liturgy that had been used prior to the arrival of Europeans in Kerala.

Besides the archeparchy (archdiocese), there are three exarchies (dioceses) in India. The church has more than 500,000 members. There are scattered congregations across North America.

Address:

Syro-Malankara Catholic Church
Archbishop's House
Trivandrum 695 004
Kerala
India
<http://malankara.net/>

Source:

Roberson, Ronald G. The Eastern Christian Churches: A Brief Survey. 5th ed. Rome: Edizioni Orientalia Christiana, Pontificio Istituto Orientale, 1995.

Taoism

See Daoism

Taiwan

See China: Taiwan

Tajikistan

The area that composes the modern state of Tajikistan was inhabited by the sixth century B.C.E., and several important trading centers for the ancient Central Asian world arose. The land was first overrun by the Persians, and then in the fourth century B.C.E. by Alexander the Great (356–323 B.C.E.). In the millennium after Alexander, the region was occupied by various invading armies. In the sixth and seventh centuries C.E., Turkish peoples moved onto the land, only a short time before the Arab Muslim Empire incorporated Tajikistan into the caliphate. Islam was introduced at this time and soon became the dominant religion of the people. During the years of the succeeding Tahrid and Samanid kingdoms, the Tajik people emerged as a separate ethnic group (in the ninth and tenth centuries). Their language is a dialect of Persian.

Tajikistan was part of a series of kingdoms through the next centuries, finally falling into a set of fiefdoms in the seventeenth century. Some of these were subservient to the Bukhara Khanate based in Uzbekistan. Then in the 1860s the Russians moved into central Asia, and through the 1870s they annexed the northern half of Tajikistan. The Khanate of Bukhara retained some degree of independence, and much of western Tajikistan was reorganized as the Province of Eastern Bukhara.

Soviet power in the region was established in stages, but in 1924 the Autonomous Soviet Socialist Republic of Tajikistan was incorporated into the new Soviet Socialist Republic of Uzbekistan. It was separated from Uzbekistan in 1929 and remained in the Soviet Union until independence in 1991. Following independence old tensions between Tajiks and Russians flared, and many Russians bearing needful skills returned to their homelands.

Status of religions in Tajikistan, 2000-2050

Followers	2000			2025	2050
	total	%	rate
Muslims	5,171,000	83.6	2.02	8,000,000	10,630,000
Nonreligious	740,000	12.0	0.56	600,000	400,000
Christians	131,000	2.1	-1.14	125,000	120,000
Orthodox	93,000	1.5	-1.53	85,000	75,000
Protestants	17,000	0.3	-1.26	15,000	15,000
Independents	15,000	0.2	2.26	20,000	25,000
Atheists	119,000	1.9	-5.08	80,000	60,000
Jews	8,900	0.1	0.55	11,000	12,000
Zoroastrians	7,400	0.1	2.16	21,000	38,000
Ethnoreligionists	5,900	0.1	1.71	10,000	14,000
Buddhists	4,000	0.1	1.34	8,000	15,000
Baha'is	740	0.0	2.16	2,000	4,000
Total population	6,188,000	100.0	1.56	8,857,000	11,293,000

Through the 1990s the new government faced a somewhat unstable adjustment to post-Communist life, including a civil war led by a former prime minister (1997). The government has been especially concerned about conservative Islamic groups, and in 1998 a treaty with Uzbekistan was reached out of common concern about terrorists being trained in Afghanistan. In 1999 the Parliament passed a law banning religious organizations from having a direct relationship with any political party.

The majority of Muslims follow the Sunni HANAFITE SCHOOL OF ISLAM. This community came under sharp attack during the Stalinist years, but the attempts to suppress it relaxed in the decades following World War II. Soviet authorities returned control of the community to local leadership, and even placed the imams on government salaries through the Muslim Board of Central Asia (1943). Russian became the language of discourse, and Muslim leaders tried to picture Russian culture as more attractive than the Turkish that had become popular in the nineteenth century. Imams for this officially sanctioned Muslim activity were trained at the two seminaries in Uzbekistan.

Besides the Hanafite majority, there is also a visible WAHHABI ISLAM presence, with their main support being in the Kurdistan region in the southern highlands. The Wahhabis gained strength from those Muslims opposed to Soviet intervention in neighboring Afghanistan. There is also a SHI'Ā ISLAM community, centered in the Gorno-Badakhshan Autonomous Oblast, and a group of ISMAILI ISLAM believers, known as Pamiris, who originated in the tenth century and currently reside in the remote Pamir Mountains. There is a popular folk Islam that undergirds all of the various Muslim groups and lends special support to the NAQSHBANDĪYA SUFI ORDER.

Christianity, in the form of the RUSSIAN ORTHODOX CHURCH (MOSCOW PATRIARCHATE), was introduced with the arrival of the czar's forces in the 1860s. The church grew as Russians moved to the region both before and after the Soviet era. Today its several parishes have been incorporated into the single diocese that covers Uzbekistan, Turkmenistan, Tajikistan, and Kyrgyzstan. St. Nicholas Cathedral in Dushanbe is the center of the Orthodox community.

In the 1920s, Soviet authorities deported two Baptist pastors and their wives to Dushanbe, Tajikistan's capital. They became the core of the first Protestant church in the region, and through the rest of the decade they were joined by other BAPTISTS who migrated and settled in Dushanbe or nearby. In 1930 the church chose I. Ya. Danilenko as its first minister. A second congregation was formed by the closely related Evangelical Christians. The two small groups united in 1936, but the next year authorities closed the church. When it was allowed to reopen in 1944, some 35 members remained. It experienced slow but steady growth through the next half-century, and at the time of independence it had more than 800 members; in addition, other congregations had been formed throughout the country. The church suffered greatly from independence and the civil war that followed. Many of its members (especially the Russians and the German-speaking members) chose to leave, and by the middle of the 1990s, only some 350 members could be found.

Besides the Baptists there are small numbers of Lutherans and Pentecostal believers in Tajikistan. The small number of members of the SEVENTH-DAY ADVENTIST CHURCH have been incorporated into its Asian-Caucasian Conference, which additionally includes members in five other counties. There is a small Armenian community that adheres to the ARMENIAN APOSTOLIC CHURCH.

Followers of Judaism in Tajikistan are closely related to those in Uzbekistan. They speak a distinct dialect of Tajik, called Judeo-Tajik. They are found primarily in Dushanbe. Jews may have arrived in the region as early as the sixth century B.C.E. They were the only people in the region who did not accept Islam in the seventh and eighth centuries C.E. Attempts at forced conversion by Muslims in the seventeenth century led to the existence of secret Jews, not unlike the Maranos of Spain. At the end of the eighteenth century, a Moroccan rabbi, Joseph Maman (Mamon) Maghribi, settled in Bukhara. He led in a revival of Jewish life and introduced the Sephardi prayer rite that replaced the Persian rite previously used in most synagogues.

As early as the 1880s, Jews began to move to Israel, and in the 1970s some eight thousand of the thirty thousand Jews believed to be living in Tajikistan and Uzbekistan migrated.

Sources:

- Atkin, M. Tadjikistan: Nationalism, Religion, and Political Change. Washington, DC: National Council for Soviet and East European Research, 1992.
- Muriel, A. The Subtlest Battle: Islam in Soviet Tajikistan. Philadelphia: Foreign Policy Research Institute, 1989.
- Samuels, T. B. Tajikistan and the Islamic Revival. M.A. thesis, University of Virginia, 1987.

Taliban

The Taliban, the "Students of Islamic Knowledge Movement," the organization that controlled the largest part of Afghanistan as the twenty-first century began, got its start among youth that were attending madrasas (religious schools) that had been set up in Pakistan by Afghan refugees during the 1980s, at which time the Russians occupied much of the country. Most of the southern part of Afghanistan was inhabited by people who were ethnically Pashtuns and speakers of a distinctive language, Pashti. This same ethno-linguistic group was dominant in that part of Pakistan adjacent to Afghanistan. The Pashtuns were traditionally followers of the Sunni HANAFITE SCHOOL OF ISLAM. The new movement among the students, a primary expression of ISLAMISM, placed an extremely conservative interpretation on their tradition, much as the followers of WAHHABI ISLAM did in Arabia, and found inspiration from the Pakistani-based JAMAAT-E-ISLAM and its founder, Sayyid Abul al-Mawdudi (1903–1979).

By the early 1990s, the Taliban had evolved into a formal organization under the leadership of a council ulema (or a community of learned men) and the council's leader, Mullah Muhammad Omar. Movement leaders spread through the Pashtun areas of Afghanistan and quickly gained a large following. Formed as a militia, in 1996 the Taliban moved on Kabul, the capital, and quickly took over from the divided ruling elite, who had been drawn from the Uzbek and

The body of a man convicted by the Taliban of being a member of the opposition hangs in front of a hotel in Kabul, Afghanistan, September 23, 2000. (AP/Wide World Photos)

Tajik ethnic groups whose strength lay in the north (many of whom were either followers of SHI'A ISLAM or secular Marxism). The defeated leaders quickly formed an alliance against the Taliban and retained control of the northern third of the country. (Through the 1990s, the United Nations and the United States did not recognize the Taliban, considering Afghanistan a land without a government. They recognized instead the government of Shi'a leader Burhanuddin Rabbani, of the Northern Alliance, as the rightful leader of Afghanistan. Only Pakistan, Saudi Arabia, and the United Arab Emirates recognized the leadership in Kabul.)

Once in control of the capital, Taliban leaders instituted a strict interpretation of Islamic law that included traditional modest dress for women, restrictions on female education, and denied access to male physicians. It also reintroduced various forms of punishment that have largely been banished from the West (flogging, amputation of limbs, and execution by stoning). They moved to end the lawlessness that had come to many parts of the country in the wake of the Russian withdrawal and found televisions and video cassettes offensive to Islam. Although those actions made the Taliban unpopular in many quarters, it was the destruction of large Buddhist statues, considered by many as art treasures, in March 2001 that brought widespread denunciations from around the world.

In 1996 the leaders of the Taliban invited Osama bin Laden (b. 1957) to reestablish his organization, AL QAEDA, in Afghanistan. Subsequently, Al Qaeda was charged with a series of attacks upon U.S. citizens and property, culminating in the bombing of the Pentagon and the World Trade Center in the United States on September 11, 2001. The Taliban was implicated in these attacks because of its harboring bin Laden in Afghanistan. In October 2001, the United States began military actions in Afghanistan aimed at capturing bin Laden and his associates and destroying Al Qaeda. Secondly, the attack has been on the Taliban as an accessory to the terrorism perpetuated by the Al Qaeda network. The attack destroyed the Taliban government and has called into question its possibility of surviving as an organization. By early 2002, their Internet site, <http://www.taliban.com>, was no longer functioning and no pro-Taliban site remained.

Sources:

- Maley, William, ed. Fundamentalism Reborn? Afghanistan and the Taliban. New York: New York University Press, 1998.
- Matinuddin, Kamal. The Taliban Phenomenon: Afghanistan, 1994–1997. Karachi: Oxford University Press, 1999.
- Rashid, Ahmed. Taliban: Militant Islam, Oil and Fundamentalism in Central Asia. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 2001.

Tamil Saivism

Tamil Saivism is a broad category that can include any type of Siva-worship in the two thousand years or more of its existence in the Tamil-language region of southern India. The term may sometimes refer specifically to vernacular forms of Shaiva devotionalism that developed in the Tamil country. At other times, Tamil Saivism denotes Shaiva Siddhanta, the organized sect of Saivism most commonly associated with Tamil Nadu.

Siva (or Shiva)-worship appears in the Tamil literary record from the early centuries C.E. In the Purananuru (c. first–third centuries C.E.), a king is advised to circumambulate a temple of “the three-eyed god,” a common epithet of Siva. By the fifth century, the Silappadigaram epic shows that Siva’s mythology, iconography, and worship were well known. Beginning from the sixth to ninth centuries, Siva’s popularity spread when devotees called nayanmar made pilgrimages to local sacred places and celebrated Siva’s manifestations there. Through accessible Tamil songs, poet-saints like Appar, Sambandhar, Sundarar, and Manikkavachagar promoted bhakti (the ecstatic, loving devotion to a personal deity) and helped create an enduring temple-centered religious culture.

This devotional movement grew alongside—and soon intertwined with—a school of Saivism called Shaiva Siddhanta (the word Saivism means “perfected” or “fully concluded”). It apparently originated in northern India sometime before the eighth century C.E. among monastic communities in what is now Madhya Pradesh. Between the tenth and thirteenth centuries, monastic lineages spread throughout India. The school emphasized the liberating role of ritual, a dualistic philosophy, and respect for conventional caste and gender distinctions. It also tended both to accept the legitimacy of the Veda and to assert the superiority of Shaiva Siddhanta over it. The tradition eventually lost its all-India spread, but it became and remains the normative form of organized Saivism in Tamil Nadu.

Shaiva Siddhanta was originally based on twenty-eight primary Agamas, revealed texts that contain Siva’s instructions for his own worship; more than two hundred subsidiary Agamas exist as well. The earliest of these Sanskrit works are datable to the eighth century C.E., but they must have existed in oral or written form for some time before that. These texts focus primarily on rules for rituals and doctrinal exegesis; some, but not all, add guidelines for correct conduct and yogic practices. Many Agamas also provide information on iconography and architecture.

The dualist doctrine of Shaiva Siddhanta’s Agamas accepts three fundamental and separate realities: Siva (pati), souls (pashu), and fetters (pasha). Siva is the ultimate God who is omniscient, omnipotent, and eternally liberated. Souls, too, have most of the same inherent qualities, but caught in a state of spiritual bondage, they do not realize their true nature. Out of his grace, Siva creates the universe through the agency of divine beings in order to provide the conditions for souls to find release from the shackles of ignorance, karma, and materiality. Ritual plays a crucial role in the soul’s spiritual progress. A qualified guru, who acts as Siva’s representative, removes most of the disciple’s fetters through the “liberating initiation” (nirvanadiksha). The disciple should also ritually worship Siva every day in order to remove new karmic bonds that he continues to generate after initiation. The ultimate goal is to become like or equal to Siva.

Later Shaiva Siddhanta texts developed the Agamas’s teachings in new ways. Medieval preceptors, first from Kashmir and later from Tamil Nadu, composed Agamic commentaries, doctrinal syntheses, and manuals of ritual instruction, all in Sanskrit. Many of these writings sought to unify the teachings of the Agamas. Then, from the thirteenth to fourteenth centuries, philosophical works in Tamil were composed and canonized as the Meykandasastiram. Unlike the Sanskrit works, the texts of this collection heightened the importance of devotion and saw liberation as the merging of the soul into Siva.

Shaiva Siddhanta’s dualist stance has faced serious competition from the nondualist philosophy of Advaita Vedanta. Although nondualist ideas appear even in a few Agamas, important thinkers like Aghora Sivacharya (twelfth century) and Umapati Sivacharya (fourteenth century) vigorously defended the fundamental separation of Siva and souls. But later authors such as Sivagrayogin and Sivadvaitin Appayadikshita (both sixteenth century) helped promote a nondualist understanding of Saivism that continues today. The popular Tamil ideal of union with Siva has also contributed to the shift away from dualism.

Shaiva Siddhanta religious professionals are of two main types, distinguished by caste and function. Male priests of the Adishaiva Brahman subcaste perform the rituals in most Siva temples for the welfare of the lay public and the state. High-caste, non-Brahman male ascetics residing in monastic institutions compose the other group of professionals. Their lineages were established by the sixteenth century in the Tanjavur region as centers of Shaiva learning and private religious practice.

Shaiva Siddhanta in India is organized only at the local level. Training schools for priests, temple and monastic administrative structures, and caste and kinship networks provide institutional support, while ascetic leaders and respected priests offer limited leadership. The sect extends membership to the four varna (castes), but excludes the lowest castes, for whom social and legal redress began only in the 1940s and remains far from complete. Women may receive initiation as lay members but are barred from priestly and monastic ranks, and they may not perform ritual worship in the elaborate manner of initiated males.

Outside India, the tradition appears mostly among expatriate Tamil communities, as in Sri Lanka, Malaysia, Singapore, and the United States. One exception is the Saiva Siddhanta Church, based in Hawaii. Sivaya Subramuniyaswami, a convert of American origin, founded this international organization in 1949. The organization aims to propagate a form of nondualist Shaiva Siddhanta around the world.

It is not easy to calculate Saiva Siddhantin membership, let alone that of Tamil Shaivas in general. Although formally initiated practitioners are no doubt few, Saiva Siddhanta's ritual tradition has exerted great influence because its priests preside over most Siva temples in Tamil-speaking Hindu communities. In India notable Siddhantin worship centers include the great temples of Madurai, Tiruvannamalai, and Rameshvaram. Important monastic institutions include Dharmapuram and Tiruvavatuturai.

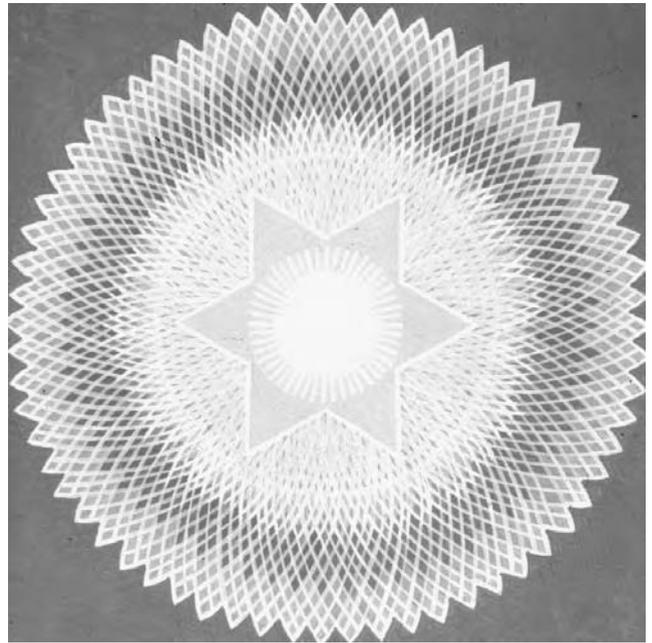

Ginette Ishimatsu

Sources:

- Brunner, H el ene. "Analyse du Suprabhedagama." Journal asiatique 255 (1967): 31–60.
- Davis, Richard H. Ritual in an Oscillating Universe: Worshipping Siva in Medieval India. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1991.
- Dhavamony, Mariasusai. Love of God According to Saiva Siddhanta: A Study in the Mysticism and Theology of Saivism. London: Oxford University Press, 1971.
- Dunuwila, Rohan A. Saiva Siddhanta Theology. Delhi: Motilal Banarsidass, 1985.
- Fuller, C. J. Servants of the Goddess: The Priests of a South Indian Temple. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1984.
- Ishimatsu, Ginette. "The Making of Tamil Shaiva Siddhanta." Contributions to Indian Sociology 33, 3 (1999): 571–579.
- Koppedraayer, K. I. "Are Sudras Entitled to Ride in the Palanquin?" Contributions to Indian Sociology 25, 2 (1991): 191–210.

Tantrism

Tantrism is an ancient and secret Hindu meditative practice. This secret and sometimes controversial practice emphasizes enjoying the sensual world as a means of spiritual progression and stands in stark contrast to the ascetic traditions that one finds, for example, among the sannyasin

A twentieth-century Mandala (Eric Pelham/TRIP)

(those who have adopted the renounced life). Tantrism resembles a number of other Hindu practices (as found within the SHAKTA MOVEMENT and SAIVISM), and has counterparts in Jainism. Buddhism has also adopted Tantrism to some extent and expanded it within various Buddhist schools of thought, especially TIBETAN BUDDHISM and Japanese Shingon.

Tantrism began in India around the sixth century C.E. and is responsible for a number of important Hindu developments. Many ancient temple wall carvings that depict tantric scenes of eroticism and divine sexuality have survived. Many mantras and yantras come from Tantrism. Tantrism also refers to a series of ancient books (the Tantras) dealing with religious ideas, magic, and sacred sexual practices. Much tantric teaching involves the concept of the female side of the divine (Shakti), and numerous Tantras were written as a dialogue between the Hindu god Siva and the goddess Parvati.

Despite its controversial nature, Tantrism is accepted by many Hindu texts as a form of meditation leading to enlightenment. Some forms of Tantra include simple prayers, icon worship, complex pujas (worship), and the reading of the Tantras. More rare and notorious forms of Hindu Tantrism include a spectrum of sexual practices. During these practices, the participants initiate sexual intercourse but do not complete it, seen as a form of self-control. If the participants are able to complete the ritual, they will have gained more spiritual insight; if they are not able to control themselves, they suffer serious consequences of negative karma. On account of the possible negative spiritual consequences and social taboos, sexual Tantrism has not been widely practiced in India in modern times. However, one center of Tantrism, the INTERNATIONAL YOGA FELLOWSHIP MOVEMENT, has become the source of its spread throughout the West.

Buddhism has taken the concept of Tantrism from Hinduism and has created an almost new meaning for it. Tantric Buddhism is most often called Tantrayana, Vajrayana, or Southern Buddhism. These can also be considered schools of Buddhist thought. Buddhist Tantra is a world of secret doctrines. Sometime after an individual chooses to follow the Tantrayana path, a particular celestial being (yidam) will confront a sadhaka (a pupil of Tantra) with his own personal temptations and weaknesses (usually sexual in nature) and will assist him in gaining spiritual strength to transform those temptations into vehicles of enlightenment. Padmasambhava was a great proponent and teacher of Tantrayana in the classical age of Tibet. Buddhist Tantra experienced its greatest growth under the Pala Dynasty in Bengal (700–1175 C.E.). Had it not been for Islamic invasions, Tantra may have developed into even more theological expansions.

The concept of the guru came from Hinduism and along with Tantra was incorporated into Buddhism. Buddhist teaching prohibits the Hindu concept of the Brahmanical guru teacher, but Tantra transforms the Hindu guru into a mere guide for the sadhaka. As the student of Tantra grew in enlightenment, his magnificent spiritual powers (siddhi) grew as well. Siddhi powers, according to tantric texts, could allow the student to make great changes in the social, physical, psychological, and spiritual aspects of his surroundings. As the significance of the pupil grew in Buddhism, Hinduism adapted and incorporated the idea so that it exalted the pupil in conjunction with the spiritual guru master.

Tantra has traveled to the West and has been incorporated as a popular religious icon. In some circles, it has been recognized as purely a sensual means to enlightenment. The New Age Movement has adopted Tantrism and has transformed it into the view of the masculine and feminine attributes merging together to form a whole person: a balance of energies. Many tantric mandalas can be found as icons in multiple non-Eastern metaphysical traditions.

Kumar Jairamdas

Sources:

Kinsley, David. Hindu Goddesses. Los Angeles: University of California Press, 1988.

Urban, Hugh. The Economics of Ecstasy: Tantra, Secrecy, and Power in Colonial Bengal. New York: Oxford University Press, 2001.

sils known have been extracted from rock strata. However, in much more recent times it was settled by Bantu people, now divided into more than 120 separate ethnic groupings.

Tanzania (formerly known as Tanganyika) enters modern history in 695 C.E., when Prince Hamza of Oman, the first of a number of losers in various political struggles on the Arabian Peninsula, settled on the East African coast. Hamza chose Zanzibar as his new home. He was followed by a group from Mecca who founded Mogadishu (Somalia). Later immigrants founded Mombasa (Kenya) and Beira (Mozambique). The Arabs intermarried with the Zandi, or blacks, creating a new trading culture along the coast that tied east Africa to Arabia and eventually to India and lands further east.

The Portuguese arrived at the beginning of the sixteenth century and by the 1520s had taken control of the East African coast. They destroyed the Zandi culture and economic structure. They remained in control until 1688, when the sultan of Oman recaptured Zanzibar, part of a lengthy effort to drive the Portuguese out of the region. The sultan settled in Zanzibar, and his family remained in control into the eighteenth century. During this time, the slave trade flourished. Toward the end of the century, Zanzibar was lost to rival Arab leaders. The movement of the British into the region in the early nineteenth century stopped the movement of slaves out of Zanzibar and turned the rulers' attention to the mainland and the development of plantations that absorbed the slaves. Cloves became the new cash crop.

The weakening power of the sultan in the face of European encroachments came to a head in 1884, when a German arrived and annexed land on the mainland. His actions were backed by German warships. In 1886 the European powers gave Tanganyika, Burundi, and Rwanda to Germany, and Zanzibar became a British protectorate in 1890. Following Germany's defeat in World War I, the British took control of Tanganyika. It remained a colony until 1961, when the modern nation of Tanzania was proclaimed.

Status of religions in Tanzania, 2000-2050

Followers	2000			2025	2050
	total	%	rate
Christians	16,883,000	50.4	3.23	32,500,000	48,500,000
Roman Catholics	8,283,000	24.7	2.91	16,000,000	24,500,000
Protestants	5,530,000	16.5	3.30	10,425,000	15,700,000
Anglicans	2,650,000	7.9	3.38	5,300,000	8,350,000
Muslims	10,644,000	31.8	2.83	19,000,000	27,043,000
Ethnoreligionists	5,393,000	16.1	1.39	5,170,000	3,000,000
Hindus	289,000	0.9	3.26	600,000	1,000,000
Baha'is	141,000	0.4	3.26	250,000	360,000
Nonreligious	84,700	0.3	3.51	214,000	320,000
Buddhists	45,600	0.1	2.38	90,000	180,000
Atheists	19,100	0.1	3.16	50,000	100,000
Sikhs	10,100	0.0	2.19	25,000	40,000
Jains	7,800	0.0	2.38	18,000	40,000
Jews	220	0.0	2.57	400	600
Zoroastrians	130	0.0	2.66	250	400
Total population	33,517,000	100.0	2.78	57,918,000	80,584,000

Tanzania

Tanzania's Rift Valley has been inhabited for a million years, and it is the site from which some of the oldest human fos-

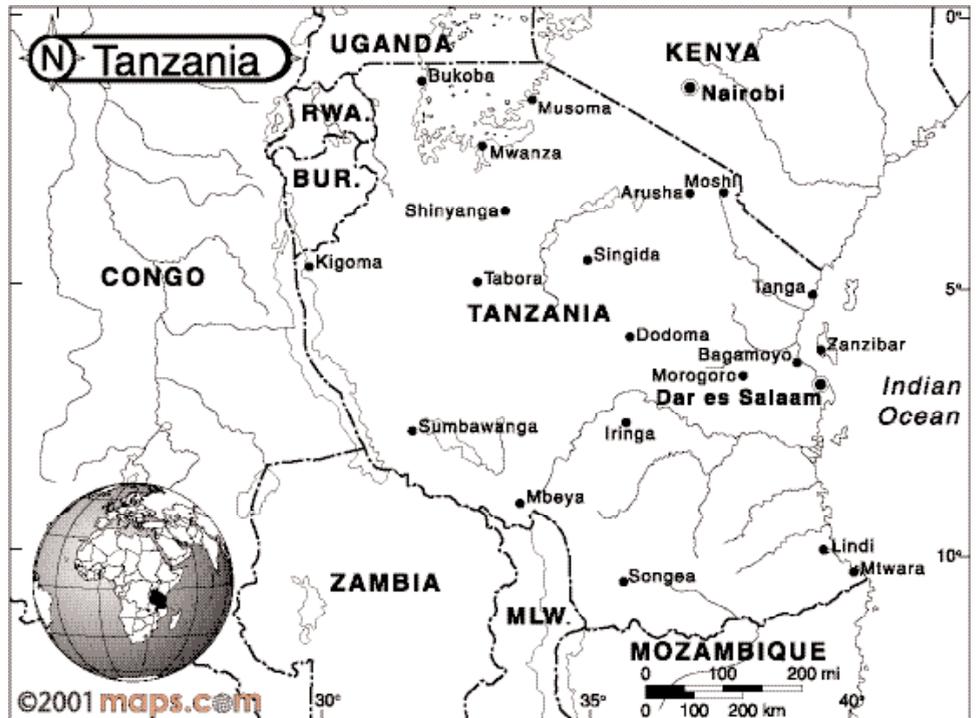

The settlers from Oman who developed Zanzibar brought with them the Ibadī Kharijite form of Islam that predominates in Oman. Kharijism is usually distinguished by its lack of allegiance to the Arab caliph and by its belief that leadership in the Muslim community should not be limited to descendants of the Prophet Muhammad. Rather, leaders should be chosen on a merit system. It developed prior to the emergence of the four schools of Sunni Islam and the split between Sunnis and Shi'as. It places much more emphasis on the Qur'an in making legal decisions than on the Hadith, the traditions concerning Muhammad.

The movement of Muslims from other parts of the Arabian Peninsula to become an integral part of Zandj culture ensured that the Kharijite sect did not gain control of the culture, which eventually was ruled by the Sunni SHAFIITE SCHOOL OF ISLAM, the dominant segment of the Tanzanian Muslim community except on Zanzibar Island. Islam spread dramatically in the period between the two world wars. In the twentieth century, the community has been enlarged by a number of Indo-Pakistanis, mostly Shi'as.

The cosmopolitan nature of modern Dar es Salaam has permitted the diversity of the Muslim community to manifest, and today there are centers of Ismaili, Bohras, and Ithna-Asharis. The AHMADIYYA MOVEMENT IN ISLAM arrived in 1934, and it now has more than forty branch centers. Approximately 32 percent of Tanzania's residents are Muslims.

Christianity originally came to Tanzania in the sixteenth century with the Portuguese, but its presence was superficial and short lived. Then, in 1860, several priests moved to Zanzibar. The HOLY GHOST FATHERS arrived three years later and eventually developed their first center at Bagamoyo, founded as a settlement for freed slaves. When the WHITE FATHERS arrived in 1878, they used Bagamoyo as their point of departure into the interior. Other orders followed. The dioceses of Dar es Salaam and Tabora (two of the now four archdioceses) were designated in 1887.

Tanzania was part of the famous exploratory travels of David Livingstone, a missionary of the LONDON MISSIONARY SOCIETY. His visit to Oxford and Cambridge in 1857 led to the formation of the Universities' Mission to Central Africa, a High-Church Anglican sending agency, and to the launching of the first mission to Tanzania, in 1860. That same year, the London Missionary Society, which was already at work in Rhodesia (Zambia), pushed northward into Tanzania around Lake Tanganyika. The CHURCH MISSIONARY SOCIETY, a Low-Church Anglican sending agency, arrived in 1886. The Anglican work would eventually mature into the CHURCH IN THE PROVINCE OF TANZANIA.

The German colonial advent into Tanzania led to the arrival of several Lutheran missionary societies, beginning in 1886 with the Berlin Mission at Dar es Salaam. The expanded Lutheran work was turned over to several American churches, including the Augustan Lutherans, after World War I. Eventually, German missionaries were readmitted, but they were forced out again during World War II; American churches (now merged into the EVANGELICAL LUTHERAN CHURCH IN AMERICA) and the CHURCH OF SWEDEN filled the vacuum. In 1937 the Federation of Lutheran Churches of Tanzania was created and became a step toward the formation of the EVANGELICAL LUTHERAN CHURCH IN TANZANIA in 1961. With more than two million members each, the Anglican and Lutheran churches are by far the largest churches (other than the ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH) in the country.

Beginning with the African Inland Mission in 1908, a spectrum of churches and missionary sending agencies began work. Among the more successful have been the CHURCH OF GOD (CLEVELAND, TENNESSEE), the Moravians, the NEW APOSTOLIC CHURCH, the ASSEMBLIES OF GOD, the SEVENTH-DAY ADVENTIST CHURCH, and the Baptist Convention of Tanzania (affiliated with the SOUTH-ERN BAPTIST CONVENTION). The extensive Pentecostal growth in Tanzania has been aided by the effort begun by Swedish (Pentecostal Churches in Tanzania) and Canadian (PENTECOSTAL ASSEMBLIES OF CANADA) missionaries. In the 1990s, several Korean groups became active in Tanzania, including a mission team from YOIDO FULL GOSPEL CHURCH.

In spite of its proximity to Kenya, Tanzania has had relatively fewer indigenous churches formed within its bounds. The larger African Initiated Churches—such as the AFRICAN ISRAEL CHURCH, NINEVAH and the LEGION OF MARY—have come into the country from adjacent states.

The larger mission churches formed the Tanganyika Missionary Council, which evolved into the Christian Council of Tanzania, an affiliate of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES. More recently, several of the more conservative missionary agencies formed the Tanzania Evangelical Fellowship, loosely associated with the WORLD EVANGELICAL ALLIANCE.

Within the context set by the two dominant religious communities, Tanzania has become home to a spectrum of religions, many originally brought into the country through the international trading center of Zanzibar. At various times the country was open to immigrants from India, the rest of southern Asia, and the South Pacific. The Hindu community, with approximately 250,000 members, is the largest religious community apart from Christianity and Islam. Most Hindus are Asian Indians. Sikhs and Jains have also come from India. FOGUANGSHAN is one form of Buddhism (from Taiwan) that has spread through Tanzania from its anchor in the Chinese community, and SOKA GAKKAI INTERNATIONAL is active. The largest of the alternative groups, however, is the BAHÁ'Í FAITH.

Sources:

- Ranger, T. O. The African Churches of Tanzania. Nairobi, Kenya: East African Publishing House, 1972.
- Stefano, J. A. Missionary Work in the Church of Tanzania in the Past and Present. Erlangen, Germany: Evangelical Lutheran Mission Publishing House, 1990.
- Von Socard, S. Islam in Tanzania. CSIC Papers—Africa, no. 5. Birmingham, UK: Centre for the Study of Islam and Christian-Muslim Relations, 1991.
- Wright, M. German Missionaries in Tanganyika, 1891–1941. Oxford: Clarendon, 1971.

Taoist Tai Chi Society

The Taoist Tai Chi Society (TTCS), together with its religious affiliate, the Fung Loy Kok Taoist Temple, is perhaps the largest Daoist group in the Western Hemisphere. TTCS was founded in 1970 in Toronto, Canada, and maintains its headquarters there. Centers exist in most Canadian cities, and there are several in the United States, notably in Tallahassee, Florida, and Boulder, Colorado. They have a growing presence in Europe and the Caribbean as well.

hassee, Florida, and Boulder, Colorado. They have a growing presence in Europe and the Caribbean as well.

Moy Lin-Shin, the founder and spiritual leader, was born in Guangdong (Canton) in southern China in 1931. He moved to Hong Kong in 1948 to escape the revolution. There he trained at the Yuen Yuen Institute, which was established by Daoist monks from Canton who were part of the Longmen sect of QUANZHEN DAOISM. Moy immigrated to Canada in 1970, ostensibly to teach martial arts but also as a Daoist missionary. He modified standard Yang-style Tai Chi and coined the term Daoist Tai Chi.

As Moy's original students left Toronto, Daoist Tai Chi clubs sprang up around Canada and later in the United States. Moy's teachings attracted a graduate student from Hong Kong, Eva Wong, who went on to become the in-house intellectual of the TTCS until her break with Moy in the late 1990s. She has published a series of popular books on Daoism with Shambhala Press.

Today the TTCS has “grown to thousands of classes in over 400 locations on four continents,” and there are some ten thousand dues-paying members worldwide. Fung Loy Kok Temple, dedicated in 1981, is the religious arm of the Moy organization. Temple spaces, which vary in size, are located upstairs from or in rooms adjoining the Tai Chi studios.

Fung Loy Kok Taoist Temple “observes the teachings of the three great religions of China: Daoism, Buddhism and Confucianism.” They are represented by the central triad of the temple altar as Lu Dongbin, Guanyin (Goon Yam in Cantonese), and the Jade Emperor, respectively.

Today, the society is registered as a charitable organization and is led by a board of directors. Master Moy retired from his official leadership roles in 1995 and died in 1998. Religious activities are performed by lay members, who, at least in Canadian branches, seem to be divided equally into white Canadians and Cantonese immigrants (mainly elderly women). Chanting is performed in Cantonese, which is transliterated phonetically for the non-Chinese members.

The TTCS also owns and operates an international retreat center an hour's drive north of Toronto. There, ground will soon be broken on a “Cultivation Center” with architecture inspired by the traditional Daoist monastery. This will be the largest Daoist building outside Asia.

The TTCS raises awareness by emphasizing the health benefits of practicing Tai Chi and the service aspect of belonging to the society. It runs an old-age home and a soup kitchen. Later, Tai Chi students will be introduced to the chanting practice of Fung Loy Kok. The organization does not emphasize philosophy, mysticism, or “spirituality.”

The TTCS remains far better known in Canada (not to mention England, Australia, and Poland) than it does in the United States, in part because they have no presence in the American Daoist centers of New York, Los Angeles, and San Francisco. In 2001, the society reported seven hundred centers of activity worldwide.

Address:

Taoist Tai Chi Society
134 D'Arcy St.
Toronto, Ontario M5T 1K3
Canada
<http://www.taoist.org/>

Elijah Siegler

Sources:

- Wong, Eva, trans. Lieh-Tzu, a Taoist Guide to Practical Living. Boston: Shambhala, 1995.
———. Cultivating Stillness: A Taoist Manual for Transforming Body and Mind. Boston: Shambhala, 1992.
———. Taoism. Boston: Shambhala, 1997.

Tenrikyō [Religion of Heavenly Wisdom]

One of the very first of what have come to be known as Japan's new religions, or shin shukyo, Tenrikyō was founded in 1838 by Nakayama Miki (1798–1887), a farmer's wife with shamanistic attributes from a village close to Tenri City, which is situated in the Yamato basin only a short distance from the historic city of Nara. In 1838, Tenri-O-no-Mikoto (the God of Heavenly Reason), also known as Oyagami (God the Parent) is believed to have taken possession of Nakayama Miki, also called Oyasama (Worthy Parent), for the purpose of revealing to her his divine plan and her role therein and to bestow upon her the gift of healing.

Nakayama Miki's mission was to consist of delivering people from suffering in preparation for the coming of a perfect divine kingdom (kanrondai sekai) in which human beings would enjoy the joyous and blissful life (yokigurashi) in union with Tenri-O-no-Mikoto. On becoming the shrine of Tenri-O-no-Mikoto, Nakayama Miki was also provided by this same deity with a plot of ground known as the jiba, believed to be the place of origin of the human race and its spiritual home (oyasato). On this land stands the principal place of worship (Shinden) at the center of which is the kanrondai (sacred pillar). Both the Shinden and the Kyosoden (the sanctuary of the founder) are centers of pilgrimage. It is believed that Nakayama Miki continues to dwell in the Kyosoden, where she is attended to as if still physically present by devotees who dust and clean her bedroom, prepare her food, and look after her every need.

As in the case of other Japanese new religions founded by women, Nakayama Miki was greatly helped by a dedicated male disciple in the person of Iburi Izo, a poor carpenter whose wife she had healed of childbirth fever. Iburi Izo displayed his gratitude for this cure by dedicating himself to hinokishin (volunteer work for the church) including the construction of a model of the first kanrondai in 1873 and a sanctuary for Tenri-O-no-Mikoto. Iburi Izo became the joint leader of Tenrikyō on the death of Nakayama Miki in 1887, and in his capacity as Honseki (oracle) he spoke through the spirit of the founders to God. His pronouncements were written down and came to constitute a set of sacred writings known as the Osashizu. These supplement the two most important sacred scriptures, the Ofudesaki (Tip of the Divine Writing-pen), transmitted by God to Nakayama Miki, a transmission that was not completed until 1882, and the divinely inspired Mikagura-uta (poems that are used as the text of Tenrikyō's worship).

The major Tenrikyō sacred ritual, the dance of creation or Kagura Tsutome, takes place around the kanrodai and is performed by dancers in masks led by the head of the church, known as the Shimbashira, a descendant of the founder. The masks represent figures in the cosmogonic myth developed by Tenrikyō. This dance, performed on the twenty-sixth of each month, is believed to hasten the fulfillment of God's plans and is given as the main reason for Tenrikyō's existence. On the day prior to the performance, the Shimbashira "ordains" (in a brief ceremony known as the honseki) those who have completed the course of besseki lectures (the nine lectures required for initiation) and the Shuyoka course (three months' intensive training) and taken the besseki vow. They are given by the Shimbashira the sacred grant of Osazuke (healing) and these graduates, or yobuku (literally timbers), are now empowered to perform healing rites using a particular form of hand gesture known as teodori (hand dance) the gesture used in Tenrikyō worship.

The major festival for members from all over the world is the birthday of the founder, celebrated at the Oyasato, or headquarters on April 18. Other important services include the Tai-sai (great services) held on January 26 and October 26. There are memorial services for the dead on March 27 and September 27, as well as a monthly service, the Tsukinami-sai. Three times a month there is the popular sacramental rite of obiya yurushi (easy childbirth), which involves the consecration of white rice that is then placed on the kanrodai during the Obiya Tsutome service in which the creation is ritually reenacted.

Regarded as a dissident religious movement, Tenrikyō suffered increasing government probes and harassment, and the founder, while proud of her country, was critical and at times even scornful of its ruling elite—as were other female founders of Japanese sects, including Deguchi Nao (of ŌMOTO). Nakayama Miki was frequently interrogated, and she was imprisoned on seventeen occasions for, among other things, blasphemy and obstructing the public highways by performing elaborate ritual dances at the corners of the village. The movement's fortunes changed, however, and in 1908 it was recognized as one of the thirteen "Sect Shinto" organizations, autonomous organizations authorized by the government between 1868 and 1945.

In 1947, Tenrikyō, believing that its teachings had become distorted by state Shintoism, launched the campaign for the Restoration of the Original Teachings (Fukugen). In 1970 it withdrew from the Association of Shinto Sects and had itself placed in the category of “Other Religions.” It is one of the largest movements in that group, with a membership of more than one million in Japan. Tenrikyō is also present in many countries outside Japan, including Korea, Taiwan, India, Nepal, the Democratic Republic of the Congo, the United States, France, and Great Britain, but in every case with the exception of Korea its membership has remained numerically small.

Tenrikyō operates a number of important cultural and educational institutions including Tenri University, founded in 1925, and the very valuable Tenri Library and Tenri Sankokan Museum. It has also established a publishing house and a hospital. In the latter spiritual and scientific methods of healing are used together.

The structure and organization of Tenrikyō, while formally bureaucratic, is essentially based on the principle of the ie (family system); the Honbuin (central administration), consists of descendants of the families of Nakayama Miki and Iburi Izo or of families very close to theirs. The headquarters are in Tenri (near Nara), Japan, and are known as Oyasato (Village of the Parent).

Address:

<http://www.tenrikyo.or.jp/>

Peter B. Clarke

Sources:

Clarke, Peter B. A Bibliography of Japanese New Religions.

Eastbourne, UK: Japan Library, 1999.

Elwood, Robert S., Jr. Tenrikyo: A Pilgrimage Faith. Tenri City, Japan: Oyasato Research Institute, 1982.

Ofudesaki: Tip of the Writing-Brush. Tenri City, Japan: Tenrikyō Church Headquarters, 1971.

Oyasato Research Institute, Tenri University. The Theological Perspectives of Tenrikyo. Tenri City, Japan: Tenri University Press, 1986.

Tenshō Kōtai Jingūkyō [The Religion of the Mighty God of Heaven]

Tenshō Kōtai Jingūkyō, the Religion of the Mighty God of Heaven (Tenshō refers here to the Sun Goddess, Amaterasu), was founded in July 1945 by a farmer's wife, Sayo Kitamura (1900–1967), from the village of Hizumi in Yamaguchi Prefecture in the western part of Honshu. Sayo Kitamura, after one of a series of possessions by Tenshō, became a living goddess, or ikigami. She proceeded to inform her listeners that global catastrophe was imminent.

She also announced that the Kami Tenshō, who had taken complete possession of her whole being, had commanded her to perform a dance as a means of restoring harmony and peace at that very moment, when the present order of the world was about to collapse into complete anarchy and chaos. From that point, observers referred to the new movement as the Dancing Religion (Odori Shukyo). The dance is also important in securing release from evil spirits and in bringing relief where there is misfortune. In the thinking of the Dancing Religion, as in numerous other Japanese religions (for example, AGONSHU), ancestral spirits are seen as bringing suffering to their descendants and the living generally when they themselves have not been redeemed.

A charismatic leader who broke innumerable conventions in relation to style of dress, use of language, and customary forms of greeting, among other things, Sayo Kitamura, known to her followers as Ogamisama (Great God), preached continuously of impending calamity and, in particular, of the devastation that awaited the world on account of the development and use of the atomic bomb. There would, however, emerge in the course of time a new world order in which peace and happiness would reign unchallenged, and this would be brought about by spiritual means, by fulfilling the commands of the absolute deity Tenshō Kōtai Jingū.

The main teaching of the movement is that misfortune and unhappiness are the result of desires and attachments and that the only way out of this unhealthy and harmful condition is through prayer that leads to the state of non-ego, or muga. The main practice is the ecstasy dance, or muga-no-mai, the dance of selflessness. A prayer known as oinori is said by members prior to starting this dancing ritual, and it ends with the recitation of the formula na myo ho ren ge kyo, a phrase that is regarded as untranslatable and whose meaning and power to transform and purify are in the sounds. This formula and improvised songs (muga-no-uta) are sung continuously, each time with ever-increasing intensity and volume as the dance gets underway.

It is believed that the dance bestows on participants the gift of divine insight into the innermost secrets of the universe. Followers believe, further, that this dance will give them spiritual control over the world and purify the souls of all human beings. It is also thought that once they have achieved this high emotional state, followers' prayers gain the power to redeem all evil spirits, including those that might be in possession of the living. A form of speaking in tongues during this selfless dance is not unknown, the different languages heard being those of souls who have entered the participants' bodies to express their gratitude for having been saved.

Other practices include mutual soul-polishing meetings known variably, depending on their form, content, and size, as tomomigaki, migaki-no-kai, and komigakai.

The movement's headquarters, or Honbu—regarded as the spiritual home of the people of the world—are located in the village of Tabuse in Yamaguchi Prefecture, close to the village where the founder was born and reared. The present spiritual head is Himigamisama, her granddaughter and the daughter of her son, known as Wakagamisama. The latter performs the role of administrative head of the movement.

Overseas branches exist in the United States, the largest center being in Hawaii, where the active membership is less than one thousand.

Peter B. Clarke

Sources:

Clarke, Peter B. "Modern Japanese Millenarian Movements." In Japanese New Religions in Global Perspective, edited by Peter B. Clarke, 129–182. Richmond, Surrey: Curzon, 2000.

Hamrin, Tima. "Illness and Salvation in Tenshō Kōtai Jingūkyō." In Japanese New Religions in Global Perspective, edited by Peter B. Clarke, 240–257. Richmond, Surrey: Curzon, 2000.

Nishiyama, Shigeru, and Fujii Takashi. "The Propagation and Spread of Tenshō Kōtai Jingūkyō within Japanese American Society on Hawaii Island." In New Religions: Contemporary Papers in Japanese Religions, edited by Inoue Nabutaka, 125–161. Tokyo: Kokugakuin University, 1991. Posted at <http://www.kokugakuin.ac.jp/ijcc/wp/cpjr/newreligions/nishiyama.html>. Accessed November 26, 2001.

The Prophet of Tabuse. Tabuse: Tenshō Kōtai Jingūkyō, 1954.

Terapanth Svetambara Jain Tradition

The Terapanth Svetambara Jain Tradition was founded by Muni Bhikhan (1726–1803), who was later called Acarya Bhiksu. Bhikhan was born in India in the village of Kantaliya near Jodhpur. His parents were Bisa Osvals of the Sankleca gotra (clan) and followed the Murtipujak Jain tradition. After the death of his wife, Bhikhan renounced the world and became initiated into the itinerant mendicant order of Acarya Raghunath (1706 or 1708–1790) of the Dhanna Dharmadasa Sthanakavasi tradition in 1751. However, on June 28, 1760, he split from the "lax" Sthanakavasis with four other monks and founded his own mendicant order in Kelya near Rajsamand. In the beginning, his group had only thirteen male members, and his opponents scorned it as the path of the thirteen, or terah panth. Bhiksu later paraphrased terah panth as tera panth, or your path, and interpreted the number thirteen in terms of the principal rules of conduct for Jain ascetics, the five great vows, or mahavratas; the three restraints, or guptis; and the five comportments, or samitis—which he attempted to follow by the letter.

The cause of the schism was a disagreement over a technical point of Jain karma theory. The Jain canonical scriptures teach that the soul can be liberated from its karmic fetters only through the renunciation of all violence—that is, all action. The Dharmadasa Sthanakavasis, like most extant Jain traditions, also propagate compassion, or anukampa, as a religious value and emphasize the positive karmic consequences of charity (dana-daya) and the protection of life (jiva daya). In contrast, Bhiksu argued that because ultimately both bad karma (papa) and good karma (punya) obstructs the liberation of the soul, a salvation seeker must avoid both. Because he privileged this perspective, he even regarded acts of compassion performed for the purpose of accumulating punya as sinful (papa). The most concise discussion of this issue from the Terapanth point of view can be found in Bhiksu's treatise Anukampa Ri Caupai, written in 1787 in the local Marvari language. Bhiksu distinguishes there (and elsewhere) between relative or worldly compassion (laukik daya) and absolute or religious compassion (lokottara or dharma daya)—that is, absolute nonviolence. He argues that although material acts of charity are positive from the social point of view (vyavahara naya), they are negative from the religious point of view (niscaya naya). In his conception, punya can be gained only as a side effect of acts of renunciation, not independently through acts of material help or other "mixed" actions. His criticism of the laxity of the Sthanakavasi mendicants and other Jain traditions is directed against their nonrecognition of the difference between religion and worldly morality.

The terminology of Acarya Bhiksu's teaching of absolute renunciation is influenced not only by the writings of the Digambara Acarya Kundakunda (c. second to third centuries C.E.) and the Digambara commentaries of Umasvati's Tattvartha-sutra (c. third to fifth centuries C.E.) but also by the tabbas (vernacular commentaries) of the Acarya Dharmasinha (1599–1671), the founder of the Dariyapuri Sthanakavasi tradition. Dharmasinha also taught the futility of compassionate help and nonintervention on the grounds that from the absolute point of view the moment of death of every living being is predetermined by its life-span (ayusya) karma, even if the causes of death appear to be accidental, and therefore preventable, from a conventional point of view. For other Sthanakavasis the name Terapanth indicates that Acarya Bhiksu's views are akin to those of the proponents of the image-worshipping lay movement of the Digambara Terapantha (which should otherwise not be confused with the aniconic Svetambara Terapanth order), whose adherents also claim to practice Jainism from an absolute perspective—or niscaya naya. The denial of the necessity of the practical point for a nonomniscient living being is, for them, a form of ekanta-vada (theoretical absolutism) that contradicts the Jain theory of anekanta-vada (nonabsolutism).

Although the principal outlook of the Terapanth has not changed during its 240-year history, its forms of application and its institutions have changed. To prevent schisms and laxity, Acarya Bhiksu made the rule that there should be only one acarya (teacher-cum-group leader) and that he should be chosen by his predecessor. On that basis, the fourth acarya, Jitmal (Jayacarya; 1803–1881), created an elaborate institutional framework for the growing monastic order from 1852 onward. The ninth acarya, Tulsi (1914–1997), ruled the order from 1936. He modernized the Terapanth and turned it from a world-negating mendicant order into a world-transforming religious movement by emphasizing the significance of education, worldly morality, and social reform. In 1949 he created the “nonreligious” anuvrat (small-vow), movement for the implementation of nonviolence and morality in social life. In 1952 he abolished the dogma of nonaccidental death and later promoted “worldly” charity for his educational projects. The communal good-will movement in 1954 was followed in 1960 by the naya mod (new turn), initiative that sought to eradicate “outdated” social customs among the Terapanth laity, such as rituals, casteism, and female purdha. In 1970 the Jain Visva Bharati was opened and gained the status of a “deemed to be University” in 1991. It is located in Ladnun, the birthplace of Acarya Tulsi, and it functions today as the physical center of the Terapanth, though all important decisions are taken by the permanently itinerant acarya. In 1980, Acarya Tulsi introduced a new category of novices, the saman(i)s, who are permitted to use public transport and to travel abroad on missionary tours. For many Jains living outside India, the samans and samanias are the only Jain mendicants they can meet. The present leader of the Terapanth is Acarya Mahaprajna (b. 1920), who was inaugurated in 1994. Mahaprajna contributed greatly to the Terapanth edition of the canonical scriptures, or agama (1974 ff.), and the publication of the Terapanth literature in Rajasthan. Under the impression of the success of Goenka’s vipassana (meditation) classes in Rajasthan, he introduced a Jain version of insight meditation, preksa dhyana, in 1975. And in 1980 he introduced the science of living program, jnana vijñana, a step-by-step guide for a nonviolent way of life for children and adults, intended for schools and universities in particular. The chosen successor of Mahaprajna is Yuvacarya Mahasraman (b. 1962).

At present, the Terapanth has about 250,000 followers all over India (including non-Jain members of the anuvrata movement); several thousand in Nepal, the UK, and the United States; and a few families in many commercial centers around the world. Most Terapanth lay followers belong to the traditional business families of the Osval castes. Because of the influence of the missionary tours of the samans and samanias, the influence of the Terapanth is currently spreading worldwide, though primarily among expatriate Jains. The principal religious practices of the Terapanthis are fasting, meditation, and study. Because image worship is rejected, lay people venerate the mendicants of the Terapanth order as symbols of Jain ideals.

Address:

Jain Vishva Bharati.
Ladnun 341 306
Rajasthan
India

Peter Flügel

Sources:

- Budhmal, Muni. Terapanth Ka Itihas. Pratham Khand: Terapanth Ke Pratham Car Acarya. 4th rev. ed. Calcutta: Jain Svetambar Terapanth Mahasabha Prakasan, 1964, 1995.
- Flügel, Peter. “The Ritual Circle of the Terapanth Svetambara Jains.” Bulletin D’Etudes Indiennes 13 (1995–1996): 117–176.
- Mahaprajna, Yuvacarya. Preksha Dhyana: Theory and Practice. 2d rev. ed., edited by Muni Mahendra Kumar. Ladnun: Tulsi Adhyatma Nidam, 1992.
- Nathmal, Muni [Acarya Mahaprajna]. Acharya Bhiksu: The Man and His Philosophy. Translation of Bhiksu Vicar Darsan by N. Sahal. Curu: Adars Sahitya Sangh Prakasan, 1959, 1968.
- Tulsi, Acarya. Anuvrat: A Shield against Immorality. Ladnun: Jain Vishva Bharati, 1989.
- , ed. Bhiksu-Granth Ratnakar. Khand 1–2. Sanghrahakarta: Muni Cauthmal. Prabhandh Sampadak: Sricand Rampuriya. Calcutta: Jain Svetambara Terapanth Mahasabha, 1960–1961.
- Tulsi, Acarya, and Yuvacarya Mahaprajna, comps. Terapanth: Maryada Aur Vyavastha. Sampadak: Muni Madhukar. Jayacarya Series Vol. 9. Ladnun: Jain Visva Bharati, 1983.

Thai Forest Monks

The second half of the nineteenth century in Thailand witnessed an efflorescence of ascetic forest-dwelling monks dedicated to the practice of meditation. These monks led an eremitic life—sometimes alone, sometimes in small groups. They were heirs to a classical division within the Theravada sangha (monastic order) between forest dwellers (in Pali araññavasi) and town dwellers (gamavasi). This division correlates loosely with a further categorization of monks into those who devote themselves to meditation (vipas-sanadhura) and those whose vocation is more inclined toward studying texts (ganthadhura).

Austere activities undertaken in addition to the monks’ rules (vinaya) came to be associated with the path of meditation. Thirteen in number, these practices are known as dhutanga, and they include the practice of sleeping in forests or cemeteries. In Thailand monks who follow all or some of the dhutanga practices are known as thudong monks.

Scholars propose that the revitalization of the thudong tradition can be regarded as a reaction to nineteenth-century ecclesiastical reforms and the emergence of a new monastic fraternity (nikaya), the Thammayut, promoted by the royal monk and eventual monarch, Mongkut (1851–1868). The Thammayut reformers engineered a more standardized and bureaucratic form of state Buddhism, commensurate with moves toward the consolidation and modernization of the state.

Many of the most noted of the thudong monks of the revival were to be found in the northeast region of the country, especially those who belonged to the lineage of the meditation teacher Phra Ajaan Man Phuurithatto (1870–1949). Man was universally acknowledged as an especially holy monk who achieved the highest level of spiritual attainment (arahant). Narratives of Man’s life and those of other venerated forest monks became popular and are nowadays printed for distribution as gifts at funerals.

The forest monks served as teachers, healers, and community leaders to the villagers who supported them. From the outset the wandering monks established temporary hermitages during the rainy seasons. Under pressure from the centralized authority of the ecclesiastical hierarchy, and with the encouragement of local patronage, the hermitages gave way to permanent monasteries whose members continued the thudong tradition by undertaking pilgrimages.

Most recently, organized tours have become popular among prosperous urban folk who seek to acquire religious merit through offering requisites to the forest monks, who are regarded as particularly pure and so unusually productive of merit. The funerals of forest meditation masters have attracted huge crowds, including high-ranking members of the Thai royal family. Such attention has, however, done little to safeguard the independence of forest monks, who are often in conflict with officials of the Forest Department. In 1987 the Thai Sangha Council ordered all monks, except those living in designated monasteries, to leave the forests. Furthermore, forested areas are shrinking. Decades of land clearance and logging have wiped out up to 80 percent of Thailand’s forests. Monks from forest monasteries are active in a struggle to conserve what remains.

One famous forest monk and disciple of Ajaan Man was Ajaan Chah. Ajaan Chah (1924–1993) established an international monastery, Wat Pah Nanachat, as a center for the increasing numbers of Buddhists from Europe, Australia, and America who traveled to Thailand to be ordained as monks. In 1977 he visited Britain and founded what came to be known as the BRITISH FOREST SANGHA. A branch monastery was established in the 1990s in northern California and named Abhayagiri Buddhist Monastery; similarly, branch monasteries exist in Switzerland, Italy, New Zealand, and Australia.

Address:

Wat Pah Nanachat
 Bahn, Bung Wai
 Amper Warin
 Ubon Rajathani 34310
 Thailand

Sources:

Tambiah, Stanley J. The Buddhist Saints of the Forest and the Cult of Amulets. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1984.
 Taylor, J. J. Forest Monks and the Nation-State: An Anthropological and Historical Study in Northeastern Thailand. Singapore: Institute of Southeast Asian Studies, 1993.
 Tiyanich, Kamala. Forest Recollections: Wandering Monks in Twentieth-Century Thailand. Honolulu: University of Hawaii Press, 1997.

Thailand

The most prominent religion in Thailand is, and for many centuries has been, Buddhism. Individual Thai people may take Buddhism very differently—that is, as an intellectual religion, a normative religion, a popular religion, a doctrinal religion, or an engaged religion. No matter what type of Buddhism is taken, as long as it is harmful neither to an individual nor to the public, it is supported by the people and by the government. All Thai Buddhism that complies with the policy of the Thai government, as legislated in the

A seated Buddha and stupa at the Wat Wora Chettharam in Ayatthaya, Thailand (S. Reddy/TRIP)

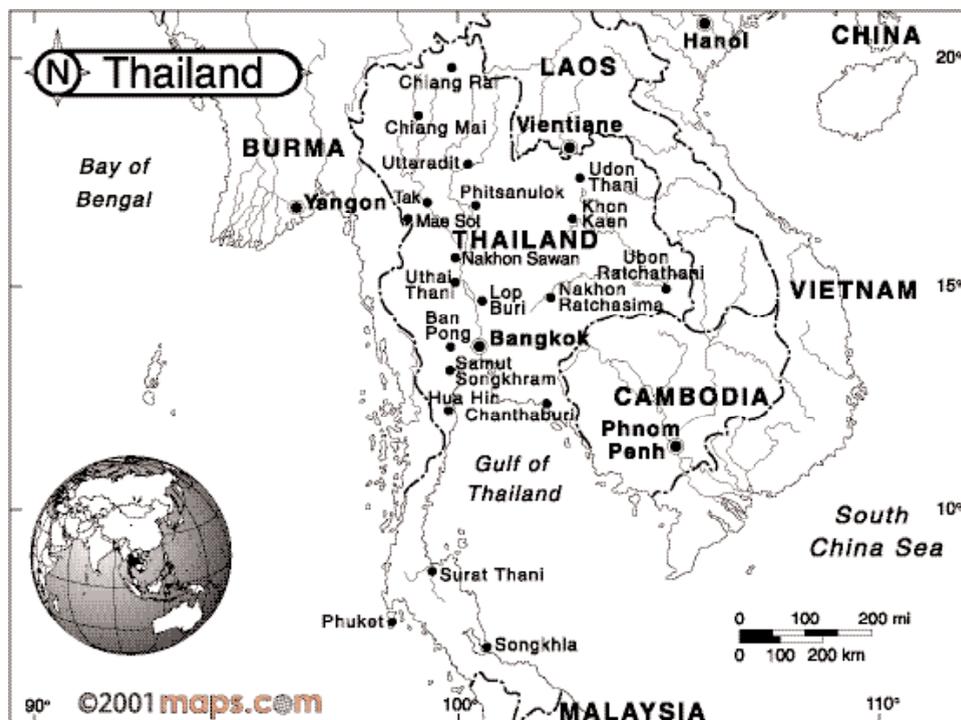

Sandra Bell

Sangha Act of 1962, and that is administrated by the Sangha Supreme Council, is considered orthodox Buddhism and, according to the Thai Constitution, is supported by the government.

Some Buddhist movements—for example, THE SANTI ASOKA—are self-governed, reject the authority of the Sangha Supreme Council, and establish their own ways of life and religious practices. They are considered unorthodox and gain no governmental support. In contrast to the Santi Asoka, another influential reformist Buddhist group, the DHAMMAKAYA FOUNDATION, submits itself to the Thai Sangha and thus is protected by some of its elders. Thailand is also the home of the international headquarters of the WORLD FELLOWSHIP OF BUDDHISTS, which has its main offices in Bangkok.

According to Basic Religious Data for the year 2000, compiled by the Department of Religious Affairs, there were 57,357,862 Buddhists out of 61,466,178 Thai people in 1998—that is, 93 percent of Thais are Buddhists. Thai Buddhism is predominantly THERAVADA BUDDHISM, and thus it places a great deal of emphasis upon the support of the monastic order. Monks cannot work to earn their livings. They are supported by laypeople and the government. In 1998 there were 265,791 Buddhist monks and 97,875 Buddhist novices. In 1999 there were 31,111 Buddhist monasteries throughout the country. Food is donated to monks during their alms rounds, or they are invited to lead a ceremony. This is held to yield more merit to the doer than donating to “ordinary people,” as monks are considered holy.

Apart from Buddhism, other religions in Thailand supported by the government are Islam, Christianity, Hinduism, and Sikhism. These religions are subject to the Department of Religious Affairs and under Thai law. Following the Thai Constitution, all religions whose beliefs and practices are harmful neither to an individual, society, nor the Thai nation are allowed to spread throughout the country. Thais are free to profess any religion. Besides, the Thai king, though himself a Buddhist, is the Great Upholder of All Faiths. On the king's birthday each year, leaders of all major religions in Thailand—Buddhism, Islam, Christianity, Hinduism, and Sikhism—express their well-wishes to the king on television.

Status of religions in Thailand, 2000-2050

Followers	2000			2025	2050
	total	%	rate
Buddhists	52,383,000	85.3	0.95	61,330,000	61,607,000
Muslims	4,173,000	6.8	1.21	5,000,000	5,500,000
Christians	1,362,000	2.2	1.42	1,766,000	2,050,000
Independents	779,000	1.3	1.59	1,000,000	1,200,000
Protestants	303,000	0.5	1.74	450,000	500,000
Roman Catholics	255,000	0.4	0.61	280,000	300,000
Ethnoreligionists	1,317,000	2.1	1.10	1,450,000	1,400,000
Nonreligious	1,226,000	2.0	2.06	1,800,000	2,100,000
Chinese folk-religionists	530,000	0.9	-0.19	500,000	350,000
Confucianists	222,000	0.4	1.10	300,000	400,000
Hindus	214,000	0.4	1.73	360,000	450,000
Baha'is	144,000	0.2	1.05	240,000	300,000
Atheists	88,700	0.1	1.04	250,000	320,000
Sikhs	19,000	0.0	1.09	35,000	50,000
Neoreligionists	14,600	0.0	1.99	35,000	50,000
Shintoists	370	0.0	1.41	700	1,200
Jews	80	0.0	0.37	100	120
Total population	61,399,000	100.0	1.00	72,717,000	74,188,000

According to statistics from the Department of Religious Affairs, in 1998 there were 2,977,434 Muslims, 1,012,871 Christians, and 21,125 religious followers of Hinduism and Sikhism. There are also religious followers of other minor traditions, such as the BAHÁ'Í FAITH and Confucianism. They are, however, unable to gain support from the Thai government because of their small number of members.

The Islamic community in Thailand is Sunnite (of the SHAFIITE SCHOOL OF ISLAM) led by the Chula-raja-montri (chief imam) whose office is in Bangkok. The Islamic law is used in Muslim courts in four major provinces in southern Thailand, where a number of Malay people reside.

Christianity in Thailand represents two basic groupings: Catholic and Protestant. In 1998 there were about twenty-two hundred Christian clergy. In 1999 there were about fifteen hundred Protestant churches and seven hundred Catholic churches in Thailand. All were supported financially by the Thai government. The Protestant community was pioneered by Dutch and British missionaries, the latter representing the LONDON MISSIONARY SOCIETY. They were soon joined by Americans from the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions. A number of the Protestant church groups (BAPTISTS, Presbyterians, the CHRISTIAN CHURCH [DISCIPLES OF CHRIST], and followers of LUTHERANISM) united in 1934 to form the CHURCH OF CHRIST IN THAILAND, currently the largest Protestant body. Since World War II, significant growth has been shown by the NEW APOSTOLIC CHURCH and the indigenous Thai Ezra Churches, the latter a movement that began in northeast Thailand in the early 1980s and by the end of the century had claimed more than 100,000 members.

Wat Pho, Temple of Reclining Buddha, Bangkok, Thailand (Corel)

Christianity has found its support primarily among Vietnamese, Chinese, Karen, and Montagnard ethnic groups residing in China, and to only a small degree among the Thai proper.

Hinduism and Brahmanism play significant roles in the Thai Royal Court and popular traditions. For most Thais the king is semidivine. Although he himself is a Buddhist, his power is held to be supported by deities, both in Buddhist and Hindu traditions. All auspicious royal ceremonies, such as the First Ploughing Ceremony, the Royal Inauguration, and the Golden Jubilee of the Royal Enthronement, are partly performed by Brahmins (Hindu priests). Moreover, as Indian civilization and Hinduism have pervaded Thai society since the old days, many Thais believe that their lives are predestined by a Hindu god, especially God Brahma. Although most Thais are Buddhists, they nevertheless believe in the supernatural power of deities.

Sikhism is confined to some Thais of Indian blood living most in downtown Bangkok. Confucianism prevails among Thais whose ancestors are Chinese. The Thai people have refrained from waging wars against one another based upon their religions.

Pataraporn Sirikanchana

Sources:

- Keyes, Charles F. Thailand: Buddhist Kingdom to Modern Nation-State. Boulder, CO: Westview, 1987.
- Sirikanchana, Pataraporn. Kwam Roo Phuen Than Thang Sasana (Fundamental knowledge of religion). 3d ed. Bangkok: Thammasat University Press, 1997.
- Smith, A. G. A History of Church Growth in Thailand: An Interpretive Analysis, 1816–1980. Ph.D. dissertation, Fuller Theological Seminary, 1980.
- Thai Department of Religious Affairs. Yearbook of Basic Religious Data, 2000. Bangkok: Government Printing Office, 2000.

Theosophical Society (Adyar)

The Theosophical Society, with international headquarters in Adyar (Chennai), Madras, India, was founded in New York City in 1875 by a number of individuals, the most important of whom were Henry Steel Olcott (1832–1907) and Helena Petrovna Blavatsky (1831–1891). Olcott became the first president of the society (1875–1907), helping in its spread and organization and popularizing its teachings. Blavatsky was responsible for the restatement, according to the Theosophical interpretation, of those teachings that became synonymous with the teachings of the Theosophical Society. Most of the teachings are contained in her two most important works, Isis Unveiled and The Secret Doctrine. Blavatsky retains special standing for most Theosophists because of her status as disciple, or chela, of highly evolved beings—masters or mahatmas—who dwelled in an “Occult Brotherhood” and who were the ultimate source of the teachings known as the Ancient Wisdom, the Secret Doctrine, the Wisdom Religion, or Theoso-

Helena Petrovna Blavatsky (Bettmann/Corbis)

phy. This wisdom, it is believed, existed from the dawn of humanity—a prisca theologia or philosophia perennis—and was preserved and transmitted through the ages by great teachers and initiates (Pythagoras, Buddha, Krishna, Jesus, Zoroaster, Plato, Porphyry, Proclus, Patañjali). Furthermore, it was conserved, however imperfectly, in the various religious traditions (Hinduism, Buddhism, Christianity, Judaism, Islam, and Zoroastrianism) and their sacred scriptures (the Veda, Upanishads, Bhagavad Gîtâ, the Purânas, the Hebrew and Christian scriptures, the Zohar, the Buddhist canon, and the Avesta), all of which purported to disclose, in the words of Blavatsky, “the ‘deepest depths’ of the Divine Nature, and show . . . the real tie which binds all things together.”

Because of this conviction, the original objects of the society, as stated in its by-laws of 1875, were “to collect and diffuse a knowledge of the laws which govern the universe.” Nonetheless, the comparative study of religion and philosophy was not its only aim. There is enough evidence to suggest that the Ancient Wisdom was to be practiced. Indeed, the very word first employed by Blavatsky to refer to this wisdom was Magic, a term that was synonymous with the post-1870s popularization of Theosophy as defined and elaborated by her in her later writing career and which suggests a combination of both practice and understanding. For this reason, members of the Theosophical Society at various periods in its history placed greater emphasis on striving to arouse one’s latent powers than on merely investigating the laws of nature from a theoretical perspective. That was especially true from the early years of the society to the early 1880s and during the presidency of Annie Besant (1907–1933). One type of training that more advanced members sought to achieve in the early years of the society was astral projection, or the out-of-body experience.

Since there is no official dogma recognized by the society, members possess a diversity of views according to their understanding of Theosophy. One position that is universally accepted, however, is the “Brotherhood of Humanity,” which is articulated in the first of three objects of the society, quoted herein according to the language of the 1896 General Report: “to form a nucleus of the Universal Brotherhood of Humanity, without distinction of race, creed, sex, caste or color.” The other two objects of the society reflect the traditional outlook of Theosophists given above in the 1875 by-laws: “to encourage the study of comparative religion, philosophy and science” and “to investigate unexplained laws of nature and the powers latent in man.” In addition to these objects, the body of teachings generally associated with the society has been articulated by Blavatsky, especially in her greatest work, The Secret Doctrine. Among the teachings are (1) the notion that religions have both exoteric and esoteric elements, with the Ancient Wisdom or Wisdom Religion (that is, Theosophy) synonymous with the esoteric body of wisdom, taught and preserved by initiates in all the great religions and philosophies; (2) the recognition of the diversity and universality of sources containing the Ancient Wisdom, thereby including not only elements of Western esotericism—neoplatonism, Christian kabala, Hermetism, and Hermeticism—but also Eastern components, notably Hindu and Buddhist philosophies: in brief, an “Eclectic Theosophy” as opposed to the Theosophy of Western esotericism; and (3) the three propositions contained in the introduction of The Secret Doctrine: (a) the existence of an infinite and unknowable Absolute, (b) the cyclic nature of the universe and all it comprises, and (c) the identity of the soul with the Universal Soul (of the Absolute) and the need for all souls to progress through the cycle of reincarnation to realize this identity.

As is the case in many movements, disagreements over teachings and authority have led to new organizations that arose out of the original Theosophical Society. For instance, the attempt to place Esoteric Christianity and Western Theosophy on the same footing as the increasingly Hindu and Buddhist Theosophy of Blavatsky and her Masters led to the formation of the Hermetic Society in 1884. In the same vein, the conflict arising over authority led to the 1895 separation of the American section of the Theosophical Society under William Quan Judge (1851–1896), one of the original founders. Today, the Judge Society continues under the name the THEOSOPHICAL SOCIETY (AMERICA).

The Theosophical Society (Adyar) continues as the largest of Theosophical organizations, with a membership of approximately 30,000 spread over sixty countries, with India and the United States possessing the most members (12,852 and 4,676, respectively).

James A. Santucci

Sources:

Blavatsky, Helena Petrovna. The Secret Doctrine. 2 vols. in 1. Los Angeles: Theosophy Company, 1974. (A facsimile of the original 1888 edition.)

Gomes, Michael. The Dawning of the Theosophical Movement. Wheaton, IL: Theosophical Publishing House [Quest Books], 1987.

———. Theosophy in the Nineteenth Century: An Annotated Bibliography. New York: Garland, 1994.

Olcott, Henry S. Old Diary Leaves. 6 vols. Adyar, India: Theosophical Publishing House, 1900–1941.

Ransom, Josephine. A Short History of the Theosophical Society. Adyar, India: Theosophical Publishing House, 1938.

Santucci, James. La Società Teosofica. Torino: Elledici, 1999.

———. The Theosophical Movement 1875–1950. Los Angeles: Cunningham Press, 1951.

Theosophical Society (America)

The Theosophical Society was begun in 1875 in New York City by Helena P. Blavatsky (1831–1891) and Henry Steel Olcott (1832–1907) as an organization that would continue their investigations into Spiritualist phenomena and other occult practices and ideas. It would also further the work of studying and coordinating the insights of various world religions. Blavatsky and Olcott left the United States for India in 1878. For several years the society floundered; then in 1883, William Quan Judge (1851–1896), one of the original members of the society, began to recruit members and hold public meetings. He published a magazine, the Path, for American Theosophists, beginning in 1886. In that year he dissolved a Board of Control established by Olcott in 1884 to govern the society in the United States and created an American Section of the worldwide Theosophical Society that Judge himself headed as general secretary.

Judge was a charismatic leader, personally inspiring many middle-class American men and women interested in esoteric matters and disillusioned with Christianity. His published work conveyed Theosophical teachings in a popular, accessible style. His skills as an organizer, manager, and communicator contributed significantly to the rapid expansion of Theosophical work in the 1880s and 1890s. By the time of his death in 1896, Theosophical lodges could be found in most major, and many smaller, American cities, and membership numbered in the thousands. Theosophy became a household word, appearing in numerous discussions of religion and culture in the popular print media. It also became the target of attacks by Christian clergy. Many who joined the Theosophical Society were spurned by their friends and families in much the same way that adherents of new religions in the 1960s and later were ostracized by loved ones.

When Blavatsky died in 1891, Judge, vice president of the Theosophical Society, became head of the Esoteric School of Theosophy, an elite group composed of individuals thoroughly committed to Theosophical principles. Later he suggested that he and Annie Besant (1847–1933), head of the European Section after Blavatsky’s death, share leadership of the Esoteric School. For the next few years controversy ensued, as Besant first sided with Judge, then opposed him, as did Olcott. They accused Judge of misusing the handwriting and seal of the esoteric leaders of the movement, Blavatsky’s teachers, the Masters. This series of events, often referred to in Theosophical history as the Judge Case, remains a controversial chapter in the evolution and development of the movement. As a result of continued attacks on Judge, in 1895 the American Section, while recognizing Olcott as president-founder, declared its autonomy, electing Judge president-for-life of the Theosophical Society in America. Olcott withdrew the branch charters and revoked the membership of those in the United States, Europe, and elsewhere who followed Judge, thus splitting the worldwide Theosophical movement in two.

The next year Judge died, and he was succeeded as leader of the American Theosophists by Katherine Tingley (1847–1929). This succession was marked by controversy. Some of Judge’s inner circle accused her of manipulating events and people to make it appear that Judge had given his blessing to her leadership, while other leaders supported her without reservation. She remained a controversial figure, among Theosophists and in the public eye, throughout her tenure. Her name frequently appeared in newspaper articles associated with various legal battles, the earliest major one involving a libel suit that she brought against the owner of the largest Los Angeles newspaper. Within the society, she inspired members to focus on philanthropic and educational activities, expanding an agenda that had emerged in nascent form during Judge’s final years.

In 1898, Tingley was named leader and official head of the Theosophical Society, and the organization was renamed the Universal Brotherhood and Theosophical Society (UB and TS). The UB and TS sponsored various reform efforts aimed at improving society and individuals through its affiliate, the International Brotherhood League (IBL).

Women joined in significant numbers and percentages after Tingley became the leader, and much of the IBL's work dealt with issues traditionally associated with women, especially raising and educating children. Under Tingley, a home for orphans and unwed mothers opened in Buffalo, medical assistance was provided for soldiers returning from Cuba following the Spanish-American War, and war relief was provided to the poor and homeless in Santiago de Cuba.

In 1900 she led an exodus of Theosophists to Point Loma, located on an undeveloped peninsula west of San Diego. Three years earlier, in 1897, at the end of a worldwide tour, she had laid the cornerstone of the School for the Revival of the Lost Mysteries of Antiquity there. At Point Loma, Theosophists constructed numerous dwellings and began educating young children. They also ran three schools in Cuba patterned after the style of education, called Raja Yoga, that had evolved at Point Loma. Educational efforts were the focus of community life at Point Loma, based on the Theosophists' conviction that a new era had dawned and that reincarnated souls entering the world as newborns were exceptionally amenable to spiritual and moral training. Tingley also worked for the abolition of capital punishment, for prison reform, and for international peace. She emphasized music, the arts, and drama in life and education, building the first open-air Greek theater in the United States in 1901.

Theosophists believe that humanity reincarnates many times, according to grand cosmic cycles of ascent and decline that last for millions of years. The progress of waves of life forms or souls is monitored by the Masters, advanced beings who no longer need physical bodies and are not bound by the constraints of time and space. Masters supposedly gave Blavatsky the teachings she passed along to other Theosophists, including those found in her magnum opus, The Secret Doctrine (1888), and numerous other publications. Point Loma Theosophists read and adhered to Blavatsky's teachings, often filtered through the published writings of Judge and Tingley. The published works of those latter two leaders did not depart substantially from Blavatsky, but recast her teachings in an idiom and vocabulary more accessible to U.S. readers.

Point Loma Theosophists, however, departed from Theosophists elsewhere in their belief that the earthly succession of leaders following Blavatsky was through Judge rather than Besant. They linked the validity of Theosophical teachings to this succession, the Masters supposedly granting each earthly leader in this succession credibility and authority and sometimes working in and through those leaders in a bicameral relationship in which the personality of the leader was melded with the esoteric power and wisdom of the Master. That was the case with Judge, and later with Tingley's successor, Gottfried de Purucker (1879–1942), a self-taught polymath who devoted many years of study to Theosophy, ancient languages, mythology, and comparative religion.

During his tenure as leader, Purucker lectured on numerous occasions, and his lectures were later transcribed and published. The result was "technical Theosophy," a complex body of teachings based on the teachings of Blavatsky, Judge, and Tingley, but which used the teachings of Purucker's predecessors as points of departure for deep and creative reflection. He had led the Point Loma Theosophists through the lean years of the Depression, returning their foci to those of Judge: printing and distributing Theosophical literature and encouraging growth among local lodges. He also initiated the Fraternization movement, encouraging contact with various Theosophical organizations and the renewal of brotherly feeling among Theosophists everywhere. Near the end of his administration, during World War II, Purucker moved the Theosophical Society's headquarters from Point Loma to Covina, California.

No clear successor came forward to succeed Purucker, and a cabinet of leaders governed for three years, as he had instructed. In 1945, Colonel Arthur L. Conger (1872–1951), a retired officer in the U.S. Army, became the leader of the society. Many lifelong Theosophists did not agree with Conger's selection and left the society. Most networked informally, although one group found a semblance of an organizational center in Point Loma Publications, Inc., founded in 1971 by Iverson Harris Jr. (d. 1979) and W. Emmett Small (b. 1903). Conger expanded the Theosophical Society's publishing program and emphasized local public work, particularly in postwar Europe. Shortly before his death he began moving the headquarters to Pasadena, California, and closed the Esoteric Section. He was succeeded as head of the Theosophical Society (Pasadena) by James Long (1898–1971) in 1951. Long oversaw moving the headquarters, library, and archive of the Theosophical Society to their present location in Altadena, California. Long emphasized living Theosophical teachings and expressing the Theosophical philosophy simply in each person's own words. He founded Sunrise magazine in 1951 as a bridge between Theosophy and the public.

Long was succeeded in 1971 by the current president and leader, Grace F. Knoche (b. 1909), a Raja Yoga student from birth. The exact number of members is not available, but there are relatively few active lodges in the United States. The strongest contingent of Pasadena-affiliated Theosophists outside the United States is in the Netherlands. In addition, there are national sections designated for Australasia, Finland, Germany, Great Britain, Nigeria, Scandinavia, and South Africa. The society publishes Theosophical classics as well as Sunrise, and it holds regular meetings for members in Altadena. Such meetings, usually discussions of Theosophical writings by Blavatsky and others, constitute the rituals practiced by most Pasadena-affiliated Theosophists.

In this Theosophical tradition, Theosophy is a matter of inward transformation through mental and spiritual discipline. Meditative traditions that alter mind and body, such as hatha yoga, have been suspect since Judge's era. Instead, Theosophists in the Pasadena tradition emphasize moral refinement and advances in daily living, coupled with deepened understanding of Theosophical principles through the diligent study of texts. In recent years the Pasadena society has participated in efforts to find common ground among all Theosophical movements, especially the United Lodge of Theosophists and the International Theosophical Society, headquartered in India. Efforts have also been made to heal the divisions created by the leadership dispute of 1945, although Point Loma Publications and others who left the Theosophical Society (Pasadena) in the 1940s are not likely to return.

Address:

Theosophical Society
P.O. Box C
Pasadena, CA 91109–7107
<http://www.theosociety.org/>

W. Michael Ashcraft

Sources:

- Greenwalt, Emmett A. California Utopia: Point Loma: 1897–1942. Rev. ed. San Diego: Point Loma Publications, 1978.
- Judge, William Quan. The Ocean of Theosophy. Covina: Theosophical University Press, 1948.
- Purucker, Gottfried de. Fountain-Source of Occultism. Pasadena: Theosophical University Press, 1974.
- Ryan, Charles J. H. P. Blavatsky and the Theosophical Movement. Rev. ed. Pasadena: Theosophical University Press, 1975.
- Tingley, Katherine. Theosophy: The Path of the Mystic. Rev. ed. Pasadena: Theosophical University Press, 1977.

Theravada Buddhism

Theravada Buddhism is the designation for the various Buddhist traditions prevalent in South and Southeast Asia. Theravada, or southern Buddhism, with its local cultural variations and specific ordination lineages, is the dominant religious tradition in Sri Lanka (69 percent of the population), Burma/Myanmar (85 percent), Thailand (94 percent), Cambodia (88 percent), and Laos (58 percent). With the global spread of Buddhism in the twentieth century, substantial numbers of migrants from these countries have come to live in North America and Europe. Alongside, Western converts have taken up Theravada meditational practices and the study of canonical texts.

The Theravada tradition is the only surviving tradition of some thirty different schools of early Buddhism. Translatable as the “sayings or doctrine of the elders,” the school claims to be nearest to the original words and teachings of the historical Buddha (sixth/fifth century B.C.E.). The precursor of the Theravada school had been the Sthaviravada (Skt.: doctrine of the elders), which split with the majority faction of the Mahasanghikas in North India in the fourth century B.C.E. A century later, the Indian-Sanskrit Sthaviravada came to Ceylon and became the Theravada. Some five centuries after Buddha's death, the teachings were written down in Pali on palm leaves. The numerous texts were collected in three baskets. From that stems the designation of Tipitaka (three baskets)—that is, the text collections of the Vinaya Pitaka (basket of monastic discipline), Sutta Pitaka (doctrinal teachings), and Abhidhamma Pitaka (philosophical investigations). These voluminous collections form the canon of the Theravada tradition. There also exist commentaries to the canon and ancillary literature, especially the Visuddhi-magga (The Path to Purity), composed by the Ceylonese monk Buddhagosha in the early fifth century C.E.

The focal point of Theravada tradition is constituted by the order of monks (bhikkhu sangha). Although originally there also existed an order of nuns (bhikkhuni sangha), that order dissolved later as the line of nuns' ordination broke. The monk represents the Theravada ideal of a person's nonattachment to worldly relations and affairs, concentrating to practice the Buddhist path of renunciation in order to extinguish one's delusion, hatred, and greed. The main task of a monk is to live up to that ideal, to hand on the Buddhist teachings and practices, and to instruct the lay Buddhist followers. The laity supports the sangha (monks' order), donating food, shelter, and clothing. A clear hierarchy of religious virtuosi and lay followers is basic to the Theravada.

Although Theravada tradition can be considered outspokenly conservative regarding doctrinal interpretation and forms of life, it has unmistakably changed in the course of time. Following the period of early Buddhism, during the period of traditional Theravada (late third century B.C.E. to the eighteenth century C.E.), the sangha established close relations with the ruling powers. Strongly supported by feudal kings, the monasteries became wealthy landlords. In religious terms, monks became preoccupied with conducting ceremonies of chanting pirit or paritta (texts designed to improve a layperson's material and physical state; however, also of importance to the sangha itself) and presiding at funerals. Considered as “fields to gain spiritual merit,” monks developed to function mainly as ceremonial priests. This role, its form and content, was strongly criticized, much as in the period of reformist or modern Theravada (nineteenth and twentieth centuries), when urban monks and educated middle-class lay Buddhists interpreted Buddhism as scientific, modern, and universal. Confronted by imperial power, Western concepts, and missionary Christianity, this English-educated elite stressed rationalist elements in the Buddhist teachings. They devalued the “cultic” and “ritualistic” practices and emphasized a scripturalist approach to achieving nibbana (extinction, liberation; Skt.: nirvana). Although this modern or “Protestant” Theravada Buddhism has remained a minority—the vast majority of both monks and laypeople continuing to hold to traditional Theravada concepts—it is this modernized version of Theravada Buddhism that is considered representative of Theravada Buddhism as a whole. An important element of the reinterpretation of Theravada Buddhism is a revival of meditation practices. Practices such as vipassana (penetrative seeing) and satipatthana meditation (application of mindfulness) have gained a growing interest in South Asia and in the West, in particular.

Addresses:

<http://www.accesstoinight.org/lib/index.html>
<http://jbe.la.psu.edu/palicanon.html>

Martin Baumann

Sources:

- Bechert, Heinz. Buddhismus, Staat und Gesellschaft in den Ländern des Theravada-Buddhismus. 3 Vols. Frankfurt am Main: Schriften des Instituts für Asienkunde and Wiesbaden, Harrassowitz, 1966–1973. Reprint, Göttingen: Seminar für Indologie und Buddhismuskunde, Vol. 1, 1988; Vol. 2, 2000.
- Bond, George D. The Buddhist Revival in Sri Lanka: Religious Tradition, Reinterpretation and Response. Columbia: University of South Carolina Press, 1988.
- The Books of the Pali Canon*. Oxford: Pali Text Society, 1881–.
- Gombrich, Richard. Theravada Buddhism: A Social History from Ancient Benares to Modern Colombo. London: Routledge, 1988.

3HO (Healthy, Happy, Holy Organization)

See Sikh Dharma

Tian Dao (Yiguandao)

Tian Dao is arguably the most significant Chinese religious response to modernity to result from that period of extended turmoil, the twentieth century. Tian Dao temples and congregations spread rapidly throughout urban China in the 1930s and 1940s, only to be effectively eliminated after the founding of the People’s Republic of China in 1949. Some leaders managed to leave China, however, and new networks took root in Taiwan, Southeast Asia, Hong Kong, and other areas of Chinese migration.

Tian Dao owes its initial success to Zhang Tianran (1889–1947), from Jining, Shandong Province, in eastern China, who was a senior leader in what was then a minor Daoist group known since the late 1800s as Yiguandao (the Way of Pervading Unity). (Members abandoned the term Yiguandao in the late 1940s, and now universally refer to themselves as Tian Dao [the Way of Heaven], or Zhenli Tian-dao [the Heavenly Way of True Principle].) After assuming leadership in 1930, Zhang initiated reforms that made Yiguandao more attractive to prospective new members. For example, he allowed meat eating, although vegetarianism remained the preferred goal. Members were no longer required to maintain celibacy. Lengthy rituals were simplified. Most important, new emphasis was given to proselytization.

Yiguandao emerged as a way for common people to fulfill obligations to both family and the traditional realm of deities and also maintain a strong sense of community in uncertain times. Temple networks spread throughout urban China, but particularly in such rapidly industrializing cities as Tianjin and Shanghai. Missionaries established new temples and moved to incorporate existing temple networks and other associations under Zhang’s leadership.

Tian Dao experienced a growth phase during World War II. During the Japanese occupation (1937–1945), a puppet Chinese government was set up under Wang Jingwei in Nanjing. Zhang and many of his lieutenants enjoyed free passage throughout much of the occupied areas and had close ties with leaders in the Wang Jingwei government. With the end of the war those ties became a liability, and Tian Dao leaders quickly cultivated new connections with the Nationalist government that briefly reoccupied the cities before the Nationalists’ final defeat in 1949. Zhang died in 1947. By cooperating with the regimes in control of urban China, Tian Dao had bet on two losing sides in succession. Unsurprisingly, the incoming Communist regime lost no time in suppressing Tian Dao along with similar groups in the antisuperstition campaigns of the 1950s. Although Zhang’s third wife, Sun Yuehui, managed to leave China and settle in Taiwan, the group was essentially leaderless; it could have disintegrated as quickly as it had grown.

In exile, Tian Dao reinvented itself and spread the hard way: from the ground up. Those leaders who had managed to leave mainland China in 1949 settled in Taiwan, Hong Kong, and, in a few cases, Southeast Asia. Pioneers in Taiwan began to recruit new members and establish home temples despite having few sources of outside funding. Some leaders combined business with their religious efforts.

Recalling Tian Dao’s support of the Wang Jingwei regime during the war, the Taiwan government now also suspected Tian Dao of harboring Communist spies and saw its beliefs as a rival ideology. Tian Dao was actively suppressed by the police in several campaigns between 1963, when it was outlawed, and 1987, when it was finally legalized. Spies infiltrated meetings, and several leaders were arrested and sent to prison. Despite the harassment, Tian Dao flourished in Taiwan and grew to become the largest organized religious group there. It allied itself with local entrepreneurship, and as Taiwan underwent an economic boom between the 1960s and the 1980s, Tian Dao leaders recruited factory owners and workers alike. It provided a sense of community for displaced workers moving into industrial zones, and it actively promoted adult education in the Chinese classics and Buddhist sutras.

By the 1980s the multitude of Tian Dao temples was generally grouped into eight major sublineages, the largest being the Wen Hua, Bao Guang, Ji Chu, and Xing Yi. The first three of these traced their establishment to pre-1949 mother temples in Shanghai, the fourth to a temple lineage in northeast China. According to a 1981 survey, each of these sublineages had hundreds of subsidiary temples; the total temple count went from approximately six hundred in 1981 to twelve hundred in 1991. Since the 1980s, Tian Dao groups have spread around Southeast Asia, China, Europe, and America. A reasonable estimate of worldwide membership today is between five and ten million. That number is impossible to confirm, however, since sublineages do not always cooperate, and many temples make no distinction between people initiated yet inactive and those who, once initiated, continue as active members.

Within Tian Dao, proselytization is a means by which members may gain merit that can then be transferred to family members. A member who recruits one hundred initiates can request a rite whereby the soul of a deceased relative, such as a parent, can be promoted, or pulled up (chaoba), into Heaven. The opportunity to make amends for past nonfilial acts and save one's parents exerts a strong pull on Tian Dao members. Initiation in Tian Dao ensures an individual's own entry into Heaven and release from the endless cycle of rebirth in which all humans are trapped. To reflect this significance, each new initiate is given a small passport recording date and temple name; entry to Heaven is barred without this passport. Misspelled names or dates on the passport will, it is believed, similarly block one's entry.

Tian Dao ritual performances involve the assembly gathering before the altar and following two ritual assistants and a presider; all three are usually dressed in formal ritual robes (liyi). Core rituals in Tian Dao practice include the lighting of the incense, the presentation of offerings, and the invitation of deities to the altar. Rituals include the performing of repetitive koushou (bows and salutes) to each of the various deities in the pantheon; Tian Dao is most familiar among people in Taiwan as a bowing religion. Tian Dao congregations also regularly attend communal meals—invariably vegetarian—and lectures. The lectures are the prime means of transferring Tian Dao doctrine.

Tian Dao's extensive pantheon of deities is centered on Ancient Mother veneration. Worship of the Ancient Mother (Lao Mu, also called Wusheng Laomu [the Unborn Ancient Mother]) formed in the mid-Ming dynasty (1368–1644) and spread especially throughout the region south of the Yangtze River area. Lao Mu is believed to have created her human children, only to have them lose their way because of the enticements of materiality. In a grand gesture of compassion she orders Maitreya to return to earth to save these lost souls and allow them to enter Heaven and sit at her side.

The Ancient Mother is said to be present in the flame generated by an oil lamp placed in the center of the altar. Effigies of additional major deities are arrayed behind this light, usually including a smiling, seated Maitreya Buddha in the center; a Guan Yin bodhisattva, the popular deity of compassion and childbirth, to Maitreya's left; Ji Gong Huofo (living Buddha), a popular deity based on a monk from the Song dynasty (960–1279), on Maitreya's left; and, on either ends of the altar, images of Lyu Chunyang and Guang Gong, two popular Chinese deities based on legendary figures. In addition, ceramic figurines or black-and-white photographs of the founder, Zhang Tianran, and in many temples, his third wife, Sun Yuehui, are sometimes placed at the far ends of these main altars.

Tian Dao groups put little relative emphasis on textual sources. Tian Dao teachings borrow a limited palette of ideas and terms from such Buddhist, Daoist, and Confucian sources as the Maitreya Sutra, the Heart Sutra, the Dao De Jing, and the Analects. Also, spirit writing remains common in Hong Kong, Taiwan, and Southeast Asian Chinese communities. Tian Dao practice involves writing on a sand-filled tray by a team of three selected members, often teenage girls. One of the team, said to be under the direct influence of a deity, writes Chinese glyphs in the sand with a stylus as the second member smooths the sand with a squeegee and recites what is written. The third team member then records this with pen and paper.

Tian Dao today exists as one of many well-organized international religious groups active in Chinese culture. An umbrella organization, the Tian Dao General Assembly, was established in Taiwan in 1987, but only some 70 percent of Taiwan-based groups belong. Tian Dao groups tend to view other subjects with suspicion.

Today Tian Dao faces two paths into the future. It can redefine and reorient itself as an international movement relevant to people of all backgrounds, or it can focus instead on regaining its previous prominence as a significant movement in China. Either way, Tian Dao is likely to continue as a force among world religions. There are numerous Tian Dao sites in Chinese on the Internet. An English-language periodical, Golden Voice of Maitreya, is available.

Address:

Tian Dao
12th Floor
No. 31, Ming-Sheng E. Rd.
Sec. 3, Taipei
Taiwan

Edward Irons

Sources:

Introduction to Dao. Taipei, Taiwan: Tsu Kwang, n.d.

Jordan, David D., and Daniel L. Overmyer. The Flying Phoenix: Aspects of Chinese Sectarianism in Taiwan. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1986.

Song Guanyu. Tiandao Chuan Deng—Yiguan yu Xiandai Shehui (The celestial way passes the torch—Yiguan and modern society). Taipei: San Yang, 1996.

———. Tiandao Gouchen: Yiguandao Diaocha Baogao (Fishing in the depths of the celestial way: A report of investigations into the Unity sect). Taipei: Privately printed, 1983.

Tiantai/Tendai

The Tiantai (Jap.: Tendai) is a Chinese school of Buddhism, the name of which goes back to the mountain Tiantai(-shan) in China on which the school was originally situated. Zhiyi (538–597) is considered the founder of Tiantai. After having been formed in Tang-China, it soon made its way to Japan, mainly through the first Japanese Tendai-patriarch, Saicho (764–822). It was in Japan where Tendai became one of the prominent Buddhist schools of medieval and pre-modern Japan, with its main monastic center on Mount Hiei above the imperial capital of Heian-kyo (Kyoto).

Tiantai represents an integral attempt to systematize all the different teachings and the ways of teaching of the Buddha that are found in Buddhist sutras (Skt.: texts), in a chronological but also in a hierarchical way. This is reflected in the concept of “five periods and eight ways of teaching” (Chin.: wushi-bajiao), according to which the categories of sutras can be divided (Chin.: panjiao: dividing the teachings) into five soteriologically progressive and successive periods. These are the periods in which the Buddha was supposed to have preached these sutras during his lifetime: (1) the Avatamsaka (Chin.: Huayan-shi), (2) the Agama (Ahan-shi), (3) the Vaipulya (Fangdeng-shi), (4) the Prajnaparamita (Banruo-shi), and (5) the Lotus, Saddharmapundarika, and Nirvana (Fahua-Niepan-shi), being the last and highest level and teaching—that is, the ultimate truth of the Buddha. Another system of division is the one of eight ways of teaching according to form: (1) sudden (Chin.: dun-jiao; related to 1), (2) gradual (jian-jiao; related to 2, 3, and 4), (3) esoteric (bimi-jiao), insofar as different methods are used simultaneously to teach different listeners without their knowing of each other, (4) indeterminate (buding-jiao), in the sense that the hearers are aware of each other but not realizing what has been taught to the other; according to content, (5) the teaching of the so-called Hinayana canon (zang-jiao), (6) the “pervasive” teaching (tong-jiao) of nonorigination and emptiness, (7) the “separate” teaching (bie-jiao) of the “Threefold Truth” to the spiritually higher developed Bodhisattvas, and (8) the “Round (or Perfect) Teaching” (yuán-jiao), which lies beyond all differentiation and is found especially in the Lotus sutra.

The philosophical foundation of Tiantai is based on the teaching of the Middle Way of Nagarjuna, stressing the “Threefold Truth” (sandi) of emptiness (kong), conventionality (ji), and the middle (between both truths: zhong). Tiantai also lays emphasis on meditation practice (called cessation and insight or zhiguan) with the realization of the “Threefold Truth” through the “Threefold Contemplation” (sanguan).

Although Tiantai as a living factor in Chinese Buddhism has almost totally lost effect, it has preserved its most influential legacy in Japan. It continues not only in the Tendai-headquarters of Mount Hiei and the affiliated temples but also through its impact on Japanese Buddhist thinking in general. The primary Tendai organization in Japan is Tendaisghu. There are also a number of independent groups in the Tendai tradition in the country.

Address:

Tendaisghu
Enryaku-ji Temple
1771–1, Sakamoto
Hinmichi, Otsu-shi
Shiga
Japan

Max Deeg

Sources:

Groner, P. Saicho: The Establishment of the Japanese Tendai School. Berkeley: Buddhist Studies Series, 1984. Reprint, Honolulu: University of Hawaii Press, 2000.

Hurvitz, Leon. Chih-I (538–597): An Introduction to the Life and Ideas of a Chinese Buddhist Monk. Brussels: Institute Belge des Hautes Études Chinoises, 1962.

Ng Yu-Kwan, Ng. T'ien-t'ai Buddhism and Early Madhyamika. Honolulu: University of Hawaii Press, 1993.

Swanson, Paul L. Foundations of T'ien-T'ai Philosophy. Freemon, CA: Asian Humanities Press, 1989.

———, ed. “Tendai Buddhism in Japan.” Japanese Journal of Religious Studies (Special Issue) 14, 2–3 (June–September 1987).

Tibetan Buddhism

Following its initial introduction in the seventh century, Buddhism became the dominant religion in the Tibetan cultural area—which includes the central provinces of Ü and Tsang (now composing the “Tibet Autonomous Region” of the Peoples’ Republic of China), the eastern provinces of Kham and Amdo, Mongolia, Bhutan, parts of Russia, and several republics of the former Soviet Union, as well as large areas of northern India and Nepal. Traditional histories trace the beginning of the first dissemination (chidar) of Buddhism to the reign of King Songtsen Gampo (c. 618–650).

Royal patronage continued during the reign of King Trisong Detsen (c. 740–798), who together with the Indian scholar-monk Santaraksita and the tantric master

Pilgrims walk around the Barkor in Lhasa, Tibet. (J. Sweeney/TRIP)

Padmasambhava founded the first Buddhist monastery at Samye in 775. The two Indian masters represent competing paradigms of Buddhism, both of which became influential in Tibet: a monastic and clerical stream that emphasized cenobitic monasticism; and lineages often centered on charismatic lay Tantrics. The former was transmitted mainly from north Indian monastic universities such as Nalanda, while the latter was centered in Bihar and Bengal and generally existed well apart from the monastic establishments.

The early Tibetan dynasty came to an end with the assassination of King Relbachen (reigned 815–836), whose death was followed by a brief persecution of Buddhists. This marked the end of the “first dissemination.” The “second dissemination” (ngadar) began with the arrival in Tibet of AtiŸa in 1042.

Following the ascension of the fifth Dalai Lama, Ngawang Losang Gyatso (1617–1682), to power in the seventeenth century with the backing of Mongol troops, Tibet was ruled by successive Dalai Lamas (who are believed by Tibetan Buddhists to be physical manifestations of the buddha Avalokiteshvara). This ended with the Chinese invasion and annexation of Tibet in the 1950s, which began a period of widespread persecution of Buddhism and resulted in the destruction of thousands of monasteries. In 1959 the fourteenth Dalai Lama, Tenzin Gyatso (b. 1935), fled to India, where he subsequently formed a government-in-exile in Dharamsala. Hundreds of thousands of Tibetans have since followed him into exile.

Many of the monasteries that were destroyed by the Chinese in Tibet have been rebuilt in exile, and today tens of thousands of monks and nuns continue to study the traditional monastic curricula. In Tibet, however, the Chinese government is deeply suspicious of monastics because many have been at the forefront of anti-Chinese agitations. As a result, the number of monks and nuns is severely restricted, and many are forced to spend several hours each day in “patriotic reeducation classes,” in which they are taught Marxist dogma. Many monasteries have Chinese secret police in residence, and little time is allowed for study of traditional Buddhist curricula.

There are four main orders in Tibetan Buddhism: Nyingmapa, Sakyapa, Kagyupa, and Gelukpa. Nyingmapa means Old Order; it is so named because it relies on older translations of Buddhist texts, and it traces itself back to Padmasambhava. The latter three are collectively called New Orders (Sarma) because they rely on translations prepared during the second dissemination. All four orders have both scholastic and tantric traditions, but they differ in the relative emphasis they place on study or meditative practice. In addition, each bases itself on particular tantric texts and traces itself to particular lineages.

Hilltop temple, Tibet (Corel)

John Powers

Sources:

- Coleman, Graham, comp. and ed. A Handbook of Tibetan Culture. Boston: Shambhala, 1994.
- Gyatso, Tenzin (Dalai Lama XIV). The World of Tibetan Buddhism. London: Wisdom, 1995.
- Powers, John. Introduction to Tibetan Buddhism. Ithaca, NY: Snow Lion, 1995.
- Samuel, Geoffrey. Civilized Shamans: Buddhism in Tibetan Societies. Washington, DC: Smithsonian Institution Press, 1993.
- Shakya, Tsering. The Dragon in the Land of Snows: A History of Modern Tibet Since 1947. New York: Columbia University Press, 1999.

Tibetan Nyingma Institute

Tarthang Tulku Rinpoche (b. 1935), a lama from eastern Tibet (Kham), moved to India in 1959 following the Chinese takeover. His father was a Nyingmapa lama and astrologer, and he had received teachings in all four principal Tibetan Buddhist schools while in Tibet. Tarthang Tulku's principal teacher was Dzongsar Khyentse, Chokyi Lodro (d. 1959). In India Tarthang Tulku taught at the Sanskrit University in Varanasi (Baranasi) and reprinted Tibetan texts. Then in 1969 he moved to Berkeley, California, with his French Egyptian wife Nazli.

In Berkeley, Tarthang Tulku established the Tibetan Nyingma Meditation Centre (or Padma Ling)—a pioneer Tibetan-American Buddhist Dharma center. He emphasized meditation practice, the recitation of the mantra of Padmasambhava, Om Ah Hum Benza Guru Pema Siddhi Hum, and embodied the ngags-pa ideal—the householder-yogi. (Householder-yogis, which have existed in Tibet since Buddhism was first introduced, are dedicated religious practitioners not residing in monasteries but living in families.)

In 1970 Tarthang Tulku founded Dharma Publishing. Over the past thirty years it has launched many books on Tibetan art, teaching, and practice. Not long after coming to America he and his students purchased a large fraternity house near the University of California in Berkeley and converted it into a major place of teaching and practice. In 1975, the organization broke ground for their rural retreat center, Odiyan. His success in establishing a solid institutional base was remarkable, as other Buddhist leaders noted. Buddhism was not unknown in the West, even in the 1960s, but it lacked dedicated communities and teaching facilities (other than some serving the Japanese-American community). As Tarthang Tulku was a Tibetan refugee, only a decade out of Tibet, the establishment of a significant and enduring Dharma center was a significant accomplishment.

He next set himself the task of integrating the sophisticated insights of the Tibetan path into modern language and modern life. His writing is characterized by an applied approach to Buddhist spirituality. Books such as Gesture of Balance, Skillful Means, and Time, Space and Knowledge introduced a meditation format that engages with the ordinary world. His work on Kum Nye Relaxation was a fresh approach to Tibetan yoga. Dharma Publishing continues to produce translations of Tibetan classics and has reprinted the entire Tibetan Buddhist canon, the bKa'-gyur—the spoken word of the Buddha—and bsTan-'gyur—the authoritative commentaries (Kanjur and Tanjur)—as well as thousands of other texts.

Through the late twentieth century, Tarthang Tulku's work led to the founding of centers around the world, the principal ones being in California, the Netherlands, Germany, and Brazil, though there are numerous smaller centers throughout the world.

Addresses:

Tibetan Nyingma Institute
1815 Highland Pl.
Berkeley, CA 94709
<http://www.nyingmainstitute.com/index.htm>

Dharma Publishing
2910 San Pablo Ave.
Berkeley, CA 94702
<http://www.dharmapress.com/>

Diana Cousens

Sources:

- Crystal Mirror*. Vols. 1–4. Emeryville, CA: Dharma Publishing, 1971–1977.
- Fields, Rick. How the Swans Came to the Lake. 3rd ed. Boston, MA: Shambhala, 1992.
- Nyingma Edition of the Tibetan Buddhist Canon, Kanjur and Tanjur*. 128 vols. Emeryville, CA: Dharma Publishing, 1981. (Complete eighteenth-century sDe-dge edition, plus texts from Lhasa and Peking editions and texts from the Chinese Tripitaka.)
- Tarthang Tulku. Kum-Nye Relaxation. Emeryville, CA: Dharma Publishing, 1978.
- . Skillful Means. Emeryville, CA: Dharma Publishing, 1978.

Tijāniyya Sufi Order

The Tijāniyya is a Muslim brotherhood or Sufi order (in Arabic, tariqa) named after its founder, Ahmad b. Maham-mad al-Tijānî (1737–1815). The sources—the most important being Jawāhir al-ma'ānî by 'Alî Harāzîm Barāda, a disciple of al-Tijānî—allow us to establish 1782 as the year when the Tijāniyya was established in the Algerian desert. In 1798, Ahmad al-Tijānî moved to the city of Fez (Morocco), where he spent the rest of his life. By the time of his death, the new Sufi order had already reached areas such as Mauritania to the south and Tunisia to the east.

During the nineteenth century, the Tijāniyya expanded further into sub-Saharan Africa: the areas of present-day Senegal, Guinea, Mali, and northern Nigeria came to be included within the sphere of influence of the Tijāniyya. A key figure of this development was al-Hājj 'Umar b. Sa'îd Tal (d. 1864), who, in the 1850s, launched a jihad against the “pagan” Bamana rulers and later against the French, who had attempted to include the West African hinterland in their colonial state. Although the military activities of al-Hājj 'Umar earned the Tijāniyya the reputation of being anticolonial in Africa south of the Sahara, the contrary was the case in its original homeland: the leaders of the order at 'Ain Mâdi and Temasin (Algeria) were on good terms with the French rulers, and there is evidence that they gave their support to French missions that were to explore the northern and central Sahara. When Morocco became a French protectorate in 1912, the colonial administration tried to use the Tijāniyya to increase its acceptance among the local Muslim population.

The twentieth century saw the continuation of the rapid spread of the Tijāniyya in sub-Saharan Africa. However, after the final military defeat (1890–1893) of the Tijānî state established by al-Hājj 'Umar by the French colonial army, a new generation of Tijānî leaders emerged who worked for the spread of their Sufi order by peaceful means. With regard to the French presence, these leaders followed the “accommodationist” approach of their Northern African counterparts. Some prominent Tijānis, such as the Senegalese shaykh al-Hājj Malik Sy (1855–1922) or Seydou Nourou Tal (c. 1880–1980, a grandson of al-Hājj 'Umar), became close allies of the French administration. The only significant exception to the new approach was shaykh Hamallāh from Niore du Sahel (present-day Mali), the founder of a distinctive branch of the Tijāniyya whose followers clashed repeatedly with French forces. Hamallāh died in exile in Montluçon (France) in 1940, and his movement continues to exist in some regions of Mali, Burkina Faso, and the Ivory Coast.

Among the most visible figures of the Tijāniyya in the twentieth century are Ibrāhim Niassé (d. 1975) from Senegal, Muhammad al-Hāfiz b. 'Abd al-Latif (d. 1978) from Cairo, and Ahmad Skiraj (d. 1944) from Morocco. Niassé established a movement known as Jamâ'at al-fayda (Congregation of the Spiritual Overflowing) within the Tijāniyya in the 1930s. In the following decades, the fayda movement expanded rapidly in West Africa and even reached such distant areas as Darfur (Republic of Sudan). When Niase died in 1975, the number of his followers was estimated at twenty to thirty million. The proselytizing activities of Muhammad al-Hāfiz were concentrated on the Anglo-Egyptian Sudan (and later the Republic of Sudan). In addition, he acquired the reputation of being the most distinguished defender of Tijāniyya doctrine, together with Ahmad Skiraj. Both scholars published numerous books and pamphlets with the purpose of explaining the mystical teachings of Ahmad al-Tijāni to a larger audience. For more than twenty-five years Muhammad al-Hāfiz edited the Cairo-based journal Tariq al-haqq (The Way of the Truth), which dealt not only with Tijāni doctrine but also with a wide range of issues such as the exegesis of the Qur'an, legal opinions (fatwas), the history of Islam, and current debates within the Muslim world.

Right from the outset, the Tijāniyya became the target of strong criticism by other Sufis and non-Sufi Muslims. According to Jawāhir al-ma'ānī, Ahmad al-Tijāni—who had been affiliated with several Sufi orders before—founded his own brotherhood only after a personal encounter with the Prophet Muhammad (d. 632). Moreover, al-Tijāni claimed to be in permanent communication with the Prophet and justified his teachings by pointing to what the Prophet told him during those meetings. However, the authenticity of the alleged sayings of the Prophet was contested by non-Tijānis. Although Sufis usually accepted the possibility of meeting the Prophet even after his death, other Muslims denied such a possibility completely. Controversial statements made by al-Tijāni included his claim to be the “seal of the saints” (khatm al-awliyā'), the notion that one recitation of a short prayer formula known as salāt al-fātih was equivalent to six thousand recitations of the whole Qur'an, and the prohibition against visiting any Sufi shaykh who is not affiliated to the Tijāniyya, to mention but a few examples. Al-Tijāni is even quoted as having said, “Whoever sees me on a Monday or on a Friday will surely enter paradise and will not be punished.”

Not surprisingly, such tenets were unacceptable to many non-Tijāni Sufis and non-Sufi Muslims. Tijāni doctrines have thus been at the root of countless controversies since the order's foundation. Compared with other Sufi orders, the Tijāniyya is distinguished by its exclusiveness, its outspoken sense of superiority to other orders, and the high degree of confidence of salvation among the followers, because Ahmad al-Tijāni gave them the guarantee that they will enter paradise on the Day of Judgment, provided that they comply with the order's rules. Apart from the severe opposition evoked by such teachings, the Tijāniyya also managed to gain staunch support, particularly among Muslims in West Africa. Membership in this Sufi order always transcended adherence to particular social status groups. Tijāni doctrine seems to be attractive to both scholars and the illiterate, nobles and former slaves, peasants and the emerging Muslim urban middle class, the rich and the poor. Every member is supposed to perform daily recitations, some being on an individual basis (awrād, sg. wird), while the wazifa (duty) and the Friday dhikr (worship) have to be performed in a group.

At the top of the order's hierarchy is the eldest living male descendant of Ahmad al-Tijāni. The present head is Sidi 'Abd al-Jabbār from 'Ain Mādī (Algeria). Generally, all descendants of the order's founder are considered to be the highest authorities within the Tijāniyya. But other shaykhs can also occupy a high position in the hierarchy when they are granted the title khalīfa. Below the khalīfa is the so-called muqaddam, who is allowed to initiate others into the recitation practices of the brotherhood. The Tijāniyya is nowadays the most influential Sufi order in West Africa. Its main areas of influence are Senegal and northern Nigeria, followed by countries such as Mauritania, Gambia, Ghana, Mali, Niger, and Cameroon. The order also has a significant presence in some regions of Guinea, Burkina Faso, the Ivory Coast, Togo, Benin, and Sierra Leone. More to the east, important Tijāniyya communities can be found in Chad, the western and central regions of the Sudan, and in some regions of Ethiopia. As for North Africa, it seems that the influence of the Tijāniyya has declined over the course of the twentieth century. However, the order is still active in parts of Morocco, Algeria, Tunisia, and Egypt. Since the first half of the twentieth century, the order has also managed to make inroads into Southeast Asia (Indonesia, Malaysia). This expansion was possible primarily through the contacts established in Mecca by Tijāni leaders from West Africa and Egypt with pilgrims from Southeast Asia. Tijāniyya centers also exist in Albania, and there seem to be small communities in Turkey, Lebanon, Syria, and even in Iran. In a more recent development, the Tijāniyya order has started to recruit members among North American Muslims. The proselytizing activities in the United States are coordinated by Shaykh Hasan Cissé from Kaolack, Senegal, a disciple of the above-mentioned Ibrāhim Niase.

As there is no statistical data available, it is impossible to provide the number of followers of the Tijāniyya. For West Africa—nowadays the Tijāniyya heartlands—estimates run as high as sixty million. However, the number of twenty million followers worldwide seems to be more realistic, and the number of those who participate in the order's rituals on a regular basis is certainly much lower.

At present, the most active centers of the Tijāniyya include Fez (Morocco), where the shrine of al-Tijāni is located; Tivaouane and Kaolack (Senegal); Niore du Sahel (Mali); Kano and Maiduguri (Nigeria); and Kiota (Niger), to mention but a few.

Address:

Tijāniyya
Son Excellence Sidi 'Abd al-Jabbār

Khalife des Tijâniyya
 'Ain Mâdi
 Cercle de Laghouat
 Algeria
<http://home.earthlink.net/~halimcisse/index.html>

Rüdiger Seesemann

Sources:

Abun-Nasr, Jamil M. The Tijaniyya: A Sufi Order in the Modern World. London: Oxford University Press, 1965.
 al-Sâ'ih, Muhammad al-'Arabî. Bughyat al-mustafid li-sharh munyat al-murid. Cairo: Mustafâ al-Bâbi al-Halabî, 1959.
 Barâda, 'Alî Harâzim. Jawâhir al-ma'ânî wa-bulûgh al-amâni fi fayd Sayyidi Abi l-'Abbâs al-Tijâni. Parts 1–2. Beirut: Dâr al-Fikr, 1963.
 Brenner, Louis. West African Sufi: The Religious Heritage and Spiritual Search of Cerno Bokar Saalif Taal. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1984.
 Hunwick, John O. "An Introduction to the Tijâni Path: Being an Annotated Translation of the Chapter Headings of the Kitâb ar-rimâh of al-Hâjj 'Umar." Islam et sociétés au Sud du Sahara 6 (1992): 17–32.
 Robinson, David. The Holy War of Umar Tal: The Western Sudan in the Mid-Nineteenth Century. Oxford: Clarendon, 1985.
 Robinson, David, and Jean-Louis Triaud, eds. La Tijaniyya: Une confrérie musulmane à la conquête de l'Afrique. Paris: Karthala, 2000.

Timor

The eastern half of the island of Timor, part of the nation of Indonesia, became a separate nation in 2002, following a referendum in which more than 70 percent of the people voted for independence. When the Dutch took control of most of Indonesia, the Portuguese retained control of the eastern half of Timor and colonial rule continued into the 1970s. After the Portuguese revolution of 1974, the government moved to allow East Timor to determine its own future. The transition was handled poorly, however, and facing a civil war, the Portuguese administration suddenly abandoned the island in October 1975. One group seeking immediate independence, the Frente Revolucionaria de Timor Leste Independente, or FRETILIN, seized the capital, Dili.

At that point, Indonesia sent troops into East Timor, and the civil war reached a climax in December 1975 when a coalition of groups opposed to FRETILIN captured the capital. They formed a provisional government and moved to incorporate the island into Indonesia. The president of Indonesia designated East Timor as an Indonesian province in July 1976. In the meantime, the FRETILIN forces retreated into the mountainous interior and conducted a guerrilla war that continued into the late 1990s. The United Nations called for the Indonesians to withdraw.

Indonesia finally changed its policy on East Timor in 1989. However, the 1990s became a time of increased violence, and it was only with the change of governments in Indonesia (and the resignation of long-time president Suharto) that a move to respond to East Timor's aspiration for independence occurred. In the meantime, in 1996 the Nobel Peace Prize was awarded to Timorese liberation activists Jose Ramos-Horta (b. 1948) and Catholic bishop Carlos Ximenes. In 1999 the United Nations oversaw a referendum on Indonesia's autonomy proposal. After the great majority voted for independence, the United Nations oversaw the transition and the first elections in 2001. Candidates associated with FRETILIN won the majority of seats in the new legislature.

Timor is home to a vast array of native peoples, all of whom developed their own particular culture and religion. There are a dozen ethnic groups in East Timor. One important group, the Tetum, contributed their language as a common language in the capital city during the days of Portuguese rule. Tetum subsequently spread throughout East Timor, and today it is spoken by about 60 percent of the residents. Common to many of the groups was the belief in a Lord of the Upper World, various lesser spirits, and, what is very important, ancestral figures. Different religious functionaries (diviners or medicine men) worked to discern the cause of any misfortunes and treated illness (which was believed to be caused by sorcery or the displeasure of spirits). Ancestor worship was focused at the different ceremonies marking the life cycle. These traditional religions have largely been replaced by Roman Catholicism.

The ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH came to Timor with the Portuguese in 1511. The Dominicans took the lead in evangelizing the people and had an early success when the island's principal ruler was converted in 1561. However, with the coming of the Dutch, the work of the Dominicans was largely disrupted. In 1816 the Oblates of Mary Immaculate reorganized the weakened Catholic community. The Status of religions in Timor, 2000-2050

Followers	2000			2025	2050
	total	%	rate
Christians	816,000	92.3	1.89	1,128,000	1,336,000
Roman Catholics	796,000	90.0	1.89	1,080,000	1,270,000
Protestants	47,000	5.3	2.70	73,500	100,000
Muslims	28,300	3.2	3.55	30,000	30,000
Ethnoreligionists	26,400	3.0	-1.50	10,000	2,000
Neoreligionists	5,000	0.6	0.49	6,500	7,000
Nonreligious	3,400	0.4	2.01	5,000	6,000
Buddhists	1,700	0.2	-0.68	900	600
Chinese folk-religionists	1,400	0.2	-0.58	800	700
Baha'is	1,200	0.1	2.28	1,700	2,100
Hindus	1,100	0.1	1.66	1,800	2,800
Total population	885,000	100.0	1.80	1,185,000	1,387,000

work was placed under the diocese of Macao, but a bishop, the suffragan to Goa, India, was placed in Dili in 1940.

Since the end of World War II, the Catholic Church has made rapid progress in converting most of the island. Membership went from 66,000 in 1956 to more than 700,000 by 1996. It now includes more than 90 percent of the population. It was the case, however, that during the 1980s, Indonesian law required everyone to be aligned with a “monotheistic” religion. Traditional Timorese religions did have legal status, but Catholicism had absorbed various traditional practices and accommodated to traditional indigenous belief systems.

Timor is one of only two Asian countries with a Catholic majority (the other being the Philippines). Much of that growth has been attributed to the church’s ability to operate with some degree of independence during the 1980s as the people struggled for independence. The church was attached to Gao rather than aligned with the rest of Indonesian Catholicism, and its bishop took actions that directly opposed Indonesian authority and identified with the people.

Although the country is dominated by Catholicism, there is a small Protestant presence, the ASSEMBLIES OF GOD having the largest following. Also, Muslim traders have brought Islam (of the Sunni SHAFIITE SCHOOL OF ISLAM) to Timor, primarily in the coastal towns. With rapid growth during the years of Indonesian rule, Islam now counts the allegiance of some 3 percent of the population. There are several BAHÁ’Í FAITH spiritual assemblies and a marginal number of Buddhists of Chinese extraction.

Sources:

East Timor: A Christian Reflection/Timor Oriental: Une reflexion Chrétienne. London: Catholic Institute for International Relations, 1987.

“East Timor’s Church Stands with the People.” Posted at <http://www.etan.ca/infoaction/church.shtml>. Accessed October 1, 2001.

Webb, R. A. F. “The People of the Book: Christians and Muslims in Indonesia: A Brief Survey of Nusa Tenggara Timur.” Indonesia Circle 35 (1984): 59–69.

Tocoist Church/Church of Our Lord Jesus Christ in the World

In northern Angola, several movements associated with the KIMBANGUIST CHURCH movements started after the prophet’s arrest in 1921. The first significant AFRICAN INITIATED CHURCH began there under the prophet and former Baptist teacher and choirmaster Simão Toco (1918–1984): the Church of Our Lord Jesus Christ in the World, also known as the “Red Star” after the church’s symbol. This movement started in 1949 in the western Congo in a decisive Pentecost of its own, with trembling and speaking in tongues. Toco was arrested by Belgian officials and handed over to the Portuguese government at the Angolan border in 1950, together with eighty-two Angolan followers. The movement was severely repressed, but it had ten thousand adherents by 1965 and had become multiethnic, thanks to the Portuguese practice of exiling Tocoists to distant provinces. Toco himself was exiled to various parts of Angola and eventually in 1963 to the islands of the Azores, where he worked as a lighthouse keeper until 1974. During the Angolan civil war, Toco, who then lived in Luanda, was in a precarious position because of his origins in an area that supported an antigovernment party.

A leadership struggle in the church followed Toco’s death in 1984, and the government did not include the Tocoist Church in its list of twelve recognized churches. The dispute was resolved in 1988 when Luzaisso Antonio Lutango was elected leader of the church and the government lifted its suspension of the church’s activities. There were many remarkable similarities between the careers of Simão Toco and Simon Kimbangu, besides their first names. Like Kimbanguism, the Tocoist church requires monogamy and forbids pork and alcohol. Tocoist members must wear white in worship, and they are taught to regard Toco as the second member of the Trinity.

The headquarters of the church is in Luanda, Angola.

Allan H. Anderson

Sources:

Estermann, Carlos. “O tocoísmo como fenómeno religioso.”

Garcia de Orta 13, 3 (1965): 325–342.

Grenfell, F. James. “Simão Toco: An Angolan Prophet.” Journal of Religion in Africa 28, 2 (1998): 210–226.

Togo

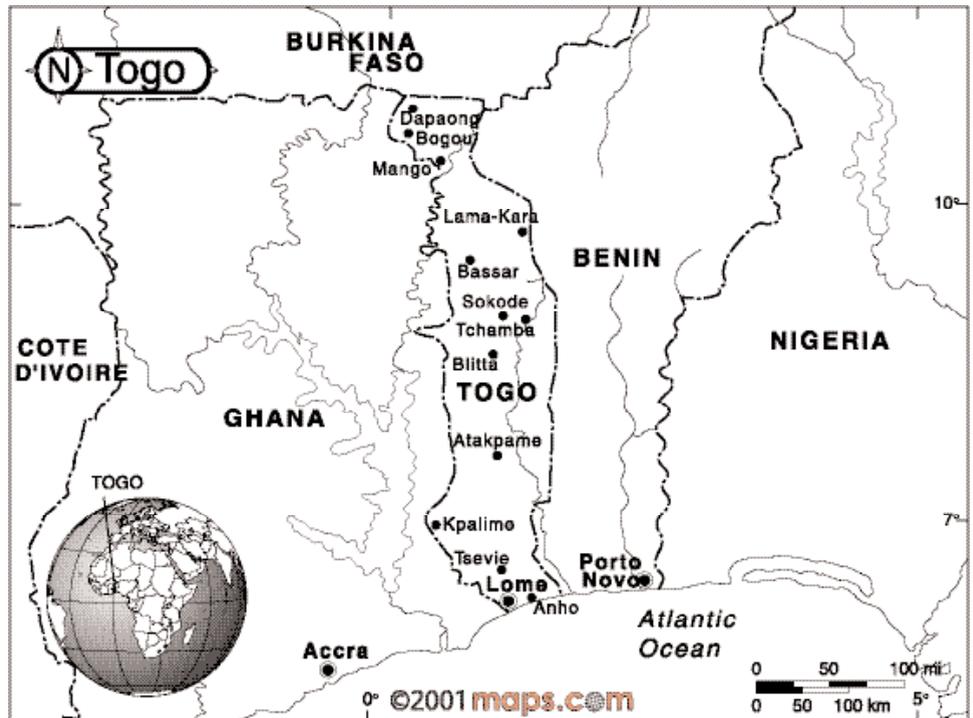

Modern Togo originated as a small country on the Gulf of Guinea sandwiched between the Gold Coast (Ghana) and Dahomey (Benin). The area has been the home of the Ewe, a people related to the Ashanti (of Ghana) and the Ibo and Yoruba (of Nigeria). The Kabye and Mina are also among the more important of the more than a dozen peoples who reside in the country. Through the mid-nineteenth century, the land was a semiautonomous region, ruled by several African chiefs, that became a buffer between the British Gold Coast and French Benin. Then in 1884, at a conference of European powers, Germany asserted its rights to a share in central Africa. This land was then given to Germany, which named it Togoland. The German commissioner for West Africa, Gustav Nachtigal, signed a treaty with several of the more powerful Togo chiefs.

German control of the area was short lived. During World War I, Britain and France closed the gap between their territories. In 1957 the part of Togo under British control was annexed and merged with the Gold Coast to create modern Ghana. However, the French part remained a separate territory that finally attained independence in 1960. It is that former part of Togo under French control that constitutes the present state. Independence was followed by a period of national unrest that included political assassination and several coups. The 1967 coup brought in Etienne Eyadema, who has remained in power ever since, in spite of periods of strong protest and an abysmal human rights record. He has regularly been reelected as the leader of the only legal political party.

Traditional African religions remain strong in Togo, claiming the allegiance of as much as half of the population of 3.5 million. Among the Ewe, the Supreme Deity is named Mawu. Mawu is feminine, thought of as mother, creator, judge, and law-giver, and temples managed by priests may be found throughout Ewe country, where sacrifices are made to Her regularly.

Although the Portuguese had worked the coast of the Gulf of Guinea gathering slaves and had visited the coast of Togo from the sixteenth into the nineteenth century, it was not until 1871 that the ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH established its first mission, at Agouyé. A second station was opened in 1886, established by the Society of African Missions, a French order from Lyon. Togo became a prefecture in 1892 and a vicariate in 1924. German Catholic priests were active during the days of German rule, but they were forced to leave in 1918. Priests from the Society of African Missions took their place. The ordination of the first Togo priest signaled the beginning of the indigenization process. The Diocese of Lomé was erected in 1955. The Roman Catholic Church is now the largest Christian body in Togo.

As early as 1847, the North German Missionary Society, which drew much of its support from the pietist element in the Lutheran churches of northern Germany, sent missionaries into Togo to work among the Ewe people. At the time that the missionaries were expelled in 1918, the mission had been divided, with one part in British territory and part in Status of religions in Togo, 2000-2050

Followers	2000			2025	2050
	total	%	rate
Christians	1,972,000	42.6	3.00	4,150,000	6,100,000
Roman Catholics	1,123,000	24.3	3.17	2,450,000	3,500,000
Protestants	480,000	10.4	3.45	1,200,000	1,800,000
Independents	110,000	2.4	4.48	300,000	500,000
Ethnoreligionists	1,745,000	37.7	2.47	2,528,000	3,018,000
Muslims	873,000	18.9	2.99	1,700,000	2,800,000
Baha'is	25,400	0.6	3.50	55,000	90,000
Nonreligious	10,500	0.2	3.82	40,000	80,000
Atheists	1,300	0.0	2.71	4,000	8,000
other religionists	2,600	0.1	2.09	5,000	8,000
Total population	4,629,000	100.0	2.80	8,482,000	12,104,000

French. In 1922 the mission constituted itself as the Evangelical Ewe Church. It developed a congregational polity with a general synod that met triennially. Through the 1920s the UNITED FREE CHURCH OF SCOTLAND sent in personnel to assist the congregation in British territory, and the PARIS MISSION did likewise for the remaining congregations. Increasingly, in spite of efforts to prevent it, the church divided. The church in French territory began a theological school in 1929.

In 1955 the UNITED CHURCH OF CHRIST (through its United Church Board of World Ministries) added its support to the church and expanded its work to include the Kabye people in the northern reaches of the country. Then in 1959, the church in French territory became an autonomous body as the EVANGELICAL CHURCH OF TOGO (Église Évangélique du Togo). The following year, the North German Missionary Society returned, and the Evangelical Church was able to further expand. At the time that Togo became an independent country, the Evangelical Church was already the largest Protestant church, and it has remained so. Its present name, the EVANGELICAL PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH OF TOGO, reflects its replacement of the congregational polity it had at its beginning with a presbyterial organization.

Traditional figures at a Loma Fetish Market in Togo (M. Jelliffe/TRIP)

As early as 1843, Thomas Birch Freeman, the missionary of the British Methodists (now the METHODIST CHURCH in Great Britain) visited Togo. He met with the chief in Anécho and gained his friendship. More important, he gained permission to locate a preaching point and a school in Anécho, from which Methodism was able to begin its spread along the coastal communities inhabited by the Mina people. The church has maintained its strength among the Mina people and has been largely unable to transcend that base.

The ASSEMBLIES OF GOD, the Pentecostal church from the United States, began work in Togo in 1937 and expanded to the northern part of the country in 1940. In the years after World War II, the church expanded rapidly and soon surpassed the Methodists as the third largest religious group in Togo. Various other American-based Free Churches also came to Togo: the SEVENTH-DAY ADVENTIST CHURCH and the JEHOVAH'S WITNESSES. However, by far the largest number of churches contributing to the growing pluralistic environment of the country either came from other nearby countries, especially Ghana, or, in a few cases, originated within Togo.

Among the African Initiated Churches founded by Togo believers is Église du Christ, founded by an Ewe pastor in 1962, and the Ordre Sacre de Deliverance (Sacred Order of Deliverance), founded among the Ewe in 1968. Ghana has contributed a number of groups, such as the Église de la Guérison Divine du Togo (the Divine Healer's Church of Togo), which came to Togo around 1960, and the Société de la Croix Blanche. Nigeria contributed the CHURCH OF THE LORD (ALADURA), and Benin the Heavenly Christianity Church.

The Sunni MALIKITE SCHOOL OF ISLAM was introduced into Togo in the eighteenth century. The first mosque was built in 1820 at Sokodé and found its major support among several of the peoples living in the extreme northern part of the country. In 1973 the Muslims organized the Muslim Union of Togo, which has struggled to block the development of the Sufi brotherhoods and the AHMADIYYA MOVEMENT IN ISLAM, the Pakistani revivalist movement that opened work in 1960 and that some consider heretical; the BAHÁ'Í FAITH first appeared in 1955. Muslims now constitute some 15 percent of the population.

Sources:

Delval, R. Les musulmans au Togo. Paris: Publications Orientalistes de France, 1980.

Religieuses au Togo. Togo: Archevêché de Lomé, 1991.

Sossah, K. Panorama sociologique des sectes religieuses au Togo: Etude et documents. Lomé, Togo: Institut National de la Recherche Scientifique, 1976.

Tokelau Islands

The Tokelau Islands consist of three South Pacific atolls located between Kiribati and Samoa, with a total population of approximately seventeen hundred people. The islands have been inhabited for several thousand years by Polynesians who had their first contact with Europeans in 1765.

Status of religions in the Tokelau Islands, 2000-2050

Followers	2000			2025	2050
	total	%	rate
Christians	1,400	95.7	-0.70	1,400	1,400
Protestants	1,000	66.7	0.00	1,000	1,000
Roman Catholics	560	37.3	0.36	600	640
Marginal Christians	30	2.0	0.00	50	80
Baha'is	60	4.3	0.80	100	150
Total population	1,500	100.0	-0.69	1,500	1,500

Explorer John Byron found the islands to possess little of interest to his government. Only in 1877 did Great Britain move to name the islands a British protectorate. In 1916 they were formally annexed and incorporated in the Gilbert Islands and Ellice Islands colonies. Administration was transferred to New Zealand in 1925.

The present name of the island appeared in 1946, and New Zealand assumed full sovereignty in 1958. However, in the post-World War II decades, the United States also claimed hegemony over the islands, which claim it did not drop until 1980. From 1960 to 1972, New Zealand encouraged immigration of Tokelau Islanders to New Zealand, but in 1972 reversed that policy for one of supporting the retention of cultural life and traditions. Since the 1980s, the United Nations has monitored the ongoing desires of the residents concerning their relationship to New Zealand, but they have continued to enjoy their semiautonomous state. New Zealand has placed its Tokelau Affairs Office on Samoa.

The LONDON MISSIONARY SOCIETY, which had been operating in the South Pacific for a half-century, finally sent a missionary to Tokelau in 1861. The early missionaries were extremely aggressive toward the traditional religion, and by the late twentieth century it had all but disappeared. Approximately 70 percent of the residents are members of the CONGREGATIONAL CHRISTIAN CHURCH IN SAMOA, created in 1962 and based in western Samoa.

The ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH established work immediately after World War II in 1946. That work was attached to the vicariate headquartered in Samoa in 1955 and eventually grew into the Diocese of Apia (Western Samoa) in 1966 (now the Diocese of Samoa-Apia.) It was separated from the diocese as an independent mission in 1992. The only other religious activity in the islands is a small BAHÁ'Í FAITH community.

Sources:

Boardman, D. W. "Religion as a Factor in the Adjustment of Immigrants: Tokelau Island Community in the Wellington Area." Social Compass 26, 1 (1979): 73-85.
 Hooper, A., and J. Huntsman, trans. Matagi Tokelau: History and Traditions of Tokelau. Apia, Western Samoa: Office of Tokelau Affairs, Institute of Pacific Studies, University of the South Pacific, 1991.

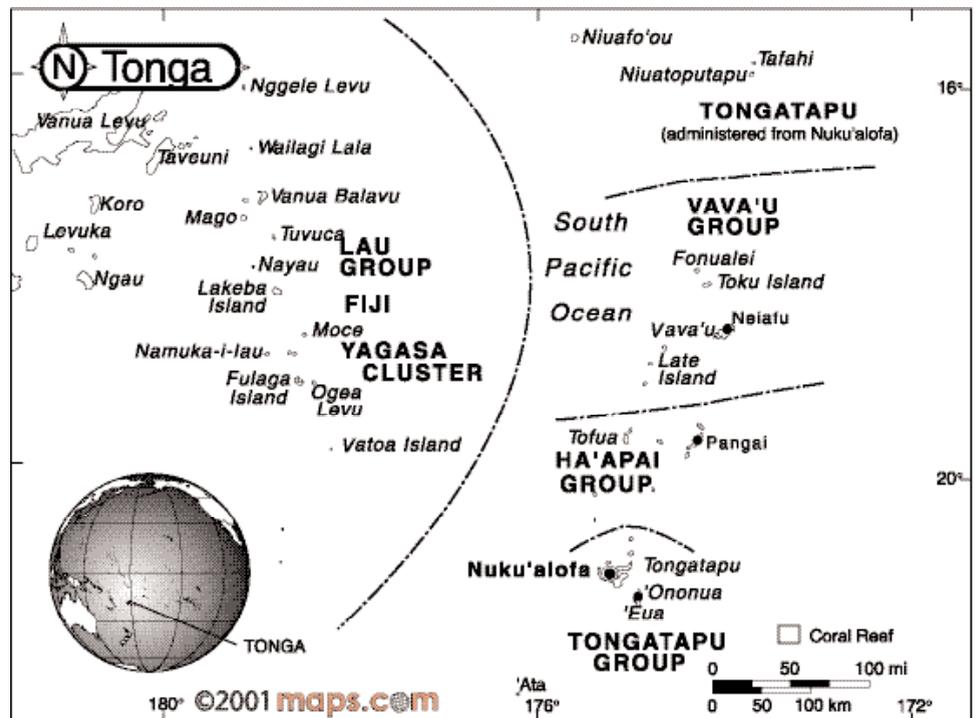

Tonga

Tonga, whose name means "south," is an island archipelago of 169 islands in the far South Pacific between Fiji and American Samoa. It was settled more than a millennium ago by Polynesians who arrived from those two island groups. The islanders developed a complex social system headed by the Tui Tonga (ruler), later replaced by local leaders (divided among religious and secular leaders) on the main islands. The Dutch explorer Jakob Lemaire visited Tonga as early as 1616, but it was Captain Cook who in the eighteenth century gave them their early name among Westerners, the Friendly Islands.

In the mid-nineteenth century, a civil war broke out. A young leader, Taufa'ahau Tupouin, was victorious and unified the islands under his rule, which lasted until 1893. An admirer of British ways, he called himself George I and introduced a parliamentary system of governance. The British established a protectorate over Tonga in 1890 but did not

Status of religions in Tonga, 2000-2050

Followers	2000			2025	2050
	total	%	rate
Christians	91,600	92.9	0.10	95,400	96,800
Protestants	42,300	42.9	0.10	43,000	44,000
Independents	20,800	21.1	0.54	27,000	32,000
Marginal Christians	14,400	14.6	-0.10	13,800	13,500
Baha'is	6,600	6.7	3.05	9,000	12,000
Nonreligious	160	0.2	4.48	400	800
Buddhists	120	0.1	2.75	180	280
Hindus	100	0.1	12.68	50	100
Ethnoreligionists	10	0.0	0.00	10	20
Total population	98,500	100.0	0.29	105,000	110,000

disturb the local system of government. In 1918 the youthful great-granddaughter of George I was crowned Queen Salote. Tonga was never transformed into a colony, and in 1970 it became independent of British oversight under King Taufa'ahau, who continues as head of state.

Missionaries from the LONDON MISSIONARY SOCIETY attempted to evangelize Tonga in 1797, but they withdrew after three of their number were killed in 1799. They were succeeded by Australian Methodist Walter Lowery, who arrived in 1822. The work bore little fruit until the mid-1830s, but it suddenly spread rapidly over the island of Vava'u in 1834 and then spread through the archipelago. King George I, who finally unified the islands, was a Methodist, and in the decade after he established his rule the great majority of the islanders converted. The older Polynesian religion was virtually wiped out.

George I also became the source of the first schism within the Christian community. He established the Wesleyan Free Church and ordered his subjects to join it. The two bodies remained bitter rivals until 1924, when, under a new ruler, a plan of union was worked out. The majority of the Free Church, the larger body at this time, united to form the Free Wesleyan Church of Tonga. However, some six thousand members refused to join the union and continued as the Free Church of Tonga. The Free Church of Tonga has subsequently experienced two schisms, with members leaving in 1929 to form the Church of Tonga and in 1962 to form the Church of the Red Coats. Through these four churches, the Methodists remain the majority church grouping on Tonga, though they have declined proportionately as the population has grown and new missionary groups have arisen in the last half of the twentieth century.

The second church to establish itself on Tonga was the ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH. After several unsuccessful attempts, dating back to 1837, to create a mission, Catholic work began in earnest following an 1855 treaty between Tonga and France proclaiming religious freedom as the law of the land. The church grew to the point that a vicariate was erected in 1937 and a diocese in 1976. The first indigenous priest was ordained in 1933. The bishop resides in Nuku'alofa, the capital.

Anglicans arrived fairly late into Tonga (1902) but had little success. Anglican work is part of the Diocese of Polynesia within what is now known as the ANGLICAN CHURCH IN AOTEAROA, NEW ZEALAND, AND POLYNESIA. Somewhat earlier (1895), the SEVENTH-DAY ADVENTIST CHURCH began its mission on Tonga, which was formally organized as the Tonga Mission in 1921, a year before the creation of the church's South Pacific Division.

The ASSEMBLIES OF GOD entered in the 1930s but did not experience real success until 1966, when they held a Good News Crusade to which hundreds responded. Like the Assemblies of God, the JEHOVAH'S WITNESSES arrived in Tonga in the 1930s and experienced a heightened growth in the 1960s, though they have not been as successful in gaining members. More successful than either has been the CHURCH OF JESUS CHRIST OF LATTER-DAY SAINTS, which entered Tonga in 1891 and grew rapidly after World War II, the publication of the Tongan edition of The Book of Mormon in 1946 being a significant factor. Beginning with twenty-four hundred members, by the end of the century the church reported more than forty thousand members in a population of approximately 120,000. It is the second largest religious body on Tonga.

Tonga remains one of the most thoroughly Christianized of the South Pacific countries, which has meant that few newer Evangelical churches entered through the last decades of the twentieth century and that the community of people who follow other faiths is small. There is a small BAHÁ'Í FAITH community, as well as a group of immigrants from India who continue to worship as Hindus.

Sources:

- Forman, Charles H. The Island Churches of the South Pacific: Emergence in the Twentieth Century. Maryknoll, NY: Orbis, 1982.
- Harris, D. P. Missionaries in the Last Kingdom. M.A. thesis, Harvard University, 1989.
- Tippett, A. R. People Movements in Southern Polynesia: Studies in the Dynamics of Church-Planting and Growth in Tahiti, New Zealand, Tonga and Samoa. Chicago: Moody, 1971.

Toraja Church (GT)

The people of the Toraja region of the central highlands of Sulawesi, one of the larger Indonesian islands, resisted incursions into their territory by the Dutch government, Muslims, and Christians. However, in 1906 the Dutch established their authority in the area, and in 1912 the Reformed Church began a mission that in 1913 resulted in the first baptisms. That same year, the Gereformeerde Zendingbond, a very conservative Calvinist missionary society based in Holland, assumed responsibility for the mission. The church grew quickly, and through the 1930s a planned development toward independence was put into place. In 1941 the first congregation was declared independent of the mission and called its pastor. There were approximately fifteen thousand people affiliated with the mission at that point.

The church's plans were interrupted by the Japanese invasion of Indonesia. However, in 1947 an independent Toraja church with a presbyterian polity was constituted. Then, as Indonesia moved toward independence, an Islamic revolt developed across Sulawesi. Many Muslims opposed the new government and fought a guerrilla war into the 1960s. The revolt forced many Torajans to choose between Christianity and Islam. By the time the revolt had ended, more than 70 percent of the Toraja people had joined the church. The church also founded congregations in other parts of Sulawesi and on Kalimantan and Java, where Torajans had immigrated.

Through the 1970s, the church gave considerable time to rethinking its relationship to the local culture, toward which it had developed a positive stance. One result was a new confession of faith adopted in 1981. In 1988, women were accepted into the ordained ministry. Although retaining a cordial relationship to the founding mission, the church has asserted its independence and joined both the WORLD ALLIANCE OF REFORMED CHURCHES and the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES.

In the 1990s, the church reported 300,000 members in 709 congregations. It sponsors two hospitals, an orphanage, and a rural training center for female leaders.

Address:

Toraja Church (GT)
 Jalan Jenderal Ahmad Yani 45
 Rantepao—Tana Toraja 91831
 Sulawesi Selatan
 Indonesia

Source:

Bauswein, Jean-Jacques, and Lukas Vischer, eds. The Reformed Family Worldwide: A Survey of Reformed Churches, Theological Schools, and International Organizations. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans, 1999.

Toronto Airport Christian Fellowship

The Toronto Airport Christian Fellowship (TACF) is the church base for a famous charismatic renewal known as the “Toronto Blessing” that began on January 20, 1994. TACF, led by senior pastors John and Carol Arnott, a husband-and-wife team, was originally a part of the California-based Association of Vineyard Churches, founded by John Wimber. TACF separated from the Vineyard during late 1995 and early 1996 after serious disagreements over aspects of the renewal connected with the Toronto Church.

The Blessing renewal began under the ministry of Randy Clark, a Vineyard pastor from St. Louis, who was holding a revival campaign at the former Toronto Airport Vineyard in early 1994. Clark outlined his own experience of spiritual awakening through the work of evangelist Rodney Howard-Browne, a Pentecostal evangelist from South Africa, who now heads Revival Ministries International in Tampa, Florida. Howard-Browne gained fame through manifestations of “holy laughter” that characterized his revival meetings.

The initial campaign in Toronto continued after Clark returned to St. Louis. The Blessing gained international attention as news spread throughout the charismatic Christian world about a supernatural “Holy Ghost” revival in Toronto. By the summer and fall of 1994 thousands were flocking to Toronto for the meetings held six nights every week. Toronto Life magazine billed the “Blessing” the top tourist attraction of 1994. Visitors continued to come to Toronto by the thousands from every part of the globe throughout 1995 and early 1996. Since then TACF has focused on special conferences and on travel to various countries to export the renewal around the world.

From the outset of the renewal, critics like Hank Hanegraaff, author of Counterfeit Revival, accused TACF leaders of using hypnotism and psychological control to manipulate the crowds into frenzied bouts of laughter, shaking, rolling on the floor, moaning, groaning, crying, and falling down (known as being “slain in the Spirit”). What drew particular concern from Vineyard leader John Wimber were episodes of people acting or sounding like animals during the worship services.

In early 1996, TACF formed Partners in Harvest, a non-denominational organization that seeks to unite charismatic grouping of ministries and churches influenced by the revival. There are now about one hundred participating member organizations from the United States, Canada, and a dozen other countries in Europe, the United Kingdom, Africa, and South America.

TACF became the target of fresh criticism in 1999 following reports from the church leaders that God was filling people’s cavities with real gold. TACF released a video about the alleged miracles called “Go for the Gold” and their website featured pictures from people who claimed that God had performed dental work on them. Attendance increased as reports circulated about the supernatural claims.

Though local membership involves about one thousand people, TACF has enormous worldwide outreach through its weekly television program, renewal magazine, and school of ministry. As well, the church has been visited by several million people since 1994 and maintains links with some of the most prominent leaders in the charismatic and Pentecostal world, including Benny Hinn and Paul Cain.

Address:

Toronto Airport Christian Fellowship
 272 Attwell Dr.
 Toronto, Ontario M9W 6M3
 Canada
<http://www.tacf.org>

James A. Beverley

Sources:

Arnott, John. The Father’s Blessing. Lake Mary, FL: Creation House, 1995.
 Beverley, James A. Holy Laughter and the Toronto Blessing. Grand Rapids, MI: Zondervan, 1995.
 Hanegraaff, Hank. Counterfeit Revival. Dallas, TX: Word, 1997.
 Poloma, Margaret. “Toronto Blessing.” Posted at http://www.hirr.hartsem.edu/research/research_pentecostalism_polomaart8.html. Accessed March 15, 2002.

TRADITIONAL AFRICAN RELIGIONS

The term indigenous is inadequate, but refers to African societies with a “traditional” religious and cultural orientation with many common characteristics. African peoples do not have the same traditional religious ideas or philosophy, and the existence of common characteristics must be proved through systematic comparative analysis. Any suggestion that there is a “unity” of African indigenous religions must be limited to considering common themes in systems that are often quite different. There are wide divergences between religions, which sometimes develop in isolation from each other. Each “common” phenomenon belongs to a complete whole, which is itself from a unique cultural, historical, and religious context. In this essay we must make generalizations with their accompanying dangers of misrepresentation, although in the indigenous religions of sub-Saharan Africa there is a great degree of affinity. These religions have weathered the ravages of time and the influences of external religions and cultures, and certain expressions of beliefs that have endured for many centuries still persist, even in urbanized and “secularized” societies. When these beliefs come into contact with an imported religion, such as Christianity or Islam, they often remain unaltered or may fundamentally change the character of that religion.

The term animism, from the Latin anima (“breath” or “soul”) was popular in nineteenth-century Europe, and is the belief that natural objects or phenomena possess a soul. At best, this idea of a pervasive soul describes only one aspect of African religions and this term, together with “primitive” and even “primal” (basic or primary), should be abandoned. A more satisfactory way of describing African indigenous religions might be to use three interdependent and overlapping terms: (1) theism: the belief in a Supreme Being and (sometimes) lesser gods; (2) spirituality: the belief in a spiritual world, including ancestors; and (3) dynamism: the belief in power working through objects and available to people.

Theism: God and Lesser Divinities. Almost all African religions posit the idea of a single God, a supreme creator. The term polytheism (many gods) is a difficult one to sustain in Africa, and writers like Idowu have suggested that an “implicit” or “diffused” monotheism is true of African religions. This theism is ambivalent: the Supreme Being is at the same time very near (immanent) and distant (transcendent). But writers like Mbiti have pointed out that the two attributes of God’s transcendence and immanence are complementary, and that transcendence cannot be emphasized to the exclusion of immanence. African observers acknowledge that God in traditional religions is predominantly transcendent, which usually means that for most of the time the Supreme Being is remote from everyday affairs. Because of this, he/she (usually male) does not interfere with or harass people, and therefore is regarded as “good.” But because of his/her simultaneous nearness, sometimes people live in dread of an unpredictable God who may cause calamity and distress, including affliction, misfortune, diseases, death, and national calamities.

There are no atheists in African religions. Most peoples had a unique name (sometimes several) for a Supreme Being before the introduction of Christianity or Islam. Often one name, or a derivative of it, reappears among different peoples. Although there is widespread belief in a Supreme Being, usually a creator God, most divine functions have been delegated to other beings, lesser gods, spirits, or ancestors. In places where Christianity or Islam predominate there is a stronger belief in monotheism at a popular level, and vaguer traditional ideas of a Supreme Being have been replaced by a definite belief in a monotheistic God. The Supreme Being is a being with personal attributes (although not human) and isolated from other spirit beings. Often the Supreme Being is also the first ancestor and essentially the same name or root word is used for God as for ancestors. Sometimes the name for God is associated with both the ancestors and with a place where he is believed to live. In these cases the distinction between God and ancestor is maintained by the use of different noun classes. In some cases the name for God is a locative related to the place where the spirits live. Usually the Supreme Being is believed to live in the “sky” or “heaven” (in most African languages there is no differentiation between these two words), but some peoples situate him under the earth, where the spirits live. In Yoruba (Nigeria), Olorun is “owner of heaven,” and in many religions the word for God is synonymous with sun, and sometimes with rain. These ideas indicate that the sun, the rain, the sky (heaven), and other natural phenomena are manifestations of God and among some, God is sometimes identified with nature. In west Africa, the male deity in the sky sends rain to fall upon the female deity, Mother Earth. The Ashanti venerate the Earth Goddess Asase Yaa, as the earth is closely related to the fertility of the Ashanti people as well as being the resting place of their ancestors.

The activity most commonly attributed to the Supreme Being is that of creation, and many of the names for God describe God as creator, molder, and maker. Every new institution and birth is attributed to God’s power. However, it is often felt that God has withdrawn from creation usually as the result of some human (or animal) blunder or by God’s arbitrary decision, and usually God does not do anything any more. Thus we have the view that the African “high god” is a deus otiosus, a passive, inactive God. It is true that many African peoples no longer are able to say who or what God is. Seldom is God worshipped directly and shrines, altars, temples, or priests do not exist. There is no feeling of guilt in the sight of God and therefore there is no need to try to appease God with gifts or sacrifices. There are exceptions to this general rule, and among some peoples sacrifices and prayers are addressed to and shrines and priests devoted to God. As long as God provides rain, harvests, health, possessions, and children, everyone is satisfied. Nevertheless, God sustains all life, and if he/she chooses to withdraw provisions, then people may have to entreat God. But God is normally too far above humanity to be concerned with their daily affairs. There is no spontaneous longing for God and no desire to enter into relationship with God—religion is practical and material rather than mystical or spiritual.

Nevertheless, belief in the Supreme Being is a central feature of these religions, and it would be wrong to emphasize the remoteness and inactivity to the exclusion of the simultaneous nearness and unceasing activity. God stands behind everything, is mentioned in many proverbs and myths, and is called on in times of crisis. Terrifying and unexplainable natural phenomena (such as storms, earthquakes, lightning, fire, and epidemics) are often attributed to God, who is invoked to account for these otherwise unexplainable things. The basic conception is that God is “good,” but this seems to mean that he/she is neutral and does not hamper, irritate, or interfere with humans, and therefore humans should not interfere with God and may ignore him/her. If they do “interfere,” this might irritate God and lead to punishment. When God does intervene, a person may never know what God is going to do, and thus there is a strong undertone of fatalism. God becomes arbitrary and unpredictable, merciful or merciless, as God chooses. The comforting thought for those faced with inexplicable events is “God has done it,” “it’s God’s will,” or “God knows” (but we do not understand).

Some African peoples, especially in west Africa, have a belief in a pantheon or hierarchy of divinities. They are often associated with some aspect of nature or life, and thus are sometimes called “nature spirits.” They have many human characteristics: they can become hungry, jealous, angry, and so on, and people must always endeavor to remain on good terms with them. Some of these divinities used to be human beings, others were created by God or appear as God's wives or children, and some are regarded as more powerful than others. Among west African peoples (unlike most other Africans), there are a great number of divinities and spirits that appear to be personifications of the Supreme Being. But these "gods" are more limited than the Supreme Being and bear a generic name that is not applied to God. Thus, about 1,700 Yoruba divinities are called orisha, a term never used to refer to God, which is Olurun or Olodumare. These divinities, like ancestors, often function as servants and intermediaries of the Supreme Being and are often represented by wooden or metal images. The Yoruba orisha are headed by Orisha-nla or Obatala, the one who gives riches or poverty, strength or deformity. Ogun is the god of war, Shango the god of storms and the anger of Olurun, Shopona the power of smallpox and fever (Sapata among the Ewe in Benin), Eshu the power of mischief, Olokun the sea god, and so on. The Yoruba pantheon has reappeared in the Caribbean and in Brazil. The divinities derive from the creator and have no existence or authority in their own right. In west Africa, sea deities and many river deities are important. Sky gods distinct from the Supreme Being also exist. The Ewe have twin gods Mawu (male) and Lisa (female) with fourteen children who become gods of natural phenomena associated with the sky: thunder, lightning, rain, etc.

African societies have myths about the beginning of time, which often reveal beliefs about creation and a supreme creator. These myths are passed on orally from generation to generation, providing fundamental explanations for the order in the universe and society established by a creator, and sometimes explaining why God has "gone away" from creation. Some myths associate human origins with a tree, others tell of the first person's formation out of clay or out of a hole in the ground or a marsh. Others attribute human origins to the knee or leg of a divine being, or to being brought from heaven to earth. The Akan myth (Ghana) has God creating an orderly universe: first the sky, then the earth, rivers, waters, plants, and trees. After that, humans were formed and animals made for them, and nature spirits were formed to protect them. According to many myths, humans originally lived in a state of indescribable bliss, immortality, and unimpeded fellowship with God. Although God lived in heaven, heaven was closely connected to earth at the beginning. God provided all the necessities of food and clothing for people in a paradise, and taught them how to till the ground, make beer, hunt, and cook. But this paradise did not last, and after some time God withdrew from people. This withdrawal is not usually attributed to human sin or offence, but to some mistake—although there are some exceptions where myths relate the presence of sin and disobedience. In most of these myths humans are innocent victims of tragic circumstances. Myths go on to explain how people lost their immortality, again through an unfortunate accident. The most common myth in Africa concerns the animal messenger (often the chameleon) who was sent to people with news of immortality or resurrection. But the messenger dawdled on the way, forgot his message or garbled it, stuttered in delivering it, or had his parcel of new skins stolen by the snake (which explains why snakes can have new skins every year). But the most common version of the myth is that the first messenger was overtaken by a second one (often the lizard) whose message was that people would die. The result is irreconcilable separation between humanity and the creator.

Dynamism: Power and Power Specialists. Practices associated with the so-called "manipulation of power" ("dynamism") are intimately related to religious practices. The dependence on the Supreme Being, the gods, spirits, or ancestors is revealed in resorting to the "dynamism" specialists for solutions to problems. Africans believe in power, which may reside in charms, amulets, beads, medicines, words, names, and various other inanimate objects. Possessing this power enables people to do supernatural things or to prevent evil from occurring, and so people long for more of it. The greatest disaster possible follows the losing of power. Illnesses, suffering, disappointments, exhaustion, injustice, oppression, and failure are all regarded as a lessening of power, and so everything possible is done to avoid its loss and to promote its increase. The Supreme Being is seen as the source of all power, but this power has no dualism—God can use his power for good or withhold it, resulting in evil. There is a personal quality about the power residing in people, intimately linked to the ancestors and the ongoing life of the community. The interrelatedness between magic, power, and the ancestors is shown in the diviner’s capacity to make “magic,” ascribed to the power of the ancestors residing within. Life and existence or being itself is inextricably tied up with power. To live is to have power, to be sick or to die is to have less of it. These concepts are not always held by all people in these societies, they sometimes depend upon the level of cultural and technological development, and whether people are in a rural or an urban environment. In these different contexts, although power is sought earnestly, it acquires different meanings.

The principle behind the use of magic and divination in Africa is the ability to strengthen or weaken another person’s power through the manipulation of the power of non-human things. In order to obtain power, people make use of charms and medicines, and consult diviners or “witchdoctors,” healers, prophets, and mediums. These specialists, who have undergone a long period of training by their elders, use their power for the good of the local community, particularly in providing protection against the illegitimate use of power, the work of evil sorcerers or witches. And so, whenever the lessening of power results in problems, it is usually necessary for people to consult such specialists in order to receive more power. These specialists have power to discern the wishes of the ancestors and to act as protectors of society. They must be heeded, for one who does not follow their instructions courts disaster. The diviner is able to diagnose the cause of the affliction and will usually prescribe some ancestor ritual and sometimes give protective medicines and strong charms to overcome this unseen evil force. The specialist often seeks to discover the source of the trouble and who sends it. The answer to the question of who sent the problem takes different forms, but usually involves one of five possibilities that the adversity comes from: (1) an evil wizard; (2) an offended ancestor; (3) the breaking of a taboo; (4) God; or (5) the personal guilt of the sufferer or someone close to her or him. The specialist will be concerned mainly with the first three causes.

These specialists are believed to use their power for the good of the community, and function as doctors, counselors, and pastors at the same time (often the most influential people in the whole community with an all-encompassing mandate). They explain the mysteries of life and death, convey messages from the spirit world, heal sicknesses, give guidance in daily affairs, protect from dangers seen and unseen, resolve quarrels, promote fertility, act as “agony aunts” in affairs of the heart, and ensure success and prosperity in all areas of life. They are in opposition to the evil wizards, who are to be feared and avoided. Sorcery and witchcraft are to be overcome by the strengthening of people through the use of more powerful medicine or magic. In many African languages, different words are used to distinguish between the “good” diviner on the one hand and the enemy of society, the sorcerer or witch, on the other.

Divination is still widely practiced all over Africa, not least of all in urban areas. It is often intimately associated with the ancestor cult, since diviners are traditionally believed to be possessed by ancestors. There are diviners in urban areas throughout Africa whose techniques may differ from rural diviners and who may even consider themselves Christian, although usually they are not. Their healing power is specifically not Christian, coming directly from guiding ancestors, although today the influence of Christianity has contributed to the syncretistic views of many diviners and prophets regarding their source of power. The manipulation of power (magic) may be homeopathic or contagious. The former is based on the principle that power can be harnessed by analogous or imitative actions, such as causing smoke to symbolize clouds and produce rain, or piercing a so-called “voodoo doll” in the likeness of a particular person to produce the same effect in that person. Contagious magic likewise is based on the idea that everything closely associated with a person, such as hair, nail clippings, urine, saliva, dirty clothes, and so on, may be used by someone else to do that person harm. The power resident in material substances collectively known as “medicines” is interrelated with the power resident in people and can be used to support that power. Medicines are therefore not exclusively curative in a western sense, but are powerful substances that can be legitimately used for a wide variety of beneficial purposes such as fertility, success, courtship, protection, and even the changing of personality, and also to combat sorcery and witchcraft. These medicines contain (or are) power, which should be used for the benefit of the community, but they are also used illegitimately to harm people or to reduce their power.

Very often there is also the unseen evil and antisocial force of the sorcerer, who has too much power that can be selfishly used to harm others and must be counteracted with a more powerful force. In some African societies a distinction is made between two kinds of wizard. Sorcerers deliberately use medicine against their victims and are the personification of evil in the community. If such a person is discovered or smelled out, there is only one remedy, total extermination by the whole community. The second kind is witches, who are usually female and use medicines and/or some psychic act, usually inadvertently and unconsciously. Witches are believed to leave the bodies of women while they sleep to meet other witches at certain places. They fly around on the backs of birds, fireflies, sticks, and other objects, or they change themselves into owls, bats, or hyenas. They seek to enter other people’s bodies and suck out their power. The wizard can sometimes only succeed with an evil intent if some kind of access to the victim is gained through the latter’s protective ancestors.

Some make a distinction between Asian shamans who “travel” to cosmic worlds in a state of trance (ecstasy) and African healers who are possessed by guiding ancestors, also resulting in a trance. These are probably different explanations of the same phenomenon, consistent with their own religious contexts. Whether we refer to a shaman or a diviner, both exhibit similar characteristics as spirit mediums. They can be male or female persons who, as a result of a disorientating illness, believe themselves to be called to be healers. After initial resistance to this calling, they accept it and undergo a prolonged period of training often in isolation, usually with an experienced diviner or shaman, and the training ends with a symbolically rich initiation ceremony. Thereafter they enter into periods of purposeful ecstatic communication with the spirits by means of trances or seances, with ancestors or other spiritual entities accepted in their religious contexts, in order to bring health to others and harmony between the community and those spiritual entities they represent. African healers exhibit many similar characteristics to Asian shamans. There are many kinds of healers who divine through wooden divining slabs, shells, or through ancestors or alien spirits, and are distributors of appropriate medicines. This is true whether they are herbalists or diviners/spirit mediums. As long as there is belief in the power of spirits and evil sorcery, the healer’s enhanced position as pivotal to the well-being of the community is guaranteed. The healer is called to this position by recurring healing dreams followed by illness, which is sometimes a mental disturbance. Periods of withdrawal and resistance then follow, after which the novice healers accept the calling and enter into training, which involves observing a number of taboos. They must receive their guidance from a spirit or ancestor if they are going to succeed as professional specialists in the spirit world. Various healing techniques and methods used include using herbs, throwing bones, stones, or nuts to divine, and relying on dreams or other forms of communication with guiding ancestors. To increase the power of their patients, specialists use a wide variety of objects: amulets, necklaces, powders, tattoo markings and face painting, incantations, forked sticks, horns, calabashes, and so on. These are all symbols of power intended either to protect or to promote health, happiness, and success. Many healers are also herbalists, with detailed and intimate knowledge of the use of herbs, roots, and other plants as medicines to protect or restore life. In Africa it is not always possible to distinguish between a therapeutic “herbalist” and a diagnostic “diviner,” because most specialists use both methods in treating patients. In many of the independent AFRICAN INITIATED CHURCHES, the prophet-healer has taken the place of the traditional healer, and the use of healing symbols with parallels to traditional healing methods is one of the central and most important features.

Spirituality: Ancesters and the Spirit World. Rituals concerning ancestors are the center of many African religions, and this practice is still important for many Africans converted to Christianity. The operating principle is the ancestors’ presence and moral influence in the community of which they are part. Ancestors usually manifest themselves through dreams, sicknesses, and other misfortunes. All African peoples take dreams seriously, although not all dreams are sent by ancestors, as these can always be recognized. Africans usually recognize a message from the ancestors by means of a visible manifestation of the dead person in their dreams. It is only when the meaning of a recurring dream is unclear that the diviners are consulted for interpretation. But when an ancestor appears in a dream, the meaning is usually clear enough. Ancestors are limited in that their influence is mainly restricted to their kin of the same lineage. Usually in African societies these will be their patrilineal descendants (male and female), although sometimes an ancestor can even be a younger relative who has predeceased one (hence the inadequacy of the term “ancestor”). The ancestors visit their living kin from time to time by means of various signs that are interpreted by the family—the most common (besides dreams) being an onslaught of different sicknesses and delay in conception. Various unfortunate and fortunate occurrences will be ascribed respectively to the ancestors’ displeasure or their favor. Their main benevolent function is that of protection. If they are neglected (for their main need is to be remembered), then they are capable of unleashing destructive powers on the family concerned. In this respect, ancestors are causative agents of both good and evil. Having protective powers, their exercise of these powers results in good, the withholding of them in evil. Furthermore, the direct actions of their surviving kin, particularly in ritual acts of remembrance or the neglect of such acts, has direct bearing on the conduct of the ancestors.

Ancestors are conceived of as elevated people. Although they are approached with the respect due them as the older and wiser ones of society, it is doubtful whether this approach is the same as that given to God. In other words, such terms as ancestor worship or even veneration are inaccurate. Of course, the ancestors are known to be dead and therefore they are not the same as living people. They are generally believed to be less fortunate than the living; and because of their limitations, having more power than the living compensates them. African peoples, however, who pray to ancestors also pray to living people. In African societies, elders are believed to have more power and therefore require allegiance from the younger ones. Ancestors are conceived of as quite distinct from the Supreme Being, although they are thought of as nearer to God than are living people. Contact with ancestors on the part of the living is usually made through offerings and ritual killings, which occur when the ancestors are believed to be hungry; essentially, a ritual killing is to participate in a communal meal with the ancestors. People must continually see to it that the ancestors are fed. Thus, apart from ritual killings, beer is poured out for them and food left in the pot. The ancestors are sometimes thought of as unpredictable, capricious, and prone to anger and jealousy, and if they are thought to behave like this they may be scolded. Although ancestors are primarily for the preservation of the family, they are also a threat and are therefore to be feared. No one can ever be sure what they are going to do or not do next. In practice there is an intimate personal relationship between the living and the departed. Supplicants may make suggestions to the ancestors of acceptable alternatives to the course being followed by them, and respectfully request a change in attitude. The language is usually that of polite everyday speech, the address of people to their seniors.

Ancestors are believed to enter into individuals and to use them as mediums of communication. Some African diviners are specialist spirit mediums and are mostly women. Such spirit mediums are “possessed” by ancestors in order to communicate with the living. Various things happen that show that a medium is possessed. Usually she goes into a trance, accompanied by various ritual activities of the people around her, such as singing and dancing. The onset of this trance is accompanied by trembling, rolling of the eyes, falling down in a fit, or supernatural feats, after which the medium begins to speak with the “voice” of the ancestor. After the trance is over, the medium returns to normal. The people inquiring of her are thereafter to carry out the instructions of the ancestor as interpreted by the medium. Spirit possession usually means that a spirit temporarily enters into people and displaces their ability to control themselves while being possessed. Among the Shona and many other African peoples, the desire of an ancestor to possess someone is usually signaled by a lengthy illness. Shaking and grunting noises during dancing and the beating of drums herald the onset of possession. The family may then discuss their problems with the possessed medium, for they are actually talking with the ancestors. A Zulu person possessed by ancestors is expected to become a diviner, for spirit possession is linked to divination. At first, the person will demonstrate strange behavior, will tend to be antisocial, and will be subject to constant dreaming and prolonged illness. The eventual possession is evidenced by frequent yawning and sneezing, by shaking, quivering and convulsions, by belching and hiccuping, and by singing the songs of the ancestors. Ancestors are also believed to reappear in newborn children.

Ancestors who have been forgotten and no longer fulfil their protective function, children who die, and adults who did not have children of their own or did not receive a proper burial are believed to become spirits in the graveyard of time. Their abode is in the earth or in the air, and they seldom fulfill any practical function, but may become angry and vengeful. In many parts of Africa, nature spirits are abundant, such as spirits that dwell in water, sacred stones, caves, hills, springs, trees, groves, forests, and many others. These spirits may have been ancestors buried in or near that particular natural phenomenon, who with the passing of time were identified with that phenomenon. There are also anthropomorphic spirits, often visible to people, which are often ogre-like little creatures, sometimes with strong sexual connotations and associated with natural phenomena. A famous one in southern Africa is the Zulu thokoloshe, a creature that is known throughout the region and the subject of many conversations. There are also many spirits identified with particular animals. The origin of all these spirits is not speculated on; they are simply believed to have always existed, and they are omnipresent, very much a part of the world. The main difference between spirits and ancestors in practical terms seems to be that spirits do not appear as often to people. When they do, they may bring adversity or even possess people. In west Africa, nature spirits have become significant deities that must be placated by means of daily sacrifices, offerings, and other ritual acts.

One of the functions of a diviner is to determine the identity of and exorcise evil spirits. These spirits could include nature spirits, spirits under the control of malicious sorcerers, and spirits that come from outside a person's particular ethnic group or lineage, sometimes perceived as avenging spirits. Ancestors are never referred to, nor considered, evil spirits, as their existence depends on the continued respect of their relatives. But once they are forgotten and no rites are performed for them, they may reappear and cause trouble. Many nature spirits are feared, and people go to diviners to seek protection from them. There seems to be a connection in perception between ancestors and all types of spirit; they are all personal spirits with individual identity and characteristics. They often possess people, which in African thought is not always a bad thing. Spirits possess mediums in order to convey significant messages to people and this possession is a treasured feature and not a threat. But at other times, spirits possess people in such a way that they desire to be free from the troublesome consequences through exorcism.

Allan H. Anderson

Sources:

Idowu, E. Bolaji. African Traditional Religion. London: SCM, 1973.

Magesa, Laurenti. African Religion: The Moral Traditions of Abundant Life. New York: Orbis, 1997.

Mbiti, John. African Religions and Philosophy. London: Heinemann, 1969.

———. Concepts of God in Africa. London: SPCK, 1971.

Traditional Anglican Communion

The Traditional Anglican Communion is an international ecumenical body of conservative churches in the Anglican tradition. In the mid-1970s a significant conservative reaction developed in the EPISCOPAL CHURCH in the United States, occasioned by the ordination of the first female priests and the authorization of a new Prayer Book. Several new jurisdictions were established in the United States that became catalysts for Anglicans in various Anglican churches worldwide to leave those churches in fellowship with the Archbishop of Canterbury and to form independent dioceses. In the 1980s such churches emerged in Canada, Australia, New Zealand, and the United Kingdom.

In 1992 the Anglican Catholic Church, the Anglican Catholic Church of Canada, and the Anglican Catholic Church of Australia, including their member dioceses in New Zealand, Hong Kong, and Latin America, formed the Traditional Anglican Communion. Subsequently, the Traditional Anglican Church was formed in England, and its affiliated additional members included the Church of Ireland (Traditional Rite), the Anglican Church in America, and the Anglican Church in South Africa.

The Traditional Anglican Communion is minuscule relative to the CHURCH OF ENGLAND and its affiliates, and most of the churches that have resulted from the schisms that began in 1976 have not affiliated with it. It does represent a growing alternative for those unsettled by the ongoing changes within the larger Anglican world.

The communion formed the International Anglican Fellowship as its missionary arm and charged it with the task of raising money for those churches around the world that were finding it difficult to survive in their efforts to maintain traditional faith and worship.

Address:

Traditional Anglican Communion
275 Solomon Dr.
Estes Park, CO 80517-7255
<http://www.acahome.org/>

Source:

Anglican Church in America. Posted at <http://www.acahome.org>.

Transcendental Meditation

See World Plan Executive Council

Trinidad and Tobago

The religious plurality of Trinidad and Tobago's 1.3 million people stems from its colonial history and ethnic diversity, making the land a "rainbow nation." During colonial times (1498–1962), the indigenous Arawak population was wiped out by the Spanish. In late eighteenth century, French settlers were invited to set up plantations to grow sugar and cocoa. The settlers brought with them Roman Catholicism and slaves from West Africa. The ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH since then has represented Trinidad's religious norm, despite the British takeover in 1802 and the introduction of the CHURCH OF ENGLAND and, later, other Christian denominations. Anglicans in the Diocese of Trinidad and Tobago were incorporated into the CHURCH IN THE PROVINCE OF THE WEST INDIES in 1883.

The religious traditions of the West Africans became blended into Catholic-African syncretic cults, such as the Shango/Orisha and SPIRITUAL BAPTISTS ("Shouters," with Protestant elements). With the British abolition of slavery in 1834, the need for cheap plantation laborers was fulfilled through indentured workers from India. From 1845 to 1917, more than 140,000 Indians from various regions and religious backgrounds were brought to Trinidad. The diversity of Hindu ritual practices and doctrinal beliefs became standardized during the nineteenth and early twentieth centuries into a homogenized and Brahman (priestly) monopolized “Caribbean Hinduism.” The religion aspired to acquire a more respected place in Trinidadian society; thus Hindu folk traditions were purged and marginalized and “official” Hindu worship aligned with Christian patterns. Nevertheless, certain healing practices, “evil eye” ceremonies, sorcery, and divination rituals persisted. Interestingly, those practices cut across the generally highly segmented, exclusive, and stratified population of Trinidad and Tobago (the latter having been administratively joined with Trinidad in 1889), that being especially so in the working-class population.

A Corpus Christi procession in Tobago (Helene Rogers/TRIP)

Indians and Africans also brought with them Islamic traditions. Among the Indian segment, Muslims constituted some 12 to 16 percent. As with the African peoples, Indians were subjected to Christian missionary programs, the PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH IN CANADA being most active in attempting to convert the so-called heathen brothers and sisters. Proselytization efforts among Indian Muslims more or less failed. However, among the Indian people, evangelists from the PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH IN TRINIDAD, and later the Roman Catholic Church, the Anglicans, the SEVENTH-DAY ADVENTIST CHURCH, and, most recently, several Pentecostal churches, count some 22.2 percent as members. Thus Hindu and Muslim traditions remain the religious backbone of Trinidad and Tobago’s Indian population.

Afro-Trinidadians and Indo-Trinidadians, each with about 40 percent of the population, form the two largest segments. The 1990 census specifies that some 68.2 percent of T and T’s population regarded themselves as belonging to one of the Christian denominations, whereas 23.7 percent were Hindu and 5.8 percent were Muslim. Among the Christian traditions, Roman Catholicism remained strongest, with 29.4 percent, followed by Anglicanism (10.9 percent), Presbyterianism (3.4 percent), and Seventh-day Adventism (3.7 per-

Status of religions in Trinidad & Tobago, 2000-2050

Followers	2000			2025	2050
	total	%	rate
Christians	837,000	64.6	0.44	896,000	872,000
Roman Catholics	398,000	30.7	0.07	390,000	380,000
Protestants	179,000	13.8	0.94	220,000	320,000
Anglicans	154,000	11.9	0.10	170,000	160,000
Hindus	295,000	22.8	0.74	355,000	370,000
Muslims	88,500	6.8	0.83	121,000	135,000
Nonreligious	28,000	2.2	3.16	50,000	70,000
Spiritists	19,300	1.5	3.65	26,000	30,000
Baha'is	15,600	1.2	1.47	28,000	45,000
Chinese folk-religionists	5,100	0.4	0.15	7,500	9,000
Buddhists	4,000	0.3	0.33	6,500	8,000
Jews	600	0.1	0.08	700	800
Atheists	240	0.0	0.00	500	800
other religionists	1,700	0.1	2.59	2,000	2,900
Total population	1,295,000	100.0	0.64	1,493,000	1,543,000

cent). Many of the older Christian churches are members of the Christian Council of Trinidad and Tobago, which is in turn affiliated with the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES. A strong inroad at the expense of Anglicanism and Roman Catholicism has been made by Evangelical and Pentecostal groups since the 1970s, constituting about 15 percent of the population in 1990. Although the public domain had long been dominated by Christian traditions, since the 1990s a more balanced representation of non-Christian faiths has come to the fore.

Martin Baumann

Sources:

Brereton, Bridget. A History of Modern Trinidad 1783–1962. Port of Spain, Trinidad: Heinemann, 1981.

- Maynard, G. O. A History of the Moravian Church: Eastern West Indies Province. Port of Spain, Trinidad: Yuille's Printerie, 1968.
- Simpson, G. E. Religious Cults of the Caribbean. 3d ed. Rio Pedras, Puerto Rico: Institute of Caribbean Studies, University of Puerto Rico, 1980.
- Vertovec, Steven. Hindu Trinidad. London: Macmillan, 1992.
- Yelvington, Kevin A., ed. Trinidad Ethnicity. London: Macmillan, 1993.

Trinidad and Tobago, Hinduism in Indians from South Asia, often in the Caribbean referred to as East Indians, migrated to Trinidad as indentured laborers for cane and cacao estates between 1845 and 1917. What began as a system to meet an acute labor shortage in the wake of slave emancipation was maintained as a system that depressed local wages, thus dramatically increasing the total number of immigrants (over 145,000). The vast majority of laborers were Hindu (87 percent) and came from the middle Gangetic Plain, although a relatively small number were recruited from the Madras Presidency. Despite the hardships and difficulties they found in Trinidad, many Indians remained, and, mainly because of high birth rates, they composed 41 percent of the total population by 1990. At the time of that census, East Indians of the Hindu faith represented 59 percent of the Indian population and 24 percent of the total population—or approximately a quarter of a million adherents. The majority of migrants were lower caste, although those reputed to have “soft hands” (that is, Brahmins) also migrated in substantial numbers. Hindu immigrants carried with them religious practices, many of which have been synthesized and transformed by the migration experience and sociocultural milieu of colonial Trinidad. Caste distinctions have become muted, though not fully ignored in Trinidad today. Also, the majority of Hindus subscribe to their own ritual orthodoxy (that is essentially, but not exclusively, a Vaishnavite, Puranic, bhakti, and congregational-centered amalgam of practices) as defined by the Sanatan Dharma Maha Sabha—the strongest Hindu organization on the island. In addition, adherents of the DIVINE LIFE SOCIETY, the SATHYA SAI BABA MOVEMENT, Vishwanath Parishad, ARYA SAMAJ, and others can be found. One of the clearest examples of a Trinidadian Hindu culture can be seen in their temple architecture.

Hindu temple architecture in Trinidad has its clearest roots in the small priest-owned temples of the central Gangetic Plain during the middle of the nineteenth century. Essentially, Hindu migrants first depended on holy books, plants, and small statues of the deities (murtis) that they brought with them. Since folk deities are generally propitiated under trees throughout India, it is safe to assume that Hindus in Trinidad also continued that practice from the earliest time. Eventually, home shrines gave way to specially constructed traditional-style temples in the house yard or garden. The earliest known temples in Trinidad were erected by the 1860s and were mainly of bamboo wattle and daub construction with a thatch roof. By the 1880s more substantial structures were established in “clay brick” and stone. These traditional temples can still be found in Trinidad’s landscape and are relatively small (about a hundred square feet) with a pyramidal or rounded dome (sikhara) enshrining the deities.

During the 1920s a new type of temple was introduced called the koutia. This is derived from a Bhojpuri Hindi term kutia, that indicates a hut or simple hermitage. The architectural form derives from the Bhojpur region (central Gangetic Plain) of India where the koutia’s significance lies in housing the person who takes care of the temple (pujari). In Trinidad, the koutia took on the function of an assembly hall (mandapa) when it was added to a traditional temple. Throughout the 1920s and 1930s itinerant swamis (invited from India) traveled from village to village. The koutia was ostensibly built to house them temporarily and as a meeting place in which to sing bhajans or read scripture after they left. Villages without a temple also built koutias to attract a swami’s visit. Afterward, villagers could use the koutia as a temple with the simple installation of a deity’s image. Eventually it became a temple in and of itself, though it is difficult to determine exactly when and where this first took place. Koutias are rectangular, rather than square, and have a flat, shed roof or low-angled gable roof. They rarely have sikharas, except in a few cases in which a dome was added to the front porch of the structure for decorative purposes. By this time, many different deities (primarily Sanskritic) might be installed in the same temple, thus making it possible to worship Mahadeva and Krishna in the same place. In this way, villagers need not travel to different locations to worship a specific deity.

The koutia temple evolved into the Trinidadian temple by the 1950s. The addition of a dome where the deities were enshrined successfully merged the traditional form with the koutia. Thus, the Trinidadian form is also rectangular, with a raised platform and dome at one end, and the rest of the structure extending away from it with space to seat several hundred people in the larger versions. Trinidadian temples always have a sikhara and an assembly hall attached to the domed area. Today it is common to see Trinidadian temples, Koutia temples, and traditional temples with or without a koutia attached. Often on Sundays a community-based ritual called satsang is held. Puja is performed, scripture is read and interpreted, and bhajans are sung by the group. In addition, yearly events called yagnas (fire festival) are held. This is a seven- to nine-day affair sponsored by a family or a village. In all cases, whether through temple architecture or congregational ritual, a very strong sense of Trinidadian Hindu identity is created and maintained.

Carolyn V. Prorok

Sources:

Laurence, K. O. A Question of Labour: Indentured Immigration into Trinidad and British Guiana, 1875–1917. London: James Currey, 1994.

Prorok, C. V. “Evolution of the Hindu Temple in Trinidad.” Caribbean Geography 3, 3 (1991): 73–93.

———. Hindu Temples in Trinidad: A Cultural Geography of Religious Structures and Ethnic Identity. Ph.D. dissertation, Louisiana State University, 1988.

Vertovec, S. Hindu Trinidad: Religion, Ethnicity and Socio-Economic Change. London: Macmillan Caribbean, 1992.

True Buddha School

The True Buddha School is a PURE LAND BUDDHISM group oriented on Amida Buddha as the Bodhisattva capable of assisting people in the afterlife to the Pure Land, the Western Paradise. The True Buddha School teaches that anyone who calls on Amitabha’s name with an undivided mind will be reborn in the Pure Land and in the future will escape the cycle of reincarnation.

The True Buddha School mixes the Pure Land emphases with Tibetan practices. It was founded by Master Sheng-Yen Lu, who was born in 1945 in Taiwan. As a young man he studied engineering and worked at his profession for a decade. He also studied various religions and different schools of Buddhism. His own study led him to a state of Enlightenment, and his followers consider him a Living Buddha; an emanation of the White Padmakumara Master Sheng-Yen teaches that there are eighteen Padmakumaras (or Lotus Bodhisattvas) residing in the Pure Land, among whom the White Padmakumara is the chief. At one point he traveled spiritually to the Pure Land, where he realized that he is an emanation of the White Padmakumara incarnated in the present as a human being in order to assist the liberation of sentient beings.

The True Buddha School describes itself as a school for spiritual cultivation that begins with members taking refuge in the guru, and the Three “Gems of Buddhism”: the Buddha, the Dharma, and the Sangha (that is, Buddha, Truth, and Fellowship). Members also practice a Tantric Dharma believed capable of leading individuals to Buddhahood (Enlightenment). The True Buddha Tantric Dharma involves a practice of visualizing oneself and Buddha as “One,” which, combined with the cultivation of purity of body, mind, and speech, offers the hope that an ordinary layperson can achieve Buddhahood.

Those seeking to follow the Dharma are advised to seek initiation from a true guru (Master Sheng-Yen). To take refuge in the Living Buddha and become a student of the True Buddha School, one may come to the school’s headquarters, now located in the state of Washington in the United States, and direct Initiation Empowerment, or one can, on the first or fifteenth of any lunar month, at 7:00

A.M., recite the Fourfold Refuge Mantra: “Namo Guru bei, namo Buddha ye, namo Dharma ye, namo Sangha ye” while prostrating oneself. On those same days each month, Master Sheng-Yen Lu performs a ceremony of “Remote Initiation Empowerment.” One may also go to a True Buddha School center and receive initiation.

From Taiwan the True Buddha School has become a global institution with three hundred local chapters and some thirty major temples in more than twenty countries, from Japan to Australia, Brazil, and the United Kingdom. Master Sheng-Yen Lu has been a prolific writer with more than a hundred books to his credit.

Address:

True Buddha School
17012 NE 40th Ct.
Redmond, WA 98052
<http://www.tbsn.org/>

Sources:

Sheng-Yen, Lu. An Overview of the Buddhadharma. Union City, CA: Purple Lotus Society of USA, 1996.

Sheng-Yen, Lu, Master. The Inner World of the Lake. San Bruno, CA: Amitabha, 1992.

Sheng-Yen, Lu, and Janny Chow. A Complete and Detailed Exposition on the True Buddha Tantric Dharma. Union City, CA: Purple Lotus Society of U.S.A., 1996.

True Jesus Church

In 1917, Paul Wei, Ling-Shen Chang, and Barnabas Chang, Christians residing in Beijing, China, received the baptism of the Holy Spirit and the revelation of the perfect Truth concerning salvation. They proceeded to found the True Jesus Church, whose message spread through the previously existing Christian communities and then to the general public through several gospel newsletters that the three initiated. From the Chinese mainland the movement found its way to Taiwan (1927), throughout Southeast Asia (1927), and Hawaii (1930). Headquarters of the church moved first to Nanjing (1926) and then to Shanghai (1927).

The True Jesus Church lost considerable following in its homeland after the Chinese Revolution and the establishment of the People’s Republic in 1949, though it still has an estimated one million members in China. However, headquarters were moved to Taiwan, and from there growth was directed through the Chinese in diaspora. Delegates to the church’s World Conference in Taiwan in 1975 created the International Assembly of the True Jesus Church. In 1985 leaders relocated the principal office of the International Assembly to Los Angeles, California. Subsequently, four Evangelical centers have been established for America, Europe, Northeast Asia, and Southeast Asia.

The True Jesus Church sees itself as the restored Apostolic Church of the End Time that has received the divine revelation of Truth through the Holy Spirit. That Truth has been confirmed through various signs and miracles. The name is also assigned spiritual meaning: God is “True” (John 3:33, 17:3; 1 Thessalonians 1:9) and Jesus designated himself the “Truth” (John 14:6), or the “true Vine” (John 15:1). The author of the Gospel of John called him the “true Light” (John 1:9). God called and established the “Church” (Acts 15:14–18). It is believed that the church should bear God’s name—that is “Jesus” (Matthew 1:21; John 17:11, 26). The True Jesus Church thus exalts the name of God and considers itself the Christ.

The church’s doctrinal position is quite similar to the nontrinitarian, Apostolic, or “Jesus Only” perspective. It teaches that the reception of the Holy Spirit is necessary for entering the kingdom of God, and that speaking in tongues is the sign of that reception. It practices baptism in “Jesus’ Name.” Baptism is by full immersion in living water. Unlike most Pentecostal churches (both trinitarian and nontrinitarian), the True Jesus Church baptizes infants. The church also considers foot washing as a third sacrament (in addition to baptism and the Lord’s Supper). It worships on the Sabbath (Saturday) rather than Sunday.

Outside of mainland China, the True Jesus Church reports approximately seventy-nine thousand members as the new century begins. Members are scattered in some twenty countries.

Address:

True Jesus Church
11236 Dale St.
Garden Grove, CA 92841
<http://www.tjc.org>

Sources:

The Five Biblical Doctrines. Garden Grove, CA: Words of Life Publishing House, 1995.
Return to the True Church. Garden Grove, CA: Words of Life Publishing House, 1995.
Speaking in Tongues: A Biblical Perspective. Garden Grove, CA: Words of Life Publishing House, 1996.

True (Old Calendar) Orthodox Church of Greece

The True Orthodox Church of Greece was organized as a reaction to the adoption in 1924 of the New or Gregorian calendar by the ORTHODOX CHURCH OF GREECE. In spite of pockets of opposition to the change, no priest rejected it until an extraordinary event, the appearance of a cross in the sky on September 14–15, 1925, the day celebrated as the Feast of the Elevation of the Holy Cross according to the Old or Julian calendar. As a result of that event, two priests announced their adherence to the Old calendar. However, it was the monks from Mt. Athos who provided the strongest opposition to the New calendar and who took the lead in founding Old Calendar churches. By 1934 there were some eight hundred such churches, in all parts of Greece.

As of the mid-1930s, no bishop had appeared in support of the Old Calendarists, but in 1935 three bishops left the Church of Greece and adhered to what had become known as the True Orthodox Church of Greece. They immediately consecrated four additional bishops, though two of the three original bishops then returned to the state church. Metropolitan Chrysostomos of Florina emerged as the leader of the True Church.

In 1937, Metropolitan Chrysostomos made a statement that while the state church had erred in adopting the New calendar, it had not lost the supernatural presence of God, and its sacraments were still valid. His statements were rejected by two of his bishops, both of whom formed separate factions, though most of their supporters returned to Chrysostomos’s jurisdiction by 1950. At the same time, however, the state church launched a systematic, repressive effort that included an attack upon Old Calendar priests, who were deprived of their clerical clothing and often beaten and shaved. Chrysostomos was sent into exile for a year in 1951. Released in 1952, he now was the only bishop left, and he died in 1955 without an episcopal successor. Orders for a new bishop were finally obtained in 1960 from the RUSSIAN ORTHODOX CHURCH OUTSIDE OF RUSSIA.

Archbishop Akakios headed the church from 1960 until his death in 1963. He was succeeded by Archbishop Auxentios. New controversy developed in 1974, when Archbishop Auxentios suggested, contrary to Metropolitan Chrysostomos, that the state church’s sacraments were without grace. In response, two of the bishops adhering to Chrysostomos’s more favorable moderate view consecrated a set of new bishops. Those who accepted Auxentios’s position also consecrated more bishops, and two separate synods came into existence. Each synod itself split into two factions, leaving the Old Calendar movement divided into at least five factions (including the group that had originally separated from Metropolitan Chrysostomos in the 1930s). Two of these factions merged, leaving the four factions (each with its separate synod) that exist today.

Three of the factions believe that grace has been removed from the sacraments of the state-supported Orthodox Church of Greece. Of those, the largest is led by Metropolitan Chrysostomos II. The moderate faction, which believed that the state church retained grace in its sacraments, eventually looked to Metropolitan Cyprian of Oropos and Fili as its leader. That branch of the Old Calendar movement has been able to garner the support of the Old Calendar Orthodox Church of Romania and the Old Calendar Church in Bulgaria. This faction is second in size to that led by Metropolitan Chrysostomos II, and in 1994 it entered into full communion with the Russian Orthodox Church Outside of Russia.

In spite of the existence of the various factions, the members and clergy of the True Orthodox Church consider themselves as one body united by their disagreement with the stance of the Church of Greece regarding the calendar, and by their general opposition to the participation of the state church in various ecumenical endeavors. They claim some 200,000 adherents, about 120 parishes, and a number of monastic communities. Their churches have no electric lights or pews. Associated parishes are found in Australia and Canada. Each of the four factions also has congregations as well as a diocesan structure based in the United States.

Source:

Chrysostomos, Archimandrite, with Hieromonk Ambrosios and Hieromonk Auxentios. The Old Calendar Church of Greece. Etna, CA: Center for Traditionalist Orthodox Studies, 1986.

Tunisia

Tunisia, a North African country between Libya and Algeria, was originally the home of the Berbers; later it became the center of a series of ancient cultures. The ancient city of Carthage (located not far from modern Tunis) was established by the Phoenicians around 800 B.C.E. It became the center of a sizable empire that eventually fell to Rome. In 146 B.C.E., Rome razed the city. The Vandals overran the Romans in 439 C.E. They were in turn driven out by the expanding Byzantine Empire in 533. Finally, in 670, the Arabs moved across North Africa, bringing with them Islam.

Tunisia was incorporated into the Almohad Empire based in Morocco in the twelfth century. As that empire fell apart, the Berbers reasserted themselves. Tunisia remained independent until the coming of the Ottomans in the sixteenth century. After centuries of control by various Muslim forces, Tunisia was invaded by the French, who in 1882 invaded Tunisia and made it a protectorate. French control of the area was granted by Britain in return for their loss of a role in the Suez Canal.

As early as 1925, Tunisians organized to demand independence. Only after three years of armed conflict (1952–1955) did France relent and in 1956 recognize Tunisia's au-

Status of religions in Tunisia, 2000-2050

Followers	2000			2025	2050
	total	%	rate
Muslims	9,485,000	99.0	1.63	12,659,000	14,693,000
Christians	51,600	0.5	1.07	80,000	120,000
Independents	30,400	0.3	2.40	60,000	100,000
Roman Catholics	19,000	0.2	-0.76	17,000	16,000
Protestants	670	0.0	0.30	900	1,500
Nonreligious	39,800	0.4	2.53	89,000	150,000
Jews	3,800	0.0	0.53	3,000	2,000
Atheists	3,700	0.0	2.91	8,000	12,000
Baha'is	1,900	0.0	2.48	4,000	6,000
Total population	9,586,000	100.0	1.63	12,843,000	14,983,000

tonomy. A year later a republic was proclaimed and a president representing the Destur Party was elected. Tunisia was transformed into a socialist state until financial problems forced a more open economy. The country has since moved toward a more democratized, secularized, and Westernized position.

Islam is both the dominant and official religion of the country. The great majority of the population follow the Sunni MALIKITE SCHOOL OF ISLAM. The legal structure of the country demands that the president be a Muslim, and it prevents attempts at proselytization by representatives of other religions.

Although most believers follow the Malikite school, there are a significant number of Kharjites on the island of Djerba. In the 1980s a strong fundamentalist movement emerged to oppose the further Westernization and secularization of the country. Included in the critique of the country was a protest of the un-Islamic role assumed by women and the immorality of tourists who flocked to the country's

The Sidi Oqba Mosque in Kairouan, Tunisia (Helene Rogers/TRIP)

Mediterranean beaches. In 1992, Tunisia's president Zina El Abidene denounced the fundamentalists to a gathering of Arab government ministers in Tunis.

Before the arrival of Islam, Tunisia had been the home of a vital Christian community. It was there at the beginning of the fourth century C.E. that the Donatist controversy erupted over the role of those who had betrayed their faith during times of persecution. The Donatists rejected the appointment of such people to positions of leadership. They argued that the efficacy of the sacraments depends upon the purity of the priest who delivers them. In reaction to Donatism, Augustine, the bishop of Hippo (354–430), developed arguments for the use of state power to suppress heretical ideas. An episcopal structure existed in Tunisia until at least the eleventh century.

The ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH attempted to reestablish itself in Tunisia at various times but did not build a real following until the nineteenth century, and that among expatriates. In 1843 a prefecture was erected, and a new archbishop of Carthage was named in 1884. The church grew through the first half of the twentieth century, primarily among the French and others who had moved to the country. In like measure, following independence, with the emigration of most Europeans who had lived there, the church suffered considerably. In 1957 the church turned over sixty-five of its seventy church buildings to the state. Today the church is led by a bishop who resides in Tunis.

Anglicans entered Tunisia in 1829 with a mission directed toward the Jewish community, which at the time was 100,000 strong. The mission opened two schools for Jewish children that soon were also serving the Muslim community. Today the work continues under the direction of the Diocese of Egypt of the EPISCOPAL CHURCH IN JERUSALEM AND THE MIDDLE EAST. In 1881 the North African Mission began work in Tunis, and over the next decades it expanded to seven centers. Its work was significantly disrupted by World War II, and most of its centers were closed. In 1962 the mission started a popular Bible-study correspondence course that enrolled some twenty thousand people before the government became aware of it and forced its withdrawal in 1964. Subsequently, the mission moved its work to France. The same year that the mission began, the REFORMED CHURCH OF FRANCE began its work serving French Protestants in Tunisia. The Reformed Church in Tunisia still maintains one congregation of one hundred members in Tunis.

During the years of French rule, the SEVENTH-DAY ADVENTIST CHURCH (1905), Methodists (1908, from America), and Pentecostals from the CHURCH OF GOD (CLEVELAND, TENNESSEE; 1911) established work. A short time later the Greek and Russian Orthodox churches organized a parish for their members who had moved to Tunis to work.

Jews had resided in Carthage prior to the coming of the Christians, and their community survived the changing of governments through the years. In 1881 they had been granted equal rights with the Muslim community, and they had been promised that those rights would be guaranteed by the independent government established in 1957. When they were not, many Jews decided to leave. Over the next decade, the population of the community dropped from 100,000 to 25,000. Many moved to France, others moved to Israel. As the century came to an end, only 3,000 remained. They were found in Tunis, Sfax, and Sousse. There is also a group of Jews on Jerba Island, where an ancient synagogue, El Ghriba, is located. The community is headed by the Grand Rabbinate of Tunisia, located in Tunis.

Like other North African countries with an established Muslim faith, Tunisia has proved unattractive to the many new religions that have arisen through the twentieth century. There are, however, a small number of Baha'is.

Sources:

Cooley, J. K. Baal, Christ and Mohammed: Religion and Revolution in North Africa. New York: Holt, Rinehart and Winston, 1965.

De Sainte-Marie. La Tunisie chrétienne. Lyon: Bureaux des Missions Catholiques, 1878.

Fluehr-Lobban, C. Islamic Society in Practice. Gainesville: University Press of Florida, 1994.

Shahin, E. E. A. The Restitution of Islam: A Comparative Study of the Islamic Movements in Contemporary Tunisia and Morocco. Baltimore, MD: Johns Hopkins University, 1990.

Turkey

Turkey, as Asia Minor, has been home to civilizations reaching back to pagan times. Anatolia, modern-day Turkey, is the homeland of numerous cultures, mostly of mixed ethnic origin. Theories indicate a link between Sumerians, Hittites, and Turks because they spoke agglutinative languages and are believed to have come into southern Mesopotamia more than six thousand years ago from Central Asia. Western culture associates Turkey with the Troy of Homer's Iliad and Odyssey, as well as tales of the fabled kings Midas (725–696 B.C.E.) and Croesus (560–547 B.C.E.). By the sixth century B.C.E., Turkey was home to the philosophies of Thales, Anaximander, and Anaximenes, who were natives of Miletus. Before Athens emerged, Hellenic culture flourished in Anatolia until the invasion of Cyrus the Great (550–530 B.C.E.), who drove the culture to Athens. The conquests of Alexander the Great (334 B.C.E.) helped revive Hellenic thought through the Middle East, and during the Roman era, Anatolia had enormous libraries that rivaled Alexandria's in Egypt. The last Anatolian king bequeathed his kingdom to Rome (133 B.C.E.), which established a capital at Ephesus from which it ruled fairly peacefully for six centuries.

Turkey played a key role in the development of Christianity. Its foremost proponent was Paul, a Jew from Tarsus. He trekked the excellent Roman road system to spread the new religion. His first journey took him to Antioch, Perga, Iconium, Derbe, Attalia, and other cities in Anatolia. His Status of religions in Turkey, 2000-2050

Followers	2000			2025	2050
	total	%	rate
Muslims	64,714,000	97.2	1.73	84,924,000	96,598,000
Nonreligious	1,349,000	2.0	1.97	2,300,000	3,300,000
Christians	389,000	0.6	0.63	450,000	500,000
Orthodox	228,000	0.3	0.16	200,000	200,000
Independents	78,000	0.1	1.84	120,000	160,000
Protestants	32,500	0.1	0.97	40,000	55,000
Atheists	68,100	0.1	1.80	100,000	135,000
Buddhists	38,300	0.1	2.46	60,000	80,000
Jews	21,600	0.0	-0.19	15,000	10,000
Baha'is	19,600	0.0	3.00	35,000	55,000
Chinese folk-religionists	15,900	0.0	1.64	22,000	30,000
Ethnoreligionists	10,700	0.0	0.15	8,000	6,500
Total population	66,591,000	100.0	1.73	87,869,000	100,664,000

Epistle to the Galatians, the ninth book of the Christian New Testament, was addressed to people of the Galatian region, where descendants of the Gauls (Celts) had pioneered the interior. He took three missionary trips (recorded in the Book of Acts) and ran into difficulty in Ephesus, where silversmiths engaged in creating statues of Diana/Cybele/Asartate felt that he threatened their livelihoods. Other figures, such as John the Apostle, were reported to have taken Mary, the mother of Jesus, to Ephesus, and a small chapel dedicated to her celebrates Mass on August 15, which is believed to be her Ascension Day. The author of the biblical book of Revelation, writing from the Isle of Patmos off the Turkish coast, addressed his words to the seven churches of Asia, all in Anatolia: Ephesus, Izmir, Pergamum, Sardis, Philadelphia, Laodicea, and Thyatira.

The Ecumenical Council of Nicea of 325 C.E. proved a major milestone in developing Christian doctrine. Five years later, the emperor Constantine dedicated the city of Byzantium as a new Rome. He was a death-bed convert to Christianity, and his new holy city, Constantinople, would be the seat of the Roman Empire. Eventually, the metropolitan of Constantinople would be given a higher status than those in other Mediterranean cities (Jerusalem, Antioch, Alexandria, and Rome), thus foreshadowing the Great Schism of 1054, when the Roman Catholic Church and Eastern Orthodoxy split. While the barbarians across the Mediterranean were laying siege and weakening Rome, Constantinople thrived. Emperor Justinian (527–565) reconquered the Balkans, Italy, Anatolia, Egypt, and North Africa, while embellishing the architectural structures of the Byzantine Empire. The Church of Holy Wisdom, or St. Sophia, in Constantinople became the most highly acclaimed church in Christendom, unrivaled for a thousand years.

A man prays during Ramadan in Istanbul, Turkey (K.Adlard/TRIP)

By the late thirteenth century, Byzantine rule had declined in power. Within fifty years of the Prophet Muhammad's death, a new religion founded in Saudi Arabia and called Islam (submission to God's will) had conquered all of Anatolia and threatened the walls of Constantinople (669– 678 C.E.). Muhammad, the prophet of this new religion, died and was succeeded by caliphs (deputies) whose job was to ensure the welfare of Islam. Two great dynasties emerged: the Umayyads (661–750), based in Damascus; and the Abbasids (750–1100), who ruled from Baghdad. Both challenged the Christians of Byzantium.

The Great Seljuk Turkish Empire (1037–1109), based in Persia, was a catalyst for the decline of Anatolia. In 1071, Seljuk armies defeated the Byzantine force at Manzikert and captured their emperor. They subsequently took most of Turkey and established a capital near Nicea. They ruled what are now Iran, Iraq, and Turkey, developed beautiful architectural designs, and produced the noted poet Omar Kayyam (d. 1123). Celaleddin Rumi (1207–1273), or "Mevlana," founder of the Mevlevi Whirling Dervish order of Sufis, made the century's outstanding contribution to religious poetry and mysticism.

Byzantine culture was weakened by the assertion of Islam. However, the fatal blow to its glory occurred from fellow Christians during the Fourth Crusade (1202–1204). A disheveled European Christian army invaded and plundered Constantinople, doing irreparable damage. While the Byzantines were attempting to recover, legions of Turks running before the Mongols took over areas of the Marmara and Aegean coasts. Under Sultan Suleyman the Magnificent (1520–1566), these Turks conquered Constantinople (1453) and established the Ottoman Empire. Suleyman also attempted to incorporate Europe in the Ottoman Empire. His successors were finally defeated at Vienna in 1529. As they conquered new territories, the Ottoman sultans placed the religious leadership of each community of non-Turks (including the Orthodox patriarch in Constantinople and the chief rabbi) in political positions responsible directly to the sultan.

During the early nineteenth century, subject peoples revolted against Ottoman rule. In 1832, the Kingdom of Greece was formed as the Romanians, Bulgarians, Armenians, Arabs, and Albanians successfully agitated for their freedom. European powers watched as the debilitated empire began to come apart. France and England stood ready to occupy and annex the Ottoman territories, using religion as the excuse: to protect Catholic, Protestant, or Orthodox subjects from the Islamic Turks.

The empire sided with Germany in World War I and lost. The last blow to the weakened dynasty was dealt when Greek armies invaded Turkey and the Turkish War for Independence (1920–1922) began. Turks repelled the invading armies under General Mustafa Kemal (1881–1938). The charismatic Kemal took control as the empire collapsed. He abolished both the sultanate and the Islamic caliphate. Treaties from World War I were renegotiated. As a result, 1.5 million Greeks in Turkey returned to Greece, and Turks in Greece were brought back to Anatolia. Earlier turmoil (1915–1917) had seen 600,000 Armenians and Chaldeans massacred before they could leave the country. Now the survivors emigrated rapidly, and the number of Christians in Turkey dropped drastically.

Kemal established a republic in 1923, and a secular constitution was adopted in 1924. Islam was removed as the state religion and all mystical orders were abolished. Wearing the fez and polygamy were outlawed. A new Latin alphabet was designed, and Persian and Arabic words were purged from the Turkish language. The Gregorian calendar replaced both the Muslim and the older Julian calendars. In 1930, Constantinople was renamed Istanbul. In 1934, women obtained the right to vote. By then, Kemal had become Atatürk, or Father Turk. He ruled by fiat through the Republican Peoples Party until his death on November 10, 1938.

Turkey remained neutral during World War II. Years of postwar turmoil finally led the military to intercede in 1980 to stabilize the situation. Two major trajectories have continued to clash in modern Turkey: secular understanding and the ideal of a nonsecular world that supports the union of religion and state. Tensions rose as the modern Turkish state supplanted a traditional religiously ruled empire.

Heightened tensions followed the introduction of Western global and technical cultures. Modern Turkey exists between modernity and traditionalism.

Republican secularists abandoned the Islamic world, especially the habits of folk religion deemed superstitious or unscientific. Authorities also removed economic, political, and social roles from mosques. Religion was limited to personal choice instead of imposed by government mandate. At the same time, traditionalists saw these actions, symbolized by the change to the Western calendar, as an immediate danger to the supremacy of Islam. On a social level, cooperation and integration has not occurred between secularists and nonsecularists, leaving Turkey straddling two worlds and thus appearing religiously and secularly unstable.

Since Ottoman times, Sunni Islam, of the HANAFITE SCHOOL OF ISLAM, has been mainline religion, and it continues to be the most noticed and supported religious practice. Its precepts and ethos are based on the Qur'an and revelations of the Prophet Muhammad, and its jurisprudence on Hanafite precepts. These principles remain the unifying factor in a strident cultural identity. Concurrently, paradoxical practices of folk Islam include fortune-telling, astrology, divination, manipulation of spirits, sorcery, the wearing of amulets such as the Mediterranean eye, the circumcision of boys, and praying at the tombs of saints. Despite these deviations from the orthodox, Muslims acknowledge the primacy of an enduring piety in orthodoxy. It is paradoxical that even as Turkish secularism attempts to divorce religion and government, the Department of Religious Affairs (Diyanet) promotes Sunni Islam. About 15 percent of the population are SHI'A Muslims, considered heterodox by the Sunni majority, as are the small group of YEZIDIS near Diyarbakir.

Islam is not systematically organized in the manner of Western churches. There are no membership lists or formal bodies to petition for membership. Everyone born into a Muslim family is considered a Muslim unless they deny it. Turks carry national identity cards, and 99 percent of them state Islam as their religion. Secularists rarely change them. An inner sense of belonging is the criterion for inclusiveness. Turks normally do not ask about personal religious beliefs. Male circumcision is noncanonical, but it is ritually practiced with boys between the ages of seven and twelve.

A major factor in the social, ethnic, and political turmoil in Turkey is the question of what to do about the Kurds who live in eastern Turkey and in the mountains bordering Iraq. Kurdish populations wish to maintain their language, social customs, and mores. The official position of Turkey for some years was that these people are mountain Turks and that they should abide by the rules and laws of Turkey. Genocide and mass migration to Europe have caused their numbers to dwindle. The Kurds are primarily Sunnite, but many are Shi'a followers of ALEVISM. Turkey has no accurate statistics on these minority religious and ethnic groups who do not subscribe to mainstream Turkish tradition. There are also small numbers of Tahtacis and Ahl-el-Hak who are separatist groups but usually pass for Muslim.

Interior of the Blue Mosque, one of many temples of Islam in Turkey (Photodisc)

Islam is widely manifest in the form of folk piety. For example, Turks generally keep their Qur'ans in high places, as they are believed to provide protection against evil thoughts. Some time ago it was believed that to carry a small Qur'an would also ward off bullets. Today, those who carry them do so above the waist. Many write and then sew verses from the Qur'an into their clothing for spiritual healing. Reciting a verse before bedtime may protect the home from burglars, and before traveling is considered a good omen. Children recite verses to protect them when alone or when they find themselves in atypical situations.

There are pious expressions peppered throughout Turkish speech patterns. Inshallah means "if Allah wills" and can be used in the positive as a salutation or departure term, or when negativity is present. Mashallah praises Allah and means "O, what Allah has willed" and is used consistently in daily life. The besmele—"I begin in the name of Allah, the most merciful, the most compassionate"—is normative for canonical prayer and is used before any day-to-day activities. Every call to prayer starts with the tekbir phrase Allahu Akbar: "It is Allah who is magnificent." The expression Ya

Allah—"O, Allah"—is used when changing position from something passive to active. Today, some secularists attempt to strip the Turkish language of religious connotations, while others consider greetings such as aley kum selam—"May the peace, health and security of Allah be with you"—to be normative for verbal interchange.

Prayer beads are widely used, especially with Sufi groups. Other groups use them also as "worship using the fingers." The repetitive verses calling on Allah, zikir, find confirmation that each prayer has been recited thirty-three times. Some people carry beads to handle when worried, and that cultural routine is not religious but comforting in a secular way.

Some people wear the blue "evil eye" bead or attach it to Turkish belongings. At times, the Mashallah, which means "O, what Allah has willed," accompanies it. The bead is a form of folk religion that wards off the evil eye. Some people are thought to have the propensity to gaze at others and inadvertently harm them, although they themselves are well-meaning people. Villagers cover the faces of beautiful babies, or tie sacks around the udders of milk cows when outdoors to protect the production of milk from the evil eye. This evil eye figure predates Islam and the immigration of Turkish-speaking peoples in the Middle East.

Where folk traditions predominate, one also finds shamans. The shaman, or hodja, is believed to be gifted with metaphysical powers. When Islam is used as the format for divining procedures, the hodja is called a Muslim shaman. People for whom contemporary medicine and psychology have failed frequently turn to the hodjas.

The idea of receiving knowledge about a certain circumstance through dreaming is believed to have been taught by Muhammad. There are Muslims who live by their dreams and perform acts of ablution as preparation for dreaming, because ritual impurity negates the authenticity of the dreamer. Atatürk took severe action against hodjas and mediums, sometimes jailing them. Today, folk practices are common, and there are many secularized people who take horoscopes, evil eye beads, and the work of hodjas quite seriously.

At the beginning of World War I, Christians made up about 20 percent of the Turkish population. In 1914 the Roman Catholics had four archdioceses and sixteen dioceses. The shuffling of populations, emigrations, and especially the mass execution of Armenians significantly reduced the Christian presence. The majority of Christians are Orthodox, though they are scattered in different jurisdictions. The See of the ECUMENICAL PATRIARCHATE is in Istanbul. He has status and prestige but is without power to intervene in Turkish matters. He has few followers in Turkey proper, his status coming from his far-flung international jurisdiction, which includes the Greek Orthodox in all of the non-Orthodox countries of Europe, the Greek islands of the Aegean Sea, Mount Athos, Crete, and the Americas.

The GREEK ORTHODOX PATRIARCHATE OF ANTIOCH AND ALL THE EAST has five congregations in Turkey; the BULGARIAN ORTHODOX CHURCH has two churches and an exarch in Istanbul; the RUSSIAN ORTHODOX CHURCH has a congregation in Istanbul; and the SERBIAN ORTHODOX CHURCH has a small membership in the country. Non-Chalcedon Oriental Orthodox are separated into two distinct communities, the ARMENIAN APOSTOLIC CHURCH and the SYRIAC ORTHODOX PATRIARCHATE OF ANTIOCH AND ALL THE EAST (Syro-Jacobite). Together they make up the bulk of the Christian population in Turkey, about 225,000 people. There is also a minuscule Turkish Orthodox Church, the result of a largely unsuccessful attempt to create an indigenous national Orthodoxy separate from the Ecumenical Patriarchate.

The ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH has dioceses representing its several rites—Latin, Armenian, Chaldean, Syrian, and Byzantine. Most Latin Catholics live near Istanbul, Izmir, and Ankara. Most of the Chaldeans are clustered near the Iraqi border. Small numbers of Catholics of the Byzantine rite are divided between Rome and the patriarchal Vicariate of Istanbul. There are about twenty-eight thousand Catholics in Turkey.

A new wave of Protestant Christian missionary work began with the arrival of William Goodall of the AMERICAN BOARD OF COMMISSIONERS FOR FOREIGN MISSIONS in Istanbul in 1831. However, most Turkish converts came not from Islam but from the older Christian populations. The CHURCH MISSIONARY SOCIETY, the BASEL MISSION, and the SOCIETY FOR THE PROPAGATION OF THE GOSPEL IN FOREIGN PARTS had abandoned Istanbul by the 1870s on account of an inhospitable environment for religious conversion. Later the American Baptists, the CHRISTIAN CHURCH (DISCIPLES OF CHRIST), the CHURCH OF THE BROTHERS, British Quakers, and the London Jews Society retired from missionizing indigenous Turks. In 1970 the United Church had eighty-four missionaries in Turkey attempting to help the people without proselytizing. Most of the missionaries are based in Istanbul. The American Academy for Girls has about eighteen missionaries assigned to the American College at Izmir. The British and Foreign Bible Society were responsible for translations of Scripture into Turkish. The American Congregationalists established Roberts College, north of Istanbul, in 1871; in 1961 it was given over to the Turkish government, renamed Bosphorus University, and today is a premier institution of higher education and flagship for the Turkish university system.

German Lutherans and British Anglicans (under the CHURCH OF ENGLAND's Diocese of Europe) have parishes in Ankara, Izmir, and Ankara. They have a very small presence of two thousand people. They serve expatriates, the U.S. military, and diplomatic communities. Turks do not have memberships in these groups. Various Protestant and Free Church groups have opened missions in Turkey through the twentieth century. However, their success has been marginal.

An indigenous Jewish population of thirty-five thousand, most of them Sephardic Jews, live near Istanbul. There has been a Jewish community in Turkey since ancient times, though its makeup was changed by the addition of a number of Jews who were expelled from Spain and Portugal at the end of the fifteenth century. Their numbers have dwindled since 1948, when many decided to immigrate to Israel. Unity for the Jewish community is provided by the Great Rabbi, who resides in Istanbul.

The number of spiritual assemblies of the BAHÁ'Í FAITH has expanded rapidly through the 1990s, and Bahá'ís now number about one thousand. There is a small Buddhist presence, but Islam remains the majority religion, with more than 85 percent of the population; those who profess no religion approach 10 percent. Little shift in these numbers is expected in the near future.

Gail M. Harley

Sources:

Frazer, C. A. Catholics and Sultans: The Church and the Ottoman Empire, 1453–1923. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1983.

Garnett, L. M. J. Mysticism and Magic in Turkey. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons, 1912.

Tapper, R., ed. Islam in Modern Turkey: Religion, Politics and Literature in a Secular State. London: St. Martin's, 1994.

Turkmenistan

Turkmenistan, a central Asian republic on the Caspian Sea directly north of Iran, was the reward of numerous conquerors, from Alexander the Great's Greek Empire to the Arabs. Modern Turkmens are a relatively later product of the mixing of the Oguz Turks with several of the groups who had long inherited the region. That mixing occurred in the eleventh through the fifteenth centuries.

In the nineteenth century, Turkmenia was conquered by Russia and was incorporated into Bukhara and Khuva, two Russian protectorates. Resistance to Russian domination was fierce, and only in 1881 was all the country pacified. In spite of efforts to break with Russia at the time of the revolution, Turkmenistan was incorporated into the Soviet Union, and the Soviet Socialist Republic of Turkmenistan was created in 1924. The republic actually brought some political unity that had often been denied as parts of the country changed hands and fell under various regimes over the centuries.

Turkmenistan finally emerged as an independent country in 1991. It is the least democratic of the governments of the former Soviet republics, now being under the leadership of strongman Saparmurat Niyasov. In 1994 the government created the Council on Religious Affairs to provide oversight of the religious (primarily Muslim) community.

Islam came to Turkmenia in the 650s, when the Arab caliphate expanded into Central Asia under Uthman (644–656) and remained a part of the subsequent Umayyid and Abbasid caliphates. The Mongols invaded early in the thirteenth century, and over the next hundred years they were converted to Islam. Suppressed through the Soviet years, the Islamic community was revived in the 1980s and has done well under the independent government established in the 1990s. From four mosques operating in the country in 1987, several hundred are now open.

Beginning in the mid-1990s, however, steps have been taken by the government to ensure that Muslim organiza-

Status of religions in Turkmenistan, 2000-2050

Followers	2000			2025	2050
	total	%	rate
Muslims	3,888,000	87.2	2.50	5,918,000	7,457,000
Nonreligious	401,000	9.0	-0.35	250,000	150,000
Christians	102,000	2.3	-1.69	93,000	90,000
Orthodox	74,600	1.7	-2.70	70,000	60,000
Independents	19,000	0.4	3.48	12,000	14,000
Protestants	2,800	0.1	0.00	5,000	7,000
Atheists	64,000	1.4	-3.35	20,000	10,000
Jews	2,800	0.1	0.71	2,000	2,000
Baha'is	960	0.0	1.88	2,000	4,000
Ethnoreligionists	740	0.0	1.46	1,000	1,200
Buddhists	630	0.0	1.94	900	1,200
Total population	4,459,000	100.0	1.97	6,287,000	7,715,000

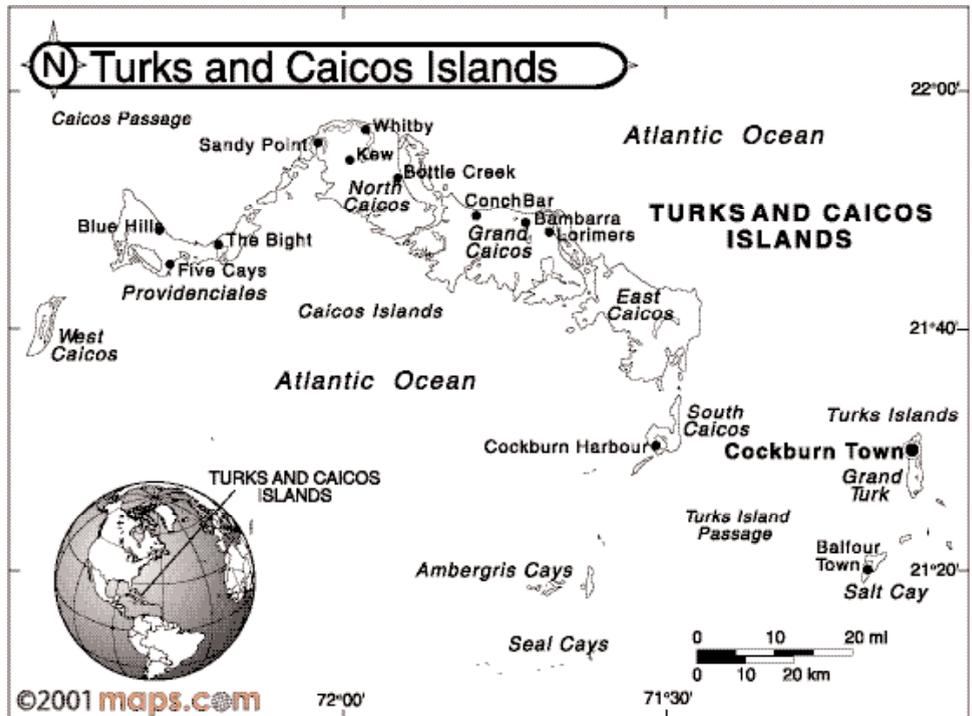

tions do not become centers of political protest. The government began to take control of Muslim schools for clergy training, frustrated the effort to form an Islamic political party, and restricted the printing and distribution of religious literature. The government has been especially attentive to any suggestion that an Islamic government should replace the present secular one. In 2000, Niyasov ordered the burning of four thousand copies of the Qur'an, copies that the government had paid to have printed, ostensibly because of the inaccuracy of the translation. The translator had made some public criticisms of Niyasov's un-Islamic activities.

A small Christian presence was established in Turkmenistan during the years of Russian dominance. A small RUSSIAN ORTHODOX CHURCH presence remains. It is part of the single diocese that covers Uzbekistan, Turkmenistan, Tajikistan, and Kyrgyzstan. There are a number of Armenians who reside in Turkmenistan, and they have organized the ARMENIAN APOSTOLIC CHURCH (HOLY SEE OF ECHMIADZIN). Protestants entered the country in the 1890s when I. K. Saval'ev, a Baptist, moved from Vladikavkas (Russia) and F. S. Ovsyannikov, a Mennonite, moved from Samatria Province to Ashkhabad. Two years later the two established a village, Kuropatkinsky, some twenty kilometers from Ashkhabad, where the first church was erected. Later a church was opened in Ashkhabad. This church became the target of Soviet authorities in the 1930s. The Baptist movement remains small in Turkmenistan, there being only three congregations in the 1990s. These congregations have joined with the Union of Evangelical Christian-Baptists of Central Asia, an association founded in 1992 that also includes the churches in Uzbekistan and Tajikistan.

Sources:

Hayit, B. Islam and Turkestan under Russian Rule. Istanbul: Privately printed, 1987.
 Wingate, Reginald. The Steep Ascent: The Story of the Christian Church in Turkestan. London: British and Foreign Bible Society, n.d.

Status of religions in the Turks & Caicos Islands, 2000-2050

Followers	2000		2025	2050
	total	% rate
Christians	15,300	91.6	3.65	30,600
Protestants	8,100	48.4	3.06	16,300
Anglicans	2,000	11.9	2.26	3,500
Independents	2,000	11.9	4.24	5,000
Nonreligious	830	5.0	5.24	2,100
Spiritists	430	2.6	4.43	750
Baha'is	130	0.8	3.67	250
Atheists	20	0.1	5.45	60
Total population	16,800	100.0	3.79	33,800

Turks and Caicos Islands

The Turks and Caicos Islands are two Caribbean island chains located north of Haiti and southeast of the Bahamas. They were originally inhabited by the Arawak people, and there is research to suggest that it was on one of these islands that Columbus first touched the soil of the New World in 1492. The islands did not face European colonization until 1678, when the British moved in. During the next century the islands faced a common history of the destruction of the Arawak society, the importation of slaves to work plantations, and battles with the French and Spanish. British dominion was firmly established by 1787. Rule was administered from the Bahamas until 1848. Then, in 1874, the islands became a dependency of Jamaica until 1962, after which they again became a separate British colony. They became autonomous by steps, with direct involvement of the British government ending in 1988. The islands remain in the British Commonwealth.

The traditional religion of the Arawak people was destroyed with the people in the eighteenth century. Christianity entered the islands as the Church of England followed British settlement. It was established in the middle of the eighteenth century and now claims approximately 20 percent of the islands' relatively small population. The churches are included in the CHURCH IN THE PROVINCE OF THE WEST INDIES.

Baptists have had the most success, their work having originated from the British Baptist Union's missionary activity in Jamaica. Baptists from the JAMAICA BAPTIST UNION came to Turks and Caicos in the middle of the nineteenth century. They soon outstripped the Methodists, now the second largest group in the islands, who had come in 1800 as part of the last stages of their spread through the islands that began in 1787. Their work was later incorporated into the METHODIST CHURCH IN THE CARIBBEAN AND THE AMERICAS.

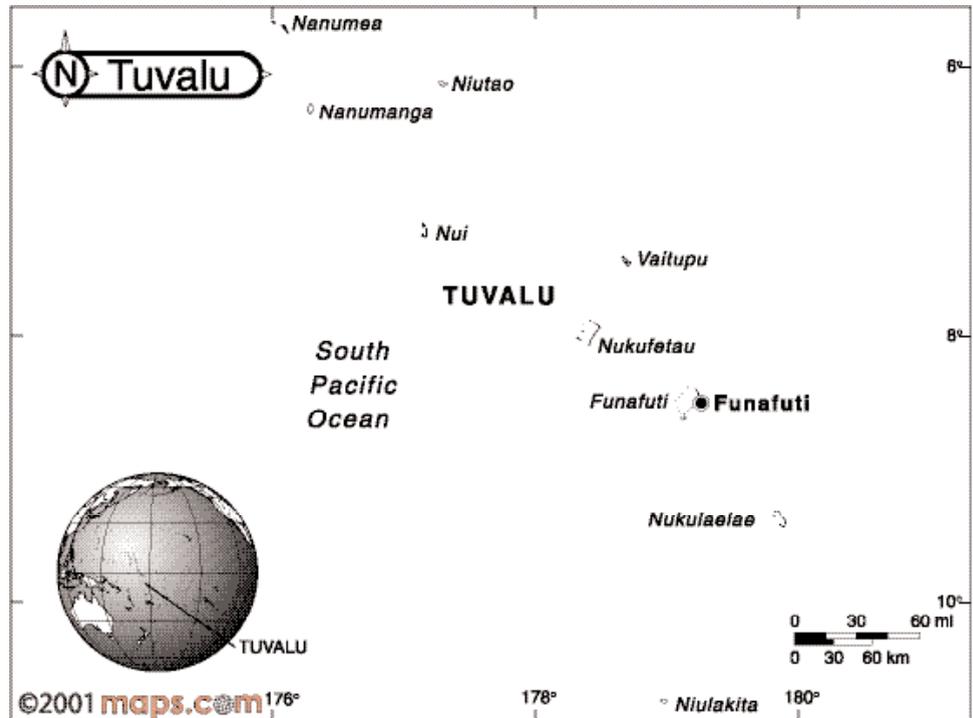

Through the twentieth century, a spectrum of Protestant/Free Churches came to the islands (BAPTIST BIBLE FELLOWSHIP INTERNATIONAL, CHURCH OF GOD OF PRO-PHECY, and the SEVENTH-DAY ADVENTIST CHURCH). The CHURCH OF GOD IN CHRIST, an African American Pentecostal church, has established a small presence, as have the enthusiastic SPIRITUAL BAPTISTS. The ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH has a minimal presence.

Sources:

- Barrett, David. The Encyclopedia of World Christianity. 2d ed. New York: Oxford University Press, 2001.
- Smith, Hosay. A History of Turks and Caicos Islands. Hamilton, Bermuda: Self-published, 1968.

Tuvalu

Tuvalu is a South Sea island republic located between Fiji and Kiribati. Tuvalu was settled by Polynesians several thousand years ago, most likely by migration from Tonga and Samoa. The Tuvaluans first came into contact with Europeans as early as the sixteenth century, and at some point the islands were named the Ellice Islands. However, between 1850 and 1875 they were targeted by slavers, and the majority of the islands' residents were taken to Peru and Chile to work in the mines. The slave trade was stopped only upon effective settlement by the British and the establishment of a Christian mission. In 1892 the British established a protectorate over the islands, and in 1915 incorporated them into the new colony of the Gilbert (now Kiribati) and Ellice Islands.

The islands began the process of independence with a referendum in 1974. Independence became a fact in 1978. A parliamentary system modeled on the United Kingdom was installed. The new nation retained close ties to England.

The LONDON MISSIONARY SOCIETY (LMS) launched a very successful mission in Samoa, and in 1861 Samoan missionaries arrived in the Ellice Islands. They were joined in 1870 by J. S. White, a LMS missionary. Over the next three decades, the three thousand island residents were converted to Congregational Christianity. As a result, the traditional religion (already severely weakened by the losses to the slave trade) disappeared. This work matured into the CHURCH OF TUVALU, which retains the allegiance of more than 90 percent of the islands' residents.

The only other churches operating in the islands are the SEVENTH-DAY ADVENTIST CHURCH, which began work in

Followers	2000			2025	2050
	total	%	rate
Christians	10,500	89.3	2.66	18,000	23,800
Protestants	12,000	102.4	2.83	20,500	27,000
Marginal Christians	290	2.5	3.79	600	800
Independents	250	2.1	5.24	500	750
Nonreligious	600	5.1	4.07	1,200	1,600
Baha'is	580	5.0	3.79	1,400	2,000
Atheists	70	0.6	3.27	80	120
Buddhists	10	0.1	10.84	20	30
Total population	11,700	100.0	2.80	20,700	27,600

the 1950s in the Gilbert Islands, and the ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH. The Catholic Church had been prevented from operating in the islands until 1964, but today it has several congregations. There is also a small BAHÁ'Í FAITH presence in Tuvalu.

Sources:

- Forman, Charles H. The Island Churches of the South Pacific: Emergence in the Twentieth Century. Maryknoll, NY: Orbis, 1982.
- Kofe, L. The Tuvalu Church: A Socio-Historical Survey of Its Development towards an Indigenous Church. B.D. project, Pacific Theological College, 1976.

Twelve Tribes

The Twelve Tribes Messianic Communities are a utopian and millenarian Christian communal fellowship that emerged from the Jesus People Revival in 1972 under the leadership of Elbert Eugene ("Gene") Spriggs, whom community members consider an apostle, and his wife, Marsha. Through the years, as the community has evolved it has occasionally changed its name, a reflection of its development. In recent years it has been known as the Messianic Communities and the Northeast Kingdom Community Church.

Members of the Twelve Tribes adopt Hebrew names and consider themselves as part of the Commonwealth of Israel forming in the last days, bound together by the New Covenant in Messiah's Blood (Ephesians 2:12). The communities have evolved a distinct culture around their craftsmanship and handiwork. They also have evolved their own devotional music and dance forms.

Spriggs, the son of a factory quiller and scoutmaster, was born in Chattanooga, Tennessee, and grew up in the Methodist Church. In 1971 he became involved in the Jesus Movement through Marineth Chapel and Center Theater in Glendale, California. Returning to Tennessee, he and his wife opened their residence in East Ridge, a suburb of Chattanooga, and attracted a variety of young spiritual seekers. As a group formed, they copied the early Christian pattern of sharing all things in common (Acts 2:37–47). The group also opened the Yellow Deli, a health-food bakery and sandwich restaurant. They prepared whole-grain bread, which symbolized the Gospel of Jesus—the real spiritual food in contrast to the lifeless “White Bread Jesus” found in mainline churches. Eventually they rejected conventional religion and began developing their own worship, gathering on Friday evenings to welcome the Sabbath and on Saturday to break bread and celebrate the Messiah's resurrection.

They made contact with a Christian fellowship in Island Pond, Vermont, that wished to emulate their communal life, and in 1979 the group sold their property and moved north. In Chattanooga the households had been centralized, but in Island Pond they formed independent communes, each household specializing in its own cottage industry. Many members left after the first winter, but the group opened up the Common Sense Restaurant and attracted new members.

The Twelve Tribes accept the basic affirmation of traditional Christianity, but also include various theological innovations concerning communal living, marriage, and eschatology. They also have been influenced by the Sacred Name movement and have adopted the Hebrew designation for Jesus (Yahshua). As their theology has developed, more has been discerned concerning the community's role in the last days, their relationship to Yahshua, and levels of salvation after Judgment. The communities define themselves as the lost and scattered tribes of the ancient Jews undergoing restoration in preparation for eternal life. They believe that their community is undergoing a process of purification as the “pure and Spotless Bride” awaiting her Bridegroom, and that it will probably take three generations to be ready for the Second Coming. By increasing their ranks through conversions and childbearing, they are “raising up a people” in preparation for the Jubilee horn that heralds the return of Yahshua. The group condemns abortion and homosexuality and supports monogamy, premarital chastity, and home schooling.

Since relocating in Island Pond the group has also developed an elaborate ritual life. Public “gatherings” are held on Friday and Saturday night (the Jewish Sabbath and the eve of the First Day) that feature circle dancing, devotional songs, spontaneous speaking, and stories for the children. The public is also invited to their weddings, which dramatize the community's millenarian expectations: the Bride, representing the Community, prepares herself for the call of the groom, her “King.”

Some fifteen hundred people are involved with the movement, of whom roughly half are children. There are fourteen associated communities in the United States and additional communities in Argentina, Brazil, France, Germany, Spain, Australia, New Zealand, the United Kingdom, and Canada. The majority of members still reside in New England, mainly in Vermont or in the Boston area. In 1993 the community in Island Pond, Vermont, numbered fifteen households. By 1994 it had shrunk to five, as families moved to Bellows Falls, Rutland, and Burlington in Vermont, as well as to Rhode Island and Hyannis, Massachusetts, in order to set up new communities.

Each local community is “covered” by a council of male elders (one from each household). Under the elders is an informal hierarchy of teachers, deacons, deaconesses, and shepherds. Women wear head scarves “in church” or at the “gatherings” and meetings to demonstrate their submission to their husbands and the male elders, who, in turn, are “covered” by “Our Master.” The Spriggs, childless and with no fixed abode, travel among the communities offering counsel and inspiration. Evangelism is carried on by contact with individuals whom they meet through their businesses and the distribution of their periodical, the Twelve Tribes Freepaper.

The Twelve Tribes have been attacked by anticultists ever since the founding of communes in Chattanooga, but they experienced a new level of conflict beginning in 1984 with accusations of child abuse in the community. In that year the Vermont State Police, armed with a court order and accompanied by fifty Social Services workers, raided the Island Pond Community homes and took 112 children into custody. Several days later a district judge ruled that the search warrant issued by the state was unconstitutional, and all the children were returned to their parents. Child custody disputes and investigations by Social Services continue, however, partly because of the influence of the anticult movement and several former members. The group's commitment to their biblically based disciplinary practices is the primary focus of concern. Parents are instructed to discipline children who do not obey upon “first command” with a thin, flexible “reed-like” rod (as mentioned in Proverbs 23:13) so as to inflict pain but not injury. No evidence has been produced to substantiate the accusations of child abuse against the group, though these have been repeated for more than fifteen years.

Since the raid the group has attempted to cooperate with state authorities and has made efforts to reach out to neighbors in trying to foster better understanding. On June 25, 1994, the church held a ten-year anniversary celebration “to commemorate [our] deliverance from the 1984 Island Pond Raid.” Many of those 112 children, now in their teens and twenties, shared their traumatic memories of the raid, again denied allegations of abuse, and declared their allegiance toward their parents and their community.

Address:

Twelve Tribes
2243 Dorchester Ave.
Lower Mills, MA 12124
<http://www.TwelveTribes.com>

Susan Palmer

Sources:

Nori, Don. “Persecution at Island Pond.” Charisma 10, 4
(November 1984).

Palmer, Susan J. Moon Sisters, Krishna Mothers, Rajneesh Lovers: Women’s Roles in New Religions. Syracuse, NY: University of Syracuse Press, 1996.

Swantko, Jean A. An Issue of Control: Conflict between the Church in Island Pond and State Government. Palenville, NY: Privately printed, 1998.

UFO Religions

The term UFO Religion refers to a group of extremely diverse, predominantly but not exclusively small Western, religious groups with one thing in common: they have a distinctly religious understanding of what may be broadly termed “the myth of the flying saucer,” and the accompanying legends of human intercourse with extraterrestrial beings.

In essence little can be said about these religions that does not apply to most religions in general. Religious leadership, rituals, sacred texts, myths, social structures, and the like are typologically no different from what we find in most spiritual groups outside society’s larger religious tradition(s). Sometimes the UFO aspect appears simply as an attachment to well-known religious representations—for instance, when UFOs are considered vehicles of Theosophical Masters from Venus who, in traditional Theosophy, live in Tibet and do not use that kind of transportation. In general, the UFO perspective forms a part of syncretic belief systems.

No UFO cult predates the flying saucer rumors that hit the public imagination around the beginning of the cold war in the summer of 1947. As it appears, the strange aerial objects that were allegedly seen by more and more people could not be explained to everyone’s satisfaction. At a certain point it was suggested that they were spaceships from other worlds, and soon the first “contactee,” George Adamski (1891–1965), who claimed to have met with space people in the Californian desert, met his audience. He was soon to be followed by numerous major and minor UFO prophets, each with his (and occasionally her) special message from beings from other planets.

It is debatable whether the general belief in extraterrestrial visitation should be considered a religious idea. However, it is quite obvious that this belief very often takes the shape of genuine religious faith. It is therefore appropriate to distinguish between the broader public imagination and the beliefs expressed in the actual UFO religions.

UFO religions are directly inspired by dominant features of the modern, technologically advanced world. Science, technology, space travel, fears of atomic war, computers, pollution of the natural world, and the like are among the themes incorporated, and thus dealt with, in religious UFO narratives. The occupants of the UFOs are understood to be superhuman beings, bringers of all good to people on Earth. The UFO cults are distinctively modern in the sense that they interpret typical aspects of the modern world into their religious apparatus.

UFO religions are usually inspired by ideology perpetuated through the THEOSOPHICAL SOCIETY (ADYAR), and most leaders of such groups are known to have been engaged in different kinds of modern spirituality prior to their UFO-related work. Well-known examples are George King (1919–1997), who founded the Aetherius Society in 1954; Ruth (1900–1993) and Ernest Norman (1904–1971), who headed UNARIUS (estab. 1954); Charles Boyd Benzel, the original founder of Mark Age (1960); George Van Tassel (1910–1970), who founded the Ministry of Universal Wisdom; and on the fringe of what may be termed religious UFO groups, George Adamski, who built up the International Get Acquainted Program (IGAP) in 1958.

The basic idea in these groups is the need for humans on Earth to grow spiritually and eventually to align with peoples from other worlds who are already united in a Cosmic Brotherhood. The leader(s) of the group will usually claim to be in personal contact with the space people or higher beings, either man to man (being to being) or by means of telepathy. Other groups, though, have quite a different heritage. The RAELIAN MOVEMENT (INTERNATIONAL), for instance, draws heavily on Jewish-Christian traditions, claiming that what the Bible recollects in fact is the story of how a group of extraterrestrials some twenty-two thousand years ago created life on Earth by means of hyper-advanced biotechnology. The leader of the group, Rael (born Claude Vorilhon in France in 1945), who was allegedly approached by the extraterrestrials in 1973, is identified as a prophet and a messiah succeeding the biblical characters. Another UFO cult, Heaven’s Gate, which met its sad destruction in a collective suicide in San Diego in 1997, had developed its own rare belief system urging believers to aim at “The Evolutionary Level Above Human” (TELAH).

In all, some twenty-five different UFO religions may be active today. Further, a line of other religions have incorporated belief in UFOs into their theologies. Certain Evangelical groups, for instance, believe UFOs to represent satanic forces, while other Christian groups, such as THE FAMILY, believe them to be associated with angels. UFO-like notions are also found in the CHURCH OF SCIENTOLOGY’s belief system. Finally, of course, religious interpretations of the UFO-narrative are important to the NEW AGE MOVEMENT.

Mikael Rothstein

Sources:

Clarke, David, and Andy Roberts. Phantoms of the Sky: UFOs—A Modern Myth. London: Robert Hale, 1990.

Evans, Hilary. From Other Worlds: The Truth behind Aliens, Abductions, UFOs and the Paranormal. London: Carlton, 1998.

Lewis, James R., ed. The Gods Have Landed: New Religions from Other Worlds. New York: State University of New York Press, 1995.

Uganda

Inhabited for millennia, Uganda emerges on the historical stage in the tenth century C.E. with evidence of an urban civilization. In the thirteenth century the area was invaded by Bacwezi people who subdued the resident Bantu people. After settling in, they created a number of fortresses that protected their cattle, the key to their wealth and power. Through succeeding centuries, some of the groups of the region were oriented eastward toward Zanzibar and others northward through the Nile Valley to Sudan and Egypt. In the seventeenth century, Islam began to spread into Uganda.

The history of the region was changed by the movement through the area of David Livingstone (1813–1873), the fabled missionary of the LONDON MISSIONARY SOCIETY. Out of communication with the West for some years, in 1875 he became the object of a highly publicized search by reporter Henry Stanley (1841–1904). Upon his return to England, Stanley denounced the spread of Islam farther south, and he occasioned the sending of missionaries. In 1888 the Imperial British East Africa Company set up a trading enterprise.

British influence in the area was solidified in 1886, when it received European recognition for the establishment of a protectorate, formerly put in place in 1893. British control lasted until 1962, when independent Uganda came into being. The land reform program of the new government met opposition from the forty thousand Indian expatriates in the country who controlled much of the commercial activity. Following the coup that brought Idi Amin to power in 1971, many of the Indians were expelled from the country. Amin's bloody regime was ended when he prompted war with neighboring Tanzania by attempting to annex some of its territory.

The return of economic and political stability in the 1980s was hindered by a guerrilla-led civil war that ended only after a coup at the end of 1985. After seizing power,

Status of religions in Uganda, 2000-2050

Followers	2000			2025	2050
	total	%	rate
Christians	19,321,000	88.7	3.01	40,900,000	60,866,000
Roman Catholics	9,130,000	41.9	2.99	19,000,000	28,500,000
Anglicans	8,580,000	39.4	3.01	18,400,000	27,500,000
Independents	815,000	3.7	4.46	2,100,000	3,650,000
Muslims	1,137,000	5.2	2.32	2,076,000	2,200,000
Ethnoreligionists	954,000	4.4	1.28	700,000	600,000
Hindus	174,000	0.8	2.82	365,000	550,000
Nonreligious	110,000	0.5	3.22	300,000	500,000
Baha'is	66,500	0.3	-5.73	60,000	80,000
Atheists	10,200	0.1	2.50	25,000	40,000
Jews	2,300	0.0	1.32	3,200	4,800
Jains	2,000	0.0	1.93	5,000	8,000
Sikhs	1,100	0.0	-0.51	1,000	1,000
Total population	21,778,000	100.0	2.84	44,435,000	64,850,000

Yoweri Museveni attempted to re-create an orderly situation in a country that was heavily in debt and is still beset with poverty. He has stood for election on several occasions, most recently in May 2001, when he received 69 percent of the vote.

Traditional religions are still practiced in Uganda, but they now can count less than 5 percent of the people among their adherents. Among the groups that have retained a sizable percentage of traditionalists are the Ganda, the largest group in the country. The Ganda have a sophisticated theology that poses the existence of a pantheon of deities headed by a Supreme Being (Katonda) and his family, including Nalwanga (wife), Wanga (grandfather), Mususi (father), and Kibuka (brother). The many deities that surround Katonda serve as intermediaries between Him and human beings, and each is given charge over an aspect of the cosmos of importance to human life (from childbirth to hunting).

The meaningful push of Islam into Uganda began in the mid-nineteenth century. It flowed in from the north (Sudan) and east (Tanzania). Inadvertently, the British encouraged Islam by their use of Muslims as bureaucrats and translators. The community was expanded by the inclusion of Muslims among the Indians who assumed responsibility for developing Uganda's commercial life. Indian Muslims brought SHI'A ISLAM, especially in its ISMAILI BOHRAS, Ithna-Ashari, and BOHRAS forms.

The AHMADIYYA MOVEMENT IN ISLAM arrived in 1921. Considered heretical, it nevertheless attempted to evangelize the Ugandan public, with some response. However, in the middle of the century it divided into three factions that have yet to reunite.

During his 1875 visit to Africa, Henry Stanley met a Ugandan ruler, Kabaka Mutesa I, who requested Christian missionaries to assist him in throwing back the encroachments of Islam, a distorted tale if not an outright fabrication. The CHURCH MISSIONARY SOCIETY's (CMS) first missionaries arrived in 1877. They found Dallington Maf-taa, an African preacher commissioned by Livingstone. All of the team, except its leader Alexander McKay, died within their first two years. McKay continued to work alone, and his steadfastness eventually paid off with converts and additional missionaries, who arrived in the 1890s. The Bible Churchmen's Missionary Society bolstered the CMS's efforts in 1921.

The Anglican work became the largest in the country, not counting that of the Roman Catholics, and it is structured today as the CHURCH OF THE PROVINCE OF UGANDA, set aside as an independent province in 1961. In 1965 the province elected Erica Sabiti as its primate, the first African to assume such a post. The African Inland Mission had added its strength to the small Anglican community in Uganda in 1918. It worked closely with the CHURCH OF ENGLAND, and eventually its missions/churches were integrated into the new province as its West Nile Diocese.

The ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH was introduced into Uganda in 1879. The brothers of the White Fathers found their way to the court of Kabaka Mutesa. Their subsequent missionary endeavor had an immediate impact. By 1912 there were more than 136,000 members, and the church now has more than seven million members. The first Ugandan priest was ordained in 1911, and the first bishop in 1939. In 1969 the church was encouraged by the visit of Pope Paul VI, whose talk emphasized the need to develop a truly African Christianity. Today the Catholic Church numbers in excess of nine million, more than 40 percent of the country's population.

The development of Christianity in Uganda has been marred by a number of horrendous events, beginning with the persecution of Muslims in 1875 and 1876 in which some seventy Muslim leaders were killed. In 1885 and 1886, between two hundred and three hundred Anglican and Catholic Christians were killed (an event marked by the Church of the Martyrs at Namugongo, erected by the Catholic Church). Most recently, in 2000, the Catholic Church was embarrassed when a group of former members who had formed a new organization, THE MOVEMENT FOR THE RESTORATION OF THE TEN COMMANDMENTS, committed a mass murder/suicide in the rural village of Kanungu. Some 780 died (including a number of members who had been murdered at other locations). The group appears to have been built around messages received by its leaders from the Virgin Mary.

Pentecostalism was introduced into Uganda in 1935 by the PENTECOSTAL ASSEMBLIES OF CANADA. Their mission (now known as the Pentecostal Assemblies of God) spread; other Pentecostal churches established missions, and new Ugandan Pentecostal bodies (such as the Church of the Redeemed) were created. Several hundred AFRICAN INITIATED (INDEPENDENT) CHURCHES now are active in Uganda, including the Charismatic Church of Uganda (founded by former Anglicans), the AFRICAN ISRAEL CHURCH, NINEVAH (from Kenya), and the Society of the One Almighty God.

The MRTC incident brought to light several obscure Ugandan apocalyptic and millenarian movements heretofore known only locally. For example, the Holy Spirit movement led by Alice Lakwena had engaged the government in a war that lasted more than a decade (from 1985 to 1996). Lakwena eventually fled Uganda and now lives in exile in Kenya. The Lord's Resistance Army, led by Joseph Kony (a distant relative of Lakwena's), is closely related to a rival group founded by Lakwena's father, Severino Lukoya. In the light of problems encountered among these groups, the government has moved to suppress what it perceives as prophetic movements: most recently, in 1999, the World Message Last Warning Church, founded by Wilson Bushara.

Apart from these smaller and more controversial groups, more traditional Christian bodies have entered Uganda and garnered a significant response, including the NEW APOSTOLIC CHURCH, the SEVENTH-DAY ADVENTIST CHURCH, and the CHURCH OF GOD (ANDERSON, INDIANA). There is also an Orthodox presence that originated in a schism among the Anglicans in the 1920s, now under the GREEK ORTHODOX PATRIARCHATE OF ALEXANDRIA AND ALL AFRICA. The Orthodox Church joined with the Anglicans and Catholics to found the Uganda Joint Christian Council in 1963. It is now affiliated with the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES. More conservative churches have formed the Uganda Association of Evangelicals, loosely associated with the WORLD EVANGELICAL ALLIANCE.

Hinduism was brought to Uganda by the Indian businessmen who settled in Africa throughout the twentieth century. They have built temples in Kampala and, though suppressed during the years of Idi Amin, have returned in strength and have spread throughout the country. There are close to a million adherents following a spectrum of Hindu forms. There are a very small number of Jains and Sikhs.

The BAHAI FAITH has had some of its greatest African response in Uganda. It had formed more than fifteen hundred spiritual assemblies, and Kampala was chosen as the site of its first African temple. However, Amin banned the movement, and the subsequent years of civil war and unrest almost destroyed it. Less than a hundred spiritual assemblies were active through the 1990s. However, there is every reason to believe that it will rebuild in the early decades of the new century.

Among the more interesting of Uganda's newer religious movements is the Abayudaya, a group which has practiced Judaism since 1919, when their leader, Semei Kakungulu, after his study and consideration of the Torah, began to observe the Mosaic law, including circumcision. In the intervening years, Western and Israeli Jews have visited Uganda and offered Kakungulu and his followers information on contemporary Judaism. The five hundred Abayudaya survived Idi Amin's conversion to Islam and anti-Semitism, and today they reside in four villages outside Mbale, Uganda.

Sources:

- Abidi, S. A. H., ed. The Role of Religious Organizations in the Development of Uganda. Kampala, Uganda: Foundation for African Development, 1991.
- Anderson, W. B., ed. Christianity in Contemporary Africa: Uganda. Kampala, Uganda: Department of Religious Studies and Philosophy, Makerere University, 1973.
- Behrend, Keike. La Guerre des esprits en Ouganda: Le mouvement du Saint-Esprit d'Alice Lakwena (1985–1996). Rev. ed. Paris: L'Harmattan, 1997.
- King, N. Q., A. Kasozi, and A. Oded. Islam and the Confluence of Religions in Uganda, 1840–1966. Tallahassee, FL: American Academy of Religion, 1973.
- Rutiba, E. T. Religions in Uganda, 1960–1990. Kampala, Uganda: Department of Religious Studies, Faculty of Arts, Makerere University, 1993.
- Taylor, John V. The Growth of the Church in Uganda: An Attempt at Understanding. London: SCM, 1958.

Ukraine

During the pre-Christian period, in what is now Ukraine, various forms of Paganism dominated among the Slavic and non-Slavic tribes that inhabited the region. Animism and belief in a Goddess-Mother was the main faith of the Cimmerians (ninth to seventh centuries B.C.E.); the gods Tabi, Papa, and Api were the primary deities in the pantheon of the Scythians (seventh to third centuries B.C.E.); the cult of the sun, fire, and the Great Goddess Astarta was deeply extended among Sarmatians (second century B.C.E. to fourth century C.E.); and a belief in ghosts and a variety of natural and social forces was characteristic of the faith among the Goths and the Gunnys (third to fifth centuries C.E.).

The distinctive paganism of the local Slavic population had developed on its own basis but in close interaction with non-Slavic influences. A few dozen gods and innumerable ghosts had formed the polytheistic system of Eastern-European Slavs, in which Perun (the god of lightning and rain), Dazhboh (the god of the sun), and Svaroh (the god of heaven and fire) headed the pantheon. Before the adoption of Christianity, Slavic polytheism appeared to be making a smooth transformation into henotheism with the most intensive worship directed toward Perun.

The first attempt to evangelize the Kyivan Rus was realized in 866 (or one or two years later) during the time of princes Ascold and Dir. Although this event did not leave any serious effects in the religious history of Ukraine, it was the first direct meeting with Byzantine Christianity (though previously the Kyivan Rus had had sporadic acquaintances with other Christian branches—Aryanism, Armenian Monophysitism, Manicheism, and even Nestorianism).

The official conversion of Eastern-European Slavic tribes to Christianity started after the mass baptizing of Kyivans in 988 under Great Prince Volodymyr (980–1015), who was later canonized and became one of the most popular local saints. As the conversion resulted from the efforts of priests from Constantinople, subsequent church history flowed out of the context of Eastern Christianity in general and the Byzantine tradition in particular. Since that time EASTERN ORTHODOXY has been the main spiritual institution in Ukraine. Its history can be divided into three main periods. For seven centuries (988–1686), the Kyivan metropolis was under the ECUMENICAL PATRIARCHATE in Constantinople; in 1696 it was incorporated into the RUSSIAN ORTHODOX CHURCH (MOSCOW PATRIARCHATE). In 1918 it began a period of struggle for independence from the Moscow Patriarchate.

During the first centuries following the official conversion of the Kyivan Rus, although influences of paganism had remained strong, Orthodoxy extended through all the land. The Orthodox Church became an obligatory and official institution in the country. It promoted the development of writing, education, law, architecture, social and political life, the strengthening of family values, and the transformation of interpersonal relations. It also started its own monastic tradition. The Kyiv-Cave monastery from the second part of the eleventh century is the most famous monastic center from that time.

Following the Mongol invasion, for a time (1240–1458) the Kyivan metropolitans didn't have a permanent place of residence. They transferred the actual place of their see to the northern part of the country (Vladimir, Suzdal, and, finally, Moscow), while keeping their old title—Metropolitan of Kyiv (ir Kiev) and All Rus. As a result, the bishops moved to create a new identity (separate from the Kyivan heritage) of a northern-Rus national self-image, centered on Moscow. At the same time, there was an aspiration to keep all the privileges of the Kyivan Church in the southern (Ukrainian) part of the former Kyivan Rus.

The Moscow metropolis declared its autocephaly from Kiev in 1458, and ten years later it announced its complete separation. It still existed as an independent body when, in 1596, a number of its clergy, including bishops, signed the Brest Union by which a number of them moved into the ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH. Many of the Orthodox and the Eastern-rite Catholics were forced into the Russian Orthodox Church beginning in 1686. Moscow and Kiev were reunited, but this time the Moscow Patriarchate was in control. Over the next centuries, the Ukrainian church lost many of its unique ecclesiastical features.

Through the twentieth century, the Ukrainian Orthodox Church alternated between two quite opposite positions, first as a jurisdiction within the Moscow Patriarchate, which took the form of an exarchate (1921–1942, 1945–1990), and then as a formally autonomous church (1918–1921, 1942–1944, 1990–2001). Following the Russian Revolution, Ukrainian leaders began an attempt to exist as an autonomous jurisdiction, though as yet unrecognized by other canonical Orthodox communities (1919–1934, 1942–1944, 1989–2001).

Although the Ukrainian Orthodox Church remains the dominant religious body, relatively strong influences from other Christian churches are also present in the Ukraine. The Roman Catholic Church's mission to Ukraine began late in the first millennium C.E. As early as 960, King Otton I established a mission to Kyiv under the leadership of the monk Adalbert as the first "bishop of Rus." A permanent presence by the Roman Catholic Church started in the twelfth century with the settlement of the Dominicans. New Episcopal sees (including Lviv, Lutsk, and Kamjanets-Podilskij), which continue to exist, were established in the western Ukraine after successful Polish and Hungarian conquests in the thirteenth century. Later, especially during the Status of religions in Ukraine, 2000-2050

Followers	2000			2025	2050
	total	%	rate
Christians	41,868,000	83.0	0.02	40,000,000	36,284,000
Orthodox	27,400,000	54.3	0.07	27,000,000	25,000,000
Independents	8,500,000	16.9	0.86	9,000,000	8,300,000
Roman Catholics	5,579,000	11.1	0.07	5,700,000	5,500,000
Nonreligious	5,480,000	10.9	-1.63	3,750,000	1,498,000
Atheists	2,012,000	4.0	-2.35	893,000	500,000
Muslims	863,000	1.7	0.51	880,000	900,000
Jews	220,000	0.4	-1.25	150,000	100,000
Ethnoreligionists	9,100	0.0	0.15	10,000	12,000
Buddhists	2,500	0.0	0.32	4,000	6,000
Baha'is	250	0.0	23.72	1,000	1,800
Total population	50,456,000	100.0	-0.28	45,688,000	39,302,000

period when Ukraine was a part of the Polish-Lithuanian state, some conversions into the Latin-rite Roman Catholic Church were recorded, though Catholicism has primarily remained a religion of the national identity of Polish, Slovak, and Hungarian minorities in the country. As the new century begins, there are seven Roman Catholic dioceses with 807 parishes and fifty monasteries in Ukraine. The head of the church, Archbishop Marjan Javorky of Lviv, was nominated as a cardinal in January 2001.

The second branch of the Catholic Church in Ukraine is the UKRAINIAN CATHOLIC CHURCH, established in 1596 following the Brest Union, in which five of the seven Ukrainian Orthodox bishops accepted papal supremacy and the teachings of the Roman Catholic Church. They were allowed to preserve the Orthodox liturgy and rite. The new church was tolerated and even supported when Ukraine was part of the Polish-Lithuanian (till the end of the eighteenth century), Austrian-Hungarian (1772–1914), or Polish (1920–1939) states. But it was declared an antinational institution and was opposed by the Cossacks (the main national force in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries); later it was completely prohibited in that part of the Ukraine which became part of the Russian Empire in the eighteenth century, and subsequently in the Soviet Union after World War II. In 1946 all seven bishops and hundreds of monks and priests were imprisoned, and all parishes were converted to the Russian Orthodox Church. The Ukrainian Catholic Church continued to function outside the Ukraine, and it finally restored its activity in the Ukraine after 1989. In the 1990s it became the second largest religious body in Ukraine according to the number of parishes (3,317). These are now organized into nine dioceses and three exarchates. There are, additionally, seventeen dioceses and exarchates of the church around the world.

Patriarch Filaret ministers on Christmas, St. Volodymr Cathedral in Kiev, Ukraine (D. Mossienko/TRIP)

A Mukachiv Greek-Catholic diocese (established after the separate Uzhhorod Union with Rome in 1646) functions in Ukraine autonomously from other structures of the church. It is ruled directly by the Vatican and in close relationship with the RUTHENIAN CATHOLIC CHURCH, which was established in the United States by Ukrainians and Ruthenians from the Carpathian region. The visit to the Ukraine by Pope John Paul II in June 2001 has become an extremely important event for both branches of the Catholic Church.

Unlike Orthodoxy and Catholicism, Protestantism has never been really influential in Ukrainian society, in spite of two periods of closer acquaintance with Protestant ideas and even some planting of Protestant denominations. In the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, classical Protestantism appeared in the Ukraine in the form of Calvinism (the Reformed Church), Anti-Trinitarianism, and Socinianism. Some two hundred Protestant congregations appeared in Galicia, Volyn, and central Ukraine, but owing to strong opposition to Protestantism from the Cossacks and official state prohibitions, Protestantism had almost completely disappeared by the beginning of the eighteenth century.

In the middle of the nineteenth century, the Baptists moved into the southern and central regions of Ukraine under the influence of German colonists. Over the next decades, approximately 5 percent of the Ukrainian population became members of the Baptist Church. At the same time, lesser numbers of Adventist, Pentecostal, and Jehovah's Witnesses congregations (the latter in western Ukraine) arose during the first half of the twentieth century and continue to exist.

Protestantism today has become increasingly important in the Ukraine, with almost fifty Protestant denominations combining to include 27 percent of existing religious communities (approximately sixty-eight hundred organizations). In several regions, the number of Protestant congregations is larger than the number of parishes of more traditional churches. Judging by the number of adherents, the Baptist Church of the Ukraine is currently the largest Baptist body in Europe.

The Ukraine has also traditionally been home to adherents of non-Christian religions. JUDAISM was established in the tenth century, and extensive immigration of western European Jews through Poland took place in the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries. They established seventy-nine towns scattered through the country. Then, in the eighteenth century, the Ukraine became the motherland of one of the most influential Jewish movements of modern times, Hassidism. Its founder, Baal Shem-Tov (Besht; 1698–1760), was born in Ukrainian Galicia and spent most of his life in the region near the Carpathian Mountains and in the town of Medzhybizh. Other famous Hassidic thinkers—Josef Koen, Levi Itshak, Hershon Kurtover—as well as founders of the scientific study of Judaism—Solomon Pappoport and Nahman Krohmal—have worked in the Ukraine.

The Jewish community also suffered much through the years. For example, three hundred local Jewish communities with their inhabitants were annihilated during the Ukrainian war for independence under the leadership of Bohdan Hmelnytskyj in the mid-seventeenth century. Many additional Jews were killed during anti-Jewish pogroms at the beginning of the twentieth century. However, the Holocaust during World War II became the most significant tragedy, with 98 percent of the Jewish population being systematically annihilated. Today, following mass emigration in the 1970s and 1990s, fewer than a half-million Jews remain in the Ukraine. They have created 230 communities (including Hassidic and Reform synagogues) and several dozen Jewish organizations.

The continuous history of the Muslim community starts in the eleventh century, when Kyivan princes invited Muslims into the country for war service. As a result small Islamic communities were created in various cities, though the most intensive spread of Islam was on the Crimean Peninsula, where the local Tatar population accepted Islam in the fourteenth century under Khan Uzbek. From 1475 to 1774, a Crimean-Tatar Islamic state was under the protection of the Ottoman Empire. Attacks on Ukrainian Christians set the Cossacks in permanent opposition to Crimean Tatars. From the time of the incorporation of Crimea into the Russian Empire in 1783 until the Revolution of 1917, Islam continued its development without major conflict with other religions, but it was seriously disrupted in the 1930s by the atheistic policies of the Soviet Union. It completely disappeared after Stalin's deportation of all Crimean Tatars from their ethnic motherlands in 1944. Crimean Tatars began returning to the Crimea in the 1980s, and through the 1990s Islamic traditions have started to revive in Crimea and all of the Ukraine. Four hundred Muslim communities (305 of which are in the Crimea) exist now in the Ukraine under the supervision of three separate spiritual centers.

Armenian colonies have existed since the fourth century in Crimea and along the northern coast of the Black Sea. Additional Armenians moved to the Ukraine (mostly to Galicia and Volyn) during intensive migration in the eleventh, thirteenth, and fourteenth centuries. In 1365, the head of the ARMENIAN APOSTOLIC CHURCH (HOLY SEE OF ECHMIADZIN) appointed a bishop for Ukrainian Armenians with the See in Lviv. In 1630 this bishop (Michael Torosovych) signed the union with Rome and started the Lviv archbishopric of the ARMENIAN CATHOLIC CHURCH. All the institutions of both churches were destroyed in 1945, however, during the post-Communist period; some sixteen communities of the Armenian Apostolic Church and one of the Armenian Catholic Church have restored their activities.

Crimea particularly and Ukraine in general have been among the most famous centers of development of the KARAITES, the Jewish group that rejects the Talmud and recognizes only the authority of the Torah. Ukrainian believers have added some pagan practices and become a new religion, without direct correlation to other Karaite branches in the world. Karaites have been in Crimea since at least the eighth century; in the thirteenth century, they created new settlements in several cities of western Ukraine. In the late nineteenth century, Crimea was the world center of Karaism. Fully prohibited during the Soviet time, Karaites have opened eight communities in the post-Soviet era.

Reflecting a trend in the religious world internationally, the Ukraine became a place of intensive growth of New Religious Movements (NRMs) through the 1990s. Although there are many NRMs of all types, they do not have a large number of followers. Among newly arrived Christian groups are the CHURCH OF JESUS CHRIST OF LATTER-DAY SAINTS, the NEW APOSTOLIC CHURCH, THE SALVATION ARMY, the CHURCHES OF CHRIST CENTERS INTERNATIONAL, the SWEDENBORGIAN MOVEMENT, and many Charismatic groups (some three hundred congregations). There is one group with Eastern Christian roots—the Church of Transfigurative God's Mother, a Russian Marian Church.

Eastern religions are represented by the INTERNATIONAL SOCIETY FOR KRISHNA CONSCIOUSNESS, neo-Buddhists (including several Tibetan Buddhist communities), adherents of SRI CHINMOY (NON-INSTRUMENTAL), Transcendental Meditation, SAHAJA YOGA, and many other small groups. Several groups that seek a universal synthesis of religions include the UNIFICATION MOVEMENT, the BAHÁ'Í FAITH, and the specifically Ukrainian GREAT WHITE BROTHERHOOD. Leaders of the brotherhood became known far beyond Ukraine when they predicted the end of the world for November 1993, at which time they also attempted to occupy and worship in the most famous Christian sanctuary of Ukraine—Sophia Cathedral (dating from 1037) in Kyiv.

As in many European nations, the past decade has seen a revival of neo-paganism, which in the Ukraine has included a search for old Slavic roots. There are two major representatives in the country, the Native Faith, which focuses upon the mainly monotheist idea of Dazhboh, and the Native Ukrainian National Faith, which accepts polytheism.

There are a wide range of Western esoteric groups, including the THEOSOPHICAL SOCIETY (ADYAR) (as founded by Helena Blavatsky, who was born in Ukraine) and the Brotherhood of Holy Grail. American representatives of the tradition now active in the Ukraine include the CHURCH OF SCIENTOLOGY, the CHURCH OF CHRIST, SCIENTIST, and RELIGIOUS SCIENCE (Science of Mind).

Although the number of communities of new religions is relatively high, Ukraine still remains a country in which traditional religious priorities and affiliations prevail. According to the most recent sociological surveys, 61 percent of the population define themselves as Orthodox, 8 percent as Greek Catholic, 2 percent as Roman Catholic, 3 percent as Protestant, and only 1 percent as adherents of a NRM; meanwhile, 25 percent are atheists or do not relate to any religious group.

Andriy Yurash

Sources:

- Baltaden, S. K. Seeking God: The Recovery of Religious Identity in Orthodox Russia, Ukraine, and Georgia. DeKalb: Northern Illinois University Press, 1993.
- Blazejowskyj, Dmytro. Hierarchy of the Kyivan Church (861–1990). Rome: Univ. Cath. Ucr. Clementis Papae, 1990.
- Kolodny, A. M. Religion and Church in the Democratic Ukraine. Kyiv, 2000.
- Millennium of Christianity in Ukraine: A Symposium*. Ottawa, ON: Saint Paul University, 1987.
- Sorokowski, A., ed. A Century of Christian Culture in Ukraine. London: Ukrainian Millennium Committee in Great Britain, 1988.
- Ukrainian Orthodox Calendar 2000*. South Bound Brook, NJ: Ukrainian Orthodox Church of the U.S.A., 2000.

Ukraine, Eastern Orthodoxy in

As a unique phenomenon of Eastern Christianity, Ukrainian Orthodoxy (UO) has been shaped under many, sometimes controversial, influences. From the time of the baptism of the Kyivan Rus' (988 C.E.) until the end of the seventeenth century, it developed in interaction with the ECUMENICAL PATRIARCHATE in Constantinople, and since the middle of the seventeenth century, it has been in close communication with the RUSSIAN ORTHODOX CHURCH (MOSCOW PATRIARCHATE), or ROC. During its entire existence, contact with Western Christianity has been very important for its identity. And finally there are many features that testify to the distinctive character of the church's tradition, such as some pagan traces, unique local practices, specific combinations of saints, openings to different traditions, unique canonical law, the experience of conducting local councils, its own monasticism, numerous Western adoptions, and so forth. The church has been a point at which Constantinople Orthodox, Western Roman, and Russian Orthodox traditions converge.

In spite of its diverse past, any actual pluralism in the UO was suppressed while Ukraine was a part of the Russian Empire (1654–1917), especially after the UO was subordinated to the Moscow Patriarchate (from 1686). The first attempts to establish liberal values in the society after the Russian revolutions in 1905 and February 1917 caused strong demands from Ukrainian clergy and adherents to separate the Ukrainian Church from the Russian one. Prior to 1919, the separation movement had expressed only a general desire to translate all of the church's books and liturgy into Ukrainian. After publishing a decree of the government of the Ukrainian People's Republic (an independent state in 1917–1920) about autocephaly of the UO (January 1, 1919), the exponents of separation divided into two ideological directions that with variations and some changes have existed till the present. One group argued for full separation from Moscow and the creation of an independent autocephalous church, while the other favored the preservation of the organizational connection with the Russian Orthodox Church in the form of an exarchate or autonomous church.

In March 1919 the supporters of autocephaly founded the first parishes that declared their full independence from their former religious center, and in October 1921 they conducted an All-Ukrainian Council in which the creation of the Ukrainian Autocephalous Orthodox Church (UAOC) was announced and its hierarchy was consecrated. This new church was not recognized by any traditional Orthodox church, as none of the then-current Orthodox bishops took part in the ordinations. In spite of canonical law, a new bishop for the UAOC was consecrated from among and by parish priests (only the Russian Living Church faction of the Russian Orthodox Church recognized the UAOC, in 1923). The UAOC was most active in central, and to some extent northern and southern, Ukraine, where till the end of the 1920s almost three thousand parishes were within its jurisdiction. In 1929, Stalin had initiated suppression of the UAOC, which he accused of nationalism. Twenty-six of its bishops and thousands of its priests and active members were arrested and killed in the concentration camps. By 1934 all of the institutions of the UAOC were destroyed.

The UAOC revived in February 1942, following the German occupation of the Ukraine, when three former bishops of the ORTHODOX CHURCH OF POLAND (OCP) declared the second birthing of the UAOC and ordained new bishops (who were from the canonical point of view quite legitimate). In 1944, before the Soviet army reoccupied Ukrainian territory, the hierarchy of the UAOC, the majority of its priests, and hundreds of thousands of adherents left the Ukraine and established the church's institutions in diaspora (till 1949 in Western Europe and, after 1950, mainly in the United States, Canada, and additionally in Australia and South America).

Responding to demands of the Ukrainian clergy concerning more independence for UO, in 1918 the ROC had agreed to proclaim the autonomy of the Orthodox Church in Ukraine. However, practically speaking, that independence was never realized. In 1921 the Moscow patriarch Tikhon appointed an exarch to Ukraine, which in effect converted the autonomous church into an exarchate.

Before 1917 the ROC had had 11,753 churches in Ukraine: during the 1920s some 3,000 of those recognized the jurisdiction of the UAOC; some 2,000 (after 1920) found themselves in Polish territory and became a part of the OCP; and fewer than 7,000 churches remained under the authority of the ROC. Initially, parishes of the ROC dominated in the eastern and southern Ukrainian regions, but its infrastructure was almost completely destroyed by the middle of the 1930s as a result of the Soviet state's antireligious policy: fewer than one hundred churches remained open. The church in connection with the ROC renewed its structure during World War II, and in 1942 it announced its return to its previous autonomous status, which was transformed again into an exarchate in 1944 when the Soviet Union restored its control over Ukrainian territory. The majority of the bishops of the Autonomous Church left the Ukraine.

From 1944 till 1989 the Ukrainian exarchate of the ROC was the only Orthodox religious structure that was permitted by the Communist regime. Immediately after World War II, it brought together twenty-one dioceses with more than seven thousand parishes. All of the parishes of those churches that were then prohibited in the Soviet Union were included in the ROC's Ukrainian exarchate, including the parishes of the former UAOC, the OCP (in the territories that moved back to the Soviet Union), and the UKRAINIAN GREEK CATHOLIC CHURCH. The number of parishes was further decreased, to fifteen dioceses and approximately five thousand parishes, at the beginning of the 1960s as a result of Khrushchev's antireligious campaign.

The monopoly of the ROC over orthodoxy in the Ukraine was demolished after the beginning of liberal changes in the Soviet Union. In 1989 the third revival of the UAOC in Ukraine was proclaimed by a group of Orthodox clergy in Galicia. The priest Volodymyr Yarema from Lviv was its ideological leader, and Bishop Ioan Bodnarchuk, formerly with the ROC, led the new movement. The revival of the autocephalous church was strongly opposed by the ROC in general, and especially by Metropolitan Filaret, the head of the Ukrainian exarchate of the ROC, which included at that time almost 70 percent of all Orthodox parishes in the country (approximately five thousand out of fewer than seven thousand).

In the early 1990s, three separate church structures appeared in the Ukraine. The Ukrainian Orthodox Church under the jurisdiction of the Moscow Patriarchate (UOC MP) represents a pro-Russian direction in the Ukrainian Orthodoxy. It was created in January 1990 from the former Ukrainian exarchate of the ROC. After the declaration of Ukraine's independence (August 1991), Metropolitan Filaret signed a request to the ROC requesting autocephaly. The ROC deemed the request inexpedient. Two other bishops did not agree with that decision and joined Filaret in creating the Ukrainian Orthodox Church of Patriarchate (UOC KP). Volodymyr Sabodan became the new Ukrainian metropolitan of the UOC MP. In 1996 the UOC MP officially refused the idea of its granting autocephaly in the Ukraine.

Parishes of the UOC MP now prevail in most sections of the country. It is the largest religious body in the Ukraine (with 36 dioceses) according to the number of religious organizations (9,246 in total), monasteries (122, with 3,519 monks and nuns), brotherhoods (24), and clergy (7,507); its headquarters and main cathedral are on the territory of the most ancient and famous Ukrainian monastery, the Kyiv-Cave Lavra.

The strictly autocephalous direction within UO is represented by two churches—the UOC KP and the UAOC. Neither structure is recognized by any autocephalous Orthodox church, owing to the strong opposition of the ROC. After 1998 the Ecumenical Patriarchate manifested special interest in UO. Patriarch Bartholomew I has proposed a way to unify the several Orthodox branches and grant autocephaly to the unified UOC.

The Ukrainian Orthodox Church of Kyivan Patriarchate was founded in June 1992 with an eye toward the unification of the whole of the UAOC (which had existed in Ukraine from 1989) and smaller parts of the UOC MP, which, under Metropolitan Filaret, hadn't agreed with the refusal of the ROC to give autocephaly for UO. It was founded by Patriarch Mstyslav Skrypnyk, who was at the same time the head of the UOC in the United States. The UOC KP is now led by patriarchs Filaret and Denysenko. It includes under its jurisdiction thirty dioceses in the Ukraine, and six dioceses abroad (Russia, Germany, France, Greece, and the United States). It has sixteen seminaries and academies, twenty-two monasteries, ten brotherhoods, and eighteen missions. The main cathedral of the UOC KP is the Church of Saint Volodymyr in Kyiv.

The third Orthodox body, the Ukrainian Autocephalous Orthodox Church (UAOC), was created in 1993 by the small group of former UOC KP clergy, which until June 1992 had been in the UAOC that had existed from 1989 to June 1992. These clergy disagreed with the leadership of the UOC KP of Metropolitan Filaret. The charismatic leader of this group, Volodymyr Yarema, was ordained as a bishop in 1993 and subsequently elected the patriarch of this new UAOC. He was succeeded in September 2000 by the present metropolitan, Mephodij Kudriakov. The UAOC has eleven dioceses, 1,015 religious organizations, one monastery, and six seminaries. More than 90 percent of its parishes are located in Galicia, though its headquarters have been stationed in Kyiv.

In addition to the three large churches, a variety of smaller Orthodox communities, most with ethnically Russian roots, are also present, including the two branches of the Old Believers Russian Orthodox Church, one with clergy (fifty-eight religious organizations) and one without (twelve religious organizations). Also visible are the RUSSIAN ORTHODOX CHURCH OUTSIDE OF RUSSIA (7 religious organizations), the Russian True Orthodox Church (35 organizations), the Apocalyptic Orthodox Church (4 organizations), the Greek Orthodox Church (2 organizations), the Innocentian Church (1 organization), and several independent parishes (4 organizations).

After the intensive movement of Ukrainians through the twentieth century, Ukrainian Orthodox structures were established abroad: in America, the Ukrainian Orthodox Church in the U.S.A. was founded in 1924; it now has three dioceses and 95 parishes. It was unrecognized until 1995 but has since been in communion with the Ecumenical Patriarchate. The Ukrainian Orthodox Church in Canada, founded in 1918, has 3 dioceses and 260 parishes. Also unrecognized for many years, in 1990 it came into communion with the Ecumenical Patriarchate. There are also separate dioceses in Western Europe, Australia, and South America. Orthodox communities of Ukrainians have also created structures in Romania (the Ukrainian decanate of the ROMANIAN ORTHODOX CHURCH) and Poland (several dioceses of the OCP in which Ukrainians are in the majority). An independent and informative Internet site devoted to Ukrainian Orthodoxy can be found.

Sociological data show that 61 percent of the Ukrainian population recognize themselves as adherents of Orthodoxy; however, only 35 percent (57 percent of Orthodox believers) are sure concerning their concrete church affiliation (indicative that many people see Orthodoxy more as an abstract historical tradition than as their actual religious practice). The UOC MP, which unites 37 percent of the all-Ukrainian religious organizations (70 percent from the Orthodox organizations), is supported by 12 percent of the population; the UOC KP, which unites 12 percent from the general number of communities (22 percent among Orthodox churches), has 22 percent of the adherents among the all-Ukrainian population; the UAOC (representing 4 percent of all-Ukrainian organizations and 8 percent of Orthodox ones) has 1 percent of the supporters. These figures show that the real jurisdictional priorities of the population do not coincide with existing church infrastructures. They also indicate that the thrust toward an autocephalous structure has significantly stronger support in the society than the pro-Russian position. The likelihood of a unified autocephalous church that will be recognized by the other Orthodox patriarchates is high.

Addresses:

Ukrainian Orthodox Church of Kyivan Patriarchate
Church of Saint Volodymyr in Kyiv 36 Pushkina St.
Kiev
Ukraine
<http://www.ukrainian-orthodoxy.org/index.asp>

Ukrainian Autocephalous Orthodox Church
1 Entrance
8-A Triokhsviatytel's'ka St.
Kiev
Ukraine

Andrij Yurash

Sources:

- Baltaden, S. K. Seeking God: The Recovery of Religious Identity in Orthodox Russia, Ukraine, and Georgia. DeKalb: Northern Illinois University Press, 1993.
- Pavlyshyn, M., ed. One Thousand Years of Christianity in Ukraine: Papers from a Symposium at the Australian National University, Canberra, 15 August 1987. Melbourne: Department of Slavic Languages/Monash University, 1988.
- Ukrainian Orthodox Calendar 2000*. South Bound Brook, NJ: Ukrainian Orthodox Church of the U.S.A., 2000.
- Zinkewych, O., and A. Sorokowski, eds. A Thousand Years of Christianity in Ukraine: An Encyclopedic Chronology. New York: Smoloskyrb Publishers and the National Committee to Commemorate the Millennium in Ukraine, 1988.

Ukrainian Greek Catholic Church

Christianity came to what is now the Ukraine at the end of the first millennium C.E., and following the division between the ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH and EASTERN ORTHODOXY in 1054, the Ukrainians adhered to the latter. The church in Ukraine was under the jurisdiction of the ECUMENICAL PATRIARCHATE residing in Constantinople. In the fourteenth century, Lithuania, a Roman Catholic nation, invaded the region, and much of the national and ethnic identity of the Ukrainians was developed in opposition to the imposed Lithuanian authority.

In 1439 the Orthodox metropolitan of Kiev, Isidore, attended the Council of Florence, a gathering of the bishops of the Roman Catholic Church, and agreed to the union of the Ukrainian Orthodox with the Roman Catholics. Many Ukrainians accepted the union, but many rejected it and remained Orthodox in faith. Then in 1569, following the union of Lithuania and Poland, control of the region passed to Poland. Catholic leaders made a new effort to unite Catholic and Orthodox structures as a means of stopping the growth of Protestantism.

In this context, a number of Orthodox began to see a union with Rome as a means of saving their church from absorption into the Latin-rite Roman Church, which was expanding rapidly. Thus in 1596, at a gathering of Orthodox bishops, a new union of Ukrainian Orthodoxy with Rome was proclaimed. Over the next century the majority of Ukrainians accepted it. It survived until the nineteenth century, when Russia expanded its control in the region. Russian authorities suppressed the Roman Catholic Church and incorporated both the Ukrainian Greek Catholic Church and the Ukrainian Orthodox Church into the RUSSIAN ORTHODOX CHURCH (MOSCOW PATRIARCHATE). The Ukrainian Greek Catholic Church survived in Galicia, western Ukraine, which had by this time come under Austrian control.

The Ukrainian Greek Catholic Church flourished during the early twentieth century under the brilliant leadership of Andrew Sheptyckyj. Beginning in the late nineteenth century, Ukrainians had started to migrate worldwide, and Catholic parishes began to emerge in the United States, Canada, South America, Australia, and Western Europe. These parishes served an important part in keeping Ukrainian identity alive during the years after World War II, when the Soviet Union annexed Galicia, Poland deported most Ukrainians in Poland to the Soviet Union, and the Soviet government suppressed the Ukrainian Greek Catholic Church. All of the bishops were arrested, and all but one died in prison. Believers were forced to choose between the Russian Orthodox Church or the Latin-rite Roman Catholic Church, though in fact the Ukrainian Catholic Church survived as an underground church.

Only with the weakening of the Soviet Union at the end of the 1980s was a distinctive Ukrainian Catholic church re-established, when in 1989 a new bishop of Przemyśl was named. In 1991, Cardinal Myroslav Lubachivsky was able to move into his residence in Lviv. By the end of the year seminaries were established at Lviv, and Ivano-Frankivsk and religious orders were revived. There were a reported five million members in eleven dioceses. Meanwhile the church in diaspora continued on. There are five dioceses in Canada and four in the United States. There are also dioceses in Australia, Brazil, and Argentina. Apostolic exarchates have been appointed for France, Germany, and the United Kingdom. Ukrainian Catholic seminaries are located in Washington, D.C.; Ottawa; and Curitiba, Brazil. There is a Ukrainian College in Rome.

Address:

Ukrainian Greek Catholic Church
Ploscha Sviatoho Jura 5
290000 Lviv
Ukraine
<http://www.ugkc.lviv.ua/>

Sources:

- Dyrud, Keith P. The Quest for the Rusyn Soul: The Politics of Religion and Culture in Eastern Europe and in America, 1890–World War I. Philadelphia: Balch Institute, 1992.
- Himka, John-Paul. The Greek Catholic Church and Ukrainian Society in Austrian Galicia. Cambridge: Ukrainian Studies Fund, Harvard University, 1986.
- Liesel, N. The Eastern Catholic Liturgies: A Study in Words and Pictures. Westminster, MD: Newman, 1960.

Umbanda

Umbanda, a Brazilian-based religion closely related to CANDOMBLÉ, integrated Afro-Brazilian and kardecistic-spiritistic doctrines and practices, along with various indigenous elements. With its desire to magically manipulate the empirical world according to the sorrows and necessities of its adherents, Umbanda has remained loyal to the Afro-Brazilian tradition. At the same time it has excluded blood sacrifice, and, compared with Candomblé, initiation into Umbanda is considerably less costly, both in terms of money and preparation time. Like SPIRITISM, Umbanda focuses on an altruistic morality and charity.

As an institutionalized religion, Umbanda emerged in the 1930s, when a far-reaching processes of urbanization and industrialization began, and the political context supported the ideological integration of a new society. Hence Brazilian scholars of religion point out that the consolidation of Umbanda reflects the search by a still disintegrated population for a national identity, capable of harmonizing internal contradictions, including racial tensions. Umbanda established itself on a larger scale in the 1950s, especially in Rio de Janeiro, Pôrto Alegre, and São Paulo. Until today the urban character remains a key element. As the Datafolha survey showed, 69 percent of all Umbanda members in 1991 were inhabitants of major Brazilian cities, and 56 percent were white.

Brazilian scholars subsume both Umbanda and Candomblé in the category of “mediumistic religions.” The 1991 census treated Candomblé and Umbanda as a statistical unit, with 648,463 members (0.44 percent of the total population). According to the 1994 Datafolha study, about 1 percent of Brazil’s adult population were associated with Candomblé, and 1 percent with Umbanda. The Federação Nacional de Tradição e Cultura Afro-Brasileira projected a very different picture, with an estimate that seventy million Brazilians are participants in either Candomblé or Umbanda. Among several Umbanda organizations is the Initiatic Order of the Divine Cross, an Umbanda temple established in 1970 by the medium F. Rivas Neto.

Address:

Initiatic Order of the Divine Cross
Rua Chebl Massud, 157
Bairro Água Funda
São Paulo
Brazil
http://www.umbanda.org/conce_e.htm
<http://www.jornalumbandahoje.com.br/>

Frank Usarski

Sources:

Bastide, Roger. The African Religions of Brazil. Baltimore, MD: Johns Hopkins Press, 1978.
Brown, Diana DeGroat. Umbanda: Religion and Politics in Urban Brazil. New York: Columbia University Press, 1994.
Hess, David J. Samba in the Night: Spiritism in Brazil. New York: Colombia University Press, 1994.

Unarius

Unarius, one of several religions to emerge out of the claims of contact with advanced beings from outer space, emerged out of the spiritualist work of Ernest Norman (1904–1971) and his wife, Ruth Norman (1900–1993). Unarians believe that the Normans have been reincarnated a number of times, on occasion together. For example, Ernest appeared as the Egyptian pharaoh Amenhotep, and Ruth as the pharaoh's mother. Most important, Ernest is believed to have been Jesus and Ruth his betrothed. Ruth was also believed to have been the woman who sat as a model for Leonardo da Vinci's Mona Lisa. Unarius is seen as the return of Jesus and the renewal of his work, which was so abruptly stopped by his untimely death.

Unarius ("universal articulate interdimensional understanding of science") was organized in 1954, and during its early years it was built around the channeling of Ernest Norman, who claimed contact with beings on a variety of planets. Following his death in 1971, Ruth emerged as a channel and over the next twenty years produced a number of texts. She also produced a basic set of lesson materials, which became the curriculum for new Unarius members. These lessons, "The Psychology of Consciousness" and "Self-Mastery, the Infinite Concept of Cosmic Creation," concentrate on bringing forth the latent potentials in each individual. The original materials channeled from beings from Venus, Mars, Hermes, Eros, Orion, and Muse related information on life in other worlds, their advanced science, and, most important, information on spiritual development and healing. Healing may occur utilizing energy directed from the great intelligences on other worlds.

Building on her husband's earlier works, Ruth Norman offered an integrated picture of the many planets that she asserted were combined into an Intergalactic Federation. These advanced planets contacted Ruth and invited Earth into the confederation through her. A joining occurred in 1973, with Ruth (spiritual name, Ioshanna) as the principal contact. Since that time, Earth has been seen as progressing so that in the future it can become a full member of the confederation.

Following Ruth Norman's death, Unarius was led by Charles Spiegel (1921–1999). It is currently led by a board of senior students. Members are scattered across North America and in Italy, Spain, New Zealand, and Nigeria.

Address:

Unarius
143 S. Magnolia
El Cajon, CA 92022
<http://www.unarius.org/>

Sources:

Ioshanna [Ruth Norman]. A Space Woman Speaks from Outer Space. El Cajon, CA: Unarius, n.d.
Norman, Ernest L. The Voice of Venus. Santa Barbara, CA: Unarius-Science of Life, 1956.
Pathway to Light: An Introduction to the Unarius Science of Life. El Cajon, CA: Unarius Academy of Science, 1995.
The Universal Hierarchy. A Pictorial Tour of Unarius. El Cajon, CA: Unarius Educational Foundation, 1982.

UNBELIEF

The term Unbelief, as used in this encyclopedia, refers directly to the modern community of people and organizations who advocate those philosophical/ideological positions that do not include a belief in God, either in the singular or plural, and have no use for various supernatural realities, often seen as the essence of religion, including prayer, miracles (in the sense of divine intervention in the natural order), revelation, or life after death. Such philosophical positions go under a variety of names—ATHEISM, HUMANISM, AGNOSTICISM, FREETHOUGHT, rationalism, secularism, and so forth.

Through the centuries, numerous individuals, and even religious groups, have espoused positions that formally could be called Unbelief. In the ancient West, Unbelief has been ascribed to those philosophers who challenged various supernatural assumptions commonly held within Greek society, such as the belief in demonic inspiration and divination. In the East, JAINISM and THERAVADA BUDDHISM developed extensive religious systems without the need of positing a God as a focus of worship.

However, modern Unbelief does not encompass every form taken by alternatives to theism and polytheism; rather, it refers to the critical approach taken to Western Christianity that emerged in post-Reformation Europe in which unbelief was unbelief in Christian theism (and to a lesser extent, Judaism). Attacks upon the belief in God as irrational and lacking evidential support began to be made in the eighteenth century, but a foundation for these attacks had been laid by the events of the previous centuries.

At the beginning of the sixteenth century, western Europe was united religiously by the ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH. Although its power varied considerably from country to country, the challenges to its hegemony were relatively localized and were dealt with by the power of the state. However, the attack on the Church's power that began with Martin Luther (1483–1546) in the second decade of the new century would by the end of the century remake the religious map of Europe significantly. Different countries would emerge with LUTHERAN, REFORMED-PRESBYTERIAN, or ANGLICAN establishments in power, and additional space would be provided for MENNONITES, Socinians (nontrinitarians), and various small mystical groups such as the Schwenfelders.

Relative to the time, the champion of unbelief was Michael Servetus (1511–1553), the Spanish physician who wrote a book comparing the Christian Trinity to the three-headed hound of hell. For this and other opinions expressed in his 1553 work on the restitution of Christianity, he was first imprisoned by the Inquisition. Escaping, he fled to Geneva, where Reformed Church leader John Calvin (1509–1564) saw to his arrest and execution. Although Lutherans, Calvinists, and Anglicans had challenged a set of Roman Catholic beliefs, they did not disagree concerning the doctrine of God (and that unanimity would quickly push the Socinians from their brief ascendancy in Poland).

Protestantism, while still operating within an orthodox Christian world, did begin the process of criticism of popular supernaturalism that had become institutionalized in Roman Catholicism. It challenged the nature of the Eucharist, the central Christian sacrament, and offered alternatives to the Roman Catholic doctrine of transubstantiation, which holds that the bread and the wine once consecrated are transformed in substance into that of the Body and Blood of Christ (although their appearance remains unchanged). Protestants also challenged the use of numerous relics and the doctrine of purgatory (and the accompanying system of rewards and punishments associated with it).

A next step, the challenge to some of the pervasive views shared by both Protestant and Roman Catholic Christians alike, emerged in the seventeenth century. Deism affirmed the existence of God but generally denied its miraculous or supernatural elements. Such belief generally saw Jesus as a great moral teacher but denied that as the Christ he was the second person of a Triune God. Deism was often seen as a natural or reasonable religion (as opposed to revealed religion). According to its initial advocate, Edward Herbert, Lord Cherbury (1583–1648), deism focused on five affirmations: the existence of a supreme being; the need for worship; piety and virtue as the primary forms of worship (rather than prayer and ritual); the need to repent of shortcomings; and a set of rewards and punishments awaiting individuals in the afterlife. The deist worldview undercut belief in God's activity in the world, apart from maintaining the system through natural law and the validity of prayer.

Deism became popular among the educated elite as science developed. Although affirming the existence of God, it supplied a worldview that did not interfere with scientific experimentation and investigation and a theology that did not answer scientific questions in a way that blocked further inquiry. Deism tended to adopt the view of God as the watchmaker who created the world, wound it up, and left it to run according to natural laws. Deism also included an anticlerical element, and many deists attacked the Church, the authority of its priests and ministers in secular matters, and publicized immoral acts attributed to church leaders in centuries past.

While arising in the seventeenth century, Deism became a significant movement in the eighteenth century. British Deist leaders included Lord Shaftsbury (1621–1683), Alexander Pope (1688–1744), Anthony Collins (1676–1729), and Thomas Woolston (1669–1732). In France, Voltaire emerged as the leading Deist spokesperson and used his literary abilities to attack religion in general and the Roman Catholic Church in particular. In the British American colonies, Deism emerged as the faith of the most prominent revolutionaries—Thomas Jefferson, Benjamin Franklin, Thomas Paine, John Adams, and George Washington.

Atheism. As Deism was gathering a wide following, a next step was taken away from the dominant religious sentiments in Western society with the development of perspectives that dispensed with the notion of a deity as an ultimate point of reference. Because of the need to establish itself within a society in which the overwhelming majority profess theism, the nontheistic perspective struggled to find space to exist in reference to the larger community; it was commonly perceived as a negative position, simply a denial of God and religion. To the contrary, atheists have generally insisted, however, that their position is not so much a denial of God as the development of a perspective on life after having found no convincing evidence that something called God exists and of creating a lifestyle in which God is unnecessary either as a moral authority or an object of worship.

Atheism thus includes a variety of belief systems that lack any belief in a God or in multiple gods. Some go even further and say that the very term God has no meaning to them. The assertion of such a perspective has put atheists at odds with the mainstream of religious thought as it has existed in the West since the seventeenth century. Although hinted at in earlier works, atheism was first openly asserted in the modern West in 1772 in the book by Paul Henri Holbach (1723–1789), The System of Nature, though his position had been implied in several earlier texts in which he criticized the Church and Christian theology.

As atheism developed, it did so under a variety of names, each indicating a major theme and a slightly different emphasis in thought—Freethought, rationalism, secularism, and humanism being the most popular. The concept of Freethought developed in the eighteenth century to describe systems of dissent from specific religious propositions. As science was emerging as a relatively secular endeavor, Freethought insisted that science be free from various theological debates and conclusions and be allowed to develop its own vocabulary and methodology as it pursued its investigation of the world—that scientists be freed to follow the paths opened by the logic of their thoughts. Inasmuch as scientific conclusions offered dissenting views on what most considered religious issues, from the sanctity of the human body to the age of the universe, Freethought became identified with non-Christian views and eventually with atheism.

Rationalism refers to any one of several philosophical positions characterized by the elevation of reason to the level of a dominating metaphysical or epistemological principle. In one sense, rationalism has a significant philosophical history, as the philosophical school begun by Rene Descartes (1596–1650). In the more popular sense, however, rationalism refers to a position adopted by many unbelievers suggesting that religious beliefs and practices be subjected to a rational examination and accepted or rejected on the same basis as one would accept or reject other matters. In examining religions, rationalists tended to reject theological supernaturalism and practices such as worship and prayer, which they tended to condemn as “irrational”—that is, contrary to reason as they used it.

Secularism is a perspective on the world that begins with the division of the world into two realms, the sacred and the secular—that is, the realm of the divine and the religious, and those aspects of life that may be considered apart from either. As originally proposed in the mid-nineteenth century, secularism had a special concern for ethics and the development of ethical systems apart from theology. Secularism thus came to mean the practical process of improving humans and society without reference to religion or religious institutions. Secularism has also taken on special connotations with regard to the single issue of the separation of church and state in its more absolutist sense—namely, that not only should government not interfere with religion but that religious ideas should not be injected into governmental processes.

Humanism, a term that covers a variety of philosophical perspectives, arose anew in the early twentieth century as an attempt to build a human-centered worldview and ethic that by implication rejected supernatural understandings of the operation of the universe and an ethic based upon pragmatic human values and love.

France has been particularly important in the development of Unbelief. The term atheism was coined in France, where it was often used in conjunction with the term libertine (freed man). The latter term came to be used almost exclusively for sexually liberated individuals, but originally it included those who were intellectually and theologically free. Deism flowered in France in the eighteenth century, Voltaire (1694–1778) emerging as its champion. Denis Diderot (1713–1774) was possibly the first true French atheist.

The revolution in France, as in the American colonies, was led by Deists, but because of the power exercised by the Catholic Church it included a strong element of anticlericalism. Atheism was present in postrevolutionary France and produced some outstanding lights, such as pioneer sociologist August Comte (1798–1857), but it found its major expression over the next century in various anti-Catholic events, including the secularizing of the schools in the 1880s. Church and state were separated in 1905. French Freemasonry also created a nontheistic form of its esoteric teachings. In the twentieth century, atheism has found expression in various Freethought groups (La Libre Pensée being the largest national organization), and atheists have taken to promoting the national policy against minority religions.

In the last half of the nineteenth century, throughout the Western world, people who identified themselves as atheists, freethinkers, rationalists, secularists, or humanists began to create organizations and movements to support their various tendencies, now grouped under the umbrella of Unbelief. Among the earliest and most important of the nineteenth-century organizations were the First Society of Free Enquirers (founded by Abner Kneeland [1774–1844] in Boston in 1834); the Bund freier religiöser Gemeinden Deutschlands (founded in Germany in 1859); and the National Secular Society (founded by Charles Bradlaugh [1833–1891] in England in 1866).

The Issue of Marxism. In the West, Unbelief has generally distinguished itself from what was arguably the most successful nontheistic system to arise in the modern world, Marxism. Marxism has been tied in the public consciousness with totalitarian governments in the Soviet Union and post-revolutionary China.

The philosophy of Karl Marx (1818–1883) was much more anticlerical than atheistic, and he felt that most religion (as experienced in the state-aligned religions of the nineteenth century) was, as expressed in his most famous quotation, the “opiate of the people”: it lulled people into accepting their exploited status in the lower levels of the social order and acquiescing to rule by the few. He had positive views of some Christian movements, but he argued that both Judaism and Christianity were expressions of stages in human development that had to be surpassed if progress was to occur. Marx felt that religions are a human product that, like other human ideologies, reflect the social systems that perpetuate them.

Marx’s economic critique of history took form primarily in political parties that went on to participate in the governmental systems of different countries. The atheism that was implicit in his thought became operationalized in the Communist Party. However, it was largely assumed in the twentieth century that to be a Communist was to be an atheist, and the support for atheism and the resultant disparagement of religion became embedded in the national policies of those countries in which Marxism became the ruling philosophy—the Soviet Union, the People’s Republic of China, North Korea, Vietnam, the countries of Eastern Europe. Albania was the only country, however, that formally (in 1967) proclaimed itself an atheist nation and acted on that proposition by outlawing all forms of religion, closing all of its churches and mosques, and imprisoning many of the clergy. Only in 1991 was freedom of religion restored.

In the Soviet Union atheism became institutionalized in a succession of organizations: the League of the Godless, the League of the Militant Godless, and the Institute of Scientific Atheism (which continues into the post-Soviet era). Initially the Soviets focused upon efforts to marginalize religion and end the institutional authority of the Church. The formation of the League of the Godless, however, represented the emergence of active promotion of atheism through the press, social institutions, and specialized organizations. Through succeeding decades religious policy periodically shifted its emphases between the promotion of atheism and the forceful suppression of religion.

In China, the critique of what were seen as various systems of exploitation reached out to include religion. Chinese policy led initially to the cutting of the ties between religious groups and any foreign leadership, especially in the case of Christianity, the complete reorganization of the various religious communities into five approved religious organizations, and the imposition of an ideology that was more aligned to the new Marxist Maoist government. While this reorganization was occurring, many government leaders, representing the Chinese community, argued that religion and Marxism were incompatible. Chinese Communist antagonism toward religion reached its zenith during the period of the Cultural Revolution (1966–1976). Since that time a much more accommodationist policy has been adopted, though government attacks on religion have continued.

As the new century begins, religion in China survives, and an official policy of freedom of religious belief has been written into the law. It is also the case that the Chinese Communist Party is officially atheist and that membership in the party and belief in religion are mutually exclusive. In between those people who are members of officially accepted religions and the party is a mass of unofficial religious activity that is still subject to periodic suppression by the atheist government. It remains the strong belief in those countries still ruled by Marxism that religion and belief in God will eventually pass away. In the world, the spread of Marxism accounts for the great majority of Unbelief, which includes some 55 percent of the North Koreans, 42 percent of the Chinese, 31 percent of the Czechs, and 27 percent of the Russians.

Modern Western Unbelief. Through the twentieth century, as Marxism rose and then faced the crisis of the fall of the Soviet Union, non-Marxist forms of Unbelief emerged as a popular movement that competed for the support of the public with religious groups. Groups professing nontheistic philosophies supported many values commonly offered by religious groups, including answers to the three main religious questions: Where did we come from? Why are we here? and Where are we going? Answers to these questions were given without reference to God or the supernatural. Atheist groups also offered moral systems devoid of supernatural authorities and communal fellowship in their various local gatherings, national and international conventions, and even ritual life.

Non-Marxist atheism as a positive philosophy, as opposed to simple irreligion or concern with ultimate questions, enjoyed its greatest response in Europe and European outposts in North America, South Africa, Australia, and New Zealand. It has not fared well in South America, although it found some support in India where a movement critical of Hinduism attacked many of the supernatural powers ascribed to various Indian spiritual teachers. As early as 1875, the Hindu Freethought Union appeared in Madras. It survived for two decades. Through the twentieth century a succession of Indian organizations appeared, the most successful being the Indian Rationalist Association, founded in 1960.

In the West, organized atheism has proceeded country by country. In the United States, popular leadership was provided by organizations such as the National Liberal League, the Freethinkers of America (Joseph Lewis), The American Association for the Advancement of Atheism, the American Humanist Association, AMERICAN ATHEISTS (Madalyn Murray O’Hair), and the COUNCIL FOR SECULAR HUMANISM (Paul Kurtz). Similarly, across Europe a number of national rationalist, humanist, Freethought, and atheist groups have been organized.

As early as 1880, the International Federation of Freethinkers (since 1936 the World Union of Freethinkers) was organized. The more substantive INTERNATIONAL HUMANIST AND ETHICAL UNION was formed in 1952. It now includes member groups from around the world. A specifically Jewish form of unbelief emerged in the 1960s and eventually gave birth to the INTERNATIONAL FEDERATION OF SECULAR HUMANISTIC JEWS.

Although the different communities of Unbelief have generally reached a consensus on the issues of God and the supernatural, they have disagreed on the issue of religion. Humanists, in particular, have expressed positive approaches to religion and have developed (or continued) religious structures that they feel contribute to ameliorating the human condition or provide a ritual dramatization of the important events of the life cycle—birth, coming of age, marriage, and death. Secular Judaism perpetuates synagogue life under the leadership of rabbis. The American Humanist Association “ordains” celebrants (Humanist ministers) who lead celebration services (analogous to Protestant worship services). Operating in a somewhat different context, the Norwegian Humanist organization HUMAN-ETISK FORBUND I NORGE, one of the largest in Europe, has worked for a secular alternative to Christian confirmation (through which most Norwegian youths have traditionally passed). As the new century begins, these “civil” confirmations are celebrated annually in some ninety locations throughout Norway with some four thousand young people, approximately 10 percent of the relevant age group, taking part.

In response, many atheist and Freethought groups eschew any form of religious activity. They see themselves as over and against religion rather than providing a nontheistic or non-supernatural alternative to it. The Council for Secular Humanism is among those groups opposed to associating Unbelief in any way with religion.

Pseudoscience. Increasingly associated with Unbelief is the crusade against pseudoscience. A pseudoscience is a set of related ideas based on theories put forth as scientific but which upon examination lack any scientific base. The ideas may be based on an inadequate methodology, false or fraudulent information, or supernatural claims. During the nineteenth century, occult and esoteric claims revived, claiming to have scientific support from movements like mesmerism, and then as science expanded, found confirmation in a variety of scientific findings.

At the end of the twentieth century, a variety of people examined and debunked the claims of Spiritualist mediums to contact the dead and produce various physical phenomena. As claims of paranormal phenomena proliferated in the years after World War II, including the obvious popularity of astrology, some humanists, led by Paul Kurtz, then a leader in the American Humanist Association, took the lead in the founding of the Committee for the Scientific Investigation of Claims of the Paranormal (CSICOP).

The leadership of the society saw the rise of interest in the paranormal, psychic phenomena, alternative forms of healing, UFOs, and related phenomena as dangerous to society and representative of a general decline in critical thinking. The society promoted the development of a “skeptical” movement designed to debunk what it saw as pseudoscience, gave rise to local affiliated chapters across North America, and led to the formation of several like organizations, such as the Los Angeles–based Skeptics Society. It also became the model for several similar organizations now found in more than thirty countries around the world. CSICOP now maintains an International Network of Skeptical Organizations.

Agnosticism. Arising along with atheism was a slightly different position of Unbelief, agnosticism. The term was coined by Thomas Henry Huxley (1825–1895) in 1869 to indicate a methodology of refusing to assert knowledge about things that are not demonstrated or even demonstrable. Huxley’s position, as later expanded and popularized, has identified agnosticism as the position that God or the origin of the universe is unknowable, and hence it is best to refrain from opinions on the subject.

The agnostic position has generally assumed a certain methodology in looking at the world and coming to conclusions about matters that could be labeled as “true.” Most have found in scientific methodology the way to truth, and hence they rely primarily on reason and the empirical method as the proper way of knowing the universe. Belief in a deity (and many related theological realities) push the individual beyond the confines of scientific methodology. Hence, for the person who assumes such a methodology, discourse on God and divine realities is beyond the realm of knowledge. The agnostic chooses to withhold judgment on such matters.

Address:

European Council of Skeptical Organizations
Postfach 1222,
64374 Rossdorf
Germany

Sources:

- Angeles, Peter A., ed. Critiques of God: Making the Case against Belief in God. Amherst, NY: Prometheus, 1997.
- Howlett, Duncan. The Critical Way in Religion. Buffalo, NY: Prometheus, 1980.
- Husband, William B. Godless Communists, Atheism and Society in Soviet Russia, 1917–1932. DeKalb: Northern Illinois University, 2000.
- Johnson, B. C. The Atheist Debater's Handbook. Buffalo: Prometheus, 1982.
- Kurtz, Paul, ed. The Humanist Alternative. Buffalo, NY: Prometheus, 1973.
- Lamont, Corliss. Humanism as a Philosophy. New York: Philosophical Library, 1949.
- Larue, Gerald A. Freethought across the Centuries: Toward a New Age of Enlightenment. Amherst, NY: American Humanist Press, 1996.
- O'Hair, Madalyn Murray. Atheist Primer: Did You Know All the Gods Came from the Same Place? Austin, TX: American Atheist Press, 1978.
- Robertson, J. M. A History of Freethought, Ancient and Modern to the Period of the French Revolution. 2 vols. London: Watts and Co., 1936.
- Shermer, Michael. Why People Believe Weird Things. New York: W. H. Freeman and Company, 1997.
- Smith, George H. Atheism: The Case against God. Amherst, NY: Prometheus, 1989.
- Stein, Gordon, ed. The Encyclopedia of Unbelief. 2 vols. Buffalo, NY: Prometheus, 1985.
- Thrower, James. Western Atheism: A Short History. Amherst, NY: Prometheus Books, 1999.

Unification Movement

The Unification Movement (UM) refers to the messianic religious and social movement led by the Reverend Sun Myung Moon (b. 1920). It consists of a complex network of religious, media, industrial, commercial, cultural, and educational enterprises worldwide. Many of these organizations, such as The Washington Times and the University of Bridgeport, function independently and include only a few individuals who accept the messianic teachings of the movement. Nevertheless, all of these entities are in one way or another identified with the Reverend Moon.

The Unification Church (UC)—formally, the Holy Spirit Association for the Unification of World Christianity (HSA-UWC)—stands at the center of the movement. It was founded May 1, 1954, in Seoul, Korea, but was not legally recognized by the government of the Republic of (South) Korea until 1963. Highly conversionistic, the UC sent its first missionaries to Japan and the United States in 1958 and 1959. The movement was largely dormant in the United States during the 1960s and had only three hundred or so members in 1971. However, there was more dynamism in Japan, and in the early 1970s, the Reverend Moon decided to concentrate the resources of the movement in America. He conducted a series of evangelistic tours that substantively increased the church's membership and visibility. By 1974, UM sources claimed that members in the United States had increased tenfold to three thousand. The movement filled New York's Madison Square Garden for a highly publicized speech by the Reverend Moon on "The New Future of Christianity" in late 1974. He later spoke to large audiences at New York's Yankee Stadium (1975) and the Washington Monument (1976).

In 1975 the church sent out missionaries to 120 nations but still focused much of its activity in the United States. With the close of the evangelistic campaigns, the UM proliferated a variety of nonprofit and business organizations that extended well beyond the confines of the church. By the early 1970s, the Reverend Moon had initiated an International Conference on the Unity of the Sciences (ICUS) that brought together numerous scientific luminaries annually. The movement also funded the Professors World Peace Academy (PWPA), which in 1992 gained a controlling interest in the University of Bridgeport, Connecticut. The movement operated Sung Hwa, later Sun Moon, University, in Korea, as well as the Little Angels Arts School. It also established the Bolshoi Ballet Academy in Washington, D.C. Unification Theological Seminary (est. 1975) served as the base for a broad-ranging ecumenical program, and during the mid-1970s the movement established its first two metropolitan daily newspapers, Sekai Nippo (1975) in Tokyo and The News World (1976) in New York City. The movement expended millions in founding The Washington Times (1983), which became its flagship media enterprise. In 1989 it established a major daily, Segye Ilbo, in Korea, and in 1996 it set up Tiempos Del Mundo, a Latin American hemispheric daily, in Buenos Aires. The movement's business operations in Korea—including its major holding, Tong-il Industries—were reported to have net assets worth nearly $200 million. The movement focused on maritime ventures in the United States, purchasing shipbuilding yards and fish-processing plants in Norfolk, Virginia; Bayou La Batre, Alabama; Gloucester, Massachusetts; and Kodiak, Alaska, during the late 1970s and 1980s.

Apart from these undertakings, the UM was known for its fervent anti-Communist activities. It set up chapters and training centers for "Victory Over Communism" in Korea and strenuously opposed Marxist advances on Japanese college campuses during the late 1960s and early 1970s. It funded Radio of Free Asia and the Freedom Leadership Foundation (FLF) in the United States during the same period. In 1973–1974, the Reverend Moon initiated a highly publicized National Prayer and Fast for the Watergate Crisis (NPFWC) in support of President Nixon, and he circulated an "Answer to Watergate" in most of the nation's major newspapers. During the 1980s the movement attempted to arm the West ideologically through various organizational affiliates, most notably CAUSA (Confédération des Associations pour l'Unification des Sociétés Américaines), which sponsored high-tech multimedia conferences for conservative leaders and clergy throughout the Americas. The Washington Times played an important role and was reportedly the newspaper of choice in the Reagan White House. At the same time, the movement took advantage of perestroika by assiduously cultivating contacts in the Communist world. The Reverend Moon invited Soviet journalists to participate in annual World Media Conferences and, importantly, invested heavily in mainland China. These initiatives and others gained the Reverend Moon private audiences with Soviet premier Mikhail Gorbachev (1990) and North Korean premier Kim Il Sung (1991).

With the collapse of the Eastern Bloc and Soviet communism, the UM entered what it regarded as an era of messianic fulfillment, or what the Reverend Moon termed the "Completed Testament Age." The movement established innumerable Federations for World Peace and conducted high-profile sisterhood ceremonies between women from formerly enemy nations and peoples. However, the true gateways to the Completed Testament Age were massive International Holy Weddings over which the Rev. and Mrs. Moon officiated in 1992, 1995, 1997, 1998, 1999, and 2000. The UM already had conducted record-breaking weddings for 1,800 couples (1975), 2,075 and 6,000 couples (1982), and 6,500 couples (1989). During the 1990s these numbers soared into the hundreds of thousands and even hundreds of millions as members under the auspices of the Family Federation for World Peace and Unification (FFWPU) campaigned worldwide to rededicate marriages and distributed holy wine, holy grape juice, and eventually holy candy on a mass basis. In addition to the globalization of the Blessing, the UM embarked upon an effort to reclaim a “restored and purified” Garden of Eden in the South American outback, acquiring vast tracts of land primarily in the Brazilian state of Mato Grosso do Sul after 1995.

All of these efforts were animated by the conviction that the Reverend and Mrs. Moon are “the True Parents of all humanity . . . the Savior, the Lord of the Second Advent, the Messiah,” a declaration that the Reverend Moon made publicly in 1992. This declaration brought to completion a series of experiences, which began on Easter morning, 1935, when the Reverend Moon was praying alone on a mountaintop and received what he understood to be “a special mission from Heaven through Jesus.” Afterward, according to his testimony, he “spent years searching precisely how to bring salvation to humankind.” In 1952 he completed a hand-written version of Wolli Wonbon (Original Text of the Principle). This was followed by Wolli Haesul (Explanation of the Principle, 1957) and Wolli Kangron (Exposition of the Principle, 1966), which has served as the movement’s definitive theological and holy text. The latter was translated into English as Divine Principle (1973) or Exposition of the Divine Principle (1996), and Unificationists regard it as “the new expression of God’s truth” that unlocks the secrets of the Bible. It contains chapters on the Creation, the Fall, the Consummation of Human History, the Advent of the Messiah, Resurrection, Predestination, Christology, and an elaborate account of dispensational history, which concludes that the messiah was born as a Korean between 1917 and 1930. The text interprets the human fall in sexual terms and maintains that the crucifixion of Jesus was not God’s original will but the result of human ignorance and disbelief. After 1996, the Reverend Moon Moon instituted Hoon Dok Hae (gathering for reading and learning), utilizing passages from his many volumes of sermons. Some consider Hoon Dok Hae to have displaced the Principle. Others view it as a complementary and more universal expression of the “Completed Testament Word.”

The UM has not been subject to the apocalyptic configurations that have afflicted and destroyed other movements. Nevertheless, the broad scope and duration of negative reactions accompanying its emergence have rendered it one of the most controversial new religious movements of the latter twentieth century. The Communist regime in North Korea jailed Reverend Moon in 1948 for, among other things, “bringing disorder to society.” The South Korean government jailed him for draft evasion in 1955, and unsubstantiated rumors of church sex orgies swirled in Korean society. During the 1960s, Japanese media referred to the Principle Movement as “the religion that makes parents weep,” and in 1971 the practice of kidnapping and deprogramming began. During the 1970s, in the United States, the movement was widely regarded as a brainwashing cult that exploited members, known as “moonies,” and that practiced “heavenly deception.” Alternatively, the UM was depicted as a subversive group abridging the separation of church and state and influencing U.S. policy on behalf of the Korean government. During the 1980s, the U.S. government jailed the Reverend Moon on charges of tax evasion, and during the 1990s there were exposes and allegations leveled against his family. Similar patterns of response have been prevalent elsewhere, notably in Europe, the CIS (Commonwealth of Independent States), Southeast Asia, and Latin America. Still, in the United States and many countries, the Unification Church has gained acceptance as a bona fide religion, related movement components operate as legal entities, and it has been able to extend constitutional protections to members.

The UM’s organizational structure is charismatic, with the Reverend Moon Moon exercising authority over the movement’s direction and major operations. Immediate supervision is delegated to trusted elders, mainly Koreans and some Japanese, who form a spiritual hierarchy extending from senior to new members. The Unification Church has incorporated numerous national churches and maintains missions in more than one hundred nations. However, leadership is often rotated and membership dispersed to forestall premature institutionalization. The literally hundreds of UM-related nonprofit and commercial organizations have led some to describe the UM as a religious multinational. For many years, the Unification Church maintained a World Mission Center in midtown Manhattan. However, the UM’s international headquarters generally have been wherever the Reverend Moon resides. During the 1970s and 1980s, that was Irvington, New York. During the 1990s, he resided for substantial periods in South America and Korea. The movement has constructed a substantial religious shrine north of Seoul at Chungpyung Lake Training Center, where the Reverend Moon frequently went for prayer and meditation. The site, which includes a “heavenly palace” with seating for several thousand as well as sacred trees and healing springs, is understood to be the meeting place of heaven and earth.

Reliable membership totals are difficult to ascertain. During the 1970s, both the movement and its critics exaggerated its size, claiming between two and three million adherents worldwide. During the 1980s observers tended to downplay the movement’s numbers, given a leveling off of conversions in the West. However, this was compensated by growth elsewhere. The number of marriage ceremony participants is the most reliable indicator of UM membership totals. Since 1960 the Reverend Moon has “blessed” approximately 100,000 church couples, suggesting an adult UM membership population approaching 200,000. The UM would appear poised to build on these totals, given the favorable age, sex, and geographical distribution of its members and its encouragement of large families.

Address:

Unification Church in America
4 W. 43rd St.
New York, NY 10036
<http://www.unification.org/>
<http://www.ettl.co.at/uc/europe/> (in Europe)
<http://www.ettl.co.at/uc/index.htm> (multilanguage)

Michael L. Mickler

Sources:

Barker, Eileen. The Making of a Moonie: Choice or Brainwashing? London: Blackwell, 1984.
Chryssides, George. The Advent of Sun Myung Moon. New York: St Martin's, 1991.
Forty Years in America: An Intimate History of the Unification Movement, 1959–1999. New York: HSA-UWC, 2000.
Introvigne, Massimo. The Unification Church. Salt Lake City, UT: Signature Books, forthcoming.
Sontag, Fredrick. Sun Myung Moon and the Unification Church. Nashville, TN: Abingdon, 1977.

Unified Buddhist Church of Vietnam

A number of separate but related organizations have operated under the name of the Unified Buddhist Church of Vietnam (also variously called the United or Unified Buddhist Congregation). The original Unified Buddhist Church of Vietnam (UBC) was the largest Buddhist organization in the Republic of Vietnam (South Vietnam) prior to 1975. Although banned in present-day Vietnam, the UBC remains religiously and politically active, both in its homeland and through related groups in diaspora. Furthermore, the history of the UBC is inextricable from the influential Buddhist form of social activism known as “engaged Buddhism.”

Specifically, the genealogy of the UBC can be traced to attempts, first, to counter the suppression of Buddhist activities in the early 1960s, and later, to find an effective, integrated Buddhist response to the Vietnam-U.S. war. Protests and demonstrations began over the suppression of Buddhist activity by the U.S.-supported, Catholic president Ngo Dinh Diem (1901–1963). As the antagonism grew, monks and lay leaders were jailed, and a number of demonstrators were killed. Several monks burned themselves to death, including Thich Quang Duc, whose photograph focused worldwide attention on the Buddhist struggle in South Vietnam. In 1964, following a coup and Diem's assassination, monks in central and southern Vietnam organized the UBC at a conference in Saigon. Early leaders included Thich Tri Quang, Thich Tam Chau, and Thich Nhat Hanh.

The UBC was a diverse organization, spanning Vietnamese Buddhism's historical divisions, and it included local THERAVADA, MAHAYANA, ethnic Chinese, and Khmer, as well as sectarian laypeople, monks, and temples. It was not the only Buddhist organization in Vietnam, but the UBC became the most prominent Buddhist voice in the Republic of Vietnam's politics. Although the UBC was beset with internal disagreements over the proper place of Buddhist political advocacy (not new to twentieth-century Buddhism), protests against the military government, the war, and U.S. involvement in Vietnam broadened with mass rallies. In May 1966 a violent crackdown on what had become known as the Buddhist Struggle Movement resulted in more deaths and the imprisonment of thousands of monks. Thus ended the UBC's most overt attempt to bring democracy to South Vietnam. UBC members nevertheless continued to be involved in war and refugee relief activities. Thich Nhat Hanh, having recently escaped an assassination attempt, was abroad at the time of the crackdown and never returned.

After the fall of Saigon, religious activity was severely curtailed, and the UBC was compelled to continue its political opposition at times underground. In 1981 the government formed an official Buddhist church, forcing the UBC deeper into the shadows. Through regular cycles of government oppression of religious activism, whether political or humanitarian, UBC members have continued in their opposition to government regulation of religion. In 1992, UBC leader Thich Quang Do, the most prominent religious activist in contemporary Vietnam and a Nobel Peace Prize nominee, published an open letter to the government in advocacy of religious freedom and an open society. His imprisonment, house arrest, and continued humanitarian efforts have been a catalyst for world attention to the issue of religious freedom in Vietnam through the 1990s and early twenty-first century.

Thich Nhat Hanh continues to advocate for socially engaged Buddhism with an international organization also known as the Église Bouddhique Unifiée, which is based in France at his compound, Plum Village. This incarnation of the UBC is widely known among Vietnamese in diaspora and in Vietnam, but it also possesses a large following among convert Buddhists in North America and Europe. A greater number of Vietnamese Buddhists in exile are involved with disparate (and not more than loosely linked) descendants of the UBC, such as the Unified Buddhist Church, Inc., Vietnamese American Unified Buddhist Congress in the U.S.A., the Unified Buddhist Congregation in Australia-New Zealand, and other organizations in those countries, France, Germany, Canada, and throughout the worldwide Vietnamese diaspora.

Douglas M. Padgett

Sources:

King, Sallie. “Thich Nhat Hanh and the Unified Buddhist Church: Nondualism in Action.” In Engaged Buddhism: Buddhist Liberation Movements in Asia, edited by Sallie B. King and Christopher S. Queen, 321–363. Albany: State University of New York Press, 1996.

Topmiller, Robert. "The Lotus Unleashed: The Buddhist Struggle Movement in South Vietnam, 1964–1966." Ph.D. dissertation, University of Kentucky, 1998.

———. "Vietnamese Buddhism in the 1990s." Cross Currents 50, 1/2 (Spring/Summer 2000): 232–240.

"Vietnam: The Suppression of the Unified Buddhist Church." Human Rights Watch/Asia 7, 4 (March 1995).

Unified Buddhist Church, the Order of Interbeing, and the Community of Mindful Living

The Venerable Thich Nhat Hanh (b. 1926) entered Tu Hieu monastery in Hue (central Vietnam) at the age of seventeen and was ordained into the Lam Te (RINZAI [JAPAN], LIN-CHI [CHINA], IMJE [KOREA], LAM-TE [VIETNAM]) Zen sect. His studies included both MAHAYANA and THERAVADA traditions, emphasizing mindfulness, gatha (short verses), and koan. Later he studied religion in the United States at Princeton University and lectured at Columbia University.

Returning to Vietnam in 1964, Nhat Hanh, together with others, founded Van Hanh University in Saigon and the School of Youth for Social Service, one of the primary vehicles of Engaged Buddhism during the Vietnam War. In 1965, Nhat Hanh founded the Tiep Hien Order, the Order of Interbeing, a new branch of the Lam Te School and another manifestation of Engaged Buddhism; the order consists of laypersons as well as monks and nuns and includes those who have taken the order's fourteen precepts.

During the years of the Vietnam War, Nhat Hanh was one of the primary theoreticians and spokespersons of the Struggle Movement, the Buddhist effort to bring peace to Vietnam while siding with neither north nor south. His 1966 international speaking tour to publicize the Vietnamese Buddhist perspective led to his life in exile, which has continued to the present. In 1967, Nhat Hanh was nominated for the Nobel Peace Prize by Martin Luther King Jr., whom he had convinced to repudiate the war publicly.

Since the war, Nhat Hanh has traveled the Western world, leading workshops and retreats emphasizing mindfulness (cultivating awareness in the present moment); the five Mindfulness Trainings (his engaged version of the five lay precepts—not only does one do no harm oneself but one also finds ways to prevent others from causing harm, and so forth); and nonviolent engagement of Buddhism with all aspects of life. Nhat Hanh's approach is typified in the title of his most famous book, Being Peace: one must be peace in order to make peace. For Nhat Hanh, Buddhism is about cultivating our love and understanding, which will then naturally be expressed in all aspects of our lives.

The UNIFIED BUDDHIST CHURCH OF VIETNAM was founded in Vietnam in 1963 to create a unified Buddhist voice during the volatile period of intense conflict between the government of South Vietnam and South Vietnamese Buddhists. Nhat Hanh reestablished the UBC in France in 1969 as the Église Bouddhique Unifiée and in 1998 in the United States as the Unified Buddhist Church, Inc. The UBC is outlawed by the government in Vietnam, where only the government-established and -controlled Buddhist Church of Vietnam is permitted.

Today the Unified Buddhist Church has major practice centers with residential monks and nuns in Vermont and California. There are home-based practice groups in most countries of Western Europe, as well as the United States, Canada, Australia, India, Israel, Japan, New Zealand, Russia, Poland, Guatemala, the Dominican Republic, and Brazil. This loose-knit lay organization is called the Community of Mindful Living. The monks at Nhat Hanh's root temple, Tu Hieu, in Hue, Vietnam, also claim him as their teacher, but he has not been able to visit them.

Approximately 120 monks and nuns have been ordained into the Lam Te Order and Order of Interbeing by Nhat Hanh. Nhat Hanh considers as his students those who have taken the fourteen Precepts of the Order of Interbeing and those who have taken the five Mindfulness Trainings from him, but there is no estimate of the number of laypersons who have done so. Nhat Hanh himself does not encourage Westerners to convert to Buddhism; he encourages them, if they are Christians, to "be good Christians"; if Jews, to "be good Jews." He does encourage everyone to take the five Mindfulness Trainings, in an ecumenical spirit, as guides for mindful living.

Address:

Unified Buddhist Church
Plum Village, New Hamlet
13 Martineau
33580 Dieulivol
France

<http://www.plumvillage.org>

Sallie B. King

Sources:

Hunt-Perry, Patricia, and Lyn Fine. "All Buddhism Is Engaged: Thich Nhat Hanh and the Order of Interbeing." In Engaged Buddhism in the West, edited by Christopher S. Queen, 35–66. Boston: Wisdom, 2000.

King, Sallie B. "Thich Nhat Hanh and the Unified Buddhist Church: Nondualism in Action." In Engaged Buddhism: Buddhist Liberation Movements in Asia, edited by Christopher S. Queen and Sallie B. King, 321–363. Albany: State University of New York Press, 1996.

Nhat Hanh, Thich. Being Peace. Berkeley, CA: Parallax Press, 1987.

Union d'Églises Baptistes Françaises au Canada

The French Baptist Union's roots are in the Grand Leigne Mission, which was founded as a school by Madame Henriette Feller and Louis Roussy, two missionaries representing the Swiss Missionary Society (Reformed), who arrived in Montreal in 1835. In 1849 it became Baptist, and by 1855 there were twenty preaching points and more than three thousand converts. After Mme Feller's death in 1868, nine churches organized as the Union des Églises Baptistes de Langue Françaises while being part of the Grande Ligne Mission.

At the beginning of the twentieth century there were several thousand members in the churches in the Ottawa-Montreal area, as far east as Nova Scotia and as far west as Manitoba. Against rising French nationalism, however, the mission was seen as a tool of the English. By 1960, when the Quiet Revolution flourished in Quebec, the decline was clear, with only one in nine of the pastors being French Canadian.

Union d'Églises Baptistes Française au Canada received a federal charter in 1966. The Reverend Maurice Boillat, a Swiss-born pastor, became the first full-time general secretary, who broke down barriers between the union and the Quebecois culture. It developed a headquarters in Montreal; a radio and television studio; a Bible college; and, in 1982, the Centre d'Etudes Théologiques Évangéliques.

The Union d'Églises Baptistes Françaises au Canada in 1970 became the fourth body in the Baptist Federation of Canada, with eight churches and 398 members. By 1986 they had grown to 1,404 members, with nine of nineteen churches self-supporting, and fifteen of twenty-two pastors being French-Canadians. Today there are twenty-seven churches and 1,300 members in Quebec and New Brunswick that provide both inspiration and completion to Canadian Baptist Ministries.

Address:

Union d'Églises Baptistes Françaises au Canada
2285 Papineau
Montreal, Quebec H2K 4J5
Canada
<http://www.unionbaptiste.com/>

Robert S. Wilson

Sources:

- Bentall, Shirley. From Sea to Sea: The Canadian Baptist Federation 1944–1994. Mississauga, ON: Canadian Baptist Federation, 1994.
- Grant, John Webster. The Church in the Canadian Experience. Vancouver, BC: Regent College, 1998.
- Renfree, Harry A. Heritage and Horizon: The Baptist Story in Canada. Mississauga, ON: Canadian Baptist Federation, 1988.
- Zeman, Jarold Knox. Baptist in Canada. Burlington, ON: G. R. Welch, 1980.
- . Costly Vision: The Baptist Pilgrimage in Canada. Burlington, ON: G. R. Welch, 1988.

Union of Baptist Churches of Cameroon

The Union of Baptist Churches of Cameroon (Union des Églises Baptistes du Cameroun) traces its history to the British Baptist Missionary Association, which began work in West Africa utilizing converts from among the recently freed Africans residing on Jamaica. In 1843, forty-two Jamaicans and four European couples established a mission station on Fernando Po (now Bioko), an island off the coast of Cameroon. In 1845, Joseph Merrick, a Jamaican, moved to West Cameroon and began learning the language of the Usubu people. One of the Europeans, Alfred Saker, moved to Cameroon Town (now Duala), where he founded the first Baptist church in Cameroon in 1849.

The Baptist work grew slowly until 1884, when Germany assumed authority in Cameroon. The Baptists turned their work over to the BASEL MISSION, a Swiss missionary society that drew support primarily from Reformed churches in Germany and Austria. The new workers agreed to respect the Baptist faith of the converts, but many did not like the manner of the Basel missionaries or their introduction of non-Baptist practices such as infant baptism. Those who retained their Baptist distinctives rejected the Basel leadership and turned to German Baptists in Germany and the United States for support. Baptist missionaries arrived to assume control of the mission, and in 1898 they formed the Mission Society of German Baptists.

The German missionaries were expelled during World War I, and the work of the Mission Society was largely turned over to the PARIS MISSION (of the REFORMED CHURCH OF FRANCE), which agreed to respect the Baptist beliefs and practices. This mission continued to develop with the assistance of the Paris missionaries, and in 1952 it reorganized as the Union of Baptist Churches of Cameroon. The union became fully autonomous in 1957.

The Union of Baptist Churches is a member of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES and the BAPTIST WORLD ALLIANCE. In the mid-1990s it reported some sixty thousand members.

Address:

Union of Baptist Churches
B.P. 6007
New Bell, Douala
Cameroon

Sources:

- Allégret, E. La Mission du Cameroun. Paris: Evangelical Missionary Society, 1924.
- Kwast, Lloyd E. The Discipling of West Cameroon: A Study of Baptist Growth. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans, 1971.
- Wardin, Albert W., ed. Baptists around the World. Nashville: Holman, 1995.

Union of Evangelical Christians–Baptists of Russia

The Union of Evangelical Christians–Baptists of Russia, founded in 1979, is the largest organization of Baptist Christians in Russia. The union also carries the tradition of Baptists in the country, a tradition that has a severely broken organizational presence because of the periodic repression of religion in Russia. In the last decade, with the relative religious freedom of post-Soviet life, Russian Baptists have become known for their allegiance to traditional Baptist standards, including the pious life expected of present members and the testimony of repentance and faith of new members prior to their baptism by immersion.

The Baptist entrance into what was then the Russian Empire had at least three different points of origin. First, in 1855, a man named Plonus, a tailor, moved from Memel (then in Germany but today in Lithuania) to St. Petersburg, where he distributed Christian tracts and gathered a small circle of believers. Three years later, Gottfried Alf (1831–1858), a German Lutheran residing in Poland, was baptized and went on to found Baptist churches in Poland and the Ukraine. The German-led Baptist movement spread throughout the empire from the Transcaucasus to Siberia. In some cases, German-speaking communities in various parts of Russia served as the originating point from which Baptist perspectives were disseminated to the surrounding communities.

Toleration was granted to Baptists in those areas in which Lutheranism was the dominant religion, but such toleration was not granted in predominantly Orthodox areas. In the Ukraine and Russia proper, the abandoning of the Russian Orthodox Church was not permitted. In spite of this obstacle, in 1887 the German Baptists in the Russian Empire founded the Union of Baptist Churches of Russia and formally separated from the Baptist Union of Germany (now the UNION OF EVANGELICAL FREE CHURCH CONGREGATIONS [BAPTIST]).

A second Baptist movement began in the Ukraine in the 1860s with the spread of Ukrainian Bibles and literature. One Ukrainian, Efim Tsymbal, raised in the Orthodox Church, received a believer's baptism from a group of Mennonite Brethren living in the Ukraine and went on to launch a Baptist movement among the Ukrainian citizenry. He and two evangelists he discovered and baptized, Ivan Ryaboshapka (1831–1900) and Mikhail Ratushni (1830–c. 1915), found an opening among the Stundists, followers of a movement who gathered for an hour (or stunde) of devotion every day. In the Ukraine, most Stundists became Baptists.

A movement similar to that in the Ukraine began in 1862 in Georgia when Martin Kalweit (1833–1918) baptized Nikita I. Voronin (1840–1905). This movement drew considerable strength from the Molokans, a Protestant-like group that had rejected the sacramentalism of the Russian Orthodox Church. The new Baptist movement soon spread throughout Caucasus and in the early 1880s ran into the Ukraine. The two groups formed a single united front in 1884 with the founding of the Russian Baptist Union.

In 1874, Lord Radstock, a member of the CHURCH OF ENGLAND with leanings toward the PLYMOUTH BRETHREN (EXCLUSIVE) teachings of John Nelson Darby, began to preach in St. Petersburg. His work attracted Colonel Vasili A. Pashkov (1831–1902), who would lend his name to the movement that resulted from Radstock's effort. The movement spread as a spiritual revival among Orthodox believers and was thus able to grow to some extent free of government interference. It survived until 1905 and the granting of religious toleration, and then it went public with the founding of two congregations in St. Petersburg. They called themselves Evangelical Christians. After a brief association with the Russian Baptist Union, Pashkov and the Evangelical Christians separated and in 1909 formed the All-Russian Union of Evangelical Christians.

The Russian Revolution brought significant change, beginning with a period of rapid growth only to be followed by decades of persecution and restriction. By the end of the 1930s, most churches were closed and many pastors and other church leaders arrested on various charges. Finally, in 1944 the government allowed/forced the Baptists and Evangelical Christians to form the All Union Council of Evangelical Christians-Baptists, which was to be the single organization for all Protestants who accepted adult believers' baptism. The union would eventually become home to Pentecostals and the Mennonite Brethren.

In the years after World War II, the All Union Council was allowed some freedom. It published a periodical; in 1955 it participated in the meeting of the Baptist World Alliance; and in 1962 it was accepted into the World Council of Churches. Then in 1960, during the presidency of Nikita Khrushchev, the union was forced to sign a letter of instruction to its member congregations limiting evangelism. That letter led to a schism, with the new group taking the name Council of Churches of Evangelical Christians-Baptists. The council, popularly known as Reform Baptists, accused the union of cooperating too closely with the state.

Some relief came in 1988 with the reforms that began under Gorbachev, but a reunion between the two groups has not been worked out. Then in 1992, a significant change occurred in the wake of the fall of the Soviet Union and the emergence of the Commonwealth of Independent States. The All Union Council of Evangelical Christians-Baptists gave way to the Euro-Asiatic Federation of Unions of Evangelical Christians-Baptists, uniting Baptists in ten independent Baptist Unions. The bulk of the membership remained in the Union of Evangelical Christians–Baptists of Russia, which in the 1990s reported seventy-nine thousand members in more than a thousand churches. The Pentecostal members, always in an uneasy position in the union, left and organized separately in 1989.

The union's new five-story headquarters building also houses the headquarters of the federation and the Moscow Baptist Seminary. The union cooperates in the issuance of the federation's two periodicals. The union has launched a vast evangelism effort throughout the country and has nurtured the formation of Sunday schools with each of its congregations. The union continues its membership in the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES and the BAPTIST WORLD ALLIANCE.

Address:

Union of Evangelical Christians–Baptists of Russia
International P.O. Box 171
Moscow
Russia

Sources:

- Sawatsky, Walter. Soviet Evangelicals since World War II. Kitchener, ON: Herald, 1981.
- Steeves, Paul. The Russian Baptist Union, 1917–1935. Lawrence: University of Kansas, 1976.
- Wardin, Albert W., Jr. Evangelical Sectarians in the Russian Empire and USSR: A Bibliographical Guide. Metuchen, NJ: Scarecrow, 1995.

Union of Evangelical Christians–Baptists of the Ukraine

The Baptist Church originated in the Ukraine with the movement of Germans who happened to be Baptists into the territory. They formed two churches, in Horczik and Soroczin, in 1864. Simultaneously, other tendencies toward the Baptist position appeared among others of German background in the country, including Mennonites and those independent pietists called Stundists. The government and the Orthodox Church allowed little room for religious deviance, and persecution began. However, in 1884, a Russian Baptist Union was formed.

Ukrainian Baptists formed an All Ukrainian Baptist Union in 1918, following the Russian Revolution. They were allowed to exist and met regularly through the 1920s. In 1926 they began a periodical to further spread their message. The relative freedom of the 1920s gave way to a period of persecution and repression of the 1930s. They were forced into the All Union Council of Evangelical Christians-Baptists in 1944 but maintained some autonomy through the retention of their own senior presbyter and other presbyters for different sections of the church in the region.

In 1992 the Ukrainian Baptists formed an independent union, though one that retains fraternal relations with similar organizations in Russia and other countries formerly a part of the Soviet Union. Three years earlier they once again had been able to begin a periodical. The Ukrainian Baptists, with more than 105,000 members, now claim more than half of all the Baptists that once resided in the Soviet Union.

The union is a member of both the BAPTIST WORLD ALLIANCE and the Euro-Asiatic Federation of Unions of Evangelical Christians-Baptists.

Address:

Union of Evangelical Christians–Baptists of the Ukraine
3-a Tolstoi St.
252004 Kiev 4
Ukraine

Sources:

- Tolbet, Robert G. Venture of Faith. Philadelphia: Judson, 1955.
- Wardin, Albert W., ed. Baptists around the World. Nashville: Holman, 1995.

Union of Evangelical Free Church Congregations (Baptist)

The Union of Evangelical Free Church Congregations (Baptist), or Bund Evangelisch-Freikirchlicher Gemeinden, continues the thrust of the Baptist movement in Germany that originated in the 1830s. German-born Johann Gerhard Oncken (1800–1884) grew up in Scotland, where he encountered some evangelical Christians and experienced a personal conversion. In 1823 he returned to Germany to distribute Bibles and Christian literature. Along the way, his own Bible study convinced him of the truth of the Baptist belief that limits baptism to adult believers. The story of his change of belief was eventually called to the attention of American Baptists then still in the early stages of their organization. One of their leaders, Barnas Sears, traveled to Germany in 1833 and contacted Oncken. The following year he baptized Oncken and seven others who then formed the first Baptist Church in Germany, in Hamburg. This church would become the mother church not only for German Baptists but also for much of Europe. In 1835 Oncken was appointed as a missionary for the American Baptist Triennial Convention (now the AMERICAN BAPTIST CHURCHES IN THE U.S.A.).

The Baptists suffered persecution in their early years, but in 1842 their response to a fire that swept Hamburg gained them the respect of the city. Then legal changes in 1848 and 1850 provided some greater degree of religious freedom. In 1848, Oncken founded a periodical, Das Missionblatt. He also began to hold regular classes for ministerial students that grew into the Baptist seminary in 1880. He traveled widely and brought together the groups that became the nucleus around which Baptist churches emerged throughout German-speaking Europe.

Oncken attracted a number of talented assistants, among them Julius Wilhelm Köbner and Gottfried Wilhelm

Union of Indonesian Baptist Churches

Lehmann. Köbner, the son of a Danish rabbi, established the first Baptist churches in Denmark, and Lehmann led in the organization of German Baptists. In 1848, Lehmann called together representatives of the churches in Germany and created the first association. That led to the formation the next year of the Union of Associated Churches of Baptized Christians in Germany and Denmark.

In the 1870s, Baptists had to struggle to assert their freedom from Oncken who, as the patriarch of the movement, had increasingly wanted to see the many churches in Germany as mere branches of the Hamburg church. The German union was threatened but survived through the end of Oncken's career. The movement continued to grow through the 1930s. In 1936 the Baptist Union accepted the Elim Congregations, a Pentecostal fellowship, into membership, and in 1940 the Baptists merged with the Plymouth Brethren to form the Union of Evangelical Free Church Congregations.

The union was hard hit by the war; it lost many members and leaders. Half of their buildings, including the seminary and printing facilities in Hamburg, were destroyed. Following the war, the country was divided. For a while the union held together, but in 1970 the East Germans withdrew and formed a separate union. Meanwhile, the Pentecostals and some of the Brethren congregations withdrew from the union, and the term Baptist was added to the union's name. Then, in 1991, after the reunification of Germany, the East and West German congregations were reintegrated into a single union.

In 1974 the Baptists of German-speaking Europe came together to create a confession of faith—"An Account of Our Faith"—finally accepted in 1977. The confession affirms the basics of the Reformed faith, the belief in baptism by immersion for adult believers, and the nature of the Christian life.

In 1990 the union reported eighty-seven thousand members in 590 churches. Besides the seminary in Hamburg, many German-speaking Baptists attend the seminary in Rüschtikon, Switzerland. The union is a member of the BAPTIST WORLD ALLIANCE.

Address:

Union of Evangelical Free Church Congregations (Baptist)
Friedberger Str. 101
Postfach 1262
61282 Bad Homburg v.d.H
Germany

Sources:

Balders, Günter, ed. Ein Herr, ein Glaube, eine Taufe. Wuppertal/Kassel, Germany: Oncken, 1984, 1989.
Der bund Evangelisch-Freikirchlicher Gemeinden in Deutschland. Wuppertal/Kassel, Germany: Oncken, 1992.
McBeth, H. Leon. The Baptist Heritage: Four Centuries of the Baptist Witness. Nashville, TN: Broadman, 1987.

Rushbrooke, J. H. The Baptist Movement in the Continent of Europe. London: Kingsgate, 1923.

Union of Indonesian Baptist Churches

The Union of Indonesian Baptist Churches (Gebungan Gereja Baptis Indonesia) began with the closing of China to foreign religious leadership in 1949. In 1951 three former missionaries from China arrived in Jakarta, the capital of the newly independent country of Indonesia. They were assisted by Ais Pormes, an Indonesian trained in Australia and the United States, who soon became pastor of a growing Baptist church in Jakarta.

Growth of the church was slow, though a Baptist presence was built during the next fifteen years through the formation of a seminary, a publishing house, and a hospital on Java, with support from the Foreign Mission Board of the SOUTHERN BAPTIST CONVENTION. Thus the mission was in place when, following an attempted government coup in 1965, there was a sudden move to Christianity that the missionaries could only describe as phenomenal. The union was established in 1971.

During subsequent years, Baptists connected with the union established work on Sumatra, Bali, and several of the other Indonesian islands. It established a hospital on Sumatra and pursued a rural development program. Korean and Japanese Baptists also added their resources to the expansion of the church.

In the mid-1990s, the union reported more than fifty thousand members in 625 churches. It is a member of the BAPTIST WORLD ALLIANCE.

Address:

Union of Indonesian Baptist Churches
P.O. Box 2474
Jakarta 10001
Indonesia

Source:

Nance, John Irvin. A History of the Indonesian Baptist Mission: 1950–1960. M.A. thesis, Baylor University, 1969.

Union of Messianic Congregations

The Union of Messianic Congregations is the oldest and largest of several groups that have emerged out of a new movement within Evangelical Christianity. Messianic Judaism originated in nineteenth- and twentieth-century Protestant missions to the Jews, as well as in the countercultural religious and ethnic ferment of the 1960s and 1970s. Jewish- and Gentile-born adherents accept "Yeshua" (Jesus) as Savior and Son of God, as well as other standard tenets of Evangelical theology, but they adopt Jewish practices to express that faith. Today, hundreds of congregations throughout the world affirm this unique Jewish/Christian religious identity.

In the nineteenth and early twentieth centuries, Protestant missionaries used Jewish symbols and language to communicate the message of salvation to Jewish audiences, and they sponsored separate congregational worship for new Hebrew-Christian converts. By the 1950s several Hebrew-Christian congregations existed under Protestant denominational control that kept potentially dangerous “Judaizing” to a minimum. Hebrew Christians were still eventually expected to “melt” into existing church structures.

In the 1960s and 1970s, however, the growing interest among young adults in ethnic identity and religious meaning led to new developments. Martin “Moishe” Rosen, an evangelist with the older American Board of Missions of the Jews, left to found “Jews for Jesus,” to demonstrate that Jewish identity need not be washed away by baptism. Although new converts were still expected to join Christian churches, the missionary organization effectively utilized Jewish symbols to reach Jewish youth. By 1975 the Hebrew Christian Alliance of America had changed its name to the Messianic Jewish Alliance of America as a symbol of self-acceptance and as a successful evangelization tool. More important, key leaders such as Martin Chemoff began to form congregations to maintain Jewish identity; “assimilating” into churches was now rejected. “Jesus” became “Yeshua,” churches were reorganized as “synagogues,” and Protestant hymns were replaced with Jewish-sounding music and Israeli dancing. A Jewish calendar was followed, with Christological messages inserted into each holiday using altered Jewish liturgy. As additional messianic congregations formed, representatives met in 1979 to create the Union of Messianic Jewish Congregations.

This lifestyle alteration led to deeper theological discussions concerning the place of Jewishness in the movement, dividing congregations into several groups. The two largest are the Union of Messianic Jewish Congregations and the International Alliance of Messianic Jewish Congregations. The alliance, founded in 1986, is formally affiliated with the Messianic Jewish Alliance of America. It includes congregations in more than twenty countries around the world. Both groups accept Charismatic theology and worship, plus a modicum of Jewish practices amended to fit Evangelical faith. (Noncharismatic Messianic congregations have organized the Fellowship of Messianic Jewish Congregations. A few Messianic congregations are independent, but some others have been accepted into Evangelical denominations such as the EVANGELICAL FREE CHURCH OF AMERICA and the ASSEMBLIES OF GOD.) All Messianics agree, however, that Jesus was a Jew, Jewish identity is God-given, and thus Jewish practices can enrich and even fulfill the original purpose of Christianity; most agree that Jewish believers will lead the great revival at the End of Days.

American Jews oppose the Messianic movement because of their active proselytization of Jews with the seemingly false message that one can be both Jewish and Christian. “Jews for Judaism” is the most prominent organization countering what it sees as Messianic deception of the ignorant, and some feel that it unnecessarily divides believers into Jewish and Gentile populations.

Today, there are more than 250 congregations of the Union of Messianic Congregations in the United States, with dozens more worldwide, often building on earlier Hebrew-Christian missions. A generous membership estimate would be fifty thousand. However, the union’s influence is much greater in Jewish circles as a threat to Jewish continuity and in Christian circles as a success story of Jewish evangelism and a living reminder of original Jewish Christianity.

Addresses:

Union of Messianic Jewish Congregations
529 Jefferson St. NE
Albuquerque, NM 87108

International Alliance of Messianic Jewish Congregations
P.O. Box 274
Springfield, PA 19064

Carol Harris-Shapiro

Sources:

- Ariel, Yaakov. Evangelizing the Chosen People. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 2000.
- Cohn-Sherbok, Dan. Messianic Judaism: The First Study of Messianic Judaism by a Non-Adherent. New York: Continuum, 2000.
- Harris-Shapiro, Carol. Messianic Judaism: A Rabbi’s Journey through Religious Change in America. Boston: Beacon, 1999.
- Internet sites on Messianic Judaism include the home pages of the Union of Messianic Jewish Congregations (<http://www.umjc.org>) and the International Alliance of Messianic Jewish Congregations (<http://www.mjaa.org>), plus pages reflective of Jewish assessment of the movement, such as <http://www.jewsforJudaism.org/j4j-2000/html/library/rnessianicjudaism.html>.
- Schiffman, Michael. Return of the Remnant: The Rebirth of Messianic Judaism. Baltimore: Lederer, 1992.
- Stern, David. Messianic Jewish Manifesto. Jerusalem: Jewish New Testament Publications, 1989.

Union of the Armenian Evangelical Churches in the Near East

The Union of the Armenian Evangelical Churches in the Near East began as a reform movement within the ARMENIAN APOSTOLIC CHURCH but was established as an independent Protestant community in Istanbul in 1846. It grew through the nineteenth century to include more than sixty thousand members scattered throughout the Ottoman Empire. However, during World War I, the Turks turned on the Armenians and massacred more than two million of them. That event and the subsequent movement of Armenians out of the Turkish-controlled territory decimated the union.

Union of Welsh Independents

In the 1920s, the union reorganized in Lebanon and Syria. Today it includes some twenty-three congregations with approximately ten thousand members. It is organized as a union of organized churches who elect a committee of twelve members that carry on the work of the union. It is related through the Supreme Council of the Evangelical Community in Syria and Lebanon with the National Evangelical Union of Lebanon and the NATIONAL EVANGELICAL SYNOD OF SYRIA. Together the three churches support the Near East School of Theology in Beirut.

The union sponsors Haigazian University College and cooperates with the Armenian Apostolic Church in cosponsoring a hospital and two nursing homes. It is a member of the Middle East Council of Churches and the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES.

Address:

Union of the Armenian Evangelical Churches in the Near East
P.O. Box 11-377
Ibrahim Pasha Mar Mikhael
Beirut
Lebanon

Sources:

Bauswein, Jean-Jacques, and Lukas Vischer, eds. The Reformed Family Worldwide: A Survey of Reformed Churches, Theological Schools, and International Organizations. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans, 1999.

Chopourian, G. H. The Armenian Evangelical Reformation: Causes and Effects. New York: Armenian Missionary Association of America, 1972.

Union of Welsh Independents

Wales, a separate country with a separate language, was united with England in 1536. English became the official language, and as Henry began the Reformation, English replaced Latin as the official language of worship for the CHURCH IN WALES (Anglican). Although many adopted English as their primary language, voices continually arose requesting worship in Welsh, and in 1588 a Welsh edition of the Bible was finally published.

As a whole, the dissenting traditions (Presbyterians, Congregationalists, and so forth) had less problem with the Welsh language, though dissent in Wales carried the same social disapproval and legal restrictions as it did in England. Independency experienced a revival in Wales as a result of the Evangelical Awakening in the middle of the eighteenth century, and numerous informal religious societies emerged across the land. Many supported the London Missionary Society (formed in 1795) and joined with the Congregational Union of England and Wales (formed in 1832).

The Union of Welsh Independents (Undeb yr Annibynwyr Cymraeg) formed among Congregationalists in Wales in 1872. It continued the tradition of the Puritan movement of the seventeenth century but has emphasized the preservation of Welsh culture and language. Within that concern, the union has participated in various ecumenical endeavors and was early in accepting women into ministerial orders (1925).

In the 1990s the union reported more than forty-five thousand members in its six hundred congregations. It is a member of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES and the WORLD ALLIANCE OF REFORMED CHURCHES. It also joins in the conferences sponsored by the INTERNATIONAL CONGREGATIONAL FELLOWSHIP.

Address:

Union of Welsh Independents
11 St. Helen Rd.
Abertawe, Swansea
Wales SA1 4AL
United Kingdom

Sources:

Bauswein, Jean-Jacques, and Lukas Vischer, eds. The Reformed Family Worldwide: A Survey of Reformed Churches, Theological Schools, and International Organizations. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans, 1999.

Van der Bent, Ans J., ed. Handbook/Member Churches/World Council of Churches. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 1985.

Unitarian Universalist Association

The Unitarian Universalist Association (UUA) is the primary carrier of the several strains of the liberal religious tradition that developed in nineteenth-century America in dissent from the Orthodox Christian faith. Since the time of the Protestant Reformation, teachers have appeared who advocated non-Trinitarian approaches to theology. However, in the United States a new challenge appeared among the Congregational churches (now an integral part of the United Church of Christ) in the person of Joseph Priestly. Response to his preaching in the 1790s led to the founding of the first Unitarian churches. Then in 1819, William Ellery Channing preached a famous sermon that became a catalyst for the formation of a Unitarian movement. In this sermon he called for an emphasis on the oneness of God and the role of Christ as a moral exemplar. The American Unitarian Association was founded in 1825, and the Congregational churches were called upon to choose between the Trinitarian and Unitarian positions.

Even earlier, in the 1760s, John Murray had been expelled from the London tabernacle founded by George Whitefield because of his belief that hell was not the destiny of unbelievers and his preaching that eventually all would be saved.

He moved to the American colonies and then became an itinerant preacher. By the time of the American Revolution the first Universalist congregations had begun to appear. These churches came together in 1786 to issue the Articles of Association for Universalist Churches. The association was short-lived, but Murray was succeeded by Hosea Ballou, who accomplished a more permanent organization in 1790.

The Universalist Church of America and the American Unitarian Association grew up side by side through the nineteenth and twentieth centuries. Although they saw themselves as the more liberal wing of the Protestant churches, many felt that they were far more than just another Christian sect. They felt that in denying the Trinity and the doctrine of hell, both groups had placed themselves beyond the boundaries of the faith. Neither group was invited to participate in ecumenical organizations.

The Unitarian Association and Universalist Church merged in 1961 to form the Unitarian Universalist Association. Although the association acknowledges its roots in Christianity, in the decades since the merger it has steadily moved away from those roots in the acceptance of a broad spectrum of religious perspectives within its membership. Not only are Humanism and other nontheist perspectives acceptable but, in addition, Eastern religious systems have taken root among the members. Possibly the most interesting of recent developments has been the growth of neopagan Witchcraft (or Wicca) in the association, which has been given structure through the Covenant of Unitarian Universalist Pagans (CUUPs). Christian Unitarians continue to exist as one caucus among many.

The UUA is organized congregationally. Congregational representatives gather annually for a national meeting. In 2000 the association reported 155,000 members in North America.

American Unitarianism was exported by missionaries to India and Japan in the nineteenth century. As a result of its work in India, the Unitarians became aware of the BRAHMO SAMAJ and the similarity of their beliefs. Eventually the Unitarians withdrew from India and have continued their fraternal ties to the Brahma Samaj. Through the twentieth century, the association developed followings among expatriate communities in Europe. Universalists, meanwhile, developed a missionary program in Japan.

Unitarians also became aware of their Reformation roots in the teachings of Fausto Socinius (1539–1604), who had great success in spreading non-Trinitarian beliefs in Poland, and Francis David (d. 1579), who propagated Unitarian beliefs in Romania. Their work continues in the Unitarian Church in Romania, with whom the American association developed a fraternal relationship. In 1995, American Unitarians led in the formation of the International Council of Unitarian Universalists, to nurture those of a similar persuasion around the world. Through the nineteenth century some cooperative activity had been carried out through the INTERNATIONAL ASSOCIATION FOR RELIGIOUS FREEDOM.

Address:

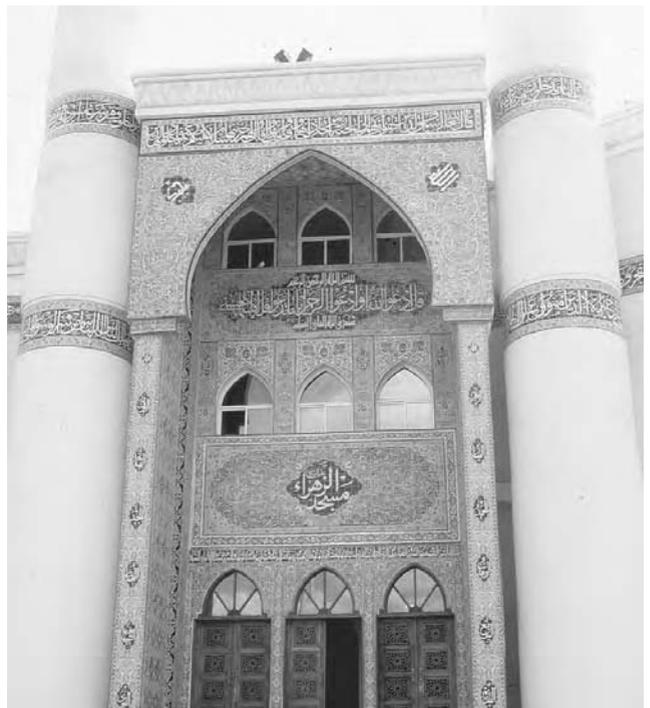

Unitarian Universalist Association
25 Beacon St.
Boston, MA 02108
<http://www.uua.org/>

Sources:

- Alstrom, Sydney E., and Jonathan S. Carey. An American Reformation. Middletown, CT: Wesleyan University Press, 1985.
- Miller, Russell E. The Larger Hope. 2 vols. Boston: Unitarian Universalist Association, 1979, 1985.
- Tapp, Robert B. Religion among the Unitarian Universalists. New York: Seminar, 1973.
- Wilbur, Earl Morse. A History of Universalism. Cambridge: Harvard University Press, 1946.

United Arab Emirates

The United Arab Emirates (UAE) lies along the southern coast of the Persian Gulf between Saudi Arabia and Oman. The area was little populated until it became the home of pirates who attacked traders moving between Mesopotamia and India. It was not until the nineteenth century, when the

The New Mosque in Sharjah, United Arab Emirates (Helene Rogers/TRIP)

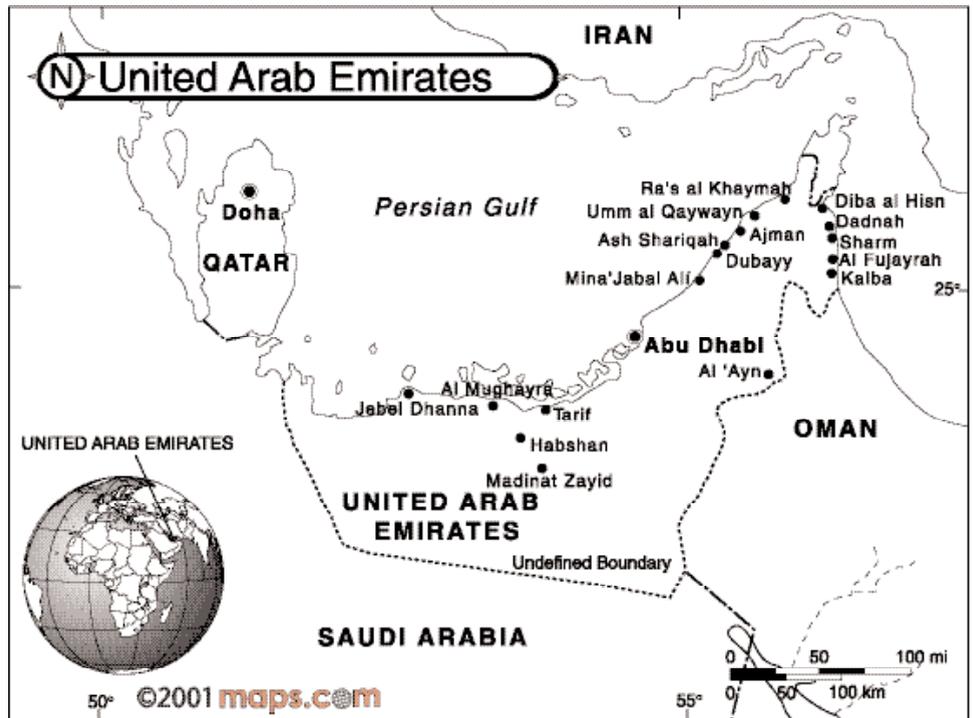

British moved into the area in strength, that the piracy was controlled. Under continuing British influence, the various local rulers in the region (called emirs) were brought together in a truce (1835) and then as a British protectorate (1892).

Oil exploration and production began in the region in 1958; it flourished, especially around Abu Dhabi. In 1971 the British withdrew, and seven emirates (of which Dubai and Abu Dhabi are the most powerful) united to form the present United Arab Emirates. Bahrain and Qatar, which also had the opportunity to join, decided to become independent nations. The UAE is one of the top oil-producing countries in the world at present.

The United Arab Emirates is a very conservative Arab country. The area converted to Islam in the seventh century C.E., and at one point what is now the UAE was the center of the Carmathians, a dissident Muslim movement. The sheikdom at the heart of the movement grew powerful, to the point of conquering Mecca. The fall of the sheikdom led the surviving residents to turn to piracy as a means of livelihood. More recently, the UAE has become a country of hundreds of thousands of immigrants from other Muslim countries, attracted by jobs in the oil fields. The population of the country went from around 360,000 in 1975 to 1.5 million in the mid-1990s. Immigrants have brought a spectrum of Sunni Islamic schools to the area. As in Arabia and Oman, there are substantial numbers of WAHHABI ISLAM followers, and immigrants have established mosques of the HANBALITE, SHAFIITE, and MALIKITE schools. There are also SHI'AS from Pakistan, India, and Bangladesh.

The UAE understands itself to be an Islamic state and has made that a matter of law. Since 1975 all proselytizing has been outlawed, and those who violate the law are fined or imprisoned. The primary Christian evangelization effort is through international radio broadcasts.

Christianity attempted to build work in the area in the nineteenth century but had little success. As early as 1841 a Roman Catholic priest of the Servites traveled through the region. In 1889 the vicariate of Arabia was erected at Aden. South Yemen expelled the vicariate, which relocated to Abu Dhabi. In the 1970s the vicariate had eleven parishes and fifteen chapels, two of which were in the UAE. Both

Status of religions in the United Arab Emirates, 2000-2050

Followers	2000		2025	2050
	total	% rate
Muslims	1,846,000	75.6 2.13	2,483,000	2,600,000
Christians	270,000	11.1 2.98	390,000	455,000
Roman Catholics	124,000	5.1 2.95	175,000	202,000
Orthodox	70,000	2.9 3.42	100,000	110,000
Independents	47,000	1.9 3.29	80,000	100,000
Hindus	187,000	7.6 4.09	200,000	272,000
Baha'is	55,200	2.3 3.28	85,000	120,000
Buddhists	48,600	2.0 3.04	75,000	95,000
Nonreligious	24,000	1.0 4.13	35,000	50,000
Sikhs	5,900	0.2 3.89	9,000	12,000
Atheists	3,700	0.2 4.47	5,000	8,000
Neoreligionists	1,200	0.1 3.69	2,000	3,000
Total population	2,441,000	100.0 2.43	3,284,000	3,615,000

parishes were founded in the 1960s and serve expatriates. Additional vicariate worship centers are presently located in Bahrain, Oman, Qatar, and Yemen.

Protestantism entered the area in 1890 in the person of Samuel M. Zwemer of the REFORMED CHURCH IN AMERICA; Zwemer eventually settled in Bahrain. The CHURCH OF ENGLAND established work once the British acquired some hegemony in the Gulf. Parishes in the region emerged only in the 1960s and were limited to expatriates from the British Isles. The primary Anglican parish, St. Andrew's Church in Abu Dhabi, is now attached to the Diocese of Cyprus and the Gulf, a diocese within the EPISCOPAL CHURCH IN JERUSALEM AND THE MIDDLE EAST. Other Protestant/Free Church groups with work include the CHRISTIAN BRETHERN, The Evangelical Alliance Mission (TEAM), and the Reformed Presbyterian Church, Evangelical Synod. The small work of the SEVENTH-DAY ADVEN-TIST CHURCH is attached to the Gulf Section in the Middle East Union Mission. Also, members of various Orthodox churches have relocated to the UAE.

There are a small number of expatriate Hindus in the UAE and a set of assemblies of the BAHÁ'Í FAITH.

Sources:

Fenelon, K. G. The United Arab Emirates: An Economic and Social Survey. London: Longman, 1976.

Horner, N. A. "Present-day Christianity in the Gulf States of the Arabian Peninsula." Occasional Bulletin of Missionary Research 2 (April 1978): 53–63.

Vine, P., and P. Casey. United Arab Emirates: Profile of a Country's Heritage and Modern Development. London: Immel, 1992.

United Baptist Church (Mozambique)

The United Baptist Church (Igera Uaiiao Baptista) of Mozambique dates its beginning to a mission established by the CHURCH OF SCOTLAND in 1913 at Mihecani, Mozambique. During the 1930s support for the mission dried up, and it was turned over to the Nyassa Mission, which also had trouble with sustaining support. In 1939 the work was transferred to the South Africa General Mission (now known as the Africa Evangelical Fellowship). The South Africa General Mission was closed by the government in 1959, at a time when the missionaries were out of the country on furlough. They were refused reentry, and the Free Baptist Union of Sweden assumed oversight.

The Free Baptist Union had originally come into Mozambique from South Africa in 1921, when it had assumed responsibility for another independent mission. It had established further missions in the southern part of the country by the time it accepted responsibility for the Mihecani Mission in the north. The Africa Evangelical Fellowship was able to return to Mozambique in 1985.

The work progressed until 1975, when it began to suffer from the repression of the Marxist regime. During the next seven years, churches were closed, missionary personnel imprisoned, and religious activities severely limited. The United Baptist Church, formally organized in 1968, began a period of spectacular growth, however, following the change of governments in the early 1980s, and by the end of the twentieth century it had reported more than 200,000 members. In 1998 the Africa Evangelical Mission merged into the SIM (the Society for International Ministries, originally the Sudan Interior Mission).

The United Baptist Church supports a seminary at Mihecani. The church is a member of the Christian Council of Mozambique, which in turn is affiliated with the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES. The church also has a relationship with the United Baptist Church in Zimbabwe, which also grew out of the work of the Africa Evangelical Fellowship.

Address:

United Baptist Church
c/o SIM
14830 Choate Circle
Charlotte, NC 28273

Sources:

Hansson, Eric, and Barbro Wennbergs, ed. Mission genom hundra dr. Tidaholm, Sweden: Fribaptistsamfundets Förlag, 1991.

SIM. Posted at <http://www.sim.org/sim.html>. Accessed September 15, 2001.

Thompson, Phyllis. Life out of Death in Mozambique. London: Hodder and Stoughton, 1989.

United Board for World Ministries

See American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions

United Church in Jamaica and the Cayman Islands

The United Church in Jamaica and the Cayman Islands dates to the first presence of Presbyterians who were among the Protestants that gathered for worship at Hampden Trelawn, Jamaica. However, organized missionary activity did not start until representatives of the Scottish Missionary Society arrived in Jamaica at the beginning of the nineteenth century. They quickly extended their activity to Grand Cayman, also the home to some Scottish settlers. Along with establishing worship services, they began schools for the children of Africans. In the 1830s they joined the forces demanding the end to slavery in Jamaica, and following abolition in 1838 they actively participated in evangelical activity among the freedmen. They had already founded the Jamaica Presbytery and the Presbyterian Academy (to train ministers) by 1836. As early as 1846, some graduates of the academy were sent to Calabar, thus initiating what became the PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH OF NIGERIA. They also began a mission among East Indians residing in Jamaica that led to the sending of missionaries to Rajputana in northwest India.

The LONDON MISSIONARY SOCIETY, representing British Congregationalists, arrived in 1834. The Congregational Union of Jamaica was formed in 1977, but because of continuing financial problems in the land, they remained dependent on the Congregational Union of England and the International Congregational Council.

In 1965 the Congregational Union of Jamaica and the Presbyterian Church of Jamaica merged to form the United Church in Jamaica and the Cayman Islands. In the 1990s it reported twenty thousand members. It is a member of the Jamaica Council of Churches, the WORLD ALLIANCE OF REFORMED CHURCHES, and the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES.

United Church in Papua New Guinea

Address:

United Church in Jamaica and the Cayman Islands
P.O. Box 359
12 Carlton Crescent
Kingston 10
Jamaica

Sources:

Bauswein, Jean-Jacques, and Lukas Vischer, eds. The Reformed Family Worldwide: A Survey of Reformed Churches, Theological Schools, and International Organizations. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans, 1999.

Van der Bent, Ans J., ed. Handbook/Member Churches/World Council of Churches. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 1985.

United Church in Papua New Guinea

The LONDON MISSIONARY SOCIETY (LMS) joined the effort to bring Christianity to the residents of Papua New Guinea in 1871, and missionaries established stations along the coast. They were joined by Methodists from Australia, who opened work on the Bismarck Archipelago in 1875 and the islands to the south and east of the main island. Their primary effort was among the Dobu people. The work grew slowly but steadily with relatively few incidents, the most memorable being the killing of one LMS missionary and eleven of his converts in 1901.

After World War II, it became increasingly evident that the church should be prepared to become autonomous. Thus in 1963 the LMS helped to form the Congregational Church in Papua New Guinea. Then in 1968 the Congregationalists and Methodists, along with two congregations attached to the United Church of North Australia, merged to create the United Church of Papua New Guinea and the Solomon Islands. At the time of the United Church's formation, the leadership was already largely indigenous, and the transition of authority was smooth. In 1996 the congregations in the Solomon Islands separated to become the United Church in the Solomon Islands.

In the mid-1990s the United Church in Papua New Guinea reported one million members. The church has a congregational polity and an assembly as its highest legislative body. Work continues in the different languages spoken among Papua New Guinea's residents. It cooperates with several other churches in sponsoring the Theological Seminary at Rabaul. It is a member of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES and cooperates with the Council for World Mission.

Address:

United Church in Papua New Guinea
P.O. Box 1401
United Church Assembly Office
Port Moresby
Papua New Guinea

Sources:

Bauswein, Jean-Jacques, and Lukas Vischer, eds. The Reformed Family Worldwide: A Survey of Reformed Churches, Theological Schools, and International Organizations. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans, 1999.

Forman, Charles H. The Island Churches of the South Pacific: Emergence in the Twentieth Century. Maryknoll, NY: Orbis, 1982.

Van der Bent, Ans J., ed. Handbook/Member Churches/World Council of Churches. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 1985.

United Church of Canada

The United Church of Canada was created in 1925 by bringing together the Methodist Church (Canada, Newfoundland, and Bermuda), the Congregational Union of Canada, all but a third of the PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH IN CANADA, and a number of local congregations that had been operating as union churches. The hope of the founders that this union would be the first of more to follow has gone largely unrealized. The celebration of the union with the Evangelical United Brethren was quickly followed by disappointment when discussions with the Anglicans to create the Church of Christ in Canada were terminated in 1975. However, the United Church of Canada remains a leader in ecumenical activity both nationally and internationally. It was instrumental in organizing the Canadian Council of Churches in 1944 and was a charter member of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES in 1948. It has retained membership in the WORLD ALLIANCE OF REFORMED CHURCHES and the WORLD METHODIST COUNCIL.

The denomination's articles of faith were adopted in 1925 as part of the Basis of Union. A "Statement of Faith" was approved in 1940, and what is referred to as the "New Creed" has been in use since 1968. Responding to calls for a new confession of faith, the General Council requested in 2000 that the Committee on Theology and Faith begin work on a document that would honor the church's theological diversity and acknowledge its place in a pluralistic world. The receptivity of its theological schools and congregations to biblical criticism is reflected in preaching and educational projects, notably the "New Curriculum" introduced in the 1960s. The worship practices of the uniting congregation were shaped initially by The Hymnary (1930) and The Book of Common Order (1932). A new Service Book was published in 1969. The Hymn Book, published jointly with the Anglican Church of Canada in 1971, was followed a generation later by Voices United in 1996, a work that has received a more enthusiastic reception than its predecessor. The United Church Observer is the official publication of the denomination.

Some of the major events in the denomination's history are intertwined with its controversies. Church union was accomplished only after a long and bitter round of negotiations, drawn out over a period of nearly three decades. After a congregational vote was held in each Presbyterian congregation to determine whether it would join the new church, about a third continued as the Presbyterian Church in Canada. Since then the church has regularly taken positions on political and social issues viewed at the time as risky or controversial. It was the first denomination in Canada to ordain women (Lydia Gruchy, in 1936) and has since elected women to other prominent positions. In 1980, Lois Wilson became the first woman to serve as moderator. Some decisions, such as its positions on remarriage of divorced persons in the early 1960s and ordination of gay and lesbian persons in 1988, generated controversy at the time but have been adopted with less fanfare by others. It continues to study, issue statements, and make efforts to influence governments and other agencies responsible for shaping policy on such issues as abortion, capital punishment, racial equality, land use, refugees, and poverty. It is currently grappling with the financial and moral implications of its involvement in helping the federal government to operate residential schools for native Canadians.

The United Church of Canada is organized at four levels: local congregations or pastoral charges; district presbyteries that exercise oversight of pastoral charges in their jurisdiction; regional conferences that meet annually; and the national General Council, which meets on a biennial or triennial basis. The denomination relates to thirteen theological schools, five educational centers, and six liberal arts colleges and universities. The educational work of the denomination is also carried on in congregations through organizations for children, youth, and gender-specific associations for adults such as the United Church Women, renamed "Women of the United Church of Canada" in 2000.

The United Church of Canada operates primarily in Canada, although a few Methodist congregations in Bermuda relate to the Maritime Conference. The churches that merged in 1925 had established missions in such places as Angola, China, India, Japan, Korea, and Trinidad. That work continued and at first expanded after union. The denomination now works under the direction and at the request of indigenous ecumenical partners to provide funds and personnel for projects.

Its development has followed a trajectory similar to mainstream churches in the United States over the same period: it suffered a decline in membership and financial resources during the Depression years; experienced a postwar revival of religious interest; and has recently seen lower rates of membership and participation, reporting the first loss of membership in 1966. It reports the number of confirmed members as 668,549, while the most recent census data (1991) indicate that 3,093,120 Canadians consider themselves affiliated with the denomination. Since union it has remained the largest Protestant denomination in Canada.

Address:

United Church of Canada
3250 Bloor Street W.
Etobicoke, Toronto M8X 2Y4
Canada
<http://www.uccan.org>

Phyllis D. Airhart

Sources:

- Chambers, Steven. This Is Your Church: A Guide to the Beliefs, Practices and Positions of the United Church of Canada. 3rd. ed. Toronto: United Church Publishing House, 1993.
- Grant, John Webster. The Canadian Experience of Church Union. London: Lutterworth, 1967.
- White, Peter Gordon, ed. Voices and Visions: Sixty-Five Years of the United Church of Canada. Toronto: United Church Publishing House, 1990.

United Church of Christ

The United Church of Christ (UCC), founded in 1957, continues and combines several Reformed Church traditions from Europe in the United States. One of these traditions, that of the Congregational churches, was also responsible for a significant part of the worldwide spread of Protestantism in the nineteenth century through its vast missionary program.

The Congregational churches originated with the British Puritans, who came to the American colonies in 1620. Possessed of a Reformed theology, once in the colonies they adopted a congregational form of church governance. Unlike the Pilgrims who had preceded them and settled at Plymouth, Massachusetts, the Congregationalists were not separatists. They held to the autonomy of the local congregation, but that congregation was intimately tied to the township government of the community in which it was located. Heresy and actions opposed to church order were punishable by the town authorities, and harsh treatment would be handed out to the likes of Roger Williams, a minister expelled from Massachusetts who would later found the Baptist Church in neighboring Rhode Island, and the Quakers (members of the Society of FRIENDS). The Congregational establishment in Massachusetts would continue through the American Revolution but eventually be lost as state governments conformed to the policy of separation of church and state in the new United States.

At the beginning of the nineteenth century, the Congregationalist churches assumed a leading role in the emerging world missionary movement pioneered by the Moravian, Methodist, and Baptist churches in the previous century. Representatives of the churches formed the AMERICAN BOARD OF COMMISSIONERS FOR FOREIGN MISSIONS (ABCFM) and began an aggressive program of recruiting and sending missionaries to Hawaii and the South Pacific, then to Africa and Asia. The ABCFM became one of the major instruments for turning Protestantism into a global movement through the century.

The Congregationalists were also oriented toward learning and education, and as such they were the founders of many of America's finest institutions of higher learning, such as Harvard and Yale universities. They also became the battleground in which new theological currents could emerge and be tested. Thus, in the nineteenth century, Unitarianism would arise and split the church. A number of congregations would eventually leave to form the AMERICAN UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION. In the twentieth century, prominent ministers would become leading exponents of liberal Protestant perspectives, and the Congregationalists would take the lead in the modern ecumenical movement. Their attachment to the ecumenical ideal would lead them into a series of church mergers.

The Christian churches originated in the revivals that swept the new United States in the decades following the American Revolution. The founders were attached to two basic ideas. First, they advocated an extreme form of democratic church government based in the local church; they were suspicious of leadership beyond and above the local church. The most prominent of the several groups that created the Christian churches were the Republican Methodists, led by James O'Kelly. O'Kelly had been a prominent minister in the Methodist Episcopal Church (now an integral part of the UNITED METHODIST CHURCH), but he had rejected the episcopal governance of the church that placed authority to assign ministers in the hands of a bishop. The Christians also challenged the division of the church into various sectarian groupings and felt that the followers of Christ should be known simply as "Christians."

In 1931 the National Council of the Congregational churches and the Christian churches united to form the General Council of the Congregational-Christian Churches.

At the time of the Protestant Reformation, while most German Protestants adhered to Lutheranism, there was a significant minority who preferred the Reformed Church. Following the founding of the colony of Pennsylvania, many members of the German Reformed Church accepted William Penn's offer to move to the new land where they would be allowed to worship as they pleased. It is estimated that as many as fifteen thousand were in America at the time of the Revolution. As early as 1725, a schoolteacher who had begun to lead worship services was ordained by the Dutch Reformed Church (now the REFORMED CHURCH IN AMERICA); subsequently, the German churches developed a close relationship with the stronger Dutch church. In several stages, the German Reformed Church organized as part of the Dutch Reformed Church. It finally became independent in 1793.

The German Reformed Church founded its foreign mission board in 1838. For the next twenty-eight years it worked through the AMERICAN BOARD OF COMMISSIONERS FOR FOREIGN MISSIONS, but after 1866 it began to develop independent work.

The Evangelical Synod of North America had its origins in Prussia, where in 1817 the ruler had created the Church of the Prussian Union by encouraging the merger of the Lutheran and Reformed churches in his realm. The church was seen as a bulwark against rationalism and pietism, and personal spirituality was emphasized. Significant attention was given to foreign missions as manifest in support for several missionary societies, most prominently the Basel Mission Society. Beginning in 1833, that society sent more than 280 missionaries to the United States to work among German Americans. In 1840, under the leadership of Joseph A. Rieger (1811–1869) and George Wendelin Wall (1811–1867), a group of ministers met in St. Louis, Missouri, to form the German Evangelical Church Society of the West.

The society (after 1866, the synod) was a loosely organized body designed to serve the congregations. It encouraged the use of the several catechisms that had been developed in Germany that combined Lutheran and Reformed elements. Shortly after the society formed in St. Louis, two similar organizations arose in the Northwest and Northeast. In 1872 these three synods merged to form the German Evangelical Synod of North America (the word "German" being dropped in 1927). Like its German counterpart, the synod developed a strong missionary program both at home among Native Americans and abroad. Additionally, it gave support to higher education and medical facilities.

In 1934 the Evangelical Synod and the Reformed Church united to form the Evangelical and Reformed Church. A short time later, the new church initiated talks with the General Council of the Congregational-Christian Churches. That merger was consummated in 1957, occurring at the height of ecumenical enthusiasm in the United States; it was seen as a model for other churches to follow. It also gave hope to those who wished to see a U.S. version of a united Protestant church that would bring together not only the church making up the United Church of Christ but also various Methodist, Episcopal, Presbyterian, and other churches.

The United Church is organized congregationally with denominational affairs placed in the hands of the General Synod. As with most Protestant churches, relationships with a number of mission churches were reoriented into partnership relations with new independent ecclesiastical bodies. The fabled American Board united with the mission board of the Evangelical and Reformed Church as the United Church Board of World Ministries.

In 1996 the church reported 1,450,000 members in more than six thousand churches. The UCC has a strong commitment to ecumenical relations and is a prominent member of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES and the WORLD ALLIANCE OF REFORMED CHURCHES. It is also one of the most liberal of church bodies and among the very few Christian bodies willing to ordain professed homosexuals. Its ministers and lay leaders have been prominent in a range of social causes, from peace advocacy to race relations. The church maintains an extensive program of higher education that includes support for a number of colleges and seminaries.

The church continues to support many of the churches that originated as missions of the UCC's several constituent groups. It has a special partnership relationship to the CHRISTIAN CHURCH (DISCIPLES OF CHRIST), the EVANGELICAL CHURCH IN GERMANY, the PENTECOSTAL CHURCH OF CHILE, the UNITED CHURCH OF CHRIST IN THE PHILIPPINES, and the PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH IN THE REPUBLIC OF KOREA.

Address:

United Church of Christ
700 Prospect Ave., E.
Cleveland, OH 44115-1100

Sources:

- Dunn, David, et al. A History of the Evangelical and Reformed Church. Philadelphia: Christian Education Press, 1961.
- Gunneman, Louis H. The Shaping of the United Church of Christ. New York: Thomas Nelson, 1971.
- Horton, Douglas. The United Church of Christ. New York: Thomas Nelson, 1962.
- Youngs, J. William. The Congregationalists. Westport, CT: Greenwood, 1998.

United Church of Christ— Congregational in the Marshall Islands

The United Church of Christ—Congregational in the Marshall Islands began with the arrival in 1857 of missionaries, both U.S. and Hawaiian, connected with the AMERICAN BOARD OF COMMISSIONERS FOR FOREIGN MISSIONS. As the work grew, in 1865 the administration of the Micronesian Mission was placed in the hands of the Congregational Church of Hawaii's Board of Missions. The work was immensely assisted by the Hawaiian leadership, who developed indigenous leadership and used local leaders to extend the work to new islands. Although some of the American Board's missionaries were Presbyterian, Congregationalism dominated, and the Marshall Islands work developed a Congregational polity.

The work continued under the guidance of the American Board until 1957, when the Congregational Christian churches in the United States merged with the Evangelical and Reformed Church to create the UNITED CHURCH OF CHRIST. At that time the American Board was superseded by the United Church Board of World Ministries. This change also signaled the beginning of a process of maturation of the Micronesian Mission.

In 1979 a referendum was held throughout Micronesia (then a UN trust assigned to the United States). Although the Carolines and the Marianas voted to become the Federated States of Micronesia, the Marshalls voted to remain in the trust relationship with the United States. They became a separate entity and were granted local autonomy. In 1986 they became a Free Associated State with a continuing special relationship to the United States. In 1990 the Marshall Islands were admitted to the United Nations.

As the country was moving toward independence, so too the mission moved toward becoming independent as the United Church of Christ—Congregational in the Marshall Islands. It adopted the polity and theological perspective of the United Church of Christ.

The United Church has approximately 39,000 members (out of a population of 181,000). It is the largest Protestant church in the country and a member of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES. It also retains a relationship with the other churches that have grown out of the ABCFM's Micronesian Mission and participates with them in the United Church of Micronesia.

Address:

United Church of Christ—Congregational in the Marshall Islands
P.O. Box 75
Majuro
Marshall Islands 96960

Source:

- Bauswein, Jean-Jacques, and Lukas Vischer, eds. The Reformed Family Worldwide: A Survey of Reformed Churches, Theological Schools, and International Organizations. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans, 1999.

United Church of Christ in Japan

In 1940 the Japanese ordered all Protestant churches united into a single body, the United Church of Japan, generally called the Kyodan. Most churches complied, and the few who refused to join lost any legal standing. The majority of those who affiliated with the Kyodan remained together when the government changed following World War II, and the church remains the largest Protestant body in the country.

Protestantism entered Japan in 1859 after the Townsend Harris Treaty had cleared the legal hurdles to its presence. Missionaries of the Episcopal Church, John Liggins and Channing M. Williams, were the first to arrive, in May 1859. James C. Hepburn, representing the Presbyterian Board of Foreign Missions, arrived in the fall. He pioneered the work of Bible translation. Then in November, Samuel R. Brown and Guido F. Verback, of the Dutch Reformed Church (now the REFORMED CHURCH IN AMERICA), landed. All except Verback had been reassigned from China. Although the treaty had allowed their entrance, the government confined their activities to Yokohama and Nagasaki and largely confined them to operating schools and clinics. Attempts to evangelize in conventional ways were considered an offense.

The first convert was baptized in 1864, but the first church was not organized until 1872 in Yokohama. A second church was opened in 1873 in Tokyo. The missionaries also took steps to organize their work without reference to their respective denominations. However, they had to deal with the arrival of additional missionaries representing other churches. The CHURCH MISSIONARY SOCIETY (of the CHURCH OF ENGLAND) sent people in 1869, and the first American Baptist missionary came in 1872. Then in 1873, the government removed the restrictions, and the number of missionaries and the groups they represented rose sharply, among them being the Methodists.

The translation of the New Testament was completed and published in 1880. The Old Testament was completed seven years later. With the new Bibles and the legal restrictions gone, the churches entered a growth phase. By this time Japanese leaders had arisen who began to create an indigenous presentation of the faith. By the end of the 1880s, the number of missionaries had almost doubled (from 145 to 383). Then in 1890, the government issued a document declaring its rejection of Christian beliefs and defining Japanese personhood in terms of Shintoism. This document was to be read with great ceremony in all the schools on all public holidays. This action explains the difficulty that met many members of the independent evangelical missionary agencies as they began to enter the country around the turn of the century.

The spirit of cooperation that was present in most of the missionary groups led to a union of the mission of the Presbyterian Church in the U.S.A., the CHURCH OF SCOTLAND, and the Dutch Reformed Church in 1877 as the United Church of Christ in Japan (the word "united" was dropped in 1890). In 1887 the three Anglican missionary thrusts from England and America came together as the Japan Episcopal Church. In 1907 the two American and one Canadian Methodist groups united as the Japan Methodist Church. Several of the Baptist groups came together in 1957 as the Japan Baptist Union. Lutheranism entered Japan in 1892 with the opening of work at Saga on the island of Kyushu. Subsequently several churches and a spectrum of Lutheran missionary societies started missions.

In 1913, following the visit of U.S. missionary executive John R. Mott, many of the missions joined together in a "Cooperative Campaign of Evangelism." A new growth spurt followed but finally ground to a halt as Japan geared up philosophically and militarily for World War II. During the 1930s pressure was put upon Christians to engage in shrine attendance, during which time one was expected to bow before a picture of the emperor. The churches rejected the attempt to have Shintoism redefined as nonreligious.

Then in 1939, the Religious Bodies Law was passed that ordered all Protestant Christians to come together in a single organization, or Kyodan. Among the churches who refused to come together in the Kyodan were THE SALVATION ARMY, the Anglicans, the SEVENTH-DAY ADVENTIST CHURCH, and the Holiness Church. Some thirty-two groups affiliated with the Kyodan. During the war, missionaries and Christian leaders were suspect. The Holiness Church suffered the most, with 250 of its pastors arrested.

After the war, the U.S. government imposed U.S.-style freedom of religion on Japan, and General Douglas MacArthur made a personal plea for a thousand missionaries to come to the newly opened land. Those denominations whose missions had come together in the Kyodan sent more than four hundred missionaries. However, the many evangelical churches and independent sending agencies sent even more. Most of the churches forced into the United Church of Christ in Japan remained. By the beginning of the 1980s, they had some 200,000 members in 12,600 congregations. Although growth has been slight in the last decades of the twentieth century, it remains the largest Protestant church in the country.

In the late 1990s, the church reported 206,000 members. The church is a member of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES. The United Church has issued its own ecumenical statement of faith. It is organized congregationally, with a general assembly as its highest legislative body. Its congregations across the country are organized into sixteen districts.

Address:

United Church of Christ in Japan
Room 31
Japan Christian Center
3-18 Nishi-Waseda
2-chome, Shinjuku-ku
Tokyo 169
Japan

Sources:

Bauswein, Jean-Jacques, and Lukas Vischer, eds. The Reformed Family Worldwide: A Survey of Reformed Churches, Theological Schools, and International Organizations. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans, 1999.

Van der Bent, Ans J., ed. Handbook/Member Churches/World Council of Churches. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 1985.

United Church of Christ in the Philippines

The United Church of Christ in the Philippines was founded in 1941 and combined the missionary history of the Presbyterians, Congregationalists, Methodists, United Brethren, and Disciples of Christ. The Presbyterian Church in the U.S.A. (now a constituent part of the PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH [U.S.A.]) was the first church to launch a missionary thrust in the Philippines following the Spanish-American War and the U.S. annexation of the islands at the end of the nineteenth century. Dr. James B. Rodgers arrived in April 1899. He was quickly followed by James Thobum, a missionary bishop for the Methodist Episcopal Church (now a constituent part of the UNITED METHODIST CHURCH), who left the Reverend Nicolas Zamora in charge of work until a group of U.S. women landed at Manila the following year. In 1901 the Reverend Homer C. Stuntz arrived as the superintendent.

The Presbyterians founded the first Protestant college, Silliman University, in 1901, and the two churches cooperated in the founding of Union Theological Seminary in 1907. Both churches also faced the religious side of the desire of the Filipinos for self-rule. In 1907, Nicolas Zamora, the first Filipino ordained as a Protestant minister, led a group of Methodists to form the independent EVANGELICAL METHODIST CHURCH IN THE PHILIPPINE ISLANDS. A short time later, the Presbyterians lost a group who formed the United Evangelical Church of Christ. And even later the Methodists had a second split that led to the founding of the Philippine Methodist Church.

The Women's Missionary Association of the Church of the United Brethren (now a constituent part of the United Methodist Church) voted to begin missionary activity in the Philippines at its 1901 meeting. The first missionaries, Sanford B. Kurtz and Edwin S. Eby, landed in the islands later that year. They settled on Luzon in the northwest. The CHRISTIAN CHURCH (DISCIPLES OF CHRIST) missionaries also arrived in 1901 and established their initial station on the northern part of Luzon, at Laoag. Both missions grew steadily until the beginning of World War II. The AMERICAN BOARD OF COMMISSIONERS FOR FOREIGN MISSIONS, which already had a work in the South Pacific, having worked out a comity agreement with the other churches, began work on Mindanao in 1902. The Reverend R. F. Black and his wife settled at Davao and began work among the rather diverse population of Roman Catholics, Muslims, and followers of indigenous religions.

Soon after the first Protestant missions had been launched, an effort to cut competition and duplication of efforts had occurred. As the missions became established, some began to project the vision of a united Protestant church. A first step in that direction occurred in 1929 when the Presbyterians and Congregationalists merged their work into the United Evangelical Church in the Philippines. In 1943 the United Brethren and the Christian Church (Disciples of Christ) merged to form the Evangelical Church in the Philippines. The Evangelical Church and the United Evangelical Church then came together in 1948 with the Philippine Methodist Church and several small independent churches to form the United Church of Christ in the Philippines. Of course, in the midst of this process, the churches experienced the years of Japanese occupation during World War II and the resulting complete disruption of Christian life throughout the islands.

The United Church adopted a new confession of faith reflective of its varied past and the reformed theological tradition that now dominates its life. It has also become known for its advocacy of justice issues within the country, especially concerning issues of human rights. The church manages a system of secondary schools, several colleges and universities, and four hospitals. It is a member of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES, the WORLD METHODIST COUNCIL, the REFORMED ECUMENICAL COUNCIL, and the WORLD ALLIANCE OF REFORMED CHURCHES. It was a charter member of the Philippine Federation of Christian Churches. The church reported 950,000 members in the 1990s.

Address:

United Church of Christ in the Philippines
P.O. Box 718
C.P.O., EDSA
Quezon City, Ermita Manila 1099
Philippines

Sources:

Bauswein, Jean-Jacques, and Lukas Vischer, eds. The Reformed Family Worldwide: A Survey of Reformed Churches, Theological Schools, and International Organizations. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans, 1999.
World Methodist Council, Handbook of Information. Lake Junaluska, NC: World Methodist Council, 1997.

United Church of Christ in Zimbabwe

The United Church of Christ in Zimbabwe began with the arrival of Congregationalist missionaries representing the AMERICAN BOARD OF COMMISSIONERS FOR FOREIGN MISSIONS into the eastern part of Zimbabwe in 1893. The initial stations were set up in Chikore and at Mount Silinda. The mission experienced steady growth through the next century, and in 1973 it became independent.

The church has congregational polity, with its synod being the highest legislative body. It ordained females to the ministry from the beginning of its existence as an independent church. It is an ecumenically oriented church and holds membership in the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES and the WORLD ALLIANCE OF REFORMED CHURCHES, as well as being a founding member of the Zimbabwe Council of Churches.

In the 1990s the church reported thirty thousand members. It cosponsors the United Theological College and the Rusitu Bible Institute.

Address:

United Church of Christ in Zimbabwe
Rosin House 316

United Church of God, an International Association

Nelson Mandela Ave. 48
Harare
Zimbabwe

Source:

Bauswein, Jean-Jacques, and Lukas Vischer, eds. The Reformed Family Worldwide: A Survey of Reformed Churches, Theological Schools, and International Organizations. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans, 1999.

United Church of God, an International Association (plus Church of God, an International Community)

The United Church of God was formed by the last large group to leave the WORLDWIDE CHURCH OF GOD (WCOG) in the years following the death of WCOG founder Herbert W. Armstrong. Following the Christmas Eve 1994 sermon by Pastor General Joseph W. Tkach, in which he announced that the WCOG had abandoned the founder's teachings and had moved firmly toward an Evangelical Protestant theological perspective, many ministers left Worldwide, taking their congregations with them. In 1995 some 150 elders convened to form "a collaborative organisation" with an avowedly more collegiate form of governance than had been traditional in Worldwide or than was found in the two previous large breakaways, the PHILADELPHIA CHURCH OF GOD (1989) and the Global Church of God (1992; see LIVING CHURCH OF GOD). Many individual churches that had left the WCOG before the mass exodus that resulted in the United Church of God later joined it.

In its teachings and practices, the United Church of God is the most moderate of the major offshoots from Worldwide. Although it holds to Armstrong's teachings, it has deliberately reexamined all of them to "prove the truth," rather than accepting them "on faith." This has led to a softening of some attitudes, though the major teachings still follow those formerly held by the Worldwide Church of God.

The name United has proved to be a little embarrassing for the church. A number of individual churches that joined because of what they perceived to be United's "hands-off" attitude to governance have since seceded in protest over decisions by the church's headquarters.

A major split occurred within the United Church in early 1998, when the council of elders removed the church's president, David Hulme, from his post. Hulme left and founded the Church of God, an International Community. A considerable number of individual ministers and assemblies within United, including most of those in Britain, followed him. There are an estimated twenty-five hundred members.

The United Church of God is still easily the largest of the offshoots in the "Worldwide family"; at its height it had as many as seventeen thousand members, and it still claims that in attendance at the Feast of Tabernacles, though the actual membership number is probably no more than fifteen thousand. In 2000 it had more than four hundred elders and members in over thirty countries. It publishes a selection of books and booklets and a magazine, Good News, and has a radio show, The Good News.

Addresses:

Church of God, an International Community
P.O. Box 91150
Pasadena, CA 91109-1150
<http://www.vision.org>
<http://www.vision-uk.org>

United Church of God
P.O. Box 541027
Cincinnati, OH 45254-1027
<http://www.ucg.org>
<http://www.gnmagazine.org>

David V. Barrett

Sources:

Barrett, David V. The New Believers. London: Cassell, 2001.
The Journal: News of the Churches of God. Big Sandy, TX: JMC.
Tkach, Joseph. Transformed by Truth. Sisters, OR: Multnomah, 1997.

United Church of the Solomon Islands

The United Church of the Solomon Islands began as a missionary effort of Australian Methodists. John Goldie arrived in the western Solomons Province in 1902 and established a base at Munda Point on New Georgia. He was assisted by missionaries from the Methodist churches in Fiji and Samoa. In 1913, with additional assistance from New Zealand Methodists, the work moved to Bougainville, formerly under German control.

In 1955 the British began to relocate a number of people from the Gilbert Islands to Wagina in the western Solomons. Many of those people had been members of the mission of the LONDON MISSIONARY SOCIETY (Congregationalist; LMS). The LMS worked out an agreement with the Methodists to receive these people into the Methodist Church.

In 1968 the Methodist Church in the Solomons merged with the Methodists in Papua New Guinea and the Papua Ekalesia (the independent church that developed from the LMS mission in Papua) to form the United Church of Papua New Guinea and the Solomon Islands. Then in 1978 the Solomon Islands became an independent nation. In the 1980s, secessionists on Bougainville demanded independence from Papua New Guinea. This disruption created a communication problem between important segments of the church, and in 1996 the Solomon Islands and Papua New Guinea segments of the church decided to go their separate ways.

The United Church of the Solomon Islands reported fifty thousand members in the 1990s. It is a cooperating partner with the Council on World Mission and a member of the WORLD ALLIANCE OF REFORMED CHURCHES and the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES. Leslie Boseto, a former bishop of the church, was elected president of the World Council of Churches in 1992.

Address:

United Church of the Solomon Islands
P.O. Box 82
Kokeqolo, Munda Western Province
Solomon Islands

Sources:

- Bauswein, Jean-Jacques, and Lukas Vischer, eds. The Reformed Family Worldwide: A Survey of Reformed Churches, Theological Schools, and International Organizations. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans, 1999.
- Forman, Charles H. The Island Churches of the South Pacific: Emergence in the Twentieth Century. Maryknoll, NY: Orbis, 1982.

United Church of Zambia

The United Church of Zambia (UCZ) has brought together a variety of Christian missions formed in the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries. The oldest strain of UCZ history can be traced to 1885 and the entrance of a group of missionaries led by François Coillard of the PARIS MISSION (associated with the REFORMED CHURCH OF FRANCE). They had support from Lesotho. Their beginning was inauspicious, as they were arrested and maltreated soon after their arrival in what is now Zambia (formerly Northern Rhodesia). However, they persevered with their work, initially among the Lozi people, and in 1964 the work grew into the independent Evangelical Church of Barotseland.

The LONDON MISSIONARY SOCIETY (LMS) started work in 1883 in the northern part of the country at Ni-amkolo, among the Lungu people. They were soon joined by Presbyterians.

In 1894 a missionary from the CHURCH OF SCOTLAND, Alexander Dewar, and a Christian from Tonga, John Banda, came into Rhodesia from Malawi and established themselves at Mwenzo, not far from the border with Tanzania. Their work was supplemented through the early twentieth century by teams of students from Malawi who made trips into Zambia to evangelize the population. Among these students was David J. Kuanda, the father of Kenneth D. Kuanda, who would lead the country in the years immediately after Zambia's independence. In 1894 the Primitive Methodists (now a constituent part of the METHODIST CHURCH in Great Britain) opened a mission in central Zambia among the Ila people.

In the 1920s, the rich copper deposits in the country began to be mined, and several churches opened a mission station at Copperbelt, a community that arose near the mines. In the 1930s those missions (including centers of the LMS and the Presbyterians) came together as the United Missions of the Copperbelt. This united mission became a catalyst for the LMS and Presbyterians to unite across the country in 1945 as the CHURCH OF CENTRAL AFRICA PRESBYTERIAN in Rhodesia. In 1958 they were joined by another group of missions in the Copperbelt that had formed the Central Free Church Council to create the United Church of Central Africa in Rhodesia.

In the 1960s, Northern Rhodesia moved toward independence as Zambia, a move that culminated in 1965. That same year the United Church of Central Africa merged with the Methodists and the Church of Barotseland to form the United Church of Zambia. It included members from seven different Zambian peoples.

In the mid-1990s, the United Church reported one million members. The church sponsors a hospital, several secondary schools, and a farm college. The church has a presbyterian organization with a synod as the highest legislative body. It follows a Reformed theological perspective but acknowledges only the Apostles' Creed and the Nicene Creed as its doctrinal standard. The church is ecumenically active and has affiliated with the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES and the WORLD ALLIANCE OF REFORMED CHURCHES. It also cooperates with the Council for World Mission.

Address:

United Church of Zambia
P.O. Box 50122
Nationalist Rd. at Burma Rd.
Ridgeway, Lusaka
Zambia

Sources:

- Bauswein, Jean-Jacques, and Lukas Vischer, eds. The Reformed Family Worldwide: A Survey of Reformed Churches, Theological Schools, and International Organizations. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans, 1999.
- Van der Bent, Ans J., ed. Handbook/Member Churches/World Council of Churches. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 1985.

United Congregational Church of Southern Africa

Johannes van der Kamp came to the Cape of Good Hope as a missionary representing the LONDON MISSIONARY SOCIETY (LMS) in 1799. His goal was to open a mission among the Bantu-speaking people of the region. A missionary station was founded at Kuruman, and the first congregations at Graaff-Reinet (1801) and Bethelsdorp (1802). With the assistance of other missionaries, the most famous being David Livingstone and Robert Moffat, the work spread across the colony. In the meantime the British took control, and British settlers began to flood into the cape. Among them were some of Congregational background who also began to form new churches.

United Evangelical Church–Anglican Communion of Angola

In 1854 the LMS withdrew from the cape in order to pursue opportunities in the interior of Africa. In 1859 the LMS churches and those of independent origin united to form the Evangelical Voluntary Union. The Union became the Congregational Union of Africa in 1877.

Alongside the British Congregationalists, Americans came to the cape in 1835. Missionaries representing the AMERICAN BOARD OF COMMISSIONERS FOR FOREIGN MISSIONS initiated work among the Zulu people in Natal and then moved into Mozambique to work among the Batswa people. The mission grew to become the Bantu Congregational Church. In 1967 the Congregational Union and the Bantu Church united to form the United Congregational Church of Southern Africa. By this time its work had moved beyond South Africa and Mozambique to Namibia, Botswana, and Zimbabwe.

In the 1990s the United Church reported 275,000 members. It is a member of the WORLD ALLIANCE OF REFORMED CHURCHES and the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES. In 1972 the South African Association of the Disciples of Christ merged into the United Church.

Address:

United Congregational Church of Southern Africa
P.O. Box 96014
150 Caroline St.
Brixton, Johannesburg 2019
South Africa

Sources:

Bauswein, Jean-Jacques, and Lukas Vischer, eds. The Reformed Family Worldwide: A Survey of Reformed Churches, Theological Schools, and International Organizations. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans, 1999.

Van der Bent, Ans J., ed. Handbook/Member Churches/World Council of Churches. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 1985.

United Evangelical Church–Anglican Communion of Angola

The United Evangelical Church of Angola is one of several churches that grew out of the work of Archibald Patterson, an independent Anglican missionary, and Swiss minister Ernest Niklaus, who in 1922 started a mission in the province of Uige. The work grew through the 1960s as the Igreja Evangélica do Norte de Angola, and Archibald became a beloved figure to many. However, in 1961, when the Civil War broke out, the church faced severe government repression. Church leaders were forced underground or into exile. Only in 1977 was the church able to reorganize, and the name EVANGELICAL REFORMED CHURCH OF ANGOLA was chosen. At that time a difference of opinion arose on various issues, and a group of eighteen ministers under the leadership of the Reverend Domingos Alexandre left to found a separate denomination, the United Evangelical Church of Angola. The United Evangelical Church of Angola (Igreja Evangélica Unida de Angola) is currently headquartered in Luanda, Angola. In the 1980s it was a member of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES but it is no longer.

More recently, however, Alexandre left the United Evangelical Church of Angola and founded the United Evangelical Church–Anglican Communion in Angola in close connection with the Archdeanery of Angola of the Church of the Province of Southern Africa. Like the Archdeanery, the United Evangelical Church is a member both of the Council of Christian Churches in Angola and the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES.

Address:

United Evangelical Church–Anglican Communion in Angola
C.P. 10498
Luanda
Angola

Source:

The Church of England Yearbook. London: Church Publishing House, published annually.

United Evangelical Lutheran Church (UELC)

The United Evangelical Lutheran Church (UELC) traces its origin to the early twentieth century, with the work of the Augustan Lutheran Church (a church formed by Swedish-Americans that later participated in the various mergers through which American Lutherans formed the present EVANGELICAL LUTHERAN CHURCH IN AMERICA [ULCA]). During the second decade of the twentieth century, one of its ministers became pastor of the Swedish Lutheran congregation in Buenos Aires. While there, Emil Cedar began work in Spanish, including the translation of literature. Following the formation of the United Evangelical Lutheran Church (1918–1962), one of the steps in the American merger process, the new church assumed responsibility for the Buenos Aires congregation and sent Edward H. Mueller (d. 1923) to head the work. During the brief five years of his ministry, he founded four additional congregations.

In 1948 the Argentine congregations formed a synod and were formally received into the ULCA as an associate synod. In 1951 it joined the LUTHERAN WORLD FEDERATION (LWF). LWF membership also served as a catalyst calling attention to the variety of war refugees that had found their way to Argentina, especially from Eastern Europe and the Baltic states. In cooperation with the LWF it assisted refugees from Hungary, Slovakia, Latvia, and Estonia to form congregations. In 1953 the UELC became an autonomous body. It then engaged in a process of assisting new members to adjust to their new home.

The United Evangelical Lutheran Church is headed by its president and the synod, its highest legislative body. It has a membership of approximately eight thousand members. The church sponsors a system of parochial schools and supports the Instituto Superior Evangélicos de Estudios Teológicos, an interdenominational seminary for the training of ministers. It is ecumenically active and a member of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES. Women have been admitted to the ministry since 1981.

Address:

United Evangelical Lutheran Church
Marcos Sastre 2891
1417 Buenos Aires
Argentina

Source:

Bachmann, E. Theodore, and Mercia Brenne Bachmann. Lutheran Churches in the World: A Handbook. Minneapolis, MN: Augsburg, 1989.

United Evangelical Lutheran Church in India

Functioning as both a denomination and an ecumenical body, the United Evangelical Lutheran Church in India (UELCI) was founded in 1926 as the Federation of Evangelical Lutheran Churches. It embodies the major thrust of Lutheran missions in India that began in 1706, when Bartholomäus Ziegenbalg and Heinrich Plutschau arrived from Denmark as representatives of the Danish-Halle mission with the support of the Church of Denmark and the Danish king. They settled Tanquebar (a Danish colony) and quickly learned Tamil. Before the end of the decade, Ziegenbalg had produced a Tamil translation of the Christian New Testament, and along the way a Tamil grammar and dictionary. Their work would set a pattern frequently followed by pioneering Protestant missionaries worldwide of concentrating on reducing languages to writing and producing translations of the Bible.

The work of making the most substantive gains in spreading Lutheranism is generally credited to Christian Freidrich Schwartz, who dominated the mission in the late eighteenth century. The fifty thousand converts would become the core of what would later be known as the Tamil Evangelical Lutheran Church.

The early nineteenth century was a time in which the British limited missionary access to India, and interest among European Lutherans was at its lowest. However, at the end of the 1830s, British authorities developed a new attitude, and Lutherans launched a new wave of missionary activity.

In 1840 the German Leipzig Mission began work in Tamil that was later passed to the Swedish Lutherans. In the 1870s this work was assumed under the new missionary society directly sponsored by the CHURCH OF SWEDEN. The mission would later mature as the Tamil Evangelical Lutheran Church. In 1842, Father C. F. Heyer arrived in Madras as a representative of the Ministerium of Pennsylvania (now a constituent part of the EVANGELICAL LUTHERAN CHURCH IN AMERICA) and as the very first foreign missionary commissioned by any American Lutheran body. The North German Missionary Society at Bremen sent missionaries two years later, but their work was absorbed by the Americans in 1850. The American work would mature as the ANDHRA EVANGELICAL LUTHERAN CHURCH, one of the largest Christian bodies in India.

Subsequently, missionaries would arrive from the Gossner Mission (1844), the Danish Missionary Society (1863), the Hermannsburg Mission (1865), the Swedish Evangelical Mission (1877), and the Schleswig-Holstein Evangelical Lutheran Mission headquartered in Breklum, Germany (1882). From these efforts no less than ten Lutheran churches serving different language groups and different parts of the country would emerge.

In 1926, in part because of encouragement from the Lutheran World Convention held in 1923, the various Lutheran churches in India formed the Federation of Evangelical Lutheran Churches in India. It developed support for the All-India Theological College and Research Institute in 1953, a major symbol of the hoped-for Lutheran unity. More recently, the churches have expanded their level of trust and the closeness of their fellowship by reorganizing the federation in 1975 as the Lutheran Churches in India and in the 1980s dropping the plural "Churches" for the singular "Church." Over the years the UELCI has assumed more denominational functions, not the least of which is its serving as the representative body holding the membership of the member churches with the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES. Interestingly, the church is not a member of (though it cooperates with) the LUTHERAN WORLD FEDERATION (LWF). Most of the member churches of the UELCI are members of the LWF.

The UELCI represents more than 1,500,000 church members. Associated churches include the Andhra Evangelical Lutheran Church, Arcot Lutheran Church, Evangelical Lutheran Church in Madhya Pradesh, Gossner Evangelical Lutheran Church in Chotanagpur and Assam, Good Samaritan Evangelical Lutheran Church, India Evangelical Lutheran Church, Jeypore Evangelical Lutheran Church,

United Evangelical Mission

Northern Evangelical Lutheran Church, South Andhra Evangelical Lutheran Church, and Tamil Evangelical Lutheran Church.

Address:

United Evangelical Lutheran Church in India
Gurukul Campus
94 Purasawalkam High Rd.
Kilpauk 600 010 Chennai
Tamil Nadu
India

Sources:

Bachmann, E. Theodore, and Mercia Brenne Bachmann. Lutheran Churches in the World: A Handbook. Minneapolis, MN: Augsburg, 1989.
Directory—Handbuch. Geneva: Lutheran World Federation, issued annually.

United Evangelical Mission

See Rhenish Mission

United Free Church of Scotland

The United Free Church of Scotland continues the tradition of the Free Church of Scotland (now a constituent part of the CHURCH OF SCOTLAND). In 1900 the Free Church merged with another splinter group from the Church of Scotland, the United Presbyterian Church, to form the United Free Church of Scotland. In 1929 the United Free Church of Scotland merged into the Church of Scotland. However, a minority segment of the United Church did not concur with the merger and decided to continue under their previous name and administration.

The church has continued to advocate freedom from state control and support. It has also argued for religious equality, which led to its early openness to women in the ordained ministry. Doctrinally it is like the Church of Scotland, doctrine not being at issue in the debates that led to the church's formation.

The highest legislative body in the church is its General Assembly. The church is a relatively small body, with only six thousand members, but it carries on an active world ministry in Cambodia and in cooperation with the UNITED CONGREGATIONAL CHURCH OF SOUTHERN AFRICA in Botswana. It is a member of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES and the WORLD ALLIANCE OF REFORMED CHURCHES.

Address:

United Free Church of Scotland
11 Newton Pl.
Glasgow G3 7PR
United Kingdom
<http://www.ufcos.org.uk/>

Source:

Bauswein, Jean-Jacques, and Lukas Vischer, eds. The Reformed Family Worldwide: A Survey of Reformed Churches, Theological Schools, and International Organizations. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans, 1999.

United Kingdom

The United Kingdom (UK) consists of four countries: England, Scotland, and Wales (which make up Great Britain) and the six counties of Northern Ireland, which remained part of the UK when Éire became independent in 1922. The history, especially the religious history, of each of these countries is inextricably bound with that of the others, and yet, at the same time, is a story in its own right.

Britain's having been more affected than southern Europe by the Ice Ages, fewer evidences of the early culture remain than is the case in what are now southern France and Spain. It is, however, assumed that there would have been similarities in a belief in an afterlife: a shallow grave found in Wales containing a young man buried with bracelets of ivory and covered with red ochre is estimated to date from roughly 25,000 B.C.E. (shortly before the last great period of glaciation), making it the oldest recorded British burial. The earliest evidence of religion in Britain is archaeological, going back to at least the fourth millennium B.C.E. Monuments such as Stonehenge (begun between 3100 and 2100 B.C.E. and believed to have been used for ceremonial purposes), as well as elaborate tombs, suggest that gods and divine powers played an important role in the Neolithic and Bronze ages.

The oldest surviving mythologies tell of successive invasions from Ireland. Later, trade with the Gallic Celts resulted in a pagan Celtic culture becoming well established in the southeast of England by the fourth century B.C.E. By the time of the Roman invasion in 55 B.C.E., the Druids were in a position of considerable power and were sup-

Followers	2000			2025	2050
	total	%	rate
Christians	48,581,000	82.6	0.10	47,904,000	42,405,000
Anglicans	26,278,000	44.7	0.12	26,000,000	24,200,000
Roman Catholics	5,620,000	9.6	0.04	5,650,000	5,650,000
Protestants	5,050,000	8.6	-0.28	4,800,000	4,400,000
Nonreligious	6,921,000	11.8	0.63	8,100,000	9,405,000
Muslims	1,197,000	2.0	1.32	1,400,000	1,600,000
Atheists	794,000	1.4	0.99	1,000,000	1,450,000
Hindus	429,000	0.7	1.36	500,000	600,000
Jews	302,000	0.5	-0.25	275,000	250,000
Sikhs	235,000	0.4	0.45	275,000	350,000
Buddhists	165,000	0.3	3.21	250,000	300,000
Spiritists	68,800	0.1	2.26	85,000	100,000
Chinese folk-religionists	39,500	0.1	1.23	45,000	52,000
Baha'is	30,600	0.1	1.65	40,000	60,000
Neoreligionists	16,000	0.0	1.71	38,500	45,000
Ethnoreligionists	7,100	0.0	1.64	8,000	10,000
other religionists	44,000	0.1	-0.01	40,000	40,000
Total population	58,830,000	100.0	0.22	59,961,000	56,667,000

pressed by the Romans for political rather than religious reasons. There is disagreement about how Romanized British paganism became, but many of the local deities became fused with, or at least were joined by, the gods and goddesses of Rome. Isis and other Egyptian gods also made their way to Britain, which was still a pagan country in the late Roman period.

Pockets of Christianity are thought to have been introduced to Britain in the second century, but it seems unlikely that it existed in any substantial form much before the middle of the third century. St. Ninian (c. 360–432), the first known Christian missionary in Scotland, built a stone church at Whit-horn in 379. Other missionaries (often by way of Ireland) contributed to the establishment of the Celtic Church in the fifth century, with a number of the early monasteries, such as Iona and Lindisfarne, remaining places of pilgrimage to this day. In 597, St. Augustine (d. 604/605)—not to be confused with Augustine of Hippo—was sent to Britain by Pope Gregory I (c. 540–604) and became the first archbishop of Canterbury after the conversion of King Ethelbert of Kent (d. 616). Through the next centuries, the Celtic Church was gradually absorbed into the mainstream of Western Christianity based in Rome.

After the Norman Conquest of 1066, Roman canon law (the chief agent of papal control in the Western church) became increasingly powerful (and corrupt), provoking the reformer John Wyclif (1330–1384) to condemn practices such as the selling of indulgences. His followers, known as the Lollards, were suppressed after an unsuccessful uprising in 1414 but are seen as the precursors to the Reformation in the sixteenth century. Then, England's King Henry VIII (1491–1547) could muster sufficient support to break away from Rome over the question of the dissolution of his marriage to the first of his six wives, Catherine of Aragon (1485–1536), and proclaim himself head of the CHURCH OF ENGLAND in 1534. Henry's daughter, Mary Tudor, attempted during her reign (1553–1558) to restore Catholicism but merely succeeded in fanning the flames of the Reformation. One of the first actions of Mary's half-sister, Queen Elizabeth I (1533–1603), was to secure a Protestant future for England, and since 1559 the Church of England has been "by law established."

The CHURCH IN WALES had been legally part of the Church of England when it was still part of the Roman Church, and thus it found itself established as a Protestant church. It became disestablished in 1920. Despite Elizabeth I's officially reforming the CHURCH OF IRELAND, most Irish Christians remained loyal to Rome. In 1869 the statutory union between the Anglican churches of Ireland and England was dissolved, and the Church of Ireland ceased to be established by law. There has never been an established Church for Northern Ireland.

Once established, the Church of England was opposed not only by Roman Catholics but also by Protestants who wanted to purify the church even further. Some of these Puritans worked for reform within the Anglican Church, others formed small separatist movements, later known as the English Independent or Congregationalist movement. The Separatist Puritans led by Robert Browne (c. 1550–1633) found a more tolerant reception in the Netherlands, and the Pilgrim Fathers emigrated from Leiden, via Plymouth, to New England in 1620 under the leadership of John Robinson (c. 1576–1625).

Scotland's Reformation owes much to the persistence of the Calvinist John Knox (1505–1572), with the Reformed CHURCH OF SCOTLAND becoming established along Presbyterian lines in 1560. Subsequent pressure from Stuart kings to make the church episcopal came to a head in 1638 when the Covenanters, revolting against Charles I's attempt to introduce the Scottish Prayer Book of 1637, became embroiled in the civil wars (1642–1646; 1648–1651), which were fought between the Royalist Cavaliers and the Puritan Roundheads, led by Oliver Cromwell (1599–1658).

The congregation at St. Joseph's Church in London (Helene Rogers/TRIP)

The UK has had a continuing history of religious dissent. The early English Baptists had settled in London in the first half of the seventeenth century; in 1650 the name Quaker was applied to George Fox (1624–1691) and his followers, who were later known as the Society of FRIENDS. During the turbulence of the Civil War, there was a mushrooming of relatively short-lived millennial movements (such as the Ranters, the Levellers, and the Fifth Monarchy Men) in the same period. Around the 1730s, a surge of revivalism (the Awakening) was witnessed in Wales, England, and, slightly later, in Scotland—it was in 1738 that John Wesley (1703–1799), the Anglican priest who was to found the Methodist movement, experienced a profound spiritual conversion that reinforced his fervent evangelical fervor. In 1843, 474 Disruption Dissenters, constituting nearly a third of the ministry of the Church of Scotland, seceded to form the Free Church of Scotland. The nineteenth century also saw the arrival of a number of new sects, some of which (such as the PLYMOUTH BRETHREN [EXCLUSIVE] and THE SALVATION ARMY) were homegrown; others (such as the SEVENTH-DAY ADVENTIST CHURCH, the CHURCH OF CHRIST, SCIENTIST, and the JEHOVAH'S WITNESSES) came from the United States of America. Toward the end of the century, one or two other movements, such as Madame Blavatsky's THEOSOPHICAL SOCIETY (ADYAR), began to introduce ideas from the East to sections of upper-middle-class England. The National Secular Society was founded by Charles Bradlaugh in 1866, and the British Humanist Association appeared in 1928; but Britain has never experienced the virulent anticlericalism found in some other parts of Europe.

The early twentieth century witnessed the arrival of several Pentecostal sects from the United States (by way of Norway), followed by the further appearance of "foreign" religions. Successive waves of migrants (particularly West Indians in the 1950s and people of Asian origin from the 1960s onward) changed not only the ethnic but also the religious composition of England. While the major denominations were undergoing a steady decline in church attendance and membership, there was a growth (which by no means compensated for the loss in the traditional churches) in Charismatic and Pentecostal Christianity, especially among Afro-Caribbeans who found themselves unwelcome in predominantly White churches. Sunni, Shi'a, and Ahmadiyya mosques, Hindu and Buddhist temples, Sikh gurdwaras (temples), and a few Shinto shrines appeared in the high streets and back streets of London and a number of towns in the Midlands. A further development was the emergence of both indigenous and imported new religions, which became increasingly visible from the late 1960s. Among those originating in the United Kingdom were the Aetherius Society, the School of Economic Science, the Emin, the Jesus Army, and the Findhorn Foundation in the north of Scotland, which is visited by New Age seekers from around the world. By the turn of the century, INFORM (a government-supported organization providing information about alternative religions) had records on well over a thousand different groups in the UK—as well as a number of anticult and countercult movements that had been set up to warn the population about the perceived theological and practical dangers of alien religions.

A law decreeing the burning of heretics remained in force in England until 1676, although the last persons burned at the stake for heresy in England were two Anti-Trinitarians in 1612. In Scotland an eighteen-year-old student, charged with denying the Trinity, was hanged at Edinburgh as late as 1697. Witches had been burned or, more frequently, hanged in Britain from the time of the Middle Ages, but the witch-hunts reached a peak in the seventeenth century. The last witchcraft trial in England was held in 1712 (1722 in Scotland).

In 1689 the Act of Toleration had granted freedom of worship to nonconformists or Free Churches (that is, Protestants refusing to conform to the doctrines or authority of the Established Church), who were then allowed their own ministers and places of worship—subject to their taking an oath of allegiance to the Crown. However, the act did not apply to Roman Catholics or Unitarians, who remained subject to civil and religious constraints until the nineteenth century. Furthermore, the earlier Test Acts, barring anyone who was not a member of the Established Church from holding public office, remained in force until the second half of the nineteenth century—religious tests for academics in the universities of Oxford, Cambridge, and Durham being abolished in 1871. The Roman Catholic hierarchy was eventually restored in England and Wales in 1850 (giving rise to a "no popery" furor over "Papal Aggression")—but not until 1878 in Scotland. Ironically, although discrimination on grounds of sex or race became illegal in the 1970s, Northern Ireland is the only part of the UK in which discrimination on religious grounds has been an offense. The introduction of the Human Rights Act in October 2000, allowing cases concerning rights given under the European Convention of Human Rights to be dealt with in British courts, has given rise to a new situation that has yet to be fully clarified.

So far as British Jewry is concerned, a small community had settled in England after the Norman Conquest, was expelled by Edward I (1239–1307), and then was readmitted under Cromwell. Confessing Jews were sufficiently integrated into British society to be admitted to Parliament in 1858—Disraeli had converted to Christianity ten years before he entered Parliament in 1837, but although Lionel de Rothschild had been elected a member for the City of London from 1847, he had been unable to submit to the required Christian oaths and had not been permitted to take up his seat. Although making a notable contribution to British society, even the influx of Jewish refugees exiled by the Russian pogroms in 1881, and those fleeing from Nazi persecution in central and eastern Europe during the first half of the twentieth century, have never resulted in the community's becoming statistically very significant, this being partly due to a high rate of intermarriage. On a few isolated occasions outbreaks of anti-Semitism have hit parts of Britain: anti-Semitic riots occurred, for example, in the Welsh valleys in 1911 and in several large English towns in 1947.

Toward the latter part of the twentieth century, there have been periods of further tension related to the diversity of beliefs and practices associated with ethnic minorities, one such instance being triggered by the placing of a fatwa upon Salman Rushdie after the publication and public burnings of his book Satanic Verses. Generally speaking, however, Britain has enjoyed a relatively peaceful coexistence among its many religious communities. That has not, however, been the case in Northern Ireland, where constant tensions have existed between a Protestant majority, which has enjoyed relative economic and political advantage, and a Catholic minority that wants to be reunited with the rest of Ireland. The conflict erupted into violence in 1968, and by the end of 1993 well over three thousand "troubles-related deaths" had resulted from terrorist activities by paramilitary organizations such as the Irish Republican Army, the Ulster Defence Association, and the Ulster Volunteer Force. A series of uneasy cease-fires continue to be broken by schismatic groups.

Westminster Abbey (Corel)

Unlike many other European countries, there is no legal definition or official registration of religions. Those that wish to do so may apply for charitable status, which can confer certain financial and status benefits. There have been a few restrictions placed upon some of the newer religions and their adherents (mainly, though not exclusively, with regard to immigration), but generally speaking the only laws that control members of any religion are those, such as the criminal code, that apply to any other citizen of the country.

There are, however, both privileges and restrictions related to the Established Churches, and the question of disestablishment is under constant review. While in the earlier part of the twentieth century the Church of England was referred to as the Conservative Party at prayer, from around the 1960s it appeared to become less compliant to the establishment (with a small e), both theologically and politically. The publication of Honest to God in 1963 by the bishop of Woolwich, John Robinson; a series of provocative statements by David Jenkins, bishop of Durham; and the introduction of the Anglican Alternative Service Book in 1980 all led to acute anxiety among traditionalists about the undermining not merely of the established church but also of the very fabric of British society. Tensions between church and state—as represented, respectively, by the archbishop of Canterbury, Robert Runcie (1925–2000) and the prime minister, Margaret Thatcher (b. 1925)—were exacerbated when Dr. Runcie commissioned a report on urban poverty (published as Faith in the City in 1985) and insisted on praying not only for the British but also for the relatives of Argentines who died in the Falklands War. The final crunch for some Anglicans came when, in 1992, the General Synod agreed to the ordination of women to the ministry, and the bishop of London, Graham Leonard, led a small exodus of clergy into the ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH.

In 2001 the total UK population was just under 60 million, of whom 50 million were in England, 5 million in Scotland, 3 million in Wales, and 1.7 million in Northern Ireland. Allegiance to (although not necessarily membership in) religious organizations in the UK as a whole has been estimated as follows: Anglican (43 percent); Roman Catholic (10 percent); Presbyterian (4 percent); Methodist (2 percent); other Trinitarian (4 percent); Non-Trinitarian (2.2 percent); Muslim (2.4 percent); Sikh (1 percent); Hindu (0.8 percent); Jewish (0.5 percent); “other” (0.7 percent); and “non-religious” (29 percent).

So far as formal membership in Britain is concerned, just over 1.5 million persons are Anglicans, and there are 1.7 million Roman Catholics, 1 million Presbyterians (including the UNITED REFORMED CHURCH OF THE UNITED KINGDOM, which was an amalgamation in 1972 of Congregationalists and English Presbyterians), 0.5 million Methodists, 0.25 million Baptists, and a further 0.5 million belonging to various independent churches. It should, however, be pointed out that membership numbers can be misleading, as some religions (such as the Roman Catholic Church) include children, while others include only those who have undergone adult baptism. According to the 1991 Northern Ireland census, the religious distribution there was as follows: Roman Catholic (38 percent); Presbyterian (21 percent); Church of Ireland (18 percent); Methodist (4 percent); Baptist (1.2 percent); Brethren, Congregationalist, and Unitarian (all under 1 percent); “other” (5 percent); “none” (4 percent); and “not stated” (7 percent).

If such concepts as “religious disposition” and “Christian community” are used, the UK is still predominantly (roughly two-thirds) Christian—but hardly fervently so, with only a third of the population calling themselves religious (and just 6 percent saying they are “very religious”), while nearly half claimed that they were “not religious.” Less than one in ten of the population attends a religious service at least once a week—the majority do so less than once a year. At the same time, a third claim to pray at least once a week, believe that Jesus was both man and God, and that their religious beliefs have a great deal of influence on their daily life. Furthermore, over a third (13 percent of whom had denied being “religious”) report that they have a spiritual life.

Except in Northern Ireland, involvement in institutional religion is closely related to age, those over fifty accounting for well over half the adult church attendance. There is also a noteworthy difference between the countries in self-reported church attendance, the rate in Northern Ireland being roughly twice that in Scotland, which in turn is roughly twice that in England, with Wales having dropped from a rate similar to Scotland’s to one similar to England’s over the latter quarter of the twentieth century.

One way to describe religion in Britain in the early part of the twenty-first century could be as a comparatively gentle, secularizing pluralism. The gentleness may be seen as indifference or apathy, but it also suggests a relative absence of virulent antagonisms on the one hand and of frenetic enthusiasms on the other. The secularization is reflected in the extent to which religion has been moving from the public to the private domain. The pluralism is neither devoid of, nor undermined by, tension; competition exists, but on the whole, it is contained within the rules of engagement of the so-called spiritual supermarket. In Northern Ireland the division between embattled minorities of both Roman Catholics and Protestants has been lethal. A lasting solution is still awaited to overcome the historical and political enmities that have become so intransigently entangled in religious identities.

Eileen Barker

Sources:

- Badham, Paul. Religion, State, and Society in Modern Britain. Lewiston, NY: Edwin Mellen, 1989.
- Bebbington, D. W. Evangelicalism in Modern Britain: A History from the 1730s to the 1980s. London: Unwin Hyman, 1989.
- Brierley, Peter. “Christian” England: What the English Church Census Reveals. London: Marc Europe, 1991.
- Brierley, Peter, and Heather Wraight, eds. UK Christian Handbook. London: Christian Research, issued annually.
- Burghart, Richard. Hinduism in Great Britain: The Perpetration of Religion in an Alien Cultural Milieu. London: Tavistock, 1987.
- Davie, Grace. Religion in Britain since 1945. Oxford: Blackwell, 1994.
- Davies, Charles Maurice. Heterodox London: Or, Phases of Free Thought in the Metropolis. 2 vols. London: Tinsley Brothers, 1874.
- Davies, Douglas, Charles Watkins, and Michael Winter. Church and Religion in Rural England. Edinburgh: T and T Clark, 1991.
- Forster, Roger, ed. Ten New Churches. Harrow, Middlesex: British Church Growth Association/MARC Europe, 1986.
- Gay, John D. The Geography of Religion in England. London: Duckworth, 1971.

Gilley, Sheridan, and W. J. Sheils, eds. A History of Religion in Britain: Practice and Belief from Pre-Roman Times to the Present. Oxford: Blackwell, 1994.

Green, Miranda J., ed. The Celtic World. London: Routledge, 1995.

Hornsby-Smith, Michael P. Catholics in England 1950–2000: Historical and Sociological Perspectives. London: Cassell, 1999.

Hutton, Ronald. The Pagan Religions of the Ancient British Isles: Their Nature and Legacy. Oxford: Blackwell, 1991.

McLeod, Hugh. Religion and the Working Class in Nineteenth Century Britain. Basingstoke: Macmillan, 1984.

Matthews, Ronald. English Messiahs: Studies of Six English Religious Pretenders, 1656–1927. London: Methuen, 1936.

Montgomery, John. Abodes of Love. London: Putnam, 1962.

Oliver, Ian P. Buddhism in Britain. London: Rider, 1979.

Reynolds, Arthur. English Sects: An Historical Handbook. London: Mowbray, 1921.

Smith, Warren Sylvester. The London Heretics, 1870–1914. New York: Dodd, Mead, 1968.

Thomas, Keith. Religion and the Decline of Magic. Harmondsworth: Penguin, 1973.

Weller, Paul, ed. Religions in the UK: A Multi-Faith Directory. Derby, UK: University of Derby/Inter Faith Network for the United Kingdom, 1993.

United Lodge of Theosophists

The United Lodge of Theosophists grew out of the challenge to the Theosophical movement posed by Robert Crosbie (1948–1919). Crosbie was a long-time theosophist who rejected what he saw as organizational distractions and formalities, especially the polemics that occurred in the 1890s with the changes of leadership following the death of the cofounder of the THEOSOPHICAL SOCIETY (ADYAR), Madame Helena Blavatsky. The American lodges had separated under William Q. Judge. Through the first decade of the twentieth century, rivalries in the Theosophical movement were focused in the personalities of Annie Besant, who headed the international movement from India, and Katherine Tingley, who headed the American Society.

In forming the United Lodge, Crosbie posed the vision of a nonsectarian Theosophical grouping. It would be loyal to the founders of Theosophy but not show preference for any individual opinions. The United Lodge was formed in 1909 without a constitution, by-laws, or officers. Members, called associates, sign a statement of sympathy with the “Declaration,” and any one of them may found an independent associated lodge.

The United Lodge teaches that there is but one life, a spirit/consciousness that is constantly evolving toward a greater understanding and realization. This evolution proceeds along a course that is native to humanity. The mind is the place of realization and growth, and humans are in a continuous process of growth and development.

The United Lodge has a primary periodical, Theosophy, published in Los Angeles, and The Theosophical Movement, published in Bombay, India. Eleven affiliated lodges are scattered across North America, and there are eleven others in Europe and India.

United Methodist Church

Address:

United Lodge
245 W. 33rd St.
Los Angeles, CA 90007
<http://ult.org>

Sources:

Crosbie, Robert. The Friendly Philosopher. Los Angeles: Theosophy Company, 1934.
The Theosophical Movement, 1875–1950. Los Angeles: Cunningham Press, 1951.
The United Lodge of Theosophists, Its Mission and Its Future. Los Angeles: Theosophy Company, n.d.

United Methodist Church

The United Methodist Church is the primary body continuing the Wesleyan Methodist tradition in the United States. It is, as of the beginning of the twenty-first century, the third largest religious body in the country.

The crises experienced by John Wesley (1703–1791) during his brief work as an Anglican minister in the colony of Georgia (1735–1738) led to the founding of Methodism as a revivalist movement within the CHURCH OF ENGLAND soon after his return to England. By the 1760s, Methodists had joined the migration of other British citizens to the American colonies. Early groups emerged in northern Virginia, Baltimore (Maryland), Wilmington (Delaware), Philadelphia, and New York City. Wesley sent unordained preachers to guide the work. As with the Anglicans, the American Revolution proved a turning point for the movement. All but one of the preachers returned to England, and the remaining Methodists, with John Wesley's consent and guidance, decided to reorganize as an independent denomination.

To facilitate the establishment of the American church, in 1784, Wesley sent the Reverend Thomas Coke, whom he had appointed superintendent, to America to establish the church. At a conference during the Christmas season of that year, the Methodist Episcopal Church (MEC) was founded. Francis Asbury (1745–1816), the one preacher who had not returned to England, was elected the church's first bishop. He would lead the church for the next forty years. The church's basic organization was the conference of ministers who met annually under the bishop. At the end of the annual gathering, the bishop announced their pastoral assignment for the coming year. With the bishop assigning ministers to their work, a national strategy for evangelizing the country could be developed. Wesley also edited the Church of England's Thirty-nine Articles of Religion and presented Twenty-five Articles, which the Methodist Episcopal Church accepted as its doctrinal statement. After the war the church grew significantly, and by the 1830s it had become the largest religious organization in America.

In the first decades of the church, it faced and resolved several issues that had led to schisms. As the church grew, many African Americans, especially in the nonslave states in the North, became members. However, African American members were segregated in worship and not welcomed into the ordained ministry. Beginning in the 1790s, a set of schisms occurred among the African American members that led to several new denominations being established, most notably the AFRICAN METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH and AFRICAN METHODIST EPISCOPAL ZION CHURCH. At about the same time, a number of German-speaking immigrants in the new nation were affected by the Methodist revivals. However, Asbury decided that German had no future in America, and he declined to set up German-speaking parishes. This led to the establishment of several new "Methodist" denominations, the Evangelical Association (after 1922 the Evangelical Church) and the United Brethren in Christ. In 1830 the Methodist Episcopal Church experienced the first of several schisms, by ministers and congregations who founded the Methodist Protestant Church (MPC). The church had no bishops and allowed congregations a voice in hiring their minister and lay members a role in the national church leadership.

The most significant break occurred in 1844, when the General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church (MEC) voted to divide, the issues of slavery and the nature of episcopal leadership being the prime issues. The southern conferences reorganized as the Methodist Episcopal Church, South (MECS). At the time of the split, the ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH replaced the Methodist Episcopal Church as the largest religious body in the United States, though both the MEC and MECS continued to grow through the rest of the century.

Not only did Methodism spread across the United States, but by the middle of the nineteenth century it had fully joined the world-missions movement that the British Methodists had helped to initiate. The several Methodist branches sent missionaries to all parts of the globe, and the scope of foreign work increased as more countries were opened to the missionary enterprise.

In the twentieth century, the various branches of Methodism began a process of reversing the fragmentation of the previous century. In 1939 the MEC, MECS, and MPC united to form the Methodist Church (1939–1968). In 1946 the Evangelical Church and the United Brethren merged to form the Evangelical United Brethren. In 1968 the Evangelical United Brethren and the Methodist Church united to form the United Methodist Church.

The United Methodist Church does not have a central headquarters, though the headquarters of its Council on Ministries serves some of those functions. Additional offices of its national boards and agencies are located in Nashville, Tennessee (the headquarters of the former MECS); Washington, DC; and Evanston, Illinois. The highest legislative body in the church is the General Conference, which meets quadrennially. In the United States the church is divided geographically into five jurisdictions, and each jurisdiction into conferences. Jurisdictional conferences meet quadrennially, during which time elections are held to fill any vacancies in the episcopacy, and bishops receive their assignments for the next four years. Bishops preside over one or two annual conferences and appoint the ministers to their parish assignments. Conferences outside the United States are grouped into seven central conferences that function much as jurisdictional conferences, at which bishops are elected.

At the time of the formation of the United Methodist Church, the constituent bodies were already participating in the international move to grant autonomous status to foreign churches that had resulted from earlier missionary endeavors. In 1968 a number of the former mission churches took the occasion of the formation of the new church in the United States to assume their autonomous status. Most of these churches have continued a fraternal relationship with the United Methodist Church through the WORLD METHODIST COUNCIL. The United Methodist Church is also a member of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES.

In 1999 the church reported 8,377,000 members. It supports a massive program of higher education, social service agencies, and medical facilities, both in the United States and abroad.

Address:

United Methodist Church
Council on Ministries
601 W. Riverside Ave.
Dayton, OH 45406

Sources:

- Allen, Charles Livingstone. Meet the Methodists: An Introduction to the United Methodist Church. Nashville, TN: Abingdon, 1998.
- Burke, Emory Stevens, ed. The History of American Methodism. 3 vols. New York: Abingdon, 1965.
- Campbell, Ted A. Methodist Doctrines: The Essentials. Nashville, TN: Abingdon, 1999.
- Collins, Kenneth J. A Real Christian: The Life of John Wesley. Nashville, TN: Abingdon, 1999.
- Langford, Thomas A., ed. Doctrine and Theology in the United Methodist Church. Nashville, TN: Kingswood, 1990.
- Wesley, John. Works. Vol. 1. Nashville, TN: Abingdon, 1984.

United Pentecostal Church International

The United Pentecostal Church International (UPCI), the largest Oneness Pentecostal organization, traces its beginning to the founding of the New Testament Church on the Day of Pentecost (Acts 2). It affirms the experience, doctrine, and practice of the apostles. It emerged within the modern Pentecostal movement with the activity of Charles F. Parham (1873–1929) and his distinctive message concerning the baptism of the Holy Spirit with the initial evidence of speaking in tongues. The ministry of William J. Seymour (1870–1922), a onetime student of Parham's and also a Holiness minister, was equally significant for the founding of the movement. His Azusa Street Mission in Los Angeles, California, was the site of a three-year revival (1906–1909) that resulted in the worldwide spread of Pentecostalism.

The Pentecostal movement experienced a division in 1910, when William Durham (1873–1912), a Baptist pastor in Chicago, dissented on the doctrine of sanctification. A second division occurred when ministers such as Canadian Baptist Frank J. Ewart (1876–1947), Glenn A. Cook (1867–1948), African American pastor G. T. Haywood (1880–1931), and Iranian immigrant Andrew D. Urshan (1884–1967) started baptizing “in the name of the Lord Jesus Christ” instead of with the Trinitarian formula.

On April 15, 1914, Ewart and Cook rebaptized each other in Jesus' name—the decisive act that launched Oneness Pentecostalism as a distinct movement. Soon, they and many other ministers began rebaptizing people, and they adopted a non-Trinitarian explanation of the Godhead. Many members of the ASSEMBLIES OF GOD (AG), which had formed in 1914, embraced this teaching, including two prominent ministers, Howard A. Goss and E. N. Bell. Then in 1916, the AG adopted a Trinitarian statement of faith, forcing the Oneness ministers to withdraw. Some 156 of 585 ministers left the Assemblies.

In 1917 leading Oneness ministers organized the General Assembly of Apostolic Assemblies. In 1918 it merged with a small pre-existing group called the PENTECOSTAL ASSEMBLIES OF THE WORLD (PAW), which had embraced the Oneness message. The uniquely organized PAW was forced to hold all of its conferences in the North, on account of segregationist regulations in the South. As a result, few of the southern ministers could participate fully, and in 1924 most of the whites withdrew from the PAW. They formed three regional organizations, two of which soon merged. The desire for interracial unity was so strong, however, that in 1931 the merged group joined with the PAW again, creating the Pentecostal Assemblies of Jesus Christ. Initially its governing board was required to be 50 percent black, but later its racial composition was adjusted to be the same as that of the ministry. Again, the pressures of society worked against this new effort. By 1938 most of the blacks had left and returned to the PAW, which a few ministers had kept alive.

At this point, there were two relatively large, predominately white Oneness Pentecostal organizations—the Pentecostal Church, Incorporated, and the Pentecostal Assemblies of Jesus Christ. On September 25, 1945, these two groups merged in St. Louis, Missouri, forming the United Pentecostal Church. In 1972 the word International was added to the official name. The first general superintendent was Howard Goss, who served from 1945 to 1951. Following him were Arthur T. Morgan (1952–1967), Oliver F. Fauss (1967, interim), Stanley W. Chambers (1968–1977), and Nathaniel A. Urshan (1978–). In 1946 a Canadian Oneness group, the Full Gospel Pentecostal Church, joined the new organization.

The UPCI shares many key beliefs with other conservative Protestants, including the existence of one true God; the creation of the universe by God; the inspiration, authority, and infallibility of the Bible; the existence of angels, the devil, and demons; the fall and sinfulness of humanity; the Incarnation (Jesus Christ is God manifested in the flesh, the Son of God, and born of a virgin); the Atonement (the substitutionary death, burial, and resurrection of Jesus Christ); salvation by grace through faith in Jesus Christ; water baptism; the New Testament church as the people of God; the priesthood of all believers; the rapture of the church; the premillennial second coming of Jesus Christ to earth; the millennial kingdom of Jesus Christ; the last judgment; eternal punishment for the unrighteous; and eternal life for the righteous. The UPCI observes the Lord's Supper and practices foot washing as an ordinance.

Like all other Pentecostal groups, the UPCI teaches the baptism of the Holy Spirit with the initial sign of tongues; miraculous, spiritual gifts for today; and divine healing. In addition, the UPCI embraces three important Oneness Pentecostal distinctives. First it affirms the Oneness view of the Godhead. God is absolutely and indivisibly one (Deuteronomy 6:4), and in Jesus Christ dwells all the fullness of the Godhead bodily (Colossians 2:9). In order to redeem fallen humanity, God has revealed Himself as the Father (in parental relationship to humanity), in the Son (in human flesh), and as the Holy Spirit (in spiritual action). (See Malachi 2:10; Luke 1:35; Genesis 1:2.) These three titles identify manifestations of the one God, not three distinct persons or centers of consciousness in the Godhead. Jesus is fully God and fully man.

Second, the church affirms the plan of salvation according to Acts 2:38. In the new covenant, the application of God's grace and the expression of saving faith come as humans repent of sins, are baptized in the name of Jesus Christ for the remission of sins, and receive the gift of the Holy Spirit (Acts 2:38). Following the pattern of the apostolic church, water baptism should be administered by immersion in the name of Jesus Christ, for Jesus is the only name given for salvation (Acts 4:12).

Third, the church affirms the necessity of holiness of life. The UPCI teaches that sanctification is a process that begins at the new birth. Citing Hebrews 12:14 and other scriptural passages, the UPCI Articles of Faith emphasize the need for holiness both inwardly (attitudes and thoughts) and outwardly (behavior and dress).

UPCI church services are characterized by demonstrative, spontaneous worship. Important elements of public worship are preaching, singing, testifying, and praying. Evangelistic services typically end with an altar call, extended prayer by the congregation, and the laying on of hands.

The basic form of church government is congregational. The local body controls its own affairs, and the pastor is the leader under Christ. There is a strong district and national organization for the sake of ministerial standards, fellowship, and world evangelism. The organization is governed by its annual general conference. When the conference is not in session, the highest governing body is the Board of General Presbyters. The general board consists of the general superintendent, the general secretary-treasurer, two assistant general superintendents, six divisional directors, the district superintendents, and the regional executive presbyters. A global council, composed of representatives from around the world, coordinates the international efforts of the various national bodies affiliated with the UPCI. The UPCI ordains both men and women. It recognizes women as evangelists, missionaries, and pastors, but it reserves the top executive offices for men.

The work of the church is organized into the following divisions: church administration, editorial, education, foreign missions, Harvestime (radio), home missions (United States and Canada), ladies' ministries, Sunday school, youth, and publishing.

The organization owns the Pentecostal Publishing House, which prints materials under the imprints Word Aflame Press and World Aflame Publications. Among the institutions operated or endorsed by the church are the World Network of Prayer, Harvestime radio ministry, the Urshan Graduate School of Theology, seven Bible colleges in North America and eighty overseas, the Historical Center, Tupelo Children's Mansion (an orphanage), Lighthouse Ranch for Boys (a rehabilitation center), Spirit of Freedom (a ministry to alcohol and drug abusers), and Compassion Services International (a relief agency). The official periodical is the Pentecostal Herald.

In June 1999, the UPCI reported 3,892 churches (excluding daughter works) in the United States and Canada, and 25,450 in 136 other countries. The regular attendance was about 500,000 in the United States and Canada and 2.1 million elsewhere, for a total of 2.6 million members with a constituency of approximately 4 million. The UPCI is the only Oneness organization to have a large missions program in all areas of the world, with high concentrations of adherents in Louisiana; Mizoram, India; Ethiopia; and New Brunswick, Canada.

Address:

United Pentecostal Church International World Evangelism Center

8855 Dunn Rd.
Hazelwood, MO 63042-2299
<http://www.upci.org>

Schools, and International Organizations. Grand Rapids, MI:
William B. Eerdmans, 1999.

David K. Bernard

Sources:

- Bernard, David K. A History of Christian Doctrine. Vol. 3, The Twentieth Century. Hazelwood, MO: Word Aflame, 1999.
- Clanton, Arthur L., and Charles E. Clanton. United We Stand. Hazelwood, MO: Word Aflame, 1995.
- Foster, Fred. Their Story: 20th Century Pentecostals. Rev. ed. Hazelwood, MO: Word Aflame, 1981.
- Hall, J. L., and David K. Bernard, eds. Doctrines of the Bible. Hazelwood, MO: Word Aflame, 1990.

United Presbyterian Church of Brazil

The United Presbyterian Church of Brazil began in the 1970s when the more theologically liberal and socially active leaders in the PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH IN BRAZIL were alienated by some of the more conservative and antiecclesiological policies instituted by the church. In 1972 a number of the ministers and laypeople left to form a separate church that in 1973 became the United Presbyterian Church. They found that some ministers and churches of like mind had previously left the Independent Presbyterian Church and formed the National Federation of Presbyterian Churches. The two groups made common cause, and in 1978 they merged to form the United Presbyterian Church of Brazil.

Although it is a relatively small body on the Brazilian landscape, the United Presbyterian Church has become well known for its protests of social injustice and its activities on behalf of the poor. Its theological statements include not only several of the historic Reformed statements of faith but also two more recent documents, the Barmen Confession, adopted by German Christians in protest against Nazism, and the Confession of 1967, originally promulgated by American Presbyterians (now united in the PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH [U.S.A.]). In the 1990s the church reported fifty-two hundred members.

The church is ecumenically active at the national and regional levels. Internationally, it is a member of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES and the WORLD ALLIANCE OF REFORMED CHURCHES.

Address:

United Presbyterian Church
C.P. 01-2 12, Av. Princesa Isabel
Salas 1210-1211
290 10-260 Victoria, ES
Brazil

Source:

Bauswein, Jean-Jacques, and Lukas Vischer, eds. The Reformed Family Worldwide: A Survey of Reformed Churches, Theological

United Protestant Church of Belgium

The United Protestant Church of Belgium continues the movement of the sixteenth century Reformation into the area now known as Belgium. As in the Netherlands, the Reformed Church found support, but as a result of the settlement of the struggle for control over the Low Countries in the Treaty of Utrecht (1713), Belgium remained a predominantly Roman Catholic region. Those Reformed churches that survived were attached to the Reformed Church in the Netherlands and the Reformed Church of France. There were some forty Protestant congregations in the land in 1914.

Following World War I, the Methodist Episcopal Church, South (now a constituent part of the UNITED METHODIST CHURCH) began a relief movement in Belgium that also led to the formation of churches. In 1922 a Belgian mission was formally initiated, and a school, orphanage, and hospital opened. The Belgian annual conference was created in 1930. The growth of the church through the 1930s was accompanied by a general growth in Protestantism. Between the wars, more than two hundred Protestant congregations of all types were formed.

Protestants suffered greatly during World War II. The Methodist Church lost much of its property, and many of its leaders were arrested. After the war, American Methodists launched an eight-year rebuilding program. Included in the rebuilding was a new theological school in Brussels. In 1952 the Belgium Conference was incorporated into the Central and Southern European Central Conference, whose bishop resided in Zurich.

Through the 1960s, various parts of Belgian Protestantism began to look toward organic union. In 1963 the Methodists united with the Evangelical Protestant Church (a work supported by Swiss Protestants) to form the Protestant Church of Belgium. Then in 1978, the Belgian congregations of the REFORMED CHURCHES IN THE NETHERLANDS and the Belgian Christian Missionary Church united with the Protestant Church of Belgium to form the United Protestant Church.

In the late 1990s, the United Protestant Church reported forty thousand members. Although it is a relatively small body, the church has responsibility for teaching Protestantism in the public schools, and it administers a chaplaincy program in the prisons and hospitals. It is a member of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES, the WORLD ALLIANCE OF REFORMED CHURCHES, and the WORLD METHODIST COUNCIL.

Address:

United Protestant Church
5 rue de Champ-de-Mars

1050 Brussels
Belgium

Sources:

Bauswein, Jean-Jacques, and Lukas Vischer, eds. The Reformed Family Worldwide: A Survey of Reformed Churches, Theological Schools, and International Organizations. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans, 1999.

Van der Bent, Ans J., ed. Handbook/Member Churches/World Council of Churches. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 1985.

United Protestant Church of Netherlands Antilles

The Netherlands Antilles include six islands, three of which are off the coast of Venezuela (Curacao, Bonaire, and Aruba) and three across the Caribbean, east of the Virgin Islands (St. Maarten, Saba, and St. Eustatius). The Netherlands Reformed Church was introduced as early as 1635, primarily through chaplains that accompanied the employees of the Dutch Indies Company, but it had little influence until after the dissolving of the Dutch Indies Company (1791) and the Napoleonic era. The church had tried to convert the original inhabitants of the islands, but with virtually no success, and there was little interest in converting the African laborers until slavery was abolished in 1863. The Roman Catholicism of the original settlers continues as the dominant religious force.

The Dutch language died out on St. Maarten, Saba, and St. Eustatius, and with it the Dutch Reformed Church, whose members were absorbed into the Methodist and Anglican churches. However, in 1825, King William I, the ruler of Holland, decreed the formation of a United Protestant Church in his Caribbean possessions. This church brought together the members of the Netherlands Reformed Church with the minority of members of what is now the EVANGELICAL LUTHERAN CHURCH IN THE KINGDOM OF THE NETHERLANDS. Three units of this church have survived, the churches on Curacao, Aruba, and Bonaire. At the time of their formation, each of these churches was quite small (the one on Bonaire, for example, having a total of seventy-one members).

The most successful of the churches was on Curacao. It was serviced by ministers from Holland, some of whom made periodic trips to Aruba. It grew several congregations, but lost some strength in 1931 when a group of members left to found the Reformed Church in the Netherlands (Liberated) in Curacao. In churches where no minister was available, lay readers delivered sermons from texts approved by the Netherlands Reformed Churches. The first minister was permanently stationed on Aruba in 1858. It was not until 1947 that a second minister was assigned. There are now three congregations.

Bonaire's congregation was not organized until the 1840s. The minister also took a different course and began to baptize the children of the African residents. The island's second congregation was organized in 1934.

The United Protestant Church has seven congregations on the three islands, with a total of approximately five thousand members. It is a member of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES. Services are held in Dutch, English, and Papiamentu (a new language that is composed of elements of Spanish, Portuguese, Dutch, and English that predominates among the population). Although it is relatively small, the church provides the main Protestant presence on the three islands.

Address:

United Protestant Church of Netherlands Antilles
Fortkerk
Fort Amsterdam
Willemstad
Curacao

Sources:

Bauswein, Jean-Jacques, and Lukas Vischer, eds. The Reformed Family Worldwide: A Survey of Reformed Churches, Theological Schools, and International Organizations. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans, 1999.

Van der Bent, Ans J., ed. Handbook/Member Churches/World Council of Churches. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 1985.

United Reformed Church of the United Kingdom

The United Reformed Church, formed in 1972, is the primary vehicle carrying the seventeenth-century Puritan movement in England. In Scotland, Presbyterianism gained the ascendancy in 1560, with Parliament's acceptance of the Scots Confession. With the establishment of the CHURCH OF ENGLAND under Elizabeth I (1558–1603), who assumed the throne in 1558, those who followed the reformed ideas espoused by John Calvin (1509–1564) in Geneva and who hoped eventually to further reform the church along Presbyterian lines, emerged as one wing of the Puritan movement. Puritans sought to purify the church further, and they fell along a range of opinions.

The Puritans had their opportunity in the 1640s, when they gained control of Parliament. In 1643 the Westminster Assembly of Divines met to advise Parliament, and in the process they drew up the Westminster Confession of Faith and the Westminster Catechism. More than any others, these documents define British Presbyterianism. Presbyterianism had always to contend not only with the Church of England but also with Independents (Congregationalists) and Baptists. Although Presbyterians wished to take control from bishops and place it in the hands of church elders (presbyters), the Congregationalists and Baptists opted for authority in the hands of the congregations.

The Puritans reigned supreme during the brief period of the Commonwealth (1643–1660), but with the Restoration of the monarchy in 1660, the episcopally led Church of England returned to power. The various Puritan groupings were forced to organize as dissenting churches. Legal restrictions tended to decrease support, though there was some relief with the Toleration Act of 1689. Beginning in the 1740s, England experienced what was known as the Evangelical Awakening, a national revival that had as its main product the Wesleyan Methodist movement. However, both Presbyterians and Congregationalists experienced new life, and one wing of the Methodists remained loyal to a Calvinist theological perspective. It would organize as the Calvinist Methodist Connexion.

Toward the end of the eighteenth century, dissenting Puritan groups began to take on new organizational expressions. As early as 1783 the presbytery of Northumberland brought Presbyterians in the north of England together. The Presbyterian Church in England was formed in 1836, following the movement of a number of Scots south. The Scottish expatriates also formed the English Synod of the United Presbyterian Church (a Scottish body) in 1863. In 1876, these two groups united to form the Presbyterian Church of England.

Congregationalism in England had taken definite form in 1649 with the issuance of the Savoy Declaration of Faith and Order, which accepted the Reformed theology that underlay the Westminster Confession but opted for congregational church polity. Congregationalists took on new responsibilities with the formation in 1795 of the LONDON MISSIONARY SOCIETY, which would send missionaries and Congregationalism around the world. The society preceded the formation of the Congregational Union of England and Wales in 1832.

The Congregational Union and Presbyterian Church became leading forces in the shaping of Protestantism as a worldwide phenomenon in the nineteenth century and assumed leadership roles in the ecumenical movement that led to the consolidation of so many churches in the twentieth century. The Congregational Union (renamed the Congregational Church of England and Wales in 1966) merged with the Presbyterian Church of England to form the United Presbyterian Church in 1972.

In the meantime, in 1833, Peyton Wyth had brought to England the ideas of radical Presbyterian minister Alexander Campbell, whose work in the United States had led to the formation of a new revivalistic movement that would later lead to the formation of several new denominations, such as the CHURCHES OF CHRIST (NON-INSTRUMENTAL) and the CHRISTIAN CHURCH (DISCIPLES OF CHRIST). Wyth led in the formation of the new British group called the Churches of Christ. Over its first century it formed some two hundred congregations.

In the mid-1970s, the majority of the Association of the Churches of Christ voted to join with the new United Reformed Church, but not by the two-thirds majority needed to effect a merger. Hence, in 1979 the association dissolved, and two new associations formed. One of these combined in 1980 with the United Church. The other continues as the Churches of Christ. The merger led to a name change, the United Reformed Church of England and Wales becoming the United Reformed Church of the United Kingdom.

The United Reformed Church's 100,000 members are grouped into twelve regional synods in England and Wales. With the addition of the Churches of Christ congregations, the church now has a few congregations in Scotland. The former London Missionary Society has been reorganized by merger with the various other missionary societies operating in the Presbyterian and Congregational world, and in 1977 it completed a thorough theoretical realignment that now envisions its work as a partnership arrangement with churches worldwide. It has reemerged as the Council for World Mission.

In 1972 the United Church published a new Confession of Faith, which it saw as a contemporary restatement of the Reformed theological tradition. That confession reflects the church's participation in contemporary theological dialogue. The church is a leading member of the WORLD ALLIANCE OF REFORMED CHURCHES and is also affiliated with the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES. The church retains special relationship to the thirty partnership churches associated with the Council for World Mission.

On April 1, 2000, the Scottish Congregational Church and the United Reformed Church formally united. Congregationalism had come to Scotland at the end of the eighteenth century with the appearance of the two laymen, Robert and James Haldane, who began to advocate the cause of world mission within the CHURCH OF SCOTLAND. The church was slow to respond, and in reaction the brothers began to form independent churches that would support a missionary program. The Reverend Greville Ewing came to their aid and began classes for the training of ministers in 1799. He was the major voice calling the congregations to form the Congregational Union in 1812.

Although it was small, the church would have an important role in world missions. Among its members would be the immortal David Livingstone, who pioneered Christian missions in central Africa. It cooperated with the London Missionary Society formed by the British Congregationalists.

In 1897 the Congregational Union merged with the Evangelical Union. This latter union had arisen as a protest against the Calvinist emphases in one of the splinters of the Church of Scotland, the Synod of the United Secession. The leader of the union was a follower of Arminian theology (similar to that espoused by the Methodists). The union after 1897 was a decidedly more eclectic body. It had an evangelical piety, emphasized social programs, and developed a liberal theology relative to the predominant Presbyterian/Reformed theology that dominated Scotland early in the twentieth century. The union was always a noncreedal church. The union was a pioneer in ecumenism, partially a product of its missionary work.

United Religions Initiative

Congregationalism in Scotland had emerged around three separate structures: the Congregational Union, the Scottish Congregational College (founded in 1811 in Edinburgh), and the Congregational Women's Union. Each of these functions as an independent organization. In the 1990s, supporters of each responded to a plan to link the three organizations more closely into what was termed a voluntary church. This move to give a more coordinated and united existence to the Congregational community met with widespread support, and in 1993 the three entities united as the Scottish Congregational Church.

Address:

United Reformed Church of the United Kingdom
86 Tavistock Pl.
London WC1H 9RT
United Kingdom

Sources:

- Bauswein, Jean-Jacques, and Lukas Vischer, eds. The Reformed Family Worldwide: A Survey of Reformed Churches, Theological Schools, and International Organizations. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans, 1999.
- Van der Bent, Ans J., ed. Handbook/Member Churches/World Council of Churches. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 1985.

United Religions Initiative

The United Religions Initiative was conceived in the mid-1990s by the Rt. Rev. William E. Swing, the EPISCOPAL CHURCH's bishop of San Francisco. He envisioned a global interfaith community that could work toward ending religiously motivated violence and replace such violence with structure based on healing, peace, and justice. Over the next five years the ideals of that vision were spread internationally, and, beginning in 1996, a series of annual Global Summit conferences were convened in San Francisco.

Among the first actions of those who identified with the initiative was the sponsoring of a 72 Hours of Peace program that began on December 31, 1999. The conferences also considered and initiated some forty projects in countries around the world that attracted the attention of prominent religious leaders such as Desmond Tutu of South Africa and the Dalai Lama. These initial efforts led to the organization of a variety of local groups (termed cooperating circles) in different countries, an interim global council, and a formal inaugurating conference held in Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, in June 2000. At the opening of the conference on June 26, people from thirty-nine religious traditions and forty-four countries signed the charter and formally established the United Religions Initiative.

It is the task of the United Religions Initiative to promote enduring daily interfaith cooperation that will in turn lead to its ultimate goal of ending violence caused by religious conflict and lead to a culture characterized by peace, justice, and healing. The first task of the cooperating circles on the various continents of the world was to elect representatives who would form the first Global Council. At the time of its founding, some seventy-five cooperating circles had been recognized. Although the United Religions Initiative is a new interfaith organization, it has made cooperation with other interfaith groups part of its standard operating format.

Address:

United Religions Initiative
P.O. Box 29242
San Francisco, CA 94129-0242
<http://www.uri.org/>
<http://www.united-religions/>

Source:

United Religions Initiative. Posted at <http://www.united-religions.org/newsite/index.htm>. Accessed August 15, 2001.

United Society for the Propagation of the Gospel

See Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts

United Society of Believers in Christ's Second Appearing (Shakers)

The Shakers are a dissenting Christian sect originating in eighteenth-century England. Known initially as the "Shaking Quakers," because they trembled or shook when taken in ecstasy, these enthusiasts coalesced in Bolton near Manchester in the 1740s around two tailors, James and Jane Wardley. Leadership of the small group later passed to an uneducated charismatic and visionary, Ann Lee Standerin (1736-1784), under whose direction she and a handful of followers immigrated to the United States in 1774 and eventually took up residence in New York near Albany. The English immigrants attracted attention when accused of being British sympathizers during the Revolutionary War. They emerged on the religious scene in 1780 when they began to attract American converts. Lee, known by her followers as Mother Ann, traveled throughout eastern New York and New England on a missionary journey. The sites where she was successful in attracting disciples subsequently became centers of Shaker life and the locations of Shaker villages. Lee was regarded by her followers as a gifted prophet, a miracle worker, and their spiritual parent.

A round stone barn at the Shaker settlement of Hancock, Massachusetts (Christopher Rennie/TRIP)

Following Lee's death, successive leaders, known as the ministry, began the process of gathering Believers into separate communities, where life was organized around several fundamental principles including celibacy, common property, acceptance of the ministry's authority, and separation from the "world." Between 1784 and 1826 twenty Shaker villages were established, located from Maine in the East to Kentucky in the West. The Shakers, known formally as the United Society of Believers in Christ's Second Appearing, reached their numerical height in the 1840s, when approximately forty-five hundred Believers inhabited the scattered villages. The society's strenuous work ethic resulted in economic success in both agriculture and light manufacturing.

Among distinctive Shaker beliefs are the notion of God as involving both a male and female aspect (Father and Mother), the association of sin with lust and sexual relations, the identification of Ann Lee with the Christ Spirit, and the possibility of Christian perfection. Worship within the community included physical exercises, such as dances and marches, as well as song, testimony, and exhortation. The years following 1837 witnessed a wave of spiritualistic activity in the society, during which time "spiritual gifts" and messages were received by Shaker "instruments" or mediums.

Following the Civil War the society experienced steady numerical and economic decline. In particular, it failed to recruit and successfully retain many male members. The Believers divided over the best strategy to follow in these circumstances, some arguing for accommodation to modern American life, others resisting it in the name of tradition. Villages were closed, resources were consolidated or sold off, and by the 1980s only two villages remained in New England, each with a mere handful of Believers. In the year 2000, seven Shakers resided at the last village, Sabbathday Lake, Maine, a site founded in 1794. Despite their small numbers, the contemporary Shakers exhibit confidence regarding the future of the society. They are surrounded by a circle of friends and patrons who admire the Believers' spiritual values, their distinctive culture, and the material objects associated with their history.

United States of America

Stephen J. Stein

Sources:

Brewer, Priscilla J. Shaker Communities, Shaker Lives. Hanover: University Press of New England, 1986.

Kirk, John T. The Shaker World: Art, Life, Belief. New York: Harry N. Abrams, 1997.

Stein, Stephen J. The Shaker Experience in America: A History of the United Society of Believers. New Haven: Yale University Press, 1992.

Whitson, Robley Edward, ed. The Shakers: Two Centuries of Spiritual Reflection. New York: Paulist, 1983.

United States of America

The original inhabitants of what is now the United States of America arrived at least thirty thousand years ago from Asia, most likely over a land bridge now submerged beneath the Bering Strait. They spread across the continent, and by the fifteenth century C.E. some five hundred different groupings, now usually referred to as nations, arose. Some groups were small, occupying a relatively confined niche. Others adopted a nomadic lifestyle that saw them roaming over a large territory and living off the land. In still other climes, a settled agricultural life developed. Possibly the largest single settlement was at Cahokia, Illinois, where a city with upward of forty thousand inhabitants once existed.

Each nation had its own religion that was exclusive to it, though the religions often resembled those of bordering nations. Across the continent, religious life and ritual expressions varied widely but were related intimately to the land, its animal inhabitants, and the climate. Religion and the secular order were intertwined, and while religious functionaries—shamans, magicians, healers—were present, they often shared spiritual authority with the chiefs. Once the Europeans arrived, the native peoples began to absorb insights from Christianity, and it often became difficult to distinguish those elements that had been absorbed from those that had been originally present.

Status of religions in the United States of America, 2000-2050

Followers	2000			2025	2050
	total	%	rate
Christians	235,742,000	84.7	0.80	261,348,000	269,522,000
Independents	78,550,000	28.2	1.62	100,000,000	113,000,000
Protestants	64,570,000	23.2	0.70	69,000,000	70,000,000
Roman Catholics	58,000,000	20.8	0.26	65,000,000	66,000,000
Nonreligious	25,078,000	9.0	1.59	40,000,000	50,000,000
Jews	5,621,000	2.0	0.15	6,100,000	6,200,000
Muslims	4,132,000	1.5	1.50	5,920,000	7,100,000
Buddhists	2,450,000	0.9	2.68	5,000,000	8,000,000
Atheists	1,149,000	0.4	4.09	1,600,000	1,900,000
Hindus	1,032,000	0.4	3.24	1,500,000	1,780,000
Neoreligionists	811,000	0.3	3.50	930,000	1,000,000
Baha'is	753,000	0.3	2.30	1,150,000	1,450,000
Ethnoreligionists	435,000	0.2	4.50	500,000	500,000
Sikhs	234,000	0.1	3.87	310,000	400,000
Spiritists	138,000	0.1	1.44	175,000	200,000
Chinese folk-religionists	78,500	0.0	0.32	65,000	50,000
Shintoists	56,200	0.0	1.18	70,000	85,000
Zoroastrians	52,700	0.0	2.20	84,000	106,000
Taoists	11,100	0.0	1.08	13,500	16,500
Jains	7,000	0.0	3.36	7,000	8,500
other religionists	577,000	0.2	0.85	800,000	1,000,000
Total population	278,357,000	100.0	0.92	325,573,000	349,318,000

The first Europeans to discover North America and possibly land in American territory were the Vikings, but significant contact began early in the sixteenth century as the Spanish expanded northward from their original settlements in the Caribbean. Initial settlements were in Florida and New Mexico, but later expanded to include the southwest from Texas to California. Meanwhile, the French expanded up the St. Lawrence River into the Great Lakes region and southward through the Mississippi Valley to New Orleans. Relatively late, with the landing of the settlers in Massachusetts and Virginia at the beginning of the seventeenth century, the British began to make their all-important settlement of the Atlantic seacoast. Both Dutch and Swedish settlements would be established amid the British colonies, but these eventually gave way to British control.

The arrival of the Europeans would lead to the establishment of most of the state churches. Roman Catholicism was planted in the Spanish and French colonies, the Church of England in most of the British colonies. The congregation of the CHURCH OF SWEDEN (Lutheran) in Delaware and of the Reformed Church of the Netherlands in New York and New Jersey continued under British rule. More important for the future of the land, however, were the colonies formed by various groups of religious dissenters. Congregationalists, losers in the power struggle between the Puritans and Anglicans in seventeenth-century England, colonized Massachusetts in 1620. They wished to establish a land in which Congregationalism was the state church, and they proved most intolerant of other dissenters. Earlier, a small group of the most radical Puritans had settled at Plymouth, Massachusetts. These Pilgrims shared the Reformed faith of the Congregationalists but dissented on the idea of establishing a state church.

The intolerance of the Puritans would lead to the banishment of one of their ministers, Roger Williams, who would settle in Rhode Island, where he would found the first Baptist church in the colonies and create a state that allowed broad religious liberties. Farther south, a member of the Society of Friends created a colony in which the beleaguered sectarian groups from across Europe were welcome. Not only did the Quakers make Philadelphia their home, but Mennonites, Brethren, and members of several mystical groups made their way to Pennsylvania. Finally, Roman Catholics from England, where Catholicism was feared by both Puritans and Anglicans, settled and attempted to establish a colony in which religious freedom reigned. The colony would eventually be taken over by Anglicans from neighboring Virginia and the period of religious freedom curtailed.

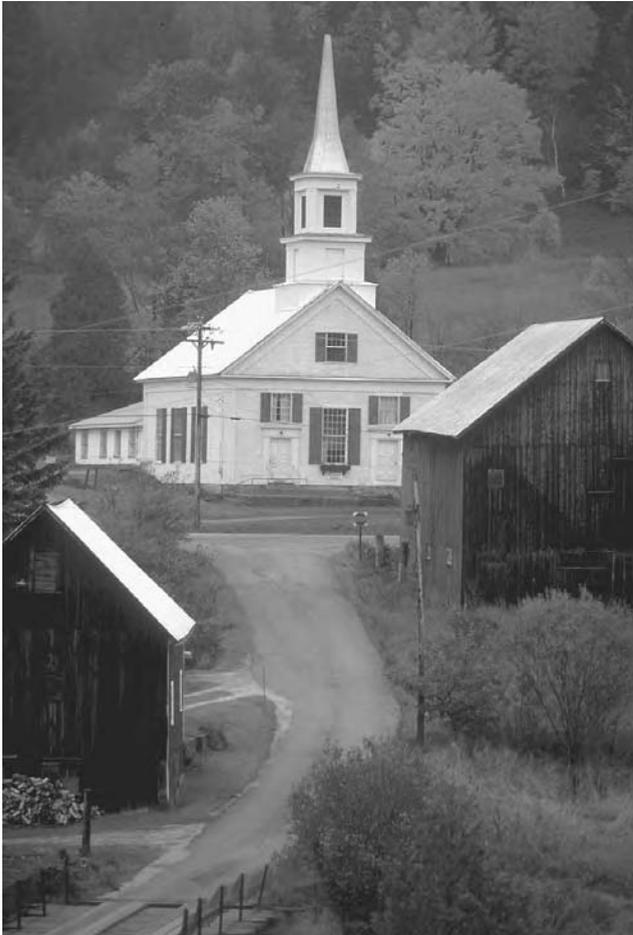

The changes brought by the war for American independence (1776–1781) led to a dramatic change in the religious community. In the new nation, two churches existed in strength, the Congregationalists in New England and the Anglicans in the southern colonies. Anglicanism was identified with the defeated British regime, and few south of New England would tolerate a Congregational establishment. Leading figures in the revolution—Thomas Jefferson, George Washington, and Benjamin Franklin included—were both pragmatic politicians and deists. The most liberal religious thinkers of their day, they opted for an experiment in creating a country without a state church. They left the option for a state church up to the individual states, and Massachusetts kept its establishment into the early nineteenth century. Soon all of the states wrote an antiestablishment clause into their constitutions.

At the time of the founding of the United States, most of the several hundred Native American nations remained intact, though some had been destroyed by disease and war brought by the Europeans. A few of the Native Americans had become the objects of attempts by Christians to convert them, the most successful mission being established by the Roman Catholics in Maryland. Through the nineteenth century, a variety of churches would open missions among Native Americans; however, their efforts would be continually undermined by their identification with the U.S. government, whose policy of war, breaking treaties, and removal of Native Americans to less attractive lands in the West continued to sour the possibilities for full participation of native peoples in American life.

The other factor determining the uniqueness of the new nation was the introduction of slavery into the southern colonies and the adoption of a set of laws inhibiting the integration of African Americans into the other colonies. Following the American Revolution, slavery expanded in the South, and antiblack legislation was adopted by most free states. The country fought a Civil War in the nineteenth century (1860–1865) that resulted in the ending of slavery but did not deal with many of the special laws related to African Americans, including a set of laws adopted in the southern states at the end of the century. Continued unrest because of the legal restrictions on African Americans (and by the middle of the twentieth century on other minority groups) led to the passing of broad civil rights legislation in the 1960s.

When George Washington, the first president of the United States, was inaugurated in 1789, there were, apart from the Native American religions, some seventeen religious groups, sixteen Christian denominations, and a set of Jewish synagogues. The country defined its borders as extending to the Mississippi River, and expansion of settlements into the land of the Native Americans to the west began immediately. In the early decades, the Anglicans, now reorganized as the Protestant Episcopal Church in the U.S.A. (now the EPISCOPAL CHURCH), tended to dominate the political scene, and most of the country's early presidents were drawn from its ranks. The Congregationalists, soon allied with Presbyterians who moved to the United States in large numbers following the restoration of the monarchy in England in 1660, dominated in education and were responsible for the founding of many of the nation's most respected universities, including Harvard, Yale, and Princeton. As a result, the churches of the Reformed tradition also tended to produce the majority of the nation's leading theologians.

As the nation expanded westward, the Baptist Church, the Methodist Episcopal Church, and the ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH were the winners. The Baptists and Methodists, both with miniscule numbers at the time of the American Revolution, moved onto the frontier and experienced great success with evangelizing the largely irreligious settlers. They developed the use of revivals and camp meetings that would evolve and continue to be widely used into the twentieth century. By the 1830s the Methodists had become the largest church in the nation. Through the nineteenth century, the Baptists would eclipse the Methodists, though they would divide into a number of separate denominations.

Church, Waits River, Vermont (Corel)

In the 1840s the Methodists divided into the Methodist Episcopal Church and the Methodist Episcopal Church, South. That act left the Roman Catholics, who were able to remain undivided by the issues fast moving the country to civil war, the largest single church in America. It has remained so to the present. The church grew both by evangelizing the public and as a result of the steady stream of Roman Catholic immigrants. It also grew as Roman Catholic believers residing in the former French and Spanish colonies were added to the nation.

Through the nineteenth century, to some extent because of the continued immigration from Europe, the number of religious groups multiplied decade by decade. Without a controlling state church, religious debates were often resolved by one side departing to found a new church. Innovation led to new religions, and through the century the CHURCH OF JESUS CHRIST OF LATTER-DAY SAINTS, the Spiritualist movement, the THEOSOPHICAL SOCIETY (AMERICA), the CHURCH OF CHRIST, SCIENTIST, and the New Thought movement would emerge and become established on the religious landscape. The Latter-day Saints would pioneer the settlement of the Rocky Mountain states, and they remain the majority body in Utah and the surrounding region. By the end of the nineteenth century, there were more than three hundred Christian denominations.

One of the most important movements in American religion in the nineteenth century was launched by the predicted return of Christ in 1843/1844 by William Miller, a Baptist lay preacher. When his prophecy failed, the movement built around him splintered. New dates would be set and doctrinal divergences would emerge. Out of the pieces of a failed movement would come two of the most successful twentieth-century religious groups, the SEVENTH-DAY ADVENTIST CHURCH and the JEHOVAH'S WITNESSES. It would also produce the WORLDWIDE CHURCH OF GOD, which, after a successful half-century, splintered when the main body dropped its unique doctrines and converted to an orthodox Christian position.

Jews had been present in the American colonies, the first synagogues having been built in New York and Rhode Island by immigrants from Brazil who had fled when the Portuguese recaptured Recife from the Dutch in the 1650s. By the time of the American Revolution, there was a modest string of synagogues from Savannah in the South to New England. The Jewish community expanded greatly in the early nineteenth century, especially through immigration from Germany. In America it would experience a division that also swept through much of the community worldwide. In the West, Jewish leaders would begin to advocate reform and call for the dropping of much of the ritual and legal tradition in favor of an approach that favored the essential ethical and spiritual core of the faith. In response, those who rejected the Reform platform would organize as Orthodox Jews. The arrival of several million Eastern European Jews in the country at the end of the century would not only greatly enlarge the Jewish community but also lead to the emergence of still another perspective, which would take form as Conservative Judaism, in the space between the Orthodox and Reform factions.

With the end of slavery, African Americans were free to develop their own religious institutions. The first African American churches had been formed soon after the American Revolution by Methodists in Philadelphia, New York, and several other northern cities. Two groups emerged as large national bodies in the late nineteenth century, the AFRICAN METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH and the AFRICAN METHODIST EPISCOPAL ZION CHURCH. After the Civil War, the scattered Baptist churches began to organize nationally, and by the end of the century they had formed the NATIONAL BAPTIST CONVENTION, U.S.A. Out of that original organization two other national bodies, the NATIONAL BAPTIST CONVENTION OF AMERICA and the PROGRESSIVE NATIONAL BAPTIST CONVENTION OF AMERICA, have been formed.

The introduction of so many divisions within the religious community ensured that no one religious organization would dominate; however, many Protestants saw themselves as the leading religious force in the country, and during the last half of the nineteenth century they joined Protestants worldwide in seeking means to overcome their disunity. Their efforts resulted in the formation of the Federal Council of Churches, which included among its membership most of the older and larger denominations. It also promoted the merger of its closely related member bodies, and major unions took place within the Lutheran, Presbyterian/Reformed, and Methodist family of denominations.

Although one group of churchmen looked to the development of a united Protestantism, another group became concerned about the changes in church life—especially the theological changes—that had occurred in the larger denominations as a result of the attempt by many church leaders to respond to the social and intellectual challenges of contemporary culture. Conservatives accused the modernists of rejecting the fundamentals of the faith, including the authority of the Bible, the Trinity, the deity of Christ, and the doctrine of creation. That concern would be focused in the 1920s in the arguments over the biblical account of creation, which the fundamentalists insisted should be taken literally. The fundamentalist-modernist controversy split the Protestant community into three factions, which have remained to the present.

The largest group, which retained control of most of the larger denominations, was the modernists, who saw the need to develop the tradition within the contemporary context. The Evangelicals wished to engage culture, but without giving up on what they saw as the essentials of the faith. The fundamentalist core not only wanted to remain true to the essentials of the faith but also to separate from all association with modernists, and even from other conservatives who associated with modernists. These three groups eventually organized their own ecumenical bodies, the National Council of Churches of Christ in the U.S.A., the National Association of Evangelicals, and the American Council of Churches. Internationally, these three groups would associate, respectively, with the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES, the WORLD EVANGELICAL ALLIANCE, and the INTERNATIONAL COUNCIL OF CHRISTIAN CHURCHES.

The process of merging closely related churches that became noticeable during the decades of the Federal Council of Churches continued under the aegis of the National Council. During the late twentieth century, a number of the largest churches presently existing in America were formed by new unions resulting in the formation of the UNITED CHURCH OF CHRIST (1957), the UNITED METHODIST CHURCH (1968), the PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH (U.S.A.) (1983), and the EVANGELICAL LUTHERAN CHURCH IN AMERICA (1988). The largest Baptist churches, the SOUTHERN BAPTIST CONVENTION and the AMERICAN BAPTIST CHURCHES IN THE U.S.A., had drifted to opposite ends of the theological perspective and have not seriously considered merger.

A street evangelist preaches in a California parking lot. (S. Grant/TRIP)

As the Protestant community was reorganizing itself in new structures, and the Roman Catholic Church was feeling its way into becoming an American church, another change was occurring in American religion, the emergence of communities of the world's religions. In 1893, Chicago had hosted the Parliament of the World's Religions, out of which the first Hindu and Muslim organizations would be founded in America. Chinese Buddhist temples had first emerged on the West coast during the Gold Rush that began in 1849, but Buddhist organizations, especially Japanese Zen and Shin groups, now began to proliferate. A steady growth would be halted in 1924, when a new federal act stopped immigration from Asia and most countries outside of Western Europe.

The laws preventing immigration from Asia and the Middle East were revised in 1965, and a sudden rush of immigration from India, Japan, Korea, and other parts of the world led to the sudden influx of Buddhists, Hindus, and Muslims. Their numbers were additionally swelled by the arrival of teachers and missionaries who began to build new religious movements that would go on to become global religious organizations. Such groups as the INTERNATIONAL SOCIETY FOR KRISHNA CONSCIOUSNESS, the UNIFICATION MOVEMENT, SOKA GAKKAI INTERNATIONAL, the Transcendental Meditation movement (WORLD PLAN EXECUTIVE COUNCIL), and the Divine Light Mission (now ELAN VITAL) entered the country at this time. (At the same time the African American community became particularly open to Islam, and they now constitute a significant portion of its American membership.)

As the Asian religions were spreading, a number of new home-grown movements also began a growth phase, primarily among young adults in the larger urban complexes. These included the Children of God (a communal group now known as THE FAMILY), the CHURCH OF SCIENTOLOGY, THE WAY INTERNATIONAL, and the CHURCH UNIVERSAL AND TRIUMPHANT. These were either variations on Christianity or representatives of Western esotericism. The sudden proliferation of new and unfamiliar groups led to a reaction by both the older, more conservative churches, which saw the United States as a Christian nation, and the parents of the youthful converts to many of the more high-demand religions. Their concerns fell on deaf ears until the suicide/murder deaths in 1978 of nine hundred members of the PEOPLES TEMPLE. Although that group did not fit the profile of the new religious movements in most respects, the deaths led to the expansion of an anticult crusade built around the practice of deprogramming, which included the detention of members of new religions by their parents and by people hired to convince the young person to renounce the new faith. That practice ended only in 1995, after a young man who had been kidnapped and detained won a large judgment against the major organization promoting deprogramming, the Cult Awareness Network.

Among the groups that have taken their place in the religious leadership of the post-World War II religious scene have been the Eastern Orthodox churches. These emerged in the nineteenth century as non-English-speaking groups, the largest being from Russia (the ORTHODOX CHURCH IN AMERICA) and Greece (the Greek Orthodox Archdiocese [under the jurisdiction of the ECUMENICAL PATRIARCHATE]). Americanizing through the twentieth century, they found common cause in the plight of their mother churches, especially those living under Communist or Islamic governments, and most recently have become significant voices in the National Council of Churches and the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES. Like several groups whose patriarchs came under the control of a Marxist government, the Orthodox Church in America (formerly the RUSSIAN ORTHODOX CHURCH [MOSCOW PATRIARCHATE]) withdrew its administrative connection with the Moscow Patriarchate.

As the wealthiest if not the largest Christian country in the world, the United States has contributed immeasurably to the spread of Protestantism, which it carried around the world in the nineteenth century. Beginning with the AMERICAN BOARD OF COMMISSIONERS FOR FOREIGN MISSIONS, most denominations large and small established mission boards and sent missionaries around the world. Out of their efforts have come thousands of new churches (many described elsewhere in this volume). In the twentieth century, the missionary effort was bolstered by the Pentecostal movement, which not only grew into an important new segment of the American religious scene but also was among the most missionary-minded of movements. Within a decade of the seminal event in its origin, the revival at the mission in Los Angeles in 1906, it had founded missions on every continent and gone on to become a force in most countries of the world. Its largest representatives in the United States include the CHURCH OF GOD IN CHRIST, the ASSEMBLIES OF GOD, the CHURCH OF GOD (CLEVELAND, TENNESSEE), and the CHURCH OF GOD OF PROPHECY. A new wave of interest in Pentecostalism among members of the older Protestant bodies brought hundreds of thousands of new adherents into the movement, many of whom formed a host of new Charismatic denominations.

By the end of the twentieth century, more than two thousand distinct religious communities had emerged in the United States. They represented the spectrum of the world's religions, though the majority were Christians. About half of the population belongs to the more than nine hundred Protestant churches. Slightly more than 20 percent are Roman Catholic, and the Roman Catholic Church is the single largest religious body in America. It is followed by the Southern Baptist Convention, the United Methodist Church, the Presbyterian Church (U.S.A.), the Church of God in Christ, the Evangelical Lutheran Church in America, the Episcopal Church, and the United Church of Christ. There are more than fifty other groups, including the three large Jewish congregational associations, which report a million or more members. The rest are spread through the many other religions. There is a small but vocal atheist/humanist community, but less than 10 percent of the public count themselves irreligious.

Sources:

- Albanese, Catherine. American Religion and Religions. 2d ed. Belmont, CA: Wads, 1992.
- Gill, Sam D. Native American Religions: An Introduction. Belmont, CA: Wadsworth, 1982.

Hall, Robert L. An Archeology of the Soul: American Indian Belief and Ritual. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1997.

Hudson, Winthrop S. Religion in America. 6th ed. New York:

Charles Scribner's Sons, 1998.

Marty, Martin E. Pilgrims in Their Own Land. Boston: Little, Brown, 1984.

Murphy, Larry G., Jr., J. Gordon Melton, and Gary L. Ward, eds. Encyclopedia of African American Religion. New York: Garland, 1993.

Williams, Peter. America's Religious Traditions and Culture. New York: Macmillan, 1990.

Uniting Church in Australia

The Uniting Church in Australia was formed in 1977 by the merger of the Methodist, Presbyterian, and Congregational churches. The new church became the third largest religious body in Australia, behind the ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH and the ANGLICAN CHURCH OF AUSTRALIA, a position it retains to the present.

Methodism began in Australia with the arrival of Samuel Leigh, a minister appointed by the Wesleyan Conference in Great Britain. His presence in Sydney was a symbol of the intention of the conference to create a presence throughout the South Pacific. As other ministers arrived the work grew, and in 1855 the Australasian Conference was organized. In 1873 further growth (including the development of missions in several of the South Pacific islands) led to favorable reaction to a plan to divide the churches into several conferences, to be united by a general conference that would meet triennially. In 1974 the New South Wales and Queensland Conference, the Victoria and Tasmania Conference, the South and West Australia Conference, and the New Zealand Conference were established. Missions in Tonga, Fiji, and the other islands were attached to the New South Wales and Queensland Conference.

Through the nineteenth century, several smaller Methodist churches had been founded, but in 1902 they merged with the larger Wesleyan group to form the Methodist Church of Australasia. New Zealand was set apart as an independent church in 1913.

The first Presbyterian minister arrived in Australia in 1923, but by that time the first Presbyterian settlers, who had arrived in 1802, had built a church (1809) in Ebenezer. John Dunsmore Lang settled in Sydney and organized the Scots Church. The work grew, and in 1840 the Synod of Australia in Connection with the Established Church of Scotland was created. Almost immediately this church found itself playing out the same debates that split the Church of Scotland, and in 1846 a group separated to form the Free Presbyterian Church of Victoria. In addition, at about this same time, other Presbyterians from Great Britain began to establish work in Australia.

Through the last half of the nineteenth century, a desire to unite all of the Presbyterians manifested in a series of mergers at the state level. Finally a national assembly met in 1901 to form the PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH OF AUSTRALIA (CONTINUING).

The Congregationalist Church of Australia grew out of the LONDON MISSIONARY SOCIETY (LMS), which had selected the South Pacific as its first area for concentrated missionary activity. W. T. Cook, an LMS missionary, settled in Sydney in 1809. Additional churches would be founded by other missionaries across the subcontinent, with particular strength in Melbourne and Sydney.

Initial negotiations looking toward a merger of the three churches occurred in the second decade of the twentieth century. At the time the merger was finally consummated in 1977, the Methodists represented about 60 percent of the merged body, the Presbyterians another 30 percent, and the Congregationalists around 10 percent. One-third of the members of the Presbyterian Church declined to enter the merger, and they continue today as the Presbyterian Church of Australia. Dissenting elements in the Congregationalist Church formed the Congregationalist Federation of Australia.

Congregations of the Uniting Church in Australia are organized into seven synods, all in Australia proper, all of the former missions in the islands having matured into independent churches in their own right. The National Assembly is the highest legislative body for the church. In the late 1990s, the church reported 1,380,000 members.

The church is ecumenically active and holds membership in the WORLD METHODIST COUNCIL, the WORLD ALLIANCE OF REFORMED CHURCHES, and the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES.

Address:

Uniting Church in Australia

222 Pitt St.

P.O. Box A2266

Sydney South, NSW 1235

Australia

<http://www.uca.org.au/>

Sources:

Bentley, Peter, and Philip J. Hughes. A Yearbook of Australian Religious Organizations. Kew, Victoria: Christian Research Association, 1997.

Humphreys, Robert, and Rowland Ward. Religious Bodies in Australia: A Comprehensive Guide. Wantima, Australia: New Melbourne Press, 1995.

Uniting Presbyterian Church in Southern Africa

The Uniting Presbyterian Church in Southern Africa was formed in 2000 by the merger of the PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH OF SOUTHERN AFRICA and the Reformed Presbyterian Church of Southern Africa. The Presbyterian Church of Southern Africa traces its start to a Calvinist

Uniting Reformed Church in South Africa

Society formed among Scottish soldiers in South Africa in 1806. The work progressed, but units split off to affiliate with the Congregationalists. However, in 1924, a specifically Presbyterian effort went forward, connected with the United Presbyterian Church (now a constituent part of the CHURCH OF SCOTLAND), with newly arrived settlers from Scotland as the heart of the congregation. An initial church building, St. Andrew's Church in Cape Town, opened its doors in 1828, and subsequently congregations were opened in British settlements across the land. The church spread to Zimbabwe in 1896 and shortly thereafter to Zambia.

The various congregations were organized as the Presbyterian Church in 1897. By the end of the twentieth century, approximately two-thirds of its ninety thousand members were white. The remainder were native Africans, and a few were of Indian extraction.

The Reformed Presbyterian Church in Southern Africa, formerly the Bantu Presbyterian Church, was the product of missionary activity among native Africans by different Scottish churches. It became an independent body in 1923. Its primary strength was in Natal and the region around the Cape of Good Hope. It brought some fifty thousand members into the new Uniting Church.

The church is a member of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES and the WORLD ALLIANCE OF REFORMED CHURCHES. The Presbyterian Church of Southern Africa had opened the ordained ministry to women in the 1970s. In 2001 the Uniting Church elected the Rev. Diane Vorsteras as moderator of its general assembly, the first time a woman has headed a major South African Christian denomination.

Address:

Uniting Presbyterian Church in Southern Africa
Joseph Wing Centre
150 Caroline St.
P.O. Box 96188
Brixton
Johannesburg 2019
South Africa
<http://www.presbyterian.org.za>

Source:

Bauswein, Jean-Jacques, and Lukas Vischer, eds. The Reformed Family Worldwide: A Survey of Reformed Churches, Theological Schools, and International Organizations. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans, 1999.

Uniting Reformed Church in South Africa

One of two large churches claiming the Dutch Reformed heritage within South Africa, the Uniting Church is the result of the spread of the Reformed Church within the non-white population of South Africa. As early as 1859 a mission began in Burgersdorp and Middleburg in the northeast corner of the Cape. Then five years later, Henru Gonin began a mission among the Kgatla people residing near Saulspoort. That same year, another missionary began work in Zoutpansberg at Kranspoort in the Transvaal. In the 1870s work spread to the Orange Free State.

As the work spread, synods were established successively in the Orange Free states (1910), Transvaal (1932), the Cape (1951), and Natal (1952). The General Synod of what was known as the Dutch Reformed Church (South Africa) was organized in 1963. The church had developed primarily among the Sozho and Nguni peoples.

In the meantime, in 1881, the DUTCH REFORMED CHURCH formalized its basic segregationist stance by setting apart its nonwhite congregations into the Dutch Reformed Mission Church in South Africa. It began with four ministers, two elders and a seminary donated by the parent body. This church grew into a large body that would become a member of the WORLD ALLIANCE OF REFORMED CHURCHES (WARC). In 1982, as racial turmoil in South Africa was growing, the WARC passed a declaration condemning apartheid and labeling the theological defense of the practice a heresy. As a result of this statement, the Dutch Reformed Mission Church wrote, and in 1986 adopted, a new confession of faith, the Belhar Confession, which was placed beside the traditional Reformed statements as a standard document (much as the Barmen Confession directed at the Nazi situation was adopted by the Confessing Church in Germany).

The adoption of the Belhar statement led to the development of a plan to reunite all of the Reformed churches in South Africa. This process culminated in the 1994 union of the Dutch Reformed Mission Church and the Dutch Reformed Church in Africa as the Uniting Reformed Church in South Africa. The new church has reported 1,200,000 members.

The Uniting Church is headed by its general synod. A multiethnic church, there are eleven official languages spoken within it. It is a member of both the WARC and the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES.

Address:

Uniting Reformed Church in South Africa
Private Bag 1
Belhar 7507
South Africa
<http://www.vgksa.org.za/>

Source:

Bauswein, Jean-Jacques, and Lukas Vischer, eds. The Reformed Family Worldwide: A Survey of Reformed Churches, Theological Schools, and International Organizations. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans, 1999.

Unity School of Christianity/
Association of Unity Churches

Unity began in Kansas City, Missouri, in 1889, when its co-founders, Myrtle (1845–1931) and Charles (1854–1948)

Fillmore, dedicated their lives to the study and teaching of what they referred to as “practical Christianity.” The catalyst to its founding was Myrtle Fillmore, whose recovery (from tuberculosis) was precipitated by a lecture on mental healing in 1886. Its earliest expressions were a periodical, Modern Thought, later renamed Unity, and a prayer ministry, the Society for Silent Help, later renamed Silent Unity. Silent Unity, with a little over two million contacts annually (c. 2000), continues to be a primary focus of the Unity School, and its round-the-clock prayer ministry is well known throughout the entire New Thought movement.

Originally established as a ministry of healing and publication, by the early twentieth century Unity had assumed a sectarian character. Institutionalization began in 1903 with the incorporation of the Unity Society of Practical Christianity, which evolved into the Unity School of Christianity, the movement’s best-known organization. Over the latter half of the twentieth century, Unity progressively reduced its once extensive periodical outreach, with the pocket-size daily devotional magazine The Daily Word (1.3 million subscribers) its most representative periodical today. In the 1990s it discontinued publication of Wee Wisdom (begun in 1893), which had been the longest continually published children’s magazine in the world. Unity magazine, which was recently changed from a monthly to a bimonthly cycle, has twenty-three thousand subscribers. Unity School appears to remain strongly committed to book publishing, with the works of Charles and Myrtle Fillmore and numerous other authors continuing to be printed and distributed.

Unity School is located at Unity Village, Missouri, just outside Kansas City. The village is an impressive complex made up of many large buildings constructed in a generic Mediterranean style, an expansive array of fountains spanned by a “bridge of faith,” ornate landscaping, and walk paths, all dominated by a massive tower, 150 feet in height. The complex is the spiritual center of the Unity movement and serves primarily as a religious education and retreat center. It houses all Unity School operations, including Silent Unity, and functions as a shrine and pilgrimage destination for the more devout of Unity followers. The school is directed by a self-perpetuating board of directors, and its current president, Connie Fillmore Bazy, is the founders’ great-granddaughter. In her own estimation, she will be the last of the Fillmores to direct Unity School, and she has already established a transition process that will result in her replacement by a new president and chief executive officer.

Unity’s second major branch is the Association of Unity Churches (AUC), founded in 1966. The association is independent of Unity School and serves as the ecclesiastical arm of the movement. Under the leadership of a president and CEO (Glenn Mosley), who is appointed by a board of trustees, AUC ordains and supervises ministers, sanctions churches, and coordinates expansion activities. Members of the board of trustees are elected by representatives from member churches at annual conferences. Membership statistics are not available, but increases in the number of ministries in recent years suggest steady growth. As of 2001 there were 648 active ministers and 1,023 licensed teachers serving in 936 ministries and 57 affiliated study groups in 64 countries. Most notable is Unity’s strong presence in Africa, especially Nigeria, where there are 50 affiliated groups.

Unity does not publish membership statistics, but increases in the number of churches indicates sustained growth over the past several decades. Total membership in Unity churches is most likely in the 100,000 range, although the number of participants is probably much higher. In the 1990s two Unity splinter groups formed, Unity-Progressive Council and the Federation of Independent Unity Churches. Both of these groups are headquartered in Florida.

Unity is the largest movement in the New Thought family and distinctive among New Thought groups in its Christian self-affirmation. It uses the Bible as a primary text, recognizing it as a “divine book of life” that “bears witness” to the word of God. Unity was once the trendsetter in the revitalization of allegorical Bible interpretation, but it has done little to advance this type of study since the 1960s. The allegorical method, called “metaphysical” interpretation in Christian Science and New Thought, approaches the text as a symbolic document, in which persons, places, and things represent elements in consciousness. Charles Fillmore’s exhaustive lexicon, Metaphysical Bible Dictionary (1931), represents the fullest expression of this distinctive New Thought method of exegesis. In addition to the Bible, Unity’s other primary religious text is H. Emilie Cady’s Lessons in Truth, first published in 1894.

Like other early New Thought groups, Unity emerged in the context of Christian Science, through the work of the independent Christian Science teacher Emma Curtis Hopkins (1849–1925), a former protégé of Mary Baker Eddy (1821–1910). The Fillmores were students of Hopkins, receiving their ordination from her in 1891, and the theology of the movement shows her influence. Unity is, thus, best considered a reaction against traditional Christian Science, rather than a further extension of Eddy’s system. Mental healing (or “prayer treatment”), once a prominent feature of Unity, seems to be less of a focus in the movement today, with mainstream pastoral counseling and alternative healing methods having equal or greater popularity in many churches.

As part of the New Thought movement, Unity is an expression of popular religious idealism; as such it affirms that the basis of reality is mental (not material) and that mental states determine material conditions. Characteristic of New Thought as a whole, Unity recognizes that God is Mind. Unity is nondoctrinal, although several foundational teachings are notable: (1) the absolute goodness of God and the unreality of evil, (2) the innate divinity of humanity, (3) the omnipotently causative nature of consciousness, and (4) freedom of individuals in matter of belief. Unity accepts Christian doctrine, idealistically interpreted, as normative. Unity's distinctive symbol is a winged globe.

Universal Church of the Kingdom of God

Addresses:

Unity School
1901 NW Blue Pkwy.
Unity Village, MO 64065-0001
<http://www.unityworldhq.org>

Association of Unity Churches
401 SW Oldham Pkwy., Ste. 210
Lee's Summit, MO 64081
<http://www.unity.org>

Dell deChant

Sources:

- Bach, Marcus. The Unity Way. Unity Village, MO: Unity Books, 1982.
- Braden, Charles. Spirits in Rebellion: The Rise and Development of New Thought. Dallas, TX: SMU Press, 1963.
- Cady, H. Emilie. Lessons in Truth. Unity Village, MO: Unity Books, 1975.
- Freeman, James Dillet. The Story of Unity. Unity Village, MO: Unity Books, 1978.

Universal Church of the Kingdom of God [Igreja Universal do Reino de Deus]

In July 1977, Edir Macedo, a Brazilian governmental employee who had subsequently joined a number of Pentecostal denominations, felt called to devote his life to full-time evangelism. With the help of four friends, he bought a former funeral home in Abolição (in Greater Rio de Janeiro) and converted it into a chapel. In the first years, Macedo did not attract more than a hundred followers, but success ultimately came through the medium of radio. He first bought ten minutes' broadcasting time from both Rádio Metropolitana in Rio de Janeiro and Rádio Cacique in São Paulo, both popular commercial networks. The ensuing success enabled him to establish his own radio channels, followed by daily newspapers and TV networks. In 1990 he was able to purchase the popular TV Record network, thus becoming the owner of a media empire extending from Brazil to Africa and Europe. Paralleling the media growth, Macedo's church, known as the Universal Church of the Kingdom of God (IURD) drew more than six million members with two thousand places of worship in forty-six countries. Its largest constituency outside Brazil is in South Africa.

IURD roots are in Brazilian Pentecostalism in general, although several themes come from the Faith movement and from popular Brazilian religiosity. It insists on demoniza-tion (against which it offers exorcisms), with demons being held responsible for most illnesses, unhappiness, and poverty. Macedo's theology has been called "post-Pentecostal" by Brazilian scholars, and it exhibits a strong degree of anti-Catholicism. In October 1995, Sérgio Von Helder, the IURD bishop of São Paulo, kicked a statue of the Virgin Mary during a TV show and caused a national outcry. Macedo made an official apology to the ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH, but the incident had already added fuel to the fire of the controversy. IURD's TV network, TV Record, is the main rival of the powerful Brazilian network TV Globo, which has emerged as Macedo's most vocal critic. Accused of tax evasion, Macedo spent several days in jail, although he subsequently won most of his court cases.

IURD's worship style is quite noisy, and the calls for money offerings, which are often repeated several times during the same service, have elicited further criticism. IURD neither builds nor uses chapels or churches. It normally purchases movie theaters (including the historic One Million Dollar Theater in Hollywood) and converts them into chapels. In Europe, especially, local residents have complained that movie theaters are being converted into centers for what has been called a "Brazilian cult." In Porto, Portugal, for instance, mass protest led to the cancellation of a deal between IURD and the owners of a large movie theater. In Paris, as part of the current French anticult crusade, it was the city's own mayor who led the protest. All this, however, has not stopped the phenomenal growth of Macedo's church. Some Brazilian scholars have also noticed a gradual "protestantization" of the church, and a cautious dialogue has been started with other Pentecostals and Evangelical Protestants.

Address:

Universal Church of the Kingdom of God/Igreja Universal do Reino de Deus
<http://www.arcauniversal.com/igreja/>
<http://www.igrejauniversal.org.br/>

Massimo Introvigne and PierLuigi Zoccatelli

Sources:

- Macedo, E. Aliança com Deus. Rio de Janeiro: Editora Gráfica Universal, 1993.
- . Apocalipse hoje. Rio de Janeiro: Editora Gráfica Universal, 1990.
- . Vida com abundância. Rio de Janeiro: Editora Gráfica Universal, 1990.
- Ruuth, Anders. Igreja Universal do Reino de Deus: Gudsrikets Universella Kyrka, en brasiliansk kyrkobilidning. Stockholm: Almqvist and Wiksell, 1995.

Universal Faithists of Kosmon

The Universal Faithists of Kosmon are dedicated to the teachings of Oahspe, an alternative Bible channeled by Dr.

John Ballou Newbrough (1828–1891). Newbrough, a New York City dentist and Spiritualist medium, rose before dawn every morning for fifty weeks during 1881, and through the process of automatic writing he produced Oahspe. The book was published in 1882. Oahspe tells the history of humanity's life on earth from the viewpoint of "highly evolved intelligent beings," and it adapts spiritual truths for the "New Kosmon Age."

Oahspe (according to the book itself, a compound word from the ancient Panic language meaning earth, O; sky, AH; and spirit, SPE) claims "to teach HOW TO ATTAIN TO HEAR THE CREATOR'S VOICE, and to see HIS HEAVENS, in full consciousness, whilst still living on the earth." The creator, Jehovih, sent nine demigods to rule over periods of the earth's history. These periods provide the structure of Oahspe. The history of humanity and religion involve the attempts of eleven prophets—including Zarathustra the Persian, the first prophet to give written revelations; Chine of China; Eawahtah of North America; and Joshu (Jesus)—to teach truth to humanity. Oahspe teaches that we are now in the Kosmon Era, in which Jehovih's kingdom will be established on earth, bringing peace and prosperity to all.

Among the first events associated with Oahspe was the founding of a commune in New Mexico to care for orphans, the Shalam Colony. Newbrough had met a wealthy Quaker named Andrew Howland. Howland eventually purchased nearly fifteen hundred acres of land in the Mesilla Valley, and there the Shalam Colony began. Howland poured money into the colony, and for a short time it apparently flourished. However, a combination of drought, financial difficulties, the death of Newbrough in 1891, and floods proved to be too much, and Howland left the colony in 1901. He finally sold the property in 1907. Despite these difficulties, small groups of people known as Faithists persisted in their devotion to Oahspe, and the book has managed to stay in print ever since.

A notable development on the international front is the work of Faithists in Britain to keep in print a book of ritual and liturgy, The Kosmon Church Service Book, for followers of Oahspe. The book details liturgies for weddings, baptisms, and funerals, in addition to the forms for regular worship. The British Faithists also offer ministerial training. Other groups of Faithists are found in Canada, Holland, Australia, New Zealand, Nigeria, and Ghana, in addition to the United States and Britain.

Networks of the faithful seem to be mostly informal; however, the rise of Internet communication may have facilitated connections among Oahspe enthusiasts. The total number of adherents among the various groups is not known. More than twenty thousand copies of Oahspe have been sold in the last decade. Six active groups are listed on the Universal Faithist of Kosmon website. One indication of overall size is that the Global Council of International Faithists, an affiliate of the Universal Faithists of Kosmon, provides a link to a Yahoo group site that has thirty-six registered individual users.

Address:

Universal Faithists of Kosmon
c/o C. Vostek, Secretary
3439 Grand Valley Canal Rd.
Clifton, CO 81520
<http://OahspeResources.mccooknet.com>
<http://www.angelfire.com/in2/oahspe3/oindex.html>. (text of Oahspe)

Jeremy Rapport

Sources:

Horst, Laura. A Condensed Version of Oahspe. Amherst, WI: Palmer, 1977.
Oahspe: A New Bible. Los Angeles: Kosmon, 1942.

Universal Fellowship of Metropolitan Community Churches

The Universal Fellowship of Metropolitan Community Churches is the only intercontinental religious community especially designed to serve the gay/lesbian/bisexual/transgender (GLBT) community that emerged in the last decades of the twentieth century. The fellowship began out of the experiences of Troy Perry, a former pastor in the CHURCH OF GOD OF PROPHECY, a prominent Pentecostal denomination. Perry discovered his homosexuality as a young man, but he repressed it and became a husband and father and a Pentecostal minister in southern California. However, in the mid-1960s, his homosexuality became public; he was forced to resign his ministry, and his marriage ended in divorce.

Having accepted his homosexuality, Perry was still a Christian with a call to the ministry. In 1968, with the support of a few friends, he placed an advertisement in The Advocate, then the most popular periodical within the lesbian and gay community in Los Angeles, inviting people to worship with him in his living room, which served as the first Metropolitan Community Church. From this point on, the church experienced what to many was surprising growth, as laypeople who no longer felt at home in the church of their childhood adhered to the new congregation. The church then spread to other cities, as clergy whose homosexuality had become public left their denominations and aligned with the Metropolitan Community Church. Perry began the church as a Pentecostal congregation, but as other ministers with different backgrounds joined him, the fellowship took on a more ecumenical stance. As the church gained the trust and support of the gay community, it gained a new level of visibility, especially after the publication of Perry's autobiography in 1987.

Although the fellowship generally acknowledges the central affirmations of Christianity, the keystone of its theology is God's love and acceptance of all people, especially those who have a minority self-identification as gay, lesbian, bisexual, or transgender. Almost from the beginning, the church has blessed the union of gay and lesbian couples who are living in a long-term committed relationship, analogous to traditional marriage. Just as mainline Protestants have reinterpreted as cultural accretions the biblical statements seeming to approve slavery and the subjection of women, so the Metropolitan Community churches treat the biblical antihomosexual passages as expressions of human, not divine, judgment.

The emergence of the Metropolitan Church has followed the rise of a visible gay community in most urban centers in the West. The history of the developing GLBT community has been marked by resistance, and the church's congregational buildings have on several occasions been targets of antigay forces, who burned them. The church was also hit by the AIDS epidemic, and in 1985 it launched a special ministry to people with AIDS. A major component of this ministry involves alerting other churches to the seriousness of the problem.

Through the 1990s the church became a global fellowship, currently organized into seventeen districts, eight of which are located outside of the United States. Its more than three hundred congregations are now found in sixteen countries: the United Kingdom, Germany, France, Denmark, Nigeria, the Philippines, South Africa, Australia, New Zealand, Argentina, Brazil, Venezuela, Mexico, Nicaragua, Canada, and the United States. The fellowship supports Samaritan College in Los Angeles.

Address:

Universal Fellowship of Metropolitan Community Churches
8704 Santa Monica Blvd., 2nd Floor
West Hollywood, CA 90069-4548
<http://www.ufmcc.com/>

Sources:

Eastman, Donald. Not a Sin, Not a Sickness: What the Bible Does and Does Not Say. Los Angeles: UFMCC, 1990.
Perry, Troy. Don't Be Afraid Anymore. New York: St. Martin's Press, 1992.
———, with Thomas L. P. Swicegood. The Lord Is My Shepherd and He Knows I'm Gay. New York: Bantam Books, 1978.
———, and Thomas L. P. Swicegood, eds. Profiles in Gay and Lesbian Courage. New York: St. Martin's Press, 1992.
Wilson, Nancy L. Our Story Too: Lesbians and Gay Men in the Bible. Los Angeles: UFMCC, 1992.

Universal Great Brotherhood

The Universal Great Brotherhood (UGB) was founded in Venezuela in 1948 by Serge Raynaud de la Ferriere (1916– 1962) and his student, Jose Manuel Estrada (1900–1982). De la Ferriere developed an interest in esotericism as a young man. Among his early experiences, he traveled to Egypt, where he underwent a mystical initiation as the "Sublime Crowned Cophto and Great Priest Khediviar." He also was active in the Theosophical Society in both England and France. At one point he had an encounter with a being known as Master Sun Wu King, who gave him his mission to present the initiatic principles to the public. He founded the Universal Great Brotherhood as World War II was drawing to a close and spent the postwar years traveling and establishing UGB centers.

At one point his travels took him to Venezuela, where he met Estrada, who had for almost a decade been proclaiming the imminent coming of an avatar (an incarnation of God) and who had gathered a group to await his arrival. Estrada identified de la Ferriere as that avatar and became his disciple. In 1948 the pair reopened the Great Universal Brotherhood as a new public organization. Two years later de la Ferriere retired to spend the rest of his life engaged in esoteric work. Estrada became the director general and began to build the organization internationally.

The Brotherhood is an initiatic association designed to assist the transition of society into a new age (the Aquarian age). This new age will be born in the Western Hemisphere. To facilitate the coming new age, the Brotherhood carries on a two-part program. It offers various programs for the general public of preinitiates. It sponsors health-care services, advocates vegetarianism, and teaches yoga, astrology, martial arts, and meditation. It invites people to a program of mystical initiation, in which initiates become parts of ashrams that are seen as centers of physical and spiritual mastery and learn to live in harmony with natural law. Members form a nucleus of those who work for harmony and world peace, and the ashrams become training grounds for the commissioning of missionaries who will go out in the world to spread the word of the coming new age.

The Brotherhood has spread to most of the Spanish-speaking countries of South and Central America and beyond to the United States, Canada, Japan, Australia, Italy, Spain, and Israel. The UGB has been named as an associated nongovernmental organization by the United Nations.

Address:

Universal Great Brotherhood
B.P. 3987
Caracas 1010-A
Venezuela
<http://www.gfufundacion.org/caratulpg.htm>

Sources:

Biography, the Sublime Master, Sat Guru Dr. Serge Raynaud de la Ferriere. St. Louis, MO: Educational Publications of the I.E.S., 1976.

Montero-Campion, Anita. My Guru from South America: Sat Arhat Dr. Jose Manuel Estrada. St. Louis: Privately printed, 1976.

97066 Würzburg
Germany
<http://www.universelles-leben.org>

Universal Life [Universelles Leben]

Universal Life (Universelles Leben) is a German new religious movement that claims to reenact the original Christianity of the apostles in the modern world, on the basis of the Ten Commandments and Jesus' Sermon on the Mount. Members are persuaded that the Holy Spirit is speaking again, through a new prophet, Gabriele Wittek, who was born in 1933 near Augsburg, Germany, and raised as a traditional Roman Catholic. In 1970 her mother's death precipitated in her a spiritual crisis of some impact. Later, we are told, Wittek's deceased mother started to appear to her daughter, until on January 6, 1975, Gabriele began to hear the "internal word." Within this "word" she received instructions from "Brother Emmanuel" and the Christ himself. They asked her to spread their teachings (increasingly at odds with Wittek's early Catholicism), at first to small groups and then in large meetings in Europe's main cities, the first being held in Nürnberg on January 22, 1977. In 1976 her followers founded the Heimholungswerk Jesu Christi (Home-bringing Mission of Jesus Christ), which in 1984 was renamed Universal Life.

Wittek teaches what she calls an "internal way," rooted in the idea of the soul's preexistence in the spiritual world. Based on karma, the soul should experience several incarnations, until it becomes purified and able to escape the wheel of reincarnation. In Wittek's universalist theology, mainline Christian notions of eternal punishment and hell are also rejected. Because of their pride, the original souls fell outside the divine realm, thus generating the material world. In order to remind the souls of their divine origin, the Son of God incarnated as Jesus of Nazareth, who will soon become incarnate again. According to Wittek, all these teachings were originally included in the Bible, but they have been corrupted by the churches throughout the centuries, thus making it necessary for the Holy Spirit to speak again in our time through Universal Life.

Some seven hundred members of Universal Life live communally near Würzburg, Germany, in a large community complex including a school, two hospitals, and retirement homes, as well as manufacturing and agricultural facilities. This community is regarded as the first seed of Christ's future kingdom of peace on earth. Several thousand members, however, do not live in the Würzburg community but regularly visit some eighty centers throughout Germany, other parts of Europe, and the world. Universal Life also owns several radio networks worldwide.

Address:

Universelles Leben
Postfach 5643

Massimo Introvigne and PierLuigi Zoccatelli

Sources:

- Healing by Faith—The Holistic Healing*. Guilford, CT: The Word, 2000.
This Is My Word, Alpha and Omega: The Gospel of Jesus—A Christ-Revelation which the World Does Not Know. 2d English ed. Guilford, CT: The Word, 2001.
The Word. Guilford, CT: The Word, 2001.

Universal Soul

Universal Soul is an Italian new religious movement headquartered in Leini, near Turin, Piedmont. Its founder was Roberto Casarin, born in Turin on April 9, 1963. As a young man, Casarin was a pious Roman Catholic, who became well known for his mystical visions and for his gift of healing. Thousands of Catholics congregated in Turin to hear Casarin pray the Rosary, in the hope of being healed by the young visionary. The local Catholic hierarchy, on the other hand, was quite hostile to his success, culminating in the declaration by Anastasio Alberto Cardinal Ballestrero (1913–1998), archbishop of Turin, on June 15, 1982, that Casarin's meetings would henceforth be banned. They continued, nonetheless, and on February 26, 1984, an independent organization was founded known as Associazione Cristo nell'Uomo—Centro di Elevazione Spirituale (Christ in Man Association—Center for Spiritual Elevation).

Casarin's teachings evolved toward the idea of a "God for all people," with a critical view of organized religion as a divisive and controversial factor. From 1985 on it became evident that Casarin's was an independent religious movement, with no remaining links with the ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH. Some of the most active members of Casarin's association later created Comunità Impegno (Community Engagement), which in turn led to the establishment of the Church of the New Jerusalem in 1989. The final separation of the movement from the Catholic Church was confirmed by a declaration published on March 21, 1990, by Ballestrero's successor as archbishop of Turin, Giovanni Cardinal Saldarini. Catholic critics, as well as a former priest of the Church of the New Jerusalem turned vocal opponent, provoked a media campaign against Casarin, centering inter alia on his teachings on sexual ethics, including his tolerance of homosexuality. In fact, these themes play no particularly important role in Casarin's preaching and writings. In 1996, in order to prevent confusion with other movements with similar names, the Church of the New Jerusalem changed its name to Anima Universale—Movimento di Unione Spirituale (Universal Soul—Movement for Spiritual Union), a name also regarded as conveying the essence of the movement's teachings.

As the new century begins, Casarin has developed a quite eclectic approach. He asserts that humans have forgotten their divine origins and are living under the veil of material illusion. Universal Soul's rituals remind humans of their true divine nature, thereby developing their love toward God and to all their fellow human beings, as well as developing their spiritual awareness. Rituals include baptisms, weddings, funerals, collective meditations and prayers, "rituals of the elements," and "celebrations of mantras." The rituals are led by the priests and priestesses of the Universal Soul, known as Ramias, all of whom are full-time members living communally in the Universal Soul Centers. From the original centers, all located in the Italian region of Piedmont, the movement spread to the Venetian area and to the Province of Ancona in central Italy. The construction of a temple in Poggiana di Riese Pio X (in the Italian province of Treviso, Venetian region) generated, in 1999 and 2000, new controversies. The local Catholic Church and some local politicians opposed the construction, calling the movement a "cult." The conflict between the Universal Soul and the Roman Catholic Church appears, at times, paradoxical. Without always acknowledging it, in fact, Casarin and his Roman Catholic critics seem to agree on the one essential issue—namely, that Universal Soul is a new religious experience and not part of Roman Catholicism.

Address:

Universal Soul
Via Enrico Mattei 60
10060 Leini (Torino)
Italy
<http://www.arpnet.it/-auniver/>

Massimo Introvigne and PierLuigi Zoccatelli

Sources:

- Casarin, Roberto. In questa parte di Eternità Dio si fa tempo per me: Preghiamo insieme. Turin, Italy: CAST, 1997.
- . La Missione dell'Uno: Unione Energetica d'Amore. Turin: CAST, 1999.
- Conti, Paolo. Un personaggio scomodo: Roberto Casarin: Intervista ad un Maestro della Nuova Era. Treviso, Italy: Tipografia Volpaghese, 1994.
- Roldán, Verónica. La Chiesa Anima Universale di Roberto Casarin. Turin, Italy: Elledici, 2000.
- Zoccatelli, PierLuigi. "Symbols in the Church of Universal Soul." Paper presented at the 14th International Conference of the Center for Studies on New Religions (CESNUR), Riga, Latvia, August 29–31, 2000. Posted at <http://www.cesnur.org/conferences/riga2000/plz.htm>.

The URANTIA Foundation

The URANTIA Foundation exists to promote The URANTIA Book, a work believed to have been received from an advanced group of beings known as the Orvonton Commission in order to clear up confusion about the nature of God, divinity, and deity on Urantia, the beings' name for Earth. The book claims to tell an "alternate" history of Christianity, the Earth, and the universe. The URANTIA Book is divided into four major parts. Part I, "The Central and Superuniverses," describes the nature of the ultimate God and the organization of the universe. Part II, "The Local Universe," describes the immediate vicinity of our planet, Urantia. The history of Urantia, the Earth, is the subject of Part III, and Part IV retells the story of Jesus. Jesus' real name is Michael. He was born on August 21 in the year 7 B.C.E., was well educated, and became a skilled carpenter. He conducted a ministry around the Mediterranean for three years beginning in 27 C.E. and was then crucified and resurrected. According to the foundation's Web site, the book's message is that "all human beings are one family, the sons and daughters of one God, the Universal Father." The URANTIA Book also reveals "new concepts of Man's ever-ascending adventure of finding the Universal Father in our friendly and carefully administered universe."

According to the foundation's own account, the origins of The URANTIA Book lie in the early twentieth century, when a Chicago physician, William S. Sadler, announced that he was the head of the "Contact Commission." The Contact Commission transcribed the contents of the book and then presented them to "the Forum," a group meeting at Sadler's house that critiqued the papers and presented questions to be answered. The final text of The URANTIA Book incorporates the answers to the questions of the Forum. The group that made up the Forum became the core of believers committed to bringing The URANTIA Book to all humans. The URANTIA Foundation, a non-profit, educational foundation operating under a Declaration of Trust, was established in 1950 to be the custodian of the book and to help spread its teachings. The first printing of The URANTIA Book appeared in 1955.

Fully staffed offices affiliated with the foundation can be found in Canada, Australia, Finland, Chile, France, England, and Russia. Smaller offices may be found in eighteen other countries, including Argentina, Brazil, Belgium, Colombia, Ecuador, Greece, Korea, Mexico, Senegal, and Venezuela. According to The URANTIA Book, "The religious challenge of this age is to those farseeing and forward-looking men and women of spiritual insight who will dare to construct a new and appealing philosophy of living out of the enlarged and exquisitely integrated modern concepts of cosmic truth, universal beauty, and divine goodness." The various foundation offices help to foster this goal in many ways, including facilitating local study groups. The study groups are the primary means of disseminating the teachings of The URANTIA Book.

In addition to the 400,000 paperback copies of the book in circulation, the URANTIA Foundation has made extensive use of the Internet. The foundation's Web site is large and very well organized. The URANTIA Book is available on-line through the foundation's Web site. The foundation operates an Internet correspondence school, and it is putting a great deal of work into further translations of The URANTIA Book. Currently Dutch, English, Finnish, French, Korean, Russian, and Spanish versions of the book exist, with further translations into Arabic, Bulgarian, Chinese, Croatian, Estonian, Farsi, German, Indonesian, Italian, Lithuanian, Polish, Portuguese, Romanian, and Swedish in the process of completion.

Address:

URANTIA Foundation
533 Diversey Pkwy.
Chicago, IL 60614
<http://www.urantia.org>

Jeremy Rapport

Sources:

The URANTIA Book. Chicago: URANTIA Foundation, 1955.
The URANTIA Book Concordance. Chicago: URANTIA Foundation, 1993.

Ursulines

The Ursulines, officially the Order of St. Ursula, one of the more important orders that assisted the spread of the ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH in the modern world, was founded at Brescia, Italy, in 1535, by Angela Merici (later canonized), with an initial purpose of providing education for young girls. St. Ursula, considered the patroness of education, was chosen as the protecting saint. Angela began with twenty-eight associates as an informal company, and the members continued to live at home. A primitive rule was accepted by the pope in 1544. Then in the 1580s, Charles Borromeo, the bishop of Milan, requested a change in the rule: that the members of the company begin to live in community and accept a vow of poverty. That rule change was accepted in 1585.

The new rule was first adopted by the sisters in France, where the group experienced its greatest response. In 1612 the community in Paris was recognized as being in a monastic state. By the end of the century, there were 350 Ursuline monastic communities in France with nine thousand residents. They remained strong in France even with the disturbances of the French Revolution.

The order began to expand internationally from their bases in Paris and Bordeaux. In 1639, Marie of the Incarnation and two other sisters became the first Ursulines in the Western Hemisphere when they landed in Quebec and opened a convent and school for girls. A second beginning was made in New Orleans in 1727, from which the order spread to Cuba and Texas. From this beginning, convent schools were opened at various locations in the United States and around the world in Indonesia, Brazil, India, the Belgian Congo, and Australia. In the meantime, the order had found its way across Europe, where they pioneered female education in many areas.

The loosely organized order underwent a significant reorganization in 1900, when Pope Leo XIII unified the work under a new corporation headed by a superior general. The new corporate title was the Roman Union of the Order of St. Ursula. The motherhouse was established in Rome. The order was divided into national provinces. The prioress general and the other international officers are elected at the meeting of the general chapter, held in Rome every six years.

There are more than two hundred houses (convents) in more than twenty-five countries. The more than seven thousand sisters oversee not only primary and secondary schools for girls but also several colleges for women.

There are also a variety of smaller groups that are known as Ursulines, which either did not participate in the formation of the Roman Union or have been organized apart from it. Among these are the Ursuline Union of Eastern Canada, which originated with Sister Marie of the Incarnation and the original Ursuline convent in North America. They are organized in a fashion similar to that of the Roman Union but did not affiliate with it. Their superior general resides in Quebec. The Ursulines of Belgium began in 1831 at Tildonk and spread across the country in the middle of the nineteenth century. During the last half of the century, the groups spread to England, the Netherlands, South Africa, and Indonesia. An American house opened in New York in 1924. Headquarters are now at Haecht, Belgium. Work in South Africa and Indonesia has been replaced with centers more recently established in the Democratic Republic of the Congo and India.

Address:

Order of St. Ursula
Via Nomentana 236
00162 Roma
Italy

Sources:

Aron, Marguerite. Les Ursulines. Paris: Grasset, Les grands ordres monastiques et instituts religieux, 1937.
Caraman, Philip. St. Angela: The Life of Angela Merici, Foundress of the Ursulines. London: Longman, 1963.
Kane, Harnett T. The Ursulines, Nuns of Adventure: The Story of the New Orleans Community. New York: Farrar, Straus, 1959.

Uruguay

Archaeological evidence points to the habitation of the eastern shore of the Uruguay River (which marks the boundary between modern Argentina and Uruguay) for at least ten thousand years. Modern history, however, begins in 1527, when Sabastián Gaboto and his Spanish crew sailed up the Uruguay River. By that time, three groups—the Charruas, the Chanaes, and the Gusranis—dominated the area. The Spanish paid little attention until the governor of Asunción (Paraguay) introduced cattle into what proved to be good pasture land. The introduction of cattle and horses to the native culture proved a major step in its transformation—the cattle, in particular, driving out other mammals and the development of grazing land altering the local flora.

Uruguay

Portuguese settlement of the coast led the Spanish to assert their hegemony in the area, and in 1724 the Spanish founded Montevideo and incorporated Uruguay into the Viceroyalty of Peru. In 1776 the Viceroyalty of the Rio de Plata was set apart. The early nineteenth century was alive with thoughts of independence, in the midst of which the Portuguese invaded and took control of Uruguay, which in 1823 became a part of independent Brazil. Uruguay became independent in 1828, and a series of governments came to power in the nineteenth century.

José Batlle y Ordoñez assumed the presidency. He is credited with creating the modern Uruguayan state and redistributing much of the land heretofore controlled by a small clique of landowners. His leadership coincided with a period of economic prosperity, and the immigration of a large number of Europeans led to the spread of democratic values. Church and state were separated in 1916.

The prosperity continued until the 1960s, when inflation and corruption in the business community led eventually to a civil war in 1972. A military coup in 1973 brought a temporary end to democracy and the introduction of economic reforms. However, without public support, the military finally allowed an election in 1984. The government began a process of recovering from its severe economic situation.

Christianity was effectively introduced into Uruguay in 1616 with the arrival of FRANCISCANS and JESUITS. The Jesuits took the lead in missionizing the native population, and Uruguay became a primary region for the development of communal villages into which their converts moved.

Status of religions in Uruguay, 2000-2050

Followers	2000			2025	2050
	total	%	rate
Christians	2,178,000	65.3	0.67	2,520,000	2,806,000
Roman Catholics	2,608,000	78.2	0.73	3,100,000	3,500,000
Protestants	110,000	3.3	1.37	150,000	200,000
Marginal Christians	95,000	2.9	2.39	170,000	240,000
Nonreligious	894,000	26.8	0.64	1,084,000	1,225,000
Atheists	209,000	6.3	1.67	250,000	280,000
Jews	40,900	1.2	0.09	34,000	28,000
Baha'is	7,400	0.2	2.95	9,200	11,500
Spiritists	4,700	0.1	1.34	5,500	6,300
Muslims	500	0.0	1.08	900	1,400
Buddhists	60	0.0	0.65	100	150
other religionists	1,900	0.1	2.57	3,000	3,500
Total population	3,337,000	100.0	0.72	3,907,000	4,362,000

These thrived until 1767, when the Jesuits were expelled (part of an international disaster that befell the order). The villages were largely destroyed over the next few years.

In the meantime, the Diocese of Buenos Aires extended its hegemony to Montevideo in 1726. Montevideo was set apart as a diocese in 1878 and elevated to archdiocesan status in 1897. The church was greatly affected by the large-scale immigration from Europe that began in the nineteenth century and gave the country its unique position on the South American continent, with a huge 94 percent of the population being of European extraction. Although they were largely from Catholic countries, a high percentage of the immigrants were unbelievers, and today the country has the highest percentage of nonreligious citizens (approximately 25 percent) of any country in the Americas.

Through the last half of the twentieth century, very much influenced by papal calls for a refocus of attention on the needs of the urban poor, the ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH has directed significant resources toward assisting the poor and empowering the laity in the church. It remains the largest religious body in the country, with some 65 percent of the population identifying with it.

The remaining 10 percent of the population adhere to faiths across the spectrum of the world's religions, though the majority are Protestant and Free Church Christians. American Methodists (now the UNITED METHODIST CHURCH) made their initial probe of Uruguay in 1835, and work was established in Montevideo in 1839; it closed in 1842 because of the war then raging between Uruguay and Argentina. It was not until 1870 that a permanent work was reestablished. Early success followed the conversion of an Italian immigrant, Francisco G. Penzotti, who went on to become a prominent evangelist across the continent. The work was set apart as the independent EVANGELICAL METHODIST CHURCH OF URUGUAY in 1969.

Members of the WALDENSIAN CHURCH were among the immigrants from Italy that began to arrive in 1856, but it was not until 1877 that a pastor was assigned to provide clerical leadership. Although the second largest Protestant church in the country, many of its congregations continue to be served by lay leadership. Germans, who also began to arrive in mid-century, founded the Evangelical Church of the River Plate in 1860. Arriving later in the century were THE SALVATION ARMY (1890) and the SEVENTH-DAY ADVENTIST CHURCH (1895).

The relative freedom of religion through the twentieth century has been conducive to the establishment of missions from a variety of churches, from the ASSEMBLIES OF GOD to the CHRISTIAN AND MISSIONARY ALLIANCE. However, the JEHOVAH'S WITNESSES and the CHURCH OF JESUS CHRIST OF LATTER-DAY SAINTS have jumped out ahead of the Protestant and Free Church bodies.

Immigrants from Greece, Russia, and the Ukraine have established their several branches of the Orthodox Church, the Greeks being part of the Greek Orthodox Archdiocese of North and South America under the ECUMENICAL PATRIARCHATE, and the Russians with the RUSSIAN ORTHODOX CHURCH (MOSCOW PATRIARCHATE).

Some ten Uruguayan churches have united in the Federation of Evangelical Churches of Uruguay, which is affiliated with the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES. It grew out of the Uruguay Committee of the Confederation of Evangelical Churches of the River Plate, originally founded in 1939. The more conservative Evangelical churches have come together in the Asociación Cristiana de Iglesias Evangélicas de la Rep. de Uruguay, which is affiliated with the WORLD EVANGELICAL ALLIANCE.

Jewish immigration to Uruguay began early in the twentieth century and peaked in the 1920s and 1930s, when some ten thousand Jews fled the Nazis. With continued immigration after World War II, some forty thousand Jews eventually came to reside in the country. There are three significant groupings of Sephardic, Hungarian, and German background, which are organized into the Comunidad Israelita Sefardi, Comunidad Israelita Hungara, and the Comunidad Israelita del Uruguay. The Comité Central Israelita del Uruguay in Montevideo provides some unity to the Jewish community.

Uruguay also hosts a small Muslim community, the DIAMOND WAY and KARMA-KAGYUPA Buddhists, the BAHÁ'Í FAITH, the ANCIENT AND MYSTICAL ORDER ROSAE CRUCIS, the CHURCH OF SCIENTOLOGY, the INTERNATIONAL SOCIETY FOR KRISHNA CONSCIOUSNESS, and the UNIFICATION MOVEMENT. The Unification movement has been quite active in the country, where it owns considerable property; the country has become a major center for its dissemination throughout Latin America.

In the early 1970s, UMBANDA, an Afro-Brazilian religion, found its way into Montevideo and has spread rapidly, primarily among Uruguayans of African descent. It has approximately five thousand adherents as the new century begins.

Sources:

- Bazzano, D. Breve vision de la historia de la iglesia en el Uruguay. Montevideo: OBSUR Librería San Pablo, 1993.
 Rama, C. M. La Religión en Uruguay. Montevideo: Nuestro Tiempo, 1964.

Uzbekistan

The Uzbek people trace their lineage to a Turkish people in Siberia. These people settled in what is now central Kazakhstan. Meanwhile, in the seventh and eighth centuries C.E., in what is now Uzbekistan, a Turkish khanate was created. However, the khanate was quickly replaced by Arab rule, which came to central Asia along with the subsequent spread of Islam. A prosperous Islamic civilization developed in the next centuries as Buchara, Samarkand, and Urgench became important centers for trade and education. This era of prosperity was cut short by the invasion of the Mongols early in the thirteenth century.

In the fifteenth century, the Uzbek people residing in Kazakhstan gained a new level of unity, and in the sixteenth century they moved into present-day Uzbekistan; in 1512 the Khanate of Kiva came into existence. Subsequently, several other Uzbek khanates were created, and a set of rival states emerged.

The Russians developed plans for the region late in the nineteenth century. In 1860 Russian forces entered the area and seven years later created the province of Turkistan, with its capital at Tashkent. Over the next two centuries, the Russians succeeded in reconciling the different khanates to their presence in the region. There was some attempt to create an independent Uzbek government after the fall of the czar, but forces of the new Soviet government crushed that effort. In 1924, Central Asia was reorganized along ethnic lines, and an entity closely resembling the present nation of Uzbekistan was designated as the Soviet Socialist Republic of Uzbekistan. What is now Tajikistan was originally part of Uzbekistan but separated in 1929.

Uzbekistan was placed in a difficult position during the Gorbachev era, at the end of the 1980s. The government opposed Russian attempts to invade Afghanistan, and a hostile climate led to attacks upon Russian expatriates residing in the region. Uzbekistan moved quickly to separate from Russia in 1991 and form an independent nation.

That new government is a democracy, but only in a limited sense. Parties in opposition to the present administration have not been allowed to form, and there are imposed limitations on free speech and association.

Two laws regulating religious liberty were passed in 1998. The Law on Freedom of Conscience and Religious Organizations, while granting a spectrum of freedoms, restricts religious rights that conflict with national security, prohibits proselytizing, bans religious subjects in school curriculums, prohibits the private teaching of religious principles, forbids the wearing of religious clothing in public by anyone other than clerics, and requires religious groups to obtain a license to publish or distribute materials. The law also requires that all religious groups and congregations register. To register, a group must have at least one hundred Uzbek-citizen members. The second law revised the criminal and civil codes and provided punishments for a spectrum of activities, such as organizing a banned religious group, persuading others to join such a group, and drawing minors into a religious organization without the permission of their parents.

Like much of Central Asia, Uzbekistan is dominated by Sunni Muslims of the HANAFITE SCHOOL OF ISLAM. In 1843 the Russians created the Muslim Spiritual Board of Central Asia, with headquarters at Tashkent, whose authority reached out to neighboring countries. All imams had to register with the board, and it controlled the two seminaries for the training of religious leaders. In the brief period of lessening Russian authority, an Islamic revitalization movement, Jahid, attempted to reform what they saw as the cor-

Status of religions in Uzbekistan, 2000-2050

Followers	2000			2025	2050
	total	%	rate
Muslims	18,518,000	76.2	2.35	28,000,000	35,540,000
Nonreligious	4,405,000	18.1	1.22	4,388,000	4,200,000
Atheists	860,000	3.5	-1.50	450,000	250,000
Christians	401,000	1.7	-6.81	380,000	406,000
Orthodox	189,000	0.8	-10.49	150,000	130,000
Independents	120,000	0.5	-1.53	145,000	170,000
Protestants	44,000	0.2	0.00	40,000	50,000
Jews	54,100	0.2	-1.03	35,000	30,000
Ethnoreligionists	49,400	0.2	0.94	50,000	55,000
Buddhists	35,300	0.2	1.64	60,000	90,000
Zoroastrians	3,000	0.0	4.28	6,000	10,000
Baha'is	710	0.0	3.54	2,000	4,000
Hindus	650	0.0	1.68	1,000	1,500
Total population	24,318,000	100.0	1.71	33,355,000	40,565,000

rupt leadership and tie Islam more closely to the religion's center in the Middle East. The movement founded a number of new schools that emphasized traditional values and taught classical Arabic as a means of reintroducing the Qur'an. As the movement gained a high profile, however, the Russians suppressed it.

During the years of Soviet rule, Islam was suppressed by a government openly hostile to religion. However, late in the nineteenth century, a new revitalization movement appeared, emphasizing Islamic morals and calling people's attention to the sharia (Islamic law). Some eighty mosques remained open during the Soviet era, and a reported four thousand were opened soon after the country gained independence. As economic conditions dipped in the 1990s, during which time the country was making the transition to a market economy, many were drawn to new conservative Muslim movements, especially the WAHHABI ISLAM movement, which has been generously supported by Saudi Arabia. At the same time, Turkish spokespersons have been supportive of a pan-Turkish approach to Central Asia. The new government operates as a secular state but has granted special status to the Islamic leadership. It both supports and exercises control over the Islamic community through the Spiritual Directorate for Muslims (the Muftiate).

The Chor-Minor Mosque in Bukhara, Uzbekistan (Christopher Rennie/TRIP)

The new 1998 law demanding registration of religious organizations appears to have been largely directed at exercising some control over Muslims worshipping at independent mosques. Since the law went into effect, 1,831 religious congregations and organizations, 1,664 of which were Muslim, have been registered. However, an additional 335 applications were denied, of which 323 were from Muslim groups.

Although the Sunni Muslims dominate religious life, by 2000 the Government's Committee on Religious Affairs had registered some 167 minority religious groups (congregations), including 32 of the RUSSIAN ORTHODOX CHURCH (MOSCOW PATRIARCHATE), 23 Baptist, 26 Pentecostal or Full Gospel, 10 of the SEVENTH-DAY ADVENTIST CHURCH, 47 Korean Christian, 8 Jewish synagogues, 5 of the BAHÁ'Í FAITH, two kingdom halls of the JEHOVAH'S WITNESSES, and two temples of the INTERNATIONAL SOCIETY FOR KRISHNA CONSCIOUSNESS. Regular news reports continue as the struggle of different groups to register or recover a lost registration continues. Among the groups not registered as of 2000 was the ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH, though its registration was pending.

Christianity essentially entered Uzbekistan in the nineteenth century, with the coming of the Russians. It operates primarily within the continuing community of Russians (some 10 percent of the population), and its parishes are now part of the single diocese that covers Uzbekistan, Turkmenistan, Tajikistan, and Kyrgyzstan.

Baptists from Siberia and central Russia settled near Tashkent in 1898 and began to hold prayer meetings in their homes. The first congregation was established adjacent to the Russian fort at Tashkent and included soldiers among those in attendance. Later in the decade, German Baptists moved into the area. The Tashkent Church was closed in 1932 and did not reopen until 1944. During its first decade after World War II, it grew from sixty-five to more than thirteen hundred members. During the last decades of the Soviet era, a number of Koreans moved into the country, among whom were some Baptists. By the end of the twentieth century, there were more than twenty Baptist churches, the largest number of which were associated with the Union of Evangelical Christian-Baptists of Central Asia, an association founded in 1992 that also includes the churches in Turkmenistan and Tajikistan.

Seventh-day Adventist work includes the Asian-Caucasian Conference, which also takes in Armenia, Azerbaijan, Georgia, Turkmenistan, and Tajikistan.

The Jewish community of Uzbekistan traces its history to the fifth century C.E., when exiles from Persia arrived seeking a greater degree of religious freedom. The present communities in Samarkand and Bucharra have persisted through the many government changes over the centuries. In the nineteenth century, Jews from Russia moved to Uzbekistan and settled in Tashkent. Besides the concentration of Jews in the three main cities, there are also Jews scattered throughout the country. During the Soviet era, the Jews of Uzbekistan had a relatively easier time than their fellow believers in other parts of the Soviet Union; however, they are now threatened by the new laws that demand religious leaders be Uzbekistan citizens.

Sources:

Allworth, Edward A. The Modern Uzbeks. Stanford, CA: Hoover Institution Press, 1990.

Muslims of the Soviet East. English ed. Tashkent, Uzbekistan: Muslim Religious Board of Central Asia and Kazakhstan, 1968–.

1999 Country Reports on Human Rights Practices Released by the Bureau of Democracy, Human Rights, and Labor, U.S. Department of State, February 25, 2000. Posted at http://www.ummah.net/uzbekistan/state_department.html. Accessed May 15, 2001.

Vaisnavism

Vaisnavism is a major segment of the Hindu community distinguished by its reverence for Vishnu as the Supreme Deity. Vaisnavism flourished under the Maurya, Sunga, and Satavahana dynasties. The golden age of Vaishnavism took place in the fourth century C.E., during the rule of the Gupta Empire. The Guptas controlled the whole of northern India, from Savrashtrato to Bengal. The major schools of thought were either Vaisnavite or strongly encouraged by the government to support Vaisnavism. After Gupta rule, the Pallava Dynasty (fourth to eighth centuries C.E.) also paved the way for Vaisnavism (along with SAIVISM). As with Saivism, Vaisnavism encompasses multiple divisions, each devoted to a single major deity.

Vaisnavism is primarily concerned with the promotion of the god Vishnu. All of Vishnu's aspects (such as his vehicle snake and wives), avatars (reincarnations of the god), and his associations (such as his avatar's friends) are also exalted and revered. Since the sect is very open to admiring the deities associated with Vishnu, Vaisnavites tend to be very open to the greatness of other deities (so long as they do not surpass Vishnu). Vishnu is the all-encompassing deity to Vaisnavites. He is also omnipotent, omnipresent, and omniscient. Since all avatars of Vishnu are regarded as holy as he is, even Buddhism is tolerated by Vaishnavites, who describe Siddhartha Buddha as an avatar of Vishnu himself. In the modern world, almost all Vaisnavites have a deep reverence for the Buddha.

During the Pallava Dynasty, the Siva and Vishnu sects were, for the most part, united and, at worst, agreed to disagree on opposing issues. The Shaivites and Vaisnavites tended to merge and correlate many of the myths of Siva and Vishnu. In each incarnation of one of the gods, the other god tended to assist him in his tasks. By making their respective gods allies, the Vaisnavites and Shaivites made themselves allies, and aside from minor skirmishes, the two groups have been peaceful with each other to this day. A small number of subjects on both sides, however, have continued some religiously based animosity. Although Vaisnavites tend to dominate in northern India, many can also be found in the south, most notably the Alvars of Tamil.

Pictures of previous satradhikars hang on the walls of the Auniati Sattra in India. (L. Rowley/TRIP)

The Bengali Hindu saint Chaitanya (c. 1486–1533) propagated the system of bhakti (devotional worship), and in succeeding centuries, his followers continued a form of Vaisnavism whose devotional activity centered upon the repetition of the Hare Krishna mantra and kirtans (holy songs). Such devotion and the spiritual ecstasy it evokes were inspired by works such as the Ramayana and the Bhagavad-Gita, in which devotees display emotive acts of devotion toward the various incarnations of Vishnu.

Vaisnavism in its multiple manifestations is very much alive in the contemporary world. It has been carried around the globe as the Indian community has dispersed, and numerous Vaisnava temples have been built in the West. Also, a variety of newer Hindu movements that are grounded in the Vaisnava community have become international organizations, including the INTERNATIONAL SOCIETY FOR KRISHNA CONSCIOUSNESS (ISKCON) and the several divisions of the Swaminarayan International. The latter movement worships primarily Rama and Krishna, but it differs from ISKCON in that it does not claim the exclusiveness of Vishnu in worship and has expanded primarily among Indian expatriates.

Kumar Jairamdas

Sources:

- Basham, A. L. The Origins and Development of Classical Hinduism. New York: Oxford University Press, 1989.
- Jaiswal, Suvira. The Origin and Development of Vaisnavism. Delhi: Munshiram Manoharlal, 1967.
- Nabokau, Isabelle. Religion against the Self: An Ethnography of Tamil Rituals. New York: Oxford University Press, 2000.
- Narayanan, Vasudha. The Way and the Goal: Expressions in the Early Sri Vaisnava Tradition. Cambridge: Harvard University Press, 1987.

Vanuatu

Vanuatu is a relatively new South Pacific island country located off the northeast coast of Australia between Tuvalu and Kanaky. The islands were originally settled, possibly as early as 1400 B.C.E., by Melanesians probably migrating there from present-day Indonesia. Those who resided on the islands had their first contact with Europeans when the Spanish explorer Pedro Fernandez de Quiros visited in 1605. Captain James Cook mapped the islands and named them New Hebrides for the Hebrides Islands in Scotland. They were known by that name through the mid-twentieth century.

Lacking most of the natural resources desired by Europeans, the islands became a major source of slave laborers as the French and British moved into the area. The continuance of the slave trade long after it had been outlawed caused an intense dislike of Europeans among the Vanuatuans, who often took out their anger on missionaries.

The land jump ceremony on Pentecost Island, Vanuatu (Eric Smith/TRIP)

British and French vied for control of the islands through the nineteenth century, but at the beginning of the twentieth century they worked out an agreement to govern the islands jointly. An independence movement developed in the 1970s and gained the overwhelming support of the people by the end of the decade. Overcoming various efforts to subvert it, Vanuatu gained its freedom in 1980.

The indigenous religion, popularly called Custom, survived in strength through World War II. It was especially strong on the islands of Tanna and Aniwa, with a significant presence also on Santo and Vao. It should be noted that there were almost twenty languages spoken in the islands, and a similar number of variations on the indigenous religion existed. Following World War II, the New Hebrides were the site of the original and primary manifestation of what became known as Cargo Cults. These groups, of which at least eight were identified, recognized a mythical figure called John Frum as the founder and expected him to return to the islands, bringing the same material abundance that islanders saw come out of the cargo planes that brought supplies for troops in the early 1940s. Remnants of the Cargo Cults can still be found, though, like the traditional religions, they have been opposed by the Christian community.

The introduction of Christianity into Vanuatu began with John Williams and James Harris of the LONDON MISSIONARY SOCIETY (LMS) and several Samoan Christian teachers who visited Tanan and Erromango in 1839. Leaving the Samoans on Tanna, Williams and Harris left for Erromango, where both were killed soon after they landed. Other missionaries returned the following year and, finding their Samoan brethren safe, began a new work on Aneityum. Their work was hindered by several outbreaks of disease, which the islanders blamed upon the missionaries. The missionaries suffered the most from the continued taking of islanders into slavery, and more missionaries were killed in the New Hebrides than anywhere else in the South Pacific.

The work of the LMS was absorbed into the Presbyterian mission to the islands that began in 1848 with the arrival of Nova Scotian John Geddie. The Reformed Presbyterian Church of Scotland became the major force in Vanuatu with the arrival of John G. Paton, one of the more famous of the missionaries in the South Sea Islands. He had his first success on Aniwa, which became nominally Christian in the 1860s. The Presbyterian Church of New Zealand added their support in 1869, and eventually Presbyterians from Canada and Australia added their support. In 1948 the Presbyterian work was united and reorganized as the independent PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH OF VANUATU. It now includes approximately one-third of Vanuatu's 190,000 citizens.

Part of the significant work of the Presbyterians was the translation of the Bible into the indigenous languages. Thanks primarily to two brothers from Scotland named Gordon, the Scriptures had been translated into the four main languages by 1870. By 1901 the Bible had been published in twenty-one languages.

The ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH established an initial presence in the New Hebrides in 1839, when a missionary

Followers	2000			2025	2050
	total	%	rate
Christians	177,000	93.0	2.59	302,000	405,000
Protestants	102,000	53.7	2.81	175,000	238,000
Anglicans	34,500	18.1	2.87	60,000	85,000
Roman Catholics	29,400	15.4	2.57	54,000	73,000
Ethnoreligionists	6,600	3.5	-1.11	4,000	3,000
Baha'is	5,400	2.9	4.17	10,800	15,500
Nonreligious	760	0.4	3.33	1,500	3,000
Buddhists	370	0.2	6.46	600	1,100
Neoreligionists	90	0.1	3.79	100	200
Atheists	80	0.0	0.00	100	200
Total population	190,000	100.0	2.45	319,000	428,000

arrived on Erromango; however, their major push did not begin until 1887, as the British and French began to work out their cooperative arrangement for the islands. Over the next decades, the church had great success, especially on the islands of Vao, Atchin, and Wala. A prefecture was established in 1901 and a vicariate three years later. The Diocese of Port Vila was erected in 1966.

Bishop George A. Selwyn of the ANGLICAN CHURCH OF AUSTRALIA, with the cooperation of his colleagues in New Zealand, initiated missionary work in the northern New Hebrides in 1848. They limited their work to the northern islands in order to avoid head-on competition with the Presbyterians. For the first century of its existence, the mission actually was manned and guided by New Zealand Anglicans. Then in 1975, the CHURCH OF THE PROVINCE OF MELANESIA was established as an independent entity, and Vanuatu became a diocese in the province, which is headquartered in the Solomon Islands.

The CHURCHES OF CHRIST (NON-INSTRUMENTAL), a free church with Baptist roots, began work in the New Hebrides in 1903 after its representatives had been deported from Kanaky. Their work took hold on Aoba, and they subsequently built a substantial following on Pentecost and Maewo. More recent arrivals include the Apostolic Church (from Australia), the SEVENTH-DAY ADVENTIST CHURCH (1912), and the JEHOVAH'S WITNESSES (1933).

With the continuation of the traditional religions of the New Hebrides, it is not surprising to find a variety of indigenous churches. The interaction of Christians with the Cargo Cults has led to several new Christian congregations. The Voice of Daniel was formed by Daniel Tambe, a former Anglican priest on Pentecost Island, as the result of a vision he had in the early 1930s. The Free Church derives from a schism within the EVANGELICAL CHURCH IN NEW CALEDONIA AND THE LOYALTY ISLANDS, imported from Kanaky.

Anglicans, Roman Catholics, and Presbyterians came together in 1967 to form the New Hebrides Christian Council, with the Adventists and Apostolics as observer members. That council evolved into the Vanuatu Christian Council, now affiliated with the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES.

There are only a few religious groups that exist apart from the larger Christian community. The BAHÁ'Í FAITH began building their work in the 1960s, and BUDDHISM has been brought to the islands by immigrants from Vietnam.

Source:

Forman, Charles H. The Island Churches of the South Pacific: Emergence in the Twentieth Century. Maryknoll, NY: Orbis, 1982.

Vedanta Societies/Ramakrishna Math and Mission

The Vedanta Societies are the products of the missionary outreach of swamis (Hindu monastics) in the order inspired by the Indian saint Ramakrishna Paramahansa (1836–1886), considered an avatar, an incarnation of God. Ramakrishna's mystical experiences are regarded as proving that there is truth in all of the world's religions, and this continues to be an emphasis of the Vedanta movement. Vedanta means "end of the Vedas," and it refers to the later Vedic texts, the Upanishads, and the philosophical schools based on those texts. The basic Vedantic doctrine is that reality is nondual and unitary, and that we are all part of the one divine reality. Vedanta was introduced to the United States in 1893 when Swami Vivekananda (1863–1902) spoke at the World Parliament of Religions held in Chicago in conjunction with the Columbian Exposition. His presentation of Hindu thought to the American public was so well received that he remained until 1896 to give lectures in the Midwestern and Eastern United States and in Europe, to instruct students, and to inspire the founding of the first Vedanta Society, in New York City in 1896. Vivekananda returned to the United States in 1899–1900 to lecture in California.

Additional swamis in the Ramakrishna Order came to the United States and founded Vedanta Societies in major cities. Abhedananda (1939) was based in New York City and taught in the United States from 1897 to 1921. Trigunatita led the San Francisco Vedanta Society, which built the first Hindu temple in America in 1906. Paramananda (1885–1940) arrived in 1906 and established centers in Boston and Los Angeles, and lectured all over the United States. In 1923 he founded a spiritual community, Ananda Ashrama, at La Crescenta, California. Prabhavananda (1914–1976) founded a center in Portland, and he established an influential Vedanta Society in Hollywood in 1930. This center grew to become the Vedanta Society of Southern California, with several monasteries, a convent, and the well-known Vedanta Press. In the late 1930s, the British writers Gerald Heard (1889–1971), Aldous Huxley (1894–1963), and Christopher Isherwood (1904–1986) became Prabhavananda's disciples. Nikhilananda (1895–1973) founded a center in Manhattan in 1933 and was a prolific writer and speaker; his disciples included Professor Joseph Campbell, the comparative mythologist.

The Vedanta Societies continue to be headed by male Indian swamis, although they have trained American swamis as well as women monastics. The original Vedanta Societies in the United States remain under the spiritual (though not the administrative) authority of the Ramakrishna Order, headquartered in India, and are now part of a worldwide fellowship of autonomous Vedanta Centers. The Ramakrishna Math and Mission oversees a number of centers and institutions across the country. Centers within the United States may be found in New York City, Berkeley, San Francisco, Sacramento, Hollywood, Chicago, Boston, St. Louis, Portland, Providence, and Seattle. The Vedanta center of Southern California maintains an extensive Internet site at <http://www.vedanta.org/>, which includes a worldwide directory of Vedanta Societies.

Controversies have arisen over keeping talented swamis obedient to the Ramakrishna Order in India and on how women should relate to the male Indian monastic order. From 1910, Swami Abhedananda lectured independently of the control of the Ramakrishna Order, and when he returned to India he founded a separate organization. When Swami Paramananda died in 1940, his disciples, who included a number of monastic women, decided that his niece, Gayatri Devi, should succeed him as leader, instead of accepting a new swami from India. In 1941 the Ramakrishna Order decided that the centers founded by Paramananda were no longer its affiliates. In the early years, the Indian swamis had to cope with American racism and prejudice against their Hindu religion. Today, the Vedanta Societies have succeeded in being accepted in interfaith interactions in their respective areas.

Celebrations of Puja and Hava at the Ramakrishna Temple in Mauritius, Vacoas (P. Joseph/TRIP)

Address:

Ramakrishna Math and Mission
P.O. Belur Math
District Howrah 711 202
West Bengal
India

Catherine Wessinger

Sources:

- Burke, Marie Louise. Swami Vivekananda: His Second Visit to the West: New Discoveries. Calcutta: Advaita Ashrama, 1978.
- . Swami Vivekananda in America: New Discoveries. 2 vols. Calcutta: Advaita Ashrama, 1958.
- Jackson, Carl T. The Oriental Religions and American Thought: Nineteenth-Century Explorations. Westport, CT: Greenwood, 1981.
- . The Swami in America: A History of the Ramakrishna Movement in the United States, 1893–1960. Ph.D. dissertation, University of California, 1964.
- Wessinger, Catherine. "Hinduism Arrives in America: The Vedanta Movement and the Self-Realization Fellowship." In America's Alternative Religions, edited by Timothy Miller, pp. 173–190. Albany: State University of New York Press, 1995.

Venezuela

Venezuela was inhabited by an array of peoples in prehistoric times. Along the coast of the Caribbean Sea resided the Carib peoples (including the Tamaques, Maquiritares, and Arecunas), very different groups settling in the mountains and the Orinoco River Valley in the interior. The Carib people had the first contact with Europeans when Christopher Columbus sailed along the coast in 1498. He named the country after the city of Venice in his native Italy. The Spanish settled the coast and began to build an agricultural colony based on cocoa production, for which they imported a number of slaves from Africa.

In 1718 colonial authorities organized the viceroyalty of New Granada, with Venezuela as its easternmost district, or captaincy general. Much of the movement for the independence of South America from Spain originated in Venezuela. After an assembly of leaders declared New Granada free in 1810, revolutionary forces were led by Francisco de Miranda. His capture by the Spanish led to the emergence of Simon Bolivar. Bolivar won the war but found that the non-European people did not support him, seeing him as a representative of their slave masters. He lost out to a Spanish loyalist, José Tomás Boves, who in 1814 abolished slavery and redistributed the land. Only after Bolivar came to understand the needs of the non-Europeans was he able to gain the popular support necessary to break Spanish control.

An independent New Granada finally emerged in 1819 as Grand Colombia. In 1830, Venezuela separated from Colombia. The country was ruled by an oligarchy under the leadership of a strongman into the twentieth century. Finally in 1941, General Isaías Medina Angarita legalized the Democratic Action Party, an action that paved the way for a transition to democratic government. However, a brutal dictatorship under Marcos Perez Jiménez (1948–1958) would come first. The country has become one of the wealthiest in South America on account of its oil, and numerous immigrants have come into the country to assist in the development of its industries. The influx of people from around the world has led to the present religious pluralism so evident in urban areas.

The original residents of Venezuela had a variety of religions reflective of their different environments. These have survived in the more remote regions of the country, especially among those peoples who have kept their own language (more than twenty-five languages still survive in the country). However, all of these peoples have been targeted for evangelism by various Christian groups during the last generation. A new religion that draws on elements of native religion, African faiths, and Catholicism is the ABORIGINAL CULT OF MARIA LIONZA. Maria Lionza, the goddess of water and vegetation, heads a pantheon of deities and spirits, drawing strength from her association with the Virgin Mary in the popular imagination. The religion has a base among the Cacique people, who were most resistant to Spanish rule. Although headquartered in Caracas, it is especially strong in the southern rural parts of the country.

The ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH was introduced to Venezuela by FRANCISCANS and DOMINICANS in 1513. They created some of the first cocoa plantations and also taught the local residents the arts of domestic husbandry.

Status of religions in Venezuela, 2000-2050

Followers	2000			2025	2050
	total	%	rate
Christians	22,910,000	94.8	2.13	32,678,000	39,226,000
Roman Catholics	22,816,000	94.4	2.21	31,800,000	38,000,000
Protestants	500,000	2.1	2.78	950,000	1,300,000
Independents	350,000	1.5	2.63	600,000	900,000
Nonreligious	494,000	2.0	3.60	947,000	1,420,000
Spiritists	255,000	1.1	2.44	400,000	500,000
Ethnoreligionists	161,000	0.7	1.08	100,000	70,000
Baha'is	141,000	0.6	4.03	250,000	380,000
Muslims	79,500	0.3	2.52	180,000	250,000
Jews	47,400	0.2	1.97	75,000	100,000
Atheists	45,800	0.2	2.43	90,000	120,000
Buddhists	29,500	0.1	2.23	50,000	80,000
Chinese folk-religionists	5,100	0.0	0.76	4,000	4,000
other religionists	970	0.0	1.30	1,500	2,000
Total population	24,170,000	100.0	2.17	34,775,000	42,152,000

Capuchins arrived in 1658 and over the next century spread out in the region around Caracas. The JESUITS operated along the Orinoco River. The Diocese of Caracas was founded in 1637 and elevated to an archdiocese in 1803.

Independence was a mixed blessing to the church. It identified with the Spanish leadership that has ruled the country, but suffered a great loss of property and mission stations during the drawn-out war. It has adopted a conservative theological and social stance through the twentieth century, and it has had great difficulty in recruiting priests.

Agents of the British and Foreign Bible Society were the first to attempt the introduction of Protestantism into Venezuela, but as with the rest of South America, there was a gap of more than a half-century between their arrival (1819) and the entrance of permanent settled missionaries (1883). In the meantime, the CHURCH OF ENGLAND established a chaplaincy to serve British nationals. That work, never large, would eventually be attached to the CHURCH OF THE PROVINCE OF THE WEST INDIES. In 1976 it became an independent diocese and then affiliated with the EPISCOPAL CHURCH. A more expansive work was launched by the Canadian branch of the CHRISTIAN BROTHERS.

Even before the Brethren established their mission, however, the indigenous Alleluia Church, which had originated in neighboring Guyana, moved across the border and established an initial congregation. It heralded the unique development of non-Catholic Christianity. The ASSEMBLIES OF GOD introduced Pentecostalism in 1916 and had by midcentury become the largest Protestant/Free Church body in the land—in spite of a major schism in 1957 that led to the founding of the Venezuela Evangelical Pentecostal Association, itself a large denomination. In addition, during the 1950s the INTERNATIONAL CHURCH OF THE FOURSQUARE GOSPEL and the UNITED PENTECOSTAL CHURCH INTERNATIONAL launched very successful missions. Pentecostalism has given birth to a host of indigenous churches.

Non-pentecostal churches have also enjoyed some success. American Presbyterians were the first to follow the Brethren into Venezuela. An independent work begun in 1898 and later supported by the EVANGELICAL FREE CHURCH OF AMERICA matured into the Evangelical Free Church of Venezuela. Closely associated is the Venezuelan Organization of the Christian Evangelical Church (Organización Venezolana de Iglesias Cristianas Evangélicas), built by the Evangelical Alliance Mission beginning in 1906. In 1969 these two churches jointly founded the United Evangelical Seminary. Rivaling the Assemblies of God, however, is the Iglesias Nativas Venezolanas de Apura, an indigenous church founded by Aristides Diaz, a layman. Today, many of the Evangelical churches are associated in the Consejo Evangélico de Venezuela, which in turn is affiliated with the WORLD EVANGELICAL ALLIANCE.

On the opposite spectrum of the Christian community are the Orthodox churches, the largest group being Russians and Ukrainians who have fled the Soviet Union. Their parishes have been organized into the ORTHODOX CHURCH IN AMERICA, the RUSSIAN ORTHODOX CHURCH OUTSIDE OF RUSSIA, and the Ukrainian Orthodox Church in the USA. There is also a branch of the Greek Orthodox Church affiliated with the ECUMENICAL PATRIARCHATE.

The JEHOVAH'S WITNESSES entered the country in 1936, and the CHURCH OF JESUS CHRIST OF LATTER-DAY SAINTS in 1966. Both have found a positive response and built centers largely alienated from the rest of the Christian community.

The Jewish community was established by Sephardic Jews who settled at Coro in the nineteenth century. The cemetery at Coro is the oldest Jewish cemetery in South America. The present community of some twenty thousand residents includes many Eastern European Jews who came to Venezuela after World War II. It is centered in Caracas, where the Confederation de Asociaciones Israelitas de Venezuela is located. There is a second concentration in Maracaibo.

Immigration into the country since World War II has not only increased the spectrum of Christianity but also brought all of the world's religions to Venezuela. The 1961 Constitution guaranteed freedom of religion to all faiths; religion and the state are separate, although the great majority of people still refer to themselves as Roman Catholic.

Representatives of the BAHÁ'Í FAITH have enjoyed great success among African-Venezuelans and several of the native groups, beginning with the Guajiro people. Buddhism has been introduced by Chinese immigrants into Venezuela, though a large portion of the Chinese community are Roman Catholic.

The Western esoteric tradition is represented by the THEOSOPHICAL SOCIETY, but more response has been garnered by the ANCIENT AND MYSTICAL ORDER ROSAE CRUCIS.

Among the newer religions, the INTERNATIONAL SOCIETY FOR KRISHNA CONSCIOUSNESS has a center in Caracas. In 1997 the UNIFICATION MOVEMENT was banned by the government. Hatha yoga is very popular, but most is disconnected from any associated religious/spiritual activity, one exception being the Swami Sivananda Esceula De Yoga Para in Maracaibo, connected to the DIVINE LIFE SOCIETY.

Sources:

- Ayerra, J. Los Protestantes en Venezuela: quiénes son, qué hacen. Caracas: Ediciones Tripode, 1980.
Watters, M. A History of the Church in Venezuela, 1810–1930. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1933.

Vietnam

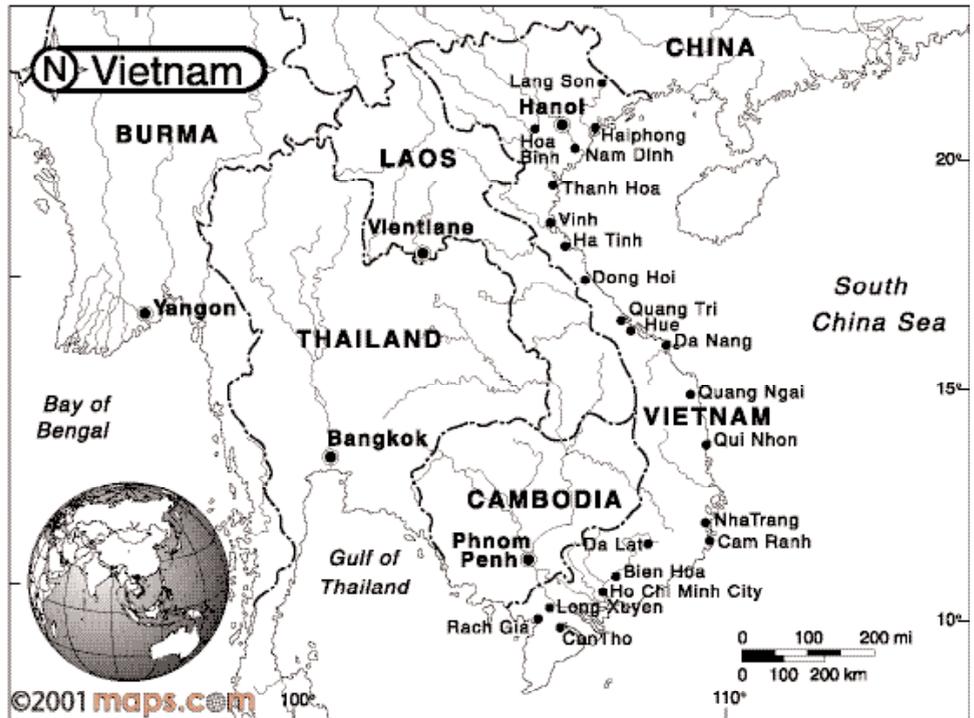

At first sight Vietnam seems to be a manifestation of the synthesis of the tam giao, or three great teachings—Buddhism, Confucianism, and Daoism—that one finds in China; but Vietnam has also been open to the religious concepts of its Southeast Asian neighbors. Consequently, the influence of Indian and, more recently, Islamic world conceptions has also had an effect. In the twentieth century, French colonialism, and the American presence in the south, made Vietnam a crucible in which East and West have been forced to meet. Nevertheless, the prevailing characteristics and attitudes of the Vietnamese people have remained the backbone onto which foreign religious ideas have been grafted. Certainly, in the decades since World War II, the Vietnamese have continued to respond in their own unique way to the challenge of foreign influence. Thus the Vietnamese characteristics of accommodation and development are strongly reflected in the rise of a number of new religious movements that developed in this period.

The origin of the Vietnamese people is explained in a now famous myth attributed to the preoccupation Hung kings (although the earliest source for this myth is the fourteenth century C.E.). This “original” dynasty attributed their ancestry to a primordial sea-dragon Lac Long Quan. He swam into the rivers of Vietnam subduing daemonic forces as he went. He brought wet-rice cultivation and married the earth goddess Au Co. From this union a hundred children were born from eggs, half of which returned to the sea, the other half remaining on the land to become Vietnam’s first rulers. This myth underlines a conceptualization of the natural world as a realm inhabited by spirits associated with prominent features of the landscape and other awe-inspiring phenomena. In much the same way, kami inhabit the Shinto conceptualization of the land in Japan. (One example is the Great King of Mount Tan-vien. Tan-vien was also the first of the Hung kings.)

Tracing the religious life of Vietnam before Chinese occupation is a dangerous job, as the technology of writing came late to the region. Certainly ancestor worship was an ever-present religious phenomenon. The Chinese who occupied the nascent nation invaded in 111 B.C.E. and were not fully repelled until the late tenth century. It would seem that this thousand-year occupation saw the adaptation of the Chinese social (and religious) model in Vietnam, but that is not necessarily the full story. It was during this period that the cult of national heroes began to develop. Foremost among these heroes, fighting for nghia, or “national justice” against rapacious northern overlords, were the Trung sisters, who led a revolt against the Chinese in the first century C.E.

Pre-common era Buddhist-designed pots (some possibly as early as the second century B.C.E.) suggest that Vietnam was a vital route for the spread of Buddhism into China. Luy Lau, established around the second century C.E. at the center of China’s Giao Chi province, near present-day

Status of religions in Viet Nam, 2000-2050

Followers	2000			2025	2050
	total	%	rate
Buddhists	39,534,000	49.5	1.67	49,431,000	54,770,000
Nonreligious	10,809,000	13.5	1.85	16,000,000	20,013,000
Neoreligionists	9,027,000	11.3	2.02	12,500,000	14,900,000
Ethnoreligionists	6,793,000	8.5	1.95	9,000,000	9,400,000
Christians	6,586,000	8.3	2.37	11,345,000	16,009,000
Roman Catholics	5,321,000	6.7	2.34	9,050,000	12,800,000
Independents	640,000	0.8	2.71	1,235,000	1,790,000
Protestants	580,000	0.7	2.35	1,000,000	1,350,000
Atheists	5,603,000	7.0	1.99	8,000,000	9,700,000
Chinese folk-religionists	798,000	1.0	-0.02	800,000	800,000
Muslims	574,000	0.7	0.99	750,000	860,000
Baha'is	356,000	0.5	2.62	540,000	700,000
Hindus	35,400	0.0	2.39	70,000	110,000
Shintoists	160	0.0	1.34	400	700
Taoists	160	0.0	1.28	400	700
Total population	79,832,000	100.0	1.82	108,037,000	126,793,000

Hanoi, was a significant center for the early dissemination of Buddhism. At Luy Lau, Buddhist texts and deities were translated into accessible local conceptualizations. It was there that the early Buddhist scholar Mau Tu wrote a Buddhist treatise known in Vietnam as Ly Hoac Luan.

According to one Vietnamese hagiographical source, the Thien Uyen Tap Anh, in 580 B.C.E., an Indian monk named Vinitaruci arrived in Giao Chau to preach MAHAYANA BUDDHISM. What is true is that from a very early stage, Buddhism became subject to a process of domestication in Vietnam that helped its inclusion into the prevailing Sino-Vietnamese social model. One example of this process was the translation of Buddhist personalities into deities who were understood to possess power over the climate. Other Buddhas possessed the sort of magical powers that local deities were thought to have. Over these early centuries Buddhism began to coalesce into a sophisticated religio-philosophical system with a number of schools being established by Vietnamese and Chinese monks.

The Xa Loi Pagoda in Ho Chi Minh City, Vietnam (Tibor Bogнар/TRIP)

When Chinese occupation was brought to an end in 949 C.E., Buddhist advisers were intimately involved in the establishment of the Vietnamese court, which, like China's, had at its center a king (vu'ong) who held a place similar to that of the Son of Heaven. Prominent monks were given the honorific title of Quoc Su, or tutor of the state, and worked closely with the court. In this way Buddhism of the Mahayana strain was forever linked with Vietnamese nationalism, and many kings of the following dynasties were intimately associated with the Buddhist cause.

During the Ly (1010–1225) and Tran (1225–1400) Dynasties, Thien Buddhism, known as Ch'an in China and Zen in Japan, became a sort of official ideology in the country now referred to as Dai Viet, or Great Viet. King Tran Thai Tong (1218–1277) composed a Buddhist treatise, the Khoa Hu Luc, or Discourse on Emptiness. Notably, in 1299, King Tran Nhan Tong (1258–1308) retired and became a Buddhist monk. He launched a local school of Thien, known as Truc Lam, or the Bamboo Forest. Today, Buddhism remains the major tradition of this nation of some eighty million.

The rise of the Le Dynasty (1428–1788) led to the increasing influence of Confucian scholars at court. It has been argued by Taylor that to maintain independence, Vietnam adapted the Chinese social model more completely after independence, in order to demonstrate to China the civility of the Vietnamese people. The adaptation of Chinese concepts reached its apotheosis at the start of the Nguyen Dynasty (1802–1945), when the court adopted Confucian-based Ming Dynasty law codes.

In the meantime, Daoism remained largely a marginal part of Vietnam's tam giao tradition, disseminated in popular novels from the Ming Dynasty onward, and since Chinese occupation an ongoing but shadowy philosophical influence. It was never fully institutionalized in major monasteries and temples, as it was in China.

From independence onward, the nation, which had until then been based around the Red River Delta, began its southward movement, or Nam Tien, along the eastern part of the Indochinese peninsula, fighting the more Indianized Cham peoples as they went. These peoples were strongly influenced by THERAVADA strains of Buddhism and Hindu ideas, which maintained an ongoing influence in the south, despite the eventual subjugation of the Cham. As Europeans began to appear in the sixteenth century, Vietnam, already too big to be administered from Hanoi, started to bifurcate. It was reunified only in 1802. The new national government, based in Hue at the halfway point of the nation, quickly became unsettled by the growth of Catholicism. It was introduced first by the Portuguese and then the French, and the tensions created between missionaries and nationalists proved a very convenient cause that allowed Napoleon III to add Vietnam to the Second Empire. Continued European religious influence has resulted in Vietnam's possessing the largest Catholic community in Asia outside of the Philippines.

The French also brought a number of esoteric traditions with them, in particular a vogue for séances and Spiritism, which, when linked with the traditional practices of Chinese-style divination, gave rise in 1926 to the Cao Dai movement. It was also during the Nguyen Dynasty that Buddhism, increasingly controlled by the court throughout the later dynasties, continued its general decline. It was revived only in certain millenarian forms such as the Buu Son Ky Huong movement of the 1850s. That brand of Buddhism eventually gave rise to HOA HAO BUDDHISM in 1939.

In response to the mistreatment of non-Catholics by the Ngo Dinh Diem regime (1954–1963), mainstream Buddhism underwent a remarkable resurgence, and the UNIFIED BUDDHIST CHURCH OF VIETNAM brought together many Buddhist groups of both Mahayana and Theravada strains. After 1975, when Communist forces overran the south, there was a systematic attempt to control religious activity by the Communist authorities. That included the establishment of “management committees” designed to ally all religious activity to the direction of the state. A great number of religiously minded Vietnamese were interred in “education camps” for months, sometimes years. Both the actuality and the threat of persecution led many religiously minded people to flee the nation and join a diaspora that has taken Vietnamese traditions around the world. Today these traditions continue to adapt to the influences of numerous host cultures around the world.

The main characteristics of the religious life of Vietnam have been of accommodation and adaptability. Many have referred to Vietnam as a “crossroad” of various socioreligious influences; however, we must be wary of ignoring the legacy that the Vietnamese themselves have made to internal religious developments that, after the events of 1975, are having an increasing influence on the world.

Christopher H. Hartney

Sources:

Cadiere, Leopold. Croyances et pratiques religieuses des Vietnamiens. 3 vols. Hanoi: Publications de l'École Française d'Extrême-Orient, 1955–1957.

Taylor, Keith Weller. The Birth of Vietnam. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1983.

Tran Van Giap. “Le Bouddhisme en Annam des origines au XIIIeme siecle.” BEFEO 32, 1 (1932).

Vipassana International Academy

The globally spread meditational movement of vipassana has its roots in the revival of THERAVADA BUDDHISM in the late nineteenth century. Reformers reinterpreted Buddhist tradition afresh, stressing rational aspects of the dhamma (Pali: Buddhist teachings). They laid emphasis on meditation, lay participation, and texts and underscored the possibility of reaching final liberation, nibbana (Pali) or nirvana (Sanskrit), in this life. This contrasted with traditional Buddhism, with its centrality on dhamma teachings by monks and devotional practices such as chanting Pali verses and reciting formulaic lists, intended as means for accumulating merit (Pali: punna) toward a better next life. The instructing of people, both ordained and laity, in meditational practices by monks was new and decisive, inasmuch as the practice of meditation had not traditionally constituted an option for lay Buddhists; secondly, the tradition of meditation had been lost for centuries among the sangha (Buddhist order), at least among the village- and town-dwelling monks. In addition, since the mid-twentieth century, laymen have taught meditation, an activity traditionally the prerogative of monks only.

The Vipassana International Academy (VIA) constitutes an independent organization developed from one of the two most important Burmese lineages of meditational practice inaugurated by eminent Theravada monks in the early twentieth century. The relevant lineage for VIA originates with Ledi Sayadaw (1846–1923) and was made widely known by his grand-disciple U Ba Khin (1899–1971), a layman and former state official (he was head of three government departments). Satya Narayan Goenka, an Indian born in Burma in 1924, a highly successful businessman and founder of the VIA, started meditation practice with U Ba Khin in 1955. Having received authorization to teach in 1969, Goenka settled in western India that same year, one of his aims being to “bring back” the dhamma to its land of origin.

In 1976, Goenka established the Vipassana International Academy at Dhammagiri in Igatpuri, 135 kilometers northeast of Mumbai (Bombay). The present-day academy is situated on a twenty-hectare plot with a golden pagoda, four meditation halls, and three hundred small meditation cells. The organization runs some twenty ten-day courses a year, some of which are at times visited by as many as five hundred participants. Students must adhere to a code of discipline, including the observation of so-called noble silence for the whole period, and a strict timetable starting at 4:00 A.M., with some ten hours of meditation practice, Pali recitations, and a discourse by the teacher or a video lecture. Goenka has developed a systematic schedule of courses with introductory, advanced, and specialized levels. All other meditational practices and neighboring vipassana approaches are banned, so as to teach the “pure” dhamma.

The term vipassana derives from the Pali root dis, meaning: to see. Vipassana is understood to be a way of seeing or gaining an insight into reality, as understood in Theravada terms. Goenka and other modern vipassana teachers base their teachings primarily on the canonical Satipatthana sutta (Discourse on the Foundations of Mindfulness) and the classic meditation manual Visuddhimagga (Path of Purification) by Buddhaghosa. Closely related to vipassana, or insight meditation, is the concept of sati, mindfulness or awareness. Vipassana is developed through the practice of sati. To generate vipassana or insight, the meditator develops mindfulness of each of the four foundations of mindfulness (body, feelings or sensations, states of mind, and the mental objects). The Satipatthana sutta prescribes specific ways to meditate on each of these four foundations, beginning with the instruction on how to develop mindfulness of the body by focusing attention on the process of breathing. Vipassana is directed toward recognizing the “three marks of existence”: In the arising and disappearing of breath, feelings, thoughts, and other objects, the meditator experiences the “truths” of impermanence (anicca), no-self (anatta), and unsatisfactoriness or suffering (dukkha). In Goenka’s courses and in his own vocabulary, as well as that of U Ba Khin, this approach has come to be called “body sweeping”—that is, the focusing of mindfulness on each part of the body, “bit by bit, part by part,” as Goenka stresses.

Attached to the VIA is the Vipassana Research Institute. It pursues studies on early Buddhist texts and has compiled the texts of the Pali canon with its commentaries on a CD-Rom (Chattha Sangayana Tipitaka), launched for free in 1997. Also in 1997, the foundation stone for a huge hall, taking the form of a 300-foot-high stupa and providing room for ten thousand people, was laid in Mumbai. In 2001, Vipassana courses were being taught at twenty-seven Vipassana centers and numerous other localities in India. Courses are also held in Indian prisons, with much success. Since the late 1970s, because of a growing number of non-Indian students and visits abroad by Goenka, this sweeping approach has spread to numerous Asian and Western countries, with fifty-eight centers globally and many places where ten-day courses are held.

Addresses:

Vipassana International Academy
Dhammagiri
Igatpuri 422 403

Dist. Nasik
Maharashtra
India
<http://www.dhamma.org>

Vipassana Meditation Centre
Dhamma Dhara
386 Colrain-Shelburne Rd.
Shelburne Falls, MA 01370
<http://www.dhara.dhamma.org>

Martin Baumann

Sources:

- Goenka, S. N. The Art of Living: Vipassana Meditation. Shelburne Falls, MA: Vipassana Meditation Center, n.d. (1980).
———. The Gracious Flow of Dharma. Igatpuri: Vipassana Research Institute, 1994.
Guidelines for Practicing Vipassana Meditation as Taught by S. N. Goenka and His Assistant Teachers. Shelburne Falls, MA: Vipassana Meditation Center, n.d.
Hart, William. The Art of Living Vipassana Meditation as Taught by S. N. Goenka. San Francisco: Harper and Row, 1987, 1993.
Sharf, Robert H. “Buddhist Modernism and the Rhetoric of Meditative Experience.” Numen 42 (1995): 228–283.

Virasaivism

Virasaivism, also known as Lingayatism, is the religious system of the Virasaivas (heroic Saivites) or Lingayatas (those who have sought refuge in the linga), a kind of reformatory Saivite Hinduism that assumed an organized form in the late twelfth century C.E. under the leadership of Basava (Basavanna, Basavesvara), in what is today the northern part of Karnataka state in India. The community is estimated to have approximately twelve million members. Certain characteristics set Virasaivism apart from orthodox Brahminical Hinduism, of which the most striking are the rejection of the orthodox social order with its hierarchical system of varnas and jatis (castes); the notion of valid scripture; the concept of priesthood; the equal position accorded women; the cordial attitude toward persons outside the community; and the welcoming attitude toward religious conversion.

Basava (who lived around 1160 C.E. and should be considered the main organizer of the movement, rather than its founder) was born in an orthodox Brahmin Saivite family and thus by birth enjoyed a certain social prestige and privileges. He rose to a ministerial position at the court of the local king and became the royal treasurer, and thereby he gained a still higher social status. However, his attitude toward his ritual status in society was affected by his disgust at what he considered a formal, mechanically ritual religiosity that had lost most of its meaning because genuine, individually felt devotion to god, which he thought to be the basis of the religion, had largely disappeared from public practice. His own profound devotion to and humility before Siva, who is the spiritual essence of all humans, made him reject the traditional high social status that he had received by birth. He rejected the sacred thread that is the traditional insignia of his high caste and declared Allama Prabhu, a senior mystic of ritually low birth, to be his personal religious teacher.

In this form of Hinduism the Vedas hold no place of special authority, and the main scriptures are the Saiva agamas and a special genre of literature written in the Kannada language known as vacana, or saying. These are relatively short prose-poems of often stunning literary beauty. Basava, Allama, Akka Mahadevi, and others have written hundreds of them.

Virasaivism began as a religious community that was open to all individuals who accepted its tenets, and many vacanas express the gratitude of converts who thus found religious fulfillment and at the same time were freed from traditional social stigmas of birth, as is characteristic of orthodox Hinduism. The ritual hold of the Brahmin castes over the laity was broken by each devotee's possessing a personal linga, or symbolic image of Siva, and thereby becoming independent of ritual specialists. Although there is a quasi-Brahminical priestly section of such specialists in the community, these people have no special authority vis-à-vis the others. Still today Virasaivism openly welcomes religious conversion, regardless of ethnic, social, or national background.

The primary strength of Virasaivism is in Karnataka state in India. In 1995, His Holiness Shri Siddharama Mahaswamiji, the head of Naganur Shri Rudraximath, founded the Central Research Library of Lingayat Studies.

Address:

Central Research Library of Lingayat Studies
 Nagnoor Shri Rudraximath
 Sivabasava Nagar
 Belgaum 590 010
 Karnataka
 India

Robert J. Zydenbos

Sources:

- Nandimath, S. C. A Handbook of Virasaivism. Delhi: Motilal Banarsidass, 1979.
- Ramanujan, A. K. Speaking of Siva. Harmondsworth: Penguin, 1973.
- Zydenbos, R. Z. "Virasaivism, Caste, Revolution, et cetera." Journal of the American Oriental Society 117, 3 (1997).

Virgin Islands of the United States

The U.S. Virgin Islands are located on the northeastern edge of the Caribbean Sea east of Puerto Rico. The islands are the western part of a larger archipelago, the other half of which are British territory. The U.S. Virgin Islands include three main islands—St. Thomas, St. Croix, and St. John—and some fifty smaller islands, mostly uninhabited. They were originally settled by Carib and Arawak people, all of whom were eventually killed by the Spanish. Christopher Columbus first landed in 1493.

Denmark took control of the western Virgin Islands in the eighteenth century. They introduced sugarcane and cotton as well as slavery. In 1917 the United States paid $25 million dollars for the islands. The Danes had previously established a local legislature, and U.S. officials built on it to create a system of local rule. Residents have U.S. citizenship and may vote in national elections. They have turned away from moves for independence or statehood. The great majority of residents are the descendants of Africans, though almost 40 percent have come to the islands from other Caribbean isles.

The ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH was originally established there in the seventeenth century. Today it includes approximately one-third of the residents, and a diocese is headquartered on St. Thomas. It is a suffragan diocese to the Archdiocese of Washington, D.C.

During the years of Danish rule, a variety of churches entered, beginning with the Lutheran Church of Denmark. Lutherans are now a part of the EVANGELICAL LUTHERAN CHURCH IN AMERICA. The CHURCH OF ENGLAND spread through the islands in the eighteenth century, and by the middle of the nineteenth century approximately one-third of the residents were Anglicans. In 1916 this work was transferred to the EPISCOPAL CHURCH.

St. Thomas would play an important role in the modern Protestant missionary enterprise, which began with the Moravian mission to the slaves in 1732. From here, the Moravians would spread around the Caribbean and around the world. The Moravian work has been incorporated in the MORAVIAN CHURCH, EASTERN WEST INDIES PROVINCE. Methodists came to the Virgin Islands in 1891. That work has now been merged into the METHODIST CHURCH IN THE CARIBBEAN AND THE AMERICAS, headquartered in Jamaica.

Followers	2000			2025	2050
	total	%	rate
Christians	89,500	96.3	-1.02	78,900	78,800
Protestants	40,000	43.0	-0.39	40,000	40,000
Roman Catholics	29,000	31.2	-0.50	29,000	29,000
Anglicans	13,800	14.9	0.15	12,000	12,000
Nonreligious	2,100	2.2	2.48	3,000	4,500
Baha'is	580	0.6	1.44	800	1,000
Hindus	390	0.4	2.66	500	800
Jews	300	0.3	0.03	300	550
Muslims	100	0.1	2.05	120	200
Total population	93,000	100.0	-0.92	83,600	85,900

Vishwa Hindu Parishad

The Vishwa Hindu Parishad (Assembly of All Hindus) is an organization with a super-denominational structure. Its declared goal is to become the representative of a united Hinduism, an ambition with obvious political implications. The Vishwa Hindu Parishad (VHP) stresses the meaning of hindutva—Hindu lifestyle—as a central characteristic of the intended new order of Indian society. The concept of the VHP is based on the conviction that Hinduism possesses all principles needed for the organization and governing of society, as well as the structuring of the economy. Therefore the aims and programmatical actions of the VHP are habitually characterized as “political Hinduism.”

In the middle of the 1990s, the VHP had about 1.6 million members worldwide, the majority of whom lived in India. However, there exist branches of the VHP in the United States, in Canada, as well as in several European, African, and East Asian countries. The non-Indian branches operate relatively independently from the head office, but normally they are organized in a kind of net structure in the various countries. The U.S. branch, for example, was founded in 1973 and has since organized various national meetings with members from about one hundred U.S. cities, the most recent as of this writing having been in Austin, Texas, in 1999.

The VHP was founded in Bombay on August 29, 1964, the mythological birthday of God Krishna (Janmashtami). Some 150 leaders of different Hindu sects participated. The founding of the VHP as a forum of a united Hinduism was initiated by Swami Chinmayananda (1916–1993), who became the first president of the organization, and Shivram Shankar Apte, a high-ranking official of the Rashtriya Svayamsevak Sangh (the national volunteers’ organization), who functioned as secretary general.

The VHP is a lay organization with a relatively small number of full-time workers. A high degree of voluntary engagement by the members guarantees the efficiency of the activities, and the members’ activities are declared a religious duty. The Organization Department, which is subdivided into the Central Board of Trustees, the Central Advisory Board, and the Central Executive Committee, constitutes the central administrative unit of the VHP.

The colonial-style Frederick Evangelical Lutheran Church, constructed in 1666, is one of the oldest buildings on St. Thomas, in the town of Charlotte Amalie, U.S. Virgin Islands. (Wolfgang Kaehler/Corbis)

Throughout the twentieth century a number of American churches opened congregations in the islands, but because of their relatively small size, most have only one or a few congregations. The SEVENTH-DAY ADVENTIST CHURCH has risen above the rest, and Pentecostals have split their support among the ASSEMBLIES OF GOD, the CHURCH OF GOD OF PROPHECY, the CHURCH OF GOD (CLEVELAND, TENNESSEE), and the Damascus Christian Church, the latter a Spanish-speaking organization.

The Jewish community in the Virgin Islands dates to the seventeenth century. Today there are some 350 Jews, about half of whom are active in the synagogue, which is located on St. Thomas. In 1983 the members of the synagogue celebrated their 150th anniversary. There are also several spiritual assemblies of the BAHÁ'Í FAITH, and fewer than a hundred Muslims.

Sources:

- Baa, E. “Religious Development.” In Fifty Years: Commemorating the Fiftieth Anniversary of the Transfer of the Virgin Islands from Denmark to the United States of America, March 31, 1967, edited by E. Downing. Charlotte Amalie, USVI: Friends of Denmark Society, 1967.
- Chapman, W., and W. Taylor. Historic Churches of the Virgin Islands. St. Croix: St. Croix Landmarks Society, 1986.
- Frederick Evangelical Lutheran Church, 325th Anniversary, 1666–1991: Celebrate Our Past, Challenge the Future*. St. Thomas: Frederick Evangelical Lutheran Church, 1991.
- Maynard, G. O. A History of the Moravian Church: Eastern West Indies Province. Port of Spain, Trinidad: Yuille’s Printerie, 1968.

The VHP's ambition as all-Hindu representative is expressed by the Religious Parliament (Dharma Samsad), a forum constituted by 1008 sadhus, religious leaders, from different Hindu sects and denominations. These sadhus function as transmitters and legitimists of the instructions and directives of the Organization Department. The practical work is done by seventeen subdepartments that are responsible for different issues—for example, propaganda and publicity, finance, security, educational programs, mission, and so forth.

Dharmo rakshati rakshitah is the slogan of the VHP; it is translated as: "If you protect the Dharma, he will protect you." This motto expresses the conviction that Indian society suffers because the Dharma is not sufficiently observed nowadays. In the eyes of the VHP, a revitalization of the Dharma would regain the glorious strength of the Indian society. A basic prerequisite for this objective is the unification of the heterogeneous Hindu sects and denominations. With that goal in mind, the VHP has repeatedly formulated Hindu catechisms and catalogues of religious behavior, which are said to be authoritative for all Hindus.

In the 1960s and 1970s, the VHP concentrated on the development of its organizational structure. In addition, there were from the beginning two major fields of activity: several service projects, mainly among outcasts and tribals, and programs of reconversion. In both projects the VHP applied a strongly polemical tone against the Christian churches. Later, in the 1980s, there was an increase of activism, now directed against the alleged threat of a foreign Muslim influence in India. From the several actions against that threat, the most important—which received a negative press worldwide—was the Ramajnamabhoomi campaign for the liberation of Rama's birthplace. That crusade, initiated in 1984, pursued the aim of regaining the Babri-mosque in Ayodhya for the Hindus. This mosque was purportedly built in the sixteenth century right on the ruins of a Rama temple. On December 6, 1992, the efforts culminated in an uncontrolled outburst of the fanaticized Hindu crowd that finally razed the mosque. As a result, several bloody altercations between Hindus and Muslims all over India arose, in which more than three hundred people lost their lives. Following the Ayodhya incident the government banned the VHP, but in June 1995 it was legalized again.

Address:

Vishwa Hindu Parishad
Sankat Mochan Ashram
Sector 6
Ramakrishna Puram
New Delhi 110 022
India
<http://www.vhp.org/>

Sources:

- Basu, Tapan, et al. Khaki Shorts and Saffron Flags: A Critique of the Hindu Right. New Delhi: Orient Longman, 1993.
- Dech, Matthias. Hindus und Hindutum in Deutschland. Marburg, Germany: dissertation University of Marburg, 1998.
- Hellman, Eva. Political Hinduism. The Challenge of the Vishwa Hindu Parishad. Dissertation, University of Uppsala, Sweden, 1993.
- Van der Veer, Peter. "Hindu Nationalism and the Discourse of Modernity: The Vishwa Hindu Parishad." In Accounting for Fundamentalism, edited by M. E. Marty. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1994.

Vodou

Vodou is a religion that blends a variety of traditional African (mainly Fon, Yoruba, and Kongo) and Catholic elements. Although decidedly more akin in its forms of ritual and belief to African traditional religion than to Catholicism, Vodou is not an African religion but a product of the Haitian experience. This experience began in the injustices and brutality of plantation slavery in the French colony of Saint-Domingue (1697–1804), followed by two centuries of general political oppression, environmental decay, and stifling poverty. Vodou therefore is a religion born of displacement, suffering, and the negotiation thereof.

Since emerging in a French colony that prohibited its practice, Vodou has always represented a formidable force of political resistance; indeed, its contribution to the success of the Haitian Revolution has been stressed by numerous writers. With the most dynamic early Vodou communities springing up in settlements of escaped slaves from diverse African ethnic groups, since its very inception the religion has demonstrated significant variety. Certain traditions are primarily ancestor cults, while others focus on particular spirits brought from West Africa or others revealed in the New World. Because of the clandestine and variegated nature of colonial-era Vodou, moreover, the religion has no founder, no unifying doctrine, and no formal organizational network. None of these, nor a Vodou scripture, have ever developed.

Slaves brought to the colony were baptized Catholic upon arrival and given minimal religious instruction by DOMINICANS, Capuchins, and JESUITS. Syncretism thus immediately resulted, as slaves identified Catholic saints as new manifestations of African spirits, and adopted crosses, holy water, and incense as powerful religious trinkets to be used in conjunction with the amulets they reconstructed from African religious memory. The Catholic "pantheon"—with its single high creator, God, the Virgin Mary, and host of the dead (the saints) who intervene in the world of the living—lent itself quite fluently to assimilation with the traditional African community of spiritual beings. African religion, likewise, has a single distant creator God

A Vodou practitioner performs an occult ritual in a basin before a crowd of people in Cap-Haitian, July 23, 2000. (AFP/Corbis)

(called Bondyè in Vodou) and numerous spirits and ancestors, who, much like the Catholic saints, are perceived as accessible and with whom the greatest amount of human/divine commerce transpires.

Spirit possession and divination are the main forms of communication with the dead (lemò) and the spirits (lwa yo) in Vodou and together form its ritual focus. Put simply, when our relationship with lemò or lwa yo is in harmony, life is full and pleasurable; when this relationship is discordant, sickness, some other hardship, or even death may result. Upon the occurrence of such misfortune, ritual specialists (female: manbo; male: oungan) are consulted. Either through divination or the orchestration of ceremonies aiming to provoke spirit possession (which most often take place in temples [ounfò], family burial compounds, or public cemeteries), the manbo or oungan effects communication with the lemò or lwa yo in order to discover the cause of the illness or discord and to determine a means of reestablishing harmony or effecting healing. Both the maintenance and the reconstitution of this harmony rely primarily on sacrifice in various forms, while healing often involves herbalism and ritual baths.

Vodou remains popular among the vast majority of Haiti's peasantry (which composes 70 percent of the national population) and is today the religion of choice for a smaller majority of the nation's urban population. Most practitioners also consider themselves faithful Catholics and see no contradiction in this. The religion has spread internationally mainly through massive emigration, as roughly one million Haitians have settled in the neighboring Dominican Republic and more than a million more in urban centers of North America, mainly New York, Montreal, Miami, and Boston. With most of Haiti's estimated eight million inhabitants, a smaller majority of the more than two million Haitians abroad, and an insignificant yet growing number of blan (non-Haitian) converts practicing the religion in some form, the worldwide number of Vodou practitioners may be roughly estimated at between eight and ten million.

Terry Rey

Sources:

Desmangles, Leslie G. The Faces of the Gods: Vodou and Roman Catholicism. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1992.

Laguerre, Michael S. Voodoo and Politics in Haiti. New York: St. Martin's Press, 1989.

Olmós, Marguerite Fernandez and Lizabeth Paravisini Gebert, eds. Sacred Possessions: Vodou, Santería, Obeah, and the Caribbean. New Brunswick, NJ: Rutgers University Press, 1997.

VRINDA/The Vrindavan Institute for Vaisnava Culture and Studies

VRINDA/The Vrindavan Institute for Vaisnava Culture and Studies, one of several groups to grow out of the INTERNATIONAL SOCIETY FOR KRISHNA CONSCIOUSNESS (ISKCON), was founded by Srila Bhakti Aloka Paramadvaiti Maharaja (b. 1954). Swami Paramadvaiti originally joined ISKCON in 1971 in Düsseldorf, Germany, and he rose to a position of leadership as a temple president. He was sent to South America by Swami Prabhupada (1896–1977), ISKCON's founder, where, in 1984, he created both the ISEV (Instituto Superior de Estudios Vedicos) and VRINDA (The Vrindavan Institute for Vaisnava Culture and Studies). By this time he had come into a relationship with Srila Sridhar Maharaja, a Vaisnava guru (one of Prabhupada's god brothers) to whom some ISKCON leaders turned following Prabhupada's death. He took his sannyas vows (the renounced life) from Sridhar Maharaja.

VRINDA established centers (ashrams, farms, cultural centers, schools, and so forth) in Colombia, Chile, Brazil, Ecuador, Argentina, and Peru, and then it spread to Central and North America and Europe (Germany, Bulgaria, Hungary, and Switzerland). In 1990, VRINDA was established in India, and a World Center opened in Vrinda Kunja. Also in Vrindavan, VRINDA opened the first Gaudiya Vaisnava Bookstore to distribute books from all of the groups in the Krishna Consciousness tradition, both classical texts as well as those produced by contemporary teachers. VRINDA has also committed itself to translating and publishing books in a variety of languages, especially German and Spanish.

VRINDA supports an expansive website, including the text of several books by Swami Paramadvaiti. It is a member of the WORLD VAISNAVA ASSOCIATION.

Addresses:

VRINDA
4138 NW 23 Rd. Ave.
Miami, FL 33142

VRINDA
Km. 28 Vía Sylvania
Granada
Colombia

VRINDA (center and bookstore)
Vrinda Kunja Bhut Galli
Gopesvara Road Mohalla P. Vrindavan
District Mathura UP PIN
India
<http://www.vrindavan.org/>

Sources:

Paramadvaiti, B. A., Swami. Our Family the Gaudiya Math. Posted at <http://www.vrindavan.org/English/Books/GMconded.html>. Accessed October 1, 2001.

———. The Temple President. Posted at <http://www.vrindavan.org/bap/index.html>. Accessed October 1, 2001.

VRINDA. Posted at <http://www.vrindavan.org/>. Accessed October 1, 2001.

Wahhabi Islam

The Wahhabi movement was launched in the 1740s by its founder, Mohammad ibn Abd-al-Wahhab (c. 1703–1791), as an attempt to purify and vivify Islam, especially in the Arabian peninsula. Al-Wahhab was especially critical of the different Sufi brotherhoods, which he saw as having fallen into heresy. He took inspiration from the HANBALITE SCHOOL OF ISLAM and its more literalistic approach to the interpretation of the Qur'an, the Muslim holy book, and the Hadith, the sayings of and traditions concerning the Prophet Muhammad. He tended to criticize the other Sunni schools as too accommodationist to the presence of the Sufis in their midst.

At the time that Wahhab began preaching, Arabia was part of the Ottoman Empire, which was dominated by the HANAFITE SCHOOL OF ISLAM, of which Wahhab was critical. He was able to gather an initial following by preaching to the pilgrims who annually flocked to Mecca. His efforts might have died out had they not become tied to the aspirations of the Saud family, which in the late 1800s began an effort to take central and eastern Arabia from the Ottomans. They were initially successful. They captured Mecca in 1806 and began to move into Iraq. The Ottoman caliph reacted, and in two campaigns, in 1812–1813 and 1816–1818, squelched the Saud family and the Wahhabi cause. The Saud family put together a coalition of Arab tribes and, in the twentieth century, with the fall of the Ottoman Empire, was finally able to reconquer the peninsula. The kingdom of Saudi Arabia was proclaimed in 1932, with the Qur'an named its guiding authority and the head of the Saud family the country's king and absolute monarch.

The Wahhabi movement was institutionalized in the family of Abd al-Aziz ibn Sa'ud, the first king, who placed his many sons and grandsons in positions of power. The Wahhabi movement also is manifest in the Committee for Encouraging Virtue and Preventing Vice, and with the Mutawwah (religious authorities), who enforce public conformity to Islamic law, especially on issues of dress and attention to daily times of prayer. They receive support from the majority of Saudis who adhere to the Hanbalite school.

The Wahhabi perspective exists as the most conservative and traditionalist of the spectrum within Sunni Islam. Wahhabis are opposed to ostentatious worship, and Wahhabi mosques tend to be simply furnished and lack minarets (towers from which the people are called to prayer). They have opposed any efforts toward religious pluralism in the Islamic world, especially the efforts of Christian missionaries. They have also advocated traditional roles for women, which in the most austere form allows only very narrow roles for females in the home.

Through the activities of the wealthy Saud family, the Wahhabi movement has exerted influence globally and has been notably present in the MUSLIM WORLD LEAGUE, headquartered in Mecca. It is also seen as the direct inspiration for a variety of traditionalist Islamist movements, such as the MUSLIM BROTHERHOOD in Egypt, the Jamaat-e-Islam Party in Pakistan, and the TALIBAN in Afghanistan. Its influence has reached beyond Sunni Islam to affect SHI'IA ISLAM through such movements as the Palestinian Hezbollah and the forces undergirding the Iranian revolution in 1979. It gained strength by denying those forces internal to the international Muslim community that sought to respond to modern intellectual currents (including criticisms of traditional Muslim practices such as polygamy), as well as the insults felt from European intervention in Muslim societies. In the twentieth century it has most strongly opposed the secularizing tendencies represented in liberal Islam, Marxism, and the permeation of the world by Western culture. Wahhabi and Wahhabi-related groups have consistently argued for the development of Islamic states in which the sharia (Islamic law) is the law of the land. The Wahhabi perspective is also dominant in the Arabian state of Qatar.

Saudi Arabia's first king, Abd al-Aziz ibn Sa'ud (TRIP)

Since the days of Abd-al-Wahhab, the Wahhabis have encountered opposition in the larger Muslim world and from many in the other schools of Sunni Islam, many of whom have written of it as if it were a heretical Muslim sect. In the West, Wahhabis have been seen as part of the larger world of “Islamic Fundamentalism,” a term rejected by most Muslim scholars, even those who might otherwise oppose the Wahhabi perspective, preferring in its stead terms such as “Islamic revivalism” and “Islamic activism.”

Sources:

Abu-Hakima, Ahmad M. History of Eastern Arabia, 1750–1800: The Rise and Development of Bahrain, Kuwait, and Wahhabi Saudi Arabia. Troy, MI: International Book Centre, 1988.

Al-Yassini, A. Religion and State in the Kingdom of Saudi Arabia. Boulder, CO: Westview, 1985.

Sabini, John. Armies in the Sand: The Struggle for Mecca and Medina (the Egyptian Wahhabi War in the 19th Century). New York: Thames and Hudson, 1981.

Wenner, Manfred W. “The Arabian Peninsula and the Islamic ‘Revival.’” In Islam in the Contemporary World, edited by Cyriac K. Pullapilly. Notre Dame, IN: Cross Roads, 1980.

Wake Island

Wake Island is one of three islands in an isolated Pacific atoll that includes the nearby islands of Wilkes and Peale. The United States occupied the atoll in 1898 during the war with Spain and has since kept Wake as a military base. It currently has some sixteen hundred residents, almost totally armed forces personnel. It is used as a business center, a stopover point for trans-Pacific flights, and a missile-testing base.

Religious services on Wake are conducted by Roman Catholic and Protestant/Free Church chaplains as needed, and there are no permanent congregations. The ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH considers Wake a part of its Diocese of Agana (Guam).

Sources:

Barrett, David. The Encyclopedia of World Christianity. 2d ed. New York: Oxford University Press, 2001.

Waldensian Church

The Waldensian Church is the oldest pre-Reformation Protestant body still in existence, and it prides itself on the title mater reformationis (Mother of the Reformation). In terms of its origins, disentangling fact from fiction is not always easy. Its founder was one Waldo or Valdesius (not originally “Peter Waldo,” the name “Peter” being added several centuries after his death in order to claim that, like the early church, the Waldensian Church had also been first led by an apostolic figure known as Peter). Waldo was a wealthy merchant in Lyons, France, who around 1170 underwent a conversion experience centered on his desire to live a life of poverty and to preach the Gospel. He died around 1206. Notwithstanding the hostility of the Catholic hierarchy, the separation from Rome of Waldo’s “Poor of Lyons” movement (only later known as Waldensians) did not initially seem to be entirely inevitable. One of the Poor of Lyons groups, led by Durandus of Osca, reconciled itself with Pope Innocent III (1160–1216) in the year 1208. Other groups remained in the margins of the ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH, breaking with Rome only gradually. In the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries, Waldensian ideas spread from France and Italy into Austria, Germany, Bohemia, Poland, and Hungary, largely through independent local groups quite different from each other and with no common leadership. It is even questioned whether the firmly established “Waldensian” groups active in France and Italy in the fifteenth century could really claim an undisputed genealogy going back to Waldo himself.

In 1532, with the Synod of Chanforan, the Waldensians of southern France and the Italian valleys of Piedmont joined the (Calvinist) Reformed Church. According to some historians, this was a crucial breach in their continuity with Waldo, while others claim some degree of continuity. In the seventeenth century, Waldensians endured terrible persecution during Europe’s religious wars, particularly in 1655 and 1686. An armed resistance failed, and the community, now reduced to some three thousand members entrenched in the Piedmont valleys, escaped to Protestant Switzerland. In 1689, however, they returned to Piedmont with a spectacular and epic march. They managed to obtain some measure of tolerance, although within a ghetto. Waldensians received help from Europeans, particularly British Protestants, and in the nineteenth century the Piedmont valleys entered a period of religious revival. Finally, in 1848, the Waldensians were granted religious freedom, with full civil and political rights, by the king of Sardinia, Charles Albert (1798–1849).

During Italy’s Risorgimento, the conflict between its newly created national state and the Roman Catholic Church gave the Waldensians the opportunity to embark on a nationwide missionary effort among those dissatisfied with the Church of Rome. Not much was achieved in term of converts, however, although a Waldensian presence was established in most Italian cities. Following another difficult period during the Fascist regime, the Waldensian Church was granted a new level of legal recognition after World War II, and in 1984 it entered into a concordat with the Italian government, amended in 1993, allowing it inter alia to share in the national church tax. In 1975, Italian Waldensians and the EVANGELICAL METHODIST CHURCH OF ITALY entered into an “integration agreement,” which was not technically a merger. The two churches, under the name Union of Waldensian and Methodist Churches, are governed by the same executive body (the Waldensian Table), while also maintaining their own separate forms of organization.

Each local assembly in the Waldensian Church is led by elected elders and appoints delegates to the yearly church synod, which in turn elects the seven members of the Table, the governing body chaired by a Table Chair (moderatore). The title of pastor is conferred upon men and women entrusted with the preaching ministry. There are at present forty thousand Waldensians, twenty-five thousand in Italy and fifteen thousand in Uruguay and Argentina, where Waldensian immigrants settled in the nineteenth century.

After the Synod of Chanforan, the theology became Reformed-Presbyterian, and Waldensians share the general doctrines of the Reformed churches.

Address:

Waldensian Church
Via Firenze 38
00184 Rome
Italy
<http://www.chiesavaldesi.org>

Massimo Introvigne and PierLuigi Zoccatelli

Sources:

- Hugon, Augusto-Armand. Storia dei Valdesi II: Dall'adesione alla Riforma all'Emancipazione (1532–1848). Torino, Italy: Claudiana, 1989.
- Molnar, Amedeo. Storia dei Valdesi I: Dalle origini all'adesione alla Riforma (1176–1532). Torino, Italy: Claudiana, 1989.
- Vinay, Valdo. Storia dei Valdesi III: Dal movimento evangelico italiano al movimento ecumenico (1848–1978). Torino, Italy: Claudiana, 1990.

Wallis et Futuna Islands

Wallis et Futuna is a French South Pacific Island territory consisting of the Wallis, Futuna, and Afori islands. They are north of Fiji and west of Samoa. A French possession through the nineteenth century, it was named a protectorate in 1887 and an overseas territory in 1961. The current population is approximately fifteen thousand.

The ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH is the only organized religion on the islands. It was first established in 1836 by a Marist priest. The Diocese of Wallis et Futuna was established in 1966. In 1974 the bishop, a Frenchman, withdrew and turned the diocese over to his auxiliary, a priest who

Status of religions in the Wallis & Futuna Islands, 2000-2050

Followers	2000			2025	2050
	total	%	rate
Christians	14,200	97.7	0.59	17,100	20,100
Roman Catholics	13,900	96.0	0.59	16,800	19,700
Marginal Christians	40	0.3	2.54	90	150
Protestants	40	0.3	1.34	80	120
Ethnoreligionists	190	1.3	-0.56	150	100
Baha'is	120	0.8	1.50	200	500
Nonreligious	20	0.2	1.41	40	120
Total population	14,500	100.0	0.58	17,500	20,800

had been elevated from among the Polynesian people who constitute the primary citizens of the islands. An indigenous episcopal leadership has been present ever since. The bishop serves as an auxiliary to the archbishop of Noumea (Kanaky) and participates in the larger Episcopal Conference of the Pacific, headquartered in Fiji.

Over the course of the twentieth century, an aggressive policy of Christianizing the islands has largely displaced the pre-Christian indigenous religion.

Source:

Barrett, David. The Encyclopedia of World Christianity. 2d ed. New York: Oxford University Press, 2001.

Warith Deen Mohammad, Ministry of

The Nation of Islam originated in 1930 in Detroit, Michigan. Its founder, Wallace Fard, preached a combination of Islam and black nationalism. The doctrine was compelling, particularly in an urban environment in which large numbers of recently arrived Southern blacks hoped to better their lives. The Great Depression magnified their economic marginalization and white prejudice, dashing the hopes of many. These individuals made a receptive audience for Fard's message. Within three years, the Nation developed a substantial following. Notably, it was supported by a well-organized administrative structure that included a security force and a school, as well as training classes for women on how to be good wives and mothers.

Fard disappeared in the early 1930s, but his appointed successor, Elijah Muhammad, developed the movement's doctrine, and further strengthened its membership core. Muhammad taught that Fard was actually Allah incarnate, and that black Americans were his Chosen People. Muhammad identified white Americans as “white devils,” and he prophesied that white America would fall in 1965–1966. In preparation for that time, he emphasized economic self-sufficiency, and the Nation undertook a variety of business enterprises.

Muhammad also required the Muslims to adhere to a strict moral code, and he emphasized physical and mental purity. He outlined strict dietary regulations, and members of the Nation were forbidden to smoke, take drugs, or gamble. In addition, he encouraged pride in the black race.

Inter-racial marriages were forbidden, and many new members took the surname “X,” to symbolize that black Americans could never know their real origins, and to suggest their potential but as yet unrealized power. In the late 1940s, Malcolm Little converted to the Nation of Islam. Malcolm X, as he became known, soon rose to become one of the Nation’s most prominent ministers and recruiters. In the early 1960s, however, Malcolm became disenchanted with Elijah Muhammad’s moral guidance (believing that he had fathered several children outside his marriage); he was in turn censured by Muhammad for commenting that President John F. Kennedy’s assassination was simply “the chickens [coming] home to roost.” As a result, Malcolm was expelled from the Nation. Soon afterward he undertook a pilgrimage to Mecca (the Hajj), and returned to the United States as a convert to traditional, orthodox Islam. He was assassinated on February 21, 1965.

Elijah Muhammad led the Nation until his death in 1975. He appointed his son Wallace as his successor, a move that surprised many. Wallace had a turbulent history within the Nation. He was strongly influenced by Malcolm X, criticized his father’s interpretation of Islam as early as 1961, and was twice expelled from the Nation during the 1960s. Nevertheless, the majority of Muslims followed him when he completely reinterpreted the movement’s doctrine. Within six months he had removed the urgent apocalyptic message from Elijah’s prophecies, and within the next year he initiated even more radical changes. In March of 1976 he declared that his father was no longer to be interpreted as the “last Messenger of Allah,” and in October he announced that the Nation was to become the World Community of al-Islam in the West (WCIW), and that people of all races were welcome to join it.

One notable Muslim did not accept these changes: Louis Farrakhan. He left the group in 1978 and “resurrected” the Nation of Islam, with its original doctrine. For the most part, however, the Muslims accepted the new direction that Wallace chose for the movement. This relatively easy transformation was the result of two factors. First, evidence suggests that in his declining years, Elijah Muhammad exhibited moderation in his language and political views. Second, Elijah’s strict doctrine and calls for education and economic self-sufficiency had the unintended consequence of raising the Nation’s membership among the middle class. Radical views were no longer as appealing as they once had been.

Wallace’s successful redirection of the movement continued during the 1970s and 1980s. In 1980 the WCIW became the American Muslim Mission, and its publication became the American Muslim Journal; in addition, Wallace announced that he would now be known as Warith Deen Mohammad. In 1985, Warith decentralized the movement completely, and the network of people and the centers associated with him have been described simply as the Ministry of Warith Deen Mohammad. Its publication became the Muslim Journal. This move toward the mainstream was perhaps most clearly evidenced in 1992, when Warith became the first Muslim cleric to lead prayers in the U.S. Senate.

Wallace’s relationship with Minister Louis Farrakhan and the Nation of Islam was a difficult one for most of the 1980s. During the 1990s, however, the two groups moved toward reconciliation. In February of 2000, at Minister Farrakhan’s request, Imam Muhammad spoke at the Nation of Islam’s annual meeting. The two leaders embraced and called for the unity of all Muslims, but as yet their coalition has had little practical effect.

Like the Nation of Islam, Warith Deen Muhammad’s movement has never published its membership numbers. The movement continues to publish the Muslim Journal, which can be found at <http://www.muslimjournal.com>. Warith Deen Muhammad’s ministry is located at <http://www.wdmonline.com>.

Martha Lee

Sources:

Gardell, Mattias. In the Name of Elijah Muhammad, Louis Farrakhan and the Nation of Islam. Durham: Duke University Press, 1996.

Lee, Martha. The Nation of Islam: An American Millenarian Movement. Syracuse: Syracuse University Press, 1996.

Muhammad, Elijah. Message to the Blackman in America. Chicago: Muhammad Mosque of Islam No. 2, 1965.

The Way International

The Way International, Inc., an international fundamentalist Christian fellowship, was founded in 1942 as a radio ministry under the name of “Vesper Chimes” by Victor Paul Wierwille (1916–1985), then a minister in the Evangelical and Reformed Church (now an integral part of the UNITED CHURCH OF CHRIST). It assumed its present name in 1974, after being known successively as the Chimes Hour (beginning in 1944), the Chimes Hour Youth Caravan (1947), and The Way, Inc. (1955).

Wierwille had decided to enter the ministry while a student at Mission House College. He later earned a B.D. at Mission House Seminary, in Minnesota, and did graduate work at the University of Chicago and Princeton Theological Seminary, earning an M.Th. in 1941. He was ordained in 1942 and became pastor of the E&R Church at Paine, Ohio, from which he moved to Van Wert, Ohio, two years later to become pastor of St. Peter’s E&R Church. During his stay in Van Wert he became an avid student of the Bible, concentrating upon the doctrine of the Holy Spirit. In 1948 he was awarded a Ph.D. by the Pikes Peak Bible College and Seminary, an unaccredited school in Manitou Springs, Colorado

In 1951, Wierwille received God's Holy Spirit and spoke in tongues for the first time, the basic Pentecostal experience. Out of his subsequent Bible study he developed a course in Christian living that he called the Power for Abundant Living (PFAL) class. He first offered the class in 1953. The following year he began to study Aramaic, under the influence of biblical scholar George M. Lamsa, and began to develop the unique perspective on biblical doctrine that has become identified with the movement that grew up around him. In 1957 he left the Evangelical and Reformed Church, and henceforth devoted himself full-time to his own ministry. That ministry had been chartered as The Way, Inc., in 1955 (later changed to The Way International in 1975). He led The Way until his retirement in 1983. He established the headquarters of The Way at the Wierwille family farm outside New Knoxville, Ohio.

The Way grew steadily through the 1950s, but growth slowed in the 1960s. Then it suddenly experienced spectacular growth in the 1970s, as the ministry identified with the national Jesus People Revival that moved among the Baby Boom generation, which was just coming of age. The Way expanded its facilities at New Knoxville, which hosted the first national Rock of Ages Festival, an annual gathering of Way members, in 1971.

Wierwille established The Way Corps, a four-year leadership training program, and in 1974 he purchased the former Emporia College in Emporia, Kansas, which he transformed into the corps headquarters as The Way College. The Word Over the World (WOW) Ambassador program, initiated by Wierwille in 1971, began to send young Way members across the country for a year of witnessing activity.

Wierwille was succeeded as president of The Way by L. Craig Martindale (b. 1948) in 1983, at the fortieth anniversary of The Way's founding. Martindale had joined The Way while in college, and he became involved full-time after his graduation. He led The Way through the 1990s but was forced to resign in 2000, when he was accused of some extramarital sexual relationships.

The beliefs of The Way are summarized in an eleven-point doctrinal statement. It rejects the Trinitarian orthodoxy of most Western Christianity and denies the divinity of Jesus; Wierwille's opinion on this controversial point is the subject of his book Jesus Christ Is Not God (1975). Although believing in the divine conception of Jesus by God, The Way teaches that Jesus is the Son of God but not God the Son. The Way also believes in receiving the fullness of God's Holy Spirit, believed to be the power of God, not the third person of a Trinity. This view has traditionally been termed Arianism, considered a heresy since the condemnation of its early exponent, Arius, by the Council of Nicea in 325 C.E.

The Way also teaches a form of biblical interpretation known as dispensationalism, a view that divides Bible history into successive periods during which God developed a different relationship with humanity. Wierwille followed a version of dispensationalism known as ultradispensationalism. Most dispensationalists believe that a new dispensation began at Easter, when Christ was resurrected from the dead, and that we currently live in the dispensation of grace that was initiated at that time. Ultradispensationalists believe that between Easter and the emergence of the New Testament church at Pentecost there was a period of transition whose story is largely told in the Book of Acts. This period is identified with the institution of John the Baptist's water baptism. In the succeeding dispensation of grace, the baptism of the spirit replaces John's baptism.

Ultradispensationalists regard the Old Testament, the Four Gospels, and the epistles of Hebrews and James as representative of pre-Pentecost dispensations. The Book of Acts is a transitional document. Paul's epistles, especially his later letters, are seen by ultradispensationalism as the prime documents of the dispensation of grace. The Way believes in one baptism, that of the holy spirit, and rejects water baptism.

The Way, like most scholars, believes that Aramaic was the language spoken by Jesus, but in addition it believes Aramaic to be the language in which the New Testament was originally written, contrary to almost all scholars, who believe it was written in Greek. This view is based on the work of George M. Lamsa, especially his Holy Bible from Ancient Eastern Manuscripts (1959), and the books of independent Indian bishop K. C. Pillai, The Orientalisms of the Bible and Light through an Eastern Window.

The Way's basic teachings are presented in the twelve-session course, the Power for Abundant Living (PFAL). New members take the course and upon graduation may continue to attend "twig" fellowships. Those who wish to become more involved in The Way's work may attend The Way College, join The Way Corps, or become a WOW Ambassador for one year.

The Way International's organization is based on the model of a tree. At the root are the five educational and administrative centers that serve the organization as international headquarters, located at New Knoxville, Ohio; The Way College of Emporia at Emporia, Kansas; The Way College of Biblical Research, Indiana Campus, at Rome, Indiana; Camp Gunnison (The Way Family Ranch at Gunnison, Colorado); and Lead Outdoor Academy at Tinnie, New Mexico. Various national organizations are identified as trunks, and state and provincial organizations as limbs. Organizations serving cities and towns are branches. The small fellowship gatherings in a person's home, most analogous to a congregation, are called twigs. Individual members are likened to leaves. The ministry as a whole is administered by a board of trustees that appoints the cabinet overseeing the headquarters complex, as well as the staff of the other root locations.

In 1983, at the time that leadership was shifted to Craig Martindale, The Way reported 2,657 twigs in the United States, with approximately thirty thousand people involved. Each twig gathering averaged approximately ten members. The Rock of Ages Festival, held that year, hosted more than seventeen thousand people. Also, PFAL classes were conducted abroad in a number of countries, primarily Zaire (now the Democratic Republic of the Congo), Chile, Argentina, Venezuela, and Colombia. Shortly after that transfer of leadership, The Way was hit with significant internal controversy that only grew following Wierwille's death in 1985. Membership also declined in reaction to continuing criticism of the organization as a cult.

Soon after the emergence of The Way International in the 1970s, various groups began to attack it and its founder. Christian countercult organizations opposed it because of its non-Trinitarian theology. Secular anticult organizations accused it of brainwashing its members and attempted to deprogram members. Then, after Wierwille's death, charges of improprieties by Wierwille and several of his close associates resulted in the defection by several prominent Way leaders, a few of whom established rival groups. As a result The Way lost considerable support, although it had seemed to recover somewhat by the 1990s, when attendance at the annual Rock of Ages Festival began to return to its former level. Much of that gain was lost in the light of revelations concerning Martindale at the end of the 1990s. There are a number of Internet sites devoted to criticism of The Way International, posted primarily by those who disagree with its theological stance.

Address:

The Way International
Box 328
New Knoxville, OH 45871

James R. Lewis

Sources:

- Martindale, L. Craig. The Rise and Expansion of the Christian Church in the First Century. New Knoxville, OH: American Christian, 1993.
- Morton, Douglas V., and John P. Juedes. The Integrity and Accuracy of the Way's Word. St. Louis, MO: Personal Freedom Outreach, 1980.
- Wierwille, Dorothea Kipp. Victor Paul Wierwille: Born Again to Serve. New Knoxville, OH: American Christian, 1996.
- Wierwille, Victor Paul. Jesus Christ Is Not God. New Knoxville, OH: American Christian, 1975.
- . Power for Abundant Living. New Knoxville, OH: American Christian, 1972.

Wesleyan Church

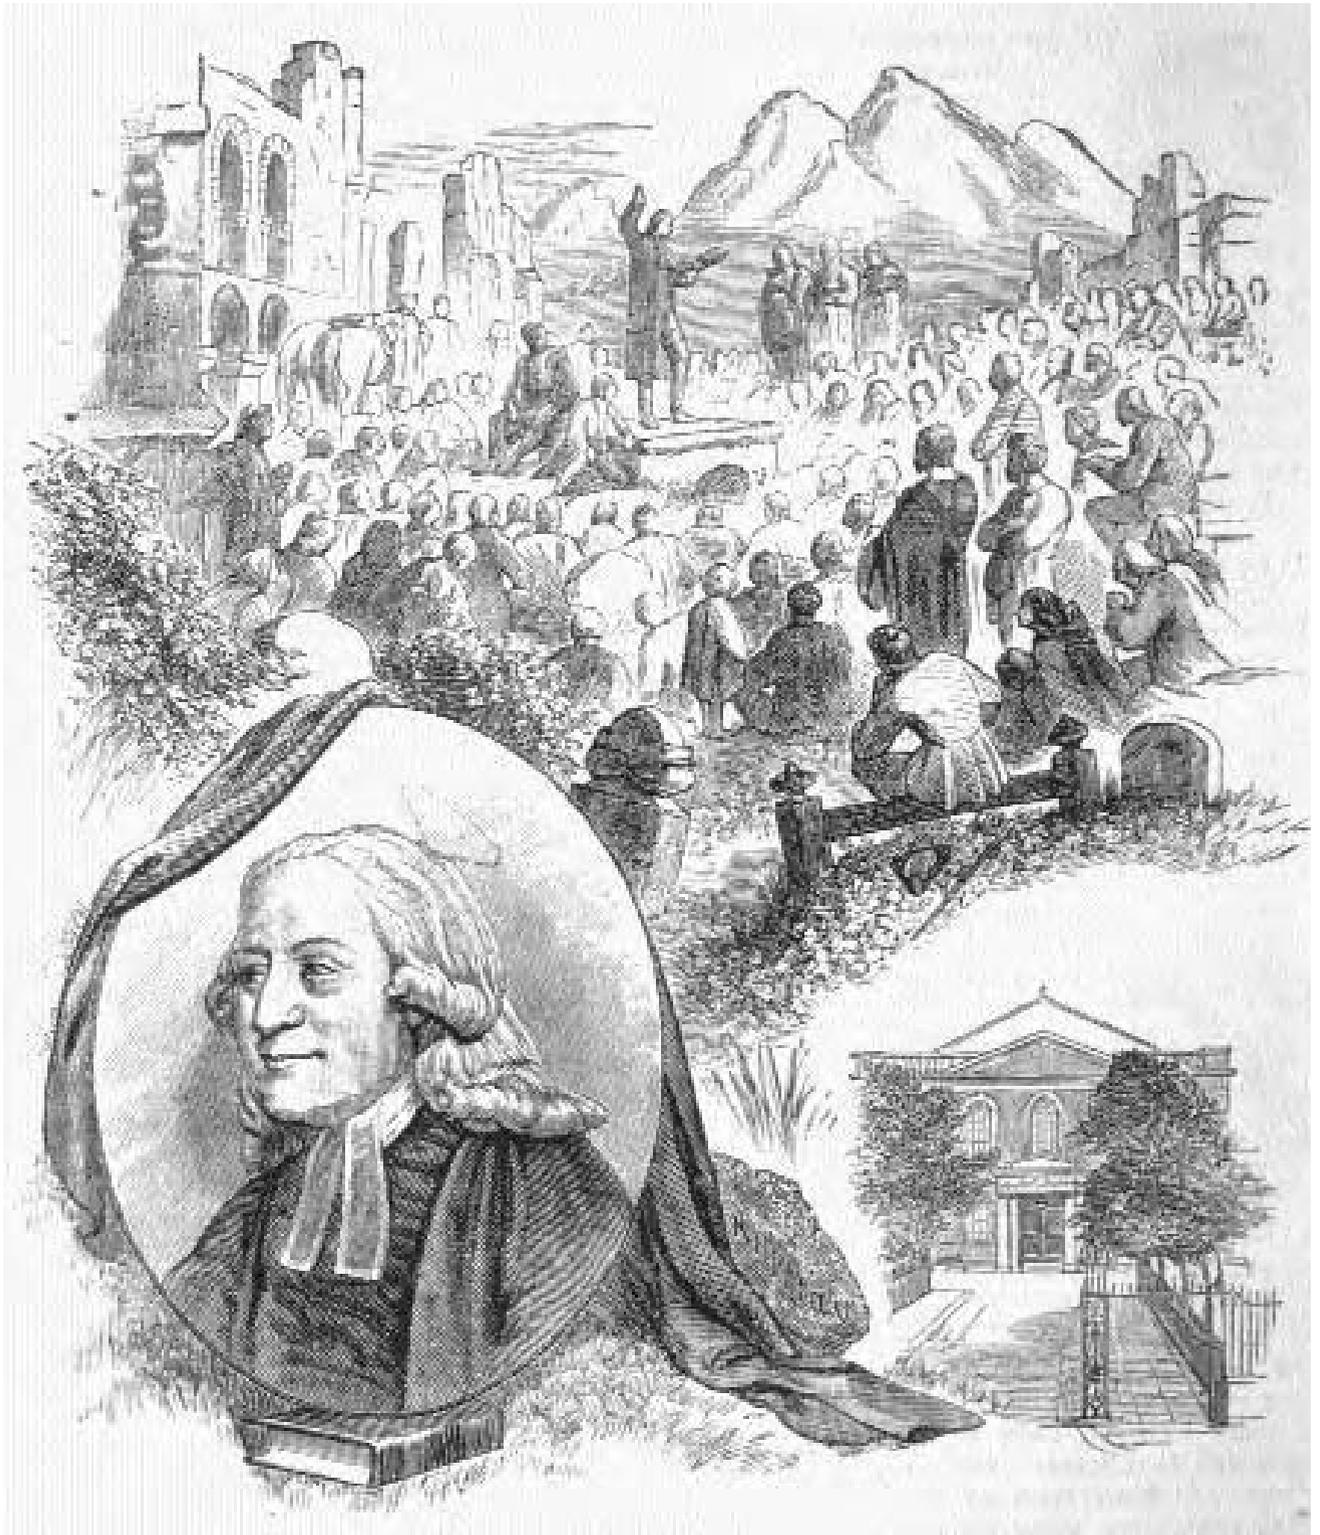

The Wesleyan Church, one of the leading products of the HOLINESS MOVEMENT in the nineteenth century in the United States, was founded in 1968 by the merger of two older Holiness churches, the Wesleyan Methodist Church and the Pilgrim Holiness Church. The Wesleyan Methodist Church originated in the abolitionist wing of the Methodist Episcopal Church (now a constituent part of the United Methodist Church) in the 1840s. As the decade began, the church was divided into three factions; the largest groups were opposed to slavery but thought that it should be eradicated gradually over a period of time. On one side were many, primarily from the South, who tolerated or were even favorably disposed toward slavery. On the other side were the abolitionists, who demanded the immediate end to slavery.

As the debate became more intense, in 1843 a number of ministers and approximately six thousand laymen withdrew from the Methodist Episcopal Church and formed the Wesleyan Methodist Church. Among their leaders were the Reverends Orange Scott, LeRoy Sunderland, and L. C. Matlock. The new church not only took a strong position against slavery but also condemned the use of tobacco and alcohol, opposed membership in secret societies, and advocated modest dress. The church decided against reinstating the episcopacy, and instead chose to be led by a president elected by the members. Over the next decades the church was also drawn into the Holiness Movement and its search for congregations of sanctified believers. The Wesleyan tradition had held out the possibility of every believer's becoming sanctified or perfect in love, as a work of grace on the soul by an act of the Holy Spirit. A renewed emphasis on sanctification spread throughout U.S. Methodist churches in the years after the Civil War.

The Pilgrim Holiness Church, merged in the Holiness Movement, was losing favor in the Methodist Episcopal Church, which at the end of the nineteenth century attempted to distance itself from the understanding of sanctification that had become normative within the Holiness Movement. In 1897 two former Methodist ministers who had resigned from the church, Martin Wells Knapp and Seth Cook Rees, founded the International Holiness Union and Prayer League in Cincinnati, Ohio. Emphasis was on holiness, spiritual healing, evangelism, and the second coming of Christ. As it grew the union evolved, and in 1922 it took the name Pilgrim Holiness Church. Through the 1920s, several other groups with similar origins merged into the new church.

Following the merger of the two churches in 1968, a modified episcopal government was established. The general superintendents (bishops) constitute the Board of General Superintendents. There are two legislative bodies, the North American General Conference and the Philippine General Conference, and all of the units of the church, including the work in more than forty countries of the world, are attached to one of these two governing bodies. The International Center of the church was moved from Marion, Indiana, to Indianapolis in 1987.

John Wesley, preacher and founder of Methodism (D. Clegg/TRIP)

In 1997 the Wesleyan Church reported 119,117 members in the United States and 248,579 members in other countries. The church supports several colleges, universities, and seminaries. The church is a member of the Christian Holiness Partnership and the National Association of Evangelicals, through which it is related to the World Evangelical Fellowship.

Address:

Wesleyan Church
P.O. Box 50434
Indianapolis, IN 46350-0434
<http://www.wesleyan.org>

Sources:

McLeister, Ira Ford, and Roy S. Nicolson. History of the Wesleyan Methodist Church. Marion, IN: Wesley, 1959.
Thomas, Paul Westphal, and Paul William Thomas. The Days of Our Pilgrimage: The History of the Pilgrim Holiness Church. Marion, IN: Wesley, 1976.

Western Buddhist Order, Friends of the

The Friends of the Western Buddhist Order (FWBO) organization was founded in London by an Englishman, Sangharakshita (Dennis Lingwood, b. 1925), in 1967. A year later the Western Buddhist Order came into being, composed of both women and men. The FWBO seeks to give Buddhism a modern, up-to-date shape, fitting Western sensibilities. The FWBO is not aligned to a specific Buddhist tradition in Asia, but rather strives to create a Western form of Buddhist interpretation, practice, and organizational form.

The FWBO uses the texts and teachings of various Buddhist developments and traditions. Basic to the FWBO is its reference to the spirit of the original teaching, as Sangharakshita calls it. This “original teaching” and the “spirit” are to be brought to light again, to be reawakened. To that end, Western art and literature—among others, William Blake, Goethe, and Nietzsche—are also introduced as so-called bridges to an understanding of the dharma (Buddhist teachings). This eclectic intra-Buddhist and interphilosophical approach also applies to the practices favored. Common are Buddhist meditation exercises from the THERAVADA tradition, especially those of the “mindfulness of breathing” (Pali: anapanasati) and the “cultivation of loving-kindness” (metta bhavana), but techniques from Zen and Tibetan traditions (such as visualization practices) are also used. Members regularly take part in pujas (worship) that include chanting, bowing, and prostration.

The authoritative and organizational focal point of the movement is the Western Buddhist Order. Order members are ordained in a ceremony, taking specific precepts, the title Dharmachari or Dharmacharini (male or female, Dharma-farer), and a religious name in Sanskrit or Pali. Order members might be single or married, living in celibacy or being in full-time employment. Many, although not all, order members live together in residential communities. Such communities, most often single-sex, are usually found near a center of the FWBO. The centers are visited by interested people and “friends”—that is, members of the FWBO. At the centers, order members offer regular programs, including meditation classes, public talks, study on Buddhist themes and texts, and “body-work” such as t’ai chi, yoga, and massage. In addition to the communities and the Buddhist centers, the FWBO has founded Right Livelihood cooperatives, such as vegetarian restaurants, whole food shops, or the successful wholesale and retail gift business Windhorse Trading in Cambridge, England. The movement’s three pillars—communities, centers, and cooperatives—aim to change the local as well as the overall Western society and to bring about a “New Society.”

Founded in Britain in the late 1960s, a decade later, the FWBO began to gain a foothold in other European countries and overseas. An especially strong branch exists in western India, where Sangharakshita had supported Buddhist leader Babasaheb Ambedkar’s conversion movement during the mid-1950s (see AMBEDKAR BUDDHISM). Apart from Europe and India, FWBO institutions exist in Australia, New Zealand, Malaysia, Sri Lanka, Nepal, and throughout North and South America. In Britain the movement has founded some thirty centers and thirty-five local groups (as of 1997), having grown to become one of Britain’s principal Buddhist organizations. Globally, there are about fifty-five city centers, fifteen retreat centers, and numerous local groups and cooperatives. In late 2000 the order had approximately 900 members; the number of supporters and “friends” is estimated to be about 100,000, the vast majority of them being Buddhists in India. The FWBO publishes several journals, among them dharma life, and it has a prolific book-publishing house (Windhorse Publications).

During the 1990s, Sangharakshita started handing on responsibilities to senior order members. Sangharakshita authorized these members to conduct ordinations and to take spiritual leadership. The selected members collectively compose the Preceptors College Council (nineteen persons), based in Birmingham, England. A core group of this council, five men and three women, form the College of Public Preceptors. From this a chairman is elected to take the leadership of the order and thus of the entire movement. Although in the future the chairman is to be elected by the whole college and council for a term of five years (re-electable), the first chairman was chosen by Sangharakshita in the autumn of 2000. The movement’s founder appointed senior member Dharmachari Subhuti (Alex Kennedy), a prominent book author about the FWBO and Sangharakshita.

Address:

Friends of the Western Buddhist Order
Communications Office
12 Park Rd.
Moseley, Birmingham B13 8AB
United Kingdom
<http://www.fwbo.org/>

Martin Baumann

Sources:

- Batchelor, Stephen. The Awakening of the West: The Encounter of Buddhism and Western Culture. Berkeley: Parallax, 1994.
- Baumann, Martin. "Work as Dharma Practice: Right Livelihood Cooperatives of the FWBO." In Engaged Buddhism in the West, edited by Christopher S. Queen, 372–393. Boston: Wisdom, 2000.
- Sangharakshita. The Rainbow Road. Birmingham, UK: Windhorse, 1997.
- Sangharakshita. A New Voice in the Buddhist Tradition. Birmingham, UK: Windhorse 1994.
- Subhuti, Dharmachari. Buddhism for Today: A Portrait of a New Buddhist Movement. Glasgow: Windhorse, 1988.

WESTERN ESOTERIC TRADITION

“Esoteric” (from Greek: esòteros) is a comparative term, meaning “more inward,” in contrast to “exoteric” (from exòteros), which means “more outward.” This usage, rooted in the terminology of Greek philosophy, presupposes a duality of insiders and outsiders. The defining characteristics of the esotericist are identification with the inside group, and consequent access to special or secret knowledge.

A prejudice in favor of classical Greece tends to date the Western esoteric tradition from Pythagoras (sixth century B.C.E.) and to root it in his travels in Egypt and Babylon. However, the legendary visit to Pythagoras of Abaris, a priest of Apollo from Hyperborea, points to an existing esoteric tradition in Northern Europe. The achievements in mathematics and astronomy of megalithic culture (fifth–second millennia B.C.E.) bear witness to a technically educated elite, and almost certainly to a concomitant spiritual science. A residue of this prehistoric tradition survives in Celtic and Germanic myth and legend, and in what little is known of the Druids and other pagan schools of the north.

The school of Pythagoras, which is much better documented, was divided into auditors (akousmatikoi) and students (mathematikoi). The auditors, seated outside the veil that hid the master as he spoke, received unexplained, dogmatic precepts, while the students were initiated into the reasons and realities behind these teachings. As the Greek name for the esoteric group suggests, one of their chief disciplines was mathematics. The same was true of Plato’s Academy (fourth century B.C.E.), whose portal bore the inscription “Let none ignorant of geometry enter.”

Plato’s teachings, following Pythagorean tradition, had an exterior side devoted to ethical questions and the education of the rational mind. That is their better-known aspect, immortalized in the Socratic dialogues. The esoteric side, in which Plato’s debt to the earlier school is more evident, combined a science of number with a science of the soul. Platonic mathematics embodied insights, revolutionary for their time, into cosmology, harmony, and the invariable laws of the natural world. It is more difficult to reconstruct the Platonic science of the soul, because this was predicated on concepts and experiences that transcended verbal and logical expression. However, there is little doubt that the inmost circles of Pythagoreans and Platonists alike were concerned with matters classified today as mystical and occult. Their ultimate purpose was to prepare the student for death and its aftermath. In this respect they resembled the initiations of the Eleusinian and other mysteries, but with the difference that the philosophers sought not just a life-changing experience but also understanding.

The first centuries B.C.E. and C.E. saw an international revival of interest in Pythagorean and Platonic philosophy that left its mark in the writings of Cicero, Ovid, and Virgil. Some of the prime movers were Cicero’s friend Nigidius Figulus, a Roman Neopythagorean; Philo of Alexandria, who tried to reconcile the Greek philosophies with his native Judaism; the traveling magus Apollonius of Tyana; and the scholarly Plutarch, a priest of Apollo at Delphi. Simultaneously there came the mystery religions from Egypt and the East, with their message of personal relationship with a savior god or goddess. The most widespread was Mithraism, which traveled with the Roman army to the outermost bounds of the empire. Mithraism as a whole was an esoteric cult that successfully guarded its secrets from outsiders. Within it, as in most esoteric groups, there was a further sifting of members as they progressed, through initiations, into ever more inward circles.

The philosophical revival, combined with the mysteries, was the soil out of which grew the great Neoplatonic movement of the third–sixth centuries C.E. with its centers in Alexandria (Ammonius Saccas, Plotinus), Syria (Porphyry, Iamblichus), Rome (the later Plotinus, Porphyry), Carthage (Apuleius), and Athens (Proclus, Damascius). This was also the time during which Christianity rose to become the official religion of the Roman Empire.

The Neoplatonists at first ignored Christianity, as they had ignored Judaism, as being irrelevant to their interests. The exoteric society of which they constituted, by their own reckoning, the esoteric elite, was one of tolerant polytheism. Given their philosophic keys, they could easily discover the metaphysical and cosmological realities concealed in the Greco-Roman mythology and in everyday religious practice. The Neoplatonists were thoroughly in favor of the latter, being well aware of how much the established temple cults contributed to private piety and public order. During the later period of the Roman Empire, they supported the convergence of cults toward a solar monotheism.

The new savior-religion of Christianity, originally an offshoot of Judaism, borrowed eclectically from the solar cult, from Gnosticism, and from the Egyptian and Mithraic mysteries. To an outsider, its most striking aspects were the solidarity of its followers, and their contempt for all other religions. Spreading at first among the lowest classes, then among patrician women, it became a political force in proportion to the weakening of the empire. In the process it discarded most of its founder's teachings, as being too unworldly and disruptive of the social fabric, and built a powerful hierarchy of its own. After it achieved primacy as the empire's official religion (325 C.E.), it set to work to liquidate its competitors. After the failure of Emperor Julian to reinstitute the worship of the old gods (360–363 C.E.), Greco-Roman paganism was doomed, along with its esoteric academies and mystery schools. The closing of the Athenian Academy in 529 C.E. marked the end of a millennium-long tradition.

Esotericism lived on despite Christianity, not because of it. Primitive Christianity was essentially a way of love and renunciation, indifferent to profane learning and the natural sciences, and suspicious of any attempt to find salvation outside the Church. The esoteric path, in contrast, is one of knowledge, or gnosis. Those for whom the science of the cosmos and the science of the soul were a consuming passion adapted the Christian framework for their own purposes. (The same happened with the Sufis in the Muslim world.) An example is the extraordinary figure known as Pseudo-Dionysius the Areopagite (seventh century). His mapping of the angelic hierarchy and its earthly parallel in the hierarchy of the Church is a typically esoteric exercise, drawing on the doctrine of correspondences, in which heaven and earth reflect one another. His “negative theology,” similar to the higher metaphysical flights of Plotinus, bypasses all the dogmatic assertions that the “positive” theologians argued over.

There is little doubt that Dionysius was also an accomplished mystic; but esotericism is not the same as mysticism. The mystic, driven by love and emotion, yearns for union with God—an experience, which, unexamined, can lead to delusion or fanaticism. The seeker after esoteric knowledge wants the transformative gnosis that reveals the true nature of himself, the world, and the divine. In a prescientific age, when illiteracy and superstition were the norm, this path of knowledge began with mathematics and natural science, logic, and the analysis of language. For this reason, Aristotle was nearly as important a contributor to it as Plato.

During the centuries after Dionysius, Neoplatonism continued to attract Christians unfulfilled by religious observance alone. The School of Chartres (eleventh to thirteenth centuries), inspired by Plato's Pythagorean dialogue Timaeus and by the encyclopedic work of Boethius, revived the sciences of number. Their lasting memorial is the Gothic cathedral, a triumph of geometry and the constructive imagination. The technical knowledge that went into this was the jealously guarded property of the master-masons, who came in time to constitute an esoteric brotherhood of their own.

The pointed arch that is the basis of Gothic architecture had appeared long before in the Arab world, where, too, the works of Aristotle, the Platonists, and the Greek scientists were studied in translation. Among other ancient sciences that passed through the Arabs to Christian Europe was alchemy, or the “Hermetic art.” For four centuries and more, alchemy served as the principal nexus of the Western esoteric tradition. It provided a cover under which one could pursue an esoteric path, in a more or less conscious way. There was nothing in it to disturb Christian orthodoxy: Even the ambition to make gold could be excused by a wish to help the poor. When practiced at the physical level, it gave a plenitude of insights into organic and inorganic nature. When the alchemist became more identified with the work, it began to operate its transmutations simultaneously on the human subject. In some cases, laboratory work was entirely omitted, and the alchemical processes were carried out through active imagination alone. Then Mercury, Sulphur, Salt, and so forth were allegories of states of mind and soul that were explored and manipulated in the cause of transformative knowledge.

The traditional secrecy of esotericism also applied to alchemy, in which the essential points were conveyed by word of mouth from master to pupil. For instance, no one ever stated outright what their First Matter was, or their Secret Fire. Moreover, just as Pythagorean cosmology included information such as heliocentrism, which remained unknown to the world in general for two thousand years, so alchemy probably included some secrets about the natural world that have yet to be rediscovered. In both cases, esotericists act as the scientific preceptors of humanity, but only when the time is ripe. Until then, their ideas would be met with mockery or suppression.

The science of the soul that is the other side of esoteric training was even more alien to the majority and to their exoteric guardians—in earlier times, the Church; in later ones, scientific materialism. For instance, all the Neoplatonists followed Pythagoras in embracing the doctrine of reincarnation. Exactly what they understood by that—what it is that they supposed to reincarnate—is a complex question. But certainly they did not envisage the after-death state of the soul as the Christians did: as an eternity of Heaven, or else of Hell. Nor could any philosophic mind take seriously the cult of relics, the trade in indulgences, the prayers to saints, and all the other apparatus that hinged on this belief concerning the after-life. As for the idea of the New Testament, and even more the Old, as infallible works of divine inspiration, the Catholic Church did well to leave their improprieties and self-contradictions in the decent obscurity of Latin.

The existence of esoteric groups during the Middle Ages is beyond doubt, but largely beyond our historical grasp. Symptoms of their existence appear, as mentioned, in the masonic guilds; also in the Courts of Love in southern France; in the Sicilian court of Emperor Frederick II; in the Knights Templar; and in Dante. But it is in the nature of esotericism not to advertise itself, nor to admit potentially unworthy and indiscreet persons to its secrets. The science of “how man makes himself immortal” (Dante’s words) was transmitted along the thinnest of threads.

During the fifteenth century, the rediscovery and translation of Greek texts, especially the Neoplatonists and the Corpus Hermeticum, led to a renaissance of classical pagan philosophy. The Byzantine philosopher George Gemistus Plethon planted the idea that divine wisdom was inherent in all religions, and that an “ancient theology” or a “perennial philosophy” had existed since the earliest ages, of which Christianity was the latest (if the most perfect) manifestation. The Roman Academy of Pomponio Leto went so far in its revival of antiquity that it was dissolved by papal order and its members imprisoned. Marsilio Ficino, head of the Florentine Academy, re-created the Orphic invocations and practiced astrological magic; his younger colleague Pico della Mirandola added Jewish kabbala to the mixture. Early in the sixteenth century, Henry Cornelius Agrippa compiled an encyclopedia of natural, astrological, and kabbalistic magic that has never been superseded. Neoplatonic ideas permeated the arts of painting, sculpture, and architecture with an alternative mythology to that of Christianity.

All of these developments hinted at the possibility of an initiatic path existing outside the Church, but they were soon extinguished. The climate of controversy and religious wars following the Reformation made it dangerous enough to be the wrong sort of Christian, let alone pagan. Alchemy alone survived as a visible and acceptable witness to an esoteric tradition.

In the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, the two components of traditional esotericism parted company. The science of the cosmos and of number became secularized in the Scientific Revolution, while the science of the soul found a new home in Protestant mysticism, invigorated by the example of Jacob Boehme (1575–1624). This “theosophy” took for granted the Christian revelation contained in the Bible, but, like alchemy, regarded the Book of Nature as a parallel revelation in which the divine mind could be penetrated. Leaning to piety and mysticism rather than to philosophy, the Boehmians (or Behmenists) were the chief if not the only esoteric tradition through the Age of Reason. Another candidate for the title is FREEMASONRY, especially in its more theosophical, magical, and alchemical offshoots. Although the majority of lodges were fraternal and political in intent, they offered a haven for discreet meetings and transmissions, while their symbolism had evident links with the ancient mysteries. Some of them, such as those frequented by the young Emanuel Swedenborg (1688–1772), gave access to Jewish esoteric teachings, notably those on sexual magic. With good reason, the Church was suspicious of Freemasonry in all its varieties.

The Romantic era was a time of philosophical ferment comparable to the Roman Empire period and to the fifteenth century. Once again, European esoteric traditions (Bohemian theosophy, Freemasonry) met with extra-European influences, now coming from Persia, India, and China. Christianity, much weakened politically and discredited in the minds of many intellectuals, no longer served as the unquestioned substratum of belief. The first stages of esotericism became freely accessible: the opportunity to study and cultivate, not merely to save, one’s own soul; the opening of the world of the imagination through poetry and music; communion with a living nature. However, no philosophical academies existed to carry the aspirant further, and the end-point was often a pantheistic mysticism.

The Romantic attitude also made itself felt as an alternative current in the natural sciences, deprecated today because of its unacceptable metaphysics (that is, because it is not based on the materialistic assumption). Some examples are the medical practices of Franz Anton Mesmer (1734–1815); the theories of metamorphosis and of color espoused by Goethe (1749–1832); the homeopathy of Samuel Hahnemann (1755–1843); the universal science based on the doctrine of correspondences of Lorenz Oken (1779–1851); and the experiments of the later Mesmerists with animal magnetism and altered states of consciousness. The connection of these with esoteric philosophy is obvious. Even more so is that of the Psychical Research Society, whose chief object was to settle the question of the soul’s survival. Until World War I, some major figures in the natural sciences (for example, William Barrett, William Crookes, Oliver Lodge, Charles Richet, and Johann Zöllner) were dedicated to such research.

Both of these tendencies—the concordance of Western with Eastern traditions, and the pursuit of a nonmaterialistic science—met in the THEOSOPHICAL SOCIETY (ADYAR). Founded in 1875 by Helena P. Blavatsky (1831–1891) and Henry S. Olcott (1832–1907), with a large contribution from the medium Emma Hardinge Britten (1823–1899), the society was at first devoted to practical research into occultism. The 1880s saw the emergence of a rival group, the Hermetic Brotherhood of Luxor, largely based on the teachings of the American medium Pascal B. Randolph (1825–1875). Its influence was out of all proportion to its modest operation, which was not through personal contact or ritual but through a correspondence course in self-initiation. In the same decade the Theosophical Society founded an Esoteric Section, which still exists but whose activities have never been revealed. A little later, the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn provided more glamorous opportunities for ceremonial magic and initiatic ritual. Its vocabulary was Hermetic, kabbalistic, Rosicrucian, and Enochian (that is, based on the “angelic conversations” of John Dee). Later offshoots of the Golden Dawn, notably those led by Dion Fortune (1891–1946) and Gareth Knight, were more Christocentric, as was the Anthroposophy of Rudolf Steiner (1861–1925).

The Western attraction to Eastern philosophies and to practices such as meditation and yoga was the most visible esoteric phenomenon of the twentieth century, comparable again to the influx of the Oriental mystery-religions (including Christianity) into the Roman Empire. Buddhism, first in its Japanese (Zen) then in its Tibetan form, provided a popular alternative religion to many former Christians and Jews. Toward the end of the century, the residue of all these tendencies—alternative science, occultism, Orientalism—congealed in the NEW AGE MOVEMENT.

At this point it is impossible to define a single Western esoteric tradition. Some Christian esotericists imagine an initiatic lineage going back to the secret teachings of Jesus himself, but the evidence, to an outsider, is nonexistent. Rather, the repeated impulses toward a “more inward” path seem to have led outside the Christianity of the churches, and the more so when the goal is knowledge of self and cosmos rather than mystical union. The fundamental teaching of Christianity is love, and its basis in the Gospels is antihierarchical and anti-individualistic. If in practice it has consistently violated those principles, they still remain as a powerful personal and social ideal, with their own virtues and rewards. To choose the esoteric path is essentially to prefer self-perfection or self-realization to these ideals, which is why the Christian churches, unlike Hinduism, Buddhism, or Greco-Roman paganism, have never had a comfortable relationship with their Gnostic and esoteric members.

Joscelyn Godwin

Sources:

- Faivre, Antoine. Access to Modern Esotericism. Albany: State University of New York Press, 1994.
- . Theosophy, Imagination, Tradition: Studies in Western Esotericism. Albany: State University of New York Press, 2000.
- Faivre, Antoine, and Jacob Needleman, eds. Modern Esoteric Spirituality. New York: Crossroad, 1992.
- Godwin, Joscelyn. Mystery Religions in the Ancient World. London: Thames and Hudson, 1981.
- . The Theosophical Enlightenment. Albany: State University of New York Press, 1994.
- Godwin, Joscelyn, Christian Chanel, and John Patrick Deveney, eds. The Hermetic Brotherhood of Luxor: Historical and Initiatic Documents of an Order of Practical Occultism. York Beach, ME: Samuel Weiser, 1995.
- Hanegraaff, Wouter J. New Age Religion and Western Culture: Esotericism in the Mirror of Secular Thought. Leiden: Brill, 1996.
- Introvigne, Massimo. Il cappello del mago: I nuovi movimenti magici, dallo spiritismo al satanismo. Milan: Sugar Co., 1990.
- Melton, J. Gordon, ed. Encyclopedia of Occultism and Parapsychology. 2 vols. Detroit: Gale Group, 2001.
- Thomas, Keith. Religion and the Decline of Magic. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons, 1971.

White Brotherhood

The White Brotherhood, an occult order founded at the end of the nineteenth century, was formed in Bulgaria by Peter Konstantinov Deunov (1864–1944), better known by his spiritual name, Beinsa Douno. As a member of the BULGARIAN ORTHODOX CHURCH, Douno had considered becoming a monk. Instead, he became a schoolteacher. He later moved to the United States to attend seminary. He finally received one degree in religion and another in medicine. In the United States he had encountered the Rosicrucians and was also conscious of the Bogomils, an ancient esoteric group from his own land. His first book, Science and Education, appeared in 1896. After returning to Bulgaria, he entered a period of seclusion and, in 1897, reported an initiatory experience during which he felt the Spirit of God descending upon him. When he finally reappeared to take students, he was recognized as having attained his masterhood. In what would be the first of regular annual meetings in August 1900, he created the White Brotherhood. His first three students were the only members. The teachings became the basis for a series of books by Douno.

Douno traveled widely, and the organization developed a following throughout Bulgaria through its first decade. In 1914 he declared the advent of the new age of Aquarius and relocated to Sofia, the capital. It being wartime, his activities came under official scrutiny, and signs of tension with authorities appeared. In August 1915, the annual meeting was disrupted and Douno was expelled from the town in which it was held. In 1917 the Holy Synod of the Bulgarian Orthodox Church pressured the authorities to have the Brotherhood expelled from Sofia. Finally in 1922, in response to Douno's opening a School of the Great White Brotherhood in Sofia, the church excommunicated Douno and many of his followers. Various further attempts to suppress the movement included the arrest of members and the disruption of meetings. In spite of its critics, however, the movement persisted. In 1926 a new headquarters complex, including a publishing center, was erected at Izfrevna, near Sofia.

Douno's teachings included the practice of paneurhythmy, a set of exercises set to music. First introduced in 1934, the exercises were integral to the work when it opened its first group in Paris (1936), Latvia, and Estonia. Further spread of the movement was stopped, first by World War II, and then by the changes in the political situation following the war. Douno's death in 1944 occurred only a few weeks after the Soviet Army took control of his homeland.

Not really understanding the drastic nature of postwar political changes, the Brotherhood reorganized in 1945 under a council and continued as it had prior to the war. Only three years later, their headquarters property was nationalized (and then leveled in 1970). Realizing now that they existed in a new, hostile environment, Brotherhood leaders took steps to preserve Douno's writings, an important move, as in 1957 the government confiscated all of Douno's books. Meanwhile, Douno's work had spread to Western Europe and the United States. His writings were translated and published. At the same time, Michael Aivanhov, whom in 1938 Douno had sent to take charge of the work in Paris, founded his own movement to perpetuate Douno's teachings as he understood and interpreted them. Aivanhov's work continues as the UNIVERSAL GREAT BROTHERHOOD.

Douno saw the White Brotherhood as embodying the true spirituality of Christianity and making a modern transmission of the eternal religion of Christ. The White Brotherhood thus continues the mystical Church of St. John, as opposed to the official church, the Church of St. Peter. Suppressed in the lands controlled by the Soviet Union, the White Brotherhood had only a few followers in the West. It was again allowed to hold meetings in the 1970s, and then in the 1990s it revived in Bulgaria as political changes brought a new level of religious freedom. It was officially recognized in November 1990, and a periodical was reinstated the following year. The rebuilding of the White Brotherhood community and educational center in Sofia began in 1995.

Today the Brotherhood exists as a vital international organization. Douno's Bulgarian followers have translated a number of his works into English and other Western languages, the first of which translations appeared in the 1960s.

Addresses:

White Brotherhood
c/o Velichka Dragaova, Sec.
Postoyanstvo St. 14, ap 88
Sofia
Bulgaria

White Brotherhood
c/o Telesma-Evida Publishing
P.O. Box 174
Ahuntsic, Montreal H2L 3N7
Canada
http://www.vega.bg/~beinsa_douno/

Marat S. Shterin

Sources:

- Douno, Beinsa. The Master Speaks: The Word of the Great White Brotherhood. Los Angeles: Sunrise, 1970.
———. Reminiscences: Talks with the Master. Los Angeles: Sunrise, 1968.
———. The Teachings of Beinsa Douno: Pearls of Love. Glasgow: Beyond the Rising Sun, n.d.

White Fathers

The White Fathers (officially the Society of Missionaries of Africa), as the name implies, has been one of the more important organizations assisting the spread of the ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH in the modern world, especially on the continent of Africa. The order was founded in 1868 by Charles M. Lavigerie, then the archbishop of Algiers. Algeria was at the time a French colony. The occasion for the founding was a typhoid epidemic in Algiers, and the first assignment of the members was the care of children and youth orphaned by the illness. The order subsequently gained oversight of various missionary centers in the country. They adapted a habit designed from the clothing commonly worn in North Africa.

In 1878, Lavigerie submitted a plan to evangelize central Africa to Rome. It was approved, and he was appointed the apostolic delegate for equatorial Africa. The first group headed for Tanganyika (now Tanzania) and established work in the western part of the country and in Uganda. They were joined by new personnel annually. Twenty-two missionaries who were killed in the late nineteenth century in Uganda were canonized in 1964. The work spread to the Congo and the Sudan (1894), and in the early twentieth century to Guinea, Mali, Upper Volta (Burkina Faso), and Ghana. In the years since World War II, they have also accepted work assignments in Nigeria and Mozambique.

The final approval of the White Fathers' constitution occurred in 1908. Members take an oath of dedication to the establishment of the Roman Catholic Church on the African continent. Only with the approval of the pope may they work outside of Africa. In 1880 the pope requested that they assume responsibility for opening a seminary in Jerusalem for the training of the clergy of the MELKITE CATHOLIC CHURCH. To date, that has been their only work outside of Africa, except for centers in the West, where members are recruited and trained. Such centers are found in the United States, for example, at Franklin, Pennsylvania (novitiate); Onchiota, New York (seminary); and Washington, D.C. (headquarters). The work of the White Fathers is divided into provinces, the first of which were designated in 1936.

Lavigerie also founded a second order, the missionary Society of Our Lady of Africa, a female society popularly known as the White Sisters. It took special responsibility for improving the spiritual and material life of African women. Like their male counterparts, the White Sisters have spread across Africa, where they currently manage more than 150 houses. They also maintain a presence in Europe and the United States where administration, recruitment, and training occur.

Address:

White Fathers
Via della Nocetta 111
00164 Roma
Italy

Sources:

Attwater, D. The White Fathers in Africa. London: Burns and Oates, 1937.

Bouniol, J. The White Fathers and Their Missions. London: Sands, 1929.

De Arteche, J. The Cardinal of Africa: Charles Lavigerie, Founder of the White Fathers. London: Catholic Book Club, 1964.

Kittler, Glen D. The White Fathers: A Chronicle of Nearly a Hundred Years of Saintly Heroism in Africa. London: W. H. Allen, 1957.

Matheson, Elizabeth Mary. African Apostles. Staten Island, NY: Alba House, 1963.

White Plum Asanga

The White Plum Asanga is an organization designed to promote unity and maintain harmonious relationships between the Dharma successors of Japanese teacher Baian Hakuju Daiosho, the honorary founder of the Zen Center of Los Angeles. He headed the Supreme Court of the main SOTO ZEN BUDDHISM group in Japan and was one of the leading figures of Japanese Zen. Many of those who hold his lineage are currently leaders of otherwise independent autonomous Zen centers. The Asanga promotes communication and provides a forum for conflict resolution among members, as well as other Buddhist schools and traditions.

White Plum Asanga offers two kinds of membership: voting membership is extended to Shiho Dharma successors in the lineage of Taizan Maezumi Daiosho (1931–1995). Maezumi Roshi He originally received Dharma transmission from Hakuju Kuroda, Roshi in 1955, but additionally received inka (approval as a teacher) from both Koryu Osaka, Roshi, and Hakuun Yasutani Roshi. He founded the Zen Center of Los Angeles, where he trained twelve Dharma successors. His students have in turn passed the Dharma lineage to nine second-generation teachers. Honorary membership is offered to all of the successors of Baian Hakuju Daiosho. Senior students, especially those who have Dharma transmission from the voting members, also are invited to participate.

Voting members of the Asanga (as of 2001) are Jan Chozen Bays (Zen Community of Oregon); John Tesshin Sanderson, Mexico; Alfred Jitsudo Ancheta, California; Charles Tenshin Fletcher (Zen Mountain Center, Mexico); Nicolee Jikyo Miller (Three Treasures Zen Community); William Nyogen Yeo, California; and Charlotte Joko Beck (Ordinary Mind Zen School). Honorary members include Kojun Kuroda, Koshinji, Japan; Takeshi Kuroda, Zenkoji, Japan; and Junyu Kuroda, Kirigayaji, Japan. Dennis Genpo Merzel currently serves as spiritual leader and president of the White Plum Asanga.

Address:

White Plum Asanga
Zen Mountain Monastery
P.O. Box 197
South Plank Rd.
Mt. Tremper, NY 12457
<http://www.mro.org/zmm/white-plum.shtml>

Wiccan Religion

The Wiccan religion is a worldwide nature religion with roots in the ancient past and contemporary times. Also known as Wicca, the Old Religion, the Craft, and Witchcraft, it incorporates revivals, adaptations, and continuations of ancient folkways, symbology, and spiritual practices from old pagan Europe and the classical civilizations of Greece, Rome, Egypt, and Mesopotamia. These include the ritual kindling of bonfires; celebrations of transition points in the cycles of nature; ecstatic dance and trance; use of intuitive perception and imaginal intention (magic); and developing and sustaining spiritual relationships with animals, plants, places, ancestors, and other forms of the Divine. In the twentieth century, several major influences converged to shape the Wiccan religion into its twenty-first-century form. These include the writings and teachings of Gerald Gardner (1884–1964) and Doreen Valiente (1922–1999), which emerged in 1950s England and were taken to the United States in 1962 by Raymond Buckland (b. 1934); the back-to-nature counterculture movement of the 1960s United States; and the rise of feminist spirituality worldwide in the 1970s, inspired by the works of Merlin Stone (b. 1931), Z. Budapest (b. 1940), Margot Adler (b. 1946), Marion Weinstein (b. 1939), Starhawk (b. 1951), and others. In the late twentieth century, the Wiccan religion and related forms of contemporary paganism grew exponentially both in number of practitioners and in diversity of forms, not only throughout the United States, Canada, and Europe but also in many other parts of the world, such as Australia, New Zealand, South Africa, Brazil, and Japan. Contributing to this growth has been the emergence of multitrade and international gatherings, networking periodicals, and information exchange through the Internet.

Although the word Wicca is sometimes used as a synonym for GARDNERIAN WICCA and forms directly derived from it, increasingly it is more typically used to include the wider range of Wiccan paths that now exists. Some practitioners call themselves “witches,” but others have abandoned that appellation because of its history of diverse and contradictory connotations. The Wiccan religion does not involve devil worship or malevolent practices. Across the many forms of the Wiccan religion, some commonalities are widespread, such as the spiritual practice of celebrating the new and full moons and the cycle of sun and seasons. The spiritual calendar, called the Wheel of the Year, consists of eight sabbats, or sacred festival times—the solstices and equinoxes and the midpoints between. These seasonal midpoints or cross quarters are also known as the Celtic Fire Festivals; they are Samhain (in mid-fall), Imbolc (winter), Beltane (spring), and Lughnassad (summer). Also widespread are Wiccan spiritual principles, which include the following: (1) Honor the Divine, understanding It as immanent and transcendent, as well as both multifaceted and as a united, interconnected whole; (2) Live life with consideration of others as well as oneself, endeavoring to be of service and to do no harm; and (3) Celebrate and attune to nature and nature’s rhythms, understanding this as central to Divine understanding and worship. Wiccans across traditions also cultivate virtues, including integrity, honesty, reliability, responsibility, balance, perseverance, empathy, kindness, compassion, knowledge, service, and freedom. In addition, Wiccans seek to live with balance and moderation, such as balancing intellect and intuition in cognitive processing; work and rest in daily life; time with others and time alone. Furthermore, Wiccans seek to cultivate good communication and healthy relationships with family, friends, community, and the greater Circle of Life of All Nature.

“The Divine” is a gender-neutral term that can be used to refer to what is known in other religions as “God” (Christianity, Judaism), “Allah” (Islam), “Tao” (Taoism), and “Great Spirit” (Native American religions). Since the Divine is viewed in many Wiccan traditions as both immanent (indwelling) and as transcendent (beyond the limits of humanness), Wiccan spiritual philosophy is pantheistic. In that the Divine is viewed as a Great Unity, spiritual philosophy has a monotheistic dimension. The Divine is also viewed as multifaceted. In many traditions, the Divine is honored as both Mother Goddess and Father God, as well as Their Unity, also known as the “Great Mystery.” In addition, The Goddess and The God have many sacred forms or aspects, such as the Triple Goddess in the forms of Maiden, Mother, and Crone, and the Dual God, symbolically represented by the sacred Oak (waxing sun) and sacred Holly (waning sun). The Divine also is acknowledged as manifest through the five elements of nature (earth, air, fire, water, and spirit). As with most other nature religions, spiritual philosophy also is animistic, in that the Divine takes the form of a spiritual dimension not only within living humans (higher power or inner self) but also within ancestors, animals, plants, places, and all things. Attunement to and communion with nature are central to spiritual philosophy and practice. Humans are viewed as part of nature, not as dominators or as owners of nature.

The predominant ritual and social space arrangement for Wiccans is the circle. As in ancient times, the circle represents many concepts, including wholeness, balance, the cycles of nature, continuity, partnership, and interconnectedness. The circle is used by individuals in personal rituals as well as by groups for rituals and festivals. The circle facilitates shared experience and encourages participation. Although classified by some as a new religious movement, because it gained visibility and growth in the twentieth century, Wicca and related forms of contemporary paganism do not fit neatly into the profile of the majority of new religious movements. Wicca is very decentralized, and thus it differs from those many new religions that typically center around the authority and teachings of a particular charismatic religious leader. The Wiccan religion and contemporary paganism are nature-centered and with an emphasis on direct personal experience rather than being of “the book” or adhering to a specific, detailed, structured worldview, as revealed to a prophet or teacher. Wicca and paganism are best grouped with other nature religions, sometimes called primal or oral religions, that encompass animistic worldviews, shamanic spiritual practices, and celebrations of the cycles of nature. The Wiccan community overlaps with the related traditions of GODDESS SPIRITUALITY and DRUIDISM.

Selena Fox

Sources:

- Adler, Margot. Drawing Down the Moon. Boston: Beacon, 1997.
- Buckland, Raymond. Buckland's Complete Book of Witchcraft. St. Paul, MN: Llewellyn, 1997.
- Clifton, Chas. Witchcraft Today. 3 vols. St. Paul, MN: Llewellyn, 1992–1994.
- Cunningham, Scott. Wicca: A Guide for the Solitary Practitioner. St. Paul, MN: Llewellyn, 1988.
- Curott, Phyllis. Witchcrafting: A Spiritual Guide to Making Magic. New York: Broadway, 2001.
- Fox, Selena, Dennis Carpenter, and Theresa Berrie. Circle Guide to Pagan Groups. Mt. Horeb, WI: Circle, 2001.
- Guiley, Rosemary Ellen. The Encyclopedia of Witches and Witchcraft. New York: Checkmark/Facts on File, 1999.
- Melton, J. Gordon, and Isotta Poggi. Magic, Witchcraft and Paganism in America: A Bibliography. New York: Garland, 1992.
- Starhawk. The Spiral Dance. Rev. ed. San Francisco: Harper and Row, 1999.
- Valiente, Doreen. The Rebirth of Witchcraft. London: Robert Hale, 1989.

Wisconsin Evangelical Lutheran Synod

The Wisconsin Evangelical Lutheran Synod, one of the more conservative Lutheran bodies, began with the arrival of German-speaking immigrants in the American Midwest in the 1840s. They appealed to their homeland for ministerial oversight, and several mission societies (Berlin, Basel) responded. An original Wisconsin synod was organized in 1850 with John Muelhaeser (1803–1867), pastor of the Salem Evangelical Lutheran Church in Milwaukee, Wisconsin, as its first president. Increasingly over the years, the synod moved toward an emphasis upon doctrinal conservatism and became aligned with the LUTHERAN CHURCH—MISSOURI SYNOD.

A similar beginning also occurred in Minnesota, under the leadership of Christian Frederick Heyer (1793–1873), formerly a missionary in India, and Eric Norelius (1833–1916), a Swedish Lutheran pastor. A third such effort arose in 1840 in Michigan, where a synod was organized by Stephan Koehler and Christoph Eberhardt. The Michigan

Synod eventually affiliated with the General Synod, the large Lutheran body that became the core of the Lutheran unity movement in America that is now embodied in the EVANGELICAL LUTHERAN CHURCH IN AMERICA. In 1968 it withdrew, however, a move reflective of its growing conservatism.

In 1872 the Wisconsin and Missouri synods formed the Synodical Conference, an association of conservative Lutheran synods. Eventually the Michigan and Minnesota synods also joined. In 1892 the Wisconsin, Michigan, and Minnesota synods federated to form the Evangelical Joint Synod of Wisconsin, Minnesota, and Michigan. A more formal merger occurred in 1917 with the formation of the Evangelical Lutheran Joint Synod of Wisconsin and Other States. That body changed its name to Wisconsin Evangelical Lutheran Synod in 1959.

The Wisconsin Synod represents the most conservative extreme of Lutheranism in North America. It withdrew from its association with the Missouri Synod through the Synodical Conference in 1963. It follows the unaltered Augsburg Confession and holds to the position that it cannot adopt formal relations with other churches unless full doctrinal agreement is reached. This position has kept the church out of ecumenical bodies, though it has relations with a similar conservative Confessional Lutheran Church in Finland, Sweden, and Norway.

Through the twentieth century the church has built a world mission program, beginning with evangelism among the Apache people in Arizona, and currently it has affiliated congregations in Puerto Rico, Mexico, Colombia, Zambia, Malawi, Taiwan, Hong Kong, and Indonesia. It also supports missionaries in India, Nigeria, and Cameroon.

The Wisconsin Evangelical Lutheran Church in 1996 reported 413,000 members in the United States (and an additional 30,000 members in other countries) in 1,235 churches. It sponsors two colleges and a seminary in the United States.

Address:

Wisconsin Evangelical Lutheran Church
2929 N. Mayfair Rd.
Milwaukee, WI 53222
<http://www.wels.net/>

Sources:

- Continuing in the Word*. Milwaukee, WI: Northwestern, 1951.
- Fredrich, Edward C. The Wisconsin Synod Lutherans: A History of the Single Synod, Federation & Merger. Milwaukee, WI: Northwestern Publishing House, 1992.

Witchcraft

See Wiccan Religion

Won Buddhism (Won Pulgyo)

Won Buddhism was founded in 1916 by Pak Chungbin (1891–1943), who is better known by his literary name, Sot'aesan. Sot'aesan was aware of the three traditional religions of East Asia—Confucianism, Daoism, and Buddhism—yet he felt that his enlightenment experience was independent of any tradition. Nevertheless, upon further inquiry he realized that all of the ancient sages had known that to which he had awakened, and, after reading the Diamond Sutra, he declared that the vehicle of Buddhism was the best for elucidating his vision of ultimate truth.

Studies on Won Buddhism are based on The Canon of Won Buddhism (Won Pulgyo kyojon), which contains two books: the Principle Book (Chongjon), composed by Sot'aesan, and the Records (Taejonggyong), a chronicle of his sayings and doings. The next important book of the tradition is the Religious Discourses of Master Chongsan (Chongsan Chongsa Pobo), the words of Sot'aesan's successor, Song Kyu (1900–1962), the first prime master of Won Buddhism. These books express the religious vision articulated by these two leaders. Sot'aesan represented his enlightened vision of ultimate reality in a perfect circle, known as the One-Circle-Figure (Irwonsang), which he equated to the concept of Dharmakaya (the body of the law or teaching) of conventional Buddhism. No images of Buddha are found in Won Buddhist temples; instead, “four graces” are viewed as the incarnations of the Dharmakaya Buddha: Heaven and Earth, Parents, Brethren (fellow creatures), and Law (religious, moral, and civil). Won Buddhism rejects the traditional concept of deliverance or liberation from the world as nihilistic; instead, it tries to realize a paradise on earth by helping people to develop their own abilities, wisdom, education, and altruism. The path to achieving the ideal of enlightenment as expressed in the One-Circle-Figure is the “Threefold Learning.” In conventional Buddhism these three are known by the Sanskrit terms samadhi (meditation), prajna (wisdom), and sila (morality). Sot'aesan recasts these in modern language as the “cultivation of spirit,” “study of facts and principles,” and “choice of conduct.” Religious practice in Won Buddhism consists of worship of the One-Circle-Figure in the place of images of Buddha, recitation of the name of the Buddha Amitabha, seated meditation, repentance and prayer, and scripture study.

Won Buddhism operates a number of branch temples and other organizational establishments in Japan and the United States. One such institution is Wonkwang University, which has a College of Won Buddhist Studies in which Won Buddhist priests, educators, and other leaders are educated in both undergraduate and graduate programs. Religious tracts and philosophical treatises are published by the faculty and research institute of the university, usually in Korean, although Won Buddhist scholars also publish in Western languages in a journal called Won Buddhism. As of 1997, the religion operated fourteen parishes in Korea and overseas and 433 temples that serve 1,276,607 members. These are serviced by 10,192 religious workers (1,640 monastics and 8,552 married religious specialists).

Address:

Won Pulgyo
Sinyong-dong 344–2
Iri-si, Cholla Pukto, 570–754
Republic of Korea
<http://www.wonbuddhism.co.kr>

Richard D. McBride

Sources:

- Chung Bong-Kil. The Sacred Books of Won Buddhism. Classics of East Asian Buddhism, Vol. 6. Honolulu: University of Hawaii Press, 2001.
- . “What Is Won Buddhism?” Korea Journal 24, 5 (May 1984): 18–32.
- Kim Bokin. “Sot'aesan and the Reformation of Korean Buddhism.” Korean Studies 19 (1995): 51–61.
- Park Kwangsoo. The Won Buddhism (Wonbulgyo) of Sot'aesan: A Twentieth Century Religious Movement in Korea. San Francisco: International Scholars, 1997.

Word of Life Church [Kale Heywet]

The Word of Life Church grew out of the efforts initiated by the Sudan Interior Mission (SIM) in 1927. The mission had begun in 1893 with a vision to evangelize the Sudan, but it was slowed by the African climate, which led to the deaths of two of the founders and the retreat from Africa by the third. Eventually work would be established in several African nations other than the Sudan (Nigeria and Niger) before the Sudan was reached.

In the 1920s the Presbyterians established a mission in Ethiopia. Among its leaders was Dr. Thomas A. Lambie, who founded the Presbyterian hospital in Addis Ababa in 1923. Several years later he began an independent Abyssinian Frontiers Mission, which in 1927 merged with the Sudan Interior Mission. The mission grew slowly and had fewer than one hundred baptized converts over the next decade. After the Italians occupied the country, foreign missionaries were kicked out (which became the occasion of SIM missionaries finally establishing work in the Sudan). When they returned in 1941, they discovered that the church had expanded dramatically. There were 20,000 members in some one hundred congregations.

The church continued to grow, reaching 100,000 members by 1960 and 500,000 by 1974, by which time it had taken the name Kale Heywet (Word of Life) Church. This progress is attributed to its being a truly indigenous church that has developed its own missionary society, which has targeted the different peoples of Ethiopia. The church has also developed a literacy program for the poverty-stricken country, and in the 1990s it cooperated with the Baptist General Conference in developing a program of famine relief.

World Alliance of Reformed Churches

The church follows a conservative Evangelical Christianity. At the beginning of the new century, it had more than two million members. It has developed an extensive educational system and medical ministry.

Sources:

"The History of SIM." Posted at <http://www.sim.org/international/history.html>.

Kane, J. Herbert. A Global View of Christian Missions. Grand Rapids, MI: Baker, 1971.

Address:

World Alliance of Reformed Churches
150 route de Ferney
P.O. Box 2100
1211 Geneva 2
Switzerland
<http://www.warc.ch/>

Source:

Bauswein, Jean-Jacques, and Lukas Vischer, eds. The Reformed Family Worldwide: A Survey of Reformed Churches, Theological Schools, and International Organizations. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans, 1999.

World Alliance of Reformed Churches

The World Alliance of Reformed Churches was formed in 1970 in Nairobi, Kenya, by the merger of the Alliance of the Reformed Churches throughout the World Holding the Presbyterian Order and the International Congregational Council. The Alliance of Reformed Churches was founded in 1875 in London, England, as an association of Reformed and Presbyterian church leaders. It was designed to facilitate cooperation and common action, especially in the mission field. The fellowship gradually grew to include members from the European continent. In 1946 the alliance, originally headquartered in Edinburgh, Scotland, moved to Geneva, Switzerland, in anticipation of the formation of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES (WCC). It self-consciously decided to make no moves that could be just as easily accomplished through the WCC.

The International Congregational Council was founded in 1892 for purposes similar to those of the Reformed Alliance. In the ecumenical atmosphere during the years following the formation of the WCC, the mutual affirmation of a Reformed theological perspective drew the two organizations together.

The alliance carries out theological dialogues, promotes programs of mutual cooperation between member churches, and sponsors a program of publications led by its periodical, The Reformed World. It has a history of witnessing against racism and in the promotion of human rights. In the 1980s it experienced particular concern over the apartheid policies of South Africa and the role of some Reformed churches' support of it. In 1982 the alliance suspended the membership of two South African Reformed bodies until they brought their policies in line with the alliance's antiapartheid stance. One church left the alliance, the other remained in association and was received back into full membership in 1997.

At its meeting in Debrecen, Hungary, in 1997, the alliance reported 211 member churches. The increase from the 49 churches originally represented in the alliance is largely accounted for by the maturing of numerous former mission churches into independent national churches.

World Brotherhood Union Mevlana Supreme Foundation

The World Brotherhood Union Mevlana Supreme Foundation was founded in Istanbul, Turkey, in 1986 to teach the channeled work of the Celestial Totality (a ranked hierarchy similar to the GREAT WHITE BROTHERHOOD of the theological tradition). Mevlana, the foundation's founder, who is called the pen of the Golden Age, is responsible for channeling the organization's sacred scriptures, particularly the Knowledge Book. Mevlana, through what her group calls "reverse transfer" (this organization's term for reincarnation), has returned to the earth in order to serve the divine purpose of the World Brotherhood Union (WBU). The WBU purports the Knowledge Book to contain the spiritual manifesto essential for personal and planetary transformation in the new millennium. The years from 2000 to 2005 are noted as foundational years, heralding a future Golden Age in which everyone attains Universal Consciousness. The WBU teaches that two UFOs are stationed above the earth to monitor and police the activities of the people of the planet. Should human behavior err beyond the parameters set by the WBU a galactic military force based on the UFOs will intercede to reshape the destructive behavior according to the Divine Plan. They believe their plan to be based on goodwill, self-sacrifice, capacity, and consciousness.

The WBU proselytizes in people's homes. A group leader who receives special spiritual messages calls six friends who meet at her home and write down, date, and sign her unique messages, which are given to another six, and so forth. The WBU claims to unite feminist and egalitarian principles and teaches that the earth is the only planet in the solar system on which discrimination between the sexes exists. Paradoxically, the specific messages to Mevlana are sent by Mustafa Molla and a Captain Riviere. Mohammed Mustafa is the messenger of Allah, and Kurtairce is the Savior or Jesus figure; both dwell with Buddha in the Celestial Totality—while touting equality, the ruling aristocracy is male.

By acknowledging the Qur'an as one of a number of sacred texts and Mohammad as a messenger of this particular sacred text, the WBU courts an Islamic population. However, the WBU should not be considered an Islamic revitalization movement, as it has only a cursory link with Islam. It has received its major inspiration from Theosophy and the Western esoteric tradition, which it has synthesized with a unique Turkish twist. Thus the WBU integrates Theosophy with beliefs about UFOs and flying saucers in a concerted attempt to wed science and religion in a sophisticated, technological way. Because of the secrecy of this group, no accurate data exist for the number of its adherents.

Address:

World Brotherhood Union Mevlana Supreme Foundation
Catalcesme Baggat Caddesi Ahmet Cevdet Pasa Sokak
No. 1/6
81110 Bostanci-Kadikoy
Istanbul
Turkey
<http://www.dkb-mevlana.org.tr>

Gail M. Harley

Source:

Harley, Gail M. "From Turbans to the Tarot: Radical Religious Trends in Modern Turkey." Unpublished paper, 1998. Copy in files of the American Religions Collection, Davidson Library, University of California-Santa Barbara.

World Buddhist Sangha Council

The World Buddhist Sangha Council (WBSC) was founded in Colombo, Sri Lanka, in 1966 as an expression of the international Buddhist Sangha (community). Within Buddhism, Sangha refers to two distinct phenomena, the Savaka-Sangha, or the community of (noble) disciples (the larger community of all believers), and, more narrowly, the Bhikkhu-Sangha, or the community of Bhikkhus (monks). This latter grouping, especially prominent in THERAVADA Buddhist groups, is also referred to as the Sammati-Sangha, or the conventional Sangha. The World Buddhist Sangha Council is organized around the Sangha in the more narrow sense of that term, as an association of Buddhist monks and clergy. In Theravada thinking, monks serve as the core and leading part of the larger Buddhist lay community. They attempt to lead exemplary and noble lives and thus exercise influence on the people in treading the noble eight-fold path. The Bhikkhu-Sangha also serves as the center for training both those who join it and the lay community.

The WBSC gathers in a general assembly at five-year intervals. The assembly selects an executive council that meets annually to carry on the assembly's business between the larger meetings. As the new century begins, the executive council includes some 149 members drawn from all the major schools of Buddhism. The Most Ven. Wu Ming of the Republic of China (Taiwan) and the Most Ven. Kok Kwong of Honmg Kong have been named the "life long honorable president" and vice president, respectively.

The WBSC has its headquarters in Taiwan. WBSC members come not only from the traditionally Buddhist countries but also from Buddhist communities around the world, especially North America and Europe.

The council has taken stands on a variety of social issues, beginning with the Vietnam War. In more recent years it has encouraged the development of Buddhist education, especially for leadership training. It has argued for a consensus Buddhism representative of mainline Theravada and MAHAYANA Buddhist traditions. This perspective was noted in a 1995 declaration which stated that "fanatic elements are to be found even in the modern world who proclaim that they are the living Buddhas. Therefore, we solemnly declare that these wrong views expressed by certain elements of the Buddhist community will not be approved by the WBSC. The Buddha once admonished the disciples that even though they have cultivated the stage of obtaining supernormal power, they should not perform miracles leading to the misunderstanding of the path shown by the Buddha. In this context, we, the WBSC, appeal to the world not to be misled by such modern elements in the name of Buddhism. We hereby declare that the whole members of the Sangha should abide by and uphold the authentic teachings of the Buddha for the betterment of mankind." This stance can be seen as posing opposition to Tibetan Buddhists, who recognize various leaders as a living Buddha, or Rinpoche (and no Tibetan Buddhists are a part of the Sangha Council), but would equally apply to the leader of the controversial FALUN GONG groups, whose leader, Li Hongzhi, is seen as a Living Buddha.

Address:

<http://www.jsf.090.net/>

Source:

Payutto, Ajahn Prayudh. "Sangha: The Ideal World Community." Posted at <http://www.saigon.com/~anson/ebud/ebdha062.htm>. Accessed October 1, 2001.

World Conference on Religion and Peace

The World Conference on Religion and Peace (WCRP) is an international organization that attempts to bring religious resources and religious leadership to bear in interfaith attempts to create world peace. WCRP dates to the Cuban Missile Crisis of 1962, during which time the United States and the Soviet Union stood on the brink of war. At that time, Dr. Dana McLean Greeley, a leader with the Unitarian-Universalist Association, called together Rabbi Maurice N. Eisendrath, Methodist bishop John Wesley Lord, and Roman Catholic bishop John Wright. Their informal meeting led to an initial conference on religion and peace in 1964 in New York City and a national Inter-Religious Conference on World Peace in Washington, D.C. Following that conference two representatives of the national conference made a world tour to assess the global situation and build a network of interested leaders.

The first World Conference on Religion and Peace met at Kyoto, Japan, in 1970. The WCRP was formally established at that time. In 1973, WCRP was granted consultative status with the Economic and Social Council of the United Nations. In the subsequent quarter-century of its existence, WCRP has created a variety of programs and responses to the changing world situation and shifting global hotspots. In 1970 it created the WCRP International Coordinating Committee for Women. A decade-long concern for children caught in war led to its sponsorship of the 1995 religious participation in the UN's study entitled "The Impact of Armed Conflict on Children."

The program is carried out through regional structures in Europe, Asia, and Africa, as well as chapters in some forty countries. World assemblies are held every five years.

Address:

World Conference on Religion and Peace
777 UN Plaza, 9th Floor
New York, NY 10017
<http://www.wcrp.org/>

Sources:

- Braybrook, Marcus. Inter-Faith Organizations, 1893–1979: An Historical Directory. New York: Edwin Mellen, 1980.
- Jack, Homer. WCRP: A History of the World Conference on Religion and Peace. New York: World Conference on Religion and Peace, 1993.
- World Conference on Religion and Peace. Religions for Peace: Action for Common Living. Maryknoll, NY: Orbis, 2000.

World Congress of Faiths

The World Congress of Faiths, one of the oldest interfaith organizations in existence as the twenty-first century began, traces its beginning to the 1893 World Parliament of Religions and the series of interfaith conferences and organizations inspired by it. Especially important was the Religions of the Empire Conference, held in London in 1924, which brought to the fore Francis Younghusband (1863–1942). As a young man he had developed a mystical view of religion and come to believe that the Divine Spirit is latent in all people—that they are children of the same Father, and that people should nurture and develop the Divine Flame. His conclusions were confirmed in a vivid religious experience he had in Tibet in 1903.

Out of his experience, Younghusband began to work for a congress of faiths at which he could share his vision of the unity of religions. He helped to plan the Religions of the Empire Conference, chaired a committee of the Society for the Study of Religions that grew out of it, and later spoke at the World Fellowship of Faiths Conference in 1933 in Chicago. From the Chicago conference, he returned to London and in 1934 established the British National Council of the World Fellowship of Faiths. He also proposed a Congress of Faiths, which convened in London in 1936, notable for its allowing actual discussion between the participants, and not just the giving of lectures. In spite of Younghusband's own beliefs, the congress reached the opinion that the desirable end of their activity was the spread of understanding and a sense of unity between different religious communions.

Following the congress a continuing committee was set up as the World Congress of Faiths (Continuation Movement). Subsequent conferences were held in 1937, 1938, and 1939. Then its work was curtailed by World War II. Younghusband died in 1942. The congress moved forward through the succeeding decades, largely on the shoulders of a few people dedicated to interfaith activity and often in the face of many Christians who felt that interfaith commitments called into question the truth claims of Christianity. In 1949 a journal, World Faiths (now World Faiths Encounter), was begun, currently the oldest interfaith periodical in circulation. During the last decades of the twentieth century, the successes of the congress were in large part the result of the long tenure of their general director, Marcus Braybrook, an Anglican priest who also served as editor for World Faiths.

In 1993, in cooperation with the INTERNATIONAL ASSOCIATION FOR RELIGIOUS FREEDOM and Westminster College, Oxford, the World Congress was able to put together an endowment for the International Interfaith Centre, inaugurated in Oxford on December 6, 1993. In part inspired by the centennial of the World's Parliament of Religions, and a perception of an increasing amount and variety of interfaith activity around the world, leaders of the congress came to believe that a need existed for an international interfaith center that was informed about interfaith work globally and could offer encouragement to continuing interfaith understanding and cooperation.

Addresses:

World Congress of Faiths
2 Market St.
Oxford OX1 3EF
United Kingdom
<http://www.worldfaiths.org/>

International Interfaith Centre
<http://www.interfaith-center.org/>

Sources:

- Braybrook, Marcus. Inter-Faith Organizations, 1893–1979: An Historical Directory. New York: Edwin Mellen, 1980.

———. Wider Vision: A History of the World Congress of Faiths. Oxford: Oneworld, 1996.

World Convention of Churches of Christ

The World Convention grew out of an attempt to revive the fellowship that had been broken between the various segments of the Restoration movement that had begun around the revivalistic efforts of Barton Stone (1772–1844), Thomas Campbell (1763–1854), Alexander Campbell (1788–1866), Walter Scott (1796–1861), and others during the first decades of the nineteenth century. Most of the leaders had formerly been ministers in Presbyterian and Baptist churches. As the movement grew over the century, it also developed some differences, primarily concerning the development of structures serving the larger community of congregations. One wing of the movement remains fiercely congregational, and rejects any structures tending toward denominational structures. These differences led to the formation of three separate fellowships, the CHRISTIAN CHURCH (DISCIPLES OF CHRIST), the CHRISTIAN CHURCHES AND CHURCHES OF CHRIST, and the CHURCHES OF CHRIST (NON-INSTRUMENTAL).

In spite of their differences, the three bodies share a number of agreed upon principles, ten of which stand out: (1) a concern for Christian unity, (2) a commitment to evangelism and mission, (3) an emphasis on the centrality of the New Testament, (4) a simple Confession of Faith, (5) believers' baptism, (6) weekly communion, (7) a biblical name, (8) congregational autonomy, (9) lay leadership, and (10) diversity/freedom/liberty.

An initial attempt to bridge the divisive forces in the Restoration movement culminated in the first meeting of the World Convention of Churches of Christ in 1930. The convention met periodically through the twentieth century. The sixteenth convention is scheduled for Brighton, England, in 2004. The convention unites congregations in more than 165 countries that have their heritage in the nineteenth-century Restoration movement. The convention is primarily for fellowship, the tradition being opposed to pan-congregational structures.

Address:

World Convention of Churches of Christ
1101 19th Ave. S.
Nashville, TN 37212–2196
<http://users.aol.com/worldconv/>

Source:

World Convention of Churches of Christ. Posted at <http://users.aol.com/worldconv/>. Accessed November 25, 2001.

World Council of Biblical Churches

The World Council of Biblical Churches is an international association of separatist fundamentalist Christian denominations. It was organized in 1987, originally taking the name Council of Bible Believing Churches International, following the break between the American Council of Christian Churches (ACCC) and the INTERNATIONAL COUNCIL OF CHRISTIAN CHURCHES (ICCC). In the 1930s, the more conservative wing of U.S. Protestantism, known as fundamentalists, split into two factions. One, the Evangelicals, agreed to work with conservative colleagues who remained within the larger liberal Protestant church bodies. The other faction, the fundamentalists, demanded that their colleagues completely renounce and separate from the larger Protestant groups, which they believed had become apostate. Under the leadership of Presbyterian minister Carl McIntire (b. 1906), the fundamentalists founded the ACCC.

In 1948, occasioned by the founding of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES, McIntire called together conservative church leaders from around the world to form the ICCC. From 1948 to 1969 the two organizations worked together, but then in 1969, the ACCC removed Dr. Carl McIntire from its board. In the ensuing controversy, the ICCC sided with McIntire, and the two organizations discontinued their relationship.

For the next few years, the ACCC operated without an international affiliate, but in 1987 it led in the founding of the Council of Bible Believing Churches International. The council sees itself primarily as an issue-oriented body designed to address with a united voice the primary topics facing fundamentalist Christians globally.

As a fundamentalist organization, the council affirms the infallibility and inerrancy of the Bible and the importance of complete separation from heresy and apostasy. The World Council of Churches and its member churches are viewed as heretical organizations. The council also opposes all accommodation to "Romanism, Ecumenism, Materialism, Communism," and any other movement or group that teaches anything contrary to sound doctrine.

Members of the council cannot be associated in any manner with the World Council of Churches or any of its affiliates; the WORLD EVANGELICAL ALLIANCE or any of its affiliates; or the ICCC or any of its affiliates. The council also opposes the modern Pentecostal/Charismatic movement. Between gatherings, the World Council of Biblical Churches is headed by an executive committee consisting of representatives from each member body.

Address:

World Council of Biblical Churches
625 E. 4th St.
P.O. Box 5455
Bethlehem, PA 18015

Source:

Falwell, Jerry. The Fundamentalist Phenomenon. Garden City, NY: Doubleday, 1981.

World Council of Churches

The World Council of Churches (WCC) is the primary organizational expression of the twentieth-century ecumenical movement within the Christian community. Beginning in the nineteenth century and continuing through the first half of the twentieth, Protestant Christian leaders from around the world voiced their concern that the splintering of the Protestant movement into hundreds of denominations was a scandal to the church. They called for new organized expressions of Christian unity. Such expressions began with agreements to stop direct competition on the mission field, and it grew into major conferences that focused issues around broad areas of Faith and Order (theological and ecclesiastical issues) and of Life and Work (the mission and activity of the church in the world).

Three important organizations operated through the early twentieth century—the Universal Christian Council of Life and Work, the Continuation Committee of the World Conference on Faith and Order, and the International Missionary Movement. In 1933 prominent U.S. theologian William Adams Brown suggested to Archbishop William Temple of the CHURCH OF ENGLAND that these three organizations enter into conversations with the World Alliance for International Friendship and the Student Christian Movement about a common future. From conversations initiated by Temple, a proposal to form a World Council of Churches was promulgated in 1937. Work on the constitution began the next year.

Slowed by World War II, the council was not inaugurated until 1948, when delegates from a variety of Protestant and Orthodox bodies gathered in Amsterdam. Its formation was opposed by a small group of the more fundamentalist churches, which that same year formed the INTERNATIONAL COUNCIL OF CHRISTIAN CHURCHES (ICCC). The ICCC should not be confused with the World Council.

The World Council has served as a fellowship of most of the larger Protestant and Orthodox Christian churches in the world. During the decades of its existence, it has assisted the process by which its North American and European members have granted autonomy to former mission churches around the world, and the council's membership has grown considerably as it has welcomed these churches into its midst. Through the 1990s, the Orthodox churches have made their presence known in their dissent from the thrust of various council activities centered on theological and liturgical innovation and involvement in controversial social programs. In the late 1990s, several of the more conservative Orthodox churches resigned from the council, and others have threatened to resign.

The work of the World Council is carried out through the meetings of its general assembly and a program centered on the international headquarters in Switzerland. There are four internal administrative groupings, with a focus upon Issues and Themes; Relationships; Communication; and Finance, Services, and Administration. None operate as self-contained entities, working instead in an interdependent relationship with all the others. The council has specialized in dialogue, which it promotes at all levels. The work of the council is extended by the efforts of a variety of regional, national, and local church councils, as well as the efforts of structures that promote dialogue and cooperation within a single Christian family, such as the WORLD METHODIST COUNCIL and the ANGLICAN COMMUNION. The WORLD ALLIANCE OF REFORMED CHURCHES, the ECUMENICAL PATRIARCHATE, and the LUTHERAN WORLD FEDERATION have their offices in the same building that houses the World Council.

As of 2001, the World Council of Churches included more than 340 member churches based in some 120 countries. The council has a special status for affiliated regional and national councils of churches, and for the organizations representing the various World Christian communions. Its Internet sites contain the Internet addresses of its member churches and affiliated organizations.

The council describes itself as “a fellowship of churches that confess the Lord Jesus Christ as God and Savior according to the scriptures and therefore seek to fulfill together their common calling to the glory of the one God, Father, Son and Holy Spirit.” This wording has been accepted as a bridge to the council's primary function of bringing Christians of different persuasions into dialogue. It provides a basis for agreement without making the arena so narrow as to exclude churches that do not affirm particular items of traditional orthodox Christianity. Because of its relative openness, it has been accused by more conservative believers of being open to liberal and heretical views, and, increasingly, conservative churches have refused to participate in its programs. The primary alternative to the World Council of Churches has been provided by the WORLD EVANGELICAL ALLIANCE, which, through the 1980s and 1990s, has established a set of regional and national councils of conservative churches and missionary agencies that parallels that of the WCC.

Most of the churches of the Anglican, Lutheran, Reformed/Presbyterian, Congregationalist, Methodist, and Orthodox traditions are members, while a relatively small number of Baptist, Holiness, and Pentecostal bodies are related. Although the ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH (RCC) is not a member, there are close links with it. The WCC/RCC joint working group meets annually, and the WCC Faith and Order Commission includes Roman Catholics who are members with full voting rights. The council has built cordial relationships with the Pontifical Council for Promoting Christian Unity, the primary structure growing out of Vatican II to conduct ecumenical dialogue by the Roman Catholic Church. The council conducts dialogue with leaders of the other major religious traditions through its Office for Inter-religious Relations.

Address:

World Council of Churches
P.O. Box 2100
150 route de Ferney
1211 Geneva 2
Switzerland
<http://www.wcc-coe.org>

Sources:

- Kinnamon, Michael, and Brian Cope, eds. The Ecumenical Movement: An Anthology of Key Texts and Voices. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 1997.
- Raiser, Conrad. To Be the Church: Challenges and Hopes for a New Millennium. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 1997.
- Van der Bent, Ans J., ed. Handbook of Member Churches: World Council of Churches. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 1982.
- Yearbook*. Geneva: World Council of Churches, issued annually.

World Evangelical Alliance

What is now known as the World Evangelical Alliance developed among the new generation of Protestant and Free Church Evangelical Christians following World War II, but it traces its organizational identity to the Evangelical Alliance that formed in England in 1846. The alliance was an early expression of the Christian Ecumenical Movement, an organizational expression of Christian unity. The original gathering, held in London, brought together representatives of some fifty-two denominations from Europe and North America. The delegates had responded to a number of calls for such an alliance that had been issued by Christian leaders for several decades.

The initial organization was seen as an association of individual Christians, rather than a confederation of churches. A doctrinal statement emphasizing both the authority of the Scriptures and the need for individual interpretation was adopted, along with statements on the Trinity, human depravity, and salvation through Jesus Christ. The development of a strong international organization foundered on the question of slavery, still a fact of life in the United States. Thus power was passed to a series of national alliances, the first established in England, Canada, Germany, and Sweden. Indian and Turkish chapters were opened in 1849 and 1855, respectively. No U.S. branch was formed until 1867, after the Civil War had settled the slavery issue.

The European branches of the alliance have continued active. However, the U.S. branch became inactive at the beginning of the twentieth century, and its corporation was formally dissolved in 1944 and its assets turned over to the Federal Council of Churches. Work in America had fallen victim to the fundamentalist-modernist controversy. Out of the controversy, in the early 1940s the more forward-looking among the conservative Evangelicals organized the National Association of Evangelicals.

In the years following World War II, Evangelical leaders began again to look for some kind of international cooperation. Initial contacts resulted in the calling of a meeting to be held at Woudschiten, near Zeist, in The Netherlands, August 5–11, 1951, at which time the World Evangelical Fellowship (WEF) was created. A brief doctrinal statement was adopted and three purposes accepted. The WEF would direct its activities to the furtherance of the Gospel, the defense and confirmation of the Gospel, and fellowship in the Gospel. An initial outreach tour was conducted by several WEF leaders to determine needs within the global Evangelical community. Within the first year, six national Evangelical fellowships had affiliated with WEF—Ceylon (Sri Lanka), Cyprus, Great Britain, India, Japan, and the United States. Six more—Singapore, Hawaii, Switzerland, Germany, France, and Holland—joined at the first meeting in 1952.

The WEF subsequently grew into a worldwide network of more than 120 national/regional Evangelical church alliances, 104 organizational ministries, and 6 specialized ministries. In 2001, the WEF voted to change its name to World Evangelical Alliance. It is headed by an international executive council, whose members are drawn from every region of the world. It operates through seven regional bodies that in turn coordinate the activity of national bodies in their region. The World Evangelical Alliance serves those more conservative Evangelical Christians who do not identify with the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES, whose stance they consider too liberal.

Address:

World Evangelical Alliance
141 Middle Rd.
#05–05 GSM Building
Singapore 188976
<http://www.worldevangelical.org/>

Sources:

- Fuller, W. Harold. People of the Mandate. Carlisle, UK: Paternoster; Grand Rapids, MI: Baker, 1996.
- Howard, David M. The Dream That Would Not Die: The Birth and Growth of the World Evangelical Fellowship, 1846–1986. Exeter, UK: Paternoster, 1986.

World Fellowship of Buddhists

The World Fellowship of Buddhists (WFB) is an international, nongovernmental Buddhist organization, founded on March 25, 1950, and inaugurated at its first general conference in Colombo (Sri Lanka) that same year. This was probably the first time in the history of Buddhism that representatives from nearly every school of Buddhism in the THERAVADA, MAHAYANA, and TIBETAN traditions gathered to share their mutual understanding and Buddhist activities. The respected scholar Dr. G. P. Malalasekera (1899–1973) was the WFB’s first president, from 1950 to 1958.

According to the WFB Constitution, the general conference is to be held once every two years. The president holds office for a term of four years, and his/her country is the place of the organization’s headquarters. Accordingly, the first WFB headquarters was in Colombo. In the time of the WFB’s second president, Hon. U. Chan Htoon (from 1958 to 1961), the headquarters was in Burma. Afterward, all WFB presidents have been Thais, and thus the headquarters is permanently situated in Bangkok, as adopted at the WFB Ninth General Conference in 1969.

The WFB has the following aims and objectives: (1) to promote among the members strict observance and practice of the teachings of the Buddha; (2) to secure unity, solidarity, and brotherhood among Buddhists; (3) to propagate the teachings of the Buddha; (4) to organize and carry on activities in the field of social, educational, cultural, and humanitarian services; and (5) to work for securing peace and harmony among men and happiness for all beings, and to collaborate with other organizations working for the same ends.

Inasmuch as the WFB organization is composed of different Buddhist denominations, all members learn to accept each other’s beliefs, worship, and practices. In the first WFB conference, some significant resolutions were adopted. The Dharmacakra (Wheel of the Law), with eight spokes representing the Noble Eightfold Path, was adopted as the international Buddhist symbol, and the six-colored Buddhist flag, at that time in use in Sri Lanka, was adopted as the international Buddhist flag. The term Hinayana in all contexts was replaced by the term Theravada. In the historical context, there was a stage when the Mahayanists, as a derogatory remark, called some of the earlier Buddhists as the followers of the lesser vehicle (Hinayana) while they believed that they were following the greater vehicle (Mahayana).

The WFB is a traditional rather than a controversial organization. According to its constitution, it refrains from involving itself directly or indirectly in any political activity. Currently, its patrons include, among others, the supreme patriarch of Thailand, the head of the Sri Lankan Sangha, the king of Thailand, the king of Nepal, and the president of the Republic of India.

The organization is led by an elected president and the Office of Bearers (fifteen vice presidents, nine chairpersons of standing committees, an honorary secretary-general, an honorary deputy secretary-general, an honorary assistant secretary-general, and an honorary treasurer). According to the WFB, the duties and responsibilities of standing committees are particularly important and beneficial to all people. For example, the Standing Committee of Publication, Publicity, Education, Culture, and Art can work for the knowledge and peace of Buddhists and non-Buddhists; likewise, the Humanitarian Services Committee.

Nowadays, missions and activities of the WFB are carried on through its 135 regional centers in thirty-seven countries. It maintains consultative status with UNESCO as a Category B nongovernmental organization, to represent the Buddhist point of view on matters relating to education, culture, and communication in UNESCO conferences and meetings. It has also been recognized as a nongovernmental organization (Category I), cooperating with the United Nations in the domains of peace, human rights, and development.

In late 2000, the WFB had 129 representatives from twenty-seven countries in Asia, Europe, and North America (including Hawaii). The true number of members within the WFB is unknown. It covers all Buddhists who join activities of regional centers around the world. The number of delegates and observers who join each WFB general conference is approximately five hundred.

Address:

World Fellowship of Buddhists
616 Benjasiri Park
Soi Medhinivet
Off Soi Sukhumvit 24
Sukhumvit Road
Bangkok 10110
Thailand
<http://www.wfb-hq.org>

Pataraporn Sirikanchana

Sources:

WFB Review 37, 2 (April–June 2000).
The World Fellowship of Buddhists Fortieth Anniversary (1950–1990). Bangkok: World Fellowship of Buddhists Headquarters, 1990.

World Methodist Council

Formed in 1951, the World Methodist Council (WMC) continues the intra-Methodist cooperative activity that began in 1881 with the first Ecumenical Methodist Conference that assembled in London. Attendees at the first conference represented primarily the various North American and British organizations into which the Methodist movement had splintered through the nineteenth century. The ecumenical conferences continued to meet every decade until the 1941 meeting was stopped by World War II. The desire to reunite the several churches into which both the British and Americans had split and the wish of American and British Methodists to keep fraternal relations strong fueled the meetings through the middle of the twentieth century.

Significant changes in world Methodism led to the council's creation. The larger American churches participated in a series of mergers (1939, 1946, and 1968) that led to the creation of the United Methodist Church; similar mergers in England led to the present Methodist Church. The constituent bodies of both churches had created a far-flung international missionary endeavor, and following World War II they began the process by which most of the missions were transformed into autonomous church bodies. This process was recognized in 1951 with the change of name of the Ecumenical Conference to the World Methodist Conference, and the establishment of a permanent secretariat.

In 1953 the council's permanent headquarters was established at the Methodist campground at Lake Junaluska, North Carolina. Elmer T. Clark (1886–1966), the council's first secretary for the Western Hemisphere, took the lead in the construction of the headquarters building and organized the following WMC conferences at Lake Junaluska (1956) and Oslo, Norway (1961). The conferences have continued to meet at five-year intervals.

The program of the WMC includes efforts to support Methodist education, strengthen family life in the various cultures, sponsor worldwide evangelism programs, develop worship and liturgical life in the churches, sponsor youth work, promote Methodist publishing worldwide, and provide an annual program of world exchange of clergy and laity. Through the quinquennial Oxford Institute of Methodist Theological Studies (where the Wesley brothers, George Whitefield, and others met in the earliest Methodist gatherings), WMC facilitates scholarly studies and timely theological reflection.

Between meetings, the work of the council is entrusted to an executive committee and an executive staff headed by the general secretary. At the 2001 meeting, the general secretary, Joe Hale, who had held the post for twenty-five years, retired and was succeeded by the Rev. George Freeman. The Geneva office is currently led by the Rev. Denis Dutton, past bishop of the METHODIST CHURCH OF MALAYSIA. The current chairperson of the World Methodist Council is His Eminence Sunday Mbang of the METHODIST CHURCH NIGERIA. He succeeded Frances Werner Alguire, the first female chairperson. Churches from 108 countries are members of the council.

Address:

World Methodist Council
Lake Junaluska, NC 28745
World Methodist Council
150 Route de Ferney
1211 Geneva 2m
Switzerland

Sources:

Harmon, Nolan B. Encyclopedia of World Methodism. 2 vols. Nashville, TN: United Methodist Publishing House, 1974.

World Methodist Council, Handbook of Information. Lake Junaluska, NC: World Methodist Council, 1997.

World Muslim Congress

The World Muslim Congress (Motamar Al-Alam Al-Islami), the oldest of the several organizations aimed at bringing unity to the Muslim global community, was founded in 1926 at a gathering of Muslim leaders hosted by King Abdul Aziz of Saudi Arabia. At a second gathering, held in Jerusalem in 1931, a constitution with the necessary rule and regulations was adopted for an organization that could promote solidarity among Muslims and cooperation on a global scale. Alhaj Aminul Hussaini, the grand mufti of Palestine, was elected as one of the presidents. In the 1930s the idea of the congress fell by the wayside, but it was revived in the wake of the founding of the nation of Pakistan in 1947. A revived World Muslim Congress met at Karachi, Pakistan, in 1949. At a second meeting, in 1951, the revived organization began to take shape, and permanent headquarters were established in Karachi. Alhaj Aminul Hussaini continued as the organization's president. Proposals were accepted for the development of a World Muslim News Agency and the founding of a bank for the development of the Muslim community internationally.

Of the several Islamic cooperative organizations, such as the Muslim World League, the World Muslim Congress has been the least defined by the political concerns of the Muslim community. This has not, however, kept it from speaking out on various issues of particular concern for Muslims, such as the persecution of Muslims in minority situations, the struggles of Muslims in the Middle East, and, most recently, expressions of solidarity with the Muslims of Bosnia. However, it has shown a particular interest in the religious expression of Islam, and its leaders have attempted to represent Islam in numerous interfaith conferences.

The Congress periodically sponsors international conferences, the most recent of which met in Pakistan in 2000. Dr. Abdullah Bin Omar Nasseef of Saudi Arabia currently serves as president. Mir Nawaz Khan Marwat, the assistant secretary general, is in charge of the office in Karachi. Its work is carried out through a number of regional offices that range from Beijing, China, to South Africa and London. North American offices are located in Miami, Florida. In 1988, Dr. Inamullah Khan, then the secretary general of the Modern World Muslim Congress, was awarded the Templeton Prize for progress in religion.

The congress enjoys consultative status with the United Nations through its Economic and Social Council and UNICEF, and observer status with the Organization of the Islamic Conference.

Address:

World Muslim Congress
9-A, Block-7, Gulshan-e-Iqbal
P.O. Box 5030
University Rd.
Karachi 74000
Pakistan
<http://www.motamaralalamalislami.org/>

Source:

Burdett, Anita L. P. Islamic Movements in the Arab World, 1913–1966. 4 vols. Slough, UK: Archive, 1998.

World Plan Executive Council

The World Plan Executive Council is the major organization behind the spread of the practice of Transcendental Meditation (TM) around the world from its point of origin in India. The practice of TM is generally ascribed to Guru Dev, the teacher of Maharishi Mehesh Yogi, who in turn emerged in 1958 with the mission of telling the world about the benefits of engaging in meditation. Maharishi had spent thirteen years with his teacher prior to his public career.

In 1959, Maharishi made his first world tour during which he introduced TM to the West. He had spectacular success, in part due to the endorsement by several celebrities, most notably the Beatles. In 1972, he announced the World Plan, the overall strategy for spreading TM, and its theoretical base, the Science of Creative Intelligence. Maharishi argues that TM is not a religious practice and that the Science of Creative Intelligence is secular science, not a religious philosophy. Based upon that understanding, the practice of TM has been introduced into many countries with the backing and assistance of secular governments from Zimbabwe to Romania. However, in other places, most notably the United States, it has been seen as a religious activity and government support denied.

TM is a form of japa yoga, a form of meditation used in both the Hindu and Sikh/Sat Mat traditions. Meditation is accompanied with the repetition of a sound constantly repeated silently to oneself. The sound, called a mantra, is given to the person at the time of initiation into the practice. The particular sound is determined by the gender and age of the initiate.

According to the Science of Creative Intelligence, the universe is underlain by an absolute field of pure being—unmanifested and transcendental. Science teaches how to contact this underlying reality, pure being, via meditation. The ultimate goal is God-realization. This Science of Creative Intelligence is seen as the summation of the wisdom of India. A significant amount of research now supports the value of meditation and its healthful effects on the body.

The World Plan Executive Council is structured in a number of divisions. The International Meditation Society introduces the general public to meditation. The Student International Meditation Society focuses on young adults, while the Spiritual Regeneration Movement focuses on older adults. The Foundation for Creative Intelligence works with the business community. Maharishi International University in Fairfield, Iowa, offers a four-year college curriculum with instruction integrated with the practice of TM. The Natural Law Party functions as a new political party that runs candidates for office in those countries where it is allowed to operate. The Maharishi Vedic Approach to Health has introduced a version of the Indian ayurvedic system of medical treatment to the west. The Global Country of World Peace, a nation without borders, approaches the concerns of world peace by focusing upon the divisive influence of nationalism and national borders on human society.

As the new century begins, it is claimed that more than five million people practice TM and many more have been initiated. There are more than forty thousand teachers of TM. TM is now taught in centers throughout the world. The World Plan Executive Council has continually developed new programs to facilitate the permeation of all realms of society with the practice of TM and has developed an extensive Internet presence. The most controversial practices espoused by the council is the TM-Sidhi Program, which claims to teach people to levitate, a practice called yogic flying. The skepticism of such claims, including the accusations of people who took the program and refuted its effectiveness, have undermined the council's credibility in many quarters.

Addresses:

World Plan Executive Council
Administrative Center
Seelisburg
Switzerland
<http://www.tm.org>
<http://www.alltm.org/>

International Association for the Science of Creative Intelligence
Hotel Seeblick
6353
Switzerland

Sources:

Maharishi Mehesh Yogi. The Science of Being and the Art of Living. London: International SRM, 1966.
Mason, Paul. The Maharishi: The Biography of the Man Who Gave Transcendental Meditation to the West. Shaftesbury, Dorset, UK: Element, 1994.
Orme-Johnson, David W., and John T. Farrows, eds. Scientific Research on the Transcendental Meditation Program: Collected Papers I. Seelisburg, Switzerland: Maharishi European Research University Press, 1977.

White, John. Everything You Want to Know about TM, Including How to Do It. New York: Pocket Books, 1976.

World Reformed Fellowship

The World Reformed Fellowship was formed in October 2000 by the merger of two ecumenical associations operating among conservative churches of the Reformed tradition: the World Fellowship of Reformed Churches (WFRC) and the International Reformed Fellowship (IRF). The World Fellowship of Reformed Churches, formed in 1992, brought together the National Presbyterian Church of Mexico, the Presbyterian Church of Brazil, and the Presbyterian Church of America. The World Evangelical Fellowship (WEF) was a catalyst for the formation of the World Fellowship as it existed under the WEF umbrella, and it held its meetings in conjunction with WEF assemblies. The organization considered the situation of Evangelical churches in the Reformed tradition in the Western Hemisphere. Among the affiliated Spanish-speaking churches, fourteen formed the Confraternidad Latinoamericana de Iglesias Reformadas, which initiated several missionary consultations concerning Latin America.

The International Reformed Fellowship was formed in 1992 in Pasadena, California, and it has been notable for the strong participation of Korean Presbyterian churches. Like the WFRC, the IRF assumed a conservative theological stance and opposed the contemporary theological trends it saw embedded in the World Council of Churches and the associated World Alliance of Reformed Churches.

The new fellowship found agreement in adherence to the Westminster Confession of Faith, the formative document of the Presbyterian tradition, and in contemporary standards accepted by many conservative Evangelicals concerning the authority of Scripture, affirming the Bible's infallibility and inerrancy. The twenty-three original member churches were drawn from twenty-three countries.

Address:

World Reformed Fellowship
5637 Bush River Rd.
Columbia, SC 29212
<http://www.reformedfellowship.org/>

Source:

Green, Bill. "Is There a Need for a Reformed Fellowship?" Posted at <http://www.reformedmissions.org/fellowship.htm>. Accessed July 30, 2001.

World Sephardic Federation

The Sephardic Jewish community traces its origins to the Iberian Peninsula (Spain and Portugal), where a Jewish presence can be traced to the third century B.C.E. during the days of Imperial Rome. The community grew following the scattering of Jews from Palestine as a result of the destruction of the temple in 70 C.E. Over the next centuries Christianity came to power in the region and Jews became subject to an increasing number of repressive and discriminatory measures. Then in 711, Arab Muslim forces invaded southern Spain and quickly overran the peninsula.

Islam would control the territory for the next centuries. In the eighth century, at the time that the Umayyad Dynasty was replaced by the Abbasid Dynasty in the Middle East, a member of the Umayyad family escaped to the western Mediterranean. His arrival in Spain became the occasion of the setting up of a new Umayyad Dynasty in Spain and the independence of Spain from the formerly united Arab Muslim empire.

Under Muslim rule, the Jews of Spain enjoyed the protection of the Arab rulers as a people of the book, though the separation of Spain from the larger empire would mean that the Jews in Spain would be somewhat isolated from large segments of the developing Jewish community, especially as it grew in Germany and in the Christian-dominated lands farther to the east. Meanwhile in Spain, Jews participated in the high culture developed in Muslim Spain. Jewish philosophers and scientists would arise, and the community would enjoy the leadership of learned theologians and jurists. The height of Jewish life in Spain could be said to have occurred in the twelfth century, during the time that Moses ben Maimon (more popularly known as Maimonides or Rambam) lived (1135–1205). Maimonides wrote three important Jewish texts, though he is best remembered for his third volume, The Guide of the Perplexed (1190), which synthesized Jewish thought with Aristotelian philosophy. He also developed a widely quoted summary of Orthodox Jewish belief. Maimonides's writings circulated widely and not only provoked a reaction from other segments of the Jewish community but also caused many Christians to respond to his thought. In Paris, the DOMINICANS burned his writings in a public ceremony.

Within Spain, one group of Jews, largely in reaction to Maimonides, created a circle of mystics who in turn began to produce texts partially inspired by Neoplatonism and the Jewish mystical text, the Zohar. This movement would have an effect upon the development of the Hassidic community in other parts of the Jewish world.

Shortly after Maimonides's death, Christian partisans in Iberia, never completely pacified, began a reconquest of the land. Over the next two centuries, various kingdoms were established, and the Jewish community entered a new era of discrimination and persecution. In the kingdom of Aragon intense efforts to convert the Jews to Christianity were pursued. The height of reaction to the Jewish presence came in Castile and Aragon in 1391, when violence broke out and over a period of several months many Jews were massacred. A significant number of conversions to Christianity were noted over the following decades. The conversions decimated the Jewish community in many urban areas and by the end of the fifteenth century, as modern Spain was being created, led to a call for the complete expulsion of the remaining followers of the Jewish faith. At the same time a reaction against the Jewish Christians set in, and beginning in 1449 they were denied government positions.

In 1480 the Inquisition was established in Spain, with the specific task of rooting out any heresies among Jewish and Muslim converts. For the Jews, it meant scrutiny for tendencies among Jewish Christians to continue practicing Judaism after their conversion, and the beginning of the legends of the Marranos, the secret Jews who though outwardly operating as Christians, in their private and family lives continued to practice Judaism and pass it along to their children.

The emergence of the modern state of Spain—with the conquest of the remaining territory held by Muslims in the south and the union of the states of Castile and Navarre—culminated in the orders of 1491 (Portugal) and 1492 (Spain) for the complete expulsion of the Jews from the Iberian Peninsula. The great majority of the Jews who left at this time found their way to Muslim territory and established centers for the perpetuation of Sephardic traditions throughout the Ottoman Empire and across North Africa. Here they would enjoy a new era of prosperity, and a number of outstanding scholars and political leaders would emerge. Some of these communities would quietly flourish until the late twentieth century, when they would be decimated by the immigration of their members to Israel and to a lesser extent Western Europe and North America.

A smaller number moved to Holland and the other European countries. In Holland they were allowed to live somewhat peacefully, and Amsterdam became the new center of the Sephardic community. A smaller number of the expelled Jews relocated to the Americas. There is reason to believe that among the sailors who served with Christopher Columbus in his first voyage to the New World in 1492 were several Jews; a number of Portuguese Jews/Marranos relocated to Brazil. Some fled to Holland, possibly the most tolerant country of the era, where a new Jewish intelligentsia would develop. Possibly the most famous Dutch Jew is philosopher Baruch Spinoza (1632–1677).

In the early 1600s, the Netherlands attacked Brazil and established themselves in Recife. Jewish settlers emerged out of the population to found the first openly Jewish community in the Americas, Kahal Kodesh, the Holy Congregation. Unfortunately for them, Recife returned to Portuguese control in 1654. As a result, the members of the community were redistributed to Curacao in the Dutch West Indies, Surinam, and two North American locations, the Dutch colony of New Amsterdam (now New York) and the recently established Rhode Island colony. In the mid-1750s, Sephardic Jews organized the first Jewish community in Canada, in Halifax. A more permanent congregation, Shearith Israel, was later organized in Quebec. From Surinam and Curacao, the Sephardic community has spread across Latin America and now constitutes 15 to 20 percent of the whole. The beginnings of Judaism in both North and South America resulted from the Sephardic diaspora.

In the early nineteenth century, as German Jews began to arrive in force, many with Reformist tendencies, the German (Ashkenazi) and Sephardic Jews tended to go their separate ways. A small Sephardic presence remained, as first the Germans and then the Eastern Europeans came to dominate the Jewish community. Beginning in 1885, Sephardic life was established anew by the migration of Jews reacting to the decline of the Ottoman Empire. The mostly poor immigrants had difficulty integrating with the more affluent American Sephardic community.

In the meantime, in 1655, Oliver Cromwell found cause to admit the first Jews to England after their expulsion in the thirteenth century. Abraham Israel Carvajal (c. 1590–1659) and his two sons received residency rights. As others arrived, Cromwell authorized a cemetery (but no public worship), the event from which the modern London Jewish community dates its existence. Cromwell saw the Jews as a vital source of information on England's perennial rival—Spain.

By the end of the seventeenth century, the Sephardic community was widely distributed across North Africa and the Middle East (the lands of the Ottoman Empire) and in scattered centers in the Americas and Europe. They resided in relative peace through the mid-twentieth century but were radically affected by the establishment of the nation of Israel and the growing enmity between Muslims and Jews in general over the Palestinian question. Through the last half of the twentieth century, many of the old Sephardic Jewish communities in predominately Muslim lands relocated to Israel, where they now form the largest segment of the Jewish community as a whole. (The Sephardic communities in the Balkans were largely destroyed by the Holocaust.) In 1984 a Sephardic party was founded in Israel, which through the 1990s became one of the largest political parties in the country.

In 1925, U.S. Sephardic Jews took the lead in founding the World Sephardic Federation in an attempt to build a cooperative network that could participate in the development of global Jewry. A Union of Sephardic Congregations was founded in New York three years later. The American Sephardic Federation, founded in 1951, is the World Sephardic Federation's strongest national affiliate. The European Sephardic community has a focus through the Institut Sépharade Européen. There are numerous Internet sites representative of the Sephardic community.

Addresses:

World Sephardic Federation
13 rue Marignac
1206 Geneva
Switzerland

American Sephardic Federation
15 W. 16th St., 6th Floor
New York, NY 10011

Institut Sépharade Européen
25 rue Dodonée
1180 Brussels
Belgium

Sources:

Cohen, Martin A., and Abraham J. Peck, eds. Sephardim in the Americas: Studies in Culture and History. Tuscaloosa: University of Alabama Press, 1993.

Stillman, Norman A. The Jews of Arab Lands in Modern Times. Philadelphia: Jewish Publication Society of America, 1991.

World Vaisnava Association

The World Vaisnava Association (WVA) was founded in 1994 by a spectrum of leaders (arcaryas and sannyasis) representing organizations that had grown from the GAUDIYA MATH. The Gaudiya Math had emerged at the beginning of the twentieth century as the leading voice in the revival of the monotheistic devotional form of Vaisnava associated with Shri Chaitanya Mahaprabhu (c. 1486–1533). In the last generation, beginning with the work of Srila A. C. Bhaktivedanta Prabhupada (1896–1977), the founder of the INTERNATIONAL SOCIETY FOR KRISHNA CONSCIOUSNESS (ISKCON), the devotional form of VAISNAVISM spread from Bengal, India, around the world.

In the years following Prabhupada's death, ISKCON experienced a number of schisms over issues of guru leadership. Members asked whether the gurus who succeeded Prabhupada should be venerated in the same manner that he had been. Other gurus had problems with the governing body that assumed headship over the international movement. A few turned to teachers (gurus) associated with the Gaudiya Math for new leadership. ISKCON split into a number of competing organizations, several of which grew into large international groups.

Initially, several former ISKCON leaders met in Vrindavan with B. V. Tripurari Swami, B. G. Narasingha Swami, and B. A. Paramadvaiti to discuss the possibility of founding a new organization as an expression of the unity of the flourishing global movement that had emerged from the Gaudiya Math. The group met again in 1993 and made several decisions. First, they agreed to approach Srila B. P. Puri Maharaj, then ninety-seven years old, the most senior Vaisnava then alive, who agreed to become the first president of the proposed organization. They also decided to invite the leadership from all the different related groups to participate as founders of what would become the World Vaisnava Association.

An initial edition of the World Vaisnava Association Newsletter was issued in February 1994 and distributed to all the ISKCON-related groups. It invited suggestions and participation in a founding meeting that was held in November 1994. Some 120 people were present, and 28 arcaryas and sannyasis became founding members. The association was seen as a revival of the Visva Vaisnava Raj Sabha, originally founded by Srila Jiva Goswami in the nineteenth century.

In promoting the unity of the various member organizations, WVA seeks to help others understand what it thinks of as the real Hinduism Sanatan Dharma, its theism, and its answers to the problems of contemporary society. It seeks to motivate the leaders and adherents of the member organizations in their propagation of Vaisnavism and to promote the circulation of Vaisnava literature. It was agreed that the organization would seek to build respect and fraternal relations between the various member organizations and would not in any way compete with any of them. In that regard, WVA would not create any ashrams, nor facilitate the guru-disciple relationship.

Founding members of the association included: Chaitanya Math, the Gaudiya Vaisnava Society, Sri Chaitanya Math, ISEV (Il Instituto Superior de Estudios Vedicos), ISKCON, Gaudiya Sangha, Sri Caitanya Gaudiya Math, Vedanta Samiti, Sri Caitanya Bhakti Gemeinschaft, VRINDA, the Bhaktivedanta Ashram, the Hungarian Vaisnava Association, the Sri Sri Radha Govindaji Trust, the Gaudiya Mission, the Bhaktivedanta Institute, the Sri Krishna Chaitanya Mission, Gopinath Gaudiya Math, and Mantra Meditation Hawaii. Any organization in the Chaitanya tradition may associate with the WVA. The organization publishes the WVA Journal.

Address:

World Vaisnava Association
No. 154 Gopeswar Road
Mohala, Vrindaban
U.P. Dist.
Mathura Pin 281 121
India
<http://www.wva-vvrs.org/>

Sources:

Paramadvaiti, B. A., Swami. Our Family the Gaudiya Math. Posted at <http://www.vrindavan.org/English/Books/GMconded.html>. Accessed October 1, 2001.

World Vaisnava Association. Posted at <http://www.wva-vvrs.org/>. Accessed October 1, 2001.

World Zoroastrian Organization

In the 1970s, some British Zoroastrians began to argue publicly for the creation of a worldwide Zoroastrian association that could assist the survival of the Zoroastrian community, which in every country of its existence is a minority and hence vulnerable to changing political climates. Unable to enlist the backing of the leadership in India and Iran, and spurred by the problems encountered by members of the faith in East Africa and fears for the situation in Iran following the Islamic Revolution, British Zoroastrians assembled a set of concerned leaders from around the globe to form the World Zoroastrian Association (WZO). The WZO grew out of a network put together as the result of several world Zoroastrian congresses that had been held through the 1970s and 1980s.

Within the London community, questions had arisen over the allowance of non-Zoroastrians to attend worship (an increasing problem in pluralistic London), the plight of children of mixed marriages, and the double use of the term Zoroastrian to indicate an ethnic Parsee as well as a practitioner of Zoroastrianism. In 1983 the World Zarathushtrian Trust Fund was established to support the WZO.

The WZO has found its strongest support in North America, among the member associations of the Federation of Zoroastrian Associations of North America, founded in 1987. It has not received the support of many of the Indian Zoroastrians where the WZO is seen as challenging older communal structures. The WZO is also perceived as representing the less traditional segment of the international Zoroastrian community, symbolized in 1993 by its acceptance of the children of mixed marriages into the Zoroastrian fellowship. Traditional Zoroastrians reject mixed marriages and make no provision for the conversion of non-Zoroastrians. They also have strict rules about the admittance of non-Zoroastrians into the most sacred space where important rituals are performed. The more traditionalist community members in the United Kingdom have withdrawn their support from the world organization.

The WZO is headed by a thirty-seven-member board with international representation and a British-based executive committee. The organization has made it its job to intervene with governments on behalf of Zoroastrians, provide support for adherents living in poverty, assist the strengthening of Zoroastrian youth in the faith, and sponsor conferences, seminars, and research on Zoroastrianism.

Address:

World Zoroastrian Association
135 Tennyson Rd.
South Norwood
London SE25 5NF
United Kingdom
<http://www.w-z-o.org/>

Source:

Hinnells, John R. Zoroastrians in Britain. Oxford: Clarendon, 1996.

Worldwide Church of God

The Worldwide Church of God today bears almost no resemblance to the church founded in 1934 by Herbert W.

Armstrong (1892–1986) and run by him for half a century until his death. Much of the description here is of the “historical” church, whose background and the summary of beliefs also apply to the majority of the church’s numerous splinter groups.

The Worldwide Church of God shared common roots with the Seventh-day Adventist movement. When with the encouragement of Ellen G. White (1827–1915) a large group of sabbatarian Adventist assemblies agreed to take the name SEVENTH-DAY ADVENTIST CHURCH, at a conference in Battle Creek, Michigan, in 1860, a much smaller dissenting group split away under the name Church of God Seventh Day. Armstrong, a failed advertising executive, joined a congregation of one branch of this church in 1929, was ordained a minister in 1931, and was associated with the church until it removed his preaching credentials in 1937. In 1934 he started a small radio ministry (later to be called The World Tomorrow) and published the first mimeographed copy of The Plain Truth magazine, the two main activities by which the church reached out to nonmembers. His church was called the Radio Church of God until changing to its present name in 1968.

The church was sabbatarian and millenarian. It laid a strong emphasis not just on the Seventh-day Sabbath but also on holding the seven Jewish Holy Days, and obeying Jewish dietary laws. It taught the literal (and soon-to-come) Millennium, in which Christ would rule in peace on Earth for one thousand years, with true believers (that is, members of the church) being rulers under Christ. It had a strong emphasis on biblical prophecy and held a particular version of BRITISH ISRAELISM, in which mentions of the subtribes of Ephraim and Manasseh in the Bible refer specifically to the present-day nations of Britain and the United States. Armstrong and other preachers and writers in his church examined political, military, and moral world affairs to prove that these are the End Times. The church also taught that God is a family, currently with two members, the Father and the Son, but that true believers will become part of the God-family.

Throughout its history the Worldwide Church of God met with much hostility from mainstream Christians and from anticultists, not only for its radical theological teachings but also for its insistence on two full tithes of gross income, and in some years a third tithe, and for its strict top-down governance, which allegedly led to much abuse of authority.

Until Armstrong’s death, the most traumatic period for the Worldwide Church of God was the decade of the 1970s. Many members believed from Armstrong’s teaching that the End Times would begin around 1972, and that Christ would return by 1975 (there was even a booklet entitled 1975 in Prophecy); when that did not occur, some disillusioned members left. Doctrinal changes on the date of Pentecost and a reversal of the church’s formerly strict ruling against remarriage after divorce caused a number of members to leave in 1974, some to found splinter churches. In 1977, Armstrong married a divorcée forty-six years younger than himself, much to the disapproval of his son and heir-apparent, Garner Ted Armstrong (b. 1930). The younger Armstrong was involved in sexual scandals early in the decade and was suspended from preaching for some months; on his return he liberalized some of his father's teachings until, in 1978, his father banished him from the church. Garner Ted Armstrong founded his own CHURCH OF GOD, INTERNATIONAL. In 1979, in response to allegations by former members of financial impropriety by Herbert W. Armstrong and the church's lawyer, Stanley Rader, the state of California placed the church in receivership for a time. In 1980 a former senior member published a book that detailed the authoritarian nature of the church and also alleged that Armstrong had had sexual relations with one of his own daughters many years earlier.

The church recovered from all of these trials. At its height it had a baptized membership of very nearly 100,000, and its flagship magazine, The Plain Truth, had a worldwide circulation of more than six million.

A week before his death, Armstrong appointed the church's administrative officer, Joseph W. Tkach (1927–1995), as his successor. Initially Tkach followed Armstrong's teachings and practices, but soon (strongly encouraged by his son Joseph Tkach Jr. [b. 1951], who became pastor general upon his father's death) he withdrew all of Armstrong's books and booklets and began changing doctrines. Ministers who disagreed with the changes either resigned or were fired for refusing to teach them. In 1989 Gerald Flurry left to found the PHILADELPHIA CHURCH OF GOD; in 1982 longstanding senior evangelist Roderick C. Meredith left to found the Global Church of God (see LIVING CHURCH OF GOD), and in 1995 a large group of ministers left to found the UNITED CHURCH OF GOD. This last was in reaction to Joseph W. Tkach's Christmas Eve 1994 sermon, in which he formally renounced most of Armstrong's teachings and declared that the Worldwide Church of God was now effectively a standard Evangelical Protestant church that "by tradition" worshiped on Saturday. Many of the offshoot groups had splits of their own; there are currently more than three hundred separate offshoot groups, though many are minuscule.

With a massive drop in members and with tithing now voluntary rather than mandatory, the church's income plummeted. It laid off many of its staff, sold buildings, and had to close Ambassador University (formerly Ambassador College), which Armstrong had established in 1947 to train the church's members as ministers. The American edition of Plain Truth is now a cover-price magazine, though the totally separate UK edition is still free, as all of Worldwide's publications had formerly been. The Worldwide Church of God now celebrates Christmas and Easter, formerly condemned as pagan festivals. The church's headquarters is encouraging congregations to consider holding services on Sundays instead of Saturdays, though that move appears to be meeting with resistance from the membership.

The church's present estimated membership is forty to fifty thousand. The church publishes a set of periodicals, including The Plain Truth (U.S.A.), The Plain Truth (UK), Northern Light (Canada), and the Worldwide News, and it continues a radio program, Plain Truth Commentary. In the United States, the Worldwide Church of God was accepted as a member of the National Association of Evangelicals in May 1997, and in the UK it was accepted in the equivalent Evangelical Alliance in July 2000. Through these it is related to the WORLD EVANGELICAL ALLIANCE.

Address:

Worldwide Church of God
300 W. Green St.
Pasadena, CA 91123
<http://www.wcg.org>

David V. Barrett

Sources:

- Armstrong, Herbert W. Autobiography. 2 vols. Pasadena, CA: Worldwide Church of God, 1986, 1987.
- Barrett, David V. The New Believers. London: Cassell, 2001.
- Hopkins, Joseph. The Armstrong Empire: A Look at the Worldwide Church of God. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans, 1974.
- Nichols, Larry, and George Mather. Discovering the Plain Truth: How the Worldwide Church of God Encountered the Gospel of Grace. Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity, 1998.
- Robinson, David. Herbert Armstrong's Tangled Web. Tulsa, OK: John Hadden, 1980.
- Tkach, Joseph. Transformed by Truth. Sisters, OR: Multnomah, 1997.

Yemen

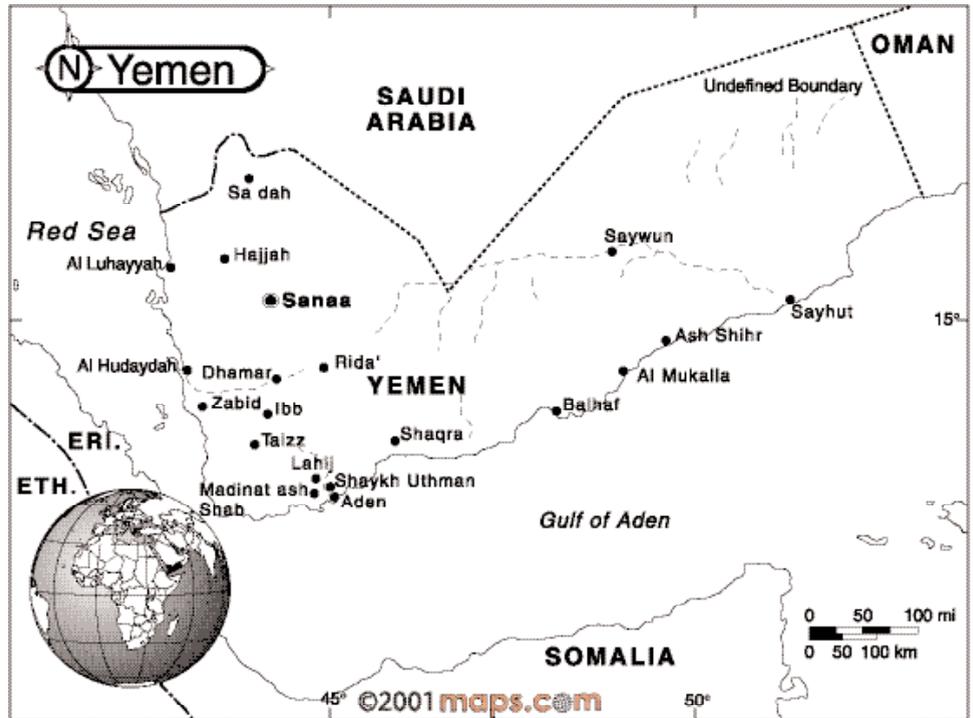

Yemen is the southernmost country on the Arabian Peninsula. The land has been inhabited at least since the end of the second millennium B.C.E., and a sophisticated civilization, the kingdom of Saba, or Sheba, developed there. It was based upon trade in spices, and over the next thousand years its cities became popular stops for caravans from both east and west. As sea trade between the Mediterranean area and India emerged, Yemen prospered even more.

Early in the Christian era, Yemen developed a special relationship with Ethiopia, which it faced across the Red Sea. Ethiopia conquered Yemen in 525 and remained in control for half a century until driven out by the Persians in 570. Yemen became a prize for different would-be conquerors for the next three hundred years. Then in the seventh century, the leadership of the country converted to Islam, and within a generation Islam became the religion of the people. As the capital of the Islamic world moved to Damascus and then to Baghdad, Yemen was left somewhat isolated from the centers of both political and religious life.

In 897 a stable dynasty, the Yadyi, was established in the northern part of the country. A series of dynasties arose and fell in the south. For a time in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, the Ottoman Empire attempted to establish hegemony in the region. The British first made their presence felt in 1618, when they established the headquarters of the East Indies Company at the city of Mukha. Then in 1839, they took control from Mukha through the Strait of Bab al Mandeb along the coast to Aden (the best port in the region). In response, the Turkish army moved into North Yemen. The opening of the Suez Canal in 1870 gave Aden new importance, and Great Britain moved to establish its control of the coast all the way to Oman, a process not completed until 1934.

In 1911 the Imam Yahya Ad-din began to reassert the rights of the Yadyi Dynasty, which has survived though subservient to the Turks. It soon displaced the Turks, challenged Saudi influences on its northern border, and put pressure on the British over Aden. During the rest of the century, the struggle to unite Yemen as an independent country led to various wars, border realignments, and even the involvement of the country in the short-lived United Arab Republic (1958–1961). In 1967 a socialist republic was declared in South Yemen, and in 1969 the British were forced out. The merger of North and South Yemen was delayed by the continued meddling of Saudi Arabia and other Arab nations that had interests in the north, but it was finally accomplished in 1990. Through the 1990s, the popula-

Status of religions in Yemen, 2000-2050

Followers	2000			2025	2050
	total	%	rate
Muslims	17,919,000	98.9	4.57	38,491,000	57,934,000
Hindus	125,000	0.7	4.56	350,000	600,000
Christians	32,200	0.2	3.56	64,000	108,000
Orthodox	12,000	0.1	3.51	22,000	40,000
Independents	8,000	0.0	4.81	20,000	35,000
Roman Catholics	6,000	0.0	4.14	13,000	20,000
Nonreligious	25,200	0.1	4.34	60,000	120,000
Atheists	7,800	0.0	2.62	17,000	32,000
Jews	1,100	0.0	-0.12	500	500
Baha'is	1,000	0.0	3.63	2,000	4,000
Jains	200	0.0	3.47	500	1,200
Buddhists	100	0.0	3.42	300	600
Sikhs	100	0.0	2.05	60	60
Total population	18,112,000	100.0	4.57	38,985,000	58,801,000

Men praying in Djibla, Yemen (Helene Rogers/TRIP)

tion increased dramatically as a result of the expulsions of Yemenis from Saudi Arabia and the return of Yemenis from Africa.

The Islamization of Yemen has been one of the more determinative factors in its history. The first mosques to be built in Yemen, reportedly erected by some men sent by the Prophet Muhammad himself, were in San'a al-Janad and near Wadi Zabid. These mosques may still be visited today. The country was also affected by the division of the Muslim community into Sunni and SHI'A ISLAM. The Shi'as, the backbone of the former Yadi Dynasty, are the majority in the northern part of the country, while the south is dominated by followers of the SHAFIITE Sunni school. There is also a measurable Ismaili community and an even smaller number of followers of the AHMADIYYA MOVEMENT OF ISLAM, a nineteenth-century revivalist movement.

Islam is considered the established religion of Yemen, and Islamic law is the basis of all legislation. Non-Muslim religions are not permitted to proselytize, and Yemeni Muslims are not permitted to convert to another faith. Although the government has taken steps to present an open face to the West, it has been opposed by some Muslim groups, such as the Aden-Abyan Islamic Army, a militant movement opposed to Western presence in the Middle East. In 1990 the leader of the army was sentenced to death for his kidnapping of twenty Western tourists in the country.

Judaism had been present in Yemen for many centuries; but then at the beginning of the fifth century C.E., a group of Yemenis, the Himyarites, decided to convert to the Jewish faith. It took control of South Yemen and established Judaism as the official religion. The Himyarites also moved to suppress Christianity, which had come into the country from Ethiopia. The Ethiopians reacted, and Himyarite rule was short-lived. In 525 the Ethiopians overran the Himyarite kingdom.

Through the succeeding centuries the Jews in Yemen lived quietly, though they were frequently the target of oppression and conversionist activity, and they created a unique Jewish community. In the mid-twentieth century it numbered upward of fifty thousand people. Through the early twentieth century, new anti-Jewish forces began to operate. In 1922, Yemen revived an ancient Muslim law that demanded the forced conversion to Islam of all Jews under the age of twelve. In 1947, Aden was the scene of anti-Jewish riots that cost eighty-two Jews their lives and the destruction of many homes in the Jewish community. Continued pressure on the community led to the 1950 immigration of almost the entire community to the new state of Israel. Today almost no Jews are left, and there is no organized Jewish religious life.

Christianity was established in Yemen by the Ethiopians but gradually disappeared during the first centuries of Muslim rule. The primary exception appears to have been on the island of Socotra, an island in the Arabian Sea, where the APOSTOLIC CATHOLIC ASSYRIAN CHURCH OF THE EAST (a Nestorian Christian body based in Iraq) had a bishopric that lasted well into the medieval era.

Christianity made a new beginning in Yemen in the nineteenth century when a Roman Catholic priest of the Servite order settled in Aden. Work throughout the Arabian Peninsula had grown to the point that in 1854 a prefecture was created. It became a vicariate in 1888 and remained in Aden until 1974, when it was transferred to Abu Dhabi, where it remains. Catholic work in the decades after World War II has been primarily among expatriates, the number of whom radically declined after the British were driven out of Aden. However, in 1973 the North Yemen government invited the MISSIONARIES OF CHARITY (headed by Mother Teresa) to come to Hodeida and take charge of a home for the aged. That became the first of a variety of charitable and medical projects supported and managed by various Roman Catholic orders and missionary agencies. At the same time South Yemen nationalized the schools, and all but two Roman Catholic missionaries (except for two priests) were expelled. The ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH retains a minuscule presence in Yemen, but no proselytizing is allowed.

Protestant presence in Yemen goes back to 1885, when Ion Keith-Falconer, a Scottish nobleman, settled in Aden with a vision of spreading Christianity across Arabia. He died two years later, unable to adapt to the climate. The CHURCH OF SCOTLAND adopted his mission, but more important, two students at the seminary of the REFORMED CHURCH IN AMERICA at New Brunswick, New Jersey, were inspired to take the deceased missionary's place. James Cantine and Samuel M. Zwemer organized the American Arabian Mission and then left to attend language school in Beirut. Their work was greatly assisted by the adoption of their mission by the Reformed Church, which supplied funds for several hospitals. The primary work in Yemen, however, remained the single original mission in Aden and the hospital subsequently opened by the Church of Scotland.

The Scottish work united with the Danish Mission in 1961, and the church in Aden became known as the Church of South Yemen, almost the only congregation of Yemeni nationals in the country.

Beginning in the 1960s, several other groups, especially the Red Sea Mission Team, attempted to open work; however, in 1965 all missionaries were withdrawn from South Yemen. They returned in 1968 but were then ordered out by the government in 1973. More substantive work began with a clinic opened in 1964 in Taiz, North Yemen, by the SOUTHERN BAPTIST CONVENTION's missionary arm. The facility moved to Jubia in 1968, and a small church has been formed that in 1992 reported ninety-two members. By 1972, fifteen medical missionaries were active in the country. Today there are more than thirty Southern Baptist personnel in Yemen.

Although Protestants were attempting to establish work, the Anglicans had begun worship services led by chaplains with the forces that captured Aden in 1839. An Anglican parish was established in Aden and has continued to the present under the jurisdiction of the far-flung Diocese of Cyprus and the Gulf of the EPISCOPAL CHURCH IN JERUSALEM AND THE MIDDLE EAST.

In addition, Yemen has a very small BAHÁ'Í FAITH community and a few practicing Hindus (from India and Pakistan).

Sources:

- Burman, R., ed. The Jews of Aden. London: London Museum of Jewish Life, 1991.
- Horner, N. A. "Present-day Christianity in the Gulf States of the Arabian Peninsula." Occasional Bulletin of Missionary Research 2 (April 1978): 53–63.
- Meissner, J. R. Tribes at the Core: Legitimacy, Structure, and Power in Zaydi Yemen. Ph.D. dissertation, Columbia University, 1987.
- Pridham, B. R., ed. Economy, Society and Culture in Contemporary Yemen. London: Croom Helm Centre for Arab Gulf Studies, University of Exeter, 1985.

Yezidis

The Yezidis are a small religious group of approximately 300,000 Kurmanji-speaking people who settle geographically dispersed in several areas of Kurdistan and the Caucasus. The largest Yezidi communities live in northern Iraq (estimates vary between 100,000 and 250,000); the main sanctuary of the Yezidis, the shrine of Sheykh 'Adi, is situated in the Valley of Lalish, just north of Mosul. Yezidis played an influential part in Kurdish tribal confederations under the Ottoman Empire. Successive religious persecutions, however, drove waves of immigrants into the Caucasus, particularly Armenia and Georgia (some forty thousand). About five thousand Yezidi live in Syria, while most of the approximately ten thousand Yezidis of Eastern Turkey fled during the 1980s, mainly to Germany, where there is a community of about twenty thousand.

The Yezidi tradition developed out of the Muslim 'Adawiyya order of the Sufi Sheykh 'Adi ibn Musafir (c. 1073–1162), who was born in Lebanon and studied in Baghdad. When he settled at Lalish, in the Hakkari Mountains, he drew a lot of followers from the local Kurdish population as well as from outside Kurdistan. Being childless, Sheykh 'Adi was succeeded after his death by a nephew, whose descendants continued to lead the movement for more than a century. Under Sheykh Hasan b. 'Adi (d. 1254), his great-grandnephew, the order seems to have deviated from acceptable Islamic norms by regarding Sheykh 'Adi as the sole source of religious authority. As many similarities with the cults of the Ahl-e Haqq and Alevis suggest, Yezidi tradition also incorporated pre-Islamic, presumably western Iranian or Kurdish, beliefs and observances. Its followers subsequently were regarded as non-Muslims and (wrongly) denounced as devil-worshippers. Ever since, Yezidi history has been marked by persecutions and attacks by their Muslim neighbors.

One of the essential characteristics of Yezidi tradition is its nonliterate nature—its holy texts have been orally transmitted over the generations, especially so as literacy was formerly forbidden to Yezidis. The body of religious texts is mainly constituted by the so-called qewls, sacred hymns in Kurmanji, which are chanted by trained bards (qewwal) on religious occasions (for a selection of these in English, see Kreyenbroek 1995), and the two sacred books of the Yezidis, the Kitaba Jilwe (Arabic: Book of Revelation) and the Meshef Resh (Kurdish: The Black Book) (both are translated in Guest 1993). Although these books most probably had not been written before the nineteenth century, they seem to represent a genuine tradition, containing the essential teachings of the founders of the faith as they were once laid down in written texts of the same name.

The oral tradition prevented the development of a doctrinal body, making Yezidi tradition a belief system in a very loose sense, with many variations in practice between individuals and the scattered communities. To generalize, the Yezidis venerate a God called Khode (a deus otiosus) and seven Holy Beings or Angels (khas), to whom God has entrusted worldly affairs. The leader of the Angels is the Peacock Angel (Kurdish: Tawusi Melek, hereafter Melek Tawus), who is responsible for all that happens in the world, whether good or bad, which may have promoted his identification with the Satan of other religions (although Yezidis are forbidden to use that name). The Yezidis believe in reincarnation, whereby the quality of a person's future life depends on his behavior in the last.

Being a Yezidi is a matter of birth, not belief—one cannot become a Yezidi. Personal convictions may result from membership of the community, but cannot lead to it. Participation in festivals, observance of some prohibitions, and formal obedience to religious authorities are essential elements of religious life, more so than individual verbal prayer. If Yezidis pray, they usually do so facing the sun in the morning and evening. Wednesday is the holy day of the Yezidis. Besides the veneration of Melek Tawus, the most conspicuous markers of Yezidi identity are their caste system and their strict rule of endogamy, as well as a number of prohibitions. Yezidi society is separated into two basic endogamous classes or castes: the laymen or commoners, called mirid; and the “priestly” castes. The community is led by both the Mir of Sheykhhan, who is traditionally regarded as the vice-regent of Sheykh 'Adi (and also of Melek Tawus), and the Baba Sheykh (Father Sheykh), the leader of the sheykhs and thus the spiritual leader of the faith (although recent developments in Iraq as well as the process of migration have limited their influence to some extent). The clergy are divided further into several castes or titles, among which the sheykh and the pîr are the most important. Each Yezidi—including the sheykhs and pîrs themselves—must have a sheykh and pîr who acts as a spiritual guide for him or her. The sheykh participates on behalf of his mirid in the performance of religious rites, such as those of birth, circumcision, baptism, marriage, and death. For this, the commoners pay him a certain sum of money each year. Prohibitions regarding purity in both spiritual and physical matters include marriage with non-Yezidis (which results in exclusion from the community) and polluting the “elements,” by spitting, cutting or shaving one's facial hair, wearing blue clothes, eating certain types of food (such as lettuce, fish, pumpkin, broad beans, and cabbage), or using words connected with the devil.

The last decades have seen the continuing migration of Yezidis to Europe, particularly Germany, where a “diasporization” of the Yezidi community can be observed. Against the background of a widespread fear that the Yezidi identity might disappear in the course of migration, the religious authorities have called for the collection of all relevant oral traditions, to forge a written scripture, and to reform some of the taboos. Free from religious persecution, and having become simultaneously more urban and literate, Yezidi intellectuals (among them many mirid) try to reconstruct and represent their religion through the publication of journals, the creation of websites, and the cooperation with academics, according to the conditions of a modern, culturally complex society. These attempts may eventually result in the transformation of Yezidi tradition from an orthopraxy to a more orthodox scriptural religion—a Yezidism—in which differing local traditions become homogenized into a more binding diasporic identity.

Andreas Ackermann

Sources:

- Allison, Christine. The Yezidi Oral Tradition in Iraqi Kurdistan. Richmond: Curzon, 2001.
“Dengê Êzidiyan.” Posted at <http://www.yezidi.org>. Accessed September 1, 2001.
Guest, John S. Survival among the Kurds: A History of the Yezidis. London: Kegan Paul, 1993.

Kreyenbroek, Philip G. Yezidism—Its Background, Observances and Textual Traditions. Texts and Studies in Religion, Vol. 62. Lewiston: Edwin Mellen, 1995.

Yiquandao

See Tian Dao

Yogi Tradition

The Yogi tradition is among Hinduism's oldest living traditions. The tradition has no separate modern-day form, as it permeates all of Hinduism. Essentially, as individuals desire to know the Ultimate, or Brahman, they are inspired to seek out Brahman. Yoga is the name given to a spectrum of ways to search for and come to know God.

The "Father of Yoga" was Patanjali (c. second century B.C.E.), the author of multiple discourses—that is, the Yoga sutras that contain the knowledge about knowing God through yoga. Patanjali is considered the first yogi, in the strictest sense, though yoga itself derives from the Harappan civilization (2300 B.C.E.) Among the Harappan archaeological sites in Mohenjo Dharo, an ancient statue of a man in a yoga posture was uncovered.

A yogi (or yogini, for a female) will live a life of asceticism. Many Hindus turn to the life of a yogi in the end stages of life in order to gain release from the cycle of reincarnation after their death. A yogi may undergo rigorous training in some form of yoga in order to achieve the deep level of concentration necessary for true yoga. The number of bodily postures (asanas) for hatha yoga are in the thousands, with some masters claiming to know them all. Asanas go from simple leg raises to seemingly impossible contortions.

A yogi may have one or more pupils that he will instruct in the ways of yoga, or he may be completely alone. This habit of teaching is central to Hinduism. There is no modern organization for the yogi tradition because it is a tradition that is incorporated into all forms of Hinduism.

The yogi will meditate until the ultimate goal is achieved. When the yogi sees all beings—friends, enemies, animals, plants, and everything else—as one, the yogi has broken the chain of illusion (maya). No more are there illusory distinctions and classes. No longer does logic or common sense seem real to the yogi. When the yogi sees all things as one, the yogi is ready to die, and after death to actually become one with Brahman, the Ultimate Reality.

Hatha yoga, the proto-yoga exercises (postures) that serve as a precursor to the practice of the other forms of yoga (karma, raja, bhakti, and jnana), had largely disappeared from India by the beginning of the nineteenth century. It was revived in that century by Yogi Madhavdas, who operated out of an ashram in Gizrat in western India, and Shyam Sundar Goswami of Calcutta. Madhavdas's student, Shri Yogendra (b. 1897), who built a center in Myambai (Bombay), was a major force in spreading hatha yoga to the west in the early twentieth century.

A sadhu practices Yoga contortions in India. (Ask Images/TRIP)

Kumar Jairamdas

Sources:

- Aranya, Hariharananda. Yoga Philosophy of Patanjali. Translated by P. N. Mukerji. Calcutta: University of Calcutta, 1977. Reprint, Albany: State University of New York Press, 1983.
- Basham, A. L. The Origins and Development of Classical Hinduism. New York: Oxford University Press, 1989.
- Desikachar, T. K. V. Religiousness in Yoga. New York: University Press of America, 1980.
- Jarrell, Howard R. International Yoga Bibliography, 1950–1980. Metuchen, NJ: Scarecrow, 1981.

Yoido Full Gospel Church

The Yoido Full Gospel Church (ASSEMBLIES OF GOD) was founded by Paul David Yonggi Cho in 1958 in an old U.S. Army tent located in a slum area of Seoul, Korea. Forty years later it was acclaimed the largest Christian congregation in the world, with some 730,000 members. The story of Cho and the Yoido church is to a great degree the story of Christianity in Korea since World War II. Cho was born in 1936 in the district of Uljin near the southern port city of Pusan. He was raised in a Buddhist home in a nation under Japanese occupation. By the time he was sixteen, Cho was dying of tuberculosis when a young Christian girl told him of Jesus Christ and his healing power. After a miraculous healing in 1955, Cho became a Christian and joined the newly formed Assemblies of God.

The Korean Pentecostal movement began in 1928 when the first Pentecostal missionary from the United States, Mary Rumsey, arrived in Korea. After ordaining her first pastor, Sung San Park, in 1938, she organized the Chosun Pentecostal Church and Mission Center. She later organized five more churches before being expelled from Korea by the Japanese. After the devastation caused by the Korean War, Rumsey turned her churches over to the American Assemblies of God in 1952. The mission soon organized a Bible school in Seoul, where one of the first students was Yonggi Cho.

With the help of U.S. Army chaplains, Cho learned English and became an interpreter for visiting American evangelists. One of his heroes was the healing evangelist Oral Roberts. Cho patterned much of his ministry on Roberts's teachings and evangelistic methods.

In 1962, Cho built a new sanctuary that seated 1,500 persons, but this soon overflowed with crowds seeking salvation and healing. By 1964 the church claimed 2,000 members. Exhausted by his labors, Cho began to organize his church into "cells" that met in homes. These cells provided pastoral care for the exploding congregation. By 1985 there were more than fifty thousand such cells, mostly led by women.

Stories of miraculous healings spread over the city, attracting ever-larger crowds. By 1973, with 23,000 members, Cho began construction of a huge new church on Yoido Island, near the site of the new South Korean parliament building. In 1973 the ten-thousand-seat sanctuary was completed in time to host the Pentecostal World Conference. The growth of the church skyrocketed. By 1979 membership passed the 100,000 mark. In the following years there were periods in which 10,000 new members were added to the church each month. By 1994 the membership had reached the 700,000 mark and the church made plans to be the first congregation to reach the 1,000,000 mark. The membership peaked about 1995, however, with 730,000 members. Slower growth resulted from the organization of new daughter congregations from the Yoido membership.

By 1990, Cho had led in a rebuilding program that saw his sanctuary enlarged to seat twenty-two thousand persons. By this time he led seven Sunday services with more than thirty thousand in attendance in each service through the use of additional auditoriums and closed-circuit television. It was claimed that Cho spoke face to face each week to more people than any other person on earth.

Beyond his local church, Cho became well known as the author of several books on cell groups and church growth. These included his autobiographical Fourth Dimension (1979) and Successful Home Cell Groups (1981). In 1989 he founded a daily newspaper called the Kook Min Daily News, which quickly reached a million subscribers. In this newspaper as well as in his books and sermons, Cho expounded his "Fivefold Message of the Gospel," which included Salvation, the Holy Spirit, Divine Healing, Blessings, and the Second Coming of Jesus. By the end of the century, Cho was probably the best known Korean Christian leader in the world. His congregation was widely recognized as the largest Christian local church in history.

Address:

Yoido Full Gospel Church
P.O. Box 7
Seoul 150-600
Korea
<http://www.yfgc.org/>

Vinson Synan

Sources:

- Cho, Paul (David) Yonggi. The Holy Spirit, My Senior Partner: Understanding the Holy Spirit and His Gifts. Mary's Lake, FL: Charisma House, 1996.

———. Prayer: Key to Revival. Waco, TX: Word, 1984.

Vinson, Synan. "The International Ministry of Dr. David Yonggi Cho." In The Holy Spirit and the Church: A Collection of Scholarly Papers in Celebration of the 40th Anniversary of Dr. Yonggi Cho's Ministry. Seoul: Privately printed, 1998.

Wilson, D. J. "Paul Yonggi Cho." In Dictionary of Pentecostal and Charismatic Movements, edited by Stanley Burgess, Garry McGee, and Patrick Alexander, 161–162. Grand Rapids, MI: Zondervan, 1988.

Yoruban Religion/Spirituality

The Yoruban people of Nigeria emerge out of prehistory with the founding of Ife, a city in southwestern Nigeria, which has been their center for a millennium. Yoruban towns are traditionally headed by a chief (oba) who is invested with authority by the chief in Ife. Although they are an agricultural people, everyday life is centered in the villages that are placed in the center of the local farmland.

The Yorubans divide the cosmos into Orun, the sky, and Aiye, the earth. In the sky dwells Olorun, the High God, a number of associated deities (the Orissa), and the ancestors. Olorun is seen as somewhat remote and difficult to approach; hence He is not the object of shrines, rituals, or prayers. He is seen as the source of all and the creator of the first sixteen human beings. However, it is Orisa-nla who is credited with creating the earth and transferring the first humans to their new home. It is also believed that Orisa-nla began his acts of creation at Ife. Hence Ife is the center of all religious and spiritual power. Other locations have power as derived from Ife. (An alternate story suggests that Orisa-nla messed up his work and that Odunuwa had to redo it.)

Orisa-nla and Odunuwa are but two of the Orissa. Others include Ogun, the god of metals, and Esu, generally associated with divination. Also important to the Yoruban system are the ancestors. Outstanding ancestors are seen as residing in the abode of the Orissa and are venerated with their own shrines and rituals. Some ancestors are recognized for their role in Yoruban history and are recognized above their association with a single family. Some have attained status for the nation as divine beings, including Sango, Orisa-oko, and Ayelala, virtually identical to the Orissa. Both the Orissa and the ancestors are sources of power.

The role of the various religious functionaries in Yoruban society is to mediate between the people and the Orissa and ancestors. Each of the deities has priests. Some priests (aworo) are diviners (babalawo) who are consulted on the questions of life. Other priests attend the shrines of various deities. Yorubans believe that deities possess various people, called the elegun, who operate as a medium through whom the deities communicate. There are also healers, the oloogun, and the masked dancers (egungun), whose traditional masks are seen as possessors of power.

The King of Yoruba at his palace, Nigeria (J. Highet/TRIP)

There are between five and ten million Yorubans, most of whom reside in western Nigeria. There is a great variety in the practice associated with the widespread Yoruban system, not only in Nigeria and neighboring countries but also in its New World incarnations in Cuba and Brazil (where it developed an overlay of Christianity and is known variously as SANTERIA or Macumba). Both Christianity and Islam have come into Yoruban lands, resulting in a situation in which syncretistic religions have emerged. Among the primary groups to arise in reaction to Christianity are the various ALADURA CHURCHES, which exist along a spectrum between orthodox Protestant Christianity and traditional Yoruban religion. The CHURCH OF THE LORD, ALADURA is a member of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES. Others, such as the Eternal Sacred Order of the CHERUBIM AND SERAPHIM have incorporated elements of possession practices from the traditional practice.

Yoruban religious leaders in the West have made themselves available to interpret the faith of their coreligionists in Africa. Prominent organizations include the Ife Foundation of North America (<http://www.ifafoundation.org/>), the Iglesia Lukumi Babalu Aye (<http://home.earthlink.net/~clba/index.htm>), and the African Theological Archministry centers on the Oyotunji African Yoruban Village at Shelton, South Carolina.

Sources:

- Curry, Mary Cuthrell. Making the Gods in New York: The Yoruba Religion in the African American Community. New York: Garland, 1997.
- Edwards, Gary, and John Mason. Black God—Orisa Studies in the New World. Brooklyn, NY: Yoruba Theological Archministry, 1985.
- Ìdòwú, E. Bólájí. Olódùmaré: God in Yorùbá Belief. New York: Wazobia, 1994.
- Lawson, E. Thomas. Religions of Africa. San Francisco: HarperSanFrancisco, 1985.

Young Buddhist Association of Malaysia

The Young Buddhist Association of Malaysia (YBAM) was established on July 29, 1970, in Kuala Lumpur. The YBAM is a nonprofit religious organization that espouses a non-sectarian approach toward all Buddhist traditions.

The objectives of the YBAM are the following: (1) to be the national organization of all Buddhist youths in Malaysia; (2) to encourage, foster, and develop the practice of the teachings of the Buddha among youths; (3) to coordinate the religious, social, and recreational activities of Buddhist youths through its member organizations; (4) to provide leadership training for Buddhist youths; (5) to further all other interests of Buddhist youths as may be decided upon at a National Council meeting. The YBAM carries out its activities through the following committees: (1) Dharma Propagation, (2) Education, (3) Publication, (4) Welfare, (5) Culture, (6) Training, (7) Buddhist Graduates and Buddhist Undergraduates, (8) Government Affairs and External Relations, (9) International Affairs, and (10) Finance.

Its core activities are based on Dharma propagation, education, culture, and welfare. The YBAM organizes Dharma propagation activities by inviting Buddhist scholars, both locally and overseas, to give teachings on Buddhism through public lectures, seminars, study camps, and conferences. In 1996 the Dharma Propagators Training Program was launched to train Dharma speakers. It also publishes an English journal, Eastern Horizon, three times a year, and a quarterly Chinese journal, Buddhist Digest, in addition to other Buddhist literature. In the area of education, it has produced a Buddhist syllabus for the primary schools and is preparing the syllabus for the secondary schools.

Inasmuch as Malaysia is a plural society, YBAM ensures that cultural programs representing Buddhist values are incorporated into the local Buddhist community. In 1994 it launched the organ donation campaign to educate the public on the importance of donating organs after death. In 1980 the YBAM launched its first Six-Year Plan (1980–1986) to ensure that programs are well strategized and in line with its national objectives. A formal planning process also allows it to monitor the success of its implemented programs. During the latest Six-Year Plan (1998–2003), a Quality Management System was launched to ensure that programs achieve quality standards.

Membership in the YBAM comprises ordinary membership and associate membership. Ordinary members are Buddhist organizations with youth members, while associate members are individuals. As of January 1, 2001, there were a total of 250 ordinary members and more than 2,000 individual members.

YBAM is a member of the Malaysian Youth Council, and it is affiliated to the World Fellowship of Buddhist Youth (WFBY). It will be hosting the WFBY's thirteenth General Conference in 2002 in Kuala Lumpur. The YBAM operates a full-time secretariat based at its headquarters.

Address:

Young Buddhist Association of Malaysia
10 Jalan SS 2/75
47300 Petaling Jaya
Selangor
Malaysia
<http://www.ybam.org.my>

Benny Liow Woon Khin

Sources:

YBAM 10th Anniversary Souvenir Magazine. Penang, 1980.
 YBAM 15th Anniversary Souvenir Magazine. Penang, 1987.
 "YBAM 15th National Council Biennial Report." Petaling Jaya, 2000.
 YBAM National Council Handbook. Petaling Jaya, 2000.

Young Israel

The movement today known as Young Israel traces its beginning to the Jewish Theological Seminary. In 1912, Rabbi Judah Magnes (1877–1948) and two seminary professors, Israel Freidlander and Mordecai M. Kaplan (1881–1983), later to become the founder of RECONSTRUCTIONIST JUDAISM, launched an effort to unite the Orthodox youth (who were alienated from the Yiddish-speaking Orthodox centers that dominated within the Orthodox community), then residing on the Lower East Side of Manhattan (New York City). Over the next decade, a new approach to Jewish life, CONSERVATIVE JUDAISM, was brought from Germany, and the seminary identified with it. The founders of Young Israel saw themselves as Orthodox, and in 1922 they broke relations with the Conservative movement and the seminary. At the same time, they discovered that their own approach differed from that of other Orthodox groups and hence remained a separate organization. Over the next decades, as the youth with whom the movement began grew to adulthood, Young Israel emerged as a powerful representative of Orthodoxy.

The movement incorporated in 1926. During the 1930s it spread across the United States and into Canada. By the beginning of World War II, there were thirty-five affiliated synagogues. After the establishment of the State of Israel, the American Friends of Young Israel was founded to establish centers in the new country.

Young Israel, at its beginning, represented the liberal end of the spectrum of Orthodox Judaism. It has steadily become more Orthodox through the twentieth century. Young Israel has become a significant advocate of Sabbath observance and the segregation of men and women at synagogue services. It has also joined the general Orthodox condemnation of Conservative and REFORM JUDAISM.

Addresses:

Young Israel
 3 W. 16th St.
 New York, NY 10011

Young Israel
 P.O. Box 7306
 Jerusalem 91371
 Israel
<http://www.youngisrael.org/>

Sources:

Rosenthal, Gilbert S. Contemporary Judaism: Patterns of Survival. New York: Human Sciences, 1986.

"Young Israel—Movement to Synagogue." In The Jewish Directory and Almanac, edited by Ivan L. Tillem. New York: Pacific, 1984.

Young Men's Buddhist Association

The Colombo Young Men's Buddhist Association (YMBA), known in Sinhala as Taruna Bauddha Samitiya, was founded in 1898. Many other similar Buddhist societies emerged as a result of the religious revival that began among Buddhists in Sri Lanka in the late nineteenth century. The Colombo YMBA's motto teaches that a life in which morality is well combined with wisdom brings one victory (sila pannanato jayam). One of the aims of the YMBA is "to advance the moral, cultural, physical and social welfare of Buddhists." As a lay Buddhist movement, its strength and prestige increased with the spread of its branches in local areas in the first half of the twentieth century. YMBAs were invented to increase the knowledge in dhamma, to hold discussions on Buddha's teachings, and to help people to organize life in accordance with Buddhist doctrines (according to the dominant THERAVADA BUDDHISM in Sri Lanka). When YMBA grew in strength, it was assigned to organize the Dhamma schools (daham pasal) that have become a characteristic feature of Buddhist education in modern Sri Lanka. Until the Sri Lankan government took over its functions in 1961, YMBA had established a national network of Buddhist Sunday schools for which they provided printed texts and other educational resources.

In organizing the Dhamma schools, YMBA has made a distinctive contribution. On December 20, 1919, Sir D. B. Jayatilake chaired a gathering of Buddhist organizations held at Ananda College. In that assembly, YMBA was asked to hold Dhamma examinations. In the first Dhamma school examination, held in 1920, 374 male and female students from twenty-seven Dhamma schools participated. Although its success encouraged YMBA to hold exams every year, it also introduced Bauddhacarya examination for teachers of the Dhamma schools in 1926, in which twelve teachers took part. During the time of Buddha Jayanti (1956), the interest in Dhamma schools developed steadily. Students could attend the Dhamma schools until the age of twenty-three, and in one class students studied for two years. Although four to five books were assigned for each class, students were also expected to finish the study of texts such as the Abhidharmarthasangraha.

Although the Dhamma examinations, held at five levels, were open to any person interested in the study of Theravada Buddhism, candidates who were over the age of twenty-five were permitted to take diploma examinations without taking the prior ones. The examinations were held on the fourth Sunday of June at centers in Sri Lanka and abroad, and candidates were able to apply through Dhamma schools. The examination contained two papers, testing students' knowledge of Dhamma and Abhidhamma. Further, in the 1980s, the Colombo YMBA was asked to produce the Dhamma school books that were published and distributed free of charge by the Ministry of Buddhist Affairs.

In addition, since 1902, the Colombo YMBA has continuously published an English periodical, The Buddhist, which was originally published by the Colombo THEOLOGICAL SOCIETY, beginning in 1888.

To meet the expectations of lay Buddhists, local YMBAs scattered around the country organize a variety of activities to enhance the learning experience of the laity. For instance, since its founding in 1944, the YMBA in Balapitiya has provided religious instruction on Buddhism by sponsoring preaching sessions by famous Buddhist preachers, such as the Venerable Hinatiyana Dhammaloka (1900–1981).

Most YMBAs across the island nation support observing the precepts on special days, the practice of meditation, holding Dhamma discussions, the distribution of printed sermons, the celebration of Vesak, providing facilities for the sick, sponsoring sports activities, creating library facilities, and promoting the education of local children through financial support and guidance.

Address:

Colombo Young Men's Buddhist Association
70 D.S. Senanayake Mawatha
Colombo 8
Sri Lanka

Mahinda Deegalle

Sources:

Bechert, Heinz. Buddhismus: Staat und Gesellschaft in den Landern des Theravada Buddhismus. 3 vols. Wiesbaden: O. Harnassowitz, 1966–1973.

Bond, George. The Buddhist Revival in Sri Lanka: Religious Tradition, Reinterpretation and Response. Columbia: University of South Carolina Press, 1988.

Gombrich, Richard F. Theravada Buddhism: A Social History from Ancient Benares to Modern Colombo. London: Routledge and Kegan Paul, 1988.

Gombrich, Richard F., and Gananath Obeyesekere. Buddhism Transformed: Religious Change in Sri Lanka. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1988.

Valitota: Balapitiya Taruna Baudha Samitiye Rajata Jayantiya. Edited by D. D. M. Seneviratna et al. Colombo: Anula Mudranalaya, 1971.

the Federated Republics of Yugoslavia that had been founded earlier in the century. Through the 1990s, following the breakup of the former federated state, Yugoslavia was in an almost constant state of war and its leadership widely condemned for its policy of “ethnic cleansing.”

In the second century B.C.E., Rome conquered the eastern coast of the Adriatic Sea and established the province of Illyria over its people. As its territory expanded, it founded a number of cities, including Belgrade. When the Roman Empire was divided into eastern and western regions, the border between the two halves ran through Yugoslavia. Roman control gave way to a variety of invading peoples who moved into the area from the north and west. The last were the Slavs, who eventually dominated the region. The Byzantine Empire moved in to take control of the Slavic population.

Serbia became independent from the Byzantine Empire in the twelfth century. Then, in the fourteenth century, the Turkish Ottoman Empire began its push up the Danube River. Much of Serbia fell to the Turks following the Battle of Kosovo in 1389, and by the end of the century Serbia had disappeared as a political entity. In 1690 the Serbs revolted, and after the revolt was crushed, the Turkish authorities relocated thousands of Albanians to the Kosovo region in the southern part of Serbia.

Turkish authority began to weaken noticeably late in the eighteenth century. In 1829, Serbia emerged as an autonomous province within the empire, though it was not until 1882 that Serbia became an independent nation. In 1905 neighboring Montenegro became independent. World War I brought an end to the Austro-Hungarian Empire that had gained hegemony over former Ottoman territories north and east of Serbia (Croatia, Slovenia, Bosnia, Herzegovina), and in the 1920s, Yugoslavia was formed as an attempt to assert the unity of the southern Slavic peoples. Not included at first, Slovenia was added after World War II.

Postwar Yugoslavia was seen as a federation of republics. Held together for many years by strongman Marshal Josef Broz Tito (1892–1980), the federation fell apart at the beginning of the 1990s. One by one, Slovenia, Croatia, Bosnia

Yugoslavia

The contemporary state of Yugoslavia, consisting of Serbia and Montenegro, though a remnant of the former state that attempted to unite the southern Slavic peoples of Slovenia, Croatia, Bosnia, Herzegovina, and Macedonia, continues

Followers	2000			2025	2050
	total	%	rate
Christians	7,225,000	67.9	1.00	7,858,000	8,414,000
Orthodox	6,046,000	56.8	0.95	6,700,000	6,970,000
Roman Catholics	547,000	5.1	-0.17	750,000	900,000
Independents	185,000	1.7	4.00	260,000	380,000
Muslims	1,723,000	16.2	0.93	1,765,000	1,350,000
Nonreligious	1,328,000	12.5	-1.06	1,109,000	697,000
Atheists	357,000	3.4	-4.40	100,000	70,000
Jews	2,900	0.0	-7.41	2,300	2,000
Ethnoreligionists	1,700	0.0	0.58	3,000	3,800
Baha'is	1,300	0.0	0.97	3,000	6,000
other religionists	2,000	0.0	0.69	4,000	5,000
Total population	10,640,000	100.0	0.47	10,844,000	10,548,000

and Herzegovina, and Macedonia withdrew. Montenegro remained united with Serbia.

Trouble from its large, heavily armed military developed after the federation's breakup. Serbian president Slobodan Milosevic attempted to gather those areas of the former Yugoslavia dominated by ethnic Serbs, and civil war erupted, first in Croatia, then Bosnia and Herzegovina, and eventually in Kosovo. Kosovo existed as an independent province of Serbia, and Milosevic attempted to end that autonomy. In the process Serbian troops attempted to kill or drive out the ethnic Albanians who had lived there since the end of the seventeenth century. The war was eventually stopped only with the intervention of U.S. and European armed forces.

Christianity had entered Serbia during the Roman period and had become a dominant force by the time the empire withdrew. The various peoples who flowed into the territory in succeeding centuries brought new forms of paganism, but eventually, by the ninth century, Christianity had reasserted itself. The church came under the authority of the ECUMENICAL PATRIARCHATE during the years of Byzantine rule, but following the establishment of an independent Serbian nation declared its independence from Constantinople. The break with Constantinople was further emphasized in 1346, when the Serbian archepiscopacy at Pec was elevated into a patriarchate. When the Turkish Ottoman Empire conquered the Balkans in the fourteenth century, the new authorities suppressed the Serbian Patriarchate and placed the church under the archbishop of Ohrid (Macedonia). The patriarchate was not reestablished until 1557, but it was again suppressed in 1766 and the Serbian Church again placed under the Ecumenical Patriarchate.

The struggle for the reemergence of Serbian Orthodoxy began in 1832, when some degree of autonomy was granted. However, it would not be until after World War I that a united SERBIAN ORTHODOX CHURCH was created (1919) and the following year the patriarchate once again allowed to exist. It was not named the official state church, but it enjoyed a number of prerogatives as the church of the ruling elite. Its favored status and financial benefits were dropped by the Marxist government that came to power in 1945.

In 1919 the Macedonian Orthodox Church had been integrated into the Serbian Church, but it became independent in 1967. Meanwhile, the movement of various ethnic peoples during the era of Turkish rule is manifest today in the congregations of the BULGARIAN ORTHODOX CHURCH, the ROMANIAN ORTHODOX CHURCH, and the ALBANIAN ORTHODOX AUTOCEPHALOUS CHURCH, still found in Serbia.

Although the ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH was the majority faith in neighboring Croatia, it was very much the minority in Serbia. Nevertheless, it has had a presence through the centuries. In the sixteenth century, an Eastern Rite Catholic church developed in Croatia as a Roman counterpart to the Serbian Orthodox Church. From headquarters at the Marcha monastery, efforts were launched to convert members of the Serbian Church to Roman Catholicism. The church was given its own diocesan bishop in 1777. When the twentieth-century nation of Yugoslavia was created, the diocese of Krizevci was extended to include all of the country, and it drew members from a variety of predominantly Orthodox ethnic groups (Ukrainians, Serbians, Macedonians, Romanians). Its status as a multinational diocese is presently under consideration. Since the breakup of Yugoslavia, Latin Rite Catholics are under the archbishop of Belgrade.

Protestants came into Serbia during the sixteenth century. The autonomous province of Vojvodina became the center of Lutheran congregations among Hungarian, Slovak, and German ethnic groups. In the twentieth century, two separate churches emerged, the Evangelical Church in the Socialist Republics of Croatia, Bosnia and Herzegovina and the Autonomous Province of Vojvodina, the primary German-speaking church, and the SLOVAK EVANGELICAL CHURCH OF THE AUGSBURG CONFESSION IN YUGOSLAVIA. The former church was at one time a large body, the overwhelming majority of its members being relocated outside Yugoslavia after World War II. The far larger Slovak Church had been connected with the LUTHERAN CHURCH IN HUNGARY, but it became autonomous in the 1920s following the formation of Yugoslavia.

The Reformed Church also established itself in Vojvodina and Croatia, and like the Lutherans was structurally part of the Reformed Church of Hungary. This church survived through World War I and became autonomous in 1933 as the REFORMED CHRISTIAN CHURCH IN YUGOSLAVIA.

Following World War II the German members left, and under the persecution of the Tito regime, many Hungarians returned to Hungary. In the 1990s, the Croatian membership was set apart as an autonomous church. Through the decade, as the wars continued, many Serbians came to Vojvodina, and many Hungarian-speaking people decided to leave. Both the Reformed and Lutheran churches in Vojvodina are members of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES, and they form the backbone of the Ecumenical Council of Churches in Yugoslavia.

The Baptist Church in Yugoslavia began in 1875 when Heinrich Meyer, the German-Baptist leader from Budapest, baptized the first three members of the congregation at Novi Sad. These three people and many of the other early members had been associated with the Nazarenes, a Baptist-like pacifist movement that had previously spread through the region. This original work was primarily among the German-speaking residents of the Yugoslav nations, and it collapsed after World War II. However, in 1898 second work was initiated among the Slovak-speaking population that developed into a Baptist conference in 1918. Two years later work began among Hungarian Serbians.

In 1924 the Baptist Union of Yugoslavia was formed. It was disrupted by the breakup of the federation in 1990, and Baptist congregations in each of the new countries organized separately. A new Baptist Union of Yugoslavia was organized in 1992. It includes a number of small congregations in Serbia and one in Montenegro. The Methodist Episcopal Church (now a constituent part of the UNITED METHODIST CHURCH) began work in Vojvodina in 1898 among German-speaking residents in Bachka. It later spread in the Hungarian-speaking community. These churches were the heart of the Yugoslavia Mission Conference, created in 1922. Methodism grew in spite of its not receiving official recognition by the government. The church suffered first by a drop in support from the United States during the Great Depression, and then the loss of the majority of its German-speaking members following World War II. It survives as a very small body whose members are part of the Macedonia-Yugoslavia Annual Conference of the United Methodist Church.

Through the twentieth century a variety of Protestant and Free Church groups have established work in Yugoslavia. The missions begun by both Pentecostals and the SEVENTH-DAY ADVENTIST CHURCH have survived and are now among the most substantive churches in the country. The largest Pentecostal church is the Evangelical Church. Several Evangelical sending agencies continue work in the new century that was launched prior to the breakup of the federation, including the Pocket Testament League and Campus Crusade for Christ.

There is a small Jewish community in Yugoslavia centered on Belgrade, which continues a Jewish community in the region that dates to the Roman period. The community that survived the Holocaust is centered on Belgrade, and it includes some two thousand members. Members are united by the Federation of Jewish Communities of Yugoslavia.

The Muslim community in what is present-day Yugoslavia was strongest in Kosovo, and Kosovo Muslims, many of Albanian ethnicity, were among the people targeted by Serbian forces during the civil war in the 1990s. Many died, and others were forced to leave the country. The community is reorganizing in the aftermath of the war, before which they represented between 15 and 20 percent of the population. As in Turkey, the Muslims are primarily Sunnis of the HANAFITE SCHOOL OF ISLAM. There are also a small number of members of the BAHÁ'Í FAITH.

Several Eastern religions were established in Yugoslavia as the Marxist regime came to an end. Most prominent among them are two Buddhist groups, the KARMA KAGYU Tibetan Buddhists and THE KWAN UM ZEN SCHOOL. Hinduism is represented by the INTERNATIONAL SOCIETY FOR KRISHNA CONSCIOUSNESS.

On March 12, 2002, as this encyclopedia went to press, an agreement was reached to restructure Yugoslavia as a new nation to be called Serbia and Montenegro, both of which will exist as autonomous units that will retain a common defense and foreign policy but have separate economies, currencies, and customs services.

Sources:

- Broun, J. "Religion in Yugoslavia: The Background." America 165 (November 30, 1991): 414–416.
- Flere, S. "Denominational Affiliation in Yugoslavia, 1930–1989." East European Quarterly 25 (June 1991): 145–165.
- Frid, Z., ed. Religions in Yugoslavia: Historical Survey, Legal Status, Church in Socialism, Ecumenism, Dialogue between Marxists and Christians, etc. Zagreb: Binoza, 1971.
- Shenk, N. G. The Social Role of Religion in Contemporary Yugoslavia. Ph.D. dissertation, Northwestern University, 1987.

Zambia

Zambia, in the heart of Central Africa, is a landlocked country surrounded by the Democratic Republic of the Congo, Angola, and Zimbabwe, among other countries. Over the centuries it was settled by various Bantu peoples who attempted to make a place for themselves in the several river valleys and along the lakes that constitute its border with neighboring countries. Modern history begins with the initial trek of Portuguese explorers attempting to find a land route tying together Mozambique and Angola. They were frustrated first by the Sotos, who moved into the Congo when driven out of their lands to the south, and then by the British, who moved into the area from South Africa. The British both coveted the mineral resources of the region and wanted to build their own land route across Africa (from South Africa to Egypt).

The British-South Africa Company kept control of what became known as Northern Rhodesia (named for Cecil Rhodes) through the nineteenth century, and the British government assumed direct hegemony only in 1924. The oppressive conditions in the mines became the catalyst to unite people in the effort to gain independence. In 1953 the British moved Zambia into a federation with Southern Rhodesia (Zimbabwe) and Nyssaland (Malawi). Kenneth Naunda led the forces boycotting an election that would institutionalize European domination of the federated states. The struggle would be fought openly over the next decade, but after Naunda's United National Independence Party won the 1964 elections, independence immediately followed.

Naunda survived Zambia's isolation from its neighbors with an economy built on copper mining, and saw the situation reverse when the other countries gained their independence. He led the country until 1991, when a multiparty system was adopted and Frederick Chiluba was elected to succeed him.

Status of religions in Zambia, 2000-2050

Followers	2000		2025	2050
	total	% rate
Christians	7,551,000	82.4 2.50	13,703,000	19,087,000
Roman Catholics	3,070,000	33.5 2.71	5,600,000	8,000,000
Protestants	2,705,000	29.5 3.38	4,997,000	7,210,000
Independents	1,580,000	17.2 2.96	3,000,000	4,600,000
Ethnoreligionists	1,310,000	14.3 1.76	1,266,000	1,000,000
Baha'is	162,000	1.8 3.07	360,000	700,000
Muslims	97,900	1.1 2.04	180,000	250,000
Nonreligious	23,400	0.3 2.09	60,000	92,000
Hindus	12,500	0.1 2.29	25,000	40,000
Atheists	7,100	0.1 2.11	13,000	20,000
Buddhists	3,100	0.0 2.65	7,000	12,000
Jews	1,200	0.0 1.72	2,000	3,000
Total population	9,169,000	100.0 2.39	15,616,000	21,204,000

Traditional religions have had a rich history since the coming of the Europeans. The religions that were developed by the various Bantu groups held in common the belief in a supreme being, variously called Mulungu or Lesa, the veneration of one's ancestors, and the practice of magic. In reaction to the presence of whites, a variety of movements have developed, drawing adherents from multiple peoples; new movements have come in from neighboring countries, especially the Mahamba movement from Angola and the Mashave movement from lands to the south. Most of these movements have in common an emphasis on spiritual healing or spirit possession. Somewhat different has been the Mchape movement from Malawi, which aims to counter witchcraft—that is, malevolent magic.

The first Christians in Zambia were Portuguese Catholics who entered the region in the late 1700s. The first permanent missionary station, however, was opened in 1885 by the Paris Mission affiliated with the REFORMED CHURCH OF FRANCE. The LONDON MISSIONARY SOCIETY, the CHURCH OF SCOTLAND's (Presbyterian) missionaries, and the British Methodists arrived within a few years. Each of these missions grew into churches, which finally merged in 1965 to form the UNITED CHURCH OF ZAMBIA, the largest church in the country. Kenneth Naunda was himself a Presbyterian. Other early churches with a sizable following include the REFORMED CHURCH IN ZAMBIA (started from South Africa), the CHRISTIAN BROTHERS, the SEVENTH-DAY ADVENTIST CHURCH, and the AFRICAN METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH. Representatives of the CHURCH OF ENGLAND arrived in Zambia in 1909 and built their church primarily among white settlers. Zambian Anglicans are now part of the CHURCH OF THE PROVINCE OF CENTRAL AFRICA.

The ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH finally established permanent work in 1891 through the efforts of the WHITE FATHERS. They were later provided assistance by the FRANCISCANS, Capuchins, and JESUITS. The church grew steadily through the twentieth century, and the first bishop was established in Lusaka in 1959. The first African bishop was consecrated in 1963.

The JEHOVAH'S WITNESSES entered Zambia in 1911 and soon spread among the native population. At their height as many as a fourth of the population were affiliated, and 15 to 20 percent remain aligned. Their growth has come in the face of periodic attempts by the government to suppress them, the most recent being in the late 1960s, when the new independent government banished all foreign leadership and tried (unsuccessfully) to destroy the movement. Today the Witnesses claim some 375,000 adherents. Their influence is extended through several large independent Witness groups. Of these, the independent Watchtower group, is most interesting, as it has built its work around four cooperative villages. The NEW APOSTOLIC CHURCH, a German-based nineteenth-century millennial group, came to Zambia in 1915 and, like the Witnesses, has had spectacular success.

Zambia has been a center of new African Indigenous Churches, especially in the years since the country's independence. Among the most important is the Lumpa or Visible Salvation Church founded by Alice Lenshina in 1954. It still has an active following counted in the tens of thousands, though it was officially banned in 1965. Also functioning is the MUTIMA WALOWA WA MUKUMBI (Sweet Heart of the Clouds Church), founded in 1951 by Emilio Mulolani Chishimba. The majority of the more than one hundred independent churches known to exist in the country have come into Zambia from neighboring countries, though most have only small followings.

At least three ecumenical councils now operate in Zambia. The more liberal churches, those associated with the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES, have remained in the Christian Council of Zambia, originally founded in 1945. The more conservative Evangelical groups compose the Evangelical Fellowship of Zambia, associated with the WORLD EVANGELICAL ALLIANCE. Many of the independent churches have banded together in the Association of Independent Churches.

Zambia has attracted only a small representative sampling of the world's religions. There is a small Jewish community of less than fifty resident members in Lusaka who support the Lusaka Hebrew Congregation. A larger Muslim community is focused upon Asian expatriates residing in Lusaka and several other urban centers. Similar is Hinduism, also brought to Zambia from India, but having little appeal to the population at large. Following a distinct course is the BAHÁ'Í FAITH, which has enjoyed some success since the 1960s among various Zambian peoples.

Sources:

- Cross, S. The Watchtower Movement in South Central Africa. Ph.D. dissertation, Oxford University, 1973.
- Roberts, A. D. "The Lumpa Church of Alice Lenshina." In Protest and Power in Black Africa, edited by R. Rotberg and A. Mazrui. New York: Oxford University Press, 1970.
- Rotberg, R. Christian Missionaries and the Creation of Northern Rhodesia. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1965.

Zaydites

Most Shi'a Muslims trace the lineage of their leadership, the Imams, through al-Husayn's surviving son, Ali, better known as Zayn al-Abidin (d. 714), and his son, Muhammad al-Baqir (d. c. 732). However, between their time in office, the Shi'a community had to face the challenge posed by the elder son of Zayn al-Abidin, Zayd b. Ali (d. 740), who had been named the new Shi'a Imam ahead of al-Baqir.

Zayd came to his office as the understanding of the Imam as guide of the community was being elevated. Zayd rejected this trend and the ascription of any divine or supernatural elements to the Imam's authority. As his opinions became known, the majority of the Shi'ite leadership rejected him, moved to substitute al-Baqir in his place. The Shi'as came to consider Zayd as never having been the Imam. His small following survived, however, and in the ninth century they were able to establish hegemony in two countries, Tabaristan (south of the Caspian Sea) and Yemen. The former Zaydi state came to an end in 928, was re-established in 964, but declined in the twelfth century. Most of the Zaydis were absorbed into the larger Shi'ite community.

Yemen, as a Zaydi state, was founded in 890 and has lasted through the twentieth century. Zaydi supremacy was challenged in the years after the fall of the Fatimid Dynasty in Egypt as ISMAILI ISLAM grew strong in the region, but in spite of the attacks from the Ismailis, the Yemeni state retained its independence. Then in 1539, it was incorporated into the Ottoman Empire (based in HANAFITE Sunni Islam). Their rule lasted only until 1595, when the Zaydites revolted; they drove the Ottomans out in 1635. Yemen retained its independence for more than two centuries, but in 1872 the Ottomans once again took over the region. As the Ottomans declined, Yemen received independence (albeit with strong British influence) as World War I progressed.

The Zaydites disagree with the Shi'ites on the issues of the Imamate (the same issue that split Sunnis and Shi'as). They did retain the office of the Imam, though he was chosen on merit; military skill often being more important than any spiritual or intellectual qualifications. There are reports of two rivals for the Imam's office fighting to the death to demonstrate their higher qualifications.

The Zaydite community has been dramatically affected by events since 1949. In 1949 there was an attempt to overthrow the government by coup. Although Imam Yahya was killed, the coup did not succeed. His successors remained in power until 1962, when a secular coup was successful in deposing the Imam and establishing the Yemen Arab Republic (superseded in 1990 by the People's Democratic Republic of Yemen). Since that time, the office of the Imam has remained vacant.

The Zaydites have no separate headquarters, though it is the official religion of Yemen. There is a Ministry of Awqaf (endowments) and Religious Guidance in the government at the national level. Most of the world's eight million Zaydites reside in Yemen, but they may now be found scattered around the globe.

Source:

Yann, Richard. Shi'ite Islam. Oxford: Blackwell, 1995.

Zen Buddhism

Zen Buddhism is a branch of MAHAYANA BUDDHISM. According to legend, the Buddha established the foundations of Zen Buddhism during a discourse on Vulture Peak in which he held up a flower. Only Mahakashyapa understood this message, becoming the first Indian patriarch in the Zen Buddhist lineage. Legend continues that an Indian monk named Bodhidharma transmitted this new form of Buddhism to China around 500 C.E. Bodhidharma's teachings mixed with DAOISM to form a new school of Mahayana Buddhism, called Ch'an. Ch'an is the Chinese pronunciation of the Sanskrit word dhyana, which means meditation. In Japan, Ch'an became known as Zen, which is the Japanese pronunciation of Ch'an. The two main schools of Japanese Zen Buddhism, RINZAI and SOTO, were introduced into Japan from China in the twelfth and thirteenth centuries, respectively. Both schools adapted to Japanese culture, while still retaining elements of their Chinese roots.

The aim of Zen Buddhism is to achieve enlightenment. The essential nature of Zen is often summarized as:

A special transmission outside the scriptures;
No dependence upon words and letters;
Direct pointing at the human heart;
Seeing into one's nature and the realization of Buddhahood.

Zen claims to differ from other Buddhist schools in its emphasis on seated meditation. In contrast with his contemporaries, Bodhidharma de-emphasized the existing focus on priestly ritual and the endless chanting of the sutras or Buddhist scriptures. Although other Buddhist schools often balance meditation with other religious practices such as intellectual analysis of doctrines or devotional practices, Zen considers those practices useless in attaining enlightenment. The core of Zen practice is seated meditation, called zazen. Meditation practices differ in different schools: generally, Soto Zen teaches shikantaza, and Rinzai Zen teaches koan practice. Shikantaza (nothing but sitting) involves sitting, in a state of alert attention that is free of thoughts. Koans are paradoxical questions, phrases, or stories that cannot be solved using intellectual reasoning, such as "What is the sound of one hand clapping?"

Like other Buddhist traditions, Zen Buddhism has begun to develop in Western countries in the last one hundred years. In 1893, Shaku Soyen attended the Chicago World's Parliament of Religions, becoming the first Zen master to visit the United States. In the early 1900s a few Rinzai priests moved to the United States, and in 1930 one of these established the first Zen center in the United States in New York, the Buddhist Society of America. Works on Zen by authors such as D. T. Suzuki had an important role in contributing to an understanding of Zen at an intellectual and philosophical level in both the United States and Europe. Interest in the practice of Zen came later, beginning with the influence of the Beat generation in the 1950s and increasing in the 1960s with the arrival of Japanese teachers coming to teach and establish centers in Europe and the United States.

The vast majority of Zen practitioners outside of Japan are converts. There are now indigenous Zen teachers from a variety of lineages leading Zen groups in countries as diverse as the United States, Canada, the United Kingdom, France, Germany, Poland, Spain, Sweden, Switzerland, Australia, New Zealand, Argentina, Brazil, India, and the Philippines. As Zen has developed it has been recontextualized to suit Western cultures. Major changes include an emphasis on lay practice, equality for women, the application of democratic principles, an emphasis on ethics, and secularization and the linkage to some sciences, particularly psychology and psychotherapy.

Rinzai Zen (dry landscape) garden at the Nanzen-ji Temple in Kyoto, Japan (Christopher Rennie/TRIP)

Zen Buddhism has an extensive presence on the Internet, a good starting point being the Zen Buddhism Virtual Library at <http://www.ciolek.com/WWWVL-Zen.html>. It includes a directory of groups and centers internationally.

Michelle Spuler

Sources:

- Dumoulin, Heinrich. Zen Buddhism: A History. Translated by James W. Heisig and Paul Knitter. 2d ed. New York: Macmillan, 1994.
- Kapleau, Philip. The Three Pillars of Zen. New York: Weatherhill, 1965.
- Rommeluère, Eric. Guide du Zen. Paris: Livre de poche, 1997.

Shunryu Suzuki. Zen Mind, Beginner's Mind. Edited by Trudy Dixon. New York: Weatherhill, 1970.

Zhengyi Daoism

The Zhengyi represent the second group of legitimate Daoists active today (the other being QUANZHEN). They are sometimes called Tianshi Daoists because they claim to trace their lineage back to the Heavenly Masters of the Han dynasty (Daoism), though scholars doubt the continuity. The Zhang family of Jiangxi Province, unknown before the ninth century, took on the mantle of the Zhang family of Sichuan Province of the second century and received imperial recognition. Thus the Zhengyi (Orthodox Unity) Order of Longhushan (Dragon Tiger Mountain) was created. That is still their headquarters in mainland China.

In 1304 the Yuan emperor appointed the Celestial Master to supervise the registers of other sects, and many folded into the Zhengyi. The Zhengyi was the dominant school during the Ming, and many of the Zhang family married into the imperial family.

Early Western accounts of Zhengyi called the hereditary Celestial Master “the Daoist Pope.” In 1949 the 63rd Celestial Master moved to Taiwan, where the 64th lives today. (That is the 64th counting from Zhang Daoling, though the lineage is verifiable only through the 23rd, dating to the middle of the Tang.) Today approximately 20 percent of Daoists on the mainland are Zhengyi, concentrated mainly in southeast China. Taiwan (where many southeast Chinese immigrated after the Communist takeover) is predominantly Zhengyi. In Beijing, Zhengyi was represented by Dongyue miao (Eastern Peak Temple), built during the Yuan Dynasty, now a museum.

Zhengyi ordination is passed down from father to son within individual families, or through master-disciple as legitimated through adoption. Priests work out of their homes, where they maintain an altar. They provide ritual services on demand or according to the calendar to community members, who are not necessarily Daoist. Zhengyi is sometimes seen as “folk Daoism,” though that is a misnomer.

Major rituals include jiao (communal sacrifice), which harmonizes the entire community with the cosmos. Used to commemorate a special event, the jiao includes a celebratory offering of flowers, fruit, and incense. The zhai are rituals of repentance in which the priests inside the temple fast on behalf of the community. Paradoxically, in the modern Daoist temple, zhai refers to the special community banquet (vegetarian dishes prepared to look and taste like meat) that follows.

Both jiao and zhai are commonly performed in conjunction with each other as part of an entire series of rituals held during a multiday festival. Other Zhengyi rituals include the gongde (requiem service), healing, and exorcisms. These rites incorporate many layers of previous ritual going back two thousand years in Daoist history.

The division of labor in a traditional Zhengyi ritual is complicated. Priests nicknamed “black hats” perform classical rites inside the temple, to which the public is not admitted. “Red hats” (called fangshi, a Han dynasty term meaning ritual master) orally describe what is going on to the masses thronged outside the temple. Also, significant local variation has developed over time, depending on family lineage.

Important fieldwork on Zhengyi Daoist ritual has been done in Taiwan, in particular by scholars who have been initiated as Zhengyi priests, notably Kristofer Schipper and Michael Saso. Besides these scholar-practitioners, there are few true Zhengyi Daoists in the Western world. One attempt to re-create a Zhengyi ritual community in the West is Orthodox Daoism in America (ODA). Founded by the Euro-American Liu Ming (born Charles Belyea), the ODA accepts serious students interested in investiture (text completion) or ordination. Liu Ming also lectures to the public. The ODA publishes a quarterly newsletter, Frost Bell, which explains Zhengyi Daoism to a Western audience.

Address:

Longhushan Tainshi Association
Longhushan
Jiangxi 335411
People’s Republic of China

Elijah Siegler

Sources:

Dean, Kenneth. Taoist Ritual and Popular Cults of Southeast China. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1993.
Saso, Michael. Taoism and the Rite of Cosmic Renewal. Pullman: Washington State University Press, 1973.

Zhong Gong

Zhong Gong, founded in 1988, is one of the most popular of the qigong groups operating in the People’s Republic of China. By the end of the 1990s it was estimated to have tens of millions of followers. However, in 1999, in the wake of the government’s crackdown on the FALUN GONG, it also was singled out for repressive measures.

Zhong Gong, the China Health Care and Wisdom Enhancement Gong, was founded by Zhang Hongbao (b. 1955) during the heyday of government support for qigong. He taught a traditional form of qigong, emphasizing the use of exercises and meditation as a means of stimulating qi energy. Such energy, once properly flowing through the body, would bring health and enhance mental functioning. Zhong Gong operated independently of the officially sanctioned National Qigong Association, and it speedily spread across the country. In spite of its independent stance, it was favorably mentioned in the official press. Its training school in Shaanxi Province had more than two thousand students. Reportedly, no lesser a personage than the country’s president, Jiang Zemin, had sought out a Zhong Gong master to treat his arthritis and back pain.

Through the 1990s, the group had some minor run-ins with the authorities. Its independent ways became known, but no ideological elements appeared to contradict government authority (as was the case with Falun Gong). However, in December 1999, police abruptly closed the Zhong Gong training facility in Shaanxi. Then in January 2000, a Zhong Gong leader in Zhejiang Province was sentenced to two years for the Chinese equivalent of practicing medicine without a license, a changed evaluation of the group that potentially placed all qigong groups at risk. The government has charged that following qigong has been accompanied with admonitions to stop seeing medical doctors.

Out of its interaction with Zhong Gong, the government promulgated changes in the regulations covering qigong groups. These new rules specified how groups should be organized and placed limitations on the teachings they could espouse. The human rights press in Hong Kong and worldwide now monitors the ongoing issues surrounding Zhong Gong and other qigong groups.

Sources:

Eckholm, Erik. "China Imprisons a Leader of Healing-by-Meditation Society." New York Times, January 20, 2000.

Lee, Richard E. Scientific Investigations in Chinese Qigong. San Clemente, CA: China Healthways Institute, 1999.

Peisheng, Wang, and Chen Guanhua. Relax and Calming Qigong. Hong Kong: Peace, 1986.

Zimbabwe

The modern nation of Zimbabwe (formerly the British colony of South Rhodesia), proclaimed in 1980, traces its history to the arrival of Bantu miners who came to work the extensive iron ore deposits around the fifth century C.E. They also worked the copper and tin deposits they found. Today, the Shona Bantu make up 94 percent of the Zimbabwean population. The Zimbabwean Bantu society created one of the highest medieval cultures in Africa, symbolized by the tenth-century walled city of Zimbabwe, from which the contemporary nation takes its name.

The Shona Bantu were divided into a number of sub-groups. The Karanga people who built Zimbabwe extended their rule into present-day Mozambique and Malawi, and they traded their metal with the Asian market. The Karanga were displaced in the fifteenth century by the Rotsi, who continued their Asian trade until the Portuguese disruption of East African coastal life in the sixteenth century.

In 1834 the Zulus came into the area and pushed the Rotsi northward and westward. Zulu hegemony prevailed in southeastern Zimbabwe. In 1889 a representative of the British South African Company (headed by Cecil Rhodes) negotiated rights to exploit the mineral resources of the Status of religions in Zimbabwe, 2000-2050

Followers	2000			2025	2050
	total	%	rate
Christians	7,870,000	67.5	1.84	11,157,000	14,109,000
Independents	4,700,000	40.3	2.56	7,000,000	9,300,000
Protestants	1,440,000	12.3	1.43	1,700,000	2,000,000
Roman Catholics	1,120,000	9.6	2.10	1,700,000	2,300,000
Ethnoreligionists	3,517,000	30.1	1.36	3,500,000	3,300,000
Nonreligious	112,000	1.0	2.84	200,000	400,000
Muslims	85,400	0.7	0.66	100,000	120,000
Baha'is	37,100	0.3	2.49	60,000	100,000
Hindus	16,900	0.1	2.26	30,000	50,000
Atheists	16,200	0.1	2.21	25,000	35,000
Jews	10,800	0.1	1.40	15,000	16,000
Buddhists	820	0.0	1.56	1,800	4,000
Spiritists	530	0.0	0.60	800	1,200
other religionists	1,500	0.0	1.52	2,500	4,000
Total population	11,669,000	100.0	1.70	15,092,000	18,139,000

Zulu-controlled part of the country. The British founded the town of Salisbury (now Harare), and over the course of the next years they created a situation to legitimize their takeover of the Shona Bantu land (1895).

In the 1960s, the white-led government resisted attempts to transfer power to the African majority, and in 1965 independence was proclaimed. The Ian Smith government held on for more than a decade, but the process of transferring power began in 1979 with the election of Abel Muzorewa (b. 1925), a bishop in the UNITED METHODIST CHURCH, as president. He changed the name of the country to Zimbabwe-Rhodesia, but his government fell the next year; in new elections, the Zimbabwe African National Union led by Robert Mugabe was swept into power. Mugabe was able to reconcile with his main political rival later in the decade, and the merged Patriotic Front of the Zimbabwean African

A Pentecostal Missionary baptizes a convert in Zimbabwe. (D. Butcher/TRIP)

National Union has subsequently remained the primary political organization in the country. Mugabe remains in power after having faced several elections through the 1990s.

Zimbabwe has one of the most diverse religious communities of any nation in Africa. Some 30 percent of the population continue to follow traditional African religions, with some of the smaller groups not a part of the Bantu being among the most resistant to the various new religious traditions that entered in the nineteenth century. The Shona people worship a supreme being known as Mwari. In Shona thought, unlike that of most traditionalists in nearby countries, the supreme being provides ongoing contact through a variety of intermediaries (similar to mediums in Western esoteric traditions) between God and his human children. Religious functionaries become possessed by Mwari, various ancestor spirits, and the lion spirits, the spirits of chiefs who ruled in Zimbabwe in ancient times. Various medium-like functionaries serve as leaders of different movements among the various subdivisions of the Shona.

Christianity was brought into the area in the sixteenth century, the Portuguese having made contact with the Shona in 1561. However, no permanent Christian community was established. Then in 1859, the LONDON MISSIONARY SOCIETY (LMS) (Congregationalists from England) made contact with the Zulu chief and were granted permission to open a mission station. The LMS would dominate Protestant effort in Zimbabwe until the end of the 1880s.

The ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH returned in 1879 and established early centers in Salisbury and Bulawayo. It established itself within the white community in the country, but steadily in the last half of the twentieth century it found support among native Zimbabweans. The first African bishop was consecrated in 1973, during the years of the Smith government. To the present the church has not produced a sufficient number of black priests, and the majority of the priests remain foreign born. The church is supported by four indigenous female religious orders, among which the largest part of the church's African leadership is found.

A new day for Zimbabwean Christianity began in 1888 when the British government, having asserted some hegemony in the region, gave the CHURCH OF ENGLAND-related Universities Mission to Central Africa a grant of land, and work was subsequently initiated among both the Shona and Zulu peoples. The diocese of Rhodesia was erected in 1891. The work was incorporated into the CHURCH OF THE PROVINCE OF CENTRAL AFRICA, created in 1955.

British Methodists arrived in 1890, and their American cousins six years later. The former had substantial support among Zimbabweans of British background, while the latter was a totally African church (apart from the small number of missionaries) from the beginning. The British work grew into what is today the METHODIST CHURCH IN ZIMBABWE. The American work remains attached to the UNITED METHODIST CHURCH as its Zimbabwe Conference. Abel Muzorewa, the first African bishop, was consecrated in 1968. In 1992 the United Methodists founded Africa University.

THE SALVATION ARMY came to Rhodesia in 1891, and now it has one of its largest followings among the Shona. Other Protestant churches with substantial followings include the SEVENTH-DAY ADVENTIST CHURCH (1894), CHURCHES OF CHRIST (NON-INSTRUMENTAL) (1896), the AFRICAN METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH (1900), the EVANGELICAL LUTHERAN CHURCH IN ZIMBABWE (1903), and the NEW APOSTOLIC CHURCH (1910). Baptist work began in 1917 but was largely related to the white community. The SOUTHERN BAPTIST CONVENTION directed its concern to Zimbabwe after World War II, and in 1950 it picked up the support of an independent Baptist missionary couple who had been working in the country since 1930. With added support from the United States, the mission grew rapidly and matured in 1963 into the Baptist Convention of Zimbabwe.

In the early twentieth century, the first of the AFRICAN INITIATED CHURCHES appeared, and several—such as the AFRICAN APOSTOLIC CHURCH OF JOHANE MARANGE, the MAI CHAZA CHURCH, and the ZIMBABWE ASSEMBLIES OF GOD AFRICA—are among the largest Christian bodies in the country. The ZIONIST AND APOSTOLIC CHURCHES from South Africa have also garnered a significant following, and the ZION CHRISTIAN CHURCH is now larger than the Roman Catholic Church. The ZIONIST AND APOSTOLIC CHURCHES have grown into a large body in the years since the country's independence.

The various Christian churches in Zimbabwe are associated in several ecumenical organizations. The Zimbabwe Council of Churches, with its roots in the Southern Rhodesia Missionary Council, founded in 1903, is affiliated with the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES. The Evangelical Fellowship of Zimbabwe is affiliated with the WORLD EVANGELICAL ALLIANCE. A spectrum of the African Initiated Churches came together in 1972 to found the African Indigenous Churches Conference.

Also representing the larger Christian world are the CHURCH OF JESUS CHRIST OF LATTER-DAY SAINTS (which arrived in 1950) and the JEHOVAH'S WITNESSES (c. 1910). In the twentieth century, Zimbabwe has become home to a spectrum of the world's major religious traditions. Daniel Montage Kisch, a Jew, arrived in Zimbabwe in 1869 and became an advisor to King Lobengula, the Zulu ruler. In the 1880s, Jewish immigrants from Eastern Europe (primarily from Lithuania and Russia) began to arrive. They were joined by German Jewish immigrants in the 1930s, and British and South African Jews in the decades after World War II. The contemporary community of some ten thousand Jews has its center in the Zimbabwe Jewish Board of Deputies and the two synagogues in Harare and Bulawayo.

Zimbabwe is also home to one of the African groups that claim a relationship to the larger community. The LEMBA people identify themselves as Jews culturally, following a set of traditional cultural and ritual practices that signify to them their Hebrew ancestry. Although their status as Jews is a matter of debate, in 1996 a set of studies began to appear that provided scientific support to their claims of Hebrew ancestry.

The small Muslim community grew tenfold (from eight thousand to eighty thousand) during the last quarter of the twentieth century, primarily because of the immigration of Muslims from neighboring Malawi and Mozambique. Most are Sunnis of the SHAFIITE school. There is a Hindu community based in the Indian community, and the BAHÁ'Í FAITH has experienced considerable growth, in large part at the expense of the Muslims and Hindus.

Zimbabwe has provided a welcoming environment for many of the new religious groups from around the world, and today one can find centers of the ANCIENT AND MYSTICAL ORDER ROSAE CRUCIS, the CHURCH OF SCIENTOLOGY, the INTERNATIONAL SOCIETY FOR KRISHNA CONSCIOUSNESS, and the UNIFICATION CHURCH. Buddhism is represented by SOKA GAKKAI INTERNATIONAL, and there is one Tibetan Buddhist center in Harare.

Sources:

- Daneel, M. L. Zionism and Faith Healing in Rhodesia: Aspects of African Independent Churches. The Hague: Mouton, 1970.
- Hallencreutz, C. F., and A. Mayo, eds. Church and State in Zimbabwe. Vol. 3: Christianity South of the Zambesi. Gweru, Zimbabwe: Mambo, 1988.
- Mandivebga, E. C. Islam in Zimbabwe. Gweru, Zimbabwe: Mambo, 1983.
- Zvobgo, C. J. M. History of Christian Missions in Zimbabwe. Gweru, Zimbabwe: Mambo, 1996.

Zimbabwe Assemblies of God Africa

One of the largest denominations in Zimbabwe is the Zimbabwe Assemblies of God Africa (popularly called ZAOGA), a newer Pentecostal church with roots in South African Pentecostalism, the APOSTOLIC FAITH MISSION OF SOUTH AFRICA (AFM). ZAOGA commenced in urban areas of Zimbabwe and is led by Archbishop Ezekiel Guti. In 1959, Guti and a group of young African pastors were expelled from the AFM after a disagreement with white missionaries. The group joined the South African Assemblies of God of Nicholas Bhengu, but separated from there in 1967 to form the Assemblies of God, Africa (later the ZAOGA). Guti went to the independent Pentecostal Christ for the Nations Institute in Dallas, Texas, in 1971, and he too received financial and other resources from the United States. But Guti, like many leaders of the new PENTECOSTALISM in Africa, resists any attempts to identify his church with the “religious right” of the United States or to be controlled by what are considered “neocolonial” interests. In a very pertinent development in 1986, leaders of twelve of the largest Pentecostal churches in Zimbabwe, including Guti, wrote a fierce rebuttal to a right-wing attack on the Zimbabwean state by a North American Charismatic preacher.

Since 1986, ZAOGA has also had churches in Britain. Zimbabwean ZAOGA missionaries went to South Africa to plant churches there in 1989, and the church also has branches, called “Forward in Faith,” in seventeen other African countries. ZAOGA is now organized as a full-fledged denomination with headquarters complex and administrative structures in Harare, headed by Guti. By 1999, ZAOGA had an estimated 600,000 affiliated members, which made it the third largest denomination in Zimbabwe after the AFRICAN APOSTOLIC CHURCH OF JOHANE MARANGE and the ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH, with more than 10 percent of the Christians in the country. ZAOGA itself claimed to be the largest, with one and a half million members in 1995, but that figure is disputed. Guti’s leadership style and expensive overseas trips were becoming contentious issues in the late 1990s, as were the lifestyles of some of his more powerful pastors. ZAOGA has already experienced various splits, resulting in several new and vigorous Pentecostal churches in Zimbabwe.

Allan H. Anderson

Sources:

Anderson, Allan H. African Reformation: African Initiated Christianity in the Twentieth Century. Lawrenceville, NJ: Africa World Press, 2001.

Maxwell, David. “‘Delivered from the Spirit of Poverty’: Pentecostalism, Prosperity and Modernity in Zimbabwe.” Journal of Religion in Africa 28, 3 (1998): 350–373.

Zion Christian Church (South Africa, Zimbabwe)

The Zion Christian Church (ZCC), not a typical Zionist church but now the largest denomination in South Africa, was founded by Engenas (Ignatius) Lekganyane (c. 1880–1948). ZCC tradition says that in about 1910, the official year of the commencement of the church, Lekganyane was praying when he received a revelation through a whirlwind that he would found a large church. In about 1916, Elias Mahlangu founded the Zion Apostolic Church of South Africa (ZAC), and Lekganyane was ordained and emerged as leader of a ZAC congregation in his home village. Mahlangu began to promote customs among ZAC members that Lekganyane objected to, such as wearing white robes, growing a beard, and taking off shoes before services—practices found in many ZIONIST AND APOSTOLIC CHURCHES today but not allowed in the ZCC. Lekganyane’s break with the ZAC came in 1920, when he went to Lesotho and joined Edward (Lion) Motaung’s Zion Apostolic Faith Mission (ZAFM), where he was ordained bishop. Differences emerged, and at about the end of 1924, Lekganyane founded the Zion Christian Church.

In 1930, Lekganyane bought a farm near Pietersburg that became the church headquarters, Moria, to which Zionists flock today. In keeping with Zion City near Chicago and other African Zions, Lekganyane established a mecca for pilgrimage, a center of ritual power. In 1935 the ZCC membership was about 2,000, but by 1942, when the church was at last officially registered, there were fifty-five congregations and 27,487 members, having spread to Zimbabwe, Botswana, and the Northern Cape Province. A year later, the ZCC membership was over 40,000. Lekganyane died in 1948, and a leadership struggle ensued between his sons Edward and Joseph. It was not clear whom Engenas had appointed as successor, and the brothers formed two separate churches in 1949. The followers of Joseph, the minority faction, are now St. Engenas Zion Christian Church, and the majority of Engenas’s people followed Edward in the Zion Christian Church. There is very little difference between the two in beliefs and practices. Under Edward Legkanyane (1925–1967) the ZCC continued to grow, so that by 1954 the membership was some 80,000, probably the biggest AIC in southern Africa at that time. Edward was a very effective leader, and after his premature death in 1967, his son Barnabas, the present bishop (b. 1954), succeeded him, although a superintendent governed the church until 1975, Barnabas’s twenty-first birthday.

Since being registered with the government in 1942, the ZCC has enjoyed the favor of the ruling regime. Edward Lekganyane invited the government to the annual Easter conference in 1965, during apartheid’s worst years. Barnabas also invited the regime, beginning in 1980. In the much-publicized event at the 75th anniversary celebration at Easter 1985, President P. W. Botha was given the Freedom of Moria. After this event, ZCC members in Soweto were subject to a spate of violent attacks, as the visit reinforced the suspicion that the ZCC was a supporter of the status quo. Nevertheless, the ZCC has emerged from the fear of an oppressive regime to play a role in the radical changes since 1990. There were an estimated four million members of the ZCC in 2000, the second largest AIC in the continent.

The ZCC is the most significant Zionist church in Zimbabwe, and it has existed separately from the South African ZCC. Samuel Mutendi (c. 1898–1976) had a series of dreams in 1919 revealing that he would start an African church. He was baptized by Engenas Lekganyane in Pretoria in 1923 and commissioned as the ZAFM's missionary to Zimbabwe. In 1925, Lekganyane called Mutendi and other Zionist leaders to Pretoria, where the ZCC was organized. Mutendi was the only Zimbabwean leader to join the new church, and Lekganyane ordained him a minister. Mutendi modeled the new Zimbabwean church on the ZCC in South Africa, and he remained loyal to Lekganyane until his death in 1948. Thereafter, the two ZCC churches had less contact, and although Edward Lekganyane managed to visit Mutendi in 1953, the ZCC in Zimbabwe became fully autonomous. It had thirteen minor schisms between 1929 and 1961, but the most serious schism occurred after Mutendi's death in 1976. A succession struggle between his sons Ruben and Nehemiah resulted in two separate ZCC churches—Ruben with the smaller faction of some 50,000 members by 2000, and Nehemiah, who had received the support of most of the senior ministers, with more than 200,000.

Address:

Zion Christian Church
Zion City Moria
P.O. Boyne
nr Pietersburg
South Africa

Allan H. Anderson

Sources:

- Anderson, Allan H. "The Lekganyanes and Prophecy in the Zion Christian Church." Journal of Religion in Africa 29, 3 (August 1999): 285–312.
- . Zion and Pentecost: The Spirituality and Experience of Pentecostal and Zionist/Apostolic Churches in South Africa. Pretoria: University of South Africa Press, 2000.
- Daneel, M. L. Old and New in Southern Shona Independent Churches. 2 vols. The Hague: Mouton, 1971, 1974.
- Zion Christian Church. The ZCC Messenger. Johannesburg. Various issues.

Zionist and Apostolic Churches (South Africa, Zimbabwe)

The beginnings of African Zionist and Apostolic churches in southern Africa are found in Zion City, near Chicago, where a Christian "theocracy" created in 1896 by healer John A. Dowie of the Christian Catholic Church (since 1997 known as the Christ Community Church of Zion) emphasized divine healing and triune baptism by immersion. This church was established in Johannesburg in 1895. It was joined in 1903 by Pieter L. le Roux, a Dutch Reformed missionary, with three African evangelists (Daniel Nkonyane, Muneli Ngobesi, and Fred Lutuli) and four hundred preachers and converts in the eastern Transvaal (now Mpumalanga). In 1904, Dowie sent Daniel Bryant to South Africa as overseer. He baptized 141 Zion believers in the river near le Roux's church. This group of "Zionists," the great majority being Zulus, grew within a year to five thousand. In 1908 a team of North American Pentecostal missionaries arrived in Johannesburg and used the Zion church building there for services. Le Roux joined their APOSTOLIC FAITH MISSION, but his African fellow-workers remained Zionists while embracing the new Pentecostal doctrine.

One of the Zion leaders, Daniel Nkonyane, seceded from the AFM in about 1910, forming the Christian Catholic Apostolic Holy Spirit Church in Zion, having already obtained and paid for a "three hundred acre" building site, which became a prototype for many African "Zion Cities" to come. In 1917, Elias Mahlangu founded the Zion Apostolic Church of South Africa. From Mahlangu's church, Edward Motaung (Lion) seceded in 1920 to form the Zion Apostolic Faith Mission (ZAFM), and Engenas Lekganyane's ZION CHRISTIAN CHURCH seceded from the ZAFM in 1925. Paul Mabiletsa, another founding Zion leader, commenced the Apostolic Church in Zion in 1920, and J. C. Phillips, a Malawian, commenced the Holy Catholic Apostolic Church in Zion.

In theology, there are no significant differences between African Zion and Apostolic churches on the one hand and the Pentecostal churches on the other, but in practices the differences are considerable. A Zionist becomes a Christian through baptism by triune immersion in water, which usually must take place in running water—that is, in a river often called "Jordan." There is an emphasis on divine healing, although the methods of obtaining this healing differ. Whereas most Pentecostals practice laying on hands or prayer for the sick, this will usually be accompanied in Zion and Apostolic churches by the use of symbolic objects such as blessed water, ropes, staffs, papers, ash, and so on. Prophecy and speaking in tongues are also practiced in most Zion and Apostolic churches. There are strong regulations for members, and many churches do not allow alcohol, tobacco, medicines, or eating pork. The attitude to traditional religious practices in Zion and Apostolic churches is generally ambivalent, particularly when it comes to ancestors, and some of these churches allow polygyny. For the outsider, the biggest distinguishing feature is the almost universal use of uniform clothing—usually white robes with colored belts and sashes and other markings, or, in the case of the ZCC, khaki uniforms and green and gold colors. These churches do not have many church buildings and often meet in the open air.

In Zimbabwe, Zionist and Apostolic churches arriving from about 1921 through migrant laborers returning from South Africa soon eclipsed other AICs in size and influence. The first Zionist church was the Christian Apostolic Church in Zion, planted in Matabeleland by migrants from Mabiletsa's church in South Africa. David Masuka joined the Zion Apostolic Church of South Africa (ZAC) of Elias Mahlangu in 1921, when he was working in Pietersburg, and he returned to be minister for the church in Zimbabwe in 1923. The ndaza (sacred cord) Zionists wear white or multicolored robes tied with cords, and the ZAC of Masuka was one of the first of these among the Mashona. Like many other Zionist churches, the ZAC experienced a schism from 1930 onward, starting with the Sabbath Zion Church, the Zion Protestant Church, the Zion Apostolic City, and several other schisms retaining the name "Zion Apostolic Church." In contrast, the ZAFM under the flexible and highly respected Andreas Shoko, one of the first Zionist leaders, managed to avoid any further serious schisms after Mutendi left the church with Lekganyane to form the ZCC.

Allan H. Anderson

Sources:

- Anderson, Allan H. Zion and Pentecost: The Spirituality and Experience of Pentecostal and Zionist/Apostolic Churches in South Africa. Pretoria: University of South Africa Press, 2000.
- Daneel, M. L. Old and New in Southern Shona Independent Churches. 2 vols. The Hague: Mouton, 1971, 1974.
- Sundkler, B. G. M. Zulu Zion and Some Swazi Zionists. London: Oxford University Press, 1976.

ZOROASTRIANISM

Zoroastrianism, the ancient religion of Persia (Iran), is most known in the West from the biblical story told of the Magi visiting the child Jesus (Matthew 2). The wise men known for their searching the heavens for signs were Zoroastrians who would take note of a new star. In ancient Persia, large pyramidal structures called ziggurats were erected from which the Zoroastrian priests could make their astronomical/astrological observations.

Zoroastrianism is named for Zarathustra (or Zoroaster). Little is known about Zarathustra, including the years in which he lived. The best estimate is that he came from that area of modern Kazakhstan east of the Volga River from which the Iranian people originated. It is believed that he influenced a tribal chief named Vishtaspa in his favor, and that his faith was then carried among the Iranians when they moved into northeastern Iran around the twelfth century B.C.E. Zarathustra may have lived as early as the seventeenth century. From that base, Zoroastrianism spread among the Medes and Persians in western Iran.

During the reign of Cyrus the Great (559–530 B.C.E.), an empire was created that extended from Turkey to Afghanistan. Under Cyrus, Zoroastrianism moved from its prehistorical to its historical phase, when Cyrus made it the empire's state religion. By this time the ziggurats were in place, as were the Magi, originally the priestly class from the Medes. The life of Zoroastrianism was completely disrupted during the conquests of Alexander the Great. Among other actions in subduing the land, Alexander burned Persepolis, the capital, and in the process destroyed many Zoroastrian records and writings. In the process of spreading Hellenistic culture, his successors suppressed Zoroastrianism until a new Persian Empire was finally created toward the end of the second century B.C. The Parthian Empire (c. 129–224) re-established the primacy of Zoroastrianism, which it enjoyed through successive regimes until the coming of the Arabs and Islam in the seventh century. For the next centuries Zoroastrianism would battle Islam for the hearts of the people, and by the tenth century it had become not only the state religion but also the dominant religion practiced across the Persian lands.

The dislodging of the Zoroastrian leaders from the Persian court became the motivation for some to begin the migration to what was perceived as a less hostile land, and early in the eighth century migrations to western India began. They became the nucleus of the Parsee (or Persian) Zoroastrian community, which from India has now spread to Africa and the West.

Zarathustra preached a dualistic understanding of the universe. In it, two forces fight for the hearts of humans. Ahura Mazda, the eternal God, is wise, good, and just, but unfortunately, not omnipotent. There also exists a second entity, Angra Mainyu, like Ahura Mazda uncreated, but the embodiment of evil. In order to defeat Angra Mainyu, Ahura Mazda created the world, which exists as a battleground between the good and the bad. To assist him in the creative act, he called upon his Holy Spirit and evoked the Holy Immortals, all emanations of the one God. His emanations are, however, properly seen as divine and, as such, objects of veneration and even worship. Each of these seven emanations represents a high value, such as truth, health, or power. Zoroastrians should invite these Holy Immortals into their lives and make these qualities/values their own.

In the cosmic battle, Angra Mainyu brought evil spirits to oppose the Holy Immortals, some pictured as gods of war. They brought death into the world. The good spirit countered evil by bringing more life into existence to replace those who have died. Individuals are called through their life to align with good or evil and will be judged at the end by which choices they made.

The Mihr Jashan festival in Zartosha, Iran (Ibrahim/TRIP)

Humans have an important role in the cosmic battle. Collectively, they have the power to align with good and become the decisive force in the ultimate triumph of goodness. Then, at the end of earthly life, each person will be judged; those who were more good than bad will go to a heavenly existence, and the others are destined for hell and punishment. Although the dominant form of Zoroastrianism looked for the gradual triumph of good over evil and the eventual destruction of the evil order, a second form of understanding the endtimes, an apocalyptic system, also developed. In that second presentation, evil would gradually win, with an accompanying increase in chaos, natural disasters, and social ills. The inevitable growth of evil would at the last moment be halted by the appearance of a Saoshyant, a Savior figure who will appear out of the family of Zarathustra to lead a final battle of good people triumphing over the evil one. The dead will then be resurrected and the final judgment will take place. At that time the evil will be destroyed and the good purged of the remaining evil they possess. The good will enjoy eternal life. The correlations of this form of Zoroastrianism with later Christian perspectives is obvious.

The Zoroastrian cosmology is derived from its scripture, the Avesta, a volume of approximately one thousand pages. The oldest part of it consists of the Gathas, the hymns of Zarathustra, which are written in an ancient dialect known as Old Avestan. The original collection of the Avesta, known to have existed in the ninth century (two centuries after the Muslim takeover of Persia), included some twenty-one books. Much of the text was lost in subsequent years, the present text being the result.

In addition to the Avesta, Zoroastrians recognize a second level of holy writings that were written and compiled in the centuries of the Sassnian Persian Empire (third to seventh centuries C.E.). They are distinguished by being written in a later Persian dialect called Pahlavi. These texts include commentaries on the Gathas and summaries of the lost Avesta texts. Although the Pahlavi texts have an important role, the Avesta remains the primary sacred text.

Leadership in the Zoroastrian community is supplied by the priests, identified by their all-white clothing, a symbol of the high value placed on purity and cleanliness in Zoroastrian culture. They oversee the temples, at the center of which are the ever-burning fires, symbols of righteousness. Fire is a key reality in Zoroastrian life and culture. It symbolizes light and ties the believer to the heavens through the fiery lightning bolt—and acknowledges the importance that fire has had in the daily life of individuals, at least in pretechnological cultures. The Gathas speak of fire as the creation of Ahura Mazda and set fire as the superior symbol of divinity, as opposed to the idols, which it replaced. The primary fire is the Atash Bahram, which is created with special rituals of consecration and remains burning brightly in the primary hall of a temple. Lesser fires, the Atash-I-Aduran and the Dadgah, are used for minor rituals and as the center of space used for daily prayers.

Youth are initiated into the faith by passing through a simple ceremony that begins with learning a set of prayers. On the day of the ceremony, they engage in some purification rituals and don a sacred shirt. Performing ablution rituals will be a standard beginning to all sacred acts in the future. The heart of the rather brief ceremony is the reception of the sacred cord, called a kusti, from a priest. The cord is wrapped three times around the waist over the shirt, and then tied with a simple knot. The ceremony is like a wedding, a moment for general celebration by friends and relatives. The full member of the faith is expected to engage in prayer five times daily (similar to Muslim practice) before a fire. During the prayers, the kusti is untied and retied.

Among the important rituals to which Zoroastrians must periodically give attention are funerals. Rituals are designed to deal with the uncleanness of the body of the deceased and to assist the soul on its way. Traditionally, the body is placed on a high tower and its flesh devoured by vultures and the bones bleached by the sun. Today, cremation is more common, especially in the West. The funeral is then directed toward the soul, which is believed to linger close by for three days. The funeral is done the day after the death, but the priests continue the rituals for the deceased for the next several days. The family joins in important good-bye activities on the fourth day. Commemoration of the deceased will continue monthly for the next year and then annually for the next thirty years at the annual ceremony for the dead. The day may be celebrated in the temple or in people's homes.

The annual acknowledgement of the deceased is just one holy day ritualized by Zoroastrians. The most important are the seven obligatory holy days that acknowledge the one God Ahura Mazda and the six Holy Immortals, No Ruz, or "New Day" (which celebrates the beginning of the year according to the Zoroastrian calendar), and the six gahambars, or days of obligation. Celebration of the gahambars is largely limited to the Iranian Zoroastrians today, among whom there are occasions for five-day festivals. Like other major religious communities, the Zoroastrians have their own calendar that has to be reconciled with the common solar calendar now used by the international community.

The movement of Zoroastrians to India beginning in the ninth century created two somewhat separated communities. Given their poverty and existence in a more-or-less hostile climate, there was little contact between them over the next centuries, and each community developed its own distinctive customs while trying to preserve its community and faith. Some changes came to the communities as they began to interact with the British in the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries. The rise of British power in India preceded the emergence of the Parsees as a well-to-do trading community. In the eighteenth century they had developed trading centers in the Orient (the history of which continues in the small Parsee community still found in Hong Kong).

Zoroastrian Tower of Silence in Yazd, Iran. The dead were laid out on rocks to be eaten by vultures in a “sky ritual.” (Christopher Rennie/TRIP)

As the British entered East Africa, Zoroastrians relocated to Zanzibar, Mombassa, and Nairobi, from where they expanded inland. By the mid-twentieth century, though remaining a somewhat separatist community culturally and religiously, they became prosperous, with members assuming leading roles in the business community and the professions. As decolonization proceeded, the Parsees were among the Asians who were viewed as having secured their position because of colonial advantages, and pressure came to bear on many to leave—especially during the regime of Idi Amin in Uganda. Rather than return to India, many Parsees relocated to the West. The largest community has emerged in London and its immediate environs, but scattered communities have also appeared across the United States and Canada, and more recently in Australia.

Meanwhile in India, the Parsee community had tended to shift from Gujarat southward toward Mumbai and into what is now Pakistan. The largest communities currently are in Mumbai and Karachi. In both countries, Parsees have become prominent business leaders and on occasion have appeared in important political posts.

The Zoroastrian community in Iran almost disappeared at the end of the nineteenth century, but through the twentieth century it experienced a revival, growing fivefold. Zoroastrians have enjoyed guarantees of religious freedom articulated in the 1906 Constitution of Iran, and toleration under the post-1979 changes wrought by the Islamic revolution. They are expected to observe Islamic codes of public conduct. They are represented at the Majlis (parliament) and serve in the armed forces. Furthermore, many members of these religions fought side by side with Moslem Iranians in the Constitutional Uprising of the late nineteenth century that finally resulted in the Constitution of 1906.

A visit by a group of Parsee priests to Iran in the late 1990s found that in spite of the revival, much was still lacking in the Iranian Zoroastrian community. The religion is, to put it bluntly, in shambles. There was no place where the major ritual ceremonies could be performed. None of the priests were holding the barashoom, the purification ceremony necessary to perform the “inner” rituals, which can be done only by a priest in the sacred space in the temple. There are fire temples in several cities, but some did not have the fires burning. The priests are largely uneducated, and many do not wear their priestly garb. Many laypeople do not wear the sacred shirt and cord. Although discouraged somewhat by what they had observed, the delegation held out hope for the continued revival and rebuilding of the Iranian community with assistance from India and the West.

Currently, Zoroastrians may be seen as divided into two primary communities, one based in Iran and the other in India, with both communities represented by diaspora communities in Africa and the West. The communities are further divided by what might be seen as traditionalist and modernist wings. The latter group has adapted to life in urban centers and the modern West. Traditionalists adhere with more strictness to older rituals and prayer life, and pay attention to the laws of purity relative to women in their menstrual cycle and the bodies of the dead (traditionally there were people set apart as unclean whose job was to handle corpses). They eschew cremation and demand disposal of corpses by carrion birds and the sun. They do not sanction marriage outside the faith and do not engage in attempts to convert others to Zoroastrianism.

In the West several organizations have arisen to serve the Zoroastrian community. In 1980 an international group of Zoroastrian leaders founded the WORLD ZOROASTRIAN ORGANIZATION, based in London, out of an expressed desire especially among diaspora Zoroastrians for an international structure to protect, unite, and sustain what is a very small community, almost invisible in the pluralistic West. In North America, where many Parsees migrated after 1965, a number of local Zoroastrian associations were established. In 1987 a number of these associations came together to create the Federation of Zoroastrian Associations of North America. Many of these associations, representative of the more modernist trends in the Western Zoroastrian community, also support the World Zoroastrian Organization. There are several local associations of Iranian Zoroastrians in North America, primarily along the Canadian and U.S. west coasts.

As early as 1962, a World Zoroastrian Congress was held in Tehran, Iran. Successive congresses have been held irregularly, the seventh meeting having been in Houston, Texas, in 2001.

Sources:

Boyce, Mary. A History of Zoroastrianism. 3 vols. Leiden: Brill, 1975, 1982, 1991.

Geldner, K. Avesta: The Sacred Books of the Parsis. 3 vols. Stuttgart, Germany: Kohlhammer, 1986.

Hinnells, John R. Zoroastrians in Britain. Oxford: Clarendon, 1996.

Writer, R. Contemporary Zoroastrians: An Unstructured Nation. Lanham, MD: University Press of America, 1994.

Zulu Religion/Spirituality

The Zulu people are one of the Bantu groups that migrated into what is now South Africa at some unknown point in the last two millennia. They date their own origin myth from a chief named Malandela, who had a son named Zulu who became the head of his own clan. He brought his clan to the Mfolosi Valley, north of the Thuleka River in present-day Natal. The Zulu people then entered into history with the emergence generations later of Shaka (1785–1828). A remarkable leader, Shaka reorganized the Zulus and turned them into a notable military force. His kingdom eventually covered some 11,000 square miles of territory. The British attacked the Zulu kingdom in 1879, captured the chief, Cetshwayo, and sent him into exile. In 1897, Zulu land was annexed and passed to the newly created Union of South Africa. The Zulu were pushed into a small “reserve” while most of their land was settled by whites.

The Zulu trace their ancestry to Inkosi Yezulu, the God of the Sky, also known as Umvelinqangi. The male sky God and his female counterpart, Earth, brought forth the people, Abuntu, though the exact process of creation is not clear. Also important to the Zulu are the ancestral spirits, especially those of outstanding chiefs, local village headmen, and men, in that order. The departed souls of the ancestors are known collectively as the amalozi or amathinga, and are pictured as residing in the earth but still having an active role in the life of their present progeny.

Various ritual figures are designated to assist the process of relating positively to the spirit world. At each village, the headman (umnumzane) serves as both secular and religious leader. He serves as priest, focusing the devotion of his people to the ancestors, and he symbolizes the chief’s ancestors to the people. He is present at almost all ritual occasions. Diviners, most often women, deal with human problems by using their divinatory skills to find the cause of the problem. They work hand-in-hand with a herbalist (usually a man) who prescribes the cure once the problem is found. Herbalists are usually specialists in either medicine (izinyanga zemithi) or healing (izinyanga zokwelapha). Zulu medicine today is a mixture of traditional healing practices and Western medicine. Finally, attention to the ritual chores are completed by the izinyanya zezula, a specialist in relating to the sky, a function that evolved in part because of the thunderstorms that are important in local weather.

A Zulu church choir in South Africa (B. Seed/TRIP)

Less formally active in Zulu religion are the sorcerers, often herbalists who also have a knowledge of magic, though anyone may be a sorcerer. The sorcerer uses magic to redress a grievance. Finally, there is the witch, a person, usually believed to be female, who is thought to be living a concealed existence in the village. The witch is one who uses magic for evil and inappropriate ends. The witch is judged to be present by the manifest evil consequences of her actions.

Ritual activity for the Zulu happens most frequently in the circular villages called kraals, typically built on the side of a hill with the entrance facing down the slope. In the center of the kraal are the very important cattle herds. On the west side, at the highest point in the kraal, is the home of the headman, and adjacent to his house is the umsamo, the most important ritual center for the community. The umsamo is the place for communing with the ancestors. The surrounding hills of Zulu land (those unoccupied by kraals) provide the sites for special rituals, including those that invoke the Sky God.

Most Zulu ritual is about power (amandla), its use (and misuse). Power is derived from the God of the Sky, the ancestors, and medicine. Ritual connects with the source of the power that sustains life and creates order. Witches, of course, pervert the power.

Today's four million (some estimate as many as six million) Zulu live across South Africa, but they are concentrated in Kwazulu, the name of the old reserve. The royal house originally established by Shaka still exists, and the Zulu nation's current king is Zwelithini Goodwill Kacyiprian Bhekuzulu. At various points in the twentieth century, the Zulu king has been an important voice challenging South Africa's racial policies.

Christian missions were first established among the Zulu in the nineteenth century, and today many Zulu mix life as a member of a Christian church with traditional rituals and varying levels of belief. Out of the conflict between Christianity and traditional beliefs have come some new African Initiated churches, the NAZARETH (NAZARITE) BAPTIST CHURCH being the most prominent.

Sources:

Berglund, Axel-Ivar. Zulu Thought-patterns and Symbolism. London: C. Hurst, 1976.

Lawson, E. Thomas. Religions of Africa. San Francisco: HarperSanFrancisco, 1985.

Von Kapff, Uli. Zulu: People of Heaven. Cape Town: Holiday Africa, 1997.

"Zulu Information and Links." Posted at <http://www.zulupage.co.za/index-ien.html>. Accessed November 1, 2001.

INDEX

Note: Page numbers in bold indicate location of an article dedicated to that topic in the encyclopedia. Religious bodies followed by an asterisk in this index are mentioned frequently throughout the encyclopedia, being found in most major countries in the world. Only the most important citations in the text are included in the index for those entries.

- Aalbu, Bernard, 962
Aaronistas, 792
Abayudaya, 1317
'Abd al-Jabbār, Sīdi, 1281
'Abd al-Latif, Muhammad al Hāfīz b., 1280–1281
'Abd al-Qadir al-Jilani, 1056
'Abd al-Salam Faraj, 28
'Abd al-Wahhab, Mohammad ibn, 1405
Abdals, Rum, 34
'Abdu'l-Bahá, 102, 104–108, 110
Abdullah Azzam, 27
Abernathy, Ralph, 1046
Abhedananda, 1392
Aboriginal Cult of Maria Lionza, 1, 1394
Aboriginal religions, 1–3, 95
Abraham, K. E., 319
Abu Nidal Organization, 685
Abyssinian Frontier Mission, 444, 1421
Academy Movement, 534
Achewa Church, 817
Adamski, George, 1314
Addai, 283, 673
Adejobi, Adeleke, 340
Adejobi, E. O. A., 976
Aden, 1437–1438
Adidam, 3, 502
Adler, Margot, 1418
Adventism, 3–4, 722
Aetherius Society, 955
Afghani, Sayyid Jamal al-Din al-, 689, 692
Afghanistan, 4–7
 Taliban, 5, 6, 28, 693, 713, 1257–1259
Africa Evangelical Fellowship, 899, 1345
Africa Evangelical Mission, 1345
Africa Inland Church, 7–8
Africa Inland Mission (AIM), 7, 228, 355, 1226
Africa Israel Church, Nineveh, 976
African Apostolic Church in Central Africa, 15
African Apostolic Church of Johane Marange, 8,
 57, 232, 358, 817, 899, 1455, 1456
African Baptist Missionary Society, 789
African Brotherhood Church, 8–9, 10
African Christian Church and Schools, 9–10
African Church (Bethel), 954
African Church of the Holy Spirit, 10, 18, 748, 1211
African Church of the Red Cross, 10
African Episcopal Church of St. Thomas, 19
African Evangelical Fellowship, 56
African Faith Tabernacle, 1210
African Gospel Church, 69
African Greek Orthodox Church, 22
African independent churches, 13. See also African Initiated Churches
African Independent Pentecostal Church of Africa,
 10–11, 14, 232
African indigenous churches, 13. See also African Initiated Churches
African Industrial Mission, 817
African Initiated Churches (AICs), 12–17, 29, 146,
 215, 228, 451, 548, 705, 817, 954, 958, 1197,
 1198, 1229, 1237, 1283, 1285, 1316 *
 African/Ethiopian Churches, 14–15
 Mai Chaza Church, 814
 newer Pentecostal/charismatic churches, 16
 Organization of African Instituted Churches
 (OAIC), 976–977 prophet-healing/spiritual churches, 15–16
 Spiritual Churches, 1210–1211
African Inland Church, 747
African Inland Mission, 357, 747, 1262
African instituted churches, 13. See also African Initiated Churches
African Israel Church, Nineveh, 18, 232, 1211,
 1263, 1316
African Methodist Episcopal (AME) Church,
 18–20, 115, 130, 147, 406, 603, 784, 788,
 817, 910, 1198, 1237, 1362, 1372, 1449,
 1455
African Methodist Episcopal Zion Church, 20–21,
 788, 1362, 1372
African Orthodox Church, 11, 21–22, 375, 976
African Pentecostal churches, 15–16
African Protestant Church, 22, 215
African Reformed Church, 1070
African religions, traditional, 1289–1296
 Zulu religion/spirituality, 1464–1465
African Union Mission, 146
Afrikaans Baptist Churches, 127
Aga Khan, 598, 631, 667, 696, 1159
Agama Khonghucu, 641
Aglipay, Gregorio, 1015
Agnosticism, 22–23, 1331
Agonshū, 23–24, 718
Agricola, Mikael, 504, 505
Ahitler, Timothy Blasio, 782
Ahmad, Abu'l-Qasim, 598, 695
Ahmad, Hazrat Mirza Ghulam, 24, 26, 695,
 990–991
Ahmad, Qazi Hussain, 712, 713
Ahmad Qadiyani, Mirza Ghulam, 689

- Ahmadiyya Anjuman Ishaat Islam, Lahore, 24–26, 631, 991
- Ahmadiyya Movement in Islam, 24, 26, 689, 990–991 *
- Ahui, John, 582
- AIDS ministries, 1380
- Aijiro, Onishi, 606
- Aitken, Robert, 397, 398, 1128
- Aivanhov, Michael, 513, 1417
- Ajaib Singh, 1110
- Ajuoga, Mathew, 976
- Akhbari, 1159
- Akinsowon, Abiodun, 233
- Akinyele, Sir Isaac Babalola, 266
- Akiya, Einosuke, 1190
- Akong Rinpoche, Chuje, 742
- Akurinu, 1211
- Al Qaeda, 7, 27–28, 631, 684, 693, 713, 903–904, 1258
- Aladura Churches, 15, 28–30, 226, 954, 1210
- Celestial Church of Christ, 226
- Christ Apostolic Church, 266–267
- Church of the Lord, 29, 340, 789, 955, 976, 1198, 1210, 1285
- See also* Cherubim and Seraphim
- Albania, 30–32, 132, 133
- Albania, Orthodox Autocephalous Church of, 31, 32–33, 373, 1446
- Albania Tirana Mission, 32
- Albanian Evangelical Alliance, 32
- Albigensians, 554
- Alchemy, 389, 1414
- Alcoholics Anonymous, 645
- Aleph, 92–93, 719
- Alevism (Alevis, Alawis), 33–35, 132–133, 545, 695, 728, 778, 1248, 1250, 1306
- Alexander, Daniel William, 11, 22
- Alexander, John, 651
- Alexander, Michael Solomon, 433
- Alexandre, Domingos, 1354
- Alexius II, 440
- Alexy II, Patriarch, 965, 1109
- Algeria, 35–37
- Algeria, Protestant Church of, 1050–1051
- Ali, Mirza Husayn, 1159
- Ali, Zayd b., 1449
- Alimpyj, Metropolitan, 965
- All Africa Council, 15
- All Ceylon Buddhist Congress, 37
- All Ceylon Young Buddhist Congress, 37
- Allada, 1059
- All-Africa Conference of Churches (AICC), 8, 976
- All-Canada Movement, 271
- Allen, Horace N., 758, 1038
- Allen, Richard, 18, 19, 20
- Alliance of the Reformed Churches, 1421
- Alliance World Fellowship, 38, 267
- Allred, Owen, 1025
- All-Russian Union of Evangelical Christians, 1338
- All-Ukrainian Baptist Union, 1339
- All-Union Council of Evangelical Christians-Baptists, 538
- Almeida, Florentino, 656
- Aloben of Persia, 238
- Alsace and Lorraine, Church of the Augsburg Confession of, 337, 480, 511, 1071
- Alsace and Lorraine, Reformed Church of, 511, 1070–1071
- Al-Tayyib Ismailis, 151
- Amal, 779
- AmaNazaretha, 12, 15, 924–925
- Ambedkar, Bhimrao Ramji “Babasaheb,” 38, 184, 631, 1412
- Ambedkar Buddhism, 38–39
- Ambelain, Robert, 552, 835
- American Association for the Advancement of Atheism, 1330
- American Atheists, 39–40, 91, 1330
- American Baptist Association, 40, 1199
- American Baptist Churches in the U.S.A., 40–42, 225, 281, 1373
- American Baptist Free Mission Society, 361, 720
- American Baptist Home Mission Society, 120, 122, 123, 361, 426
- American Baptist Missionary Union (ABMU), 308, 720
- American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions, 42–43 *
- American Catholic Church, 551
- American Christian Missionary Society, 270, 349, 432
- American Church of God, 920
- American Council of Christian Churches, 652, 1425
- American Council of Churches, 1373
- American Druze Society, 411
- American Humanist Association, 608, 1330, 1331
- American Indians, 1370
- Lakota, 768–769
- Native American Church, 447, 450, 919–921
- Navajo, 923–924
- American Lutheran Church, 228, 231, 470
- American National Baptist Convention, 916
- American Rosicrucian order (AMORC), 835
- American Samoa, 43–44, 853
- American Samoa, Congregational Christian Church of, 359
- American Sephardic Federation, 1432
- American Unitarian Association, 647, 1342–1343
- Amin, Sheikh Al-Amin Osman al-, 436
- Amish, 44–45, 141, 845
- Amman, Jacob, 44
- Amram, Itubwa, 922
- Amritanandamayi, Mataji, 627, 837
- Amsterdam, Peter, 496
- Amuri Free Church, 362
- An Shigao, 247
- Anabaptists, 90, 128, 499, 612, 843, 844, 845
- Amish, 44–45, 141, 845
- Hutterites, 173, 612–613, 1004
- See also* Mennonites
- Ananda Marga Yoga Society, 46, 74, 545, 549, 592
- Anandakipila, Swami, 97
- Anandamayi Ma, 1156
- Ancestor worship:
- African, 1292, 1294–1295
- Bantu-speaking people, 1197
- Chinese, 237, 245, 254–255
- Japanese Reiyūkai, 1077
- Ancheta, Alfred Jitsudo, 1418
- Ancient and Mystical Order Rosae Crucis, 46–47, 835, 955–956
- Ancient Church of the East, 48, 64, 673, 765
- Ancient Order of Druids, 410
- Ancient Rosicrucian Brotherhood, 553
- Andes Evangelical Mission, 153
- Andhra Evangelical Lutheran Church, 48, 1355
- Andorra, 49
- Andrews, J. N., 1154
- Andrianarijaona, Rakoto, 814
- Anglican Catholic Church, 1297
- Anglican Church in Aotearoa, New Zealand, and Polynesia, 44, 49–50, 300, 958, 1127, 1287
- Anglican Church in the Province of South Africa, 1237
- Anglican Church of Australia, 50, 351, 1391
- Anglican Church of Canada, 50–52, 375, 471
- Anglican Church of Hong Kong and Macao, 52–53
- Anglican Church of Korea, 53, 758
- Anglican Communion, 53–54, 316. See also Church of England *
- Anglican Communion of Angola, 1354
- Anglican Consultative Council, 53–54
- Anglican Mission in America, 344
- Anglican Province of the Southern Cone of America, 54–55, 492
- Angola, 55–57
- Anglican Communion of, 1354
- Evangelical Church of Central, 1133
- Evangelical Congregational Church in, 468
- Evangelical Reformed Church of, 56, 489, 1354

- Tocoist Church/Church of Our Lord Jesus Christ in the World, 1283
 United Evangelical Church-Anglican Communion of, 1354
- Angolan Council of Evangelical Churches, 57
- Anguilla, 57–58
- Anima Universale [Universal Soul], 1381–1382
- Animism, 1289
- Ansari, Muhammed, 1056
- Ansar-ud-Deen Society, 953
- Ansgar, 336, 1237
- Antarctica, 58
- Anthroposophical Society, 58–59, 74, 274
- Antigua, 60–61
- Antigua Christian Council, 60
- Antiochian Orthodox Christian Archdiocese of North America, 562
- Antipopes, 1143–1144
- Antoine, Robert, 1059
- Aoko, Gaudensia, 782
- Apartheid, Reformed Churches and, 1376
- Apia Protestant Church, 1126
- Apocalyptic Orthodox Church, 1323
- Apocrypha, 446
- Apostles, 282
- Apostles of Infinite Love, 61, 831, 1144
- Apostles of Sobriety, 1021
- Apostolic Assembly of Faith in Jesus Christ, 62–63, 65, 995
- Apostolic Catholic Assyrian Church of the East, 48, 63–64, 229, 286, 670, 673, 815, 1239–1240, 1252, 1438
- Apostolic Church, 64–65, 215, 329, 1009
- Apostolic Church in Mexico, 65–67
- Apostolic Church of Faith in Jesus Christ, 62, 65–67, 427, 569, 867, 947
- Apostolic Church of Great Britain, 266
- Apostolic Church of the End Time, 1300
- Apostolic Faith, 67–68
- Apostolic Faith Church, 65, 141
- Apostolic Faith Mission, 68, 69, 391, 1004, 1457
- Apostolic Faith Mission of South Africa (AFM of SA), 68–69, 784, 899, 910, 1198, 1455
- Apostolic Gnostic Church, 552
- Apostolic Revelation Society, 487, 1210
- Apostolic Sabbath Church of God, 69–70
- Apostolic United Apostolic Brethren, 1025
- Apostolic United Faith Coloured Church, 1211–1212
- Apostolic World Christian Fellowship, 70
- Appenzeller, Ella J. D., 758
- Appenzeller, Harry G., 761
- Appiah, Joseph W. E., 902
- Aquinas, Thomas, 288
- Aquino, Michael, 330, 1135
- Arab Evangelical churches, 674
- Arada, 1059
- Arafat, Yasser, 728
- Arara, 376, 1059
- Arathi, 1211
- Arbousset, Thomas, 788
- Arcane School, 70–71, 937
- Arcot Lutheran Church, 1355
- Arès Pilgrims, 71
- Argentina, 72–74
- Argentina, Evangelical Church of the River Plate, 465
- Argentina, Evangelical Methodist Church of, 483–484
- Argentine Alliance of Evangelical Churches, 73
- Arias, Mortimer, 484
- Aristotle, 288
- Ariyaratne, A. T., 1134
- Arjun, 632
- Armenia, 74–77
- Armenian Apostolic Church, 74, 76, 77–79, 99, 101, 205, 286, 423, 537, 538, 670, 673, 728, 765, 780–781, 1096, 1183, 1249, 1257, 1308, 1320, 1341
- Holy See of Echmiadzin, 77–78
- See of the Great House of Cilicia, 78–79
- Armenian Catholic Church, 76, 79–80, 673, 781, 1320
- Armenian Evangelical Church, 674
- Armenian Orthodox Church, 1310
- Arminius, Jacobus, 124, 847, 1076, 1079
- Armstrong, Garner Ted, 320, 1434
- Armstrong, Herbert W., 4, 171, 320, 797, 1014, 1352, 1434
- Army of Mary, 80–81
- Army of the Cross of Christ Church, 548, 902
- Arnold, Eberhard, 173
- Arnold, Edwin, 812
- Arnott, John and Carol, 1288
- Arousa Cult, 951
- Arsha Vidya Gurukulam, 81–82
- Art of Living Foundation, 82–83, 373
- Arthur, William, 485
- Aruba, 83–84
- Arya Samaj, 84–85, 502, 503, 578, 592, 624–625, 748, 839, 1198, 1234
- Asahara, Shōkō, 92, 719
- Asamblea Apostólica de la Fe en Cristo Jesús, 62–63
- Asbahi, al-, 825
- Asbury, Francis, 20, 1362
- Ascension, 1117
- Ashes of Purification Church, 705
- Ashlag, Yehuda, 739
- Asokans, 1131
- Assemblies of Canada, 748
- Assemblies of Christian Churches, 1054
- Assemblies of God, 85–86 *
- Assemblies of God, National Christian Church of the, 867
- Assemblies of God in Brazil, 86, 165, 232
- Assemblies of God in Great Britain and Ireland, 87, 357
- Assemblies of God in Italy [Assemblee di Dio in Italia], 699–700, 701
- Assemblies of Yahweh, 88
- Assembly Hall Churches, 797
- Assembly of Christian Churches, 569
- Associazione Cristo nell'Uomo, 1381
- Associate Presbyterian Church, 918
- Associate Reformed Presbyterian Church, 423
- Associated Churches of Christ in New Zealand, 88–89
- Association for Global New Thought, 660
- Association for Research and Enlightenment, 89–90, 938, 939
- Association of Baptists for World Evangelism, 527
- Association of Central American Churches, 570, 571
- Association of Evangelicals in Angola, 57
- Association of German Mennonite Congregations, 90–91
- Association of Gospel Halls, 603
- Association of Indian Evangelical Churches, 418
- Association of Islamic Cultural Centers, 546
- Association of Lutheran Churches of Panama, 995
- Association of Protestant Church and Institutions in Algeria, 37
- Association of Unity Churches, 371, 660, 1376–1378
- Association of Vineyard Churches, 1288
- Assyrian Church, Apostolic Catholic, 48, 63–64, 229, 286, 670, 673, 815, 1239–1240, 1252, 1438
- Assyrian Evangelical churches, 674
- Atheism, 91–92, 1327–1329
- American Atheists, 39–40, 91, 1330
- Freethought, 518–519
- French, 511
- state mandated, 30, 239–240, 435, 439, 1104, 1329
- See also Unbelief
- Atsutane, Hirata, 1166
- Auclair, Raoul, 81
- Augouard, Prosper, 601
- Augustan Lutheran Church, 1354
- Augustine, St., 137, 315, 1357
- Aum Shinrikyō, 92–93, 685, 719
- Aumist Religion, 93–94
- Aurobindo Ashram, Sri, 626, 1215–1216
- Aurobindo Ghose, Sri, 626, 1156, 1215
- Auroville, 1215
- Ausrans, 350–351, 1022
- Australia, 1, 94–97, 296
- Aboriginal religions, 1–3, 95
- Anglican Church of, 50
- Buddhism in, 194–195

- charismatic movement, 277–278, 279
 Uniting Church in, 96, 296, 516, 851, 859, 998, 1375
- Australian Federation of Islamic Societies, 96
- Austria, 97–99
- Austria, Evangelical Church of the Augsburg and Helvetic Confessions in, 460–461
- Austria, Old Catholic Church of, 98, 461, 967
- Austrian Buddhist Association, 99–100
- Avtar Singh Ji, Baba, 1129
- Axling, William, 720
- Ayahuasaca religions, 168
- Aymar  religion, 235
- AZen, 719
- Azerbaijan, 100–101
- Azzam, Abdullah, 693
- The B b, 102, 103, 106, 1159
- Baba Jaimal Singh, 1179
- Babalola, Joseph Ayo, 340
- B bi Faith, 102–103
- Bada, Alexander Abiodun, 226
- Baer, Dov, 800
- Bah '  Faith, 102–114, 668, 1159 authoritative texts, 106–107 beliefs, 107–109
 devotional life, 111 institutions, 109–110 international diffusion, 111–114
 origins, 102–106
- Bahamas, 115–116
- Bahamas National Baptist Missionary and Education Convention, 116
- Bahamonde, Wenceslao, 860
- Bah 'u'll h, 102–104, 106, 1159
- Bahrain, 116–118
- Baian Hakuju Daiosho, 1418
- Bailey, Alice A., 937
- Bailey, Alice B., 70
- Bakker, Jim, 570
- Bakker, Tammy Faye, 570
- Bakula Rinpoche, 881
- Bali, 639
- Bali, Protestant Christian Church of, 1048
- Ballard, Edna, 346, 614
- Ballard, Guy W., 346, 614
- Ballestrero, Anastasio Alberto Cardinal, 1381
- Bamba, Ahmadou, 900
- Banda, John, 1353
- Banderas, Pedro, 63
- Bangladesh, 118–119, 989
- Bangladesh, Church of, 306
- Bangladesh Baptist Sangha, 119–120
- Banna, Hassan al-, 690, 692, 902–903
- Bantu Baptist Church, 127
- Bantu Presbyterian Church, 1376
- Bantu religions, traditional, 1196–1197, 1448–1449, 1464–1465
- Baptist Association of El Salvador, 120, 426
- Baptist Association of the Bay Islands, 603
- Baptist Association of the Mosquitia, 604
- Baptist Bible Fellowship International, 120–121, 215, 521, 604, 871
- Baptist Churches, Samavesam of Telegu (India), 1125–1126
- Baptist Churches of the Central African Republic, 420
- Baptist Community of the Congo River (Church of Christ in the Congo), 307–308
- Baptist Community of the Western Congo (Church of Christ in the Congo), 308–309
- Baptist Convention, 604 of Guatemala, 569
 of Hong Kong, 121 of Kenya, 121–122
 of Nicaragua, 122, 947
 of South Africa, 127, 1198
 of Western Cuba, 122–123
- Baptist Federation of Canada, 219, 1337
- Baptist Fellowship, Cooperative, 363–364
- Baptist International Missions, 995
- Baptist Mid-Missions, 228, 420
- Baptist Sangha, Bangladesh, 119–120
- Baptist Union of Denmark, 123–124
 of Germany, 1338
 of Great Britain, 120, 124–125, 230 of Hungary, 125–126, 611 of New Zealand, 126–127
 of South Africa, 127
 of Yugoslavia, 1447
- Baptist World Alliance, 127–128, 129, 1153
- Baptists, 128–129, 294
- Barbados, 130–131
- Bar n, Ernesto, 553
- Barquinha, 168
- Barratt, Thomas B., 899, 1009
- Barrett, Harrison D., 919
- Barth, Hattie, 661
- Barth, Paul, 661
- Basava, 1399
- Basel Mission, 131 *
- Basilio Scientific School, 74
- Batak Christian Community Church, 132, 1047
- Batak Protestant Christian Church, 1083
- Bauer, Yehuda, 657
- Bazyl, 982
- Bazzy, Connie Fillmore, 1377
- Beal, Richard, 225
- Beane, Scipio, 19
- Beck, Charlotte Joko, 1418
- Bedward, Alexander, 715
- Bedwardian Movement, 715
- Bektashi Sufism, 34, 132–133, 378, 1230
- Belarus, 133–136
- Belgian Christian Missionary Church, 1365
- Belgian Evangelical Mission, 137
- Belgian Protestant Missionary Society, 1113
- Belgium, 136–138
- Belgium, United Presbyterian Church of, 1365
- Belize, 138–142
- Benade, William H., 534
- Bene Israel, 142, 634, 734
- Benedictines, 142–144
- Bengal Evangelistic Mission, 119
- Bengal Orissa Bihar Baptist Convention, 281
- Benin, 144–147
- Benin, Protestant Methodist Church of, 1052
- Bennett, Dennis, 231
- Benzel, Charles Boyd, 1314
- Bereslavski, Ioann, 893
- Berg, Daniel, 86
- Berg, David Brandt, 495–496, 497
- Berg, George, 635
- Berg, Philip S., 584, 739
- Bergersen, Terje Dahl, 554
- Berkenhagen, August Hermann, 887
- Berlin Mission Society, 475, 476
- Bermuda, 146–147
- Bernard, Christian, 47
- Bernhardt, Oskar Ernst, 555–556
- Berry, L. L., 19
- Bershadskii, Rodion G., 767
- Berthoud, Paul, 1039
- Besant, Annie, 937, 1028, 1271, 1272
- Bessarabian Orthodox Church, 876
- Beta Israel, 147–148, 444
- Bethany Evangelical Mission, 570
- Bethel African Methodist Episcopal Church, 19
- Bethel Mission, 1030, 1113
- Bethel Pentecostal Temple, 999
- Bethel Society, 1083
- Bethesda Church of God, 569
- Beuckelson, Jan, 845
- Bhajan, Yogi, 1174
- Bhakt Singh, 150, 765
- Bhakti yoga, 399, 621–622, 632, 1390
 Divine Life Society, 399–400
- Bhaktivedanta, A. C., 531–532, 627
- Bhaktivinoda, Kedarnath Datta, 540
- Bharati, Bihar Yoga, 664
- Bhikhan, Muni, 1221, 1266
- Bhikku, Dhammajayo, 395
- Bhiksu, Acarya, 710
- Bhimrao Ramji Ambedkar, 38
- Bhutan, 148–150
- Bible Baptist Fellowship, 604
- Bible Christian Church, 859

- Bible Churchman's Missionary Society, 303, 343, 345, 1316
- Bible Criticism Research Project, 369
- Bible Pattern Church Fellowship, 429
- Bible Sabbath Association, 150–151
- Bible Students, 339
- Bin Laden, Osama, 27, 28, 631, 684, 693, 904, 1258
- Bingham, Hiram, Jr., 750, 751
- Bingham, Hiram, Sr., 42
- Bingham, Rowland, 1226
- Birkly, James, 1117
- Bisayan religion, 1017–1018
- Bischoff, Johann Gottfried, 939
- Bitzer, Robert H., 1078
- Black, William, 860
- Black Harry, 932
- Black Israelites, 913
- Black Judaism, 61
- Black Sisters of the Immaculate Conception, 207
- Blau, Amram, 935, 1138
- Blavatsky, Helena P., 202, 347, 552, 556, 557, 937, 1028, 1103, 1270, 1272, 1321, 1361, 1415
- Bliss, Daniel, 780
- Boardman, George, 907
- Bobadilla, Mariano, 1010
- Boddy, Alexander A., 65, 1009
- Bodhirak, 1131
- Boehme, Jacob, 1415
- Bogomils, 155, 204, 205, 554, 1416
- Böhler, Peter, 886
- Bohras, 151, 210, 215, 243, 695, 812, 1159, 1160, 1316
- Shiah Fatimi Ismaili Tayyibi Dawoodi Bohra, 151, 210, 243, 696, 839, 1160
- Boillat, Maurice, 1337
- Bolaang Mongondow, 275
- Bolivia, 152–153
- Bolivia, Evangelical Methodist Church of, 153, 484
- Bolivian Evangelical Lutheran Church, 153–154
- Bon religion, 148, 154–155, 190, 248
- Bonaventura, St., 512
- Booth, William, 1123
- Bori cult, 951
- Borneo Evangelical Mission, 821
- Bosco, John, 1122
- Boseto, Leslie, 1353
- Bosnia and Herzegovina, 155–157, 1446
- Medjugorje, 841
- Bosquart, Marc, 81
- Botswana, 157–159
- Spiritual Healing Church, 1211–1213
- Bourdin, Gilbert, 93
- Boyd, R. H., 915, 917
- Bradlaugh, Robert, 91
- Brahma Kumaris, 74, 159, 168, 545, 592, 627
- Brahmo Samaj, 159–160, 591, 624–625, 643, 647, 1343
- Braide, Garrick Sokari, 12, 29
- Branch Davidians, 160–162
- Brandon, L. S., 491
- Branham, Joseph M., 162
- Branham, William Marrion, 162
- Branham Tabernacle and Related Assemblies, 162
- Bratslav Hassidism, 584
- Bray, Thomas, 316, 430
- Brazil, 163–168, 293
- Assemblies of God in, 86
- Christian Congregation of, 275
- Episcopal Anglican Church of, 430
- Evangelical Church of the Lutheran Confession in, 464
- Methodist Church in, 165, 849–850
- Presbyterian Church in, 1029
- United Presbyterian Church of, 1365
- Brazil Annual Conference, 849
- Brazilian new religion, Santo Daime, 1131–1132
- Breeding, M. L., 279
- Breeze, William, 551
- Bresee, Phineas F., 341
- Brésillac, Melchior de Marion, 789
- Brethren, 168–169, 268. See also Plymouth Brethren
- Brethren Church, 228. See also Church of the Brethren
- Brethren Confession, 463
- Brethren in Christ, 169, 947. See also Mennonites
- Brethren of the Common Life, 928–929
- Brewer, George H., 122
- Bricaud, Jean Baptiste, 551, 552
- Bridge to Freedom, 346
- Bridge to Spiritual Freedom, 614
- Brinkman, George, 1005
- British and Foreign Bible Society, 352, 417, 1394
- British Baptist Missionary Association, 1337
- British Baptist Union, 116, 120
- British Druid Order, 410
- British Forest Sangha, 169–170, 1268
- British Honduras, 138
- British Honduras Baptist Trust Association, 603
- British Indian Ocean Territory (BIOT), 170–171
- British Israelism, 171, 1434
- British Virgin Islands, 172
- Britten, Emma Hardinge, 1415
- Brooke, Anthony, 938
- Brooks, Nona, 400
- Brotherhood of Holy Grail, 1321
- Brotherhood of the Cross and Star, 172–173
- Brothers, Richard, 171
- Brown, George, 853
- Brown, Lottie, 720
- Brown, Nathan, 720
- Brown, Samuel R., 1349
- Brown, William Adams, 1425
- Browne, Robert, 124, 1357
- The Bruderhof, 173, 1004
- Brunei, 174–175
- Islam in, 174, 175–177
- Bryant, William F., 318
- Buber, Martin, 479, 584
- Buchman, Frank, 644
- Buckland, Raymond, 528, 1418
- Buckland, Rosemary, 528
- Budapest, Z., 1418
- Budd, Henry, 52
- Buddha's Light International Association, 246
- Buddhadasa, 185
- Buddhasananuggaha Association, 177–178
- Buddhism, 179–198, 187, 246, 396–397, 589*
- in China, 238. See also Chinese Buddhism
- diffusion in Asia, 183–192
- fundamental principles, 179–181
- in India, 627, 629–631
- in Indonesia, 638–640
- in Japan, 717–719. See also Japanese Buddhism; Zen Buddhism
- in Mongolia, 880–881
- in Myanmar, 906–907
- primary traditions, 181–183
- in Singapore, 1182, 1184–1185
- in Thailand, 1268–1269
- in Vietnam, 1396–1398
- in the west, 192–196
- women and the Shakta movement, 1156
- See also* Chinese Buddhism; Japanese Buddhism; Mahayana Buddhism; Theravada Buddhism; Tibetan Buddhism; Zen Buddhism
- Buddhist groups:
- Agonshū, 23–24
- All Ceylon Buddhist Congress, 37
- Ambedkar Buddhism, 38–39
- Austrian Buddhist Association, 99–100
- British Forest Sangha, 169–170
- Chinese Buddhist Association, 249–250
- Chinese folk religion, 245, 259–260
- Chogye Order, 188, 264–265
- Dhammakaya Foundation, 395–396
- The Dharma Drum Mountain Association (Fakushan), 396–397
- Diamond Way Buddhism, 398–399
- European Buddhist Union, 99, 453
- Foguangshan, 187, 195, 246, 396, 507–508, 820, 1263
- Friends of the Western Buddhist Order, 1412–1413

- German Buddhism Union, 540–541
 Hossōhū, 606–607
 Humanistic, 507
 Insight Meditation Society, 645–646
 Korean (Won), 188, 757, 1420–1413
 Lanka and, 1217–1218
 Laotian, 769–772
 Maha Bodhi Society, 184, 192, 193, 630, 812–813, 863
 Malaysian, 820
 Master Ching Hai Meditation Association, 836–837
 Navayana, 182
 Newar, 926, 943–944
 Pomun Order, 188, 1025
 Pure Land, 186, 189, 238, 243, 258, 507, 717, 725–726, 1054–1055, 1300
 Sarvodaya, 957, 1134–1135
 Shintoism and, 1165. See also Japanese Buddhism; Shinto
 Sōka Gakkai International, 57, 74, 99, 167, 189, 194, 195, 243, 512, 549, 702, 718, 1014, 1184, 1189–1191, 1263
 Tantrism (Tantrayana), 1260, 1261
 Tiantai, 186, 188, 189, 1277
 True Buddha School, 820, 1300
 Unified Buddhist Church of Vietnam, 1335–1336
 Vietnamese Hoa Hao Buddhism, 598–600
 World Buddhist Sangha Council, 1422–1423
 World Fellowship of Buddhists (WFB), 37, 99, 199, 721, 1182, 1269, 1427–1428
 Young Men's Buddhist Association, 1444–1445
 Buddhist Association of China, 240
 Buddhist Association of the Republic of China, 200
 Buddhist Association of Thailand, 199
 Buddhist Churches of America, 194
 Buddhist Community Seita Jōdo-Shinshū Honpa-Honganji, 74
 The Buddhist Compassion Relief Tzu Chi Association, 187, 200–201, 246, 396, 820
 Buddhist Council of New South Wales, 96
 Buddhist Institute, 201–202, 213
 Buddhist Missionary Society, 202, 820
 The Buddhist Society, 202–203
 Buddhist Society of India, 38
 Builders of the Adytum, 203
 Bulgaria, 204–206
 Bulgarian Catholic Church, 206
 Bulgarian Orthodox Church, 205, 206–207, 373, 415, 1308, 1416, 1446
 Bullinger, Heinrich, 499
 Buluku, Jakobo, 10
 Bund Freier Religiöser Gemeinden Deutschlands, 1329
 Bunjiro, Kawate, 753
 Bunting, Jabez, 847
 Burkina Faso, 207–208
 Burma Baptist Convention, 907
 Burner, Willie, 338
 Burning Bush Assembly, 65
 Burt, William, 485
 Burundi, 208–210
 Burundi, Church of the Province of, 210, 342
 Bushara, William, 1316
 Bushman religion, 157
 Bustos, Teofilo, 553
 Buta Singh Ji, Baba, 1129
 Butler, Jamen Bernardt, 22
 Butler, John, 941
 Butuque, 220
 Buu Son Ky Huong, 598
 Bwiti, 210, 435, 525
 Byakkō Shinkō Kai, 210–211
 Byankya, Patrice Njojo, 313
 Byzantine Catholic Church, 1110
 Cabalist movement, 554
 Cabrera, Juan Bautista, 1207
 Cady, H. Emilie, 1377
 Cain, Paul, 1288
 Caitanya, 662
 Calvary Church, 571
 Calvary Holiness Church, 342
 Calvin, John, 124, 291, 498–499, 514, 654, 807, 914, 1068, 1075–1076, 1243, 1326, 1366
 Cambodia, 212–214
 Buddhism in, 185–186, 201–202, 212
 Cameroon, 214–215
 Evangelical Church of, 215, 458, 1029
 Native Baptist Church, 921
 Presbyterian Church in, 1029–1030
 Presbyterian Church of, 22, 215, 1035
 Cameroon Baptist Church, 921
 Cameroon Baptist Convention, 215–216
 Campbell, Alexander, 88, 270, 271, 272, 273, 323, 348–349, 1367, 1424
 Campbell, Thomas, 270, 272, 348–349, 1424
 Campbellites, 88
 Campos, Enrique Chavez, 1004
 Campus Crusade for Christ, 205
 Canada, 216–218, 296
 Anglican Church of, 50–52, 375, 471
 Christian Church (Disciples of Christ) in, 270–271
 Evangelical Mennonite Conference, 482–483
 Lutheran Church in, 471, 802–803
 Union d'Églises Baptistes Françaises au, 1336–1337
 United Church of, 147, 216, 296, 468, 1030, 1346–1347
 Pentecostal Assemblies of, 18, 103, 147, 883, 1316
 Presbyterian Church in, 147, 1030, 1298, 1346
 Canadian Baptist Federation, 218
 Canadian Baptist Ministries, 218–219
 Canadian Council of Churches, 219
 Canadian Friends Service Committee, 220
 Canadian International Baptist Ministries, 218
 Canadian Yearly Meeting of the Religious Society of Friends, 219–220
 Candomblé, 74, 166–167, 220, 1130, 1324
 Canterbury Baptist Association, 126
 Cantine, James, 974
 Caodaism (Dao Cao Dai), 221, 511
 Cape Verde Islands, 222
 Capuchins, 513, 515
 Carey, Lott, 788, 789
 Carey, William, 119, 124, 294, 334, 799
 Cargill, David, 851
 Cargo cults, 450, 999, 1390–1391
 Caribbean Light and Truth Mission, 141
 Carlebach, Shlomo, 584
 Carmathians, 1344
 Carmona-Rivera, Moisés, 1143
 Caroline Islands, 870
 Carr-Gomm, Philip, 411
 Carter, Howard, 87
 Carter, John, 87
 Cartwright, Andrew, 21
 Carvalho, Manuel dos Santos, 488
 Casalis, Eugène, 785
 Casarin, Roberto, 1381–1382
 Case, Paul Foster, 203
 Cashwell, Gaston B., 661, 662
 Castro, Fidel, 123, 374, 857
 Catharism, 552, 781
 Catherine of Siena, St., 408
 Catholic, Apostolic and Palmarian Church, 1144
 Catholic Apostolic Church, 223, 939
 Catholic Apostolic Evangelical Church, Lusitanian, 432, 801–802
 Catholic Assyrian Church, Apostolic, 48, 63–64, 229, 286, 670, 673, 815, 1239–1240, 1252, 1438
 Catholic Church
 American, 551
 Armenian, 76, 79–80, 673, 781, 1320
 Bulgarian, 206
 Chaldean, 229–230
 Christian, 966, 1457
 Coptic, 364, 423
 Ethiopian, 444
 Gnostic, 550–551, 554, 1220
 Greek, 124, 559–560, 673, 1187
 Holy Catholic Church in Japan, 600
 Italo-Albanian, 700–701

- Liberal, 97, 786–787, 1240
 Melkite, 423, 728, 780, 842–843, 1248, 1249, 1417
 Melkite Greek, 562
 Polish National, 971, 1022–1023
 Romanian Greek, 1098, 1099
 Ruthenian, 1110, 1319
 Syrian, 673, 780, 1251, 1252
 Syro-Malabar, 815, 1253–1254
 Syro-Malankara, 816, 1254–1255
 Ukrainian, 1110, 1322, 1323–1324
 Ukrainian Greek, 1318–1319
 Catholic Church in Switzerland, Old, 661, 966
 Catholic Church of Mariavites, 967–968
 Catholic Churches, Old Catholic. See specific Old Catholic churches
 Catholic Diocese of the Old Catholics in Germany, 223–224, 661, 967, 971
 Catholic Holy Spirit Church in Zion, Christian, 1237
 Catholicate of the East, 816
 Catholic-Hindu syncretism, 565
 Caudill, Herbert, 123
 Cayce, Edgar, 89, 938, 1213
 Cayman Islands, 224–225
 Cayman Islands, United Church in Jamaica and the, 1345–1346
 CBAmerica, 225–226
 Cecil, Martin, 429
 Cecil, Michael, 429
 Cedar, Emil, 1354
 Celebi, Celaledin, 864
 Celebi, Faruk Hjemen, 864
 Celestial Church of Christ, 29, 146, 226, 955
 Celtic Church, 1357
 Celtic religions, 97, 674
 Center for Christian Formation, 604
 Center of African Religion, 74
 Center of Faith, Hope and Love, 570
 Central African Republic, 227–228
 Églises Baptistes de la RCA, 420
 Central American Bible Institute, 569
 Central American Evangelical Church Association, 569
 Central American Mission, 425, 568, 603
 Central Union Pacific Mission, 362
 Cespedes, Gregorio de, 758
 Ceylon Methodist Church, 863
 Ceylon Pentecostal Church, 821
 Ceylon Pentecostal Mission, 1005
 Chaboseau, Augustin, 835
 Chad, 228–229
 Chad, Evangelical Church of, 229, 458–459
 Chah, Ajahn, 169–170, 185, 1268
 Chaitanya, 1390, 1434
 Chaitanya, Mahaprabhu, 530, 1432
 Chaldean Catholic Church, 229–230, 673, 1248
 Chambers, Stanley W., 1364
 Champrenaud, Léon, 552
 Ch'an Buddhism, 186, 265, 396, 1054, 1450
 Rinzai (Lin-Chi), 1084
 Soto Zen, 186, 189, 717, 1194–1195, 1450
 Chand, Faqir, 827, 1060
 Chandler, Trevor, 277
 Chandra, Shri Ram, 1169
 Channel Islands, 230–231
 Channing, William Ellery, 1342
 Chapman, Percy T., 120
 Charismatic Church of Uganda, 1316
 Charismatic Movement, 87, 231–232, 298, 425, 429, 1003
 Charismatic Movement in Australia, 277
 Charismatic Renewal in the Holy Spirit, 1021
 Charismatic Renewal Movement, 164
 Chaza, Mai, 814
 Cheeseman, Joseph James, 790
 Chen, Hon-Ming, 232
 Chen, Yu Hsia, 232
 Chen Tao, 232–233
 Cheng Yen, 200–201, 396
 Cherubim and Seraphim, 29, 146, 215, 233–234, 549, 950, 955, 977
 Chewa traditional religion, 817
 Chia, Mantak, 584–585
 Chiage, Lawrence Pius Jairo, 782
 Chicago-Lambeth Quadrilateral, 54
 Chidvilananda, 1171
 Chigaku, Tanaka, 758
 Children of God, 205, 495–497
 Chile, 234–236
 Evangelical Church in, 454–455
 Methodist Church in, 850, 864
 Methodist Pentecostal Church of, 850, 864
 Pentecostal Church of, 1004
 Chilean Evangelical Pentecostal Church, 73
 Chilson, Arthur, 10
 Chimes Hour, 1408
 China, 237–241, 253
 atheism in, 1329–1330
 freedom of religion policy, 240, 260–261
 The Hong Kong Council of the Church of Christ in, 605–606 syncretism, 247
 See also Hong Kong; Macao; Taiwan; Tibet
 China, Church of Christ in, 239, 242, 605
 China, Orthodox Church in, 978–979
 China, Republic of. See Taiwan
 China Christian Council, 53, 240, 1083
 China Islamic Association, 240, 248–249
 China Taoist (Daoist) Association, 240
 Chinese Buddhism, 186–187, 238, 240, 256–258, 261
 Tiantai, 1277
 See also Ch'an Buddhism; Foguangshan; Pure Land Buddhism
 Chinese Buddhist Association, 249–250
 Chinese Catholic Patriotic Association, 240, 250–251
 Chinese Daoist Association, 251
 Chinese Muslim Cultural and Fraternal Association, 243
 Chinese Protestant Three-Self Patriotic Movement, 53, 240, 251–252, 605, 798
 Chinese religion, 186, 245, 253–262 early Confucian tradition, 255–256 early dynasties, 253–255
 Fa-hsiang-tsung, 607
 Falung Gong, 242, 248, 261, 386, 388, 492–495, 820, 1423 five elements, 256
 literati and Neo-Confucianism, 258–259 popular religion, 245, 259–260 qingong, 382, 493, 759, 1452–1453 sectarianism, 260
 Tian Dao, 1275–1277
 yin-yang, 256, 259
 Zhong Gong, 1452–1453
 See also Chinese Buddhism; Confucianism; Daoism
 Chinese Rhenish Church-Hong Kong Synod, 1083
 Chinese Taoist Association, 388, 1058
 Ching Hai Wu Shang Shih, 836
 Chinmayananda, Swami, 1401
 Chinmoy Kumar Ghose, 1216
 Chinmoy, Sri, 1216
 Chirisa, Farai J., 856
 Chishimba, Emilio Mulolani, 905
 Chishti, Khwaja Muinuddin, 631
 Chissano, Alberto Joachím, 899
 Chistiniyya Sufi Order, 263–264, 631, 712, 1228, 1230
 Chitambar, Jasvant Rao, 852
 Chiyoko, Fukata, 430
 Cho, Paul David Yonggi, 1441
 Chogye Order, 188, 264–265
 Chondogyo, 265–266, 755, 759
 Chongyang, Wang, 1058
 Christ (Jesus), 282–283
 Christ Apostolic Church, 15, 29, 266–267, 329, 340, 955
 Christ Chapel Church, 955
 Christ Community Church of Zion, 1457
 Christ for all Nations, 955
 Christ in Man Association, 1381
 Christadelphians, 131, 141, 368, 427, 571
 Christengemeinschaft, 99
 Christian and Missionary Alliance (CMA), 38, 73, 207, 213, 267, 353, 417, 428–429, 467, 495, 569, 572, 728, 824
 Christian Apostolic Church in Zion, 1237, 1458

- Christian Association of Washington (Pennsylvania), 348
- Christian Brethren, 268–269. See also Plymouth Brethren *
- Christian Brotherhood Church, 9
- Christian Catholic Church, 966, 1457
- Christian Catholic Holy Spirit Church in Zion, 1237
- Christian Church (Disciples of Christ), 43, 89, 269–270, 273, 307, 309, 321, 323, 349, 357, 375, 486, 515, 1308, 1349, 1351, 1424
in Canada, 270–271
- Christian Church in Central Sulawesi, 271
- Christian Church in East Timor, 272
- Christian Church in South Sulawesi, 272
- Christian Churches and Churches of Christ, 89, 270, 272–273, 349, 515, 1424
- Christian Churches of Java, 273–274
- Christian Community, 59, 274, 618
- Christian Congregation of Brazil, 165, 275
- Christian Council of Kenya, 10
- Christian Council of Nigeria, 29
- Christian Council of Rhodesia, 856
- Christian Council of the Gold Coast, 549
- Christian Council of Zambia, 1449
- Christian Evangelical Church in Bolaang Mongondow (GMIBM), 275 in Halmahera (GMIH), 275–276 in Minahasa (GMIM), 276
in Timor (GMIT), 276–277
- Christian Fraternity, 570
- Christian Growth Ministries, 231
- Christian Holiness Partnership, 169, 277, 342, 603
- Christian Identity Movement, 171
- Christian League, 755
- Christian Life Churches International, 96, 277–278, 279
- Christian Methodist Episcopal Church, 278–279
- Christian Mission Church (Macao), 243
- Christian Missions in Many Lands, 229, 603
- Christian Outreach Centre, 96, 277, 279
- Christian Pentecostal Church of God, 73
- Christian Protestant Church in Indonesia (GKPI), 279–280, 1047
- Christian Reformed Church, 427
- Christian Reformed Church in Nigeria, 1071
- Christian Reformed Church in North America, 280, 934
- Christian Reformed Churches in the Netherlands, 934, 1074–1075
- Christian Science. See Church of Christ, Scientist
- Christian Service Society, 281
- Christian Women's Board of Missions, 867
- Christianity, 282–299 early doctrines and heresies, 285–286
early history, 282–285
early interaction with Islam, 286, 288–289 early Middle Ages, 286–288 ecumenical movement, 296–297
Egyptian history, 423
esotericism and, 1413–1415 fifteenth–nineteenth century expansion, 293–295
future of, 298
later Middle Ages, 288–291
Protestant Reformation, 291–292
Turkey and history of, 1304–1305 twentieth century, 295–298
- Christkatholische Kirche der Schweiz, 966
- Christmas Island, 300
- Chrysostomos, Archbishop of Nea Justiniana and All Cyprus, 980
- Chuang Tzu (Zhuangzi), 237, 246, 385, 386
- Chung, Datuk Yong Ping, 344
- Chungbin, Pak, 1420
- “The Church, the Sword, and the Arm of the Lord,” 171
- Church Baptist Community of the Congo River, 307–308
- Church Baptist Community of the Western Congo, 308–309
- Church Community of Disciples of Christ, 309–310
- Church Community of Light, 310, 358
- Church Community of the Presbyterians, 310–311
- Church Episcopal Baptist Community of Africa, 311
- Church Evangelical Community, 311–312
- Church in the Province of Kenya, 300
- Church in the Province of Melanesia, 300–301, 1192–1193
- Church in the Province of Nigeria, 301, 304
- Church in the Province of Rwanda, 301–302
- Church in the Province of South Africa, 302, 1117, 1198
- Church in the Province of Sudan, 302–303
- Church in the Province of Tanzania, 303
- Church in the Province of the West Indies, 303–304, 375, 403
- Church in the Province of West Africa, 301, 304, 548, 573, 1198
- Church in Wales, 304–305, 1357
- Church Mennonite Community, 312
- Church Missionary Society, 305 *
- Church of All Religions (Hollywood, California), 1147
- Church of Bangladesh, 119, 306
- Church of Boto Adai, 391
- Church of Central Africa Presbyterian, 306–307, 817, 1353
- Church of Christ, an International Community, 1352
- Church of Christ, Scientist, 73, 131, 147, 225, 230, 314, 376, 827, 839, 869, 937, 997, 1240, 1358, 1377
- Church of Christ in Africa (Kenya), 976
- Church of Christ in China, 239, 242, 605
- Church of Christ in China, The Hong Kong Council of, 605–606
- Church of Christ in Nigeria, 1071
- Church of Christ in Thailand, 307
- Church of Christ in the Congo, 307–313, 472, 945
Baptist Community of the Congo River, 307–308
Baptist Community of the Western Congo, 308–309
Community of Disciples of Christ, 309–310
Community of Light, 310, 358
Community of the Presbyterians, 310–311
Episcopal Baptist Community of Africa, 311
Evangelical Community, 311–312
Mennonite Community, 312
Presbyterian Community of Kinshasa, 312–313
Province of the Anglican Church of the Congo, 313
- Church of Christ [Iglesia ni Cristo] (Philippines), 618
- Church of Christ in Zaire, 309, 310, 311, 313. See also Church of Christ in the Congo
- Church of Christ on Earth by the Prophet Simon Kimbangu. See Kimbanguist Church
- Church of Denmark, 327, 1009, 1355
- Church of England, 292, 315–317, 1189, 1357, 1360, 1366 *
dissent movements, 294
Methodism and, 847
Traditional Anglican Communion, 1297
See also Anglican Communion
- Church of England in Australia, 96
- Church of England in South Africa, 302
- Church of Finland, 475
- Church of French Canada, 61
- Church of God, a Christian Fellowship, 797
- Church of God, Indian Pentecostal, 635
- Church of God Adventist, 150
- Church of God (Anderson, Indiana), 58, 60, 116, 225, 317, 367, 748, 569, 570, 604, 635, 655, 947, 995, 1316
- Church of God (Cleveland, Tennessee), 56, 73, 130, 141, 153, 158, 172, 236, 317–318, 321, 367, 404, 407, 426, 867, 1127, 1374 serpent handling, 1151

- Church of God Holiness, 225
Church of God in Christ, 141, 318–320, 995, 1374
Church of God in the Mexican Republic, 867
Church of God International, 56, 73, 320, 867, 1434
Church of God of Prophecy, 60, 141, 321, 378, 404, 426, 520, 569, 604, 883, 995, 1127, 1374, 1379
Church of God (Sabbatarian), 88
Church of God Seventh Day, 426, 1434
Church of Greece, 415, 558–559
Church of India, Burma, and Ceylon, 335
Church of India, Pakistan, Burma, and Ceylon, 119, 329, 343
Church of Ireland, 321–322, 676, 802, 1297, 1357
Church of Jesus Christ, Christian, Aryan Nations, 171
Church of Jesus Christ in Madagascar, 322–323, 811
Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, 150, 323–325, 1080, 1127, 1287 *
 Church of the Lamb of God, 339–340
 Independent Church (Norway), 962 polygamy-practicing Mormons, 339–340, 1023–1024
Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, Reorganized, 205, 225, 501, 605, 740, 1080–1081
Church of Jesus Christ on Earth by the Prophet Simon Kimbangu. See Kimbanguist Church
Church of Life, 310
Church of Moshoeshoe, 325–326, 1211
Church of North India, 119, 150, 296, 326–327, 343, 634, 830, 852
Church of Norway, 228, 327–328, 482, 607, 814, 815, 961, 1235
Church of Our Lord Jesus Christ in the World, 1283
Church of Pakistan, 119, 296, 306, 326, 328–329, 343, 830, 991
Church of Papa Nouveau, 391
Church of Pentecost, 329, 429
Church of Perfect Liberty, 74
Church of Quakers in Africa, 10
Church of Religious Science, 1078
Church of Satan, 329–331, 1135
Church of Scientology, 74, 218, 331–333, 395, 703, 1033, 1034, 1039, 1314
Church of Scotland, 119, 150, 294, 306, 315, 328, 333–334, 487, 577, 698, 747, 899, 1141, 1198, 1345, 1350, 1353, 1357, 1358, 1367, 1375, 1438, 1449
Church of South India, 48, 118, 296, 305, 326, 334–335, 634, 830, 852
Church of South Yemen, 1438
Church of Sri Lanka, 305, 327, 335–336, 1218
Church of St. George the Martyr, 344
Church of Sweden, 336–337, 436, 441, 474, 478, 871, 1194, 1238, 1262, 1355
Church of the Augsburg Confession of Alsace and Lorraine, 337, 480, 511, 1071
Church of the Brethren, 88, 169, 326, 337–338, 515, 995, 1308. See also Mennonite Church
Church of the Brethren in Nigeria, 338
Church of the Czech Brethren, 786
Church of the Disciples of Christ, 338–339
Church of the East, 48, 64, 250, 670, 673
Church of the First Born of the Fullness of Times, 1025
Church of the Initiates, 210, 435
Church of the Kingdom of God, 339
Church of the Lamb of God, 339–340
Church of the Last Testament, 1104
Church of the Lord (Aladura), 29, 340, 789, 955, 976, 1198, 1285
Church of the Lord Jesus Christ of the Apostolic Faith, 70, 225, 340–341
Church of the Lutheran Brethren, 229, 482
Church of the Nazarene, 130, 140–141, 156, 172, 222, 341–342, 427, 520, 569, 603, 604, 611, 817, 867, 995, 1127, 1250
Church of the New Jerusalem, 1381
Church of the Open Bible, 573
Church of the Open Door, 153
Church of the Province of Burundi, 210, 342
Church of the Province of Burundi, Rwanda, and Zaire, 342
Church of the Province of Central Africa, 158, 343, 817, 1449, 1455
Church of the Province of Kenya, 747
Church of the Province of Melanesia, 1391
Church of the Province of Myanmar, 327, 343, 907
Church of the Province of New Zealand, 362, 501
Church of the Province of Rwanda, 344
Church of the Province of Southeast Asia, 344, 821
Church of the Province of Southern Africa, 343, 784
Church of the Province of Tanzania, 1262
Church of the Province of the Congo, 357
Church of the Province of the Indian Ocean, 171, 344–345, 811, 839
Church of the Province of the West Indies, 57, 60, 115, 130, 139, 224, 578, 714, 882–883, 1117, 1119, 1120, 1297, 1310, 1395
Church of the Province of Uganda, 345
Church of the Prussian Union, 1348
Church of the Red Coats, 1287
Church of the Twelve Apostles, 549
Church of the White Eagle Lodge, 345–346, 1214
Church of Time, 501
Church of Tonga, 1287
Church of Tuvalu and Manua, 359
Church of Tuvalu, 346, 750, 1311
Church of Uganda, Rwanda, and Burundi, 342, 345
Church of William Wade Harris and His Twelve Apostles, 1210
Church of World Messianity [Sekai Kyūsei Kyō], 1146
Church Presbyterian Community of Kinshasa, 312–313
Church Province of the Anglican Church of the Congo, 313
Church Universal and Triumphant, 346–349, 549, 614, 939
Churches of Christ, 141, 427, 515, 569, 995, 1367
Churches of Christ, International, 649–650
Churches of Christ (Non-Instrumental), 270, 273, 348–349, 1392, 1424, 1455
Churches of Christ in Christian Union, 209
Churches of God Outreach Ministries, 320
Circle Sanctuary, 350
Cissé, Shaykh Hasan, 1281
City of Jehovah, 814
Clan of the Ausrans, 350–351, 1022
Clark, Elmer T., 1428
Clark, Randy, 1288
Clarke, Edward, 453
Clarke, John, 40
Cleghorn, Robert, 140
Cleirbaut, Gilbert, 347
Clemann, E., 311
Clemens XV (sedevacantist anti-pope), 1144
Clement XV, 61
Clinton, J. J., 20
Closed Brethren, 269
Clough, James E., 1125
Clymer, R. Swinburne, 47
Coalition for Religious Freedom, 650
Cocos Islands, 351
Cohen, Andrew, 657
Coillard, François, 1353
Coke, Thomas, 334, 714, 847, 848, 851, 852, 854, 862, 932, 1118, 1362
Coker, Daniel, 19, 233
Collin, Michel, 61, 1144
Colombia, 351–353
Colombia, Presbyterian Church of, 1035–1036
Colombo Young Men's Buddhist Association, 1444–1445
Comanche Half Moon, 919
Comber, Thomas J., 307

- Comité Baptiste, 228
 Community Church Workers, 653
 Community Engagement, 1381
 Community of Christ, 1080–1081
 Community of Disciples of Christ (Church of Christ in the Congo), 309–310
 Community of Light, 310, 358
 Community of Mindful Living, 1336
 Community of the Presbyterians (Church of Christ in the Congo), 310–311
 Community of the Sons and Daughters of Mary, 80
 Comoros, 353–354, 840
 Comtes, August, 1328
 Comunità Impegno, 1381
 Confederation of Evangelical Churches of the River Plate, 73
 Confederation of Japanese Religions, 721
 Confessional Lutheran Church, 1420
 Confucianism, 186, 237, 246, 247, 248, 255–256, 1163 in contemporary China, 261
 in Indonesia, 640–642
 in Japan, 716
 in Korea, 757–758
 Confucius, 237, 246, 255
 Conger, Arthur L., 1273
 Congo, Church of the Province of the, 357
 Congo, Churches of Christ in, 307–313.
 See also Church of Christ in the Congo
 Congo, Democratic Republic of the (Zaire), 356–358
 Congo, Evangelical Church of the, 463
 Congo, Evangelical Lutheran Church in, 472
 Congo, Republic of the (Brazzaville), 354–356
 Congregation of Mary Immaculate Queen, 1143
 Congregation of the Holy Ghost under the Protection of the Immaculate Heart of Mary, 600
 Congregational Christian Church in Samoa, 43, 358–359, 1126, 1286
 Congregational Christian Church of American Samoa, 44, 359, 1126
 Congregational Christian Churches, National Association of, 914
 Congregational Church in Canada, 43
 Congregational Churches of New England, 42
 Congregational Council for World Mission, 800
 Congregational Holiness Church, 604
 Congregational Methodist Church, 209
 Congregational Union of Canada, 1346
 Congregational Union of England and Wales, 1373
 Congregational Union of New Zealand, 363, 424
 Congregationalism, 294, 359–360, 515
 Congregationalist Federation of Australia, 1375
 Congress of Indonesian Mystical Movements, 722
 Conradi, Louis Richard, 1151
 Conseil Protestant du Rwanda, 1113
 Consejo Anglicano Sud-Americano (CASA), 492
 Conservative Baptist Association, 309, 603
 Conservative Baptist Foreign Mission Society, 225
 Conservative Baptist Home Missionary Society, 603
 Conservative Baptist International, 225
 Conservative Baptist Mission Society, 309
 Conservative Judaism, 360–361, 697, 736, 1444
 Constanzo, Adolfo, 993
 Contesse, Gabriel, 772
 Convention Baptiste de' Haiti, 361, 580
 Convention of Philippine Baptist Churches, 361–362, 1017
 Cook, Robert F., 635
 Cook, W. T., 1375
 Cook Islands, 362
 Cook Islands Christian Church, 362, 363
 Cooke, Grace and Ivan, 345
 Cooperative Baptist Fellowship, 363–364
 Coornhert, Dirck, 929
 Coptic Catholic Church, 364, 423
 Coptic Christianity, 791
 Coptic Church, Ethiopian Zion, 446–447, 715
 Coptic Evangelical Church, 37, 423
 Coptic Orthodox Church, 37, 99, 286, 364–366, 421, 423, 436, 443, 444, 446, 467, 534, 728, 765, 817, 1225
 Coptic Orthodox Tewahedo Church, 467
 Corfe, John C., 53
 Cornish, Louis, 1015
 Costa Rica, 366–368
 Costa Rica, Evangelical Methodist Church of, 485
 Côte d'Ivoire. See Ivory Coast
 Côte d'Ivoire, Protestant Methodist Church in, 1051–1052
 Council for a Parliament of the World's Religions, 368–369
 Council for Secular Humanism, 369, 608, 1330, 1331
 Council for World Mission, 800
 Council of Baptist Churches in North East India, 370
 Council of Bible Believing Churches International, 1425
 Council of Christian Churches in Angola, 57
 Council of Churches of Cuba, 375
 Council of Independent Churches in Ghana, 1210
 Council of the World's Religions, 665
 Counter-Reformation, 98, 292, 462
A Course in Miracles, 370–371
 Covenant of the Goddess, 371–372
 Covenant of Unitarian Universalist Pagans, 1343
 Cramer, Malinda E., 400
 Crandon Institute, 486
 Crastchotchke, 391
 Crawford, Florence L., 68
 Crème, Benjamin, 71, 938
 Croatia, 372–374, 1446
 Croatian Shingon Buddhist Association, 373
 Crosbie, Robert, 1361
 Cross, William, 851
 Crosslinks, 303
 Crowley, Aleister, 330, 551, 552, 553, 937
 Crowther, Samuel Adjai, 301, 305, 954
 Crumpler, Ambros Blackman, 662
 Cuba, 374–376
 Cuba, Baptist Convention of Western, 122–123
 Cuba, Methodist Church of, 857
 Cuba, Presbyterian Reformed Church in, 1043–1044
 Cult Awareness Network, 1374
 Cumberland Presbyterian Church, 353, 376–377, 788
 Cumina, 995
 Cunningham, Alfred B., 319
 Custom (indigenous religion in Vanuatu), 1390
 Cyprus, 377–378
 Cyprus, Orthodox Church of, 979–980
 Cyril of Alexandria, St., 366
 Czech Brethren, Evangelical Church of the, 463–464
 Czech Lands and Slovakia, Orthodox Church in, 979
 Czech Republic, 378–380
 Czechoslovak Hussite Church, 379
 Da Free John, 3
 Dager Theological School, 22
 Dahlke, Paul, 192
 DahnHak, 382, 759
 Dahomey. See Benin
 Daisetsu, Tangen, 74
 Daishi, Kobo, 1161
 Dalai Lama(s), 155, 190, 191–192, 248, 533, 880, 940, 1278
 Dallmeyer, Heinrich, 900
 Damanhur, 382–383
 Dan religion, 704
 Daneel, M. L. (Inus), 14
 Dang, Luong Minh, 1213
 Danish Missionary Society, 1355
 Danka, Ryszard Ignacy, 351

- Danneels, Godfried, 841
 Dao Cao Dai (Caodaism), 221
 Daoism, 237–238, 243, 246, 247, 384–390
 Chinese Daoist Association, 251
 Chinese folk religion, 245, 259–260 contemporary, 388–389
 Healing Tao, 389, 584–585
 history, 385–388
 in Japan, 716
 Mahayana Buddhism and, 387
 mediumistic religion (Caodaism or Dao Cao Dai), 221
 pantheism, 997
 practices, 389–390
 Quanzhen, 240, 258, 387–388, 584, 1058, 1263
 Zhengyi, 33, 240, 387–388, 1058, 1451–1452
 Darby, John Nelson, 121, 126, 269, 1019, 1244
 Darma, 721
 Darshan Singh, 1101
 Daud Bohras, 151
 David, Francis, 1343
 Da'wa Islamic League, 36
 Dawoodi Bohras, 747
 Day, David A., 788
 Dayananda, Sarasvati, 84, 592
 De Cock, Hendrik, 280
 De La Cruz, Marcial, 92
 De la Ferriere, Serge Raynaud, 1380
 De Melo, Alfredo Gregóno, 1132
 De Melo, Paulo Roberto, 1132
 Dean, William, 121
 Dedelik, 34
 Deeper Christian Life Ministry, 391
 Deeper Life Bible Church, 16, 391, 955
 Defenders of the Faith, 569, 1054
 Defenseless Mennonite Church, 312
 Deima Church, 391
 Deism, 1327
 Dellingers, N. T., 140
 Dempster, John, 484, 486
 Denmark, 392–395
 Denmark, Baptist Union of, 123–124
 Denmark, Church of, 327, 1009, 1355
 Denmark, Evangelical Lutheran Church in, 472–473
 Des Lauriers, Guérard Michel, 1143
 Descartes, Rene, 1328
 Deshimaru, Taisen, 664–665
 Deunov, Peter, 513, 1416
 Dev, Guru, 1429
 Devi, Shri Mataji Nirmala, 627, 1115
 Dewar, Alexander, 1353
 Dhammakaya Foundation, 395–396, 1269
 Dhammaloka, Hinatiyana, 1445
 Dhammananda, 202
 Dhammayuttika, 185
 Dharma Drum Mountain, 187, 246
 The Dharma Drum Mountain Association (Fakushan), 396–397
 Dharmapala, Anagarika, 193, 202, 630, 812, 1218
 Dhillon, Gurinder Singh, 1060 d'Holbach, Baron, 91
 Di Mambro, Jo, 1191
 Dialungana, Salomon Kiangani, 749
 Diamond Sangha, 194, 397–398, 1128
 Diamond Way Buddhism, 135, 398–399, 742
 Diangienda, Joseph, 749–750, 976
 Diaz, Albert J., 122–123
 Diaz, Aristides, 1395
 Diboundou, Joshua, 921
 Diderot, Denis, 1328
 Die Freien Gemeinden, 518
 Diedo, Albert Tobo, 921
 Dievturiba, 775
 Dieye, Abdoulaye, 900
 Digambara, 629, 709, 748, 1266
 Din, Daud Burhan al-, 1160
 Din, Shaikh Tahir Jahal al-, 821
 Dini ya Roho, 10, 1210–1211
 Dinka IV, Mar, 673
 Diocese of Europe, 317
 Disciples of Christ, 269–270, 309. See also Christian Church (Disciples of Christ)
 Disciples of Christ (Church of Christ in the Congo), 309–310
 Disciples of Christ, Church of the, 338–339
 Disciples of Christ in Canada, 270–271
 Disciples of Mother Meera, 892–893
 Divination, 384, 390, 254, 1292
 Divine Healers Church, 146, 548
 Divine Life Society, 93, 399–400, 627, 664, 1395
 Divine Light Mission, 353, 427–428, 545, 592, 812
 Divine Science Federation, 400–401, 660
 Djibouti, 401–402
 Do, Thich Quang, 1335
 Dober, Leonhard, 883
 Dr. Baabsahab-Michael Aktor Anbedkar Samarek Samiti (movement), 631
 Dodd, C. O., 88
 Dogon religion, 207, 402–403, 824
 Doinel du Val-Michel, Jules Benoit, 550–552
 Dolamore, Decimus, 126
 Döllinger, Johann Joseph Ignaz von, 969
 Domínguez y Gómez, Clemente, 1144
 Dominica, 403–405
 Dominican Order, 288, 407–408, 1394 *
 Dominican Republic, 405–407
 Door to Heaven Pentecostal Church, 569
 Doraisamy, Theodore R., 854
 Dositej, 810
 Doukhobors, 408–409, 539, 878, 1103
 Dowie, John Alexander, 68, 1457
 Doyle, Arthur Conan, 345
 Drakpa, Tsong Khapa Losang, 532–533
 Druid Order (Fellowship of Isis), 500
 Druidism, 409–411, 509, 1356
 Druze, 33, 96, 411–412, 574, 689, 698, 728, 777–778, 1248
 DudjomRinpoche, 963
 Duff, Alexander, 334
 Dumpys, Hans G., 481
 Dunkers, 169
 Dunwell, Joseph R., 849
 Duono, Beinsa, 1416–1417
 Durham, William H., 86, 275, 1363
 Dutch Freethinking Association, 519
 Dutch Reformed Church, 43, 158, 280, 412, 784, 910, 1070, 1198, 1348, 1349, 1350, 1376
 Dutch Reformed Church in Africa, 1376
 Dutch Reformed Mission Church, 1376
 Dutton, Denis, 1429
 Dyson, Martin, 853
 Eames, Robert Henry Alexander, 322
 East Africa Yearly Meeting of Friends (South), 414, 523, 748
 East African United Churches, 976
 East Java Christian Church (GKJW), 414
 East Timor, 1282
 East Timor, Christian Church in, 272
 Eastern Mennonite Board of Missions and Charities, 569
 Eastern Orthodoxy, 73, 229, 373, 414–415, 558. See also Ecumenical Patriarchate; Greek Orthodox Church; Russian Orthodox Church; other specific Orthodox Churches
 Eastern Orthodoxy, in Ukraine, 1321–1323
 Eastern Rite Churches, 205, 206, 415. See also Eastern Orthodoxy
 Echo Park Evangelical Association, 648
 ECKANKAR, 415–416, 895, 956, 1060, 1101, 1180
 Eckhardt, Meister, 408
 Eclectic Center of the Universal Flowing Light, 1132
 Ecuador, 416–419
 Ecumenical Council of Churches of Austria, 460
 Ecumenical movement, 296–297
 Ecumenical Patriarchate, 99, 156, 206, 288, 415, 810, 842, 980, 1308, 1446
 Patriarchate of Constantinople, 242, 419, 421, 423, 439, 440, 443, 558, 559, 560, 1317, 1323, 1321
 Russian Orthodox Church history and, 1107
 Eddy, Mary Baker, 314, 937, 997, 1377
 Eden Revival Church, 1210
 Edgerton, James A., 660
 Edo National Church, 951

- Edwards, Jonathan, 1042
 Église Bouddhique Unifiée, 1335, 1336
 Église de Jésus Christ sur la terre par le prophète Simon Kimbangu. See Kimbanguist Church
 Église Déimatiste, 391, 705
 Église du Christ, 1285
 Église Evangélique de la Guadeloupe, 564
 Église Evangélique de Polynésie Française, 520
 Église Harriste. See Harrist Church
 Église Lumpa, 358
 Église Matsouaniste, 355
 Église protestante africaine, 22
 Églises Baptistes de la RCA, 420
 Églises Reformées Evangéliques Indépendantes, 934
 Egypt, 420–424
 Egypt, General Baptist Evangelical Convention of, 533–534
 Egyptian Christianity, Coptic Orthodox Church. See Coptic Orthodox Church
 Egyptian Jihad group, 28
 Eisendrath, Maurice N., 1423
 Eisenstein, Ira, 1064
 Ekaku, Hakuin, 1084
 Ekalesia Niue, 424, 958
 Ekman, Ulf, 1240
 El Salvador, 424–427
 Elan Vital, 168, 353, 427–428, 812, 1180
 Elijah Muhammad, 548, 912, 13107–1408
 Elim Christian Mission, 426, 569, 571, 604
 Elim Congregations, 1330
 Elim Pentecostal Church, 230, 329, 428–429
 Ella Thing Memorial Mission, 758–759
 Ellice Islands, 346, 1311
 The Emissaries, 429–430
 Emmanuel Church Association, 569
 Emmanuel Mission Sahara, 891
 Encausse, Gérard, 551, 552, 835
 Engel, Jacob, 169
 Engenas Lekganyane, 12
 English Sangha Trust (EST), 170
 Engvall, Carl Johann, 311
 Ennōkyō, 430
 Enomiya-Lassalle, Hugo Makibi, 1128
 Episcopal Anglican Church of Brazil, 165, 430
 Episcopal Baptist Community of Africa (Church of Christ in the Congo), 311
 Episcopal Church, 54, 147, 304, 316, 430–432, 569, 1395
 High-Church and Low-Church, 431–432
 Episcopal Church in Jerusalem and the Middle East, 117, 303, 378, 423, 432–433, 674, 698, 728, 780, 892, 974, 1057, 1250, 1303, 1344, 1438
 Episcopal Church in the Philippines, 433–434, 1015
 Episcopal Church of the Sudan, 303
 Episcopius, Simon, 1079
 Equatorial Guinea, 434–435
 Equatorial Guinea, Reformed Presbyterian Church of, 1075
 Erasmus, Desiderius, 929
 Eritrea, 435–436
 Esoteric tradition (Western), 1413–1416
 Espiritismo, 436–437
 Essene Church in the Hashemite Kingdom of Jordan, 729
 Established Church of Scotland, 1375
 Estigarribia, Severiano, 1010
 Estonia, 437–440
 Estonian Apostolic Orthodox Church, 438, 439, 440, 1108
 Estonian Evangelical Lutheran Church, 124, 438, 439, 440, 441
 Estonian Evangelical Lutheran Church Abroad, 441–442
 Estonian Orthodox Church (Moscow Patriarchate), 440
 Estrada, Jose Manuel, 1380
 Eternal Sacred Order of the Cherubim and Seraphim, 29, 233–234, 977
 Ethical humanism, 658
 Ethiopia, 442–444
 Beta Israel, 147–148, 444
 Ethiopian Catholic Church, 444
 Ethiopian Church, 1225
 Ethiopian Church of South Africa, 19
 Ethiopian Evangelical Church-Mekane Yesus, 443, 444–445, 786
 Ethiopian Jews (Beta Israel), 147–148, 444
 Ethiopian Orthodox Tewahedo Church, 435, 443, 444, 445–446, 577, 715, 1063, 1225
 Ethiopian-type churches, 12–14
 Ethiopian Zion Coptic Church, 446–447, 715
 Ethnoreligions, 448–452
 Eto, Silas, 1193
 Eucharist-Marian Crusade, 1021
 European Buddhist Union, 99, 453
 Evangel Fellowship, 1226
 Evangel Temple, 655
 Evangelical Alliance, 84, 353
 The Evangelical Alliance Mission (TEAM), 974, 1344
 Evangelical Alliance of Angola, 57, 1133
 Evangelical Alliance of Guatemala, 570
 Evangelical and Reformed Church, 418
 Evangelical Baptist Mission of South Haiti, 580
 Evangelical Baptist Missions, 950
 Evangelical Baptist Union of Italy, 453–454
 Evangelical Brotherhood, 30–31
 Evangelical Christian Church in Irian Jaya (GKI), 454
 Evangelical Christian Church in Slovenia, 1187
 Evangelical Christian Church of Mali, 824 Evangelical Church of the Augsburg and Helvetic Confessions in Austria, 98, 460–461 of the Augsburg Confession (Poland), 462–463 of the Augsburg Confession in Romania, 461, 490, 1096 of the Augsburg Confession in Slovenia, 1187–1188 of the Augsburg Confession in the Slovak Republic, 461–462, 1185, 1187
 of Cameroon, 215, 458, 1029
 of Central Angola, 1133 of Chad, 229, 458–459 in Chile, 454–455
 of the Congo, 355, 463 of the Czech Brethren, 379, 463–464 of French Polynesia, 459 of Gabon, 459–460, 525–526
 in Germany, 455–457, 465, 475, 543, 910, 1083, 1349
 of Guinea, 574
 of the Holy Spirit, 569 of Iran, 670
 in Kalimantan (GKE), 457 of the Lutheran Confession in Brazil, 464 of Morocco, 892 in New Caledonia and the Loyalty Islands, 457–458, 740, 1392 of Niger, 950
 in the Philippines, 1351
 of Rio de Janeiro, 488
 of South Angola, 56
 Synod of the Nile, 423, 467, 1032, 1226 of Togo, 466, 1284
 of West Africa, 466–467, 954
 of the West Indies, 407, 465–466, 520, 1119
 Evangelical Church Salama of Niger, 950
 Evangelical Churches of Vietnam, 467–468
 Evangelical Community (Church of Christ in the Congo), 311–312
 Evangelical Congregational Church in Angola, 56, 468
 Evangelical Covenant Church, 468–469
 Evangelical Ewe Church, 489
 Evangelical Faith Missions, 436
 Evangelical Fellowship of Missions Association, 1226
 Evangelical Fellowship of Zimbabwe, 1455
 Evangelical Free Church, 812
 Evangelical Free Church of America, 469, 1395
 Evangelical Free Church of Venezuela, 1395
 Evangelical Friends, 209

- Evangelical Friends International, 469–470
- Evangelical Lutheran Church, 1455
in America, 455, 470–471, 805, 1354, 1373, 1400, 1420
in Canada, 471–472, 802
in Congo, 472
in Denmark, 472–473, 491 of Finland, 478–479, 504, 506 of France, 479–480, 511 in Iceland, 473–474, 617
in Kenya, 474–475
in the Kingdom of the Netherlands, 477–478, 933, 1234, 1366 of Lithuania, 480–481
in Madhya Pradesh, 1355 of Malawi, 817
in Namibia, 475
of New Guinea, 998
of Papua New Guinea, 481–482
in Southern Africa, 158, 475–476, 1083, 1237
in Tanzania, 476–477, 1262
in Zimbabwe, 478
- Evangelical Lutheran Free Church of Norway, 482, 515, 961
- Evangelical Lutheran Joint Synod of Wisconsin and Other States, 1420
- Evangelical Lutheran National Church, 394
- Evangelical Mennonite Church, 209, 569, 604
- Evangelical Mennonite Church in Paraguay, 1001
- Evangelical Mennonite Conference, 312, 482–483
- Evangelical Methodist Church of Argentina, 483–484 of Bolivia, 153, 484 of Costa Rica, 368, 485
of Italy, 485–486, 1407 in the Philippine Islands, 483, 1017, 1351
of Switzerland, 499
of Uruguay, 486, 1385
- Evangelical Mission of Panama, 995
- Evangelical Mission of South Haiti, 465, 487
- Evangelical Mission of the Holy Spirit, 571
- Evangelical Missionary Union Church, 417
- Evangelical Pentecostal Church, 1008
- Evangelical Pentecostal Mission of Angola, 56
- Evangelical Presbyterian Church in Ghana, 478–479
- Evangelical Presbyterian Church in South Africa, 488, 1198
- Evangelical Presbyterian Church of Togo, 488–489, 1285
- Evangelical Presbyterian Reformed Church, 487
- Evangelical Protestant Church, 573
- Evangelical Reformed Church of Angola, 56, 489, 1354
- Evangelical Synodal Presbyterian Church of the Augsburg Confession in Romania, 489–490, 1096
- Evangelical Union and Mission of Brazil and Portugal, 488
- Evangelical United Brethren, 418, 1362
- Evangelical-Methodist Church of Switzerland, 499
- Evangelism-in-Depth, 570
- Evangelistic Church of West Africa, 1226
- Evangelistic Doctrinal Church of Puerto Pilón, 995
- Exclusive Brethren, 269
- Exume, Dorothy Webster, 319
- Fabre des Essarts, Léonce, 552
- Faeroe Islands, 491
- Fahs, Catherine, 48
- Fa-hsiang-tsung, 607
- Faith Movement (Trosrørelsen), 1240
- Faith Tabernacle, 266, 340
- Fakushan Association, 396–397
- Falasha, 147–148
- Falkland Islands, 491–492
- Falun Gong, 242, 248, 261, 386, 388, 492–495, 820, 1423, 1452
- Falwell, Jerry, 121
- The Family, 77, 141, 205, 495–497, 571, 869, 1314
- Family of Families, 1021
- Fang religion, 434
- Faraj, Abd al-Salam, 904
- Fard, Wallace, 911–912, 1407
- Farel, Guillaume, 479, 1243
- Farrakhan, Louis, 548, 690, 912–913, 1408
- Fatima (Portugal), 497–498, 1028
- Fatimids, 420–423
- Fauss, Oliver F., 1364
- F'Eden Church, 1210
- Federação Espírita Brasileira, 1208
- Federal Council of Churches, 652, 1373
- Federated States of Micronesia, 833
- Federation of Associations of the Confucian Religion in the Whole of Indonesia, 641
- Federation of Evangelical Baptist Churches of France, 511
- Federation of Evangelical Churches of Uruguay, 1385
- Federation of Evangelical Lutheran Churches, 1355
- Federation of Independent Unity Churches, 1377
- Federation of Swiss Protestant Churches, 131, 498–499, 1246
- Federation of Zoroastrian Associations, 1433
- Fehr, Richard, 940
- Feller, Henrietta, 1336–1337
- Fellowship of Irian Jaya Baptist Churches, 499–500
- Fellowship of Isis, 500, 555, 676
- Female circumcision, 1036
- Fenwick, Malcolm C., 759
- Fera, Saverio, 485
- Ferguson, Samuel, 788
- Fernando Po, 458
- Fidler, Richard, 319
- Fiji and Rotuma, Methodist Church in, 851
- Fiji Islands, 500–502
- Fiji Islands, Hindu community of, 502–504
- Filadelfia Church, 1009
- Filaret, Metropolitan, 1322–1323
- Fillmore, Myrtle and Charles, 1376–1377
- Finland, 504–506
- Finland, Church of, 475
- Finland, Evangelical Lutheran Church of, 478–479, 504, 506
- Finnish Freethought Union, 519
- Finnish Mission Society, 475
- Finnish Orthodox Church, 505, 506–507
- Finnish traditional religion, 504
- Fire-Baptized Holiness Church, 662, 789
- First Century Christian Fellowship, 644
- First Church of Satan, 331
- First Society of Free Enquirers, 518, 1329
- Fiske, Pliny, 1250
- Fletcher, Charles Tenshin, 1418
- Flierl, Johannes, 481
- Flores, Francisco, 66
- Flores, Samuel Joaquín, 793
- Flurry, Gerald, 1014–1015, 1434
- Flying saucer religions. See UFO religions
- Foguangshan, 187, 195, 246, 396, 507–508, 820, 1263
- Folkekirken, 472
- Foote, Julia A. J., 21
- Foreign Mission Baptist Mission, 125
- Forman, Charles W., 328, 1039–1040
- Forsyth, Nathaniel, 334
- Fortune, Dion, 555, 1416
- Foster, Angel, 857
- Foster Roshi, Nelson 398
- Foundation for the Preservation of the Mahayana Tradition, 508, 533, 881, 940
- Fountain of Life Church of Prophecy, 426
- Foursquare Gospel Churches, 73. See also International Church of the Foursquare Gospel
- Fox, George, 1358
- Fox, Kate, 1214
- Fox, Selena, 350
- France, 509–512
- France, Evangelical Lutheran Church of, 479–480, 511
- France, Reformed Church of, 36, 402, 457, 459, 487, 511, 564, 1001, 1051, 1070, 1071–1072, 1303

- Francescon, Luigi, 275
 Francis of Assisi, St., 512
 Franciscans, 288, 512–513, 1394
 Frankel, Zacharias, 360, 736
 Frashëri, Sami, 32
 Fraternité Blanche Universelle [Universal White Brotherhood], 513
 Fraternity of Inner Light, 555
 Fraternity of Saint Pius X, 514, 1246
 Frediani, Gino, 1144
 Free Apostolic Churches of the Apostles and Prophets, 426
 Free Baptist Union, 1345
 Free Brethren (Plymouth), 569
 Free Christian Baptists, 915
 Free Church of Scotland, 515, 817, 890, 1033–1034, 1358
 Free Church of Tonga, 1298
 Free Churches, 268, 514–515
 Free Evangelical Churches, 656
 Free Inquirers, 518
 Free Lutheran Church, 617
 Free Methodist Church, 209, 423
 Free Methodist Church of North America, 406, 515–516, 603
 Free Presbyterian Church of Victoria, 1375
 Free Protestant Episcopal Church, 435
 Free Wesleyan Church of Tonga, 516
 Free Will Baptist Church, 995
 Free Will Baptists, 281, 915
 Free Will Baptists, National Association of, 914–915
 Freedom from Religion Foundation, 39
 Freeman, George, 1429
 Freeman, Thomas Birch, 145–146, 548, 848, 849, 856, 862, 1052, 1285
 Freemasonry, 485, 517–518, 552
 Martinism, 835–836
 Freethinkers of America, 1330
 Freethought, 91, 511, 518–519, 1328
 Freetown Baptist Church, 1172
 Freidenker-Vereinigung der Schweiz, 519
 Freidlander, Israel, 1444
 French Baptist Union, 1336–1337
 French Guiana, 519–520
 French Polynesia, 520–521
 French Reformed Church, 459
 French secret society, Priory of Sion, 1044–1046
 Frenz, Helmut, 455
 Fretes, Andrés, 1010
 Freytag, F. L. Alexander, 339
 Friends (Quakers), 40, 294, 425, 515, 521–523, 603–604, 728, 843, 1358
 Canadian Yearly Meeting of, 219–220
 Christian Council of Kenya, 10
 East Africa Yearly Meeting of, 414, 523, 748
 General Conference, 219, 521
 Friends Church Association, 603
 Friends of Jerusalem, 935
 Friends of Meher Baba, 841–842
 Friends of the Western Buddhist Order, 196–197, 440, 453, 631, 1412–1413
 Friends United Meeting, 219, 375, 414, 469, 523–524
 Friends World Committee for Consultation (FWCC), 219, 523, 524
 Frizza, Menichetti, 874
 Frumentius, 445
 Fufai, 378
 Full Gospel Believers Church, 444
 Full Gospel Business Men's Fellowship International, 231, 955
 Full Gospel Central Church, 391
 Full Gospel Church of God, 899
 Full Gospel Church of God in Southern Africa, 318
 Fuller, Andrew, 124–125
 Furman, Charles, 569

 Ga, Marcario V., 1015
 Gabon, 525–526
 Gabon, Bwiti movement, 210
 Gabon, Evangelical Church of, 459–460, 525–526
 Galilee Church of God, 569
 Gambia, 526–527
 Gampopa, 739
 Ganda religion, 1315
 Gandhi, Mahatma, 626
 Gangale, Giuseppe, 453
 Garden of Absolute Reality, 1161–1162
 Gardiner, John, 1117
 Gardner, Gerald B., 451, 528, 1418
 Gardner, Martin, 23
 Gardnerian Wicca, 451, 528–529, 555, 1418
 Garifuna religion, 529–530
 Garifunas, 138–139, 605
 Garner, Gerald, 555
 Garvey, Marcus, 446, 714–715
 Gathuna, Arthur, 976
 Gattinoni, Carlos E., 484
 Gattinoni, Juan E., 484
 Gaudiya Math, 530–532, 1121, 1432–1433
 Gaudiya Vaisnava Association, 373
 Gautama (the Buddha), 629
 Gavazzi, Alessandro, 485
 Gaxiola, Maclovio, 66
 Gaxiola, Manuel de Jesús, 67
 Gay/lesbian/bisexual/transgender persons, intercontinental religious community for, 1379–1380
 Ge Hong, 387
 Gedatsu Kai, 189, 532
 Geddie, John, 1391
 Gee, Donald, 87
 Geelkerken, Johannes G., 1073
 Geiger, Abraham, 736, 1065
 Gelukpa, 190, 248, 532–533, 940

 General Baptist Evangelical Convention of Egypt, 533–534
 General Baptists, 41, 124–125
 The General Church of the New Jerusalem, 534–535, 955, 1242
 General Synod, 306
 Genty, Patrice, 552
 Georgia, 536–539
 Georgian Orthodox Church, 537, 539–540, 1108
 Geredja Bebas, 934
 Gereja Bethel Indonesia, 318
 German Baptists, Union of Evangelical Free Church Congregations, 1339–1340
 German Brethren, 169
 German Buddhism Union, 540–541
 German Democratic Republic (GDR), 542
 German Evangelical Church Society of the West, 1348
 German new religion, Universal Life [Universelles Leben], 358, 1381
 German Reformed Church, 43, 1348
 Germany, 541–544
 Catholic Diocese of the Old Catholics in, 223–224, 967, 971
 Evangelical Church in, 455–457, 465, 475, 543 910, 1083, 1349
 Hinduism in, 544–545
 Islam in, 545–547
 Gestefeld, Ursula, 314
 Ghana, 547–550
 Evangelical Presbyterian Church in, 478–479
 Methodist Church, 849
 Musama Disco Christo Church, 902
 Presbyterian Church of, 548, 1036
 Spiritual Churches, 1210
 Ghana Apostolic Church, 329
 Ghana Muslim Community, 548
 Ghana Muslim Mission, 548
 Ghazali, al-, 686
 Ghose, Chinmoy Kumar, 1216
 Ghose, Sri Aurobindo, 626, 1156, 1215
 Ghost Dance movement, 451
 Gibraltar, 550
 Gibson, Walter Murray, 1127
 Gideon Mission, 656
 Giguère, Marie-Paule, 80
 Gilbert Islands, 346, 750
 Gilliland, James P., 850
 Girgis, Seddik W., 534
 Giri, Swami Hariharanada, 657
 Glenny, Edward H., 36
 Global Church of God, 4, 797, 1352, 1434
 Global Congress of the World's Religions, 665
 Global Council of International Faithists, 1379
 Global Councils, 1368

- Global Ministries Board, 43
 Glück, Ernest, 776
 Gnostic Apostolic Church, 552, 553
 Gnostic Association of Anthropological and Cultural Studies, 553
 Gnostic Catholic Church, 550–551, 554, 1220
 Gnostic Christian Universal Church, 553
 Gnostic Christian Universal Movement in the New Order, 553
 Gnostic Church, Stella Maris, 1220
 Gnostic Churches (Doinel), 551–552
 Gnostic movement (Samael aun Weor), 552, 553
 Gnostic Society, 554
 Gnostic Society in the Kingdom of Norway, 554
 Gnosticism, 155, 283, 554, 673, 781, 1220
 Mandaeans, 554, 673, 827–828
 Gobind (or Govind) Singh, 632, 1174, 1177, 1179
 Goble, Jonathan, 720
 God is Love Church, 166, 368, 427
 God of the Candle, 355
 Goddess, Covenant of the, 371–372
 Goddess spirituality, 451, 555
 Goddess worship, Fellowship of Isis, 500
 Godianism, 951
 Gods All Times Association, 444
 God's Mercy Votaries, 1021
 God's Salvation Church [Chen Tao], 232–233
 Goenka, Satya Narayan, 907, 1398–1399
 Goethe, Johann Wolfgang, 59
 Goi Masahisa, 210
 Golden Light Teachings, 753–754, 974
 Goldie, John, 1352
 Goldstein, Joseph, 645
 Gomarus, Franciscus, 1079
 Gómez, Arnolda Garro, 553
 Gonin, Henru, 1376
 González, Eusebio Joaquín, 792–793, 869
 Good Samaritan Evangelical Lutheran Church, 1355
 Good Shepherd Independent Episcopal Church, 21
 Gospel Furthering Bible Church, 748
 Gospel Harvesters Church, 655
 Gospel Holy Spirit Church of East Africa, 10
 Gospel Missionary Society, 1036
 Gospel Missionary Union, 141, 353, 417, 824, 891, 995
 Gospel of God Church, 69
 Gospel Workers Church of Canada, 342
 Goss, Howard, 1364
 Gosselin, Constant, 785
 Gossner Evangelical Lutheran Church in Chotanagpur and Assam, 1355
 Gossner Mission, 1355
 Gottwald, Daniel, 1117
 Govind (or Gobind) Singh, 632, 1174, 1177, 1179
 Govinda, Bhakti Sundar, 531
 Gowans, Walter, 1226
 Grace Bible Church, 16
 Grail Movement, 358, 555–556
 Grammont, Peter, 758
 Granbery, John C., 849
 Grand Universal Fraternity, 74
 Grande Ligne Mission, 1336–1337
 Grant, Heber J., 324
 Graves, James R., 1199
 Great Britain. See United Kingdom
 Great Britain, Baptist Union of, 124–125
 Great Britain, Methodist Church of, 857
 Great Britain and Ireland, Moravian Church in, 886
 Great Commission Churches, 604
 Great White Brotherhood, 346, 556–557, 1104
 Great Zimbabwe, 783
 Greater European Mission, 205
 Greater World Spiritualist Church, 230
 Grebal, Conrad, 169
 Greece, 557–559
 Greece, Orthodox Church of, 980–981
 Greek Catholic Church, 124, 559–560, 673, 1187
 Greek Catholic Church, Melkite, 562
 Greek Catholic Church, Romanian, 1098, 1099
 Greek Catholic Church, Ukrainian, 1318–1319
 Greek Evangelical Church, 378, 559, 560
 Greek Orthodox Church, 99, 230, 358, 415, 423, 560, 1323
 African, 22
 Greek Orthodox Patriarchate of Alexandria and All Africa, 22, 37, 288, 355, 358, 415, 423, 507, 560–561, 817, 892, 1225, 1316
 Greek Orthodox Patriarchate of Antioch and All the East, 37, 288, 415, 561–562, 777, 1248, 1308
 Greek Orthodox Patriarchate of Jerusalem, 288, 415, 562–563, 698, 728, 1109
 Greeley, Dana McLean, 1423
 Greenland, 563–564
 Gregg, Irwin, 400
 Gregory I, 287
 Gregory XVII (sedevacantist anti-pope), 1144
 Grenfell, George, 307
 Grimes, Samuel, 1004
 Grimm, Georg, 192
 Growing in Grace Churches, 73, 427, 571, 605, 869
 Grubb, Barbrook, 54
 Grubb, Wilfred B., 54
 Gruchy, Lydia, 1347
 Gu, Grigori Zhu Shi, 978
 Guadeloupe, 564–565
 Guam, 565–566, 959
 Guangxun, Ding, 252
 Guardians of the City, 935
 Guatemala, 566–571
 Guénon, René, 552
 Guinea, 571–573
 Guinea-Bissau, 573–574
 Guinness, H. Grattan, 311
 Gumi, Abubakar, 953
 Gurbachan Singh Ji, Gurbachan, 1129
 Gurdjieff, George Ivanovich, 574, 1103
 The Gurdjieff Foundations, 574–575
 Guru Rinpoche, 963
 Gush Emunim, 576
 Guti, Ezekiel, 16, 1455–1456
 Guyana, 576–578
 Guyana Pandits Society, 578
 Guyana Sanathan Dharma Maha Sabha, 578
 Gyatso, Geshe Kelsang, 508, 940
 Gyatso, Sonam, 880
 Gyatso, Tenzin, 533, 1278
 Gyelpo, Könchok, 1121
 Gypsies, 205
 Muslims, 810
 Serbian Orthodox evangelization, 1149
 Gypsy Evangelical Mission, 699
 Haas, William C., 420
 Hackman, John, 1210
 Haddad, Faik Ibrahim, 433
 Hagin, Kenneth, 1240
 Hahn, Carl Hugo, 475
 Haile Selassie, 442, 1063
 Haiti, 579–580
 Convention Baptiste de', 361
 Evangelical Mission of South, 487
 Vodou, 1402–1404
 Hakim, al-, 411, 1248
 Hale, Joe, 1429
 Hales, John S., 1029
 Hallelujah Church, 577
 Halmahera, 275–276
 Hamaliyya, 228, 824
 Hamas, 693
 Hammett, Thomas, 1118
 Hammett, William, 714, 854
 Hanafite School of Islam, 580–581 *
 Hanbalite School of Islam, 581–582, 698, 1140, 1405
 Hang, Tsang To, 1048
 Hanh, Thich Nhat, 1335, 1336
 Hanifah, Abu, 581
 Hanisch, Otto, 840
 Hans Maharaj Ji, Shri 427, 592
 Harada Dai'un Sogaku Roshi, 1128
 Harappa culture, 587
 Hardev Singh Ji Maharaj, Baba, 1129–1130
 Hardjoprakoso, Sumantri, 997
 Hardjosapuro, 1133

- Hardopusoro, 721
Hare Krishna movement. See International Society for Krishna Consciousness
Harman, William, 863
Harrington, Francis M., 484
Harris, Howel, 1041
Harris, James, 1391
Harris, William Wade, 12, 29, 391, 582, 705, 1051, 1210
Harrist Church, 12, 15, 391, 549, 582, 705, 1210
Hartshorne, Charles, 997
Harvurot movement, 1064
Hass, Wolfgang, 1246
Hassidism, 583–584, 697, 736, 1320
 Lubavitch, 584, 697, 800–801
 Satmar, 584, 737, 935, 1137–1138
 See also Orthodox Judaism
Hastings, Selina, 1041
Hatha yoga, 1440–1441
Hauge, Hans Nielsen, 327, 961
Hauhau Church, 830
Hawaii, 42
Hayward, Thomas G., 1004
Hazrat Haji Hakeem Maulvi Nurud-Din Sahib, 24
Healing Society in Action, 382
Healing Tao, 389, 584–585
Health, Happy, Holy Organization, 1173–1174
Heard, R. Dennis, 1005
Heavenly Christianity Church, 146
Heaven's Gate, 233, 1314
Helminski, Edmund Kabir, 865
Helvetic Confession, Evangelical Churches of, 460–461, 463
Helwys, Thomas, 129
Henderson, Alexander, 140
Henry VIII, King, 291, 315, 1357
Hensley, George Went, 1150
Hepburn, James C., 1359
Herbert, Edward (Lord Cherbury), 1327
Hermannsburg Mission, 1355
Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn (HOGD), 203, 1415–1416
Hernández, Adolfo Zamora, 1143
Hernández, Bernardo, 66
Hernández y Esperon, Angel Maria, 656
Herrnhut brethren, 438
Hertz, Gevene, 654
Herzegovina and Bosnia, 155–157
Herzl, Theodore, 736
Herzog, Eduard, 966
Hesseltine, Anne, 633
Heyer, Christian Frederick, 1420
Hezbollah, 1405
Hezmalhalch, Thomas, 68
Hiastan, Martin, 1188
Hickey, James, 867
Hicks, Elias, 521
Hiis (The Grove), 438
Hill, John Clark, 568
Himigamisama, 1266
Hinayana Buddhism, 182
Hindu Community of the Fiji Islands, 502
Hindu Freethought Union, 519, 1330
Hindu groups:
 Arya Samaj, 84–85, 502, 503, 578, 592, 624–625, 748, 839, 1198, 1234
 Assembly of All Hindus [Vishwa Hindu Parishad], 1401–1402
 Brahma Kumaris, 159
 Brahmo Samaj, 159–160, 591, 624–625, 643, 647, 1343
 Disciples of Mother Meera, 892–893
 Divine Life Society, 399–400
 Divine Light Mission, 427–428
 Fiji Islands, 502–504
 Gaudiya Math, 530–532
 Integral Yoga International, 646–647
 Manavta Mandir, 827
 Mata Amritanandamayi Math, 837
 Shakti Movement, 590, 622, 1156–1157
 Smarta tradition, 1188–1189
 South African Neo-Hinduism, 1198
 Swaminarayan, 1235–1236
 Tamil Saivism, 820, 1121, 1259–1260
 Tantrism, 622–623
 Vedanta Societies, 74, 592, 625, 839, 1392–1393
 Virasaivas, 1121
 Vishwa Hindu Parishad, 1401–1402
 Yogi tradition, 622, 1440–1441
 See also Saivism; Vaisnavism
Hindu Welfare Board (Brunei), 175
Hinduism, 586–597, 619–627
 Catholic syncretism, 565 concepts and practice, 593–596 female leaders, 627
 in Germany, 544–545
 historical epochs, 586–593, 619–627
 in Indonesia, 642–643
 Islam and, 591
 reformist, 592
 in Sri Lanka, 1219–1220
 in Trinidad and Tobago, 1299–1300 terminological issues, 586
 women's movement (Shakti), 1156
Hindu-Mahayana Buddhist tradition in Cambodia, 212
Hine, John, 343
Hinkins, John-Roger, 895
Hinn, Benny, 1288
Hippolite, Lucius, 361
Hirsch, Samson Raphael, 736, 983
His Highness Prince Aga Khan Shia Imami Ismaili Council, 151, 598, 631, 696
Hispanic Apostolic Faith movement, 62
Hizballah, 693, 779
Hōnen, 725
Hoa, Yap Kim, 858
Hoa Hao Buddhism, 598–600, 1398
Hocking, William E., 985
Hockins, Alfred, 603
Hodur, Franciszek, 1022
Hoeller, Stephan A., 554
Hoffman, Melchior, 843, 845
Hogg, Jack, 551
Holiness Church of Christ, 342
Holiness Movement, 85, 169, 267, 277, 341, 469, 599–600, 1008, 1410
Holland, John R., 649
Holmes, Ernest, 1078, 1145
Holy Apostles Community at Aiyetoro, 234
Holy Catholic Apostolic Church in Zion, 1457
Holy Catholic Church in Japan, 600
Holy Ghost Fathers, 222, 228, 354, 525, 527, 572, 600–601, 1082, 1198, 1262
Holy Orthodox Church in Japan, 601
Holy Spirit Church of East Africa (HSCEA), 10, 976
Honduras, 601–605
Honduras Holiness Mission, 604
Hong, Paul K., 319
Hong Kong, 241–243
 Anglican Church of Hong Kong and Macao, 52–53
 Baptist Convention of, 121
 The Hong Kong Council of the Church of Christ in China, 605–606
Hongbao, Zhang, 1452
Hongzhi, Li, 1423
Honmichi, 606
Honter, Johann, 610
Hood Seminary, 20
Hoomi, Koot, 70
Hoover, James M., 858
Hoover, Willis C., 864
Hopkins, Emma Curtis, 314, 937, 1078, 1377
Hosier, Black Harry, 932
Hossōshū, 606–607
Household of God Fellowship, 955
Houteff, Victor, 160
Howard-Browne, Rodney, 1288
Howell, Vernon, 161
Htoon, U. Chan, 1427
Hubbard, L. Ron, 331–332
Hughes, Ray H., 1007
Huguenots, 455, 510, 929, 934
Hulme, David, 1352
Human-Etisk Forbund i Norge, 607–608, 1331
Humanism, 91, 511, 608, 1328
 Ananda Marga Yoga Society, 46
 International Humanist and Ethical Union, 658
 Norwegian Humanist Association, 607–608
Humanist Association of Canada, 608
Humanist Society of New Zealand, 608
Humanistic Buddhism, 507

- Humanistic Judaism, 657, 697
Humphreys, Christmas, 192, 202
Hungary, 609–612
 Baptist Union of, 125–126, 611
 Lutheran Church in, 461, 490, 611, 803, 1185, 1187, 1447
 Magyar pagan religion, 609
 Reformed Church of, 1067, 1069, 1072
Hurlburt, Charles E., 7
Hurliburt, Paul, 309
Hus, Jan, 289, 379, 462, 884, 885, 1067
Husan, al-, 1158
Husayn, al-, 1158
Husayn-'Ali, Mírzá, 102–104
Hussein, Saddam, 672
Hutchinson, John, 516
Hutter, Jacob, 612
Hutterites, 173, 612–613, 1004
Huxley, Thomas, 22–23, 1331
Hwa Dzan Dharma Giving Association, 1055
- I AM Religious Activity, 346–348, 614
I Ching, 254, 390
Ibadhi Islam, 35, 615, 973
Ibn 'Arabi, 133
Iceland, 615–618
Iceland, Evangelical Lutheran Church in, 473–474, 617
Icelandic Spiritualism, 617
Idahosa, Benson, 655
Iglesia Apostólica de la Fe en Cristo Jesús (Mexico), 65–67
Iglesia ni Cristo [Church of Christ] (Philippines), 618, 1018
Iglesias Natives Venezolanas de Apura, 1395
Ignasius Musa I Daud, 780
Ignatius IV, Patriarch, 562
Ignatius of Loyola, St., 723
Igreja Evangelica Fluinense, 1029
Igreja Maná, 1028
Igreja Universal do Reino de Deus, 1028, 1378
Ijo Orunmila, 951
Ikeda, Daisaku, 1190
Ile Afonxa Xango e Oxum Leusa, 74
Ilmu Sejati, 721
Imje, 1084
Independent Church of Australia, 618–619
Independent Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-Day Saints, 962
Independent Methodist Church, 1237
Independent Pentecostal Church Africa, 12
Independent Presbyterian Church, 165, 918
- India, 296, 627–634
 Buddhism in, 183–184, 627, 629–631
 Church of North, 119, 150, 296, 326–327, 343, 634, 830, 852
 Church of South, 48, 118, 296, 305, 326, 334–335, 634, 830, 852
- Council of Baptist Churches in North East, 370
Hinduism in, 619–627. See also Hinduism
Islam in, 631
Jewish community, 142, 734
Malankara Orthodox Syrian Church, 815–816
Methodist Church in, 851–852
Presbyterian Church of, 1037
United Evangelical Lutheran Church in, 633, 1355–1356
- Indian Christianity, 633–634
 Christian Service Society, 281
 Samavesam of Telegu Baptists Churches, 1125–1126
 Syrian Orthodox Church of Malabar, 1252–1253
 Syro-Malabar Catholic Church, 1253–1254
 Syro-Malankara Catholic Church, 1254–1255
- Indian Humanist Union, 608
Indian Muslim Association, 243
Indian Pentecostal Church of God, 319, 635, 1005
Indian Rationalist Association, 1330
Indian Sufism (Chistiniyya Sufi Order), 263–264
Indigenous Faith Association [Rodzima Wiara], 1086
- Indonesia, 635–638
 Buddhism in, 638–640
 Christian Churches in, 271–277, 279–280, 643, 1047
 Christian Evangelical Churches, 275–277
 Christian Protestant Church in, 279–280
 Confucianism in, 640–642
 Evangelical Christian Church in Irian Jaya (GKI), 454
 Evangelical Church in Kalimantan (GKE), 457
 Fellowship of Irian Jaya Baptist Churches, 499–500
 Hinduism in, 642–643
 indigenous Christian church (Toraja Church), 1287–1288
 Javanism, 721–722
 new religion (Sumarah), 1232–1233
 Pangetsu, 996–997
 Pasundan Christian Church, 1002–1003
 Protestant Churches in, 742–743, 1048–1050
- Indonesian Baptist Churches, Union of, 1340
Indonesian Bethel Church of God, 318
Indonesian Chinese Eternal Cultural Foundation, 641
- Indonesian Christian Church, 643
Indonesian Gospel Tabernacle Church, 644
Ingersoll, Robert Green, 518
Initiatives for Change, 644–645
Innocent, St., 977
Innocente, Geraldine, 346
Innocentian Church, 1323
Inquisition, 136, 1027, 1203, 1431
Insight Meditation Society, 645–646, 907
Institut Sépharade Européen, 1432
Institute for Research in Human Happiness, 752
Integral Yoga International, 400, 646–647, 1215
Intercontinental Church of God, 320
Interdenominational Evangelical Mission, 569
International Alliance of Messianic Jewish Congregations, 1341
International Anglican Fellowship, 1297
International Association for Human Values (IAHV), 82
International Association for Religious Freedom, 647, 654, 1343, 1424
International Association of Reformed and Presbyterian Churches, 647–648
International Baptist Lay Academy, 126
International Brotherhood League (IBL), 1272–1273
International Church of the Foursquare Gospel, 153, 166, 418, 569, 604, 648–649, 947, 955, 995, 1395
International Churches of Christ, 649–650, 1183, 1240
International Coalition for Religious Freedom, 650
International Communion of Charismatic Churches, 655
International Conference of Reformed Churches, 651
International Congregational Council, 1421
International Congregational Fellowship, 360, 651–652, 914
International Council of Christian Churches, 647, 652, 759, 985, 991, 1425, 1426
International Council of Christians and Jews, 652–653
International Council of Community Churches, 653–654
International Council of Religious Liberals, 647
International Council of Unitarians and Universalists, 654–655, 1343
International Evangelical Church, 655
International Evangelical Church, Soldiers of the Cross, 656, 995
International Evangelical Church and Missionary Association, 655

- International Federation of Free Evangelical Churches, 656, 872
- International Federation of Freethinkers, 1330
- International Federation of Secular Humanistic Jews, 657, 697, 1330
- International Fellowship for Impersonal Enlightenment, 657
- International Freethought Association of America, 39
- International Holiness Mission, 342
- International Holiness Union and Prayer League, 1410
- International Holy Spirit and United Indigenous Churches, 976
- International Humanist and Ethical Union, 92, 519, 608, 658, 1240, 1330
- International Lutheran Council, 658–659, 805
- International Meditation Centres, 659, 907
- International Missionary Movement, 1425
- International New Thought Alliance, 659–661, 1078
- International Old Catholic Bishops' Conference, 661, 971
- International Pentecostal Church of Christ, 661
- International Pentecostal Holiness Church, 662, 817
- International Reformed Fellowship, 1430
- International Society for Krishna Consciousness (Hare Krishnas), 74, 77, 168, 591, 592, 627, 662–663, 698, 1121, 1390, 1432–1433, 1447 *
Gaudiya Maths and, 531
VRINDA, 353, 1404
- International Yoga Fellowship Movement, 97, 400, 663–664, 1261
- International Zen Association, 74, 196, 511–512, 664–665
- Inter-Religious Council of Mexico, 869
- Inter-Religious Federation for World Peace, 665–666
- Introvigne, Massimo, 936
- Iran, 666–671
Islam in, 1159
origin of Bahá'í Faith, 102–104
- Iranian Jews, 668–670
- Iraq, 671–674
Mandeans, 827–828
- Iraqi Christianity, Chaldean Catholic Church, 229–230
- Ireland, 674–676
- Ireland, Assemblies of God in Great Britain and, 87
- Ireland, Church of, 321–322, 676, 802, 1297, 1357
- Ireland, Methodist Church in, 852–853
- Ireland, Moravian Church in Great Britain and, 886
- Irian Jaya, Evangelical Christian Church in (GKI), 454
- Irian Jaya Baptist Churches, Fellowship of, 499–500
- Irving, Edward, 223, 939
- Isis, Fellowship of, 500
- Islam, 677–691 branches of, 685–686
in Brunei, 174, 175–177
early interaction with Christianity, 286, 288–289
expansion, 686–691
Egyptian history, 421–423
Five Pillars of, 683–684
in Germany, 545–547
Hinduism and, 591
history, the Prophet Muhammad, 677–680 history, the Qur'an (Koran), 680–683
in India, 631
in Iran, 1159
in Israel, 698
Jihad, 684–685
Malikite school of, 825
in Romania, 1096, 1097
in Russia/former Soviet Union, 1105–1106
Saudi Arabian history, 1139–1140
Shafiite school of, 1155–1156
in South Africa, 1197
Spanish history, 1201–1202
in Sweden, 1240
in Syria, 1248, 1250
See also Ismaili Islam; Shi'a Islam; Sufism; Sunni Islam; Wahhabi Islam
- Islamic Action Front, 904
- Islamic Association, China, 248–249
- Islamic Community Milli Görös, 546
- Islamic fundamentalism. See Islamism
- Islamic groups:
Ahmadiyya Anjuman Ishaat Islam, Lahore, 24–26, 631, 991
Ahmadiyya Muslim Movement, 26
Alevism (Alevis, Alawis), 33–35, 132–133, 545, 695, 728, 778, 1248, 1250, 1306
Druze, 33, 96, 411–412, 574, 689, 698, 728, 777–778, 1248
Gypsies, 205
Hanafite school, 580–581
Hanbalite school, 581–582, 698, 1140, 1405
Ibadhi Islam, 615
Jadidism and Muridism, 1105
Kazakh folk Islam, 744–745
Kharijism, 1262, 1302
Sanussi, 790
Tanzanian diversity, 1262
Turkish features, 1306–1308
- Islamic Jihad, 903–904
- Islamic Nationalist Front, 693
- Islamic Republic of the Comoros, 353–354
- Islamic Salvation Front (FIS), 36
- Islamic Society of Mourids of Reunion, 900
- Islamic Supreme Council of America, 684
- Islamic Union of Hong Kong, 243
- Islamism (Islamic fundamentalism), 27, 631, 684, 692–694
Al Qaeda, 7, 27–28, 631, 684, 693, 713, 903–904, 1258
in areas of former Soviet Union, 1106–1107
Jamaat-e-Islam, 631, 685, 693, 712–713, 903, 1257
Muslim Brotherhood, 28, 423, 685, 690, 692, 902–904, 1250
Taliban, 5, 6, 28, 693, 713, 1257–1259
- Isle of Man, 694
- Isleifur, 473
- Ismaili Islam, 33, 598, 667, 685, 694–696, 747, 777, 1140, 1159, 1248, 1316, 1437, 1455
Bohras, 151, 215
Druze, 33, 96, 411–412, 574, 689, 698, 728, 777–778, 1248
Egyptian history, 420–423
Nizari Ismailis, 598, 667, 695–696
- Israel, 360, 696–699, 737
Episcopal Church, 433
Satmar Hassidism and, 1137–1138
- Israel Revelation Blessed Peace Church, 1212
- Israelite Church of God, 426
- Italian Assemblies of God, 699–700, 701
- Italian Buddhism Union, 702
- Italian Christian Assemblies, 73
- Italian Evangelical Baptist Assembly, 453
- Italian Hindu Union, 702
- Italian new religion, Universal Soul, 1381–1382
- Italo-Albanian Catholic Church, 700–701
- Italy, 700–703
Italy, Evangelical Baptist Union of, 453–454
Italy, Evangelical Methodist Church of, 485–486
- Ithna-Asharis, 747
- Ito, Shinjo, 1161
- Ito, Shinso, 1162
- Ivanov-Klyshnikov, Vasili V., 101
- Ivimey, Joseph, 124
- Ivory Coast (Côte d'Ivoire), 391, 582, 703–705
- Ivory Coast, Protestant Methodist Church in, 1051–1052
- Izala, 953
- Izo, Iburi, 1264
- Izumo Oyashirokyō, 705
- Jackson, Joseph H., 917, 1046
- Jackson, Natasha, 194

- Jackson, Thomas, 89
 Jacob, Cessi Koutouan, 582
 Jacobites, 673, 1248
 Jadidism, 1105
 Jaferis, 33
 Jaffray, Robert A., 644
 Jagat Singh, 1100
 Jainism, 589, 627–629, 706–711
 Digambara, 629, 709, 748, 1266
 Sthanakavasi Svetambara tradition, 710, 1221–1222
 Terapanth Svetambara tradition, 710, 748, 1221, 1266–1267
 Jamā'at al-fayda, 1280
 Jamaat-e-Islam, 631, 685, 693, 712–713, 903, 1257
 Jamaat e Islami Hind, 631
 Jama'at un-Nur, 546
 Jamaica, 713–715
 Jamaica, Moravian Church in, 886–887
 Jamaica, Rastafarianism. See Rastafarians
 Jamaica and the Cayman Islands, United Church in, 1345–1346
 Jamaica Baptist Union, 715–716, 1310
 Jamaican Baptist Missionary Society, 140, 367
 James, Fannie B., 400
 Jamiat-ul-Ulema-e-Pakistan, 631
 Jamieson, Penny, 49
 Jan Mayen Islands, 1234–1235
 Jansen, Cornelius, 970
 Jansenist movement (Jansenism), 137, 969
 Japan, 716–720
 Holy Catholic Church in, 600
 Holy Orthodox Church in, 601
 Korean Christian Church in, 760
 United Church of Christ in, 601, 760, 1349–1350
 Japan, Shinto in. See Shinto
 Japan Baptist Convention, 720
 Japan Baptist Union, 720, 1350
 Japan Buddhist Federation, 720–721, 726, 751, 1161
 Japan Holy Catholic Church, 603
 Japan Methodist Church, 1350
 Japanese Buddhism, 188–189, 717–719, 1163
 Hossōshū, 606–607
 Jōdo-Shū [Pure Land School], 189, 725–726
 Jōdo-Shinshū [True Pure Land School], 188, 195, 724–725, 1014
 Kiangani, Salomon Dialungana, 749
 Nichiren, 188, 189, 640, 717, 758, 948, 957, 1077, 1190
 Nipponzan Myōhoji, 957
 Reiyūkai, 189, 718, 751, 908, 1077, 1085
 Risshō Kōsei-Kai, 189, 718, 1077, 1084–1086
 Shingon, 532, 717, 1160–1161
 Shinnyoen, Garden of Absolute Reality, 1161–1162
 Shugendō, 1165, 1169–1170
 Tendai, 1277
 See also Japanese new religions; Zen Buddhism
 Japanese new religions, 718–720
 Agonshū, 23–24, 718
 Aum Shinrikyō, 92–93, 685, 719
 Brazilian, 167–168
 Byakkō Shinkō Kai, 210–211
 Ennōkyō, 430
 Gedatsu Kai, 532
 Honmichi, 606
 Izumo Ōyashirokyō, 705
 Kōfuko no Kagaku, 718, 752
 Kokuchū-Kai, 753
 Konkōkyō, 753–754, 974
 Kurozumikyō, 718, 763
 Myōchikai Kyōdan, 908
 Ōmoto, 718, 974–975, 1145, 1146
 Perfect Liberty Kyōdan, 167, 1012
 Reiha-no-Hikari, 1076–1077
 Seichō-no-Ie, 167–168, 210, 975, 1145–1146
 Shinnyoen, 189, 1161–1162
 Sūkyō Mahikari, 168, 1231–1232
 Tenrikyō, 168, 356, 606, 718, 719, 754, 1264–1265
 Tenshō Kōtai Jingūkyō, 1265–1266
 See also Japanese Buddhism
 Japanese Soto School, 74
 Java, Christian Churches of, 273–274
 Java, East Java Christian Church (GKJW), 414
 Javanism, 721–722
 Sumarah, 1232–1233
 Jayatilake, D. B., 1444
 Jeffereys, George, 428–429
 Jeffreys, Stephen, 87
 Jehovah's Witnesses, 4, 166, 722, 1358, 1372, 1449
 Jehu-Appiah, Jemisemiham, 902
 Jehu-Appiah, Matapoly Moses, 902
 Jemison, Theodore J., 917
 Jenkins, David, bishop of Durham, 1360
 Jesuit order, 72, 292, 723–724, 1384, 1394
 Jesus, 282–283
 Jesus Christ is Lord Church, 570
 Jesus People Movement, 495
 the Twelve Tribes, 1311–1313
 JeungSanDo, 724, 759
 Jewish Agency for Israel, 361
 Jewish community, in Ethiopia (Beta Israel), 147–148
 Jewish community, in India (Bene Israel), 142
 Jewish community, Sephardic, 984, 1201–1203, 1431–1432
 Jewish Reconstructionist Foundation, 1064
 Jewish Theological Seminary, 360
 Jews for Jesus, 1341
 Jeypore Evangelical Lutheran Church, 1355–1356
 Jäger, Willigis, 1128
 Jihad, 684–685
 Jilani, 'Abd al-Qadir al-, 1056
 Jinana yoga, 621
 Jinarakkhita, Ashin, 640
 Joda, Tunde, 955
 Jōdo-Shinshū, 188, 195, 724–725, 1014
 Jōdo-Shū, 189, 725–726
 John Frum, 1391
 Johnson, Albert, 225
 Johnson, Sherrod C., 340–341
 Johnston Island, 726
 Jones, Absolom, 19
 Jones, Charles Price, 318
 Jones, Franklin, 3
 Jones, "Jim" (James Warren, People's Temple), 1011
 Jones, Thomas W. S., 485
 Jones, William, 361
 Joo, Swami Lakshman, 743
 Jordan, 726–729
 Jordan, Orvis F., 653
 Jordanites, 577
 Jotabeche Pentecostal Evangelical Church, 864
 Jouret, Luc, 1191
 Judaism, 697, 730–738 *
 Abayudaya (Uganda), 1317
 Conservative, 360–361, 697, 736, 1444 history, ancient origins, 730–732 history, development of modern Jewish community, 735–736 history, diaspora, 734–735 history, Greek and Roman eras, 732–734 history, Zionism and state of Israel, 736–737
 Humanistic, 657, 697
 in India, 734
 Karaites, 698, 734, 741, 796, 1320
 Lemba tradition (Southern Africa), 783, 1455
 Marranos, 869
 Messianic, 698, 1340–1341
 Persian, 668–670
 polytheistic ethnoreligions vs., 450
 Reconstructionist, 697, 1064, 1444
 Reform, 360, 697, 736, 982, 1065–1067
 Secular Humanistic, 657, 697
 Sephardic community, 984, 1201–1203, 1431–1432
 Spanish history, 1201–1203
 Union of Messianic Congregations, 1340–1341
 in Yemen, 1437–1438
 Young Israel, 1444
 See also Hassidism; Orthodox Judaism
 Judge, William Q., 1272, 1361

- Judson, Adoniram, 42, 633, 907
 Junco, Isabel, 465, 487
- Kabatinan, 637
 Kabbalah, 203, 583, 735, 800
 Kabbalah, Research Centre of the, 697
 Kabbalah Learning Centre, 584, 739
 Kabir, 591, 632
 Kagyu Dak Shang Choling, 74
 Kagyupa Tibetan Buddhism, 190, 248, 739–740, 742
 Kahihia, Benjamin, 11
 Kahinga, Kayuwa Tshibumbu Wa, 310
 Kakungulu, Semei, 1317
 Kale Heywet, 444, 445, 1421
 Kali followers, 1156
 Kalimantan, Evangelical Church in, 457
 Kalweit, Martin, 538
 Kam, Joseph, 276
 Kamm, William, 832, 1144
 Kampuchea. See Cambodia
 Kanaky, 740–741
 Kanetomo, Yoshida, 1165
 Kannon Jikeikai, 23
 Kanyiles, Daniel, 22
 Kaplan, Mordacai M., 1064, 1444
 Karaites, 698, 734, 741, 796, 1320
 Kardec, Allan, 1, 437, 1207–1208, 1214
 Karekin II, 77
 Karma yoga, 621
 Karma-Kagyupa Tibetan Buddhism, 248, 398, 739, 742, 748, 1447
 Karo Batak Protestant Church (GBKP), 742–743
 Kashmir Saivism, 743–744, 1121, 1170
 Kassathin, Nikolai, 601
 Kazakhstan, 744–745
 Kebatinan, 721
 Keech, William, 120
 Keepers of the Flame, 347
 Kefa Ayub Mavuru, 10
 Keiju, Okada, 1231
 Keith-Falconer, Ion, 1438
 Kejaen, 637
 Kelly, Edward, 122
 Kelly, Robert Reid, 488, 1029
 Kelly, William, 1019
 Kelsang, Geshe, 508
 Kennedy, Bruwell, 974
 Kent, Thomas, 1226
 Kenya, 7, 8, 10, 745–749
 Baptist Convention of, 121–122
 Church in the Province of, 300
 East Africa Yearly Meeting of Friends, 414, 523
 Methodist Church of, 857
 Nomiya Luo Church, 958–959
 Spiritual Churches, 1210–1211
 Kenya African United Churches, 976
 Kenya Foundation of the Prophets Church, 748
- Kenyan Friends, 414
 Keyser, Christian, 481
 Khameni, Ali, 1159
 Khan, Fazal Inayat, 1227
 Khan, Hazrat Inayat, 842, 1227, 1228, 1230
 Khan, Hidayat Nayat, 1227
 Khan, Inamullah, 1430
 Khan, Maheboob, 1227
 Khan, Pir Vilayat, 1228
 Khan, Pir Zia Inayat, 1228–1229
 Khapa, Tsong, 508
 Kharijism, 1262, 1302
 Kheiralla, Ibrahim George, 112
 Khin, U Ba, 659, 907, 1398
 Khoi religion, 1196
 Khomeini, Ayatolla, 668, 685, 693, 1159
 Khyenpa, Düsüm, 742
 Ki Dok Kyo Kyo Do Yen Mange, 755
 Kiangani, Salomon Dialungana, 749
 Kibira, Josiah M., 477
 Kibwetere, Joseph, 894
 Kidder, Daniel P., 849
 Kigen, Dogen, 1194
 Kikyu, Tanaka, 753
 Kim Jae-Joon, 1032
 Kimbangu, Simon, 12, 358, 749, 944
 Kimbanguist Church, 12, 15, 56, 210, 228, 355, 358, 526, 749–750, 944, 976
 Kimpa Vita (Dona Beatrice), 12
 King, George, 1314
 King, J. H., 662
 King, Jonas, 560
 King, Martin Luther, Jr., 302, 626, 917, 1046, 1336
 Kinsolving, Lucien, 430
 Kiranga religion, 209
 Kiribati, 750–751
 Kiribati Protestant Church, 750, 751
 Kiriyaama Seiyu, 23
 Kirpal Light Satsang, 1101
 Kirpal Ruhani Mission, 996
 Kirpal Singh, 1100–1101, 1180
 Kirpalani, Lekhraj Khubchand, 159
 Kitamura, Sayo, 1265
 Kivebulaya, Apolo, 313
 Kivuli, Daudi Zakayo, 18, 976
 Kivuli II, John Mweresa, 18
 Kiyoka, 356
 Kleine Gemeinde, 482–483
 Knapp, Christopher, 603
 Knapp, Martin Wells, 1410
 Kneeland, Abner, 518
 Knight, Charles F., 194
 Knight, Gareth, 1416
 Knight, JZ, 1062
 Knight-Bruce, George W. H., 343
 Knoche, Grace F., 1273
 Knöpken, Andreas, 776
 Knorr, Nathan, 722
 Knox, John, 333, 1357
 Köbner, Julius, 123
- Kobo, Daishi, 1161
 Kodo, Sawaki, 664
 Kōdō Kyōdan, 751
 Kōfuko no Kagaku, 718, 752
 Kokuchū-Kai, 753
 Komensky, Jan Amos, 379
 Komuhangi, Ursula, 894
 Kongo religion (Palo Mayombe), 993
 Konkōkyō, 753–754, 974
 Kony, Joseph, 1316
 Kook, Abraham Isaac, 576
 Kook, Tzi Yehuda, 576
 Korea, Anglican Church of, 53
 Korea, Democratic People's Republic of (North Korea), 754–756
 Korea, Presbyterian Church in the Republic of, 1031–1032
 Korea, Presbyterian churches of, 758, 760, 1031–1032, 1037–1039, 1349
 Dae Shin, 1037
 HapDong, 758, 760, 1032, 1037–1038
 TongHap, 758, 760, 1032, 1038–1039
 Korea, Republic of (South Korea), 756–760
 Korean American Presbyterian Church, 760
 Korean Buddhism, 188
 Chogye Order, 264–265
 Pomun Order, 1025
 Won, 188, 757, 1412–1413
 Korean Christian Church in Japan, 760
 Korean Christian Federation, 755
 Korean Confucianism, 757–758
 Korean Methodist Church, 758, 760–761
 Korean Pentecostalism, Yoido Full Gospel Church, 1441
 Korean Presbyterian Church (HoHun), 759
 Korean religion:
 Chondogyo, 265–266
 DahnHak, 382
 JeungSanDo, 724
 Koresh, David, 161
 Kornfield, Jack, 645
 Kosovo, 1446, 1447
 Kotani, Kimi, 1077
 Kowalski, Johann, 967–968
 Koyasan Shingonshu, 1161
 Kozel, Karl, 1152
 Kozłowska, Felicja, 967–968
 Krapf, Johann Ludwig, 747
 Krebs, Fritz, 939
 Kremmerz, Giuliano, 836
 Kreuzeder, Elfriede, 967
 Krishna Consciousness. See International Society for Krishna Consciousness
 Krishnamurti, Jiddu, 59, 761–762, 937
 Krishnamurti Foundations, 74, 761–762
 Krivogonov, Yuri, 556–557
 Krumm-Heller, Arnoldo, 553, 1220
 Kruyt, Albertus C., 271
 Kuala Lumpur. See Malaysia

- Kublai Khan, 250
 Kubo, Kakutaro, 1077
 Kubota Akira Ji'un-ken Roshi, 1128
 Kudriakov, Mephodij, 1323
 Kugler, Anna S., 48
 Kukai, 1160
 Kulvetis, Abraomas, 480
 Kumuyi, William, 16, 391, 955
 Kundalini yoga, 622
 Kung, Chin, 1055
 Küng, Hans, 679–680
 Kurozumikyō, 718, 763
 Kurtz, Paul, 369, 608, 1331
 Kusaie, 870
 Kuwait, 672, 763–765
 Kuyper, Abraham, 1072, 1073
 The Kwan Um School of Zen, 188, 373, 765–766, 1447
 Kyodan, 1349, 1350
 Kyrgyzstan, 766–767
 Kyu, Song, 1420
- Laestadian movement, 479
 Lake, John G., 68
 Lakota, 768–769
 Lakwena, Alice, 1316
 Lalou, Marie, 391
 Lambeth Conferences, 54
 Lambeth Quadrilateral, 316, 335
 Lambie, Thomas A., 443–444, 445, 1421
 Lammers, G. A., 962
 Lamsa, George M., 1409
 Lam-Te, 1084
 Lang, John Dunsmore, 1375
 Lao Buddhist Sangha, 769–770
 Lao traditional religion, 770–771
 Lao Tzu (Laozi), 237, 246, 384, 385, 386
 Laos, 186, 770–772
 Laos Evangelical Church, 772–773
 Last Church of God and His Christ, 817
 Latin America Mission, 367
 Latin American Evangelization Crusade, 367
 Latin American Lutheran Church, 154
 Latter Rain Church, 68
 Latvia, 773–775
 paganism in, 775–776
 Latvian Conference of Seventh-Day Adventists, 773, 775
 Latvian Evangelical Lutheran Church, 773, 774, 776
 Latvian Orthodox Church, 1108
 Lausanne Movement, 124
 Lavastida, Bartholomew, 465, 487
 LaVey, Anton Szandor, 330, 1135, 1152
 Lavigerie, Charles M., 1417
 Lawes, Frank E., 424
 Lawes, W. G., 998
 Lawry, Walter, 516
 Laymans Holiness Association, 342
 Laythi, Yahda al, 825
- Le Loup, Yvon, 552
 Le Roux, P. L., 68, 1457
 Le Roy, Alexandre, 601
 Leadbeater, Charles Webster, 786–787, 937
 Lebanon, 776–781
 Lebanon, Maronite Church in. See Maronite Catholic Church
 LeBaron, Aaron, 340
 LeBaron, Ervil, 339–340
 Lectorium Rosicrucianum, 781–782
 Lee, Seung-Han, 382
 Lee, Witness, 798
 Leene, Jan, 781
 Leene, Zwierv Wilhelm, 781
 Leeser, Isaac, 983
 Lefebvre, Marcel, 514, 1142–1143, 1246
 Legion of Mary, 358, 748, 782
 Leigh, Samuel, 859, 1375
 Leighton, Samuel, 941
 Leiter, Karin, 967
 Lekganyane, Engenas (Ignatius), 1456, 1457–1458
 Lemba, 783, 1455
 Lenshina, Alice, 12, 1449
 Lesotho, 783–785
 Lesotho, Church of Moshoeshoe, 325–326
 Lesotho Episcopal Conference, 784
 Lesotho Evangelical Church, 785
 Leuenberg Church Fellowship, 785–786
 Levi, Eliphaz, 937
 Lewis, Harvey Spencer, 47, 835
 Lewis, Joseph, 91
 Lewis, Murshid Samuel, 1228
 Lewis, Ralph, 47
 Lewis, Theodore, 313
 Li Hongzhi, 493
 Liberal Catholic Church, 97, 786–787, 1240
 Liberation theology, 164, 352
 Liberia, 787–789
 Lutheran Church in, 788, 804
 Presbytery of, 1044
 Liberia Baptist Missionary and Educational Convention, 789–790
 Libermann, Francis, 600
 Libre Pensée, 519
 Libya, 790–791
 Sanusiyya Sufism and, 1230
 Licht im Osten, 767
 Liechtenstein, 792
 Life and Family Apostles, 1021
 Liggins, John, 603, 1349
 Light of the Truth Universal Shrine (LOTUS), 647
 Light of the World Church, 73, 368, 427, 571, 605, 792–794, 869
 Light-Life, 1021
 Lighthouse of Freedom, 347
 Lin-Chi, 1084
 Lindsey, Gordon, 162
 Lingayatism, 1399
- Lingayats, 1121
 Lingbao, 387
 Lingpa, Jigme, 963
 Lingwood, Dennis, 1412
 Linobambakoi, 378
 Lin-Shin, Moy, 1263
 Lionza, Maria, 1
 Lipa, Mark I, 33
 Lisle, George, 714, 715
 Lithuania, 134, 794–797
 Lithuania, Evangelical Lutheran Church of, 480–481
 Lithuanian Evangelical Lutheran Church in Diaspora, 480–481
 Lithuanian pagan religion, 794–795, 1099–2000
 Little Flock, 239, 240, 242, 797
 Little Pebble, 1144
 Litton, Fred, 604
 Litton, Lucille, 604
 Living Church, 71
 Living Church of God, 797
 Living Love Church, 604
 Living Rosary movement, 520
 Living Stream Ministry, 798–799
 Livingstone, David, 343, 356, 799–800, 816–817, 1068, 1262, 1315, 1354, 1367
 Livingstone College, 20
 Livingstone Inland Mission, 307, 311
 Lizzi, Jorge Angel Livraga, 935
 Llorente, Francisco F., 62
 The Local Church, 239, 240, 242, 246, 797–798, 821
 Lokayana Buddhism, 182
 Lomax, Thomas H., 21
 London Missionary Society, 799–800 *
 Long, James, 1273
 López, Luis, 62
 Lopez-Lozano, Carlos, 1207
 Lord, John Wesley, 1423
 Lord's Pentecostal Church, 487
 Lord's Resistance Army, 1316
 Lotin Samé, Adolph, 921
 Louw, Andrew A., 1070
 Lowery, Walter, 1287
 Lowrie, John C., 328, 991, 1039
 Loyola, Ignatius, 292
 Lu, Sheng-Yen, 1300
 Luang Phoh Sod, 395
 Lubachivsky, Myroslav, 1324
 Lubavitch Hassidism, 584, 697, 800–801
 Luigia Paparelli Mission, 703, 872–876
 Lukoya, Severino, 1316
 Lumpa, 1449
 Lumpaka, 710
 L'Union d'Églises Baptistes Françaises au Canada, 218
 Luria, Isaac ben Solomon, 735, 739, 800
 Lusitanian Catholic Apostolic Evangelical Church, 432, 801–802

- Lusitanian Church, 801–802, 1028
 Lutango, Luzaissio Antonio, 1283
 Luther, Martin, 291, 455, 471, 514, 541, 680, 802, 803, 806–807, 1076, 1326
 Lutheran Christian Service (LCS), 477
 Lutheran Church, Andhra Evangelical, 48
 Lutheran Church, Estonian Evangelical, 438, 439, 440, 441, 124
 Lutheran Church, Malagasy, 814–815
 Lutheran Church, Missouri Synod, 375, 427, 569, 604, 802, 804–805, 1123, 1420
 Lutheran Church in Canada, 471, 802–803
 Lutheran Church in Hungary, 461, 490, 611, 803, 1185, 1187, 1447
 Lutheran Church in Liberia, 788, 804
 Lutheran Church in Tanzania, 472
 Lutheran Church of Australia, 132
 Lutheran Church of Central Africa, 817
 Lutheran Church of Denmark, 1400
 Lutheran Church of Sweden, 336
 Lutheran churches, evangelical. See specific Evangelical Lutheran churches
 Lutheran Mission Cooperation (LMC), 477
 Lutheran World Federation, 154, 298, 445, 455, 456, 477, 805–806, 1123, 1188, 1355
 Lutheranism, 291–292, 455, 806–807
 Luwum, Janani, 345
 La Luz del Mundo, 792–794
 Luxembourg, 807–808
 Lyahuka Church of East Africa, 10
 Lynch, James, 334, 851–852
 Lynn, James J., 1147
 Lyons, Henry, 917
- Ma Amritanandamayi, 627, 837
 Ma Yoga Shakti International Missions, 627
 Ma Yoga Shakti Saraswati, 627
 Macao, 243–244
 Macao, Anglican Church of Hong Kong and, 52–53
 Macedo, Edir, 1378
 Macedonia, 809–810
 Macedonia Cooperative Community, 173
 Macedonian Orthodox Church, 373, 810, 1446
 Machen, J. Gresham, 985
 MacIntyre, Alasdair, 997
 Mack, Alexander, 169
 MacKenzie, Charles, 343
 MacKenzie, John, 799–800
 MacLaine, Shirley, 938–939
 Maclaren, Albert, 998
 Maclay, Robert F., 760–761
 Macumba, 220, 1443
 Madagascar, 345, 810–812
 Madagascar, Church of Jesus Christ in, 322–323
- Madani, Hazrat Abu Hashim, 1228
 MADECH, 1061
 Madhavdas, 1441
 Magic, in ethno-religions, 449–450
 Magnes, Rabbi Judah, 1444
 Maguire, Frank, 231
 Magyar Evangeliumi Aliansz, 611
 Magyar pagan religion, 609
 Maha Bodhi Society, 184, 192, 193, 630, 812–813, 863
 Mahamba movement, 1448
 Mahaprabhu, Chaitanya, 530, 1432
 Maharaj Ji, 812, 1180
 Maharishi Mahesh Yogi, 592, 627, 899, 1429
 Mahasraman, Yuvacarya, 1267
 Mahaswamiji, Shri Siddharama, 1400
 Mahathera, Narada, 640
 Mahavira, 706
 Mahayana Buddhism, 181–182, 258, 813–814, 820, 1184
 Daoism and, 387
 Korean Buddhism, Chogyo Order, 264–265
 Newar Buddhism, 926
 Shugendō and, 1169
 Vietnamese, 1396–1397
 See also Zen Buddhism
 Mahayana Tradition, Foundation for the Preservation of the, 508
 Mahdi, al-, 668
 Mahikari, 719
 Mahikari, Sūkyō, 1231
 Mahlangu, Elias, 1456, 1457
 Mai Chaza Church, 814, 1455
 Maimonides, Moses, 734–735, 1431
 Maitatsine, Mohammed Marwa, 953
 Maitri, 1021
 Makarios III, 980
 Makhulu, Walter P. K., 343
 Makiguchi, Tsunesaburo, 1189–1190
 Makisua Church, 1127
 Malagasy traditional religion, 811
 Malagasy. See Madagascar
 Malagasy Lutheran Church, 811, 814–815
 Malalasekera, G. P., 1427
 Malankara Orthodox Syrian Church, 633, 815–816, 830, 1254
 Malankara Pentecostal Church, 635
 Malawi, 816–818
 Malay Muslim Monarchy (MIB), 175
 Malaysia (Kuala Lumpur), 818–821
 Buddhist Missionary Society, 202
 Islam in, 821–822
 Methodist Church in, 821, 858
 Protestant Church in Sabah, 1049
 Young Buddhist Association of, 1443
 Malaysian Buddhism Association (Mahayana), 820
 Malcolm X, 1408
 Maldives, 822–823
- Maledivian religion, 835
 Mali, 823–825
 Malikite School of Islam, 825 *
 Malpan, Abraham, 830
 Malta, 825–827
 Malvinas, 491–492
 Mamaia, 521
 Man Phuurithatto, Phra Ajaan, 1268
 Manalists, 618
 Manalo, Felix, 1018
 Manarah, Lord Hamsah, 93–94
 Manavta Mandir, 827
 Mandeans, 554, 673, 827–828
 Manganhela, Zedekias, 1039
 Mangena Maaake Mokone, 19
 Mango, Alfayo Odongo, 1210–1211
 Manicheanism, 204, 238
 Mankind Enlightenment Love, 1213
 Manoá, Samuela, 1127
 Maoism, 261
 Maori religion, 828–830, 941, 942–943
 Maowe, Johane, 69
 Mapuche religion, 234–235
 Mar Thoma Syrian Church, 118, 327, 633, 765, 816, 821, 830, 974, 1254
 Marange, Johane, 8, 69
 Marantha Church of God, 427
 Marburger Mission, 307
 Maria Devi Christos, 556–557
 Maria Legio, 782
 Marian tradition, 298, 1092
 Fatima (Portugal), 497–498, 988, 1028
 Mother of God Centre, 893–894
 Our Lady of All Nations, 987–988
 World Network of Marian Devotion, 831–832
 Marian Trinitarian spiritualist Church, 869
 Mariavites, Old Catholic Church of, 967–968
 Marijuana use, 446–447
 Markos, Antonious, 976
 Markow, Mischa, 1188
 Marona, Joseph, 303
 Maronite Catholic Church, 423, 779–780, 832–833, 1248
 Maronite Christians, 138, 377
 Marpa, 739
 Marranos, 378, 869, 1431
 Marsden, Samuel, 95, 942
 Marshall Islands, 833–834, 869, 1349
 Martin, Rabai, 842
 Martindale, L. Craig, 1409
 Martinez, José L., 63
 Martinez de Pasqually, Jacques, 835
 Martinique, 834–835
 Martinism, 835–836
 Martyn, Henry, 433
 Marwat, Mir Nawaz Khan, 1430
 Marx, Karl, 1329
 Marxism, 91, 239–240, 247, 374, 1104, 1329–1330

- Mary Queen of Scots, 333
 Masaih, Abdul, 816
 Mason, Charles Harrison, 318
 Masonic tradition. See Freemasonry
 Masorti Olami, 360
 Master Ching Hai Meditation Association, 74, 427, 836–837, 996, 1060
 Masuka, David, 1458
 Mata, Sri Daya, 1147
 Mata Amritanandamayi Math, 627, 837
 Matakini, 641
 Mather, Cotton, 371
 Mathew, Arnold Harris, 786, 971
 Matitta, Walter, 325, 1211
 Matthews, Victoria, 52
 Matthys, Jan, 90, 845
 Maubant, Pierre, 758
 Mauritania, 837–838
 Mauritius, 171, 838–840
 Mawdudi, Sayyid Abul A'la, 712, 903, 1257
 May, J. W., 1005
 Mayan religion, 138, 141
 Mayotte, 840
 Mays, Blaine C., 660
 Mazaev, Gavriel I., 745
 Mazdaznan, 840
 Mazu Tianfei, 245
 Mazzarello, Maria Domenica, 1122
 Mbang, Sunday, 1429
 Mbina, Wafter, 22
 Mbiru, 210
 Mbona-Kolini, Emmanuel, 302
 Mbutia, Elijah, 10
 McAleister, Robert, 655
 McAlister, R. E., 1004
 McAllister, Jill, 654
 McCall, Nathaniel, 123
 McCauley, Mattie, 319
 McElheran, Evelyn, 487
 McFarlane, Samuel, 998
 McGilvary, Daniel, 307, 772
 McGuire, George Alexander, 21
 Mchape movement, 451, 1449
 McIntire, Carl, 648, 652, 918, 985, 1425
 McKay, Alexander, 1316
 McKean, Kip, 649
 McMurry, Grady, 551, 986
 McPherson, Aimee Semple, 648
 McPherson, Harold S., 648
 McPherson, Rolf, 649
 McTernan, John, 655
 Means, Russell, 769
 Meares, John Levin, 655
 Mebius, Frederick, 604
 Meditation Groups, Inc., 71
 Mediumistic religions. See Spiritism and mediumistic religions
 Medjugorje, 841, 988
 Meeker, Lloyd Arthur, 429
 Meera, Mother, 627
 Meher Baba, 627, 634, 841–842
 Meher Baba, Friends of, 841–842
 Mekane Jesus Church, 443, 444–445
 Melanesia, Church in the Province of, 300–301
 Melanesian religion, 501
 Melani, Sergio, 1144
 Meletios II, Patriarch, 561
 Melkite Catholic Church, 423, 728, 780, 842–843, 1248, 1249, 1417
 Melkite Greek Catholic Church, 562
 Melville, Andrew, 333
 Memmi, Albert, 657
 Mencius, 256
 Mendelssohn, Moses, 1065
 Mendiondo, Samuel, 656
 Mennonite Brethren, 846
 Mennonite Church, 337, 843, 929. See also Church of the Brethren; Mennonites
 Mennonite Church, Defenseless, 312
 Mennonite Church, Evangelical, 209, 569, 604, 1001
 Mennonite Church, Old Order, 45
 Mennonite Church in the Netherlands, 843–844
 Mennonite Community (Church of Christ in the Congo), 312
 Mennonite Conference, Evangelical, 312, 482–483
 Mennonite World Conference, 844
 Mennonites, 141, 169, 292, 845–846
 Association of German Mennonite Congregations, 90–91
 Brethren, 168–169
 in Paraguay, 846
See also Amish; Brethren in Christ; Church of the Brethren; Mennonite Church
 Mensah, Africanus, 1243
 Mercar USA, 360
 Meredith, Roderick C., 797, 1434
 Merici, Angela, 1383
 Merrick, Joseph, 458
 Mersdorf, Alexander, 465
 Mertowardojo, Raden Soenarto, 996
 Merzel, Dennis Genpo, 1418
 Mesmer, Franz Anton, 937, 1213, 1214, 1415
 Messiah Club, 501
 Messianic Community, 1312
 Messianic Jewish Alliance of America, 1341
 Messianic Judaism, 698, 1340–1341
 Messianity, 1146
 Methodist, 294, 846–847, 1008
 Methodist Church, 43, 847–849, 1362, 1428
 Methodist Church, Ghana, 548, 849, 902
 Methodist Church, Lower Myanmar, 863
 Methodist Church, Nigeria, 856
 Methodist Church, Upper Myanmar, 863
 Methodist Church (Canada, Newfoundland, and Bermuda), 1346
 Methodist Church in Brazil, 165, 849–850
 Methodist Church in Chile, 850, 864
 Methodist Church in Fiji and Rotuma, 501, 851
 Methodist Church in India, 851–852
 Methodist Church in Ireland, 852–853
 Methodist Church in Malaysia, 821, 858
 Methodist Church in Samoa, 43, 853, 1126
 Methodist Church in Singapore, 854
 Methodist Church in Sri Lanka, 336, 862–863, 1218
 Methodist Church in the Caribbean and the Americas, 57, 60, 115, 130, 140, 172, 404, 603, 714, 854–855, 932, 1118, 1119, 1120, 1310, 1400
 Methodist Church in the Union of Myanmar, 855, 863
 Methodist Church in Zimbabwe, 855–856, 1455
 Methodist Church of Australasia, 851, 1375
 Methodist Church of Baleares, 1206
 Methodist Church of Cuba, 375, 857
 Methodist Church of Great Britain, 859, 861
 Methodist Church of Kenya, 857
 Methodist Church of Mexico, 858–859, 867
 Methodist Church of New Zealand, 859–860
 Methodist Church of Peru, 860
 Methodist Church of Sierra Leone, 860–861, 1198
 Methodist Church of South Africa, 158, 861–862, 910, 1237
 Methodist Church of Togo, 862
 Methodist Churches, Evangelical, 483–486
 Methodist Conference, 859
 Methodist Conference Zion Church, 20
 Methodist Episcopal Church, 56, 277, 278, 328, 341, 357, 483, 515, 847, 1183, 1348, 1362, 1371–1372, 1410, 1447. See also African Methodist Episcopal (AME) Church; United Methodist Church *
 Methodist Episcopal Church, Christian, 278–279
 Methodist Episcopal Church, South, 277, 278, 761, 1362, 1365
 Methodist New Connexion, 1123
 Methodist Pentecostal Church of Chile, 235, 850, 864, 1004, 1008
 Methodist Protestant Church, 1362
 Methodist Wesleyan Mission, 580
 Metropolitan Community Church, 1379–1380
 Metzger, Hermann Joseph, 551

- Mevlevi Sufi Order, 378, 397, 864–865, 1230, 1305
- Mexican Church of Jesus, 867
- Mexico, 865–869
 Methodist Church of, 858–859
 National Baptist Convention of, 916
 National Presbyterian Church in, 918
- Meyer, Heinrich, 1447
- Meyer, Jacob O., 88
- Mhalamkala, Josefa, 1039
- Michaelius, Jonas, 1068
- Michelet, Victor-Émile, 835
- Micronesia, 833, 869–871, 959–960
- Micronesia Guam Mission, 566
- Middle East Council of Churches, 699
- Middlemiss, George, 861
- Midway, 871
- Mien religion, 771
- Migisha, Angelina, 894
- Mikhail, M. S., 976
- Miki, Nakayama, 606, 718, 1264
- Miller, George A., 485
- Miller, Nicolee Jikyo, 1418
- Miller, William, 4, 88, 171, 1153, 1372
- Minahasa, 276
- Ming, Liu, 1452
- Ministerium of Pennsylvania, 48
- Minkio, Martin Bambba, 22
- Minling Trichen Rinpoche, 963
- Mission Covenant Church, 656, 961
- Mission Covenant Church of Sweden, 311, 463, 468, 469, 515, 871–872, 1239
- Mission Covenant Youth, 872
- Missionaries of Charity, 872, 1438
- Missionary Advance, 995
- Missionary Church of Christ, 1054
- Missionary Church of God, 569
- La Missione-Luigia Paparelli, 872–876
- Mita Congregation, 368, 427, 869, 874–875, 1054
- Mitchell, Hulon, Jr., 913
- Mitsu, Miyamoto, 908
- Mitsuhiro, Fukata, 430
- Mizrachi, 576
- Mobutu Sese Seko, 308, 309, 310–311, 313, 356
- Modekne, 871
- Modipane, David, 476
- Moffat, Robert, 1354
- Mohammadiyah, 721
- Mokichi Okada Foundation, 1146
- Moksha foundation, 657
- Moldavian Orthodox Church, 1108
- Moldova (Moldava), 875–878
- Moller, Robert, 810
- Molokans, 101, 538, 878–879, 1103, 1338
- Monaco, 879
- Monastic Republic of Mount Athos, 558, 1149
- Mondlane, Eduardo, 1039
- Mongiardino, Jose, 484
- Mongolia, 879–882
- Mongolian Partnership, 882
- Monod, Guillaume, 551
- Monodism, 551
- Monroe, William C., 361
- Monster, Peder C., 123
- Montfort, St. Louis-Marie Grignon de, 408
- Montserrat, 882–883
- Montt, Ríos, 571
- Moody, Dwight L., 1019
- Mooki, David W., 1243
- Moon, Sun Myung, 650, 665, 1333
- Moore, John J., 21
- Moral Re-Armament, 644–645
- Moravian Brethren, 379, 462, 577
- Moravian Church, 604
 in America, 885
 Eastern West Indies Province, 130, 883, 1400
 European Continental Province of the, 883–885 in Great Britain and Ireland, 886 in Jamaica, 886–887, 1118 in Nicaragua, 887, 947
 in Southern Africa, 887–888, 1198
 in Suriname, 888–889, 1234
 in Tanzania, 889–890
- Moravians, 60, 122, 130, 293, 548
- Morgan, Arthur T., 1364
- Mormonism. See Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints
- Morocco, 890–892
- Morolong, Harry, 1211
- Morris, Elias Camp, 917
- Morris, James W., 430
- Morrison, Robert, 239, 243
- Morton, C. L., 319
- Morton, John, 1033
- Morton, Sarah, 1033
- Mosa Sono, 16
- Moshi, Stefano, 477
- Moshoeshoe Berean Bible Readers' Church, 325
- Moshoeshoe I, 783–784, 785
- Mosley, Glenn, 1377
- Motaung, Edward, 1456, 1457
- Mother Earth People, 438, 440
- Mother Meera, Disciples of, 892–893
- Mother Meera Society, 627
- Mother of God Centre, 893–894, 1104
- Mother Teresa, 872
- Motswasele, Jacob Mokgwetsi, 1211–1212
- Motswasele, Mokalleng, 1212
- Mott, John R., 1350
- Mount Bashan Evangelical Churches, 569
- Mountain of Fire and Miracles Church, 955
- Mouridisme, 900
- Movement Crois-Koma, 355
- The Movement for the Restoration of the Ten Commandments, 832, 894–895, 1316
- Movement of Independent Pentecostal Churches, 867
- Movement of Spiritual Inner Awareness, 895–896, 1060. See also Elan Vital
- Mozambique, 896–899
 Presbyterian Church of, 1039
 United Baptist Church, 1345
- Mozoomdar, Protap Chundar, 647
- Mpadi, Simon-Pierre, 944–945
- Mpalanyi-Nkoyoyo, Livingstone, 345
- Msuku, Gilbert, 817
- Muelhaeser, John, 1420
- Mueller, Edward H., 1354
- Mueller, George, 269
- Muhammad, Elijah, 548, 912, 1407–1408
- Muhammad (The Prophet of Islam), 677–680, 1139
- Muhammad, Wallace, 913
- Mukpol, Osel Rangdrol, 1157
- Muktananda, Swami, 743, 1170–1171
- Mulandi, Simeon, 8
- Mülheim Association of Christian Fellowships, 899–900, 1009
- Mumford, John, 97, 664
- Mumford, Stephen, 1152
- Munetada, Kurozumi, 718, 763
- Muñoz, Antonio, 66
- Muñoz, José María, 569, 604
- Müntzer, Thomas, 90
- Muridiyya, 527, 900–901, 1148
- Muresan, Lucian, 1098
- Muridism, 1105
- Murphy, Charles H., III, 344
- Murray, Billy D., 321
- Murray, John, 1342–1343
- Musama Disco Christo Church, 548, 902, 1210
- Muslim Brotherhood, 28, 423, 685, 690, 692, 902–904, 1250
- Muslim Committee of the Congo, 356
- Muslim Spiritual Board of Central Asia, 745
- Muslim World League, 904, 1140–1141, 1405
- Mussolini, Benito, 701
- Mutima Walowa Wa Makumbi, 905, 1449
- Muzorewa, Abel, 1453
- Mwale, Justo, 1070
- Mwerinde, Credonia, 894
- Myalism, 367, 368, 995
- Myanmar (Burma), 905–907
 Buddhism in, 184–185, 906–907
 Church of the Province of, 327, 343, 907
 International Meditation Centres, 659
 Methodist Churches, 855, 863
- Myanmar, Methodist Church in the Union of, 855

- Myanmar Baptist Convention, 907
Myōchikai Kyōdan, 908
Myint, Maung Soe, 748
- Nackabah, Kwesi John, 1210
Nackabah People, 1210
Naganuma, Myoko, 1085
Nahaprajna, Acarya, 1267
Nahi, Ble, 391
Namibia, 909–910
Namibia, Evangelical Lutheran Church in, 475
Namibian traditional religions, 90
Nanak, 591, 632, 989, 1175
Nanalola, Ayo, 266
Nanguisimo, 376
Nao, Deguchi, 974, 718, 606
Naqshbandiyya Sufi Order, 96, 101, 177, 910–911
Narada, Dasira, 1213
Narayan, Bhaktivedanta, 531
Naseef, Abdullah Bin Omar, 1430
Nasir, Kundan Lall, 991
Nation of Islam, 548, 689, 911–913, 1407–1408
Nation of Yahweh, 913–914
National Association of Congregational Christian Churches, 914
National Association of Evangelicals, 86, 225, 1373
National Association of Evangelicals of Ghana, 549
National Association of Free Will Baptists, 41, 914–915
National Baptist Convention, 867, 915, 1373
National Baptist Convention, U.S.A., 116, 916–917, 1046
National Baptist Convention of America, 915, 917, 1373
National Baptist Convention of Mexico, 916
National Black American Baptists, 127
National Christian Church of the Assemblies of God, 867
National Christian Council of Kenya, 10
National Church of Nigeria, 951
National Council of Churches of Christ in the U.S.A., 1373
National Council of Churches of Kenya, 18
National Council of Congregational Churches, 43
National Council of Evangelical Free Churches, 847
National Council of the People's Church of Christ and Community Centers of the United States and Elsewhere, 653
National Evangelical Church of Kuwait, 765
National Evangelical Synod of Syria, 917–918
National Evangelical Synod of Syria and Lebanon, 780, 1250
National Evangelical Union of Lebanon, 917–918
National Independent Church of Africa, 748
National Islamic Front (NIF), 27
National Liberal League, 1330
National Pillar Association, 758
National Presbyterian Church, 571
National Presbyterian Church in Mexico, 141, 918, 1430
National Qigong Assembly, 1452
National Secular Society, 91, 1329
National Spiritualist Association of Churches, 918–919, 1214
National Union of the Assemblies of God, 73
Native American Church, 447, 450, 919–921
Native Americans. See American Indians
Native Baptist Church, 921
Native Baptist Church of Cameroon, 215
Native Faith (Ukraine), 1321
Native religions, 448
Native Ukrainian National Faith, 1321
Nauru, 921–922
Nauru Congregational Church, 922–923
Nava, Antonio, 66
Navajo, 923–924
Navalar, Arumuga, 1220
Navarro, Juan, 62
Navayana Buddhism, 182
Nazareth (Nazarite) Baptist Church, 12, 924–925, 1465
Ndiege, Zablou, 958
Ndungane, Hugh Njongonkulu, 302
Nee Tosheng, 797–799
Neff, Christian, 90
Nemoto, Yukio, 1143
Neoapostolic Church, 808
Neo-Catechumenal Community, 1021
Neo-Confucianism, 188, 246, 258–259, 640
Neolog, 360
Neo-paganism, 420, 504
Neo-pentecostalismo, 166
Neoplatonism, 1413–1414, 1431
Nepal, 925–927 indigenous religions in, 927–928
 Newar Buddhism, 943–944
Nerse IV Klayetsi, St., 78, 79
Nestorian Christianity, 64, 75, 238, 285–286. See also Church of the East
Netherlands, 928–931
Netherlands, Evangelical Lutheran Church in the Kingdom of the, 477–478
Netherlands, Old Catholic Church of the, 661, 929, 968–970
Netherlands, Reformed Churches in the (GKN), 272, 280, 933, 934, 1072–1073, 1079, 1129, 1234, 1365
Netherlands, Reformed Churches in the (Liberated), 934, 1073–1074
Netherlands Antilles, 931–932
Netherlands Antilles, United Protestant Church of, 1366
Netherlands Reformed Church, 280, 302, 577, 651, 844, 929, 932–934, 1072, 1074, 1198, 1366
Neturei Karta, 737, 935, 1137–1138
New Acropolis Cultural Association, 74, 935–936
New Age Movement, 168, 429, 554, 936–939, 1314, 1416 in Japan, 718–719. See also Japanese new religions
New Apostolic Church, 77, 99, 223, 244, 539, 796, 812, 939–940, 950, 991, 1149, 1198, 1240, 1246, 1270, 1316, 1449, 1455
New Caledonia, 457, 740
New Church, 230
New Church of Southern Africa, 1243
New Church of the Holy Heart of Jesus, 1144
New Hebrides Christian Council, 1392
New Jerusalem, The General Church of the, 534–535
New Jerusalem Church of God, 569
New Kadampa Tradition (NKT), 508, 533, 940–941
New Life Evangelical Church, 995
New Millennium Peace Foundation, 382
New Testament Church of God, 318
New Thought movement, 314, 346, 400, 1078
 Divine Science Federation, 400–401
 International New Thought Alliance, 659–661
 Religious Science, 1078–1079
 Seichō-no-le, 1145–1146
 Unity, 1377–1378
New Tribes Mission, 995
New Zealand, 941–943
 Anglican Church in Aotearoa, New Zealand, and Polynesia, 44, 49–50, 300, 958, 1127, 1287
 Associated Churches of Christ in, 88–89
 Church of the Province of, 362, 501
 Maori religion, 828–830
 Methodist Church of, 859–860
New Zealand Council of Churches, 126
New Zealand Presbyterian Church, 363
Newbrough, John Ballou, 1379
Newman, John P., 484
Newman, Junius E., 849
Ngak'chang Rinpoche, 81
Ngala, Nathan K., 9
Ng'Anglican'a, Joseph, 1211
Nguema, Marcus, 435
Ngunzi ("prophet") churches, 12, 944–945

- Niasse, Ibráhim, 1280
 Nicaragua, 945–947
 Nicaragua, Baptist Convention of, 122
 Nicaragua, Moravian Church in, 887
 Nichidatsu, Fujii, 957
 Nichiren Buddhism, 189, 717, 758, 948, 957, 1077, 1190
 Nichiren Shōshū, 188, 640, 948, 1190. See also Sōka Gakkai International Nichirenshū, 758, 948–949
 Nichols, Philip Ross, 411
 Nicolici, Dumitru, 1152
 Niōæmñya, 263–264
 Niger, 949–950
 Niger Delta Pastorate Church, 955
 Nigeria, 950–956
 Church in the Province of, 301, 304
 Church of the Brethren in, 338
 Deeper Life Bible Church, 391
 Evangelical Church of West African, 466–467
 Methodist Church, 856
 Presbyterian Church of, 1039
 Reformed Church of Christ in, 1071
 Yoruban religion, 1290, 1291, 1442–1443
 See also Aladura Churches
 Nigerian Association of Aladura Churches, 29
 Nigerian Baptist convention, 705, 956
 Nikhilananda, 1392
 Nikkō, 948, 949
 Nikken, Abe, 948
 Niklaus, Ernest, 489, 1354
 Niles, Daniel T., 863
 Ninian, St., 1357
 Nipponzan Myōhōji, 189, 957
 Niranjanananda, Paramahansa, 664
 Nirankari Mission, Sant, 1129–1130
 Nityananda, 1171
 Niue, 958
 Niue, Ekalesia of, 424
 Niwano, Nikkyo, 1085
 Nizar, Abu Mansur, 695
 Nizari Ismailis, 598, 667, 695–696
 Nkansah, James Kwame, 1210
 Nkonyane, Daniel, 1457
 Noble Order of Tara, 500
 Noli, Fan S., 32
 Nomiya Luo Church, 958–959
 Nomiya Luo Mission, 748
 Nommensen, Ludwig Ingwer, 1047
 Nonjuring Church of Scotland, 431
 Norddeutsch Mission, 488–489
 Norelius, Eric, 1420
 Norman, Ruth and Ernest, 1314, 1325
 Norris, J. Frank, 120–121
 Norris, William H., 484, 486
 Norse mythology, 392–394
 North Africa Mission, 36, 891
 North American Baptist Fellowship, 128
 North American Renewal Service Committee, 321
 North German Missionary Society, 1284, 1355
 North Korea, 754–756
 Northeast Kingdom Community Church, 1312
 Northern Baptist Convention, 42
 Northern Evangelical Lutheran Church, 1362
 Northern Germany Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church, 611
 Northern Ireland, 676, 1359–1359
 Northern Marianas, 870, 959–960
 Norton, Ralph, 137
 Norway, 960–962
 Norway, Church of, 228, 327–328, 482, 607, 814, 815, 961, 1235
 Norway, Evangelical Lutheran Free Church of, 482, 515, 961
 Norwegian Baptist Union, 962
 Norwegian Church Mission to Israel, 327
 Norwegian Humanist Association, 607–608
 Norwegian Lutheran Mission, 327–328
 Norwegian Missionary Society, 814
 Nostradamus, 61
 Nsamihogo, Augustin, 302
 Nuhu, Lucas, 10, 976
 Nur, 1106
 Nusayr, Muhammad ibn, 778
 Nusayris, 33, 778
 Nyabingi, 1112
 Nýall, 617
 Nydahl, Ole, 135, 399, 742
 Nyingma Tibetan Buddhism, 155, 190, 248, 925, 963–964, 1278
 Nzambi ya Bougie, 355
 Nzapa to Azande movement, 227

 Oahspe, 1378–1379
 Oases groups, 1021–1022
 Obeah, 141, 367, 368, 404–405, 995
 Oberlin, Johann Friedrich, 479
 Oblates of Mary the Immaculate, 1116, 1143, 1283
 Obonyo, Lawi, 1210–1211
 Obu, Olumba Olumba, 172
 Ochwatta, James, 976
 Odunlami, Sophia, 266
 Oecolampadius, John, 1243
 O'Hair, Madalyn Murray, 39, 91
 Okada, Mokichi, 1146
 Okano, Seiō, 532
 Okano, Seiken, 532
 O'Kelly, James, 1348
 Okotie, Chris, 955
 Olavus, 336
 Olcott, Henry Steel, 194, 863, 1218, 1270, 1272, 1415
 Old Believers, 438, 876, 965–966, 1103, 1107 Old Believers, Latvian, 773, 775
 Old Believers Russian Orthodox Church, 1323
 Old Calendar churches, 1301–1302
 Old Catholic Bishops' Conference, International, 661
 Old Catholic Church, 1245
 Old Catholic Church in Great Britain, 786
 Old Catholic Church in Switzerland, 661, 966
 Old Catholic Church of Austria, 98, 461, 967
 Old Catholic Church of Mariavites, 967–968, 1022
 Old Catholic Church of the Netherlands, 661, 929, 968–970
 Old Catholicism, 223–224, 970–972
 Old Order Mennonite Church, 45
 Old Reformed Churches in the Netherlands, 1074
 Old Rite Romanian Orthodox Church, 972, 1096
 Oldham, William F., 854, 858
 Oman, 972–974
 Ibadhi Islam, 35, 615, 973
 Omar, Muhammad, 1257
 Ōmoto, 718, 974–975, 1145, 1146
 Omoyajowo, J. A., 301
 Oncken, Johann Gerhard, 123, 125, 610, 1339–1340
 Ondeto, Simeon Mtakatifu, 782
 Onisaburo, Deguchi, 606, 974–975
 Onoi, Jesus, 391
 Ontakekyō, 975–976
 Open Plymouth Brethren, 269, 519
 The Order, 171
 Order of Friars Minor, 512, 513
 Order of Interbeing, 1336
 Order of Saint Charbel, 1144
 Order of St. Ursula, 1383
 Order of the Mother of God, 61
 Order Sacre de Deliverance, 1285
 Ordo Templi Orientis (O.T.O.), 330, 550, 552, 553, 986–987
 Organization of African Instituted Churches, 340, 955, 976–977
 Oriomolade Tunolashe, Moses, 233
 Orthodox Autocephalous Church of Albania, 31
 Orthodox Church
 in America, 32, 977–978, 1108, 1374
 in China, 238, 240, 241, 978–979, 1108
 of Cyprus, 378, 979–980 in Czech Lands and Slovakia, 979 of Eritrea, 436
 of Greece, 419, 980–981, 1301. See also Greek Orthodox Church
 in Japan, 1108
 in Lithuania, 795
 of Moldava, 876

- of Mother of God "Majestic," 893–894
of Poland, 982, 1322
- Orthodox Daoism in America, 1452
- Orthodox Judaism, 360, 697, 736, 982–984
Beta Israel and, 148
Gush Emunim, 576
Neturei Karta, 737, 935, 1137–1138
Young Israel, 1444
See also Hassidism
- Orthodox Presbyterian Church, 436, 760, 934, 984–985
- Orthodox Syrian Church of India, 118
- Osborn, T. L., 569
- Oschoffa, Samuel, 226, 955
- Osho Commune International, 543, 545, 592, 634, 702, 743, 748, 985
- Ositelu, Gabriel Segun, 340
- Ositelu, Josiah, 340
- Osuke, Shimoyama, 975
- O.T.O. (Ordo Templi Orientis), 330, 550, 552, 553, 986
- Otubu, G. I. M., 977
- Our Lady of All Nations, 831, 986–987
- Our Lady of Fatima, 497, 987
- Owalo, Johana, 958
- Owens, Robert Dale, 518
- Oyedepo, David, 955
- Ozman, Agnes, 67, 1008
- Paarma, Jukka, 479
- Pack, David C., 797
- Padsambhava, 1261
- Pagan Federation, 988
- Pagan Folk Music movement, 1086
- Paganism, 451
Clan of the Ausrans (Poland), 350–351, 1022
Covenant of the Goddess, 371–372
Druidism, 409–411, 509, 1356
Fellowship of Isis, 500
Goddess spirituality, 555
in Latvia, 775–776
premodern Lithuania, 794–795
Rodzima Wiara (Poland), 1086
Romuva, 1099–1100
See also Neo-paganism; Wicca
- Pagtakhan, Francisco, 1015
- Paguyuban Sumarah, 1232
- Pakde Narto, 996
- Pakistan, 296, 988–992
Church of, 119, 296, 306, 326, 328–329, 343, 830, 991
Presbyterian Church, 329, 991, 1039–1040
- Pakistan Association, 243
- Palau, 870, 992
- Palestine Liberation Organization (PLO), 727–728, 779
- Palestine Pentecostal Church, 569
- Palmer, Jim, 122
- Palmer, Viola, 122
- Palo Mayombe, 376, 993
- Panama, 993–996
- The Panamerican Spiritualist Confederation, 74
- Panentheism, 997
- Pangestu, 721, 996–997
- Pan-Islamic Unity movement, 692
- Pantheism, 997
- Paparelli, Luigia, 872–876
- Papian, Korioun, 670
- Papua New Guinea, 997–1000
- Papua New Guinea, Evangelical Lutheran Church of, 481–482
- Papua New Guinea, United Church in, 1193, 1346
- Papus, 551, 552, 835
- Paraguay, 1000–1001
Mennonites in, 846
People of God, 1010
- Paramadvaiti, Bhakti Aloka, 531, 1404
- Paramadvaiti Maharaja, Srila Bhakti Aloka, 1404, 1433
- Paramahansa, Ramakrishna, 625, 1392
- Paramananda, 1392
- Paredes, Leonor, 1010
- Parham, Charles Fox, 67–68, 85, 171, 1005, 1008, 1363
- Paris Mission, 1001–1002 *
- Paris Missionary Society, 322, 457, 458, 459, 466, 487, 788
- Parish of Divine Mercy and Mary the Mystical Rose, 996
- Parker, Quanah, 919
- Parli, Hermann, 699
- Parliament of the World's Religions (Chicago, 1893), 350, 368–369, 710, 1373, 1392, 1424, 1450
- Parr, John Nelson, 87
- Parsis, 667. See also Zoroastrianism
- Parsons, Levi, 1250
- Particular Baptists, 124–125
- Partners in Harvest, 1288
- Pasaribu, Theophilus, 1181
- Pashazade, Allashukur Humatogly, 101
- Pashkov, Vasilii, 1338
- Pashupata Saivism, 1002
- Pasundan Christian Church, 1002–1003
- Patanjali, 1440
- Paterson, Rt. Rev. John C., 49, 50
- Paton, John G., 1391
- Patrick, St., 674–675
- Patterson, Archibald, 56, 489, 1354
- Patterson, George, 603
- Patterson, John C., 300
- Paul, St., 282
- Paul VI, Pope, 970
- Paulk, Earl P., Jr., 655
- Pavlov, Vasilii G., 538
- Pawenang, Sri, 1134
- Payne, John, 788
- Peebles, James M., 919
- Peerdeman, Ida, 986
- Pelia, Kimo, 1127
- Penn, William, 337, 522, 1348
- Pentecostal Assemblies of Canada, 18, 103, 147, 883, 1316
- Pentecostal Assemblies of God, 748
- Pentecostal Assemblies of Jesus Christ, 63, 1363
- Pentecostal Assemblies of the World (PAW), 62, 63, 70, 340, 1004, 1008, 1363
- Pentecostal Association of Ghana, 1210
- Pentecostal Charismatic Churches of North America, 321
- Pentecostal Church of Chile, 236, 1004, 1008, 1349 of Christ, 661 of God, 141, 426, 604, 1005, 1054 of God of America, 569 of God of New York, 569 of Jesus Christ, 995 of the Nazarene, 342
of Scotland, 342
- Pentecostal Churches in Tanzania, 1263
- Pentecostal Fellowship Association of Nigeria, 955
- Pentecostal Holiness Church, 662
- The Pentecostal Mission, 1005–1006
- Pentecostal Mission Church, 236, 1008
- Pentecostal Mission of Nashville, 342
- Pentecostal Missionary Baptist Church, 141
- Pentecostal Missionary Union, 87
- Pentecostal World Conference, 321, 1008, 1441
- Pentecostal World Fellowship, 1008–1007
- Pentecostalism, 298, 1008–1009 *
African prophet-healing/spiritual churches, 15–16
Brazilian neo-pentecostalismo, 166
Charismatic Movement, 231–232
Scandinavian, 1009–1010
serpent handlers, 1150–1151
- Penzotti, Francisco G., 485, 486, 860, 1013
- People of God (Paraguay), 1010
- People's Church, 472
- People's Republic of China. See China
- Peoples Temple, 578, 1011, 1374
- Peraza, Juanita García, 874
- Perez, Rodolfo, 1220
- Perfect Liberty Kyōdan, 167, 1012
- Perl, Jacob, 765
- Perry, Troy, 1379
- Persaudaraan Upasaka Upasika Indonesia, 640
- Persian Jews, 668–670
- Peru, 1012–1014
- Peru, Methodist Church of, 860
- Pesa, Jaote, 958
- Pessoa, Fernando, 1028
- Petersen, Ole Peter, 961

- Pethrus, Pertrus Lewi, 1009
 Petri, Laurentius, 336
 Petty, Calvin C., 21
 Peyotism (Native American Church), 919–921
 Philadelphia Church, 604
 Philadelphia Church of God, 1014–1015, 1352, 1434
 Philafricaine Mission, 56
 Philanthropic Association of the Friends of Man, 339
 Philippine Baptist Churches, Convention of, 361–362
 Philippine Independent Church, 432, 433, 1015, 1017
 Philippine Islands, Evangelical Methodist Church in the, 483, 1017, 1351
 Philippine Methodist Church, 1351
 Philippines, 1016–1018
 Episcopal Church in the, 433–434, 1015
 Evangelical Church in the, 1351 indigenous traditional religion, 1017–1018
 United Church of Christ in the, 1017, 1349, 1350–1351
 Pietist movement, 90, 131, 327, 499, 871
 Piggott, Henry J., 485
 Pilgrim Holiness Church, 603, 883, 1410
 Piraino, Antonio, 699
 Pitcairn Islands, 1018–1019
 Pittman, Mel and Ruby, 527
 Pitts, Fountain E., 484, 849
 Pius XII, Pope, 970
 Pivarunas, Mark Anthony, 1143
 Pjeturss, Helgi, 617
 Plantard, Pierre, 1044, 1045
 Plato, 1413
 Platon, 32
 Platt, Jon, 1051
 Plutschau, Heinrich, 633, 1355
 Plymouth Brethren, 126, 153, 268, 765, 797, 867, 985, 1019–1020, 1358
 Pocomania, 995
 Point Loma Publications, 1273–1274
 Polaire Brotherhood, 345
 Poland, 1020–1022
 Clan of the Ausrans, 350–351, 1022
 Evangelical Church of the Augsburg Confession in, 462–463
 Orthodox Church, 982, 1322
 Rodzima Wiara, 1086
 Polish Catholic Church, 971, 1022–1023
 Polish Catholicism, Old Catholic Church of Mariavites, 967–968
 Polish National Catholic Church, 971
 Polish Unitarianism, 135
 Polygamy-practicing Mormons, 339–340, 1023–1024
 Pomun Order, 188, 1025
 Ponape, 870
 Pontoppidan, Erik, 327
 Poonia, Harivansh Lal, 657
 Poor Clares, 512, 513
 Pormes, Ais, 1340
 Portugal, 1026–1029
 Post, Christian Frederick, 602
 Post, Henry Barrington, 1035
 Potay, Michael, 71
 Poullart des Places, Claude Francis, 600
 Prabhavavavda, 1392
 Prabhupada, Bhaktivedanta Swami, 168, 662–663, 1404, 1432
 Prabhupada, Vaishnava, 591
 Prajapita Brahma, 159
 Pratt, Addison, 521
 Precious Stone (Diamond) Society, 266
 Presbyterian Church
 of Africa, 1033–1034
 of Aotearoa New Zealand, 424, 1034 of Australia (Continuing), 96, 1034, 1375 in Brazil, 165, 1365 of Brazil, 1430
 in Cameroon, 1029–1030
 of Cameroon, 22, 215, 1035
 in Canada, 147, 1030, 1298, 1346
 of Colombia, 1035–1036
 Cumberland, 376–377
 of East Africa, 1036 of England, 1367
 of Ghana, 548, 1036
 of India, 1037
 of Korea, 1031, 1037, 1038
 of Korea (Dae Shin), 1037 of Korea (HapDong), 758, 760, 1032, 1037–1038 in Korea (KoShin), 1038 of Korea (TongHap), 758, 760, 1032, 1038–1039 of Mozambique, 899, 1039 of Nigeria, 1039, 1345
 Orthodox, 985
 of Pakistan, 329, 991, 1039–1040 in the Republic of Korea, 1031–1032, 1349 in Rwanda, 1030–1031 of Southern Africa, 1040, 1198, 1375 in the Sudan, 1032
 in Taiwan, 1031
 in Trinidad, 1032–1033, 1298
 of Vanuatu, 1040–1041, 1391 of Wales, 1041
 Presbyterian Church (U.S.A.), 376, 418, 467, 1042–1043, 1076, 1350, 1373, 1430
 Presbyterian Community of Kinshasa, 312–313
 Presbyterian Reformed Church in Cuba, 1043–1044
 Presbyterian tradition, 294, 1075–1076
 Presbyterianism, Evangelical Churches, 487–489
 Presbyterians in the Congo, 310
 Presbytery of Liberia, 1044
 Presbytery of Sialkot, 328
 Priestly, Joseph, 1342
 Primal religions, 448
 Primitive Baptists, 41, 515
 Primitive Methodist Church, 435, 569, 859
 Primitive Methodist Mission, 862
 Primitive Methodists, 1353, 848
 Primitive Wesleyan Methodist Connexion, 852
 Prince of Peace Church, 426, 571
 Prince of Peace Evangelical Church, 570
 Prince of Peace Evangelical Church Association, 569
 Prince of Peace Pentecostal Church, 604
 Principality of Andorra, 49
 Priory of Sion, 1044–1046
 Priscillianism, 1026
 Pro Oriente, 98
 Progressive National Baptist Convention of America, 917, 1046–1047, 1373
 Prophet, Elizabeth, 347–348
 Prophet, Mark L., 346–347
 Prophet-healing churches, 14, 15–16, 1294
 Prophet Elias Movement, 869
 Protestant Christian Batak Church (HKBP), 132, 279–280, 1047, 1048, 1181
 Protestant Christian Church, Angkola (GKPA), 1048
 Protestant Christian Church of Bali (GKPB), 1048
 Protestant Christian Church of Nias (BNKP), 1048–1049
 Protestant Church in Sabah, 821, 1049
 Protestant Church in Southeast Sulawesi (GEPSULTRA), 1049–1050
 Protestant Church of Algeria, 37, 1050–1051
 Protestant Church of Belgium. See United Protestant Church of Belgium
 Protestant Church of Senegal, 1051
 Protestant Episcopal Church, 316
 Protestant Episcopal Church in the U.S.A., 431
 Protestant Methodist Church in Benin, 146, 1052
 Protestant Methodist Church in Côte d'Ivoire, 705, 1051–1052
 Providence Baptist Church, 788
 Province Baptist Church, 789
 Province of the Anglican Church of the Congo, 313
 Pseudoscience, 1331
 Puerto Rican Espiritismo, 436–437
 Puerto Rico, 1052–1054
 Mita Congregation, 874–875
 Pullen, Harry Herbert, 453
 Pullin, Thomas, 569

- Pure Land Buddhism, 186, 189, 238, 243, 258, 507, 717, 725–726, 820, 1054–1055, 1300
- Puri, Bhakti Promode, 531
- Puri Maharaj, 531
- Puritans, 40, 128, 359, 1357, 1366–1367, 1371
- Purucker, Gottfried de, 1273
- Pyramidism, 171
- Pythagoras, 1413
- Qadiriyya Rifaiyya Sufi Order, 1056
- Qadiriyya Sufi Order, 35, 101, 145, 207, 215, 228, 358, 402, 667, 789, 891, 953, 1056, 1148, 1225, 1230
- Qatar, 1057
- Qigong, 382, 493, 759
- Zhong Gong, 1452–1453
- Quakers, 1347, 1358. See Friends
- Quanzhen Daoism, 240, 258, 387–388, 584, 1058, 1263
- Quebec messianism, 61
- Quechua religion, 235
- Queen of Peace, 841
- Quintero, Oscar Uzcátegui, 553
- Qumran community, 733
- Qutb, Muhammad, 27
- Qutb, Sayyid, 692, 693, 903
- Qutb al-Gawth, Shaykh al-, 1155
- Rabbani, Mullah Muhammed, 5
- Rabbecca Jumba Kivuli, 18
- Rada Religion, 1059
- Radha Soami Satsang, Beas, 1100, 1179
- Radhasoami, 827, 895, 1060, 1129, 1179
- Radical Reformation, 292
- Radio Church of God, 1434
- Raelian Movement, 1240, 1314
- Raelian Movement International, 74, 1060–1062
- Rahman, Omar, 27, 28, 904
- Raj Yoga, 159, 621, 1169, 1273
- Rajadharmā-nidēsa, Phra, 199
- Rajagopalachari, Shri Parthasarathi, 1169
- Rajneesh, Bhagwan Shree, 543, 592, 743, 986
- Rajneesh, Osho, 1115
- Ram Chandra, Shri, 1169
- Ram Chandra Mission, Shri, 1169
- Ramakrishna, 625, 1156
- Ramakrishna, Paramahansa, 625, 1392
- Ramakrishna Math and Mission, 625, 1392–1393
- Ramanuja, 623
- Ramtha's School of Enlightenment, 939, 1062
- Randolph, Pascal B., 1415
- Rangjung Rigpe Dorjé, 399, 742
- Rankin, Melinda, 867
- Rapagelanus, Stanislaus, 480
- Rapoliomis, Stanislovas, 480
- Rastafarians, 61, 225, 405, 446–447, 578, 715, 1063–1064, 1118, 1119, 1120
- Ratana, Tahupotiki Wiremu, 830
- Ratana Church, 830, 943
- Rationalism, 1328
- Raven, F. E., 1019
- Razan, Hayashi, 1165
- Rechevsky, Zina, 508
- Reconstructionist Judaism, 697, 1064, 1444
- Red Sea Mission Team, 1438
- Reddy, Balgur Venkat, 892
- Redfield, James, 939
- Reed, Coling, 618
- Rees, Seth Cook, 1410
- Reform Baptists (Russia), 1065
- Reform Judaism, 360, 697, 736, 982, 1065–1067
- Reformation, 291–292, 542
- Reformed Christian Church in Slovakia, 1067, 1187
- Reformed Christian Church in Yugoslavia, 1067–1068, 1447
- Reformed Church, 291, 498–499
- Reformed Church in America, 43, 117, 280, 765, 780, 974, 1068, 1438
- Reformed Church in Hungary, 373, 611
- Reformed Church in North America, Christian, 280
- Reformed Church in Romania, 1068–1069, 1096, 1099
- Reformed Church in Zambia, 1070, 1449
- Reformed Church in Zimbabwe, 1070
- Reformed Church of Alsace and Lorraine, 511, 1070–1071
- Reformed Church of Christ in Nigeria, 1071
- Reformed Church of France, 36, 402, 457, 459, 487, 511, 564, 1001, 1051, 1070, 1071–1072, 1303. See also Paris Mission
- Reformed Church of Hungary, 1067, 1069, 1072
- Reformed Church of South Africa, 817
- Reformed Churches, 807
- Reformed Churches, International Conference of, 651
- Reformed Churches in the Netherlands (GKN), 272, 280, 933, 934, 1072–1073, 1079, 1129, 1234, 1365
- Reformed Churches in the Netherlands (Liberated), 934, 1073–1074
- Reformed Congregation of the Goddess, 555
- Reformed Denomination, 1074
- Reformed Druids of North America, 411
- Reformed Ecumenical Council, 280, 306, 1074–1075
- Reformed Ecumenical Synod, 412
- Reformed Episcopal Church, 147
- Reformed Presbyterian Church, 378, 1042
- Reformed Presbyterian Church, Evangelical Synod, 1344
- Reformed Presbyterian Church of Cuba, 375
- Reformed Presbyterian Church of Equatorial Guinea, 1075
- Reformed Presbyterian Church of Scotland, 1391
- Reformed Presbyterian Church of Southern Africa, 1375–1376
- Reformed/Presbyterian tradition, 1075–1076
- Reformed Scottish Rite of Freemasonry, 835
- Reformed Tradition, 131, 135, 333, 455
- Refuge Churches, 341
- Regions Beyond Mission, 73
- Reiha-no-Hikari, 1076–1077
- Reilly, Thomas, Jr., 446
- Reinach, Rodolfo, 465
- Reiyūkai, 189, 718, 751, 908, 1077, 1085
- Religious Science, 313, 400, 955, 1078–1079, 1145
- Religious Science International (RSI), 660, 1078–1079
- Religious Society of Friends, Canadian Yearly Meeting of, 219–220
- Remer, Klaas, 482
- Remey, Charles Mason, 106
- Remonstrant Brotherhood, 1079–1080
- Renaissance International, 46
- Renny, 725
- Renovated Church of Christ, 61
- Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, 205, 225, 501, 605, 740, 1080–1081
- Republic of China. See Taiwan
- Research Centre of the Kabbalah, 697
- Restoration movement, 268, 349
- Restored Church of God, 797
- Resurrection Churches and Ministries, 141
- Reunion, 1081–1082
- Reuss, Theodor, 551, 986
- Revival Ministries International, 1288
- Reyes, Isebelo de los, 1015
- Rhenish Mission, 132, 456, 457, 475, 643, 861, 909–910, 1048, 1082–1083, 1181
- Rhodes, Barbara, 765
- Rice, Luther, 633
- Richard, Mira (the Mother), 1156, 1215
- Richmond, Cora L., 919
- Ridsdale, Philip, 313
- Rieger, Joseph A., 1348
- Rifa'i, al-, 1056
- Rifaiyya, 667, 1230
- Rigpa Fellowship, 453, 1083–1084
- Ringatu, 943
- Rinzai, 186, 189, 397, 717, 1084, 1128, 1450
- Rio Muni (Equatorial Guinea), 434–435
- Ríos, Otoniel, 569

- Risser, Paul C., 649
 Risshō Kōsei-Kai, 189, 718, 1077,
 1084–1086
 Risshohaku Association, 1161
 River Brethren, 169
 Roberts, Benjamin Titus, 515
 Roberts, Evans, 64
 Roberts, Oral, 162, 662, 1441
 Robertson, Archibald T., 127–128
 Robertson, William E. J., 22
 Robinson, John, 1357
 Robinson, John (Bishop of Woolwich), 1360
 Rodgers, James B., 1351
 Rodriguez, Armando, 857
 Rodriguez, Victor Manuel Gomez, 553
 Rodzima Wiara (Poland), 1086
 Roerich, Nicholas, 557
 Roho churches, 18, 1210–1211
 Roman Catholic Church, 1086–1093 *
 Benedictine Order, 142–144 church, ministry, and magisterium
 (infallibility), 1089–1091
 Coptic Catholic Church, 364
 Dominican Order, 288, 407–408, 1394
 early history, 287–288
 eschatology, 1093
 Franciscan Order, 288, 512–513, 1394
 Fraternity of Saint Pius X, 514, 1246 history of the Church of England,
 315–316
 Holy Ghost Fathers, 222, 228, 354, 525,
 527, 572, 600–601, 1082, 1198, 1262
 Inquisition, 136, 1027, 1203, 1431 institutional structure, 1090
 International Old Catholic Bishops'
 Conference, 661
 Jesuit order, 72, 292, 723–724, 1384,
 1394
 Lectorium Rosicrucianum, 781–782
 Liberal Catholic Church, 97, 786–787,
 1240
 Luigia Paparelli Mission, 703, 872–876
 Marian movement. See Marian tradition
 Missionaries of Charity, 872
 La Missione-Luigia Paparelli, 872–876 modernist/traditionalist tension, 296
 New World expansion, 293
 Order of St. Ursula, 1383
 origins, 1088
 Polish new religious movements, 1021
 Reformation era, 289–292 sacraments, 1092–1093
 saints and Mary, 1092
 Sedevantism and antipopes, 1142–1144 in Spain, 1203–1204
 in Syria, 1249–1250 theological anthropology, nature, and grace, 1091
 theological emphases, 1088–1089 theology of sin, 1091–1092 unbelief traditions and, 1326–1327
 Universal Soul and, 1381–1382
 Vatican City, 701, 1093
 Vodou and, 580
 Waldensian Church, 1398–1399
 World Network of Marian Devotion,
 831–832
See also specific Catholic and Old Catholic churches
 Romania, 1094–1097
 Evangelical Church of the Augsburg
 Confession in, 461, 490
 Evangelical Synodal Presbyterian Church of the Augsburg Confession in, 489–490
 Islam in, 1096, 1097
 Reformed Church in, 1068–1069, 1096,
 1099
 Roman Catholic Church, 1095, 1096
 Romanian Evangelical Church, 1096
 Romanian Greek Catholic Church, 1098,
 1099
 Romanian Orthodox Church, 373, 415,
 876, 1096, 1098–1099, 1323, 1446
 Romanian Orthodox Church, Old Rite, 972
 Romuva, 1099–1100
 Roncaccia, Basilio, 873
 Rose of Lima, St., 408
 Rosen, Martin Moïshe, 1341
 Rosenius, Karl Olof, 871
 Rosicrucian Apostolic Church, 552
 Rosicrucians. See Ancient and Mystical
 Order Rosae Crucis
 Rossi, Marcelo, 164
 Rotuma, 851
 Roussy, Louis, 1337
 Rowe, John, 715
 Rowe, W. G., 70
 Roy, Maurice Cardinal, 80
 Roy, Philippe, 80
 Roy, Rammohun, 159–160, 591, 624
 Ruhani Satsang, 836, 1060, 1100–1101, 1180
 Rumi, Celaleddin, 1305
 Rumi, Jalal ad-din ar-, 864
 Rumsey, Mary, 1441
 Runcie, Robert, 1360
 Rushdie, Salman, 1359
 Russell, Charles Taze, 4, 339, 722
 Russia, 1101–1105
 ethnic minority religions, 1105–1107 new religious movement, Mother of God Centre, 893–894
 Reform Baptists, 1065
 Soviet atheism, 1329
 Union of Evangelical
 Christians–Baptists of Russia,
 1338–1339
 Russian Baptist Federation, 538
 Russian Baptist Union, 745
 Russian Free Orthodox Church, 893
 Russian Living Church, 1321
 Russian Old Believers. See Old Believers
 Russian Orthodox Church, 32, 37,
 134–135, 415, 423, 439, 440, 561,
 745, 766, 767, 882, 876, 1107–1109,
 1257, 1308, 1309, 1317, 1387
 Chinese, 241, 978–979
 Georgian Church and, 537, 540 history in Russia, 1101–1103
 Holy Orthodox Church in Japan, 601
 Molokans, 878
 Moscow Patriarchate, 1107–1109
 Mother of God Centre, 893–894
 Orthodox Church in America, 32,
 977–978, 1108, 1374
 Ruthenian Orthodox Church, 1110
 Soviet era, 1104
 Syria and, 1249
 Ukrainian orthodoxy and, 1321–1322,
 1324
 Russian Orthodox Church Outside of Russia, 415, 978, 1108, 1109–1110,
 1301, 1323, 1395
 Russian Orthodox Greek Catholic Church,
 977–978
 Russian True Orthodox Church, 1323
 Ruthenian Catholic Church, 1110, 1319
 Rutherford, Joseph F., 339, 722
 Rwanda, 1111–1114
 Rwanda, Church in the Province of,
 301–302, 342, 344
 Rwanda, Presbyterian Church in,
 1030–1031
 Ryangombe, 1112
 Rymler, Frederick Ludwig, 962
 Ryūhō, Ōkawa, 718, 752
 Sabbath Zion Church, 1458
 Sabeans, 673
 Sabodan, Volodymyr, 1322
 Sacred Name movement, 88
 Sacred Order of Deliverance, 1285
 Sadler, William S., 1382
 Sadr, Imam Musa, 779
 Sadrach, 273
 Safavi, Navvab, 693
 Sah, Lonka, 1221
 Sahaj Marg, 1169
 Sahaja Yoga, 545, 592, 627, 1115
 Sahara, 1115–1116
 Sahn, Seung, 765
 Sah-ok, Kang Il-sun, 724
 Sai Baba, 1136
 Said, Qaboos ben, 973
 St. Clair, Margaret, 528
 St. Croix, 1400
 Saint Germain, 346, 348
 Saint Germain Foundation, 614
 St. Helena, 1117

- St. John, 1400
 St. John's Apostolic Faith Mission Church of South Africa, 158
 St. Kitts-Nevis, 1117–1118
 St. Lucia, 1118–1119
 St. Pierre et Miquelon, 1119–1120
 St. Thomas, 1400
 St. Thomas Evangelical Church, 118
 St. Vincent, 1120–1121
 Saint Vincent and the Grenadines Christian Council, 1121
 Saint-Martin, Louis-Claude de, 835
 Saionji Masami, 211
 Saiva Siddhanta, 743, 1259–1260
 Saivism, 590, 623, 839, 1121, 1389
 Kashmir, 743–744, 1121, 1170
 Pashupata, 1002
 Tamil, 820, 1121, 1259–1260
 Saker, Alfred, 458, 921
 Sakwa, Wellington B., 9
 Sakyā, Tridzin, 1122
 Sakyapa, 190, 248, 742, 1121–1122
 Salesians, 1116, 1122–1123
 Salihiya, 402
 Salvadorean Lutheran Synod, 1123
 Salvation Army, 944, 961, 1123–1125 *
 Salzberg, Sharon, 645
 Samaritan Evangelical Church, 1054
 Samavesam of Telegu Baptists Churches, 1125–1126
 Sami religion, 504
 Samoa, 1126–1127. See also American Samoa
 Samoa, Congregational Christian Church in, 358–359
 Samoa, Methodist Church in, 43, 853, 1126
 Samoan Full Gospel Church, 1127
 Samori, 573
 Samraj, Adi Da, 3
 San Marino, 1127
 San religion, 157, 1195–1196
 Sanbō Kyōdan, 397, 1128
 Sanderson, John Teshin, 1418
 Sangh, Rashtriya Swayamsevak, 634
 Sangharakshita, 1412
 Sangir-Talau Evangelical Church (GMIST), 1129
 Sankara, Thomas, 207
 Sant Mat, 634, 1129, 1175, 1179–1180
 Sant Nirankari Mission, 1129–1130
 Santería, 145, 376, 437, 1054, 1121, 1130, 1443
 Santerismo, 437
 Santi, Ricardo, 485
 The Santi Asoka, 1131
 Santi Asokan Buddhism, 1131, 1269
 Santiago, William Soto, 996
 Santo Daime, 168, 1131–1132
 Sanusiyya, 228, 790, 1230
 São Tomé and Príncipe, 1132–1133
 Sapta Darma, 721, 1133–1134
 Sarada Devi, 1156
 Sarasvati, Dayananda, 84, 592
 Saraswati, Ma Yoga Shakti, 627
 Sarkar, Prabhat Ranjan, 46
 Sarvodaya, 957, 1134–1135
 Sas, Alfredo C., 1152
 Sasana Abhiwurdhi Wardhana Society (SAWS), 202
 Saso, Michael, 1452
 Sastri, Sivanath, 160
 Sat Guru Maharaj, 956
 Satanism, 1135–1136
 Church of Satan, 329–331, 1135
 Satchidananda, Sri Swami, 646
 Sathya Sai Baba Movement, 702, 1136–1137
 Satmar Hassidism, 584, 737, 935, 1137–1138
 Satsang Network, 1138
 Satyananda Saraswati, Swami, 663–664
 Saudi Arabia, 1138–1141
 Saunière, Berenger, 1044
 Savonarola, Girolamo, 289
 Sawa, Metropolitan, 982
 Sawan Ruhani Mission, 74
 Sawan Singh, 1100
 Saxon Evangelical Church, 804
 Sayadaw, Ledi, 1398
 Sayadaw, Mahasi, 177–178, 645, 907
 Scanderberg (born Gjergj Kastrioti), 30, 31
 Scars de Lima, Glauco, 430
 Schechter, Solomon, 360
 Schilder, K., 651, 1073
 Schipper, Kristofer, 1452
 Schleswig-Holstein Evangelical Lutheran Mission, 1355
 Schlue, Christi, 400
 Schmidt, Walter, 939
 Schneerson, Joseph Isaac, 800
 Schneerson, Menachem Mendel, 584
 Schoemaker, Mario, 618
 School for Esoteric Studies, 71
 Schools of the Fourth Way, 74
 Schroeder, Herman H., 400
 Schuckhardt, Francis, 1143
 Schucman, Helen, 370
 Schumann, Theophilus Salomon, 888
 Schwartz, Jacqueline, 645
 Science of Mind churches, 1078
 Science of Spirituality, 74
 Scientology, 74, 218, 331–333, 395, 703, 1033, 1034, 1039, 1314
 Score, John, 988
 Scotland, Church of, 119, 150, 294, 306, 315, 328, 333–334, 487, 577, 698, 747, 899, 1141, 1198, 1345, 1350, 1353, 1357, 1358, 1367, 1375, 1438, 1449
 Scotland, Free Church of, 515, 817, 890, 1033–1034, 1358
 Scotland, United Free Church of, 1362
 Scots Church, 1375
 Scott, Peter Cameron, 7, 747
 Scott, Walter, 1424
 Scottish Congregational Church, 360, 1367
 Scottish Episcopal Church, 431, 1141–1142
 Scottish Missionary Society, 334
 Scranton, Willaim B., 758, 761
 Scudder, John, 42, 334
 Seabury, Samuel, 1142
 Seagrave, Gordon S., 907
 Sears, Barnas, 1339
 Seaton, Lydia, 1117
 Seax Wicca, 528
 Sebastianism, 1027
 Secular humanism, 608
 Secular Humanism, Council for, 369
 Secular Humanistic Jews, International Federation of, 657, 697
 Secularism, 1328
 Sedevacantism and Antipopes, 1142–1144
 Sédir, Paul, 552
 See of Echmiadzin, 77–78, 79
 See of the Great House of Cilicia, 78–79
 Seibo no Mikuni, 1143
 Seichō-no-Ie, 167–168, 210, 975, 1145–1146
 Seihō, Okano, 532
 Seiken, Okano, 532
 Sein, Teófilo Vargas, 874
 Seiyū, Kiriyama, 718
 Sekai Kyūsei Kyō, 167, 975, 1146, 1232
 Selassie, Haile, 442, 1063
 Self-Realization Fellowship, 1147
 Sellers, Ernest William, 656
 Selwyn, George Augustus, 49–50, 300, 1391
 Seminar of the Sacred Hearts of Jesus and Mary, 1143
 Sen, K. C., 160, 624
 SEND International, 205
 Senegal, 1147–1149
 Senegal, Protestant Church of, 1051
 Senegal Muridiyya Sufi order, 900–901
 Separate Baptists, 41
 Separatists, 124, 128–129
 Sephardic Judaism, 984, 1201–1203, 1431–1432
 Serbia, 1445–1447
 Serbian Orthodox Church, 156, 373, 810, 979, 1109, 1149–1150, 1239, 1308, 1446
 Serpent handlers, 1150–1151
 Servetus, Michael, 654, 1326
 Seventh Day Adventist Church, 1153–1154 *
 Branch Davidians, 160–162
 Latvian conference, 773, 775
 Seventh Day Adventist Reform Movements, 426, 1151–1152
 Seventh Day Baptist General Conference, 1152–1153
 Seventh-Day Church of God, 4

- Seychelles, 1154–1155
 Seymour, William J., 67, 68, 1008, 1363
 Shadare, Joseph, 266, 340
 Shādhiliyya Sufi Order, 1155, 1225
 Shafii, Muhammad ibn Idris ibn al-Abbas, 825, 1156
 Shafiite School of Islam, 1155–1156 *
 Shafo, Muhammad ibn Idris ibn al-Abbas ibn Uthman, 1156
 Shaivism. See Saivism
 Shaivite tradition. See Saivism
 Shakarian, Demos, 231, 1007
 Shakers, 1368–1370
 Shakespeare, J. H., 128
 Shakti Movement, 590, 622, 1156–1157
 Shaku, Soyen, 193
 Shambhala International, 453, 742, 1157
 Shangqing, 387
 Shankar, Ravi, 82–83
 Shankara, 623
 Shankara, Mul, 84
 Share International, 71, 938
 Sharma, I. C., 827
 Shaw, Barnabas, 861
 Shaw, William (nineteenth-century missionary), 861
 Shaw, William (Baptist Church president), 917
 Shaybani, Muhammad ibn al-Hasan al-, 825
 Shellabear, William G., 858
 Shelton, S. McDowell, 341
 Shem-Tov, Baal, 583, 736, 1320
 Shembe, Amos Khula, 924
 Shembe, Johannes Galilee, 924
 Shembe, Mbusi Vimbeni, 924
 Shembe, Mdliwamafa Mloyisa (Isaiah), 12, 924–925
 Sheng Yen, 396
 Sheng-Yen, Lu, 1300
 Shenouda III, Pope, 976
 Sheptyckyj, Andrew, 1324
 Shi'a Islam, 5, 100, 685–686, 1157–1160, 1437
 Alevis, 33–35, 132–133, 545, 695, 728, 778, 1248, 1250, 1306
 in Iraq, 671, 673
 Persian Islam, 667
 Twelver sect, 102
 Wahhabi Islam and, 1405
 Zaydites, 151, 1159, 1449–1450
 See also Ismaili Islam
 Shiah Fatimi Ismaili Tayyibi Dawoodi Bohra, 151, 210, 243, 696, 839, 1160
 Shields, T. T., 218
 Shimmin, Isaac, 855
 Shingon Buddhism, 532, 717, 1160–1161
 Shinnyoen, 189, 1161–1162
 Shinran, 724–725
 Shinto, 189, 716, 717, 718, 1163–1168
 Ontakekyō, 975–976
 Perfect Liberty Kyōdan, 1012
 state, 1166–1177
 Tenrikyō and, 1264–1265
 See also Japanese new religions
 Shirazi, Sayyid, 668, 1159
 Shiv Dayal Singh, 634, 1060
 Shobo An Zendo, 74
 Shodo, Okano, 751
 Shoghi Effendi, 102, 105, 106, 110, 112–113
 Shōkō, Asahara, 92, 719
 Shona religion, 1454
 Shouters, 797
 Shrivakayana Buddhism, 182
 Shri Ram Chandra Mission, 1169
 Shuck, John Lewis, 121
 Shugendō, 1165, 1169–1170
 Siassi Lutheran Church, 481
 Siddha Yoga, 1170–1171
 Siddhanta Saraswati, Bhakti, 530
 Siddhartha Gautama (the Buddha), 179
 Siegel, August Ludwig, 465
 Sierra Leone, 1172–1173
 Sierra Leone, Methodist Church of, 860–861
 Signs following movement, 1150–1151
 Sikh Dharma, 1173–1174
 Sikhism, 6, 591, 627, 632–633, 989, 1175–1180
 Sant Mat, 634, 1129, 1175, 1179–1180
 Sikh Dharma, 1173–1174
 Silent Unity, 1377
 Silesian Evangelical Church of the Augsburg Confession, 1181
 Siloism, 74
 Silvera, Aurelio, 857
 Simalungun Protestant Christian Church, 643, 1047, 1181
 Simon, G. K., 1181
 Simons, Menno, 44, 90, 169, 292, 482, 843–844, 845, 929
 Simonton, Asbel Green, 1029
 Simpson, Albert Benjamin, 267, 428
 Simpson, W. W. (Bill), 652
 Sin, Lim Si, 855
 Sinclair, John C., 1005
 Singapore, 1182–1184
 Buddhism in, 1182, 1184–1185
 Methodist Church in, 854
 Singh, Ajaib, 1110
 Singh, Baba Jaimal, 1179
 Singh, Bhakt, 150, 765
 Singh, Darshan, 1101
 Singh, Gobind (or Govind), 632, 1174, 1177, 1179
 Singh, Jagat, 1100
 Singh Ji, Baba Buta, 1129
 Singh, Kirpal, 1100–1101, 1180
 Singh, Sawan, 1100
 Singh, Shiv Dayal, 634, 1060
 Siva-Buddha religion, 639
 Sivananda, Swami, 93, 627, 664
 Sivananda Saraswati Maharaj, 399–400, 646
 Skeptics Society, 1331
 Skiraj, Ahmad, 1280
 Skrypnyk, Mstyslav, 1322
 Slovak Evangelical Church of the Augsburg Confession in Yugoslavia, 1185, 1439
 Slovak Republic, Evangelical Church of the Augsburg Confession in the, 461–462
 Slovakia, 1185–1187
 Slovakia, Reformed Christian Church in, 1067, 1187
 Slovenia, 1187–1188
 Small, Alethea Brooks, 400
 Small, John, 21
 Small, Mary J., 21
 Smarta tradition, 1188–1189
 Smith, Bailey, 662
 Smith, Charles Lee, 91
 Smith, Joseph, III, 1081
 Smith, Joseph, Jr., 323, 1080
 Smith, Samuel L., 70
 Smyth, John, 124, 129
 Snake handlers, 1150–1151
 So, Huynh Phu, 598
 Socarras, Arnaldo, 656
 Society for Humanistic Judaism, 657, 697
 Society for International Ministries, 1345
 Society for the Propagation of the Bible, 600
 Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts, 1189 *
 Society of African Missions, 1284
 Society of Friends, 522, 1358, 1371. See also Friends
 Society of Missionaries of Africa. See White Fathers
 Society of Saint Pius X, 514, 1142
 Society of the One Almighty God, 1316
 Socinianism, 135
 Socinius, Fausto, 1343
 Socinus, Laelius, 654
 Sofrony, Bishop, 965
 Sogyel Rinpoche, 963, 1083
 Sojun, Ikkyu, 1084
 Sōka Gakkai International, 57, 74, 99, 167, 189, 194, 195, 243, 512, 549, 702, 718, 719, 1014, 1184, 1189–1191, 1263. See also Nichiren Shōshū
 Sokolsky, Joseph, 206
 Sok-Po, Han, 760
 Solar Temple, 94, 218, 512, 1191
 Solomon Islands, 1192–1193
 Solomon Islands, United Church of the, 1352–1353
 Somalia, 1193–1194
 Someillan, Enrique B., 857
 Soremekun, Joseph, 856

- Sosa, Arturo Rangel, 656
 Sot-aesan, 1420
 Soto Zen Buddhism, 186, 189, 717,
 1194–1195, 1450
 South Africa, 1195–1199
 Apostolic Faith Mission of South Africa
 (AFMs of SA), 68–69
 Baptist Union/Baptist Convention of, 127
 Buddhism in, 195
 Church in the Province of, 302
 Dutch Reformed Church, 412
 Evangelical Presbyterian Church in, 488
 Methodist Church of, 158, 861–862,
 910, 1237
 Uniting Reformed Church in, 1198,
 1376
 Zion Christian Church, 1456–1457
 Zionist and Apostolic Churches, 1456,
 1457–1458
 South Africa General Mission, 56, 899,
 1345
 South African Assemblies of God of Nicholas Bhengu, 1456
 South African Baptist Alliance, 127
 South American Evangelical Mission, 73
 South American Missionary Society,
 54–55, 73, 491
 South Andhra Evangelical Lutheran Church, 1362
 South India Church of God, 635
 South India Full Gospel Church, 635
 South India United Church, 335
 South Indian Conference of the Methodist
 Episcopal Church, 858
 South Korea, 756–760. See also Korea
 South Korea, Presbyterian Church in,
 1031–1032
 Southern Baptist Convention, 41–42,
 1199–1200 *
 Spain, 1200–1206
 Spangenberg, August, 883, 885
 Spangler, David, 938, 939
 Spanish American Inland Mission, 569
 Spanish Christian Church, 1206
 Spanish Evangelical Church, 1203,
 1206–1207
 Spanish Reformation Church, 1206
 Spanish Reformed Episcopal Church,
 1203, 1207
 Spartas, Reuben, 22, 976
 Spaulding, Justin, 849
 Spener, Phillip Jacob, 479
 Spiegel, Charles, 1325
 Spinoza, Baruch, 997
 Spiritans, 600
 Spiritism and mediumistic religions, 1,
 131, 938, 1207–1208, 1214
 Candomblé, 166–167, 220, 1130, 1324
 Caodaism (Vietnam), 221
 Espiritismo (Puerto Rico), 436–437
 Garífuna, 529–530
 Palo Mayombe, 993
 in Portugal, 1028
 Rada Religion, 1059
 Santería, 145, 376, 437, 1054, 1121,
 1130, 1443
 traditional African religions, 1292,
 1295–1296
 Umbanda, 74, 166–167, 220,
 1324–1325, 1385
 Vodou, 145, 437, 578, 579, 1130,
 1402–1404
 Spirit-type African churches, 14
 Spiritual Baptists, 131, 715, 1120,
 1208–1209, 1120, 1297
 Spiritual Christian Evangelical church, 66
 Spiritual churches, 15–16
 Spiritual Churches (Ghana), 1210
 Spiritual Churches (Kenya), 1210–1211
 Spiritual Counterfeits Project, 798
 Spiritual Healing Church, 158, 326,
 1211–1213
 Spiritual Human Yoga, 1213
 Spiritual Science movements, 955
 Spiritualism, 937, 1207–1208, 1213–1215
 Association for Research and Enlightenment, 89–90, 938, 939
 channeling, 1215
 Church of the White Eagle Lodge,
 345–346
 National Spiritualist Association of Churches, 918–919
 pseudoscience, 1331
 See also Spiritism and mediumistic religions; Theosophical Society
 Spiritualist Church of England, 345
 Spirit-writing cults, 255
 Spriggs, Albert Eugene (Gene), 1311–1312
 Springs of Living Water Church, 569
 Spurgeon, Charles, 126
 Spurgeon, Thomas, 126
 Spurling, Richard Green, 317
 Sri Aurobindo Ashram, 626, 1215–1216
 Sri Chinmoy Centers International, 1216
 Sri Lanka, 1216–1219
 All Ceylon Buddhist Congress, 37
 Church of, 305, 327, 335–336, 1218
 Hinduism in, 1219–1220
 Methodist Church in, 336, 862–863,
 1218
 The Pentecostal Mission, 1005–1006
 Young Men's Buddhist Association,
 1444–1445
 Sri Sathya Saj Baba Organization of
 Guyana, 578
 Sridhar Maharaja, Srila, 1404
 Standerin, Ann Lee, 1368
 Stanley, Charles, 662
 Stanley, Henry, 1315, 1316
 Starhawk, 555, 1418
 Steenoven, Cornelis, 969
 Steiner, Rudolf, 58–59, 274, 618, 1416
 Stella Maris Gnostic Church, 1220
 Stephan, Martin, 804
 Stetson, Augusta, 314
 Stewart, Clive Thomas, 1152
 Stewart, Gary Lee, 47
 Stewart, Joseph, 66
 Sthanakavasi Svetambara tradition, 710,
 1221–1222
 Stillwell, William, 20
 Stone, Barton W., 88, 270, 271, 272, 349, 1424
 Stone, Merlin, 1418
 Strachan, Kenneth, 570
 Strauss, Carl Theodor, 193, 812
 Stroup, John, 661
 Studd, C. T., 435
 Student Christian Movement, 1425
 Sturluson, Snorri, 392
 Subba Rao Movement, 634
 Subud, 119, 378, 721, 1223
 Sudan, 1224–1126
 Sudan, Church in the Province of, 302–303
 Sudan, Presbyterian Church in the, 1032
 Sudan Council of Churches, 7
 Sudan Interior Church, 1226
 Sudan Interior Mission, 443, 466, 950, 954,
 1226, 1345, 1421
 Sudan Presbyterian Evangelical Church,
 1226
 Sudan United Mission, 458–459, 1226
 Sudanese Church of Christ, 1226
 Sufi Islamia Ruhaniat Society, 1228
 The Sufi Movement, 631, 1227–1228, 1230
 Sufi Order International, 631, 1228–1229, 1230
 Sufism, 685, 1229–1231
 Alevism (Alevis, Alawis), 33–35,
 132–133, 545, 695, 728, 778, 1248,
 1250, 1306
 Bektashi, 34, 132–133, 378, 1230
 in Brunei, 177
 Chistiyya Order, 263–264, 631, 712,
 1228, 1230
 Hamaliyya (or Hamilliyya), 228, 824
 Mevlevi order, 378, 397, 864–865, 1230, 1305
 Muridiyya, 527, 900–901, 1148
 Naqshbandiyya Order, 96, 101, 238,
 910–911
 Shâdhiliyya Order, 1155, 1225
 Subud, 119, 378, 721, 1223
 Suhrawardiyya Order, 667, 1230, 1231
 Tijâniyya Order, 35, 145, 207, 215, 228,
 358, 572, 789, 824, 949, 953, 1148,
 1225, 1230, 1280–1282
 Yasawiyya, 1230
 Sufism Reoriented, 842
 Suh Sang-Yoon, 1038
 Suharto, 641, 721
 Suhrawardi, Abu Haf's'Umar al-, 1231

- Suhrawardi, Abu'Najib al-, 1231
 Suhrawardiyya Sufi Order, 667, 1230, 1231
 Sukarno, 641, 721
 Sūkyō Mahikari, 168, 808, 1231–1232
 Sulawesi, Christian Churches in, 271, 272
 Sulawesi, Protestant Church in Southeast, 1049–1050
 Sumarah, 721, 1232–1233
 Summit Lighthouse, 347, 614
 Summit University, 347
 Sumohadiwidjojo, Muhammad Subuh, 1223
 Sundkler, Bengt, 13
 Sunni Islam, 685
 Hanbalite School of, 581–582
 Ibadhi Islam, 35, 615
 in Iraq, 672–673
 Malikite school of, 825
 See also Hanafite School of Islam;
 Islam; Malikite School of Islam;
 Wahhabi Islam
 Sun-tzu, 256
 Superet Light Doctrinal Church, 996
 Suriname, 1233–1234
 Suriname, Moravian Church in, 888–889
 Suriname Committee of Christian Churches, 1234
 Suso, Henry, 408
 Suun, Ch'oe, 265
 Suzuki, D. T., 193, 719, 1084
 Svalbard and Jan Mayen Islands, 1234–1235
 Svarupananda, Jagat Guru Siddha, 532
 Svetambaras, 629
 Swaggart, Jimmy, 570
 Swain, Clara A., 852
 Swami, Narayanswarupdas (Pramukh), 1235
 Swami, Sahajanand, 1235
 Swami Sivananda Escuela De Yoga Para, 1395
 Swaminarayan Hinduism, 1235–1236
 Swaminarayan International, 1390
 Swazi Christian Church in Zion of South Africa, 1237
 Swaziland, 1236–1237
 Sweden, 1237–1240
 Sweden, Church of, 336–337, 436, 441, 474, 478, 871, 1194, 1238, 1262, 1355
 Swedenborg, Emmanuel, 534, 1241, 1242, 1415
 Swedenborgian Church, 534
 Swedenborgian Church of North America, 1241–1242
 Swedenborgian movement, 230, 1240, 1242–1243
 Swedish Assemblies of God, 236, 812
 Swedish Baptist Mission, 228
 Swedish Evangelical Mission, 355, 436, 445, 1355
 Swedish Evangelical Mission Covenant Church, 468
 Swedish Free Mission, 209
 Swedish Holiness Union Mission, 158
 Swedish Lutheran Mission, 443, 468, 469
 Swedish Mission of the True Bible Friends, 445, 474
 Swedish-Norwegian Assemblies of God, 73
 Sweet Heart of the Clouds, 905, 1449
 Swift, Jonathan, 518
 Swing, William E., 1368
 Swiss Brethren, 169
 Swiss Missionary Society (Reformed), 1337
 Swiss Protestant Churches, Federation of, 131, 498–499, 1246
 Swiss Reformed Churches, 457
 Switzerland, 1243–1247
 Switzerland, Old Catholic Church in, 661, 966
 Sydney Humanist Association, 608
 Symington, James, 1020
 Syria, 1247–1251
 Syria, National Evangelical Synod of, 917–918
 Syriac Orthodox Patriarchate of Antioch and All the East, 99, 777, 780, 1239, 1248, 1251–1252, 1253, 1254, 1300
 Syrian Catholic Church, 673, 780, 1251, 1252
 Syrian Church, Malankara Orthodox, 815–816
 Syrian Church of Malabar, Mar Thoma, 830
 Syrian Orthodox Church, 561, 562, 635
 Syrian Orthodox Church of Antioch, 285, 728, 830, 842
 Syrian Orthodox Church of Malabar, 974, 1252–1253, 1254
 Syro-Jacobite Church of Malabar, 21
 Syro-Malabar Catholic Church, 815, 1253–1254
 Syro-Malankara Catholic Church, 816, 1254–1255
 Taara-believers, 438, 440
 Tabor, Franz, 156
 Tabwia, Timoteo, 922
 Tagore, Devendranath, 160, 624
 Tagore, Rabindranath, 643
 Tahiti, 459, 520
 Tai Hsu, 186, 200
 Taiping, 386
 Taisen, Deshimaru, 664–665
 Taiwan, 239, 244–246
 Buddhist associations, 200–201
 Chen Tao, 232–233
 Presbyterian Church in, 1031
 Taixu, 249
 Taizan Maezumic Daiocho, 1418
 Tajikistan, 1256–1257
 Takatomi, Senge, 705
 Takeyasu, Miyamoto, 908
 Talib, Ali ibn Abi, 615, 1157
 Taliban, 5, 6, 28, 693, 713, 1257–1259
 Tallen, William, 486
 Tambe, Daniel, 1392
 Tambor de Mina, 220
 Tamil Evangelical Lutheran Church, 1362
 Tamil Saivism, 820, 1121, 1259–1260
 Tani, Grace, 1210
 Taniguchi, Masaharu, 1145
 Tantrayana, 1260, 1261
 Tantrism, 190, 622–623, 1156, 1260–1261
 Tanzania, 7, 414, 1261–1263
 Tanzania, Church in the Province of, 303, 1262
 Tanzania, Moravian Church in, 889–890
 Tao Te Ching (Daodejing), 385, 386
 Taoism. See Daoism
 Taoist Tai Chi Society, 1263–1264
 Tariq, 527
 Tarot, 203
 Tarthang Tulku Rinpoche, 1279–1280
 Tashimungu, Josue, 313
 Tasmania, 50
 Tauler, Johannes, 408
 Taylor, Clark, 277
 Taylor, Gardner C., 1046
 Taylor, James, 1019
 Taylor, James, Jr., 1019–1020
 Taylor, William, 56, 235, 357, 849, 850, 852, 855, 860, 898
 Taylor Brethren, 269
 Taymiyya, Ahmad ibn, 581
 Tayyibiyya, 423
 Te Ua Haumene, 830
 Teague, Colin, 788, 789
 Tegetmeyer, Sylvester, 776
 Tegucigalpa Friends Mission, 604
 Teitelbaum, Yoel, 935, 1137
 Temple, Robert K. G., 403
 Temple, William, 1425
 Temple Apostolic, 207
 Temple of Set, 330
 Tendai, 717, 1277
 Tendzin, Osel, 1157
 Tengerianism, 1105
 Tenrikyō, 168, 356, 606, 718, 719, 754, 1264–1265
 Tenshō Kōtai Jingūkyō, 1265–1266
 Tenzin Gyatso, 191–192
 Terapanth Svetambara Jain tradition, 748, 1221, 1266–1267
 Teresa, Mother, 872
 Tetzl, Johann, 291
 Thai forest monks, 1267–1268
 Thailand, 1268–1270
 Buddhism in, 185
 Buddhist Association of, 199
 Church of Christ in, 307
 Dhammakaya Foundation, 395–396
 forest monks, 1267–1268
 The Saint Asoka, 1131

- Thaye Dorjé, 399
- Themotheios, H. G. Thomas Mor, 1253
- Theodosius, Metropolitan, 601
- Theosophical Society, 59, 74, 97, 194, 202, 347, 552, 557, 639, 643, 748, 761, 786, 937, 996, 1218, 1270–1275, 1321, 1359, 1415, 1445
- Adyar, 1270–1272
- America, 1273–1275
- UFO religions and, 1314
- Theosophist Society, 193
- Theosophists, United Lodge of, 1361–1362
- Theosophy, 554
- Arcane School, 70–71
- Thepmuni, Monkxon, 395
- Theravada Buddhism, 181, 258, 590, 1274–1275
- British Forest Sangha, 169–170
- Buddhasananuggaha Association, 177–178
- Lao Buddhism, 770–772
- Maha Bodhi Society, 812–813
- Singapore and, 1182, 1884
- Sri Lanka and, 1217–1218
- Thai, 1267–1268, 1269
- Vipassana International Academy, 1398–1399
- Third Order of St. Francis, 512
- Thneibat, Abdul Majeed, 904
- Thoburn, Isabella, 852
- Thoburn, James M., 854, 855, 858
- Thomas (Apostle), 283–284
- Thomas, John, 516, 853
- Thompson, Elmer, 465, 487
- Thompson, James, 352, 417
- Thompson, James M. (African American missionary), 432
- Thompson, John F., 486
- Thorgeir of Ljósavatn, 473
- Three-Self Church, 605, 798
- Three-Self Patriotic Movement, 240, 251–252, 605, 798
- Three-Self Patriotic Movement Committee of the Protestant Churches of China, 240
- Threshold Society, 865
- Thubten Zopa Rinpoche, Lama, 508
- Thuc, Pierre-Martin Ngô-Dhinh, 1142
- Thudong tradition, 1267–1268
- Tian Dao, 245, 495, 820, 1275–1277
- Tianran, Zhang, 1275
- Tiantai, 186, 188, 189, 1277
- Tibet, 246–248
- Chinese repression, 190–191
- Tibetan Buddhism, 167, 182, 190–192, 248, 258, 1184, 1277–1279
- in China, 238
- Diamond Way, 398–399
- Drukpa Kagyu (Bhutan), 148, 150
- Foundation for the Preservation of the Mahayana Tradition, 508
- Gelukpa, 532–533
- Kagyupa, 190, 248, 739–740, 742
- Karma-Kagyupa, 248, 398, 739, 742, 748, 1447
- in Mongolia, 880–881
- New Kadampa Tradition (NKT), 533, 940–941
- New Orders, 1278
- Nyingma, 155, 190, 248, 925, 963–964, 1278
- Rigpa Fellowship, 453, 1083–1084
- Sakyapa, 190, 248, 742, 1121–1122
- Sangha Council and, 1423
- Shambhala International (Vajradhatu), 453, 742, 1157
- Tantrism and, 1260
- Western practice, 193, 194–195
- Tibetan Nyingma Institute, 1279–1280
- Tien Dao, 386
- Tiflis sect, 538
- Tijāniyya Sufi Order, 35, 145, 207, 215, 228, 358, 572, 789, 824, 949, 953, 1148, 1225, 1230, 1280–1282
- Timor, 1282–1283
- Timor, Christian Evangelical Church in, 276–277
- Tingley, Katherine, 1272–1273
- Tirtha, Bhakti Ballabh, 531
- Tkach, Joseph W., 797, 1014, 1352, 1434–1435
- Tönisson, Karl, 440
- Toco, Simão, 1283
- Tocoist Church, 57, 1283
- Toda, Josei, 1190
- Togo, 1283–1285
- Togo, Evangelical Church of, 466
- Togo, Evangelical Presbyterian Church of, 488–489
- Togo, Methodist Church of, 862
- Tokelau Islands, 1285–1286
- Tokuharu, Miki, 1012
- Tokumitsu, Kanada, 1012
- Toland, John, 997
- Tolbert, William R., Jr., 790
- Tomlinson, A. J., 318, 321, 1151
- Tomlinson, Milton A., 321
- Tōmoji, Ito, 1161
- Tondrakian movement, 76
- Tonga, 459, 1286–1287
- Tonga, Free Wesleyan Church of, 516
- Tonghak, 265
- Toppi, Francesco, 699
- Toraja Church (GT), 1287–1288
- Toronto Airport Christian Fellowship, 1288
- Torres, Osel Hita, 508
- Townsend, Henry, 301
- Traditional African religions, 1289–1296
- Zulu religion/spirituality, 1464–1465
- Traditional Anglican Communion, 432, 1297
- Trans-Caucasian Union of Baptists, 538
- Transcendental meditation, 543, 545, 698, 899
- World Plan Executive Council, 1429
- Trask, Thomas, 1007
- Tremblay, Gaston, 61, 1144
- Tridzin, Sakya, 1122
- Triennial Convention, 41–42
- Trinidad, Presbyterian Church in, 1032–1033, 1298
- Trinidad and Tobago, 1297–1299
- Hinduism in, 1299–1300
- Trinley, Ugyen, 399, 742
- Trinley Thaye Dorjé, 742
- Tristan de Cunha, 1117
- Troward, Thomas, 1078
- Trowbridge, Carmelita, 1078
- True Bible Friends, 474
- True Buddha School, 820, 1300
- True Friends of the Bible, 443
- True Jesus Church, 70, 239, 240, 242, 246, 759, 821, 1183, 1300–1301
- True (Old Calendar) Orthodox Church of Greece, 559, 1301–1302
- True Pure Land School [Jōdo-Shinshū], 188, 195, 724–725, 1014
- True Spiritist Society, 74
- Truk Islands, 870
- Trumbull, David, 235
- Trungpa Rinpoche, Chögyam, 742, 1157
- Tsonga Presbyterian Church, 488
- Tulku, Chagdud, 963
- Tulku, Tarthang, 1279–1280
- Tulsi, Acarya, 1267
- Tunisia, 1302–1304
- Turabi, Hassan al-, 27
- Turkey, 1304–1309
- Turkish Islamic Union of the Authority of Religion, 546
- Turkish Orthodox Church, 1308
- Turkmenistan, 1309–1310
- Turks and Caicos Islands, 1310–1311
- Turner, Harold, 13
- Turner, Henry McNeal, 19
- Turner, Peter, 359, 853
- Turuki, Te Kooti Arikirangi Te, 830
- Tutu, Desmond, 302, 1198
- Tuvalu, 750, 1311
- Tuvalu Christian Church, 346
- Twelve Apostles Church, 1210
- Twelve Tribes, 1311–1313
- Twelver Shi'a Islam, 102
- Twitchell, Paul, 415–416, 1101, 1180
- Tzong Kuan Buddhist Temple, 74
- Tzu Chi, 200, 201
- UFO religions, 1314
- Raelian Movement International, 1060–1062
- Unarius, 1325
- World Brotherhood Union Mevlana Supreme Foundation, 1422

- Uganda, 894–895, 1315–1317
 Uganda, Church of the Province of, 345
 Uklein, Simeon, 878
 Ukraine, 1317–1321
 Ukraine, Eastern Orthodoxy in, 1321–1323
 Ukraine, Union of Evangelical Christians-Baptists of the, 1339
 Ukrainian Autocephalous Orthodox Church, 1321–1322, 1323
 Ukrainian Great White Brotherhood, 1321
 Ukrainian Greek Catholic Church, 1110, 1322, 1323–1324
 Ukrainian Greek-Catholic Church, 1318–1319
 Ukrainian Orthodox Church, 415, 1108, 1110, 1318, 1322
 Ukrainian Orthodox Church in the U.S.A., 1323
 Ukrainian Orthodox Church of Patriarchate, 1322
 Ukrainian paganism, 1317, 1321
 Umbanda, 74, 166–167, 220, 1324–1325, 1385
 Unarius, 1325
 Unbelief, 1326–1332. See also Atheism
 Underwood, Horace G., 758
 Unevangelized Fields Mission, 577
 Unification Church, 1333–1335
 Unification Movement, 74, 77, 215, 650, 665–666, 759, 1333–1335
 Unified Buddhist Church, 1336
 Unified Buddhist Church of Vietnam, 187, 1335–1336, 1398
 União de Vegetal, 168
 Union Católica Trento, 1143
 Union d'Églises Baptistes Françaises au Canada, 1336–1337
 Union of Baptist Churches of Cameroon, 215, 1337
 Union of Baptist Congregations, 773
 Union of Baptists and Evangelical Christians in Soviet Union, 439
 Union of Evangelical Christian-Baptists of Central Asia, 1310, 1388
 Union of Evangelical Christians-Baptists, 101, 135
 Union of Evangelical Christians–Baptists of Russia, 767, 876, 1338–1339
 Union of Evangelical Christians–Baptists of the Ukraine, 1339
 Union of Evangelical Free Church Congregations (Baptist), 1339–1340
 Union of Evangelical Protestant Churches of Niger, 950
 Union of Free Evangelical Churches, 656
 Union of Hungarian Baptist Churches, 126
 Union of Indonesian Baptist Churches, 1340
 Union of Latvian Old Believer Congregations, 773
 Union of Messianic Congregations, 1340–1341
 Union of Muslims of Russia, 1106
 Union of Orthodox Jewish Congregations, 984
 Union of Sephardic Congregations, 1432
 Union of Spiritual Communities in Christ, 409
 Union of the Armenian Evangelical Church in the Near East, 378, 1341–1342
 Union of Utrecht, 970
 Union of Welsh Independents, 360, 1342
 Unitarian Church, 1096
 Unitarian Church in Romania, 1343
 Unitarian Universalist Association, 608, 1342–1343
 Unitarianism:
 International Council of Unitarians and Universalists, 654–655
 Philippine Independent Church, 1015
 Polish, 135
 Unitas Fratrum, 379, 884
 United African Methodist Church, 954
 United Andean Mission, 418
 United Arab Emirates, 1343–1345
 United Baptist Church, 899
 United Baptist Church (Mozambique), 1345
 United Brethren in Christ, 603, 1172, 1362
 United Buddhism Church, 511
 United Christian Church of Africa, 1237
 United Church in Jamaica and the Cayman Islands, 224, 714, 1345–1346
 United Church in Papua New Guinea, 1193, 1346
 United Church of Canada, 147, 216, 296, 468, 1030, 1346–1347
 United Church of Ceylon, 863
 United Church of Christ, 270, 273, 360, 466, 468, 489, 651, 833, 871, 1250, 1284, 1347–1349, 1373
 United Church of Christ, an International Association, 1352
 United Church of Christ, Congregational in the Marshall Islands, 1349
 United Church of Christ in Japan, 601, 720, 760, 1349–1350
 United Church of Christ in the Philippines, 1017, 1349, 1350–1351
 United Church of Christ in Zimbabwe, 1351–1352
 United Church of God, 4, 1352, 1435
 United Church of Japan, 603, 1349
 United Church of Micronesia, 871
 United Church of North India, 119
 United Church of Papua New Guinea and the Solomon Islands, 998, 1352
 United Church of Religious Science (UCRS), 147, 571, 1078–1079
 United Church of the Solomon Islands, 998, 1193, 1352–1363
 United Church of Zambia, 1353, 1449
 United Congregational Church of Southern Africa, 158, 910, 1198, 1353–1354, 1356
 United Divine Science Ministries, 660
 United Divine Science Ministries, International, 400–401
 United Evangelical Church, Anglican Communion of Angola, 56, 489, 1354
 United Evangelical Church in India, 634
 United Evangelical Church of Argentina, 73
 United Evangelical Church of Christ, 1351
 United Evangelical Lutheran Church (UELC), 1354–1355
 United Evangelical Lutheran Church in India, 633, 1355–1356
 United Evangelical Lutheran Church of Germany, 456
 United Evangelical Mission, 132, 1082
 United Evangelical Mission-Community of Churches on Three Continents, 1083
 United Free Church of Scotland, 489, 548, 1284, 1362
 United Gospel Church, 995
 United Kingdom, 1356–1361
 United Kingdom, United Reformed Church of the, 1366–1368
 United Lodge of Theosophists, 1361–1362
 United Lutheran Church in America, 470
 United Methodist Church, 296, 328, 847, 848, 961, 1183, 1362–1363, 1428, 1453, 1455. See also Methodist Episcopal Church *
 United Methodist Church of South Africa, 862
 United Methodist Free Churches, 847, 857, 859
 United Molokan Christian Association, 878
 United Native African Church, 146, 233–234, 954
 United Pentecostal Church, 353, 1364
 United Pentecostal Church International, 63, 67, 70, 141, 236, 407, 427, 604, 1004, 1008, 1127, 1363–1364, 1395
 United Pentecostal Church of Colombia, 353
 United Presbyterian Church of Belgium, 137, 1365
 United Presbyterian Church of Brazil, 1365
 United Presbyterian Church of North America, 918
 United Presbyterian Church of Pakistan, 991
 United Protestant Church of Aruba, 84

- United Protestant Church, 1225, 1250, 1365, 1375
- United Protestant Church of Netherlands Antilles, 1366
- United Reformed Church, 230, 360, 651, 1360
- United Reformed Church of the United Kingdom, 1366–1368
- United Religions Initiative, 1368
- United Rhenish Missionary Society, 1082
- United Society for the Propagation of the Gospel, 548, 1189
- United Society of Believers in Christ's Second Appearing, 1368–1370
- United States of America, 1370–1375
- United Synagogue of Conservative Judaism, 360
- United Vietnamese Buddhist Congregation in Australia, 96
- United World Mission, 569
- Uniting Church in Australia, 96, 296, 516, 851, 859, 998, 1375
- Uniting Presbyterian Church in Southern Africa, 1198, 1375–1376
- Uniting Reformed Church in South Africa, 1198, 1376
- Unity School of Christianity, 73, 131, 141, 314, 368, 400, 427, 618, 1078, 1376–1378
- Unity-Progressive Council, 1377
- Universal (and) Human Energy, 1213
- Universal Christian Council of Life and Work, 1425
- Universal Christian Gnostic Church, 553
- Universal Church of God of Prophecy, 426
- Universal Church of the Kingdom of God, 166, 368, 427, 869, 1378
- Universal Faithists of Kosmon, 1378–1379
- Universal Fellowship of Metropolitan Community Churches, 1379–1380
- Universal Gnostic Church, 552
- Universal Gnostic Movement, 74
- Universal Great Brotherhood, 1380
- Universal Life, 358, 1381
- Universal Pantheist Society, 997
- Universal Soul, 1381–1382
- Universal White Brotherhood, 513
- Universalist Church of America, 1343
- Universalists, International Council of Unitarians and, 654–655
- Universelles Leben, 358, 1381
- Universities Mission to Central Africa, 1454
- Upper Volta, 207
- URANTIA Foundation, 1382–1383
- Urgyen Trinley Dorjé, 742
- Urshan, Nathaniel A., 1364
- Ursulines, 1383
- Uruguay, 1383–1385
- Uruguay, Evangelical Methodist Church of, 486
- U.S. Virgin Islands, 1400–1401
- Usuli, 1159
- Uzbekistan, 1385–1388
- Vachon, Louis-Albert Cardinal, 81
- Vahindra, 440
- Vahosanna, 69
- Vaishnava bhakti, 632
- Vaisnava Mission, 74
- Vaisnavism, 530–532, 621, 623, 839, 1121, 1389–1390
- Gaudiya, 373, 530–532, 1121, 1432–1433
- Swaminarayan Hinduism, 1235–1236
- VRINDA, 1404
- World Vaisnava Association, 1432–1433
- See also International Society for Krishna Consciousness
- Vajradhatu, 742, 1157
- Valbuena, Joaquín Enrique Amortegui, 553
- Valiente, Doreen, 988, 1418
- Vamatenga, 814
- Van der Kamp, Johannes, 1353
- Van Tassel, George, 1314
- Vanags, Janis, 776
- Vanuatu, 1390–1392
- Vanuatu, Presbyterian Church of, 1040–1041
- Vapostori (Apostles), 8
- Varick, James, 20
- Vatican, 701, 1093
- Veda, 588–589, 619
- Vedanta Societies, 74, 592, 625, 839, 1392–1393
- Veli, Haji Bektash, 132
- Venezuela, 1393–1395
- Venezuelan Organization of the Christian Evangelical Church, 1395
- Veniainoiv, John (St. Innocent), 977
- Verback, Guido F., 1349
- Verigin, Peter Vasilevich, 409
- Vernon, Leroy Monroe, 485
- Vick, G. Beauchamp, 121
- Vietnam, 1395–1398
- Vietnam, Evangelical Churches of, 467–468
- Vietnam, Unified Buddhist Church of, 1335–1336
- Vietnamese Buddhism, 187, 1335–1336
- Hoa Hao Buddhism, 598–600
- Vietnamese indigenous religion (Caodism or Dao Cao Dai), 221
- Vilatte, Joseph Rene, 21, 551
- Vingren, Gunnar, 86
- Vipassana International Academy, 1398–1399
- Vipassana Meditation Centres, 907
- Virasaivism, 1121, 1399–1400
- Virgin Islands of the United States, 1400–1401
- Vishva Hindu Parishad, 578, 634, 1401–1402
- Visible Salvation Church, 1449
- Vision of the Future, 73
- Visuombye, 1100
- Vivekananda, 592, 625, 1156, 1392
- Vodou, 145, 437, 578, 579, 1130, 1402–1404
- Voice of Daniel, 1392
- Voice of God Church, 571
- Voice of God Evangelical Church, 569
- Voice of the Chief Cornerstone, 368, 996
- Voice of the Cornerstone, 73, 427, 571, 869
- Voliva, Wilbur, 68
- Voltaire, 1328
- Von Helder, Sérgio, 1378
- Vorilhon, Claude, 1060–1061, 1314
- VRINDA, 531, 1404, 1433
- Vrindavan Institute for Vaisnava Culture and Studies, 1404
- Waddilove Institute, 856
- Wagner, Norman L., 1004
- Wahhab, Muhammad ibn Abd-al-, 689, 692, 1140
- Wahhabi Islam, 5, 117, 119, 423, 578, 582, 689, 692, 766, 1057, 1140, 1230, 1250, 1257, 1387, 1405–1406
- Wahid, Abdurrahman, 641
- Waithaka, James N., 10
- Wake Island, 1406–1407
- Waldensian Church, 486, 786, 1385, 1406–1407
- Waldorf Schools, 59
- Wales, Church in, 304–305, 1342
- Wales, Presbyterian Church of, 1041
- Wall, George Wendelin, 1348
- Wallis et Futuna Islands, 1407
- Walloon Church, 934
- Walters, Alexander, 21
- Walters, J. Donald, 1147
- Walther, Carl Ferdinand Wilhelm, 804
- Wambugu, Njeru, 977
- Wangpo, Jamyang Khyentse, 963
- Waring, David, 140
- Warith Deen Mohammad, Ministry of, 1407–1408
- Warner, Daniel, 317
- Warren, George, 848, 861
- Warriors of Christ, 77
- Watanabe, Tetsuo, 1146
- Watchman Nee, 797–799
- Watkins, Owen, 855
- Watson, David, 651
- The Way International, 1408–1410
- Way of the Heart, 3
- Wedgwood, James Ingall, 786–787
- Weinstein, Marion, 1418
- Welsh Independence, Union of, 1342
- Wenas, A. Z. R., 276
- Weor, Samuel Aun, 74, 552, 553

- Wesley, John, 515, 599, 694, 846–847, 851, 852, 884, 1008, 1041, 1358, 1362
- Wesleyan Church, 60, 130, 225, 603, 1410–1412
- Wesleyan Conference, 848
- Wesleyan Free Church, 1298
- Wesleyan Methodist Association, 847
- Wesleyan Methodist Church, 139, 603, 861, 1410
- Wesleyan Methodist Church of New Zealand, 859
- Wesleyan Methodist Church of South Africa, 862
- Wesleyan Methodist Connection, 1198
- Wesleyan Methodist Missionary Society, 847, 848, 849, 853
- West African Methodist Church, 861
- West Indies Mission, 487
- Western Buddhist Order, Friends of the, 1412–1413
- Western esoteric tradition, 168, 517, 554, 936, 938, 1413–1416
- Weston, Mark (Omar), 869
- Westrup, Thomas, 916
- Wettergren, Paul Peter, 482
- White, Ellen G., 4, 150, 1152, 1153, 1434
- White, J. S., 1311
- White, James, 4
- White, John, 855
- White, William, 431
- White Brotherhood, 205, 513, 1416–1417
- White Cross Society, 487
- White Eagle Lodge, Church of the, 345–346
- White Fathers, 207, 748, 817, 1112–1113, 1262, 1316, 1417–1418
- White Lotus Society, 260
- White Plum Asanga, 1418
- Whitefield, George, 1041, 1042
- Whitehead, Alfred North, 997
- Wicca, 451, 555, 1418–1419
 Circle Sanctuary, 350
 Gardnerian, 528–529, 555
 Pagan Federation, 988
See also Paganism
- Wierville, Victor Paul, 1408–1409
- Wilberforce University, 20
- Wilkes, Amy Elizabeth, 117
- Willermoz, Jean-Baptiste, 835
- William Branham Evangelistic Association, 162
- William Wade Harris Twelve Apostles Church, 1210
- Williams, Channing M., 603, 1349
- Williams, John, 358, 363, 1040, 1126, 1391
- Williams, Roger, 40, 129, 1347
- Williams, William Jones, 65
- Willy, Maurice, 772
- Wilson, John (British Israelism), 171
- Wilson, John (Native American Church), 919
- Wilson, Lois, 1347
- Wilson Big Moon, 919
- Wimber, John, 232
- Wine, Sherwin T., 657
- Winn, Michael, 584
- Winners Chapel, 955
- Wisconsin Evangelical Lutheran Church, 817
- Wisconsin Evangelical Lutheran Synod, 205, 1419–1420
- Wise, Isaac, 983, 1065
- Witmer, Peter, 169
- Witteck, Gabriele, 1381
- Wolff, Joseph, 432
- Woman's American Baptist Home Mission Society, 120
- Woman's Foreign Missionary Society, 852
- Women's Parent Mite Missionary Society, 19
- Won Buddhism, 188, 757, 1423
- Wongsonogoro, 722
- Wood, A. Garves, 361
- Wood, Elsie, 860
- Wood, F. W., 123
- Wood, Thomas B., 486, 860
- Woodroffe, John, 555
- Word Alliance of Reformed Churches, 1424
- Word of Life [Livets Ord], 1240
- Word of Life Church [Kale Haywet], 444, 445, 1421
- World Alliance for International Friendship, 1425
- World Alliance of Reformed Churches (WARC), 208, 298, 651, 1076 * apartheid and, 1376
- World Baptist Fellowship, 120–121
- World Brotherhood Union Mevlana Supreme Foundation, 1422
- World Buddhist Sangha Council, 96, 1422–1423
- World Christian Church, 570
- World Community of al-Islam in the West, 1408
- World Conference on Religion and Peace, 1423
- World Congress of Faiths, 1424
- World Convention of Churches of Christ, 899, 1424–1425
- World Council of Biblical Churches, 1425
- World Council of Churches (WCC), 296, 652, 1071, 1353, 1425–1425 *
 World Evangelical Alliance, 296, 1426–1427 *
 World Evangelical Crusade, 527, 1075
 World Evangelical Fellowship, 1427, 1430
 World Evangelism crusade, 705
 World Evangelization Crusade, 458
- World Fellowship of Buddhists (WFB), 37, 99, 199, 721, 1182, 1269, 1427–1428
- World Fellowship of Reformed Churches, 1430
- World Holding the Presbyterian Order, 1421
- World Islamic Front, 27, 28, 631
- World Jewish Congress, 737
- World Mennonite Conference, 91
- World Message Last Warning Church, 1316
- World Methodist Council, 847, 1428–1429*
- World Mission and Prayer League, 153, 329
- World Muslim Conference, 1194
- World Muslim Congress, 1148, 1431
- World Muslim League, 692
- World Network of Marian Devotion, 298, 498, 831–832, 988
- World Pantheist Union, 997
- World Pentecostal Conference, 649
- World Plan Executive Council, 899, 1432
- World Reformed Fellowship, 1430–1431
- World Sephardic Federation, 1431–1432
- World Team (formerly Worldteam), 361, 466, 487
- World Union for Progressive Judaism, 737, 1064
- World Union of Freethinkers, 519
- World Vaisnava Association, 531, 1432–1433
- World Wide Missionary Movement, 995
- World Zionist Organization, 361
- World Zoroastrian Organization, 1433–1434, 1463
- Worldwide Church of Christ, 1352
- Worldwide Church of God, 4, 171, 320, 797, 1014–1015, 1372, 1434–1435
- Worldwide Evangelization Crusade (WEC), 435, 574
- Wovenu, Charles Kobla, 1210
- Wright, John, 1423
- Wu Bong, 765
- Wümpermann, Knud, 124
- Wycliffe, John, 289, 379, 1357
- Wyth, Peyton, 1367
- Xango, 220
- Xango Aganyu African Temple, 74
- Xavier, Chico, 1208
- Xavier, Francis, 633, 723, 820, 1050
- Xiuquan, Hong, 260
- Yahweh ben Yahweh, 913
- Yamada Koun ZenshinRoshi, 397, 1128
- Yaozong, Wu, 251–252
- Yap Islands, 870
- Yasawi, Ahmad, 132

- Yasawiyya, 1230
 Yasutani Haku'un Ryoko Roshi, 1128
 Yazidi, 673
 Yeboa-Korie, Charles, 1210
 Yee, Sayagi U Tint, 659
 Yellow Turbans, 386
 Yemen, 1436–1438, 1449–1450
 Yemenite Ismailis, 151
 Yeo, William Nyogen, 1418
 Yeshe, Lama Thubten, 508
 Yezidis, 538, 1248, 1438–1440
 Yiguando (Tian Dao), 245, 495, 820, 1275–1277
 Yin-yang, 256, 259
 Yoga Fellowship Movement, International, 663–664
 Yogananda, Parmahansa, 1147
 Yogendra, Shri, 1441
 Yogi tradition, 622, 1440–1441. See also Hinduism
 Yoido Full Gospel Church, 391, 759, 864, 1008, 1009, 1263, 1441
 Yoruban religion, 145, 951, 993, 1121, 1130, 1290, 1291, 1442–1443
 Yoshikazu, Okada, 1231
 Yoshio, Hase, 1076
 Young, Brigham, 323–324, 1080
 Young, Florence S. H., 1193
 Young Buddhist Association of Malaysia, 820, 1443
 Young Israel, 984, 1064, 1444
 Young Men's Buddhist Association, 1444–1445
 Younghusband, Francis, 1424
 Youth with a Mission, 955
 Yugoslavia, 372–373, 809, 1445–1447
 Bosnia and Herzegovina, 155–157
 Slovak Evangelical Church of the Augsburg Confession in, 1185, 1439
 Yugoslavia, Reformed Christian Church in, 1067–1068, 1447
 Yugoslavia Mission Conference, 1447
 Yukteswar, Sri, 1147
 Yuvacarya, Mahasraman, 1267
 Yu-wei, K'Anglican, 640
 Zadruga, 1086
 Zaire, 356–358
 Zaire, Churches of Christ in the Congo, 307–313. See also Church of Christ in the Congo
 Zakkai, Johann ben, 733
 Zalman, Schneur, 800
 Zalwenu, Abojevi, 1059
 Zambia, 1448–1449
 Zambia, Reformed Church in, 1070, 1449
 Zambia, United Church of, 1353
 Zamora, Nicolas, 483, 1351
 ZAOGA, 1455–1456
 Zarathustra, 666, 1459
 Zareh I of Cilicia, 79
 Zawahiri, Ayman al-, 28, 904
 Zayd b. Ali, 1158–1159
 Zaydites, 151, 812, 1159, 1449–1450
 Zen, 186, 238, 243, 258, 397, 1450–1451
 Diamond Sangha, 194, 397–398, 1128
 International Zen Association, 664–665
 The Kwan Um School of Zen, 765–766
 Rinzai, 186, 189, 397, 717, 1084, 1128, 1450
 Sanbō Kyōdan, 397, 1128
 Soto, 186, 189, 717, 1194–1195, 1450
 Tantrism and, 1260
 Western practice, 193, 195
 White Plum Asanga, 1418
 See also Ch'an Buddhism; Japanese Buddhism
 Zenana Missionary Society, 305
 Zhengyi Daoism, 33, 240, 387–388, 1058, 1451–1452
 Zhihong, Yuan, 250
 Zhiting, Min, 250
 Zhiyi, 1277
 Zhong Gong, 1452–1453
 Ziegenbalg, Bartholomäus, 633, 1355
 Zimbabwe, 8, 783, 1453–1455
 Evangelical Lutheran Church in, 478
 Mai Chaza Church, 814
 Methodist Church in, 855–856, 1455
 United Church Christ in, 1351–1352
 Zion Christian Church, 1456–1457
 Zionist and Apostolic Churches, 1456, 1457–1458
 Zimbabwe Assemblies of God, 232, 1455
 Zimbabwe Assemblies of God Africa (ZAOGA), 16, 1455–1456
 Zimbabwe Council of Churches, 1455
 Zimmerman, Thomas F., 1007
 Zingyun, 507
 Zinzendorf, Nikolaus Ludwig von, 883, 884, 886
 Zion Apostolic Church of South Africa, 1456, 1458
 Zion Apostolic City, 1458
 Zion Apostolic Faith Mission, 1456
 Zion Christian Church, 12, 15, 68, 158, 784, 1455, 1456–1457
 Zion Protestant Church, 1458
 Zionist and Apostolic Churches, 1455, 1456, 1457–1458
 Zionist-type African churches, 12–13
 Zlaventre, Leonti Izot, 972
 Zoroastrianism, 101, 238, 243, 634, 666–667, 1459–1463
 Mazdaznan, 840
 World Zoroastrian Organization, 1433–1434
 Zulu Christianity, AmaNazaretha, 12, 924–925
 Zulu religion, 1295, 1464–1465
 Zurenuo, Zurewe K., 482
 Zwemer, Samuel, 117, 765, 974, 1068, 1141, 1344, 1438
 Zwingli, Huldrych, 1243
 Zwingli, Ulrich, 291, 498, 514
 Zwingli-Unity, 933