime. In southern Korea, the Presbyterian Church was reconstituted at assemblies in 1946 and 1947, taking the name Presbyterian Church of Korea in 1949. A period of rapid growth followed. That growth has been attributed to the fact that people did not identify Christianity with the colonial government and to the lay-oriented evangelism that characterized the church.

During the period of reconstituting the church, many called for a cleansing from the church of those who had worshipped at the Shinto shrine. Resistance leaders organized a presbytery in 1945 and called for full repentance by those who did not resist. They founded a seminary in Pusan, but the new Presbyterian Church refused to recognize it. The core of the resistance movement refused to join with the larger body and now exists as the Presbyterian Church in Korea (KoShin).

Through the 1950s, the church faced the issue of participation in the ecumenical movement. One group favored membership in the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES. The other leaned toward the fundamentalist INTERNATIONAL COUNCIL OF CHRISTIAN CHURCHES. The issue came to culmination in 1959, when the church divided into two somewhat equal factions, both carrying the name Presbyterian Church of Korea (PCK). The PCK (TongHap) affiliated with the World Council of Churches and the World Alliance of Presbyterian Churches.

Today, the PCK (TongHap) represents the more liberal wing of Korean Presbyterianism. In the late 1990s it reported 2.1 million members in 5,890 congregations. In 1984, in celebration of the hundredth anniversary of Korean Presbyterianism, the church open a new headquarters building in Seoul. Two year later it adopted a new confession of faith as a modern restatement of the Reformed theological position. It accepted the ordination of women in 1995. The church is led by its general assembly. It is one of the partner churches of the Council for World Mission (United Reformed Church in the United Kingdom). The church supports a number of institutions of higher learning, and it now has a worldwide ministry among Koreans who left the country during and after the Korean War.

Address:

Presbyterian Church of Korea (TongHap)
P.O. Box 1125
135 YunChi-Dong
ChongRo-ku, Seoul 100-611
Republic of Korea

Source:

Bauswein, Jean-Jacques, and Lukas Vischer, eds. The Reformed Family Worldwide: A Survey of Reformed Churches, Theological Schools, and International Organizations. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans, 1999.

Presbyterian Church of Mozambique

Reformed Christianity entered Mozambique through the preaching of Josefa Mhalamkala, who had discovered Christianity while visiting South Africa. In 1887 his work was picked up by Swiss Reformed missionary Paul Bertoud (1847–1930). The work concentrated in the southern provinces of Mozambique through the first half of the twentieth century. In subsequent decades, the church started the process of becoming an independent body, and it also began to spread to other parts of the country.

In 1961 Eduardo Mondlane (d. 1969), an official with the United Nations and a member of the Presbyterian Church of Mozambique, came back to his native land and organized FRELIMO (Frente de Liberta Vão de Mozambique), the united front against colonialism. He led the group until his assassination in 1969. In 1972 the Portuguese colonial authorities moved against the church and arrested a number of its leaders. Synod president Zedekias Manganhela was tortured and killed in prison. Pressure on the church was relieved only by the end of colonial rule in 1975.

In the 1990s the church reported one hundred thousand members. It is a member of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES and the WORLD ALLIANCE OF REFORMED CHURCHES. It supports two theological schools, the Theological Institute of Ricatla and the Theological School of Khovo. The highest legislative body in the church is the General Assembly. Doctrinally it adheres to the teachings in the Heidelberg Catechism. It has a continuing close relationship with the FEDERATION OF SWISS PROTESTANT CHURCHES.

Address:

Presbyterian Church of Mozambique
C.P. 21
Av. Ahmed Sekou Touré 1822
Maputo
Mozambique

Source:

Bauswein, Jean-Jacques, and Lukas Vischer, eds. The Reformed Family Worldwide: A Survey of Reformed Churches, Theological Schools, and International Organizations. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans, 1999.

Presbyterian Church of Nigeria

The Presbyterian Church of Nigeria has its origins in the Scottish Missionary Society's work in Jamaica. The church worked among the Africans living in Jamaica and participated in the movement for the abolition of slavery during the 1830s. After abolition, the Presbyterians experienced an influx of members, and in the 1840s the first ministers graduated from the presbytery's school. The church developed a missionary perspective and in 1846 commissioned the first of its ministers as missionaries to Calabar on the Gulf of Guinea in present-day Nigeria. The first stations were established at Duke Town and Creek Town. A third station began at Old Town Calabar in 1847. The mission work gradually moved inland.

The CHURCH OF SCOTLAND assumed responsibility for the work even before the British established their hegemony over the area. Work has concentrated among the Efik, Ibo, and Tiv peoples.

The church gained autonomy in 1954. It has a presbyterian polity and admits women to ordination. It is a member of both the WORLD ALLIANCE OF REFORMED CHURCHES and the REFORMED ECUMENICAL COUNCIL. Numerous Presbyterian and Reformed churches, primarily in the early twentieth century, began missions among one or more of Nigeria's five hundred peoples/language groups. No less than eleven different Reformed/Presbyterian churches are now operating there; the Presbyterian Church of Nigeria is the oldest but by no means the largest. It is a member of the Reformed Ecumenical Council of Nigeria, which provides fellowship and coordination among the different churches.

The Presbyterian Church of Nigeria reported 124,000 members in the 1990s. It is a member of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES.

Address:

The Presbyterian Church of Nigeria
P.O. Box 2635
26–29 Ehere Rd.
Ogbor Hill, ABA Abia
Nigeria

Source:

Bauswein, Jean-Jacques, and Lukas Vischer, eds. The Reformed Family Worldwide: A Survey of Reformed Churches, Theological Schools, and International Organizations. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans, 1999.

Presbyterian Church of Pakistan

The Presbyterian Church of Pakistan grew out of the original Protestant Christian work in what is now Pakistan. Missionaries initially arrived in the 1830s from the Punjab. The first missionary appears to have been John C. Lowrie (1808–1900), who settled in Lahore in 1834, though he soon had to retire. Then in 1849 Charles W. Forman (1821–1894) opened the first permanent missionary station and went on to develop the impressive educational program that led to the founding of a string of elementary and secondary schools, several colleges, and a seminary. Forman led in the founding of the Lahore Church Council. In 1904 the Lahore Church Council joined the United Church of Northern India (a union of Congregational and Presbyterian missions that would later become part of the CHURCH OF NORTH INDIA).

Presbyterian Church of Southern Africa

A second missionary thrust began in 1855 under Andrew Gordon (1828–1887) of the United Presbyterian Church in the U.S.A. (now a part of the PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH [U.S.A.]). He began in Lahore and then expanded to Sialkot. Four years later the Presbytery of Sialkot was organized. In 1893 the Sialkot work was incorporated as one presbytery in the Synod of the Punjab of the United Presbyterian Church in the U.S.A. In 1961 the synod became independent as the United Presbyterian Church of Pakistan. Seven years later the church experienced a severe split when representatives of the International Council of Christian Churches attempted to woo support to its fundamentalist position. Over the subsequent decades, the schism was largely healed.

In 1993 the Lahore Church Council and the United Presbyterian Church of Pakistan merged to become the Presbyterian Church of Pakistan. In the later 1990s it reported four hundred thousand members in two hundred congregations. It sponsors the Gujranwala Theological Seminary. Though it stayed out of the merger that created the Church of Pakistan, it remains in close relationship with the latter and is also a member of both the WORLD ALLIANCE OF REFORMED CHURCHES and the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES.

Address:

Presbyterian Church of Pakistan
P.O. Box 13
2 Empress Rd.
Lahore 54000
Pakistan

Source:

Bauswein, Jean-Jacques, and Lukas Vischer, eds. The Reformed Family Worldwide: A Survey of Reformed Churches, Theological Schools, and International Organizations. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans, 1999.

Presbyterian Church of Southern Africa

Early in the nineteenth century, the United Presbyterian Church (now an integral part of the CHURCH OF SCOTLAND) began work among the settlers in the Cape Town area. The missionaries showed special concern for the Scottish soldiers of regiments stationed there by the government of Great Britain, which was beginning to exert its influence in South Africa. An initial congregation was formed in 1829, and the work spread as English-speaking settlements emerged. The various congregations of the Scottish Mission were organized into a church in 1897. Subsequently, congregations were established across South Africa, Zimbabwe, and Zambia.

In the 1990s, the Presbyterian Church of Southern Africa reported ninety thousand members. Some two-thirds of the membership is White, but there is a growing work among non-Whites, most recently in the Indian community. The White membership tends to be urban, but the church has reached out to numerous groups in the three countries, and a variety of different languages are now spoken within it. In Zambia, congregations have developed among the Tumbuka and Chibemba peoples and in Zimbabwe among the Sindebele and Shona peoples.

The church is ecumenically involved and has joined the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES. During the 1990s it began negotiations looking toward possible merger with the Reformed Presbyterian Church in South Africa, a former mission church that grew out of the Scottish efforts to evangelize the Bantu people of the region.

Address:

Presbyterian Church of Southern Africa
P.O. Box 96188
150 Caroline St., 1st Floor
Joseph Wing Centre
Brixton 2019
South Africa

Source:

Bauswein, Jean-Jacques, and Lukas Vischer, eds. The Reformed Family Worldwide: A Survey of Reformed Churches, Theological Schools, and International Organizations. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans, 1999.

Presbyterian Church of Vanuatu

The Presbyterian Church of Vanuatu continues the missionary efforts established by the London Missionary Society (LMS) in 1938 on the South Sea islands of the New Hebrides, now the independent nation of Vanuatu. In 1838 the pioneer South Sea missionary John Williams (1796–1839) decided to expand the work of the LMS into the New Hebrides from his base on Samoa. Accompanied by three Samoan teachers and fellow LMS missionary James Harris (d. 1839), he arrived on Tanna Island, where he left the three Samoans while he and Harris moved on to Erromanga. Unfortunately, they were both killed.

On two occasions, in 1840 and 1845, missionaries had to leave Tanna when the locals blamed them for outbreaks of disease. This targeting of missionaries would continue as British and French slavers operated the islands—the residents blaming the missionaries, whom they identified with European authorities, for the loss of neighbors and loved ones. A significant number of missionaries were murdered.

At the end of the 1840s, the LMS work was superseded by the arrival of Presbyterians, most notably John Geddie (1815–1872) from Canada and John G. Paton (1824–1907) and a team of missionaries affiliated with the Reformed Presbyterian Church of Scotland. Their work was supplemented by William Witt and Peter Milne (1834–1908), who arrived in 1869–1870 from the Presbyterian Church of New Zealand. Finally, after the British and French decided to stop fighting over the islands and began to work out their unique cooperative administration, the Reformed Church of France began a small work.

All of the Presbyterian missionary activity was eventually united and reorganized as the Presbyterian Church of Vanuatu. At this time the church was transferred to local leadership from the foreign missionaries, who by this time were primarily from Australia and New Zealand. The church has had a significant role in the development of Bislama, a neo-Melanesian language that has subsequently become the official language of the new nation of Vanuatu. It promoted it as a common language through the development of a Bible translation that is used in worship throughout the islands. (Earlier, the church had supported the work of translating the Bible into more than twenty-one other languages that are still spoken throughout the islands.)

At the end of the 1990s, the church reported fifty-seven thousand members. The largest religious group in Vanuatu, it is a member of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES and the Vanuatu Christian Council.

Address:

Presbyterian Church of Vanuatu
Presbyterian Jyos Blong Venuatu
P.O. Box 150
Port Vila
Vanuatu

Sources:

- Bauswein, Jean-Jacques, and Lukas Vischer, eds. The Reformed Family Worldwide: A Survey of Reformed Churches, Theological Schools, and International Organizations. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans, 1999.
- Forman, Charles H. The Island Churches of the South Pacific: Emergence in the Twentieth Century. Maryknoll, NY: Orbis, 1982.

Presbyterian Church of Wales

The Presbyterian Church of Wales (or Egiwys Brebyteraidd Cynirn) grew out of the Evangelical Awakening of the seventeenth century in Great Britain. The primary organizational expression of the Awakening was the METHODIST CHURCH, which developed under the leadership of John Wesley (1703–1791). Closely associated with Wesley was George Whitefield (1714–1770), a classmate at Oxford, who had encouraged Wesley to expand his work beyond London and had introduced the High Church–oriented Wesley to outdoor preaching. Although they were friends, Wesley and Whitefield had deep doctrinal differences, the latter leaning toward Calvinism and its emphasis on predestination while Wesley adhered to the theology of Jacobus Arminius (1560–1609) and an emphasis on free grace and human response.

Around 1835 Whitefield became acquainted with Howel Harris (1714–1773), a Welshman who had begun an independent teaching mission following a deep conversion experience. Harris began to preach throughout Wales, and at times Wesley traveled through the country with him. In the 1740s Wesley and Whitefield parted over their doctrinal differences. About this same time, Harris introduced Whitefield to Selina Hastings, Countess of Huntington (1707–1791), who tried unsuccessfully to bring about a reconciliation. When that proved impossible, she sided with Whitefield, having already contributed generously to his orphanage project in the American colonies.

As a member of the royalty, the Countess of Huntington also had the ability to appoint “chaplains,” ministers who had no Church of England parish but who could function as ministers of the established church. Selina encouraged the erection of chapels in various locations where her chaplains could preach. She also endowed a training college for young preachers at Trevecca in Wales. This informal network of preachers and chapels became known informally as the Countess of Huntington Connection. In 1779 a parish minister brought suit against the countess, and the authorities ruled against the growing work. It had to be reorganized as a dissenting movement, the Calvinist Methodist Connexion.

The Presbyterian Church of Wales continues the Welch branch of the Calvinist Methodist Connexion. As an independent body, it held its first general assembly in 1864. In the twentieth century it became known as the Calvinist/Methodist Church of Wales and then assumed its present name. In 1933 it adopted its present constitution and received the assent of Parliament for its promulgation.

In the 1990s, the Presbyterian Church of Wales reported fifty-four thousand members. Its Confession of Faith places it in the Reformed theological tradition. The general assembly is the highest legislative body. The church is a member of both the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES and the WORLD ALLIANCE OF REFORMED CHURCHES.

Address:

The Presbyterian Church of Wales
53 Richmond Rd.
Cardiff, Wales CF2 3UP
United Kingdom
<http://www.ebcpcw.org.uk/>

Source:

- Bauswein, Jean-Jacques, and Lukas Vischer, eds. The Reformed Family Worldwide: A Survey of Reformed Churches, Theological

Schools, and International Organizations. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans, 1999.

Presbyterian Church (U.S.A.)

The Presbyterian Church (U.S.A.), formed in 1983 by a merger of the United Presbyterian Church in the U.S.A. and the Presbyterian Church in the United States, is the primary body continuing the British and Scottish Presbyterian traditions in the United States. The United Presbyterian Church was itself the product of a variety of mergers, and its constituent parts include the very first Presbyterian synods founded during the American colonial era.

Presbyterians, who constituted one segment of the larger Puritan movement in Great Britain, began to move to the American colonies in the seventeenth century, especially after the end of the Commonwealth (1648–1660). Congregations were formed, especially in Connecticut, New York, Pennsylvania, and New Jersey. The first synod was formed in 1706. In the middle of the eighteenth century, the movement was split between those who supported the new revivalism, as proposed by the likes of independent Anglican George Whitefield (1714–1770) and Congregationalist Jonathan Edwards (1703–1758), and those who rejected it. Revivalism would be a continuing issue dividing Presbyterians through the nineteenth century. The main body of American Presbyterians held together until the end of the American Civil War, but then it split into two factions. The northern faction emerged as the Presbyterian Church in the United States of America; the southern group emerged as the Presbyterian Church in the United States.

After the American Revolution, the church had spread westward. During the early part of the nineteenth century, it made common cause with the Congregationalists, and the two groups developed a plan of union to cut down on competition as the two churches developed on the frontier. However, on the frontier, revivalism again divided Presbyterians as a new issue arose: the camp meeting. Those who supported camp meetings and revivalism on the frontier departed to form the Cumberland Presbyterian Church.

In the decades prior to the American Revolution, Scottish Covenanters found their way to the colonies. Covenanters in Scotland had formed their own church in 1733 in protest against the authority of the established Church of Scotland. By 1773, several Covenanter ministers had arrived in the colonies and formed the Reformed Presbyterian Church. A second succession occurred in the 1700s among people who protested the patronage system of the Church of Scotland and its lack of spiritual fervor. Still a third schism occurred in protest of the burghers who took the oath of loyalty that allowed them to hold public office in Scotland. The antiburgher faction opposed the oath and charged that taking it supported the episcopacy. People associated with the Covenanter and antiburgher factions came to the colonies in the middle of the eighteenth century and in 1753 formed the Associate Presbyterian Church. In 1782, the Reformed Presbyterian Church and the Associate Presbyterian Church united to form the Associate Reformed Presbyterian Church.

But some members of the Associate Presbyterian Church declined to join the merger and continued to exist under that name. In 1822, the Associate Reformed Presbyterian Church split into two factions, one in the north and one in the southern part of the country. In 1858, the continuing Associate Presbyterian Church and the northern faction of the Associate Reformed Church merged to constitute the United Presbyterian Church of North America.

In 1906, the Presbyterian Church in the United States of America and the Cumberland Presbyterian Church merged and continued under the name of the former body. Then, in 1958, that body merged with the United Presbyterian Church in North America to become the United Presbyterian Church in the U.S.A. That merger brought most American Presbyterians into two organizations. These two groups, the United Presbyterian Church in the U.S.A. and the Presbyterian Church in the United States, merged in 1983 to constitute the Presbyterian Church (U.S.A.).

In 2000 the Presbyterian Church (U.S.A.) reported 2.56 million members. The church is organized on a presbyterial model. Its highest legislative body is the general assembly. Congregations are grouped into presbyteries and synods across the country. The church supports a number of colleges and theological seminaries. The constituent bodies forming the Presbyterian Church (U.S.A.) began ordaining women to the ministry in 1956.

In 1967 the United Presbyterian Church caused considerable controversy when it adopted a new Confession of Faith, which the church saw as a contemporary restatement of the Presbyterian tradition but which many conservatives saw as a marked departure from traditional standards. The church subsequently published a book containing the Apostles' Creed, the Nicene Creed, several Reformed confessions, the Westminster documents, and the new 1967 confessions. It is generally understood that these statements of the Christian and Reformed traditions are to be understood both in the light of history and contemporary theology. Some church members and leaders, primarily from the Presbyterian Church in the United States, who rejected what they saw as the liberal theological tendencies in the church implied by the new confession, stayed out of the proposed merger and in the 1970s formed the conservative Presbyterian Church in America.

The Presbyterian Church (U.S.A.) is ecumenically oriented, and its constituent bodies produced some of the outstanding ecumenical leaders of the twentieth century. The church is a leading member of the WORLD ALLIANCE OF REFORMED CHURCHES and the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES.

Refreshments follow a service at a Presbyterian Church in London. (Helene Rogers/TRIP)

Address:

The Presbyterian Church (U.S.A.)
100 Witherspoon St.
Louisville, KY 40202
<http://www.pcusa.org>

Sources:

- Hart, D. G., and Mark A. Noll, eds. Dictionary of the Presbyterian and Reformed Tradition in America. Des Plaines, IL: InterVarsity Press, 1999.
- Jamison, Wallace N. The United Presbyterian Story. Pittsburgh, PA: Geneva Press, 1958.
- Miller, Park Hays. Why I Am a Presbyterian. New York: Thomas Nelson & Sons, 1956.
- Weeks, Louis B. To Be a Presbyterian. Philadelphia: Westminster John Knox Press, 1987.
- Weston, William J. Presbyterian Pluralism: Competition in a Protestant House. Knoxville: University of Tennessee Press, 1997.

Presbyterian Reformed Church in Cuba

During the last decades of the nineteenth century, many Cubans found their way to Florida where they encountered Protestant churches for the first time. In 1890 Evaristo Collazo, who in the 1880s had resided in Tampa, Florida, returned to Cuba and began to gather small groups in Havana, Santa Clara, and Placetas. He also came to Cuba to support the revolutionary struggle to free Cuba from Spain. Collazo later was ordained as a Presbyterian missionary and became a lieutenant in the revolutionary army in the Spanish-American War.

After the war, in 1902, Collazo reopened the church and was assisted by American Presbyterian missionaries. The communities they founded eventually constituted themselves as a presbytery of the Synod of New Jersey of the Presbyterian Church in the U.S.A. (now a constituent part of the Presbyterian Church [U.S.A.]). The church experienced steady growth through World War II, and in 1945 it joined with the Methodists and Episcopalians in forming the Seminary of Matanzas.

In 1967 the Presbyterian mission became an autonomous body as the Presbyterian Reformed Church in Cuba (Iglesia Presbiteriana-Reformada en Cuba). In 1969 Fidel Castro overthrew the government and established the regime he still heads. The government adopted an antireligious policy, but the church survived through the next quarter of a century and then experienced a spurt of growth, as regulations on religion were loosened in the 1990s.

Presbytery of Liberia

The church is organized presbyterially. Its highest legislative body is the national synod. It published its own confession of faith in 1968. It is a member of both the WORLD ALLIANCE OF REFORMED CHURCHES and the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES. In the late 1990s it reported fifteen thousand members in fifty-nine congregations.

Address:

Presbyterian Reformed Church in Cuba
Salud 222 E/Lealtad y Campanario
La Habana 10200
Cuba

Source:

Bauswein, Jean-Jacques, and Lukas Vischer, eds. The Reformed Family Worldwide: A Survey of Reformed Churches, Theological Schools, and International Organizations. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans, 1999.

Presbytery of Liberia

Missionaries from the Presbyterian Church in the U.S.A. (now an integral part of the PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH [U.S.A.]) arrived in Liberia in 1833. As mission work proceeded, they discovered that personnel, one by one, were falling victim to malaria. They instituted a policy of sending only African American personnel but soon discovered that these workers were just as susceptible to the disease. In spite of their problems, the missionaries were able to play an important role in the developing country, and one of their number signed the country's Declaration of Independence in 1847. Support in the form of missionary personnel continued through the 1880s.

The Liberian Presbytery was among the earliest of the Christian missions in Africa to move entirely under local control and then attain status as an independent church. It was also unusual in the African context in that it had been originally constituted by repatriated Africans who had been returned to Africa after their sojourn in the United States. The presbytery became independent in 1928. It also became one of the first churches to ordain women—as deacons in the 1940s and as elders in the 1950s.

In the late 1990s the presbytery reported three thousand members in twelve congregations. It is a member of both the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES and the WORLD ALLIANCE OF REFORMED CHURCHES. In the 1970s it developed a new relationship with the CUMBERLAND PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH, and in the 1980s it became a provisional presbytery in that church.

Address:

Presbytery of Liberia
P.O. Box 3350

Broad and Johnson St.
Monrovia
Liberia

Source:

Bauswein, Jean-Jacques, and Lukas Vischer, eds. The Reformed Family Worldwide: A Survey of Reformed Churches, Theological Schools, and International Organizations. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans, 1999.

Priory of Sion

The Priory of Sion is a secret society legally established in France in 1972 by Pierre Plantard (1920–2000), although it claimed great antiquity. Legends connected with the Priory of Sion have generated great interest through the years, particularly as a result of the publication in 1982 of The Holy Blood and the Holy Grail by British journalists Michael Baigent, Richard Leigh, and Henry Lincoln. The story starts with Father Berenger Saunière (1852–1917), who in 1885 became the parish priest of Rennes-le-Château, a small village in the French region of Aude, near the Pyrenees Mountains. Saunière, it seems, was a rather strange character, deeply interested in symbolism; he also had a penchant for building a number of constructions around his parish church, including a bizarre neogothic “Tower of Magdala.” These construction projects obviously cost a good deal of money, yet Saunière was known to come from a poor family, and one did not normally become rich in nineteenth century France by being a parish priest in a mountain hamlet.

Rennes-le-Château lies at the heart of the area once inhabited by the Cathars, and rumors spread that Saunière had found a treasure buried in the Middle Ages by the persecuted heretics. The fact that Saunière was also an archaeology buff and had found some old artifacts whilst digging in the vicinity of the parish church added fuel to the fire of rumors. The priest did his excavations at night, in order to remain the sole owner of his findings (which, according to French law, he should have given to the state). This obviously did not endear Saunière to the municipality, and some villagers also suspected him of having an affair with his servant, Marie Denarnaud (1868–1953), who was undoubtedly fiercely loyal to the controversial priest.

These rumors could not have failed to attract the attention of the local Catholic bishop, and having investigated the matter he concluded that, rather than having found a Cathar treasure, Saunière had made his money from “trafficking in masses,” a not uncommon wrongdoing among nineteenth- and early-twentieth-century priests. In the Catholic Church, masses can be celebrated for the benefit of a specific soul, in the hope of helping a deceased loved one to ascend from Purgatory into Heaven. Masses can also be said for a specific aim for the benefit of living persons (for instance, for healing purposes). Prior to Vatican II, for each mass, priests received a stipend, that is, a fixed amount of money for each mass they said. “Trafficking in masses” meant, in practice, that priests advertised their willingness to celebrate a great number of masses for both the dead and the living. Advertising in this way was regarded as a kind of unfair competition toward other priests and was condemned by the church as illicit. The matter became even worse, of course, when priests failed to celebrate the masses requested, despite having received the appropriate stipend. The bishop traced advertisements placed by Saunière in Catholic magazines throughout France, and even abroad, and quickly determined that he could not possibly have celebrated all the masses he had received payments for, thus in fact defrauding his “clients.” In 1909, the bishop asked Saunière to leave Rennes-le-Château; the priest refused and was suspended from his priestly duties and privileges (a lesser sanction than excommunication, but a painful sanction nonetheless, which ended Saunière’s ecclesiastical career). He decided to remain in Rennes-le-Château, however, and the ownership of his buildings (Tower of Magdala included) did not pass to the diocese because Saunière had taken the precaution of transferring their ownership to Marie Denarnaud.

Although the bishop had concluded that trafficking in masses was enough to explain Saunière’s suspicious wealth, rumors about buried treasures (and alleged contacts with the Paris esoteric milieu) continued until Saunière’s death in 1917 and even in the years that followed. The rumors resurfaced again in the early 1950s when Marie Denarnaud, who in her old age was still the owner of all the properties, was trying to sell them. She probably thought that rumors of buried treasures would raise the value of the properties. One buyer was Noel Corbu (1912–1968), who in 1956 started spreading the Saunière treasure legend through the local press, in the hope of attracting clients to the restaurant he had opened in one of the buildings. The rumors did spread largely, thanks to friendly contacts between Corbu, some local reporters, and members of the Paris esoteric milieu.

Pierre Plantard, who had been the leader of a minor occult-political organization known as Alpha Galates, told an even taller story about Rennes-le-Château, firstly to selected friends from the late 1950s, then to the esoteric author Gérard De Sède, who in 1967 published a book entitled L’Or de Rennes (“Rennes’ Gold”). It was De Sède who in turn interested the three British journalists, Baigent, Leigh, and Lincoln, in the story, and they jointly saw to it that Rennes-le-Château became a household name throughout the English-speaking world, thanks to a BBC TV series based on their reports, as well as several popular books. In short, the story told by Plantard to De Sède, and later popularized by the British journalists, was that Saunière did indeed discover a buried treasure, and that it included much more than valuable antiquities. Buried in Rennes-le-Château were documents confirming the old southern French legends that Jesus Christ, rather than ascending into Heaven, had come to live in France with his wife, Mary Magdalene. Plantard added that the divine couple did indeed have children in France and that they initiated a dynasty, which eventually became known as the Merovingian Kings of France. This, Plantard suggested, was the true meaning of the Grail legends: the Holy Grail, in French Saint Graal, was in fact the Sang Réal, which in Medieval French means “Holy Blood,” that is, the blood of Jesus Christ himself flowing in the veins of the Merovingians. When the Merovingian dynasty fell from power, Plantard continued, their descendants went underground and a secret organization, the Priory of Sion, has preserved their holy blood even since. Cathars and Knights Templar, as well as early Freemasons and various literary and artistic figures (prominent among them being the painter Nicholas Poussin, 1594–1655), were all said to be connected to the secretive priory. Plantard gradually started to imply that he was himself not only the current Grand Master of the elusive priory but also the last descendant of the Merovingians and the current vessel of Christ’s holy blood.

Plantard’s tale, if true, would of course have turned Christianity on its head and inspired a whole new interpretation of world history. Historians remained understandably skeptical, regarding the Priory of Sion as nothing more than a figment of Plantard’s imagination (although a Catholic order known as “Priory of Sion” did exist in the Middle Ages, they note, it had nothing to do with the Merovingians, the blood of Jesus Christ, or Rennes-le-Château). Millions of readers of popular books about Rennes-le-Château took the story quite seriously, however, and many in the esoteric milieu were happy to join the Priory of Sion after Plantard legally established it in 1972. It is also not impossible (as reported by several journalists) that some people in the political, financial, and intelligence worlds also took a genuine interest in the Priory’s activities, seeing it almost as a more secretive and elite brand of Freemasonry, and some may even have joined it. Be that as it may, the Rennes-le-Château saga became an integral part of international popular culture through novels and movies; Preacher and The Magdalena (recently joined by Rex Mundi) were among the popular comic book series that also focused interest on the subject. The priory remains an interesting organization, combining themes from several preexisting occult orders, which may tempt even those who doubt that the Rennes-le-Château legends are factually true to join. As a secret society, the priory’s address (in the Paris region) remains confidential, and the organization does not maintain a Web site.

Sources:

- Baigent, Michael, Richard Leigh, and Henry Lincoln. The Holy Blood and the Holy Grail. London: Jonathan Cape, 1982.
- Cardini, Franco, Massimo Introvigne, and Marina Montesano. Il Santo Graal. Florence: Giunti, 1998.
- De Sède, Gérard. L'Or de Rennes, ou la vie insolite de Bérenger Saunière, curé de Rennes-le-Château, 2d ed. Paris: Julliard, 1967.
- Saul, John M., and Janice A. Glaholm. Rennes-le-Château: A Bibliography. London: Mercurius Press, 1985.

Progressive National Baptist Convention of America

Among the least known of the organizational remnants of the 1960s Civil Rights movement in the United States, the Progressive National Baptist Convention of America was formed in 1961 by Baptist pastors who supported Martin Luther King Jr.'s nonviolent protests against laws and social patterns that allowed racial discrimination to persist in American life. The convention grew out of the NATIONAL BAPTIST CONVENTION, U.S.A., which at the time was the largest institution in the United States led and supported by African Americans.

Formed late in the nineteenth century, the National Baptist Convention represented a new attempt by African Americans to control their own religious organizations. Prior to its founding, most Black Baptists were affiliated with the American Baptists (now the AMERICAN BAPTIST CHURCHES OF THE U.S.A.), many serving in its employ as writers, missionaries, and denominational agency workers. However, African Americans were largely excluded from the higher levels of control and decision making within the denomination. Soon after the formation of the National Baptist Convention, however, the African American community was confronted with a series of new laws that mandated a segregated society in the American South (where most African Americans resided).

Through the early twentieth century, a long struggle for social equality took place, and many Black leaders were prepared to continue that struggle long into the future. Observing the repressive responses to the occasional race riots that broke out in some U.S. cities, they concluded that attempts to change the situation by taking to the streets was counterproductive. Among those who believed it was futile to try to suddenly change racial patterns was Joseph H. Jackson (d. 1990), the pastor of a large Baptist congregation in the heart of Chicago's African American community and the powerful president of the National Baptist Convention.

Into this setting came Martin Luther King Jr., the pastor of a relatively small congregation in Montgomery, Alabama. King had been inspired by the example of Mahatma Gandhi and his successful efforts to free India from colonial rule.

Utilizing the opportunity presented initially by the rude treatment of a Black woman on a public bus in December 1955, he organized the African American community across the South in a protest against segregation laws. He impressed the example of Gandhi upon the protesters, giving a uniquely Christian twist to the idea of nonviolent moral challenge to the authorities. The idea caught the imagination of the younger generation, and a mass movement ensued.

In 1961 King's supporters in the National Baptist Convention demanded that the convention, the most prestigious African American religious organization in the country, declare its support of King and the movement. They immediately faced opposition from President Jackson and others who feared that repercussions would be dire if King took to the streets. They refused to support King's movement. The demand for support of the Civil Rights movement was also tied to a challenge of Jackson's leadership of the convention. He had been president for nine years in 1961. However, Jackson's commitment to the gradual elimination of racial discrimination still had the majority support of the convention, and the challenge to his continued presidency by Gardner C. Taylor in 1961 was defeated.

Following their defeat, Taylor and his supporters in the convention decided that the best way to lead African American Baptists in a new direction was to issue a call to form a new association. In November 1961, twenty-three pastors answered and with the messengers (representatives) from their churches formed the Progressive National Baptist Convention. The news of the formation of the convention was largely lost outside of the African American community, as the nation's attention was on King and the Southern Christian Leadership Conference, which provided the direct guidance to the Civil Rights movement at the time. Among the bylaws accepted by the new convention the following year was a provision limiting the length of the term of the president. The convention grew quickly over the next years, as the movement culminated in the passing of the comprehensive Civil Rights Act in 1964.

In 1995 the Progressive National Baptist Convention reported a membership of 2.5 million in some two thousand congregations. It cooperates with the other national Baptist conventions in the support of two theological schools. Cooperative action with other Baptist bodies has been a keynote of its national program. Among its earliest efforts was the Fund for Renewal, a program jointly sponsored with the American Baptists and designed to give new life to Black Baptist schools. King and Ralph Abernathy (1926–1990), the American Baptist who succeeded King as leader of the Southern Christian Leadership Conference following King's assassination, lent their support to the fund. The progressive National Baptist Convention is also a member of the BAPTIST WORLD ALLIANCE and the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES.

Address:

Progressive National Baptist Convention
601 50th St., N.E.
Washington, DC 20019
<http://www.pnbc.org>

Sources:

Fitts, Leroy. A History of Black Baptists. Nashville, TN: Broadman Press, 1985.
Payne, Wardell J. Directory of African-American Religious Bodies. 2d ed. Washington, DC: Howard University Press, 1996.

Protestant Christian Batak Church (HKBP)

The Protestant Christian Batak Church dates to the arrival on Sumatra of Ludwig Ingwer Nommensen (1834–1918) as a representative of the German RHENISH MISSION, a missionary agency associated with the German Lutheran Church. Nommensen initiated work among the Batak people who had settled on Sumatra in the ancient past. The Batak prospered, and over the centuries various Batak subdivisions appeared. Nommensen moved into the heart of Batak country and established a mission, and colleagues soon followed. The mission's work spread across the island.

In the 1920s the Sumatran Lutherans began to manifest signs of desiring independence. For example, they asked the German missionaries to relinquish control of the church. Formal independence was granted in 1930, though the German missionaries remained in place with a slightly altered status. The new church took the name Huria Kristen Batak Protestan, or Protestant Christian Batak Church, and is generally known by the initials of its Indonesian name (HKBP).

Then in 1940 Germany invaded the Netherlands. In response, the Dutch government on Sumatra interned all the German missionaries and did not allow anyone to use their homes or offices. The church was suddenly cut off from its financial resources. While the church was still trying to cope with this crisis, the Japanese invaded and tried to force some Shinto practices on the Christian community.

In the face of the wartime problems, the HKBP elected its first Indonesian endorus (bishop). In 1951 it issued a confession of faith that acknowledged the authority of the ancient ecumenical creeds, the Reformation confessions, and the Barmen Declaration (a statement against some of the religious claims of Nazism), but it also went on to create its own restatement of the Christianity that spoke against a number of views that it opposed such as PENTECOSTALISM and nationalistic Christianity. The new confession did not choose between Lutheran and Reformed doctrine, but the newly autonomous church decidated to continue its Lutheran associations and applied for membership in the LUTHERAN WORLD FEDERATION. It has subsequently become a member of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES and the Community of Churches in Indonesia.

In 1954 the church opened Nommensen University, currently with two campuses. The university's former theological school now exists as a separate institution. The church also maintains an extensive school system of elementary and secondary schools. Other ministries include a farming project, a youth center, an orphanage, and a center to assist the blind and crippled. The church also works with many of its poorer members to improve their skills as farmers and tradespeople. Deaconesses from Germany were introduced very early into the Sumatran mission, and the church has since developed its own deaconess program. Deaconesses work in the church-sponsored hospital and as community workers.

The HKBP has developed a modern denominational organization to facilitate its mission. It is led by its bishop and a general secretary. The major legislative body is the biennial synodical convention. Parishes are organized into resorts, and resorts into districts. Each district is led by a superintendent. Women have been admitted to the ordained ministry since 1982.

The church uses Toba Batak as its official language, but it has faced a severe problem concerning language because several other languages, including Bahasa Indonesia, compete as the primary language of its members. Many congregations, especially those located in urban areas, now conduct services in Indonesian.

The HKBP is the oldest and largest of the several bodies that have grown from the original Rhenish Mission. These several churches, which separated over the years either from the older Batak mission or from the HKBP after World War II, include the Batak Christian Community Church (GPKB), the Christian Protestant Church in Indonesia (GKPI), the Indonesian Christian Church (HKI), and the Simalungun Protestant Christian Church (GKPS).

In the mid-1990s, the HKBP reported 1.25 million members. It carries on missionary programs among modern Indonesia's three thousand islands and its many distinct ethnic and language groups.

Address:

Protestant Christian Batak Church
Pearja Tarutung
Sumatra
Indonesia

Source:

Bachmann, E. Theodore, and Mercia Brenne Bachmann. Lutheran Churches in the World: A Handbook. Minneapolis, MN: Augsburg Press, 1989.

Protestant Christian Church— Angkola (GKPA)

The Protestant Christian Church—Angkola (Gereja Kristen Protestan Angkola, or GKPA) developed as the work of the PROTESTANT CHRISTIAN BATAK CHURCH (HKBP) spread among the Angkola people of Indonesia, one of the Batak subgroups. The HKBP began in 1861 at Sipirok, Sumatra, where the RHENISH MISSION originally established a mission station. However, the Angkola language was distinctive enough that Angkola church leaders requested separation so they could pursue the development of an Angkola church. The HKBP acted favorably on that request in 1974, and the new church was set up. The formation of the GKPA motivated the completion of the translation of the Bible into Angkola.

Except for one parish in Jakarta, the parishes of the church are all in northern Sumatra. They are grouped into districts that operate under the synod, the highest legislative body in the church. The church opened a training center to facilitate the self-help and independence of people in the rural villages, where most of the church's congregations are located. The church is also ecumenically oriented and is a member of both the LUTHERAN WORLD FELLOWSHIP and the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES. It also carries on a program of Christian-Muslim dialogue. At the end of the 1990s the church reported twenty-eight thousand members.

Address:

Protestant Church, Angkola
Jalan Teuku Umar 102
22722 Padangsidimouan
South Tapanuli, North Sumatra
Indonesia

Source:

Bachmann, E. Theodore, and Mercia Brenne Bachmann. Lutheran Churches in the World: A Handbook. Minneapolis, MN: Augsburg Press, 1989.

Protestant Christian Church of Bali (GKPB)

The Protestant Christian Church of Bali (Gereja Kristen Protestan di Bali, or GKPB) began in 1929 with the arrival on Bali of Tsang To Hang, a Chinese missionary with the CHRISTIAN AND MISSIONARY ALLIANCE. Bali was unusual among the Indonesian islands in that it had resisted the earlier incursion of Islam and had remained predominantly Hindu. In 1864 a representative of the NETHERLANDS REFORMED CHURCH had established a mission. He had baptized only one convert as a result of his work. He was murdered in 1881 and as a result of his death, the Dutch authorities did not allow other missionaries to work on the island.

Tsang To Hang had better results. By 1931 he had baptized a group of Balinese and had established a church. However, he was banished in 1933. After a time, the Christian Church in East Java was permitted to assume the care of the small Christian community on Bali. Growth was slow and by 1949 when the church became independent, there were still fewer than two thousand Balinese Christians. During the period since its independence, the church has been assisted by the movement of many Balinese throughout Indonesia, where they have encountered other Christian churches before returning to Bali to join the Christian church there.

The church has presbyterian polity and has adopted the ancient Christian creeds as its doctrinal standards. It operates a school system, a hospital, and several clinics. In the 1990s it reported sixty-nine hundred members in thirty-eight congregations. It is an associate member of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES.

Address:

Protestant Church of Bali
P.O. Box 72
Jalan Dr. Sutomo 101A
Denpasar 80118
Bali
Indonesia

Source:

Bauswein, Jean-Jacques, and Lukas Vischer, eds. The Reformed Family Worldwide: A Survey of Reformed Churches, Theological Schools, and International Organizations. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans, 1999.

Protestant Christian Church of Nias (BNKP)

The Protestant Christian Church of Nias (Banua Niha Keriso Protestan, or BNKP) dates to the arrival of missionaries from the RHENISH MISSION, a German missionary society with roots in both Lutheran and Reformed traditions. The missionaries came to Nias, an island east of Sumatra that is now a part of Indonesia, because they had been expelled from Kalimantan (Borneo), another Indonesian island. They began to work among the various peoples of the island, each of whom spoke their own local languages. It was not until 1874 that a process of communication was established and the first convert was received and baptized. Some twenty thousand Niassans had become Christians by the beginning of World War I.

In the years immediately after the war, the mission entered an unexpected growth phase, tripling in size within a few years. In 1936 the first synod of what became the Protestant Christian Church of Nias was convened. The present presbyterial church order was adopted in 1938, which is considered the church's official beginning. One of the German missionaries chaired the church meetings until 1940. The church continued to grow through the decades after World War II but has also experienced a set of schisms related to traditional Niassan power structures. The church would eventually become the religion of the majority of the island's residents and would be credited with bringing a sense of unity to the island as it was thrust into the modern world. Nias language spoken in the northern half of the island was chosen for a translation of the Bible, which was printed in 1913. Nias subsequently became the common language of the island.

In the late 1990s, the church reported 326,000 members, approximately 60 percent of the population. It is a member of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES.

Address:

Protestant Christian Church of Nias
Jalan Soekarno 22
Gunungsitoli 22813
Nias Sumatera Utara
Indonesia

Source:

Bauswein, Jean-Jacques, and Lukas Vischer, eds. The Reformed Family Worldwide: A Survey of Reformed Churches, Theological Schools, and International Organizations. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans, 1999.

Protestant Church in Sabah (Malaysia)

Soon after World War II, the SEVENTH-DAY ADVENTIST CHURCH began a mission on the Kudat peninsula in the state of Sabah in the Malaysian part of Borneo. Many who were ready to become Christian were not ready to accept some of the prohibitions demanded by the Adventists, including refraining from pork and alcohol. In 1951 the Run-gus people approached the BASEL MISSION (now the Evangelical Missionary Society), requesting it to send missionaries to them. Heinrich Honegger arrived two years later. Along with his evangelistic work, he led in the foundation of an agricultural school. Growth was relatively quick and the church became independent in 1965, although it still utilized Basel Mission personnel. Four years later it faced a crisis when the country's Islamic government expelled all of the foreign missionaries and began a campaign to convert the Christians of Sabah to Islam.

Once the Islamization campaign ended in 1976, the church entered a new growth phase. It adopted a congregational form of church government, but it has a synod that is headed by a bishop or head pastor. The church ordains women.

In the 1990s the Protestant Church in Sabah reported approximately thirty thousand members. It has grown among the various groups indigenous to Sabah, extending also to mainland Malaysia as people from Sabah have moved around the country. The church now works among various Bornean people and in the Chinese community, and it is a member of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES. It has emphasized the Lutheran tradition of the Basel Mission (which represents both Lutheran and Reformed congregations in Germany and Switzerland) and has joined the LUTHERAN WORLD FEDERATION.

Address:

Protestant Church in Sabah
P.O. Box 69
Kudat, Sabah
Malaysia

Source:

Bachmann, E. Theodore, and Mercia Brenne Bachmann. Lutheran Churches in the World: A Handbook. Minneapolis, MN: Augsburg Press, 1989.

Protestant Church in Southeast Sulawesi (GEPSULTRA)

The Protestant Church in Southeast Sulawesi (Gereja Protestan di Sulawesi Tenggara, or GEPSULTRA) originated when a Protestant church was established for government and military officials residing on the island of Sulawesi, now a part of Indonesia. In 1916 a missionary began to expand this work into the countryside, where Islam was dominant. The first native baptism occurred in 1918. Congregations of Sulawesians were formed over the next two decades, but no ministers were ordained and the church property was not registered. This neglect caused the church severe problems when the Japanese invaded and the missionaries were no longer available. Attempts to reorganize after the war were slowed by unrest among Muslims, who were unhappy with the new Indonesian central government. In 1950 Muslim guerrillas killed a missionary and several church workers who had been traveling around the country to survey the church's situation.

Only in 1957 did the situation in the region stabilize enough for the church to meet and constitute itself as an independent body. It adopted a presbyterial government, with a synod as the highest legislative body. In the late 1960s the government began to move workers into southeast Sulawesi, a sparsely populated region, and the church began to grow among the new residents. Its membership currently includes more than 25 ethnic/language groups. Church membership has grown to more than twenty-five thousand, though it still constitutes a small minority in the predominantly Muslim culture.

The immigrants to Sulawesi brought with them a form of agriculture that threatened the local ecosystem. In the 1970s the church responded with a program in agricultural education that attempted to build a progressive view of farming combined with a spiritual worldview. This small church supports a limited set of social programs, including two orphanages, an elementary school, and four secondary schools. The church is a member of the WORLD ALLIANCE OF REFORMED CHURCHES and the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES.

Protestant Church in the Moluccas

Address:

Protestant Church in Southeast Sulawesi
P.O. Box 3
Jalan Dr. Ratulangi 121
Kendari 93121
Sulawesi Tenggara
Indonesia

Source:

Bauswein, Jean-Jacques, and Lukas Vischer, eds. The Reformed Family Worldwide: A Survey of Reformed Churches, Theological Schools, and International Organizations. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans, 1999.

Protestant Church in the Moluccas (GPM)

The history of the Protestant Church in the Moluccas (Gereja Protestan Moluccas, or GPM) goes back to the arrival of the Portuguese into the East Indies in the sixteenth century. A Catholic mission established in the Moluccas, or Spice Islands, baptized its first convert in 1538. Francis Xavier (1506–1552) visited the Christian community there in 1546. After more than sixty years of work, the Portuguese were driven out by the Dutch, who installed Reformed church ministers in place of the priests. The community went through a process of Protestantization. The first Protestant church service in Asia was held in the Moluccas on February 27, 1605.

A vital church was built throughout the islands from its center in Ambon. The Heidelberg Catechism was translated into Malay and published in 1625. The New Testament followed in 1668. The complete Bible (1733) was followed by a Psalm book (1735). Sermons in Dutch were translated and given to lay ministers for presentation in Malay worship services. Over the next century an indigenous Christianity was created in the Moluccas.

A wave of pietistic fervor that had come to the church in Holland was imported to the Moluccas by a new missionary society, the Nederlandsche Gereformeerde Zendingsvereniging (NZG). Missionaries from this society arrived in Indonesia in 1815, among them Joseph Kam (1769–1833), who settled in Ambon where he had a vital ministry for the next eighteen years. He recruited numerous lay teachers, who were then deployed in missions throughout the Dutch East Indies.

After World War I the church was readied for autonomy, which occurred in 1935 when the GPM was established as a branch of what was called the Protestant Church in Indonesia, headquartered in Jakarta. Though the church was locally autonomous, important decisions were referred to Jakarta for final approval. This arrangement became increasingly dysfunctional, and after World War II the attempt to keep the churches in the different island groups united faded. The Protestant Church in Indonesia was transformed into an ecumenical council and then faded into obscurity.

The Protestant Church in the Moluccas suffered greatly during the Japanese occupation. No fewer than fifty-four church leaders were killed. In 1944 the church's archives, located in Ambon, were destroyed during Allied bombing of the city. In 1950 Ambon was also the sight of heavy fighting when the government put down an insurrection by some who opposed the new government of Indonesia.

In the immediate aftermath of the founding of Indonesia in 1948, the church went through a period of self-reflection. It adopted a new church order with a presbyterian polity. It reflected on its relationship with Islam, an increasing factor in the religious life of the Moluccas and the dominant religion in Indonesia. A new emphasis was placed on ministerial education, and the church now supports a theological faculty at the Maluku Christian University in Ambon. The church is a member of both the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES and the WORLD ALLIANCE OF REFORMED CHURCHES.

In the 1990s the Protestant Church in the Moluccas reported 454,000 members. Once the majority religion on the island, it has been challenged by the movement of so many Indonesians to the Moluccas. A branch of the church was established in the Netherlands by some four thousand Moluccans who moved to Holland after World War II at the expense of the Dutch government.

Address:

Protestant Church in the Moluccas
Jalan Mayjend
D.I. Panjaitan 2
Ambon 97124
Maluku
Indonesia

Sources:

Bauswein, Jean-Jacques, and Lukas Vischer, eds. The Reformed Family Worldwide: A Survey of Reformed Churches, Theological Schools, and International Organizations. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans, 1999.
Enklaar, I. H., and Joseph Kam. "Apostel der." In Molukken. Gravenhage, 1963.

Protestant Church of Algeria

The Protestant Church of Algeria has inherited the traditions of nineteenth-century Protestant/Free Church missionary activity in Algeria. After the call for French setblers to come to Algeria in 1873, Protestantism was offered an opening. The REFORMED CHURCH OF FRANCE came to Algeria and established work there, primarily among French Protestants because the government frowned upon proselytizing within the Muslim community. Through the early twentieth century, as the French expatriate community grew, the Reformed Church became the largest of the many non-Catholic church bodies in the country.

In 1908 two women who had been conducting an independent mission in Algiers since 1893 affiliated themselves with the Methodist Episcopal Church (now a constituent part of the UNITED METHODIST CHURCH), and in 1909 the Methodist Episcopal Church's Woman's Foreign Missionary Society assumed their support. Other women were accepted to extend the work, though the first U.S. worker did not arrive until 1922. Work spread among the coastal cities and was based in medical and social services. In 1966 the Methodists opened a hospital in the northeastern city of Il Maten.

The independence of Algeria in 1962 deeply affected the Protestant community. The exodus of five hundred thousand people with French passports depleted many Christian groups of their support, especially the Reformed Church. Then the Methodist Church was hit in 1969 by charges that their missionaries were agents of the Central Intelligence Agency, and ten (a significant percentage) were expelled from the country. The church's missionaries in Oran had withdrawn the year before for other reasons, and the church was left with 215 members.

In 1970 the French Reformed Church, the Methodists, and several other groups that had also lost significant resources since 1962 merged to become the Protestant Church of Algeria. The church is a member of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES and the WORLD ALLIANCE OF REFORMED CHURCHES. The church acknowledges both Methodist and Reformed doctrinal positions. It also cooperates with the ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH in various social programs.

As the 1990s ended, the church had only five hundred members and eight parishes, but it is still considered an important body, keeping alive a Christian presence in a predominantly Muslim country.

Address:

Protestant Church of Algeria
31 rue Reda Houhou
16000 Algiers
Algeria

Source:

Bauswein, Jean-Jacques, and Lukas Vischer, eds. The Reformed Family Worldwide: A Survey of Reformed Churches, Theological Schools, and International Organizations. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans, 1999.

Protestant Church of Senegal

One of the smaller churches in the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES, the Protestant Church of Senegal began in the nineteenth-century attempts of the PARIS MISSION (affiliated with the REFORMED CHURCH OF FRANCE) to build a mission among the native people of Senegal. They had little success from their beginning in 1862 until after François Villegier translated a portion of the Bible into Wolof, one of the local languages, and Walter Taylor, a former slave who resided in Sierra Leone, joined the effort. Taylor concentrated his evangelistic activity among freed slaves residing in Khor, a small community near St. Louis.

A second church was opened in Dakar after it became the capital in 1904. However, the missionaries found the largely Muslim population unresponsive to their attempts to convert them. The church became independent in 1972 and is now completely in Senegalese hands, but the membership largely consists of expatriates. In the mid-1990s, the church reported 250 members in two congregations. It is a member of the WORLD ALLIANCE OF REFORMED CHURCHES.

Address:

Protestant Church of Senegal
B.P. 22390
Dakar Ponty
Senegal

Source:

Bauswein, Jean-Jacques, and Lukas Vischer, eds. The Reformed Family Worldwide: A Survey of Reformed Churches, Theological Schools, and International Organizations. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans, 1999.

Protestant Methodist Church in Côte d'Ivoire

The Protestant Methodist Church in Côte d'Ivoire dates to the arrival in 1924 of a Wesleyan Methodist missionary, Jon Platt, from Dahomey (Ghana) and Togo, where the Wesleyans (now the Methodist Church in Great Britain) had established work as early as 1842. It is the case that prior to that time, beginning in the first decade of the century, African prophet William Wade Harris (1865–1929), a former Methodist, had established his church in Cote d'Ivoire and neighboring countries. He had predicted the arrival of White missionaries, and many saw in the Methodists the fulfillment of his prophecy.

As the Wesleyans' work in Côte d'Ivoire developed, it was an integral part of the work in Dahomey and Togo. In 1947 it had grown to the point that it was detached from work in the neighboring countries and organized as a district directly attached to the British Methodist Conference. The work in Côte d'Ivoire was given independent status in 1963, and the reorganization was completed the following year.

Protestant Methodist Church of Benin

At that time, the first indigenous leader, Samson Nandjui, was selected as the mission's chairman.

Although Methodism has become a national movement, with a membership and constituency of approximately one million, the major centers are in the capital, Abidjan, and in Dabou, where the church opened a hospital in 1968. Ministerial education is supported through the School of Protestant Theology of Porto-Novo in Benin. The church is a member of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES and the WORLD METHODIST COUNCIL. It has formed a structure to handle issues of Christian-Muslim relations.

Address:

Protestant Methodist Church in Côte d'Ivoire
41 Boulevard de la République
B.P. 12
Abidjan, 1
Côte d'Ivoire

Sources:

Harmon, Nolan B. Encyclopedia of World Methodism. 2 vols. Nashville, TN: United Methodist Publishing House, 1974.
World Methodist Council. Handbook of Information. Lake Junaluska, NC: World Methodist Council, 1997.

Protestant Methodist Church of Benin

The largest non-Catholic church in the African nation of Benin, the Protestant Methodist Church was founded by Thomas Birch Freeman (1809–1890), the son of an English mother and an African father. In 1838 Freeman returned to Africa from England as a representative of the Wesleyan Methodist Connection (now an integral part of the METHODIST CHURCH) in Great Britain. He began work in Ghana, then known as the Gold Coast, before moving on to Benin, then known as Dahomey, in 1843. Freeman and his wife settled in Quidab on the Benin Coast and shortly thereafter traveled inland to Abomey to interview the king of the region, but they were unable to obtain his cooperation for the missionary work. The king was still involved in the slave trade, and Freeman had begun a program of employing freed slaves from the Americas to assist in the mission's leadership.

The work did not begin to grow until after the French protectorate was declared in 1851 and effect pacification occurred over the next decades. Noteworthy leadership was supplied later in the century by the Methodist African superintendent, Thomas Joseph Marshall. Along with the work in neighboring Togo, the mission remained a district in the British Methodist Conference until after Benin became independent in 1974 as a Marxist state. The Methodist mission subsequently became an independent body as the Protestant Methodist Church of Benin.

The church has continued to grow and by the end of the 1990s reported approximately one hundred thousand members. At the same time it has been an ecumenical church, supporting cooperative educational endeavors with several other churches. In 1965 it initiated a cooperative evangelistic endeavor that targeted the Fon people and included the production of a Bible in the Fon language. The church is a member of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES. Following the British lead, the church is led by a president rather than a bishop.

Address:

Protestant Methodist Church of Benin
01 B.P. 34
Cotonou
Benin

Sources:

Harmon, Nolan B. Encyclopedia of World Methodism. 2 vols. Nashville, TN: United Methodist Publishing House, 1974.
World Methodist Council. Handbook of Information. Lake Junaluska, NC: World Methodist Council, 1997.

Puerto Rico

When Columbus first discovered the island of Borinquen, now known as Puerto Rico, it was inhabited by the Taino people, who would later be killed off by the combination of disease, war, and the attempt to adapt to the harshness of the Spanish colonial system. In the early sixteenth century, as an economy built on sugar cane developed, Africans were brought to Puerto Rico to work the plantations. During the nineteenth century, slave revolts attempted unsuccessfully to overthrow Spanish rule.

Contemporary Puerto Ricans date their independence from the unsuccessful revolt in 1868 led by Ramón Emeterio Betances (1827–1893), who proclaimed the island's independence prior to his defeat. Slavery was finally abolished in 1873. As a result of the Spanish-American War, control of Puerto Rico passed to the United States in 1898. English was imposed as the official language, and in 1917 Puerto Ricans became U.S. citizens. However, their participation in local affairs was limited. They became U.S. citizens with limited control over local government; the governor and other key officials were not elected, but appointed by the U.S. president, and the governor could veto any legislation.

After World War II, local rule was turned over to the island's residents. The new government, elected in 1948, moved to transform Puerto Rico into a commonwealth. The United States retained power in foreign relations, defense, and some financial affairs; Puerto Ricans retained their American citizenship. An ongoing debate over the island's status has been held in Puerto Rico, with some favoring statehood and others independence, but the commonwealth status has continued to be favored by the majority of the population.

Catholicism was established in Puerto Rico in 1511, when the first diocese in the Western Hemisphere was established on the island. The church grew, but its leadership was wiped out late in the seventeenth century by a smallpox epidemic. Only four priests survived, and they were given little additional assistance during the next century. The church was greatly strengthened in the early nineteenth century, when a number of priests came to Puerto Rico from other regions in Latin America where wars of independence had put their lives in danger. Their loyalty to Spain did not go unnoticed when the various slave revolts began to occur.

Since the United States took control of the island, the church has struggled to retain its traditional role and its self-image as a Latin American institution while trying to make itself relevant in the new American-oriented world. The church entered the twentieth century with but a single bishop, but new dioceses were named in 1924, 1960, and 1964. San Juan was elevated to archepiscopal status in 1960. The Catholic Charismatic movement found strong support in Puerto Rico in the 1970s and has continued to attract a large number of the island's Catholics. The majority of Puerto Ricans are still Roman Catholics.

The first non-Catholic church in Puerto Rico dates to the activity of an English Presbyterian trader who started a small church in 1860. Religious tolerance was proclaimed in 1868, and in 1872 the first continuous Protestant work was initiated by the Church of England's bishop in Antigua, who erected the first Anglican church at Ponce. That work was turned over to the EPISCOPAL CHURCH, which had sent missionary representatives very soon after the change of governments in 1898. Responsibility for the work was initially turned over to the bishop of Chicago but was later moved to the jurisdiction of the bishop of Sacramento, California. Puerto Rico is currently organized as an extraprovincial diocese of the Episcopal Church.

The movement of the Episcopal Church to Puerto Rico heralded the arrival of missionaries from a number of other U.S. churches, beginning with the Baptists, the Disciples of Christ, the United Brethren in Christ (now a constituent part of the United Church of Puerto Rico), the Lutherans and the Presbyterians in 1899, the Methodists in 1900, and

Status of religions in Puerto Rico, 2000-2050

Followers	2000			2025	2050
	total	%	rate
Christians	3,754,000	97.0	0.90	4,304,000	4,476,000
Roman Catholics	2,900,000	75.0	0.72	3,250,000	3,300,000
Protestants	505,000	13.1	1.16	650,000	720,000
Independents	249,000	6.4	1.11	350,000	440,000
Nonreligious	61,700	1.6	2.12	100,000	140,000
Spiritists	27,300	0.7	1.63	36,000	42,000
Atheists	14,200	0.4	1.66	18,000	22,000
Hindus	3,400	0.1	1.79	6,000	10,000
Baha'is	2,800	0.1	2.40	6,000	10,000
Jews	2,700	0.1	0.71	2,800	3,000
Muslims	930	0.0	1.24	2,000	3,000
Buddhists	500	0.0	1.12	1,000	1,500
Chinese folk-religionists	460	0.0	1.50	800	1,300
other religionists	1,100	0.0	0.70	1,300	1,500
Total population	3,869,000	100.0	0.93	4,478,000	4,710,000

the SEVENTH-DAY ADVENTIST CHURCH in 1909. William Sloan, a minister in the Northern Baptist Church (now the AMERICAN BAPTIST CHURCHES IN THE U.S.A.), made an initial tour of the island and made recommendations that led to the founding of Baptist work there. Following an agreement among the several denominations, the Baptists focused their work in the north, between Ponce and San Juan. The first congregation was opened in Rio Piedras. The Convention of Baptist Churches of Puerto Rico was formed in 1902.

Lutheran work was initiated by the Augustana Synod (now a constituent part of the EVANGELICAL LUTHERAN CHURCH IN AMERICA) in San Juan. Five churches were founded during the first decade, and, eventually, responsibility for the work passed to the United Lutheran Church in America. The Methodist Episcopal Church (now a constituent part of the UNITED METHODIST CHURCH) responded to the new situation in Puerto Rico by sending Charles W. Drees (1851–1926) to the island. Drees, who had previously been working in Uruguay, initiated both Spanish and English services in San Juan. The work remained attached to the United Methodist Church until 1992, when it was set apart as the semiautonomous Methodist Church of Puerto Rico. It became fully autonomous in 2000. Adventist work was organized in 1909 into the still existing East Puerto Rico Conference and the West Puerto Rico Conference, both of which are included in the Antillian Union Conference, which also includes work in the Dominican Republic.

Through the twentieth century, a spectrum of traditional Protestant and Free churches initiated work in Puerto Rico. Among the more successful were the ASSEMBLIES OF GOD (1957) and the CHURCH OF GOD (CLEVELAND, TENNESSEE; 1944). PENTECOSTALISM, especially, had a significant role in the development of a variety of new Puerto Rican initiated churches, several of which have also spread through the Spanish-speaking communities in the United States. Prominent among these are the Iglesia de Dios Pentecostal (Pentecostal Church of God, 1916), Iglesia Defensores de la Fe (Defenders of the Faith, 1931), Iglesia de Cristo Misionera (Missionary Church of Christ, 1934), Asamblea de Iglesias Cristianas (Assemblies of Christian Churches, 1939), Samaria Iglesia Evangélica (Samaritan Evangelical Church, 1941), and the Iglesia Mita (MITA CONGREGATION, 1942). The Pentecostal Church of God was founded by Puerto Ricans, but it affiliated with and worked with the Assemblies of God until 1956, when the two churches went their separate ways.

Gardner H. Russell began meetings affiliated with the CHURCH OF JESUS CHRIST OF LATTER-DAY SAINTS (LDS) in 1947 among U.S. service personnel stationed at Guajataca. He later opened a mission in San Juan. In 1996, the number of LDS congregations had grown to the point that the Puerto Rico San Juan Mission, headquartered in Rio Piedras, was formally recognized. The JEHOVAH'S WITNESSES entered the country in the early 1930s.

There is a small Jewish community (some fifteen hundred residents) in Puerto Rico. It supports both a Reform and a Conservative synagogue in the city of Santruce.

Puerto Rico is one of several Caribbean islands where the African Caribbean religions have been very successful. The dominant form in Puerto Rico is SANTERIA, which takes Yoruban religion with an overlay of Spanish Catholicism. From Puerto Rico, Santeria has spread across North America. Because of its identification of Nigerian deities with Roman Catholic saints, initially a means of retaining the African faith while outwardly practicing Roman Catholicism, many Puerto Ricans identify with both religious communities.

A host of new religions established centers in San Juan and other Puerto Rican cities, beginning in the 1970s. These include the Sri Chinmoy centers, the INTERNATIONAL SOCIETY FOR KRISHNA CONSCIOUSNESS, and the CHURCH OF SCIENTOLOGY. There are also both Tibetan and Zen Buddhist centers and one Burmese Theravada center.

Sources:

- Gonzalez-Whippler, Migene. Santeria: The Religion. New York: Llewellyn, 1998.
- Mendoza, A. La Iglesia en Puerto Rico. Brussels, Belgium: Pro Mundi Vita, 1985.
- Saenz, M. "Economic Aspects of Church Development: A Study of the Policies and Procedures of the Major Protestant Groups in Puerto Rico from 1897–1957." M.A. thesis, University of Pennsylvania, 1961.
- Ziegler, M. O. The Origins and Growth of the Methodist Church in Puerto Rico, 1900–1970. Immaculate, PA: Immaculata College, 1988.

Pure Land Buddhism (China)

The Pure Land mythos, which eventually came to center upon the popular practice of invoking Buddha Amida's name with the intention of being born in his Pure Land of Bliss, the Western Paradise, was carried into China as early as the second or third century C.E., as indicated by sutra translations. Subsequently, beginning at least with the monk Lu-shan Hui-yüan (344–416), its practices were adopted and spread widely in Chinese monasteries. Pure Land ideas never really formed an independent teaching lineage, however, instead coexisting with normal monastic lineages, especially the T'ien-t'ai founded by Chih-i (538–597). A key Chinese addition to the canon in the early period was the Kuan-ching (Visualization Sutra), which describes nine detailed statuses of potential rebirth in the Pure Land realm.

Pure Land doctrine and practice have remained a standard aspect of the repertoire of Chinese Buddhism, whether in monastic practice or in monastically influenced lay practice. A decline in relative status occurred in the T'ang period (618–907), when Pure Land (and T'ien-t'ai) became to some extent subordinated to the authority claims of Ch'an lineages. Nevertheless, almost all later monastic Buddhism was normally characterized by the "dual practice" of both Ch'an and Pure Land, as represented by the teaching of Chu-hung (1535–1615), and apparently more practitioners hoped for rebirth in the Western paradise than for success in pursuing the official bodhisattva path.

Crucially, much of Pure Land tradition in China went outside of official monasticism. The Kuan-ching text in particular opened the way to popularization because it appeared to promote the efficacy of religious routines as simple as the recitation of the Buddha's name, which alone might lead to the Pure Land at its lowest level. A key teacher who was regarded as having emphasized this aspect of the teaching was Shan-tao (613–681). His presentation of the Pure Land perspective would later influence H_nen (1133–1212), who would launch the tradition in Japan in 1175. Throughout the later imperial period (c. 1200–1900), influential lay Pure Land movements flourished, sometimes supervised by the official monastic system and sometimes separate from it. Of course, more so than monastic Buddhism (which was carefully controlled by Chinese imperial regimes), independent Pure Land had a tendency to diverge into popular movements, which violated normative Buddhism religiously or even challenged it politically.

Chinese traditions were severely damaged by twentieth-century political disorder and by post–World War II Maoism. However, vigorous revival has been under way for decades, stimulated significantly by late-twentieth-century developments in Taiwan. In the case of Pure Land, the revival has recreated the old relationships of complementarity and tension between Pure Land and Ch’an authority claims on the one hand and between monastic and lay forms of organization on the other. Nonetheless, the Pure Land ‘language’ of Buddhism continues to be preferred to the Ch’an by more Chinese practitioners, as it was in the imperial periods.

In comparative context it is noteworthy that no version of Chinese Pure Land ever took root (despite decades of possible inspiration in the twentieth century due to Japanese colonialism), which was both austere orthodox (philosophically) and also fundamentally nonmonastic (as is the Japanese JODO-SHINSHU school). Whether monastic or lay, Chinese followers have remained oriented to an approach that strongly valorizes ritual asceticism and precept-keeping.

Among the important representatives of Chinese Pure Land Buddhism in the contemporary world is the international association of Amitabha Buddhist Societies associated with Taiwanese Master Chin Kung (b. 1927), who founded the Hwa Dzan Dharma Giving Association and the associated Corporate Body of the Buddha Educational Foundation. Related temples and centers may be found among the Chinese in diaspora in Hong Kong, the Philippines, India, Nepal, Bangladesh, Malaysia, Australia, Singapore, Canada, the United States, the United Kingdom, Poland, Spain, and South Africa. The Corporate Body of the Buddha Educational Foundation publishes and distributes Pure Land books internationally.

Address:

Amitabha Buddhist Societies
<http://www.amtbweb.org/> (in Chinese and English)

Galen Amstutz

Sources:

- Ch’en, Kenneth K. S. Buddhism in China: A Historical Survey. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1964. Reprint, 1972.
- Chin Kung, Master. To Understand Buddhism: The Collected Works of Venerable Master Chin Kung. Taipei, Taiwan: Corporate Body of the Buddha Educational Foundation, 1998.
- Gregory, Peter N., and Daniel A. Getz Jr. Buddhism in the Sung. A Kuroda Institute Book. Honolulu: University of Hawaii Press, 1999.
- Jones, Charles Brewer. Buddhism in Taiwan: Religion and the State, 1660–1990. Honolulu: University of Hawaii Press, 1999.
- Welch, Holmes. The Practice of Chinese Buddhism, 1900–1950. Cambridge: Harvard University Press, 1967.

Qadiriyya Rifaiyya Sufi Order

The original Sufi teacher who established the Rifa'i Sufi order was Ahmad al-Rifa'i (1118–1181), who was born in Basra, Iraq. Sheikh al-Rifa'i was a contemporary of Sheikh 'Abd al-Qadir Jilani in Baghdad, from whose teaching the QADIRIYYA SUFI ORDER developed. Much of their theosophy focused upon the different stages (maqamat) and states (awhal) one needs to experience to touch God's beauty (jamal). "Love is fire" is a common phrase among the Rifa'i Sufis, who assert that love piety is essential for the mystical experience.

Egyptian Rifa'i Sufis have an intense veneration of the Prophet and his family; Central Asian Rifa'is are distinguished by the practice of piercing their skin with swords and eating glass during dhikr ("remembrance of Allah" devotional sessions). The dhikr sessions include verd (spiritual readings) and practicing tesbih (repeating the names of God with the aid of a rosary). Today, the Rifa'i Sufis are located in Iraq, Turkey, Egypt, Syria, Palestine, Lebanon, Central Asia, and southeastern Europe.

A new lineage of the Rifaiyya began early in the twentieth century. It grew from the ruins of a prayer house (tekke) located in Kasimpasha, now a suburb of Istanbul, and the work of Sheikh Muhammed Ansari, an Iraqi who moved to Erzincan in northeastern Turkey in the early 1900s. A descendent of both Abd al-Qadir Jilani and Ahmad al-Rifa'i, he had become sheikh of the Rifa'i order. In Turkey he met Sheikh Abdullah Hashimi, a Qadiri, and they worked together for many years. Eventually Sheikh Hashimi sent Ansari to Istanbul to establish the Qadiri Rifa'i Tariqa order and revive the prayer house.

Sheikh Ansari headed the Qadiriyya Rifa'i Tariqa in Istanbul from 1915 until his death. His son, Sheikh Muhyiddin Ansari, succeeded him and spread the order throughout Turkey, Germany, and the former Yugoslavia. He was succeeded in 1978 by Sheikh Nureddin Ozal. In May 1993, Sheikh Ozal passed away and Sheikh Taner Ansari became the new leader. Soon afterward, Sheikh Taner moved to the United States, where the center of the order is now located.

Address:

Qadiriyya Rifa'i Order
P.O. Box 2511
Napa, CA 94558
<http://www.qadiri-rifai.org>

Qamar-ul Huda

Sources:

Blakney, Richard, trans. The Eye of the Heart. Istanbul, 1988.
De Jong, Frederick. Turuq and Turuq-Linked Institutions in Nineteenth-Century Egypt. Leiden, the Netherlands: Brill, 1978.
Trimingham, Spencer. The Sufi Orders in Islam. Oxford: Clarendon, 1971.

Qadiriyya Sufi Order

The Qadiriyya Sufi Order, named after 'Abd al-Qadir al-Jilani (d. 1166), was founded in Mesopotamia approximately eight hundred years ago. It is one of the oldest Sufi orders in existence. Al-Jilani is considered to be one of the greatest Sufi teachers of his time, referred to as "sheikh of sheikhs." The development of the order and of its teachings is credited to his sons, 'Abd al-'Aziz and 'Abd al-Razzaq.

The Qadiri tradition includes philanthropic activities, meditative prayers to God called dhikr, specialized prayers, invocations, the use of music and poetry for spirituality, and special attention on studies in the Qur'an, law, and philosophy. The Sufi order adheres to hierarchies of a Sufi society, where the elder Qadiri sheikh stands as the primary teacher and supervisor of all the disciples. Although al-Jilani originally came from the Persian province of Gilan and settled in Baghdad, the Qadiriyya order eventually spread to most major centers in the Islamic regions: Iran, Syria, Egypt, Spain, Lebanon, North and West Africa, South Asia, China, Turkey, Central Asia, eastern Africa, Bosnia and Macedonia, and Indonesia. Recently, the order has established centers in many major cities in the Western world as well.

There is no central headquarters for the order, but it may be contacted through Al-Baz Publishing, Incorporated.

Address:

Al-Baz Publishing, Inc.
3680 N. 56th Ave., Ste. 836
Hollywood, FL 33021
<http://www.ummah.org.uk/al-baz/> (Al-Baz Publishing Web site)
<http://www.al-baz.com/shaikhabdalqadir/> (Information about al-Jilani)

Qamar-ul Huda

Sources:

Aini, Mehmet Ali. Un grand saint de l'Islam, 'Abd al-Qadir Guilani, 1077–1166. Paris: n.p., 1967.
at-Tadifi, Muhammad ibn Yahya. Qala'id al-Jawahir, or Necklaces of Gems.
Chabbi, Jacqueline. "Abd al-Kadir al-Djilani, personnage historique." Studia Islamica 38 (1973): 75–106.

Petrushevsky, I. P. Islam in Iran. Albany: State University of New York Press, 1985.

Qatar

Dawlat Qatar (the State of Qatar) is a small country located on a peninsula that juts out into the Persian Gulf. To the west is the island nation of Bahrain. Further to the west is Saudi Arabia, and to the south at the base of the peninsula is the United Arab Emirates. The original Arab population of the region received Islam in the seventh century C.E. Over the centuries it has also received immigrants from Yemen, Palestine, Egypt, Pakistan, India, and Iran. Only 40 percent of the present population of 420,000 are native Qataris.

Qatar was conquered in 1076 by Bahrain and remained under Bahrain's hegemony until the nineteenth century, when the ath-Thani family rose to power and led the fight for independence, which was finally obtained in 1868. The wealth of the country was traditionally built on the very fine pearls that came from the coastal waters, but demand for Qatari pearls collapsed in the 1930s because of Japanese competition. Qatar switched to oil, which has made it a wealthy nation. It is currently headed by Sheikh Hamadi bni Khalifa th-Thani (b. 1950), to whom power passed in 1995.

Islam is the official religion of the country and any form of proselytization of Muslims is prohibited by law. Also, other religions are not allowed to construct and use church buildings. The majority of Qataris are Muslims and follow the strict WAHHABI ISLAM school, which also dominates neighboring Saudi Arabia. However, the many immigrant groups that have moved into the country have brought other forms of Islam with them. For example, Muslims from Pakistan, India, and Iran, who make up 40 percent of the population, tend to be followers of SHI'A ISLAM.

Christianity had spread across the Arabian Peninsula in the second and third centuries C.E., but it was completely obliterated after the rise of Islam. The ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH attempted to rebuild a Christian presence in the area, beginning in 1841 in Aden. A vicariate was created in 1889, but it is now headquartered in Abu Dhabi, United Arab Emirates. There has been little response to the church in Qatar. A single priest resides in Doha.

Status of religions in Qatar, 2000-2050

Followers	2000			2025	2050
	total	%	rate
Muslims	496,000	82.7	2.00	621,000	655,000
Christians	62,300	10.4	2.85	94,000	106,000
Roman Catholics	36,100	6.0	3.74	55,000	60,000
Independents	10,200	1.7	2.49	15,000	20,000
Anglicans	8,000	1.3	1.06	11,000	12,000
Hindus	15,100	2.5	2.76	20,000	25,000
Nonreligious	13,500	2.3	3.06	22,000	25,000
Buddhists	11,400	1.9	2.38	20,000	30,000
Baha'is	980	0.2	0.91	1,400	1,700
Atheists	260	0.0	2.82	500	1,000
Total population	599,000	100.0	2.13	779,000	844,000

Protestant and Orthodox Christians are represented among the expatriates working in the oil field. The Arab American Oil Company employs chaplains who hold services. The CHRISTIAN BRETHERN, one branch of the PLYMOUTH BRETHERN movement, has organized several congregations. An Anglican chaplain from the EPISCOPAL CHURCH IN JERUSALEM AND THE MIDDLE EAST resides in Abu Dhabi and also visits Qatar to conduct services.

Since World War II, the BAHÁ'Í FAITH has emerged in Qatar. It originated in nearby Iran, just across the Persian Gulf.

Sources:

Horner, N. A. "Present-day Christianity in the Gulf States of the Arabian Peninsula." Occasional Bulletin of Missionary Research 2 (Apr. 1978): 53-63.

Vine, P. and P. Casey. The Heritage of Qatar. London: IMMEL Publishing, 1992.

Quanzhen Daoism

1058

Quanzhen, which translates as “Complete Realization,” or “Complete Perfection,” is one of two schools that today represent the Daoist alchemical tradition, in contrast to the liturgical tradition of ZHENGYI DAOISM. Quanzhen is also sometimes erroneously known as Northern Daoism, and Zhengyi is called Southern Daoism. About 80 percent of organized Daoism in mainland China belongs to this sect, which also prevails in Hong Kong.

For all its importance, Quanzhen is almost completely unknown in the West, where there has been little academic study of it. Many of the newer Western Daoist groups (TAOIST TAI CHI SOCIETY, HEALING TAO centers) have some relation to Quanzhen, though the exact nature of these ties remains unclear.

Emerging out of the ashes of war-torn twelfth-century China, Quanzhen became the most important religious movement in China during the Yuan dynasty. Quanzhen was founded by Wang Zhe, who was also known by his religious name as Wang Chongyang (1113–1170). After living in seclusion on Mount Zhongnan in Shaanxi Province, he received seven disciples, who spread the new teaching. The most famous of these disciples was Qiu Chuji (1148–1227), who in a celebrated account in Chinese history, accepted an invitation in 1219 to teach the Mongol emperor Genghis Khan (c. 1162–1227) about longevity. Because of this, many early khans showered patronage on Quanzhen Daoism. Indeed, Quanzhen Daoists were tax exempt and became semi-official government representatives.

In the Qing dynasty, Qiu Chuji was retroactively given credit for founding the Longmen Pai (Dragon Gate Branch) of Quanzhen Daoism, the dominant sect today. Actually, Longmen can only be definitively traced to the founding of the famous Baiyunguan (White Cloud Temple) in Beijing in 1656. In the Qing dynasty, Baiyunguan became the center for all Daoist schools, overseeing ordination, and many schools officially subsumed themselves into Longmen Pai. Today, Baiyunguan is the headquarters for both Quanzhen Daoism and the CHINESE DAOIST ASSOCIATION.

Quanzhen is a monastic and celibate tradition. Monks and nuns wear blue robes and topknots. The main altars of Quanzhen temples traditionally enshrine the Three Pure Ones, the high gods of Daoism, emanations of Dao. They are seated in meditation, rather like Buddhas. Indeed, Quanzhen owes not only its iconography but its architecture and philosophy to Buddhism. It ascetically rejects daily comforts, and it believes in rebirth and karma. Its emphasis on quiet sitting (jingzuo) was influenced by Chan Buddhism. Quanzhen is based on spiritual and moral cultivation, rather than on philosophical, scriptural, or ritual traditions.

That cultivation also incorporates much of “Inner Alchemy,” a tradition concerning personal transformation which has been preserved largely due to the efforts of Quanzhen. The patron saint of Quanzhen Inner Alchemy is Lu Dongbin, a Tang dynasty sage whom Wang Chongyang had visualized. Lu Dongbin is head of the eight immortals. Depicted as a scholar with a fly whisk and a demon-slaying sword, he is a common subject in Yuan-dynasty drama and popular art.

One of Wang Chongyang’s aims was to bring the Three Teachings of China, Daoism, Confucianism, and Buddhism, into a single great system once more. Quanzhen borrowed not only from Buddhism but also from neo-Confucianism. In the nineteenth century, Quanzhen movements were popularized, particularly those involving the new divinatory craze of spirit writing, in which a sharp stick attached to a frame moved automatically over a planchette of sand. Many of these sects make up the current Hong Kong Daoist scene. Many temples there have a truly combinatory pantheon: Lu Dongbin, representing Daoism; the Jade Emperor, representing the celestial bureaucracy, hence Confucianism; and Guanyin, the sinicized, feminized form of Avalokiteshvara, the bodhisattva of compassion, representing Buddhism.

Elijah Siegler

Address:

Baiyunguan
6 Baiyunguan Jie
Xibianmenwai, Xuanwu District
Beijing
China

Sources:

Tsui, Bartholomew P. M. Taoist Tradition and Change: The Story of the Complete Perfection Sect in Hong Kong. Hong Kong: Christian Study Centre on Chinese Religion and Culture, 1991.
Wong, Eva. Seven Taoist Masters. Boston: Shambhala, 1990.

Rada Religion

The Rada religion (variously referred to as Alladah, Arara, or Arada) is a Caribbean religion derived from the name of an African city located along the Mina coast on the Bight of Benin. The city of Arada served as an important religious and political center during the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, and Rada spirits (lwa) occupy a central place in African-derived religions throughout the Caribbean. Rada spirits are especially prominent in Haiti, where all African spirits are grouped into families, pantheons, and/or nachons, and every lwa (whether a member of the Petro, Ibo, or Kongo nachon) is believed to have a Rada counterpart (Desmangles 1992, 94). Rada spirits are also present in the African-derived religions of Cuba, the Dominican Republic, Jamaica, Barbados, St. Kitts, Grenada, Carriacou (the Grenadines), and St. Vincent.

The major Rada spirits include Dada Segbo (the creator), Daugbwe (the serpent), Elegba (spirit of the crossroads), Sakpata (an Earth spirit), and Ogou (the spirit of iron). Some observers associate Rada lwa with benevolent forces and contrast them with Petro lwa, who are seen as bitter and aggressive. This is an oversimplification. As Desmangles (1992, 95) points out, the distinction is not one between good and evil. Rada lwa are often conceived as gentle guardians of the universe, but they too can be unpredictable and vindictive. For example, Elegba, who directs the course of human destiny, can also cause accidents altering that destiny. All lwa have complex personalities.

The purest form of Rada ritual was on the Caribbean island of Trinidad during the late nineteenth century (Carr 1953). In the 1860s a free Rada population from Dahomey (now Benin) settled in the Belmont section of Port of Spain, and Abojevi Zalwenu, an African-trained diviner and herbalist, came to Trinidad to meet the religious needs of this immigrant community. Zalwenu (also known by his Creole name Robert Antoine and more popularly as “Papa Nanee”) purchased acreage in Belmont where he established a residential compound that remained a center of Rada ceremonial life until his death in 1899.

Under Zalwenu, Rada ceremonies were carried out in strict accordance with African calendrical cycles, and new vodunsi (priests) were initiated on a regular basis. Unlike other Rada ceremonies in the Caribbean, Zalwenu’s Trinidad rituals closely followed nineteenth-century African practice. Elsewhere, however, Rada rituals contained a mixture of practices from a variety of African traditions (Petro, Kongo, and so on). These “mixed” ceremonies have preserved elements of seventeenth- and eighteenth-century Rada ritual that were lost in Africa and unknown to Zalwenu.

The Belmont place of worship, called a vodunkwe (house of the gods), survives, but Rada rituals have been greatly modified and the number of services, especially those involving animal sacrifices, have declined in recent years. (The author visited the compound with the late Andrew Carr in 1976, and again visited in 1985 and 1999.) In 1999 the site was used primarily as a panyard (musical shrine) and a center for Orisha devotees, but a number of vodunsi were in residence. In the nineteenth century, Zalwenu established different shrines (and stools) to the lwa at various locations around the vodunkwe. Devotees continue to make offerings at these stools.

Many Trinidadians no longer distinguish the Rada lwa from other African-derived deities. All spirits are grouped into a general category called Orisha. Thus, Tracey Hucks (2001) has suggested that Trinidadian Rada may be fully absorbed into the more active Orisha religion. However, interest in “pure” Rada continues, and Andrew Carr’s 1989 study is still widely consulted, suggestive of a possible resurgence of the Rada tradition in Trinidad. At the International Orisha Conference that was held in Port of Spain in 1999, for example, there was serious talk of bringing a senior vodunsi from Africa to reestablish the Belmont center.

Address:

The Belmont Vodunkwe
127–129 Belmont Circular Rd.
Port of Spain
Trinidad

Stephen D. Glazier

Sources:

- Burton, Richard D. E. Afro-Creole Power: Opposition and Play in the Caribbean. Ithaca, NY: Cornell University Press, 1997.
- Carr, Andrew T. A Rada Community in Trinidad. 1953. Reprint, Port of Spain: Paria Publishing, 1989.
- Desmangles, Leslie G. The Faces of the Gods: Vodou and Roman Catholicism in Haiti. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1992.
- Glazier, Stephen D. Marchin’ the Pilgrims Home: A Study of the Spiritual Baptists of Trinidad. Salem, WI: Sheffield, 1991.
- Hucks, Tracey. “Trinidad, African-Derived Religions.” In The Encyclopedia of African and African-American Religions, edited by Stephen D. Glazier, 338–343. New York: Routledge, 2001.
- Warner-Lewis, Maureen. Trinidad Yoruba: From Mother Tongue to Memory. Tuscaloosa: University of Alabama Press, 1996.

Radhasoami

The Radhasoami tradition was formally founded in 1861 in Agra, India, by Shiv Dayal Singh (1818–1878), who was associated with two Sant Mat gurus, Tulsi Sahib (1764–1848) in Hathras and Girdhari Das (d. 1861) in Agra. Shiv Dayal Singh, more popularly known as Soamiji Maharaj, advocated the practice of surat shabd yoga (union of the soul with the divine sound), a strict lacto-vegetarian diet, and devotion to a living guru who would guide initiates to higher regions of consciousness. The name Radhasoami (usually spelled as one word, with the variation Radhaswami) was apparently coined by one of Shiv Dayal Singh's chief disciples, Rai Salig Ram (d. 1898), who elevated his guru to the highest divine status. In Salig Ram's theology, Radha stands for soul and Soami for lord, and thus Radhasoami means Lord of the Soul. This interpretation has been shared by almost all practitioners of the faith. The phrase is also used as a greeting between members.

After Shiv Dayal Singh's death in 1878, several disciples worked as his spiritual successors. This eventually led to a number of schisms, and it is now estimated that there are well over one hundred different branches of the Radhasoami tradition worldwide. The most popular Radhasoami group in the world is the Radhasoami Satsang, Beas (Punjab), which has well over 2 million followers and centers in Europe, Africa, Asia, and North America. Founded by Jaimal Singh (1838–1903) in 1891, the Beas Satsang (spiritual gathering) lineage of gurus have all been born Sikh. Since Radhasoami advocates devotion to a living human guru, this has naturally led to political and religious tension among orthodox Sikh groups in the Punjab. The Radhasoamis are not a subset of Sikhism, but they do share much of the Sant philosophy in common. The current leader of the Beas Satsang is Gurinder Singh Dhillon (b. 1954), who has been instrumental in expanding the property holdings of the group worldwide, including large estates in California, North Carolina, Hawaii, England, and South Africa.

Other important Radhasoami branches, each with their own unique guru lineages, include three founded in the city of Agra, India: Soami Bagh, Dayal Bagh, and Peepal Mandi. Each of these branches trace their lineages back to Shiv Dayal Singh through Rai Salig Ram (otherwise known as Huzur Maharaj). Unlike the Beas-related satsangs that advocate repeating the spiritual mantra of five holy names (panch nam), the Agra-related groups teach repetition of one holy name, Radhasoami. Unlike the Beas satsangs, which argue that Radhasoami is simply a modern manifestation of Sant Mat, the "doctrine of the saints," the Agra groups also believe that their founder, Shiv Dayal Singh, was a unique and supreme incarnation of the highest lord, Anami Purush, and presented a new and higher path to God. There are at least one hundred thousand followers in each of the Agra schools, though most of the disciples are Indian born.

Arguably the most controversial guru in Radhasoami history was the Faqir Chand (1886–1981), founder of the Manvta Mandir branch in Hoshiarpur, Punjab, and disciple of Shiv Brat Lal (d. 1939), who taught that all gurus are "unknowing" and that whatever miracles or visions occur in a devotee's life are directly due to his or her faith and devotion. The guru, in sum, has no paranormal powers whatsoever. Faqir's views are generally viewed in Radhasoami circles as heretical and heterodox. However, Faqir's writings have become increasingly more popular since his death.

The Radhasoami tradition has also influenced other new religious movements, including RUHANI SATSANG (founded by Kirpal Singh [1894–1974], disciple of the Beas guru, Sawan Singh), ECKANKAR (founded by Paul Twitchell [b. c. 1908–1971], former disciple of Kirpal Singh), MASTER CHING HAI MEDITATION ASSOCIATION (founded by Ching Hai [b. 1929], one-time disciple of Thakar Singh), the eclectic MOVEMENT OF SPIRITUAL INNER AWARENESS, ELAN VITAL (formerly the Divine Light Mission), and MasterPath (founded by Gary Olsen, who claims spiritual allegiance with Sawan Singh and was a former follower of ECKANKAR).

Since there are so many different gurus and branches in the Radhasoami tradition, there have been a significant number of succession disputes within the movement's history. The most contentious fight was between Soami Bagh and Dayal Bagh and resulted in a decades-long legal battle over the worship and property rights at Shiv Dayal Singh's samadh (burial site). Despite these squabbles, Radhasoami is one of the fastest growing of the newer religious traditions in the world. The total number of followers worldwide (among all branches) is estimated to be well over 4 million.

David Christopher Lane

Sources:

Juergensmeyer, Mark. Radhasoami Reality. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1991.

Lane, David Christopher. The Radhasoami Tradition. New York: Garland Publishers, 1994.

The Unknowing Sage: The Life and Work of Baba Faqir Chand. Walnut, CA: MSAC Philosophy Group, 1993.

Raelian Movement International

The Raelian Movement International is the largest UFO religion in the world, currently claiming fifty thousand members, or those who have undergone the "baptism," called the "transmission of the cellular plan," in which initiates acknowledge the extraterrestrials, the Elohim, as their Creator. The movement was founded in 1976 by Claude Vorilhon (called Rael), born in Vichy, France, in 1946. He was and is still a race car driver.

Having chosen Vorilhon to be a prophet, the Elohim abducted him to their planet, where an encounter with his father, Yahweh, led to the escalation of his claims back on Earth. His alleged encounter with the Elohim took place on December 13, 1973 (the day of Saint Lucie, whose name means “light”), in the mountains near Clermont-Ferrand. A green, childlike being emerged from their ship and invited Rael aboard for Bible instruction, in the course of which Genesis was revealed to be a starship’s log account of the Earth colonization project of the Elohim scientists. Vorilhon learned that these scientists created the first humans in laboratories out of their own DNA. The Fall of Humanity was the consequence of forbidden science lessons taught to the little “Adams and Eves” born out of test tubes, and the casting out of Eden was the “grounding” of the original team of extraterrestrials as a punitive action, the result of a struggle between rival political factions on the home planet over the issue of whether or not earthlings should be given scientific knowledge.

The Elohim gave Vorilhon the title Rael (from Is-Rael, meaning “bearer of light”) and told him that he had been chosen to found a movement that would spread globally and would demystify the world’s religions with the literal truth: the message of humankind’s true origins and destiny. His mission is to arrange the construction of an embassy on neutral territory in Jerusalem, where the extraterrestrials could land and meet the representatives of all the nations and be filmed by television crews.

Rael founded MADECH (Mouvement pour l’Accueilles Elohim Createurs de l’Humanité), the forerunner of the Raelian Movement, in 1974. MADECH published Rael’s account of his extraterrestrial encounter: Le Livre qui dit la vérité: J’ai rencontré un extraterrestre (1974). The founding of the Raelian Movement International in 1976 made the transition from ufologist club to a distinct new religious movement.

Rael encountered the extraterrestrials again on October 7, 1975, a meeting described in They Took Me to Their Planet [Les Extra-terrestres m’ont emmené sur leur planète], 1997. While on their planet, he received the hospitality of six female biological robots, with whom he spent a night of love-making and who taught him the sensual awareness technique to activate his psychic potential and grow new neural pathways. Sensual meditation, described in his third book, Sensual Meditation, involves a relaxation exercise called harmonization avec l’infini, a mental-anatomical tour of the body that arrives eventually at the brain, a visualization of the planet of the Elohim, and an exercise in telepathic rapport.

On this same trip, he was introduced to the mysteries of cloning and watched his own double being formed in a vat. For Raelians, the hope of immortality will be fulfilled by regeneration through science. Hence, Rael established an initiation called “the transmission of the cellular plan,” which formalizes members’ recognition of the Elohim as their creators. They are also encouraged to sign a contract giving a local mortuary permission, upon their decease, to remove one square centimeter of the “frontal bone” to be stored in a bank in Switzerland, awaiting collection by the Elohim and future cloning.

In the twenty-first century, the movement has received considerable publicity due to Rael’s belief in cloning. On March 9, 1997, Rael announced the creation of Valian Venture, Ltd., a company that offers CLONAIID to parents who wish to clone a child, for the fee of two hundred thousand dollars. Another service offered by the company is INSUR-ACLONE; for fifty thousand dollars, the cell of a child can be stored to be cloned in the event of an untimely death. Most recently, Raelians have announced that they are attempting to clone a dead baby in a secret laboratory.

Raelian membership is divided into two levels: the committed core group of “Guides,” who make up the group’s hierarchy, called the Structure, and the most recently joined members or loosely affiliated “Raelians,” who after baptism received the bulletin Apocalypse. The six levels in the pyramidal Structure are, from low to high, assistant animator, animator, assistant guide, priest guide, bishop guide, and finally, the planetary guide or Guide of Guides (Rael). The priest and bishop guides are empowered to transmit the cellular codes, or “baptize” new members. The guide of guides is reelected by the bishops every seven years. There is also a Council of Discipline with the power to excommunicate errant members, as well as an administrative body, the Council of the Wise.

Rael, called the “Last of Forty Prophets,” was born soon after the first atomic explosion in Hiroshima in 1945, when humanity entered the “Age of Apocalypse.” Raelians believe that during this age of scientific revelation, humanity will come to understand its true origins. “With the Elohim’s guidance and humanity’s right choices, this age holds marvelous potentialities: liberation, power, quasi-immortality, once the Elohim arrive and bequeath to their creations scientific knowledge that will enable humans to travel through space and colonize virgin planets in our own image.”

The group is known as the Raelian Religion in the United States, where it has won tax-exempt status, and it is known as the Raelian Church in Canada, where it is seeking recognition as a religion. The Raelian Movement was established in Quebec in 1976. The Canadian movement was the second of the international movements after France. By March 1995, the movement had acquired religious corporation status from the Quebec government. This meant that the new Raelian Church could apply for tax-exempt status.

The central headquarters of the international movement is in Quebec, at UFOland in Valcourt, where Rael resides in between his lecture tours and car races, though the address of the international headquarters is formally listed Geneva, Switzerland. There is also a retreat, called Eden, in Alby, France. There are over five thousand Raelians in Canada, nearly all of them in Quebec. The movement has branches in eighty-four countries, though most members are found in French-speaking Europe, Quebec, and Japan.

Ramtha's School of Enlightenment

The Raelians have four large gatherings each year on dates that commemorate Rael's encounters with the Elohim. Members also participate in an annual one-week staged'evening in a rural setting, featuring daily lectures, sensual meditation, fasting, nonmandatory nudity, sensory awareness exercises, and sexual experimentation—the ultimate goal being to experience the “cosmic orgasm.”

Address:

Raelian Movement, International Headquarters
P.O. Box 225
1211 Geneva 8
Switzerland
<http://www.rael.org/> (multilingual)

Susan Palmer

Sources:

- Bouchard, Alain. “Mouvement Raelien.” In Nouvel Age . . . Nouvelles Croyances. Written under the direction of the Centre d'Information sur les Nouvelles Religions. Montreal: Editions Paulines & Mediaspaul, 1989.
- Palmer, Susan J. Il Movimento raelieni. Torino, Italy: Editions Elledici, 2000.
- . “The Raelians Are Coming: The Future of a UFO Religion.” In Religion in a Changing World, edited by Madeleine Cousineau, 136–146. Westport, CT: Praeger, 1998.
- Vorilhon, Claude. Les Extra-terrestres m'ont emmené sur leur planète. Brantome, France: L'Édition du Message, 1977.
- . Le Livre qui dit la vérité. Vaduz, Liechtenstein: Fondation Raelienne, 1974.
- . La Méditation Sensuelle. Vaduz, Liechtenstein: Fondation Raelienne, 1980.

Ramtha's School of Enlightenment

Ramtha's School of Enlightenment was founded in the late 1980s in Yelm, Washington, by JZ Knight (b. 1946), who had emerged as the most popular of a new wave of channelers that arose in the West along with the NEW AGE MOVEMENT. In 1977 the spiritual entity Ramtha appeared to Knight, then a housewife in Tacoma, Washington, and introduced himself as the Enlightened One. The next year, Knight began to channel Ramtha publicly. She initially held weekend sessions called Dialogues, where she would channel Ramtha. The Dialogues were held around the United States and increasingly in several foreign countries, and many of these sessions were later transcribed and published as books or made available on videotape. However, in 1988 the decision was made to discontinue the Dialogues and to concentrate on developing a body of students who wished to go more deeply into the process of actualizing the enlightenment about which Ramtha had spoken.

According to the channeled messages, Ramtha is a thirty-five-thousand-year-old warrior who at the height of his power was almost killed. He found enlightenment during his time of recovery and eventually ascended to a spiritual realm. Once Ramtha's School of Enlightenment was formed, Ramtha began to teach a set of practices that would allow students to access and become directly aware of the spiritual realms. The basic practice, termed “energy and consciousness,” involves controlled breathing and kundalini yoga, in which latent energy believed to be located at the base of the spine is allowed to rise up the spine and bring its energy and enlightenment to the self.

Ramtha describes the universe as divided into seven levels, at the center of which is the Void (Pure Potentiality) out of which the other levels are derived. The seventh level is the visible world, into which individuals as spiritual entities have come. The spiritual entities created this world, but then they became trapped in it and forgetful of their spiritual origin. Enlightenment comes as one is able to remember and experience one's spiritual origin and can freely navigate the several levels.

The school is organized as an Esoteric mystery school. Students initially pass through a graded curriculum before being admitted to the larger student body of those who continually work on their self-awareness as spiritual beings. The larger student body gathers at the headquarters twice each year for advanced retreats, at which time new teachings and perspectives are released by Ramtha.

Some three thousand students are active in the school. During the 1990s, all events were held at Yelm, but at the close of the decade Knight began to travel again and introductory sessions concerning Ramtha are now being held annually by senior students at locations in Europe, South Africa, and Australia. Literature is published in Spanish, German, Italian, French, Japanese, and Norwegian.

During the early 1990s, Knight and the school passed through a period of intense controversy, much of which was related to the secretive esoteric nature of the school's work. In the mid-1970s she opened up the school to a group of scholars, including several psychologists who ran a set of tests on Knight and some of her leading students. Their positive reports concerning her psychological health and the extraordinary nature of her channeling activity largely ended the attacks she had previously experienced.

Address:

Ramtha School of Enlightenment
P.O. Box 579
Yelm, WA 98597
<http://www.ramtha.com/>

Sources:

- Knight, JZ. A State of Mind. New York: Warner Books, 1997.
- Melton, J. Gordon. Finding Enlightenment: Ramtha's School of Ancient Wisdom. Hillsboro, OR: Beyond Worlds Publishing, 1998.

Ramtha (through JZ Knight). A Beginner's Guide to Creating Reality. Yelm, WA: JZK Publishing, 2000.

———. Ramtha. Edited by Steven Weinberg. Eastsound, WA: Sovereignty, 1986.

Rastafarians

Rastafarianism is a social, political, and religious movement that began on the Caribbean island of Jamaica in the late 1920s. Followers of the movement, sometimes called Rastas or Dreads, are best known as the originators of the popular musical style reggae, for their extensive ritual use of ganja (marijuana), and for wearing their hair in long, rope-like braids called dreadlocks.

The name Rastafarianism is borrowed from Ras Tafari, a name for former Emperor Haile Selassie I of Ethiopia (1892–1975), who reigned from 1916 to 1974. Although a number of the founders of Rastafarianism (notably Leonard Howell and Archibald Dunckley) preached that Haile Selassie was a Living God, Emperor Selassie himself remained a devout leader within the ETHIOPIAN ORTHODOX TEWAHEDO CHURCH. When Selassie visited Jamaica in 1966, he was greatly puzzled by Rastafarians who seemed to be worshipping him.

Although there are many variants within Rastafarianism, the 1983 Rastafari Theocratic Assembly passed a resolution declaring a single variant—that associated with the House of Nyahbinghi—as the orthodox faith. The House of Nyahbinghi creed proclaims Haile Selassie a Living God and states that all African peoples are one and that the descendants of those who were taken from Africa to be slaves in Babylon will be repatriated. It is contended that all African people are descendants of the ancient Hebrews and that the reason Africans now live outside Africa is because their descendants disobeyed Ja (short for Jehovah, the God of the Hebrews), who then punished them by making them slaves to Whites. Haile Selassie I was expected to arrange for the return of all people of African descent to Africa, but following his death in 1975, there has been less emphasis on a physical return to Africa and greater emphasis on a spiritual return.

Rastafarianism today is a worldwide movement with membership in Jamaica, other Caribbean islands, the United States, Canada, Australia, New Zealand, South Africa, Ghana, Rastas reasoning during a prayer service in the Rasta House of Yeoville, Johannesburg, South Africa.

Ethiopia, the islands of the South Pacific, and parts of Western Europe (especially England, Holland, and Germany). Although contemporary Rastas represent many races and nationalities, the religion began as a Black nationalist movement. Contemporary adherents stress that it is much more than a nationalist movement—it is a way of life. They prefer to describe their involvement with Rasta as livity, the adoption of a lifestyle informed by strict theocratic principles.

One central Rasta ritual, called “reasoning,” is a group discussion and debate about the interpretation of biblical texts, local politics, predictions about the future, and commentary on world events. During these ceremonies Rastas also smoke ganja, which, they believe, brings them closer to Ja. The smoking of ganja is thought to have medicinal as well as spiritual benefits.

Rastafarianism is a highly successful religious movement that has persisted for over seventy years. It continues to play a major part in the struggles of people of African descent for freedom and equality throughout the world. It is a very decentralized movement with a variety of organizations (mostly local), publications, and self-initiated activity. It has a lively presence on the Internet.

Stephen D. Glazier

Sources:

- Barrett, Leonard E., Sr. The Rastafarians. Boston, MA: Beacon Press, 1997.
- Chevannes, Barry. Rastafari: Roots and Ideology. Syracuse, NY: Syracuse University Press, 1994.
- Mulvaney, Rebekah Michele. Rastafari and Reggae: A Dictionary and Sourcebook. Westport, CT: Greenwood, 1990.
- Murrell, Nathaniel Samuel, William David Spencer, and Adrian Anthony McFarlane, eds. Chanting Down Babylon: The Rastafari Reader. Philadelphia: Temple University Press, 1998.
- “Ras Adam’s Links Page.” An Internet page with numerous links into the international Rastafarian world. Posted at <http://web.syr.edu/~affellem/raslinx.html>. Accessed December 1, 2001.

Reconstructionist Judaism

Reconstructionist Judaism developed in the United States, largely the product of the fertile mind of Mordacai M. Kaplan (1881–1983). Born in Lithuania, Kaplan came to the United States with his parents, attended the Jewish Theological Seminary, and subsequently became the rabbi of an Orthodox synagogue in New York. While there he became one of the founders of the youth movement that later matured as YOUNG ISRAEL.

Through the 1920s, Kaplan moved from ORTHODOX JUDAISM to an alignment with CONSERVATIVE JUDAISM, out of which he developed his very different approach, based upon a reconstruction of Jewish civilization. His speculations led to his classic text, Judaism as a Civilization (1934), in which he argues that Jews must make radical changes to their own social and organizational life in order to accommodate to each culture in which they reside. He saw the religious nature of Judaism through his understanding of civilization. For Kaplan, Jewish civilization focuses upon the clarification of the values of human existence, the struggle with God, and the ritualizing of life in the home, the synagogue, and the community.

Kaplan developed a pragmatic approach to Jewish life, centered on the community, rather than a theological approach to Judaism that centered in issues of tradition, revelation, and philosophy. His rejection of the divine origin of the Torah (the Jewish Bible) was but one issue that helped sever relations between Kaplan and his Conservative colleagues and that led to the development of Reconstructionism as a separate branch of Jewish spirituality. He was formally excommunicated in 1945.

The Reconstructionist movement was organized in steps. In 1935 Kaplan founded a periodical called the Reconstructionist. In 1940 the Jewish Reconstructionist Foundation was founded, and soon thereafter the first Reconstructionist synagogues opened their doors. The foundation was superseded in 1955 by a synagogue association, which went through several name changes before emerging in 1996 as the Jewish Reconstructionist Federation. Along the way it had absorbed many Jews who had participated in the harvurot movement, a communal movement that developed in the 1960s. Rabbi Ira Eisenstein (1907–2001), the second prominent leader of the movement, took the lead in founding the Reconstructionist Rabbinical College in 1968. The Rabbinical Association was founded in 1974.

Reconstructionism is largely limited to the United States. It has steadily moved toward alliances with Liberal and REFORM JUDAISM, with which it has now identified through its affiliation with the World Union for Progressive Judaism. As the twenty-first century begins, there are approximately one hundred Reconstructionist congregations, including three in Canada, and some fifty thousand members in North America. There is a single congregation in Curaçao.

Address:

Jewish Reconstructionist Federation
7804 Montgomery Ave., Ste. 9
Elkins Park, PA 19027
<http://www.jrf.org/>

Sources:

- Alpert, Rebecca T., and Jacob J. Straub. Exploring Judaism: A Reconstructionist Approach. Elkins Park, PA: Reconstructionist Press, 2000.
- Eisenstein, Ira. Reconstructing Judaism: An Autobiography. Elkins Park, PA: Reconstructionist Press, 1986.

Kaplan, Mordecai M. Basic Values in Jewish Religion. New York: Reconstructionist Press, 1948.

———. Judaism as a Civilization. New York: Macmillan Company, 1934.

Sculd, Mel. Judaism Faces the Twentieth Century: A Biography of Mordecai Kaplan. Elkins Park, PA : Reconstructionist Press, 1993.

Reform Baptists (Russia)

The Reform Baptists emerged in 1961 as a major schism in the UNION OF EVANGELICAL CHRISTIANS–BAPTISTS OF RUSSIA in what was then the Soviet Union. In 1960 the union, which represented Baptists and Pentecostals in the Soviet Union, had been forced by the Khrushchev government to issue a letter of instruction to its member congregations. The letter ordered the congregations to hold back on their evangelistic efforts. Some leaders in the union rejected the letter and saw it as indicative of an unacceptable intimacy between the union and the state.

In 1961 a group left the union and formed an Organizing Committee, officially organizing in 1965 as the Council of Churches of Evangelical Christians–Baptists, commonly referred to as Reform Baptists. They chose as their first president Gennadii K. Kryuchkov. He was soon arrested and served a time in prison. He then disappeared into the underground. The secretary, Georgi P. Vins (1928–1998), served two prison terms before being allowed to come to the United States, which became his base of operation for the continued advocacy for Russian Christians.

The schism between the union and the Reform Baptists continues. Only in 1988 with the beginning of reforms under Soviet president Mikhail Gorbachev (b. 1931) did the Reform Baptists get some relief. By the end of the year, all the Reform Baptists in prison were released and the church launched a new evangelism campaign. In 1989 the Reform Baptists held their first congress unmolested by the authorities, with delegates representing its forty-two thousand members. By 1993 they had some fifty thousand members.

Source:

Wardin, Albert W., ed. Baptists around the World. Nashville: Broadman and Holman Publishers, 1995.

Reform Judaism

In the eighteenth century, Jewish scholars, most notably Moses Mendelssohn (1729–1786), began to advocate an acculturation of traditional Jewish life to modern European life. This advocacy also coincided with the integration of many Jews, especially in Germany, into the emerging post-Enlightenment secular culture. That integration was encouraged by the changes brought to Europe by the Napoleonic conquests.

In the nineteenth century, the dialogue with non-Jewish culture would contribute to the development of a new movement within the Jewish community to develop a liberal and even rationalistic form of Jewish existence. Taking the lead would be German-speaking Jews in Central Europe and North America. The reforms began with the introduction of organ music, sermons delivered in German, and prayers in German rather than Hebrew. What began as simply an attempt to make the synagogue more appealing to “modern” Jews led to a new way of viewing Judaism. In Germany, the lead was taken by Abraham Geiger (1810–1874), who in 1870 became the chief rabbi in Berlin. Geiger argued that Judaism was always in a state of change and that God might demand at one time what at another time was inappropriate. Given the changes of the past, the rabbis of the present have leave to make changes as demanded by the times.

Reforms were asked for in the early 1920s by the younger members of the synagogue at Charleston, South Carolina, one of the early Jewish worship centers in the United States. When the congregation (largely consisting of Sephardic Jews) refused, some members left to found the Reform Society of Israelites. However, Reform Judaism really developed in the United States in the last half of the century with the significant immigration of German Jews into the Midwest. Isaac M. Wise (1819–1900) emerged as Geiger’s American counterpart, and in America the program of reform led to the creation of a set of structures to embody the movement’s ideals—the Union of American Hebrew Congregations (1875), Hebrew Union College (1877), and the Central Conference of American Rabbis (1889). Cincinnati, Ohio, became the center of Reform Jewish life. (A Reform synagogue was opened in Canada, but until the last half of the twentieth century the movement did not take hold there.)

The Reform movement’s challenge to traditional Judaism was qualitatively different from Jewish movements during the previous millennium. It questioned the necessity of a host of practices that had been considered normative for Jewish religious life. Kosher food practices were discarded, as was peculiar dress. All laws from the Jewish Bible and the Talmud (later writings of the rabbis that developed Jewish law) were examined in the light of modern needs and discarded if judged nonessential. Reform Jews were distinct from nonpracticing traditional Jews in that they did not simply ignore the law but argued that in following the reform path, one could be a complete religious Jew. This idea directly challenged traditional Judaism and the authority of traditional rabbis.

As the movement developed, Reform Jews came to oppose Zionism, although this opposition was thoroughly reversed after World War II. Reform Judaism has broken down the barriers between men and women in the synagogue, recognized Jewish lineage through both the father and the mother (whereas traditional Judaism is matrilineal), expressed a willingness to accept converts to the faith, and most recently accepted gay and lesbian Jews into the rabbinate.

A young woman practices for her Batmitzvah with a female rabbi in a West London Synagogue. (Helene Rogers/TRIP)

The Reform movement spread to Jewish communities worldwide through the twentieth century, moving in the 1930s to the Jewish community in Palestine. After several unsuccessful starts, liberal Judaism in Israel experienced a new beginning in 1958, when the Harel Synagogue opened in Jerusalem. As other synagogues opened, they associated together as the Israel Movement for Progressive Judaism (incorporated in 1971), and their leadership formed the Council of Progressive Rabbis. The Israeli movement has differed from American Reform Jews in its retention of various Orthodox practices in recognition of their important role in Israeli life.

In Israel, Orthodox Jews challenged the status of Reform (and Conservative) Jews, and moves were made to prevent their spread and the construction of Reform synagogues. Many Orthodox Jewish rabbis consider Reform Judaism as a separate religion. As a result, marriages performed in Israel by Reform rabbis are still not recognized by the civil authorities, and Reform couples must undergo a second wedding service to meet legal demands. The lack of official recognition has had an impact on the movement's perceived lack of authenticity, has altered its relationship to the Israeli government, and has led many to treat it much like one of the various non-Jewish religious communities in Israel.

The Reform movement globally is represented by the World Union for Progressive Judaism (WUPJ). Approximately two-thirds of the world's 1.5 million Reform and Progressive Jews reside in the United States. Other important Reform organizations would include the Union of American Hebrew Congregations and the Israel Movement for Progressive Judaism, which shares headquarters with the WUPJ.

Addresses:

World Union for Progressive Judaism, International Headquarters
13 King David St.
Jerusalem, 94101
Israel

World Union for Progressive Judaism, North American Headquarters
633 Third Ave.

New York, NY 10017-6778
<http://rj.org/wupj/index.html>

Union of American Hebrew Congregations
 633 Third Ave.
 New York, NY 10017-6778
<http://rj.org/>

Sources:

- An Intimate Portrait of the Union of American Hebrew Congregations—A Centennial Documentary.* Cincinnati, OH: American Jewish Archives, 1973.
- Plaut, W. Gunther. The Rise of Reform Judaism. New York: World Union for Progressive Judaism, 1963.
- Tabory, Ephraim. Progressive Judaism in Israel: Progress and Prospects. New York: American Jewish Committee, 1998.

Reformed Christian Church in Slovakia

The Reformed phase of the Protestant Reformation reached Slovakia in the sixteenth century and found some immediate support from people already affected by the reforms attempted by Jan Hus (c. 1373–1415) a century earlier. By 1564 enough congregations had been formed to designate four presbyteries. After the Hungarian takeover of the region, the presbyteries were incorporated into the Reformed Church of Hungary.

Although Hungary was primarily a Roman Catholic country, there were powerful Protestant royalty, especially among the Transylvanian princes, who used their influence to protect the Reformed faith. Repression in the mid-seventeenth century led to what became known as the “Bloody Tribunal” at Bratislava in 1673. Pastors who refused to realign with the ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH were forced into exile, and a few were even sold into slavery. The repression was not relaxed until the Edict of Toleration in 1781, and Protestants were finally granted basic civil rights in 1791.

The church tended to be Hungarian in leadership, and especially after the country’s constitutional changes enacted in 1881, Slovak cultural peculiarities were largely eliminated from church life. Following World War I and the separation of Czechoslovakia from the Austro-Hungarian Empire, the Reformed Church of Slovakia was set apart as an independent body. It originally included some 235,000 members, approximately 20,000 of whom lived in nearby Ukraine. The next decades were filled with tensions, as the Hungarian minority objected to the changes in church life introduced by the new Slovak leaders.

World War II brought additional changes. During the Nazi regime, the church was once again merged into the Reformed Church of Hungary, though its independence was reestablished soon after the war ended. The Ukrainian members were lost as the Ukraine was integrated into the Soviet Union. Then in 1951, the church adopted a new constitution.

The synod was named the highest legislative body in the church, and a synodal council was organized as the synod’s executive arm. Further changes came in 1993 when Slovakia was separated from what is now the Czech Republic.

The Reformed Christian Church in Slovakia has approximately 120,000 members in more than 325 congregations. It supports the Theological Seminary located at Komárno. A Hungarian-speaking minority remains an important component of the church’s life. It is a member of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES, the WORLD ALLIANCE OF REFORMED CHURCHES, and the INTERNATIONAL CONFERENCE OF REFORMED CHURCHES.

Address:

Reformed Christian Church in Slovakia
 Jókaiho 34
 94 501 Komárno
 Slovakia

Sources:

- Bauswein, Jean-Jacques, and Lukas Vischer, eds. The Reformed Family Worldwide: A Survey of Reformed Churches, Theological Schools, and International Organizations. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans, 1999.
- Capek, D., ed. Fellowship of Service: Life and Work of Protestant Churches in Czechoslovakia. Prague: Ecumenical Council of Churches, 1961.

Reformed Christian Church in Yugoslavia

In the sixteenth century, the Reformed Church spread throughout Hungary and Hungarian-speaking converts formed the Reformed Church of Hungary. In 1920, as a result of settlements following World War I and the breakup of the Austro-Hungarian Empire, a section in the southern portion of the empire adjacent to Serbia was transferred to Serbian control. In 1933, those members of the Reformed Church who found themselves in a new country formed the Reformed Christian Church in Yugoslavia.

The new church also included several German-speaking Reformed congregations that had originated in the eighteenth century among people who had moved into the area from Germany. The Germans were forced out of the area following World War II. Atrocities committed by occupying German troops had made people of German background unwelcome in the new nation of Yugoslavia that was being formed.

The surviving church suffered suppression under the Marxist regime during the generation after World War II, and many members immigrated to Hungary. However, the church continued into the post-Marxist era. It experienced a major loss when Croatia separated from Yugoslavia as an independent country and the members residing there organized separately in 1993 as the Reformed Christian Church in Croatia.

The church has a Reformed theological stance, having adopted the Heidelberg Catechism and the Helvetic Confession as doctrinal standards. It has a presbyterial organization, with a synod as its highest legislative body. Worship is primarily in Hungarian and Czech. In 2002, the church reported approximately seventeen thousand members in 19 congregations, but it has been losing Hungarian-speaking members, as many have left the country seeking a more hospitable environment. The church is a member of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES, the WORLD ALLIANCE OF REFORMED CHURCHES, and the Yugoslav Ecumenical Council.

Address:

Reformed Christian Church in Yugoslavia
Ul. Bratstva 26
24, 323 Feketic
Yugoslavia
<http://www.netministries.org/see/churches.exe/ch01797>

Source:

Bauswein, Jean-Jacques, and Lukas Vischer, eds. The Reformed Family Worldwide: A Survey of Reformed Churches, Theological Schools, and International Organizations. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans, 1999.

Reformed Church in America

The Reformed Church in America is the primary bearer of the Dutch Reformed Christian tradition in the United States. The church traces its origin to the establishment of a colony on the eastern coast of North America at the beginning of the seventeenth century on Manhattan Island, today the heart of New York City. The first congregation was established in 1628 by Rev. Jonas Michaelius (1577–c. 1633). Through the next century, the church spread through the Hudson River valley and then into the colony of New Jersey. Its growth was somewhat blunted by the British takeover of New Amsterdam (New York) in 1664, but Dutch migration to the colonies continued. As church members moved westward, the church established congregations in different parts of the country, though the strength remained in the east. Queens College (now Rutgers University) was established to provide college and theological training.

As the colonies' break with England became a possibility, in 1770 John Livingston (1746–1825), who had been in Holland completing his education, arrived back in New York with a plan of union for the scattered Reformed congregations. It was not until 1792 that a constitution was adopted. In 1819 the church incorporated under the name Reformed Protestant Dutch Church. It followed the beliefs and practices of the Reformed Churches in the Netherlands (GKN).

The church had a spurt of growth in the middle of the nineteenth century, when a new wave of immigration from Holland brought many Dutch settlers to Michigan, Iowa, and neighboring states as far west as South Dakota. A few congregations were founded in Canada. As it Americanized, the church adopted its present name in 1867. Through the late nineteenth century and early twentieth century, the church developed an extensive missionary program. It continues to sponsor work in Japan, Taiwan, Hong Kong, the Philippines, Venezuela, Ecuador, Honduras, Nicaragua, and India. The church sponsored the Arabic Mission, founded in the 1880s by Samuel Zwemer (1867–1952), which was dedicated to spreading Christianity in the Muslim lands of the Middle East. The church continues to support the small congregations and social institutions the mission initiated in Bahrain, Saudi Arabia, Kuwait, and Oman.

The church's headquarters are located in New York, in a building that also houses the offices of the National Council of Churches in the U.S.A. and a variety of organizations representing the various concerns of the more ecumenically minded churches in the United States. It is organized presbyterially. In 1999 it reported 299,000 members in the United States and 6,500 members in Canada. The highest legislative body is the annual general assembly. Its decisions are implemented by a sixty-two-member executive committee. The church is divided into eight regional synods and further divided into two classes, or presbyteries. The church supports three college and two seminaries. The first women were admitted to the ordained ministry in the church in 1981. It is a member of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES.

Address:

Reformed Churches in America
247 Riverside Dr.
New York, NY 10015
<http://www.rca.org/>

Sources:

- Hart, D. G., and Mark Noll. Dictionary of the Presbyterian and Reformed Tradition in America. Downer's Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press, 1999.
- Hood, F. J. Reformed America. Tuscaloosa: University of Alabama Press, 1980.
- Van Hoeven, J. W., ed. Piety and Patriotism: Bicentennial Studies of the Reformed Church in America. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans, 1976.

Reformed Church in Romania

In the middle of the sixteenth century the ideas of John Calvin (1509–1564) were introduced into Transylvania (then connected with Hungary) and found their greatest acceptance among the Hungarian-speaking population, most of whom were formerly adherents of the ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH. Within a short time, as Calvin's perspective spread, a large number of Catholic monasteries would disappear.

Around 1530 Protestant preachers (both Calvinist and Lutheran) were active in the area of Satmar, Transylvania, where they operated under the protection of a powerful Romanian nobleman, Gaspar Dragfl. Later, Calvinism spread in the neighboring districts. By 1566 it had spread to Oradea and throughout the northern half of Transylvania. The Synods of Abrud (1545), Debrecen (1567), Oradea (1567), and Satu Mare (1646) were held in order to determine the organization of mission and of religious life. Catholicism was a shadow of its former self in the region, with many deserted churches and a shortage of priests; indeed, no Catholic priests remained in the district by 1598. By 1609 the Catholic cathedral in Oradea, though not yet destroyed, no longer held the altar with the relics of St. Ladislav (1040–1095). The cathedral was finally pulled down in 1618, and the stones were used to rebuild the city. At the same time, the statues of the canonized kings were melted, and the bronze was used for casting cannons.

The Calvinists separated completely from the Lutherans in 1564, and two subsequent synods in 1564 and 1567 set the organizational foundations for the Reformed Church in Transylvania. The church accepted the Second Helvetic Confession as its doctrinal standard at the synod in 1567. Somewhat of an anomaly in the Reformed tradition, the leaders retained the title of bishop, and the church's primary organizational units are termed dioceses. The Diet of Turda (1564) recognized the Calvinist Church, and the Catholic monks and priests were banished from the areas inhabited by the Magyars. Protestantism became dominant in the region, and the conflict between Protestants and Catholics continued as the Protestant princes supported the conversion of the remaining Catholic element of the population to the new faith, sometimes even with the help of the military.

The diet of 1572 slowed down the spread of the Reformed movement by granting freedom of expression to the Catholic Church. Under these circumstances, Catholicism survived and regained momentum in areas like Ciuc, Sfântu Gheorghe, Odorheiu, and Trei Scaune. During Michael the Brave's (Michael II Apafi, r. 1690–1697) short dominion over Transylvania attempts were made to consolidate the traditional churches. He restored the Orthodox bishop to his former rights, but this measure was ephemeral. Then, as soon as Transylvania became an archduchy under Austrian domination, Catholicism resumed its missionary activity. In 1691 the Leopoldine Diploma officially recognized and strengthened the rights of the Catholic Church. The Calvinists were obliged to return several places of worship to the Catholics, Catholic schools were reestablished, and some landed properties of the former monasteries were restored. In 1697 the king of Austria, Leopold I (1640–1705, r. 1658–1705), appointed a Catholic bishop for Transylvania, but due to Calvinist opposition, he would not be installed until 1716.

As Transylvania was under foreign dominion, churches in this territory were subject to the general regulations concerning denominations. The Geley Canons, instituted in 1646, included the main rules of the Reformed Church and was in effect until 1949, when the new statutes of the Calvinist church were approved. The unification of Transylvania with Romania after World War I brought about several changes in the organization of the Reformed Church—most importantly, the separation of the work in Romania from the REFORMED CHURCH OF HUNGARY. Those parishes not in the Diocese of Cluj, though disproportionate with respect to each other (as the diocese of Cluj has almost twice as many members as the diocese of Oradea), are organized in a similar manner and are autonomous. Also, both are under the jurisdiction of the synod in religious matters. Each diocese is led by a general assembly (made up of 50 percent priests and 50 percent laypeople) and a consistory that includes the bishop, the primcurator, the church notary, the mission advisor, and the councilors.

The present organization retains the tradition of parish autonomy instituted by the Diet of Turda in 1564, in which the priest must be appointed by the believers of the parish. The Calvinist believers are organized in parishes, which are linked in districts under an archpriest for administrative reasons. The districts are included in the two dioceses (Oradea and Cluj).

The Reformed Church is geographically one of Romania's most widely spread denominations. In 1930, 3.9 percent of the population declared themselves to be Calvinists (710,706 believers). At the end of the 1990s, the church reported 802,454 members. The church is a member of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES and the WORLD ALLIANCE OF REFORMED CHURCHES.

Addresses:

Reformed Church in Romania
Diocese of Cluj
Str. C. Bratianu Nr. 51
Transylvanian District
3400 Cluj
Romania

Reformed Church in Romania
Diocese of Oradea
Str. Craiovei I Nagyvarad
3700 Oradea
Romania

Constantin Cuciuc

Sources:

- Branzea, Nicolae I., and Stefan Lonita. Religious Life in Romania. Bucharest: Editura Paideia, 1999.
- Cuciuc, Constantin. Atlasul Religiiilor si al Monumentelor Istorice Religioase din Romania. Bucharest: Editura Gnosis, 1996.

Reformed Church in Zambia

1070

The Reformed Church in Zambia originated in the preaching of a nineteenth-century native evangelist among the Ngoni people who lived in what is now eastern Zambia near the present-day city of Chipata. Chief Mpezeni of the Ngoni (c. 1830–1900) was impressed and invited missionaries into his territory. Thus, in 1899 representatives from the DUTCH REFORMED CHURCH (NKG) arrived and founded their first mission. After a generation of activity, in 1929 the first Zambian national, Justo Mwale, was ordained.

In 1943 the mission was reorganized as the African Reformed Church, but White missionaries from South Africa continued to control the work. It was not until 1961 that a Zambian was elected as moderator. Zambia became an independent country in 1964, and two years later the African Reformed Church became independent. The church assumed its present name in 1968.

In the 1980s, as the policy of apartheid became an international issue and the Dutch Reformed Church identified itself with that policy, the Zambian church called the relationship to its parent body into question. In 1989 it threatened to sever ties to South Africa unless the church rejected apartheid. That did not occur, and in 1991 the Reformed Church in Zambia suspended all relationships with the Dutch Reformed Church.

In the mid-1990s the Reformed Church in Zambia reported 250,000 members in 131 congregations. The church is headed by an general synod that meets quadrennially and two regional synods, each of which meet biennially. The seminary at Lusaka is named for Justo Mwale. The church is a member of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES and both the REFORMED ECUMENICAL COUNCIL and the WORLD ALLIANCE OF REFORMED CHURCHES.

Address:

Reformed Church in Zambia
Synod Office
Box 550100
Katete
Zambia

Source:

Bauswein, Jean-Jacques, and Lukas Vischer, eds. The Reformed Family Worldwide: A Survey of Reformed Churches, Theological Schools, and International Organizations. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans, 1999.

Reformed Church in Zimbabwe

The Reformed Church in Zimbabwe began in 1891 when Andrew A. Louw (1862–1956), a missionary with the Dutch Reformed Church in South Africa, assisted by several African workers, established an initial missionary station in the land traditionally inhabited by the Shona people. In the next century, work was extended to the Nyanja people and most recently among the Tonga.

Today, as an independent body, the eighty-thousand-member church is organized with a mixed congregational and presbyterian polity. The synod is the highest legislative structure. The church recognizes the traditional Reformed doctrinal statements in the Heidelberg Catechism and the Canons of the Synod of Dort. It is a member of the WORLD ALLIANCE OF REFORMED CHURCHES and the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES, and it supports Murray Theological College.

Address:

Reformed Church in Zimbabwe
P.O. Box 670
62 Hughe St.
Masvingo
Zimbabwe

Source:

Bauswein, Jean-Jacques, and Lukas Vischer, eds. The Reformed Family Worldwide: A Survey of Reformed Churches, Theological Schools, and International Organizations. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans, 1999.

Reformed Church of Alsace and Lorraine

The Reformed Church of Alsace and Lorraine (a section of France bordering Germany) shares much of the history of the REFORMED CHURCH OF FRANCE. As in the rest of France, the Protestant Reformed movement spread through Alsace and Lorraine in the sixteenth century, endured persecution in the decades prior to the Edict of Nantes (1598), and enjoyed toleration until Louis XIV (r. 1643–1715) revoked the edict in 1685. The church was almost destroyed by the migration of its members or their conversion to the ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH during the eighteenth century. After the French Revolution and Napoleon's rise to power, the Reformed Church was again allowed to operate openly, though Napoleonic restrictions limited church life, including the development of a representative national organization.

The Napoleonic structure regulating church life in France stayed in place until separation of church and state was adopted in 1906. However, by that time Alsace and Lorraine had been lost to France as a result of the Franco-Prussian War. They were returned to France at the end of World War II. Once back in relation to the French government, the churches of the region chose to retain the relationship they had had under the Napoleonic regulations. The church also decided to stay out of the merger that created the REFORMED CHURCH OF FRANCE in 1938.

Although it maintains a close working relationship with the French Reformed Church, the Reformed Church in Alsace and Lorraine is administratively separate. It is represented in the National Assembly of the Reformed Church of France and has a close working relationship with the (Lutheran) CHURCH OF THE AUGSBURG CONFESSION OF ALSACE AND LORRAINE, the two churches sharing the same headquarters building in Strasbourg.

The Reformed Church of Alsace and Lorraine has a membership of approximately thirty-three thousand. It is a member of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES and the Protestant Federation of France.

Address:

Reformed Church of Alsace and Lorraine
1 quai St. Thomas
67081 Strassbourg Cédex
France

Sources:

Annuaire de la France Protestante. Paris: Fédération Protestante de France, issued annually.
Bauswein, Jean-Jacques, and Lukas Vischer, eds. The Reformed Family Worldwide: A Survey of Reformed Churches, Theological Schools, and International Organizations. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans, 1999.

Reformed Church of Christ in Nigeria

The Reformed Church of Christ in Nigeria was formed in 1973 as the Church of Christ in Nigeria by former members of the Christian Reformed Church in Nigeria ("Reformed" was added to the name in 1993). The majority of people originally constituting the new church were Kuteb people, but in succeeding years people from several other neighboring groups have affiliated.

There being little of a doctrinal element in the church's split with the Christian Reformed Church, the new church continued the parent body's commitments to the basic Reformed statements of faith, including the Heidelberg Catechism and the Canon of Dort. It also continued a Reformed polity in its organization. Congregations are organized into classes, and the ten classes constitute the synod.

The church has experienced several decades of rapid growth and now reports 277,000 members in its forty-one churches. It is a member of the REFORMED ECUMENICAL COUNCIL, the WORLD ALLIANCE OF REFORMED CHURCHES, and the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES.

Address:

Reformed Church of Christ in Nigeria
P.O. Box 42
Lupwe Road n 2 ussa, Takum
Taraba
Nigeria

Source:

Bauswein, Jean-Jacques, and Lukas Vischer, eds. The Reformed Family Worldwide: A Survey of Reformed Churches, Theological

Schools, and International Organizations. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans, 1999.

Reformed Church of France

The Reformed Church of France traces its origin to the spread of the Calvinist phase of the Protestant Reformation in France in the 1540s. Best estimates set the adherents of reform at approximately 10 percent of the population by the time of the church's first national assembly in 1559. Representatives at that assembly established the Gallican Confession as the doctrinal standard. Through the rest of the century, the Reformers experienced periods of persecution, highlighted by the St. Bartholomew's Day Massacre in 1572. Finally, in 1598, via the Edict of Nantes, the French government granted religious toleration. Then in 1685, Louis XIV (1638–1715) revoked the Edict of Nantes and asserted his right as ruler to name the religion of the people and demand uniformity. As a result, many Protestants (known as Huguenots) fled the country, and many others joined the ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH.

However, Reformation survived in France as an underground movement. In 1789 King Louis XVI (r. 1774–1792) recognized its existence by allowing Protestants to register their births, marriages, and deaths apart from the Roman Catholic Church. The church was finally able to come out of hiding following the French Revolution. Napoléon Bonaparte (1769–1821) established a system that recognized both Lutheran and Reformed Churches and governed their existence in France. Although not fully free, they were able to operate openly. In 1820, the Reformed Church manifested its openness to the growing world missionary movement by sponsoring a new missionary organization, the Paris Mission, which gradually established work in most French colonies (now overseas departments) around the world.

In 1906 the French government adopted a system of separation of church and state. Although churches no longer received government financial support, they were now free to operate as corporate entities and grow. Two new Reformed churches emerged, one more liberal and one more conservative. The more liberal church became intimately involved with the various ecumenical efforts that were leading to the formation of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES. In 1938 these two branches of Reformed life, along with the French Methodists and some Free Churches, merged to create the present-day Reformed Church of France. A new Declaration of Faith was promulgated at this time.

The Reformed Church has congregations across France, though it is weakest in one part of eastern France where Lutheranism has dominated. Also, following World War I, when France recovered Alsace and Lorraine, the REFORMED CHURCH OF ALSACE AND LORRAINE chose to remain corporately separate though in close communion with the Reformed Church of France.

The Reformed Church of France reports approximately 182,000 members in a population of 58 million. It is a member of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES and the Protestant Federation of France.

Address:

Reformed Church of France
47, rue de Clichy
75311 Paris
France

Sources:

Annuaire de la France Protestante. Paris: Fédération Protestante de France, issued annually.

Bauswein, Jean-Jacques, and Lukas Vischer, eds. The Reformed Family Worldwide: A Survey of Reformed Churches, Theological Schools, and International Organizations. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans, 1999.

Leonard, E. G. A History of Protestantism [in France]. Translated by M. H. Joyce. London: Nelson, 1965.

Reformed Church of Hungary

It did not take long for the Reformation to spread from Germany and Switzerland to Hungary in the sixteenth century. The first wave was Lutheran, but a second wave of Reformed teachings also took hold, especially in Transylvania. During the seventeenth century authorities of the ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH throughout the Hapsburg Empire attempted various measures to repress Reformed congregations. These efforts culminated in what became known as the Bloody Tribunal, held at Bratislava in 1673. Pastors who refused to return to the Roman Catholic Church were banished, imprisoned, or in some cases sold as galley slaves. Protestants in the region did not receive toleration until 1791, although the church survived in spite of the persecution. A presbyterian system of church order was developed, and the office of bishop was retained as an administrative position.

Through the nineteenth century, Hungary was much larger than it is today. After World War I and again after World War II, significant segments of Hungary were separated and incorporated into neighboring states. Transylvania, for example, was transferred to Romania. As these lands were separated, Reformed churches in those lands were also separated from the parent body.

Following World War II, Hungary came under a Marxist regime that had an antireligious bias. Although officially proclaiming religious freedom, the government imposed tight controls on religious organizations and confiscated much church property. The church survived until the end of Communist rule in 1989. Since that time, religious freedom has returned. The church has experienced a new burst of growth and has received back some of the property it had lost.

In the midst of its rebuilding, the Reformed Church of Hungary attempted in the 1990s to reestablish contact with Hungarian-speaking Reformed churches in other countries. In 1995 it hosted a consultative synod of Hungarian-speaking churches. Such churches can now be found in the Czech Republic, Slovakia, the Ukraine, Romania, Serbia, and Croatia. There are also Reformed churches of Hungarian heritage in the United States and several South American countries, although for the most part these abandoned the Hungarian language in the twentieth century.

In the late 1990s the church reported 1.6 million members in eleven hundred churches. It is a member of the WORLD ALLIANCE OF REFORMED CHURCHES and the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES. It oversees three theological schools.

Address:

Reformed Church of Hungary
P.O. Box 5
Abonyi-u 21
Budapest 1146
Hungary
<http://www.reformatus.hu/> (in Hungarian)
<http://www.reformatus.hu/english/english.htm> (in English)

Source:

Bauswein, Jean-Jacques, and Lukas Vischer, eds. The Reformed Family Worldwide: A Survey of Reformed Churches, Theological Schools, and International Organizations. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans, 1999.

Reformed Churches in the Netherlands (GKN)

The Reformed Churches in the Netherlands (called the GKN for its Dutch name, De Gereformeerde Kerken in Nederland), not to be confused with the GKN (Liberated), founded in 1892, is the second largest Protestant church in the Netherlands. At the beginning of the twenty-first century, it had approximately 650,000 believers in 840 parishes served by 320 ministers. Though officially founded in 1892, its origins can be traced to the Separation movement in 1832 and the Dutch Nonconformism movement in 1886, both of which were separation movements from the NETHERLANDS REFORMED CHURCH. The primary issue leading to the separations was the growing adherence to liberal theological thinking within the Netherlands Reformed Church, which had assumed an increasingly important role. The father of the unity of the two separations was Abraham Kuyper (1837–1920), also the founder of the Free University (Vrije Universiteit) in Amsterdam (1880) and of the former Anti Revolutionaire Partij, an important Protestant party (now a constituent part of the Christian Party, the CDA). This kind of political activism remains significant in the GKN, and for many years, it has had an influence in the Netherlands beyond its direct religious influence upon its members. Doctrinally, however, the GKN is much like other Reformed church bodies in accepting the Heidelberg Catechism, the Canons of the Synod of Dort, and the Dutch Confession as its standards of faith and practice.

Through the mid-1920s, the GKN developed its organized life, with many active believers founding Reformed schools, newspapers, political parties, clubs, and other groups. At the same time, it experienced a variety of theological disagreements, especially over the role of the government in answering questions of belief. Then an initial rupture came in 1926. Dr. Johannes G. Geelkerken (1879–1960) was condemned for his belief that the Holy Scriptures are not inspired by God. A second very important rupture occurred during the German occupation of World War II, with criticism of the teachings of Kuyper, the church's revered founder. Dr. Klass Schilder (1890–1952), a professor at Kampen, one of the church's ministerial training centers, criticized Kuyper's views on common grace, the nature of the soul, the covenant of grace, and rebirth. Schilder was condemned in 1944, and he left with many followers to found the REFORMED CHURCHES IN THE NETHERLANDS (LIBERATED).

In more recent decades, the GKN has experienced a new set of theological tensions. Important theologians such as Drs. Herman Wiersinga, H. M. Kuitert, and C. J. Den Heijer have offered variant perspectives on the traditional Reformed teachings. Among other ideas, they have directly questioned belief in the divine inspiration of the Bible, the divine character of Jesus, and the nature of human reconciliation. Although the majority of the GKN has aligned itself with these theologians, an important part rejects them. The last named group is united in the Society of Worried (Vereniging van Verontrusten) and in Reformed Churches in the Netherlands (affliction communities).

The GKN has a synodal-presbyterian organization with an emphasis on local parishes. The local churches are grouped in seventy-seven classes, which in turn constitute thirteen provincial synods. These are governed by the general synod, which is assisted by several councils for special problems and tasks. The classes, provincial synods, and the general synod are named “greater councils” to emphasize the independence of the local parish. The ministers (both men and women) are educated in Amsterdam at the Free University and in Kampen at the Theological University, though the decision has been made to abandon theological education in Amsterdam.

The GKN is a member of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES, the Council of Churches in the Netherlands, the WORLD ALLIANCE OF REFORMED CHURCHES, and the Conference of European Churches. The church is also active in Together on the Way (“Samen op Weg”), the process seeking a unity between the NETHERLANDS REFORMED CHURCH, the GKN, and the EVANGELICAL LUTHERAN CHURCH IN THE KINGDOM OF THE NETHERLANDS. This process persists, although it has encountered numerous obstacles.

Address:

Reformed Churches in the Netherlands
Joseph Haydnlaan 2A
3533 AE Utrecht
The Netherlands

E. G. Hoekstra

Sources:

- Crom, A. P., ed. Anderhalve eeuw gereformeerden in stad en land. 12 vols. 1984–1985.
 Endedijk, H. C. De Gereformeerde Kerken in Nederland. 2 vols. 1990–1992.
 Hoekstra, E. G., and M. H. Ipenburg. Wegwijs in religieus en levensbeschouwelijk Nederland. Handboek religies, kerken, stromingen en organisaties. Kampen: Uitgeverij Kok, 2000.
Jaarboek van de Gereformeerde Kerken in Nederland. Issued annually.
 Post, J. E. Gereformeerd zijn en blijven, een wankel evenwicht. 1998.

Reformed Churches in the Netherlands (Liberated)

The Reformed Churches in the Netherlands (Liberated) (Gereformeerde Kerken in Nederland [Vrijgemaakt]) has its origins in the separation of a number of ministers and members from the REFORMED CHURCHES IN THE NETHERLANDS (GKN). Several professors, most notably Drs. Klass Schilder (1890–1952) and S. Greydanus, both of the Theological University of Kampen, expressed misgivings about the views associated with Abraham Kuyper (1837–1920), the founding father of the Reformed Churches in the Netherlands. They rejected his teachings on common grace, the nature of the soul, the covenant of grace, the rebirth, and baptism, among others. The 1944 General Synod condemned Schilder and his associates. Some seventy-seven thousand Reformed believers left the mother church and founded a new one, with the same name, adding the word “liberated” for postal reasons.

The Liberated Churches, as they are also known, consider themselves to be the real continuation of the churches grounded in earlier movements of 1832 (the Separation movement) and 1886 (Dutch Nonconformism). As the twenty-first century begins, the denomination includes some 124,000 believers, with 260 parishes and 290 ministers. It has its own university in Kampen (Broederweg) and is active in foreign missions. It is a member of the INTERNATIONAL CONFERENCE OF REFORMED CHURCHES and also has particular affiliations with the Free Reformed Churches of Australia, the Presbyterian Church of Eastern Australia, the Canadian and American Reformed Churches, the Free Reformed Churches of the Philippines, Eglise Réformée Evangélique, the Evangelical Presbyterian Church of Ireland, Gereja Gereja Reformasi di Indonesia N.T.T., the Korean Presbyterian Church, the Free Church of Scotland, the Reformed Church in the United States, Eglise Reformée Confessante au Zaïre, and Die vrije Gereformeerde Kerk in Suid-Afrika.

In the 1960s, the Liberated Churches experienced a serious problem. Some ministers wanted to establish formal communications with the Reformed Churches in the Netherlands (GKN), for which they were condemned by the synod. Around 20 percent of the members and 30 percent of the ministers subsequently left the church. First they gathered in what were termed Home-Communities, and then in 1979 they became the NETHERLANDS REFORMED CHURCH.

Address:

Reformed Churches in the Netherlands (Liberated)
Broederweg 15
8261 GS Kampen
The Netherlands
<http://www.gkv.nl/> (in Dutch)

E. G. Hoekstra

Sources:

- de Roon, L. H., ed. Waar zijn wij en waar gaan wij heen? Kroniek van een verandering in de Gereformeerde Kerken (vrijgemaakt). 1993.
- Deddens, D., and M. te Velde. Vrijmaking-wederkeer. Vijftig jaar vrijmaking in beeld gebracht 1944–1994. 1994.
- Hoekstra, E. G., and M. H. Ipenburg. Wegwijs in religieus en levensbeschouwelijk Nederland. Handboek religies, kerken, stromingen en organisaties. Kampen: Uitgeverij Kok, 2000.

Reformed Denomination

The Reformed Denomination is a collective of small networks of congregations and many individual local congregations that make up the most conservative wing of Reformed Protestantism in the Netherlands. They are found in the so-called Bible Belt of the Netherlands—Zeeland, the isles of South Holland, along the great Dutch rivers and the Veluwe hills—and as the twenty-first century begins they count some 250,000 believers. The approximately fifty local congregations are the result of various schisms due to differences in belief, problems with ministers, and other organizational concerns.

The perspective of the Reformed Denomination is also found in the right wing of the NETHERLANDS REFORMED CHURCH (the Reformed Unity/de Gereformeerde Bond), in the Reformed Congregations (Gereformeerde Gemeenten), the Reformed Congregations in the Netherlands (Gereformeerde Gemeenten in Nederland), the Old Reformed Churches (Oud Gereformeerde Gemeenten), the Old Reformed Churches in the Netherlands (Oud Gereformeerde Gemeenten in Nederland), and a small part of the CHRISTIAN REFORMED CHURCHES IN THE NETHERLANDS (de Christelijk Gereformeerde Kerken in Nederland). The local churches, most originating in the late nineteenth century, have different names. Believers support their own political party, the Political Reformed Party (Staatkundig Gereformeerde Partij, SGP), which has three of the 150 seats in the Dutch Parliament.

The beliefs of the Reformed Denomination include (1) the doctrine of election, which states that before one's birth, God destined one's eternal salvation or damnation, (2) an emphasis on the need for personal conversion as a token of God's election, (3) a distinction between persons who are converted and those who are not, (4) a pietistic experience of God, with a strictly personal experience being the result of the personal conversion, (5) the popularity of the theologians of the seventeenth and eighteenth century, who emphasized the analysis of the soul and the essentials of truth belief, (6) the recognition that humans are unable to do anything to be saved, (7) resignation to the power of God's providence in the life of the believer, (8) the assertion that the Holy Scriptures are inspired by God, (9) the singing of the Psalms in the rhymed version of Datheen and those of 1773, and (10) confidence that the Holy Ghost uses the Word of God in one's heart. Generally, the Bible is read in the Dutch translation of 1637.

The Reformed Denomination is served by several periodicals, including Reformatorsch Dagblad (newspaper), Standvastig, and Terdege.

E. G. Hoekstra

Sources:

- Brienen, T., et al. De Nadere Reformatie. Beschrijving van haar voornaamste vertegenwoordigers. 1986.
- Hoekstra, E. G., and M. H. Ipenburg. Wegwijs in religieus en levensbeschouwelijk Nederland. Handboek religies, kerken, stromingen en organisaties. Kampen: Uitgeverij, 2000.
- Jonkers, J. B. G. De gereformeerden. 1997.
- Meiden, A. van der. De zwarte kousen kerken. Bevindelijk herooverwogen portret. 1993.
- Zwemer, J. P. De bevindelijk gereformeerden. 2001.

Reformed Ecumenical Council

The Reformed Ecumenical Council (REC) was founded in 1946 as the Reformed Ecumenical Synod. It adopted its present name in 1988. It includes in its membership a number of more conservative Reformed bodies, the most prominent being the CHRISTIAN REFORMED CHURCH IN NORTH AMERICA. Many of the member churches were formed as missions of the Christian Reformed Church or in relation to the REFORMED CHURCHES IN THE NETHERLANDS, the Dutch counterpart of the Christian Reformed Church.

Membership in the REC is based on doctrinal agreement, a shared confession of faith being a basis of the union. The member churches seek to present a unified witness to the world of the historic Christian faith. Member churches may adopt any one of the several historical statements of the Reformed faith as a basis of their doctrinal confession.

The churches of the REC meet in an assembly quadrennially. A permanent secretariat and an interim committee carry on the affairs of the REC between assemblies. The program is focused in theology, mission services, and youth activities.

The REC has twenty-nine member churches from twenty-one countries. It provides a conservative alternative to the WORLD ALLIANCE OF REFORMED CHURCHES. Only one of its member churches, the GREEK EVANGELICAL CHURCH, is also a member of the World Alliance and the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES.

Address:

Reformed Ecumenical Council
2050 Breton Rd., SE, Ste. 102
Grand Rapids, MI 49546–5547
<http://www.recweb.org>

Sources:

Bauswein, Jean-Jacques, and Lukas Vischer, eds. The Reformed Family Worldwide: A Survey of Reformed Churches, Theological Schools, and International Organizations. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans, 1999.
Handbook. Grand Rapids, MI: Reformed Ecumenical Synod, 1997.

Reformed Presbyterian Church of Equatorial Guinea

The Reformed Presbyterian Church of Equatorial Guinea (Iglesia Reformada de Guinea Equatorial) can be traced to the work initiated by American Presbyterian missionaries on Corisco, an island off the coast of Guinea, in 1840. In 1865 the work moved to the mainland, which was then under the control of the French. It moved quickly to develop indigenous leadership, ordaining the first native minister in 1870. In 1901 Spain took control of the mainland territory and periodically generally acted so as to suppress Protestant work.

In the period immediately after the founding of the Spanish Republic (1932–1936), the government's activity became less suppressive. In 1933 the World Evangelical Crusade (WEC), an independent Evangelical missionary agency, opened work among the Okak people. In 1952 all Protestant churches in the region were closed and pastors were stopped from any religious activity. In spite of the suppression, both the WEC and the Presbyterian work continued to grow. In 1969, the year after the country became an independent nation, the two churches merged to become the Evangelical Church.

Independence did little to relieve the Protestants' situation. Spanish rule was followed by dictatorial regimes, first under the leadership of Macias Nguema (r. 1968–1979) and then his nephew Obiang Nguema (r. 1979–present). Meanwhile, beginning in 1970, the Primitive Methodist CHURCH IN GREAT BRITAIN (now a constituent part of the METHODIST CHURCH of Great Britain) had built the largest Protestant following of the several churches active in Equatorial Guinea. Much of its strength was on the island of Fernando Póo (now called Bioko). In 1973 the Evangelical Church and the Methodist Church united to form the Reformed Church of Equatorial Guinea.

The merger turned out to be an ill-advised enterprise, as there was no clear understanding as to how the new church would function and what authority it would have over its respective member bodies. Through the 1990s, it came to be seen as a federation of churches that functioned loosely while the two churches worked on the issues that blocked their merger. In the meantime, the former Evangelical Church has assumed a new existence as the Reformed Presbyterian Church of Equatorial Guinea.

In the 1990s the Reformed Presbyterian Church of Equatorial Guinea reported eight thousand members in a country that is predominantly Roman Catholic. Its membership is drawn primarily from the Fang, Ntumu, and Okak peoples. The church is a member of the WORLD ALLIANCE OF REFORMED CHURCHES and the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES.

Address:

Reformed Presbyterian Church of Equatorial Guinea
Apdo Postal 22y
Bata
Equatorial Guinea

Source:

Bauswein, Jean-Jacques, and Lukas Vischer, eds. The Reformed Family Worldwide: A Survey of Reformed Churches, Theological Schools, and International Organizations. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans, 1999.

Reformed/Presbyterian Tradition

The Reformed and Presbyterian churches trace their common history to the thought and ministry of John Calvin (1509–1564) and the Protestant Reformation of the sixteenth century. Calvin assumed a leadership position among French-speaking Protestants following the publication of his systematic theology, Institutes of the Christian Religion (1536), and then took control of the Protestant cause in the Canton of Geneva in Switzerland, first for two years (1536–1538) and then more permanently in 1541.

In the Institutes, Calvin proposed the Reformed theology and a presbyterian organization. Theologically, Calvin was close to Martin Luther (1483–1546), their primary disagreement being about the nature of Christ's presence in the eucharistic sacrament. Luther's view, termed consubstantiation, held that Christ is truly present in the substance of the elements. Calvin's view was that Christ is present in the sacrament both symbolically and by the spiritual power that is imparted to the faithful by their faith. This basic theological difference also gave the Reformed church a distinctive stance toward reform. Lutherans tended to discard only those parts of the traditional Western Christian practice that were found to be in opposition to the Bible. The Reformed churches tended to discard anything that was not actually biblical. This more radical approach had concrete implications, making most Reformed church buildings more austere than their Lutheran counterparts, for example.

As the Reformed movement spread to the British Isles, first to Scotland and then to England, the issue of church organization came to the fore. Those who followed Calvin's lead tended to emphasize the presbyterian polity, which called for leadership by elders (presbyters) rather than bishops. Thus they became designated as Presbyterian churches rather than as Reformed churches, as those in continental Europe were generally called. In the British (and American) context, arguments over questions of polity in the seventeenth century tended to split the churches of the Reformed theological tradition, and both the Congregationalists and Baptists, who accepted a congregational form of church governance, dissented from the Presbyterian consensus.

In the nineteenth century, Congregationalists and Presbyterians cooperated to a significant extent in their world mission enterprise, especially through the work of the AMERICAN BOARD OF COMMISSIONERS FOR FOREIGN MISSIONS and the LONDON MISSIONARY SOCIETY, though in each case the Congregationalists emerged as the dominant force. In the twentieth century, the Presbyterians and Congregationalists have formed several international cooperative agencies, especially the WORLD ALLIANCE OF REFORMED CHURCHES, which includes Reformed, Presbyterian, and Congregational church bodies and has its headquarters in the same building that houses the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES.

The Reformed/Presbyterian tradition found definitional expression in a set of confessions issued through the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, most importantly the Gallican (1559), Belgic (1561), Second Helvetic (1566), and Westminster (1647–1648) Confessions and the Heidelberg (1563) and Westminster (1647–1648) Catechisms. These documents affirmed the Reformed emphasis on God's sovereignty, an important element of which is his work of electing his people to salvation. Implicit in this emphasis is a belief in predestination. This element of Reformed theology was challenged by Dutch theologian Jacobus Arminius (1560–1609), whose critique led to the writing of the other widely accepted Reformed doctrinal text, the Canon of the Synod of Dort (1619), which affirmed the traditional doctrines related to predestination.

In the twentieth century, the Reformed tradition was challenged by the new historical critical approach to the Bible and the scientific critique of biblical literalism. The Presbyterians were among the major bodies split by the fundamentalist-modernist debates in the 1920s and 1930s, with the modernists taking control of the larger Presbyterian churches, especially what is now known as the PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH (U.S.A.). That church accepts the Confession of 1967, promulgated by one of its constituent bodies, and has tended to see the other confessions as relativized by their historical context. More conservative Reformed and Presbyterian churches accept the authority of the older creeds as a valid contemporary interpretation of biblical teachings.

Sources:

- Bauswein, Jean-Jacques, and Lukas Vischer, eds. The Reformed Family Worldwide: A Survey of Reformed Churches, Theological Schools, and International Organizations. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans, 1999.
- Calvin, John. Institutes of the Christian Religion. 2 vols. Philadelphia: Westminster Press, 1960.
- Cochrane, Arthur C., ed. The Reformed Confessions of the Sixteenth Century. Philadelphia: Westminster Press, 1966.
- Leith, John H. An Introduction to the Reformed Tradition. Atlanta, GA: John Knox Press, 1977.
- Nichols, James Hastings. Corporate Worship in the Reformed Tradition. Philadelphia: Westminster Press, 1968.

Reiha-no-Hikari

Reiha-no-Hikari, a Japanese new religion, was founded by Hase Yoshio (1914–1984) in 1954 under the name Reiha-no-Hikari Sangyō Kai. Suffering from illness, Hase undertook a religious pilgrimage at the age of twenty-four. At Mount Goken in Kagawa Prefecture he heard the voice of Kami (the divine) and miraculously recovered. He continued the religious pilgrimage. In 1954 he received a revelation from Kami, telling him to become the messenger of Kami at the top of Mount Goken. It is believed that Hase is a messiah, born to save human beings through the divine power of reiha (spirit waves) sent from Kami through Hase's body.

Over the next few years Hase surrounded himself with a small group, some forty people, who had been saved by his spirit waves. He founded the Hase Sensei Sankōkai (Master Hase Adoration Association). Three years later the group was incorporated, and in 1969 the headquarters was moved to its present location in Noda. March 7, the day the founder realized his relationship as a child of the great cosmic god, is commemorated annually with a festival. After his death in 1984, its members came to believe that Hase became an eternal wave of spiritual energy.

In response to their beliefs about their founder, Reiha-no-Hikari's members recite the prayer "Goshugojin-sam [Guardian God of Humanity: the founder], Nidai-sama [the second and current leader], please help us follow the path to the salvation of humankind" to receive reiha. That text is printed on the Gosintai Ofuda (Divine Emblem Plaque) that is installed in the altar in each member's home. Reiha-no-Hikari's main scriptures are the Goshō (Writings) and the Seikun (Oath Instructions), written by the founder.

The current leader of Reiha-no-Hikari is Hase Keiji, the founder's son. As the twenty-first century began, the group claimed approximately 825,636 members.

Address:

Reiha-no-Hikari
2683-1, Yamasaki
Noda-shi, Chiba Prefecture 278-0022
Japan
<http://www.rhk.or.jp/> (in Japanese)

Keishin Inaba

Sources:

- Inoue, Nobutaka, et al., eds. Shinshūkyō Kyōdan Jinbutsu Jiten. Tokyo: Kobundo, 1996.
- Watanabe, Masako, and Midori Igeta. "Healing in the New Religions: Charisma and 'Holy Water.'" Contemporary Papers on Japanese Religion, 2: New Religions, 1991. Posted at <http://www.kokugakuin.ac.jp/ijcc/wp/cpjr/newreligions/igeta.html>. Accessed on January 10, 2002.

Reiyūkai

Reiyūkai (Society of the Friends of the Spirit), a Japanese lay organization, derived from the tradition of Nichiren Buddhism and was founded between 1919 and 1925 in Tokyo by Kakutaro Kubo (1890-1944) and his sister-in-law Kimi Kotani (1901-1971). It arose out of Kubo's sense of apocalypse, which originated from the social and intellectual transformation of Japan during the Taisho period (1912-1926), combined with his understanding of Nichiren Buddhism and finally accentuated by the Great Tokyo Earthquake of 1923.

Kubo had received instruction in the nationalistic ideas of Nichiren Buddhism, but he was more interested in formulating a religious way for the laity to respond to the crisis of modern society. Kubo saw the sociopolitical upheavals of his time as evidence of ancestral distress caused by the neglect of ancestor worship by the laity, who had entrusted it to the Buddhist clergy. Therefore, he formulated lay rites of ancestral worship. In Reiyūkai, the rite for ancestral worship is the twice daily recital of Aokyokan, or the Blue Sutra, which is an abridged version of the Lotus Sutra, the doctrine of Nichiren Buddhism. The rite also involves the practice of venerating the sokaimyo, a tablet in which the posthumous name of all the ancestors of the husband and the wife are inscribed and enshrined in the domestic altar.

Although Kubo provided the doctrinal foundation for this lay movement, it was the organizational skill and charismatic healing powers of Kimi Kotani that drew the initial followers into Reiyūkai. She proselytized by combining faith healing with teachings that claimed to improve living conditions as well as instill self-esteem in her converts, who were initially the urban proletariat but later small business owners and the self-employed.

The proselytization activity in Reiyūkai is called michibiki. The proselytizer is called the "guide parent" (michibiki no oya) and the convert is the "guide child" (michibiki no ko). This "parent-child" link of proselytization is the organizational principle of Reiyūkai. Another notable feature of Reiyūkai is the hoza, a kind of group counseling circle, which is also the smallest unit of organization, formed by these links of proselytization.

In 1945 Reiyūkai was one of the fastest growing new religions in Japan, but it suffered several setbacks, including financial scandals involving Kimi Kotani and the secessions of several groups, such as RISSHO KOSEI-KAI, now the second largest new religion in Japan, Myochikai, and others. These problems have led to a decline in its membership. In 1999, Reiyūkai had a membership of about 2 million in Japan and centers in seventeen foreign countries. Since Kotani's death in 1971, faith-healing related practices have declined considerably. The emphasis has shifted to social welfare programs, youth activities, and overseas missions in North and South America and Asia.

Reiyūkai has three major religious centers: Shakaden, the Tokyo headquarters of Reiyūkai, enshrining the statue of Shakyamuni Buddha; Mirokusan, the youth training center dedicated to the Future Buddha Maitreya; and Shichimenzan, where pilgrimages are undertaken during equinox days. Reiyūkai advocates traditional ethics in familial relationships and in politics, and it supports conservative political parties and causes.

Address:

Reiyūkai
1-7-8 Azabudai, Minato-ku
Tokyo 106-8644
Japan
<http://www.reiyukai.org>

Ranjana Mukhopadhyaya

Sources:

Hardacre, Helen. Lay Buddhism in Contemporary Japan: Reiyukai Kyodan. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1984.

Kotani, Kimi. A Guide to Reiyukai. Tokyo: Reiyukai, 1958. Reprint, 1972.

Reiyukai: Awareness, Action and Development. Tokyo: Reiyukai, 1997.

Religious Science

Religious Science is the youngest major tradition in the New Thought movement. It is also the second largest, with its two major groups, the United Church of Religious Science (UCRS) and Religious Science International (RSI), ranking second and third in size, respectively, behind the UNITY SCHOOL OF CHRISTIANITY/ASSOCIATION OF UNITY CHURCHES. Both groups trace their origin to Ernest Shurtleff Holmes (1887–1960), one of the last students to study with the founder of New Thought, Emma Curtis Hopkins (1849–1925). Holmes's classic New Thought text, The Science of Mind (1926), supplies the basis for the tradition's primary beliefs and healing practices. It is also widely studied in other New Thought communities and serves as the primary religious text for many independent groups, most notably the non-affiliated Science of Mind churches. Holmes began his work in Los Angeles, California, and although Religious Science is an international movement today, the largest concentration of its churches is still in that state.

Holmes, together with his brother Fenwicke, was active in the mental healing movement even before his studies with Hopkins. His early influences were diverse, including Ralph Waldo Emerson (1803–1882), Mary Baker Eddy (1821–1910), Henry Drummond (1851–1897), and especially Thomas Troward (1847–1916). The system he eventually developed is a synthesis of Christian Science and Troward's theories. He was ordained in Divine Science by Agnes J. Galer in 1917, when he was already attracting large crowds to his lectures on mental healing and a growing number of clients for his services as a practitioner. In 1925, the year after Ernest's studies with Hopkins, he parted from Fenwicke on friendly terms; Fenwicke went east, where he enjoyed considerable success as a New Thought author and lecturer, and Ernest settled in Los Angeles, where he began the work that grew into Religious Science.

The relationship of Hopkins to the formation of Religious Science is significant. It is notable that The Science of Mind was published two years after Holmes had studied with her. The following year (1927) he established the Institute of Religious Science and Philosophy, Inc., and began publishing Religious Science Monthly (by 1929 retitled Science of Mind). Holmes had previously written a book, established a religious institute, and published a magazine, none of which had been particularly successful. After his studies with Hopkins, however, the same component elements came together to form the foundation of a religious movement. Holmes credited Hopkins with supplying what had been missing from his earlier endeavors—mysticism. Although Hopkins's mysticism is certainly a celebrated part of New Thought lore, her capacity to inspire persons to develop fully functional religious movements is probably more significant. She seems to have had provided a sort of inspiration to Holmes.

The emergence of Religious Science from Holmes's work in the late 1920s was gradual and can be measured in terms of several decisive turning points. In 1932 Robert H. Bitzer (1896–1994), who would later have a long tenure as president of INTERNATIONAL NEW THOUGHT ALLIANCE, started the institute's second congregation. Others followed. In 1939 the institute began to ordain ministers, and in the mid-1940s one of them, Carmelita Trowbridge, formed the first Religious Science church in Alhambra, California. She successfully resisted the institute's efforts to prevent her from referring to her group as a "church." The church movement in Religious Science quickly gained momentum, and by 1949 the International Association of Religious Science Churches was formed.

Tensions between the institute and the association led the institute to establish an ecclesiastical organization in 1953—the Church of Religious Science. In 1954 Holmes proposed eliminating the association and replacing it with the newly formed Church of Religious Science. Forty-six churches joined the church, but nineteen refused. Churches that affiliated with the church went on to become the United Church of Religious Science (UCRS), adopting that name in 1967; those staying with the association became Religious Science International (RSI), adopting that name in 1972.

Both groups accept Holmes's teachings as normative, follow Science of Mind as their primary religious text, and recognize two classes of religious professionals: ministers and practitioners. Practitioners in Religious Science have a similar function to Christian Science practitioners; they facilitate mental healing and administer "spiritual mind treatment" to individuals on a one-to-one basis. Of all New Thought groups, Religious Science has most faithfully maintained the tradition of mental healing and the role of professional mental healer. This is further revealed in the recognition of practitioner status as a prerequisite for ministerial training in UCRS and RSI.

The chief differences between the groups lie in their organizational structures and in their educational systems. Organizationally, both groups are governed by elected boards and presided over by presidents, who are elected by the boards. UCRS is more centralized and hierarchical, but both groups allow churches significant autonomy, and members of the governing boards are elected by representatives selected by the churches. Educational curricula is largely the same in both groups, although UCRS requires education of its ministers at regional schools, of which there are four, and RSI allows for training at local churches.

Each group publishes a representative periodical. Science of Mind (UCRS) has forty-four thousand subscribers and Creative Thought (RSI) has eleven thousand. In recent years the groups have had a good relationship, establishing policies for accepting each other's ministers and practitioners and working to develop stronger ties through a Committee of Cooperation, established in the late 1980s. As of 2001, UCRS had 160 churches and 56 study groups, and RSI had 107 churches and 27 societies. The vast majority of centers for both groups are in the United States, with highest concentrations in California. UCRS has representative groups in twenty-four countries, and RSI in five. UCRS reports 272 active ministers and 2,332 practitioners; RSI reports 246 ministers and 424 practitioners. UCRS operates a Ministry of Prayer that averages about one hundred thousand contacts annually. Total membership in both groups is fifty-five thousand (UCRS forty thousand and RSI fifteen thousand). In the early 1990s a small number of RSI ministers left the organization and formed Global Religious Science Ministries (incorporated in 1993). The Global group has twenty member churches and is headquartered in Virginia Beach, Virginia.

As a branch of New Thought, Religious Science is an expression of popular religious idealism; as such it affirms that the basis of reality is mental, not material, and that mental states determine material conditions. As is characteristic of New Thought as a whole, Religious Science recognizes Mind as the Ultimate Reality, but unlike other New Thought groups its concept of God is far less anthropomorphic, with terms like Principle, Law, and Mind being more commonly used. It is also the least Christian of the groups, neither identifying itself with Christianity nor making any particular effort to retain elements of Christian doctrine. It accepts the perfection and omnipresence of the one Divine Mind and recognizes humanity's link with Mind through the "subjective" minds of individuals. "Spiritual mind treatment" consists of realizing the reality of the perfection of Divine Mind rather than an undesired condition. A typical treatment would include an affirmation, such as: "There is One Life, that Life is God, that Life is Perfect, that Life is my Life now."

Addresses:

United Church of Religious Science
3251 West 6th St.
Los Angeles, CA 90020
<http://www.religiousscience.org>

Religious Science International
P.O. Box 2152
Spokane, WA 99210
<http://www.rsintl.org/>

Sources:

- Braden, Charles S. Spirits in Rebellion. Dallas: Southern Methodist University Press, 1963.
Holmes, Ernest. The Science of Mind. New York: Dodd, Mead and Company, 1944.
Holmes, Fenwicke L. Ernest Holmes: His Life and Times. New York: Dodd, Mead and Company, 1970.

Remonstrant Brotherhood

The Remonstrant Brotherhood (Remonstrantse Broederschap), a liberal Protestant denomination, has its origins in the condemnation of the Remonstrants at the Synod of Dordrecht (1618–1619). This turn of events had been brought on by a theological struggle about the doctrine of predestination between Jacobus Arminius (1560–1609) and Franciscus Gomarus (1563–1641), both professors in the University of Leiden. About two hundred ministers supportive of Arminius were dismissed and removed from the NETHERLANDS REFORMED CHURCH (Nederlandse Gereformeerde Kerk), at that time the privileged church. The Synod of Dordrecht issued the so-called Vijf Artikelen tegen de Remonstranten (the Five Articles against the Remonstrants, also known as the Confession of Dort), which today is still an element in Drie Formulieren van Enigheid (the Three Orders of Unity), the confession of faith in most of the orthodox Protestant REFORMED CHURCHES IN THE NETHERLANDS.

The dismissed ministers fled to Antwerp and hoped that their condemnation would be repealed. The Remonstrant Brotherhood was founded in 1619, when their hope proved vain. A short time later, they returned to the Dutch Republic and created their first conventicle in 1631 in Amsterdam. Three years later, they founded a ministerial training college in Leiden, known since 1873 as the Remonstrant Seminary.

In the second part of the nineteenth century, the Remonstrant Brotherhood had its Golden Age. Its membership tripled because of the rise of modernism and the movement of more liberal church members into its ranks. In more recent decades, however, the Brotherhood has experienced a period of decline. Between 1966 and 1988, the number of believers sunk by approximately 50 percent. As the twenty-first century begins, the number of believers is about seven thousand, in forty-six communities served by forty ministers. An additional community of about three thousand is also served by the church. Individuals join the church on the basis of a personal confession. Local congregations identify themselves as Remonstrant Church or as Remonstrant-Reformed.

The Remonstrants' first confession was formulated by Arminius's student Simon Episcopius (1583–1643), and a more contemporary statement appeared in 1940. The Brotherhood believes that the phrasing of confessions is not perpetually valid, and their authority is not to be compared with that of the Bible and the Gospels. The confession is only “a token of time” and can be changed if the modern time makes it necessary; every time has its own needs and therefore its own answers.

The Brotherhood intends to be a community of faith, “rooted in the gospel of Christ and faithful to her principle of freedom and forbearance, and willing to adore God and to serve Him.” It is not a confessional church, but an affirming church. The Brotherhood rejects the idea that its members are a “chosen” group, as is believed in most Reformed churches. Hence, everyone can take the Holy Communion as long as they live in community with Christ.

Since 1989, every congregation in the Brotherhood has been independent, free to arrange its own spiritual and material affairs. Each congregation calls its own minister and has the right to represent itself at the Algemene Vergadering van de Remonstrantse Broederschap, the coordinating organization. Ongoing executive decisions are left to the Commissie tot de Zaken der Remonstrantse Broederschap (the Committee on the Affairs of the Remonstrant Brotherhood).

Laypeople play an important role in the direction of the Brotherhood. All offices are open to men as well as women. The Remonstrant Brotherhood was also the first church (1989) in the Netherlands to allow the blessing of nonmarital communities and also homosexual and lesbian relationships.

The Remonstrant Brotherhood is active ecumenically and a member of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES, although it is critical of the council’s basic statement: “The World Council of Churches is a fellowship of churches that accept our Lord Jesus Christ as God and Saviour.” It is also a member of the Council of Churches (in the Netherlands); the Conference of European Churches (since 1959); the International Congregational Council (beginning in 1949); and since 1970, the WORLD ALLIANCE OF REFORMED CHURCHES, because of its acceptance of the same spirit of freedom and tolerance, and the same aversion to church discipline in matters of faith. In 1973 the Brotherhood signed the Declaration of Leuenberg, an agreement between Reformed and Lutheran churches. The Brotherhood is also active in several international liberal councils.

The Brotherhood welcomes ministers from the NETHERLANDS REFORMED CHURCH (Nederlandse Hervormde Kerk), the Fellowship of Liberal Reformed Protestants (Verenging van Vrijzinnig Hervormden), the Liberal Communion of Faith NPB (Vrijzinnige Geloofsgemeenschap NPB), and the MENNONITE CHURCH IN THE NETHERLANDS (Algemene Doopsgezinde Sociëteit) to lead worship in Brotherhood congregations.

Address:

Remonstrant Brotherhood
Nieuwegracht 27a

3512 LC Utrecht
The Netherlands
<http://www.remonstranten.org/> (in Dutch)

E. G. Hoekstra

Sources:

- Cossee, E. H., Th. M. van Leeuwen, and M.A. Bosman-Huizinga. De remonstranten. 2d ed. Published in the series Wegwijs. Kerken en groeperingen. Kampen, the Netherlands: Kok, 2001.
- Drees, W. B., ed. Een beetje geloven: Actualiteit en achtergronden van het vrijzinnig protestantisme. Amsterdam: Balans, 1999.
- Hoenderdaal, G. J., and P. M. Luca, eds. Staat in de vrijheid: De geschiedenis van de remonstranten. Zutphen, the Netherlands: De Walburg Pers, 1982.
- Kuiper, J., and Th. M. van Leeuwen, eds. Als een vuurbaken: Teksten over de functie van belijdenissen naar remonstranten inzicht. Zoetermeer, the Netherlands: Meinema, 1994.
- van Leeuwen, Th. M. Van horen zeggen: Geschiedenis en uitleg van de bijbel. 2d ed. Amsterdam: Balans, 1999.

Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints

The Community of Christ, formerly the Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, shares its origins with the CHURCH OF JESUS CHRIST OF LATTER-DAY SAINTS. The foundational church was founded on April 6, 1830, by Joseph Smith Jr. (1805–1844). Smith and a handful of followers united with a Baptist preacher by the name of Sidney Rigdon (1793–1876) early in 1831, and together they relocated to Rigdon’s settlement in Kirtland, Ohio, where the church began to grow rapidly. Smith promoted a new book of scripture, called the Book of Mormon, which he said he had translated from ancient metal plates inscribed in an unknown language. The Book of Mormon addressed numerous religious issues of the time in the United States, and it attracted considerable attention, both positive and negative. After the destruction of the church settlements at Independence, Missouri, and at Kirtland, Ohio, members and leaders ultimately settled in Illinois, where they established a thriving community at Nauvoo in 1839. Mounting distrust from long-time settlers, coupled with the church’s growing political and economic influence, led to the death of Smith at the hands of an angry mob in 1844.

After Smith’s death, numerous leaders lay claim to the prophetic mantle, which caused the church to split into numerous factions. The best known of these factions, the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, emerged under the leadership of Brigham Young (1801–1877), who had been an influential church leader under Smith during the Nauvoo period. Claiming Smith’s authority, Young introduced the public practice of polygamy and formalized several esoteric doctrines regarding the nature of God and the means of salvation. Young led his followers to Utah.

Most of Smith's other followers remained in the midwestern United States, where they began coalescing into several organized groups. Joseph Smith's son, Joseph Smith III (1832–1914), and many of his family members united with a group of these followers, where Smith was acknowledged as the legitimate successor to his father on April 6, 1860. The church has remained based in the Midwest since that time, finally reestablishing international headquarters at Independence, Missouri (from whence it had been driven in 1833), in 1920.

The theology of the Community of Christ can be typified as mainstream Protestant Christian, leaning toward the liberal side of biblical interpretation. Although the church has no formal creed, its understanding of God, humanity, and salvation are Protestant in nature and practice. The Book of Mormon is used in addition to the Bible, but the Bible is seen as foundational. There are within the church a variety of opinions about the historicity of the Book of Mormon, and the church requires no formal confession regarding that book.

An additional book of scripture, called the Doctrine and Covenants, contains what the church considers to be inspired guidance from the presidents of the church since the time of Joseph Smith Jr. These writings consist mostly of counsel to the church on how its members should interact with the larger community, as well as major policy statements regarding the practice of the denomination. For example, in 1984 then president Wallace B. Smith, great-grandson of the founder, introduced what is now known as Section 156 of the Doctrine and Covenants. This document called the church to build a temple at the headquarters complex for the purpose of housing offices of the church and providing for the education of the membership, along with providing space for various worship functions. This document also called for a reformation of the church's priesthood, which for the first time included the ordination of women. This issue erupted into a major controversy, which split the denomination and witnessed the emergence of a small, but vocal fundamentalist movement, some of whom have selected new leaders, and others who are simply functioning independently of the denomination as local, congregationally governed churches.

The denomination is operated mostly by lay leaders, many of whom are ordained as ministers but receive no financial support from the church. Less than 1 percent of the total membership are supported full-time by the church, and these are mostly headquarters staff and administrative ministerial leaders who function at international or regional levels. The denomination is headed by a president, who with two counselors are known as the First Presidency. There is a Council of Twelve Apostles, which functions as the chief missionary and administrative body of the denomination, and whose members serve as the administrative officers of regional areas of the world. The Presiding Bishopric, composed of the presiding bishop and two counselors, supervises the denominational finances and assets. Seven Quorums of Seventy, almost all of whom are bivocational ministers, serve in local areas as leaders of missionary and evangelistic activities.

The largest membership base of the denomination is in the United States and Canada, where more than 50 percent of total members are located, but the church has made significant overseas missionary efforts in English-speaking countries (Britain and Australia), as well as Africa, the Caribbean, and Asia. The church has large memberships in Tahiti and Haiti, for example. As of December 1999, formal congregations were organized in approximately forty countries, with a total membership of 251,499 persons.

The international headquarters at Independence, Missouri (near Kansas City), is the focus of church administration, leadership education, and publishing. The church operates Herald Publishing House, which produces monthly magazines, church literature, and curriculum. The headquarters complex consists of the Auditorium, where regular legislative assemblies are held, and the Temple, which was dedicated in 1994. Both buildings house church offices and contain libraries, museums, theaters, sanctuaries for worship and meditation, and classrooms.

Address:

Community of Christ
1001 W. Walnut
Independence, MO 64050–3562
<http://www.cofchrist.org/seek/>

Steven L. Shields

Sources:

Edwards, Paul M. History: Our Legacy of Faith. Independence, MO: Herald Publishing House, 1991.
Judd, Peter A., and A. Bruce Lindgren. Introduction to the Saints Church. Independence, MO: Herald Publishing House, 1976.
Shields, Steven L. A Comparison between the RLDS Church and the LDS Church. Independence, MO: Herald Publishing House, 1986.

Reunion

Reunion, an island and a French overseas department in the Indian Ocean west of Madagascar, remained uninhabited until Arab merchants found it in the seventeenth century. The Portuguese visited the island at a later date, and finally, in the eighteenth century, the French established a settlement there and were able to assert their hegemony in the face of other European claims upon it. The French imported slaves to work the sugarcane and coffee plantations that the settlers created, and their descendants now form some 80 percent of the current population of approximately six hundred thousand. The descendants of Chinese, Malaysian, and Indian laborers also reside on the island. Reunion's colonial status was altered into that of a department in 1946. There has been continual unrest since 1978, when the United Nations pronounced its favor of the island's independence.

The great majority of Reunion's residents are members of the ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH, which arrived with settlers in 1653. The first resident priest arrived in 1712. A new era began in 1817 with the arrival of the sisters of the congregation of St. Joseph of Cluny, who used Reunion as the headquarters for efforts to evangelize East Africa. The HOLY GHOST FATHERS assumed control of the island in 1917. The Diocese of Saint Denis was established in 1966. It includes a Chinese mission that had been founded in 1951.

The Roman Catholic Church enjoyed a religious monopoly on Reunion until 1936, when the SEVENTH-DAY ADVENTIST CHURCH established work. The church's Reunion Conference, formally organized in 1947, is part of the Indian Ocean Union Mission. There is also some work by the ASSEMBLIES OF GOD, the JEHOVAH'S WITNESSES, and the Evangelical Church of Reunion, which grew out of the missionary efforts of the African Evangelical Fellowship.

Of religions other than Christianity, the Muslim community is the largest, though it is divided ethnically among Pakistani and Indian Muslims (mostly Shi'as) and East Africans (mostly Sunnis). There is a growing community of the BAHÁ'Í FAITH, and a small Rosicrucian presence is supplied by the ANCIENT AND MYSTICAL ORDER ROSAE CRUCIS. Officially, Reunion guarantees freedom of religion.

Sources:

Eve, P. La religion populaire à la Réunion. 2 vols. Sainte-Clotilde, Réunion: Université de la Réunion, Institut de linguistique et d'anthropologie, 1985.
 Foulon, A. Les religions à la Réunion. Livry-Gargan, France: Editions Orphie, 1989.

Status of religions in Reunion, 2000-2050

Followers	2000			2025	2050
	total	%	rate
Christians	614,000	87.8	1.38	752,000	796,000
Roman Catholics	611,000	87.4	1.39	750,000	800,000
Protestants	31,500	4.5	1.94	49,000	60,000
Marginal Christians	6,000	0.9	2.58	12,300	18,000
Hindus	31,500	4.5	1.95	50,000	60,000
Muslims	29,100	4.2	1.38	41,000	50,000
Nonreligious	12,100	1.7	5.65	15,000	24,000
Baha'is	5,900	0.9	1.72	10,000	14,000
Ethnoreligionists	2,900	0.4	2.04	4,000	4,000
Buddhists	1,300	0.2	2.64	2,400	3,600
Atheists	980	0.1	3.38	2,400	3,500
Jains	870	0.1	1.54	1,600	2,200
Sikhs	560	0.1	1.55	900	1,200
other religionists	230	0.0	2.35	400	700
Total population	699,000	100.0	1.48	880,000	959,000

Rhenish Mission

The United Rhenish Missionary Society, now the United Evangelical Mission, headquartered in Barmen, Germany and popularly known as simply the Rhenish Mission, was one of the most important Protestant Christian missionary sending agencies of the nineteenth century. Most of its missions matured into independent Lutheran churches. The society began with the effort of twelve German laymen who in 1799 met at Elberfeld, Germany, where they founded the Bergische Bible Society and the Wupperthal Tract Society. These two organizations merged with the Barmen Missionary Society (founded in 1815) to form the Rhenish Mission.

By the time of its creation, a new generation of leadership had recognized the opportunity for Protestantism on the world scene and had joined in what would become the movement's global expansion through the next century. The first commissioned missionary of the Rhenish Mission was sent to South Africa, though the center of the work became Namibia, where eventually more than fifty missionaries were supported. This work later matured into the EVANGELICAL LUTHERAN CHURCH IN SOUTHERN AFRICA.

While building the African work, the Rhenish Mission developed a second focus in Southeast Asia, and it opened work in the 1830s in Borneo. In 1846 its concentration shifted to China, where a large mission developed, though much of it was lost in 1951. The Chinese Rhenish Church–Hong Kong Synod (with congregations in Taiwan) is the primary surviving remnant of the Chinese mission, though some of the work survives through the congregations of the China Christian Council. One of the most successful missions was launched in 1861 in Sumatra, where the church continues today as the Batak Protestant Christian Church. The Rhenish Mission expanded further with the entrance of Germany into the world colonial enterprise in the 1880s and suffered exceedingly from the destruction of that enterprise at the end of World War I, and its work in Asia was changed completely by the events of World War II.

Through the twentieth century, the Rhenish Mission began the process of developing indigenous leadership and overseeing the transfer of power to local ministers and lay personnel. At the same time it watched the development of the EVANGELICAL CHURCH IN GERMANY, whose members supplied most of its financial resources. In 1971 it merged with the Bethel Society, another German missionary organization, to form the United Evangelical Mission–Community of Churches on Three Continents. The new society became more closely affiliated with the Evangelical Church, and a new emphasis on social service ministries has developed.

Address:

United Evangelical Mission
Rudolfstr. 137
42285 Wuppertal
Germany
<http://www.ve-mission.org/> (in German and English)

Source:

Bachmann, E. Theodore, and Mercia Brenne Bachmann. Lutheran Churches in the World: A Handbook. Minneapolis, MN: Augsburg Press, 1989.

Rigpa Fellowship

Among the most popular books on Buddhism to be published in the West in recent years is Sogyal Rinpoche's work The Tibetan Book of Living and Dying. When it was published in 1992, it introduced the author and his relatively new Tibetan Buddhist organization, Rigpa, to many people.

The Rigpa Fellowship was established in the United Kingdom in 1979 under the spiritual direction of Sogyal Rinpoche (b. c. 1949). Born in Tibet in the late 1940s, Sogyal Rinpoche was brought up from an early age by his master, Jamyang Khyentse Chökyi Lodrö, who recognized him as the incarnation of Tertön Sogyal (1856–1926), a teacher to the thirteenth Dalai Lama. In 1971 Sogyal Rinpoche moved to the UK in order to study comparative religion at Trinity College, Cambridge. Soon after, he moved to London, where he built up a small following of students and began to give teachings. In 1991 the present Rigpa Centre in north London was opened.

Eight international Rigpa retreats are held annually in various countries, drawing up to three thousand participants overall. There are now eleven national centers around the world, in addition to retreat centers at Lerab Ling in the south of France and Dzogchen Beara in the southwest of Ireland. Buddhist teachers from a variety of traditions are invited to teach, as from the outset Rigpa has not relied exclusively on the teachings of Sogyal Rinpoche but has followed an ecumenical approach. International coordination takes place within three departments: finance and administration, teaching services, and executive directors. Though in each country there is a team responsible for running activities, the international staff offer support and are responsible for key strategic decisions in consultation with Sogyal Rinpoche and other lamas.

Rigpa has developed a graduated “study and practice” program that is delivered internationally, and which can take seven years to complete. It begins by introducing basic meditation practice, using samatha methods such as resting the mind on an object (usually a picture of Padmasambhava), mantra recitation, and watching the breath. Then the Mahayana compassion teachings of Lojong (Tibetan) are presented, together with the tonglen practice (giving and receiving). Next, students are introduced to the Vajrayana preliminaries, including “Going for Refuge” and bodhicitta (Sanskrit; mind of awakening). The main practice followed by committed students is the Longchen Nyingtik, which is based on the Dzogchen tradition of Tibetan Buddhism. In common with many other Buddhist groups, Rigpa does not rely on one sacred text but rather refers to a variety of Indian and Tibetan Buddhist texts.

In 1994 Sogyal Rinpoche was accused of fraud and assault. However, these allegations were never proved. In response, senior students of Sogyal Rinpoche have said that they fear the lawsuit was part of a deliberate campaign to undermine the lama and his organization (see Brown 1995). Sogyal Rinpoche, being from the Yogic tradition of the Nyingma School of Tibetan Buddhism, is not a monk and is therefore not bound by the monk's rules. He is not a celibate; indeed, he has a partner and a son.

Address:

Rigpa International
8, rue de la Bouquerie
34700 Lodeve
France
<http://www.rigpa.org>

Jamie Cresswell

Sources:

Brown, Mick. "Scandal and the Living Buddha." Telegraph Magazine (London). February 25, 1995.
Rinpoche, Sogyal. Glimpse after Glimpse. London: Rider, 1995.
———. The Tibetan Book of Living and Dying. London: Rider, 1992.

Rinzai (Japan), Lin-Chi (China), Imje (Korea), Lam-Te (Vietnam)

Rinzai, one of the five sects of Chinese Ch'an/Zen flourishing during the Sung period (960–1279), has survived until our times. It claims Lin-chi I-hsüan (in Japanese, Rinzai Gigen, d. 866) for its founder, although it appeared as a distinct school a few generations after him. The pedagogical use of shouting that Lin-chi is credited for imprinted the sect with its roughness. After it split into two sub-sects, called Yang-chi (Jap., Yōgi) and Huang-lung (Jap., Ōryō), it became predominant when Ch'an/Zen was institutionalized during the Sung period.

Two figures stand out: Yuan-wu K'o-ch'in (Jap., Engo Kokugon, 1063–1135) and his disciple Ta-hui Tsung-kao (Jap., Daie Sōkō, 1089–1163). Yuan-wu, a fine representative of a learned Ch'an, compiled the "Blue Cliff Record" (in Chinese, Pi-yen lu; Japanese, Hekiganroku), still an essential textbook for the sect. The Blue Cliff Record is composed of one hundred "cases" or koan (Ch., kung-an; Jap., kōan)—dialogues or blunt quotes—with commentary in prose and in verse.

With Ta-hui, the Lin-chi sect identifies with the method of "meditation which contemplates words" (Ch., k'an-hua ch'an; Jap., kannazen), in which the meditator concentrates on a key-word (Ch., hua-t'ou; Jap., watō) taken from a kung-an (or koan), in order to induce enlightenment (Jap., satori). With the introduction of the koan, a new literature developed. Wu-men Hui-k'ai (Jap., Mumon Ekai, 1183–1260) wrote a short compilation of forty-eight such kung-an called The Gateless Door (Ch., Wu-men kuan; Jap., Mumonkan), which had tremendous success in Japan.

The sect was introduced to Japan in the thirteenth century by a few Japanese and Chinese monks. Myōan Eisai (1141–1215), a Japanese monk who was made a Ch'an Master when visiting China, foreshadowed the interest in this tradition in Japan. He wrote a "Treaty on the Spreading of Zen for the Defense of the Country" (Jap., Kōzen Gokokuron), although he never tried to found a separate sect from Tendai Buddhism, to which he belonged. However, soon after it appeared in Japan, Rinzai experienced some success and quickly was institutionalized on the Chinese model. Its monasteries of Kyoto and Kamakura, known collectively as the Five-Mountains (Jap., gozan), became important cultural, literary, and political centers in the fourteenth century, though lineages more intent on Buddhist practice remained somewhat independent of these more scholarly centers. Ikkyū Sōjun (1394–1481) remains a popular figure of the sect. This uncompromising monk, close to the humble, embodied the saintly figure that mingles with the crowd of ordinary people. Like so many Japanese sects, Rinzai Zen knew a period of decline in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries. It found its great reformer with Hakuin Ekaku (1685–1768), a sturdy and unconventional character.

In Japan, Rinzai now exists through some fifteen branches, which together include a few thousand monks and some 2.5 million followers. The majority of these developed from the primary lineage of Zen masters centered at the Myōshin-ji monastery established in the fourteenth century.

The Lin-chi sect has survived in China, where it crossed with elements of PURE LAND BUDDHISM. In Japan, the Obaku sect, strictly separate from Rinzai, is a representative of this later form. Lin-chi Ch'an has also survived in Vietnam and Korea, although in syncretic forms. The Korean Chogye sect is thus a synthesis of the Lin-chi and Huayen sects. The work of Daisetsu T. Suzuki (1870–1966) introduced the Japanese sect to the West at the beginning of the twentieth century. It has now settled in most continents, but compared to other Buddhist traditions, its impact remains relatively meager.

Eric Rommeluère

(English translation by Michel Proulx)

Sources:

Collcutt, Martin. Five Mountains: The Rinzai Zen Monastic Institution in Medieval Japan. Cambridge: Harvard University, 1981.
Dumoulin, Heinrich. Zen Buddhism: A History. 2 vols. Trans. by James W. Heisig and Paul Knitter. New York: Macmillan Publishing Company, 1988 and 1990.
The International Research Institute for Zen Buddhism Web site. Posted at <http://www.iiijnet.or.jp/iriz> (Japanese and English). Accessed January 11, 2002.
Two Zen Classics: Mumonkan and Hekiganroku. Translated with commentaries by Katsuki Sekida. New York: Weatherhill, 1977.
The Zen Master Hakuin: Selected Writings. Translated by Philip B. Yampolsky. New York: Columbia University Press, 1971.

Rishō Kōsei-Kai

Rishō Kōsei-kai (meaning Society for the Establishment of Righteousness and Friendly Intercourse) is a lay Buddhist new religion of Japan. It was founded on March 5, 1938, in Tokyo by Nikkyō Niwano (1906–1999) and Myōko Naganuma (1889–1957)—the result of a secession from another new religion called REIYUKAI, a group in the tradition of NICHIRENSHU.

The Zen Garden and Tea House of the Nanzen-ji Temple in Kyoto, Japan (Christopher Rennie/TRIP)

Risshō Kōsei-kai, claiming a membership of about 6 million in 1999, is the second largest new religion in Japan. Its phenomenal growth, especially during the 1950s and early 1960s, is credited to its emphasis on traditional social values like filial piety and ancestor worship combined with faith in the Lotus Sutra. However, this movement faced a major crisis in 1956, when a Japanese newspaper called Yomiuri Shinbun carried out a prolonged attack on its proselytization activities and financial deals.

In its initial phase, the movement greatly relied on shamanistic practices such as “bodily reading” (shikidoku) of the Lotus Sutra by Naganuma, and its interpretation by Niwano. After Naganuma’s death in 1957, the shamanistic practices ceased and the emphasis shifted to a more doctrinal approach. Although the doctrinal basis of Risshō Kōsei-kai is the Lotus Sutra, what is original about its teachings is that it combines the emphasis on helping others achieve salvation, which is characteristic of the Lotus Sutra and Mahayana Buddhism, with the principle of the Four Noble Truths (shittai) of early Buddhism that emphasize one's own salvation. Risshō Kōsei-kai preaches the practice of the Bodhisattva Way—that is, perfecting one's personality through the realization and cultivation of the Buddha nature and saving others by leading them to the faith. One of the prominent features of Risshō Kōsei-kai is its group counseling session, called the hoza. In hoza, members try to find solutions to their personal problems by applying the teachings of the organization. Since 1964, the Eternal Buddha Shakyamuni, whose image is enshrined in the Great Sacred Hall, has been declared as its focus of worship.

The proselytization activity of Risshō Kōsei-kai is called the o-michibiki, which means “to guide.” In Risshō Kōsei-kai, the leader-follower relationship is modeled after the parent-child (oya-ko) relationship; the senior member is referred as michibiki no oya (guide parent) and the new member is referred as michibiki no ko (guide child). Earlier this oya-ko relationship formed the basis of the branch organization, but since 1959 the parent-child branch system has been changed to a locality or diocese (kyoku) based branch system. At present there are 239 branches in Japan and 6 branches overseas, mainly in the United States, Brazil, and Taiwan. In recent years Risshō Kōsei-kai has distinguished itself in sponsoring inter-religious dialogue and international peace movements. Its social activities include sending blankets to the refugees in Africa, sponsoring the Donate One Meal Campaign, and so on. In 1969 it launched the Brighter Society Movement for fostering community-based voluntary activities. It is also active in politics by supporting the candidates of conservative political parties.

Address:

Risshō Kōsei-kai Headquarters
2-11-1 Wada, Suginami-ku
Tokyo 166-0012
Japan
<http://www.kosei-kai.or.jp> (in Japanese)

Ranjana Mukhopadhyaya

Sources:

- Dale, Kenneth J., and Akahoshi Susumu. Circle of Harmony: A Case Study in Popular Japanese Buddhism with Implications for Christian Mission. Tokyo: Seibunsha, 1975.
- Morioka, Kiyomi. “The Institutionalization of a New Religious Movement.” Japanese Journal of Religious Studies 6, 1-2 (1979): 239-280.
- Niwano, Nikkyo. Lifetime Beginner, An Autobiography. Trans. by Richard L. Gage. Tokyo: Kosei Publishing Co., 1978.
- Risshō Kōsei-kai*. Tokyo: Kosei Publishing Co., 1966.

Rodzima Wiara (Poland)

Rodzima Wiara (the Indigenous Faith Association, formerly Zrzeszenie Rodzimej) is a continuation of a Neo-Pagan association called Zadruga, which was active in Poland before World War II and emphasized political more than religious goals. Rodzima Wiara was founded by Stanisław Potrzebowski and Maciej Czarnowski, a member of the original Zadruga, at the beginning of the 1990s and registered as a religious union in 1996. In contrast to its predecessor, the Rodzima Wiara offers not only right-wing politics, nationalism, and anti-Catholicism, but also a theology and some religious practices that are based on scarce remnants of Slavonic neopaganism.

The theology is polytheistic and related to the pantheon of Slavonic gods, with the Sun, Mother Earth, and the Universal Power of Nature mentioned as gods in the theological credo of the movement. The Sun is the principal god and the main object of religious ceremonies such as the Welcoming the Sun rite at dawn. The liturgical calendar is based on a solar rhythm, and collective rituals that take the form of a Greeting of the Sun are performed at the beginning of the astronomical spring, summer, and autumn. The most important of them is the Noc Kupaly ceremony, celebrated at the beginning of the astronomical summer, during the shortest night of the year.

The membership of the movement has grown from 68 in 1996 to 143 in 1999 and is the most numerous in the western part of Poland. The five regional branches of the movement are relatively independent, and there are also informal groupings across the regional branches. One of them, perhaps the most nationalistic, is associated with the “skinhead” movement, and another, more individualistic, is associated with the Pagan Folk Music movement.

Address:

Rodzima Wiara
Pocztowa 16 / 15
53-313 Wrocław
Poland

Thadeus Doktor

Source:

Simpson, S. Native Faith: Polish Neo-Paganism at the Brink of the Twenty-first Century. Kraków: Nomos, 2000.

Roman Catholic Church

The name “catholic,” from the Greek words meaning universal (katholikos), or according to the whole (kath'holou), was used in early Christianity to describe the nature of the Church. The word church is also derived from Greek roots (ek kaleo; ekklesia), meaning those who are called. “Catholic” implied being “orthodox”—that is, of possessing the fullness of truth and holding correct doctrines, and the term was used in opposition to those movements that were considered heretical or schismatic. Catholicity also includes an openness or appropriation of all truth in all cultures, languages, theological traditions, and expressions of spirituality.

Taking communion at St. Paul's Church in Papua, New Guinea (Eric Smith/TRIP)

In early statements of the faith, especially in the Nicene-Constantinopolitan Creed (c. 381), a creed recited during the liturgy today, catholicity was noted as one of the marks of the Church, along with unity, holiness, and apostolicity. After the growing divisions between the Eastern and Western churches, the term catholic began to be increasingly used as a title of the Western Church, while the Eastern churches appropriated the name Orthodox Church. During the period of the Protestant Reformation, the addition of the title "Roman" to Catholic was used to demarcate those in communion with Rome. Today the Catholic Church numbers approximately one billion faithful, with churches spread throughout the world, and it encompasses a number of distinct ecclesial traditions, which include the largest, the Roman, in addition to the Byzantine, Armenian, Maronite, East and West Syrian, Coptic, and Ethiopian rites. The name Roman Catholic specifically describes those in the Catholic Church who belong to the Roman tradition, while the other churches in this communion (including the ARMENIAN CATHOLIC CHURCH, BULGARIAN CATHOLIC CHURCH, CHALDEAN CATHOLIC CHURCH, COPTIC CATHOLIC CHURCH, ETHIOPIAN CATHOLIC CHURCH, GREEK CATHOLIC CHURCH, ITALO-ALBANIAN CATHOLIC CHURCH, MARONITE CATHOLIC CHURCH, MELKITE CATHOLIC CHURCH, ROMANIAN GREEK CATHOLIC CHURCH, RUTHENIAN CATHOLIC CHURCH, SYRIAN CATHOLIC CHURCH, SYRO-MALABAR CATHOLIC CHURCH, and UKRAINIAN CATHOLIC CHURCH) have their own respective nomenclature and distinct liturgical and theological traditions.

The Roman Catholic Church traces its origins to the time of the apostles, to those who were commissioned by Jesus Christ to preach his message of salvation (or eternal life). This church believes that it is a faithful and authoritative transmitter of the message of Christ. Of special importance in defining its apostolic character is the preeminence of its major see of Rome, the city in which the apostles Peter and Paul preached and were martyred. From the early beginnings of the Church, Rome has affirmed its special importance in being an ancient and authentic guarantor of the faith, a claim that developed over time into a theology that saw the pope (also called the Roman pontiff or the bishop of Rome) as primate of the universal Church. Rome's formulation of a universal primacy, however, has never been fully accepted by the other early Christian tradition of the Church—namely, the Orthodox Church.

The Second Vatican Council (1962–1965) has been the major defining moment for modern Catholicism, an event that moved the Church beyond some of the more intransigent theological categories of the Council of Trent (1545–1563) and the First Vatican Council (1869–1870). This recent council had a significant influence on the modern theology of the Church, the laity, evangelization, and relations with other Christians and other faiths, as well as on issues of social, political, and economic justice, secular society and the sciences, and the role of the human conscience in moral decision making, to name a few.

Theological Emphases. Catholic theology, and Christian theology for that matter, is rooted in the revelation of God in the Hebrew Scriptures (the Old Testament), in the New Testament, and in the tradition of the Church. Scripture and tradition form a unified common source for Roman Catholic theology. Continuity with tradition in worship and theology is an important characteristic of Catholicism.

Faith in God is based on the self-disclosure of God in history, through various events and persons, preeminently as transmitted in the Church's canon of Holy Scripture. The Scriptures are considered to be inspired by God, and thus are a normative and authoritative expression of the faith. In this schema, the New Testament, conveying the life and words of Christ and his apostles, is seen as the fulfillment of the Old Testament prophecies. A fuller knowledge of God was given through the revelation of the Son of God, or Jesus Christ, while the Spirit of God completes this transmission by making this revelation a continually living reality in the Church throughout time. The public revelation of God is fulfilled in Christ and is concluded with the death of the last apostles.

One may approach the knowledge of God through the use of reason, but only through revelation, and the corresponding response in faith, may one more fully apprehend the divine mystery. "Reason informed by faith" or "faith seeking understanding" imply the dialogue that occurs between faith (theology) and reason (the latter of which includes the modern sciences). All of humanity is called to respond to this revelation through the act of faith. The Second Vatican Council's dogmatic constitution on divine revelation (Dei verbum) reflects such a conception of revelation.

One should also note that three other texts of Vatican II—namely, the Dogmatic Constitution on the Church (Lumen gentium), the Declaration on the Relationship of the Church to Non-Christian Religions (Nostra aetate), and the Decree on the Church's Missionary Activity (Ad gentes divinitus)—also provide additional themes on the notion of revelation. These texts address more explicitly the Catholic conception of the nature of revelation in the world religions, and they speak of Christ as the one who ultimately enlightens all nations. The mission of the Church also includes mediating revelation to the present time and cultures, where the official teaching body of the Church, the magisterium, along with bishops and theologians, have a specific role in teaching and transmitting the faith. Doctrines are formal teachings of the Church, and among them are included dogmas, which are teachings regarded as solemnly proclaimed and irreformable.

The Catholic Church holds a faith in one God, and so is monotheistic, but this monotheism is expressed in terms of a Trinitarian God, who is Father, Son, and Holy Spirit. Traditional trinitarian theology has expressed such a God as three divine persons united by a common nature or essence. These divine persons are conceived of as analogically akin to human persons, with the qualification that human persons exist as individual centers of consciousness, while divine persons are defined in terms of persons-in-relation. This doctrine of the Trinity, although not explicitly contained in the Scriptures, was developed in the early tradition in its reaction to various heresies, and it affirms that the three persons are distinct by saying that the Father is unbegotten, the Son is begotten, and the Holy Spirit proceeds from the Father (and/or through the Son). However, by virtue of their eternal communion or relationships, the three are simultaneously one. Perichoresis, or mutual indwelling, is the term used to express this inner-trinitarian relationship. Sometimes their activity in the history of salvation is described as being Creator, Redeemer, and Sanctifier, for Father, Son, and Holy Spirit, respectively. A number of theologians have used psychological analogies, which are not without their limits, to describe the unity and diversity of the three, and they speak of God as being the Mind, Word, and Will, or they use the analogy of love, speaking of God as Lover, Beloved, and Mutual Love. Language about the trinitarian God is always qualified with the notion that created persons may not attain a full knowledge of the divine mystery by virtue of their created and finite natures, and so they rely on divine revelation in communicating how God is one, yet three. In trinitarian theology, a methodological distinction is made between the immanent Trinity (God as mysteriously existing in the godhead) and the economic Trinity (God as active in the history of salvation), with the understanding that both ways of speaking about God refer to the same Triune God.

Very early in the tradition of the Church, the notion emerged that God created the universe out of nothing (creatio ex nihilo) and that creation was good. These beliefs counteracted ideas which held that God created out of some preexistent matter, a position that threatened the transcendence of God over created matter, or that creation was somehow accidental, which threatened the notion that God willed creation and had the absolute freedom to create. Creation in the book of Genesis is seen as good, willed by God, and a gift of God's love. There is linked to this protology (theology of first things) a rejection of any sort of dualism between good and evil in the material and spiritual realms. Such a God is Creator through the Son, who with the Spirit continually sustains and sanctifies creation. Of particular importance in such a cosmology is Jesus Christ, the Savior, through whom all of creation and humanity is renewed. Today's Church seeks to correlate its fundamental theology of creation in the light of modern scientific discoveries, and it has become more sensitive to the crises existing in ecology.

Jesus Christ, as the second person of the Trinity, is seen as God who became incarnate in order for a fallen (sinful) humanity to attain salvation and in order for creation to be renewed. The incarnation is described by St. Paul as a kenosis, which is literally a self-emptying or condescension of God's becoming human without thereby ceasing to be God. The name Christ means the anointed one—hence the related names of Messiah or Savior.

The classical doctrine in christology (theology of Christ) is that Jesus Christ has two natures, both divine and human, which are united, without change, confusion, separation, or admixture, into one person. This doctrine, formulated very early on in the ecumenical councils, accounts for how Christ is Savior or Redeemer. As being fully God he is able to save, yet as also being fully human (of body and soul), he is able to freely accept the offer of salvation on behalf of humanity. Christ was like human persons in all things, except sin.

The Christ event, his incarnation, death, resurrection, and ascension to heaven, are the components that form the basis of the theology of salvation (soteriology) wrought by Christ. The universal significance of this event is that Christ is the sole mediator between God and humanity. He is seen as both the head, as mediator to God, and body of the Church. In the latter aspect, the participation and life of the person and community occur in and along with Christ. This ongoing presence in the community comes through the Spirit of Christ, who forms the link between the Jesus of history and the Christ of faith. In this latter aspect, Christ becomes existentially relevant to each person's, and the Church's, life—that is, in their personal and communal worship, prayer, and experience.

The theology of Christ is related to the theology of the Spirit (pneumatology), and one cannot be understood without the other. The Spirit is the one who not only descends upon Christ (at his baptism), anointing him for his mission to spread the Gospel, but Christ also sends the Spirit to be the ongoing life-giver and sustainer for the Church (at Pentecost). This Spirit endows the Church and persons with many charisms, or gifts of grace, allowing them to continue to spread the good news of salvation and to participate sacramentally in the life of Christ. This same Spirit is the one who inspires the prophets, ensures that the Church will not falter in its faith, and is the principle of communion (unity) among persons and churches.

The Church, Ministry, and Magisterium. Much of the modern conception of the theology of the Church (ecclesiology) is contained in the previously mentioned Second Vatican Council's statements on the Church, on ecumenism, the Church in the modern world, and the Church's missionary activity. Vatican II variously described the Church as the Body of Christ, the People of God, and the Temple of the Spirit. In its earliest beginnings, Christians saw themselves as being in continuity with the temple worship of Judaism. Only later, as the two religious traditions grew apart, did separate churches, in homes and designated buildings, begin to emerge.

The Church is described as both an invisible and a visible reality. The visible Church is the institutional and hierarchically structured community that exists in the created realm, while the invisible aspect accounts for the fact that the Church is also a heavenly reality, in that it is a community that is the body of Christ that exists in communion with God. Both of these aspects refer to the sacramentality of the Church—that is, its being a means of a life of grace or holiness. The term "communion of saints" expresses the holiness of the earthly and heavenly Church. The Church is also described as being both a universal and a local reality. The local church is the community of faithful in a given place (a parish, city, or region), while the universal Church is the unity or communion of these local churches. There has been a tendency in Catholic theology sometimes to see each local church as a part of the universal Church. Theologians such as Jean-Marie Tillard, building upon the insights of Vatican II's description of communion ecclesiology, have emphasized that each local church has to be seen as fully a Church in order to affirm the fullness of life in Christ in each community, and that each local church simultaneously forms part of the universal communion of churches.

The Church has from earliest times been characterized as having four marks: unity, holiness, catholicity, and apostolicity. Unity is the unity of life and doctrine in Christ and the Spirit. In modern times, there has been a concern for ecumenism, which is the dialogue that seeks unity between churches not in communion (or union) with each other. Major statements of agreement have come from dialogues with, for example, the Eastern Orthodox, Anglican, and Lutheran churches. Today's churches realize that disunity is contrary to the will of God and threatens the effective witness of the Church. As for the Church's holiness, it is primarily predicated on the notion that the Church is essentially holy and lives a life of grace, despite its members at times being sinful. The previously mentioned etymology of the word catholic implies both a universality, but more important, a wholeness—the fullness of salvation is given in the Church. Vatican II extended the notion of catholicity in its recognition that there are churches and ecclesial communities outside the Catholic Church that possess degrees of catholicity. The notion of apostolicity implies a continuity in the faith and ministry of the apostles, and the authentic transmission of such faith in all times.

This mark of apostolicity is in part related to the institutional ministry, the latter of which is often described as safeguarding and transmitting Catholic doctrine, and as existing as servants to the faithful. The institutional Church consists of a threefold ministerial structure of bishop, priest/presbyter, and deacon. The bishop is one who oversees each local community (diocese) but who is also entrusted with responsibility for the whole Church. Each bishop is part of an episcopal college, whose head is the pope. This episcopal college formally meets either in conferences (of regions, countries) or in international bodies, such as in a council or synod. Priests and deacons are united to the bishop and pastorally minister to their respective local churches. Priests generally preside at the eucharistic celebration, and when present, so do the bishops.

The notion of the Petrine ministry, the special commissioning of Peter to be the “rock” (foundation) upon which the Church was to be built (Mat. 16:17–19), forms the basis of the claim of a universal primacy of the bishop of Rome, though each bishop in the Church also shares this same Petrine vocation. Recently, Pope John Paul II in his encyclical Ut unum sint (1995) called for a re-envisioning of the role of the papacy in order for it to be more ecumenically acceptable to other Christian churches.

Each pastor of the Church and each member of the Church is called to spread the Gospel; however, a special responsibility to teach is entrusted to the bishops. Formal teaching authority in matters of the faith and morals was entrusted to the successors of the apostles—namely, the bishops, who are to guard and explain the faith fully. The word magisterium (magister: master) refers to the teaching authority of the Church, and it is generally used to describe two types of teaching: extraordinary and ordinary. One type of the exercise of extraordinary magisterium is a universal (ecumenical) council when it proclaims a doctrine to be definitively held—hence, to be infallible. Vatican I (1869–1870) also decreed that the pope, as the one speaking from the chair of the bishop of Rome (ex cathedra), when he teaches on matters of faith and morals a doctrine to be universally held by the entire Church, can teach infallibly. There is only one such exercise of papal infallibility in the history of Catholicism (Mary's Assumption, 1950). Ecumenical councils and infallible definitions of the pope as such are regarded as teachings of the extraordinary magisterium. Another distinction to the teaching authority in the Church is that exercised by each bishop, the entire episcopal college, or the pope in teaching on faith and morals in their “ordinary” teaching. Papal encyclicals, letters, statements of the various curial offices of the Church (for example, the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith), or the bishops when teaching as individuals or as a collegial body are examples of this aspect. Such a teaching function does not enjoy the charism of infallibility, but it is seen as authoritative and it does call for respect for the teaching (although infallible teachings may be contained in such an exercise of magisterium). According to canon law, dissent from ordinary magisterial teachings is theoretically possible, provided a number of strict conditions are met; however, dissent from infallible teachings is not permissible. The term “creeping infallibility” is used to describe the misconceived belief that all papal teachings are infallible. Another question in contemporary ecclesiology is to what extent the various curial offices can exercise magisterium outside of the college of bishops.

The distinction between extraordinary and ordinary magisterium is based on the theology of the development of doctrine. This notion of development essentially means that the Church may explicitly teach a truth not explicitly contained in the apostolic deposit of faith, or that the Church may grow in its understanding of a doctrine, or that the expression of a doctrine may change in order to adapt to different languages and times, without the content of the doctrine changing. A further distinction is that the content of an infallible doctrine may not change, but doctrines not considered infallible may change. Changes in formal teaching in Catholicism have included the prohibition of slavery, religious liberty for all persons, and that there is the possibility of salvation outside the Church. Another important doctrine is the sensus fidelium (sense of the faithful), which affirms that the Spirit of God has been bestowed upon the entire Church, and not simply on the institutional ministries. The supernatural sense of the faithful can manifest an unerring quality when they reflect a universal consensus on faith and morals. The theological notion of reception is related to sense of the faithful when doctrines of faith and morals are received by the Church as correct and authoritative, while nonreception would imply an ecclesial rejection of a teaching.

The College of Cardinals has a duty in assisting the papacy as a consultative body in governance of the universal Church or in electing a new pope. The Roman Curia is the formal bureaucracy that assists in papal government through various congregations, councils, and commissions.

The ministry of the Church is extended through various religious orders, special societies in the Church whose members commit themselves to public vows of poverty, chastity, and obedience, and life in community with fellow members. Such societies are generally dedicated to specialized service in the Church; whether education (Marist Brothers), evangelism (Dominicans), publishing (Society of St. Paul), service to the poor or ill (such as the MISSIONARIES OF CHARITY), or a life of prayer and contemplation (Carmelites). A number of these orders have assumed a particular role in foreign missions and the spread of the Church internationally (they are discussed in separate entries in this encyclopedia), including the BENEDICTINES, DOMINICANS, FRANCISCANS, HOLY GHOST FATHERS, JESUITS, SALESIANS, URSULINES, and WHITE FATHERS.

Theological Anthropology, Nature, and Grace.

Theological anthropology deals with issues of human nature, creation, the relationship with God, free will, sin, and redemption. Catholic theology sees the person as created in the image and likeness of God, and thus possessing freedom of determination. All persons are called to live in a relationship with God, through Christ and in the Spirit, and the ultimate destiny to which each person is called is eternal life in the trinitarian God.

The relationship between God and humans is expressed in the classic Catholic formulation of nature and grace. Nature in the nature-grace categories refers to our human condition and innate capacity to desire and receive grace, grace being the gratuitous divine self-communication or divine presence. This formulation is meant to bring to light two important points. The first is that grace is a free gift of God to human beings, and the person is called to freely accept this gift. This doctrinal area implies a relationship with God and a transformation, or sanctification, of the person that results from that relationship. The other part of the equation is that grace cannot be attained by our own actions, or, in other words, one cannot attain salvation through one's own efforts. The scriptural formulation of this relationship is best expressed by contrasting a life lived in grace, versus a life lived in sin. The Western Christian tradition has tended to see grace as healing one from sin, while the Eastern Christian tradition has generally seen grace as leading to a process of sanctification or divinization, and despite the different emphases, both aspects exist in each tradition. The sanctifying and transformative power of grace is also now being incorporated into a theology of grace that includes all of creation, and not just humanity.

A distinction is drawn between uncreated grace and created grace. Uncreated grace refers to the inner trinitarian life of God, while created grace refers to the gift and effects of being sanctified and brought into communion with God. This grace is also a universal gift that allows for the possibility of those who do not explicitly know Christ or God to authentically respond to God's offer of grace. Theologian Karl Rahner (1904–1984) has characterized this as "anonymous Christianity." This position still affirms that Christ is the unique or sole mediator of that divine grace. Vatican II's Declaration on Non-Christian Religions (Nostra aetate) addresses the Church's relationship to Judaism, Islam, and other world religions. The text acknowledges the unity of humanity because of the creative work of God, and does not reject things that are true and holy in these religions. Dialogue and collaboration, as in the realm of ecumenism, is encouraged. Vatican II's constitution on the Church recognized that non-Christians may achieve salvation, despite not being members of the visible Church.

Man and woman are also seen as being affected by original sin and the sins of humankind. Modern theology of sin has moved beyond some of the problems associated with holding a doctrine of biological transmission of sin or the sins of the first humans, and has viewed original sin in terms of a primordial (first) sin and personal responsibility. In a literal interpretation of the Genesis creation account, sin could be envisioned in categories of biological transmission. However, in the light of modern anthropology, psychology, and biblical criticism, Adam and Eve can be seen as symbols of the whole human race, which would emphasize each person's individual responsibility for sin. Catholicism has spoken of the corporate nature of sin, and that such sin can be manifested in a distortion of certain relationships (whether these be ecclesial or social, for example).

The theology of sin also addresses two basic types of sin: venial and mortal. Venial sins are spoken of as immoral because of their matter or because of a defect in the knowledge and freedom of the one sinning. Mortal sins are more severe in their subject matter and because there is the added notion that those committing them manifested sufficient thought and consent. Mortal sins destroy communion with God, while venial sins mar, but do not completely destroy, this communion.

Saints and Mary. The term saint, in common usage, refers to one who has been canonized by the Church—that is, one who has been formally recognized to have lived a life of holiness or a life of grace. The numerous recognized saints witness to the diversity of lives and approaches to spirituality. An important part of ecclesiology and the theology of grace, though, is that all those who have attained salvation have become holy, or saints (both those canonized and those not). The communion of saints means that after death there still exist relationships between all Christians, both dead and alive. In Roman Catholicism, there is a formal process of recognition of sainthood that involves a number of criteria. A person is recognized by the Church as blessed, then is beatified, and finally, is canonized. This process involves formal investigation of the person's life, and attribution of miracles to a particular saint. Beatification allows a public veneration of the person, while canonization is a definitive belief that the person in question has indeed attained eternal life. Saints are not prayed to as if they are God, but rather, they are prayed to for their intercessory prayers—the grace and blessings always come from God. A distinction is made between the veneration of a saint and the worship (adoration) that is due to God alone. Veneration of saints, their images, stature, relics, or icons always leads to a worship of God.

Mary holds a special place of veneration among the saints, followed by the apostles and early martyrs. Mary's particular importance within the cult of the saints stems from her sanctity of life and her accepting to be the mother of Jesus Christ. Mary is sometimes spoken of as the mother of God (Greek: Theotokos)—not of the divine nature of God, but of the incarnate Son of God. The theological understanding of Mary emerged alongside the early Church's formal declarations on the nature of Christ. Mary is seen as being a virgin who conceived by the Holy Spirit, not by human procreation. Two other doctrines about Mary are important in Catholic theology—namely, the Immaculate Conception and the Assumption. The Immaculate Conception, a doctrine formalized in 1854, teaches that Mary, from the moment of her conception, by the grace of God and the merits of Christ's saving work, was free from original sin. The Assumption holds that Mary was taken up to heaven in body and soul. The Assumption witnesses to the fact that Christ's saving work will ultimately triumph over sin and death, and that all may hope for eternal life. The Church does not require assent to apparitions of Mary (such as at FATIMA and Lourdes).

Sacraments. Sacraments, or mysteries, are means of the mediation of divine grace, signs of faith and acts of worship that are rooted in the ultimate mystery of the Church being a sacrament. Participants experience the grace and power of God, which is bestowed upon them gratuitously by virtue of Christ's suffering, death, and resurrection. The Christ event is thus the foundation for sacramental theology. The term in Greek, mysterion, connotes a broader understanding of God's grace to humanity, which is not limited to the number of sacraments. A trait of Catholicism is that it envisions itself as being sacramental—that is, as mediating communion with God. Modern theology after Vatican II has also emphasized the importance of the Christ event, as Christ being the first or primordial sacrament, and as the Church also being a sacrament. The number of formal sacraments, though, is seven: baptism, confirmation, Eucharist, reconciliation (Penance), anointing of the sick, matrimony (marriage), and holy orders (ordination).

There are three sacraments of Christian initiation: baptism, confirmation, and Eucharist. Baptism is the incorporation of a person into the Church, the body of Christ, and leads to the restoration of the imago in Christ of the one being baptized. The forgiveness of sins also forms part of the theology of baptism. Christian churches generally recognize the unrepeatable character of baptism, provided that the act is done with a trinitarian formula—that is, in the name of the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit—and the use of blessed water. As an incorporation into the Church, each person thus also enters into the "priesthood of all believers." Baptism is thus seen as an ordination into the community, where the one baptized now forms part of the eucharistic celebration.

Confirmation (chrismation) is an anointing with the holy oil of chrism whereby the initiate is sealed with the gift of the Spirit. Confirmation was initially practiced within the context of baptism, but it has become separated from this rite of initiation. Confirmation is celebrated as a second sacrament for baptized children who have reached the age of reason, and have thus undergone further catechesis, or it forms part of the rite of Christian initiation of adults. The Catholic Church, though, has in ecumenical dialogue with the Orthodox churches recognized the unity of the ancient rite of baptism, confirmation, and Eucharist, which professed all three upon the one being initiated.

The Eucharist is seen as the culminating point of the initiation process, preceded by baptism and confirmation. Eucharist is literally a sacramental "thanksgiving" and praise of God, and a remembrance of the past and recollection of what God shall do in the future. In the Eucharist, through participation in the mystical Body and Blood of Christ, sacramentally represented by the bread and wine, the faithful are brought into communion (union) in the Body of Christ through the descent of the Spirit.

The sacrament of reconciliation is a ritual in which sins of the baptized are forgiven, thus leading to a reconciliation between the person and God. In reconciliation, the Church recognizes that sin has a social dimension that affects the community. This sacrament, echoing the New Testament's universal call to reconciliation, also includes a penitential act, either of prayer or good works. Prayer, as a reconciliation with God, forms an important part of this ritual. A number of rituals exist with regard to reconciliation, whether it be a communal act or private act, or a combination of the two, with reconciliation before immanent death another ritual.

Anointing of the sick is also part of the Church's prayer services, and has since medieval times been largely administered to those who are gravely ill or dying. Extreme unction is a synonym for this sacrament. In recent times there has been a renewal of this sacrament also to include all who are ill or those in old age.

Marriage is seen as an indissoluble covenant between a man and a woman that is geared to the expression of love between the two, and is also naturally ordered to the procreation of children. This marriage covenant echoes the fidelity of the covenant of God to the people. The Church does not dissolve marriages that are sacramentally valid and consummated. Marriages, though, are dissolvable under very specific conditions set out by Church canon law and that are adjudicated by local diocesan marriage tribunals.

Holy orders are basically a sacrament of ordination into the institutional priesthood, diaconate, or episcopate. The Church teaches that through ordination, one becomes united in the ministry of Christ and the apostles. Ordained ministers serve the Church in various ways and in various degrees, from safeguarding the deposit of faith, governing, administering the sacraments, to sanctifying. Generally, ordained ministers are celibate men. The primary justification for this is based upon the prototype of the high priesthood of Christ. There has since the last century been a movement in the Church to extend ordination to women, especially in view of the increase in their roles in areas traditionally exercised by men, such as chaplaincy, spiritual direction, and pastoral associateship.

The Kingdom of God and Eschatology. Eschatology (theology of last things) addresses questions such as death (or the end of the world), judgment, heaven, purgatory, hell, the resurrection of the body, and the coming of the Kingdom of God. As mentioned, the goal of human existence is eternal life in God, which is expressed in Catholic theology as the beatific vision, and through the notion of the coming of the Kingdom of God, or the end times (the eschaton or parousia). The Kingdom of God theologically means the rule or reign of God. The end of the world does not necessarily imply the end of matter, however, for the cosmos could be mysteriously transfigured. In the Church's vision, the Kingdom of God is already mysteriously upon us, yet, this eternal kingdom is still awaiting its final consummation. This is antinomically described as the "already but not yet." Eternal life is a vision of God, and living in an eternal relationship of love and knowledge of God.

The Church has never formally taught that anyone is in hell, or that it is a place of punishment by God; rather, hell is the place of total absence from God for those who would reject the gift of eternal life. Purgatory is seen as an intermediary place of purification from one's sins in preparation for the beatific vision. Purgatory has been spoken of in terms of a penal process, but some modern theologians have tended to focus on this intermediate state as a place of preparation and sanctification for eternal life. The Church's magisterium has generally held that the resurrection of the dead takes place at the end of time, but some have left open the possibility of an individual resurrection immediately after death. The destiny of each Christian thus includes purgatory, the resurrection of the body and soul, and the beatific vision (eternal life).

The Roman Catholic Church has its headquarters in Vatican City, a five-acre sovereign nation (the smallest of all the world's countries). In stark contrast, the Roman Catholic Church is the world's largest religious organization, with slightly more than one billion members (as of 2000), or approximately 16 percent of the world's population. The Roman Catholic presence on the Internet is massive. The church has an official website at <http://www.vatican.va/>. In addition, many dioceses and religious orders also have web pages, and numerous sites of both a supportive and critical nature. <http://www.catholic.net/> is particularly helpful, with links to a variety of Catholic periodicals, papal encyclicals, and other Church documents.

Jaroslav Z. Skira

Sources:

- Annuario Pontificio*. Città del Vaticano: Libreria Editrice Vaticana, issued annually.
- Bokenkotter, Thomas A. A Concise History of the Catholic Church. Rev. ed. Garden City, NY: Image, 1990.
- Fiorenza, Francis Schüssler, and John P. Galvin, eds. Systematic Theology: Roman Catholic Perspectives. 2 vols. Minneapolis, MN: Fortress, 1991.
- Flannery, Austin, ed. Vatican Council II: The Conciliar and Post Conciliar Documents. Rev. ed. Boston: St. Paul, 1992.
- Foley, Leonard. Believing in Jesus: A Popular Overview of the Catholic Church. 4th ed. Cincinnati, OH: St. Anthony's Messenger, 2001.
- Foy, Felician A., and Rose M. Avato. A Concise Guide to the Catholic Church. Huntington, IN: Our Sunday Visitor, 1984.
- Hellwig, Monika K. Understanding Catholicism. New York: Paulist, 1981.
- McBrien, Richard P. Catholicism. Rev. ed. New York: HarperSanFrancisco, 1994.
- , ed. The HarperCollins Encyclopedia of Catholicism. New York: HarperCollins, 1995.
- Rahner, Karl. The Content of Faith: The Best of Karl Rahner's Theological Writings. Edited by Karl Lehmann and Albert Raffelt. Translated by Harvey D. Egan. New York: Crossroad, 1993.

Romania

The Romanian people can be traced to the ancient Dacians, who appear in history in the fourth century B.C.E. when several were sold as slaves in Athens. Their homeland was the Carpathian Mountains, which cut through what is now modern Romania. Rome conquered the region in 109 C.E. The land north of the mountains, Transylvania, and south, Wallachia, became Dacia Superior and Dacia Inferior, respectively. The Roman occupation, which lasted until 270, left a significant imprint on the region and gives the country its contemporary name. The withdrawal of Rome left the region open to successive waves of invading troops, though a somewhat stable period began in the seventh century with the incorporation of the area into the Bulgarian Empire.

Romania's history is marked by the invasion of the Mongols in 1241, when most of the records of its past were destroyed, and history essentially began anew in 1290 with the founding of the principdom of Wallachia with headquarters at Curtea de Arges. At the same time, Hungary consolidated its control of Transylvania. Wallachia struggled to remain independent from the more powerful Hungarians to the north and, increasingly in the fifteenth century, from the growing Ottoman Empire.

Wallachia became a Turkish province in 1417, but for the next century various attempts were made both to keep the Turks from occupying the land and to maintain the culture and religion of the people intact. Among the figures who came to the fore in the middle of the century was one Prince Vlad (c. 1431–1476), who became known for his efforts both to unite the Wallachians and his battles against the Turkish armies. Considered a national hero by modern Romanians, he has become infamous in the West after his other name, Dracula (or son of Dracul, which in Romanian means son of the dragon), was given to the title character in Bram Stoker's vampire novel.

Although the Turkish advance was checked in 1529 at Vienna, Turkish dominance of Hungary and Wallachia remained through the rest of the century. There was a brief respite from Turkish rule beginning in the 1590s, but the Turks came into power again in the seventeenth century.

Status of religions in Romania, 2000-2050

Followers	2000			2025	2050
	total	%	rate
Christians	19,639,000	88.0	-0.16	18,126,000	14,984,000
Orthodox	19,000,000	85.1	0.00	17,000,000	13,900,000
Roman Catholics	3,237,000	14.5	-0.28	3,000,000	2,500,000
Protestants	2,380,000	10.7	0.13	2,150,000	1,800,000
Nonreligious	1,653,000	7.4	-1.89	1,200,000	910,000
Atheists	738,000	3.3	-2.59	300,000	200,000
Muslims	282,000	1.3	0.06	300,000	300,000
Jews	9,900	0.0	-4.11	10,000	10,000
Baha'is	1,800	0.0	0.81	4,000	8,000
other religionists	3,700	0.0	0.81	5,000	7,000
Total population	22,327,000	100.0	-0.39	19,945,000	16,419,000

Wallachia remained under Turkish control until Russia became involved. In 1812, Russia took control of the southeastern part of Moldavia and continued to put pressure on the Ottomans in the region. Step by step, greater levels of autonomy were introduced. In 1859, Alexandru Ion Ciza emerged as the ruler of a united Wallachia and Moldavia, which was recognized as the independent country of Romania in 1878 following the Russian-Turkish War of 1877. Then in 1816, Romania aligned itself against Hungary and Austria in World War I, and it was awarded Transylvania when the Austro-Hungarian Empire was dismantled in 1918.

Romania was occupied by Germany during World War II. After the war, the country came under Russian influence, and in 1946 the Communists took control of the government. In 1965, Nicolae Ceausescu (1918–1989) became head of the Communist Party and in 1967 president of the country. He began to pursue a policy somewhat independent of Russia, and emerged as a most brutal dictator. A combination of economic problems and government corruption led to massive discontent that culminated in the revolution of 1989 that drove Ceausescu from power and led to the establishment of a democratic government in the country.

Easter Services at Sirena Monastery in Romania (F.Andreescu/TRIP)

Christianity was introduced into the Danube region, according to legend, by the Apostle Andrew in the first century C.E. Documents are scarce, but a bishop resided at Tomis by the fourth century, and a bishop from Banat-Marisena attended the Ecumenical Council of 787. In subsequent centuries, Romania was on the battle line between the Byzantine Greek and the Roman Latin churches. The swing of Wallachia and Moldavia into the Greek camp was solidified during the two centuries of Bulgarian control. The work of Cyril and Methodius in introducing the Slavonic liturgy also influenced the developing church.

When Wallachia was founded as a separate state, Orthodoxy dominated. In 1359 an Orthodox bishop sent from Constantinople settled at Curtea de Arges. A second diocese was erected at Severin in 1370. Although Orthodoxy was the dominant force in Transylvania, the ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH was on the ascendancy. BENEDICTINES had established themselves in Cluj and Saniob in the eleventh century, and FRAN-CISCANS and DOMINICANS arrived in the thirteenth century. From the fourteenth century, Orthodoxy became increasingly established in Wallachia and Catholicism in Transylvania. A bishopric was established in Moldavia in 1401.

As Hungary became the dominant force in Transylvania, the Orthodox Church was suppressed. In 1279 the Orthodox were stopped from building new churches and Orthodox worship prohibited. The dominance of Roman Catholicism was bolstered by the arrival of many Germans into Transylvania. The Orthodox Church survived through the seventeenth century, but once Austria gained dominance of the region in 1687, systematic efforts to convert the Orthodox began. As part of its missionary thrust, Catholics founded the ROMANIAN GREEK CATHOLIC CHURCH, an Eastern Rite church. Under threat of the loss of civil rights, the head of the Orthodox Church agreed to unite with Rome in 1698.

Early in the sixteenth century, an additional factor was introduced into Romanian religious life with the arrival of Protestants, both Lutherans and Reformed, from German-speaking areas to the west. Although they initially had their greatest success in the German-speaking communities, both a Hungarian- and a Romanian-speaking Protestant movement emerged. Transylvania also became home to an important (and the surviving) wing of Unitarianism (non-Trinitarian Christianity), which had also emerged in the sixteenth century and established itself briefly in Poland.

The progress of Christianity was checked somewhat by the conquest of the Ottomans, dedicated Muslims. Muslims from the area north of the Black Sea had entered what is now Romania as early as the thirteenth century, but others moved into the region following the spread of Ottoman control across Romania and into Hungary. Muslim strength was concentrated in the Danube River valley, west of the Black Sea.

Independence in 1878 set the stage for a set of changes in Romanian religious life. Most important, in 1885, Orthodox believers established the ROMANIAN ORTHODOX CHURCH as an autocephalous body no longer under the administrative jurisdiction of the ecumenical patriarchate in Constantinople. Secondly, various Protestant/Free Churches, most prominently the Baptists, saw an opportunity to plant their brand of Christianity in Romania. The original Baptist community was founded in 1856, but after 1877, Baptist churches began to appear across the country. Initial growth was in the German-speaking and Hungarian-speaking communities, but by the turn of the century a significant Romanian Baptist church had been formed. In 1917 there were twenty-three thousand Baptists, of whom eleven thousand were Hungarian, ten thousand Romanian, and only one thousand German. Other new groups entering at this time were the CHURCH OF THE NAZARENE, the CHRISTIAN BRETHERN, and the SEVENTH-DAY ADVENTIST CHURCH.

Pentecostalism began in Romania through a Romanian magazine published in the United States. The first prayer house opened in 1922, and in 1925 what became the Apostolic Church of God of Romania was organized. The JEHOVAH'S WITNESSES first appeared in 1912.

Religious life in Romania did not fare well through most of the twentieth century, especially in the decades following World War II. The addition of Transylvania brought a score of new religions into Romania, where the Orthodox Church had a preferred role. Orthodoxy was hit with a schism in 1924, following its adoption of the Gregorian calendar, the OLD RITE ROMANIAN ORTHODOX CHURCH being set up by those who continued to adhere to the Julian calendar. A law on religious organizations passed in 1928 that both favored some groups—those Christian churches that had a long history in the region—and prohibited the activity of the Jehovah's Witnesses, the Pentecostals, the Nazarenes, and a number of other smaller groups. Following the change in government after World War II, authorities moved to merge the Romanian Catholic Church into the Romanian Orthodox Church. This unhappy union led to the arrest of many who refused to discontinue Catholic rites.

The primary losers in Romania through the twentieth century, however, were the Jews. Following their expulsion from Iberia (1492–1493), many Sephardic Jews moved to Romania. They were not allowed to organize until 1730. In the nineteenth century, especially in Transylvania, the Jewish community divided along Reformed and Orthodox lines. Jews were officially recognized in 1894 in Transylvania and in 1923 and 1928 in Romania. The federation of the Jewish Communities of Romania accommodated units for its two branches.

There were an estimated half-million Jews in Romania at the beginning of World War II. The majority were killed during the Holocaust, but more than a hundred thousand survived. During the Ceausescu era the government adopted a liberal immigration policy, and the majority of the community moved to Israel. As the new century begins, only some ten thousand Jews remain in Romania.

Islam survived in southeastern Romania, and in 1928 the community was divided into four muftiates. The mufti from Tulcea was recognized as the chief mufti, the leader of the Romanian Muslim community. There were some 185,000 Muslims at the time, although the community has decreased to around 55,000 today. There is a single muftiate headquartered in Constanta.

Surviving the Ceausescu era, Romania began a new period of religious freedom in 1989. Romania became a major target for evangelizing groups from both East and West, and it quickly jumped into a new level of religious pluralism. Among the groups that opened centers were the BAHAI FAITH, THE FAMILY, the CHURCH OF JESUS CHRIST OF LATTER-DAY SAINTS, the UNIFICATION MOVEMENT, the INTERNATIONAL ZEN ASSOCIATION, the INTERNATIONAL SOCIETY FOR KRISHNA CONSCIOUSNESS, and the MOVEMENT OF SPIRITUAL INNER AWARENESS.

Since the revolution, fifteen religious bodies have been recognized by the government. They are the Romanian Orthodox Church, the Romanian Catholic Church, the Roman Catholic Church (Latin Rite), the REFORMED CHURCH IN ROMANIA, the EVANGELICAL CHURCH OF THE AUGSBURG CONFESSION IN ROMANIA (Lutheran), the EVANGELICAL SYNODAL PRESBYTERIAL CHURCH OF THE AUGSBURG CONFESSION IN ROMANIA, the Unitarian Church, the ARMENIAN APOSTOLIC CHURCH, the Old Rite Romanian Orthodox Church, the Muslim community, the Jewish community, the Baptist Christian Church, the Seventh-day Adventist Church, the Pentecostal church, and the Romanian Evangelical Church. Numerous newer groups operate as religious associations, thereby receiving a form of government recognition but no public funds to assist their activities.

Sources:

Branzea, Nicolae I., and Stefan Lonita. Religious Life in Romania. Bucharesti: Editura Paideia, 1999.

Cuciuc, Constantin. Atlasul Religiiilor si al Monumentelor Istorice Religioase din Romania. Bucharesti: Editura Gnosis, 1996.

Romania, Islam in

The Romanian Muslim community has a variety of ethnic backgrounds, though most of Romanian Muslims are Turks and Tatars who came into what is now the easternmost part of Romania from the territory north of the Black Sea and later from the south as the Ottoman Empire expanded into Central Europe. Some of them came with the Petcheneg and the Cuman people, who settled in the area between the ninth and twelfth centuries. A small number of Muslims are ethnic Albanians. Even Gypsies, known as kaapti, were converted to Islam. During several wars, Muslims from Crimea known as Circassians temporarily settled in the area and then moved to the south of the Danube.

Islam spread among the Petchenegs, Udis, Cumans, Tatars, and the Seljuk and the Osmanli Ottomans who originally resided in Central Asia. By the tenth century they were present north of the Black Sea and in Dobrogea. Islam gradually replaced the old religious practices, and the Uzbeks were the first to embrace the faith in Allah. During the reign of Khan Berke (1257–1267), the Turks from the north of the Black Sea and Dobrogea adhered to Islam. The subsequent waves of Turks coming from Central Asia and Anatolia formed large communities in what is now Romania, and Turkish geographical names have survived to this day (Babadag, Sarighiol, Medgidia, Techirghiol, Adamclisi, etc.). Gradually, the Muslim population increased in Dobrogea and in the towns along the Danube, which were exposed to the influence of the Muslim cultural centers from the south. Islam united the Tatar and Turkish populations and laid the foundations of several political and administrative institutions and an impressive culture. Islam brought about a spiritual revival for these populations and played an essential role in the preservation of the Turks' national identity.

As Islam pushed north into Hungary, the rulers of the Romanian countries, in an effort to preserve the independence of their principalities, attempted to limit the influence of Islam north of the Danube. For example, they were able to negotiate treaties with the sultans that allowed the Muslims who came to the area for trade to convert to Christianity. Thus, it was hoped that this would prevent the foundation of Muslim communities and the building of Islamic places of worship. In the fifteenth century, Dobrogea came under Ottoman administration and allowed the consolidation of Islam in the area. Mosques and meshids (smaller places of worship) were built during that time, and religious schools and courts were founded. The Sari Saltuk Mausoleum from Babadag, the Mischin Baba Mausoleum in Ada Kale (now moved to the Simian island), and several cheshemels (traditional wells) that have survived to this day date from the end of the fifteenth century.

Dobrogea was reintegrated into the Romanian state in 1878, and its particular cultural features as well as the political and administrative elements of the past were retained. The newspaper Ikdam reported in 1909 that the Turks from Dobrogea had 2 muftis paid by the government, 2 religious courts, more than 300 mosques, 107 mullahs, 100 imams, 81 muezzins, and 30 khaims. A law passed in 1880 to regulate Dobrogea's organization stated that the Muslim community was allowed to have two muftiates (Constanța and Tulcea), as well as several Islamic religious courts; these would remain in operation until around 1930. The Muslim judge (the cadi) had a special competence in matters regarding the family, such as marriage, divorce, parental authority, guardianship, succession, and wills. The law of cults passed in 1928 recognized the organization of the Islamic community in four muftiates (Caliacra, Constanța, Durostor, Tulcea). In Resolution 39818 issued by the Council of Ministers in 1937, the mufti from Tulcea was recognized as basmufti (chief mufti), the leader of all Muslims from Romania. In 1930 there were reported to be 185,486 Muslims in the country, many of them living in Durostor and Caliacra.

With funds from a donation by General Gazi Ali Pasa, a seminary for training Muslim clergy was founded in Babadag. In 1889 the Ministry of Cults and Public Instruction recognized and reorganized the Muslim seminary, which included also a Romanian language chair. Because of the drought and the consequent migration of people, the seminary was moved to Medgidia in 1901.

Through the early twentieth century, many ethnic Turks residing in Romania returned to Turkey. Between the two world wars, entire villages from Dobrogea were deserted. The number of places of Muslim worship also decreased. Of the three hundred places of Islamic religious and cultural significance in existence by the turn of the twentieth century, only about eighty have survived to this day. The Islamic community now has only one muftiate (in Constanța), led by the chief mufti and an ecumenical council (the surai islam, made up of twenty-three members). The 1992 census recorded 55,988 Muslims in Romania, 0.2 percent of the country's population. The majority live in Dobrogea, but there are smaller communities in the port towns along the Danube. The Muslim community in Bucharest (about four to five hundred believers) provides personnel for some embassies.

Address:

Muslim Community in Romania
Bd. Tomas nr. 41
Constanța
Romania

Constantin Cuciuc

Sources:

Branzea, Nicolae I., and Stefan Lonita. Religious Life in Romania. Bucharest: Editura Paideia, 1999.

Cuciuc, Constantin. Atlasul Religiilor si al Monumentelor Istorice Religioase din România. Bucharest: Editura Gnosis, 1996.

Romanian Greek Catholic Church

An Eastern Rite church in communion with the ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH emerged in the late seventeenth century in Romania following the retreat of the Turks from Transylvania in 1687. The new Hapsburg rulers of the Austro-Hungarian Empire encouraged the Orthodox faithful, the majority of Transylvanians, to change their allegiance to Rome and supported Jesuit missionaries to work toward that end. A combination of pressures, including the denial of full civil rights to Orthodox believers, led the head of the Orthodox church in Transylvania to agree to a union of his church with Rome in 1698. That agreement was approved at a synod two years later, and the Romanian Greek Catholic Church came into being.

The union held together until 1744, when a devout Orthodox monk began a revival of Orthodoxy and the government finally gave up its attempt to suppress it. In 1759 a new Orthodox bishop was consecrated for Transylvania. Two communities of about equal strength (the Romanian Orthodox and the Romanian Catholic) emerged, however, and some bitter feeling between the two groups remained. At the end of World War I, Transylvania was removed from Catholic Hungary and became a part of Orthodox Romania. By the end of the 1930s, there were five dioceses serving 1.5 million believers.

After World War II, the new Marxist government forced the Greek Catholics to break their ties to Rome and unite with the ROMANIAN ORTHODOX CHURCH. In 1948 the church was officially dissolved and its property turned over to the Orthodox officials. Shortly thereafter, all of the Catholic bishops were arrested. Five died in jail, and the sixth died in 1970 under house arrest.

The Romanian Greek Catholic Church was not able to revive until 1990, when the 1948 dissolution decree was rescinded after the fall of the Ceaușescu government. Suddenly, three bishops who had been operating underground emerged. Pope John Paul II (1920–) immediately appointed bishops for all the vacant dioceses. The reemergence of the church set off a continuing confrontation with the Romanian Orthodox Church. Greek Catholics demanded the immediate return of all the property seized in 1948. However, the Orthodox patriarch has been slow to turn over the property, as he insists that it is now serving members who have become Orthodox in faith. The church has been able to recover most of its former property, but a fight continues over disputed parishes. Some progress was noted following the visit of Pope John Paul II to Romania and his meeting with the Romanian Orthodox patriarch in 1999.

The Romanian Greek Catholic Church, united with Rome, is led by Metropolitan Lucian Muresan, who also serves as archbishop of Fagaras and Alba Julia. According to the latest government statistics (1992), there are 223,327 adherents; the church claimed more than three times that number, 767,000.

Address:

Romanian Greek Catholic Church
Str, P. P. Aron 2
3 175
Blaj AB
Romania

Constantin Cuciuc

Sources:

Branzea, Nicolae I., and Stefan Lonita. Religious Life in Romania. Bucharest: Editura Paideia, 1999.
Cuciuc, Constantin. Atlasul Religiilor si al Monumentelor Istorice Religioase din România. Bucharest: Editura Gnosis, 1996.

Romanian Orthodox Church

Christianity reached the area west of the Black Sea along the Danube River as early as the second century C.E. Christian communities to the north of the Danube (present-day Romania) had close relations, including administrative relations, with the churches to the south (present-day Bulgaria), which were better organized and received pastoral guidance from the patriarch of Byzantium. In 535, Emperor Justinian (483–565) established the See of Tauresium in his native town (now the town of Taor, in the former Yugoslavia), and the see had jurisdiction over some Romanian Christian communities. Although documents are rare, an episcopal office is mentioned as existing in Tomis (fourth–sixth centuries), and in 787, a bishop from Banat-Marisena (today Cedad in Timis County) attended the seventh ecumenical council at Nicaea. The conversion to Christianity of people in Romania's neighboring countries had a great influence on the spread and consolidation of Christianity in Romania.

In 973 the new Hungarian state concluded an alliance with the powerful Catholic, Emperor Otto I (912–973), after which missionaries from the ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH were sent to this country to replace those from Byzantium. As a result of the influx of Roman Catholics into the region, the Balkans became one of the places where the line was drawn between Eastern Orthodoxy and Roman Catholicism in 1054, when the two churches formally separated.

In the meantime, the conquest of Bulgaria (1018) by the Byzantine King Basil II Bulgaroctonus (c. 958–1025) allowed Byzantium to gain religious and political power over Romania. In succeeding years, the Orthodox Church was supported by the political authorities. The first centralized Romanian state, with its capital in Curtea de Argeș, was established in 1324 by Prince Basarab (d. 1352), the founder of Wallachia. His son adopted the Orthodox Church as a spiritual support for political life and asked that a bishop be sent from Constantinople. In 1359, Bishop Lachint from Vicina was accepted at Curtea de Argeş, and his jurisdiction also included Transylvania. A second episcopal see was established in Severn in 1370.

Romanian princes coming from Maramureş in 1350 organized the religious life of Moldavian locals, and during the reign of Prince Alexandru cel Bun (1400–1432), the patriarchate from Constantinople recognized Bishop Losif of Suceava (1401). In 1632 the capital of Moldavia (and the bishopric) was moved from Suceava to Lasi. While the Orthodox Church was spreading through Wallachia and Moldavia, its development in Transylvania was hindered when Hungary conquered the region and, with German backing, forced people to accept Catholicism. A Roman Catholic council in Hungary (1279) forbade Orthodox believers to build churches or to perform worship services according to Orthodox principles.

Pressure on both Roman Catholic and Orthodox believers followed the arrival of Calvinist Protestantism. Calvinist princes from Transylvania asked Orthodox believers to accept the Reformed faith, and some Orthodox bishops left as the REFORMED CHURCH IN ROMANIA grew in strength. Catholic authority was reestablished after 1687, and again Catholic missionaries organized the conversion of Orthodox believers. The heightened pressure to convert was backed by the political authorities, leading to the acceptance of unity with Rome (1698–1701) and the foundation of the ROMANIAN GREEK CATHOLIC CHURCH. Orthodox converts were allowed to keep their Greek liturgy, but they acknowledged the authority of Rome. Forced conversions continued through the eighteenth century.

When Romania fell under Turkish rule in 1417, some semblance of local control remained and Christianity was left undisturbed. The Turkish hegemony was thrown off in the 1590s, but it returned in the next century. At about the same time, Russia began to meddle in the region as part of its drive for an ice-free port. The struggle to emerge as a nation free from the control of both Russia and the Ottoman Empire led to Romania's full independence in 1877.

After independence, the Romanian Orthodox Church proclaimed itself autocephalous, and in 1885 its independence was recognized by the ECUMENICAL PATRIARCHATE. Following World War I, Transylvania was again united with Romania (1918), and the Orthodox Church was presented with a new opportunity. It considered Orthodox believers who had previously united with Rome to be still part of the Orthodox Church, and efforts were expended to reintegrate them back into Orthodoxy. The Romanian Constitution adopted in 1923 did not distinguish between the Romanian Greek Catholic Church and the Romanian Orthodox Church. The conflict between these two church bodies continues to the present.

Also following the war, steps were taken to unify the administration of the Romanian Orthodox Church. In 1920, a board was established to draw up the regulations of the church. The new "law and regulations of the organization of the Romanian Orthodox Church" appeared in 1925. The leading bishop was for the first time given the title of patriarch. The first Romanian patriarch, Miron Cristea (1868–1939), held the post from 1925 until his death in 1939. The church has survived the upheavels of the twentieth century, including the very repressive Marxist regime that exercised power from the end of World War II until 1989.

Today the Romanian Orthodox Church is organized according to its own regulations, drawn up by the synod and modified according to sociopolitical circumstances. Though independent administratively, it is one in faith and belief with the rest of the Orthodox world. The head of the Romanian Orthodox Church is the patriarch, and the Romanian Orthodox Patriarchate includes metropolitan bishoprics, archiepiscopates, bishoprics.

In 1998 the church was divided into ten archdioceses and thirteen diocesan bishoprics with 10,069 parishes and over 10,000 priests. The church also has canonical oversight of the Vicariate of the Serbian Orthodox Church in Romania, with twenty-six thousand believers, and the Vicariate of the Ukrainian Orthodox Church, with fifty-two thousand believers. Outside of Romania, there are bishops in Germany, France, and the United States who lead Romanian Orthodox believers who remain in communion with the Romanian patriarchate residing in Western Europe and North America. The Orthodox Church oversees fourteen theological institutes, most of them founded after 1989, with hundreds of students. It is a member of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES.

Address:

Romanian Orthodox Church
Aleea Patriahiei 2
70526 Bucharest, 4
Romania
http://www.patriarhia.ro/bor_eng/index_eng.htm

Constantin Cuciuc

Sources:

Branzea, Nicolae I., and Stefan Lonita. Religious Life in Romania. Bucharest: Editura Paideia, 1999.
Cuciuc, Constantin. Atlasul Religiilor și al Monumentelor Istorice Religioase din România. Bucharest: Editura Gnosis, 1996.

Romuva

Romuva (Lithuanian; sacred place, shrine) is a Lithuanian Neo-Pagan movement that builds its faith and practice on Lithuanian folklore and other sources of pre-Christian belief.

Early attempts to reconstruct the religion of pre-Christian Lithuania were evident in Lithuania's national awakening movement of the nineteenth century. The most prominent promoters of the pre-Christian tradition were poet Andrius Vištelis (1837–1912) and Domas Šidlauskas (1878–1944); the latter also established a pagan shrine called Romuva and propagated a reconstruction of pre-Christian faith that he called Visuomybė (Lith., universal faith). After the 1940 Soviet occupation, the movement was persecuted and disbanded.

In 1967 Romuva was organized as a cultural society by Jonas Trinkūnas (b. 1939), who is also a prominent leader in the Romuva movement today. The new Romuva movement had no institutional ties with the pre-Soviet Visuomybė, and its main activities were the celebrations of folk holidays with the Christian elements removed, relying heavily on the Lithuanian ethnic heritage and folklore in a belief that the pagan content is easily uncovered by removing the Roman Catholic veneer.

The Neo-Pagan movement, persecuted in the Soviet period, was revived in 1988, and Romuva congregations were established in 1991–1992 in Vilnius (the capital city of Lithuania) and Kaunas, as well as among Lithuanians living in Chicago, Boston, and Toronto. Currently there are about one to two hundred members and many more sympathizers, since Romuva's focus on the ethnic origins of Lithuania and on the propagation of ethnic culture makes the religion attractive and easily acceptable in the Lithuanian context. Romuva titles itself an "ethnic religion of Lithuania," is not conversionist, and has not spread beyond Lithuania except among the communities of ethnic Lithuanians in North America.

The beliefs of Romuva are not clearly and dogmatically defined within the different communities in the Romuva movement. Romuva claims to be a continuation of the pre-Christian (Pagan) religion of Lithuania and attempts to avoid inventions, which makes it difficult to define the doctrine or practice of the movement since no written scriptures or sources of the pre-Christian religion have survived. The movement largely depends on the ethnic culture, songs, ethnological myths, and anthropological reconstruction as the sources for its practices, and this leads to a plurality of perspectives within the movement. Generally, the concept of Darna (Harmony) is emphasized as the basis of morality and values, and ancient holidays are celebrated and ethnic particularities are observed in the belief that they facilitate the experience of the ancient religion. Different gods and goddesses of the pre-Christian pantheon (such as Dievas, Perkunas, and Laima) are invoked. They are often conceived as dependent realities, subordinate to the symbols they embody, as well as the expressions of the sacredness that permeates all living and nonliving things. Celebrations of ancient holidays are the main activities within Romuva, usually held at ancient castle-hills or other sacred pre-Christian sites, like stones, hills, trees, groves, and rivers. None of the ancient shrines have survived and no shrines have been built by the movement, though building projects do exist.

Currently Romuva is trying to get state recognition as one of the traditional religions in Lithuania, along with the larger ones that have existed in the country for the last three centuries. The extent of Romuva's continuity with the pre-Christian faith of Lithuania is debated by scholars, who point to the existing differences with the pre-Christian religion as well as the impossibility of reviving a religion without any written sources or continuing priestly practice, which in Lithuania was discontinued a few centuries ago.

In 2001, the Romuva movement had five officially registered and informally related communities in Lithuania. In 1997 Romuva initiated the World Congress of Ethnic Religions to facilitate ties with ethnic religions (surviving or re-born) of other countries around the world. The movement publishes a magazine, Romuva.

Address:

Romuva (informal address)
A. Vivulskio St. 27–4
Vilnius 2009
Lithuania
<http://www.romuva.lt/> (in Lithuanian and English)

Donatas Glodenis

Sources:

- Giedraitis, Liudvikas, ed. "Vaikštantys vandeniu." Liaudies kultūra 3 (2000): 1–7.
- Trinkūnas, Jonas. Baltų tikėjimas. Lietuvių pasaulejauta, papraočiai, apeigos, ženklai. Vilnius: Diemedžio Leidykla, 2000.
- , ed. Of Gods and Holidays: The Baltic Heritage. Vilnius: Tvermė, 1999.

Ruhani Satsang

Ruhani Satsang: Science of Spirituality was formally founded by Kirpal Singh (1894–1974) in 1950 in Delhi, India. According to Kirpal's own published accounts, he was chosen to be the spiritual successor of his guru, Sawan Singh (1858–1948) of Radha Soami Satsang, Beas. As Kirpal explains: "My Master, Hazur Baba Sawan Singh Ji Maharaj, a perfect Saint, had a great desire to form a common forum or platform, Ruhani Satsang [spiritual gathering], at which all persons, even though professing different faiths and religious beliefs, could be imparted the principles of Spirituality."

Kirpal's claims, however, were met by sharp resistance from the majority of Sawan Singh's following and blood relatives, who supported Jagat Singh (1884–1951) as the rightful successor at Radha Soami Satsang, Beas. This led to a distinct break between the two groups, and today they have no formal connection with each other beyond sharing a similar philosophy. This philosophy includes: (1) belief in a living human guru, (2) a strict vegetarian diet, (3) daily shabd yoga meditation, and (4) a high moral life, which includes abstaining from drugs and alcohol and sex before marriage.

Kirpal Singh initiated over eighty thousand people worldwide to the movement during his tenure and established Ruhani centers throughout India, Europe, and North and South America. He was also instrumental in establishing the World Fellowship of Religions in Delhi and in promoting other humanitarian projects. He authored a number of influential books on shabd yoga, including Crown of Life and Naam, or Word. His teachings were also highly influential among other new religious leaders, including Paul Twitchell (c. 1908–1971), the founder of ECKANKAR, who was initiated by Kirpal Singh during his first tour of the United States in 1955.

Kirpal's death in August of 1974 left his organization in disarray. Several disciples claimed to be his spiritual successor, and this led to the formation of a number of rival factions. Today several separate religious satsangs claim spiritual ties to the late Kirpal Singh. The Sawan-Kirpal Ruhani Mission was founded by Darshan Singh (1921–1989), Kirpal's eldest son, who was succeeded after his death by his eldest son, Rajinder Singh (b. 1946). Kirpal Light Satsang, formed by Thakar Singh (b. 1929), a disciple of Kirpal Singh and a close ally of Madam Hardevi, has been the subject of intense controversy in Germany and the United States due to widely reported allegations of sexual misconduct and child abuse on the part of the guru. Sant Bani Ashram was established by Ajaib Singh (1926–1997), a disciple of Kirpal Singh and a former follower of Charan Singh (1916–1990) of Radha Soami Satsang, Beas, who recently died without formally appointing a successor. Of these groups, Sawan-Kirpal Ruhani Mission is by far the largest and most successful in terms of a global following, with well over one hundred thousand followers.

Addresses:

Sawan-Kirpal Ruhani Mission
c/o Kirpal Ashram
2 Canal Rd.
Vijay, Magar, Delhi 110 001
India
<http://www.sos.org/nc/main.htm> or <http://skrm.sos.org/>

Kirpal Light Satsang
c/o KTS-NE
P.O. Box 302
Kinderhook, NY 12106
<http://www.santmat.net/>

Sant Bani Ashram
Sanbornton, NH 03269
<http://members.iex.net/~naam/>

Sources:

- Chadda, H. C., ed. Seeing Is above All: Sant Darshan Singh's First Indian Tour. Bowling Green, VA: Sawan Kirpal Publications, 1977.
- Juergensmeyer, Mark. Radhasoami Reality. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1991.
- Lane, David C. The Radhasoami Tradition: A Critical History of Guru Successorship. New York: Garland Publishing, 1992.
- Scotti, Juliet, and Ricki Linksman. Kirpal Singh: The Story of a Saint. Delhi: Sawan Kirpal, 1977.
- Singh, Kirpal. Surat Shabd Yoga: The Yoga of the Celestial Sound Current. Introduction for Western Readers. Edited by Robert Leverant. Berkeley, CA: Images Press, 1975.
- . The Teachings of Kirpal Singh. Edited by Ruth Seader. Bowling Green, VA: Sawan Kirpal Publications, n.d.

Russia

Russia's religious history has many features in common with other European countries. With the adoption of Christianity by the Grand Prince Vladimir (c. 956–1015) in 988, Kievan Rus, the early eastern Slavonic state, became part of Christendom, although paganism long coexisted with Christian beliefs in many parts of Russia. From its beginning the Russian Church was linked to Byzantine (Eastern) Christianity, from which it inherited a rich and elaborate religious culture that emphasizes aesthetic aspects of the faith and preservation of the tradition more than reflective theology. Byzantine Christianity developed the idea of symphony, that is, a harmonious relationship between the secular and the ecclesiastical authorities. Organizationally, the Eastern churches, unlike the Western Church, lacked a central ecclesiastical authority; they were instead autonomous (autocephalous) and coterminous, with each country governed by a single political authority. With the formation of the Moscow Patriarchate in 1589, the RUSSIAN ORTHODOX CHURCH achieved formal independence from the ECUMENICAL PATRIARCHATE in Constantinople.

Status of religions in Russia, 2000-2050

Followers	2000			2025	2050
	total	%	rate
Christians	84,308,000	57.4	0.29	95,791,000	91,642,000
Orthodox	75,950,000	51.7	0.31	85,500,000	80,000,000
Independents	7,800,000	5.3	0.51	8,500,000	8,500,000
Protestants	1,630,000	1.1	1.53	2,400,000	2,700,000
Nonreligious	40,410,000	27.5	-0.55	23,210,000	12,450,000
Muslims	11,137,000	7.6	-0.10	11,500,000	11,000,000
Atheists	7,634,000	5.2	-1.65	4,000,000	2,500,000
Ethnoreligionists	1,128,000	0.8	0.25	1,000,000	850,000
Jews	951,000	0.7	-0.98	600,000	500,000
Hindus	766,000	0.5	1.20	900,000	1,100,000
Buddhists	583,000	0.4	0.58	900,000	1,150,000
Baha'is	16,600	0.0	1.01	30,000	60,000
Chinese folk-religionists	930	0.0	0.91	2,000	4,000
Total population	146,934,000	100.0	-0.09	137,933,000	121,256,000

David Christopher Lane

Many of the distinctive features of Russia's religious history followed from the relationship between the Orthodox Church and the state. During the Middle Ages, when Russian lands were under the Mongol yoke, the church provided a source of unity and identity among the disunited and politically subjugated population. During the consolidation of Russian lands under Moscow between the fourteenth and sixteenth centuries, this history contributed to the church's role as an important symbolic and political force. The historical coincidence of the fall of the Byzantine Empire (1453) and the emergence of the Moscow state gave rise to the idea of the Third Rome, according to which Moscow rulers came to see themselves as the legitimate heirs of the Roman and Byzantine Empires. The church became the most significant marker of identity for the expanding imperial state, a role much more significant than that of Catholic, Protestant, Muslim, and Confucian religious authorities in the countries neighboring Russia.

Russian religious history also reflects the distinctive features of modernization in Russia, which was usually introduced "from above" and accelerated the diversification and secularization of Russian society. It was precisely these effects of modernization that created fears and anxieties about the potential erosion of the Orthodox ideological foundation of the autocracy. The modernizing and Westernizing reforms of Peter the Great (1672–1725) included changing ecclesiastical authority to approximate Protestant European models. The patriarchy was abolished and replaced by the Holy Synod, run by secular officials, and meticulous state control was imposed on congregational and parish life. The Synodal period, which lasted until the 1917 February revolution, had a mixed effect on the church. On the one hand, the Holy Synod was part of the state apparatus and was obliged to cooperate with the police in matters such as "subversive activities," censorship, adultery, and divorce. On the other hand, the church was fully protected by the state against competition with other faiths and had a monopoly on proselytizing. Furthermore, as the ideological foundations of autocracy seemed increasingly threatened by liberal ideologies, revolutionary movements, and the growing significance of ethnic minorities, the state

Russian religious history also reflects the distinctive features of modernization in Russia, which was usually introduced "from above" and accelerated the diversification and secularization of Russian society. It was precisely these effects of modernization that created fears and anxieties about the potential erosion of the Orthodox ideological foundation of the autocracy. The modernizing and Westernizing reforms of Peter the Great (1672–1725) included changing ecclesiastical authority to approximate Protestant European models. The patriarchy was abolished and replaced by the Holy Synod, run by secular officials, and meticulous state control was imposed on congregational and parish life. The Synodal period, which lasted until the 1917 February revolution, had a mixed effect on the church. On the one hand, the Holy Synod was part of the state apparatus and was obliged to cooperate with the police in matters such as "subversive activities," censorship, adultery, and divorce. On the other hand, the church was fully protected by the state against competition with other faiths and had a monopoly on proselytizing. Furthermore, as the ideological foundations of autocracy seemed increasingly threatened by liberal ideologies, revolutionary movements, and the growing significance of ethnic minorities, the state

An orthodox priest stands in front of the church dome in Yeniseysk, Russia. (A. Kuznetsov/TRIP) turned to the official ideology of the inseparable unity of Orthodoxy, the Autocracy, and the People (first formulated in the 1830s).

Cathedral of the Archangel, Moscow (Corel)

In spite of the Orthodox hold on the land, a variety of alternative religions were introduced over the centuries. A prominent source of religious diversity in Russia was schismatic movements, the most significant of which was the OLD BELIEVERS, who emerged in the mid-seventeenth century as a result of the Great Schism within the church. The eighteenth century saw the growth of Russian sects, such as the DOUKHOBORS (Fighters for Spirit), the Khristoverly (Believers in Christ), and the MOLOKANS (Milk-Drinkers). The teachings and practices of these sects suggest some Protestant influence (Klibanov 1965).

The territorial expansion of the Russian Empire led to the inclusion of many other ethnoreligious groups, such as Muslims (e.g., Tatars, Bashkirs, and Chechens), Jews, Roman Catholics (mainly Poles and Lithuanians), Protestants (Finns, some Latvians and Estonians), Buddhists (e.g., Kalmyks and Buriats), and shamanists in Siberia and in the Volga area. The late nineteenth century was marked by active proselytizing by Western missionaries from such groups as the BAPTISTS, JEHOVAH'S WIT-NESSES, SEVENTH-DAY ADVENTIST CHURCH, and Pentecostals. At different times, Free Masonry, German Pietism, and SPIRITUALISM found a considerable following among Russian nobles and the intelligentsia. Helena P. Blavatsky (1831–1891), cofounder of the THEOSOPHICAL SOCIETY, and Georges Gurdjieff (c. 1872–1949), whose work continues through the GURDJIEFF FOUNDATIONS, came from Russia, although they mainly developed their teachings outside the country.

Until the beginning of the twentieth century, this enormous diversity was managed in a rigid and restrictive manner. The Legal Code of the Russian Empire outlawed proselytizing among ethnic Russians, and conversion to an "alien faith" was a criminal offense. Religious minorities were divided into three categories: (1) "recognized and tolerated," that is, ethnic religious groups who could practice their religions freely but not proselytize; (2) "tolerated and unrecognized," that is, major sects who were allowed to practice their religion with some restrictions on their civil rights; and (3) "tolerated and persecuted," that is, those who were seen as presenting particular dangers to the state and were subject to administrative exile and severe restrictions of civil rights. This situation began to change in the early twentieth century with the introduction of the Edict of Toleration (1905), which gave certain rights to religious minorities. However, by that time, the state-church symbiosis had already produced its counter-image: Russian militant secularism and atheism.

During the Soviet period (1917–1989), the imposition of secularism and atheism by the state was a unique historical experience in Russian history. This policy partly stemmed from the concept that, in a society modernized according to the Marxist vision, religion would naturally wither away. The actual Communist religious policy, however, was much more complicated and involved attempts both to eradicate religion and to manipulate it for political purposes. Part of this policy was the disestablishment and institutional destruction of the Orthodox Church and, subsequently, other religions, with mass closures of churches and repression of clergy and active laity. Religion was forcibly relegated to the private domain, as its public display was regarded as anti-social activity.

At the same time, the Communist government sought to socialize and resocialize generations of Soviet people into atheism as part of what Christel Lane (1981) calls “political religion,” that is, a set of prescribed Communist ideas, values, symbols, and rituals designed to unite people and provide a basis for their behavior. However, with the passage of time, the Soviet regime sought a degree of accommodation with religious institutions and believers; for instance, during the Great Patriotic War (1941–1945) the Moscow Patriarchy was restored together with some churches and monasteries. Nevertheless, up to the end of the Soviet regime, temporary thaws were followed by antireligious campaigns, often launched by the same leaders (Anderson 1994).

During the seven decades of Communist modernization there remained some limited channels for transmitting religious culture. Although severely undermined and restricted, the Orthodox Church and other religions continued to operate. The Communist cultural revolution increasingly turned to pre-revolutionary high culture, which had many religious themes and symbols. Some elements of religious culture were preserved within émigré circles, and these were available to a very limited extent inside Russia. Finally, the generation of people brought up before the official assault on religion continued to have some influence in Russian society. The incidence and dynamics of religious beliefs and practices during the different periods of the “construction of communism” remain under dispute and require further research. Nevertheless, much evidence suggests that the deepening crisis of the Soviet system from the 1960s onwards was accompanied by a growing interest in religion and a particular interest in the historical links between ethnicity and religion, and religion and nationhood (Carter 1990).

Following the dissolution of the Soviet Union, the 1990 Law on Freedom of Religions was part of the latest attempt to modernize Russian society. For the first time in Russia’s history, it treated religious freedom as an “unalienable right of Russian citizens” and extended these rights to all those residing in Russia. The law contained strong clauses that prevented state agencies from interfering in religion and that guaranteed the legal equality of all faiths.

The 1990s were characterized by the increased visibility of religion, due to its high profile in the media, its engagement in politics, and the public display of religious symbols. During the 1990s, the proportion of professed atheists to those who considered themselves religious was reversed: In the early 1980s around 10 percent of Russians claimed to be believers, and around 43 percent, atheists. In 1999 the figures were 40 percent believers and 5 percent atheists; however, the available evidence suggests that these changes were accompanied by only a moderate increase in the number of people practicing religion (Kotiranta 2000, 37–42).

Two trends that simultaneously occurred in post-Communist Russia have defined the distinctive scenario of religious life. There was a marked resurgence of historical religions, such as the Russian Orthodox Church, ISLAM, BUDDHISM, and others. There was also a rapidly increasing diversity caused by various new religious phenomena. These included more established groups from abroad, mainly Protestant, and what are usually defined as new religious movements (NRMs). In addition, several Russian indigenous NRMs became prominent, such as the Church of the Last Testament, the MOTHER OF GOD CENTRE, and the GREAT WHITE BROTHERHOOD. This increasing diversity touched on one of the most sensitive issues of the transitional period. On the one hand, in a post-Communist society such as Russia, religion is often seen as the most significant marker of national and ethnic identity, and thus new religions are usually given less legitimacy. On the other hand, the concept of civic nation, with the accompanying recognition of the right to choose and practice religion freely, were shared by a considerable section of Russian society as it modernized after 1990.

The resulting tensions were reflected in the introduction of the new 1997 Law on Freedom of Conscience and Religious Associations. Although formally recognizing the basic religious freedoms, the new law placed serious restrictions on the activities of new religious associations and groups from abroad. So far, the 1997 law has had mixed effects. Although most religious associations, including NRMs, have been registered under the law, some were refused registration, and others, such as the SALVATION ARMY, were banned following court decisions. The prospects for pluralistic accommodation of the various religions in Russia still depend on the general direction of change in a society that is yet to sort out its fundamental culture and structure.

Sources:

- Anderson, J. Religion, State and Politics in the Soviet Union and Successor States, 1953–1993. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1994.
- Billington, J. The Icon and the Axe: An Interpretative History of Russian Culture. New York: Vintage Books, 1970.
- Carter, S. Russian Nationalism: Yesterday, Today and Tomorrow. London: Pinter, 1990.
- Ellis, J. The Russian Orthodox Church: Triumphalism and Defensiveness. Basingstoke, NY: Macmillan Press, 1996.
- Klibanov, A. Istoria Religioznogo Sektantstva v Rossii. Moscow: Nauka, 1965.
- Kotiranta, M., ed. Religious Transition in Russia. Helsinki: Aleksanteri Institutej, 2000.
- Lane, C. The Rites and Rulers: Ritual in Industrial Society. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1981.

Russia, Ethnic Minority Religion in

The enormous distances stretching between Eastern Europe and Asia (sometimes referred to as the distinctive geopolitical space of Eurasia) have hosted a vast diversity of religions affiliated with a variety of ethnic groups that, in recent centuries, have persisted, evolved, and found some degree of mutual accommodation within a single state, the Russian Empire, which identified itself as an Eastern Orthodox country. In the former Russian Empire, various forms of the world religions (Christianity, Islam, Judaism, and Buddhism), as well as a spectrum of ethn tribal religions including Shamanism, were linked to some eighty different ethnic groups, and various factors have contributed to the persistence of a close connection between religion and ethnicity.

While encouraging Eastern Orthodox proselytism among the inovertsy (peoples of non-Orthodox faiths), the Russian state made only limited attempts at their Christianization. The government saw as a far more important goal the control of religious minorities and the perpetuation of the ethno-religious status quo, which had the effect of securing the numerical predominance of the Russian Orthodox population. This was sought through the “policy of toleration”—that is, granting ethnic minorities the freedom to practice religion but totally banning their (and any other) proselytization among ethnic Russians. Further, the state imposed administrative structures that governed the religions of ethnic minorities and suppressed dissent within them. Later, in particular during the period of national awakening of Russia’s religious minorities from the 1850s onward, their religions often played a vital role in constructing national identity.

However, as a result of complex cultural encounters, schisms, and incomplete proselytization, many of Russia’s ethnic minorities had a rather complex religious composition. Thus, while the attempts of the Russian Orthodox Church and the state at Christianization of the Muslim Tatars and Bashkirs (in the Volga area) in the sixteenth and eighteenth centuries largely failed, a small part of those groups became Christians; in addition, a considerable part of the Bashkirs continued their strong affiliation with Tenggerianism, their traditional ethn tribal religion. Although the church and state were more successful in converting “the pagans,” through force or missionary activities, often combined, those peoples continued to practice their traditional religions—for example, the Moksha and Erzia (both of whom are now called the Mordvinians), Chuvashes, Mari, Votiaks (now called Udmurts), all in the Volga area; and the Yakutians, Tunguns, and Chukchi in Siberia. Meanwhile, the Chuvashes had already been partly converted to Islam, and the Buddhist lamas only partially gained control over the Buriats in southern Siberia, whose northern tribes remained Shamanists.

In the late nineteenth century, within the borders of what is now the Russian Federation, Islam was the most significant religion, making up some 4 percent of the population (approximately four million people). Almost all of Russia’s Muslims were Sunnis of the Hanafite school. Historically, Islamic ethnic groups in Russia showed a combination of accommodation with the imperial state and Russian Orthodox majority on the one hand, and, on the other, a high awareness of their religious distinctiveness and association with the world community of Muslims (umma).

However, there were considerable differences between the kind of Islam that obtained among different ethnic groups, in particular between Islam in the European parts of Russia (mainly the Tatars and Bashkirs), and Islam of the peoples of the northern Caucasus (that is, the Chechens, Nogai, Kabardinians, Avars, Laks, and so forth). For instance, many Tatars interacted closely with the ethnically Russian population; their cultural elite were well integrated into wider Russian society, and some of their nobility converted to Eastern Orthodox Christianity. The Tatar capital Kazan’ was one of the major centers of European education in Russia. On the one hand, this resulted in a relatively high degree of secularism among the Tatar cultural elite. On the other, in the late nineteenth century, part of the national awakening was the movement of Jadidism (in Arabic, usul al-jadid, method of teaching), which sought to reinforce Islamic culture by modernization—that is, by combining return to the “authentic” Islam with European education, technology, and science.

In contrast, in the northern Caucasus in the nineteenth century, Islam was important as a source of resistance to Russian imperial expansion. There, the predominant form of Islam became Muridism, the mystical teachings of Sufi brotherhoods, which placed emphasis on the unconditional loyalty of followers (murids). In addition, in the mountainous regions of the northern Caucasus, Islam was closely intertwined with the pre-Islamic traditions of the highlanders. Geopolitically, this region was rather remote from central Russia and linked to the Islamic world, primarily to the Ottoman Empire.

Soviet religious policy had contradictory effects on the religions of ethnic minorities. On the one hand, their religious institutions, including clergy, were repressed, and their ethnoreligious traditions were destroyed (for example, in the 1930s, 97 percent of all mullahs and muezzins were either killed or otherwise unable to serve Muslim communities). On the other hand, part of the Soviet nationality policy was the declaration of the “right to self-determination,” which resulted in the creation of ethnic politico-administrative units (autonomous regions and republics) and the granting of a degree of cultural autonomy. This contributed to the preservation, and sometimes even the creation, of a sense of ethnic identity. However, with the demise of the Soviet Union, the Soviet elements in the ethnic symbolism became increasingly unsustainable, and religion reemerged as a powerful resource for reconstructing ethnic identities.

There are some identifiable trends in the reconstruction of ethnoreligious links among different ethnic groups in post-Soviet Russia. The cause of ethnoreligious awakening is usually taken up by local intellectuals and politicians, with rather insignificant participation by clergy. The issue of reconstructing ethnic religion is usually highly politicized and related to a number of local economic, social, and political issues, primarily the degree of independence from Russian federal authorities. At the cultural level, while the religious tradition was largely destroyed, there is an attempt to reinvent it by drawing on remaining memory and artifacts and to adjust it to the present cultural and political needs. Among some ethnic groups this attempt has taken the form of controversies over which elements of the ethnic religious heritage can be seen as representing “the authentic national religion”: for example, the debates between Christians and traditionalists among the Mordovians, Yakutians, Udmurtsians, and Mari, and the even more complex situation among the Chuvash, which include Muslims, Christians, and traditionalists. This is complicated by the fact that many regions have a high proportion of ethnic Russians who consider Eastern Orthodox Christianity their ethnic religion. In some ethnic regions (namely, the republics of Tyva and Buriatia), local authorities declared all major religions—referring to Buddhism, (Eastern) Orthodoxy, and Shamanism—their state religions. Finally, the ethnoreligious situation is further complicated by the presence of foreign missionaries who seek to educate and assist their cobelievers from Russia’s ethnic minorities; however, the missionaries and their cobelievers often discover considerable differences in beliefs, practice, and general culture.

The process of restoration of ethno-Islamic links gained much publicity because of its political implications and the fact that in post-Soviet Russia there are more than forty Muslim ethnic groups that total, according to different sources, between twelve and seventeen million—or between 8 and 12 percent of the population. Islamism has manifested itself in the sharply increased number of those claiming to be “believing Muslims” (among the ethnic Muslims of Tatarstan, from 36 percent in 1989 to 75 percent in 1994); the reconstruction and building of mosques; the spread of Islamic education; and the establishment of contacts with the umma. In the 1990s, missionaries from abroad, in particular from Saudi Arabia, played a considerable role in the development of religious education; in addition, around a thousand young Russian Muslims received a religious education in Islamic countries. There was also a movement for restoration of the tradition of Islamic law (Shari’ah); that, however, rarely went further than banning alcohol in public places and during Islamic holidays.

There emerged all-Russia Islamic movements, such as the Nur (Light) and the Union of Muslims of Russia, as well as regional Islamic political and cultural movements such as the Ittifak in Tatarstan and the Islamic Party in Dagestan. All these movements contain different trends, reflecting a number of issues associated with the larger Islamist Movement. Some activists (sometimes referred to as “traditionalists”) do not go beyond the desire to restore what they see as historic forms of Islam. Others (often called “national revivalists”) put emphasis on the restoration of national—that is, “Tatar,” “Bashkir,” or Chechen—forms of Islam, and look with apprehension on the activities of missionaries from the Middle East. Finally, some (sometimes called “reformists”) see Islam as a viable alternative to Westernization. Reformists assert that Islam should be restored to its “authentic state” at the time of the Prophet and the first Caliphs. Although that position has many features commonly attributed to what has been termed “Islamic fundamentalism,” reformists have been reluctant to align themselves with Muslim political fundamentalists from abroad. The current prominence of these positions is dependent on the general sociopolitical situation in particular regions and the degree to which local elites are interested in playing the “Islamic card.” In Tatarstan and some other regions, after an initial period of politicization, an “Islamic revival” took predominantly cultural forms. In contrast, in Chechnya, it became one of the bases on which the conflict has unfolded, but it was not the primary cause of the politico-military conflict over independence. At the same time, the conflict in Chechnya attracted representatives of the international Islamic fundamentalist networks.

In the early and mid-1990s, the Islamist Movement and Islamic fundamentalism often found support among various non-Islamic political forces in Russia. The “Democrats” associated it with post-Communist liberation, whereas the “Nationalists” saw it as part of “anti-Westernism.” However, the conflict in Chechnya and the threats associated with international Islamic terrorism damaged the image of many Islamic movements in Russia.

Marat S. Shterin

Sources:

- Akiner, S. Islamic Peoples of the Soviet Union: An Historical and Statistical Handbook. London: KPI, 1986.
- Balzer, M. M., ed. Shamanism: Soviet Studies of Traditional Religion in Siberia and Central Asia. Armonk, NY: M. E. Sharpe, 1990.
- Bennigsen, A., and S. E. Wimbush. Muslims of the Soviet Union: A Guide. London: Hurst, 1985.
- Bordeaux, M. A. Religious Minorities in the Soviet Union: A Report. London: Minority Rights Council, 1984.
- Kozlov, V. The Peoples of the Soviet Union. Translated by P. M. Tiffen. London: Hutchinson, 1988.
- Levin, N. Jews in the Soviet Union since 1917: Paradox of Survival. 2 vols. New York: New York University Press, 1988.
- Vakhtin, N. Native People of the Russian Far North. London: Minority Rights Group, 1982.

Russian Orthodox Church (Moscow Patriarchate)

The Orthodox (Eastern Christian) faith took root in what is now the Russian Federation long before Russia's emergence as a discrete political unit. Whereas more or less autonomous feudal princedoms were not integrated into the Kingdom of Moscow until the mid-sixteenth century, Orthodoxy had become the state religion of Kievan Rus in 988 C.E., when Grand Prince Vladimir of Kiev (c. 956–1015) decided to convert from traditional pagan beliefs to the Christianity of the Byzantine Rite. From then Byzantine Christianity became the faith of the three peoples who trace their origins to the Rus of Kiev: the Russians, Ukrainians, and Belarusians.

Christian Kiev entered a period of decline that culminated in 1240, when the city was destroyed during the Mongol invasion. By the fourteenth century a new political center grew up around the principality of Moscow, and the metropolitan of Kiev took up residence there. Later, Moscow was declared the metropolitan see in its own right. Gradual centralization of power in Moscow paved the way for administrative and ideological transformations in what became the Russian Orthodox Church (ROC).

Initially, the ROC came under the titular jurisdiction of the ECUMENICAL PATRIARCHATE in Constantinople, which assumed the power to appoint the Russian metropolitan and bishops. However, Russia gained more political power in the centuries following Constantinople's fall to the Turks in 1453. The shift in power culminated in 1448, when Grand Duke Vasily (1415–1462) bade the Council of Russian Bishops to designate Bishop Jonas to the metropolitan position. Not only was the Moscow metropolitan now independent, but henceforth the czar (and later the emperor) would be considered the champion and protector of the Orthodox faith. In 1589 the ROC achieved its full canonical (lawful) independence, or autocephaly, when Czar Boris Godunov (c. 1551–1605) forced the patriarch of Constantinople to enthrone Bishop Iov as the first patriarch of Moscow and All Russia. The Russian Church now deemed itself the successor to Byzantine Orthodoxy by assuming the designation of Moscow as the Third Rome: the first Rome being said to have fallen into heresy and the New Rome, Constantinople, having fallen under the Turks.

In the mid-seventeenth century a schism occurred in the ROC when Patriarch Nikon (1605–1681) reformed a number of liturgical usages. Those who refused to follow the reforms and continued the old Russian features of the Orthodox liturgy came to be known as the OLD BELIEVERS. By the beginning of the eighteenth century, the ROC had totally lost its independence as it was brought under direct state supervision. In 1721, Emperor Peter the Great (1672–1725) abolished the position of patriarch, and the ROC was subsequently administrated by the Holy Synod, headed by a secular official, the attorney-general, who was appointed by the emperor.

Through the Russian Empire, the ROC now operated as the exclusive state church. Orthodoxy came to be seen as emblematic of Russian statehood, and religion played an important role in the empire's geographic expansion. In fact, the state's cultural unity and integrity was based on three major premises: the influx of ethnically Russian colonists, the processes of cultural-linguistic Russification, and the inclusion of new lands into the canonical territory of the ROC. According to the 1897 Census, of the Russian Empire's 125 million residents, 72 percent were Orthodox, 9.2 percent were Catholics, 3.0 percent were Protestants, 11.1 percent were Muslims, 4.2 percent were followers of JUDAISM, and 0.4 percent were Buddhists.

In August 1917, as the first stage of the Russian revolution unfolded, a synod of ROC bishops reestablished the Russian Patriarchate and elected Metropolitan Tikhon (1865–1925) to the position of patriarch. Two months later, however, the Communists assumed control. The legal separation of church and state was declared, and a state policy of atheism was assumed. The ROC bore the brunt of the general antireligious policy because of its symbolic relationship to the deposed monarchy. During the first generation of Soviet rule, the number of Orthodox parishes dropped from 778,000 (1917) to only 31,000 (1941). The majority of surviving parishes were located in Moldova, western Ukraine, and western Belarus—territories annexed to the USSR only in 1939–1940. In the twenty-five administrative provinces (oblasts) in what is now the Russian Federation there was not a single functioning Orthodox parish as World War II came to a close. After World War II, repression relaxed somewhat and a few parishes reopened. However, both clergy and lay members suffered considerable civil disability.

In the late 1980s, the political liberalization under President Mikhail Gorbachev (b. 1931) led to a gradual lifting of restrictions on church activities, prominently displayed in the 1988 celebration of the millennium of Orthodox Christianity in Russia, which was recognized by the state as a national event. The Gorbachev reforms created the conditions for the dynamic development of the ROC, and by 1988 the church had some seven thousand active parishes served by sixty-seven hundred priests. There were also twenty-one monasteries and five theological educational institutions. As the twenty-first century began, the church counted more than nineteen thousand parishes served by eighteen thousand priests, with five hundred monasteries and ninety-two educational institutions, including five theological academies, twenty-six theological seminaries, thirty theological schools, three Orthodox universities, and twenty-eight icon-painting schools.

Today some 50–60 million Russian citizens recognize themselves as Orthodox (some 33 to 40 percent of the total population), although only 10–15 percent of those who identify themselves as Orthodox attend church services at least once a month. With the exception of the few traditionally Islamic and Buddhist administrative provinces of Russia, Orthodoxy is the predominant religion across the country. The majority of Russian citizens still identify themselves as nonreligious.

The ROC began to expand internationally in the eighteenth century, but it did not experience considerable growth until the decades following the Russian revolution. Bishops who had been part of the ROC established dioceses among the Russian diaspora worldwide. These dioceses were more or less independent administratively, and many were eventually lost to the church altogether as they joined the RUSSIAN ORTHODOX CHURCH OUTSIDE OF RUSSIA, which refused to cooperate with the Moscow patriarch during the years of Communist rule and has subsequently rejected the patriarchate's policies. Since the fall of the Soviet Union, the dioceses around the world have been able to reposition themselves in relation to the patriarchate. Today, more than half of its parishes and 55 of 130 dioceses of the ROC are located outside Russia.

In Russia, Ukraine, and Belarus, where Orthodox believers constitute a majority of the population, the ROC remains a significant institutional and spiritual power that still unites these Slavic states following the breakup of the Soviet Union. In other former Soviet republics, the parishes of the ROC serve as important ethnocultural centers that consolidate the minority Slavic population, especially in the Baltic and Central Asian states. As the new century begins, in the Russian Federation itself there are sixty-five dioceses and about eighty-three hundred parishes. In the Ukraine, the dioceses of the ROC were reorganized in 1990 into the autonomous Ukrainian Orthodox Church (see UKRAINE, EASTERN ORTHODOXY IN). In three other former Soviet republics, autonomous national Orthodox churches were established under the canonical jurisdiction of the ROC, namely, in Moldavia (since 1992, four dioceses), in Latvia (one diocese), and in Estonia (one diocese). These now exist as the Moldavian Orthodox Church, the Latvian Orthodox Church, and the ESTONIAN APOSTOLIC ORTHODOX CHURCH. Ten dioceses of the ROC in Belarus form the Belarusian Exarchate, now seen as a regional grouping of dioceses united for purposes of day-to-day administration.

In other post-Soviet states, ROC dioceses remain under the direct supervision of and subordinate to the Moscow Patriarchate. There is one diocese in Lithuania. Kazakhstan is divided into three dioceses. The predominantly Islamic Central Asian post-Soviet states, including the republics of Uzbekistan, Kyrgyzstan, Turkmenistan, and Tadjikistan, are united into one diocese headquartered at Tashkent, Uzbekistan. There are no parishes of the ROC in Georgia, where the GEORGIAN ORTHODOX CHURCH is autocephalous. The two dioceses of the ROC in Armenia and Azerbaijan also incorporate parishes from the neighboring provinces of the Russian Federation.

Additional churches related to the Moscow Patriarchate exist in many other countries. The ORTHODOX CHURCH IN CHINA was granted autonomy in 1957, and the HOLY ORTHODOX CHURCH IN JAPAN became autonomous in 1970. In Western Europe, there are six dioceses of the ROC, and a South American diocese includes parishes in Panama, Argentina, Colombia, Brazil, Chile, Peru, and Costa Rica. Although most North American parishes of the Russian tradition are part of the ORTHODOX CHURCH IN AMERICA, the smaller patriarchal parishes of the Russian Orthodox Church (thirty-one in the United States and twenty-five in Canada) constitute a body in direct subordination to the Moscow Patriarchate, without local diocesan structures. There are also individual parishes of the ROC in Australia, the Czech Republic, Finland, Iran, Mexico, Mongolia, Morocco, Norway, Sweden, South Africa, and Tunisia.

The Russian Orthodox Church has become active in the political life of the new Russian Federation, especially on matters that it feels directly affect its role and status in society. However, Orthodox priests and bishops are not allowed to be members of political parties or to participate in electoral campaigns. Various official agreements have been signed between the church and government agencies to create a legal framework of collaboration between the state and church in the spheres of charity, social work, education, preservation of cultural heritage, and the like.

In 2000, the ROC articulated its relation with society, state, and with non-Orthodox Christian churches in two documents, the Bases of the Social Concept of the Russian Orthodox Church and the Basic Principles of the Attitude of the Russian Orthodox Church toward the Other Christian Confessions. In the first document, the church called upon members to “obey the state and pray for it, while taking into account its separate nature. The goal of the church is the eternal salvation of people, while the goal of state is their well-being on earth.” In the second document, the church asserted that Christian unity can only occur in the “bosom of the One, Holy, Catholic and Apostolic Church.” Therefore, it could not recognize the equality of the different (especially Protestant) denominations. In spite of this stance, the church has remained a member of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES.

The Russian Orthodox Church is headed by Patriarch Alexy II of Moscow and All Russia. Although the total membership is difficult to estimate, in the three former Soviet republics of Russia, Ukraine, and Belarus, the number of Orthodox Christians is close to 90 million, which makes the ROC the largest of the Eastern Christian churches around the world.

Alexei D. Krindatch

Address:

Russian Orthodox Church
Danilov Monastery
Danilovsky Val 22
113, 191 Moscow
Russian Federation
<http://www.russian-orthodox-church.org.ru> (in Russian)
<http://www.russian-orthodox-church.org.ru/en.htm> (in English)

Sources:

- Krindatch, Alexei. Geography of Religions in Russia. Decatur, GA: Glenmary Research Center, 1996.
- Polonsky, A. 1998. “The Orthodox Church and Society in the Post-Communist Russia” (in Russian). In Factor etnoconfessionalnoj samobytnosti v postsovetском obshestve. Moscow: Karnegi Center, 1998.
- Pospelovsky, D. The Russian Church under the Soviet Regime, 1917–1982. Crestwood, NY: St. Vladimir’s Seminary Press, 1984.

Russian Orthodox Church Outside of Russia

In the years following the 1917 revolution in Russia and the defeat of the anticommunist White Armies, a first wave of emigration drove up to 2 million people into exile. A majority of them were members of the RUSSIAN ORTHODOX CHURCH, who now needed to organize their religious activities in new circumstances because communication with the Mother Church in Russia was difficult. Already cut from contact with the Moscow Patriarchate during the civil war in Russia, hierarchs in the southern Russian zones under the control of the White Armies had created in May 1919 a Provisional Supreme Administration of the Church for South Russia. This move was approved by the church in November 1920, when a decree (ukaz) from Patriarch Tikhon (1865–1925) gave to bishops deprived of contact with the central administration of the church the right to organize themselves into a higher entity of ecclesiastical authority.

In November 1921 a council of Russian Orthodox emigrants gathered in Sremski Karlovci (Serbia). There were thirteen bishops in exile among the one hundred participants. Probably under pressure from the Soviet authorities, Patriarch Tikhon dissolved the Provisional Administration in 1922. The church in exile obeyed, but it immediately reorganized itself again in accordance with the patterns set in the 1920 decree: the Synod of Bishops would serve as the central church authority among the emigrants. This marked the beginning of what is known today as the Russian Orthodox Church Outside of Russia (ROCOR), also called the Russian Orthodox Church Abroad. Intermittent contacts with Moscow continued for a few years, insofar as the circumstances of those difficult times allowed, but a complete break came in 1927, when Metropolitan Sergius (1867–1944), administrator of the Moscow Patriarchate, requested a written expression of loyalty from the clergy in exile to the Soviet regime.

The Russian church in exile at first presented a united front, but soon divisions intervened, and large groups of Russian clergy and faithful in France (a stronghold of the emigration) and in the United States left the Russian Synod. In addition, during World War II and immediately following it, the ROCOR saw the loss of the numerous parishes in Eastern Europe and China, with emigrants resettling a second time in the West or in Australia. The headquarters of the synod had to leave Serbia, and finally relocated in 1949 in the United States. Due to the new geopolitical environment and the efforts of the Russian Orthodox Church under Soviet control to reinforce its links with the other Orthodox churches as well as other Christian denominations, active relations between the ROCOR and other religious bodies gradually decreased, although friendly contacts have persisted to this day with some, especially the GREEK ORTHODOX PATRIARCHATE OF JERUSALEM and the SERBIAN ORTHODOX CHURCH. After the 1960s, the ROCOR itself also became increasingly critical of the involvement of Orthodox churches in the ecumenical movement. On the other hand, during the Soviet period, the ROCOR was held in high esteem by the believers of the so-called Catacomb Church, who led a clandestine religious life in Russia.

Although precise statistics are not available, the ROCOR probably numbers today less than 150,000 faithful, including converts of non-Russian origin who feel attracted by its conservative stance. After the fall of the Soviet Union, some people or groups in Russia asked to be accepted into the jurisdiction of the ROCOR and formed a Free Russian Orthodox Church, but the movement did not grow very large and suffered divisions. In recent years, there have been increasing tensions within the ROCOR between those open to a dialogue with the Patriarchate of Moscow and those who reject entirely such overtures.

Ruthenian Catholic Church

Address:

Russian Orthodox Church Outside of Russia
75 E. 93rd St.
New York, NY 10128
<http://www.rocor.org/> (in Russian and English)

Jean-François Mayer

Sources:

- Antić, Oxana. "The Russian Orthodox Church Abroad." In Eastern Christianity and Politics in the Twentieth Century, edited by Pedro Ramet, 135–145. Durham, NC, and London: Duke University Press, 1988.
- Seide, Georg. Verantwortung in der Diaspora: Die Russische Orthodoxe Kirche im Ausland. Munich: Kyrill & Method Verlag, 1989.
- Young, Alexey. The Russian Orthodox Church outside Russia: A History and Chronology. San Bernardino, CA: Borgo Press, 1993.

Ruthenian Catholic Church

The Ruthenian Catholic Church is a Greek Byzantine church that has its base in the Carpathian Mountains of southwestern Ukraine, Slovakia, and southeastern Poland. Ruthenians speak a Ukrainian dialect but identify ethnically as Rusyns, not Ukrainians. Christianity began to be propagated late in the first millennium C.E., and following the break between the ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH and EASTERN ORTHODOXY in 1054, the Ruthenian church adhered to Eastern Orthodoxy. At about the same time, the area came under Hungarian control.

In the centuries after Hungary, a Roman Catholic nation, established its rule in Slovakia and western Ukraine, priests began to agitate for the Orthodox church to come into communion with Rome. In 1646, sixty-three Orthodox priests, primarily from what is today Slovakia, entered the Roman Catholic Church. The act of receiving them, called the Union of Uzhorod, occurred at a town on the Ukrainian-Slovakian border. Two additional acts of conversion to Roman Catholicism occurred in the Ukraine in 1664 and 1713. As a result of these events, Eastern Orthodoxy all but disappeared from the region.

Through the eighteenth century, a battle for control of the Ruthenians ensued between local bishops, who followed the Latin Rite, and those priests who represented the Orthodox converts and continued to use a Slavic Rite. Then in 1771, a Ruthenian bishop was elected and made the head of a Ruthenian eparchy (diocese). A Ruthenian seminary was established in 1778 at Uzhorod. Thus, the Ruthenian Catholic Church (also known as the Byzantine Catholic Church) emerged as a distinctive ethnic church that continued a variety of Eastern Orthodox traditions (including a married priesthood) and strongly identified with the Rusyn people of Transcarpathia.

Following World War I and the breakup of the Hungarian Empire, the region was incorporated into the new nation of Czechoslovakia, and in the 1920s one group left the church and returned to Orthodoxy. Then following World War II, the area east of Uzhorod became part of the Soviet Union. Pressure was exerted in the Ukraine to force the church back into Orthodoxy, and its parishes were placed under the RUSSIAN ORTHODOX CHURCH and its patriarch in Moscow. In like measure, an effort was made to destroy the Ruthenian church in Poland and Czechoslovakia. In the meantime, more than five hundred thousand Rusyns had migrated to the United States. However, they found that the American Roman Catholic hierarchy was opposed to the continuance of the traditional practices of the Ruthenian Church, especially the married priesthood. The majority of Rusyns in the United States reverted to Orthodoxy, and a few became Protestants.

The revival of the Ruthenian Catholic Church began after the disruption of the Soviet Union. In January 1991 the Vatican reestablished the Eparchy of Mukachevo (Ukraine) and appointed a new bishop. An estimated five hundred thousand Rusyn Catholics remained in the region. The seminary was reopened in Uzhorod in 1992. The status of the church in the Ukraine remains open, as both the UKRAINIAN CATHOLIC CHURCH and the Ukrainian Orthodox Church (see UKRAINE, EASTERN ORTHODOXY IN) have been reestablished in the now independent nation.

The first eparchy of the Ruthenian Catholic Church was established in the United States in 1924. There are now four American dioceses, with national leadership provided by the metropolitan, who resides in Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania. Some two hundred thousand Ruthenian Catholics reside in the United States. Ruthenian Catholics also reside in Australia and Western Europe, but most are largely integrated into the Ukrainian Catholic Church.

Address:

Ruthenian Catholic Church
Zakarpatska 18
294017 Uzhorod
Ukraine
<http://www.byzcath.org/> (Web site of the Byzantine Catholic Churches in America)

Sources:

- Liesel, N. The Eastern Catholic Liturgies: A Study in Words and Pictures. Westminster, MD: Newman Press, 1960
- Roberson, Ronald G. The Eastern Christian Churches: A Brief Survey. 5th ed. Rome: Edizioni Orientalia Christiana, Pontificio Istituto Orientale, 1995.

Rwanda

Rwanda became an independent nation in 1962, when Belgium handed over political authority to a democratically chosen government under Grégoire Kayibanda (1924–1976), Rwanda's first president. Rwanda is a small country in the heart of the Great Lakes region in Africa, just south of the equator. It counted 3.5 million inhabitants, of whom 95 percent were subsistence farmers who lived on the hills that are for the greater part covered with fertile soil.

In 1885–1886, the Conference of Berlin allotted Rwanda to the German Empire, but only in 1896 did troops start to impose German authority. Before that date, the dreaded spears of the Rwandese kings had been able to keep slaves traders from the coast area and European explorers at a distance. The oral history of the kingdom was well recorded by the court aristocracy, and modern historians trace them back to the fourteenth or even the tenth century.

In the eighteenth century, anthropologists saw the Rwandese kingdom, in which the minority of Tutsi dominated the majority of Hutu and a small minority of Batwa, in the light of the Hamitic hypothesis, according to which the Batutsi belonged to the Nilo-hamitic race. According to this hypothesis, the Batutsi had entered the country with their great herds of cattle in several stages in the twelfth and thirteenth centuries. In the course of the last few centuries they had gradually subjected the Hutu agriculturalists of the Bantu race, who themselves had steadily deforested the hills since their arrival between the seventh and tenth centuries. These Bahutu had driven into the remaining forests the original pygmoid race of the Batwa, who were hunters.

Modern Rwandese historians and some Western scholars consider the Hamitic hypothesis as a way for European scholars to explain how highly developed cultures and organizations could be discovered in Black Africa, where the backward Negro could not have created such civilizations. They claimed, therefore, that the Hamitic race was of Asian or even European origin (Sanders 1969). The fact is that the Rwandese oral history does not say anything about invading cattle farmers who gradually took the dominant position. The Banyarwanda (people of Rwanda)—the Tutsi,

Status of religions in Rwanda, 2000–2050

Followers	2000			2025	2050
	total	%	rate
Christians	6,397,000	82.7	1.17	10,787,000	14,151,000
Roman Catholics	3,942,000	51.0	1.12	6,750,000	8,909,000
Protestants	1,620,000	21.0	1.36	2,710,000	3,500,000
Anglicans	600,000	7.8	0.00	1,000,000	1,300,000
Ethnoreligionists	695,000	9.0	-0.21	600,000	417,000
Muslims	613,000	7.9	0.98	980,000	1,325,000
Baha'is	14,200	0.2	1.29	30,000	60,000
Hindus	11,600	0.2	1.50	25,000	45,000
Nonreligious	2,200	0.0	0.92	5,000	10,000
Total population	7,733,000	100.0	1.02	12,427,000	16,008,000

Hutu, and Twa—speak one language (Kinyarwanda, classified within the Bantu languages), share the same religious concepts and costumes, and have the same family traditions. The Hamitic hypothesis leaves unexplained why fifteen out of the eighteen Rwandese clans show a mixture of Batutsi, Bahutu, and Batwa.

Some lineages within the Batutsi group created their own identity, which in the nineteenth century strengthened the kingdom under the leadership of the Banyiginya clan, which is exclusively Batutsi. The kingdom developed an expansive power and gained hegemony over the greater part of Rwanda. This development created a growing tension between Bahutu and Batutsi, which were more and more seen as exclusive classes, although there always remained Batutsi without political influence and Bahutu who took leading positions in the Banyiginya kingdom. Until the beginning of the twentieth century, a number of small more or less independent monarchies subsisted with a king (mwami) who belonged to the Bahutu group.

After World War I, the League of Nations conferred Rwanda to Belgium as a trustee area. The Belgian regime introduced an administrative reform in which leadership was exclusively given to Batutsi people. Thus, the distinction between Hutu and Tutsi was rigidified. The antagonism between classes turned into a struggle between what were considered different races, leading to a bloody social revolution in 1959 and continued turmoil within the Hutu-dominated government that assumed control from Belgium in 1962. At that point, some ten thousand Batutsi, many of them of the former ruling class, sought refuge in neighboring countries.

Denied the right to return, a second generation of these refugees attacked the country in 1990, heightening tensions between the two groups, now called Hutu and Tutsi, and culminating in the genocide of April–June 1994, in which more than five hundred thousand Tutsi and a considerable number of moderate Hutu were assassinated. Out of fear of the strong Tutsi-dominated invasion army, between 2 and 3 million Hutu then fled the country and stayed in refugee camps in Zaire/Congo and Tanzania until they were forced to return in 1996–1997. Upon their return they found a disrupted society of 8 million people, characterized by hatred, mistrust, grief, and mourning.

From ancient times, the Rwandese people have been characterized by a religious consciousness that permeates all life—procreation, cattle breeding and agriculture, and the building of a homestead. They feel a strong relationship and even kinship with nature, which explains their respect for the environment. Humans are surrounded by an invisible world of spirits who influence human life. To this spiritual world belong the spirits of the ancestors (abazimu), who for some generations after their death participate in the life of the family. These ancestors need not be feared if people live in harmony and according to the rules of life that the forebears left as their testament. Illness, barrenness, and misfortune may be interpreted as punishment or revenge of the ancestors, reminding their offspring of the proper behavior. Ancestors are to be distinguished from bad spirits or malevolent forces, often of unknown origin (amahembe or ibitega). Bad forces may be used by personal enemies who act in a hidden way, only known and influenced by sorcerers (abarozi). In case of illness or misfortune, diviners (abapfumu) are consulted in order to detect the character and the meaning of the spiritual force behind it.

The idea of relations between human beings and God is a fundamental notion in Rwandese religion. Humans are seen not as isolated persons but always in relationship to fellow humans and nature. The closest relationship is with the members of one's family, which includes several groups: the inzu, or minor lineage, one's father, mother, brothers and sisters; the umuryango, or major lineage, one's family in a larger sense; the ubwoko, or clan, a broader entity of families, the membership of which is decisive for the rules of marriage. Individuals may enter into relationship with the spiritual world, enjoy the blessings from that world, and participate in its forces.

God, or Imana, is creator (Rurema) of the Earth and of the humans who reside there. Christian theologians have depicted Imana as transcendent, fitting the basic concept of God according to Christianity. Anthropologists have tended to describe Imana as the sacred dimension of life as it determines human destiny, gives fecundity, and yields wealth or poverty. According to some well-known myths, Imana once lived very close to people, and his most favorite activity was the cradling of babies. However, one day a young couple discovered Imana in their compound. They saw him as an intruding stranger, with their child in his arms. In defense the man aimed his arrow in the direction of Imana, who, since this unhappy misunderstanding, has never been seen again. According to an oft-cited proverb, Imana dwells all over the Earth during the day, but prefers to spend the night in the beloved Rwanda.

Traditional Rwandan religious consciousness involves no specific cultic manifestations of worship but is manifest in the celebration of the rites of passage, specifically the cults of Ryangombe, or kubandwa, and the cult of Nyabingi. Ryangombe is a mythical hero who died a tragic death. Before he died, he appealed in agony to Batutsi, Bahutu, and Batwa people to be initiated into societies that honor him. The Ryangombe rite consists of cult sessions with dancing and singing, through which people are initiated into kubandwa societies. Initiates (imandwa) receive their own new secret name. Misfortunes, such as barrenness and illness, and natural disasters, such as drought, may intensify the Ryangombe cult sessions. Giving honor to Ryangombe provides protection against evil spirits. The Ryangombe cult has its parallels in other parts of the Great Lakes region. Traditionally, as Hutu, Tutsi, and Twa participated together in it, the cult created social cohesion. Only the sacred king (mwami) could not participate in the initiation.

In the northern part of the country the cult of Nyabingi has a greater popularity. According to the myth, the woman named Nyabingi did not become a normal spirit (umuzimu) after her death, but instead she turned into a medium by whom one can be possessed through trance. Women may be cured from barrenness if they "have Nyabingi" (bagirwa, being possessed).

The first Christian missionaries to arrive in Rwanda were the WHITE FATHERS. This order of the ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH worked according to clear-cut missionary principles: gaining a deep knowledge of the people, establishing a four-year catechism according to the model of the ancient church, and trying to convert first the supreme political authority, who then will help with the conversion of the great masses. Rwanda, with its well-organized society headed by a king as absolute ruler, was an ideal place to apply these principles. Eager to precede Muslims and Protestants, the White Fathers quickly established parishes in all parts of the country, ten having been opened by the time the Germans were expelled in 1916.

In 1907 the first Protestant missionaries, German Lutherans, arrived as representatives of the Bethel Mission (the Evangelical Mission Society for German Eastern-Africa, or Evangelische Missionsgesellschaft für Deutsch-Ostafrika). One of their prominent missionaries, Ernst Johanssen (1864–1934), saw the African religion as a human answer to the divine revelation of the one God who communicates with all humankind. He studied Rwandese customs and religion in order “to trace the radiation of God’s Glory hidden in the African religion.” The German Lutherans founded eight missionary stations, along with two commercial missions to compete with the Muslim traders. When forced to leave in 1916, the Lutherans had already edited a translation of the four Gospels and a textbook in the Rwandese language.

The White Fathers continued their missionary work into the twenties and provided the new patterns for structuring Rwandan society. By 1994 the Roman Catholic Church controlled more than half of all primary and secondary schools and sponsored a large number of hospitals. Missionaries became advisors to Belgian authorities, and Vicar Apostolic Léon Classe especially promoted the influence of the Tutsi, being convinced that they were born to rule.

In 1931, after King Yuhi V Musinga (1883–1944) refused to convert, Monseigneur Classe advised that he be dismissed and sent into exile. His successor, King Mutara III Rudahigwa (1913–1959), was baptized in 1943, and three years later he allocated his country to Christ. Prompted by the king’s action, almost all the aristocracy presented themselves for baptism, and the Hutu were encouraged to do the same. People spoke of the Tornado of Mission. From that time onward, Christianity, and especially the Catholic Church, saw tremendous growth. In 1950, 25 percent of the population were counted as belonging to the Catholic Church, increasing to 34 percent in 1961 and 50 percent in 1988.

Only after World War II did leaders perceive the weakness of the missionary strategy. A new generation of priests, influenced by the ideas of Catholic Action and social democracy, saw the injustices of Rwandese class society. Previously, the rigid classification of the Rwandese as either Tutsi or Hutu resulted in their identification with the oppressors and the oppressed, respectively. Unfortunately, the new message of the equality of all people worked only to strengthen the identity of individuals as either Hutu or Tutsi, resulting in an even more rigid division of the population.

Catholic missionaries then began to promote the interests of the majority Hutu. On the eve of independence, the Hutu, supported by the church, started a social revolution. Under Rwanda’s first president, Grégoire Kayibanda, the ruling party pursued a policy of ethnic equilibrium, through which jobs and positions were divided according to the percentage of Hutu (85 percent) and Tutsi (15 percent). This policy was continued by the successor government, led by General Juvénal Habyarimana (1937–1994), who took over power in a bloodless military revolution in 1973.

After 1921 the Belgian Protestant Missionary Society (Société Belge des Missions Protestants au Congo) continued the work of the German Lutherans, thus accounting for the existence of a strong Presbyterian Church (rather than Lutheran) in the country. The society represented a minority faction in Belgium, and its progress was initially hampered by lack of finances and personnel. In the course of time other Protestant missionary organizations followed: the SEVENTH-DAY ADVENTIST CHURCH from the United States (1916), Anglicans of the CHURCH MISSIONARY SOCIETY (1921), Danish Baptists (1938), Swedish Pentecostals (1940), and the FREE METHODIST CHURCH (1942).

Within the Church Missionary Society, a revival movement developed that, in the thirties and forties, exercised great influence among Protestants in neighboring Burundi, Uganda, Tanzania, and Kenya. This movement, called the East-African Revival, typically sponsored “conventions,” large meetings where people gathered for praying and singing, hearing sermons, and giving testimonies. The 1945 Kabale Convention attracted an international audience of fifteen thousand. Devoted members of the movement, called abake (people on fire), or abalokole (those who are saved), experienced a heightened joy, visions and dreams, and an absence of any color bar between White and Black. The abake struggled for equality between Hutu and Tutsi, promoted strong participation by women, and placed African leadership at the head of the movement. The movement led to independent churches in other countries, and in Rwanda it remains an influential movement within the Anglican community.

Around 1959–1962, the Protestant missions were transformed into independent church organizations, which then collaborated in founding the Conseil Protestant du Rwanda (CPR). From then on, an emancipation of the Protestants from foreign control became evident. The theological school in Butare, founded in 1971, developed into a Theological Faculty in which most mainline Protestants (including the Pentecostals) participate. In 1988 all Protestants together represented 20 percent of the population, less than half that of Catholics. Today there are two ecumenical organizations serving the Protestant community, the Alliance Evangélique du Rwanda, which is affiliated with the WORLD EVANGELICAL ALLIANCE, and the Protestant Council, which is affiliated with the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES.

The genocide of 1994 left all the churches in deep crisis. Almost one-third of the clergy had been Tutsi, of whom a majority were murdered. Those who had held leading positions, mostly Hutu, fled the country. Returning Tutsi refugees added to the controversy by attempting to seize leading positions. Past racial ideology and present internal problems prevented the churches from becoming healing communities. The Catholic Church was singled out for criticism by the new Tutsi-dominated government, which derided its assumed policy of divisionism, seen as the ultimate cause of the genocide.

After 1994 a number of new AFRICAN INITIATED CHURCHES were created, most of them at the initiative of Tutsi returnees who did not want to reintegrate into the older churches so associated with the genocide. Thus, inadvertently and for the first time in Rwandese history, churches were founded on an ethnic basis. Most of these new communities participate in the Charismatic/Pentecostal movement, which is also influencing the older mainline churches. This new charismatic wave is characterized by strong eschatological preaching, baptism by immersion, and long sessions of ecstatic prayer.

After 1994, Islam was no longer considered by the government and by the public news agencies to be an inferior religion. Muslims had been present in Rwanda since the beginning of the twentieth century, the first being African soldiers serving in the German colonial army. The Germans also promoted the immigration of merchants and craftspeople, some of whom were Muslims, but at the same time they took measures to prevent any spread of Islam among the population.

The marginal position of Muslims in Rwanda was accentuated under Belgian rule, the Muslims being viewed as German partisans. Muslims were denied permission to create their own associations, and only in 1964 did Rwandese authorities recognize the Association of Muslims in Rwanda (AMUR). In 1970 about 8 percent of the population was Sunni Muslim. Then in 1994, Muslim Tutsis returning from their exile gave the community a new self-consciousness, claiming that Muslims had not participated in the genocide. Muslim missions began to attract great audiences. Schools were installed, and the end of Ramadan became an official national holiday. At his installation in January 2001, Sheikh Saleh Hategekimana claimed that Muslims, with about 120 mosques scattered throughout the country, represent 18 percent of the population.

Since 1996, the Butare-based Ecumenical Centre for Theological Education and Research (CORVT) has developed a dialogue program in which Protestants, Catholics, and Muslims participate. On a regular basis the Ecumenical Centre organizes seminars where prominent leaders of these communities discuss together the social problems of the country.

Gerard van 't Spijker

Sources:

- Berger, Iris. Religion and Resistance: East African Kingdoms in the Precolonial Period. Tervuren, Belgium: Musée Royal de l'Afrique Centrale, Serie IN-80, no. 105, 1985.
- Gatwa, Tharcisse. Rwanda. Eglises: Victimes ou Coupables. Les Eglises et l'idéologie ethnique au Rwanda, 1900–1994. Lomé, Togo, and Taoundé, Cameroun: Editions CLE/Haho, 2001.
- Kasule, O. H. "Muslims in Rwanda: A Status Report." Journal of the Institute of Muslim Minority Affairs 3, 1–2 (1982): 133–144.
- Prunier, Gérard. The Rwanda Crisis 1959–1994: History of a Genocide. New York: Columbia University Press, 1997.
- Sanders, Edith. "The Hamitic Hypothesis: Its Origins and Function in Time Perspective." Journal of African History 10, 4 (1969): 521–532.
- van 't Spijker, Gerard. "Religion in Rwanda after the Genocide." Studies in Interreligious Dialogue 9, 2 (1999): 165–177.

Sahaja Yoga

Sahaja Yoga was founded by Sri Mataji Nirmala Devi (b. 1923). She was the eldest daughter of an Indian barrister and enjoyed an affluent childhood in a Protestant family before marrying a successful diplomat, Sir C. P. Srivastava. In the late 1960s she became a follower of Osho Rajneesh, but left his circle and was highly critical of him thereafter. In 1970, we are told, she became “fully realized,” simultaneously enabling others to achieve spiritual “realization” effortlessly. She then began to attract followers herself, initially in India, then in London, where she was based, and in increasing numbers throughout the world. Nine years later she revealed her divine identity as the Adi Shakti (primordial creatrix), and to committed followers she is the Goddess, returned to save the world. Sri Mataji travels widely in order to spread her “global religion.” Her movement now claims a presence in seventy-five countries, each with its own national leader, and has approximately twenty thousand converts.

Sahaja Yoga practices combine principles of TANTRISM with rituals and symbols from other traditions, especially from South Asia, and the majority are performed to banish negativity or to purify. Meditation is described as the raising of the spiritual energy of kundalini, usually dormant at the base of the spine, through chakras, spiritual centers in the body, which are cleansed of impurities as it passes. When the process is complete, spontaneous union with “The All Pervading Power” is achieved, and individuals experience a cool breeze on the palms of their hands and the top of their heads. This union is said to cure serious illnesses, to leave practitioners feeling relaxed and balanced, and to lead to increasing sensitivity, both to their own spiritual vibrations and those of others. Sri Mataji’s image is felt to be particularly purifying, and members cherish photographs of her surrounded by miraculous light, or accompanied by deities. Sahaja Yoga puja (ceremonies) involve the worship of Sri Mataji in her different divine aspects.

Sri Mataji promotes arranged marriages between devotees of different nationalities, and these take place, in groups of up to 120 couples, either at international pujas or on the annual India Tour. She advises women to act as the “heart” of their families, and men as the “head,” and the vast majority of the leaders in Sahaja Yoga are men. There are two Sahaja Yoga schools, in Rome and Dharamsala, where children of members board. Additionally, the movement runs a number of nongovernmental organizations, including a hospital dedicated to healing according to the principles of Sahaja Yoga. Notwithstanding Sri Mataji’s teaching that “truth cannot be owned,” her tax-free annual income from Sahaja Yoga activities has been estimated at more than $2 million, and devotees have subsidized the purchase and renovation of a number of properties where she lives, including castles outside Poona, India, and Cabella, Italy, as well as a chateau in France. In the past, concerns have been voiced over her at times authoritarian treatment of her followers, and for the welfare of the children in Sahaja Yoga schools.

The international headquarters of the movement is now in the United Kingdom and may be contacted through its Internet site at <http://sahajayoga.org>.

Judith M. Fox

Sources:

- Coney, Judith. Sahaja Yoga: Socializing Processes in a South Asian New Religious Movement. Richmond, UK: Curzon 1999.
Sri Mataji Nirmala Devi. Meta-Modern Era. North Wales, PA: Vishwa Nirmala Dharma, 1997.

Sahara

The Sahara, officially known as Al-Jumhuriyah as-Sahara al-Arabiyyah as Dimuqratiyah, or the Sahara Arab Democratic Republic, is a sparsely populated country with approximately 300,000 people at the beginning of the twenty-first century. It is located on the Atlantic Ocean south of Morocco, most of the land being the westernmost segment of the Sahara desert. The land was originally populated by Moors, Tubus, and Tuaregs (by the fifth century C.E.). Several centuries later a number of Yemenites moved into the area and intermarried with the residents, thus producing the dominant Sahrawi people who reside in the country. In the eleventh century the first Sahara confederacy emerged, and in future centuries it would be incorporated into the territory of different kingdoms based in neighboring countries.

Status of religions in Sahara, 2000-2050

Followers	2000			2025	2050
	total	%	rate
Muslims	292,000	99.4	3.61	467,000	586,000
Nonreligious	880	0.3	3.93	1,800	3,500
Christians	490	0.2	0.57	700	1,100
Independents	350	0.1	2.93	600	900
Roman Catholics	140	0.1	-3.50	100	200
Atheists	260	0.1	1.43	400	600
Baha'is	120	0.0	1.92	200	300
Total population	293,000	100.0	3.60	470,000	591,000

The Mud Mosque in the Sahara, Mali (J. Sweeney/TRIP)

Arab forces reached the Atlantic coast of North Africa in the first decade of the eighth century C.E., and Islam spread among the people of North Africa over the next few centuries. Here the Kharijite movement that challenged the authority of the Arab caliph was strong. In later centuries, the Sunni MALIKITE school would come to dominate North Africa, including Sahara and her neighbors.

Spain established a settlement (Dakhla) on the Saharan coast, primarily to protect the far more valuable Canary Islands, but in the 1880s began to plan placing the region under Spanish hegemony. Then in 1904, the European powers split Western Africa into four segments, although France (which had established a colony that bounded Sahara on the east and south) was the only other country to show any real interest in the western Sahara. The Sahrawi opposed any incursions into their land by Europeans. Through much of the twentieth century, Spain, France, and Morocco vied to wrestle control from the native forces.

After World War II, Spain began to mine phosphate, Sahara's major mineral asset. In the meantime, the United Nations pressed for Saharan self-determination, and Morocco reasserted its claims to the land. In 1975, Spain conceded its interest to Morocco and Mauritania, but almost immediately the Sahrawi proclaimed the establishment of an independent republic. War with Morocco and Mauritania followed. Although Mauritania pulled out after a few years, the war with Morocco continued through the 1980s. A ceasefire was finally arranged in 1991 that left Morocco in control for all practical purposes, the Saharan Republic's government forced into exile in Algeria (though recognized by a number of countries), and the final status of the country still in dispute.

As Spain asserted her hegemony over Sahara in the twentieth century, the Roman Catholic Church began to move beyond its service to the minuscule Spanish expatriate community at Dakhla. Only in 1954 was prefecture designated, the work being delegated to two religious orders, the Oblates of Mary Immaculata and the Salesian Sisters of the Sacred Heart of Jesus. The Catholic presence peaked in the mid-1970s (with six parishes), but it has now diminished to fewer than five hundred believers.

Protestant presence has been even smaller. The primary attempt to establish a mission was by the SEVENTH-DAY ADVENTIST CHURCH, but it did not succeed. There is a small BAHÁ'Í FAITH community of some one hundred members, but virtually the entire citizenry remain Muslim.

Sources:

Barrett, David. The Encyclopedia of World Christianity. 2d ed. New York: Oxford University Press, 2001.

Hodges, Tony. Western Sahara: The Roots of a Desert War. Westport, CT: Lawrence Hill, 1983.

St. Helena

St. Helena, the South Atlantic island made famous as the site of Napoleon's exile from 1815 to 1821, was uninhabited prior to its discovery by Portuguese sailors in 1502. The British settled St. Helena in 1659, and it has been a British colony ever since. Two other islands, Ascension and Tristan da Cunha, are dependencies of St. Helena. St. Helena has some fifty-five hundred inhabitants, Ascension slightly more than one thousand, and Tristan da Cunha around three hundred. Although separated by hundreds of miles of water, the three islands are tied together by their strategic military placement in an area where land is sparse.

Members of the CHURCH OF ENGLAND arrived with the first British settlers, and today the great majority of the islanders are Anglicans. The church, formally established in 1851, is now attached to the CHURCH IN THE PROVINCE OF SOUTH AFRICA. There is one diocese, serving St. Helena and Ascension. Tristan da Cunha is under the oversight of the Diocese of Cape Town (South Africa).

Over the course of the twentieth century, other Protestant churches and the ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH have developed congregations. They include the BAPTISTS, the SEVENTH-DAY ADVENTIST CHURCH, the SALVATION ARMY, and JEHOVAH'S WITNESSES. Each counts its membership in the low hundreds. The Baptists are affiliated with the BAPTIST UNION OF SOUTH AFRICA. The SDAs are attached to the Southern Africa Union Conference.

There is one small group of the BAHÁ'Í FAITH on St. Helena, the only non-Christian group that has become visible.

Source:

Cannan, Edward. Churches of the South Atlantic Islands, 1502–1991. Oswestry, UK: Anthony Nelson, 1992.

Status of religions in Saint Helena, 2000–2050

Followers	2000			2025	2050
	total	%	rate
Christians	6,100	96.3	0.70	7,400	9,000
Anglicans	4,400	70.1	0.26	5,200	6,100
Protestants	520	8.3	1.68	650	800
Marginal Christians	200	3.2	1.64	400	600
Nonreligious	180	2.9	4.25	300	500
Baha'is	50	0.8	5.24	80	150
Total population	6,300	100.0	0.84	7,800	9,600

St. Kitts-Nevis

St. Kitts-Nevis (more formally, the Federation of Saint Christopher and Nevis) are two of the Windward Islands in the Lesser Antilles on the northeast edge of the Caribbean Sea. They were originally settled by the Carib people who were first visited by Christopher Columbus in 1493. The Caribs were left alone until Thomas Walker established what was the first English settlement in the Caribbean in 1623. The initial settlement on nearby Nevis was made in 1628. The Caribs were soon eliminated, and slaves from Africa were brought in to work the expanding plantations. For the next century, France and England vied for control of the islands, but they were awarded to England by the Treaty of Versailles of 1793.

In 1816, St. Kitts was included in a single colony that included the Virgin Islands and Anguilla. The Virgin Islands were separated in 1871, and St. Kitts became the center of the remaining colony. After World War II, it was incorporated into the Associate States of the West Indies and developed local autonomy. Anguilla moved to disassociate itself in 1980. Religious freedom is guaranteed in St. Kitts-Nevis.

The CHURCH OF ENGLAND arrived with the first British settlers and for more than a hundred years was the only religious organization on the islands. In 1824 the bishop of London handed over control of the parishes to the bishop on Barbados. That same year an archdeaconry of Antigua, which included St. Kitts-Nevis, was established. The archdeaconry became a diocese in 1842 and has since become a diocese of the CHURCH IN THE PROVINCE OF THE WEST INDIES, headquartered at Nassau, the Bahamas.

Daniel Gottwald and James Birkly, missionaries of the Moravian Church, arrived in 1777 to found the first Protestant mission. They had been invited by John Gardiner, a planter, to evangelize the slaves under his care. They and their successors were soon visiting more than fifty different plantations. When the Methodists arrived in 1787, the two churches cooperated in evangelistic efforts and the building of churches. Methodism was introduced to St. Kitts by Lydia Seaton, formerly a servant who had been converted

Status of religions in Saint Kitts & Nevis, 2000–2050

Followers	2000			2025	2050
	total	%	rate
Christians	36,500	94.8	-0.90	32,700	33,000
Protestants	22,300	57.9	-0.83	20,000	20,500
Anglicans	9,700	25.2	-1.69	8,000	7,000
Roman Catholics	4,800	12.6	-0.69	4,500	5,000
Hindus	580	1.5	-0.05	600	700
Spiritists	520	1.4	-0.46	550	600
Nonreligious	480	1.3	1.90	650	900
Baha'is	200	0.5	-0.15	300	600
Muslims	120	0.3	0.45	200	280
Neoreligionists	100	0.3	-1.42	100	100
Total population	38,500	100.0	-0.84	35,100	36,200

St. Lucia

by Nathaniel Gilbert while living on Antigua. The Rev. Thomas Coke, the associate of Methodist founder John Wesley, visited St. Kitts for the first time in 1787 and later sent Thomas Hammett there to head the work. The Methodists later affiliated with the METHODIST CHURCH IN THE CARIBBEAN AND THE AMERICAS and the Moravian work was assigned to the MORAVIAN CHURCH IN JAMAICA. Both churches are now members of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES.

The ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH established work in 1861. It was included in the diocese of Roseau (Dominica) until 1971 and then placed in the Diocese of St. John's (Antigua).

During the twentieth century, a variety of churches have targeted St. Kitts-Nevis for missionary activity, including the SEVENTH-DAY ADVENTIST CHURCH, the Pilgrim Holiness Church (now an integral part of the WESLEYAN CHURCH), the CHURCH OF GOD OF PROPHECY, the CHURCH OF GOD (CLEVELAND, TENNESSEE), the CHRISTIAN BROTHERS, the CHURCHES OF CHRIST, and the SALVATION ARMY. At the same time a number of indigenous churches such as the Antioch Baptist Church, the Assemblies of the First Born, the Evangelical Faith Church, and the SPIRITUAL BAPTISTS have arisen.

There is little evidence of organized religion apart from Christianity, the most prominent group being the BAHÁ'Í FAITH. There are also some followers of ISLAM, Afro-Caribbean religions, and the RASTAFARIANS.

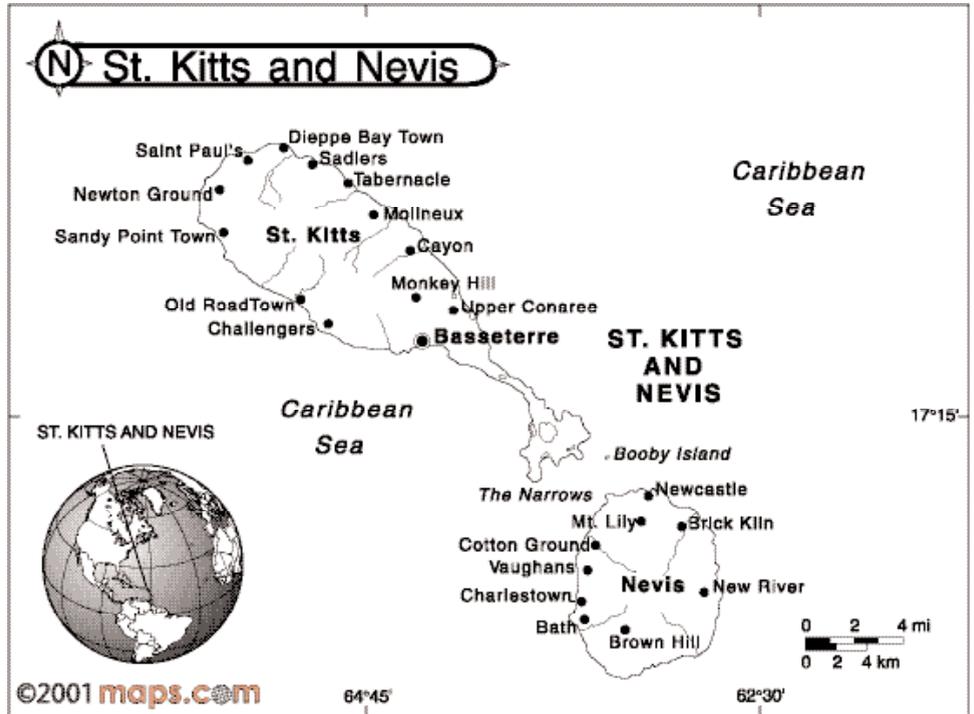

Sources:

Barrett, David. The Encyclopedia of World Christianity. 2d ed. New York: Oxford University Press, 2001.

Maynard, G. O. A History of the Moravian Church: Eastern West Indies Province. Port of Spain, Trinidad: Yuille's, 1968.

St. Lucia

St. Lucia, one of the Windward Islands of the Lesser Antilles, is located at the western edge of the Caribbean Sea between Martinique and St. Vincent. It was originally settled by the Arawak people, who around 800 C.E. were conquered and replaced by the Carib people. The latter group inhabited the island when Christopher Columbus arrived in 1502 and gave it its present name. Both the British and Spanish vied for the island, but neither could defeat the local resistance to their settlement.

Then, in 1660, the French settled on the island, and it became one object in the ongoing British-French conflict over the course of the next century. Finally, in 1814, the British received control as one item in the Treaty of Paris. The British quickly developed the sugarcane industry on a set of plantations built upon slave labor. The present population largely derived from the mixing of the former master/slave population. St. Lucia was incorporated into the Colony of the Windward Islands. It was included in the West Indies Federation (1959–1962) and received the right of self-government as one of the Federated States of the Antilles in 1967. It became a fully independent country in 1979, though it remains part of the British Commonwealth.

Status of religions in Saint Lucia, 2000-2050

Followers	2000			2025	2050
	total	%	rate
Christians	148,000	96.1	1.39	199,000	230,000
Roman Catholics	116,000	75.2	1.34	149,000	163,000
Protestants	20,500	13.3	1.59	33,500	42,500
Anglicans	4,400	2.9	1.21	5,600	6,500
Spiritists	2,600	1.7	2.38	4,000	5,000
Hindus	1,400	0.9	1.45	2,200	2,700
Muslims	700	0.5	1.63	1,000	1,200
Neoreligionists	570	0.4	1.72	750	900
Baha'is	360	0.2	1.95	600	900
Nonreligious	310	0.2	4.41	500	900
Total population	154,000	100.0	1.42	208,000	242,000

The ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH came to St. Lucia with the French and became fully established in 1719. The Diocese of Castries, initially erected in 1956, was elevated to an archdiocese in 1974. Serving more than 75 percent of the population, it remains by far the largest religious grouping on the island.

Anglicanism entered with the British and claims the largest percentage of the non-Catholic community. The churches were under the Diocese of Barbados prior to the creation of the Diocese of the Windward Islands in 1878. That diocese, headquartered on St. Vincent, is now part of the CHURCH IN THE PROVINCE OF THE WEST INDIES. The Methodists arrived in St. Lucia in 1809, part of the early expansion of British Methodism through the Caribbean following the American Revolution. The Methodist work is now part of the METHODIST CHURCH IN THE CARIBBEAN AND THE AMERICAS. In the mid-nineteenth century, the Moravians, who also had been expanding through the Caribbean with a mission devoted to the plantation laborers, arrived. Their work is now incorporated into the MORAVIAN CHURCH, EASTERN WEST INDIES PROVINCE, headquartered on Antigua. All three churches are now members of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES.

Over the course of the twentieth century, a spectrum of churches representative of Evangelical, HOLINESS, and PENTECOSTAL perspectives arrived on St. Lucia, primarily from the United States. Each has had modest success. Among the more successful have been the EVANGELICAL CHURCH OF THE WEST INDIES and the United Holy Church of America. The SEVENTH-DAY ADVENTIST CHURCH arrived in 1926 and the JEHOVAH'S WITNESSES in 1963.

Several movements that have arisen in the Caribbean and subsequently spread through the islands have found their way to St. Lucia. The RASTAFARIAN movement spread from Jamaica in the 1950s and 1960s. In like measure, the SPIRITUAL BAPTISTS have arisen as a popular indigenous church, and the YORUBAN RELIGION, also known as SANTERIA, has gained some degree of popularity. The BAHÁ'Í FAITH has a small following on St. Lucia.

Sources:

Gachet, C. A History of the Roman Catholic Church in St. Lucia. Port of Spain, Trinidad: Key, 1976.
 Jesse, C. Outlines of St. Lucia's History. Castries: St. Lucia Archeological and Historical Society, 1964.

St. Pierre et Miquelon

St. Pierre et Miquelon is an archipelago of eight islands off the southern coast of Newfoundland (Canada), a remnant of French America. The British pushed a claim to the islands through the 1700s, but they relinquished the claim in 1804. The islands were until 1946 a French possession, afterward designated an overseas territory, and since 1975 an overseas department of France. There are approximately sixty-five hundred inhabitants.

The ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH came to the islands with its early settlers in 1668. It remains the only Christian church on the islands and claims the great majority of citizens as

Followers	2000			2025	2050
	total	%	rate
Christians	6,400	97.4	0.21	6,900	7,100
Roman Catholics	6,500	98.5	0.26	7,100	7,600
Protestants	70	1.1	2.44	120	180
Marginal Christians	40	0.6	10.31	80	130
Baha'is	90	1.3	1.61	150	260
Nonreligious	80	1.1	3.15	150	250
Muslims	10	0.2	0.00	40	80
Total population	6,600	100.0	0.27	7,200	7,700

St. Vincent

members. It has been constituted as a vicariate attached to the Episcopal Conference of France. There are some professing Protestants among the residents, but no organized work. There is, however, a spiritual assembly of the BAHÁ'Í FAITH.

Source:

Rannie, W. F. Saint Pierre and Miquelon. Beamsville, ON: Rannie, 1963.

St. Vincent

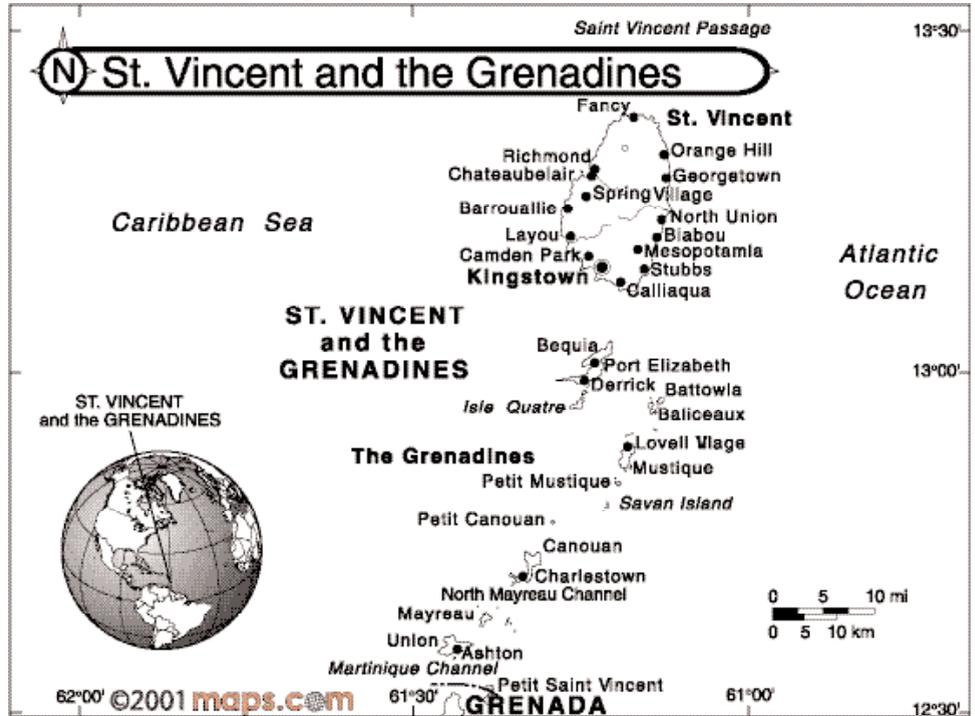

St. Vincent, one of the Windward Islands, is located on the southeastern edge of the Caribbean Sea between St. Lucia and Grenada. Since being granted independence as a member of the British Commonwealth in 1979, its territory has included not only the main island but also the northern part of the Grenadine Islands immediately to the south. St. Vincent was originally settled by the Arawak people, who were in turn conquered and replaced by the Caribs. These were the people that Christopher Columbus found when he arrived in the area in 1498.

The Caribs were left alone until 1783, when England was given hegemony over St. Vincent in a treaty with its European neighbors. They sent a force to defeat the Caribs, who had been joined by some slaves that had escaped from other nearby islands. They were largely defeated and eradicated by 1796. A set of plantations soon emerged, and a large number of Africans arrived to work them.

St. Vincent was incorporated into the Colony of the Windward Islands in 1833. It received some degree of autonomy in 1960 and became a self-governing state in 1969. It became fully independent in 1979. Following the first elections of the new government, members of the RASTAFARIAN movement on Union Island led an armed rebellion that had to be put down by troops brought in from Barbados.

The CHURCH OF ENGLAND came to St. Vincent with the first British settlers. It has remained the largest religious body in St. Vincent, and its largely black membership reflects the island's population. Today, the Diocese of the Windward Islands, a diocese within the CHURCH IN THE PROVINCE OF THE WEST INDIES, is headquartered on St. Vincent.

Methodism spread through the Caribbean from England in the years immediately after the American Revolution. It

Status of religions in Saint Vincent & the Grenadines, 2000-2050

Followers	2000		2025	2050
	total	% rate
Christians	102,000	89.1 0.48	111,000	111,000
Protestants	33,900	29.7 0.85	42,000	44,000
Anglicans	19,700	17.3 -0.14	20,600	21,000
Independents	13,300	11.7 1.20	18,000	21,000
Hindus	3,800	3.4 1.03	5,800	7,400
Nonreligious	2,600	2.3 9.09	5,000	8,000
Spiritists	2,000	1.8 2.36	3,000	4,000
Muslims	1,700	1.5 1.25	2,800	4,000
Baha'is	1,700	1.5 3.31	3,000	4,800
Neoreligionists	580	0.5 4.62	700	1,100
Total population	114,000	100.0 0.75	131,000	140,000

reached St. Vincent in 1787, a direct result of the Rev. Thomas Coke's visit to Antigua and the birth of his enthusiasm for missionizing the Caribbean in 1786. The Methodist work is now a part of the METHODIST CHURCH IN THE CARIBBEAN AND THE AMERICAS.

Through the course of the twentieth century, an array of Protestant/Free Church bodies have found their way to St. Vincent from both England and the United States. These include ADVENTISM, HOLINESS, PENTECOSTALS, BAPTISTS, and independent Evangelical bodies. The mission of the PENTECOSTAL ASSEMBLIES OF CANADA has grown to become the Pentecostal Church of the West Indies. Among the more interesting bodies is the Christian Pilgrim Church of St. Vincent, an indigenous Christian denomination. The SPIRITUAL BAPTISTS, a movement that has spread through many of the Caribbean Islands, was banned in St. Vincent between 1913 and 1965.

In 1964 the Anglicans, Catholics, Methodists, and the SALVATION ARMY founded the Christian Council of St.

Vincent, now known as the Saint Vincent and the Grenadines Christian Council. It is closely related to the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES.

The BAHÁ'Í FAITH has spread on St. Vincent in the years since World War II. At the same time, YORUBAN RELIGION, popularly called SANTERIA, has emerged to visibility among the descendants of Africans. It includes elements brought to the islands from Africa, revitalized by a new influx of those teachings made possible by modern communications. Santeria operates as a semisecret religion, and the estimate of support is difficult to make.

Source:

Young, V. H. Becoming West Indian: Culture, Self, and Nation in St. Vincent. Washington, DC: Smithsonian Institution, 1993.

Saivism (Hinduism)

Saivism (or Shaivism) is a Hindu religious concept which asserts that Siva is the supreme divine being. Saivism developed primarily during the Maurya, Sunga, Satavahana, and Gupta dynasties. The Pallava dynasty (first eight centuries C.E.) saw the greatest of Saivite achievements. Evidence of pre-Hindu Siva concepts occur in Harappan art dating from between 3000 and 2000 B.C.E. A nature-man deity was a predominant god for pre-Hindu Harappans. The deity appears to be a Siva precursor.

Saivism as a form of Hinduism has multiple branches. Around the seventh century, it made its way throughout Southeast Asia. In India, a majority of Saivites are found in southern India in the Tamil regions, a phenomenon due in part to northern invaders forcing the original Indian inhabitants southward. They (the pre-Hindus), having the Siva precursor god, developed the concept of Siva from the invaders. Today, Tamils are very devout Saivites, and multiple subsects of TAMIL SAIVISM exist. The Thirukural, written during the fifth century B.C.E., is a Dravidian (Harappan) set of texts. These texts in the Tamil language became the holy books of the Saivites.

Saivite worship and beliefs follow that of most Hindus. Puja (worship) is done before a sacred lingam-yoni (Siva linga) representing the male and female aspects of procreation. Saivites view Siva as half male and half female (Ardhanarisvara). Because of this, many Hindus worship Siva and his wife, Parvati, conjointly.

There are numerous Saivite men who have become priests of Siva. These men carry tridents and watering bowls, begging for food from others each day. They dress in very little or, in many cases, refuse to wear clothing at all. Some Siva priests also undergo surgery to cause impotence and thus ensure that sexuality does not disrupt their intense meditation practice.

The Nayanars (Tamil Saivite saints) demand exclusive faith in Siva alone and in no other Hindu deity, all other deities being almost insignificant to them. Since a few Tamil sects have declared Siva as the only deity and supreme being, they have made themselves a monotheistic group within Hinduism. Monotheistic Saivism has its parallel within VAISHNAVISM in the GAUDIYA MATH and the larger Hare Krishna movement it has spawned (including the INTERNATIONAL SOCIETY FOR KRISHNA CONSCIOUSNESS), which has elevated Krishna as the one supreme deity.

The Trika (Triad) of Kashmir is a non-Tamil Saivite group that is monotheistic. Above and beyond its monotheism, KASHMIR SAIVISM also accepts the position of Shankara (788–820 C.E.) on the unreality of the material universe, and the belief in immediate enlightenment. Abhinava Gupta (tenth century) is one of the most renowned of the Kashmir Saivites.

The Lingayats (ViraSaivas), another Saivite sect, have a unique status in Hinduism as one of the rare Hindu groups that oppose imagery in worship. The only symbol allowed in worship is the Siva linga. A small Siva linga is worn by each devout member of the sect. The group was founded in India in 1156 C.E. by Basava, a minister of the royal court. Basava may have been influenced by the neighboring Islamic tribesmen of the time. This may explain his prohibition of Hindu icons and idols. As a Hindu revolutionary, Basava rejected the Vedas and the Brahmin class, created his own class of priests (jangamas), made women and men equals, banned puja sacrifices and pilgrimages, and allowed women to remarry after the death of their husbands. He also condemned cremation and preferred burial. The Lingayats have sacred books written in the Canarese and Telegu languages. Today the sect is prominent in the Hyderabad and Mysore areas of India.

Kumar Jairamdas

Sources:

Chitgopekar, Nilima. Encountering Sivaism. New Delhi: Munshiram Manoharal, 1998.

O'Flaherty, Wendy. Siva, the Erotic Ascetic. New York: Oxford University Press, 1981.

Sakyapa Tibetan Buddhism

The Sakyapa order of Tibetan Buddhism derives its name from Sakya (Gray Earth), the area in central Tibet in which its main monastery is located. Sakya Monastery was founded in 1073 by Könchok Gyelpo (1034–1102) and later became one of the great monastic centers in Tibet after the Sakyapas came to supremacy following Sakya Pandita's (1182–1251) appointment as regent by Gushri Khan in 1245. This followed a visit by Sakya Pandita to the Mongol court to surrender Tibet to the Mongols. Traditional histories report that the khan was so impressed by Sakya Pandita that he converted to Buddhism, and rather than impose direct Mongol control over Tibet appointed Sakya Pandita to rule in his stead. Sakyapa overlordship continued with Sakya Pandita's successors, but it declined in the late fourteenth century when Mongol power waned.

The most distinctive Sakyapa meditative practice is called "path and result" (lamdre), which is a comprehensive system of practice based on the Hevajra Tantra. Following the Hevajra's doctrine of "the undifferentiability of samsara and nirvana," the lamdre system views the path and its result as being inseparable and mutually implicative. Path cannot legitimately be distinguished from result because the former leads to the latter. And the result subsumes the path. From the standpoint of buddhahood, all dichotomies vanish, and meditators in this system are trained to view all distinctions as merely projections of mind. Mind in turn is said to have an essence of luminosity and emptiness.

An important tenet of the lamdre system is the similarity of the "triple appearance" (nangsum) and "triple continuum" (gyusum). The first consists of: (1) the appearance of phenomena as impure error; (2) the appearance of experience in meditation; and (3) pure appearance. These are said to be fundamentally the same; the only difference lies in how they are perceived. The first refers to how ordinary, unenlightened beings perceive reality, while the second refers to the perceptions of advanced meditators—who have removed some of the mental defilements that cloud the perceptions of ordinary beings. The third aspect is known by buddhas, who have removed all defilements and perceive the true nature of reality.

The triple continuum consists of: (1) basis; (2) path; and (3) result. As with the triple vision, the three are said to be undifferentiable. The basis is the two truths (conventional and ultimate truths). The path consists of cultivating method and wisdom. The pure vision is the result, and represents the attainment of buddhahood.

The leadership of the Sakyapa order is held by male members of the Khon family. According to traditional Sakyapa histories, the Khons were originally adherents of the Nyingmapa order but split from it when Sherap Tsültrim witnessed a public display of esoteric Tantric rituals at a Nyingmapa monastery and decided that this violated Tantric injunctions concerning secrecy. This attitude continues in the order today, and Sakyapas tend to be the most secretive of all schools of Tibetan Buddhism, with respect to Tantric teachings and practices. As a possible result of that attitude, Sakyapa is also the smallest of Tibetan Buddhism's four orders (though its literature, philosophical systems, and meditative practices are widely influential). Following the Chinese invasion of Tibet in the 1950s, Sakya Tridzin, the head of the order, fled to India, and subsequently established a new headquarters complex at Rajpur that includes a monastery and college.

Address:

Sakya Centra
187 Rajour Rd., P. O. Rajpour
District Dehra Dun
Utter Pradesh
India

John Powers

Sources:

- Deshung, Rinpoche. The Three Levels of Spiritual Perception. Boston: Wisdom, 1995.
- Gyaltzen, Sakyapa Sonan. The Clear Mirror: A Traditional Account of Tibet's Golden Age. Ithaca, NY: Snow Lion, 1996.
- Jackson, David. Enlightenment by a Single Means. Wien: Verlag der Österreichischen Akademie der Wissenschaften, 1994.
- Powers, John. Introduction to Tibetan Buddhism. Ithaca, NY: Snow Lion, 1995.

Salesians

The Salesians, officially the Order of St. Francis de Sales, is an ordered community of the ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH, founded in 1859 by John Bosco (1815–1888) with an original intention of emphasizing the Christian education of youth. It has both lay and clerical members. In 1872, Bosco also founded the Salesian Sisters (the Daughters of Mary Help of Christian) with a similar purpose. The Salesian Sisters has grown into one of the largest orders for women religious in the world.

In his twenty-sixth year, Bosco befriended an orphan whom he began to instruct in the faith. This relationship led to his founding an oratory in Turin, Italy, that became the motherhouse of his order. The order was formed with recruits from the youth he had been instructing. There were seventeen in the original group that constituted the Salesian Order. He received papal approval in 1864 and approval of the constitution of the order in 1874. Expansion began after official approval, and in 1875 the first missionaries were commissioned. They settled in Argentina. They were led by Giovanni Cagliero, the first Salesian to become a bishop and cardinal.

At the time of Bosco's death, in 1888, the order had spread in Europe to Spain, France, and England, and in South America to Argentina, Uruguay, and Brazil. Growth continued at a spectacular pace through the next century, and the order spread to more than seventy countries. In some cases, they were invited to countries in which Italian communities had emerged where they developed work among both adults and youth.

The Salesian Sisters developed a mirror educational program for girls. Its cofounder with Bosco, Mother Maria Domenica Mazzarello (1837–1881), would later, like Bosco, be canonized. The lay affiliate group, called the Cooperators, focus their efforts on charitable activities toward youth.

The Salesian Order's work is found in South America, India, Thailand, and the Congo.

Address:

Salesian Order
Via della Pisana 1111
C.P. 9092
00163 Roma-Aurelio
Italy

Sources:

Ceria, Eugene. The Salesians. Patterson, NJ: n.p., 1955.
Wirth, Morand. Don Bosco and the Salesians. New Rochelle, NY: Don Bosco, 1982.

Salvadorean Lutheran Synod

Lutheranism emerged in El Salvador only in the middle of the twentieth century. In the early 1950s the newly formed LUTHERAN WORLD FEDERATION made contact with expatriate German communities in El Salvador. An initial congregation was founded in 1954. The LUTHERAN CHURCH—MISSOURI SYNOD (not associated with the Lutheran World Federation) took the lead in developing a church. The church grew beyond the German community, especially in the 1970s, when congregations arose across the country. The church, however, entered a period of instability following the military coup in 1979 and the division of the country into warring factions through the 1980s. As a result of the existence of armed insurrectionists, death squads, and the resulting deaths of some 50,000 people, some 500,000 people fled to the United States and another quarter of a million to neighboring countries during the early 1980s.

As work related to the Missouri Synod spread through Central America, the various churches were united into the Council of Lutheran Churches in Central America and Panama. Of the several churches, the Salvadorean Church is the largest. In 1972 the church began work among the poor of El Salvador, but as civil unrest increased, they found themselves presented with a situation far beyond their means. In 1983 the president of the synod and the physician in charge of its mobile clinic were arrested and deported. At the next synod meeting, in January 1984, the church, independently of the Missouri Synod, formally applied for membership in the Lutheran World Federation. LWF had already entered the country with assistance for displaced persons.

By the mid-1980s the synod had only two ordained ministers left, the remainder either having been killed or having fled. The church survived the era of terror through the effort of a group of lay preachers. Currently the church has approximately six thousand members. It is a member of the Lutheran World Federation and the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES.

Address:

Salvadorean Lutheran Synod
Calle 5 de Noviembre 313
Barrio Sam Miguelito
San Salvador
El Salvador

Source:

Bachmann, E. Theodore, and Mercia Brenne Bachmann. Lutheran Churches in the World: A Handbook. Minneapolis, MN: Augsburg, 1989.

The Salvation Army

Although distinctive in government and practice, the Salvation Army is an integral part of the Christian Church. The Army's doctrines follow the mainstream of Christian belief and teaching, and its eleven articles of faith emphasize the primacy of Scripture, the need for personal salvation, and the possibility of living a Christlike life. The objects of the Army, as outlined in the Salvation Army Act of 1980, include "the advancement of Christianity and, pursuant thereto, the advancement of education, the relief of poverty, and other charitable objects beneficial to society or the community of mankind as a whole."

The movement, founded in East London in 1865 by William Booth (1829–1912), a minister formerly with the Methodist New Connexion (now a constituent part of the METHODIST CHURCH), quickly spread from Britain to many parts of the world. The Salvation Army is now at work in more than one hundred countries, its activities radiating from its International Headquarters in London. The rapid expansion of the movement was aided by the adoption of a quasi-military command structure after 1878, when the name "the Salvation Army" came into use. The military style of the Salvation Army proved to be an effective stimulus to the progress of the Army's fight against evil. This style of organization makes for good mobility and discipline. Responding to a dominant theme in Christian teaching, which sees the church engaged in spiritual warfare, the Army has used to advantage its military features—such as uniforms, flags, and ranks—to identify, inspire, and regulate its endeavors.

Despite the rapid growth of the Army in the early 1880s, many people did not approve of William Booth's methods, and the Salvation Army often provoked brutal and determined opposition from publicans and brothel keepers who were losing trade and influence. The sight of Salvationists taking the Christian Gospel onto the streets, marching with brass bands, uniforms, and banners, often aroused the protesters' anger, and in 1882, some 669 Salvationists were knocked down, kicked, or otherwise assaulted on the streets of Britain alone. Full-time officers and employees, as well as soldiers, adherents, and friends who give voluntary service, maintain a wide variety of evangelistic and social programs, under the authority of the general. The Army also benefits from the support of many generous donors and friends, including a number who serve on advisory boards. Leadership is provided by commissioned officers who are recognized ministers of religion. Internationally, there were 17,417 active officers, 8,106 retired officers, 1,019,137 senior soldiers, and 394,953 junior soldiers as of January 1, 2000. The general, the Army's international leader, is elected by a High Council of territorial leaders convened for that purpose in accordance with the Salvation Army Act of 1980. Administratively, the Salvation Army is divided into more than fifty territories and commands, each led by a territorial commander, or officer commanding. Territories are divided into divisions, with a divisional commander leading a team of administrative staff. Each division includes a number of corps and other Salvation Army centers, each with its own commanding officers or managers. Officers from Britain pioneered the Army's work in many countries during the early years, but the aim has always been to develop local leadership and membership; indigenous leaders are now taking increased responsibility in their own countries. The considerable movement of officers between territories is a vital factor in maintaining the internationalism of the Army.

The Salvation Army playing Christmas Carols on Sutton High Street, England. (Helene Rogers/TRIP)

The corps is the local Salvation Army center, established both to disseminate the Army's Christian teachings and to serve the needs of the local community. There are currently 15,486 corps throughout the world, where a variety of people meet for worship, fellowship, musical activities, and other events. The corps program will also usually include community activities such as lunch clubs, parent and tod-ler groups, and advice and counseling services. All are welcome at Salvation Army meetings, which are characterized by lively singing and enthusiastic participation, including spontaneous personal Christian witness and extempore prayer.

A major difference between the Salvation Army and most other Christian denominations is that the Army does not include the use of sacraments in its worship. The Salvation Army has never been opposed to the sacraments, but Salvationists believe that the sacraments are not essential to becoming a Christian, and that it is possible to live a holy life and receive the grace of God without the use of physical signs and symbols. Salvationists accept a disciplined and compassionate life of high moral standards that include abstinence from alcohol and tobacco. From its earliest days, the Army has accorded equal opportunities to women, every rank and service being open to them; from childhood, young people are encouraged to love and serve God. Raised as an evangelistic mission, the Salvation Army also spontaneously embarked on schemes to improve the social conditions of the poor, and it has established social service centers, hospitals, clinics, and schools in many parts of the world. Wherever the Army operates, facilities such as thrift stores, eventide homes, hostels, and children's homes have developed to meet local needs, as an expression of practical Christianity. The Army, with other agencies, is also involved widely in providing emergency relief wherever disasters occur, whether through famine, flooding, hurricanes, earthquakes, or war.

The Salvation Army was for a time a member of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES but withdrew over the council's involvement in various intense political issues.

The Salvation Army, illustration in Harpers Weekly Magazine, c.1880 (Library of Congress)

Address:

The Salvation Army
101 Queen Victoria St.
London EC4P 4EP
United Kingdom
<http://www.salvationarmy.org>

Gordon Taylor

Sources:

Coutts, Frederick. No Discharge in This War: A One-Volume History of the Salvation Army. London: Hodder and Stoughton, 1975.

The Salvation Army Year Book, 2001. (Published annually.)

Sandall, Robert Arch Wiggins, Frederick Coutts, and Henry Garipey. History of the Salvation Army. 8 vols. London: Thomas Nelson/Hodder and Stoughton, 1949.

Samavesam of Telegu Baptists Churches

The Samavesam of Telegu Baptists Churches is one of two large Baptist groupings in India, the country with more Baptists than any other, apart from the United States.

American Baptists initiated work in South India in 1836, the first missionaries finally settling in Nellore in 1840. The first church, and for many years the only center of activity, was founded in Nellore in 1844. A second station was opened in 1866 in Ongole by James E. Clough. It grew rapidly as a number of Madigas, an outcast group, affiliated with the mission. Then in 1876, following a local famine, almost ten thousand joined. As much as possible, Clough encouraged the converts to remain in their former social setting rather than, as occurred elsewhere, to form separate Christian communities. The church subsequently spread among the outcasts in the Telegu-speaking areas through the rest of the century.

Beginning in 1925, there was a measurable movement of caste Hindus into the church, notable in that the evangelists were outcasts. The church also built a strong educational program, providing primary education and technical training that offered a wide range of employment opportunities for the poorer element in Telegu society. Two important institutions for higher education, Madras Christian College and the Women's Christian College of Madras, were also supported, and the first seminary was opened in the 1870s. By 1920, seven hospitals had been built.

After World War II and India's independence, the Telegu mission began the transition to autonomy, a process that took some time and included a period of litigation over church property. Following the transition, the church has continued as an expanding body. In the late 1990s it reported 432,000 members in 835 congregations, approximately two-thirds of all Baptists in South India. The church has taken an ecumenical stance. It is a member of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES, the BAPTIST WORLD ALLIANCE, and a variety of regional and national ecumenical structures.

Address:

Samavesam of Telegu Baptist Churches
C.M.A. Compound, Nellore 524 003
Andhra Pradesh
India

Sources:

Clough, John E. From Darkness to Light: A Story of the Telugu Awakening. Philadelphia: American Baptist Publication Society, 1882.
Wardin, Albert W., ed. Baptists around the World. Nashville: Broadman and Holman, 1995.

Samoa

The present state of Samoa (or Western Samoa) consists of those islands of the Samoan archipelago in the South Pacific west of the 171st meridian. Samoa is sandwiched between the nations of Tonga and the Tokelau Islands. The islands were inhabited by Polynesians by at least 1000 B.C.E. They were first visited by Europeans (the Dutch) in 1722, but it was almost another century before Europeans began to settle in the islands in any number. After Germany occupied the islands in 1855, merchants concentrated on the lucrative copra business. However, both the British and the Americans continued to express claims for the land, and in 1899 the islands east of meridian 171 were given to the United States. In 1919, following World War I, New Zealand took control of Western Samoa.

After World War II, Western Samoa became a UN trusteeship. In 1962, following a plebiscite on the issue, independence was achieved and a constitutional monarchy in line with traditional social structures in Samoa was established in power. Throughout the twentieth century there was significant European/Polynesian intermarriage in Samoa, and a recognizably new group, the Euronesians, have become a measurable part of the population.

Christianity arrived in Samoa at a particularly propitious time, immediately following a popular revolt that had overthrown an unpopular autocratic ruler, Tamafaiga. The first missionary was a Samoan who had found Christianity while among the Methodists in Tonga in 1828. The first churches emerged from his preaching when he returned home. Then in 1830, John Williams, a missionary with the LONDON MISSIONARY SOCIETY (LMS), and a team of eight Tahitian teachers visited. The eight remained behind after Williams left. By 1835 there were some two thousand Christians, and by 1837 some thirteen thousand. By the end of the decade, the overwhelming majority of the islanders had identified with the church, and within a generation the traditional religion had all but disappeared.

In the process of the Christianization of Samoa, the Congregationalists of the LMS and the Methodists, without consulting the Samoans, agreed not to compete with each other in the area; the Methodists agreed to withdraw in favor of the LMS. The Samoans, however, rejected the decision, as the original work in the islands had been Methodist-related. The Samoan Methodists became an independent body. In 1855, the Australian Methodists became autonomous of the British Methodists and reestablished relationships with the Samoans. The Samoan work became first a district and then a conference in the Methodist Church of Australia. It became independent in 1964 as the METHODIST CHURCH IN SAMOA.

At the same time, the work of the London Missionary Society prospered and matured into the CONGREGATIONAL CHRISTIAN CHURCH IN SAMOA, which became independent of its missionary oversight in 1962. Originally this church covered both Western Samoa and American Samoa, but in 1980 the churches in American Samoa separated to form the Church of Tutuila and Manua, now the CONGREGATIONAL CHRISTIAN CHURCH OF AMERICAN SAMOA. The LMS work also gave birth to an independent congregation in Apia that originated in an English-speaking seaman's church. Although it retains strong relations with the Congregational Christian Church, the small Apia Protestant Church remains an independent body.

Followers	2000			2025	2050
	total	%	rate
Christians	174,000	96.6	1.12	259,000	333,000
Protestants	128,000	71.1	0.99	195,000	245,000
Roman Catholics	39,500	21.9	0.93	59,000	76,000
Marginal Christians	17,000	9.4	-0.12	21,000	23,000
Baha'is	4,200	2.3	3.03	8,000	12,000
Nonreligious	1,900	1.1	4.87	3,600	6,000
Buddhists	20	0.0	1.84	40	60
Chinese folk-religionists	20	0.0	1.84	40	60
Total population	180,000	100.0	1.19	271,000	351,000

These churches contain the majority of Christians in Samoa and form the backbone of the ecumenical community. They are members of the Samoa Council of Churches, and the two larger bodies are members of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES. Historically, both churches have been missionary churches and have supported Samoan missionaries across the South Pacific.

The ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH came to Samoa in 1845 from the Wallis and Futuna Islands. It grew steadily in the face of the Protestant establishment and by the 1960s claimed more than 20 percent of the population. A vicariate that included Samoa and the newer work in the Tokelau Islands was established in 1957. That vicariate was elevated to a diocese in 1966. The present diocese (of Samoa-Apia) was divided in 1982 by the separation of the work in American Samoa and again in 1992 of the work in the Tokelau Islands.

The CHURCH OF JESUS CHRIST OF LATTER-DAY SAINTS arrived in Samoa in 1863 in the person of two missionaries, Kimo Pelia and Samuela Manoa. Their commission to begin work, however, had been made by an excommunicated leader, Walter Murray Gibson, who had built an independent mission in Hawaii. His church lasted into the 1880s, and Gibson went on to become the prime minister of Hawaii. When official missionaries of the church arrived in 1888, Manoa quickly brought the work under their care. The work grew slowly, being somewhat hindered during the years of German control (1899–1914), but it was aided by the publication of the Samoan edition of the Book of Mormon in 1903.

The Mormon work in Samoa was so successful that in 1977 the church announced plans to build a temple (to be used for weddings and other special ceremonies) in Apia. It was finished and dedicated in 1983. By the end of the 1990s the church claimed more than fifty thousand members, approximately one-fourth of the country's population.

The other church to reach Samoa in the nineteenth century was the SEVENTH-DAY ADVENTIST CHURCH, which arrived in 1895. It too has experienced steady growth. The Samoa mission was formally organized in 1921 and now exists as part of the Central Pacific Union Mission.

PENTECOSTALISM entered the islands in 1928 through missionaries from the ASSEMBLIES OF GOD. It was subsequently joined by the UNITED PENTECOSTAL CHURCH INTERNATIONAL (a Oneness body), the CHURCH OF GOD OF PROPHECY, the CHURCH OF GOD (CLEVELAND, TENNESSEE), and two indigenous churches, the Makisia Church and the Samoan Full Gospel Church. The CHURCH OF THE NAZARENE, the CHRISTIAN BRETHREN, and the JEHOVAH'S WITNESSES are also present. Anglicans are represented by several parishes now part of the Diocese of Polynesia of the ANGLICAN CHURCH IN AOTEAROA, NEW ZEALAND, AND POLYNESIA.

The BAHÁ'Í FAITH, the only major non-Christian community on the island, received a significant boost in 1973 when the king of Samoa announced his conversion. Subsequently, Apia became the location of the world's seventh Baha'i temple.

Sources:

Franco, R. W. The History, Role, and Function of the Contemporary Catholic Church in Western Samoa. M.A. thesis, California State University, 1976.

Setu, F. The Ministry in the Making: A History of the Emergence of the Ministry of the Church in Samoa, 1830–1900. Suva, Fiji: Th.M. thesis, Pacific Theological College, 1988.

Tuimauluga, L. The Ministry of the Congregational Christian Church in Samoa in a fa'a-Samoa (Samoan Custom) Framework. Suva, Fiji: B.D. thesis, Pacific Theological Seminary, 1977.

San Marino

San Marino is a republic organized in 1866, as the process of Italian unification was rapidly moving forward. According to local mythology, San Marino had existed as an entity since the fourth century and is named for a third-century brick mason who moved onto Mount Titano after helping rebuild the walls of Rimini. He later became known as a man of prayer and was canonized. The territory named for him was formally recognized as a separate nation by the pope in 1831. Today it is the smallest republican state in the world, being only 23.6 square miles in area. It is completely surrounded by Italy and located on Mount Titano, above the Adriatic port city of Rimini. It became well known in the mid-twentieth century for its elegant postage stamps, which became prized items in collections worldwide.

San Marino is located at the border of two Italian provinces, Romana and Marca, and its Roman Catholic churches are divided between the two dioceses of Rimini and Montefeltro. Roman Catholicism dates to the fifth century, when a Christian hermitage was erected on what is now San Marino.

The only visible dissent from the ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH in San Marino are a small gathering of JEHOVAH'S WITNESSES that emerged in the mid-1960s and a single spiritual assembly of the BAHÁ'Í FAITH.

Status of religions in San Marino, 2000–2050

Followers	2000			2025	2050
	total	%	rate
Christians	24,400	92.2	1.24	29,200	25,900
Roman Catholics	23,500	88.7	1.18	28,000	24,700
Marginal Christians	270	1.0	2.54	500	700
Nonreligious	1,400	5.1	2.36	2,000	2,500
Atheists	480	1.8	2.43	800	1,000
Baha'is	240	0.9	4.86	400	600
Muslims	10	0.0	0.00	20	40
Total population	26,500	100.0	1.36	32,400	30,000

Sources:

Rossi, G., ed. A Short History of San Marino. San Marino: C. N. Packett, 1979.
<http://www.sanmarinosite.com>.

Sanbō Kyōdan

The Sanbō Kyōdan (Fellowship of the Three Treasures), an international ZEN BUDDHIST organization, was founded on the teachings of Harada Dai'un Sogaku Roshi (1871–1961). Harada did not teach in the traditional SOTO ZEN style in which he had been ordained as a priest and authorized as a Zen master. He taught both Soto and RINZAI meditation techniques (having also received transmission in the Rinzaï tradition); he treated monastics and lay practitioners as equals; and he developed introductory talks for novice monks, rather than leaving them devoid of verbal instruction, as was the way in Soto Zen.

In 1954, Harada's successor, Yasutani Haku'un Ryoko Roshi (1885–1973), formally separated from the Soto lineage in which he had been ordained and founded a new organization, the Sanbō Kyōdan, based on Harada's teachings. The Sanbo Kyodan is considered an independent lay stream of Soto Zen that incorporates aspects of Rinzaï Zen. Having established the Sanbō Kyōdan in Japan, Yasutani initiated its spread internationally.

Yasutani's successor, Yamada Koun Zenshin Roshi (1907–1989), came to lead the Sanbō Kyōdan in 1973. He continued to internationalize the organization, and differentiated the Sanbō Kyōdan from the majority of Japanese Zen organizations by dissolving distinctions between monastic and lay practitioners; emphasizing the social dimension of human existence, often discussing political, social, and economic issues; and continuing to break the traditional sectarian barriers that separated Buddhists and Christians. By the end of Yamada's life, approximately one-quarter of the participants at his sesshins were Christians. Kubota Akira Ji'un-ken Roshi (b. 1932) succeeded Yamada as head of the Sanbō Kyōdan in 1989.

The majority of Sanbō Kyōdan adherents practice the Rinzaï Zen meditation method of koan practice, although some practice the Soto Zen meditation technique of shikantaza (just sitting). A range of activities are available at Sanbō Kyōdan centers, including group zazen (sitting meditation) periods totaling two hours, half- or full-day periods of Zen practice on weekends, and week-long meditation retreats (sesshins). The student-teacher relationship is essential to practice, and private meetings of the student and the Zen master, called dokusan, occur regularly.

At least forty people have been authorized as Zen masters in the Sanbō Kyōdan lineage, many of whom were not Japanese, and a number of those have their own successors. Robert Aitken, founder of the DIAMOND SANGHA, is one of the best known. Sanbō Kyōdan Zen masters are not necessarily Buddhists, and they include ordained members of other religious traditions, such as the Jesuit priest Hugo Makibi Enomiya-Lassalle (1898–1991) and the Benedictine Willigis Jäger (b. 1925).

Sanbō Kyōdan has some fifteen affiliated centers in Japan, the Philippines, Australia, Canada, the United States, England, France, Germany, and Spain. In 1995 the Sanbō Kyōdan had 2,539 registered followers in Japan and approximately 2,500 in other countries.

Address:

Sanbō Kyōdan
 San-un Zendo, 1-6-5 Hase
 Kamakura-shi, 248-0016
 Japan

Michelle Spuler

Sources:

Habito, Ruben. "No Longer Buddhist nor Christian." Buddhist Christian Studies 10 (1990): 231–237.

Sharf, Robert H. "Sanbokyodan: Zen and the Way of the New Religions." Japanese Journal of Religious Studies 22, 3–4 (1995): 417–458.

See also the "Harada-Yasutani School of Zen Buddhism" page on T. Matthew Ciolek's extensive Virtual Buddhism site. Posted at <http://www.ciolek.com/WWWVLPages/ZenPages/HaradaYasutani.html>.

Sangir-Talaud Evangelical Church (GMIST)

The Sangir-Talaud Evangelical Church (Gereja Masehi Injili in Sangir-Talaud) dates from the sixteenth century. Missionaries of the ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH came to the Sangir archipelago in the 1560s, and in 1563 the king of Siau was baptized. Roman Catholics were driven out by the Dutch, who came to power in the region in 1677. A few missionaries representative of the REFORMED CHURCHES IN THE NETHERLANDS arrived during the years of the East Indies Company, but, for the most part, through the eighteenth century the islanders were neglected. Only in the early nineteenth century were they rediscovered and reintegrated into the Reformed church.

In 1857 four missionaries arrived in Sangir Island, and four more subsequently settled in the Talaud Islands. The Christian community still existed on Sangir, but it had disappeared in the Talaud. On Sangir, where the missionaries had carpentry skills, they cleared forestland and created a plantation that became the focus of a theocratic society. Church membership rose steadily through the rest of the century. A decided change in organization occurred in 1921, when native members were invited into the leadership of the church for the first time. In that year, sixteen ministers were ordained and the first steps in the creation of a presbyterial church structure were taken. That process was disrupted by World War II, but in 1947 the first synod of the GMIST was convened.

The GMIST has had to deal with the changing situation of the archipelago in the larger nation. Church members have expanded into western Indonesia and the Philippines. The residents of Talaud (80 percent of whom are members of the church) have asserted their desire to form an independent church.

In the 1990s the church reported 220,000 members in 355 congregations. The church oversees a theological school at Tahuna, Sangir. It is a member of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES and the WORLD ALLIANCE OF REFORMED CHURCHES.

Address:

Sangir-Talaud Evangelical Church
P.O. Box 121
Tahuna, Sangir-Talaud Sulawesi Utara
Indonesia

Source:

Bauswein, Jean-Jacques, and Lukas Vischer, eds. The Reformed Family Worldwide: A Survey of Reformed Churches, Theological Schools, and International Organizations. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans, 1999.

Sant Mat

See Radhasoami; Sikhism and the Sant Mat Tradition

Sant Nirankari Mission

The Sant Nirankari Mandal (or Mission) was founded in 1929 by Baba Buta Singh Ji (1873–1943), who was raised as a Sikh in the Punjab and as a young man found himself on a quest to know God. He also developed a talent for reciting Gurbani (the holy verses from the Adi Granth, the Sikh holy book). His search led him to an encounter with Bhai Sahib Kahan Singh Ji, who taught him a secret of receiving Brahm Gyan, or God Knowledge. Subsequently, Buta Singh began sharing the secret with whosoever showed an interest, the result being that the Sant Nirankari Mission was founded in May of 1929. Joining Buta Singh in this effort was Baba Avtar Singh Ji (1900–1969), who would later succeed him as the organization's guru (teacher)/leader.

After receiving Knowledge in a manner that remains confidential among members, they are taught to remember God at all times through repeating "Ik Tu Hi Nirankar" (Thou Formless One), from which practice the group receives its name. They also are encouraged to follow five principles: (1) Since all assets belong to God, one should not feel proud of their possession; (2) One should not take pride in one's caste, creed, race, faith, or other similar distinctions, and not hate others on that account; (3) One should not look down on others because of their mode of dress, diet, or living; (4) One should not renounce the worldly life to become a recluse or ascetic; (5) One should not divulge the Divine Knowledge bestowed by the satguru to others without his permission. At the same time, one should not take pride in being enlightened.

The orientation toward the satguru who imparts knowledge relates the Nirankaris to the RADHASOAMI Sant Mat tradition, which also differs from orthodox Sikhs who no longer have a living guru and no confidential teachings. Baba Avtar Singh Ji was succeeded by Baba Gurbachan Singh Ji (1930–1980) and the present satguru, Baba Hardev Singh Ji Maharaj (b. 1954). During the 1970s the Nirankaris came into open conflict with the Sikh community, especially those elements who were working for the separation of the Punjab from India. Violent clashes included the attack upon Nirankaris at their worship center, the Baisakhi Samagam, in Amritsar in 1978. When police tried to quell the violence, they opened fire and eighteen people were killed. Two years later, Gurbachan Singh was assassinated.

Santería

Baba Hardev Singh Ji Maharaj succeeded his father as the new satguru. His leadership has been marked by a number of tours to Nirankari centers across India and around the world. The Sant Nirankari Mandal has its headquarters in Delhi. It established itself there soon after the country became independent, a fact that led to some criticism by the larger Sikh community in the Punjab. There are more than one hundred branches of the mission outside India, including countries in Asia, Africa, the Middle East, Europe, and North America.

Address:

Sant Nirankari Colony
Delhi 110 009
India
<http://www.nirankari.org>
<http://www.nirankari.net>
<http://www.nirankari.com>

Sources:

Chugh, J. S. Fifty Years of Spiritual Bliss: Commemorative Souvenir on the Golden Jubilee Nirankari Sant Samagam, November 6–10, 1997. Delhi: Sant Nirankari Mandal, 1997.
Joshi, Nirmal, and Bhupender Bekal, eds. Salvation Tours (1995–96). Delhi: Sant Nirankari Mandal, 1997.

Santería

Santería is the common name given to West African, especially Yoruban, religion as it manifested among African residents forcefully brought to the Spanish-controlled islands of the Caribbean during the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries. African religion survived in part by adopting a Roman Catholic overlay. Its name derived from the identification of various African deities, the Orishas, with Catholic saints. Practitioners thought of their faith as the Reign of the Orishas (Regla de Ocha). White people, seeing what they considered an undue emphasis on and devotion to the saints, called the religion Santería. Santería is also known as La Regla Lucumí (from Lucum, the Yoruba language as it is spoken in Cuba and the United States).

Among the Yoruban and related peoples, the pantheon of divinities is headed by Olorun, the High God. As he is a somewhat remote deity, more attention is directed to the Orisha, who are seen as the creators of the Earth and responsible for planting human life here. Among the Orisha are Ogun, the god of metals, and Esu, generally associated with divination. In addition, some ancestors have attained popular status as divine beings, such as Sango (or Chango), and are popularly thought of as identical with the Orisha. In the Santería system, Sango was identified as St. Barbara, Babalz Ayi became St. Lazarus, and Eleggua or Elegba became St. Anthony (the identification being based upon realms of human life with which the saint was associated). The Orisha are seen as sources of power; they are often approached in ceremonies in which people become possessed with the deity, and their spoken words are seen as communications from that particular deity.

Santería operated as a clandestine religion during the slave era, and only in the last half of the twentieth century did it publicly claim the primacy of its African roots. (It was additionally suppressed during the first decades of the Castro regime in Cuba, though it enjoyed a relaxation of restrictions on religion in the 1990s.) At the same time, while affirming its African heritage, it has retained elements of popular Roman Catholic piety, most noticeably the burning of candles with the saints' pictures on personal altars.

Leadership in Santería is decentralized. Male leaders (priests) are known as santeros (or Babalochas), and females (priestesses) as santeras (or Iyalochas). There are no schools or seminaries, training being conducted on a tutorial system with a knowledgeable satero/santera. Prior to initiation into the priesthood, they enter a period of solitude.

Through the twentieth century, with the movement of West Indians to North America, Santería has appeared in many urban centers—its presence being visible in the many botanicas, stores that sell the religious supplies used in the practice of the religion, that can be found in Spanish-speaking communities. Also, in North America, in the climate of religious freedom and pluralism, more public centers of the Orisha faith have become public. Possibly the most visible American Santería center is the Church of Lukumi Babalu Aye, which became the subject of a 1993 Supreme Court case over the church's practice of animal sacrifice, which had been outlawed by the city of Hialeah, a Miami suburb.

The African Theological Archministry has become an important pilgrimage site for African Americans and has increasingly stripped itself of its Santería past and emerged as a Yoruban religious outpost.

The number of followers of Santería is unknown, its semisecret nature and the complex way it mixes with Roman Catholicism making it difficult to make any estimation. It has its strongest centers in Puerto Rico and Cuba, but has a significant following in the United States, especially in Miami, New York City, and southern California. A similar practice is found in Brazil under the name CANDOMBLÉ, and in Haiti as VODOU.

Addresses:

Church of Lukumi Babalu Aye
P.O. Box 22627
Hialeah, FL 33002
<http://www.church-of-the-lukumi.org/>

African Theological Archministry
Oyotunji African Yoruba Village
Box 51
Shelton, SC 29941
<http://www.cultural-expressions.com/oyotunji/default.htm>

Sources:

- Adefunmi I, Oba Efuntola Osejeman Adelabu. Olorisha: A Guidebook into Yoruba Religion. Shelton, SC: privately printed, 1982.
- Canizares, Paul. Cuban Santeria: Walking with the Night. Inner Traditions, 1999.
- Gonzalez-Wippler, Migene. Santeria. New York: Julian, 1973.
- Murphy, Joseph. Santeria: African Spirits in America. Boston: Beacon, 1992.

The Santi Asoka

The Santi Asoka is a new “unorthodox” Buddhist movement in Thailand initiated by Bodhirak (b. 1934), a Buddhist monk. It reacts against some wayward practices of Thai Buddhist monks and laity. Also, it attempts to preserve the Thai traditional ways of life and authentic Buddhist life. Vegetarianism is strongly promoted.

The Santi Asoka was founded in 1973. Bodhirak, formerly Rak Rakpong, was a television entertainer and songwriter with some interest in magic and supernaturalism. After his ordination as a Thammayut monk in Wat Asokaram in 1970, he abandoned his supernaturalistic beliefs and practices and received the ordained name of Phra Bodhirak (The Preserver of Enlightenment). His strict observance of the Buddha’s doctrine attracted a considerable number of faithful Buddhists who gathered more and more in Wat Asokaram, his monastic residence. There he formed a religious group called the Asoka. Since the group was composed of both Thammayut and Mahanikai Buddhists, it was not allowed by the abbot to stay permanently in the monastery. Bodhirak then had to move to Wat Nongkratum, a Mahanikai monastery, to ordain as a Mahanikai monk in 1973. Because of their controversial unorthodoxy in beliefs and practices, their religious propagation was obstructed by the established Thai Buddhist Sangha and self-styled orthodox Buddhists. Bodhirak then declared his resignation from the authoritative power of the Sangha administration on August 8, 1975. Bodhirak’s challenge to the Sangha led to his disrobing and the end of his monastic status in 1989.

The Santi Asokan Buddhists strictly follow their way of life, which includes adherence to Buddhist precepts and discipline as (they believe) originally taught by the Buddha; they live in the Asokan commune in order to help one another to attain their final goal (the end of suffering, or nirvana).

The Asokans are differentiated into ascetics (ordained people) and lay people. Ascetics are composed of the male ordained, the female ordained, and novices. In other words, Asokan ascetics are composed of “monks,” “female monks” or nuns, and novices both male and female. The process of ordination is more difficult to follow and to pass than that of other Thai monastic lineages. Generally, the Asokans live in strict discipline based on chastity, poverty, and spiritual purification. They are strict vegetarians and abstain from sexual lives. Their minimal requirement is to adhere to the Buddhist Five Precepts and to work hard in their self-reliant commune.

The Asoka community has been the subject of considerable controversy. The Asokans deny the authority and the supremacy of the Sangha Supreme Council, which, according to Thai law, rules the Thai Sangha. According to Thai law, Bodhirak had transgressed the law by forming his own hermitages and giving ordination to his disciples. Thus Bodhirak is accused by other “orthodox” Thai Buddhists of having formed his own teachings and interpretations of Buddha’s words regardless of normative meanings of the THERAVADA canon (the Tripitaka).

The leadership and organization of the Santi Asoka are in the sole hands of Bodhirak. The statement of membership is still unknown. The Asokan headquarters is in Bangkok, and there are five additional branches in the country’s other provinces. There is no center abroad.

Address:

Santi Asoka Monastery
67/30 Soi Tiam Porn
Nawamin Rd., Klong Koom
Bung Koom, Bangkok 10240
Thailand

Pataraporn Sirikanchana

Sources:

- Fuengfusakul, Apinya. “Empire of Crystal and Utopian Commune: Two Types of Contemporary Theravada Reform in Thailand.” Sojourn: Social Issues in Southeast Asia 8, 1 (1993): 153–183.
- Sirikanchana, Pataraporn. “Santi Asoka: Its Rise and Religious Roles in Thai Society.” Paper presented to the Buddhist Studies Center, Chulalongkorn University, February 1998.
- Swearer, Donald K. The Buddhist World of Southeast Asia. Albany: State University of New York Press, 1995.

Santo Daime

Ayahuasca is a powerful hallucinogenic brew used by many native peoples across South America. Over the course of the twentieth century it became an integral element in various Brazilian religious movements that, toward the end of the century, spread to North America and Europe. Santo Daime, one branch of that movement, is a new religion founded in Brazil at the beginning of the twentieth century after Raimundo Irineu Serra was introduced to its use.

Ayahuasca (or vine of the dead) is also known as yage (Colombia) and caapi (Brazil). It is prepared from the vine Banisteriopsis caapi by boiling vine segments with various other plants. The resulting drink contains several hallucinogenics, including harmilne and/or N,N-dimethyltyptamine. Archaeological evidence strongly suggests that ayahuasca has been used for centuries. It became known outside Brazil from the description of the experiences of Manuel Villavicencio, published in 1858. Adding to Villavicencio's account were the notes of British explorer Richard Spruce, published in 1908. Then in the 1960s, ayahuasca was rediscovered in the context of the wave of interest in LSD and other hallucinogenics throughout the West. In his 1968 paper "The Sound of Rushing Water," Michael Harder, for example, described his experience with the drug in Ecuador in 1961.

South Americans utilize ayahuasca as a healing substance. They gather, prepare, and consume it with proper ceremony and reverence. In the Upper Amazon, Banisteriopsis caapi is mixed with another plant, Psychotna viridis, and boiled for a full day and then stored until needed. The drug is believed to connect the individual with the force that ties all things together.

At the beginning of the twentieth century, while under the influence of ayahuasca, Raimundo Irineu Serra had a vision of the Virgin Mary who, as Our Lady of Conceição, gave him many new teachings. Out of this experience, he constructed a new religion, Santo Daime, the Religion of the Rainforest. Slowly growing at first, following World War II, it spread across Brazil and then overseas as members have migrated. The appearance of ayahuasca as a sacramental substance by an ethnic religious community has presented legal authorities with a spectrum of problems. At the beginning of 2000, members were arrested in Spain, and the movement has begun an effort to have the drug legalized in the United States and several countries of Western Europe.

Soon after his initial encounter with the Virgin, Mastre Irineu (as the founder is known today) received the text of several new songs that now make up a hymnal for the movement. He also received instructions for three dances, with very simple steps, that were believed to facilitate the flow of divine energy. Additional hymns have been received through the years. As the movement spread to other countries, members received new hymns in languages other than Portuguese, and the movement has accepted these for use during worship.

Santo Daime rituals begin with the separation of the men and women into two groups in the meeting hall. Two lines are formed and the ayahuasca received. As the hymns are sung, some begin dancing. Different songs have different purposes (healing, communicating with spirits, celebration). Additional sips of the sacramental substance are handed out every few hours, and the ceremony may last as long as eight to twelve hours.

Mastre Irineu was succeeded by Padrinho Sabastiao de Melo, who was in turn succeeded by his son, Padrinho Alfredo Gregóno de Melo, the present international leader. A second, smaller group is headed by Padrinho Alfredo's brother, Paulo Roberto de Melo. The larger group was incorporated in Brazil in 1974 as the Eclectic Center of the Universal Flowing Light, the term Eclectic referring to the mixing of Christian and traditional beliefs within the church. It is headed by a Spiritual Council, and is headquartered at Céu do Mapiá, a community created by Padrinho Sabastiao de Melo. Céu do Mapiá is located in the jungle on the Purus River, a tributary of the Amazon. The branch of the movement led by Paulo Roberto has established centers in Hawaii, California, and the Netherlands.

Address:

Centro Eclético da Fluente Luz Universal Virgem da Luz
c/o Ricardo Tadeu dos Santos
Rua Arniando Santos
240-Recrejo dos Bandeirantes, 22.790-330
Rio de Janeiro
Brazil
<http://www.santodaime.org>

Source:

Eclectic Center of the Universal Flowing Light. Posted at <http://www.santodaime.org>. Accessed June 12, 2000.

São Tomé and Príncipe

São Tomé and Príncipe are two islands off of Africa in the Atlantic Ocean south of Nigeria. After more than five hundred years as a colony of Portugal, they became an independent republic in 1975. São Tomé, Príncipe, and the neighboring islands were among the first colonized by the Portuguese in the fifteenth century. They had a fine port and were an ideal location for the establishment of a processing center where slaves could be brought from the coast of Africa and dispatched to various locations in the Americas.

The islands are now inhabited by the Tongas, the original inhabitants found by the Portuguese, as well as other peoples who came to the island during the days of the slave trade or who arrived after the slave trade was abolished. Although most came from the nearby West African coast, a

Status of religions in São Tomé & Príncipe, 2000-2050

Followers	2000			2025	2050
	total	%	rate
Christians	141,000	95.8	2.07	206,000	280,000
Roman Catholics	111,000	75.3	1.80	160,000	210,000
Independents	15,500	10.6	2.34	27,000	40,000
Protestants	5,400	3.7	2.64	12,000	20,000
Baha'is	3,000	2.1	3.92	7,000	11,000
Ethnoreligionists	1,700	1.2	1.54	1,200	1,000
Nonreligious	1,400	1.0	4.51	3,000	5,000
Muslims	60	0.0	1.67	100	170
Total population	147,000	100.0	2.14	217,000	297,000

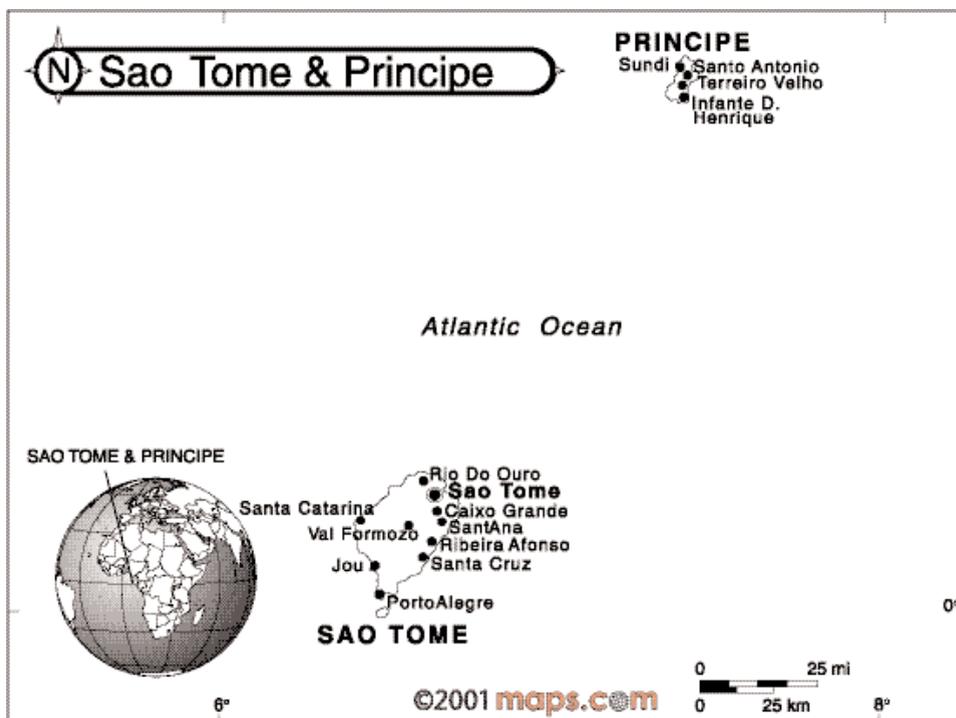

number derive from the people of the former Portuguese colonies of Angola and Mozambique.

Although most Africans passed through São Tomé on their way to the Americas, some were brought to work the plantations that were created on the islands. After slavery was officially abolished in 1869, a system of indentured servitude was put in place, eventually leading to revolts and repressive actions by the government. The revolution in 1974 in Portugal set the stage for the independence of São Tomé and Príncipe the following year.

During the years of the slave trade and throughout the 1800s, members of numerous African peoples were brought to the islands; though the ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH was established on the islands in 1534, little attempt was made to convert them. At the beginning of the twentieth century, most of the residents of African descent retained their traditional religion. However, intense evangelization efforts were made, and by the 1970s most signs of traditional African religions had disappeared.

In 1534, Pope Paul II created a diocese for São Tomé and the territory being explored and colonized along the African Coast. It was originally attached to the ecclesiastical province of Funchal (Madeira) but later was attached as a suffragan diocese to more established dioceses. Since 1940 it has been attached to Luanda (Angola). The church spread quickly once it turned its attention to the Africans, and by the mid-1970s more than 90 percent of the total population (now some 112,000) had been baptized.

For many years, São Tomé served as the penal colony for Angola. In the 1930s an Angolan who had been exiled to São Tomé, and who also happened to be a Protestant Christian, began a Protestant movement that became the Igreja Evangélica (Evangelical Church). He supplied the first Scriptures and hymnbook for his converts by writing down the passages and hymns he had memorized. His effort was assisted by two African Christians sent from Angola, one by the Evangelical Alliance of Angola in 1957 and one by the Evangelical Church of Central Angola in 1960. Today, Protestantism is also represented by the SEVENTH-DAY ADVENTIST CHURCH, which arrived in 1938, and the ASSEMBLIES OF GOD. There is also a small community of the BAHÁ'Í FAITH on the islands.

Sources:

Garfield, R. A History of Sao Tome Island, 1470–1655: The Key to Guinea. San Francisco: Mellen Research University Press, 1992.
 Hodges, T., and M. Newitt. São Tomé and Príncipe: From Plantation Colony to Microstate. Boulder, CO: Westview, 1988.

Sapta Darma

The founder of Sapta Darma (seven teachings) was originally named Hardjosapuro. He lived in Pare, in East Java, and began to experience direct contact with God in December 1952. This came in the form of automatic movements, which became the basis for the spiritual practice. Particularly notable experiences continued for several years and included not only the movements he experienced physically but also reception of teachings (some of which appeared on the wall of his home), changes in his name, and finally of a name for the practice. His name changed first to Brahmono, then to Rodjopandito, and finally to Sri Gotama. Teachings continued to flow through Sri Gotama until his death in December 1964.

As the name of the group suggests, there are seven points to the central teaching; some of them are ethical imperatives, others are statements of ontological conviction. In Sapta Darma, however, focus is on spiritual practice rather than theory or philosophy. Practice in Sapta Darma is called sujud (Arabic; surrender). Members experience the same movements experienced spontaneously by the founder. Men sit cross-legged, women with feet tucked under them; all report experiencing an awakening of inner energy originating near the base of the spine. This then moves up the spine, leading to an automatic bow, until the forehead touches the floor.

Women wear a white headdress and robe similar to but not the same as those worn by Muslims. The resonances of Sapta Darma names, practice, and theory with Islamic and Indic teachings is not seen as an indication of influence from them. Followers emphasize that their founder did not receive inspiration from, or even know about, other religious teachings. Sapta Darma holds that its theory of talirasa (the rope of feeling) is original. It details the network of energy points in the body related to pathways of life energy and linked to practice of sujud.

Sapta Darma, almost alone among Javanese movements, has argued consistently that it ought to be acknowledged as a “religion.” During the Suharto era, that term was reserved for five “world religions.” From the 1970s until her death in 1996, Sri Pawenang, who led the Yogyakarta-based organization, was bolder than most Javanists in arguing for legitimacy of its practice. As a lawyer she was able to maintain her argument actively in contexts where others had capitulated. Sapta Darma has been prominent as one of the largest Javanese mystical organizations. It once claimed a membership of around 100,000. It has a stronger village following than most Javanist movements and is also exceptional for having attracted a strong ethnic Balinese following.

Paul Stange

Sources:

Hadiwijono, Harun. Man in the Present: Javanese Mysticism.

Baarn, the Netherlands: Bosch and Keuning N.V., 1967.

Pawenang, Sri. Wewarah Sapta Darma. Yogyakarta, n.d.

Sarvodaya

Sarvodaya (the awakening of all), with its programs in 11,600 villages, is undoubtedly the foremost lay Buddhist movement in Sri Lanka, with a strong and active program for the uplifting of human life both materially and spiritually. Although its Buddhist roots are explicit both in doctrine and practice, its outlook bears witness to the perspective of its founder and his philosophy of “active social engagement,” put into practice in rural Sri Lanka and transcending both ethnic and religious boundaries.

In the first week of December 1958, the Lanka Jatika Sarvodaya Sramadana Movement was born, with a commitment to the idea that things can be changed for the better. Sarvodaya began implementing its ideal with a two-week social work camp for schoolchildren held in an underdeveloped, neglected, untouchable Candala village named Kanatoluva, Bingiriya; its goal was to alleviate poverty among the villagers. On January 1, 1958, Dr. A. T. Ariyaratne (b. 1931), the founder of Sarvodaya, had accepted the appointment as a teacher of biology and mathematics at Nalanda College, a prominent Buddhist school founded during the Buddhist revival of the late nineteenth century. The aim of the Grade 10 students’ work camp led by Ariyaratne was to provide an opportunity for urban youth to understand rural life and problems in order to help them to stand on their own feet.

Although Mahatma Gandhi (1869–1948) had used the term sarvodaya to mean the “welfare of all,” Ariyaratne reinterpreted it in Sri Lanka as the “awakening of all,” in the light of his own reading of the teachings of the Buddha. Ariyaratne believes that the four Sublime Abodes (loving-kindness, compassion, sympathetic joy, and equanimity) and the four Modes of Social Conduct (the absence of desire, hatred, fear, and delusion) taught by the Buddha help the process of personality awakening. For Ariyaratne, Sarvodaya is an activity of “awakening all” from an individual perspective to a wholesome state that embraces all of humanity. This awakening process works on “spiritual, moral, cultural, social, economic and political” levels.

One crucial term—sramadana—characterizes Sarvodaya’s contribution to social development as a movement inspired by Buddhist ideas. Sramadana is the selfless act of sharing one’s labor with others. This is an act of charity that Sarvodaya broadly defines as “an act of sharing one’s time, thought, effort and other resources with the community” for the sake of awakening oneself and others. Sarvodaya’s interest was in the inculcation of Buddhist values using Buddhist teachings as a vehicle for development. Sarvodaya sought to affirm the social dimensions of BUDDHISM and the way in which Buddhist teachings can be applied to daily contexts in communal settings. Sarvodaya has criticized materiality when the aggressive accumulation of wealth destroys the values of an unsophisticated rural community.

The Lanka Jatika Sarvodaya Sramadana Sangamaya has an American affiliate, the Mission of Sarvodaya USA. That organization is dedicated to building a North American community that expresses the ideals of Sarvodaya.

In recent years, Sarvodaya has been increasingly attacked for alleged implementation of urban, bourgeois, middle-class values and ideals among rural people. Further, in the early 1990s, it faced severe political threats, to the point of extinction, from the Sri Lankan government of President Premadasa (d. 1993). Nevertheless, the objective of the Sarvodaya movement has been the generation of a “non-violent revolution toward the creation of a Sarvodaya Social Order that will ensure the total awakening of human personalities.” Using Buddhist philosophical insights, the traditional values and aspirations of Sri Lankan culture, and Gandhian ideas, Ariyaratne was able to propose and develop a sustainable, nature-friendly alternative development strategy. In Sarvodaya’s four decades of village development work, four values—truth, nonviolence, self-denial, and charity—dominate the scene and determine its success as a grassroots Buddhist movement.

Address:

Lanka Jatika Sarvodaya Sramadana Sangamaya
Damsak Mandira
98 Rawatawatta Rd.
Moratuwa
Sri Lanka

Mahinda Deegalle

Sources:

- Ariyaratne, A. T. Collected Papers. 2 vols. Moratuwa: Sarvodaya Research Institute, 1980.
- . The Power Pyramid and the Dharmic Cycle. Ratmalana: Sarvodaya Vishva Lekha, 1988.
- Bond, George. "Conflicts of Identity and Interpretation of Buddhism: The Clash between the Sarvodaya Shramadana Movement." In Buddhist Fundamentalism and Minority Identities in Sri Lanka, edited by Tessa J. Bartholomeusz and Chandra R. de Silva, pp. 36–52. Albany: State University of New York Press, 1998.
- Gombrich, Richard F., and Gananath Obeyesekere. Buddhism Transformed: Religious Change in Sri Lanka. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1988.
- Perera, J., C. Marasinghe, and L. Jayasekera, eds. A People's Movement under Siege. Moratuwa: Sarvodaya Book Publishing Services, 1992.

Satanism

Satanism refers to the worship of Satan, the Christian devil. While posed as an idea in the Middle Ages, when people accused of being witches were charged with worshipping the devil, self-avowed Satanists do not appear to have arisen prior to the time of Louis XIV. At that time, a group practicing the black mass (a parody of the central act of worship of the ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH) and the ritual killing of infants was uncovered operating in Louis's court. Satanism, when it has subsequently appeared, had manifested as an attack upon a dominant Christianity and the society it has supported.

Accounts of actual Satanism prior to the 1960s are quite rare. Satanists produced almost no literature, the 1891 volume La Bas by French esotericist Joris Karl Huysmans (1848–1907) being notable by its uniqueness. Each new Satanist group came into existence without reference to prior groups, and each was unable to pass along Satanism to a second generation. Satanism differs from every other religious ideology in that the understanding of what Satanism is and what Satanists do was almost totally the product of the vivid imagination of Christian writers who had never met a Satanist and had had no direct encounter with or information about any actually existing Satanist group. The majority of Satanist groups were created by people who had decided to create something that conformed to a conception about which Christian writers had previously fantasized.

Through the mid-twentieth century, a variety of cases appeared in which small groups of teenagers assembled in informal Satanic groups, which subsequently became known when they were discovered breaking into churches to steal communion wafers or vandalizing a graveyard. On occasion the mutilated body of a dog or cat was seen as the remains of a Satanic ritual.

The perception of Satanism changed significantly in 1968 when Anton Sandor LaVey (1930–1997) announced the formation of the CHURCH OF SATAN. This unique organization became the subject of much media coverage and even attracted several celebrities. Interest in Satanism, both pro and con, was also stimulated by Rosemary's Baby, a 1968 movie about a Satanist cult, and the publication in 1971 of William Blatty's The Exorcist. The movie version of Blatty's book (1973) would set off a wave of interest in exorcism, and lead to a fresh set of Christian anti-Satanism texts.

Although various reporters projected exorbitant figures for membership in the Church of Satan, it never had more than a few members, most of whom consisted of people who paid a modest membership fee and received the organization's periodical. By 1974, however, the core of the Church of Satan had been splintered by a schism among a number of the church's leaders, including Michael Aquino, LaVey's capable assistant. With the exception of the Temple of Set, founded by Aquino, most of the splinters survived only a short time, and interest in Satanism waned significantly.

A new wave of interest in Satanism emerged in the mid-1980s around two phenomena. First, several women, initially Michelle Smith and Loren Stafford, published books describing their reported lives as members of a Satanist group when teenagers. In each case they reported that they had forgotten their involvement and remembered their experience only later during counseling. Although both the Smith and Stafford cases would later be exposed as hoaxes, in a short time additional women came forth with similar stories. Second, a variety of cases appeared in which young children accused adults of having forced them to participate in Satanic rituals as members of ongoing Satanic cults, the most famous case involving multiple accusations directed at the teachers/administrators of a day school in Manhattan Beach, California. The McMartin case lasted for three years and resulted in acquittals of the accused. The turning point in the case came with revelation of the manner in which many of the children had been coached to produce negative testimony.

The second wave of interest in Satanism supplied by the forgotten memory cases and accusations rose as literally hundreds of accusations of Satanic activity were registered during the late 1980s and early 1990s. Government officials and psychological counselors came forward with words of support. The interest passed, however, as a variety of hoaxes and false accusations were uncovered, as the forgotten memories were understood to be cases of what psychologists now call “false memory syndrome,” and as no Satanic activity was uncovered that could have been responsible for so many accounts. As in the past, the stories of Satanism in the 1980s proved to be the product of vivid imaginations.

Sathya Sai Baba Movement

What remains of Satanic activity is the spectrum of small groups that have grown out of the Church of Satan and sporadic, short-lived teenage experiments with the dark side of occultism and malevolent magic. On rare occasions, those experiments, especially when carried out with the use of mood-altering drugs, have led to the death of one or more of the participants.

It should be noted that members of modern Neo-Pagan and Wicca groups, because they often describe themselves as witches, are frequently labeled Satanists. This connection between witchcraft and Satanism was made in Europe in the Middle Ages by Christian leaders, many of whom were connected with the Inquisition. From Catholic leaders, the idea passed to Protestant ministers and from them into the popular consciousness. Contemporary Neo-Pagans, who have a positive spirituality built around a oneness with nature, have attempted to dispel any association between themselves and Satanism.

Sources:

- Kelly, Henry Ansgar. The Devil, Demonology, and Witchcraft. Garden City, NY: Doubleday, 1974.
- Lanning, Kenneth V. Investigator's Guide to Allegations of "Ritual" Child Abuse. Quantico, VA: Behavioral Science Unit, National Center for the Analysis of Violent Crime, Federal Bureau of Investigation, FBI Academy, 1992. Posted at http://www.geocities.com/Athens/Delphi/4979/lanning_9201.html.
- Lyon, Arthur. Satan Wants You. London: Rupert Hart-Davies, 1970.
- Nathan, Debbie, and Michael Snedeker. Satan's Silence: Ritual Abuse and the Making of a Modern American Witch Hunt. New York: Basic Books, 1995.
- Richardson, James T., Joel Best, and David G. Bromley, eds. The Satanism Scare. Hawthorne, NY: Aldine de Gruyter, 1991.
- Smith, Michelle, and Lawrence Pazner. Michelle Remembers. New York: Congdon and Lattes, 1980.
- Stratford, Lauren. Satan's Underground. Eugene, OR: Harvest House, 1988.

Sathya Sai Baba Movement

The contemporary Indian guru Sathya Sai Baba was born to a non-Brahmin kshatriya family on November 25, 1926, in the village of Puttaparthi in Andhra Pradesh, India. His name was Sathya Narayana Raju. As a child he was renowned for materializing sweets for his friends and locating lost items. At fourteen, some time after a seizure perhaps caused by a scorpion bite, he suddenly called his family and neighbors to his bedside and declared that he was Sai Baba. By this he claimed to be the reincarnation of the miracle-working Maharashtran saint Sai Baba of Shirdi (c. 1856–1918). The new Sai Baba, Sathya Sai Baba (Sai Baba of truth), now claimed to be the second of three Sai Baba incarnations. His own successor is to be known as Prema Sai Baba (Sai Baba of love).

After his declaration, Sathya Sai Baba began performing miracles and delivering teachings and soon gathered a following in India. Gradually word spread abroad, and people began flocking to Sai Baba in the hope of being helped by one of his miracles. Devotees' publications describe extraordinary cures, resurrections from the dead, materializations of religious trinkets, mind reading, and astral travel. Sai Baba's most common miracle, however, is his manifestation of ash known as vibhuti, performed by waving his right hand in a circular motion. Usually he gives the ash to devotees, often with instructions to use it medicinally. Above all it is conviction about Sai Baba's paranormal powers that is the hallmark of a devotee.

The movement has great appeal to the cosmopolitan middle classes, particularly among diasporic Indian communities, Europeans, and North Americans. As of 1995 almost seventeen hundred Sathya Sai Baba centers and groups were registered in more than 130 countries, from all continents. In Puttaparthi various institutions have been established with funds raised by the organization: a school, a college, and a hospital. The global organization is administered pyramidally, structured with regional, national, and local chairmen. A registered center must have a chairman, secretary, and treasurer, and must provide three activities—worship, spiritual education, and charity.

The organization is supported through anonymous donations, and there are no membership fees. The total number of devotees is difficult to estimate, as many worship Sai Baba without registering as members or even attending the centers. Sai Baba devotees have created an extensive Internet presence.

The movement follows the style of Hindu bhakti devotionism. It emphasizes the individual's personal commitment to Sai Baba himself as personification of divinity. Love of God is emphasized over scriptural learning or renunciation, and the worshipper is encouraged to transcend desire from within the world. Selfless love and charitable service are promoted, rather than withdrawal from the world. The teachings are ecumenical and stress a single godhead as the essence of all religious traditions. Sai Baba insists that the true devotee is one who learns to practice his own religion well, rather than convert to another.

Sai Baba education promotes a set of “universal human values” emanating from the Hindu principles of prema, shanti, ahimsa, sathya, and dharma (love, peace, nonviolence, truth, and duty) but said to underlie all religions. The symbol of the Sai Baba organization is a lotus flower in whose five petals these Sanskrit terms are written. Sai Baba altars often include a range of godforms from several of the world religions, usually with a picture of Sai Baba or his feet in the center. Worship is structured along the lines of Hindu puja worship and usually includes offerings of flowers to the image of Sai Baba, chanting of Sanskrit mantras, singing of devotional songs (bhajans) in Sanskrit and other languages, recitation of prayers, and the offering of burning camphor (arathi) to the altar. Prasad, or offerings, obligatorily including vibhuti are then distributed to the congregation. At some centers individuals will recite personal experiences of miracles to the audience or deliver messages taken from the Sai Baba literature. The literature used by the movement is not written by Sai Baba himself but consists of his numerous speeches, noted down and published by devotees. Sai Baba also makes frequent reference to the Bhagavadgita, and even makes unsystematic references to other texts from both Hinduism and other world religions.

The Sai Baba movement has stimulated some controversy. There is at least one organization in India that has launched a personal crusade against Sai Baba and other miracle workers. Video films of Sai Baba performing “faked” materializations have been released, as have books publishing evidence against some of the devotees’ claims of miracle experiences. Stories have also circulated about sexual harassment of boys at the Sathya Sai College, sponsored by the organization and located close to the ashram in Puttaparthi. Generally, though, the movement has been unmarred by these accusations, and it continues to attract influential members to its following.

Address:

Sathya Sai Baba
Prasanthi Nilayam
Dist. Anantapur
Andhra Pradesh 515134
India
<http://eaisai.com/baba>
<http://web.singnet.com.sg/~changfam/>

Alexandra Kent

Sources:

- Bowen, D. The Sathya Sai Baba Community in Bradford: Its Origin and Development, Religious Beliefs and Practices. Monograph Series, Community Religions Project. Leeds: Department of Theology and Religious Studies, University of Leeds, 1988.
- Kasturi, N. Sathyam, Sivam, Sundaram: The Life Story of Bhagavan Sri Sathya Sai Baba. 3 vols. Prasaanthi Nilayam, A.P.: Sri Sathya Sai Books and Publications Trust, 1973–1975.
- Klass, Morton. Singing with Sai Baba: The Politics. Boulder, CO: Westview Press, 1991. Reprint, Prospect Heights, IL: Waveland, 1996.
- Manual of Sri Sathya Sai Baba Dal and Guidelines for Activities*. Bombay: World Council of the Sri Sathya Sai Organizations, 1979.

Sandweiss, S. Sai Baba: The Holy Man . . . and the Psychiatrist. New Delhi: M. Gulab Singh and Sons, 1975. Reprint, San Diego: Birth Day, 1975.

Satmar Hassidism

The Satmar, one of the newer Hassidic communities, has become known as one of the few anti-Zionist groups operating in the Jewish community. Members believe that the present state of Israel is illegitimate and that efforts to set up a Jewish state in Palestine are contrary to Jewish teachings. The group was founded by Rebbe Yoel Teitelbaum (1887–1979), the younger son of the Rebbe for Szigetter Hassidim. Following his father’s death, he moved to Satu Mare (Hungary), where he was eventually named chief rabbi. His charisma and allegiance to tradition brought him a large following. Although he opposed the Zionists, they were the ones who in 1944 saved him from the Holocaust. After living out the war in Switzerland and a visit to Palestine, he came to America in 1947. He set about the task of re-creating a community similar to the one that had existed prior to the war. Many Hungarian-Americans flocked to his cause.

Teitelbaum settled in the Williamsburg section of Brooklyn, New York, and soon several hundred families had associated with him. The community soon adopted the distinctive clothing of the Old World communities and a variety of practices peculiar to ultra-Orthodox life. The establishment of the state of Israel became a problem of major proportion. Most Orthodox had opposed Zionism, a program initiated by liberal and secular Jews. They believed that only the Messiah could bring the rebirth of Israel. Although many Orthodox groups later accommodated to or became avid supporters of Israel, the Satmar continued in their opposition and found support in what it perceived to be the new government’s antireligious policies. The Satmar who resided in Palestine organized rallies against the new state. They also refused to serve in the Israeli army or participate in elections. Following the liberation of Jerusalem in 1967, the late Rabbi Yoel Teitelbaum, the Satmar Rebbe, forbade his followers from visiting the Western Wall because it had been regained not by divine miracles but by Israel’s army, the military arm of a “regime of heretics.”

Teitelbaum was able to rally Orthodox and anti-Zionist Jews, especially those of Hungarian extraction, and the Satmar emerged in Jewish communities in Europe (Belgium, United Kingdom) and South America (Brazil, Argentina, Uruguay). In 1968, Rebbe Yoel had a stroke that hobbled him for the rest of his life. He died in 1979, and after a year of mourning was succeeded by his nephew Rebbe Moshe Teitelbaum.

The Satmar developed a relationship with the Neturei Karta (Guardians of the City), an Israeli-based anti-Zionist group, which placed itself under the Satmar’s care and guidance. In 1965, Rabbi Amram Blau, the founder of the Neturei Karta, married a divorced convert to Judaism (formerly a Roman Catholic). As a result, the Satmar forced his ouster from leadership.

The Satsang Network

There are approximately fifty thousand Satmar in the United States. Most live in Brooklyn, but some have moved to the Satmar community, Kiryas Yoel, established in 1974 in upstate New York. Centers in other countries are considerably smaller. There are an estimated seventy thousand Satmar worldwide.

Sources:

Mintz, Jerome R. Hasidic People: A Place in the New World. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1992.

Rubin, Israel. Satmar: Two Generations in an Urban Island. New York: Peter Lang, 1997.

The Satsang Network

This loosely organized new religious phenomenon appeared in the beginning of the 1990s. It is focused around several dozen Westerners, announced as enlightened or awakened, who travel around the world to give satsang, or meetings aimed at helping others to make the transition to enlightenment. Besides the activity of satsang and the core teaching of enlightenment, they share reference to one or, more commonly, at least two out of three Indian gurus: Osho (1931–1990), Poonjaji (1910–1997) (with connections to Ramana Maharshi [1879–1950]), and Sri Swami Hans Raj Maharaj in Rishikesh (born around 1925). The Satsang network thus came into being at the intersection between three different Indian religious traditions. Another common feature holding the network together is the followers, who often accept several of the enlightened Westerners as enlightened teachers, and visit satsang given by all of them.

Many of the satsang givers have a history of intense involvement with the Osho movement. After the death of Osho in 1990, several of his disciples started visiting Poonjaji. Vasant (male), from Norway, was the life guard of Osho for several years, before he met Poonjaji in the middle of the 1990s. Arjuna (male), from the United States, and Rahasya (male), from Germany, have similar stories. Thus, the Satsang Network could be considered a post-Osho development. However, there are also satsang givers without connections to Osho, such as Shantimayi (female, the United States), a disciple of Sri Hans Maharaj with a background in Buddhism, or Gangaji (female, the United States), a disciple of Poonjaji, also with a background in Buddhism. Both of the latter have disciples of their own who in turn are considered enlightened.

The core teaching of the Satsang Network is that enlightenment is here for everyone at the present moment. To become enlightened one should just drop all concepts, ideas, and beliefs. A consequence of this teaching is that other ideological traits are downplayed. As in the Osho movement, the world is seen as divine, and there is no need for renunciation. Although no techniques are explicitly recommended to realize enlightenment, sometimes, as in the Osho movement, different kinds of personal growth and therapeutic work are practiced.

Satsang is a traditional activity in the Indian spiritual context, meaning “being together with truth.” In the Satsang Network, satsang is characterized by active participation of the audience, music, dance, and high spirits. The focus in satsang is on enlightenment and how to drop the thinking that one is not enlightened. The satsang givers clearly occupy a special position in the movement, but at the same time they are conceived of in a much more egalitarian way than Eastern spiritual teachers normally are in the East.

The Satsang Network has no central organization, no name, and no membership; it could be considered a conglomeration of several interconnected networks. Some of the satsang givers have their own enterprises or foundations for personal and spiritual development. Some examples include: Ganesh Foundation (200 Wetmore Lane, Petaluma, CA 94952, Internet site at <http://www.ganeshafoundation.org/>), the organization of Shantimayi; The Living Essence Foundation (Box 2746, Grass Valley, CA 95945, Internet site at <http://www.livingessence.com/resource.htm>), by Arjuna; and The Gangaji Foundation (505A San Marin Dr., Suite 120, Novato, CA 94945, Internet site at <http://www.gangaji.org/>).

The Satsang Network is global, satsang givers of different national origin traveling mainly in Europe, the United States, Australia, South America, Japan, and India. Because of the lack of organization, it is difficult to estimate the number of persons engaged. Satsang givers number several dozen, and satsangs must regularly reach several thousand. The level of engagement is, however, often quite low.

Liselotte Frisk

Sources:

http://home.swipnet.se/ananda/satsang_links.htm

<http://www.livingsatsang.nl>

<http://www.satsang.de/>

<http://go.to/satsang>.

Saudi Arabia

The story of the emergence of Saudi Arabia is intimately connected with the rise of Islam. At the time when Muhammad appeared on the stage of history (c. 570–632), the Arabian Peninsula was home to a variety of groups, many headed by their own sheik and following a traditional polytheistic religion. Around 610, Muhammad began to preach the message he had received from God (later written down in the Qur'an). He attacked the image worship of his neighbors and called for the destruction of the idols. He also called upon the rich to give assistance to the poor. Muhammad was of the Hashim people, who had risen to dominate Mecca where a worship center, the Kabah, had been a source of pilgrimage. The Hashimites were in charge of the Kabah, which at the beginning of the seventh century housed hundreds of deity images. One of the commands in the Qur'an instructed Muhammad and his followers to purify the Kabah.

In 622, Muhammad was invited to Yathib (Medina) to arbitrate the feuds that were dividing its people. Islam is usually dated from that move, called the Hegira. Muhammad soon proclaimed the rightness of going to war against Islam's enemies, especially the Meccans, and by 629 he was in command in the city of his birth. He smashed the idols at the Kabah and made of it a place of pilgrimage for Muslims.

With the conquest of Mecca, Muhammad emerged as the strongest person on the Arabian Peninsula, and many of the sheikdoms sought an alliance with him. Subsequently, they and their people became Muslims. These alliances both created a new political community and ended much of the fighting between the different groups.

The expansion of Arab power came during the rulership of Umar (634–644): The Arabs moved outward to take control of Syria, Palestine, Egypt, and Persia (Iran). Interestingly, the Arabs were not seafaring people and made no move across the Red Sea to Ethiopia or the Sudan. A hereditary monarchy (the Umayyad Caliphate) would be established in 661 by Mu'awiya I (d. 680). Under him and his successors, the Arab Empire would reach from Morocco and Spain to what is today Pakistan. However, the empire's capital was moved to Damascus, and Arabia proper retained its place primarily as the point of origin of Islam and the site of the hajj, the pilgrimage to Mecca required of each Muslim at least once in a lifetime.

Life in Arabia continued at a slow pace oriented on the trade in the cities and the agriculture and sheepherding in the rural areas. Although nominally a part of successive

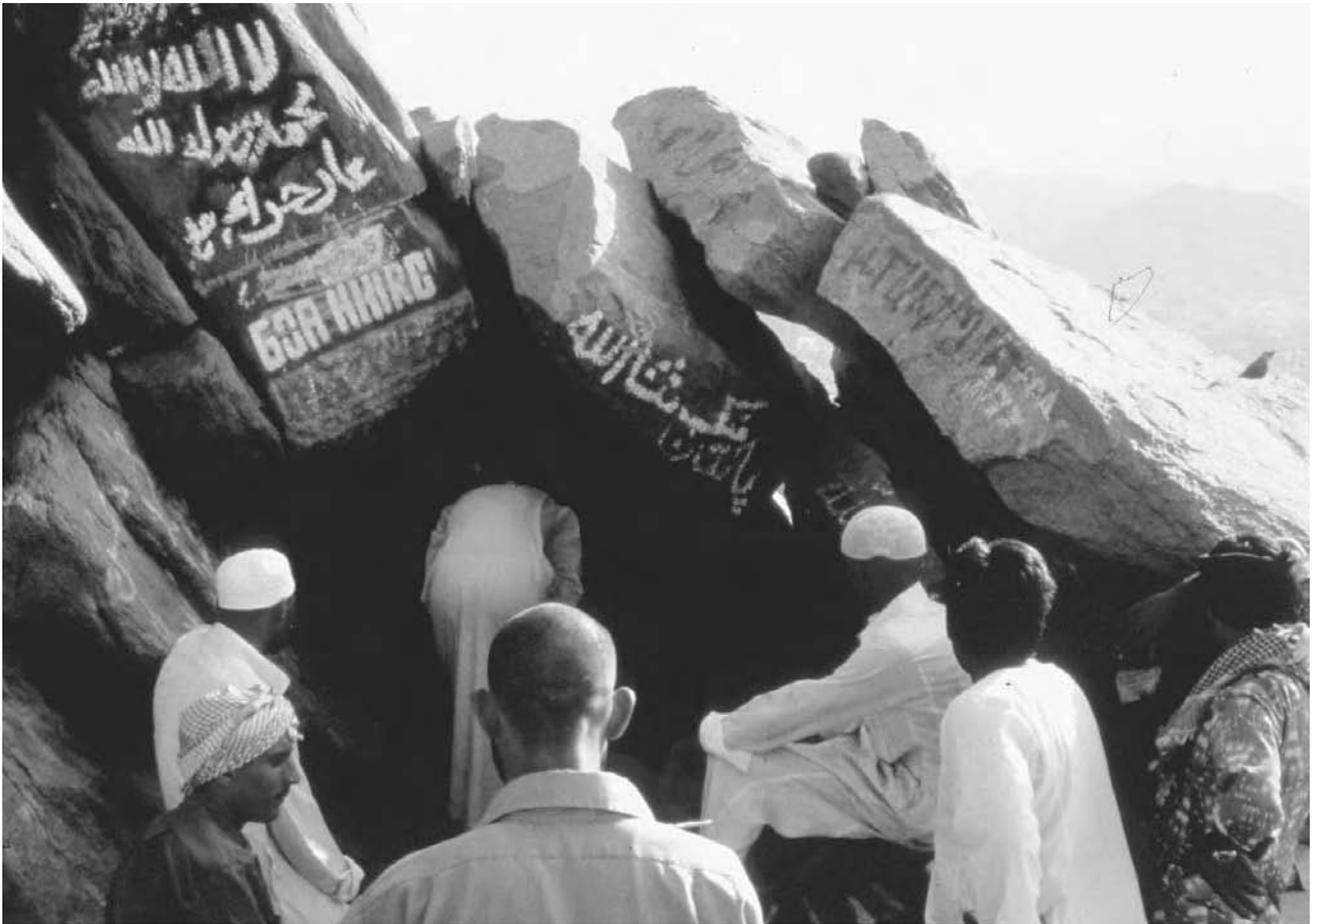

Status of religions in Saudi Arabia, 2000-2050

Followers	2000			2025	2050
	total	%	rate
Muslims	20,252,000	93.7	2.98	36,318,000	47,312,000
Christians	798,000	3.7	3.39	1,900,000	3,290,000
Roman Catholics	626,000	2.9	3.35	1,500,000	2,600,000
Independents	85,000	0.4	3.54	200,000	350,000
Protestants	38,000	0.2	3.71	90,000	160,000
Hindus	240,000	1.1	4.13	600,000	1,200,000
Nonreligious	131,000	0.6	4.81	800,000	2,000,000
Buddhists	70,500	0.3	2.90	150,000	300,000
Sikhs	41,500	0.2	3.29	90,000	150,000
Ethnoreligionists	39,300	0.2	8.75	40,000	80,000
Chinese folk-religionists	19,400	0.1	2.58	34,000	60,000
Neoreligionists	17,200	0.1	2.67	35,000	60,000
Atheists	5,000	0.0	2.69	10,000	20,000
Baha'is	4,000	0.0	3.38	8,000	16,000
Total population	21,607,000	100.0	3.02	39,965,000	54,461,000

Muslim empires, the most important being the Abbasid (beginning in 750 C.E.) and the Ottoman (beginning in the thirteenth century), many parts of Arabia operated for long periods as semiautonomous regions, of peripheral concern to the rulers of the empire.

Change began to take place with the rise of the Saud family in the eighteenth century. As the Ottoman Empire was losing its ability to govern so large a territory, the Saudis established the independent Emirate of Najd in the center of the peninsula, with their capital at Riyadh. Forced out of power for a period at the end of the nineteenth century, they regrouped in Kuwait and reestablished themselves at the end of World War I, with British assistance. In 1926 they moved on Mecca and, following its conquest, Abd-al-Aziz ibn Saud, the head of the family, was proclaimed king of Hijaz and sultan of Najd. Six years later this kingdom became the modern nation of Saudi Arabia. He adapted the old structures of the land to his rule, assigning the emirs the leadership of districts, and local chiefs and their armies control on the local level. The government continues as an absolute monarchy with no elective political offices.

The Prophet's Cave in Mount Hira, Saudi Arabia (TRIP)

The rise to power of the Saud family is intimately connected with the WAHHABI ISLAM movement. Muhammad ibn Walihab (d. 1787) was a Muslim leader who attacked the Ottoman leadership for their lax manner, especially in their observance of the law. He in effect revived the HANBALITE SCHOOL OF ISLAM, which had largely died out. The Hanbalites had rejected the various methods of expanding the law by using analogy and reason, and felt that the law as handed down in the Qur'an should be observed as literally as possible. The Saud family found their greatest allies in the Wahhabis, and both of their fortunes rose together. Sunni Islam is the stated religion of Saudi Arabia, and the Wahhabi School the dominant form.

The king of Saudi Arabia is considered the spiritual leader of all Muslims. That is recognized in several ways, including his role as guardian of the shrine in Mecca. Each year, following the Aid El Kebir, the Feast of the Sacrifices, he enters the Kaaba, the black cubic shrine at the center of the mosque in Mecca. He washes its interior and changes the black cloth that encloses it. He is the only person allowed to enter the shrine.

A form of Muslim devotion is a common part of Saudi life. The Shari'ah (Muslim law) operates throughout the culture (including the school system), and five times daily other matters come to a halt as a brief time is taken for prayer.

Other forms of Orthodox Islam are tolerated in Saudi Arabia. Sunnis of the SHAFIITE SCHOOL OF ISLAM are strong in the western part of the country, the region along the Red Sea, and there are pockets of both HANAFITE and MALIKITE believers, especially at Al-Hufuf, inland from the Persian Gulf. There are some sixty thousand ISMAILIS at Ahsa, and a small number of Zaydites in the area near the border with Yemen. Through the tenth century, Sufism spread through most of the Islamic Empire, including Arabia, from its main center in Baghdad.

The Muslim establishment in Arabia has several organizations of international importance. In 1963, the MUSLIM WORLD LEAGUE was created, and remains headquartered in Mecca. It is the Muslim equivalent of the Christians' WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES, and attempts to bring a greater sense of unity to the Muslim world. It also assists Muslims in countries in which they are the minority, and to that end it has opened numerous national offices around the world. The Organization of the Islamic Conference, with headquarters in Jeddah, was established in 1969 during the first Conference of the Muslim World, which was held in Rabat, Morocco. The occasion of its formation was the burning of the al-Aqsa Mosque in Jerusalem. It includes representatives of the majority of nations in which Muslims are the dominant faith, who consult together to promote cooperation and mutual assistance in various fields of interest. Its Triennial Conferences bring together the heads of some fifty-five nations.

Through the government's Ministry of Education, a number of Muslim institutions of higher learning, which have influence far beyond the border of the country, have been established. Included among these schools are the Faculty of the Sharia and Islamic Studies (Mecca), the Islamic University of Medina, the Higher Institute of Judiciary (Riyadh), and the Islamic Jurisprudence College (Mecca). The annual visitation of pilgrims to Mecca is overseen by the government's Department of Hajj.

According to tradition, Christianity was brought to Arabia by Bartholemew, one of the original twelve Apostles. Christians did find their way to the peninsula over the next centuries, and by the sixth century a variety of churches could be found. These were completely submerged into Islam from the seventh century. Christianity did not return until the nineteenth century. The ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH established work at Aden (Yemen) in 1841. A vicariate of Arabia was formed in 1889 and is administered from Abu Dhabi (United Arab Emirates). Work in Dhahran is limited to expatriates, though it has grown in recent years because of the expansion of the oil business.

In 1890, Samuel Zwemer, representing the American Arabian Mission, opened a center in Aden and began an effort to create a Christian presence in the area, but he was never allowed to evangelize in Arabia. During the early twentieth century, two churches, one affiliated with the CHRISTIAN BROTHERS and one with the CHURCHES OF CHRIST, emerged in Dhahran, but were limited to serving expatriates. Several additional churches have appeared in recent decades, including Unitarian congregations and some small Evangelical groups. There are also small numbers of expatriates connected with the Orthodox churches (Greek, Coptic, and Syrian). Officially, all religions other than Islam are prohibited in Saudi Arabia (a fact that became an issue for Americans stationed there during the Gulf War), and attempts at proselytization are dealt with severely by the authorities. Churches are permitted only as private affairs among noncitizens.

As the presence of Christians is limited to expatriates, so there are small numbers of Buddhists and Hindus from China and India, respectively, and the BAHÁ'Í FAITH has developed several groups.

Sources:

- Al Saud, T. "Permanence and Change: An Analysis of the Islamic Political Culture of Saudi Arabia with Special Reference to the Royal Family." Ph.D. dissertation, Claremont Graduate School, 1982.
- Al-Yassini, A. Religion and State in the Kingdom of Saudi Arabia. Boulder, CO: Westview, 1985.
- Barrett, David. The Encyclopedia of World Christianity. 2d ed. New York: Oxford University Press, 2001.
- Peters, F. E. The Hajj: The Muslim Pilgrimage to Mecca and the Holy Places. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1994.
- Pullapilly, Cyriac. Islam in the Contemporary World. Notre Dame, IN: Cross Roads Books, 1980.

Scientology

See Church of Scientology

Scottish Episcopal Church

During the Reformation of Christianity of the sixteenth century, Protestants of the Reformed tradition fought with the country's rulers, who were Roman Catholics, for control of the country. In 1560 the Scottish Parliament rejected papal authority and reformed the church along Presbyterian lines. A Reformed liturgy was introduced in 1564. The CHURCH OF SCOTLAND became a Presbyterian establishment. However, a nominal episcopacy remained in place, protected by some powerful people who adhered to a more Roman approach to Christianity. James IV (who in 1603 also became James I of England) favored the bishops, and as soon as he felt secure on the throne, he began to pick away at the Presbyterians' establishment. In 1610 he secured orders from the CHURCH OF ENGLAND for the Scottish bishops. Two years later he reinstated them in their dioceses and slowly reintroduced other changes.

Charles I (1625–1649) asserted the supremacy of the Crown in Scotland and in 1634 tried to impose a Book of Canons that would bring the Church of Scotland closer to the Church of England. Through the new archbishop of Canterbury, William Laud (1573–1645), he enforced a High Church approach to worship. In 1637 he imposed a new liturgy on the Scottish church that was like unto the one used in the Church of England. His attempt to enforce his will on a rebellious nation actually led to his downfall, the establishment of the Commonwealth in England under Oliver Cromwell (1599–1658), and the abolishment of the episcopacy in both England and Scotland. The monarchy was reestablished in 1660. Both Charles II (1660–1685) and James II (1685–1688) were Catholics.

In 1661, after Charles ascended to the throne, Parliament annulled all acts affecting religion passed since 1633 and restored the episcopacy as it had been under Charles I. Four new bishops were appointed for Scotland and consecrated by bishops of the Church of England. The Presbyterians were now disenfranchised. After the Glorious Revolution that brought William II and Mary (1689–1702) to the throne, the religious order changed again. Presbyterians were again placed in charge of the established Church of Scotland, which once again became a Presbyterian church. It has remained such to this day.

Those who favored the Episcopal order protested. They were especially strong in the more northern part of Scotland. They finally won some toleration in 1712, and while never reinstated, continue to this day as the Scottish Episcopal Church. Supporters suffered somewhat during the period 1745–1792, when a set of penal laws made it illegal for Episcopalians in Scotland to possess church buildings or to hold public services. Ministers were not allowed to minister to more than five persons at any one time.

The Scottish Episcopal Church is at one with the belief and practice of the Church of England. It would be to this church that former members of the Church of England in the newly formed United States would turn when the British bishops initially refused to consecrate a bishop for the now independent American colonies. In 1874 the Scottish bishops consecrated Samuel Seabury (1729–1796), who had been elected as a bishop by Anglican clergymen in Connecticut. His agreement with the consecrating bishops led to the inclusion of some distinctive elements of the Scottish liturgy into the American liturgy.

After the penal laws were repealed, the church experienced a growth phase and began to acquire buildings, many of which are still in use. In 1982 it modified its form of governance. A general synod composed of three houses (bishops, clergy, and laity) is now the highest legislative body.

The church is led by its primus, one of the bishops who is selected by the House of Bishops. There are currently seven dioceses. The church has experienced some membership losses in the 1990s and now has approximately fifty thousand members.

Address:

Scottish Episcopal Church
21 Grosvenor Crescent
Edinburgh EH12 5EE
United Kingdom
<http://www.scotland.anglican.org/>

Sources:

- Van der Bent, Ans J., ed. Handbook/Member Churches/World Council of Churches. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 1985.
- Wingate, Andrew, et al., eds. Anglicanism: A Global Communion. London: Mowbray, 1998.

Secular Humanism

See Council for Secular Humanism

Sedevacantism and Antipopes

In the wake of Vatican II, several archconservative Roman Catholic groups began to adopt a critical attitude toward the hierarchy. The largest of these groups later became the Society (or FRATERNITY) of Saint Pius X, under the leadership of French archbishop Marcel Lefebvre (1905–1991). Lefebvre, however, never questioned the legitimacy of Pope Paul VI (1897–1978), or that of his successors. Lefebvre's view was that they were leaders of dubious doctrines and actions (thus justifying Lefebvre in promoting what, according to Rome, amounted to a schism), but did not conclude that such wrongdoings should automatically invalidate their papal canonical role. Inside and outside the SOCIETY OF SAINT PIUS X, more radical groups emerged, each concluding that, after Vatican II, the popes had lost their legitimacy as a result of their heretical teachings; this implied that the Holy See of Rome (Latin, Sedes) was technically "vacant"—that is, there was no legitimate pope. Hence the name of Sedevacantism was given to the movement, which was vehemently critical of Lefebvre and his society. The latter, in fact, although critical of the pope, continued to pray for him in its masses with the ritual formula una cum Pontifice nostro (in unity with our pope). Sedevacantists regarded what they called the una cum masses as ipso facto invalid, just as both Sedevacantists and members of the Lefebvre movement regarded masses celebrated according to post-Vatican II liturgical renewal as invalid.

Sedevacantism was never a well-organized movement, consisting as it did of several small groups, often divided on questions of leadership and on the finer points of how non-una cum masses should be celebrated. The very fact that they considered the Holy See to be vacant meant that Sedevacantists by definition could not recognize an international authority, and it kept their movement divided. Some influential centers did emerge, however. Many Sedevacantist leaders were consecrated as bishops in the late 1970s and early 1980s by archconservative Vietnamese archbishop Pierre-Martin Ngô-Dhinh Thuc (1897–1984). Those consecrations, not authorized by the Vatican, were, according to Roman Catholic canon law, illicit but not invalid (and they led ultimately to Thuc's excommunication). That meant that Thuc's consecration of the Sedevacantist leaders as bishops was regarded as valid, although they were automatically excommunicated. They were, however, according to Roman Catholic canon law, "real" bishops, with the power to consecrate other bishops in turn and to ordain priests (forthwith excommunicated by virtue of the fact of their ordination by an excommunicated bishop). The question is quite important in Catholic canon law and doctrine, which states that a validly ordained priest (although excommunicated), when pronouncing the words of the consecration in the Mass, really does convert the bread and wine into the body and blood of Jesus Christ (something an invalidly ordained priest is not empowered to do). Thus, thanks mostly to Archbishop Thuc (who died in 1984 fully reconciled with Rome) and to more than one hundred “Thuc bishops” ordained directly or indirectly by him, Sedevacantists could rightly claim to have “real” priests and to be able to offer “real” masses to their followers.

Among those consecrated by Thuc was Father Michel Guérard des Lauriers (1898–1988), who prior to Vatican II had been a respected Catholic Dominican academic theologian and had joined Lefebvre in 1970 and left him in 1977. Guérard was initially regarded as a leading intellectual light in the international Sedevacantist network. He insisted, however, that he was not technically a Sedevacantist and that his position was slightly different. In his “Cassiciacum theory” (originally expounded in 1979 in the journal Les Cahiers de Cassiciacum), Guérard explained that the Holy See was vacant only “materially”; “formally” Paul VI (as, later, his successors) could still be regarded as pope. Only if a significant number of cardinals and bishops were prepared to start a canonical process against the pope would he cease to be the “real” pope also “formally” (and not only “materially”). Guérard criticized both Lefebvre (who regarded Paul VI as pope both formally and materially) and the Sedevacantist majority (for which Paul VI was not the pope, neither formally nor materially). Guérard’s complicated theory succeeded in rallying only one section of the Sedevacantist network around him. The Cassiciacum theory is currently promoted by the Italian-based Mater Boni Consilii Institute and by a number of U.S. groups originating from former Dominican bishop Robert McKenna (b. 1927), who was consecrated bishop by Guérard himself in 1986.

Sedevacantism (not connected with the Cassiciacum theory and regarding the Holy See as vacant in both the formal and the material sense) has its main centers in Mexico, thanks in particular to the activities of a “Thuc bishop,” Moisés Carmona-Rivera (1912–1991), who, together with Adolfo Zamora Hernandez (1910–1987, yet another “Thuc bishop”), founded the Union Católico Trento and the Seminar of the Sacred Hearts of Jesus and Mary in Hermosillo (Sonora, Mexico). In the early 1980s, a popular Sedevacantist leader in the United States was Francis Schuckhardt (b. 1937), who in 1967 had founded the Congregation of Mary Immaculate Queen (CMRI, from its Latin name) at Mount Saint Michel near Spokane, Washington, and subsequently broke with Rome in 1970. Schuckhardt, however, was accused of a number of personal wrongdoings and had to leave his own community in 1984; in 1987 he was found in possession of illegal drugs and arrested in California. After his release from jail, he established and now runs a semi-clandestine organization known as the Oblates of Mary the Immaculate (not to be confused with the Roman Catholic religious order of the same name). CMRI survived, however, and even prospered in its post-Schuckhardt phase, with the help of the Mexican Sedevacantists, and under the leadership of Bishop Mark Anthony Pivarunas (b. 1958), consecrated by Carmona-Rivera in 1991. The CMRI maintains a Web site at <http://www.cmri.org>. In 1993, Pivarunas in turn consecrated as bishop Father Daniel L. Dolan (b. 1951), who converted his parish of St. Gertrude the Great in Cincinnati from a Society of Saint Pius X Mass center to the central point of a Sedevacantist network extending to several nearby states.

There may be some ten thousand Sedevacantists throughout the world, with the most important centers in the United States, Mexico, France, Italy, Germany, and the Czech Republic. The small Japanese group Seibo no Mikuni, founded in 1970 by Yukio Nemoto (1925–1988), remains largely isolated because of its peculiar millennial beliefs. Most of them believe that forming a central organization would be tantamount to establishing a schismatic alternative ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH. They prefer to remain a network of small groups and see themselves as the only surviving remnant of the one true post-Vatican II Catholic Church. One of their main problems is how to respond to the issue of the future of Catholic authority. By definition, they regard the pope as essential for the church’s very survival and infallibility, but, at the same time, they maintain that there is no (legitimate) pope in Rome at present. A large majority of Sedevacantists dismiss as non-canonical, and even ridiculous, the very idea that they could convene a conclave and elect a pope of their own; they prefer to wait for a solution to come directly, and perhaps unpredictably, from God, whose ways, they say, are after all not human ways. A few Sedevacantists, on the other hand, are “conclavist”—that is, they believe a conclave should be called (composed of all, or at least most, Sedevacantist bishops) and a new pope duly elected. Conclavists realize nonetheless that, should a conclave be organized, the majority of the Sedevacantist bishops would refuse to attend it, and that some groups (such as the Italian Association of St. Mary “Salus Populi Romani,” headquartered in Turin, Italy) regard a conclave as certainly desirable but, at least for the time being, impracticable. Attempts have been made to organize a conclave, however: in 1994, for example, some twenty Sedevacantist bishops from twelve different countries met in Assisi, Italy, and elected as pope a South African priest (and former student at Lefebvre’s seminary), Victor Von Pentz, under the name of Linus II. He currently resides in the United Kingdom and maintains but a limited following.

Some conclavists have, on the other hand, joined other alternative popes (“antipopes,” according to Roman Catholic theology), who, even before the full development of the Sedevacantist network, had claimed that their role was based both on the alleged heresies of Vatican II and on mystical visions calling them to the pontificate without the need of any conclave or election. One of the earliest “pretenders” was a French priest, Michel-Auguste-Marie Collin (1905–1974), who claimed to have been called by Heaven itself to become “Pope Clemens XV” during Vatican II, in 1963. Collin established an alternative “Vatican” in Clémery, Lorraine, where he also founded a Renewed Church of Christ, known outside France as the Church of the Magnificat. After Collin’s death in 1974, his church nearly collapsed entirely, and it is now reduced to a small remnant of what it once was. One of Collin’s followers, however, the Québec priest Gaston Tremblay (b. 1928), had already ceased to recognize the French claimant in 1968 and had proclaimed himself “Pope Gregory XVII.” His movement is called the APOSTLES OF INFINITE LOVE.

Tremblay’s main competitor is Clemente Domínguez y Gómez (b. 1946), one of the seers in the alleged Marian apparitions of Palmar de Troya, Spain (1968–1976), and later a “Thuc bishop,” consecrated by the Vietnamese archbishop on January 11, 1976. In 1978, Domínguez (in the meantime blinded in a car accident in May 1976) revealed that he had been mystically designated by Jesus Christ as the new pope in a 1976 vision, and his followers confirmed his election as “Pope Gregory XVII” (the same name adopted by Tremblay in Québec). His “Catholic, Apostolic and Palmarian Church” (named after the town of Palmar de Troya) is probably the single largest organization bowing to the authority of an “alternative” pope, with more than a thousand followers in Spain and several hundreds more internationally. In the 1990s, however, Domínguez was accused of sexual immorality with several nuns of the order he had established in the meantime; in 1997 he admitted his sins and asked for his community’s forgiveness. Most followers remained loyal to Domínguez and to his hand-picked successor, former lawyer and “Thuc bishop” Manuel Alonso Corral. Others, however, have both doubted the sincerity of Domínguez in his apology and questioned his decision to appoint a successor rather than leave this choice to a conclave including the many cardinals he had in the meantime appointed from among his bishops. At the end of 2000, seventeen bishops with a couple of hundred followers left the Palmarian Church and formed a splinter movement known as “The Tribe.”

Other claimants to the role of pope have included Father Gino Frediani (1913–1984), the parish priest of Gavinana (province of Pistoia, Italy), who in 1973 claimed to have been mystically consecrated by Jesus Christ and several Old Testament prophets as “Pope Emmanuel I.” He gathered several hundred followers; after his death, a hundred have remained active in his “New Church of the Holy Heart of Jesus” under the leadership of his successor, Father Sergio Melani (who, however, makes no claim to being the new pope). A couple of dozen rival “antipopes” operate in several countries, but none of them have more than a handful of followers.

A special position is nonetheless maintained by William Kamm (b. 1950), a German-born Catholic lay preacher living in Australia and known as “Little Pebble.” It is claimed that the Virgin Mary has revealed to Kamm that the post-Vatican II popes, including John Paul II, are indeed legitimate (contrary to the Sedevacantist thesis). On the other hand, Heaven has designated Kamm as the only legitimate successor of John Paul II; when he dies, any pope elected in Rome other than Kamm will not be the real pope. Kamm has more than a thousand followers in several countries, some of them living communally and most of them members of a religious order known as the “Order of Saint Charbel” (named after the popular Catholic Lebanese saint Charbel Maklouf [1828–1898]). As long as John Paul II lives, Kamm claims to be in full communion with him and the Roman Catholic Church—an opinion not shared, however, by the Australian Catholic bishops, who, despite his protests, have repeatedly branded Kamm’s organization as schismatic.

Addresses:

Mater Boni Consilii Institute
Località Carbignano 36
10020 Verrua Savoia
Torino
Italy
<http://www.plion.it/sodali>

St. Gertrude the Great
11144 Reading Rd.
Cincinnati, OH 45241
<http://www.sgg.org>

Seibo no Mikuni
33–2 Aza Ubasaku Oaza
Matuzuka, Sukagawa-shi
Fukushima 969–04
Japan

Italian Association of St. Mary “Salus Populi Romani” Via Luigi Chiala 8
10080 Feletto
Province of Turin
Italy

Catholic, Apostolic, and Palmarian Church
Abad Gordillo 5
Apartado 4058
41080 Sevilla
Spain

New Church of the Holy Heart of Jesus
Via Maresca-Gavinana 9
51028 San Marcello Pistoiese
Province of Pistoia
Italy

Sources:

- Cuneo, Michael. The Smoke of Satan: Conservative and Traditionalist Dissent in Contemporary American Catholicism. New York: Oxford University Press, 1997.
- Delestre, Antoine. Clemens XV: prêtre lorrain et pape à Clémery. Metz: Serpenois, 1985.
- Des Lauriers, Michel Guérard. "Le Siège Apostolique est-il vacant?" Cahiers de Cassiciacum 1 (1979).
- Historia Sagrada o Santa Biblia Palmariana de Grado Superior según el Magisterio Infallible de la Iglesia*. 3 vols. Sevilla: Santa Sede Apostolica, 2001.
- "The Little Pebble": The Last Pope: A Man of Contradiction: Petrus Romanus, Sinner or Saint? Nowra, New South Wales: William Kamm, 1999.
- Paldino, Francesco Maria. Petrus es tu? Chateaufort: Delacroix, 1997.
- Le ultime volontà di Dio per la Terra nascoste nei Profeti dell'Antico e del Nuovo Testamento*. Gavinana, Pistoia, Italy: Aggeo, 1984.

Seichō-no-Ie

Seichō-no-Ie (House of Growth, or Home of Life and Power) was founded by a charismatic individual, Masaharu Taniguchi (1893–1985), who had endured an early life of misfortune and misdeeds, including illness, hapless love affairs, an aborted university education, and financial hardship. Despite his problems, he educated himself by reading a spectrum of Eastern and Western philosophical, psychoanalytic, and spiritual texts. Additionally, his early adult life and thought were especially shaped by his four-year participation in Ōmoto-kyo, a recently founded faith that practiced healing and taught a Gnostic-like synthesis of monotheism and spiritualism. He also managed to heal his young daughter of a serious illness through affirmations and meditative prayer, and reported at least one mystical experience.

On the basis of such experiences and influences, including the writings of Ernest Holmes, founder of the RELIGIOUS SCIENCE movement, Taniguchi founded Seichō-no-Ie in 1930, with the publication of a magazine. Two years later he published the first installment of what would evolve into the forty-volume scripture of Seichō-no-Ie, Seimei no Jisso (Truth of Life), more than sixteen million copies of which have now been sold. Ever since its inception, Seichō-no-Ie has struggled internally, and occasionally under governmental pressure, over whether it constituted a publishing concern, an organized religion, a spiritual movement, or simply a way of life.

For anyone familiar with the American New Thought tradition, there is little that appears original in Seichō-no-Ie's doctrine, though metaphysically its extremely idealistic monism does appear to lean distinctly in the direction of Christian Science. Taniguchi taught that: (1) only God and God's manifestation as the spiritual "World of Reality" (Jisso) are real; (2) humanity is essentially a part of that world and therefore perfect, though ignorant of that truth; (3) the entire material, phenomenal world is insubstantial and illusory, the product of thought, and therefore malleable by the mind and words; and (4) the proper goal of the religious or spiritual life is to awaken to the truth about one's infinite nature and innate perfection, and thus to realize and manifest such things as wisdom, love, joy, prosperity, and (perhaps above all) health. Taniguchi expressed these convictions in his more than four hundred books as an eclectic mixture of Christian and Buddhist language and concepts, slightly tinged with Shintoist beliefs. Although a prolific writer and effective synthesizer and popularizer of existing ideas, he was hardly an original thinker. Indeed, he always insisted that he was merely presenting the essential core of truth common to all the world's religions.

His one unique contribution to the New Thought tradition was in the area of spiritual practice, for it appears that he alone within that movement actually presented a technique by which adherents could access the inner and essential divinity they claim to possess. He proposed a type of daily meditation, shinsokan, which involves a kneeling posture, palms pressed together at eye level, the recitation of a sutra, an empowering shout, focused meditation, and some closing affirmations. In addition, he recommended chants and slogans, the most common being expressions of gratitude, which Taniguchi regarded as the most healing mind-set of all.

Seichō-no-Ie's organization is patriarchal and centralized. Since Taniguchi's death, it has been under the leadership of his son-in-law and adopted son, Seichō, a strong leader and prolific writer in his own right. The ruling body, the Hombu, operates out of the headquarters, from which it oversees all training events, rallies, seminars, and conferences. Beneath the governing body are regional, prefectural, and local centers. The last of these, called soai-kai (mutual love societies), comprise all adult male members plus three affiliate societies for women, youth, and young adults. The soai-kai generally meet monthly for scripture reading, lecture-style teaching, testimonials, and fellowship. Most of this takes place in private homes, though there are a modest number of churches scattered over Japan, as well as two temples in the Nagasaki and Kyoto prefectures.

Seichō-no-Ie experienced some controversy from its ultraconservative political stance, first manifested as an extreme dedication to the emperor in the 1930s. It blossomed into outright militarism during World War II. As a result Taniguchi was officially silenced during the American Occupation, and the membership declined. After the ban was lifted, he began to promote a renewal of national pride and patriotism. He and the organization also took strong positions against abortion and for education promoting traditional values, constitutional revision to restore the emperor's sovereignty, and the revival of the use of the national anthem, flag, and holidays.

Sekai Kyūsei Kyō

Seichō-no-Ie spread internationally, initially through the Japanese diaspora, but increasingly through an intentional, though not aggressive, missionary impulse. The organization has centers in Hawaii, North America, Latin America (especially in Brazil), and Europe. A fair estimate of membership is four million (three-quarters residing in Japan), representing a quadrupling of size in the last generation. The Japanese headquarters maintains an Internet site at <http://www.sni.or.jp/> in Japanese. The American headquarters in California sponsors an English-language site at <http://www.snitruth.org/>.

Address:

Seichō-no-Ie Foundation
266, 3-chome, Harajuku
Shibuya-Ku, Tokyo
Japan

Paul Alan Laughlin

Sources:

- Clarke, Peter B., and Jeffrey Somers, eds. Japanese New Religions in the West. Kent, UK: Japan Library/Curzon Press, 1994.
- Ellwood, Robert S. The Eagle and the Rising Sun: Americans and the New Religions of Japan. Philadelphia: Westminster, 1974.
- McFarland, Neill. The Rush Hour of the Gods. New York: Macmillan, 1967.
- Taniguchi, Masaharu. Truth of Life. Tokyo: Seichō-no-Ie Foundation, 1961.

Sekai Kyūsei Kyō (Church of World Messianity)

Founded in 1935 by Okada Mokichi (1882–1955), a former associate of ŌMOTO (Great Origin), Sekai Kyūsei Kyō, or the Church of World Messianity (referred to henceforth simply as Messianity), is concerned primarily with performance of the johrei ritual, which consists of the transmission of divine light for the purpose of constructing an earthly paradise. Johrei is administered by a member who, wearing an amulet or ohikari, raises the palm of her/his hand over the recipients, who may or may not be believers, and imparts to them the divine light of healing.

Okada developed a causal theory of illness that linked it to spiritual clouds that could be dispersed not only by the practice of johrei but also by the use of herbal remedies. He was also persuaded that certain kinds of illness are beneficial. For example, the common cold serves to cleanse the body, which would otherwise be rendered dysfunctional by toxic substances. Shizen noho, or natural farming, is also a fundamental part of Messianity's teachings and practices.

There are various views among followers as to whether Okada is divine or human. For example, some members, particularly in Brazil, equate him with Jesus; others see him as the Messiah of the present age. Initially Okada proclaimed himself to be the Boddhisatva Kannon, long venerated in Japan as the very essence of compassionate mercy, and later as the Messiah of the New Age. Regardless of whether they regard him as divine or human, all refer to him as Meishu-sama, sama being an honorific such as sir or lord or senhor.

Messianity, as is the case with many other new Japanese religions, is emphatically millenarian and preaches the coming of an earthly paradise resulting from an ever-increasing outpouring of divine light by means of johrei and shizen noho, which is essentially agriculture without the use of toxic chemicals. This approach to agriculture is based on the belief that nature possesses its own intrinsic resources, which are sufficient in themselves to bring forth wholesome crops and plants in abundance.

The movement has an estimated 900,000 members in Japan and is present in many parts of the world. It is particularly strong in Brazil and Thailand, where the membership in both countries is over 300,000. Messianity is inclusive where belief and practice are concerned. It does not demand of new members who belong to another faith that they abandon it upon joining. The movement has sympathizers and practitioners among some of the Catholic clergy of, for example, Brazil and Bolivia, and in recent times it has attracted some three hundred Theravada Buddhist monks in Sri Lanka who now both receive and transmit johrei.

Messianity consists of two main institutions, the Church of World Messianity and the Mokichi Okada Foundation, the former focusing on spiritual matters and the latter on cultural activities including sangetsu, or flower arranging and horticulture. Differences between the two branches are becoming increasingly blurred as the leadership attempts to present johrei not as the core practice of the Church of World Messianity as such but as a nondenominational healing ritual that can be effectively administered by any religious or secular institution that has the necessary "faith" in its curative powers. "Faith" here does not mean a belief in a nonempirical, supernatural order, for in the case of johrei the recipient is provided with proof of its beneficial effects before being asked to accept that it has the power to produce them.

Although at present united, Messianity has experienced serious internal divisions, and this has meant the establishment of a number of different branches, each with its own headquarters. Today the main headquarters are at Atami, and the world president is the Reverend Tetsuo Watanabe. Among those who hold the highest positions of spiritual leadership is the grandson of Mokichi Okada, the Reverend Yoichi Okada. The Mokichi Okada Foundation has an extensive Internet site in both English and Japanese at <http://www.moa.or.jp/.n>.

Address:

Sekai Kyūsei Kyō
Izunome Kyodan

26-1 Momoyama-cho
Atami, Shizuoka
Japan
<http://www.moa-inter.org.jp/> (Site for Mokichi Okada Foundation)

Peter B. Clarke

Sources:

- Clarke, Peter B. "Modern Japanese Millenarian Movements: Their Changing Perception of Japan's Global Mission with Special Reference to the Church of World Messianity in Japanese New Religions." In Japanese New Religions in Global Perspective, edited by Peter Clarke, pp. 129–182. London: Curzon, 2000.
- Ellwood, Robert S. The Eagle and the Rising Sun: Americans and the New Religions of Japan. Philadelphia: Westminster, 1974.
- Foundations of Paradise*. Los Angeles: Church of World Messianity, 1984.
- Teachings of Meishu-Sama*. 2 vols. Atami, Japan: Church of World Messianity, 1967–1968.

Self-Realization Fellowship

The Self-Realization Fellowship was founded in 1935 by Paramahansa Yogananda (1893–1952), a Hindu swami (monastic) who first came to the United States in 1920 to lecture to the International Congress of Religious Liberals meeting in Boston and sponsored by the American Unitarian Association. Yogananda was the disciple of Swami Sri Yukteswar (1855–1936), a guru with a concern to reconcile science with the spiritual knowledge of India. Yogananda was college educated and fluent in English. In 1922 he founded a center in Waltham, Massachusetts. In 1924 he embarked on a speaking tour of the United States, attracting large audiences in urban areas. In 1925, Yogananda established his headquarters on an estate on Mount Washington in Los Angeles. He continued lecturing to large crowds. In 1935 his organization, formerly known as the Yogoda Satsanga Society, was incorporated as the Self-Realization Fellowship. The SRF has a hermitage in Encinitas, a temple in San Diego, the Church of All Religions in Hollywood, and in 1950 the Lake Shrine complex was dedicated at Pacific Palisades, California.

After Yogananda's death, the SRF was led by James J. Lynn, who after taking sannyasa (monastic renunciation) was known as Rajarsi Janakananda. Following his death in 1955, Sri Daya Mata, an American woman, has served as president of the SRF.

Yogananda is the author of the well-known Autobiography of a Yogi, first published in 1946 and translated into eighteen languages. His account of his meetings with Eastern and Western mystics is intended to demonstrate that spiritual truth is found in all religions. Yogananda is regarded by his devotees as a premavatar, an incarnation of divine love. He taught that it is possible to realize the experience of oneself as being one with God through yogic and meditative techniques. The SRF exists to propagate Yogananda's teachings, and it offers a home-study course based on Yogananda's lessons that culminates in initiation into a technique called kriya yoga, which the disciple pledges not to reveal. The SRF sponsors a monastic order for men and women and operates a publishing house. SRF altars include images of Krishna and Christ, who are regarded as the two ultimate sources of SRF doctrines. As of 1992 there were several hundred thousand initiates into SRF kriya yoga with varying levels of commitment to the organization.

Controversies have surrounded leading teachers' splitting away from the SRF and establishing their own organizations. J. Donald Walters, known as Kriyananda, formerly a minister of the Church of All Religions and a vice president of the SRF, separated from the SRF in 1962 to launch his own teaching career. In 1968 he founded Ananda World Brotherhood Village in Nevada City, California. He is a popular speaker on the New Age circuit, and offers his own home-study course along with other published materials.

The SRF oversees more than five hundred temples and meditation centers now located in fifty-four countries. In India, SRF is still known as the Yogoda Satsanga Society. It has its national headquarters in Dakshineswar (near Calcutta). It oversees ninety meditation centers and twenty-one educational institutions.

Address:

Self-Realization Fellowship
3880 San Rafael Ave.
Los Angeles, CA 90065–3298
<http://www.yogananda-srf.org/>

Catherine Wessinger

Sources:

- Thomas, Wendell. Hinduism Invades America. New York: Beacon Press, 1930.
- Wessinger, Catherine. 1995. "Hinduism Arrives in America: The Vedanta Movement and the Self-Realization Fellowship." In America's Alternative Religions, edited by Timothy Miller, pp. 173–190. Albany: State University of New York Press, 1995.
- Yogananda, Swami Paramahansa. Autobiography of a Yogi. Los Angeles: Self-Realization Fellowship, 1970.

Senegal

Senegal, a modern African nation on the Atlantic Ocean immediately south of Mauritania, covers a territory that has been inhabited since prehistoric times. At the time of European contact, it was home to the Wolof, Fulani (with many subgroups), Serer, and Tukeler, among other peoples. The French colonized the area in the seventeenth century and took from it many people who were then enslaved in their American colonies. Slavery was abolished in 1848, but France faced continual opposition to its rule through the end of the century. In the eighteenth century, an Islamic kingdom had been established by Abdel Kader Torodo. In 1776 he adopted the title Almany (prayer leader) and created a strong theocratic system that proved quite resistant to French control. Senegal obtained its independence in 1960. It had a relatively prosperous two decades under its democratic government, but has been hard hit by the encroaching Sahara desert since the drought of 1983.

Traditional religions remain alive among Senegal's peoples, but they have been steadily replaced over recent centuries by Islam. Less than 10 percent of the population still adhere to the faith earlier identified with their people, the majority residing among the Diola and Serer. Islam first arrived in the area in the eleventh century. Some Berber leaders had traveled to Mecca and returned with a young scholar who was given space for a learning center on the Senegal river. An exponent of the MALIKITE SCHOOL OF ISLAM, he attracted many followers later known as Almoravids, who developed an army and eventually established a large kingdom that reached to the Mediterranean. In the twelfth century, the capital was moved to Marrakesh (Morocco). Today, the West African office of the WORLD MUSLIM CONGRESS resides in Dakar.

Senegal is home to several prominent Sufi brotherhoods, the first to arrive being the QADIRIYYA, said to have been founded by 'Abd al-Qadir al-Jilani, who died in Baghdad in 1166 C.E. There are some 300,000 members as the new century begins. An important part of their worship is involved with drumming, and they have become known by the publication and international circulation of some of their drumming music on compact discs. Larger than the Qadiriyya, with some 400,000 members, are the MURIDIYYA, founded toward the end of the nineteenth century in Senegal by Sheikh Ahmadou Bamba (c. 1853–1927). Their name means those who seek after progress on Islam's mystical path. Still larger is the million-member TIJANIYYA, who look to Sheikh Ahmad al-Tijani (1737–1815) as their founder. The order has spread throughout West Africa. The Status of religions in Senegal, 2000-2050

Followers	2000			2025	2050
	total	%	rate
Muslims	8,307,000	87.6	2.60	14,800,000	20,372,000
Ethnoreligionists	591,000	6.2	2.54	800,000	900,000
Christians	523,000	5.5	2.71	1,040,000	1,655,000
Roman Catholics	441,000	4.7	2.85	920,000	1,500,000
Independents	14,000	0.2	3.63	30,100	45,000
Protestants	9,800	0.1	2.71	20,000	32,000
Nonreligious	39,100	0.4	5.26	60,000	125,000
Baha'is	16,800	0.2	2.60	32,000	60,000
Atheists	4,000	0.0	3.02	9,000	20,000
other religionists	730	0.0	1.95	1,500	3,000
Total population	9,481,000	100.0	2.61	16,743,000	23,135,000

orders tend to be exclusivist, an aspect of their life that was opposed by Sheikh Touré and some Muslim intellectual colleagues who founded the Union Culturalle Musulmane in 1953. As the new century begins, more than 85 percent of the Senegalese profess Islam.

Christianity came to Senegal in the fifteenth century with the arrival of the Portuguese. In the 1480s, a Senegalese chief named Behemoui traveled to Lisbon, where he underwent baptism in 1486. Subsequently, in the 1490s, the first Christian centers were opened in Ziguinchor, just north of the present-day border of Guinea Bissau. Senegal was included in the diocese of Funchal (headquartered on the island of Madeira) in 1514.

Early in the nineteenth century, the French Catholic Sisters of St. Joseph of Cluny launched a new era of growth for the ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH. The vicariate of the Senegambia was erected in 1863. In 1955 Dakar was named an archdiocese, and the first African archbishop was consecrated in 1962. Since that time, a push has been made to create a more Africanized priesthood.

Protestantism came to Senegal with members of the REFORMED CHURCH OF FRANCE under the auspices of the PARIS MISSION. However, few of the missionaries could handle the environment, and most died before any productive work could be established. It was not until 1936 that they were joined by the Worldwide Evangelism Crusade. Since World War II, a variety of Protestant and Free Church groups have arrived, all limited by pressure from the Muslim community against proselytizing activities. The most response by the Senegalese has been to the NEW APOSTOLIC CHURCH (which reports some ten thousand members), the Lutheran Church (of Finnish origin), the ASSEMBLIES OF GOD, and the JEHOVAH'S WITNESSES. Some of the conservative Evangelical churches are associated in the Evangelical Fellowship of Senegal, which is affiliated with the WORLD EVANGELICAL ALLIANCE. There is no Senegal-based church that is a member of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES.

Senegal defines itself as a secular country with freedom of religion, in spite of the Muslim majority. This unusual situation was highlighted by the election of a Catholic to the presidency of the country in 1962. No Hindu or Buddhist groups have been visible in Senegal, though there is a small presence by the BAHÁ'Í FAITH.

Sources:

- Behrman, L. C. Muslim Brotherhoods and Politics in Senegal. Cambridge: Harvard University Press, 1970.
- Callaway, B., and L. E. Creevey. The Heritage of Islam: Women, Religion and Politics in West Africa. Boulder, CO: Lynne Rienner, 1994.
- De Dianoux, H. J. "La christianisme au Sénégal." L'Afrique et l'Asia modernes 4 (1981): 3–22.
- Delcourt, J. Historie Religieuse du Sénégal. Dakar: Clairafrique, 1976.

Serbia and Montenegro

See Yugoslavia

Serbian Orthodox Church

The Serbian Orthodox Church traces its roots to the missionary work launched from Constantinople in the second half of the ninth century C.E., which produced a Christian Byzantine-Slavonic culture in the region. Serbia became independent of Constantinople toward the end of the tenth century, and its ruler, Steven Nemanja (1168–1196), worked to suppress non-Christian religion in his realm. The first partial ecclesiastical independence of the Serbian land was soon established under the country's first archbishop, Saint Sava (1176–1235). The year 1217 is generally seen as the founding date of the Serbian Orthodox Church. From that time, worship has followed a Serbian liturgy. In 1375 a local patriarchate was established.

This autonomy was gradually suppressed under centuries of Turkish domination that began after the Battle of Kosovo in 1389. Serbia ceased to exist as a separate political entity in 1463. It became the target of both Russia and the Austro-Hungarian Empire toward the end of the eighteenth century, and while still a part of the Ottoman Empire it began to reemerge as a state early in the nineteenth century. In 1878, as Turkish power waned, the Congress of Berlin recognized Serbia as an independent country.

The restoration of the patriarchal office occurred in 1879, the year after Serbia gained its independence. In the last half of the twentieth century, the Serbian Orthodox Church was subject to countless persecutions, first from the Croatian nationalist regime during the years of World War II, and then by the Yugoslavian government that came to power after the war. After the fall of the Communist regime at the beginning of the 1990s and the dissolution of Yugoslavia, the Serbian Orthodox hierarchy did not hesitate to condemn the atrocities committed by members and representatives of its own people. Moreover, the Serbian Church, alone among the Orthodox churches in the former Communist countries, has witnessed a complete reconciliation with its members abroad, especially in North America, who had left the patriarchate during the years of Marxist rule.

The Serbian Orthodox Church is noted for a very conservative position within the Orthodox world. Along with the Monastic Republic of Mount Athos, it is the only canonical Orthodox jurisdiction in the Balkan area that did not accept the adoption of the Gregorian calendar. The Serbian Orthodox patriarchate has also offered the most consistent and articulate criticism of the ecumenical involvement of sister Orthodox jurisdictions.

The church is Eastern Orthodox in belief and practice. A particularity of the Serbian church is the Slava, a celebration of the patron saint of a family, which takes the place of the usual Orthodox nameday feast. The patron saint of a family, handed from father to son and never changed, has been traced to the times of the first Serbian Christians; it is an example of inculturation of the Christian faith into an ancient pagan practice (the veneration of pagan family idols) that was not suppressed but transformed by Christian piety.

The Serbian patriarchate has more than eight million faithful in the former Yugoslavia, with a diaspora all over the Western world (particularly in Germany, North America, and Australia). Dioceses may now be found in Romania, Bosnia, Croatia, France, Germany, Sweden, the United States, Canada, and Australia. The Serbian Orthodox Church may also be credited with a certain success in evangelizing the Gypsies. The church is, in spite of its criticisms of some forms of ecumenism, a member of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES.

Address:

Serbian Church
ul. Kralja Petra Br. 5
P.O. Box 182
110 01
Belgrade, Serbia
Federal Republic of Yugoslavia

Andrea Cassinascio

Sources:

Spasovoc, Stanimir. The History of the Serbian Orthodox Church in America and Canada, 1941–1991. Translated by Nedeljko Lunich. Belgrade: Printing House of the Serbian Patriarchate, 1998.

Velimirovich, Nikolai. A Treasury of Serbian Orthodox Spirituality: The Serbian People as a Servant of God. Translated by Theodore Micka and Steven Scott. Grayslake, IL: Free Serbian Orthodox Diocese of the United States and Canada, 1988.

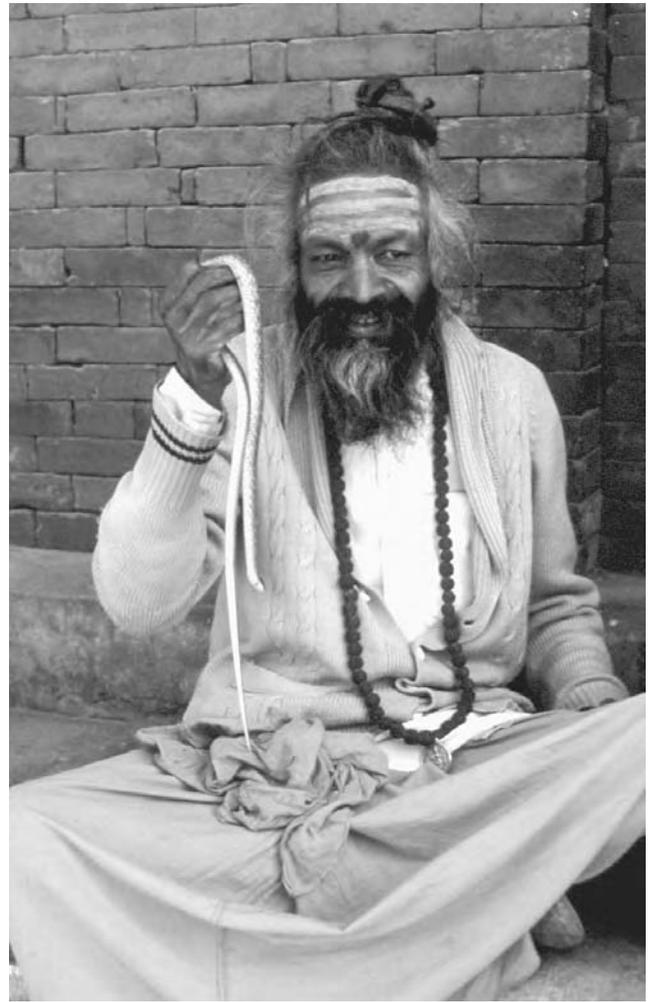

Serpent Handlers/ Signs Following Movement

Serpents have been a source of mystery and great symbolic significance in human cultures for thousands of years, frequently playing a role in religious ritual. And spiritual leaders have handled snakes for a variety of purposes. Handling poisonous serpents as an expression of faith, and as a focal point of worship, emerged only in the early twentieth century as the HOLINESS MOVEMENT was giving birth to PENTECOSTALISM. Nearly a century later, the taking up of serpents remains among the most enigmatic developments in the chronicling of religious movements.

The practice of handling serpents in worship services probably began in 1908. A few years later the practice was occurring in church services in the Appalachian region of east Tennessee. So too was the practice of drinking poison (usually strychnine). Why did people engage in such seemingly bizarre and dangerous practices? From their perspective the answer was simple: The Bible commanded that believers do so. Mark 16:18 says: “[T]hey shall take up serpents; and if they drink anything deadly, it will by no means hurt them.”

Passages from sacred texts can go virtually unnoticed for long periods of time and then, seemingly, appear suddenly and become the basis for a schism or a significant movement. Such was the case with these verses about handling snakes and drinking poison.

The enigma surrounding this practice is not so much the fact that a group of people decided to take this verse of Scripture literally. Rather, the mystery is the fact that this verse is encased in three additional verses that would become the core of the twentieth-century Pentecostal movement (Mark 16:15–18). The first verse is Christ’s commandment to preach the Gospel of every creature on earth

A Saddhu in Nepal (Tibor Bogner/TRIP)

(usually referred to as the Great Commission). Then, on either side of the verse about serpent handling and drinking poison, is the promise that those who believe in Christ and are baptized will (1) cast out demons; (2) speak with new tongues; and (3) lay hands on the sick and they will recover. The beginning of this Scripture reads: “[A]nd these signs will follow those who believe.”

The nascent Pentecostal movement in Appalachia believed that all five of these “signs” were both the promise of God and a commandment that was to be obeyed. The churches they founded often contain “signs following” in their name. The broader Pentecostal movement readily embraced tongues, healing, and the casting out of demons, but it did not act upon the references to snakes and poison without controversy. In Appalachia, the emerging Pentecostal tradition entertained these controversial ideas for some years before “signs followers” were marginalized.

George Went Hensley was probably the first to take up the practice of handling serpents in religious services; there is little question that he popularized the practice (Kimbrough 1995, 192). But it was A. J. Tomlinson, the leading figure of the issuant CHURCH OF GOD (CLEVELAND, TENNESSEE), that popularized and lent a measure of legitimacy to serpent handling. Tomlinson invited Hensley to preach in his church in 1914 and later that year wrote enthusiastically about snake handling in the Church of God Evangel. Four years later, Tomlinson asked Hensley to join the denomination, and he accepted.

Serpent handling spread rapidly during the second and third decades of the twentieth century, and the Church of God clearly lent legitimacy to this development. In 1928, following a near fatal snakebite, the practice was formally banned in the Church of God. Thereafter, serpent handling would find its niche on the margin of society, where it has remained for the better part of a century. Reports of occasional deaths from snakebite aroused public indignation. During the 1940s the practice was outlawed in Kentucky, Georgia, and Virginia, but that seemed only to reinforce the commitment of the faithful to practice their beliefs.

Although systematic data about how many people participate in serpent handling has never existed, it seems clear that their number has never been very large. Current estimates by scholars who study snake handlers range from about twenty-five hundred down to no more than a few hundred.

For its size, there is probably no other religious movement that has been the subject of more writing and investigation. Journalists and scholars alike have frequently focused on sensationalist themes, and characterization of the snake handlers as “bizarre,” “exotic,” “eccentric,” and “grotesque.” No small number have found significance in the snake as a phallic symbol. More serious scholarly literature has focused on psychopathology. Appalachia has been viewed as a culture under tremendous stress, and participants in snake handling have been seen as suffering both economic and cultural deprivation.

During the 1990s a group of scholars moved beyond sensationalizing and interpreting serpent handlers’ behavior as an indicator of pathology or deprivation. Rather, they found patterns of behavior that are both functional and readily understandable within the context of normal behavior. As with all religions, the faith of the serpent handlers provides communal solidarity (ibid.). Their faith gives meaning to their lives as well as spiritual integration (Hood). And there is a substantial literature that indicates that serpent handlers are not very different from their community peers (Burton). Finally, contrary to the presumption of most who wrote about snake handlers for most of the twentieth century, the new breed of scholars are skeptical about the prospects of this sectarian movement disappearing anytime soon.

Jeffrey K. Hadden

Sources:

- Burton, Thomas. Serpent-Handling Believers. Knoxville: University of Tennessee Press, 1993.
- Covington, Dennis. Salvation on Sand Mountain. New York: Penguin, 1995.
- Hood, Ralph W., Jr. “When the Spirit Maims and Kills: Social Psychological Considerations of the History of Serpent Handling Sects and the Narrative of Handlers.” International Journal for the Psychology of Religion 8, 2 (1998): 71–96.
- Kimbrough, David L. Taking up Serpents. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1995.
- Mundkar, Balaji. The Cult of the Serpent. Albany: State University of New York Press, 1983.
- Olsen, Ted. “They Shall Take up Serpents.” Posted at <http://www.christianitytoday.com/ch/58h/58h025.html>. Accessed May 15, 2001.
- Religious Movements Homepage. “Serpent Handlers.” Posted at <http://religiousmovements.lib.virginia.edu/nrms/Snakes.html>. Accessed May 15, 2001.

Seventh Day Adventist Reform Movement

A “Reform Movement” emerged within the SEVENTH-DAY ADVENTIST CHURCH during World War I, following controversies surrounding conscientious objection. The latter was a position initially advocated by the Adventist Church. Faced with the imminent threat of persecution and of the church’s being banned in several countries, however, the leader of the European Division, Louis Richard Conradi (1856–1939), reversed the earlier viewpoint and asked European Adventists to serve in the military forces of their countries (even on the holy day of Saturday). Several young Adventists rejected this decision, however, and decided to defy their governments by going underground. They were supported by roughly 2 percent of German Adventists, and by similar percentages in other countries.

The Reform Movement originated from local initiatives, and initially had no international coordination. The Adventist Church, in order to avoid problems with governments, quickly expelled the Reformists. At the end of the war, the international Adventist leadership tried to heal the division, finally firing Conradi from his position in 1922. Reconciliation, however, proved impossible. In a conference held in Friedensau, Germany, in 1920 and at the General Conference of the Adventist Church of 1922, held in San Francisco, the Reformists’ requests were rejected, and separation followed. A Seventh Day Adventist Reform Movement was formally incorporated during a conference held in Gotha, Germany, on July 14–20, 1925. A missionary expansion of the newly independent movement followed in the United States, Canada, Argentina, Brazil, Australia, South Africa, and what was then Rhodesia. During World War II, the Reform Movement reiterated its conscientious objection position, and again underwent persecution. Persecutions also continued after the war in the Communist countries of Eastern Europe.

The Reform Movement is today divided into two main branches, as a consequence of a 1951 split. Although the two branches relate different versions of the same events, it seems that at the General Conference of the Reform Movement held in Zeist, The Netherlands, in 1951, the main controversial questions were personal rather than doctrinal. Dumitru Nicolici (1896–1981), a Romanian leader who had moved to the United States in 1948, led the branch known as the Seventh Day Adventist Reform Movement, while those loyal to the president, Karl (Carlos) Kozel (1890–1989), kept the name International Missionary Society–Seventh Day Adventist Reform Movement. Kozel's branch remained strong in Europe, particularly in Germany, while Nicolici's branch drew the majority of members from Australia, Brazil, and the United States. Its leadership later passed from Nicolici to Andrei Lavrik (1902–1976), Clyde Thomas Stewart (1902–1992), and Alfredo C. Sas (b. 1932).

During the 1960s, controversies erupted within the Seventh Day Adventist Reform Movement between the United States and the international chapters, but they were satisfactorily resolved in 1967. In the same year, a "peace dialogue" was started between the Seventh Day Adventist Reform Movement and the International Missionary Society–Seventh Day Adventist Reform Movement. Negotiations for a merger failed at that time, but they were started again in the 1980s and the 1990s with encouraging but nondefinitive results. The Seventh Day Adventist Reform Movement remains to this date the larger organization, with 27,840 members in ninety countries. The International Missionary Society–Seventh Day Adventist Reform Movement has some 15,000 members throughout the world and is headquartered in Germany.

Addresses:

Seventh Day Adventist Reform Movement
P.O. Box 7240
Roanoke, VA 24019–0240
<http://www.sdarm.org>

International Missionary Society–Seventh Day Adventist Reform Movement
P.O. Box 1310
74803 Mosbach/Baden
Germany
<http://www.imssdarm.org>

Massimo Introvigne and PierLuigi Zoccatelli

Sources:

Balbach, Alfons. The History of the Seventh Day Adventist Reform Movement. Roanoke, VA: Seventh Day Adventist Reform Movement, 1999.

Kramer, O. Rise and Progress of the Reform Movement: My Personal Experience. Huntington Park, CA: International Missionary Society–Seventh Day Adventist Reform Movement, 1994.
The Principles of Faith of the Seventh Day Adventist Church "Reform Movement" and Her Church By-Laws. Mosbach/Baden, Germany: General Conference Seventh-Day Adventist Church Reform Movement, n.d.

Seventh Day Baptist General Conference

Sabbatarianism, the belief that Saturday rather than Sunday is the proper day for Christian worship, arose among Protestants in seventeenth-century England. They had a basic agreement with Baptists concerning the autonomy of the local church, believer's baptism, and the authority of the Bible as the only source of faith and practice. The latter belief became crucial, inasmuch as in their reading of the Scriptures they found no basis for Sunday worship. As early as 1650, a Sabbath-keeping congregation was founded in London.

In 1664, Stephen Mumford, a Baptist from Tewkesbury, moved to Newport, Rhode Island, and associated with the Baptist church there. Over the next seven years he convinced others of his sabbatarian ideas, in 1671 establishing the first Seventh Day Baptist church in the American colonies. Those who formed the new church did not condemn those who continued Sunday worship, and they were able to maintain friendly relationships over the years. A second congregation formed in Philadelphia around 1800, and a third in New Jersey five years later. The Philadelphia group influenced some German-speaking Free Church believers in the Philadelphia area who would later create a separate German Seventh Day Baptist Conference.

Through the eighteenth century, sabbatarian Baptist congregations spread across the United States. In 1802 representatives of several churches formed the General Conference. A strong emphasis on local autonomy was retained, but the conference was given the power to carry out special tasks. Publication of sabbatarian materials was given high priority. A missionary society was formed in 1843, and it opened work in China four years later. It subsequently began work at selected locations around the world, in most cases in response to communications from small groups of sabbatarians asking for help.

Seventh Day Baptists formed several schools in areas devoid at the time of public education. Three of those schools became colleges. The college at Alfred, New York, became Alfred University, and in 1871 a seminary was located at the school.

In the 1850s some Seventh Day Baptists influenced Ellen G. White and her husband, James White, the founders of the SEVENTH-DAY ADVENTIST CHURCH. That church has become the largest sabbatarian Christian body in the world.

Through the twentieth century, various groups that have separated from the Seventh-day Adventists have subsequently identified with the Seventh Day Baptists.

The General Conference was ecumenically oriented and became a founding member of the National Council of Churches of Christ in the U.S.A. and the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES. However, it withdrew from both of those organizations in the 1970s, as it felt that some of their policies infringed upon congregational autonomy. However, the conference has remained active in the BAPTIST WORLD ALLIANCE.

Late in the twentieth century, after many years in Plainfield, New Jersey, the headquarters of the General Conference moved to its present location. In 1995 it reported forty-eight hundred members in eighty churches in the United States and Canada. The conference meets annually and elects a general council that manages its affairs.

Through the twentieth century, the General Conference has nurtured Seventh Day Baptist churches in such places as Jamaica, Guyana, Malawi, Ghana, India, Burma (Myanmar), the Philippines, Australia, and New Zealand. Most of those efforts have grown into autonomous conferences. In 1965 the General Conference took the lead in the creation of the World Federation of Seventh Day Baptist Conferences. By 1993, some seventeen conferences from around the world were affiliated.

Address:

Seventh Day Baptist General Conference
P.O. Box 1678
Janesville, WI 53547-1678
<http://www.seventhdaybaptist.org>

Sources:

Sanford, Don A. A Choosing People: The Story of Seventh Day Baptists. Nashville, TN: Broadman, 1992.
———. Conscience Taken Captive: Short History of Seventh Day Baptists. Janesville, WI: Seventh Day Baptist Historical Society, 1992.

Seventh-day Adventist Church

The Seventh-day Adventists trace their roots to the activity of William Miller (1782–1849), a Baptist preacher and farmer in New York state. Miller, based on his particular interpretation of biblical passages, and after several date changes, predicted the second advent of Jesus for October 22, 1844. When the final predication failed to materialize, the Millerites split into several groups led by various charismatic leaders, one of whom was Ellen G. White (née Harmon, 1827–1915), the primary force behind the Seventh-day Adventists.

Ellen G. Harmon came to the Millerite movement as a teenager and began doing itinerant preaching. After the Great Disappointment, as the failure of William Miller's prediction came to be known, Harmon gathered with friends for a prayer session. During this session she had the first of approximately two thousand visionary experiences. These experiences came to be accepted as authoritative by Seventh-day Adventists. Many of Ellen G. White's visions form the basis of Seventh-day Adventist tenets, or confirmed tenets decided upon by the less spiritually adept members of the group. Today Ellen G. White retains her status as a prophet in the Seventh-day Adventist church.

Ellen G. Harmon eventually came to advocate the shut door policy, the idea that the October 22 date signified the entry of Jesus into the heavenly sanctuary to begin its cleansing, and that anyone who had not heard and heeded William Miller's message was denied salvation. Under the influence of a Millerite preacher named Joseph Bates, Ellen G. White also began to advocate the observance of Saturday Sabbath and a bland vegetarian diet modeled after that of the popular nineteenth-century health reformer Sylvester Graham. The policies were confirmed during visionary experiences. These two developments are the beginning of what one Seventh-day Adventist scholar refers to as restoration themes: the idea that the return of Jesus depended upon humans returning to proper observance of biblical laws.

In 1845, Ellen G. Harmon married another itinerant Millerite preacher, James White. Together they began earnestly working on spreading the new message. As their married life progressed, some of their stances, again legitimated by Ellen G. White's visions, moderated. For instance, by 1851 the shut door policy became much less strict, admitting children born after 1844 and those who had not outright rejected William Miller's message. By 1851 the Whites had two sons. In 1855 the Whites moved to Battle Creek, Michigan. There Ellen G. White's interest in health and diet fully developed. Eventually, Battle Creek became the home to a massive sanitarium run by another influential Seventh-day Adventist, John Harvey Kellogg. Kellogg was also an advocate of dietary reform, and part of the institution's menu was a sort of dried and crumbled bread accompanied by milk and taken as a breakfast food. John Harvey Kellogg's brother, William, took this idea and created the Kellogg's Cereal Company.

The Seventh-day Adventists are much like any mainline American Protestant denomination. However, a few unique features should be highlighted. The authority of Ellen G. White's prophecy has already been mentioned, along with observance of the Saturday Sabbath. The Great Controversy is the Adventist idea that all of humanity is now involved in a struggle between Christ and Satan about God's laws and sovereignty. Seventh-day Adventists therefore believe that they are part of a remnant church specifically called to keep the commandments and the faith of Jesus. Seventh-day Adventists teach that Christian behavior includes adequate rest and exercise, avoidance of foods identified as unclean in the Old Testament along with alcohol and tobacco, and a prohibition of “irresponsible” use of drugs and narcotics. The idea that Jesus is now ministering in the heavenly sanctuary is still an official part of Adventist belief. Seventh-day Adventists also still expect the imminent return of Jesus, but set no specific date.

The name Seventh-day Adventist was chosen in 1860; however, the denomination was not officially organized until 1863. Today the denomination is organized into four representative levels: the local churches; local conferences made up of the local churches in a state or territory; the union conference, made up of conferences in a larger territory or group of states; and the General Conference, made up of all the unions in all parts of the world. The General Conference is the highest authority for the church. An elected Executive Committee holds power between sessions of the General Conference. The General Conference is made up of twelve divisions, each with responsibility for a specific geographic area. The divisions represent every major populated area of the world.

Seventh-day Adventists emphasized missionary work from their early years. The first missionary was J. N. Andrews, who traveled to Switzerland in 1874. In 1890 missionary work began in the Pacific islands. The year 1894 saw Seventh-day Adventist missionaries enter Africa and South America, and in 1896 they traveled to Japan. The church now has established work in 209 countries. Although the Web site cites publication and distribution of Seventh-day Adventist literature as the prime factor in its worldwide success, Seventh-day Adventists have always made health and education a major part of their missionary efforts.

The church boasts 5,846 schools worldwide, along with 166 hospitals and 371 clinics. The founding of hospitals, clinics, and schools has done much to aid the global spread of Seventh-day Adventism. As reported in 1999, there were 46,740 Seventh-day Adventist churches throughout the world, with a total membership of 10,939,182.

Address:

Seventh-day Adventist Church
12501 Old Columbia Pike
Silver Spring, MD 20904-66000
<http://www.adventist.org>

Jeremy Rapport

Sources:

- Damsteegt, P. Gerard. Foundations of the Seventh-day Adventist Message and Mission. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans, 1977.
- Land, Gary, ed. Adventism in America: A History. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans, 1986.
- Maxwell, C. Mervyn. Tell It to the World: The Story of Seventh-day Adventists. Rev. ed. Mountain View, CA: Pacific Press, 1977.

Numbers, Ronald L. Prophetess of Health: Ellen G. White and the Origins of Seventh-day Adventist Health Reform. Rev. ed. Knoxville: University of Tennessee Press, 1992.

Seychelles

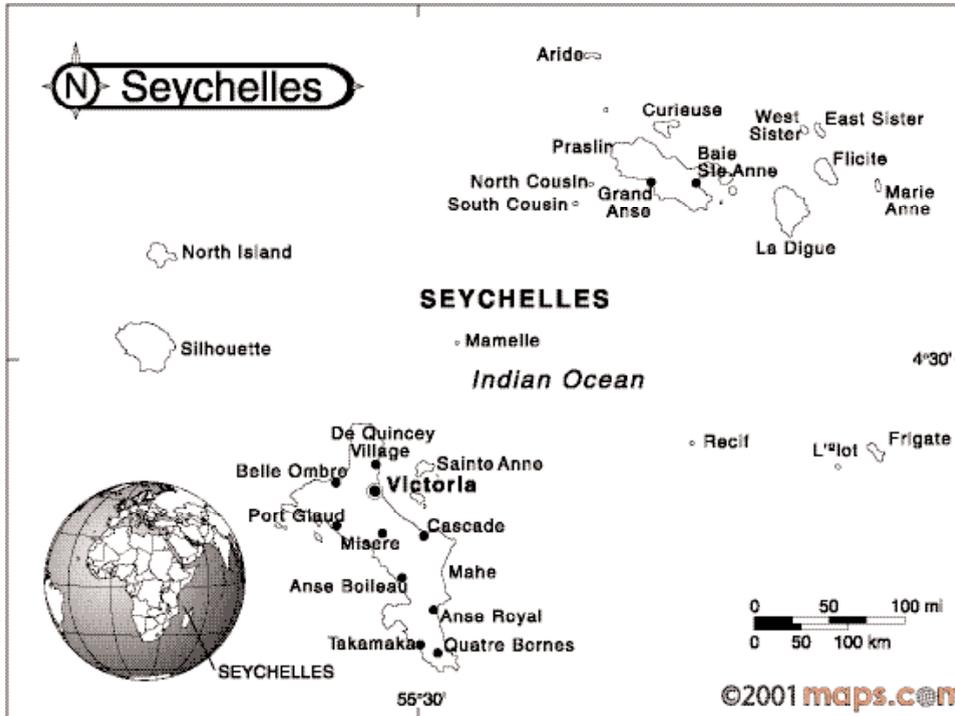

The islands of the Republic of Seychelles, located in the Indian Ocean northwest of Madagascar, were populated in the 1760s by African slaves under first the French and then the British. The French organized a colony in 1768, but it was replaced by British rule in 1794. In 1903 it was named a British Crown Colony, granted self-rule in 1970 and complete independence in 1976. The great majority of the seventy thousand residents occupy the largest of the islands, Mahe.

The French established the ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH, which remains the dominant religious force of the land with some 90 percent of residents being baptized members. The Diocese of Victoria (formed in 1890) is attached to the Kenya Episcopal Conference. It operates a string of parochial schools. The first indigenous bishop was named in 1975. There is also an indigenous order of nuns, the sisters of St. Elizabeth.

The CHURCH OF ENGLAND did not arrive until 1843 and remained the church of the British leadership. Diversity in the religious community was added by the arrival of Indians and Chinese attracted by the strategic position of the islands for trade between eastern Africa and southern Asia. Most Indians were Hindus, but there were also a small number of Muslims, Jains, and Zoroastrians. The Chinese (with a population of less than a hundred people) practice a form of the Buddhist/Taoist amalgam popular in their homeland.

In the twentieth century, both the SEVENTH-DAY ADVENTIST CHURCH (1929) and the JEHOVAH’S WITNESSES (1960) opened work, as have a group of the BAHÁ’Í FAITH. One Evangelical congregation has been formed by the International Christian Fellowship, a British organization. Of more importance, in 1972 the Far East Broadcasting Associ-

Followers	2000			2025	2050
	total	%	rate
Christians	75,000	96.9	1.04	94,000	109,000
Roman Catholics	70,000	90.4	0.99	84,000	96,000
Anglicans	5,200	6.7	0.80	6,000	6,600
Protestants	2,000	2.5	2.32	3,000	4,200
Nonreligious	1,400	1.9	3.79	2,500	3,700
Hindus	410	0.5	0.86	500	600
Baha'is	310	0.4	2.66	700	900
Muslims	170	0.2	0.37	150	150
Chinese folk-religionists	40	0.1	1.59	90	150
Jains	30	0.0	0.65	50	70
Zoroastrians	20	0.0	1.41	60	100
Total population	77,400	100.0	1.09	98,000	115,000

Ba-'Alawi, contributed to the 'Alawiya Sufi orders in Yemen, South Asia, and Myanmar. Al-Shâdhili's famous disciple was Abu-l 'Abbas al-Mursi (d. 1287), whose shrine is in Alexandria, where thousands of sufis still conduct their religious activities publicly.

Leadership of the order has passed to Shaykh al-Qutb al-Gawth, now seen as the "Guide" of the Shâdhiliyya path. He resides on the Mount of Olives in Jerusalem as the Imam of the Masjid al-Aqsa (the Dome of the Rock). The Dome of the Rock is related to the tradition of the Night Journey of the Prophet Muhammad, who is believed to have traveled from Mecca to al-Aqsa and from there to heaven.

ation established a radio station that targets programming to both Africa and India.

The New Religions have yet to find their way to the Seychelles, in large part because of the out-of-the-way location of the islands.

Sources:

- Bradley, J. T. The History of the Catholic Church in Seychelles. Victoria, Seychelles: Clarion, 1940.
- Metz, Helen Chapin. Indian Ocean: Five Island Countries. Washington, DC: U.S. Government Printing Service, 1995.
- The Seventh-day Adventist Mission in Seychelles: A Review of Events from Years 1930–1980*. Victoria, Seychelles: The Mission, 1981.

Shâdhiliyya Sufi Order

The Shâdhiliyya Sufi Order is named after Abu al-Hasan al-Shâdhili (d. 1258), who is buried at Humaythra near the coast of Egypt's Red Sea. These sufis are found mainly in northern Africa and in Egypt. They have traditionally espoused a nonsectarian view toward Sunni Islamic law schools in order to have a balanced mystical and worldly life. A person's knowledge ('ilm) is revealed and understood through one's actions ('amal) on earth. The sainthood (walaya) in the Shâdhiliyya Sufi Order is significantly tied into the experiences of other members in the sufi order. The Shâdhili sufis emphasize that each moment is in front of the divine, and there is a constant calling to return to the holy.

The Shâdhiliyya Order derives from the Abu Madyan Shu'ayb (d. 1198), whose primary disciple, Muhammad 'Alî

Since 1993 the shaykh has traveled widely, teaching the Shâdhiliyya path to all who wish to learn it. The strength of the order is in Algeria, Tunisia, and Morocco.

Address:

Shâdhiliyya Sufi Order
c/o Sidi Muhammad Press
2656 First St. #413
Napa, CA 94558
<http://www.napanet.net/~smp/index.htm>

Qamar-ul Huda

Sources:

- Buckman, David. "The Underground Friends of God and Their Adversaries: A Case Study and Survey of Sufism in Contemporary Yemen." Update 39 (1997): 21–24.
- Cornell, Vincent. Realm of the Saint: Power and Authority in Moroccan Sufism. Austin: University of Texas Press, 1998.
- Danner, Mary Ann Koury, trans. The Key to Salvation: A Sufi Manual of Invocation-Miftah al-Falah. Cambridge, UK: Islamic Texts Society, 1996.
- Ibn al-Sabbagh. The Mystical Teachings of al-Shâdhili. Translated by Elmer H. Douglas. Edited by Ibrahim M. Abu-Rabi. Albany: State University Press of New York, 1993.

Shafiite School of Islam

The Shafiite School of Islam is one of the four madhhabs (schools) of jurisprudence deemed orthodox within the world of Sunni Islam. The school traces its origin to the career of one man, Muhammad ibn Idris ibn al-Abbas ibn Uthman ibn Shafi (767–820), a Palestinian raised in Mecca and then widely traveled in the Islamic world. As he began to teach and write, he was presented with the task of synthesizing and reconciling the then competing schools of legal interpretation represented by the HANAFITE and Traditionalist school. Toward the end of his life, he dictated his most famous book, Al-umm, in which he laid out his own perspective and left behind a record of the differences between the other schools.

Shafi was writing as the process of defining the traditions relative to the Prophet Muhammad and his companions (Hadith) were being compiled and assessed, and he placed great importance on the authentic traditions, as opposed to the legal consensus of the scholars (ulama) that had been reached in the leading centers of Islamic learning—Baghdad, Medina, and so forth.

Shafiite teachings took root in Persia (Iran) in the ninth century, during the years of the Abbasid Empire, and they remained the most influential school of thought into the thirteenth century. In addition, Shafi spent his last years in Egypt, and his teachings took root there, becoming the official school during the Ayyubid Dynasty (1167–1252) and remaining of continuing importance until the rise of the Fatimid Dynasty (which established a non-Sunni Shi'a Ismaili government). The adoption of the Hanafite School of legal interpretation by the Ottoman Empire, however, pushed the Shafiite School out of the centers of Islamic power in the Middle East. It had become the dominant school among the trading classes and through them was taken to Indonesia (now the most populous predominantly Islamic nation in the world) and to the Muslim communities along the east coast of Africa whose most famous center was Zanzibar.

Sources:

- Coulson, Noel J. Conflicts and Tensions in Islamic Jurisprudence. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1969.
- . A History of Islamic Law. Edinburgh: Edinburgh University Press, 1994.
- Hallaq, Wael B. A History of Islamic Legal Theories: An Introduction to Sunni Usul al-Fiqh. New York: Cambridge University Press, 1997.
- Horrie, Chris, and Peter Chippindale. What Is Islam? London: Virgin, 1998.
- Schacht, Joseph. An Introduction to Islamic Law. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1964.
- Watt, Montgomery. The Majesty that Was Islam. New York: Praeger, 1974.

Shakta Movement (Hinduism)

The Shakta movement (Shaktaite, Shaktism, Shakti movement, sometimes without the h in the spelling) is one of the major theological dynamics in Hinduism. Its ideology is essentially a supreme Mother-Goddess phenomenon common in many primal religions. The Shakta movement has ties to other Hindu movements, such as SAIVISM; it flourished in India under the Maurya, Sunga, and Satavahana dynasties.

Proponents of the Shakta movement are predominantly Hindu with some following in Buddhism. They begin with the assertion that the Ultimate Divinity is female, not male. The male deities are subservient to the Shakti (Shakti is also another term for feminine spiritual energy and is also a separate name for a female Hindu deity). The Devi Mahatmya, a major Shakta text, retells many traditional Hindu myths, but portrays the feminine deities with new superior positions. Most Hindus do not object to the Shakta movement and have even incorporated Shakta teaching into their own belief systems. There are also multiple groups of Shakti followers in Hinduism, some being liberal while others being Shakti exclusive.

Hinduism is currently undergoing a major renaissance worldwide, and the Shakta movement is a part of that renaissance. In addition to the revival of Hindu tradition, a new appreciation for civil and women's rights is also coming into play. The Shakta movement is a direct recipient of these new allowances. More female gurus are being revered by Hindus as reincarnations of holiness and enlightenment, whereas in the past only men were viewed with such reverence. Female deities are being studied and exalted along with, and in some cases even more than, male divinities.

The Kali followers, Saivites, and the BRAHMO SAMAJ are helping to lead the way for the Shakta movement. Some Hindu holy men, such as Vivekananda (1863–1902), Sri Ramakrishna (1836–1886), and Sri Aurobindo (1872–1950), have helped to assist the cause of the Shakta movement. Many women have claimed to be direct reincarnations of Shakti, thus attributing to themselves great reverence. Such women include Sarada Devi, Ramakrishna's wife (1853–1920); Mira Richard, Aurobindo's companion (1878–1973); and the renowned Anandamayi Ma (1896–1982). Despite the fact that these women are all deceased, they all have followings within the Hindu community and in the Shakta movement today. Many Shakta movement Hindus actually have pictures of these women as objects of worship that they revere as much as an icon of Siva, Durga, or Vishnu.

The Shakta movement has had an effect upon Hinduism and Jainism. Both religions have their own religious orders exclusively for women. Buddhism, in particular, has elevated the status of the feminine divine. Avalokitesvara, the prominent Bodhisattva in MAHAYANA BUDDHISM, has been represented in many female forms as well as male forms. Many Buddhist mudras (hand gestures) represent union between a deity and his corresponding Shakti. Some Buddhist groups have incorporated TANTRISM into their Shakta movements. The sexual aspect of this is seen more in old Tibet and Nepal than in India and Khmer.

Kumar Jairamdas

Sources:

- Coburn, Thomas. Encountering the Goddess: A Translation of the Devi-Mahatmya and a Study of Its Interpretation. Albany: State University of New York Press, 1991.
- Hawley, John, and Donna Wulff. Devi: Goddesses of India. Los Angeles: University of California Press, 1996.
- Kinsley, David. Hindu Goddesses. Los Angeles: University of California Press, 1988.

Shambhala International

Shambhala International is a reformed version of a Tibetan Buddhist organization initially known as Vajradhatu. Vajradhatu was founded in Boulder, Colorado, by an exiled Tibetan lama of the Kagyu lineage, Chogyam Trungpa Rinpoche (1939–1987), in 1973. Chogyam Trungpa was a flamboyant character who, after giving up his monastic vows, gained a reputation as a bon vivant, though his writings on spiritual themes attracted an audience that reached well beyond his personal following.

A major center was founded in Nova Scotia, Canada, in 1983, where the movement's international headquarters are currently located. The headquarters serve more than one hundred Shambhala Centers throughout the world in the United States (79), Canada (21), Europe (38), New Zealand (1), Australia (1), and Japan (1). In the mid-1990s the movement claimed a total paid membership of around forty-five hundred.

Chogyam Trungpa developed an eclectic form of Tibetan Vajrayana Buddhism, incorporating elements drawn from the Japanese Zen tradition, Japanese arts, and Western psychology. He attracted followers among artists and writers such as the poet Allen Ginsberg. Ginsberg was particularly associated with the Naropa Institute, an accredited university that Chogyam Trungpa founded in Boulder in 1974. Its curriculum continues to stress the arts, philosophy, and psychology.

Chogyam Trungpa appointed his American disciple Osel Tendzin (Tom Rich) as his successor, but in 1988 it was revealed that he was HIV-positive and that he had passed the condition on to one of his disciples. The revelations led to serious disruptions within the movement that were eventually to be addressed by the creation of a new leadership under the authority of Chogyam Trungpa's eldest son, Osel Rangdrol Mukpo, in 1991. In 1992 he announced his plans to amalgamate all Vajradhatu activities under the new title of Shambhala International.

Shambhala International began formally in 1976 as Shambhala Training, the secular arm of Vajradhatu. The name is drawn from a Tibetan myth that features a kingdom of enlightened beings ruled by sagacious monarchs. The intention of the training is to create people capable of establishing a society that mirrors the Shambhala kingdom in this world. Although Shambhala International's programs include the teaching of meditation practices and deploy Tibetan Buddhist concepts, Shambhala International presents itself as a secular organization. Participants can adhere to their own religious preferences and do not have to think of themselves as Buddhists. Nevertheless, the movement continues to support contemplative centers such as Gampo Abbey in Nova Scotia and conducts weddings and funerals. At the same time, it promotes education and training programs aimed at business corporations as well as individuals.

All of these activities are intended to contribute to Shambhala International's goal of creating what is described as an "enlightened society." For many members, however, the most significant aspect of their participation remains rooted in their personal practice based on Chogyam Trungpa's eclectic interpretation of Vajrayana Buddhism.

Address:

Shambhala International
1084 Tower Rd.
Halifax, Nova Scotia B3H 2Y5
Canada

Sandra Bell

Sources:

- Bell, Sandra. "'Crazy Wisdom,' Charisma, and the Transmission of Buddhism in the United States." Nova Religio: The Journal of Alternative and Emergent Religions 2, 1 (1998): 55–75.
- Dawson, Lorne, and Lynn Eldershaw. "Shambhala Warriorship: Investigating the Adaptations of Imported New Religious Movements." In Croyancees et Societes, edited by Bertrand Ouellet and Richard Bergeron, pp. 199–231. Montreal: Editions Fides, 1998.
- Trungpa, Chogyam. Born in Tibet. London: George Allen and Unwin, 1966.
- . Cutting through Spiritual Materialism. Berkeley, CA: Shambhala, 1973.

Shi'a Islam

Over the first centuries of its existence, Islam was divided into two main communities, the Sunni and the Shi'a. The split emerged slowly in the years after the death in 661 C.E. of Ali ibn Abi Talib, the son-in-law of Muhammad (c. 570–632) and husband of Fatimah (c. 605–633). Some among the Muslims developed a special veneration for the physical family of Muhammad. However, after Ali's death, the caliphate (the political leadership of the Arab Muslim community) passed to the Umayyads (that is, caliphs drawn from the clan of Umayyad).

The Shi'as came to believe that Ali had been the best qualified to succeed Muhammad, rather than the three people chosen as caliph between the Prophet's death and the designation of Ali in 656 as the fourth caliph. Over time, they came to believe that Muhammad had chosen Ali as his successor. The Shi'as also came to believe that Islam needed an imam (or guide) as a guardian of Islamic revelation and the bearer of the Prophet's authority. Hence the need for those in the Prophet's family to lead them. Gradually, "those of the Prophet's family" came to be seen as Ali, Fatimah, and their progeny.

An Ashura ceremony during the month of Moharam, commemorating the death of Hussein (Mohammed's grandson) and his family (Ibrahim/TRIP)

One center of the Shi'as (literally, partisans of Ali) was Kufa in Iraq, where Ali had briefly resided. There, followers claimed al-Husan (d. 669), Ali's son, as the successor. After his death, attention turned to his brother, al-Husayn (d. 680). He eventually came to Kufa to assume the leadership of the Shi'a community. Al-Husayn died in a failed attempt to overthrow the Umayyads. His defeat briefly focused attention on his half-brother, al-Hanafiyya (d. 700).

During the eighth century, various Shi'a groups with authority placed in varying lines of descent from Muhammad and Ali came to exist, many extinguishing themselves in political opposition to the caliphate. One group, the Imamiyya, traced its lineage through al-Husayn's surviving son, Ali, better known as Zayn al-Abidin (d. 714), and his son, Muhammad al-Baqir (d. c. 732). The latter was a jurist of note who more clearly articulated the role of the imam as community guide. He also left the community to his learned son, Ja'far al-Sadiq (d. 765), who worked during the turbulent period that saw the Abbasids overthrow the Umayyad Caliphate. The various Shi'a groups supported the Abbasids, but then became the objects of persecution by the new caliphate. Many in Iraq rallied to the side of al-Sadiq, who went on to develop the idea of a sinless and infallible imam as the authoritative spiritual guide needed by humanity. The imam has the knowledge of the Qur'an, both its exoteric and esoteric teachings, and obedience is properly due him.

As the majority Shi'a lineage was developing, one problem of note arose when Zayd b. Ali (d. 740), the son of Zayn al-Abidin, was named the new Shi'a imam. He, however, soon rejected his role and the idea of a physical lineage of imams. He quickly lost the support of the majority, who quickly gave their allegiance to his brother Muhammad al-Baqir, and soon deleted any mention of Zayd as ever having held the office. Zayd found his support in Yemen and a line of imams, each successor chosen for his demonstrated ability rather than parentage, and continued to lead the community of ZAYDITES.

Following al-Sadiq were seven additional imams, beginning with Musa al-Kazim (d. 796/797), the younger son of al-Sadiq. During al-Kazim's time of leadership, a dispute developed over whether he or his older brother, Ismail (d. 762), was the rightful imam. Ismail had died prior to his father, and the main body of Shi'as accepted his younger brother as the seventh imam. Some, however (the followers of ISMAILI ISLAM), looked to Ismail as the proper imam and adopted his descendants as their new imams. The Ismailis have splintered into a number of groups, the largest groups being the Nizari Ismailis, led by the Aga Khan, and the BOHRAS. Both groups now have their largest followings in India.

The main body of Shi'as, continuing to recognize the descendants of Musa al-Kazim, eventually came under the leadership of the twelfth imam, Muhammad al-Muntazar (d. c. 879), who had become imam at the age of four in 873. Within a few days, however, the youthful imam disappeared and was never found. He had no brothers, and to all appearances the lineage had died out. A crisis of authority emerged. The leaders of the community proposed a novel hypothesis. They suggested that al-Muntazar had assumed a concealed presence in the world, invisible to humanity. However, he will appear at some point in the future as the chosen one whom the Qur'an suggested would appear shortly before the end of the world. There was an early expectation that the appearance would occur at some point in the next century.

To continue leadership in the Shi'a community, a Council of Twelve, the Ulama, moved into the vacuum created by al-Muntazar's disappearance. They selected one of their number to possess at any moment the authority once held by the imams in Ali's lineage. The Ulama assumed more authority century by century as al-Madhi, the Hidden Imam, failed to manifest.

The Shi'as grew slowly through the fifteenth century, but in the wake of the Mongol invasion of Persia (Iran) and the rise of the Safawid Dynasty at the beginning of the sixteenth century, Shi'a Islam became Persia's state religion. The Safawid ruling family claimed a direct lineage from Musa al-Kazim, and Shi'a Islam subsequently spread throughout the Safawid Empire, which stretched from India to Syria. At the height of its power, the Ulama began to appoint judges, ayatollahs, who formed their own courts and had the power of judgment.

Today the Shi'as, also known as the Twelvers or Ithna-Ashariyah, are the dominant group in Iran, Yemen, and Azerbaijan, and have a slight majority in Iraq. There is a significant Shi'a minority in Afghanistan, Pakistan, and Saudi Arabia, while smaller Shi'a communities exist in the other Middle Eastern states and a number of African countries; through the twentieth century, they have developed in the West.

In Iran, the Ulama remains the chief judicial body for the Shi'a community and the state. It appoints from among its members a single person to be al-Madhi's representative on Earth. One of these representatives, the Ayatollah Khomeini (1902–1989), became world famous when he was at the focus of the Iranian Revolution in 1979. The worldwide Shi'a community currently (as of 2001) looks to the spiritual leadership of Ayatollah Ali Khamenei (b. 1939), who resides in Tehran.

The Shi'a community has given birth to a variety of movements. In Iran and Iraq, for example, the community is divided into two major legal schools, the Usuli and the Akhbari. The smaller group, the Akhbaris, found primarily in the southern parts of the two countries, has the more strict interpretation of the law. The larger Usuli school has the more liberal legal perspective and permits some latitude in the interpretation of the law in reaching legal decisions.

In Iran, the hope of the appearance of al-Madhi supplied the base upon which two popular movements developed in the nineteenth century. The first was led by Sayyid Ali Muhammad Shirazi (1819–1850), known as the Bab, or the Gate. The Babi movement then gave birth (after the Bab's execution by the Persian authorities) to the BAHÁ'Í FAITH, which looked to Mirza Husayn Ali (1817–1892), known as Baha'u'llah, or the Glory of God, as the one predicted by the Bab. Even though the Babi movement remained relatively small and confined to Persia, the Bahá'í Faith has become an important global religion that understands itself as fully independent of Islam.

Through the centuries, the Shi'a community has been the source of numerous dissenting groups, more than seventy of which have been identified. Though small, they continue to exist throughout the entire Muslim world (from North Africa to Indonesia). Like the majority communities, they accept the basics of Islam, but they have varying opinions concerning the specifics of eschatology, generally revolving around their belief about the manifestation of the Hidden Twelfth Imam. Additional distinctive groups have emerged out of the Ismaili community around the same set of issues.

Sources:

- Bakhash, Shaul. The Reign of the Ayatollahs: Iran and the Islamic Revolution. New York: Basic Books, 1984.
- Halm, Heinz. Shiism. Translated by J. Watson. Edinburgh: Edinburgh University Press, 1991.
- Khomeini, Ruhollah. Islamic Government. New York: Manor, 1979.
- Tabataba'i, Sayyid Muhammad Husayn. Shi'ite Islam. Translated and edited by S. H. Nasr. Albany: State University of New York Press, 1975.

Shiah Fatimi Ismaili Tayyibi Dawoodi Bohra

Ul-Amine, Hasan. Shorter Islamic Shi'ite Encyclopedia. Beirut: n.p., 1969.

Yann, Richard. Shi'ite Islam. Oxford: Blackwell, 1995.

Shiah Fatimi Ismaili Tayyibi Dawoodi Bohra

The Shiah Fatimi Ismaili Tayyibi Dawoodi Bohra are the largest of the several branches of the BOHRAS, Ismaili Muslims who in the eleventh century acknowledged the authority of al-Mustali (caliph in Egypt, 1094–1101) and later al-Tayyib, the infant heir to the caliph's throne who disappeared in 1130. They believe that al-Tayyib was not killed, as most have concluded, and now exists as the Hidden Imam. The leadership of the community was eventually placed under the care of an administrator, who has the title al-mutlaq, who possesses all the authority of an imam, as he acts in the absence of the Hidden Imam. Leadership in the al-Tayyib community had arisen in Yemen after being suppressed in Egypt, but in 1517, when the Ottoman Empire extended its boundaries to include Yemen, it moved to Gujarat, India. It later moved to Surat, north of Mumbai, and more recently to Mumbai (Bombay).

The Bohra community went through a crisis of succession in 1589 when the majority party accepted Daud Burhan al-Din (d. 1612) as the new al-mutlaq. Since that time, the position has remained in the family of Daud (or Dawoodi). It continues under the authority of the current al-mutlaq, who is aided by a chief assistant (often the designated heir), the ma'dhun, and a second assistant, the mukasir. Local leadership is provided by priests known as shayikhs or amils.

When they reach the age of fifteen, each Bohra takes an oath of loyalty to the community and its leadership. That oath is renewed annually. The Bohras recognize seven (two more than most Muslims) essential pillars of their faith: Walayah (devotion to Allah, the Prophets, the imam [al-Tayyib], and the al-mutlaq); Taharah (purity/cleanliness); Salah (prayers); Zakah (religious dues); Sawn (fasting); the Hajj (pilgrimage to Mecca); and Jihad (holy war).

The Shiah Fatimi Ismaili Tayyibi Dawoodi Bohra has a college for the training of amils at Surat. Dawoodi Bohras have approximately one million adherents. The majority reside in India, with smaller communities in Pakistan, other Middle Eastern countries, East Africa (since the eighteenth century), and the West (since the 1950s). Adherents can be recognized by their appearance. Men have beards and wear white, gold-rimmed caps; women wear a colorful dress, the rida.

Address:

Shiah Fatimi Ismaili Tayyibi Dawoodi Bohra
c/o Dawat-e-Hadiyah

Administration of the 52nd al-Dai al-Mutlaq
His Holiness Dr. Syedna Muhammed Burhanuddin Mumbai
India
<http://www.torontojamat.com/>

Sources:

Amiji, H. M. "The Bohras of East Africa." Journal of Religion in Africa 7 (1975): 27–61.

Daftary, Farhad. A Short History of the Ismailis. Princeton, NJ: Marcus Wiener, 1998.

Shin Buddhism

See Pure Land Buddhism (China)

Shingon Buddhism

The Shingon sects of Japanese Buddhism look to Kobo Daishi (literally "great teacher"), born Kukai (773–835), as their founder. Kukai arises out of obscurity as a religious seeker at the beginning of the ninth century C.E. In 804, he traveled to China where he studied esoteric Buddhism with Hui-kuo (746–805). He was ordained in 805 and returned to Japan. He spent the next 30 years propagating Shingon and died at Kongobu-ji Temple on Mt. Koya in 835.

Shingon Buddhism teaches that there are three modes of manifestation of the Buddha, the Enlightened One. First, the dharmakaya is Buddha as unchanging and eternal existence, which Shingon names the Mahavairocana Buddha, the primary object of veneration within the community. Second, Buddha may also manifest as bodhisattva, such as Amida Buddha of the Pure Land tradition. Finally, there is the more limited form that a buddha might take in order to deliver instruction to sentient beings such as humans. Such a form was assumed by the historical Buddha Sakyamuni. The focus on Mahavairocana does not limit the attention that a Shingon believer might give to other Buddhas.

Kukai taught that Mahavairocana Buddha was responsible for generating all life in the cosmos and the universe embodies his teachings. The deeds performed by humans, with their physical bodies, their words, and spirituality, are those of the Buddha. Once aware of this fact, humans are able to enter a state of Buddha consciousness and attain Enlightenment. Through the use of mudras (a meaningful sign/gesture made with the hand), vocalizing a mantra (mystical sounds/words), or contemplating one of the buddhas, a person can enter the highest states of Buddha consciousness. These practices can all be found in the fire rituals for which Shingon temples have become known. These teachings are found in the primary sacred texts of Shingon, the Dianichi Sutra (Mahavairocana-sutra) and the Kongocho Sutra (Vajrasekhara-sutra).

In the twelfth century, the Shingon movement divided into two major branches. Kabukan (1095–1145) revived some neglected aspects of Shingon and mixed it with Pure Land emphases such as the repetition of the Nimbutsu mantra and hope of Enlightenment in this life and movement into the Pure Land after death. Kabukan's new doctrine, Shingi, was opposed to the traditional or old doctrine, Kogi. Both branches of Shingon would later divide into a number of subbranches. Some seven subbranches of the Kogi and two branches of the Shingi were forced to merge in 1941 as World War II began. Most of these subbranches as well as new ones would reappear after 1945.

The primary bearer of the Shingon tradition is the Koyasan Shingonshu. It and no less than sixteen other branches of Shingon are members of the JAPAN BUDDHIST FEDERATION. Koyasan Shingonshu has its headquarters at Kongobu-ji Temple where Kobo Daishi is buried. Besides temples across Japan, Koyasan Shingonshu has temples in the United States (eighteen), of which fourteen are in Hawaii, and South America (eighteen). In America, the Shingon Buddhist International Institute has been formed to research and promote Shingon thought.

Addresses:

Koyasan Shingonshu
132, Oaza Kotyasan
Koya-cho
Ito-gun, Wakayama
Japan
<http://www.koyasan.org/>

Koyasan Shingon Mission
North America
342 E. 1st St.
Los Angeles, CA 90012

Shingon Buddhist International Institute
P.O. Box 3757
Pinedale Station
Fresno, CA 93650-3757
<http://www.shingon.org/>

Sources:

- Arai, Abbot Yusei. Shingon Esoteric Buddhism: A Handbook for Followers. Fresno, CA: Shingon Buddhist Intl. Inst., 1997.
- Buddhist Denominations and School in Japan*. Tokyo: Bukkyo Dendo Kyokai, 1984.
- Hakeda, Yoshito. Kukai: Major Works. New York: Columbia University Press, 1972.
- Kiyota, Minoru. Shingon Buddhism, Theory and Practice. Los Angeles: Buddhist Books International, 1978.
- Light of Buddha*. Los Angeles: Koyasan Buddhist Temple, 1968.

Murthy, K. Krishna. Buddhism in Japan. Delhi: Sundeep Prakashan, 1989.

Shinnyoen, Garden of Absolute Reality

Shinnyoen, Garden of Absolute Reality, a new religion, or shin shukyo, based on the esoteric SHINGON school of BUDDHISM, was founded in several stages by Ito Tomoji (1912–1967) and her husband, Ito Shinjo (1906–1989), beginning in 1936 in the Tachikawa suburb of Tokyo; at that time, it was known as the Risshohaku Association. To ensure legal recognition, the movement was affiliated with a well-established Shingon sect, Shingonshu Daigoha, and in 1948 it became a legal religious organization in its own right, using the name Makoto Kyodan, which it changed to Shinnyoen in 1951. Shinnyoen became a religious juridical person in 1953.

Prior to founding Shinnyoen, Ito Shinjo studied the science of divination known as Byozeisho and also trained at the Daigo School of Shingon esoteric Buddhism, where he received the title of Great Master (Acharya); his wife inherited an important spiritual gift referred to as reino, or spiritual faculty, from her aunt. Believing themselves to be suitably trained and endowed, they together took on the role of “mediums of salvation” for all who were concerned to know their destiny or have their fortunes told.

The tragedy that struck them as parents when their two sons died from an incurable illness in childhood was to be imbued with deep spiritual significance and value. The death of the two brothers, the holy brothers, or ryodoji sama, as they are known, was interpreted to mean that the spiritual path uniting this world and the invisible world had been opened, and the Bakku Baiju, or the great power of salvation, had been unleashed.

Shinnyoen stresses its Buddhist credentials and, by contrast with AGONSHU, claims to be new and even unique by being the only religion to base its doctrines on what it claims to be the last teachings of the Buddha, Siddhatta Gotama, the Mahaparinirvana, or Great Nirvana, sutra. Buddha, according to Shinnyoen, revealed that this sutra contained the essence of all his previous teachings. Like so many other Japanese new and new new religions based on one or another of the Buddhist sutras, Shinnyoen is also eager to stress that the teachings of the Mahaparinirvana sutra are open to all to know and understand, and not the exclusive preserve of a few dedicated Buddhist clerics.

There are several levels of spiritual development in Shinnyoen. There is the lay order of monks, which consists of those who have undergone special training and taken formal vows. In addition, there are the four levels of daijo, or Mahayana; of kangi, or happiness; of daigangi, or great happiness; and of reino, or spiritual faculty. Practice of the faith, service to the movement, and engagement in activity to spread the movement constitute the criteria for a member moving from one stage to another.

Like TENRIKYO, Shinnyoen operates on the basis of a lineage system, in the sense that all new members have what is referred to as a “guiding parent” that is the person who introduced them to the movement. That person continues to assist the new follower, or “guided child,” with understanding of the doctrines and with their practice. The doctrines, or “secrets of Buddhism,” are derived in the main from esoteric Buddhism and are revealed to followers by mediums—all followers can with appropriate training eventually become mediums—who are believed to receive support from the members of the founders’ family, now existing in the spirit world. Mediums are highly regarded as true disciples of Buddha.

Sesshin, or spiritual guidance, is an important part of Shinnyoen practice and is provided with the help of spiritual mediums, or reinosha, who act as mirrors for trainees. Such mediums provide four kinds of spiritual guidance (sesshin), two of which are for the general improvement of members—kojo sesshin and sodan sesshin—and two of which are for the resolution of specific problems—sodan sesshin and kantei sesshin. Special meditation sessions known as eza are provided for those who aspire to higher levels of enlightenment.

Shinnyoen encourages all followers to carry out the Three Practices, which are kangi, or joyous offerings leading to the purification of the mind; gohoshi, or service leading to the purification of the body; and otasuke, or the purification of speech, which consists essentially of sharing of the teachings with others and bringing them to the Buddha.

The movement’s present leader is Ito Shinso, called by followers Kyoshu-sama, a daughter of the founders. Today there are an estimated 650,000 Shinnyoen members in Japan, and the movement has established centers in the United States, in several European countries, and in Taiwan, Hong Kong, and Singapore. In all of those countries the following is relatively small: for example, there are no more than 1,000 members in Europe.

Address:

Shinnyoen, Garden of Absolute Reality
Grand Temple at 1–2–13 Shibazaki-cho
Tachikawa, Tokyo 190–0023

Japan

<http://www.shinnyo-en.or.jp/> (in Japanese)

<http://www.sef.org/> (in English)

Peter B. Clarke

Sources:

Nagai, Michiko. “Magic and Self-Cultivation in a New Religion: The Case of Shinnyoen.” Japanese Journal of Religious Studies 22, 3–4 (1995): 301–321.

Sakashita, Jay. “Shinnyoen and the Transmission of Japanese New Religions Abroad.” Ph.D. dissertation, University of Stirling, Scotland, 1998.

Shiramizu, Hiroko. “Organizational Mediums: A Case Study of Shinnyoen.” Japanese Journal of Religious Studies 6, 3 (1979): 70–82.

SHINTO

Shinto (the Divine Way), the traditional religion of Japan, is today represented by a spectrum of religious groups in the land of its birth, the largest segment of the movement being Shrine Shinto, which finds embodiment in the thousands of public shrines that dot the landscape. Shrine Shinto was the state religion of Japan in the decades prior to World War II. Sect Shinto designated the thirteen Shinto organizations (KUROZUMIKYO, Shinto Shuseiha, IZUMO OYASHIROKYO, Fusokyo, Jikkokyo, Shinshukyo, Shinto Taiseikyo, ON-TAKEKYO, Shintotaikyo, Misogikyo, AUM SHINRIKYO, TENRIKYO, and KONKOKYO) recognized by the government during that period. In addition, there are more than a hundred new Japanese religions, some founded before 1945 and suppressed by the government and others founded after 1945, that draw primarily on Shinto themes.

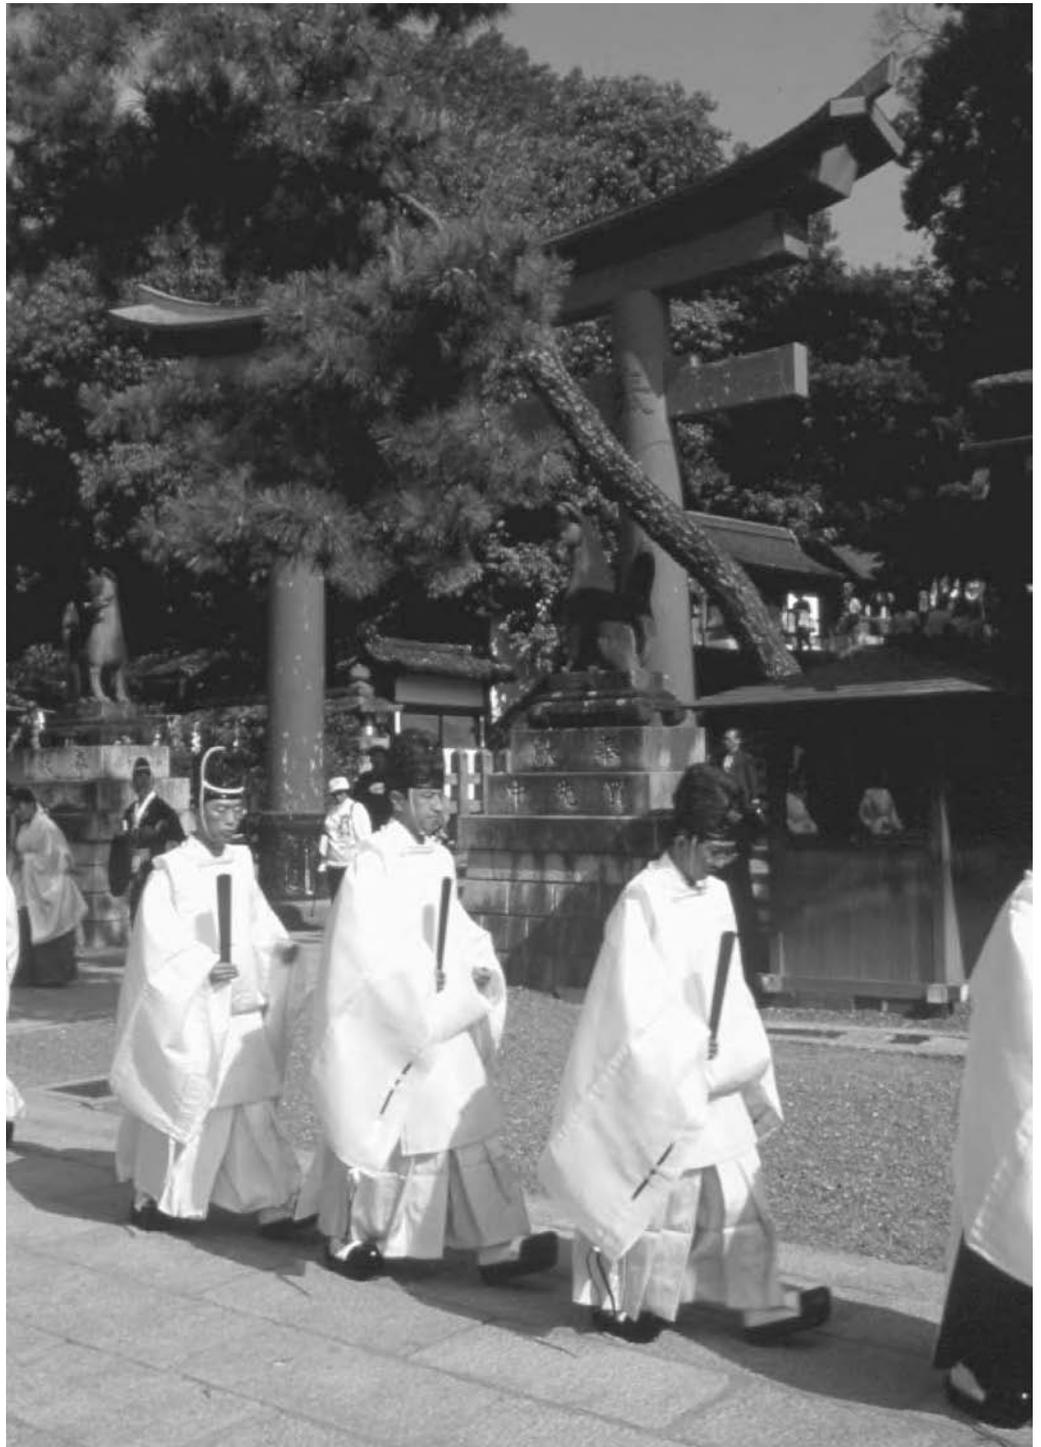

Early in Japan's history, numerous extended family groups (clans) developed, each of which developed religious practices largely tied to its land. There was no central political structure or unified culture. By the third century C.E. an agriculturally based religion had become prominent, and over the next centuries Japan would come together as a nation around the prominent Yamato clan (the source of the later imperial family). During this formative period, two of what would become leading Shinto shrines, Ise and Izumo, were created.

Crucial to the creation of a national Shinto religion (which incorporated the many local variations) was the introduction of Confucianism and its emphasis on ethics and social order, the spread of the cosmology that divided the world into ying-yang polarities, and later the arrival of BUDDHISM. Each challenged the elite elements of Japan to create a uniquely Japanese faith comparable to that of neighboring states. One result was the compilation of the Kojiki (712 C.E.) and Nihongi (720 C.E.), the two sacred texts of Shinto that describe the overarching myth out of which the many local cults would operate.

Shinto views the world as alive with divinity. The term kami refers to the many deities of heaven and earth who may include among them some human beings and an array of natural objects (birds, plants, and natural features). Anything above the ordinary or that might awaken a sense of awe or mystery in the human mind may be listed as a kami, including the succession of emperors who have led the country.

Although kami of local significance are acknowledged at different shrines, some kami gained a significance as part of the national myth of Japan's origin. The deities Ame-no-minaka-nushi-no-Kami (Kami Master of the Center of Heaven), Taka-mi-musubi-no-Kami (High Sacred Creating Kami), and Kami-masubi (Sacred Creating Kami) are seen as the primordial deities who were present when nothing but the primal chaos existed. They were responsible for the formation of the Earth and the deities who were later to create Japan and its people.

The High Kami in heaven sent the primal parents—Izanagi (male) and Izanami (female). Their interaction gave birth to numerous islands and other deities. Then Izanami was burned as the fire-god was given birth. She descended into the underworld, where she was trapped after eating of its food. In his attempts to free Izanami, Izanagi bathed in the ocean as a cleansing act. His ablutions also resulted in the appearance of Amaterasu, the goddess who is seen as the ancestress of the Japanese imperial family. While at a festival, another kami held a mirror up for Amaterasu to gaze upon herself. She would later give this mirror to her grandson, who was sent from heaven to establish the Japanese royal lineage. The mirror is now said to be residing hidden in the Ise shrine.

The Harvest Festival celebration at the Fushimi Inari Shrine in Kyoto, Japan (Tibor Bogner/TRIP)

Shinto has an essential communal element, and much of its activity occurs in the many shrines that are found throughout Japan. The shrines, abodes of the kami, are generally located in spots of particular natural beauty or some noteworthy geographical feature. The site itself is marked off with a fence, and the entrance with the distinctive gate (torii) to which a sacred rope (shimenawa) is attached. At the shrine, the kami are invoked on a cycle that follows the agricultural seasons and that affirms the myth of national origins. Many shrines are located at the foot of a mountain, which has the effect of marking the land of death and renewal (the mountain) from the plains, the land of life and activity. Others may be found at the point where two streams merge.

Common elements in Shinto rituals are the offering of foods, which in turn has had a profound influence on the Japanese diet, and purification, harkening back to the baths taken by Izanagi in his attempts to free his wife from the underworld. Food offerings may be classified by type (animal, vegetable, fish), style of preparation (raw or cooked), mode of offering, or whether it is to be viewed by the deities or eaten by them. Frequently the offered food becomes part of a banquet consumed later by the worshippers.

Purification rites have been developed in response to a variety of life's setbacks, from the sickness and death of a loved one to natural calamities and national disasters. They came to include reactions to forms of ritual impurity (from menstruation to sexual activity) and to symbolize the hope of renewal.

After 538 C.E., Shinto developed in dialogue with Buddhism, the latter becoming an increasing part of Japanese life. Shinto and Buddhist temples were often constructed adjacent to each other, and they found a common ground in their esoteric element. Buddhists came to accept Shintoism as a lesser form of itself, and locally, syncretistic Buddhist/Shinto cults developed that centered on specific shrines and local deities. SHUGENDO became one of the more interesting new religions drawing deeply from both Buddhist and Shinto sources.

Shintoism experienced a revival in the fifteenth century after many shrines were destroyed in the Onin War (1467–1477). Out of the ashes emerged Yoshida Kanetomo (1435–1511), who dedicated his life to their reconstruction (especially those most associated with his prominent family), the return of Shinto supremacy in the land, and the reestablishment of imperial authority. He recast Shintoism as the original faith and the source of DAOISM, Confucianism, and Buddhism. He expounded a new theology built around an exoteric teaching (as found in the Kojiki and Nihongi) and esoteric teachings that he claimed had been revealed by deities to his family (resulting in additional scriptural texts). Kanetomo became the leading figure in Shintoism, and his school would dominate the religion during the next centuries.

The work of Kanetomo and his successors would during the Edo Period (1600–1868) lead to a shift in Shinto away from a primary dialogue with Buddhism to one with Confucianism. At the same time a new scholarly movement, called kokugaku (National Learning), attempted to redefine Japanese tradition and self-identity. Hayashi Razan (1583–1657), who led the new trend, emphasized the immanence of the Absolute as the divine within the inner life of the individual, the divine life expressed in ethical behavior, and, most important for Japan's future, the primary manifestation of divine virtue in the imperial government. During the Edo Period, especially in the writings of Yoshikawa Koretari (1616–1694), the deity Kuninotokotachi no Mikoto, identified with the primal chaos, emerged as the central figure in the Shinto pantheon.

The continued development of Shintoism in the eighteenth century set the stage for major developments in the nineteenth century. The variety of Shinto groups, later to constitute Sect Shintoism, began to emerge. Most of these new groups were the result of the activity of a creative founder who was also responsible for the composing or receiving by revelation of a distinctive new scripture. These groups were later classified by the major themes they developed. Some emphasized attachment to traditional texts (Kojiki and Nihongi);

The Karatsu Okunchi Festival in Kyushu, Japan (Christopher Rennie/TRIP)

Confucian ethical principles; or purification rituals. The Fuji and Ontake sects emphasized the longstanding worship at sacred mountains. Spiritual healing, utilizing Shinto rituals, became the center of Tenrikyo and Konkokyo.

A new era for Shinto came in 1868 with the emergence of the Meiji government. The new government brought to the fore a form of Shintoism usually referred to as State Shinto. It combined the thought of Hirata Atsutane (1776–1843) with the cult that had grown up around the imperial family. Atsutane had been an effective propagandist of the return of Japan to imperial rule and the establishment of Shinto as the sole religion of the land. State Shinto propagated the belief in the divinity of the emperor and sanctified Japan's national political policies. It proposed as its idea saisei itchi, the unity of religion and government. Students of Atsutane were recruited to head a revived Office of Shinto Worship whose initial mandate was the separation of Shintoism from Buddhism and CHRISTIANITY. As a result, Shinto shrines were stripped of all Buddhist and Christian symbols, and the Imperial Palace was denuded of the heretofore dominant Buddhist altars and symbols.

In the 1870s, step by step, the government asserted its authority over the Shinto shrines and leadership. The Agency for Spiritual Guidance was given authority over all Shinto priests and designated their place of appointment. The national rituals to be performed at each shrine were also prescribed. The emperor was declared sacred and inviolable in 1889, and, in 1900, Shinto's special place was reemphasized by its being placed under the Bureau of Shrines in the Home Ministry, while Buddhism and Christianity were relegated to a separate Bureau of Religion in the Ministry of Education. In the meantime, Sect Shinto had an intermediary position. The sects were treated much like Buddhism and Christianity, being seen as private religious organizations under the jurisdiction of the Bureau of Religion. Most important, they were not allowed to create shrines, nor to copy shrine architecture in their worship centers, including the use of a torii as a gateway entrance.

Increasingly, Shinto was seen as an arm of the state. In 1911 it ordered all schools (including private religious schools) to take their pupils to shrines for nationally directed ritual events. In 1932 a Catholic school refused to comply with the regulation on grounds of religious freedom. Students at one Catholic school had been asked to visit a shrine particularly associated with Japan's military history. As a result of the protest, the government declared the shrines "nonreligious" sites whose task was to foster national loyalty. Shintoism was thus redefined in such a way as to be compatible with any particular religious affiliation; the inclusion of Shinto ritual into both private and public life became a sign of loyalty as Japan went to war. Amulets from the Ise shrine became ubiquitous.

The loss in World War II affected Shintoism most of all. The coming of religious freedom gave Sect Shinto a new life, and several sects emerged as popular movements whose adherents numbered into the tens of thousands. Then, on December 15, 1945, General Douglas MacArthur (1880–1964) issued the "Shinto Directive," which ordered the separation of State Shinto from the government. Most important, the government was to end its support of the shrines. This mandate was embodied in the Constitution of 1947.

In the late 1940s, State Shinto evolved into what is today known as Shrine (jinja) Shinto. The formerly government-supported shrines were reorganized into a private religious corporation, the Association of Shinto Shrines, with which the great majority of shrines affiliated. There were more than a hundred thousand such shrines in 1945. By the beginning of the 1980s, some seventy-nine thousand shrines were maintained as part of the new system of voluntary support. Two seminaries, one at Kokugakuin University in Tokyo and the other at Kogakukan University in Ise, train Shinto priests. The association represents Shintoism in various interfaith activities, including the WORLD CONFERENCE ON RELIGION AND PEACE. It also accepts women into the priesthood.

In spite of the proliferation of Shinto sects, the association includes the majority of the two to three million Japanese who identify themselves as Shintoists, the number of whom is somewhat difficult to assess, as many people carry dual affiliations, a continuing result of Meiji Era practices. Support for Shintoism in Japan pales next to that for Buddhism, which now commands the allegiance of more than half the population. The special Shinto of the Imperial House (koshitsu) also survives in a variety of practices associated with the emperor and his family, the shrines at the royal palace, and the Grand Shrine at Ise. The most important rite is Niinamesai, the annual offering of the first fruits of the grain harvest, which includes a thanks to the deities for their blessing and a sharing of the food with the deities, especially Amaterasu.

The Grand Shrine at Ise, now a popular tourist attraction, includes two shrines. One is dedicated to Amaterasu and, as the shrine of the legendary ancestress of the emperor, has a special relationship to the imperial family. Traditionally, the emperors would make reports to the goddess at the shrine, which was believed to hold the fabled mirror she had passed to her grandson. A second shrine is dedicated to Toyouke, the goddess of food. Every twenty years, new shrines replicating the old ones are erected. Upon their completion, as part of a ceremony of renewal, the ritual objects in the old shrines are transferred to the new ones, and the old shrines are then completely dismantled.

Shinto, as the religion of the Japanese people, has been largely confined to that country. However, early in the twentieth century, it was established among Japanese immigrants in Hawaii. Although largely suppressed during World War II, it slowly revived after the war as questions of the loyalties of Japanese Americans were resolved. Shinto has subsequently appeared, in small numbers, in diaspora communities in Canada and South America.

Sources:

Bocking, Brian. A Popular Dictionary of Shinto. New York: McGraw-Hill, 1997.

Breen, John, and Mark Teeuwen, eds. Shinto in History. Richmond, UK: Curzon, 2000.

Hardacre, Helen. Shinto and the State, 1868–1988. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1991.

Nelson, John K. A Year in the Life of a Shinto Shrine. Seattle: University of Washington Press, 1996.

Ono, Sokyō. Shinto: The Kami Way. Rutland, VT: Charles E. Tuttle, 1967.

Ross, Floyd H. Shinto: The Way of Japan. Boston: Beacon, 1965.

Shri Ram Chandra Mission

Shri Ram Chandra (“Lalaji,” 1873–1931) was born in Fatehgarh (Uttar Pradesh, India) in 1873. In 1908 he returned to Fatehgarh from Kaimganj, where he had lived for several years, and started tutoring a small number of pupils who accepted him as their spiritual master. In 1914 he established his first regular satsang, or group meditation, and from 1929 on he consecrated his whole life to teaching and commenting on the Vedas. He died in 1931. His successor, also called Shri Ram Chandra (1899–1983), although not a relative, was born in Shahjahanpur and was known in the movement as Babuji. In 1945 he incorporated the Shri Ram Chandra Mission (named after his master and not himself). Originally a civil clerk (hence the name Babuji, from the word babu, meaning clerk), he decided in 1954 to devote himself full-time to the work of the mission, and went on to supervise its worldwide expansion. He died in 1983 and was, in turn, succeeded by Shri Parthasarathi Rajagopalachari, born in Madras-Chennai in 1927 and known in the mission as Chariji.

The mission teaches a system of yoga called Sahaj Marg. This is a variety of traditional Raja yoga (royal yoga), modified in accordance with modern lifestyles. Although other Raja yoga schools have rather complicated and lengthy trainings, Sahaj Marg is basically simple and includes no secret rituals, names, or mantras. New pupils immediately start meditating with the help of a “preceptor” for thirty minutes (later, when they are more experienced, one hour), simply sitting and focusing their attention on the “Divine Light,” which is supposed to be already present in their hearts. The mission recommends another thirty minutes of “purification” at the end of each day, in order to clear the mind of the distractions accumulated throughout the day. A short prayer is also suggested before going to bed. This process is known as the “inner trip,” or yatra, through a number of spiritual realms moving gradually closer to the Center. During this process, the pupil receives help from the transmission of the master’s own energy, a “force without force,” or without qualification, also known as pranahuti, or the gift of life (after prana, life; and huti, gift). It is possible to achieve a state of union with the Divine at the end of the process, and it is this that is regarded as the ultimate aim of true yoga.

In 1967 the Shri Ram Chandra Mission established the Sahaj Marg Research and Training Institute, with headquarters at Chennai (India) and Lausanne (Switzerland) as an international yoga research center. There are more than fifty ashrams in India, the largest of them in Manapakkam, seven miles from Chennai; there are also two ashrams in the United States, and others in Europe, the largest being in Augerans (France) and Vrads Sande (Denmark).

Address:

Shri Ram Chandra Mission (Shahjainpur U.P.)
Manapakkam

Chennai 600 116
India
<http://www.srcm.org>

Massimo Introvigne and PierLuigi Zoccatelli

Sources:

- Chandra, Ram. Truth Eternal. Chennai, India: Shri Ram Chandra Mission, 1973.
- Complete Works of Ram Chandra*. 2 vols. Pacific Grove, CA: Shri Ram Chandra Mission, 1989–1991.
- Rajagopalachar, Parthasarathi. My Master. Chennai, India: Shri Ram Chandra Mission, 1975.

Shugendō

Shugendō, literally the Way (dō) of practicing or acquiring (shu) magico-religious power (gen), is the name given to a broad range of beliefs and practices associated with sacred mountains in Japan. It has no actual founder but grew out of loose organizations of people who entered mountains either temporarily or permanently in order to attain the power of the divine forces (kami, hotoke) associated with them. Stories of ascetics and esoteric practitioners, such as Shugendō’s legendary founder En no Gyōja, share motifs of immurement in mountains, restricted diet or fasting, the recitation of mantras, and contemplation. The growing formalization of mountain practices and the incorporation of regional sacred mountains and their practitioners—particularly under Buddhist auspices—led, by the thirteenth century, to the emergence of two dominant streams of Shugendō, one affiliated with the shrine-temple complex at Yoshino and the other with that at Kumano. By the seventeenth century, the main streams were Honzan-ha and Tozan-ha, centered on Yoshino-Kumano and affiliated with Tendai and Shingon, respectively; Haguro-ha in northern Japan; and Hikosan in Kyushu. The former two looked on En no Gyōja as their founder, while Haguro and Hikosan maintained local traditions. Shugendō was banned in 1872 as part of the Meiji government’s policy of creating Shinto as a state ideology and suppressing all signs of syncretism. Shugendō was particularly vulnerable, because it had developed as an admixture of Japanese beliefs about mountains and their kami (deities), esoteric Buddhist practices and doctrines, shamanistic and mediumistic understandings of the relationship between the human and the divine, and Chinese ritual and divinatory techniques. Shugendō sects mushroomed after freedom of religious association was legalized in the postwar constitution.

The practice most associated with Shugendō is that of the Ten Realms. MAHAYANA BUDDHISM postulates ten realms of rebirth: hells, hungry spirits, beasts, ashuras (demi-gods), human beings, heavenly beings, shravakas (disciples of the Buddha), pratyeka-buddhas (self-enlightened buddhas), bodhisattvas, and buddhas. Shugendō practice in the mountains incorporates the idea of progressing through these realms of enlightenment, combined with an earlier, shamanistic pattern of death and rebirth. Medieval records suggest that this pattern was once widespread; now, however, it survives only at Hagurosan in Yamagata Prefecture.

The Akinomine (Autumn Peak) of Hagurosan, originally lasting more than a month, has gradually been condensed to the present seven days (August 24–September 1). Practitioners divide their time between making pilgrimages to sacred places in the mountains during the day, to access sacred power, and reciting sutras for two sessions of around two hours every night. Six specific practices associated with the first six of the ten realms are carried out in conjunction with symbolic rituals centering on death and rebirth. The hells are represented by a ritual called nanban ibushi, in which pungent smoke is fanned through the hall at the end of the sutra-recitation sessions on the first three nights. The hungry spirits are symbolized by fasting on the first three days; the beasts by complete abstinence from the use of water (other than drinking); the ashuras by Tengu-zumo (wrestling); human beings by repentance (repeated prostrations while reciting the names of the deities and buddhas of the mountain); and heavenly beings by ennen (sacred dance), though now Noh chants have been substituted. The underlying theme of death and rebirth is symbolized, sometimes in multiple forms, by an initial funeral service (prior to entering the mountain); conception (throwing a pole up the steps of the temple, the touching of blazing torches together); growth in the womb (ceremonies to “pacify the spirit,” altar decorations); and birth (uttering the birth cry on the final day, running down the mountain, jumping over flames).

Shugendō doctrine traditionally has borrowed much from Buddhism and has been concerned with esoteric explanations of the meaning of terminology, ritual, and dress. It does not have scriptures as such. In recent years Shugendō centers have made much of the contribution that Shugendō can make to ecological understanding. Although it is traditionally a male preserve, women shugen are active in all centers, though they are still banned from entering the region around Sanjōgatake (Yoshino), the most sacred peak of Kumano-Yoshino Shugendō. Full female participation is a continuing controversy here, though in other centers, such as Hagurosan, women have begun to occupy senior positions formerly restricted to men.

Gaynor Sekimori

Sources:

- Earhart, H. Byron. A Religious Study of the Mount Haguro Sect of Shugendō: An Example of Japanese Mountain Religion. Tokyo: Sophia University, 1970.
- Miyake, Hitoshi. Shugendō: Essays on the Structure of Japanese Folk Religion. Ann Arbor: University of Michigan, 2001.

Sekimori, Gaynor. “The Akinomine of Haguro Shugendō: A Historical Perspective.” Transactions of the International Conference of Eastern Studies, 40, 1995.

Swanson, Paul L. “Shugendō and the Yoshino-Kumano Pilgrimage: An Example of Mountain Pilgrimage.” Monumenta Nipponica 36, 1 (1981): 55–84.

Tyler, Royall, and Paul L. Swanson, eds. “Shugendō and Mountain Religion in Japan.” Special issue of the Japanese Journal of Religious Studies 16, 1–2 (June–September 1989).

Siddha Yoga

The Siddha Yoga movement and the network of nonprofit organizations that gives it corporate form in the world today owe their existence to Swami Muktananda (1908–1982), who was a widely traveled Hindu monk from the port city of Mangalore in southwest India. The death of his spiritual master Nityananda (1899–1961) in August 1961 can be considered the founding date for Siddha Yoga. His master’s passing put him in the position of an independent head of his own religious sect, but one that honored the master’s memory and claimed a continuity with Nityananda’s spiritual powers. Muktananda founded the new movement, named it, and during the last dozen years of his life attracted patrons who provided enough capital to establish its major centers in Australia, the Americas, and Europe.

Siddha means complete, perfected, or fully realized, and this refers to the sources, methods, and goals affirmed in the movement’s devotional theology of grace. Nityananda is the primary model of the Siddha in personal form and the mediator of the invisible transcendent realm of Siddha Loka, which is functionally similar to the realm of ascended masters found in I AM RELIGIOUS ACTIVITY, Theosophy (THEOSOPHICAL SOCIETY), and similar modern revivals of ancient teachings. Many Siddhas are likely to be alive on the planet at any particular time, but only a highly evolved person can discern them. By definition the current head of the Siddha Yoga movement, its presiding guru, is such a person. The guru is assumed to be a capable guide for devotees in two basic ways: as an instructor and as a transmitter of power for individual spiritual development.

Swami Muktananda and his successor as guru have used many kinds of written and oral sources in their teaching, predominantly Hindu but without limitation to any single sector of the tradition. They quote and comment on ritual and philosophical texts of the Veda, Vedanta, Saiva Agama, and Tantra, and have given special prominence to texts of KASHMIR SAIIVISM and to traditional works in honor of the guru and in praise of Hindu goddesses. Siddha Yoga seems to have an open or an emerging canon of scripture that is determined by the guru’s assessment of what the devotees need. Devotees, in turn, can practice Siddha Yoga chants, meditation, and acts of service, and can take fee-based short courses without relinquishing the religion of their birth or family. From a devotee's point of view, the key feature of Siddha Yoga is a relationship to the guru as a spiritual catalyst, expressed through affiliation rather than membership. To an outsider, these appear to be characteristics of an audience cult.

A couple is married in a Siddha ceremony. (J. Highet/TRIP)

The movement's short history has been marked by two closely related controversies at the end of Muktananda's life. The first occurred over the succession in leadership. Muktananda named a pair of siblings to succeed him as equals. The elder sister was the stronger, and as Swami Chidvilasananda she is now the sole leader of the movement. Her younger brother left or was forced out in 1985, and as Swami Nityananda he heads his own small organization, called Shanti Mandir. The second controversy concerned the apparent contradiction between Nityananda's and Muktananda's status as celibate monks, and reports of their multiple secret sexual alliances with devotees. These were acknowledged as the cause for removal in the case of Swami Nityananda, but they are denied about Muktananda by those who speak for the movement.

Siddha Yoga centers can now be found in more than twenty-five countries across Europe, North and South America, Australia, and New Zealand. Gurudev Siddha Peeth, the original Siddha Yoga ashram and headquarters of the movement during Muktananda's lifetime, is located in rural Maharashtra, India.

Address:

Siddha Yoga
P.O. Box 600
371 Brickman Rd.
South Fallsburg, NY 12747-5313
<http://www.siddhayoga.org/>

Gene R. Thursby

Sources:

- Brooks, Douglas Renfrew, et al. Meditation Revolution: A History and Theology of the Siddha Yoga Lineage. South Fallsburg, NY: Agama, 1997.
- Caldwell, Sarah. "The Heart of the Secret: A Personal and Scholarly Encounter with Shakta Tantrism in Siddha Yoga." Nova Religio 5, 1 (October 2001): 9-51.
- Thursby, Gene R. "Swami Muktananda and the Seat of Power." In When Prophets Die: The Postcharismatic Fate of New Religious Movements, edited by Timothy Miller, pp. 165-181. Albany: State University of New York Press, 1991.

Sierra Leone

The area occupied by the modern state of Sierra Leone was originally settled by a spectrum of peoples, the Temne (in the north) and Mende (in the south) being the largest. From the fifteenth to the beginning of the nineteenth century, the coast was visited by the Portuguese and other slavers, gathering people to ship to the Americas, but settlements were sporadic.

A new era for Sierra Leone began in the 1780s. British abolitionists purchased a small tract of land for the settlement of repatriated former slaves. The first settlers arrived in 1787, and their numbers grew in 1792 with a group from Nova Scotia. Following the American Revolution, former slaves who had sided with the British on the promise of freedom after the war were relocated to Nova Scotia. Many, uncomfortable with the climate, accepted the offer of British abolitionists for relocation to Africa. The former Nova Scotia residents landed at what in 1792 would become known as Freetown. A third group (the Maroons) would arrive from Jamaica in 1800, and the population would grow with other former slaves as well. But also, within a generation, the settlement would be co-opted by the British government as its drive to control Africa emerged. The repatriated Africans, known as Creoles, would become a distinct group, identified by their adoption of European ways and their feeling of superiority to the native peoples.

The small Freetown settlement became the capital of the new colony of Sierra Leone, and the British took control of the inland areas over the course of the nineteenth century. In 1960, Sierra Leone became an independent state, but in 1971, after several years of instability, it broke ties with England and declared itself a republic. However, poverty, corruption, and unrest have continued to the present and have culminated in a decade-long civil war, beginning in 1991. Although a peace treaty was negotiated in 1999, the situation remains tense.

Among the former slaves who settled in Nova Scotia were Methodists and Baptists. Upon their arrival in Freetown, they founded the first Christian churches. David George (1743–1810) was the leader of the Nova Scotian Baptists and became the pastor of the Freetown Baptist Church, the Status of religions in Sierra Leone, 2000-2050

Followers	2000			2025	2050
	total	%	rate
Muslims	2,230,000	45.9	1.99	3,755,000	5,055,000
Ethnoreligionists	1,959,000	40.4	1.72	2,980,000	3,668,000
Christians	556,000	11.5	2.66	1,070,000	1,720,000
Protestants	171,000	3.5	1.88	270,000	360,000
Roman Catholics	169,000	3.5	3.84	410,000	750,000
Independents	165,000	3.4	2.57	350,000	570,000
Nonreligious	95,300	2.0	2.80	250,000	500,000
Baha'is	11,400	0.2	3.59	25,000	40,000
Hindus	2,500	0.1	1.96	4,000	7,000
Atheists	120	0.0	3.26	300	600
other religionists	1,100	0.0	5.94	1,600	3,000
Total population	4,854,000	100.0	1.97	8,085,000	10,994,000

first Baptist congregation on the African continent. Prior to the American Revolution, he had formerly been a member of the all-black Baptist church in Silver Bluff, South Carolina. It was to be a generation before a second congregation would be established. The work struggled through the century, aided briefly by the Southern Baptists in the 1850s. The Baptist Convention of Sierra Leone was founded in 1974, but by the end of the century it still had only about six thousand members.

The Methodists who arrived in 1792 were some two hundred strong. They tried to obtain help from their coreligionists in England, but the British conference was slow to develop a missionary consciousness; it was not until 1811 that they recruited a missionary, George Warren, to assist with the work. He died after only eight months, and his successors quarreled with the congregants and split the work into several factions. In the middle of the century, the United Brethren in Christ (now a constituent of the UNITED METHODIST CHURCH) began a separate work, and later in the century the Wesleyan Methodist Connection (now an integral part of the WESLEYAN CHURCH) and the AFRICAN METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH assumed support for missionary efforts. At the end of the twentieth century, all of these works continued, with the original METHODIST CHURCH OF SIERRA LEONE being the largest. It is the only Sierra Leone-based church that is a member of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES.

Men who had been active in creating Freetown were among the founders of the CHURCH MISSIONARY SOCIETY (1799). As might be expected, the CMS turned its attention to Sierra Leone as one of its first missionary targets. They hoped to convert the Creoles and to use them to missionize the continent. The climate took its toll on the British missionaries, and many died, but along the way they founded two schools that became important in the colony's development, Fourah Bay College (for men) and Annie Walsh Training Institution (for women). As quickly as possible, they trained African priests. A diocese was erected in 1852, thus allowing for the ordination of African clergy without the necessity of their traveling to England. A European held the episcopal chair until the middle of the twentieth century.

In 1951, Sierra Leone was one of five Anglican dioceses that merged to form the CHURCH IN THE PROVINCE OF WEST AFRICA. Moses Scott, the African bishop of Sierra Leone, was the first archbishop of the new province. There are now two dioceses in Sierra Leone.

Roman Catholics made initial efforts to reach the people of Sierra Leone over the centuries since the first European contact, but it was not until the nineteenth century that permanent missions and churches were established. The vicariate of Sierra Leone was designated in 1858 and assigned to the Lyons Fathers and the HOLY GHOST FATHERS. The church experienced slow growth during its initial century. The first Sierra Leone priest was ordained in 1939. In 1950, Rome assumed direct responsibility for the work and established the dioceses of Freetown and Bo. In the twentieth century, the ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH became the largest religious group in the country.

A variety of Protestant and Free Church groups arose in Sierra Leone over the course of the twentieth century. As early as 1905, two young women who had been influenced by the revival of PENTECOSTALISM in Los Angeles began a small mission in Freetown, and then directed work among the Kru people and other groups (Kissi, Limba, Loko) in the extreme eastern part of the country. This work was later assumed by the ASSEMBLIES OF GOD. The NEW APOSTOLIC CHURCH, which began work in the 1960s, has also shown great success.

The original Methodist Church, though not from any desire of its own, became the first of AFRICAN INITIATED

CHURCHES, both in Sierra Leone and the whole of the continent. A number of independent churches arose in Sierra Leone during the twentieth century, including some from other countries, such as the CHURCH OF THE LORD, ALADURA, and those indigenous to Sierra Leone, such as the National Pentecostal Church.

As Christianity entered from the coast, so Islam entered from the interior. Sunni Islam of the MALIKITE school had been established in West Africa in the eleventh century. It found a response in the northern and western parts of the country among the Susu, Vai, Bullom, Yalunke, and Temne. During the twentieth century, many Mende became Muslim. Unlike some nearby countries, such as French-speaking Senegal, the Sufi Brotherhoods are not very active in Sierra Leone.

Sierra Leone has been especially responsive to the AHMADIYYA MOVEMENT IN ISLAM, which many Muslims consider sectarian and even heretical. The Ahmadiyyas began work in 1957 and have found their best response among the Mende people (now constituting 90 percent of the Ahmadiyya membership). The BAHÁ'Í FAITH has also had considerable response and now reports more than ten thousand members.

The liberal Protestant churches in Sierra Leone are associated together in the Council of Churches in Sierra Leone, which is affiliated with the World Council of Churches. More conservative bodies are associated with the Evangelical Fellowship of Sierra Leone, which is an affiliate of the WORLD EVANGELICAL ALLIANCE. The Interreligious Council of Sierra Leone (IRCSL), a broad-based organization representing the major Christian and Muslim organizations in the country, has been active in the search for peace in the war-torn land.

The violent situation in Sierra Leone during the 1990s has not been conducive to the influx of new religions, and the country's religious pluralism remains confined to the traditional religions of the native people, Islam, and Christianity. There is a small Hindu presence among Indian expatriates, and a group related to the ANCIENT AND MYSTICAL ORDER ROSAE CRUCIS.

Sources:

- Fisher, H. "The Ahmadiyya in Sierra Leone." Sierra Leone Bulletin of Religion 2, 1 (1960): 1–10.
- Olson, G. W. Church Growth in Sierra Leone: A Study of Church Growth in Africa's Oldest Protestant Mission Field. Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 1969.
- Skinner, D. E. Islam in Sierra Leone during the Nineteenth Century. Ph.D. dissertation, University of California, 1971.

Sikh Dharma

Sikh Dharma, an outgrowth of—and successor organization to—the Healthy, Happy, Holy Organization, was founded by Yogi Bhajan (b. 1929) in 1969. Bhajan is a well-educated Sikh and former customs officer from Delhi, India. He moved to Toronto, Canada, in 1968, where he initially taught hatha yoga classes. From Toronto he moved to Los Angeles in December 1968, and the next year he founded an ashram and the Healthy, Happy, Holy Organization (3HO). People were attracted to 3HO by Bhajan's classes in kundalini yoga, previously a secret practice. Yogi Bhajan's teachings, which initially focused on yoga disciplines, gradually changed to emphasize an increasingly orthodox form of Sikhism, the religion in which Bhajan was raised. This new focus was reflected corporately when 3HO was supplanted by Sikh Dharma. 3HO was retained as Sikh Dharma's educational wing.

Like many of the other Eastern religious groups that took root in the West during the later years of the 1960s counterculture, 3HO initially attracted disaffected young people. As a consequence, individuals associated with Bhajan's Sikh Dharma are usually Westerners rather than Punjabis. (Punjab, a province in northwest India, is the Sikh homeland.) They take formal initiation into the Sikh faith by joining the Khalsa, the Brotherhood of the Pure Ones, a fellowship begun by Guru Gobind Singh. Members of the Khalsa are required to keep the traditional practices introduced by Guru Gobind Singh that became the distinguishing marks of the Sikh community, known popularly as the five Ks: Kesh, long hair, a sign of saintliness; Kangh, a comb for keeping the hair neat; Kach, short pants, for quick movement in battle; Kara, a steel bracelet signifying restraint; and Kirpan, a sword of defense (in later years, it became acceptable for Sikhs to carry a sword symbolically).

The 3HO Sikhs are vegetarian, usually preferring natural foods. Fish, meat, alcohol, and drugs are prohibited. They also prefer natural methods of healing. Additionally, the traditional religious practices and holidays of Sikhism are observed by 3HO Sikhs. These holidays include Balsakhi Day, the birthday of Khalsa (April); the Martyrdom days of Guru Tegh Bahadur (November) and Guru Arjun Dev (May); and the birthdays of the ten gurus.

There has been a good deal of controversy with respect to Sikh Dharma's relationship with the older Punjabi Sikh community. American Sikhs criticized Punjabi Sikhs for becoming lax in their discipline, especially in their adherence to the five Ks. Additionally, in the 1970s, Sikh leaders in Amritsar took the unprecedented step of giving Bhajan administrative authority over Sikh affairs in the Western Hemisphere, an appointment that carried with it the title Siri Singh Sahib. Some Punjabi Sikhs living in the West were outraged by this appointment. Rather than challenging Amritsar, however, they tended to respond by criticizing Bhajan on such issues as his emphasis on yoga and diet—an emphasis that is not part of traditional Sikhism. Other Sikhs in India echoed this line of criticism. Although these issues have never been resolved, Bhajan's emphasis on orthodoxy was supported by Amritsar. New controversies arose following the upheavals that took place in the Punjab in the 1980s, with Bhajan coming under attack from Sikh nationalists for his refusal to support an independent Sikh homeland.

Sikh Dharma centers may be found in more than twenty countries around the world, including Taiwan, Australia, South Africa, Brazil, and many of the European nations.

Addresses:

Sikh Dharma
Rt. 3
Box 11 32D
Española, NM 87532

Sikh Dharma International Secretariat
P.O. Box 351149
Los Angeles, CA 90035
<http://www.yogibhajan.com>
<http://www.3ho.org>

James R. Lewis

Sources:

- Khalsa, Kirpal Singh. "New Religious Movements Turn towards Worldly Success." Journal for the Scientific Study of Religion 25, 2 (1986): 233–245.
- Tobey, Alan. "The Summer Solstice of the Healthy-Happy-Holy Organization." In The New Religious Consciousness, edited by Charles Y. Glock and Robert N. Bellah, pp. 5–30. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1976.

SIKHISM AND THE SANT MAT TRADITION

Sikhism was founded by Guru Nanak (1469–1539) in sixteenth-century India. Nanak was born into a Hindu family in Punjab, a province in northern India. Although Hindus constituted a majority of the population, in Nanak's time Muslims ruled most of the subcontinent. He took instruction in Hindu lore from a village teacher and also attended a Muslim school. Although certain older interpreters of the Sikh tradition asserted that he was attempting to reconcile Hinduism and Islam by forming a syncretism of the two, the consensus of more recent scholarship is that Nanak saw himself as founding a completely new religion superseding both Hinduism and Islam.

Sant Mat, by way of contrast, is a sampradaya—a school of religious teaching transmitted through a line of gurus—that, at least traditionally, did not seek to establish itself as a separate religion. The Sant teacher Ramananda, for example, stayed within the Hindu fold, while Kabir, perhaps history's most famous Sant master, remained identified as a Muslim. Although Sant Mat arose in North India during the late Indian Middle Ages, the core meditation technique of the school, Surat Shabd Yoga, or Nad Yoga, appears to be much more ancient.

Sikhism and Sant Mat have been associated with each other for a number of different reasons. These include their common location and period of origin, the many shared themes in their teachings, similar conceptions of the divine, and the fact that the majority of contemporary Sant Mat teachers are Sikhs. Some early-twentieth-century scholars went so far as to claim that Guru Nanak was actually a student of Kabir—a speculative assertion with no documentable historical basis. Mainstream Sikhs do not practice Surat Shabd Yoga, and would adamantly reject any suggestion that Nanak and the other Sikh gurus were part of the Sant Mat tradition. The following discussion will survey first Sikhism and then Sant Mat.

At about the age of sixteen, Guru Nanak became an accountant in the household of an important Muslim official in the town of Sultanapur. He began to gather a group of followers who bathed together in a river before dawn every day and met in his home in the evening to sing religious songs. One day he failed to return from his morning swim. His friends found his clothes on the banks of the river and dragged the waters in an unsuccessful attempt to recover his body. Three days later, Nanak reappeared. He is said to have stated at the time: "There is neither Hindu nor Muslim, so whose path should I choose? I shall follow God's path. God is neither Hindu nor Muslim and the path which I follow is God."

Later he explained that during the time he was missing he had been carried into God's presence, where he had received a cup of nectar and a message from God to go forth into the world to teach the repetition of the name of God and the practices of charity, meditation, and worship.

Nanak traveled widely to spread his religious message. According to tradition, he made four journeys, visiting Assam in the east, Sri Lanka in the south, Ladakh and Tibet in the north, and Mecca, Medina, and Baghdad in the west. Nanak's followers began to call themselves sikhs, which means students or disciples.

In 1504, India was invaded by a Muslim conqueror from Central Asia. By 1525 the sultan of Delhi had been deposed and the Mogul Empire established in its place. During this time of upheaval, Nanak looked for a place of refuge and stability. He and his family established a religious center at Kartarpur, a village built on land donated by a wealthy member of the new faith.

Sri Hamandir Sahab (Golden Temple) in Amritsar, India (Helene Rogers/TRIP)

Nanak stressed that there is but one God. Although he regarded his revelation as transcending both Islam and Hinduism, his teachings also embodied certain traditional South Asian ideas, such as karma, reincarnation, and the transitory nature of the world. He emphasized the unique role of the guru as necessary to lead people to God. He urged his followers to meditate, worship God, and sing devotional hymns.

According to Sikhism, the ultimate purpose of religion is union with God through his indwelling presence in the human soul. Receiving divine grace in this way, human beings are freed from the cycle of birth and rebirth, and then pass beyond death into a realm of infinite and eternal bliss. Nanak's teaching offered a clear and simple path to this goal. By meditating on the divine name, human beings are cleansed of their impurities and enabled to ascend higher and higher until they achieve union with the eternal one. Sikhs hold that suffering in the world arises as a result of humanity's separation from God.

Toward the end of his life, Nanak ensured that his teaching would not die but would survive and become a new religion. He appointed a successor, Lehna, passing over his own two sons, whom he did not regard as suitable. Nanak gave Lehna a new name, Angad, meaning "limb." Lehna would become a "limb" or a part of Nanak. After Guru Nanak's death in 1539, Angad became the second of what would become ten Sikh gurus. He compiled a hymnal of Guru Nanak's compositions, to which he added his own.

The third guru, Amar Das, served from 1552 to 1574. He dug a well with eighty-four steps at Goindwal that became a place of pilgrimage and a focus of special rites and festivals. Amar Das nominated his son-in-law Ram Das Sodhi as the fourth guru. Thereafter the guship remained in the Sodhi family. The fourth guru, Ram Das, began the Golden Temple of Amritsar, the present headquarters of the world Sikh community. He nominated his son Arjan as the fifth guru.

Arjan completed the Golden Temple, which is still Sikhism's central shrine, with four doors on four sides to indicate that it was open to all castes. He also installed the Adi Granth (First Book), the collected writings of Nanak and the other gurus, within it. Arjan was eventually tortured and executed by the Mogul emperor. His martyrdom ended the first phase of Sikhism. Before his imprisonment, Arjan had nominated his son Hargobind as the sixth guru and girded him with two swords, symbolizing spiritual and temporal power. He left instructions that his son should "sit armed upon the throne and maintain an army to the best of his ability."

The sixth guru, Hargobind, established a group of horse and foot soldiers. He was imprisoned by the Mogul emperor for several years, but upon his release he regrouped and fought against the Moguls. The seventh guru was Hargobind's grandson Har Rai. The eighth guru was Har Rai's son Harikrishan, who died as a child. Upon the death of the young eighth guru, the Mogul emperor nominated a successor. The Sikhs, however, acclaimed Tegh Bahadur as their ninth guru. Guru Tegh Bahadur traveled through the Punjab preaching. His popularity prompted the Mogul emperor to have him arrested and beheaded in 1675.

The tenth guru, Gobind Singh, completed the Adi Granth and further militarized the Sikhs by forming the Khalsa, the Community of the Pure. Members of the Khalsa were initiated by a baptism in which they drank and were sprinkled with sweetened water stirred with a sword. They added Singh (Lion) to their name and adopted the five Ks: Kesh, long hair, a sign of saintliness; Kangh, a comb for keeping the hair neat; Kach, short pants, for quick movement in battle; Kara, a steel bracelet signifying sternness and restraint; and Kirpan, a sword of defense. The Khalsa was open to men and women of all castes. Members were admitted only after an initiation ceremony at which they pledged themselves to an austere code of conduct. Each morning they were to bathe at dawn and spend time in meditation. Liquor, tobacco, and narcotics were forbidden. They pledged loyalty to the teachings of the gurus. Sikhs who did not accept baptism into the Khalsa fraternity came to be known as Sahajdhari.

After all four of his sons died in fighting the Moguls, Guru Gobind Singh proclaimed that the line of the gurus would come to an end with himself. After Gobind Singh's death, the Adi Granth—subsequently referred to as the Guru Granth Sahib—was established as the guru, and no further human gurus were allowed. Subsequently, the Guru Granth was installed upon a throne and treated as a living presence in every Sikh temple.

Following Gobind Singh's death, the Khalsa became a military and political power in Punjab. Conflict between the Sikhs and the Mogul Empire continued. In 1799 the Sikhs captured Lahore and made it their capital. The Sikh kingdom of Ranjit Singh dominated the Punjab and other areas of northwest India. This kingdom granted religious freedom to the Hindus and Muslims. During the rule of Maharajah Ranjit Singh, from 1799 to 1839, large numbers of peasants converted to the Khalsa.

During the nineteenth century, the Sikhs fought against British invaders. The army of Ranjit's successor was defeated in 1849, and the Sikh kingdom was annexed to British India. Partially because the British administration was perceived as being generally fair and even-handed in Punjab, the Sikhs remained loyal to the British during the Great Mutiny of 1857 and afterward became preferred recruits to the British army. The Sikhs continued to increase in numbers under British rule, largely because of the special favors accorded to the Khalsa in the army and the civil services.

Guru Nanak and the other Sikh gurus (Helene Rogers/TRIP)

In 1931 leading Sikh authorities and associations in India held a meeting at Amritsar and drew up a document called the Rehat Maryada (Guide to the Sikh Way of Life) that all Sikhs are expected to follow. In this document, a Sikh is defined as anyone who believes in one God, the ten gurus and their teaching, and the Guru Granth. Every Sikh is expected to serve the community of the faithful, lead a life of prayer and meditation, and recite or read a prescribed number of hymns each day.

The British withdrew from the Indian subcontinent in 1947. When the British decided to partition the Punjab between the new states of India and Pakistan, the Sikhs were bitterly disappointed. Many places sacred to them, such as the birthplace of Guru Nanak, were in the western section of Punjab, which was given to Pakistan. East Punjab remained in India. Eventually two and a half million Sikhs were forced to immigrate to East Punjab.

In the Indian census of 1971, the number of Sikhs (both Khalsa and Sahajdhari) was more than ten million, which was still less than 2 percent of the population of India. About 85 percent of the world's Sikhs live in Punjab, northern India. There are also significant diaspora communities in the United Kingdom and Canada.

There are several Sikh sects. The Udasi, or “detached,” are followers of Sri Chand, the ascetic elder son of Guru Nanak. They did not convert to the Khalsa started by Guru Gobind Singh. During the period of Sikh persecution by Mogul rulers, the Udasi took over the management of several Sikh shrines and introduced Hindu icons and ritual into Sikh temples. This met with the disapproval of orthodox Sikhs, who divested the Udasi of their control of the temples in the 1920s. Most Udasi today observe Hindu customs and pay nominal homage to the Adi Granth.

The Nirmala, or “unsullied,” are a sect of theologians started by Guru Gobind Singh. The guru had a group of scholars study Sanskrit and the Vedas to be better equipped to interpret the writings of the gurus, which make frequent allusions to Hindu mythology and sacred texts. Nirmala wear white clothes and are vegetarians.

The Namdhari, or “adopters of the name,” are a sect founded by Balak Singh, who criticized the rich lifestyle of the Sikh aristocracy and preached the virtues of poverty. He exhorted the Sikhs to practice no ritual except repeating God's name. The Namdhari dress in white handspun cloth, abstain from liquor, and are vegetarians. Their gurdwaras (temples) are free of ostentation, and their wedding ceremonies are performed in austere simplicity.

The Nihangi, or “crocodiles,” are a militant order of Khalsa. They wear blue clothes and always carry arms on their person. Today they live mostly on alms and are notorious for their addiction to hashish. The Nirankari (see SANT NIRANKARI MISSION) believe in the succession of gurus continuing after Guru Gobind Singh and pay homage to a living guru. They include persons of all religions without requiring conversion to Sikhism.

If one considers Sant Mat to be a Sikh sect, it is easily the largest. The most prominent contemporary Sant Mat lineage is the Radha Soami (or RADHASOAMI) movement. The Radha Soami Satsang, Beas, is one of a number of movements flowing from the teachings of Param Sant Soami Ji Maharaj (Soami Ji). Soami's successors quarreled and split over succession to leadership of the movement he created. Radha Soami Satsang, Beas, developed from the teachings of Baba Jaimal Singh. The successor to Baba Jaimal Singh, Maharaj Sawan Singh, spread the teachings throughout India and, eventually, to the West. Under the leadership of Sawan Singh's grandson, Charan Singh, the Radha Soami Satsang, Beas, became the largest of all of the Sant Mat groups in the world.

The notion that God is light and sound is a core doctrine of the Sant Mat tradition. Rather like Western GNOSTICISM, Sant Mat teaches that the cosmos is a multilevel emanation in which human souls are trapped, and that the spiritual aspirant needs a series of words or names keyed to each of the lower levels in order to move through these levels and reach the divine source. There are five lower levels, for which one therefore requires five words. A sound current (a “river” of vibration; alternately pictured as a ray of light) from the higher levels—an emanation from the high God—flows down through all of the lower levels. A living guru imparts five secret names (the simram) to the aspirant at the time of initiation. Contemplating the sound current and the inner light (the visual aspect of the divine sound) with the master's guidance allows the individual to follow the sound back to the source from which it emanated (the Supreme Being), resulting in spiritual liberation. Those who follow the system must live according to a code of behavior that includes vegetarianism, abstinence from alcohol, and high moral character. Two and a half hours per day are to be set aside for meditation.

Radha Soami has also been the source of a number of new religious movements. For example, the father of Maharaj Ji, the current leader of ELAN VITAL (formerly the Divine Light Mission), was originally a disciple of Sawan Singh. New splinter groups have often arisen out of disputes over who should be the new leader following the death of a guru. One of the more important splinter groups was Kirpal Singh's RUHANI SATSANG, which was formed in the wake of the passing of Sawan Singh. Kirpal Singh's followers, in turn, have splintered repeatedly following his death. Kirpal Singh was also one of Paul Twitchell's teachers, and a number of outsiders have pointed out Kirpal Singh as likely the source of ECKANKAR sound current practices. ECKANKAR itself has influenced or given rise to a number of other new spiritual groups.

James R. Lewis

Sources:

- Barrier, N. Gerald, and Verne A. Dusenbery. The Sikh Diaspora: Migration and the Experience Beyond Punjab. Delhi: Chanakya, 1989.
- Cole, W. Owen. Popular Dictionary of Sikhism. Richmond, UK: Curzon, 1990.
- Fripp, Peter. The Mystic Philosophy of Sant Mat. Punjab: Radha Soami Satsang Beas, 1978.
- Juergensmeyer, Mark. Radhasoami Reality: The Logic of Modern Faith. Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1991.
- Lane, David Christopher. The Radhasoami Tradition: A Critical History of Guru Successorship. New York: Garland, 1992.
- Singh, Harbans. The Message of Sikhism. Delhi: Delhi Sikh Gurdwara, 1978.
- Singh, Khushwant. A History of the Sikhs. New Delhi: Oxford University Press, 1977.

Silesian Evangelical Church of the Augsburg Confession [Slezská církev evangelická augsburského vyznání]

The first Lutheran congregations in Silesia began to emerge in the 1620s, and by the middle of the century the Protestant Reformation had celebrated its victory in this region. In 1568 the first rules for worship services in this locality were published, which have been regarded as a legislative ground for the Silesian Evangelical Church of the Augsburg Confession up to the present time. With the end of the period of Counter-Reformation and the re-Catholization, Silesia witnessed another growth of Lutheranism after the issuing of the Edict of Toleration by Joseph II. In 1861, following the issuance of the so-called Protestant Edict, the first Lutheran congregations became part of the Evangelical Church of the Augsburg and Helvetic Confessions in Austria-Hungary, having formed the so-called Seniorate of Silesia. After the fall of the Austro-Hungarian monarchy and the foundation of an independent Czechoslovak Republic, a self-governing seniorate was founded in Czechoslovakia under the name of Evangelical Church of the Augsburg Confession in Eastern Silesia. Since 1948, the church has used its present name.

The character of the church is regional and national—it operates in the region of Silesia, and many of its members are of Polish nationality. That is also the reason why, apart from Czech, one of its official languages is Polish.

The church follows the Augsburg Confession of 1530 and the doctrine of Martin Luther. In its religious practice, it keeps the traditions of baptism and the Lord's Supper, while at the same time rejecting the notion of transubstantiation. However, it acknowledges the presence of Christ's body and blood in the Sacrament of the Altar during the moment of Holy Communion. Its basic forms of liturgy are two Sunday services, carried out in Czech and Polish. Organizationally, it follows a presbyterian structure. The synod is the highest legislative body.

The church numbers its members at approximately thirty thousand. It is a member of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES.

Address:

Silesian Evangelical Church of the Augsburg Confession/
Slezská církev evangelická augsburského vyznání
Na Nivách 7, 737 01
Český Těšín
Czech Republic

Dusan Lužný

Source:

Bachmann, E. Theodore, and Mercia Brenne Bachmann. Lutheran Churches in the World: A Handbook. Minneapolis, MN: Augsburg, 1989.

Simalungun Protestant Christian Church

The Simalungun Protestant Christian Church (Gereja Kristen Protestan Simalungun) was established in 1961, when the Simalungun-speaking congregations in the PROTESTANT CHRISTIAN BATAK CHURCH (HKBP) requested autonomy so they could develop a ministry especially for their people. Simalungun is a Batak dialect with some similarity to Sanskrit. The people are concentrated in rural Sumatra in a mountainous region near Lake Toba.

The church traces its own history to 1903. The first sermon was preached in Simalungun country by Theophilus Pasaribu, an evangelist from among the neighboring Toba people, who accompanied a RHENISH MISSION evangelist into the region. G. K. Simon, a missionary who settled in the region, translated portions of the New Testament into the Simalungun language. The mission began just as a feeling of nationalism had arisen in Sumatra, and the church was identified with the Dutch authorities. Growth was slow.

During World War II, the church was able to keep some of its work going because of their knowledge of the Japanese Christian Toyohiko Kagawa, with whom the Japanese occupation forces were familiar.

The HKBP had formed the Simalungun district in 1940, and in 1950 it established a school for the training of Simalungun pastors. The assignment of several of the pastors from the first graduating class away from the Simalungun area first prompted talk of separation of the district.

The new church continued the organization and beliefs of the parent body. It is led by a synod, but congregations have a high level of autonomy. An executive council administers the church's affairs between synod meetings. The church ordained the first female pastors in 1988, and it has a strong cadre of female evangelists.

The church reported 190,000 members in the late 1990s. It sponsors the Bethesda Hospital in Sardok Dolok and an educational center at Sondri Raya. It is a member of the LUTHERAN WORLD FEDERATION and the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES.

Address:

Simalungun Protestant Christian Church
P.O. Box 101
21142 Pematangsiantar
North Sumatra
Indonesia

Source:

Bachmann, E. Theodore, and Mercia Brenne Bachmann. Lutheran Churches in the World: A Handbook. Minneapolis, MN: Augsburg, 1989.

Singapore

Singapore, literally the city of the lion, received its name from a vision that came to a visiting prince many centuries ago. It is a large island separated by a narrow causeway from mainland Malaysia. It was originally inhabited by Malaysians, and much of its history has been tied to its northern neighbor. In 1824, Singapore and several adjacent islands were purchased by the British from the Sultan of Johore. The British began immediate improvements of the port and brought both Chinese and Indians in to work. Today, more than three-fourths of the population are Chinese, with significant numbers of Indians, Pakistanis, and Sri Lankans.

The British incorporated Singapore into a colony called the Straits Settlements. After World War II, the ports of Penang and Melaka, the other major parts of the colony, became part of the Malayan Union, and Singapore became a Crown colony. Internal autonomy was granted in 1949. It later became part of the Malayan Federation, but in 1965, under the leadership of Prime Minister Lee Quan Yew, it withdrew and became an independent country within the British Commonwealth. Yew continued to lead the country, now an economic enigma in Southeast Asia, until his retirement in 1991. He was succeeded by Goh Chok Tong.

Although Singapore has been accused of passing a set of laws restrictive of personal freedoms, and even of human rights abuses in the 1980s, the small nation with an extremely diverse religious community has been a model of religious freedom and interfaith harmony and cooperation. The Islamic community is based upon the original Malayan inhabitants, while the Chinese brought Buddhism and related Chinese religion. The British initiated the Christian community, and there are distinct smaller communities of Sikhs, Hindus, and Jews.

The Muslim community in Singapore is quite diverse. It consists of Malaysians, most of whom adhere to the SHAFIITE school, but with a component of Shi'as with roots in India and Pakistan and others from China and Indonesia. The government recognizes (in part) the validity of Islamic law (the Shari'ah), and the Majlis Ugama Islam (Islamic Religious Council) cooperates with the government in regulating the community according to Muslim rules.

Status of religions in Singapore, 2000-2050

Followers	2000			2025	2050
	total	%	rate
Chinese folk-religionists	1,521,000	42.7	1.35	1,458,000	1,044,000
Muslims	655,000	18.4	1.73	780,000	800,000
Buddhists	516,000	14.5	1.84	650,000	700,000
Christians	438,000	12.3	2.20	660,000	760,000
Roman Catholics	143,000	4.0	1.81	210,000	240,000
Protestants	127,000	3.6	2.38	200,000	230,000
Independents	94,000	2.6	2.42	150,000	175,000
Hindus	181,000	5.1	1.89	250,000	275,000
Nonreligious	164,000	4.6	2.75	250,000	300,000
Neoreligionists	62,800	1.8	1.80	78,000	85,000
Sikhs	15,600	0.4	1.12	19,500	21,000
Baha'is	5,500	0.2	2.22	9,000	11,000
Atheists	4,500	0.1	2.90	8,000	12,000
Shintoists	870	0.0	2.17	1,500	2,000
Ethnoreligionists	760	0.0	2.37	900	1,200
Jews	680	0.0	1.57	800	900
other religionists	1,100	0.0	4.47	2,000	3,000
Total population	3,567,000	100.0	1.69	4,168,000	4,015,000

Many of the Chinese in Singapore came from the Chinese community in Malaya, and as such they adhere to THERAVADA forms of Buddhism rather than the MAHAYANA forms that dominated in China. Also, Buddhist missionaries from Thailand have been active in the Chinese community, further strengthening the Theravada base. The primary Buddhist organizations are the Singapore Buddhist Federation and the Singapore Buddhist Sangha Organization. There is also an important regional center of the WORLD FELLOWSHIP OF BUDDHISTS headquartered at the Buddhist Union.

It is estimated that approximately 15 percent of Singaporeans are Buddhist; but another 40 percent are identified as Taoist and followers of Chinese religion, mixing Taoist, Buddhist, and Confucian elements. The boundaries between Buddhism and Taoism, in practice, are at best fuzzy.

Although most Buddhists are of Chinese heritage, a minority of Buddhists with roots in Sri Lanka are found in the Singapore Sinhala Buddhist Association, and both Thais and Tibetans (Kagyü Dharma) have opened centers.

Hinduism was brought to Singapore by Indians, primarily Saivites from Tamil, in southern India. They have built a series of temples in the city according to traditional style and standards. The entire community is invited to their major celebrations. Between 5 and 6 percent of Singaporeans are Hindus.

The Jewish community in Singapore traces its beginnings to around 1840. A synagogue, Maghain Aboth, was opened in 1878, but services had previously been held in a private home on a street known today as Synagogue Street. Most Jews were from Baghdad (Iraq), but the population became more diverse over the course of the twentieth century. There are now two synagogues serving several hundred Jewish families.

Christianity arrived on the Malayan Peninsula when Catholic priests set up a mission in the wake of the Portuguese conquest in 1511. The Diocese of Malacca (including Singapore and the portion of Malaysia immediately to the north) was established in 1557 and flourished for almost a century. However, the Dutch took over in 1641, and they suppressed Catholicism in favor of the Reformed Church (but made little attempt to convert the indigenous population). Following the British purchase of Singapore, a degree of religious freedom returned, and the ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH entered a growth phase, finding marked response among the Chinese. In 1841 a vicariate covering Singapore and Malaysia was reestablished, and in 1888 Singapore became the seat of a revived Diocese of Malacca. Since 1953, it has been an archdiocese. The Malaysian area was separated from the archdiocese in 1972. In the meantime Singapore became the residence of an apostolic visitor (a representative of the Vatican) charged with coordinating the church's work among the Chinese outside of the People's Republic of China.

In 1814 a representative of the LONDON MISSIONARY SOCIETY, a Presbyterian, opened work in education in Singapore but had little success in converting people. In 1846 the missionaries withdrew, but a small church continued under local leadership; soon other Presbyterians (including some Chinese immigrants) arrived. The Presbyterian work, long tied to work across Malaysia, separated from the Malaysian jurisdiction in 1975. The majority of Presbyterian churches in Singapore reorganized as the Presbyterian Church in Singapore and created both an English-speaking and a Chinese-speaking presbytery.

In 1826 the East India Company appointed an Anglican chaplain to serve the Europeans then residing in Singapore. The first Anglican church, St. Andrew's, became the base of missionary activity in 1856 with the arrival of missionaries from the SOCIETY FOR THE PROPAGATION OF THE GOSPEL IN FOREIGN PARTS from England. Work was pursued in several different languages, and by 1909 it had grown to the point that appointment of a bishop seemed appropriate. The diocese of Singapore was separated from Malaysia in 1970. The present Anglican Diocese of Singapore has charge of work in Thailand, Laos, Cambodia, Vietnam, and Indonesia. It is an integral part of the Council of Churches in East Asia, which includes several extra provincial Anglican dioceses and provides some of the structure of a province. Currently, the bishop of Singapore is also the chairman of the council.

The South India conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church (U.S.A.) expanded their work into Malaysia and Singapore in 1885, and in 1888 set Malaysia (including Singapore) apart as a separate mission. Work was pursued in four languages (English, Chinese, Tamil, and Malaysian) and spread through Malaysia, Burma, and present-day Indonesia. In 1936 two conferences were created, one for Chinese-speaking members and one for English-speaking. In 1968, three Methodist churches in the United States merged to found the UNITED METHODIST CHURCH, and the Singaporean Methodists became part of a new autonomous body, the Malaysia and Singapore Methodist Church. The work that had developed among the Tamil-speaking people was set apart as a Tamil Provisional Conference. In 1976 the Malaysian and Singaporean elements of the church divided, resulting in the present Methodist Church in Singapore, the largest Protestant body in Singapore.

Given its size, Singapore became home to an amazing array of other Christian churches over the course of the twentieth century. Many of these were brought to Singapore by and operate within an ethnic expatriate community. Members of the ARMENIAN APOSTOLIC CHURCH arrived as early as 1850. A variety of missionary-minded Protestant churches from England and the United States have opened churches, and a spectrum of Chinese indigenous churches have appeared. Among the latter, the TRUE JESUS CHURCH is among the most interesting and successful. Recently, the INTERNATIONAL CHURCHES OF CHRIST have made Singapore an important base of operations for its expansion throughout southeastern Asia. There are four Lutheran denominations represented in Singapore, all headquartered in neighboring countries (Malaysia and Indonesia).

The JEHOVAH'S WITNESSES, who established work in 1912, were stripped of their legal status by the independent Singaporean government because of their stand against universal military service. They no longer have kingdom halls in Singapore but continue to proselytize on the island from a base across the causeway in Malaysia. The first congregation of the CHURCH OF JESUS CHRIST OF LATTER-DAY SAINTS was opened in 1968. The Singapore Mission is one of eight missions in the Asia Area of the church.

Singapore, Buddhism in

Above and beyond the large Buddhist, Christian, Hindu, and Muslim communities, there is also a Sikh community consisting of Punjabis and a set of spiritual assemblies of the BAHÁ'Í FAITH. A number of the so-called New Religions from Japan, Taiwan, and the United States have attempted to start work, and groups such as the SOKA GAKKAI INTERNATIONAL (a Nichiren Buddhist lay movement) and the ANCIENT AND MYSTICAL ORDER ROSAE CRUCIS can be found. The large number of different groups in Singapore means that the great majority are limited to a small membership.

The government in Singapore encourages religious harmony and supports the activity of the Inter-Religious Organizations council. Also, the larger religious communities have established cooperative councils. Among Christians, the National Council of Churches of Singapore, which grew out of the former Council of Churches of Malaysia and Singapore, founded in 1948, is affiliated with the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES. Other denominations are members of the Chinese Church Union, the Singapore Council of Christian Churches, and the Association of Bible Believing Churches. The Evangelical Fellowship of Singapore is affiliated with the WORLD EVANGELICAL ALLIANCE, whose international headquarters is split between Singapore and the Philippines.

Sources:

- Abdullah, T., and S. Siddique, eds. Islam and Society in Southeast Asia. Singapore: Institute of Southeast Asian Studies, 1986.
- Kuo, Eddie C. Y. Religion in Singapore. Singapore: Census of Population, Monograph #2, 1990.
- Mialaret, J. Hinduism in Singapore: A Guide to the Hindu Temples of Singapore. Singapore: Donald Moore for Asia Pacific Press, 1969.
- Sng, B. E. K. Church and Society: Singapore Context. Singapore: Graduates Christian Fellowship, 1989.
- Tai, Kao Keng, Dorothy Kao, and Grace Tan. Singapore Church Directory. Singapore: Singapore Every Home Crusade, issued annually.

Singapore, Buddhism in

Singapore is made up of migrant populations that arrived during the early nineteenth and the twentieth centuries. When these migrants arrived, they brought along their cultures and reproduced them in a colonial environment. Chinese migrants brought along a syncretic Chinese religious belief system. Chinese religion is a composite mixture of Buddhism, Taoism, and Chinese folk beliefs. There was also a small group of Singhalese migrants during this period that brought THERAVADA BUDDHISM into Singapore.

With independence and the formation of the Singapore nation-state in 1965, the syncretic Chinese religion has undergone various changes. Along with a rise in education and social status, many Chinese have started to reassess their religious affiliation. This results in a separation of Buddhism from a syncretic Chinese religious belief system. The 1990 Singapore Census of Population showed that 31 percent of the total population of approximately 3.1 million (approximately 970,000) are Buddhists, and that Buddhist adherence is spread evenly among all age groups.

Today, Buddhism in Singapore can be divided into several types. MAHAYANA BUDDHISM includes elements of DAOISM and Chinese folk beliefs. It is commonly practiced by the majority of the Singapore Chinese. Theravada Buddhism is practiced primarily by the Singhalese, but there are also a sizable number of Chinese Theravada Buddhists. From the 1980s onward, both TIBETAN BUDDHISM and Japanese Buddhism (represented by the SOKA GAKKAI INTERNATIONAL) have made their presence known in Singapore. At the same time, Buddhism was also undergoing modernizing changes and secularization. A growing group of Buddhists who called themselves Reformist Buddhists emerged in the 1980s. Reformist Buddhism is a lay movement that does not recognize traditional boundaries and focuses on scriptural teachings and interpretation of the Buddhist texts. The Reformist Buddhists refer to their approach as the Buddhayana tradition.

There are more than one hundred Buddhist and Buddhist/Taoist temples in Singapore, with many temples practicing a combination of Buddhist and syncretic Chinese religion. The largest is the Phor Kark See Temple. Among the several Theravada temples, the popular Mangala Vihara Buddhist Temple is representative.

Lay Buddhists have created several organizations, such as the Cheng Beng Buddhist Temple, the Singapore Buddha Sasana Society, and the Singapore Buddha Yana Organisation. All these Buddhist temples and associations are members of the Singapore Buddhist Federation, an umbrella body that provides leadership for the Buddhist community in Singapore. The federation was formed in 1949. Since then, it has expanded on its activities to include not only the dissemination of Buddhist teaching but also education, social welfare, and charity work. Today there are six Buddhist clinics, one secondary and two primary schools, and old people's homes under its supervision. Apart from these activities, individual temples and lay organizations are also involved in active dissemination of Buddhist knowledge to the public, and in welfare and charity work. Some temples house a home for the aged, while others house a home for physically less able children.

The Buddhist Sangha is represented by a large majority of Mahayana monks and nuns, with a small number of Theravada and Tibetan monks. There are also a few monks who do not want to be associated with these traditional Buddhist labels. At present there are more than one hundred monks and fifty nuns in Singapore. The Sangha Council of Singapore governs their social and religious behavior.

Address:

Singapore Buddhist Federation
12 Ubi Ave 1
Singapore 408932

Khun Eng Kuah

Sources:

- Kuah, Khun Eng. "Maintaining Ethno-Religious Harmony in Singapore." Journal of Contemporary Asia 28, 1 (1998): 103–121.
- . "State and Religion: Buddhism and Nation-Building in Singapore." Pacific Viewpoint 32, 1 (1991): 24–42.
- Kuo, Eddie C. Y., and Tong Chee Kiong. Religion in Singapore. Singapore: Census of Population, 1990.
- Ling, T. "Religion." In Management of Success: The Moulding of Modern Singapore, edited by K. S. Sandhu and P. Wheatley. Singapore: Institute of Southeast Asian Studies, 1989.
- Wee, V. "Buddhism in Singapore." In Singapore: Society in Transition, edited by R. Hassan. Kuala Lumpur: Oxford University Press, 1976.

Slovak Evangelical Church of the Augsburg Confession in Yugoslavia

As its name implies, the Slovak Evangelical Church of the Augsburg Confession in Yugoslavia serves the Slovak minority residing in Yugoslavia, the great majority being residents of the province of Vojvodina in the northern part of the nation. Lutheranism spread into Slovakia (otherwise a Roman Catholic country) in the sixteenth century and was carried by Slovaks as they spread across Europe and to North America.

The church is headed by its bishop and has a synod as its highest legislative body. Close relations are kept with the EVANGELICAL CHURCH OF THE AUGSBURG CONFESSION IN THE SLOVAK REPUBLIC, and widespread use is made of the Slovakian Bible translation produced in Czechoslovakia in the 1970s.

In 1967 the Evangelical Church of the People's Republic of Serbia merged into the Slovak church. It was a small Hungarian-speaking church that had, prior to World War I, been part of the LUTHERAN CHURCH IN HUNGARY.

As the new century begins, the church reports approximately fifty thousand members. It is a member of the LUTHERAN WORLD FEDERATION and the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES.

Address:

Slovak Evangelical Church of the Augsburg
Confession in Yugoslavia
Karadziceva 2
21000 Novi Sad
Yugoslavia

Source:

Bauswein, Jean-Jacques, and Lukas Vischer, eds. The Reformed Family Worldwide: A Survey of Reformed Churches, Theological

Schools, and International Organizations. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans, 1999.

Slovakia

Slovakia was settled by Slavic tribes during the fifth and sixth centuries C.E. Their pagan religion belonged to the West-Slavic sphere, and it survived until the coming of Christianity in the ninth century. Also, at the beginning of the ninth century, an independent duchy spread through the territory of Slovakia with its center in Nitra. During the reign of the Earl Pribina, in the year 830 C.E., the first Christian church was constructed in Slovakia. At the time, Christian influence was conditioned by political loyalty to the German town of Salzburg, and this church was therefore consecrated by Adalram, the archbishop of Salzburg. Nevertheless, the Slavs in Nitra had as yet not converted to the new faith. Despite the work of missionaries from Ireland, Scotland, Germany, and Wallachia, neither inhabitants nor ruling elites converted to the Christian belief.

After the year 833, under the reign of the Earl Mojmir, the territory of Slovakia became part of the first state of the Western Slavs named Great Moravia. Aiming to oppose the political expansion of his powerful neighbor, Rastislav, the ruler of Great Moravia asked the pope to establish an independent church province. The pope refused, and therefore the following year, Rastislav, based primarily on a political rationale and the idea of independence, asked the Byzantine emperor Michal III to send Christian teachers. In 863 Michal III sent the missionaries Constantinus (826–869) and Methodius (d. 885) from Thessalonika to Great Moravia. The two mastered the local dialect of the Aegean Slavs and then played an important role in the process of Christianization, especially as related to church administration and the education of clerical elites. They also translated the most important sacral books into the Slavic language and introduced Slavic into the liturgy. When, in 867, Constantinus (or Cyril) and Methodius planned to visit Constantinople, they received an invitation from the pope, who, despite their alignment to Eastern Orthodoxy, wished to control their activities in Great Moravia. Pope Hadrian II

Status of religions in Slovakia, 2000–2050

Followers	2000			2025	2050
	total	%	rate
Christians	4,610,000	85.6	0.47	4,771,000	4,382,000
Roman Catholics	3,660,000	67.9	0.11	3,700,000	3,356,000
Protestants	600,000	11.1	0.20	720,000	720,000
Independents	23,000	0.4	-0.83	23,000	22,000
Nonreligious	573,000	10.6	-1.04	496,000	395,000
Atheists	198,000	3.7	-0.89	120,000	50,000
Jews	4,800	0.1	0.42	5,000	5,200
Baha'is	670	0.0	5.25	1,000	2,000
Muslims	520	0.0	0.33	700	1,000
Total population	5,387,000	100.0	0.25	5,393,000	4,836,000

subsequently gave the missionaries an audience, sanctified the holy books in the Slavic language, and ordained the first Slavic clerics.

For the first time in Europe, the pope agreed to a liturgy in a national language other than Greek or Latin. Unfortunately, Constantinus died in Rome; thus Methodius returned to the territory of Great Moravia as the first Slavic archbishop. He brought with him a copy of the papal bull Gloria in altissimis Deo, which confirmed the use of Slavic liturgy. Soon after his establishment in Great Moravia, Methodius again traveled to Rome in the name of the Earl Kocel. While there he received the resolution establishing the independent church province, the Pannonian see (archprovince), and was named the official papal representative (legatus). The position of Methodius as archbishop and the use of the Slavic liturgy was further reconfirmed by the pope in 880 C.E. in the bull Industriae tuae, issued on the occasion of Methodius's attestation of the Nicene Creed and of Roman orthodoxy. This act eventually led to the end of the use of the Slavic liturgy in the Byzantine Rite in Great Moravia. The romanization of the Slavic church was intensified by the actions of the German bishop Viching in Nitra, the main enemy of Methodius. After Methodius's death in 885, Viching took the initiative in disbanding his school and dislodging all its pupils. Subsequently, Slovakia naturalized the German clerical hierarchy.

After the battle at Bratislava in 907, which started the period of destruction of Great Moravia by the Magyars, the territory was in total chaos. By the end of the tenth century, the eastern part of Great Moravia (now the majority of the territory of Slovakia) became a duchy of the Hungarian kingdom, while the western part was transformed into the Czech state. The Hungarian earl, Gejza I, accepted Christianity in 997 under the ministrations of Bishop Vojtech of Prague. The Hungarian (Magyar) state organized the political and church administration at Slovakia after the fall of Great Moravia. It continued the orientation toward Western (or Catholic) Christianity, but the process of Christianization of the Hungarian nomads as well as the native Slavic inhabitants proceeded slowly. In the centuries of political chaos, many of the Slavs in the south had been assimilated by the Hungarians, while in the north they sought the security of inaccessible places (such as mountains). Under the new political order, the see of Nitra was reestablished by the year 1115 C.E. In addition, a new see was created in Jager, though the head of the hierarchy of the Hungarian state was the archbishop in Östzergom.

Through the Middle Ages, the territory of Slovakia was fixed on Western Roman Catholicism. Many monasteries were established, and the number of holy orders operating in Slovakia increased. Catholicism became part of the national culture until the time of the Protestant Reformation. In the second half of the sixteenth century, Reformed and Lutheran doctrines were disseminated through Slovakia, and by the beginning of the seventeenth century some 90 percent of the inhabitants of Slovakia had become Protestants. This fact explains why the subsequent re-Catholicization at the instigation of the Habsburg rulers of Hungary in the seventeenth century was so difficult. JESUITS in Trnava and Bratislava proved very effective. It was the period of repression of local nobility, of confiscations of the properties of Protestant churches, and forced mass conversions to Catholicism throughout the countryside. As a result, Protestantism survived only among the Slovak middle class and in a small number of villages. The development of Slovak culture up to the beginning of the twentieth century followed two independent lines, Catholic and Protestant. Only in 1781, as a result of the tolerant policies of Emperor Joseph II, were Protestants granted equal rights with the Catholic majority. Paradoxically, it was from the Protestant, rather than the Catholic, circles that the majority of dominant personalities of Slovak culture of the nineteenth century arose, including, for example, Ludovít Štúr, the creator of the Slovak literary language. Through the upheavals of the modern world, somehow or other, the majority confession in Slovakia remained Roman Catholicism. As of 1991, around 60 percent of the citizens belonged to the ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH. Only 8 percent of Slovaks belong to one of the Protestant churches, the largest being the EVANGELICAL CHURCH OF THE AUGSBURG CONFESSION IN THE SLOVAK REPUBLIC, whose adherents include approximately 6 percent of the population. From the other confessions in Slovakia, only two groups have as much as 1 percent of the population: the GREEK CATHOLIC CHURCH (3 percent) and the REFORMED CHRISTIAN CHURCH IN SLOVAKIA (Calvinist) with 1.5 percent. Among the other churches, the Orthodox Church, with 0.5 percent, also plays an important role in the life of Slovakia. In the year 1977 the pope established the independent province of the Slovak Catholic Church through his bull Qui divino. In spite of it, during the whole atheistic regime (1948–1989), Christianity in Slovakia (Catholic, Protestant, or other) suffered repression. Church life was formally tolerated by the state, but in fact church members were discriminated against in education and social status. Activists were arrested, and, unlike the situation in other communistic regimes, played an important role in the Catholic Church. From its circles came the core of dissidents who organized the resistance and the so-called Tender Revolution (1989) in the Slovakian part of the former Czechoslovakia. After the fall of Czechoslovakia and the formation of independent Slovakia in 1993, Catholicism's influence on the public and cultural life of the country dramatically increased.

Milan Kováč

Sources:

Dekan, Ján. Moravia Magna. Bratislava: Tatran, 1980.

Poláčik, Stefan, ed. Atlas der Religionen, Religiöser Gemeinschaften und Religiosität in der Slowakei. Bratislava: Chronos, 2000.

Vanco, Martin. "The Beginning of the Great Moravian Empire: Christianization." In Medieval Rotundas in Slovakia, edited by Martin Vance. Bratislava: Chronos, 2000.

teenth century, except for a brief period during the Napoleonic era.

During the late nineteenth century, Slovenians began to identify with the pan-Slavic movement but had to settle for the union of the Slavic regions of the Austro-Hungarian Empire into an autonomous political area within the empire in 1917. After World War I and the fall of the empire, the region was assigned to Austria. Following World War II, Slovenia became one of the six republics within the Federation of Yugoslavia. It prospered as one of the country's most industrialized area.

In 1990 a move to separate from Yugoslavia became noticeable, and the following year Slovenia declared its independence. That independence was recognized by the countries of Western Europe, and, fortunately, Slovenia was able to stay out of the war in the 1990s that ravaged its former comrades in the other Yugoslavian republics.

The ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH established itself very early among the Slovenian people, and the work of native priests and monks (who constituted the great majority of the Slovenian intelligentsia during the Middle Ages) is credited with the southern Slovenes' retaining their identity as a people. It also separated them from the Orthodox-dominated regions farther south and the Croatian Catholics, who had been heavily influenced by Italian leadership. The church was supported by the Austrian Catholic hierarchy through Slovenia's many centuries under Austrian control, but it suffered under the secularization that occurred in the postwar period (1945–1991). Today the church is led by the archbishop of Ljubljana and the Slovenia Episcopal Conference. They command the loyalty of the majority of the two million citizens.

Protestants came into Slovenia as the Reformation spread through German lands in the sixteenth century. The Lutheran church suffered losses during the Counter-Reformation, and many Lutherans found refuge in the Prekmuije region, where the church is still strong. It was able to recover somewhat during the period of religious tolerance that began with Joseph II. Lutherans were incorporated into the Hungarian Lutheran Church but emerged as the Evangelical Christian Church in Slovenia after World War II. Today, as the Evangelical Church of the

Slovenia

The Slovenes, a southern Slavic people, settled in what is now the Republic of Slovenia in the seventh century C.E. However, in 743 the area was conquered by the Bavarians, and the Slovenes began a long period of subjugation to various Germanic powers. The Slavs who lived north of the Drava River were Germanized, but those to the south were able to retain their identity as Slovenians. Beginning in the thirteenth century, Austria became the dominant influence in the region. Austrian rule continued throughout the nine-

Status of religions in Slovenia, 2000–2050

Followers	2000			2025	2050
	total	%	rate
Christians	1,829,000	92.1	0.47	1,706,000	1,409,000
Roman Catholics	1,659,000	83.6	0.38	1,520,000	1,250,000
Protestants	32,000	1.6	-0.15	35,000	38,000
Independents	31,000	1.6	0.67	40,000	45,000
Nonreligious	102,000	5.2	-0.90	79,400	59,100
Atheists	52,000	2.6	-1.29	30,000	15,000
Muslims	1,400	0.1	0.58	2,000	2,500
Baha'is	300	0.0	11.50	600	900
Jews	120	0.0	1.75	150	180
Total population	1,986,000	100.0	0.35	1,818,000	1,487,000

Augsburg Confession in Slovenia, it is the largest Protestant body in Slovenia and a member of the LUTHERAN WORLD FEDERATION and the European Council of Churches, though it has not joined the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES. The large Reformed presence in Hungary spilled over into Slovenia, and, early in the twentieth century, some eight hundred Reformed church members, mostly of Hungarian ethnicity, formed three congregations in Slovenia. They became independent in 1921 as the Reformed Church in Yugoslavia. It developed a relationship with the Reformed Christian Church in Yugoslavia. In 1993 the Reformed Christian Church in Slovenia was established, and the Reformed Church of Hungary accepted responsibility for providing pastoral oversight. It currently has a close working relationship with the Slovenian Lutheran Church. Protestants in Slovenia cooperate in the Council of Christian Churches in Slovenia.

The SEVENTH-DAY ADVENTIST CHURCH entered the region in 1909, and in 1925 it organized the Croatian-Slovenian Conference (reorganized in 1992). The work is headquartered in Zagreb, Croatia. Baptists came into the area in the person of Martin Hiastan, an agent of the British and Foreign Bible Society, in the years prior to World War I. His first convert, Jurij Carter, began holding meetings in his home in 1923. The little church became associated with the Baptist church in Zagreb. It was not until 1938 that there was enough Baptist strength for a Slovenian conference to be organized.

The Italians who occupied Slovenia during World War II closed the Baptist churches and imprisoned some of the Baptist leadership. Following the breakup of Yugoslavia, the four surviving Baptist churches formed the Union of Baptist Churches in Slovenia.

The CHURCH OF JESUS CHRIST OF LATTER-DAY SAINTS had initiated work in Slovenia in 1899 through the efforts of Mischa Markow, a Hungarian who had previously settled in Salt Lake City, Utah. He was banished after only a month of work. His effort was not revived until the 1970s, when the LDS were able to establish themselves as a legal entity in Yugoslavia. The first meetings were held in Ljubljana. In 1993 the first full-time elder from Slovenia arrived in Salt Lake City for training. JEHOVAH'S WITNESSES came into Yugoslavia in 1925 and continued to work quietly in the decades after World War II, even though officially banned. They emerged quickly after the breakup of Yugoslavia and can now be found in various locations across Slovenia.

Various religions have come to Slovenia since its independence in 1991. They include the UNIFICATION MOVEMENT, SAHAJA YOGA, and the INTERNATIONAL SOCIETY FOR KRISHNA CONSCIOUSNESS. Several esoteric groups such as the THEOSOPHICAL SOCIETY and the ORDO TEMPLI ORIENTIS (O.T.O.) had been able to function quietly even earlier. The small Jewish community in Slovenia was ravaged first by the Holocaust and then by the movement of members to Israel. Fewer than two hundred remain today.

Sources:

- Flere, S. "Denominational Affiliation in Yugoslavia: 1930–1989." East European Quarterly 25 (June 1991): 145–165.
- Frid, Z., ed. Religions in Yugoslavia: Historical Survey, Legal Status, Church in Socialism, Ecumenism, Dialogue between Marxists and Christians, etc. Zagreb: Binoza, 1971.
- Ramet, R. "Religion and Nationality in Yugoslavia." In Religion and Nationalism in Soviet and East European Politics, edited by R. Ramet. Durham, NC: Duke University Press, 1989.

Smarta Tradition (Hinduism)

The Smarta tradition is a living Hindu tradition that started in the classical age of Hinduism. This tradition was derived from Puranic traditional practices. The Smartas combined the concept of varnashramadharma (social organization around castes) with puja (worship) to a select few major deities. The Smartas get their name from the sacred Smṛiti texts. This class of texts are “things that are remembered,” or secret oral teachings passed down from generation to generation. Many teachings are still secrets disclosed only among devout Smartas. As the Smartas became fewer in number, the teachings were written down for the sake of future preservation. Smarta teaches its adherents that they are the true root of Hinduism.

The Smartas revere and worship five principal deities. These are Vishnu (Hindu preserver god), Siva (Hindu destroyer god), Surya (sun god), Ganesha (remover of obstacles), and Durga (warrior goddess). Smarta puja consists of rites from the Vedas (mainly the Rig Veda) and the repetition of many mantras (secret meditative incantations). Smarta worship is more of a solemn duty than a devotional part of life. Communion with the divine or eternal salvation is rarely the focal point or even an important aspect in Smarta worship rituals.

The Smartas consider themselves a Hindu subgroup, and the predominant Smarta population consists of rich Indians. Today, wealthy Hindus tend to practice Smarta-style Hinduism rather than Vaishnava or Saivite styles.

Kumar Jairamdas

Sources:

- Basham, A. L. The Origins and Development of Classical Hinduism. New York: Oxford University Press, 1989.
 Eck, Diana. Darsan: Seeing the Divine Image in India. 3d ed. New York: Columbia University Press, 1998.

Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts

The Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts (SPG) is the oldest of the two Anglican missionary organizations that contributed substantially to the spread of the CHURCH OF ENGLAND internationally in the nineteenth century and led to the formation of numerous Anglican churches that currently exist around the globe. The society, formed in 1701, originated from a survey of conditions among the settlers in the British American colonies by Thomas Bray. Early discussions resulted in two goals for the new society: the serving of the religious needs of English settlers far from Britain (primarily in North America and the Caribbean), and the conversion of the native populations in British colonies.

Although established as an independent body with private funds, it quickly bound itself to the established church, beginning with its royal charter and the convening of its first meeting at Lambeth Palace under the chairmanship of Archbishop Tenison. Work was confined to North America and the Caribbean during its first century, among the first people commissioned being a teacher for African American children in New York City. However, as the British Empire expanded during the nineteenth century, the SPG followed. The independence of the American colonies freed resources to other parts of the world.

At the beginning of the nineteenth century, the SPG was joined by a second Anglican missionary organization, the CHURCH MISSIONARY SOCIETY. The latter, a product of the Evangelical Awakening in England in the previous century, was decidedly Low Church in its sympathies, while the SPG had been very much identified with the High-Church wing of Anglicanism.

Work began in India in 1818, and Africa and the Middle East soon followed. It extended its concern to Malaysia in the middle of the century, and later in the century opened missions in Japan and Korea.

In the twentieth century, the SPG adjusted to the maturing of the missions into the new independent Anglican churches that now constitute the worldwide ANGLICAN COMMUNION. In many areas they continued to support missionary personnel, especially among those churches still struggling for financial independence. However, the change in the missionary thrust in the years after World War II also cost the SPG popular support, and its income suffered accordingly. In 1965 and 1968, the SPG merged with two other organizations, the Universities' Mission in Central Africa and the Cambridge Mission to Delhi, to produce a new organization, the United Society for the Propagation of the Gospel. The United Society continues to support personnel in more than twenty countries and works with more than fifty churches worldwide.

Address:

United Society for the Propagation of the Gospel
 Partnership House
 156 Waterloo Rd.
 London SE1 8XA
 United Kingdom
<http://www.uspg.org.uk/>

Source:

Dewey, M. The Messengers: A Concise History of the United Society for the Propagation of the Gospel. London: Mowbray, 1975.

Society of Saint Pius X

See Fraternity/Society of Saint Pius X

Sōka Gakkai International

Sōka Gakkai was founded in Japan in 1930 by an educator, Tsunesaburo Makiguchi (1871–1944), who organized the Sōka Kyoiku Gakkai (Value Creation Education Society) in an attempt to give the Japanese educational system a more humanist focus. Shortly before Japan's entry into World War II, Makiguchi and his protégé, Josei Toda (1900–1958), converted to NICHIREN SHOSHU Buddhism—a sect that claims to teach the “true Buddhism” as taught by Nichiren (1222–1282 C.E.). After the war, Sōka Gakkai was reorganized as a lay movement of Nichiren Shōshū.

Nichiren was a thirteenth-century monk who believed that all individuals contain within themselves the potential for enlightenment and that this potential can be unlocked by exclusive devotion to the Lotus Sutra. The Lotus Sutra is understood to be the most perfect expression of the Buddha's wisdom. By chanting the title of the Lotus Sutra, Nam-Myoho-Renge-Kyo, one forms a connection with the ultimate reality that pervades the universe—the karmic law of cause and effect. In common with other followers of Nichiren, Sōka Gakkai members chant this phrase, along with portions of the Lotus Sutra and prayers for world peace (collectively called Gongyo), in front of a copy of the Gohonzon, a mandala originally inscribed by Nichiren that features the title of the Lotus Sutra surrounded by characters representing the “ten realms” of consciousness.

The ten realms refer to ten basic life conditions, which everyone possesses and experiences—Hell, Hunger, Animality, and Belligerence, through Tranquility, Rapture, Learning, and Realization, to Bodhisattva, and ultimately Buddhahood or enlightenment. These “life conditions” are not understood as external circumstances imposed upon the individual but rather as modes of being. Thus, one's external circumstances are but a reflection of one's inner life condition, and by changing one's way of being in the world, one can improve the external circumstances of one's life.

Sōka Gakkai, furthermore, promotes the belief that individual enlightenment is the first step toward world peace. As individuals become enlightened, they can work together to raise awareness of issues of intercultural understanding and tolerance, issues of the environment, and the threat of military technology. As an organization, therefore, Sōka Gakkai sponsors a variety of educational, cultural, and political projects and participates in the United Nations as a nongovernmental organization. The organization, for instance, has founded a major university as well as primary and secondary schools in Japan. It also sponsors art museums, a concert association, retreat centers, and research associations, both in Japan and in Europe and America. Every year members submit a peace proposal to the United Nations on behalf of President Ikeda.

Daisaku Ikeda (b. 1928), the Sōka Gakkai's charismatic third president, led the international growth of the movement. Today, Sōka Gakkai International claims millions of members in about a hundred countries, with significant representations in the United States, Brazil, Britain, and Italy.

History: Thwarted in their attempt to reform the Japanese educational system, Makiguchi and Toda were imprisoned on charges of lese majesty for their refusal to cooperate with the Religious Organizations Act (1940), which created a three-religion establishment, centered on State Shinto and designed to promote patriotism and loyalty to the increasingly militarist regime.

Following Makiguchi's death in prison and the end of World War II, Toda, the movement's second president, reorganized Sōka Gakkai as a lay association of Nichiren Shōshū. In the chaotic aftermath of the war, Sōka Gakkai grew rapidly, mostly among the displaced residents of urban environments. However, Toda's zeal, and the zeal of new converts, attracted public suspicion. New converts sometimes destroyed ancestral altars as an expression of exclusive devotion to their new religion; indeed, they may have been encouraged to do so by the movement's leadership. The practice of shakubuku, an aggressive and argumentative means of recruitment, also set the movement at odds with established religions and led to accusations that Sōka Gakkai brainwashed its members. Massive rallies and parades sponsored by Sōka Gakkai reminded onlookers of the demonstrations of fascist regimes during World War II. Together, these features gave Sōka Gakkai in Japan the image of a dangerous “cult,” whose leaders had ulterior and untoward motives.

Although Ikeda, the third president, and his successor, Einosuke Akiya, have gone to great lengths to improve the movement's public image, suspicion remains. Sōka Gakkai's political involvement through the organ of the Komeito, a political party founded by the Sōka Gakkai, and the near godlike reverence that members have for President Ikeda have tended to perpetuate public distrust. Although it has been subject to a generalized suspicion toward Eastern religious movements in the United States, Europe, and South America, the movement's history outside of Japan has been tranquil by comparison to its Japanese history.

The Schism of 1991: For more than fifty years, Sōka Gakkai existed as a lay movement affiliated with the Nichiren Shōshū sect. But latent tensions between the Sōka Gakkai and the Nichiren Shōshū leadership came to a head in 1990, when the high priest accused Daisaku Ikeda, who remains the movement's primary spiritual figurehead, of slandering Buddhism by asserting that the priests and laity are equal before the Gohonzon. Although a formal apology was issued by the Sōka Gakkai leadership, and apparently accepted by the priests, tensions between Sōka Gakkai leaders and the priests continued to grow. When the priests raised obligatory fees for funerary and other ritual services, Sōka Gakkai leaders objected that the priests had become greedy and authoritarian. In reply, the priests accused Sōka Gakkai leaders, namely Ikeda, of slandering the priesthood. In November 1991, the high priest of Nichiren Shōshū ordered the Sōka Gakkai to disband and issued a writ of excommunication for all members who remained affiliated with the Sōka Gakkai.

Ironically, in many countries Sōka Gakkai seems to have benefited greatly from that split. The schism served to enhance the autonomy of the various national organizations, making it easier for these organizations to adapt to the circumstances in their immediate environments. To fill the gap left by the priests, Sōka Gakkai developed roles for voluntary “ministers of ceremony,” who now preside over weddings, funerals, and other ritual services.

Although SGI’s growth worldwide slowed during the 1990s, it remains steady. The organization thus appears to have successfully weathered its developmental challenges, and its future appears secure. Sōka Gakkai International has regional and national offices serving the movement worldwide, and an extensive Sōka Gakkai Internet presence.

Address:

Sōka Gakkai International Headquarters
Office of Public Relations
15–3 Samon-cho
Shinjuku-ku, Tokyo 160–0017
Japan
<http://www.sgi.org>

Phillip E. Hammond and David Wayne Machacek

Sources:

- Eppsteiner, Robert. The Soka Gakkai International: Religious Roots, Early History, and Contemporary Development. Cambridge, MA: Sōka Gakkai International, 1997.
- Hammond, Phillip, and David Machacek. Soka Gakkai in America: Accommodation and Conversion. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1999.
- Machacek, David, and Brian Wilson, eds. Global Citizens: The Soka Gakkai Buddhist Movement in the World. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2000.
- Metraux, Daniel A. The Lotus and the Maple Leaf. Lanham, MD: University Press of America, 1996.
- Wilson, Brian, and Karel Dobbelaere. A Time to Chant: The Soka Gakkai Buddhists in Britain. Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1994.

Solar Temple, Order of the

This defunct movement was founded by a French citizen, Jo Di Mambro (1924–1994). Di Mambro had previously been a member of the ANCIENT AND MYSTICAL ORDER ROSAE CRUCIS (AMORC) from 1956 to the late 1960s. During that period, he apparently also developed his first contacts with French groups interested in launching a Templar “resurgence.” In 1973, Di Mambro became president of a Center of the Preparation of the New Age, and in 1976 he organized a community called the Pyramid. In 1978 he settled with his followers in Geneva, where he created the Golden Way Foundation. This foundation developed cultural activities attracting outsiders, too, but at the same time it sheltered esoteric rites of Rosicrucian and Templar inspiration for those intensely engaged in the work. A community always remained the core of the various groups led by Di Mambro.

In the early 1980s, a Belgian homeopathic physician, Luc Jouret (1947–1994), joined the group and, being a gifted speaker, became its main propagandist. He soon became well known in the New Age and esoteric circuit in French-speaking countries. Cultural clubs named Archedia were launched and functioned as an exoteric counterpart to the esoteric order, then called the International Order of Chivalry, Solar Tradition. However, while hundreds of people sometimes attended Jouret’s lectures, the membership of the order remained more modest, apparently peaking at around five hundred members. People forming the core community did not necessarily belong to the order. The name “the Order of the Solar Temple” is being used here in a generic way, since the movements became famous under that name; there were, however, several simultaneous or successive groups with different names, and reorganizations were frequent.

The ideological sources of the movement were eclectic and reflected many of the ideas common in the occult subculture. However, its message put an unusual emphasis upon imminent apocalyptic turmoils, as a prelude to the passage to new conditions for those people who would manage to survive and become the seeds of the new Solar Race: In case there would not be a sufficient number of people answering the call of the Temple for staving off global disaster, at least there would be “enough survivors to carry the species toward the evolutionary blueprint intended for mankind.” During the 1980s, there was a clear survivalist orientation.

For a number of reasons, including internal dissent, survivalism on this planet was abandoned by Di Mambro and a core group around him from the early 1990s; the mood turned increasingly pessimistic. The leaders of the Solar Temple decided that the only way was a “transit” toward another world. That was accomplished in October 1994. Some left willingly, but a number of members apparently did not realize that their “transit” involved being killed; some others, considered traitors, were assassinated, including a couple and their baby child savagely slaughtered in Québec. Most of the other fifty victims died in Switzerland, including the leaders. In December 1995, sixteen members lost their lives in France, and, in March 1997, five people in Québec.

Although some people continue to believe in some of its doctrines, the Solar Temple no longer exists as a group. But the impact of the repeated “transits” has created an after-shock extending well beyond the Solar Temple: For instance, it has contributed to the radicalization of the campaign against “cults” by authorities in countries such as France.

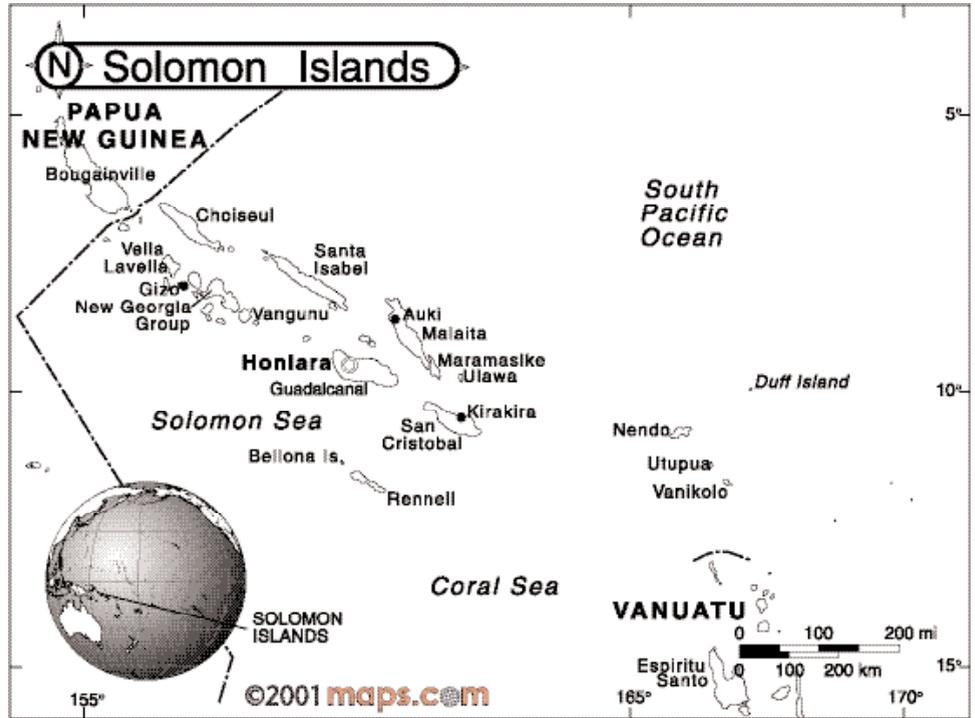

Jean-François Mayer

Sources:

Delaforge, Gaetan. The Templar Tradition in the Age of Aquarius. Putney, VT: Threshold, 1987.

Hall, John R., and Philip D. Schuyler. "The Mystical Apocalypse of the Solar Temple." In Apocalypse Observed: Religious Movements and Violence in North America, Europe, and Japan, edited by John R. Hall, pp. 111–148. London: Routledge, 2000.

Mayer, Jean-François. "Our Terrestrial Journey Is Coming to an End": The Last Voyage of the Solar Temple." Nova Religio: The Journal of Alternative and Emergent Religions 2, 2 (1999): 172–196. Also posted at <http://www.novareligio.com/mayer.html>.

Solomon Islands

The Solomon Islands are a set of islands northwest of Australia in the South Pacific, the most famous of which is Guadalcanal. They have been inhabited by Melanesians for some four thousand years. Europeans first discovered the islands in 1567, when the Spaniard Alvaro de Mendenā landed. Beginning in the eighteenth century, slavers raided the islands and transported captured islanders to Fiji and Australia to work the sugar plantations.

Only after World War I did England move to establish a colony over the Solomons. The Japanese invaded and held the islands until recaptured by Allied forces. Following World War II, the archipelago was divided into two parts. The western half was later annexed to Papua New Guinea. The latter remained a British colony until granted independence in 1978. Most of the islands' residents are Melanesians, but minorities from Europe, China, and Polynesia settled there over the course of the last century.

Traditional religion has survived in the Solomons. The dominant faith at the time the first Christian missionaries arrived was a polytheistic system that recognized a somewhat remote supreme being who went under different names on the different islands. The more operative concept, made famous by anthropological description, is mana, the impersonal power that pervades the cosmos at every level. Mana is a comprehensive concept that explains a variety of phenomena, and it can be used by religious practitioners to heal and work magic. Following long-term contact with Eu-

Status of religions in the Solomon Islands, 2000-2050

Followers	2000			2025	2050
	total	%	rate
Christians	425,000	95.7	3.37	790,000	1,099,000
Anglicans	170,000	38.2	3.96	323,000	473,000
Protestants	159,000	35.8	3.66	275,000	385,000
Roman Catholics	48,000	10.8	1.56	90,000	130,000
Ethnoreligionists	13,700	3.1	0.86	15,300	12,000
Baha'is	1,900	0.4	2.76	4,000	6,000
Buddhists	1,400	0.3	2.96	2,500	3,600
Nonreligious	1,300	0.3	6.65	4,000	7,000
Muslims	580	0.1	2.75	1,000	1,600
Atheists	150	0.0	4.21	400	1,000
Total population	444,000	100.0	3.29	817,000	1,130,000

ropeans, a number of new variations of the traditional religion appeared. The best known of these new traditional religions were the "cargo cults" based on the airplanes that brought unfamiliar objects to the islands during and after World War II.

The ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH arrived in the Solomons when Marist priests opened a mission in 1845. It was later abandoned, but by that time the Anglican church in New Zealand had launched a mission to Melanesians. In 1861, John C. Patterson, designated the missionary bishop for Melanesia, began a decade of leadership ended by his untimely death at the hands of residents of the Santa Cruz Islands. Patterson was succeeded by John Selwyn, who continued Patterson's policy of gathering the most talented among the converts and sending them to New Zealand for formal training. The Anglican work on the Solomons grew as a missionary diocese in the Province of New Zealand. In 1970 it was set apart as the CHURCH IN THE PROVINCE OF MELANESIA. It is the largest church in the islands, including some 30 percent of the 320,000 citizens.

Roman Catholics soon reestablished work, and by 1897 a prefecture was erected that grew into a vicariate in 1912. In 1916 the islands were divided into two dioceses, one for the western Solomons and one for the southern islands, the latter based on Guadalcanal at the capital, Honiara. Approximately 10 percent of the population are professed Catholics.

Methodists from Australia came to the Solomons in 1902 and brought native workers from Samoa and Fiji with them. In 1922 the New Zealand Church assumed responsibility for what had grown into a district, but the church was largely destroyed by the Japanese; it was rebuilt, however, in the years immediately after hostilities ended. In 1968 the Methodist Church of the Solomons participated in a merger with the Congregationalists on New Guinea to form the United Church in Papua, New Guinea and the Solomon Islands, now divided into the UNITED CHURCH IN PAPUA NEW GUINEA and UNITED CHURCH OF THE SOLOMON ISLANDS, separately.

In 1904 the South Seas Evangelical mission, a faith mission based in Australia, grew out of the older Queensland Kanaka Mission. Its first missionary was Florence S. H. Young, but she was followed by thirteen members of the family of Dr. Northcote Young, who opened work on Guadalcanal, Malaita, and Makira. Their work grew into the South Sea Evangelical Church, which became an independent body in 1963. By 1970 it had 285 congregations affiliated with it.

The older mission churches, including the Roman Catholic Church, formed the ecumenical Solomon Islands Christian Association in 1967. It includes the several churches that are also members of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES, the Anglican, and the United churches. The South Seas Island Church has identified with the WORLD EVANGELICAL ALLIANCE and participates in the Evangelical Alliance of Papua New Guinea and the Solomon Islands.

The Seventh-day Adventist Church contributed to the expanding array of churches in the Solomons in 1914. Its very successful mission is now a part of the Western Pacific Union Mission that includes Vanuatu and New Caledonia. Several indigenous churches have arisen over the years, including the Remnant Church and the Christian Fellowship Church. The latter, the largest of such independent churches, was founded in 1959 by Silas Eto in a schism of the METHODIST CHURCH on the island of New Georgia.

The various world religions have only begun to discover the South Sea Islands in general and the Solomon Islands in particular. By the 1970s there were small groups of Buddhists, Hindus, and Baha'is.

Sources:

Forman, Charles H. The Island Churches of the South Pacific: Emergence in the Twentieth Century. Maryknoll, NY: Orbis, 1982.

Laracy, H. Marist and Melanesians: A History of Catholic Missions in the Solomon Islands. Canberra: Australian National University Press, 1976.

Naban, J. The History of the Work of the Anglican Church in the Solomon Islands. Suva, Fiji: Pacific Theological Seminary, 1976.

Tippett, A. R. Solomon Islands Christianity: A Study in Growth and Obstruction. New York: Friendship, 1967.

Worsley, Peter. The Trumpet Shall Sound: A Study of Cargo Cults in Melanesia. New York: Schocken, 1968.

Somalia

The history of Somalia was given a new and determinative direction by the entrance of Islam in the eighth century. The land had been home to several ethnic groups for a number of centuries, but they were tied together by a common language and culture. They had been producers of incense and had developed trade with the ancient Egyptians and the Roman Empire. Their ancient religion, however, was gradually replaced by Islam, and the people had become thoroughly Islamized by the thirteenth century.

Following their conversion to Islam, the Somalis founded a new political entity, the state of Ifat. It was able to sever its subservient relationship to Ethiopia, transformed into the sultanate of Adala, and grew prosperous as it began to trade with the Islamic states along the eastern coast of Africa. Adala was brought down, however, in 1541 when Portugal, which had developed an alliance with Ethiopia, attacked and laid waste to Somalia's coastal cities. The Portuguese presence in the area prevented the sultanate's recovery, and Adala was divided into a set of smaller sultanates. By the time the Portuguese were driven from the area in the seventeenth century, the Ottoman Empire had moved into the region and established its hegemony over northern Somalia while the sultanates in the south sought a relationship with the sultan in Zanzibar.

Europeans reappeared in the area in the nineteenth century, and French, British, and Italian forces established their countries' presence. The British and Italian area became independent in 1960 and merged to form the present state of Somalia. The French territory is now the country of Djibouti.

Status of religions in Somalia, 2000-2050

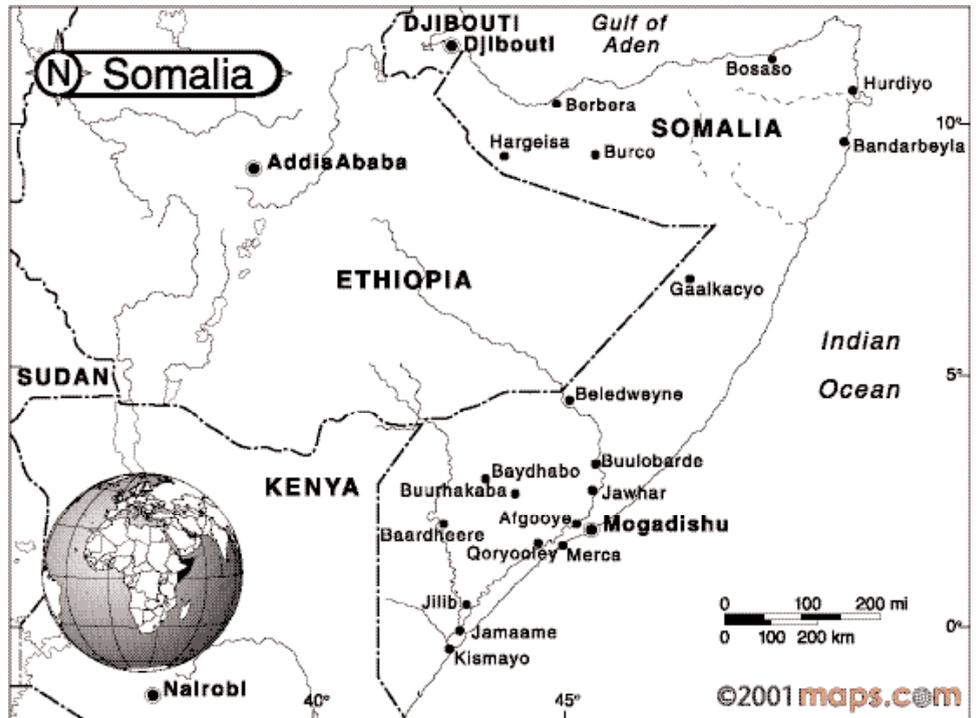

Followers	2000			2025	2050
	total	%	rate
Muslims	7,144,000	98.3	2.82	16,075,000	22,893,000
Christians	102,000	1.4	-0.76	120,000	127,000
Orthodox	91,800	1.3	-0.86	100,000	100,000
Independents	5,500	0.1	2.03	14,000	20,000
Protestants	1,100	0.0	0.96	2,000	3,000
Ethnoreligionists	9,400	0.1	1.37	12,000	13,000
Nonreligious	3,300	0.1	1.45	7,000	10,000
Hindus	2,900	0.0	1.93	6,000	10,000
Baha'is	1,800	0.0	5.27	5,000	8,500
Atheists	1,100	0.0	-0.01	2,400	4,600
Total population	7,264,000	100.0	2.76	16,227,000	23,066,000

A parliamentary government assumed control of the country but failed to perform, and in 1969 a military coup under General Siad Barre occurred. It gained popular support as it moved to correct some of the country's problems, not the least being illiteracy. It brought the country almost to ruin, however, by attempting to lay claim to the Plateau of Ogaden just across the border in Ethiopia. Increasing opposition to the Barre government led to civil war in 1991. The forces of the United Somalian Congress succeeded in driving Barre from power, but then divided into two factions that have since vied for control of the country. In the midst of the struggle, the United Nations and the United States attempted to intervene, unsuccessfully. As of the beginning of the new century, there is as yet no central government in the country.

Islam in Somalia was somewhat reshaped during the years of the Ottoman Empire. That part of the country formerly under Ottoman rule is largely of the HANAFITE school, while the part that was related to Zanzibar is primarily of the SHAFIITE school. There are a small number of Shi'as, mostly of Pakistani origin. The capital, Mogadishu, has been the site of the East Africa regional office of the WORLD MUSLIM CONGRESS.

Christianity was introduced into Somalia in 1881 but greatly expanded after the Italians took control of the southern coast, including Mogadishu. However, it has had very little success, even prior to the independent government's prohibition of proselytizing activity, and its several thousand members are still primarily expatriates. In 1972 the government nationalized all of the church's property. However, in spite of the changes in the church's status and the resultant departure of much of its personnel, a Roman Catholic diocese of Mogadishu was created in 1975.

Lutheran missionaries from the CHURCH OF SWEDEN came to Somalia in 1898. They opened a set of educational and medical facilities and engaged in evangelistic outreach, but they had their greatest success among a group of Bantu-speaking former slaves. The mission was disrupted when Italian authorities expelled the missionaries in 1935. The work was revived after World War II by Mennonites and the Sudan Interior Mission (SIM), but it was hurt by the same nationalization of church property that destroyed so much of the Catholic work in 1972. Most SIM missionaries left soon afterward. By 1976 all foreign missionaries had left the country. Two groups of Somali nationals, one formerly associated with the Mennonites and one with the Sudan Interior Mission, continued to meet after the missionaries left. In the 1980s, a few Mennonites were able to return.

There are also a few Hindus (expatriate Indians) and Bahá'ís in the country. The BAHÁ'Í FAITH had some success in the 1970s, and at one point a member of the Barre government was a member. It had some initial success among the Iranian expatriate community, but in 1975 the Iranians were expelled.

Sources:

- Bayne, E. A. A Religious Nationalist in Somalia: A Comment on Modern Nationalism Allied with Islam as a Unifying Dynamic. New York: American Universities Field Staff, 1966.
- Lewis, I. M., ed. Islam in Tropical Africa. London: Oxford University Press, 1966.
- Miller, F. Sufi Influences on Somali Society. M.A. thesis, Duquesne University, 1973.
- Trimingham, J. S. The Christian Church and Mission in Ethiopia (including Eritrea and the Somalilands). London: World Dominion Press, 1950.

Soto Zen Buddhism

Soto Zen Buddhism is one of the five Chinese Ch'an (Zen) lineages founded by Tung-shan Liang-chieh (807–869). It was transmitted by Dogen Kigen (1200–1253) to Japan, where it grew into the largest school of Zen, with more than 17,500 temples at its peak in the eighteenth century. The Soto Zen school emphasized the practice of “silent illumination” Zen meditation (in Japanese, shikantaza) and the observance of strict monastic codes as the path to enlightenment. These practices were detailed in Dogen’s seminal text, the Shobogenzo. The temples of Eihei-ji and Sojiji have acted as priestly training centers for the school in Japan.

Especially under the influence of the so-called second founder of the Japanese Soto school, Keizan Jokin (1268–1325), the organization also incorporated devotional forms of worship to numerous local deities, adopted esoteric Buddhist rituals, and received patronage from local lords to grow into a major force in Japanese religious life. Its temples offered healing, rain-making, and funerary rituals, among others, that attracted numerous adherents.

Today, the school maintains approximately fifteen thousand temples in Japan. Several hundred affiliated temples exist in Europe and the Americas, transmitted by both Japanese immigrants in the late nineteenth century and by European and American converts during the 1960s and 1970s. Soto Zen in the West among Japanese immigrants has served as a repository of Japanese culture and Buddhist ritual, especially funerary and ancestral rites. Among converts, on the other hand, it has focused on the primacy of meditation and its application in daily life, with a particular emphasis on involvement of the laity.

Addresses:

Eihei-ji-cho
Yoshida-gun, Fukui-ken 910–12
Japan

Sojiji
2–1–1 Tsurumi-ku
Yokohama-shi, Kanagawa-ken 230–8686
Japan

Duncan Williams

Sources:

- Bielefeldt, Carl. Dogen’s Manuals of Zen Meditation. Berkeley: Center for Japanese Studies, University of California Press, 1988.
- Bodiford, William. Soto Zen in Medieval Japan. Honolulu: University of Hawaii Press, 1993.
- LaFleur, William, ed. Dogen Studies. Honolulu: University of Hawaii Press, 1985.
- Tanahashi, Kazuaki, et al., trans. and ed. Moon in a Dewdrop: Writings of Zen Master Dogen. San Francisco: North Point, 1985.

South Africa

The oldest sign of religion in South Africa comes from Ingwavuma in northern KwaZulu/Natal at a place called Border Cave, where there is evidence of Middle Stone Age occupation. Some of the human remains found there show affinities to the later Khoi and San populations of the western parts of South Africa. Particularly fascinating are the remains of the body of a child that had been covered in red clay before burial, which suggests an understanding of a reality that transcends earthly existence. These remains are dated to about 100,000 years ago and are some of the oldest indications of religious activity in the world.

The oldest piece of rock art in southern Africa dates from twenty-seven thousand years ago and was recovered from the Apollo 11 Cave in Namibia. Burial remains indicate, however, that people who strongly resemble the contemporary San were present in the southern African region as early as twelve thousand years ago. Their famous rock engravings, which are scattered over large parts of South Africa, were numerous up until two thousand years ago. At that time changes in lifestyle took place, and from that point on the religious activities of the Khoi and San are reasonably well documented.

The culturally distinct Khoi (sometimes referred to as Khoikhoi or Hottentot) and the San (Bushmen) evolved from the same genetic stock, referred to as Khoisan. In prehistoric times they were probably spread over most of the southern African region, but by the time the colonists arrived in the seventeenth century they were confined to the southwestern parts of the country.

The San were hunter-gatherers who relied on fruits and vegetables of the veldt as well as game for their diet. The movement of game and the sparse rainfall of the region controlled their lives, and they were socially organized into small roving bands that traversed the desert in search of water and food. They recognized the existence of a greater as well as a lesser god. The greater god resided in the eastern sky and the lesser in the western sky. These gods were whimsical and were capable of sending good or bad fortune to people. Of much importance in San mythology is the un-

Status of religions in South Africa, 2000–2050

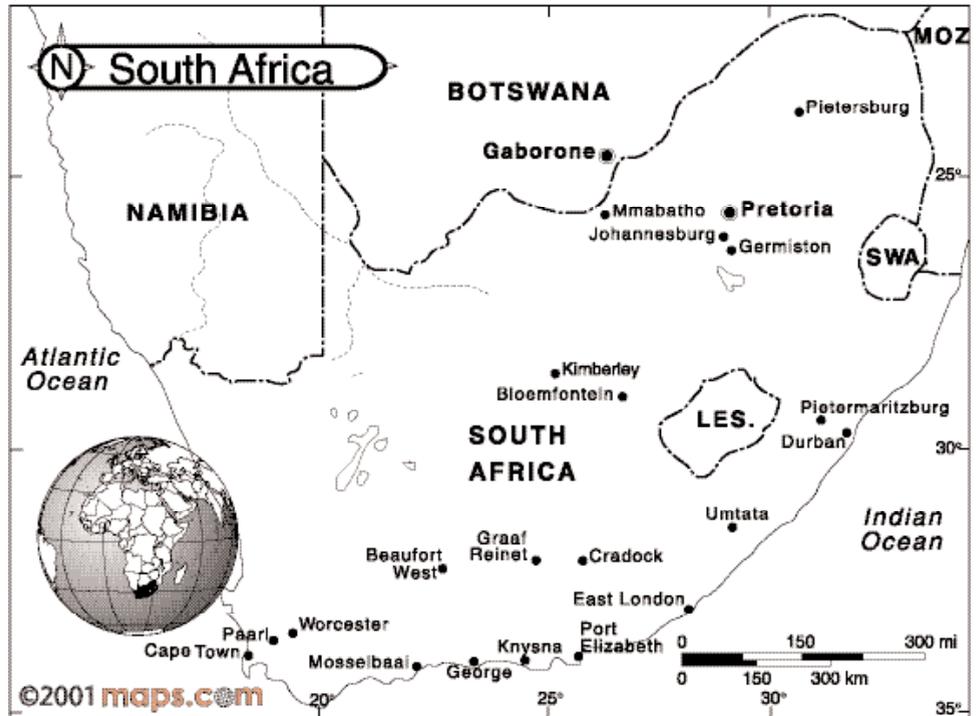

Followers	2000			2025	2050
	total	%	rate
Christians	33,564,000	83.1	1.91	38,272,000	43,682,000
Independents	18,500,000	45.8	2.14	23,000,000	27,300,000
Protestants	12,410,000	30.7	1.83	14,600,000	17,500,000
Roman Catholics	3,350,000	8.3	2.18	4,400,000	5,500,000
Ethnoreligionists	3,376,000	8.4	-0.22	3,000,000	2,500,000
Hindus	959,000	2.4	1.90	1,200,000	1,600,000
Nonreligious	957,000	2.4	3.18	1,400,000	2,000,000
Muslims	947,000	2.4	1.70	1,100,000	1,300,000
Baha'is	256,000	0.6	2.49	500,000	700,000
Jews	157,000	0.4	0.46	170,000	200,000
Atheists	81,900	0.2	1.72	215,000	300,000
Buddhists	46,600	0.1	2.07	100,000	150,000
Sikhs	8,600	0.0	1.20	15,000	20,000
Chinese folk-religionists	3,200	0.0	1.31	8,000	15,000
Spiritists	2,000	0.0	-0.11	3,600	6,000
Confucianists	240	0.0	0.51	500	900
other religionists	18,200	0.0	0.63	30,400	40,000
Total population	40,377,000	100.0	1.73	46,015,000	52,514,000

predictable divine trickster figure Kaggen, who could change his appearance at will and who played pranks and upset the normal order of things. The only defense humans had was to intensify the supernatural energy that they possess, called n/um. This was accomplished through communal dancing in which the rhythm of the dance would induce an altered state of consciousness in the healer. Through the dance, singing, trance, and fire, the n/um of the dancer-healer is brought to "boil"; it overflows in sweat and nose-bleeding, which in turn repels evil.

For the San all of nature was invested with a numinous quality, and their attitude toward the world was one of deep reverence and respect. Animals such as the eland and the mantis manifested divine qualities, and the stars were said to be the eyes of dead ancestors or great hunters. These people lived in a delicate balance with the natural environment, and their only defense against the expansionist activities of the colonists was to retreat from their preferred territory to the Kalahari Desert. Today there are no more than about fifty thousand, and many live in the neighboring countries of Namibia and Botswana. No common body of beliefs has survived among the small groups.

The Khoi people were nomadic pastoralists who settled mainly in the western Cape and moved only when water and pasture were needed for their animals. They had developed the ability to smelt iron and used it to fabricate weapons and implements. When their pastoral activities encroached on the hunting area of the San, it was the San who were forced to abandon the territory and move farther northward.

The Khoi believed in a cosmic duality of spirit. Tsui/Goab was the benevolent giver of rain and all things good, and Guanab was the evil god who brought misfortune, illness, and death. These gods would, however, sometimes inexplicably go against their own nature and bring about the opposite qualities. Whereas these gods influenced only the communal life, it was the ancestral cultural hero Heitsi-Eibib that was invoked for individual success and healing. There are many stories about his exploits, particularly about his many deaths, which are attested to by his many grave sites where offerings or stones were left for good luck.

With the arrival of the colonists, the Khoi culture crumbled in the face of superior weapons and missionary efforts to Christianize them. Eventually all Khoi were exterminated or incorporated and absorbed into the various groups in the Cape.

While the Khoi and the San inhabited the arid western parts of the country, the black African peoples, or Bantu-speaking people, inhabited the eastern and central parts of the country. Those parts consisted of rolling grasslands toward the coast as well as a vast inland plateau west of the Drakensberg. Different lifestyles developed among these people, varying with the climate, altitude, and soil. The lush, mountainous eastern parts of the country allowed for small self-sufficient and independent settlements (usually on a ridge), within hailing distance of neighbors. West of the Drakensberg, in the interior, the land is flat and rainfall inconstant. There the people needed larger tracts of land to sustain living, and the population was divided into very large centrally located settlements.

In the early nineteenth century, violent clashes between the people of different settlements led to the merging of groups into powerful nation-states, complete with their own royal houses. These groups were categorized by early ethnographers as the Nguni-speaking group (Xhosa, Zulu, and Swazi) and the Sotho-Tswana group (Northern Sotho, South Sotho, and Western Sotho or Tswana), the Venda and the Shona.

Although the religious practices of these groups differed notably, the main features show remarkable congruence. All the beliefs and practices are centered on the cardinal belief that there should be harmony between the natural and the spirit world. If human beings behaved with due deference toward the ancestors, and in accordance with prescribed social convention, everyone would prosper and flourish. If anyone misbehaved in any way, the harmony would be disturbed and the protection of the ancestors lifted, so that misfortune would strike the offenders.

A river baptism in South Africa (B. Mnguni/TRIP)

It is therefore clear that the main element of all the religious practices of the Bantu-speaking people was ancestor veneration. Each homestead had its own ancestors, who were included in the celebrations and decision making of everyday life and to whom it was looked for protection and prosperity. On a larger scale, every tribe or nation also had its own ancestors who were responsible for the welfare of the nation. Specialists in the form of diviners, by virtue of their ability to mediate in the spirit world, were on hand to help seek out the cause of suffering and misfortune and to help restore the order with prescribed sacrifices and purification rituals.

On the whole, scholars of African traditional religion agree that there was a belief in a Supreme Being or Creator who was so powerful and detached that human beings could not approach him. There are, however, also dissenting voices who maintain that this is a Western and Christian interpretation that was thrust upon a discrete religious system.

In South Africa today there are many who still abide by the old ways, and although it is estimated that more than 70 percent of Black South Africans profess to be Christians, their Christianity is often more influenced by the traditional religion than African religion is influenced by Christianity. It is safe to say that many of the AFRICAN INITIATED CHURCHES in South Africa today are not only influenced by traditional religion but that they also represent a synthesis of traditional religion and Christianity.

When the Dutch came to South Africa in 1652 they brought Reformed Christianity with them, and all other forms of religion were prohibited. Islam had been brought to the Cape as early as 1658 by slaves who were imported from the East Indies, but it was only in 1804, when the Dutch government granted religious freedom to all people, that they could establish their first mosque. Because Islam did so much to address the social and educational needs of the community, the religion attracted people from all classes and races and became a center of resistance against slavery and social injustice. From 1860 onward, Islam was also established in Natal, when Indian laborers were brought to the province. From there it quickly spread to the Transvaal, and today there may be as many as a million Muslims in South Africa and the number is growing.

The Reformed faith was originally brought to South Africa by members of the NETHERLANDS REFORMED CHURCH, but following the British takeover of the Cape Colony, Presbyterians from the British Isles, especially adherents of the CHURCH OF SCOTLAND, expanded the Reformed community. Through the twentieth century, these several churches splintered and reunited and today exist as more than fifteen different denominations, including the DUTCH REFORMED CHURCH, the EVANGELICAL PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH IN SOUTH AFRICA, the PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH OF SOUTHERN AFRICA, the UNITED CONGREGATIONAL CHURCH OF SOUTHERN AFRICA, the UNITING REFORMED CHURCH IN SOUTH AFRICA, and the UNITING PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH IN SOUTHERN AFRICA. The last named was formed by a merger in 1999. Two years later it selected the Rev. Diane Vorster as the new moderator of its general assembly, the first time a woman has headed a major South African Christian denomination.

Over the course of the nineteenth century, the major Protestant traditions brought to South Africa included the Anglicans (now included in the CHURCH IN THE PROVINCE OF SOUTH AFRICA), Methodists (METHODIST CHURCH OF SOUTH AFRICA), Baptists (BAPTIST UNION OF SOUTH AFRICA), and Moravians (MORAVIAN CHURCH IN SOUTHERN AFRICA). PENTECOSTALISM spread to South Africa soon after its establishment in America, the APOSTOLIC FAITH MISSION OF SOUTH AFRICA being its earliest representative. It has continued as an important segment of the Christian community, and South Africans have participated fully in the Charismatic movement. Several new South African Charismatic churches, such as the International Fellowship of Charismatic Churches, have now become global bodies.

A number of the Protestant churches are members of the South African Council of Churches, which is affiliated with the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES. Many of the more conservative Evangelical groups are associated with the Evangelical Alliance of South Africa affiliated with the WORLD EVANGELICAL ALLIANCE.

The first priests of the ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH settled in the Cape in 1805 but were not allowed to begin missionary work until 1820. A vicariate was established in 1837. The first Black bishop was consecrated in 1953. The church is currently led by the Episcopal Conference of South Africa.

It was only after 1804, when religious freedom came to the Cape, that practicing Jews came to settle in South Africa. The first synagogue (the Tikvat Israel—Hope of Israel) was established in 1841 in Cape Town. Today about half of the more than 100,000 Jews in the country live in and around Johannesburg, where they are involved mainly in trade and the professions. Many Jews played leading roles in the struggle for freedom in this country, and today many still continue to make important contributions to public life.

Hinduism, the last of the great world religions that have a major presence in this country, first came to Natal in 1860 with Indian indentured laborers. More laborers as well as many merchants followed soon afterward, and today South Africa has a vibrant Indian community of about one million people, most whom are Hindus. Most Hindus belong to the Sanathanist or ritualistic tradition, but there are also three streams of neo-Hinduism present in South Africa—namely ARYA SAMAJ, neo-Vedanta (for example, the Ramakrishna Centre and the DIVINE LIFE SOCIETY), and Hare Krishna (the INTERNATIONAL SOCIETY FOR KRISHNA CONSCIOUSNESS).

According to 1991 census figures (the last census that included compulsory questions on religious affiliation), about 67 percent of the population adhered to Christianity (33 percent to various African Initiated Churches, 18 percent to the Reformed family, 11 percent Roman Catholic, 9 percent Methodist, 6 percent Anglican, and 4 percent Lutheran). About 2 percent of the population belonged to Islam, 1.5 percent to Hinduism, and 0.2 percent to Judaism. Approximately 30 percent of the population did not fall into any of these categories, and that probably accounted for adherents of African traditional religion and a nonreligious component. According to the 1996 census (in which questions on religion were optional), only 54 percent of South Africans followed Christianity, but 34 percent had no religion or did not state one. Some 13 percent stated that they did not belong to any religion. As there was no way of indicating adherence to African traditional religion, one may assume that the 34 percent who claimed no religion or declined to answer the question included a strong component of adherence to African religion. At present there is a strong movement by adherents of African religion to return their religion to its ways and practices prevalent before colonialization, and to imbue it anew with dignity, honor, and acceptability within the South African cultural milieu.

In 1994 the long agonizing chapter of apartheid in the history of this country came to a close when the first democratically elected government took office under the presidency of Nelson Mandela. During the apartheid era many religious leaders in this country were involved in either the promotion of, or the resistance to, the system. Although the names of those who had sought to promote apartheid on biblical grounds will sink into oblivion, others, such as that of Anglican archbishop of Cape Town Desmond Tutu, Nobel Laureate for Peace, will go down in history as powerful and compelling examples of agents for justice and transformation.

H. Christina Steyn

Sources:

- Chidester, David. Religions of South Africa. London: Routledge, 1992.
- Krüger, J. S. Along Edges: Religion in South Africa: Bushman, Christian, Buddhist. Pretoria: Unisa, 1995.
- Krüger, J. S., G. J. A. Lubbe, and H. C. Steyn. The Human Search for Meaning: A Multireligious Introduction to the Religions of Humankind. Pretoria: Via Afrika, 1966.
- Prozesky, Martin, and John De Gruchy. Living Faiths in South Africa. New York: St. Martin's, 1995.

Southern Baptist Convention

The Southern Baptist Convention, the largest Protestant/Free Church body in the United States, was founded in 1845 as a result of a deep controversy within the larger American Baptist fellowship. Baptists, based as they were in the local church, had been slow to organize. In the early nineteenth century, they formed a set of organizations (societies) designed to assist the congregations in presenting a united voice, publishing religious materials, and expanding through home and foreign missions. Each society had its own rules and membership. The controversy over slavery presented it with the necessity of making some unforeseen decisions.

In the decades following the American Revolution, Baptists spread to every corner of the United States as then constituted. The southern half of the nation had developed around a system of agriculture that depended on slaves, and Baptists had found an opening for mission among the slave population. At the same time, many slave owners and their friends had become Baptists. And American Baptists, even in the South, were aware of the problem raised by the demands for freedom that undergirded the American Revolution, coupled with the ambiguous nature of the Bible's discussion of the subject. The early Christians, most notably the Apostle Paul, had made no direct challenge to the slavery then operative in the Mediterranean Basin.

As the slavery controversy that would lead to the American Civil War (1860–1865) deepened, the Baptists found it increasingly difficult to remain neutral, and the issue continued to be raised in different forms. For example, many Southern delegates who supported the American Baptist Home Missionary Society came to believe that a disproportionate number of home missions were being established outside the South. The issue came to a head in 1845, when Georgia delegates proposed a man for appointment as a home missionary. The board turned him down by refusing to act on the matter. Then the Alabama delegates sent an inquiry to the Triennial Convention overseeing foreign missions and asked if slaveholders could be appointed as foreign missionaries. The convention's reply included a statement that it would not act so as to give the appearance of approving of slavery.

These two actions were enough for some, and in 1845, Baptists in the South met and approved the plan for the formation of the Southern Baptist Convention. Unlike the American Baptists, the convention would unite all of the missional functions into a single organization. A foreign mission board and a home mission board were established immediately, and plans were projected for future educational and publications work. Because of the devastation of the American Civil War, plans for further expansion had to be postponed to the end of the century. To avoid too much centralization, the foreign missions board was established in Richmond, Virginia, where it remains to this day. The Home Missions Board was opened in Marion, Alabama, and later moved to Atlanta, Georgia, where it now is located.

After the Civil War, Southern Baptists also passed through a significant controversy that contributed to their unique place in the Baptist world. Advocates of the so-called Landmark position, most notably James R. Graves (1920–1993), argued that Baptist churches are the only true churches in the world, that the true church is a local, visible organization, and that Baptist churches and the kingdom of God are coterminous. Graves insisted that Baptist churches had existed at every age, and hence the contemporary Baptist movement could be traced to the time of Christ (rather than to the independent movement in sixteenth-century England). Among the implications of the Landmark position were that Baptists should have no pulpit fellowship (that is, should not exchange ministers to lead worship) with other Protestant groups, and that Baptist congregations should limit communion to members of Baptist churches. Although the Landmark position was ultimately rejected, it deeply influenced Southern Baptist life into the mid-twentieth century. It eventually would become the established position of the AMERICAN BAPTIST ASSOCIATION.

After the Civil War, slowly, step-by-step, Southern Baptists built their denominational life. In 1888 the Woman's Missionary Union was created. The Sunday School Board appeared three years later. Several Baptist institutions for higher education existed in the South prior to the Civil War, but as a whole, Baptists were suspicious of colleges and seminaries; it would be the twentieth century before the great expansion of Southern Baptists into higher education would occur.

In the new century, concern turned to the increasing problem of coordinating the growing convention and its boards and agencies. In 1917 the convention revised its constitution and created an executive committee assigned the task of directing all the work being nurtured by the convention. The executive committee became the primary agent for carrying out the will of the convention as expressed in its annual meetings. The committee as it developed included the officers elected by the convention, a representative from each of the boards, and a representative from each state.

Through the twentieth century, the Southern Baptists have expanded throughout the United States and become both a national body and the nation's largest Protestant group. With the opening of a church in Vermont in 1964, it finally had churches in all fifty states. Although membership is still concentrated in the South, its greatest expansion in recent decades has occurred outside the South. Through the first decades of the twentieth century, Southern Baptists operated under a comity agreement with Northern Baptists to limit competition. However, in 1942 such comity came to an end. Both Northern Baptists (now the American Baptist Churches in the United States) and Southern Baptists realized that, given the congregational nature of their movements, they could exercise little control over the movements, or the desire for affiliation of local Baptist churches. It was also the case that the two groups were developing distinct theological differences, with the Southern group assuming a distinctly more conservative stance.

During its first generation, Southern Baptist missionary activity was concentrated in China and Africa. The expansion of work into Roman Catholic Italy in 1870 signaled the beginning of an era of growth. Through the rest of the century, missions were opened in Mexico, Brazil, and Japan. Through the twentieth century, work expanded into more than ninety countries worldwide. In the decades since World War II, the convention has also faced the problems of the ending of colonialism and the growth of former missions into autonomous churches. In many cases these changes have led to a reorientation of Southern Baptist participation with former mission churches in new partnership relations. However, the commitment to global evangelism remains, and in 1999 the convention supported 3,482 full-time missionary personnel overseas.

The convention did not found seminaries, but gradually adopted seminaries founded independently by Southern Baptists. As of 2000 it supported six seminaries in the United States. It also sponsors fifty-two colleges and universities, and provides support for more than one hundred colleges and seminaries overseas.

Like Baptists in general, Southern Baptists accept the Bible as their definitive creed, but they have periodically published summaries of the major beliefs that focus their faith. In 1925, in the midst of attacks on the convention by its most fundamentalist wing, the convention adopted a doctrinal statement called "The Baptist Faith and Message" (revised in 1963). This statement has served through most of the twentieth century. In the last half of the century, however, Southern Baptists became increasingly embroiled in a controversy between its more conservative Evangelical wing and its more moderate wing. This controversy has threatened to split the convention, and in the 1990s several structures, such as the Cooperative Baptist Fellowship, were established to consolidate the interests of the moderates who had become a minority within the convention. Much of the controversy has swelled around the seminaries, whose professors have continually been the source of liberal theological perspectives. The primary issue has been biblical authority: Conservatives have tended to make affirmation of the inerrancy of the Bible (the belief that the Bible is without error on all matters about which it speaks) a test for holding a leadership position within the convention.

Addresses:

Southern Baptist Convention Executive Committee
901 Commerce St., Ste. 750
Nashville, TN 37203

Southern Baptist Foreign Mission Board
P.O. Box 6767
Richmond, VA 23230

Southern Baptist Home Missions Board
1350 Spring St., NW
Atlanta, GA 30367
<http://www.sbcnet.org>

Sources:

Baker, Robert A., ed. A Baptist Source Book. Nashville, TN: Broadman, 1966.

Encyclopedia of Southern Baptists. 4 vols. Nashville, TN: Broadman, 1958–1971.

Fletcher, Jesse C. The Southern Baptist Convention: A Sesquicentennial History. Nashville, TN: Broadman, 1994.

Hastings, C. Brownlow. Introducing Southern Baptists: Their Faith and Their Life. New York: Paulist, 1981.

Spain

When Christianity began, the Iberian Peninsula was already part of the Roman Empire; with the exception of some northern territories, Spanish people had been deeply Romanized. An old tradition affirmed that the peninsula was evangelized by the apostle St. James the Greater (this tradition was the basis for the development of the Way of St. James, or Camino de Santiago, in the Middle Ages). Although historical research has cast serious doubts on the reliability of this tradition, it is certain that conversion to Christianity was a relatively rapid process in the Roman Hispania, notwithstanding the persecutions of Christians ordered by Roman emperors. By the late third century Christianity was deeply rooted in the population, and Spain was producing mature theologians.

Beginning in 409 C.E., Spain was invaded by different "barbarous" peoples from Central and Northern Europe. By the fall of the western Roman Empire, in 476, the Visigoths constituted the dominant kingdom in the peninsula. Visigoths were a minority in comparison to the Hispano-

Roman population, but they were the rulers of the territory. The kingdom's religion was a matter strongly controlled by the king. In the late sixth century the Visigoths converted from Arianism—a Christian heresy—to Roman Catholicism. The initiative was taken by King Reccared, and the Third Council of Toledo (589) was the instrument for the conversion of Arian bishops and the integration of both ecclesiastical hierarchies. The Councils of Toledo, convoked by the king but presided over by an archbishop, dealt with both religious and political issues, and were an important means of facilitating the coexistence between Visigoths and Hispano-Romans. During the seventh century, the ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH made significant contributions to Spanish cultural development, with St. Isidore of Seville (560–636) as the central figure of those years.

In 711 the Visigothic Kingdom of Spain fell under the Muslim attack. Arab Muslims conquered almost the whole Iberian Peninsula in an astonishingly rapid military campaign, and Islamic rule replaced Christian rule. Spanish history in the following centuries is, to a great extent, the history of the struggles between Islamic kingdoms and Christian kingdoms, which finally took over the entire peninsula in the late fifteenth century. In those centuries, the degrees of religious tolerance, or intolerance, in the Christian and Islamic territories, respectively, varied according to political and cultural circumstances. Overt persecution of the faithful of other religions was not always the rule—it was rather the exception. However, despite some recent idealization of the coexistence of the three monotheistic religions in Islamic territories, there was nothing comparable to the contemporary notion of religious freedom. To be Christian in a territory governed by Muslims (mozárabe), and vice versa (mudéjar), usually entailed remarkable discrimination with regard to legal and economic status. This fact often stimulated conversions on both sides.

On the other hand, there were important settlements of Jewish people in Spain at least since the late first century C.E., after the great Diaspora following the destruction of the Temple of Jerusalem by the Emperor Titus (39–81) in 70. Significantly, the Hebrew name of Spain, Sepharad, gives name to the Sephardic branch of Judaism. Their rela-

Status of religions in Spain, 2000–2050

Followers	2000		2025	2050
	total	% rate
Christians	37,107,000	93.6 0.03	33,712,000	27,074,000
Roman Catholics	38,080,000	96.1 0.07	34,700,000	28,000,000
Independents	320,000	0.8 0.82	400,000	450,000
Marginal Christians	200,000	0.5 1.64	300,000	360,000
Nonreligious	1,836,000	4.6 0.95	2,100,000	2,200,000
Atheists	441,000	1.1 0.11	532,000	575,000
Muslims	201,000	0.5 1.67	250,000	300,000
Buddhists	17,700	0.0 0.72	22,500	25,000
Baha'is	13,600	0.0 4.25	25,000	35,000
Jews	13,100	0.0 0.22	15,500	17,500
Total population	39,630,000	100.0 0.08	36,658,000	30,226,000

tionships with the Catholic Church do not seem to have been very positive, as demonstrated by some anti-Jewish provisions of the Council of Iliberis (Granada) in the early fourth century. The Arian period of the Visigothic monarchy opened a period of tolerance and an amelioration of the situation of Jews. However, shortly after the kingdom's conversion to Roman Catholicism in 589, new persecutions and measures against Jews came into being. During the first period of the Islamic domination in Spain (eighth to eleventh centuries), Jewish people could live and develop peacefully, particularly in Al-Andalus, or southern Spain.

After the fall of the caliphate of Cordoba, and especially after North African peoples took control of the Muslim territories in Spain (in the late eleventh century), there was an intensive immigration of Jewish population to the Christian kingdoms, where they could find better living conditions. Some Jews fled out of Spain, as did Maimonides (1135–1204), one of the leading philosophical figures of the twelfth century.

Semana Santa (Easter Week) celebrations in Andalusia, Spain (Tibor Bognar/TRIP)

In Christian territories, until the late fifteenth century, the situation of Jews oscillated between tolerance and persecution; more often than not they were subject to discriminatory measures. Some Jewish people occupied important positions in the world of culture, finance, and, at times, politics, as happened also in the Cordoba caliphate. They played a central role in the School of Translators of Toledo, which constituted, throughout the twelfth century, a unique environment of intercommunication between Christian, Islamic, and Jewish cultures, and contributed substantially to the rediscovery of ancient Greek philosophy in medieval Europe. Ecclesiastical pressure, however, determined that, in the long run, anti-Semitic policy prevailed in Spain. The paradox was that the Catholic Church that urged the persecution of Jews was the same church that promoted the mendicant orders; built the magnificent Romanic and Gothic cathedrals, so full of spirituality; and impelled the foundation of the great European universities in the Lower Middle Ages, which paved the way for the Renaissance (Salamanca was one of the first and most significant European universities).

It is usually assumed that the constitution of Spain as a modern state and nation began in the late fifteenth centure. In 1492, Queen Isabel of Castile (1451–1504) and King Ferdinand of Aragon (1452–1516), who had married in 1469, conquered the Moorish kingdom of Granada, thus making a unified kingdom of Spain (in reality, it was a plurality of kingdoms with a common monarch until the Decree of Nueva Planta in 1716). Significantly, Isabel and Ferdinand are known as the Catholic Monarchs (Reyes Católicos), because the spreading and strengthening of Catholicism formed one of their main goals in politics, both within the territory of the Spanish peninsula as well as in the subsequent colonization of America. With them, the idea that Catholicism is part of the Spanish national identity became firmly established, and it remained, with manifold consequences and only a few breaks, until the late twentieth century.

The year 1492 was also decisive for two other reasons: the discovery of America by Christopher Columbus, which permitted the spreading of Christianity throughout an immense new continent; and the expulsion of Spanish Jews, followed in 1502 by the expulsion of Muslims. Jews, like Muslims, had to choose between conversion to Catholicism or exile. This led to a new Diaspora of Sephardic Jews (some 200,000 people left the kingdom); some of them immigrated to America, but the largest part spread all over the Mediterranean countries.

For Queen Isabel, as for Charles I (1500–1558) and his son Philip II (1527–1598), religious unity was an essential element of political unity in Spain. In their foreign policy, as in their domestic policy, they were endeavoring to build a great Catholic empire. That idea led them to fight for the purity of Catholic doctrine in the Iberian peninsula, to urge an intense and prompt evangelization of indigenous peoples in America, and to fight against the advance of Protestantism in Europe. Indeed, the support of Charles I and Philip II, as well as the contribution of a considerable number of Spanish bishops and theologians, were essential for the development of the Council of Trent.

The main instrument utilized by the Spanish monarchy to guarantee the kingdom's religious unity was the Spanish Inquisition, founded in 1478 by Queen Isabel and King Ferdinand with papal approval. From the very beginning the institution was controlled almost entirely by the Spanish monarchy, which put the Inquisition in the hands of the Dominicans. Initially, the Spanish Inquisition's main goal was to discover and punish insincere converts from Judaism (marranos) or from Islam. After the Lutheran Reformation, the extirpation of the first Protestant cells in Spain was also a main objective. The Spanish Inquisition was particularly active during the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries (although it was abolished only in 1848). It conducted its procedures against heresy often with extreme harshness and sometimes cruelty, although with no more cruelty than its brother Anglican and Calvinist institutions. The Spanish Inquisition's procedures always followed the same pattern and were carefully recorded. They frequently ended with an auto-da-fé—a public ceremony, presided over by ecclesiastical and secular authorities, in which humiliated repentant sinners acknowledged their mistakes and pertinacious heretics were severely punished, sometimes being publicly burned to death at the stake. The purpose of autos-da-fé was to show the power of the Inquisition (also called the Holy Office) and to deter people from incurring heretical beliefs.

A similar inquisitorial policy was applied in the vice kingdoms of America. However, we must not forget that the Inquisition was an instrument of the monarchy and was not representative of the Spanish Church's attitude as a whole. On the contrary, there were frequent conflicts and tension between the Spanish Inquisition, run by the Dominicans, and other ecclesiastical institutions—including the popes. On the other hand, it was due to the influence of the Catholic Church that the Spanish colonization of America was probably the most humane of all the enterprises of the kind developed by European kingdoms at that time. (The so-called black legend has emphasized the negative aspects of Spanish intervention in the New World, but the fact is that, in comparative terms, no other colonization in history has produced such interracial societies as the ones existing in Latin America.) The church was sincerely interested in the evangelization of the new continent. Most of the evangelists were members of religious orders, and many of them, such as Fr. Bartolomé de las Casas (1474–1566), vigorously defended indigenous peoples' rights. In particular, the "reductions" established by Jesuits reached the very heart of numerous indigenous civilizations and, along with evangelization, performed a cultural and educational work of extraordinary efficiency; indeed, the expulsion of Jesuits from Spanish territories, decreed in 1767 by King Charles III (1716–1788), did serious harm to the indigenous cause. The school of Salamanca, and particularly Francisco de Vitoria, a Dominican, who is considered the founder of international law, provided an important philosophical and theological support for Indians' rights, and consequently for the spiritual and cultural work of religious orders in America.

The development of Protestantism in Spain was impeded by the Inquisition's activity. In the mid-sixteenth century there were Lutheran communities of some significance in Seville and in Valladolid (the former gained a certain momentum among popular classes, the latter involved rather the social and intellectual elites). The nobility of the Kingdom of Navarre received the influence of Calvinism (with some episodes of intolerance toward Catholic practices), especially during the second half of the sixteenth century. However, the Inquisition repressed steadily and efficiently their activities and proselytism; the autos-da-fé celebrated in Seville and Valladolid in 1559 were particularly famous and important (but there were many others during the rest of the century). This fact determined that Protestantism was virtually nonexistent in Spain from the late sixteenth century or the early seventeenth century until the nineteenth century (it is now represented in the SPANISH EVANGELICAL CHURCH and SPANISH REFORMED EPISCOPAL CHURCH).

The evolution of Christianity in Spain was, therefore, essentially Catholic. The religious unity of Spain received an additional impulse in 1609 with the expulsion of moriscos—that is, Moors apparently converted to Catholicism but who, in a considerable percentage, had preserved their tradition, culture, and beliefs. Approximately 400,000 people left the country. This fact, like the expulsion of Jews in 1492 (and, probably, like the prohibition and persecution of Protestantism), caused irreparable damage to the Spanish economy.

From the late fifteenth century until 1978, Catholicism was the official religion of the Spanish state, with only two ephemeral interruptions. The Catholic Church was never a state church in the technical sense, but Spain was a confessional state. During the nineteenth and twentieth centuries, almost all the numerous Spanish constitutions proclaimed Catholicism as the official religion of the country (including the Constitution of 1812, which introduced the principles of liberalism in Spain). The two exceptions were the Constitution of 1869 (derogated in 1876) and the Republican Constitution of 1931 (derogated in 1939).

As in other European Catholic states, Spain's consolidation as a modern state and an absolute monarchy was accompanied by the typical characteristics of regalism. There was a reciprocal support and concession of privileges between church and state. Essentially, the state guaranteed the Catholicism of the country and granted certain economic privileges to the church, which enjoyed an enormous social and cultural influence in the kingdom and in the American territories. In exchange, the monarchy obtained political support from the ecclesiastical authorities and benefited from certain prerogatives on ecclesiastical matters (iura maiestatica circa sacra), especially the power to control the appointment of bishops as well as the ecclesiastical laws to be applied in its territory. On the other hand, until the second half of the twentieth century, ecclesiastical institutions assumed responsibility for a spectrum of social services that today are generally considered part of the welfare state's competences—education, charity, and hospitals. The cooperation between church and state was materialized in the Concordats of 1717, 1737, 1753, 1851, and 1953.

In the long run the state became the strongest part of this bilateral relationship, as occurred in other European regalist states and in other analogous regimes on the side of Protestantism. This produced an increasing tension between secular and ecclesiastical authorities. The penetration of Enlightenment ideas in Spain reinforced the position of the monarchy and led to the expulsion of Jesuits under Charles III in 1767 (with the support of most Spanish bishops). A similar attitude, together with obvious economic interests, inspired the state's massive confiscation of a great part of the immense ecclesiastical properties in Spain during the nineteenth century (desamortización, or confiscation of mortmain property), which was particularly intensive between 1834 and 1855. In addition, ecclesiastical taxes (another important source of income for the Catholic Church) were suppressed in 1841. The consequence was that the church became economically dependent upon the state, a fact that modified substantially their relationship.

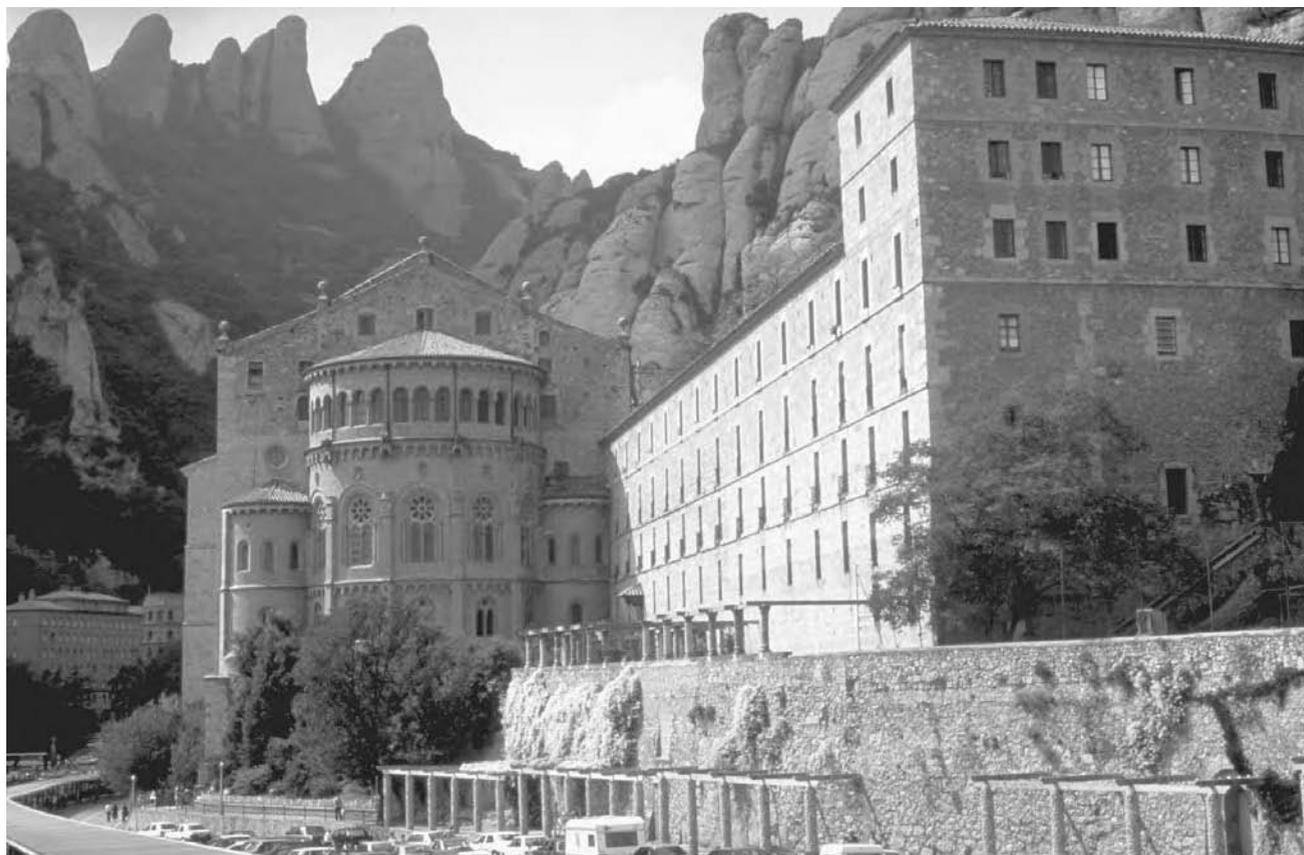

The situation experienced an abrupt breach in 1931, when the Second Republic was declared. The 1931 Constitution formally proclaimed the freedom of religion and conscience, but the constitution itself and the subsequent legislation adopted a markedly hostile regulation of religious institutions, which severely restricted the Catholic Church's freedom without actually creating an environment of freedom for other religious denominations. Hostility replaced cooperation. The dominant sentiment in some Republican governments was not freedom but rather revenge, with the explicit intention of terminating the Catholic Church's mighty social and cultural influence on Spanish life. That excessive anticlerical reaction led to opposite reactions on the other side. Spanish society became divided in two halves, from the religious perspective. This fact seriously disturbed social peace, above all when the radical leftist parties formed a government in 1936, and it was one of the main causes of the Civil War, 1936–1939. Thus, the effects of the Second Republic experience were not limited to constituting merely a parenthesis in the Catholic tradition of the Spanish state; the intransigence of the main political forces and their inability to agree on a common project opened the way to a three-year civil war, which in turn ended with the dictatorship of General Francisco Franco (1892–1975), who ruled the country until his death.

Franco's regime returned to the confessional state and was decidedly supported by the Catholic hierarchy at least until the 1960s. This new age of church-state collaboration, expressed in the 1953 Concordat with the Holy See, has often been called National Catholicism, for the identification between nation and religion was again a substantial part of public policy, especially inside the country. Franco's regime did not have Catholicism as its only element of ideological cohesion, but religion provided a sort of "historical legitimacy" to the dictatorship. The natural consequence was intolerance of other religions, stimulated or consented to by the Catholic Church, whose official doctrine still proposed the confessional state as the ideal regime. Non-Catholic religious worship was permitted only in private. In practice, the effects of this religious intolerance were particularly detrimental for other Christian churches. Islamic and Jewish Spaniards resided mainly in the Spanish territories in Northern Africa (Protectorado Español de Marruecos), where they enjoyed a specific legal status more favorable than the one recognized in the peninsula.

The paradox is that the first manifestation of religious tolerance by Franco's regime—the 1967 Law of Religious Freedom—was impelled by the Catholic Church, which had changed some of its basic views on church-state relations in the Second Vatican Council (Decl. Dignitatis Humanae). In addition, in the late 1960s some influential Spanish bishops were overtly willing to create a new framework for the relationships between the church and Franco's dictatorship, which was noticeably in its final stage. The 1967 law put an end to religious intolerance in Spain and provided a real legal status to non-Catholic religious denominations; it was certainly based upon a restrictive notion of religious freedom, but probably no more restrictive—and perhaps less so—than the concept of other fundamental rights and public liberties in that political context.

The current legal and political framework of religion in Spain was designed by the constitution promulgated in 1978, meeting entirely the standards of freedom characteristic of Western democracies. In the following years, the Spanish state signed the most relevant international documents regarding human rights, including the European

Montserrat, a Benedictine Monastery near Barcelona, Spain (Corel)

Convention of Human Rights. Spanish society, in its largest part, accepted rapidly and deeply the new model of political life. In the last two decades, religious pluralism has notably increased and is no longer seen by Spaniards as a negative reality, or as contrary to the Spanish traditional identity, but rather as the normal effect of freedom. Religion has ceased to be, for the first time in many centuries, a source of social and political conflict.

The constitutional framework of religion is no longer based upon state confessionality but upon four fundamental principles: religious freedom, equality, neutrality, and cooperation. The state protects the exercise of freedom of religion and conscience by every individual and group. All citizens are equal before the law, and therefore no one can be subjected to discrimination on the basis of religion or beliefs. Neutrality determines that the state has no official religion and may not evaluate religious groups according to their doctrines or tenets; it may judge only their social effects. However, there is no separation between state and religion; on the contrary, the constitution provides that “the public authorities shall take into account the beliefs of Spanish society and maintain the consequent relationships of cooperation with the Catholic Church and the other religious denominations.”

The constitutional right to religious freedom was developed by a statute enacted in 1980 (Ley Orgánica de Libertad Religiosa). State cooperation with religious communities has materialized especially in formal agreements that provide a specific legal status to the most significant religions in Spain. Thus, in 1979 the old concordat was replaced by a set of four agreements with the Holy See, which, in fact, collectively constitute a concordat and are assimilated to international treaties in Spanish law. Their purpose was to preserve those traditional privileges of the Catholic Church that were deemed compatible with the new constitutional principles (for example, civil effects of canonical marriage, religious education in public schools as an optional subject for students—but mandatory for the schools—financial support, religious assistance to the army, and so forth). Many of these privileges were subsequently granted also to some of the main religious minorities in Spain, in particular to those of more historical significance, when the Spanish state in 1992 signed agreements of cooperation with three federations of Evangelical churches, Jewish communities, and Islamic communities (that is, the same religions that were persecuted by the Spanish monarchy five centuries earlier).

Other religious groups enjoy the same freedoms, and they can easily acquire legal personality in Spanish law through a simple procedure of registration; however, they receive hardly any actual cooperation from the state. In any event, most of the more than eight hundred non-Catholic religious communities registered in Spain are integrated into the three aforementioned federations (the federations comprise approximately 65 percent of Evangelical churches, 74 percent of Jewish communities, and 72 percent of Islamic communities). If we except JEHOVAH'S WITNESSES and the CHURCH OF JESUS CHRIST OF LATTER-DAY SAINTS, the cooperation agreements with the Catholic Church (1979) and with religious minorities (1992) are representative of a very high percentage of the Spanish population.

That is why the present state of things is normally deemed satisfactory. Viewed in the context of Spanish history, the existing problems are relatively unimportant. Thus, the Catholic Church sometimes argues that the Spanish state does not adequately fulfill some of its obligations derived from the 1979 Concordat (for example, its contribution to preserve the historical property of ecclesiastical origin, which is immense and precious). The Evangelical, Jewish, and Islamic federations aspire to obtain a complete equalization with the Catholic Church's legal treatment, particularly with regard to financial support. The two significant religious minorities left out of the federations—Jehovah's Witnesses and Mormons—have in recent years been attempting unsuccessfully to reach a cooperation agreement with the state.

From a sociological perspective, in spite of the difficulties in finding reliable statistics, it is undisputed that the Catholic Church is the religion of the overwhelming majority of the Spanish population all around the country (with the exception of the Spanish cities of Ceuta and Melilla, located within the territory of Morocco, where Muslims may reach 25 and 35 percent of the population, respectively). Among a population of forty million, some 90 percent of Spaniards recognize themselves as Catholics, while less than 2 percent follow other religions, and 8 percent declare not to have any religion (these data are from 1990–1996). Approximately 75 percent of marriages are celebrated according to canon law, and parents demand Catholic instruction in schools—public and private—for some 80 percent of preuniversity students. The number of Jews is probably not beyond twenty thousand (there having been no Jews in Spain from 1500 to the 1920). The Evangelical Federation counts no more than 140,000 members and the Islamic Federation some 350,000 (many of them being immigrants from Islamic countries). Jehovah's Witnesses number less than 100,000, and Mormons around 30,000.

The Catholic Church still retains a powerful social influence, although public morals are much less rooted in Catholic doctrine than in the recent past. As in other European countries with a traditional majority church, there is an increasing trend in Spain—even among people who define themselves as Catholic—toward living openly in agreement with ethical rules not entirely coincident with official Catholic morals, and toward a less close relationship with the ecclesiastical establishment. The number of clergymen and members of religious orders has been diminishing in the last decades. At the same time, there are a growing number of charitable institutions and nongovernmental organizations of Catholic inspiration, with numerous young volunteers.

Javier Martínez-Torrón

Sources:

- Cuenca Toriba, José Manuel. Relaciones Iglesia-Estado en la España contemporánea (1833–1985). 2d ed. Madrid: Alhambra, 1989.
- García Villoslada, Ricardo, ed. Historia de la Iglesia en España. 7 vols. Madrid: Biblioteca de Autores Cristianos, 1979–1982.
- General Directorate of Religious Affairs (Dirección General de Asuntos Religiosos), Ministry of Justice, Spain. Posted at http://www.mju.es/asuntos_religiosos/index.html.
- Guía de Entidades Religiosas de España (Iglesias, Confesiones y Comunidades Minoritarias)*. Madrid: Dirección General de Asuntos Religiosos, Ministerio de Justicia, 1998.
- Menéndez y Pelayo, Marcelino. Historia de los Heterodoxos Españoles. 3 vols. 3d ed. Madrid: Consejo Superior de Investigaciones Científicas, 1992.
- Meyerson, Mark D., and Edward D. English, eds. Christians, Muslims, and Jews in Medieval and Early Modern Spain: Interaction and Cultural Change. Notre Dame, IN: University of Notre Dame Press, 1999.
- Payne, Stanley G. Spanish Catholicism: An Historical Overview. Madison: University of Wisconsin Press, 1984.
- Tratado de Derecho Eclesiástico*. Navarra: Eunsa, 1994.

Spanish Evangelical Church

The Spanish Evangelical Church derives its doctrinal tenets from the sixteenth-century Protestant Reformation movement, and from the Pietist Renovation movement of the nineteenth century. In 1869 the first assembly of what was termed the Spanish Reformation Church took place, adopting the title Spanish Christian Church in 1871. Subsequent to merging with the Congregationalists of the Union Ibero-Evangelists, it adopted the present designation. In 1953 the Methodist Church of Catalonia and Baleares (which had resulted from the activity of the Methodist Episcopal Church, now an integral part of the UNITED METHODIST CHURCH) joined the Spanish Evangelical Church.

The Spanish Evangelical Church follows the pattern of democratic structure and has a presbyterian-synodal model for administration. Its organization comprises, among others, an elders council for each local church, a presbytery for each region, and regional synods. Every two years a general assembly or synod of the entire church in Spain is held. Presently, the Spanish Evangelical Church has fifty-eight places of worship (thirty-eight churches and twenty missionary centers) in Spain, which gather some three thousand believers. Local communities meet around the reading and teaching of the Word of God (the Bible) as the central element of the service. The Last Supper and baptism are considered sacraments that help the believer in the expression and comprehension of the spiritual realities of the Christian faith. In addition, the Spanish Evangelical Church celebrates pastoral ordination, confirmation, marriage blessing, and burial as rites of religious significance.

The Spanish Evangelical Church runs several religious-oriented entities, among them the Seminary SEUT (Seminario Evangélico Unido de Teología), several evangelical schools (El Porvenir and Juan de Valdés), the Center for Ecumenism (Los Rubios) in Málaga, and Elders Houses in Santa Coloma de Gramanet (Catalonia), Madrid, and Palma de Mallorca.

In 1992 the Federation of Evangelical Entities of Spain, on behalf of various Christian denominations in which the Spanish Evangelical Church is included, signed an Agreement of Cooperation with the Spanish government. That agreement has helped to ameliorate and regularize the legal status of the Evangelical Church and its sociological reputation after years of subtle misunderstandings and social prejudice.

The church is a member of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES and the Spanish Committee of Cooperation between Churches (Comité Español de Cooperación entre las Iglesias).

Address:

Spanish Evangelical Church
Noviciado 5
28015 Madrid
Spain

Rafael Palomino

Sources:

De la Hera, Alberto, and Rosa M. Martínez de Codes. Spanish Legislation on Religious Affairs. Madrid: Ministerio de Justicia, 1998.
Dirección General de Asuntos Religiosos. Guía de entidades religiosas de España. Madrid: Ministerio de Justicia, 1998.
Spanish Evangelical Church. Posted at <http://www.iee-es.org> (in Spanish, French, German, and English). Accessed November 15, 2001.

Spanish Reformed Episcopal Church

The Spanish Reformed Episcopal Church (Anglican Communion) was founded in 1868 in Gibraltar, headed by Juan Bautista Cabrera, who was exiled from Spain during the reign of Isabella II, Queen of the Spaniards (r. 1833–1868). After Isabella was ousted by the revolution of 1868, Cabrera returned to the country and founded the church in Seville.

Bishop Cabrera was consecrated in 1894 through the cooperation of the Church of Ireland.

The Spanish Reformed Episcopal Church preserves the ancient Christian liturgy of the Visigoths and Mozarabs. Deeply influenced by the Reformation movement, the Spanish Reformed Episcopal Church belongs to the worldwide ANGLICAN COMMUNION (since 1979) and to the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES. It holds a national biennial synod and has published its official journal, La Luz, since 1869.

The Spanish Reformed Episcopal Church runs several religious-oriented entities, including the Seminary SEUT (Seminario Evangélico Unido de Teología), the Ecumenical Centre Villa Adelfos (Castellón), and Agrupación de Mujeres de la Iglesia Catedral del Redentor. The church oversees places of worship in twelve Spanish cities with approximately fifteen hundred members.

The church is currently led by the Rt. Rev. Carlos Lopez-Lozano. In 1992 the Federation of Evangelical Entities of Spain, on behalf of various Christian denominations in which the Spanish Reformed Episcopal Church is included, signed an Agreement of Cooperation with the Spanish government that makes easier the development of the church in Spanish society.

Address:

Spanish Reformed Episcopal Church
Calle dela Beneficiencia 18
28004 Madrid
Spain
<http://www.netministries.org/see/churches.exe/ch10650>

Rafael Palomino

Sources:

The Church of England Yearbook. London: Church Publishing House, published annually.
De la Hera, Alberto, and Rosa M. Martínez de Codes. Spanish Legislation on Religious Affairs. Madrid: Ministerio de Justicia, 1998.
Dirección General de Asuntos Religiosos. Guía de entidades religiosas de España. Madrid: Ministerio de Justicia, 1998.

Spiritism

Spiritism is based on the work of Hyppolyte Léon Denizard Rivail (1804–1869), who began to lay down his teachings in 1854 under the pseudonym Allan Kardec. Kardec was among the first people attracted to the Spiritualist movement that spread to France in the 1860s. He developed his own teachings from his contact with mediums and published them in his several books. Translated into Portuguese, the books spread his particular form of SPIRITUALISM, which included a belief in reincarnation, an idea anathema to British and American Spiritualists at the time.

Spiritual Baptists

In Brazil his concepts were adopted, elaborated, and sometimes reinterpreted by various authors, especially Chico Xavier, currently the most prominent representative of Brazilian Spiritism. He emphasizes, as do some other authors, the religious character of Spiritism. The doctrine of Spiritism centers on the idea of a continuous evolution of the individual soul in various manifestations. Death is considered an intermediate state between two lives in visible material form. Kardec taught that contact can be made with the spiritual world. This explains the important role of mediums in the local centers of Kardecism, which regularly become locations where people seek to communicate with deceased relatives. The worldview of Kardecism contains basic ideas of Christianity and intends to complete or fulfill them. Especially in terms of ethics, Spiritism is clearly Christianity-oriented, which leads Kardecists to engage in a wide range of charitable activities.

The history of institutionalized Kardecism in Brazil began in 1865 with the first official group of Spiritists in Salvador, Bahia. From 1873 on, Rio de Janeiro witnessed a wave of foundations of Spiritist circles and centers. In 1884 the Federação Espírita Brasileira was established as a national umbrella organization of local groups. At the end of the 1880s and in the following decades, umbrella organizations emerged at the state level. As for local centers, there was already a saturation by the 1950s. Official statistics for 1956 counted 2,950 local Brazilian groups, each with an average of 318 members. Kardecism's character as an urban phenomenon that attracts mainly middle-class, more erudite Brazilians has continued to this day.

In the national censuses, which have included Kardecism as a separate religious category since 1940, Spiritists never exceeded 2 percent of the population. In 1991 only 1.12 percent of the population declared themselves Kardecist, and only 3.6 percent of those lived in rural areas. The Datafolha study of 1994 confirmed not only the concentration of Spiritism in urban surroundings but also the high level of education of most adherents. According to the survey, 89 percent of Kardecists lived in large or medium-size cities, with concentrations in São Paulo and Rio de Janeiro. In each of those two cities, Kardecists made up 8 percent of the population.

The Internet site for the Federação Espírita Brasileira includes the text of Kardec's two primary works, The Spirit's Book and The Medium's Book. Centers of the Federação can now be found across South America and in Portugal.

Brazilian scholars treat Kardecistic Spiritism as one of several "mediumistic religions." In 1991, some 1,644,354 Brazilians, or 1.12 percent of the population, declared themselves Kardecists, while the Datafolha study of 1994 identified 3 percent of the adults entitled to vote as adherents of Kardecistic Spiritism.

Addresses:

Federação Espírita Brasileira, National Headquarters
SGAN 603 Conjunto "F"
Av. L-2 Norte
Brasília, DF
Brazil

Federação Espírita Brasileira, Regional Headquarters
Avenida Passos, 30, downtown
Rio de Janeiro, RJ
Brazil
<http://www.febrasil.org.br/>

Frank Usarski

Sources:

- Kardec, Allan. The Medium's Book. Translated by Emma E. Wood. New York: Samuel Weiser, 1970.
———. The Spirit's Book. Translated by Anna Blackwell. São Paulo: Livaria Kardec Editora, 1972.

Spiritual Baptists

The Spiritual Baptists are a rapidly expanding international religious movement with congregations in St. Vincent, Trinidad and Tobago, Grenada, Guyana, Venezuela, London, Amsterdam, Toronto, Los Angeles, and New York City. Like other religions of Caribbean origin, the Spiritual Baptists seem to have started out as a "religion of the oppressed." In recent years, however, congregations in Trinidad have attracted membership among wealthy East Indians, Chinese, and Europeans. Nevertheless, the religion is still overwhelmingly black, with Asians and whites constituting less than 5 percent of the total membership.

The central Spiritual Baptist rite is called "mourning." Spiritual Baptists participate in mourning ceremonies for a variety of reasons: to cure cancer, to see the future, or to communicate with the deceased. For most participants, however, the major reason for participating in the rite is to discover one's "true" rank within an elaborate twenty-three-step church hierarchy. Every Baptist is expected to mourn often, and all Baptists desire to advance within the church hierarchy.

The 1990s ushered in a period of increasing respectability and visibility for the faith. In 1996 a general conference of Spiritual Baptist bishops was held at the Central Bank Auditorium in Port of Spain, Trinidad. Archbishop Murray's address to the conference called for: (1) building a new cathedral that would include a library for researchers who want to "make a history" of the Spiritual Baptist faith; (2) the establishment of a trade school; and (3) construction of a "Spiritual Baptist Park" that will serve as a pilgrimage site for Spiritual Baptists in the Caribbean and throughout the world.

A seminary—the Southland School of Theology—was established, and a comprehensive Spiritual Baptist minister's manual was published in 1993. In addition, the day of the repeal of the Shouters Prohibition Ordinance (shouters being a derogatory name for the Spiritual Baptists) in 1953 is now a national holiday in Trinidad and Tobago. But it is difficult to gauge the impact of these changes on rank-and-file believers. Thus far, the impact has been minuscule. Southland School of Theology has no full-time students, the Spiritual Baptist ministers' manual is rarely consulted, and construction has yet to begin on the park, the trade school, or the cathedral. The majority of Spiritual Baptist churches in the Caribbean remain small and lack a solid financial base.

Shouter Baptists preaching and praying on the streets of Scarborough, Tobago (Helene Rogers/TRIP)

The Spiritual Baptists are led by the Council of Elders, which includes individuals (both male and female) who have been consecrated as archbishops. For the average Caribbean church member, things continue very much as before. There has, however, been tremendous church growth outside the Caribbean. Today, the largest and most prosperous Spiritual Baptist churches are located in Great Britain, Canada, and the United States.

Address:

Council of Elders Spiritual Baptist Shouters
Faith of Trinidad and Tobago

2A-2B Saddle Rd.

Maraval

Trinidad and Tobago

<http://www.n2consulting.com/brochure.htm>

Stephen D. Glazier

Sources:

- Gibbs de Peza, Hazel Ann. My Faith: Spiritual Baptist Christian. St. Augustine: The Multimedia Production Centre School of Education/Faculty of Humanities and Education/University of the West Indies, 1999.
- Glazier, Stephen D. Marching the Pilgrims Home: A Study of the Spiritual Baptists of Trinidad. Salem, WI: Sheffield, 1991.
- Gray-Burke, Archbishop Barbara. "A Brochure for Teachers on Spiritual Shouter Religion in Trinidad and Tobago." Posted at <http://www.n2consulting.com/brochure.htm>. Accessed December 1, 2001.
- Hackshaw, John Milton. The Origin of the Christian Religion, the Baptist Faith, the Independents, and Spiritual Baptist Churches. Trinidad: Citadel, 2000.
- Lum, Kenneth Anthony. Praising His Name in the Dance: Spirit Possession in the Spiritual Baptist Faith and Orisha Work in Trinidad, West Indies. New York: Harwood, 2000.

Spiritual Churches (Ghana)

1210

The prophet healing AFRICAN INITIATED CHURCHES (AICs) in Ghana are now popularly known as the “Spirit churches” (Akan: Sunsum Sore). Liberian prophet William Wade Harris (HARRIST CHURCH) preached in western Ghana for only a few weeks, but his influence remained, particularly in the first Spirit church to be formed there: the Church of William Wade Harris and His Twelve Apostles (later the Church of the Twelve Apostles). Harris’s converts, Grace Tani and Kwesi John Nackabah, founded this church in 1918 to realize Harris’s instruction that twelve apostles be appointed in each village to look after his flock. Grace Tani was a traditional priestess when she was converted by Harris and became one of his assistants. When Harris was deported from the Ivory Coast, Tani returned to Ghana, fell ill, and called for Nackabah to pray for her healing. Nackabah was also a diviner until baptized by Harris and given the emblems of authority: a cup for holy water, a calabash with which to beat out evil spirits, a staff cross, and a Bible. Tani, now Madame Harris Grace Tani, remained spiritual leader of the church, with Nackabah administrative and public leader. This dual arrangement was a convenient method used by several AICs to overcome traditional male resistance to female leadership.

The new church followed the Harrist tradition by emphasizing healing through faith in God and the use of holy water. Similarly, the Bible was placed on people’s heads and gourd rattles were used to drive out demons and heal people. Polygyny was permitted, and new members were first ritually purified through washing. The healing was administered in healing “gardens” (communal dwellings), and the holy water was usually kept in basins under a wooden cross in the gardens. Nackabah died in 1947, to be succeeded as bishop by John Hackman. After the death of Hackman in 1957 and Tani in 1958, schism occurred, largely on ethnic lines. The church is now divided into several groups, the most prominent being the Nackabah People, the William Wade Harris Twelve Apostles Church, and the Twelve Apostles Church of Ghana.

The most prominent churches in Ghana are the MUSAMA DISCO CHRISTO CHURCH, the Twelve Apostles Church, and the African Faith Tabernacle, with about 125,000 affiliates each in 1990. The African Faith Tabernacle was founded by Prophet James Kwame Nkansah in 1919, a movement influenced in doctrine and practices by the form of North American fundamentalism from which it originated. The prophet Charles Kobla Wovenu, a former Presbyterian government clerk, commenced the Apostolic Revelation Society in 1939, consisting mainly of Ewe, with a holy city at Tadzewu. He left the Presbyterian church in 1945 when he was told to stop praying for healing.

In 1963 the Eden Revival Church (now known as the F’Eden Church) was commenced by a Presbyterian schoolteacher, Charles Yeboa-Korie (b. 1938), when he received visions that he was to become a healer. He used prayer with accompanying liturgical objects such as Bibles, blessed water, handkerchiefs, olive oil, candles, and incense in order to bring healing from sickness and deliverance from demons. Later, modernization and contact with Western Christianity caused the candles and incense to disappear, and Yeboa began to see his church as forming a bridge between the AICs and the “mainline” churches. In 1970, F’Eden was the first AIC to be admitted to the national Ghanaian Christian Council.

ALADURA CHURCHES from Nigeria (such as the CHRIST APOSTOLIC CHURCH, the CHERUBIM AND SERAPHIM, the CELESTIAL CHURCH OF CHRIST, and the CHURCH OF THE LORD, ALADURA) have come to Ghana and have significant followings. Several of the spiritual churches in Ghana formed an ecumenical cooperative organization in 1962, the Pentecostal Association of Ghana, the name chosen illustrating the self-identity of the “spiritual churches” of Ghana as “Pentecostal.” Another ecumenical organization, called the Council of Independent Churches in Ghana, has also been formed. Observers estimated that in 1996 there were more than three thousand AICs in Ghana.

Allan H. Anderson

Sources:

- Anderson, Allan H. African Reformation: African Initiated Christianity in the Twentieth Century. Trenton, NJ and Asmara, Eritrea: Africa World Press, 2001.
- Baëta, G. C. Prophetism in Ghana: A Study of Some “Spiritual” Churches. London: SCM, 1962.
- Beckman, David M. Eden Revival: Spiritual Churches in Ghana. St. Louis, MO: Concordia, 1975.
- Consultation with African Instituted Churches, Ogere, Nigeria, 9–14 January 1996*. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 1996.

Spiritual Churches (Kenya)

The first AFRICAN INITIATED CHURCHES (AICs) to emerge in Kenya were the “spiritual churches” that began among Luo Anglicans around Lake Victoria. The Roho (Spirit) movement commenced in 1912, first as a popular charismatic movement among young people within the Anglican church. Afterward, its best known founders, Anglican deacon Alfayo Odongo Mango (1884–1934) and his nephew Lawi Obonyo (c. 1911–1934), began a prophetic ministry around 1933, when several remarkable healings and other miracles were reported.

In spite of the opposition by Anglican authorities, Mango installed new rites of baptism and Communion, and his home became a center to which people came and then fanned out. Mango began to prophesy the end of colonial rule and predicted future development in Kenya. The Roho were accused of acts of violence and banned from the local Anglican church. Mango, Lawi, and seven of their followers were murdered by a mob of several hundred, as Mango's house was set alight. The Roho thereafter began a vigorous missionary expansion movement called Dini ya Roho (Religion of the Spirit), emphasizing the power of the Spirit and dressing in white robes with red crosses. The Roho churches say that Mango's sacrificial death atoned for their sins and opened heaven to Africans. Mango is prayed to as "our Saviour," and he has inaugurated a new era of the reign of the Holy Spirit in Africa. These churches enjoin monogamy on their leaders, and they are known for their processions through the streets of towns and villages. The Roho movement now has several schisms and has spread to Tanzania.

A Holy Spirit movement among the Abaluyia emerged after a Pentecostal revival in a FRIENDS/QUAKERS mission in 1927, also called Dini ya Roho. The movement resulted in the Holy Spirit Church of East Africa and the AFRICAN CHURCH OF THE HOLY SPIRIT. All these Roho churches do not have sacraments of baptism and Communion, but they do have rituals for purification before church services, before meals, and before entering and leaving houses. In common with other spiritual and prophetic churches, these churches reject the use of medicines; their members wear white robes with a red cross, turbans, and beards, and remove shoes during services. Church meetings have ecstatic phenomena, especially prophecy, speaking in tongues, the interpretation of dreams, and healing. One of the most prominent spiritual churches in western Kenya is the AFRICAN ISRAEL CHURCH, NINEVEH.

The Arathi (Prophets), also known as Watu wa Mungu (People of God), or, as now better known, Akurinu, is a spiritual church movement among the Gikuyu of central Kenya. It started in a Pentecostal revival in 1922, when manifestations of the Spirit—including speaking in tongues, prophecy, visions, and other ecstatic phenomena—were present, and in which there was an emphasis on prayer and the confession of sins. Joseph Ng'ang'a received a divine call in 1926, and, after a four-year seclusion, began preaching the downfall of European colonialism. His followers wore long white robes and expected a new golden age for the Gikuyu. When the Spirit came on them they roared and shook violently, a practice that continues today. The movement spread throughout the Gikuyu region, and the colonial authorities became increasingly nervous of what they saw as a religious expression of African nationalism. The Akurinu were banned, and Ng'ang'a and five other leaders were arrested.

Later in 1934, Ng'ang'a and two followers were killed by a police contingent. The repression of the movement increased, and many Akurinu were arrested and imprisoned. Others fled to other parts of Kenya, where the movement spread further, setting up communities and living together wherever they went. Schisms began to appear in 1949, and there are now more than thirty Arathi churches in Kenya, nearly all of which use "Holy Ghost" in their church title. Like the Roho churches, they do not baptize with water but practice a "baptism of the Holy Spirit" by a threefold shaking hands and laying on of hands. Despite the similarities with the Roho movement, the Akurinu movement was formed with little or no contact with Western missions or spiritual churches elsewhere. It has consciously attempted to form a radically African type of Christianity, in which the pattern of the mission churches plays no significant role, and that may make the Akurinu churches unique.

Allan H. Anderson

Sources:

- Githieya, Francis K. The Freedom of the Spirit: African Indigenous Churches in Kenya. Atlanta, GA: Scholars Press, 1997.
- Hoehler-Fatton, Cynthia. Women of Fire and Spirit: History, Faith and Gender in Roho Religion in Western Kenya. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1996.
- Rasmussen, Ane Marie Bak. Modern African Spirituality: The Independent Spirit Churches in East Africa, 1902–1976. London: British Academic Press, 1996.

Spiritual Healing Church (Botswana)

The Spiritual Healing Church is properly described as a "child" of the independent church movement in South Africa. It was founded by Jacob Mokgwetsi Motswasele (1900–1980), who was born to Israel and Kiole Motswasele in 1900 in Thaba Nchu, South Africa. Motswasele belonged to the Barolong clan and Seleka tribe and was raised a Methodist. As a young man he migrated to Matsiloje, in the Tati district of Botswana, then known as the Bechuanaland Protectorate. There he began to experience religious dreams, which intensified in 1923 when the Prophet Harry Morolong came to Matsiloje from Thaba Nchu, Bloemfontein, South Africa, to lead a revival mission. Prophet Morolong had been inspired by Walter Matitta (1885–1935), founder of the CHURCH OF MOSHOESHOE in Lesotho. After Morolong's visit, Motswasele and others who continued to gather for prayer experienced the spiritual phenomena of trembling and speaking in tongues.

Between 1930 and 1948, Motswasele was a migrant worker in Johannesburg, South Africa. There he was influenced by Mrs. Christinah Nku, a prophetess of the St. John's Apostolic Faith Mission, and he became a member of the Bantu Methodist church. Upon returning to Matsiloje, he began a ministry of prayer and healing. He was seen as a man who possessed many gifts: healing, "sight" (diagnosing illness, interpreting dreams, foretelling the future), preaching, rainmaking, and simply having power from God. Around that time he became known as the Prophet Mokaleng. In 1952 he founded the Apostolic United Faith Coloured Church, which after numerous other name changes is now known as the Spiritual Healing Church. The first baptism was held April 16, 1953. In 1955 construction on a church building was begun. In 1966, Israel Motswasele (1934–1999) replaced his father, Mokaleng, as head of the Spiritual Healing Church. Mokaleng remained a prophet until his death in 1980. Although Israel was certainly seen as having power from God, his gifts were more administrative.

Forming a new AFRICAN INITIATED CHURCH (AIC) in the 1950s was difficult in the Bechuanaland Protectorate, as both British authorities and local tribal leaders (dikgosi) vigorously sought to restrict such “dissident” and “unwelcome” movements. Although most AIC leaders were harassed and persecuted, Mokaleng was allowed to operate in a low-key manner. Perhaps his relative freedom was due to the fact that Matsiloje was in a remote and generally neglected district, and that local subchiefs were not very powerful. By the late 1950s, Mokaleng was allowed to travel, starting “prayer groups” in other areas. By the late 1960s, and with independence in 1966, restrictions against AICs began to loosen. In 1966 a congregation was formed in Gaborone and by 1968 this congregation was allowed to erect a building—the first AIC building in the capital. Although the Spiritual Healing Church has often been viewed as a member of the “Apostolic” family of AICs from South Africa, when it was allowed to register in 1973, the government requested that the word “Apostolic” be removed from in front of “Spiritual Healing Church.”

At least four unique features characterize the Spiritual Healing Church. First, while most AICs are suspicious of other Christian organizations and churches, Israel Motswasele took the bold step of inviting Mennonite workers into the midst of the church in the mid-1970s to provide Bible and leadership training. Second, this church places uncommon emphasis on the presence and appearance of church buildings. Third, as AICs are often differentiated by unique dress codes, the church uniform robes for the Spiritual Healing Church are blue and white, and they are worn by baptized members only. A final unique feature is that while many AICs crumble or stagger because of poor management, the Spiritual Healing Church is recognized as being uncharacteristically well run and organized.

Part of the reason that the Spiritual Healing Church is well run is that beginning in 1966 with Israel Motswasele and his father, Jacob, roles for administration and prophecy have been separated. In 1984 the administrative head became known as the “archbishop.” Prophets are chosen by the Holy Spirit, who is free to choose family members to this ministry, such as Israel’s brother Joseph. The archbishop is now elected, but charisma and appointment by the predecessor are still very important factors. As with the METHODIST CHURCH in Africa, other roles in the church include, in order of increased authority: preachers, deacons, evangelists, and full ministers. Women’s voices in the church are increasingly being heard, although women are still permitted to participate only on lower levels of the hierarchy, primarily as deacons. There are quarterly meetings for leaders in each of the district conferences, Gaborone, Mahalapye, Francistown, and Maun.

Despite being well organized, the Spiritual Healing Church has not been able to avoid splits and secessions. In 1973 a conflict arose between Mokaleng and Matlho Kapaletswe, the latter seceding to form the Revelation Blessed Peace Church. Other splits have been more peaceful, and the following AICs are better described as “daughter churches”: St. Faith Holy Church, Saints Gallery Church, St. Philip’s Faith Healing Church, and the Lesidi Church.

The Spiritual Healing Church has grown rapidly since the late 1960s, due largely to its healing ministry. The most recent available statistics, from 1990, indicate that there were twenty-six congregations in Botswana with approximately sixteen thousand members, and the numbers are undoubtedly higher today. Growth is especially strong in urban areas, where the church attracts young people who have moved to the city to find employment. There is a branch of the Spiritual Healing Church in Namibia, and some church planting efforts have also been under way in South Africa.

Some practices that characterize the Spiritual Healing Church include prohibitions against tobacco, alcohol, and eating pork, nonscaly fish, and animals that are already dead. The Spiritual Healing Church has its own service book, which it published in 1977, and includes litanies for a variety of services. Although the church generally recognizes and takes seriously traditional African spirits, ancestors, and other forces, it has its own way of dealing with those entities and the crises they bestow. Three festivals are especially important in the Spiritual Healing Church. Easter is the highlight of the year, and every third year all congregations gather in Matsiloje for a celebration that lasts four or five days. In the two intervening years, district churches meet together. On January 25, a memorial service is held for the founder, Mokaleng, marking the date of his death. Each August an all-night festival is held to celebrate the Feast of Unleavened Bread.

Although there is a high reverence for the Scriptures, because of illiteracy, traditional African approaches to authority, and an overall emphasis on pneumatology, there is little perceived need to expand Bible knowledge beyond the limited number of passages that the present leaders are familiar with and commonly preach upon.

The Spiritual Healing Church has its headquarters at Matsiloje, Botswana.

Andy Brubacher Kaethler

Sources:

Amanze, J. N. Botswana Handbook of Churches. Gaborone: Pula, 1994.

- Boschman, Don. "The Conflict between New Religious Movements and the State in the Bechuanaland Protectorate prior to 1945." Th.M. thesis, Harvard Divinity School, 1989.
- Friesen, Rachel Hilty. "A History of the Spiritual Healing Church." M.A. thesis, Toronto School of Theology, 1990.
- . "Origins of the Spiritual Healing Church." In Afro-Christianity at the Grassroots, edited by G. C. Oosthuizen et al., pp. 37–50. Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1994.
- Rantsandu, B. "The Conflict between the Spiritual Healing Church and the Authorities before Independence." In Afro-Christianity at the Grassroots, edited by G. C. Oosthuizen et al., pp. 51–54. Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1994.

Spiritual Human Yoga/ Mankind Enlightenment Love

Spiritual Human Yoga (SHY) was originally known as Universal (and) Human Energy; today it uses the name of Mankind Enlightenment Love (MEL) as well. It was founded by Luong Minh Dang, born in Vietnam in 1942. Data about his biography are controversial. Between 1961 and 1975 he apparently served as an officer in the South Vietnamese Navy; after the Communist takeover, he immigrated to the United States, becoming a U.S. citizen in 1985. He gained rapid recognition as a healer in St. Louis, Missouri, first among Vietnamese immigrants and later outside the Vietnamese community. The movement was established in 1989, and from the United States it expanded into Mexico, Brazil, Western and Eastern Europe, Turkey, Israel, and Thailand.

By 1998 some ten thousand students had reached Level 6, at that time the highest in the movement. According to Dang, his teachings derive from one Dasira Narada (1846–1924), a Sri Lankan master on whom information independent of SHY literature is not available. According to SHY, Narada initiated Dang in Vietnam in 1972, and died in Sri Lanka in 1980. SHY teaches that a Universal Energy permeates the universe, and (having entered through the chakras) flows through the cells of the human body. SHY's techniques claim to enable its followers to control the Universal Energy and to use it for the well-being of humanity in general. SHY students are taught how to direct the Universal Energy toward those who most need it, thus (inter alia) healing the sick. SHY's techniques are introduced as being faster and easier to master than others, such as Reiki, which also involves the flow of a universal energy. Up to Level 5 inclusive, the Universal Energy is transmitted through the practitioner's hands; at higher levels, at which small pyramids are also used to store Energy, transmission is telepathic. Level 7 was introduced at the end of 1999. Since January 2000, Levels 1 to 3 are taught in a single three-day course.

SHY does not have any common religious structures. There are no rituals or rites of passage. Master Dang's teachings, on the other hand, include a spirituality, particularly at Level 4 and higher. This spirituality is eclectic: Dang quotes Franz Anton Mesmer (1734–1815), an early exponent of the Energy so important to the SHY perspective, and Edgar Cayce (1877–1945), whose teachings are spread through the ASSOCIATION FOR RESEARCH AND ENLIGHTENMENT, and he encourages his students to read The Grail Message, written by Abd-ru-shin (Oskar Ernst Bernhardt, 1875–1941), the founder of the GRAIL MOVEMENT. Buddha and Jesus are also revered as spiritual masters, although a certain critique of more traditional religions is inherent in SHY teachings, and Dang certainly believes that his regular contact with the Higher Beings allows him to receive more updated information.

In Europe, Dang has become a target of the anticult crusade, and he was arrested in Belgium in January 1999. After sixty-five days of imprisonment, he was released on bail and allowed to leave the country. Although the Belgian accusations concerned mostly finances, the media tended to stress SHY's most apocalyptic elements. In fact, Dang believes that the twenty-first century will prove to be a great divide in the history of humanity, and he expects crucial events to take place sometime soon. SHY is a millenarian movement in the sense that it anticipates that in the not-too-distant future there will be the advent of a new heaven on Earth, culminating in the final defeat of illness and death itself.

Address:

Spiritual Human Yoga
7321 South Lindbergh Blvd., Ste. 209
St. Louis, MO 63125
<http://www.mel-hq.com/main-en.asp>

Jean-François Mayer, PierLuigi Zoccatelli, and Massimo Introvigne

Sources:

- Mayer, Jean-François. "Healing for the Millennium: Master Dang and Spiritual Human Yoga." Journal of Millennial Studies 2, 2 (Winter 2000). Posted at <http://www.mille.org/publications/winter2000/winter2000.html> or <http://www.bu.edu/mille/publications/winter2000/winter2000.html>.
- Nguyen, Tri-Thien. L'Energie universelle et humaine: Une méthode naturelle de guérison énergétique. Romont, Switzerland: Editions Recto-Verseau, 2001.

Spiritualism

Spiritualism is a nineteenth-century movement that emerged in the United States around the belief that its leaders, called mediums, could contact and speak to the spirits of the deceased. Arising in an atmosphere in which many traditional religious beliefs, especially survival of death, were being questioned, Spiritualism claimed to be able to demonstrate the reality of the survival of death. Crucial to such demonstrations were the mediums, individuals who had the special ability to interact with the spirit world, often while in a trancelike state, and bring meaningful messages to people from deceased relatives and friends.

Spiritualists date their movement from March 31, 1848, when Kate Fox (d. 1892) and her two sisters, Leah and Margaret, began to converse with what they believed was the spirit of a deceased individual who formerly resided in their home. Communication was established through strange rapping noises that they had heard. Once they perceived that the rappings had a rational content, they worked out a code to begin communication.

The interest shown by neighbors in the phenomenon led no lesser a person than newspaper editor Horace Greeley to investigate and report on it. News reports led others to attempt such communications, and within a few years a wide variety of modes of communication were being reported. Spiritualism spread quickly through the 1850s, and parties at which attempts to communicate with spirits were made became a popular form of entertainment. On a more serious level, books advocating the Spiritualist hypothesis—that humans survive death in a spirit existence and that communication through a medium is possible—were published, lecturers advocated Spiritualism, and mediums gave public demonstrations. A more sophisticated direction to the new movement was offered by Andrew Jackson Davis, a prominent trance medium, who wrote extensively about his spirit contacts and the afterlife that he and other Spiritualists referred to as Summerland.

Spiritualism also drew upon earlier demonstrations of Mesmerism, a movement that grew out of the work of French physician Franz Anton Mesmer, who claimed to have found a subtle force underlying the universe that could be used to produce altered states of consciousness. Mesmerism would lead to the discovery of hypnotism in the nineteenth century. Spiritualists claimed that mediums could demonstrate “scientifically” the reality of life after death.

Crucial to the development of Spiritualism in the late nineteenth century was physical mediumship, the claimed ability of some mediums not just to speak to and relay information from the spirits of the deceased but also to produce an array of phenomena. These, such as the levitation of objects, the materialization of spirits, and photography of the dead, appeared to go far beyond the phenomena discovered by mundane science. By the end of the nineteenth century, physical phenomena had become the most spectacular claim undergirding belief in Spiritualism.

In the 1880s, a group of scientists and others organized to investigate the claims being made about Spiritualist phenomena and to speculate on the nature of a universe that allowed such phenomena to exist. The investigations of the Society for Psychical Research in Great Britain and similar societies in Continental Europe and North America, although initially hopeful, eventually drastically reduced the claims of the kinds of psychic phenomena for which there was some modicum of evidence. Psychical researchers almost completely destroyed the claims of physical phenomena, the great majority of which rested upon fraud. Through the twentieth century, parapsychology, a new approach to psychic phenomena centered upon laboratory research, replaced psychical research, which had focused its attention upon the observation of mediums and psychics.

In the United States, the Spiritualist movement was given some structure by the organization of camp meetings, popularly modeled on the camp meetings being perpetuated among Evangelical Protestants and associations of spiritualists at the state level. It grew as a secular movement based around the demonstration of phenomena, but it developed a religious dimension as those convinced of the truth of the phenomena began to speculate on the nature of reality in light of the afterlife.

Through the last decades of the twentieth century, three factions appeared. One group saw Spiritualism as a secular movement limited to the production of demonstrable phenomena. A second group saw it as a religious group based upon the ongoing contact with the spirits of the deceased (and other spiritual beings such as angels) and the information about the afterlife derived from such contact. This second group was divided over Spiritualism's relation to traditional Christianity. The larger groups saw Spiritualism's differences with Christianity, while a smaller group attempted to interpret Spiritualism as a Christian movement. In the 1890s, the first attempt to organize a national Spiritualist denomination resulted in the 1893 formation of the National Spiritualist Association, later renamed the NATIONAL SPIRITUALIST ASSOCIATION OF CHURCHES.

Spiritualism spread to England in the 1860s and soon thereafter to Continental Europe. In England a spectrum of Spiritualist organizations emerged, including the Spiritualist Association of Great Britain and the London Spiritualist Alliance. In the twentieth century, the Greater World Christian Spiritualist League and the CHURCH OF THE WHITE EAGLE LODGE joined the community as significant organizations. As it developed in France, Spiritualism found a popular leader in the person of Allan Kardec (1804–1869). From France the movement was exported to South America, where it found particular success in Brazil. Kardec was an advocate of reincarnation, and his teachings, known as SPIRITISM, were alienated from Christianity. They found expression in the Federação Espírita Brasileira, based in Brazil.

In America, Spiritualism spread through the 1920s, but by midcentury it began to decline under criticism of Spiritualist phenomena and in the face of competition from a growing esoteric community. Always considered a fringe element in the religious community in America, it became more established in Great Britain, especially after repeal of the archaic Witchcraft Laws in the 1950s that had occasionally been used to charge mediums with fraud. It enjoys its greatest success today in Brazil.

Although the emphasis of Spiritualism was always spirit contact for the purpose of demonstrating life after death, another phenomenon that in the late twentieth century came to be known as channeling also had a role in the Spiritualist community. Some individual spiritualists, including many mediums, made contact with what were considered wiser and more evolved spirit beings not particularly connected with the families of those who came to the Spiritualist demonstrations. These evolved beings talked of the nature of the afterlife and expounded on a wide range of philosophical and theological concepts. The teachings of such spiritual beings were later collected and published. Given the widely divergent opinions expressed by the entities who spoke in channeled material, such channelings would occasionally be the basis of a new separate movement, such as the UNIVERSAL FAITHISTS OF KOSMON, the GRAIL MOVEMENT, or UNIVERSAL LIFE. In the late twentieth century, channeling became a prominent part of the NEW AGE MOVEMENT.

Sources:

- Doyle, Arthur Conan. The History of Spiritualism. 2 vols. London: Cassell, 1926.
- Gauld, Alan. Mediumship and Survival: A Century of Investigation. London: Heineman, 1982.
- Kerr, Howard. Mediums, Spirit Rappers, and Roaring Radicals. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1972.
- Melton, J. Gordon. Encyclopedia of Occultism and Parapsychology. 5th ed. Detroit, MI: Gale Research, 2001.
- Nelson, Geoffrey K. Spiritualism and Society. New York: Schocken, 1969.

Sri Aurobindo Ashram

The Sri Aurobindo Ashram (SAA) in Pondicherry (Tamil Nadu, South India) derived both from the presence and ideas of Aurobindo Ghose (1872–1950) since 1910 and from the presence and work of the Mother (Mira Richard, 1878–1973) since 1920. Sri Aurobindo was born in Calcutta and educated in Great Britain, and after his return to India in 1893, he was involved with the Indian independence movement. Because of those activities he was jailed for a year in 1908. While in prison he had a religious experience and, according to the records, achieved a state of samadhi (deep contemplation) through the practice of yoga. Upon his release, he went to Pondicherry. There he developed a system inspired by the Indian philosophies of Samkhya, Yoga, Vedanta, and Tantra, to which he added some integrating elements of Western philosophies. He called his system Integral Yoga.

In November 1926, Aurobindo withdrew to his room in order to intensify his inner work. The whole material and spiritual management of the ashram devolved on the Mother. This was the desire of the disciples, then about twenty-five in number, who had gathered around Aurobindo to practice yoga under his direction. The ashram members devoted their lives to the ideal of Integral Yoga, the spiritual philosophy and practice of Aurobindo, which was published in a huge number of articles and books. The central idea is that of evolution, directed both at the evolution of nature/matter, society, and individuals toward their spiritual perfection and realization of the divine consciousness and at the devolution of the spirit in order to manifest the Divine in the world and to create a divine life in matter, society, and man. There is no need for asceticism or retreat from the world, and meditation alone is not enough: Knowledge as well as determination and power of action and creation are also necessary for spiritual growth.

The organization of the SAA provided various facilities for members to fulfill this ideal, including small-scale industries, trade, sports, education, libraries, and studios for dance, music, painting, and so forth. The core of the SAA is the Sri Aurobindo International Centre of Education, established in 1951 and renamed in 1959. In 1960 the Mother set up the Sri Aurobindo Society (SAS) for the realization of harmony in the world. The SAS was also necessary for managing the SAA, including its funds. The SAA enjoys UNESCO support. In 1968 the international city of Auroville came into existence as a place where the Divine could be realized in the physical. People from all over the world and from many parts of India live and work there, engaged in ecology, city planning, education, and culture. The spiritual center of Auroville is a large structure, the Matrimandir. In September 2001, some 1,680 Aurovillians lived in the city, coming mainly from India, France, and Germany.

There have always been controversies among the SAA, SAS, and Auroville over understanding and living the principles and conflicting ideas of individual freedom and self-realization, as well as over the need for social cooperation requiring structure and organization, administration, and leadership. In 1980 the Indian government took over the responsibility of Auroville; the SAA now is run by the SAA Trust.

Striving for the divine consciousness is regarded to be beyond religious, national, or racial boundaries. Although no missionary work is carried out in India or abroad, a number of branches were established in India as well as in France, the United States, Canada, Germany, Spain, Italy, the Netherlands, Sweden, Switzerland, and Great Britain. These branches publish the works of Aurobindo and the Mother, and organize seminars and conferences to disseminate the idea of human unity through the practice of Integral Yoga. The SAA and Auroville organize and participate in international projects.

Address:

Sri Aurobindo Society
 c/o Bureau Central
 3 Rangapillai Street
 Pondicherry 605001
 Tamil Nadu
 India
<http://www.sriurobindoashram.org>
<http://www.auroville.org>

Melitta Waligora

Sources:

- Ghose, Aurobindo. The Life Divine. Pondicherry: Sri Aurobindo Ashram, 1973.
- . Synthesis of Yoga. Pondicherry: Sri Aurobindo Ashram, 1972.
- Kluback, W. Sri Aurobindo Ghose: The Dweller in the Lands of Silence. New York: Peter Lang, 2001.
- McDermott, Robert, ed. Six Pillars: Introductions to the Major Works of Sri Aurobindo. Chambersburg, PA: Wilson, 1974.
- Minor, Robert N. The Religious, the Spiritual, and the Secular: Auroville and Secular India. Albany: State University of New York Press, 1998.

Sri Chinmoy Centers International

Sri Chinmoy (b. August 27, 1931) is founder and leader of an international religious movement that teaches physical and spiritual peace and bliss through exercise and meditation. Born Chinmoy Kumar Ghose in what is now Bangladesh, he was placed in the ashram of Sri Aurobindo in Pondicherry when he was orphaned at the age of twelve. He spent twenty years at the ashram, achieving great states of enlightenment. Sri Chinmoy came to New York City in 1964, where he began organizing a following throughout the United States, including Chicago, Seattle, and Washington, D.C. He currently resides in Jamaica, New York.

Sri Chinmoy advocates a method of guru devotion as the fastest means by which one can attain spiritual progress toward realization of what he calls the Supreme (that is, God). Guru devotion requires the guru to formally accept and initiate the disciple, while the disciple must serve the guru, make the guru's needs and desires his or her own, and obey the guru implicitly. By meditating on the guru or on his image, the disciple is actually serving the Supreme that resides in the guru. Sri Chinmoy calls this the path of love, devotion, and surrender, by which the disciple realizes the Supreme through the grace of the guru.

In 1976, Sri Chinmoy inaugurated a series of marathon and endurance races, and in 1986 established the Sri Chinmoy Oneness–Home Peace Run to publicize the need for world peace and to promote fitness as a spiritual goal.

To date, more than one million runners from eighty countries have passed the peace torch on all seven continents in the biannual race. At times the peace runs have raised controversy, when American public school children were encouraged by local school boards to participate in races sponsored by a Hindu group. The athletic guru, who continues to play tennis daily, has received ridicule for his claim to raise 7,063.75 pounds in a one-arm overhead lift. He says that he has performed other miraculous feats, such as lifting entire football teams, elephants, or one-ton pickup trucks on a single platform. Despite such claims, the guru is nevertheless well respected for his peace efforts by world leaders such as Mikhail Gorbachev and Nelson Mandela. He conducts twice-weekly prayer and meditation sessions for staff at the UN Headquarters in New York, and has performed hundreds of concerts in behalf of world peace.

Although Sri Chinmoy does not charge for his services as guru, a network of “Divine Enterprises of the Sri Chinmoy Centers” sells numerous items produced by the guru himself, including paintings, hundreds of books, and tapes and CDs of his flute-, esraj- and cello-playing, as well as his devotional songs. The enterprises include restaurants, boutiques, health food stores, printing shops, flower shops, and sporting goods stores. Sri Chinmoy personally appoints leaders to approximately eighty local Sri Chinmoy Centers in Europe, the United Kingdom, the United States, and Australia-New Zealand. Membership is estimated at five thousand worldwide.

Address:

P.O. Box 32433
 Jamaica, NY 11432
<http://www.peacerun.com/>

Rebecca Moore

Sources:

- Madhuri [Nancy Elizabeth Sands]. The Life of Sri Chinmoy. Jamaica, NY: Sri Chinmoy Lighthouse, 1972.
- Sri Chinmoy. The Master and the Disciple: Insights into the Guru-Disciple Relationship. Jamaica, NY: Aum, 1985.
- . The Wisdom of Sri Chinmoy. San Diego: Blue Dove, 2000.

Sri Lanka

Sri Lanka (until 1972, Ceylon) is a multiethnic, multireligious, and multilingual (Sinhalese, Tamil, and English) country of 18.1 million people (as of 1995). At a rough estimate, there are 74 percent Sinhalese (low-country and Kandyan) and 18 percent Tamils (both Lankan and Indian). Important minorities are Moors, Malays, and Burghers (of mixed origin: Dutch, British, Ceylonese). On the basis of the 1981 census (total population, 14.8 million), religious populations are as follows: (Theravada) Buddhists, 10.3 million; Hindus, 2.3 million; Christians, 1.1 million; Muslims, 1.1 million; others faiths, 8,300. There is a close association between Buddhism and Sinhalese, and Hinduism and Tamils; Sinhalese, Tamils, and Burghers are Christians (Catholics and diverse Protestant groups); Moors and Malays are Muslims.

Buddhism was transferred to Lanka by Mahinda (son of Aśoka) in the time of King Devānampiya Tissa (c. 250–210 B.C.E.). The Sinhalese tradition (Mahāvamsa—that is, The Great Chronicle) sees in the events

The sacred Sri Maha Bodhi Tree in Anuradhapura, Sri Lanka (B. Gadsby/TRIP)

Status of religions in Sri Lanka, 2000-2050

Followers	2000		2025	2050
	total	% rate
Buddhists	12,879,000	68.4 1.01	15,922,000	17,092,000
Hindus	2,124,000	11.3 0.61	2,500,000	2,700,000
Christians	1,764,000	9.4 1.14	2,225,000	2,485,000
Roman Catholics	1,260,000	6.7 0.74	1,520,000	1,620,000
Independents	331,000	1.8 2.85	480,000	600,000
Protestants	102,000	0.5 1.04	135,000	160,000
Muslims	1,695,000	9.0 1.09	2,200,000	2,500,000
Nonreligious	340,000	1.8 1.97	633,000	1,000,000
Atheists	90,900	0.5 1.29	140,000	200,000
Sikhs	47,100	0.3 1.03	70,000	95,000
Baha'is	15,500	0.1 1.77	30,000	50,000
Zoroastrians	2,300	0.0 1.23	3,500	4,900
Neoreligionists	920	0.0 1.40	1,500	3,000
Chinese folk-religionists	750	0.0 0.73	1,200	2,000
Shintoists	150	0.0 2.32	350	500
Ethnoreligionists	150	0.0 -0.58	120	100
Total population	18,827,000	100.0 1.00	23,547,000	25,923,000

(the rejection of South Indian invaders) of the reign of King Dutthagāmani (161–137 B.C.E.) a confirmation of an intimate connection between national aspirations and the Buddhist cause, a tendency that revived in history several times. For several reasons, Lanka became important for Theravāda Buddhism: In the Alu-Vihāra (3 kilometers from Mātālē) the Pali-Canon was written down for the first time (in 80 B.C.E.); in the fifth century, the great commentator Buddhaghosa composed highly important works (Visuddhimagga) that later became normans of Theravāda Orthodoxy. Different Buddhist schools struggled to gain predominance in Lanka, although only King Parākramabāhu I (1153–1186) established the Mahāvihāra tradition (of Buddhaghosa) as

At a shrine in Sri Lanka, offerings are left at the feet of a small Buddha figure. (Martin Baumann)

“orthodox.” In this regard Sinhalese Buddhism became standard for all South Asian Buddhism.

In addition to (Hinduistic) influences from India, which distracted Lankan Buddhists for centuries, Muslim traders settled down along the coasts of Lanka (but never became really influential). In the early sixteenth century the Portuguese started Catholic missionary work in Lanka. Following colonial powers (Dutch 1640, British 1798–1956) promoted their preferred religion. In British times the Anglicans (now included in the CHURCH OF SRI LANKA, a union of several Protestant churches) and the METHODIST CHURCH, SRI LANKA gained ground. But the ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH has continued to be the largest Christian community.

Traditional Buddhism regained strength by the import of new ordination lines from Thailand (Siyam-Nikāya, 1753) and Burma (Amarapura-Nikāya, 1803; Rāmaññna-Nikāya, 1865). These constitute the Mahāsaṅgha (established order of monks) up to today. In the late nineteenth century a “new” Buddhism developed, which is to a certain extent the result of the encounter and confrontation with Protestantism. Scholars call this form either “Protestant Buddhism” or “Buddhist Modernism.” A mythic starting point of this development is one of the debates between low-land Buddhists and Anglicans/Methodists in Panadura (1873). Influenced by a publication of this famous debate, the THEOSOPHICAL SOCIETY (ADYAR) (through its president Henry S. Olcott) started to assist the “new” Buddhists in their emancipatory struggle. One of the most influential Buddhist figures in recent times, the anagārika Dharmapāla (1864–1933), founder of the MAHA BODHI SOCIETY, worked in that fashion.

Heinz Muermel

Sources:

Bechert, Heinz. Buddhismus, Staat und Gesellschaft in den Ländern des Theravada-Buddhismus. Bd. 1: Allgemeines und Ceylon. Frankfurt: Alfred Metzner Verlag, 1966. Reprint, Göttingen, 1999.

- Gombrich, Richard, and Gananth Obeyesekere. Buddhism Transformed: Religious Change in Sri Lanka. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1988.
- Manogaram, Chelvadurai, and Bryan Pfaffenberger, eds. The Sri Lankan Tamils: Ethnicity and Identity. Boulder, CO: Westview, 1994.
- Seneviratne, H. L. The Work of Kings: The New Buddhism in Sri Lanka. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1999.
- Smith, Bardwell L., ed. Religion and Legitimation of Power in Sri Lanka. Chambersburg: ANIMA, 1978.
- Wickremeratne, Ananda. Buddhism and Ethnicity in Sri Lanka: A Historical Analysis. Kandy, Sri Lanka: International Centre for Ethnic Studies, 1995.

Sri Lanka, Hinduism in

In Sri Lanka there are two main representations of Hinduism: the Sri Lankan Tamil Hindus, who live mainly in the northern and eastern provinces, and the Indian Tamil Hindus, who live in the central highland on the island, especially in the area around Kandy and Nuwara Eliya. The Indian Tamil Hindus are mostly low-caste people. They came to the island in the nineteenth century from Tamil Nadu, imported by the British to work on their tea, coffee, and rubber plantations. The Sri Lankan Tamil Hindus are mostly from farming and fishing castes. They trace their roots back to the kingdoms prior to the time when King Elara (king of the damilas) was defeated by Dutthagamani (161–137 B.C.E.)—the beginning of a Buddhist era as described in the Sinhalese chronicle Mahavamsa, written in the sixth century C.E. The Tamil Hindus count, in all, 2.3 million—or around 13 percent of the Sri Lankan population of 18.1 million, according to the census of 1995. (The remaining Tamils, some 26 percent, are either Muslims or Christians.)

Both groups are mostly Saivites, with a strong affiliation to the worship of Shakti and Siva's two sons, Ganesha (Pillaiyar or Vinayakar in Tamil) and Karttikeya (Murugan in Tamil). Both groups practice a similar form of TAMIL SHIVAISM rooted in the Saiva Siddhanta tradition, a tradition that became vitally important in Tamil Nadu from around the seventh century and that is based on the Smriti collection Tirumurai and the twenty-eight Agamas considered as being shruti texts. The Tirumurai, a collection of twelve books written by the sixty-three bhakti poets called the Nayanmars, presents a strong bhakti devotion to Siva and his manifestations. The Agamas describe the practice of the religion, including descriptions of how to practice yoga, when to conduct the daily puja (worship) and festivals, descriptions of how to install the god statues in the temples according to the four points of the compass, and the like. The Agamas also have an implicit theology with a monistic ontology, in which creation is seen as the radiations of God (Siva), and in which mukti, or release from samsara (cycle of rebirth), is described as being identical to God, not as being a part of God. There will always be a distinct difference between Siva and the devotees.

Detail of Hindu temple in Sri Lanka (Corel)

The combination of this theology and the bhakti devotion is manifested in the temple worship, where the way of attaining mukti is possible through the darshanas (sights) of God, in which Siva's arul-shakti (the energy of grace) will be shown for the devotee who is clean in body and mind.

In spite of these similarities, the two groups do not seem to go to the same temples for puja, even if they live in the same neighborhood (exceptions are pilgrimage sites such as Kataragama or Kathiramam in Tamil—the most important pilgrimage site on the island after the troubles started between Hindus and Buddhists in Jaffna). This is not only an issue of caste; it is also caused by differences in history and worship.

The reformist Arumuga Navalar (1829–1879) plays an especially important role in Sri Lankan Tamil Hinduism. He emphasized the difference between the secular sphere and the religious sphere, a distinction that made him emphasize the religious institution as the basis for the religious life, and as the only place in which one can cope with the limits of human behavior. Here, in the right atmosphere, human desires will be kept under control, because the puja will engage the body, mind, and voice. This distinction has two major outcomes visible in the Sri Lankan Tamil Hinduism of today: (1) an awareness of orthopraxis, when it comes to temple worship; and (2) an adjustment of tradition, when it comes to the secular working sphere.

Since the beginning of the 1980s, when the violent conflict between the Sinhalese and the Tamils escalated, Tamils fled the island to South India and the West. There are currently some 150,000 Tamils in Canada and some 200,000 in Europe living as refugees. Wherever they settle, they have established their temples and sociocultural institutions to maintain their tradition.

Marianne Q. Fibiger

Sources:

- Carter, John Ross, ed. Religiousness in Sri Lanka. Colombo, Sri Lanka: Marga Institute, 1979.
- Dubey, Ravi Kant. Indo-Sri Lankan Relations: With Special Reference to the Tamil Problem. New Delhi: Deep and Deep, 1989.
- Manogaram, Chelvadurai, and Bryan Pfaffenberger, eds. The Sri Lankan Tamils: Ethnicity and Identity. Boulder, CO: Westview, 1994.
- "Religions in the History of Yalppanam." Lanka 5 (December 1990): 3–223.

Stella Maris Gnostic Church

The Stella Maris Gnostic Church, one of a number of South American Gnostic sect groups, emerged from obscurity in the summer of 1999, when reports circulated that its members had disappeared into the mountains, ready to commit suicide. The story later proved to be a hoax.

Modern GNOSTICISM emerged in nineteenth-century Europe as part of the occult milieu. It was then taken to South America early in the twentieth century by German teacher Arnoldo Krumm-Heller (1876–1949), who had been given authority to carry the movement to Latin America at a conference in Germany in 1907. At about the same time, he was also consecrated as a bishop in the GNOSTIC CATHOLIC CHURCH by H. C. Peithman. The Stella Maris Gnostic Church was founded in 1989 by Rodolfo Perez and former members of the Universal Christian Gnostic Movement. It is headquartered in Cartagena, Colombia.

In June 1999, the mother of one of the church's members complained about the group and asked the local authorities to assist her in removing her daughter from it. They did not feel it was their responsibility to act. A month later, the group left Cartagena for its annual retreat. The day after the small group (with fewer than one hundred members) departed, Colombian papers carried stories that the group had headed for the Sierra Nevada mountains, where they expected to meet a space ship that would take them to another world. The Sierra Nevada has been the focus of UFO reports, and many flying saucer buffs believe it to be a place where direct contact with extraterrestrials is possible.

The story was picked up by newspapers internationally and tied to memories of the suicide of the members of the Heaven's Gate group. However, the next day, Perez and several members of the group went on Colombian television to point out their lack of interest in UFOs. They emphasized that they would return home when their retreat was over. The retreat was not taking place in flying saucer country, but San Pedro, Colombia. The media had been routinely informed of the facts concerning the retreat, but the leading Colombian daily, El Tiempo, ran the initial story without referring to the facts that they had at hand.

The story of the group press conference was carried by the Colombian media, but no follow-up appeared in the international media for almost a year. In the spring of 2000, however, an obscure British magazine, Fortean Times, finally printed the story of the hoax in its May issue. It was also posted on the Internet. Meanwhile, the Stella Maris Gnostic Church returned to its routine life in Cartagena.

Sources:

- Murdie, Alan. "The Stella Maris Cult." Fortean Times 133 (May 2000): 66.
- . "UFOs, Strange Lights, and Meteorites in Columbia." Posted at <http://www.xmo85.dial.pipex.com/colombia.htm>. Accessed May 10, 2000.

Sthanakavasi Jain Tradition

The origins of the Sthanakavasi (lit. hall-dweller) Svetambara Jain tradition can be traced to the Gujarati Jain reformer Lonka Sah, Lunka or Lumpaka (c. 1415–1489), who protested against the laxity of the contemporary Tapagaccha Murtipujak Svetambara Jain mendicants, because their conduct did not match the prescriptions of the oldest canonical texts. Lonka was the first layman who started a new religious movement within the Jain tradition. Because he copied manuscripts for Jain monks, he had unique access to the Jain scriptures and noticed that the oldest Svetambara scriptures do not mention the practice of merit-making by giving money as religious gifts (dana) for the construction of temples, nor the performance of image-worship (murti-puja) or similar ostentatious rituals involving the breaking of flowers and other acts of violence. On the contrary, the scriptures prescribed possessionlessness and strict asceticism: nonviolence, self-restraint, and penance. Lonka, therefore, rejected both image-worship and the authority of fourteen (or fifteen) of the forty-five canonical texts that contain references to it. He also denounced the legitimacy of the existing image-worshipping monastic orders and started to live as an uninitiated ascetic, following the oldest textual prescriptions himself.

The surviving original sources for Lonka's biography and doctrine are not entirely reliable. But most texts agree that, in contrast to common practice, Lonka accepted alms from all castes but no money, that he did not possess a mouthmask (mukhavastrika), a stick (danda), or a broom (rajoharana), and that he practiced neither image-worship nor the Jain rites of purification (pratikramana and posadha), which also involved elements of image-worship. Lonka quickly gained a large following among the Jains in Gujarat. Although he did not create a monastic order himself, he laid down instructions for his followers. The original texts were thought to be lost until 1964, when D. D. Malvaniya claimed to have rediscovered them in the L. D. Institute library in Ahmedabad in the form of two anonymously written manuscripts: Lunka Na Saddahiya Ane Karya Athavan Bolno and Lunka Na Hundi.

The Lonkagaccha mendicant tradition was formed by Lonka's first disciple, Bhana, who apparently initiated himself and forty-five followers of Lonka's doctrine sometime between 1471 and 1476 by accepting the five great vows of the Jain ascetics (mahavrata). In the first decades of the sixteenth century the Lonkagaccha split into several more or less organized regional or revisionist Lonkagaccha groups, most of which comprised lay-ascetics, or yatis, who did not accept all of the five great vows or reverted to image-worship. In the mid-sixteenth century, the Lonka tradition was split into more than thirteen independent branches, which further divided into separate subgroups. Until the demise of the Lonkagacch yatis in the nineteenth and twentieth centuries, only four branches survived: the Lahauri Lonkagaccha (founded c. 1504); the Nagauri Lonkagaccha (c. 1528); the Gujarati Lonkagaccha Mota Paks (Varsinha Paks, or Kesav Paks) (c. 1555); and the Gujarati Lonkagaccha Nana Paks (Kumvar Paks) (c. 1555).

In protest against the renaissance of image-worship and the renewed laxity of conduct of most Lonkagaccha (lay) ascetics, five reformers—the so-called panca muni—split off from the Kesav Paks, the Kumvar Paks, and the Ekal Patriya Panth (a lay movement of unknown origin) in the early sixteenth century and founded the principal Sthanakavasi mendicant traditions, which still exist today. The five traditions share three doctrinal characteristics: (1) rejection of image-worship, (2) strict ascetic conduct in accordance with the prescriptions in the thirty-two accepted Jain scriptures, and (3) compulsory use of a mouthmask to prevent the swallowing of living beings such as insects and dust. The square white mouthmask is now the principal external feature of all Sthanakavasi mendicants (the Terapanth Svetambara mendicants use a rectangular blue mask). Sthanakavasi laity generally reject material forms of worship (dravya) and practice only asceticism (tapas) and inner forms of worship (bhava), such as meditation (dhyana) and study (svadhyaya). Instead of images, they venerate the mendicants as living symbols of the Jain ideals.

They also practice daya dharma, the religious work of compassionate help (dana) for animals and human beings, in order to accumulate merit (punya) and thus to advance on the path of salvation. These three typical forms of ritual practice are known under the titles guna puja, deva guru, and dana-daya. In 1760, Muni Bhikhan, the founder of the TERAPANATH SVETAMBARA JAIN TRADITION, severed himself from the Dharmadasa Sthanakavasi tradition because he rejected merit-making as such, in favor of a purely salvation-oriented ascetic style of life.

The Sthanakavasi Jain tradition is presently divided into twenty-six mendicant orders whose origins can be traced to one or more of the five principal reformers (kriya uddhara) of the aniconic Jain tradition, although the available sources are inconsistent: (1) Jivaraja has been made responsible for all crucial innovations of the Sthanakavasi tradition, though some sources give priority to Lava. He lived sometime between 1524 and 1641 (probably having been born in Surat) and separated himself from the Kumvar Paks in 1551, 1609, or 1629. Apparently it was he who selected the thirty-two Svetambara scriptures that are now accepted by all Sthanakavasis (possibly by adding the Vyavaharasutra or the Avasyakasutra or both to Lonka's list, but there is no compelling evidence), and who introduced the mouthmask (muhapatti), the rajoharan, and other paraphernalia used by present-day Sthanakavasi mendicants. (2) Dharmasimha (1599–1671) severed himself from the Kumvar Paks in 1628, 1635, or 1644 in Dariyapuri in Ahmedabad and founded the Ath Koti (eight class) tradition. He was a scholar and wrote vernacular commentaries (tabbo) on the Prakrit Jain scriptures. He introduced a special pratikramana rite for his lay followers and taught that there is no accidental death, because the lifespan of a living being is determined by its own karma. (3) Lava or Lavji Rsi (c. 1609–1659), the founder of the Dhundhiya (seeker) tradition, also known under the name Rsi Sampraday, was born in Surat and split from the Kesav Paks in 1637, 1648, 1653–1655, or 1657. (4) The founder of the Baistola (twenty-two schools) tradition, Dharmadasa (1645–1703) from Ahmedabad, was originally a member of the Ekal Patriya Panth, but under the influence of Lava and Dharmasimha founded his own tradition in 1660 through self-initiation. (5) Hara, the ancestor of the Sadhumargi tradition (a branch of the extinct Kota Sampradaya), separated himself from the Kumvar Paks in 1668 or 1728.

The name sthanaka-vasi (hall-dwellers), though in evidence in a text written in 1630, was not regularly used as a common designation for all five traditions until the unification movement of the early twentieth century. Doctrinally, only Dharmasimha's Ath Koti tradition in Gujarat differs significantly from the other four schools, which disagree only on minor points of philosophy and ritual. The Sthanakavasi traditions as a whole nowadays are divided along regional lines between the Gujarati and the non-Gujarati (North Indian) traditions. The non-Gujarati traditions are further subdivided into those who joined the reformist and centrally organized Sramanasangha, which was founded in 1952 in Sadari in Rajasthan in a merely partially successful attempt to unite all Sthanakavasi groups, and those who remained outside or left the Sramanasangha. Both the Sramanasangha and the independent traditions include mendicant orders that derive from four of the five main Sthanakavasi traditions (the exception is the Ath Koti tradition), which were split into some thirty-three different organized groups at the beginning of the twentieth century. Although they are nominally under the command of one single acarya whose consent is essential for all initiations and excommunications (at present, Acarya Dr. Sivmuni), the original twenty-two founding traditions of the Sramanasangha continue to operate within its framework more or less independently.

Some monastic orders never joined the Sramanasangha, among them all Gujarati Sthanakavasi traditions, the Jnanagaccha of the Dharmadasa Ramratna tradition (founded by Jnanacandra, Ujjain 1732), and the Nanagaccha of the Jivaraja tradition (Nanakram, eighteenth century). Because of perpetual discord between the founding traditions, many disappointed senior ascetics left the Sramanasangha again and established their own independent groups: Muni Hagamilal, and the modernist Arhat Sangha (Susilkumar 1926–1994, New Jersey, 1974) of the Jivaraja tradition; the Mayaram Sampradaya (Mayaram, 1854–1912) of the northern Lava tradition; Acarya Nanalal of the Hara Sadhumargi tradition (Hukmicand, early nineteenth century); and four groups of the Dharmadasa tradition: the Jaymalgaccha (Jaymal, 1708–1796; Rajasthan, 1748 or 1783); the Ratnavams (Ratnacandra, Rajasthan, 1796); the Dharmadasa Sampradaya (Umesmuni, late twentieth century); and Upadhyay Amarmuni (1901–1992), the inspirational force behind the modern Virayatan order, which was founded by Sadhvi Candana in Ragriha, 1974.

None of the Gujarati groups joined the Sramanasangha, which is essentially a Hindi-speaking order. With the exception of the Khambhat Sampradaya (Lava, Ahmedabad, 1648) and the three Ath Koti traditions—the Dariyapuri Ath Koti Sampradaya (Dharmasimha, Ahmedabad, 1628); the Kacch Ath Koti Mota Paks (Krsna, originally Dharmadasa Sampraday, Kacch 1715–1782); and the Kacch Ath Koti Nana Paks (Jasraj, Kacch, 1786)—the majority of the independent Sthanakavasi traditions in Gujarat descend from Mulacandra (1651–1725), one of Dharmadasa's twenty-two leading monks. Mulacandra's main disciples formed separate local groups after a dispute at a mendicant assembly in 1788 in Limbdi. Not all of the emerging Gujarati Dharmadasa traditions survived, and some of them split further into subgroups labeled great (mota) and small (nana). The seven principal orders of today are all named after the place of origin that is also their main seat: Limbdi Cha Koti Mota Paks (founded by Ajramar, Limbdi, 1788); Limbdi Cha Koti Nana Paks (Hemcand and Gopal, Limbdi, 1859); Gondal Mota Paks (Dungarsi, Gondal, 1788); Gondal Sanghani (Ganga Svami, Gondal, 1794); Barvada (Mota Kahan, Barvada, 1788); Botad (Jasa, Botad, c. 1850); and Sayala (Naga, Sayla, 1772–1812). They are not led by an elected administrator cum teacher (acarya), like the independent traditions outside Gujarat, but by the male ascetic with the highest monastic age, or diksa paryaya, who may or may not be called acarya. His main decisions have to agree with those of the often hereditary leader (sanghapati) of the lay community.

The overall number of Sthanakavasi mendicants is much higher than generally assumed. In 1999 there were 3,223 mendicants, 533 sadhus, and 2,690 sadhvis—that is, 27.5 percent of all Jain mendicants, distributed in roughly equal proportions among the Sramanasangha (1,096), twelve Independent traditions (967), and the thirteen Gujarati traditions (1,160). The nationwide umbrella organization of the Sthanakavasi laity, the All India Svetambara Sthanakavasi Jain Conference, the motivating force behind the movement toward unity, was founded in 1906 in Morvi in Gujarat, but it split in 1984 into two independent organizations because of the irreconcilable differences in ritual, culture, and language between Gujarati- and Hindi-speaking Sthanakavasi traditions.

Addresses:

Akhil Bharatvarsitya Svetambara Sthanakavasi
Jain Conference (Hindi)

Jain Bhavan
12 Sahid Bhagat Singh Marg
New Delhi 101001
India

Akhil Bharatvarsitya Svetambara Sthanakavasi Jain Conference (Gujarati)
1 Vijay Vallabh Cauk
Paydhuni
Mumbai 400 002
India

Peter Flügel

Sources:

- Flügel, Peter. "Protestantische und Post-Protestantische Jain Reformbewegungen: Zur Geschichte und Organisation der Sthanakavasi I." Berliner Indologische Studien 13–14 (2000): 37–103.
- . "Protestantische und Post-Protestantische Jain Reformbewegungen: Zur Geschichte und Organisation der Sthanakavasi II." Berliner Indologische Studien 15–16 (2002).
- Hastimal, Acarya. Jain Dharma Ka Maulik Itihas. Vol. 4. Jaypur: Jain Itihas Samiti, 1987, 1995.
- Hastimal, Acarya, comp. Pattavali Prabandh Sangraha. Edited by Narendra Bhanawat. Jaypur: Jain Itihas Nirman Samiti, 1968.
- Jnanasundara, Muni. Srimad Laumkasah. Phalodi: Sri Jnana Puspamala, 1936.
- Malvaniya, D. "Lokasah Aur Unki Vicar-Dhara." In Gurudev Sri Ratna Muni Smrti-Granth, edited by Vijay Muni Sastri and Harisankar Sarma, pp. 365–383. Agra: Gurudev Smrti Granth Prakasak Samiti, 1964.
- Manilal, Muni. Sri Jaindharmano Pracin Sanksipt Itihas Ane Prabhu Vir Pattavali. Amadavad: Jivanlal Chaganlal Sanghvi, 1934.

Subud

Subud was founded in Indonesia around the late 1920s by a Javanese Muslim named Muhammad Subuh Sumohadiwidjojo (1901–1987), whose followers call him "Bapak," an Indonesian term of respect and affection meaning "father." From the age of about sixteen, Muhammad Subuh received a number of spiritual messages. He worked as a bookkeeper and studied with several spiritual masters (kiai) before receiving the latihan kejiwaan, the spiritual exercise of Subud, as a revelation in 1925. Around 1933 some of Bapak's friends received the latihan, and the practice slowly spread throughout Java; a small group, guided by Bapak, started an organization called Ilmu (esoteric spiritual knowledge) Kasunyatan (emptiness).

The name Subud, introduced by Bapak at the inaugural meeting of the new organization in 1947, is derived from three Sanskrit terms: susila (to be able to live as true human beings according to the will of God); budhi (endeavor, the power of the intellect, or consciousness); and dharma (the possibility to surrender completely to the will of God). Taken together, Susila Budhi Dharma means: to follow the will of God, or the power of the life force that works both within us and without. Although religious terminology is frequently used, Subud is not seen as a religion—indeed, members of many different religions, or no religion at all, practice the latihan. Bapak emphasized that Subud has "no holy book, no teaching, no sacred formula. . . . In Subud the members only surrender with patience, trust, and sincerity to Almighty God." Subud is a "process," a "receiving." Bapak instructed his followers that there should be no proselytizing or advertising in Subud; he also recommended that there should be no membership fees.

The latihan lasts about half an hour and is practiced twice a week. It involves standing with a group of people (men and women practice separately). Some feel a vibration; most begin to feel a spontaneous impulse to move, dance, utter sounds, or sing. This is experienced as an inner cleansing and a receiving of divine guidance, which spills over into the participant's everyday life. Practitioners report feeling happier, enjoying improved personal relationships, health, and work experiences. For some, however, the process of purification brings out problems that have to be dealt with—an experience that can be difficult and painful.

Only members may attend the latihan; newcomers have to wait about three months before being invited to join. Then, with the assistance of a helper, they can be "opened" by partaking in their first latihan.

Subud has been established in the West since the late 1950s, when it attracted the attention of several followers of Gurdjieff. Worldwide, membership is now estimated as around ten thousand in more than seventy countries, with about twenty-five hundred in the United States and one thousand in the UK. Although some have left at various periods, numbers have been sustained, with some second-generation members requesting to join when they reach the minimum age of seventeen. Throughout the years, several Subud businesses have been established, not all of which have been financially successful. Nonetheless, Subud has sustained various charitable projects under the name of Susila Dharma International, which has a UN-affiliated status.

Address:

International Subud Committee
Jl. Tegal Harum No. 1
Denpasar 80237
Bali
Indonesia
<http://www.isc.or.id/>

Eileen Barker

Sources:

- Geels, Antoon. Subud and the Javanese Mystical Tradition. Richmond, UK: Curzon, 1997.

Sudan

Lyle, Robert. Subud. Kent, UK: Humanus, 1983.
 Sullivan, Matthew Barry. Living Religion in Subud. London: Subud Publications International, 1990.
 Webb, Gisela. "Subud." In America's Alternative Religions, edited by Timothy Miller, pp. 267–273. Albany: State University of New York Press, 1995.

Sudan

Settlement of the lands adjacent to the Upper Nile River and the associated rivers that feed into it occurred in pre-historic times, and as early as 3000 B.C.E. this territory came under the control of Egypt. It was thus not until the eighth century B.C.E. that an independent state, Napata, came into existence. In 730, Napata conquered Egypt, and for several generations its leaders ruled as pharaoh. After the fall of Napata in the seventh century, three states emerged that would continue for the next two millennia. These three states, Nobatia, Dongola, and Alodia, formed important functions in the trade between the Middle East and sub-Saharan Africa.

These states came under Christian influence in the fourth century C.E. Then, in the seventh century, Muslim Arabs entered Dongola. In exchange for retaining the territorial integrity of Dongola and Alodia, the two states allowed Islamic proselytizing in the area. Egyptians invaded in the fourteenth century. Their influence led to the destruction of Dongola and the emergence of new Islamic states. Then in 1820, Egyptian forces under Muhammad Ali, the Albanian who had come to rule Egypt, occupied Khartoum. Over the next year, they unified the several countries and created the modern state of Sudan. As British influence grew in Egypt, further changes were introduced, including the abolishing of slavery.

Foreign rule led to revolution. Muhammad Ahmad raised an army in 1881 that led to British intervention in 1882. The revolt climaxed with the defeat of the British at Khartoum in 1885 and the establishment of an independent government. His victory was short lived, however, and with French assistance, Ahmad's rule was overthrown in 1898.

The independence of Sudan was finally accomplished in 1956, but civil war ensued between the predominantly Arab Muslim north and the African Christian south. The coup

Status of religions in the Sudan, 2000-2050

Followers	2000			2025	2050
	total	%	rate
Muslims	20,731,000	70.3	2.23	32,680,000	41,484,000
Christians	4,921,000	16.7	2.32	8,530,000	12,100,000
Roman Catholics	3,149,000	10.7	2.42	5,500,000	7,700,000
Anglicans	2,320,000	7.9	2.57	3,600,000	4,600,000
Protestants	796,000	2.7	3.31	1,480,000	2,070,000
Ethnoreligionists	3,518,000	11.9	0.72	4,400,000	4,500,000
Nonreligious	280,000	1.0	2.44	588,000	1,000,000
Atheists	46,700	0.2	1.81	75,000	100,000
Baha'is	1,800	0.0	2.34	5,000	10,000
Jews	1,400	0.0	1.21	1,600	2,000
Hindus	580	0.0	1.57	1,000	1,600
Total population	29,490,000	100.0	2.05	46,264,000	59,176,000

d'etat by Gaafaral-Nimeiry in 1969 led to the end of the war but did not solve the problems between north and south. In a last attempt to retain power, in 1983 he imposed Islamic law on the whole country. Opposition organized in the south. Over the course of the next two years, a liberation movement in the southern region asserted its autonomy. War developed between the movement's guerrilla army and Sudanese forces. The many different peoples of the south, some Christians and some followers of traditional African religions, have been caught in the middle. The continued warfare in the south of Sudan has been the source of numerous atrocities and much suffering.

Until the fourth century, traditional African religions dominated across what is now Sudan. There are more than 570 ethnic groups that have been identified, each at one time having its own religion and dialect. In the fourth century, Orthodox Christianity from Egypt found its way up the Nile. In the fifth century, Orthodoxy split between those who supported the Orthodox statement expounded at the Council of Chalcedon and the Monophysite perspective that dominated in Egypt. Both opinions gained a following in the Sudan. The following century, the Ethiopian Church (which favored the Monophysite position) was introduced from the east and found a following. Much of the initial Christian following was lost to Islam—especially in the former Dongola and Alodia (the northern two-thirds of the present country)—over the next centuries. Variant forms of Islam emerged, some related to changes in the Egyptian leadership, but, as in the Muslim countries to the west, the dominant form had been the Sunni MALIKITE SCHOOL.

A blood sacrifice to bless the road in Kassala, Sudan (Helene Rogers/TRIP)

When Muhammad Ali invaded the country, he attempted to impose strict Sunni HANAFITE Islam. This imposition was part of the cause of the revolt under Muhammad Ahmad, proclaimed by his followers al-Mahdi, the leader and prophet who, many Muslims believe, will emerge to rescue and unite Islam at some time in the future. After the defeat of al-Mahdi, a legal system that mixed Hanafi and British elements was introduced, and the Malikite school reasserted its dominant role. However, through the twentieth century, a very diverse Muslim community arose that includes numerous large Sufi brotherhoods and the continued followers of al-Mahdi, the Ansars (some three million strong). Among the Sufi brotherhoods the Khattimiyya are the largest, but the QADIRIYYA, SHĀDHILIYYA, and TIJĀNIYYA are also prominent.

The AHMADIYYA MOVEMENT IN ISLAM has attempted to spread through Sudan but has been outlawed as heretical. The BAHĀ'Ī FAITH entered Sudan in the 1890s but has not shown much success for a century of activity.

A small Ethiopian Orthodox community has survived in Sudan, and Greek Christianity survives under the jurisdiction of the GREEK ORTHODOX PATRIARCHATE OF ALEXANDRIA AND ALL AFRICA. The Monophysite perspective survives in the COPTIC ORTHODOX CHURCH and the ETHIOPIAN ORTHODOX TEWAHEDO CHURCH, both of which have established dioceses in Sudan.

These three churches dominated the Christian community until after the defeat of al-Mahdi by the British in 1898. The next year the CHURCH MISSIONARY SOCIETY introduced the CHURCH OF ENGLAND into the Sudan, the first center being at Omdurman. In 1901, American Presbyterians from the United Presbyterian Church (now part of the PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH [U.S.A.]) entered from their base in Egypt. The Anglican work has matured as the Church of the Province of the Sudan. The Presbyterian mission has resulted in two churches, the Presbyterian Church of the Sudan (in the south) and the Sudan Presbyterian Evangelical Church (earlier existing as the Sudanese presbytery of the EVANGELICAL CHURCH–SYNOD OF THE NILE).

Sudan Interior Church

A variety of Christian groups attempted to open work in the Sudan through the twentieth century, among the most successful being the Sudan United Mission (1913), whose work led to the present Sudanese Church of Christ, the Africa Inland Mission (African Inland Church, 1936), and the Sudan Interior Mission (SUDAN INTERIOR CHURCH, 1937). Several AFRICAN INITIATED CHURCHES have arisen, including the Eternal Life Church and the Evangelical Revival Church, both schisms from the Anglicans.

The ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH also entered Sudan following the British victory in 1898. The first Sudanese priest was ordained in 1944, but growth was stymied by the war that followed independence. All of its seminaries and many church buildings were destroyed. However, with the reorganization that occurred at the beginning of the 1970s, including the elevation of the vicariates and prefectures into dioceses in 1972, Catholicism has grown into the largest Christian body in the country. It grew from 600,000 members in 1970 to 2.7 million by 1995. As with other Christian churches, its strength is in the southern region. One can only speculate as to the extent of growth had the new warfare of the 1980s not occurred.

Islam, with 70 percent of the population, and Christianity, with 16 percent, dominate the religious life of the Sudan. Traditional African religions survive among the Didinga, Ingressana, Meban, and a variety of other ethnic groups. They constitute about 1 percent of the population and reside primarily in the south. The liberal Protestant community has joined together to form the Sudan Council of Churches, affiliated with the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES. The more conservative churches have combined to form the Sudan Evangelical Christian Association, which is associated with the WORLD EVANGELICAL ALLIANCE.

Sources:

- Hunwick, J. O. Religion and National Integration in Africa: Islam, Christianity, and Politics in the Sudan and Nigeria. Evanston, IL: Northwestern University Press, 1992.
- Vantini, G. Christianity in the Sudan. Bologna: EMI, 1981.
- Wingate, F. R. Mahdism and the Egyptian Sudan: Being an Account of the Rise and Progress of Mahdism, and of Subsequent Events in the Sudan to the Present Time. 2d ed. London: Cass, 1968.

Sudan Interior Church

The Sudan Interior Church is the product of the missionary activity of the Sudan Interior Mission (SIM), now known as the Society for International Ministries. SIM was founded in 1893 by Canadians Walter Gowans and Rowland Bingham and American Thomas Kent as an independent missionary society dedicated to the evangelization of the Sudan, then one of the few countries without a single Christian missionary. The three arrived in Nigeria in December 1893, where Bingham fell ill. The others pressed inward, where Gowans and Kent died early in 1894. Bingham returned to Toronto and organized a support council and began to rebuild the effort. However, the first mission station would not be opened until 1902.

Work began in Nigeria (rather than the Sudan) and spread from Patigi to Bida (1903) and Wushishi (1904), and it became the core of the present Evangelistic Church of West Africa. Prior to its finally reaching the Sudan, work would spread to Niger (1924), Ethiopia (1927), and Upper Volta, now Burkina Faso (1930). The work in the Sudan would actually be a result of the work in Ethiopia, and it began in 1936 after its missionaries were expelled from that country. They had initiated work among the Dinka people.

Work in the Sudan prospered for a generation, but in 1961, three of the four stations were closed by the government. The following year, the Sudan passed the Missionary Societies Act, which placed a number of restrictions on the mission. In 1964 the process of missionary expulsion began, actions that marked the heightening of the civil war that continues in the southern part of the Sudan. Through the 1960s the number of missionaries dropped from thirty-six (serving at nine stations) to five, those last leaving in 1970.

The Sudan Interior Church has emerged as an autonomous body out of the pressure placed on the former mission in the 1960s. The church is a member of the Sudan Council of Churches, which unites the minority Christian community. It is a conservative Evangelical body that affirms the major Christian beliefs shared by all Protestants.

In the 1980s the Sudan Interior Mission merged with three other similar missionary agencies that had work in Asia and South America to form the Society for International Ministries. SIM has no international headquarters but operates through national councils that can now be found in a number of countries. In 1980 the Sudan Interior Church and other autonomous churches that grew from the missions founded by the Sudan Interior Mission and the three other agencies now a part of SIM created Evangel Fellowship, an association of twelve churches. In 1996, Evangel Fellowship formed the Evangelical Fellowship of Missions Association to coordinate their mutual missionary efforts.

Addresses:

Sudan Interior Church
P.O. Box 220
Khartoum
Sudan

SIM U.S.A.
 P.O. Box 7900
 Charlotte, NC 28241
<http://www.sim.org>

Sources:

Bingham, Rowland. Seven Sevens of Years and a Jubilee: The Story of the Sudan Interior Mission. Toronto: Evangelical Publishers, 1943.

Fuller, W. H. Run While the Sun Is Hot. New York: Sudan Interior Mission, 1967.

Society for International Missions. Posted at <http://www.sim.org/>. Accessed November 15, 2001.

The Sufi Movement

The Sufi Movement, a representative of Chisti Sufism, emerged following the death of India-born Hazrat Inayat Khan (1892–1927), who had founded the Sufi Order in the United States in 1910. Khan initiated a woman, Rabia Martin, and designated her as his successor. His choice was, however, rejected by Khan's family and his growing European following. Khan died at a relatively young age and had not written a will. Seizing upon this circumstance (and the fact that his son/successor was still a minor), the European members rejected Martin's leadership and organized the Sufi Movement. They chose Maheboob Khan (1887–1948), Inayat's brother, as their new leader. He would be succeeded in 1948 by a cousin, Mohammad Ali Khan (1881–1958), Musharaff Khan (1895–1967), and Fazal Inayat Khan (1942–1990). Fazal resigned leadership in 1982.

After Fazal Khan's resignation, a collective leadership tried to assume control, but it soon met with dissent so deep as to split the movement. Hidayat Inayat Khan (b. 1917) soon emerged as the leader of the largest part of the Sufi Movement. He shared leadership with Murshida Shahzadi. Hidayat, one of the sons of Hazrat Inayat, finally became the sole leader of the movement in 1993.

Hidayat Inayat Khan was only ten years old when his father passed away in 1927. From his father he inherited a love of music. He studied at L'Ecole Normale de Musique and eventually became a professor in the Music School of Dieulefit, Drome, France, and conducted an orchestra in Haarlem, Holland. He wrote numerous compositions, including both secular music and a collection of Sufi hymns, and was a founding member of the European Composers' Union.

The Sufi Movement resembles the SUFI ORDER INTERNATIONAL, headed by Hazrat Inayat's elder son, Vilayat Inayat Khan, and is organized in five divisions to focus on universal worship, community, healing, symbology, and esoteric activity. The movement has spread across Europe to Canada and the United States. Members meet weekly for dhikr (worship) and classes.

Sufi dancers (Jeff Albertson/Corbis)

Address:

The Sufi Movement
11 rue John Rehfous
1208 Geneva
Switzerland
<http://guess.workweb.net/sufi/>

Sources:

The Gathas. Katwijk, The Netherlands: Servire, 1982.
Khan, Fazal Inayat. Old Thinking: New Thinking. New York: Harper and Row, 1979.
Khan, Hidayat Inayat. Sufi Teachings. Canada: Ecstasis, 1994.

Sufi Order International

The Sufi Order International is a religious organization whose primary aim is to promote the universalist Sufi teachings of Hazrat Inayat Khan (1882–1927) and his son, Pir Vilayat Khan (b. 1916). Hazrat Inayat Khan was a renowned Indian musician who became a disciple of Hazrat Abu Hashim Madani, a Sufi master from a branch of the famed CHISTINIYYA SUFI ORDER in India. Before his death, Madani asked Khan to bring Sufism to the West. Khan arrived in the United States in late 1910 and both taught Sufism and performed music on the East and West Coasts before traveling to Europe and Russia to organize formal Sufi centers. The seeds of future division were sown at this time, as different disciples (murids) were placed in charge of national centers in Europe and North America. The American leader, Rabia Martin, having been rejected by the members of Khan's family, led the American followers into a relationship with Indian teacher Meher Baba.

In 1926, Khan named his eleven-year-old son, Vilayat, to be his successor as head of the Sufi Order. Following his father's death in 1927, Vilayat studied philosophy, psychology, and music in Paris and Oxford and began intensive meditation training under various Sufi masters in the Middle East and India. He eventually emerged as a legitimate successor to his father's work, though much of the European following had reorganized as the SUFI MOVEMENT, under Maheboob, Inayat Khan's brother. However, Vilayat rebuilt the Sufi Order and eventually reinstated it in the United States during the 1960s. His efforts in California were helped by Murshid Samuel Lewis (1896–1971), an eclectic teacher who had received initiation into several Sufi orders during a lifetime of spiritual seeking. Lewis brought his group of students into the Sufi Order in 1968, but some of those students later left the order in 1977 over disagreements with Vilayat's regulations and formed the Sufi Islamia Ruhaniat Society.

Over the past forty years, Pir Vilayat Khan has become an internationally recognized spiritual teacher who gives frequent public lectures and participates in various religious congresses, interfaith dialogues, meditation camps, and New Age expositions in the United States, Western Europe, and India. Pir Vilayat and Pir Zia, his son and successor, were invited to attend the UN Peace Summit for world spiritual and religious leaders in 2000.

The Sufi Order International's teachings generally consist of the writings of Hazrat Inayat Khan and their further elaboration by Pir Vilayat and Pir Zia. All three Khans teach the essential unity of spiritual ideals across religious traditions. Pir Vilayat seeks to establish in his initiates a "stereoscopic consciousness" that cultivates simultaneous awareness of everyday human reality and the most elevated levels of the Divine Being. He emphasizes that the realm of ordinary perception both reveals and veils a sublime reality that is unfolding itself within and through human life. The universe is evolving, in other words, toward a Chardin-like Omega point. In books such as Toward the One and Awakening: A Sufi Experience, Pir Vilayat synthesizes prayer, meditation, and breathing methods from different spiritual traditions with traditional Sufi practice, with the intention of helping disciples experience the underlying unity of all things in the Divine Ground. All of Pir Vilayat's teachings are a natural outgrowth of his father's intention to foster tolerance and mutual understanding between East and West and between the different branches of the Beni Israel traditions.

The present-day teaching work of the Sufi Order International includes seminars and retreats that focus on spiritual healing arts, meditation practices, the spirituality of music, esoteric studies, and universal dances of peace. Although the Sufi Order International is headquartered in France, the North American headquarters are at the Abode of the Message, a residential Sufi community founded in 1975 in New Lebanon, New York. There, the former Shaker colony houses Omega Publications and its retailing outlet, Wisdom's Child Bookstore, and Sacred Spirit Music. The Abode hosts an annual program of spiritual retreats, the Healing Arts center, and ongoing classes in dhikr (a traditional Sufi chanting practice), Dervish whirling, and Universal Worship. This latter liturgy was developed by Inayat Khan and draws on elements of the world's major religions.

Additional teaching centers exist in large cities throughout the United States and Europe, with center and branch leaders appointed by the president of the order. The Hope Project is a charitable program, active in India.

On February 4, 2000, Pir Zia Inayat Khan received the teaching mantle of Pir Vilayat in an investiture ceremony at Hazrat Inayat Khan's tomb in Delhi, India. He was also elevated to the presidency of the Sufi Order in North America, although Pir Vilayat remains chairman of the board of directors. Pir Zia divides his time between the Abode, India, and Europe. He is particularly interested in creating stronger ties with established Sufi orders in the Middle East and Asia, and with helping Sufism as a tradition to move in a more universal direction. Pir Zia is committed to his grandfather's vision of building Universal temples that honor all religions. The Universal is currently developing an institute designed to promote and implement its vision of a humanity that is tolerant, just, and unified in spirit, if not in the particulars of traditional beliefs and practices.

The Sufi Order International is not recognized as a traditional Islamic Sufi order, because its membership is open to people of all faiths and it does not promote traditional Islam. Most of its members are white, middle-class Westerners, many of whom have been affiliated with the order since the 1970s. The order is a prototypical New Age religion, with its eclectic embrace of traditional religious practices, its desire to synthesize science and religion, its expectation of a dawning New Age of spiritual unity, and its interest in both Eastern and Western methods of psychological, physical, and spiritual healing.

Addresses:

Sufi Order International
23 rue de la Tuilerie
92150 Suresnes
France

Hope Project
T-22
Basti Hzt
Nizamuddin
New Delhi 110013
India

Phillip Charles Lucas

Sources:

- Khan, Pir Vilayat Inayat. Awakening: A Sufi Experience. New York: Jeremy P. Tarcher/Putnam, 1999.
- . The Message in Our Time: The Life and Teaching of the Sufi Master, Pir-o-Murshid Inayat Khan. San Francisco: Harper and Row, 1978.
- . Toward the One. New York: Harper and Row, 1974.

Sufism

The inner esoteric spiritual dimensions of the Islamic religious tradition is commonly referred to as Sufism (Arabic, tasawwuf). Since the time of the Prophet Muhammad, Muslims have contemplated the existence of God and meeting the divine in the hereafter. However, practitioners of tasawwuf, or Sufis, have focused on encountering the divine in the present lifetime. The earliest scholars of the tradition—such as Hasan al-Basri, Rabi'a al-Adawiya, Bayazid Bistami, and Mansur al-Hallaj—had stressed various components of leading an ascetic life and defining technical terms that came with the inner journey (tariqah) toward Allāh. To access a closeness with God, Sufis developed a wide body of literature that discussed the spiritual experiences of the traveler, especially detailed accounts of consciousness or unconsciousness experienced on the journey.

To earn the intimacy of God, Sufis have relied on learning the direct knowledge of the divine (al 'ilm al-laduni) through the rigorous spiritual training by a Sufi shaikh who had already been enlightened by the knowledge of God (ma'rifa). According to the classical Sufi scholars, the primary theological premise in Sufism is that Prophet Muhammad was trained by God Himself so that the Prophet would embody these inner practices and beliefs and teach his followers. A common private conversation between God and the Prophet, or hadith qudsi, stated: "I was a hidden treasure and I loved that I be known, so I created the creation in order to be known." For Sufis, since the moment of creation human beings have been working toward being nearer to God. The human heart has a natural tendency to feel incomplete until it dwells in the presence of God (hulûl).

For Sufis there is an outer (zâhir) and inner (bâtin) reading of the world, particularly in the interpretation of the Qur'an and the customs of the Prophet (sunna). For those who truly desire to understand and experience the inner dimensions of God's speech, Sufis have argued for studying the hidden and inner meanings of the Qur'an or batn al-qur'ân. The realization of God in the journey ('irfân) was not exclusive for select human beings, but as the Prophet Muhammad had an intimate dialogue with God in his heavenly ascension (lâyla mi'râj wa isra), Sufis claim this event laid down a mystical paradigm for others to follow. Sufi Muslims begin with the fundamental profession of Islamic faith: "There is no God but God, and Muhammad is the messenger of God." The first part reinforces the oneness of God at all times, while the second part speaks of the Prophet's special status as the messenger of God. For Sufis, Prophet Muhammad is the mystical exemplar and major focus for meditations, veneration, and invocations.

The Sufi tradition rapidly developed manuals as a form of religious learning ('ilm) alongside the normative religious sciences of law and the customs of the Prophet. During the classical period of Sufism, mystical knowledge was understood as superior to the traditional knowledge taught in the colleges. By the early eleventh century, Sufi scholars and Muslim intellectuals like Ibn Sina (or Avicenna, d. 1037) incorporated Sufi knowledge ('irfân) with metaphysical studies of Greek philosophy into the traditional curriculum. The discrepancies between the mystical path (tariqah) and the education in the colleges (madrasa) began to be minimized with Ahmad al-Ghazzali (d. 1111), who advocated a balanced approach to Islamic spirituality and orthopraxy. Mainstream scholars and religious authorities accepted Sufism as Sufis themselves were able to accommodate them with a refined theology that moved beyond personal ecstasy and was based on reason, critical self-reflection, and analysis of the soul's journey.

Sufis organized themselves into orders that were highly structured for the disciples to be trained in the mystical journey. Unlike Christian monastic orders, such as the Franciscans and the Jesuits, Sufi orders did not have to take vows of celibacy, nor were they under the supervision of a central authority like the pope. Each Sufi order was based upon the teachings and authority of the Sufi teacher, who needed to have a lineage to the Prophet Muhammad. The Sufi orders established lodges (khanaqah) in which disciples lived and were taught by their respective teachers, but not all disciples lived in the lodges. There was a "master-disciple" (pir-murid) relationship within the orders, and disciples needed to pass initiation in order to be a member. The institution of Sufism meant that it was accessible to anyone who wanted to reach God from the mystical path; it also gave distinct identities to each of the Sufi orders. Sufi disciples were given specific instructions on how to pray with more attention, to bring more love to their lives, to direct their wealth toward the poor, and to learn detailed spiritual exercises for enlightenment.

Sufi orders are found throughout the Muslim world. Among the more prominent Sufi orders to emerge out of Mesopotamia (Iran/Iraq) are the Rifaiyya, SUHRAWARDIYYA, and QADIRIYYA RIFAIYYA. These are among the earliest of the Sufi orders. Rifaiyya was founded in Basra, Iraq, in the twelfth century, soon spreading from Iraq into Syria and Egypt. The Suhrawardiyya formally established themselves in early twelfth-century Iraq and spread westward into India. The Qadiriyya Sufis originated in Iran in the twelfth century and spread both eastward and westward into India and North Africa.

Sufism continued to grow in popularity in North Africa as the Rifaiyya order expanded into Syria and then Egypt. Shortly thereafter it spread to Northwest Africa, where it gained the support of the ruling Almohad dynasty (1130–1269), whose territory included Morocco, Algeria, Tunisia, and Muslim Spain. The Shadhiliyya developed in the thirteenth century in Tunisia and continues to flourish in contemporary Algeria, Tunisia, and Morocco.

In Central Asia and Anatolia (equivalent to modern-day Turkey), a number of major Sufi orders emerged between the twelfth and seventeenth centuries in Turkey and Central Asia. The Yasawiyya, originating in Turkestan, led in spreading the movement among the Turkish tribes of Central Asia. Among the important Central Asian orders is CHISTINIYYA, the foundation of which is generally ascribed to Mu'in al-Din Chishti (c. 1142–1236), a native of Sijistan. The order spread into India, where it became that land's largest Sufi order. It split into several factions and has a high profile in the West, through two branches of the work founded by Hazrat Inyat Khan, the SUFI ORDER INTERNA-TIONAL and the SUFI MOVEMENT. Yasawiyyawiyya appears also to have given birth to the BEKTASHI Sufis, who continue strong in Albania and nearby Balkan countries.

The MEVLEVI derive from the experience, work, and writings of Turkish poet/mystic Jalal ud-din Rumi (1207–1273); they are famous as the "whirling dervishes." The order is based on Rumi's place of burial, Konya, Turkey. Along with the other Turkish orders, it was suppressed when the secular government assumed authority in 1925. It declined for several decades but experienced new life in the West at the end of the century. Equally hurt by the formal abolition of Sufi groups in Turkey were the NAQSHBANDIYA; however, they survived through their non-Turkish centers and have enjoyed more success. The order was founded by Baha al-din Naqshband (d. 1389) near Bukhara in Central Asia, and subsequently it spread from India to Turkey. It flourished under the Ottomans and Mughals, and after a setback in the mid-twentieth century, it too has found new life in the contemporary West and in Islamic nations.

In the eighteenth century, the WAHHABI movement attached to Islam many popular practices that had entered through Sufism—including the veneration of saints and pilgrimages to their gravesites—while encouraging a strict adherence to Islamic law. In Africa the spirit of reform contributed to the establishment of several new orders, such as the TIJANIYYA, founded in the 1780s by Ahmad al-Tidjani (d. 1815), and, in the same spirit a century later, the MURIDIYYA. Both have spread across North Africa and western sub-Saharan Africa, and since World War II into the West.

More extreme was the Sanusiyya, founded in Cyrenaica (eastern Libya) in the 1840s by Muhammad b. ali Sanusi (1787–1859). The Sanusiyya rejected of all forms of luxury. Like other African orders, it included a strong sense of veneration for the Prophet Muhammad. They were a critical resistance group fighting against French colonial rule, and they took the lead in creating the modern state of Libya. Overthrown in 1969 by Colonel Muammar al-Qaddafi, they have been an important element in the opposition to his regime.

Addresses:

Internet sites for Sufism include:
<http://www.arches.uga.edu/~godlas/Sufism>
<http://world.std.com/~habib/sufi.html#resources>
<http://www.sufibooks.com/>

Qamar-ul Huda

Sources:

Chittick, William. The Sufi Path of Knowledge: Ibn 'Arabi's Metaphysics of Imagination. Albany: State University of New York Press, 1989.

Ernst, Carl. The Shambhala Guide to Sufism: An Essential Introduction to the Philosophy and Practice of the Mystical Tradition of Islam. Boston: Shambhala, 1997.

- Lewisohn, Leonard, ed. The Legacy of Mediaeval Persian Sufism. New York: Khaniqah Nimatullah, 1992.
- Lings, Martin. What Is Sufism? Cambridge, UK: Islamic Texts Society, 1993.
- Rizvi, Syed Athar Abbas. A History of Sufism in India. 2 vols. New Delhi: Manoharlal, 1978.
- Schimmel, Annemarie. Mystical Dimensions of Islam. Chapel Hill: North Carolina Press, 1975.
- Trimingham, Spencer. The Sufi Orders in Islam. Oxford: Clarendon, 1971.

Suhrawardiyya Sufi Order

The Suhrawardī Sufis were recognized as an important Sufi order with Shaikh Abū’Najīb al-Suhrawardī (d. 1168), the uncle of Abū Hafs ‘Umar Suhrawardī (1144–1234). Abū’-Najīb Suhrawardī was originally from the town of Suhraward, which is west of Sultaniyya, in the province of al-Jibal, Iran. Abū’Najīb was the rector of the Nizamiyya Academy and an authority on Hadith (the sayings of the Prophet Muhammad). He also wrote a famous Sufi treatise on etiquette and Sufi practice.

Equally profound was Shihab al-din Yahya Suhrawardī (1170–1208), a mystic-philosopher who expanded upon the School of Illumination (Hikmat al-Ishraq), which used rational discourse as a basis for experiential wisdom. The ishraqi school was a coherent and philosophical system of inquiry into knowledge, symbolism, and wisdom.

Later, Shaikh Abu Hafs ‘Umar al-Suhrawardī consequently wrote an equally profound Sufi text called the ‘Awārif al-Ma’arīf (Knowledge of the Spiritually Learned), which is still used in the Sufi world for spiritual lessons. Al-Suhrawardī was designated as the Shaikh al-Islam, or supreme Islamic religious authority, under caliph al-Nasir (1179–1225); he preached the importance of adhering to Islamic law, customs of the Prophet, and the Qur’an.

The Suhrawardīs professed intense studies of law, Qur’anic studies, philosophy, theology, and the complete adherence to Islamic customs set by the Prophet Muhammad. Knowledge of the divine is attainable through constructive reasoning and contemplation; the mystical way meant living moderately and not being lost in complete poverty or asceticism. The Suhrawardī Sufis can be found in South Asia, Iran, Syria, Central Asia, Europe, and North America.

The Suhrawardī Foundation in Lahore, Pakistan, publishes materials on Sufism and the modern world. The elder Sufis continue the Suhrawardī tradition of mystical studies and practice. The Suhrawardī Foundation of North America holds conferences and poetry meetings to better understand the Sufi journey.

Qamar-ul Huda

Sources:

- Huda, Qamar-ul. Striving for Divine Union: Spiritual Exercises of the Suhrawardī Sufis. Surrey, UK: Curzon, 2002.
- Razavi, Mehdi Amin. Suhrawardī and the School of Illumination. Surrey, UK: Curzon, 1997.
- Thackston, William. The Mystical and Visionary Treatises of Shihabuddin Yahya Suhrawardī. London: Octagon, 1982.
- Walbridge, John. The Leaven of the Ancients: Suhrawardī and the Heritage of the Greeks. Albany: State University of New York Press, 2000.
- Wilson, M. A Sufi Rule for Novices: Kitāb Ādāb al-Muridīn of Abū-Najīb al-Suhrawardī. Cambridge: Harvard University Press, 1973.
- Ziai, Hossein. Knowledge and Illumination: A Study of Suhrawardī’s Hikmat al-ishraq. Atlanta: Scholars Press, 1990.

Sūkyō Mahikari

A Japanese New Religion founded in 1959 by Okada Yoshikazu (1901–1974), a former member of the imperial guard who suffered for many years from physical afflictions and economic misfortunes. In the night of February 27, 1959, Okada received a vision of God who called him with the words: “Get up. Change your name to Kotama (Jewel of Light). Raise your hand. Trials and tribulations are coming.” This experience marked the beginning of the movement that was called Sekai Mahikari Bunmei Kyōdan. Okada came to be called Sukuinushisama (Lord Savior) and assumed a divine status in the movement as the original mediator of the saving and healing light of God. Between 1959 and 1967, Okada is said to have received a series of fifty-seven revelations that were collected and published for the first time in Japanese in 1969 as the sacred scripture of the movement, called the Goseigen. From the end of the 1960s, Mahikari underwent a rapid growth in Japan, and in the early 1970s the first centers were opened outside of Japan. In 1972 a center was opened in Paris, and from there missionaries spread all over Europe, North and South America, and Africa. After the founder died in 1974, the movement split. One group continued the original name of the movement and was led by one of the closest disciples of Okada, Sekiguchi Sakae. The other group followed the leadership of the adopted daughter of the founder, Okada Keiju (Sukuinushisama), and took the name Sūkyō Mahikari. The latter has become the larger of the two groups and is usually the organization generally associated with the name Mahikari. The exact number of members in the movement is kept a strict secret, but it may be estimated between 500,000 and one million. The movement claims about twelve hundred centers in eighty countries.

The central focus of the movement is the practice of okiyome, which consists of the transmission of divine Light through the palm of the hand of an initiate to another person or to any animate or inanimate object in need of purification or protection. This practice was largely inherited from SEKAI KYUSEI KYO, another twentieth-century Japanese religion of which Okada had previously been a member. At the origin of this practice lies the belief that most afflictions and misfortunes are caused by spirit possession, resulting from negative karmic actions in this or in a past life. It is the forehead that is regarded as the seat of possessing spirits and that is the main focus of the practice of okiyome. The power to transmit the Light resides in an amulet, called the omitama, which is formally received at the end of the initiation course and which is surrounded by numerous taboos.

Sumarah

Besides okiyome, which can (and should) be practiced at any time and place, members are also enjoined to participate in monthly rituals, called mimatsuri, and in yearly spring and autumn festivals. The latter take place at the central shrine (the Suza) in Takayama, Japan, and members are encouraged to make the pilgrimage to the place of birth of the movement and if possible participate in these events. Since spirit possession is the origin of all evil, another important ritual practice in the movement consists of the worship of ancestors every morning and evening at a private altar in the home.

The teachings of Sūkyō Mahikari are transmitted in three initiation courses, each requiring an increasing commitment to the movement. The elementary teachings, which constitute the heart of the movement, focus on the etiology of diseases and misfortunes. Although the emphasis is on the notion of possession, ethical principles (mostly of Confucian origin) are inculcated as a means to avoid spirit possession. The advanced courses focus mostly on sacred history and on the millenaristic and nationalistic beliefs of Mahikari. Within the pantheon of Gods and spirits of Mahikari, one God, called Mioyamotosumahikariomikamisama (or Su-God), is worshipped as the origin of creation and salvation. It is to this God that most prayers are addressed.

Sūkyō Mahikari is organized as a theocracy, with the leader, called Oshienushisama, as its absolute authority. The world is organized in different regions (Sidobus) encompassing centers of different sizes, from a small local center called han, to a fully developed dojo. The movement is supported by an elaborate system of donations: monthly donations to the center, donations for particular projects undertaken by the movement, donations in thanksgiving for particular blessings or for receiving light at every visit to the dojo.

Address:

Sūkyō Mahikari
2-596-1 Kamiokamoto-machi
Takayama City
Gifu Prefecture
Japan

Sources:

- Cornille, Catherine. "The Phoenix Flies West: The Dynamics of Inculturation of Mahikari in Western Europe." Japanese Journal of Religious Studies 18, 2-3 (1991): 265-285.
- Davis, Winston. Dojo: Magic and Exorcism in Modern Japan. Stanford, CA: Stanford University Press, 1980.
- Tebecis, Andris Karlis. Mahikari, Thank God for the Answers at Last. Tokyo: Yoko Shuppan, 1982.
- Young, Richard. "Magic and Morality in Modern Japanese Exorcistic Technologies." Japanese Journal of Religious Studies 17 (1990): 29-50.

Sumarah

Sumarah is a Javanese word referring to the condition of total surrender. Thus the name Paguyuban Sumarah, for the Indonesian spiritual association, is also a description of its practice. The aim of meditation, termed sujud within Indonesia, is to surrender every aspect of personal being so the self functions as a vehicle for God's will. Sumarah is currently an association of about six thousand. The seat of the organization, the Dewan Pimpinan Pusat (DPP), is in Jakarta. Regional centers exist in all major Javanese cities, and in a few regions, notably Madiun, a large number of villagers have joined. Sumarah is not identified with any religion. Although most members are Muslim, there are also Buddhist and Christian followers.

Sumarah is a practice. It has no canon of teachings, no sacred texts, and no sacred sites or buildings. There is no "guru," and the direction of attention in meditation is "inward"; the authority that meditators are meant to attend to is that of the "true teacher" (guru sejati or hakiki) inside. Nevertheless, guidance (tuntunan) within weekly group sessions is a critical vehicle for practice. Guides, termed pamong, speak spontaneously through attunement to those participating. All Sumarah members lead normal working and family lives. The aim of practice is not isolation from society but a balance of outer (lahir) and inner (batin) being in every moment.

The origins of Sumarah lie in the revelatory experiences (wahyu sumarah) of Sukinohartono in 1935. Pak Kino, as he was called, was born at the turn of the century near the court city of Yogyakarta. He worked as a court attendant and bank clerk until his death in 1970. After his revelation a circle of friends began to share practice, so that by 1940 the seeds of an organization had been sown through most of Central and East Java. Those seeds germinated during World War II under Japanese occupation. During the revolutionary struggle of the late 1940s, an influx of many new and younger members gave rise to the need for a formal organization.

Just as Indonesia gained independence, the association crystallized into what is now Paguyuban Sumarah, usually referred to as just Sumarah. From 1950 until 1966 formal organization was led by Dr. Surono and centered in Yogyakarta.

From 1966 until his death in 1997, the most important leader was Arymurthy in Jakarta. Throughout the period since independence, Sumarah has been one of the several dozen most prominent national movements within the sphere of JAVANISM (kejawen, earlier also termed kebatinan). Although not one of the largest movements, it has been especially important nationally because its leaders have been simultaneously active in umbrella organizations that represent kebatinan on the national scene.

Although there have been several hundred international practitioners since 1971, there is no international organization.

Paul Stange

Address:

DPP Paguyuban Sumarah
Yayasan Sukino
Pendopo Sumarah
Gang Setiyaki, Wirobrajan
Yogyakarta
Indonesia

Sources:

- Howe, David. Sumarah: A Study of the Art of Living. Ph.D. dissertation, University of North Carolina, 1980.
- Stange, Paul. "Inner Dimensions of the Indonesian Revolution." In Autonomous Histories, Particular Truths, edited by Laurie Sears. Madison: University of Wisconsin, Center for Southeast Asian Studies, 1993.
- . Politik Perhatian: Rasa dalam Kebudayaan Jawa (The Politics of Attention: Intuition in Javanese Culture). Yogyakarta: Lembaga Kajian Islam dan Sosial, 1998.

Sunni Islam

See Islam

Suriname

Suriname was originally settled around 3000 B.C.E. by the Arowak people and later by the Carib people, who had developed a hunting and fishing culture at the time of Colum-

Status of religions in Suriname, 2000-2050

Followers	2000			2025	2050
	total	%	rate
Christians	210,000	50.4	0.43	275,000	310,000
Roman Catholics	93,000	22.3	0.40	120,000	135,000
Protestants	71,300	17.1	-0.09	80,000	84,000
Marginal Christians	4,400	1.1	2.31	7,000	9,000
Hindus	74,400	17.8	0.23	80,000	80,000
Muslims	57,800	13.9	-0.22	66,700	66,000
Nonreligious	20,100	4.8	1.12	32,200	44,000
Neoreligionists	20,000	4.8	0.74	30,000	38,000
Spiritists	14,800	3.5	0.90	20,000	25,000
Ethnoreligionists	8,100	1.9	-0.52	6,000	4,000
Baha'is	6,400	1.5	0.69	9,000	12,000
Buddhists	2,500	0.6	2.13	2,500	3,600
Chinese folk-religionists	1,100	0.3	4.40	950	1,200
Jews	760	0.2	0.20	1,000	1,200
Atheists	490	0.1	4.94	800	1,200
other religionists	440	0.1	0.89	800	1,300
Total population	417,000	100.0	0.38	525,000	588,000

bus's arrival in 1498. It was formally claimed by Spain, but the first European settlement did not occur until 1616 when the Dutch arrived. The territory was contested by Britain. In 1667, by the treaty of Breda, Suriname became a Dutch colony (at the same time that New Amsterdam became New York).

The Dutch introduced slavery into the colony, and after slavery was abolished, a large number of Javanese and Asian Indians were brought to the area as a new source of cheap labor. By the beginning of the twentieth century, Suriname was home to a complex mixture of ethnic groups and religious traditions. Today the largest single group derives from the Indian immigrants (35 percent), the majority of whom came from the United Provinces of India (Uttar Pradesh), West Bihar, and the Ganges Plains of North India. After the abolishment of slavery, many Africans intermarried with the native population and developed the Creole group, with their own language (32 percent). Prior to the end of slavery, many Africans had escaped inland and founded Maroon villages that have given rise to several distinct Maroon communities (10 percent). Those of Indonesian heritage constitute some 15 percent. There are a few surviving native people (3 percent) and a small remnant of Whites.

These various ethnic groups tended to remain separate, divided both by ethnic tradition and by language. The divisions became important as the country moved toward independence, and they are credited with blocking a sense of national consciousness that prevented the change from colonial status until 1975. Following independence, approximately a third of the population left the country, many taking the opportunity to move to Holland. After a period of government instability in the 1980s, including several coups, a democratic system was put into place in 1990.

Christianity was introduced to Suriname in 1683 with the arrival of several Catholic priests. However, they stayed only for four years. Priests came again in 1786, but again for only a brief stay. Then in 1735, permanent Christian work was launched by the Moravians. They had marked success among Africans living in the interior and among former slaves. The MORAVIAN CHURCH IN SURINAME now includes more than 10 percent of the country's 400,000 citizens.

The EVANGELICAL LUTHERAN CHURCH IN THE KINGDOM OF THE NETHERLANDS and the REFORMED CHURCHES IN THE NETHERLANDS established work in 1741 and 1750, respectively, but served the White residents primarily and lost heavily after independence. A spectrum of other Protestant and Free Churches have established work, but none have found more than a few thousand members.

The ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH returned to Suriname in 1817 and soon jumped into the lead in its appeal to the general population. A vicariate was erected in 1852. The first bishop was consecrated a century later in 1958. Today, almost one in four residents are Roman Catholics.

The Suriname Committee of Christian Churches dates to 1960. It is affiliated with the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES and includes the Moravian, Reformed, Lutheran, and Roman Catholic churches.

The Indians brought Hinduism with them. The majority of traditional Hindus are associated in the Shri Sanatan Dharm Mahasabha, while the nineteenth-century reformist ARYA SAMAJ movement has a significant following (some 16 percent of the Hindu population).

Some Indians were Muslims, however, the largest group being from Java—Sunni Muslims of the SHAFIITE school. There are a small number of members of the AHMADIYYA Muslim movement, and several thousand members of the BAHÁ'Í FAITH.

A variety of smaller religious communities have survived into the twenty-first century. Of these the Jewish community is among the more interesting. It dates to the arrival of Sephardic Jews in the mid-1600s. Presumably some Ashkenazi Jews arrived from England a short time later. A Portuguese Jewish Congregation of Suriname was founded in 1661/1662, and a first synagogue was completed in 1667 at Jodensavanna. The congregation followed the practice of the Congregation of Amsterdam. Today there are two synagogues at Paramaribo, both Sephardic, which now serve the approximately seven hundred Jews in the country.

A much larger group of native people continue to practice their traditional religions. There are a small number of Chinese, who, like the Indians and Indonesians, came after the abolition of slavery, and who have retained their Buddhist faith. Some of those of West African ancestry have tried to keep their African beliefs and practice alive.

Sources:

Bekier, B. E. "Perseverance of African Beliefs in the Religious Idea of the Bosnegers in Surinam." Hemispheres 1 (1985): 93–108.
 Hamilton, J. Taylor, and Kenneth G. Hamilton. History of the Moravian Church: The Renewed Unitas Fratrum, 1722–1957. Bethlehem, PA: Interprovincial Board of Christian Education, Moravian Church in America, 1967.
 Suparian, P. The Javanese in Surinam: Ethnicity in an Ethnically Plural Society. Ph.D. dissertation, University of Illinois, 1976.
 Van der Berg, C., and P. van der Veer. "Pandits, Power, and Profit: Religious Organization and the Construction of Identity among Surinamese Hindus." Ethnic and Racial Studies 9, 4 (1986): 514–528.
 Vernooij, J. "The Christian Churches of Surinam." Exchange 10, 29 (1981): 16–31.

Svalbard and Jan Mayen Islands

Svalbard (literally, cold coast) and the Jan Mayen Islands form an overseas territory of Norway located in the North Sea, north of the European mainland. Together they consist of some 150 islands with four main ones. These uninhabited islands were discovered in 1596 by Jacob Heemskerck, a Dutchman on a whaling expedition. They were claimed by the Dutch until granted to Norway in 1920 in the Spitsber-

Status of religions in Svalbard & Jan Mayen Islands, 2000-2050

Followers	2000			2025	2050
	total	%	rate
Christians	1,900	52.3	1.85	2,200	2,800
Protestants	1,000	27.2	1.64	1,100	1,200
Orthodox	750	20.4	2.24	980	1,300
Nonreligious	1,800	47.7	2.28	2,400	3,200
Total population	3,700	100.0	1.90	4,700	6,000

gen Treaty. In the meantime, in 1713 the Russians established a presence.

Today some three thousand people live on the islands, some engaged in mining and some in running various weather and research stations. In the summer there is some tourism. The only visible religious life on the island is the CHURCH OF NORWAY (Lutheran), which sends chaplains to conduct worship for the people stationed there (most on temporary assignment). The territory is assigned to the ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH's Vicariate of North Norway, headquartered at Tromsø, but there is little Catholic presence amid the residents and there are no Catholic services.

The islands have been a source of conflict between Norway and both Denmark (with hegemony over Greenland) and Russia.

Source:

Arlov, T. B. A Short History of Svalbard. Polarhåndbok no. 4. Oslo: Norsk Polarinstitutt, 1989.

Swaminarayan Hinduism

Swaminarayan Hinduism began as an early-nineteenth-century reform movement. The founder, Sahajanand Swami (1781–1830), became an important religious teacher and reformer in Gujarat during the period of political disunity and social upheaval that coincided with the imposition of British rule in Gujarat.

Sahajanand Swami attacked three social evils: female infanticide, widow burning, and opium addiction. He opposed the British trade in opium and the pernicious effects of drug addiction on the peasants. He also advocated the protection and social uplift of women by opposing large dowries, establishing separate precincts in the temples for women, and permitting some celibate women to reside in the temples.

Sahajanand Swami preached against the practices of corrupt sadhus and lax discipline among householders. The major reform he instituted was a strict discipline for his sadhus, including five primary vows: (1) celibacy and strict separation from women; (2) renunciation of all family ties; (3) avoiding attachment to the objects of the senses; (4) poverty; (5) overcoming ego. Although the sadhus renounced the world, they lived in towns and cities to organize social and religious affairs. Sahajanand Swami established a strict discipline for householders that does not require renunciation of the world. His followers took five vows: not to eat meat, not to take intoxicants, not to commit adultery, not to steal, and not to defile oneself or others. Nonviolence, vegetarianism, and freedom from addictions are stressed.

As the group grew, Sahajanand Swami himself soon became the object of veneration. Vaishnava theology teaches that when human plight is great, Vishnu appears to bring true religion and salvation. Krishna was the most prominent deity in Gujarat, and images of Krishna and his consort Radha were placed in Swaminarayan temples, but Sahajanand Swami came to be worshipped as Lord Swaminarayan. The theology of the group presents him as the manifestation of the highest reality, Purushottam; supports worship of his image in temples; and describes his heavenly abode as Akshardham. Swaminarayan established major temples at Vadtal and Ahmedabad and appointed his brothers' sons to be acharyas (monastic leaders) and administrators of two Swaminarayan dioceses that divide all Gujarat and India north and south.

Swaminarayan Hindus accept the Vedas and other basic sacred Hindu scriptures and doctrines, and they preserve four additional texts that are attributed to Swaminarayan's inspiration. The Sikshapatri contains rules for sadhus, householders, women, and acharyas. The Vachanamritam is a collection of philosophical sermons given by Swaminarayan. The Satsangijivan is a five-volume Sanskrit compendium of all the teachings, history, and legends from the life of Swaminarayan. The Lekh is more narrowly focused on regulations about the succession of the acharyas of Ahmedabad and Vadtal.

The nineteenth century saw steady growth of Swaminarayan Hinduism in Gujarat; the twentieth century witnessed both division in India and significant growth abroad among Gujaratis in East Africa, Britain, and North America. The major division occurred in 1906 when a sadhu named Swami Yagnapurushdas (1865–1951) split from the Vadtal temple to establish his own group with a few sadhus and a small number of householders. The doctrine of the Bochasanwasi Swaminarayan Sanstha (BAPS) is that Yagnapurushdas and his successors are the human abode (askhar) of Purushottam. The current leader, Narayanswarupdas Swami, popularly known as Pramukh Swami (b. 1921), presides over a rapidly growing institution.

A smaller group was founded by Mukтаживандас Swami, a sadhu who left the Ahmedabad temple in the 1940s and set up a new institution at Maninagar. In 1972 he revealed that he was the personification of the Swaminarayan Gadi, and thereafter he received divine honors. He died in Bolton in 1979 while on tour to visit his disciples in Great Britain.

Gujarati emigrations and rapid modern mobility and communication established Swaminarayan Hinduism as a growing transnational religion. Gujarati workers in British East Africa built temples that are still active in Kenya, Tanzania, and Uganda. After the independence of African countries, many immigrated to Britain, where Swaminarayan is the fastest-growing Hindu group. Many British Swaminarayan temples have been built since 1980—including the impressive BAPS temple in north London. Significant Gujarati immigration to the United States followed liberalization of the immigration laws in 1965. The Akshar Purushottam Sanstha group alone has more than 148 centers and 22 major temples in North America. Two international organizations have been formed by followers of the two original dioceses of Ahmedabad and Vadtal: the International Swaminarayan Satsang Organization (ISSO) and the International Swaminarayan Satsang Mandal (ISSM).

Swaziland

Swaminarayan Hinduism continues to be a significant force in the preservation of personal and group identity for many Gujaratis in India and in the contemporary diaspora.

Addresses:

BAPS
Shree Swaminarayan
Mandir, Shahibaug
Amdavad-380 004
Gujarat
India
<http://www.swaminarayan.org>

ISSO and ISSM
Shree Swaminarayan Mandir
2114 Pine St.
Grand Prairie, TX 75050

ISSO and ISSM
Shree Hari House 99B
Cobbold Rd.
Willesden
London NW10 9SL
United Kingdom
<http://www.swaminarayan.nu>

Status of religions in Swaziland, 2000-2050

Followers	2000			2025	2050
	total	%	rate
Christians	875,000	86.9	3.24	1,592,000	2,211,000
Independents	460,000	45.6	3.38	870,000	1,250,000
Protestants	153,000	15.2	2.86	256,000	330,000
Roman Catholics	54,000	5.4	1.73	90,000	120,000
Ethnoreligionists	108,000	10.7	0.75	140,000	140,000
Nonreligious	12,000	1.2	4.79	25,000	40,000
Muslims	6,600	0.7	3.41	14,000	23,000
Baha'is	4,500	0.5	4.17	10,000	16,400
Hindus	1,500	0.2	2.47	3,000	4,800
Atheists	260	0.0	2.70	500	800
Total population	1,008,000	100.0	2.96	1,785,000	2,436,000

Raymond B. Williams

Sources:

Dave, H. T. Life and Philosophy of Shree Swaminarayan. London: George Allen and Unwin, 1974.
Williams, Raymond Brady. A New Face of Hinduism: The Swaminarayan Religion. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1984.
———. Religions of Immigrants from India and Pakistan: New Threads in the American Tapestry. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1988.

Swaziland

The nation of Swaziland was formed when several very different groups united to oppose Zulu expansion from Natal and the Transvaal. Sobhuza, the head of the Dlamini, who had brought about the union, died in 1839. His son, M'swazi, would rule for the next three decades, during which time the primary force threatening the nation became the Boers. He would give his name to the nation.

In 1867, Swaziland, a relatively small land, became a British protectorate and remained administratively separate as Great Britain established its control over all of South Africa. The drive to full independence was accelerated by the break between South Africa and the United Kingdom in 1960. The country was granted internal autonomy in 1967 and full independence the next year. It adopted a parliamentary monarchy, and King Sobhuza II was the first ruler of the independent nation. In 1973 he dissolved parliament and proclaimed himself the absolute monarch. He instituted a new constitution that included a legislature consisting of members elected by the public and those appointed by the king. The prime minister and the queen mother both held important leadership responsibilities.

The death of King Sobhuza in 1982 led to a power struggle within the royal family. In 1986, nineteen-year-old prince Makhosetive assumed the throne as Mswati III, and he continues to lead the country. He has adopted a conservative stance that continues the country's strong ties to South Africa, upon which it is economically dependent.

Traditional religion in Swaziland has revolved around the royal family, and the welfare of the state was seen as a reflection of the king's well-being. He and his mother were revered as the makers of rain. The royal ancestors are also seen as having an intercessory role with Umlhulumcandi, the First Being. Traditional religionists also have a strong belief in the phenomenon of possession, and possession by spirits, ancestors, and animals is a common part of religious practice. Approximately 10 percent of the people continue in their traditional belief system. That number has dropped steadily, however, through the twentieth century.

The Swaziland king invited Methodist missionaries from South Africa into his realm in 1825. However, that and several other attempts to evangelize the nation over the next several decades ended in failure. Permanent work really began in 1881 with the arrival of the United Society for the Propagation of the Gospel to build the CHURCH OF ENGLAND. Their work was constituted a diocese of the Anglican Church in the Province of South Africa in 1968. In 1887 German Lutherans began work that has matured into a diocese of the EVANGELICAL LUTHERAN CHURCH IN SOUTHERN AFRICA. Methodists made a new beginning in 1895 and finally built a substantial work integrated into the METHODIST CHURCH OF SOUTH AFRICA.

As the major Protestant churches came into Swaziland from South Africa, so also was the country invaded by AFRICAN INITIATED CHURCHES, originally formed in their larger neighbor. Possibly the first independent church to arrive was the Independent Methodist Church (a schism from the AFRICAN METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH). Between 1906 and 1936, some twenty indigenous groups established work, the largest being branches of the ZIONIST AND APOSTOLIC CHURCHES, the Christian Catholic Holy Spirit Church in Zion, the Christian Apostolic Church in Zion of South Africa, and the Swazi Christian Church in Zion of South Africa.

In 1939 the king of Swaziland attempted to unite all the small independent churches operating in the country into a national church. Although his success was only partial, the United Christian Church of Africa did come into being, and the king is still considered its leader. A cathedral was erected in 1970 and opened in 1979 as the National Swazi Church. It is the site of special Easter services attended by the royal family.

The ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH arrived rather late, when brothers with the Order of the Servants of Mary opened their initial mission in 1913. The work was freed from the Vicariate of Natal in 1923 with the creation of the prefecture of Swaziland. In 1961 the new suffragan diocese of Swaziland was attached to the diocese of Pretoria. The erection of the diocese was a result of two decades of rapid growth following the end of World War II.

The Swaziland Conference of Churches, which includes not only the older missionary churches but also the Roman Catholic Church, the SEVENTH-DAY ADVENTIST CHURCH, and a number of new conservative Evangelical churches, was formed in 1965. In 1976 the Roman Catholic, Lutheran, Mennonite, and African Methodist churches founded the Council of Swaziland Council of Churches, which is affiliated with the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES. Many of the African Initiated Churches are united in the League of African Churches in Swaziland, and conservative Evangelicals have established the Association of Evangelicals of Swaziland, affiliated with the WORLD EVANGELICAL ALLIANCE.

Islam and Judaism have made little impact on Swaziland, and there are no visible communities of Buddhists or Hindus. The primary non-Christian community to arise in the twentieth century is the BAHÁ'Í FAITH.

Sources:

- Armitage, F. L. "Abakamoya: People of the Spirit: A Study of the Zionist Movement in Swaziland with Special Reference to the Swazi Christian Church in Zion of South Africa and the Nazareth Branch." Ph.D. dissertation, University of Aberdeen, Scotland, 1976.
- Byaruhanga-Akilki, A. B. T. Religion in Swaziland. Kwaluseni, Swaziland: University of Botswana, Lesotho, and Swaziland, 1975.
- Kasenene, P. Religion in Swaziland. Braamfontein, South Africa: Skotaville, 1993.
- Ndlovu, H. L. "The Royal Easter Ritual and Political Action in Swaziland." Ph.D. dissertation, McMaster University, 1993.
- Perkins, F. J. "A History of Christian Missions in Swaziland to 1910." Ph.D. dissertation, University of Witwatersrand, 1974.

Sweden

Megalithic monuments, rock-carvings, and grave-mounds bear witness to prehistoric religion during the Stone, the Bronze, and the Iron Ages. In one of the earliest written sources about religion in Swedish territory, Adam from Bremen, in a report to his archbishop in 1070, speaks about a pagan temple in Uppsala, where the gods of Thor, Woden, and Frej were worshipped through sacrificial rituals every ninth year. Most probably Sweden shared the Old Norse mythology and cosmology described in the Icelandic literature (the Eddas).

Christian mission began in Sweden in the ninth century. A small congregation was founded in 830 by Ansgar, a Frankish-German monk considered the "Apostle of the North." Through Viking settlements and trading, the impact of Christianity increased. Olof Skötkonung, considered the first king of Sweden, was probably baptized in the year 1000. In 1164, Uppsala was designated as the see of the archbishop. Saint Bridget (Birgitta) of Sweden, known for her visions and revelations and the founding of an order, lived in the fourteenth century. At the time of the Reformation, in the sixteenth century, the CHURCH OF SWEDEN switched its allegiance from the ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH to LUTHERANISM, and now exists as an evangelical Lutheran church. During the following centuries the position of the church as a state church was strengthened, and Swedish citizenship implied church membership. Adopting or giving expression to a faith that was not strictly in accordance with the teachings of the church became a penal offense and could lead to exile.

Sweden

The religious currents of the eighteenth century, such as pietism, also spread in Sweden. Later on, Methodism, the Baptists, the Holiness movements, and other revival movements were brought to the country from England and North America. In Sweden these revival movements turned into popular movements (folkrörelser), in opposition to the Church of Sweden and to a society with a state church system. Moreover, the liberal ideas of the nineteenth century contributed very significantly to breaking the religious hegemony of the church. During the second part of that century, a number of denominations were acknowledged and given permission to act as Free Churches alongside the state church. Also the CHURCH OF JESUS CHRIST OF LATTER-DAY SAINTS was by then established in this country. During the first decades of the twentieth century, the JEHOVAH'S WITNESSES became noticeable; PENTECOSTALISM had also gained adherents.

Swedish people had to wait until 1952 to obtain full freedom of religion, even the right to reject any religious affiliation whatsoever. Today, however, the once homogeneous country of Sweden has turned into a pluralistic and a multicultural society. This change has been mainly due to labor immigration and the influx of refugees. Sweden has a population of 8.9 million, and of those, 12 percent are immigrants. All this has, of course, meant changes in the field of religion. The year 2000 was a memorable year in that the state church system as such was abolished. The full impact

Status of religions in Sweden, 2000-2050

Followers	2000			2025	2050
	total	%	rate
Christians	6,052,000	67.9	0.30	6,030,000	5,605,000
Protestants	8,420,000	94.5	0.30	8,450,000	7,965,000
Roman Catholics	175,000	2.0	1.49	260,000	300,000
Orthodox	120,000	1.4	1.34	170,000	210,000
Nonreligious	1,562,000	17.5	0.42	1,652,000	1,601,000
Atheists	1,059,000	11.9	0.43	1,100,000	1,100,000
Muslims	202,000	2.3	3.93	270,000	300,000
Jews	16,100	0.2	0.39	17,500	18,000
Baha'is	5,000	0.1	1.62	6,000	9,000
Buddhists	1,100	0.0	1.66	2,000	3,000
Hindus	180	0.0	67.99	300	400
other religionists	13,100	0.2	0.90	19,500	25,000
Total population	8,910,000	100.0	0.40	9,097,000	8,661,000

of that event on the religious community as a whole still remains to be seen.

Today, 7.4 million Swedes, or 83 percent of the population, are members of the Church of Sweden. In 1975, 10.8 million church attendances for the Sunday-morning service were reported, and among fifteen-year-olds, 63 percent had been confirmed; in 2000, the corresponding figures had fallen to 6.6 million and 43 percent. On the other hand, during the same period, attendance at music services/concerts (musikgudstjänster) has increased from 1.4 million to 2.4 million. These data may serve as examples of religious change in Sweden. In 1960, the first ordination of women priests took place. Today, of those in the ministry, almost one-third are women, two of whom are bishops.

The once rebellious Free Church denominations are today well integrated into Swedish society, and they participate in ecumenical work. As far as membership within these denominations is concerned, the trend is one of decline, from 255,500 in 1985 to 216,000 in 1999. The largest is the Pentecostal movement (Pingströrelsen), with 90,000 members. The Pentecostals reach out to immigrants, and meetings, though small, are held not only in the common Western languages but also in Amharic/Tigrinya, Arabic, Persian, and Romany for the Roma (Gypsies). The MISSION COVENANT CHURCH OF SWEDEN (Svenska Missionsförbundet), having originated from a Low-Church movement, has 67,000 members. It accepts both infant and believer's baptism, and is a member of the WORLD ALLIANCE OF REFORMED CHURCHES. InterAct (Nybygget), with 28,800 members, is the only denomination that has had a small but distinct membership increase. It was established in 1996 through a union between three Baptist denominations founded in the nineteenth century. It is a member of the WORLD EVANGELICAL ALLIANCE. Also present are the Baptist Union of Sweden (Svenska Baptistsamfundet); the Swedish Alliance Mission (Svenska Alliansmissionen); the SALVATION ARMY; the METHODIST CHURCH; a branch of U.S.-based UNITED METHODIST CHURCH; and the SEVENTH-DAY ADVENTIST CHURCH. All these churches are organized in the Swedish Free Church Council (Sveriges Frikyrkosamråd).

The Woodland Cemetery outside Stockholm, constructed between 1920 and 1940, blends artistically built chapels with a serene Nordic landscape. (The Cemeteries Administration of the City of Stockholm)

The Roman Catholic Church and the Orthodox and Oriental churches in Sweden have some characteristics in common, though their history differs. They are churches with many immigrants, their growth is strong, and they are primarily found in the big cities. The Catholic Church has 150,000 members, indicating that the membership has more than doubled since 1975. The church is probably the most multicultural organization in Sweden. Apart from the congregations, there are the so-called national groups, the largest being the Polish community (30,000 members) and the Spanish-speakers (20,000 members). Mass is celebrated regularly in Arabic, Croatian, Hungarian, English, French, Gheez, Italian, Portuguese, Slovene, and Vietnamese. The Orthodox and Eastern churches have altogether 100,000 faithful, a figure that has doubled since 1975. The SYRIAC ORTHODOX PATRIARCHATE OF ANTI- OCH AND ALL THE EAST is the largest, with 28,000 members. The SERBIAN ORTHODOX CHURCH has 23,000 members. Many of the Greek Orthodox Church members, who came to Sweden as labor migrants, have returned to Greece. Then there are the Bulgarian, Estonian, Finnish, Macedonian, Rumanian, Russian, Armenian, Coptic, and Ethiopian Orthodox churches, plus the APOSTOLIC CATHOLIC ASSYRIAN CHURCH OF THE EAST. There is also a Swedish Orthodox deanery.

Among the Protestant foreign churches, the ESTONIAN EVANGELICAL LUTHERAN CHURCH is the biggest (12,000 members), followed by the Hungarian Protestant Church (6,000). All churches and denominations mentioned above are members or observers in the Christian Council of Sweden (Sveriges kristna råd).

The Faith Movement (Trosrörelsen) was established in Sweden in the early 1980s, when Ulf Ekman, once a priest in the Church of Sweden but later influenced by the teachings of Pentecostal teacher Kenneth Hagin in Tulsa, Oklahoma, founded a congregation in Uppsala, the Word of Life (Livets Ord). There are now some forty congregations with 6,000 members affiliated to the Word of Life. In the beginning the growth of the Faith Movement caused conflicts with the surrounding religious society. The Word of Life pursue an extensive missionary work, particularly in the former Soviet Union, where quite a number of congregations and Bible schools have been founded. In recent years India has been at the focus of this kind of activity. The Vineyard also has some propagation in Sweden, with 1,000 members in ten congregations and house groups. The INTERNATIONAL CHURCHES OF CHRIST have one congregation in Stockholm, with some 150 members.

Up to the beginning of the twentieth century, almost 8,000 Mormons had left for Utah. Today the CHURCH OF JESUS CHRIST OF LATTER-DAY SAINTS in Sweden numbers 8,500, which implies an increase of more than 50 percent since 1975. Almost half of the members belong to congregations in the three big city areas of Stockholm, Malmö, and Gothenburg. In 1985 a temple was built in a suburb of Stockholm. The JEHOVAH'S WITNESSES have also increased by more than 50 percent, and there are now 23,500 members or publishers; at the memorial in 1999, some 36,000 individuals were present. In contrast to the Latter-day Saints, their congregations are more evenly distributed throughout the country. To a higher degree than the Pentecostals, the Jehovah's Witnesses have gained adherents among immigrants. Taken together, immigrants make up 10 percent of the members; there is even an Arabic congregation. Denominations like the LIBERAL CATHOLIC CHURCH, the NEW APOSTOLIC CHURCH, and CHURCH OF CHRIST, SCIENTIST may have roughly 2,000 members among them, including adherents of the SWEDENBORGIAN MOVEMENT.

Among the non-Christian world religions, the Jews were given special permission to settle in Sweden, and to practice their religion, as early as the end of the eighteenth century. Today there may be 16,500 Jews, of whom 8,000 are members of a community, a figure that has been fairly constant. The big waves of immigration in recent years account for the enormous growth of Muslims in Sweden. The number of regular attendants at the different mosques in Sweden can be estimated at 100,000, though the number of immigrants and refugees with Muslim backgrounds ("ethnic" Muslims) may amount to 300,000 or even more. A big mosque, which can accommodate 1,500 people, was opened last year in Stockholm. Other mosques—buildings that have been established and built for the sole purpose of being a mosque—can be found in Malmö, Trollhättan, and Uppsala. In Gothenburg there is a mosque of the AH-MADIYYA MOVEMENT IN ISLAM. The BAHÁ'Í FAITH, with 900 adherents, is a middle-class phenomenon consisting of Iranians, but with many Swedish converts as well. The Hindus can be estimated at some 3,000 to 5,000, the INTERNATIONAL SOCIETY FOR KRISHNA CONSCIOUSNESS included. The Sikhs number about 800. Further, there are some 800 to 1,000 Buddhists in Sweden, among them a number of Western converts, ZEN and TIBETAN BUDDHISTS in particular.

Of course a number of New Religions have established themselves, even in Sweden. There are formations such as the CHURCH OF SCIENTOLOGY (in 2000 they were granted permission to conduct marriages), a few adherents of the RAELEIAN MOVEMENT, and the CHURCH UNIVERSAL AND TRIUMPHANT, but also a number of neo-Hindu and neopagan groups including WICCA and neo-shamanism. Tentatively, the number of regular and active members within these movements may be estimated at 10,000—and some 500 of those hold to the Æsir cult. This figure has not changed very much in recent decades. Closely related to these religions and movements are the large number of loosely organized, New Age-inspired groups. If belief in reincarnation would do as a criterion of susceptibility to these kinds of new religiosity, they may involve some 400,000 individuals (the Hindus and the Buddhists excluded). Finally, Humanisterna (The Humanists), promoting humanism as a philosophy of life and affiliated with the INTERNATIONAL HUMANIST AND ETHICAL UNION, has some 700 members.

A study from 1999 including all religions showed that, during a September weekend, one million people, or 12 percent of the population, took part in a religious event either by attending services or through media religion (or both). That is a result which, when all religions and different faiths are considered, questions the picture of Sweden as a highly secularized country.

Margareta Skog

Sources:

- Skog, Margareta, ed. Det religiösa Sverige: Gudstjänst-och andaktsliv under ett veckoslut kring millennieskiftet. Örebro: Libris, 2001.
- Tegborg, Lennart, ed. Sveriges kyrkohistoria. 8 vols. Stockholm: Verbum, 1998–.

Turville-Petre, E. O. G. Myth and Religion of the North: The Religion of the Ancient Scandinavia. London: Weidenfeld and Nicolson, 1964.

Swedenborgian Church of North America

The Swedenborgian Church of North America, one of several churches to grow out of the teachings of Swedish visionary and theologian Emanuel Swedenborg (1688–1772), was established in Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, in 1817 as the General Convention of the New Jerusalem Church. Boston, Massachusetts, however, has long been the organizational center and spiritual home of the church. At the time of the founding of this organization, there were already seventeen different societies in the United States with approximately 360 members. The purpose of the organization was threefold: (1) to lay the foundation for permanent organization and central control of the church; (2) to regularize ordination; and (3) to support missionary efforts. Although the founding generation of this organization theoretically considered an episcopal form of church government, they opted for the more democratic congregational form. It suited the spirit of the times, as well as the previous history of the church.

The Swedenborgian Church of North America still has a congregational governmental structure. It holds an annual convention in which delegates from the various congregations assemble to conduct the business of the church. These annual meetings have been held since 1817 without interruption. At these meetings decisions are made regarding ordination, the by-laws, and the overall policies of the church. At the meeting, the administrative offices of the church are also filled. The offices are president, vice president, recording secretary, and treasurer. The president is elected for one three-year term and may be elected to serve an additional three years. After serving two terms, he or she is not immediately eligible to run again. The other administrative officers of the church serve for terms of one year and are eligible for reelection without limit.

The president and other administrative officers, along with three ministers and six laypersons, form the General Council, which constitutes the governing body of the church. One minister and two laypersons are elected annually to serve terms of three years. The General Council is assisted in its work by Support Units that are specifically focused on functional areas, such as communications, education, ministry support, and so forth. The chairs of the Support Units form the cabinet, which is chaired by the president. There is also a Council of Ministers that oversees the pastoral and theological matters of the church.

The Swedenborgian Church of North America reported in its journal for the year 2000 that it has a total membership of 2,104, of whom 1,543 are listed as active members.

The journal listed forty-three churches, thirty-six active ministers, and three authorized lay leaders. General Convention Swedenborgian Churches are located in the United States, Canada, and Guyana. In recent years the Swedenborgian Church has attempted to move beyond external criteria for membership and leadership roles in the church. In the case of the ministry, the church developed a “Statement of Inclusiveness,” preferring to make decisions regarding ordination based on “the quality of ministry that it believes the individual is capable of providing.” Women have been ordained into the ministry since 1975, and there are currently sixteen listed on the roll. Since 1997 a person’s sexual orientation is no longer regarded as an impediment to ordination.

There are two patterns of worship in the Swedenborgian Church, traditional and contemporary. The traditional format is similar to Low-Church Episcopal. A liturgy is used with opening responses, chants that are sung, two readings from the Word (Bible) separated by an anthem or solo, a sermon that is extemporaneous or read from a manuscript, pastoral prayer, affirmation of faith, hymns, offertory, and a benediction. Some of the churches that use this format have incorporated children’s talks into it.

There are also contemporary services in the Swedenborgian Church. Although they vary greatly, a consistent feature is extensive lay participation. Sacred dance and skits have been incorporated into these services, as well as contemporary music. They also involve sharing on the part of the congregants. There has been some controversy surrounding both of these styles of worship, because the church membership has strong preferences. But there has also been some movement toward a middle position, as societies that favor traditional forms have incorporated some more contemporary aspects in recent years. Both styles of worship require careful thought and planning if they are to be effective.

The Swedenborg School of Religion was closed in 1999, and the property in Newton, Massachusetts, was sold. Early in 2001 the Swedenborg School of Religion (SSR) formed a partnership with Pacific School of Religion (PSR) in Berkeley, California. The faculty of the SSR will inaugurate an ordination program in the newly established Swedenborg House of Studies at Pacific School of Religion in the fall of 2001. The program will offer a master of divinity degree, as well as a certificate of theological studies in conjunction with PSR. Distance education will also be a feature of the new program. The library will be housed on the PSR campus, but it will be electronically integrated with that of the Graduate Theological Union. This will make the resources of the Swedenborg House of Studies accessible worldwide through an interlibrary database.

The central office of the Swedenborgian Church of North America is located in Massachusetts in a church building designed by the noted architect Ralph Adams

Swedenborgian Movement

Cram. The Wayfarers Chapel in southern California is the national monument of the Swedenborgian Church to their founder, Emanuel Swedenborg. It is often called the “Glass Church,” and it attracts more than a quarter of a million visitors annually. The Swedenborgian Church in San Francisco is over one hundred years old and is a beautiful example of the Arts and Crafts school of architecture.

Address:

Swedenborgian Church of North America
11 Highland Ave.
Newtonville, MA 02460
<http://www.swedenborg.org/>

Jane Williams-Hogan

Sources:

- Block, Marguerite Beck. The New Church in the New World. New York: Octagon, 1968.
- Journal of the Swedenborgian Church, 2000*. Newtonville, MA: Swedenborgian Church of North America, 2000.
- Swedenborg, Emanuel. True Christian Religion. West Chester, PA: Swedenborg Foundation, 1996.
- Williams-Hogan, Jane. “Institutional and Communal Response to the Writings of Emanuel Swedenborg in Britain and the United States.” In Scribe of Heaven: Swedenborg’s Life, Work, and Impact. West Chester, PA: Swedenborg Foundation, 2001.

Swedenborgian Movement

Swedenborgian churches are founded upon the theological writings of Emanuel Swedenborg (1688–1772). Swedenborg was born in Stockholm and died in London. A scientist, philosopher, and civil servant, he published an extensive theological corpus from 1749 to 1771. He stated in True Christian Religion that “the Lord [Jesus Christ] manifested himself before me, his servant, and sent me to this office,” in order “to receive the doctrines [of the new Jerusalem] in [my] understanding [and] to publish them by the press.” From the time of his call in 1744 until his death, he wrote and published eighteen different titles in thirty volumes. All of his theological writings were written in Latin. His first theological work, Arcana Coelestia (1749–1756), or Secrets of Heaven, was published in eight volumes. It presents the spiritual or internal sense of the biblical books of Genesis and Exodus. Also included in his corpus are works entitled Heaven and Hell (1758), the Last Judgement (1758), Revelation Unveiled (1766), Divine Providence (1764), Love in Marriage (1768), and True Christian Religion (1771).

Swedenborg called his theology a “new” Christianity. It emphasizes the oneness of God, who is the Lord Jesus Christ; the reality of the spiritual world and how it operates; the spiritual nature of the last judgment, which he claimed took place in 1757; the essential spiritual nature of human beings; the correspondence between the spiritual world and the natural world; human freedom in spiritual things; the marriage of love and wisdom in the Lord; the partnership of faith and charity leading to a life of use; and the sacred nature of marriage.

Swedenborg himself never attempted to found a church based upon the revelation he was given. He saw himself as a spiritual explorer and scribe. There were only a handful of people who claimed allegiance to his teachings at the time of his death, but groups of followers emerged in Sweden and England almost immediately afterward. His followers in Sweden belonged to the elite and well-educated circles of society. In England they came from more diverse social backgrounds, and a significant number of readers and followers emerged among the artisans in Lancashire. Conflicts with the Crown and the Lutheran Church in Sweden impeded development of a legally organized New Church until 1874. In England, however, a church was organized to promote New Church worship as early as 1787.

There are two well-established Swedenborgian organizations incorporated in the United States. One is called the SWEDENBORGIAN CHURCH OF NORTH AMERICA; the other is the GENERAL CHURCH OF THE NEW JERUSALEM. The Swedenborgian Church, also called the General Convention, is the more liberal of the two organizations. Its church government is democratically organized. It is a member of the National Council of Churches and sees itself as an advocate for liberal political causes in the United States and the world. The convention advocates group diversity and environmentally aware thinking as part of its spirituality.

The General Church is more conservative and does not feel that the church should take stands on political issues, leaving such activism up to the individual. Its church government is hierarchically organized. Although not advocating diversity per se, the membership of the General Church is racially and ethnically the most varied of any Swedenborgian organization worldwide.

The Swedenborgian movement from the beginning has been international in character. In the eighteenth century readers of Swedenborg’s religious writings were found in Sweden, England, Germany, France, and America. Readers formed themselves into groups in Skara, Gothenberg, and Stockholm, Sweden; London, Manchester, and Birmingham, England; Boston, Philadelphia, and Baltimore, U.S.A.; Tübingen, Germany; and Strasbourg, France, among other places.

The General Conference of the New Church was first organized in Great Britain in 1787, and by 1815 it had instituted a congregational structure. Church business was to be conducted at an annual conference, which has been held yearly since that time up to the present. In 1999 the General Conference had 1,314 adult members in thirty societies, served by thirteen ministers and two assistants. The General Conference has recently opted to ordain women and has begun a dispersed learning program in conjunction with its theological school, the New Church College, Radcliffe, Manchester.

The General Conference was supportive of the development of the New Church in the nineteenth and early twentieth centuries. Today there are independent Swedenborgian New Church organizations in Australia, South Africa, and Nigeria that were at one time closely associated with the General Conference. The conference also has ties to New Church societies in New Zealand and Mauritius. The developments in South Africa and Nigeria are particularly worthy of mention, because Africans have been particularly responsive to the religious writings of Emanuel Swedenborg.

The roots of the New Church of Southern Africa go back to the discovery of a copy of Swedenborg's True Christian Religion by David W. Mooki in 1909. He found a copy in a used furniture store, bought it, read it, and decided that its message concerning the one God, the Lord Jesus Christ, was true. He wished to found a church based upon this truth. Certain that there were more books and an organization already in existence somewhere in the world, he converted the members of his African Holy Catholic Church congregation to the teachings of the New Church. He made contact with the British Conference in 1917. As a result, his church became a missionary church of the General Conference. His efforts thrived, and by 1960 the church had twenty-five thousand members, thirty-nine churches, and 114 ministers. They became independent in 1969, under the leadership of David Mooki's son Obed, and took on the name cited above. The New Church of Southern Africa is congregationally organized, and church business is addressed annually in a conference and then supervised by a president for the remainder of the year. Given the strong leadership style of Obed Mooki, his death in 1990 created problems for the organization. A schism occurred, and in the year 2000, the membership of the New Church of Southern Africa stands at about fifteen thousand adult members. They have forty-one ministers, fifty evangelists, and more than eighty societies.

The New Church in West Africa developed in Nigeria within the same time frame as the New Church in South Africa, with a similar story of development. Africanus Mensah bought copies of Swedenborg's religious writings through an advertisement, and upon reading them he became convinced of their truth. He made contact with the General Conference, and his organization was recognized by them in 1939. When Mensah died in 1942, there were approximately one thousand adult members in thirteen societies. The church is congregational in structure, and in 1981 it became an organization independent of the General Conference in the UK.

A European Association of the New Church is headquartered in Switzerland. This is an umbrella organization for groups located in France, Germany, Italy, and other countries in Europe. There are also independent Swedenborgian New Church organizations in, among other countries, the Czech Republic, Kenya, Korea, the Philippines, Russia, and Sri Lanka.

Addresses:

General Conference of the New Church
20 Bloomsbury Way
London WC1A 2TH
United Kingdom

New Church of Southern Africa
P.O. Box 592
Orlando East 1803
Soweto
South Africa

New Church in West Africa
P.O. Box 22
Owo
Ondo
Nigeria

European Association of the New Church
Buchholzstrasse 141
8053 Zurich
Switzerland

Jane Williams-Hogan

Sources:

Spaulding, John Howard. Introduction to Swedenborg's Religious Thought. New York: Swedenborg Publishing Association, 1977.

Williams-Hogan, Jane. "Institutional and Communal Response to the Writings of Emanuel Swedenborg in Britain and the United States." In Scribe of Heaven: Swedenborg's Life, Work, and Impact. West Chester, PA: Swedenborg Foundation, 2001.

Woofenden, William Ross. Swedenborg Researcher's Manual. Bryn Athyn, PA: Swedenborg Scientific Association, 1988.

Switzerland

With the advent of the Reformation, the Swiss Confederation became a religiously mixed country. Under the influence of theologians such as Huldrych Zwingli (1484–1531) in Zurich, John Oecolampadius (1482–1531) in Basle, Guillaume Farel (1489–1565) in Neufchatel, and John Calvin (1509–1564) in Geneva, several Swiss cantons turned to Protestantism; others continued their prior alignment to the ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH. One split into two half-cantons, and both religions were tolerated in some territories jointly owned by several cantons. Up to the nineteenth century, religious fault lines would have lasting consequences for Switzerland also at the political level: There were several internal conflicts related to religious differences.

Switzerland

The next step was the making of the federal state in the nineteenth century. Liberal political circles, eager to modernize the country, saw the conservative and hierarchical spirit of the ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH as an obstacle, in opposition to democratic aspirations. In addition, while the Protestant churches in Switzerland were cantonal ones, easily controlled by local authorities, the Roman Catholic Church formed a supranational religious organization, and its faithful were obedient to a spiritual power located abroad. This led to several clashes; as a result, a secret, separate alliance (Sonderbund) was concluded by seven Catholic cantons in order to help each other in case of an aggression. This was unacceptable to the other cantons, and a brief military campaign in November 1847 led to the defeat of the Sonderbund.

In 1848 the first federal constitution was adopted and ushered in Switzerland's modern political system. Another federal constitution came into force in 1874, and remained in force (with amendments) until 2000. The 1874 Constitution affirmed the inviolability of freedom of conscience and belief, but some passages showed a clear suspicion toward possible infringements by the Roman Catholic Church. In addition, it was forbidden to create new dioceses in Switzerland without permission of the federal government, or to establish new convents or religious orders; and the JESUITS (seen at that time as the spearhead of Roman Catholicism) were not allowed to operate on Swiss territory. The articles banning the Jesuits and the foundation of new convents or religious orders were taken out of the constitution in 1973; they had not been enforced for many years. But it was not until 2001 that the obligation to get approval from the federal government for the creation of new dioceses disappeared from the constitution.

The nineteenth century also saw the emergence of religious pluralism. There had already been people outside the mainstream previously: At the time of the Reformation, radical trends emerged with the Anabaptists (Zurich, 1525), who were severely persecuted; some managed to survive in isolated places—the Mennonites still exist today. Jews were

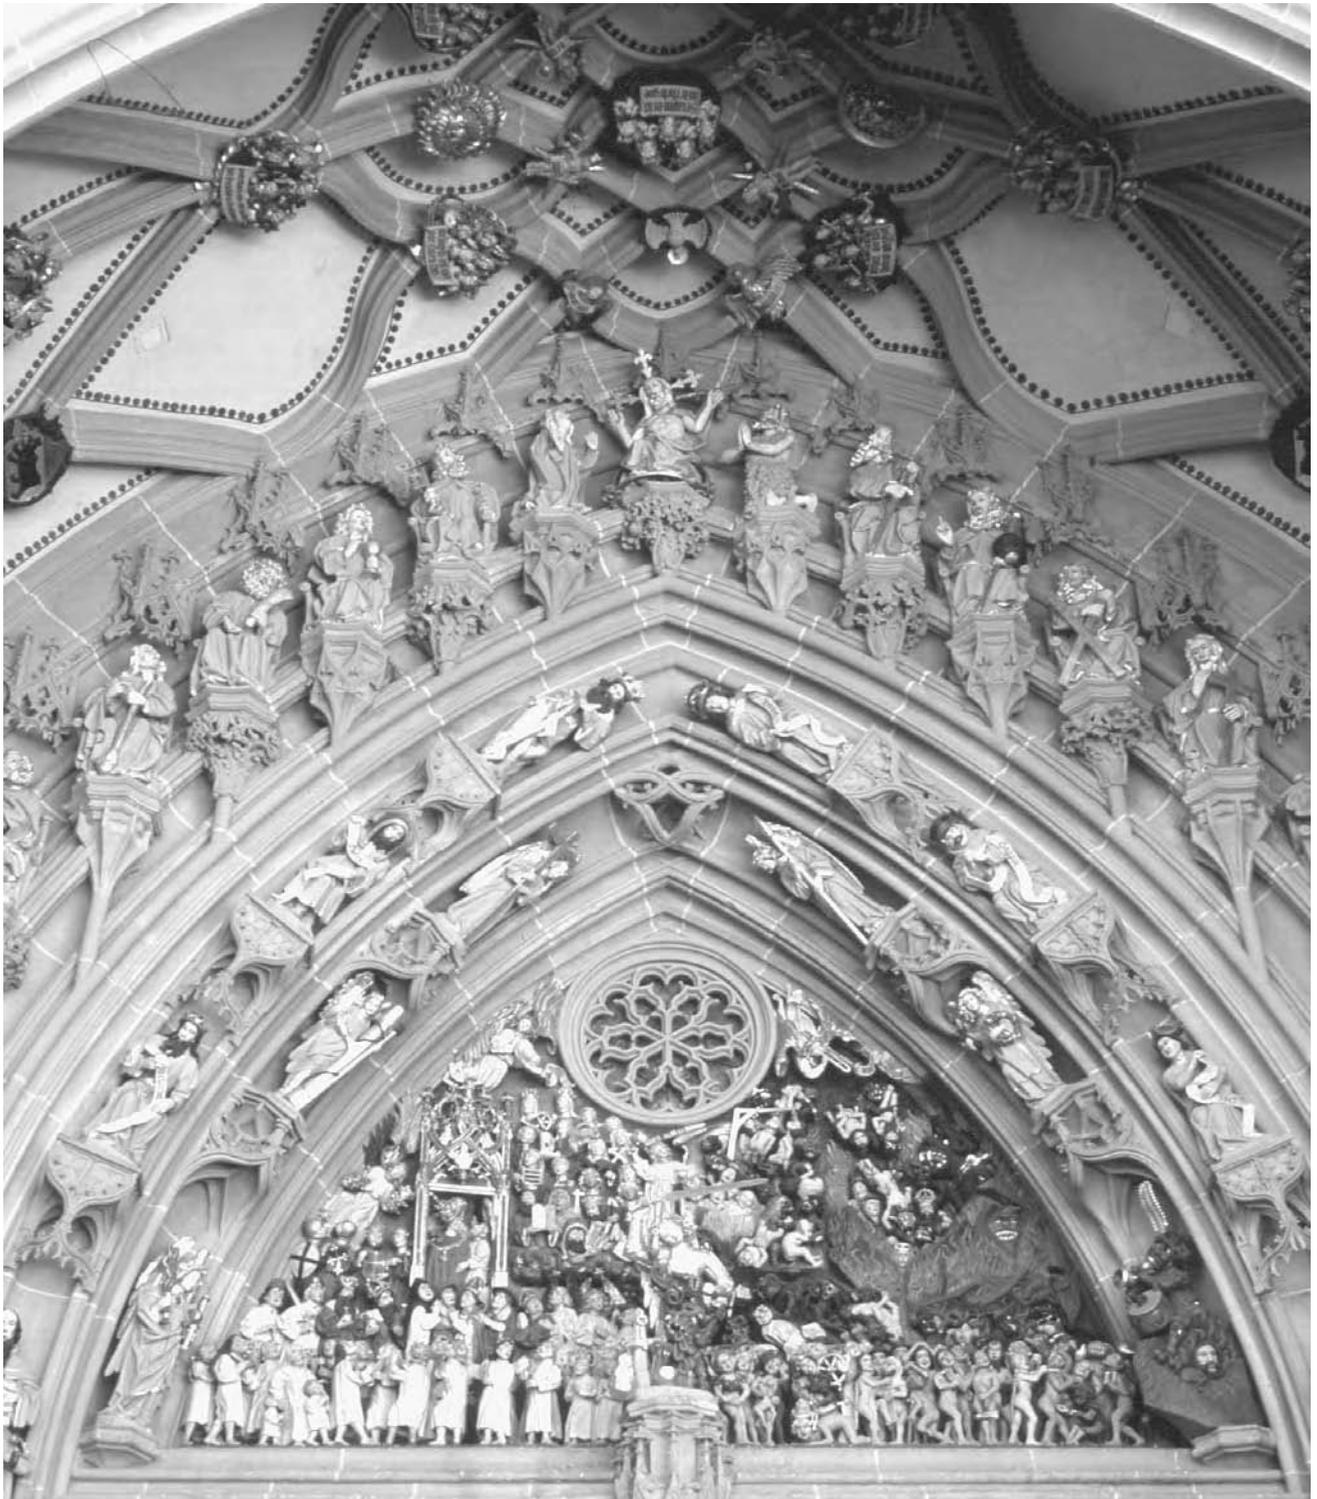

Status of religions in Switzerland, 2000-2050

Followers	2000			2025	2050
	total	%	rate
Christians	6,527,000	88.4	0.62	6,595,000	5,690,000
Roman Catholics	3,260,000	44.1	0.44	3,200,000	2,700,000
Protestants	3,040,000	41.2	0.47	3,000,000	2,550,000
Independents	160,000	2.2	1.71	240,000	275,000
Nonreligious	522,000	7.1	2.08	622,000	652,000
Muslims	202,000	2.7	2.48	235,000	250,000
Atheists	79,800	1.1	1.32	105,000	120,000
Hindus	22,800	0.3	3.71	4,600	6,500
Jews	17,700	0.2	0.18	15,000	13,000
Buddhists	7,900	0.1	4.57	2,200	2,400
Baha'is	3,700	0.1	0.08	4,500	5,500
other religionists	2,700	0.0	0.05	4,000	5,000
Total population	7,386,000	100.0	0.78	7,587,000	6,745,000

present too, but it was only during the second half of the nineteenth century that they came to enjoy equal rights with other residents, including the right to settle at any place in Switzerland. About the same time, additional religious groups appeared in Switzerland. Among Protestants, a number of ministers and laypeople became influenced by revivalist ideas and felt unsatisfied with the control exercised by the civil authorities upon churches in their respective cantons. This gave birth to Free Churches in a few cantons, especially the Canton of Vaud, where a number of Protestant ministers, influenced by the ideas of theologian Alexander Vinet (1797–1847), resigned from the state church in protest against political intrusions in church life.

Besides the Free Churches, other small independent Christian communities, now known as the CHRISTIAN BROTHERS, emerged at various places, among them the followers of John Nelson Darby (1800–1882), who spent several years in Switzerland (especially in the areas of Geneva and Lausanne). On the Catholic side, groups of Catholic liberals separated from Rome and created an OLD CATHOLIC CHURCH after the First Vatican Council. The first Russian Orthodox church in Switzerland was consecrated in 1866. Finally, emergent new religious movements also set foot in Switzerland during that period: representatives of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints reached Switzerland as early as 1850; and the first European converts to the SEVENTH-DAY ADVENTIST CHURCH were baptized in 1866.

Elaborate carvings decorate this cathedral entrance in Berne, Switzerland. (N & J Wisemann/TRIP)

With the exception of Jews, however, religious pluralism remained confined to the Christian heritage. Inasmuch as Switzerland never did consider itself a country of immigration (although that comes to be increasingly challenged today) and never was a colonial power, extra-European, non-Christian populations were virtually nonexistent in Switzerland until the second half of the twentieth century. Especially impressive has been the rapid development of the Muslim community, built upon immigration. According to the national census, which is conducted every ten years and includes a question on religious affiliation, there were fewer than 3,000 Muslims in Switzerland in 1960, more than 16,000 in 1970, and more than 150,000 in 1990. As the new century begins (the results of the 2000 census being as yet unpublished), estimates of the Muslim population put the number above 250,000. The Swiss Muslim community consists primarily of Sunnis of the HANAFITE school who came to the country from Turkey and the Balkans.

Although the Reformed Churches had been the largest religious group till the national census of 1960, the Roman Catholic Church took the lead after the 1970 census, on account of a higher birthrate as well as a higher percentage of Roman Catholics among immigrants (who came from southern Europe: Italians, Spanish, and Portuguese came to work in Switzerland). The difference between the two confessions has increased over the years: in 1990, Roman Catholics constituted 46.32 percent of the Swiss population, while Protestants were down to 39.98 percent. And the statistical decline of Protestantism is likely to continue, in part because there are fewer psychological obstacles for a nonpracticing Protestant to give up church affiliation. Roman Catholicism, on the other hand, is far from being homogeneous. Many Swiss Catholics have imbibed Protestant principles and the democratic spirit; inasmuch as the rules in several cantons give a high level of control to laypeople in church affairs, there are possibilities for pressure. It would be difficult for a bishop on a very conservative line to affirm his authority over all parts of his diocese: In 1997 the bishop of Chur, Wolfgang Haas, had to be transferred by Rome to a newly created archbishopric in Liechtenstein because many parishes in his diocese had gone into open revolt and refused to accept him (or pay their contributions) on account of his conservative views. On the other hand, it was in Switzerland that the late ultra-conservative French archbishop Marcel Lefebvre (1905–1991) came to create the FRATERNITY/SOCIETY OF SAINT PIUS X and a seminary for the training of traditionalist Catholic priests in 1969. Since 1970 the seminary has been located at Ecône, in the canton of Valais; the Catholic traditionalist movement has found an especially strong local following in that area, and elsewhere. It was at Ecône that Archbishop Lefebvre consecrated four bishops in 1988.

There are other important trends in the religious life of Switzerland, which affect the established churches. As in several other Western European countries, the number of those claiming affiliation to one of the mainline churches has been decreasing. The unaffiliated may actually be the fastest growing group on the religious map of Switzerland: From 3.8 percent in 1980, this group had reached 7.4 percent of the population in 1990, and it is expected that the results of the 2000 census will reveal a still higher percentage. In cities like Basel or Zurich, the percentage of unaffiliated people now constitutes the largest single group in the population, accounting for more than a third of the local population. “Unaffiliated” does not necessarily mean “nonbelieving” or “nonreligious,” however; but up to now, it does not seem that minority religions have gained from the weakening of traditional religions, since affiliation to religious groups outside of the historical religions (Catholicism, Protestantism, Orthodoxy, Judaism, and Islam) remained in 1990 less than 3 percent of the population. The largest of those latter groups is the NEW APOSTOLIC CHURCH, with about thirty-seven thousand faithful. In global figures, nontraditional religions all counted together were not growing.

As everywhere in the world, the Roman Catholic Church in Switzerland is organized into dioceses. Except for the Diocese of Lugano, whose boundaries correspond to those of the Italian-speaking canton of Ticino, other dioceses do not strictly correspond to cantonal borders or cover several cantons, although there is in most cantons a cantonal Catholic corporation for administrative purposes. Most of the Reformed Churches, on the other hand, are organized along cantonal lines and are regrouped together within the FEDERATION OF SWISS PROTESTANT CHURCHES. Despite a significant statistical decline, the established churches still keep a strong position in Switzerland, since they do enjoy an official status. Religious affairs are a prerogative of the cantons: There is no federal agency dealing with those issues. Of the twenty-six cantons, only two have a regime of separation between state and religion, and even in those cases, the formerly established churches still enjoy a special status. This means that, in twenty-four cantons, people affiliated with the recognized churches (usually the Roman Catholic Church and the canton’s Reformed Church, but in some cases also the Jewish community and the Old Catholic Church) will pay church taxes (as in Germany). It is important to understand that the recognition is a cantonal one, not a national one, and it is well possible that some cantons will sooner or later choose the way of separation. The fact that only some religious communities enjoy a public law status does not mean that the others are discriminated against or prohibited from operating: There are few problems of religious freedom in Switzerland, where even emergent, fringe groups are usually able to function without any hindrance. In 2000 the federal government clearly rejected a request from a group of members of the federal parliament asking the federal authorities to introduce a nationwide policy on “cults.”

The headquarters of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES, as well as those of the LUTHERAN WORLD FEDERATION and the WORLD ALLIANCE OF REFORMED CHURCHES, are located in Geneva. In addition, several movements have established their international headquarters in Switzerland, such as the ANTHROPOSOPHICAL SOCIETY in Dornach (near Basel) and the Moral Re-Armament (renamed INITIATIVES FOR CHANGE in August 2001) in Caux (near Montreux).

Jean-François Mayer

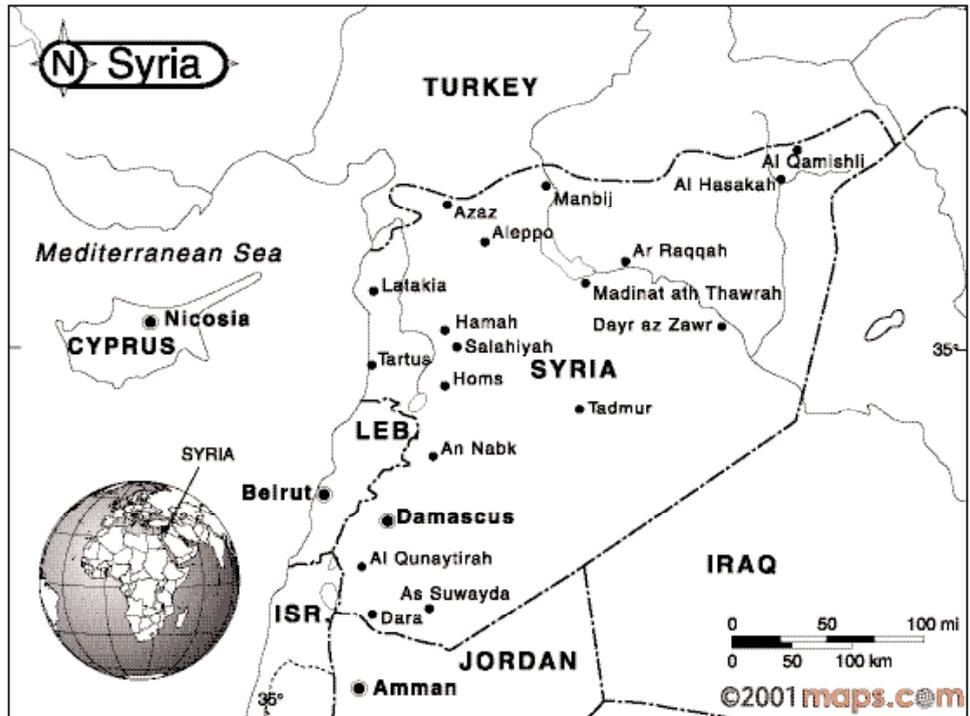

Sources:

Bovay, Claude. L'évolution de l'appartenance religieuse et confessionnelle en Suisse. Berne: Office Fédéral de la Statistique, 1997.

Kraus, Dieter. Schweizerisches Staatskirchenrecht. Tübingen: J. C. B. Mohr, 1993.

Mayer, Jean-François. “La liberté religieuse en Suisse.” Conscience et Liberté 55 (1998): 6–37.

Vischer, Lukas, et al. Ökumenische Kirchengeschichte der Schweiz. Freiburg-Basel: Paulusverlag-F. Reinhardt, 1994.

Status of religions in Syria, 2000-2050

Followers	2000			2025	2050
	total	%	rate
Muslims	14,395,000	89.3	2.72	23,216,000	30,228,000
Christians	1,263,000	7.8	1.99	2,033,000	2,556,000
Orthodox	798,000	5.0	1.77	1,250,000	1,550,000
Roman Catholics	325,000	2.0	2.06	530,000	690,000
Independents	100,000	0.6	3.93	200,000	247,000
Nonreligious	441,000	2.7	3.09	1,000,000	1,650,000
Atheists	33,900	0.2	2.69	60,000	80,000
Jews	4,100	0.0	0.32	3,000	3,000
Baha'is	120	0.0	1.59	200	350
Zoroastrians	30	0.0	0.65	40	50
Total population	16,125,000	100.0	2.67	26,292,000	34,490,000

Syria

Syria's prehistory begins with the invention of writing, which took place in southern Babylon perhaps around 3000 B.C.E. and evolved into cuneiform script. Israelites and other Semitic peoples had migrated there and settled near Jerusalem around 1400 B.C.E. The Hebrew Bible tells some of their stories of war, the development of monotheism, and territorial expansion. Boundaries have changed throughout the centuries because Syria was once denoted to be the entire region between the peninsulas of Anatolia and Sinai. A variety of pagan faiths flourished there, and King Hammurabi is remembered as a noted lawgiver. As intriguing as it is, Syria's ancient history lies beyond the parameters of this encyclopedia, which begins with the empire of Alexander the Great, dating between 356 and 323 B.C.E.

The Hellenistic era was a time of change, following the death of Alexander, when the Seleucids, named for Alexander's general Seleucus, controlled the region. After their demise, the Ptolemies of Egypt reigned for one hundred years until Antiochus the Great defeated Ptolemy and took over southern Syria. By then Greek culture, the hallmark of those regimes, had cross-fertilized the region. Later, about 31 B.C.E., Syria was a significant province of the Roman Empire. Roman rule undermined the Syrian social structures and eroded the cohesiveness among indigenous groups. Syria was later divided into two provinces, Syria Coele in the north, with two Roman legions garrisoned there, and Syria Phoenice, which had one.

By the fifth century C.E., Syria had been partitioned into five provinces. The city of Antioch was the seat of the governor and the cultural center for developments in art, medicine, law, and philosophy, and most importantly for the development of Christianity. According to Christian tradition, the followers of Jesus were first called Christians at Antioch (Acts 11:26), and Antioch became the center of one of the ancient patriarchates. The actions of the successive patriarchs of Antioch helped shape the doctrinal aspects of the Christian religion.

After the Roman Empire crumbled, Syria became wedged into the Byzantine Empire with Constantinople as headquarters, but during the first half of the seventh century, Syria was one of the first regions incorporated into the Muslim Caliphate. In 633–634 C.E. a decisive and vigorous campaign won the territory for the Arabs. In 636 Damascus finally surrendered to the new authority. Conversions to Islam followed the Muslim victory, though Christians and Jews were generally treated with tolerance. From 639 to 750 the Ummayyad dynasty reigned with Damascus as its capital. When the Arabic Abbasids defeated the Ummayyads in 750, they moved the center of power to Baghdad (which in Arabic is known as the city of peace), where for several centuries their caliphate ruled in splendor. The flowering of Islamic culture proceeded, committed to the arts as well as warfare, while providing the infrastructure for the early schools of Islamic jurisprudence.

The Fatimid dynasty, a Shi'a sect named for the daughter of Mohammad, wrestled control from the Abbasids. For a time during the eighth and ninth centuries, the Fatimids dominated much of the Mediterranean areas of northwest Africa. The Church of the Holy Sepulcher, a pivotal Christian holy site, was destroyed in 1010. Their use of mercenaries became their downfall, however. In 1020 their leader Hakim (996–1021) proclaimed that he was a reborn God. Some Syrians accepted his claim, and today they are identified as the DRUZE. A rival group, the Assassins, in 1130 killed Amir, the last able Fatimid caliph who ruled from Egypt. Consequently, anarchy followed. In 1171 the last of the Fatimid rulers died. A group of ruthless mercenaries dedicated not to religion but power by assassination seized control.

The Assassins, a neo-Ismailite order named for their use of hashish, minimized religious instruction, fostered murder, and spread terror through the land (1090). For nearly two centuries they operated as professional executioners. The Mongol invasions halted their reign of terror in 1272, when the Syrian stronghold at Masyad was destroyed. A sprinkling of the descendants of the Assassins, known as ISMAILIS, remain in Syria today. The Aga Khan, based in Bombay, India, is their spiritual leader, with 140,000 adherents scattered throughout India and now dispersed worldwide.

Arabs form the Sunni majority, including the Bedouins (who constitute about 7 percent of the population) and the Kurds (also with 7 percent). Armenians (a small 2 percent) are generally the descendants of early settlers who follow Arab customs or those latecomers who arrived after the persecutions of World War I and maintain their Armenian language and identity.

Today, Syria is a Muslim state. Approximately 85 percent of the population of 16,125,000 practices Sunni Islam of the HANAFITE school. The largest Shi'a sect, the ALEVIS, are found near Latakia in the northwest province. They make up about 13 percent of the population. The Druze are a minority, with about 380,000 adherents; they are a dominant majority in the southwestern province of Suwayda. Ismailis are found in very small numbers near Hama and in Homs. A small number of Twelver Shiites are grouped near Aleppo, and they make up 1 percent of the population. The YEZIDI, whose religion combines elements of Islam, Judaism, Nestorian Christianity, Zoroastrianism, and Manichaeism, was founded in the twelfth century by Shaikh Adi. It has some nineteen thousand adherents, most in Djebel Sinjar near Aleppo. The BAHÁ'Í FAITH, with roots in Iranian Islam, initially tried to missionize Syria in 1892. They were not accepted, and to the present, the Bahá'ís have only a minuscule presence in Syria.

Judaism has an ancient presence in Syria, much of the Jews' history being recorded in the Jewish Bible (which Christians call the Old Testament). It was swelled by the addition of Jews expelled from Spain and Portugal in the 1490s. During the early twentieth century the population was more than twenty thousand, but given the events since the rise of the state of Israel, only some four thousand remain.

Prior to the advent of Islam, Syria also had a strong Christian heritage that had initially established itself in the Antiochian Jewish population. The city of Antioch had a large church where the Apostle Paul was headquartered. Antioch became a major spiritual epicenter as its theologians hammered out doctrines pertaining to the nature of Christ. After the Council of Chalcedon in 451, EASTERN ORTHODOXY predominated. Only in the sixteenth century did the ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH gain a foothold, when at various times Orthodox Christians found it convenient to form Eastern-Rite dioceses in communion with Rome. Among them, the MARONITE CATHOLIC CHURCH can be traced to the Crusader Kingdom of Antioch in the twelfth century. Between the sixteenth and eighteenth centuries, additional Eastern Rite churches developed, most importantly the MELKITE CATHOLIC CHURCH and the CHALDEAN CATHOLIC CHURCH.

Christians make up about 8 percent of the inhabitants of Syria. The GREEK ORTHODOX PATRIARCHATE OF ANTIOCH AND ALL THE EAST has the largest congregations, which are deeply rooted in an Arab identity. They are Greek in that they follow Byzantine traditions. The Greek Orthodox became the mother church for the Jacobites (SYRIAC ORTHODOX PATRIARCHATE OF ANTIOCH AND ALL THE EAST) who broke away in the sixth century as a result of the Monophysite controversy concerning the nature of Christ.

The interior of the Omayyad Mosque in Damascus, Syria (Christopher Rennie/TRIP)

The patriarch lives in Damascus and maintains friendly relations with other Orthodox congregations, particularly the RUSSIAN ORTHODOX CHURCH (MOSCOW PATRIARCHATE), who supported the quest for a Syrian to be appointed as patriarch of Aleppo. The ARMENIAN APOSTOLIC CHURCH (HOLY SEE OF ECHMIADZIN) forms the third major Christian community in Syria based near Aleppo, with about 300,000 followers.

Six Roman Catholic groups exist in Syria today. The MELKITES, with their main strength in Aleppo, are a predominant group. Their patriarch, who resides in Damascus, has an extensive jurisdiction that includes Jerusalem (Israel) and Alexandria (Egypt). There is an enclave of Maronites near Aleppo, but their numbers are few, as most reside in neighboring Lebanon. Latin Catholics also live near Aleppo, where their vicar dwells. Aleppo played an important geographical role in the transmission of Christian principles beginning in the thirteenth century, when Crusaders headquartered there. Chaldeans inhabit eastern Syria near the Iraqi border, with fifteen hundred people near Aleppo and another five hundred near Damascus. The Holy See has a nuncio residing in Damascus serving as liaison with the Syrian government.

Early missionary reports frequently merged activities in Syria and Lebanon. This is because the two countries were, at one time, a single geographical area, until separated by the French Mandate in 1918 for administrative reasons. Initial missionary activity from Western nations centered around Beirut, which is now in Lebanon. Joseph Wolff of the London Jews Society visited Syria in 1822–1823 looking for converts to Christianity from among the Jewish population.

Representatives of the AMERICAN BOARD OF COMMISSIONERS FOR FOREIGN MISSIONS arrived in the Middle East and traveled extensively in Palestine and Syria. Missionaries Pliny Fiske and Levi Parsons stirred religious unrest within the Catholic and Orthodox communities while being largely ignored by the Muslim community. The American Board left Syria and Iran in 1970 and turned their work over to the United Presbyterian Church (now the PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH [U.S.A.]), which has a medical and educational focus in the Middle East. Aleppo College is an outstanding institution, which is supported by the Armenian Evangelical Union, The NATIONAL EVANGELICAL SYNOD OF SYRIA AND LEBANON, the American Presbyterians, and the UNITED CHURCH OF CHRIST.

The National Evangelical Synod, founded in 1823, is one of the oldest missionary groups. The National Evangelical Christian Alliance of Syria, established in 1921, has about 1,000 members. The CHURCH OF THE NAZARENE has existed since 1970 and has seven churches. The Diocese of Jerusalem of the EPISCOPAL CHURCH IN JERUSALEM AND THE MIDDLE EAST governs the small Anglican presence of 3,000. In the 1990s, Pentecostal/Charismatic renewal movements spread through the Christian community in Syria, with more than 100,000 people participating. In the wake, new Pentecostal congregations have appeared, but as in earlier generations, converts to this latest form of Christianity have come primarily from previously existing Christian communities within Syria, rather than from Islam.

Islam's place in Syrian society has changed during the past one hundred years. Under the rule of the Ottoman Empire (1517–1918) and during the early years of the twentieth century, legal scholars (ulama) advocated strict adherence to Muslim jurisprudence traditions, three being operative in Syria today. The court systems follow the Hanafite school, while the SHAFIITE school is more likely to govern family issues in both Syria and Lebanon. There is a small minority that support the HANBALITE tradition, closely associated with the conservative WAHHABI school identified with the royal family of Saudi Arabia.

Syria has an innovative history associated with its use of the several legal traditions. Syrian religious scholars have tended to study with teachers of each school of jurisprudence, thus yielding a pluralistic approach to the Muslim community. This pluralism has facilitated a level of acceptance of the various Sufi orders and other minority groups. In the early years of the twentieth century, the Syrians rejected the ultraconservative Wahhabi Movement, partially because of their spirit of judicial tolerance, their allegiance to the system of jurisprudence reflected by the Ottoman Empire, and their history of diversity in beliefs.

However, problems arose in the early twentieth century when reformers clashed with Sufi orders. Controversy developed over the Sufi love of visits to shrines and the tombs of saints, which is in direct conflict with Sunni doctrine. Most important, reformers challenged the rules so dear to the Shafite and Hanafite jurists. The resultant religious instability contributed significantly to the collapse of the Ottoman Empire after World War I. Amir Faysal of the Meccan Hashemite clan briefly seized control of Syria but was ousted by the French in 1916. The League of Nations mandated a French protectorate in 1918. Syria mobilized against Western hegemony, and even the marginalized Druze and Alevi communities combined forces with mainstream Muslims.

In 1949 a new nonreligious civil code based on an Egyptian model was adopted. Four years later, Islam's legal arm recognized a Law of Personal Status that governed family matters for Sunnis, Alevi, and Ismailis. In contrast, the Druze (not considered true Muslims), the Jews, and the Christians each have their own codes of jurisprudence to govern their members.

In 1963 a military coup brought the socialistic Ba'ath Party into power. In 1970, Hafiz al Assad began his three decades as president. Upon his death in 2000, his son Basher Assad succeeded him. Missed by most Western observers, Assad was a member of the minority Alevi community, as is his son. Their rule has given the Alevi a significantly higher profile in Syria, though some Sunnis still reject the idea of a president from what they see as a heretical minority tradition. The Syrian president appoints his cabinet. However, 250 members of the People's Council (the legislature) are elected from cities and rural areas within Syria. The country, except for a brief period during 1974–1975, has been under martial law because of constant warfare coupled with internal dissension. Today, secular and religious ideologies are flashpoints fueling human rights violations for dissident groups.

The rise of the Muslim Brotherhood, initiated in Egypt soon after the end of World War II but allied with the Wahhabi leadership in Saudi Arabia, was a reactionary backlash to the quest for secularism, and because of the furor, the Syrian cabinet established a law that the head of state must be a Muslim. However, ongoing clashes continue with the Brotherhood over the place of religion in affairs of state.

For a brief time, Syria was united with Egypt in the United Arab Republic (1958–1961) and participated in the Arab-Israeli Wars of 1967 and 1973. Syrian troops intervened in Lebanon in 1976, fearing an Israeli-backed political takeover. However, Syria did not support Iraq during the Gulf War in 1990–1991, partially because the countries are ruled by rival Ba'ath parties.

The Middle East Council of Churches (affiliated with the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES) formed in 1927 near Beirut, and it includes four Syrian-based churches. After the Arab-Israeli War, the council has been active in helping with resources for the 340,000 displaced persons, mainly Palestinian refugees, who are stateless. There are another 300,000 people who have been internally displaced throughout the political and religious strife. The World Council of Churches has subsidized much of the work done to help these homeless people, who have a substandard quality of life, maintain their integrity under duress.

Gail M. Harley

Sources:

- Abd-Allah, U. F. The Islamic Struggle in Syria. Berkeley, CA: Mizzen, 1983.
- Bliss, F. J. The Religions of Modern Syria and Palestine. New York: Scribner, 1912.
- Fact, M. A. "The Alawis Community of Syria: A New Dominant Force." Middle Eastern Studies 20, 2 (1984): 133–153.
- Haidallah, I. A. The Legal Status of Non-Moslem Communities in the Near East, and Especially Syria and Lebanon. Beirut: American University of Beirut, 1965.

Syriac Orthodox Patriarchate of Antioch and All the East

During the fifth century C.E., the Christian church was struck by what was termed the Monophysite controversy, a stage in the Christian movement's development of the orthodox definition of the trinity and the divinity of Christ. In 451 the Council of Chalcedon promulgated the position that Christ was of one substance with the Father as regards his Godhead, and at the same time of one substance with humanity as regards his manhood. The Monophysite position spoke to the nature of Christ and suggested that Jesus's human nature had been taken up and absorbed into his divine nature. They did not ascribe to the Council of Chalcedon, though they did follow the findings of previous councils and use the standard creed promulgated earlier by the Council of Nicaea in 325 C.E.

Monophysite exponents led in the formation of several churches that separated from EASTERN ORTHODOXY and the ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH. Among the last to form was the Syrian church, which is generally dated to the consecration of Jacob Baradeus (500–578) as bishop of Edessa in 542 C.E. Edessa was then a major center of the Christian church in its movement into Asia. Bishop Jacob was both a fervent Monophysite and possessed of the favor of Empress Theodosia (of the Byzantine Empire). He was able to use his position to travel through the empire from Turkey to Egypt and eastward to Persia, founding Monophysite congregations. His initial work was continued by his followers until inhibited by the emergence of Islam in the seventh century. They spread the church as far east as India and China.

The church uses a Syriac liturgy and a Syriac translation of the Bible, which has been available since the second century. As the church has spread, other languages have been introduced over the centuries.

The church's history has been marked by several disasters in the modern era. It suffered greatly when the Mongols passed through in the fourteenth century. It lost many members when the Roman Catholic Church established the SYRIAN CATHOLIC CHURCH as a Syrian affiliate in the eighteenth century. At the beginning of the twentieth century, many of its members were killed by the Turks. During the twentieth century, some reversal of the downward trend was made when it accepted many Orthodox in India under its umbrella, and in 1964 the Syrian patriarch consecrated and reestablished the office of the Catholicate of the Orthodox Syrian Church of the East in India.

For many years, beginning in the thirteenth century, the church had been headquartered at Mardin, Turkey, but it moved to Homs, Syria, in 1933 to escape Turkish violence and then in 1957 relocated to Damascus. In 2000 the church changed its name from Syrian Orthodox to Syriac Orthodox, indicating its use of the Syriac language rather than any ties to the current nation of Syria. The Syriac Orthodox Patriarchate of Antioch and All the East (popularly known as the Syrian Orthodox Church or the Jacobite Church) is now under the leadership of His Holiness Ignatius Zakka I. Ivas, its patriarch. The church has bishops in Iraq, Lebanon, Jerusalem, Turkey, the Netherlands (for parishes in Europe), Sweden (for Scandinavia), the United States, Australia, and Brazil (for South America). The largest number of members associated with the church are in India, where more than 700,000 reside. The church is a member of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES.

Address:

Syriac Orthodox Patriarchate of Antioch and All the East
P.O. Box 22260
Bab Tooma
Damascus
Syria
<http://www.syrianorthodoxchurch.org/>

Sources:

- Chaillot, Christine. The Syrian Orthodox Church of Antioch and All the East: A Brief Introduction to Its Life and Spirituality. Geneva: Inter-Orthodox Dialogue, 1998.
- Orthodoxia*. Regensburg, Germany: Osrkirchliches Institut, issued annually.

Syrian Catholic Church

Ramban, Kadavil Paul. The Orthodox Syrian Church: Its Religion and Philosophy. Vadatampady, Puthencruz, India: Pathrose, 1973.

Roberson, Ronald G. The Eastern Christian Churches: A Brief Survey. 5th ed. Rome: Edizioni Orientalia Christiana, Pontificio Istituto Orientale, 1995.

Van der Bent, Ans J., ed. Handbook/Member Churches/World Council of Churches. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 1985.

Syrian Catholic Church

The Syrian Catholic Church emerged in the seventeenth century out of missionary activity launched by missionaries of the ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH in Aleppo in northwest Syria. At the time, the majority of Christians in the area were affiliated with the SYRIAC ORTHODOX PATRIARCHATE OF ANTIOCH AND ALL THE EAST, the so-called Jacobite church, which had not affirmed the teachings of the Ecumenical Council held at Ephesus in 431 concerning the nature of Christ. The council affirmed that Christ had both a human and a divine nature, while the Syrians generally held the Monophysite position that Christ had only a divine nature.

The Catholic mission had spectacular success through the 1650s, and in 1662 a patriarch with Catholic leanings, Andrew Akhidjan, was elected head of the Syrian Orthodox Church. Following his death, however, a split occurred, and the two factions (one pro-Rome and one independent of Rome) each elected a patriarch. However, the authorities of the Ottoman Empire supported the Orthodox faction, and no successor to the Catholic bishop was elected.

Those Syrians who followed the Syrian-Antiochene liturgy and practice but were oriented on the authority of the bishop of Rome continued to exist but found themselves in an increasingly precarious position. In the eighteenth century, they were forced underground. Then in 1782, the Syrian patriarch declared his allegiance to Rome and fled to Lebanon, where he established Our Lady of Sharfeh Monastery. He began a new line of Syrian Catholic patriarchs. Finally in 1828, the Ottoman government granted recognition to the Syrian Catholic Church. In 1850 the headquarters of the church was moved to Mardin, in southwestern Turkey.

The church expanded during the last half of the nineteenth century but fell victim to the massacres of Syrians that occurred during World War I. As a result of those massacres, many Catholics fled to Lebanon, and in the 1920s the patriarchate moved to Beirut. Like every patriarch, the current patriarch, Ignatius Musa I Daud, has added "Ignatius" to his patriarchal name. There are some 100,000 Syrian Catholics, most residing in Lebanon, Syria, Turkey, Egypt, and Iraq. There are parishes in the Sudan and Israel, and the faithful in North America are organized into Our Lady of Deliverance Syriac Catholic Diocese. The church is active in the Middle East Council of Churches.

The church oversees two religious orders, both named for Ephraem the Syrian, a fourth-century saint-theologian. A publishing house and seminary are located at Our Lady of Sharfeh Monastery. Worship is conducted in Syrian, though most members now speak Arabic.

Address:

Syrian Catholic Church
Rue de Danms
B.P. 116-5087
Beirut
Lebanon

Sources:

Liesel, N. The Eastern Catholic Liturgies: A Study in Words and Pictures. Westminster, MD: Newman, 1960.

Roberson, Ronald G. The Eastern Christian Churches: A Brief Survey. 5th ed. Rome: Edizioni Orientalia Christiana, Pontificio Istituto Orientale, 1995.

Syrian Orthodox Church of Malabar

The year 1653 can be considered the founding of the modern Syrian Orthodox Church of Malabar, while its history leads us to a time period between the first and third centuries C.E. The church traces its origins to the Apostle Thomas. As a result of a synod in the year 2000, the church refers to itself as the Syrian Orthodox Church of Malabar; previously it had been the Malankara Jacobite Syriac Orthodox Church.

The Syrian Orthodox Church of Malabar considers itself the church of the Syrian Christians of India, whose presence can be documented from the third century. To support this claim, the church refers to individual documents that suggest that the Syrian Christians of India stood under the jurisdiction of the patriarch of Antioch. But there is more historical evidence that India's Syrian Christians were members of the APOSTOLIC CATHOLIC ASSYRIAN CHURCH OF THE EAST prior to the arrival of the Portuguese. Along with all other jurisdictions of Mar Thoma of India, the church is convinced that its origins can be traced to the presence of the Apostle Thomas in India. After the Portuguese forced the church to unify with the ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH under Menezes at the synod of Diamper in 1599, it took decades till the local Syrian opposition, led by Archdiakon Thoma Parambil (Thomas de Campo), made intensive efforts to acquire a Syrian bishop. But Mar Atallah, the former Syrian-Orthodox archbishop from Damascus, who arrived in 1652, was captured by the Portuguese and taken to Europe. Thereafter the Thomas Christians took an anti-Latin oath, and twelve priests consecrated the Archdeacon Thomas (d. 1673) in an emergency ceremony. As a result, a faction of the Indian Thomas Christians came into being, the members of which have since been referred to as the Malankars.

In 1655, Thomas I received help and apostolic succession from the Metropolitan Gregorios Abdalgilil of Jerusalem and other bishops of the SYRIAC ORTHODOX PATRIARCHATE OF ANTIOCH AND ALL THE EAST who traveled to India. As a result of the presence of these bishops, the Syrian Christians took on, under Thomas I, the West-Syrian liturgy and recognized the synod of Ephesus.

Once again, in the middle of the eighteenth century, problems arose surrounding the consecration of the church's leader, with the transition from Thomas IV to Thomas V and then Thomas VI. However, a delegation from the Syrian Orthodox bishops once again ordained validly and without conflict Thomas VI, later referred to as Dionysios I the Great (1761–1808).

In 1836 the general assembly of the Malankars strengthened their ties to the Syrian Orthodox Church in order to resist the Anglican Church Missionary Society, which was intent on reforming the Orthodox Syrians. With the synod of Mulanthuruthy in 1876, the Syrian Orthodox patriarch Petros IV (d. 1894) reorganized the Church of the Malankars, for which he had a full mandate. The reform Malankars were excommunicated and left the church (they formed the present-day Mar Thoma Syrian Church of Malabar). But as early as 1911 there was a conflict between the Syrian Orthodox patriarch Abdallah II (1909–1915) and the Metropolitan Dionysios VI. This conflict arose when Abdallah tried to replace the metropolitan Dionysios VI, who wanted more autonomy, with one of his own hierarchs. But with the help of the former Syrian Orthodox patriarch Abdalmasih II (who was deposed of his office in 1905 by the sultan), the Malankars managed to reestablish the Office of the Maphrian in India, which had been eliminated in the nineteenth century and had been united with the Office of the Metropolitan of Malankara since 1934. As a result, there were two opposing Malankarian Syrian Orthodox jurisdictions: the so-called Catholicos faction and the Patriarch faction. While the autonomists called for Indianization, those loyal to the patriarch sought to preserve old traditions. In 1975 the autonomist Augen I was suspended by the Syrian Orthodox synod in Damascus and was replaced by Katholikos Basileios Paulos II (d. 1996). Since then, the Malankars have once again appeared permanently divided—despite a decision of the Supreme Court of India in 1995 that aimed at unifying the Malankars.

The faith and the liturgical tradition of the Syrian Orthodox Church in India are similar to those of the Syriac Orthodox Church. The church approved the first three ecumenical councils (Nicaea, Constantinople, and Ephesus) and denies the addition of the Filioque clause in the Apostles' creed. They do not accept the concept of the Immaculate Conception of St. Mary. The liturgical language of the Syrian Orthodox Church is Syriac.

Membership in the Syrian Orthodox Church can be estimated at approximately 650,000 people. The leadership of the church is part of the Syriac Orthodox episcopal synod. The leaders are the Malankara metropolitan and catholicos, and are supported by the Managing Committee of the church, the secretary of the church, and the trustees of the church. The church is divided into ten dioceses.

The Syrian Orthodox Church is also present outside India, primarily in expatriate/diasporic communities in Europe and North America. H.G. Thomas Mor Themotheios is in charge of dioceses outside of Kerala, and H.G. Joseph Mor Gregorios is in charge of the United Arab Emirates and European dioceses.

The Syrian Orthodox Church of Malabar has a theological seminary in the state of Kerala at Udayagiri (near Mulanthuruthy). The seminary also functions as a center for the ecumenical activities of the church. In Kerala, ardent theological dialogues are taking place between the Syrian Orthodox Church and the Catholic Church (the foundation being a joint statement presented by Patriarch Yakub III and Pope Paul VI in 1971). As a result, a draft resolution was prepared, and both churches have agreed in principle to allow marriages between its members. The Syrian Orthodox Church is also an active member of ecumenical organizations such as the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES, the Christian Conference of Asia, and the National Council of Churches in India.

Address:

Syrian Orthodox Church
c/o H.G. Thomas Mor Dionysius Metropolitan Mount Senai Bishop's House
Kothamangalam
Kerala 822101
India

Martin Tamcke

Sources:

- Kaniampampil, Kurian Corepiscopa. The Syrian Orthodox Church of India and Its Apostolic Faith. Tiruvalla, 1989.
- Madey, Johannes. "Background and History of the Present Schism in the Malankara Church." Oriens Christianus 60 (1976): 95–112.
- Paul, Daniel Babu. The Syrian Orthodox Christians of St. Thomas. Ernakulam: Cochin, 1968.
- Philip, E. M. The Indian Church of St. Thomas. Kottayam, 1951.
- Williams, Raymond B. Christian Pluralism in the United States: The Indian Immigrant Experience. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1996.

Syro-Malabar Catholic Church

The Syro-Malabar Catholic Church emerged in the fifteenth century when Portuguese Roman Catholics discovered the

Syro-Malankara Catholic Church

SYRIAN ORTHODOX CHURCH OF MALABAR (which now exists in two branches, the MALANKARA ORTHODOX SYRIAN CHURCH and the MAR THOMA SYRIAN CHURCH OF MALABAR). The Malabar church traced its origin to the legendary ministry of the Apostle Thomas in the years after the death and resurrection of Jesus. As the Portuguese established their authority in India, Catholic missionaries began to impose a variety of Roman Catholic liturgical changes and practices upon the church. A number of these were formally adopted at a synod in 1599 held at Diamper. Portuguese were appointed as bishops, clerics were required to adopt a celibate existence, and the Inquisition was established to deal with heretics.

Over the next generation opposition to the new order grew, and in 1653, at another synod at Diamper, the majority of the church broke with Rome. They returned to their pre-Catholic practices. Pope Alexander VII subsequently appointed the Carmelites to rectify the problems in India. They arrived a short time later, and over the next decades many of those who had broken with Rome returned. The Carmelites held the leading positions in the church through the nineteenth century. By the 1680s a Syro-Malabar Catholic Church and a reordered Syrian Orthodox Church of Malabar emerged, and both have continued to the present. The Syro-Malabar church is in full communion with the ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH.

For the next two hundred years, the Latin-Rite Catholic churches and Syro-Malabar congregations with their heavily Latinized liturgy remained part of the same jurisdiction. Then in 1887, Pope Leo XIII separated the two groups. In 1896 the Vatican erected three vicariates apostolic for the Syro-Malabar Catholic Church and placed indigenous bishops in charge. A fourth diocese was created in 1911. Through the twentieth century, these four dioceses have grown into four provinces, each headed by an archbishop and each including additional dioceses. As the new century begins, there are twenty-four dioceses in India, twelve of which are in Kerala. In 1923 the vicariate apostolic of Ernakulam was elevated as an archdiocese, and in 1992 it was named the major archdiocese of Ernakulam-Angamly. The archbishop is the head of the Syro-Malabar Church.

The Syro-Malabar Catholic Church has an estimated 4,300,000 members. That figure represents the remarkable growth since the 1930s, when there were fewer than half a million members. The church sponsors two major seminaries at Bangalore and Ujjain, and a number of religious orders. There are several expatriate congregations in the United States and one in Canada.

As early as 1934, Pope Pius XI authorized a study of the Syro-Malabar liturgy with the aim of possible restoration of its pre-Latinized format. A revised liturgy was finally published in 1957, but it has not proved a popular format in India, where the Latinized liturgy had been used for several centuries.

Address:

Syro-Malabar Catholic Church
Major Archbishop's House
P.B. No. 2580
Kochi, Kerala 682 031
India
<http://members.aol.com/smalabar/index.htm>

Sources:

Hoke, Donald, ed. The Church in Asia. Chicago: Moody, 1975.
Moffett, Samuel Hugh. A History of Christianity in Asia. Vol. 1: Beginnings to 1500. San Francisco: HarperSanFrancisco, 1992.
Neill, S. C. A History of Christianity in India. 2 vols. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1984, 1985.

Syro-Malankara Catholic Church

The Syro-Malankara Catholic Church originated in 1926 out of disagreement within the MALANKARA ORTHODOX SYRIAN CHURCH in southern India. The Malankara church traces its beginning to the ministry of the Apostle Thomas, who, it is claimed, came to Kerala soon after the resurrection of Christ and founded several churches prior to his martyrdom. In the fifteenth century Indian Christians came into contact with the ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH. Missionaries who arrived with the Portuguese began to exert considerable influence over the church, and in 1599, at a synod at Diamper, imposed a variety of practices from the Latin rite on the church. In 1653 the majority of the Indian faithful rejected Roman authority and returned to the Syriac liturgy that they had previously used.

The reestablished Orthodox Church then turned to the SYRIAC ORTHODOX PATRIARCHATE OF ANTIOCH AND ALL THE EAST, often called the Jacobite church, for the episcopal orders lost during their years affiliated with Rome. In the nineteenth century, the CHURCH OF ENGLAND, which had come to India with British rule, began to exert its influence on the Malabar church. Some suggestions for reform were accepted by parts of the church leading it to split into two branches, the MAR THOMA SYRIAN CHURCH OF MALABAR and the Malankara Orthodox Syrian Church. The Mar Thoma Church accepted the reforms suggested by the Anglicans and has established formal communion with the Church of England.

The Malankara Church continued with its traditional practice and its communion with the Syriac Orthodox Patriarchate of Antioch and All the East. However, in the 1880s, a dispute developed with the patriarch of the Syrian Orthodox Church, who began to assert his ownership of the property of the Malankara Church. That dispute would continue in several phases until the 1950s. In the midst of this controversy, five Malankara bishops opened negotiation with Rome. They asked that their liturgy be retained and that they remain as bishops of their dioceses. Originally, on September 30, 1930, two of the five made their profession of the faith. The next day, they were joined by two more of their episcopal colleagues. They and those priests and laypeople received with them constituted the Syro-Malankara Catholic Church, a church in full communion with the Roman Catholic Church. In 1932 Mar Ivanios visited Rome. He was named archbishop of Trivandrum, and along with his archeparchy, the Eparchy of Tiruvalla was established. The new church drew significant support from the Malankara Church, and by 1960 it claimed more than sixty-eight thousand members.

At the time of its founding, the Roman Catholic Church already recognized a Syro-Malabar Catholic Church operating in the same area; however, this church uses a very different liturgy and has a variety of practices adopted from the Portuguese in the 1600s. With minor changes, the Syro-Malankara Catholic Church maintains the Syriac

