The Harrist movement, sparked by the ministry of the Liberian prophet William Wade Harris (1860–1929), resulted in the HARRIST CHURCH and many other African churches in the Cote d'Ivoire, including the Church of Boto Adai, the Church of Papa Nouveau, and Crastchotche (originally Christ Church), founded by the Prophet Makoui in 1935. Most significantly, as was characteristic of many other AFRICAN INITIATED CHURCHES (AICs), two of these Ivorian movements were founded by women. Marie Lalou, who claimed to be the true successor to Harris, rejected the "foreign gods" of the missionaries (which had caused the return of evil spirits), and founded the Église Déimatiste (Deima Church) in 1942. This movement, which has instituted women as successive leaders since Lalou's death in 1951, has become the second largest AIC in the Ivory Coast.

Another movement separated from Deima after its female founder, Ble Nahi, had claimed to be Marie Lalou's true successor, changing her name to Jesus Onoi. When Ble Nahi died in 1958, however, two male prophets succeeded her. Both movements deriving from Lalou advocate the celibacy of their women leaders, healing and protection by holy water and ashes, and the rejection of fetishes, witchcraft, and the reading (or even the touching) of the Bible, a magical book. Both women founders received visions after a time of illness or extreme trouble, much in the same way that traditional healers are called to their profession. There were many other schisms in the Harrist movement during this time. Most of these churches have certain rituals in common, following the example of Harris. Harris's baptism, his clothes, his ritual accoutrements (the cross, bowl, and rattle), and the use of holy water for healing and protection, all these liturgical practices are common to most of these groups. It appears, however, that traditional meanings have been given to these symbols, quite different from the meanings intended by Harris.

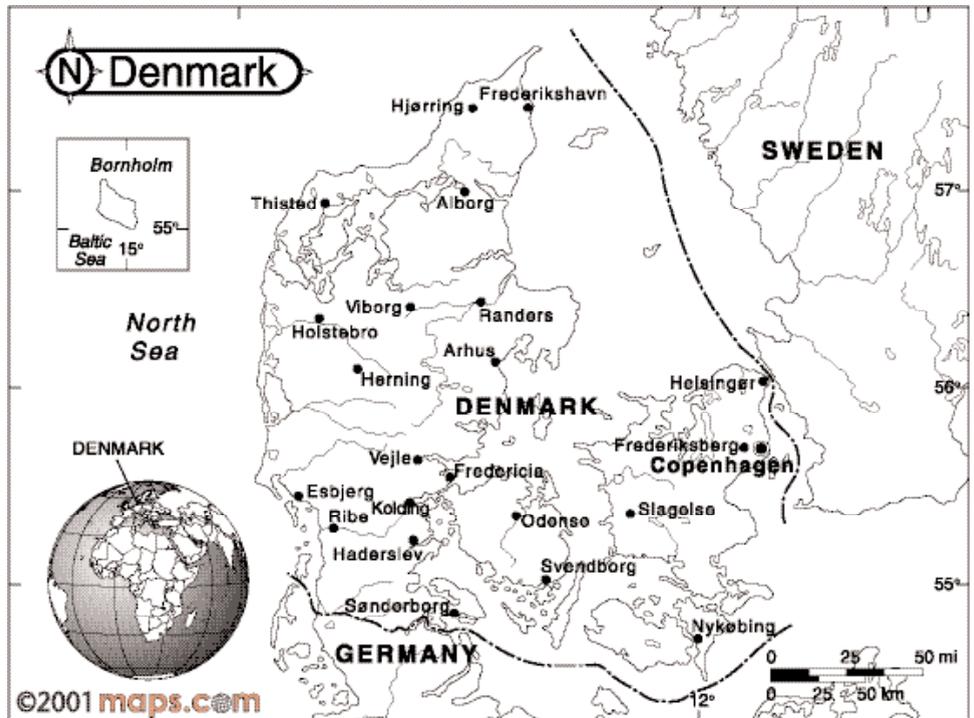

Allan H. Anderson

Sources:

Walker, Sheila S. "The Message as the Medium: The Harrist Churches of the Ivory Coast and Ghana." In African Christianity: Patterns of Religious Continuity, edited by G. Bond, W. Johnson, and S. Walker. New York: Academic Press, 1979.

———. "Women in the Harrist Movement." In The New Religions of Africa, edited by B. Jules-Rosette. Norwood, NJ: Ablex, 1979.

———. The Religious Revolution in the Ivory Coast: The Prophet Harris and the Harrist Church. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1983.

Denmark

In a prehistoric context, Denmark must be regarded as a part of Northern Europe. We have only scant information about the religions of the first hunter-gatherers and the first agriculturists in paleo- and neolithicum, but the latter left behind a large number of megalithic chamber-graves. The Bronze Age (c. 1800–500 B.C.E.) was dominated by an aristocracy, who in the earlier part of the period were buried in large mounds. Some 20,000 such mounds still exist.

From about the time when iron came to be the main material for tools and weapons (c. 500 B.C.E.), Scandinavia probably came to be inhabited by Germanic peoples, whose religion was described by the Roman author Tacitus in 98 C.E. in his book Germania. Tacitus writes that the Germanic peoples believed their ancestor Tuisto was born of the Earth, that he had a son called Mannus (Man) and that Mannus again had three sons, whose names may be reconstructed as Ing, Hermin, and Ist. It is reassuring to find echoes of this mythical information in the mythology of the Vikings, which was preserved in Iceland, but in a language that was spoken all over the Scandinavian area.

The period between Tacitus and the Viking age is characterized by a dearth of sources, but from 793, when Vikings attacked Lindisfarne (off the eastern coast of England; called the Holy Island for its many monasteries) for the first time, more sources become available. Beginning in this period a series of poems, in modern times called the poetic Edda, began to be composed. They describe the mythical world of the Nordic gods, providing our best source for the pre-Christian religion. This is also the time, when Christian missions to Denmark began. In 826 the German monk Ans-

Status of religions in Denmark, 2000-2050

Followers	2000			2025	2050
	total	%	rate
Christians	4,847,000	91.6	0.20	4,674,000	4,088,000
Protestants	4,640,000	87.7	-0.09	4,407,000	3,777,000
Independents	36,000	0.7	1.84	60,000	75,000
Marginal Christians	36,000	0.7	2.19	65,000	85,000
Nonreligious	287,000	5.4	1.37	363,000	450,000
Atheists	76,900	1.5	0.95	92,000	105,000
Muslims	66,600	1.3	1.92	90,000	125,000
Jews	6,800	0.1	0.10	6,800	7,000
Hindus	3,800	0.1	1.08	5,000	7,000
Baha'is	1,800	0.0	1.75	2,500	4,000
Buddhists	910	0.0	0.67	1,500	2,200
other religionists	2,500	0.1	1.68	3,300	4,400
Total population	5,293,000	100.0	0.29	5,238,000	4,793,000

gar preached in Denmark and later in Sweden. Wholesale conversion of the Danes was proclaimed by the Danish king Harald Bluetooth on a runic inscription around 965, but it took a long time before Denmark became a Christian nation with its own archbishop (in 1103). An Icelandic scholar and chieftain called Snorri Sturluson (1179–1241) collected and systematized the mythological poems in 1220. He called his book Edda, and thus gave a name to the poems.

Snorri is our prime source for the Nordic mythology, but he may not have had better sources than we do today. The world of the Vikings can best be understood from the point of view of a farm in the woods. In the middle is Midgard, Middle Earth (literally, the fenced-in area in the middle); here live the humans. Around Midgard is Udgard (literally, outside the fence,) and this is where giants live. Giants are a constant threat to order. They are associated with frost, wildfire, and wolves—anything that destroys crops or livestock. Around the world is the Ocean where another giant lives, namely the Midgard serpent, which encircles the world. Above Midgard, and connected to it by the rainbow Bifrost (literally, the shaky road), is Asgard, the realm of the gods called Aesir. There is another race of gods called Vanir. They battled the Aesir once, and in the ensuing exchange of hostages Njord and his offspring, Frey (The Lord) and Freya (The Lady) came to live with the Aesir.

A Catholic church in Sejero, Denmark (M. Feeney/TRIP)

Other beings inhabit the universe, collectively called Vættir (Beings). Foremost are the dwarves, who live in big rocks and produce treasures, and the elves, who are something of a mystery. Names of these beings suggest that they are chthonic (associated with the underworld), related maybe to the cult of the ancestors. The gods are numerous. The most important are Thor, Odin, and Frey, who were worshipped in a temple in Uppsala, Sweden, probably as late as 1050. Thor is the god of cosmic order. He is the protagonist of many stories, where he demonstrates great strength and appetite and slays giants in duels. His symbol is his weapon, the hammer Mjöllnir (Crusher). As Christianity encroached on the Nordic areas, Thor seems to have gained importance as the prime adversary of Christ, and the hammer symbol appears to have been consciously used as a symbol of opposition to the newfangled customs. Odin is the god of kingship, war, death, mead, poetry, magic, and ecstasy—all of which were perceived as interrelated by the Vikings. He is supposed to be the father of Thor, but they are portrayed as antagonists, just as the great farmers must have been against the warfaring aristocracy. Frey is a god of fertility. His image at Uppsala is said to have had an immense phallus. He was probably thought to unite with Freya, as the Male with the Female, although she is mythically described as his sister.

The religious festivals were tied to a solar calendar. The most important time of the year seems to have been the vernal equinox. Every ninth year a major festival was held, in which everybody had to participate or pay a heavy fine. Men, horses, and dogs were killed. The bodies were hung in trees, and the blood was used to stain the altars (and probably the participants). Highly regulated collective eating and drinking were an important part of the festivals, and we hear that a cup of drink was carried around “for Growth and Harmony,” as well as for the gods and the ancestors.

According to an enigmatic poem called “Völuspá” (normally translated as “The Sibyl’s Prophecy”), which describes the creation and decay of the world order, the world will eventually come to an end in a pitched battle between gods and giants. Odin will be swallowed by an enormous wolf, which will then be killed. Thor will kill the Midgard serpent but die from its poison. Freya will be killed by the fire-giant, and the world will be consumed in flames. It will rise again, though, in a renewed state.

Christian Era: The Christian church's history in Denmark is long and complex. Christianity ruled unchallenged until relatively recently, when secularization, which is very outspoken in Danish society, has led to a considerable weakening of the church. Until 1536, when the Lutheran Reformation was adopted as a new theological program in Denmark, church affairs were in the hands of the nobility, who also ruled over the church's property (40 percent of Denmark's land). When the ties to Rome and the pope were cut, the Danish king was installed as the head of the church, a principle that has survived to this day. When the country's first real constitution was adopted in 1849, legislators decided to design a national church that would encompass almost every citizen, but at the same time ensure freedom of religion. The result was a rather special legal construction, the Peoples' Church (Folkekirken), which, in accordance with the constitution, is supported by the state.

Today, Denmark remains one of the most ethnically and culturally homogenous countries in the world. By 2001, 86 percent of the population (some 4.5 million individuals) were members of the same church, the EVANGELICAL LUTHERAN CHURCH IN DENMARK. During the later decades of the twentieth century, the number of members declined, but in recent years the trend has turned, and the church seems to have stabilized its position. It has been observed on more than one occasion that the Scandinavian national churches, in certain ways, have become elements in civil religion structures, and a recent poll (1999) showed that 70 percent of the Danish population support the prevailing constitutional principle of a national church supported by the state. However, only a minority of people in Denmark are devoted Christians, and "belonging without believing" seems to be widespread.

On the other hand, "belief without belonging" is not uncommon in other walks of Danish religious life. Broadly speaking, New Age concepts have gained some influence, and many people hold beliefs in reincarnation, astrology, various kinds of healing, and so on; certainly many individuals without organizational affiliation believe in divine beings of various kinds, Christian and non-Christian. The rare category is the "believers who belong," a fact that points to secularization as a fundamental feature of contemporary Danish society. The pure breed of devoted "belonging believers" is primarily found in isolated parts of the National Church and in religious bodies on the fringes of or completely outside of conventional religion. About 3 percent of the population are engaged in other religious communities and approximately 11 percent reject religion and religious affiliation altogether.

All the world's major religions are represented in Denmark, but only Islam has a substantial following. Some 190,000 immigrants from Muslim countries (including their offspring) live in Denmark (currently constituting some 3.4 percent of the entire population), but nobody knows to what degree these individuals consider themselves religious. Islam came to Denmark with imported labor in the 1970s, and now, when new generations are born into Danish society, it seems likely that a local variety of Islam, adapted to Danish ways, will evolve. The vast majority of Muslims follow Sunni Islam, but some groups are part of SHI'A ISLAM. Much smaller groups of Hindus and Buddhists have made their way to Denmark during the past two decades, primarily as refugees. These groups number up to five or six thousand persons each, depending on how they are counted. In general members of non-Christian religions are able to lead religious lives according to their traditions, but Danish society has not as yet adapted to the reality of multiculturalism. At this point the country still awaits the erection of its first mosque and the inauguration of the first Muslim burial ground. A few Hindu temples exist, but they are remotely situated and by no means integrated into Danish urban life.

As regards new religions, the situation in Denmark seems to be the same as in other Western lands. Many different new groups are represented, but most of them only gain a very small following, and their presence leads to public concern and different kinds of negative reactions. At the same time, though, conflicts between the new religions and society at large seem to have been a less frequent feature in Denmark than in other Western European countries such as Germany and France. Also, as in other countries, the vast majority of people in Denmark express a nonsympathetic attitude toward the new religions if asked, but most are basically uninterested and generally uneducated in the subject. Religious belief and religious affiliation are usually looked upon as an entirely personal affair, which also means that most Danes find missionary work of every kind unacceptable.

Most new or relatively new religions in Denmark remain very small, with an average membership of some 15–25 individuals in the inner groups being quite normal. Inner members of all postwar new religions actively operating in Denmark hardly number more than 2,500 individuals, or approximately 0.04 percent of the population. If subpopulations with a more superficial or peripheral attachment to the groups are taken into consideration, the number will obviously increase, but not to a point where one would talk of real success.

The largest of the more recent new religions is the CHURCH OF SCIENTOLOGY, which presumably has an inner group membership of approximately 500 individuals, a relatively large figure that probably is due to the fact that the Church's Continental Liaison Office and its facilities for advanced training in the faith for Europe and Africa is situated in Copenhagen. It should be noted that almost every new religion in Denmark is involved in a global or at least Euro-American organizational network, and probably none of them would be able to exist without close global affiliations.

From a legal point of view religious freedom is guaranteed in the constitution and urged by changing governments. Problems in this respect are due to political right-wing propaganda against Muslims, which has become increasingly more outspoken during recent years, and cult-awareness propaganda against new religions by the country's only organization of that kind, the Dialog Center. Although the former has an impact, it seems that the counterattack on the new religions has largely failed. Religious groups may apply for formal recognition, a status that grants them freedom from taxation and the right to perform legally binding marriages. By 2000 some eighty religious groups had been officially recognized through either the prevailing law (of 1970) or the one that went before. A group of academics (primarily scholars of religion) serve as consultants to the Ministry of Ecclesiastical Affairs on these matters.

Mikael Rothstein and Morten Warmind

Sources:

- Davidson, Hilda. Myths and Symbols in Pagan Europe: Early Scandinavian and Celtic Religions. Syracuse, NY: Syracuse University Press, 1989.
- Lausten, Martin Schwarz. Danmarks Kirkehistorie. Kibenhavn: Gyldendal 1996.
- Rothstein, Michel. "New Religions, State Policy and Anti-Cult Activities. Aspects of the Danish Discussion." In Gudars och gudinnors terkomst. Studier i nyreligiositet, edited by Carl-Gustav Carlsson and Liselotte Frisk. Umea, Sweden: Umea Universitet, 2000. [Swedish]

Department Françoise d' Action Apostolique

See Paris Mission

Dhammakaya Foundation

The Dhammakaya Foundation was established on February 20, 1970, in Wat Phra Dhammakaya, a famous Buddhist monastery near Bangkok, Thailand, by a group of leading disciples of the late Venerable Monkhon Thepmuni (Luang Phoh Sod; 1884–1959), the abbot of Wat Pak Nam in Bangkok. The Dhammakaya Foundation was originally known as the Dhamma-prasithi Foundation, derived from the name of grandma Upasika Jan Khon-nok-yoong

(b. 1909), its leading founder and the earliest meditation teacher in the lineage of Luang Phoh Sod.

Dhammakaya means the dhammic element leading to enlightenment and the end of suffering. Luang Phoh Sod, the originator and the great master of the Dhammakaya tradition, teaches that Dhammakaya is the Buddha and the achievement of the Dhammakaya Knowledge is to see the Buddha in oneself. The Dhammakaya practice requires a pure untainted mind, suitable for keeping all virtues. Its meditation technique requires a concentration on the phrase "Samma Araham" (perfect attainer) until one has the vision of dhammakaya. According to the Dhammakaya teaching, seeing the dhammakaya within oneself is the attainment of nirvana (Sanskrit: extinction, freedom; in Pali, nibbana), and the Buddha, together with his holy disciples, still exists somewhere in the universe. The teaching is quite controversial among Buddhists in contemporary Thailand, and thus the Dhammakaya practice has fostered a new Buddhist movement critically confronting the Thai government, which directly supports the Thai Buddhist establishment. In 1999 the Dhammakaya Foundation was charged with distorting the Buddha's teaching of nirvana and misusing donations.

The president of the Dhammakaya Foundation is the Venerable Dhammajayo Bhikkhu (b. 1944), the former abbot of Wat Phra Dhammakaya. The vice president is the Venerable Dattajeevo Bhikkhu (b. 1941), the acting abbot and former vice-abbot. Both are Upasika Jan's leading meditation students. The remaining eleven administrative members of the foundation are lay attendants who faithfully follow the Dhammakaya tradition.

The pioneering work of the Dhammakaya Foundation has addressed the spiritual needs of modern society by using novel combinations of old and new. Modern technology has been applied to present traditional teachings in a way that attempts to respond to the needs and expectations of those in contemporary society. Modern administrative practices that have a scope much broader than is usually possible for traditional temples have been applied to the traditional charitable framework of temples and monastic communities alike.

The objects and purposes of the Dhammakaya Foundation are to promote social harmony through the practice of meditation and to promote in world society a culture of virtue and morality for all, irrespective of gender, race, language, or religion and belief. The foundation works (1) to provide the facilities for the teaching of meditation and the study of the culture that underlies world peace; (2) to create virtue in society by instilling morality, with special emphasis on the younger generation; (3) to promote the recognition and praise of those of exceptional virtue in society; (4) to produce materials in print and other media to promote peace, social harmony, virtue, and morality; and (5) to provide humanitarian services.

The Dhammakaya Foundation provides facilities to allow individual meditators to learn how to practice in some degree of convenience, even though the number of meditators and observers may reach 200,000 people at one time. The foundation supports the establishment of the World Dhammakaya Centre (WDC), on its present 800-acre site, comprising the Great Sabha Dhammakaya Assembly Hall (which it claims is the largest spiritual assembly hall in the world), the Phra Mongkolthepmuni Vihara (Luang Phoh Sod Monument), and the Maha Dhammakaya Cetiya (which the foundation describes as the peace-dome stupa for the third millennium).

Resident in the temple community in 2000 were approximately 625 monks, 263 novices, 116 laymen, and 359 laywomen. Apart from meditation training and ordination of Buddhist novices, aimed especially at young Thais, the Dhammakaya Foundation also works internationally. For example, in 1994, it provided computerized scriptures and a Buddha image to the Burmese monastic community in Rangoon, Myanmar. Since August 1984, it has become the United Nations accredited nongovernmental organization (NGO) associated with the Department of Public Information (DPI) and has since sent delegates to the Annual DPI/NGO Conference of the United Nations. In 1986, the Dhammakaya Foundation was accepted as a member of the WORLD FELLOWSHIP OF BUDDHISTS and World Fellowship of Buddhist Youth.

Address:

Dhammakaya Foundation
 Wat Phra Dhammakaya
 23/2, District 7, Klong Sam
 Klong Luang, Pathum Dhani
 Thailand
<http://dhammakaya.or.th>

Pataraporn Sirikanchana

Sources:

- Dhammakaya Foundation. World Peace through Inner Peace. Bangkok: Dokbia Publishing, 1999.
- Sirikanchana, Pataraporn. "The Dhammakaya Foundation." WFB Journal (Thai Edition) 192 (Nov./Dec. 1994): 28–32.
- Swearer, Donald K. The Buddhist World of Southeast Asia. Albany: State University of New York Press, 1995.

The Dharma Drum Mountain Association (Fakushan)

The Dharma Drum Mountain Association, more commonly known in Asia as the Fakushan Association is a religious, educational, and cultural organization with affiliates in Europe, the Asia-Pacific, and Canada, and thirteen chapters in the United States. It was formed in 1996 as the result of a merger between two other organizations: the Chung-

Hwa Institute of Buddhist Culture, a Ch'an (as the Chinese version of Zen Buddhism is called) meditation center set up in 1979 in New York to teach meditation to interested Americans, and the International Cultural and Educational Fakushan Foundation, established in 1989 on Taiwan. Both institutions result from the initiatives of Sheng Yen (b. 1931), a monk-scholar born in the Chinese province of Jiangsu who divides his time between New York and the various branches of Fakushan in Taiwan.

Although Sheng Yen does not have the kind of mass appeal on the island enjoyed by his colleagues Hsing Yun, the creator of FOGUANGSHAN, or Cheng Yen, the founder of THE BUDDHIST COMPASSION RELIEF TZU CHI ASSOCIATION, he is nonetheless a highly regarded spiritual leader in Buddhist circles. The Fakushan Association ranks as one of the three major Buddhist organizations in Taiwan, although, with a membership estimated at 400,000, it does not reach the scale of Foguanshan and Tzu Chi. Although the two latter own branches throughout the island, the activities of Fakushan remain concentrated in the northern part of the island.

The vitality of Fakushan, like other Buddhist organizations on the island, cannot be nourished solely by its small core community of about 100 monks and nuns residing in Taiwan; it must also depend on the activities of lay members in Taiwan and abroad. In that particular respect, the practice and the teachings of Sheng Yen, like those of Hsing Yun, the founder of Foguanshan, also relate to the popular support for humanistic Buddhism (renjian fojiao) in Taiwan. Sheng Yen himself can claim a close bond to the founder of that trend, having studied at a seminary established by the famous reformist monk Tai Hsu in Shanghai. Although Fakushan organizes fund-raising campaigns and participates in social and charitable activities in cooperation with the government and other associations, its involvement in that area does not compare to that of Tzu Chi. Fakushan, like Foguanshan, is primarily dedicated to the spread of the Dharma (teachings) through education.

The distinctive contribution of Fakushan to Taiwanese Buddhism resides in the particular emphasis that Sheng Yen puts on consciousness raising about the environment.

To achieve its educational goals, Sheng Yen has taught over the years as many as 25,000 people about meditation and Buddhism in Taiwan and abroad. Sheng Yen himself is a Buddhist scholar who has written and published over fifty books, in Chinese and other languages, to introduce the public to Ch'an Buddhism, and he has participated in international Buddhist symposia. To sustain these activities, Sheng Yen has established research institutes devoted to Buddhist studies in Taipei. In 2000, the organization finalized plans to build a Dharma Drum University that could offer to more than 3,500 students a curriculum of humanities and social sciences. The first step in the establishment of that project, the Dharma Drum Mountain College of Social and Humanitarian Studies, is targeted for completion in 2001.

Addresses:

The Dharma Drum Mountain Association
International Cultural and Educational Foundation of Dharma Drum Mountain
14–5, Ling Bon Ling
San Chieh Village, Taipei County Taiwan
Republic of China

Dharma Drum Mountain Buddhist Association
90–56 Corona Ave.
Elmhurst, NY 11373
<http://www.chan1.org>

André Laliberté

Sources:

Crook, John H. “The Place of Ch’an in Post-Modern Europe.”
Chung-hua Buddhist Journal 13, 2 (May 2000): 549–584.
Jones, Charles Brewer. Buddhism in Taiwan: Religion and the State, 1660–1990. Honolulu: University of Hawai’i Press, 1999.

Diamond Sangha

The Diamond Sangha is an international Zen Buddhist organization. It was founded in 1959 by an American, Robert Aitken (b. 1917), one of the fathers of Western Zen. Aitken first became interested in Zen Buddhism when he was interned in a Japanese prisoner-of-war camp in Japan with R. H. Blyth, a scholar and well-known translator of Japanese poetry, particularly haiku. After the war Aitken completed a Master of Arts degree in Hawaii that included a thesis entitled, “Basho’s Haiku and Zen.” Aitken began practicing Zen Buddhism in California in 1948 with a Japanese teacher, Senzaki Nyogen Sensei (1876–1958). Aitken continued his Zen training in Japan and Hawaii, studying with other Japanese Zen Masters, including Nakagawa Soen Roshi (1907–1984). Soen gave Aitken permission to establish a Zen group in the United States where Soen could lead annual sesshins (retreats) for American practitioners, so in 1959, Aitken and his wife, Anne Aitken (1911–1994), founded the Diamond Sangha in Hawaii.

Aitken continued his Zen practice under the tutelage of Zen Master Yasutani Hakuun Ryoko Roshi (1885–1973), the leader of a school of Japanese Zen Buddhism called the SANBO KYODAN (Fellowship of the Three Treasures). In 1962 Yasutani began periodic visits to Hawaii to guide the Diamond Sangha members in Zen practice, and his successor, Yamada Koun Zenshin Roshi (1907–1989), visited the Diamond Sangha annually in the 1970s and early 1980s. In 1974 Yamada authorized Aitken as a Zen Master in the Sanbo Kyodan lineage. In 1983 Yamada gave Aitken an additional qualification, that of Shoshike (Correctly Qualified Teacher), which gave Aitken the authority to teach independently of the Sanbo Kyodan lineage if he so chose. Few Zen Masters in the Sanbo Kyodan lineage exercise this right, but Aitken did. The Diamond Sangha separated from the Sanbo Kyodan and became an independent lineage with headquarters in Hawaii and with Aitken as its leader. The Diamond Sangha does not maintain formal relations with the Sanbo Kyodan, although informal relations still exist.

Diamond Sangha groups were then founded in other American states, including Arizona, California, Colorado, New Mexico, and Texas. Aitken led Australia’s first Zen retreat at the request of the Sydney Zen Centre in 1979 and appointed his first Australian successor, John Tarrant (b. 1949), as an Assistant Teacher in 1984. Groups were also founded in Switzerland, New Zealand, Argentina, and Germany, and Zen Masters from each country were eventually appointed. Aitken has maintained the Sanbo Kyodan system for appointment of teachers. The first appointment is as an Assistant Teacher (termed Apprentice Teachers in the Sanbo Kyodan), or Sensei, then approximately five years later as a Zen Master, or Roshi. Assistant Teachers work under the supervision of a Zen Master, and cannot assume an independent role without the Zen Master’s agreement. In practice, however, Assistant Teachers have virtually the same responsibilities as Zen Masters. Zen Masters in the Diamond Sangha have full autonomy, as Denpo (Dharma succession) qualifications are included in the qualification as a Zen Master. In contrast, in the Sanbo Kyodan lineage Zen Masters are first appointed Junshike, a level at which they can receive the title of Roshi. However, only some Zen Masters receive the higher appointments of Denpo and Shoshike. In 1999 John Tarrant Roshi, leader of the California Diamond Sangha, exercised his right to autonomy and founded an independent lineage around the California Diamond Sangha.

The Diamond Sangha engages in similar practices to those of the Sanbo Kyodan; the vast majority of Diamond Sangha practitioners practise the Rinzai Zen meditation method of koan practice. Robert Aitken’s Taking the Path of Zen is an excellent outline of koan practice and other related elements in the Diamond Sangha such as zazen and dokusan. Zen Buddhism claims to differ from other Buddhist traditions through its emphasis on zazen, or seated meditation. Because of this emphasis, the majority of Diamond Sangha activities are designed to provide opportunities for practice of zazen. Most groups provide group zazen periods of different lengths, such as two-hour zazen periods in the evening, half or full-day periods of Zen practice on weekends, and weeklong meditation retreats, known as sesshins. A few groups also offer residential training programs of two to four weeks duration. Dokusan is a private meeting of the student and the Assistant Teacher or Zen Master that occurs in the teacher’s room. This provides regular contact with a teacher and is particularly important for students undertaking koan practice.

The Diamond Sangha differs in several ways from many Japanese Zen Buddhist organizations and some Western Zen Buddhist groups. The Diamond Sangha is a lay practice with lay teachers (a tradition that originated in the Sanbo Kyodan). None of the teachers are Buddhist priests, monks, or nuns, although, paradoxically, some are in other religious traditions. As was the case in the Sanbo Kyodan, it is not necessary to be Buddhist to be a member of the Diamond Sangha. However, Zen Masters must be Buddhists, although other religious beliefs may be held concurrently. Diamond Sangha teachers currently include Father Pat Hawk Roshi, a priest in the Redemptorist Order; James Ford Sensei, a minister in the Unitarian Universalist Church, and Pia Gyger, a Catholic nun. A number of Diamond Sangha teachers are also qualified psychologists or psychotherapists, and psychological and psychotherapeutic techniques are being utilized in Zen practice.

The Diamond Sangha has long emphasized equality of the sexes. Numerous changes in the Diamond Sangha reflect this: increase in the numbers of female practitioners to reach approximately equal numbers of male and female practitioners; the foundation of Kahawai: A Journal of Women and Zen in 1979; the appointment of the first female Assistant Teacher, Subhana Barzaghi, in 1991 (and as a Roshi in 1996); alterations to chants to include women; and the development of activities that support women in their practice, such as women's groups and women's sesshins.

The Diamond Sangha is also well known for its emphasis on consensus and ethics. Aitken has written books on the relationship between Zen practice and ethics, including The Mind of Clover: Essays in Zen Buddhist Ethics. Robert Aitken, Anne Aitken, and Nelson Foster Roshi (a Zen Master in the Diamond Sangha) were among those who created the Buddhist Peace Fellowship as part of the Diamond Sangha, in 1979. Teachers from other Buddhist traditions, including Gary Snyder, Joanna Macy, and Jack Kornfield, soon joined them.

Due to Aitken's emphasis on consensual decision-making processes, the Diamond Sangha ceased to be a hierarchical organization with headquarters and became an international network of affiliated Zen Buddhist centres. When Aitken retired from teaching in 1997, no one was appointed to replace him as leader of the organization. The Diamond Sangha has a charter of common ground to which all affiliated groups must agree, but each group is independent beyond the requirements imposed by this document. Formal discussion about organizational issues occurs between teachers at the annual Teachers' Circle. Most Diamond Sangha groups obtain the majority of their funds from membership fees. The percentage of male and female members is approximately equal, and members are mostly middle-class professionals or young people entering university and Anglo-Saxon in background. Most would not classify themselves as Buddhists, and those that would are almost entirely converts to Buddhism.

By the start of 2000 Aitken had authorized sixteen people as Assistant Teachers or Roshis in the Diamond Sangha network; four of these, however, have chosen to stop teaching within the Diamond Sangha network. Three of Aitken's successors had begun appointing their own successors, and had appointed an additional eight Assistant Teachers. Nineteen groups were formally affiliated with the Diamond Sangha, and at least six more maintained informal links. Ten of the formal affiliates were located in the United States of America, five in Australia, and one each in Argentina, Germany, New Zealand, and Switzerland. Total membership was approximately 2,500.

There is no formal headquarters, but information on the network of Diamond Sangha centers may be obtained from the Honolulu Diamond Sangha, 2747 Waiomao Road, Honolulu, HI 96816. Several other affiliated centers also maintain active Internet sites, including the Desert Zen Sangha, <http://www.delegation.org/lame/zds/index.html>, and the Melbourne (Australia) Zen Group, <http://www.bluep.com/~axjshan/index1.html>

Michelle Spuler

Sources:

Aitken, Robert. Taking the Path of Zen. San Francisco: North Point Press, 1982.

———. The Mind of Clover: Essays in Zen Buddhist Ethics. San Francisco: North Point Press, 1984.

———. Original Dwelling Place. Washington, DC: Counterpoint, 1996.

Ciolek, T. Mathew. "Harada-Yasutani School of Zen Buddhism." Posted at <http://www.ciolek.com/WWWVLPages/ZenPages/HaradaYasutani.html>. Accessed December 6, 1999.

Rawlinson, Andrew. The Book of Enlightened Masters: Western Teachers in Asian Traditions. Chicago: Open Court, 1997.

Tworokov, Helen. "Robert Aitken." In Zen in America: Profiles of Five Teachers, edited by Helen Tworokov. San Francisco: North Point Press, 1989.

Diamond Way Buddhism

The Diamond Way organization is a Western lineage of the KARMA-KAGYUPA (in Tibetan, Karma bKa' brgyud) a subschool of TIBETAN BUDDHISM. Its rise and development offer an illustration of the way the Tibetan tradition of MAHAYANA BUDDHISM has settled in the West. Since the early 1970s, the Kagyu-oriented groups have settled and spread in Europe and the United States more quickly than any other school of Tibetan Buddhism. Unlike the Gelugpa, the Kagyupa had lost any significant role in Tibet's politics at the time of the Chinese invasion and annexation of the country (1950–1959). As a result, they favored a strategy of cultural and religious preservation by expanding in new areas. The sixteenth Gyalwang Karmapa (head of Karma-Kagyü Buddhism), Rangjung Rigpe Dorjé (rGyal ba Rang byung Rig pa'i rDo rje, 1924–1981), head of the Karma-Kagyü lineage, soon realized that the appeal of Buddhism in the late 1960s among Westerners presented an opportunity to spread the dharma (the Buddhist doctrine) outside Asia. Three decades later, along with the expansion of the other subschools of the Kagyü lineage, the Karma-Kagyü branch has emerged as one of the major worldwide Tibetan networks.

The Diamond Way organization exemplifies a process of Westernization of Buddhism. It was founded in 1972 in Copenhagen, Denmark, by Danish-born Ole Nydahl (b. 1941) and his wife Hannah. They were the first Western followers of Rangjung Rigpe Dorjé. The Nydahls' commitment to Buddhism began during their travels in Asia, where they met Tibetan lamas in Nepal in the early 1960s, just before this country became one of the favorite destinations of Western spiritual seekers. Like other Western Buddhist masters, Ole Nydahl sought to make Buddhist methods acceptable and available in the West. In so doing, he proved to be a talented translator of the teachings and a prolific author, as well as an unflinching traveling instructor. From the early 1970s onward, he founded approximately 270 centers around the world, paving the way for the settlement of a "white" Buddhism in Eastern Europe and Russia (in the mid-1980s).

Despite the lay and Western emphasis upon transmission and training promoted by Nydahl, the Diamond Way organization maintains intense genealogical, doctrinal, and organic bonds with the Karma-Kagyü monastic assembly. The diamond way is indeed a literal translation of the traditional label of the Tibetan tradition of Buddhism: vajrayana, from the Sanskrit words vajra, "diamond" or "thunder" (in Tibetan, rdo rje) and yana, "path." Although Ole Nydahl was not fully ordained as a monk, he is called "lama," and as a lay teacher and leader, he remains faithful to the traditional teachings of the Kagyüpa's doctrine and practices. Nydahl's attempts to demonstrate the superiority of Buddhism over other religions, as well as his polemics against other Buddhist traditions, have generated considerable criticism.

In the mid-1990s the recognition of two successors at the head of the Karma-Kagyü lineage brought to light an internal dispute concerning the traditional patterns of spiritual authority. Urgyen Trinley (or Orgyan Phrin las) (b. 1985) was first enthroned in Tibet (Tsurphu, 1992) and is now established in France. Urgyen's Asian headquarters is in Rumtek, near Gangtok, Sikkim, India. Nydahl actively supports Urgyen's challenger, Thaye Dorjé (or mThah yas rDo rje) (b. 1983), who fled from Tibet in 1994 and is now established in New Delhi. Thaye Dorjé may be contacted through the Karmapa International Buddhist Institute (KIBI) New Delhi, B 19–20 Institutional Area, Mehrauli, New Delhi, 110016 India. Thaye followers have a Web site at <http://www.karmapa.org>. He is considered by the Diamond Way organization as the authentic seventeenth Karmapa.

Nydahl's official Web site is at <http://www.lama-ole-nydahl.org> and is linked to the Diamond Way organization Web site (where a directory of centers is located) and to the Diamond Way Buddhism Web site at <http://www.diamond-way-buddhism.org/>. There is no one street address for the organization.

Lionel Obadia

Sources:

Batchelor, Stephen. The Awakening of the West: The Encounter of Buddhism and Western Culture. Berkeley, CA: Parallax Press, 1994.

Nydahl, Lama Ole. Entering the Diamond Way: Tibetan Buddhism Meets the West. Nevada City, CA: Blue Dolphin, 1985. Reprint, 1999.

———. Riding the Tiger. Nevada City, CA: Blue Dolphin, 1992.

Divine Life Society

The Divine Life Society is a religious organization whose philosophy and ritual practice are rooted in Hinduism's bhakti (devotional) and yogic traditions. Devotees refer to their faith as a practical form of spirituality promulgated through a nonsectarian, service-oriented, syncretic set of beliefs in the teachings of prophets from divergent faiths (Zoroaster, Parsvanatha, Moses, the Buddha, Mahavira, Jesus, Muhammad, Guru Nanak), saints (e.g., Saint Francis of Assisi, Sri Aurobindo, the Baal Shem Tov, Mahatma Gandhi), and acharyas (e.g., Ramanujacharya, Chaitanya). Nevertheless, the primary source of their philosophical outlook is based on the work of the group's founder, Sivananda Saraswati Maharaj (1887–1963) and his disciples, who form a group of spiritual leaders that now run the organization. These teachings are focused in what Sivananda called the "science of seven cultures" (health, energy, ethical, heart, will, psychic, spiritual). In order to promote these cultures, the Divine Life Society sponsors conferences and seminars in yoga and meditation, and it is affiliated with temple communities in many countries around the world, particularly those with a significant population of people of Indian origin (e.g., South Africa, Trinidad and Tobago, Canada, Mauritius). Its headquarters is near Rishikesh, a sacred site high in the Himalayas where the Ganges River begins.

The founder, Sivananda, started life as Kuppaswami Iyer in the village of Pattamadai in Tamil Nadu. He was given a Western-style education and eventually became a medical doctor. While serving as a doctor for Indian plantation laborers in British Malaya from 1913 to 1923, Kuppuswami was exposed to the religious philosophies of many different faith traditions. He yearned for a more spiritual life for himself and thus returned to India to visit its holy places. While in Rishikesh he studied at the feet of Sri Swami Visvananda Saraswati, who renamed him after he had taken the vows of a sannyasin (follower of the renounced life). Sivananda now lived a monk's life of austerity and wandered from one end of India to the other. Eventually he returned to Rishikesh, where he established an ashram (center) and dispensed medical services (practicing both Western medicine and Ayurveda, the traditional Hindu science of health) to those in need. It was here in a small kutir (hut) on the banks of the Ganga River that Sivananda established the Divine Life Society in 1936.

It is difficult to assess the number of people who subscribe to Divine Life precepts, although finding the locations of DLS chapters is relatively easy. Toward the end of his life, Swami Sivananda commissioned several of his students to go into the world and establish yoga centers in the Divine Life Society tradition. As a result Swami Vishnu Devananda (1927–1993) moved to Quebec and founded an international network of Sivananda Yoga Vedanta Centers across North America; Swami Satchidananda (b. 1914) moved to the United States and founded INTEGRAL YOGA INTERNATIONAL; and Swami Sahajananda began work in South Africa. Other international networks inspired by Sivananda include the INTERNATIONAL YOGA FELLOWSHIP MOVEMENT and the Yasodhara Ashram Society. In the meantime, the Divine Life Society has itself opened work around the world and has centers in more than fifteen countries.

Swami Sivananda was succeeded by Swami Chidananda (b. 1916).

Address:

Divine Life Society
 P.O. Shivanandanagar 249 192
 District Tehri-Garhwal
 Uttaranchal, Himalayas
 India
<http://www.divinelifesociety.org>
<http://www.sivanandadlshq.org>
<http://www.swami-krishnananda.org>

Carolyn V. Prorok

Sources:

- Ananthanarayanan, N. From Man to God-Man: The Inspiring Life-Story of Swami Sivananda. New Delhi: DLS, 1970.
- Maharaj, S. S. V., ed. Sivananda: Biography of a Modern Sage. Freemantle, Western Australia: Divine Life Society, 1985.
- Narayana, Guru. Life Divine and Spiritual Values. Bangalore: Swami Sivananda Spiritual Centre, 1977.

Divine Science Federation/United Divine Science Ministries, International

Divine Science began as an organized movement on May 4, 1888, when the original school was incorporated in San Francisco. Significant founders include Malinda E. Cramer (1844–1906) in San Francisco (1888); Nona Brooks (1861–1945) and her two sisters, Fannie B. James and Alethea Brooks Small, in Colorado (1889); and Herman H. Schroeder, who lived and worked in the German American community in St. Louis (1892). San Francisco became one of the leading centers of early New Thought (which also includes the UNITY SCHOOL OF CHRISTIANITY and RELIGIOUS SCIENCE) under Cramer's leadership. In 1892, Cramer established the International Divine Science Association as a loose coalition of many early New Thought leaders and centers.

The Home College of Divine Science in San Francisco served as the early headquarters of Divine Science, although local groups have always been autonomous, as they remain to this day. Cramer edited and published Harmony, a monthly magazine that began in October 1888 and continued through April 1906. The San Francisco facility was destroyed in the earthquake of 1906, after which Denver became the focal point of the movement.

Various efforts were made to create a new central organization. In 1957, several churches held a conference in Denver and founded the Divine Science Federation International (DSFI), with Irwin Gregg as its first president. The federation office was established in Denver in 1957 and remained there until 1997, when it was moved to St. Louis. Christi Schlue is the current president. A new, independent alliance of Divine Science ministries began in the late 1990s, in San Antonio, Texas. It is known as United Divine Science Ministries International. Anne Kunath, its founder, continues as its first president.

Divine Science teaches the omnipresence of God and affirms that each individual has access to all the potential of God through his or her own consciousness. On this basis, Divine Science works to heal the sick in mind and body through affirmative prayer. It is a direct approach to God, which affirms the essential goodness of humanity as God's idea. Through a closer attunement with the Divine Presence, individuals overcome the appearances of sin, disease, lack, and alienation from God, humanity, and the cosmos, and live an abundant life here and now. Divine Science maintains that this teaching reflects Jesus's true purpose, and thus lays its claim to be a Christian movement.

Worship practices differ among churches and centers. There is no required format, but most services include a sermon (often called a lesson), prayer and meditation, and hymn singing. In communion services, some churches and centers use the traditional bread and wine, but others use candles, and still others use no tangible objects at all.

The individual, when in touch with the Divine Presence, is the supreme authority in Divine Science. The Bible is revered as a sacred text, but is not considered infallible. Doctrinal texts include Divine Science and Healing and Divine Science: Its Principle and Practice. There have been no doctrinal controversies within the movement, but there have been key controversies on organization and educational policy.

Divine Science began in the United States, but has students in six continents. The Center for Creative Thought in Durban, Republic of South Africa, is currently the largest Divine Science ministry outside the United States. Even though Divine Science seeks to spread its message, it does not send out missionaries. Nevertheless, it is rapidly becoming more widely known through the Internet.

The movement has never emphasized membership, and it is impossible to determine the number of adherents with any confidence. It is likely that there are fewer than 5,000 members worldwide. Yet it has had a wider influence than its numbers indicate, through popular Divine Science authors such as Emmet Fox, Joseph Murphy, and William Parker.

Through the last half of the twentieth century, the movement experienced a slow decline; in the 1990s, however, it began a growth phase, which has included the establishment of new churches near Detroit and in Wichita, Kansas. Three reasons appear to underlie this new growth: (1) The resolution of long-standing organizational issues within the DSFI in 1996 and 1998, including major reforms in the by-laws; (2) a revival of interest in the writings of Malinda E. Cramer, which support contemporary holistic ways of thinking; and (3) several excellent Web sites, including the two official Web sites given below.

There are currently two central headquarters, whose addresses are given below. Relations between the headquarters are amicable, but it is uncertain whether the federations will unite. The Divine Science Ministers' Association, which is open to members of both federations, is headed by its president, John Copeland. Students may enroll in ministerial programs in one of three schools: Brooks Divinity School in Denver (which began as the Colorado College of Divine Science, with a charter dating to 1898); the Divine Science School in Washington, D.C.; and the United Divine Science Ministerial School in San Antonio.

Two local churches, in their organizations dating back to the nineteenth century, are notable sites of the movement. Both are known as the First Divine Science Church in their own cities, one being located in St. Louis (dating from 1892, the current building from 1916), and the other in Denver (dating from 1898, the current building from 1921).

Addresses:

United Divine Science Ministries International 8419 Callaghan
San Antonio, TX 78230
<http://www.uniteddivinescience.org>

Divine Science Federation International 3617 Wyoming St.
St. Louis, MO 63116
<http://www.angelfire.com/il/divinescience/index.html>

Robert Winterhalter

Sources:

Brooks, Louise McNamara. Early History of Divine Science.
Denver: First Church of Divine Science, 1963.
Cline-McCrary, Joan, ed. Hidden Harmony. St. Louis: DSFI, 1990.

Djibouti

Modern Djibouti is a relatively new country, having been established in 1898 as a colony, French Somaliland. It is a small area located around the gulf of Tadjoura, an inlet on the Gulf of Aden. The land, mostly hot and uninhabited, was originally settled by the Afars (of Ethiopian heritage) and the Issa (of Somalia). Islam came into the area in the thirteenth century from Yemen (across the Gulf of Aden to the north). Present-day Djibouti became part of a new nation called Ifat centered upon the city of Zeila (in present-day Somalia). It later evolved into the Sultanate of Adal. Portugal aligned itself with Ethiopia and in 1541 attacked Zeila and other cities to the south. The Portuguese destroyed the cities' ability to compete in the rich trade that extended from India along the African coast to the south. Adal fell apart, and a variety of lesser sultanates divided the land.

One of these lesser sultanates was located at Tadjoura. In 1862, the sultan sold the city of Obock to the French. During the next generation the sultanate disappeared, and in 1898 the French announced the existence of their new colony, with the capital at the city of Djibouti, a port they had built in the 1880s. Following the granting of independence to Somalia in 1969, the residents of Djibouti began to agitate for independence as well. A plebiscite in 1977 found 85 percent of the population favoring an end to colonial rule. Independence was granted. The area has remained somewhat unstable, however, due to the continued

Status of religions in Djibouti, 2000-2050

Followers	2000			2025	2050
	total	%	rate
Muslims	600,000	94.1	2.16	966,000	1,266,000
Christians	28,500	4.5	1.08	42,000	52,500
Orthodox	18,900	3.0	1.07	28,000	35,000
Roman Catholics	8,900	1.4	1.02	12,500	15,000
Protestants	240	0.0	4.81	500	1,000
Nonreligious	8,300	1.3	2.75	17,000	25,000
Baha'is	550	0.1	3.27	1,200	2,000
Hindus	130	0.0	-0.15	140	160
Total population	638,000	100.0	2.12	1,026,000	1,346,000

problems between Ethiopia and Eritrea and the unrest in Somalia.

Islam dominates Djibouti's religious life. The majority of the population are Sunnis of either the HANAFITE or SHAFIITE SCHOOL OF ISLAM. There are some followers of SHI'A ISLAM, most from India. Active Sufi brotherhoods include the QADIRIYYA SUFI ORDER, the Salihiya, and the Rifaiya. There is also a small community representing AHMADIYYA MOVEMENT IN ISLAM.

Hinduism has come into the country by the relocation of several hundred Indians. There is also a small community of the BAHAI' FAITH.

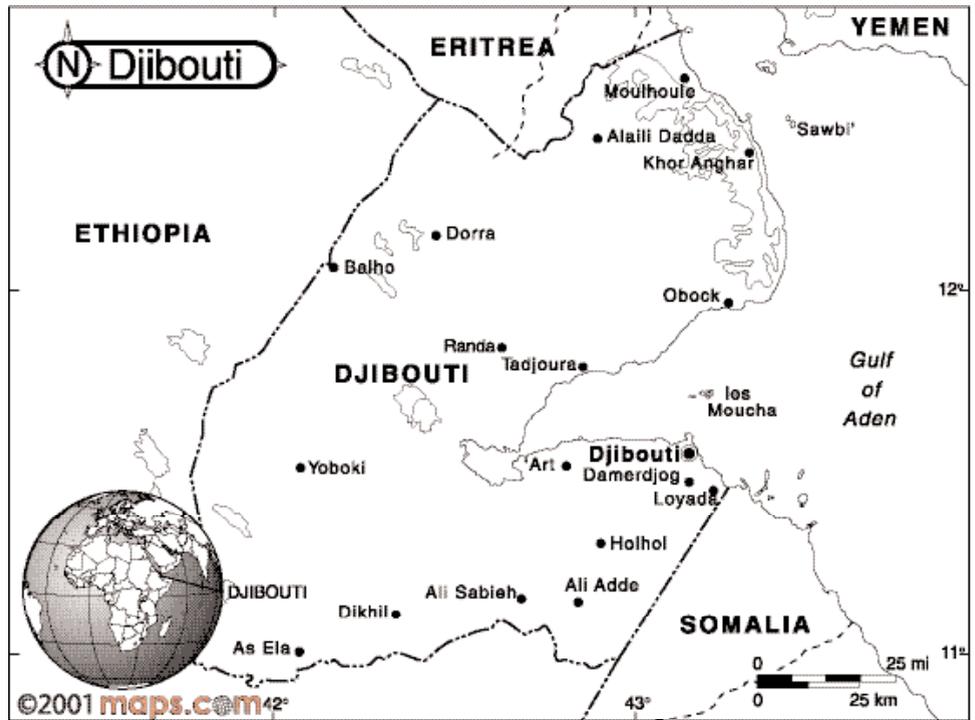

Christianity appears to have been initially introduced into the country following the French purchase of Obock. The first priests of the ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH came from the Diocese of Arabia in 1883. The work grew slowly but steadily, and in 1955 the Diocese of Djibouti was established. Protestants from the REFORMED CHURCH OF FRANCE arrived around 1940 and subsequently founded the Protestant Church of Djibouti. Workers from Ethiopia have more recently organized the ETHIOPIAN ORTHODOX TEWAHEDO CHURCH. The Ethiopian bishop of Djibouti, East, and South Africa resides in Nairobi. There are also a small number of Greek Orthodox believers, mostly European expatriates.

Sources:

Shehim, K. "The Influence of Islam on the Afar." Ph.D. dissertation, University of Washington, 1982.
 Trimingham, J. Spencer. The Christian Church and Missions in Ethiopia (Including Eritrea and the Somalilands). London: World Dominion Press, 1950.

Dogon Religion

The Dogon people inhabit land between the Niger River and Mali's border with Burkina Faso. The majority of the seven hundred Dogon villages are built along the hundred or so miles of the Cliffs of Bandigara, an escarpment that runs through the region. They appear to have settled in the area in the fifteenth century, in the process displacing other residents. They have been resistant to the encroachments of Islam, otherwise the dominant religion of the area, and Christianity, which was introduced during the years of French rule in the twentieth century.

Dogon religion is built around three emphases. The Awa cult centers on Nommo, the first living being (and ancestor of the Dogon) who was created by Amma (the god who created of the universe). Participants hope to reorder the spiritual forces disturbed by the Nommo's death, a process to be accomplished by dancing with elaborate painted masks, especially for funerals and events marking the anniversaries of a death. More than seventy-five types of Dogon ritual masks have been identified. Awa dancing attempts to conduct the souls of the deceased to what is seen as their final resting place in the family altars. It also verifies their status among the ancestors.

The worship of Lebe, the earth god, centers on fertility, particularly as it is related to the agricultural cycle. Lebe is believed to visit his priests, called hogons, each evening. He takes the form of a serpent, who purifies and empowers the priest by licking him. The hogan takes the lead in various ceremonies that punctuate the agricultural cycle. He also oversees the shrine, one of which is found in each Dogon village, dedicated to Lebe. Each shrine incorporates some soil as a symbol of earth fecundity.

The Binu cult includes as important features ancestor worship, spirit communication, and agricultural sacrifices. After Amma created Nommo, he multiplied into eight Nommo (four pairs). One of the eight primordial humans rebelled and upset the order of the universe. Amma then sacrificed one of the remaining seven Nommo and scattered bits of his body through the world, including the sites of presently existing Binu shrines. These shrines provide a point of contact between the Dogon and their ancestors, especially a class of primordial ancestors who lived before death became a reality of human existence. In ancient times, one of these ancestors would appear in the form of an animal, who would assist a kinship group (clan) and thus become its totem animal. The Binu priests oversee the ongoing contact and intercession with the ancestor represented by the clan's totem. The rituals insure the ancestor's benevolence and provide access to spiritual power.

The Dogon arose out of relative obscurity in the 1970s following the publication of The Sirius Mystery by Robert K. G. Temple. Temple drew attention to the Awa cult, especially its dancing and the masks used. Each Dogon male carves and paints a mask that is worn for funerals, but also, once every sixty years, for a dance ceremony called the sigi. The sigi marks the renewal of the generations, but also marks the rebirth of the white dwarf star, Sirius. The sigi was first photographed in 1970. As part of the ceremony, it was explained that a second (and sacred) star orbited Sirius. Astronomers later discovered that the Dogon were correct about Sirius being a double star.

The publication of Temple's book in the West had the effect of bolstering what was in the 1970s being touted as the "ancient astronaut" theory, a theory posed as an alternative account of human origins. The theory suggested that humans had originally come to earth from outer space or had been created by extraterrestrials. As interest in the ancient astronauts died in the 1980s, the focus on Sirius began to inspire channelers (mediums), who began to channel messages from what were believed to be advanced beings who resided on planets in the Sirius star system.

There are some 300,000 Dogon.

Sources:

Griaule, Marcel. Conversations with Ogotemmel: An Introduction to Dogon Religious Ideas. London: Oxford University Press, 1980.

Imperato, Pascal J. Dogon Cliff Dwellers: The Art of Mali's Mountain People. New York: L. Kahan Gallery of African Arts, 1978.

"Sacred Sites of the Dogon People, Mali." Posted at <http://www.sacredsites.com/africa/dogon.html>. Accessed December 1, 2001.

Temple, Robert K. G. The Sirius Mystery. Kent, UK: Bailey Brothers and Swiften, 1972.

Dominica

Dominica is a 300 square mile island in the Lesser Antilles with a population of approximately 80,000 people. Most Dominicans are of mixed African descent. Dominica has been an independent nation since 1978. Previously, Dominica had been an Associated State of Britain, a crown colony of Britain, a self-governing colony of Britain controlled by local mulatto elites, a colony exchanged a number of times between Britain and France, an independent Carib Indian island, and a Spanish possession. Geographically, Dominica is a mountainous volcanic island densely covered with vegetation. From the time it was named by Columbus, in 1493, to the late eighteenth century, the rough terrain made colonization difficult. Geography, economy, and politics have all been factors instrumental in shaping Dominica's religious history.

When Columbus set foot on Dominica in November 1493, he met the ancestors of the contemporary Carib Indians. Little is known about Carib religion, and few traces of Carib religion remain. What can be gleaned about Carib religion is often found in the suspect reports of early Roman Catholic missionaries.

Based on his analysis of Roman Catholic missionary documents, Douglas Taylor found Carib religion to be primarily a shamanic religion, which revolved around presenting offerings of food and drink to various spirits. There was belief in a variety of spirits, both beneficial and malicious. He also found evidence for some antagonism in Carib social structure, and one might surmise on the basis of various remaining cosmological myths, most of which deal with family relationships, that one function of Carib religion was mediating these antagonisms. In the mid-nineteenth century, especially through the mission work of Father Deletre, most Caribs converted to Roman Catholicism.

In the colonial period, the religious landscape of Dominica was dominated by Anglicanism, METHODISM, and, most especially, Roman Catholicism. Each of these religions was associated with a particular class, or status segment, and class and status associations are still important structures of Dominica's religious field.

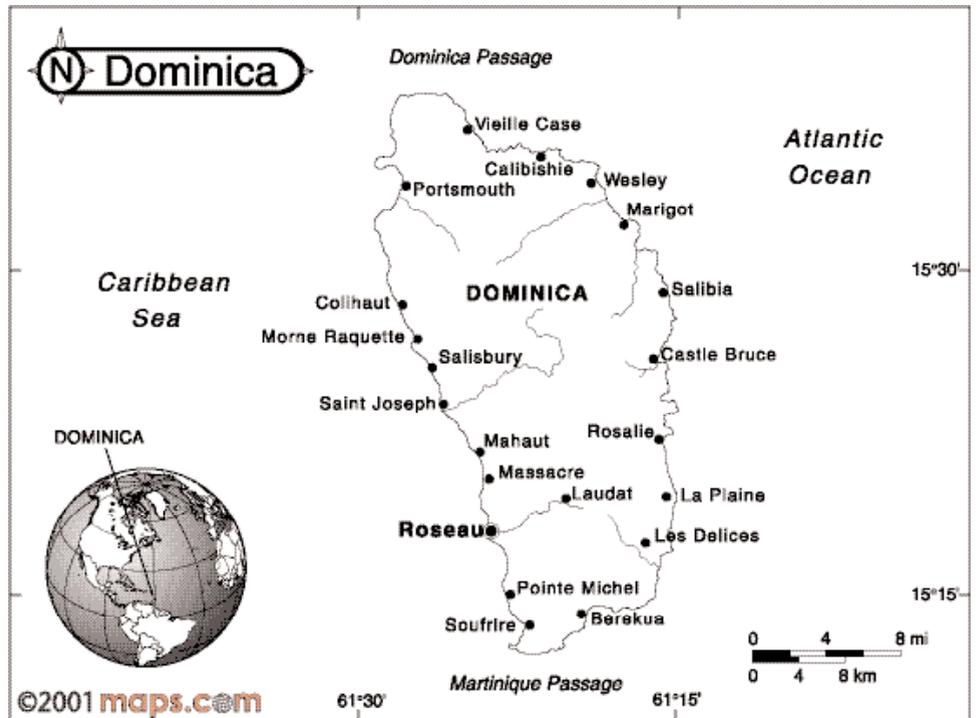

Anglicanism (represented by the CHURCH OF ENGLAND) was the religion of British landowners, and in general Anglicans did not seek to convert the African Dominican populations. To this day, Anglicanism is a small religion, primarily associated with a few old landowning families. Anglican parishes are now included in the CHURCH IN THE PROVINCE OF THE WEST INDIES.

Status of religions in Dominica, 2000-2050

Followers	2000			2025	2050
	total	%	rate
Christians	67,100	94.8	-0.15	68,100	70,800
Roman Catholics	56,300	79.6	-0.23	56,800	58,500
Protestants	11,200	15.8	0.55	13,000	16,000
Independents	2,100	3.0	2.14	4,000	5,000
Spiritists	1,900	2.7	0.48	2,200	2,800
Baha'is	1,200	1.7	2.05	2,000	3,000
Muslims	160	0.2	0.83	300	500
Hindus	140	0.2	0.07	170	210
Buddhists	90	0.1	0.22	150	250
Nonreligious	90	0.1	0.22	400	1,200
Chinese folk-religionists	40	0.1	0.49	70	100
Neoreligionists	20	0.0	1.84	40	80
Total population	70,700	100.0	-0.09	73,400	78,900

Methodism began to flourish in Dominica in the early nineteenth century. It is especially associated with the northeastern portion of the Island (e.g., the villages of Wesley and Marigot), which have a different settlement history from the rest of the island, and were not colonized by the French. Methodism became especially associated with a rising mixed-race class in the nineteenth century, and from the 1830s forward it was particularly linked with the Mulatto Ascendancy, a colored elite that dominated Dominica's legislature. Among other things, Methodism indicated status. It also distinguished the elite from the primarily Catholic black population, and it encouraged literacy, which facilitated elite education. By the late nineteenth century Methodism, now a part of the METHODIST CHURCH IN THE CARIBBEAN AND THE AMERICAS, ceased growing, and though it has been influential, it has remained a far smaller religion than Roman Catholicism. Dr. Phillip Potter, former president of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES, is perhaps Dominica's most well-known Methodist.

Roman Catholicism first was introduced to Dominica by the French; under Colbert's Code Noir of 1688, the French baptized slaves within six months of their arrival on Dominica. After the British took the island, the ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH was suspect, both for its ties to the pope and for its ties to France. It was only in 1828 that Roman Catholics were extended full rights. After that point, and continuing through emancipation in 1834, Catholicism was embraced by a large portion of the former slaves, who, it seems, often embraced it as an identity of resistance, in opposition to the Anglican landowners and the Methodist mulatto elite. At the same time, priests were important in representing peasant interests. Though there were severe conflicts between the Methodists and Catholics (including legislative disputes over religious involvement in education and at least two riots), these disturbances quieted toward the mid-nineteenth century. After the Catholic bishop, Poirier, gave up his French citizenship and became a British subject, the relationship of government and the Catholic Church was cemented. In the late nineteenth century, Dominica made the transition to Crown Colony status (a transition the Catholic Church had supported against the mulatto elite), and for the next half century a period of especially strong Catholic influence ensued.

During the late nineteenth century and the first half of the twentieth century, the Roman Catholic Church exerted near hegemony over religious life on the island. In particular, the mountainous geography of the island left many villages disconnected from one another, and Catholic missionary priests (often French priests from the FMI—Sons of Mary Immaculate—order) were the central organizing figures of village life throughout the countryside. In the city, the Catholic hierarchy (typically Belgian priests from the CSSR—Redemptorist—order) was also instrumental in primary and secondary education, and later in providing social services (e.g., welfare services). During this time, Roman Catholic authorities actively discouraged the presence of new religious groups, and numerous witnesses attest to Catholic priests burning missionary tracts handed out by Protestant groups trying to establish themselves on the island. Despite Catholic opposition, small groups of the JEHOVAH'S WITNESSES, the SEVENTH-DAY ADVENTIST CHURCH, and PENTECOSTALISM (the CHURCH OF GOD OF PROPHECY and the CHURCH OF GOD [CLEVELAND, TENNESSEE]) were established near the larger towns in the first half of the twentieth century. However, none of these flourished.

The main survival of African religion on Dominica is obeah, a form of sorcery performed by and for individuals, and without group affiliation. There is little information on the prevalence of obeah on Dominica, and though many people claim that it is widespread, few if any admit to using it themselves. Interviews with older Dominicans indicate that this was also the case in the past. It is possible that the availability of Catholicism as a religion of resistance made it less necessary to preserve subaltern African traditions. On the other hand, obeah is still prevalent enough to be officially illegal and actively prosecuted, and even in recent years there have been arrests and deportations on grounds of practicing obeah. According to the police in Dominica, obeah is particularly associated with drug trafficking.

In terms of other folk beliefs, tales abound locally about soukouyan (witches), lougawou (werewolves), and other creatures, and though many people will carry a Bible verse or psalm to protect themselves from these creatures, it is difficult to determine the extent to which these types of belief structure Dominican worldviews.

After the middle of the twentieth century, rapid social changes swept Dominica. These changes ranged from increased political independence and cultural revaluations of race to increased radio and television ownership. In turn these social changes led to changes in Dominica's religious field as well.

The Roman Catholic Church continues as the dominant tradition on the island, but its influence has diminished. In particular, the late 1960s saw a rapid expansion of the Protestant Pentecostal movement in Dominica, an expansion that relied heavily on radio. This was followed in the early 1980s by a second wave of expansion of the Pentecostal movement. Most villages on the island now have at least one Pentecostal or Charismatic church, both independent and denominational types. Partly in response to Protestant Pentecostalism, in the 1970s an active Catholic Charismatic Renewal movement also started. Hostilities between Catholics and Pentecostals became so severe that in 1986 the prime minister of Dominica, Dame Eugenia Charles, had to call a national meeting of religious leaders and appeal for toleration. Since that time, relations among religious groups have been more congenial.

Dissatisfaction with Roman Catholicism became particularly acute in the 1970s, when young men influenced by the black power movement increasingly associated Catholicism with colonialism (especially through its role in secondary education). Many of these men became associated in varying degrees with the RASTAFARIANS, a religion originally from Jamaica, which emphasized Afrocentric notions of divinity, local traditions, and a return to the land. Partially as a cover for secular political and economic difficulties and partly because of the challenge they posed to traditional norms, reaction against these Rastafarians was draconian; from 1974 through 1983 Rastafarians were virtually prohibited from Dominica through the infamous Dread Act. Among other things, the Dread Act made Rastafarian hairstyles (called dreads, or dreadlocks) illegal and provided blanket legal protection for those persecuting Rastafarian. The Dread Act further radicalized many Rastafarians, many of whom retreated to the rainforest to live in isolated communes. It is only in the last fifteen years that Rastafarians have begun to be socially acceptable in Dominica.

Since 1970 other changes have also marked the religious field in Dominica. There is now a much wider range of religious groups on the island, including non-Christian groups such as the BAHÁ'Í FAITH, SOKA GAKKAI INTERNATIONAL, and ISLAM, and all groups practice freely.

Richard C. Salter

Sources:

Aspects of Dominican History. Roseau, Dominica: Government Printing Division, 1972.

Honychurch, Lennox. The Dominica Story. London: Macmillan Education, 1995.

Salter, Richard C. "Religious Group Formation in the West Indies." Ph.D. dissertation, University of Chicago, 1998.

———. "Shooting Dreads on Sight." In Millennialism, Persecution, and Violence, edited by Catherine Wessinger. Syracuse, NY: Syracuse University Press, 2000.

Dominican Republic

The island of Quiaqueya was originally inhabited by several Caribbean peoples, the Lucayos, the Ciguayos, the Tainos, and the Caribs. Christopher Columbus renamed the island Hispaniola when he landed in 1492. The fort he built is marked as the beginning of the European colonization of the Americas. The Spanish subsequently enslaved the island's residents, almost annihilating them. Seeing the inability of the native peoples to survive the imposed order, Bartolome de Las Casa (1474–1566), the Roman Catholic bishop, suggested the importing of Africans. Some of the first slaves in the New World were brought to Hispaniola, and some of the first independent African communities appeared here in the 1500s.

The island culture shifted to the production of sugar cane on large plantations. Valued as a strategic point between

Status of religions in the Dominican Republic, 2000-2050

Followers	2000			2025	2050
	total	%	rate
Christians	8,083,000	95.2	1.76	10,484,000	11,190,000
Roman Catholics	7,522,000	88.6	1.74	9,643,000	10,400,000
Protestants	360,000	4.2	2.36	570,000	750,000
Independents	130,000	1.5	2.46	250,000	325,000
Spiritists	186,000	2.2	1.82	260,000	320,000
Nonreligious	169,000	2.0	3.60	330,000	616,000
Atheists	38,300	0.5	2.47	60,000	92,500
Chinese folk-religionists	6,600	0.1	1.78	9,000	12,500
Baha'is	5,900	0.1	1.68	10,000	17,000
Muslims	1,900	0.0	1.57	3,000	4,900
Buddhists	1,500	0.0	0.39	1,600	1,800
Jews	610	0.0	1.26	850	1,200
Neoreligionists	100	0.0	1.26	200	400
other religionists	2,700	0.0	1.32	5,000	8,300
Total population	8,495,000	100.0	1.80	11,164,000	12,265,000

Europe and Central and South America, Hispaniola was coveted by both the British and French. The French took the western half of the island, which they later renamed Haiti, in 1686. The whole island became French for a period, but was lost to a short-lived African American republic. Spain recovered it in 1809. Finally, in 1865, after Spain had been in and out of the country, the Dominican Republic became independent. However, it fell under U.S. influence at the beginning of the twentieth century, which led to the United States imposing a protectorate.

In 1930 a dictator, Rafael Leonidas Trujillo, came to power. His brutal regime ended only in 1961, when he was assassinated. At that time it was learned that he personally owned 70 percent of the country's workable land. In the intervening years, the instability of the sugar market has kept the country in crisis, and changes of government have been frequent. A democratic government with regular elections has been in place since 1966, but it is threatened constantly by corruption, massive poverty, and labor unrest.

European presence on Hispaniola destroyed the native people and their religion, which was replaced with Christianity. The area that was to later become the Dominican Republic became the early center of the ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH, and the first bishopric in the Americas was established there in 1511. St. Thomas University was opened in 1538. Catholicism enjoyed a monopoly in the religious sphere until the nineteenth century and still retains the allegiance of the majority of the people.

The Roman Catholic Church enjoys a special status in the country, a status now confirmed by law, following the signing of a concordat between the Vatican and the government in 1954. Among other privileges, Roman Catholics have access to public funds to cover some church expenses, including the repair of church buildings. The government generally does not interfere with the practice of religion; members of the National police, however, are required to attend Catholic Mass.

Protestants took the opportunity provided by the Haitian occupation of the Dominican Republic to enter the country. Africans from North America were invited to populate the land, and once they arrived, they asked for religious leadership. In 1834 a Methodist minister from England arived, and a few years later a minister from the AFRICAN METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH established work. In the 1840s, a British Baptist missionary founded a church, which has not survived, at Puerto Plata among African Americans. American Episcopalians entered the country in 1898 and created a mission, which is now a diocese of the EPISCOPAL CHURCH. Apart from one independent missionary, later identified with the FREE METHODIST CHURCH OF NORTH AMERICA, no other churches initiated work until the twentieth century.

In 1911, American groups that had already established work in Puerto Rico moved personnel to the Dominican Republic. In 1919, the Presbyterians, the Methodists, and the Church of the United Brethren cooperated in forming an Alliance for Christian Service in Santo Domingo. The Moravians eventually joined the alliance, which was serving as an agency for coordination and cooperation. This alliance matured into a united church, which became autonomous in 1953 as the Iglesia Evangélica Dominicana. The church carries on a wide variety of social service programs and has an active publication board that distributes a significant amount of literature. However, it has fallen behind some of the more evangelistic churches in gaining a following among the population. The church is a member of the WORLD ALLIANCE OF REFORMED CHURCHES.

The SEVENTH-DAY ADVENTIST CHURCH entered the country in 1908 and has built a strong movement, second only to the ASSEMBLIES OF GOD, which entered in 1933. The SDA work is a part of the Antillean Union Conference, which also includes Puerto Rico. The JEHOVAH'S WITNESSES, who started their evangelistic activity immediately after World War II, now have a substantial following. A wide spectrum of American Protestant and FREE CHURCHES have now opened work in the Dominican Republic. They range from Pentecostal groups such as the CHURCH OF GOD (CLEVELAND, TENNESSEE) and the UNITED PENTECOSTAL CHURCH INTERNATIONAL to various Evangelical churches, including the BAPTISTS, the EVANGELICAL CHURCH OF THE WEST INDIES, and the CHRISTIAN BROTHERS.

The CHURCH OF JESUS CHRIST OF LATTER-DAY SAINTS arrived in 1978. There are also a number of local spiritual assemblies of the BAHÁ'Í FAITH. There is a small Buddhist community, consisting primarily of Chinese and Japanese expatriates. There had been a small Jewish community that was established in the sixteenth century; over the centuries, however, it disappeared. A new Jewish community was started in the 1930s and now numbers around 150 people. They have a synagogue in Santo Domingo.

Sources:

Davis, M. E. "Afro-Dominican Religious Brotherhoods: Structure, Ritual, and Music." Ph.D. dissertation, University of Illinois, 1976.

Kane, J. Herbert. A Global View of Christian Missions. Grand Rapids, MI: Baker Book House, 1971.

Wipfler, W. L. The Churches of the Dominican in the Light of History: A Study of the Root Causes of the Current Problems. Cuernavaca, Mexico: Centro Intercultural de Documentación, 1966.

Dominicans

The Dominicans, officially the Order of Preachers, constitute one of the oldest and largest of the religious orders of the ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH. Its founding was occasioned by the emergence of a heretical movement in southern France in the thirteenth century. The order's founder, Dominic (1170–1221), was placed in charge of the preaching mission directed to counter the Albigensians. To stave off any possible charges of personal gain, Dominic and his assistants practiced voluntary poverty. This group became the core of what became a permanent organization that in 1215 received the initial approval of the bishop of Toulouse, France. The next year the group adopted the Rule of St. Augustine and in 1517 received approval of its name and mission from the pope.

The order was established to provide for the spiritual nourishment of its members and to send them upon missions in defense of the Catholic faith, the art of preaching being a primary tool. Shortly after its founding, Dominic sent lieutenants to various locations to open centers, beginning with Paris and Bologna. The first general chapter of representatives for the more than a dozen houses met in 1220. A vow of absolute poverty was adopted, and subsequently a form of governance was adopted and the work divided into provinces. The organization is democratic, but the leadership, especially the master general, is granted considerable administrative power. The general chapter may set broad policies and may on rare occasions modify the constitution.

Dominican sisters drumming on a feast day in Zambia. (C. Treppel/TRIP)

Dominic's order was spreading rapidly when he died in 1221. It had penetrated most of Europe, and a number of national provinces were in the process of formation. This growth continued under his successors. Dominic encouraged education, and the order obtained the first chair in theology at the Sorbonne. A number of scholars appeared among the Dominicans in their first century.

The order tended to establish its centers in urban areas. From this center, the community would become the target of systematic evangelism, and friars would be sent out to the surrounding countryside. Emerging out of the order were a number of "penitential preachers," who emphasized penance and reform of life as the major theme of their preaching work. The best known of these is Savonarola (1452–1498), who brought Florence to repent of its worldly ways during the Renaissance. The order quickly gained a reputation for its learning, and it was placed in charge of that major institution designed to stamp out heresy and promote allegiance to the church, the Inquisition.

Dominic's desire to help reform and revive the church also led him to missions. He sent Dominican brothers to the borders of Christendom. Early efforts were directed to the Jews and Muslims of southern Spain and northern Africa and to the Baltic peoples of Latvia, Estonia, and Lithuania, and the order also pushed eastward into Poland and the Ukraine. Efforts in the western Mediterranean Basin were directed toward the return of Orthodox Christians to the authority of Rome, as well as to the conversion of Muslims.

As the order expanded, its vow of poverty became a problem, and in 1475, Pope Martin V granted the Dominican priories (not individuals) the right to own property and thus provide for the basic needs of the members. The Protestant Reformation directly affected the order. It lost those provinces in northern Europe, and those in neighboring countries were considerably weakened. At the same time in the east the Dominicans were losing centers in lands overrun by the Turks.

The losses during the first half of the sixteenth century were partially offset by gains in the Western Hemisphere. The first Dominicans found their way to the West Indies in 1510 and had created a new province a mere twenty years later. That province was the base from which the order expanded through the Spanish colonies, as well as Brazil. Already in 1592 Dominicans had followed the Portuguese to Indonesia and the Philippines, from which they began efforts in China, Formosa, and Japan. From Italy they reestablished work in the Middle East and pushed eastward to Kurdistan.

Like the JESUITS, an order that was suppressed in 1773, the Dominicans suffered from the rise of secularized governments in several European countries. The wars for independence in South America then destroyed most of the work there. In 1804, the king of Spain separated the Spanish houses from the main part of the order, a separation that continued through most of the nineteenth century.

The initial problems created by hostile secular governments gave way to a new freedom to exist in a liberalized atmosphere that included commitments to religious liberty. Beginning in the late nineteenth century, the order reestablished itself in most European countries, and there was steady growth through the entire twentieth century. Membership increased from 4,472 in 1910 to more than 10,000 in 1963. Much twentieth-century growth occurred in the Third World.

The order is led by a general chapter and the master of the order (the successor to St. Dominic). It consists of provinces, each of which is ruled by a provincial chapter and the prior provincial. Each province includes convents and houses, each of which is governed by a prior or superior. The international headquarters of the order is located in Rome. The master of the order has a Web site at <http://www.op.org/curia/>, but one of many sites representing the many Dominican units worldwide.

The order is organized in three parts: the First Order, which includes priests and lay brothers; the Second Order, of contemplative nuns; and the Third Order, of people who live in the world but adopt the Dominican spirit or live communally but do not take the full vows of the First Order. The primary history has been carried by the First Order but the Second Order can also be traced to St. Dominic, who authored its original constitution in 1206. The nuns took charge of their own temporal affairs in 1267.

The history of the Second Order has been marked by two periods in which mystical spirituality flowered. The first, in the fourteenth century, is associated with the preaching of several friars who were their spiritual directors, Meister Eckhardt (c. 1260–1327), Henry Suso (c. 1300–1366), and Johannes Tauler (c. 1300–1361). A second period was noted in the eighteenth century. Like the First Order, the Second suffered ups and downs during the modern era, beginning with the Reformation, but enjoyed a period of expansion in the twentieth century.

The Third Order appears to have emerged from the penitential fraternities that sprang up in response to the preaching of the Dominican friars in the thirteenth century. At the end of the century, a rule was created for those fraternities that came under the jurisdiction of the order. Some of these fraternities later developed a communal life and dedicated their time to social, educational, and other charitable works. Over the centuries the Third Order produced some notable saints of the church, including St. Rose of Lima (1586–1617), the first person from the Western Hemisphere who was canonized, St. Catherine of Siena (1347–1380), and St. Louis-Marie Grignon de Montfort (1673–1716), whose writings laid the foundation for the present emphasis on the veneration of the Virgin Mary in Roman Catholicism.

Address:

Convento Santa Sabina (Aventino)
Piazza Pietro d'Iliria 1
00153 Roma
Italy

Sources:

- Ashley, Benedict M. The Dominicans. Colledgeville, MN: St. Mary's, 1990.
- Bennett, R. F. Early Dominicans: Studies in the Thirteenth-Century History. New York: Russell and Russell, 1971.
- Devas, R. Dominican Revival in the Nineteenth Century. London: Longmans, 1913.
- Reeves, J. B. The Dominicans. London: Bloomsbury, 1959.

Doukhobors

The Doukhobors' origins are obscure, due to their reliance on orally transmitted traditions and teachings, but it is generally accepted that their sect began during the wave of reform that swept through Russia in the seventeenth century. The original Doukhobors were peasants from Southern Russia who were influenced by that reform, and at times they experienced persecution under the Russian czars and the RUSSIAN ORTHODOX CHURCH. An Orthodox archbishop called them Doukhobors (spirit wrestlers) in 1785. The term was meant to be derisive (wrestlers against the spirit), but the sect put its own positive spin on the term (wrestlers for and with the spirit) and kept it as their own.

They faced persecution again in the late nineteenth century, and with the czar's approval and the support of Leo Tolstoy (1828–1910) and British and American FRIENDS (Quakers), 7,400 Doukhobors arrived in Canada as immigrants in 1899. They settled as a community in what was to become Saskatchewan. In 1902 the Russian authorities released their leader, Peter Vasilievich Verigin (d. 1924), from his exile in Siberia, and he soon joined his followers in Canada. After a change in the Canadian government's policy, the Doukhobors ran up against the authorities in 1905 for registering their lands communally (not individually as the Canadian government desired), as well as for their refusal to swear an oath of allegiance to the government. As a result, they lost the lands that they had tilled for the past few years. Beginning in 1908 Verigin led most of his followers to Southern British Columbia, where he established an isolated community of close to 6,000.

Doukhobors are strict pacifists, and many refuse to swear an oath. The emphasis is on the inner light, which all Christians possess. Outward forms are rejected: the sacraments, clergy, images, signs of the cross, fasts, even the Bible. Many are vegetarians and avoid killing animals. What gives life is the Spirit of Christ that speaks through the lips of Jesus's followers. The Bible is replaced with orally transmitted hymns and liturgy (their Living Book), which are sung and spoken during their meetings (called sobranyas). For most, communal living is the ideal way to live in mutual love. The leaders of the community are considered to have the Spirit of Christ more strongly than others.

Three major divisions occurred after the Doukhobors arrived in Canada. The Orthodox (or Community) Doukhobors continued in the communal way of living and remained loyal to the Verigin leaders. In 1938 these Orthodox Doukhobors were organized by Peter Verigin into the Union of Spiritual Communities of Christ. The Independents departed from the communal way of living. The Sons of Freedom (headquartered in Krestova, British Columbia) presented a more radical, and often violent, approach to dissent and nonconformity.

Presently there are around 30,000 Doukhobors in Canada. The Union of Spiritual Communities of Christ has its central office in Grand Forks, British Columbia. Its periodical is entitled ISKRA and maintains a Web site at <http://www.iskramag.org>. A major challenge facing the Doukho-bors in the late twentieth century is that of assimilation into mainstream Canadian culture.

Address:

Union of Spiritual Communities of Christ
Box 760
Grand Forks, British Columbia V0H 1H0
Canada

Gordon L. Heath

Sources:

- Friesen, John W., and Michael M. Verigin. The Community of Doukhobors: A People in Transition. Ottawa, Canada: Borealis Press, 1989.
- Mealing, F. M. Doukhobor Life: A Survey of Doukhobor Religion, History and Folklore. Castlegar, Canada: Cotinneh Books, 1975.
- Woodcock, George, and Ivan Avakumovic. The Doukhobors. Toronto, Canada: Oxford University Press, 1968.

Druidism

Modern Druidism, or Druidry, has over 30 groups in Britain alone, and many more internationally. Most contemporary Druids in Britain are pagan (and their groups and activities are part of the wider Neo-Pagan and WICCAN RELIGION networks); some have close links with Wicca, some are Christians, some belong to nonreligious friendly societies (e.g., the Ancient Order of Druids), and others see Druidry as a philosophy or a way of life rather than as a religion. All Druids have at least one thread in common—the Celtic Druids are their source of inspiration. Little is known about how pagan Celts practiced Druidry. Certainly, Druidism was the faith of the Celtic inhabitants of Gaul and the Celtic people of the British Isles until either Romanization or the introduction of Christianity led to its decline. Druids claim that the early Druids built megalithic monuments such as Stonehenge and the Rollright Stones.

The story of what constituted the beliefs and ritual practices of those inhabiting the prehistoric British Isles is little documented, and what is known is highly complex. However, by the 1720s an initial great revival of interest in the Druids was being disseminated by Romanticism and new archaeological findings. The history of the revival of British Druidism must be seen as a history of attitudes to Druidry and has been summed up as a story of creative re-invention, a process that continues in contemporary Druidry. Modern Druidry, as recognised by Druids themselves, can include just about anything you want it to include, and rituals may include non-Celtic elements of an American Indian or Hindu tradition along with elements from Welsh or Irish myth and poetry. Public rituals performed by white-robed Druids may use a version of the Universal Druid Prayer (Iola Morganwg's Gorsedd Prayer, first spoken in London in 1792) and may follow the Revival Druids in seeing the light of the sun as the symbol of God, or they may revere the sun as a symbol of spiritual light and associate it with one of the sun gods in Celtic mythology.

The mysterious megalith Stonehenge, between Amesbury and Stoke in England (Corel)

For many Druids there is a central belief in the unity of the spiritual, the creative imagination, and the natural environment. These three elements reflect the three realms of traditional Druidic learning, the Bards (poets, storytellers, and singers), Ovates (philosophers and diviners), and Druids (moral philosophers). Reconnecting to the past and to the natural world is assisted by working with the natural eightfold seasonal cycle of festivals: Halloween (Samhain), Candlemas (Imbolc), May Day (Beltaine), and Lammas (Lughnasad), together with the Winter and Summer Solstices and the Spring and Fall Equinoxes. Contemporary Druids also emphasize the primacy of the circle as a symbol of the wholeness of life and the seasonal cycle and as a spiritual sanctuary. Most of their rituals are celebrated in private. The most public and controversial festival has been the Summer Solstice celebration of the Triumph of Light by Druids at Stonehenge. Druids revere the sun and often practice their rites in daylight. For ten years or so, however, their key Summer Solstice public festivities at Stonehenge were curtailed. Public outcry and the efforts of Druids themselves brought them back the right to worship there.

Membership numbers vary widely. The British Druid Order (BDO), whose current chief is Philip Shallcrass and which publishes the main Druid magazine, the Druid's Voice, estimates its membership at over two thousand. It may be contacted at P.O. Box 29, St. Leonards-on-Sea, East Sussex, TN37 7YP, UK, or through its Web site: <http://www.druidorder.demon.co.uk>. The Ancient Order of Druids (founded by Henry Hurle in 1781) has more than three thousand members, whereas many groups have fewer than a hundred. The Council of British Druid Orders acts as a forum for eight of the twelve or so Druid groups in Britain. The Ancient Druid Order, or the Druid Order, founded in 1717, celebrates the Summer Solstice at Stonehenge, the Spring Equinox at Tower Hill, and the Autumn Equinox at Primrose Hill. From this developed OBOD, the Order of Bards, Ovates and Druids, constituted in 1964, and one of the largest Druid groups, with over three thousand members. It has a worldwide experience-based postal teaching program, a newsletter, and workshops. It aims to renew Druidry, promoting equality of the sexes, and is as concerned with environmental and artistic matters as spiritual ones. The first chief was Philip Ross Nichols, and the current one is Philip Carr-Gomm. The OBOD may be contacted at P.O. Box 1333, Lewes, East Sussex, BN7 37G, UK or through its Internet site at <http://www.druidry.org>.

Other British groups include the Secular Order of Druids, whose current chief is Tim Sebastian; it developed out of attempts to counterbalance the increasing influence of the rock festival at Glastonbury, as well as from the feeling that the Druids needed to establish a stronger presence at Stonehenge in the mid-1970s. The Glastonbury Order of Druids, formed in 1988, remains a small group mainly concerned with Stonehenge and Glastonbury. The primary American Druidic groups are Ar nDraiocht Fein: A Druid Fellowship, founded in the mid-1980s by Isaac Bonewits (who became well known in 1968 when he graduated from the University of California at Berkeley with a degree in magic), and the original Druid group, the Reformed Druids of North America. The latter group originated in a student protest movement at Carleton College in Northfield, Minnesota, in 1963. An extensive directory of links to these and other Druidic groups may be found at <http://www.esotericart.com/fringe/druidLinks.htm>.

Charlotte Hardman

Sources:

- Carr-Gomm, Philip. The Elements of the Druid Tradition. Shaftesbury, UK: Element Books, 1991.
- . The Druid Way. Shaftesbury, UK: Element Books, 1993.
- , ed. The Druid Renaissance. London: Thorsons, 1996.
- Harvey, Graham, and Charlotte Hardman, eds. Pagan Pathways. London: Thorsons, 1995.
- Hutton, Ronald. The Pagan Religions of the Ancient British Isles. Oxford: Blackwell, 1991.
- Jones, Prudence, and Nigel Pennick. A History of Pagan Europe. London: Routledge, 1995.
- Matthews, John, ed. The Druid Source Book. London: Blandford, 1998.
- Restall Orr, Emma. Spirits of the Sacred Grove: The World of a Druid Priestess. London: Thorsons, 1998.
- Smiles, Sam. The Image of Antiquity: Ancient Britain and the Romantic Imagination. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1994.
- Woodward, Ann. English Heritage Book of Shrines and Sacrifice. London: Trafalgar Square, 1992.

Druze

The Druze emerged as a new religious community in Egypt among the Ismaili Muslims during the rule of al-Hakim, the Fatimid Caliph (r. 996–1021). Some Ismaili clergy began to teach that their generation was the time of the end of the era of Islam and of Islamic law. As the movement developed, they also began to proclaim the divinity of al-Hakim, who served as both caliph of the empire and imam of the primary Ismaili community. The name of the new group was derived mistakenly from that of a leading exponent of that view, al-Darazi (d. 1019), though he was not associated with the group later called Druze. Another teacher, Hamzah ibu-'Ali, was the real creative voice of the community. Hamzah ibu-'Ali claimed to be both imam and lord of this age.

As the movement grew among the population, the authorities in Cairo moved to suppress it. In the midst of their efforts, al-Hakim suddenly disappeared under mysterious circumstances. The Druze interpreted this event as confirmation of their beliefs. To them, he had not been killed, but had voluntarily entered a period of Occultation, or Hiddenness, from which one day he would reappear to the faithful.

The disappearance of al-Hakim simply led to even harsher suppression of the Druze, who left Egypt and settled in Syria and Lebanon. There they survived as a semisecret community. They have been reluctant to share the materials containing their secret teachings with outsiders. Converts are not allowed; one can only be born into the Druze community.

The Druze now await the return of both al-Hakim and Hazzah, whose appearances will vindicate their faith. Meanwhile, they gather for worship on Thursday (rather than Friday), and they have a doctrine of the transmigration of souls. They have abandoned the following of the Muslim law (shariah), feeling that many of its prescriptions are no longer relevant. Their moral code centers on truthfulness, mutual assistance, and submission to God's will as the highest values. They also are proud of having abandoned social discrimination a millennium ago, their understanding having led them to grant equal rights to women and to abandon slavery.

The Druze refer to themselves as al-Muwahhidun, which means those who believe in the Unity of God. While the Druze community remained strongest in Syria, Lebanon, and Palestine, it has become widely dispersed, beginning in the nineteenth century. The first American Druze community was organized in 1908. The American Druze Society was designed to protect the Druze identity, culture, and faith, as well to serve the Druze community. Druze communities can also now be found across Latin America (Venezuela, Brazil, Argentina, Mexico, Chile, and Colombia). Others have settled in the West Indies, Australia, the Philippines, France, the United Kingdom, and Nigeria. The Druze in diaspora maintain a strong tie with the base community in the Middle East. There are an estimated 500,000 Druze worldwide, of which more than 400,000 live in Syria, Lebanon, and Israel.

Contact with the community for outsiders has been facilitated by the publication of Adam Magazine, a bilingual periodical (in Arabic and English). It and the Druze community may be contacted through the Druze Web site at <http://> www.druzenet.org. The American Druze Society and various local Druze communities also have an Internet presence.

Dutch Reformed Church

Sources:

- Abu-Izzeddin, Neila M. The Druzes: A New Study of Their History, Faith, and Society. Leiden: N.p., 1993.
- Betts, Robert Brenton. The Druze. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1988.
- Bryer, D. R. W. "The Origins of the Druze religion." Der Islam 52 (1975): 47–84, 239–262.
- Firro, Kais M. A History of the Druzes. Leiden: Brill, 1992.

Dutch Reformed Church (South Africa)

The Dutch Reformed Church is one of the two large churches in the REFORMED/PRESBYTERIAN TRADITION operating in South Africa that grew out of the settlement of the Cape of Good Hope by the Dutch in the seventeenth century. The church dates to 1672. After some years, church leaders began to institute missions among both the slave population that developed and the Native population, but they always maintained a very separate existence between the white European membership and the African membership. The church became independent of Holland after the British took control of the Cape Colony at the beginning of the nineteenth century. It held its first synod as an independent body in 1824.

The church spread through South Africa, but experienced two major splits in the middle of the nineteenth century. Issues causing tensions included geography, with a more conservative theology prevalent among settlers in the Transvaal. Arguments developed over whether hymns other than those derived from the biblical Book of Psalms could be used. The Dutch Reformed Church based in the Cape area also adopted a more liberal interpretation of the basic Reformed documents (the Heidelberg Catechism, the Belgic Confession, and the Canons of Dort).

In 1862, the Supreme Court ruled that representatives of the Dutch Reformed congregations outside of the Cape Colony could not sit in the synod of the Dutch Reformed Church. As a result, these congregations severed their formal ties to the church and established separate synods for the Transvaal, Orange Free State, and Natal. Later, a separate Dutch Reformed Church also arose for the same reasons in South-West Africa. These five churches remained in a friendly relationship, and in 1907 they formed a federation. They merged in 1962 to constitute the present Dutch Reformed Church (Nederduitse Gereformeerde Kerk).

The Dutch Reformed Church is headed by a general synod, and its congregations divided into presbyteries and synods. In the 1990s it reported 1.3 million members in 1,260 congregations. Missionaries from this church spread across the southern part of Africa in the late nineteenth century and were responsible for what have become independent national churches in Malawi, Zimbabwe, Zambia, Mozambique, Nigeria, Kenya, and Namibia. It has also built a number of social service institutions across South Africa.

As the issue of apartheid gained world attention, the Dutch Reformed Church, defensive of its segregated church life, withdrew from the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES. Then in 1982, the WORLD ALLIANCE OF REFORMED CHURCHES (WARC) declared apartheid a sin and the theological justification for it that had been offered a heresy. It suspended the membership of the Dutch Reformed Church. In 1997, with the changing events and stances being developed in the post-apartheid era, the WARC readmitted the Dutch Reformed Church to membership, anticipating the church's formal rejection of apartheid. The church is also a member of the REFORMED ECUMENICAL COUNCIL.

Address:

Dutch Reformed Church
P.O. Box 4445
234, Visagiestraat
Pretoria 0001
South Africa
<http://www.ngkerkdrc.co.za/>

Sources:

- Bauswein, Jean-Jacques, and Lukas Vischer, eds. The Reformed Family Worldwide: A Survey of Reformed Churches, Theological Schools, and International Organizations. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans, 1999.
- Elphick, Richard, and Rodney Davenport, eds. Christianity in South Africa: A Political, Social, and Cultural History. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1998.

The Lady Grey historic Dutch Reformed Church in South Africa (B. Swanson/TRIP)

East Africa Yearly Meeting of Friends (South)

American representatives of the Society of Friends (now the FRIENDS UNITED MEETING) began mission work at Kaunosi, Kenya, in 1902. Work concentrated in the Kakamega and Bungoma districts in the western part of the country and later extended into the Rift Valley, the Nyanza province, and the two large cities (Nairobi and Mombasa). Over the next four decades, the work grew into the largest yearly meeting (association) of FRIENDS in the world. The East Africa Yearly Meeting became self-governing in 1946 and became responsible for all of the properties formerly owned by the mission in 1964. More recently, it became the source of a set of closely related yearly meetings.

A group of Kenyan Friends under the leadership of Johnstone Namufweli moved into Uganda in 1948 and founded a monthly meeting (congregation) at Kampala. They were joined by others who migrated in the mid-1950s at the invitation of the colonial government. They were set apart as an independent yearly meeting in 1969. In 1952 the government of Tanganyika (now Tanzania) invited Kenyans to relocate there, and some Friends were among those who accepted the invitation. The first group settled in Ikoma in the Musoma District, where the first congregation was established. The Tanzania congregations remained a part of the Kenyan work until 1968, when the Tanzania Yearly Meeting was formed.

In 1973, the work in Kenya was reorganized into nine districts, and the first of what became five yearly meetings (Elgon Religious Society of Friends) established. In 1979 the East Africa Yearly Meeting (South) held its first meeting and is now the largest of the Friends yearly meetings, with some 47,000 members. Yearly meetings are congregational associations that are the basic organization unit among Friends. The East Africa Yearly Meeting (North) (with 13,000 members) and the Nairobi Yearly Meeting (with 4,000 members) were established in 1987. Among the five Kenyan associations, the East Africa Yearly Meeting sponsors the Friends Bible Institute (for the training of pastors) and Friends College, both at Aimosi, while the East Africa Yearly Meeting (South) represents Kenyan Friends as a member of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES.

Address:

East Africa Yearly Meeting (South)
P.O. Box 160
Vihaga
Kenya

Source:

Quakers around the World. London: Friends World Committee for Consultation, 1994.

East Java Christian Church (GKJW)

The East Java Christian Church (Gereja Kristen Jawi Wetan [GKJW]) dates to the activities of Christian laypeople operating in East Java early in the nineteenth century. In the 1930s two European laypeople, one a German watchmaker, the other an Indo-Russian farmer, introduced Christianity into the Muslim community around Surabaya. They baptized an initial convert in 1843. During this time, the watchmaker spent several periods in jail for violating the law against proselytizing Muslims. Eventually a small congregation emerged, which in 1850 came under the care of the mission of the Reformed Church of the Netherlands. Over the next generations the mission grew slowly but steadily. In 1931 a synod was organized. At this time there were some twenty-three thousand baptized members, almost all residing in rural areas.

As with other missions in Indonesia, the missionaries remained in control until the Japanese arrived in 1942. The war and period of occupation totally disrupted the church, which took the rest of the decade to recover. Growth began again in the 1950s and resumed its pattern of steady development in what is a predominantly Muslim part of the country. Associated with the church are a set of schools, an orphanage, and a variety of medical facilities.

In the 1990s the church reported 153,000 members in 118 congregations. It is a member of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES and the WORLD ALLIANCE OF REFORMED CHURCHES.

Address:

East Java Christian Church
Jalan Shodanchoo Supriadi 18
Malang 65147 Jawa Timur
Indonesia

Source:

Bauswein, Jean-Jacques, and Lukas Vischer, eds. The Reformed Family Worldwide: A Survey of Reformed Churches, Theological Schools, and International Organizations. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans, 1999.

Eastern Orthodoxy

Together, the Eastern Orthodox churches constitute one of the three major traditions of Christianity (Roman Catholicism and Protestantism being the other two). Eastern Orthodoxy emerged as the dominant expression of Christianity in the eastern half of the Mediterranean world in the eastern half of the Roman Empire (which after the fall of Rome in 475 came to be known as the Byzantine Empire), and its organizational focus was on the archbishops at Constantinople (originally Byzantium, later Istanbul), Antioch, Jerusalem, and Alexandria. Greek was the dominant language, as opposed to Latin in the western Mediterranean where after the fall of Rome the bishop of Rome became more and more important, leading the whole Western church as pope. Through the centuries, the organizational unity of Christendom was gradually weakened by theologically divergent churches in Armenia, Egypt, Persia, and lands to the east. Then in the eleventh century, the most significant schism occurred, that between the ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH and the Greek Orthodox churches.

Today, Eastern Orthodoxy consists of a number of churches, which are divided nationally and ethnically, but held together in communion through a shared faith, which finds expression in their version of the Nicene Creed. The Eastern Orthodox have a technical theological disagreement with the Roman Catholic Church concerning the place of the Holy Spirit in the Trinity. In the Nicene Creed as recited in Eastern Orthodox churches, belief is affirmed in “the Holy Spirit, who proceeds from the Father.” In the Roman Catholic version of the creed, the phrase “and the Son” is added at this point, so that it reads, “the Holy Spirit, who proceeds from the Father and the Son.” The Eastern church rejected that phrase, believing that it suggested an undue subordination of the Holy Spirit.

The Eastern Church also did not develop the ideal of celibacy of the clergy as in the Roman Catholic Church, though it insists that priests marry before receiving holy orders and that bishops be drawn from unmarried priests (primarily from its monks, who live in ordered communities).

The archbishop of Istanbul, the ecumenical patriarch, is the symbolic focus of the unity of Eastern Orthodoxy. His jurisdiction, the ECUMENICAL PATRIARCHATE, includes Turkey (the former base of the Roman Empire in the East, usually referred to as the Byzantine Empire), parts of Greece, all of Europe not specifically assigned to other jurisdictions, and the Greek-speaking Orthodox in North and South America. The remainder of the Mediterranean is divided between the GREEK ORTHODOX PATRIARCHATE OF ANTIOCH, the GREEK ORTHODOX PATRIARCHATE OF JERUSALEM, and the GREEK ORTHODOX PATRIARCHATE OF ALEXANDRIA AND ALL AFRICA.

Through the centuries a variety of autonomous Orthodox jurisdictions have been recognized, most separating from the Ecumenical Patriarchate as they grew in size and their country asserted its independence. Important Orthodox churches include the RUSSIAN ORTHODOX CHURCH, the Ukrainian Orthodox Church, the Church of Greece, the BULGARIAN ORTHODOX CHURCH, and the ROMANIAN ORTHODOX CHURCH. There are in addition a number of smaller autonomous jurisdictions.

Also, during the centuries since the schism between the Eastern and Western churches, a variety of Orthodox communities have for various reasons moved back into communion with the Roman Catholic Church and now exist as Eastern Rite Catholic Churches. Such EASTERN RITE churches now parallel most Orthodox jurisdictions.

There are some Orthodox churches that are not in communion with the Ecumenical Patriarchate. Some of these were formed during the twentieth century, as Marxist governments rose in predominantly Orthodox countries. It was the feeling of some members of these churches that they could not remain in communion with bishops who had tacitly offered allegiance to such government authorities. The largest of these anti-Communist Orthodox churches is the RUSSIAN ORTHODOX CHURCH OUTSIDE OF RUSSIA, formed by Russian bishops who were outside of the country at the time of the Russian Revolution and who attempted to reorganize the Russian parishes in the diaspora.

In the late twentieth century, as the Orthodox Church began to participate in the ecumenical movement as expressed in the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES, the more conservative church leaders saw such relationships as inherently subversive of Orthodox faith and practice. Their protest was focused in the change of most Orthodox Churches from the traditional Julian calendar to the more commonly used Gregorian calendar. The conservative dissenting jurisdictions are generally known as “Old Calendar” churches.

Sources:

Fitzgerald, Thomas E. The Orthodox Church. Westport, CT: Greenwood Press, 1995.

Orthodoxia. Regensburg, Germany: Ostkirchliches Institut, issued annually.

Roberson, Ronald G. The Eastern Christian Churches. Rome, Italy: Pont. Institutum Studiorum Orientalium, 1988.

Schmemmann, Alexander. The Historic Road of Eastern Orthodoxy. New York: Holt, Rinehart and Winston, 1963.

ECKANKAR

ECKANKAR, also known as “The Religion of the Light and Sound of God,” was founded by Paul Twitchell (c. 1908–1971) in California in 1965. Although it claims to be the oldest religion in the world, its beliefs and practices bear striking resemblances to the Punjabi Radhasoami Tradition, Western esoteric traditions such as those found in the THEOSOPHICAL SOCIETY and Rosicrucianism (the ANCIENT AND MYSTICAL ORDER ROSAE CRUCIS), and certain aspects of the CHURCH OF SCIENTOLOGY. The essence of ECKANKAR lies in its spiritual practices, which are said to lead the individual into greater union with God and toward becoming a coworker with God. The practices taught by ECKANKAR include singing the mantra “Hu” (an especially holy name for God) and bilocation (soul travel). Eckists believe that they can be in more than one place simultaneously and that many dreams are actually such experiences. ECKANKAR teaches them how to interpret the spiritual meanings of dreams.

Paul Twitchell wrote several books about and for ECKANKAR, including the first volumes of an open-ended canon of ECKANKAR scriptures known as Shariyat-Ki-Sugmad. Twitchell died in 1971 and was succeeded by Darwin Gross, who was in turn succeeded as “Living ECK Master” (spiritual leader and oracle of God) by Harold Klemp in the early 1980s. Under Klemp and ECKANKAR’s president, Peter Skelskey, ECKANKAR relocated its world headquarters from California to Minneapolis, Minnesota, in the late 1980s. The world headquarters includes the Temple of ECK, ECKANKAR’s primary worship center, in Chanhasen, Minnesota. The organization does not publish membership statistics but claims to have tens of thousands of adherents worldwide. It is a nonexclusive religious organization, so many members are also members of other religious groups.

The highest authority in ECKANKAR is the Living ECK Master, and Harold Klemp is considered the 973d such person in world history. ECKANKAR chelas (devotees) regard Klemp as their spiritual guide and believe that he appears to them and teaches them in their dreams. Klemp is believed to be in touch with a group of spiritual guides known as the Order of Vairagi Masters. The spiritual teachings and practices of ECKANKAR are determined by Klemp and communicated to the chelas via books, correspondence courses, and magazines published by Illuminated Way Publishing Company. ECKANKAR also produces videos, which often feature talks given by Klemp, and these are shown on cable television. ECKANKAR centers exist in numerous cities in North America, Europe, and Africa.

ECKANKAR has endured several controversies since its founding. Paul Twitchell’s autobiography and credibility as a genuine spiritual leader were questioned by at least one scholar. David Christopher Lane’s exposé of Twitchell and ECKANKAR, entitled The Making of a Spiritual Movement: The Untold Story of Paul Twitchell and ECKANKAR, has plagued ECKANKAR since its first publication in the late 1970s. Controversy surrounded the departure of Darwin Gross and his succession by Harold Klemp. Many Minnesotans initially objected to the building of ECKANKAR’s temple in suburban Minneapolis, claiming that a cult was appearing in their midst. However, under Klemp’s capable leadership, ECKANKAR has managed to survive these controversies and settled into a more stable life among the West’s relatively new alternative religions.

Address:

ECKANKAR
P.O. Box 27300
Minneapolis, MN 55427
<http://www.eckankar.org>

Roger E. Olson

Sources:

- Klemp, Harold. The Spiritual Exercises of ECK. Minneapolis: ECKANKAR, 1993.
- Lane, David Christopher. The Making of a Spiritual Movement: The Untold Story of Paul Twitchell and ECKANKAR. Del Mar, CA: Del Mar Press, 1993.
- Olson, Roger E. “ECKANKAR: From Ancient Science of Soul Travel to New Age Religion.” In America’s Alternative Religions, edited by Timothy Miller. Albany: State University of New York Press, 1995.
- Twitchell, Paul. ECKANKAR: The Key to Secret Worlds. Minneapolis: Illuminated Way Publishing, 1969, 1987.

Ecuador

Ecuador has been inhabited for thousands of years by a variety of Native peoples, the most prominent being the Quichua (or Quechua), whose northern center was at Quito. In the fifteenth century, these peoples were united into the Inca Empire. In 1534, the Spanish conquistadors found an Inca world weakened by leadership succession differences and captured Quito. Ecuador was subsequently incorporated into the Viceroyalty of Peru, where it remained until 1717, when it was transferred to the new Viceroyalty of New Granada (which included Colombia, Venezuela, and Panama).

Spanish rule in Ecuador was ended in 1822 with the victory of forces under Antonio José de Sucre. In 1830, Ecuador withdrew from Greater Colombia and became an independent nation. The country continued under the leadership of an oligarchy of large landowners. Their stranglehold on the country prevented land reform, and

Status of religions in Ecuador, 2000-2050

Followers	2000			2025	2050
	total	%	rate
Christians	12,340,000	97.6	2.09	17,231,000	20,076,000
Roman Catholics	11,900,000	94.1	2.02	16,500,000	19,200,000
Protestants	240,000	1.9	2.64	430,000	620,000
Independents	225,000	1.8	3.47	500,000	750,000
Nonreligious	173,000	1.4	4.17	400,000	900,000
Ethnoreligionists	66,200	0.5	1.89	75,000	85,000
Atheists	17,700	0.1	2.38	29,000	50,000
Baha'is	15,600	0.1	0.80	15,000	15,000
Buddhists	13,300	0.1	1.71	17,500	24,000
Chinese folk-religionists	12,300	0.1	1.57	15,000	18,500
Jews	3,800	0.0	1.21	4,200	5,000
Muslims	1,700	0.0	3.67	4,000	9,000
other religionists	2,800	0.0	2.00	5,000	7,500
Total population	12,646,000	100.0	2.11	17,796,000	21,190,000

their ineptitude led to the loss of parcels of the country to its neighbors. Present-day Ecuador represents approximately 20 percent of the original territory at the time of independence from Spain.

In 1979, Ecuador adopted a new constitution, which gave it democratic government, but its stability has been challenged by both the armed forces and U.S. foreign policy.

The Quichua people make up some 40 percent of the present population of Ecuador. However, it is among the various smaller ethnic groupings in the most remote parts of the country, especially in the headwaters of the Amazon, that traditional religion has survived.

The Spanish introduced the ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH in the 1530s, and a diocese was established at Quito in 1545. Making use of the infrastructure of the Incas, both Spanish authority and the Catholic faith was established across the land. Following the initial diocesan synod in 1595, a program of evangelizing the Amazon began. Steady progress in Christianizing the land was pursued through the eighteenth century; however, the country's independence from Spain brought problems. The church's dependence upon Spain for priests and financial support led to a sharp cutback in services delivered.

Problems were somewhat relieved by the concordat between Rome and Quito in 1862, but anticlerical forces in control of the government repudiated the concordat in 1895. Church lands were appropriated by the government in 1908. The church's problems, especially in pastoral leadership, have led to the development of a popular folk Catholicism, which integrates many elements of traditional Native culture, often including many elements of traditional religious thought and practice.

The church has also traditionally identified with the ruling Spanish elite and was thus unprepared to deal with the radical program introduced by the bishop of Riobamba, who identified his diocese with the rights of the Quichua and other Native peoples and who introduced a broad range of programs to not only draw them closer to the church but to bring reforms to the secular society in the rural regions. By the mid-1970s, he was being excluded from meetings of the other bishops, but he was able to retain the support of Rome.

In the face of almost total Catholic hegemony in Ecuador, James Thompson (1788–1854), the agent of the British and Foreign Bible Society, initiated a Protestant presence in the country. His trip through the country in 1824 did not, however, bear fruit until 1896, when the Gospel Missionary Union sent three missionaries, who were able to take advantage of the opening provided by the repudiation of the country's concordat with the Vatican. They initiated work along the Pacific coast and inland among the Jivaro, but had their greatest success among the Quichua in the Andes highlands. The work matured as the Evangelical Missionary Union Church, the largest non-Catholic church in Ecuador.

The CHRISTIAN AND MISSIONARY ALLIANCE (CMA) opened work in 1897, the only other Protestant or FREE CHURCH group to arrive before the turn of the century. The SEVENTH-DAY ADVENTIST CHURCH started work in 1905. It was the only group other than the CHRISTIAN BROTHERS to begin work prior to World War II. After World War II, Ecuador became a major focus of Evangelical Christian missions in South America, in part due to the attention brought by the work of the World Radio Missionary Fellowship. In 1931, Clarence Jones and Reuben E. Larson, both of CMA background, began Ecuador's first radio station with a 250-watt transmitter in Quito. HCJB, or the Voice of the Andes as it is best known, was the first religious radio station outside of the United States.

After World War II, as other groups developed their own radio ministries, they gave support to HCJB and used it to build their various mission activities. The most famous incident associated with the station occurred in the 1950s, beginning with the murder of five CMA missionaries who, with the assistance of HCJB, had pioneered work among the Auca people. Their deaths were widely reported and debated in Evangelical circles, as was the move of the wife and sister of two of those who were killed to Auca land and the eventual conversion of the people who had murdered the missionaries.

The interior of the Church of San Luiz in Otavalo, Ecuador (J. Pugh/TRIP)

Among the groups to come to Ecuador in the post-war period was the INTERNATIONAL CHURCH OF THE FOURSQUARE GOSPEL, a Pentecostal body that found immediate response. Twenty years after its arrival in 1953, it had become the second largest non-Catholic church in the country, though rivaled by the United Pentecostal Church, which entered only a few years later. Several older American denominations—the Evangelical and Reformed Church (now a constituent part of the UNITED CHURCH OF CHRIST), the Presbyterian Church in the U.S. and the United Presbyterian Church in the U.S.A. (both now constituent parts of the PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH [U.S.A.]), and the Evangelical United Brethren (now a constituent part of the UNITED METHODIST CHURCH)—combined resources in 1945 to create the United Andean Mission. Although they intended to launch work in several countries, work has been limited to Ecuador with only modest success, though their various medical, agricultural, and educational efforts have been well received.

A number of indigenous Ecuadorian churches have emerged, including the Church of the Holy Spirit (1967), the Universal Independent Church of Christ (1970), and the Voice of Jesus Christ Church, all Pentecostal groups. Most recently, the Association of Indian Evangelical Churches has become the largest Protestant or FREE CHURCH in the country, the only one with more than 100,000 adherents.

Interdenominational work began with the Inter-Mission Fellowship, which included a spectrum of Protestant missionary efforts. It was superseded by the Ecuador Evangelical Fellowship in 1965, a reflection of the emergence of autonomous Ecuadorian denominations. The fellowship was the site of tensions between those groups more oriented to Evangelicalism and those more closely related to the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES (WCC) and the broader ecumenical scene. At present there is no ecumenical group related to the WCC, while the more evangelical churches are united in the Confraternidad Evangélica de Chile, which in turn is associated with the WORLD EVANGELICAL ALLIANCE. There is a small Jewish community in Ecuador, whose approximately one thousand members are found primarily in Quito and Guayaquil. There are more than five thousand Chinese, many of whom continue in their Buddhist and Taoist faith. The BAHÁ'Í FAITH, introduced at mid-century, has experienced a growth period, especially among some of the Native people and those of African descent.

Although Quito was a magnet for Evangelical Christians, it has not drawn missionaries of the new religions in great numbers. The ANCIENT AND MYSTICAL ORDER ROSAE CRUCIS (usually known as the Rosicrucians) has had a lengthy presence.

Sources:

- Alonso, I., et al. La Iglesia en Venezuela y Ecuador. Fribourg: FERES, 1962.
- Carpenter, K. "Religion in Ecuador: From Paganism to Protestantism." Doctoral thesis, Bethany Theological Seminary, 1993.
- Goffin, A. M. The Rise of Protestant Evangelism in Ecuador, 1895–1990. Gainesville: University Press of Florida, 1994.
- Kuhl, P. E. "Protestant Missionary Activity and Freedom of Religion in Ecuador, Peru, and Bolivia." Ph.D. dissertation, Southern Illinois University, 1982.
- Stoll, D. Is Latin America Turning Protestant? The Politics of Evangelical Growth. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1990.

Ecumenical Patriarchate/ Patriarchate of Constantinople

After the Emperor Constantine moved the Roman imperial capital to the town of Byzantium in 330 and renamed it New Rome or Constantinople, the church of that city took on new importance. Thus the First Council of Constantinople in 381 elevated it to a patriarchal rank second only to Rome. The Council of Chalcedon in 451 expanded the boundaries of the patriarchate and gave it jurisdiction over bishops of dioceses in "barbarian" lands. For the next thousand years, the church of Constantinople was the center of the church in the Eastern Roman Empire (usually referred to as the Byzantine Empire). It also presided over expansive missionary activity into the Balkans and the Slavic lands to the northeast. After the schism with the ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH of the West in the eleventh century, Constantinople assumed the first rank among the Eastern Orthodox churches. The steady decline of the Byzantine Empire was hastened by the brief Latin conquest by crusaders in the thirteenth century and the gradual encroachment of the Ottoman Turkish armies.

The fall of Constantinople to the Turks in 1453 ironically enhanced the authority of the patriarchate dramatically. Although its territory had been reduced on the eve of the conquest to the small remnants of the Byzantine empire, the Ottoman sultans established a new millet (administrative) system, which gave the patriarchate civil as well as religious authority over all the Orthodox Christians within their vast empire. Then, when the Ottoman Empire went into decline and new Christian states emerged in the Balkans in the nineteenth century, the patriarchate began to give up its ecclesiastical authority there and granted autocephalous status to the new churches in those countries. A small Greek kingdom gained independence in 1832, and in the wake of that independence, the expansion of the kingdom in the wake of the Balkan Wars of 1912–1913, and an extensive exchange of populations between Greece and Turkey in the 1920s, the great majority of the Greek-speaking faithful of the patriarchate have been transferred to the autocephalous ORTHODOX CHURCH OF GREECE. Anti-Greek rioting in Istanbul (the modern Turkish name of the city) in the 1950s precipitated another exchange of populations, such that now fewer than five thousand Greeks remain in Turkey itself.

Nevertheless, the Patriarchate of Constantinople retains jurisdiction over the semi-autonomous Orthodox Church of Crete as well as the Orthodox dioceses in the Dodecanese Islands and the monastic republic of Mount Athos, all of which are in Greece. The Greek Orthodox in the so-called Diaspora also come under the patriarchate's jurisdiction, notably including the faithful in the Americas, Australia, and Western Europe. The total membership has been estimated at 3.5 million. It administers a number of theological institutions in Greece and elsewhere.

Today the Ecumenical Patriarchate of Constantinople is seen as the first in honor of the autocephalous Orthodox churches and a point of unity among them, with the patriarch's role defined as primus inter pares, first among equals. The patriarchate does not have the authority to intervene in the internal affairs of the autocephalous churches, but it does coordinate pan-Orthodox activities, such as decisions to participate in ecumenical dialogues with other Christian bodies. Occasionally it calls the Orthodox churches together for common action when problems arise. The patriarchate is governed by a permanent twelve-member Holy Synod, which is presided over by the Ecumenical Patriarch. The patriarchate's position in Istanbul remains precarious. The Turkish government closed down its only theological school on the island of Halki in 1971, and the tiny Greek community undergoes periodic harassment. But in 1989 the patriarchate was able to dedicate a new administrative center to replace the one that had been destroyed by fire in 1941. This gave it the capacity to fulfill its role more effectively and to host important church events.

Address:

Ecumenical Patriarchate of Constantinople
His Holiness Bartholomew, Archbishop of Constantinople
Rum Patrikhanesi
34220 Fener-Istanbul
Turkey
<http://www.patriarchate.org>

Ronald Roberson

Sources:

- Geanakoplos, Deno. A Short History of the Ecumenical Patriarchate of Constantinople (330–1990): "First among Equals" in the Eastern Orthodox Church. Brookline, MA: Holy Cross Orthodox Press, 1990.
- Hussey, J. M. The Orthodox Church in the Byzantine Empire. Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1986.
- Maximos, Metropolitan of Sardes. The Oecumenical Patriarchate in the Orthodox Church: A Study in the History and Canons of the Church. Translated by Gamon McLellan. Thessaloniki: Patriarchal Institute for Patristic Studies, 1976.
- Runciman, Steven. The Great Church in Captivity: A Study of the Patriarchate of Constantinople from the Eve of the Turkish Conquest to the Greek War of Independence. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1968.

Églises Baptistes de la RCA

Baptists entered French Equatorial Africa in the 1920s through the efforts of a fundamentalist Baptist missionary, William C. Haas (1873–1924). Haas had been a missionary in the Belgian Congo with the interdenominational Africa Inland Mission, but in 1920 founded an independent Baptist missionary society called Baptist Mid-Missions (now headquartered at 7749 Webster Rd., Cleveland, OH 44130). Haas joined the first missionary team that established a mission in what is today the Central African Republic (CAR) in 1921. They established initial stations at Sibut, Crampel, and Bangasou, where Haas was buried after his death in 1924.

The mission had steady growth over the next generation, and by the 1960s it had founded over a hundred churches. It also had established a hospital and six medical dispensaries. In pursuit of its educational ministry, it owns a printing press and has opened several bookstores. Its two bible schools and seminary have assisted the development of indigenous leadership. It has contributed to the larger effort of translating the Bible into African languages by publishing the Bible for the Sango people. Its workers translated the New Testament and cooperated with the Grace Brethren Mission on the Old Testament.

In 1963, the mission was organized as the Association of Baptist Churches. The work was hampered by the discovery of some moral problems among the leadership, and the association was dissolved in the 1970s. In 1996, it reorganized under its present name. The work has continued to grow, and by the mid-1990s it reported 6,000 members in 375 churches. It is the largest non-Catholic religious group in the CAR.

The Églises Baptistes has its headquarters at Bangui. As a fundamentalist group, it has no connection with either the BAPTIST WORLD ALLIANCE or the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES. Baptist Mid-Missions remains an independent society, but has the recommendation of the General Association of Regular Baptist Churches, from which it draws much of the resources that it uses to continue its support of the Églises Baptistes. In 1998, it reported 41 associated personnel in the CAR. An account of the work is found at the Baptist Mid-Missions Web site at <http://www.bmm.org/Fields/car.html>.

Two schisms of the Églises Baptistes led to the formation of the Union Fraternelle des Églises Baptistes (1977) and the Association des Églises Baptistes Centrafricaines.

Sources:

- Field Surveys*. Cleveland, OH: Baptist Mid-Missions, 1977.
- Strong, Polly. Burning Wicks. Cleveland, OH: Baptist Mid-Missions, 1984.

Egypt

Egypt, considered by many Westerners as the cradle of their civilization, was for millennia the home to a flourishing religious tradition (a tradition whose belief and practice lie beyond the reach of this encyclopedia). That religion, which in a revisionist form has reappeared outside of Egypt in Neo-Paganism, was in stages replaced by Christianity and then Islam, whose entrance into the Nile Valley initiated the modern religious history of the region.

Egypt was incorporated into the kingdom of Alexander the Great (356–323 B.C.E.) and afterwards came under the Ptolemaic dynasty, which continued to rule until Egypt became a Roman province (31 B.C.E.). It remained within the Roman Empire through its transformation into the Byzantine Empire until the Arab conquest in 642. The Arabs imposed their language and created the most definitive break with the country's ancient past.

In the tenth century, the Arabs were replaced by the Fatimids, Ismaili Muslims who had emerged at the end of the prior century in Tunisia and spread across North Africa. The Fatimids established their capital in Cairo and established the famed Al-Azhar University. The Fatimid Empire extended from Palestine to Tunis but in the twelfth century was weakened by war with the Christian crusaders. In 1171, the Arabs were able to drive the Fatimids from power and

Status of religions in Egypt, 2000–2050

Followers	2000			2025	2050
	total	%	rate
Muslims	57,780,000	84.4	2.01	81,170,000	96,869,000
Christians	10,346,000	15.1	1.70	13,710,000	16,650,000
Orthodox	9,317,000	13.6	1.60	12,000,000	14,000,000
Protestants	550,000	0.8	3.24	780,000	1,200,000
Independents	225,000	0.3	2.84	509,000	850,000
Nonreligious	325,000	0.5	3.96	700,000	1,250,000
Atheists	63,600	0.1	2.04	100,000	150,000
Baha'is	5,800	0.0	1.43	8,000	12,000
Jews	1,400	0.0	1.23	1,500	1,800
Hindus	680	0.0	1.29	1,000	1,600
Total population	68,470,000	100.0	1.97	95,615,000	114,844,000

reestablish themselves as the dominant force in the land. They held sway until 1517, when the rising Ottoman (Turkish) Empire assumed control.

Formally, Egypt remained a part of the Ottoman Empire into the nineteenth century. In 1805 an Albanian, Muhammad Ali, seized control and began the process of modernization. In the 1860s, Egypt gained a degree of autonomy, but it had already become the object of economic forces operating out of Western Europe. It had joined with the French to create the Suez Canal but in 1874 sold its interest in the canal to pay its debts to the British. In 1882 the British landed an occupation force, and in 1914 Egypt became a British protectorate. Though the protectorate was officially discontinued in 1922, the British presence continued in force through World War II, when Egypt was a staging area for Allied opposition to the Germans in North Africa.

In 1948, the weakened rulers of the country, who claimed royal prerogatives, were overthrown in a coup led by Colonel Gamal Abdel Nasser (1918–1970). Nasser installed a secular government. He created an international crisis by successfully nationalizing the Suez Canal in 1956. Two years later he united Egypt with Syria in the short-lived United Arab Republic (1958–1961). Nasser's last years were overshadowed by the Israeli defeat of Egypt in the 1967 Six-Day War. His successor, Anwar Sadat, reoriented Egypt toward the West and worked out an agreement with Israel, both of which led to his assassination in 1981. He was succeeded by the present president, Hosni Mubarak.

Christianity looks to the account of Mary and Joseph fleeing to Egypt with the infant Jesus (Matthew 2:14–15) as the beginning of Christianity in the country. Then, according to tradition, after the church was established in Jerusalem, St. Mark was sent to Egypt where the first Christian Church was called together in Alexandria. Over the next centuries, the church spread through the Nile Valley, and the successive bishops of Alexandria became major participants in the evolution of Christian theology through the fifth century. Egypt was also among the first places that Christian monasticism emerged as an important part of church life.

Egyptian Christians faced a major crisis in the middle of the fifth century; as part of the larger theological project of defining the nature of the Trinity, the Christian movement was concerned with defining the nature of Christ. Christ's two natures (human and divine) were defined by the Council of Chalcedon in 451. The Egyptian leadership rejected the formula espoused by Chalcedon and were labeled Monophysites (from the Greek for "one nature") by those who accepted Chalcedon (who in Egypt were called Melkites). The theological battle continued over the next centuries, during which time the majority of the Christians in Egypt were united in their refusal to acknowledge the Chalcedonian position (while claiming that they fully accepted the Nicene Creed and were not Monophysites). Nevertheless, the Egyptian Church broke relations with the rest of the Christian world, especially the patriarch in Constantinople (the ECUMENICAL PATRIARCHATE OF CONSTANTINOPLE being the nominal center of Eastern Orthodoxy).

Christian history was then interrupted by the Arab invasion in the seventh century and the entrance of Islam. Christianity was most negatively affected by the subsequent warfare between Egypt, the Muslims headquartered in Baghdad, the Byzantine Empire, and the Crusaders. Many Christians converted to Islam; however, the weakened COPTIC ORTHODOX CHURCH, as it was then called, survived, and eventually the Egyptian Christians became a recognizable subgroup in Egyptian society.

Islamic history also followed a somewhat disjunctive course, beginning with the Ismaili Fatimid rulers in 969. The Fatimid Caliph established the new city of Cairo as his capital and in 1072 founded Al-Azhar University. The Ismailis represented a form of SHI'A ISLAM that looked for leadership of the Muslim world in the descendants of

Muhammed Ali Mosque, Cairo (Corel)

Muhammad through his daughter Fatima and son-in-law Ali. They split with the main body of Shiites in the eighth century when the heir to the throne, Ismail, the son of Imam Ja'far al-Sadiq, died before he could assume authority. Most Shiites threw their support to Ismail's brother, but the Ismailis recognized the descendents of Ismail as the beginning of a new line of imams. The new lineage was named after Fatima.

The Ismailis also proposed the belief that prior to the end of time, a seventh prophet (Muhammad being the sixth) would arise. This prophet, the Mahdi, from the Arabic for "rightly guided," was expected to bring no new revelation, but to bring political unity.

In 1021, a Fatimid prince was declared Ismail resurrected and the one prophesied to overthrow the Arab ruler, a follower of Sunni Islam, then ruling from Baghdad. He failed to accomplish his assigned task, and the resulting splintering of the Ismailis contributed to the weaknesses that led to their overthrow in 1171. Among the groups emerging from the Ismailis was the mystical Tawfiyya Sufi Brotherhood.

Although the reestablishment of Arab leadership in Egypt did not mean the disappearance of the Ismailis, they did move into a minority status, while the Sunni Muslims took the lead. Sunnis are split among the major schools, with the SHAFIITE and MALIKITE SCHOOLS dominating in the north and the HANAFITE SCHOOL in the south.

Islam, in its several factions, remains the faith of more than 80 percent of Egypt's 68 million citizens. In the post-Nasser era, Islam in Egypt has developed a set of structures that now offer leadership to the religious community. The Supreme Council for Islamic Affairs has the assigned purpose of spreading Islam in Egypt and around the world. To that end it prints literature in a number of languages and makes grants for the construction of mosques and the education of youth. Al-Azhar University is one of the leading Muslim centers of higher learning in the world, and its scholars are called upon to make decisions concerning disputed questions in the Muslim community. Reorganized in 1961, it has developed a school for the training of females, a training institute for future Muslim leaders from around the world, and radio and printing facilities to assist the spread and purifying of Islam. Finally, the Council for Islamic Studies has as its purpose the vivification of Islamic culture. Both the university and the council have been strongly opposed to the more politically radical elements (often lumped together under the term Islamic Fundamentalism) in Egypt.

Egypt was the originating point of the Muslim Brotherhood, a conservative group allied with the WAHHABI leadership in Saudi Arabia. The brotherhood gained political clout each time the Saudi government put money into the financially ailing Egyptian economy. It has advocated the institution of Islamic law as the law of the land, but has lost considerable support since individuals associated with it were deemed responsible for Sadat's death. Mubarak has banned all overt political activity by the brotherhood, while developing friendly relations with the United States. Under Mubarak the country has become more secular, at the same time resisting any attempt to return to the socialist policies favored by Nasser.

Egyptian Christianity entered the modern world in two main forms, the COPTIC ORTHODOX CHURCH and the much smaller GREEK ORTHODOX PATRIARCHATE OF ALEXANDRIA AND ALL AFRICA (in communion with the ECUMENICAL PATRIARCHATE OF CONSTANTINOPLE). Then, in the seventeenth century, the ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH entered Egypt through missionary activity instituted by the Capuchins and JESUITS. While building up Latin Rite congregations, the spread of Catholicism also led to the formation of the Eastern Rite COPTIC CATHOLIC CHURCH. As Egypt's population diversified, congregations of the MARONITE CATHOLIC CHURCH and the MELKITE CATHOLIC CHURCH also emerged (as have congregations of a variety of Orthodox churches, such as the RUSSIAN ORTHODOX CHURCH and the ARMENIAN APOSTOLIC CHURCH).

Protestants opened work in 1854 through the efforts of the United States-based Associate Reformed Presbyterian Church (now a constituent part of the PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH [U.S.A.]). Their proselytizing activity, primarily among Coptic Christians, led to the formation of the Coptic Evangelical Church, now known as the EVANGELICAL CHURCH—SYNOD OF THE NILE. Other independent Evangelical churches and missionary agencies launched missions, among the most substantive being that of the FREE METHODIST CHURCH in 1899. The work of Evangelicals was disrupted by the wars in 1956 and 1967, when foreign missionaries had to leave the country. Several missionary agencies reassigned their missionaries to more friendly locations. Among the churches retaining at least a presence in the country are the CHRISTIAN BROTHERS (since 1869) and the CHURCH OF GOD (CLEVELAND, TENNESSEE). Many of the Evangelical groups have their base among expatriates (especially Greeks and Lebanese) living and working in Egypt.

Anglicans began work in 1847, and their parishes are now part of the EPISCOPAL CHURCH IN JERUSALEM AND THE MIDDLE EAST, based in Israel.

Egypt, of course, plays a major role in the beliefs of Judaism, and there has been a significant Jewish community in Egypt at least since the fifth century B.C.E. It was in Egypt that the Hebrew Torah was translated (around 250 B.C.E.) into Greek, a work known as the Septuagint translation. That community survived through the years of Roman and then Muslim rule until 1948. After the establishment of the state of Israel, most of Egypt's Jews migrated, especially spurred by the hostility directed toward them following the wars in 1956 and 1967. At present only some two hundred Jews remain in Egypt, supplemented by a small expatriate community that has recently emerged in Cairo. There are four Jewish synagogues in the Cairo metropolitan area.

Few of the newer twentieth-century religions have tried to colonize Egypt. Although Buddhists speculate on the possibility that Buddhist missionaries reached Egypt in ancient times, there are no known Buddhist centers in the country at present. There is a small community of the BAHAI FAITH, but no Hindus, Sikhs, or representatives of the new religious movements (though it is likely that some of these groups are represented by members in the expatriate community).

Sources:

Berger, M. Islam in Egypt Today: Social and Political Aspects of Popular Religion. New York: Cambridge University Press, 1970.

Ekalesia Niue

Meinardus, O. F. A. Christian Egypt: Ancient and Modern. Cairo: American University in Cairo Press, 1977.

Solihin, S. M. Copts and Muslims in Egypt: A Study in Harmony and Hostility. Leicester, UK: Islamic Foundation, 1991.

Sullivan, Denis J., and Sana Abed-kotob. Islam in Contemporary Egypt: Civil Society vs. the State. Boulder, CO: Lynne Rienner Publishers, 1999.

Watt, W. Montgomery. The Majesty That Was Islam. New York: Praeger Publishers, 1974.

Ekalesia Niue

The Ekalesia (Church) of the tiny island nation of Niue was initiated by missionaries from Samoa sent by the LONDON MISSIONARY SOCIETY in the 1840s. They were joined by Europeans in the 1860s, first William George Lawes (1839–1907) in 1861 and his successor Frank E. Lawes in 1868. The Lawes brothers organized the mission along Congregationalist lines and trained missionaries who later went to Papua and launched the church there. In successive decades, the church developed a close relationship with the Congregational Union of New Zealand. At the same time, the country of Niue developed strong ties to New Zealand. Fifteen thousand Niueans now reside in New Zealand, and Niueans have special citizenship rights there.

The mission in Niue became independent in 1966. It has congregations in New Zealand, and a continuing relationship to the Congregational Union of New Zealand and the PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH OF AOTEAROA NEW ZEALAND, which also has congregations in Fiji with Niuean members.

The Ekalesia Niue includes as members 1,675 of the island’s 2,300 residents. It is a member of the WORLD ALLIANCE OF REFORMED CHURCHES.

Address:

Ekalesia Niue
P.O. Box 25
Alofi
Niue
via New Zealand

Source:

Bauswein, Jean-Jacques, and Lukas Vischer, eds. The Reformed Family Worldwide: A Survey of Reformed Churches, Theological Schools, and International Organizations. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans, 1999.

El Salvador

El Salvador, known as Cuscatlán (Land of the Jewel) by the indigenous peoples, is the smallest of the Spanish-speaking countries in Central America, bordered by Guatemala, Honduras, and Nicaragua in the north, east, and south, respectively. It, unfortunately, has the most severely degraded environment in the region, and 70 percent of the country’s large peasant population continue to live in poverty.

By 1525, Pedro de Alvarado, one of the cruelest of the Spanish conquistadors, had subdued—with extreme brutality—most of the indigenous population of Central America. The territory of El Salvador became part of the Captaincy-General of Guatemala during the Spanish colonial period, and for some time after independence was part of a federated Republic of Central America (1821–1838), achieving its full independence in 1838. The nation experienced a series of political struggles, assassinations, and revolutions until 1886, when conservative rule brought about political stability for the next forty-five years. During this period communal Native lands were privatized, coffee became the main crop, and the coffee oligarchy consolidated its control of the country’s political, economic, and social life, an oligarchy dominated by the legendary “Fourteen Families.”

The oligarchy and the army—the National Guard was created in 1922—have historically stood behind the democratic facade that this country has erected, based on a series of constitutions since independence. Political competition among the elite and a series of brutal military dictatorships created a long history of repression by the army, which alienated members of the small middle class and generated decades of discontent among the masses. A series of popular uprisings during the 1930s resulted in the infamous “Massacre of 1932,” in which about 30,000 people were brutally murdered by the army. The history of corruption and repression by the nation’s “public security forces” continued unabated for decades. During the 1970s opposition leaders organized a revolutionary movement that led to a civil war, beginning in 1979, against a despotic regime that was supported by the U.S. government.

During this civil war, the international press reported a series of massacres that began to sway public opinion in the United States against the U.S. government’s support of the Salvadoran government. Most important was news of the Roman Catholic priests who were killed during the period 1977–1991, including the priest Rutilio Grande (1977),

Status of religions in El Salvador, 2000-2050

Followers	2000			2025	2050
	total	%	rate
Christians	6,122,000	97.6	2.06	8,755,000	10,608,000
Roman Catholics	5,723,000	91.2	2.07	8,000,000	9,600,000
Independents	710,000	11.3	2.59	1,200,000	1,550,000
Protestants	530,000	8.4	2.40	940,000	1,300,000
Nonreligious	93,800	1.5	2.96	200,000	460,000
Baha'is	27,700	0.4	3.32	60,000	100,000
Ethnoreligionists	21,900	0.4	3.18	30,000	42,000
Atheists	5,100	0.1	1.92	8,500	15,000
Muslims	1,800	0.0	1.30	2,500	4,000
Chinese folk-religionists	780	0.0	1.13	900	1,100
Buddhists	600	0.0	1.09	750	1,000
Jews	560	0.0	1.23	700	800
other religionists	1,900	0.0	2.44	3,500	5,000
Total population	6,276,000	100.0	2.08	9,062,000	11,237,000

Archbishop Oscar Arnulfo Romero (1980), and six Jesuit priests (1989) at the University of Central America. Then, in 1980, four Catholic nuns and lay workers were raped and killed by the military, which occasioned a temporary suspension of U.S. military aid. Most of the massacres ended in 1992 with the signing of a UN-sponsored Peace Accord. Subsequently, the military and police forces were purged, but only a few were brought to trial. El Salvador has witnessed progress toward greater economic and political stability during the 1990s and into the twenty-first century, despite the fluctuations of the world economy.

The country's religious landscape has been divided since the early 1900s, as scores of Protestant missionary agencies have gained a beachhead. That situation was exacerbated in the 1960s with the emergence of a strong national Evangelical movement, which has challenged the historically dominant position of the ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH in El Salvador.

Also, since the 1920s, the Catholic Church has been increasingly divided internally between those who have supported the status quo—the conservative alliance of church and state—and those who have supported a more liberal and progressive agenda, based on defending the human rights of the marginalized sectors of society—an agenda termed the “Preferential Option for the Poor” in the language of the Second Vatican Council and the Medellín Council of Latin American Bishops, held in the 1960s. More recently, the Catholic CHARISMATIC MOVEMENT has presented a third option to many Roman Catholics, whose families have been torn apart by armed conflict and forced geographical relocation due to the civil war and by internal conflicts between conservatives, liberals, and progressives, both in the political and religious arenas.

The history of Protestantism in El Salvador is distinct from other Central American countries, in that pioneer foreign mission efforts were directed toward the Spanish-speaking population from the very beginning. In other republics, the presence of English-speaking immigrants, largely West Indians, often served as a cultural and linguistic bridge for new missionaries prior to engaging in ministry to the Spanish-speaking or Indian populations.

The earliest Protestant groups to enter El Salvador were the newly formed Central American Mission (now known as CAM International), whose first missionaries arrived in 1896, the California FRIENDS Mission (Quakers) in 1902, the American Baptists in 1911, and the SEVENTH-DAY ADVENTIST CHURCH in 1915, in addition to an independent Canadian Pentecostal missionary, Frederick Mebius (1869–1944), who arrived in 1904.

By 1936, these Protestant church bodies were well established in El Salvador and had achieved some notable success among the general population of Spanish-speaking mestizos (people of mixed Spanish and Indian blood) and the remnant of early Amerindians who had settled in the territory now known as El Salvador: the Pipil (Uto-Aztecan), the Lenca (Micro-Chibchan, the largest Indian group in the country), and the Kekchí (Mayan). The Quakers developed an extensive ministry among the Kekchí in a region known as the Three-Nation Triangle (El Salvador, Guatemala, and Honduras), which includes northwestern El Salvador. However, the Quakers have not prospered as well as other Protestant groups in El Salvador.

Despite numerous stages of growth and decline, the CAM-supported association of churches has become one of the largest non-Pentecostal denominations in the country. From the establishment of its first church in 1898 in Ila-pango, near San Salvador, this independent fundamentalist denomination had planted 21 churches and 83 mission stations in eight of the country's 14 departments by 1936, largely due to the efforts of a team of U.S. missionaries and Salvadoran pastors. In 1935, the CAM-related churches were organized under a national council of leaders and became known as the Evangelical Church of El Salvador. By 2000, it had about 16,700 members and 340 churches and missions.

The American Baptist Home Mission Society (now an integral part of the AMERICAN BAPTIST CHURCHES IN THE U.S.A.) entered El Salvador in 1911, where it soon developed strong educational and church work, especially in San Salvador and Santa Ana. By 1936, a chain of churches and mission stations, many completely under national leadership, had been established, and work had begun among the Pipil in the western coastal region, near Santa Ana. The BAPTIST ASSOCIATION OF EL SALVADOR was organized in 1934, and by 1992 reported 51 congregations and 4,975 members. It is the only church headquartered in El Salvador that is a member of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES. In the 1970s, several other Baptist groups began work in El Salvador: the SOUTHERN BAPTIST CONVENTION and the Baptist International Mission, which combined had 65 congregations and 12,714 members.

In 1915 the Seventh-day Adventist Church sent a missionary couple to El Salvador, and in 1916 their first church was established in San Salvador. However, the Adventists only reported 5 churches and 325 members in 1936, an effort that was curtailed probably because of competition from the growing Pentecostal movement. In 2000, this denomination of the Adventists had 195 congregations and about 29,200 members. Three other Adventist-related bodies also exist in El Salvador: the SEVENTH DAY ADVENTIST REFORM MOVEMENT, founded in 1956, the Church of God–Seventh Day and the Israelite Church of God.

In 1904, two years prior to the Pentecostal revival in Los Angeles, Frederick Mebius began one of the earliest Pentecostal movements in Latin America, known as the Apostolic Churches of the Apostles and Prophets. The controversial Pentecostal doctrine preached by Mebius and his Salvadoran assistants brought him into conflict with leaders of the CAM-related churches, the American Baptists, and the Adventists. Mebius and his helpers traveled throughout the countryside in an itinerant preaching ministry that by 1930 produced 25 loosely organized congregations, known as the Free Apostolic Churches of the Apostles and Prophets. Several splinter groups soon appeared—the Apostolic Church of the Apostles and Prophets (1935) and the Apostolic Church of the Upper Room (1930s). Two other groups follow in this same tradition, the Apostolic Church of God in Christ (1950) and the Apostolic Church of the New Jerusalem (1977), as well as many independent congregations. The largest of these, the Apostolic Church of the Apostles and Prophets, reported 300 congregations and about 48,400 members in 2000.

After the arrival of the ASSEMBLIES OF GOD in El Salvador in 1929, efforts were made to bring some order to this assortment of independent Apostolic churches, but this attempt was only partially successful. In 1930, 12 of these churches became founding members of the Assemblies of God, whose missionaries had entered the country at the request of Francisco Ramírez Arbizu, one of the leading pastors in the Free Apostolic Movement. However, most of the Free Apostolic leaders remained independent. The Assemblies of God later enjoyed a phenomenal period of growth, attributed to the employment of indigenous church principles during the administrations of Ralph D. Williams (1902–1982) and Melvin Hodges (1909–1988). In 1992, the Assemblies of God reported some 123,442 members and 1,250 churches, making it the largest Protestant denomination in the nation.

As might be expected, the Assemblies of God have not been immune to schismatic movements, with several splits occurring during the 1960s, including the Pentecostal Evangelical Union (1954), the Evangelical Mission of the Holy Spirit (1960), the Garden of Eden Evangelical Church (1962), the Evangelical Mission of the Voice of God (1969, the largest of these groups), and the Evangelical Pentecostal Church of El Salvador (1974).

The arrival of the CHURCH OF GOD (CLEVELAND, TENNESSEE) in El Salvador in 1940 brought H. S. Syverson, the general overseer of the Church of God in Central America, in contact with Mebius, who agreed to work together under the auspices of the former, although there were some obvious doctrinal differences between the two church traditions. Nevertheless, Mebius worked with the Church of God for several years, until his death in 1944 at an advanced age. By 1980, this denomination reported 191 congregations and about 12,000 members; in 1992, the work had grown to 392 congregations and 19,281 members.

Additional Pentecostal denominations also entered El Salvador in the period 1950–1980. The Pentecostal Church of God of New York and the Pentecostal Church of God of Puerto Rico, both with historical ties to the Assemblies of God, arrived in 1966. The Prince of Peace Evangelical Church from Guatemala began work in the early 1960s. The Elim Christian Mission from Guatemala arrived in the late 1970s. The CHURCH OF GOD OF PROPHECY, called the Universal Church of God of Prophecy in El Salvador, arrived in 1950, but its progress has been slowed by several divisions: the Church of God Holy Zion (1952), the Fountain of Life Church of Prophecy (1969), the Fundamental Church of God of Prophecy (1972), the Holy Zion Church of God of Prophecy (1974), and the City of Zion Church of God of Prophecy (also in 1974). In 1992, the Pentecostal Church of God (New York) reported 58 churches and 5,665 members; the Universal Church of God of Prophecy had 92 churches and 5,151 members; the Fountain of Life Church of Prophecy had 74 churches and 6,727 members; and the Prince of Peace Church reported 430 churches and 19,111 members. In 2000, Elim Christian Mission had about 110 churches and 23,400 members. Another large Pentecostal denomination is the Marantha Church of God, which had about 240 churches and 10,200 members in 2000.

The Oneness (“Jesus Only”) Pentecostal Movement is represented in El Salvador by two denominations: the APOSTOLIC CHURCH OF FAITH IN JESUS CHRIST (1948) and the UNITED PENTECOSTAL CHURCH INTERNATIONAL (1975). In 2000, the former had about 32 churches and 1,250 members, and the latter had an estimated 800 churches and 32,100 members.

Other non-Pentecostal denominations in El Salvador include the following: the LUTHERAN CHURCH–MISSOURI SYNOD (1953), the independent CHURCHES OF CHRIST (1963), the CHURCH OF THE NAZARENE (1964), the United World Mission, the CHRISTIAN BROTHERS, the Evangelical Mennonites, the CHRISTIAN REFORMED CHURCH, and several smaller groups.

In addition to the rapid growth of Evangelical denominations during the past few decades, El Salvador has also witnessed the emergence of a diversity of non-Protestant Christian groups, such as the JEHOVAH’S WITNESSES (410 kingdom halls with 23,000 members in 2000) and the CHURCH OF JESUS CHRIST OF LATTER-DAY SAINTS (107 temples with 30,100 members in 2000) from the United States; the LIGHT OF THE WORLD CHURCH from Guadalajara, Mexico; MITA CONGREGATION and Voice of the Cornerstone from Puerto Rico; the God is Love Church and the UNIVERSAL CHURCH OF THE KINGDOM OF GOD from Brazil; the Growing in Grace Churches, based in Miami, Florida; UNITY SCHOOL OF CHRISTIANITY; and the CHRISTADELPHIANS, among others.

Also, a few non-Christian groups have appeared, adding to the historical presence of the Jewish community, which arrived from Spain during the colonial period or from other European countries, mainly in the aftermath of World Wars I and II. Other non-Christian religions in El Salvador include ISLAM, BUDDHISM, and several Hindu-related groups: the Sawan Kirpal Ruhani Mission (Science of Spirituality), the MASTER CHING HAI MEDITATION ASSOCIATION, and the INTERNATIONAL SOCIETY FOR KRISHNA CONSCIOUSNESS (popularly known as the Hare Krishnas).

Two public opinion polls give a current picture of religious affiliation in the nation. The first was conducted in 1988 by researchers at the Central American University in San Salvador; it revealed that 67.1 percent of the total population were Catholics, 16.4 percent Protestants, 4.8 percent other religions, and 14.7 percent no religion/no response. The second was done in 1995 by CID-Gallup and showed that Catholics were 67.8 percent of the population, Protestants 16.8 percent, other religions 2.3 percent, and no religion/no response 13 percent. These studies, which had a margin of error of plus or minus 3 percent, reveal that no significant changes have taken place in religious affiliation since the mid-1980s, although an Evangelical study by CONESAL published in 1993 claimed that the Protestant population was over 30 percent of the total population and consisted of more than 4,200 congregations and 514,286 baptized members.

Clifton L. Holland

Sources:

- Brierly, Peter, ed. World Churches Handbook. London: Christian Research, 1977.
- Despertar '93: El Desarrollo de la Iglesia Evangélica 1982–1992 y los Desafíos para el Año 2000*. San Salvador, El Salvador: CONESAL, 1993.
- Holland, Clifton L., ed. World Christianity: Central America and the Caribbean. Monrovia, CA: MARC-World Vision, 1981.
- “La Religión para los Salvadoreños.” Serie Informes, no. 17. San Salvador, El Salvador: Universidad Centroamericana José Simeón Cañas, 1988.
- Read, William R., et al. Latin American Church Growth. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans, 1969.
- Sobrino, J., et al. Companions of Jesus: The Jesuit Martyrs of El Salvador. Maryknoll, NY: Orbis, 1990.
- Wilson, Everett A. “Sanguine Saints: Pentecostalism in El Salvador.” Church History 52 (June 1983): 186–198.

Elan Vital/Divine Light Mission

Shri Hans Maharaj Ji (1900–1966) founded the Divine Light Mission (DLM, which later became Elan Vital) in India during the 1930s. Hansji Maharaj was a disciple of Sarupanand, a guru in the lineage of Shri Paramhans Advait Mat centered in Guna, a district in the state of Madhya Pradesh. Shri Paramhans Advait Mat (which is based primarily on the teachings of the Sant tradition and shabd [sound current] yoga) is a guru-based organization with centers throughout India. The group’s teachings are remarkably similar to those of the Radhasoami tradition, which was founded in Agra, India, around the same time period (mid to late nineteenth century). Apparently Hansji split with the main center of Shri Paramhans Advait Mat in a succession dispute after his guru’s death. This led him to create the Divine Light Mission. Hansji incorporated almost every tenet and practice he had learned in Shri Paramhans Advait Mat into his own teachings, including a nuanced understanding of sound and light meditation, lacto-vegetarianism, mahatmas, initiation, receiving “knowledge,” and enjoying divine nectar.

When Maharaj Ji died in 1966, Prem Pal Singh Rawat, the youngest of four sons and only eight years old at the time, declared himself to be his father’s spiritual successor and a satguru, or Perfect Master. A precocious child, he was said to have meditated from the age of two, and he spoke to crowds at six. Although ascension to authority usually accrues to the oldest not the youngest son, neither his brothers nor his mother challenged his proclamation.

Elim Pentecostal Church

He assumed his father's name, Maharaj Ji, but later became known as Maharaji.

In 1971, at the age of thirteen, Guru Maharaj Ji traveled to England and the United States and was almost immediately a media sensation. He established headquarters in Colorado, but the largest number of devotees (called Premies, meaning lovers of God) was in Britain. Barker estimates there were about 8,500 Premies in the early 1970s. But success was short-lived. In 1973, a mass gathering in Houston's Astrodome, called to proclaim a millennium of peace, drew only a fraction of the crowd anticipated and turned out to be a financial disaster. A year later, at age sixteen, the young guru married his secretary, who was eight years his senior. This marriage fractured family ties and resulted in a reorganization of DLM. Some of his followers began to drift away.

For the next several years Maharaj Ji struggled with reorganization—how to present the message and how to meet mounting financial obligations. In 1979, headquarters were moved from Denver, Colorado, to Miami, Florida, where the responsibility for meeting payrolls and caring for Premies became an increasing burden. Maharaj Ji came to see the Indian spiritual motif as unnecessary, perhaps even a hindrance, to reaching a larger audience. In the early 1980s he began closing down ashrams, changed the name of his organization to Elan Vital, repackaged the message, changed his name to Maharaji, and redefined himself as a teacher.

The primary teaching of the Divine Light Mission involved the “receipt of Knowledge,” and the primary teaching of Elan Vital involves “receipt of Knowledge.” The path to receiving Knowledge is the practice of four meditation techniques. The meditation techniques the Maharaji teaches today are the same he learned from his father, Hansji Maharaj, who, in turn, learned them from his spiritual teacher, “Knowledge,” claims Maharaji, “is a way to be able to take all your senses that have been going outside all your life, turn them around and put them inside to feel and to actually experience you. . . . What you are looking for is inside you” (<http://www.elanvital.org/Knowledge.htm>).

The young guru, who willingly accepted the spiritual titles of “Lord of the Universe” and the “Perfect Master,” considered these meditation techniques to be fundamental in the quest for spiritual existence. Gradually he came to see the meditation techniques as mere technology, which can be applied to “secular enlightenment.” He now claims that “Knowledge’ is not spiritual, nor is it a religion.” And, of course, Elan Vital is not a religious organization.

Having set the Radhasoami perspective in a new context, as a secular personal-growth teaching, Maharaji has found a new following. He continues to travel the world lecturing and extending Knowledge to uncounted numbers, while the organization has assumed a low profile in many lands where it was formerly an object of intense controversy. In the process of change, he left behind a number of former members of the Divine Light Mission, who have formed a network to continue to communicate about their experiences. Elan Vital itself supports an Internet site, given below, where organizational contacts in countries around the world are listed.

Address:

Elan Vital
P.O. Box 6130
Malibu, CA 90264-6130
<http://www.elanvital.org>

Jeffrey K. Hadden and Eugene M. Elliott III

Sources:

- Barker, Eileen. New Religious Movements: A Practical Introduction. London: Her Majesty's Stationery Office, 1989.
- Barrett, David V. The New Believers. London: Cassell, 2001.
- Downton, James V. Jr. Sacred Journeys: The Conversion of Young Americans to Divine Light Mission. New York: Columbia University Press, 1979.
- Elan Vital/Divine Light Mission. Posted at <http://religiousmovements.lib.virginia.edu/nrms/elanvital.html>. Accessed November 28, 2001.
- Maharaji. Listen to the Cry of Your Heart: Something Wonderful Is Being Said. Malibu, CA: Visions International, 1995.
- Maharaj Ji. The Living Master. Denver, CO: Divine Light Mission, 1978.
- Messner, Jeanne. “Guru Maharaj Ji and the Divine Light Mission.” In The New Religious Consciousness, edited by Charles Y. Glock and Robert N. Bellah. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1976.

Elim Pentecostal Church

The Elim Pentecostal Movement is the second largest Pentecostal denomination in Great Britain. A 1996 survey reported an overall average Sunday attendance of 63,500 in the 432 churches in the United Kingdom, Channel Isles, and Ireland. The largest British Elim congregation is Kensington Temple, London, operating with 120 satellite churches and over 7,000 members.

Elim was the large oasis that the children of Israel came upon during their wanderings in the wilderness (Exodus 15:27). In 1915, George Jeffreys (1889–1962), a Welsh evangelist, launched the Elim Evangelistic Band in Monaghan, Ireland. The Band's first church was established in Belfast in 1916. Eventually a formalized constitution was agreed upon in 1922, coinciding with Jeffreys's shift of attention from Ireland to England. In 1929, the group became known as the Elim Foursquare Gospel Alliance, reflecting the group's Pentecostal emphases on Jesus as Savior, Baptizer in the Holy Spirit, Healer, and Coming King (a presentation of the Christian gospel developed by Albert Benjamin Simpson [1843–1919], founder of the CHRISTIAN AND MISSIONARY ALLIANCE). In common with other Pentecostal groups, Elim has a high regard for the Bible, together with an expectation of a personal awareness of salvation and subsequent empowerment by the Holy Spirit. Distinctive to Elim amongst British Pentecostals, tongues are not insisted upon as the evidence of the baptism in the Holy Spirit.

In 1934, administrative power passed from Jeffreys to an elected Executive Council. From this time onwards, there was major conflict between Jeffreys and E. J. Phillips (1893–1973), Elim's chief administrator, concerning both doctrinal and ecclesiological issues. This culminated in Jeffreys's resignation in 1939 to form the Bible Pattern Church Fellowship.

After World War II, there was an emphasis upon organized evangelism, continuing Jeffreys's methodology of gathering large crowds of people and preaching a message of salvation through Christ's death and the possibility of divine healing. However, the results in the postwar period did not match the successes of Jeffreys during 1924–1934. It was the CHARISMATIC MOVEMENT in the 1960s that provided the spur for a revitalized Pentecostal spirituality and a renewed emphasis upon church growth. From the 1980s onwards there has been an increased emphasis upon the social effects of the gospel, with many churches offering such programs as child care, employment schemes, and advice centers.

Elim has international links with churches and workers in forty-five countries. These range from large national churches such as the CHURCH OF PENTECOST, which has approximately one million adherents in Africa, to individual workers working with various local congregations.

The Elim Church is governed by the Conference, made up of ministers and laity, which meets annually. Up to 1998, membership of the Conference was only open to men. The national work is divided into regions, each having its own regional superintendent, who is elected to this position by the ministers and lay representatives from within the region. These officers form the basis of the Executive Council. Each church has a leadership session, consisting of the pastor/s, together with elders and deacons. The church session is responsible for the general oversight of the church, although the minister has the responsibility for the services. The membership of the church is open to any who are "born again."

Address:

Elim Pentecostal Church
P.O. Box 38
Cheltenham, Gloucestershire GL50 3HN
United Kingdom
<http://www.elim.org.uk>

Neil Hudson

Sources:

Cartwright, Desmon W. The Great Evangelists. Basingstoke: Marshall Pickering, 1986.

Hudson, D. N. "A Schism and Its Aftermath. An Historical Analysis of Denominational Deception in the Elim Pentecostal Church, 1939–1940." Ph.D. dissertation, King's College, 1999.
Wilson, Brian. Sects and Society. London: Heinemann, 1961.

The Emissaries

The Emissaries were founded in Tennessee in 1932 by Lloyd Arthur Meeker (1907–1954), who had come to the realization that "he was completely responsible for the state of his world and the quality of his experience in it"; he published his ideas under the name of Uranda. In 1940 he met Martin Cecil (1909–1988), later the seventh marquess of Exeter, who took Meeker's teachings and developed them into a more systematic and comprehensive system. Their writings and talks are collected in a series of volumes entitled The Third Sacred School. Meeker died in a plane crash in 1954, and Cecil took over the leadership.

Most Emissaries live in eight main communities of from 20 to 150 people, the largest being in the United States, at Sunrise Ranch in Colorado (established in 1945), and at Martin Cecil's cattle ranch in British Columbia, Canada (1948); the British community is at Mickleton House in Gloucestershire, England (1980). Until Cecil's death in 1988, leadership was centralized; for example, each community would read a transcript of a talk by Cecil at their Sunday services. After his death, his son Michael Cecil (b. 1935) decentralized the leadership, putting it into the hands of a governing board of trustees and locally selected representatives. After this change, the transition took some time, but eventually each community became used to being self-governing.

The primary purpose of the Emissaries is "to encourage the experience and expression of divine identity." Individuals working together can "become the critical mass which empowers creative change on a wider scale." They see themselves as part of the wider NEW AGE MOVEMENT of people "whose passion is to express the spirit of God on Earth." Their main spiritual practice is attunement, "a form of vibrational alignment and healing . . . a process of clarifying and deepening our connection with Being and Source . . . a vital component of the spiritual renaissance emerging in the world today." During attunement, one member will hold his hands over areas of another member's body, usually without touching, in order to activate "a free flow of life energy between physical and spiritual dimensions" and to "bring health and well-being on very deep and fundamental levels."

Members, typically aged thirty-five to fifty, tend to come from the professions, the arts, and the media. Emissary communities frequently host conferences, courses, and seminars by a wide range of other New Age groups and teachers.

The Emissaries are also known as the Emissaries of Divine Light. Earlier names for the movement include the

Ennōkyō

Foundation for Universal Unity, the Ontological Society, and the Integrity Society. There is an estimated world membership of six hundred.

Address:

The Emissaries
Sunrise Ranch
5569 North County Rd. 29
Loveland, CO 80538
<http://www.emissaries.org>

David V. Barrett

Sources:

Barrett, David V. The New Believers. London: Cassell, 2001.
Cecil, Martin. Being Where You Are. New Canaan, CT: Keats Publishing, 1974.
Exeter, Martin. Beyond Belief: Insights to the Way It Is. Loveland, CO: Foundation House Publications, 1986.

Ennōkyō

Ennōkyō is a Japanese new religion founded by Fukata Chiyoko (1887–1925). In 1919 she received a special message from Kami (a Shinto deity) to become the messenger of Kami and a tool for the sake of the world. After this revelation from Kami, she began to practice faith healing and to help people avoid misfortune by predicting troubles they would otherwise encounter. Gradually she attracted a number of followers, and in about 1931, six years or so after her death, they organized two groups, Ennō Shūhōkai and Ennō Hōonkai, to carry on her essentially mystical and faith-healing teachings. Both groups dissolved in 1941, but were reestablished as Ennōkyō after World War II and registered by the government in 1948. A feature unique to Ennōkyō is “Shūhō”: Its spiritual training sessions take the form of a dialogue between paired individuals to resolve problems in daily life. Its main scripture is Ennō kyōten, which includes the teachings of Sei (sincerity), Ai (love), and Zen (virtue).

Ennōkyō is currently led by Fukata Mitsuhiro. As the new century began it reported 459,935 members.

Address:

Ennōkyō
1–1 Muramori
San Nan-machi, Hikami-gun
Hyogo prefecture
669–3192
Japan

Keishin Inaba

Source:

Hori, Ichiro, et al., eds. Japanese Religion: A Survey by the Agency for Cultural Affairs. Tokyo: Kodansha International, 1972.

Episcopal Anglican Church of Brazil

The CHURCH OF ENGLAND assumed that South America was not to be considered a missionary field because of the prior presence of the ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH; thus it was left to the EPISCOPAL CHURCH, based in the United States, to initiate the Anglican tradition in Brazil. In 1889, two young seminarians, James W. Morris and Lucien Kinsolving (1862–1929), representatives of the American Church Missionary Society, arrived in Porto Alegre. A decade later Kinsolving became the first Anglican bishop of South Brazil.

In 1905, the Mission Board of the Episcopal Church assumed responsibility for the mission. By 1913, there were 1,304 communicant members. As the mission grew, the Church of England opened chaplaincies in various parts of the country to serve expatriate communities.

By 1962, there were 185 parishes in the Brazilian church, divided into three dioceses. Slowly the church leadership had become indigenous, but few parishes were self-supporting. Following the designation of a fourth diocese, in 1965, the church was set apart as an autonomous province, though it has still continued in a partnership relation with the Episcopal Church, which supplies various resources for it to draw upon.

The church (Igreja Episcopal do Brasil) is led by its primate, currently Mt. Rev. Glauco Scares de Lima. There are seven dioceses. The synod of the church, its highest legislative body, meets triennially, and it appoints an executive committee to administer the church's affairs between synod meetings. As the new century began, the church reported a membership of 70,000. It is a member of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES and the worldwide ANGLICAN COMMUNION.

Address:

Episcopal Anglican Church of Brazil
Av. Ludolfo Boehi, 256
Teresopolis, C.P. 11510
Cep 90841–970 Porto Alegre, RS
Brazil

Sources:

Manross, William W. A History of the American Episcopal Church. New York: Morehouse-Gorham, 1950.
Van der Bent, Ans J., ed. Handbook/Member Churches/World Council of Churches. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 1985.

Episcopal Church

The Episcopal Church is the primary representative of the Anglican tradition in the United States and continues the work of the CHURCH OF ENGLAND established in the British American colonies. The first Anglican worship service appears to have been held in 1587, at the colony

Cathedral Church of St. Peter and St. Paul, in Washington, D.C., an Episcopal cathedral chartered by the U.S. Congress in 1893 and established on Mount St. Alban. (Corel) originally established at Roanoke, Virginia. The first permanent congregation was assembled in Jamestown, Virginia, in 1607.

Through the seventeenth century, the church spread through the British colonies, and continued to exist there when Anglicanism was temporarily banned in England during the days of the Commonwealth (1649–1660). In 1692, British authorities finally forced the establishment of a congregation even in Puritan Boston. At the end of the century Dr. Thomas Bray led in the founding of the SOCIETY FOR THE PROPAGATION OF THE GOSPEL IN FOREIGN PARTS (SPG). The American church received the benefits of the society in the form of hundreds of ministers who volunteered to organize and serve American congregations through the next seventy years. Though no bishop was ever appointed for the colonies, Bray returned in 1696 as the representative of the church, with some limited episcopal powers.

The American Revolution was a devastating blow to the development of the church. Most members of the church, and especially the ministers, were identified with those settlers who opposed the Revolution. Following the ending of hostilities, all of the SPG missionaries moved to Canada or returned to England. They left only a small group of ministers committed to residing in the new nation and caring for the four hundred Church of England congregations.

The immediate problem for the church was the securing of an American bishop. A bishop was needed to perform a variety of functions, not the least being the ordination of new ministers. In 1783, the clergy of Connecticut took the lead and selected Samuel Seabury to go to England for consecration. The British bishops were ready to consecrate him, but he withdrew when he found himself as an American citizen unable to swear allegiance to the British crown. Thwarted, he traveled to Scotland, where he found bishops with the Nonjuring Church of Scotland (now the SCOT-TISH EPISCOPAL CHURCH) who in 1784 consecrated him.

Back in the United States, Seabury found the Connecticut clergy ready to follow his leadership, but the churches and ministers in the colonies to the south balking. They still wanted orders directly from England: Some were resentful of the Connecticut brethren acting without consulting them; some did not like Seabury. In the meantime, while Seabury was in Europe, they had met in convocation and found a leader in William White. They developed a constitution for a new church and selected White and Samuel Provost as their prospective bishops. In 1787, the pair sailed for England, where they found that Parliament had passed legislation that allowed for the consecration of men who did not take the oath of loyalty if they were designated for service outside the country. They returned with valid episcopal orders.

In 1789, the Americans organized the Protestant Episcopal Church in the U.S.A. and adopted a constitution. A slightly edited edition of the Prayer Book used as a guide to worship by the Church of England was adopted. It included a basic liturgy reflective of the middle way between Protestantism and Roman Catholicism that had defined Anglicanism since the reign of Elizabeth I. The church also accepted the Church of England's Thirty-nine Articles of Religion.

As the church developed, it served many of America's elite, and a majority of the country's presidents during the early half of the nineteenth century were drawn from its ranks. It also developed the several recognizable groups that had emerged in British Anglicanism after the Commonwealth. One group, the Anglo-Catholics, followed what was known as a High-Church path and favored rapprochement with the ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH. On the other extreme, those who advocated a Low-Church policy tended to identify with the Protestant community and were noted for their evangelical and missionary zeal. Between the two groups were the latitudinarians, who followed a middle road between the two extremes.

The Low-Church wing tended to be the strongest in the church through the early half of the nineteenth century, though the Anglo-Catholic wing was always present. However, during the nineteenth century Anglo-Catholicism asserted itself in the Church of England, and its influence began to grow in the Episcopal Church. As its support grew, a crisis developed, leading in 1873 to the withdrawal of Kentucky bishop George David Cummins (1822–1876) and many of the Low-Church adherents to found the Reformed Episcopal Church. Although the church weathered the controversy, its worship life was changed. New churches tended to be built in the gothic revival style, and the communion table tended to be replaced with an altar.

In the decades after World War II, the Episcopal Church became deeply involved in the ecumenical movement. A long-time member of the Federal Council of Churches, it was one of the original members of the National Council of Churches in the United States of America. It was also a charter member of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES. As a leader in the liberal Protestant community in America, it was also profoundly affected by the social changes during the last half of the twentieth century. Many of the bishops and clergy assumed leadership roles in the Civil Rights movement, and the church was among the first Anglican bodies to consider the admission of women to the priesthood.

The church faced a new round of significant controversy in the 1970s, controversy created by dissent among members over the church's involvement in various social crusades, the laxity of morals perceived within the clergy, and a set of changes introduced into the Prayer Book. These issues culminated in 1976 when the General Convention of the church approved the ordination of women to the priesthood. As a result of that action, a number of ministers and members left and organized several new denominations that saw themselves as representatives of a Traditional Anglican movement.

The Episcopal Church has its headquarters in New York. The church is divided into dioceses, each led by a bishop, and from the bishops, one is selected as the church's presiding bishop. The General Convention is the highest legislative body in the church. In 1967, the General Convention adopted the present name of the church, a shortened form of its original name.

The Episcopal Church has primarily seen itself as serving the American Anglican community and concentrated its missionary efforts on growing westward as the United States enlarged itself through the nineteenth century. It did found congregations and chaplaincies overseas to serve expatriate communities. Through the Convocation of Anglican Churches in Europe, it cooperates with the Diocese of the Church of England and the LUSITANIAN CHURCH OF PORTUGAL to sponsor English-speaking Anglican churches throughout continental Europe.

In 1834, Low-Church forces in the church founded the American Church Missionary Society. The first missionary was an African American, James M. Thompson, appointed for work in Africa. That same year, 1835, Rev. Henry Lockwood was sent as the first missionary to China. Work has expanded to Japan and Haiti. It then became focused on Latin America. The church's Board of Missions took control of the foreign missions in the years after the American Civil War (1860–1865). The work of that board is currently in the hands of the Episcopal Partnership for Global Ministries, the name reflecting the changed relationship between the American Church and the now mature Anglican churches worldwide. Some former mission churches have chosen to remain part of the Episcopal Church, and Province II includes the Diocese of Micronesia, Province VIII, the Diocese of Taiwan, and Province IX, the Diocese for Colombia, the Dominican Republic, Ecuador, and Honduras.

In the years immediately after World War II, the Episcopal Church developed a special relationship with the PHILIPPINE INDEPENDENT CHURCH, a church formed by former Roman Catholics in the Philippine Islands. In 1948, Episcopal bishops passed Anglican episcopal orders to the Philippine Church, and the two churches have remained in communion since that time.

Address:

Episcopal Church
815 2d Ave.
New York, NY 10017
<http://ecusa.anglican.org>
<http://www.episcopalchurch.org>

Sources:

Elgin, Kathleen. The Episcopalians: The Protestant Episcopal Church. New York: D. McKay Co., 1970.
Manross, William W. A History of the American Episcopal Church. New York: Morehouse-Gorham, 1950.
Webber, Christopher L. Welcome to the Episcopal Church. Harrisburg, PA: Morehouse Publishing, 2000.

Episcopal Church in Jerusalem and the Middle East

The Episcopal Church in Jerusalem and the Middle East brings together the many efforts by members of the CHURCH OF ENGLAND to establish missions from North Africa to the Arabian Peninsula. Though Anglican missionaries had visited the area in the eighteenth century, it was not until 1818 that permanent work began, in Egypt. Two years later, Joseph Wolff (1795–1862) of the London Church's Ministry among the Jews came to Jerusalem to begin evangelizing the Jewish residents. Wolff's work expanded to neighboring Lebanon and Syria in the next couple of years. The Ministry of the Jews reached Tunisia as early as 1829.

These initial efforts were strongly affected at the beginning of the 1840s by the decision of church leaders in England and Germany to establish a Christian presence in Jerusalem in the form of an Anglican bishop. They chose Michael Solomon Alexander (1799–1845), a German rabbi who converted to Christianity and subsequently become an Anglican priest. He accepted the position as a means of converting Jews. In 1851, under the leadership of Alexander's successor, Samuel Gobat, the church turned its attention to the Arab population. He built schools and ordained the first Arab priests. Work expanded to Jordan in 1860.

The first Anglican in Iran, Henry Martyn (1781–1812), arrived as a chaplain for the East India Company. A gifted linguist, he translated the Bible into Persian. The fledgling work was given a new infusion of life in 1844 with the arrival of missionaries with the Ministry among the Jews to work with the Jewish community in Tehran. The CHURCH MISSIONARY SOCIETY (CMS) arrived in 1869 to begin more general work among the Persian Muslims. The mission grew into a church, and a bishop was named in 1912. The Diocese of Persia remains the most substantial work in the province.

Work on the Arabian Peninsula began in 1839, following the British capture of Aden. Anglican chaplains formed the first church. Over the years, other churches were opened and closed as British presence waxed and waned, but at the beginning of the twenty-first century those that remain now serve primarily expatriate personnel residing in the area as oil workers.

During the twentieth century, Anglican work across North Africa and the Middle East underwent changes as new dioceses were created, and then in the post–World War II world, the move to grant autonomous status to missions took control. In 1920, Egypt and the Sudan were separated from Jerusalem as a new diocese. Sudan became a separate diocese in 1945. With the creation of an independent Israel, in 1948, the majority of the Anglicans left, and many Arab Christians moved to neighboring countries. CMS institutions in Jaffa and Lydda were closed, as was the Bishop Godat school in Jerusalem. Many other properties were abandoned and then destroyed or confiscated by the new government.

In 1957, the bishopric of Jerusalem was elevated into an archdiocese. That same year, the Diocese of Jordan, Lebanon, and Syria was set apart and the following year, the Diocese of Egypt was suspended and the work attached to Jerusalem. That diocese was revived in 1974 and now includes all the work in Egypt, Libya, Tunisia, Algeria, Ethiopia, Somalia, and Djibouti.

Finally, in 1976, the archbishopric was replaced by a new independent Anglican province, the Episcopal Church in Jerusalem and the Middle East. Faik Ibrahim Haddad (r. 1976–1984) was the first bishop of Jerusalem in the new province. At the same time, the Diocese of Jordan, Lebanon, and Syria was absorbed into the Diocese of Jerusalem, and a new Diocese of Cyprus and the Gulf was created by combining the Anglican parishes on Cyprus and the Arabian Peninsula. The dioceses of Egypt and Iran became a part of the new province.

The province is currently led by the bishop of Egypt. He is president of the Central Synod that represents the four dioceses (Jerusalem, Egypt, Iran, and Cyprus and the Gulf). The president is elected for a five-year term and may be reelected once. The church oversees St. George's College in Jerusalem. The church is a member of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES and the Middle East Council of Churches.

Address:

Central Synod, Episcopal Church in Jerusalem and the Middle East Diocesan Office
P.O. Box 87
Zanalek, Cairo
Egypt

Sources:

The Church of England Yearbook. London: Church Publishing House, published annually.
El-Assal, Raih Abu. "Anglicanism in Jerusalem." In Anglicanism: A Global Communion, edited by Andrew Wingate et al. London: Mowbray, 1998.

Episcopal Church in the Philippines

The Episcopal Church in the Philippines originated in the religious ferment that followed the annexation of the Philippine Islands by the United States in 1898. The EPISCOPAL CHURCH in the United States sent missionaries, who arrived in 1902 with instructions to target those segments of the population not otherwise affiliated with any Christian church. Among groups so identified were the Chinese who lived in Manila, various ethnic groups in northern Luzon, and the Muslims of Mindanao and Sulu.

The work progressed steadily, and a set of primary and secondary schools was established. After World War II, during which the church suffered considerably from the Japanese occupation, a move to build indigenous leadership was vigorously pursued, and the number of Filipino priests increased sharply during the 1950s. The first Filipino bishop was consecrated in 1967.

The church has had a unique relationship with the PHILIPPINE INDEPENDENT CHURCH, which has Anglican orders, and in 1961 the two churches entered into full communion. Until 1990, the work in the Philippines was part of Province VIII of the Episcopal Church in the United States, but in that year it was set apart as an autonomous jurisdiction. The church is at one in faith and practice with the wider ANGLICAN COMMUNION, and led by its prime bishop. There are five dioceses.

The Episcopal Church in the Philippines is a member of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES.

Address:

Episcopal Church in the Philippines
 P.O. Box 10321
 Broadway Centrum
 1112 Quezon City
 Philippines

Sources:

- The Church of England Yearbook*. London: Church Publishing House, published annually.
- Hoke, Donald, ed. The Church in Asia. Chicago: Moody Press, 1975.
- Kane, J. Herbert. A Global View of Christian Missions. Grand Rapids, MI: Baker Book House, 1971.

Equatorial Guinea

Equatorial Guinea is a small country located on the western coast of Africa. It consists of a small area on the mainland, sandwiched between Cameroon and Gabon, and several islands. The capital, Malabo, is located on one of the islands, Bioko, formerly known as Fernando Po. The territory on the mainland, known as Rio Muni, is largely a rainforest, located less than two degrees from the equator. The major group in the country is Bantu, but there are many Ibo and Efik people on Bioko and Fang and Ndowe people on the mainland.

The Ndowe people worked with the European slave traders in the eighteenth century, while the Fang refused to participate in the slave trade and retreated from the coastal lands. In 1777–1778, Portugal ceded their claims on the area to Spain; before Spain could take control, however, the British moved in and occupied Bioko as a staging area for its conquest of Nigeria. Spain finally took control in the 1850s. Rio Muni had been French territory, but it came into Spanish hands in 1901. Equatorial Guinea remained attached to Spain until independence was proclaimed in 1969. Subsequently, Francisco Macias Nguema (d. 1979) moved quickly to consolidate his power as the new president. He viciously destroyed all visible opposition, and as repression grew, the country went through a decade of bloodshed. In 1978, all churches were ordered closed.

In 1979, Marcus Nguema was arrested and executed following a coup, but the succeeding regime gathered a repu-

Status of religions in Equatorial Guinea, 2000-2050

Followers	2000		2025	2050
	total	% rate
Christians	400,000	88.4 2.58	709,000	999,000
Roman Catholics	391,000	86.4 2.57	675,000	955,000
Independents	18,000	4.0 3.23	40,000	60,000
Protestants	15,200	3.4 0.07	22,000	27,000
Muslims	18,300	4.1 2.73	32,000	45,000
Nonreligious	13,800	3.1 2.30	25,000	37,000
Ethnoreligionists	9,600	2.1 0.64	8,000	7,000
Atheists	8,100	1.8 3.02	16,000	25,000
Baha'is	2,300	0.5 5.17	4,800	8,000
Hindus	230	0.1 4.18	600	1,200
Total population	453,000	100.0 2.56	795,000	1,122,000

tation similar to Nguema's. The leader of the new regime, General Teodoro Obiang Nguema Mba Nzago (b. 1942), continues to lead the country. A slow transition to a more democratic government began in the 1990s.

Each of the peoples of the territory now constituting Equatorial Guinea had a traditional indigenous religion. These religions survive among a small minority of the public, mostly among the Fang people, estimated at less than 5 percent of the total population. The Fang acknowledge a supreme deity named Nzame and venerate ancestral spirits called Bekon. The primary religious functionaries are the uganga (also called ngang), to whom is attributed the ability to contact the spirits and manipulate supernatural powers.

The ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH entered in the fifteenth century through the successive European powers that operated within the area. Spanish Catholicism provides the major background of the present church. The work was organized under a prefecture in 1855. The prefecture was elevated to a vicariate in 1904. There are presently two dioceses, one for Rio Muni and one for the islands. More than 80 percent of the population are baptized Catholics. The church faced many problems in the 1970s—the expulsion of priests, nuns, and bishops, the arrest of priests and lay leaders, and the closing of churches. However, it rebounded during the 1980s and 1990s.

The first Protestants in Equatorial Guinea were Baptists. They entered in 1841 but were expelled in 1858. Presbyterians began work on the island of Corisco in 1850 and moved into Rio Muni fifteen years later. In 1933, the Worldwide Evangelization Crusade (now WEC International), a Protestant sending agency founded by pioneer missionary C. T. Studd (1860–1931), began work in Rio Muni among the Okak (Fang) people. In 1970, the crusade merged its work with the Presbyterians to form the Evangelical Church, an independent Presbyterian body. In 1870, missionaries arrived from the Primitive Methodist Church in England. They established work on Fernando Po, which in 1893 expanded into Nigeria, where it has become a large organization and member of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES. In 1973, the Evangelical Church and the Methodists in Equatorial Guinea united to form the Presbyterian Church of Equatorial Guinea.

Various indigenous movements have appeared in the country. The BWITI movement, also known as the Church of the Initiates, is a revival of worship of ancestral spirits among the Fang people. Worship includes use of a psychedelic substance found in the eboga root. It emerged at the end of the nineteenth century in neighboring Gabon and has survived in spite of attempts to suppress it.

In 1937, the Presbyterians experienced a schism, when some members adopted a more congregational form of organization and formed as the Assembly of Brethren (Assemblies de los Hermanos). The JEHOVAH'S WITNESSES entered the country immediately after World War II.

Among the more interesting groups in the country is the Free Protestant Episcopal Church, a small autonomous Anglican jurisdiction that originated in England and established itself in Nigeria. The work on Bioko, mostly among English-speaking expatriate Africans, is part of the Diocese of West Africa (possibly the most successful arena of the Free Church's life).

The CHURCH OF JESUS CHRIST OF LATTER-DAY SAINTS has a small work with less than a hundred members that is attached to the Ivory Coast Abidjan Mission. The SEVENTH-DAY ADVENTIST CHURCH established its Equatorial Guinea Mission in 1986 and now has several hundred members. The BAHÁ'Í FAITH entered Equatorial Guinea in the 1960s. There is a minimal Muslim presence, primarily Sunnis of the MALIKITE SCHOOL.

Marcus Nguema was an atheist, and as his regime proceeded he first supported the spread of ATHEISM and eventually moved against the churches because of their refusal to cooperate with his atheist programs. During this time, atheism became established among one segment of the public.

Sources:

Fernández, C. Misiones y misioneros en la Guinea Española.

Madrid: Editorial Co. SA, 1962.

Pujadas, P. L. La Iglesia en la Guinea Ecuatorial. Madrid: Editorial

Iris de Paz, 1968.

Eritrea

Eritrea is a relatively new country whose existence has been challenged throughout the twentieth century. It is located along the southern shore of the Red Sea between Djibouti and the Sudan. It was originally inhabited by various African peoples believed to have come into the area from the Sudan in ancient times. At some point between 1000 and 400 B.C.E., the Sabeans, a Semitic group, arrived in Eritrea and integrated with the local population. Because of its long shoreline, the area was a prize seized by different conquering forces over the centuries. Land-bound Ethiopia especially saw Eritrea as its entryway to the ocean. Eritrea was incorporated into the Axum Empire, which reached from its base in northern Ethiopia to include Yemen. Christianity was introduced in the fourth century, and the ETHIOPIAN ORTHODOX TEWAHEDO CHURCH, established in 332, became the religion of the nation's ruling elite.

Muslims occupied the islands of the Daklak Archipelago at the beginning of the eighth century, and the religion began to penetrate the coastal area in subsequent centuries. Islam enjoyed its greatest success following Ahmad Granj of Harar's establishment of it in the Amhara highlands in 1506. In 1541, a Portuguese fleet called into the area by the Ethiopians destroyed much of the Islamic culture along the coast to the north and east of Ethiopia.

A new era in Eritrean history began in 1885 when Italy occupied the region. Eritrea became the staging area for Italy's subsequent invasion of Ethiopia. Defeated, the Italians received formal control of Eritrea in the subsequent negotiations. They named it a colony in 1900. In the 1930s,

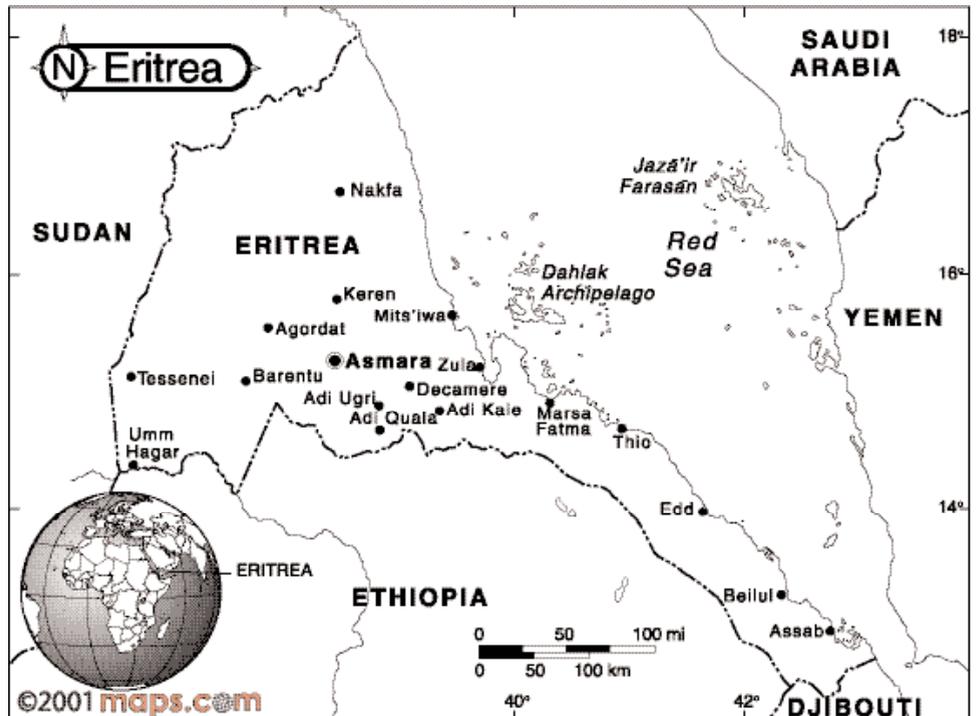

Status of religions in Eritrea, 2000-2050

Followers	2000			2025	2050
	total	%	rate
Christians	1,944,000	50.5	2.90	3,400,000	4,690,000
Orthodox	1,775,000	46.1	2.94	3,075,000	4,200,000
Roman Catholics	130,000	3.4	2.66	250,000	350,000
Protestants	22,000	0.6	3.24	46,000	99,000
Muslims	1,722,000	44.7	2.82	2,955,000	3,872,000
Nonreligious	159,000	4.1	4.25	300,000	500,000
Ethnoreligionists	23,800	0.6	2.84	22,000	15,000
Baha'is	1,200	0.0	2.90	2,000	4,000
Hindus	760	0.0	2.46	1,200	2,500
Atheists	250	0.0	2.34	500	1,800
Total population	3,850,000	100.0	2.91	6,681,000	9,085,000

Mussolini again tried to invade Ethiopia from Eritrea. Mussolini was defeated in 1941, and the British came into the region to replace the Italians. In 1950, the United Nations named Eritrea a federated state within the Ethiopian Empire. In 1962, it was incorporated fully into Ethiopia, a move rejected by many Eritreans who had developed a new sense of national identity during the fight against Italy. Efforts to gain Eritrea's independence began in the 1950s, and hostilities aimed at independence began in 1961. After thirty years of warfare, in 1991, while Ethiopia underwent a government change, a provisional government was established in Eritrea by the rebel forces. Following a highly monitored referendum, the new national state was declared in 1993 and most of the world's countries immediately recognized its existence. The capital is in Asmara.

Islam and Orthodox Christianity vie for the hearts of the Eritrean people. The Sunni Muslim community, mostly of the SHAFIITE SCHOOL, is led by Sheikh Al-Amin Osman Al-Amin. The Orthodox Church of Eritrea has close relationship with the COPTIC ORTHODOX CHURCH of Egypt, and Pope Shenouda has consecrated most of its bishops. Prior to 1991, the church existed as a diocese in the Ethiopian Orthodox Tewahedo Church. The ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH has work in both the Latin Rite and the Eastern (Ethiopian) Rite, with two bishops in Asmara.

Protestantism entered Eritrea in 1866 when three representatives of the Swedish Evangelical Mission (representing LUTHERANISM) arrived in Massawa on their way to the interior of Ethiopia. Blocked from their goal, they stayed and initiated work among the Kunama people. After they had established a center in Massawa, the authorities began to entrust freed slaves to their care. They also began to recruit indigenous leadership. The church became self-governing in 1926, the first autonomous Lutheran body in Africa. In 1911, the church experienced a schism when some of the Swedish missionaries left their affiliation with the Swedish Evangelical Mission to affiliate with the Swedish Mission of Bible True Friends, a conservative movement that had developed to protest liberal trends in the CHURCH OF SWEDEN. The new mission became autonomous in 1957 as the Lutheran Church in Eritrea.

Through the twentieth century, various Protestant and FREE CHURCH bodies entered Ethiopia through Eritrea, and the two countries share much religious history in common. Following World War II, the ORTHODOX PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH and the Evangelistic Faith Missions (an American-based sending agency) initiated work in Eritrea. The latter established what has become the Evangelical Church of Eritrea. A year after the declaration of independence in 1993, the SOUTHERN BAPTIST CONVENTION initiated work.

Sources:

- Barrett, David. The Encyclopedia of World Christianity. 2d edition. New York: Oxford University Press, 2001.
- Trimingham, J. S. The Christian Church and Mission in Ethiopia (Including Eritrea and the Somalilands). London: World Dominion Press, 1950.

Espiritismo

Espiritismo is a system of ritual healing indigenous to Puerto Rico and commonly found in the New York City metropolitan area. It is one of a number of healing traditions originating in the Caribbean region that provide participants with an opportunity to relieve stress and to address specific emotional, social, and physical ailments, as well as creating an entertaining drama that satisfies spiritual needs and provides insight into psychic or behavioral crises. As a ritualized healing tradition, it is not practiced as an alternative to mainstream religions such as Catholicism. Ritual specialists (espiritistas) are essentially mediums who are able to access, or otherwise influence, spirits and Catholic saints for the benefit of their clients.

Syncretizing elements from a number of spiritual traditions, Espiritismo practitioners continue to adapt their rituals to their contemporary circumstances. Espiritismo has its origins in the writings of Allan Kardec, a Frenchman who attempted to rationalize popular European folk beliefs of the nineteenth century. In Puerto Rico Kardec's "science of spiritism" blended with curanderismo, which was itself a blend of folk Catholicism, sixteenth-century European medicine, and earlier Caribbean and Mesoamerican Indian practices. More recently, elements of SANTERÍA, an African-based syncretic faith that developed in Cuba, have also been incorporated into the practice of Espiritismo—especially in New York City, where it has gained wide popularity among Puerto Ricans and African Americans. The syncretism of Santería and Espiritismo in New York City is still in its incipient form, and it is becoming distinguished as a separate religious/folk medical practice called Santerismo.

When a believing individual or family suffers from persistent pain that has not been relieved by medical doctors, when a husband is cheating on his wife, when someone is facing harassment and unfair treatment at work, or when a child always seems to be in trouble at school, then an espiritista or espiritista will be consulted. Likewise, newly purchased homes or cars will be "cleansed" and blessed. In the course of her work, an espiritista will have a private consultation with clients at the altar in her home where she will read cards, call upon her spirit guides, and interview the client to assess the nature of the problem. Guías, or spirit guides, are the disincarnated spirits with which a medium or medium in development is in direct communication. The guías help the medium and are not understood as "possessing" the espiritista. They talk to the medium, protect her from causas, and appear to mount the medium in trance to talk to and help others.

The spirits have personality characteristics that are valued for the strengths they represent or are desired by the medium. Such protecciones are often Catholic saints, the Yoruban powers of Santería, folk heroes (such as Joan of Arc), idealized ethnic types (such as the Indio, the Hindu, the Negro Africano), a physical type (a strong black, an old man or woman), a professional type (priest, doctor, missionary), a deceased relative of the individual, or a relative from another existence. They are not understood to be perfect beings, but instead they are called upon as enlightened, elevated spirits. Espiritistas often have many guías.

On the other hand, a causa is a negative and base disincarnated spirit. If such a spirit is identified as the client's problem, then the medium will recommend a despojo (a ritual bath) for spiritual cleansing, attending extra Catholic masses, and attending a feast night celebration (which she celebrates at the altar in her home or in a centro). If the base spirit is particularly resistant, the espiritista will mount and interrogate it, sometimes with the assistance of other mediums, in order to remove it from her client. "Mounting" is a vaguely defined experience of having a spirit ride one person in order to communicate with others. For instance, in Haitian Vodou, people who have the spirit "on" them are called horses. When an espiritista mounts a spirit, she is metaphorically pinning it down with the weight of her own spiritual power. After the medium has cleansed the client by mounting the causa(s), she will use another ritual to cleanse herself (e.g., going to the cemetery where she will ritually pass the causa to a guía, whereupon she returns home to ritually bathe and pray at her altar).

Espiritismo is a particularly Puerto Rican means for negotiating the difficulties of life. It is usually practiced in informal places, such as the home of the spirit medium or in centros, which are basement or storefront sites. Since it is an informal tradition without a central authority, it is extremely difficult to assess the number and distribution of both home and centro sites. Also, Espiritismo is fluid, dynamic, and loosely organized, with mediums having individualized styles and strengths that gain them a following. Still, most people who visit an espiritista consider themselves to be devout Catholics, and they do so only if there is a difficult problem to be solved by spiritual means. Most mediums are found by word of mouth or through their local botánicas (neighborhood shops selling spiritual products).

Carolyn V. Prorok

Sources:

- Brandon, George. Santería from Africa to the New World: The Dead Sell Memories. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1997.
- Garrison, Vivian. "The 'Puerto Rican Syndrome' in Psychiatry and Espiritismo." In Case Studies in Spirit Possession, edited by Vincent Crapanzano and Vivian Garrison. New York: John Wiley and Sons, 1977.
- Koss, Joan D. "Religion and Science Divinely Related: A Case History of Spiritism in Puerto Rico." Paper presented at the 73d Annual Meeting of the American Anthropological Association: Symposium on Spiritism in Latin America, Mexico City, 1974.
- Prorok, Carolyn V. "Boundaries Are Made for Crossing: The Feminized Spatiality of Puerto Rican Espiritismo in New York City." Gender, Place and Culture: A Journal of Feminist Geography 7, 1 (2000): 57–80.

Estonia

As of the end of 2000, Estonia was home to seven churches (of recognized denominations), eight congregational associations, and 66 individual congregations. There were also religious communities that have established themselves as nonprofit organizations, as well as some that have maintained themselves as informal associations. At the same time, little more than half of the population of 1.4 million had affiliated with some religious tradition. More than 60 percent of the population defined themselves as Christians, while approximately 27 percent considered themselves as indifferent in religious matters and 10 percent declared themselves atheists. The public religious tolerance is high, and all religious communities are treated in an equal manner by the state.

There is no state church in Estonia. The largest church is the ESTONIAN EVANGELICAL LUTHERAN CHURCH; 16 percent of the population consider themselves as Lutherans. The second largest religious community is Orthodox (15 percent) though divided into two communities: the ESTONIAN APOSTOLIC ORTHODOX CHURCH and the Estonian Orthodox Church (Moscow Patriarchate). They are followed by adherents of the Baptists (0.45 percent), the ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH (0.4 percent), the JEHOVAH'S WITNESSES (0.27 percent), PENTECOSTALISM (0.18 percent), the SEVENTH-DAY ADVENTIST CHURCH (0.11 percent), METHODISM (0.1 percent), ISLAM (0.09 percent), and the indigenous traditions of Taara-believers and Mother Earth People (0.07 percent). The OLD BELIEVERS (0.18 percent), who arrived from Russia in the beginning of the eighteenth century, constitute a unique religious-ethnic group with a distinctive religious tradition. Also the Setus in the south-east corner of Estonia have their unique religious and cultural tradition, which combines the Orthodox Church and still maintained pre-Christian traditions.

Although the official statistics imply one congregation for every 2,700 inhabitants, only approximately 18 percent of the population have formalized their ties to a specific congregation. Due to its recent history under the Soviet rule, the tradition of belonging formally to a religious organization has been broken in Estonia.

The pre-Christian religion of Estonia was a local form of shamanism like that found among other Finno-Ugric peoples; nature was considered animated by different spirits or powers, who were called "mothers" and "fathers." The veneration of ancestors was also known. During the 1920s and 1930s, an attempt to restore the pre-Christian religion of Estonians was made under the name "Taara-belief." In 1931 the Taara-believers founded their religious organization, Hiis (The Grove).

Status of religions in Estonia, 2000-2050

Followers	2000			2025	2050
	total	%	rate
Christians	887,000	63.5	-0.54	800,000	716,000
Protestants	240,000	17.2	0.00	235,000	240,000
Orthodox	230,000	16.5	-0.63	280,000	300,000
Independents	46,000	3.3	8.69	70,000	95,000
Nonreligious	350,000	25.1	-1.95	241,000	150,000
Atheists	153,000	10.9	-2.67	80,000	50,000
Muslims	4,700	0.3	-0.54	7,000	8,000
Jews	2,100	0.2	-5.20	2,000	2,000
Baha'is	460	0.0	0.20	700	1,000
Total population	1,396,000	100.0	-1.17	1,131,000	927,000

From the tenth century onward, Christianity was introduced to Estonians by trade and Christian monks. In the beginning of the thirteenth century the Roman Catholic Church and the Teutonic Order started to Christianize Estonia. By 1227 Estonia was declared Christianized. However, the pre-Christian worldview really started to change as late as the end of the fifteenth century, and was to a great extent maintained until the first half of the eighteenth century.

The Lutheran Reformation reached the towns in Estonia in 1524. Soon LUTHERANISM became the largest denomination. The Lutheran clergy has played an important role in the processes of forming Estonian cultural and national identity—the first prayer book and catechism in Estonian were Lutheran, printed in 1535, and the Bible was printed by Lutherans in 1739.

In 1727 the first Herrnhut brethren (Moravians) came to Estonia. The native Estonians had an important role in the development of the Herrnhut movement, especially after 1743 when it was banned and the German brethren expelled from the country. The movement eventually had a role in the national and cultural development of Estonia by encouraging literacy and various cultural pursuits that were popular in Europe at the time.

An Orthodox Church procession along a street in Tallinn, Estonia (T. Noorits/TRIP)

The Orthodox Church is one of the oldest churches in Estonia. However, Estonians did not join the Orthodox Church in great numbers until the middle of the nineteenth century. Then the prime reasons for conversion were economical and social, and the conversions were supported by the czarist Russification policy.

From the 1870s through the end of the first decade of the twentieth century there were several religious revivals in Estonia. During this period Baptists, Seventh-day Adventists, Methodists, Pentecostals and others were introduced.

Shortly after the collapse of the Russian Empire in 1917 the Estonian Evangelical Lutheran Church was founded on the basis of Lutheran congregations in Estonia. In 1919 the Orthodox congregations in Estonia organized themselves as the Estonian Apostolic Orthodox Church (EAOC). In 1920 the Moscow Patriarchate gave independence to the EAOC, and since 1923 the EAOC has related to the ECUMENICAL PATRIARCHATE OF CONSTANTINOPLE as an autonomous church.

In 1940, when Estonia was incorporated into the Soviet Union, the religious situation changed dramatically. Already in 1940 some religious organizations were dissolved (for example, the Taara-believers, Jehovah's Witnesses, and THE SALVATION ARMY), religious literature was banned, the property of religious organizations was confiscated, and the Faculty of Theology at the Tartu University was closed. In 1945 the RUSSIAN ORTHODOX CHURCH dissolved the Estonian Apostolic Orthodox Church. The EAOC maintained its legal continuity in exile; the metropolitan of the EAOC had left the country along with approximately seventy thousand Estonians who fled from the second invasion of the Soviet troops in 1944. In Estonia, the Russian Orthodox Church established its own diocese. In 1945 the Baptist, Evangelical Christian, Pentecostal, and FREE CHURCHES were forced by Soviet officials to merge into the Union of Baptists and Evangelical Christians in Soviet Union. The activities of religious organizations were strictly regulated and controlled. The Soviet Marxist ideology of ATHEISM was implemented particularly forcefully in the 1960s. During this period religion and religious institutions were marginalized in the society.

The change began with the national awakening during the end of the 1980s, and gained strength with the reestablishment of the independence of Estonia in 1991. During this period religion became important as the maintainer of ethical and moral norms, and also as a connection to Estonia's past. Because of its links to the past, the Estonian Evangelical Lutheran Church became important. Several religious movements that had previously been banned restarted their activities. In 1993 the EAOC reestablished itself in Estonia. During this period also, many new religious movements emerged. New Age sensibilities, which became noticeable in Estonia in the 1970s, started to gain much popularity in the popular religion of Estonians.

The national awakening also renewed interest in pre-Christian worldviews and religions. This trend is represented by the House of Taara and Mother Earth People, which together involve roughly two hundred active members and approximately one thousand people who identify themselves with that tradition. The Taara-believers continue the attempts made in the 1930s, whereas the Mother Earth People relate native Estonian religion to other Finno-Ugric peoples' nature worship. This tradition is essentially person-centered, with the emphasis on a kind of power (vägi) that is understood both as a personal quality and as the essence of everything. In addition to Taara- and Earth-believers the local shamanistic tradition of healers (noid) is still alive and popular.

Islam and Judaism have been traditionally connected to the national minorities in Estonia. In Estonia there are also followers of the Buddhist and Hindu traditions. However, the philosophical ideas of Buddhism and Hinduism are more popular than their religious practices. The most active Hindu group is the local community of the INTERNATIONAL SOCIETY FOR KRISHNA CONSCIOUSNESS. The first influences of Buddhism arrived in Estonia during the early twentieth century with the Estonian Buddhist monk Vahindra (Karl Tõnisson, also known as Karlis Tennissons). Today the Buddhist tradition is represented by two Buddhist congregations, Friends of the WESTERN BUDDHIST ORDER Estonia, and a small publishing house. In 1991 the Dalai Lama visited Estonia. During the following years several world religious leaders have visited Estonia: Moscow Patriarch Alexius II (1993), Pope John Paul II (1993), and Ecumenical Patriarch Bartholomeus (2000).

Ringo Ringvee

Sources:

- Au, Ilmo, and Ringo Ringvee. Kirikud ja kogudused Eestis. Tallinn, Estonia: Ilo, 2000.
- Hoppenbrouwers, Frans. "Romancing Freedom: Church and Society in the Baltic States since the End of Communism." Religion, State and Society 27, 2 (June 1999): 161–173.
- Vööbus, Arthur. "Studies in the History of the Estonian People." Papers of the Estonian Theological Society in Exile (18–44). Vols. 1–14. Stockholm: ETSE, 1969–1985.

Estonian Apostolic Orthodox Church/ Estonian Orthodox Church (Moscow Patriarchate)

The Orthodox community is the second largest religious group in Estonia, with approximately 200,000 adherents, who are divided between two Orthodox churches: the Estonian Apostolic Orthodox Church (EAOC; Eesti Apostlik Õigeusu Kirik) and the Estonian Orthodox Church in the Moscow Patriarchate (EOC-MP; Eesti Õigeusu Kirik Moskva Patriarhaadis). Both churches are led by a metropolitan, whose headquarters are in Tallinn. Today fifty-nine of the Orthodox congregations belong to the EAOC and twenty-eight to the EOC-MP.

For centuries the Orthodox faith in Estonia was mostly the faith of foreign traders or rulers, or the faith of the cultural minority of Setus in southeastern Estonia. However, during the nineteenth century, there were two conversion movements pressuring the indigenous peasantry to give up Lutheranism and join the RUSSIAN ORTHODOX CHURCH. The reasons for these conversion movements were both economic and social: The peasantry expected to receive land and hoped to be protected from the Baltic-German landowners if they accepted the official religion of the Russian Empire.

After the declaration of Estonian independence in 1918, the Orthodox congregations in Estonia organized themselves as the Estonian Apostolic Orthodox Church. In 1920, Patriarch Tikhon of Moscow declared the EAOC to be independent. The first bishop of the EAOC was elected in 1920. In 1923 ecumenical patriarch Meletios IV recognized the EAOC as an autonomous church in the jurisdiction of the ECUMENICAL PATRIARCHATE OF CONSTANTINOPLE.

In 1944, Metropolitan Alexander and twenty-two priests went into exile just before the Soviet troops invaded Estonia for the second time. In 1945 the representatives of the Russian Orthodox Church (Moscow Patriarchate) dissolved the synod of the EAOC in Estonia and formed a new structure, the Diocese Council of the Russian Orthodox Church. The EAOC was able to maintain its legal continuity in Sweden, serving the Estonian Orthodox community in exile. In 1993 the EAOC reestablished its structures in Estonia. This was followed by a long dispute between the EAOC and the Moscow Patriarchate over issues of church property. In 1990 the former metropolitan of the Estonian diocese, Alexius, was elected patriarch of the Russian Orthodox Church as Alexius II.

The Moscow Patriarchate maintains an Internet presence at <http://www.russian-orthodox-church.org.ru/>.

Addresses:

Estonian Apostolic Orthodox Church
Vene 27
10123 Tallinn
Estonia
<http://www.orthodoxa.org>

Estonian Orthodox Church (Moscow Patriarchate)
Pikk 64–4
10133 Tallinn
Estonia

Ringo Ringvee

Sources:

Alexius, Patriarch. Pravoslaviye v Estonii. Moscow: Pravoslavnaia Entsiklopedija, 1999.
“Statement of the Holy Synod of the Russian Orthodox Church, 8 November 2000.” Posted at <http://www.russian-orthodox-church.org.ru/se011081.htm>. Accessed May 1, 2002.

Estonian Evangelical Lutheran Church

The Estonian Evangelical Lutheran Church (EELC) is the largest religious organization in Estonia, with 165 congregations in Estonia, 2 congregations in Russia, and 1 congregation in Latvia. In 1999 the EELC reported approximately 177,000 adherents and 48,000 donating members. The church’s consistory is situated in Tallinn. Since 1994, it has been led by its archbishop, Jaan Kiivit Jr.

Estonia was Christianized during the thirteenth century by the ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH and the Teutonic Order. The Reformation, in the form of LUTHERANISM, reached Estonia in 1527. During the period of Swedish rule (1625–1710), the hierarchy of the Lutheran Church was organized along episcopal lines, as was the case with the CHURCH OF SWEDEN. The Lutheran Church with its clergy played an important role in the history of Estonian religion and culture. Then, shortly after the end of the Russian Empire, the Lutheran congregations in Estonia started to develop an indigenous organization. The EELC was founded in 1917 in the First Church Congress. The EELC was defined as the “free people’s church,” as the majority of the population were Lutherans.

After the incorporation of Estonia into the Soviet Union in 1940, major changes concerning the situation of religious organizations took place. By 1939, 53 of the church’s 209 pastors had migrated to Germany, due to their German ancestry. In 1940 the Soviet authorities arrested several Lutheran pastors. The theological faculty of the University of Tartu was closed in 1940. Because of this closing, a new Theological Institute of the EELC was founded in 1943 during the years of German occupation. Today this institution still operates as an institution for the preparation of the clergy, as well as Sunday-school teachers and the like. In 1944 approximately 70,000 Estonians, among them 72 Lutheran pastors, fled to the West because of the approaching Soviet Army. After the war, they took the lead in forming the EELC Abroad.

Internationally the EELC belongs to the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES (1961), and to the LUTHERAN WORLD FEDERATION (1963). In 1996 the EELC signed the Porvoo declaration, a statement of agreement with the Anglican and Scandinavian Lutheran churches. The ordination of women started in 1967. At the beginning of the twenty-first century, 14 of the 187 EELC clergy are women.

Address:

Estonian Evangelical Lutheran Church
Kiriku plats 3
10130 Tallinn
Estonia
<http://www.eelk.ee/> (Estonian)

Ringo Ringvee

Sources:

Veem, Konrad. Vaba Eesti Rahvakirik. Stockholm: EVR, 1988.
We Bless You from the House of the Lord. The Estonian Evangelical Lutheran Church Today. Tallinn, Estonia: Consistory of the EELC, 1997.

Estonian Evangelical Lutheran Church Abroad

The Estonian Evangelical Lutheran Church Abroad (EELCA; Eesti Evangeeliumi Luteri Usu Kirik) was formed in 1944 among Estonian refugees in Sweden. In 1944, due to the traumatic experiences of the first Soviet occupation (1940–1941), approximately 70,000 Estonians fled from Estonia to the West, mainly Sweden and Germany, before the Soviet troops occupied the country. The majority of the refugees were Lutherans. Among the expatriates were seventy-two Lutheran pastors, including the bishop of the ESTONIAN EVANGELICAL LUTHERAN CHURCH (EELC), Johan Köpp. The first new pastors were ordained in 1947 in German refugee camps.

All the statutes of the EELC were reestablished abroad in 1958. The consistory of the EELCA is situated in the country where the archbishop resides. The EELC Abroad has been the maintainer of the Estonian national identity for the diaspora community, who traditionally maintain church services in the Estonian language. Through the last decades of the twentieth century the membership declined, as second- and third-generation Estonians assimilated to the population of their country of residence. During the period of Soviet occupation of Estonia, the EELCA provided religious literature for the EELC at home.

The EELC Abroad has its headquarters in Toronto. The EELCA has sixty-four congregations all over the world—in Sweden, Germany, England, France, the United States, Canada, Australia, and Brazil. Its approximate membership is sixteen thousand. The church is led by Archbishop Udo Petersoo (1990) and the consistory of the church, which is located in Toronto. On the international level, the EELCA was one of the founding members of the LUTHERAN

Ethiopia

WORLD FEDERATION (1947), and of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES (1948). It is also a member of the Conference of European Churches. Since 1978, the EELCA has also sponsored an educational institution for the clergy, the Theological Institute of the EELCA.

Address:

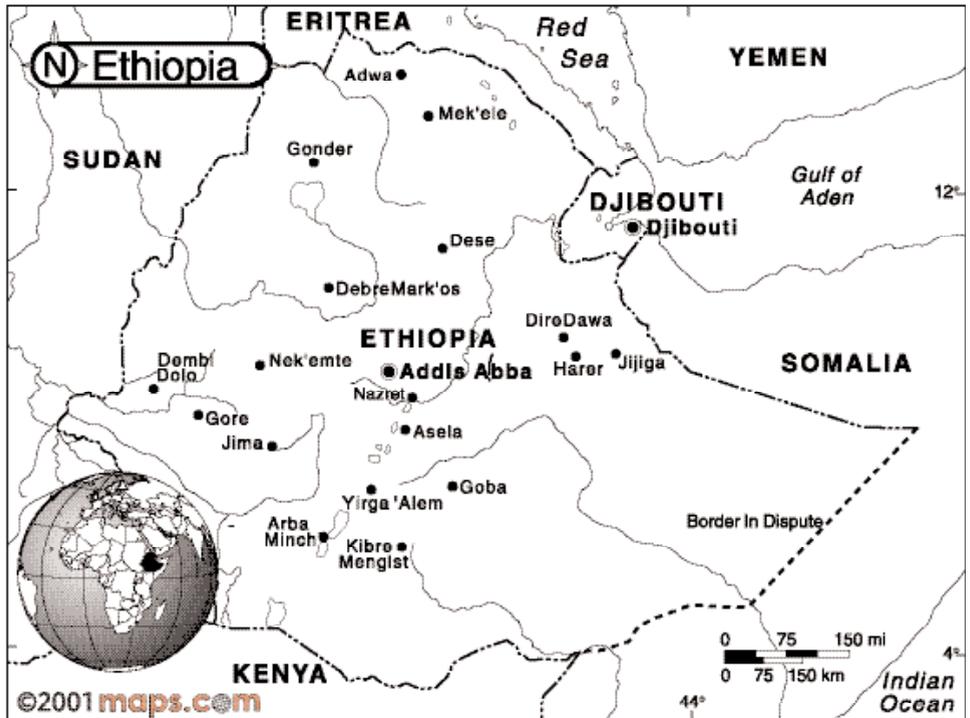

Estonian Evangelical Lutheran Church Abroad
383 Jarvis St.
Toronto, Ontario M5B 2C7
Canada
<http://www.eelk.ee/>

Ringo Ringvee

Sources:

Veem, Konrad. Vaba Eesti Rahvakirik. Stockholm: EVR, 1988.

We Bless You from the House of the Lord. The Estonian Evangelical Lutheran Church Today. Tallinn, Estonia: Consistory of the EELC, 1997.

Ethiopia

Ethiopia is home to a variety of native peoples, the majority being Galla or Amhara. Around 2000 B.C.E. the Habbashat, an Arab people from Yemen, moved into the region, and it is from them that Ethiopia also became known as Abyssinia. The early center of Ethiopia was Axum, a city along the trade route from the Red Sea to the southern Sudan.

An Ethiopian kingdom arose early in the Christian era and expanded across the Red Sea into present-day Yemen. In the fourth century, the royal family accepted Christianity, and gradually the Christian faith came to dominate the land. The kingdom suffered by the gradual movement of Islam, first through the Arab peninsula and Egypt and then along the East African coast. Feeling somewhat stifled by the Muslim world that now largely surrounded them, the rulers appealed to Christian Europe for assistance in the fifteenth century. Their appeal finally resulted in the arrival of the Portuguese in the next century and the destruction of Muslim power in Somalia.

The next centuries saw the rivalry between the Amhara (who had ruled Ethiopia) and the Gallas come to the fore. The Gallas gained the throne for a brief period in the middle of the eighteenth century, but eventually the Amharas reestablished control.

Status of religions in Ethiopia, 2000-2050

Followers	2000		2025	2050
	total	% rate
Christians	36,108,000	57.7 2.75	68,488,000	100,593,000
Orthodox	22,838,000	36.5 2.64	42,500,000	62,500,000
Protestants	8,510,000	13.6 3.17	17,500,000	27,000,000
Independents	860,000	1.4 3.67	2,400,000	6,186,000
Muslims	18,993,000	30.4 2.77	35,500,000	53,000,000
Ethnoreligionists	7,312,000	11.7 1.96	11,000,000	15,000,000
Nonreligious	106,000	0.2 5.03	300,000	700,000
Baha'is	21,600	0.0 2.42	50,000	75,000
Jews	11,900	0.0 1.77	14,000	18,000
Atheists	7,400	0.0 2.15	20,000	45,000
Hindus	4,700	0.0 2.61	10,000	15,000
Total population	62,565,000	100.0 2.67	115,382,000	169,446,000

At the end of the nineteenth century, the Italians invaded Ethiopia as part of their dream of an empire in Africa. They were soundly defeated in 1895, but were able to take control of Eritrea and the coast of the southern part of Somalia. The Italians again invaded in 1935, and they held Ethiopia until replaced by the British in 1941. Independence returned in 1948 under Haile Selassie.

Selassie ruled until he was overthrown in 1974. The underlying cause of unrest had been the stranglehold on the country held by Ethiopian royalty and the Ethiopian church, which together owned the great majority of the country. A military government, sympathetic to Marxist socialism, eventually took over in 1977, but faced a number of dissenting groups and constant violence and civil war through the 1980s. The military ruler, Mengistu Haile Mariam (b. 1937), was finally overthrown in 1991, but the new government faced a period of intense social conflict. It worked out a peace with the primary dissident group that controlled Eritrea, which became an independent country, and then turned to deal with the problem of the widespread famine, which had been exacerbated by the war.

Although some traditional African religions still exist in Ethiopia, the majority of the population are Christians and members of the ETHIOPIAN ORTHODOX TEWAHEDO CHURCH. Traditional religion is strongest in the southwestern part of the country (in lands bordering Kenya and the Sudan).

Following the acceptance of Christianity by the ruling elite, the Ethiopian church has had a strong relationship with the COPTIC ORTHODOX CHURCH of Egypt and followed it in its break with the larger world of Eastern Orthodoxy during the Monophysite controversy in the fifth century. The Monophysites, whose name comes from the Greek for “one nature,” tended to emphasize the divine nature of Christ to the point of sacrificing the fully human nature. The Eastern Orthodox in communion with the ECUMENICAL PATRIARCHATE OF CONSTANTINOPLE held that Christ had two natures (human and divine), as defined in the Chalcedonian Creed, adopted at the council held in Chalcedon in 451. In modern perspective, the controversy appears to have been essentially a jockeying for control of the Egyptian church that was fought out in theological terms.

Through the centuries, the relation of the Ethiopian church as a daughter to the Egyptian church was symbolized by the regular appointment of an Egyptian as the abuna (or archbishop) of the Ethiopian church by the head of the Coptic Church. That relationship only ended in 1959 when the head of the church became an Ethiopian, bearing the title of Patriarch-Catholicos.

The Ethiopian church developed a unique relationship with Islam when some of the early followers of Muhammad visited the country in 662 C.E. This visit is often quoted by Muslims as an important event establishing Islam’s traditional tolerant stance toward the other religions of the Book (Christianity and Judaism). The Coptic Church supported the country’s resistance to the expansion of Islam as neighboring lands became predominantly Muslim.

Islam (of the SHAFIITE SCHOOL) gained a permanent stronghold in Ethiopia among several of the peoples in the southeastern part of the country near the border with Somalia. Danan is an important intellectual center, and Goba, a city further inland and nearer the capital, Addis Ababa, annually hosts thousands of pilgrims on their way to the town of Ginir, where the body of Sheikh Hussein, considered a saint in Ethiopia, is entombed. Other Muslims are concentrated in the far west of the country near the Sudanese border. They currently make up some 30 percent of Ethiopia’s residents.

The ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH came into the country in the sixteenth century, and some attempts were made to absorb the Ethiopian church into Roman Catholicism.

A priest stands outside his church in Axon, Ethiopia. (G. Spenceley/TRIP)

Some progress to this end was made in the seventeenth century when the head of the church briefly identified as a Catholic. However, some of the missionaries proved tactless and, among other things, attempted to impose the Latin liturgy on the land. In reaction, the missionaries were kicked out of the country and were not allowed to return until the nineteenth century. However, when they returned, they were identified with the Italians, and they were again ejected. Their church survived, however, as Italian lay people were not forced to leave.

The church finally developed an Ethiopian liturgy that retained as much of the Coptic liturgy as was possible. Today a community of several hundred thousand Roman Catholics exists in Ethiopia, the great majority following the Ethiopian liturgy, though Latin and Ethiopic rite congregations operate within the same dioceses. The church is led by the archbishop of Addis Ababa.

Protestantism entered the country through the efforts of a spectrum of Lutheran missionaries, beginning in 1866 with some from the Swedish Lutheran Mission. Subsequently, in 1911, Swedish missionaries representing the independent True Friends of the Bible arrived. The two groups united their work in 1938. German missionaries from the Hermannsburg Mission arrived in 1927. Missionaries from Norway, Denmark, Iceland, and the United States arrived through the 1940s and 1950s. Much of the Lutheran work was brought together in the ETHIOPIAN EVANGELICAL CHURCH MEKANE YESUS. American Presbyterians arrived in 1920 and began work among the Galla people. When the Italians arrived, the Presbyterian missionaries were expelled, and before leaving they organized their mission as the Bethel Evangelical Church. In the mid-1970s, it merged into the Mekane Jesus Church.

The Sudan Interior Mission (SIM) launched its expansive work in Ethiopia in 1927; Dr. Thomas A. Lambie (1885–1954), who had been working with the Presbyterians, began an independent work that he called the Abyssinian Frontier Mission. He merged his mission into SIM. Working primarily among the Galla people, the mission built a following of some 60 members, but following the expulsion of the missionaries in 1935, expanded rapidly. There were 18,000 by the time the British arrived. By the mid-1970s, there were 182,000 members, and as the WORD OF LIFE CHURCH, it has become the largest Protestant work in the country, with over 2 million members as of the 1990s.

In the years since World War II, a spectrum of additional Protestant groups have begun work in Ethiopia, including the Baptist General Conference of America, which entered the country in 1950. PENTECOSTALISM came into the country in the postwar years, and two large indigenous churches have resulted, the Full Gospel Believers Church and Gods All Times Association, which between them have half a million members. Both of these churches have been encouraged by assistance and personnel from Scandinavian Pentecostal bodies.

Among the most interesting of Ethiopian groups has been the BETA ISRAEL, a Jewish group that existed in the Gonder region north of Lake Tana. They were the subject of much persecution at various periods of the twentieth century, even as they fought for recognition by the larger Jewish community that had finally taken notice of their existence. In the 1990s, most of the group (which at its height numbered some 28,000) migrated to Israel (which finally recognized them under the Law of Return in 1994). Around 12,00 remain in Ethiopia.

The BAHÁ'Í FAITH established its first spiritual assembly in 1964. Today there are almost 20,000 adherents. A variety of new religions have arrived, most AFRICAN INITIATED CHURCHES from nearby countries. Though several Buddhist groups responded to Ethiopian needs during the recent famine conditions in the country, no Buddhist or Hindu groups appear to have been formed.

Sources:

Engelsviken, T. Molo Wingel: A Documentary Report on the Life and History of the Independent Penetcostal Movement in Ethiopia, 1960–1975. Oslo: Free Faculty of Theology, 1975.

Horner, N. A. Rediscovering Christianity Where It Began: A Survey of Contemporary Churches in the Middle East and Ethiopia. Beirut: Near East Council of Churches, 1974.

Liesel, N. The Eastern Catholic Liturgy: A Study in Words and Pictures. Westminster, MD: Newman Press, 1960.

Molnar, Enrico S. The Ethiopian Orthodox Church. Pasadena, CA: Bloy House Theological School, 1969.

Trimingham, J. S. The Christian Church and Mission in Ethiopia (Including Eritrea and the Somalilands). London: World Dominion Press, 1950.

———. Islam in Ethiopia. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1952.

Ethiopian Catholic Church

The ETHIOPIAN ORTHODOX TEWAHEDO CHURCH was a branch of the COPTIC ORTHODOX CHURCH based in Egypt and like it failed to affirm the formulation of doctrine promulgated by the Council of Chalcedon in the fifth century. The Chalcedonian Creed affirmed that Christ existed as one person with both a human and divine nature. The Monophysites (from the Greek for “one nature”), who predominated in the Egyptian church, held that Christ had only a divine nature. For many centuries after the establishment of Islam across North Africa, Ethiopia was cut off from the rest of the Christian world. It was rediscovered in the fifteenth century, and missionaries of the ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH launched efforts to bring the Ethiopian church into union with Rome.

In 1622, the king of Ethiopia declared himself Catholic and his nation a Catholic state. The following year, the pope appointed Affonso Mendez, a Portuguese Jesuit, the first patriarch of the new Ethiopian Catholic Church. He was installed in 1626. He lost popular support, however, when he tried to latinize the liturgy. When the king died, his successor banished Mendez and ended the union of the Ethiopian church with Rome.

Catholic missionaries did not reenter the country until the end of the nineteenth century, and the church did not expand significantly until the years of the Italian occupation (1935–1941). It was not until 1961 that an episcopal see, headquartered at Addis Ababa, was erected. Additional suffragan dioceses were established in Asmara and Adigrat. In 1993, Eritrea became independent of Ethiopia. Approximately half of the Ethiopian Catholic membership resided in the new country; as a result two additional dioceses (Keren, Barentu) were created. Most of the 190,000 members of the Ethiopian Catholic Church are in the two countries.

The church does not have an Internet site.

Address:

Ethiopian Catholic Church
Catholic Archbishop's House
P.O. Box 21903
Addis Ababa
Ethiopia

Sources:

Liesel, N. The Eastern Catholic Liturgies: A Study in Words and Pictures. Westminster, MD: Newman Press, 1960.

Roberson, Ronald G. The Eastern Christian Churches—A Brief Survey. 5th ed. Rome: Edizioni Orientalia Christiana, Pontificio Istituto Orientale, 1995.

Ethiopian Evangelical Church Mekane Yesus

The Ethiopian Evangelical Church Mekane Yesus was founded in 1959 by the churches that had grown out of the several missions created by different Lutheran missionary agencies that had been operating in Ethiopia through the century. Lutheran work began with missionaries of the Swedish Evangelical mission in Eritrea in 1866. They eventually opened a mission in Jima, in the province of Kefa. They purchased slaves who were then invited to become Christians and educated the neighborhood children in their school. Workers with the mission also helped translate the Bible into one of the Ethiopian languages, Oromo. Through the next decades, the Swedish Evangelical Mission (SEM) grew primarily among the Oromo-speaking people, though the missionaries encouraged the developing Evangelical movement within the ETHIOPIAN ORTHODOX TEWAHEDO CHURCH that had resulted from the earlier translation of the Bible into Amharic (or Amarigna).

Through the next decades, other Lutheran groups established work in the country: the Swedish Mission of Bible True Friends (1921), the German Hermannsburg Mission (1927), The Norwegian Lutheran Mission (1948), the Icelandic Mission (1952), and the Danish Ethiopian Mission (1952). The earlier missions suffered during the occupation of the country by the Italians (1936–41). Not only were the missionaries exiled, but a number of the leaders in the church were arrested and executed. However, the church not only survived, it prospered. In 1941 the congregation in Addis Ababa reorganized apart from the SEM mission and through the decade emerged as the center of the indigenous Protestant movement in the country. In 1944 it called the first Conference of Ethiopian Evangelical Churches that would meet annually, apart from the missionaries' input and attendance, and work toward the creation of a single Ethiopian Evangelical church.

A significant move to unite the Lutheran work in Ethiopia was initiated in 1947 by the Lutheran World Federation, which has called upon Lutherans around the world to seek unity in their own countries. A visit by an LWF representative led to the formation of the Lutheran Missions Committee, which in turn launched several cooperative efforts to assist all the missions, most notably the Ethiopian Evangelical College, opened at Debre Zeyt in 1956. By the mid 1950s, considerable effort was evident in planning for a united Lutheran church, culminating in the formation of the Ethiopian Evangelical Church Mekane Yesus in 1959. The church was received into the Lutheran World Federation in 1963, and the World Council of Churches in 1972.

The church has grown by a series of mergers. In 1965, the Kambata Evangelical Church, formerly a synod of the WORD OF LIFE CHURCH/KALE HEYWET, merged into the Ethiopian Evangelical Church. Meanwhile in Europe, discussion between Lutheran and Reformed churches led to the Leuenberg Agreement that offered a statement of understanding and alignment between the two communions. Based upon that agreement, the Evangelical Church Bethel merged into the Ethiopian Evangelical church. The Bethel church originated in 1919 when a flu epidemic hit Ethiopia and the government requested Thomas Alexander Lambie (1885–1954), a medical missionary working in the Sudan, to come to Ethiopia.

He and other American Presbyterian missionaries who came afterward decided to work toward the renewal of the Orthodox Church rather than set up separate Presbyterian church congregations. However, when the missionaries were kicked out in 1936, those who had been affected by their work moved to set up a church in the Reformed tradition in 1940. It was formally constituted as the Evangelical Church Bethel in 1947. In 1970 it was received into the WORLD ALLIANCE OF REFORMED CHURCHES, though that association was dropped in 1974.

The Church has over two million members. It went through a period of rapid growth between 1877 and 1983 during which the membership doubled. It also has affiliated congregations in Europe formed by members who have moved to Scandinavia. These congregations have organized the Northern Europe Mekane Yesus Fellowship.

The Church is organized into synods, and the quadrennial synodical convention is the highest legislative body. It is led by a president who is assisted by an executive committee and general secretary. The church supports the Mekane Yesus Seminary in Addis Ababa.

Address:

Ethiopian Evangelical Church Mekane Yesus
Jomo Kenyatta Road
P.O. Box 2087
Addis Ababa
Ethiopia

Sources:

- Bachmann, E. Theodore, and Mercia Brenne Bachmann. Lutheran Churches in the World: A Handbook. Minneapolis, MN: Augsburg Press, 1989.
- Bauswein, Jean-Jacques, and Lukas Vischer, eds. The Reformed Family Worldwide: A Survey of Reformed Churches, Theological Schools, and International Organizations. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans Publishing Company, 1999.
- "Ethiopian Evangelical Church Mekane Yesus in Skärholmen, Sweden." Posted at <http://www.skärholmen.org/mekaneyesus/>. Accessed September 15, 2001.

Ethiopian Orthodox Tewahedo Church

Christianity's appearance in Ethiopia is generally attributed to one Frumentius (c. 300–c. 380), a Greek Christian. According to the story, while on a voyage through the Red Sea, he was captured along with his brother, and both were taken to the ancient capital of Ethiopia at Axum as slaves. Placed in the service of the king, like the biblical Joseph, he won the king's favor and was given a position of trust. As a part of his privileges, he was allowed to preach his Christian faith. He eventually won over the king and court to the new faith, and the door was open to convert the country. Frumentius's brother was ordained as a priest, and in 339 Frumentius was consecrated by the Patriarchate of Alexandria (Egypt) as the first bishop of Ethiopia. He is credited with translating the Bible into the Ethiopian language.

Ethiopian Zion Coptic Church

The Ethiopian church developed as a daughter church of the Egyptian church, and several centuries after its founding it therefore became involved in a controversy between the patriarch of Alexandria and the other bishops of the Christian church over the nature of Christ. As part of their attempt to refine Christian understanding of God, the church considered the mystery of Christ's dual nature as both God and human. The patriarch of Alexandria argued that Christ's divine nature was primary, an opinion that deemphasized the human nature of Jesus. The rest of the church went on (in the fifth century) to reach a consensus that Christ was both fully human and fully divine. This "orthodox" position was included in the Chalcedonian Creed, adopted by the church's bishops in 451 at the Council of Chalcedon. The patriarch of Alexandria continued to adhere to the Nicene Creed (of 325), which is compatible with both the Monophysite (from the Greek for "one nature") position and that of the "orthodox" churches. The argument split the church, and most of the Egyptians followed the patriarch into what is now known as the COPTIC ORTHODOX CHURCH.

Except for this question of Christ's nature, the Ethiopian church is at one with Eastern Orthodoxy and traditional Christian faith. The church follows the Coptic Church in its veneration of the Virgin Mary. However, it differs in its acceptance of the Apocrypha (books written between the period of the last books of the Hebrew Bible and the first century C.E.). It also recognizes some Old Testament figures as saints, holds Saturday as an additional holy day, and observes many Jewish dietary rules.

The Ethiopian church was cut off from the Christian world in the eighth century by the rise of Islam. Isolated, Ethiopia was able to remain autonomous in its mountainous homeland. In the thirteenth century, the Christian state reached the height of its power, and King Lalibela gave his name to a city of churches, ten of which were carved from solid rock. It almost merged into the Roman Catholic Church in the seventeenth century, but pulled back in reaction to the tactless activities of Catholic missionaries. In the twentieth century, responding to attempts to heal the rifts of the ancient church, the Ethiopian Orthodox Tewahedo ("Unity") Church has become a member of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES.

The church does not have an official Web site. There are several expansive unofficial pages at <http://members.nbci.com/redingtn/eth.html> and <http://www.prairienet.org/dx-images/eotc.htm>. The church is headed by its patriarch, currently Abuna Paulos. At the beginning of the new century, it reports some seventeen million members in Ethiopia and another million in Eritrea. There are also dioceses in Sudan, Djibouti (covering East Africa), Jerusalem, London (UK), Trinidad, and the United States.

Address:

Ethiopian Orthodox Tewahedo Church
P.O. Box 1283
Addis Ababa
Ethiopia

Sources:

- The Church of Ethiopia: A Panorama of History and Spiritual Life.*
Addis Ababa: The Ethiopian Orthodox Church, 1970.
- Molnar, Enrico S. The Ethiopian Orthodox Church. Pasadena, CA: Bloy House Theological School, 1969.
- Shenk, C. E. "The Development of the Ethiopian Orthodox Church and Its Relationship with the Ethiopian Government from 1930 to 1970." Ph.D. dissertation, New York University, 1972.

Ethiopian Zion Coptic Church

The Ethiopian Zion Coptic Church is a small body that traces its history to Marcus Garvey (1887–1940), the Jamaican reformer and advocate for African Americans; it gained a reputation of a different kind following the arrest of several of its leaders in 1978 for breaking the antidrug laws in the United States. Garvey founded the movement in 1914 in Jamaica as a religious affiliate of his Universal Negro Improvement Association, and although it blossomed briefly in the 1920s, it died out in the United States. It survived in Jamaica as a very small body and became associated with the RASTAFARIANS, known for their use of ganja (marijuana) as a mood-altering substance for religious purposes.

In 1970, several Americans in Jamaica encountered the church. They joined and established a church center on Star Island off Miami Beach, in Florida. Under the leadership of Thomas Reilly Jr., the American leader, a second center opened in New Jersey. Over the next years the church had a variety of interactions with government authorities. In 1973, law enforcement authorities seized 105 tons of marijuana from the group. However, that did not prevent the church from finally receiving its tax-exempt status as a religious organization two years later. The church immediately filed a lawsuit against the government, demanding that its members be allowed to use marijuana.

The church had arisen on the heels of the widespread discovery of marijuana and other psychedelic substances by young people in the 1960s and the founding of a spectrum of groups that used various substances (LSD, peyote, and the like), all of which were considered controlled substances by the American government. The Ethiopian Zion Coptic Church believes that smoking marijuana is equivalent to making a burnt offering to God. The members believe that by smoking marijuana and thus consuming the psychoactive ingredient in the plant they will be able to change their body chemistry, and thus survive into God's new world after the end of this world. The new world will be a time of peace and brotherhood and of such abundance that people will no longer have to work. They call upon the Bible to support their belief (Genesis 1:29; Exodus 3:2–4; Psalms 104:14; Hebrews 6:7).

In spite of their belief, in 1978 the court ruled against their members being allowed to use marijuana even in a religious context, and immediately afterwards law enforcement agents raided the church center on Star Island. Finding illegal substances, the police arrested a number of church leaders, and after a long adjudication process they were convicted in 1981. In jail, they petitioned for the right to have marijuana, but were again denied. Through the 1970s, other drug-oriented churches in the United States (with one exception, the NATIVE AMERI-CAN CHURCH) also were handed a series of negative court rulings.

The church survives in the United States, but headquarters remain in Jamaica where members operate a 4,000-acre farm. Only a hundred members remain in the United States, but several thousand reside in Jamaica. A Web site is maintained by church member Carl Olsen at <http://www.commonlink.com/users/carl-olsen/RASTAFARI/coptic.html>. He describes the church as closely related to the Rastafarians, even though it does not teach similar doctrines and members do not wear dreadlocks, the unique Rastafarian hairstyle.

Address:

White Horses Ethiopian Zion Coptic Church
St. Thomas Parish
Jamaica

Source:

Marijuana and the Bible. Hialeah, FL: Ethiopian Zion Coptic Church, n.d.

ETHNORELIGIONS

The term ethnoreligion designates a group of religions also termed primal religions, native religions, indigenous religions, and most frequently in this volume traditional religions. The term refers to those thousands of religions practiced by the many, relatively small, surviving ethnic groups around the world. The religions themselves are relatively small in that, compared to Buddhism or Islam, for example, they are confined to a single particular ethnic (or sub-ethnic) group centered in a limited geographical locale. Adherents of the religion are usually tied together by a local language (some five thousand such local languages still exist) and are related to each other as members of the same kinship group. In general, one is born into the group, and except under unusual circumstances, new members from outside the ethnic group are not admitted. Most of these groups are preliterate; that is, they exist in cultures in which written languages may have only been introduced in the last two centuries, and what literature exists has not become a factor in the perpetuation of the religion.

In the nineteenth century, such ethnoreligions were viewed as lower in the evolutionary scale, less advanced forms of the religious life. Those scholars who developed the comparative study of religion often attempted to build a hierarchy of religions, in which invariably Christianity appeared at the apex and these religions formed the base. Over the nineteenth and twentieth centuries, many ethnoreligions disappeared as their adherents were absorbed into one of the larger religious communities.

Various considerations have led to a reevaluation of ethnoreligions in the twentieth century. A more sophisticated approach to history has challenged the ease with which presently existing tribal religions are equated with what might have existed in the ancient past. Scholars now understand that religions exist in time and change and develop over time. Scholars are now more hesitant to equate what they find in the present, even among the most isolated of groups, with what might have existed in the ancient past. They have also discovered that geographically limited communities were frequently tied to large trading networks that operated over large distances and were continuing spurs to transformation.

In the twentieth century, scholars have also developed a new appreciation of the levels of sophistication and appropriateness of the ideology underlying most ethnoreligions. Such sophistication was often obscured by the Western missionaries who for many years were the major conduits of information concerning the majority of ethnoreligionists. At the same time, rather than seeing a sharp break between “primitive” and “higher” religions, scholars now see a continuum of ethnogroups, which would include literary traditions such as Shinto and Judaism or a relatively new ethnoreligion like Sikhism. Hinduism can even be seen as a cluster of ethnoreligions.

Shinto, Judaism, and Sikhism aside, most ethnoreligions do share characteristics that set them apart as a distinctive set of religions. The great majority of ethnoreligions operate as oral traditions. The chronicles of Christianity, in particular, have been filled in the past centuries with accounts of initial missionaries to a different people who spent their first years reducing a language to writing and producing a grammar, a Bible, and a hymnbook or liturgy. Such work has been integrated into the spread of Christianity since the seventeenth century among Native Americans and in primal cultures around the world. However, in the face of the global movement of Christianity, Buddhism, and Islam, many people have chosen to remain adherents to their traditional faiths.

While expressing a wide variety of theologies and mythologies, ethnoreligions tend to have a primary concern with power. They developed in situations in which the struggle for basic survival was a constant concern and lacked the contemporary tools that have been supplied by science and technology. They had to deal with disease, natural calamities, and limited resources while seeking means to predict, control, and overcome them. At the same time, they shared the common human experiences of spirit being, heightened states of consciousness, and moments of success, transcendence, and empowerment.

Both their physical environment and inner experience provided the elements from which a worldview would be constructed. That worldview would integrate the totality of existence from the mundane to the transcendent, and it would be developed in such a manner that modern distinctions such as sacred and secular or religious and nonreligious would not exist. Given the holistic nature of many ethnoreligions, some have argued that it is improper to think of the group as having a religion at all, suggesting instead that spirituality pervades their life. One can, however, provide some overview of ethnoreligions based upon a religious analysis.

Most ethnoreligions include reference to a pantheon of deities, usually headed by a being who is seen as a first deity who directly creates or is the source of lesser deities, the created world, and humanity. The account of the world of this deity is told in stories (which together constitute a myth), which account for the origins of the group and the land they inhabit. The primal deity is often remote and inaccessible, and hence any relationships are with the myriad gods and goddesses. The world is also usually seen as alive, as the abode of gods or spirits or itself possessed of spiritual power, or both. Typically introduced into the worldview is a place for ancestors. Many origin stories include accounts of the first humans and make a place for the memory of honored group heroes and the immediate ancestors of living individuals. One of the factors by which ethnoreligions may be distinguished is the relative emphasis placed on deities, various spirits, and the group's ancestors. Each is seen as a source of power, some of good power to be accessed and some of evil power to be avoided or countered.

Most ethnoreligions provide a variety of means to relate to the larger cosmos and the sources of power. The most common means is magic, the utilization of various techniques believed to be the means of manipulating spiritual power. A variety of forms of magic have been distinguished and a variety of names (witchcraft, sorcery, wizardry) applied to them. One generally thinks of magic being invoked when specific mundane goals are being sought, such as the manipulation of weather, the curing of a disease, or the fecundity of a harvest. The life of groups also embodies elements of worship, actions aimed at building positive relationships with the deities, the spirit world, and the ancestors. Some rituals will often combine elements of both magic and worship.

*A shaman stands on a hillside in animal skin clothes in Russia.
(A. Kuznetsov/TRIP)*

Different primal societies also have a spectrum of religious practitioners, most of whose jobs have elements of secular occupations. The most well known of such practitioners are the shamans, known for their abilities to be in direct contact with the spirit world, and the priests, who function as ceremonial leaders in the annual cycle of rituals and otherwise enforce communal rules. The priestly role often overlaps with political leadership. Some groups may have healers, who are repositories of the group's wisdom on alleviating sickness. Oracles and divines are people who have an ability to offer supernatural guidance about a situation or discern the future. Mediums are people especially able to contact spirits. The different functions of magic and worship are merged and divided in numerous ways in different societies, with practitioners combining their "spiritual" roles in very different ways with more mundane occupations.

Ethnoreligions rarely have an abstract ethics, there being little time or motivation for the speculative arts, though the groups will have some rules that dictate actions and others that delineate forbidden actions. Researchers in Polynesia encountered the idea of taboo, objects, actions, and even people who were considered dangerous (and hence to be avoided) due to some characteristic—ritual uncleanness, past negative occurrences associated with them, or possession of negative spiritual power. An analogous idea appears to be inherent in many primal cultures. Among the most common taboos are those relating to childbirth, menstruating women, or the bodies of the deceased.

The Jewish Bible (the Christian Old Testament) includes many stories of the conflict of Judaism with neighboring polytheistic ethnoreligions. The rise of Christianity to power in Europe came as it replaced the numerous ethnoreligions that had preceded it across the continent. The Arab-Islamic Empire that spread from the Indus Valley to Morocco, while relatively tolerant of Christians and Jews, saw "polytheists" as major subjects for conversion. Through the succeeding centuries, as Christianity and Islam became global religions, their progress was often at the expense of ethnoreligions, which have been increasingly on the defensive in the modern world.

In spite of the political and scientific power aligned with the major world religions, primal religions have survived, and in places ethnoreligionists have assumed the offensive in preserving their traditional life. In this task, they have been assisted by contemporary ideas of cultural relativity, and they have drawn on those ideas to charge Christian and Muslim missionaries with a form of cultural totalitarianism. Christians, in particular, have been associated with the evils of European colonialism, and ethnoreligionists have reasserted themselves in the now independent former colonies. Ethnoreligions remain a significant factor in the religious life of most African countries south of the Sahara and in Asia, in such countries as South Korea, Laos, Malaysia, and Mongolia, among others.

The interface of ethnoreligions with European colonial authorities and with Islamic and Christian missionaries has in many places led to the emergence of modern movements that draw on traditional religious themes and rituals, but attempt to respond to the pressures applied by the colonial and postcolonial situation. Among the more famous would be the NATIVE AMERICAN CHURCH, a movement that spread among Native Americans early in the twentieth century. It was but one example of a series of such movements that had emerged at various times through the nineteenth century as the United States expanded across North America. Most of these, such as the Ghost Dance movement, were suppressed by the authorities. Equally well known are the so-called Cargo Cults that emerged in the South Pacific following World War II.

In Africa, a number of new spirit possession movements, in which contact with the deities is made as participants go into a trancelike state and allow spirits to speak and act through them, appeared throughout the twentieth century. Most began as local cults, but some subsequently spread to a variety of different groups across national boundaries. Another type of group was the Mchape (medicine) movement that arose in what is now Malawi in the 1930s, with a concentration on eradicating malevolent magic. It later spread to Uganda, Tanzania, Zambia, and Mozambique. The new traditionalist movements in Africa fit into a spectrum of new religions, which include groups that present a complex mixture of Christian and traditionalist themes in the AFRICAN INITIATED CHURCHES.

Thousands of ethnoreligions still exist, and only a representative sample could be included in this encyclopedia; these few, however, illustrate both the wide variety and common themes found in primal society worldwide. See entries on ABORIGINAL RELIGION (Australia); MAORI RELIGION (New Zealand); DOGON RELIGION (Mali); YORUBAN RELIGION/SPIRITUALITY (Nigeria); ZULU RELIGION/SPIRITUALITY (South Africa); THE LAKOTA (United States); THE NAVAJO (United States); and NEPAL INDIGENOUS RELIGION.

As a result of slavery, many Africans were transported to the Americas. In Brazil and the Caribbean Islands especially, new forms of African ethnoreligions emerged in dialogue with Roman Catholicism. Often seen as syntheses of the two faiths, the Afro-Caribbean and Afro-Brazilian faiths have increasingly been seen as surviving African religions with a veneer of Catholicism. See entries on Arara, CANDOMBLÉ, SANTERÍA, PALO MAYOMBE, VODOU, and UMBANDA.

During the twentieth century, citizens of developed nations have turned their attention to ancient ethnoreligions, and created new religions that attempt to recover religions lost for centuries. Most are known only through archaeological and anthropological reconstructions, or through the writings of representatives of faiths that replaced them. Most noticeable of the revivalist neoreligions are various forms of European Paganism. Attempts to re-found Paganism began early in the twentieth century, but did not take off until Gerald B. Gardner (1884–1964) founded the neoreligion of Witchcraft, or WICCA. As GARDNERIAN WICCA spread from England to North America it inspired further Neo-Pagan groups, including a revived DRUIDISM, and provided a legitimation for a modern form of polytheism built around worship of a prime female deity, GODDESS SPIRITUALITY. In the 1990s, the fall of the Soviet Union became the occasion of a new assertion of national tradition in Northern Europe by those who have revived Pagan traditions in the Baltic nations (Lithuania, Latvia, Estonia) and Poland (ROMUVA, THE CLAN OF AUSRANS, RODZIMA WIARA). See complementary entry on Traditional African Religion.

Sources:

- Adegbola, E. A. Ade, ed. Traditional Religion in West Africa. Nairobi: Uzima Press, 1983.
- Adler, Margot. Drawing Down the Moon. Rev. ed. Boston: Beacon Press, 1986.
- Alpers, Anthony. Maori Myths and Tribal Legends. Auckland, NZ: Longman, 1966.
- Bastide, Roger. The African Religions of Brazil: Toward a Sociology of Interpretation of Civilizations. Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1978.
- Beier, Ulli. The Origin of Life and Death: African Creation Myths. London: Heinemann, 1966.
- Blakely, T. D., E. A. Walter, and L. T. Dennis, eds. Religion in Africa: Experience and Expression. London: Heinemann, 1994.

- Brandon, George. Santeria from Africa to the New World: The Dead Sell Memories. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1993.
- Collins, John James. Native American Religions: A Geographical Survey. Lewiston, NY: Edwin Mellen, 1991.
- Eliade, Mircea. Shamanism: Archaic Technique of Ecstasy. New York: Pantheon, 1964.
- Haynes, Douglas. Micronesian Religion and Lore. Westport, CT: Greenwood, 1995.
- Hultkrantz, Ake. Native Religions of North America. San Francisco: Harper and Row, 1987.
- Isizoh, Chidi Denis. "Bibliography on African Traditional Religion." Posted at http://www.afrikaworld.net/afrel/atr_bibliography.htm. Accessed January 15, 2002.
- Murphy, Joseph M. Working the Spirit: Ceremonies of the African Diaspora. Boston: Beacon Press, 1994.
- Olupona, Jacob, ed. African Spirituality: Forms, Meanings and Expressions. New York: Crossroad, 2000.
- . African Traditional Religion in Contemporary Society. New York: Continuum, 1990.
- Smart, Ninian. The Religious Experience of Mankind. New York: Macmillan, 1984.
- Sullivan, Lawrence E., ed. Native American Religions: North America. New York: Macmillan, 1989.
- . Native Religions and Cultures of North America: Anthropology of the Sacred. New York: Continuum, 2000.
- Swain, Tony. Interpreting Aboriginal Religion: An Historical Account. Special Studies in Religion 5. South Australia: Flinders University, 1985.
- Swain, Tony, and Garry Trompf. The Religions of Oceania. London: Routledge, 1995.
- Turner, Harold W. Bibliography of New Religious Movements in Primal Societies. 2 vols. Boston: G. K. Hall, 1977, 1979.
- . Religious Innovation in Africa. Boston: G. K. Hall, 1980.
- Walker, Barbara. The Woman's Encyclopedia of Myths and Secrets. San Francisco: Harper and Row, 1983.

European Buddhist Union

The European Buddhist Union (EBU) is an international umbrella organization of Buddhist communities, centers, and organizations as well as national unions. The EBU is not affiliated to a particular Buddhist tradition or school. According to its constitution, adopted in 1990, the aims are to promote fellowship and cooperation among Buddhist organizations in Europe and to encourage meetings and friendly relations between their members. The EBU works to support and promote the growth and public recognition of Buddhism in Europe.

The EBU was founded in Paris in 1975. It is headed by a board consisting of a president, two vice presidents, and a treasurer. EBU's first president was French Paul Arnold (presidency 1975–1983), followed by British Arthur Burton-Stibbon (1983–1989), and also British Stephen Hodge (1989–1991), Dutch Aad Verboom (1991–1995), and French Lama Denys Teundroup (1995–1998). Currently, the presidency is jointly filled by Italian Maria Angela Falà and German Heinz Roiger. The number of member organizations has grown steadily since the EBU's beginning, with about thirty members from eleven countries in 1991, and forty-five members from fifteen European countries in early 2001.

Apart from national unions from France, Italy, Germany, Austria, Switzerland, Belgium, Portugal, and the Netherlands, members are also Buddhist centers or organizations working on a Europe-wide basis, such as RIGPA FELLOWSHIP, the Friends of the WESTERN BUDDHIST ORDER, SHAMBHALA INTERNATIONAL, some Zen and Shin Buddhist groups, the Tibetan Center Hamburg, the Manjushri Center London, and the Nalanda Association (Spain). Organizations of Buddhists who have emigrated from Asia (e.g., Vietnamese, Cambodian, or Laotian Buddhists) or of Nichiren traditions are so far not members of the EBU. Thus, the EBU is almost exclusively a representational organization of convert Buddhists, although some migrant Buddhist organizations are affiliated to national unions. The EBU estimates the number of Buddhists in Europe between two to four million people. In view of scholarly studies, a much lower figure of around one million Buddhists is, however, more likely.

EBU delegates meet annually at varying Buddhist centers. The main public event of the EBU is the EBU international congress, held every five years (with modifications). Congresses have taken place in Paris (1979, 1988, 2000), Turin (1984), and Berlin (1992). The meetings are aimed at bringing about both a dialogue between Buddhists of the various traditions and a stocktaking of the state of affairs of Buddhism in Europe. During such conferences, visited by up to one thousand people, notable speakers elaborate on the theme of the congress, be it the public recognition of Buddhism in Europe, educational issues, or the dynamic of the plurality and diversity of Buddhism in Europe.

The EBU has no permanent headquarters, both due to its poor financial resources and its rather weak organizational efforts. Its offices are thus moved in accordance with the current president. For many years it has been acknowledged as a UNESCO nongovernmental organization (category C) and has been approached by the European parliament and UNESCO on issues regarding the freedom of religious practice.

The union may be contacted through its two presidents: Maria Angela Falà, Unione Buddhista Italiana, Via Euripide 137, 00125 Rome, Italy, or Heinz Roiger, Wacholderweg 5a, 82194 Groebenzell, Germany. Falà is also head of the Italian Buddhist Union.

Martin Baumann

Sources:

- Baumann, Martin. "Buddhism in Europe: Past, Present, Prospects." In Holding the Lotus to the Rock: The Blossoming of Buddhism in the West, edited by Charles S. Prebish and Martin Baumann. Berkeley: University of California Press, 2001.
- . "Creating a European Path to Nirvana. Historical and Contemporary Developments of Buddhism in Europe." Journal of Contemporary Religion 10, 1 (1995): 55–70.
- . Einheit in der Vielfalt-Buddhismus in Europa. Munich: Deutsche Buddhistische Union, 1994.

Evangelical Baptist Union of Italy (UCEBI)

The first Baptist mission in Italy was established in Bologna in 1863 and was known as "The Gospel Mission to the Italians." Its lifespan was short. A more permanent institution, however, was the Spezia Mission for Italy and the Levant, which was founded in 1866 in La Spezia by English pastor Edward Clarke (1820–1912). Later, both an English and an American mission (the latter affiliated with the SOUTHERN BAPTIST CONVENTION) were established in Rome. In 1884, the two missions joined forces together with the Spezia Mission in a federation called Unione Cristiana Apostolica Battista (Christian Apostolic Baptist Union). In 1922, the British mission left Italy and entrusted its members to the Southern Baptists, while the Spezia Mission maintained an autonomous presence under the leadership of Harry Herbert Pullen (1862–1951). A notable Baptist intellectual of the early twentieth century was Giuseppe Gangale (1898–1978). In 1954, the Spezia Mission was reorganized and renamed Associazione Missionaria Evangelica Italiana (Italian Evangelical Mission Association). It merged in 1966 with the Unione Cristiana Evangelica Battista d'Italia (UCEBI, Evangelical Baptist Union of Italy), historically derived from the Southern Baptist Mission, but independent and in fact more liberal than its U.S. counterpart, thus inducing the more conservative Italian Baptists to establish a separate Assemblea Evangelica Battista Italiana (AEBI, Italian Evangelical Baptist Assembly).

Evangelical Christian Church in Irian Jaya

UCEBI now comprises more than 150 churches (not all of them Baptist), with some 50 male and female pastors, 5,000 adult members, and a "population" (including children and irregular attendees) of 25,000. On March 29, 1993, UCEBI entered into a concordat ("Intesa") with the Italian government, which theoretically would have entitled it to share in the national church tax. However, the UCEBI has so far elected not to receive its rightful portion of the tax because of its theological principles about the separation of church and state. The concordat preserves the UCEBI's congregationalist identity, whereby it regards itself as a loose federation of independent churches, despite the fact that in 1990 it adopted a Confession of Faith, which insists on adult baptism and separation of church and state. In 1977, UCEBI joined the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES and, in 1990, it signed a protocol for the reciprocal recognition of ministers with the Waldensian and Methodist Union, notwithstanding their differences on infant baptism (clearly spelled out in the protocol).

To date, there is no official Web site.

Address:

UCEBI
Piazza San Lorenzo in Lucina 35
00186 Rome
Italy

Massimo Introvigne and PierLuigi Zoccatelli

Sources:

- Sanfilippo, Paolo. Commento alla confessione di fede dell'U.C.E.B.I. Rome: U.C.E.B.I., 1992.
- Scaramuccia, F. Un'avventura di fede. L'Opera missionaria di Edward Clarke (1820–1912). Torino: Claudiana, 1999.
- Scaramuccia, Franco, and Renato Maiocchi. L'Intesa battista: un'identità rispettata. Torino: Claudiana, 1994.
- Wardin, Albert W., ed. Baptists around the World. Nashville: Broadman and Holman Publishers, 1995.

Evangelical Christian Church in Irian Jaya (GKI)

The Evangelical Christian Church in Irian Jaya (GKI Irja: Gereja Kristen Injili di Irian Jaya) began with the arrival of two independent German carpenters who were supported as missionaries by an independent faith mission in Holland. They settled in northeastern Irian Jaya, a province of Indonesia, in what is known as the Bird's Head in 1855, accompanied by several native Christians from the Moluccan Islands. They had little success, a fact that has been attributed to their extremely low opinion of the culture.

The progress of the mission changed visibly in 1907, when suddenly Christianity spread and many joined the church. Over the next few years the church spread throughout the northern half of the island (the Dutch authorities had given the southern half to the ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH). A teacher training school was opened at Meiji, at which indigenous leadership was trained. However, the Japanese invasion caught the mission unprepared. No indigenous pastors had been ordained, and no pan-congregational structure had been created. The move to formally organize the church was picked up after the war. In 1950 the first Indonesian pastors were ordained, and in 1965 the first synod met. Irian Jaya was incorporated into Indonesia in 1963, at which time the missionaries turned the church over to the local leadership and left the country.

Since it became independent, the church has had to face a variety of problems. The population has changed radically, as different peoples have moved into the area following economic development. The church faces competition with the spread of Roman Catholicism and Islam in its established territory in the north. The church itself has begun to spread into the south of Irian Jaya.

The church is organized on a presbyterian model, with a synod as the highest legislative body. It accepts the ancient Christian creeds as its doctrinal standard. The church has developed an extensive educational system that includes the Sekolah Tinggi Theologia I. S. Kijne (named for the leader of its original training school).

In the 1990s the church reported 650,000 members in 1,869 congregations. It is a member of the WORLD ALLIANCE OF REFORMED CHURCHES and the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES.

Address:

Evangelical Christian Church in Irian Jaya
P.O. Box 1160
Jalan Argapura No. 21
Jayapura 99222 Irian Jaya
Indonesia

Source:

- Bauswein, Jean-Jacques, and Lukas Vischer, eds. The Reformed Family Worldwide: A Survey of Reformed Churches, Theological Schools, and International Organizations. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans, 1999.

Evangelical Church in Chile

The Evangelical Church in Chile continues the spread of LUTHERANISM in Chile that began with the arrival of German-speaking people in the nineteenth century. An early center was in the southern part of the country near the towns of Valdivia and Osomo, and as early as 1852 two pastors arrived to form and lead congregations. About the same time, a professor of botany at the University of Chile began to organize Lutherans in the Santiago area and recruit pastors from Germany. They were allowed to meet only in private locations, religious freedom not yet being a part of Chilean life. He was assisted by the Gustav-Adolf-Werk, an organization established to assist Lutherans residing in predominantly Roman Catholic lands.

Pastors were obtained from several of the Lutheran bodies in Germany via Argentina, and they were considered part of a mission of the EVANGELICAL CHURCH IN GERMANY. A synod was formed in 1904. It operated in an informal manner until 1937, when the German Evangelical Lutheran Church was formally organized. The church joined the LUTHERAN WORLD FEDERATION in 1955 and four years later adopted a new constitution and assumed their present name. The program of the church also shifted significantly away from preserving German heritage to Chileanization. The increasing use of Spanish in worship was accelerated by a cooperative program with American Lutherans that aimed at missionary work among the urban poor and the rural indigenous population.

The church ran into major internal problems following the fall of the Allende regime. Pastors tended to be more attuned to the needs of those least supportive of the new government, while many of the laypeople were staunchly conservative. The expulsion from the country of Helmut Frenz, who had headed an ecumenical commission caring for political refugees, became the occasion for a split in the church. Eight of twelve congregations left; some became independent, and some founded the Lutheran Church in Chile. In the 1980s, most Lutherans joined a Council of Lutheran Churches in Chile to work toward reunion, but such a union has not yet occurred.

The Evangelical Lutheran Church in Chile was left with only two thousand members at the time of the disruption of 1975 and has added only a few hundred more in the ensuing decades. Most of its congregations and work is in the Santiago Metropolitan Area. It is a member of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES.

The church is led by its president and the synod, the highest legislative body among the rather loosely associated congregations. It continues a program of cooperation with the EVANGELICAL LUTHERAN CHURCH IN AMERICA and has attempted to extend it into communities south of Santiago.

Address:

Evangelical Lutheran Church in Chile
Ricardo Lyon 1483
Casilla 15167, Santiago
Chile

Source:

Bachmann, E. Theodore, and Mercia Brenne Bachmann. Lutheran Churches in the World: A Handbook. Minneapolis, MN: Augsburg Press, 1989.

Evangelical Church in Germany

The Evangelical Church in Germany inherits the history of the Christianity that was introduced into Germany possibly as early as the second century. Three bishoprics were erected in the third century, and over the next centuries Roman Catholicism became the dominant religion. The whole of present-day Germany was included in the Holy Roman Empire, whose emergence is generally dated to the coronation of Charlemagne in 800. By the sixteenth century, the empire consisted of a number of more or less autonomous countries, principalities, and city-states.

In the 1520s, Martin Luther, a monk and professor at the University of Wittenberg in Saxony, challenged the theological trends of his day and a variety of practices he felt had entered the ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH illegitimately. These trends and practices, he felt, contradicted the teachings of the Bible, which he insisted centered upon the message of the free salvation of God offered to believers. The new movement he began championed the ideas of the final authority of the Bible (over and against the authority of tradition and the teaching office of the papacy) and of salvation by faith, apart from any good works performed by humans. These emphases and their implications were embodied in the Augsburg Confession (1530) and a catechism that Luther had authored the year before. These two documents more than any others define the Lutheran tradition.

The religious wars that broke out between Lutherans and Roman Catholics as Luther's ideas spread were brought to a halt in 1555 by the Peace of Augsburg. The treaty signed at that time articulated a principle that was to have far-reaching effects throughout Germany. Both Lutherans and Catholics would exist in the Holy Roman Empire, and the ruler of each principality would decide which church would dominate in his/her land (a principle often expressed, in Latin, as cuius regio eius religio, whose region, his religion). In Lutheran lands, the prince assumed the power formerly held by the bishop. The situation was complicated in the ensuing decades as the REFORMED/PRESBYTERIAN TRADITION (the form of Protestantism developed by John Calvin in Geneva, Switzerland) spread through Germany, and some princes accepted it. Lutherans issued the Formula of Concord (1577) to distinguish the Lutheran faith from the Reformed variation.

Among the more important of the Lutheran principalities was Prussia. In 1613, the ruler adopted the Reformed faith. Although the population remained Lutheran, a number of Reformed congregations came into being, with the approval of the country's leadership. This development attracted French Huguenots to Prussia to escape the hostile environment in their homeland. In 1817, King Frederick William I (r. 1797–1840) forced a merger of the Lutheran and Reformed churches into what became known as the Evangelical Church. Though there was one national church organization, local congregations and individual ministers were allowed to choose either the Lutheran or Reformed faith. Both the Augsburg Confession and the Helvetic Confession (the latter a statement of the Reformed faith) were accepted as official statements of faith, and pastors could choose either Luther's Small Catechism or the Heidelberg Catechism as a tool to instruct the youth. In other lands, a similar Evangelical church came into existence. In Baden and the Palatinate, a new catechism that combined Lutheran and Reformed emphases was introduced.

During the course of the nineteenth century, the many smaller German states were unified into modern Germany, though the border changed frequently as different wars were fought and won or lost. As the country was united, the larger of the former independent German countries became states in the new nation. Each state continued the church that had previously evolved within its boundaries. The various churches existed along a spectrum from those that were predominantly Lutheran to those that were Evangelical or United (combining Lutheran and Reformed elements) to those that were predominantly Reformed. Predominantly Lutheran churches were found in Saxony and Bavaria, while the Reformed perspective dominated in Lippe. In Saxony, where the Evangelical church had originated, one group of Lutherans separated from the state church as a confessional Lutheran body.

Attempts to bring some unity to this chaotic situation were focused in various gatherings of the territorial churches throughout the nineteenth century. Then in 1918, church and state was separated, and the Protestant princes handed the episcopal authority they had heretofore held to the church. The church's synods received that authority. They became self-governing churches just in time to experience the era of inflation, economic depression, the rise of National Socialism, and World War II. Each of the territorial churches, one in each of the German states, adopted a new constitution, and continued their relationship with the state to the extent that they still received state money for their maintenance.

In 1922, the German Evangelical Church Federation was formed. It built upon the theological work and relationships of the nineteenth century. It assumed a basically Lutheran perspective but allowed room for the Reformed minority. Also operating among the churches was the General Evangelical Lutheran Conference, formed in 1868. It worked on building relationships with Lutherans in other lands and led directly to the calling of the Lutheran World Convention in 1923.

The rise of Nazism split the church between those who supported the aims of the state and those opposed to what they saw as an evil government. Progovernment supporters forced the organization of the German Evangelical Church in 1933. The church became the battleground for the two factions, and the battle lasted until suppressed by the war. The war ended with Germany divided into two parts.

The surviving leadership of the anti-Nazi Confessing Church emerged in 1945 to lead in the formation of a new inclusive Protestant church, the Evangelical Church of Germany (Evangelische Kirche in Deutschland; EKD). The same forces that led to the formation of the Lutheran World Convention led to participation in the formation of the LUTHERAN WORLD FEDERATION in 1948. The federation had as its immediate task the rebuilding of Europe. That same year, the predominantly Lutheran churches in Germany also founded the United Evangelical Lutheran Church of Germany (VELKD) as a fellowship within the EKD.

Both the EKD and the VELKD included the churches in the two sections into which Germany had been divided, which later became the Federal Republic of (West) Germany and the (East) German Democratic Republic. This attempt to preserve a church that reflected a united Germany proved untenable as the Cold War developed. In 1968, the EKD divided, and the VELKD followed suit the next year. That divided condition remained until the unification of Germany in 1990. The present Evangelical Church in Germany was brought together following the country's reunion.

The Evangelical Church in Germany now consists of twenty-four autonomous churches, one each in the different states of the German nation. Each church is allowed a considerable variation theologically and administratively and is responsible for the spiritual life of the people in its area. The Evangelical Church in Germany is a cooperative structure through which the churches carry out a variety of functions, including their relationship to various interdenominational ecumenical agencies like the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES. Individual churches have also chosen to be members of the Lutheran World Federation or the WORLD ALLIANCE OF REFORMED CHURCHES.

The highest legislative body in the EKD is its synod, which meets annually. The synod is headed by a seven-person governing board, the Presidium. The synod considers matters of common concern to the churches. It initiates programs through its nine permanent committees: Scripture and Proclamation of the Gospel; Social Services, Mission and Ecumenical Relations; Legal Affairs; Church, Society, and State; Education and Young People; Europe; the Environment; Budget; and Nominations.

The churches that now make up the EKD have experienced various movements concerned with theological revival and personal spirituality over the centuries. In the nineteenth century, the churches were profoundly affected by the world Protestant mission movement, which had actually begun in Germany among the Moravians. In response a number of missionary societies were formed, drawing their support from the members of one or more of the churches. Prominent among those based in the more Lutheran churches were the Leipzig, the Gossmer, and the North German missionary societies. Societies drawing primarily from United churches included the Berlin, the RHENISH, and the BASEL missionary societies. The latter, as its name implied, also drew heavily from Swiss Reformed churches. These societies carried German Protestantism around the world and in some places perpetuated the internal differences that existed in the German church.

In 2000, the EKD reported twenty-seven million members.

Address:

Evangelical Church in Germany
Kirchhauser Str. 12
Postfach 21 02 20
30402, Hanover
Germany
<http://www.ekd.de>

Sources:

Bachmann, E. Theodore, and Mercia Brenne Bachmann. Lutheran Churches in the World: A Handbook. Minneapolis, MN: Augsburg Press, 1989.
Van der Bent, Ans J., ed. Handbook/Member Churches/World Council of Churches. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 1985.

Evangelical Church in Kalimantan (GKE)

The Evangelical Church in Kalimantan (Gereja Kalimantan Evangelis [GKE]) originated in 1935 with the arrival of missionaries from the RHENISH MISSION (a German missionary society with roots in both LUTHERANISM and the REFORMED/PRESBYTERIAN TRADITION) who began work among the Dayak people in Kalimantan, a province in the central region of the island of Borneo. In 1838, they formally opened stations among the Dayak, Ngaju, and Maanyan peoples. The people expressed little interest in Christianity, and the local religious leaders were openly hostile to the missionaries. They also resented the attempt of colonial Dutch authorities to establish hegemony in the area. In the 1859 revolt against the Dutch, the mission was seen as part of the Dutch rule and destroyed. The missionaries left the area and relocated on the island of Nias (thus initiating work there).

The mission was reestablished once order was restored but continued to make only modest gains for the rest of the century. It was estimated that between 1866 and 1900, only two thousand Dayak people joined the new religion. In 1920, the Rhenish Mission turned over its work to the Swiss-based BASEL MISSION. The work began to make progress over the next fifteen years, and in 1935 the first Dayak ministers were ordained and the church formally established as an autonomous body. It was given a presbyterial order and adopted the ancient Christian creeds as its doctrinal standards. Among the new ministers was the son of a Dayak chief, F. Dingang, who proved an effective evangelist.

The missionaries continued to serve the church, and until the arrival of the Japanese in 1942, one of the Germans headed the synod board. Church leadership became thoroughly indigenous during the war years. The church saw the peace that followed as a time for expansion and in 1950 adopted its present name as part of a self-conscious attempt to abandon its role as an exclusively Dayak church and become one serving people of all ethnic groups throughout Kalimantan, both the various traditional groups and the many immigrants who have arrived since World War II. It also joined the newly founded Indonesian Council of Churches.

In 1955, the church founded the Centre of Agricultural Training, located at Tumbang Lahang, and in 1967 the Technical High School at Mandomai. In 1987, it capped its vast educational program with the new Christian University, opened at Palangka Raya, the capital of central Kalimantan.

In the 1990s, the church reported 219,000 members in 785 congregations. It is a member of the WORLD ALLIANCE OF REFORMED CHURCHES and the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES.

Address:

Evangelical Church in Kalimantan
P.O. Box 86
Jalan Jenderal Sudirman, No. 4, Rt 1
Benjarmasin-Jolly 70114 Kalimantan
Indonesia

Source:

Bauswein, Jean-Jacques, and Lukas Vischer, eds. The Reformed Family Worldwide: A Survey of Reformed Churches, Theological Schools, and International Organizations. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans, 1999.

Evangelical Church in New Caledonia and the Loyalty Islands

Christian missionaries began activity on New Caledonia (now the country of Kanaky in the South Pacific) in 1834. In 1841, two Samoan converts from the mission of the LONDON MISSIONARY SOCIETY (LMS) arrived in New Caledonia and others began work in the Loyalty Islands. They were joined by European missionaries in 1853, about the same time that the French took over control. The ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH missionaries had arrived two years earlier, and they received the support of the government. Nevertheless, the LMS mission grew steadily through the nineteenth century.

As French became the dominant language of Kanaky, the mission shifted its primary relationship from the LMS to the PARIS MISSION of the REFORMED CHURCH OF FRANCE, beginning in 1897. Under the PMS, the mission enjoyed a particularly prosperous period, beginning in 1902 during the tenure of Maurice Leenhart (1878–1954).

Evangelical Church of Cameroon

The church follows the REFORMED/PRESBYTERIAN TRADITION in theology and is congregational in polity. In the twentieth century, it has stressed its cultural identification with the Kanak people, the Melanesian group that originally inhabited the island.

The Evangelical Church became independent in 1962. During the century it developed largely indigenous leadership, and few Europeans remain on its staff. The church reports a membership of approximately 30,000 out of a population of 188,000.

Address:

Evangelical Church in New Caledonia and the Loyalty Islands
8 rue F. Leriche
B.P. 277, Vallée
New Caledonia

Sources:

Bauswein, Jean-Jacques, and Lukas Vischer, eds. The Reformed Family Worldwide: A Survey of Reformed Churches, Theological Schools, and International Organizations. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans, 1999.

Van der Bent, Ans J., ed. Handbook/Member Churches/World Council of Churches. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 1985.

Evangelical Church of Cameroon

The Evangelical Church of Cameroon (Église Évangélique du Cameroun) has its roots in the decision of the British Baptist Missionary Association to begin work in West Africa utilizing converts from among the recently freed Africans residing on Jamaica. In 1843, forty-two Jamaicans joined four European couples in setting up a mission station on Fernando Po (now Bioko), the island that the Spanish had turned into a center of the African slave trade. Two years later, Joseph Merrick, one of the Jamaicans, moved to the coast of Cameroon and began learning the language of the Usubu people. One of the Europeans, Alfred Saker (1814–1880), moved to Cameroon Town (now Duala). He formed the first Baptist church in 1849.

The Baptist work grew until 1884, at which time Germany gained hegemony over Cameroon. The Baptists turned their work over to the BASEL MISSION, a Swiss missionary society that drew support from Germans and Austrians. The new workers agreed to respect the Baptist faith of the converts; nevertheless, many did not like the manner of the German missionaries or their introduction of practices such as infant baptism. A split occurred. Those who stuck with the Basel Mission experienced a new change as World War I began, when Britain and France replaced the German authorities. The Basel Mission turned over its work in French territory (some fifteen stations) to the PARIS MISSION (of the REFORMED CHURCH OF FRANCE). Even though the Basel Mission was allowed to return in 1925, it did not reclaim its stations from the Paris Mission. The resources of the French missionaries, however, had been significantly stretched by many new responsibilities, a fact that hastened indigenous leadership's taking over the church's management and the church gaining its autonomy even before the country became independent. The process toward independency began in 1947, and the church emerged as the fully independent Evangelical Church of Cameroon in 1957.

The Evangelical Church's life had been partly tied to that of the Union des Églises Baptistes du Cameroun, which had also come under the guidance of the Paris Mission and had also become independent, in 1947. The church and the union retain close fraternal ties and are both members of the Council of Baptist and Evangelical Churches.

In the 1990s, the Evangelical Church reported 1,200,000 members in its 700 churches. It is presbyterially organized and currently has thirteen regional synods. A general synod is the highest legislative body. It has a theological college at Ndougé. It is a member of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES.

Address:

Evangelical Church of Cameroon
B.P. 89
Duala
Cameroon

Source:

Bauswein, Jean-Jacques, and Lukas Vischer, eds. The Reformed Family Worldwide: A Survey of Reformed Churches, Theological Schools, and International Organizations. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans, 1999.

Evangelical Church of Chad

The Evangelical Church of Chad grew out of the variety of Protestant and FREE CHURCH missionary efforts launched in various parts of the country during the twentieth century, at which time Chad was a part of French Equatorial Africa. The Canadian branch of the Sudan United Mission (SUM), an interdenominational Evangelical sending agency, entered in 1925, and while developing its own work in the southwestern province of Logone, was active in coordinating the efforts of other missionary groups. After World War II the Evangelical enterprise entered a growth phase. SUM's effort was focused upon the establishment of a self-supporting church and the development of indigenous leadership in what was and remains a relatively poor land.

In 1958, the Mission Franco-Romande du Tchad started work in the Ouaddai region, a predominantly Muslim area in eastern Chad, with SUM support. It soon received substantial additional support from the World Evangelization Crusade (now WEC International), a British-based sending agency. In 1962, the leadership of the Sudan United Mission, the WEC, and the French Mennonites, who were also supporting work in the area, began a dialogue in light of the emergence of Chad as an independent country (1960) and the fragmented nature of the Protestant mission scene. Out of these conversations came the SUM Mission, which the government recognized in 1963. The SUM Mission evolved into the Evangelical Church of Chad.

It is a conservative Free Church based upon the authority of the Bible and affirming the basic doctrines of Evangelical Christianity. In the late 1990s, it reported some 200,000 members, the largest Protestant body in what is a predominantly Muslim country. It oversees several Bible schools and the Ecole Supérieure de Théologie Évangélique. It was an important force in establishing the Comité de Coordination des Activités Missionnaires, which continues to promote amity between the different missionary agencies operating in the country.

Address:

Evangelical Church of Chad
B.P. 821
N'Djamena
Chad

Source:

Bauswein, Jean-Jacques, and Lukas Vischer, eds. The Reformed Family Worldwide: A Survey of Reformed Churches, Theological Schools, and International Organizations. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans, 1999.

Evangelical Church of French Polynesia

The Evangelical Church of French Polynesia (Église Évangélique de Polynésie Française) dates to the arrival of the first missionaries dispensed to the South Pacific by the newly formed LONDON MISSIONARY SOCIETY (LMS) in 1787. The society sent out thirty representatives, four of whom were ordained. The remaining party consisted of spouses and a spectrum of artisans. The original plan called for the team to establish two self-supporting communities on Tahiti and Tonga. Eighteen settled in Tahiti. However, within a year, eleven of these moved on to Australia. Those remaining kept the mission going. Their work finally bore fruit in 1815 (some sources say 1812) when King Pomare converted and asked to be baptized.

The king's conversion had far-reaching results. He had a large church constructed and urged his people to become Christians. Most followed his lead. The church became institutionalized across Tahiti with the training of lay leadership and the opening of a publishing concern. The missionaries saw to the translation of the Bible that was published in Tahitian in 1838.

The French moved into the area in 1840 and established a protectorate. The authorities soon demanded that French missionaries, primarily Roman Catholic priests, be allowed to work on Tahiti (they were already present in other nearby islands). A number of islanders deserted the Evangelical Church. In 1863, the REFORMED CHURCH OF FRANCE, through its PARIS MISSION, began work on Tahiti. It represented the same Reformed Protestantism as the LMS and in 1883, as the islands were becoming increasingly French in language and orientation, the LMS turned all of its work over to the Paris Society.

Through the twentieth century, the Society spread Protestantism through French Polynesia. In 1963, the mission became autonomous as the Evangelical Church of French Polynesia. The church also began a mission among the Chinese laborers who arrived in two waves (1856–66, 1907–1930).

Today, the Evangelical Church continues to dominate the Protestant community and includes approximately 45 percent of the population in its membership (approximately 95,000). They also have a large congregation among expatriate French Polynesians in Kanaky. There are a variety of small independent churches throughout the islands, most having been formed by former Evangelical Church leaders.

The Evangelical Church of French Polynesia is a member of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES and an active participant in the Pacific Conference of Churches.

Address:

Evangelical Church of French Polynesia
B.P. 11
3 Blvd. Pomare 403
Paeete, Tahiti
French Polynesia

Sources:

Bauswein, Jean-Jacques, and Lukas Vischer, eds. The Reformed Family Worldwide: A Survey of Reformed Churches, Theological Schools, and International Organizations. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans, 1999.
Van der Bent, Ans J., ed. Handbook/Member Churches/World Council of Churches. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 1985.

Evangelical Church of Gabon

The Evangelical Church of Gabon was initiated by missionaries from the AMERICAN BOARD OF COMMISSIONERS FOR FOREIGN MISSIONS, the missionary agency founded by American Congregationalists early in the nineteenth century. Their representatives settled in what is now Gabon in 1842. A generation later, the work was passed to the Presbyterian church in the USA, now a constituent part of the PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH (U.S.A.), which in turn passed their work to the PARIS MISSION (the missionary arm of the REFORMED CHURCH OF FRANCE) in 1892. In the late nineteenth century, France had asserted its hegemony over this part of Africa and in the 1890s demanded that instruction in all schools be in French.

By 1949, the Paris Mission had eight stations and twenty missionary personnel working in Gabon. That same year the first group of African members returned from having completed their theological studies at the seminary in Cameroon. These five teachers became the first native pastors. Their arrival also speeded the mission's transformation into an autonomous church, completed in 1961. The church was composed primarily of Fang people and heavily female in membership.

Many churches have been disrupted because of interference or suppression by the government, but the Evangelical church of Gabon has been disrupted by internal disputes and power struggles. In 1971, the church was split into two factions, which had become visible during the close election of Nang Essono as head of the church. His unsuccessful challenger, Sima Ndong, headed the dissenting faction. The church removed the pastors supporting Ndong from their ministerial roles. In spite of a number of attempts to settle the dispute, the schism continued for the next twenty years.

It was not until 1989 that what appeared to be a reconciliation was worked out and a single synodal council elected to office. However, in the early 1990s, troubles arose again. On several occasions the disputes led to shooting. By the middle of the 1990s, the church had split into three factions, known informally as the Baraka, the Foyer, and the Gros Bouquet. In 1997, the Baraka and Gros Bouquet factions met in a joint synod, formed a new national council, and elected a new president, Rev. Jean Noël Ogouliguendé. This church is now recognized as the Evangelical Church of Gabon.

At the beginning of 1990, the church had 96,000 members. It is a member of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES. It supports the Theological School of the African Protestant Church at Yaoundé, Cameroon.

Address:

Evangelical Church of Gabon
B.P. 617
Libreville
Gabon

Sources:

- Bauswein, Jean-Jacques, and Lukas Vischer, eds. The Reformed Family Worldwide: A Survey of Reformed Churches, Theological Schools, and International Organizations. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans, 1999.
- Van der Bent, Ans J., ed. Handbook/Member Churches/World Council of Churches. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 1985.

Evangelical Church of the Augsburg and Helvetic Confessions in Austria

Martin Luther's first followers in Austria can be traced as early as 1521, and until the beginning of the Thirty Years'

War in 1618, Austrian Christians of the Protestant denominations in the upper classes had religious freedom. During the time of its widest spread the Evangelical Church could claim three quarters of the Austrian population. But when the Austrian emperors Ferdinand II (1578–1637) and III (1608–1657) enforced some burdensome changes, following the victory of the Catholic league in the Battle of the White Mountain (1620), the fate of the Evangelical Church grew far worse. The Roman Catholic Counter-Reformation forced thousands of Protestants to either leave the country or to hide underground for more than a hundred and fifty years.

Two important historical and legal changes happened in the following centuries. In 1784 Emperor Joseph II (1741–1790) issued the Patent of Tolerance, and Lutherans and Calvinists (and members of the Eastern Orthodox Church) were permitted private religious services, though they were still considered "second-class citizens." Finally, in 1861, Protestants got the same civil rights as members of the ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH in the Austrian Monarchy, and in 1867 religious freedom was legally acknowledged as a human right by the Fundamental Law of the State. But religious affairs, including those of the Evangelical Church, remained under the control of the government, which was traditionally dominated by Roman Catholic values. It was not until 1961 that an agreement was signed between the Republic of Austria and the Evangelical Church under which the latter gained full sovereignty and autonomy.

Presently there are about 351,000 members of the two bodies that together constitute the Church of the Augsburg and Helvetic Confessions, with sinking numbers during the last decades of the twentieth century. The Church of the Augsburg Confession (Lutheran) now comprises 190 parishes and seven superintendents, the Church of the Helvetic Confession (Reformed) holds nine parishes (with 10,500 persons). Worth mentioning is the existence within both churches of a small number of "mixed" parishes, following both the Augsburg and Helvetic confessions. The largest number of Evangelical Christians in relation to the whole population lives in the Burgenland, an eastern part of Austria bordering Hungary, which was attached to Austria after World War I. Many adherents of the Helvetic confession live in Vorarlberg, bordering Switzerland.

In both churches people are elected from the community for their offices; the governing body is the synod. Women have been admitted to the ministry; the first female superintendent, Gertraud Knoll, was elected in 1994 for the Burgenland. For theological studies there exists a faculty at the University of Vienna with a full curriculum leading up to the doctorate.

The Evangelical Church was a founding member of the Ecumenical Council of Churches of Austria in 1958; the Augsburg Confession also joined the LUTHERAN WORLD FEDERATION in 1947, and the Helvetic Confession is a member of the WORLD ALLIANCE OF REFORMED CHURCHES. Both Confessions are also members of the Conference of European Churches and the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES. There are regular and active ecumenical contacts with most of the Protestant FREE CHURCHES and with the Roman Catholic Church and OLD CATHOLIC CHURCH OF AUSTRIA; with the latter there has been intercommunion since 1986.

Address:

Evangelical Church of the Augsburg and Helvetic Confessions
Severin-Schreiber-Gasse 3
1180 Wien
Austria
<http://www.evangel.at>

Manfred Hutter

Source:

Reingrabner, Gustav. Protestanten in Oesterreich. Geschichte und Dokumentation. Vienna: publisher unknown, 1981.

Evangelical Church of the Augsburg Confession in Romania

The Evangelical Church of the Augsburg Confession in Romania derives from the spread of LUTHERANISM in the German-speaking areas of Transylvania in the sixteenth century. It shared some of its history with that of the LUTHERAN CHURCH IN HUNGARY, though existing as a separate German-speaking organization. The Lutheran movement arrived in Transylvania just as the Turkish army was establishing its control. German-speaking Transylvanians formed the Church of God of the Saxon Nation, which in 1572 officially accepted the Augsburg Confession as its confessional statement of belief. Hungarian-speaking Lutherans in Transylvania, originally a part of the Lutheran Church in Hungary, were cut off from their counterparts in Hungary with the separation of Transylvania and its incorporation into Romania after World War I. They organized the Synodal Evangelical Presbyterian Lutheran Church of the Augsburg Confession.

Transylvania was incorporated into the Austro-Hungarian Empire in 1691. Although Turkish rule was gone, the new government favored the ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH to the detriment of Protestant churches. In the mid-nineteenth century the church adopted a new constitution (with the approval of ruling authorities in Vienna) that established a presbyterial-synodal governing system but allowed for significant congregational autonomy. The church has always been headed by a bishop. The church also oversaw a large primary and secondary school system.

The church suffered greatly during World War II and the subsequent rise of an aggressive atheist government. At the same time, many Transylvanians accepted the offer of the German government to resettle people of German heritage from Eastern Europe in Germany. With over a hundred pastors accepting this offer, the church has faced a significant leadership problem. The Romanian population also moved into the industrial centers and away from the towns where most Lutheran parishes were located. With the fall of the Ceausescu government in 1989, the church has received greater freedom to develop its life.

The church is headquartered in Sibiu. In 1997 it reported 17,500 members. In the Sibiu headquarters complex there is a school of theology for training pastors. With instruction in German, it serves as an extension school of the United Protestant Theological Institute located in Cluj, where instruction is in Hungarian. The institute also serves Hungarian-speaking Lutheran, Reformed, and Unitarian educational needs.

The church is very ecumenically minded and is a member of the LUTHERAN WORLD FEDERATION, the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES, and the Conference of European Churches.

Address:

Evangelical Church of the Augsburg Confession in Romania
Strada General Magheru 4
2400 Sibiu
Romania

Sources:

- Bachmann, E. Theodore, and Mercia Brenne Bachmann. Lutheran Churches in the World: A Handbook. Minneapolis, MN: Augsburg Press, 1989.
- Branzea, Nicolae I., and Stefan Ionita. Religious Life in Romania. Bucharest: Editura Paideia, 1999.
- Cuciuc, Constantin. Atlasul Religiilor si al Monumentelor Istorice Religioase din Romania. Bucharest: Editura Gnosis, 1996.

Evangelical Church of the Augsburg Confession in the Slovak Republic

The territory constituting the present Slovak Republic, formerly a part of the Czechoslovak Socialist Republic, emerged as an independent country in 1993, in the wake of the destruction of the Marxist hegemony in Eastern Europe. It had existed under Hungarian rule for most of the second millennium C.E. As such, it was eventually incorporated into the Austro-Hungarian Empire. In 1921, in the wake of World War I and the collapse of the empire, the nation of Czechoslovakia was created by the merger of Slovakia with the neighboring provinces of Bohemia and Moravia, which through the centuries had been more identified with German rule.

In 1948, Czechoslovakia became a socialist country. The government was reorganized as a federal republic in 1968, and Slovakia gained heightened autonomy as a regional government unit. With the fall of communism, the desire for the formation of a Slovak-speaking state led to the formation of the present Slovak Republic.

Evangelical Church of the Augsburg Confession

LUTHERANISM had come into Bohemia, Moravia, and Slovakia during the early sixteenth century. The area had previously been affected by the reforming movement led by John Hus (1372–1415) and the Moravian Brethren. Although the Counter-Reformation led to a resurgent Catholicism in Bohemia and Moravia (and the almost complete suppression of Lutheranism), Lutheranism survived in strength in Slovakia. It was suppressed, but in the two decades after the Edict of Toleration of 1781, the church quickly rebounded. Parishes reappeared and over 130 church buildings were erected. It received a new level of recognition in 1848, when it was accorded full ecclesial equality.

Until the formation of Czechoslovakia, Slovakian Lutheranism had been a part of the larger Lutheran Church in Hungary, which was controlled by a Hungarian-speaking leadership. The setting up of the new country was the occasion for establishing a separate Slovak-speaking Lutheran body. The present church continues that organization into the now independent nation of the Slovak Republic.

The church accepts the Augsburg Confession as its doctrinal standard. It has a rich liturgical life, which includes the use of the Kralice Bible (a Czech translation of 1577) and the hymnal of Wittenberg-trained pastor-poet Juraj Tranovsky (1592–1637). Ecumenically oriented, the church is a member of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES and was an original member of the Ecumenical Council of Churches of the former Czechoslovakia. It is currently a member of the Ecumenical Council of Churches in the Slovak Republic.

The church is organized into fourteen districts and two dioceses, the later each headed by a bishop. The general convention is the primary legislative body, and the administration of the national church is left in the hands of a presidium and the bishop-general. As the twentieth century came to a close, the church reported 329,000 members. It oversees some Slovak parishes in the Czech Republic, and has strong ties to Slovak-speaking Lutherans in the countries of the former Yugoslavia and Slovak-heritage congregations in the United States.

It sponsors the Slovak Theological Faculty, which trains pastors for Slovak-, Slovene-, and Polish-speaking congregations, both in the Slovak Republic and in neighboring countries. A separate Polish-speaking Lutheran church also exists in the Slovak Republic.

Address:

Evangelical Church of the Augsburg
Confession in the Slovak Republic
Palisady 46
81106 Bratislava
Slovak Republic
<http://www.ecav.sk>

Source:

Bachmann, E. Theodore, and Mercia Brenne Bachmann. Lutheran Churches in the World: A Handbook. Minneapolis, MN: Augsburg Press, 1989.

Evangelical Church of the Augsburg Confession (Poland)

The ideas of Martin Luther (1483–1546) came to Poland as soon as Polish merchants and students brought them on their way back home from Wittenberg and Königsberg. The first Evangelical (that is, Lutheran) sermons were preached in 1518 in Gdansk and in Slask (i.e., Silesia). Already in 1523, the Wroclaw city council had nominated the first Evangelical parson. The Lutheran views spread from Lower Silesia and Krakow to the area of Cieszyn and survived the Catholic Counter-Reformation during the reign of the Habsburgs to stay alive until today. In Eastern Prussia, in turn, the last Great Master of the Teutonic Order, Prince Albert (1490–1568), under the personal influence of Luther, dissolved his order and then formally paid homage to the Polish king, Zygmunt the Old (aka Sigismund II, 1520–1572). Both the king and his son created favorable conditions for the Augsburg Confession in Eastern Prussia. Although the Polish parliament voted for equality of religions and religious peace in 1573, the act was condemned by the ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH, and the period of the Counter-Reformation started.

Later on, Austrian monarch Joseph I (1678–1711) allowed Evangelicals to build six churches in Silesia, and the Edict of Toleration issued by Joseph II (1741–1790) in 1781 allowed Evangelical religious life to flourish in the Cieszyn area. The immigration to Polish soil of Evangelical craftsmen and farmers from the whole of Europe in the nineteenth century gave LUTHERANISM new strength. However, World War II prevented the stabilization of the church. Around 30 percent of the Evangelical clergy died in concentration camps and prisons. The politics of the postwar authorities also caused a weakening of the church.

The primary structure of the church is its synod, the church's governing body, consisting of 15 clergy delegates and 390 lay representatives. The synod is elected every five years. The administrative and executive power rests with the eight-member consistory and the superintendent bishop. The consistory is based in Warsaw. Both the president of the synod and the president of the consistory are elected by a special collective electoral body. The inner affairs of the church are regulated by the Fundamental Inner Law, as accepted by the Church Synod. The basic relationship of the church and the Republic of Poland is determined by the law enacted on May 13, 1994.

The church is currently divided into six dioceses in Poland. They are represented by their respective synods and execute their power through the board and the bishop. There are 122 parishes and 277 churches or chapels of the church. The 87,000 (as of 1997) members live mainly in the area of Cieszyn (Silesia), in Upper Silesia, Mazury (former East Prussia), and Warsaw. They are cared for by approximately 120 priests. The Kosciol Ewangelicko-Augsburski, to give it its Polish name, is a member of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES and the Polish Ecumenical Council.

Address:

Evangelical Church of the Augsburg Confession (Poland)
ul. Miodowa 21
00-246 Warszawa
Poland

Leslaw Borowski

Sources:

Gastpar, Waldemar. Historia protestantyzmu w Polsce. Warszawa: ChAT, 1977.
Marceli, Kosman. Protestanci w Polsce do polowy XX wieku. Wrocław: Ossolineum, 1980

Evangelical Church of the Congo

The Evangelical Church of the Congo began in 1910 when missionaries from the MISSION COVENANT CHURCH OF SWEDEN arrived in Madzia, then in French Equatorial Africa. They were soon joined by colleagues from Norway and Finland. A thriving mission resulted, and a seminary was created at Ngouedi. In 1947, a period of spiritual awakening broke out at the seminary and soon spread through the church and led to a burst of membership growth. In 1961, a year after the Congo gained its independence, the mission also became independent.

The new church followed the pietist and Evangelical teachings of its parent body. It has no creed and regards the Bible as the only source of its faith and practice. Only adult baptism is practiced. The church has a centralized government headed by a synod. The church is divided into districts, each headed by a superintendent. The church manages a number of health facilities and several schools for girls.

The 1990s were a time of social unrest in the country and tensions within the church, many of which were based on ethnic differences. In 1997, during a civil war, much of the church's property was destroyed or looted. The church has worked for democratic government to become a reality in the Congo, one of the primary goals of the Institute for Training and Information, a joint project of the church and the Mission Covenant Church of Sweden.

In the 1990s the church reported 135,000 members in 111 congregations. It is a member of the WORLD ALLIANCE OF REFORMED CHURCHES and the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES.

Address:

Evangelical Church of the Congo
Bacongo 3205
1 rte de Djoué-Moukounizougouaka
Brazzaville
Congo

Sources:

Bauswein, Jean-Jacques, and Lukas Vischer, eds. The Reformed Family Worldwide: A Survey of Reformed Churches, Theological Schools, and International Organizations. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans, 1999.
Van der Bent, Ans J., ed. Handbook/Member Churches/World Council of Churches. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 1985.

Evangelical Church of the Czech Brethren [Ceskobratrská církev evengelická]

The Evangelical Church of the Czech Brethren (Ceskobratrská církev evengelická) emerged in 1918 through the coalescence of the former Calvinist Evangelical Church of the Helvetic Confession and the Evangelical Church of the Augsburg Confession, both of which dated to the movement of the Protestant Reformation into the Czech lands in the sixteenth century. Its emergence came as a result of long-term efforts of Czech Calvinists and Lutherans to unite. The unification had originally been planned for the year 1915 to honor the five hundredth anniversary of the martyr's death in flames of Czech religious reformer Jan Hus. However, the outbreak of World War I prevented it. After the war, the fall of the Austro-Hungarian monarchy and the foundation of the new, independent Czechoslovak Republic created space for the emergence of this new church. All the Czech congregations affiliated with the two churches joined this new church at its beginning.

The church is actively involved in the ecumenical movement: In 1927 it helped to establish the Union of Evangelical Churches in the Republic of Czechoslovakia; in 1955 it was one of the cofounders of the Ecumenical Council of Churches; and later it cooperated in the ecumenical translation of the Bible into Czech. It is also a member of the WORLD ALLIANCE OF REFORMED CHURCHES, of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES, and of the Conference of European Churches.

One of the specific features of this church is its embracing of four confessions: the Brethren Confession (1535), the Bohemian Confession (the common confession of Evangelical Christians in the Czech countries, stemming from Hussite times and presented to the emperor Maximilian II in 1575), the Augsburg Confession (1539), and the Second Helvetic Confession (1566). However, the overall common denominator of its doctrine and practice is the Calvinism of the Helvetic Confession. Members acknowledge two sacraments: baptism and the Eucharist.

Evangelical Church of the Lutheran Confession in Brazil

The organizational structure of this church is presbyterian. The church is divided into thirteen seniorates, which are presided over by committees composed of both ministers and laypeople. The highest body is the synod, which holds annual meetings and is composed of elected deputies. The Synod Council, headed by a Synod Senior, controls the work of the church.

The church estimates that it has about two hundred thousand members, which makes the church the largest body in the Czech Republic.

Dusan Lužný

Address:

Evangelical Church of the Czech Brethren
Jungmanova 9
111 21 Praha 1
Czech Republic

Source:

Bauswein, Jean-Jacques, and Lukas Vischer, eds. The Reformed Family Worldwide: A Survey of Reformed Churches, Theological Schools, and International Organizations. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans, 1999.

Evangelical Church of the Lutheran Confession in Brazil

The Lutheran presence in Brazil began with the movement of the Portuguese royal family to Brazil during the Napoleonic era. During his stay in Brazil, the king devised a plan to introduce European-style farming into the southern part of the country. He recruited farmers from the Catholic section of Switzerland, but unable to fill his needs, he turned to Germany. Most who accepted the offer of a new life in Brazil came from the poorer areas of the Rhine River Valley in the Palatinate. The first group arrived in 1823 and settled at Nova Friburgo, northeast of Rio de Janeiro. Subsequent settlers were located farther south in Rio Grande do Sul. In all some five thousand people migrated, and included among them were a few German Lutheran pastors. The first church was organized in 1824.

The church overcame a number of obstacles during its first generation. It always had a shortage of pastors, a problem only remedied when several of the German mission societies became involved in the 1860s. Some settlements became victims of imposters. In midcentury, the JESUITS entered the area, and their vigorous pro-Catholic work soured what had been good relations between Lutherans and Roman Catholics. Nevertheless, immigration continued, and eventually four separate Lutheran synods emerged, serving communities in different parts of the country. The Synod of Rio Grande do Sul was formed in the south in 1886. Then came the Lutheran Synod (1901), the Synod of Santa Catarina and Parana (1911), and the Middle Brazilian Synod (1912).

The new century brought a new set of obstacles, not the least being the arrival of missionaries from the Lutheran Church-Missouri Synod who, rejecting the theological latitude in the Evangelical Church, which included those of the REFORMED/PRESBYTERIAN TRADITION, took members away from the church to found a conservative, exclusively Lutheran, rival church. World War I brought pressures for the German-speaking communities to drop their German language, only to be followed in the 1930s by the attractiveness of National Socialism and Adolf Hitler. Then in 1938, the Brazilian government nationalized all the foreign-language schools.

On a more positive note, in 1922, steps had been taken to start theological education in Brazil, a must if the churches were ever to free themselves from dependence on the home country. World War II led to the arrest of some pastors and speeded the transition to Portuguese. In 1946 the founding of the Faculdade de Teologia (now the Escola Superior de Teologia) became an important event uniting the four synods. They united in a federation just two years later and under that loose organization joined the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES in 1950 and the LUTHERAN WORLD FEDERATION in 1952. The church is a charter member of the National Council of Churches in Brazil. It adopted its present name in 1954. At the time it was the largest non-Catholic body in Brazil, though that is no longer the case.

The new Evangelical Church moved to improve its ecumenical ties, especially with a long-term program of contacts with the ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH. It has also supported the continued improvement of its educational facilities and encouraged faculty members and pastors to pursue further education in Germany.

Although no longer the largest Protestant body in Brazil, it is by far the largest Lutheran Church body in South America. In the 1990s, it reported 850,000 members. It had a membership boost as Lutherans from Europe moved to Brazil after World War II. The church issues a periodical, Jornal Evangélico. The church is led by a general assembly that meets biennially, and the administration is in the hands of a church council. Congregations are divided into regions and districts.

Address:

Evangelical Church of the Lutheran Confession [Brazil]
Rua Señor dos Passos 202, 5 andar
C.P. 2876
90001-970 Porto Alegre, RS
Brazil

Sources:

Bachmann, E. Theodore, and Mercia Brenne Bachmann. Lutheran Churches in the World: A Handbook. Minneapolis, MN: Augsburg Press, 1989.

Van der Bent, Ans J., ed. Handbook/Member Churches/World Council of Churches. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 1985.

Evangelical Church of the River Plate

LUTHERANISM in Argentina began among German immigrants in Buenos Aires in the years after the country gained independence (in 1816). German Protestants initially gathered in the Anglican Church, but in 1842 petitioned the Evangelical Mission Society in Bremen, Germany, for a pastor. August Ludwig Siegel arrived the following year. It took the members a decade to raise the funds to construct their own building, which was dedicated in 1853. Meanwhile, immigration increased, especially after the unrest in 1848 encouraged many to leave Europe. Others were lured by a scheme to populate Argentina's interior. Some also settled in nearby Uruguay, and ties developed with similar congregations in Brazil, Paraguay, and Chile. In the 1890s a pastor was sent to travel a preaching circuit among the German Lutheran congregations across the southern half of South America, and in 1900 an association, the German Lutheran La Plata Synod, held its first meeting.

For the next three decades, the pastor of the Buenos Aires congregation also served as the president of the synod, but in 1932 a dean was appointed from Germany to take the burdens of the synod's office from the pastor. The church continued to grow, especially in the years after World War II, when many Germans moved to South America. It became independent of the EVANGELICAL CHURCH IN GERMANY in 1956, and for the next generation church leaders pushed members to become more integrated into South American society. The success of their efforts was manifest in 1980, when the first Argentinean-born pastor, Rodolfo Reinach, was elected the synod's president.

Today the church continues to serve the descendants of German and Swiss immigrants, and as adaptation has occurred, Spanish services have superseded German-language worship. Gradually, the majority of pastors have also come from among men trained at the Instituto Superior Evangélico de Estudios Teológicos, a Protestant seminary supported by several denominations in Buenos Aires.

The church has been a leader in ecumenical efforts. It is a member of the Argentine Federation of Evangelical Churches and the Latin American Council of Churches. It helped to form the Lutheran Council of the River Plate, which includes the three larger Lutheran bodies in Argentina, as well as a number of independent churches and smaller associations. It is also a member of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES and the LUTHERAN WORLD FEDERATION.

The church is headquartered in Buenos Aires. It includes congregations in Paraguay and Uruguay in its membership, last reported in 2000 at 47,000.

Although largely Lutheran, the church has adopted a position as a "United Protestant" church, meaning that it follows a program initiated in Germany of uniting Lutheran and Reformed churches into a single organization and reconciling what are considered minor differences. It is estimated that approximately 10 percent of the members are from the REFORMED/PRESBYTERIAN TRADITION.

Address:

Evangelical Church of the River Plate
Sucre 2855, piso 3
C1428 DVY Buenos Aires
Argentina

Source:

Bachmann, E. Theodore, and Mercia Brenne Bachmann. Lutheran Churches in the World: A Handbook. Minneapolis, MN: Augsburg Press, 1989.

Evangelical Church of the West Indies

The Evangelical Church of the West Indies grew out of the work of a team of independent Evangelical Christian missionaries in Cuba in 1928. The work was initiated by Elmer Thompson (b. 1901) and his wife Evelyn McElheran (b. 1905), who were soon joined by Bartholomew Lavastida (1890–1994), a Cuban national, and Isabel Junco, a Spanish woman converted by Lavastida. They opened a Bible school in which the students were quickly engaged in evangelistic endeavor. Prior to Fidel Castro's coming to power, the work had formed more than a hundred congregations, and the school had trained some four hundred evangelists.

In 1936 the group decided to establish work in the Dominican Republic. Alexander Mersdorf, a missionary who had joined the original team, stopped at Port-au-Prince, Haiti, on the way to his destination, and he was immediately stopped by some Haitians and asked to provide some training to a small group of Christians who had great zeal but had never been instructed in the Christian life. They lacked a Bible in their language and were desirous of a minister. He placed the need before the mission in Cuba, and they responded to it and postponed their thrust into the Dominican Republic. The opening of the mission in Haiti occasioned the team's adoption of a name, the West Indies Mission. The work in Haiti eventually became the EVANGELICAL MISSION OF SOUTH HAITI.

The work subsequently spread to the Dominican Republic (1939), Jamaica (1945), and Guadeloupe (1947). Then in 1949, the Mission began a thrust into a number of the small English-speaking islands of the Eastern Caribbean—Saint Lucia, Saint Vincent, Grenada (the Windward Islands), and Trinidad and Tobago. Over the years, this effort matured and was eventually set apart as an autonomous church, the Evangelical Church of the West Indies (ECWI).

In Saint Lucia there are ten churches, all led by St. Lucian pastors, with a total membership of 1,000. The mission first entered St. Vincent in 1952 when missionaries began witnessing in small coastal towns. Today there are ten churches dotting the island with a membership of 650. In Grenada, the five churches have a total membership of approximately 250. The ministry on Trinidad was started in 1951 by Lloyd Cross and Dave Whitmore. They focused on the north coast, where they perceived a lack of Christian presence. There are now eighteen ECWI churches scattered from Blanchisseuse in the north to Siparia in the south, including all the key towns of the island, with a combined membership of approximately 1,500.

Along the way the West Indies Mission became WorldTeam and continued to expand the number of countries in which it had work. It opened work in South America in 1955 and in Europe in 1970. Most recently, in 1995, WorldTeam merged with the British-based RBMU (Regions Beyond Missionary Union) International to form World Team (1431 Stuchert Rd., Warrington, PA 18976), and has continued to open new fields of operation.

The Evangelical Church of the West Indies has continued to work in close relationship with World Team. In 1990 it welcomed a new openness toward religion shown by the Castro regime in Cuba and has once again begun to grow, by forming of cell groups in different towns, many towns having been without a church during the Castro years. The church is headed by its president. Each island nation has its own structure, headed by a national moderator and national superintendent. A General Council meets biennially. In 1998 that council authorized the church's own missionary sending agency, which adopted a mission in French Guinea as its first responsibility.

Address:

Evangelical Church of the West Indies
Box 143 Old Montrose
Kingstown
St. Vincent

Source:

"About World Team: A History of Worldteam 1928–1995." Posted at <http://www.worldteam.org/about/wthist.htm>. Accessed May 1, 2002.

Evangelical Church of Togo

The Evangelical Church of Togo began among the Ewe-speaking people as a mission initiated by the Norddeutsche Mission headquartered in Bremen, Germany. The mission came to what is now Togo late in the nineteenth century. The first congregation was organized in 1893. The German missionaries left in 1914, and the churches attempted to maintain their unity amid the changing boundaries imposed by the European powers. In 1922 an independent Evangelical Ewe Church was constituted that included work in both the British- and French-controlled regions. A synod of the whole church met every three years, but the two parts drifted apart. At the end of the 1920s, the PARIS MISSION of the REFORMED CHURCH OF FRANCE assumed some responsibility for assisting the church.

In 1929 the church started its own theological school. That same year it also expanded northward and opened work among the Kaybe people. The church progressed in common cause with the Paris Mission into the 1950s. In 1955 the UNITED CHURCH OF CHRIST, based in the United States, added their resources to the work. In 1959 the Evangelical Church became independent of the Paris Mission. A year later the Norddeutsche Mission returned to Togo and developed a working relationship with the now independent church. Since 1967, the church has struggled with the dictatorship that has dominated the country. It has continued to expand, and in 1984 it opened work among the Kokomba people.

The church is organized on a presbyterial model, with the synod as the highest legislative body. It has prepared its own doctrinal statement, the Confession of the Evangelical Church of Togo.

In the 1990s the church reported 300,000 members in 516 congregations. It is a member of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES.

Address:

Evangelical Church of Togo
B.P. 2
rue Tokmake 1
Lomé
Togo

Sources:

Bauswein, Jean-Jacques, and Lukas Vischer, eds. The Reformed Family Worldwide: A Survey of Reformed Churches, Theological Schools, and International Organizations. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans, 1999.
Van der Bent, Ans J., ed. Handbook/Member Churches/World Council of Churches. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 1985.

Evangelical Church of West Africa

The Evangelical Church of West Africa is the result of the missionary initiative of the Sudan Interior Mission, an independent Evangelical missionary society founded in 1893 in the United States. In 1935 it sent missionaries into the Borno province of Nigeria, who established a station at Kukar Gadu near the Bauchi province border. This area is predominantly Muslim, but the missionaries targeted four communities of non-Muslims for attention, the Kare-Kare, Bade, Ngamo, and Ngizim people. They first had significant success from a station in Gashua among the Bade people opened in 1938.

They successively opened stations in Gadaka among the Ngamo (1951) and in Garin Maje as an outpost among the Ngizim (1952). In 1954 the several churches that had been created were united as the Association of Evangelical Churches in West Africa. The church had spectacular success, primarily in the northeast of the country. In the 1990s it reported 2,200,000 members, and it is the largest of the several churches of the REFORMED/PRESBYTERIAN TRADITION operating in Nigeria.

The Evangelical Church of West Africa has retained a conservative theological stance, which it teaches through its fifteen Bible training schools, three theological colleges, and two seminaries. It is organized congregationally. The congregations are grouped into eighteen districts. There is a general council to oversee the church's denominational endeavors, which include extensive medical and educational facilities. The church is a member of the WORLD EVANGELICAL ALLIANCE.

Address:

Evangelical Church of West Africa
P.O. Box 63
Jos, Plateau State
Nigeria

Source:

Bauswein, Jean-Jacques, and Lukas Vischer, eds. The Reformed Family Worldwide: A Survey of Reformed Churches, Theological Schools, and International Organizations. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans, 1999.

Evangelical Church–Synod of the Nile

The Evangelical Church–Synod of the Nile derives from missionary work begun by American Presbyterians in Egypt in 1854. Unable by law to proselytize among Muslims, they found their converts from people raised as members of the COPTIC ORTHODOX CHURCH. The church built its program around evangelism, charitable activity (hospitals and schools), and Bible study groups using an Arabic Bible. By the turn of the century, four presbyteries had been founded, and work spread into the Sudan.

Through the twentieth century, the Evangelical Church has spread to other North African and Middle Eastern countries, primarily from the immigration of its members responding to job offers. In 1967 it became an autonomous body and the following year fully independent, though it retains a working relationship with the PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH (U.S.A.). It presently has seven presbyteries united by the Synod of the Nile, the highest legislative body in the church.

In the 1990s the church reported three hundred thousand members in three hundred churches. It sponsors a theological seminary in Cairo. It is a member of the WORLD ALLIANCE OF REFORMED CHURCHES and the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES.

Address:

Evangelical Church–Synod of the Nile
P.O. Box 1248
Cairo
Egypt

Source:

Bauswein, Jean-Jacques, and Lukas Vischer, eds. The Reformed Family Worldwide: A Survey of Reformed Churches, Theological Schools, and International Organizations. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans, 1999.

Evangelical Churches of Vietnam

The Evangelical Churches of Vietnam (Hoi Thánh Tin Lành), one of the few Christian religious communities operating in Vietnam, began in 1911 after missionaries of the CHRISTIAN AND MISSIONARY ALLIANCE (from the United States) obtained permission from the French colonial government to pursue evangelistic work in Da Nang. Very early, several influential members of the community identified with the church, and it grew rapidly. Local leadership developed, and it was granted autonomy as the Evangelical Churches of Vietnam in 1927. The government recognized it in 1929 and lifted restrictions on its work. It quickly expanded among various ethnic groups, especially the Raday and Kobo peoples. A Bible and Theological Training Institute was opened at Nhatrang and later others at Dalat and Ban Me Thot. The church developed with a congregational polity, and there is no national synod.

The end of French colonialism, the division of Vietnam into two countries, and the years of the Vietnam War created significant changes in the church. Following the withdrawal of the French, many church members moved into the southern half of the country. However, the work in the north, including the Bible school at Nhatrang, continued to operate throughout the years of the Vietnam War. In 1972, church leaders in the north made contact with the National Council of Churches in the United States, at which time they expressed criticism of the American role in the war. The following year they made contact with the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES, which initiated aid to rebuild the church following the close of the war.

The final fall of South Vietnam and the withdrawal of American forces were accompanied by the emigration of many church leaders and pastors. In the 1980s, some American Vietnamese converts returned to Vietnam to start new congregations and revive the church. By the end of the 1990s, there were more than one thousand congregations and some four hundred Christian pastors working with the Evangelical Churches. Some forty congregations are found in Ho Chi Minh City and its immediate environs.

Evangelical Congregational Church in Angola

The Evangelical Churches has yet to create any national association, but may be contacted through offices in the two major cities: Hoi Thánh Tin Lành, số 2, rue Ngo Tram, Hanoi, Vietnam, and Hoi Thánh Tin Lành, 386 Diên Biên Phu, Quận 3, TP Ho Chi Minh, Vietnam.

Source:

Bauswein, Jean-Jacques, and Lukas Vischer, eds. The Reformed Family Worldwide: A Survey of Reformed Churches, Theological Schools, and International Organizations. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans, 1999.

Evangelical Congregational Church in Angola

The Evangelical Congregational Church in Angola (Igreja Evangelica Congregacional em Angola) dates to the arrival of representatives of the AMERICAN BOARD OF COMMISSIONERS FOR FOREIGN MISSIONS (now the Global Ministries Board of the UNITED CHURCH OF CHRIST) in 1880. The mission, originally opened at Sailundo among the Ovimbundu people, grew very slowly. They were joined by Canadian Congregationalists (now a constituent part of the UNITED CHURCH OF CANADA) in 1886. As World War I began in 1914, they had gathered only three hundred members; however, they experienced a growth phase in the 1920s and 1930s.

The mission has been greatly affected by the changes that came with the ending of colonial rule in Angola. In 1951 Portugal signaled its desire to retain control in Angola by making it an overseas province of Portugal. However, with independence coming to some of its African neighbors, Angola broke into civil war in 1960. In 1961, suspecting the missionaries of supporting the insurgents, the government began systematically denying visa renewals. The number of missionaries dropped significantly. In 1967, the United Church of Christ and the United Church of Canada withdrew the remaining non-Angolan personnel as a protest against the Portuguese policies in Angola.

In the meantime, in 1957, the two Congregationalist missions had united as the Evangelical Church of Central Angola. However, as the missionaries withdrew, the church itself divided, one part of it going into the underground with the rebels. After independence in 1975, the other faction established itself as the Evangelical Congregational Church in the People's Republic of Angola. The two groups remained in contact, and over the two decades after independence worked toward reunion. That was accomplished in 1996.

In the 1990s the Evangelical Congregational Church in Angola reported 250,000 members. It was a founding member of the Council of Christian Churches in Angola and is also a member of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES. The church developed an early center at Dondi, where they founded a seminary and a publication center. Today, ministers are trained at an ecumenical Protestant seminary at Huambo. The church is noted for its extensive medical facilities, the best in the country.

Address:

Evangelical Congregational Church in Angola
C.P. 551
Huambo
Angola

Source:

Bauswein, Jean-Jacques, and Lukas Vischer, eds. The Reformed Family Worldwide: A Survey of Reformed Churches, Theological Schools, and International Organizations. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans, 1999.

Evangelical Covenant Church

The Evangelical Covenant Church has its roots in the same revival of piety and spirituality in Sweden that led to the formation of the MISSION COVENANT CHURCH OF SWEDEN. Through the 1850s and 1860s, people who had been affected by the revival migrated to the United States. Most affiliated with Lutheran congregations and attempted to carry on their pietist quest. However, as in Sweden, they found life in the Lutheran churches too confining, and in the 1870s they began to form their own churches. In 1873 the first synod, the Swedish Lutheran Mission Synod, was organized. A second synod, the Swedish Lutheran Ansgarius Synod, was created in 1884. The next year, the two synods merged to form the Swedish Evangelical Mission Covenant Church of America. The church went through several name changes in the twentieth century to emerge as the Evangelical Covenant Church.

Although operating out of the central Western Christian doctrinal tradition, the church is noncreedal and accepts the Bible as the only perfect rule of faith and practice. Its noncreedal position emphasizes the role of the Christian life over that of theological speculation. In 1981, the church backed the publication of an important theological volume, Covenant Affirmations, issued as a means of clarifying the church's perspective. It emphasized the centrality of the Bible, the necessity of the new birth, the church as the gathered community of believers, the conscious dependence of the believer on Christ, and the reality of the free life in Christ. Unlike the Baptists, the church practices infant baptism.

The church is organized congregationally, and there is an annual assembly of representatives of the congregations where business affecting the whole covenant is carried out. The church developed an extensive mission program early in the twentieth century, and retains a partnership relationship with former mission churches in South America, Asia, continental Europe, and the Democratic Republic of the Congo. In 1996 it had 93,000 members in North America and 220,000 members worldwide. It has joined with other churches that came out of the same free church impulse in Europe in the nineteenth century and the former mission churches to create the INTERNATIONAL FEDERATION OF FREE EVANGELICAL CHURCHES. It is also a member of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES.

Address:

Evangelical Covenant Church
5101 N. Francisco Ave.
Chicago, IL 60625
<http://www.covchurch.org>

Sources:

Matson, P., E. B. Larsson, and W. D. Thornbloom, eds. Covenant Frontiers. Chicago: Board of Mission, Evangelical Mission Covenant Church of America, 1941.
Olsson, Karl A. A Family of Faith. Chicago: Covenant Press, 1975.
Van der Bent, Ans J., ed. Handbook/Member Churches/World Council of Churches. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 1985.

Evangelical Free Church of America

The Evangelical Free Church of America grew out of the nineteenth-century FREE CHURCH revival that swept through Europe in the nineteenth century and had a special focus in Sweden, where it led to the formation of the MISSION COVENANT CHURCH OF SWEDEN. Many who had been inspired by the revival migrated to the United States, where in the 1870s they began to form independent congregations. Some of these congregations joined together in 1873 to form the Swedish Lutheran Mission Synod. However, some congregations, prizing their freedom, rejected any involvement in a synod. They preferred a loose association of congregations. Such an association was formed at Boone, Iowa, in 1884 as the Swedish Evangelical Free Church.

At about the same time, immigrants from Norway and Denmark, where the Swedish revival had spread, also began to organize congregations in America. In 1889, a periodical, Evangelisten, appeared to promote their fellowship. An initial organization appeared two years later as the Western Evangelical Free Church Association, followed a few months later by an Eastern association. These two associations merged in 1909 to form the Norwegian-Danish Evangelical Free Church Association.

In 1950, the Swedish and Norwegian-Danish churches united as the Evangelical Free Church of America. By this time, the new church had become identified with the emerging Evangelical movement, which had grown out of the fundamentalist controversy of the 1920s. Their position was in contrast to the Evangelical Covenant Church, the other American body that had grown out of the same Swedish revival, which had identified itself with the more liberal Protestant churches and the contemporary ecumenical movement. One sign of the direction of the Evangelical Free Church was its adoption of a confession of faith that emphasized the essential affirmations of the Protestant Reformation, the Bible as the inspired word of God, and the premillennial imminent Second Coming of Christ.

In 1992, the Evangelical Free Church reported 185,000 members worldwide. It is organized congregationally; however, there is a national annual meeting of congregational representatives to oversee the cooperative endeavors of the fellowship. High among these endeavors is a mission program that supports personnel across continental Europe, in Latin America and Asia, and the Democratic Republic of the Congo. Many of the former missions of the church have now become autonomous sister churches. The church also supports a college, a university, and a theological seminary in the United States and a spectrum of medical, educational, and social service institutions overseas. The church is a member of the national Association of Evangelicals through which it relates to the WORLD EVANGELICAL ALLIANCE.

Address:

Evangelical Free Church of America
1551 E. 66th St.
Minneapolis, MN 55423
<http://www.efca.org>

Sources:

Norton, W. Wilbert, et al. The Diamond Jubilee Story. Minneapolis, MN: Free Church Publications, 1959.
Olson, Arnold Theodore. Believers Only. Minneapolis, MN: Free Church Publications, 1956.
———. This We Believe. Minneapolis, MN: Free Church Publications, 1961.

Evangelical Friends International

Evangelical Friends International (EFI) was founded in 1965 as a networking association for four autonomous Quaker groups that represented the most conservative wing of the FRIENDS movement. Each had been deeply affected by the Wesleyan HOLINESS MOVEMENT in the nineteenth century and had come to exist in the space between the two communities. The Evangelical Friends Alliance, Eastern Division, was founded in 1813 as the Ohio Yearly Meeting of Friends and was one of the original Friends groups influenced by the preaching of Joseph John Gurney, a Quaker preacher deeply influenced by Methodist Holiness teachings.

The Kansas Yearly Meeting was formed in 1872 and in 1900 affiliated with the Five Years Meeting (now the FRIENDS UNITED MEETING). However, through the early twentieth century its members were influenced by Holiness teachings, and in 1937 it withdrew from the Five Years

Evangelical Lutheran Church in America

Meeting. By this time it had established its first missionary program in the part of the Congo now known as Burundi. In the 1970s it changed its name to the Mid-America Yearly Meeting.

In the late nineteenth century, Friends began to move into the Willamette Valley in Oregon. In 1893 they dropped their affiliation with the Iowa Friends and formed the independent Oregon Yearly Meeting. In 1902 they too affiliated with the Five Years Meeting and like the Kansas Meeting withdrew after being influenced by Holiness ideas. The Oregon Meeting has been active in education and has established George Fox College in Newberg, Oregon. It later assumed the name Northwest Yearly Meeting.

In 1957 Friends in Colorado withdrew from the Nebraska Yearly Meeting (affiliated with the Five Years Meeting) and formed the Rocky Mountain Yearly Meeting. They did not keep their former affiliation with the Five Years Meeting. Rather, in 1965 they joined with the three other conservative Friends Meetings in the Evangelical Friends Alliance. Over the years that association took on the trappings of a denominational structure. The change of name to Evangelical Friends International in 1990 was a recognition of the change that had taken place.

Evangelical Friends International supports two colleges, one university, and a graduate school of theology. It carries out missionary work in Burundi, Mexico, Rwanda, Taiwan, Peru, Bolivia, and India. The Evangelical Friends Alliance, Eastern Division, is a member of the CHRISTIAN HOLINESS PARTNERSHIP, though Evangelical Friends International is not. EFI is a member of the National Association of Evangelicals, through which it is related to the WORLD EVANGELICAL ALLIANCE.

Address:

Evangelical Friends International
No central headquarters. For information, contact:
Dr. John P. Williams
Regional Director for North America
5350 Broadmoor Circle, NW
Canton, OH 44709
<http://www.evangelical-friends.org>

Sources:

DeVol, Charles E. Focus on Friends. Canton, OH: Missionary Board of the Evangelical Friends Church—Eastern Division, 1982.
The Story of Friends in the Northwest. Newberg, OR: Barclay Press, n.d.

Evangelical Lutheran Church in America

The Evangelical Lutheran Church in America is one of the two primary bodies continuing the Lutheran tradition in the United States. Formed in 1988, it stands in direct continuity with the earliest Lutheran organizations in America, formed in the eighteenth century, but is also the product of a series of mergers that occurred through the twentieth century that saw more than a hundred separate Lutheran churches merge into a single ecclesiastical unit.

Lutherans came to the United States from the different countries of northern Europe and through the nineteenth century spread out across the vast frontier then opening to settlement. As groups settled in different areas, churches were formed and synods established. Each synod typically served a single language group in a relatively limited area. A minority of synods represented variant trends in Lutheranism toward a more conservative doctrinal approach or an emphasis upon piety and the religious life. The earliest mergers tended to bring those of the smaller synods together that were of like language or national heritage.

As Americanization proceeded, mergers across the boundaries of national heritage became feasible. Numerous German Lutherans were among the seventeenth-century immigrants to the American colonies. These settlers formed the backbone of the earliest synods, the Philadelphia Ministerium (1748) and New York Ministerium (1786). The Philadelphia Ministerium, part of the New Ministerium, and the North Carolina Synod had merged in 1820 to form the General Synod of the Lutheran Church. Similar mergers in other parts of the country led to the formation of the General Synod of the South and the General Council. These three groups merged in 1918 to form the United Lutheran Church in America, the largest Lutheran body in America through the mid-twentieth century. This body included most of the German-American Lutherans.

In 1962, the United Lutheran Church in America created a multiethnic church by its merger with the Finnish Evangelical Lutheran Church (Soumi Synod), the Augustana Evangelical Lutheran Church (of Swedish heritage), and the American Evangelical Lutheran Church (of Danish heritage). Their union created the Lutheran Church in America.

In 1930, a group of German-American synods in the middle of the United States—the Ohio, Buffalo, Texas, and Iowa synods—united to form the American Lutheran Church. In 1960, the American Lutheran Church merged with the United Evangelical Lutheran Church, itself the product of a merger of Danish-American churches and the Evangelical Lutheran Church, of Norwegian background. The new church retained the name American Lutheran Church.

Through the 1970s the American Lutheran Church and the Lutheran Church in America were the two largest Lutheran bodies in the United States. They also formed the more liberal and ecumenically oriented wing of American Lutheranism, in contrast to the more conservative, confessionally strict, churches such as the LUTHERAN CHURCH—MISSOURI SYNOD and the WISCONSIN EVANGELICAL LUTHERAN SYNOD. The two churches entered into merger negotiations soon after they were organized. In the meantime, a controversy had developed within the Missouri Synod, in which a number of professors at the synod's main seminary in suburban St. Louis, Missouri, were accused of straying from strict orthodox doctrinal standards. The controversy brought the more liberal pastors and members to the scholars' defense. The controversy resulted in the more liberal group leaving the Missouri Synod and forming the Association of Evangelical Lutheran Churches.

The Association of Evangelical Lutheran Churches was invited into the union meetings of the Lutheran Church in America and the American Lutheran Church. The effort of the three groups culminated in their merger as the Evangelical Lutheran Church in America, a merger that became effective on January 1, 1988. The new church established its headquarters in Chicago. In 1999, it reported 3,825,000 members. The church is headed by its presiding bishop. It is divided into sixty-five synods, each of which is in turn headed by a bishop. The work of the church at the national level is channeled through a variety of boards and agencies. The church supports a number of colleges, universities, and seminaries.

The church accepts the Bible and the Augsburg Confession as its standard of doctrine; it has, however, adopted a contemporary liberal theological approach to doctrinal issues. The church is ecumenically oriented and a member of both the LUTHERAN WORLD FEDERATION and the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES. In 1997, the Church voted intercommunion with the PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH (USA), the UNITED CHURCH OF CHRIST, and the REFORMED CHURCH IN AMERICA. In 2001, intercommunion was established with the Episcopal Church.

Some of the Lutheran churches that are now constituent parts of the Evangelical Lutheran Church were active in missions, often in cooperation with the missionary sending agencies of the various Lutheran churches in continental Europe. Already by the time of the 1988 merger, most of these missionary efforts had evolved into independent churches. The Evangelical Lutheran Church retains a partnership relationship with many of these churches and continues to supply significant financial support to some of them in the poorer countries. The church also supports congregations across Europe that serve English-speaking expatriates. In 1967 and 1986, respectively, the American Lutheran Church and the Lutheran Church in America released their affiliated Canadian parishes. These parishes eventually merged to form the EVANGELICAL LUTHERAN CHURCH IN CANADA.

Address:

Evangelical Lutheran Church in America
8765 Higgins Rd.
Chicago, IL 60631
<http://www.elca.org>

Sources:

- Chilstrom, Herbert W. Foundations for the Future. Minneapolis, MN: Publishing House of the Evangelical Lutheran Church in America, 1988.
- Nelson, E. Clifford. The Lutherans in North America. Philadelphia: Fortress Press, 1980.
- Nichol, Todd W. All Those Lutherans. Minneapolis, MN: Augsburg Publishing House, 1986.

Evangelical Lutheran Church in Canada

Lutherans are those who trace their roots to the sixteenth-century reforms initiated by the German Reformer Martin Luther (1483–1546). Behind many of these reforms was Luther's belief in the necessity of justification by grace through faith alone, as well as his conviction that only Holy Scripture has authority in matters of belief.

The first Lutheran congregation in Canada was established in Halifax in 1752. The location of churches originally depended on the pattern of German immigration. Support for the churches came primarily from their affiliations with American Lutheran groups. Early churches tended to be in rural Nova Scotia, Ontario, and the Prairies. Since World War II, the largest concentrations of Lutherans are found in Kitchener-Waterloo, Winnipeg, and Edmonton.

The Evangelical Lutheran Church in Canada (ELCIC) is one of the two main Lutheran denominations in Canada (the other is the LUTHERAN CHURCH—CANADA). In 1986, the ELCIC was formed from the merger of two Lutheran denominations, the Lutheran Church of America and the Evangelical Lutheran Church of Canada. The ELCIC has its head office in Winnipeg, Manitoba, and is composed of five synods, with each synod presided over by a bishop. Membership is numbered around 200,000. In July 2001 the ELCIC entered into full communion with the ANGLICAN CHURCH OF CANADA. This allows for the free exchange of members and clergy, although both denominations remain distinct church bodies. The ELCIC is a member of the Canadian Council of Churches, the LUTHERAN WORLD FEDERATION, and the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES. Its denominational periodicals are entitled Canada Lutheran and Esprit.

The ELCIC uses the term Evangelical in the way it was used in the sixteenth century, not necessarily in the way many use it today. Services are primary in English. The ELCIC is a "confessional" church, subscribing to the beliefs of the Reformers expressed in the confessions contained in the Book of Concord. Two sacraments are practiced in the church: Baptism and Holy Communion. Infant baptism is practiced, with the hope that confirmation will occur at a later date, after the child has been nurtured in the faith. Holy Communion is often every week, presided over by an ordained minister, and is usually open to all baptized

Evangelical Lutheran Church in Congo

Christians. The ELCIC ordains both men and women, and seeks to be active in the promotion of ethical and social issues in Canada and abroad.

Address:

Evangelical Lutheran Church in Canada
302–393 Portage Ave.
Winnipeg, Manitoba R3B 3H6
Canada
<http://www.elcic.ca>

Gordon L. Heath

Sources:

- Cronmiller, Carl. R. A History of the Lutheran Church in Canada. Toronto: Evangelical Lutheran Synod of Canada, 1961.
- Pfrimmer, David. "A Lutheran Witness in Canadian Society." In Church and Canadian Culture, edited by Robert E. VanderVennen. Lanham, MD: University Press of America, 1991.
- Ward, Kenn. This Evangelical Lutheran Church of Ours. Winfield, BC: Wood Lake Books, 1994.

Evangelical Lutheran Church in Congo

The Evangelical Lutheran Church in Congo (Église Évangélique Luthérienne au Congo) originated among a group of Christian believers in the eastern part of the Democratic Republic of the Congo (then Zaire) who had been inspired by listening to the Radio Voice of the Gospel, a Lutheran radio station that operated out of Addis Ababa in the 1960s. They expressed a desire to affiliate with the Lutheran church and were placed in contact with representatives of the EVANGELICAL LUTHERAN CHURCH IN TANZANIA and the LUTHERAN WORLD FEDERATION. Leaders in the Congo group were invited to receive training in Tanzania. In 1975, the first graduate from the Makumira Theological School was ordained for an initial congregation in Kalémié. The following year, the association of Lutheran churches was received into the Church of Christ in Zaire (now the Church of Christ in the Congo), the state-recognized organization for all Protestant churches. The Lutheran church received official government recognition in 1981.

Through the 1980s, the group grew as more pastors were graduated and ordained. A general assembly was organized. As the Evangelical Lutheran Community in Zaire East, the new church joined the Lutheran World Federation in 1986 and most recently, under its new name, a name that reflects the changes that brought the Democratic Republic of the Congo into existence, has been received into membership by the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES.

The congregations of the Lutheran Church in Congo are in the easternmost section of the country, with its primary center in Lubumbashi, on Lake Tanganyika. It can be contacted through an office in neighboring Zambia. The church is currently led by Bishop Ngoy Kasukuti. In 2000, it reported 136,000 members.

Address:

Evangelical Lutheran Church in Congo
P.O. Box 23294
Kitwe
Zambia

Source:

- Bachmann, E. Theodore, and Mercia Brenne Bachmann. Lutheran Churches in the World: A Handbook. Minneapolis, MN: Augsburg Press, 1989.

Evangelical Lutheran Church in Denmark

Beginning with the Lutheran Reformation (1536), the Evangelical Lutheran Church was for centuries the only ecclesiastical body allowed in Denmark. It superseded the ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH, which had been introduced into Denmark around 825 C.E. by a Benedictine monk named Ansgar. Following the Reformation it adopted the Augsburg Confession and aligned itself in belief and practice with the Lutheran Church in Germany.

Through the centuries revivals were watched carefully and sects suppressed. During this period, by the grace of the king and in the economic self-interest of the state, Jews, Calvinists, Roman Catholics, and Moravians were allowed to settle in connection with embassies or in strictly limited areas. With the abolition of the absolute state, Denmark became a constitutional monarchy (1849) that allowed freedom of expression, association, assembly, printing, and religion. Since then citizens have been entitled to freedom of worship, and their religious organizations, financing, and rites may not be touched as long as they respect the public order and morality. No one is obliged to contribute to a religion that the person concerned does not affiliate with. No one can be deprived of civil and political rights because of his or her religious conscience.

Following the establishment of the constitutional monarchy, it was not expected that the majority church should be of the same standing as other religious communities. The national church, which was then called Folkekirken, or the People's Church, had to be Evangelical Lutheran, and for the last 150 years it has been protected and supported economically by the state. Even in the early twenty-first century, the sovereign must be a member of a Lutheran community. In the mid-nineteenth century 98 percent of the population belonged to the People's Church, which still today includes about 86 percent of the population. The situation is complex; church and state resemble a divorced couple continuing to live together, with one party having the upper hand. It is a strange fusion of a religious community and public administration, with parliament as the ruling subject of the church, the institution that supports it, and the authority that gives and withdraws competence. The state can intervene in the external and internal matters of the church. However, it has seldom meddled with the internal affairs, and the People's Church is not cowed by the state.

Since 1912 the influence of laymen has been strong, thanks to local congregational councils, and for almost a century the church has given a lopsided amount of power to the local level. Today church-state relations represent a peculiar mixture of comparatively tight centralizing state administration and extensive self-government locally. This state of affairs has indisputably strengthened the People's Church locally, but it also explains the impotence of a church that is unable to manifest itself as an independent entity in relation to the state. The church has no synod and no one, neither bishop, priest, nor any layperson, can function as the "voice of the church" in, for example, ecumenical matters.

Denmark is an old maritime nation, and colonial power and church circles have always supported the religious and cultural life of Danes abroad, just as since the eighteenth century they have played a major role concerning Christian mission activities all over the world. At home Lutherans for the last thirty years have had to deal with the growing influence of other—and especially new—religious movements. In 1998, 4.1 percent of the population belonged to "recognized religious communities" outside the People's Church, and among them about 120,000 from Muslim countries. Only 10.1 percent did not in 1998 belong to any religious community at all.

Affiliated congregations, primarily for expatriates, are found in a number of countries across Europe. The church is a member of the LUTHERAN WORLD FEDERATION and the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES.

Address:

Evangelical Lutheran Church in Denmark
c/o Secretary International Church Relations
Nørregade 11
1165 København K
Denmark
<http://www.folkekirken.dk/> (In Danish with a link to English page)

Frands Ole Overgaard

Source:

Bachmann, E. Theodore, and Mercia Brenne Bachmann. Lutheran Churches of the World: A Handbook. Minneapolis, MN: Augsburg, 1989.

Evangelical Lutheran Church in Iceland

Iceland, with a population of 270,000, is one of the smallest states in Europe. It is uniqueness among European nations, however, in that from the very beginning of human habitation, Christianity has been present. The first people on Iceland were Celtic hermits, seeking refuge to worship Christ. Later Norse settlers drove them out, but even some of those were Christians, although the majority worshipped the old Norse gods. When Iceland was constituted as a republic in year 930 it was based on the Norse religion. Then at the end of the tenth century, a new cadre of Christian missionaries arrived.

Soon the nation was divided into two hostile camps. Thus, in the year 1000, at the Althing (legislative assembly) held at Thingvellir, the leaders of the two groups, realizing the danger that threatened them, chose a person that everybody respected, a Norse priest and chieftain, Thorgeir of Ljósavatn, to decide which way the people should go. After a daylong contemplation of the problem, Thorgeir announced his decision: "Let it be the foundation of our law that everyone in this land shall be Christian and believe in one God, Father, Son and Holy Spirit." The people bowed to his wisdom. Soon afterwards, missionary priests from Germany, England, and Eastern Europe organized the people within the ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH. The first Icelandic bishop, Isleifur, was consecrated in Bremen in 1056. He established his see at Skálholt, which remained the center of Christian learning and spirituality through the eighteenth century. A second diocese centered on Hólar was created in 1106.

In 1262, Iceland suffered a civil war that led to its coming under the rulership of Norway and then was passed to Denmark in 1380. The Danish church joined the Lutheran camp in 1536, and thus, four years later, the Reformation started by Martin Luther was established in Iceland, enforced by the Danish crown. The king ordered the dissolving of the monasteries and confiscated much of the church's property, as he now assumed office as the supreme head of the church. Most of the former Roman priests continued in their parishes under the new regime.

The nineteenth century saw the beginning of a national revival in Iceland and a movement toward political independence. The constitution of 1874 guaranteed religious freedom but also decreed that the "Evangelical Lutheran Church is a national church and as such it is protected and supported by the State." This provision remained in the new constitution of the Republic of Iceland adopted in 1944. Church legislation was revised at the beginning of the century, at which time parish councils were established and the congregations gained the right to elect their pastors.

In the early 1900s, liberal theology was introduced in Iceland, and textual criticism of the Bible became quite influential in the newly founded Department of Theology of the University of Iceland. At the same time Spiritualist and Theosophical ideas found support in intellectual circles. Conservative leaders opposed both trends, and the ongoing conflict marred church life well into the 1960s.

Through the nineteenth century, Iceland's population was predominantly rural and the church was a part of the traditional way of life. A century later, Iceland is a modern and highly urbanized society. Secularization and individualization have brought an increasing pluralism of belief. In spite of the changes, the great majority of the population still adhere to the Evangelical Lutheran Church. (Almost all of the children are baptized within their first year, more than 90 percent of all adolescents are confirmed, 75 percent of all marriages occur in the church, and 99 percent are buried in the church.) Most children are taught evening prayers in their homes. The primary schools teach Bible stories, and children's services are an important part of the worship life of every parish. The state broadcasting transmits worship services every Sunday morning, and daily devotions morning and night.

On the other hand, regular Sunday morning worshippers form a much lower percentage of the population. Recent polls show only 12 percent of adults in Iceland attend church service at least once a month. On January 1, 1998, a new law further redefined the relationship of the church to the government. The church remains established by law, but is otherwise autonomous. The state supports the church and collects membership dues for it (as well as for other denominations and religious communities). Church legislation, previously the domain of the Althing, is now handled by the Kirkjuþing (church assembly), the highest legislative authority of the church. It has twenty-one elected representatives, nine clergy and twelve laypeople, and a layperson as a president. The highest executive authority is the Church Council (Kirkjuráð), with two clergy and two laymen elected by the Kirkjuþing, and presided over by the bishop of Iceland. The bishop's office in the Church House is at the same time the office of the Kirkjuráð. Besides dealing with financial matters and personnel, the council also has departments of parish renewal, church aid, education, and diakonia (service).

Annually the bishop summons all the pastors and theologians of the church to the pastors' meeting, the synod, to discuss the affairs of the church and society. The synod has a say in all matters of theology and liturgy to be decided by the bishop and Kirkjuþing. Early in the nineteenth century, the two older dioceses were merged into a new single diocese headquartered in Reykjavík. At the old episcopal sees of Skálholt and Hólar there are assistant or suffragan bishops (vígslubiskup). They assist the bishop of Iceland in pastoral matters and with him form the Bishops' Meeting. There are about 300 Lutheran parishes nationwide, with approximately 150 priests and 10 ordained deacons. Ten priests work in specialized ministries in hospitals and other institutions, and others serve Icelandic congregations abroad. The Theological Faculty of the University of Iceland, founded in 1911, educates the clergy and deacons of the church. Many theologians go abroad for further studies in seminaries and universities on both sides of the Atlantic.

The Evangelical Lutheran Church in Iceland is a member of the LUTHERAN WORLD FEDERATION, the Conference of European Churches, the Nordic Ecumenical Council, and the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES. It is also a member of the Porvoo agreement between the Anglican Churches of the British Isles and the Nordic and Baltic Lutheran churches. An organization called the Missionary Societies of Iceland, in cooperation with the Norwegian Missionary Federation, has operated missions in China, Ethiopia, and Kenya. The Icelandic Church Aid has worked in cooperation with foreign relief and developmental agencies in development work and emergency aid in various parts of the world.

Address:

Evangelical Lutheran Church in Iceland
Bishop's Office
Laugavegur 31
150 Reykjavík
Iceland
<http://www.kirkjan.is/index.shtml?english>

Karl Sigurbjörnsson

Sources:

Hjálmarsson, Jón R. History of Iceland: From the Settlement to the Present Day. Reykjavík: Iceland Review, 1993.
Sigurbjörnsson, Karl. The Church of Iceland: Past and Present. Reykjavík: Church of Iceland, 1998.

Evangelical Lutheran Church in Kenya

Lutheranism came to Kenya as a result of the Italian invasion of Ethiopia. In 1936, the Italians expelled all the Protestant missionaries. Among those who left the country were the representatives of the Swedish Mission of the True Bible Friends, an independent missionary organization founded in 1911 in protest of the liberalism its members felt had arisen in the CHURCH OF SWEDEN. The expelled missionaries began to look for an alternative field where they could both continue their evangelism and stay in some minimal contact with their colleagues in Ethiopia. At this juncture, they made contact with some Ethiopian refugees who had escaped the Italian occupation but were having a difficult time in Kenya.

The first representatives of the True Bible Friends arrived in 1939. In the process of helping the Ethiopians, they discovered a new field for evangelism. They settled in the area east of Lake Victoria and began to evangelize the Kisii and Luo people. The church had immediate success, and the missionaries moved quickly to train native leadership. By 1958, the mission was ready to become independent, and a constitution for the Evangelical Lutheran Church in Kenya was adopted. At the same time the first candidate for the ministry, who had been trained at the Lutheran seminary in Tanzania, was ordained. Following revision of the constitution in 1963, the church was registered as an independent church in 1965.

Even though the church was brought into existence by the True Bible Friends (who continue to support it), since its formation four other Lutheran bodies have added their support. These include the Swedish Lutheran Evangelical Association in Finland, the World Mission Prayer League, based in the United States, the Lutheran Evangelical Association of Finland, and the Norwegian Lutheran Mission.

Work has concentrated among the Kisii and Luo people, and an edition of Luther's Catechism has been produced for both languages. There is both a hymnal and New Testament in Kisii. More recently, the church has reached out to other groups, including the Pokot, the Boran, and the Samburu. The Boran's land is along Kenya's border with Ethiopia.

In 1985, the Evangelical Lutheran Church in Kenya had 31,000 members in 163 congregations. The general assembly is the highest legislative body, and administration has been placed in the hands of an executive committee. In 1978, the church established the Matongo Lutheran Theological College and Bible School. It is a member of the LUTHERAN WORLD FEDERATION, the National Christian Council of Kenya, and the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES.

Address:

Evangelical Lutheran Church in Kenya
Nile Rd.
P.O. Box 54128
Nairobi
Kenya

Sources:

Bachmann, E. Theodore, and Mercia Brenne Bachmann. Lutheran Churches in the World: A Handbook. Minneapolis, MN: Augsburg Press, 1989.
Van der Bent, Ans J., ed. Handbook/Member Churches/World Council of Churches. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 1985.

Evangelical Lutheran Church in Namibia

The Evangelical Lutheran Church in Namibia is the largest of several churches that have grown out of the work of the RHENISH MISSION in Namibia. The effort began at the urging of the LONDON MISSIONARY SOCIETY, which had initially surveyed the area in 1814. However, it was 1842 before representatives of the mission arrived. Latvian-born Carl Hugo Hahn (1818–1895) established work among the Hereros people. While waiting for his first convert, he reduced the language to writing.

After his initial converts in the 1860s, he founded a Christian colony at Otjimbingwe, where he trained some lay workers who led the mission into a growth phase. The work soon outstripped the resources available from the Rhenish Mission, and Hahn found additional support from the Finnish Missionary Society, the missionary arm of the EVANGELICAL LUTHERAN CHURCH OF FINLAND. The expansion of Hahn's work into the land of the Ovambos was the first foreign missionary endeavor undertaken by the church. This new support required some negotiation, as the Rhenish leadership was representative of the EVANGELICAL CHURCH IN GERMANY, a church that had combined Lutheran and Reformed roots. However, Hahn's work was allowed to move toward a more exclusive Lutheran identity, as the Finns required. During World War I, the Finns assumed full responsibility for the growing work, and its success has been attributed to a peculiar affinity between the people and the Finnish missionaries, over two hundred of whom had been commissioned by 1970.

The Finnish work included the creation of a publishing center, a hospital (opened in 1911), and an educational system, which began with a teacher-training school in 1913. The move to indigenous leadership began soon afterwards, and the first Ovanambo pastor was ordained in 1925. The mission became independent as the Evangelical Lutheran Church in Namibia in 1954.

An information page on the church is maintained at http://www.elca.org/dgm/country_packet/packets/africa/namibia/elcin.html. As the new century began, it reported slightly more than half a million members. It is a member of the LUTHERAN WORLD FEDERATION and the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES.

Address:

Evangelical Lutheran Church in Namibia
c/o Bishop Kleopas Dumeni
P.B. 2018
Ondangwa
Namibia

Sources:

Bachmann, E. Theodore, and Mercia Brenne Bachmann. Lutheran Churches in the World: A Handbook. Minneapolis, MN: Augsburg Press, 1989.
Directory—Handbuch. Geneva: Lutheran World Federation, issued annually.

Evangelical Lutheran Church in Southern Africa

The Evangelical Lutheran Church in Southern Africa was constituted in 1975 by the merger of four previously existing Lutheran churches, which have retained some organizational continuity by continuing as dioceses in the new ecclesiastical body. The first Lutheran missionaries, representatives of the Berlin Mission, entered the Cape of Good Hope in 1834, and their work eventually spread through the colony and into the Orange Free State. In 1911 the mission was organized as two synods, one in each territory. These two synods came together to form a regional church in 1963 and subsequently joined the LUTHERAN WORLD FEDERATION.

In 1854 missionaries unable to settle in Ethiopia, as planned, came to the Transvaal. They were joined four years later by missionaries from the Berlin Mission who established work among the Bakoba people. The mission spread among different peoples and into Botswana and Lesotho. In 1962 the work in the Transvaal was constituted as the Lutheran Church-Transvaal Region and affiliated with the Lutheran World Federation.

Lutheran work in Natal began in 1844 when five missionaries from the Norwegian Missionary Society arrived. They were joined by Norse-American missionaries in 1870. The Berlin Missionary Society spread their work to the area in 1847. They opened a school at their center in Emmaus. They later expanded their work into Swaziland and in 1911 constituted the Zulu-Xhosa-Swazi Synod. In 1857 the Hermannsburg Missionary Society added their strength to the growing work and opened a school to train parish workers. Finally, in 1876, missionaries from the church of Sweden settled in the interior of Natal. In 1912, these several missions formed the Cooperating Lutheran Missions in Natal-Zululand. This structure matured into the Lutheran Church in South Africa—South-Eastern Region. As such it joined the Lutheran World Federation and the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES.

In 1857, the Hermannsburg Missionary Society opened work among the Tswana people of the Transvaal. They found a ready acceptance of Christianity due to the prior activity of David Modipane. Some twenty years earlier, Modipane, then a war prisoner, had converted to Christianity. In the 1840s, he returned to his people and began to preach. He did not baptize or form a church, but told those who listened to him that soon others would come with proper authority. The missionaries purchased land from the Tswana and formed several Christian villages that became the church's centers. By 1959, when the independent Lutheran Botswana Church was constituted, there were some 100,000 members. That church became the Evangelical Lutheran Church in Southern Africa in 1963 and soon affiliated with the Lutheran World Federation.

Shortly after the merger of these four regional churches to form the Evangelical Lutheran Church in Southern Africa, two additional dioceses were created, one serving the Johannesburg area and one for the members in Botswana. The church has an episcopal polity and is led by its presiding bishop. The church assembly, the highest legislative body, meets biennially. The church council oversees the administration at the national level.

Given the racial divisions in modern South Africa, the reception in 1984 of five congregations whose members were predominantly of Indian heritage became a step forward of significance far beyond the bounds of the church. These congregations were the result of a mission opened in the 1970s by the Norwegian Missionary Society, the Hermannsburg Mission, and the Church of Sweden. The church struggled through the 1980s to deal with the many races, people, and languages in the church, all of which, given the apartheid system imposed by the government, continually threatened its unity. With the end of apartheid, the church has worked to overcome its divided past.

At the end of the 1990s, the church reported more than 600,000 members. The church oversees two seminaries, the Lutheran Theological College Umpumulo at Mapumulo, and the Marang Theological Seminary in Tihabane, Bophuthatswana. Several smaller churches, primarily of white South Africans, which share much of the history of the Evangelical Lutheran Church, have remained independent of the larger united body.

Address:

Evangelical Lutheran Church in Southern Africa
24 Geldenhuys Rd., Kempton Park
P.O. Box 7331
Bonaero Park, 1622
South Africa
<http://www.geocities.com/Heartland/Meadows/7589/elcsa.html>

Sources:

Bachmann, E. Theodore, and Mercia Brenne Bachmann. Lutheran Churches in the World: A Handbook. Minneapolis, MN: Augsburg Press, 1989.
Van der Bent, Ans J., ed. Handbook/Member Churches/World Council of Churches. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 1985.

Evangelical Lutheran Church in Tanzania

The Evangelical Lutheran Church in Tanzania (ELCT) was born in June 1963 with the formal amalgamation of seven churches that had previously worked together as a federation. These seven churches trace their beginnings to the nineteenth-century missionary activities in East Africa. Both African-initiated groups and German missionary societies became very active in creating congregations and parishes that later developed into self-governing churches. Before World War I there were three German mission societies operating in what was then Tanganyika: the Berlin Mission, which worked in the southern part of the colony and later on the eastern coast, the Leipzig Mission, which worked in the northern and central parts of the territory, and Bethel Mission, which worked in the northeast and later in the northwest. In the northwest, Protestant African groups, largely influenced by the Anglican Church in Uganda, invited Bethel Mission to work with them.

New mission societies arrived after World War I. The Augustana Mission, based in America, took over the work of the Leipzig Mission and Berlin Mission. The Norwegian Mission (Free Church) took charge of the Mbulu area in the northern part of the country. The Methodist Mission from South Africa became responsible for the northwest area, but did not remain there long after it got into conflict with the African Christian group.

During and after World War II, representatives from several Lutheran mission societies from Scandinavia arrived and worked together with the already established churches. It was during this time that these established churches of different backgrounds formed a Federation of Lutheran Churches in Tanganyika, which later, on June 19, 1963, merged to become the Evangelical Lutheran Church in Tanzania.

The former seven churches have established twenty church units known as dioceses. Each diocese has its own constitution and diocesan leadership. These twenty different dioceses together constitute the Evangelical Lutheran Church in Tanzania, which now has a membership of approximately two million members. It is the second largest Christian body in Tanzania and the largest Lutheran body in Africa. The head of the church is called Mkuu wa Kanisa (a Swahili title meaning “the one taking responsibilities of church leadership”) and is elected from among the twenty bishops. The first Mkuu wa Kanisa was the late Bishop Stefano Moshi from the Northern Diocese, who was succeeded by the late Bishop Sebastian Kolowa from the North Eastern Diocese, who was in turn succeeded by Bishop Samson Mushemba from the North Western Diocese. The church has a general secretary who works with the executive secretaries of different church departments. There is a General Assembly, which meets every four years, and an Executive Council, which meets four times annually.

The church has pursued its mission both within Tanzania and in neighboring countries. In the 1960s and 1970s it supported work in Kenya and the Congo (formerly Zaire). In the 1980s it has worked in Malawi and Zambia, and more recently has opened work in Mozambique and Uganda. Within Tanzania it has established new mission areas where the work of diakonia (service) is very strongly emphasized. Education has become a strong priority, leading the church to establish secondary schools, colleges, and a university as expressions of its missionary task.

In order to continue the longstanding relationships between the church and the former mission societies, the Lutheran Christian Service body (LCS), since 1997 known as the Lutheran Mission Cooperation (LMC), was established in 1973. Its offices are within the church’s headquarters in Arusha. This body works together with the Evangelical Lutheran Church in Tanzania to fulfill its mission objectives.

The ELCT is a member of the Christian Council of Tanzania, the All-Africa Conference of Churches, the LUTHERAN WORLD FEDERATION, and the WORLD COUN-CIL OF CHURCHES. Through these ecumenical bodies the church has shared its leadership talents with the larger Christian community. One of the former presidents of the Lutheran World Federation was the late Bishop Josiah M. Kibira (1977–1984), an ELCT bishop.

Address:

Evangelical Lutheran Church in Tanzania
P.O. Box 3033
Boma Rd.
Arusha
Tanzania

Wilson Niwagila

Sources:

- Bachmann, E. Theodore, and Mercia Brenne Bachmann. Lutheran Churches in the World: A Handbook. Minneapolis, MN: Augsburg Press, 1989.
- Van der Bent, Ans J., ed. Handbook/Member Churches/World Council of Churches. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 1985.

Evangelical Lutheran Church in the Kingdom of the Netherlands

The Evangelical Lutheran Church in the Kingdom of the Netherlands (Evangelisch-Lutherse in het Koninkrijk der Nederlanden) can be traced to the arrival of Lutheran refugees in Amsterdam from the Southern Netherlands (now Belgium), where Roman Catholic authorities had been unappreciative of attempts to spread Protestantism. Amsterdam was at the time, 1566, the most religiously tolerant city in Europe. Continuing to worship in members’ homes, the group adopted a confession and church order in 1588 at the time a church was formally organized. In 1600, Holland, which had become a Reformed Calvinist country, formally granted religious tolerance to both Roman Catholics and Lutherans. By 1605, no less than five congregations had emerged in Holland, and a synod was formed.

The toleration act allowed the Lutherans to own houses of worship, provided they did not look like churches. In 1633 the group purchased a former warehouse, which they converted into their main church building. Known as the “Old Church at the Spui,” it remains the home of an active congregation today. During the century the group spread to England, and became the source of the first Lutheran congregation in New York.

The Dutch Lutheran community experienced one major schism, the result of a growing rationalist approach to theology in the eighteenth century. The more orthodox confessional wing of the church broke away in 1793 to form the Restored Evangelical Lutheran Church. It was 1952 before the two branches reunited. By that time, both had been changed by a new era of research on Lutheran roots and a new commitment to Lutheran theological basics. Three years after the union, a new hymnal and liturgy were published.

Evangelical Lutheran Church in Zimbabwe

In 1955 the united church also adopted a new constitution calling for a presbyterial organization. The synod meets semiannually, with the president of the church presiding. Ministers are trained at the Lutheran Theological Seminary attached to the University of Amsterdam. Women were admitted to the ministry in 1931.

The church exists as a small minority in a predominantly Reformed land. It has considered merger with the Reformed Church, but has not moved to consummate such a course of action. It has, however, been active ecumenically as a member of the Council of Churches in the Netherlands, the LUTHERAN WORLD FEDERATION, and the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES. It has shrunk since World War II and, receiving no subsidy from the state, has had a problem recruiting and holding pastors, most of whom have to serve two congregations. It has approximately twenty-seven thousand members in sixty-two churches.

Address:

Evangelical Lutheran Church in the Kingdom of the Netherlands
Postbus 8504
3503 RM Utrecht
Netherlands

Sources:

- Bachmann, E. Theodore, and Mercia Brenne Bachmann. Lutheran Churches in the World: A Handbook. Minneapolis, MN: Augsburg Press, 1989.
- Van der Bent, Ans J., ed. Handbook/Member Churches/World Council of Churches. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 1985.

Evangelical Lutheran Church in Zimbabwe

Lutheranism entered what is today known as Zimbabwe in 1903 when missionaries from the Church of Sweden, which had previously established a work in Natal, moved into Southern Rhodesia. There the LONDON MISSIONARY SOCIETY, a British Protestant sending agency, and other churches had already initiated missionary work, and an agreement was reached by which the Church of Sweden would concentrate its activity in the southwestern part of the country. Here the missionaries encountered the Ndebele people (a Zulu-related people). The work spread across the southern part of the country, where its strength remains, though as members have migrated into the cities it now has congregations across the country.

In the 1930s the initial steps toward autonomy were taken that resulted in 1941 in a new constitution, which outlined the several responsibilities of the CHURCH OF SWEDEN and the resident church members. Then in 1961, the church became autonomous. Three years later, Southern Rhodesia became independent, though rule by the white minority continued until 1979.

The church is centered on the city of Bulawayo. Its parishes are organized into two districts. Legislation for the church is done at its biennial delegated assembly. The church is led by a bishop. At the end of the twentieth century, the church reported a hundred thousand members. Most of the church's pastors are trained at the United Theological College in Harare, a joint project of five Protestant denominations.

The church is characterized by a noticeable female majority among the active membership. They created a volunteer organization, Vashandiri, in the 1930s that has been a significant part of the church's life and development. They manage a program of adult education, including both Bible and theological training as well as secular topics such as child care. Vashandiri is headquartered at a women's center in Gweru, which is also used for retreats, weddings, and various church meetings.

The church has an education program that includes several secondary schools and a youth center at Njube. An early emphasis on medical missions now manifests as joint support with other churches of four hospitals. The church cooperates with the world Lutheran community on various projects, especially Lutheran World Service, which has developed a spectrum of programs in response to the devastating drought in 1984–1986. The church is a member of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES, the LUTHERAN WORLD FEDERATION, the Fellowship of Evangelical Lutheran Churches in Southern Africa, and the Council of Churches in Zimbabwe.

Address:

Evangelical Lutheran Church in Zimbabwe
P.O. Box 2175
Bulawayo
Zimbabwe

Sources:

- Bachmann, E. Theodore, and Mercia Brenne Bachmann. Lutheran Churches in the World: A Handbook. Minneapolis, MN: Augsburg Press, 1989.
- Van der Bent, Ans J., ed. Handbook/Member Churches/World Council of Churches. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 1985.

Evangelical Lutheran Church of Finland

The Evangelical Lutheran Church of Finland came into being as a fruit of the sixteenth-century Reformation of the ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH. At that time, Finland was a part of Sweden. In the nineteenth century, the country was a part of Russia, and finally in 1917 it became independent.

Two main factors can be seen in the process of the Reformation in Finland. King Gustavus Vasa of Sweden (1496– 1560) had political reasons to be in favor of the Reformation. Wealth and power were transferred from the church to the king when Sweden, and Finland as a part of it, became Protestant. At the same time, however, Swedish and Finnish priests studied in Germany and were significantly inspired by the new perspective of the Reformers. The church thus made the transition from Roman Catholicism to Lutheranism, the latter perspective lasting to the present.

In the nineteenth century, four revival movements started in the Finnish church, all of which continue to exist. Each has its own theological emphases, songbooks, and summer festivals. The largest of the four revival movements is the Laestadian movement, which especially reflects church life in northern Finland. A so-called fifth revival began after World War II and maintains links to the international Evangelical movement. In addition to the several revival movements, there are many other organizations, including missionary societies and student organizations within the church; most recently the international Charismatic Movement has also gained a foothold in the church.

According to the Constitution Act of the state from 1919, the state is neutral in respect of religion, and the citizens are guaranteed religious freedom. Still the Lutheran and the Orthodox churches have some privileges, among the more important being their taxing power. The Lutheran church is a majority church, but no longer a state church. However, in the 1990s additional reforms occurred that further loosened the connection between church and state.

In 1999, 85.3 percent of the population, or 4.4 million people, belonged to the Evangelical Lutheran church. The church plays, particularly through its ceremonies, a role in most people's lives: a vast majority are baptized, confirmed, married, and buried by Lutheran pastors.

There are approximately six hundred parishes located in eight dioceses. All the Swedish-language parishes in different parts of the country belong to one diocese (5.8 percent of Finns speak Swedish as their native language). The archbishop who is often regarded as the head of the church is in Turku, the town where the first bishopric of Finland was established in the thirteenth century. The church's supreme decision-making body is the Synod (107 members). Other authoritative bodies are the Ecclesiastical Board, the Bishops' Conference, and the Church Council for International Relations. The central offices of the church are located in Helsinki. Altogether, the church employs almost 20,000 people full-time or part-time. Out of these, 1,800 are ordained ministers. One fourth of the clergy are women. Women have been ordained since 1988, but even before that hundreds of female theologians worked in the parishes.

The financial basis of the church is its taxing power. Most funds are spent on parish work and maintenance of buildings. Parish work includes, for example, children's clubs, family counseling, hospital pastoral care, and work among the disabled, the unemployed, old people, and prisoners.

Archbishop Jukka Paarma may be reached at P.O. Box 60, 20501 Turku, Finland. The Evangelical Lutheran Church of Finland is a member of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES, the Conference of European Churches, the LUTHERAN WORLD FEDERATION, and the Nordic Ecumenical Council.

Address:

Evangelical Lutheran Church of Finland
Church House
P.O. Box 185
00161 Helsinki
Finland
<http://www.evl.fi/english>

Laura Maria Latikka

Sources:

- Evangelical Lutheran Church of Finland. Church in Finland. The History, Present State and Outlook for the Future of the Evangelical Lutheran Church of Finland. Documents of the Evangelical Lutheran Church of Finland 1. Helsinki: Evangelical Lutheran Church of Finland, 1989.
- Heino, Harri, K. Salonen, and J. Rusama. Response to Recession. The Evangelical Lutheran Church of Finland in the Years 1992–1995. Tampere, Finland: Research Institute of the Evangelical Lutheran Church of Finland, no. 47, 1997.
- Sentzke, G. Finland: Its Church and Its People. Helsinki: Publications of the Luther-Agricola Society, Series B 3, 1963.
- Työrinoja, P., ed. The Evangelical Lutheran Church in Finnish Society. Documents of the Evangelical Lutheran Church of Finland 6. Helsinki: Church Council for Foreign Affairs, Church Council, 1994.

Evangelical Lutheran Church of France

When the Protestant Reformation spread into France, the Reformed Church based in French-speaking Geneva found significantly more support than did Lutheranism. However, Lutheranism did find support in the Montbéliard region (then a part of the German Duchy of Württemberg) and in Alsace-Lorraine (French area bordering Germany). Beginning with the ministry of Guillaume Farel (1489–1565) and Martin Bucer (1491–1551), the church has been conscious of its role as a mediating force between German Lutheranism and French Reformed emphases. Over the centuries it has produced a number of significant figures in spiritual renewal, such as pietist leader Phillip Jacob Spener (1635–1705) and Johann Friedrich Oberlin (1740–1825).

The first Lutheran congregation (expatriate Swiss) was founded in Paris in 1626. A Danish congregation soon followed. However, only with the coming of Napoleon and his establishment of a set of laws that both recognized the existence of Protestant churches and regulated their life, were

Evangelical Lutheran Church of Lithuania

Lutherans allowed to worship openly in France. The presence of LUTHERANISM in Paris grew in the twentieth century with the development of work within the German expatriate community.

In 1871, as a result of the Franco-Prussian War, many of the French Lutherans suddenly found themselves in Germany with the annexation of Alsace-Lorraine. Those Lutherans who remained in France were found primarily in Montbéliard and Paris. In 1906, following the separation of church and state in France, the Lutherans were finally free to form a national organization. The Evangelical Lutheran Church of France is one of the two bodies that continue the life of the Lutheran Reformation in France. When Alsace-Lorraine was returned to France after World War I, the Lutherans there organized the CHURCH OF THE AUGSBURG CONFESSION OF ALSACE AND LORRAINE, which has remained a separate body.

The Evangelical Lutheran Church of France is a member of the Protestant Federation of France, the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES, and the LUTHERAN WORLD FEDERATION.

Address:

Evangelical Lutheran Church of France
16 rue Chauchat
75009 Paris
France

Sources:

Bachmann, E. Theodore, and Mercia Brenne Bachmann. Lutheran Churches in the World: A Handbook. Minneapolis, MN: Augsburg Press, 1989.

Van der Bent, Ans J., ed. Handbook/Member Churches/World Council of Churches. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 1985.

Evangelical Lutheran Church of Lithuania/ Lithuanian Evangelical Lutheran Church in Diaspora

The Lutheran Church in Lithuania dates to the spread of the Protestant Reformation in the 1520s. Neighboring Prussia was the first country to declare LUTHERANISM its state religion (1525), and Lithuanians studied in Wittenberg, Leipzig, and other Protestant universities. The Reformation spread through all parts of society, and the initial reformers faced harsh resistance by Catholic authorities. In 1539 Abraomas Kulvietis (Abraham Culva, c. 1509–1545) established a college in Vilnius without permission of the local Catholic bishop, and the college was shut down three years later. The college founders sought asylum in Prussia, where Abraomas Kulvietis, as well as another prominent figure of the Lithuanian Reformation, Stanislovas Rapolionis (often referred to by his Latin name, Stanislaus Rapagelanus; c. 1485–1545), contributed to the founding of Königsberg University in 1544.

The Reformation eventually found support among the Lithuanian nobility (especially the influential Radvila family), and the country became predominantly Protestant. In response, the bishop of Vilnius invited the JESUITS, already working in Poland, to spearhead the Counter-Reformation. They founded Vilnius University in 1579, and by the end of the century, the ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH had basically regained her former primacy.

Though now in a minority position, Lutherans contributed significantly to Lithuanian culture. The first book ever printed in the Lithuanian language was Luther's Small Catechism, published in 1547 by Martynas Mažvydas (in Latin, Martinus Mosvidius; 1520–1563) in Königsberg. In 1590 Jonas Bretkūnas (Iohannes Bretke; 1536–1602) completed the translation of the Bible into Lithuanian, although it was never published.

In 1648 the synod of the Evangelical Lutheran Church in Lithuania adopted the model of the Saxonian Church of the Augsburg Confession. In 1780 the church's synod established an independent consistory (which started functioning in 1782), and two years later the synod divided Lithuania into three church districts.

In 1832 both the synod and the consistory were abolished by order of the Russian czar, an action made possible because a major part of Lithuania had fallen under Russian occupation in 1795. Lithuania's Lutheran parishes were joined to the Curonian Consistory, with its administrative center in St. Petersburg. Later, parishes in part of Vilnius County and on the right bank of the Nemunas River were joined to the Warsaw Consistory.

Meanwhile, beginning in 1613, Lithuania Minor had its own consistory, established in Königsberg. When in 1660 Prussia ultimately united with Brandenburg, Königsberg Consistory was integrated into the Berlin General Consistory. In 1817, by decision of the king of Prussia, Fredrick William III, Lutheran and Reformed churches were formally merged to become the Prussian Evangelical Church. Some Lutheran parishes never accepted the Prussian Union.

Lithuania regained its independence in 1918, and the northern part of Lithuania Minor, the Klaipėda district (Memel gebiet) was joined to the Republic of Lithuania in 1923. Of the Klaipėda district's population, 97 percent (more than 150,000) was Lutheran, and there was a strong desire to unite all Lutheran parishes in Lithuania under one administration. Nevertheless, Lutherans in Klaipėda district remained under the supervision of the Königsberg Synod. Only in 1955, after World War II, were the remaining parishes in the district formally joined to the Evangelical Lutheran Church of Lithuania.

In the rest of Lithuania, Lutherans numbered approximately 70,000, but they were divided by language. Thirty thousand were ethnic Lithuanians, twenty-six thousand were German-speaking, and fourteen thousand were Latvian-speaking. As a result, between 1920 and 1941, each ethnic group formed its own synod, which in turn elected delegates for the consistory, the supreme body of the Evangelical Lutheran Church of Lithuania (ELCL). At the time, the president of the Republic of Lithuania appointed the president and the vice president for the consistory. As World War II loomed (1938), 9.56 percent of the 2.7 million Lithuanians were Evangelical (Lutherans and Reformed being counted together).

Due to Soviet occupation and Lithuania's incorporation in the USSR in 1940, a considerable part of the population fled to the West or was deported to the USSR. The number of Lutherans decreased by almost 90 percent. After 1944 large numbers of Lithuanian Lutherans and nearly all pastors found asylum in the West. In 1946 in Germany the constituting synod formed the Lithuanian Evangelical Lutheran Church in Exile, which (as a Lithuanian Evangelical Lutheran Church in Diaspora since 1993) continues to exist today. The church's bishop, Hans G. Dumpys, may be reached at its headquarters, 6641 S. Troy St., Chicago, IL 60629. It is a member of the LUTHERAN WORLD FEDERATION. As the new century begins, it counts about five thousand members.

A few pastors who remained in occupied Lithuania tried hard to keep the church alive under repression. A consistory was constituted in 1941 and 1950. Only in 1955 did the first synod meeting since World War II take place. By 1988 there were only twenty-five parishes in Lithuania.

National revival and the restoration of Lithuania's independence in 1991 provided the ELCL with an opportunity to reestablish parishes and various activities. In 2001 ELCL consisted of fifty-five parishes, served by some twenty-five clergy (including deacons). Since 1990, synods have taken place regularly every five years. Between the synods, the church is administered by the consistory.

Lutherans total about 1 percent of Lithuania's 3.6 million population. ELCL is a member of the Lutheran World Federation (since 1967) and the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES. Since 1993, a Department of Evangelical Theology has functioned at Klaipėda University. Bishop Jonas Kalvanas resides in the church headquarters in Tauragė.

Address:

Evangelical Lutheran Church of Lithuania
J. Tumo-Vaižganto 50
5900 Tauragė
Lithuania

Kęstutis Pulokas

Sources:

Bachmann, E. Theodore, and Mercia Brenne Bachmann. Lutheran Churches in the World: A Handbook. Minneapolis, MN: Augsburg, 1989.
Gudaitis, Kristupas. Evangelikų bažnyčios Lietuvoje. Vilnius: Lietuvos enciklopedijų redakcija, 1991.

Lukšaitė, Ingė. Reformacija Lietuvos Didžiojoje Kunigaikštystėje ir Mažosioje Lietuvoje. Vilnius: Baltos lankos, 1999.

Evangelical Lutheran Church of Papua New Guinea

Lutheran work in Papua New Guinea originated with two thrusts into the region following the establishment of a German colony on the northeast corner of the island of New Guinea in the 1880s. Johannes Flierl (1858–1947) moved to the German colony from Australia, where he had been working with the Aboriginal people. A missionary with the Neuendettelsau Mission, he established an initial station near Finschhafen. Missionaries from the RHENISH MISSION joined him the next year. Work began on reducing the local languages to writing and then translating the Bible. As churches slowly emerged, each congregation was assigned an area for evangelization, and beginning in 1908 native teachers were sent out to evangelize their neighbors.

The missions made significant progress when they adopted a method developed by Christian Keyser (1877–1961) of gaining the consent of a whole people to convert before beginning baptisms. This method helped considerably in the preservation of much of the culture of the region. The mission was severely affected by World War I, when the missionaries had to withdraw, but as elsewhere the effect had a positive value in forcing the further creation of indigenous leadership. Until the Germans were allowed to return (1927), American and Australian Lutherans supplied some guidance to the emerging church.

The mission continued to grow through the 1930s, but was even more severely disrupted by the Japanese occupation of the island. A number of missionaries and church leaders were killed and many church buildings destroyed. The mission was quickly reconstructed after the war (with American and Australian assistance), and in 1956 the organization of the Evangelical Lutheran Church occurred. The present name of the church was adopted in 1976 with the establishment of the independent country of Papua New Guinea and the granting of full independence by the several missionary bodies that had until then overseen its operation. Partnership relationships were maintained with German, American, and Australian Lutherans. One of the major programs of the new church was the translation of the Bible into Pidgin, the language that had emerged as the most commonly spoken language in the country's multi-language environment.

In 1976 the Siassi Lutheran Church, a product of the Neuendettelsau Mission, which had been turned over to the Evangelical Lutheran Church of Australia in 1936, merged into the Evangelical Lutheran Church of Papua New Guinea.

Evangelical Lutheran Free Church of Norway

The church is led by its bishop, who resides in Lae, and the church convention that meets biennially. Congregations are divided into geographic districts. Zurewe K. Zurenuo, elected in 1973, was the first New Guinean selected for the episcopacy, though at the time he had yet to be ordained to the ministry.

In the 1990s the church reported membership in excess of 550,000. It is a member of the LUTHERAN WORLD FEDERATION and the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES. It sponsors three seminaries for the training of ministers and church leaders. It also continues to oversee an extensive system of primary and secondary schools, as well as a teacher's college, also located at Lae.

Address:

Evangelical Lutheran Church of Papua New Guinea
P.O. Box 80
Lae, Morobe Province 411
Papua New Guinea

Sources:

- Bachmann, E. Theodore, and Mercia Brenne Bachmann. Lutheran Churches in the World: A Handbook. Minneapolis, MN: Augsburg Press, 1989.
- Van der Bent, Ans J., ed. Handbook/Member Churches/World Council of Churches. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 1985.

Evangelical Lutheran Free Church of Norway

Significant dissent from the established CHURCH OF NORWAY emerged toward the end of the nineteenth century when a group appeared asking for independence of the church from state control. The Rev. Paul Peter Wettergren (1835–1889), a former missionary of the church in South Africa, emerged as the spokesperson of the group, arguing that Jesus Christ, not the king of Norway, must be recognized as head of the church. In Norway, the parliament acted as the Church of Norway's legislature, and the king retained the power of pastoral appointments and of promulgating church law.

The suggestion that the secular authority should not interfere in church affairs was bolstered by complaints that church discipline had become lax, doctrinal aberrations had appeared, and moral standards had been lowered. Wettergren and his associates suggested that congregations be given the privilege of choosing their own pastors and begin exercising the powers now in the hands of the king. The arguments were not accepted, and Wettergren and his followers withdrew from the state church.

The new church made a firm commitment to the standard Lutheran confession of faith and developed a presbyterial polity to organize its congregations. The synod, the highest legislative authority, meets semiannually and elects the church's officers. Congregations call their pastors in cooperation with a district board. The church has established a Bible and Theological Seminary.

The church has a strong program of evangelism, especially among the more secularized adults in the suburbs of Norway's cities. It also has an extensive evangelism program, with missionaries in Japan, Ethiopia, Taiwan, and Cameroon.

In the 1990s the church reported 19,700 members in sixty-nine congregations. Though challenging the Church of Norway, the Free Church has good relations with it at present. It has remained aloof from other FREE CHURCHES in Norway, but has friendly relationships with the Church of the Lutheran Brethren in the United States and sends observers to the Conference of Lutheran Free Churches in Europe. It is not a member of the LUTHERAN WORLD FEDERATION.

Address:

Evangelical Lutheran Free Church of Norway
St. Olavsplass
P.O. Box 6787
0130 Oslo 1
Norway

Source:

- Bachmann, E. Theodore, and Mercia Brenne Bachmann. Lutheran Churches in the World: A Handbook. Minneapolis, MN: Augsburg Press, 1989.

Evangelical Mennonite Conference (Canada)

MENNONITES trace their roots to the more radical element of the sixteenth-century Protestant Reformation. During a period of continuing persecution, many turned to the former Roman Catholic priest Menno Simons (1496–1559) for his mature leadership. His teachings shaped the movement, which spread from Europe to Russia in the eighteenth century.

The Evangelical Mennonite Conference's (EMC) origins can be traced back to a split in the Mennonite community in southern Russia in 1812. The leader of the reform movement, Klaas Reimer (1770–1837), concerned about lax discipline in the church, established a separate church entitled the Kleine Gemeinde (German; Little Community). The reason for the title is debated. It most likely was due to its size in comparison with the Grosse Gemeinde (Large Community).

In 1874–1875 the group immigrated to North America to escape government pressure. About one-third of the group settled in Nebraska, and the other two-thirds settled in two colonies in Manitoba. The Canadian immigrants at that time numbered around fifty families. From the 1880s to the years immediately following World War II, the Kleine Gemeinde experienced a series of divisions within the community, political and cultural pressures to conform, and a loss of members as many immigrated to Mexico. The Kleine Gemeinde kept its name until 1952, when it was changed to the Evangelical Mennonite Church. In 1959 its name was changed to the present-day Evangelical Mennonite Conference.

The modern-day EMC has over 7,000 members in 53 churches. Its churches are located in central and western Canada. Although its membership still reflects its Dutch-German background, it is increasingly becoming more ethnically diverse. The EMC is a supporting member of the Mennonite Central Committee and the Evangelical Fellowship of Canada.

The denomination holds that “the Scripture has final authority in faith and practice, a belief in Christ’s finished work, and that assurance of salvation is possible.” It also adheres to historic Mennonite convictions regarding the necessity of discipleship, believer’s adult baptism, social concern, and pacifism. Women can serve on national boards, and in a wide variety of areas of ministry in the church, but they cannot be ordained as ministers. The EMC practices three ordinances: water baptism, the Lord’s Supper, and foot washing. Mission work and educational institutions are also an important part of the ministry of the EMC. Local church autonomy is stressed, with the churches of the conference organized under the conference council (which meets twice a year) and the moderator.

Address:

Evangelical Mennonite Conference
440 Main St.
Box 1268
Steinbach, Manitoba R0A 2A0
Canada
<http://www.emconf.ca>

Gordon L. Heath

Sources:

Epp, Frank H. Mennonites in Canada, 1786–1920: The History of a Separate People. Toronto: Macmillan, 1974.
———. Mennonites in Canada, 1920–1940: A People’s Struggle for Survival. Scottsdale, PA: Herald Press, 1982.
Regehr, T. D. Mennonites in Canada, 1939–1970: A People Transformed. Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 1996.

Evangelical Methodist Church in the Philippine Islands

Following the change of administration in the Philippines as a result of the Spanish-American War, the Methodist Episcopal Church (MEC, now an integral part of the UNITED METHODIST CHURCH) launched missionary activity in the predominantly Roman Catholic country. The mission grew rapidly, but did not respond in a timely way to expressed desires for indigenous leadership. The desire for a greater leadership role was initially expressed in the formation of “The Truth,” an evangelistic effort created by Filipino evangelists. Church leaders discouraged the independent effort. Thus it was that Nicholas Zamora, the first Filipino ordained to the ministry, assumed leadership of some 3,000 members who broke with the MEC to form the Evangelical Methodist Church in 1909. The church was self-governing, self-supporting, and self-propagating. The church had grown to some 20,000 members by the mid-1920s.

Initially the church followed the parent body in organization and adopted a slightly edited version of the MEC Discipline as its organizational manual. In 1948, however, it placed the leadership of the church in the hands of a newly created consistory of elders, consisting of eleven ministers and two laypersons. The consistory was elected every four years by the church’s general conference. The consistory names one of its ministerial members as the church’s general superintendent. He, in turn, names the district superintendents who head the geographic districts into which the church is divided.

The church has developed a strong program of economic assistance and industrial development among the poorer people of the Philippines. It has taken a strong stand against racial discrimination, drug addiction, and divorce.

At the end of the 1990s, the church reported some 70,000 members. It is a member of the WORLD METHODIST COUNCIL and the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES.

Address:

Evangelical Methodist Church in the Philippine Islands
908 Apacible St., Unit 3A
Ermita, Manila 1000
Philippines

Sources:

Harmon, Nolan B. Encyclopedia of World Methodism. 2 vols. Nashville, TN: United Methodist Publishing House, 1974.
Van der Bent, Ans J., ed. Handbook/Member Churches/World Council of Churches. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 1985.
World Methodist Council. World Methodist Council, Handbook of Information. Lake Junaluska, NC: World Methodist Council, 1997.

Evangelical Methodist Church of Argentina

As early as 1825, the Missionary Society of the Methodist Episcopal Church (now a constituent part of the UNITED METHODIST CHURCH) proposed the opening of a mission in Argentina, but the proposal was not acted upon immediately. Then in 1932, an unnamed Methodist wrote from

Evangelical Methodist Church of Bolivia

Argentina saying that he had founded a Methodist class and requested that the church send a missionary to offer assistance. In 1835 the Rev. Fountain E. Pitts (1808–1874) visited the country and returned to the United States to make his recommendation that missionaries be dispatched to the Plate River (Rio de la Plata) area.

John Dempster (1794–1863) arrived in Buenos Aires in December 1836. Over the next five years he built a school and congregation and then was succeeded by William H. Norris (1801–1878), who had been working in Uruguay. Under Norris's guidance, the work was extended into the interior of Argentina and into Paraguay, though the real expansion did not occur until the 1860s. All preaching was in English until that time. In 1874 the Woman's Foreign Missionary Society added their strength to the work and sent two missionaries to found a school for girls (now Colegio Americano).

In 1892, the General Conference authorized the founding of the South America Annual Conference (similar to a diocese in Methodism), and Bishop John P. Newman (1826–1899) held the first session in 1893. Work now also included missions in Brazil, Peru, and Chile. There were 886 members in Argentina. The South America Conference gave way to the Latin American Central Conference in 1924, the central conference structure offering some degree of autonomy. In 1932, the conference elected the first Latin American Methodist bishop, Juan E. Gattinoni (1878–1970), pastor of Central Church in Buenos Aires.

Argentina was set apart as a separate conference in 1956, and in 1968, the uniting conference of the United Methodist church voted positively on a proposal that the Argentina Annual Conference be allowed to become an autonomous church. That transformation occurred the next year when the Evangelical Methodist Church of Argentina was organized. Carlos E. Gattinoni (b. 1907), the son of Juan Gattinoni, was elected as the first bishop of the new church. He, like his father, had been the pastor of Central Church when he was called to the episcopate.

The new church continued the structure and beliefs of the parent denomination, except that it established a committee to oversee pastoral appointments, rather than leaving that task in the hands of the bishop alone.

In the late 1990s the church reported 8,850 members. It is a member of the WORLD METHODIST COUNCIL and the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES.

Address:

Evangelical Methodist Church of Argentina
Av. Rivadavia 4044
1205 Buenos Aires
Argentina
<http://www.cristianet.com/iema/>

Sources:

Harmon, Nolan B. Encyclopedia of World Methodism. 2 vols. Nashville, TN: United Methodist Publishing House, 1974.

World Methodist Council, Handbook of Information. Lake Junaluska, NC: World Methodist Council, 1997.

Evangelical Methodist Church of Bolivia

Methodist work in Bolivia is dated from the arrival of bishop-to-be William Taylor (1821–1902) on an exploratory mission in 1877. In 1879, Jose Mongiardino began distributing Bibles in the country, but his work ended abruptly with his murder. Several other attempts to being a mission met with mixed results, and it was not until 1906 that a stable work was begun, under Francis M. Harrington (1865–1908). He organized the first Methodist church in La Paz and the following year opened the American Institute, which subsequently grew to become the Colegio Evangelista Metodista. The single church carried METHODISM for the next thirty-four years, even though the nation was designated a mission conference.

In 1952, Bolivia passed through a revolution, which brought among other changes a new openness to Protestantism. In 1956, the Methodist Episcopal Church (now an integral part of the UNITED METHODIST CHURCH) committed funds for a new "Land of Decision" program in Bolivia, which at the time had eight churches in what had been designated a provisional annual conference. Work was launched in Spanish-speaking areas, as well as among the indigenous native population. Schools were founded, and medical work increased. The original clinic in La Paz is now the Pfeiffer Memorial Hospital. The UNITED CHURCH OF CHRIST IN JAPAN, into which Japanese Methodists had moved, sent missionaries to work among the increasing Japanese expatriate community.

In 1968, at the time of the merger that created the United Methodist Church, the conferences in Latin America requested autonomy, and the conference that had presided over the merger acted favorably on their request. The 1969 annual conference meeting in Bolivia completed the organization of the Evangelical Methodist Church of Bolivia. Rev. Mortimer Arias (b. 1924) was elected as the first bishop of the new church. The bishop is elected for a four-year term. The church has continued to work closely with its parent body.

At the end of the twentieth century, the church reported more than six thousand members in 155 churches. The church is a member of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES and the WORLD METHODIST COUNCIL. Within the church, congregations are active among the Aymará, Quechua, and Castellanos peoples.

Address:

Evangelical Methodist Church of Bolivia
Landaeta 423
Casilla 356 y 8347, La Paz
Bolivia

Sources:

- Harmon, Nolan B. Encyclopedia of World Methodism. 2 vols. Nashville, TN: United Methodist Publishing House, 1974.
- McCleary, Paul. Bolivia—Land of Opportunity. New York: Board of Missions, The Methodist Church, 1964.
- Van der Bent, Ans J., ed. Handbook/Member Churches/World Council of Churches. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 1985.
- World Methodist Council, Handbook of Information*. Lake Junaluska, NC: World Methodist Council, 1997.

Evangelical Methodist Church of Costa Rica

Methodism entered Costa Rica in the 1880s in the person of Francisco G. Penzotti (1851–1925), who had formerly worked as a pastor and missionary in South America. Born in Italy, he had moved to Uruguay, where as a young man he had had a dramatic conversion experience. He entered Costa Rica as an agent of the American Bible Society. The Methodist Episcopal Church (now a constituent part of the UNITED METHODIST CHURCH) was formally established in 1918 by George A. Miller (1868–1961), then superintendent of the church's Panama Mission. The first congregations were organized in towns along the Inter-American Highway between San José and the Panama border. A major project was the development of educational institutions, including a training school for church workers (later the Methodist Theological Seminary) and the Colegio Metodista, which became the first Protestant-sponsored school whose students were admitted to the national university.

The work was included in the Central American Mission Conference organized in 1940. The Costa Rica Provisional Annual Conference was organized in 1961. The work continued in affiliation with its American parent through the several mergers in 1939 and 1968 that produced the United Methodist Church. In 1973 it became autonomous as the Methodist Church of Costa Rica. The church is headed by its bishop, who is elected by the conference of ministers and lay delegates.

The church is a member of the WORLD METHODIST COUNCIL and the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES. At the end of the twentieth century, it reported 5,400 members and a constituency of 10,000.

Address:

Evangelical Methodist Church of Costa Rica
P.O. Box 5481–1000
San José
Costa Rica

Sources:

- Harmon, Nolan B. Encyclopedia of World Methodism. 2 vols. Nashville, TN: United Methodist Publishing House, 1974.

World Methodist Council, Handbook of Information. Lake Junaluska, NC: World Methodist Council, 1997.

Evangelical Methodist Church of Italy

Methodist missionaries have been active in Italy since the nineteenth century, with autonomous missions from both England (from what is now the METHODIST CHURCH) and the United States (from what is now the UNITED METHODIST CHURCH). The first Wesleyan missionary, William Arthur (1819–1901), arrived in Italy in 1859. He was followed by Richard Green (1829–1907), who established an outpost in Florence and initiated cooperative contacts with independent Italian evangelical churches, including the anti-Catholic Free Christian Church, which had been established by a former Catholic priest, Alessandro Gavazzi (1809–1889). The debate on whether the Methodists should establish an Italian Methodist Church, or join in the efforts of those aiming to establish a national Protestant Church in Italy, continued for several decades. The British Wesleyan mission expanded under the leadership of Henry J. Piggott (1831–1917) and Thomas W. S. Jones (1831–1916), who in 1870 incorporated the Evangelical Methodist Church in Italy. The most distinguished Italian member was the philosopher Pietro Tagliatela (1829–1913), another former Catholic priest.

American missions took a separate path. Following a proposal by Charles Elliott (1782–1869), the Missouri-Arkansas Conference in 1871 decided to despatch Leroy Monroe Vernon (1838–1896) to Italy. Attempts to join forces with the British Methodists were not successful, and in 1874 Vernon incorporated, in Bologna, the Episcopal Methodist Church of Italy, which in 1875 opened a temple in Rome. Vernon's successor, William Burt (1852–1936), developed a liaison with Italian Freemasonry, at that time a very anti-Catholic institution. A number of Italian Freemasons, however, were not Christians of any persuasion, but secular humanists. A former Wesleyan Methodist who had joined the Episcopal Methodists, Saverio Fera (1850–1915), promoted a schism in Italian Freemasonry, by gathering in a splinter organization around himself anti-Catholic Freemasons who were nonetheless Christian and Protestant, and opposed secular humanism. Fera was a controversial figure, and his initiatives were ultimately detrimental to Italian Methodism, while a largely independent pastor, Riccardo Santi (1871–1961), acquired national and international respect with the foundation of Casa Materna, established in 1905 as an orphanage for the destitute street children of Naples.

After World War II (during which Methodists suffered discrimination as members of a "foreign" church), in 1946 the American and British branches merged to become the unified Methodist Church of Italy, which was eventually given official recognition by the Italian government on

Evangelical Methodist Church of Uruguay

March 20, 1961. Still pursuing their original aim of unifying Italian mainline Protestantism within a single church, the Methodists signed a “pact of integration” with the WALDENSIAN CHURCH in 1975. This pact became officially effective in 1979. It was not, technically, a merger, because the Waldensians and the Methodists also maintained separate institutions, as well as separate international contacts. They decided, however, to be governed by one synod, responsible for the newly constituted Union of Waldensian and Methodist Churches. The Evangelical Methodist Church of Italy remained also incorporated separately, according to legal proceedings completed in 1979, while the Union of Waldensian and Methodist Churches entered into a concordat with the Italian government in 1984.

Address:

Evangelical Methodist Church of Italy
Via Firenze 38
00184 Rome
Italy

Massimo Introvigne and PierLuigi Zoccatelli

Sources:

Chiarini, Franco. Storia delle Chiese Metodiste in Italia 1859–1915. Torino: Claudiana, 1999.
———, ed. Il metodismo italiano (1861–1991). Torino: Claudiana, 1997.

Evangelical Methodist Church of Uruguay

The Evangelical Methodist Church of Uruguay (Iglesia Evangelica Metodista) dates to the 1835 tour of Fountain E. Pitts (1808–1874), a minister in the Methodist Episcopal Church (now an integral part of the UNITED METHODIST CHURCH). He not only assessed the possibility of initiating a Methodist ministry in Argentina, Brazil, and Uruguay, but founded a Methodist class in Montevideo. During a six-month stay, he called for the church to send a full-time missionary to the area. As a result Rev. John Dempster (1794–1863) arrived in Buenos Aires in 1836. During his tenure he visited Montevideo and requested a full-time missionary worker for the country. That worker was William H. Norris (1801–1878), who arrived in 1839; however, even though he was able to get permission to build a church, the war between Uruguay and Argentina and internal unrest in the country prevented much success in his missionary activities. He withdrew in 1842.

In 1870, a new attempt to found Methodism in Uruguay was started by John F. Thompson (1843–1933), though he also had little success. Finally in 1876, Thomas B. Wood (1844–1922) arrived and was able to create a stable growing organization. He was aided by Francisco G. Penzotti (1851–1925), converted under Thompson’s ministry, and other native Uruguayans. They had some difficulty from a hostile government and on occasions were arrested because of their evangelistic endeavors. They were able to get some relief after William Tallen became pastor of an American church in Montevideo and used the pulpit as a forum to defend Protestantism in general. He also occasionally spoke at the university and attracted several well-educated Uruguayans to the church. In 1884, the mission joined in the development of a theological school as a joint venture with the WALDENSIAN CHURCH (there being a large Italian expatriate community in Montevideo).

Uruguay operated as a branch of the Argentina work until 1893, when the Methodist Episcopal Church organized its South America Conference. Uruguay (including a small part of Argentina and Brazil) became a separate district. During this time, the Crandon Institute, the most important of the church’s educational institutions, was founded. It eventually offered a complete education from elementary school through junior college. A ministerial training school founded in Montevideo was later transferred to Buenos Aires and became Union Theological Seminary. In the 1960s the church entered into merger negotiations with the Waldensians and the CHRISTIAN CHURCH (DISCIPLES OF CHRIST), but the merger was not consummated.

As the work in South America developed, the Argentina and Uruguay districts were separated into the River Plate Conference. That conference was dissolved in 1952, and Uruguay was set apart as the Uruguay Provisional Conference. Having recruited the necessary number of ministers (twenty-five), in 1964 it became the Uruguay Annual Conference. In 1968, at the time of the formation of the United Methodist Church, the general conference gave the Uruguay Conference permission to become an autonomous body. It completed that process in 1969, and Rev. Emilio Castro was elected as president of the new church. As secretary of the World Council of Churches, Castro went on to become one of the most outstanding voices in the world ecumenical community.

The Methodist Church is a relatively small church, with approximately two thousand members, but it is a member of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES and the WORLD METHODIST COUNCIL. It has sponsored a radio show since the 1940s, La Voz Evangelical (The Evangelical Voice).

Address:

Evangelical Methodist Church of Uruguay
Estero Bellaco 2678
C.P. 11.600
11600 Montevideo
Uruguay

Sources:

Harmon, Nolan B. Encyclopedia of World Methodism. 2 vols. Nashville, TN: United Methodist Publishing House, 1974.
Talolon, Alberto G. Historia del Metodismo en el Rio dela Plata. Buenos Aires: Imprensa Metodista, 1936.

World Methodist Council, Handbook of Information. Lake Junaluska, NC: World Methodist Council, 1997.

Evangelical Mission of South Haiti

The Evangelical Mission of South Haiti grew somewhat accidentally out of the work of a team of independent Evangelical Christian missionaries in Cuba. In 1928 Elmer Thompson (b. 1901), his wife Evelyn McElheran (b. 1905), a Cuban national named Bartholomew Lavastida (1890–1994), and Isabel Junco opened a Bible school. As part of their study, they had the students engage in evangelistic efforts. The work of the students and graduates expanded to the point that in 1936 a decision was made to expand the effort to the Dominican Republic. Alexander Mersdorf, a missionary who had joined the original team, was sent to survey the situation, but stopped at Port-au-Prince, Haiti, on the way to Santo Domingo. While there, he encountered some Haitians who had been converted to Christianity while working on a sugarcane plantation in Cuba. They knew little of the Christian life beyond the absolute basics and had no Bible in their native Creole language. They were looking for a minister who could provide them with some training and guidance.

Upon his return to Cuba Mersdorf placed the needs of the Haitians before the group at the Bible school and they decided to postpone work in the Dominican Republic and concentrate instead on Haiti. The work in Haiti eventually became the Evangelical Baptist Mission in South Haiti. The Haitian mission began in 1937 by founding a Bible school in Les Cayes and growing the mission through its graduates. Over the next years it also founded a seminary, a hospital, and a radio network.

In the mid-1990s the mission reported sixty thousand members in 282 churches. The West Indies Mission, the name assumed by the work that grew in the islands from Thompson's original effort later changed its name to WorldTeam. In 1995 it merged with RBMU International to become World Team (1431 Stuchert Rd., Warrington, PA 18976). The Evangelical Mission of South Haiti retains close relations with World Team.

Address:

Evangelical Mission of South Haiti
MFI-M.E.B.S.H.
Box 15665
West Palm Beach, FL 33416–5665

Source:

World Team Web site. Posted at <http://www.worldteam.org>

Evangelical Presbyterian Church, Ghana

In 1847 missionaries from the Bremen, the Norddeutsche, and the BASEL MISSIONS began work among the Ewe people in what was then called Togoland. These societies drew their support from the Lutheran and Reformed churches of Germany and German-speaking Switzerland. Germany assumed control of this area in 1884, and the mission experienced a period of growth beginning in the 1890s and extending to World War I.

Germany lost its African colonies as a result of World War I, and England and France divided Togoland. That part assigned to Britain was incorporated into the colony of the Gold Coast. The congregations that had been formed among the Ewe people were essentially left without missionary oversight, and in 1922 their leadership met for the first synod of the Ewe church. A congregational church order was developed, and the synod took oversight of the churches in both the French and English territory. Two synods were set up to function in the two new colonies, but a joint synod of the whole church was to meet every four years.

In 1923 missionaries from the CHURCH OF SCOTLAND moved into the Gold Coast and began to work with the Ewe church members, while in 1929 missionaries from the PARIS MISSION (associated with the REFORMED CHURCH OF FRANCE) assumed similar duties in French Togo. The two Ewe synods shared a constitution, but over the years developed in divergent directions. As the Gold Coast became Ghana and Togo became an independent country, the two synods became independent churches, though they continue to have close fraternal relations and to meet in their joint synod quadrennially.

The church in Ghana expanded far beyond its original base among the Ewe to include mission stations among the Twi, Guan, Konkomba, Kabre, and Akposso peoples. It has also had a turbulent history, as various groups have split to form indigenous churches. As early as 1954, some twenty congregations among the Beum and Krachi people split over issues of language and polygamy, the allowance of polygamy, common in some societies, being a persistent problem for African Christian churches. This split became the occasion for the Ewe Presbyterian Church to change its name to the Evangelical Presbyterian Church (the church in Togo made a similar name change.) Other churches that have their roots in the Evangelical Presbyterian Church include the Apostolic Revelation Society, the White Cross Society, the Evangelical Presbyterian Reformed Church, and the Lord's Pentecostal Church. Most recently, the Charismatic Movement spread through the church and along with new life brought schism. Those most supportive of the movement have formed the Evangelical Presbyterian Church of Ghana.

In the 1990s the church reported 143,000 members in 748 congregations. It supports Trinity College at Legon jointly with the Anglican, Methodist, and other Presbyterian churches. It is a member of the WORLD ALLIANCE OF REFORMED CHURCHES and the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES.

Address:

Evangelical Presbyterian Church, Ghana
P.O. Box 18
Ho-Kpodzi, HO Volta Region
Ghana

Sources:

- Bauswein, Jean-Jacques, and Lukas Vischer, eds. The Reformed Family Worldwide: A Survey of Reformed Churches, Theological Schools, and International Organizations. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans, 1999.
- Van der Bent, Ans J., ed. Handbook/Member Churches/World Council of Churches. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 1985.

Evangelical Presbyterian Church in South Africa

The Evangelical Presbyterian Church in South Africa began in 1875 when Reformed Church missionaries from Switzerland initiated work among the Tsonga people of the northern Transvaal of South Africa. They were later joined by workers from the PARIS MISSION (associated with the REFORMED CHURCH OF FRANCE). The work spread throughout the Transvaal, especially after the mining industry developed. With the movement of people pursuing jobs, it spread to the Orange Free State and into Zululand. It has remained a largely ethnic church, with worship being conducted in the Tsonga language.

The mission matured as the Tsonga Presbyterian Church. In 1962 it became autonomous. Once organizationally independent, it began the long process of becoming financially self-sufficient. Its doctrine and practice follow that of its parent body. The synod is the highest legislative body. It appoints an executive committee that administers the church on a day-to-day basis.

In the 1990s the Evangelical Presbyterian Church reported 30,000 members. It is a member of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES.

Address:

Evangelical Presbyterian Church in South Africa
P.O. Box 31961
Braamfontein 2017, Johannesburg
South Africa

Sources:

- Bauswein, Jean-Jacques, and Lukas Vischer, eds. The Reformed Family Worldwide: A Survey of Reformed Churches, Theological Schools, and International Organizations. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans, 1999.
- Van der Bent, Ans J., ed. Handbook/Member Churches/World Council of Churches. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 1985.

Evangelical Presbyterian Church of Portugal

The first congregation in the reformed tradition in Portugal was founded by a Scottish physician, Robert Reid Kelley, in 1845 on the island of Madeira. However, the church was suppressed and the members scattered. One of the members eventually found his way to Lisbon and was instrumental in founding the first Presbyterian church in that city. The movement spread with assistance of Brazilian and American missionaries. Paralleling the Presbyterians, Manuel dos Santos Carvalho led in the founding of the first Congregational church in 1880. That church cooperated with the Evangelical Church of Rio de Janeiro, with whom it founded the Evangelical Union and Mission of Brazil and Portugal.

After World War II, Presbyterian and Congregational leaders began to look toward the formation of a national Portuguese church, and in 1947 a constitution was promulgated. The first synod of the new church, the Evangelical Presbyterian Church of Portugal (Igreja Evangélica Presbiteriana de Portugal), was held in 1952. In this effort, the United Presbyterian Church in the USA (now a part of the PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH [U.S.A.]) provided guidance and support. Those Congregationalist churches that chose not to join the united church formed the Union of Evangelical Congregationalist Churches.

It has benefited from the changes that brought religious freedom to Portugal and the new relations between Protestant and Roman Catholics following Vatican II, but remains a small church with 22 congregations and around one thousand members. It cooperates with the Spanish Methodists in supporting the Evangelical Seminary of Theology in Lisbon. It is a member of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES.

Address:

Evangelical Presbyterian Church of Portugal
Rua Tomás de Anunciação n 56, 1-D
1300 Lisbon
Portugal

Sources:

- Bauswein, Jean-Jacques, and Lukas Vischer, eds. The Reformed Family Worldwide: A Survey of Reformed Churches, Theological Schools, and International Organizations. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans, 1999.
- De Azevedo, C. Churches of Portugal. New York: Scala Books, 1985.

Evangelical Presbyterian Church of Togo

The Evangelical Presbyterian Church of Togo originated with the Norddeutsche Mission, founded in Hamburg, Germany, in 1836. It drew support from Pietist Lutherans, Moravians, and Reformed Protestants from across northern Germany, and in 1847 it sent the first missionaries into Togo to work among the Ewe people. Their work soon spread across the border into the Gold Coast.

In 1884, Germany assumed hegemony over what was then Togo, but during World War I the British and French took control, dividing the country into a eastern (British) and western (French) part. In 1918, both governments expelled the German missionaries operating in their territories, and in 1922 the mission reorganized as the Evangelical Ewe Church, which included congregations in French Togo, British Togo, and the Gold Coast. The church tried to affirm its unity across national boundaries, but increasingly the British and French segments were divided by language and custom.

In the Gold Coast, the UNITED FREE CHURCH OF SCOTLAND, a Presbyterian church, assumed control of the former work of the BASEL MISSION and then increasingly became influential over the congregations of the Evangelical Ewe church. Meanwhile in French Togo, the Ewe Church founded its own theological school and began to build a relationship with the PARIS MISSION (REFORMED CHURCH OF FRANCE), which began to assume more and more control. It also began to spread among the Kabye people in the northern part of the country. In 1955, the UNITED CHURCH OF CHRIST from the United States added its support to the work through its United Church Board of World Ministries.

The church became fully independent in 1959 as the Evangelical Church of Togo. The next year Togo became independent of France. In the next decades the church grew to a considerable extent and emerged as the largest non-Catholic body in the country. More recently it assumed its present name, an indication of its leaving its early congregational organization behind and adopting a presbyterian structure.

In the late 1990s the church reported a membership of three hundred thousand in 516 congregations. It is a member of the Christian Council of Togo and the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES.

Address:

Evangelical Presbyterian Church of Togo
B.P. 2
rue Tokmake 1
Lomé
Togo

Source:

Bauswein, Jean-Jacques, and Lukas Vischer, eds. The Reformed Family Worldwide: A Survey of Reformed Churches, Theological Schools, and International Organizations. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans, 1999.

Evangelical Reformed Church of Angola

The Evangelical Reformed Church of Angola grew out of the work of Anglican missionary Archibald Patterson and Swiss minister Ernest Niklaus, who in 1922 started mission work in the province of Uige. The work grew through the 1960s as the Igreja Evangélica do Norte de Angola. However, in 1961, when civil war broke out, the church faced severe government repression. Most church leaders were either forced underground or out of the country. Only in 1977, after independent Angola had been established, was the church able to reorganize. The members chose the name Evangelical Reformed Church of Angola.

The new church faced some immediate problems, not the least being the departure of eighteen ministers who founded a separate church, which led to the formation of the UNITED EVANGELICAL CHURCH-ANGELICAN COMMUNION OF ANGOLA. However, the main body of the church continued. Headquarters were moved to the capital in Luanda, and the church developed evangelical efforts designed to transform it into a national church, rather than simply a regional organization. It now has work in eleven of the eighteen provinces of Angola.

In the 1990s the church reported a hundred thousand members in five hundred congregations. Its General Assembly is the highest legislative body in the church. Administration is in the hands of its executive committee. It is a member of both the Council of Christian Churches in Angola and the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES.

Address:

Evangelical Reformed Church of Angola
Rua Karl Marx 45 RIC-47B
C.P. 5968
s/c Frère Mutudi Mesongolo Luanda
Angola

Source:

Bauswein, Jean-Jacques, and Lukas Vischer, eds. The Reformed Family Worldwide: A Survey of Reformed Churches, Theological Schools, and International Organizations. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans, 1999.

Evangelical Synodal Presbyterian Church of the Augsburg Confession in Romania

The Evangelical Synodal Presbyterian Church of the Augsburg Confession in Romania dates to the movement of the Lutheran faith into Hungary and Transylvania in the sixteenth century. There it found a response among both German-speaking and Hungarian-speaking peoples. These churches existed in what was then a part of the Ottoman Empire. In 1691, Transylvania was incorporated into the expanding Hapsburg Empire and existed through a period during which the government supported efforts of the ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH to reclaim Protestant believers. Lutherans in Transylvania were initially incorporated into the LUTHERAN CHURCH IN HUNGARY, but were separated following the transfer of Transylvania to Romania following World War I.

The Evangelical Synodal Presbyterian Church of the Augsburg Confession in Romania continues the Hungarian-speaking Lutheran tradition that has been present in Transylvania since the Reformation. It had experienced a revival in the 1780s following the granting of religious tolerance by the government in 1781 during which time many of its prominent buildings were erected. Following the changes after World War II, the Hungarian (and Slovak) Lutherans decided to organize separately from the German-speaking Lutherans, now within the EVANGELICAL CHURCH OF THE AUGSBURG CONFESSION IN ROMANIA.

The Hungarian church is organized on a presbyterial system with congregations organized into presbyteries. A general synod is the highest legislative body. The church is led by a bishop who is assisted by a lay president. As the new century began, the church reported a membership of some 32,000. It is a member of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES and the WORLD LUTHERAN FEDERATION. With the Unitarians and Reformed churches, it supports the United Protestant Theological Institute in Cluj at which most of its ministers are trained.

Address:

Evangelical Synodal Presbyterian Church of the Augsburg Confession in Romania
Bulevadul 21 Decembrie 1
3400 Cluj
Romania

Sources:

Branzea, Nicolae I., and Stefan Ionita. Religious Life in Romania. Bucharesti: Editura Paideia, 1999.
Cuciuc, Constantin. Atlasul Religiilor și al Monumentelor Istorice Religioase din Romania. Bucharesti: Editura Gnosis, 1996.

Faeroe Islands

The Faeroe Islands is a group of eighteen islands in the Atlantic Ocean north of Scotland with some 540 square miles of land and approximately 50,000 residents. The island was originally settled by Scandinavians, who over the centuries developed their own Faeroese language. For centuries they worshipped as Roman Catholics. Following the Reformation of the sixteenth century, the Roman Church was replaced with the Lutheran Church that continues to dominate the religious community.

Today, the Faeroe Islands are a dependency of Denmark. The Lutheran community is a part of the EVANGELICAL LUTHERAN CHURCH IN DENMARK and officially under the authority of the bishop of Copenhagen. An assistant bishop resides in Tórshavn, the capital. A small ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH community reappeared in the 1930s and today is attached to the bishop in Copenhagen.

Interestingly, the CHRISTIAN BROTHERS, the open branch of the Plymouth Brethren, initiated work in the Faeroes in 1865 and have had success on several of the northernmost islands. They are by far the largest of several Free Church groups, including THE SALVATION ARMY and the SEVENTH-DAY ADVENTIST CHURCH, that now have work. The first JEHOVAH'S WITNESSES came around 1950, and there is one kingdom hall. There is also a small group of the BAHÁ'Í FAITH.

Sources:

West, J. F. Faroe: The Emergence of a Nation. London: C. Hurst, 1972.

Wylie, J. The Faeroe Islands: Interpretations of History. Lexington: University of Kentucky Press, 1987.

Falashas

See Beta Israel

Falkland Islands/ Malvinas Islands

The Falkland Islands, also known as the Malvinas Islands, are a disputed territory in the Atlantic Ocean off the coast of Argentina. In 1982, after Argentina asserted its hegemony of the islands through an occupying force, it fought a war with the United Kingdom and was forced to withdraw. The Falklands include more than a hundred islands first discovered in 1520 by Spanish explorers. They were initially inhabited by the British, who founded the community of Port Egmont in the 1690s. They later returned the islands to Spain, who renamed the community Port Soledad. Then in the eighteenth century French fishers and seal hunters settled on the islands and named them for Saint Malo.

Following Argentina's independence, the islands were considered part of the new nation. In 1833, Great Britain, as part of a larger issue involving trade along the south Atlantic coast, occupied the islands. They also brought settlers with them. These settlers eventually became the overwhelming majority of the islands' inhabitants.

British control of the islands was not disputed until the United Nations review after World War II. In the end, the UN recognized Argentinean sovereignty, a decision from which the United Kingdom dissented. Since the 1982 war, the United Kingdom has remained in control of the islands, and their status, like their name, is a continuing issue.

The settlers who arrived with the British in 1833 were primarily Anglican, but a chaplain from the CHURCH OF ENGLAND did not arrive until 1845. Missionaries of the South American Missionary Society arrived a decade later. L. S. Brandon, who stayed in the islands for thirty years (1877–1907), is remembered as the person who largely built the Anglican establishment.

The Diocese of the Falkland Islands was created in 1869, and included British expatriates through most of South

Status of religions in the Faeroe Islands, 2000-2050

Followers	2000			2025	2050
	total	%	rate
Christians	42,000	98.1	-0.93	35,400	32,000
Protestants	38,900	90.9	-1.08	32,000	28,000
Independents	400	0.9	4.81	820	1,200
Marginal Christians	200	0.5	2.92	400	700
Nonreligious	670	1.6	0.32	1,000	1,200
Baha'is	120	0.3	2.70	200	300
Total population	42,700	100.0	-0.89	36,600	33,500

Status of religions in the Falkland Islands, 2000-2050

Followers	2000			2025	2050
	total	%	rate
Christians	1,900	85.6	0.43	2,000	2,000
Anglicans	820	36.5	-0.44	800	750
Protestants	660	29.3	0.96	800	900
Roman Catholics	270	12.0	1.62	350	400
Nonreligious	190	8.5	2.50	250	300
Baha'is	70	3.0	2.97	130	150
Atheists	20	1.0	0.96	40	60
Buddhists	10	0.2	17.46	10	20
Neoreligionists	10	0.2	14.87	10	20
other religionists	40	1.6	1.84	60	90
Total population	2,300	100.0	0.56	2,500	2,600

The Whale Bone Arch at Port Stanley Cathedral on the Falkland Islands (R. Belbin/TRIP)

America. In 1910, work in Argentina and eastern South America was separated, but reunited in 1946. In 1974, jurisdiction over the work in the Falklands passed to the Consejo Anglicano Sud-Americano (CASA), a transition structure leading to the formation of the ANGLICAN PROVINCE OF THE SOUTHERN CONE OF AMERICA. However, the English-speaking residents of the Falklands formally protested their inclusion in what had become a predominantly Spanish-speaking Anglican body, and in 1977 the archbishop of Canterbury assumed authority over the Falklands. The work there remains an integral part of the Archdiocese of Canterbury. The great majority of the islands' two thousand residents identify with the Church of England.

The ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH began work among the British expatriates in 1857, and their small work remains attached to the bishop of London. A Presbyterian minister arrived in 1872 as the beginning of what became the United Free Church of the Falkland Islands, in which Lutherans and Baptists have also found a home. The church has fraternal relations with the CHURCH OF SCOTLAND.

The JEHOVAH'S WITNESSES arrived in the 1960s and have established a small work, as have members of the BAHÁ'Í FAITH.

Sources:

- Barrett, David. The Encyclopedia of World Christianity. 2d edition. New York: Oxford University Press, 2001.
- Bissio, Roberto Remo, et al. Third World Guide 93/94. Montevideo, Uruguay: Instituto del Tercer Mundo, 1992.
- Cannan, Edward. Churches of the South Atlantic Islands, 1502–1991. Oswestry, UK: Anthony Nelson, 1992.
- Gerry-Hoppé, J. F. "The History of the Non-Conformist Church in the Falkland Islands." Falkland Islands Journal 6, 1 (1992): 17–25.
- Murphy, G. Christ Church Cathedral: The Falkland Islands: Its Life and Times, 1892–1992. Stanley: Lance Bidwell, 1991.

Falun Gong (Falun Dafa)

Starting in 1979, China's leadership introduced radical social and economic reforms. The four modernizations—economic, scientific, military, and agricultural—were presented in an optimistic mode and showed a real willingness on the government's part to experiment with social structure and management. In fact, no one was quite sure what the outcome would be of many of these experiments. One unexpected result has been the flourishing of spiritual and religious movements within the bounds of the new liberalism. Falun Gong is the most significant of the many groups to arise in the 1980s and 1990s.

Falun Gong practitioners meditate outside the Chinese Embassy in London, January 23, 2001. (AFP/CORBIS)

Falun Gong is an indigenous Chinese spiritual movement that has grown swiftly using modern communication and organizational tools. It formed in 1992 in Chang Chun, an industrial city in northeastern China. At that time it was but one of many qigong practice groups. By the late 1990s it had spread into most Chinese cities and to overseas centers such as Hong Kong, Taiwan, Japan, and the United States. It rose to prominence on April 25, 1999, when over ten thousand Falun Gong followers surrounded the leadership compound of Zhongnanhai in central Beijing to stage a peaceful but dramatic protest of perceived mistreatment by police. At that point Falun Gong ceased being simply an unknown meditation group and became, partly through ongoing intense international media focus, a political opponent to the Chinese government.

Falun is the Wheel of the Law or Dharma, in this case referring to the absolute truth taught by the Buddha, which inexorably rolls forward. Gong refers to a technique or practice, with a particular sense of a spiritual or meditation practice. Thus Falun Gong is the practice or implementation of the spiritual truth, and, by extension, the totality of practitioners who follow these teachings. (The group also refers to itself as Falun Dafa, the Great Law of the Wheel of Dharma.) In practice the label Falun Gong refers to followers of Li Hongzhi, who is said to be enlightened and the sole possessor of the Buddha's truth.

Li Hongzhi (b. 1952; some sources claim 1951) served in the army and worked for a government grain corporation before starting Falun Gong around 1992. Falun Gong literature states that he studied with Daoist and Buddhist masters.

It is not known how large the movement is overall at this stage. At one point Falun Gong literature estimated there were over forty million followers in China. Since the group was banned in China, most of these have ceased to participate in group activities; some who believe strongly have been driven underground. Although there are Falun Gong groups around the world that continue to protest and practice in public, the total number of active followers worldwide currently probably numbers in the thousands.

The key Falun Gong texts are Zhuan Falun (The Turning of the Wheel of Dharma) and Falun Fofa (Buddha Law of the Wheel of Dharma), which like most Falun texts are collections of Li Hongzhi's speeches. Li has also issued a collection of his poetry, Hong Yin (Torrential Sighs). One key aspect of Falun Dafa's growth has been the adept use of the Internet. Key texts, speeches, and messages from Li Hongzhi are found on the group's Web sites, in several language options.

Falun Dafa espouses a life oriented around both practice and cultivation, in order to cleanse oneself and cease being “ordinary.” Practice means performing the set sequences of five physical and meditation exercises. These are often done in groups in the mornings, sometimes in neighborhood parks. Cultivation involves “removing your demon-nature and fulfilling yourself with Buddha-nature.”

Zhuan Falun emphasizes that the basic nature of the universe is zhen-shan-ren, truthfulness, benevolence, and forbearance. This compact statement of the fundamental character of the universe is the Great Law (dafa). These original universal properties are shared by humans upon birth. We are, however, trapped in the state of ordinary consciousness and cannot see the truth of the universe. The way out of this situation of ignorance is cultivation.

The individual in Falun Dafa is described as a container filled with some good, some bad elements, the Buddha-nature and the demon-nature. These dual natures are visible to those of higher perceptions as white or black substances. The white is de, translated as a physical field surrounding the body, which is accumulated through hardships, and the black is called karmic force (yeli), accumulated through bad actions over innumerable lifetimes. The goal of Falun cultivation is to transform de to gong, cultivation energy, through the assistance of the master. This de/gong energy level is apparent because it grows in a vertical spiral, the gongzhu, from the top of the head, which again is visible to some.

In addition to gong energy, an individual is characterized by her xinxing (mind nature) level. Xinxing is an aspect of the person that includes de, plus other characteristics such as tolerance, “enlightenment quality,” the abandonment of attachments, and the ability to suffer difficulties. Xinxing thus develops in tandem with de/gong.

A key aspect of cultivation is facing the travails encountered in life. Ordeals are necessary, for they function as tests of xinxing. Conflict in everyday life is similarly part of cultivation. Suffering overall is explained as the repayment of one’s karmic debts, and these debts must be repaid in some form.

Falun Dafa teaches that the current cycle of the universe is bound to expire and end in catastrophe, “the Final Period of the Last Havoc.” The resulting new age will be a period of advancement and ease based on material progress.

Falun Dafa’s organization is a dispersed yet informed linkage of leaders versed in training and functioning in a cell-like network with maximum flexibility and focus. In its early stages in China, Falun Gong established assistance centers (fudao zhongxin) with assistants and branch heads, in addition to general assistance centers (zong fudao zhongxin) at the provincial and municipal levels and a Research Society (yanjiuhui). The General Society (zonghui) arranged national or international meetings. Finally, there were Law Assemblies, fahui, at which cultivation experiences could be discussed. Many of these organizational structures fell apart with the crackdown in China. In contrast, Falun Gong in Hong Kong in 2000 was and is a loose collection of practitioner groups, each of which gets together daily to practice the exercises, with a minimum of leadership. However there is some degree of coordination beyond this, as is evident in the dissemination of information, the training of new members, and the frequent public demonstrations on public holidays. A Hong Kong Association of Falun Dafa officially promotes lectures.

Not all Falun Gong groups follow Li Hongzhi, however. Claims by Hong Kong followers of Belinda Peng Shanshan that she is the rightful master of Falun Gong may be a first case of intergroup fissuring.

Zhuan Falun repeatedly states that Falun Dafa does not follow the rituals of the past. This does not, however, mean Falun Dafa practitioners lack ritual. The carefully choreographed daily exercises so emblematic of Falun Gong practice are a form of group ritualization. In addition such actions as installation of the falun (wheel) in the practitioner’s abdomen and the opening of the tianmu (celestial eye) are clearly initiatory rites.

The movement was officially banned in China on July 20, 1999, and since then has been actively suppressed by public security throughout China. Members caught engaging in the practice, demonstrating in public, or attending meetings have been arrested. Some have been sent to reeducation camps or prison. Central government media coverage has also focused on painting the movement in a negative light. Newscasts have interviewed former members who have repudiated the group’s principles. Graphic examples of suicide and murder have been attributed to the excesses of Falun Gong beliefs.

In January of 2000 seven followers (some reports claim five) attempted suicide by self-immolation in Tiananmen Square, the heart of Beijing. Two subsequently died. Falun Gong spokespersons overseas doubted that the protesters were authentic Falun Gong members, since, they said, Falun Gong principles uphold the sanctity of life. These statements implied that the incident was staged, a contention denied by the Chinese government. Regardless, the constant media reporting of this incident has clearly served to discredit the group in the minds of many Chinese citizens.

Despite Falun Dafa’s strategic positioning of itself as in opposition to the surrounding society and its “ordinary” mentalities, the interaction has been mutual, with many of the forms found within Falun taken from the socialist context in which the movement surfaced. These include organization into cells, concern with control over mass media releases, and the centrality of unified doctrinal and organizational practice, all characteristics of Chinese Marxism and the Chinese Communist Party, as well as many sectarian religious groups. The advent of Falun thus shows the resiliency of the tradition of popularly based religious movements within Chinese culture as a whole, as well as the undeniable influence of Chinese socialism.

Falun Gong in some ways fits well in this traditional model of an uneasy relationship between the central government and newly arisen religious groups. It is grassroots based; members are often farmers newly arrived in urban centers, or former state workers thrown out of work due to economic restructuring. And like similar rebellious groups, Falun Gong is consistently critical of the dominant ideologies, including both the established Communist ethos and the new it-is-glorious-to-be-rich game plan.

But in terms of modern (post-1911) Chinese history, there have been very few overtly political religious movements. The myriad groups, such as TIAN DAO, that rose in the 1930s generally had no avowed political agendas. And since the Communist victory in 1949, all but the largest religious organizations, such as Catholicism and Buddhism, have been repressed in mainland China. In this sociopolitical sense of being a political player, Falun Gong is unique among modern Chinese religious movements.

Falun Gong's success is most likely tied to a combination of the appeal of a clear, simple exercise and ritual practice with the vision expressed in Li Hongzhi's teachings. Clearly, it is not enough to say that Falun Dafa grew simply because it filled a gap in a rapidly transforming Chinese sociospiritual landscape, a gap associated with recent liberalization and modernization of China's economy; the many chapters overseas indicate it appeals to people untouched by China's rapid economic transformation as well.

The treatment of Falun Gong is often portrayed as an example of human rights violations in China, and consequently the group continues to surface as an international news subject. Falun Gong's prospects solely as a religious movement, however, are unclear. Falun Gong may continue to survive outside China simply as one of many spiritual-religious groups based on traditional Chinese cultural practices. Falun Gong has established numerous national organizations throughout the Chinese communities in the diaspora world. They are best contacted through the many Internet sites.

A major source of information on Falun Gong is the Internet. There one may easily find numerous sites in a variety of languages from a variety of perspectives. Especially good starting points are some of the official Falun Gong sites, such as <http://www.faluninfo.net> and <http://falundafa.org/eng/books.htm>. From the latter site, the complete text of Master Li's main book, Zhuan Falun, may be downloaded, and additional books have been posted at other sites. For a learned appraisal and periodically updated bibliography, see the site maintained at the Sinological Institute at the University of Leiden, <http://www.let.leidenuniv.nl/bth/falun.htm>.

Edward Irons

Sources:

- Li Hongzhi. Falun Buddha Law (Lectures in the United States). Hong Kong: Falun Fo Fa Publishing Company, 1999.
- Wong, John, and William Ti Liu. The Mystery of China's Falun Gong: Its Rise and Sociological Implications. Singapore: World Scientific Publishing/Singapore University Press, 1999.

The Family/Children of God

The Family, originally known as the Children of God (COG), emerged out of the Jesus People Movement of the late 1960s. David Brandt Berg (1919–1994), an itinerant evangelist loosely associated with the CHRISTIAN AND MISSIONARY ALLIANCE, established the movement in 1968 in Southern California. COG soon developed into a highly structured communal organization noted for an aggressive style of evangelism, high levels of tension with the outside world, strong internal discipline, and sustained anti-establishment rhetoric aimed at American society and the conventional churches of the day.

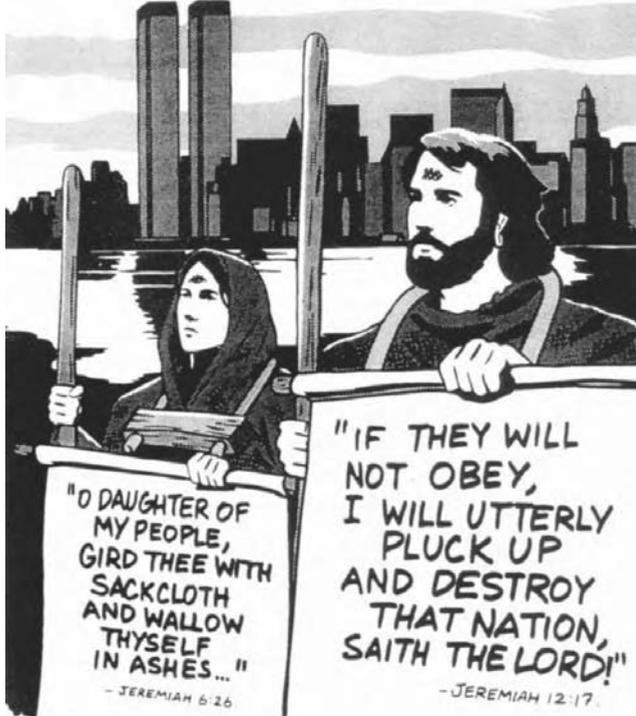

In 1969, Berg (known until his death as Father David) took his young disciples on the road, eventually establishing a permanent community on a ranch near Thurber, Texas. Here the organization grew to over two hundred young people, and the basic pattern of community life was established. In 1972, Berg ordered his disciples out of North America to begin the missionary task of reaching the entire world with the message of Jesus. Throughout the 1970s, the movement grew and flourished. Berg withdrew from personal contact with members, but maintained control through the leadership structure and his written correspondence, known as MO Letters.

In 1978, due to serious internal conflicts and a leadership crisis, Berg fired almost all of the administrative personnel and essentially disbanded the organization. Continuing individual communities maintained ties through written correspondence. Other disciples formed smaller units and traveled nomadically. In 1980, Berg called the communities together again as the Family of Love, then simply The Family. By this time he had selected a young woman, Maria, from among the members as his spouse and successor.

In 1976, Berg introduced a revolutionary new sexual ethic. "Flirty Fishing," the use of sexual allure up to and including sexual intercourse, was advocated as a means of witnessing and establishing supportive friends. Family women began frequenting bars and nightclubs, and some joined escort services in order to meet potential converts and establish relationships with potential supporters. Flirty Fishing was never intended as a recruitment tool for new disciples, and few joined as a result of being "fished." However, a substantial number of disciples left the movement in response to this sharp change in sexual ethic.

The new sexual ethos also included open sexual relationships between disciples, termed "sharing." Disciples were allowed and encouraged to establish sexual fellowship with other members. Consent of all parties was required, but many homes experienced substantial social pressure to participate in this new aspect of Family life. Nudity and open sexuality became common features of most Family homes during the early 1980s.

WOE TO AMERICA!

Publication of the Children of God. Special Collections, Davidson Library, University of California–Santa Barbara.

A number of disciples interpreted some of Berg's writings and his example as authorizing sexual contact between children and between minors and adults. Family children were considered adults when they turned twelve years of age, and sexual contact between adults and young teens was common during the early 1980s. In 1986, Maria became aware of a number of problems regarding teen-adult sex. Rigid age categories were defined, and sexual contact between adults and minors was prohibited. Flirty Fishing was discontinued the next year, and sexual contact with outsiders is now strictly forbidden. Sexual sharing among consenting adults continues, but sex between adults and minors is an excommunication offense. In the late 1990s, Maria introduced a new form of autoerotic religious sexual practice called Loving Jesus.

From the beginning, the Children of God focused primarily on a spiritual mission. In 1991, Berg issued a message entitled "Consider the Poor," directing members to begin assisting the poor and helpless "just like Jesus did." Disciples now conduct ministries to prisons, street gangs, illegal aliens, refugees, unwed mothers, drug addicts, and abused children all over the world.

In October of 1994, Berg died. Shortly after his death, Maria and Peter Amsterdam were married and now lead the Family together. In 1994, they issued the "Love Charter," which spelled out the rights and responsibilities of Family members. Although final authority remained at the top, local leadership became far more democratic, and disciple life became less regimented.

The Family does not reveal the address of its leadership, and contact is best made through one of its homes or through the Internet. There is an official Family site at the address given below, and a number of sites sponsored by various continental and national units. By 1986, the greater percentage of disciples and the bulk of the missionary enterprise were located in Latin America and Asia. They had a particularly strong presence in India, Thailand, Japan, the Philippines, Argentina, and Brazil. With the collapse of the Soviet Union in 1989, a new missionary field opened, and in the early 1990s hundreds of disciples left for Eastern Europe. The vast majority were second-generation members under age twenty-five. In the late 1990s, Family leadership identified Africa as the next area of focus, and over the past five years numerous Family homes have been established there.

In 1989, the Family drew a distinction between members who were willing and able to carry the full burden of disciple life, and those unwilling or unable to bear the yoke of full-time membership. Fully committed disciples are known as Charter Members, and the less committed are Fellow Members. Additionally, Family homes maintain relationships with Outside Members. These are persons who have been led to faith in Jesus and look to the Family for religious guidance and instruction, but have never joined as full-time disciples. In the year 2000, The Family moved to place greater emphasis on the care and spiritual development of Outside Members.

The Family is a highly diverse movement, counting disciples from a wide range of national, ethnic, racial, and socioeconomic backgrounds. Family theology has generally reflected its Evangelical Protestant roots. Members are bound together by a set of core theological beliefs. These core beliefs center on Jesus and salvation, Berg as God's Prophet, the End Times, and the Spirit World.

From the very beginning, the disciples have understood themselves as Jesus people. They pray to Jesus, sing to Jesus, and spend their lives telling others about Jesus. And the disciples are convinced that they are the true and most dedicated followers of Jesus. Personal salvation through faith in Jesus Christ is the linchpin of Family theology. Witnessing for Jesus and persuading others to pray to receive Jesus as their savior is the defining task of disciple life.

David Berg is the defining personality of the Family. By the early 1970s, he had defined his role as God's Prophet for the End Times as an essential aspect of Family life. Berg claimed absolute spiritual and political authority over his young charges. The disciples have a high view of the Bible, and use Father David's writings as authoritative interpretations of the Scripture. Today, Maria is acknowledged as Berg's successor and God's Prophetess.

It is believed that Berg still leads the Family from the Spirit World. He speaks regularly through dreams and prophetic experiences of Maria, Peter, and other Family members. Direct encounter with Jesus, Berg, departed saints, and other residents of the Spirit World is a regular feature of Family life.

Family disciples hold End Time beliefs similar to those held widely in the Evangelical Protestant world. The Antichrist will arise and take over the world, persecuting Jesus' followers. During this time of tribulation, the disciples will suffer greatly, but also lead the other Christians in resistance to the Antichrist. Jesus will return and defeat the Antichrist at the Battle of Armageddon, establishing a thousand-year reign of peace on the earth. At the end of the thousand years, Satan will be released for one final confrontation. After Jesus defeats Satan, God will judge the world and establish the Kingdom of Heaven, in which Family disciples will serve as rulers and priests. Family theology is distinguished by the special role assigned Family disciples, and the intensity of their conviction that The End is near.

Total commitment is another significant aspect of the Family belief system. Disciples must forsake all and commit their lives to witnessing and Family duties. Disciples generally relinquish most contacts with the outside world. With the Love Charter and the growing number of Fellow Members, Family literature now acknowledges "concentric circles" of commitment, though total commitment is still the ideal.

Recruitment of new disciples was a high priority until the late 1980s, when the Family began looking to the second generation as the key to growth and survival. The Family continues to recruit new disciples, but at a much more modest pace. At the end of 2000, Family membership stood at 8,951 Charter Members and 3,156 Fellow Members, of which approximately 4,000 were children under the age of twelve, 3,500 were young people aged twelve to twenty-one, and 4,500 were adults. They live in 1,426 homes scattered over 100 countries. There were approximately 55,000 Outside Members.

The normal Family term for the broader society is "the System." Since the earliest days of the Children of God, the disciples have lived in high tension with the System. Disciples generally limited interaction with outsiders to witnessing and raising funds. However, as an increasing number of teens and young adults left the movement, parents have attempted to maintain contact with their children, thus softening the hard line between insider and outsider.

The Family's peculiar lifestyle generated considerable hostility and even persecution from the social environment. Through the years, the Family response had been to go underground. However, beginning in 1989, Family adults were accused of physically and sexually abusing their children. Homes worldwide were subject to raids by law enforcement and social service agencies. To date (2001), all children taken into "protective custody" have been returned to their parents, and no disciple has been convicted of any offense. However, the ongoing ordeal forced the Family into greater interaction with the legal system, social service agencies, and the academy.

Address:

<http://www.thefamily.org>

James Chancellor

Sources:

- Chancellor, James D. Life in the Family: An Oral History of the Children of God. Syracuse, NY: Syracuse University Press, 2000.
- Fontaine, David, and John Weaver. Thrilling Pictures of the Future! Zurich, Switzerland: World Services, 1989.
- Lewis, James R., and J. Gordon Melton, eds. Sex, Slander and Salvation: Investigation of the Family/Children of God. Stanford, CA: Center for Academic Publication, 1994.
- The Love Charter*. Zurich, Switzerland: The Family, 1998.
- Van Zandt, David. Living in the Children of God. Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1991.

Fatima (Portugal)

Among the most important Marian apparitions and messages in the history of the ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH are those of Fatima, which were vouchsafed to three children between May 13 and October 13, 1917. Fatima has been recognized as a place of pilgrimage since 1930, drawing about 5 million visitors a year. Especially after World War II, devotion to Our Lady of Fatima has spread worldwide, and is expressed, among other ways, through active support from Rome, and in dozens of church-acknowledged branch shrines elsewhere in the world.

In addition to being a "mainstream" Marian devotion, Fatima has a particular function as a standard-bearer for a conservative, even fundamentalist Marian movement, composed of a large number of conservative Catholic groups and institutions, some acknowledged by the church and some not, which take their inspiration from the messages (including the secret messages) that were given at Fatima. As a rule these groups function autonomously, are often well organized, sometimes have large numbers of adherents (e.g., Marian Movement of Priests, <http://www.msm-mmp.org>, 100,000; Blue Army of Fatima, c/o World Apostolate of Fatima, P.O. Box 976, Mountain View Rd., Washington, NJ 07882, <http://www.bluearmy.com>, more than 10 million), and command ample resources.

According to the organizations and devotees involved, the messages of Fatima should form the basis for a worldwide reevangelization and missionary program, in order to save the degenerate world and church from the ever-present Satan. Among the typical themes in the messages are penitence, prayer, conversion of all sinners, the rosary, war, and anticommunism. Only after the world gives itself over to the Immaculate Heart of Mary (and acknowledges her salvific work) and the conversion of Russia takes place will a Kingdom of Peace will be realized on earth, in which all those who subject themselves to the pope will be protected against the Devil. The formal dedication of Russia occurred in 1942. Even after this dedication, the Third Secret of Fatima, which the visionary Lucia (or Lucy, b. 1907) shared only with the pope, continued to inspire for end-time prophecies and speculations of an eschatological and apocalyptic nature about the further course of the world and the concrete beginning of the end times. During the Cold War, Our Lady of Fatima was the model for the church in the struggle against communism, atheism, and apostasy. Since the 1970s the interpretation of the messages has begun to take on a life of its own, and Fatima has increasingly begun to function as the paradigm for new fringe devotions, often in connection with new Marian apparitions.

The fall of the Communist regimes, growing interest in the end of the world caused by the millennium, and his own personal devotion to Fatima led Pope John Paul II to reveal the Third Secret in 2000. The content appeared less dramatic and apocalyptic than many had expected. Fundamentalist circles suggest that the message has not yet been fully revealed, and that the end of time will not begin in 2000 but some years later. In this way Fatima remains an important source of nourishment for groups and individuals within the World Network of MARIAN DEVOTION.

Addresses:

Santuário de Nossa Senhora de Fátima
Apartado 31
2496–908 Fátima
Portugal
<http://www.santuاريو-fatima.pt>

Serviço de Peregrinos
sepe@santuاريو-fatima.pt

Peter Jan Margry

Sources:

Kohle, Hubert. "Fundamentalistische Marienbewegungen." In Handbuch der Marienkunde, edited by Wolfgang Beinert and Heinrich Petri, vol. 2. Regensburg: F. Pustet, 1997.

Michael, Bro. Third Secret of Fatima. Rockford, IL: TAN Publishers, 1988.

Pelletier, Joseph A. The Sun Danced: Revised and Expanded. New York: Image Books, 1983.

Rossi, Severo, and Aventino de Oliveira. Fatima. Fatima, Portugal: Cinsolata Missions' Publications, 1994.

Walsh, William T. Our Lady of Fatima. New York: Image Books, 1954.

Zimdars-Swarts, Sandra L. Encountering Mary: Visions of Mary from La Salette to Medjugorje. New York: Avon Books, 1992.

Federation of Swiss Protestant Churches

The Reformation in Switzerland began in 1521 in Zurich, where Ulrich Zwingli (1484–1531), one of the more radical voices of the period, was pastoring. Reformed ideas spread through the German-speaking cantons during the remainder of the decade and were evident in the French-speaking territories by the beginning of the 1530s. Zwingli had read Martin Luther's writings as they appeared, and he came to believe that only that which the Bible taught should be binding upon Christians or allowable in the church. This principle took the Lutheran Reformation principle that those things which the Bible prohibited should be abandoned one step further. Thus Zwingli moved to get rid of church vestments, statues of saints, and the Mass (to be replaced with a simplified memorial meal, the Lord's Supper). In 1524, he married.

Zwingli was killed in a battle with the Catholic cantons. The battle proved decisive, in that the spread of the Reformation in Switzerland was essentially halted at that point. By the end of the decade, the Swiss phase of the Reformation had a new champion in the person of Jean Calvin (1509–1564). A Frenchman, Calvin moved to Geneva somewhat by accident in 1536, the year his magnum opus, The Institutes of the Christian Religion, was published. He initially attempted to build a model community, but ran into opposition that forced him from the city. However, he returned in 1541 and remained the head of the church until his death.

The Institutes of the Christian Religion essentially defined the Reformed faith. Calvin affirmed the basic Lutheran positions of biblical authority and salvation by faith as the free gift of God, as opposed to what the Reformers saw as the Roman Catholic position, advocating a system of salvation by human works. Calvin differed from Luther on the sacraments, teaching that Christ's presence in the Eucharist was spiritual rather than real. This position also differed from Zwingli's understanding of the Lord's Supper as in essence a memorial meal (a position later championed by the BAPTISTS and most FREE CHURCH groups).

Calvin's Geneva became the disseminating point of the Reformed Church, which spread eastward to Hungary and westward to Holland and the British Isles. Swiss Protestants were able to join in a united front when Calvin worked out an agreement with Heinrich Bullinger, Zwingli's successor in Zurich. The agreement was written up in the Consensus Tiguinus in 1549.

The Reformed position could also be seen as broadly opposed to the Free Church position. Christianity was viewed as intimately integrated with the state, and Calvin spent his time keeping the state from interfering with the church, while asking the church to move against those who taught other than Reformed theology. Like Zwingli, he opposed the Anabaptists, who argued for a church separated from the state and open only to those who accepted Christ as adults and were subsequently baptized. Reformed churches aimed to be coterminous with the state and to baptize all its citizens as infants. The Reformed Protestant position was published in a series of confessional documents, the Second Helvetic Confession, authored by Bullinger in 1566, being especially important. Over the centuries these have tended to become less authoritative among Swiss Protestants.

For several centuries, the Protestant churches existed as separate state churches, one in each of the cantons. In 1884, the Swiss Confederation was instituted. A decade later a Swiss Church Conference began meeting annually. Then in 1920, the Federation of Swiss Protestant Churches was founded, as a result of probes by the Federal Council of Churches in the United States, which was seeking a European partner to coordinate its efforts to rebuild Europe after the destruction of World War I. The Methodists aligned with the Federation in 1922.

The Federation now includes twenty-two canonical churches, the Evangelical-Methodist Church of Switzerland, and the Free Church of Geneva. It exists as an association of the Reformed churches in Switzerland, but performs many denominational functions, such as holding the membership of those churches in the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES and the WORLD ALLIANCE OF REFORMED CHURCHES. The member churches vary in membership from the large church in the Canton of Bern, with more than 700,000 members, to those in predominantly Roman Catholic cantons such as Ticino and Glarus, with only about 20,000 members in each.

The several larger member churches support a set of theological schools in Switzerland. The churches have a structure that models that of the Swiss cantons; they are supported by state funds.

The Swiss Protestant community was significantly affected by the Pietist movement, a movement emphasizing personal religious faith. That movement led to the establishment of a variety of Free Churches, opposed to state interference in church life, and to the establishment of a variety of organizations that helped revive faith in the life of the churches. Among the more important was the BASEL MISSION, founded in 1815, which became one of the important structures carrying Protestantism around the world in the nineteenth century. The Basel Mission drew support from both Lutheran and Reformed churches in Switzerland, Germany, and Austria.

Address:

Federation of Swiss Protestant Churches
Postfach 36
Sulgenauweg 26
3000 Bern 23
Switzerland
<http://www.ref.ch> (in German)

Sources:

Bauswein, Jean-Jacques, and Lukas Vischer, eds. The Reformed Family Worldwide: A Survey of Reformed Churches, Theological Schools, and International Organizations. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans, 1999.
Westin, Gunnar. The Free Church through the Ages. Nashville, TN: Broadman Press, 1958.

Fellowship of Irian Jaya Baptist Churches

The Fellowship of Irian Jaya Baptist Churches (Persekutuan Gereja-Gereja Baptis Irian Jaya) began in the 1950s with the work of Mennonites from Holland who began a mission in Irian Jaya, the eastern half of the island of New Guinea, now a part of Indonesia. They established churches in the Bird's Head region in northwest Irian Jaya near the border with Papua New Guinea. The Mennonite missionaries withdrew in 1963, when Irian Jaya was incorporated into Indonesia, but the work they had founded continued.

In 1955 missionaries connected with the Baptist Union of Australia expanded their work in Papua New Guinea to Irian Jaya. It was their desire to reach those peoples who were still following their traditional religion. Evangelism began among the Dani people in the Balien Valley the following year. The first converts were received in 1962; however, the sight of the burning of their traditional religious artifacts angered many, and four months after the baptismal ceremony, some of the traditionalists attacked and killed some of the converts. This action was broadly condemned, and the dead, considered to be martyrs for the church, became a catalyst that led to heightened growth. The Fellowship of Irian Jaya Baptist Churches was founded in 1966 among the Dani believers.

In 1977 some of the leaders of the fellowship were in Jayapura, the regional capital in northwest Irian Jaya, and there encountered some university students who had grown up in the churches founded by the Mennonites. This chance encounter led to communication between the two groups, and the Mennonite work was later merged into the fellowship.

In the 1990s the fellowship reported 49,000 members in 170 congregations. It is a member of the BAPTIST WORLD ALLIANCE.

Address:

Fellowship of Irian Java Baptist Churches
Kotari, Jayapura
Irian Jaya, Kotak Pos 1212
Jayapura 99012
Indonesia

Sources:

Nance, John Irvin. "A History of the Indonesian Baptist Mission, 1950–1960." M.A. thesis, Baylor University, 1969.
Wardin, Albert W., ed. Baptists around the World. Nashville: Broadman and Holman, 1995.

Fellowship of Isis

The Fellowship of Isis (FOI) was founded in 1976 by Olivia Robertson (b. 1917) and her brother and sister-in-law, Lawrence and Pamela Durdin-Robertson. Since Lawrence Durdin-Robertson's death (1994), it has been led by Olivia Robertson. Succession planning in January 1999 created a decentralized organization with an Archpriesthood Union of thirty-two archpriestesses and archpriests acting as Custodians of the FOI.

The Fellowship of Isis is multi-religious, multi-racial, and multi-cultural, and members are free to maintain other religious allegiances. The FOI is active in interfaith dialogue and took part in the Parliament of the World's Religions Centennial Session in 1993. Olivia Robertson was one of the two women and sixteen men who gave platform addresses at the opening plenary. The FOI considers the Parliament to be an important stepping-stone in worldwide acceptance of Goddess worship.

As of December 2000, the FOI had around 18,500 members in 93 countries. Outside Western countries, the FOI is particularly active in Nigeria. The Fellowship of Isis has three principles that all members acknowledge—Love, Beauty, and Truth, which are considered to be the divine attributes of the Goddess. Membership is seen as a way to promote closer communion between members and the Goddess. Although it was founded to promote Goddess worship, the FOI is not exclusively a Goddess organization, and male deities are also venerated.

The FOI has around 700 Iseums, mainly in members' own homes. These are considered Hearths of the Goddess. They offer initiation, celebratory rites, and fellowship. A standard liturgy of rites is available for group worship, but Iseums are free to adapt these to their own needs. Members may conduct their own rites, but if they wish, women and men may train for the priesthood. Training in the priesthood is provided through around 110 College of Isis Lyceums. Each Lyceum provides an original course of study, culminating in a rite from the Lyceum Liturgy. There are around 950 priestesses and priests. The priesthood is believed to be linked to Ancient Egypt through Olivia and

Lawrence Durdin-Robertson's descent from a hereditary priesthood. For those who are not called to the priesthood, there is a system of personal initiation involving thirty-two initiation rites and a thirty-third level of "spontaneous mystical awakening."

The Fellowship of Isis publishes a magazine, Isian News, available by subscription. Membership itself is free, and the number of members does not indicate the number of active members. The Fellowship of Isis also has its own Druid Order, with fifty-six groves, and a body called the Noble Order of Tara that focuses on nature conservation. The Fellowship of Isis has a strong environmental ethos and venerates all life, animal, plant, and mineral. Every human, animal, bird, and tree is considered to be "an eternal offspring of the Mother Goddess's Divine Family of Life."

Address:

Fellowship of Isis
Clonegal Castle
Enniscorthy
Ireland
<http://www.fellowshipofisis.com>

Vivienne Crowley

Sources:

Adler, Margot. Drawing Down the Moon: The Resurgence of Paganism in America. New York: Penguin, 1997.
Fellowship of Isis. Fellowship of Isis Handbook. Enniscorthy, Ireland: Fellowship of Isis, n.d.
Witt, R. E. Isis in the Graeco-Roman World. London: Thames and Hudson, 1971.

Fiji Islands

The Fiji Islands are an archipelago in the South Pacific that appears to have been populated as early as 2000 B.C.E. Of the approximately 500 islands, Viti Levu and Vanua Levu, are the largest. Rotuma, an island some 400 miles north, is a dependency of Fiji. Melanesians settled there in the sixth century B.C.E. They were first contacted by Europeans in 1643, by Abel Tasman (1603–1659) (for whom Tasmania would later be named). Subsequently, James Cook (1728–1779) visited in 1774, and in 1789 William Bligh (1754–1817), the famous captain of the H.M.S. Bounty, stopped there and wrote the first lengthy account of island life.

Toward the beginning of the nineteenth century, a Fijian leader, Na Ulivau, was able to unite the islands into one community. Then in 1830, the first Christian missionaries arrived, representatives of the LONDON MISSIONARY SOCIETY (LMS). However, by agreement among the Protestant missionaries working in the South Seas, the Methodists received hegemony over Fiji, and in 1835 the LMS missionaries withdrew and two British Methodists assumed their post. They made little progress until 1854, when Na Ulivau's son, Ratu Seru Cakobau, converted and was baptized. The new king went on to become a great admirer of the Western world, and in 1858 actually offered his kingdom for annexation to the United States. Caught up in the approaching Civil War, the government ignored his offer.

Eventually, England annexed Fiji in 1874, and began the development of large sugar plantations. The local inhabitants would not leave their land to work the plantations, and in 1879 the British began importing laborers from India. Eventually, the Indians brought their wives from their homeland and settled in Fiji. They soon constituted the majority of the population, a fact that has been a continual source of conflict. The island became independent in 1970.

The ancient religion of the Melanesians predominated on the Fiji Islands until the nineteenth century. It has virtually disappeared as a distinct religion, though remnants remain that are kept alive in periodic revivals of traditional culture. In 1885, the prophet Ndungumoi arose as a spokesperson of traditional religion, and led a movement opposed to the further spread of Christianity. His movement was notable for its espousal of ritual cannibalism.

The British METHODIST CHURCH had a twenty-five-year head start on other Protestant churches in building its work and remains the largest religious group on the islands. After the Indians began arriving in numbers, in 1892 the church opened an Indian Mission. The church had over the years been closely identified with the Fijian government and was severely affected by the coup that occurred in 1987 and by the political unrest during the 1990s. The METHODIST CHURCH IN FIJI AND ROTUMA is the only Fijian-based church in the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES.

The Church of England established its initial work in the Islands in 1860. The present-day Anglican parishes are part of the ANGLICAN CHURCH IN AOTEAROA, NEW ZEALAND, AND POLYNESIA. It was followed by missionaries from the Presbyterian Church (1876) and the SEVENTH-DAY ADVENTIST CHURCH (1989). Through the twentieth century, a variety of Protestant groups, from the ASSEMBLIES OF GOD to the CHRISTIAN BROTHERS, have also arrived.

Status of religions in Fiji, 2000-2050

Followers	2000			2025	2050
	total	%	rate
Christians	464,000	56.8	1.24	621,000	760,000
Protestants	375,000	45.9	1.41	500,000	590,000
Independents	86,000	10.5	2.38	130,000	160,000
Roman Catholics	85,000	10.4	1.67	120,000	150,000
Hindus	272,000	33.3	1.10	366,000	395,000
Muslims	56,000	6.9	1.02	75,000	88,000
Nonreligious	10,800	1.3	1.82	20,000	40,000
Baha'is	5,700	0.7	1.69	8,700	10,000
Sikhs	5,300	0.7	1.68	8,500	10,800
Chinese folk-religionists	3,100	0.4	0.90	4,600	6,000
Ethnoreligionists	300	0.0	1.03	400	500
Jews	110	0.0	0.87	130	150
Total population	817,000	100.0	1.18	1,104,000	1,310,000

The older missionary churches operating in Fiji formed the Fiji Council of Churches in 1924. It is affiliated with the World Council of Churches (WCC). Also, the regional Pacific Conference of Churches, itself affiliated with the WCC, is headquartered in Suva, Fiji. One result of this cooperative activity was the creation of the Pacific Theological School in 1966 with the sponsorship of the Anglicans, Methodists, Congregationalists, and Presbyterians.

Among the more interesting groups on the islands are several indigenous movements, such as the Church of Time (1945) and the Messiah Club (1965), both schisms of the Methodist Church. The Jehovah's Witnesses, the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints (who have a special role for South Sea islanders in their understanding of salvation), and the Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints are active in Fiji. The Church of Christ, Scientist, presence, visible in the 1970s, has disappeared.

The Indian laborers brought Hinduism, in several varieties, with them. Of the 60,000 who arrived prior to World War I, one-fourth were from South India and the rest from North India. The ARYA SAMAJ, a nineteenth-century reform movement opposed to temple worship, was brought to Fiji by the North Indians. In opposition, representatives of the Sanatan Dharm, based in the more traditional temple worship, establishes what is now the largest group in the Hindu Community of the Fiji Islands. Competing with it are the TISI Sangam and the Gujarati Samaj, both more traditional groups serving Telugu-speaking and Gujarati-speaking segments of the population. All three have emphasized the construction of temples and the preservation of traditional worship. It is the largest group in the Hindu Community of the Fiji Islands. Fiji has also participated in the popular spread of Hinduism worldwide. The INTERNATIONAL SOCIETY FOR KRISHNA CONSCIOUSNESS, formed in New York in 1965, has established a Krishna temple in Lautoka, and ADIDAM, an Advaita Vedanta group, purchased one of the Fijian islands as a home for its guru.

Islam also came to Fiji through the immigration of Indians (and Pakistanis). Their community includes both Sunnis and Shi'as. Most Muslims are related to the Fiji Muslim League, which in 2000 reported some 56,000 Muslims in Fiji. It cooperates with the Islamic Council for the South Pacific, founded in 1984, which promotes cooperation among Muslims in Australia, New Zealand, Papua New Guinea, Fiji, Venuatu, and Tonga, and the Regional Islamic Da'wa Council for South East Asia and the Pacific, based in Kuala Lumpur, Malaysia. There is also an active group of Ahmadiyyas, which may have the allegiance of as many as a third of the islands' Muslims.

Several thousand Sikhs from the Punjab joined in the migration of workers from India. More recently, spiritual assemblies of the BAHAI FAITH have appeared.

The division of the country into two groupings, one of native Fijians and one of Indian origin, has become an increasing problem in Fiji since World War II. In 1987, Fiji was the subject of a military coup led by people who believed that the native Fijians were being deprived of their rights. The coup led to a new constitution being promulgated in 1990. Then in 2000, during the term in office of Mahendra Chaudhry, the country's first prime minister of Indian descent, a second coup attempt occurred, which led to the country being taken over by the military. The coup attempts placed the Methodists, the largest religious body in Fiji, whose membership is almost totally native Fijians, in the middle. Many identified the church with the failed Fijian coup attempts.

Sources:

Foreman, J. C. W., ed. Island Churches: Challenge and Change. Suva, Fiji: University of the South Pacific/Institute of Pacific Studies, 1992.

Forman, Charles H. The Island Churches of the South Pacific: Emergence in the Twentieth Century. Maryknoll, NY: Orbis, 1982.

Garrett, J. To Live among the Stars: Christian Origins in Oceania. Geneva, Switzerland: World Council of Churches in cooperation with the University of the South Pacific/Institute of Pacific Studies, 1982.

Ross, C. S. Churches and Church Workers in Fiji. Victoria, Australia: H. Thacker, 1909.

Fiji Islands, Hindu Community of the Hinduism came to Fiji with the indentured laborers who were brought from India to Fiji by the British colonialists to work on plantations. Indentured migration to Fiji took place between 1879 and 1916 and involved some 60,000 Indians (45,000 from North India, 15,000 from the South), 80 percent of whom were Hindus. The majority of them decided to stay in Fiji after the end of their indenture, and they were later joined by free migrants from Gujarat and Punjab. According to the 1996 national census, there were 261,097 Hindus in Fiji (259,775 were of Indian origin, the others being converts from other ethnic groups) and 3,076 Sikhs. The overall number of Indo-Fijians was 338,818, or 44 percent of Fiji's total population.

Whereas in India, Hinduism and the caste system are closely related, the latter determining social status, marriage, occupation, and commensality, the caste system did not even survive the journey of Hindus from India to Fiji, let alone plantation life in Fiji. Only the Brahmin status was re-created, while Hindus of all castes lived and ate together, did the same work, and even shared the scarce women. The fading away of the caste system meant that Hindu society in Fiji became more egalitarian and that religion lost its central position in life.

Since Hinduism is closely bound to the Indian soil with its holy rivers, shrines, and gods, a feeling of loss, rootlessness, and guilt is widespread among Hindus in the diaspora. This is one of a number of reasons why most Indo-Fijians cut all ties with India once they embarked on the ships. Free migrants on the other hand kept close ties to India and were therefore important in keeping Hindu traditions alive.

In the early decades, the absence of proper caste and family life meant that many traditional ceremonies were either not observed at all or persisted in a simplified form. A popularized ritualistic version of Hinduism with a focus on devotion and little intellectual content was practiced, rituals and ceremonies became the essence of the religion, and Brahmins derived their authority from a command of these rituals rather than from religious learning and an ideal lifestyle. From the plurality of Hindu practices in India, Indo-Fijians have chosen those that made most sense to them and their social and economic situation. The Ramayana became the most popular text, not only because it is simple and casteless, but more importantly because its central theme is exile, suffering, struggle, and eventual return. In the barracks of the indentured workers, the Ramayana was recited, and Ram Lila performances were staged.

Especially after the 1920s, a number of formal religious societies were established that were active in the religious, educational, and cultural fields. For North Indians the most important were the ARYA SAMAJ and the Sanatan Dharm, for South Indians the Then India Sanmarga Ikya Sangam (P.O. Box 9, Nadi, Fiji) or TISI Sangam. The Arya Samaj, officially known as Arya Pratinidhi Sabha of Fiji (1 Ono Street, Samabula, Suva, Fiji), started in 1904 but did not register officially until 1917. The major aim in these early years was the provision of educational facilities for Indian children at a time when Christians ran most schools and there was fear of conversion. On the religious side, Arya Samaj stands for simplified ceremonies, a rejection of the caste system and of idol worship, social reform, and conversion of non-Hindus. All these appealed to many Hindus in Fiji who were dissatisfied with the lack of intellectual content in traditional Hinduism, the time-consuming rituals, and idol worship. Today, there are about 20,000 Arya Samajis in Fiji, and their ceremonies, most importantly the fire ceremony, hawan, are held in schools throughout the country as well as in three community centers. The headquarters is in the capital, Suva.

Sanatan Dharm missionaries were called from India in the 1920s to support Hinduism in Fiji and combat the Arya Samaj. The first convention was held in 1934, and an official organization, Shree Sanatan Dharm Pratinidhi Sabha (P.O. Box 1082, Lautoka, Fiji), formed in 1958. Over the years, the majority of Hindus in Fiji accepted it as their organization. It maintains a number of schools and the majority of temples in Fiji.

The TISI Sangam, a regional organization for South Indians, was formed in 1926. In addition to religious, social, and educational work, it is devoted to the preservation of the Tamil and Malayalam languages. It maintains about thirty temples in the country. In 1941, South Indians of Telugu-speaking origin broke away and formed the Dakshina India Andhra Sangam of Fiji, which runs a few schools and one temple. Apart from these major organizations, there are a number of religious movements and religious-cum-cultural societies. The Gujarati Samaj is the major organization for the 6,000 Gujaratis. The Satya Sai Baba Organization (P.O. Box 271, Lautoka, Fiji) has about 2,500 followers and thirty-seven centers countrywide, with the headquarters in Fiji's second city, Lautoka. The INTERNATIONAL SOCIETY FOR KRISHNA CONSCIOUSNESS maintains a temple in Lautoka (Sri Krishna Kaliya Temple, 5 Tavewa Avenue, P.O. Box 125, Lautoka, Fiji) and three centers around the country. There are about 300 initiated followers in Fiji.

The Sri Siva Subramaniya Swami Hindu Temple on Levu Island, Fiji (M. Jelliffe/TRIP)

It is important to note that Hindus in Fiji have not come up with new religious movements or a distinct form of Hinduism that would reflect their unique experiences and needs in the diaspora, but have instead imported a variety of movements from India. There are no holy rivers or great places of pilgrimage in Fiji, though some places have acquired some importance, such as the Cobra Rock Temple outside Labasa, built around a snake-shaped rock that is believed to grow in size. In the course of the relatively short history of Hinduism in Fiji there has already been a major shift in ritual practices: During the first decades, Holi was the major Hindu festival in the annual calendar. At present Diwali is the principal festival and even a national holiday. This can be interpreted as a shift from play- and transcendence-oriented devotionism, with Lord Krishna in the center, to a duty- and perfection-oriented devotionism, focused on Lord Ram. Since no distinct form of Hinduism exists in Fiji, the estimated 100,000 Indo-Fijians who live outside Fiji (most of whom left after the military coups in 1987 and the subsequent state-sanctioned discrimination against them) are sharing temples with Hindus of other origins. In Australia and New Zealand, which are the major countries of resettlement, Indo-Fijians split along lines based on India's, not Fiji's, geography (South versus North Indians) in their choice of temple. However, Indo-Fijians have established branches of their major organizations, especially the Arya Samaj, Sanatan Dharm, and TISI Sangam.

Finland

Carmen Voigt-Graf

Sources:

Gillion, K. L. Fiji's Indian Migrants. Melbourne: Oxford University Press, 1962.
 Kelly, John D. "From Holi to Diwali in Fiji: An Essay on Ritual and History." Man 23, 1 (1988): 40–55.
 ———. A Politics of Virtue: Hinduism, Sexuality, and Countercolonial Discourse in Fiji. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1991.

Finland

The largest religious community in Finland is the EVANGELICAL LUTHERAN CHURCH OF FINLAND. In 1999, 85.3 percent of the population (approximately five million) were members of this church, and 1.1 percent belonged to the FINNISH ORTHODOX CHURCH. The third largest group was the Pentecostals, and the fourth was JEHOVAH'S WITNESSES. More than 10 percent did not belong to any religious communities, and those who dismiss religious beliefs as irrational have formed organizations in order to promote thinking and culture that is free from religious bonds, and have produced nonreligious ceremonies that can replace Christian baptism, wedding ceremonies, and so on. They think that freedom of thought, conscience, conviction, and religion are not yet achieved in society. The adherence to these organizations has so far been modest.

Finland was one of the last European countries to be reached by Christianity. The ancient religion of the Finns consisted of myths, worship of the dead, and worship of nature beings, sprites, and personal gods. There were also shamans and wise men. Worship of the dead was mainly based on the fear of ghosts. In the same way, worship of different beings like fairies, elves, and gnomes often aimed at propitiating these beings. Among the Sami people who

Status of religions in Finland, 2000-2050

Followers	2000			2025	2050
	total	%	rate
Christians	4,804,000	92.8	0.33	4,781,000	4,305,000
Protestants	4,635,000	89.6	0.30	4,650,000	4,250,000
Independents	77,700	1.5	2.04	105,000	120,000
Orthodox	55,900	1.1	-0.02	55,000	55,000
Nonreligious	281,000	5.4	1.08	350,000	440,000
Atheists	73,300	1.4	0.46	95,000	110,000
Muslims	9,200	0.2	1.64	15,000	25,000
Buddhists	2,500	0.1	2.44	4,500	6,000
Baha'is	1,700	0.0	1.12	2,000	2,400
Chinese folk-religionists	1,300	0.0	1.29	1,800	2,500
Jews	1,200	0.0	-0.14	1,300	1,300
Neoreligionists	520	0.0	2.62	800	1,000
other religionists	1,900	0.0	1.13	3,000	4,500
Total population	5,176,000	100.0	0.37	5,254,000	4,898,000

populate northernmost Finland, the pre-Christian religion was preserved longer than among the Finns, although they, too, later became Lutheran or Orthodox Christians. Finnish mythology is found in the nineteenth-century poem collection, the Kalevala. It is a work of one man, Elias Lönnrot (1802–1884), who collected the stories in different provinces of Finland but probably also wrote some parts himself. In the sixteenth century, the church reformer Mikael Agricola had published a list of ancient Finnish gods. Otherwise the sources of information about the old Finnish mythology are few. Today, there are some small groups of people, Neo-Pagans, who wish to revive the religion that Finns had before Christianity.

The first Christian influences have been traced to the ninth century. Items with Christian symbols and Christian vocabulary came from both east and west. Finnish culture and language are not related to the cultures and languages in neighboring countries (except Estonia): Finns are neither a Slavic nor a Scandinavian people. Christianity was established during the first three centuries of the second millennium, and in 1216 the Finland of that time became a part of the diocese of Uppsala (Sweden). Some years later, the first bishop of Finland was appointed. By the end of the thirteenth century, the ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH had established its position in the country.

The interior of the Lutheran Temppeliaukio Church in Helsinki, Finland (R. Belbin/TRIP)

The Lutheran phase of the Protestant Reformation of the sixteenth century reached Finland rather early, the first influences felt already in the 1520s. The Christian New Testament was published in Finnish in 1548. It was translated by Mikael Agricola, later a Lutheran bishop. His literary work had an impact far beyond the church, as it became significant for the literacy of the Finns, for the written Finnish language, and for the national literature.

In theological respects, the Reformation was carried out moderately in Finland, and the historic episcopal succession, or apostolic succession of bishops, was not broken. The most visible changes were abandoning Latin as the church language and regarding only baptism and Holy Communion as sacraments. Economically, the Reformation proved disastrous for the church in the Kingdom of Sweden, of which Finland was still a part. The church's wealth and much of its power were transferred to the king. This did not mean a disaster for Christianity, though, as the Reformation brought about a deepening of knowledge about the Christian faith among the people. Later, especially in the nineteenth century, several nationwide revivals were experienced among the people. Some of these took place in and still have influence in the Lutheran church. Others resulted in the establishment and growth of other denominations.

Besides the Lutheran church and the Pentecostal congregations, the strongest Protestant denomination is the Finnish Orthodox Church (14,000 members). It started at the end of the nineteenth century as a renewal movement inside the Lutheran church, but separated as an independent church after the declaration of religious freedom in 1923. The Roman Catholic Church, which had to close down its activities in the 1520s, returned to Finland at the end of the eighteenth century. Now there are 7,000 Catholics in the seven parishes of the Diocese of Helsinki. The number of Catholics, of whom many are foreigners, is increasing, and several Catholic religious orders have made their appearance.

The relations between churches became increasingly cordial through the twentieth century. The Ecumenical Council of Finland, which is the oldest ecumenical body in the country and which has also got the most member churches and organizations, was founded in 1917. The council includes twelve member churches and communities, and eighteen observers. A change in the relationship between the majority church and the minority churches occurred recently when the annual official church services (e.g., on the Independence Day), which members of the government and the parliament attend, became ecumenical.

Finnish Orthodox Church

The first Jews came to Finland from Sweden at the end of the eighteenth century, but the community has remained small. The majority of Jews have their roots in Russia. Today, there are two synagogues and 1,150 Jews in Finland. In Helsinki the Jewish community also maintains a kindergarten, a school, and a hospital.

The first Muslim community was founded in 1925 by Tatars who immigrated from Russia. This community retains much of its ethnic distinctiveness, as do most of the newer communities. There are not yet any Muslim schools, nor are there recognizable mosques. The registered Muslim communities are still small and few in number. Estimates on the actual size of Islam in Finland vary between fifteen and twenty thousand; however, the number of Muslims in Finland is increasing, mainly due to immigration.

Several internationally known new religious movements are present in Finland, but they have remained small. Only JEHOVAH'S WITNESSES and the CHURCH OF JESUS CHRIST OF LATTER-DAY SAINTS have gained a notable numbers of members. There are no remarkable indigenous new religious movements.

Religious freedom is guaranteed for everyone, as far as the activities involved are not otherwise in opposition to the law. The legislation came into force in 1923. In autumn 2000, a proposal for a reform of the freedom of religion legislation will be presented to parliament.

Laura Maria Latikka

Sources:

- Heino, Harri. Changes in Religiosity from the Finnish Viewpoint. Publication No. 37 of the Research Institute of the Lutheran Church in Finland. Tampere: Research Institute of the Lutheran Church in Finland, 1988.
- Pentikäinen, Juha. Kalevala Mythology. Translated and edited by Ritva Poom. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1989.
- . Cultural Minorities in Finland. An Overview towards Cultural Policy. Edited by J. Hiltunen. Helsinki: Publications of the Finnish National Commission for UNESCO, 1995.
- . Shamanism and Culture. Tampere: Etnika, 1998.

Finnish Orthodox Church

The roots of the Finnish Orthodox Church lie in the missionary work done at the beginning of the second millennium in the easternmost area settled by Finnish tribes, that is, the province of Karelia. This work primarily originated from the monasteries, and was carried out by Orthodox monks. The monastery at Valamo, founded according to tradition by the Greek-born monk Sergius and his younger assistant, Herman, was the most important base. As time went by, several other monasteries were found to back up the church's work. None of the Orthodox parts of Karelia formed part of Sweden-Finland politically until the latter half of the sixteenth century, and more came to do so in the seventeenth century. In 1809–1917, when Finland was a Grand Duchy of the Russian Empire, a separate diocese was established for the Orthodox parishes (1892), centered on Vyborg (Karelia). When Finland became independent in 1917, the church's administrative links with the Russian church were broken. After various intermediate stages, the Orthodox church's standing in Finland was formalized through government action: In 1923 it canonically became an autonomous Orthodox church under the Ecumenical Patriarch of Constantinople, gaining extensive self-government in internal matters. As early as 1918 the Finnish government had endorsed, through a special decree, its status as the second national church, the other being the EVANGELICAL LUTHERAN CHURCH OF FINLAND. The Current Act on the Orthodox Church of Finland dates from 1969, with a supplementary decree the following year. Administratively, the Finnish Orthodox Church, which has over 58,000 members, is divided into three dioceses: Karelia, Helsinki, and Oulu. The bishop of the diocese of Karelia is also archbishop (Archbishop John, Archbishop of Karelia and All Finland), the other bishops being metropolitans (Metropolitan Leo of Helsinki and Metropolitan Ambrosius of Oulu). There is also an assistant bishop, called bishop of Joensuu (Bishop Panteleimon), in the Diocese of Karelia. The church's supreme decision-making body is the General Assembly, made up of representatives of the clergy and laymen, to which the bishops belong by right. Decisions on doctrines and canons must be ratified by the Bishops' Synod. The ordinary decision-making body is the Board of Administration, which consist of bishops, a priest, and laymen. General Assembly decisions can only become acts and decrees following approval by the Finnish state. The church's publications committee takes growing responsibility for all Orthodox literature published. The Orthodox periodicals with the largest circulation are Aamun Koitto, Ortodoksiviesti, and Paimen-Sanommat. The committee also publishes a theological yearbook and a periodical on Orthodox culture. The dioceses are divided into 25 parishes, many of which cover an extensive geographical area. There are some 140 churches and chapels, and about 133 clergy, more than 20 of them currently in retirement. There is one monastery (called in Finnish Uusi-Valamo, or simply Valamo) and one convent (Lintula convent). Most parishes use only Finnish for services, though Church Slavonic is also used regularly in Helsinki and occasionally in other places Swedish and Greek.

The Finnish Orthodox Church is primarily financed out of the church tax collected with the other national taxes and paid to the church by the state on a monthly basis. The salaries of the Orthodox clergy, for instance, come out of this money. The central and diocesan administrations are financed by the state. For seventy years (1918–1988), the Orthodox clergy were trained at a seminary maintained by the state. In 1988, however, the seminary was placed under the University of Joensuu, which has a Department of Orthodox and Western Theology for the purpose. There is also an Orthodox seminary subordinate to the church, which is responsible for service rituals and liturgical practices. The university trains teachers of religion and cantors as well as Orthodox priests. Religious instruction in public schools is confessional, and if there are enough of them, Orthodox pupils are entitled to separate instruction. The church usually arranges Orthodox teaching for groups too small to warrant this. The foreign and ecumenical contacts of the Orthodox Church of Finland have been growing steadily ever since the 1960s, and the Church is now a member of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES. The church has associated parishes among Finnish-Americans in the United States and in 1977 began cooperative work with the GREEK ORTHODOX PATRIARCHATE OF ALEXANDRIA AND ALL AFRICA in Kenya and Uganda. Since World War II, there has also been a growing interest in reviving the tradition of icon painting and there are several active groups at the moment in various parts of the country. This art form has awakened interest outside the Orthodox Church, too, like many other manifestations of Orthodox tradition and culture.

Address:

Finnish Orthodox Church
Karjalankatu 1
70110 Kuopio
Finland
<http://www.ort.fi>

Sources:

- Piironen, E. "The Orthodox Church in Finland." International Review of Mission 62, 245 (1973): 51–56.
Purmonen, V., ed. Orthodoxy in Finland: Past and Present. 2d ed. Kuopio, Finland: Orthodox Clergy Association, 1984.
Venkula-Vauraste, L. "800 Years of Orthodox Faith in Finland." Look at Finland 5 (1977): 42–47.

Foguangshan

Founded in Kaohsiung, Taiwan, in 1967, Foguangshan had by the close of the twentieth century developed into one of the most influential Buddhist organizations in the Republic of China and had opened nearly one hundred temples elsewhere around the world. The order's founder, Master Xingyun (b. 1927), took vows of renunciation at age twelve in 1939 at Qixia Temple in Nanjing, China. Ten years later, he followed the Nationalist army as it retreated to Taiwan. As his following among both mainland transplants and native Taiwanese grew, he established Foguangshan (Buddha's Light Mountain) in the southern part of the island. The monastery's eight-story-high statue of Amitabha Buddha and its Pure Land Cave (which was modeled on Disneyworld's "It's A Small, Small World") have over the years attracted millions of pilgrims and tourists.

Foguangshan is regarded as a leading exponent of Humanistic Buddhism (Renjian Fojiao), by which is meant a refocusing of Chan (Zen) and Pure Land practice to more directly deal with the challenges of contemporary life. Rather than exerting their efforts toward being reborn in a pure land elsewhere in the universe, as is usually advocated by the Pure Land School, people are exhorted to transform our own world into a pure land and thereby attain universal enlightenment. Master Xingyun believes that radical, confrontational reforms are not effective means for achieving that goal, since such tactics create too much suffering and remain within dualistic thinking. Instead, he espouses gradual amelioration through each person, whether monastic or lay, engaging in a daily regimen of recitation, meditation, and self-reflection, while simultaneously devoting the rest of their time to improving others' material and spiritual conditions. Hence, Foguangshan sponsors a variety of social, educational, and missionary enterprises, including two orphanages, a medical clinic, several preschools, a high school, and a liberal arts university.

Foguangshan projects are typically undertaken in cooperation with political and corporate leaders. Because of this, Master Xingyun's detractors have saddled him with the pejorative labels of "political monk" and "commercial monk." He counters that creating close working relationships with the powerful is an expedient means (in Chinese, fangbian; in Sanskrit, upaya) for achieving Buddhist goals.

Although improving people's material wellbeing is seen as essential to establishing a pure land on earth, the key to realizing such a utopia nonetheless remains cultivating people's wisdom and compassion through exposure to Buddhism. Foguangshan is therefore especially well known in Taiwan for its publishing empire, which includes a punctuated edition of the Buddhist canon, a six-volume encyclopedia of Buddhism, and scores of books, cassettes, and videos by Master Xingyun on Humanistic Buddhism. The emphasis on promoting Buddhist teachings is also seen in Foguangshan's missionary efforts. Although the vast majority of devotees in Foguang branch temples outside of Taiwan are overseas Chinese Buddhists, the organization has also devoted considerable energy to bringing others into its fold. Hsi Lai Temple (Hacienda Heights, California), Nan Tien Temple (Wollengong, Australia), and Nan Hua Temple (Bronkhorstspuit, South Africa) have been at the forefront of Foguangshan missionary activity.

Kari Rantila

Approximately thirteen hundred monks and nuns were within the Foguang ranks in the year 2000, and the order's lay society, known as the Buddha's Light International Association, had a membership of at least four hundred thousand and perhaps more than one million.

Address:

Foguangshan
Tashu Township
Kaohsiung County, Taiwan
Republic of China
<http://www.ibps.org>

Stuart Chandler

Sources:

Chandler, Christopher Stuart. "Establishing a Pureland on Earth: The Foguang Buddhist Perspective on Modernization and Globalization." Ph.D. dissertation, Harvard University, 2000.
Jiang Canteng. Taiwan Dangdai Fojiào. Taipei: Nantian Press, 1997.
Jones, Charles Brewer. Buddhism in Taiwan: Religion and State, 1660–1990. Honolulu: University of Hawai'i Press, 1999.

Foundation for the Preservation of the Mahayana Tradition

The founder of the Foundation for the Preservation of the Mahayana Tradition (FPMT), Lama Thubten Yeshe (1935–1984), was born in Tibet. He was identified as the reincarnation of the Abbess of Chi-me lung Gompa and joined Sera Je College near Lhasa, where he remained until he was twenty-five. In 1959 he fled into Northeast India along with many other Tibetans and there continued his studies. Here he met Lama Thubten Zopa Rinpoche (b. 1945), who became his first disciple. In 1965 the lamas first came into contact with a number of Westerners, many of whom were on the hippie trail to India, most importantly Zina Rechevsky, an American heiress. Her request to be taught by the lamas resulted in her ordination as a nun by the Dalai Lama in 1967. The trio moved to Nepal in 1969, where they founded Kopan monastery.

Over the following years Kopan attracted a large influx of Westerners, and the seeds of a new Buddhist movement were sown. Lama Yeshe developed a distinctive teaching style tailored to Western understanding and began to visit many groups, which had arisen throughout the West. By 1975 the extent of the movement was such that Lama Yeshe formed a group in order to oversee the diverse activities that were then taking place. This group was named the Council for the Preservation of the Mahayana Tradition (CPMT) and comprised directors of Dharma centers, rural retreat centers, and training institutes, which were all part of the expanding organization that came to be known as the FPMT. It has now spread into over twenty-six countries across four continents and is the most widespread Tibetan Gelugpa movement outside Tibet.

Lama Yeshe died of a heart attack in a Californian hospital in 1984, and Lama Zopa succeeded him as spiritual director. In 1984 Osel Hita Torres was born to Spanish parents and was soon identified by His Holiness the Dalai Lama as the reincarnation of Lama Yeshe. He is now training at Sera Je monastery in southern India. In the future he will replace Lama Zopa as the spiritual director of the FPMT.

Conishead Priory in the United Kingdom was purchased in 1976 and was named the Manjushri Center. It became a thriving training and retreat center under the spiritual directorship of Geshe Kelsang Gyatso. However tension grew between the FPMT, then situated far away in Nepal, and the Manjushri Center. After much antagonism the Manjushri Center eventually split away from the FPMT and a new movement, the NEW KADAMPA TRADITION, was founded under the spiritual guidance of Geshe Kelsang (b. 1931). The two groups have no affiliation today.

At present Lama Zopa Rinpoche remains the spiritual director, and his authority is shared with the FPMT via the Board of Directors. The CPMT is responsible for representing all members of the various centers around the world. The FPMT Inc. Office (international office) is responsible for administration, legal and financial matters, education, and other coordinating functions, as well as the implementation of ideas stemming from the FPMT board of directors and from the CPMT. Many centers have Tibetan geshe as their resident teachers; the geshe is often assisted by a Western monk or nun.

Central to the FPMT teaching is the Lam Rim Chen Mo, which is a synopsis of the Perfection of Wisdom literature, though many other Buddhist texts are referred to as and when necessary. Although various meditation and tantric practices are taught, the FPMT describe their main practice as "following the spiritual advice of Lama Zopa Rinpoche," which is based on the Mahayana Gelug sect of Tibetan Buddhism and follows the lineage of Lama Tsong Khapa.

Address:

Foundation for the Preservation of the Mahayana Tradition
125B La Posta Rd.
Taos, NM 87571
<http://www.fpmt.org>

Jamie Cresswell

Sources:

Batchelor, Stephen. The Awakening of the West: The Encounter of Buddhism and Western Culture. Berkeley, CA: Parallax, 1994.

Mackenzie, Vicki. Reincarnation: The Boy Lama. London: Bloomsbury, 1988.

Yeshe, Lama, Lama Zopa Rinpoche, et al. Wisdom Energy: Basic Buddhist Teachings. Boston: Wisdom Publications, 2000.

France

The religious history of France is thoroughly related to Roman Catholicism, which shaped the social and political basis for the foundation of the nation-state, as well as the framework of French culture. France has traditionally been considered “the eldest daughter of the (Roman) Church.”

Originally, the ancient territory now called Gaul (from the Latin Gallia), forerunner of France, was home to a pre-Celtic and Celtic pastoral and tribal civilization, whose religion was DRUIDISM. The conquest of Gaul began with Greek settlements (in the sixth century B.C.E.) and proceeded with Roman invasions (from the second century B.C.E. onward). The end of the independence of the various tribes of Gaul, after the Gallic Wars conducted by Julius Cesar (in 58–50 B.C.E.), led to the absorption of the whole area into the Roman Empire. The resultant Gallic provinces began to be converted to Christianity in the first century of the new era.

The Franks, a pagan Germanic tribe, invaded Gaul, along with other Germanic tribes, in the fifth century, but the baptism of the Frankish leader, Clovis (c. 466–511), and his people inaugurated a lineage of Christian emperors and kings whose power was legitimated by the blessing of the church. This lineage stretched from the early Merovingian, Carolingian, and Capetian kings, until the late Napoleonic Empire (1804–1814) and the Second Empire (1852–1870).

Recurring barbarian invasions and endless territorial wars between feudal kingdoms in the Middle Ages and the early Renaissance did not allow the lasting foundation of a centralized and powerful state. Despite the success of Charlemagne (742–814) in having himself crowned emperor of the Romans by the pope (800), his unification of many territories into an empire (from the eighth to the tenth century) proved fragile, and the Holy Roman Empire that was based on his achievement turned out rather to be a rival of France than an extension of her power. For a time, nevertheless, France grew into the most powerful of feudal monarchies.

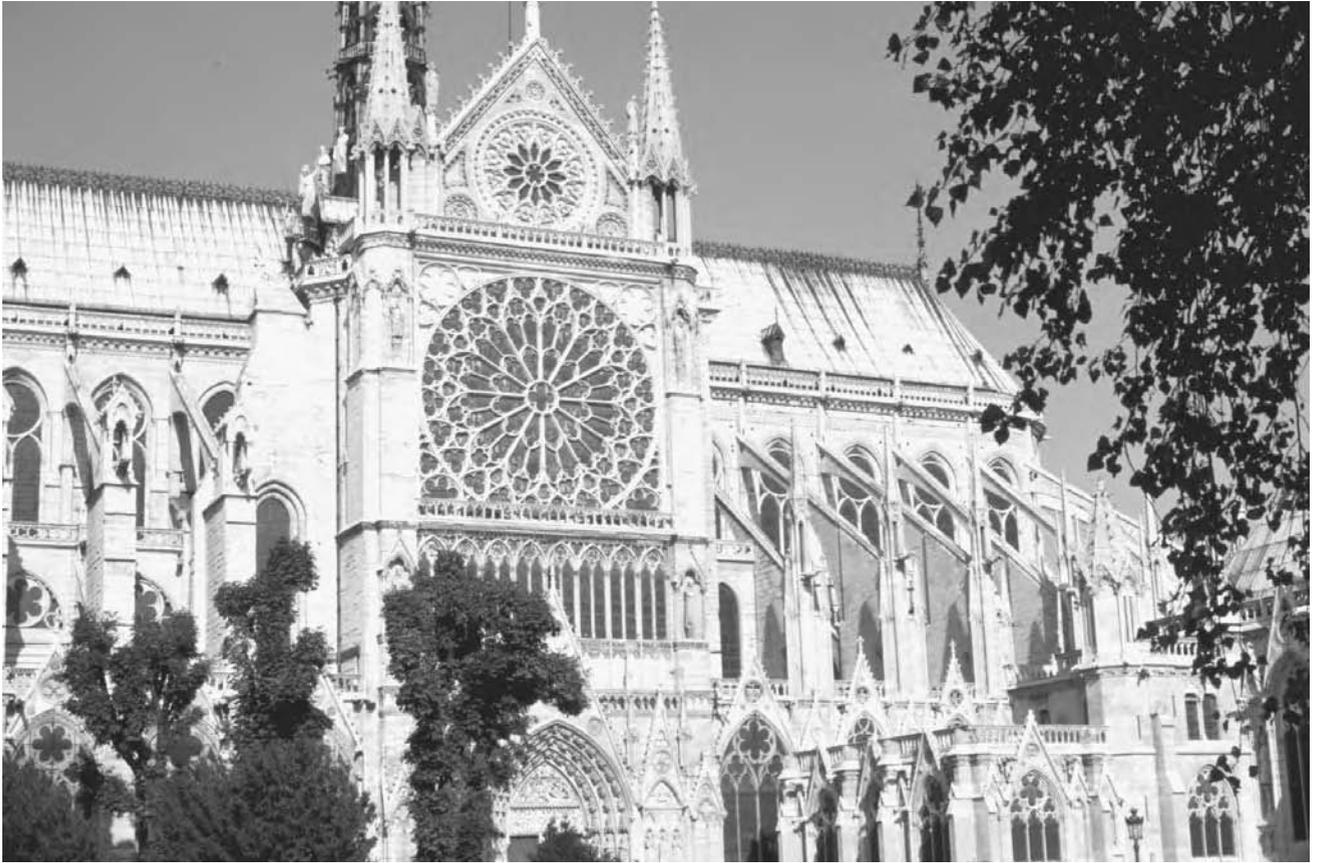

Status of religions in France, 2000–2050

Followers	2000			2025	2050
	total	%	rate
Christians	41,786,000	70.7	0.28	41,807,000	37,564,000
Roman Catholics	48,600,000	82.3	0.29	49,000,000	46,500,000
Independents	1,325,000	2.2	0.58	1,500,000	1,500,000
Protestants	910,000	1.5	0.22	900,000	900,000
Nonreligious	9,229,000	15.6	0.65	10,269,000	11,000,000
Muslims	4,177,000	7.1	0.82	4,800,000	5,400,000
Atheists	2,381,000	4.0	0.79	3,000,000	3,800,000
Jews	591,000	1.0	0.27	600,000	600,000
Buddhists	448,000	0.8	1.15	600,000	800,000
Chinese folk-religionists	135,000	0.2	1.17	180,000	220,000
Ethnoreligionists	104,000	0.2	2.03	110,000	130,000
Neoreligionists	65,000	0.1	0.80	80,000	100,000
Hindus	44,600	0.1	1.10	60,000	75,000
Spiritists	23,600	0.0	0.95	30,000	36,000
Baha'is	4,100	0.0	0.33	5,200	6,500
Zoroastrians	590	0.0	0.72	800	1,000
other religionists	91,200	0.2	0.71	120,000	150,000
Total population	59,080,000	100.0	0.41	61,662,000	59,883,000

Simultaneously, Roman Catholic institutions settled in France by way of the building of abbeys (Cluny, 927–942), monasteries, and cathedrals all over the country. The propagation and the reinforcement of the faith were achieved by means of evangelism and Crusades (1096–1291). The Catholic organization of the country was founded upon the model of Roman administrations and reflected the traditional structures of the pre-Christian civilization. This “parish civilization” (a territorial structuring in dioceses) persisted as the main religious and social form of organization in France until the twentieth century.

After France recovered from the struggle with England later called the Hundred Years' War, the French monarchy became stable and strong enough to survive the Wars of

The Rose Window of Notre Dame, Paris, France (Corel)

Religion of the sixteenth century, brought on by the Protestant Reformation, and to keep France Catholic. At the same time, the French monarchy avoided domination by the pope, and it was among the French clergy that Gallicanism originated, a movement that favored the restriction of papal control and the achievement by the clergy of each nation of administrative autonomy. Moreover, the Edict of Nantes (1598) granted the French Protestants (of the REFORMED/PRESBYTERIAN TRADITION; called Huguenots) a high degree of religious freedom and even power in some areas.

The absolutist French monarchy of the second half of the seventeenth century was shaped by a cardinal, the famous Richelieu (1585–1642), and came to its greatest power under Louis XIV (1638–1715), who saw himself as the greatest champion of the Roman Catholic Church and answerable only to God. He encouraged unity of religion, gradually undermining the freedoms and privileges of the Protestants and finally revoking the Edict of Nantes (1685), thus driving many Huguenots out of France and greatly weakening the French economy. The oppressiveness of the political system seemed inextricably linked with the power of the church, and the philosophes of the Age of Enlightenment, such as Voltaire (1694–1778), risked their lives when they questioned either.

It is thus not surprising that the French Revolution of 1798 brought about a quick laicization of institutions (public records, health, and social services) and originated a first major rupture with Rome. During the Reign of Terror there was even an effort to completely de-Christianize France—in 1793 the Cathedral of Notre Dame de Paris was proclaimed a Temple of Reason, and widespread persecutions occurred, especially in the years 1793–1794. On the other hand, ultimately the Revolution contributed to the recognition by state institutions of denominational pluralism (1795). Despite the dispossession of ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH properties during the First Empire, Napoleon Bonaparte (1769–1821), knowing that most of his subjects were still Roman Catholics and wishing a return to stability, reestablished relationships with Rome; the Concordat of 1801 made the Roman Catholic Church once again the established church of France, supported by the state, yet kept the church firmly Gallican, that is, under the control of the French government. After the first defeat of Napoleon, the monarchy was restored, but it was a constitutional monarchy, and remained one (after a brief hiatus in 1815, ended by Napoleon's final defeat at Waterloo) until the Revolution of 1848. The Roman Catholic Church remained the established church, and Catholicism continued the revival it had experienced under Napoleon, but the principle of religious toleration remained in force. It was only with the fall of the Second Empire (1870) and the establishment of the Third Republic (1871) that a republican political and social system came into being that completed the laicization of France.

French aesthetics, literature, and science have slowly separated from religious influences, starting in the eighteenth century. Further, the progress of industrialization and urbanization, together with the rise of new social strata (proletariat, bourgeoisie), contributed to the process of secularization in France. Emerging ideologies of the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries, such as HUMANISM, positivism, and rationalism, also played a key role in this process, in addition to politicized anticlerical movements (even stronger since the mid-nineteenth century) and to the rise of FREETHOUGHT in the upper classes of society (which had begun in the seventeenth century). At the same time, Catholicism got more involved in social action (especially in the mid-nineteenth century) and political life (especially between 1860 and 1875). Even so, the educational system was laicized in 1882, and the separation of state and church was decreed in 1905.

From that time, although Catholic Christianity in France has seen various religious renewals (through evangelism, especially in Christian youth movements [1935–1965]), it has on the whole weakened, and there has been a rapid growth of ATHEISM. At the same time, since the mid-1970s the decay of the Catholic Church has favored the rise of new forms of Christian religiosity through traditional community forms (MENNONITES, BAPTISTS, or FRIENDS [Quakers]) or evangelical movements (Adventists, PENTECOSTALISM, JEHOVAH'S WITNESSES), introduced in France in the years 1900–1930.

Nevertheless, despite the weakening of Catholic institutions and organizations, statistical estimates place the native Catholic population of France at about 74 percent (according to social scientific sources) to 90 percent (according to religious sources). In comparison, Protestants (including Reformed, Lutherans, and Baptists) represent currently between 1 and 2 percent of the French population, while Eastern Orthodox adherents only account for 0.5 percent. Protestantism is represented in France most notably by such bodies as the REFORMED CHURCH OF FRANCE, the REFORMED CHURCH OF ALSACE AND LORRAINE, the EVANGELICAL LUTHERAN CHURCH OF FRANCE, and the CHURCH OF THE AUGSBURG CONFESSION OF ALSACE AND LORRAINE. The Protestant Federation of France includes these churches and additional groups such as the SALVATION ARMY and the Federation of Evangelical Baptist Churches of France. The PARIS MISSION, supported by the Reformed Church, has been an important force in the worldwide spread of Protestantism since the nineteenth century.

Existing along with Christianity are “foreign” religions, imported through migration: Judaism, Islam, and various Asian religious groups. The presence of Jews dates to the late Middle Ages. They encountered a challenging integration in France, due to a long-lasting tradition of anti-Semitism. Jews acquired French citizenship in 1790–1791 and soon benefited from the official recognition of their religious life owing to integrative laws (1808) and later antidiscrimination laws (1846). Anti-Semitism then gained renewed life as a popular and influential movement in the late nineteenth century, culminating in the Dreyfus Affair, which began with the unjust sentencing of a Jewish officer, Alfred Dreyfus (1859–1935), to life in prison for treason (1895). A national movement led by some of France's greatest intellectuals fought to exonerate him, and anticlericalism was strengthened by the role the Catholic Church was perceived as having played in his ordeal. Nevertheless, the 1930s crisis reinforced anti-Semitism, and the collaborationist government of Vichy during World War II joined the Nazis in deporting many French Jews to concentration camps. In the second half of the twentieth century, the massive settling of migrants from North Africa led to a revitalization of Jewish faith in France, especially propelled by the Jews of Algeria. Following independence in 1962, the Algerian government moved to suppress the Jewish community by, among other actions, depriving Jews of their economic rights. As a result, almost 130,000 Algerian Jews immigrated to France. At the end of the twentieth century, Jews made up approximately 1 percent of the total population of France (some 600,000).

Islam (mainly Sunni of the MALIKITE school) came to France with the migration influxes of the 1960s from Morocco (1 million), Tunisia, and Algeria (more than 1 million), as well as Turkey (200,000) and sub-Saharan African countries. The Muslim community now includes some 4 to 5 million adherents. It is the largest Muslim presence in Western Europe, and the most substantial since medieval Spain. There are only 8 formal mosques, but some 1,600 less formal prayer and worship centers. The Grand Mosque in Paris serves as a symbolic center of the rather diverse community. Since the mid-1970s, socially and sometimes politically active Muslim movements have emerged among the migrants and their naturalized offspring, who are torn between marginalization and integration, and who suffer an enduring xenophobic stigmatization because of their native religion.

Asian religions entered the French soil through migration influxes, mainly from French ex-colonies Laos, Vietnam, and Cambodia (Indochina), carrying Buddhism (from 350,000 to 500,000 adherents) and other forms of beliefs and practices (Daoism, Confucianism, and more recent indigenous groups such as CAODAISM). The UNIFIED BUDDHIST CHURCH transferred its headquarters from Vietnam to rural France. The INTERNATIONAL ZEN ASSOCIATION is a large international Japanese Zen movement headquartered in Paris. Hindu migrants from India and Tamil refugees from Sri Lanka are up to 50,000 adherents.

Another and last face of the French religious landscape is the development of new religious movements beginning in the 1950s, including various Asian movements that have spread through the West in the last generation (the UNIFICATION MOVEMENT, Transcendental Meditation, the INTERNATIONAL SOCIETY FOR KRISHNA CONSCIOUSNESS) as well as Western Esoteric groups (Rosicrucians, FRATERNITÉ BLANCHE UNIVERSELLE, the Acropole) and several uniquely French groups and organizations (Invitation à la Vie [IVI], the AUMIST RELIGION [Mandarom], ARÈS). The increase in numbers of NEW AGE, or “alternative,” movements (more than three hundred groups with from several dozens to thousands of members) and the controversy that began in the mid-1990s (following the murder and suicide deaths of members of the SOLAR TEMPLE) about “sects” has focused public debates on issues of religious freedom, denominational pluralism, and secularization in France. The result has been the passing of a series of laws aimed at suppressing the “sects” in France, with the JEHOVAH’S WITNESSES, the CHURCH OF SCIENTOLOGY, the Aumists, and the Buddhist movement SOKA GAKKAI INTERNATIONAL being primary targets.

As a final point, mention must be made of the subtle but ongoing persistence of indigenous beliefs in overseas French territories (French Polynesia and Guyana, as well as islands such as Réunion, Martinique, and Guadeloupe), despite their formal conversion to Roman Catholicism.

Lionel Obadia

Sources:

- Annuaire de la France Protestante*. Paris: Fédération Protestante de France, issued annually.
- Boyer, Alain. L'Islam en France. Paris: Presses Universitaires de France, 1998.
- Cholvy, Gérard. La religion en France, de la fin du XVIIIe à nos jours. Paris: Hachette, 1991.
- Introvigne, Massimo, and J. Gordon Melton, eds. Pour en finir avec les sectes: Le débat sur le rapport de la commission parlementaire. Paris: Dervy, 1996.
- Mayer, Jean-François. Confessions d'un chasseur de sectes. Paris: Les Editions du Cerf, 1990.
- Petit, Laurène, and Roger Aucoin. Guide du Nouvel Age. Paris: L'Age du Verseau, 1990.
- Ronce, Philippe. Guide des Centres Bouddhistes en France. Paris: Editions Noësis, 1998.
- Vernette, Jean, and Claire Moncelon. Dictionnaire des groupes religieux aujourd'hui. Paris: Presses Universitaires de France, 1995.

Franciscans

The Order of Friars Minor is the primary group referred to by the designation Franciscan. There are also two other groups, the order of contemplative nuns popularly known as the Poor Clares (or Second Order) and a lay order, the Third Order of St. Francis. The Order of Friars Minor traces its beginning to St. Francis of Assisi (c. 1181–1226). As a young man from a well-to-do family, he felt a call to “rebuild Christ’s church” and to live the renounced life: poverty, preaching the gospel, and penance. Others were attracted to him, and he authored a rule that was, according to the order’s tradition, verbally approved by Pope Innocent II in 1209, the founding date of the order.

The rule underwent a number of revisions over the next century, some caused by the need to adapt the rule to the quickly growing membership, the need to interpret ambiguous parts of the text, and the question of how property was to be handled in light of Francis’s rather austere understanding of poverty. The legal and practical problems of handling possessions caused tensions in the order for decades, though some moderation was found during the leadership of St. Bonaventura (1217–1274), considered the order’s second founder. The tendency to adopt a more absolutist position on poverty, however, continued to attract many Franciscans. The next generation of the more radical Franciscans was called the Spirituals, and they were vigorously suppressed by the church.

In the fourteenth century, laxity in the main body of the order led to the emergence of a new subgroup, the Observants, who tended to retire to remote locations where they could practice the rule of St. Francis in all its austerity. By the end of the century the movement had spread from Italy to France and Spain. Gradually a split developed between the main body of the order, the Conventuals, and the Observants, officially recognized in 1517. The Observants, which constituted the majority of the Franciscans at the time of the split, became the base of other reforming efforts that further split the order. Most of these additional reformed groups were reunited into the Observant branch of the order in 1897. The union of 1897 left three major branches of Franciscans—the Conventuals, the Observants, and the Capuchins (officially recognized in 1619).

In the meantime, the Franciscan movement had spread throughout the known world. Franciscans spread across Europe, were given special responsibility for the Holy Land, and founded the first Catholic churches in China. In the eighteenth century, the JESUITS had taken the lead in the Catholic Church’s missionary work outside of Europe, especially in the Americas. Thousands of Franciscans moved to the Americas in the seventeenth century, and after the Jesuits were suppressed in 1773, Franciscans were in most cases called to take their place. The international role of the Franciscans continued through the nineteenth century (in spite of ups and downs in various particular locations), and by the middle of the twentieth century their centers could be found in more than 135 countries. Since the 1960s, they have reasserted an emphasis on ministering to the poor.

The Order of Friars Minor (continuing the Observant tradition) has its international center at Mediatrice 25, 00165 Roma, Italia. It has a Web site at: <http://www.ofm.org/>.

The Order of Friars Minor Capuchins has its international center at Curia Generalis Ord. Min. Cap. Via Piemonte 70, 00187 Roma, Italy. It has several Web sites sponsored by the different provinces, including <http://capuchin.org> and <http://www.capuchinfriars.org.au>. The order is currently active in 76 countries. The most famous Capuchin in the twentieth century was undoubtedly Padre Pio, an Italian monk noted for his having the stigmata, the five wounds of Christ, in his hands, feet, and side. Although a number of cases of the stigmata have been reported over the centuries, he was the first priest in the history of the church in which they were manifest. He was beatified (a step toward sainthood) by Pope John Paul II on May 2, 1999.

The Order of Friars Minor Conventuals has its international center at Piazza SS. Apostoli 51, 000187, Roma, Italy.

Contemporaneous with the founding of the Franciscans, a counterpart for females, the Poor Clares, was founded by Francis and St. Clare (1194–1243) in 1214. Cardinal Ugolino (later Pope Gregory IX) gave the order its first rule in 1219. Over the centuries, like their male counterpart, the Clares split into several branches. The Urbanists follow the rule of Pope Urban IV (1263), which allows some exemption from corporate poverty as well as personal poverty; the Collettines are named after St Collette, who restored the principle of corporate poverty in her houses in the fifteenth century. A Capuchin branch originated in the sixteenth century, paralleling developments in the male branches of the order. The majority of convents of the Poor Clares are purely contemplative and are strictly enclosed.

Sources:

- Hanley, Boniface, and Salvator Fink. The Franciscans: Love at Work. Patterson, NJ: St. Anthony Guild Press, 1962.
- Jackson, Robert H., and Edward Castillo. Indians, Franciscans, and Spanish Colonization: The Impact of the Mission System on California Indians. Albuquerque: University of New Mexico Press, 1996.
- Robson, Michael. St. Francis of Assisi: The Legend and the Life. London: Geoffrey Chapman, 2000.

Fraternité Blanche Universelle

The Fraternité Blanche Universelle (or Universal White Brotherhood) grew out of the WHITE BROTHERHOOD that had been founded in Bulgaria at the beginning of the twentieth century by Peter Deunov (1864–1944). In 1937, as the movement peaked, the aging Deunov sent Omraam Michael Aivanhov (1900–1986), one of his accomplished students, to Paris to open a center. His settlement in Paris was quickly followed by World War II, Deunov's death, and the rise of Soviet power in Bulgaria. With the suppression of the movement in its land of origin, Aivanhov emerged as the leader of the movement in the West and a spiritual teacher in his own right.

The ultimate authority for the White Brotherhood is believed to be a fraternity of highly evolved beings who reside on a higher plane of existence. The earthly organization is seen as a visible reflection of this invisible Brotherhood, and the leadership is believed to be in contact with its members. The purpose of the Brotherhood is to pass on the eternal religion of Christ; it continues the tradition of the Church of St. John, considered by many as the genuine embodiment of Christian spirituality. The Church of St. John is seen as following the spirit rather than the letter of Christ's teaching (which the visible Church of St. Peter is seen as following). This tradition embodies a Christian version of Western esotericism.

Aivanhov teaches that the goal of one's life is to know oneself, to unite one's human self with the divine self. Having made that connection, one is attuned to the White Brotherhood and ready to participate in the great work. The masters of the Brotherhood are attempting to bring the Kingdom of God into reality on Earth. Aivanhov expounded on this basic idea at length in his writings and public discourses. These are published in two collections, The Complete Works (35 volumes) and the Izvor Collection (36 volumes).

Aivanhov's works are published in several languages by Editions Prosveta. In the decades following war, the Brotherhood expanded in France, where it now has some 5,000 members, and began to establish centers in other French-speaking countries. In the early 1980s the first center was opened in the United States. At the end of the 1990s it reported work in 26 countries, most in Western Europe. The largest number of members were in France (5,000) and Quebec (4,000).

Address:

Universal White Brotherhood
2, rue du Belvedere de la Ronce
92310 Sèvres
France
<http://www.prosveta.ch/>

Sources:

- Feuerstein, Georg. The Mystery of Light: The Life and Teachings of Omraam Michael Aivanhov. Salt Lake City, UT: Passage Press, 1992.
- Lejbowicz, Agnes. Omraam Michael Aivanhov, Master of the Great White Brotherhood. Fréjus, France: Editions Prosveta, 1982.
- Renard, Opierre. The Solar Revolution and the Prophet. Fréjus, France: Editions Prosveta, 1980.
- Who Is Omraam Michael Aivanhov?* Fréjus, France: Editions Prosveta, 1982.

Fraternity/Society of Saint Pius X

Monsignor Marcel Lefebvre (1905–1991), a French Roman Catholic missionary priest working in Africa, became first a bishop there, then the apostolic delegate for the whole of French-speaking Africa, and finally archbishop of Dakar in 1955. In 1962, he returned to France to become bishop of Tulle, while at the same time remaining superior general of his missionary religious order, the Fathers of the Holy Spirit. He resigned in 1968, however, finding himself unwilling to cooperate with the aggiornamento program requested for religious orders by the Second Vatican Council. In 1970, he opened near Fribourg, Switzerland, a seminary for young Catholic men seeking a “traditional” preparation for the priesthood. After a few months, the seminary moved to Ecône, in the Swiss Diocese of Sion, where the bishop had already granted his approval and incorporation of Lefebvre’s organization as the Fraternity of Saint Pius X. In 1974, however, the Vatican started to investigate complaints that the seminary was offering a formation program incompatible with the Second Vatican Council, and in 1975 an ad hoc commission of cardinals requested Lefebvre to refrain from performing further priestly ordinations. He rejected the injunction, however, and on June 29, 1976, defied the Vatican by ordaining thirteen new priests.

On July 22, 1976, the Vatican suspended Lefebvre from his functions as bishop and as priest (a lesser sanction than excommunication: Lefebvre was not excommunicated, and was still recognized as a Catholic in good standing, but no longer authorized to operate as a bishop, or even as a priest).

A dialogue, in fact, continued between Lefebvre and Rome, and on May 15, 1988, it seemed to have achieved its goal, when the French bishop signed the preliminary version of an agreement making the Fraternity of Saint Pius X an independent organization within the Roman Catholic Church, headed by a bishop selected by the Vatican from the fraternity’s own ranks (although other than Lefebvre) and authorized to celebrate the pre-Vatican II Catholic Mass. Several of Lefebvre’s key aides regarded the agreement as unacceptable, however, and on June 19, 1988, negotiations were interrupted. On June 20, Lefebvre initiated what Rome regarded as a schism, by consecrating, without Vatican authorization, four new bishops (Bernard Fellay, Bernard Tissier de Mallerais, Richard N. Williamson, and Alfonso de Galarreta). This time, he was promptly excommunicated, together with the conservative Brazilian bishop Antonio de Castro Mayer (1904–1991), who had assisted Lefebvre in the consecration ceremony. On July 2, 1988, Pope John Paul II published the apostolic letter Ecclesia Dei, in which he denounced the new schism, but left a door open to dialogue and allowed Lefebvre’s ex-followers who wished to remain in communion with Rome to obtain a special status and be authorized to celebrate the old Catholic liturgy.

Although separated from Rome, the fraternity (incorporated in the United States as the Society of Saint Pius X) grew, creating several new male and female religious orders along its path (again, not recognized by the Vatican). It currently has six seminaries (in Switzerland, Germany, France, the United States, Argentina, and Australia), 130 homes in 26 countries, 3 universities, 20 high schools, and 50 elementary schools, as well as 380 priests, 200 seminarians, and some 60 male and 120 female members of the religious orders it has created. The Catholic Jubilee year 2000 saw the opening of a new dialogue between the fraternity and the Vatican, and in March 2001 the Holy See officially confirmed that negotiations were in progress.

Although the media often report that the main disagreement between the fraternity and Rome is liturgy, and the fraternity’s wish to celebrate the old Mass, there are in fact several other problems that have not yet been resolved. During his last years (he died in 1991), Lefebvre insisted that he regarded Vatican II teachings on religious liberty as the most critical issue. Religious liberty was a notion he rejected for both theological and political reasons. He was also a staunch opponent of ecumenism and interreligious dialogue, which he regarded as conducive to relativism. In the course of its ongoing dialogue with the fraternity, the Vatican has been quite open on liturgical questions, while the other issues have understandably proved more problematical.

Address:

Fraternity/Society of Saint Pius X
 Priorat Mariæ Verkündigung
 Schwandegg
 6313 Menzingen
 Switzerland
<http://www.sspix.org>

Massimo Introvigne and PierLuigi Zoccatelli

Sources:

- Lefebvre, Marcel. I Accuse the Council. Kansas City, MO: Angelus Press, 1998.
- . Open Letter to Confused Catholics. Kansas City, MO: Angelus Press, 1999.
- . A Bishop Speaks: Writings and Addresses, 1963–1975. Kansas City, MO: Angelus Press, 2000.

Free Churches

As developed in the eighteenth century, the term Free Church referred to those Protestant Christian churches that operated free of entanglements with the state governments of Europe. Free Churches had emerged at the time of the Protestant Reformation, when leaders of the Swiss Brethren called for a more radical reformation of the church than that being asked for by Martin Luther (1483–1546), Ulrich Zwingli (1484–1531), and later Jean Calvin (1509–1564).

They wanted a pure church consisting of adults who had been converted to Christianity and who had made a conscious decision to affiliate with the church. By definition, such a church could not be coterminous with the state and include all of the citizens whether they had or wanted any relationship with God or not. In such a church, ecclesiastical discipline operated only among church members and was limited to expulsion of a misbehaving member from the church's fellowship.

A primary symbol of the Free Church came to be adult baptism. State churches (including the Lutheran, Reformed, and Anglican) generally baptized the children of members soon after their birth. The Free Churches generally baptized those who had reached an age at which they were deemed accountable for their Christian profession and had made such a profession. Members who had been previously baptized as infants were typically rebaptized.

The emphasis on baptism within the Free Churches led to further concern about, for example, the proper mode of baptism, with many following the lead of the Baptists in opting for immersions. A few, including the CHURCH OF THE BRETHREN, advocated triune immersion. Baptists divided over the necessity of the act of baptism for individual salvation.

The Free Church impulse led first to the spread of the Mennonites and BAPTISTS and then took form across Europe with the formation of such groups as the FRIENDS (Quakers), the MISSION COVENANT CHURCH OF SWEDEN, the EVANGELICAL LUTHERAN FREE CHURCH OF NORWAY, and the Free Church of Scotland. In North America there were also the churches of the Restoration Movement, the CHURCHES OF CHRIST, the CHRISTIAN CHURCHES AND CHURCHES OF CHRIST, and the CHRISTIAN CHURCH (DISCIPLES OF CHRIST). In the twentieth century, most Pentecostal churches have adopted the Free Church approach to Christian community.

In the nineteenth century, the term Free was added to the name of various churches claiming additional freedoms. The FREE METHODIST CHURCH OF NORTH AMERICA was an advocate both of immediately freeing African Americans held in slavery and of free pews (as opposed to other Methodist churches, which accepted a fee from members who wished to have a family pew in the local church building). Free Church also came to mean without a creed (other than the Bible) or free of various forms of ecclesiastical hierarchy. Most Free Churches have adopted a congregational polity, though originally the Congregational Church movement was not a Free Church and remained tied to the state of Massachusetts into the nineteenth century. Groups such as the Churches of Christ and the Primitive Baptists have adopted an ultra-congregational polity, which limits any governance functions by structures above the local congregations. Other Free Churches, such as the Southern Baptist Convention and the Christian Church (Disciples of Christ) grant denominational structures considerable power to build and control programs operated for the denomination as a whole.

Sources:

- Davies, Horton. The English Free Churches. 2d ed. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1963.
- Harrison, Paul M. Authority and Power in the Free Church Tradition. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1959.
- Littell, Franklin H. The Free Church. Boston, MA: Starr King Press, 1957.
- Payne, Earnest A. The Free Church Tradition in the Life of England. London: SCM Press, 1951.
- Westin, Gunnar. The Free Church through the Ages. Nashville, TN: Broadman Press, 1958

Free Methodist Church of North America

The Free Methodist Church, one of the leading churches of the nineteenth-century Holiness Movement, emerged as a conservative movement within the Methodist Episcopal Church (now a constituent part of the UNITED METHODIST CHURCH) in the 1850s. Leaders of the movement felt that the main body of the church had slipped from Wesleyan standards, especially as related to an emphasis on the call to lead the sanctified life. Methodist founder John Wesley (1703–1791) had taught that it was possible to be sanctified in this life and had proposed that Christians should strive to be sanctified, to become perfect in love, in this life. Two signs of the Methodists' falling from this standard were the membership of many in secret societies and their toleration of slavery. Most of those who eventually made up the Free Methodist Church were abolitionist. The Methodist Episcopal Church, although against slavery generally, held that abolitionism was an extremist position.

The issues raised by the conservatives culminated when Rev. Benjamin Titus Roberts (1823–1893) and others were expelled from the church. They appealed to the General Conference that met in 1860. When their appeal was denied, they formed the Free Methodist Church. Their name related to another complaint of theirs, the selling of pews to particular church members. The Free Methodists declared that all the pews in their churches were freely open to all.

Formally, the Free Methodists had no doctrinal quarrel with its parent body. Increasingly, however, the Methodist Episcopal Church distanced itself from the particular version of the Holiness perspective that had been popularized in the church in the nineteenth century; the Free Methodists later added a statement on sanctification to the Twenty-five Articles of Religion, to which most Methodists adhere. A new set of articles of religion was adopted in 1974 that spelled out the Holiness perspective and gave the biblical references that underpin them. The church teaches that all Christians may be inwardly cleansed from sinful rebellion against God. This sanctification of the affections occurs instantaneously when believers, already having experienced justification from sin, in a moment of faith are open to the work of the Holy Spirit on their lives.

Free Wesleyan Church of Tonga

Outwardly the life of holiness includes conformity to a set of guidelines that the church feels should be normative for the Christian life. Church members refrain from alcohol, tobacco, and recreational drugs. They tithe their income. They refrain from membership in secret societies. They are anti-racist. They hold marriage and sexual purity in high regard.

The church is organized with a modified episcopacy. The highest legislative body is the General Conference, consisting of an equal number of ministers and laity. The conference elects the bishops (or general superintendents). The congregations are divided among annual conferences, which appoint ministers to their pastoral charges. In 1996, the church reported 74,855 members in the United States and 5,360 in Canada. During the nineteenth century, the church joined in the world missions movement, and today the great majority of its members are found in its conferences overseas, which reported 358,252 members in thirty-four countries around the world. The church is a member of the CHRISTIAN HOLINESS PARTNERSHIP and the National Association of Evangelicals, through which it is related to the WORLD EVANGELICAL ALLIANCE.

Addresses:

Free Methodist Church of North America
World Ministries Center
770 North High School
Indianapolis, IN 46214

P.O. Box 535002
Indianapolis, IN 46253
<http://www.fmcna.org>

Sources:

- Hogue, William T. History of the Free Methodist Church. 2 vols. Chicago: Free Methodist Publishing House, 1918.
- Marston, Leslie R. From Age to Age a Living Witness. Winona Lake, IN: Life and Light Press, 1960.
- Roberts, Benjamin T. Holiness Teachings. Salem, OH: H. E. Schmul, 1964.

Free Wesleyan Church of Tonga

Methodism, now divided into four bodies, forms the largest religious community in the multi-island nation of Tonga, and the Free Wesleyan Church of Tonga is the largest of the four Methodist denominations. Methodist work on Tonga began in 1822, but the original missionary, Walter Lawry (1793–1859) had to withdraw after fourteen months. On June 28, 1826, John Thomas (1769–1881) and John Hutchinson landed on Ha'atafu and settled in Kolovai. They had been preceded by two converts from Tahiti named Hope and Tafeta, who had started work on Nuku'alofa. As other missionaries (from Australia) arrived, the work spread to Ha'apai and Vava'u.

Success was scant until 1934, when the efforts of an early Tongan convert led to a mass conversion on Vava'u, and the success was soon repeated on Ha'apai. As it turned out, the ruler of Ha'apai, Taufa'ahau Tupouin, in the 1850s became the person who unified Tonga into a nation and became its first ruler. An admirer of the British, he chose the name George I, by which he was commonly known. He also further encouraged his new subjects to become Christian, and by the end of the 1850s almost all Tongans were at least nominally Christians. Most Tongans were Methodists, though the ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH had established a small mission.

In 1890, the aging king and his prime minister (a former Methodist missionary) expressed their concern about the continuing control of the church from Australia. Their desire to break the administrative relationship led to a schism, and the king and his supporters formed the Wesleyan Free Church. Further, he ordered his subjects (as far as he could, given the religious freedom that had been proclaimed in 1855) to join it, and the Methodist Mission and the new church were bitter rivals for the next four decades. Finally in 1924 the new ruler, Queen Salote, worked out a reconciliation, and the two bodies merged to become the Tonga Conference of the Methodist Church of Australia. Some 6,000 people stayed out of the merger and formed the Free Church of Tonga.

The Tonga Conference continued its relationship with the Australian Methodists until 1977. The merger of the Australian Methodists into the UNITING CHURCH IN AUSTRALIA became the occasion of the Tongan Conference becoming autonomous as the Free Wesleyan Church of Tonga. It sponsors an extensive education program that includes some 60 percent of the secondary education in the country.

During the nineteenth century, the Tongan church became crucial to the spread of Methodism through the South Pacific, as Tongan converts accompanied many Methodist missionaries, assisting in the foundation of the church in many island systems. In the twentieth century, many Tongans migrated to New Zealand, Australia, and the United States, and congregations that retain their relationship directly with the Free Wesleyan Church can now be found in each of these countries.

The Free Wesleyan Church of Tonga is a member of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES. It has a baptized membership of approximately 33,000, but claims a constituency that would double that number.

Address:

Free Wesleyan Church of Tonga
P.O. Box 57
Nuku'alofa Tonga

Sources:

- Forman, Charles H. The Island Churches of the South Pacific: Emergence in the Twentieth Century. Maryknoll, NY: Orbis, 1982.
- Loatoukefu, S. Church and State in Tonga: The Influence of the Wesleyan Methodist Missionaries on the Political Development of Tonga, 1826–1875. Canberra: Australian National University, 1967.
- Wood, A. H. Overseas Missions of the Australian Methodist Church. 3 vols. Melbourne: Aldersgate Press, 1975–1978.

Freemasonry

Although there is much debate over the ties of modern Freemasonry to medieval guilds of stone masons, there is little doubt that what is today called Freemasonry emerged at the end of the seventeenth century with the formation of lodges of speculative freemasons in Great Britain culminating in the formation of the first Grand Lodge in 1717 by the merger of four previously existing lodges in England. These initial lodges had emerged as older masonic organizations accepted non-masons into their life. Devoid of any interest in erecting buildings, these non-masons used their gatherings to speculate about metaphysical issues quite apart from the theological perspectives of either the Church of England or the other dissenting churches in the country at the time, choosing instead to follow the Western Esoteric teachings previously spread under the label of Rosicrucinism (see ANCIENT AND MYSTICAL ORDER ROSAE CRUCIS). Among the first prominent exponents of Western Esotericism in England were Robert Fludd (1574–1637) and Elias Ashmole (1617–1692). The Rev. John Theophilus Desguliers, who became grand master of the British Lodge, was also chaplain to the Prince of Wales, and his political connections facilitated the spread of the movement throughout the British Isles and onto the European Continent and beyond.

Grand Lodges were formed in Ireland in 1725 and Scotland in 1736. The first speculative lodge was founded in Germany in 1733 and was soon established in France and Italy. The first Papal statements against Freemasonry were issued in 1738 and 1751. The Grand Lodge of Massachusetts was founded in 1733 and others followed beginning with South Carolina in 1737. The Masonic lodges would become hotbeds not only of metaphysical speculation but of new democratic political ideals. Masonic ideal would flow through the salons of Paris in the decades prior to the French Revolution and would be a prominent element tying many of the American revolutionaries together. The Marquis de Lafayette was a mason as was Benjamin Franklin (who largely financed the American Revolution) and future American presidents George Washington, James Madison and James Monroe.

English masons led in the founding of speculative lodges in France early in the eighteenth century. The first national French Masonic Body, the English Grand Lodge of France was formed in 1728. It operated under British leadership until 1738 when the Duke of Antin became the first French Grand Master. During the 1750s, the French work became fully independent and took its present name, the Grand Lodge of France. The French work, becomes important in the nineteenth century as Freethought becomes important to French intellectual and political culture. In 1849, the Grand Lodge declared that the existence of God and the immortality of the soul were foundational principles of Freemasonry. However, in 1877, the French declared that absolute liberty of conscience and the solidarity of humanity were the basic principles. At the same time, all references to God were removed from the rituals. These actions led to the British and American lodges severing relations with the French. The French action appears to be made in reaction to Catholic criticism that Freemasonry had become a rival religion.

Freemasonry is an initiatory system, in which members are brought step by step into its basic ideas and practices, a basic worldview being presented in the initial three degrees. Various elaborate degree systems, the most famous being the 33 degrees of the Ancient and Accepted Rite, the system used in most British and American lodges. The cosmos is viewed as a series of levels that the soul travels as it rises to the realm of the Divine.

The endpoint of metaphysical speculation is an omnipresent, eternal, immutable principle beyond the conceptualizations of language (which many call God). That principle finds expression in natural law. There also exists space and motion, concepts basis to all human perception. Underlying the cosmos is Spirit/consciousness, which manifests and both energy and matter. The cosmos is in eternal flux and creation proceeds in as universal energy and proto-matter interact and produce the basic seven levels of existence. These seven levels—physical, life principle, astral, karma, manas, buddhi, atma—are also reflected in the individual. Mason rituals provide the material to reflect upon the universe and humanity's rightful place within it.

There are a variety of Rites (ritual schemes) used by different Masonic lodges. A Grand Lodge unites lodges that use the same rite. A Grand Orient unites lodges that may use a variety of rites. The Eastern Star was founded in 1876 as an auxiliary for females, Masonic groups being basically a male organization, though forms of masonry, that is, co-masonry, that accept female members were founded in the twentieth century.

Today, the Masonic movement is organized in a set of national grand lodges and grand orients the most prominent of which is the United Grand Lodge of England, the governing body of Freemasonry in England, Wales, and the Channel Islands. The Supreme Council 33° of Ancient and Accepted Scottish Rite of Freemasonry of the Southern Jurisdiction of the United States of America is the leading American organization.

Speculative Freemasonry has been an important transmitter of the WESTERN ESOTERIC TRADITION, having been built from Rosicrucian teachings and serving as a basis of a spectrum of nineteenth century occult groups from the THEOSOPHICAL SOCIETY (ADYAR) to several initiatory ceremonial magic groups such as the O.T.O. (ORDO TEMPLI ORIENTIS). To the present, it raises issues of the religious nature of its teachings and the essential nature of the several grand lodges as religious bodies.

Addresses:

United Grand Lodge of England
Freemasons' Hall
Great Queen St.
London WC2B 5AZ
United Kingdom
<http://www.grandlodge-england.org/>

The Supreme Council, 33°
1733 16th St. NW
Washington, DC 20009-3103
<http://www.srmason-sj.org/web/index.htm>

Sources:

- Dumenil, Lynn. Freemasonry and American Culture 1880–1930. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1984.
- Gould, R. F. Gould's History of Freemasonry throughout the World. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons, 1936.
- Knoop, Douglas, and G. P. Jones. A Short History of Freemasonry to 1730. Manchester: University of Manchester Press, 1940.
- Mackey, Albert G. An Encyclopedia of Freemasonry. Philadelphia: Louis H. Everts, 1905.
- Pike, Albert. Morals and Dogma of the Ancient and Accepted Scottish Rite of Freemasonry. Washington, DC: House of the Temple, 1969.
- Roberts, Allen E. Freemasonry in American History. Richmond, VA: Macoy Publishing and Masonic Supply Co., 1985.
- Schuchard, Marsha. "Freemasonry, Secret Societies, and the Continuity of the Occult Tradition in English Literature." Ph.D. diss., University of Texas, Austin, 1975.
- Voorhis, Harold Van Buren. Masonic Organizations and Allied Orders and Degrees. N.p.: Press of Henry Emerson, 1952.
- . Masonic Rosicrucian Societies. New York: Henry Emerson, 1958.

Freethought

Freethought, or freethinking, as a term to describe unbelief or dissent from specific religious propositions, appears to have arisen at the end of the seventeenth century in England. The term emerged during the struggle of science to free itself from ongoing theological debates, as it followed a "free way" in inquiry. Eventually, the term became applied to the conscious rejection of some parts of traditional religion. The use of the term implies that the freethinker has a special loyalty to the process of thinking and to the freedom that would allow such thinking to go wherever logic takes it.

As it developed, Freethought came to apply to any revision or rejection of contemporary religious doctrines, or the application of critical and rational thinking to specifically religious subjects.

In the 1690s, there appeared a pamphlet that included reference to the "New Religious Fraternity of Freethinkers," and in 1708 Jonathan Swift, in his Sentiments of a Church of England Man, used the term to refer collectively to those espousing unbelief. Then, in 1713, Anthony Collins accepted the term in his Discourse of Free-Thinking, and from that point, the identification of the term and religious unbelief began to appear in popular discourse, though those opposed to freethinking often included references to any kind of religious heterodoxy, a more common phenomenon than unbelief.

In the eighteenth century, individuals began to identify themselves as freethinkers, and in the last half of the nineteenth century, one could identify a movement of Freethought that included not only individuals but groups that had a reference to Freethought in their names. The leading exponent of freethinking unbelief in America was Robert Green Ingersoll (1833–1899), a popular lecturer, who identified himself as a freethinker. He noted in his 1890 lecture, "Has Freethought a Constructive Side?":

A denial of all orthodox falsehoods—an exposure of all superstitions. This is simply clearing the ground, to the end that seeds of value may be planted. It is necessary, first, to fell the trees, to destroy the poisonous vines, to drive out the wild beasts. Then comes another phase—another kind of work. The Freethinker knows that the universe is natural—that there is no room, even in infinite space, for the miraculous, for the impossible. The Freethinker knows, or feels that he knows, that there is no sovereign of the universe, who, like some petty king or tyrant, delights in showing his authority. He feels that all in the universe are conditioned beings, and that only those are happy who live in accordance with the conditions of happiness, and this fact or truth or philosophy embraces all men and all gods—if there be gods.

By this time, Freethought had become a synonym for ATHEISM, with the added polemic point that religious thinkers were somehow bound by outdated religious doctrines and institutions that hindered their logic and prevented their following the logic of their affirmations.

Among the oldest of Freethought organizations was the Free Inquirers, founded by utopian thinker Robert Dale Owens (1801–1877) in 1828. Several other Free Inquiry associations appeared in the next few years, the most notable being Abner Kneeland's (1774–1844) First Society of Free Enquirers in Boston, Massachusetts. Among the largest was Die Freien Gemeinden, founded by German-speaking Americans in 1859. It developed chapters in a number of urban centers and remained active through the 1920s.

By the end of the nineteenth century, there were a number of Freethought institutions across the North American continent and Europe and around the world, including the Hindu Free-thought Union (founded in India in 1875), General Free-thought Association (Canada, 1880s), the Brisbane Free-thought Association (Australia, 1888), the Freethought Association (South Africa, 1888), the Deutscher Freidenker Bund (Germany, 1881), and the Union des Libres Penseurs (France, 1904). The International Federation of Freethinkers was founded in Brussels in 1880 and has been known since 1936 as the World Union of Freethinkers (c/o Jean Kaech, P.O. Box 3001 Berne, Switzerland).

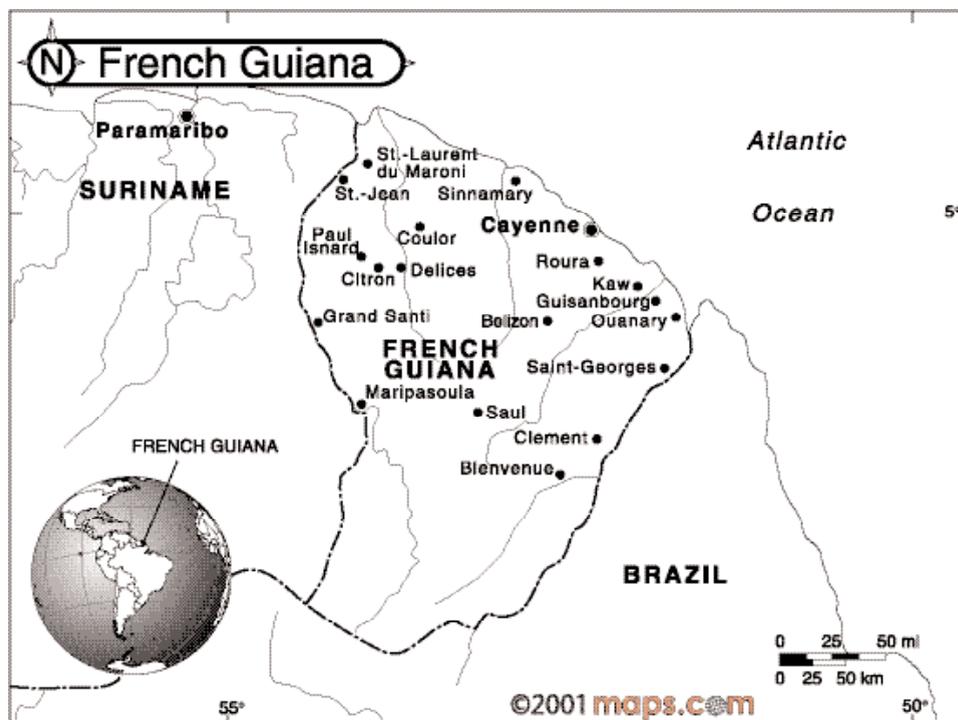

In the twentieth century, atheists, humanists, rationalists, and freethinkers came to see themselves as forming one international community of unbelief, and numerous Freethought organizations have arisen, which are hardly distinguishable from other groups espousing unbelief. Many are members of the INTERNATIONAL HUMANIST AND ETHICAL UNION. Among the oldest and most influential are the Freidenker-Vereinigung der Schweiz (Switzerland), Vapaa-ajattelijain liitto (Finish Freethought Union), Libre Pensée (France, founded in 1848), and De Vrije Gedachte (The Dutch Freethinking Association).

Sources:

- Robertson, J. M. A Short History of Freethought. New York: Russell and Russell, 1957.
- Stein, Gordon. The Encyclopedia of Unbelief. 2 vols. Buffalo, NY: Prometheus Books, 1985.
- Tribe, David. 100 Years of Freethought. London: Elek, 1967.

French Guiana

French Guiana is an overseas department of France located on the Atlantic coast of South America immediately north of Brazil. It is a tropical land, whose capital, Cayenne, is only five degrees from the Equator. The primary people found by the Spanish when they first visited the area were the Caribs, who had displaced earlier residents, the Arawaks. Further inland were other peoples, in-

Status of religions in French Guiana, 2000-2050

Followers	2000			2025	2050
	total	%	rate
Christians	153,000	84.6	4.37	346,000	473,000
Roman Catholics	145,000	80.0	4.16	320,000	440,000
Protestants	7,000	3.9	3.02	12,500	13,000
Marginal Christians	5,500	3.0	4.93	12,000	15,000
Chinese folk-religionists	6,500	3.6	4.93	16,000	24,000
Spiritists	6,400	3.5	5.94	15,000	22,000
Nonreligious	4,600	2.5	6.87	15,000	27,000
Ethnoreligionists	3,500	1.9	3.36	7,500	10,000
Hindus	2,900	1.6	5.12	7,000	12,000
Muslims	1,600	0.9	4.64	3,600	5,000
Atheists	860	0.5	5.17	1,800	2,300
Baha'is	720	0.4	2.80	1,600	2,300
Neoreligionists	720	0.4	2.80	1,500	2,200
Jews	100	0.1	2.71	220	300
other religionists	110	0.1	3.24	300	500
Total population	181,000	100.0	4.48	416,000	581,000

cluding the Oyampi, Cussaris, and Emerillon. They practiced a variety of related indigenous religions, some of which have survived.

The Spanish and then the French, who occupied the coast in 1604, brought Catholicism with them. The land was disputed territory through the rest of the century and at different times was controlled by the Dutch, the British, and the Portuguese. French control was finally reestablished in 1676. Various efforts to build the colony with French citizens met with mixed results, due to the climate, and even now most of the population reside along the coast and on the nearby islands (one of which was the famous penal colony, Devil's Island).

Catholicism was established in 1636 and became the leading religion soon afterwards. Efforts were made to convert the indigenous population, and most immigrants were of a Catholic background. The Diocese of Cayenne was erected in 1956. The church was very slow in creating indigenous leadership, and no native Guianan was ordained as a priest until 1971.

Challenges to Catholic hegemony did not really begin until the twentieth century. At the beginning of the century, a member of the CHRISTIAN BROTHERS (the Open Plymouth Brethren) came to Guiana from Barbados to begin work. He was followed by representatives of the SEVENTH-DAY ADVENTIST CHURCH (1940), the JEHOVAH'S WITNESSES (1945), the SOUTHERN BAPTIST CONVENTION (1982), the EVANGELICAL CHURCH OF THE WEST INDIES (ECWI) (1986), the CHURCH OF THE NAZARENE (1988), and the CHURCH OF GOD OF PROPHECY (1991). The ECWI is an association of churches initiated by an American-based Evangelical sending agency, World Team, in the Caribbean.

Also, through the century, numerous people have moved into French Guiana from other lands, especially Brazil, Surinam, and Haiti. There is also a measurable community of Asians, mostly of Chinese and Indian heritage. The massive movement of immigrants into French Guiana has led to the establishment of a variety of different religions, including Afro-Brazilian spirit-possession groups, Spiritism, VOUDOU, Hinduism, and Buddhism. There are a few Muslims, most of Javanese or Lebanese extraction. French immigrants have brought Rosicrucianism, most noticeably members of the ANCIENT AND MYSTICAL ORDER ROSAE CRUCIS (an American-based group that has been quite successful in France).

Sources:

- Barrett, David. The Encyclopedia of World Christianity. 2d edition. New York: Oxford University Press, 2001.
- Bissio, Roberto Remo, et al. Third World Guide 93/94. Montevideo, Uruguay: Instituto del Tercer Mundo, 1992.

French Polynesia

The islands presently grouped together as French Polynesia include some 120 islands of the Society, Gambier, Austral, Marquesas, and Tuamotu archipelagoes. They were inhabited in prehistory by the Polynesians. Spanish explorers visited the Marquesas in 1595, but little attention was paid to them until the discovery of Tahiti in 1767 by the English explorer Samuel Wallis. The islands were then visited by Captain James Cook, and in 1789, Tahiti, the largest island, was the destination from which the H.M.S. Bounty had just sailed when the famous mutiny occurred in 1789.

In 1840, the French occupied the island. In 1843, they named it a protectorate and in 1880 designated it a colony, calling it the French Establishments of Oceania. Beginning in 1966, French Polynesia was for a period the site of some very controversial French nuclear tests. Finally in 1984, the islands were granted local autonomy, the provisions of which were strengthened in 1996 and 1998. France remains in control of the country's military affairs and the currency.

Prior to the coming of Christianity, the residents of the islands worshipped a pantheon of deities headed by a supreme god called Ta'aroa. The other deities were ascribed hegemony over vital areas of island life, such as the sea or the weather. The traditional religion has been all but obliterated by the modern import of Christianity.

An initial effort at evangelization by Roman Catholics in the islands began as early as 1659. A second attempt began in 1772 by some Franciscans from Peru. More permanent efforts were begun in the Gambier Islands in 1831 by French priests. They subsequently found their way to the Marquesas in 1838, Tahiti in 1842, and Tuamotu in 1849. In the decades following World War II, the church experienced significant growth, some attributed to the spread of a devotional movement centered upon the recitation of the rosary. The Living Rosary movement had begun in France under the leadership of Pauline Jaricot (1799–1862). Today, the church is centered on the Archdiocese of Papeete (Tahiti). There is also a diocese headquartered in the Marquesas and serving the northern islands.

In 1797, missionaries of the LONDON MISSIONARY SOCIETY (LMS) arrived in Tahiti, one of their very first missionary targets. A party of eighteen settled on the island (and another eleven went on to Tonga). The group encountered a variety of unexpected problems and by the turn of the century, only seven (five men and two women) remained, the rest having left for Australia and two having been dismissed for marrying local women. Crucial to the success of the mission, in 1815 King Pomare converted and requested to be baptized. He then saw to the building of a large church. At the king's urging, most of the people abandoned their old religion in favor of Christianity. The establishment of French rule and the introduction of Roman Catholic missionaries made the British-based LMS missionary work increasingly difficult, and in 1886 the missionaries turned their work over to representatives of the French Reformed Church's Paris Evangelical Missionary Society, which had already begun separate work on Tahiti.

Status of religions in French Polynesia, 2000–2050

Followers	2000			2025	2050
	total	%	rate
Christians	207,000	88.0	1.74	279,000	327,000
Protestants	110,000	46.8	2.14	150,000	178,000
Roman Catholics	100,000	42.5	2.32	140,000	165,000
Marginal Christians	25,000	10.6	2.26	35,000	46,000
Chinese folk-religionists	18,400	7.8	2.18	26,000	31,000
Nonreligious	8,300	3.5	3.51	16,000	25,000
Baha'is	700	0.3	3.35	1,500	3,000
Buddhists	340	0.2	1.41	500	800
Ethnoreligionists	220	0.1	1.00	300	400
other religionists	270	0.1	3.05	500	700
Total population	235,000	100.0	1.85	324,000	388,000

In 1963, the mission became autonomous as the Église Evangélique de Polynésie Française. The church is a member of the Pacific Conference of Churches and the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES.

Both the CHURCH OF JESUS CHRIST OF LATTER-DAY SAINTS (the Mormons) and the REORGANIZED CHURCH OF JESUS CHRIST OF LATTER-DAY SAINTS have started missions. The former arrived first in 1844, and the Mormons have built extensive work, given the special role they have assigned Polynesians in their scheme of salvation. The work begun by Elder Addison Pratt is considered the first Mormon mission to a non-English-speaking area of the world. The French closed the mission in 1852. It was reopened in 1892 and churches built for the remnant of loyal members. A temple was opened in Papeete in 1983. Most recently, the church reported 14,000 members. The Reorganized Church began with a schism in the LDS in the Tuamotu Islands in 1884.

The SEVENTH-DAY ADVENTIST CHURCH began work in 1892, and the JEHOVAH'S WITNESSES in 1932. The Evangelical Church has also been the scene of a number of schisms, among the most interesting being the Mamaia group, founded in the mid-1920s by a man with messianic pretensions and a calling to evict all white people from the islands. There have been several schisms since World War II, most on administrative issues. In 1968, the Chinese members left to found the Polynesian Pentecostal Churches. In 1977, Baptists made their first appearance in the area, with the entrance of the very conservative BAPTIST BIBLE FELLOWSHIP INTERNATIONAL.

Chinese had first arrived in the islands in 1865 and now constitute approximately 6 percent of the population. Although many are Christian, they have also established Buddhist centers. As in other French territories, the ANCIENT AND MYSTICAL ORDER ROSAE CRUCIS is present, and the BAHAI' FAITH has been growing since it arrived in 1955.

Sources:

- Ellsworth, S. G., and K. C. Perrin. Seasons of Faith and Courage: The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints in French Polynesia, a Sesquicentennial History, 1843–1993. Sandy, UT: Yves R. Perrin, 1994.
- Forman, Charles H. The Island Churches of the South Pacific: Emergence in the Twentieth Century. Maryknoll, NY: Orbis, 1982.
- Mauer, D. Protestant Church at Tahiti. Paris: Nouvelles Editions Latines, 1970.
- O'Reilly, P. Tahitian Catholic Church. Paris: Société des Océanistes, 1969.

Friends General Conference

The Friends General Conference is the more liberal wing of the FRIENDS movement, the wing that grew out of the ministry of Elias Hicks (1748–1830), an eloquent speaker who moved among American Quakers in the 1820s. He emphasized the more subjective side of the Quaker tradition, the reliance on the Inner Light for guidance, and tended to denigrate any outward forms. Among the implications of his approach was the gathering of Quakers for meetings without any prior planning (or programming). Thus those meetings attracted to Hicks messages came to be known as “unprogrammed.” Within the Hicksite faction, a new level of theological diversity became manifest.

Hicks's approach created open controversy in 1823 in the Philadelphia Yearly Meeting (the center of the Quaker community at the time), and over the next four years the controversy became harsher. Then in 1827 the Hicksite faction withdrew from the Philadelphia Meeting, and subsequently similar separations occurred in Friends' communities across the East and Midwest. Within a few years seven Hicksite yearly meetings were formed.

Further organization began after the American Civil War with the formation of a Sunday School Conference in 1868. It facilitated communication among the far-flung unprogrammed congregations, led to several other organizations focused on additional concerns, and culminated in the formation of the Friends General Conference in 1900.

With some 32,000 members, the Friends General Conference is the smallest of the three main Friends denominations, with members confined to North America.

Address:

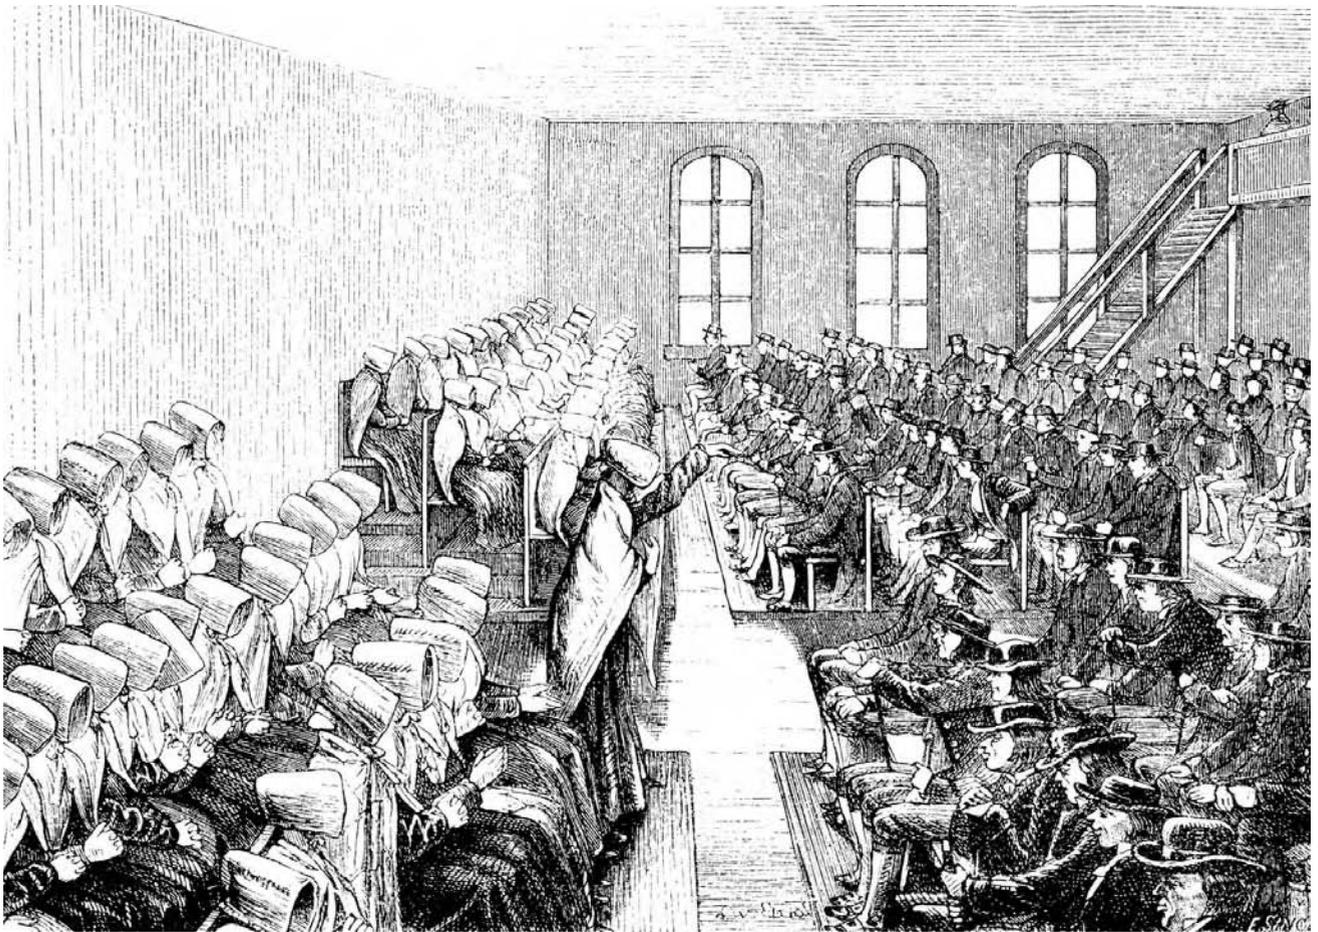

Friends General Conference
1216 Arch St., 2B
Philadelphia, PA 19107
<http://www.fgcquaker.org>

Sources:

- Doherty, Robert W. The Hicksite Separation. New Brunswick, NJ: Rutgers University Press, 1967.
- Friends World Committee for Consultation. Quakers around the World. London: Friends World Committee for Consultation, 1994.
- Jones, Rufus M. The Latter Periods of Quakerism. 2 vols. Westport, CT: Greenwood Press, 1970.

Friends/Quakers

The Friends movement, commonly known as the Quakers, emerged in seventeenth-century England as the most radical expression of the Puritan movement, the movement that attempted to complete the work of the Reformation in the Church of England by purifying it of non-Biblical elements that had accumulated over the centuries. George Fox (1624–1691), the movement's founder, was a mystic and social activist who began to preach in 1647, during the English Civil War, following his experience of inner illumination. His comments on the social scene drew fire during the years of the Commonwealth (1649–1660), when he was first arrested for his pacifist views.

A nineteenth-century meeting of the Society of Friends (North Wind Picture Archives)

The beginnings of a movement became visible in 1667 when Fox's followers organized a set of monthly (congregations), quarterly (district), and yearly (national) meetings. The Society of Friends was built around Fox's idea that the Bible was not the end of revelation, but that each believer had access to the inner light that provided immediate contact with the living Spirit. Gatherings were centered upon quietly waiting for the Spirit to speak. Bodily movements that appeared in these meetings gave members the popular appellation, Quakers. The messages received and the guidance they offered would then be tested by the teachings and example of Jesus.

Fox taught that Friends should lead simple lives, avoiding the vanities of the world. Members did not wear colorful clothing, wigs, or jewelry. Their language was characterized by their refusal to use "you" when addressing social superiors, as was customary; they addressed everyone with the familiar "thee" and "thou," which further set them apart. They became known for their participation in various social causes, including abolition, prison reform, and most notably, pacifism. Heightened tension over their pacifism regularly arose in times of war.

Persecuted in England, Quakers found a haven in the American colonies when William Penn (1644–1718) founded Pennsylvania and invited his fellow believers to settle there. They first arrived in 1655. Pennsylvania subsequently became a major source of American ideals of freedom of religion.

The Friends remained a small minority group both in England and the United States, and their support for the anti-slavery cause further limited their growth in the American South. However, through the nineteenth and early twentieth century, they spread across North America. As early as 1681 the first General Meeting of Friends was held in New Jersey. It evolved into the General Yearly Meeting of Friends in Philadelphia, East Jersey, and Adjacent Provinces, and as the Philadelphia Yearly Meeting continues as the oldest Quaker association in North America.

During the nineteenth century, several issues split the Friends, and various yearly meetings arose that advocated several distinct perspectives. As the number of yearly meetings proliferated across the United States, various associations of yearly meetings appeared, the most important being the FRIENDS UNITED MEETING, the FRIENDS GEN-ERAL CONFERENCE, and the EVANGELICAL FRIENDS INTERNATIONAL. Friends have also organized for joint efforts on various social issues through the FRIENDS WORLD COMMITTEE FOR CONSULTATION (FWCC). The movement began to spread in the late nineteenth century as Friends participated in the global Protestant missionary movement, and yearly meetings are now found on every continent. Their greatest success was in Kenya, where the EAST AFRICA YEARLY MEETING OF FRIENDS became the largest Quaker association in the world.

The organizational center of the Society of Friends remains in England, where the FWCC and the London Yearly Meeting are headquartered.

Sources:

- Comfort, William Wistar. The Quaker Way of Life. Philadelphia: Blakiston, 1945.
- Cooper, Wilmer A. Living Faith: A Historical and Comparative Study of Quaker Beliefs. Richmond, IN: Friends United Press, 2001.
- Friends World Committee for Consultation. Quakers around the World. London: Friends World Committee for Consultation, 1994.
- Peck, George. What Is Quakerism? A Primer. Wallingford, PA: Pendle Hill Publications, 1988.
- Whitmire, Catherine. Plain Living: The Quaker Path to Simplicity. Notre Dame, IN: Sorin Books, 2001.

Friends United Meeting

Formed in 1902, the Friends United Meeting brings together the primary elements of the Friends or Quaker movement in the United States, which dates to the colonial era. The Friends movement developed around relatively small autonomous associations of congregations in a particular area, and by this means the movement spread across the United States during the nineteenth century and funded missionaries in Africa and Latin America. The Friends United Meeting has brought together one set of these yearly meetings (as the congregational associations are called).

The United Meeting traces its origins to the earlier arrival of Quakers in the American colonies in the 1650s. As in England, most colonists did not welcome them. The Congregationalists in New England saw them as disturbers of the peace, whose presence distracted from the religious uniformity they hoped to build. Quakers found a haven in the religiously free Rhode Island, and there they organized the first congregation (quarterly meeting). The real strength of the movement, however, was in Pennsylvania, where William Penn (1644–1718), a wealthy Quaker, created a colony, in large part to provide a refuge for Quakers and others who were suffering from religious persecution both in England and on the European continent. The first organization of Quakers above the congregational level, the General Meeting of Friends, gathered in 1681 in Burlington, New Jersey. It became the seed from which the Philadelphia Yearly Meeting eventually grew.

The Friends movement developed on the radical fringe of the Puritan movement. While accepting a basic Protestant belief structure, including belief in the fatherhood of God, the lordship of Jesus Christ, salvation by faith, and the priesthood of all believers, Friends have tended to withdraw from participation in the state and are confirmed pacifists. As various times, their refusal to participate in wars has earned them the contempt of neighbors, which they have countered with a strong emphasis on social service. The Friends have also dropped the practice of water baptism, interpreting the one baptism referred to in Ephesians 4:4–5 as a baptism of the spirit.

Friends have been known for their unique worship services based upon their understanding of the guidance of the Inner Light. They were known to sit in silence, waiting for the Holy Spirit to move in the hearts of those who had gathered. This emphasis made then the subject of two very different trends in the early nineteenth century. In the 1820s, many Friends were attracted to the teachings of Elias Hicks, who placed total reliance on the Inner Light and advocated an approach to worship that included no preplanning. Those meetings that accepted his idea became known as “unprogrammed” meetings. The Hicksite Friends now form the FRIENDS GENERAL CONFERENCE. Another group of Friends were attracted to the Holiness teachings of Methodist John Wesley, as delivered by Joseph John Gurney. Most of those yearly meetings affected by the Holiness teachings are now gathered in the EVANGELICAL FRIENDS INTERNATIONAL.

Those meetings that rejected both the approach of Elias Hicks and that of J. J. Gurney continued as the largest faction of the movement. In the 1880s, efforts to bring the yearly meetings into a closer relationship were initiated. Conferences were held every five years through the last decades of the century, and in 1902 a loose association, called appropriately the Five Years Meeting, came into existence. The Five Years Meeting evolved into the Friends United Meeting in 1965. At the end of the 1990s, it included twenty-seven yearly meetings. The yearly meetings cover the United States, but two-thirds of the 150,000 members are now found outside the United States, in the yearly meetings in Cuba, Africa, Jamaica, Mexico, and Israel.

Administratively, the work of the Friends United Meeting is carried out through the General Board. The Department of World Ministries relates American Friends to the associated meetings overseas. The Meeting is a member of both the National Council of Churches of Christ in the U.S.A. and the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES and cooperates fully with the FRIENDS WORLD COMMITTEE FOR CONSULTATION.

Address:

Friends United Meeting
101 Quaker Hill Dr.
Richmond Hill, IN 47374
<http://www.fum.org>

Sources:

“Friends United Meeting.” In Friends in the Americas, edited by Francis B. Hall. Philadelphia, PA: Friends World Committee, Section of the Americas, 1976.

Friends World Committee for Consultation. Quakers around the World. London: Friends World Committee for Consultation, 1994.

Friends World Committee for Consultation

The Friends World Committee for Consultation (FWCC) was the major product of the Second World Conference of Friends (Quakers) that was held at Swarthmore, Pennsylvania, in 1937. It expressed the desire for greater unity among Quakers, who had been split by doctrinal differences in the nineteenth century but had found a new sense of unity in their peace witness as a result of World War I. Also, by the 1930s, after several centuries as primarily a movement in England and North America, the Friends had become a worldwide movement. The initial work of the committee was somewhat inhibited by the outbreak of World War II soon after its founding.

FWCC rebounded after the war and in 1952 organized the next World Conference, which was held in Oxford, England, in 1952. Since that time it has worked on its multifaceted program of assisting Friends to transcend their doctrinal differences, coordinating various social programs, representing Friends in different ecumenical settings, and providing a united voice for Quaker witness on social issues, especially issues related to peace and social justice. Most of the yearly (district and national) meetings around the world are affiliated to the committee.

The committee is divided into four sections—Africa, the Americas, Asia and the West Pacific, and Europe and the Middle East. The committee holds a large international meeting every three years. An Interim Committee and a staff headed by the executive secretary carry on the work of the committee between the triennial gatherings. The committee sees as one of its essential functions the maintenance of communication between Friends worldwide, many of whom live as small minorities within their own countries, and providing a sense of the global nature of their work and witness.

There are some seventy related yearly meetings, and several hundred thousand Friends worldwide.

Address:

Friends World Committee for Consultation
4 Byng Pl.
London WC1E 7JH
United Kingdom
<http://www.quaker.org/fwcc/FWCC.html>

Sources:

Friends World Committee for Consultation. Quakers around the World. London: Friends World Committee for Consultation, 1994.

Peck, George. What Is Quakerism? A Primer. Wallingford, PA: Pendle Hill Publications, 1988.

Gabon

Gabon, on the Atlantic coast of Africa between the Congo and Equatorial Guinea, has been an inhabited area for several thousand years, but in the sixteenth century it was invaded by the Myene and in the next century by the Fang people. The majority of the population were from various Bantu groups, but the Fang became the dominating force. Europeans had begun to visit the area in 1472 (the Portuguese), and sailors from various nations continued to land on the coast to collect slaves and ivory. The Myene and Fang cooperated with the Europeans in these endeavors. In the middle of the nineteenth century, as the slave trade was winding down, Libreville was founded as a city for freed slaves.

The French, who controlled Gabon for many years, had little interest in exploiting its resources and used it primarily as a conduit to more interesting parts of Africa. Only in the late twentieth century has it become valuable for its uranium and oil deposits. The country made a rather peaceful transition to independence in 1960.

The many different peoples had a variety of traditional religions, most of which have been replaced by Christianity. The veneration of ancestors was a common theme among them. There were also various secret societies, the most important being the BWITI, a male group dedicated to the remembrance of the great ancestors. It developed quite strongly among the Fang and more recently began to admit females to initiation. Members consume a root that possesses psychedelic properties. The eboga root is used in initiation ceremonies in place of water baptism. Bwiti emerged in the late nineteenth century. Suppressed during the colonial era, it developed a branch that incorporated Christian elements and was then legalized in 1970. The Bwiti is now the third largest religious group in Gabon.

Christianity was introduced to Gabon by Capuchin missionaries who arrived from Italy in the 1600s. However, they were expelled by the Portuguese in 1777. In the nineteenth

Status of religions in Gabon, 2000-2050

Followers	2000			2025	2050
	total	%	rate
Christians	1,111,000	90.6	2.71	1,776,000	2,378,000
Roman Catholics	745,000	60.8	2.62	1,180,000	1,550,000
Protestants	233,000	19.0	2.87	400,000	600,000
Independents	180,000	14.7	3.15	320,000	470,000
Muslims	56,700	4.6	3.55	110,000	170,000
Ethnoreligionists	37,700	3.1	1.98	50,000	60,000
Nonreligious	13,000	1.1	6.35	30,000	50,000
Neoreligionists	6,000	0.5	2.19	11,000	18,000
Atheists	780	0.1	2.68	1,500	3,000
Baha'is	400	0.0	0.12	1,000	1,800
other religionists	720	0.1	1.90	1,600	3,000
Total population	1,226,000	100.0	2.75	1,981,000	2,682,000

century the Congregation of the Sacred Heart of Mary and the HOLY GHOST FATHERS became the backbone of the ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH presence in the region. Libreville became the center of church activity in the 1850s, and the Vicariate Apostolic of Senegambia and the Two Guineas was established, with the vicar residing in Gabon. In 1863, the area was divided into several vicariates and the Vicariate of Libreville was created. In 1958, Libreville was elevated to archdiocesan status and a new Diocese of Mouila created. A third diocese was set apart in 1969.

The EVANGELICAL CHURCH OF GABON had its beginnings when missionaries from the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions arrive in 1842. They turned their work over to American Presbyterians in 1870, who in turn gave way to the Paris Mission (Reformed Church of France) in 1892. The Gabon Mission became independent in 1961. In 1934, the Paris Mission encouraged the Christian and Missionary Alliance to begin work in the southern half of the country, their mission maturing as the Evangelical Church of South Gabon.

The Roman Catholic Church remains the largest church in the country, claiming upwards of 60 percent of the population. Besides the two larger Protestant churches, there are a few smaller groups, including the JEHOVAH'S WITNESSES, the KIMBANGUIST CHURCH (which arrived from the Congo in the 1950s), and the indigenous Evangelical Church of Pentecost.

There is a small Muslim community, most of whom follow the Sunni Maliki school. The community received a boost in 1973, when Albert Bongo, who had become president of Gabon in 1967, announced that he had converted to Islam. The BAHAI FAITH entered the country in the years after World War II. As is common in most former French colonies, there are several lodges of the ANCIENT AND MYSTICAL ORDER ROSAE CRUCIS.

Sources:

Hamilton, B. A. "The Environment, Establishment, and Development of Protestant Missions in French Equatorial Africa." Ph.D. dissertation, Grace Theological Seminary, 1959.

Kasule, O. H. "Muslims in Gabon, West Africa." Journal of the Institute of Muslim Minority Affairs 6, 1 (1985): 192-206.

Klein, C. M. We Went to Gabon. Harrisburg, PA: Christian Publications, 1974.

Stoecklin, P., et al. L'Église Evangélique du Gabon, 1842-1961. Alençon: Imprimerie Corbière et Jagain, 1962.

Gambia

Gambia is a small African nation that exists along the Gambia River, which flows into the center of Senegal. Gambia is surrounded by Senegal on three side, the Atlantic Ocean forming its western border. The largest group of Gambia's citizens consists of the Mandingo people, who moved into the area in the fifteenth century. They shared power along the river with the kingdom of Mali. The Portuguese arrived in 1455, and their presence caused a significant amount of the economic life to shift toward the ocean.

In 1618, the British purchased Gambia from Portugal and thus established Great Britain's initial foothold in western Africa. The British worked the river and established a system of gathering slaves for transport to its colonies in North America and the Caribbean. The British saw the area primarily as a source for slaves, and neither the government nor the British churches saw it as an area for missionary work. Meanwhile, beginning in the early nineteenth century, Islam became the dominant religion in the country.

After the end of the slave trade, Gambia lost its economic importance to Great Britain and was transformed primarily into an irritant for France who controlled Senegal. In 1889, the French and British reached an agreement that set the present border between Gambia and Senegal. Gambia be-

Status of religions in the Gambia, 2000-2050

Followers	2000			2025	2050
	total	%	rate
Muslims	1,134,000	86.8	3.67	1,916,000	2,478,000
Ethnoreligionists	102,000	7.8	2.29	120,000	129,000
Christians	50,500	3.9	3.29	82,000	108,000
Roman Catholics	31,200	2.4	3.38	50,000	65,000
Independents	9,000	0.7	3.74	18,000	25,000
Protestants	3,700	0.3	3.12	5,000	6,000
Baha'is	10,800	0.8	6.40	17,000	28,000
Nonreligious	8,100	0.6	4.29	15,500	30,000
Hindus	210	0.0	4.19	400	800
Total population	1,305,000	100.0	3.56	2,151,000	2,773,000

The Pipeline Mosque in Gambia (J. Short/TRIP)

came autonomous in 1963 and in 1965 became an independent nation in the British Commonwealth.

Although some traditional religion remains in Gambia, the great majority of the people became Muslim (Sunni MALIKITE SCHOOL OF ISLAM) in the nineteenth century. Both the Tariq and the MURIDIYYA Sufi Brotherhoods are also present, having come into the country from Senegal. In 1960, the AHMADIYYA MOVEMENT IN ISLAM also established a small presence. The BAHÁ'Í FAITH began a growth phase in the 1960s.

It was not until 1816 that an Anglican chaplain made his way to Gambia. Later missionaries from the SOCIETY FOR THE PROPAGATION OF THE GOSPEL IN FOREIGN PARTS established a small mission. The CHURCH OF ENGLAND's work was incorporated into the Diocese of Gambia, which in 1951 became part of the CHURCH OF THE PROVINCE OF WEST AFRICA. Representatives of the METHODIST CHURCH came in 1821, and Gambia became a launching pad for Methodism's expansion throughout West Africa. The first permanent mission of the ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH was established in 1849. There is now a Catholic diocese, established in 1957, whose bishop resides at Banjul. Many of the priests are HOLY GHOST FATHERS from Ireland.

These three churches dominated the Christian community through the mid-1950s. Together they constituted the Christian Council of Gabon, which in turn is affiliated with the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES. However, beginning with the World Evangelical Crusade (now WEC International), which entered the country in 1957, several Evangelical organizations have begun a new missionary effort. The primary effort has come from the Association of Baptists for World Evangelism, an American-based Evangelical missionary-sending organization that began sending missionaries in 1979. The first missionary couple, Mel Pittman and Ruby Pittman, were the vanguard heralding the arrival of what had become by the end of the twentieth century a team of seventeen. The SOUTHERN BAPTIST CONVENTION opened a mission in 1982.

Sources:

- Laughton, J. R. C. Gambia: Country, People and Church in the Diocese of Gambia and the Rio Pongas. London: S.P.G., 1938.
- Maranz, D. E. Peace Is Everything: World View of Muslims in Senegambia. Dallas: Summer Institute of Linguistics, 1993.
- Quinn, C. A. "Mandingo Kingdoms of the Senegambia: Traditionalism, Islam, and European Expansion." Ph.D. dissertation, Northwestern University, 1972.

Gardnerian Wicca

528

In its narrower sense, Gardnerian Wicca refers to one initiatory lineage within contemporary pagan Witchcraft whose members can trace a line of their initiators back to Gerald Brosseau Gardner (1884–1964). In a wider sense, the term is sometimes used to refer to many forms of the new religion of Wicca (the only modern religion born in Britain) that share elements of the strictly defined Gardnerian tradition. (Tradition in Wicca can be loosely compared to denomination in Protestant Christianity.)

Gardner himself was born in a suburb of Liverpool, where his father was a partner in a prosperous firm of timber importers. He had little formal education; due to acute asthma, he was often sent on sea voyages to warmer Mediterranean climates with his nurse-governess. When he was sixteen, his governess married a tea plantation owner in Ceylon (now Sri Lanka, at that time a British colony). He worked two years for the couple and then took a managerial job on another plantation. During his early adult years he also became a Freemason. He later managed rubber plantations in Borneo and Malaysia, and after contracting malaria, took employment with the colonial government inspecting rubber plantations and overseeing the legal opium trade. He retired in 1936 and returned with his English wife, Donna, to live on the south coast of England at Highcliffe near Bournemouth. During his years of contact with South Asian cultures he had become intensely interested in such ideas as reincarnation, shamanism, and magic.

In 1939, Gardner claims to have met a handful of surviving British witches, been initiated, and been given permission to write about the Craft, first as fiction (High Magic's Aid) and then as nonfiction (Witchcraft Today). Some historians of the pagan revival, such as Aidan Kelly and Ronald Hutton, question whether any such coven actually existed or whether Gardner and some friends themselves created it. Philip Heselton, on the other hand, argues in his book Wiccan Roots that the coven did exist and suggests who its members in fact were. Regardless of its origins, Gardnerian Wicca enjoyed steady growth throughout the 1950s and 1960s, aided by books and interviews that caused interested people to seek out Gardner and his coveners.

Gardnerian Wicca spread to North America both through Gardner's books and in the persons of Raymond Buckland (b. 1934) and Rosemary Buckland, an English couple who came to Long Island in the early 1960s. By then the American science fiction writer Margaret St. Clair (1911–1995) had already absorbed Gardner's Witchcraft Today and included many of its elements in her 1963 novel Sign of the Labrys. Most American and Canadian Gardnerian witches (in the stricter sense) trace their lineage to the Bucklands, although Raymond Buckland, a frequent writer on Wicca, in the 1970s downplayed the importance of such lineage, going so far as to start his own from-scratch tradition, Seax Wicca (Saxon Witchcraft).

Gardnerian Wiccans regard Wicca as an initiatory mystery religion, not a mass movement, and tend to adopt elitist attitudes towards other more public forms of Wicca. There are three degrees of initiation, the first making one a priest or priestess and the second conferring the right to teach the Craft. The third qualifies one to form one's own coven, although sometimes second-degree witches may also do so. Ideally, a coven would have a high priestess (Witch Queen) and high priest (Magus), both of the third degree, and no more than thirteen members. Gardnerian covens tend to be hierarchical, with leaders ritually addressed as "Lady" or "Lord." Third-degree initiates gain greater prestige based on the number of covens that have "hived off" from theirs. Each coven is autonomous, although persons judged to have broken their initiatory oaths may be shunned by members of other covens.

The ritual year is based upon a series of eight "sabbats," at the solstices, equinoxes, and the four cross-quarter days half way between the solstices and equinoxes, plus "esbats," or magic-working and coven-business sessions that may be held at the full moon. All Gardnerian Wiccans are expected to copy their teachers's "Book of Shadows," a collection of core ritual scripts, chants, and other material, to which the student may later add. The eight seasonal rituals are not changed, however, as part of a deliberate effort to continue a shared current of energy that each generation adds to a form of "group soul." Followers believe that they will reincarnate in circumstances permitting them to rejoin their coveners in their next lives. Gardnerian covens emphasize the "drawing down" or "carrying" of their deities, a form of trance-possession similar to that found in VODOU and CANDOMBLÉ. Among contemporary Wiccans, they have made this a hallmark of their practice.

Initiates themselves estimate that there are approximately 220–230 covens, with a total of about 3,600 initiated Gardnerian-lineage witches in North America. In another sense—that popularized by historian of religion Aidan Kelly—most Wicca is Gardnerian, if it includes those elements that do not seem to have been part of English Witchcraft before Gerald Gardner's writings were published: an asexual Godhead manifesting as a God and Goddess, ritual leadership primarily or ideally female, seasonal and lunar rituals performed within a magic circle with elemental guardians invoked at each cardinal direction, a belief in reincarnation, and the idea that Wicca is a revived ancient religion with its own theology, not merely a loose collection of magical practices. Although none of these characteristics are unique to contemporary Wicca, collectively they go a long way toward defining it. The widespread influence of Gardner's and his followers' writings (especially the writings of Doreen Valiente [1922–1999], who served as Gardner's high priestess in the 1950s and authored several books of her own) have exercised a magnetic influence on other forms of witchcraft and caused them to align with this broadly Gardnerian model.

A variety of Gardnerians have developed a presence on the Internet, and it is possibly the best avenue for contact, as they have no central or authorized spokesperson. One access point is the Gardnerian Tradition Web Ring, which may be reached at <http://members.tripod.com/~Moonpfyr/web/indexring.html>. A list of Gardnerian contacts is posted at <http://www.wicca.drak.net/gardnerian/gardcont.html>.

Chas S. Clifton

Sources:

- Gardner, Gerald B. High Magic's Aid. London: Michael Houghton, 1949.
- . The Meaning of Witchcraft. Wellingborough, UK: N.p., 1959.
- . Witchcraft Today. London: Rider, 1954.
- Heselton, Philip. Wiccan Roots: Gerald Gardner and the Modern Witchcraft Revival. Freshfields, UK: Capall Bann Publishing, 2000.
- Hutton, Ronald. The Triumph of the Moon: A History of Modern Pagan Witchcraft. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1999.
- Kelly, Aidan. Crafting the Art of Magic. St. Paul, MN: Llewellyn, 1991.
- St. Clair, Margaret. Sign of the Labrys. New York: Bantam Books, 1963.
- Valiente, Doreen. The Rebirth of Witchcraft. London: Robert Hale, 1989.

Garífuna Religion

The ethnic group known as the Garífuna, or Black Caribs, live today in Central America, the Caribbean, and various cities in the United States, Canada, and England (a total population of about 100,000–150,000) and can be distinguished by their unique cultural patterns: language, religion, crafts, music, dance, and lifestyle.

The history of the Garífuna (cassava-eating people) begins on the island of St. Vincent in the eastern Caribbean, which was originally inhabited by a mixture of Carib and Arawak tribes (linguistically Maipuran and Arawakan, or Island Carib) from mainland South America prior to the period of Spanish colonization that began in 1492. Soon after their initial contact with Europeans, the Island Caribs began to absorb individual Europeans (from Spain, France, and England) and West Africans (mainly from shipwrecked Spanish slave ships) by means of capture or rescue. By 1700, a new ethnic group emerged on St. Vincent that was racially and culturally distinct from that of the Island Caribs: the Garífuna.

In terms of their language and cultural patterns, the Garífuna are an Afro-Amerindian people (called Zambos by the Spanish) who have blended various traits of their ancestors to create a unique social system with a strong emphasis on music, dance, and story-telling and with its own unique brand of religion, which consists of a mixture of Indian, African, and Catholic beliefs. Another distinction is that the Garífuna are matrifocal, which means that the women are the center of the household and that people trace their bloodlines through their mother's family.

In November of 1997, the Garífuna celebrated the two hundredth anniversary of their arrival on the shores of Central America, after being forcibly removed by the British from the island of St. Vincent in 1797. After conquering many of the Spanish-held islands in the Caribbean, the British decided to take control of the French-held island of St. Vincent during the 1770s. By 1783, the British had dominated the French inhabitants and their slaves and attempted to subjugate about 7,000–8,000 Garífunas. However, many Garífunas were killed in battles with the British or died from European diseases during this period. During 1795–1797, the British hunted down, killed, or captured the remaining Garífuna population, destroyed their homes, and deported on eight or nine ships about 2,250 survivors to the island of Roatan in the Bay Islands, off the coast of Honduras. However, the Garífuna leaders considered Roatan to be unsuitable for such a large population and requested help from the Spanish authorities at Trujillo, on the mainland of Honduras. By the end of September 1797, about 1,700 Garífuna had been resettled near Trujillo by the Spanish, who hoped that the Garífuna would provide them with needed manpower for the development of farming communities on the north coast of Honduras.

By 1900, the Garífuna had established their own settlements along the Caribbean coast of Central America, predominantly in Honduras, Guatemala, and Belize (known at that time as British Honduras), but also at Sandy Bay in Nicaragua. The principal settlements were at Stann Creek and Punta Gorda in Belize; Livingston, near Puerto Barrios, in Guatemala; and at scores of locations along the northern coast of Honduras, near the major cities of Puerto Cortés, Tela, La Ceiba, and Trujillo. In 1974, it was estimated that the Garífuna population in Honduras was about 60,900, with about 10,600 in Belize, 5,500 in Guatemala, and 800 in Nicaragua. With few exceptions, most of these settlements were located within 200 yards of the sea, near river mouths, freshwater lagoons, and protected bays. Also during the 1970s, thousands of Garífuna were reported to have migrated to U.S. cities (New York, Boston, New Orleans, and Los Angeles), where the men typically served in the U.S. merchant fleet. More recently, Garífuna families have been reported in port cities of Canada and Great Britain.

Soon after their arrival in Central America in 1797, the Garífuna were considered by the Spanish and British settlers to be “devil-worshippers, polygamists and speakers of a secret language,” which strengthened the Garífunas’s resolve to live apart in their own settlements, maintain their independence, and preserve their culture. Garífuna songs and dances display a wide range of subject matter; for example, there are work songs, social dances, and ancestral ceremonies centered on traditions. One of the most popular dances is called “La Punta,” which is performed at wakes, holidays, parties, and other social events. Some of these traditional dances and ceremonies have to do with the Garífunas’s respect for the dead: the Amuyadahani (bathing the spirit of the dead), the Chuga (feeding the dead), and the Dugu (the feasting of the dead).

The Garífunas perform these religious rites and ceremonies because, like many Amerindian and African societies, they believe that the spirits of their dead ancestors, which are both good and evil and have a direct impact on the lives of people in the living world, must be respected, worshipped, and appeased. This religious tradition bears some resemblance to SPIRITISM.

Although some Garífunas adopted Catholicism on the island of St. Vincent during the French occupation or after arriving on the Spanish-controlled mainland of Central America, this was rather a “political decision” than an authentic conversion to Christianity. After migrating to the south coast of Belize and establishing permanent settlements, some Garífunas accepted the presence of Anglican, Methodist, and Baptist missionaries in their villages and eventually the establishment of English-speaking Protestant churches and schools, beginning in the early 1800s. Later, the Seventh-day Adventists and the Church of the Nazarene developed churches and schools in Garífunas villages in Belize. In Honduras, there are a few Baptist churches among the Garífunas, near Tela.

However, the core of Garífunas culture consists of their traditional Afro-Amerindian rites and rituals, which are practiced in every Garífunas settlement, and the buwiye (shaman [male or female]), is the direct psychological link between the ancestors and the souls of the living. An important part of their religious ceremonies involves the use of songs, drinking, and dance, accompanied by drums and other musical instruments, a combination that sometimes induces a trance-like state of consciousness (called “spirit-possession”) during which time a person is believed to enter the spirit world and communicate with the ancestors, according to practitioners. These ceremonies, which are similar in some respects to VODOU, SANTERÍA, and obeah practices in Haiti, Cuba and Puerto Rico, and Jamaica, respectively, are used to mourn the dead, heal the sick, protect family members from harm, do harm to one’s enemies, discern the future, assure good fishing and harvests, find a mate, help the dead achieve peace and happiness in the next world, appease alienated spirits, and so on. Rum is often administered ritually to begin a ceremony or induce a trance; it is thrown out of the doors and windows to attract the spirits; it is sprinkled upon the dancers, drummers, and the possessed to cool and soothe; it is used to cure those seeking relief from physical and psychological ills; and it is used to anoint the sacred table at the end of the ceremony. Food, flowers, and candles are normally used in these ceremonies as well, but there is no mention of animal sacrifices being used as in Vodou, Santería, and obeah rituals. Although many Garífunas today speak Creole English and/or Spanish, most continue to use their traditional language, which is a unique blend of Arawak, Carib, French, Yuroba, Bantu, and Swahili.

Clifton L. Holland

Sources:

- Davidson, William V. “Black Carib (Garífunas) Habitats in Central America.” In Frontier Adaptations in Lower Central America, edited by Mary W. Helms and Franklin O. Loveland. Philadelphia: Institute for the Study of Human Issues, 1976.
- “The Garífunas of Belize and St. Vincent.” Posted at <http://www.centrelink.org/Belize.html>. Accessed October 15, 2001.
- Gonzalez, Nancie L. Sojourners of the Caribbean: Ethnogenesis and Ethnohistory of the Garífunas. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1988.
- Olmos, Margarite Fernández, and Lizabeth Paravisini-Gebert, eds. Sacred Possessions: Vodou, Santería, Obeah and the Caribbean. New Brunswick, NJ: Rutgers University Press, 1997.

Gaudiya Math

The Gaudiya Math family of institutions represents the most visible form of VAISHNAVISM, the worship of Vishnu, in the world outside of India and, increasingly, within India itself. It traces its origins to the life of Chaitanya Mahaprabhu (1486–1533), the great saint and ecstatic of Bengal, whom Gaudiya Math followers hold to be an incarnation of Krishna (Vishnu’s avatar) himself.

Like many modern Indian religious movements, the Gaudiya Math had its birth in the reforming period of the nineteenth century, when its spiritual father, Kedarnath Datta Bhaktivinoda (1838–1914), commonly known as Bhaktivinoda Thakur, undertook to reveal the theological depth of the form of Vaishnavism taught by Chaitanya. Bhaktivinoda’s son, Bhaktisiddhanta Saraswati (1869–1936), was the actual founder of the Gaudiya Math in 1918, creating a modern institution to promote Vaishnavism. In so doing, he made a number of radical changes in the external forms of the religion, which can be summarized as (1) a new attitude to social organization, known as daiva Var-nashram, which rejects all hereditary spiritual rights; (2) a more intellectually based religious life, rejecting the quietist and mystical approaches that predominated in traditional Vaishnava circles; and (3) a strict moralism, fundamentally rejecting abuses that had grown out of antinomian elements in the tradition.

The evangelical fervor that Siddhanta Saraswati brought to his preaching resulted in the establishment of sixty-four branches of his math (monastery) before he died in 1936. His conviction of the depth of the Vaishnava tradition inspired him to send disciples to England and Germany to spread the teachings, though with limited results. He left behind him a large number of highly committed and learned disciples, many of them sannyasi (in the renounced order of life). His succession was troubled, however, and a first schism took place in 1943, when Bhakti Vilasa Tirtha rejected the leadership of Bhakti Prasad Puri and became acharya (teacher) of the Chaitanya Math. Puri Maharaj's organization is now officially known as the Gaudiya Mission. Other disciples of Siddhanta Saraswati became disillusioned with the leadership of both these acharyas and left to form their own independent institutions in the 1940s and 1950s. Most prominent amongst these sannyasis were: Bhakti Rakshak Sridhar, Bhakti Dayita Madhava, Bhakti Prajnan Keshava, Bhakti Hriday Bon, Bhakti Saranga Goswami, and Bhakti Kusum Madhusudan. Most of these acharyas established separate branches in Calcutta and Nabadwip-Mayapur (the birthplace of Chaitanya Mahaprabhu) and generally had a stronghold in some regions of West Bengal, Assam, or Orissa. Some of them also established branches in other parts of India, such as Delhi, Bombay, and Chandigarh, where they often served a predominantly Bengali clientele. A. C. Bhaktivedanta Swami (1896–1977), who started the INTERNATIONAL SOCIETY FOR KRISHNA CONSCIOUSNESS (ISKCON), was a relative latecomer and founded his society in 1967 in the United States (after an earlier, failed attempt to form another institution, the League of Devotees, in Jhansi in 1953).

Although these various Gaudiya Maths had differing degrees of success in India prior to the spreading of the Hare Krishna movement internationally, ISKCON's unprecedented accomplishments around the world had undeniable repercussions on its relatives. In the early stages, the relationship of ISKCON to the Gaudiya Maths was problematic, due to Bhaktivedanta Swami's having been something of an outsider in his spiritual master's original movement. However, Bhaktivedanta Swami had strong friendships with two prominent sannyasi god-brothers, Bhakti Rakshak Sridhar (1895–1983), founder of the Chaitanya Saraswata Math, and Bhakti Prajnan Keshava (1898–1968), founder of the Gaudiya Vedanta Samiti. These relations were renewed following his return to India with his disciples from the Americas and Europe, and after his death in 1977, many of those disciples went to seek instruction in the Gaudiya Vaishnava religious tradition from Sridhar and Bhaktivedanta Narayan, one of Keshava's most prominent disciples. Another senior disciple of Siddhanta Saraswati, Bhakti Promode Puri (1899–2000), became a source of attraction to Westerners interested in the more authentic Gaudiya Math culture. Puri Maharaj became the first president of the World Vaishnava Association in 1994.

Sridhar's successor Bhakti Sundar Govinda (b. 1929; a Bengali) continues to travel all over the world and make disciples. Some of Sridhar's Western disciples have also known considerable success, particularly Bhakti Aloka Paramadvaiti (b. 1953), a Swiss national and disciple of Bhaktivedanta Swami, who founded his own organization, VRINDA, which now has more than a hundred centers, most prominently in South America. Paramadvaiti has also been the driving force in reviving the WORLD VAISHNAVA ASSOCIATION (Visva Vaishnava Raja Sabha), an attempt to coordinate the activities of the disparate Gaudiya Maths. This project has met with limited success, and there are few joint projects by the various institutions, though, with the significant exception of ISKCON, most are members.

Another prominent Western disciple of Bhaktivedanta Swami who accepted Sridhar as siksha guru (teacher) and formed an independent society is Swami Bhaktivedanta Tripurari. The Gaudiya Vaishnava Society's northern California monastery, Audarya, is its only math. Swami Tripurari has concentrated on making a literary contribution rather than on establishing maths and making disciples. His writing focuses on presenting esoteric Gaudiya Vaishnava doctrines in contemporary language. He has also successfully established an Internet congregation that transcends sectarian boundaries and serves the entire international Gaudiya Vaishnava community.

The above-mentioned Bhaktivedanta Narayan (Gaudiya Vedanta Samiti), who performed the funeral rites (samadhi) for Bhaktivedanta Swami, is the most charismatic force in the Gaudiya Vaishnava world today and has attracted the largest number of disciples outside of India, with followers on every continent and a strong publishing program in several languages. Narayan has his principal center in Mathura, India.

Bhakti Ballabh Tirtha, the current acharya of the Chaitanya Gaudiya Math, has also been particularly active worldwide and has disciples in the United States, England, and Russia, but this math's principal strength is in Assam. Bhakti Promode Puri (Gopinath Gaudiya Math) also has a following in Russia.

Doctrinally, there is not much to distinguish the Gaudiya Math from ISKCON. The principal differences are in form—the Gaudiya Math has not been overly influenced by Western elements. ISKCON has generally been suspicious of the Gaudiya Math's learning and charisma.

The Gaudiya Math has generally taken a more traditional form in India, with a single acharya generally inheriting the institution from his predecessor. The ritual of the Gaudiya Math is fairly standard throughout all the institutions, with few of the individual leaders leaving much of an individual mark. They pride themselves on fidelity to the traditions established by Siddhanta Saraswati. Though different Gaudiya Math institutions have branches throughout India, the Bengali language predominates as the language of hymns (kirtan), which are, as in traditional Bengali Vaishnavism, an important means of communicating doctrine. This is in contrast with ISKCON, which concentrates on chanting the Hare Krishna mantra rather than using the Bengali-language hymnal of Bhaktivinoda Thakur. No hymn tradition has been established in any other languages than Bengali, Sanskrit, and to a much lesser extent, Hindi. Liturgically, the Gaudiya Math tends to be little influenced by India's different vernacular Vaishnava traditions.

Also worth mentioning here is "Jagat Guru" Siddha Svarupananda, the somewhat idiosyncratic founder of the Chaitanya Mission based in Hawaii. A disciple of A. C. Bhaktivedanta Swami, he is perhaps the most Westernized of all representatives of this tradition, with a less intensely scholastic approach to spiritual life. He has opened centers in Poland and other eastern European countries, as well as in the Philippines, Australia, and New Zealand, and is a founding member of the World Vaishnava Association.

Jan Brzezinski

Sources:

- De, S. K. Early History of Vaisnava Faith and Movement in Bengal. Calcutta: K. L. Mukhopadhyay, 1961.
- Gelberg, Steven, ed. Hare Krishna, Hare Krishna. New York: Grove Press, 1983.
- Paramadvaiti, Swami B. A. "Our Family the Gaudiya Math: A Study of the Expansion of Gaudiya Vaisnavism and the Many Branches Developing around the Gaudiya Math." Posted at <http://www.vrindavan.org/English/Books/GMconded.html>. Accessed September 15, 2001.
- Sridhara, Deva Goswami Bhakti Raksaka. Sri Guru and His Grace. San Jose, CA: Guardian of Devotion Press, 1983.
- Thakura, Bhaktivinoda. The Bhagavat: Its Philosophy, Its Ethics, and Its Theology. San Jose, CA: Guardian of Devotion Press, 1985.
- World Vaisnava Association. Posted at <http://www.wva-vvrs.org>. Accessed September 15, 2001.

Gedatsu Kai

Gedatsu Kai is a Japanese new religion founded by Okano Seiken (1881–1949) in Tokyo in 1929. After founding Gedatsu Kai, Okano was ordained at Daigoji (Shingon Buddhism) in 1931. For a time Gedatsu Kai received legal recognition as a subsidiary organization of Shingon Buddhism, and it was then called Shugendō Gedatsu Kyōkai, but with the end of World War II, it withdrew from the Shingon organization.

According to Gedatsu Kai, humans desire wealth, fame, sex, food, and other necessities, but they run into trouble whenever the search for these five (necessary for survival) becomes redirected to mere satisfaction for the individual. They then fall into life's tragedies—ignorance of karmic law, hereditary problems, and selfish thoughts. The object of religion is to move from the problems and resultant suffering to a state of enlightenment that will include calm resignation and complete peace of mind. Gedatsu Kai offers a method of attaining enlightenment (gedatsu) through developing wisdom, purifying the emotions, and improving willpower.

Gedatsu Kai, literally "the association of deliverance," reveres the Kami Tenjinchigi (the source of all being) and the Buddha Gochi Nyorai (a name borrowed from esoteric Buddhism). Hannya Shingyō is the most recited sutra in Gedatsu Kai. Ongohō Shugyō, which has to do with possession and meditation, is one of its main exercises. When performing Ongohō Shugyō, members kneel before a kami (Buddha altar) holding a special spiritual card between their hands and meditate. Spirits light on the card and present requests for purifying ritual and give warnings. The messages are interpreted, not by the person engaged in Ongohō Shugyō, but by a mediator posted alongside. Another ceremony of importance in Gedatsu Kai is the Amacha Kuyō ritual, in which members pour sweet tea on cards inscribed with the name of ancestral or other spirits, in the belief that the ceremony purifies suffering spirits. Amacha Kuyō is performed morning and evening before the home altar.

The current leader of Gedatsu Kai is Okano Seihō. In 2000, it reported 193,856 members. Most reside in Japan, but centers are now scattered around the Pacific basin and in Europe, carried by members who have participated in the Japanese global diaspora. The headquarters is in Tokyo, but there is a "holy land" in the city of Kitamoto, Saitama Prefecture. In the United States, the center of Gedatsu worship is the Goreichi Spiritual Sanctuary at Mayhew, California. This shrine is seen as the resting place of all spirits and as housing the Tenjinchigi, the spirit of the Supreme Creator. The shrine also contains a statue of Fudō Myō-Ō, who has the power to conquer all evil, and other bodhisattvas.

Address:

Gedatsu Kai
4 Araki-cho
Shinjuku-ku, Tokyo 160-0007
Japan

Keishin Inaba

Sources:

- Earhart, Byron. Gedatsu-kai and Religion in Contemporary Japan: Returning to the Center. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1989.
- Gedatsu Church of America. Gedatsu Ajikan Kongozen Meditation. San Francisco: Gedatsu Church of America, 1974.
- . Manual for Implementation of Gedatsu Practice. San Francisco: Gedatsu Church of America, 1965.
- Ichiro Hori et al., eds. Japanese Religion: A Survey by the Agency for Cultural Affairs. Tokyo: Kodansha International, 1972.

Gelukpa Tibetan Buddhism

The Gelukpa (or Gelugpa) order of Tibetan Buddhism traces itself back to Tsong Khapa Losang Drakpa (1357–1419). Renowned for his scholarship and his meditative attainments, he traveled all over Tibet and studied with masters from various traditions in an attempt to determine what teachings and practices should be considered normative. The Gelukpa order—whose name means “System of Virtue”—was founded as a reformist tradition, the explicit aim of which was to emphasize the centrality of scholarship and monasticism.

Tsong Khapa considered his tradition to be the successor to the Kadampa order founded by Atisha (982–1054) and his disciple Dromdön (1004–1064). For the first few centuries after its establishment, the Gelukpa Order mostly avoided political entanglements, but in the seventeenth century it rose to supremacy in Tibet when the fifth Dalai Lama, the leader of the Gelukpa sect, Ngawang Losang Gyatso (1617–1682), also became the temporal ruler of Tibet with the help of Mongol troops. From this time until 1959, successive Dalai Lamas ruled the country. Following the Chinese invasion and annexation of Tibet, the fourteenth Dalai Lama, Tenzin Gyatso (b. 1935), fled to India in 1959 and established a government in exile in Dharamsala.

During the Cultural Revolution, Chinese Red Guards destroyed most of Tibet’s monasteries, including the major Gelukpa institutions. Gelukpas who followed the Dalai Lama into exile reestablished the three major Gelukpa monasteries—Sera, Ganden, and Drebung—in southern India, and today they continue to teach the traditional monastic curriculum, which is based on memorization of textbooks (yikcha) and oral debate (tsöba). In Tibet, meanwhile, the Gelukpa monasteries have been severely reduced in numbers by Chinese authorities. Prior to the Chinese invasion, the three main monasteries housed tens of thousands of monks, but today they are only allowed several hundred each.

The central meditation practice of the Gelukpa order is the “stages of the path” (lamrim) system, which is outlined in Tsong Khapa’s magnum opus, The Great Exposition of the Stages of the Path (Lamrim Chenmo). The text begins with an analysis of the sufferings of ordinary beings and the ignorance that is their root cause, followed by descriptions of the proper mindset of a religious practitioner. After generating a sincere desire to escape from cyclic existence, a practitioner should develop the “mind of awakening,” pursue the path of a bodhisattva (a being who wishes to become a Buddha for the benefit of other sentient beings), and cultivate the “six perfections” (generosity, ethics, patience, effort, concentration, and wisdom), which together constitute the core of a Buddha’s awakened mind. The path is conceived hierarchically, and along with the traditional practices of Mahayana Buddhism, Tsong Khapa discusses how the practices of the Tantra should be integrated into the training program. The core Gelukpa text for the tantric path is Tsong Khapa’s Great Exposition of Secret Mantra (Ngakrim Chenmo).

Today the Gelukpa order is the largest in Tibetan Buddhism, and its main reincarnate lama (tulku), the Dalai Lama, is generally considered to be the preeminent religious leader by all orders. He is not, however, the head of the Gelukpa order; this position is held by the Throne Holder of Ganden Monastery (Ganden Triba), who is appointed in recognition of his scholarship and moral authority. The headquarters of the order is at the Tibetan colony in North Kanars, Karnataka. Since 1959, Gelukpa leaders have spread across Australia, Europe, and North America. Apart from the main body, several autonomous Gelukpa groups have emerged, including the NEW KADAMPA TRADITION, a Gelukpa group that has challenged the Dalai Lama’s authority.

The Gelukpa tradition is also represented by a variety of independent organizations such as the FOUNDATION FOR THE PRESERVATION OF THE MAHAYANA TRADITION and the Buddhist International Alliance. As the head of the Tibetan government in exile, the Dalai Lama also serves as the titular head of the Tibetan people and travels widely in the cause of “freeing” Tibet from Chinese dominance. The address of the Office of His Holiness the Dalai Lama is Thekchen Choeling, P.O. Mcleod Ganj, Dharamsala 176215, India. A directory of the related offices of the central Tibetan administration of the government-in-exile established by the Dalai Lama in 1959 may be found at <http://www.lungta.cz/biblio/tibadr2.htm>.

Address:

Gelukpa
Tibetan Colony
Lama Camp No. 1
Mundgod
North Kanars, Karnataka 581411
India

John Powers

Sources:

- Coleman, Graham, ed. A Handbook of Tibetan Culture. Boston, MA: Shambhala, 1993.
- Gyatso, Tenzin (Dalai Lama XIV). Path to Bliss: A Practical Guide to the Stages of Meditation. Ithaca, NY: Snow Lion, 1991.
- . The World of Tibetan Buddhism. London: Wisdom, 1995.
- Hopkins, Jeffrey. Meditation on Emptiness. London: Wisdom, 1983.
- Lopez, Donald, Jr. Prisoners of Shangri-La: Tibetan Buddhism and the West. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1998.
- Powers, John. Introduction to Tibetan Buddhism. Ithaca, NY: Snow Lion, 1995.

General Baptist Evangelical Convention of Egypt

One of several bodies constituting the small Evangelical Christian community in predominantly Muslim Egypt, the General Baptist Evangelical Convention originated in 1931 around the preaching of Seddik W. Girgis (d. 1980). Girgis had been raised in the COPTIC ORTHODOX CHURCH. However, in the 1920s, while working with the YWCA in Jerusalem, he came into contact with Baptists and adopted an Evangelical faith. His Baptist friends arranged for him to go to the United States, where he attended Texas Christian University. After completing his B.A., he attended the Southwestern Baptist Theological Seminary (affiliated with the SOUTHERN BAPTIST CONVENTION). He also joined a Baptist church and was ordained as a minister.

In 1931, he returned to his hometown, Fayyoun, some sixty-five miles south of Cairo, and started preaching to his neighbors and family. Over the next thirty years he established six churches and converted some 250 individuals. The General Baptist Evangelical Convention emerged in the late 1960s, and Girgis served as its president until his death in 1980. He began a magazine, The Baptist Evangel, in 1971. The church building in Fayyoun was closed for a time because the church members had been unable to obtain a building permit prior to erecting it.

Once his work was off the ground, Girgis began petitioning the Foreign Mission Board of the Southern Baptist Convention (SBC) for support, but it was not until 1956 that he got a positive response. They began to send financial support and occasional visitors to check on the work. Only in 1981 were they able to send a resident missionary to pick up the work left by the recently deceased founder. The SBC continues to support the work.

In Egypt, it is illegal to proselytize Muslims, and many of the converts to the church come from a nominal Christian background. As of the mid-1990s, the church reported 670 members in twelve congregations. The church is a member of the WORLD ALLIANCE OF REFORMED CHURCHES and the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES.

Address:

General Baptist Evangelical Convention of Egypt
P.O. Box 1248
Cairo
Egypt

Source:

Wardin, Albert W., ed. Baptists around the World. Nashville, TN: Broadman and Holman Publishers, 1995.

The General Church of the New Jerusalem

The General Church of the New Jerusalem, one of several churches formed by followers of the teachings of Emanuel Swedenborg (1688–1772), the eighteenth-century Swedish visionary and theologian, was formally established in 1897 by 347 men and women. The individuals involved in the founding of the General Church for the most part had been associated with what was termed the Academy Movement, which at first was a body within the General Convention of the New Jerusalem (now generally known as the SWEDENBORGIAN CHURCH OF NORTH AMERICA). The Academy was founded in response to differences of opinion with the General Convention regarding the authority of the religious writings of Emanuel Swedenborg, organizational structure, and procedural matters. The Academy position was based on the following three principles: First, that Swedenborg's writings were the divine word of God, equivalent in authority to the Old and New Testaments; second, that the writings clearly ordained a hierarchical, or episcopal, form of church government; and third, that regional associations of the General Convention had the right to develop their own governmental structure. The Academy Movement immediately established its own theological school, and in quick succession it also founded a college and separate high schools for boys and girls. The Academy was formally founded in 1876 when it received its charter from the state of Pennsylvania.

In 1890, differences between the two groups within the General Convention came to a head when Bishop William H. Benade (1816–1905) ordained another minister of the Pennsylvania Association into the third or episcopal degree of the priesthood. His action was censured by the General Convention. At that point, members associated with the Academy Movement withdrew from the convention and established their own church, called the General Church of the Advent of the Lord. For eight years this church of the Academy Movement functioned as both a church and a school, with Bishop Benade presiding over both. Benade's autocratic style of leadership increasingly caused problems and, with a sense of necessity and much sadness, the membership of the Academy withdrew their support from Benade. In 1897, the General Church of the New Jerusalem was founded as a religious body separate from but affiliated with the Academy of the New Church.

At the time of its founding, then, the membership of the General Church came largely from those who previously had chosen to disaffiliate themselves from the General Convention of the New Jerusalem. However, it also attracted members from many General Conference societies in Canada, England, and other parts of the British Empire. Thus, from its beginning it was an international church.

The headquarters and episcopal center of this international church, since its founding, has been in Bryn Athyn, Montgomery County, Pennsylvania. The Swedenborgian community of Bryn Athyn was created when the Academy moved the location of its schools from the center of the city of Philadelphia to the country, in Lower Moreland Township. The relocation of the schools outside of the city had been deemed by church members to be culturally desirable and also beneficial to the physical health of the members.

According to the United States Census for the year 2000, the community of Bryn Athyn has a resident population of 1,351 individuals. In addition, during the 2000–2001 academic year the Academy schools reported a total student population of 391. Although most of the students come from Bryn Athyn and other places in North America, some come from countries in Africa, Asia, Europe, and South America, as well as from Australia, New Zealand, and Sri Lanka.

The executive bishop of the General Church is the chief governor and pastor of the church. He is selected by the Council of the Clergy, and his name is then referred to the board of directors of the church for counsel and response. The priesthood of the General Church is open only to men, while both men and women may serve on the board of directors. The Joint Council of the Clergy and the board of directors decide when and where the name of the proposed executive bishop will be placed before the General Assembly of the membership of the church for confirmation. The bishop serves in the office until he resigns, dies in office, or is separated from the office by the same procedure used in the selection process. The executive bishop governs the church with the assistance of counsel from both clergy and laity and the assembly of all church members.

The executive bishop receives counsel from the Council of the Clergy, which is convened on a yearly basis, either in a council of the whole body of the clergy or in regional councils around the world, all of which the bishop attends. In addition, he receives regular counsel from a consistory composed of priests that he selects. The composition of the consistory changes from time to time, and it dissolves when there is a change in the holder of the episcopal office. He also appoints lay members to serve on the Bishop's Council for a term of three years. Both men and women serve on that council, particularly married couples.

A general assembly of the members of the General Church is held at the call of the bishop every three or four years. The General Assembly, while it is composed only of those in attendance, represents the whole church. The Joint Council acts for and represents the assembly in the interim between assemblies.

The General Church data center reports that at the beginning of the year 2001, there were 4,671 members, with a total international church population of 14,385. This latter figure includes children and youths up to the age of nineteen, who are baptized but not yet confirmed in the church, and adults who are affiliated with the church but not members. The General Church has members in seventy societies, circles, or groups in thirty-four countries around the world. The largest concentrations of members and affiliates are in the United States, Canada, South Africa, and Ghana.

Ten societies of the General Church have elementary schools. Nine are in North America; one is located in Durban, South Africa. In 1999 a school was established in Tema, Ghana, as a growth initiative. Additionally, a number of the church societies sponsor nursery education programs. Education of the young is considered an important function of the General Church. Although members of the General Church do not always live in special New Church communities, and in fact most members probably live outside of them, they have built several residential communities, which are centered on a church and an adjacent General Church elementary school, in various parts of North America.

In recent years a controversy has developed within the General Church membership over the issue of the ordination of women. At the beginning of the twenty-first century, women cannot be trained for or ordained into the priesthood of the General Church. Currently there are 106 priests on the roll, and 77 of them are actively serving the church in some capacity. The others are either unassigned or retired. Women are welcome to enroll in the master's program in religious studies that was developed under the leadership of the Theological School in Bryn Athyn in 1996, and so far five men and eight women have graduated from that program.

The headquarters of the General Church of the New Jerusalem is located in a building called Cairncrest (in Bryn Athyn, Pennsylvania), which was built by Harold Pitcairn (1897–1960), a member of the General Church and an aviator who developed the autogiro used in helicopter guidance systems. There are two other notable buildings in Bryn Athyn. One is Glencairn, designed by Raymond Pitcairn (1885–1966) as the home for his family, which has its own unique arts and crafts style. Today it is a museum that houses his medieval art and a growing collection of New Church art. The other is the Bryn Athyn Cathedral, which was built using a modern version of the guild system. In the cathedral, every detail is uniquely crafted so that no two objects in the building are the same. It, too, has a unique arts and crafts style.

Address:

The General Church of the New Jerusalem
P.O. Box 743
Bryn Athyn, PA 19009
<http://www.newchurch.org>

Jane Williams-Hogan

Sources:

- Block, Marguerite Beck. The New Church in the New World. New York: Octagon Books, Inc., 1968.
- Swedenborg, Emanuel. True Christian Religion. West Chester, PA: The Swedenborg Foundation, 1996.
- Williams-Hogan, Jane. "Institutional and Communal Response to the Writings of Emanuel Swedenborg in Britain and the United States." In Scribe of Heaven: Swedenborg's Life, Work, and Impact, edited by Stuart Shotwell and Jonathan S. Rose. West Chester, PA: The Swedenborg Foundation, 2001.

Georgia

The territory between the eastern shore of the Black Sea and the western coast of the Caspian Sea, currently known as the Republic of Georgia (5,400,000 population as of the 1989 census) was inhabited in the third millennium B.C.E. As early as the sixth century B.C.E., the kingdom of Kolkhida in western Georgia had arisen. In the fourth century B.C.E. a second kingdom, Iberia (or Kartli), emerged in eastern Georgia.

Both kingdoms were incorporated into the Roman Empire in the first century B.C.E.

The territory of Iberia and Kolkhida fell under a succession of foreign rulers, including the Eastern Roman (Byzantine) Empire and Muslim Arabs; several feudal states were created in the eighth to the tenth centuries. From the eleventh to the twelfth centuries, the several divisions into which the areas had been split were united into one independent kingdom, and it was the apex of a Georgian feudal state. In the thirteenth to the fifteenth centuries, the Mongolian and Turkoman invasions split the country into many princedoms. Later on, various parts of Georgia were fought over by neighboring Turks and Iranians. In 1783, eastern Georgia became a protectorate of the Russian Empire. It was finally annexed in 1801. By 1880, as a result of several wars with Turkey, Russia absorbed the rest of Georgia. In 1914, at the beginning of World War I, the territory of present-day Georgia comprised the Tbilisi and Kutaisi gubernias, and the Batumi and Sukhumi oblasts.

After the Russian Revolution of 1917, Georgia gained its independence in 1918 and was recognized by the Soviet government. However, Britain, Germany, and Turkey all sent troops to bring down what had become a socialist government. In 1921, the Soviets responded by sending troops into the country, and in 1922 Georgia became a part of the Soviet Union. Three autonomous territorial units were established within Soviet Georgia. Two of them—Abkhazia and South Ossetia—were based on ethnicity, while the third—Adjara, which is populated by Georgian Muslims or Adjarians—was based on religion.

Status of religions in Georgia, 2000-2050

Followers	2000			2025	2050
	total	%	rate
Christians	3,090,000	62.2	-0.40	3,471,000	3,600,000
Orthodox	2,887,000	58.1	-0.22	3,231,000	3,322,000
Roman Catholics	55,000	1.1	4.93	70,000	80,000
Independents	42,000	0.9	2.14	55,000	75,000
Muslims	958,000	19.3	-0.81	1,000,000	1,000,000
Nonreligious	760,000	15.3	-2.08	600,000	500,000
Atheists	135,000	2.7	-5.53	80,000	50,000
Jews	22,100	0.4	-1.24	22,000	20,000
Baha'is	1,700	0.0	1.41	5,000	10,000
Total population	4,968,000	100.0	-0.94	5,178,000	5,180,000

In 1988–1989, following the policy of democratization and liberalization introduced by the USSR's last leader, Mikhail Gorbachev (b. 1931), a mass and rather radical nationalist movement developed in Georgia, the aims of which were both to destroy the Communist system and to break away from the Soviet Union. In May 1991, the first Georgian president, Zviad Gamsakhurdia (b. 1939)—a representative of the nationalistic bloc Round Table-Free Georgia—was elected, and in December 1991 the breakup of the USSR finalized the reestablishment of Georgia's independence. During 1991–1992, Georgia experienced civil war and unrest, combined with a growing separatist movement in its autonomous territorial units, South Ossetia, Adjara, and Abkhazia. In March 1992, the military council, which had ousted Gamsakhurdia, but obviously failed to control the situation, offered the helm to Eduard Shevardnadze, who was a decades-long Communist leader in Soviet Georgia and who resided in Moscow at that time. In 1995, he was elected president of Georgia under the new constitution that had just been adopted.

The initial Christianization of Georgia has been traced to the first century C.E. According to legend, lots were cast among Jesus' apostles to determine to which country each of them was to go with a mission, and the Holy Mother was assigned Georgia. Therefore, Georgians consider their home country as "allotted to the Mother of God." Since the Mother of God stayed in Jerusalem, the apostle Andrew went to Georgia. Western Georgia also received the apostle Simon Canaanite (also known as Simeon the Zealot), whose grave is near the city of Sukhumi in the village of Komani.

The arrival of Christian clergy from the Byzantine Empire, the construction of Twelve Apostles Cathedral in Mtskheta, the ancient capital of the kingdom of Kartli (Iberia), and the baptism of the nation are all dated to 326 C.E. The church in Kartli was initially under the jurisdiction of the Patriarchate of Antioch, but the Georgian Orthodox Church was granted independence from Jerusalem in 467. Consequently, the bishop of Mtskheta was elevated to the rank of catholicos. West Georgia, which was then a part of the Eastern Roman (Byzantine) Empire, gradually became Christian by the fifth century and came under the rule of the patriarch of Constantinople. The church in Georgia had agreed with the Armenian Apostolic Church in the rejection of the decisions of the Chalcedonian Council in 451. However, it reversed its position in 697 and again came into full communion with other Eastern Orthodox churches.

As various conquerors (most of whom were Muslims) moved through Georgia, the struggle for independence became largely identified as a struggle for defense of Orthodoxy, since many clerical and lay persons died as martyrs for their Orthodox faith.

In 1811, a decade after the Russian annexation of eastern Georgia, the head of the Georgian Church—the catholicos-patriarch—died. The authorities then took away the independence of the church in Georgia and incorporated the GEORGIAN ORTHODOX CHURCH (GOC) into the RUSSIAN ORTHODOX CHURCH (MOSCOW PATRIARCHATE) as an exarchate. The number of dioceses in the territory of Georgia was reduced from thirteen to four. The Georgian liturgy was largely replaced by the Church Slavonic liturgy, and Russification of the church in Georgia began. After 1817, only Russians were named as exarchs, or heads of the Exarchate of Georgia.

An independent Georgian Orthodox church was reestablished in 1917, but it was not formally recognized by the Patriarchate of Moscow until 1943. Nevertheless, the Georgian Orthodox Church continued through the latter decades of the Soviet Union. Its growing social role in the independent post-Soviet Georgia was symbolized in 1992 by the public baptism of Eduard Shevardnadze. By 1993, 66 percent of the population in Georgia had declared that they considered themselves believers in a religion, and of those 82.7 percent reported that they belonged to the GOC. At the same time, roughly the same proportion of respondents (80–82 percent) among those who called themselves non-believers and those who responded "don't know" also associated themselves with the GOC. Thus, the overwhelming majority of the population see the GOC as a national church and a symbol of Georgian statehood. Most recent official estimates claim that 75 percent of Georgia's population belong to GOC.

According to the GOC's decree (issued in 1991), priests and bishops are not allowed to be members of political parties or to participate in political activities yet a substantial political factor was integral to the severe internal tensions within the GOC. The moderate head of the GOC, Patriarch Ilia II, has forged a close alliance with President Shevardnadze, while a conservative and anti-ecumenical group of Georgian Orthodox clergy has been linked to Georgian radical nationalists associated with ousted president Zviad Gamsakhurdia.

The relation of the GOC to the Georgian state is a continued matter of debate. The ninth clause of the constitution declares full freedom of religion and the separation of the church and state, while at the same time acknowledging the "special role of the GOC in the history of Georgia." In the attempt to define that special role, some politicians have called for Orthodoxy to be declared the state religion. In several ways, the church operates already as an official body, and it has signed agreements about cooperation with the Georgian Ministry of Defense (1999) and the Ministry of Interiors. In the 1990s, the Georgian state supported the Georgian Orthodox Church in opposing the spread of nontraditional and new religious movements into the country. In June 1997, in a public statement, the security minister stressed that the activities of "sects" threatened national security.

On March 31, 2001, the 188 members of the Georgian Parliament passed a unanimous decision declaring the necessity of a concordat between the GOC and the state. This agreement was given constitutional rank. The proposed concordat stipulates, for example, that Orthodox clergy cannot be drafted into the army; the state recognizes marriages registered by the church; the property and lands owned by the church are tax-exempt; the state agrees to compensate the church for damages and material losses incurred during the Soviet regime; and the twelve major Orthodox festivals are recognized as public holidays. Once the concordat is signed, the GOC will be the first and only national Orthodox church that has such a special relationship with the state.

Islam was first introduced to Georgia by the Arabs in the eighth century. However, it was not until the periods in which the Ottoman Empire and the Persians (sixteenth through eighteenth centuries) had hegemony that a permanent Muslim community arose in the country. Although not a large number of Georgians were attracted to Islam, it has persisted through the centuries, and a number of ethnically various Muslim communities exist today throughout Georgia. About 330,000 of those who live in Ajaria (southwest Georgia) are ethnic Georgians who adopted Islam during the reign of the Turks. The Islamic population consists also of ethnic Azerbaijanis living in southeast Georgia (about 310,000) as well as of Chechens and Ingushs (12,000) in the villages of northeast Georgia, in the district of Akhmeti. Although Ajarians are Sunnis, there are both Shites and Sunnis among Azerbaijanis. The religious practice of Chechens involves a mixture of Sufism and Muridic brotherhoods's traditions. In terms of religiosity, the Ajarians are much more superficial followers of Islam than Azerbaijanis and, especially, Chechens. Two Islamic theological schools—madrasah—are functioning in the country, in the capital, Tbilisi and in the city of Marneuli.

Archaeological evidence confirms the presence of Jews in Mtskheta, the capital of the ancient state of Kartli, in the first centuries C.E. Jews appear to have arrived in western Georgia in the sixth century, most likely from the Byzantine Empire. In the ninth century Georgia was the site of the birth of a new Jewish group that denied some Jewish laws concerning marriage and food. The group's founder, Abu-Imran Musa (Moshe) al-Za'farani, had moved to Tbilisi (then called Tiflis) from Babylonia. He was later known as Abu-Imran al-Tiflisi, and the group the Tiflis Sect. The group appears to have lasted some three or four centuries.

Today, Jewish religion in Georgia is represented by Orthodox Judaism, and the Jewish community is subdivided into two large groups: Georgian-speaking Sephardim and Russian-speaking Ashkenazim. Although Sephardim can be considered as an indigenous population of Georgia, the origin of the community of Ashkenazim traces back only to the nineteenth century. At that time a number of retired soldiers of the Russian army who were Jews settled in Georgia. Consequently, the Sephardim in Georgia have lived until the twentieth century almost exclusively in the countryside, while Ashkenazim were initially urban dwellers.

The number of Jews in Georgia appears to have peaked at around 61,000 in 1970, including 43,000 Sephardim and 18,000 Ashkenazim. It had decreased to fewer than 25,000 in 1989 (including 14,000 Georgian-speaking and 10,500 Russian-speaking) due to mass emigration to Israel and, though less so, to the United States. The short period of Gamsakhurdia's radical nationalistic regime urged forward this process, and it continued to reduce the community through the 1990s. By 2000, the total number of Jews was estimated at 12,000 (9,000–10,000 Georgian Sephardim, 2,000–3,000 Russian-speaking Ashkenazim). Thirteen synagogues are functioning in Georgia now (including two in Tbilisi and three in Kutaisi) in comparison with twenty-eight thirty years ago. The largest Jewish communities are in the capital, Tbilisi (9,000), in the city of Kutaisi (1,000), and Gori (800).

Most of the 33,000 Kurds who migrated to independent Georgia in 1918 did so because of the religious and political persecution conducted by the government of Turkey. They are Yezidis by religion. This pagan religious teaching is based on Zoroastrianism, but it has elements of Islam, Judaism, and Christianity as well. Kurds in Georgia are strict followers of religious traditions and prescriptions.

The second-largest Christian group in Georgia consists of Christian Armenians (437,000 as of the census of 1989) who belong traditionally to the monophysite ARMENIAN APOSTOLIC CHURCH. Seven permanently functioning churches (two in Tbilisi and one each in Batumi, Nino Tsminda, Shaumjany, Akhalkalaki and Akhalzikhi) and many chapels in villages, all served by ten priests and an archbishop, form the church's Georgian Diocese.

The ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH was introduced to South Georgia at the time of the Ottoman Empire's rule. Since the Islamic conquerors were much more tolerant of Catholicism than of Orthodoxy, many Orthodox Georgians preferred to convert to Roman Catholicism rather than adopt Islam. Today these Roman Catholics live mainly in Tbilisi, in Kutaisi, and in South Georgia. Eight Catholic parishes in Georgia form a part of the Apostolic Administration of Transcaucasia, which was established in 1994 and includes also Armenia and Azerbaijan. Although most of about 30,000 Roman Catholic faithful are Georgians by ethnicity, the twelve priests and the bishop (whose residence is in Tbilisi) are foreign nationals (from Poland and Italy).

Protestantism appears to have come to Georgia initially through the spread of the MOLOKANS. In the 1840s, members of this group who ran into trouble with the authorities in the Russian Empire were banished to Transcaucasia and established several villages in Djavakhetia, the mountainous area in South Georgia. In 1862, a German, Martin Kalweit (1833–1918), who was Baptist, settled in Tbilisi. He began to hold worship services, primarily within the German-speaking community in the city. In 1867, he baptized the first Russian, Nikita I. Voronin, a Molokan, and from that time the Baptist congregation grew, with services in both languages. Since conversion from Orthodoxy was legally persecuted, the Baptist movement spread primarily among the Russians. One of them was Vasili G. Pavlov (1854–1924), who studied in Germany and returned to become the leading force in spreading the Baptist faith in Transcaucasia. In 1912, the first Georgian-speaking members were baptized, and after 1919 Baptist services were celebrated in the Georgian language on a regular basis.

In 1919, a Transcaucasian Union of Baptists was formed. In 1921, Georgian Baptists merged with the Russian Baptist Federation. The Baptist churches were closed during the period of harshest Communist religious repression (1937–1944), but in 1944 the first Baptist church was reopened under an umbrella organization of Evangelical churches, the All-Union Council of Evangelical Christians-Baptists. Following the collapse of the USSR, the Union of Evangelical and Baptist Churches of Georgia was formed. It is a member of the BAPTIST WORLD ALLIANCE. The Baptists in Georgia number about 18,000 faithful and have sixty local churches (including 5,000 persons and eight churches in Tbilisi) and a theological seminary in Tbilisi. The Baptist congregations are divided along ethnic-linguistic lines—Georgian, Ossetian, Armenian, and Russian.

In the early twenty-first century, aside from the Baptists, Protestant denominations in Georgia are represented by Pentecostals (5,000–6,000 members in seventy local communities), Lutherans (about 1,000 German speaking persons living mainly in Tbilisi), JEHOVAH'S WITNESSES (the estimates vary between 15,000 and 30,000), as well as by small groups of the NEW APOSTOLIC CHURCH and of THE SALVATION ARMY.

A unique community of the Russian sect of DOUKHOBORS in mountainous South Georgia has shrunk in size from about 7,000 in 1988 to less than 1,000 now, due to a mass migration to Russia. The remaining Dukhobors live today mainly in the village of Gorelovka in the Nino-Tsminda district.

Alexei D. Krindatch

Sources:

- Baltaden, S. K. Seeking God: The Recovery of Religious Identity in Orthodox Russia, Ukraine, and Georgia. De Kalb: Northern Illinois University Press, 1993.
- Malan, S. C., ed. A Short History of the Georgian Church. Translated by P. Ioseliani. London: Saunders, Otley, 1866.
- Roberson, R. The Eastern Christian Churches: A Brief Survey. 6th ed. Rome, Italy: Edizioni Orientalia Christiana, 1999.
- Skurat, K. Istorija Pomesnykh Pravoslavnykh Cerkvej (Russian; The history of the national Orthodox churches). Moscow: Russkie ogni, 1994.

Georgian Orthodox Church

Archaeological findings testify to the existence of Christian communities and churches in Georgia as early as the second and third centuries. At that time Georgia consisted of two states: the Kingdom of Kartli (or Iberia in Greek) in eastern Georgia and the Kingdom of Egrisi (or Kolkhida in Greek) in western Georgia. In Kartli, Christianity had become the state religion due to the missionary activity of “Equal to Apostles” St. Nino, a slave girl from Cappadocia who came to Kartli from Jerusalem around 325 C.E. According to legend, St. Nino was a close relative of St. George, commonly recognized as a protector of Georgia. Under her ministry, Georgian Queen Nana and King Mirian converted to Christianity, and then they requested the Byzantine emperor, Constantine, to send clergy to Kartli in order to baptize the royal family. The arrival of clergy in Georgia, the construction of Twelve Apostles Cathedral in Mtskheta, an ancient capital of Kartli, and the baptism of the nation are dated to 326. West Georgia, which was then a part of the Eastern Roman Empire, gradually became Christian, a process pretty much completed by the fifth century, and came under the rule of the patriarch of Constantinople. The Church of Kartli was initially under the jurisdiction of the Patriarchate of Antioch, but it was granted independence (or, more technically, autocephaly) in 467, at the request of King Vakhtang Gorgaslan and through the intercession of the Byzantine emperor and the patriarch of Constantinople. Consequently, the bishop of Mtskheta was elevated to the rank of catholicos. Nevertheless, relations with the Holy Land, in particular with Jerusalem, have always had a special meaning for Georgia and for the Georgian Orthodox Church (GOC).

Monasticism has flourished in Georgia since the sixth century. Monasteries became important centers of educational and cultural activity and remain a significant feature of the contemporary GOC. Georgians also built churches and monasteries outside of Georgia in Palestine, Greece, Bulgaria, Syria, and Cyprus.

Initially in Kartli the Jerusalem liturgy of St. James was celebrated, while the Byzantine liturgy was used in Kolkhida, in western Georgia. After East and West Georgia were united into one kingdom in 1008, the Byzantine liturgy celebrated in the Georgian language was adopted in the whole country. Also since that time the head of the GOC has been known by the title of catholicos-patriarch.

Looking for protection from Islamic invaders, Georgia has repeatedly requested assistance from Orthodox Russia. In 1783, Georgia became a protectorate of the Russian Empire. In 1801, upon the request of the last Georgian kings, George XII and Solomon II (the country having split again in the fourteenth century), Georgia was declared a part of Russia by Emperor Alexander I. In 1811, when the catholicos-patriarch of the Georgian Church died, the Catholicate of Georgia was forcibly abolished, and the Georgian Church became a part of the RUSSIAN ORTHODOX CHURCH (MOSCOW PATRIARCHATE) with the status of exarchate. Thus the GOC lost its independence, or autocephaly. The thirteen dioceses of the church were reduced to four, and the Georgian language was largely replaced by Russian and Slavonic in both the seminaries and the liturgy. Beginning in 1817, all exarchs of Georgia were ethnically Russians.

According to the 1897 census, of the total population in the territory of contemporary Georgia, 70 percent were Orthodox (i.e., members of the Russian Orthodox Church), 15 percent Muslims, 11 percent followers of the Armenian Apostolic Church, 1 percent Jews, 0.8 percent Orthodox Old Believers, 0.7 percent Roman Catholics, and 0.5 percent Protestants.

In March 1917, after the abdication of Czar Nicholas II, the autocephaly of the GOC was reestablished at a meeting of ethnically Georgian bishops, clergy, and laity; a new catholicos of the GOC was elected in September 1917. After a short period of independence (May 1918–February 1921), Georgia was annexed by the Soviet Union. The GOC managed to retain its de facto independence from the Russian Orthodox Church, but this independent status was not recognized by the Moscow Patriarchate, and for twenty-five years relations between the Russian and Georgian churches were broken. The situation was aggravated by the fact that many Orthodox parishes in Georgia were predominantly Russian and had Russian priests. These parishes tended to remain loyal to the Moscow Patriarchate.

In 1943, the Moscow Patriarchate finally recognized the GOC's autocephaly, but this status continued to be questioned, now as part of a dispute between the Russian Orthodox Church and the ECUMENICAL, PATRIARCHATE, which did not recognize Moscow's authority to grant autocephaly. The canonicity and equality of the GOC was finally regularized in 1989, when the Ecumenical Patriarchate confirmed its status.

The situation of the GOC under the Soviet regime was similar to that of the Russian Orthodox Church. At the beginning of the twentieth century, there were 2,354 parishes, 26 monasteries, and 5 convents. Some 590 public schools were also run by the church. The Orthodox clergy numbered almost 2,000. In 1985, only 54 Orthodox churches remained open in Georgia, along with 4 monasteries and a theological seminary in the capital city of Tbilisi.

The church began to revive in the late 1980s. By 1990, the church had 200 parishes (divided into 15 dioceses) and 15 Orthodox monasteries. In addition to the seminary, a theological academy was open in Tbilisi in 1988. After the declaration of Georgia's independence (1991), the renewal of the GOC intensified. By 1999, it had 400 parishes, 30 monasteries and 30 convents, 2 theological academies (Tbilisi, Kutaisi) and 4 theological seminaries (Tbilisi, Kutaisi, Batumi, Akhalzihi). The number of dioceses has increased to 27, served by 600 priests. Today it has an estimated total membership of 3,500,000.

Through the 1990s, the rapid development of the GOC was accompanied by serious internal problems. Conservative and anti-ecumenical sentiments were growing within the GOC, specifically among clergy in Georgian Orthodox monasteries. In an open letter written in May 1997, the abbots of five monasteries threatened to break communion with Catholicos-Patriarch Ilia II because of his ecumenical activities (from 1979 to 1983, he had served as a president of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES). Tensions within the GOC were high, and in order to avoid a church schism, the Synod of Bishops voted to withdraw from both the World Council of Churches and from the European Council of Churches. This action did not entirely resolve the problem, and the opposition leaders, who are in close contact with Old Calendarist groups from Greece, continue to call for a break in communion with those national Orthodox churches that participate in ecumenical organizations.

Apart from the problems with its most conservative wing, the church has made great progress in its impact on public life. Besides its guarantees of freedom of religion and of the separation of church and state, the national constitution recognizes a "special role of GOC in the history of Georgia." This special role was acknowledged in a variety of ways during the 1990s. Then in 2001, that special role was fixed legally by a decision of Georgian Parliament to sign a concordat between the church and the state. The agreement, which will have constitutional status, states, among other provisions, that Orthodox clergy cannot be drafted into the army; that the property and lands of the church are tax-exempt; that the state will not secularize the property of the GOC; and that the twelve major Orthodox festivals will be recognized as public holidays. The government also agreed to partially compensate the church for the damages and material losses inflicted by the Soviet regime.

Today, the Patriarchate of Georgia consists of ten departments (External Affairs, Mission and Evangelization, Relations with Army and Law Enforcing Bodies, Relations with Prisoners, Search and Protection of Ecclesiastical Sanctities, Study of Non-Orthodox Denominations, Education, Publication, Folk Handicraft, Study of Ancient Georgian Sacred Songs), and supports a nationwide radio show, Iveria.

Since 1977, the church has been headed by the catholicos-patriarch and archbishop of Mtskheta-Tbilisi, His Holiness Ilia II.

Address:

Erekle II
Moedani 1, Tbilisi
Georgia
<http://www.orthodox-patriarchate-of-georgia.org.ge>

Alexei D. Krindatch

Sources:

- Baltaden, S. K. Seeking God: The Recovery of Religious Identity in Orthodox Russia, Ukraine, and Georgia. De Kalb: Northern Illinois University Press, 1993.
- Malan, S. C., ed. A Short History of the Georgian Church. Translated by P. Ioseliani. London: Saunders, Otley, 1866.
- Roberson, R. The Eastern Christian Churches: A Brief Survey. 6th edition. Rome, Italy: Edizioni Orientalia Christiana, 1999.
- Schmemmann, Alexander. The Historical Road of Eastern Orthodoxy. Crestwood, NY: St. Vladimir's Seminary Press, 1977.
- Skurat, K. Istorija Pomestnykh Pravoslavnykh Cerkvej (Russian; The History of the National Orthodox Churches). Moscow: Russkie ogni, 1994.

German Buddhist Union

The German Buddhist Union (GBU; Deutsche Buddhistische Union) is the umbrella organization of Buddhist groups, societies, and institutions in Germany. Since the organization is not aligned with any specific tradition, member societies are from the Theravada, Mahayana, Tibetan Buddhist, and Western Buddhist traditions. The union is the only nationwide umbrella organization and is widely recognized as the representative of Buddhism in Germany.

The GBU started as the German Buddhist Society in 1955, offering membership to both individuals and organizations. In 1958, the organizational structure was changed to an umbrella organization of Buddhist groups and societies only. The name adopted was German Buddhist Union, and it specified three aims: (1) to promote mutual understanding and cooperation between the different schools and traditions present in Germany, (2) to serve as a Buddhist representative for administrative bodies and other public institutions, and (3) to be a partner in interreligious dialogue.

During the first twenty-five years of its existence, the GBU remained small, with seven to eight member organizations only. As Buddhism generated increasing interest in Germany from the 1970s onwards, numerous new Buddhist groups and associations were founded. In the early 1980s, the GBU experienced a sharp increase, with new groups and organizations becoming members. This growth, accompanied by the wish to gain an officially established place in society and to firmly dissociate itself from new religious groups (such as the Bhagwan Shree Rajneesh movement), led to application for public recognition of Buddhism as an incorporated body in 1985. Although the GBU managed to meet legal prerequisites, especially those of a specific organizational structure and the provision of a commonly accepted doctrinal platform, the privileged status was not granted. The main reasons for the rejection were a lack of financial resources and the fact that too small a number of Buddhists were represented by the union.

Nevertheless, the GBU is proud to present a "Buddhist Confession" (Buddhistisches Bekenntnis; a self-designation) that has been accepted by a wide range of traditions and schools. The friendly cooperation between the various Buddhist schools and groups in the GBU has been termed a Buddhist ecumenism (also a self-designation). The sharp increase in membership continued during the 1990s, doubling the members from twenty-seven (1994) to fifty (late 2000). Many of the GBU members consist of numerous local meditation groups or centers; the organization thus comprises an estimated four-fifths of the more than five hundred Buddhist groups, societies, centers, and organizations existent in Germany in the beginning of the twenty-first century.

Legally, the GBU is a registered society with public benefit status. The union is headed by a board of eleven persons, with a speaker coordinating the activities. Individual Buddhists can join the GBU via a membership in the Buddhist Community (currently some 2,000 members), which itself is a member of the GBU. Once a year, the GBU organizes a public conference, presenting varying topics. Since 1987, it has published the quarterly Lotusblätter; a year earlier its headquarters was established in Munich. The GBU is a member of the European Buddhist Union and the WORLD FELLOWSHIP OF BUDDHISTS.

Address:

Deutsche Buddhistische Union
Amalienstr. 71
80799 Munich
Germany
<http://www.dharma.de/dbu> (in German and English)

Martin Baumann

Sources:

- Baumann, Martin. Deutsche Buddhisten. Geschichte und Gemeinschaften. 2d ed. Marburg, Germany: Diagonal, 1995.
- . "The Transplantation of Buddhism to Germany— Processive Modes and Strategies of Adaptation." Method and Theory in the Study of Religion 6, 1 (1994): 35–61.
- Deutsche Buddhistische Union. Die Deutsche Buddhistische Union (DBU) und ihre Mitglieder in Selbstdarstellungen. Munich: Deutsche Buddhistische Union, 1991.

Germany

Germany as a united nation-state in the modern sense came into being after the Franco-German war of 1871. Before, there was a millennium-long story of rivalry between numerous small and big German states, between principalities, kingdoms (e.g., Bavaria, Prussia), and the Holy Roman Empire, a shifting loose confederation of mostly German-speaking states, generally with a German emperor, of which it has been said that it was neither holy nor Roman nor an empire. The different peoples were loosely connected by the varying dialects of the German language (first referred to in Latin as theodisca lingua, from which the German expression diutisc was derived, first attested in the tenth century; from diutisc has come the modern Deutsch). People believed in the existence of local powers and deities (deities in trees, rivers, on hills) that needed to be respected and approached in awe. In the course of the fifth to tenth centuries C.E., Roman Catholic monks and nuns, supported by the ruling powers, led the peoples of the various central western European territories to Christianity. During the Middle Ages (the eleventh to the fifteenth centuries), the pope and the German emperor alternately struggled as rivals and cooperated.

In the early sixteenth century, the initial historic split between the ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH and Reformist Protestantism took place, Martin Luther (1483–1546) providing the theological inspiration. Following Luther's translation of the New Testament into German (from the Greek and Latin versions) in 1521 and his public criticism of the pope and the practice of selling indulgences, an increasing number of German principalities and kingdoms dissociated from Rome and introduced the Protestant Reformation. The peace treaties of 1555 and 1648 politically sanctioned the split of the church. By those treaties, the principle was established that the ruler of a region could determine its religion (in Latin, cuius regio, eius religio), and so parts of Germany became Protestant (following the Evangelical Church, as the church established by Luther was called), and other parts remained in the Roman Catholic Church. The subjects had to follow the principal's decision.

Within Protestantism, already in the sixteenth century the first splits occurred, and pietistic denominations (emphasizing personal spirituality) came into being. Many principalities were in fact more or less mono-religious, but in the larger kingdoms people of both confessions (that is, of both the Evangelical and the Roman Catholic churches) resided, as well as marginalized Jews. Alongside this predominantly bidenominational setup a small number of FREE CHURCHES (e.g., Baptists and Methodists), occult esoteric groups, and metaphysical movements came into existence beginning in the seventeenth century.

Biconfessionalism had also come about as a result of the legal secularization of 1803 and the territorial rearrangement of the German principalities following the Napoleonic Wars (1806–1814). Along with the disappearance of states in which only one religion was recognized, a progressive dissolution of former state churches began, culminating in the legal separation of church and state (in a now united Germany) of the Weimar Republic Constitution in 1918. In 1949, after the Nazi regime and World War II, the law of the Federal Republic of Germany (FRG) incorporated the relevant articles of the Weimar Constitution. Article 137 states that there is no state church, that the various “religious societies” have the right to organize themselves in an autonomous way, and that each may collect church taxes if it is recognized as a public body. More basically, Article 4 guarantees the freedom of faith and religious confession. As for East Germany, the German Democratic Republic (GDR), its constitution of 1949 adopted the same

Status of religions in Germany, 2000-2050

Followers	2000			2025	2050
	total	%	rate
Christians	62,326,000	75.8	0.19	59,150,000	51,179,000
Protestants	30,420,000	37.0	-0.01	29,500,000	25,500,000
Roman Catholics	28,700,000	34.9	0.18	27,800,000	24,500,000
Independents	728,000	0.9	-0.03	700,000	650,000
Nonreligious	14,131,000	17.2	0.56	14,151,000	14,500,000
Muslims	3,653,000	4.4	2.51	4,950,000	6,000,000
Atheists	1,793,000	2.2	0.25	1,500,000	1,000,000
Jews	96,000	0.1	7.41	150,000	150,000
Buddhists	84,600	0.1	1.21	130,000	180,000
Hindus	51,200	0.1	1.29	85,000	125,000
Neoreligionists	18,900	0.0	0.76	30,000	45,000
Baha'is	12,400	0.0	0.32	20,000	40,000
Chinese folk-religionists	5,200	0.0	0.45	8,000	12,000
Sikhs	3,300	0.0	0.92	5,300	8,000
Ethnoreligionists	3,100	0.0	0.41	4,500	6,400
Confucianists	2,000	0.0	0.67	4,000	7,200
other religionists	39,700	0.1	0.43	50,000	50,000
Total population	82,220,000	100.0	0.35	80,238,000	73,303,000

articles of the Weimar Constitution. Nevertheless, this did not prevent the state and the Communist Party of the GDR from imposing Marxist-Leninist ideology, nor did it prevent strong criticism of the Christian churches (mainly Protestant), and indeed of every faith. As a result, after forty years of the GDR, the percentage of people not affiliated to a church or faith was the highest in Europe (70 percent non-affiliated). With the GDR joining the FRG and thus the formal ending of the GDR in 1990, the percentage of religiously non-affiliated people in the now-united Germany became 26 percent of the whole population.

Around the beginning of the twentieth century, new, non-Christian faiths and traditions had already emerged in or trickled into Germany. A few individual Baha'i, Buddhists, Theosophists, freethinkers, Anthroposophists, and others met in private circles, founded societies, and propagated their convictions in journals and public meetings. A different way of contributing to the enlarging religious pluralism of Germany came about during the 1960s, with the arrival of so-called guest workers (Gastarbeiter) from Turkey. Most of these workers and their families were Muslims (in the Sunni HANAFITE SCHOOL OF ISLAM tradition). After years of work in Germany, many opted to stay in the country where their children had by now grown up. A multitude of small, hidden mosques were built, a process that during the 1990s changed to a more visible appearance of Islam in Germany. In 2000, Islam, with some 3 million people, had become the third largest religious faith in Germany. Furthermore, the migration of people and flight of refugees from Near Eastern, African, and Asian countries had brought further faiths and traditions, be it other Islamic traditions, AFRICAN INITIATED CHURCHES, or Yezidi, Hindu, Sikh, and Buddhist followers.

Berliner Dom Church (Corel)

Additionally, during the 1970s and 1980s, new religious movements such as the Hare Krishnas (INTERNATIONAL SOCIETY FOR KRISHNA CONSCIOUSNESS), Transcendental Meditation, the Neo-Sannyas Movement of Bhagwan Shree Rajneesh (OSHO COMMUNE INTERNATIONAL), and the CHURCH OF SCIENTOLOGY had succeeded in finding a footing in Germany. A fierce public debate has ensued about whether these organizations are dangerous. Christian pastors and so-called “sect specialists” have been at the forefront of this polemical discussion, using their traditional societal power to define what is right and wrong.

Despite the fundamental enlargement of religious options and traditions, Christian churches have retained their dominant position within the religious pluralism in Germany. In 2000, of Germany’s 82 million inhabitants, 27.4 million were members of the EVANGELICAL CHURCH IN GERMANY (33.4 percent), and almost the same number of people were affiliated to Roman Catholicism (27.3 million). Free churches (1 million) and Orthodox churches (0.8 million) stay well behind the total of 3.6 million Muslims (4.4 percent). Judaism has reestablished itself in Germany after the persecution and Holocaust during Nazi time, with about 96,000 Jews living in Germany in 2000. Hindus from India and Sri Lanka (Tamils) make up some 90,000 people, Tamil Hindus having been active in opening architecturally impressive temples during the 1990s. The number of Buddhists can be estimated at some 150,000 people, two-thirds of whom are refugees and migrants from Asia. Other religious communities and new religious movements comprise a minority of some 120,000 to 140,000 followers altogether (0.15 percent). In total, non-Christian faiths with about 4 million people constitute a minority of 4.8 percent. In contrast, the number of people not officially affiliated to a church or religious tradition may be as high as 20 to 22 million, comprising thus a fourth of the population in Germany.

Martin Baumann

Sources:

- Daiber, Karl-Fritz. Religion unter den Bedingungen der Moderne. Marburg: Diagonal, 1995. An English translation of the final chapter appeared as "Religion and Modernity in Germany." Social Compass, 43, 3 (1996): 411–423.
- Deutscher Bundestag, ed. Abschlussbericht der Enquete-Kommission "Sogenannte Sekten und Psychogruppen." Neue religiöse und ideologische Gemeinschaften und Psychogruppen in der Bundesrepublik Deutschland. Bonn: Referat Öffentlichkeitsarbeit, 1998.
- Evans, Richard J. "Religion and Society." In Richard J. Evans: Rethinking German History. Nineteenth-Century Germany and the Origin of the Third Reich. London: Allen and Unwin, 1987.
- Moltmann, Jürgen. "Religion and State in Germany: West and East." Annals of the American Academy of Political Science, 483, 1 (1986): 110–117.

Religious Studies Media and Information Service (REMID). "Religiösgemeinschaften in Deutschland: Mitgliederzahlen." Posted at http://www.remid.de/remid_info_zahlen.htm. Accessed August 10, 2001.

Tworuschka, Udo, and Michael Klöcker, eds. Handbuch der Religionen. Kirchen und andere Glaubensgemeinschaften in Deutschland. Landsberg am Lech: Olzog, 1997. With updates and sections twice annually.

Germany, Hinduism in Interest in Hindu concepts and ideas in Germany can be traced to eighteenth- and nineteenth-century philosophers and writers. Despite this early encounter, a lasting presence of Hindu people began no earlier than the second half of the twentieth century, with immigrants and refugees coming from South Asia. Johann Gottfried Herder (1744–1803) and Romantic thinkers and poets such as Joseph Görres (1776–1848) and Novalis (1772–1801) idealized India as being synonymous with original religiosity and unity, virtues supposed to have been lost in Europe with the eighteenth century Age of Enlightenment. This kind of idealization has continued to this day among some artists; it has also shaped the image of India and Hinduism held by many Western converts. In 2001, the number of Hindus living in Germany has been estimated at about 90,000 to 100,000 people. Far from forming a homogeneous faith minority, Hindus fall into sub-minorities from India, Afghanistan, and Sri Lanka, as well as belonging to organizations formed by Western converts.

Procession of Hindu Tamils at an annual temple festival in Hamm, Westphalia, Germany, 1998 (Martin Baumann)

Indian Hindus, many of them businessmen, doctors, and engineers from Kerala, Bengal, or Gujarat, have come since the 1950s. The number can be estimated at some 35,000 people in 2001. These individual professionals have become well established as professors, senior physicians, or businessmen. A fair number have married German partners and taken German citizenship. Despite their number, no permanent places of worship have been founded. Occasionally Indian Hindus meet in rented halls to celebrate the main Indian annual festivals, such as Durga-puja or Divali. Wealthy families invite a swami (teacher) to provide lectures or to perform specific life rituals.

Afghan Hindus came to Germany fleeing the civil war during the 1980s. Of some 66,000 Afghans in Germany, a minority of approximately 5,000 are Hindus. In 2001, they maintained four well-organized and richly decorated temples, one in Hamburg, two in Cologne, and one in Frankfurt am Main. These sites are often visited by Sikhs and Indian Hindus too. The Afghans may be contacted c/o the Afghan Hindu Temple, Billstr. 77, 20539 Hamburg.

Western Hindus come together in organizations such as ANANDA MARGA YOGA SOCIETY (with some 200 members), SAHAJA YOGA (200), BRAHMA KUMARIS (300), the INTERNATIONAL SOCIETY FOR KRISHNA CONSCIOUSNESS (whose members are called Hare Krishnas, 350), DIVINE LIGHT MISSION (500), Transcendental Meditation Organization (1,000, plus 5,000–10,000 'practitioners'), and the OSHO COMMUNE INTERNATIONAL (5,000). All together they number less than 10,000 people. In numerous local groups, they pursue devotional acts, read basic Hindu texts, and practice yoga and meditation. They provoked public debates during the 1970s and 1980s, when they were stigmatized as belonging to "cults" and "sects," but the controversy has calmed down since the mid-1990s. A less polemic and more factually oriented approach has emerged, which perceives these Hindu-faith based groups as belonging to the category of new religions.

Tamil people from Sri Lanka have come to Germany as asylum seekers since the early 1980s. Among the 60,000 Tamil refugees and citizens in 2001, some 75 percent, or 45,000, are Hindus, the rest Catholic and Protestant. Despite the imposed geographic distribution of Tamils to all federal states of Germany, a clear concentration has evolved in North Rhine-Westphalia (NRW). In this region, 45 percent of all Tamil people live. They have established shops and social and political societies and founded numerous temples. Of the twenty-four permanent temples (additionally there are temporary places of worship) in late 2001, fifteen were situated in NRW. The size of the temples varies, from little basement rooms to shrine rooms set up on the ground floor of a residential house to temples in spacious halls of converted industrial buildings. Hamm (in NRW), with its three separate temples for Vinayagar (Ganesha), Kamadchi (a goddess), and Murugan, has become the center of Hindu Tamil life in Germany. The Sri Kamadchi Temple stages an annual procession attended by some ten thousand participants and visitors (Hindu Shankarar Sri Kamadchi Ampal Temple, Siegenbeckstr. 4, 59071 Hamm-Uentrop; <http://www.kamadchi-ampal.de>). Also, this temple is the only purposely built temple, constructed in South Indian style with a large gōpuram and seven separate shrines in the huge temple hall.

In general, until the mid-1990s migrant Hindus displayed a rather low public profile, despite their numbers. In contrast, media interests focused on convert Hindus and their religious practices. With the emergence of public processions and the founding of recognizable temples, there has been a shift to more public visibility of the immigrant Hindu minorities.

Martin Baumann

Sources:

Baumann, Martin. Migration, Religion, Integration: Vietnamesische Buddhisten und tamilische Hindus in Deutschland. Marburg: Diagonal-Verlag, 2000.

———. "Sustaining 'Little Indias': The Hindu Diasporas in Europe." In Strangers and Sojourners: Religious Communities in the Diaspora, edited by Gerrie ter Haar. Leuven: Uitgeverij Peeters, 1998.

Religious Studies Media and Information Service (REMID). "Religionsgemeinschaften in Deutschland: Mitgliederzahlen." Posted at http://www.remid.de/remid_info_zahlen.htm. Accessed November 25, 2001.

Süss, Joachim. Bhagwans Erbe. Die Osho-Bewegung heute. München: Claudius, 1996.

Germany, Islam in

In 2000, 3.04 million people of Muslim faith resided in Germany (3.6 percent of the population). Some 75 percent of these were Turkish Muslims, most of them in the Sunni HANAFITE SCHOOL OF ISLAM. Along with the dominant Sunni community, there are also Turkish ALEVISM (approx. 340,000) and smaller groups of Shi'a Muslims (of Turkish, Iranian, and other descent), Sufis, Ismailis, and members of the Ahmadiyya Muslim movement. Finally, there are also some 10,000 German Muslim converts.

The current presence of Islam is based on the enlistment of Turkish men (very few women) for semiskilled work in Germany during the 1960s. However, the history of Islam in Germany dates back to the mid-eighteenth century, when in 1739 the Prussian king, Frederick William I, ordered the construction of a mosque in Potsdam (near Berlin) so that the Turkish soldiers serving in the Prussian army could faithfully practice their religious duties. In 1798, a first Muslims set up an information booth in Stuttgart, Germany. (B. Turner/TRIP)

Muslim cemetery, owned by the Osman Empire, was authorized in Berlin. In 1922, due to Muslim diplomats, traders, and refugees living in Berlin (about 1,000 people), an initial Muslim community consisting of Muslims from forty-one nations was established.

A sharp increase of Muslim people resulted from a labor-force shortage and the resultant signing of an employment agreement between West Germany and Turkey in 1961. Similar agreements were concluded with Morocco in 1969, and subsequently with Tunisia. The agreements foresaw a temporary influx of workers. A system of rotation was built into the program, and the so-called Gastarbeiter (guest workers) were intended to stay for one to three years only. Within ten years, half a million Turkish workers came to Germany. In 1973, due to the oil recession, recruitment was stopped. The phase of family reunion commenced in the following year, and the guest workers moved from temporary housing to more permanent houses. A proliferation of Turkish social and cultural infrastructures, including small halls for prayer, developed during the 1970s and 1980s.

During the 1990s, the children of the guest workers came of age, and they have occasioned a move of Islam into the public arena. Representative mosques, each with its minaret, quite different from the hitherto unnoticed, hidden prayer halls, have been built in various cities. Most often, the building of these publicly visible signs of Islamic presence were accompanied by emotionally laden controversies, as German-born residents complained about such overtly Islamic buildings. Still, the vast majority of places for prayer remain in converted halls or houses (some 2,200), as opposed to some 70 proper mosques. Mosques and prayer halls have assumed many functions, serving religious, cultural, and social needs. Some offer special programs for youth, women, and elderly people.

The primary Muslim organizations are the Turkish Islamic Union of the Authority of Religion (DITIB), a direct representative of the Turkish Ministry of Religion, and the Islamic Community Milli Görüş (IGMG; Islamische Gemeinschaft Milli Görüş). Influential are also the Sufi-oriented Association of Islamic Cultural Centers (VIKZ) and the Islamic Community Jama'at un-Nur (all four with headquarters in Cologne). In addition to these organizations, with which about half of the local mosques or prayer halls are associated, national umbrella organizations such as the Central Council of Muslims (ZMD; Zentralrat der Muslime in Deutschland) and the Islamic Council strive to function as general representatives of Muslims in Germany. However, so far factionalism and internal quarrels have prevented the formation of a unified body. The import of Turkish home policy, the alignment to specific Islamic schools and traditions, and the emphasis on the cultural-linguistic origin of immigrant Muslims strongly influence the heterogeneity of Islam in Germany. Despite this organizational disunity, the second generation's increasing share in the leadership has brought about a shift in orientation toward ambitions to firmly establish Islam in Germany and to foster processes of both public representation and acculturation.

The various organizations that represent the German Muslim community may be contacted through the following addresses: Zentralrat der Muslime in Deutschland (ZMD), Indestr. 93, 52249 Eschweiler, <http://www.islam.de/> (in German); Islamrat für die Bundesrepublik, Adenauerallee 13, 53111 Bonn, 5396138, <http://www.islamrat.de/> (in German); DITIB, Türkisch-Islamische Union der Anstalt für Religion, Venloer Str. 160, 50823 Köln; IGMG Islamische Gemeinschaft Milli Görüs, Merheimer Str. 229 50733 Köln, <http://www.igmg.de/>; Islamische Gemeinschaft Jama'at un-Nur, Neustr. 11, 51063 Köln; and Verband der Islamischen Kulturzentren (VIKZ), Vogelsanger Strasse 290, 50825 Köln, <http://www.vikz.de/>.

Martin Baumann

Sources:

- Hannemann, Tilman, and Peter Meier-Hüsing, eds. Deutscher Islam—Islam in Deutschland. Marburg: Diagonal, 2000.
- Karakasoglu, Yasemin, and Gerd Nonnemann. "Muslims in Germany, with Special Reference to the Turkish-Islamic Community." In Muslim Communities in the New Europe, edited by Gerd Nonnemann, Tim Niblock, and Bogdan Szajkowski. Reading, UK: Ithaca Press, 1996.
- Schiffauer, Werner. "Islamic Vision and Social Reality: The Political Culture of Sunni Muslims in Germany." In Islam in Europe: The Politics of Religion and Community, edited by Steven Vertovec and Ceri Peach. Basingstoke, UK: Macmillan, 1997.
- Yalcin-Heckmann, Lale. "Growing Up as a Muslim in Germany: Religious Socialization Among Turkish Migrant Families." In Muslim European Youth. Reproducing Ethnicity, Religion, Culture, edited by Steven Vertovec and Alisdair Rogers. Aldershot, UK: Ashgate, 1998.

Ghana

The modern nation of Ghana began to take shape in the fourteenth century C.E. with the movement of the Akan (or Ashanti) people in the area, where they became rivals of the Denkyita state that controlled the coast. They emerged as a trading people who gathered the goods of the region and exchanged them for goods from the far north. This arrangement worked for several centuries, but in the seventeenth century, the Ashanti responded to the collapse of trade with North Africa by uniting and capturing several coastal cities. They then came into contact with Europeans and became partners in the slave trade.

The British attempts to stop the slave trade led to three different wars with the Ashanti (1806–1816, 1825–1828, and 1874). In 1875, the British established a protectorate over the coastal region, and twenty years later added the area in the north, where a new national political movement centered in Guinea threatened to spread. The Ashanti nation still controlled the central region. It was absorbed into the British colony, known as the Gold Coast, in 1902.

Pressure for independence grew after World War II, and in 1949 the Convention People's Party was founded by Kwame N'Krumah (1909–1972). He became the prime minister in 1952, and five years later the head of the first African colony to become independent. His attempts to reform the nation and his increasingly autocratic regime, however, met strong opposition, and in 1966 he was overthrown. A representative government was created in 1969. However, the next decades were marked by economic instability and frequent change of governments. Some stability has been offered by Jerry John Rawlings (b. 1947), who came to prominence in 1979 and became president in 1982. He has survived several changes in the government and remains the country's president as the new century begins.

The Ashanti (who dominate the central part of the country) and the Fanti (along the southern coast) make up 44 percent of the citizenry. Other important groups include the Ewe, Ga-Adanbe, Mole-Dagbani, Guan, and Gurma peoples. Approximately 25 percent of the people retain their traditional beliefs and practices.

Islam entered Ghana as early as the 1390s, in part due to the trade fostered by the Ashanti. Conversions to Islam were few until the twentieth century, but Muslims (of the Sunni SHAFIITE SCHOOL OF ISLAM and MALIKITE SCHOOL OF ISLAM) are now found across the nation. Muslims are strongest in the north, where such groups as the Wala and Dagomba are more than 50 percent Muslim. In 1969, some

Status of religions in Ghana, 2000–2050

Followers	2000			2025	2050
	total	%	rate
Christians	11,195,000	55.4	3.06	22,097,000	32,353,000
Protestants	3,360,000	16.6	3.42	7,000,000	11,200,000
Independents	2,920,000	14.5	3.11	6,150,000	9,626,000
Roman Catholics	1,925,000	9.5	2.53	3,200,000	4,200,000
Ethnoreligionists	4,937,000	24.4	2.55	6,367,000	6,540,000
Muslims	3,974,000	19.7	3.10	8,200,000	12,500,000
Nonreligious	63,800	0.3	2.89	150,000	300,000
Neoreligionists	17,800	0.1	3.18	22,000	35,000
Baha'is	12,100	0.1	2.17	18,000	35,000
Hindus	4,000	0.0	2.36	7,000	16,000
Atheists	3,200	0.0	2.55	6,000	10,000
Chinese folk-religionists	590	0.0	1.60	800	1,200
Buddhists	400	0.0	1.74	1,000	2,000
other religionists	3,900	0.0	3.05	7,000	10,000
Total population	20,212,000	100.0	2.94	36,876,000	51,802,000

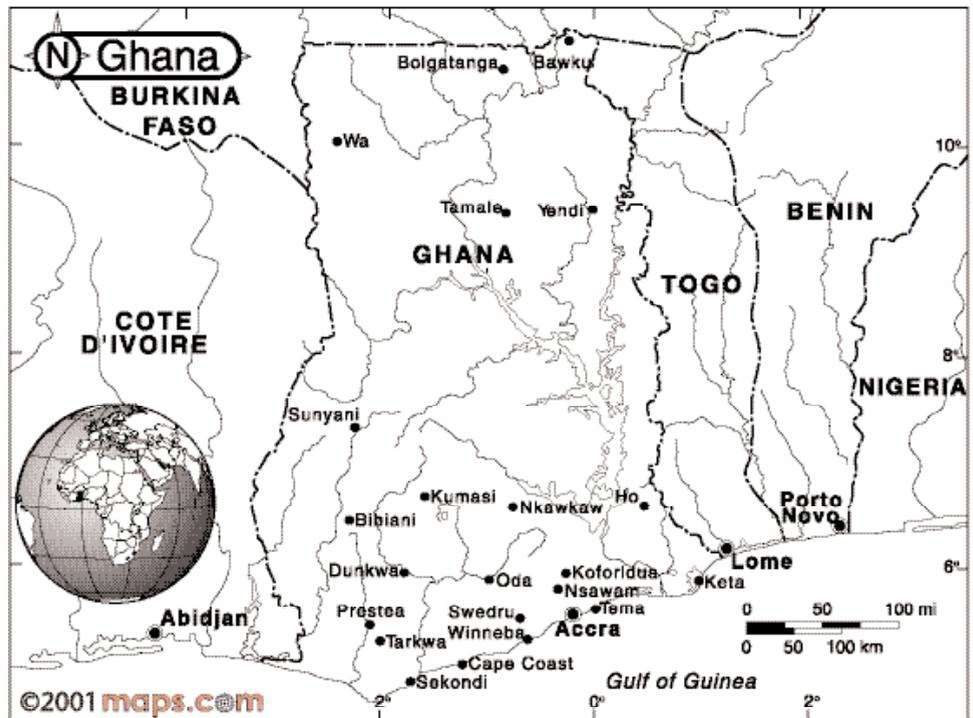

200,000 Muslim immigrants in Ghana were expelled from the country, and many Muslim schools were closed. However, by that time the native Muslim community had become well entrenched. As the new century begins, some 20 percent of the population of 20 million are Muslims.

Prior to 1969, the Muslim community had been dominated by the Ghana Muslim Community, headed by non-Ghanaians. After 1969, the Ghana Muslim Mission (organized in 1957) and the AHMADIYYA MOVEMENT IN ISLAM (formed in Accra, the capital, in 1924) rose to prominence. Both formed modern Muslim schools and assumed a role in the post-independence culture. Most recently, missionaries sent by Al-Azhar University (HANAFITE SCHOOL OF ISLAM) in Cairo, Egypt, have begun to proselytize in Ghana.

At the beginning of the 1990s, with the approval of the government, American Muslim leader Louis Farrakhan, head of the NATION OF ISLAM (FARRAKHAN), launched a mission in Ghana. In October 1994, he brought some 2,000 members from America to hold a five-day celebration of the work of Elijah Muhammad (founder of the Nation of Islam), the International Savior's Day, at which the Ghanaian president Jerry Rawlings spoke.

Christianity entered Ghana with initial missionary efforts of the Moravians, but no permanent work was established until 1828, when representatives of the Basel Mission settled in Christiansborg. The shaky work, headed by Europeans unused to the climate, was rescued in 1843 by Jamaican Moravians, who finally built a stable congregation. The Basel missionaries built villages of Christian converts and created a school system. This work was transferred to the United Free Church of Scotland (now an integral part of the CHURCH OF SCOTLAND) after World War I and eventually matured into the PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH OF GHANA.

British Methodists launched work in 1832 under the leadership of Thomas Birch Freeman (1809–1890), whose African heritage (by way of Jamaica) allowed him some comfort in his homeland. In 1838, he began the work among the Ashanti and emphasized education and indigenous leadership. The METHODIST CHURCH, GHANA, became the leading church in the land and developed an education system capped by Bible schools and colleges.

As the British gained hegemony over the region, Anglicans moved in, headed by workers associated with the CHURCH MISSIONARY SOCIETY and the United Society for the Propagation of the Gospel (though Anglican services had been held in several locations along the coast since 1752). That work has now been incorporated into the CHURCH OF THE PROVINCE OF WEST AFRICA. THE SALVATION ARMY came in 1922. Nigerian (Yoruban) Baptists established the first Baptist congregations in 1918. Americans with the ASSEMBLIES OF GOD brought Pentecostalism in 1931. In subsequent decades a spectrum of American and British groups staked out mission territories. The SOUTHERN BAPTIST CONVENTION began an extensive mission in 1947.

Like the Muslims, the Christian community suffered in 1969, when all aliens without valid passports and work permits were expelled. Most Western missionaries and numerous Christians from neighboring countries were among the million people forced to leave Ghana.

The ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH first reached Ghana when the Portuguese explored the coast in the fifteenth century, but it did not build an effective presence until the 1880s, when systematic work began. Following World War I, the White Fathers took the lead in building the church. The first Ghanaian bishop was consecrated in 1957. The church has been helped in the last generation by the spread of the Catholic Pentecostal movement.

AFRICAN INITIATED CHURCHES began to arise early in the twentieth century, and several, such as the MUSAMA DISCO CHRISTO CHURCH (also known as the Army of the Cross of Christ Church), have gone on to become international bodies. The Divine Healers Church now rivals the

A Besease traditional shrine in Ashanti, Ghana (M. Barlow/TRIP)

Methodist Church in size. Other churches, such as the CHERUBIM AND SERAPHIM and the HARRIST CHURCH, have come to Ghana from neighboring lands. The very first Ghanaian independent church, the Church of the Twelve Apostles, was founded by a former member of the Harrist Church in 1914. Literally hundreds of different independent churches now operate in Ghana.

Many of the older missionary churches organized the Christian Council of the Gold Coast in 1924. That council evolved into the Christian Council of Ghana, now affiliated with the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES. More recently, conservative evangelical churches have organized the National Association of Evangelicals of Ghana, which is affiliated with the WORLD EVANGELICAL ALLIANCE.

The JEHOVAH'S WITNESSES began work in 1924, and though banned in 1989, the organization now has over 100,000 members. The CHURCH OF JESUS CHRIST OF LATTER-DAY SAINTS, also banned in 1989, now has 15,000 members and has erected a temple in Accra. The work in Ghana expanded for the first time in the years after the admission of people of African descent to the priesthood in 1978. The ban on the church was lifted in 1990.

Some Hindu traders from India had come to Ghana through the twentieth century, but in 1977, a missionary (called the Black Monk of Africa) set up a Hindu monastery in Accra. It had a Ghanaian as its head and some two dozen African residents, who accepted the vows of renunciation as sannyasi. The monastery has developed a presence in various parts of the church through its establishment of clinics and social welfare structures. The ANANDA MARGA YOGA SOCIETY also has work in Ghana.

Additional small movements in Ghana include the BAHÁ'Í FAITH, the CHURCH UNIVERSAL AND TRIUMPHANT (from the United States), SOKA GAKKAI INTERNATIONAL (from Japan), and Chinese Buddhists.

Sources:

Barker, P., ed. Five Hundred Churches: A Brief Survey of Christianity in Ghana. Accra: Christian Council of Ghana, 1978.

- Debrunner, H. W. A History of Christianity in Ghana. Accra: Waterville Publishing House, 1967.
- The Rise of Independent Churches in Ghana*. Accra: Asempa Publishers, 1990.
- Silverman, R. A., and D. Owusu-Ansah. "The Presence of Islam among the Akan of Ghana: A Bibliographical Essay." History of Africa 16 (1989): 325–337.
- Wilks, Ivor. "Reflections on Zakât in Northern Ghana: Not an Institution but a Goal to Be Achieved." Posted at <http://www.valt.helsinki.fi/kmi/Julkais/WPt/2000/WP200HW.HTM>.
- Wyllie, Robert W. The Spirit-Seekers: New Religious Movements in Southern Ghana. American Academy of Religion, Studies in Religion, no. 21. Missoula, MT: Scholars Press, 1980.

Gibraltar

The island of Gibraltar, located off the coast of Spain and a mere 32 kilometers from Morocco, is a United Nations territory administered by the United Kingdom. The island was occupied by England in 1704. Spain formally ceded hegemony to England with the Treaty of Utrecht a decade later. Since the 1960s, Spain has actively worked to regain control, an effort blocked by a plebiscite in 1967. The island's 30,000 residents come from Spain, Great Britain, and a host of other nearby countries (including Italy, Portugal, Morocco, and Malta).

The Roman Catholic Church had begun work on Gibraltar in 1492, but once the British assumed control, the church was suppressed. However, the church survived and remains by far the largest religious body on the island. In 1910, the work was organized into a diocese, whose bishop was immediately subject to Rome through the Office for the Propagation of the Faith.

The Anglican Church was introduced by the British in 1704 and has primarily served residents of British extraction. A Diocese of Gibraltar was organized in 1842, which included Anglican parishes across southern Europe around the Mediterranean rim all the way to Turkey. More recently, the Anglican work in Europe outside of the British Isles has been reorganized into the comprehensive CHURCH OF ENGLAND's Diocese of Europe, which includes English-speaking parishes in some forty-five countries. The work in Gibraltar has been reorganized into an archdeaconry.

Also following the British arrival, Methodists (associated with the METHODIST CHURCH of Great Britain) and Presbyterians (related to the CHURCH OF SCOTLAND) established work. The SEVENTH-DAY ADVENTIST CHURCH arrived early in the century. Gibraltar is part of the Spanish Union of Churches. The JEHOVAH'S WITNESSES established their presence around 1955.

In 1492, at a time when Spain was considering what to do with the Jews in its midst, the government heard proposals that Gibraltar would be a site to exile some of them, especially the Marranos, or hidden Jews. No one acted upon the suggestion. Thus it was not until the British occupation that Jews from North Africa began to arrive. By 1749, when they received legal status, there were some six hundred, and two synagogues had been erected. The Jewish community has risen and fallen over the years. It peaked at around two thousand in the middle of the nineteenth century but had dropped back to approximately six hundred by the end of the twentieth century.

Beginning in 1961, Moroccans began to arrive in Gibraltar. They brought their Sunni Islam (of the MALIKITE SCHOOL OF ISLAM with them). Several thousand now reside on the island. There are also a minuscule number of Hindus and Baha'is.

Sources:

- Knight, H. J. C. The Diocese of Gibraltar: A Sketch of Its History, Work and Tasks. London: SPCK, 1917.
- Upon This Rock, 1769–1969: A Short History of Methodism in Gibraltar*. Gibraltar: n.p., 1969.

Gnostic Catholic Church

The Gnostic Catholic Church, a contemporary occult church, exists as an integral part of the thelemic (from the Greek, thelema, or will) magical order O.T.O. (ORDO TEMPLI ORIENTIS). It is actually one faction of the Nouvelle Église Gnostique Universelle, which in 1890 was initiated as a new Gnostic tradition by Jules-Benoit Doinel du Val-Michel (1842–1894). In 1967, the year before his marriage, Doinel claimed that as part of an apparition of the Virgin Mary, Jesus had also appeared and consecrated him as a bishop. Through the next years, he focused his reading on occult literature, and then around 1890, during a Spiritualist séance, he accepted a second consecration that led directly to his founding of the Nouvelle Église Gnostique Universelle. Through the church, Doinel hoped to revive the mystical doctrines attributed to the second-century theologian Origen, most importantly the idea of the preexistence of soul and the related belief in metempsychosis, or reincarnation. Assuming the position as patriarch of the new church, Doinel proceeded to consecrate four bishops,

Status of religions in Gibraltar, 2000–2050

Followers	2000			2025	2050
	total	%	rate
Christians	21,600	86.2	-0.79	17,700	14,000
Roman Catholics	21,200	84.5	-0.68	17,000	13,000
Anglicans	1,900	7.6	-0.51	1,600	1,300
Protestants	380	1.5	0.54	420	460
Muslims	2,200	8.6	-0.18	2,200	2,200
Nonreligious	490	2.0	2.13	600	700
Jews	480	1.9	-1.23	400	300
Hindus	270	1.1	-1.01	350	400
Baha'is	70	0.3	0.42	120	150
Total population	25,100	100.0	-0.72	21,400	17,800

each of whom went on to establish separate lineages from which several dozen distinctive Gnostic jurisdictions have emerged.

In 1892, Doinel consecrated Gerard Encausse (1865–1916), the author of several occult texts under the pen name Papus. Papus took Doinel's Gnosticism into the milieu of the German and British occult orders. Papus remained loyal to the Église Gnostique Universelle, a faction of the church that emerged in 1908. However, as a bishop he possessed authority to consecrate others without reference to his superior, and it is claimed by some that he in fact consecrated both Theodor Reuss and Aleister Crowley, who as leaders in the Ordo Templi Orientis brought the Gnostic Catholic Church into the O.T.O. orb. Evidence of these consecrations are somewhat weak.

Early in his work for the O.T.O., Crowley wrote a Gnostic mass that integrated thelemic themes in a liturgy that followed the form of the Roman Catholic mass, though no Christian teachings remained. In 1917 Reuss translated Crowley's mass into German and began designating himself as the leader of the Gnostic neo-Christians and the Swiss legate of the Église Gnostique Universelle, then headed by Jean Baptiste Bricaud (1881–1934), reportedly consecrated by Papus in 1911. Reuss later accepted several additional consecrations, while Bricaud (albeit unsuccessfully) advocated the use of Crowley's mass in Freemason circles.

During the years under Karl Johannes Germer (1885–1962), the Ordo Templi Orientis almost ceased to exist, and the performance of the Gnostic mass put aside. Then in 1957 in Switzerland, Hermann Joseph Metzger (1919–1990), a leader in the O.T.O., accepted consecration as a bishop of the Gnostic Catholic Church from Herbert Fritsche (1911–1960), and then succeeded Fritsche as patriarch in 1960. Following Germer's death, in 1963 he called together German O.T.O. leaders and was selected by them as the new international Outer Head of the Order of the O.T.O.. He then revived the O.T.O., along with the Gnostic Catholic Church.

In America in the 1970s, Grady McMurtry (1918–1985) revived the O.T.O. by assuming the role of caliph of the order and argued that he was therefore patriarch of the Gnostic Catholic Church. McMurtry claimed authority to lead the O.T.O. from some emergency documents he had been given by Crowley in the mid-1940s. He argued that the same documents gave him an implied consecration as a bishop. McMurtry's role as head of the church was questioned, given the lack of documentation of Crowley's consecration by Papus and the lack of an act of consecration of McMurtry.

McMurtry's successor, William Breeze, put the controversy over the church to rest when he was consecrated anew by Jack Hogg, a bishop of the Gnostic Church of Thelema. Hogg's lineage could be traced directly to Doinel and has been supplemented by the lineage of Orthodox bishop Joseph René Vilatte, through the small theosophically oriented American Catholic Church. All ninth-degree members of the American O.T.O. are now consecrated as Gnostic bishops. The Other Head of the O.T.O. is also considered the patriarch of the Gnostic Catholic Church.

The American branch of the Gnostic Catholic Church may be contacted at JAF 7666, New York, NY 10116. Gnostic church services are held across North America and in eighteen countries where the O.T.O. has affiliated lodges and groups.

Sources:

- Anson, Peter. Bishops at Large. London: Faber and Faber, 1964.
- Koenig, Peter R. "Herman Joseph Metzger—OHO of the O.T.O. and Patriarch of the Gnostic Catholic Church." Posted at <http://www.cyberlink.ch/~koenig/bishops.htm>. Accessed April 23, 2000.
- Koenig, Peter R. "Stranded Bishops." Posted at <http://www.cyberlink.ch/~koenig/bishops.htm>. Accessed April 23, 2000.
- Ward, Gary L., Bertil Persson, and Alan Bain, eds. Independent Bishops: An International Directory. Detroit, MI: Apogee Press, 1990.

Gnostic Churches (Doinel)

The Gnostic churches comprise a number of new religious movements, most of which originated from the spiritual experience of Jules-Benoît Doinel (1842–1902). Doinel was born in Moulins (France), in 1842, into a pious Catholic family, sharing a special devotion to the sixteenth-century Jesuit saint Stanislas Kostka (1550–1568), who appeared to Doinel in mystical visions when he was a teenager. These visions eventually put young Doinel in trouble with his teachers at the Jesuit Seminar of Montciel, which he entered in 1859 and from which he was expelled in 1861. He decided then to become a lay archivist and historian rather than a Jesuit priest and graduated from the famous École des Chartes in 1866. His first appointment as an archivist was in Aurillac. By that time, Doinel had abandoned Roman Catholicism altogether and was active as a spiritualist medium. In 1868, however, he married actress Stéphanie-Françoise Le Clerc (1835–1873), a pious Catholic who brought him back into the Roman fold. In 1869, he was appointed archivist of the city of Niort and, while still claiming to be a good Catholic, resumed his practice as a spiritualist medium. After Stéphanie's death in 1873, he remarried in 1874, this time to a lady with strong family ties to (rather anti-Catholic) French Freemasonry, which he ultimately joined in 1884.

By that time, he had held the post of archivist in Orléans (a very important position) since 1875 and had again abandoned the ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH. French Freemasonry was in need of a competent archivist, and Doinel was called to Paris to take on the directorship of the Masonic Museum. In 1882, he joined Monodism, a short-lived religious movement led by Guillaume Monod (1800–1896), the son of the famous Swiss Reformed scholar Jean Monod (1765–1836); Guillaume claimed to be the new Messiah who represented the Second Coming of Jesus Christ. In 1890, Doinel met Papus (Gérard Encausse, 1865–1916), who was then the leader of the Martinist order and other occult organizations, which the archivist quickly joined. Doinel was a true collector of occult society memberships, and he also joined the THEOSOPHICAL SOCIETY (ADYAR). His studies led him toward a particular interest in ancient Gnosticism and Catharism. He shared these interests in Paris with Countess Maria Mariátegui (1830–1895), who later became the duchess of Pomar by marriage and was a friend of Madame Helena P. Blavatsky (1831–1891), as well as other Theosophical luminaries.

How Doinel came to found the Gnostic Church is a tale that he himself told in different ways during his later years. According to one version, in June 1890 during a spiritualist séance at the home of the duchess of Pomar, the spirits of forty-one Cathar bishops appeared and consecrated Doinel as patriarch of a newly established Gnostic church. True or not, by late 1890 Doinel was actively consecrating Gnostic bishops, including Papus and another well-known French esoteric author, Paul Sédir (pseudonym of Yvon Le Loup, 1871–1926). By 1892, there were enough Gnostic bishops to convene a synod, which confirmed Doinel as patriarch with the name of Valentinus II. The same synod consecrated yet another French esoteric author, Léonce Fabre des Essarts (1848–1917), as bishop under the name of Synésius. Between 1890 and 1894, Doinel, using a mix of Gnosticism and Catharism, published both a catechism and a ritual for the Gnostic Church. In December 1894, however, Doinel repudiated both Freemasonry and the Gnostic Church and in 1895 publicly announced his return to the Catholic fold. In May 1895, using the pseudonym of Jean Kostka (the latter being the surname of the Jesuit saint to whom he was so devoted in his youth), he published a book under the title Lucifer démasqué (Lucifer unmasked), in which he claimed that the devil himself was behind FREEMASONRY, the Theosophical Society, and the Gnostic Church.

Never one to remain in the same church for long, however, Doinel wrote to Fabre des Essarts (who, in the meantime, had been elected the new patriarch of the Gnostic Church) on December 31, 1899, claiming that he had never really abandoned Gnosticism and was returning to the Gnostic Church, not as patriarch, but as one of its bishops. In 1902, on the other hand, he published a rather pious book of Catholic poetry. Doinel died on March 16, 1902, with both Roman Catholics and Gnostics claiming that he had died whilst still embracing the tenets of their respective faiths.

Unlike Doinel, Fabre des Essarts remained a Gnostic bishop and patriarch throughout his whole life and presided over the expansion of the Gnostic Church from France into Belgium, Germany, Russia, Italy, and the United States. During this period, René Guénon (1886–1951), the famous French esoteric author, was also consecrated as a Gnostic bishop (in 1909) under the name of Palingénius but remained a member of the Gnostic Church for only a short time. Another well-known French esoteric author (and Martinist leader), Jean Bricaud (1881–1934), was consecrated a Gnostic bishop in 1901 but went on in 1907 to head a schism that established what was initially known as the Catholic Gnostic Church, but which from 1908 onwards became known as the Universal Gnostic Church. Bricaud's branch eventually attracted most members of the original Gnostic Church led by Fabre des Essarts (who died in 1917) and his successors, Léon Champrenaud (1870–1925) and Patrice Genty (1883–1964).

The two branches (the Gnostic Church and the Universal Gnostic Church) merged in 1960 under the leadership of Robert Ambelain (1907–1997) who, as leader of the Universal Gnostic Church, had succeeded Constant Chevillon (1880–1944), who had been assassinated by Nazi collaborators, and Henry-Charles Dupont (1877–1960). Ambelain, a successful writer of popular esoteric books, had established yet another independent branch in 1958: it was known as the Apostolic Gnostic Church, and it too was part of the 1960 merger. In 1967, Ambelain left his position as patriarch to pursue other interests, and in 1983 the Apostolic Gnostic Church (which was the name it maintained from the 1960 merger) ceased to exist as an international body. A dozen small Gnostic churches, however, continue to this day to survive on a national basis, particularly in France and Belgium (Rosicrucian Apostolic Church, Gnostic Apostolic Church), Italy (Italian Gnostic Church, Via San Zanobi 89, 50129 Florence, Italy), and the United States and Barbados (Apostolic Gnostic Church, <http://www.apostolic-gnosis.org>), and they have kept alive Doinel's ideas and rituals right up to the present time.

The different branches of the Gnostic Church established by Doinel in 1890 should not be confused, however, with other new religious movements, also known as Gnostic churches; some are completely independent of the Doinel tradition described above (such as several independent Gnostic churches active in California or throughout the United States); others derive from branches of the O.T.O. (ORDO TEMPLI ORIENTIS). The latter include the Catholic Gnostic Churches, which operate within several branches of the O.T.O. loyal to the tradition of Aleister Crowley (1875–1947), although Crowley claimed episcopal orders from Doinel, and the Gnostic churches operating within the Gnostic MOVEMENT, founded by Samael Aun Weor (1917–1977).

Massimo Introvigne and PierLuigi Zoccatelli

Sources:

Introvigne, Massimo. Il ritorno dello gnosticismo. Carnago, Varese, Italy: SugarCo, 1993.

Kostka, Jean (Jules Doineau). Lucifer démasqué. 1895. Reprint, Geneva-Paris: Slatkine, 1983.
 Le Forestier, René. L'Occultisme en France aux XIX^{ème} et XX^{ème} siècles. L'Église Gnostique. Milan: Archè, 1999.

Gnostic Movement (Samael Aun Weor)

More than a hundred independent organizations, known as Gnostic movements or Gnostic churches, claim as their founder Victor Manuel Gómez Rodríguez (1917–1977), an esoteric master born in Bogota (Colombia) and known under the pen name of Samael Aun Weor. Raised as a Roman Catholic, Weor later became a spiritualist, a Theosophist, and a member of the Fraternitas Rosicruciana Antiqua (Ancient Rosicrucian Brotherhood) founded by Arnoldo Krumm-Heller (1876–1949). Krumm-Heller was a friend of the British magus Aleister Crowley (1875–1947) and also operated a Gnostic Catholic Church, in which he probably consecrated Weor a bishop. Weor published his first popular esoteric book, The Perfect Matrimony, in 1950 and about the same time in Mexico City established a Universal Christian Gnostic Church. Weor's death in 1977 generated an endless sequel of schisms. They all differ on matters relating to leadership, doctrine, and ritual, but all venerate Weor as a superhuman master and as the Messiah of the Aquarian age. Some of the branches have several thousand members, particularly throughout Latin America and also in Latin Europe and Québec, with others in the United States, Australia, New Zealand, Asia, and Africa.

Weor's thought is syncretic and includes themes drawn from Theosophy, Krumm-Heller, Aleister Crowley, George Ivanovich Gurdjieff (c. 1866–1949) and other masters. The three keys to Weor's system (or the "three factors of the consciousness revolution") are death, rebirth, and sacrifice. Death means the destruction of all the negative psychological factors that prevent human awakening. Rebirth involves the birth of a higher alchemical body, achieved through sexual magic in the shape of the "AZF Arcane," a form of karezza (the technique aimed at halting a sexual experience just before orgasm). Sacrifice means spreading to humanity in its entirety the wisdom the initiate has acquired. In order to achieve the three stages of Weor's consciousness revolution, secret rituals (in seven degrees), study, astral projection, and astral travels have to be undertaken. The initiate's itinerary is divided into three stages, known as exoteric, mesoteric, and esoteric (terminology also used by Gurdjieff). Weor's main sexual practice, the above-mentioned form of karezza, also known by the tantric name Sahaja Maithuna, is regarded as the only permissible sexual magic. All other forms (including those prevailing in the O.T.O. (ORDO TEMPLI ORIENTIS) groups inspired by the teaching of Aleister Crowley) are regarded as illicit and ultimately controlled by a "Black Lodge" for their own satanic ends.

Drawing a map of the Weor groups is a difficult task, with new schisms occurring almost frequently. The largest group is the Gnostic Institute of Anthropology, which until her death in 1998 was led by Weor's widow, Arnolda Garro Gómez (known as Maestra Litelantes; 1920–1998). It currently has some 18,000 members and was established in 1989, when Arnolda left the Gnostic Association of Anthropological and Cultural Studies over a dispute about the copyright on Weor's writings. The American branch of the Gnostic Institute of Anthropology (3408 E. Broadway, Suite E, Long Beach, CA 90814) maintains a Web site for the organization at <http://www.gnosticinstitute.org>.

The Gnostic Association of Anthropological and Cultural Studies (Internet site at <http://www.ageacac.org>) still exists under the joint leadership of Hypatia Gómez, Weor's daughter, and Victor Manuel Chavez, whilst Osiris Gómez, Weor's son, took over the leadership of the Gnostic Institute of Anthropology, together with Roberto Tejada, after his mother's death. The international headquarters of the Gnostic Institute of Anthropology are at Taxquena 1408, Col. Campestre Churubusco, Mexico, and a Brazilian Web site (<http://www.infonet.com.br/iga>) is used internationally.

Among other branches, a few are worthy of mention: (a) the Gnostic Association of Anthropological, Cultural and Scientific Studies, established in Spain in 1992 by Oscar Uzcátegui Quintero (headquarters: Avenida de América 26/10F, 18006 Granada, Spain; Web site: <http://www.ageacac.org>); (b) the Center for Gnostic Studies (Centro de Estudios Gnósticos, CEG), perhaps the fastest-growing branch, a splinter from Arnolda's branch, guided by Ernesto Barón (whose large Italian chapter maintains a Web site at <http://www.ceg-it.org>; in 2001, Cloris Rojo Barón, Ernesto's wife, separated from her husband and created a separate branch); (c) the Gnostic Christian Universal Church, founded by Colombian master Teofilo Bustos (b. 1935), known as the Venerable Master Lakshmi, currently living in Venezuela (<http://www.gnostico.com>); (d) the Gnostic Christian Universal Movement in the New Order, established in Colombia in 1960 by Joaquín Enrique Amortegui Valbuena (1926–2000), known as the Venerable Master Rabolú (<http://www.gnosisonline.com>). This group enjoyed a certain notoriety in the media thanks to its apocalyptic features and the idea that a planet named Hercólubus may soon collide with planet Earth, thus destroying humanity forever.

Massimo Introvigne and PierLuigi Zoccatelli

Sources:

- Weor, Samael Aun. Manual of Revolutionary Psychology. Los Angeles: Gnostic Association, 1987.
 ———. The Perfect Matrimony. New York: Adonai Editorial, 1980.

Zoccatelli, PierLuigi. "Il paradigma esoterico e un modello di applicazione. Note sul movimento gnostico di Samael Aun Weor." La Critica Sociologica, 135 (Fall 2000): 33–49.

Gnosticism

The term Gnostic was originally applied to a spectrum of groups that emerged to prominence in the second century C.E. as competitors to the Christian church. Questions about the origins of the groups remain a source of intense scholarly discussion, and estimates for the dates of their origins range from the first century C.E. to the first century B.C.E. Until the twentieth century, the Gnostics were known primarily from the writings of Christian heresiologists such as Saint Irenaeus (c. 125–202), whose famous text Against Heresies included excerpts of the writings of various Gnostics such as Valentinus and Carpocrates, both of whom lived in the second century C.E.

The study of Gnosticism was elevated from its status as a subtopic under Christian heresies in 1945 with the discovery of an ancient Gnostic library in the Egyptian desert at Nag Hammadi. The fourth-century site yielded complete copies of books such as the Gospel of Truth (initially recognized from the several quotes in Irenaeus' writings) and the Gospel of Thomas, a heretofore unknown collection of sayings attributed to Jesus. These books, along with the Pistis Sophia, a Gnostic collection published in 1900, have provided a whole new perspective on the Gnostic groups and have led some to question the conventional view of Gnosticism as a singular movement. The renewed interest in Gnosticism has also focused attention on the MANDAEANS, possibly the only Gnostic group that has survived from the ancient Mediterranean. The Mandaean community is centered in southeastern Iraq.

Gnosticism was described by Irenaeus and other Christian writers as a heretical form of Christian teaching. However, in light of the new findings, the Gnostic tradition has come to be seen as a religious community in its own right that began to interact with the Christian movement already in the first century and incorporated Christian elements into its own teachings. Christian Gnostics believed that they possessed the clearest understanding of the message of Christ, the knowledge (in Greek, gnosis) that allowed them to encounter spiritual reality and attain salvation.

To the Gnostics, God was a remote reality, utterly unknowable and transcendent. They described the world as the product of a series of emanations that originated in God—those closest to God being purely spiritual and those closest to earth being characterized by the gross materiality of earthly life. The material world was inherently bad, and only in escaping from it could one obtain salvation. Human beings were seen as sparks of divinity who had been trapped in this lower world. The gnosis allowed them to escape their fate and return to their spiritual home. In some groups, the God of the Hebrew Bible was pictured as a lesser deity, the demiurge, characterized by human passions. In contrast, Christ was seen as a totally spiritual being who appeared in human form (only seeming to have a material existence) to show the way back to the spiritual realm.

Gnosticism, apart from the Mandaeans, appears to have died out by the fifth century, but the impulse it represented continued to reappear at various times and places throughout Europe, most prominently among the Bogomils toward the end of the first millennium C.E. in Bulgaria and the Cathars (or Albigensians) in southern France. Gnosticism had a great affinity to the kabbalistic teachings of mystical Judaism, which found expression in the Christian Cabalist movement that emerged in the sixteenth century. A new burst of Gnosticism began with the Cabalist movement and with the seventeenth-century movement called Rosicrucianism. This reborn Gnosticism is discussed elsewhere in this encyclopedia as the WESTERN ESOTERIC TRADITION, which includes Rosicrucianism, FREEMASONRY (eighteenth century), Theosophy (nineteenth century), and a host of occult and metaphysical groups spawned in the twentieth century, culminating in the NEW AGE MOVEMENT.

Whereas Christian leaders and scholars have tended to see Gnosticism as the oldest and most persistent Christian heresy, Western Esoteric leaders in the twentieth century have taken the opportunity provided by the free religious environment to reclaim Gnosticism as a contemporary living tradition. Gnostic Christian groups have appeared on the fringe of the Christian community, incorporating the Gospel of Thomas into their canon of Scripture. Other esoteric groups have claimed the Gnostic heritage by incorporating the term into their name, though without any significant reference to the ancient Gnostic texts; these include the Gnostic CATHOLIC CHURCH and the Gnostic MOVEMENT.

A very few groups have attempted to base their religions directly on the ancient Gnostic writings. The most prominent representatives of this latter type include the Gnostic Society, based in southern California and headed by Gnostic bishop Stephan A. Hoeller, and the Gnostic Society in the Kingdom of Norway, founded by Terje Dahl Bergersen.

Addresses:

Gnostic Society
4516 Hollywood Blvd.
Los Angeles, CA 90029
<http://www.gnosis.org/~gnosis/gnostsoc.htm>

Gnostic Society in the Kingdom of Norway
Bruchion-Center for Gnosis and Art
c/o Capella Santa Sophia
Jan Valentin Saether
Brugt. 3
0157 Oslo
Norway
<http://terje.bergersen.net/gsn/>

Sources:

- Couliano, Ioan P. The Tree of Gnosis: Gnostic Mythology from Early Christianity to Modern Nihilism. New York: HarperCollins, 1992.
- Filoramo, Giovanni. A History of Gnosticism. Oxford: Basil Blackwell, 1990.
- Logan, Alastair H. B. Gnostic Truth and Christian Heresy: A Study in the History of Gnosticism. Edinburgh: T & T Clark, 1996.
- Pearson, Birger A. Gnosticism, Judaism and Egyptian Christianity. Minneapolis, MN: Fortress Press, 1990.
- Robinson, James M. The Nag Hammadi Library in English. San Francisco: HarperSanFrancisco, 1990.
- Rudolph, Kurt. Gnosis: The Nature and History of Gnosticism. New York: HarperCollins, 1987.
- Williams, Michael Allen. Rethinking "Gnosticism": An Argument for Dismantling a Dubious Category. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1996.

Goddess Spirituality

Goddess spirituality has been an important trend in Western religion since the nineteenth century. While mainstream churches have struggled to adapt themselves to the demands of women for entry into the priesthood and inclusive language in liturgy, other spiritual traditions have evolved to meet these needs. Several cultural trends can be discerned in the growth of Goddess spirituality, including women's emancipation from the nineteenth century onward and growing interest in pre-Christian religious traditions with both female and male deities. Another important influence, particularly in Europe, was the cultural exchange between East and West and the exposure of Western colonialists to Eastern religious traditions of Goddess worship.

In the early twentieth century, British colonial magistrate and tantric scholar Sir John Woodroffe (1865–1936), writing as Arthur Avalon, advocated a return to a religion where Goddess and God were equal. All things were possible, wrote Sir John, when the supreme personifications of the Divine were God and Goddess who "give and receive mutually, the feminine side being of equal importance with the masculine" (731–732). In the mid-twentieth century, writer Dion Fortune, founder of the Fraternity of Inner Light, wove Goddess spirituality into literature for public consumption in novels that described a religion of Goddess and Horned God, drawing on European mythologies with kabbalistic overtones. In the late 1940s, a retired British colonial administrator, Gerald Brosseau Gardner (1884–1964), had his own personal vision of the Goddess and created what was in effect a new religious synthesis by grafting ideas of Goddess worship, heavily steeped in the Greek and Roman classics of his boyhood education, onto the remnants of the British witchcraft tradition.

GARDNERIAN WICCA, as the synthesis came to be known, incorporated a gender essentialism and a focus on heterosexuality that was unattractive in the latter half of the twentieth century to many women attracted to Goddess worship as a manifestation of their feminism. New interpretations of Goddess-based witchcraft arose, particularly in the United States through the work of Starhawk. Wicca already venerated the natural world as a theophany. Starhawk made more explicit the radical activism of many Goddess worshippers. From the 1980s onwards, Goddess spirituality, nature religion, and environmental activism have gone hand in hand.

The goddess Aphrodite (Helene Rogers/TRIP)

For Pagan women, organizations such as the FELLOW-SHIP OF ISIS and the Reformed Congregation of the Goddess offer routes to ordination and the possibility of fulfilling the role of priestess, to which many spiritual women feel drawn but which is denied them or given only on suffering in monotheistic traditions. There are parallel upsurges of interest in the divine feminine in Jewish and Christian traditions. Some Jewish women have found in the kabbala and the matriarchs of the Bible images that can update Judaism to meet contemporary women's needs, and some Christian women have sought to update liturgy so that God is Mother and She as well as Father and He.

Vivienne Crowley

Sources:

- Avalon, Arthur (John Woodroffe). Shakti and Shakta. 1918. Reprint, New York: Dover, 1978.
- Eller, Cynthia. Living in the Lap of the Goddess: The Feminist Spirituality Movement in America. Boston: Beacon Press, 1995.
- Raphael, Melissa. Thealogy: Discourse on the Goddess. Sheffield, UK: Sheffield Academic Press, 1999.
- Starhawk (Miriam Simos). The Spiral Dance: A Rebirth of the Ancient Religion of the Great Goddess. San Francisco: Harper and Row, 1989.

The Grail Movement

The Grail movement was founded by Oskar Ernst Bernhardt (1875–1941), a German esoteric author known under the pen name of Abd-ru-shin (Parsi; Son of Light). He was born in Bischofswerda (Germany) in 1875, and from 1900 on traveled extensively in the Middle and Far East, the United States, and Europe; he also published several novels, short stories, and theatrical pieces. The outbreak of World War I found him, a German citizen, in an enemy country, the United Kingdom, and he was interned on the Isle of Man. In 1923, he circulated the first parts of The Grail Message, the publication of which continued through to 1937.

The Grail Message, a complicated esoteric work, found interested readers, particularly in Germany, France, the former Czechoslovakia, and Austria. Bernhardt decided, in fact, to settle in Austria, at the Vomperberg (Tyrol), together with a handful of followers of what later became known as the Grail movement. In 1938, Austria was occupied by Nazi Germany: The Grail Message was banned, the Vomperberg center closed, and Abd-ru-shin arrested. Released from jail in September 1938, he was banished firstly to Schlauroth (near Görlitz, Saxony) and then to Kipsdorf, where he died in 1941. His wife, Maria Freyer (1887–1957) continued his spiritual mission within the framework of the Grail movement, which was directed for several years after her death by other members of the Bernhardt family, although it was also plagued by a number of schisms.

The Grail Message includes 168 talks explaining the structure of the whole universe and of the laws that govern it. The border between the divine and human realms is the Grail Castle, where the holy cup of the Grail represents God's direct irradiation. Creation is the spread of God's rays, with their consequent and gradual cooling beyond this border. This is how different planes of the universe were generated, a scheme very reminiscent of that found in the thought of Helena P. Blavatsky (1831–1891), one of the founders of the THEOSOPHICAL SOCIETY (ADYAR). First came the original spiritual level, then the spiritual level and additional levels successively down to matter, all originating, it is believed, from the cooling and solidification of the divine rays. Crucial for this descent of the rays are two characters, known as Parsifal and the pristine Queen, or Mother. A force flows down from the Holy Grail and sustains the whole of creation. Planet Earth is part of the creation's denser and lower level. Human beings, however, keep within themselves a spiritual spark capable of reminding them of their divine origin. By cultivating this spark through successive reincarnations, humans can transcend the lower planes of matter, achieve a higher spiritual consciousness, and ultimately return to their heavenly home.

At the Vomperberg and in other places, the Grail movement celebrates three spiritual feasts each year: the Feast of the Holy Ghost (Pentecost) on May 30, the Feast of the White Lily on September 7, and the Feast of the Radiant Star on December 29. The total membership of the main branch of the Grail movement (splinter groups not included) is currently 16,000. The international readership of

The Grail Message is certainly much larger. The headquarters are located at the Vomperberg, although the international correspondence address is the movement's publishing house.

Address:

Grail Movement
Verlag der Stiftung Gralsbotschaft
Schukertstrasse 8
70192 Ditzingen
Germany
<http://www.graal.org>

Massimo Introvigne and PierLuigi Zoccatelli

Sources:

- Abd-ru-shin (Oskar Ernst Bernhardt). In the Light of Truth. The Grail Message. 3 vols. Vomperberg, Austria: Alexander Bernhardt, 1985.
- . The Ten Commandments of God. The Lord's Prayer. Vomperberg, Austria: Alexander Bernhardt, 1982.

Great White Brotherhood (Russia/Ukraine)

The Great White Brotherhood (GWB) is perhaps the most publicized and controversial new religious movement that appeared in the former Soviet Union in the early 1990s. In the 1980s, the founder of GWB, Yuri Krivogonov, who had a Ph.D. in engineering, became interested in ways of "releasing the energetic potential of humankind" and "directing" human behavior. In 1990, he set up the Atma Medical Centre (or Institute of Soul) in Kiev, the Ukrainian capital, which was intended for the study and propagation esoteric methods of healing. He soon met Marina Tsvigun, a young Ukrainian journalist who had had a "special experience" during an abortion operation. Following their marriage and "persecution" by Ukrainian legal authorities (i.e., a criminal investigation of financial irregularities), the institute rapidly evolved into a religious community, and its leaders evolved into the "divine duo" of Maria Devi Christos and Ioann Swami. They announced a 1,260-day period of spreading the message of the living God, Maria Devi Christos, which would culminate in her "sacrificial death," followed within three days by her resurrection in autumn 1993 in Kiev. In November 1993, almost all members of GWB arrived in Kiev but were detained by the Ukrainian police. The movement was then banned in the Ukraine and its leaders sentenced to imprisonment.

In prison, Maria Devi denounced her former husband as a "fallen Cain" and divorced him. She and her new husband, "Apostle Piotr," were released in 1997 under an amnesty. The divorce caused a split among the remaining members, several dozens of whom continued to operate underground in both Ukraine and Russia. Their attempts to register with authorities what they claim to be a cleaned-up movement have so far proved unsuccessful.

The name of the movement alludes to an interest in, and the claim to have been initiated into, ancient esoteric wisdom. This initiation seems mainly to have been based on Krivogonov's familiarity with the teachings of Theosophist Nicholas Roerich (1874–1947), founder of the Agni-Yoga Society, and Helena. P. Blavatsky (1831–1891), cofounder of the THEOSOPHICAL SOCIETY (ADYAR). Krivogonov's early teachings were also influenced by various "alternative techniques" and teachings that were available in the emerging Soviet phase of the New Age movement in the 1980s—bioenergetics, various forms of yoga and meditation, neuro-linguistic programming, and the like. Reference to Eastern religious teachings is evident in the names adopted by the leaders ("Swami" and "Devi"). At the same time, in the early days GWB emphasized the ability of the leaders to provide therapeutic remedies and to enhance the human potential of its followers. With the development of the religious community, however, millenarian features, embodied in the teaching of Yusmalos, became increasingly prominent.

Yusmalos (a contraction of the two first names of the leaders and logos), depicted the current state of the world in dualistic terms as governed by a satanic conspiracy on the one hand but, on the other hand, blessed with the presence of the living God, which gave prospects for salvation to "144,000 saints" (an apparent reference to the Book of Revelation). The early teachings of GWB had strong political overtones, with both anti-Western and anti-Communist elements. The satanic conspiracy was occasionally referred to as "American-Israeli" or "Jewish-Masonic," and only Slavs could be the elect few; God himself was said to be "a Russian." At the same time, the post-Communist reality was seen as a hangover of Communist injustices, which could only be overcome by the establishment of a strong theocracy based on the "true religion." The "sacrifice" of Maria Devi Christos was seen as the beginning of the new era of "divine theocracy." It remains unclear, however, whether her "death" was expected to be a physical or purely symbolic act.

After the failure of the end of the world to materialize and the split in the leadership, the millenarianism of GWB diminished considerably. Maria Devi Christos renounced its most controversial features and attributed their origins to the "evil" influence of her former husband. Since 1994, followers have tended to claim that the movement stemmed from the "respectable" traditions of Theosophy and Agni Yoga. Similar changes have occurred in the movement's practices, which have evolved from strong asceticism and hostility to the outside world to more moderate attitudes. However, the continuing semi-underground existence of GWB makes it difficult to know the extent to which these changes have affected different subgroups within the movement.

The early activities of GWB served as one of the triggers of the Russian and Ukrainian anticult movements. The anticultists exaggerated its controversial features to point to the general dangers from a spectrum of religious groups that emerged en masse in the former USSR in the early 1990s. Curiously, the anticult opposition to GWB appeared to agree with GWB's belief in the powers of neuro-linguistic programming and other psychological techniques utilized by the GWB leaders.

Marat S. Shterin

Sources:

- Borenstein, E. "Articles of Faith: The Media Response to Maria Devi Christos." Religion 25, 3 (1995): 249–266.
- Filatov, S. "Sects and New Religious Movements in Post-Soviet Russia." In Proselytism and Orthodoxy in Russia, edited by J. Witte Jr. and M. Bourdeaux. Maryknoll, NY: Orbis, 1999.
- Shterin, Marat. "New Religions in the New Russia." Nova Religio, 4, 2 (2001): 310–321.

Greece

The Greek peninsula and its associated islands have been inhabited for some 5,000 years. In the second millennium B.C.E. the Achaean people emerged as the ruling elite and founded the Mycenaen Empire, covering present-day Greece and Crete. The Dorians swept through the area and rose to dominance as the first millennium B.C.E. began. Over the next centuries a set of city-states arose in the area. In the eighth century the increase in population and lack of resources forced the Greeks to turn outward to the Mediterranean Sea. They became great traders, established colonies throughout the region, and made Greek the language of international commerce.

During the sixth century, Athens began its rise to prominence among the city-states, and during several centuries of prosperity great strides were made in the setting down of laws, scientific observations, literature, and philosophical thought, developments that have had implications for all

Status of religions in Greece, 2000–2050

Followers	2000			2025	2050
	total	%	rate
Christians	10,083,000	94.7	0.36	9,252,000	7,570,000
Orthodox	9,900,000	93.0	0.39	9,100,000	7,500,000
Independents	228,000	2.1	0.22	200,000	170,000
Roman Catholics	62,000	0.6	0.50	75,000	85,000
Muslims	354,000	3.3	1.29	400,000	420,000
Nonreligious	180,000	1.7	1.21	180,000	200,000
Atheists	19,500	0.2	2.65	22,000	32,500
Jews	5,000	0.1	-2.81	4,000	4,000
Spiritists	940	0.0	0.46	1,500	2,000
Baha'is	610	0.0	1.63	1,100	1,500
other religionists	1,900	0.0	0.46	2,500	3,000
Total population	10,645,000	100.0	0.41	9,863,000	8,233,000

humankind. The growing influence of Greece culminated in the rise of Philip of Macedonia, who subdued the peninsula. Philip's son, Alexander the Great (336–323 B.C.E.), built an empire that included North Africa, the Arabian Peninsula, Persia, and territory as far as India. The fracturing of Alexander's empire after his early death set the stage for the rise of Rome. Rome conquered Greece in 146 B.C.E.

Greece remained a part of the Roman Empire for many centuries. When in the fourth century C.E. the empire was divided, Greece was tied to the eastern part of the empire, known as the Byzantine Empire because its capital was Byzantium (later called Constantinople, and later still, Istanbul); as Christianity was established as the religion of the empire, Greece was brought under the hegemony of the Eastern Orthodox Church. Greece was under the direct authority of the patriarch in Constantinople.

Constantinople fell to the Turkish Muslims in 1456, and within a few years Greece also fell. The Turks remained in Greece as an occupation force for the next four centuries and in 1718 formally incorporated Greece into the Ottoman Empire. By the beginning of the nineteenth century, the Ottoman Empire was showing its weakness, and in the 1830s the Greeks were able to force the creation of an independent Greek state, minus the area in the northeast around Thessalonica. The country was ruled by a king through the rest of the century, but in 1911 a parliament was created. The country was overrun by the Nazis during World War II. Political instability has marked the postwar decades, the country reaching its lowest point during the harsh repressive military dictatorship that began in 1967. The dictatorship ended in 1974. Since 1975, the country has operated under its new democratic constitution.

The introduction of Christianity to Greece is described in the New Testament as resulting from a dream experienced by the apostle Paul during which he heard a call to come to Macedonia. He subsequently traveled through the land, stopping at Thessalonica, Berea, Philippi, Corinth, and Athens. He later wrote letters to believers in Thessalonica, Philippi, and Corinth that became part of the Christian scriptures.

The rise of Christianity to a position of power in the Roman Empire led to its pushing aside the pagan faith that had previously dominated in Greece and the other religions that had come to Greece along the trade routes established across the Mediterranean and through Alexander's kingdom. Christianity completely replaced what had come before though it was deeply influenced by the philosophy that had grown out of the encounter with Greek religion and the East, especially by the thoughts of Plato and the Neoplatonists. Judaism alone survived. Over the next centuries the theology and liturgy of the Eastern Orthodox Church developed, and the Orthodox Church distinguished itself on various points from the ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH of the Latin-speaking part of the empire. Authority in the Eastern Orthodox Greek-speaking church came to be shared by the patriarchs in Constantinople, Antioch, Jerusalem, and Alexandria.

The takeover of Greece by Turkey did not greatly change the church's position in Greek society, though the church became one symbol of the Greek people's survival during the long years of Turkish rule. However, after the coming of independence in 1830, a break with the ECUMENICAL PATRIARCHATE followed. In 1833, the government issued the first formal statement declaring an independent national church free from the authority of the patriarch, who still resided in Turkish territory. It was not until 1850 that the independency of the church was recognized. Not included in the jurisdiction of the ORTHODOX CHURCH OF GREECE are some of the Greek islands, still in the jurisdiction of the Ecumenical Patriarchate and, most importantly, the independent Monastic Republic of Mount Athos.

An Orthodox monk at a monastery in Samos, Greece (Helene Rogers/TRIP)

In 1924, the Church of Greece made what many considered a crucial change in adopting the Gregorian calendar, which replaced the traditional Julian calendar. This move was seen by many as a step away from the received tradition of the church and led to major schism by bishops, priests, and parishes who continued to adhere to the Julian calendar. Over the years, the TRUE (OLD CALENDAR) ORTHODOX CHURCH OF GREECE has further divided over the issue of cooperation with the Church of Greece, which has participated in the larger ecumenical movement, even to the point of joining the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES.

The Church of Greece remains the faith of the overwhelming majority of Greek citizens, but almost immediately after it came into being as an autonomous body, it had to make room for other Christian churches. Some posed little problem, such as churches like the CHURCH OF ENGLAND, the ARMENIAN APOSTOLIC CHURCH, or the ANCIENT CHURCH OF THE EAST, which served small expatriate communities and offered no program for proselytization. However, in 1858, a Protestant movement, later known as the GREEK EVANGELICAL CHURCH, was the first of a number of Protestant bodies and FREE CHURCHES that attempted to develop missions in Greece. At various times these churches have faced severe repression and in recent decades were the object of concern of the Greek police, who considered them subversive of national policy.

The most successful of non-Orthodox bodies have been the JEHOVAH'S WITNESSES, who began activity in Greece in 1900. They have also been the group that has received the most attention from both the Orthodox Church and the state in its attempt to protect the position of the church in Greek life. During the 1990s, the arrest of Jehovah's Witnesses led to the Greek government receiving two significant judgments from the World Court for violations of religious freedom documents to which it had agreed. These rulings have eased the situation in Greece somewhat.

During the 1960s, although not open to the new religions that were otherwise proselytizing throughout Europe, Greece became a setting for the development of the Western Esoteric tradition in the phase that came to be known as the NEW AGE MOVEMENT. Many New Age devotees described their work as nonreligious, though it was spiritual.

Sources:

- Burch, S. L. "The Beginning of the Protestant Mission to the Greek Orthodox in Asia Minor and Pontos." M.A. thesis, Fuller Theological Seminary, 1977.
- Dietrich, B. C. Tradition in Greek Religion. Berlin: de Gruyter, 1986.
- Frazer, C. A. "The Orthodox Church of Greece: The Last Fifteen Years." Indiana Social Studies Quarterly 32, 1 (1979): 89–110.
- Hart, L. K. Time, Religion and Social Experience in Rural Greece. Lanham, MD: Rowman and Littlefield, 1992.

Greek Catholic Church

In 1829, the sultan of the Ottoman Empire rescinded the law requiring Roman Catholics following an other-than-Latin liturgical order to be subject to the Orthodox Church. That law had meant that the small number of Greek Catholics in Greece and Turkey worshipped in churches under the jurisdiction of the ECUMENICAL PATRIARCHATE. The small community of Greek Catholics now allowed to have their own congregations began to grow in the 1850s after missionary work was launched among the Greek Orthodox by a Roman Catholic priest. A modest number of parishes emerged through the remainder of the nineteenth century. In 1895, the Assumptionist Fathers settled in Constantinople, where they oversaw a Greek seminary and two parishes. In 1911, Pope Pius X organized the Greek Catholic parishes in Turkey into an exarchate and appointed Isaias Papadopoulos as the first bishop.

In the 1920s, almost all of the Greek Catholics moved to Athens, the result of an agreement between the two countries for a general relocation of expatriates to their homeland. The emergence of a body of believers in Greece affiliated with the ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH has caused considerable tension over the years in a land in which the Greek Orthodox Church is considered the national religious body. The Greek Orthodox Church has actively opposed both Protestant and Catholic presence in the country but is especially opposed to the Greek Catholic Church, which it sees as easily confused with an Orthodox church. Catholics must conform to a set of special laws designed as obstacles to any movement of Orthodox believers into the Greek Catholic Church.

The several parishes of the Greek Catholic Church have a total membership of less than 2,500. There is still one parish in Istanbul.

Address:

Greek Catholic Church
Odos Homirou 9
106 72 Athens
Greece

Sources:

Liesel, N. The Eastern Catholic Liturgies: A Study in Words and Pictures. Westminster, MD: Newman Press, 1960.
Roberson, Ronald G. The Eastern Christian Churches—A Brief Survey. 5th ed. Rome: Edizioni Orientalia Christiana, Pontificio Istituto Orientale, 1995.

Greek Evangelical Church

The roots of the Greek Evangelical Church can be traced to the work of Jonas King (1792–1869), a Congregationalist minister sent to Greece by the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions following the Greek War for Independence that ended in 1928. He settled in Greece, met and married a Greek woman, started a school, engaged in welfare work, and preached as opportunity allowed. In 1848, the authorities arrested and deported King. Through the influence of the American government, he was eventually allowed to return.

It was not until 1866, just three years before King's death, that the first community of a future church was organized. King was by this time being aided by a young man, Michael Kalopothakis, who had been present at King's trial in 1848 and as a result had converted to Protestantism. He went to New York, studied at Union Theological Seminary, and then returned to his native land. He led in the erection of the first church building in 1871. By 1885, three congregations existed, and a synod was organized. In the meantime, evangelistic work had been conducted in the Greek community in Turkey by the British Mediterranean Mission. This effort was to have a significant effect upon the work in Greece. As a result of the Greek-Turkish War of 1922, many Greek people left Turkey and returned to Greece. As a result of the sudden jump in membership that followed, the synod was reorganized as the Greek Evangelical Church.

The church is conservative in its theology and places great emphasis on the authority of the Bible. It has developed a strong Sunday school and youth program. The church is headed by a general assembly that meets semi-annually.

In the years since World War II, the church appears to have attained a stable position in Greek society, though many still consider it a foreign element in Greek culture. It continues to evangelize and has developed a broad social service program. In the 1990s, it opened a mission in Albania.

In the 1990s, the church reported approximately five thousand members. Affiliated churches can now be found in Cyprus, Germany, and the United States, where many members have immigrated. It is a member of both the WORLD ALLIANCE OF REFORMED CHURCHES and the REFORMED ECUMENICAL COUNCIL, as well as the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES.

Address:

Greek Evangelical Church
24 Marku Botsari St.
117 41 Athens
Greece

Source:

Bauswein, Jean-Jacques, and Lukas Vischer, eds. The Reformed Family Worldwide: A Survey of Reformed Churches, Theological Schools, and International Organizations. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans, 1999.

Greek Orthodox Patriarchate of Alexandria and All Africa

The city of Alexandria was founded by Alexander the Great in 332 B.C.E. and quickly became one of the great cultural and political centers of the ancient world. According to tradition, St. Mark the Evangelist brought Christianity to the city in the first century, and the new religion began to spread in the sizable Jewish community that had long flourished there. By the end of the second century Christianity had been embraced by the majority of the city's Greeks and was growing in the local Egyptian population, and a renowned catechetical school had been established. The community was persecuted by the Roman emperors in the third century but came into its own after Constantine's Edict of Milan granted religious freedom to Christians in 313.

The Church of Alexandria was soon torn by theological controversies and efforts to suppress various heresies that sprang up. The Byzantine emperors enforced the Christological teaching of the Council of Chalcedon (451), which had the support of local Greeks but was rejected by the great majority of the Egyptian Christian population. When the Arab armies took Alexandria in 642, the Egyptian Christians were free to organize themselves into what eventually became today's COPTIC ORTHODOX CHURCH. The Arabs singled out the Greek minority for special persecution because of its links to the former Byzantine rulers. The Turkish conquest of Egypt in 1517 brought an end to the persecutions but gave rise to a greater dependency on the ECUMENICAL PATRIARCHATE. Some of the Greek patriarchs began to live in Constantinople, and at times the ecumenical patriarch appointed them to office. The Alexandrian Patriarchate sank deep into poverty and often had to turn to the RUSSIAN ORTHODOX CHURCH (MOSCOW PATRIARCHATE) for support. The church experienced a renaissance in the nineteenth century when the Egyptian rulers began to encourage Greeks to settle in Egypt. After 1846, the patriarchs resided permanently in Egypt once again, and the involvement of the Ecumenical Patriarchate in the administration of the Alexandrian Church ended in 1858.

Patriarch Meletios II (1926–1935) promulgated a new set of regulations for the patriarchate and modified his title to include “of All Africa” in the place of the former “of All Egypt.” His successor Christophoros recognized a spontaneous movement of indigenous Africans toward Orthodoxy that began in Uganda and spread to Kenya and Tanzania. By 1998, there were over a hundred African Orthodox priests in East Africa, presided over by the world's first black African Orthodox bishop. The growing membership among Africans compensated for the shrinking of the Greek community in Egypt.

The patriarchate is governed by regulations that provide for a synodal system of administration and a process of patriarchal election that involves both clergy and laity. The Holy Synod, made up of at least seven metropolitans (currently twelve), must meet at least once a year but ordinarily gathers semiannually. The Alexandrian Patriarchate ranks second among the Orthodox churches, immediately after Constantinople. Through the efforts of Archbishop Makarios III of Cyprus, an Orthodox patriarchal school was opened in Nairobi in 1981. The membership of the patriarchate today includes approximately 100,000 black Africans and 150,000 others, mostly ethnic Greeks scattered across the continent. It is an active member of the Middle East Council of Churches and the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES.

Address:

Greek Orthodox Patriarchate of Alexandria and All Africa
P.O. Box 2006
Alexandria
Egypt
<http://www.greece.org/gopatalex/index.html>

Ronald Roberson

Sources:

Meinardus, O. F. A. Christian Egypt: Ancient and Modern. Cairo: American University/Cairo Press, 1970.
Orthodoxia. Regensburg, Germany: Ostkirchliches Institut, annual.
Roberson, Ronald G. The Eastern Christian Churches—A Brief Survey. 5th ed. Rome: Edizioni Orientalia Christiana, Pontificio Istituto Orientale, 1995.

Greek Orthodox Patriarchate of Antioch and All the East

Founded in 300 B.C.E., the city of Antioch quickly became one of the most important urban centers of the eastern Mediterranean. The new religion arrived very early in the city; according to the Book of Acts (11:26), it was there that the followers of Jesus were first called Christians. The single-bishop model of church government appears to have originated in Antioch, and most scholars agree that the Gospel of Matthew was composed there. The growing community was periodically persecuted in the third century, but flourished after Emperor Constantine's Edict of Milan (313) granted freedom of worship to Christians. The School of Antioch was renowned as a center of biblical studies advocating a literal interpretation of scripture and an emphasis on both the humanity and divinity of Christ.

The Council of Chalcedon (451) established Antioch as a patriarchate but reduced its size by ceding much of its territory to Constantinople and the new Patriarchate of Jerusalem. Chalcedon also triggered a schism within the Church of Antioch, the larger portion rejecting the Christological teaching of the council and eventually forming what is today the SYRIAC ORTHODOX PATRIARCHATE OF ANTI- OCH AND ALL THE EAST. After Antioch fell to the Arabs in 638, the Greeks who allied with Byzantium and who had accepted Chalcedon experienced many years of persecution. The Greek Patriarchate prospered again from 969, when the Byzantine Empire regained the city, until 1085, when it fell to the Seljuk Turks. During this period of Byzantine rule the older West Syrian liturgy of Antioch was replaced by the Byzantine liturgy. In 1098, the Latin Crusaders took Antioch and established a kingdom that lasted nearly two centuries. A line of Latin patriarchs was set up, while a Greek succession continued in exile.

The Greek Patriarchate returned to Antioch after the city was taken by the Egyptian Mamelukes in 1268. By now Antioch had been reduced to a small town, and the patriarchate moved permanently to Damascus in the fourteenth century. The area fell to the Ottoman Turks in 1516 and remained under their control until World War I. The Christians of the area had been reduced to a minority, and the church was further weakened by the activity of Western missionaries. A domestic quarrel among the Orthodox resulted in the election of two patriarchs in 1724, one Catholic and one Orthodox, and the church split into separate Greek Orthodox and Melkite Greek Catholic communities. Even though in recent centuries the faithful have been composed almost entirely of Arabs, the line of ethnic Greek patriarchs continued until 1898, when the last Greek patriarch was deposed. An ethnic Arab patriarch was elected the next year, and all subsequent patriarchs have been Arabs.

Today the patriarchate's Holy Synod is composed of the patriarch and all the active metropolitans. Meeting at least annually, it has the purpose of electing the patriarch and other bishops, preserving the faith, and taking measures against violations of ecclesiastical order. There is also a General Community Council made up of the Holy Synod and lay representatives. Meeting twice a year, this body is responsible for financial, educational, juridical, and administrative matters. When a new patriarch needs to be chosen, the council selects three candidates, one of which is then elected by the Holy Synod. Patriarch Ignatius IV (elected 1979) has been very active in the ecumenical movement and has encouraged dialogue with the Syrian Orthodox Church and the MELKITE CATHOLIC CHURCH in an effort to reunite the three main segments of the ancient Antiochian Patriarchate. In 1970, the patriarchate established St. John of Damascus Academy of Theology, located near Tripoli, Lebanon, which in 1988 was incorporated into Balamand University.

There has been extensive immigration from the homeland of this church in Syria and Lebanon to various parts of the world in recent decades, especially to North and South America. The Antiochian Orthodox Christian Archdiocese of North America also includes a number of Western-rite parishes, for the most part composed of former Episcopalians. The archdiocese maintains a Web site at <http://www.antiochian.org>. The total membership of the patriarchate today is about 750,000.

Address:

Greek Orthodox Patriarchate of Antioch and All the East
P.O. Box 9
Damascus
Syria

Ronald Roberson

Sources:

- Downey, G. Ancient Antioch. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1963.
- Dick, Ignace. Les Melkites: Grecs-Orthodoxes et Grecs-Catholiques des Patriarcats d'Antioche, d'Alexandrie et de Jérusalem. Turnhout, Belgium: Editions Brepols, 1994.

Greek Orthodox Patriarchate of Jerusalem

The earliest Christian community in Jerusalem was decimated by the Roman destructions of the city in 70 and 135

C.E. By the time the church in Palestine was organized in the late second century, the bishop of Jerusalem was subordinate to the metropolitan of Caesarea Maritima within the Patriarchate of Antioch. After peace was granted to Christians by Constantine in 313, Jerusalem became a great center of Christian life and pilgrimage, in part because of the Basilica of the Holy Sepulchre and other churches built by Constantine and his mother, Helen. Given its newfound importance, the Council of Chalcedon in 451 made Jerusalem a patriarchate ranking immediately after Antioch in status.

Christian Jerusalem suffered a terrible disaster in 614 when it was sacked by invading Persians, who destroyed most of its churches and monasteries. In 637, the city surrendered to the Arab armies that had besieged it for four months, and subsequently under Arab rule much of the population gradually converted to Islam.

In 1099, Jerusalem fell to the Crusaders, who established a Latin kingdom that endured for almost a century. Rome created a Latin Patriarchate of Jerusalem, but a line of Greek patriarchs continued in exile, usually residing in Constantinople. They began to live in or near Jerusalem again following the destruction of the Crusader Kingdom by the Seljuk Turks in 1187. In 1247, the city was taken by the Egyptian Mamelukes, and in 1516 it fell to the Ottoman Turks, who ruled the city for four hundred years.

Under Ottoman rule various Christian groups frequently struggled for control of the holy places in Jerusalem. In the mid-nineteenth century the Turks confirmed Greek control over most of them. This arrangement remained in place under the British mandate beginning in 1917 and under subsequent Jordanian and Israeli administrations.

Even though most of the patriarchate's faithful, including most of the married parish priests, have long been ethnic Arabs, since 1543 all the patriarchs of Jerusalem and most of the bishops have been ethnic Greeks drawn from the Brotherhood of the Holy Sepulchre, a monastic community headquartered in the monastery of the St. Constantine and St. Helena in Jerusalem. This has been a source of tension, which broke into the open several times in the nineteenth century and which continues today. The Holy Synod has vigorously resisted efforts to promote ethnic Arabs to the episcopate and eventually the patriarchate and has continued to affirm its Greek character.

In 1989, the patriarchate withdrew from all the bilateral theological dialogues in which the Orthodox Church was engaged, stating that other Christians were using the dialogues as a means of proselytism.

Under its current charter, the patriarchate has both a synod and a mixed council. The patriarch presides over the Holy Synod, which can have no more than eighteen members and is composed of metropolitans and provincial bishops as well as titular bishops and archimandrites appointed by the patriarch. Questions are decided by majority vote; ties are broken by the patriarch. The mixed council, composed of laity and clergy and over which the patriarch also presides, provides for lay input into the decision-making process.

The patriarchate is a member of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES and the Middle East Council of Churches. At present it has jurisdiction over Jordan, Israel, and the areas under the control of the Palestinian Authority. Total membership is estimated at 200,000, with no more than 3,500 remaining in Jerusalem itself.

Address:

Greek Orthodox Patriarchate of Jerusalem
P.O. Box 19632-633
Jerusalem
Israel

Ronald Roberson

Sources:

Pulcini, T. "Tensions between the Hierarchy and Laity of the Jerusalem Patriarchate: Historical Perspectives on the Present Situation." St. Vladimir's Theological Quarterly 36 (1992): 273-298.

Purvis, J. D. Jerusalem, The Holy City: A Bibliography. Metuchen: Scarecrow, 1988.

"Règlement du patriarcat grec orthodoxe de Jérusalem." Proche Orient Chrétien 8 (1958): 227-242.

a colony and established a new Danish settlement in 1894. It was made an integral part of Denmark in 1953, and Greenlanders elect two members to the Danish Parliament (the Folketing).

Danish Lutherans established work in Greenland in 1721, and Lutheranism retains the allegiance of the majority of the population. The dean of the church, who lives in the capital, works under the bishop of the EVANGELICAL LUTHERAN CHURCH IN DENMARK who resides in Copenhagen. The majority of the Inuit have been baptized, but there is evidence of some continued allegiance to their pre-Christian faith in the far north. The traditional religion was built around the veneration of a female deity, called variously Nerrivik or Sedna, the Old Woman of the Sea.

During the twentieth century, a spectrum of churches, from the ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH to the SEVENTH-DAY ADVENTIST CHURCH and the JEHOVAH'S WITNESSES, developed congregations, but all have had relatively little success. Pentecostals from several Scandinavian countries ar-

Status of religions in Greenland, 2000-2050

Followers	2000			2025	2050
	total	%	rate
Christians	54,100	96.4	0.08	56,700	59,300
Protestants	38,900	69.2	0.02	40,000	41,000
Marginal Christians	240	0.4	2.92	600	1,000
Independents	120	0.2	2.92	220	250
Nonreligious	1,200	2.2	1.52	2,000	3,000
Ethnoreligionists	440	0.8	-0.35	300	200
Baha'is	360	0.6	1.70	600	900
Total population	56,200	100.0	0.11	59,600	63,400

Greenland

Greenland is a large island, most of which is covered in ice the year round and is thus sparsely populated. It was originally settled by Inuit people (Eskimos), and they remain the dominant element of the population. The majority of people live along the southwest coast, where the capital Nuuk (or Godthåb) is located. Greenland played an important role in history as a staging area for the Viking exploration of America. Erik the Red established a colony in the tenth century that lasted until the fourteenth century. The land was rediscovered in the sixteenth century. In 1815, Denmark claimed it as rived in the years after World War II, and the CHRISTIAN BRETHREN, who had had great success in the Faeroe Islands, initiated work in 1970.

Sources:

Larsen, W. Kirken under polarstjernen: Fra den grønlandske kirke. Copenhagen: Lohse, 1972.
 Minion, R. Religions of the Circumpolar North. BINS Bibliographical Series. Edmonton, Canada: University of Alberta/Boreal Institute for Northern Studies, 1985.

Guadeloupe

Guadeloupe, an overseas department of France, includes several islands in the north-east edge of the Caribbean Sea, the main three islands being Basse-Terre, Grande-Terre, and Marie-Galante. The islands were originally inhabited by the Arawaks, who were in turn overrun by the Caribs. The Spanish attempted to invade the islands in 1493 but were driven off by the Caribs. Finally, the Caribs were defeated by the French in the 1630s, and the latter began to develop the sugar industry. They imported a number of Africans to work the plantations. By the early eighteenth century, the Africans had completely replaced the Caribs.

In 1815, France renounced the slave trade and restructured its Caribbean possessions as colonies. Slavery was abolished, and to build the labor force indentured servants from India were brought to the island. Following World War II, Guadeloupe was designated an overseas department, a status granting it much local autonomy. At the beginning of the twenty-first century, the island has a population of approximately 456,000.

In 1523, the first missionaries of the ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH on the islands were killed by the Caribs, but later missionaries from the various orders (JESUITS, Capuchins, Dominicans) had more success following the establishment of French authority. In 1816, a prefecture for Guadeloupe and Martinique was established, and in 1850 Guadeloupe was named a suffragan diocese and attached to the Diocese of Bordeaux, in France. The first priest of African descent was ordained in 1925, the first bishop in 1970. Today, Guadeloupean priests and nuns serve throughout the French-speaking world. The church counts more than 90 percent of the population as Catholic.

Status of religions in Guadeloupe, 2000-2050

Followers	2000			2025	2050
	total	%	rate
Christians	434,000	95.3	1.52	535,000	556,000
Roman Catholics	433,000	95.0	1.50	530,000	540,000
Protestants	22,500	4.9	2.26	38,000	55,000
Marginal Christians	19,700	4.3	1.79	40,000	70,000
Nonreligious	9,200	2.0	3.27	16,000	22,000
Atheists	5,000	1.1	1.80	7,000	8,800
Hindus	2,300	0.5	1.57	4,000	5,400
Muslims	1,700	0.4	-0.60	1,500	1,600
Baha'is	1,600	0.4	1.46	3,000	4,200
Spiritists	1,400	0.3	1.65	1,800	2,300
other religionists	210	0.1	2.76	340	500
Total population	456,000	100.0	1.55	569,000	601,000

Protestant missionary efforts began with the Moravians, who started work in the West Indies in the 1750s. They had only modest success, however. Missionaries from the REFORMED CHURCH OF FRANCE established substantial work, now existing as the Église Evangélique de la Guadeloupe. It has been eclipsed, however, by the SEVENTH-DAY ADVENTIST CHURCH, which entered the field in 1965 and is the largest Protestant body in the country. The Adventist churches are part of the French Antilles-Guiana Union Mission. Some success has also been registered by the JEHOVAH'S WITNESSES, who came to the islands in the mid-1930s.

A variety of Holiness and Pentecostal groups, most from the United States, have established small works in Guadeloupe since World War II, but most have only one or two congregations.

Indian immigrants from Tamil arrived as workers in the middle of the nineteenth century. They have developed a new religion that synthesizes elements of Catholicism and Hinduism. It is centered upon two female deities, Malieman, the Virgin Mary, and Mari-amma, the Tamil goddess of disease. Islam has been brought to the islands by immigrants from Syria, most of whom are Sunnis. There are also members of the ubiquitous ANCIENT AND MYSTICAL ORDER ROSAE CRUCIS.

Sources:

Brady, R. E. Guadeloupe: Mission Field in the West Indies. Brookhaven, MS: self-published, 1966.

La Croix, O. "The French Presence and the Church in Martinique and Guadeloupe." In New Mission for a New People: Voices from the Caribbean, edited by D. I. Mitchell. New York: Friendship Press, 1977.

Guam

Guam is the southernmost island of the Mariana Islands, and it shares much of the history of the Marianas and Micronesia in general. The island was settled in prehistoric times by the Chamorro people, Micronesians. They first encountered Europeans when Ferdinand Magellan arrived in the area in 1521. The Spanish ruled the island and at various times in the last half of the seventeenth century attempted to exterminate the native population. By the middle of the eighteenth century, less than 5,000 Chamorros were left alive. The present population (more than 100,000) are a product of intermarriage with the Spanish and with a number of Filipinos who migrated there along the Spanish trading route.

Guam came into U.S. hands in 1898 as a result of Spain's defeat in the Spanish-American War. After being reclaimed from Japanese control in 1944, it became a major U.S. military center. Guam was part of the trust assigned to the United States by the United Nations, which also began to urge the island's independence. Guam did not participate with the rest of the Marianas in the formation of the Federated States of Micronesia.

Guam remains an American territory. It has a semiautonomous government that operates under the U.S. Department of the Interior. Residents are U.S. citizens, and the local political system is similar to the U.S. state govern-

Status of religions in Guam, 2000-2050

Followers	2000			2025	2050
	total	%	rate
Christians	158,000	94.1	2.15	213,000	244,000
Roman Catholics	139,000	83.2	2.10	185,000	210,000
Protestants	17,500	10.4	1.22	24,000	29,000
Marginal Christians	4,300	2.6	3.33	9,000	12,000
Nonreligious	2,800	1.7	5.94	4,000	5,400
Buddhists	2,200	1.3	5.59	3,600	6,000
Baha'is	1,900	1.1	3.66	3,400	5,500
Chinese folk-religionists	1,300	0.8	2.21	1,700	2,100
Neoreligionists	840	0.5	5.31	1,200	1,500
Ethnoreligionists	590	0.4	-0.24	550	500
Confucianists	240	0.1	1.63	300	500
Total population	168,000	100.0	2.27	228,000	266,000

ments. The island is not represented in the U.S. Congress. A third of the island is still controlled by the military.

During the Spanish era, the ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH became the dominant religion of the people, and with the intermarriage of the Chamorros with the Spanish and Filipinos, a unique form of Spanish Catholicism became institutionalized on the island. More than 90 percent of the population identify themselves as Roman Catholics.

The large number (more than 20,000) of U.S. military personnel on the island reflects the general spectrum of American religion. Military chaplains hold services for Catholics and members of Protestant and FREE CHURCHES. JEHOVAH'S WITNESSES are active on Guam, and there is one congregation of the CHURCH OF CHRIST, SCIENTIST. Members of the CHURCH OF JESUS CHRIST OF LATTER-DAY SAINTS were among the servicemen and servicewomen stationed there during World War II, and following the war the church organized congregations that reached out to local residents.

The work on Guam is now designated the Micronesia Guam Mission.

Sources:

Mitchell, R. E. "Patron Saints and Pagan Ghosts: The Pairing of Opposites." Asian Folklore Studies 45, 1 (1986): 101–123.

Sullivan, J. The Phoenix Rises: A Mission History of Guam. New York: Seraphic Mass Association, 1957.

Guatemala

The Republic of Guatemala is the largest and most populous country in Central America. The nation is divided geographically by the central highlands that stretch east and west. Known as the "Land of Trees" and the "Land of Eternal Spring," Guatemala has been steadily losing much of its animal and plant life, particularly since the 1950s, due to the process of economic modernization. Environmental deterioration is now threatening human society and the economy, but the flora and fauna have long suffered from human activities. From the early hunter-gatherer groups of Amerindians that arrived about 2500 B.C., to the sophisticated Mayan civilization of 400–900 C.E. in the Guatemalan highlands and lowlands (as well as in adjacent areas of Mexico, Belize, Honduras, and El Salvador), where more than a million inhabitants depended on large-scale agricultural production to sustain their dominance in the region, to the Spanish colonial period (1492–1832) and the modern period (1832 to date), the natural environment of Guatemala has suffered the cumulative effects of accelerated human occupation.

The classic Mayan civilization, which was dominated by large city-states in the Valley of Guatemala (where Guatemala City is now located), Tikal in the lowlands of the Petén, Copán in northwestern Honduras, and Palanque in the Chiapas foothills, rapidly declined after 900 C.E. due to environmental changes (mainly drought), overpopulation, internal social and political disintegration, and competition with rival Amerindian empires (Toltec and Mixtec). The center of Mayan civilization shifted from the previous city-states to new ceremonial centers in the central and northern Yucatán Peninsula in present-day Mexico, such as Chichén Itzá and Mayapán, during the period 600–1500 C.E.

By the time the Spanish conquistadors, colonists, and Roman Catholic priests arrived in the early 1500s, the Status of religions in Guatemala, 2000-2050

Followers	2000		2025	2050
	total	% rate
Christians	11,124,000	97.7 2.63	19,204,000	26,069,000
Roman Catholics	9,600,000	84.3 2.71	16,400,000	21,500,000
Protestants	1,450,000	12.7 3.18	3,000,000	4,700,000
Independents	1,030,000	9.1 3.50	2,100,000	3,100,000
Nonreligious	149,000	1.3 6.71	400,000	750,000
Atheists	55,900	0.5 3.40	110,000	175,000
Spiritists	23,800	0.2 1.77	40,000	64,000
Baha'is	20,100	0.2 2.29	45,000	80,000
Chinese folk-religionists	3,700	0.0 1.74	5,800	9,000
Ethnoreligionists	2,900	0.0 -0.79	2,000	1,500
Buddhists	2,000	0.0 2.16	3,600	6,200
Jews	1,000	0.0 0.65	900	900
Muslims	910	0.0 1.31	1,200	1,600
other religionists	2,000	0.0 2.19	4,000	8,000
Total population	11,385,000	100.0 2.67	19,816,000	27,165,000

Mayan civilization in Guatemala was in disarray and engaged in bitter rivalry with other major Amerindian groups, which facilitated Spanish domination. By 1650, disease, war, and exploitation had greatly reduced the size of the Amerindian population in Guatemala, from about one million in 1500 to only about two hundred thousand in 1650. The Spanish and Creole (American-born of pure Spanish blood) elite ruled over the growing mestizo population (of mixed Spanish and Indian heritage) and the dwindling Amerindian population, which declined from 80 percent of the total population in 1778 to 65 percent in 1893, to less than half the population in 1973, according to government authorities.

Today, Guatemalan society is divided into two main categories: Indian and Ladino (non-Indians of Spanish descent). However, the major factors used by the government for determining the size of the Indian population have been language and dress, rather than race, which tends to underestimate the strength of the Amerindian population. The Council of Mayan Organizations (COMG) claimed that about 65 percent of the Guatemalan population was Indian in 1990. However that may be, Ladinos control the nation's political and economic life, as well as determining its social standards: "To be accepted outside one's own Indian community one has to look, act, and talk like a ladino," according to Tom Barry in Inside Guatemala. Ethnic discrimination permeates Guatemalan life, and Indians must shed their traditional dress and language and assume a Ladino cultural identity to achieve social acceptance and to succeed in the dominant society.

Good Friday celebrations in Antigua, Guatemala (C. Rennie/TRIP)

According to Wycliffe Bible Translators' Ethnologue (1992), the population of Guatemala was about 9,340,000 in 1990, with 55 percent being Amerindian, 44 percent Mestizo, and about 1 percent other races. Fifty-two dialects are spoken in Guatemala among twenty-three ethnolinguistic groups, with Spanish being the dominant language (44 percent), followed by the principal Mayan languages of Quiché, Mam, Cakchiquel, and Kekchí. Spanish is the major trade language because most of the Amerindian languages are linguistically distinct, which hampers communication outside one's own ethnic group. About 100,000 Black Caribs (Afro-Amerindian) speak GARÍFUNA in Central America, but only about 16,700 live in Guatemala, mainly on the Caribbean coast. Additional ethnic components of the Guatemalan population include English-speaking, Afro-American West Indians on the Caribbean coast, Middle Easterners (mainly Lebanese and Jews), Caucasians (mainly Germans and U.S. citizens), Chinese, and Koreans.

Politically, Guatemala achieved its independence from Spain in 1821–1823, after nearly three hundred years of Spanish colonial rule, when the Captaincy-General of Guatemala became the United Provinces of Central America. Then, in 1838, the Republic of Guatemala was created under rebel leader Rafael Carrera (1838–1865). In 1852, Carrera signed a concordat with the Vatican, repealed the anticlerical legislation established under the rule of Francisco Morazán (1829–1838), reinstated the Catholic religious orders, and allowed the Catholic clergy to operate the nation's few schools. However, after the death of Carrera in 1865, the liberal Justo Rufino Barrios came to power (1871–1885), and the ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH was again subjected to harsh legislation, the Jesuits were again expelled, the archbishop and bishops were exiled, tithes were eliminated, convents and monasteries were closed, church property was confiscated, priests were prohibited from wearing clerical garb and were barred from teaching, religious processions were proscribed, and civil marriage was declared obligatory. These anticlerical laws so crippled the Catholic Church in Guatemala that it has never recovered its former influence.

It was President Barrios, in 1873, who established freedom of speech and worship in Guatemala and who was responsible for the official introduction of Protestantism into the country by inviting the Presbyterian Church in the U.S.A. (now an integral part of the Presbyterian Church [U.S.A.]) to send missionaries to Guatemala in 1882, allegedly "to counteract the influence of the Catholic clergy" in its opposition to liberal reform. The Reverend John Clark Hill arrived in late 1882 to begin the work, although Hill did not speak Spanish upon his arrival and his first activities were among thirty to forty distinguished English-speaking foreigners who were already Protestants. Nevertheless, Hill and his successors succeeded in establishing churches and schools in a country that had expelled the first Protestant minister to arrive in Guatemala City in the 1840s.

By late 1885, Hill and his assistant Luis Canales had begun to preach and teach in Spanish and had initiated a process that led to the formal establishment of the Central Presbyterian Church in 1888. In addition to planting churches, the Presbyterians founded the American School in 1883, a hospital and nursing school in 1912, a bookstore in 1915, a girl's school in 1918, and an industrial training center in 1919. By 1935, there were twenty-two organized Presbyterian churches and 198 preaching points with 2,805 baptized members in Guatemala. The English worship services in Guatemala City, begun by Hill in 1882, were continued by a succession of pastors. Today, the nondenominational Union Church, located in Plazuela España, traces its founding to that date, making this church the oldest Protestant congregation in Guatemala.

Previously, other efforts had been made by Baptist missionaries and laymen in British Honduras to distribute the Scriptures among the inhabitants of a small British colony on the shores of Lake Isabel in eastern Guatemala, near the border of the two countries, between 1822 and 1835, under the auspices of the British Honduras Bible Society. It was during a similar journey by Frederick Crowe in 1841 from Belize City to Abbottsville, where he resided for two years as a missionary and school teacher, that the English Baptist colporteur began to make plans to travel to Guatemala City by way of Salamá, a journey that he accomplished in 1843 with a cargo of Bibles and other evangelical literature. Crowe, although supported in his educational and missionary efforts in Guatemala City by a few liberals, was opposed by the Catholic clergy and conservative politicians, who forced his expulsion from Guatemala in 1846. Although no permanent organizational structure was established, the English Baptists have the distinction of being the first known Protestants to work in the Republic of Guatemala.

The third Protestant missionary organization to work in Guatemala was the Central American Mission (now known as CAM International, with headquarters in Dallas, Texas), which sent Mr. and Mrs. Edward Bishop to Guatemala City in 1899. The first CAM church, located in the capital city, became the mother church to hundreds of CAM congregations throughout the country. In 1935, there were 63 organized churches and 185 preaching points. The Central American Evangelical Church Association (CAM-related), founded in 1927, became one of the largest Protestant denominations in Guatemala, and CAM has also had an important role in training pastors and lay leaders for the non-Pentecostal Evangelical movement through its Central American Bible Institute (founded in 1926) and more recently through the Central American Theological Seminary (known as SETECA), created in 1965.

By 1935, additional Protestant mission agencies were also working in Guatemala. The Church of the Nazarene traces its origins to work begun in 1901 in Cobán and Zacapa by missionaries affiliated with the Pentecostal Mission of Nashville, Tennessee, which later became part of the Church of the Nazarene. In 1902, the California Friends Mission (Quakers) began its ministry in the southeastern part of the country, near the border with Honduras and El Salvador, with headquarters in the Department (province) of Chiquimula. Representatives of the SEVENTH-DAY ADVENTIST CHURCH arrived in 1908 and began work in Guatemala City and Quezaltenango, the nation's second-largest city. The Christian Brethren, known in Guatemala as the Free (Plymouth) Brethren, were established in 1924 through the ministry of Carlos Kramer in Quezaltenango. Others were the National Evangelical Mission (1923), the National Association of Baptist Churches (1926), and the German Lutheran Church (1929).

In 1916, Thomas Pullin and Charles Furman of the United and Free Gospel Missionary Society (Turtle Creek, Pennsylvania) arrived in Guatemala to begin an itinerant evangelistic ministry in El Quiché, Totonicapán, and other western departments, but they returned to the United States in 1920 to strengthen their base of support. When Furman and his family returned to Guatemala in 1922, he was affiliated with another Holiness denomination, the Primitive Methodist Church (PMC). Later that year, the PMC absorbed the work begun by independent Holiness missionary Albert Hines in Totonicapán in 1912, which was then under the supervision of Rev. Amos Bradley. In 1926, the PMC acquired the property in Chichicastenango owned by independent medical missionary Dr. C. F. Secord, who had begun work there in 1900, and Secord continued his ministry under the auspices of the PMC.

In 1934, while on furlough in the United States, Furman joined the CHURCH OF GOD (CLEVELAND, TENNESSEE) and returned to Guatemala to become that denomination's first missionary in the country. He proceeded to visit PMC churches and encourage the leaders to join him in the ranks of the Church of God, which resulted in 14 PMC churches switching their affiliation to the Church of God. By 1980, this denomination had grown to 664 churches and 234 missions with 34,450 members.

The ASSEMBLIES OF GOD began work in the Department of Jutiapa in 1937 as an extension of its ministry in El Salvador. Following a healing campaign by T. L. Osborn in Guatemala City in 1953, the work began to grow more rapidly in the central highlands, and by 1980 churches had been established throughout the country. By 1980, there were 748 congregations with 35,909 members.

The Prince of Peace Evangelical Church Association was formed in 1956 by José María Muñoz in Guatemala City, among a group of believers that had left the Central Assembly of God. Many of the early members of this new denomination had been members of other Evangelical churches but were drawn to Muñoz's ministry because of his popular radio ministry and powerful Pentecostal preaching. By 1980, the church had more than 500 congregations.

The Elim Christian Mission began as a house church in 1962 in Guatemala City, led by a well-known medical doctor and radio personality, Dr. Otoniel Ríos, who became an Evangelical during the Evangelism-in-Depth campaigns in 1961. In 1973, Ríos terminated his medical practice to devote himself to a full-time pastoral ministry and to building up a large central church, which grew to 3,000 members in 1979 after the congregation moved into a new auditorium. By 1980, the ministry of Elim included 68 churches and 50 preaching points with a total membership of about 20,000, with a growing association of sister churches in El Salvador.

Other Evangelical denominations that began work in Guatemala prior to 1960 were the following: Emmanuel Church Association (1940), Interdenominational Evangelical Mission (1944), Baptist Convention of Guatemala (related to the SOUTHERN BAPTIST CONVENTION, 1946), Spanish American Inland Mission (Calvary Churches, 1947), Galilee Church of God (CHURCH OF GOD [ANDERSON, INDIANA]) 1947, LUTHERAN CHURCH—MISSOURI SYNOD (1947), CHURCH OF GOD OF PROPHECY (1950), United World Mission (1952), Defenders of the Faith (1952), Bethesda Church of God (1952), Apostolic Church of Faith in Jesus Christ (1953), INTERNATIONAL CHURCH OF THE FOURSQUARE GOSPEL (1956), Palestine Pentecostal Church (1956), the Missionary Church of God (1957), and the independent CHURCHES OF CHRIST (NON-INSTRUMENTAL) (1959).

During the 1960s and 1970s, additional Protestant groups initiated ministries in Guatemala: the New Jerusalem Church of God (1960), Assembly of Christian churches (1962), EPISCOPAL CHURCH (1962), Evangelical Church of the Holy Spirit (1962), Door to Heaven Pentecostal Church (1963), CHRISTIAN AND MISSIONARY ALLIANCE (1963), Evangelical Mennonite Church (1964), PENTECOSTAL CHURCH OF GOD of America (1965), Eastern Mennonite Board of Missions and Charities (1968), Mount Bashan Evangelical churches (1968), Voice of God Evangelical Church (1968), Springs of Living Water Church (1972), Pentecostal Church of God of New York (1972), Bethany Evangelical Mission (1972), the World Christian Church (1976), Center of Faith, Hope and Love (1978), Christian Fraternity (1979), and the Jesus Christ is Lord Church (1980).

Despite differences of tradition, doctrine, and practice, many of the leaders of the various Protestant denominations in Guatemala met together periodically, although informally, to discuss common problems and resolve conflicts during the period 1909–1935. A formal structure was organized in 1935 to facilitate interdenominational cooperation, the Synod of the Evangelical Church in Guatemala, although it was not until 1937 that member organizations formally ratified the agreement. In 1951, the Evangelical Synod was restructured and its name changed to the Evangelical Alliance of Guatemala (AEG), now related to the WORLD EVANGELICAL ALLIANCE.

It was under the auspices of the AEG that a vast interdenominational evangelistic campaign was conducted in 1961–1962 throughout the country, under the banner of Evangelism-in-Depth (EVAF), a program designed by missionary and national leaders of the Latin America Mission (LAM) in Costa Rica. Led by the LAM's Kenneth Strachan, EVAF was hailed as a great success by the AEG and missionary leaders, due to more than 20,000 reported "professions of faith" that took place during the citywide campaigns and house-to-house visitation efforts.

During the week of January 23–27, 1962, an interdenominational leadership retreat was held in Guatemala City, sponsored by AEG and World Vision International (Monrovia, California), with the participation of about 1,500 pastors and missionaries from throughout Central America. During the opening ceremony for this event, on January 23, the president of Guatemala, Miguel Ydígoras Fuentes, and the mayor of Guatemala City, Dr. Luis Fernando Galich, addressed the audience of about 3,000 and welcomed the participants, which was the first time in history that a Guatemalan president had participated in a Protestant rally. This singular event and the two-year EVAF program was a symbolic turning point for Evangelicals in Guatemala, who lost their fear of being known as Evangelicals in public and began to openly evangelize their communities and aggressively plant new churches throughout the country.

This was a significant turning point in the history of the Protestant movement in Guatemala and signaled a new era of rapid church growth in most areas of the country. Between 1960 and 1964, the total number of Protestant congregations increased from 566 nationally to 1,525; or in terms of national membership, from 25,470 to about 72,500, which represents an increase of 30 percent annually. By mid-1980, there were 6,448 Protestant congregations in Guatemala with 334,453 baptized members and a Protestant community of 1,003,359, or about 13.8 percent of the national population of 7,262,419.

When the National Directory of the Protestant Movement in Guatemala was published in 1981, the largest denominations were the following: the Prince of Peace Evangelical Church (518 congregations with 33,670 members), Association of Central American churches (823 congregations with 32,353 members), Assemblies of God (684 congregations with 31,505 members), Church of God (Cleveland, Tennessee) (994 congregations with 30,032 members), Seventh-day Adventist Church (216 congregations with 17,207 members), and the National Presbyterian Church (224 congregations with 16,263 members). All the other denominations had less than 10,000 members in 1980, but Pentecostal groups had 52.1 percent of all the Protestant church members in the country, compared to 6.3 percent for the Adventists and 41.6 percent for other Free Church groups (non-Pentecostal). Of the six largest denominations in 1980, only three were Pentecostal.

During the period 1960–1980, Guatemala became a showcase for the growth of the Protestant movement in Latin America, but the enthusiasm of Evangelical leaders regarding continued high rates of church growth in Guatemala often exceeded the reality. A series of public opinion polls taken between 1990 and 2001 in Guatemala helped to correct some of the erroneous growth projections made by Evangelical leaders: The CID-Gallup company reported that the Protestant population was 26.4 percent in May of 1990 and 25 percent in April of 1996. Early in 2001, SEPAL conducted a public opinion poll in Guatemala that showed Protestants to be 25.3 percent of the national population. It seemed clear that the size of the Protestant population did not change in Guatemala, even though the number of Protestant congregations continued to increase, from about 6,450 in 1980, to 9,298 in 1987, to about 18,000 in 2001.

The fact that the percentage of Protestants from 1980 to 2000 has remained stable while the number of Protestant congregations has grown by 258 percent is an as yet little understood enigma. Some have suggested that there may have been an exodus of Protestant adherents in Guatemala during the 1980s and 1990s due to discouragement about the performance of Evangelical politicians, such as General Efraín Ríos Montt (military dictator during 1982–1983) and Jorge Serrano (president during 1990–1993), as well as to disillusionment over the financial and sex scandals involving popular American Evangelical TV personalities, such as Jim and Tammy Faye Bakker (1987) and Jimmy Swaggart (1991).

Another factor, during the period 1962–1996, is that Guatemala faced political and social upheaval caused by a brutal and bloody civil war between the "public security forces" of the conservative government and a series of Marxist-led revolutionary forces, which at the time of the peace talks in late 1996 were led by the Guatemalan National Revolutionary Unity (known in Spanish as the URNG). The thirty-six years of armed conflict caused an estimated 200,000 deaths, the forced exile to Mexico of about 250,000 people from conflict zones, mainly among native peoples in the central highlands, and about 1 million internal refugees.

The counterinsurgency campaign launched by dictator Efraín Ríos Montt (a self-declared Evangelical) and carried out by the military and the civilian defense patrols in 1982–1983 strongly polarized Guatemalan public opinion against the government and caused civil rights organizations to begin a worldwide campaign against military aid to Guatemala, which had been coming mainly from the U.S. government. The Guatemalan military was accused of genocide because of its program of systematic extermination of the Indian population. In November of 1986, a series of peace talks were held in Esquipulas, Guatemala, with representatives from most of the countries of Central America, in an effort to bring peace to the convulsed region, but it was not until December of 1996 that a final peace accord was signed between the Guatemalan government and rebel forces.

During the 1980s, Evangelical public opinion was divided for and against support for Ríos Montt, who offended many people—Catholics and Evangelicals alike—by his public radio messages, which blended anti-Marxist rhetoric with Evangelical sermons. The leadership of the Evangelical Alliance, which represents most Evangelical organizations in Guatemala, decided to back off from publicly supporting Ríos Montt and to distance themselves from his government. After alienating business, military, and political opposition leaders, as well as the Catholic Church, Ríos Montt was overthrown by Defense Minister General Oscar Humberto Mejía in August of 1983. Although Evangelicals were not persecuted after the ousting of Ríos Montt as head of state, there is no doubt that the public image of Evangelicals did suffer.

In 2001, the estimated sizes of the largest Protestant denominations in Guatemala were as follows: the Assemblies of God (139,000 members), Prince of Peace Church (93,700), Church of God (Cleveland, Tennessee) (90,000), Association of Central American churches (86,000), Calvary Church (59,400), Seventh-day Adventist Church (46,400), Voice of God Church (44,500), Evangelical Mission of the Holy Spirit (38,700), Elim Christian Mission (36,600), Christian Brethren (33,800), and the National Presbyterian Church (30,100).

According to the SEPAL study in 2001, Catholics were 58 percent of the nation's population, Protestants 25 percent, other religions 3 percent, and none/no response 14 percent. Other religions included native Amerindian religions (Animist), Garífuna religion, the CHURCH OF JESUS CHRIST OF LATTER-DAY SAINTS (about 67,500 members), the JEHOVAH'S WITNESSES (about 14,100 members), Light of the World Church (Guadalajara, Mexico), Voice of the Cornerstone (Puerto Rico), THE FAMILY (Children of God), UNITED CHURCH OF RELIGIOUS SCIENCE, CHRISTADELPHIANS, and Growing in Grace Church (Miami, Florida). Guatemala is also home to the spectrum of the world's religions and now has small communities professing Judaism, BAHÁ'Í FAITH, Islam (Palestinian Arabs), Buddhists/Chinese religions, Hinduism, and various Western Esoteric traditions. The total population of Guatemala in 2000 was estimated at 11,385,300.

Clifton L. Holland

Sources:

- Barry, Tom. Inside Guatemala. Albuquerque, NM: The Inter-Hemispheric Education Resource Center, 1992.
- Brierly, Peter, ed. World Churches Handbook. London: Christian Research, 1997.
- Grimes, Barbara F., ed. Ethnologue: Languages of the World. 12th ed. Dallas, TX: Summer Institute of Linguistics, 1992.
- Holland, Clifton L., ed. World Christianity: Central America and the Caribbean. Monrovia, CA: MARC-World Vision International, 1981.
- Read, William R., et al. Latin American Church Growth. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans, 1969.
- SEPAL. Reporte Preliminar: El Estado de la Iglesia Evangélica en Guatemala, 2001. Guatemala City: Servicio Evangelizador para América Latina (SEPAL), 2001.
- Zapata, Virgilio A. Historia de la Iglesia Evangélica en Guatemala. Guatemala City: Génesis Publicidad, 1982.

Guinea

Guinea is the home to no less than sixteen different African peoples, among whom the Fulahs, Mandingos, Malinkes, and Susses form the largest blocs in the population. It was a rich land, with notable gold deposits in its northern highlands. At various times through the centuries, parts of Guinea were incorporated into empires ruled from neighboring power centers. They were, for example, on the edge and frequently part of the various Fulani states centered in Senegal and Mali. Then in 1870, a man named Samori (1840–1900) rose from humble beginnings to become the Almany (a title indicating his combined political and religious role) of a state that approximated the present country of Guinea (plus parts of Mali and the Ivory Coast).

Portuguese had traveled the coast of Guinea for several centuries and established trading posts prior to Samori's emergence, but it was during his rule that the French began to move into the heart of the country from Senegal. He fought his first battle with French troops in 1886. He fought the French for the next twelve years but was finally defeated, taken prisoner, and exiled. The country remained a French colony until 1958 when, following a negative vote on President Charles de Gaulle's plan to transform Guinea from a colony to a member of the French community, the local leadership proclaimed the country's independence.

The popular leader of the independence movement, Sékou Touré (1922–1984), died in 1984. Shortly thereafter a coup was led by Colonel Lansana Conté, who continues to head the government.

Traditional religions of the Guinea peoples have remained strong in this land where Christianity and Islam have vied for the heart of the population. The Kissi, Loma, and Gbande peoples, who traditionally have occupied the forest lands in the south-east near the borders with Sierra Leone and Liberia, have been most resistant to conversion. Also many of the Malinke and Kpelle have retained their religion.

Islam (of the Sunni MALIKITE SCHOOL OF ISLAM) entered Guinea in the eighteenth century, the Fulani people being the primary instrument. The majority of Guineans are now Muslims. The strongest support has appeared among the Dialonke, Garakole, and Susu peoples. Many of the country's Muslims are members of the TIJANIYYA SUFI ORDER, an order that was developing in North Africa at about the same time that Islam was moving into Guinea. In the twentieth century, the community has further diversified with the introduction of the AHMADIYYA MOVEMENT IN ISLAM from Pakistan. Also, since World War II the BAHÁ'Í FAITH has begun to spread.

Portuguese arrived along the coast of Guinea in 1462. Catholicism was introduced at the trading centers, but there was no effort to evangelize the interior. It was not until 1877 that Roman Catholic missionaries, in the form of the HOLY GHOST FATHERS, arrived, by which time Islam already had established its claim on much of the region. The first mission station was opened at Boff. The White Fathers arrived in 1896, by which time the French had almost completed their conquest of the land.

The ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH grew steadily through the twentieth century, growth marked by the ordination of the first Guinean priest in 1940, the establishment of the first archdiocese (Conakry) in 1955, and the consecration of the first African archbishop in 1962. The Holy Ghost Fathers were in charge of the archdiocese, and the White Fa-

Status of religions in Guinea, 2000-2050

Followers	2000			2025	2050
	total	%	rate
Muslims	4,999,000	67.3	2.65	8,866,000	12,087,000
Ethnoreligionists	2,120,000	28.5	2.37	3,000,000	3,200,000
Christians	295,000	4.0	2.98	580,000	950,000
Roman Catholics	117,000	1.6	3.25	300,000	500,000
Protestants	69,200	0.9	3.94	130,000	200,000
Independents	43,000	0.6	3.67	120,000	220,000
Nonreligious	12,500	0.2	4.55	40,000	90,000
Atheists	3,800	0.1	2.43	10,000	20,000
Baha'is	290	0.0	1.84	600	1,200
Total population	7,430,000	100.0	2.59	12,497,000	16,348,000

thers worked in the neighboring Diocese of N'Zékékoré. Then in 1967, as the country was struggling to become independent, all foreign priests and nuns were expelled. Only eight priests remained to carry on the work. The church was forced to quickly recruit more priests and rebuild, which it has subsequently done.

Protestants did not enter the country until 1918, when the CHRISTIAN AND MISSIONARY ALLIANCE (CMA) began work in the Niger River valley. It expanded primarily by working among groups that had to that point retained their traditional faith, rather than from among the Muslim community. The CMA has taken the lead in creating Bibles and other literature in the various languages spoken in Guinea. Like the Catholics, CMA missionaries were expelled in 1967, but the CMA was able to negotiate an arrangement whereby twenty-six missionaries were allowed to remain, though their activities were for a period very restricted. Many of these were at the church's two schools at Telekoro and Mamou. Thus they were able to focus on leadership training and continue the process of translating the Bible. Their work eventually matured into the Evangelical Protestant Church.

By 1967, several other churches had also established missions, most prominently the Church of the Open Bible, an American Pentecostal group that entered in 1952. The PARIS MISSION and the Anglicans had both established work in the nation's capital city, Canakry. Each of these three efforts lost all their missionary leadership in 1967, and the churches have remained weak. Anglican churches are part of the Diocese of Guinea, which now includes both Guinea and Guinea-Bissau, part of the CHURCH OF THE PROVINCE OF WEST AFRICA.

The Christian community remains relatively small, 2 to 3 percent of the total population of approximately seven million. Some 65 percent of the population profess Islam, and the remainder continue to follow their traditional religion. There are few signs of new religious impulses, though several Evangelical groups (most notably the New Tribes Mission, SIM USA [formerly the Sudan Interior Mission], and the SOUTHERN BAPTIST CONVENTION) opened work in the 1980s. The Southern Baptists have a small work among the Susu people, and more recently the NATIONAL BAPTIST CONVENTION, U.S.A. has launched missionary activity.

Sources:

"The Church in Guinea." International Fides Service 2695 (Jan. 7, 1976): 6–9.

Laughton, J. R. C. Gambia: Country, People and Church in the Diocese of Gambia and the Rio Pongas. London: S.P.G., 1938.

Status of religions in Guinea-Bissau, 2000-2050

Followers	2000			2025	2050
	total	%	rate
Ethnoreligionists	548,000	45.2	1.77	730,000	820,000
Muslims	484,000	39.9	2.70	877,000	1,321,000
Christians	160,000	13.2	2.33	295,000	450,000
Roman Catholics	141,000	11.6	2.33	240,000	350,000
Independents	31,000	2.6	4.48	70,000	120,000
Protestants	9,500	0.8	3.10	24,000	50,000
Nonreligious	18,500	1.5	3.13	40,000	85,000
Atheists	1,700	0.1	5.24	3,500	8,000
Baha'is	330	0.0	4.23	500	800
Total population	1,213,000	100.0	2.23	1,946,000	2,685,000

independence, only to see the Portuguese begin to create settlements along the coast at the end of the fifteenth century. At this time the area was home to no less than forty different peoples, the most numerous being the Fulalni, Mandings, Mandes, and Balantes.

The Portuguese gradually established a colony, which became the source of slave labor. The country itself was turned over to a private company, which forced many into the cultivation of crops designed for export, while the majority of the population were living at subsistence levels. The country was impoverished and left in ignorance. However, in this situation in the 1950s a resistance movement began to develop, led by Amilcar Cabral (d. 1973). His goals were made plain in the name of the organization he founded, the African Party for the Liberation of Guinea and Cape Verde (the Portuguese island off the coast that had been a processing center for the slave trade). The movement turned into a war for liberation, which won the country's freedom in 1973. As he realized his life's work, Cabral was

Guinea-Bissau

Guinea-Bissau, a small country sandwiched between Senegal and the Republic of Guinea, includes three major river valleys (the Geba, Cacheu, and Corubal) and the Bijagos Archipelago, consisting of a number of islands immediately off the coast. Early in the second millennium B.C.E., the area was incorporated into different kingdoms centered in Senegal and Mali, but the people eventually attained their assassinated by Portuguese agents. The United Nations moved quickly to recognize the new nation, and its establishment played a major role in the coup that ended the harsh dictatorship in Portugal and led to the dismantling of the Portuguese colonial empire.

The new government was taken over in a coup in 1980, and a Marxist dictatorship took control. A multiparty democracy was put in place in 1991, but the poverty of the country has made it continually unstable. It was the scene of a civil war in 1998 and an attempted coup in 2000.

The majority of the people of Guinea-Bissau retain allegiance to the traditional religions of the land and are the overwhelming majority in the western half of the country farthest from the coast. The Banyum, Bayot, and Manjaco peoples have remained virtually untouched by either Islam or Christianity.

Christianity came to Guinea-Bissau from the Franciscans who arrived in 1462 with the first wave of Portuguese traders. Their work came under the jurisdiction of the new Diocese of St. James of Cape Verde erected in 1532. They were later joined by Jesuit priests but made only slow progress at wooing converts into the church. The low point of the church was in 1929, when only one priest remained in the entire country. In 1940 (as part of an agreement between Portugal and the Vatican), Guinea-Bissau became a mission independent of Cape Verde, and a new missionary effort began. The relative success in more recent decades was indicated by the mission's elevation to the status of a prefecture apostolic in 1955 and the establishment of the Diocese of Bissau in 1977.

The development of the ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH was overshadowed by the movement of Islam into the country, especially in the eighteenth century. Sunni Islam of the MALIKITE SCHOOL IN ISLAM came to dominate the Sominke, Fulakunda, and Susu peoples, mostly in the southern and eastern portions of the country, and the Diola in the west. However, even Islam has had only relative success, with only a third of the population of around a million people being attracted to it.

Protestantism did not manifest in Guinea-Bissau until the Worldwide Evangelization Crusade (WEC), headquartered in England, established work in Bissau. Its work spread along the coast and in the islands of the archipelago. Like the Catholic Church, it has found progress difficult. In the 1990s the Evangelical Church of Guinea (Igreja Evangélica da Guiné), founded by the WEC, still had only a few thousand members. It is the largest Protestant work in the country. There is also a small Anglican presence attached to the Diocese of Guinea of the CHURCH OF THE PROVINCE OF WEST AFRICA and the small Guinea-Bissau Mission of the SEVENTH-DAY ADVENTIST CHURCH, part of the larger Sahel Union Mission, which includes a number of countries in West Africa.

Of some interest, there is a small DRUZE community in Guinea-Bissau consisting of approximately a hundred expatriates from Lebanon. The civil unrest has tended to discourage the founding of new religions.

Sources:

- Gonçalves, J. J. O Islamismo na Guiné Portuguesa. Lisbon: Agência-Geral do Ultramar, 1961.
- Laughton, J. R. C. Gambia: Country, People and Church in the Diocese of Gambia and the Rio Pongas. London: S.P.G., 1938.
- Rema, H. P. História das missões católicas da Guiné. Braga, Portugal: Editorial Franciscana, 1982.
- Willis, H. The Light Shines in the Darkness: The Story of the Evangelical Church of Guinea-Bissau, 1940–1974. Balstrade, UK: WED, 1996.

The Gurdjieff Foundations

George Ivanovich Gurdjieff (b. c. 1866–1949) was a spiritual teacher who brought a message of inner awakening and a method of self-development that is increasingly studied in the West today. Born in Alexandropol, in the southern Caucasus, at the crossroads of diverse cultures, traditions, and languages, Gurdjieff dedicated his early life to the search for meaning. He was convinced that there existed an ancient knowledge that could illuminate the place of human existence within the cosmic scheme. After over twenty years of relentless searching in remote schools and monasteries of the Middle East and central Asia, he appeared in Moscow in 1912 with an all-encompassing teaching that weaves cosmology, metaphysics, social critique, and spiritual practice into a design for personal evolution. The body of ideas and practices that he introduced, called “the Work,” reflects the Western Esoteric (alchemical) tradition, which requires effort on the part of the aspirant to awaken to the process of inner transformation.

A defining feature of this work on oneself is that it is meant to take place in the cauldron of everyday life. Specific to Gurdjieff's method is his emphasis on the direct awareness of the triadic structure of humans, the three centers of body, mind, and feeling. The harmonious development of this triad, called by Gurdjieff the three “brains,” brings balance to the whole being and allows access to a new dimension of consciousness.

Leading his pupils out of the chaos of the Russian Revolution, Gurdjieff settled in France in 1921, where he based his activity until his death in 1949. During this period he also set out his ideas in his major work, Beelzebub's Tales to His Grandson, as well as in Meetings with Remarkable Men, written in the form of an autobiography. In addition, Gurdjieff left a large corpus of sacred dances and exercises called “movements” and, in collaboration with Thomas de Hartmann, over two hundred musical compositions.

Gurdjieff worked closely with a number of pupils in Europe and America in what remains essentially an oral teaching tradition. Upon his death, the work of the groups was guided and developed by his chief pupil, Jeanne de Salzmann, who succeeded in creating a nucleus of advanced pupils capable of sustaining the life of the teaching. In the early 1950s, societies and foundations were established in Paris, New York, London, and Caracas. From these original centers bearing his name, and all led by his most experienced followers, other groups have been formed in many cities in Europe, North and South America, Australia, and Israel. The activities of each of the Gurdjieff Foundations are directed by a council of its own members. The relation of the foundations to each other is cooperative rather than based on common allegiance to a central authority.

George Ivanovich Gurdjieff (Gurdjieff Foundation of New York)

In the foundations, practical work takes place through various group meetings, exercises and movements, guided meditation, and a large range of activities, including music, art, crafts, and manual work, intended to make possible the use of all aspects of everyday life for the growth of awareness. Although the form and language is adapted to the scientific temper of the modern age, the teaching retains a specific esoteric character and is believed consistent with all great religious traditions. As a path of consciousness, it does not involve belief or formal rites but calls for direct experience and understanding. There is no effort to proselytize, and this may in part account for the charges of secrecy that have arisen from time to time. Approximately ten thousand persons currently participate in the work of the foundations. Essential aspects of the teaching are periodically presented to the public through conferences, lecture series, concerts, and the issuing of relevant texts. In cooperation with Gurdjieff's heirs, the foundations also direct the publication of his writings and music.

No notable controversies have occurred within the foundations since their beginnings in the early 1950s. However, some older pupils separated from the mainstream of the work and formed groups of their own. There are also numerous other organizations led by individuals who claim no historical lineage with Gurdjieff or his direct pupils. In addition, since Gurdjieff's time, many organizations throughout the world have used his name or his ideas—such as, for instance, the Enneagram and the Fourth Way—with interpretations that have little or no relation to the way these ideas are approached and experienced within the foundations.

A source of information on Gurdjieff and the Gurdjieff Foundation of New York is the Internet site <http://www.gurdjieff.org/foundation.htm>. The teaching emphasizes the need to develop a new quality of participation in all aspects of human life. A growing number of representatives of art, science, philosophy, and religion credit the teaching with insights into their own fields.

Constance A. Jones

Sources:

- Anderson, Margaret. The Unknowable Gurdjieff. New York and London: Weiser and Routledge and Kegan Paul, 1962.
- Driscoll, J. Walter, and the Gurdjieff Foundation of California. Gurdjieff: An Annotated Bibliography. New York: Garland Publishing, 1985. An exhaustive bibliography of Gurdjieff's own works and the extensive literature, which includes expositions and commentaries on the teachings, pupil's experiences, memoirs, and historical accounts. Driscoll also publishes the online periodical, Gurdjieff International Review, posted at <http://www.gurdjieff.org/>.
- . Gurdjieff: A Reading Guide. Los Altos, CA: Gurdjieff Electronic Publishing, 1999.
- Gurdjieff, George Ivanovich. Beelzebub's Tales to His Grandson: An Objectively Impartial Criticism of the Life of Man. London and New York: Penguin Arkana, 1999.
- . Life is Real Only Then, When "I Am." London and New York: Penguin Arkana, 1999.
- . Meetings with Remarkable Men. London and New York: Penguin Arkana, 1985.
- . Views from the Real World: Early Talks in Moscow, Essentuki, Tiflis, Berlin, London, Paris, New York, Chicago, as Recollected by His Pupils. Forward by Jeanne de Salzmann. London and New York: Arkana, 1984.
- Moore, James. Gurdjieff: A Biography: The Anatomy of a Myth. Shaftsbury, Dorset, UK: Element, 1991.

Needleman, Jacob, George Baker, and Bruno de Panafieu, eds. Gurdjieff: Essays and Reflections on the Man and His Teaching. New York: Continuum, 1996.

Ouspensky, P. D. In Search of the Miraculous: Fragments of an Unknown Teaching. New York: Harcourt Brace, 1949.

Gush Emunim

Gush Emunim, the Bloc of the Faithful, is an Orthodox Jewish group founded in the wake of the Six-Day War of 1967, which pitted Israel against Syria and Egypt. As a result of the war Israel occupied new territory far beyond its original borders but part of historic Israel. The Israeli government's plans to return these lands were thwarted by a group led by Rabbi Tzi Yehuda Kook, the son of the revered Rabbi Abraham Isaac Kook (1865–1935), former chief rabbi of Palestine. The younger Kook believed Jews should possess all the territory included in the Israel of biblical times (including ancient Israel, Judea, and Samaria). He came to believe that possession of that land was a prerequisite for the coming of the promised Messiah.

Gush Emunim builds on the tradition of religious Zionism as expounded by such leaders as Rabbi Zvi Hirsch Kalischer (1795–1874), Rabbi Judah Alkalay (1798–1878), and Rabbi Samuel Mohilewer (1824–1898). As a minority movement among Zionists, the religious supporters organized the Mizrahi (Spiritual Center) movement in Vienna in 1901, at a conference called by Rabbi Isaac Jacob Reines (1839–1915), the organization's first president. Like all Orthodox Jews, they believed that a Messiah would come and that he would reconstruct the temple and initiate a great Jewish empire that would be the instrument for establishing peace and prosperity for the world's people. They were also content, to some extent, to await the Messiah's coming. Rabbi Kook's followers, the Gush Emunim, have given up waiting and operate on the idea that the Messiah wants or needs them to help prepare the way. According to the Gush Emunim, beyond the mere establishment of the state of Israel, the Temple Mount in Jerusalem needs to be cleared, the temple rebuilt, and the biblical lands settled by Jews.

To carry out their program, once east Jerusalem was in Israeli hands, a member climbed to the top of the Wailing Wall and unfurled an Israeli flag. A short time later, Kook and some of his followers rented rooms at an Arab-run hotel in Hebron, the first step in a program to create a large number of settlements throughout the West Bank. The Israeli government has been unable to move them off of the land. A major obstacle is the strength accorded the Gush Emunim through their political party, the Tehiya Party, which, though relatively small, has been able to block government attempts to return conquered land to Palestinian control. While unable to swing a large number of Israelis to its full program of religious messianism, in the 1970s they found the public supportive of the basic notion of Israel's territorial expansion.

The Gush Emunim have remained a small but important group in Israel. In 1980, some of the group were responsible for a failed attempt to blow up the Dome of the Rock, an important Muslim site in Jerusalem built in the seventh century. In the 1990s, rabbis sympathetic to the Gush Emunim position advocated disobedience to military orders to leave the occupied territories. At the same time, because of his activity in pursuing the peace process with the Palestinians, they called Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin a traitor. In November 1995, Rabin was assassinated.

Gush Emunim, though small in membership, has sympathetic supporters throughout Israel for some of its primary affirmations, especially its desire to expand Israel's borders and provide no concessions to an independent Palestine. It remains somewhat secretive, especially as it has been supportive of and knowledgeable about continuing violent incidents in Israel.

Sources:

- Gorenberg, Gershom. The End of Days: Fundamentalism and the Struggle for the Temple Mount. New York: Free Press, 2000.
- Lustick, Ian. For the Land and the Lord: Jewish Fundamentalism in Israel. New York: Council on Foreign Relations, 1988.
- Newman, David, ed. The Impact of Gush Emunim: Politics and Settlement in the West Bank. New York: St. Martin's Press, 1985.
- Segal, Haggai. Dear Brothers: The West Bank Jewish Underground. Woodmere, NY: Beit Shamai Publications, 1988.
- Sprinzak, Ehud. Brother against Brother: Violence and Extremism in Israeli Politics from Altalena to the Rabin Assassination. New York: Free Press, 1999.

Guyana

Human beings may have reached what is today the country of Guyana as early as thirty-five thousand years ago. In modern times it came to be the homes of two peoples, the Arawak people who inhabited the coast and the Caribs in the interior. Eventually, the more warlike Caribs displaced the Arawaks, a process repeated several times as both groups moved into the islands of the Caribbean. They bequeathed to the region its name, Guiana (land of waters).

Christopher Columbus sailed along the coast of Guyana in 1498, but the first settlers were from Holland. The Dutch constructed a fort in 1616, the first of several settlements to facilitate trade. The Dutch West India Company administered the colony into the eighteenth century. As agriculture increased in the mid-1600s, the company began to import African slaves, and the shrinking native population moved inland. In the 1770s, Guyana became contested territory, and after four decades during which it changed hands several times, it became a British possession in 1814 and was known as British Guiana. The British retained control until independence in 1966 when it assumed the name Guyana. Since 1968, the People's National Congress has been the leading political party.

The Guyanese constitution guarantees religious freedom. During the early decades of independence, however, the Marxist-oriented governments promoted atheism, one symbol of which was the nationalization of all the schools operated by various religious groups. Religious groups and buildings are registered through the government's Ministry of Home Affairs. The presence of foreign religious personnel is strictly regulated.

Indigenous religions have survived in the interior of Guyana, especially among the Arekuna, Macushi, and Warrau peoples. But Christianity is now followed by a slight majority of the people, and Guyana has possibly the highest percentage of adherents to Hinduism of any country in the Americas (32 percent).

Roman Catholicism was introduced in 1657 by brothers of the Capuchin order, but their work did not survive. Missionaries from the NETHERLANDS REFORMED CHURCH and the Moravian Brethren arrived later in the century. The first Reformed church was erected in 1720, and Dutch Lutherans built a church in 1743, both primarily serving the Dutch community. The Reformed Church had a policy of not allowing either Africans or Guyanese people to become members.

A new era in Guyanese religion began with the establishment of British control. The LONDON MISSIONARY SOCIETY entered the country in 1807, and the CHURCH OF ENGLAND was established as the favored religious community in 1810. State support was withdrawn from the Reformed Church, and it was gradually superseded by the CHURCH OF SCOTLAND (Presbyterians), that church having been established in 1766 by several plantation owners. It began to receive state funds in 1837.

Methodism in the islands had a unique beginning. It was brought to Guyana by freed slaves from Nevis in 1802. The church was then supplemented by British immigrants. Rounding out the Guyanese scene were the Canadian Presbyterians (1885) and the SEVENTH-DAY ADVENTIST CHURCH (1887). During the twentieth century, notable

Status of religions in Guyana, 2000-2050

Followers	2000			2025	2050
	total	%	rate
Christians	439,000	51.0	0.64	507,000	547,000
Protestants	169,000	19.6	1.31	250,000	300,000
Roman Catholics	86,500	10.0	-0.17	83,000	80,000
Anglicans	77,000	8.9	-0.38	70,000	65,000
Hindus	280,000	32.5	0.95	355,000	400,000
Muslims	70,100	8.1	0.85	86,000	90,000
Ethnoreligionists	19,300	2.2	0.15	15,000	10,000
Spiritists	17,400	2.0	1.90	22,000	26,000
Baha'is	14,600	1.7	1.16	27,000	45,000
Nonreligious	11,800	1.4	1.67	18,000	27,000
Atheists	4,600	0.5	1.33	7,500	10,000
Chinese folk-religionists	2,400	0.3	1.87	3,600	5,000
Buddhists	2,100	0.2	3.26	4,000	6,000
Jews	60	0.0	0.80	80	100
Total population	861,000	100.0	0.80	1,045,000	1,166,000

work has been founded by the ETHIOPIAN ORTHODOX TEWAHEDO CHURCH, the ASSEMBLIES OF GOD, and an independent Evangelical sending agency, the Unevangelized Fields Mission, which now works in the country's interior. Among the more interesting indigenous churches are the Jordanites, an independent Pentecostal church, and the Hallelujah Church, which emerged in the interior in the 1870s under the leadership of a new prophet named Abel.

Protestant Christians associate with each other across denominational lines through the Guyana Council of Churches, an affiliate of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES. Conservative Protestants are associated in the Guyana Evangelical Fellowship, which is related to the WORLD EVANGELICAL ALLIANCE.

The ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH was reestablished in 1826 with the arrival of an initial priest. The effort proved quite successful, and a vicariate was erected a mere eleven years later. The Diocese of Georgetown was designated in 1956. Catholics now have the largest following in Guyana, followed by the Anglicans, whose work is now a diocese of the CHURCH IN THE PROVINCE OF THE WEST INDIES, and the Assemblies of God.

Following the abolition of slavery in 1833, the British turned to India as a source of labor. Indians (most of whom were Hindus) were recruited for work on plantations and brought to Guyana as indentured servants. They were largely from rural India, predominantly male, with 10 percent children and 30 percent female. Those between the ages of ten and twenty were counted as adults. Some 200,000 were transported to Guyana, and their descendents now constitute 53 percent of the population. Many left Hinduism for Christianity, as the British made it an official policy for Hindus to become Christians before they could be eligible for the better civilian jobs.

Traditional Hinduism underwent some development as people from different parts of India were thrown together on plantations with Africans and members of the native peoples. Various forms of traditional Hinduism, both Vaishnava and Saivite, remain popular, most of the temples being associated with the Hindu Orthodox Guyana Sanathan Dharma Maha Sabha, the largest single religious group in the country. Hindu priests have organized the Guyana Pandits Society. Two popular Hindu holy days, Diwali and Holi (Phagwa), are celebrated as national holidays.

There are small groups associated with the INTERNATIONAL SOCIETY FOR KRISHNA CONSCIOUSNESS, the SATHYA SAI BABA MOVEMENT, and the ARYA SAMAJ. There is also a chapter of the Vishwa Hindu Parishad.

A percentage of the Indian immigrants to Guyana were Muslims, the great majority being Sunnis of the HANAFITE SCHOOL OF ISLAM and the SHAFIITE SCHOOL OF ISLAM. There are lesser numbers of Ismailis and Shi'as. The Shiites, who have no separate mosque, have felt some discrimination from the Sunni majority, especially with the growth of a vocal WAHHABI ISLAM presence. Guyana's pluralistic culture has provided fertile ground for both branches of the Ahmadiyyas, the AHMADIYYA MOVEMENT IN ISLAM and the AHMADIYYA ANJUMAN ISHAAT ISLAM, LAHORE, and for the BAHÁ'Í FAITH.

Although most Africans brought to Guyana (who currently constitute approximate one-third of the population) have become Christians, some have also become Hindus and Muslims, while a noticeable minority have continued to practice a form of their traditional African faiths. These now find expression in Guyanese VODOU (with a base in Ashanti religion from West Africa) and SPIRITISM, their life being somewhat affected by the improved communications between Caribbean lands and by the movement of RASTAFARIANS from Jamaica.

In November 1987, Guyana became the scene of one of the more dramatic religious events of the twentieth century. Over nine hundred members of the PEOPLES TEMPLE who had established an agricultural colony in a rural part of the country were involved in a massive act of murder and suicide. Although this event occurred in isolation from the ongoing life of Guyanese religions as a whole, it affected the larger religious community worldwide.

Sources:

- Aksharananda, Swami. "Hinduism in Guyana: A Study in Traditions of Worship." Ph.D. dissertation, 1993.
- "Caribbean Hinduism." Posted at <http://www.caribbeanhindu.com>. Accessed January 25, 2002.
- Jayawardena, C. "Religious Belief and Social Change: Aspects of the Development of Hinduism in British Guiana." Comparative Studies in Society and History: An International Quarterly 8, 1 (1966): 211–240.
- Premdas, R. R. "Religion and Reconciliation in the Multi-Ethnic States of the Third World." Ph.D. dissertation, McGill University, 1991.

Haiti

Estimates of the number of inhabitants on the island of Hispaniola at the time of Columbus's arrival in 1492 vary from five hundred thousand to two million. Within fifty years, they had been reduced to a few hundred, such that the Spanish were forced to turn to African slaves as a replacement labor force. Although the island's native religious cultures, those of the Taino and Carib, all but perished with their bearers, certain indigenous Caribbean influences are still notable in Haitian Vodou. Zaka, the Vodou spirit of agriculture, for instance, is perhaps a derivative of an indigenous corn spirit.

As early as 1502, the Spanish were shipping enslaved Africans to the island, empowered by the 1454 papal bull Romanus pontifex. Slaves were forcibly baptized Catholic, yet their conversion was usually cosmetic. African religious traditions, despite their prohibition, thus thrived in the colony, especially in maroon communities, absorbing Catholic elements and eventually becoming the religion known as Vodou.

In response to an increasingly uncontrollable French presence on the island's northwestern coast, the Spanish ceded the western third of the island to the French at the Treaty of Ryswick in 1697. Statistics reveal the explosion of the French plantation system that followed: When the treaty was signed, there were roughly 2,000 slaves in the nascent French colony of Saint-Domingue, whereas by 1789, over 600,000 slaves labored for the colony, at one point producing one-third of all sugar consumed in Europe.

French Catholicism in Saint-Domingue was hampered by a weak and factional priesthood, whose conversion of enslaved Africans was largely a perfunctory gesture required by Article 2 of the Code Noir, the royal decree governing the treatment of slaves in French colonies. The arrival of the Society of Jesus in 1704 marked a significant change in this regard. French Jesuits learned African languages and established a more genuine mission for more than half the colony's slaves. Colony administrators and plantation owners soon became suspicious of the Jesuits, however, accused them of insubordination to the Crown, and had them expelled in 1763.

©2001 maps.com

Followers	2000			2025	2050
	total	%	rate
Christians	7,875,000	95.8	1.69	11,373,000	14,015,000
Roman Catholics	6,520,000	79.3	1.68	9,200,000	11,000,000
Protestants	1,440,000	17.5	2.45	2,300,000	3,150,000
Independents	430,000	5.2	2.62	850,000	1,250,000
Spiritists	207,000	2.5	2.61	320,000	480,000
Nonreligious	116,000	1.4	4.13	250,000	600,000
Baha'is	17,100	0.2	1.99	33,000	60,000
Atheists	2,300	0.0	6.09	4,000	8,000
Muslims	1,900	0.0	1.57	2,700	4,200
Chinese folk-religionists	210	0.0	1.65	300	400
Jews	200	0.0	2.05	300	500
other religionists	3,000	0.0	2.55	4,500	6,000
Total population	8,222,000	100.0	1.74	11,988,000	15,174,000

lished a more genuine mission for more than half the colony's slaves. Colony administrators and plantation owners soon became suspicious of the Jesuits, however, accused them of insubordination to the Crown, and had them expelled in 1763.

By the end of the eighteenth century persistent slave resistance mushroomed into a national revolt following an August 1791 Vodou ceremony at Bois Caiman led by a slave named Boukman Dutty. Over the next thirteen years of revolt, the popular Africa-based religion served to unite and inspire the rebel slaves to defeat Napoleon's forces and finally gain independence in 1804.

Independent Haiti's first leaders (who declared Catholicism the nation's official religion, which it remains today) struggled to gain the recognition and respect of the rest of the world. The Vatican, for example, refused to send priests until the signing of a concordat in 1860. The fifty-four-year interim period was one of especial importance in Haitian religious history, as Vodou was further crystallized as the religion of the peasantry (despite new prohibitions against it). As for the Haitian Catholic Church, the few remaining priests in the new republic were joined by clerics who had been expelled from other colonies, and these men provided a dubious and inadequate sacerdotal leadership for Haitian Catholics. In such a disorderly ecclesial climate, popular Catholicism developed more unrestrainedly in Haiti than anywhere else in the Americas.

Shortly after the signing of the concordat in 1860, French Catholic missionaries came to Haiti and aggressively developed a national educational system. Not until the 1950s were Haitians ordained in significant numbers, and even then they only accounted for 20 percent of the country's priests. Over the course of these one hundred years the ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH was transformed into the largest and most functional institution in the country, rivaled in power only by the Haitian armed forces and kowtowed to by all Haitian heads of state, save the recalcitrant François Duvalier (r. 1957–1971).

Besides educating and ministering to the better part of the population, the Catholic Church hierarchy in Haiti has until very recently sought to eradicate Vodou from Haitian society. Three formal "antisuperstition" campaigns were waged to this end, in 1896, 1913, and 1941–1942. The last of these saw the Haitian government put the military at the church's disposal, and the resultant repression of Vodou practitioners and destruction of a treasury of national art represents one of the great tragedies in Haitian religious history.

Tempered by the spirit of the Second Vatican Council (1962–1965) and inspired by the force of liberation theology, the popular Haitian Catholic Church has changed radically in recent decades, both becoming acculturated and taking sides with the poor. Vodou rhythms and drums are now common features in Catholic Masses, and Catholic base communities have emerged as a potent political force, known collectively as Tilegliz (Haitian Creole; Little Church). Empowered by Pope John Paul II's March 1983 visit and forceful declaration that "Something must change here," the Tilegliz movement served to rally the masses against the oppressive Duvalier regime, eventually leading to the dramatic departure of Jean-Claude Duvalier in 1984 and the election of populist priest Jean-Bertrand Aristide as president in 1990.

As in other Latin American nations, the Charismatic renewal is recently having a strong impact on Haitian Catholicism. The direct emotional religious experiences normally associated with Protestant Pentecostal revivals now feature in many Haitian Catholic Masses, and the annual national Charismatic convention in Port-au-Prince draws tens of thousands and is marked by dramatic healings, speaking in tongues, and witnessing.

A recent survey of over one thousand households in rural Haiti shows that as many as 30 percent of Haitians today are Protestant. Though surprising, this figure is in reality a reflection of Haiti's participation in the hemisphere-wide turn of Third World Catholics to Protestant Pentecostalism. Protestantism in Haiti, moreover, has a long history, beginning with the 1817 establishment of the Methodist Wesleyan Mission. Other Protestant sects emerged in Haiti in ensuing decades, including the Baptist, Episcopalian, and Seventh-day Adventist churches. Today, most major Protestant sects count significant numbers of followers in Haiti; the largest are the CONVENTION BAPTISTE DE HAÏTE, which was founded in 1924 and by 1986 counted 120,000 members and the Evangelical Baptist Mission of South Haiti.

Religious freedom is enjoyed today by all of Haiti's eight million citizens. Vodou has gained greater respect and is widely appreciated as a source of Haitian pride and identity and a driving force behind Haiti's rich artistic culture. Although small numbers of Buddhists, Muslims, and members of the BAHÁ'Í FAITH can be found in Port-au-Prince, by far the most influential religious movements besides Christianity and VODOU in Haiti are Freemasonry and Rosicrucianism, both of which date to the colonial era. Although the esoteric nature of these movements precludes any estimation of their numbers, many Haitian heads of state have been Freemasons, and historically the Catholic Church hierarchy has been troubled by the attraction of its flock—and especially of upper-class Haitian Catholics—to Freemasonry and Rosicrucianism.

Terry Rey

Sources:

- Conway, F. J. Pentecostalism in the Context of Haitian Religion and Health Practice. Ph.D. dissertation, American University, 1978.
- Dayan, J. Haiti, History, and the Gods. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1995.
- Desmangles, L. G. The Faces of the Gods: Vodou and Roman Catholicism in Haiti. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1992.
- Greene, A. The Catholic Church in Haiti: Political and Social Change. Lansing: Michigan State University, 1993.
- Simpson, G. E. Religious Cults of the Caribbean: Trinidad, Jamaica, and Haiti. Rio Piedras, Puerto Rico: Institute of Caribbean Studies, University of Puerto Rico, 1980.

Hanafite School of Islam

The Hanafite School of Islam is one of four madhhabs (schools) of jurisprudence recognized as orthodox within the Sunni Muslim world. Islam is centered upon submission to God (Allah) and obedience to the Shariah (law). As Islam developed, necessary decisions over acceptable and unacceptable behavior led to the elevation of jurisprudence within the Muslim community as a variety of interpretations of the Qur'an and the Sunnah, the collection of hadith (the sayings and action of the prophet Muhammad and his companions). Through the first centuries of Islam, different collections of hadith appeared and only slowly did a consensus emerge concerning what constituted the authentic hadith.

Abu Hanifah (699–767) emerged from the traditions that had emerged in his native Kufa, in Mesopotamia (modern-day Iraq). For many years he was a merchant, the experience of which he later used when he turned to legal studies. After being a student for many years, he became a teacher and instructed many in his system. He left no writings behind and it was left to two students, Abu Yusuf (c. 731–798) and Muhammad ibn al-Hasan al-Shaybani (749–c. 804) and later scholars to develop the Hanafi perspective. A large body of legal commentaries produced by scholars over the centuries now form the library of the Hanafi school. As Hanafi thought developed, it contended for acceptance with the MALIKITE SCHOOL OF ISLAM and SHAFIITE SCHOOL OF ISLAM. In the ninth and tenth century, the Abbasid Empire tended to favor the Shafiite school and the Hanafi approach went into eclipse. However, with the rise of the Ottoman Empire, the Hanafi school was revived and became the dominant school in those lands under its control. It has thus survived as the dominant school of Islam in Turkey and Egypt and the lands between (Syria, Lebanon, Jordan) and eastward into central Asia, Pakistan, India, and China (though challenged by SHI' A ISLAM in Iran and Iraq).

Muslim legal thought has four sources—the Qur'an, the Sunnah, the consensus of the ulama (community of those knowledgeable in Islamic law and theology), and reasoning by analogy, the latter principle allowing a general broadening of areas covered by the law. Like the other schools of jurisprudence, Hanafi legal scholars agree upon the importance of the Qur'an and the traditions passed through the Sunnah as important and give due reverence to the consensus of the ulama. However, the Hanafi are distinguished by the relative importance they give to the use of analogy (qiyas) and tolerance of a resulting range of opinion (ra'y) on some issues. Hanafis use human reason to compare a current situation with one for which legislation already exists. Thus the Hanafi school has been seen as the most liberal of the four schools and the one that has been most open to issues of personal freedom.

The liberality of the Hanafi's made them the object of attack by the traditionalists, especially the HANBALITE SCHOOL OF ISLAM that rejected the use of analogy and placed its emphasis upon a conservative reading of the Qur'an and Sunnah. Those forces that opposed the Ottoman Empire, which had adopted the Hanafite system for their legal discourse, cited their opposition to the Hanafite school as part of their rationale for fighting the empire.

Sources:

- Coulson, Noel J. Conflicts and Tensions in Islamic Jurisprudence. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1969.
- . A History of Islamic Law. Edinburgh: Edinburgh University Press, 1994.
- Hallaq, Wael B. A History of Islamic Legal Theories: An Introduction to Sunni Usul al-Fiqh. New York: Cambridge University Press, 1997.
- Horrie, Chris, and Peter Chippindale. What Is Islam? London: Virgin Publishing, 1998.
- Schacht, Joseph. An Introduction to Islamic Law. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1964.
- Watt, Montgomery. The Majesty That Was Islam. New York: Praeger Publishers, 1974.

Hanbalite School of Islam

The Hanbalite School of Islam is one of the four madhhabs (schools) of jurisprudence deemed orthodox within the world of Sunni Islam. The school traces its origin to Ahmad ibn Hanbal (780–855). Born in Baghdad, he would travel widely across the Arabian Peninsula and throughout the Muslim world. Though he never authored a single book on jurisprudence (fiqh), after his death, his students (including his son, Abd Allah [d. 903] gathered his writings, including a number of fatwas (legal pronouncements), that once assembled manifested the breath of his work on the Shariah (Islamic law).

Hanbal, though a student of Muhammad ibn Idris ibn al-Abbas ibn Uthman ibn Shafi (767–820), the founder of the SHAFIITE SCHOOL OF ISLAM, developed a more strict approach to legal interpretation that centered upon the Qur'an and the Sunnah, the collection of hadith (the sayings and actions of the prophet Muhammad and his companions). He played down the role of the ulama (community of those knowledgeable in Islamic law and theology) and reasoning by analogy, which had become so established in the HANAFITE SCHOOL OF ISLAM. The result was a more rigid approach to Islam that among some developed into a significant dislike of SUFISM as a departure from Orthodox Islam.

The Hanbalite school grew strong during the ninth and tenth centuries, but in 945 the new Buwayhid dynasty (who favored Shi'a Islam) turned against the Hanbalites, but it enjoyed a revival under subsequent dynasties in the eleventh and twelfth centuries. Though not the most favored at court, the Hanbalites continued to be active throughout the fifteenth century, during which time one of its most celebrated teachers, Ahmad ibn Taymiyya (d. 1328), appeared. The school further suffered in popularity with the rise of the Ottoman Empire, which favored the Hanafite school. The Hanbalite school survived mainly in pockets on the Arabian Peninsula.

Harrist Church

The Hanbalite school experienced a revival in Arabia during the career of Muhammad ibn Abd-al-Wahhab (c. 1703–1791). He founded a movement closely identified with the Hanbalite perspective (though many Hanbalite scholars have not supported it). The identification of the Saud family in Arabia with WAHHABI ISLAM Movement provided an agenda for their moving against the Ottoman Empire and led in the 1930s to the establishment of the modern state of Saudi Arabia. Wahhabism is now the professed faith of the ruling elite in Saudi Arabia and Hanbalism the majority religious community in Saudi Arabia, which is home to a variety of Islamic schools, and the Hanbalite legal system forms the basis of state law. The Hanbalite school exists as a minority party in India, Egypt, and Syria.

Sources:

- Coulson, Noel J. Conflicts and Tensions in Islamic Jurisprudence. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1969.
- . A History of Islamic Law. Edinburgh: Edinburgh University Press, 1994.
- Hallaq, Wael B. A History of Islamic Legal Theories: An Introduction to Sunni Usul al-Fiqh. New York: Cambridge University Press, 1997.
- Horrie, Chris, and Peter Chippindale. What Is Islam? London: Virgin Publishing, 1998.
- Schacht, Joseph. An Introduction to Islamic Law. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1964.
- Watt, Montgomery. The Majesty That Was Islam. New York: Praeger Publishers, 1974.

Harrist Church [Église Harriste] (Ivory Coast)

William Wadé Harris (1865–1929) received a call in 1910, while in a Liberian prison for treason, to be a prophet to take God's word to those who had never heard it. The Spirit came on him, and after his release, he began to preach from the Bible about the one true God, healing from disease, and the rejection of practices associated with traditional religions. In 1913 and 1914, he began preaching in the Ivory Coast and the Gold Coast (Ghana). Rejecting Western clothing and walking barefoot, Harris wore a long white calico robe, a turban, and black bands crossed around his chest. He carried a Bible, a gourd rattle, a bowl, and a staff in the shape of a cross.

The whole population of the regions through which he passed accepted him as the messenger of God. People traveled from distant places to hear Harris and be baptized, and as a result his message penetrated deep into the interior. He sent out disciples to carry his message and methods far and wide. On the Ghanaian coast, Harris confronted traditional priests, many of whom were converted. Opposition from Catholic missionaries caused him to return to the Ivory Coast, where he was accused of intimidation and fraud, arrested, and beaten; he was deported from the Ivory Coast toward the end of 1914. Over the next ten years, Harrist believers were systematically suppressed and village prayer houses destroyed. Harris returned to Liberia and lived in relative obscurity until his death in 1929.

Harris never intended to form a separate church, and he directed people to existing (especially Catholic and Methodist) churches, but he also encouraged converts to build their own prayer houses where there were no churches; in those houses they were to worship, led by a minister and twelve apostles chosen by the village community. Tens of thousands of his followers formed these village churches in the Ivory Coast and the Gold Coast. Thousands of Harris's followers soon found themselves at odds with Methodist financial policy, their prohibition of polygyny, and the Methodist liturgy, so different from the African hymn-singing and dancing practiced by Harris. These followers organized themselves into the Église Harriste (Harrist Church), apparently after receiving the prophet's approval to do so just before Harris died in 1929. As symbols of his prophetic authority, Harris gave John Ahui a cane cross and a Bible, and Ahui was thereafter designated Harris's successor.

The Harrist movement was severely persecuted by the French administration, and for many years its adherents had to meet secretly. Many coastal Ivorians, however, increasingly identified it with the nationalist struggle, and it began to grow rapidly. Some time after 1931, Ahui began preaching as Harris had done and organizing churches, but he was still severely restricted. After about 1945, people who had been baptized by Harris began leaving mission churches to join or to establish Harrist churches. The Harrist Church in the Ivory Coast was officially constituted in 1955, and Ahui became its preacher, bishop, and later pope. In 1964, the church was officially recognized as one of four national religions, the others being Islam, Roman Catholicism, and Protestantism. Since 1972, the church has tried to modernize and has a renewed emphasis on healing and the eradication of witchcraft.

In 1990, the church had an estimated 176,000 members, one of the four largest churches in the Ivory Coast. Ahui died in 1992 and was succeeded by Supreme Preacher Cessi Koutouan Jacob as spiritual head of the church.

Address:

Église Harriste
B.P. 337
Bingerville
Côte d'Ivoire
<http://www.egliseharriste-ongapa.ci> (in French)

Allan H. Anderson

Sources:

- Haliburton, Gordon M. The Prophet Harris: A Study of an African Prophet and His Mass Movement in the Ivory Coast and the Gold Coast, 1913–1915. London: Longman, 1971.

Hastings, Adrian. The Church in Africa, 1450–1930. Oxford: Clarendon, 1994.

Walker, Sheila S. The Religious Revolution in the Ivory Coast: The Prophet Harris and the Harrist Church. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1983.

Hassidism

Hassidism is a form of Orthodox Judaism that offers a uniquely Jewish approach to mystical experience, the direct encounter with the divine. Although it has roots in various Jewish mystical texts from centuries past, modern Hassidism is generally dated from the career of Israel Baal Shem Tov (born Israel ben Eliezer; 1698–1760). A Baal Shem is one who possesses the secret mystical knowledge of the names of God and who works miracles out of that knowledge. It is reported that as a young man he studied with a mystic teacher, or tzaddik, from a secret order called the Tzadikim Nistarim, in which he became a leader. He also became familiar with the kabbalah, one of the older Jewish mystical teachings, and in 1724 began a ten-year period of withdrawal to study the Bible and the kabbalah. He also claimed to have been in regular contact with Ahiya of Dhilo, a prophet who lived during the reign of the ancient King David. His retreat was climaxed in 1736, when he received a revelation concerning his future career.

Israel Baal Shem Tov settled in Mezshbozsh, Poland, and began to teach Hassidism. He taught that each individual could have a living experience of faith, and he encouraged people to cleave to God in their daily lives. The sense of oneness with God would lead to joy, which would in turn be expressed in ecstatic dance. An approach to Judaism that emphasized devotion and piety over law and learning had an immediate appeal to many, and the movement spread to Jewish communities throughout the Slavic countries.

Central to Hassidism was the appropriation of the kabbalah, a magical teaching that had been written down in a thirteenth-century document, the Zohar. The kabbalists believed that the world could be understood through numbers and letters. Through various divinatory methods, the hidden meaning of letters, numbers, and words can be discerned and the divine approached. The kabbalah pictures the world as the emanation of the divine in ten spheres of activity that bridge the gap between God and humanity. Thus ten becomes the key organizing principle of the cosmos. The spheres of activity (sephirot) are frequently pictured in a diagram called the “tree of life.” The kabbalah had been appropriated in the sixteenth century by a small group in the Protestant Christian community, who spelled it Cabala, but it was within the Hassidic community that it became popular for the first time.

Hassidic Jews visit to celebrate Rosh Hashanah in Uman, Ukraine. (D. Mossienko/TRIP)

The Hassidic movement was organized around a set of teachers (called *rebbe*s or tzaddikim) who were known for their mystical, psychic, miracle-working powers as much as their learning. Tzaddikim generally settled in a particular Jewish community, and there a center was developed to which believers could come to be with the tzaddik on special occasions and in which leaders could reside for short periods of time to study. Tzaddikim emerged throughout Poland, Hungary, Lithuania, Ukraine, Russia, Belarus, and other nearby countries.

Leadership within the movement was generally passed from father to son or nephew, and different Hassidic groups came to be known both by the town in which the tzaddik lived and by his family name. Two Hassidic groups have come to stand out for their distinctiveness. Bratslav Hassidism developed around Nachman of Bratslav (1772–1810). At the time of his untimely death, he was heard to have said, “My light will glow till the days of the Messiah.” His followers interpreted the remark to mean that he would have no successor, and the community he called together has continued without a rebbe to lead them. The Lubavitcher rebbe survived the Holocaust and moved to the United States, where he and his successors have spearheaded the growth of a global new Hassidism. LUBAVITCH HASSIDISM has also become known for the millennial expectations that have grown up around their recently deceased rebbe, Menachem Mendel Schneerson (1902–1994).

Hassidism was almost destroyed by the Holocaust. Nazi forces overran much of the Hassidim’s homeland in Eastern Europe, and only a small percentage survived. The *rebbe*s that escaped migrated primarily to the United States and Palestine. Among the survivors was Yoel Teitelbaum (1887–1979), the rebbe for SATMAR HASSIDISM, a group well known for their opposition to Zionism (the establishment of the state of Israel). Today, most Hassidic groups have their headquarters in the United States (many in Brooklyn, New York) and Israel.

In the 1960s, a new generation of teachers from the Hassidic tradition appeared as leaders of a variety of neo-Hassidic groups. The movement was partially inspired by the writings of theologian Martin Buber (1878–1965). Rabbi and musician Shlomo Carlebach (1926–1994) was a popular prophet of this new generation of mystically oriented Jews. The most successful of the new Hassidic groups, however, appears to be the KABBALAH LEARNING CENTRE, founded in 1922 by Rabbi Yehuda Ashlag (1886–1955), but now headed by Rabbi Philip S. Berg, the author of many books on the kabbalah and Jewish mysticism.

Sources:

- Bokser, Ben Zion. The Jewish Mystical Tradition. New York: Pilgrim Press, 1981.
- Buber, Martin. The Origin and Meaning of Hassidism. New York: Horizon Press, 1960.
- Rabinowicz, Tzvi. The Encyclopedia of Hassidism. Northvale, NJ: Jason Aronson, 1996.
- Rabinowitz, H. A. A Guide to Hassidism. New York: Thomas Yoseloff, 1960.

Healing Tao

The Healing Tao is among the best known popular Daoist groups in the West. It teaches a regulated system of inner alchemy and is famous for popularizing ritual sexual practices. It was founded by Mantak Chia (b. 1944), a Thai-born Chinese who was trained in Hong Kong and has a background in both Oriental and Western medicine, as well as traditional Daoist practices. He claims his teachings are a body of esoteric knowledge, previously hidden from the world, now being made available and accessible to the general public.

Chia is said to have begun self-cultivation at the very young age of six with Buddhist meditation training, martial arts, tai chi, and kundalini yoga. Of his many teachers, the most influential was from the Lungmen sect of QUANZHEN DAOISM. This teacher, called One Cloud, gave him transmission and a mandate to teach and heal.

Chia systematized his knowledge, and in 1974 he established the first of his schools in Thailand (called the Natural Healing Center). In 1979, he moved to New York and opened the Taoist Esoteric Yoga Center. This center, which became the Healing Tao Center, attracted Euro-American students who helped him organize a national seminar circuit. In 1994, Mantak and his wife Maneween (whom he subsequently divorced), moved back to Thailand to establish an international Healing Tao Center in Chiang Mai, which caters to wealthy Europeans and Americans.

Meanwhile, Chia’s principal student, Michael Winn, runs a Healing Tao University each summer in upstate New York that bills itself as the “largest summer ‘Chi’ retreat program in the world.” This program is no longer officially affiliated with Mantak Chia, and Winn has added on several new techniques, but Chia is a guest teacher every year. There are currently some one thousand certified Healing Tao instructors globally.

The Healing Tao program consists of fifteen courses, the first nine being introductory, the next three intermediate, and the final three advanced, which can only be reached after many years of practice. The first nine include connecting the microcosmic orbit, developing the Inner Smile, and practicing the Six Healing Sounds. The personal goals of those who practice Chia’s form of Daoism are the expansion of consciousness and improvement of their health, guided by the master through the workshops he has structured.

Healing Tao has its international headquarters at the Universal Tao Center in Thailand, where Mantak Chia now resides. Michael Winn now heads Healing Tao USA, which may be reached at P.O. Box 20028, New York, NY 10014. Healing Tao USA has a Web site at <http://www.healing-taousa.com>.

Address:

Universal Tao Center
274 Moo 7, Laung Nua
Doi Saket, Chiang Mai 50220
Thailand
<http://www.universal-tao.com>

Massimo Introvigne, PierLuigi Zoccatelli, and Elijah Siegler

Sources:

- Chia, Matak. Awaken Healing Energy through the Tao. New York: Aurora Press, 1983.
- . Taoist Ways to Transform Stress into Vitality: The Inner Smile/Six Healing Sounds. New York: Aurora Press, 1985.
- , and Michael Winn. Taoist Secrets of Love: Cultivating Male Sexual Energy. New York: Aurora Press, 1984.

HINDUISM

Hinduism has become a global religion in the twentieth century. For millennia restricted to the Indian subcontinent, Hindus currently reside in some 144 countries. The universal outreach has not been only geographical. Rather, the modern reinterpretation of Hindu ideas and practices has paved the way to attracting converts and sympathizers beyond the Indian people. As during the classical epoch of Hinduism, the modern epoch continues to be prosperous and dynamic in bringing forth new forms, ideas, and practices of Hindu ideas and devotion.

Hinduism, a Problematic Term. The term Hinduism is a Western construction invented in the early nineteenth century by British colonial administrators and orientalists. The construction and usage of the notion is built on a differentiation, current in the subcontinent, previously altering its meaning according to European understanding. Persian conquerors of the late sixth century B.C.E. used the word Hindu, a Persian variant of Sanskrit sindhu, to denote both the region and the people living nearby and beyond the Indus River (the region of today's Pakistan). Muslim rulers, who invaded North India beginning in the eighth century, took over the term and used it to demarcate Muslims from their non-Muslim Indian subjects. The Muslims' exclusive term Hindu was then adopted by eighteenth-century European orientalists and administrators in an altered mode. Since all people of the subcontinent were conceived of as followers of the one so-called heathen religion, the term Hindoo subsequently replaced the previous notion of Gentoo (heathens; from Latin, gentiles; from Portuguese, gentio). Thus, all different Indian religious traditions—except Islam—prevalent in the nineteenth-century British Raj came under the heading of Hindoo. From this the abstraction Hinduism was derived, first used in English in 1829.

Since then, the notion of Hinduism suggests a coherent religion to be found all over India. The construction fails to convey, however, the apparent diversity and heterogeneity that it both subsumes and ignores. Related to the empirical situation in the subcontinent (and now also overseas), in contrast it would rather be more appropriate to speak of a number of distinct but related religious traditions or religions existing side by side within so-called Hinduism. The encompassing of diverse regional religious traditions under the one heading of Hinduism has stirred up both academic and practical problems of communal and national representation. The same terminological problematic applies to the designation Hindu, as a person who is not a “Hindu in general” but rather a “Hindu in particular”—for example, a Gujarati Vaishnava or Tamil Shaivaite, placing emphasis on specific deities, sacred texts, ways of worship (puja), religious teachers, and so on.

Hindus seldom use the notion Hinduism as a self-description, using as an alternative a term of their own—sanatana dharma (perennial or eternal faith). This term remains elitist, in particular as it is applied more to philosophical interpretations of the diverse Hindu traditions than to the multifarious local manifestations of practice and faith.

Main Historical Epochs. The approximately three-thousand-year-long history of Veda-based traditions, or Hinduism, will be subdivided in five broad epochs, highlighting main developments and changes. (The bibliography provides references to topics and voices that deserve a fuller treatment than is possible here, in particular with regard to women, Dalits [so-called untouchables], the veneration of goddesses, worship, and the performing arts.)

Ganesha, Hindu god of luck, good beginnings, and wisdom (Helene Rogers/TRIP)

The Harappa Culture. Early twentieth-century archaeological excavations made known the existence of large towns, such as Mohenjo Daro and Harappa, with some forty thousand inhabitants each, on the banks of the Indus River. It is assumed that these towns already existed in the first half of the third millennium B.C.E. This Indus Valley civilization, also designated as Harappa culture, knew the art of writing, evidenced in carved seals. The people built impressive houses of brick supplemented by a drainage system. The script has still not been deciphered, and thus the many archaeological findings are subject to contrasting interpretations and speculation. Speculations also abound in the religious sphere. Evidence suggests cults of fire and fertility, but it is not yet clear whether the many female figures excavated relate to the veneration of a mother goddess or are mainly paraphernalia for fertility rites. Seals seem to have been used like protective amulets.

Epoch of the Veda or Brahmanism. According to established theory (though challenged recently), Indo-European people known as the Aryans (Skt., arya, noble, honorable) invaded the northwestern plains of the Indian subcontinent during the first half of the second millennium B.C.E. It is not yet known for certain whether this incursion of the Aryans destroyed the Harrapa culture or whether the civilization had come to an end because of ecological catastrophes (droughts). The Indo-European immigrants settled down near the River Sindhu (Indus) and subsequently went on to reach the Ganges River regions. Their language was an Indo-European tongue that developed into Vedic Sanskrit and later into classical Sanskrit. From those early days, Sanskrit has been the exclusive, sacred language of Vedic Brahmanism and Hinduism. Sanskrit texts, some of them more than three thousand years old, provide ample evidence of the religious ideas, rituals, and culture of the Aryan people. The texts form a huge corpus of scriptures that developed over a period of several centuries. These hymns and manuals on ritual and philosophy had previously been passed down from generation to generation by word of mouth and were written down between 1200 and 500 B.C.E. The collection of texts are called Veda from the Sanskrit root vid (knowledge). The Veda is spiritually audible, meaning that ancient seers (rishi) saw or “heard” the knowledge thanks to their superior intuition. Collectively, the four text groups of the Veda are called shruti (that which was heard). This knowledge is timeless, not subject to change. It is of nonhuman origin; it was not invented or composed by the seers.

The Veda consists of four collections, each divided into four sections. The collections are the Rig, Sama, Yajur, and Atharva; the sections in each of these collections are Samhita (hymnic compositions), Brahmana (ritual treatises), Aranyaka (forest books) and Upanishad (sitting near [the teacher], philosophical treatises). The stated sequence is roughly in chronological order, the Rig Veda Samhita being the earliest text (written down around 1200 B.C.E.) and the Upanishads being the latest (composed from 800 to 500 B.C.E.). The Veda is primarily a liturgical text, being used in the ritual honoring of the deities. The central religious practice was the sacrifice (Skt., homa, yajna), in which the ritual specialist, the brahmana (also known as brahmin and brahman) propitiated the gods. Sacrificial ingredients were milk; ghee or purified butter; curds; various grains; and the soma plant. Also, domestic animals such as sheep, goats, cattle, or horses were offered by way of ritual slaughter. The substances offered would be given into the fire and through this transported to the deities (the deva invoked). Most important was the correct recitation of the hymns and mantras (sounds, verbal formulas); only the priest was eligible to perform these rituals. The Aryans primarily worshipped Agni, the fire god; Soma, a hallucinogenic plant; Varuna, the custodian of the “law” or cosmic order (rita); and Indra, the warrior god. According to the texts and the brahmins, these rituals were essential and indispensable to sustain the cosmic homology—that is, the correlation of the cosmos and man’s position in it.

In the course of time, the priestly brahmins came to dominate the religious practice and to establish their ritual monopoly. The kings also were especially in need of rites to legitimize and stabilize their power. The dominant position of the Brahmins, undisputed until the middle of the first millennium B.C.E., provides valid ground to call this Vedic epoch the time of the brahmins, or Brahmanism. The early texts also outlined the fourfold classification of Vedic society along general social strata into which a person was born (Skt., varna). According to Rig Veda 10.90,12, the four varnas are the brahman or priest, the kshatriya (warrior and ruler), the vaishya (farmer, trader, and commoner), and the shudra (serf). The classification was straightforward and exclusive, based on ritual purity. A change of one's varna and thus one's social status was not possible. The first three classes were called the twice-born, due to a special ritual ceremony. The male members of those varnas underwent the initiation ceremony called upanayana (receiving the sacred thread). The female's equivalent to the upanayana ceremony was a rite during a girl's first menstruation, performed especially for brahman daughters. During the epic epoch and subsequent centuries, this rough classification along varnas subdifferentiated along manyfold jatis—that is, specific occupational and residential so-called castes into which a person was born.

The youngest group of texts, the Upanishads, comprise the “end of the Veda” (vedanta). In these texts the change from a sacrificial worldview to a more person-centered search for “liberation” (moksha) became manifest. The knowledge of the correct performance of the ritual shifted to a knowledge based on insight and realization of inner wisdom. It was in the Upanishads that the central terms and concepts of classical Hinduism (that is, Veda-based traditions) were formulated and expounded. Both with regard to the Vedic and epic epoch, it is paramount to bear in mind that not a single, systematized Veda-based religion dominated the Indian subcontinent. Rather, a parallelism of various religious traditions and strands, at times markedly influenced by local cults, existed.

Epoch of the Epics or Classical Hinduism. The time of so-called classical Hinduism can roughly be set from the late sixth century B.C.E. to the eleventh century C.E. The shift from the Vedic to the epic epoch is based on both socioeconomic and religious changes. These took place in the seventh and sixth centuries B.C.E. During that time span, northern India witnessed an increase in urbanization and occupational differentiation. A self-content trading strata emerged, and the numerous smaller kingdoms were replaced by larger ones. In religious terms, during these centuries a variety of renouncer traditions emerged. Among the many shramana (ascetic movements), prevalent in those days were the Buddhist and the Jain traditions. Like the many other renouncer traditions, they questioned the ritualistic predominance and the religious monopoly of the brahmins. The many shramana movements and orders of sadhhus (good men, renunciators) and sadhvis (good women) accepted the authority of the Veda. In contrast, the Buddhists and Jains questioned the attributed sacred status of the texts. The two latter came to be labeled as heterodox or heretic, and in the course of succeeding centuries various means were taken either to destroy their centers of learning or to conceptually absorb their teachings and religious practices. At times, powerful rulers such as the famous kings Ashoka (268–233 B.C.E.) and Kanishka (first century C.E.) supported the Buddhist sangha (order); at other times dynasties such as the Guptas (320–600 C.E.) were less favorable and more in support of the brahmanical sacrificial traditions. In particular, from the Guptas onward, the brahmanical traditions regained their central sociopolitical status in the Indian subcontinent, as these were concerned with the ritually legitimized status of the king, the maintenance of boundaries between the social strata, and the regulation of a person's behavior according to the general principle of dharma (order, obligation). Nevertheless, since the middle of the first millennium B.C.E. and parallel to the established brahmanical traditions, groups of ascetics and renunciators came into existence. These advocated a homeless life, depended for food on alms, and minimized, in varying degrees, personal ownership of possessions. These ascetics, by virtue of their austere life and yogic exercises, became religious authorities in their own rights. To them lay devotees may come for spiritual advice and instruction as well as to have darshan (sight, seeing the divine) and to receive prasad (food from the gods). In this way, apart from the heterodox traditions, the strand of brahmanical sacrificial tradition(s) was faced with a strand of nonestablished, and often nonresident, authority of sacred knowledge and practice, based on the Veda.

During the epic epoch, both the central religious ideas of “mainstream” Hinduism crystallized and the leading gods and deities stepped forth. The separate section below will explain the main sociopolitical and doctrinal ideas, and thus we now turn to the emergence of the devotional veneration of one god (ishtadeva, deity of choice). The strengthening of the devotional, or bhakti, movement, in the southern subcontinent in particular, the expanding popularity of the epics and the Puranas among the general population, as well as the absorption of pre-Vedic and non-Aryan religious forms had their impact on this long-term development. In this way, during the second half of the first millennium C.E., the main Hindu traditions, with their focus on Shiva, Vishnu, and Devi (goddess), took shape. Although the latter often is subsumed under the former—that is, the goddess being the wife or consort to Shiva and thus forming a part of the Shaivite tradition—it rightfully can be argued to speak of a line or strand of its own. The god Shiva in one of his many manifestations is known as a Himalayan ascetic, residing on the sacred mountain Kailash. Often he is venerated in the form of a linga, a smooth, cylindrical stone. He is also associated with a divine family, his wife Parvati personifying Shiva’s female energy, shakti, together with the sons Ganesha and Skanda (or Murukan). Shiva is an ambivalent god, being both destructive and benevolent.

Like Shiva, Vishnu is described iconographically in many stories and myths in the Puranas. The followers of Vishnu (adherents of VAISNAVISM), venerate him in one of his ten avatars (incarnations). Most important among these are the figures of Rama and Krishna; they form central figures in the great epical stories. The goddess tradition is associated with powerful female deities such as Kali, Durga, and many local goddesses. The character of the goddesses is often ambivalent; they can give life and fertility but can also generate destruction and death. Their followers are referred to as members of the SHAKTA MOVEMENT; the devotional and ritual strand refers back to both tantric texts and non-Aryan practices. At various times—and a process going on these days also—formerly local goddesses may be identified with the pan-Indian Devi, providing additional legitimation for her veneration and her inclusion in brahmanical worship.

These deities were honored both at home and in temples. Brahmans performed a manifold complex of rituals, in particular in the temples. From the sixth century C.E. onward, important temple cities evolved. These cities were not only centers of commerce and administration but also ritual centers, with the temple at the hub of the town and the streets radiating outward. The city formed the capital of the regional kingdom, and brahmanical ritual and the temple supported the power and sovereignty of the dynasty. Outstanding examples of such royal-religious cities were Madurai, Citamparam, and Kanchipuram in Tamil Nadu (South India), or Puri in Orissa (East India) with the Jagannatha Temple.

Finally, notable during the first millennium C.E., Hindu (and Buddhist) practices and concepts spread to Southeast Asia by way of Indians in search of economic wealth. Records provide evidence that brahmans, kshatriyas, and vaishyas, as well as renouncers, crossed the sea to find a living and wealth in foreign lands. This process, stretching from the first to the thirteenth centuries, has become known as the Indianization of mainland Southeast Asia and the archipelago. The local courts employed Indian warriors and priests to settle their power and to legitimize their reign ritually. Hindu and Buddhist elements were not so much superimposed on as creatively absorbed by the local nobility and elite. Localized versions of the Ramayana and other important doctrinal sources evolved, incorporating indigenous legends and myths. With the advance of Islam and the supremacy of THERAVADA BUDDHISM in Siam (Thailand) and Laos, the Sanskritic culture in Southeast Asia came to its end. In Bali, however, the particular version of Indo-Javanese culture and religion has survived to these days.

Epoch of Postclassical Hinduism and Islamic Rule. Spanning the time from about 1100 to 1800, this epoch witnessed less innovative religious impulses than the preceding epoch of classical Hinduism or the succeeding one of neo-Hinduism. Of paramount political importance was the gradual conquering of India by Muslim rulers, beginning with the raids of Mahmud of Ghazni in northwest India (977–1030). Later, the Delhi Sultanate (1206–1526) was followed by the Mughal Empire (1526–1757). Although neither the Mughals nor—gradually from 1757 onward—the British actually imposed their religions on the Indians, both esteemed their religion as superior. They looked down upon Hindu beliefs and practices. In the fifteenth century, Muslim-Hindu syncretistic interpretations evolved. Most prominent among these new understandings were the concepts and practices proposed by bhakti poet Kabir (1440–1518) and Nanak (1469–1539). Nanak founded the Sikh tradition and was the first of a line of ten gurus, based in the Punjab. Also notable became the religiously tolerant rule of the great Mughal emperor Akbar (r. 1555–1605). The Hindu traditions, differentiated along regional and devotional lines, also had some outstanding interpreters such as the dvaita renouncer Madhva (thirteenth century). In line with his view, the Bengali saint Chaitanya (1486–1533) founded the Gaudiya Vaishnava sampradaya (sub-tradition). His ecstatic dancing and singing enabled him to experience the love of Radha and Krishna. In the twentieth century, the Bengali Vaishnava Prabhupada felt inspired by Chaitanya and Madhva, founding the INTERNATIONAL SOCIETY FOR KRISHNA CONSCIOUSNESS in New York in 1966. Other important theologians and poets of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, spreading their devotional form of religiosity in vernacular rather than Sanskrit verses, had been Vallabha (1479–1531), Tulsidas (c. 1532–1632), and Dadu (1544–1660), as well as Tukaram (1608–1649) and Ramdas (1608–1681). The latter two praised Hindu-ness and glorified past “golden ages.”

Epoch of Neo-Hinduism, British Rule, and Independence. From the sixteenth century onward, the Portuguese started to establish trading posts on the Indian coast. They were followed by Dutch, French, and British companies, all striving to gain a share in the lucrative trade in spices. The British strengthened their commercial and administrative positions gradually. In 1757, the British East India Company secured Bengal by military force. Over the course of the next hundred years, the company was able to spread its commercial and military influence all over India. The Indian economy was changed to mainly the exporting of goods, which consequently ruined local trade and business. English became the official language of the administration and the law courts. In 1858, the British Crown officially adopted India as its colony, establishing a centralized administration for the whole country.

The industrialization of the Indian economy was accompanied by the establishment of the British educational system as well as the arrival of Christian missionaries. Earlier on, British administrators and scholars had started to study and collect the numerous sacred texts. Charles Wilkins translated the Bhagavad Gita into English in 1785, followed by William Jones’s translation of the Manusmriti in 1789. Christian missionaries aimed to convert members of the high castes, though with little success. They strongly criticized Indian customs such as child-marriage and the self-immolation of widows (sati). Such criticism was also voiced by Indian social reformers, most notably by the Bengali Ram Mohan Roy (1772–1833). Influenced by Muslim and Christian ideas, in particular by the Unitarians, Roy formed the BRAHMO SAMAJ in 1828. He intended to spread a rational, ethical monotheism, which according to him had its roots in the Upanishads and Brahma Sutra. The society was modeled on Christian reform movements and met regularly for religious services during which passages from the Upanishads were read, hymns sung, and sermons delivered. Some fifty years later, Dayananda Saraswati (1824–1883) founded the ARYA SAMAJ in 1875. He emphasized a return to the Veda and denied the authenticity of puranic Hinduism. The Arya Samaj criticized brahman-based ritual worship of images or idols, worked for the uplift of women, and glorified an assumed “golden Vedic age.”

The Brahmo Samaj and Arya Samaj organizationally and conceptionally pioneered what came to be known as neo-Hinduism or Hindu Renaissance. They were followed by other influential reformers and their organizations, most notably Vivekananda (1863–1902, disciple of Ramakrishna), Shri Aurobindo (1872–1950), and Mohandas K. Gandhi (1869–1948). These and other spokesmen were strongly influenced by Western ideas and Christian values, making use of these in order to bring about a revival of Hinduism and an independent India. Religious reforms and a burgeoning Indian nationalism went hand in hand, reclaiming an “unpolluted,” sovereign Aryan past. These Western-educated reformers used the English language to spread their ideas, circulated texts and pamphlets, stressed social services, and criticized what they saw as degenerated Hindu customs and practices. They constructed a Hinduism based on reason and ethical spirituality, equal or superior to Christianity and Islam. Although this reformist Hinduism has acquired the image of representing “typical Hinduism” in the West, especially championed by Vivekananda and the VEDANTA SOCIETIES (founded 1894), in India itself the various reform movements have attracted only small followings. Their religious impact has remained confined to the educated, urban strata of Indian society, not reaching the mass of the Hindu people.

The movement for Indian self-rule (svaraj) grew stronger in the 1920s and 1930s, headed by Gandhi and his campaign based on the principle of satyagraha (holding fast to the truth). India gained independence in 1947, Nehru becoming its first prime minister. Based on democratic ideals and a secular constitution, Hindu political nationalists have questioned Nehru, in particular during the last two decades of the twentieth century. The nationalists used the religious argument to a large extent for the achievement of political and ideological aims. A climax was reached with the destruction in 1992 of the Babri Mosque (built in 1528) in Ayodhya. Communalism and the right-wing Hindutva policy (making India Hindu) have since undermined the country’s self-claimed prestige as the most numerous secular democracy of the world.

The late-nineteenth-century reinterpretation of Hinduism along Western organizational models and ideas was vital to paving the way for a trans-Indian outreach of Hinduism. Vivekananda’s famous speech at the 1893 World Parliament of Religions in Chicago and his two-year stay in the United States made him the first effective proponent of Hinduism as a universal religion. An idealized image of India as the land of spiritually superior gurus (grave persons) and of Hinduism as a religion of tolerance and deep devotion reinforced previously held Western glorifications (prevalent since the late eighteenth century). This positive perception was strengthened as Hindu teachers, swamis, and gurus started to visit the West from the 1950s onward. A variety of groups and organizations were founded, and they won followers among the hippies and the counterculture. Most prominent have become the Transcendental Meditation of Maharishi Mahesh Yogi; Swami Pabhupadas’s International Society for Krishna Consciousness; Shree Hans Ji Maharaj’s Divine Light Mission (superseded by ELAN VITAL); the ANANDA MARGA YOGA SOCIETY, founded by Shree Shree Amandamurti; the neo-Sannyas Movement (OSHO COMMUNE INTERNATIONAL), centered on the teachings of Bhagwan Shree Rajneesh (Osho); the BRAHMA KUMARIS; and SAHAJA YOGA.

Hindu practices, customs, and ideas had left India prior to this export of spiritual practices, however. Between 1838 and 1917, Britain's colonial authorities recruited workers from India for labor in the mines and sugar fields in South Africa, the Caribbean, and the Malayan-Pacific region. Also, laborers left India to build the railway in East Africa and to earn livings as traders there. The overall number of these indentured workers is estimated to have been in excess of 1.5 million. Communities of Hindu and, to a lesser degree, Muslim Indians were formed in the faraway colonies. The religious heritage was not abandoned, despite attempts to convert the Indians to Christianity. Rather, the religious belonging and rituals were maintained and handed down through generations. As a result, sizable Hindu communities exist from the time of indentureship in such scattered locations as Trinidad, Guyana, Surinam, East and South Africa (Natal), Mauritius, Malaysia, and the Fiji Islands.

A very different trajectory has brought hundreds of thousands of Indians to the West since the 1960s. Because of changes in foreign policy (especially that of the United States), shifts in immigration policies, and the need for increased work forces abroad, Indians were allowed to immigrate to Canada, the United States, and Australia. Furthermore, Indians had begun a significant move to Great Britain following Indian independence, and beginning in the 1950s settled in other European countries as well. Finally, because of the oil boom, workers were needed to build new houses and cities in the Near East, and many Indians lived there temporarily. A widespread network of communications has been set up by Hindus in the different places, using the airplane, telephone, Internet, and e-mail to maintain contact with fellow Hindus abroad and in India. Also, as is the case with the converted "Western" Hindus, the Indian Hindu communities and their newly erected and consecrated temples are often visited by gurus and swamis from India. Confined for three millennia to the Indian subcontinent (with the exception of Indianized Southeast Asia), during the twentieth century Hinduism has become a globally distributed religion.

Principle Concepts and Practice. At the close of the Vedic and the shift to the epic epoch, the texts of the Aranyakas and Upanishads expounded on the principal concepts of classical Hinduism. The notion of dharma started to become a leading religious concept: dharma, though untranslatable in any Western language, as it has no direct semantic equivalents, conveys the meaning of duty, norm, obligation, and cosmic law or order. A Hindu person is said to act according to the dharma of his/her varna and jati—that is, to stick to the obligations and restrictions imposed by one's birth. Birth and rebirth in specific jatis is dependent on the person's karma (action). All living beings are thought to be reborn repeatedly in the cycle of death and rebirth (samsara), this according to the cause and effect of the actions and deeds a person had performed in life. There are different "disciplines" (yoga, from the Skt. root yuj, to control) or "paths" (marga) to gain moksha, or liberation, from this beginningless cycle. The path of action (karma marga) entails the path of unselfish action—that is, of fulfilling one's duty (dharma) without expecting praise or blame. The path of knowledge (jnana-marga) is constituted by attaining scriptural knowledge and by this "true insight" into the real nature of the universe. The path of devotion (bhakti marga), most emphasized throughout the great epic Bhagavad Gita, outlines as means for final liberation the surrender to and wholehearted trust in the god venerated. Basic to these different paths is the fundamental correspondence of the all-pervading ultimate reality or truth (brahman) and the human soul (atman). To reach liberation is to understand this basic unity of brahman and atman. The Chandogya Upanishad explains this nonseparatedness in the famous conversation between Uddalaka Aruni and his son Shvetaku: the father asks the son to dissolve salt in water and says that brahman and atman are united in a similar manner. The father ends the teaching in explaining: "The finest essence here—that constitutes the self of this world; that is the truth; that is the self (atman); and that is how you are (tat tvam asi)” (6.13).

The two great epics, the Ramayana and the Mahabharata (including the Bhagavad Gita), in particular, expound on and make known the central Hindu concepts and the different paths to liberation. These epics, composed from 200 B.C.E. to 300 C.E. and followed by other texts, such as the Manusmriti (codes of law), the Puranas (old stories), sutras, and shastras (normative and scientific texts), all belong to the category of smriti (remembered, handed down). Smriti texts are of human authorship; they explain, comment on, and prescribe ideas and life-styles touched on in the Vedas. Although theoretically this literature is of lesser authority than the Vedas, it has played a far more important role in the lives and religiosity of Hindus for the last two thousand years. In particular, the sutras and shastras provide a normative structuring of a person’s obligation (dharma), both with regard to one’s position in society (that is, duties according to one’s varna) and with regard to one’s stage of life (ashrama). These two concerns together became known as varnashrama-dharma. Its fulfillment was a sign of brahmanical orthopraxy, and in many Hindu traditions this model codified the ideal of a “true Hindu life.” Smarta brahmins are especially proud and eager to follow the teachings and prescriptions of the smriti texts. The four different stages that a male “twice-born” (dvija) is expected to take are brahmacarya, the stage of boy student, learning the Veda; grihastha, the stage of householder, raising a family; vanaprastha, the stage of hermit or forest-dweller, retiring from the householder’s duties; and sannyasa, the final stage of renouncer, concentrating on final liberation. The obligations of married women were generally referred to as stri-dharma, the duties of the wife. According to the Manusmriti, women are to be subject to male control and authority throughout their lives; they have to be docile and virtuous.

As mentioned, of paramount importance to teaching basic Hindu ideas, norms, and practices to the common Hindu were the two great epics, the Ramayana and Mahabharata. Some two and a half millennia later, these mythological dramas continue to attract an unsurpassed interest. The stories and their morale are told by parents to their children, set on stage by village theater groups, and broadcast in phenomenally successful television productions in the 1980s. The Ramayana, or story of King Rama, exists in a multitude of versions, the most widely known being the one attributed to Valmiki. The main plot of the story is the abduction of Princess Sita, wife of Rama, by the demon Ravana and the freeing of Sita and her return to Ayodhya with the help of the monkey-general Hanuman. The story’s morale centers on the fulfillment of one’s dharma—that is, on loyal obedience to one’s social role and obligations. In the same way, the Mahabharata highlights the virtues of devoted service to and dutiful observance of one’s dharma. The main part of the story circles around struggles for throne succession among cousins, culminating in a battle between the Pandavas and the Kauravas. The eve of the battle sets the scene for the Bhagavad Gita (Song of the Lord), the well-known dialogue between Krishna and Arjuna. Doubtful Arjuna, who is hesitant to fight his relatives, is convinced by his charioteer Krishna that it is his social and religious obligation, or dharma, to go into the war. As a member of the warrior class, he has to fulfill his duty. Krishna, though disguised as charioteer, is really the supreme Lord, and he offers Arjuna guidance in the same way a teacher (guru) instructs his pupil. In the eighteen chapters of the Gita, the three principle disciplines or paths to attain liberation from the cycle of death and rebirth are also explained prominently, among many further themes.

The shaping and codifying of basic Hindu concepts and norms from the middle of the first millennium B.C.E. onward was accompanied by the development of different philosophical systems and the growth of so-called sectarian or tradition-wise worship of particular deities from the middle of the first millennium C.E. From around the third to the sixth centuries C.E., theologians and philosophers worked out six so-called orthodox perspectives or systems (darshana) commonly identified in Hindu thought. Each system is based on specific text and commentaries, containing logic, analysis, and scriptural exegesis. The samkhya darshana advocates a dualistic and atheistic differentiation of self or spirit (purusha) and matter (prakriti). The yoga darshana, based on the Yoga Sūtra of Patanjali (fifth century), builds on the dualism of samkhya. It focuses, however, on the spiritual discipline required for the self to attain moksha, or liberation. The mimamsa darshana places its emphasis on right action (dharma), whereas the nyaya darshana elaborates on a system of logic, leading to liberation. The vaisheshika darshana constitutes a system of atomistic analysis of the categories of dharma and their constituent elements. Finally, the vedanta darshana, like the mimamsa darshana system of Vedic exegesis, concentrates on the Upanishadic teaching on ultimate reality (brahman). In the following centuries, the vedanta system was differently interpreted by philosophers and renouncers. Most prominent among the many have become Shankara (c. 788–820), Ramanuja (1017–1137), and Madhva (1238–1317). Shankara favored the nondualist or advaita vedanta and established that viewpoint as the touchstone of a revived smarta orthodoxy. He was founder of ten orders of samnyasis (renouncers) and set up four (or five) principal monasteries (mathas) or seats of learning (vidyapithas). The leading men of these seats are renowned spiritual and normative leaders known as Shankaracharyas (masters [in the tradition] of Shankara), playing an important role through the centuries and up to the present. Being different from Shankara's theology, Ramanuja taught a qualified nondualist or vishishtadvaita vedanta. He disagreed with Shankara on the nature of brahman, the individual selves, and the world. Ramanuja was the leader of a Shri Vaishnava Order (followers of Vishnu), arguing that Vishnu-Narayana is the ultimate Brahman, his relation to the world and souls being "qualified" as substance to attribute. In contrast to Shankara's and Ramanuja's understandings, Madhva exposed a dualist, or dvaita, vedanta. He stressed the absolute sovereignty of God and differentiated the fivefold set of absolute distinctions between (1) God and souls, (2) God and the world, (3) souls and souls, (4) souls and the world, and (5) matter in its different aspects. These theological conceptualizations cannot be differentiated from philosophical systematizations; a sharp distinction is hardly possible.

Worship and the veneration of the chosen deity take many different forms in the Hindu traditions and sampradayas. To the vast majority of people, the above-sketched philosophical investigations are rather less known. The bulk of devotees engage in the recitation of the name of the deity, in praying to the various gods and goddesses and receiving darshan, in joint singing at a meeting (samkirtana, bhajana), in night vigils of prayer and song, in attending fire sacrifices in the temple or at home. Individual prayer is more prevalent than congregational forms of worship. A devotee may concentrate on a mental image of a god or pray in front of a murti. The honoring and worship can be daily, or it can be performed occasionally before the home shrine and without a foot ever set in a temple. Also, some may go on a pilgrimage (tirthayatra) to the holy spots in India, while many will attend the various specific festival days (utsava, yatra), celebrated throughout the year. One of the most popular forms of worship is the puja, the ritual offering of hospitality to a god or goddess as a most welcome and honored guest. The Brahman offers flowers, camphor, water, light, fruits, and food, as well as mantras, to venerate the deity. At specific days and occasions, a ritual bathing (abhishekam) will take place, the Brahman offering a number of precious ingredients to the deity. As an expression of one's faith and devotion, a devotee may give gifts (dana) and undertake fasts and vows (vrata). In life-cycle ceremonies, memorial rites, and rites of expiation, the favor of the deity is sought through prayer and invocations. Of particular practical importance for many Hindus is the knowledge of auspicious times according to astrological constellations. In ancient times these were used to determine the appropriate times for Vedic sacrifices, and it has become a common belief that terrestrial events correspond to celestial phenomena. The constellations are held to have a direct effect on important life events. Hindus consult an astrologer or a brahman to have a horoscope cast, providing information about beneficial and unfavorable times. According to the days and hours specified, children's ritual names are selected, marriages arranged and performed, debts paid, businesses started, travels done, and much more. In contrast to Western astrologies, the Hindu system considers the moon rather than the sun to be of fundamental importance.

Martin Baumann

Sources:

General

- Brockington, J. L. The Sacred Thread: A Short History of Hinduism. Delhi: Oxford University Press, 1981, 1992.
- Dubois, Abbe J. A. Hindu Manners, Customs and Ceremonies. Translated by Henry K. Beauchamp. Calcutta: Rupa and Co., 1993.
- Flood, Gavin. An Introduction to Hinduism. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1996.
- Knott, Kim. Hinduism: A Very Short Introduction. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1999.
- Michaels, Axel. Der Hinduismus. Geschichte und Gegenwart. Munich: Beck, 1998.

Conceptual considerations

- Dalmia, Vasudha, and Heinrich von Stietencron, eds. Representing Hinduism: The Construction of Religious Traditions and National Identity. New Delhi: Sage, 1995.
- King, Richard. Orientalism and Religion: Postcolonial Theory, India and "The Mystic East." London: Routledge, 1999.
- Sontheimer, Günther D., and Hermann Kulke, eds. Hinduism Reconsidered. New Delhi: Manohar, 1989.

Main historical epochs and modernity

- Baird, Robert D., ed. Religion in Modern India. Delhi: Manohar, 1995.
- Coedès, Georges. The Indianized States of Southeast Asia. Translated by Susan Brown Cowing. Edited by Walter F. Vella. Honolulu: East-West Center Press, 1968.
- Copley, Antony, ed. Gurus and Their Followers: New Religious Reform Movements in Colonial India. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2000.
- Dabydeen, David, and Brinsley Samaroo, eds. Across the Dark Waters: Ethnicity and Indian Identity in the Caribbean. London: Macmillan, 1996.
- Dumont, Louis. Homo Hierarchicus: The Caste System and Its Implications. Translated by Mark Sainsbury. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1970.
- Hartsuiker, Dolf. Sadhus: Holy Men of India. Singapore: Thames and Hudson, 1993.
- Hatcher, Brian A. Eclecticism and Modern Hindu Discourse. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1999.
- Hawley, John Stratton, and Donna Marie Wulff, eds. Devi: Goddesses of India. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1996.
- Kumar, Radha. The History of Doing: An Illustrated Account of Movements for Women's Rights and Feminism in India, 1800–1990. New Delhi: Kali for Women, 1993.
- Larson, Gerald James. India's Agony over Religion. New York: State University Press of New York, 1995.
- Luden, David, ed. Making India Hindu: Religion, Community, and the Politics of Democracy in India. Delhi: Oxford University Press, 1996.
- Marriott, McKim. India through Hindu Categories. New Delhi: Sage, 1990.
- Richards, Glyn. A Sourcebook of Modern Hinduism. London: Curzon, 1985.
- Rukmani, T. S., ed. Hindu Diaspora: Global Perspectives. Montreal: Concordia University, 1999.
- Sharma, Arvind. Classical Hindu Thought: An Introduction. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2000.
- Stutley, M., and J. Stutley. A Dictionary of Hinduism: Its Mythology, Folklore and Development 1500 B.C.–A.D. 1500. London: Routledge and Kegan Paul, 1977.
- Thapar, Romila. Interpreting Early India. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1992.

- Tharu, Susie, and K. Lalita, eds. Women Writing in India, 600 B.C. to the Early Twentieth Century. London: Pandora Press, 1991.
- van der Veer, Peter. Religious Nationalism: Hindus and Muslims in India. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1994.
- Vertovec, Steven. The Hindu Diaspora: Comparative Patterns. London: Routledge, 2000.

Principal concepts and practices

- Bahadur, Om Lata. The Book of Hindu Festivals and Ceremonies. New Delhi: UBS, 1995.
- Bhardwaj, S. M. Hindu Places of Pilgrimage in India. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1973.
- Eck, Diana L. Darshan: Seeing the Divine Image in India. New York: Columbia University Press, 1981, 1998.
- Fuller, Christopher J. The Camphor Flame: Popular Hinduism and Society in India. Princeton: Viking, 1992.
- Huyler, Stephen P. Meeting God: Elements of Hindu Devotion. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1999.
- Kinsley, David. Hindu Goddesses: Visions of the Divine Feminine in the Hindu Religious Tradition. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1986.
- Kumar, P. Pratap. The Goddess Laksmi: The Divine Consort in South Indian Vaisnava Tradition. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1997.
- McGilvray, Dennis B. Symbolic Heat: Gender, Health and Worship among Tamils of South India and Sri Lanka. Middletown, NJ: Grantha, 1998.
- Smart, Ninan. Doctrine and Argument in Indian Philosophy. London: Allen and Unwin, 1964.

His Highness Prince Aga Khan Shia Imami Ismaili Council

The administrative authority, operating under the leadership of the Aga Khan, for the contemporary Nizari Ismaili Muslim community. The Nizari Ismailis, as a separate branch of ISMAILI ISLAM, originated during the years of the Fatimid dynasty in Egypt. In 1094 C.E., Abu Mansur Nizar (1045–1095) succeeded his father Abu Tamim Ma'add al-Mustansir bi'llah (d. 1094) as caliph of Egypt and imam for the Ismaili community. However, some part of the population favored his younger brother Abu'l-Qasim Ahmad (1074–1101). A civil war resulted, and Nizar was defeated and subsequently executed. His death appeared to end his cause, but Ismailis in Persia and Iraq continued to recognize his lineage. After the fall of the Fatimid dynasty and the suppression of Ismaili belief in Egypt, the Persians became the center of the surviving community.

For several centuries, Ismaili life was centered upon the famous mountain fortress at Alamut in northern Persia (and similar mountain fortresses in Syria and Lebanon). During this era, the Ismailis became known as the Assassins, a name derived from their use of hashish but later applied to their practice of sending out trained killers to assassinate their enemies. Their life at Alamut was brought to an end by the Mongols in 1256, and the last of the mountain outposts were finally overrun by the Ottomans in the sixteenth century. They were left as a minority Muslim community, but they still possessed a leadership in the lineage of Nizar, whom they believed to be in a direct familial lineage with Muhammad through his daughter and his son-in-law Ali. In the 1830s, the leader was given the honorific title, Aga Khan, by which he and his successors have since been known.

During the Alamut years the Ismaili community expanded to India when a number of missionaries began to build what became a growing following in Gujarat and the Sind (now part of Pakistan). By the beginning of the nineteenth century, the largest groups of Ismailis resided in India. Thus when the Aga Khan was forced out of Persia in 1840, it was only natural that he would assume a new residence among his followers in India. Locally, his followers became known as Khojas. Here they developed a distinctive literature focused in ginans, a variety of hymnlike poems utilizing local languages that embody Ismaili theological and speculative beliefs.

The contemporary Nazari Ismaili community is under the absolute spiritual guidance of the Aga Khan, a belief that was spelled out in the 1986 constitution granted to the community. The administration of the community is placed in the hands of the His Highness Prince Aga Khan Shia Imami Ismaili Council, which takes on life through a number of national and local councils that are found wherever the Nizari Ismailis have spread. During the nineteenth century, many Ismailis began to move to East Africa and in the twentieth century to Europe and North America. It is estimated that there are some thirty million Nazari Ismailis worldwide.

During the first half of the twentieth century, the Aga Khan authorized the formation of a spectrum of institutions for social and economic development on the Indian subcontinent and in East Africa. These have now been grouped in the Aga Khan Development Network, which includes the Aga Khan Foundation, Aga Khan Educational Services, the Aga Khan Fund for Economic Development, Aga Khan Health Services, Aga Khan Planning and Business Services, the Aga Khan Trust for Culture, Aga Khan University (Pakistan), and the University of Central Asia (with projected campuses in Tajikistan, Kyrgyzstan, and Kazakhstan). The network may be contacted through its Internet site, <http://www.akdn.org>, or at its international offices at 1–3 Avenue de la Paix, P.O. Box 2369, 1211 Geneva 2, Switzerland. Several of the national councils have Web sites.

Sources:

- Daftary, Farhad. A Short History of the Ismailis. Princeton, NJ: Marcus Wiener Publishers, 1998.
- Frischauer, Willi. The Aga Khans. New York: Hawthorn Publishers, 1971.
- Jackson, Stanley. The Aga Khan. London: Odhams Press, 1952.
- Nanjio, A. The Nizari Isma'ili Tradition in the Indo-Pakistani Subcontinent. Delmar, NY: N.p. 1978.

Hoa Hao Buddhism

Hoa Hao Buddhism (Phat Giao Hoa Hao, or PGHH) is a Vietnamese reformist Buddhist movement combining Buddhism and the cults of ancestors. Hoa Hao is considered by its followers to be a reform branch of Buddhism. It does not have an institutionalized priesthood and rejects many of the ritual aspects of orthodox Mahayana Buddhism. For instance, even the most dedicated followers of Hoa Hao, who would in more orthodox traditions be monks, are allowed to live with their families and are not required to shave their heads. Hoa Hao followers worship Buddha at least twice a day. Hoa Hao altars display no Buddha statues but a piece of brown cloth. Their flag is rectangular and brown, bearing no symbols.

Hoa Hao followers believe that their movement is an extension of the Buu Son Ky Huong (literally, "Strange Fragrance of Precious Mountains") sect, which was established in Vietnam in 1849. Hoa Hao Buddhism was launched in 1939 by charismatic twenty-year-old visionary Huynh Phu So. His teaching highlighted basic Buddhist doctrines and the concept of "Four Debts," namely duties to ancestors and parents, to the Fatherland, to one's compatriots, and to Buddhist values. The new Buddhist movement was named after Huynh Phu So's birthplace—Hoa Hao village in Tan Chau District, Chau Doc Province, which is in the Mekong Delta near the Cambodian border.

Within a few months, Huynh Phu So gained the adherence of half a million followers. Also, in 1939 the young leader had composed four volumes of traditional Vietnamese verses, which aimed at propagating the basics of Hoa Hao doctrine. These works, composed in the language of ordinary speech, totaled about 150,000 words and more than 800,000 copies were distributed.

During World War II, the Hoa Hao started a military build-up. When Vietnam declared its independence in 1945, Huynh Phu So allied with the Viet Minh to resist the French troops. On September 21, 1946, Huynh Phu So established the Social Democrat Party of Vietnam (Viet Nam Dan Chu Xa Hoi Dang, also known as Dan Xa). But the alliance between the Hoa Hao and Viet Minh did not last. In 1947, Huynh Phu So was invited for talks by the Communists and executed. Beliefs that Huynh Phu So's avatar will soon descend to earth still persist among the Hoa Hao, constituting a potentially explosive amalgamation of millenarian themes and motives of personal allegiance.

In the wake of the 1954 Geneva Agreements, the Hoa Hao community suffered persecution under the regime of Ngo Dinh Diem. Only after the overthrow of Diem in November 1963 did the Hoa Hao Buddhists reorganize themselves and elect a new administrative body. Since the end of the Vietnam War in April 1975, Communist authorities have confiscated thousands of Hoa Hao properties, they have abolished its management structure, and they have banned its major celebrations. Also prohibited is the dissemination of Hoa Hao sacred scriptures.

The Vietnamese government officially recognized the Hoa Hao community only in May 1999, when a group of 160 Hoa Hao delegates convened a congress in An Giang Province with government approval. However, many domestic Hoa Hao followers, as well as expatriate Hoa Hao activists, do not recognize the validity of this congress, since they see it as subject to government control.

Hoa Hao followers are concentrated in the Mekong Delta, particularly in provinces such as An Giang and Chau Doc. According to the Vietnamese government officials, there are 1.3 million Hoa Hao believers. Church-affiliated expatriate groups suggest that there are more than 2 million.

The international authority of the movement has moved to the United States and may now be contacted at the first address given below or at the mailing address that follows.

Addresses:

Hoa Hao Buddhist Church
c/o Central Council of Administrators 2114 W. McFadden Ave.
Santa Ana, CA 92704

P.O. Box 3048
Santa Fe Springs, CA 90670
<http://www.hoahao.org> (English and Vietnamese)

Sergei Blagov

Sources:

Biography and Teachings of Prophet Huynh Phu So. Santa Fe Springs, CA: Hoa Hao Buddhist Overseas Office, 1983.
Hue Tam Ho Tai. Millenarism and Peasant Politics in Vietnam. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1983.

Holiness Movement

The Holiness movement developed in the nineteenth century as a revival of interest in the teachings of John Wesley (1703–1791), the founder of METHODISM. Wesley had pictured the life of the Christian as one of growing in grace, culminating in the attainment of a level of perfection that he termed sanctification. Although Wesley saw the Christian life as one of striving, the attainment of this new grace of sanctification was, like the beginning of the Christian life, seen as a result of God's gracious action, not human striving.

Among Methodists in America, the preaching of sanctification as a second act of grace immediately available to the serious Christian gave a slightly different slant on Wesleyan teachings. Within the camp-meeting setting, the emphasis upon a life of growth in grace prior to sanctification was de-emphasized in favor of a focus upon the immediate attainment of perfection by God's action. The result was a fellowship in which the sanctified life became the norm of Christian church life.

This new emphasis on sanctification gained favor throughout the several Methodist churches in the decades immediately after the American Civil War but began to lose favor with the bishops and church intellectuals in the 1880s. The result was that during the next generation many Holiness advocates left the Methodists and formed independent Holiness churches, as well as independent Bible colleges and seminaries for the training of ministers. In the early twentieth century these churches began to coalesce into the major Holiness denominations, such as the Church of the Nazarene, the Pilgrim Holiness Church (now a constituent part of the Church of God [Anderson, Indiana]). In the meantime, several of the old Methodist denominational bodies, especially the Wesleyan Methodists (now a constituent part of the Wesleyan Church) and the Free Methodist Church of North America, identified with the Holiness movement at the same time that the several larger churches (later to become part of the United Methodist Church) backed away from it.

Through the twentieth century, the Holiness churches became worldwide bodies through an extensive missionary program, and the larger Holiness churches now have affiliate congregations in most of the countries of the world. In North America, Holiness churches have fellowship through the CHRISTIAN HOLINESS PARTNERSHIP. Also, in the early twentieth century, the Holiness movement became the birthplace of a new movement, PENTECOSTALISM, which continued to share its emphasis on Holiness.

Holy Catholic Church in Japan

Sources:

- Bassett, Paul M. Holiness Teaching—New Testament Times to John Wesley. Kansas City, MO: Beacon Hill Press, 1997.
- Dieter, Melvin Easterday. The Holiness Revival in the Nineteenth Century. 2d ed. Metuchen, NJ: Scarecrow Press, 1996.
- Jones, Charles Edwin. A Guide to the Study of the Holiness Movement. Metuchen, NJ: Scarecrow Press, 1974.
- Lindstrom, Harold. Wesley and Sanctification. New York: Abingdon Press, 1946.

Holy Catholic Church in Japan

The Holy Catholic Church in Japan (Nippon Sei Ko Kai), a church in the Anglican tradition, only came into existence in 1887, but its history begins earlier. The very first Christian missionaries allowed into Japan following its opening to the West in the 1840s were John Liggins (1829–1912) and Channing M. Williams (1829–1910), two American Episcopalians who arrived in May 1859 from their former posting in China. Their arrival had been made possible by the demands of the American government that Japan cease its isolationist policies toward the West. Although Liggins was soon forced to retire due to health problems, Williams remained to build the mission. He led in the founding of Saint Paul's University and Saint Luke's Hospital of Tokyo.

The work pioneered by the EPISCOPAL CHURCH was supplemented in 1869 by the entrance of personnel from the Church Missionary Society, representing the CHURCH OF ENGLAND, and the Women's Missionary Union opened the Doremus Girls' School in Yokohama in 1871. The SOCIETY FOR THE PROPAGATION OF THE GOSPEL IN FOREIGN PARTS arrived a short time later. Gradually the Japanese government allowed the missionaries to spread from their original confines in Yokohama and Nagasaki.

The British and American missionaries united in 1887 to form the Japan Holy Catholic Church. Channing M. Williams was selected as the first bishop. The first Japanese bishops were consecrated in 1923. In 1940, the Japanese government demanded that all non-Catholic Christian churches unite in the UNITED CHURCH OF CHRIST IN JAPAN. The Japan Holy Catholic Church refused the union and had to operate underground for the duration of the war. It reemerged with the declaration of religious freedom in 1945.

The church is led by its bishops and the biennial general synod. The synod selects the Executive Provincial Standing Committee, which administers the church between general synod meetings. The general synod also elects the primate from among the active bishops. The primate serves a two-year term, with the possibility of being reelected, and is the chair of the House of Bishops. There are currently eleven dioceses.

In the mid-1990s, the church reported 58,000 baptized Christians and 31,000 active communicants in the 315 congregations. The church supports Central Theological College in Tokyo and Bishop Williams Theological School in Kyoto. It also supports an expansive system of parochial schools that includes five junior colleges and five universities.

Even though it stayed out of the United Church, the Holy Catholic Church in Japan is ecumenically oriented. It is a member of the worldwide ANGLICAN COMMUNION, the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES, and the National Christian Council of Japan.

Address:

Most Rev. Christopher Ichiro Kikawada
 Holy Catholic Church in Japan
 65 yarai-cho
 Shinjuku-ku, Tokyo 162
 Japan
<http://www.nskk.org> (Japanese and English)

Source:

- Koshiishi, Samuel Isamu. "The Nippon Sei Ko Kai Today and Its Future Task." In Anglicanism: A Global Communion, edited by Andrew Wingate et al. London: Mowbrays, 1998.

Holy Ghost Fathers

The Holy Ghost Fathers, officially the Congregation of the Holy Ghost under the Protection of the Immaculate Heart of Mary, is a religious order of the ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH composed of both priests and lay brothers. The order, commonly referred to as the Spiritans, was founded in Paris, France, in 1703 by Claude Francis Poullart des Places (1679–1709). The original intent was the supplying of the French church with trained priests, and the first project was a seminary. The founder died in 1709 and the order's first two members a year later; it survived, but did not receive official approval until 1734. The order began to take an interest in missionary work during the eighteenth century. Their first missionary was sent to Canada in 1732. During the nineteenth century, several missionaries were sent to West Africa.

The order was almost destroyed in the aftermath of the antireligious sentiments generated by the French Revolution. Disbanded, it was restored in 1804 but did not truly revive until the 1850s, under its new superior general, Francis Libermann (1804–1852), a converted Jew. In 1841, Libermann had founded the Congregation of the Holy Heart of Mary and sent priests to Guinea in West Africa. Out of contacts between Libermann's order and the Holy Ghost Fathers in Africa, the two orders decided to merge in 1848. Libermann became the head of the merged group.

Under Libermann's guidance the order spread across Europe and North America, where a number of schools, including seminaries for the training of priests, were established. Here men were recruited for work in the rest of the world—South America, the West Indies, Africa, and the islands of the Indian Ocean. By the middle of the twentieth century, the Holy Ghost Fathers had sent more missionary personnel (over 1,700) to Africa than any other single religious order. Several, including archbishops Prosper Augouard (1852–1890; Congo) and Alexandre Le Roy (1854–1938; Gabon), became honored church leaders of note.

The congregation has its headquarters in Rome.

Address:

Congregation of the Holy Ghost
Clivo de Cinna 195
00136 Roma
Italy
<http://members.attcanada.ca/~spilav/TheSpiritans.html>

Source:

Koren, H. J. The Spiritans: A History of the Congregation of the Holy Ghost. Spiritan Series I. Pittsburgh, PA: Duquesne Studies, 1958.

Holy Orthodox Church in Japan

Eastern Orthodoxy spread to Japan in 1861 when Nikolai Kassathin (1836–1912), a priest, arrived as a representative of the Russian Orthodox Church. He began work on the island of Hokkaido, and within several decades had converted some twenty thousand people and opened churches across the country. He had the vision of an indigenous church, and rather than ask for further priests from Russia, he began to recruit priests from among the converts. He was able to create a missionary society to expand the work and was rewarded for his efforts by being made bishop and then archbishop of the growing mission. Toward the end of the century, the spread of the church was hindered, first by the policies of the government and then especially by the strong anti-Russian sentiment that developed as a result of the Russo-Japanese War (1904–1905).

In 1919, following the Russian Revolution and the establishment of the Soviet Union, the church in Japan, under Metropolitan Sergei Tikhomiroff, established itself as an independent body. It took the name Nippon Harisutosu Kyokai (Japan Orthodox Church). Archbishop Nikolai's policy of quickly building an indigenous church allowed the church to survive the period of most intense nationalism during the last years of the Meiji regime and World War II. It remained a separate body and was not forced into the Protestant-based UNITED CHURCH OF CHRIST IN JAPAN. After the war, the church developed strong relationships with the independent Russian Orthodox community in the United States (now the Orthodox Church in America) and accepted episcopal oversight from them until 1965, when relations were normalized with the parent body in Moscow.

The Holy Orthodox Church became autonomous in 1970 under its own episcopal leadership. The first Japanese archbishop, Metropolitan Theodosius, assumed leadership of the new church. The archbishop now resides in Tokyo, where the Cathedral of the Holy Resurrection has become a popular site for visitors. The church is divided into the Archdiocese of Tokyo and the Diocese of Sendai and Kyoto. It remains at one in doctrine and practice with Orthodoxy worldwide.

The Holy Orthodox Church has more than twenty-five thousand members and sponsors a seminary in Tokyo. It joined the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES in 1973.

Address:

Holy Orthodox Church in Japan
Nicholai do, 1–4 chome
Surugadai Kanda
Chiyoda-Ku, Tokyo 101
Japan
<http://plaza15.mbn.or.jp/~fnagaya/> (Japanese and Russian)

Source:

Van der Bent, Ans J., ed. Handbook/Member Churches/World Council of Churches. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 1985.

Holy Spirit Association for the Unification of World Christianity

See Unification Movement

Honduras

The Republic of Honduras, about the size of Ohio, is located in Central America, between Guatemala, El Salvador, and Nicaragua. In mid-2000, the total population of Honduras was estimated at 6,130,000 and was very homogeneous, with approximately 5,517,000, or 90 percent of its population, being Mestizo (mixed Spanish and Indian

Status of religions in Honduras, 2000–2050

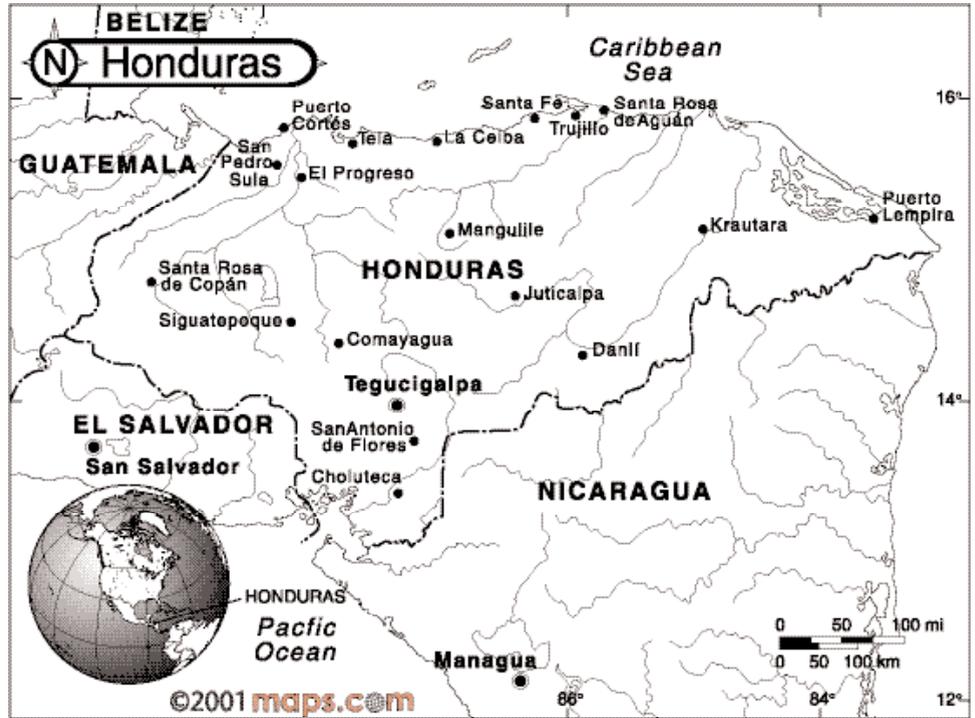

Followers	2000			2025	2050
	total	%	rate
Christians	6,292,000	97.0	2.86	10,270,000	13,265,000
Roman Catholics	5,590,000	86.2	2.78	8,950,000	11,250,000
Protestants	425,000	6.6	3.54	1,000,000	1,560,000
Independents	180,000	2.8	3.97	450,000	750,000
Spiritists	69,700	1.1	3.17	120,000	170,000
Nonreligious	56,000	0.9	4.82	156,000	300,000
Baha'is	32,600	0.5	5.02	56,000	90,000
Atheists	13,600	0.2	3.74	23,000	40,000
Muslims	8,200	0.1	3.18	15,000	30,000
Ethnoreligionists	7,000	0.1	1.44	6,000	5,500
Buddhists	3,700	0.1	3.88	6,300	14,000
Chinese folk-religionists	460	0.0	1.34	500	650
Jews	340	0.0	1.57	450	650
other religionists	2,100	0.0	2.01	3,000	4,500
Total population	6,485,000	100.0	2.89	10,656,000	13,920,000

blood), about 7 percent Indian (Lenca, Chorti, Chorotega, Pipil, Miskito, Pech, Sumo, and Tol, or Jicaque), about 2 percent African (Garífunas and Creoles), and about 1 percent Caucasian (including U.S. citizens, Canadians, Jews, Arabs, and Lebanese). There are smaller numbers of Asians (Asian-Indians, Chinese, Japanese, and Koreans). Honduras has the distinction of having the largest GARÍFUNA (of Afro-Indian origin, also known as Black Caribs) and Arabic (predominantly Palestinian, but mistakenly called Turks) populations in Central America.

It should be noted that some of the indigenous groups (Lenca, Chorti, Chorotega, and Pipiles) are Hispanicized peoples, and none of these speak their native languages, only Spanish, whereas the Miskito, Pech, Sumo, and Tol still maintain their original languages, and many speak some Spanish and/or English as well. The Miskito, in particular, have experienced significant changes since the fifteenth century due to the incorporation of numerous ethnic components (African, Spanish, English, French, Dutch, and German) into their cultural world, the result of numerous shipwrecks, foreign explorations, and pirate raids along the Caribbean coast.

Roman Catholicism arrived in Honduras with the early Spanish explorers and settlers, and it dominated the religious life of the country until after the 1950s, when Protestant groups began to multiply rapidly throughout the country. Franciscans arrived in 1521, followed by Mercyite missionaries in 1548, to begin the task of evangelizing and baptizing the Indians and forcing them to build churches in the settled communities across the land. However, across the centuries, the ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH in Honduras has never developed into a strong national institution. As late as 1990, the Catholic Church in Honduras was one of the most dependent national churches in Latin America, with a large number of expatriate priests and lay workers; in fact it has the highest proportion of expatriate priests of any Latin American nation.

Beginning in the mid-1600s, the British established a protectorate over the Miskito coast and the Bay Islands, which today form part of Honduras and Nicaragua. Trading settlements were established by the British in the 1730s at several key locations along the coast. The Miskito Indians were armed by the British to protect the Mosquito shore from Spanish penetration, while the British engaged in illegal trade with the Spanish and with Indians in the interior. The Miskito Kingdom successfully resisted Spanish conquests and allied themselves with the British for self-protection and trade benefits. As early as 1739, the Miskito chiefs requested religious instruction for their children in the Anglican faith and even sent several of their young men to Jamaica to be educated during the 1740s.

Protestantism in Honduras has had slow but steady growth. The first Anglican missionary, Christian Frederick Post (1768–1785) from Philadelphia, was sent out by the SOCIETY FOR THE PROPAGATION OF THE GOSPEL IN FOREIGN PARTS (SPGFP). Post arrived at the Black River settlement in 1768, and additional Anglican chaplains followed. In spite of their troubles with the climate, Anglican schools and chapels were established among the Indians and Negroes, but few converts were made among the whites.

Anglican chaplains and missionaries continued to serve on the Miskito coast until the mid-twentieth century. This Anglican work was transferred to American jurisdiction in 1947, eventually becoming a missionary district of the EPISCOPAL CHURCH with headquarters in the Panama Canal Zone. In 2000, there were 41 Episcopal congregations in Honduras, with about 2,900 members.

Protestant missionary activity increased during the nineteenth century with the arrival of British Wesleyan missionaries in the Bay Islands, where the first Methodist society was formed in 1844–1845. Between 1887 and 1892, the Belize District of the Wesleyan Methodists formally entered the mainland of Honduras, where English-speaking congregations were established among Belizean and West Indian migrants. During the 1930s, these congregations were taken over by a new mission agency from the United States, the AFRICAN METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH. In 1949, the United Brethren in Christ Mission (UBCM) arrived on the Caribbean coast of Honduras and soon absorbed the remaining English-speaking Methodist congregations. In 1952, the UBCM began work among the Spanish-speaking population on the north coast, and by 1986 the work had grown to 34 churches, 8 missions, and 1,677 members. In 2000, this denomination was estimated to have 60 churches and 2,600 members.

Another Methodist missionary society entered Honduras in 1957, the Wesleyan Methodist Church (now the WESLEYAN CHURCH), which also began work among the English-speaking inhabitants of the Caribbean coast; by 1978, 6 churches had been established, with about 260 members. In 1986, most of the English-speaking Methodists in the country were affiliated with the METHODIST CHURCH IN THE CARIBBEAN AND THE AMERICAS. In 2000, there were only 12 Methodist churches and 700 members in Honduras.

The Baptists in British Honduras (now called Belize) responded to invitations from West Indian Baptists in the Bay Islands to come and help them, and the first Baptist missionaries were sent to the Bay Islands in 1846. By 1904, Baptist work in Honduras had become independent of the churches in Belize under the British Honduras Baptist Trust Association. A spiritual revival, known as the Great Awakening, occurred in Belize and the Bay Islands between 1905 and 1914, which added hundreds of new converts to the existing Baptist churches. But the revival was soon followed by the turmoil of World War I, economic depression, and destruction caused by a major hurricane, all of which motivated thousands of Bay Islanders to emigrate and led to the decline of church membership during the 1920s and 1930s. Although in 1978 there were only 7 churches and 110 members in the Baptist Association of the Bay Islands, by 2000 the work had grown to 73 churches and 3,640 members.

Baptist work on the mainland, begun by the Conservative Baptist Home Missionary Society in 1951, grew to 66 churches and 1,470 members along the Caribbean coast in 1978. By 1986, there were 119 congregations with 2,269 baptized members affiliated with the Conservative Baptist Association in Honduras, mainly due to missionary efforts by George Patterson in La Ceiba. By 2000, there were 160 churches and 3,500 members in this association.

Three other Protestant groups entered Honduras during the latter part of the nineteenth century, the SEVENTH-DAY ADVENTIST CHURCH (1887), the Central American Mission (1896), and the CHRISTIAN BRETHERN (1898). Initially, the Adventists concentrated their efforts on the English-speaking population of the Bay Islands and on the coastal mainland. By 1978, Adventist work in Honduras was equally divided among Spanish-speakers in the interior of the country and English-speakers on the north coast and the Bay Islands. At this time, there were 55 Adventist churches, 97 mission stations, and about 18,400 baptized members. As the new century began, Adventist work had grown to 96 churches and about 19,800 members, which made this denomination one of the largest Protestant groups in the country. Also present in Honduras are the Church of God (Seventh-Day) and the SEVENTH-DAY ADVENTIST REFORM MOVEMENTS. Missionaries of the Central American Mission (now called CAM International) entered Honduras in 1896 with the express purpose of evangelizing the Spanish-speaking population, mainly in the nation's interior regions. Five CAM missionaries launched a pioneer effort in the mountain villages, while others concentrated their efforts on regional market centers. By 1985, there were 154 churches and 21 mission stations with about 7,600 baptized members. In 2000, the work had grown to 270 churches and missions, with 8,130 members, affiliated with the Association of Central American Churches in Honduras.

The Christian Brethren began work in the San Pedro Sula area in 1898 led by Christopher Knapp and, after 1911, by Alfred Hockins, an agent for the British and Foreign Bible Society, who later became a missionary affiliated with Christian Missions in Many Lands (1919) and remained in active ministry with the Brethren in Honduras until his death in 1978. By 1936, 12 small congregations, called Gospel Halls, had been established in the San Pedro Sula and Trujillo regions on the north coast. About 1950, missionary efforts were started in the interior of the country, and the Brethren almost doubled their membership in the next decade. From 164 congregations and about 15,000 members in 1985, the Association of Gospel Halls grew to 250 congregations and an estimated 23,000 members in 2000.

During the twentieth century, Protestant mission efforts in Honduras increased significantly with the arrival of dozens of new agencies and hundreds of new missionaries, mainly following World War II. The California Yearly Meeting of Friends (Religious Society of Friends, or Quakers) established mission work in Guatemala in 1902, and by 1912 this activity had spread across the border into northwestern Honduras, based in San Marcos de Ocotepeque. Soon Quaker missionaries and national workers were active throughout the departments of Copán, Gracias a Dios, and Ocotepeque. However, due to the war between Honduras and El Salvador in 1969, the work of the Friends Mission in northwestern Honduras was severely affected, because many of the church members were Salvadorans who were forced to return to their own country during the conflict, while other members fled to Guatemala and to the interior of Honduras. In 1985, the Friends Church Association reported 61 congregations with only 1,185 members, but by 2000 the total membership had increased to 2,240.

Although in 1914 the Quakers also began work in the nation's capital of Tegucigalpa, located in the south-central region, this field of service was administered separately and included mission stations in La Esperanza, Marcal, La Paz, and Juticalpa. However, in 1944, the Tegucigalpa Friends Mission was transferred to the supervision of the National Holiness Missionary Society (now called the World Gospel Mission [WGM]) due to serious financial and personnel shortages during World War II. At the time of the transfer, there were 5 Quaker churches, but by 1985 the Honduras Holiness Church reported about 2,400 members in 98 congregations. In 2000, this denomination had grown to 3,110 members in 110 congregations.

Other non-Pentecostal churches established in Honduras included the Evangelical and Reformed Church (now an integral part of the United Church of Christ) in San Pedro Sula in 1935; the Moravian Church in 1930 in the Mosquitia region, mainly Miskito Indians; the SOUTHERN BAPTIST CONVENTION in 1946 in Tegucigalpa; and the Eastern Mennonite Board of Missions and Charities in 1950 on the Caribbean coast and later in Tegucigalpa. Several Baptist missions entered Honduras during the 1950s and 1960s: Baptist International Mission, BAPTIST BIBLE FELLOWSHIP INTERNATIONAL, Grace Baptist churches, Baptist Mid-Missions, the Good Samaritan Baptist Mission, and a dozen independent Baptist groups. Also present were the CHURCH OF THE NAZARENE, the LUTHERAN CHURCH-MISSOURI SYNOD, the independent CHURCHES OF CHRIST (NON-INSTRUMENTAL), and several other small denominations. In 2000, the largest of these groups included: the Moravian Church (100 churches and 9,000 members), Baptist Convention (92 churches and 6,890 members), Bible Baptist Fellowship (50 churches and 5,700 members), Baptist Association of the Mosquitia (97 churches and 4,830 members), Evangelical Mennonite Church (92 churches and 3,250 members), and the UNITED CHURCH OF CHRIST (93 churches and 2,340 members).

The first known Pentecostal missionaries in Honduras visited the Bay Islands in the early 1900s, but it was not until 1931 that Frederick Mebius, an independent Pentecostal missionary working in El Salvador, crossed the border and helped establish the first Pentecostal churches in western Honduras. Early Pentecostal leaders in Honduras requested help from the ASSEMBLIES OF GOD in El Salvador during the mid-1930s. Several national workers were sent, but the first missionaries did not arrive until 1940. From the very beginning, the work in Honduras was indigenous and self-supporting, although the Assemblies of God Board of Missions has aided the work by sending missionaries and funds for special projects. By 1985, the Assemblies of God had 392 churches with 10,156 members in Honduras, and in 2000 there were an estimated 800 churches and 24,000 members.

The CHURCH OF GOD (CLEVELAND, TENNESSEE) arrived in the Bay Islands in 1944, when Fred Litton and Lucille Litton went to Roatan and Utila to hold revival meetings among the English-speaking West Indian population. Spanish-speaking work was begun in the 1950s in the interior of the country through the efforts of Mexican evangelist Josué Rubio, who established the first church in Tegucigalpa in 1951 with 53 members. By 1985, there were 371 churches with about 14,000 members; and in 2000 there were an estimated 610 churches with 18,800 Church of God members in Honduras.

The INTERNATIONAL CHURCH OF THE SQUARE GOSPEL arrived in Honduras in 1952 and began evangelistic efforts in the capital city and in the Departments of Cortés, La Paz, Santa Barbara, and Valle, in addition to Francisco Morazán, where Tegucigalpa is located. This denomination has had numerous divisions and has not grown much over the years; in 2000 there were an estimated 104 churches with about 6,700 members, which was less than it reported in 1985.

The Prince of Peace Pentecostal Church, founded in Guatemala City by José María Muñoz in 1956, began ministry in Honduras during the 1960s, mainly due to the influence of Muñoz's extensive radio ministry and the reputation of the mother church in Guatemala. It experienced rapid growth in the mid-1970s from about 50 churches (1974) to 125 (1979). In the early 1980s, it declined due to dissension within the ranks and the formation of splinter groups, but in 1985 this denomination reported 143 churches and about 2,000 members. In 2000, there were an estimated 180 churches and 13,300 members in this association.

Other Pentecostal denominations in Honduras include (2000 statistics): the UNITED PENTECOSTAL CHURCH INTERNATIONAL (170 churches and 10,700 members), PHILADELPHIA CHURCH OF GOD from Sweden (110 churches and 6,000 members), the Church of God of Prophecy (210 churches and 5,600 members), Center for Christian Formation (15 churches and 5,400 members), the Great Commission Churches (90 churches and 4,500 members), Elim Christian Mission (51 churches and 3,840 members), the Pentecostal Church of God from Puerto Rico (150 churches and 3,680 members), the Living Love Church (24 churches and 3,600 members), the Congregational Holiness Church (170 churches and 3,170 members), and several dozen smaller groups.

Overall, according to the Socio-Religious Study of Honduras by World Vision International (1987), in 1986, the Protestant movement in Honduras was composed of an estimated 2,644 churches and 645 missions, for a total of 3,289 congregations; the total membership was reported to be 149,313, and the Protestant community was estimated at 450,000, or about 11.7 percent of the national population of 3,838,031, in 1985.

According to a CID-Gallup public opinion poll in July 1997, Roman Catholics accounted for 63 percent of the total population, whereas Protestants had increased to 21 percent. Other religions were 4 percent, and no religion/no response was 12 percent. In addition to Protestant growth, the size of “other religions” and those with “no religion/no response” is significant.

Other religious groups in Honduras are the JEHOVAH’S WITNESSES (110 churches and 7,000 members in 2000); two Mormon denominations with about 110 churches and 23,000 members—the CHURCH OF JESUS CHRIST OF LATTER-DAY SAINTS (Utah Mormons) and the REORGANIZED CHURCH OF JESUS CHRIST OF LATTER-DAY SAINTS (Missouri Mormons); LIGHT OF THE WORLD CHURCH (Guadalajara, Mexico); and Growing in Grace Churches (Miami, Florida). Native American religions (Animist) survive from the ancient past and have been joined by Myalism-Obeah among the West Indians and the Garífuna Religion among the Black Caribs. Also present are the Maronite Catholic Church (Lebanese Eastern-rite believers who recognize the authority of the Pope in Rome), Islam among Palestinians, the BAHÁ’Í FAITH and a few Buddhist, Hindu, and Western Esoteric groups. The small Jewish community was established after World War II.

Clifton L. Holland

Sources:

- Brierly, Peter, ed. World Churches Handbook. London: Christian Research, 1977.
- Grimes, Barbara F., ed. Ethnologue: Languages of the World. 12th ed. Dallas, TX: Summer Institute of Linguistics, 1992.
- Holland, Clifton L., ed. World Christianity: Central America and the Caribbean. Monrovia, CA: MARC-World Vision, 1981.
- Iglesia Cristiana Luterana. ¿Los Nuevos Movimientos Religiosos en Honduras al Servicio de Quién? 1980–1989. Tegucigalpa, Honduras: Iglesia Cristiana Luterana de Honduras, 1993.
- López, Marlo René. “Historia y Misión del Protestantismo Hondureño.” Tesis de Licenciatura en Teología, Seminario Internacional Teológico Bautista, 1992.
- Matthews, E. F. “Planting the Church in Honduras: The Development of a Culturally Relevant Witness.” M.A. thesis, Fuller Theological Seminary, 1970.
- PROLADES and Visión Mundial Internacional-Honduras. Estudio Socio-Religioso de Honduras. Tegucigalpa, Honduras: Visión Mundial Internacional-Honduras, 1986.
- Read, William R., et al. Latin American Church Growth. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans, 1969.

Hong Kong

See China: Hong Kong

The Hong Kong Council of the Church of Christ in China

The Church of Christ in China can be traced to 1918, when a group of Protestant Christian leaders in China thought it necessary for the several mission-based churches to become united and form an indigenous church organization. They also realized that if they wanted to preach the Gospel more effectively, they should conform to the three principles of self-support, self-governance, and self-propagation (hence its popular designation as the three-self movement). Those denominations that supported such a movement included the Presbyterian Church, the LONDON MISSIONARY SOCIETY, the Congregational Church, the Church of the United Brethren, the Methodist Evangelical Missionary, and the Swedish Missionary Society. By 1948, there were 24 synods, 110 associations, 2,767 local churches, 496 ordained ministers, 1,448 male and female preachers, and some 172,000 communicants. The church organization consisted of national assemblies, synods, district associations, and local churches.

The Hong Kong Council was formerly incorporated within the jurisdiction of the Sixth District Association of the Guangdong Synod of the Church of Christ in China. It was renamed The Hong Kong Council of the Church of Christ in China in 1953 and incorporated by legislation passed by the Legislative Council of Hong Kong in 1958 (Chapter 1095). Members of the council basically included those churches, institutions, and schools that were originally members of the Sixth District Association, located in Hong Kong Island, Kowloon, the New Territories, offshore islands, and Macao. The council became a self-supporting organization in 1974 and proclaimed as a Three-Self church in 1980. The council emphasizes the universality and unity of the church and focuses on sharing, witnessing, and service.

The Hong Kong Council of the Church of Christ in China is a uniting church organization. Its members come from different denominational backgrounds and church polity, but they share much: faith in Jesus Christ as Redeemer and Lord on whom the Christian church is founded; an earnest desire for the establishment of Christ’s Kingdom throughout the whole earth; belief in Holy Scripture, made up of the Old and New Testaments, as the divinely inspired Word of God, and their supreme authority in matters of faith and life; and acknowledgment of the Apostle’s Creed as the expression of the fundamental doctrines of a common evangelical faith.

Other than sharing these common beliefs, churches wishing to join the council as members must also be willing to abide by several underlying principles. They must support the unity movement, emphasize democratic participation, and advocate the three-self principle. They must advocate equal rights for both sexes. And they must practice a spirit of mutual respect, trust, and sharing.

As the new century begins, the council has 52 churches and preaching points in Hong Kong and Macao. These churches offer Sunday services in Cantonese, Mandarin, Fukienese, Hainan, and Swatow dialects. There are 56 ordained ministers and 78 preachers, and a congregation of 30,000 persons. Also, the council sponsors 25 secondary schools, 5 evening secondary schools, 32 primary schools, 3 kindergartens, 3 nurseries, a family support center, and a campsite. Additionally, 25 primary schools and kindergartens are also operated by member churches. There are approximately 2,800 teachers and 58,000 students.

Honmichi

Address:

The Hong Kong Council of the Church of Christ in China
Morrison Memorial Centre
191 Prince Edward Road West
Kowloon
Hong Kong
<http://www.hkcccc.org>

Luk Fai

Sources:

The Church of Christ in China: Church Unity in China and Church and Mission Co-operation. Shanghai: Willow Pattern Press, 1938.
Merwin, Wallace C. Adventure in Unity: The Church of Christ in China. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans, 1974.
Wong, Peter. Words of the General Secretary. Hong Kong: The Hong Kong Council of the Church of Christ in China, 1983.

Honmichi [Original Way]

Honmichi (Original Way), honors both the founder of TENRIKYO, Nakayama Miki (1798–1887), and its own founder Onishi Aijiro (1881–1958). The latter, a former member of Tenrikyo and one of its church leaders in Yamaguchi Prefecture, believed that the role of Nakayama Miki as mediator of divine truth to the Tenrikyo movement came to an end in August 1913 when the kami (god) of truth, Kanrodai-Sama, decided to choose him as the tenkeisha (revealed one) and appointed him in Nakayama Miki's place as the mediator of divine revelation.

Tenrikyō finally expelled Onishi Aijiro in 1924, and in 1925 he established the Tenri Association for the Study of Heavenly Truth (Tenri Kenkyukai). In 1926 he and some one hundred of his followers were imprisoned on the charge of lese majesty, a charge that was made against and led to the imprisonment of several other leaders, including Nakayama Miki, Deguchi Nao (of ŌMOTO) and Deguchi Onisaburo (of Ōmoto). In the case of Onishi Aijiro, his crime consisted of expressing in a pamphlet, Kenkyu Shiryo (Research Materials), that the kami ruled Japan before Emperor Jimmu, the legendary first emperor of the nation, that the emperor himself was not of divine status, and that the then emperor was unfit to lead the nation. Released in 1935, he regrouped, but he was again imprisoned in 1938 for a breach of the Peace Preservation Law, and in 1939 his movement was disbanded.

On being released for a second time in March 1946, Onishi restarted his movement, giving it the new name of Tenri Honmichi (Original Way of Heavenly Truth). Later the Tenri part of the name was dropped, and the movement is now known simply as Honmichi.

Many of Honmichi's beliefs are derived from the Tenrikyō scriptures—the Ofudesaki (Tip of Divine Writing Brush) and the Migakura-uta—revealed by Tenri-O-no-Mikami (the creator god of both the universe and of mankind) to Nakayama Miki, the woman who founded Tenrikyō. At the center of Honmichi worship is the veneration of a group of ten kami (the principal one of which is Tenri-O-no-Mikoto, God of Heavenly Reason) who are believed to be the core of the universe.

Hinokishin (voluntary activity of a mental and physical kind), a pivotal idea in Tenrikyō, is also central to the teaching of Honmichi, where it often means the practice of the movement's teachings combined with selfless service to others.

Honmichi, and numerous other Japanese new and new, new religions, is persuaded that the solution to all ills lies in mind. Right mindfulness is the key to health, happiness, and peace, and thus great emphasis is placed on attaining, with the help of Kanrodai-Sama, the proper state of mind and on using the mind in accordance with the will of God. Failure in these areas leads to misfortune, sickness, and unhappiness, all evil forces that obstruct God's efforts to assist humankind. The principal goal of human beings is to build paradise on earth so that the human race can live united in peace and harmony.

Like so many other Japanese new and new, new religions (shin shukyo and shin shin shukyo, respectively), Honmichi is strongly millenarian. It is also apocalyptic in that it preaches that world war and catastrophe will afflict the human race before the advent of paradise on earth.

The current membership of Honmichi in Japan is estimated to stand at 316,000. There is only one overseas branch, and that is in the United States in Los Angeles.

Peter B. Clarke

Sources:

Clarke, Peter B., ed. A Bibliography of Japanese New Religions. Eastbourne, UK: Japan Library, 1998.
Shimazono, Susumu. "The Development of Millennialistic Thought in Japan's New Religions: From Tenrikyō to Honmichi." In New Religious Movements and Rapid Social Change, edited by James Beckford. London: Sage, 1986.

Hossōshū

As a Buddhist school, Hossōshū (Sect of Dharma Characteristics) has strong doctrinal links with Indian Buddhism. It draws doctrinal inspiration from the vijnanavada (consciousness-only) thought of Yogacara Buddhism, as propagated by Indian Buddhist philosopher-monk Asanga (fourth century C.E.) and Vasubandhu (fourth century C.E.). It intends to examine “the essential nature and phenomenal manifestations of all existents.” It asserts consciousness as the basis for the appearance of the phenomenal world.

Hossōshū is the Japanese equivalent of the Chinese Fa-hsiang-tsung, one of the thirteen traditional Chinese Buddhist sects. The doctrines of Hossōshū, together with an idealistic analysis of phenomena, were transmitted into Japan four times: First, the Japanese monk Dosho (629–700), who studied the doctrine of vijnaptimatratā under Hsuan-tsang (602–664), upon returning from China in 660 founded Hossōshū in Japan; second, in 658 Chitsu and Chitatsu brought the doctrines of the Kusha school; third, in 706 the Korean monk Chiho brought the teaching; and finally, in 735 Genbo (d. 746) brought to Japan the first complete Chinese Buddhist canon.

Hossōshū played an important role in the early stages of Buddhism in Japan. In the early phase of Japanese Buddhism, influential and famous monks such as Gyogi (668–749), Gomyo (750–834), and Jokei (1155–1213) belonged to Hossōshū. It was one of the six Nara sects of scholastic Buddhism introduced to Japan during the Nara period (710–794), which became the foundation for doctrinal innovations in the Kamakura period (1185–1336). During the medieval period (thirteenth–sixteenth centuries), three important monastic establishments—Horyuji (f. 607), Yakushiji (f. 680), and Kofukuji (f. 710)—propagated their ideas and practices; in 1892, these three headquarters came under the rule of one single abbot. Though Horyuji seceded from Hossōshū in 1950, both Yakushiji and Kofukuji in Nara each have about twenty affiliated temples.

In Japan, though the word shu (sect) is quite often used to identify Buddhist denominations, in the Nara period it did not denote the doctrinal differences associated with the English term sect. In particular, in the Nara period it referred to “a group of scholars who gathered together to study one tradition,” but their examination was not by any means restricted to one tradition alone. In fact, initially all six Nara schools gathered and pursued their studies at Todaiji Temple in Nara.

Although the major role of the Nara schools such as Hossōshū was the introduction of the academic study of Buddhism, as propagators of Buddhism among the masses they were not successful at all. Their vast depth of knowledge in Buddhist doctrinal and philosophical issues did not reach the general populace in Japan. Although two Nara schools—Kusha and Jojitsu—had no adherents at all, the other four Nara schools, including Hossōshū, attracted adherents from aristocracy. However, even they made very little effort to spread their teachings among the masses, since they were still preoccupied with performing rites and rituals for the protection of the nation, the royal family, and the aristocracy and with the promotion of culture and education. Only a few individuals, such as Gyogi of the Hossōshū, believed that as Buddhists they were expected to teach Buddhism and help the masses create better lives for themselves. Nevertheless, the doctrinal contributions of Hossōshū and other schools still continue to shape the curriculum of higher learning in Japanese Buddhist institutions.

Address:

Hossōshū
457 Nishinokyo-machi
Nara-shi 630
Japan

Mahinda Deegalle

Sources:

- Hori, Ichiro, et al., eds. Japanese Religion: A Survey by the Agency for Cultural Affairs. Tokyo: Kodansha International, 1981.
Kashiwahara, Yusen, and Koyu Sonoda. Shapers of Japanese Buddhism. Tokyo: Kosei Publishing Co., 1994.
Matsunaga, Daigan, and Alicia Matsunaga. Foundation of Japanese Buddhism. 2 vols. Los Angeles: Buddhist Books International, 1987.

Human-Etisk Forbund i Norge

Human-Etisk Forbund i Norge (Norwegian Humanist Association) was formed in 1956 by a group of parents in Oslo who had begun by seeking an alternative to the coming-of-age ceremony through which most Norwegian youth go in their fifteenth year. The ceremony confirms them as adult members of the CHURCH OF NORWAY (Lutheran), the state church of the land. Not wishing their offspring to participate in a ceremony related to a faith they rejected, the parents proposed an alternative civil ceremony, similar to one that had been in use in Denmark. They organized the first ceremony in 1951, and thirty-four youths participated.

In 1956, members of the informal Association for Civil Confirmation, as the parents called themselves, broadened their program to unite a variety of individuals who were interested in nonreligious approaches to ethical questions. Those who attended an initial gathering founded the Human-Etisk Forbund i Norge. The first leader was Kristian Horn, a professor of botany, who was able to enlist a number of colleagues from the academic and political world as supporters. They represented a spectrum of nontheistic perspectives.

The association has served over the years as a forum for discussions and the development of a community of shared values and ideas. Though realizing its shortcoming, they supported the program of “life stand education” that schools began to offer in the 1970s. The program presented different religious perspectives in a somewhat objective manner, as opposed to the Christian teachings that had previously dominated the curriculum. That program was ended in 1996 by a new law that reestablished Christian dominance in the state schools. By this time, however, the association had grown into the second largest religious/philosophical organization in the country.

In 2000, some eight thousand youths, about 15 percent of all Norwegian youth of the appropriate age, participated in the civil confirmation ceremony. The association has also prepared secular alternatives to other rites of passage for births (naming ceremonies), weddings, and funerals.

As the new century began, the association reported sixty-four thousand members. Religious freedom became a reality constitutionally in Norway in 1979. Citizens pay religious taxes, and the Humanist Association receives the religious tax money collected from its members. The association is a member of the INTERNATIONAL HUMANIST AND ETHICAL UNION.

Address:

Norwegian Humanist Association
Postboks 7644
St. Olavs Pl.
0130 Oslo
Norway
<http://www.human.no> (in Norwegian)

Source:

Stein, Gordon. The Encyclopedia of Unbelief. 2 vols. Buffalo, NY: Prometheus Books, 1985.

Humanism

Humanism is one form of nontheistic thinking that emerged in the twentieth century in the context of liberalizing trends in American religion that sought to reconstruct religion around human aspirations, values, and moral needs rather than speculation about divinity, especially speculations built upon reputed revelations of divine truth. Self-identified Humanists appeared at the beginning of the twentieth century among members of the American Unitarian Association (now an integral part of the UNITARIAN UNIVERSALIST ASSOCIATION), the Free Religious Association, and the American Ethical Union. Leading spokespersons included John H. Dietrich (1878–1957), Curtis W. Reese (1887–1961), Charles Francis Potter (1885–1962), and Theodore Abell. Potter was among the Humanists who in 1933 issued an early definitive statement of the Humanist perspective, the “Humanist Manifesto.” Other signers included philosopher John Dewey (1859–1952) and philosopher-historian John Herman Randall (1899–1980). The manifesto suggested that the universe was self-existing and not (as Christianity proposed) created. It also rejected supernaturalism and theism. The goal of life is the realization of human personality, and social ethics is a major tool in reaching that goal. A new manifesto issued in 1973 attempted to update the original with a strong affirmation that human beings have a responsibility toward the whole of the human race.

Among the first organizations to form specifically around the Humanist perspective was the American Humanist Association. Over the next generation, the movement spread globally and was embodied by such organizations as the Human-Etisk Forbund (1951), Sydney (Aust.) Humanist Association (1960), Indian Humanist Union (1960), Humanist Society of New Zealand (1963), British Humanist Association (1963), Humanist Association of Canada (1967), and the Humanist Association of South Africa (1979). Many of these groups have come together in the International Humanist and Ethical Union, founded in 1952.

Among the most successful Humanist groups is HUMAN-ETISK FORBUND I NORGE (Norwegian Humanist Association), which has over sixty thousand members and has become the second largest philosophical/religious association in the country. It began as a group of parents who wished to organize an alternative to the confirmation ceremony through which most Norwegian youth pass during their fifteenth year. The first thirty-four youths used the new civil ceremony in 1951. In the year 2000, some eight thousand youths (about 15 percent of the youth that age) selected the civil ceremony rather than that of the Church of Norway.

At the end of the 1970s, philosopher Paul Kurtz, a prominent Humanist and head of Prometheus Books, left the American Humanist Association and began to argue for what he termed secular Humanism. In 1980, he organized the COUNCIL FOR SECULAR HUMANISM, which stood for not only a nontheistic Humanism but a nonreligious Humanism. He saw secular Humanism as an alternative, not just to traditional religion but to all religion and circulated “A Secular Humanist Declaration,” which outlined that perspective. The council and its sister organizations have taken a more aggressive anti-religious stance; they propose scientific inquiry as the best method of reaching an adequate worldview and moral code. Like the religious Humanists, the council is a member of the INTERNATIONAL HUMANIST AND ETHICAL UNION.

Sources:

- Firth, Raymond. Religion: A Humanist Interpretation. Boston: Routledge, 1996.
- Flew, Anthony. Atheist Humanism. Buffalo, NY: Prometheus Books, 1983.
- Hawton, Hector. The Humanist Revolution. London: Barrie and Rockliff, 1963.
- Kurtz, Paul. In Defense of Secular Humanism. Buffalo, NY: Prometheus Books, 1983.
- Lamont, Corliss. The Philosophy of Humanism. 7th ed. New York: F. Ungar, 1990.

Hungary

The Hungarians, or Magyars, entered the Carpathian Basin toward the end of the ninth century after a long journey. In 1235, a Hungarian Dominican friar, Julianus, set out to find Magna Hungaria, the great land of the ancestors (and actually found a people whose language he could clearly understand beyond the Volga, in the territory of today's Bashkiria, a republic within Russia). Like the belief system of the other peoples of the steppes, the Hungarians's faith consisted of animism, the veneration of totem animals, and most of all, shamanism. According to this belief, the spirits know everything because being bodiless they can go anywhere. However, only the táltos (the Hungarian shaman), has the unique capability of communicating with the spirits of living and deceased creatures and with objects. The information gained in a voluntary ecstasy—what the Hungarians call rejtőzés, meaning to conceal oneself—enabled the táltos to be the Hungarians's clairvoyant, healer of humans and animals, advisor, and regós, who preserved the Hungarians's cultural heritage. Even today, a few táltos can be found among Hungarians.

It is certain that the wandering Hungarians spent a long period of time on the western side of the Volga along the middle reaches of the Don, above the Sea of Azov. Here, they encountered three types of monotheism, which coexisted peacefully. In the Khazar Kaganate, Eastern Christianity had a bishopric, and Islam was widespread. The most interesting fact, however, is that the elite circles of the Khazars converted to Judaism, even though the territory lacked any significant Jewish ethnic groups. The probable explanation is that the Khazar nobles wanted political alignment neither with Christians nor with Muslims, who both had formidable military powers in the region. Among the Kabars, the people who left with the Hungarians, were Muslims and probably also Jews; and possibly a very modest part of the Kabars and Hungarians may have been Christians.

By the end of the ninth century, Hungarians moved into, and practically conquered, the Carpathian Basin. From there they launched their stormy, marauding raids on wealthy European cities for roughly a century. Various European rulers and aspiring rulers also hired them as mercenaries against

Status of religions in Hungary, 2000-2050

Followers	2000			2025	2050
	total	%	rate
Christians	8,764,000	87.3	-0.22	8,078,000	6,871,000
Roman Catholics	6,330,000	63.1	-0.11	5,800,000	5,200,000
Protestants	2,560,000	25.5	0.04	2,400,000	2,200,000
Independents	165,000	1.6	1.66	200,000	240,000
Nonreligious	743,000	7.4	-1.00	500,000	400,000
Atheists	425,000	4.2	-1.19	220,000	120,000
Muslims	56,400	0.6	1.63	65,000	70,000
Jews	44,900	0.5	-2.86	35,000	24,000
Buddhists	1,700	0.0	5.42	1,400	2,000
Baha'is	250	0.0	5.07	400	800
Total population	10,036,000	100.0	-0.32	8,900,000	7,488,000

their rivals. That was the time when the prayer "From the arrows of the Hungarians, save us, Lord" was introduced to the litany of the Catholic Church. From the middle of the tenth century, however, the European rulers recognized that by constantly ravaging each other's domains through the use of Hungarian mercenaries, they were all harming themselves. From their several defeats, the Hungarian leaders also realized that continuing raids would lead to self-destruction. Hence, it was in the interest of both the European and the Hungarian leaders to tame the restless and nomadic Hungarians by having them settle down in a defined territory and by incorporating them into Christendom.

The missionaries—most importantly, Bishop Pilgrim of Passau, and after him, St. Adalbert of Prague—were able to turn to local traditions for support, because in the fourth century Christianity had had episcopal seats in the Roman province of Pannonia, a territory that later became western Hungary. In addition, after the fall of the Avar Empire (796), Charlemagne, the Holy Roman Emperor, promoted the Christianization of eastern Europe. Instead of Constantinople, the Hungarian leaders turned to Rome, partly because of Hungary's relatively favorable bargaining position in relation to the papacy, which was feuding with the German emperors. For Stephen, Hungary's first king, a crown from the Pope not only meant the acknowledgment of Stephen's rule but also signaled his independence from both Byzantium and the German emperor.

Religious intolerance was not characteristic of Hungarians. King Ladislaus (1077–1095), instead of persecuting Paganism, started what has been called a campaign of canonization in 1083. It raised, among others, Stephen, his son Emeric, and Bishop Gerard, the martyr tutor of Emeric, into sainthood. The canonizations served a twofold purpose. Apart from issuing mild warning to the remnants of Paganism, they also certified the presence of the nation and its rulers, the dynasty of Árpád, in Christian Europe. A large Ishmaelite population in the twelfth century provides further evidence of the Hungarians's religious tolerance. They were able to practice their faith and were obliged to serve the king only in case of war and even then only against non-Muslims. Similarly, the Jews had privileges even under King Béla IV (1235–1270); and only the Anjou period (1301–1395) introduced to Hungary the medieval version of anti-Semitism and persecution. Finally, Coloman (1095–1116), nicknamed the Book Lover (Beauclerc), issued a decree in which he stated, contrary to the views of contemporary European rulers, that witches who could assume different shapes and forms did not exist. However, while different religions existed peacefully in the Carpathian Basin under the reign of the House of Árpád, the primacy and dominance of Roman Catholicism was unquestionable.

Hungarian kings were involved in the wars against the Turks from the time of Sigismund of Luxemburg (1387–1437). After the Hungarian defeat at Mohács (1526), the country was divided into three parts, with decisive consequences, especially with respect to religion. The western and northern regions became a part of the Hapsburg Empire and thus remained Catholic. The middle part, a triangle-shaped territory, whose peak extended far beyond the capital city and included the Alföld (Great Plain), the eastern half of Transdanubia, and the lower tip of Transylvania, was absorbed by the Ottoman Empire. The remaining part of Transylvania emerged as an independent principality, protecting and nurturing future Hungarian national aspirations. Meanwhile, the sixteenth-century religious Reformation begun by Luther also affected the religious life of Hungarians. Due partly to the influence of Johann Honter (1498–1549), the founder of the Lutheran national church of the German Saxons, the Transylvanian territory soon developed an overwhelmingly Protestant character. By the middle of the sixteenth century, Protestantism had become well established in the whole country. Although Hungary was not saved from denominational enmities, in comparison to Europe, it preserved its religious tolerance. In 1557, the Edict of Torda, which takes its name from what is now the Romanian city of Turda, was the first European declaration of the equality of religions and of guaranteed free religious practice.

The victory of the Holy League at the battle at Zenta in 1697 meant the end of the Turkish occupation of Hungary, but at the same time, Hungary became, for all practical purposes, a colony of the Hapsburg Empire. The Catholic Hapsburgs launched an anti-Protestant campaign. Their intention was probably the weakening of the Hungarian nobility, the mere existence of which represented a threat to their plan of colonizing Hungary. The fact that the Hungarian nobility survived was partly due to the Protestant Transylvanian princes who generously donated noble titles, although mostly without land. A consequence of the Hapsburg policy was that Hungarian national feelings became closely linked to Protestantism, because the adherents of this faith offered greater resistance to the Hapsburgs and consequently suffered more than the Catholics.

Despite the restrictive measures of the Hapsburgs against the Protestants, Hungarian Catholics fared little better in the latter half of the eighteenth century than the Protestants. The explanation for the relative weakness of the Catholic Church contains at least three components: what was called Febronianism, a new theory of church-state relations implicitly suggesting that the territorial churches were subject to their local governments; Maria Theresa's decrees regulating the life of Hungarian Catholicism; and finally the actions of her son, Joseph II. During his ten-year rule (1780–1790), Emperor Joseph issued 6,206 decrees concerning religious life in his empire. Some of his orders were ignored, especially in the remote areas of his empire, and others created such upheaval that he soon withdrew them. Nonetheless, many traditional religious customs disappeared under his reign. His more important religio-political decisions included the dissolution of the contemplative religious orders and some of the teaching orders. Toward the end of his life he realized that, despite his good intentions, his painstakingly meticulous regulations had made the lives of his subjects miserable. On his deathbed, he withdrew all of his orders, with the exception of three laws, including his famous decree of religious tolerance issued in 1781. The edictum tolerantiale guaranteed the free practice of Protestant faith in any settlement where at least a hundred families were of that faith.

Various Protestant or Free churches entered Hungary during the nineteenth century. The Baptist movement was brought to Hungary by Hungarian workers who went to Hamburg, Germany, in the mid-1840s to help rebuild the city. There they encountered the great German Baptist leader Johann Gerhard Oncken (1800–1884), who in 1846 sent three Hungarians back to their homeland to plant a church. That initial effort led eventually to the founding of the BAPTIST UNION OF HUNGARY in 1920.

Methodism in Hungary began at the start of the twentieth century through the spread of literature among German-speaking residents of the country. Ministers from Vienna began to visit Batchka, in what is now Serbia, from where work spread to other German-speaking communities. The first Hungarian services were held in 1904, and initial organization in Budapest occurred the next year. In 1907, the work was made part of the Northern Germany Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church (now an integral part of the UNITED METHODIST CHURCH). The work was organized separately following World War I, but all the Hungarian work was, with the exception of the Budapest centers, in the new Yugoslavian state, or Austria. The work in contemporary Hungary originated from the Budapest work. It developed into an independent church following World War II.

Hungary's revolution in 1848–1849 brought about serious consequences for church-state relations. The new government issued the so-called Religion Bill of 1848, in which they disestablished Roman Catholicism as the state religion by proclaiming the full equality of all the “lawfully received” denominations. This term originates in Transylvanian terminology, where during the sixteenth century the Catholics, Lutherans, Calvinists, and Unitarians were admitted and legally “received” by the prince and the estates. It reappears also in Article 43 of 1895, which mentions a “form of legal classification of religions.” The first category consisted of the legally “received churches”: the Catholic, Lutheran, and Reformed churches, the Jewish communities, the Eastern Orthodox Church, and the Unitarians. The second or so-called “recognized” churches contained most of the smaller denominations, including, starting in 1905, the Baptists and, starting in 1916, the Muslims. The religions in the tolerated category included the Adventists, the Methodists, the Millennialists, the Mormons, and the Nazarenes. Finally, a fourth group consisted of those religions that were banned, namely the JEHOVAH'S WITNESSES, the different Pentecostal movements and, after 1939, the CHURCH OF THE NAZARENE. This categorization remained in force until the end of World War II.

Between the two world wars, Hungary allied itself with Germany, expecting the abolition of the humiliating Trianon Treaty (1920), which reduced Hungary to a third of both its territory and its population. This alliance sealed not only the fate of 600,000 deported Hungarian Jews but also that of the whole country through the following Soviet occupation since it was used to justify the Soviet occupation of Hungary after World War II. The Communist era, for all practical purposes, meant the persecution of any organized religious life. The resistance of Cardinal Mindszenty (1892–1975) and other ecclesiastical leaders resulted in their imprisonment, the banning of religious orders, the dissolution of religious organizations, and harassment of both ecclesiastics and lay persons. A certain change of attitude toward religion was experienced starting in the mid-1960s, resulting in greater tolerance, but religious people were considered second-class citizens throughout the whole Communist period.

There has been a Jewish community in Hungary since Roman times. It reached a height of 450,000 (within the boundaries set in 1920) in the 1930s in spite of varying levels of anti-Semitism. Some 250,000 Jews could be found in Budapest. Many restrictions on Jews were removed by the emancipation act in 1867, and Jews played an important role in the country's economic, intellectual, and cultural life for the next sixty years. The community, however, bore much of the brunt of the Holocaust, more than three-fourths of it perishing.

Some 100,000 Jews currently reside in Hungary, the great majority in Budapest. The Federation of the Jewish Communities in Hungary provides some overall focus. There is a large synagogue in Budapest that serves as a unifying point of the religious community, and nearby there is a rabbinical seminary. The chief rabbi heads the Central Rabbinate. Hungarian Jewry is largely Reform in orientation, but there is an Orthodox synagogue in Budapest. The strong Hassidic life that had been present in Hungary was wiped out during the Holocaust, though a remnant survived in Israel and the United States.

The fall of communism brought along the rehabilitation of religion, in the form of an open expression of appreciation, financial support, and the return of some of the ecclesiastical buildings nationalized under communism. Today Hungary can be characterized as a country with a Catholic majority (71 percent) and strong Protestant minorities (20 percent of Hungarians belonging to the REFORMED CHURCH OF HUNGARY and 5 percent to the LUTHERAN CHURCH IN HUNGARY). The Jewish communities constitute less than 1 percent of the population, those with no religious affiliation about 2 percent. The rest of the population belongs to smaller Christian and non-Christian bodies.

The larger liberal Protestant churches have associated together in the Ecumenical Council of Churches in Hungary, which is affiliated with the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES. Some of the smaller, more conservative Evangelical Christian congregations are now served by the Magyar Evangeliumi Aliansz, which is in turn associated with the WORLD EVANGELICAL ALLIANCE.

However, fewer than 20 percent of Hungarians consider themselves religious according to the teaching of their denominations. One of the consequences is that, although a sizable number of Hungarians favor the presence of religion in public life, another significant—and more energetic—segment of the population considers the public role of churches particularly undesirable. Another source of tension is the increasing number of new religious movements, even though their membership is negligible. Due to the sensation-mongering media and the anticult campaign launched by a former Protestant minister in 1993, the parliament suspended the financial support of four so-called destructive sects: the Jehovah's Witnesses, the CHURCH OF SCIENTOLOGY, the INTERNATIONAL SOCIETY FOR KRISHNA CONSCIOUSNESS, and the UNIFICATION MOVEMENT. As a consequence of international pressure, the suspension was revoked the next year. Organizations concerned with religious freedom paid closer attention to Hungary again in 2001, when a bill was proposed, unsuccessfully, to make the requirements of establishing a new church more demanding. On the whole, however, Hungary has at the beginning of the third millennium a more tolerant attitude towards religion than most formerly Communist countries.

Péter Török

Sources:

- Andras, Emerich, and Julius Morel. Hungarian Catholicism; A Handbook. Vienna/Toronto: The Hungarian Institute for Sociology of Religion and St. Elizabeth of Hungary Parish, 1983.
- Bumbaugh, David E. "The Edict of Torda: Religious Tolerance and the Rise of Unitarianism in Transylvania." Posted at <http://www.lhup.edu/International/Review/david.htm>. Accessed February 1, 2002.
- Diószegi, Vilmos. Tracing Shamans in Siberia. Translated by A. Rajaky Babo. Oosterhout, The Netherlands: Anthropological Publications, 1968.
- Hertsel, M. Y. Christianity and the Holocaust of Hungarian Jewry. New York: New York University Press, 1993.
- Lázár, István. Hungary: A Brief History. 2d ed. Translated by Albert Tezla. Budapest: Corvina, 1989.

Hutterites

The Hutterites originated in the early days of the Anabaptist uprising within the Protestant Reformation of the sixteenth century and are thus spiritual cousins of the other Anabaptists, the MENNONITES and the AMISH. Among the distinctive Anabaptist teachings, still adhered to today, are adult baptism, separation of church and state, and pacifism.

Many Anabaptists, fleeing persecution in Switzerland and other nearby areas, settled in Moravia. There, in 1528, one group pooled their property, including money, in keeping with their interpretation of Acts 2: 44–45 and other biblical passages. In 1533, Jacob Hutter (d. 1536) joined the group and soon emerged as its leader. He shaped it into a disciplined communal organization, and the believers have been known by his name ever since. Persecution of the group continued, however, and Hutter was executed by the order of Ferdinand of Austria in 1536.

Although the Hutterites did have some good and prosperous times in Moravia after 1550, persecution continued to erupt periodically. In 1770, having been promised freedom from military service among other things, they migrated to Russia. A century later, however, their exemption from military conscription was rescinded, and they moved again. Beginning in 1874, they migrated to the United States, settling in South Dakota. There they founded three colonies, reflecting the organization pattern that had prevailed lately in Russia. Each of those colonies became the founding locus of one of three Hutterite subgroups, or leuts, known after their founding elders as the Schmiedeleut, the Dariusleut, and the Lehrerleut. The leuts, harboring some distinctions in theology and lifestyle, have operated largely separately ever since. The Schmiedeleut, in a disagreement over leadership, divided into two subgroups in the 1990s.

The Hutterites lived in obscurity for many years, founding new colonies as their population expanded. In 1917, however, the U.S. government imposed military conscription without provision for conscientious objection. Young Hutterite men were incarcerated for refusing military duty, and two died of maltreatment in a military prison. Meanwhile, harassment and even mob violence were directed against the colonies. Assured of exemption from military service in Canada, the Hutterites sold all but one of their American colonies and moved to Alberta and Manitoba. The majority have lived there ever since although, as social conditions changed, new colonies were founded in the United States as well. Today the Hutterites have nearly forty thousand members in over four hundred colonies in four Canadian provinces and five American states.

Unlike the Amish, the Hutterites accept modern agricultural technology. They maintain full community of property and live in colonies averaging about one hundred in population. Each colony is led by a minister and a farm superintendent, both always male. Families live in apartments and eat at a common dining hall in the center of the colony. Each colony maintains two schools, a German-language school for instruction in religion and traditional values and an English school with a curriculum much like those of schools elsewhere. Children go to school until about age fifteen, when they begin working on the colony full time.

Young adults are usually baptized when they are in their early twenties and only thereafter marry. The Hutterites have proven to be one of the most fertile populations in the world, with an average, at some points in their history, of over ten children per family. Thus a colony can double in size and give birth to an offspring colony in ten to twenty years. That rapid growth has led to the chief recent controversy surrounding Hutterism, a controversy over repeated purchases of large tracts of land for new colonies, a practice that, other farmers contend, drives up the price of land and takes it away from non-Hutterite farmers.

Hutterite colonies are largely independent. An elder is designated for each of the leuts, and the nominal headquarters of each leut is located at that elder's colony. Contact is best made through the Web site maintained by Schmiedeleut Hutterites at the address given below. It gives the names of the designated elder for each of the three leuts, as well as the names of the committee of elders that head the Committee Schmiedeleut, one of the groups formed in the 1990s when that leut divided.

Children of the Prairie Hutterite colony in North Dakota say a prayer before breakfast, 1996. (Kevin Fleming/CORBIS)

Address:

<http://www.hutterites.org>

Timothy Miller

Sources:

- Hostetler, John A. Hutterite Society. Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1974.
- Huntington, Gertrude E. "Living in the Ark: Four Centuries of Hutterite Faith and Community." In America's Communal Utopias, edited by Donald E. Pitzer. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1997.
- Riedemann (Rideman), Peter. Account of Our Religion, Doctrine and Faith, Given by Peter Rideman of the Brothers Whom Men Call Hutterians. Translated by Kathleen E. Hasenberg. London: Hodder and Stoughton/Plough Publishing House, 1950.

I AM Religious Activity (Saint Germain Foundation)

The I AM Religious Activity is a spiritual and educational group founded in 1932 by Guy W. Ballard (d. 1939) and his wife, Edna Ballard (d. 1971). The group falls within the Ancient Wisdom family of religious organizations that includes the THEOSOPHICAL SOCIETY, the ARCANES SCHOOL, the Holy Order of MANS, and the ANCIENT AND MYSTICAL ORDER ROSAE CRUCIS. The purpose of the Activity is to assist humankind at a critical juncture in its history by publishing heretofore hidden spiritual teachings from higher planes of existence. These teachings are believed to have emanated from the Ascended Masters, also known as the Great White Brotherhood, and were communicated in over three thousand discourses given to the Ballards.

The Ascended Masters are seen by the group as a mystical brotherhood of advanced initiates who have responsibility for the spiritual evolution of humanity. The most important of these Masters for the I AM Activity is Saint Germain, who is believed to have appeared to Guy Ballard in the 1930s while Ballard was hiking near Mount Shasta in Northern California. Saint Germain declared Ballard to be the Messenger of the Great White Brotherhood for the Seventh Golden Age, a coming millennial era of eternal perfection and spiritual realization. Ballard's description of his calling to messengerhood and of the teachings he received during his encounters with Saint Germain was published in 1934 under the titles Unveiled Mysteries and The Magic Presence. Ballard used the pen name Godfre Ray King in these titles. He published other discourses from the Ascended Masters in The I AM Discourses (1936). These three titles continue to be the core of teaching materials for the Activity.

The parent organization for the I AM Activity is the Saint Germain Foundation, which was led by Guy Ballard until 1939 and by Edna Ballard until 1971. Since 1971 the foundation, with its worldwide headquarters in Schaumburg, Illinois (a Chicago suburb), has been guided by a board of directors. The board oversees both the foundation and the Saint Germain Press. The press claims that it publishes the Ascended Masters' words in their original form, free from the revisions that have occurred in I AM Activity spin-off organizations such as the Bridge to Spiritual Freedom, Summit Lighthouse, and CHURCH UNIVERSAL AND TRIUMPHANT. Among the press's offerings are complete editions of the Ballards' books, audio books and radio broadcasts on cassette tape, contemplation music, and paintings of the Ascended Masters. The press maintains an Internet site at <http://www.saintgermainpress.com>. The Saint Germain Foundation is represented throughout the world by three hundred local groups identified as "I AM" sanctuaries, "I AM" temples, "I AM" study groups, or "I AM" reading rooms. These groups are fully autonomous but are chartered by the Saint Germain Foundation's board.

The basic teachings of the Activity include knowledge of the "Mighty I AM Presence," the use of God's creative name, the "I AM," and the use of the Violet Flame. The "Mighty I AM Presence" is the individualized presence of God in each person. It can be contacted and attuned to in quiet meditation and can be used to create positive outer conditions through the practices of affirmation and decreeing. Affirmations are short sentences that affirm an ideal spiritual state and give thanks for blessings to come. In decreeing, a person calls forth the visible manifestation of a spiritual condition or seeks to dissolve a negative condition using the Name of God, "I AM." Through progressive attunement with the God Presence Within, a person can balance out negative karma and gain Ascension back to a state of Divine Realization. The most powerful dictation calls on the Violet Consuming Flame, a highly charged spiritual force revealed by Saint Germain, to pass through the body and around it, thereby clearing a person's spiritual and physical bodies from past imperfections.

The Saint Germain Foundation has always affirmed the special role of the United States in bringing the Seventh Golden Age to fruition. It is highly patriotic and proudly displays the American flag at its worship centers and during special events such as the "I AM COME!" pageant that is presented annually at the G. W. Ballard Amphitheater in Mount Shasta, California. The pageant was created, produced, and directed, beginning in 1950, by Edna Ballard. It presents the life of Jesus and focuses on the Gospel miracles and the Ascension. The I AM Religious Activity is the oldest and most conservative of the groups that have their roots in the work of the Ballards.

Address:

Saint Germain Foundation
1120 Stonehedge Dr.
Schaumburg, IL 60194
<http://saintgermainfoundation.com>

Phillip Charles Lucas

Sources:

King, Godfre Ray. The Magic Presence. Chicago: Saint Germain Press, 1935.

———. Unveiled Mysteries. Chicago: Saint Germain Press, 1934.
 Saint Germain. The "I AM" Discourses. Chicago: Saint Germain Press, 1935.

Ibadhi Islam

The Ibadhites, who constitute the major Muslim group in the state of Oman, continue into the present emphases originally championed by the now defunct Kharijites, a group that emerged as the Muslim community was still maturing in the seventh century C.E. The prophet Muhammad was succeeded by a succession of close followers who were appointed to the office of caliph and led in the growth of the Arab Muslim Empire. Some of the early followers of Islam felt that the growth had come at the price of bringing many into the faith who did not even accept the bare essentials of belief and practice, the so-called Five Pillars—acceptance of Allah and his prophet Muhammad, Fasting, Alms-giving, the Pilgrimage to Mecca, and Jihad (holy war). The Khariji (or successionists) argued that the new converts must live exemplary lives or forfeit their right to be called Muslims.

Caliph Uthman (644–656) opposed the Kharijite position and in its stead favored the position of another group, the Murji'ah, who argued that one must withhold judgment on any individual's moral laxity and leave that judgment to Allah in the next life. Those who broke the provisions of the Muslim law (the sharia) were to be punished appropriately, but their status as Muslims was not to be called into question. The issue reached a new level when Uthman was himself accused of stealing money. The Kharijites argued that he was henceforth not a Muslim and demanded his ouster from office. Uthman was subsequently killed during a Kharijite riot in Mecca.

Uthman was succeeded by Ali ibn Abi Talib (d. 661), the Prophet's son-in-law. The Kharijites were most supportive of Ali, but withdrew their support when he attempted to reconcile his rulership with the challenge from the Umayyads, who eventually established themselves in the caliphate. The Kharijites accused Ali of compromising with evil and turned against him. Most were killed when Ali defeated them, but a small number survived to keep the Kharijite vision alive.

In the meantime, a half century earlier, Islam had spread to Oman. About 630, Amr Ibn al-As took a letter from the Prophet to the two brothers who ruled Oman jointly at that time. They embraced Islam and then became allies in the Arab conquest of Persia. The connection to the Kharijites came through Abdullah ibn Ibadh, a seventh-century Omani who shared many of the Kharijite beliefs. In the eighth century, an effort arose to transform Oman into an ideal Muslim country along the lines of Kharijite principles. Also, it was decided that an imam would be chosen to lead the community.

The first Ibadhi Imam, Julanda bin Mas'ud, was elected in 751. He died in battle soon afterward and not until 801 was a successor, Warith bin Kaab, named. The final establishment of the imamate was followed by a period of peace, stability, and prosperity that lasted for some three centuries. Sohar emerged as one of the great seaports in the Muslim world, and the Omanis became responsible for the spread of Islam to the countries farther west (North Africa) and south (along the African coast).

The Ibadhis are distinguished by their creation of an allegorical interpretation of most of the anthropomorphic images in the Qu'ran, especially statements about Allah, paradise, and the doctrines concerning the last days. Thus they believe that the coming day of resurrection, for example, should be understood as the gradual coming of Allah's order on earth. They are most concerned with the commission of major sins (things forbidden in the Qu'ran) and believe that such sins must be repented of in this life, or the person will not be able to enter paradise. There are a variety of differences between the Ibadhis and the Sunnis on particulars in regard to prayer and fasting.

The Ibadhis trace their history to the Kharijites, but consider some Kharijite opinions too extreme. Most importantly, Ibadhis do not believe that sinful Muslims are not Muslims. They use the term kufri ni'mah (roughly, ungrateful) to designate Muslims who commit major sins or fail to practice the faith they profess.

The great majority of Ibadhis reside in Oman. The sultan serves as head of the community, and its administration and coordination is carried out through the government's Ministry of Awqaf (endowments) and Religious Affairs. The endowment moneys are administered by the ministry for the upkeep of mosques and for the benefit of the community. The ministry also oversees Muslim schools, coordinates travel to Mecca for pilgrims, and makes provisions for the observation of the annual fast of Ramadan. The ministry headquarters are in Muscat. Smaller communities of Ibadhis reside in Zanzibar, Algeria, Tunisia, and Libya. An unofficial but helpful Internet site on Ibadhis can be accessed at <http://www.angelfire.com/ok5/ibadhiyah/index.html>.

Sources:

- Ennami, Amr Khalifa. Al-Ibadhiyah. Muscat: Ministry of Awqaf and Religious Affairs, Sultanate of Oman, n.d.
 Lewicki, T. "The Ibadhites in Arabia and Africa." Journal of World History 13, 1 (1971): 51–131.
 Maamiry, A. H. Oman and Ibadhism. New Delhi: Lancers Books, 1989.
 Wilkinson, J. C. The Imamate Tradition of Oman. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1987.

Iceland

Although formally integrated into mainstream Western religious traditions, religious life in Iceland from the period of the Settlement to the present has had unique characteristics that can be easily misunderstood by outsiders. The Icelandic case is particularly valuable for comparative studies because Iceland has undergone rapid, thorough modernization, but it does not have—and never has had—racial-ethnic diversity, regionalism, or rigid status hierarchies. In addition, the absence of a pre-European native population means that there is not a double layer of cultural traditions that have intertwined and must now be carefully dissected. It has undergone, as has the rest of the modern world, a rural-urban transition. Unlike the rest of the West, however, this was not a transition from village to city, but from individual farmsteads to cities and towns. Iceland has also undergone the important transition from colony to nation. From the standpoint of the history of religions, too, Iceland has not only in the past been relatively isolated from events affecting the world-system, but also is one of the few thoroughly Protestant sociocultural systems not to have been exposed at one point or another to Calvinism or post-Puritan piety. If we are careful to note the distinction that sociologist Max Weber has made between the traditionalist Lutheran and the modernist Calvinist contributions to the Protestant ethic, much of the paradoxical character of the Icelandic religion-society-culture complex is rendered comprehensible.

Although there may well have been Christian monks from Ireland in Iceland in the eighth century, they had fled by 874 C.E., when Ingólfur Arnarson cast overboard his high-seat pillars, consecrated to the Nordic gods, and vowed to settle where they came ashore. Yet it is also clear from the ancient documents of Iceland (Edda and Saga) that the early settlers included both atheists and persons who might at least have had rudimentary Christian persuasions.

The story of Iceland's conversion to Christianity in 1000 is unique in the annals of the faith. It is also a paradigm for the study of Icelandic religious consciousness. A conflict had been brewing between the independent pagan Icelanders and Ólafur Tryggvason, the king of Norway, who had accepted the Christian faith and subsequently took upon himself the obligation to bring the Icelanders under the sway of the new teaching. The stage was set for a poten-

Status of religions in Iceland, 2000-2050

Followers	2000			2025	2050
	total	%	rate
Christians	273,000	97.2	0.92	315,000	323,000
Protestants	250,000	89.1	0.86	286,000	289,000
Independents	11,000	3.9	-0.09	12,000	12,000
Roman Catholics	2,900	1.0	2.13	4,000	6,000
Nonreligious	3,900	1.4	4.38	8,000	11,000
Spiritists	1,300	0.5	1.07	2,000	2,500
Atheists	1,100	0.4	1.10	1,300	1,400
Baha'is	800	0.3	3.83	800	1,000
Ethnoreligionists	270	0.1	1.50	400	600
Hindus	170	0.1	1.20	250	400
Muslims	60	0.0	1.14	100	150
other religionists	270	0.1	4.02	300	550
Total population	281,000	100.0	0.98	328,000	341,000

tial confrontation at Alþingi (the Icelandic parliament), as Christian and pagan parties each began to gather strength, and as each declared that it would not live under the law of the other. The Christians then chose Hallur Þorsteinsson (Síðu-Hallur) to proclaim their law. However, apparently unwilling to be responsible for dividing the people, he instead brought the question before the Lawspeaker, Þorgeir Ljósvetningagoði, himself a pagan, whom the pagan party had already authorized to speak on its behalf. Þorgeir took the case and then went "under the cloak": He lay down for a day and a night, pulled his cloak over him, and spoke to nobody, nor did anybody speak to him, probably in an attempt to attain hidden knowledge in some ancient pagan tradition. When he finally mounted Law Rock to deliver his decision, it was for conversion, but with a series of limitations, one of which was that the worship of the old gods could continue in private.

Iceland accepted Christianity by a freely taken decision that weighed the options in light of international political and economic considerations but also in terms of domestic tranquility. Iceland became a vassal state to the king of Norway in the thirteenth century and was passed to Denmark in the fourteenth. Formally, then, it was part of the Western (ROMAN CATHOLIC) CHURCH until the time of the Reformation. But even the old church's strictures lay rather lightly in Iceland. For instance, when Iceland was required to submit to Danish Lutheranism, the principal holdout for Catholicism was Jón Arason, the Bishop of Hólar. The effect was a rebellion and martyrdom for Jón, but the twist of Icelandic irony that slides in here was that the leaders of the rebellion were Jón's sons. In short, in spite of the officially "absolute" imposition of celibacy upon the higher clergy by the First Lateran Council in 1123, the defender of the Catholic position against Lutheranism four hundred years later in Iceland was a bishop living openly in the married state, and his sons were national heroes. As was true with the Scandinavian reformation generally, ecclesiastical changes were minimal: Monasteries were abolished, but vestments and a formal sung liturgy were retained, with many of the clergy simply continuing in their parishes as before.

One crucial concession for Icelandic history was obtained at this point: namely, that conducting worship in the common tongue meant the use of Icelandic, not Danish. This decision made the church the central institution for a distinctively national life-world for Iceland during the colonial period.

Religion in Iceland has historically been a matter of the hearth. The home was the principal place of worship and teaching, with the church building serving primarily as the focal point for central life events. In this sense, every trip to church was a pilgrimage. Since Iceland was not a village but a farm society, the church was not the quasi-political center of village life, but the pilgrimage center of family life. Particularly important for the development of a distinct Icelandic spirituality was the institution known as kvöldvaka, or the "evening wake," born of a combination of Iceland's literary cultural heritage, which made reading a valued pursuit, and cosmological circumstance: The winter noonday moon, the concomitant of the "midnight sun" touted by today's summer tour brochures, provided many hours to while away. Kvöldvaka was at once church, school, and theater for each farmstead. It also provided the vital link between saga consciousness and modernity, mediated by Christian literature.

Iceland obtained internal freedom from Denmark in 1874, and changes came to its religious life. The birth of institutionalized "religious freedom" was occasioned by the CHURCH OF JESUS CHRIST OF LATTER-DAY SAINTS in the Westman Islands—a saga recounted in the form of a historical novel, Independent People, by Iceland's Nobel laureate, Halldór Laxness. Beginning in 1905 there was also a series of dramatic spiritualistic phenomena associated with the "boy medium," Indriði Indriðason, and uniquely among mainstream Western Christian traditions, spiritualistic theory and practice were integrated into sectors of the Lutheran state church, so much so that it has been estimated that half the Icelandic clergy by the mid-1930s were sympathetic to SPIRITUALISM, and when they were first allowed to elect their own bishop in 1938, they chose a man sympathetic to the spiritualist movement. Icelandic Spiritualism makes the case that Iceland's tradition of spiritual phenomena stretching back to and through the conversion experience at Law Rock—a tradition described in the book as "saga consciousness"—provided a cultural substructure for distinctly modern innovations of "new men" at the helm of Icelandic society in the church, journalism, and politics. Later in the twentieth century spiritualist influences in the national church seem to have waned into obscurity.

But Spiritualism and Mormonism are not the only "new religions" to have appeared in Iceland. Nýall, a unique Icelandic religion, founded by Dr. Helgi Pjeturss in about 1919, combined elements of Spiritualism, Theosophy, Icelandic nationalism, Eddic poetry and the sagas, and the latest scientific research of the period. It antedated both the CHURCH OF SCIENTOLOGY and the flying saucer religions, but included elements that later appeared in each. The THEOSOPHICAL SOCIETY also had a wide following; indeed, it had the highest per capita membership in the Icelandic population of any nation in the world in 1947. Beginning in 1972 an Icelandic neo-pagan religion, Ásatrú, applied for legal status as a registered religious body, and in 1973, official recognition was granted. The Chief Godi was hence a legitimate "minister of religion" in the state's eyes, and the Ásatrúarmenn receive tax support in ratio to their numbers, which at this time is between two and three hundred, or about 0.1 percent of the population.

The great majority of the country's population remains in the state church, the EVANGELICAL LUTHERAN CHURCH IN ICELAND. Weekly practice remains the province of a small minority, but baptisms, confirmations, weddings, and funerals retain historic significance, with participation at rates running from 75 to 99 percent of the population. There is also a Free Lutheran Church with a few congregations. The principal distinction between the two is the method by which pastors are selected. In the state church, the entire geographical parish (but not those who are members of other religious bodies) may vote on the selection of a new pastor (who is paid by the state), regardless of their participation in the affairs of the church, whereas the selection of pastors among Free Lutherans is limited to active church members (who also pay the pastor's salary). Free Lutheran pastors, however, remain part of the pastors' synod of the state church. The Roman Catholic Church has had a renewed presence since the turn of the twentieth century, with a cathedral and resident bishop. There are also groups of the Pentecostals, BAHÁ'Í FAITH, SEVENTH-DAY ADVENTIST CHURCH, CHRISTIAN BROTHERS, and JEHOVAH'S WITNESSES; recent immigration has also brought new immigrant Buddhists and Muslims.

William H. Swatos Jr.

Sources:

Aðalsteinsson, Jón Hnefill. Under the Cloak. Stockholm: Almqvist and Wiksell, 1978.

Hjálmarsson, Jón R. History of Iceland: From the Settlement to the Present Day. Reykjavik, Iceland: Iceland Review, 1993.

Hood, John F. C. Icelandic Church Saga. London: S.P.C.K., 1946.

Swatos, William H., Jr., and Loftur Reimar Gissurarson. Icelandic Spiritualism: Mediumship and Modernity in Iceland. New Brunswick, NJ: Transaction, 1996.

———. "Pagus et urbanus in Iceland: Conjunctions and Disjunctions in Neo-Pagan Religion." In Alternative Religions among European Youth, edited by Luigi Tomasi. Aldershot, UK: Ashgate, 1999.

Iglesia ni Cristo [Church of Christ]

Felix Manalo Isugan (1886–1963), born to a Roman Catholic family in the Philippines, subsequently joined successively the Methodist Church, the CHRISTIAN CHURCHES AND CHURCHES OF CHRIST, and the SEVENTH-DAY ADVENTIST CHURCH. In 1913, however, he felt called by God to establish his own church, which was officially incorporated on July 27, 1914 (its coinciding with the beginning of World War I was later interpreted as a prophetic sign). The name Manalo gave to his church was simply Iglesia ni Cristo (Church of Christ), but its followers are known as Manalists in the Philippines. Although beginnings were difficult, a spectacular expansion followed in the wake of World War II. Membership in the Philippines currently exceeds 500,000. Smaller constituencies also exist in Europe (5,300 members, with regional headquarters in Italy) and the United States.

The Iglesia ni Cristo is very critical of the ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH (the majority church in the Philippines), and firmly believes itself to be the one true church. Following a prophetic tradition in the Philippines, Manalo is venerated as the sugo, or the last prophet of God, as well as the angel from the East mentioned in Revelation 7. Manalists reject the traditional doctrine of the Trinity as potentially polytheistic, believing that Jesus Christ played a messianic role but not that he was "God himself." They are also conditionalist, and do not believe in the immortality of the soul, which in their view remains "sleeping" in the grave until the Last Judgment (a doctrine derived from Seventh-day Adventists). Manalists give a literal interpretation to the Biblical command not to eat blood, a serious matter in the Philippines where a popular dish known as dinuguan is prepared with cooked animal blood. An international journal in English distributed by the church carries the title God's Message. The international headquarters is located in Quezon City in the Philippines, and the headquarters for international missions is situated at 1617 Southgate Avenue, Dale City, California 94015. There is no international Web site.

Address:

1, Central Ave.
New Era, Diliman
Quezon City, 1107
Philippines

Massimo Introvigne, PierLuigi Zoccatelli, and Verónica Roldán

Sources:

Tuggi, A. Leonard. Iglesia ni Cristo: A Study in Independent Church Dynamics. Quezon City: Conservative Baptist Publishing, 1976.

———. "Iglesia ni Cristo: An Angel and His Church." In Dynamic Religious Movement: Case Studies of Rapidly Growing Religious Movements around the World, edited by David J. Hesselgrave. Grand Rapids, MI: Baker Book House, 1978.

Independent Church of Australia

The Independent Church of Australia, a relatively new expression of Western Esotericism, was founded in Perth, Australia, in 1969. It has an eclectic perspective, with ritual and liturgy derived from both Roman and Protestant Christianity and teachings inspired by both New Thought and Theosophical traditions, especially the UNITY SCHOOL OF CHRISTIANITY and the CHRISTIAN COMMUNITY founded by Rudolf Steiner.

The Revs. Mario Schoemaker (1929–1997) and Colin Reed (1944–1999) opened the first church center, and in 1971 created the church's educational arm, the Institute of Metaphysics. It is the church's belief that Jesus was a divine being who took on human form and who, having passed through death, now inhabits the spiritual atmosphere of the planet. The church teaches that each member has an essential divine nature. Their task is to nurture the "Christ within" and pursue a path of development toward a mystical unity with God. The Cosmic Mass (similar to that of the Christian Community) is celebrated weekly, as is a service focused upon spiritual healing.

The institute's curriculum introduces students to occult metaphysics, the metaphysical interpretation of the Bible, psychism, mysticism, and the Christian mysteries. With his more advanced students, in 1988 Schoemaker founded the Order of the Mystic Christ. As students develop psychically they are directed to the gaining of a mystic vision of the Christ. The order has its own distinctive set of chants and meditations. Many members of the order reside in metropolitan Melbourne, where members can supplement their personal program of spiritual practice and study with bi-monthly gatherings.

The Independent Church of Australia is headquartered in Victoria (a suburb of Melbourne). It has congregations across Australia and New Zealand, and one congregation in the Netherlands. The church uses the several textbooks written by Schoemaker, such as The New Clairvoyance and A Short Occult History of the World, and the many tapes of his talks and classes.

Address:

Independent Church of Australia
32 Trevallyn Close
Montrose, Victoria 3765
Australia
<http://www.ica.org.au>

Sources:

Independent Church of Australia. Posted at <http://www.ica.org.au>. Accessed March 23, 2000.

India, Hinduism in

Hinduism is difficult to define as a distinct religion because it lacks a fixed creed, a group of exclusive devotees, and a definite institutional form or forms; indeed, Hinduism was not defined as a unitary religion even by its adherents until the modern period. Throughout most of its history Hinduism has existed more as a set of interrelated cultural traditions sharing a common geography and history than as a self-consciously defined religion. Nevertheless, the traditions we now refer to as Hinduism do share certain characteristics: Their adherents tend to venerate the Vedas and the Upanishads as sacred religious texts, to accept the doctrines of karma and reincarnation, to worship personifications of transcendence such as Vishnu, Siva, Rama, and Krishna, and to adopt certain practices for achieving spiritual development, such as yoga.

The rise of Hinduism and the rise of India are intimately connected, and their shared history is best divided into five eras: pre-Aryan (pre-history until 1500 B.C.E.); the period of the Vedas (1500–450 B.C.E.); classical Hinduism (450 B.C.E.–600 C.E.); the medieval period (600–1600); and the modern period (1600–present). These dates given are approximate but are widely accepted by the academic mainstream.

Pre-Aryan India (to 1500 B.C.E.). Prior to the arrival of the Aryan peoples at about 1500 B.C.E., most of India's population consisted of a dark-skinned people who historians refer to as the Dravidians. There were two types of Dravidian culture: First, a stone-age village culture could be found in much of India. In the Indus Valley, however, there existed a highly developed society with its own complex social structure, written language, architecture, and so on. The Indus Valley civilization had a sophisticated religious core; there is some indication that the gods, practices, and beliefs present in the ancient Indus Valley later became central to Hinduism (e.g., Siva, yoga, and perhaps even the notions of karma and reincarnation).

Vedism (1500 B.C.E.–450 B.C.E.). At roughly 1500 B.C.E. the Aryans, a Euro-Asian people, achieved domination over most of northern and central India. Whether they had arrived as conquerors or in some other capacity is unclear. They were a Caucasian people who historians believe emigrated from the southern Mediterranean, northern Asia, and/or Iran. They were warlike and active, committed to a polytheistic religion possibly related to the polytheistic religions of classical Greece and Rome. What we now refer to as Hinduism developed as a dialectic between that religion and religious beliefs that were native to the region. We have a clearer record of the Aryan contributions to Hinduism because, unlike indigenous cultures, the Aryans were a literary people whose language, Sanskrit, continues to be used as a living language.

The Aryans' sacred texts were the Vedas, four collections of hymns to their gods, the most central being the Rig-Veda. The primary purpose of the hymns was practical, namely, they were concerned with obtaining cooperation from the gods in controlling nature and in properly regulating society. For these purposes the Aryans prescribed rituals and sacrifices that were intended to obtain such cooperation.

The caste system, a hierarchical and hereditary set of social classes dictating occupation, social obligations, and status, appears to have been present in Aryan society, at least in a vestigial form. It is unclear if it was imported by the Aryans or was already present to some degree in the Indus Valley civilization. What is clear is that the Aryans pre-empted for themselves the highest levels of the caste system, particularly those of the priests and warriors, and imposed subordinate castes upon the native peoples. The Rig-Veda contains a description and religious endorsement of the caste system.

In Aryan society, the highest caste was that of the Brahmans, or priests. They performed the ceremonial duties, sacrificial and otherwise, outlined in the Vedas. Next, the Ksatriya caste included the warriors, nobility, and rulers. Third in line was the Vaisyas, the business class that traditionally consisted of merchants, farmers, small landholders, traders, and the like. Finally, the Sudras occupied the bottom of the official caste system. They were peasants, virtually serfs, who performed manual labor.

Another large class of people, called the "Untouchables," were considered so low in the spiritual hierarchy that they were beneath, and thus excluded from, the caste system itself. They were in charge of all things considered unclean, unsanitary, and disgraceful, such as dealing with sewage and disposing of rotting carrion. These caste divisions plus the Untouchables have remained in place throughout Indian history, gradually becoming subdivided into many jati (Sanskrit; subcastes). Since independence, the caste system has been officially discouraged by the Indian central government, yet it remains powerfully influential, particularly in rural areas.

Statue of Hindu Goddess standing on a turtle, New Delhi (Corel)

During the latter stages of the Vedic period (roughly 800–450 B.C.E.), the Upanishads, a collection of philosophical commentaries on the Vedas, were written and compiled. They attempt to spell out the mystical, transcendent meaning underlying the practicality of the Vedic texts. The Upanishads were unsystematic and did not supply an entirely consistent interpretation of the Vedas or an entirely coherent worldview. In the light of history, however, it can be seen that they expressed certain themes that later became central to what we now know as Hinduism.

A transition in the character of the Indian worldview from a polytheistic, world-affirming perspective to a monotheistic, world-rejecting one began in the Upanishads. Although prior interpretations of the Vedas had emphasized the control of worldly circumstances through sacrifices to the gods, the Brahman intellectuals who wrote the Upanishads began to embrace the ideal of transcending the world. In the worldview centered on reincarnation and karma, first given written expression therein, the material world is interpreted as a world of maya (illusion), in which people are trapped by the delusion of their mind/ego. Behind the world of illusion, characterized by unpredictability and suffering, there exists an unchanging true reality, in the Upanishads given the name Brahman. Thus Hinduism began to develop into a monotheistic tradition, focusing on Brahman.

From this perspective, people trapped in maya each have an internal core that is real (as opposed to the world, which is false), called the atman (soul). An individual atman stays constant through its many reincarnations; old bodies are discarded and replaced by new ones, much like the changing of clothes, but the wearer, the atman, always stays the same. The nature of each individual incarnation is controlled by the karma incurred in the previous one; the principle of this view, greatly simplified, is that if you are benevolent in one life, then the next life will treat you well, but if you are cruel in this life, then you will be treated cruelly when you reincarnate.

The karma/reincarnation theodicy is progressive: Over countless lifetimes an individual atman moves from mineral forms to plant, to animal, and to human. As viewed by the authors of the Upanishads, one's human spiritual development follows caste lines, from lifetimes as an Untouchable, then as a Sudra, then Vaisya, Ksatriya, and finally Brahman. In incarnations as a Brahman, one comes closest to transcending maya, and these are the only incarnations in which yogic and other spiritual practices are relevant.

Each atman eventually achieves conscious awareness of its true nature and escapes from the cycle of birth and death, a transformation commonly referred to as moksha, or liberation. There are many varieties of Hindu interpretations of this liberation, and these differences produced the various traditions we will describe below. Most traditions came to define liberation as involving the discovery of some sort of intrinsic union between the atman and Brahman, although their descriptions of this connection and how it is to be obtained differ considerably. In one very common interpretation, Brahman and atman are viewed as ultimately identical. At liberation they are found to be one and the same; any previous sense of separation is false and a part of maya.

Beyond these themes of karma, reincarnation, and liberation, many other themes in the Upanishads were elaborated on more systematically in subsequent Hindu theology and practice.

Classical Hinduism (450 B.C.E.–600 C.E.). Hinduism as we now know it emerged during the classical period. As we have seen, certain themes were first given philosophical expression in the Upanishads—for example, monotheism, reincarnation and karma, and the identity of, or at least the eternal relationship between, atman and Brahman. These ideas had remained largely confined to an elite, however, and the everyday religious life of the masses remained focused upon sacrificial religious rituals conducted by Brahman priests. However, in the classical period these philosophical ideas began to be expressed in forms that have ever since served as the basis for widespread popular religion.

In the polytheism of the Vedic period, Indians had worshipped a great variety of gods, who were viewed as inherently separate and distinct persons. In the monotheism of the classical period, however, the personifications of transcendence were confined primarily to Brahma (the creator), Vishnu (the sustainer), and Siva (the destroyer), who were each viewed as manifestations of one, unitary, transcendent reality, rather than as intrinsically distinct personalities.

Brahma tended to be viewed as a remote, unknowable figure, whereas Vishnu and Siva were viewed as accessible pathways to liberation. Hindu religious practice and belief became differentiated into two broad traditions centered on the worship of Siva (SAIVISM), on one hand, and of Vishnu (VAISHNAVISM) on the other. With this division, Hinduism began to be separated into different denomination-like groups, called sampradayas; Saivism and Vaishnavism would later become further subdivided into additional sampradayas.

Vaishnavism tends to emphasize selfless devotion to a personification of transcendence as the path to liberation from maya, whereas Saivism tends to emphasize contemplation of the formless absolute as the primary means of spiritual development. Vaishnavism has been and still is the most popular of the two traditions, and the majority of temples seen throughout the Indian countryside are Vaishnava centers. Both traditions received independent literary expression in the classical period and became consolidated as forms that did not need the services of Brahman priests for their practice.

Vaishnavism was popularized to a large extent by two great epic poems, the Mahabharata and the Ramayana. In their original forms these poems were essentially stories of warriors and kings, and they developed and were spread outside of priestly circles through oral tradition by generations of bards. As they continued to develop, they also addressed, in narrative form, the deep metaphysical issues of the Upanishads. The Mahabharata is the older, its composition beginning around 400 B.C.E. Both epics achieved written and essentially final form in Sanskrit by about 200 C.E.

It is within these epics that the concept of the avatar is introduced. Avatars are the human incarnations of God that come to help humanity along on the path toward becoming one with Brahman. Avatars are generally viewed as embodiments of Vishnu who come to revivify the spiritual condition of humanity when it is at a low ebb. Rama is the avatar whose adventures are described in the Ramayana, and Krishna is the avatar described in the Mahabharata.

Although both the Mahabharata and the Ramayana have been important in the development of Hinduism as a popular religion in India, the Mahabharata has been considerably more influential in that regard. It contains almost one hundred thousand verses, which makes it by far the world's longest poem. The Bhagavad Gita, known simply as the Gita, is a late-added section of the poem that is very widely accepted as the core of the text.

The Gita is in the form of a dialogue between Arjuna, a young prince, and his faithful charioteer, Krishna. The context is that Arjuna and his four brothers, the Pandavas, have been drawn into a civil war for the control of their kingdom against their cousins, the Kauravas. At the beginning of the Gita, their two armies are about to go to battle and Arjuna is faced with a paralyzing dilemma: Should he fight alongside his brothers and against his cousins, or should he lay down his arms and let himself be killed? If he fights, he will be causing grave harm to his own cousins for the sake of a mere kingdom; if he doesn't fight he will be failing his karmic obligations to his own brothers.

As Arjuna finds himself lost in this quandary, Krishna gradually reveals himself as the avatar of Vishnu, disguised as Arjuna's charioteer. Taking Arjuna's dilemma as his point of departure, Krishna presents in the course of the Gita a new theistic religion, which also synthesizes ideas from other Indian traditions such as yoga. According to most interpretations, the core of his teachings is the argument that he presents to Arjuna as the solution both to his dilemma and to the universal problem of salvation. The argument, greatly paraphrased, goes something like this: You can't simply not act, because you owe karmic debts to other people as a result of your actions in past lifetimes. But any form of action creates new karmic obligations. In paying past debts, you inevitably create new ones. If you fulfill your karmic responsibility to your brothers, you create new ones to your cousins; you must fulfill your karmic responsibility, but in doing so, you also create new karma. This dilemma remains to some degree in all action, even within some forms of action designed to free you from it.

Krishna discussed four different solutions to this problem: (1) jnana yoga, the way of knowledge; (2) karma yoga, the way of action; (3) raja yoga, the way of meditation; and (4) bhakti yoga, the way of devotion. According to Krishna, bhakti yoga is the most effective solution to the problem of salvation. The other forms of yoga have some effectiveness in diminishing karmic attachments, but they also introduce new karma by creating subtle attachments to the very actions, for example, meditation, that are designed to lead to liberation. The way of bhakti is to do your basic duty but to give the results of your actions completely and wholly to Krishna; do everything as if Krishna is doing it through you, and let him take responsibility accordingly. Only God himself, in the form of Vishnu-Krishna, has the power to lift attachments to the fruits of action and thus to free those devoted to him from the prison of karma/reincarnation.

In the classical period, the bhakti Hinduism as expressed in the Gita became and has remained the religious form most prevalent throughout India. This was partly because unlike traditional paths to liberation, it presented an optimistic, egalitarian approach appropriate for all castes. The Gita endorsed the caste system in that it prescribed the performance of caste obligations as essential to working through past karma. It rejected, however, the traditional interpretation of the caste system, as expressed in the Upanishads, for instance, as representing a spiritual hierarchy in which only those on the top levels could benefit from techniques designed to accomplish liberation. In this sense the bhakti of the Gita represented a revolutionary, democratic spirituality that became Hinduism's most popular form.

Saivite traditions are widely associated not with direct worship of Siva but rather with deep contemplation and meditation upon a formless absolute. (Theistic forms of Saivism do exist, but contemplative forms are much more common.) Contemplative Saivites attempt to transcend maya through the destruction of the ego, usually through withdrawal from the world and the rejection of social duties, as well as through the practice of meditative forms of yoga. In the classical period and earlier, Saivites were usually solitary ascetics, or sannyasi, who wandered in forests or throughout the land. They viewed Siva as the example of liberation through meditation and detachment from the world of maya and karmic obligations. Siva is considered the god of destruction because following his example destroys the world of maya. He is the Great Yogi, whose example inspires his followers to achieve his state of detachment and eternal bliss.

Yogic practices are designed to control the body and the mind so that consciousness can be freed from sensory attachments, achieving the state of eternal bliss that is its true nature. It seems likely that such practices developed in India as far back as 2000 B.C.E. and that then they were already associated with the veneration of a god, who eventually became known as Siva. A statue of a god similar in appearance to Siva, sitting in a cross-legged yogic posture, was found in the ruins of one of the cities of the Indus Valley civilization, and Rudra, who has many characteristics in common with Siva, is discussed repeatedly in the Vedas. In addition, ascetic yogis are referred to in the Vedas, and yogic practices are discussed repeatedly and in detail in the Upanishads.

A systematic written description of the YOGI TRADITION, including its practices, purposes, and philosophy, was first achieved in the Yoga Sutras of Patanjali, probably compiled between 200 and 400 C.E. Patanjali's system expresses considerable refinements in theory and practice compared to the discussions of yoga in the Upanishads. The authority and completeness of this description has remained unsurpassed, and if yoga can be viewed as having an authoritative scripture, this is it.

The goal of yoga according to Patanjali is samadhi, a state of pure, blissful awareness without an object. This goal is to be reached through eight stages of practice and development. The first five stages are concerned with the elimination of mental distraction: (1) yama, the development of negative virtues, such as abstention from violence, falsehood, sexual incontinence, and theft; (2) niyama, the development of positive virtues such as purity, contentment, austerity, study, and dedication of actions to the Lord; (3) asanas, sitting and postures; (4) pranayama, breath control; and (5) pratyahara, withdrawal of the senses from the external world. Once the yogi has in these five stages suppressed the distractions of mind and body, he or she proceeds to the ultimate three stages of development: (1) dharana, concentration; (2) dhyana, meditation; and (3) samadhi, pure consciousness without an object.

In addition to Vaishnavism and Saivism, TANTRISM, a third form of Hindu religion with a long history in India, achieved written expression and consolidation during the classical period. Tantrism is much less common in India than the other two traditions, but it is proportionately better known in the West. It is usually associated with the worship of Shakti, one name for the female consort of Siva, and Tantrics are sometimes referred to as members of the SHAKTA MOVEMENT. (Other female deities associated with Shakti include Kali and Durga.) The tantric tradition was probably native to India and Tibet even before the Aryan invasion, and unlike the other traditions we have discussed, it developed completely outside of the tradition of the Vedas and their interpretation.

Tantrics emphasize liberation through a form of yogic practice (kundalini yoga) that attempts the reconciliation of male and female qualities in body and mind. This reconciliation is often personified as the harmonization of the active Shakti with the passive Siva. The female power in the human body is referred to as kundalini. Essential to Tantrism is a view of the human body as possessing, along with its gross material anatomy, a second, subtle anatomy consisting of seven cosmic energy centers (chakras) connected to each other along the spine from its base to the crown of the head.

Kundalini is viewed as originating in the lower chakras, where it is confined unless it is liberated through specific rituals and practices intended to bring about its rising through the energy pathways (nadas) that tie the chakras to each other. As kundalini reaches each higher chakra, male and female energy becomes more integrated, until finally, when kundalini reaches the crown chakra of the head, enlightenment is achieved.

The Hindu Tantrics share with the Saivites a focus upon Siva and his consort as well as an emphasis upon meditative yoga as the primary means of enlightenment. However, unlike Saivism and most other Hindu traditions, Tantrism holds that liberation is to be attained by making use of the world rather than by denying it. Tantric rituals and practices often aim at acceptance and integration of sexual, aggressive, and other primal appetites. Other forms of Hinduism attempt to control and transcend such appetites, which are viewed as exciting the senses, thus tying the atman to maya. In this respect, Tantrism has affinities with the antinomianism associated with countercultural movements of psychological and spiritual liberation in the West, popular since the 1960s. It is perhaps for this reason that Tantric Hinduism is more well-known and accepted in the West than its relatively rare incidence in India would otherwise justify.

Medieval Hinduism (600–1600 C.E.). During the medieval period (600–1600 C.E.), the Saivites and the Vaishnavites, the major divisions of classical Hinduism, become subdivided into additional sampradayas (denominations), and monastic and other types of organizations were formed to put their theologies into practice. The worldviews of the major sampradayas that developed during the medieval period can be classified as Vedanta, that is, philosophical interpretations of the Vedas. One central question divides the various Vedanta sampradayas: How should the relationship between atman and Brahman (the soul and God) be interpreted?

In many of the Saivite traditions, a complete form of monism is implicit; that is, all atmans eventually achieve enlightenment by realizing their oneness with God. From the monistic point of view there is only one soul: God's soul. Any separation experienced in life is illusion; monism is literally true and uncompromising. Most of the Vaishnavite traditions are also monistic to some degree; however, they tend toward more of a qualified monism. They are monistic in that they tend to view every atman as eventually transcending the karmic necessity for reincarnation and as achieving an enlightenment in which it is realized that atman and Brahman have an eternal, noncontingent relationship. From many Vaishnavite perspectives, on the other hand, even enlightened consciousness retains a subject-object distinction between the atman and Brahman.

In the eighth century C.E., Shankara (788–820 C.E.), a legendary South Indian teacher, developed a major reorganization of Saivite thought and worship, partially as a response to the popularity of Vaishnavism. Vaishnavite theism, as expressed in the epic poems, especially in the Bhagavad Gita section of the Mahabharata, had become the most influential tradition in Hinduism. The Gita claims that devotional bhakti is the most complete and effective approach to enlightenment. Shankara's synthesis acknowledged the relative value of devotional Hinduism, but it also defended the superiority of Saivite, contemplative forms of yoga. His version of Vedanta has been and remains the most influential rationale for contemplative Hinduism and the most consistent expression of its monistic philosophy.

According to Shankara, there are two levels of spiritual truth, attainable through devotional bhakti, on the one hand, and contemplative yoga, on the other. In bhakti, ultimate reality is personified as a god or avatar, and humanity attempts to find salvation through worshipping him. Bhakti expresses a lower level of truth, but through it an aspirant can eventually, through many reincarnations, qualify for access to the higher level, which can be perfected only through contemplative yoga and monasticism. The goal of the second approach is "monistic union," in which it is finally realized that atman and Brahman are one.

In addition to producing his magisterial statement of Vedanta, Shankara set up a major religious infrastructure in India. He created four primary centers, one in each major section of India. He then defined ten monastic orders, assigned the orders among the four centers, and reorganized the sannyasi (those who accept the renounced life) among them. (Previous to that organization, sannyasi were usually wandering ascetics.)

Four primary Vaishnava sampradayas developed during the medieval period, the Sri Vaishnavas, the Nimbarki, the Madhwaguar, and the Brahma. All of these traditions still exist, but the most influential has been the Sri Vaishnavas sect, which emerged as a distinct path based upon the philosophy and influence of Ramanuja (c. 1017–1137), a widely traveled guru said to have founded hundreds of monasteries during the twelfth century. Ramanuja's goal, primarily in reaction to the prestige and popularity of Shankara's monistic statement of Vedanta, was to restore the primacy of bhakti. He was troubled by Shankara's claim that the theistic dualism implicit in bhakti—when compared to the monistic union that is the goal of the contemplative traditions—is an inferior version of ultimate truth. On the other hand, he couldn't completely discount monism because, as Shankara noted, monism was expressed in the Vedas.

In order to reassert the ultimate metaphysical standing of bhakti's view of truth, Ramanuja attempted an integration of dualistic theism with monism. In his qualified nondualism, the eternal paradox of both the union and the separation of the soul and God is seen as analogous to the temporal union/separation between the soul and the body. According to Ramanuja, in the material world the body and the soul are unified in the sense that neither can appear without the other, but they nevertheless remain separate from each other because eventually the same soul is united with many bodies. In an analogous fashion, ultimate enlightenment reveals the eternal noncontingent union of God and the individual, yet in a sense the soul remains separate because there is only one God and there are many individuals with whom he is unified. In these teachings, Ramanuja expressed both the unity implicit in the monistic statements of the Upanishads, and the separation implicit in bhakti devotionism.

Modern Hinduism (1600 to the Present). Western influence had a substantial effect on the development of Hinduism in the modern period. This influence began with the Portuguese conquest of Goa in 1510, but it got under way in earnest with British commercial, political, and cultural involvements in India, beginning in the seventeenth century. Incursions by the semigovernmental British East India Company culminated in effective control of the whole Indian subcontinent by the early nineteenth century. (Political control of India was transferred from the East India Company to the British imperial government after the Indian Mutiny in 1857.)

During the nineteenth century the British introduced important changes into Indian society. They brought with them a Western-style system of mass education, conducted in English, which included universities on the British model. In addition to becoming fluent in English, Indian students were exposed to the British intellectual tradition, in which social criticism and reform were central to creative literature, history, and law. Such education was made a requirement for employment in government and the social services, as well as in the colonial commercial enterprises that dominated the Indian economy.

English-educated Indian elites began to view Indian religious and cultural institutions and beliefs at least partially through Western eyes. Western ethical concern about Indian customs and beliefs was also reinforced by the Christian missionary activity that became widespread in India during this period. Although the actual percentage of Indians exposed directly to British educational training and religion was small, the upper echelons of the Indian power structure became suffused with British cultural influence, and they in turn tended to reshape Indian culture and religion in reaction to it.

Since the appearance of the Upanishads, most Hindu traditions had been world-rejecting, that is they viewed the world as a vale of illusory suffering that could be transcended only by leaving it through enlightenment. Through the lens of Western liberalism, however, much worldly suffering came to be seen by Indians as resulting from their own abusive social customs, and thus as preventable in this world. Consequently, during the nineteenth century, a range of Indian social practices that seemed abusive by Western standards were outlawed as a result of pressure from both English-educated Indians and English colonial administrators. Such reformed abuses included childhood marriages for girls, denial of remarriage for widows, and suttee, the practice of burning widows on the funeral pyres of their husbands.

The tendency to evaluate Hindu customs by Western standards of justice was further reinforced by the imposition of a legal system modeled upon that of the English.

From this perspective, the caste system itself, with its radically unequal inherited rights and restrictions, came to be seen by many English-educated Indians as unjust. Some of the English-speaking elite even came to question whether Hinduism was a valid religion, given the variety of abuses it had perpetrated. Others, however, came to see such abuses as resulting from peripheral or decadent trends within the religion that were correctable. They argued that Hinduism in its essence, and shorn of such abuses, was not only equal to but had many advantages over the Western humanitarian and Christian teachings that had called attention to such abuses in the first place. These sentiments were expressed in a variety of Hindu reform and revitalization movements that have continued up until the present day.

The BRAHMO SAMAJ was the earliest of the modern Hindu reform movements. It acknowledged the value of Western social criticism and Western science, but it nevertheless reaffirmed the continuing validity of a purified Hinduism in Indian culture. It claimed that the social abuses associated with Hinduism had been caused by decadent tendencies that deviated from the pure Hinduism of the Upanishads. The tendencies that it rejected included polytheism, the identification of concrete images with transcendent godhood (idolatry), an emphasis upon the efficacy of rituals, the religious justification for the caste system, and a religious particularism that proclaimed the exclusive validity of Hinduism and failed to understand that Christianity, Islam, and other religions are also valid paths to enlightenment.

Rammohan Roy (1774–1833), the founder of the Brahmo Samaj, was a gifted Bengali intellectual who had been exposed to a wide variety of Western social and ethical views. He became an advocate of liberal social reforms in India, including the repudiation of the caste system. In addition, he produced the first Bengali and English translations of the Upanishads and advocated the return of Hinduism to the monistic, monotheistic form that he believed to be taught therein, rejecting all image worship and ritualism. Under his leadership, members of the Samaj met weekly for readings from the Upanishads, combined with sermons and hymn-singing, somewhat on the model of Protestant Christian congregations. (This pattern of worship later became common among a wide variety of Hindu sects.)

After Roy's death, Devendranath Tagore (1817–1905) and Keshab Chandra Sen (1838–1884) spread the doctrines and practices of the Brahmo Samaj throughout India, particularly among the Western-educated elite. In addition, a number of organizations similar to the Brahmo Samaj developed in other coastal metropolitan centers, several of which became formally associated with it.

The ARYA SAMAJ, founded by Swami Devananda (1824–1883), accepted many of the emphases of the Brahmo Samaj, including the rejection of the caste system and image worship. However, it also rejected the Brahmo Samaj's affirmation of Western values and science. Instead it based its support for liberal social reforms exclusively upon a fundamentalist interpretation of the Vedas, which it viewed as literally true and universally binding. This approach had more of a mass appeal than that of the more elitist and intellectual Brahmo Samaj, and it helped to restore widespread pride in Indian religious traditions at the same time that it encouraged liberal reforms.

The Brahmo Samaj and the Arya Samaj, as well as a number of other nineteenth-century Hindu reform movements, adopted largely a defensive response to Western criticism. The Hindu movements that eventually became most influential, however, both in India and in the West, responded more aggressively. These movements, and the great figures who led them, reinterpreted Hinduism in a way that provided both its for its own revitalization and for a reasoned critique of Western practices and beliefs.

The most obvious target of such criticism was Western imperialism, particularly the subjugation of India as a British colony. Other characteristics of Western society that seemed of questionable value included its materialism, violence, and a widespread sense of alienation. In addition, a reformulated Hinduism could be promoted to Westerners as an alternative that solved many of the problems to which their own perspectives had left them vulnerable. With the development of these new more aggressive and self-confident Hindu movements, the modern era has increasingly involved reciprocal rather than unilateral influence between the West and India.

Ramakrishna Paramahansa (1834–1902) and his chief disciple, Swami Vivekananda (1863–1902), were seminal figures in a new phase of modern Hinduism. They were not, as the Samaj devotees had been, so concerned with purifying Hinduism of “idoltrous” aspects that were objectionable to Westerners or Muslims. Rather, they viewed Hinduism as a sort of universal religion that incorporated and endorsed the truth of other religions as well.

Ramakrishna, raised as a rural Brahman with no formal education, served as the priest of a Kali temple at Dakshinesvar, just north of Calcutta. He frequently experienced samadhi, a state of religious ecstasy, as a result of bhakti devotional practices focused both upon Hindu figures such as Kali, Siva, Rama, and Krishna, and also upon figures from other religions such as Muhammad and Jesus. Through these experiences, he came to believe that a single transcendent Reality is the common core of all of the world's great religions. Eventually, he began to experience an almost continuous state of imageless samadhi, similar to that which had been described by Patanjali and Shankara as the mark of highest enlightenment. He interpreted his various experiences through Shankara's concept of the different levels of religious truth, broadening this viewpoint to include the theistic and monistic stands of other religions as well as those of Hinduism.

During the course of his priesthood, Ramakrishna became an object of devotion and influence both to uneducated villagers and also to intellectuals from Calcutta who came frequently to sit at his feet. They were inspired by his ecstatic states and also by the simple, homely parables and images by which he communicated the meaning of his experiences. Among the sophisticates who came from Calcutta were members of the Brahmo Samaj and Arya Samaj, including Keshab Chandra Sen, and also a young agnostic named Narendra Nath Datta, who eventually became a Ramakrishna monk under the name of Swami Vivekananda.

By the time of his death in 1886, Ramakrishna was already widely regarded as a great saint. Afterwards his closest disciples formed a monastic order, the Ramakrishna Mission, to spread his message. In 1893 Vivekananda made a spectacular presentation of Ramakrishna's viewpoint at the World Parliament of Religions in Chicago, after which he stayed in the United States for four years, starting centers of the VEDANTA SOCIETIES, as the Ramakrishna Mission is known in the West, in several cities. On his return to India he was regarded as a national hero, and he spent the rest of his life contributing to the development of the Ramakrishna Mission there. Vivekananda taught that India and the West have much to contribute to each other, with India needing to profit from Western science and the West needing to profit from Indian spirituality.

The influence of Ramakrishna and Vivekananda's interpretation of Hinduism as a universally ecumenical worldview grew in response to a widespread crisis of religious faith. As a result of modern revolutions in transportation and communication, the increase in knowledge of religions, and the radical diffusion of different religious traditions geographically, apparent contradictions between religious worldviews have been brought into the foreground of public consciousness. For many, knowledge of many traditions has called into question the truth claims of any particular religion.

Some have responded to this secularizing trend by reasserting the fundamental, literal, and exclusive truth of their particular religious worldview. In contrast, others have adopted a two-level religious structuralism, in which the individual religions tend to be seen as culturally relative whereas a higher level of religious truth is constituted by a universal mysticism, or “perennial philosophy,” that allegedly stands behind all the major religions. At that level, the apparent contradictions between individual religions are transcended in an ineffable gnosis that can only imperfectly be communicated to the rational mind. Ramakrishna and Vivekananda's universalizing of Shankara's theory of two levels of religious truth has been one important source for this paradigm, now widely influential both in India and in the West.

Ramakrishna was an authentic Hindu saint of a type that appeared early in Indian history and that includes the poet-saints of later Hinduism. The best known representatives of this tradition in the twentieth century were probably Mahatma Gandhi (1869–1948) and Sri Aurobindo Ghose (1872–1950). Each provided a synthesis of Western influences and Hinduism that has been widely influential in both India and the West.

Gandhi, the leader of the Indian National Congress from 1920 onwards, was the primary architect of Indian independence from Great Britain. As a young man he studied law at an English university for three years and had been profoundly influenced by the Western intellectual ideals of democracy, equality, and individual autonomy. He also was influenced by the writings of Russian writer Leo Tolstoy (1828–1910) on voluntary simplicity and of American philosopher Henry David Thoreau (1817–1862) on passive resistance to governmental injustice. Thoreau, essayist Ralph Waldo Emerson (1803–1882), and the other American transcendentalists had themselves been influenced by Hindu concepts such as karma and the monistic nature of ultimate reality. Gandhi's use of nonviolent resistance to racial and cultural injustice was, in turn, an important influence upon Martin Luther King Jr.'s (1929–1968) adoption of such tactics and ideals in the American civil rights movement.

Gandhi's most important contribution to the fight for Indian independence was his integration of political protest with Hinduism, especially the Vaishnava tradition. He was a dedicated student of the Bhagavad Gita and viewed his political activities as a form of the karma yoga described therein. He attempted to achieve the complete detachment from passion combined with the fulfillment of social obligations recommended by the Gita, and viewed svaraj (self-rule) as both a personal and a national ideal. Previous advocates of Indian independence had limited influence because their secular arguments had little appeal to the vast majority of Indians, whose worldview was primarily religious. In contrast, Gandhi viewed independence from Great Britain achieved by nonviolent resistance as an expression of traditions central to Hinduism, and this approach was much more appealing to the religious majority.

In the tradition of exemplary prophecy described by Max Weber (1864–1920), Gandhi embodied Hindu ideals in his chaste and simple personal life. He appeared to be detached from sexuality, aggression, and other forms of self-interest; he ate a vegetarian diet; and he even wore the loincloth of the traditional Indian villager. Consequently, Gandhi was widely regarded as a saint or master of the traditional Hindu type, and his synthesis of religious and political ideals gained a strong hold over the Indian masses. In addition to leading them to independence, he strongly opposed the caste system, and his leadership continues to have an impact on the struggle to uproot this deeply entrenched social hierarchy from Indian life.

Like Gandhi, Sri Aurobindo Ghose—better known as Sri Aurobindo—was educated in England and attempted to apply a synthesis of Hindu religious and Western democratic ideals in the fight for Indian independence. As the spiritual side of his worldview began to predominate, however, he withdrew from political activities and in 1910 founded the SRI AUROBINDO ASHRAM at Pondicherry, south of Madras, which continues to flourish today.

Aurobindo had many intense spiritual experiences, including that of Brahman as the one all-pervading reality, with the world of appearances being totally illusory. His interpretation of these experiences was substantially influenced by the teachings of Ramakrishna and Vivekananda, although his system eventually became more detailed than theirs. He published several theological studies that provided a synthesis of Hindu and evolutionary ideas, including Essays on the Gita and The Life Divine. The latter was the major statement of his viewpoint, which he referred to as Integral Yoga.

Aurobindo's version of yoga is "integral" because it views the various forms of yoga described in the Gita—the yogas of knowledge, service, meditation, and devotion—as all having their place in the life of the spirit. The spiritual life is also to be lived by integrating it with the whole range of "worldly" activities, including art, science, economics, and the domestic life of the householder. According to Aurobindo, both individual and social life are in the process of evolving from the illusion of separative individualism through various stages of consciousness, until a state of superconsciousness is reached in which it is realized that Brahman, the only reality, pervades all.

Aurobindo's perspective is innovative in that it turns away from traditional Hindu world-negation by affirming the value of worldly activities as an arena for individual and social transformation. The resulting synthesis of Hinduism with Western values has been widely influential in both the West and the East. For instance, it has substantially influenced the development of transpersonal and humanistic psychology as well as the New Age and Human Potential movements, both in the United States and in Europe.

Contemporary Hinduism is not confined to these innovative religious figures and their movements. The traditional forms of religious life continue in devotional bhakti practice, both within and outside of theistic sects, in temple rituals and festivals, in the asceticism of sannyasi and itinerant sadhus, in pilgrimages to holy sites, in music and art, in the various forms of Tantra and yoga, and in the observances that structure family life. As always, however, the exemplary prophecy of charismatic saints is the primary source of Hinduism's vitality. In the current period the most important saints have been not those who have avoided the influence of modern values but those who have integrated and subordinated them to spiritual concerns. Ramakrishna, Vivekananda, Gandhi, and Aurobindo have each expressed versions of Hinduism that have allowed it to remain in the mainstream of modern Indian culture and that have also appealed to alienated Westerners. A host of other contemporary Indian religious figures, such as A. C. Bhaktivedanta (1896–1977), founder of the INTERNATIONAL SOCIETY FOR KRISHNA CONSCIOUSNESS, Maharishi Mahesh Yogi (b. c. 1911), Swami Sivananda (1887–1963), founder of the DIVINE LIFE SOCIETY, and Meher Baba (1894–1969), have continued to bring forms of revitalized Hinduism both to India and to the West.

Contemporary Hinduism has also been marked by the emergence of a number of notable female charismatic saints around whom movements have gathered. The most notable is Anandamayi Ma (1896–1982) and her contemporaries, such as Mira Richard, the Mother, Sri Aurobindo's companion. They opened space for the appearance of living teachers such as Mata Amritanandamayi (see MATA AMRITANANDAMAYI MATH), Mother Meera (b. 1960), founder of the MOTHER MEERA Society, Shri Mataji Nirmala Devi (SAHAJA YOGA), Ma Yoga Shakti Saraswati (Ma Yoga Shakti International Missions), and the collective female leadership of the BRAHMA KUMARIS.

Steven Barrie-Anthony

Sources:

- Ashby, Philip H. Modern Trends in Hinduism. New York: Columbia University Press, 1974.
- Basham, A. L. The Origins and Development of Classical Hinduism. New York: Oxford University Press, 1989.
- Chandola, Anoop. The Way of True Worship: A Popular Story of Hinduism. Lanham, MD: University Press of America, 1990.
- Flood, Gavin. Introduction to Hinduism. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2000.
- Herman, A. L. L. A Brief Introduction to Hinduism: Religion, Philosophy and Ways of Liberation. Boulder, CO: Westview Press, 1991.
- Hopkins, Thomas J. The Hindu Religious Tradition. North Scituate, MA: Duxbury Press, 1971.
- Klostermaier, Klaus K. A Survey of Hinduism. Albany: State University of New York Press, 1994.
- Knott, Kim. Hinduism: A Very Short Introduction. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2000.
- Kulke, Hermann, and Dietmar Rothemund. A History of India. London: Routledge, 1998.
- Wolpert, Stanley A. A. A New History of India. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1999.
- Zaehner, R. C. Hinduism. New York: Oxford University Press, 1988.

India, Religion in Contemporary

Before the consolidation of British rule in the early nineteenth century, the region consisted primarily of politically separate, self-contained communities with their own customs, religious traditions, and languages or dialects. Certain cultural elements did tie the land together, however, for instance, the caste system and some traditional religious doctrines such as karma and reincarnation, which were accepted as valid by the vast majority of the population. Following emancipation from the British in 1947, India did gain some semblance, at least, of a uniform political identity.

HINDUISM, a tradition native to India, accounts for about 75 percent of the Indian population. It and its role in Indian history are dealt with in a separate entry in this encyclopedia. This entry deals with the other religions now existing on the Indian subcontinent. SIKHISM (with 2 percent of the population) and JAINISM (0.5 percent) originated in India, which remains the home of more than half of their worldwide constituency. BUDDHISM originated in India, but since the late medieval period it has had a far greater impact in China, Japan, and Southeast Asia. It now accounts for about 0.7 percent of the population. Most of the rest of the population adhere to belief systems that originated elsewhere—ISLAM (12 percent), CHRISTIANITY (6 percent), and ZOROASTRIANISM (less than 0.01 percent). The primary native Indian traditions (Hinduism and its various subdivisions, Jainism, and Sikhism) developed historically over several millennia in relation to each other. Each of the major traditions is divided into numerous sects and subsects, making India one of the most religiously diverse countries in the modern world.

Jainism. Jainism is a religious tradition that stretches back into the mists of Indian prehistory. It shares with yoga an origin in the practices and doctrines of wandering forest ascetics—known as munis or shramanas—which predated the arrival of the Vedas with the Aryan invasions. Historically documented Jainism is based upon the system of ideas and practices developed by Vardhamana Mahavira (c. 540–468 B.C.E.) in the sixth century B.C.E. Mahavira lived in the lower Ganges area of India, and at the age of thirty

Status of religions in India, 2000–2050

Followers	2000		2025	2050
	total	% rate
Hindus	755,135,000	74.5 1.67	969,492,000	1,072,994,000
Muslims	122,570,000	12.1 1.95	162,500,000	190,000,000
Christians	62,341,000	6.2 2.63	98,200,000	125,300,000
Independents	34,200,000	3.4 4.18	65,500,000	86,000,000
Protestants	16,826,000	1.7 2.15	22,900,000	27,000,000
Roman Catholics	15,500,000	1.5 1.74	20,700,000	24,500,000
Ethnoreligionists	34,761,000	3.4 1.55	40,000,000	60,000,000
Sikhs	22,183,000	2.2 1.86	29,800,000	35,000,000
Nonreligious	12,849,000	1.3 2.54	25,248,000	40,000,000
Buddhists	7,249,000	0.7 1.99	9,600,000	11,400,000
Jains	4,137,000	0.4 0.85	6,000,000	6,500,000
Baha'is	1,716,000	0.2 2.06	2,500,000	3,600,000
Atheists	1,665,000	0.2 1.75	2,500,000	3,100,000
Zoroastrians	213,000	0.0 2.26	350,000	550,000
Chinese folk-religionists	133,000	0.0 1.91	250,000	400,000
Jews	9,100	0.0 0.13	9,200	9,500
Total population	1,013,662,000	100.0 1.77	1,330,449,000	1,528,853,000

gave up his home life to become a wandering spiritual seeker.

The teachings of Mahavira have considerable overlap with those of the Buddha and of the late Upanishads, which developed around the same time. All three traditions integrate emphases of the ancient shramanas tradition, including reincarnation, karma, and liberation from maya, or illusion, by ascetic and meditative practices. Jainism and Buddhism differ from the yoga and ascetic practices discussed in the Upanishads, however, in being atheistic and in regarding liberation as an individual matter rather than involving union with a transcendent God.

As with other early versions of the reincarnation/karma theodicy, Jainism is world-negating; it views the world of ordinary consciousness as illusion, or maya. From the Jain perspective, the universe consists of two sorts of entities, jivas, or individual souls, and ahiva, or nonliving matter. Jivas are in their essence free and omniscient, but their knowledge and freedom are obscured by a subtle form of matter, called karma. To the Jains, karma, the law of action and reaction, is a form of materialistic determinism, which keeps the soul bound to the world of illusion through many lifetimes. The soul remains bound primarily because of its attachments to sense experience and to its identity in its present lifetime. Salvation is to be achieved through meditation practices and austerities that break the bonds of the senses, as well as by ahimsa, or nonviolence, which occupies a more central position in the Jain worldview than it does in other forms of Indian religion.

The enlightened jiva is referred to as a siddha. Tirtankaras, or ford-makers, are a subcategory of siddhas who have served as prophets and started an order of renunciates (monks and nuns) before leaving their bodies for the last time. (Mahavira is viewed as the most recent tirtankara during the present cycle of time.) The liberated siddha has achieved omniscience, and exists forever in a state of serene and isolated tranquillity, immune to the illusions of contingent existence.

In the Jain worldview enlightenment—because of the extreme austerities and inaction that are viewed as instrumental to its attainment—is viewed as possible only for monks or nuns. (Laypeople, however, can make progress toward that goal, which can then be achieved during later lifetimes as a renunciate.) Renunciates engage in meditation practices and in severe austerities that are summarized in the five Maha-vratas, or great vows: (1) ahimsa, or nonviolence; (2) satya, or truthfulness; (3) acharya, or nonstealing; (4) brahmcharya, or celibacy and chastity; (5) aparigraha, nonattachment and nonpossession. These vows are interpreted more or less stringently, depending upon a person's spiritual status. In the more stringent forms required for renunciates, these vows are metaphorically generalized and include prohibitions not only upon actions but also upon the thoughts or feelings associated with them.

Ahimsa, or nonviolence, is the most important of these vows and is viewed as the ethical foundation of Jainism. (Indeed, the other vows are viewed as more specific extensions of ahimsa.) Violence done to another soul is viewed as creating such particularly binding karma that its complete absence is equivalent to liberation.

In Jainism nonviolence is a positive as well as a negative virtue, based upon love and kindness for all living beings. Any action, thought, or feeling that could lead to harm, no matter how slight, to another being is viewed as a form of violence. Living beings who are owed such compassion include all the different forms of life—humans, animals, insects, plants, bacteria, and even smaller submicroscopic beings—who will progress through the different evolutionary forms until eventually achieving liberation. Renunciates are expected to achieve a relatively stringent form of nonviolence, and to adopt a variety of practices, such as sweeping the ground in their path with a whisk broom, designed to avoid harm to even the smallest of these beings.

Since even vegetables and grains are considered to have souls, complete nonviolence is incompatible with the physical survival of the person practicing it. The ideal Jain renunciate would die of voluntary starvation, as Mahavira is reputed to have done. This fate is recommended as the final leave-taking from embodied life for those rare renunciates who are nearing spiritual perfection. As with ahimsa, each of the other vows has various degrees of application, with the most stringent version seeming rather extreme from the point of view of the outside observer. Another example of a vow that has lent itself to extremism is that of nonpossession.

Nonpossession is held to apply both to physical objects and to personal feelings of any sort about them. In its absolute form, the requirement of nonpossession includes both clothing and the emotion of shame, so, according to some Jains, renunciates must invariably be naked. This interpretation became the focus of a sectarian schism among Jains around 300 B.C.E., those favoring nudity for monks becoming known as the Digambaras (Sky-Clad) and those who did not as the Svetambaras (see TERAPANATH SVETAMBARA JAIN TRADITION). The two factions became rival sects that have divided the community and evolved separately in different regions ever since. Due to the rigors of their interpretation of the great vows, the order of monks among the Digambaras has nearly disappeared, with their laypersons being primarily guided by spiritually advanced householders. The Svetambaras, on the other hand, still have a sizable order of monks.

In later ages, temple worship for Jain lay congregations has developed, partly under the influence of Hinduism. It has many of the characteristics of a divine cult, with enlightened tirtankaras such as Mahavira in effect being worshipped as gods. Congregants sing devotional hymns to them, bathe them, wave lamps to them, and engage in ceremonies in front of them celebrating the important occasions of their lives. Nevertheless, the ultimately impersonal nature of their relationship to these enlightened beings is expressed in the most famous Jain litany, the Namaskarmantra, which makes no mention of specific historical personages, not even of Mahavira.

As mentioned, laypeople follow more moderate forms of the five great vows required for monks and nuns. With respect to nonviolence, for instance, they are allowed to defend themselves if attacked. However, they are not allowed to engage in occupations, such as agriculture or military service, that systematically involve harm to humans, animals, insects, or plants. They primarily engage in noninjurious occupations such as commerce and trade. (Jains reject the caste system, but in many respects function within Indian society as a jat [subcaste] of the merchant class.)

Jain congregants also must refrain from unchastity, intoxicants, and stealing. The vow against possessions is relaxed for laypeople, but they follow it by avoiding unnecessary competitiveness in business and by not accumulating assets beyond those needed for a moderate lifestyle. Their similarly humane observance of the other ethical vows has helped them to become a well-regarded component of Indian society.

Jains subscribe to a cyclical theory of history that views the present age, which lasts for many thousands of years, as spiritually debased. Consequently, they do not expect outsiders to convert to Jainism, and they rarely proselytize. A high percentage of their children, however, remain committed to the Jain faith, and the number of Jains in India has apparently remained stable at 2–4 million for many hundreds of years.

Because the Jains' worldview and style of worship have much in common with Hinduism, and because the ethical integrity and altruism of the community is widely admired, the influence of Jainism has been disproportionate to its numbers. Jain arguments for avoiding cruelty to animals have been a factor in the development of vegetarianism as a common feature of Hinduism. More generally, their advocacy of nonviolence has been widely influential, and was a major factor in Gandhi's development of the concept and practice of nonviolent resistance to British imperialism.

Buddhism. Modern Buddhist scholars place Siddhartha Gautama the Buddha (563–483 B.C.E.) in the sixth century B.C.E. He was born in northern India near the Nepal border, the son of a chief in the Sakya clan. He was raised in relative opulence, but left it behind as he began his spiritual quest. After six years of wandering, he grasped the cause of suffering and reincarnation and thus became enlightened. His enlightenment occurred as he sat in the lotus position beneath the Bodhi Tree at Bodhi Gaya. He next sought several former companions from his attempts at ascetic living, whom he found at Deer Park near Banares. To them he proclaimed the four noble truths: All existence is suffering; all suffering is caused by craving; all suffering can be ended; the way to end suffering is to follow the eightfold path. The eightfold path was described as the Middle Way, taking a middle course between an indulgent life and extreme asceticism. It consists of having right views, right aspirations, right speech, right behavior, right livelihood, right efforts, right thoughts, and right contemplation.

The former companions became his first disciples, and as others gathered around him, he organized them into a monastic community, the Sangha. Women were allowed to form a parallel but separate Sangha. He spent the rest of his life traveling through India, especially along the Ganges valley, teaching and building his movement, which emerged as a direct rebuke of the Brahmans and the caste system. Following his death, his teachings and the rules of his monastic followers were collected into what became the scriptures for the movement. The sites of his birth (Munbini Grove), enlightenment (Bodhi Gaya), the sermon to his first disciples (Deer Park), and death (Kusinagara) became places of pilgrimage and reverence.

Offering water on the feet of Bahubali, the world's largest monolithic statue, located in Shravanbelgola, India (Dinodia/TRIP)

Important to the development of Buddhism were the reputed three councils. The first, held at an unknown date, is believed to have initiated the process of assembling the scriptures. The Second Council, held at Vesali during the first half of the fourth century B.C.E., dealt with some tensions in the movement between the more conservative followers (precursors of present-day Theravada Buddhism) and more progressive elements, tensions that soon led to a split into two groups. In the meantime, Alexander the Great (356–323 B.C.E.) first invaded India and then withdrew. After his leaving, Chandragupta Maurya began a dynasty that in the third century B.C.E. ruled most of the Indian subcontinent. Buddhism was significantly strengthened by Chandragupta's grandson Asoka (273–232 B.C.E.). Asoka became a Buddhist, oversaw the third Buddhist council, and commissioned Buddhist missionaries to spread the faith in nearby countries—Afghanistan, Sri Lanka, and Southeast Asia. During Asoka's reign, Buddhism emerged as a major religion of India, with its strength in the northern part of the subcontinent.

In the meantime, the split between the two major groups—the conservatives who revered the monastic orders and those who identified the Sangha with the larger community of the faithful—widened, creating the present-day Theravada and Mahayana schools. India continued to be an important center of Buddhism through the first millennium of the Common Era. Some Buddhists absorbed elements of Hindu Tantra Yoga, leading to a new form of Buddhism that survived and expanded in neighboring Tibet.

Within India, Buddhism survived in competition with Hinduism. Then in the eighth century, Islamic armies invaded northern India and destroyed many of the Buddhist centers. As the Muslims established control, they began efforts to convert their Buddhist subjects. By the twelfth century, there was a noticeable decline in the Buddhist community across northern India, and it virtually disappeared in the next century. It survived several centuries more in southern India, but by the beginning of the sixteenth century had ceased to exist as a living tradition in India.

A new interest in Indian Buddhism can be traced to the end of the nineteenth century, when Anagarika Dharmapala, a Sri Lankan Buddhist, launched an effort to gain control of the area at Bodhi Gaya where the Buddha had gained enlightenment. The MAHA BODHI SOCIETY he founded became a global organization with the primary goal of reclaiming the site from its Hindu owners. The building of a new Buddhist presence in India, however, came only in the last half of the twentieth century, following the conversion to Buddhism of Brimrao Ramji Ambedkar (1893–1956), who had written the constitution of the newly independent nation. Despairing of removing the stigma of untouchability attached to his people, the Mahars, by Hinduism, he declared Buddhism the logical alternative for them. His movement, the Dr. Baabsaheb-Michael Akror Ambedkar Samarek Samiti, soon gathered supporters in the hundreds of thousands. The Buddhist community was then expanded at the end of the 1950s as thousands of Tibetans moved into the country, fleeing from the Chinese takeover of their country.

Most recently, Buddhists have had some success in converting the untouchables, those who live below the caste system in India. This effort has been assisted by the British Buddhist group the Friends of the WESTERN BUDDHIST ORDER. As the new century begins, there are some seven million Buddhists in India.

Islam. The initial expansion of Islam and the Arab Empire in the eighth century extended to Sind in 711 and Multan in the Punjab two years later. However, the push eastward stopped before entering significantly into what is now the nation of India. Over the next centuries, Islam spread among the peoples of Central Asia. Late in the tenth century, a Turkish leader, Sebüktygin, established himself in eastern Afghanistan. At the beginning of the eleventh century, his son Mahmud began to move into India. He conquered the Punjab, Kashmir, and Gujarat, and roamed freely down the Indus and Ganges valleys. Lahore became the capital of the Ghaznavid Empire, which lasted into the twelfth century. It was later superseded by the Delhi Sultanate, a Muslim kingdom that covered much of northern India, reaching its peak in the middle of the fourteenth century. Muslim rule was at times extremely intolerant, and while Hinduisim suffered, Buddhism was practically destroyed.

In 1398, the Mongol conqueror Tamerlane (or Timur Lang, c. 1336–1405) invaded northern India. Although he did not stay long, he destroyed the power of the Delhi Sultanate and left them unable to defend themselves when Babur (d. 1530) established Mongol rule in northern India early in the sixteenth century. Under Akbar (d. 1605), Muslim rule extended over most of the subcontinent. Akbar enforced a policy notable for its religious tolerance, but under his grandson, Shah Jahan (d. 1658), Islam was established as the state religion. Shah Jahan's son, Aurangzeb, who ruled for almost a half century (1658–1707), was a fervent orthodox Muslim, remembered for his efforts to further establish Islam in place of other religions. He forced many conversions, and at one point executed the leader of the Sikh community, who had refused to convert. His empire survived him, but was in decline when the British arrived in the eighteenth century.

By the beginning of the colonial era, a spectrum of Islamic communities had arrived in India. The majority were Sunnis of the HANAFITE or SHAFIITE schools. However, there was a significant Shiite presence rooted among displaced Persians. The Jamaat e Islami Hind, headquartered in Delhi, is the primary coordinating body for Indian Muslims.

Around 1190 C.E., Khwaja Muinuddin Chishti (c. 1138–1236) began a new phase of Islamic life. A Sufi mystic of note, he arrived in Ajmer, India, following his experience of a vision of the Prophet Muhammad. The vision ordered him, "Proceed to India and show the Path of Truth to the people there." On his way from Medina to India, he gathered followers and during the remaining year of his life established mystical Sufism in India. The CHISTINIYYA later divided into two main communities, which have now given rise to several international organizations, including the SUFI MOVEMENT and the SUFI ORDER INTERNATIONAL.

Following the fall of the Fatimid Empire in Egypt late in the twelfth century, the ISMAILI Muslims, already divided into several communities, spread through the Muslim world. Many found their way to India, where today the largest concentration of Ismailis exist. Of the several Ismaili groups, two stand out: the BOHRAS and those who acknowledge the authority of the Aga Khan and HIS HIGHNESS PRINCE AGA KHAN SHIA IMAMI ISMAILI COUNCIL.

The AHMADIYYA MOVEMENT IN ISLAM and the AHMADIYYA ANJUMAN ISHAAT ISLAM, LAHORE, heirs of the nineteenth-century Muslim revival movement begun by Mirza Ghulam Hazrat Ahmad (1835–1908), were founded in India (in what is now Pakistan) and have gone on to become important international movements, though thought of as heretical by the majority of Muslims.

During the twentieth century, especially in the years after independence, India became the scene of numerous movements that have pulled the Muslim community in different directions. The separation of Pakistan (and Bangladesh) from India led to the removal of many Muslims from what is today India and underlies the call of other Muslim communities, most notably in Kashmir, for the establishment of additional Muslim homelands. The separatist urge gave birth to one of the most important Muslim revivalist groups, the JAMAAT-E-ISLAM, whose founder, Abul Ala Mawdudi (1903–1979), has become one of the architects of contemporary ISLAMISM, which calls for the reestablishment of the sharia (Islamic law) and of true conservative Muslim rulers in Muslim lands. A Jamaat splinter group, the Jamiat-ul-Ulema-e-Pakistan, has identified itself with the World Islamic Front, organized around Osama bin Laden and AL QAEDA, which has been blamed for a number of terrorist acts internationally. On the other end of the Islamic spectrum, the Islam and Modern Age Society has attempted to offer directions for an Islamic future responding to science and contemporary culture.

Today, Islam forms the second largest religious community in India, with some 122,000,000 adherents (about 12 percent of the population).

Sikhism. Sikhism evolved as a separate religion from within the northern Indian Sant tradition of Hinduism, also referred to as the Nirguna Sampradaya. The Sant tradition developed in the context of Muslim and Hindu tensions brought about by Islamic invasions from Afghanistan and Turkey, resulting in Islamic political control of most of northern India from the early thirteenth century onwards. The best known of the Sant mystics are Kabir (1440–1518) and Nanak (1469–1538), whose teachings, especially Nanak's, became the original foundation for the development of Sikhism. (Nanak is regarded as the actual founder of Sikhism, but his perspective was substantially influenced by Kabir.) Kabir and Nanak, like other Sant poet-saints, preached a "religion of the heart," which synthesized Islamic radical monotheism with belief in reincarnation and karma derived from Hinduism.

The Sants and Sikhism have much in common with Vaishnava bhakti traditions (traditions of devotion to Vishnu), emphasizing hymns, mantras, poems, and other devotional foci as the basis for spiritual transcendence. These devotional traditions also tend to reject the spiritual rationale for the caste system. However, the Sants and Sikhism deviate from Vaishnava bhakti by accepting the characteristically Islamic emphasis upon God as without attributes and unapproachable through images. They thus reject as idolatrous and polytheistic the traditional Hindu personifications of God as Vishnu or Siva, as well as the concept of avatars such as Krishna or Rama. Because God cannot be known through specific images or conceptions of Him, they also reject religious exclusivity; they regard Hinduism and Islam, and other religions as well, as valid paths to enlightenment. In keeping with such religious universalism, their teachings also reject the efficacy of rituals that tend to separate religions from each other.

Although the Sants and Sikhs view God as without attributes and not exclusively identified with any specific rituals or imagery, they do see Him as residing in the human heart. He can be known, and union can ultimately be attained through purified emotion and ineffable intuition, which in turn can be achieved by devotional practices that help the seeker transcend attachments to external reality. Nanak's originality as the founder of Sikhism consisted not in the content of his thought relative to the other Sant mystics, but rather in his embodiment of the Sant synthesis in his own person and in the clarity and loveliness with which he expressed it.

He also emphasized the importance of ahimsa (nonviolence), possibly as a corrective to the violence that had previously plagued the relationship between Hinduism and Islam in northern India. Sikhism eventually became the dominant religious tradition of the Punjab, a fertile region of northern India, and about 90 percent of Indian Sikhs still live there.

A characteristic of the religious tradition begun by Nanak was the importance of the guru. In Hinduism a guru is regarded as a teacher who is capable of guiding seekers toward the goal of enlightenment. Nanak came to be regarded as the "first guru" of Sikhism and is usually referred to as Guru Nanak. After his death, he was followed by nine gurus in succession before Sikhism eventually abandoned its emphasis upon guidance by a living guru. After Nanak, the most important of the Sikh gurus were the fifth, Arjun, and the tenth and last guru, Govind Singh.

Arjun (1581–1606) compiled the Sikh sacred book known as the Adi Granth. It consisted of the collected writings of Nanak and the other Sikh gurus, as well as a few compositions by earlier figures in the Sant tradition such as Kabir, Namdev, and Ravidas. Most of these compositions were hymns used in religious instruction by the gurus. (A few were added later, but the compilation was definitively closed at the death of the tenth guru, Govind Singh.)

From the middle to the end of the sixteenth century the Mughal Empire under Emperor Akbar was relatively tolerant of non-Islamic religion. During this period the Sikhs began to constitute a unified religious community with some theocratic overtones. The beginning of the seventeenth century saw renewed Muslim religious intolerance, however, and Arjun was arrested as part of an attempt to force Sikhs to become Islamic. He died in captivity as a martyr to the Sikh faith. His martyrdom triggered the beginning of a century-long armed Sikh rebellion against Islamic control of the Punjab. It was during this period that Sikhism definitively became a separate religion.

Conflict with the Muslim authorities intensified during the period of the tenth guru, Govind Singh (1675–1708). In this context he made the decision to transform the Sikh religious community into a united religio-military order called the Khalsa. In this transformation Sikhism abandoned certain religious emphases that had been important in its founding. Reformed Sikhism abandoned a strict interpretation of the concept of ahimsa, or nonviolence. It also adopted divisive religious symbols like those against which Kabir and Nanak had protested. Ironically, in defending its own theology of peaceful religious universalism against religious intolerance, Sikhism was itself forced to adopt a less peaceful and less universalistic religious identity.

As badges of their allegiance to the Khalsa, Sikhs were required to adopt the surname Singh (lion). Males were also required to adopt a distinctive mode of dress, known as the five Ks: (1) Kesh, or uncut hair, a sign of saintliness; (2) Kangh, a comb for keeping the hair neat; (3) Kach, short pants for quick movement in battle; (4) Kara, a steel bracelet symbolizing sternness and restraint; (5) Kirpan, a sword of defense. Govind also required members of the Khalsa to undergo baptism by drinking and being sprinkled by honeyed water stirred by a sword. (This practice expressed the rejection of caste differentiation among the Sikhs, because the willingness to share food was a traditional basis of caste identity in India.) These symbols helped to integrate Sikhism as a coherent social unit, and the Sikhs were able to overthrow Muslim rule and establish a Sikh theocracy in the Punjab by the end of the eighteenth century. Govind was the last of the Sikh gurus and after his death spiritual authority in the tradition was transferred to the Adi Granth, the sacred scripture.

Sikh theocratic control of the Punjab lasted only until the British consolidated their rule in India in the early nineteenth century. However, the Sikhs made their peace with the religiously tolerant British rule, maintaining their military emphasis and serving with distinction in British army units. After Indian independence in 1947, many Sikhs continued this tradition by serving in the Indian army.

Sikhs have been more economically successful than most other Indian religious communities, and many Sikhs have immigrated to Western countries, doing well there also. In recent years tensions with the Indian government have emerged, sometimes flaring into violence. The primary conflicts have centered on whether Sikhism should be given the perquisites of a separate religion or is to be treated as a sect within Hinduism. Consequently, some Sikhs desire political independence for the Punjab and have made this desire the aim of their political and even military protests.

Christianity. According to the older Christian communities in India, Christianity was introduced to the subcontinent by the apostle Thomas in 52 C.E. The first documentation of Christians in southern India, however, is not until the end of the second century, though even that date indicates an impressive spread of the faith from the Middle East. A bishop from Jerusalem arrived in India in 345. This early Christian community survives to the present as the several Mar Thoma churches, the MALANKARA ORTHODOX SYRIAN CHURCH and the MAR THOMA SYRIAN CHURCH OF MALABAR.

Portugal claimed India in 1498, and in 1541 the pope granted the ruler of Portugal the right to develop a mission in the region. A bishop took up residence at the Portuguese settlement of Goa in 1533, and the arrival of the Jesuit Francis Xavier (1506–1552) in 1542 set the stage for an aggressive Roman Catholic mission directed toward both Hindus and the Orthodox Christians of Malabar. During his six years in India, Xavier guided the other Jesuits sent from Europe, but also received some Indians into his Society of Jesus. He established a house of studies, and before leaving for Japan, in 1548, he sent these missionaries to the principal cities of India to continue the work. For a short while, the Orthodox realigned with Rome, but in 1653, the majority broke communion and reestablished an independent Orthodox church. Today the ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH is represented by both a Latin Rite community and two Eastern Rite churches, the SYRO-MALABAR CATHOLIC CHURCH and the SYRO-MALANKARA CATHOLIC CHURCH.

Many Protestants look to India as the first site of the modern world missionary movement that during the nineteenth century took the Protestant movement around the globe. In fact, as the Moravians were initiating missionary work in the Caribbean, the king of Denmark lent his support to a missionary effort in India with personnel drawn primarily from the University of Halle, the main center of Pietism within German Lutheranism. The first missionaries, Bartholomaeus Ziegenbalg (1682–1719) and Heinrich Plutschau (1677–1752), landed at Tranquebar in 1706. The mission thus initiated led directly to what is today the UNITED EVANGELICAL LUTHERAN CHURCH IN INDIA.

Protestant work was made possible by British meddling in Indian life. However, the instrument of that meddling, the British East India Company, was quite hostile to Christian missionaries operating in the territories under its control. It was not until the end of the second decade of the nineteenth century that the company allowed a large number of the different churches access. British interest in world missions arose in the 1790s, and both the Baptist Missionary Society and the LONDON MISSIONARY SOCIETY (LMS; Congregationalist) chose India as their primary target. William Carey (1761–1834) arrived in 1792, an event celebrated in British missionary history, and established his original station at Serampore, north of Calcutta. The LMS missionaries arrived in Calcutta in 1798 and later developed fields in Madras (1805) and Travancore (1818).

In the meantime, American Congregationalists organized the AMERICAN BOARD OF COMMISSIONERS FOR FOREIGN MISSIONS in 1810 and two years later commissioned their first cadre of missionaries. They coordinated their effort with the LMS. Among the initial eight missionaries were Adoniram Judson (1788–1850), his wife Anne Hesselstine (d. 1826), and Luther Rice (1783–1836). The three were themselves converted to the Baptist position on adult baptism and upon reaching Serampore were rebaptized. Their actions became the occasion of the formation of the American Baptist Foreign Missionary Society, the first national organization of what is now the AMERICAN BAPTIST CHURCHES IN THE U.S.A.

The CHURCH OF ENGLAND had involved itself with support for the Danish-Halle Mission, but began a separate missionary effort through the CHURCH MISSIONARY SOCIETY (CMS) in 1813. The arrival of the CMS signaled the beginning of a greater period of openness to missionaries, and over the next decades, beginning with the British Methodists and American Presbyterians, the entire spectrum of Protestant groups, primarily from England, Scotland, and the United States, initiated new missionary enterprises. Starting in the south, these missions spread to all parts of India during the nineteenth century.

In the twentieth century, India saw notable attempts to merge what had become more than a hundred different Christian communities. These efforts had notable success, leading to the formation of the CHURCH OF SOUTH INDIA (1947) and the CHURCH OF NORTH INDIA (1970), which brought together Anglicans, Presbyterians, Congregationalists, Brethren, British and Australian Methodists, and the Disciples of Christ. A number of the Lutheran groups formed the United Evangelical Church in India.

Christianity is the third largest religious community in India, with some 62,000,000 adherents (about 6 percent of the population). The largest Christian churches are the Roman Catholic Church, Church of South India, Malankara Syrian Orthodox Church, Church of North India, COUNCIL OF BAPTIST CHURCHES IN NORTH EAST INDIA, United Evangelical Lutheran Church in India, METHODIST CHURCH IN INDIA, NEW APOSTOLIC CHURCH, and the SAMAVESAM OF TELUGU BAPTIST CHURCHES; these churches ended the twentieth century with more than a million members each.

A Missionary Council organized in 1912 became the initial vehicle for the expression of Protestant and Orthodox ecumenism. A variety of similar organizations came and went over the next decades, reacting both to the size of India and the several changes in the country's borders. Today the primary instrument of Christian cooperation is the National Council of Churches in India, which is related to the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES. The more conservative churches belong to the Evangelical Fellowship of India, which is associated with the WORLD EVANGELICAL ALLIANCE.

Other Religious Groups. ZOROASTRIANISM, an ancient Persian faith, served as the state religion under various Persian rulers, most notably Cyrus the Great (559–530 B.C.E.). Its place in Persian society was completely disrupted by the conquests of Alexander the Great, whose successors suppressed the religion. Reestablished in the second century C.E., it was permanently displaced by the Muslims in the seventh century. The coming of Islam into Persia became the motivation for many Zoroastrian leaders, beginning in the eighth century, to migrate to a less hostile environment in India. In India the Zoroastrians developed a distinctive life reacting first to centuries of poverty and then emerging as rather prosperous traders during the colonial era. Today there are some 200,000 Zoroastrians in India.

There is a small but interesting Jewish community in India, the BENE ISRAEL, who reside in the Bombay area and have become a separate subcaste in Indian society. They are one of the major non-Semitic Jewish groups. Representatives of the BAHÁ'Í FAITH have established a large work through the last half of the twentieth century. Their membership doubled (from 700,000 to 1.4 million) between 1970 and 1990.

In the years since independence, numerous new religious movements have appeared in India, including indigenous forms of the older faiths and a few that drew impulses from a variety of groups (OSHO COMMUNE INTERNATIONAL, MEHER BABA). As early as 1858, new independent Christian churches had begun to appear that rejected missionary control of the community. The Subba Rao Movement, with some 150,000 adherents, is possibly the largest of these independent churches. There are also a number of more isolated groups that continue to practice ethno-tribal religions that reach back into prehistory. Christian groups have had some of their most notable successes in recent decades working among these people. Missionary specialists have reduced their languages to writing and produced Bible translations for their use.

The Indian Sant tradition took on new life in the nineteenth century as new lineages of gurus emerged whose teachings centered upon the practice of surat shabd yoga (union of the soul with the divine sound). The new Sant Mat is generally traced to Shiv Dayal Singh (1818–1878), who had previously been associated with two Sant gurus, Tulsi Sahib in Hathras and Girdhari Das in Agra. Following his death in 1878, several disciples claimed his spiritual succession. Through the twentieth century, there have been a number of splinters, to the point that as the twenty-first century begins there are over one hundred different branches of the Sant Mat tradition worldwide, though most by far are located in northern India. The Sant Mat is regularly associated with the Sikh tradition, but differs from it in important ways, not the least being its emphasis on reverence toward the spiritual master.

The Indian constitution guarantees religious freedom for all religious groups, especially as they engage in purely religious affairs. The government operates on a principle of separation of religion and government affairs. It raises no money to support religion and does not allow religion to be included in the curriculum of state-supported schools. It is also a crime to promote enmity between groups based on religious prejudice.

Although the constitution thus provides a somewhat peaceful context for the operation of such a religiously diverse society, tensions have been manifest in recent decades due to attempts to align religious and political causes, especially in separatist movements (Sikhs in the Punjab and Muslims in Kashmir). Also, Hindu leaders, especially those associated with the VISHWA HINDU PARISHAD, a pan-Hindu association, and the Rashtriya Swayamsevak Sangh, a nationalist Hindu party dedicated to the legal establishment of Hindu values and cultural norms in India, have increasingly acted to stop Christian and Muslim attempts to convert Hindus, and India has become the scene of sporadic violence aimed at stopping any proselytizing activity.

Steven Barrie-Anthony

Sources:

- Ahmad, Aziz. An Intellectual History of Islam in India. Edinburgh: Edinburgh University Press, 1969.
- Baird, R. D. Religion in Modern India. 2d ed. Delhi: Manohar Publications, 1989.

- Baird, R. D., and Alfred Bloom. Indian and Far Eastern Religious Traditions. New York: Harper and Row, 1972.
- Hardy, F. The Religious Culture of India: Power, Love, and Wisdom. New York: Cambridge University Press, 1993.
- Neill, S. C. A History of Christianity in India. 2 vols. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1984–1985.
- Sastri, K. A. N. Development of Religion in South India. Bombay: Orient Longman, 1963.

Indian Pentecostal Church of God

The Indian Pentecostal Church of God, also known as India Pentecostal Church of God (IPC), is the largest Pentecostal denomination in India. It now has 2,000 local congregations spread all over India, Australia, North America, and the Gulf countries and claims a membership of 700,000. Sixty of the congregations are in the United States among the Malayalam-speaking Asian Indians. In India, the majority of its members are in the states of Kerala, Andhra Pradesh, and Tamil Nadu, with the headquarters in the state of Kerala.

The Indian Pentecostal Church is one of the indigenous movements that emerged out of the revivals that took place in South India in the early part of the twentieth century. There were three significant revivals in the state of Kerala in the years 1873, 1895, and 1908, accompanied by manifestations of the outpouring of the Holy Spirit. Unlike the first two revivals, the third one was sustained by the arrival in 1909 of George Berg, fresh from the Pentecostal revival that was then occurring at Azusa Street in Los Angeles. Berg was not associated with any of the Pentecostal denominations then in their initial formative stages. Thus he led in the formation of various Pentecostal house churches long before the arrival of missionaries representing the various different Pentecostal groups. These house churches organized themselves to come together to worship once a month and later adopted the name South India Church of God in 1924.

In 1926 the South India Church of God and the South India Full Gospel Church, led by Pastor Robert F. Cook, an American Pentecostal missionary, merged to form the Malankara Pentecostal Church of God. However, in 1930 the South India Pentecostal Church of God, which was led by native peoples, came out of this union in order to assert their independence and autonomy. As the remaining denomination began to spread to different parts of India from the state of Kerala, in 1934 it assumed its present name, Indian Pentecostal Church of God.

The revivals that took place in Kerala affected churches that belonged to the Syrian Orthodox tradition, and a significant section of the IPC's membership is of a Syrian Orthodox background. Because of its origin, IPC, along with other Pentecostal churches of Syrian Orthodox background, developed an apologetic against Syrian Orthodox Church beliefs and practices in addition to classical Pentecostal doctrines. A somewhat unique aspect of the Indian Pentecostal Church, this particular aspect of their theology was unnecessary and insignificant outside the state of Kerala, since the Syrian Orthodox in India is limited to this state.

Otherwise, the IPC shares broadly the doctrinal basis of CHURCH OF GOD (CLEVELAND, TENNESSEE) and the ASSEMBLIES OF GOD, and thus fits into the classical Pentecostal tradition.

The most remarkable distinctive feature of the denomination is its polity, which is characterized by independence and autonomy. A General Council elected by the members of the various regions is the highest legislative body. However, the General Council does not exercise any administrative powers. The State Councils or Regional Councils are composed of various ecclesiastical districts. Each of these districts or centers, as they are variously called, is presided over by a center pastor who is appointed by the State Presbytery. The control of the State Presbytery over the local congregation is minimal, limited to the appointment and transfer of pastors. Otherwise, the local congregations are autonomous, though a sense of corporate identity is maintained.

The IPC from its very beginning refused to be affiliated with any foreign mission organization at the cost of the independence and autonomy of the local congregations. The lack of foreign control and the freedom that ensues is considered to be the reason IPC has a better growth rate than other classical Pentecostal denominations in India.

Address:

Peniel Hall
Pallipad Post
Alleppey District
Kerala 690 512
India
<http://www.angelfire.com/al3/ipcpallipad/ipc.html>

Paulson Pulikottil

Sources:

- Abraham, K. E. IPC, the Early Years. (In Malayalam.) Kumbanad, Kerala: K. E. Abraham Foundation, 1955.
- Pulikottil, Paulson. "Pentecostalism in Independent India." In Theological Symposium for Asian Church Leaders. Seoul: 18th Pentecostal World Conference, Seoul Host Committee, 1998.
- Varghese, Habel G. K. E. Abraham: An Apostle from Modern India. Kadampanad, Kerala: Christian Literature Service of India, 1974.

Indonesia

Indonesia is an archipelago of some 17,000 islands spanning three time zones in Southeast Asia, the home of some 210 million people, the fourth largest population in the world, divided into hundreds of ethnic groups. The overwhelming majority of Indonesians, like several other peoples in Southeast Asia, speak Malay or Austronesian languages. Most of the ancestors of the Indonesians of today came from the southern part of China. These ancestors followed a variety of indigenous religions, most of which held in common a belief that all objects, whether animate or inanimate, had their own life force, with some people, like the shamans and other tribal leaders, having more of this life force than others. Because they believed in life after death, they honored dead ancestors, and many of them were practitioners of ancestor worship.

The cultures of the early Indonesians, like the cultures today, were tremendously variegated. The Indonesian islands were home to hundreds of ethnic tribes, each with its own worldview and ways of coping with the demands of everyday living. But there were common threads in this variety: a concern for balance in all aspects of life; an emphasis on reciprocity in relationships; a belief in a permanent connection between life and death; the use of rituals to mark a person's passage from one stage of life to another, including the passage from life to death; and a high degree of tolerance for the beliefs of others.

These common threads formed a cultural legacy that served as hospitable ground for the coming of the great modern religions of the world. By the time these religions made their appearance in Indonesia, codes of behavior based on the Austronesian cultural legacy, worldview, and traditions had been formulated and become a way of life all over Indonesia. To this legacy the modern world religions as they settled in Indonesia formed a series of overlays. Traditional religions continue to be practiced throughout the archipelago, and in the multireligious context of modern Indonesia, new forms of the older religions have also appeared.

There is no historical certainty as to exactly when Hinduism and Buddhism came to Indonesia, but there is enough evidence to support the view that Hinduism was introduced to Indonesia during the first century or second century of the Common Era, and after Hinduism, Bud-

Status of religions in Indonesia, 2000-2050

Followers	2000		2025	2050
	total	% rate
Muslims	116,105,000	54.7 1.50	145,247,000	149,134,000
Neoreligionists	46,235,000	21.8 1.19	53,000,000	57,000,000
Christians	27,804,000	13.1 1.72	43,000,000	61,000,000
Protestants	12,125,000	5.7 1.61	18,400,000	25,000,000
Independents	8,436,000	4.0 1.88	14,500,000	22,000,000
Roman Catholics	5,752,000	2.7 1.62	8,500,000	12,000,000
Hindus	7,259,000	3.4 2.27	10,300,000	15,000,000
Ethnoreligionists	5,334,000	2.5 0.26	5,000,000	4,000,000
Nonreligious	4,107,000	1.9 2.85	9,000,000	15,000,000
Chinese folk-religionists	3,039,000	1.4 2.61	5,000,000	7,000,000
Buddhists	1,938,000	0.9 1.74	2,450,000	2,850,000
Atheists	504,000	0.2 2.34	750,000	1,200,000
Baha'is	26,500	0.0 1.89	45,000	72,000
Jews	170	0.0 1.14	300	500
Total population	212,107,000	100.0 1.50	273,442,000	311,857,000

dhism soon followed. By the seventh century, there was already in South Sumatra the seat of a maritime empire that also served as a center of Buddhist learning, the Srivijaya. By the fourteenth century, a weakened Srivijaya was supplanted by a Hindu empire based on Java, the Majapahit. The decline of the Majapahit in the sixteenth century coincided with the coming of Islam in full force, particularly on the island of Java, after gaining an initial foothold on Sumatra and growing in strength there from as early as the seventh century. Muslims from various parts of the Islamic world contributed to the Islamization of the whole of Indonesia.

Meanwhile waves of Chinese migration into Indonesia brought about the formation of Chinese communities in Indonesia. Up to this day, these communities practice a mix of various religions, including Buddhism, Daoism, Islam, and Christianity.

A funeral procession in Sulawesi, Indonesia (TRIP)

As early as the seventh century, there were Christian communities in Sumatra, but it was only during the fifteenth century that missionaries of the Roman Catholic Church began to convert large parts of the population in eastern Indonesia. With the formation of the Dutch East India Company in the sixteenth century, Protestantism (in the form of the Reformed faith) began to gain a considerable number of adherents. Protestantism experienced significant growth in the nineteenth century with the arrival of numerous missionaries from European missionary societies, primarily of Lutheran and Reformed backgrounds. These efforts produced a number of independent churches related either to particular language groups or confined to one island. Through the last half of the twentieth century, the increase of Indonesian Protestants continued, as a spectrum of missionary movements from various countries in the West sent representatives to Indonesia.

Islam, however, has remained the dominant religion in Indonesia, and today Indonesia is the most populous Muslim country in the world. Some 87 percent of the 210 million Indonesians consider themselves Muslims, most of the SHAFIITE SCHOOL OF ISLAM. This fact, however, has not prevented many Indonesians, particularly the Javanese, from practicing the traditions of Kabatinan and Kejawen, a form of mysticism that carries influences from the mysticism of Austronesian ancestor worship, Hinduism, Buddhism, and Sufi Islam. In any case, the average Indonesian, whatever may be his or her particular beliefs, is a deeply religious person.

It is a reflection of this deep religiosity of the Indonesians that at the height of the struggle for national sovereignty and independence, in 1945, the framers of the Indonesian constitution decided that the Indonesian Republic should be based on the principle of a belief in one God. This same principle is enshrined in the Panca Sila, the state philosophy on which the Indonesian Republic itself was founded. According to this principle, the government recognizes the dominant role that religion plays in the daily life of its citizens and the importance of religion in the maintenance of the unity of the nation. The government is therefore committed to supporting the development of the spiritual and religious life of all Indonesians.

The four other principles in the Panca Sila refer to Indonesia's linkage with all other nations on the basis of humanity; Indonesian nationalism; democracy through deliberation and consensus; and social justice. Indonesia is therefore striving to be both a democracy and a meritocracy in which all religions and beliefs are tolerated, but it is not a secular state. It has a religious foundation. But neither is it a theocracy. It calls itself a Panca Sila state and as such, Indonesia is unique.

Thus Indonesia recognizes five major world religions: Islam, Hinduism, Buddhism, and Christianity. Catholicism and Protestantism are recognized as separate religions within Christianity. Certain Chinese religious practices are officially grouped together under Buddhism. Some local religious traditions have come to be officially classified as forms of Hinduism.

To be able to fulfill its obligations in regard to the spiritual and religious development of the Indonesian people, the Indonesian government maintains a Department of Religion as an important part of its administrative machinery. Established in 1946, the Department of Religion has grown into the third biggest government department, after the Department of Education and Culture and the Department of the Interior. Among its major functions are the promotion of religious harmony and the management of conflict that may arise among Indonesia's many religious communities; the administration of marriage and divorce among Muslims; and the management of the Islamic pilgrimages.

In general, the department serves as a link between traditional and modern forms of religious life. It also supports cooperation with other countries in the field of higher education. It has sent hundreds of lecturers and students to educational institutions in the Middle East and in Western countries.

Thus the history of the Indonesian Republic has been one long pursuit of the ideal of harmony and cooperation among communities of different religions and ethnic origins. And for many years, Indonesians took pride in the success of that philosophy and policy, as communities of various faiths and ethnic origins worked closely together in the cause of development and in the spirit of friendship and goodwill.

Unfortunately, in the last half of the twentieth century Indonesia has been forced to deal with formidable problems that have threatened its national unity and the social cohesiveness of its people. Various developments have worked against Indonesia's endeavors to sustain unity and to achieve social justice, and the Asian financial and economic crisis, which broke out in mid-1997 and with whose aftermath Indonesia still struggles, exposed many weaknesses in Indonesia's economic, social, and political systems. Moreover, there are forces bent on frustrating the effort at reform by destabilizing the administration.

In at least one part of the country, in Maluku, violence and even bloodshed have broken out between members of the Muslim and Christian communities—where before, for many decades, relations between the two communities had been characterized by a spirit of harmony and cooperation. Although the protagonists in this conflict are drawn from the ranks of the Muslims and Christians, it appears on close analysis not to be primarily a religious conflict. Data from the field suggest that this conflict derives from frustration in the local population over their economic situation, coupled with the effects of a disinformation campaign by provocateurs sowing religious discord. In response, the government has moved to bring the provocateurs to justice and to reestablish peace and order. It has also encouraged dialogue between communal leaders.

In spite of the many challenges that it is facing, the government of Indonesia continues its long pursued endeavor to modernize the spiritual and religious life of its citizens and to adhere to a policy of tolerance for all religions and beliefs. In 1999, it convened in Jakarta an international dialogue of the Abrahamic faiths—Judaism, Christianity, and Islam. (There is only one community of Jews residing in Indonesia, consisting of five families who form a worshipping community in Surabaya.) Operating in a dominantly Muslim country, it has promoted scholarships for Muslim students to pursue graduate studies in Christian universities outside the country. In addition, the president of Indonesia, himself a Muslim religious leader, has made known his interest in pursuing interfaith dialogue at both the national and international level.

Irawin Abidin and J. Gordon Melton

Sources:

- Boland, B. J. The Struggle of Islam in Modern Indonesia. The Hague, Netherlands: H. H. L. Smith, 1970.
- Geertz, C. The Religion of Java. Glencoe, IL: Free Press, 1958.
- The Growing Seed: The Christian Church in Indonesia*. 20 vols. Jakarta: DGI Institute, 1976–present.
- Kipp, R. S., and S. Rogers. Indonesian Religions in Transition. Tuscon: University of Arizona Press, 1987.
- McVey, Ruth, ed. Indonesia. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1963.

Indonesia, Buddhism in

When Indonesia became independent in 1950, almost nothing from the Buddhist cultures that had thrived in Sumatra, Java, Bali, and East Kalimantan between approximately the fourth and the sixteenth century C.E. had survived the Islamization of the archipelago. Today, only some stone inscriptions, Buddhist statues and seals, remnants of ancient temples, such as the eighth-century Central Javanese Borobudur, ancient Chinese reports, and a few survivals in some of the local traditions bear witness to the expansion of different Buddhist schools throughout the western part of maritime Southeast Asia.

Buddhist temple in Indonesia (Corel)

The first more comprehensive historical account of Buddhist influence in the archipelago was written by I-Ching, a Chinese Buddhist pilgrim who, in 671, embarked on a journey from Canton to India. In order to await favorable monsoon winds, he stopped over in Palembang, the center of an emerging Buddhist empire in Sumatra called Srivijaya. I-Ching recommended the local religious schools to Chinese students of Buddhism, after he himself had studied Sanskrit grammar in Srivijaya for six months. In 672, he departed to India, returning to Srivijaya on his way back to China. I-Ching observed that Mahayana had only recently been introduced to Sumatra, whereas the Mulasarvastivadanikaya, the Theravada canon in Sanskrit, had been followed for a long time. This tallies with the finds of Amaravati-style Buddha statues in Sumatra, West Kalimantan, and Java, pointing to the dissemination of early Buddhist schools, often classified as Theravada, since the second century. In the late seventh century, however, Mahayana schools of Buddhism began to acquire ideological dominance over the regional courts. Renowned Mahayana teachers from India traveled to Srivijaya, among them Vajrabodhi, the first teacher of the Yogacara school and abbot of Nalanda, as well as Atisa, the reformer of Buddhism in Tibet. The former visited Sumatra in 741, and the latter studied for twelve years (1011–1023) under the local high priest, Dharmakirti.

Between 750 and 850, a Mahayana Buddhist dynasty also reigned in Central Java: the Sailendra, who erected the famous terraced temple-monument Borobudur. Their influence ended inexplicably in the mid-ninth century, while an older dynasty attached to the worship of Siva reemerged to rule the island. Nevertheless, Buddhism continued to coexist with Hinduism, both gradually blending into a distinctly Old-Javanese creed called Siva-Buddha religion. The last regime to follow it, the East Javanese empire of Majapahit, was eventually conquered by Muslim forces around 1530. By then, North India, the Malay Peninsula, and Sumatra had already undergone a thorough Islamization process, which had severed large-scale communication between Java and the Buddhist countries of South and Southeast Asia. Majapahitan culture survived in Bali, though, transforming into a distinctly Balinese blend of Buddhism, Saivism, and ancestor worship.

Buddhism was reintroduced to Indonesia in a totally different form in the first decades of the twentieth century. It was, in fact, the increasingly popular THEOSOPHICAL SOCIETY that sparked growing interest in Buddhism among Dutch colonials, Chinese immigrants, and native noblemen.

Offering the Dutch a more rational version of Asian spirituality, Chinese immigrants a way of reinvigorating their Chineseness, and subjugated Javanese as well as Balinese noblemen a medium through which to reconnect to their glorious ancient past, Buddhism was disseminated in a Theravada and a Chinese Mahayana guise. In 1934, the Sri Lankan monk Narada Mahathera visited Java, planting a Bodhi Tree at the recently restored Borobudur. It was actually a seedling from a Bodhi Tree in Sri Lanka, which had itself been grown from a seed of the original Bodhi Tree in Bodh Gaya. The latter had been brought to Sri Lanka in the late nineteenth century by the theosophist Ir. Meertens. Narada Mahathera's gift thus reflected one of the trajectories of Buddhist revival in modern Indonesia. As Theravada followers forged closer contacts with Buddhist monasteries in Sri Lanka, Burma, and Thailand, Chinese Mahayana priests were invited to some of the Indonesian-Chinese Buddhist communities. Still, there were no clear-cut boundaries between the two groups.

In 1953, an Indonesia-born Chinese, Tee Boan-An, a former theosophist and student of the Chinese Mahayana priest Chen Ping Lau He Sang, departed to Burma, where he was ordained as the first Theravada monk from Indonesia in 1954. Under his new name, Ashin Jinarakkhita, he returned to Indonesia the same year. In 1955, he formed the first Buddhist lay association, Persaudaraan Upasaka Upasika Indonesia (PUUI), in independent Indonesia, which he integrated two years later into the Indonesian Buddhist Association (Perhimpunan Buddhis Indonesia, Perbudi), comprising both the Theravada and Mahayana priesthood and their following. In order to acquire official recognition of Buddhism from the Indonesian Ministry of Religion, Jinarakkhita had from early on tried to adapt Indonesian Buddhism (Buddhayana) to universal monotheism (Ketuhanan Yang Maha Esa) as professed in the Indonesian constitution. By equating the primordial Buddha (Adi-Buddha) with God, however, he eventually provoked the split-up of the national Buddhist community. There were those who could not endorse even the faintest allusion to theism, and there were others who increasingly rejected the spiritual guidance of Buddhists specially approved of by the Indonesian government. This has applied in particular to the strict followers of Theravada as well as to NICHIREN SHÔSHÛ International, which became popular in Indonesia in the 1970s. Members of the Chinese-Indonesian community, on the other hand, preferred a kind of folk Buddhism that also incorporated Daoist and Confucian tenets and customs (Tridharma).

After the fall of the Sukarno government in May 1998, religious liberalization has encouraged a part of the Chinese-Indonesian community to drop out of Tridharma Buddhism and to fight for the recognition of Neo-Confucianism as a religion. This recognition was granted by former president Abdurrahman Wahid in 2000. Today, Indonesia's 2–3 percent Buddhists are a heterogeneous minority supporting monotheistic Buddhayana, Theravada, various Mahayana traditions (Chinese, Tibetan, Japanese, reinvented Javanese), Tridharma, and Nichiren.

Martin Ramstedt

Sources:

- Brown, Iem. "The Revival of Buddhism in Modern Indonesia." In "Hinduism" in Modern Indonesia: Hindu Dharma Indonesia between Local, National, and Global Interests, edited by Martin Ramstedt. Richmond, Surrey, UK: Curzon, 2002.
- Coedès, Georges. The Indianized States of Southeast Asia. Honolulu: East-West Center, 1968.
- Ishii, Yoneo. "Modern Buddhism in Indonesia." In Buddhist Studies in Honour of Hammalava Saddhatissa, edited by Gatara Dhammapala, Richard Gombrich, and K. R. Norman. Nugegoda, Sri Lanka: University of Sri Jayewardenepura, 1984.
- Soekmono, J. G. Casparis, and Jacques Dumarçay. Borobudur: Prayer in Stone. Singapore: Archipelago Press, 1990.

Indonesia, Confucianism in Chinese travelers were journeying in maritime Southeast Asia as early as the beginning of the Christian era. They acquired a dominant position as interlocal traders and merchants in the populous areas of the western part of what is now Indonesia, before the arrival of the Dutch at the end of the sixteenth century. The Dutch East India Company, formed in 1602, succeeded in ousting the Chinese from their dominant position in Southeast Asian commerce. By creating an apartheid society, consisting of "Europeans," "natives," and "alien Orientals," the Dutch also obstructed the blending of Chinese immigrants with the indigenous peoples. Furthermore, from 1900 onwards, colonial policy began to expressly favor the interests of the natives to the detriment of the Chinese, who were pictured as amoral and unscrupulous exploiters impeding the progress of the native race.

The Chinese community reacted by revitalizing its Chinese identity. In 1900 the Chinese Association (Tiong Hoa Hwee Koan, or THHK) was established in Batavia, with branches founded in all major cities of the Dutch East Indies. The THHK set out to promote Confucianism as the spiritual power of all Chinese, taking up efforts similar to those of the leader of the Confucian reform movement in China, K'ang Yu-wei (1858–1927), who had been trying to establish Neo-Confucianism as a national religion in the motherland. Countering the increasing inability of Chinese people in Indonesia to understand guo-yu (the national language, or Mandarin), the THHK established over 250 Chinese schools where pupils received lessons in both Confucianism and Mandarin, alongside a modern education. Already in 1906, the first Confucian shrine, Boen Bio, was built in Surabaya, in northeast Java. In 1918 the Confucian Religion Council was founded in Surakarta, central Java, and in 1923 a congress was held at nearby Yogyakarta, during which the Center for the Confucian Religion Assembly (Khong Kauw Tjong Hwee) was established. The first book on Confucianism in the Malay language, Bahasa Melayu Betawi, had already been published in 1897. By 1936 a translation of four Confucian texts (the Ta Hsueh or Great Learning, Chung Yung or Doctrine of the Mean, Lun Yu or Analects, and Mencius) had followed. In addition, several weeklies in the Malay language were published to effectively promote Confucianism.

During the Indonesian struggle for independence, the Indonesian Chinese asserted their anticolonial attitude. In 1946 Sukarno (1901–1970), the leader of the Indonesian independence movement, granted Confucianism the status of “religion” (Agama Khonghucu). Ruling as Indonesia’s first president from 1945 on, Sukarno reconfirmed his decision in 1961. He thereby supported the claims of the Khong Kauw Tjong Hwee Indonesia—as it was now called—that the Confucianist concept of Heaven (Thian) is equivalent to Christian and Muslim monotheism, that Confucius was a prophet, and that the Confucian ethic is “religious law” to be observed by all Confucianists. Consequently, the Su Si, a compilation of the above-mentioned four classical texts, was instituted as a “holy book,” and Confucius’s birthday (August 27) and the day of his death (February 18) were made official holidays for his followers.

Affirming the necessity to assimilate, the Khong Kauw Tjong Hwee Indonesia dropped its Chinese name in 1964 and took the Indonesian designation Gabungan Perhimpunan Agama Khonghucu Seluruh Indonesia (Federation of Associations of the Confucian Religion in the whole of Indonesia). At the same time, the Youth Association of the Confucian Religion (Gabungan Pemuda Agama Khonghucu) was established, paralleling the youth organizations of all the other recognized religious communities in Indonesia.

When General Suharto (b. 1921) emerged as the most powerful man in Indonesia after quelling an abortive coup in 1965 and eventually deposing Sukarno as president, he was at first also prepared to accept Confucianism as an officially recognized religion. Pursuing a rigorous purge of ATHEISM and Communism, his regime made religious affiliation obligatory for every citizen. Hence, Confucianism needed to adapt to the rigid standards of the Ministry of Religion to counter the increasingly voiced accusation that it was nothing but an alien philosophy of ethics and not a universal religion.

In 1967 the Supreme Council for Confucian Religion in Indonesia (Majelis Tinggi Agama Khonghucu Indonesia, MATAKIN) was established. Regional branches were also formed, the so-called Councils for Confucian Religion in Indonesia (Majelis Khonghucu Indonesia, MAKIN). More than one hundred places of worship (lithang) were built. Following the model of the Christian churches, a Confucian clergy was formed that includes haksu (high priests), bunsu (Confucian teachers), and kausing (missionaries). Alongside the youth organization, a Women’s Association (Wanita Agama Khonghucu Indonesia) was founded. Confucian rites were celebrated with deep religiosity. Chinese New Year (Imlek) has become the best-known festivity of the Confucian yearly cycle. There are also monthly services, Sunday services, funerals, and weddings, at which altar boys and girls assist the officiating priest and a choir sings Confucian hymns.

Yet, all these measures could not abate the growing doubts about the religious status of Confucianism. In 1969, one year after his official appointment as president, Suharto interdicted all public manifestations of Chinese culture, demanding “full assimilation.” Consequently, Confucian weddings were not acknowledged anymore. Children resulting from such unions were denied birth certificates and thus normal civic rights. Confucianism and Mandarin could no longer be taught at public schools. From 1977 onward, Confucianists were forced to have their children educated in one of the recognized religions. Nevertheless, private practice of Confucianism was not forbidden, and the MATAKIN was still allowed to exist under the supervision of the Directorate General for the Guidance of the Hindu and Buddhist Communities (Direktorat Jenderal Bimbingan Masyarakat Agama Hindu dan Budha). Nonetheless, many ethnic Chinese chose to convert to Buddhism and even to Christianity and Islam, while secretly continuing to perform Confucian rites, including Imlek.

As a result, official Confucian membership numbers became obscure. In 1974 the MATAKIN counted 3 million followers, while the official census registered only 99,920 people (0.8 percent of the total Indonesian population). In order to counter anti-Chinese policies, the Indonesian Chinese Eternal Cultural Foundation (Yayasan Lestari Kebudayaan Tionghoa Indonesia) was formed. One of its major goals was to achieve the official recognition of Confucianism as a religion and of Imlek as a national holiday. Although this effort gained significant support from representatives of other denominations, anti-Chinese sentiments continued to smolder among the Muslim majority, impeding official recognition of Agama Khonghucu. In the wake of the Asian economic crisis and the ensuing demise of the Suharto regime, Indonesian Chinese were blamed for the destitute Indonesian economy and suffered severe pogroms. Their situation improved notably when Abdurrahman Wahid (b. 1940) was elected president in October 1999. Wahid instantly lifted the ban on the public celebration of Chinese festivities, making Imlek an optional state holiday and eventually recognizing Agama Khonghucu as one of the religions adhered to by the Indonesian people. This helped to restore a sense of pride and recognition among the Indonesian Chinese, who today are estimated at 16 to 17 million people (7–8 percent of the total Indonesian population). Confucianists are numbered at around 1 million people.

However, the performance of the classical Confucian rites has become a thing of the past, since most of them require the participation of large, extended families. Most of the Indonesian Chinese today have small, nuclear families consisting of four to five people. Moreover, modernization has led people to concentrate more on the future than on their filial duty toward their ancestors. Just like Christmas in the West, Imlek has become, above all, a good opportunity for social gatherings as well as commercial pursuit.

Martin Ramstedt

Sources:

Coppel, Charles A. "Is Confucianism a Religion? A 1923 Debate in Java." Archipel 38 (1989): 125–135.

———. "The Origin of Confucianism as an Organized Religion in Java, 1900–1923." Journal of Southeast Asian Studies 7/1 (1981): 179–196.

Kwee Tek Hoay. Origins of the Modern Chinese Movement in Indonesia. Ithaca, NY: Cornell University Press, 1962.

Lasiyo. "Agama Khonghucu: An Emerging Form of Religious Life among the Indonesian Chinese." Ph.D. dissertation, University of London, School of Oriental and African Studies, Centre of Religion and Philosophy, 1992.

Suryadinata, Leo. "Confucianism in Indonesia. Past and Present." Southeast Asia: An International Quarterly 3, 3 (1974): 881–903.

Indonesia, Hinduism in

During the period when Bali was coming under Dutch control between 1846 and 1908, the island was recognized as the last Hindu enclave by European orientalist and soon became famous as such in the international jet set. The Balinese on their part, however, had not hitherto considered themselves as Hindus. Instead, the elite of traditional Balinese caste society, that is, the satria and wesia kings (raja) as well as the brahmana priests (pedanda), had seen themselves as descendants of the last Hindu-Javanese kingdom of Majapahit, which had fallen to Muslim forces around 1530. The Majapahitan culture and religion itself had been a blending of elements of different Buddhist schools, VAISHNAVISM, SAIVISM, and autochthonous traditions involving ancestor worship.

Ancient Indian culture had influenced the western part of the archipelago since approximately the second century C.E. Among the earliest archaeological finds pointing to the dissemination of various strands of classical Hinduism in West Kalimantan as well as West and East Java from at least the fifth century onwards were the names of kings inscribed in stone, along with statues of Siva, Vishnu, and Brahma as well as those of their respective vehicles and family. The construction of the various Shaivite temples (candi) in Central Java from the late eighth century onwards culminated in the famous Candi Prambanan that was built in the mid-ninth century. Here, we also encounter the earliest proof of the dissemination of the Ramayana in the archipelago: a detailed relief recounting the story of Rama and Sita according to the Valmiki version. From the tenth century until the fall of Majapahit, a rich literature in the Old Javanese language developed in East Java, recreating both the Ramayana and Mahabharata in the local vernacular as well as addressing topics of other Indian works in an idiosyncratic manner. The Indian epics had a great impact on aesthetic development at the Hindu-Javanese courts, whereas the study of the Indian philosophical systems, Mimamsa, Samkhya, and Yoga, as well as the texts and practices of the Saiva Siddhanta, were the domain of the Shaivite priesthood. At the royal rituals, geared to reaffirm and reinforce the sacrality of local kings and their realms, the latter practiced side by side with Vaishnava and Buddhist clerics.

The practice of deifying dead local rulers continued to thrive in Bali, the heir of Hindu-Javanese culture after the downfall of Majapahit at the beginning of the sixteenth century. The three upper castes (triwangsa), tracing their descent back to noblemen and priests from Majapahit, actually sponsored a plethora of local rituals that revolved around commemorating their Javanese ancestors (bhatara). The Sudra majority were obliged to join in the veneration of the progenitors of their patrons and rulers. These rituals—in fact all traditional rituals—were ultimately designed to reestablish or maintain the correspondence between the visible world (sakala) and the universal principles of the cosmic order that had emanated from Siva and were believed to be hidden in the invisible world (niskala). Successful performance of the rituals (yadnya) would activate the life-giving aspects (kerta) of the transcendent yet immanent cosmic principles, and important agents in this process were the ancestors of the noble families.

Although the various categories of Balinese priests practiced yoga and meditation (semadi), the majority of Balinese were thus immersed in a ritual system that largely consisted of details resembling other so-called animistic traditions in the archipelago. As soon as Bali was integrated into the Dutch East Indies, both Christian and Muslim missionaries were referring to this majority when claiming that the Balinese were not really Hindu but rather "animistic heathens" strongly in need of "religion." At the same time, the sociopolitical innovations introduced by the Dutch colonial administration began to threaten traditional beliefs and lifestyles. In order to protect their religion against destructive outside influence, while also proposing to abolish customs that were not in accordance with the new times, several religious reform organizations were formed between 1917 and 1942 (the beginning of the Japanese occupation). Influenced by European orientalists, who confirmed the link between Balinese culture and ancient Indian religion, as well as the THEOSOPHICAL SOCIETY (ADYAR), who considered the Hindu-Javanese and Balinese nobility as descendants of the “Aryan race,” these reform organizations looked to India for orientation. The more progressive ones embraced key issues of Indian reformed Hinduism, as seen in such groups as the BRAHMO SAMAJ, professed by Rabindranath Tagore (1861–1941), who visited both Java and Bali in 1927. The more conservative ones, however, had stronger leanings toward (Balinese) orthodoxy, and endorsed the (local) caste system.

After World War II and the ensuing independence of the unitary Indonesian nation-state, the Balinese experienced unexpected discrimination against their religion on the part of the Muslim-dominated Indonesian Ministry of Religion. In order to comply with the Indonesian constitution, which made belief in universal monotheism mandatory for every citizen, and to avoid forced conversion to either Islam or Christianity, the Balinese again resorted to Indian reformed Hinduism to reformulate the tenets of their belief. In 1961, the monotheistic Hindu Dharma was officially recognized by the Indonesian Government. When adherence to a recognized religion became a matter of survival during the purge of communism in late 1965, members of other ethnic groups in Java, South Sulawesi, North Sumatra, and Central Kalimantan with no inclination to convert to Islam or Christianity began to embrace Hinduism as an umbrella under which to continue their various local traditions. Although it is true that Indonesian Hinduism has been lenient toward the practice of local customs, the increasing influence of more discriminate Indian sects and movements, especially since the beginning of the 1990s, has widened the rift between the various factions within the Indonesian Hindu community. Today, the approximately 6 million Indonesian Hindus (i.e., 2.9 percent of the total population) are not only divided along ethnic lines, but also on the basis of different attitudes toward issues such as vegetarianism, hegemony of priests trained in Indian philosophy rather than local concepts and practices, ritualism rather than greater emphasis on spiritual practices like prayer and meditation, and caste privileges.

Martin Ramstedt

Sources:

- Bakker, F. L. The Struggle of the Hindu Balinese Intellectuals: Developments in Modern Hindu Thinking in Independent Indonesia. Amsterdam: VU University Press, 1993.
- Coedès, Georges. The Indianized States of Southeast Asia. Honolulu: East-West Center Press, 1968.
- Lyon, Margaret L. “Politics and Religious Identity: Genesis of a Javanese-Hindu Movement in Rural Central Java.” Ph.D. dissertation, University of California, 1977.

Ramstedt, Martin, ed. Hinduism in Modern Indonesia: Hindu Dharma Indonesia between Local, National, and Global Interests. Richmond, Surrey, UK: Curzon, 2002.

Indonesian Christian Church (HKI)

The Indonesian Christian Church (Huria Kristen Indonesia, HKI) originated as a split in the RHENISH MISSION work (now the PROTESTANT CHRISTIAN BATAK CHURCH) on Sumatra. Some of the Indonesian leaders were seeking the ordination of Batak ministers and the elevation of more Batak people into other leadership positions. All of the ordained ministers were German, and they controlled the affairs of the church. Those who left were in northern Sumatra and spoke the Toba Batak language. The strength of the church remains in rural areas of Sumatra, but the church has spread as its members have moved around the country in the latter part of the twentieth century.

The new church adopted the organization of the parent body, with a synod headed by a president as the highest legislative body. Most pastors receive their training with the Theological Faculty at Nonnensen University. The church operates among some of the poorer people of Sumatra, and has a rather limited institutional program. It has managed to develop a set of primary and secondary schools. It has also nurtured a project to bring clean drinking water to some of the more remote villages.

The ministerium of the church have worked on the problem, so crucial to Indonesian Christian life, of the relationship of Christian precept to Adat, the rules and customs that have traditionally been passed down through the culture.

In the 1970s, with assistance from the Evangelical Lutheran Church in America and in cooperation with the Simalungun Protestant Christian Church, the HKI developed an innovative program for educating the church’s large group of teacher-preachers who did not have the opportunity for seminary training. The program dealt with many immediate situations these leaders encountered but also included instructions in traditional theological topics. Integral to the program was the willingness of some older pastors to become mentors to the younger workers.

At the end of the 1980s, the church reported 330,000 members. It is a member of the LUTHERAN WORLD FEDERATION and the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES.

Address:

Indonesian Christian Church
Jalan Melanchton Siregar No. 111
Pematangsiantar 21128 North Sumatra
Indonesia

Source:

Bachmann, E. Theodore, and Mercia Brenne Bachmann. Lutheran Churches in the World: A Handbook. Minneapolis, MN: Augsburg Press, 1989.

Indonesian Gospel Tabernacle Church (GKII)

The Indonesian Gospel Tabernacle Church (Gereja Kemah Injil Indonesia, GKII) originated with a decision by the Christian and Missionary Alliance (CMA) to launch missionary work in the Netherlands Indies (now Indonesia). The decision was implemented by Robert A. Jaffray (1873–1945), who had worked in China for the previous thirty years. In 1927 he and Leland Wang founded the Chinese Foreign Mission Union and began work among Chinese migrants in several Indonesian urban areas. They also responded to an opening among the Mahakam people on Kalimantan and soon had a church of more than 2,000 members. Jaffray settled in Makassar, which became the early center of the work. In 1930 he opened a publishing house and two years later a Bible school.

One by one, the CMA selected areas neglected by both the Dutch Reformed missionaries and the German missionaries (primarily from the RHENISH MISSION), and opened work in East Kalimantan, Lombok (1929), Bali (1931), southern Sumatra (1933), and West Kalimantan (1935). Additional missions appeared over the next seven years. The greatest response came in East Kalimantan and Irian (opened in 1939). A second Bible school was opened in East Kalimantan in 1938. The use of Bible school graduates allowed the mission to spread rapidly and prepared it for independence. The mission also pioneered the use of an airplane to overcome the problems of travel through jungle terrain.

As the mission spread, it also encountered people who had moved around the islands. Upon their conversion many of them returned to their homes and began churches in regions where there was an already existing Reformed church. Reformed church leaders rose to oppose the CMA. It was condemned for its relative lack of theological education and its introduction of American methods of missionary work. Working with the government, the Reformed church had the CMA expelled from several locations, including Bali. However, the mission had already become a large organization and by 1941 had 139 mission stations and had placed more than a hundred Indonesian workers into the field.

The loss of the relatively small number of missionaries (20) during the war did not affect the CMA work as badly as that of the Reformed churches; however, the pain was real. Four American missionaries and ten Indonesian workers were killed. Jaffray was one of two missionaries who died while interned. The Japanese forced the CMA church to join the regional councils of churches that it imposed upon the Protestant community (following a pattern already in place in Japan).

After the war, an expansive program to take the church to all of Indonesia had spectacular results. In 1951, the work was organized into three regional churches. Five years later these churches were given independence, and the missionaries became subordinate to the new church authorities. A new relationship between the now independent churches and the parent body was negotiated. In 1965, the three churches entered into a fellowship, Kemah Injil Gereja Masehi Indonesia. This fellowship grew to include three additional independent churches that matured from the CMA missionary efforts. In 1983 the fellowship was transformed into the new united Indonesian Gospel Tabernacle Church.

One sign of the growth of the new church during the 1970s and 1980s was the founding of additional Bible schools and the maturing of the original Bible school into the Jaffray Bible College (1958) and the Sekolah Tinggi Theologia Jaffray (1966). In 1990 the church reported 323,000 members. The church is a member of the Evangelical Fellowship of Asia, through which it is related to the WORLD EVANGELICAL ALLIANCE, and the ALLIANCE WORLD FELLOWSHIP.

Source:

Bauswein, Jean-Jacques, and Lukas Vischer, eds. The Reformed Family Worldwide: A Survey of Reformed Churches, Theological Schools, and International Organizations. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans, 1999.

Initiatives for Change/ Moral Re-Armament

Initiatives for Change is the name adopted in 2001 for the spiritual movement begun in the 1920s as the First Century Christian Fellowship, which has been known in recent decades as Moral Re-Armament (MRA). The movement was founded by Lutheran minister Dr. Frank Buchman (1878–1961). Buchman had had an intense personal spiritual awakening in 1908. In the years after World War I he began to share his experience of release from resentment and other negative emotions with college students at Oxford and Cambridge in England, and as his following grew, it was informally named the Oxford Movement.

Buchman suggested that God could become real to anyone who believed, the lack of experience of God being caused by moral laxness. A turnaround began with self-examination in the light of moral standards—purity, unselfishness, and love. He offered a means of realizing a change through the confession of one's failings to another and listening for God's guidance in the quiet moments of life, as one listens to one's thoughts. He organized a series of what were termed house parties to share—that is, to confess and listen.

Buchman was deeply concerned as Europe rearmed in preparation for World War II. He proposed that the next great world movement would be (should be) a program for moral and spiritual rearmament. The Oxford group launched a program for Moral Re-Armament in 1938. After the war, the group purchased a hotel at Caux, in Switzerland, to focus its program for postwar healing and reconciliation. They brought together people from both sides in the war and placed them in intimate space for personal and social reflection. Leaders likened their work to an ideological Marshall Plan. They did breakthrough work by including both Germans and Japanese in their programs, and in 1986 MRA was given credit by Japanese Prime Minister Nakasone for contributing to the re-creation of Japan in the postwar years. The leadership of MRA developed their program around two major imperatives: They envisioned a world in which the national leaders were themselves governed by God, and they advocated the beginning of each day with quiet time to listen for God's guidance.

While MRA was developing their international program, another program that had originated from the Oxford group developed as an independent sister organization. A man simply known as Bill to the large audience who had heard of him, who had experienced the changes Buchman advocated, developed his understanding of Buchman's approach into a twelve-step program to assist alcoholics to stop drinking. Alcoholics Anonymous spread across the United States and then internationally. In the 1960s it began to spin off a set of twelve-step programs to deal with a variety of addictions, from narcotic drugs to gambling.

In the years since Buchman's death, MRA has been led by an informal leadership at the global level. It operates through a number of national affiliates, each incorporated in its own country. There is a large international conference center in Caux, Switzerland, which also serves as the international headquarters, and a similar center in Mumbai, India. Smaller centers are located in the United Kingdom, Australia, Brazil, and Zimbabwe.

The organization, now Initiatives for Change, supports an expansive Internet site at the address given below. Both the British and American organizations also have an Internet presence. Initiatives for Change oversees a variety of programs that embody its concerns as they affect different arenas of human activity. It is not a membership organization, but some tens of thousands of people in eighty countries are estimated to be part of its active network. There are national organizations in thirty-seven countries.

Address:

Initiatives for Change
Rue du panorama
1824 Caux
Switzerland
<http://www.caux.ch/>

Sources:

Belden, K. D. Reflections on Moral Re-Armament. London: Grosvenor, 1983.

Buchman, Frank N. Remaking the World. London: Blandford Press, 1961.

Lean, Garth. On the Tail of a Comet: The Life of Frank Buchman. Colorado Springs, CO: Helmes and Howard, 1989.

Insight Meditation Society

The Insight Meditation Society (IMS) was founded in 1975, on the eighty-acre site of a former Catholic seminary and boys' school just north of Barre, Massachusetts, as a non-profit organization for the intensive practice of insight meditation (or vipassana), a system largely developed by the Burmese monk Mahasi Sayadaw (1904–1982). Part of what some individuals refer to as a twentieth-century modernization movement in Theravada, vipassana is an intensive form of meditation aimed primarily at a lay-oriented audience and designed to promote the attainment of the first of the four traditional levels of sainthood.

The site was purchased collectively by Joseph Goldstein, Jack Kornfield, Sharon Salzberg, and Jacqueline Schwartz, each of whom had studied with Asian vipassana teachers. Goldstein (b. 1944) studied with Mahasi Sayadaw and his students Anagarika Munindra and U Pandita; Salzberg (b. 1952) studied with S. N. Goenka, Mahasi Sayadaw, Munindra, and U Pandita; Kornfield (b. 1945) studied with Achaan Cha, and Mahasi Sayadaw. Each returned to the United States to begin teaching various retreats, and although these initial retreats were what Gil Fronsdal calls "a hybrid of Asian forms," their collective style was eventually geared for a Western audience of convert Buddhists, and thus virtually stripped of the religious trappings of Theravada, such as rituals, chanting, and the like. Jack Kornfield moved to California in 1981, eventually founding Spirit Rock Meditation Center in western Marin County.

There are several categories of teacher at IMS, as the center is called. These include senior Dharma teachers, associate Dharma teachers, and visiting teachers. In addition, there is always a "resident teacher" at the center. IMS sponsors various retreats for beginning and experienced meditators, consisting of daily meditation and nightly Dharma talks, interspersed with individual and group interviews with the teachers. The retreats are profoundly rigorous in nature, generally beginning as early as 5 A.M. and maintaining a routine of alternating periods of silent sitting and walking meditation, culminating around 10 P.M. Participants live in austere single quarters, segregated by gender, and all meals are vegetarian. In addition to the group retreats, experienced meditators may engage in self-retreats, work retreats, and long-term practice retreats. In the quarter century since its founding IMS has grown, and in 1997 it offered approximately two dozen retreats, ranging from two-day weekend retreats to one eighty-four-day retreat.

Although Asian vipassana teachers focus on the attainment of freedom, negatively defined as the freedom from certain characteristics such as greed, hatred, and delusion (the traditional “three poisons” of Buddhism) and positively defined as the attainment of nibbana (nirvana), Western teachers like those at IMS stress the positive aspects of freedom, such as stress reduction, a happy life, and compassionate living. Although many traditional Theravada practices, such as merit-making and taking monastic vows, are not emphasized, four concomitant practices of vipassana are stressed: mindfulness (Pali, sati), loving-kindness (metta), ethics (sila), and generosity (dana).

Like many American Buddhist communities, IMS has developed an academic component in order to help its practitioners to combine practice and study in a mutually reinforcing environment. To that end, the Barre Center for Buddhist Studies (BCBS) was founded in 1989 on ninety acres of wooded land, a half mile from IMS. The center’s executive director is Andrew Olendzki, and the director is Mu Soeng, a former Zen monk. In addition to Spirit Rock Meditation Center, mentioned above, the Cambridge Insight Meditation Center near Boston, the Vipassana Foundation of Maui, and Gaia House in the United Kingdom are associated with IMS.

Although IMS generally maintains a low profile, it has also been a leader in developing practices based on compassion and ethics for members and teachers alike. It has even developed an “Insight Meditation Teacher’s Code of Ethics,” which has enabled IMS to remain remarkably free of the scandals that have been documented in other American Buddhist communities. Moreover, its success can be measured by the fact that in the decade between 1987 and 1997, centers based on Theravada meditation techniques grew from 72 to more than 150.

The Insight Meditation Society is headquartered in Barre. The associated periodical, Inquiring Mind, the national journal of the vipassana meditation movement, is published from P.O. Box 9999, North Berkeley Station, Berkeley, CA 94709. Insight Magazine Online may be accessed at <http://www.dharma.org/insight.htm>.

Address:

Insight Meditation Society
1230 Pleasant St.
Barre, MA 01005
<http://www.dharma.org/ims.htm>

Charles S. Prebish

Sources:

- Fronsdal, Gil. “Insight Meditation in the United States: Life, Liberty and the Pursuit of Happiness.” In The Faces of Buddhism in America, edited by Charles S. Prebish and Kenneth K. Tanaka. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1998.
- Prebish, Charles S. Luminous Passage: The Practice and Study of Buddhism in America. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1999.

Seager, Richard Hughes. Buddhism in America. New York: Columbia University Press, 1999.

Integral Yoga International

Integral Yoga refers both to the synchronization of the several forms of yoga teachings and to a specific group founded by Sri Swami Satchidananda in 1966. Sri Swami Sivananda Saraswatiji Maharaj (1887–1963), a renowned Hindu teacher and revered holy man of the twentieth century, is credited with first using the concept integral yoga. Integral yoga basically means a practice that synthesizes the major yoga traditions—hatha, raja, bhakti, jnana, and karma. Sivananda also added a sixth, japa yoga, a practice based in the repetition of a mantra.

Sri Swami Satchidananda was one of several Sivananda disciples who carried his teachings beyond the traditional boundaries of Hinduism in India. Other disciples of Sivananda used the concept integral yoga, but it is Satchidananda who is credited both with popularizing the concept and developing a synthesis of yoga teachings.

Satchidananda was born in 1914 in a small village of South India. After studying agriculture and science, he worked at several commercial and technical positions. Dissatisfied with these endeavors, he determined at age twenty-eight to pursue a spiritual quest. He isolated himself and explored yoga through texts; later Satchidananda sat at the feet of several of India’s great religious teachers.

In 1947 Satchidananda’s spiritual quest led him to Swami Sivananda. He was initiated as a sannyasin (or monk) in 1949 and, because of his mastery of the various forms of yoga, was given the title Yogiraj, meaning master of yoga. Satchidananda’s affiliation with Sivananda and the latter’s DIVINE LIFE SOCIETY extended over almost two decades. In addition to extensive lectures throughout India, Satchidananda taught yoga and established centers in Sri Lanka (then known as Ceylon), Honk Kong, Japan, Malaysia, Singapore, and the Philippines.

A two-day trip to New York in 1966 was extended to five months and eventually led to the establishment of the United States as Satchidananda’s base for worldwide operations.

In October 1966, the first Integral Yoga Institute was founded in New York City. In 1972 Yogaville-West, a community for those who practiced Integral Yoga, was created in Seigler Springs, California. A year later Yogaville-East was founded in northeast Connecticut and served as the American headquarters for Integral Yoga for almost ten years.

Swamiji, as Satchidananda is known to his disciples, has also been instrumental in advocating and sponsoring ecumenical, or interfaith, programs. For over fifty years he has initiated and participated in many interfaith gatherings around the world. The goal of Integral Yoga, writes Swami Satchidananda, “is to realize the spiritual unity behind all the diversities in the entire creation and to live harmoniously as members of one universal family.” Through the years he has helped popularize the teaching that “Truth is One, Paths are Many.”

Through a gift from folksinger Carole King, Integral Yoga International acquired 600 acres of woodlands in Buckingham County, Virginia, in late 1979, which became the movement’s world headquarters. Here, on the banks of the James River, Sri Satchidananda constructed the Light of Truth Universal Shrine (LOTUS), a shrine to all the world’s religions. Dedicated in July 1986, the LOTUS shrine is intended as a place where all faith traditions can come to worship and pray and find the One Spirit that unites all.

The Satchidananda Ashram-Yogaville is both a monastic order and teaching center. In 2001 approximately eighty persons lived on the property, and an additional two hundred affiliates reside near the ashram. More than fifty instructional programs and retreats were conducted in 2001, most lasting for a duration of one to two weeks. Integral Yoga International has four institutes in the United States and one each in Canada and India. IYI maintains thirty-seven centers in twenty-eight countries; almost half are in the United States. It also maintains a set of Internet sites, including Web pages for the Satchidananda Ashram-Yogaville (<http://yogaville.org/>), Integral Yoga Institute (<http://www.integralyogaofnewyork.org>), and the Integral Yoga Teachers Association (<http://www.iyta.org>). More than four hundred persons in twenty-three countries are certified to offer instruction in Integral Yoga.

Address:

Integral Yoga International Route 1 Box 1720
Buckingham, VA 23921

Sarah Meadows and Jeffrey K. Hadden

Sources:

- Bordow, Sita, et al. Sri Swami Satchidananda: Apostle of Peace. Yogaville, VA: Integral Yoga Publications, 1986.
- Mendelkorn, Phillip, ed. To Know Your Self: The Essential Teachings of Swami Satchidananda. Garden City, NY: Anchor Books, 1978.
- Satchidananda, Sri Swami. The Yoga Sutras of Patanjali. Yogaville, VA: Integral Yoga Publications, 1978.
- Weiner, Sita. Swami Satchidananda. New York, NY: Bantam Books, 1972.

International Association for Religious Freedom

The oldest interfaith organization operating on the international scene, the International Association for Religious Freedom was founded in Boston, Massachusetts, by liberal religious leaders in 1900. That year people from various countries had gathered to attend the seventy-fifth anniversary gathering of the American Unitarian Association. In the United States that year was Protap Chundar Mozoomdar (1840–1905), a spiritual teacher from India and representative of the BRAHMO SAMAJ, with which the Unitarians had developed a close relationship. The president of the Unitarians, Samuel A. Elliott, also played a prominent role in the founding of the new association.

Founded as the International Council of Unitarian and Other Religious Liberals, but soon changed to International Council of Religious Liberals, the association met annually until World War I prevented its gatherings. After the war it continued to meet, but seemed to have lost its purpose. However, in the post–World War II climate of urgency, it was reorganized as the International Association for Liberal Christianity and Religious Freedom. Its headquarters were established in the United States but soon moved to Germany. As religious liberty was the motivating force, it soon adopted the name by which it is currently known. It has subsequently attracted an interfaith coalition of leaders from around the world, though in the West it retains a primary contact with Unitarians. The North American chapter still gathers with the annual meeting of the UNITARIAN UNIVERSALIST ASSOCIATION’s general assembly.

The International Association sponsors a Triennial World Congress and periodic regional conferences in North America, Europe, and Asia. It deals with particular issues, among the many issues in religious freedom at any moment, as they are brought before it.

Address:

International Association for Religious Freedom
2 Market St.
Oxford OX1 3FF
United Kingdom
<http://www.religiousfreedom.org>

Sources:

- Bowie, W. Copeland. Liberal Religious Thought at the Beginning of the Twentieth Century: Addresses and Papers at the International Council of Unitarian and Other Religious Thinkers and Workers, Held at London, May 1901. London: Philip Green, 1901.
- Miller, Russell E. The Larger Hope: The Second Century of the Universalist Church in America, 1870–1970. Boston, MA: Unitarian Universalist Association, 1985.

International Association of Reformed and Presbyterian Churches

The International Association of Reformed and Presbyterian Churches was founded in 1962 by delegates attending the meeting of the International Council of Christian Churches (ICCC) meeting in Amsterdam, the Netherlands. The ICCC represents the most conservative wing of Protestantism, usually referred to as fundamentalist. It is militantly opposed to the most liberal wing of the Protestant community, as represented by the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES (WCC) and the WORLD ALLIANCE OF REFORMED CHURCHES (WARC). The inspiration for the formation of the International Association was the trip of the moderator of the CHURCH OF SCOTLAND (a prominent member of both the WCC and WARC) to the Vatican.

The ICCC and the International Association both strongly affirm the infallibility and inerrancy of the Bible and demand the separation of Christians from all apostasy and heresy (which they believe have permeated the more liberal churches). Rev. Carl McIntire (b. 1906), who spearheaded the formation of the ICCC and also a Presbyterian, also took the lead in forming the International Association. Dr. A. B. Dodd of Taiwan and Dr. J. C. Maris of the Netherlands were the first moderator and secretary, respectively.

The churches of the ICCC from the Reformed Presbyterian tradition constituted the first members of the Association. The International Association has its headquarters at the same location in Collingswood, New Jersey, as the headquarters of the ICCC in America and the Bible Presbyterian Church founded by Carl McIntire.

Address:

International Association of Reformed and Presbyterian Churches
P.O. Box 190
Hadden Ave. and Cuthbert Blvd.
Collingswood, NJ 08108

Source:

Harden, Margaret C., comp. A Brief History of the Bible Presbyterian Church and Its Agencies. Privately published, 1968.

International Church of the Foursquare Gospel

The International Church of the Foursquare Gospel was founded by Aimee Semple McPherson (1890–1944), one of a small group of prominent female Christian ministers in the United States in the first half of the twentieth century. McPherson was born in Canada. Her mother had been a member of the Salvation Army, a Holiness church, but as a teenager Aimee experienced the baptism of the Holy Spirit as evidenced by speaking in tongues. A short time later she married Robert Semple. In 1910 they moved to China as missionaries. He became a victim of the climate, and Aimee returned to the United States with her baby daughter, also named Aimee. Aimee subsequently married Harold S. McPherson and the pair toured the country as independent Pentecostal evangelists, though their marriage finally ended in divorce.

Following World War I, McPherson emerged as a popular evangelist in spite of derision because of her gender, winning an audience through her oratorical abilities. In 1918 she settled in Los Angeles and led in the construction of

Aimee Semple McPherson (This Is That. Los Angeles: Echo Park Evangelistic Assoc., 1923)

Angelus Temple. At the same time she opened an evangelistic and training institute to educate leadership for what was quickly to become the Pentecostal denomination. By 1921 there were already thirty-two congregations, and McPherson formed the Echo Park Evangelistic Association. The International Church of the Foursquare Gospel was formed four years later. Work was concentrated along the West Coast but soon spread to Canada.

McPherson developed a unique presentation of the Pentecostal message, which she called the foursquare gospel (a variation of the four-fold gospel of Benjamin Albert Simpson [1843–1919], founder of the CHRISTIAN AND MISSIONARY ALLIANCE). The name Church of the Foursquare Gospel derived from the church's emphasis on the four-fold role of Jesus Christ, as Savior, Baptizer with the Holy Spirit, Healer, and Coming King. Otherwise the church is theologically at one with other trinitarian Pentecostals.

The Church of the Foursquare Gospel moved easily into the global missionary thrust that been inherent in the Pentecostal movement ever since the 1906 revival in Los Angeles that founded it. Through the last half of the twentieth century, the great majority of the membership was found outside of the United States. As the twenty-first century begins, the church reports 3,331,561 members in 26,139 churches and meeting places in 107 countries. Less than 10 percent of the membership (240,000) is now in the United States.

The headquarters of the International Church of the Foursquare Gospel is in Los Angeles. It is a member of the Pentecostal/Charismatic Churches of North America and participates in the PENTECOSTAL WORLD FELLOWSHIP. The church is led by its president: After her death in 1944, Aimee McPherson was succeeded as president by her son Rolf McPherson (b. 1913), who led the church until 1988. He was followed by John R. Holland, who held the office from 1988 to 1997 and was succeeded by Paul C. Risser. The highest legislative authority in the church is the delegated general convention.

Address:

International Church of the Foursquare Gospel
1910 W. Sunset Blvd., Ste. 300
Los Angeles, CA 90026
<http://www.foursquare.org/>

Sources:

- Blumhofer, Edith L. Aimee Semple McPherson: Everybody's Sister. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans, 1993.
- Duffield, Guy P., and Nathaniel M. Van Cleve. Foundations of Pentecostal Theology. Los Angeles: L.I.F.E. Bible College, 1983.
- Epstein, Daniel Mark. Sister Aimee: The Life of Aimee Semple McPherson. New York: Harcourt Brace Jovanovich, 1993.
- Hadden, Jeffrey K., and Charles E. Swann. Prime Time Preachers: The Rising Power of Televangelism. Reading, MA: Addison-Wesley, 1981.
- McPherson, Aimee Semple. This Is That. New York: Garland Publishing, 1985.

International Churches of Christ

The International Churches of Christ (ICC) began as a renewal movement within the CHURCHES OF CHRIST (NON-INSTRUMENTAL), a conservative American Free Church body. The Churches of Christ shared a Protestant/Free Church theological tradition but adopted an ultra-congregational organization that placed all authority in the local congregation and rejected any effort to create denominational structures that served all of the congregations. Many leaders in the Churches of Christ identified it with the true church and suggested that only people who were baptized after understanding the nature of baptism for the remission of sins were truly baptized. They generally demanded re-baptism of any person joining with them who had been baptized in another denomination.

In the 1960s, what was called the discipling movement spread through American Evangelical churches. The movement had as its goal the changing of nominal churchgoers into active Christian disciples. The movement took its name from the assignment of a new Christian to an older, more mature Christian who became the younger person's mentor in the faith. The mentoring relationship meant regular contact above and beyond contacts at congregational gatherings. There was an expectation that the disciple would accept the guidance of the mentor. During the height of the discipling movement, it was widely criticized for the often invasive and controlling guidance imposed upon young Christians.

The discipling movement entered the Churches of Christ through the Crossroads Church of Christ in Gainesville, Florida (adjacent to the University of Florida). Using the discipling program in its campus ministry at the University of Florida, it experienced spectacular success. It also became quite controversial. Eventually the Crossroads congregation withdrew their support for the program.

Among the people influenced by the Crossroads congregation during the heyday of the discipling movement was Kip McKean (b. 1954). He went on to become the pastor of a small congregation of the Churches of Christ in Lexington (suburban Boston), Massachusetts. In 1979, he challenged the members of the congregation to make a new commitment to restore the Christianity of the Bible. Starting with only thirty members, he asked them to commit their lives totally to Christ and, most importantly, to hold that as a standard for all of the people they converted to Christ. The Churches of Christ, they believed, consisted totally of disciples.

Integral to the program was discipling. Every person in the church assumed a discipling relationship with an older member and discipled one or more newer members. McKean also wrote a set of Bible lessons called the First Principles, which the church members were to master and use in teaching those whom they were discipling. It was assumed that disciples would spend part of their time each week engaged in evangelistic activity, and that they would spend time each week discussing their progress in the Christian life and any personal issues of importance with their mentor.

The church grew, moved into Boston proper, and took the name Boston Church of Christ. It grew spectacularly through the 1980s. In 1981, McKean announced a plan for the evangelization of the world in the next generation. He would send a small group of disciples to key urban centers. As they gathered disciples, they would in turn send teams out until all the world's capital cities had congregations. The movement would then go to the smaller cities until all the world was covered. The first congregations were seeded by the Boston Congregation in Chicago and London. New York, Toronto, Johannesburg, Paris, and Stockholm followed. Eventually the church reached out to Asia—Tokyo, Manila, Singapore, Bangkok. It has continued to expand.

The implementation of the plan involved a dramatic change from the more traditional organizational structure of the Churches of Christ. Instead of the congregational autonomy so prized within the Churches of Christ, the movement that was growing from the Boston Church had a strong centralized organizational structure put in place to carry out the discipling program and the plan for world evangelism. As the movement spread, World Sector leaders were appointed and given responsibility for evangelizing their part of the globe. In 1990, McKean moved to Los Angeles, and the movement has been centered there ever since. As criticism of the movement by the Churches of Christ mounted, the movement formally defined itself as no longer a part of the Churches of Christ and took the name International Churches of Christ.

In 1994, McKean, his wife, and all of the World Sector leaders and their wives signed an “Evangelism Proclamation” declaring their intent to plant a church in every nation with a city of at least 100,000 people by the year 2000. At that time they had started 146 churches in 53 nations. As of July 2000, the ICC reported 393 churches worldwide.

The International Churches of Christ have distinguished themselves from their parent body on several issues above and beyond the church organization. The ICC believes that it is the movement of God in this generation, and thus has a unique role in evangelizing the world. It is this belief that underlies the strong commitment that is so characteristic of members. It has introduced instrumental music, in a limited manner, to the church and has given an unprecedented role to women in the leadership (though it has not admitted them to the ordained ministry).

The church has organized HOPE Worldwide, a volunteer program that conducts numerous social service projects around the world. It also now has special consultative status with the Economic and Social Council of the United Nations.

Although the church has pursued its program of growth and expansion, a number of former members who had bad experiences in the church and subsequently dropped away from the church and its discipling program have complained about the church. Some have suggested that the disciplined life demanded of members is inherently manipulative and destructive of personal freedom and choice. Some have denounced it as a cult. In the face of criticisms the ICC has modified but not discarded the discipling program and provided more formal guidance for those serving as mentors. Criticism of the church peaked in the early 1990s, when those who opposed the church for the changes it had introduced in the original ideas and organization of the Churches of Christ joined forces with those who saw it as engaged in brainwashing. With the demise of the brainwashing theory, criticism has significantly decreased.

Address:

International Churches of Christ
3530 Wilshire Blvd., Ste. 1750
Los Angeles, CA 90010
<http://www.icoc.org>
<http://www.kingdomnewsnet.org>

Sources:

The Disciple's Handbook. Los Angeles: Discipleship Publications International, 1977.
Ferguson, Gordon. Prepared to Answer. Los Angeles: Discipleship Publications International, 1995.
Nelson, Robert. Understanding the Crossroads Controversy. Fort Worth, TX: Star Bible Publications, 1981.

International Coalition for Religious Freedom

The International Coalition for Religious Freedom is one of several interfaith organizations inspired by and receiving the majority of its support from the UNIFICATION MOVEMENT, headed by Korean minister Sun Myung Moon. In spite of its significant relationship to a single group, the coalition strives to be completely nonsectarian in its program and work. It is based on a commitment to religious freedom for all and a belief that every religious entity has a right to freedom of religious belief and expression as conscience leads, a right that is balanced by the requirements of generally acceptable laws against criminal behavior.

The coalition, founded in 1997, builds on and supersedes the work of the Coalition for Religious Freedom founded in 1983. Its first major activity was the holding of a set of conferences in 1998 under the general theme, “Religious Freedom and the New Millennium.” Sessions were held in Washington, D.C., Tokyo, Berlin, and São Paulo. Each session brought together religious leaders, scholars, and human rights activists to discuss the main points of religious suppression in the world and to highlight the issues faced in the creation of a more religiously free society.

The coalition in its short history has focused upon some peculiar problems faced by the Unification Movement, including the deprogrammings against its adherents in Japan and the denial of entry to Rev. Moon in some European countries, but has been broadly attentive to problems of other minority religious bodies as well.

Address:

International Coalition for Religious Freedom
7777 Leesburg Pike, Suite 309N
Falls Church, VA 22043
<http://www.religiousfreedom.com>

Source:

Religious Freedom and the New Millennium. Falls Church, VA: International Coalition for Religious Freedom, 2000.

International Conference of Reformed Churches

The International Conference of Reformed Churches (ICRC) was founded in 1982 as an ecumenical fellowship of conservative Reformed churches. The original gathering included representatives of nine Reformed and Presbyterian denominations who assembled at Groningen, Netherlands, at the invitation of the Reformed Churches (Liberated). The Reformed Churches (Liberated) was formed during World War II in the midst of a controversy within the Netherlands Reformed Church. As theological debate took place on a variety of issues around the grace of God, the church's synod issued several doctrinal statements. The issuance of the new doctrinal statements aroused a secondary issue when a protest was generated over the new statements, which were binding on the teaching elders in the church.

Leading the protest was Professor K. Schilder (1890–1952), who argued that pressing new theological positions on the church was not the way to end the controversy. He was excluded from the church's ministry and with his supporters, including a number of congregations, he led in the formation of the Reformed Churches (Liberated). The church grew into a substantial denomination with more than 100,000 members. It was conservative in orientation and soon developed a close relationship with the Christian Reformed Churches in the Netherlands.

Those who formed the ICRC felt that there was an attack within the large Reformed world on both the authority of the Bible and the Reformed creeds that had been promulgated in the sixteenth century. The ICRC adopted the Bible, the "Three Forms of Unity" (Belgic Confession, Heidelberg Catechism, Canons of Dort), and the Westminster documents (Westminster Confession, Larger and Shorter Catechisms) as the basis of their fellowship. Member churches are expected to be loyal to the confessional standards of the Reformed tradition.

The first assembly of the ICRC was held in Edinburgh in 1985 and hosted by the Free Church of Scotland. Subsequent meetings were held in Langley, British Columbia, Canada (1989), Zwolle, Netherlands, and Seoul, Korea. Prominent members of the Conference included the ORTHODOX PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH, Canadian Reformed Churches, and the Presbyterian Church of Korea (KoShin). In 1995, the Christian Reformed Churches in the Netherlands, formerly associated with the INTERNATIONAL COUNCIL OF CHRISTIAN CHURCHES and the REFORMED ECUMENICAL COUNCIL, joined the ICRC.

The ICRC promotes cooperation in missions and the presentation of a united front on the Reformed faith and related issues by its member churches. More than twenty Reformed Churches worldwide are now members of the Conference.

Address:

International Conference of Reformed Churches
13904 26th St.
Edmonton, Alberta T5E 3C1
Canada
<http://ourworld.compuserve.com/homepages/rcjanssen/icrc.htm>

Source:

Bauswein, Jean-Jacques, and Lukas Vischer, eds. The Reformed Family Worldwide: A Survey of Reformed Churches, Theological Schools, and International Organizations. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans, 1999.

International Congregational Fellowship

The International Congregational Fellowship arose to meet the need for greater expression among those Christian churches that believed that the congregational form of church life was the best form in the contemporary democratic world. Much of that thrust was lost in the merger of the General Council of Congregational-Christian Churches into the UNITED CHURCH OF CHRIST (1957), the merger of the International Congregational Council into the WORLD ALLIANCE OF REFORMED CHURCHES (1966), and the merger of the Congregational Church in England and Wales into the UNITED REFORMED CHURCH (1972). In the meantime, churches that stayed out of the mergers that created the United Church of Christ and the United Reformed Church formed the National Association of Congregational Christian Churches and the Congregational Federation of England.

The continuing congregational churches made common cause in 1975, largely prompted by David Watson in England and John Alexander in the United States. People from six countries met to form the International Congregational Fellowship. They announced the first conference for 1977, at which time they signed a document called "The Chishurst Thanksgiving," affirming their allegiance to the Congregational Way.

The fellowship has organized as a gathering of individuals concerned with the promotion of the congregational form of church life rather than an association or council of denominations. Most congregational churches are already members of either the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES or the World Alliance of Reformed Churches or both. The fellowship's primary program is its quadrennial conference to advocate for congregationalism.

Aside from the contacts given below, regional secretaries also now exist for Central Europe, Africa, Central and South America, and the Pacific and Australia. The fellowship stays in touch with Congregationalists in more than fifty countries. The first issue of the International Congregationalist Journal appeared in 2001. The fellowship presence on the Internet is provided by both British and American Congregationalists.

Addresses:

International Congregational Fellowship
c/o Rev. Graham Adams Congregational Centre
4 Castle Gate
Nottingham NG1 7AS
United Kingdom
<http://www.congregationalist.org.uk>

c/o Richard Kurrasch 1314 Northwood Blvd.
Royal Oak, MI 48073
<http://congregationlist.org>

Source:

Bauswein, Jean-Jacques, and Lukas Vischer, eds. The Reformed Family Worldwide: A Survey of Reformed Churches, Theological Schools, and International Organizations. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans, 1999.

International Council of Christian Churches

The International Council of Christian Churches (ICCC) was founded in 1948 at the instigation of the American Council of Christian Churches (ACCC). The ACCC had in turn resulted from a split within the Protestant fundamentalist movement in the 1940s. Fundamentalism arose in American Protestantism as a protest against what was seen as a departure from essential Christian beliefs by liberal Protestants in the early decades of the twentieth century. The battle between fundamentalists and modernists (as the liberals were called) came to a head in the 1930s, when many fundamentalists left the major Protestant denominations in the United States. Other fundamentalists remained within the larger denominations as conservative voices.

In the late 1930s, some fundamentalist leaders demanded that a complete separation from the liberal denominations should occur, and that ties should be broken with conservative leaders who remained in these older groups. Those conservative leaders who were willing to keep fellowship with conservatives within the older churches became known as Evangelicals and later organized the National Association of Evangelicals.

Those demanding complete separation found a leader in Dr. Carl McIntire (1906–2002), a Presbyterian minister and founder of the Bible Presbyterian Church. He led in the formation of American Council of Christian Churches in opposition to the Federal Council of Churches (now the National Council of Churches of Christ in the U.S.A.). The ACCC also opposed the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES (WCC), whose organization gained momentum in the years immediately after World War II. As the organizational conference of the WCC was announced for Amsterdam in 1984, McIntire called together his associates from around the world to gather in Amsterdam just a few days prior to the initial assembly of the WCC. In succeeding years, the much smaller ICCC often held its meeting to coincide with the WCC meeting.

The ICCC is a fundamentalist Protestant body that affirms the infallibility and inerrancy of the Bible and the need for a complete separation from heresy and apostasy, especially as these are embodied in the World Council of Churches or the WORLD EVANGELICAL ALLIANCE or any of their affiliates. The ICCC faced a severe crisis in 1970 when the thirty years of leadership by McIntire was challenged. In 1969 the ACCC removed McIntire from his role as the leader of the organization. The ICCC chose to affirm McIntire, and the ICCC and the ACCC dropped their relationship. McIntire moved to create a new American affiliate of the ICCC, now known as the ICCC in America.

At its meeting in Amsterdam in 1998, the ICCC reported seven hundred denominations from over one hundred countries represented in its membership.

Address:

International Council of Christian Churches
756 Haddon Ave.
Collingswood, NJ 08108

Source:

Harden, Margaret C., comp. A Brief History of the Bible Presbyterian Church and Its Agencies. Privately published, 1968.

International Council of Christians and Jews

The International Council of Christians and Jews (ICCJ) is an association of national organizations from more than thirty countries dedicated to the dialogue between Christians and Jews at all levels and increasingly the wider encounter between Jews, Christians, and Muslims. The ICCJ was founded in 1946 as awareness of the extent of the Holocaust spread across Europe and North America. W. W. (Bill) Simpson, the leader of the British Council of Christians and Jews, was named the first executive secretary.

At the original gathering of the Council, at Seelisberg, Switzerland, in 1947, a ten-point statement was issued that called Christians, among other things, to avoid distorting Judaism with the object of extolling Christianity; identifying Jews as the enemies of Jesus; associating Jews with the killing of Jesus; and promoting the notion that the Jewish people are reprobate, accursed, or reserved for a destiny of suffering. The work of the ICCJ contributed to the changing views of the ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH toward the Jewish community that were proclaimed during the Second Vatican Council and a host of statements renouncing anti-Semitism and anti-Jewish theological perspectives and biblical interpretations by major Protestant bodies. As a result, most Protestant bodies, especially those associated with the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES, withdrew support from efforts to convert Jews to Christianity.

Among the oldest affiliated member organizations was the National Council of Christians and Jews (now the National Conference for Community and Justice), which had been founded in the United States in 1927. A pioneer in Jewish-Christian dialogue, in the post-World War II context it expanded its role to include a broad program of activities aimed at ending religious, racial, and other forms of bigotry.

Knowledge of the Holocaust provided fuel for the Jewish-Christian dialogue through the 1970s, and the continued tension in the Middle East has spurred the broadening of dialogue to include Muslims. Beginning in Europe, the dialogue has spread worldwide into most countries with a significant Jewish presence, from Argentina to Australia and New Zealand.

The ICCJ has its headquarters at the Martin Buber House, the home of the Jewish mystic and theologian prior to his having to leave Germany due to the rise of Nazism. The ICCJ has made a special effort to bring women and youth into the work of dialogue and sponsors the Abrahamic Faith Council to focus its efforts with Muslim dialogue. It maintains an extensive Internet site dealing with Jewish-Christian relations at <http://www.jcrelations.net>.

Address:

International Council of Christians and Jews
Martin Buber House
Werlestrasse 2
Postfach 1129
64628 Heppenheim
Germany
<http://www.iccj.org>

Source:

Stöhr, Martin. "Fifty years after Seelisberg—an uncompleted international task." Posted at <http://www.jcrelations.net/article1/fifty.htm>. Accessed on September 30, 2001.

International Council of Community Churches

Community churches first appeared late in the nineteenth century in the United States as one response to the increasing religious pluralism, especially the many sects into which Protestantism had split. Nonsectarian community churches were an alternative to the establishment of multiple congregations of denominationally affiliated congregations. Such congregations were logical in smaller communities that could not support the array of denominational institutions. Then, in the early twentieth century, in response to the ecumenical movement, a variety of united congregations (formed by the merger of congregations of different denominational affiliations) also appeared on the scene. In the 1920s, the initial attempts to network such nondenominational congregations began.

Rev. Orvis F. Jordan of the Park Ridge Community Church in Illinois became the center of one such network, the Community Church Workers, founded in 1923. The organization lasted into the 1930s. Community Church Workers operated primarily among churches serving the Anglo community, and a similar structure emerged that served African American churches, the National Council of the People's Church of Christ and Community Centers of the United States and Elsewhere.

Through the 1930s, various approaches to the Federal Council of Churches were made, but the council failed to act on petitions to recognize the community church ideal. Then after World War II, a new attempt at organization led in 1946 to the formation of the National Council of Community Churches. This group merged with the predominantly African American council in 1950 to create the International Council of Community Churches. This council underwent several name changes due to the loss of the several foreign congregations, but in 1983, following the affiliation of congregations in Canada and Nigeria, the original name was again adopted.

By the very nature of its stance as nonsectarian, the council has proposed no doctrinal statement, but member ministers and churches generally operate out of a liberal Protestant, ecumenically minded stance. The council describes itself as committed to Christian unity and working "toward a fellowship as comprehensive as the spirit and teachings of Christ and as inclusive as the love of God."

The council is organized as a loose association of autonomous congregations, with the different council offices primarily facilitating communication between congregations. The officers also represent the congregations in various official capacities with the government and the larger religious world. At the end of the 1990s, the council joined the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES.

In 1995, the council reported 217 member churches with a combined membership of 250,000. Approximately 1,000 additional congregations are affiliated with the council and participate in various levels of its fellowship. Approximately 5 percent of the congregations have a dual membership in a denomination.

Address:

International Council of Community Churches
7808 College Dr., No. 25E
Palos Heights, IL 60463
<http://www.akcache.com/community/iccc-nat.html>

Sources:

Shotwell, J. Ralph. Unity without Uniformity. Homewood, IL: Community Church Press, 1984.
Smith, J. Philip. Faith and Fellowship in the Community Church Movement: A Theological Perspective. Homewood, IL: Community Church Press, 1986.

International Council of Unitarians and Universalists

The International Council of Unitarians and Universalists (ICUU) is a relatively new organization, but members believe that Unitarian and Universalist teachings go back to the first Christians. Some spoke of Jesus as a “son of God by adoption” (the gospel of Mark has no birth story), and saw only the Father as God, denying the Trinity. Others said that if God is Love, all will be saved. During the Reformation both teachings resurfaced after years of oppression. In 1531, a Spanish theologian and physician, usually known by his Latin name, Michael Servetus (1511–1553), wrote De Trinitatis erroribus (On the Errors of the Trinity). Arrested during a visit to Geneva, he was burned at the stake on October 27, 1553, with the blessings of Reformed leader and theologian John Calvin. Unitarian Churches developed in Poland under the leadership of an Italian theologian, usually known by his Latin name, Laelius Socinus (1525–1562), and in Transylvania under the leadership of a Hungarian cleric and theologian, usually known as Francis David (1510–1579). The Polish church was crushed for centuries, but there is now a Unitarian congregation in Warsaw. In Romania and Hungary there are 100,000 Unitarians in over 150 congregations. Bela Bartok, the composer, was a member of the Second Unitarian Church, Budapest.

Unitarians and Universalists were common in many dissenting chapels in Britain. Many fled to North America, including Rev. Joseph Priestley (1733–1834; discoverer of oxygen), who established the first Unitarian Church in Philadelphia. Five United States presidents were Unitarian, including John Adams, Thomas Jefferson, and William Howard Taft. Well-known Universalists include Clara Barton, who founded the American Red Cross, and P. T. Barnum, of circus fame. UUs, as they are often called, have made major contributions to science with several Nobel Prize winners such as Linus Pauling and George Wald; they are, however, especially notable for their contributions to literature. American writers Louisa May Alcott, Nathaniel Hawthorne, Henry Wadsworth Longfellow, Herman Melville, Ralph Waldo Emerson, and Kurt Vonnegut were UUs, as were British authors Elizabeth Gaskell and Charles Dickens.

Throughout the twentieth century, contacts among Unitarians and Universalists around the world were facilitated by the INTERNATIONAL ASSOCIATION FOR RELIGIOUS FREEDOM (IARE, founded in 1900). Then in 1961, the merger of the Unitarians and Universalists of North America encouraged a new level of contact and cooperation. Following a number of discussions, in March 1995 the International Council of Unitarians and Universalists was established to nourish UU Communities around the world. The founding meetings were held in Essex, Massachusetts. Rev. David Usher was elected president. Although there is no creed, a brief affirmation was adopted: “We affirm our belief in religious community based upon liberty of conscience and of individual thought in matters of faith, the inherent worth and dignity of every person, justice and compassion in human relations, responsible stewardship of earth’s living system, and our commitment to democratic principles.”

The seven-member ICUU Executive Committee meets twice a year. About fifty UUs from around the world come as delegates to ICUU council meetings in the spring of odd-numbered years. At the 1999 ICUU council meeting in Hungary, there were delegates from over twenty countries, including the Philippines, India, South Africa, Australia, Argentina, Russia, Poland, Britain, Denmark, Germany, Spain, and Finland. There are 215,000 UUs in North America, 100,000 in Hungary and Romania, 10,000 in India, 6,000 in Great Britain, 2,000 in Germany, and about 10,000 scattered in small congregations from Nigeria to Japan.

Hundreds of UUs have suffered prison and death for their faith. It was only in 1813 that English law accepted Unitarians. In the Czech Republic, before World War II, Dr. Norbert Capek was minister to the largest Unitarian congregation in the world in Prague, with 3,500 members. Capek wrote beautiful hymns, some of which are translated in modern hymnbooks. But with the Nazi occupation Capek died in a gas chamber. Dozens of other Unitarians were taken to the concentration camps. After almost fifty years of oppression under the Communists, the Czech congregations are reviving, with the aid of visiting ministers supplied in cooperation with the ICUU.

The ICUU Executive Committee for 2000–2001 consists of Rev. Jill McAllister, president, United States; Gevene Hertz, vice president, Denmark; Richard Boeke, secretary, United Kingdom; John Slattery, treasurer, Canada; Wolfgang Jantz, at-large, Germany; Rev. Cliff Reed, at-large, United Kingdom; and Dr. Elek Rezi, at-large, Romania. The ICUU Newsletter and information on member groups may be obtained from Rev. Polly Guild, 4 Kendall Common, Weston, MA 02493. The ICUU conducts ongoing training programs, which are held each year in Europe and Asia. The European Group of the ICUU arranges pilgrimages each year to special places associated with Unitarian history in countries such as Romania and Wales.

Address:

International Council of Unitarians and Universalists
Essex Hall
1–6 Essex St.
London WC2R 3 HY
United Kingdom
<http://www.unitarian.org.uk>
<http://www.uua.org>

Richard Boeke

Sources:

- Chryssides, George. The Elements of Unitarianism. Dorset, UK: Element Books, 1998.
- Gellerd, Judit, ed. “In Storm, Even Trees Lean on Each Other” (UU Sermons on Transylvania). Chico, CA: Center for Free Religion, 1993.
- Henry, Richard. Norbert Fabian Capek. Boston: Skinner House Books, 1999.
- Williams, George H. The Radical Reformation. Philadelphia: Westminster Press, 1962.

International Evangelical Church

The International Evangelical Church and Missionary Association (IEC) is a fellowship of Pentecostal churches that was formed in 1964 primarily to provide a legal cover for the Italian missionary activity of independent Pentecostal missionary John McTernan. The IEC expanded to the United States in the early 1980s to include the ministry of John Levin Meares (b. 1920), founder of Evangel Temple in Washington, D.C. The nephew of a former general overseer of the CHURCH OF GOD (CLEVELAND, TENNESSEE), Meares became a minister as a young man and served several Church of God congregations in Tennessee.

In 1955 Meares decided to resign his pastorship in Memphis in order to assist independent evangelist Jack Coe in a series of revival meetings in Washington, D.C. Meares decided to stay in Washington to build a Church of God congregation there, which he called the Washington Revival Center. He also started a radio show called Miracle Time. Although Meares was White, the major response to his ministry was from African Americans. The Church of God (Cleveland, Tennessee) was a White-controlled denomination with very intolerant attitudes about race at the time. In May 1956, Meares was disfellowshipped by the Church of God for starting an unlicensed ministry. He continued as an independent minister, and in 1957 his congregation settled in an abandoned theater, which was named the National Evangelistic Center.

John McTernan became associated with Meares soon after the latter arrived in Washington. The International Evangelical Church (IEC), beginning with a few Italian churches, had reached out to include a group of Brazilian churches under Bishop Robert McAleister, as well as some churches in Nigeria led by Bishop Benson Idahosa. Meares became the new vice president of the IEC.

In the 1960s, Meares’s ministry shifted from an emphasis on miracles to an emphasis on praise and the gift of prophecy. After the assassination of Martin Luther King Jr. in 1968 and the riots that followed, almost all of the remaining White members left the National Evangelistic Center. Membership dropped to several hundred Black members and then slowly began to increase again. In the early 1970s, the three hundred remaining members of Meares’s Washington congregation reorganized and decided to build a $3 million facility. The result was the Evangel Temple, which opened in 1975.

The IEC joined the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES in 1972. In 1974, John McTernan died and Meares found himself at the head of the International Evangelical Church. In 1982, IEC founded a new Pentecostal ecumenical organization, the International Communion of Charismatic Churches, which includes the branches of the International Evangelical Church, the Gospel Harvesters Church founded by Earl P. Paulk Jr., and others. The bishops of the International Communion of Charismatic Churches—McAleister, Paulk, and Idahosa—consecrated Meares as a bishop in 1982.

The International Evangelical Church and Missionary Association emerged out of Meares’s capacity as mediator between Black and White Pentecostal communities, which had diverged over a period of many years. In 1984, Meares began the annual Inner-City Pastor’s Conference, which draws together the pastors (primarily African American) of the many churches of the association from around the United States and Canada. More than one thousand pastors attended the Inner-City Pastor’s Conference in 1987.

The IEC has its headquarters at Evangel Temple, which in 1991 relocated to suburban Maryland. Currently led by Don Meares, Evangel Temple has over one thousand members. The IEC has approximately five hundred congregations worldwide, more than four hundred of which are in Africa. There are approximately fifty member churches in South America, twenty in Italy, twenty in the United States, and one in Jamaica.

Address:

International Evangelical Church and Missionary Association
Evangel Temple
13901 Central Ave.
Upper Marlboro, MD 20772–8636

James R. Lewis

Sources:

- Evangel Temple’s 30th Anniversary Historical Journal*. Washington, DC: Evangel Temple, 1985.

Mearns, John L. Bind Us Together. Old Tappan, NJ: Chosen Books, 1987.

International Evangelical Church, Soldiers of the Cross

The International Evangelical Church, Soldiers of the Cross, was founded in Havana, Cuba, as the Gideon Mission in the 1920s. The founder, Ernest William Sellers (d. 1953), affectionately known as “Daddy John,” was assisted in his work by three women—Sister Sarah, Mable G. Ferguson, and Muriel C. Atwood. Sellers became the bishop of the church, a post he held until 1947, when he was named the church’s Apostle, and three other bishops were designated.

The church began to expand beyond Cuba in 1950, when two missionaries were commissioned. Arnaldo Socarras pioneered the church in Mexico, and Arturo Rangel Sosa opened work in Panama. Daddy John’s successor, Angel Maria Hernandez y Esperon, placed special emphasis on the expansion of the church and started work in eight additional countries around the Caribbean.

Bishop Arturo Rangel succeeded Hernandez as the third Apostle. He continued the expansion of the church internationally, commissioning the first missionaries to the United States. However, that same year (1966), Rangel, one of the church’s bishops, and an evangelist disappeared. The three have not been heard of since. Eventually, the remaining bishops, Florentino Almeida and Samuel Mendiondo, took control of the church, and in 1969 they moved its headquarters to Miami, Florida.

The Soldiers of the Cross is a Sabbath-keeping Pentecostal church. The Law of God as presented in the Ten Commandments is revered, and the dietary restrictions mentioned in Genesis 7:2 and Leviticus 11 are seen as proper for today. Although their beliefs are largely in line with Pentecostalism, they practice baptism as a first step to salvation, the Lord’s Supper as a commemoration of Christ’s death (as opposed to his resurrection), and foot washing as a sign of humility. They have adopted an apolitical stance in regard to the social order.

The church is led by Archbishops Florentino Almeida and Samuel Mendiondo. The church adopted its present name in 1974 to avoid any confusion between it and Gideons International, the older Bible-distribution ministry. In the 1980s the church had some 1,500 members in the United States, with some 100,000 in twenty countries throughout Latin America, as well as Spain and Germany.

Address:

International Evangelical Church, Soldiers of the Cross
636 NW 2d St.
Miami, FL 33128

Source:

Melton, J. Gordon. Encyclopedia of American Religions. 6th ed. Detroit, MI: Gale Research, 1999.

International Federation of Free Evangelical Churches

The International Federation of Free Evangelical Churches is an ecumenical association of churches that trace their beginnings to a pietist FREE CHURCH impulse in continental Europe in the nineteenth century. The earliest phase of this revival can be seen in Switzerland, where free churches (that is, Protestant but separated from the state church) were formed in Berne, Basel, and Zurich. Progress was slow, as authorities discouraged the movement. However, as early as 1834, there was an attempt to associate with similar churches in France and northern Italy. In 1910, the Swiss congregations came together as the Union of Free Evangelical Churches in Switzerland. A similar revivalist impulse in Sweden gave birth to the Mission Covenant Church, which, due to the steady immigration of members to the United States, developed a strong branch in North America. Branches also developed in Denmark and Norway.

Throughout Europe, churches that shared the same pietist approach to the faith and accepted the Bible as their only creed also emerged. During the twentieth century, the Mission Covenant Church developed a strong mission program, which included Africa and Latin America. Through the mid-twentieth century, these mission efforts matured into autonomous churches that retained a close association with their parent body.

Leaders from the various European Free Churches began to meet in the 1920s and were in the 1930s joined by Covenant leaders from the United States. Interrupted by World War II, the meetings were picked up after the war, and in 1948, the International Federation of Free Evangelical Churches emerged. The federation has held international gatherings at irregular intervals since that time. The federation now includes member churches from across Europe, North America, Africa, South America, and Asia.

Address:

International Federation of Free Evangelical Churches
Régnergatan 8
11381, Stockholm
Sweden
<http://www.iffec.org/>

Sources:

Bauswein, Jean-Jacques, and Lukas Vischer, eds. The Reformed Family Worldwide: A Survey of Reformed Churches, Theological

Schools, and International Organizations. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans, 1999.

Westin, Gunar. The Free Church through the Ages. Nashville, TN: Broadman Press, 1958.

International Federation of Secular Humanistic Jews

For more than a century, Jewish scholars and writers have attempted to articulate a secular ideology compatible with Jewish tradition, but only in the late twentieth century did such a perspective give rise to organized structures like those of the various religious groups. In the 1960s, Rabbi Sherwin T. Wine (b. 1928) founded a synagogue in Birmingham (suburban Detroit), Michigan, that affirmed both the congregation's Jewish heritage and the humanistic philosophy articulated by Wine. He was soon joined by Rabbi Daniel Friedman of suburban Chicago. They led in the founding of the Society for Humanistic Judaism, which espoused a nontheistic form of Jewish theology.

Wine began a periodical and began to make his case in both Jewish circles and the larger world of rationalists, atheists, and humanists. Many ethnic Jews had shed their tradition and identified themselves as atheists and humanists, and some welcomed the perspective and community offered by the idea of Humanistic Judaism. By 1986, enough international support had manifested that the International Federation of Secular Humanistic Jews could be organized. The first president of the new association was Yehuda Bauer, a distinguished scholar at Hebrew University in Jerusalem, and Albert Memmi of the University of Paris (Sorbonne) was named the honorary president.

The federation supports a perspective that sees Jewish tradition as a human-centered history, culture, civilization, ethical values, and the shared fate of the Jewish people. The secular approach indicates that the Jewish community has both the ability and the responsibility to assume control of Jewish destiny. Affiliated national organizations are found in Israel, the United States, Canada, France, Belgium, Australia, Mexico, Argentina, Uruguay, and the countries of the former Soviet Union.

Address:

The International Federation of Secular Humanistic Jews
224 West 35th St., Ste. 410
New York, NY 10001
<http://www.ifshj.org>

Sources:

Goodman, Saul N. The Faith of Secular Jews. New York: KTAV Publishing House, 1976.
Ibry, David. Exodus to Humanism: Jewish Identity without Religion. Buffalo, NY: Prometheus Books, 1999.
Wine, Sherwin T. Humanistic Judaism. Buffalo, NY: Prometheus Books, 1978.

International Fellowship for Impersonal Enlightenment

The International Fellowship for Impersonal Enlightenment was founded in the late 1980s as the Moksha Foundation by Advaita Vedanta teacher Andrew Cohen (b. 1955). Cohen had been raised in a Jewish home, but at the age of sixteen he had a spontaneous spiritual awakening that eventually led him to India and Hinduism. His search for an explanation of what had occurred to him led him initially to Swami Hariharannada Giri (a master of kriya yoga) and then to the practice of martial arts and Zen meditation.

His search reached a first plateau in 1986 when he met Harivansh Lal Poonja, who followed the teachings of Sri Raman Maharshi's Advaita Vedanta. The teachings emphasized that human beings as pure consciousness in the Absolute are already in a state of spiritual freedom. They do not need to seek or attain it, but rather simply realize what they already are. Cohen felt an immediate agreement with the message of Poonjaji (as he is respectfully called) and after studying with him for a brief period, began to teach himself, initially in Lucknow, India. He taught in England, Holland, and Israel prior to his return to the United States and the founding of the Moksha Foundation in Cambridge, Massachusetts. In 1989 he moved to Marin County, California (north of San Francisco), and published the first of many books, My Master Is My Self, which described his spiritual search.

In Marin County, a small community of close disciples began an experiment in living as if the teachings were true and trying to discover the implications of them for daily life. This group continues as the Sangha. The Sangha became an issue with Poonjaji, whose own perspective was that the realization of Oneness had nothing to do with the visible world. Cohen came to believe that there were stages of realization of one's own unity with the Absolute and that there were implications for individuals living in the world. This issue led to his separation from Poonjaji.

The Moksha Foundation renamed itself in the late 1990s, calling itself the International Fellowship for Impersonal Enlightenment. It publishes a popular newsstand magazine, What Is Enlightenment? IEF centers are found in the United Kingdom, Holland, France, Germany, Sweden, Denmark, Australia, and India.

Address:

Impersonal Enlightenment Fellowship
P.O. Box 2360
Lenox, MA 01240
<http://retreats.andrewcohen.org>

Sources:

Cohen, Andrew. Autobiography of an Awakening. Corde Madera, CA: Moksha Foundation, 1992.

———. In Defense of the Guru Principle. Lenox, MA: Moksha Press, 1999.

———. My Master Is My Self. N.p.: Moksha Foundation, 1989.

International Humanist and Ethical Union

The International Humanist and Ethical Union (IHEU) is a global organization uniting humanists, rationalists, atheists, secularists, and various nontheistic religionists. It was founded in Amsterdam, Netherlands, in 1952 by representatives from seven organizations. Today it includes twenty full member organizations, fifty-seven associate members, and five cooperating organizations.

The Union was created to offer the public an alternative to religion and to totalitarian political systems. Humanism was seen as a philosophy that centered on respect for human beings as moral and spiritual beings. Its original 1952 statement defined humanism as a way that was democratic, ethical, and aimed at the maximum possible fulfillment through creative and ethical living. A more considered statement in 1966 spoke of what was termed ethical humanism. It projected a primal need to take responsibility for human life in the world. It acknowledged human interdependency and the need for humans to respect one another. Human progress will come as freedom of choice is extended, and justice will come from the acknowledgement of human equality. Their position has been spelled out in the 1988 “Declaration of Interdependence: A Global Ethics.”

To accomplish their goals, humanists have been involved in numerous activities and take advantage of a variety of means of disseminating their views. They have been particularly active in defending democracy, promoting civil rights, assisting victims of sexual violence, and advocating for those negatively affected by religious intolerance (including opposing female circumcision in some Muslim countries). In different countries, IHEU member organizations have fought for contraception and abortion rights, supported gay/lesbian concerns, provided nonreligious rites of passage for youth, and sponsored alternative counselors for hospitals, prisons, and the Armed Forces.

The IHEU represents its member organizations at the United Nations (including UNESCO and UNICEF) and the Council of Europe. It was a founding member of the UNESCO NGO Working Group on Science and Ethics. The Union is organized democratically and includes full member and associate member organizations. It also has a place for individuals as member supporters. Its international periodical, the International Humanist, is published in Canada. There are secretariats for Latin America and South Asia and several associated networks built around various issues and concerns. Member organizations are now found on every continent.

Address:

International Humanist and Ethical Union
IHEU Secretariat
47 Theobold Rd.
London WC1X 8SF
United Kingdom
<http://www.iheu.org>

Source:

Stein, Gordon, ed. The Encyclopedia of Unbelief. 2 vols. Buffalo, NY: Prometheus Books, 1985.

International Lutheran Council

The International Lutheran Council (ILC) is a global association of conservative (confession-oriented) Lutheran bodies that emerged in stages in the years after World War II. Among the factors undergirding the council was the changed status of many missions founded by the LUTHERAN CHURCH—MISSOURI SYNOD that had matured into independent national churches. Moreover, in Europe especially, during the twentieth century a variety of churches had come into being that assumed a theological stance similar to that of the Missouri Synod.

The ILC dates its beginning from a meeting of leaders from several confessional Lutheran churches in Uelzen, Germany, in July 1952. Seven years later, a second meeting was held in Oakland, California, specifically around the topic, “The Fellowship between Our Churches.” At the third meeting, in Cambridge, England, the name International Lutheran Theological Conference was adopted for what became a series of similar gatherings that were held through the next three decades. Eventually, attention turned toward working out a formal agreement for communion between the different churches, which was embodied in a constitution that was accepted in 1993. With the adoption of the constitution at a gathering in Antigua, Guatemala, the ILC came into existence. By this time, churches from around the world had joined in the negotiations. The doctrinal basis of their fellowship is the common acceptance of the Holy Scriptures as the inspired and infallible Word of God and of the Lutheran Confessions contained in the Book of Concord (originally published in 1580) as the true and faithful exposition of the Word of God.

The ILC now functions for communication, fellowship, mutual encouragement, and mutual assistance between the member churches. Although many of the ILC churches began with missionary efforts of the Lutheran Church—Missouri Synod, some, such as the Evangelical Lutheran Free Church in Denmark and the Confessional Lutheran Church of Finland, arrived at their position independently.

In 2001, the ILC included 28 member churches drawn from six continents.

Address:

International Lutheran Council
1333 South Kirkwood Rd.
St. Louis, MO 63122-7295
<http://www.ilc-online.org>

Source:

International Lutheran Council. Posted at <http://www.ilc-online.org>. Accessed October 1, 2001.

International Meditation Centres [Sayagyi U Ba Khin]

The history of International Meditation Centres begins with the life of the founder, Sayagyi U Ba Khin. He was born in Myanmar (Burma) in 1899, and he served in the colonial administration of British Burma in the Accountant General's Office. After independence in 1948 he was made the accountant general. Under Prime Minister U Nu, all government departments were encouraged to form Buddhist associations, and Sayagyi U Ba Khin decided to teach meditation to his office staff.

He had been authorized by two eminent meditation teachers of Myanmar to teach meditation: by his own meditation teacher, Saya Thet Gyi (1873–1945), a disciple of the Ledi Sayadaw (1846–1923), and the Webu Sayadaw (1896–1977), the reputed Arhat of Myanmar. After talking to Sayagyi U Ba Khin at length, the Webu Sayadaw told him in 1941, "Great Disciple you have to share your Dhamma. Give the Dhamma you have to everyone."

Sayagyi U Ba Khin's aim was to teach meditation to the staff of his office and to foreigners, as very few monks spoke English then. Being aware of the pressures of urban modern life, he knew that he would have to be able to give students a lasting taste of the Dhamma (Buddhist teaching) in a relatively short time. In the Vipassana Research Association, together with his disciples, he developed a technique to teach insight (vipassana) very effectively in ten days, two weekends and the week in between. He taught in the Dhamma Yangung Chi Pagoda, a pagoda specifically designed by him for meditation.

The first International Meditation Centre (IMC) was established in 1952 in Yangon (Rangoon). It is operated by the Vipassana Association of the Accountant General's Office. Sayagyi U Ba Khin held the office of president of the association and taught meditation at the IMC until his death in 1971, always assisted by Sayamagyi Daw Mya Thwin (b. 1925). Being his senior disciple, she continued teaching at the IMC Yangon after U Ba Khin's demise, until she and her husband, Sayagyi U Chit Tin, came out of Myanmar in 1978 to teach in other countries. Since then they have established five other International Meditation Centres: United Kingdom in 1979, Western Australia in 1981, United States (Maryland) in 1988, New South Wales (near Sydney) in 1989, and Austria (in Carinthia) in 1990. All the centers outside Myanmar have regional teachers who conduct courses or assist the senior teachers when they are present. All the five centers have Dhamma Yangung Chi Pagodas, which are replicas of the pagoda at the IMC Yangon. At the IMC Yangon, Sayagyi U Tint Yee (b. 1921), a disciple of U Ba Khin and the present president of the Vipassana Association of the Accountant General's Office, leads the courses.

All the IMCs in the tradition of Sayagyi U Ba Khin hold regular ten-day retreats that are frequented by people of all religions. The courses are still taught according to the system established by Sayagyi U Ba Khin. The first five days are dedicated to anapana meditation to develop samadhi (one-pointedness of mind). The remaining time is dedicated to vipassana, or insight.

Sayamagyi Daw Mya Thwin and Sayagyi U Chit Tin regularly organize ten-day ordination courses for their disciples in order to give them the opportunity to ordain as Buddhist bhikkhus (monks) and meditate in robes. They have also led pilgrimages to the sacred Buddhist sites in India, Sri Lanka, and Myanmar.

Addresses:

International Meditation Centres
31a Inya Myaing Rd.
Bahan P.O.
Yangon
Myanmar

Splatts House
Heddington, Wilts SN11 0PE
United Kingdom
<http://www.imc-uk.org>

Roger Bischoff

Sources:

- Coleman, John E. The Quiet Mind. London: Harper and Row, 1971.
- King, Winston L. Theravada Meditation. University Park: Pennsylvania State University Press, 1980.
- Sayagyi U Ba Khin. Dhamma Texts. Rev. ed. Heddington, UK: Sayagyi U Ba Khin Memorial Trust. 1999.
- Sayagyi U Chit Tin. Knowing Anicca and the Way to Nibbana. 2d rev. ed. Heddington, UK: Sayagyi U Ba Khin Memorial Trust, 1997.
- Webu Sayadaw. The Way to Ultimate Calm. Kandy, Sri Lanka: Buddhist Publication Society, Kandy, 2001.

International New Thought Alliance

The International New Thought Alliance (INTA) is a loosely structured association of New Thought churches, religious institutions, and individuals, which seeks to promote harmony and cooperation within the movement while also increasing awareness of New Thought throughout the world. It publishes a quarterly magazine, New Thought, operates the Addington/INTA Archives and Research Center, and hosts annual congresses in large urban centers in North America, chiefly in the United States. The Alliance's ten-point "Declaration of Principles" is a generic New Thought creed, which stresses traditional themes such as the goodness of God, the divinity of humanity, and the causative nature of consciousness. INTA is organized by districts, of which there are over one hundred worldwide, with slightly more than half being in the United States.

Fully vested membership is open to laypersons as well as clergy. INTA is led by a president and managed by a chief executive officer, in cooperation with an executive board. The president and members of the executive board are elected at annual congresses. Organizationally, INTA is the most open and democratically structured of all major New Thought groups, and its broad and inclusive membership requirements allow for significant diversity among individual participants, all of whom have voting privileges. Institutional membership has stricter guidelines than individual membership, but only slightly so.

INTA traces its origin to a 1914 New Thought conference in London, England. It held its first annual congress in 1915 in San Francisco and was incorporated in 1917 in Washington, D.C. The Alliance's organizational roots can be traced back to the National New Thought Alliance (1907), the New Thought Federation (1904), the first "New Thought Convention" (1899), and perhaps even the International Divine Science Association (1892). Although each of these predecessor organizations sought to unify the disparate groups in the mental healing movement, some with limited success, it was not until the formation of INTA that this goal was realized in such a way as to assure stability and longevity.

Unlike the various sects of New Thought, INTA has no easily identifiable founder. Its emergence as a coherent organization and successful overcoming of early institutional struggles were the result of the efforts of a number of talented leaders, all of whom committed themselves and in some cases the religious communities they had founded to the INTA mission. The list of early supporters reads like a New Thought who's who of the period: Annie Rix Militz, Myrtle and Charles Fillmore, Nona Brooks, Albert C. Grier, Thomas Troward, Horatio Dresser, Christian D. Larson, Orison Marden, Elizabeth Towne, and Ella Wheeler Wilcox.

Although these high-profile celebrities were instrumental in giving the fledgling INTA valuable publicity and significant legitimacy as an umbrella organization for the entire New Thought movement, the real key to the Alliance's early success was a layperson and former employee of the U.S. Post Office—James A. Edgerton (1869–1938). Edgerton was the first president of the organization, a post he held from 1915 to 1923 and then again from 1934 to 1937. A skillful executive, diplomat, and bureaucrat, Edgerton left his stamp on the Alliance, which to this day follows the same basic organizational structures he put in place. No other person is as responsible for the establishment and development of INTA. Under his leadership, by 1920, the Alliance counted among its members Militz's Homes of Truth, Brooks's Divine Science, the Fillmores' Unity, Grier's Church of Truth, and countless numbers of their followers.

Over the years INTA has been largely successful in its role as an umbrella organization for the New Thought movement. It has been particularly fortunate to have had a number of talented presidents, of whom the most important are Raymond Charles Barker, Ervin Seal, Robert H. Bitzer, and current president Blaine C. Mays. Bitzer and Mays are especially notable for their success in expanding the international outreach of INTA. Together with Edgerton, they are the longest serving presidents of the Alliance, with Mays having served the longest of all: 1974–1996 and 1997–present.

As with any broad-based ecumenical organization, composed of diverse and often competing groups, INTA has seen a fair number of controversies. Perhaps the most notable ones occurred in 1922 and 1996. Precipitating causes are difficult to specify in any detail, but both events appear to have been the result of disagreements pertaining to the Alliance's leadership and some of its programs. By comparison, the removal of references to Jesus, Christ, and Jesus Christ from the group's "Declaration of Principles" in 1954 appears to have caused no adverse reaction. The 1922 event led to the withdrawal of Unity School from the Alliance and the end of Edgerton's long tenure as president the following year. Edgerton returned to the presidency in 1934. The 1996 controversy led to the withdrawal of the leaders of a number of large churches and Mays's defeat in an election by Marguerite Goodall. Mays returned to the presidency in 1997. It is noteworthy that the year following Unity School's withdrawal, it began holding its own annual conventions, and in 1996 a number of the leaders who had withdrawn joined with others to establish what could be seen as a rival organization, the Association for Global New Thought (AGNT).

In the late 1990s INTA membership declined slightly. This may have been the result of several factors: fallout from the 1996 controversy, the rise of AGNT, the growth of another independent organization (Affiliated New Thought Network, established in 1993), as well as further institutional development of the major New Thought churches. As of 2001 membership is increasing and currently stands at about 1,200, of which 182 are institutional members, representing all branches of the New Thought movement. Notable institutional members include the Association of Unity Churches, RELIGIOUS SCIENCE International, DIVINE SCIENCE FEDERATION INTERNATIONAL, and United Divine Science Ministries, International. INTA has districts in forty-two countries and institutional members in ten. As is typical of New Thought groups (aside from Unity's Unity Village complex) there are no shrine centers in INTA, although trips to annual congresses may function as pilgrimages for highly committed members.

Address:

International New Thought Alliance
5013 E. Broadway Rd.
Mesa, AZ 85206
<http://www.websyte.com/alan/inta.htm>

Dell deChant

Source:

Braden, Charles. Spirits in Rebellion: The Rise and Development of New Thought. Dallas: SMU Press, 1963.

International Old Catholic Bishops' Conference

The Old Catholic movement developed in response to changes made in the belief structure of the ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH at the Vatican Council (1870–1871), the most significant change being the declaration of papal infallibility and the elevation of papal authority it implied. In Munich in 1871, forty-four dissenting Roman Catholic professors, under the leadership of the German Catholic scholars Johann Joseph Ignaz von Döllinger (1799–1890) and Johannes Friedrich, signed a protest of the Vatican Council's action. Congregations that rejected the pronouncement of the council began to form, and they, in 1873, organized the CATHOLIC DIOCESE OF THE OLD CATHOLICS IN GERMANY with the consecration of Joseph Hubert Reinkens as bishop of the Old Catholics in Germany. He was consecrated at Rotterdam by the bishops of Deventer of the dissenting diocese in Holland, which reformed as the OLD CATHOLIC CHURCH OF THE NETHERLANDS. Subsequent consecrations were held for the OLD CATHOLIC CHURCH OF AUSTRIA and the OLD CATHOLIC CHURCH IN SWITZERLAND.

In 1889, the Old Catholic bishops created the Union of Utrecht, and in their initial declaration they complained of a variety of matters in which they felt that Rome had departed from the faith of the primitive church, including the doctrine of the Immaculate Conception of Mary and the universal authority of the bishop of Rome. At the same time that they organized the union, the bishops decided to meet annually in conference to discuss any ongoing issues of importance. That annual conference evolved into the more formally organized International Old Catholic Bishops' Conference. The conference has been extended to include bishops from the Old Catholic churches in other countries, including France, Yugoslavia, the Czech Republic, Sweden, Slovakia, the United States, and Poland.

The conference is cooperative with the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES, which most Old Catholic churches have joined, and its representatives meet annually with representatives of the other world Christian communions.

Address:

International Old Catholic Bishops' Conference
Kon. Wilhelminalaan 3
3818 HN Amersfoort
Netherlands

Sources:

Moss, C. B. The Old Catholic Movement. Eureka Springs, AK: Episcopal Book Club, 1977.
Schnitker, Thaddeus A. "The Old Catholic Churches of the Union of Utrecht." Posted at <http://www.episcopalchurch.org/europe/coacce/utrecht.html>. Accessed October 20, 2001.

International Pentecostal Church of Christ

The International Pentecostal Church of Christ traces its beginning to an early Pentecostal periodical, The Bridegroom's Messenger, started by Gaston B. Cashwell (1860–1916) in 1907 in North Carolina. Cashwell became a singular force in spreading the Pentecostal message throughout the South. Among the people influenced by Cashwell were Hattie Barth and Paul Barth, who in 1907 founded a church in Atlanta. They later opened a Bible school, and their ministry led to the formation of a new association of churches and ministers, the International Pentecostal Assemblies.

At the same time, in 1908, John Stroup, a minister with the Methodist Protestant Church (now a constituent part of the UNITED METHODIST CHURCH) received the baptism of the Holy Spirit, and began to spread the Pentecostal message through Kentucky and Ohio. His work led to the founding of the Pentecostal Church of Christ in 1917, with Stroup as its first bishop. In 1976, the Pentecostal Church of Christ merged with the International Pentecostal Assemblies to create the International Pentecostal Church of Christ.

Although the church has only some 5,500 members in the United States, beginning in the 1930s in Brazil it built an extensive missionary program and has more than 150,000 members in sister churches in Brazil, India, Mexico, French Guinea, Kenya, the Philippines, Vietnam, and Uruguay. These national churches are indigenous and self-governing churches but considered a part of the International Pentecostal Church of Christ.

Address:

International Pentecostal Church of Christ
P.O. Box 439
2245 U.S. 42, SW
London, OH 43140
<http://members.aol.com/hqipcc>

Source:

Burgess, Stanley M., and Gary McGee, eds. Dictionary of Pentecostal and Charismatic Movements. Grand Rapids, MI: Regency Reference Library, 1988.

International Pentecostal Holiness Church

One must step back into the nineteenth century to start the pilgrimage of the denomination known as the International Pentecostal Holiness Church. The story of this church takes in both the Fire-Baptized Holiness Church (FBHC), with origins in Iowa in 1895, and the Pentecostal Holiness Church (PHC) of North Carolina, launched by Ambros Blackman Crumpler.

A call was issued by B. H. Irwin for a general council of his organization to meet July 28 to August 8, 1898, in Anderson, South Carolina. Irwin designated the Anderson meeting the First General Council of the Fire-Baptized Holiness Association. The government was a totally centralized autocracy, with the general overseer chosen for life.

In 1900 the news broke that Irwin had been leading a double life. J. H. King (1869–1946), then ruling elder of Ontario, came to Lincoln for the purpose of assuming the editorship of Live Coals of Fire, Irwin's periodical. King called for a meeting of the general council, which convened in Olmitz, Iowa, June 30 through July 2, 1900. King at age thirty-one was chosen as general overseer.

Meanwhile, A. B. Crumpler's desire to preach his view of Holiness again outweighed his desire to stay with the Methodist Episcopal Church (now an integral part of the UNITED METHODIST CHURCH), so after a successful evangelistic campaign, he issued a call in the early part of 1900 for a meeting in Fayetteville, North Carolina, to organize a new denomination.

Crumpler had learned of the original Pentecostal movement at Azusa Street in Los Angeles from reports by Frank Bartleman in 1906 in James M. Pike's Way of Faith periodical. A North Carolina Holiness preacher in Crumpler's church, Gaston Barnabas Cashwell (d. 1916), traveled to Los Angeles and obtained the Pentecostal experience at first hand. The North Carolina revival, which Cashwell initiated upon his return in the first days of 1907, quickly spread in the Southeast, while several holiness leaders and many of their members soon entered the Pentecostal fold.

A climatic battle for the Pentecostal Holiness Church occurred at the 1908 convention, which met in Dunn, North Carolina, on November 26. Crumpler, who had been unanimously reelected there, finally brought the matter to a head by walking out of the convention. The convention ended with A. H. Butler as the president and the church totally in the hands of the Pentecostal preacher.

On January 30, 1911, in the octagon-shaped Pentecostal Holiness Church building at Falcon, North Carolina, duly elected delegates met for the purpose of effecting a consolidation between the Pentecostal Holiness Church and the Fire-Baptized Holiness Church. Such was accomplished by the close of the following day.

With 176,846 adult members in the United States and Canada and ministry in 84 nations, the International Pentecostal Holiness Church in 1998 numbered 2.6 million persons around the world.

One of its most famous preachers was Oral Roberts (who left to join the United Methodist Church). Another, Bailey Smith, later became head of the Southern Baptist Convention, as did Charles Stanley, who also ranks among the most popular of electronic preachers.

Address:

International Pentecostal Holiness Church
P.O. Box 12609
Oklahoma City, OK 73157-2609
<http://www.iphc.org/>

Harold D. Hunter

Sources:

Campbell, Joseph E. The Pentecostal Holiness Church: 1898–1948. Franklin Springs, GA: Publishing House of the Pentecostal Holiness Church, 1951.
Synan, Vinson. Old Time Power: A Centennial History of the International Pentecostal Holiness Church. Franklin Springs, GA: LifeSprings Resources, 1998.

International Society for Krishna Consciousness

The worship of the god Krishna (whose name means "black" in Sanskrit) dates back to at least the second century B.C.E. in India, as recorded in the famous scripture the Bhagavad Gita (Song to the Lord). A tenth-century text, the Bhagavata Purana (The Tales of the Lord), established the playful, cowherd god Krishna as one of the most popular divinities in India. The Bengali sage Caitanya (1486–1533), a contemporary of Martin Luther, led a reformation of Krishna worship that included translating scriptures into vernacular languages, instituting public forms of dancing and singing (sankirtana), and inviting women and outcasts into the predominantly male worship circle. It was Caitanya's evangelical Krishna tradition into which Abhay Charan De (1896–1977) was initiated as the spiritual master (acarya or acharya) A. C. Bhaktivedanta Swami Prabhupada in 1932 in Bengal. Prabhupada brought his deep devotion to Krishna to America on September 17, 1965, when he arrived in New York City penniless and with a suitcase full of his translations of Krishna scriptures.

Prabhupada began his preaching ministry on the Lower East Side of New York City and attracted youth who were drawn to his piety and deep faith and to the intricate philosophy and exuberant rituals of the Hare Krishna tradition. In 1966, he incorporated his new society in New York and named it the International Society for Krishna Consciousness (ISKCON). As in Bengal, the worship Prabhupada taught to his American devotees was focused on devotion to Krishna through repetitive reciting of the names of Krishna (nama japa), worship in songs and prayers before the images of Krishna and his consort Radha (puja), and public dancing and singing to invite others to worship Krishna (sankirtana). Prabhupada's translations of and commentary on the key Krishna scriptures were distributed as a means of preaching and soliciting for money.

The Hare Krishnas' saffron robes and colorful saris, Indian chanting, and active proselytizing drew attention to the group, made them quite visible, and invited criticism and even hostile opposition. Even during Prabhupada's lifetime, overenthusiastic devotees sometimes engaged in questionable behavior in their fund-raising, exuberant proselytizing, and personal lifestyles. Prabhupada died on November 14, 1977. In that same year two Laguna Beach devotees were charged with drug trafficking and a former devotee, Robin George, sued ISKCON after charging it with kidnapping and brainwashing. The California Krishna temples that were involved and ISKCON as an organization were ultimately exonerated from both the drug dealing and kidnapping and brainwashing charges. Nonetheless, certain devotees, including several gurus among the eleven appointed successors to Prabhupada, did act unlawfully or immorally, which fueled public opposition to ISKCON. In the early years after Prabhupada's death, guru scandals included the ouster of a controversial guru named Hansadutta from the Berkeley Krishna temple and the indictment of a Moundsville, West Virginia, guru named Kirtanananda for trademark infringements and conspiracy to commit murder. Though both of these gurus had been excommunicated from ISKCON before they ran into trouble with the law, the Hare Krishnas were embarrassed by these and other such public exposés of supposed spiritual leaders of the movement. Perhaps the most serious charges leveled at ISKCON had to do with child abuse. Even today, ISKCON is learning more from its adult "children" about why it was not wise for ascetic men and untrained teachers to run crowded Krishna boarding schools.

In spite of the imagined and real scandals that ISKCON endured, the positive dimension of the devotional movement centering on Krishna that Prabhupada preached has allowed ISKCON to persist and mature, not only in the United States but in nations around the world. During Prabhupada's lifetime, his movement spread to Canada, England, Europe, Africa, and parts of Asia. By the late 1970s, ISKCON had more than ten thousand devotees living in more than fifty communities in the United States and sixty communities in forty-five countries around the world. In addition, there were literally tens of thousands of devotees living beyond the temples themselves as lay adherents. By the turn of the millennium, ISKCON was less temple- and less America-centered. By the year 2000, only forty-five temple and farm communities were active in the United States, with approximately nine hundred devotees living in them, yet these same communities attracted many householder families (grihasthas) and Indian immigrants who embraced the Hare Krishna faith that Prabhupada had brought to America thirty-five years earlier.

Also by the year 2000, ISKCON had 325 communities in seventy-five countries on every continent. Primary Hare Krishna devotional sites include Bhaktivedanta Manor outside London, the Palace at New Vrindavana in America, an international guesthouse and Vedic-style temple in Vrindavana, India, and a large devotional center in Mayapura, India. In 1998, while inaugurating a large new Krishna temple in New Delhi, India's prime minister, Atal Bihari Vajpayee, praised ISKCON for its success in the "globalization of the message of the Bhagavad Gita." Although some view ISKCON as simply an American cult, it can better be understood as a Hindu missionary movement promoting devotion to the Indian god Krishna, a movement that continues to gain popularity around the world even as its American membership base remains vital and stable.

Following Prabhupada's death, authority in ISKCON passed to the Governing Body Commission (GBC), composed of several initiating gurus and other senior devotees. Over the years the authority structure has become ever more decentralized, but the GBC still provides guidance internationally. The GBC may be contacted through the GBC Journal, P.O. Box 1119, Alachua, FL 32616, or through Secretary, Governing Body Commission, P.O. Box 16146, Circus Avenue office, Calcutta 700 017, India. Information is available from the ISKCON Communication Office, 10310 Oaklyn Dr., Potomac, MD 20854.

Address:

<http://www.iskcon.com>

Larry Dwight Shinn

Sources:

- Prabhupada, A. C. Bhaktivedanta Swami. The Bhagavad Gita as It Is. New York: Collier Books, 1968.
- Rochford, E. Burke. Hare Krishnas in America. New Brunswick, NJ: Rutgers University Press, 1985.
- Shinn, Larry D. The Dark Lord: Cult Images and the Hare Krishnas in America. Philadelphia: Westminster Press, 1987.

International Yoga Fellowship Movement

The International Yoga Fellowship Movement continues the work of Swami Satyananda Saraswati (b. 1923), one of the many disciples of Swami Sivananda Saraswati (1887–1863), the founder of the DIVINE LIFE SOCIETY. He lived with Sivananda at Rishikesh for twelve years beginning in 1943, but then, like other disciples, he left the society to found his own independent work, the International Yoga Fellowship in 1956 and the Bihar School of Yoga, which opened in 1964.

Satyananda continued Sivananda's integral yoga format, based on the practice of hatha yoga exercises, but also integrating the additional approaches of karma, jnana, bhakti, and raja yoga. In 1968 he made a world tour, which first introduced his teachings to the world outside of India, and in the 1980s he wrote a number of popular books. Through these books, he became known as not only a teacher of integral yoga but an exponent of tantric yoga. Tantra proposes the existence of a subtle human energy body that parallels the physical body. The subtle body explains the existence of psychic and spiritual experiences, and its cultivation and training is essential to the development of an enlightened state. Part of that process is the practice of kundalini yoga that activates the latent power believed by tantric practitioners to reside at the base of the spine. In the case of left-hand tantra, as taught by Swami Satyananda, it also includes the use of sex to blend male and female energies and consciousness.

The International Yoga Fellowship Movement spread in the 1960s by two routes. First, Indian disciples of Satyananda were among the many Indian nationals who migrated to Australia, North America, and Europe, and they have established centers primarily attended by Indian expatriates residing in the West. Many national organizations affiliated to the movement were formed by Swami Niranjanananda Saraswati (b. 1960) including Satyananda Ashrams, U.S.A., in 1980.

Also, many Westerners have been attracted to the teachings of Satyananda, and they have been active in spreading his teachings among Western disciples. Australian yoga teacher John Mumford was initiated by Satyananda in 1973 and two years later authored Sexual Occultism, one of the first books offering details of the heretofore secret tantric practices to the general public. Meanwhile, a Danish student who met Satyananda on his 1968 world tour moved to India with him and in 1970 returned to Denmark as Swami Janakananda Saraswati (b. 1939). He founded the Scandinavian Yoga and Meditation School in Copenhagen and in 1975 authored a second book detailing Satyananda's tantric teachings.

The International Yoga Fellowship Movement has an Internet site at the address given below that includes links to its many centers around the world. In the 1990s, one of Satyananda's disciples, Paramahansa Niranjanananda, founded Bihar Yoga Bharati as an academic center to supply the higher educational needs of the movement. Movement centers are now found on every continent, and in Europe the centers have organized the European Yoga Fellowship.

Address:

International Yoga Fellowship Movement
Bihar School of Yoga
Ganga Darshan
Fort Munger, Bihar 811201
India
http://www.yogavision.net/main_set.htm

Sources:

- Janakananda Saraswati, Swami. Yoga, Tantra and Meditation. New York: Ballantine Books, 1975.
- Mumford, John [Swami Anandakapila]. Sexual Occultism. St. Paul, MN: Llewellyn Publications, 1975.
- Satyananda Saraswati, Swami. Sure Ways to Self-Realization. Mongyar, Bihar, India: Bihar School of Yoga, 1983.
- . Taming the Kundalini. Mongyar, Bihar, India: Bihar School of Yoga, 1982.
- Teachings of Swami Satyananda Saraswati*. Mongyar, Bihar, India: Bihar School of Yoga, 1981.

International Zen Association

Founded by the Japanese Zen Buddhist priest Deshimaru Taisen (1914–1982), the France-based International Zen Association (IZA, also known as AZI) is an international network of nonprofit associations and centers (in Japanese, dojo) devoted to the practice of seated meditation (zazen). The founder arrived in France in 1967, claiming to be the last heir of a respected Soto Zen priest, Sawaki Kodo (1880–1965). A former executive, ordained as a Zen priest shortly before his master's passing, Deshimaru came at the invitation of a visiting group of French members of the macrobiotic movement. As baby boomers started seeking Eastern masters in the late 1960s, Deshimaru's Parisian dojo became the basis of a rapidly expanding organization. The IZA claimed twenty-five centers in 1972, and by 1982, more than fifty-three. A property was acquired in 1979, becoming the organization's temple of La Gendronnière (Loire-et-Cher, France).

In his Autobiography of a Zen Monk, Deshimaru Roshi explained that his master's last instructions were to bring "the seed of Zen" to the West, since Japanese Zen was weakening. His agenda was to first transplant the Zen teachings, then use those missions as a basis for reforming the institutions at home. Himself a lay practitioner for most of his training years, he gave priest ordinations (called "monks" and "nuns" in the group), interpreted as commitment to practice zazen in an otherwise lay life. The rituals of Japanese Soto Zen have sometimes been simplified. The master's emphasis on practice rather than rituals or intellectual conceptions, his direct personality and provocative teachings (urging, for example, his students to reconcile Eastern and Western philosophies through zazen) attracted many baby boomers.

Deshimaru introduced to his students the Soto Zen teaching of “just sitting” (shikantaza) and insisted that Zen is simply the practice of zazen, sitting cross-legged and observing one’s mind and breathing, without trying to gain anything. He emphasized that zazen and retreat periods where one could live and work with others led to greater insight. Thus his disciples would contribute to resolving what he saw as the civilization’s crisis, born of contradictions between intuition and rationality, science and religion.

The unexpected death of the charismatic founder sparked a crisis of succession. Some of his disciples left the organization, later receiving authorization to teach from other masters and founding their own organizations. Others stayed, vowing to “carry on together the mission of their late teacher.” Thus they imitated their teacher’s path, since he did not hold a formal transmission certificate (shiho) from his master and received one from another priest once his mission was established. Six leaders of the IZA have so far received a shiho in Japan since 1982. One died in 1990, another founded his own organization in 1993.

As the leaders of IZA now come of age as leaders and define their own teaching styles, reaching out for a new generation, it seems likely that they will also have to define, both collectively and individually, the future of their “Japanese connection.” Notwithstanding smaller or recent centers (designated as “groups”), the IZA claims 68 centers, primarily urban and nonresidential, in 13 countries. Only 5 of those centers are outside Europe. Its oldest centers are located in France, Germany, Switzerland, the United Kingdom, Belgium, and Spain. Although the active membership is estimated around 2,500 individuals, the audience and network of sympathizers of the movement is much larger. According to some members of the group, more than 15,000 persons have participated over time in at least one of its conferences, daily meditations, intensive practice periods (sesshin), or ten-day retreats.

Address:

International Zen Association
175 rue de Tolbiac
75013 Paris
France
<http://www.zen-azi.org>

Alioune Koné

Sources:

Deshimaru, Taisen. Autobiographie d'un moine Zen. 1977.
Reedited in 1995 by Taiko de Swarte and Nan Futsu. Lyon:
Terre du Ciel.
———. Sti. Edited by Philippe Coupey. Prescott, AZ: Hohm Press, 1996.

Koné, Alioune. “L’ouverture de la montagne.” Ph.D. dissertation, École des Hautes Études en Sciences Sociales, in progress.
Lenoir, Frédéric. Le Bouddhisme en France. Paris: Fayard, 1999.

Inter-Religious Federation for World Peace

The Inter-Religious Federation for World Peace (IRFWP) is one of several international interfaith organizations that has been inspired by and is largely supported by the UNIFICATION MOVEMENT, headed by Korean teacher Rev. Sun Myung Moon. The roots of the organization can be traced to a proposal put forth in the mid-1970s by Warren Lewis, a professor at the Unification Theological Seminary, that a centennial celebration of the 1893 World’s Parliament of Religions be held in 1993. He received some initial backing and organized several exploratory conferences in the late 1970s that led to the founding of the Global Congress of the World’s Religions in 1980.

The Global Congress held several meetings in the early 1980s that gave rise to two structures, the Council of the World’s Religions, which sponsored interfaith meetings in locations around the world, and the Assembly of the World’s Religions, a large interfaith gathering that convened every few years. Assembly meetings were held in New Jersey in 1985 and San Francisco in 1990. At the 1990 meeting, Rev. Moon announced the organization of the Inter-Religious Federation, which would supersede the Global Congress. This move was in line with other changes in the Unification Movement, which was being reorganized into a set of peace federations.

The Inter-Religious Federation was formally created in 1991. While continuing the Global Congress, it also assumed the role of several other Unification structures, including the International Religious Foundation and the New Ecumenical Research Association. IRFWP seeks to bring the resources of the world’s religions to bear on the primary goal of world peace. Peace is understood in all its facets as peace within the self and family units, within societies and between nations, peace within religions and between religious traditions, peace within and between cultures, and peace between the human and natural worlds.

The federation is headed by a presiding council, which is assisted by a large board of advisors made up of a spectrum of religious leaders and scholars. There is an administrative staff who manages the IRFWP’s programs on a day-to-day basis.

As the new century began, there were IRFWP chapters in twenty-six countries around the world. Among its major projects is Religious Youth Service, which brings youth of different faith backgrounds together to work on social service projects. The federation also publishes a scholarly journal, Dialogue to Alliance.

Address:

Inter-Religious Federation for World Peace
4 W. 43d St.
New York, NY 10036
<http://www.irfw.org>

Sources:

- Bryant, M. Darrol, John Maniatous, and Tyler Hendricks, eds. Assembly of the World's Religions, 1985: Spiritual Unity and the Future of the Earth. New York: International Religious Foundation, 1985.
- Cenkner, William, ed. Evil and the Response of the World's Religions. New York: Paragon House, 1997.
- Lewis, Warren. Toward a Global Congress of the World's Religions. Barrytown, NY: Unification Theological Seminary, 1978.
- Walsh, Thomas G. Assembly of the World's Religions. 1990: Transmitting Our Heritage to Youth and Society. New York: Interreligious Foundation, 1992.
- Wilson, Andrew, ed. World Scripture: A Comparative Anthology of Sacred Texts. New York: Paragon House, 1995.

Iran

Skirting the high and dry Plateau of Iran are the cities that gave birth to ancient Persian civilization, as well as becoming historic centers of religious thought and innovation. Moreover, numerous expansions and contractions of Persian political control have resulted in a contemporary modern nation dominated by Islam (more than 95 percent) but with an unexpected degree of ethno-religious diversity in the remaining, albeit tiny, section of the population.

The first documented religious tradition in Iran rose in conjunction with its earliest civilization about 3,500 years ago, and it flourished as the state religion of three pre-Islamic empires. ZOROASTRIANISM is named for its founding prophet, Zarathushtra (often known as Zoroaster), who probably lived in what is now eastern or northeastern Iran between the fifteenth and seventeenth centuries B.C.E. Poised midway between the great Mesopotamian civilizations to the west and the magnificent Indus Valley civilization to the east, Persia's early civilization and the religion created by its prophet shared with them similar ceremonial practices and conceptions of the divine and the nature of the universe, while simultaneously producing a particularly Persian point of view.

Status of religions in Iran, 2000-2050

Followers	2000			2025	2050
	total	%	rate
Muslims	64,707,000	95.6	1.85	89,268,000	107,039,000
Zoroastrians	1,903,000	2.8	2.41	3,200,000	5,100,000
Baha'is	463,000	0.7	1.23	800,000	1,000,000
Christians	363,000	0.5	1.59	620,000	900,000
Orthodox	202,000	0.3	0.63	300,000	400,000
Independents	80,000	0.1	6.16	240,000	400,000
Roman Catholics	16,400	0.0	-0.24	17,000	25,000
Nonreligious	205,000	0.3	2.53	500,000	800,000
Hindus	31,000	0.1	2.18	50,000	80,000
Jews	24,500	0.0	-1.99	25,000	25,000
Sikhs	8,100	0.0	1.50	11,000	13,500
Atheists	7,800	0.0	0.57	12,000	20,000
Ethnoreligionists	4,100	0.0	0.67	6,000	8,000
Neoreligionists	2,700	0.0	0.80	4,000	5,800
other religionists	8,400	0.0	0.96	12,000	16,000
Total population	67,702,000	100.0	1.86	94,463,000	114,947,000

Although ritual practice (with an official priesthood called magi) and philosophical interpretations changed over the course of three millennia, and pre-Zoroastrian elements were incorporated into its canon, Zoroastrianism continues to depend on the teachings of Zarathushtra for inspiration—particularly through the Avesta, or holy book, of which only a quarter is extant. An emphasis on personal responsibility and growth as a spiritual being, and a reverence for the goodwill of the divine in our material existence characterize the Zoroastrian perspective.

The Zoroastrian worshipping community has faced dramatic changes in its political position over the centuries. Receiving the patronage of kings previous to the introduction of Islam in the seventh century, Zoroastrians periodically wielded much influence in a region extending from Greece to northern India (an influence seen, e.g., in concepts of resurrection, the heaven/hell dichotomy, and savior imagery). Eventually, Zoroastrianism became a minority religion in the land of its birth, and those who persistently practiced it left the great cities for the southern provinces of Kerman and Yazd. By the tenth century some Zoroastrians found it too difficult to remain in Persia and migrated to the region of Gujarat in western India, where they became known as Parsis (meaning people from Pars, or Persia). Today, Parsis are a small but economically important religious minority found in India's western cities. Back in Persia, a dwindling Zoroastrian community courageously survived invasions by the Seljuk Turks and Mongols (who were eventually converted to Islam), punishing taxes (jizya), and humiliating rules of public social interaction with the dominant group (najes, or ritual uncleanness) by insulating themselves in rural and small-town settlements away from centers of political and economic power.

As the twentieth century approached, the plight of Zoroastrians eased, as the jizya was revoked and educational opportunities improved. Eventually, during Pahlavi rule in the twentieth century, Zoroastrians were recognized as descendants of an original, glorious Persian civilization, and iconic elements of their faith were made into nationalist symbols, including the new name of the modern nation, Iran, which was taken from a passage in the Avesta. Zoroastrians began to move back to the cities and are now protected under Iran's constitution with guaranteed parliamentary representation. In the aftermath of Iran's revolution in 1979, many Zoroastrians feared a return to oppressive conditions, and some migrated to Western nations in the early 1980s. When religious oppression did not materialize as expected, immigration eased, and the community experienced numerical growth, despite a rapid decline in the overall numbers of minority religious adherents between 1976 and 1996. Today, although Zoroastrians do not enjoy the patronage of the Iranian government and are subject to laws that restrict control over education and other social institutions, they have not suffered political or economic oppression beyond that experienced by citizens in general. Approximately 150,000 Zoroastrian adherents exist worldwide, with the largest concentrations in India, Pakistan, and Iran. The 1996 census of Iran reported 27,900 self-identified Zoroastrians, though this number may be low, as intermarriage with Muslims is common.

The seventh century C.E. proved to be a momentous time in Iranian history. The great Sassanid dynasty faced a major defeat in the battle of Nihavend in 642 against Arab invaders, and their empire collapsed with the flight and murder of their last king, Yazdegird III, in 652. Incipient application of Islamic law and conversion to the faith was gradual in the first few centuries, but Islam eventually became the dominant and even imposed faith system for the majority of people by the time of invasions by Seljuk Turks and Mongols (who came to be known as the Mughals) in the eleventh and twelfth centuries. Through this period, and until the Safavid dynasty rose to power at the beginning of the sixteenth century, Sunni traditions prevailed in Persia.

Unorthodox movements arising out of Shi'a predispositions, held by groups such as the ISMAILIS and the Sufis, were flourishing in Iran as early as the tenth and eleventh centuries. The Ismailis, some of whom continue to live in northeastern Iran, trace their origins to the lineage of Ismail (d. 760), the son of the sixth imam (revered as descended from Ali, son-in-law of the Prophet Muhammad). Ismail, who predeceased his father, is considered the seventh imam (hence the designation of Ismailis as Seveners) and the originator of a new lineage of imams (which later passed through another contested imam named Nizar). The Mongol invaders destroyed their religious center in the Alborz Mountains, causing Ismailis to flee the region. In 1840, the Nizari Ismaili leader, the Aga Khan, fled to British India, where he was successful in expanding the worshipping community. Today the majority of Nizari Ismailis, numbering several million, live outside of Iran.

Persia was the site where some of the first of the mystically oriented Sufi orders formed, several of which, such as the QADIRIYYA, the SUHRAWARDIYYA, and the Rifaiyya, not only spread through the region but over the centuries developed followings throughout the larger Muslim world. At the same time, the Sufi tradition contributed to the rise of a particularly Persian form of SHI'A ISLAM. The Sufis have historically been a brotherhood (and sisterhood) of mystical Shi'ite Muslims who eschew materialism and focus upon an ascetic and ecstatic form of spiritual expression and growth. Shah Ismail, the founder of the Safavid dynasty, was a Sufi master who established a Sufi-inspired form of Shi'a as the state religion of Iran when he became king in 1501. More importantly though, Shah Ismail conflated his political leadership with spiritual leadership. His followers, who were predominantly Turkic in origin, venerated him as both the murshid-kamil (the perfect guide) as well as an emanation of Allah Himself. Eventually the majority of the Turkic and Persian populations were integrated through the persistent and forceful application of Safavid rule and religious leadership.

During the two and a half centuries of Safavid rule, Sufi groups were targeted as heretical, despite their role in the creation of the state religion. The Shi'ite leadership (called Ithna Ashariyya, or the Twelvers) have a special devotion to the twelve imams (Ali and his eleven successors) as intercessors between the believers and Allah. The twelve imams are Ali, al-Hasan, al-Husain, al-Abidin, Muhammad al-Baqir, Ja'far al-Sadiq, Musa al-Kazim, Ali al-Rida, Muhammad al-Taqi, Ali al-Naqi, al-Hasan al-Askari, and Ali ibn Muhammad Simmari. The imams are believed to have been chosen by Allah to direct destiny and guide believers in their earthly existence; thus special prayers are offered to them and pilgrimage is made to their tombs.

The last or twelfth imam is especially important (hence the designation as Twelvers) as he acquired the imamate at the age of five, and his caregivers kept him in perpetual hiding (well into adulthood) due to the fear of an assassination. This seclusion became institutionalized as the ghaiba, or lesser occultation. Twelvers believe he never died but simply disappeared from Earth around 939. Popularly known as al-Mahdi (the Guided One or the Hidden Imam), he will, it is believed, return to a debilitated Earth heralding justice and peace and preside over the Day of Judgment.

This state-sponsored form of Shi'a Islam continues to be the dominant sect of Islam in Iran today. An attempt was made to separate political and clerical leadership in the twentieth century, but the effort came to an end in the 1979 Iranian Revolution. The Ayatollah Khomeini (1902–1989), leader of that revolution, promoted the doctrine of velayat-e faqih, or political guardianship of the community of believers by religious and legal scholars. This created a theocracy in contemporary Iran not even achieved by the Safavids.

Besides the Ismailis and Sufis, other groups of questionable orthodoxy (from the Sunni and Shi'a perspective) include the Ahl-e Haqq, who are concentrated around Lorestan and whose practices also have origins in a medieval Sufi order. Innovation of interpretation and praxis continues to this day.

Iranian innovation in religious philosophy has also produced one of the world's newest global faiths. The BAHÁ'Í FAITH is a religion that enjoins its followers to recognize a transcendent and unknowable God through that God's multiple manifestations over the millennia (e.g., Zathustra, Abraham, Moses, Gautama Buddha, Jesus, Muhammad, the Bab, and Baha'u'llah). Baha'u'llah (1817–1892), the name taken by Mirza Husayn Ali Nuri, which means the Glory of God, came from a wealthy family in northern Iran and is the founder of this faith (1860s). He was originally a Babi, or one who followed the Bab, and he based his teachings on his own revelations as well as those of the Bab. The Bab (the Gate) was originally a merchant from southern Iran named Sayyid Ali Muhammad Shirazi (1819–1850), who claimed to have had visions in 1844 of the al-Mahdi (Hidden Imam). Later he claimed to be the twelfth imam himself, with new revelations from Allah. His teachings were well received among the common folk across Iran, thus drawing the attention of orthodox religious leaders. Becoming more militant as a result of increasing persecution, Babis (his followers) took on the role of martyrs, as the Bab himself was imprisoned and fighting broke out in 1848. Eventually the Bab was executed by the government in 1850.

As a Babi, Baha'u'llah was imprisoned in Teheran in 1852, and in prison he claimed he had had his own revelatory visions. He was then exiled to Ottoman Iraq, where he lived the life of an ascetic in Kurdistan. By 1856 he returned to Iran, where he led a revival of Babism that morphed into the foundational philosophy of the Bahá'í Faith. At first there was contention within the community concerning Baha'u'llah's claims and teachings, but by the 1870s most Babis became Bahá'í.

The revival of what orthodox religious leaders saw as a heretical sect (whether in its original or new form) caused a renewal of persecutions, an increased militancy among Bahá'ís in their resistance and proselytizing activities, and their dispersal to other countries as early as the 1890s. Baha'u'llah himself lived in exile in Ottoman Turkey (Edirne, or Adrianople) and Syria (Akka, or Acre), where he wrote many of the treatises associated with Bahá'í philosophical and ethical doctrine, while his son and grandson took over organizational duties.

Bahá'í adherents in Iran have faced official persecution since the inception of their movement, with only a brief respite during the Pahlavi regime. In the 1990s over 5 million Bahá'í followers could be found around the world, while less than 500,000 (this is a rough estimate) live in the land of its birth. Bahá'í do not have constitutional protection, nor are they enumerated separately in the census. Some Bahá'í in Iran are not likely to claim membership, due to official discrimination in education and employment. The majority of Bahá'í in Iran are ethnic Persians; thus they are assimilated into all other social and cultural aspects of the dominant group.

Approximately 89 percent of Iran's people adhere to Shiite beliefs and practices in one form or another, while another 10 percent adhere to Sunni beliefs and practices. Sunni groups are primarily associated with a number of ethnic minorities that live in peripheral regions of Iran (e.g., Azari Turks, Arabs, Kurds, Turkomen, Baluchis, Qashqais, Bakhtiari). In addition to ethnic Sunni communities, Iran is home to a number of other religious minorities, which include Jewish and Christian communities.

The Jewish community has been a part of Persian society for at least 2,500 years. When Babylonia fell to Cyrus the Great, he freed the Jews who had been in captivity there and allowed their return to Jerusalem. Some Jews remained in the Persian Empire, slowly moving eastward over the centuries, and gradually becoming culturally assimilated until they became ethnically indistinguishable from the Persian majority. Since the advent of Islam their circumstances have risen and fallen with the whims and attitudes of specific rulers. Despite their status as dhimmi, or people of the book (i.e., people who follow what is regarded as holy scripture), Persian Jews in particular suffered harshly under the practice of najes (ritual uncleanness) and were often relegated to occupations already considered lowly (e.g., peddlers, dyers, weavers, entertainers) by the dominant political group. By the middle of the nineteenth century, Jews in Iran often lived in poverty in separate quarters (ghettoes) of the larger cities, they were subject to a poll tax, and they have most recently suffered a series of expulsions, forced conversions, and pogroms. When the Persian king, Naser al-Din Shah Qajar, visited Europe in 1848, European Jews brought to his attention the dire poverty and oppression Persian Jews suffered. The result of their entreaties was permission to provide financial help and lobbying for better treatment. This then led to the opening of the first modern Jewish schools.

The Imam Mosque in Esfahan, Iran (TH-Foto Werbung/TRIP)

Due in part to their new contact with Western Jews, Persian Jews began to migrate to Palestine by the late nineteenth century—a steady migration that has continued ever since. Under the Pahlavi regime (1941–1979), they gained official political representation for the first time. The 1979 Revolution ended official Iran-Israeli cooperation, thus placing Persian Jews in a precarious political position. However, many Persian Jews had supported the Revolution, and the Islamic Republic Constitution recognized them as members of the Iranian nation with equal rights and responsibilities. Despite Jews being entitled to elect a deputy to represent them in parliament, fears related to their perceived or real political relationship with Israel caused some Jews to suffer harassment, imprisonment, loss of property, and even death. Some individuals continue to be charged with being Zionist spies, although a recent court decision (2000) in Shiraz, in response to international pressure, reduced the sentences of ten Jewish men convicted of spying for Israel.

The Israeli government was concerned and frustrated about the fate of Iran's Jews until Iraq invaded Iran in 1980. Iran felt vulnerable because of Western sanctions against it, which meant that it was forced to fight an international war without access to military hardware and badly needed parts. Under these circumstances an implicit agreement was made between Israel and the Islamic Republic: In exchange for spare parts, Persian Jews would be allowed to leave Iran. As many as 55,000 Jews have been allowed to leave since the Revolution.

As the new century begins, although the Jewish population has declined significantly, Iran continues to be a home to more Jews than any other Muslim state. Many who left the country did so as much for economic reasons, such as high unemployment, high inflation, and social limitations, as they did for political reasons—all of which were causes of the emigration of Muslim Iranians as well. North America and Israel are major destinations for most of Iran's Jewish emigrants. According to human rights activists, Iranian Jews are no longer persecuted because of their religion, and attendance at synagogues and Jewish functions has been higher than at any time before the Revolution. The Jewish community itself sees its problems as stemming more from their political and economic relationship to the state. They hope that the popularly elected president, Mohammad Khatami, can improve the overall national social and economic situations and help them to resolve specific problems, such as having school on Saturdays, the Jewish Sabbath. Primarily living in large urban areas, Jews now number only half as many as before the Revolution (12,737 according to the 1996 census although Sanasarian estimates the number to be twice that many).

Christian communities in Iran also have a long history and tend to be associated with specific ethnic groups. Armenians, Assyrians, and Chaldeans are officially recognized as religious minorities by the revolutionary constitution, and they have had a Christian presence in Iran for nearly two millennia. On the other hand, Protestant communities (e.g., Congregationalists, Anglicans) emerged as missionary work began in the late nineteenth century. The original Protestant work, begun by the AMERICAN BOARD OF COMMISSIONERS FOR FOREIGN MISSIONS, led to the formation of the Evangelical Church of Iran, the largest of the Protestant groups. The ASSEMBLIES OF GOD brought Pentecostalism to Iran at the beginning of the twentieth century.

Armenians represent the largest group, whose numbers were estimated to be between 150,000 and 200,000 in the mid-1990s. Their origins in Iran are traced to the efforts of a Safavid king. Shah Abbas Safavid (1587–1629) led the Armenians from Julfa in the contemporary nation of Azerbaijan to a town designed for their settlement and with the same name near Esfahan in 1605, in order to take advantage of their artisan and business skills. Since then, most have been educated professionals, skilled artisans, or trusted business people, who have preserved their traditions, religion, language, and cultural festivities amid the dominant Muslim population. Today Armenian communities in Esfahan, Tehran, and Tabriz, affiliated with the ARMENIAN APOSTOLIC CHURCH, are the largest Christian congregations in Iran. In recent decades they have become the favorite place to live for those Armenians remaining in Iran, in large part because they have had better business opportunities there, and because they have been able to sustain their schools and social institutions in these cities.

The long-standing tolerant relationship between the Julfa Armenians and Shiite Iranians, as well as the contemporary diplomatic skills of Archbishop Korioun Papian (who presented Armenian cultural and festival traditions as religious in order to bring them under the protection of the constitution), assisted the Armenian community during the most difficult period just after the revolutionary government came to power. Archbishop A. Manukian has suggested Islamic countries of the Middle East as the best place for Armenians to preserve their language and culture. Muslim majority nations rarely proselytize, and they promote traditional values. The return to traditionalism after the Revolution and the Iran–Iraq War were major factors influencing the migration of young Armenians, thus leaving a more elderly and urbanized population back in Iran. It appears that the revolutionary government's threat of a more secular lifestyle was a primary motivation for these individuals, while the threat of a more secular society was of concern to both Armenian bishops and Shiite clergy.

Assyrians and Chaldeans, religiously organized through the APOSTOLIC CATHOLIC ASSYRIAN CHURCH (also known as the Church of the East), are smaller numerically (16,000–18,000 combined in 1990s) but have a much longer tradition of settlement in Iran than Armenians. Historically the Assyrians have been associated with the city of Urumiyeh (Rezayeh) in the northwest, and the Chaldeans with the Khuzistan region, especially Ahwaz. Their recent migration out of Iran (as well as to Tehran) has, to a large degree, been caused by the Iran–Iraq War and their previous strong support for the Pahlavi regime. Before the development of university education among Muslims, the Assyrian and Chaldean communities were disproportionately represented in specialized technical and professional services, thus providing them the contradictory position of greater economic stability during hard economic times, but also creating the danger of becoming official or unofficial political targets because of some of the services they provided. Today over 140,000 people of Assyrian and Chaldean heritage hail from the entire Middle Eastern region and live in the United States (mainly around Chicago and Detroit), where they have successfully established themselves.

Traditionally, Iranians have not perceived Armenians or Assyrians as proselytizers, even though they are Christian. On the other hand, Christian missionaries, particularly since the nineteenth century, have been seen as a threat to Muslim society, despite the fact that they have been involved in bringing education and health care services to all Iranians. American and European Christian missionaries opened schools in Tehran and other cities as early as 1881, almost two decades before the Jewish community. Establishing most of the earliest modern schools and colleges, such as Elburz College in Tehran, and hospitals with scientifically trained medical doctors, these philanthropic organizations served both Muslims and non-Muslims. Historically, European missionary activists in Iran had a higher rate of success in converting Armenians, Assyrians, and Jews than Muslims, sometimes causing deep resentments toward missionaries in these minorities.

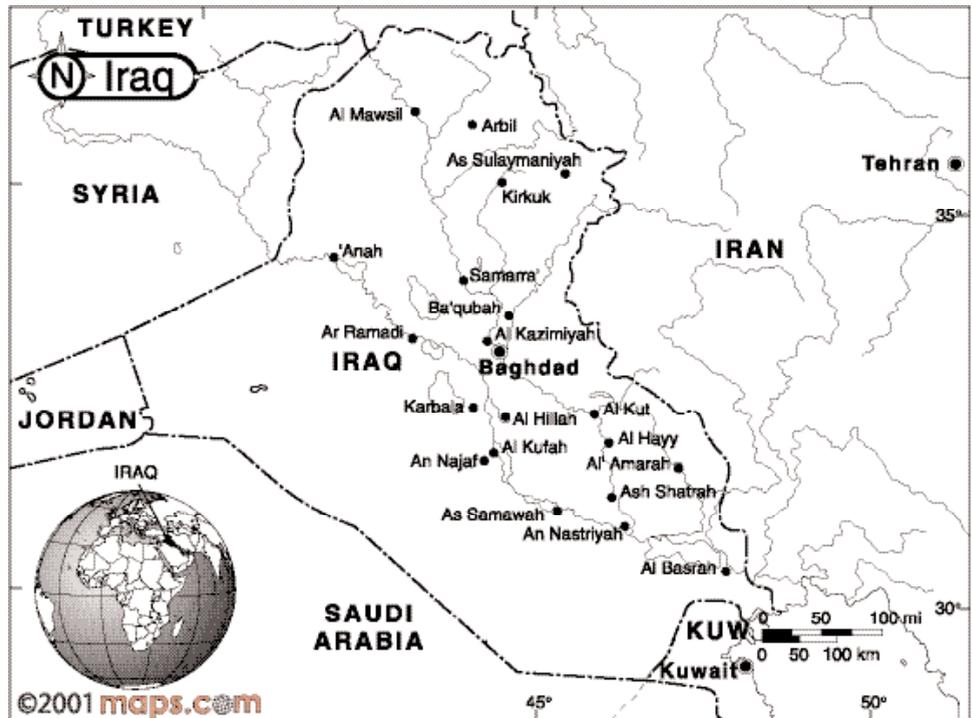

In Iran, both before the Revolution and since, apostasy (the conversion from Islam to any other faith) is a crime punishable by death. The degree to which people have actually been punished for apostasy varies from region to region and under specific rulers. On the other hand, historically, anyone who converts to Islam has the right to claim the property of his non-Muslim relatives. Thus, any religious group that actively seeks to convert others in Iran is regarded suspiciously, and this attitude has intensified since the Revolution. Both the Baha'i and Protestant Christian missionaries have been persecuted for their proselytizing activities, as well as their Muslim converts. Since 1979 several Muslim converts to Christianity, who were leaders of their churches, have been mysteriously killed. As Protestant Christian numbers have always been small, and they have not been enumerated separately, it is difficult to assess the effect of the Revolution on their migration and demographic experience, particularly in terms of different denominations.

Carolyn V. Prorok

Sources:

- Arjomand, Said Amir. The Shadow of God and the Hidden Imam: Religion, Political Order, and Societal Change in Shi'ite Iran from the Beginning to 1890. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1994.
- Bakhash, Shaul. The Reign of the Ayatollahs: Iran and the Islamic Revolution. New York: Basic Books, 1984.
- Hemmasi, Mohammad, and Carolyn V. Prorok. "Demographic Changes in Iran's Recognized Religious Minority Populations since the Islamic Revolution." Journal of Asian and African Studies (2002, forthcoming).
- Khomeini, Ruhollah. Islamic Government. New York: Manor Books, 1979.
- Sanasarian, Eliz. Religious Minorities in Iran. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2000.

Status of religions in Iraq, 2000-2050

Followers	2000			2025	2050
	total	%	rate
Muslims	22,195,000	96.0	2.51	39,386,000	52,543,000
Christians	741,000	3.2	1.62	1,270,000	1,800,000
Independents	316,000	1.4	3.67	740,000	1,200,000
Roman Catholics	268,000	1.2	-0.16	300,000	315,000
Orthodox	139,000	0.6	1.10	200,000	250,000
Nonreligious	122,000	0.5	3.64	250,000	400,000
Atheists	36,000	0.2	3.71	75,000	125,000
Baha'is	2,600	0.0	2.69	4,000	9,000
Buddhists	1,300	0.0	3.89	2,500	6,000
Jews	170	0.0	-0.51	150	150
other religionists	30,600	0.1	2.46	46,000	60,000
Total population	23,115,000	100.0	2.49	41,014,000	54,916,000

For several centuries, Mesopotamia functioned as a Seleucid desert outpost against the might of Roman conquest. However, between 133 and 117 B.C.E., the Roman Empire conquered much of Iraq. Frontier wars and political intrigues ensued that left Roman rule (now directed from Constantinople) in shambles and the region vulnerable to onslaught from other would-be conquerors.

During the seventh century C.E., Islam, a new monotheistic religion founded on the teachings of the prophet Muhammad (569–632) in Saudi Arabia, quickly spread to the neighboring regions. Following Muhammad's death, internal disputes quickly occurred over who would serve as the next caliph, or religious leader of Islam. When Ali, the son-law of Muhammad, was killed in battle in 661, the Umayyad dynasty ruled until 750. Most followers of Ali, who believed the rule of Islam should be established in those of the same bloodline as Muhammad, became known as the Shi'a, while others who believed that rule by consensus was called for became known as Sunni. The Sunnite Umayyads allowed a degree of religious tolerance that included both Shi'a as well as Christians.

Iraq

Popularly known until World War II as Mesopotamia, the name given in the writings of the Jewish Bible, Iraq has been the home of successive civilizations. Its most ancient history, however, is beyond the scope of this work, and this entry begins with the brief reign of Alexander the Great (334–327 B.C.E.) and the Seleucid Empire, which followed.

The Abbasid dynasty supplanted the Umayyads in 750. After using the Shiites to help topple their predecessors, the Abbasids turned on them and destroyed their holy sites. In the meantime, Iraq had become the most prosperous part of the empire. The Shiite Buwailids ruled briefly from the mid-tenth century until the eleventh, when the reins of power passed to Turkey and the Ottoman Empire, although the Abbasid caliph remained the titular head of state, reporting at times to the Ottoman emperor. In 1253, Hulagu or Hulegu, (c. 1217–1265), a grandson of Genghis Khan (c. 1167–1227), captured Baghdad, and by 1258 Abbasid rule faded away. Iraq was ruled by Mongols under the Khan of Persia until 1335, when the Jalai'rids seized power and governed until the early fifteenth century. The Ottomans ruling from afar watched the rise and fall of these military and religious groups within their empire. They considered them to be a major threat to both the empire and to the HANAFITE Sunni tradition. Consequently, in 1534 Sultan Suleiman the Magnificent (1494–1566) conquered Baghdad, settling the question for the time being of who would rule.

Partially due to its location, Iraq only slowly absorbed Western influences. By 1800, there was a British Resident at Basra, followed by a British consulate in 1802. France sent agents during the same period (and Catholicism was introduced by French and Italian religious orders). By 1914, the British were at war with the crumbling Ottoman Empire, leading to Britain being named the governing power. The British established a Christian regime that was politically foreign and religiously alien to the inhabitants. Immediate Arab nationalist sentiment, demonstrated in several insurrections, led the British to discontinue their new order, and an Arab Council of State was instituted, with Britain serving in an advisory capacity.

In 1921, Amir Faisal ibn Hussuan assumed rulership of Iraq. After a decade of transition, Iraq was accepted into the League of Nations, in October 1932, as a sovereign state free from the British mandate. Unfortunately, freedom from foreign rule did not stabilize religious and national sentiments. Warfare soon broke out between Sunnis and the powerful Shi'a tribes of the Euphrates valley, while the Kurdish minority agitated for a separate state. Then in 1933, the Iraqi army massacred a number of the Assyrian minority, and the country experienced seven military coups between 1936 and 1941. After World War II, sentiment ran high against European intervention; Iraqis participated in the Arab-Israeli War of 1948 until a peace agreement was arranged. Most Jews, who traced their Iraqi heritage to ancient times, emigrated between 1948 and 1952. Today, there are fewer than two hundred Jews left of that indigenous population, a record of which goes back to the dawn of history.

The Suez crisis between Egypt and Israel that began on October 29, 1956, and subsequent intervention of British and French forces affected Iraq deeply. Iraq severed diplomatic relations with France over French participation against Egypt. The students of Iraq rallied so stridently that colleges and schools were closed for a year and a half after disturbances in Mosul and Majaf caused deaths among the rioters. Martial law was imposed for one and a half years.

In 1959, King Faisal II, along with the Iraqi crown prince, was assassinated to make way for an independent republic. The power brokers of the coup were members of the socialist Ba'ath party (founded in Syria in 1941). The leadership of General Abd al Karem Kassem, who headed the new government, was disturbed by further efforts of the Kurds to establish their independence. Kassem was assassinated in 1963, and the Ba'ath party, dedicated to socialism, Arab unity, and freedom from foreign intervention, took full and exclusive control of the country. However, fighting involving the Kurds continued. Attempts to solve the Kurdish problem were undermined by Iran, who tended to support Kurdish aspirations out of their shared Shiite faith. Consequently, Iraq severed diplomatic relations with Iran. In August 1974, the hostile situation between the Kurds and the government led to 130,000 Kurds fleeing to Iran. A new peaceful solution fell apart when Iraq devastated parts of Kurdistan in 1975, leading to Kurds becoming displaced refugees, their homes and towns razed to the ground. (Of note, the initial reports of the use of chemical warfare by Iraq came from this military venture, which targeted both Iranians and Kurds.)

A new leader emerged in Iraq in 1979, when Saddam Hussein became the president of the Revolutionary Party. Today, he holds both the posts of prime minister and president of Iraq. A new constitution, liberal by Iraqi standards, was approved in July 1990, though despite the appearance it gives of granting various liberties, the real power rests with Hussein. Hussein addressed the issue of an independent Kurdish territory but never acted, as numerous oilfields were located in the proposed territory. He has also feared that the Shi'as would turn against his largely Sunni administration; the Kurds, however, have shown more aversion to the harsh government of Iran since the rise of the Ayatollah Khomeini than rule from Baghdad.

Hussein, still in militant mode, became displeased with his neighbor Kuwait, which wished to be repaid for loans made to Iraq to buttress the financial infrastructure of a failing economy. In return, Hussein accused Kuwait of stealing large oil reserves from the borders of the two countries, and then in 1990 moved troops into Kuwait. The United States reacted quickly and in January 1991 launched a war against the occupation. The war ended after only a few weeks with heavy losses by the Iraqis. The real damage to Kuwait came when Hussein ordered his retreating army to set oil rigs on fire, turning much of Kuwait into a roaring mass of fire and smoke. The raging wells took eight months to extinguish. Today most of the war-battered and scorched regions barely support life. Living conditions are primitive. As for Iraq, it remains alienated and isolated from most global political and economic structures. Iraq's postwar relations have been beleaguered by United Nations Security Council Resolution 687, which imposes economic sanctions until Iraq accounts for all weapons of mass destruction, including biological warfare equipment. Hussein has argued the need for such weapons—in case Israel attacks his country.

Surviving foiled assassination attempts and failed coups, Hussein had not been ousted from power as of the end of 2001. He was continually named as part of the conspiracy that bombed the World Trade Center in New York and the Pentagon in Washington, D.C., on September 11, 2001. However disliked in the West, he remains in power as this volume goes to press.

Since the eighth century, Islam has remained the majority religion in Iraq. Shi'as claim the allegiance of 62 percent of the population, including the Kurdish minority, although their reflection in government offices is low because Sunnis are the ruling group. Most Sunnis follow either the HANAFITE or SHAFIITE schools, the latter strong among Kurdish Sunnis.

Within Shi'a Islam there are two major schools, the Usuli and the Akhbari. The smaller group, the Akhbaris are found primarily in southern Iraq (and parts of neighboring Iran). The larger Usuli school has the more liberal legal perspective and uses a degree of interpretation in reaching legal decisions. Iraq has several sanctuaries for the Shiite population, including Samarra and Al Khadimain. There is an Institute of Islamic Studies at Baghdad.

Although a very small minority of the Kurds are Christian, there are also YEZIDI among the Kurds. The Yezidi follow a religion that blends Manichaeism, Jewish, Zoroastrian, Nestorian, and Christian elements. They worship with two sacred books, the Black Book and the Book of Revelation. Yezidis live mostly west of Mosul, but some are scattered in other regions. The Mandeans who dwell in Iraq are known as Sabians to the Arabs. Gnosticism synthesized with Christian, Jewish, and Iranian elements, along with a taste of fertility worship, forms the infrastructure of their faith. Their principle books are the Treasure, the Book of John, and a book of hymns. Most of them live in lower Iraq at Basra and Kut, as well as southwest Iran. The BAHÁ'Í FAITH, which originated in neighboring Iran, has found Iraq an equally hostile environment. Despite maintaining a presence in Iraq for 120 years, it numbers fewer than 2,660.

Christian communities in Iraq trace their history to the first century and the mission of the apostle Thomas in the Jewish colonies. Church hierarchies developed under the patriarch of Antioch in the fourth century. In the next century, Nestorians sent missionaries to the region and declared a separation from Antioch. The ANCIENT CHURCH OF THE EAST, or Assyrian Church, survived as the oldest Christian church in Iraq. It is aligned theologically with the Nestorians, who dissented from Roman Catholic and Eastern Orthodoxy on the nature of Christ's divinity. Seleucia-Ctesiphon, near Baghdad, was at one juncture in time the most important patriarchate beyond the Roman Empire. From there, from the fifth through the tenth century, Nestorian missionary efforts spread Christian doctrine throughout the Middle East.

Recently schisms have splintered the church. Its ancient headquarters, located in Kurdish territory, fell victim to Turkish expansion in the 1890s. In 1940, the patriarch relocated to America, from which he now leads the APOSTOLIC CATHOLIC ASSYRIAN CHURCH OF THE EAST. However, since the 1970s, a faction led by Mar Addai, known as the Ancient Church of the East, has claimed to be the authentic patriarchate. The Apostolic Catholic Assyrian Church, which supports Mar Dinka IV as patriarch of the East, is acknowledged by the Vatican to be legitimate. The Iraqi government supports the claims of the Ancient Church of the East.

Armenians have lived in Iraq for many centuries. The ARMENIAN APOSTOLIC CHURCH, Diocese of Baghdad, is related to the Catholicate of Echmiadzin in Armenia. Primary schools exist in cities where there are priests to teach them. The Greek Orthodox have one church in Baghdad, under the jurisdiction of the Greek Orthodox Patriarchate of Antioch and all the East. Its bishop resides in Kuwait.

The ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH dates its existence in Iraq to 1553, when the Eastern Rite CHALDEAN CATHOLIC CHURCH was recognized. Most Catholics are Chaldeans, and now number about 242,000 adherents in 10 dioceses. The church's patriarch resides in Baghdad. Iraq's Pontifical Seminary at Mosul is a joint effort of the Syrian and Chaldean communities. The SYRIAN CATHOLIC CHURCH numbers about 50,000 people in 2 dioceses. The first congregations started in 1790. The ARMENIAN CATHOLIC CHURCH congregations, with some 2,150 members, were organized into the Diocese of Baghdad in 1954, led by an archbishop and four priests. The GREEK CATHOLIC CHURCH's 300 members are served by a priest residing in Baghdad. A Latin diocese for Catholics was formed in 1632; however, there was no resident bishop until 1920. Latin Catholics number about 3,200 today. There are 200 DOMINICANS and Presentation sisters, most of them Iraqi, who teach and do medical work.

Christians who today use Syriac liturgy are divided into Chaldeans, Nestorians (Assyrian Churches of the East), Syrian Catholics, and Syrian Orthodox, who are sometimes referred to as Jacobites. This group entered Iraq in the sixth century, and they still feel that they are original Iraqis and the oldest Christian group in Iraq. Mar Matta near Mosul has the oldest Christian monastery, with six resident monks. During the demise of the Ottoman Empire in 1917, Armenian Orthodox (Gregorians) and Armenian Catholics fled Turkey and settled in Iraq. Greek Orthodox and Greek Catholics are immigrant communities in Iraq and are small in number.

Protestantism made a late appearance in the nineteenth century. The first British missionary attempt in Iraq was through the London Jews Society in 1820. Americans started activity in Mosul in 1850 through the AMERICAN BOARD OF COMMISSIONERS FOR FOREIGN MISSIONS. The CHURCH MISSIONARY SOCIETY started its mission in 1882 and persevered until World War I. The Arabian Mission of the REFORMED CHURCH IN AMERICA started its program in Basra in 1889. They were assisted by the Evangelical and Reformed Church (now a constituent part of the UNITED CHURCH OF CHRIST) and the United Presbyterian Church in the U.S. (now a constituent part of the PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH [U.S.A.]). In 1957, another group, the Presbyterian Church in the U.S.A., joined the efforts. However, no presently existing Iraqi church can be traced to these roots, converts having primarily been made from Nestorian or Assyrian congregations.

Today, Arab Evangelical churches number about 10 church groups in Baghdad, Kirkuk, and Basra. All of these congregations are served by Egyptian ministers. Two Assyrian Evangelical churches in Baghdad and Mosul are not affiliated administratively. The Armenian Evangelical Church claims one small congregation in Baghdad. A single Anglican congregation, serving expatriate British and Arabs, belongs to the Diocese of Cyprus and the Gulf of the EPISCOPAL CHURCH IN JERUSALEM AND THE MIDDLE EAST. The Lutheran Orient Mission has attempted to convert Kurds since 1911 with little success. Other small religious groups that have worked in Iraq, such as the ASSEMBLIES OF GOD, Basra Assembly, Evangelical Alliance Mission, and the SEVENTH-DAY ADVENTIST CHURCH are no longer active. In 1969 all American missionaries were ordered out of the country, though some of the missions they created continue under national leadership. In the 1990s, Pentecostal and Charismatic movements were popular, and now number some 265,000 adherents. Christians now constitute about 3 percent of the population.

Islam is the state religion of Iraq, but all citizens are deemed equal before the law. The cultural rights of the Syrian-speaking groups are decreed in Article 25 of the constitution dated April 22, 1972, which protects the Assyrians and Chaldeans. Technically the Revolutionary Council recognized three religious holidays for Christians—Christmas and two days for Easter, and there are five stated holidays for Jews. Religious judges (qadi) preside over Muslim jurisprudence. The General Bureau of Waqf (law) based in Baghdad is the official agency for Muslim law courts. There are no religious courts for non-Muslims, who settle their issues in civil courts.

Gail M. Harley

Sources:

- Moffett, Samuel Hugh. A History of Christianity in Asia: Beginnings to 1500. Vol. 1. New York: HarperCollins, 1992.
- Nakash, Y. The Shi'as of Iraq. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1994.
- Rejwan, N. The Jews of Iraq: 3000 Years of History and Culture. Boulder, CO: Westview Press, 1985.
- Wiley, J. N. The Islamic Movement of Iraqi Shi'as. Boulder, CO: Lynne Rienner Publishers, 1992.

Ireland

Ireland's historical geography is a complex one that thoroughly intertwines earthy Celtic sensibilities with historic Roman and Anglo penetrations. An early, pre-Celtic tradition is difficult to ascertain at this time. Celtic ritual traditions were practiced over a wide area of western and northern Europe and included Ireland—possibly as early as the first millennium B.C.E. The Irish Celtic tradition shared with its continental counterparts a belief in the immortality of the soul, and a reverence for the natural forces and life forms of Earth (e.g., wind, water, trees, eels) and its planetary connections (e.g., sun, sky, moon). Moreover, its priests (known as druids) played a powerful role in the social and political life of the people; for example, they ceremonially validated the power of local and regional kings (or chieftains), inasmuch as they were literally married to the land they ruled (known as a tuath).

The fecundity and the health of the tuath was essentially reflected through the virility and sound mind of the ruler. In this context, certain groves of trees and natural springs were singled out for ritual observances that guaranteed the health of the land, the king, and individual petitioners. Ancient Irish Celts believed that subterranean, parallel energy lines, now called ley lines, intersected with rising and falling subterranean streams. If such a stream erupted as a spring at Earth's surface, then it was deemed a power point to be ritually utilized. Not all springs were so blessed, and not all springs maintained their power. Yet, over the years the power of some springs has been amazingly long-lived, while new ones continue to be found. Eels could often be found in the pools that formed around springs. Those eels fortunate enough to live in powerful springs were believed to live far longer than a normal life span.

Early in the fourth century of the Common Era, an adolescent boy of British Roman origin was captured and taken to Ireland as a slave for a local king (probably in Antrim). He became fluent in Irish and familiar with Celtic beliefs over a period of about six years before he escaped. This young man eventually returned to Ireland to evangelize for the church in Rome, and he later became known as St. Patrick (the patron saint of modern Ireland). Most of the details of Patrick's life are open to debate, as is the original spelling of his name. The current scholarly consensus is that he returned to Ireland around 461, and he himself says in his Confession that he was not sent by any human authority but impelled by divine inspiration. Other sources suggest he returned to carry out a mission assigned to him by Pope Celestinus I in the year 431. Early in the mission Patrick met resistance to his evangelizing, particularly from the druids, who had much to lose if their ceremonies were no longer needed. He is said to have found success by challenging Celtic beliefs at important ceremonies by subverting key elements of these events (e.g., ignoring a royal edict against lighting fires in the days before an important spring ritual, Patrick lit a Paschal—Easter Eve—fire that the druids could not extinguish) or killing eels at powerful springs with no apparent negative effects to his own person. He also established Christian worship sites on or around those places deemed powerful by the Celts (e.g., springs, tree groves, mounds). Eventually he baptized kings, thus laying the groundwork for a future Christian Ireland.

The Irish did not become Christians magically overnight or even in a century's time, despite Patrick's successful mission. Instead, Christianity overlaid an essentially Celtic faith tradition like a veneer on a table. As Irish monasticism took root and spread, elements of the Celtic tradition were drawn up into Christian orthodoxy, while simultaneously Celtic practices absorbed Christian explanations. What emerged was a Celtic Christian church that had only nominal ties to the church in Rome. Christian priests eventually supplanted kings as the center of politically charged spiritual power, and powerful springs became holy wells. This synergistic syncretism of two great ritual traditions can still be seen at tree groves, in cemeteries, and at the holy wells of Ireland today. Although some wells are associated with local saints (e.g., St. Peakaun's Well at the Glen of Aherlow in County Tipperary) and often reflect a strong Celtic sensibility through their accoutrements and local character, other wells (e.g., St. Brigid's Well at Liscannor in County Clare) have national significance and blend Celtic and Christian meaning and use. Finally, some wells have been thoroughly Christianized in meaning and usage (e.g., St. Brigid's Well at Killare in County Westmeath and near to

Status of religions in Ireland, 2000-2050

Followers	2000			2025	2050
	total	%	rate
Christians	3,624,000	97.2	0.58	4,227,000	4,444,000
Roman Catholics	3,160,000	84.7	0.52	3,658,000	3,750,000
Anglicans	134,000	3.6	0.62	170,000	200,000
Protestants	31,500	0.8	0.16	32,000	32,500
Nonreligious	89,600	2.4	2.71	150,000	220,000
Muslims	8,400	0.2	1.89	15,000	30,000
Atheists	5,200	0.1	1.36	7,500	10,000
Jews	1,700	0.1	-0.56	1,200	1,000
Baha'is	1,300	0.0	1.48	2,500	4,600
Chinese folk-religionists	260	0.0	1.27	400	600
Total population	3,730,000	100.0	0.63	4,404,000	4,710,000

the hill of Uisneach). Such syncretism has occurred over one and a half millennia, with dynamic processes of re-mythologizing and historicizing sacred sites. The more historicized a site, the more Christian it becomes. Folk piety continues to have strong Celtic elements.

Local control of church ritual and practice was shattered in 1171 with the culmination of an Anglo-Norman invasion that installed English control over the Irish church through the Synod of Cashel. Culdees (Christian monks of the Celtic tradition) carried on the rituals of the Celtic Church for at least four more centuries before they finally died out. In the meantime, the CHURCH OF IRELAND was formally separated from the ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH and its papal administration and politically incorporated into the CHURCH OF ENGLAND. Through the trials and tribulations of English expansion, the Elizabethan Wars of the sixteenth century, enslavement to Caribbean plantations, Cromwell's reign of terror in the seventeenth century, and the great famine in the nineteenth century, Irish identity with the Roman Catholic Church deepened and helped to maintain the Irish people's identity as Irish, despite the direct control of the official Church of Ireland by the English Crown. Eventually, through sustained events of resistance (e.g., the Catholic-Gaelic Rebellion of 1641, the 1798 Rebellion) and changes in Britain's own political goals (e.g., during Queen Victoria's reign and Gladstone's rule as prime minister), the Catholic Church in Ireland was finally legalized in 1829, and the Church of Ireland was disestablished as the state church in 1869, at which point most Irish churches reverted to their Roman origins. Today the Church of Ireland still exists, but in an attenuated form. It shares its early history with the Roman Catholic Church of Ireland through its Celtic Christian period. It is now part of the worldwide ANGLICAN COMMUNION found in 164 nations. In Ireland it has approximately 350,000 members, of which 275,000 live in Northern Ireland and 75,000 in the Republic of Ireland. It is governed as a single church with two provinces (Armagh and Dublin) and twelve dioceses.

Contemporary Ireland is overwhelmingly Catholic. This arises from its early connection to the Roman Church as well as its anti-Catholic trial by fire under English rule. Political, ethnic, and religious identity have become fully and completely conflated with each other, given this colonial history. As a consequence, political tensions and violence continue to be articulated through people's identity as Catholic or Protestant. Protestant/Free Church Irish are now associated with a number of denominations, due to the resettlement of various Protestant groups by the English during colonial times as well as the conversion of some Catholic Irish. It is Protestant identity in general, though, that carries political significance and not the particular sectarian group as such. Not surprisingly, most Protestants live in Northern Ireland, and the counting of people's religious affiliation during each census cycle is loaded with political implications. According to the 1991 census, Northern Ireland had 606,000 Catholics (38.4 percent), 337,000 Presbyterians, 279,000 Church of Ireland members, 60,000 Methodists, 19,000 Baptists, 12,000 Brethren, 12,000 Free Presbyterians, 8,000 Congregational members, 12,000 Protestant (no denomination noted), and 11,000 Christian (no denomination noted); 115,000 refused to identify themselves, and approximately 3,500 people identified themselves as non-Irish minorities (e.g., Sikh, Muslim, Buddhist) or atheist. These numbers, particularly of those who refuse to name their faith association and those who claim only a general category (Protestant, Christian), reflect a context of deep division and pervasive politicization of religious identity.

An American news broadcast (ABC, September 6, 2001) noted that unpublished results from the 2001 census of Northern Ireland indicate that Catholics now compose 47 percent of the population. This increase is likely due to the combined effects of increased self-identification by Catholics, the emigration of Protestants from Northern Ireland, and higher birthrates within the Catholic community. This increase in the Catholic proportion of the population will likely have significant political consequences and may cause a new round of violence when the results are published. The Republic of Ireland continues to reflect a strong Catholic identity, suffused with Celtic influences. At its last census (1998), 91.6 percent of the population were Catholic, 2.5 percent were members of the Church of Ireland, and 5.9 percent were classified as other.

The "other" category is mainly reflected in Dublin's religious scene and includes members of Evangelical and Pentecostal churches, Western esotericists, imported religions (often imported by immigrants) such as Islam, Buddhism, Hinduism, Sikhism, and various new religions. Among the groups with centers in Ireland are the spectrum of Buddhists, the Universal WHITE BROTHERHOOD, the BAHÁ'Í FAITH, the CHURCH OF SCIENTOLOGY, and the UNIFICATION MOVEMENT. It has also been a focus of the revivalist Neo-Pagan movement based in the worldwide FELLOWSHIP OF ISIS headquartered at Huntington Castle in County Wexford.

The earliest reference to Irish Judaism was in the eleventh century, and Jews are known to have come to Ireland following their expulsion from Portugal in 1496 and during the Napoleonic Wars early in the nineteenth century. As early as 1660, a prayer room was opened near Dublin Castle, and one Jewish seminary can be dated to the 1660s. The majority of the present-day Jewish community arrived between 1880 and 1910 from Eastern Europe. From a peak of 5,500, the community has dwindled to around 1,500, many having moved to Palestine after 1948. The several synagogues are all Orthodox except for one Reform synagogue.

Carolyn V. Prorok

Sources:

- Bitel, Lisa M. Isle of the Saints: Monastic Settlement and Christian Community in Early Ireland. Ithaca, NY: Cornell University Press, 1990.
- Brenneman, Walter L., Jr., and Mary G. Brenneman. Crossing the Circle at the Holy Wells of Ireland. Charlottesville: University of Virginia Press, 1995.
- Gleeson, Tara. "The History of Judaism in Ireland." Posted at http://www.local.ie/content/14608.shtml/history/social_and_religious_history. Accessed September 15, 2001.
- Jestice, Phyllis, ed. Encyclopedia of Irish Spirituality. Santa Barbara, CA: ABC-CLIO, 2000.
- Tanner, M. Ireland's Holy Wars: The Struggle for a Nation's Soul, 1500–2000. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 2001.

Islam is now the second largest religion in the world. Despite centuries of Western ignorance of Islam and regular episodes of armed conflict against Islamic dynasties and nations, the religion of Muhammad is now the faith of one in six people on the planet. The story of Islam illustrates the staying power of the ideology that Muslims believe was restored by Muhammad in the seventh century. In spite of questions about what constitutes true Islam since the death of Muhammad, Islam has maintained a unity in essentials virtually unparalleled among world religions. This unity has created the environment for remarkable accomplishments in philosophy, art, and legal and social vision, as well as passionate religious commitment.

Some secular historians believe that Muhammad is the most significant person in human history. Though Christianity claims more adherents, Muhammad is viewed by these historians as having had a greater impact on history, given the breadth of Islamic political power, the depth and range of Islamic spirituality, and the pervasive way in which Islam brings its ideology to bear on every facet of life.

The Contours of a Prophet's Life. Scholars cannot be precise on the birth date of Muhammad. It is generally accepted that he was born about 570 C.E. Muhammad knew pain early in his life, since by age six or so he had lost both parents, first his mother just after he was born, and then later his father. He was raised by his grandfather for two years, and then his grandfather died. An uncle then took care of him until Muhammad reached his teen years.

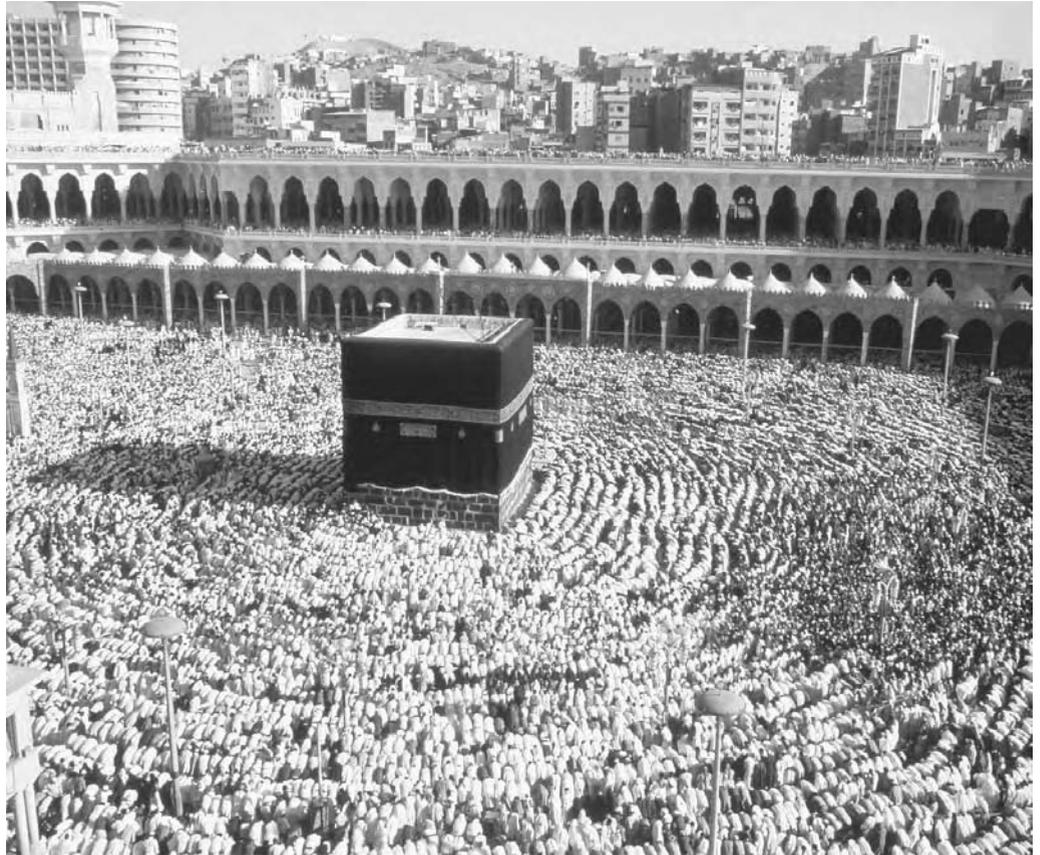

A woman merchant named Khadijah came into Muhammad's life, and they were married in 595, when Muhammad was about twenty-five. Though she was considerably older than he was, she bore him at least six children (the two boys died early), and by all indications they had a loving marriage. Muhammad did not have other wives until after Khadijah's death in 619.

Muhammad's life changed forever in the year 610, on the seventeenth night of the Arabic month Ramadan. Muhammad claimed that the angel Gabriel visited him on Mount Hira, near Mecca, in a powerful, terrifying, and transforming encounter. According to the earliest documents, Muhammad returned home, shaken by this encounter, and turned to his wife for confirmation of his prophetic call.

Three years later Muhammad began to preach to his Meccan neighbors. His message of one God met fierce resistance. The Arabs were polytheistic, and Mecca's main shrine, the Kaaba, said to have been built by Abraham, was home to many gods. Muhammad gained some converts immediately, one of the most famous being his friend Abu Bakr (d. 634). The earliest Muslims came mainly from the poor clans of Mecca, drawn to Muhammad's message of social reform.

Muslims believe that in 620, one year after the death of Muhammad's first wife, the angel Gabriel brought Muhammad by night to Jerusalem on the back of a heavenly horse named Buruq. In the holy city the prophet conversed with Jesus, Moses, and Abraham. Then, according to the Qur'an, Muhammad and his angel companion were taken by ladder (called a miraj) to the seventh heaven. Muslims believe that the Dome of the Rock in Jerusalem is built on the spot from which Muhammad ascended.

Two years later in 622, in year one of the Muslim calendar, Muhammad was forced to flee to Medina, about 250 miles north of Mecca. Then, for eight long and bitter years, the

Holy Kaaba Pilgrims as part of the Hajj in Makkah, Saudi Arabia (TRIP)

Prophet engaged in repeated military battles with his Meccan enemies. There were significant victories (most notably on March 15, 624, at Badr) and major setbacks, one being at Uhud just a year later.

By January 630, however, Muhammad triumphed; he took control of Mecca and destroyed the idols in the Kaaba. Medina continued to be his home base. He led military campaigns in northern Arabia, and returned to Mecca for a final pilgrimage in early 632. He was in poor health at the time, and he traveled back to Medina and died on June 8 of that year, in the embrace of Aisha, one of his wives.

Alfred North Whitehead is noted to have remarked that “philosophy is one long footnote to Plato.” Likewise, Islamic history is one long footnote to Muhammad. Thus, Muhammad’s journey—in all of its detail, from the mode of his prayer life, to his treatment of Jews and Christians, to what he did in battle—becomes the paradigm for all Muslims.

Historical Accuracy and Muhammad. As we will see in the next section, there is a wide range of opinion about Muhammad. Part of that difference arises out of varied estimates about how certain we can be historically about his life. There are two major sources for historical analysis: the Qur’an itself and, secondly, what is called the hadith, the non-Qur’anic traditions about Muhammad that were gathered by Muslims after his death.

The study of the hadith represents one of the most fascinating aspects of Islamic history and religious life. Muslim scholars had to try and sort through the hundreds of thousands of traditions about Muhammad in order to decide which reports were accurate. The most famous collection of what Muslims regard as authentic hadith was done by al-Bukhari (d. 870).

During his lifetime he examined over two hundred thousand separate traditions about Muhammad, discarded those he felt were bogus, and then published seven thousand that he believed were genuine. Almost all Muslims accept his verdict, though they also augment al-Bukhari's work with the collection gathered by al-Hajjah, who was his contemporary. There are lesser sources of hadith that are given some credence, and Shi'ite Muslims have their own separate collection of traditions about Muhammad.

Western scholars have been divided over the value of the hadith in terms of what can be known about Muhammad. The traditions obviously tell us what Muslims and others were saying about the prophet, and that has an interest for its own sake. Though a few have expressed total skepticism about their integrity, most non-Muslim scholars suggest that they have some value in getting us to the real Muhammad.

F. E. Peters writes, in his Muhammad and the Origins of Islam, that "it is inconceivable that the community should have entirely forgotten what Muhammad did or said at Mecca and Medina." This is a decent point, which can also be made about the earliest biographies of Muhammad, the most famous being Life of the Apostle of God, written by the Muslim scholar Ibn Ishaq in the eighth century.

Various Views of Muhammad. Three distinct views cover the range of interpretation about the prophet. Of first significance is the orthodox Muslim understanding of Muhammad. The adulation of Muhammad by Muslims parallels the Christian adoration of Jesus, the Hindu love for Krishna, the Sikh reverence for Guru Nanak, and the Buddhist focus on Gautama Buddha, though Islam refrains from any hint that Muhammad was divine.

Consider these words from a Muslim writer of the Middle Ages. "When cutting your nails you must begin with the little toe of the right foot and finish with the little toe of the left foot." This advice is from al-Ghazali, one of Islam's greatest thinkers, who based his suggestion on a tradition about the way the prophet cut his nails.

Relics of Muhammad are preserved all over the Muslim world. Maxime Rodinson, one of the great biographers of Muhammad, mentions that two hairs from Muhammad's head were found in Constantinople and "were kept there in forty bags sewn one inside the other, and were solemnly shown to worshipers once a year." One of the hadith states: "Allah's Apostle was the most handsome, most generous, and the bravest of all the people."

Out of this immense adulation of Muhammad comes an equal anger against any who are said to ridicule the Prophet. For example, Ahmed Deedat, one of the most popular defenders of Islam, circulated a pamphlet against the novelist called How Rushdie Fooled the West. His conclusion about Rushdie speaks for itself: "Mired in misery, may all his filthy lucre choke in his throat, and may he die a coward's death, a hundred times a day, and eventually when death catches up with him, many he simmer in hell for all eternity!"

A second assessment of Muhammad is one step removed from Islamic orthodoxy, though a major step. We move to those who argue for a high estimate of Muhammad, even though they do not accept, for various reasons, that he is the prophet of God, or that Islam is the one true religion. Among Christian scholars, this new approach has been adopted by W. Montgomery Watt, Kenneth Cragg, Wilfred Cantwell Smith, and Hans Küng, among the most influential theologians alive today.

Küng, a Roman Catholic, took up the question of Muhammad's status in his book Christianity and the World Religions. He presents seven parallels between Muhammad and the prophets of Israel, outlines the immense contribution of Muhammad, and concludes by citing a document from the Second Vatican Council (1962–1965), that states that the Catholic Church "also looks upon the Muslims with great respect: They worship the one true God who has spoken to man.” Küng, who does not believe that Muhammad was sinless or that Islam is the one true religion, then offers this assessment: “In my opinion, that Church—and all the Christian Churches—must also ‘look with great respect’ upon the man whose name is omitted from the declaration out of embarrassment, although he alone led the Muslims to the worship of the one God, who spoke through him: Muhammad the Prophet.”

Other scholars, such as Karen Armstrong, John Hick, Paul Knitter, and Wendy Doniger, argue for openness to all of the great world religions (and their leaders) who point humans to the transcendent. Armstrong, a former Catholic nun, has defended this view in her highly praised Muhammad: A Biography of the Prophet.

According to a third view, Muhammad is the embodiment of evil. This tradition of contempt began in the early Middle Ages, as Christian and Muslim armies fought for land control from North Africa, across the Middle East, and into Europe. The wars were viewed by many Christians, popes included, as the necessary struggle against the Antichrist himself—Muhammad. Dante’s Inferno puts the Islamic leader in the lower realms of hell. Similar diatribes against Muhammad continued after Dante through the Reformation of the sixteenth century, culminating in Martin Luther’s invective, quoted by Phipps: “Should you be called a prophet, who were such an uncouth blockhead and ass? When the spirit of lies had taken possession of Muhammad, and the devil had murdered men’s souls with his Qur’an and had destroyed the faith of Christians, he had to go on and take the sword and set about to murder their bodies.”

Secular writers have dismissed Muhammad with less vilification, but their views follow the same pattern: Muhammad is seen as ignorant, barbaric, and immoral. He was either a hypocrite or delusional, perhaps the victim of epileptic seizures, whose success with converts has more to do with promises of sexual reward, material gain, and the proverbial Islamic sword than with any truth in his teaching.

In the aftermath of the bombing of the Pentagon in Washington, D.C., and the World Trade Center in New York City on September 11, 2001, some editorials in the secular press hinted at Muhammad’s dark side, with subtle accusations that the terror that had been visited on New York and Washington had its roots in the life and teaching of the Muslim prophet. They cite Muhammad’s all-or-nothing mentality, his expansionist vision, his dictatorship, and, of course, his love for jihad (literally “struggle,” but often taken to mean “holy war”).

The Origin of the Qur’an. Some Muslims believe that the origin of the Qur’an lies in the eternal mind of Allah. Others argue that it is not eternal but a created revelation, since only Allah is eternal. The vast majority of Muslims believe that the angel Gabriel dictated the revelations to Muhammad. He then recited the words to his wife and then to the small group that became his first followers. The earliest members not only memorized the unfolding contents but also started to write them down. After Muhammad died, a number of Muslim scholars formed the final edition of the Qur’an in the time of Uthman (d. 656), the third ruler (caliph) after Muhammad.

Most Muslims pay no attention to skeptical attacks on the Qur’an and reject theories about its alleged human origins. Islam has usually taught that Muhammad was illiterate, a point used to argue for the divine origin of the Qur’an. Western scholars have debated to what extent the Qur’an can be viewed as a trustworthy source about Muhammad and early Islam. Recent skepticism has followed on the pioneering work of John Wansbrough, which has impacted the work of Patricia Crone and Michael Cook.

The Qur’an contains 114 surahs, or chapters, and over six thousand verses. The surahs are arranged by size, with the shorter chapters near the end. It is generally believed that the later chapters were written first and belong to the time period when the prophet was in Medina. The longer chapters were written last and were revealed after the prophet conquered Mecca.

The titles of the various chapters are based on some word or idea that appears in the chapter, though the titles do not usually suggest the main theme of the chapter, if there is one. Some Muslim scholars have tried to show that there are hidden scientific truths and mathematical wonders in the Qur'an. For example, one writer argues that the divine inspiration of the Qur'an is proved by the fact that the Arabic word for "Most Merciful" is used 114 times, which matches exactly the number of surahs of the Qur'an.

The Eight Major Themes of the Qur'an. Anyone who reads the Qur'an for the first time finds it confusing. It does not seem orderly, as most Muslims will acknowledge. The text does not set forth a narrative, and it is not written in a systematic fashion. The surahs are not arranged by content, and there is no single theme in most chapters. The best way to understand the Qur'an is to first grasp its major themes.

Allah. The Qur'an is absolutely dominated by reference to God. Verse after verse, page after page, beginning to end, Allah is everything to the Qur'an. The term Allah appears over 2,500 times. Anyone who says that the Qur'an is mainly about something else has never read the Qur'an. It is a book saturated with references to God.

Muhammad. The Prophet himself is at the center of the Qur'an, though often as a figure behind every chapter. His name is mentioned only four times, but he is the subject of many passages. Muslims do not believe that Muhammad is writing about himself, however. Islam teaches that Gabriel dictated to Muhammad material that was to be put in the Qur'an about Muhammad. Further, when the Qur'an quotes words from Muhammad, Muslims believe that these are words that Allah tells Muhammad to say.

Muhammad has, according to the Qur'an, an elevated status because Allah has called him as a prophet. In fact, he is "the Seal of the Prophets," a phrase from the famous passage in Surah 33 that is used by Muslims to argue that Muhammad is the final Prophet. In addition, Muhammad is a judge to his followers (4:65), and is to be respected by them (2:104; 4:46).

Allah himself is a witness to Muhammad's mission (13:43; 46:8). Further, the Qur'an teaches that Muhammad's prophetic work was predicted by both Moses (46:10) and by Jesus, of whom the Qur'an says: "And remember, Jesus, the son of Mary, said: 'O Children of Israel! I am the apostle of God [sent] to you, confirming the Law [which came] before me, and giving Glad Tidings of an Apostle to come after me, whose name shall be Ahmad.'" Ahmad is a shortened form of Muhammad.

Muhammad is the universal messenger from God (34:28), the symbol of Allah's mercy to the world (9:61; 28:46–47; 76:24–26), and inspired by Allah. Surah 53:10–12 says: "So did [God] convey the inspiration to His Servant—[conveyed] what He [meant] to convey. The [Prophet's] [mind and] heart in no way falsified that which he saw. Will ye then dispute with him concerning what he saw?"

The Qur'an describes Muhammad as gentle (3:159), very concerned about his followers (9:128), and in deep distress for unbelievers (12:97; 25:30). It describes him as a man of prayer (74:3), with an "exalted standard of character" (68:4). He was often mocked by his enemies in Mecca, and he was accused of being mad (7:184) and under the power of demons (81:22).

Muhammad is told to adore Allah (96:19), faithfully stick to the message that he is given from God (46:9), follow Allah's duty for him (30:30), and work hard (66:9). In Surah 33 Muhammad is told by Allah that he can take women as wives as long as he pays their dowry or if they are "prisoners of war." He can also marry his cousins, and any woman he wants "who dedicates her soul to the prophet."

Muhammad's followers are told to visit the Prophet's home only when they have permission, to arrive right at meal time (not before), leave quickly after the meal, and avoid "familiar talk” with the Prophet. It is said that “such [behavior] annoys the Prophet: he is ashamed to dismiss you, but God is not ashamed [to tell you] the truth.”

Qur’an. The Qur’an also takes up itself as a subject. Satan, we are told, is not the author. Muhammad could not be the author either, since, the Qur’an argues, he was completely illiterate. Only Allah could have produced such a book. The Qur’an says of itself that it is clear, understandable, written in pure Arabic, free from error, and that it contains the universal message, one that will guide its hearers into health and into eternal salvation.

Biblical Material. The Qur’an gives considerable attention to various figures from the Hebrew Bible and the Christian New Testament. Muslims believe that Islam started with creation and that Allah revealed himself to Jews and Christians, though both groups altered their Scriptures. Muslims use this to explain why both Jewish and Christian accounts of people and events often differ radically from the way they are reported in the Qur’an.

Of biblical figures, Moses gets the most mention, with over 500 verses, or almost 10 percent of the text, dealing with him. The Qur’an also gives information about Noah, Abraham, Moses, Joshua, David, Jesus, Mary, and others. Muslims find it easy to draw comparisons between Muhammad and Moses the lawgiver and also between Muhammad and King David, the warrior for God.

Jesus. The Qur’an treats Jesus with great respect, as a prophet and teacher, and as a Sign from God. It also states that Jesus was born of the Virgin Mary, performed miracles, and that his followers were called Muslims. At the same time, the Qur’an states that it is a serious error to think that Jesus is the Son of God or that God is a trinity of three Persons, as in Christian tradition. For the Qur’an, Jesus is an apostle, a messenger of God, but no more than that.

As said earlier, Muslims do not believe that Jesus died on the Cross. In Surah 4:157, one of the famous verses of the Qur’an, it speaks about enemies of Allah who insulted the Virgin Mary and who brag: “We killed Christ Jesus the son of Mary, the Apostle of God.” The text then reads: “but they killed him not, nor crucified him, but so it was made to appear to them, and those who differ therein are full of doubts, with no [certain] knowledge, but only conjecture to follow, for of a surety they killed him not.”

True Believers. Hundreds of verses in the Qur’an are devoted to a portrait of the true believer. The vast majority of passages deal with behavior, both with the path that is right, and the path that is wrong. This is in keeping with the common assertion that Islam is a religion about the right path, much more than it is a religion about right ideas.

Even though Islam is a religion of law, however, the Qur’an is focused more on the larger principles behind the law. These have to do, first of all, with positive things that are expected of all Muslims. The Muslim is a follower of Allah and fears him, and has turned from all false gods. The believer patterns his life after the model of the Prophet Muhammad.

The Muslim is a person of prayer and contemplation. He or she is peaceful, faithful, humble, and forgiving. True believers strive to do good works and protect one another. Muslims are to be charitable, according to the Qur’an, and are to be united in their faith. The disciple of Allah engages in fasting and follows Allah’s will on proper marriages and proper inheritance laws. Believers are to remember the rewards of heaven and the pains of hell.

The true believer is also identified by resistance to evil and sin. The Qur’an teaches that Muslims are to avoid gambling and drinking. Usury is a sin. Certain foods are forbidden, as in Orthodox Judaism. Muslim males cannot have more than four wives. Allah’s followers should avoid contact with skeptics and should avoid being too inquisitive about their faith. Sexual lust is wrong, and therefore female believers are to dress modestly.

The Qur’an teaches that excess in eating is sinful and also warns about the dangers of excess in religion. Muhammad said at one time that there was going to be no monkery in Islam, referring to a celibate priesthood. This idea of excess also involves avoiding certain ideas. Thus, Surah 4:171 states: “O People of the Book! Commit no excesses in your religion: Nor say of God aught but the truth. Christ Jesus the son of Mary was [no more than] an apostle of God. Say not ‘Trinity’: desist: it will be better for you: for God is one God: Glory be to Him: [far exalted is He] above having a son.”

Unbelievers. The whole human setting of the Qur’an involves the storm created by Muhammad’s prophetic call to decision. His message gives two options: belief or unbelief. Those who reject Allah’s message are deaf, blind, and full of disease. They are arrogant, foolish, hate the truth, live in delusion, and their prayers are in vain. The unbeliever is a liar, a coward, vain, and a deceiver. Muslims should avoid unbelievers, given their perversity. They will be sent into the depths of hell unless they repent.

Heaven, Hell, and Judgment Day. The Qur’an gives enormous weight to life after death. There are hundreds of verses about paradise, the pains of hell, and the reality of a Final Judgment by God. Though Muslim scholars debate to what extent certain verses about heaven and hell are to be taken literally, the overall message is clear. Heaven is pictured as a garden paradise, with mansions, fountains, food and drink, and sexual pleasure, where believers are full of happiness, peace, and joy in the presence of God.

The Qur’an draws hell as a place of blazing, eternal fire. The unbelievers will taste the boiling fluids of hell, with their faces covered in flame. They will wear garments of fire, will live in eternal regret at the folly of their rebellion against Allah, and will beg for destruction. The Day of Judgment is an absolute certainty, according to the Qur’an, though the righteous have no reason to fear. Justice will be done and human deeds will be weighed in the balance, when the Last Trumpet sounds.

The Five Pillars of Islam. The focus of Islam, submission to God, finds expression in five practices, popularly known as the five pillars. These are the first obligations owed by humans to God, and they permeate the life of the Muslim. The first is the Profession of Faith. To become a Muslim one must make a confession known as the shahadah: “There is no God but Allah, and Muhammad is His messenger.” These words seek to establish the supremacy of Allah as the one true God and the finality of Muhammad as Allah’s ultimate prophet. They also reflect Islamic differences with the Christian doctrine of the Trinity.

Second, faithful Muslims obey the call to prayer (salat), which is to happen five specific times every day. Muhammad first advised his followers to pray facing toward Jerusalem, but later chose Mecca. Kenneth Cragg, one of the great Christian scholars of Islam, writes: “Islam and prayer are in truth inseparable.” In most mosques men and women pray in separate areas for reasons of modesty and purity.

Third, Muslims are supposed to give a percentage of their worth to the poor and needy. The tithe, or zakat, is collected by a few Muslim states, but most Muslims give through leaving money in the metal zakat box in their local mosque. The money is used to help the poor and for emergency situations. The zakat involves giving 2.5 percent of the Muslim’s assets, but it is not charity since it is an obligatory act, one that is usually to be done in private.

Fourth, unless prevented by bad health, all Muslims are to abstain from all food, water, and sexual activity from sunrise to sunset during the entire month of Ramadan. The fast offers a time for spiritual reflection, repentance, and giving to the poor. The whole Qur’an is often recited in evening worship over the thirty-day period. Ramadan ends with a three-day feast.

Finally, the last pillar, known as the hajj, is the duty of all able-bodied Muslims to make a pilgrimage to Mecca at least once in their lifetime. Every year over one million Muslim pilgrims make their way to Mecca. Only Muslims can enter this holiest of Muslim cities, and many report this pilgrimage as the most significant religious experience of their lives.

Outside the city both males and females don simple white garments, and enter Mecca while reciting “Here I am at your service, O God, here I am!” They circle seven times around the Kaaba, the temple Muslims believe was built by Abraham and Ishmael. The pilgrims engage in a ritual of running between two mountains outside of Mecca, in memory of the plight of Hagar looking for food and water. Muslims also throw stones at a pillar that symbolizes Satan, and sacrifice animals in memory of the story of Abraham and Isaac.

Jihad and Islam. The idea of jihad has emerged in the contemporary world as one of the most critical and controversial of Islamic beliefs, especially as it encounters the other world religions. That controversial nature was emphasized by the events of September 11. Although the majority of Muslims assert that the word simply means spiritual struggle, the more militant Islamist minority centers its understanding on a more sinister meaning: Holy War.

In February 1998, three and a half years before September 11, Osama bin Laden, the founder and leader of AL QAEDA, made his own views clear. Along with other groups representative of twentieth-century ISLAMISM from Egypt, Pakistan, and Bangladesh, he issued a fatwa, or legal ruling, that called on Muslims “to kill the Americans and their allies—civilian and military.” He added that this struggle is an individual duty for every Muslim who can do it in any country in which it is possible to do it.

In contrast, the vast majority of Muslim countries have opposed Osama bin Laden since September 11. For example, the governments of Bahrain, Egypt, Iran, Lebanon, Oman, Pakistan, Palestine, Qatar, Saudi Arabia, Turkey, United Arab Emirates, and Yemen expressed their condemnation of the terrorist attacks almost immediately.

In like measure, American Muslim groups also condemned the terrorist attack, offering their agreement in substance with the statement of one prominent national organization: “The Islamic Supreme Council of America (ISCA) categorically condemns yesterday’s airline hijackings and attacks against the World Trade Center, the Pentagon, and all other targets. From coast to coast, we join our neighbors, coworkers and friends across ethnic, cultural and religious lines in mourning the devastating loss of precious life, which Islam holds as sacred. We pray for the thousands of innocent victims, for their families, for law enforcement and emergency workers, for stranded travelers, and for all whose confidence and security have been shaken. We pray that God’s Infinite Mercy reaches us all.”

The tragedies of September 11 have brought to the surface a long and intense disagreement within the Muslim community over the meaning of jihad and the nature of true Islam. The roots of these contemporary conflicts about Islam’s real identity lie in ancient debates about the teaching of the Qur’an, the example of the Prophet, the legitimacy of non-Muslim governments, and the place of war in Islamic ideology.

The current debates between Muslims about jihad usually hinge on differing assessments of the following crucial observations:

The Qur’an usually uses the term jihad to describe spiritual struggle.

At the same time, the Qur’an sometimes uses jihad to mean “holy war,” or just war.

The Prophet engaged in warfare.

The Prophet taught that Islam must be spread to the whole world.

Islamic law justifies self-defense and certain acts of war.

Muslims conquered non-Arab lands and peoples through war.

Muslims divide the world into two: Islam and non-Islam.

Many Muslims believe that all countries should follow Islamic law.
Some Muslim countries are nondemocratic and crush dissent.

Out of the vortex of these realities have emerged two basically different perspectives among modern Muslims. The vast majority of Muslims believe that none of the above points justify terrorism. More militant Muslims argue that terrorist acts are true acts of jihad, justified, for example, by the presence of American soldiers on Saudi soil and American support for Israel.

There are some seventy major terrorist groups operating in the world as the twenty-first century begins. Of these, more than thirty have an Islamic orientation. Of the rest, a few are well known—the Irish Republican Army or AUM SHINRIKYO (the group that spread poison gas in the Tokyo subway system). Among the Islamic groups, the most well known are the Abu Nidal Organization (also known as Black September), the Islamic Group, or IG (Al-Gama'a al-Islamiyya), the Armed Islamic Group (GIA), Hamas, Hizballah (Party of God, also known as Islamic Jihad), and al Qaeda. Though relatively small in membership, these groups have some popular support throughout the Muslim world, and their actions are widely debated. Various governments have moved against groups accused of engaging in terrorism such as the MUSLIM BROTHERHOOD (Egypt). Other militant groups, such as the JAMAAT-E-ISLAM in Pakistan, have emphasized education and political action in order to attain their ends.

The Branches of Islam. Like all religions, Islam has not maintained its original unity. Within a generation of the Prophet's death, Muslims were at war with each other over political leadership and the proper interpretation of Islamic spirituality. Muslims can be grouped under three major branches: (a) Sunni Islam, (b) SHI'A ISLAM, also known as Shi'ite, and (c) SUFISM.

Sunni Islam represents the largest grouping in Islam. Of the world's 1.2 billion Muslims, over one billion are Sunni, which is about 90 percent of all Muslims. Sunni Muslims trace themselves back to the Prophet but separate from Shi'a Muslims over the question of proper authority in Islam (which is linked to the issue of connection to Muhammad), the shape of Islamic law, and the nature of salvation. Sunni Muslims have themselves disagreed over the methodology of interpreting Muslim law and have divided into four main schools of jurisprudence: HANAFITE, SHAFIITE, HANBALITE, and MALIKITE.

There are 170 million Shi'a (or Shi'ite) Muslims globally. Though they represent a minority among the three main Islamic groups, the Shi'a version of Islam became the most well known in the West after the Islamic revolution in Iran in 1979. The shah of Iran was deposed, and the Ayatollah Khomeini (1902–1989), the well-known Shi'ite Muslim leader, returned from exile in France to run the country.

In Sunni Islam the imam is the person who leads prayer in the mosque. The same word in Shi'ite Islam refers to both leaders like the Ayatollah and, most important, members of the succession of singular figures said to be chosen by Allah to guide Islam in its earliest and most important years. One Shi'a group, ISMAILI ISLAM, believes there were seven imams in this last sense, while another extends the number to twelve. In both groups the last imam is believed to be alive, but placed in a state of supernatural hiddenness by Allah. Each Shi'ite group believes that Allah will bring its imam back to save the world.

Shi'a Muslims give enormous significance to the martyrdom of Husein, whose father, Ali (d. 661), was the son-in-law of the Prophet. Husein and fellow Muslims were slaughtered by Sunni Muslims at Kerbala (in modern-day Iraq) on the tenth day of the Muslim month of Muharran in 680. Every year at this time Shi'a Muslims engage in elaborate rituals to honor Husein's memory, and Shi'a pilgrims travel to his shrine in Kerbala.

The Sufis represent the mystical side of Islam. Today, they number over 240 million throughout the world. Sufism emerged when Islam became decadent, materialistic, and lazy in the twilight years of the earliest Muslim dynasties. Al-Ghazali (1058–1111), the great Islamic devotional writer, turned to Sufism as an alternative to the speculative, uncertain paths of philosophy and reason. The Sufi path is best known through the Whirling Dervishes, darvishes (literally, beggars; those who belong to Sufi orders) who practice a kind of dance used to help the dancer resist outside stimuli and focus on the mind of Allah.

From the start these three Islamic orthodoxies have been influenced by local folk customs. Thus, scholars often speak of a folk Islam. Many Muslims in Pakistan or Nigeria use charms to ward off evil. In Afghanistan and India, Muslims hang strands of hair at shrines to protect their children. In the Sudan the local Muslim leader might also be a medicine man who uses local tribal customs to keep Satan away. Muslims in many Islamic countries use magical objects to keep from being hurt by the evil eye.

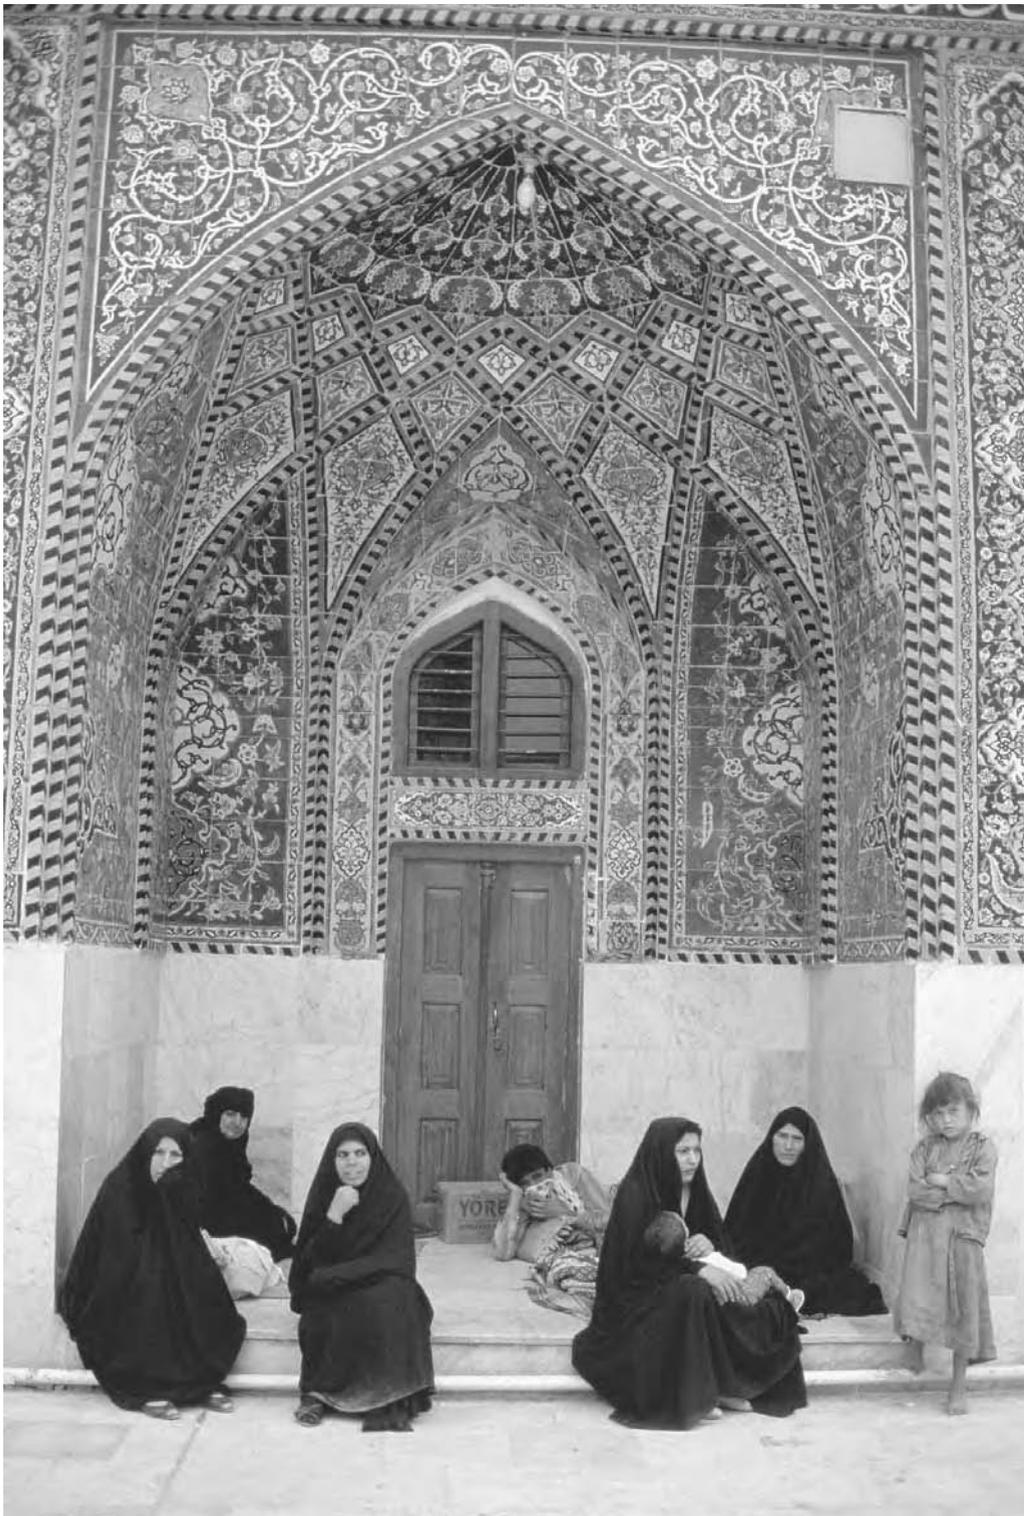

The Progress of the Faith. The dominant motifs of the Prophet Muhammad's life become the pattern, in one form or another, in Islamic history from the seventh century to the present. His own defense of Islamic truth is duplicated through the centuries by given leaders and movements. His willingness to bear arms under particular circumstances becomes the standard for declarations of jihad. His concern for a united community of the faithful is replicated worldwide from his death to the present, as Muslims of all types unite in the annual hajj to Mecca.

Muhammad's expansionist vision gripped Islam in the earliest years following the death of the Prophet, and expansionism is probably the most striking thing about the first century of Islamic life. Muslims conquered Damascus (636), then moved on to rule Jerusalem (638) and control all of Syria by 640. Egypt came under Islamic control by 646, and the Sassanian dynasty in Persia fell by 651. Muslims were moving into Spain in the early eighth century, and King Roderick of Spain was defeated in 711. Though Charles Martel stopped the Muslim advance in southern France in 732, the extent of the Islamic empire by the end of the first century following Muhammad's death is startling.

The incredibly rapid spread of Islam is especially noteworthy, given the hostilities that dogged Islam from its inception. It is as if the hostilities in Muhammad's own life, and his battles with fellow Arabs, became a deep psychic reality in the Islamic mindset, setting brother against brother. Thus, Uthman, the third caliph, was assassinated in 656. The Kharijites formed in 657 out of direct opposition to Ali, the fourth caliph in the Sunni tradition, because of his perceived weaknesses in responding to the emerging Umayyad dynasty.

These tensions between those faithful to Ali (the Shi'ites) and the early Umayyad leaders culminated in the killing of Husein, Ali's son, in 680 C.E., an event that radically impacted the Shi'as, who trace their roots to Ali as the proper successor to Muhammad. The war between Iran and Iraq in the twentieth century played out against the backdrop of these earliest days of hostility between Sunni and Shi'ite Muslims.

Divisions within Islam are reflected to some degree in the changing Islamic dynasties. Albert Hourani documents over thirty dynasties in A History of the Arab Peoples. Some of these emerge as a result of victory over Christian, Hindu, or Buddhist opposition, but many are simply a reflection of one Muslim dynasty expanding its control base by conquering other Islamic rulers and peoples. Often a dynasty crumbled from within as a once trusted servant from outside the tribe or nation started his own kingdom.

Women in mosque doorway. (Françoise de Mulder/CORBIS)

Such realities explain why many dynasties, like the Aglabids in eastern Algeria (800–909) or the Buyids in Iran/Iraq (932–1062) or the Almohads in the Maghreb (1130–1269), do not survive. Survival despite internal tensions within dynasties and external conflict between various Muslim groups is also a tribute to the political acumen displayed in those dynasties that spanned over half a millennium. The Abbasids ruled the Middle East and North Africa from 749 through 1258. The Ottomans dominated the Muslim world from 1281 through to 1922, a staying power rarely found in the history of civilizations.

The story of unrest in Islamic history is to a great degree the story of political and military rivalries, sometimes rooted in nationalist, ethnic, and tribal realities, as in the conflicts between Arab and non-Arab Muslims. However, divisions are also a reflection of competing visions of what constitutes true Islam. This is most evident, of course, in ongoing tensions between Sunni and Shi'ite Islam, but was also reflected in the treatment of those deemed to be unfaithful to basic Islamic doctrine, practice, and the dictates of Muslim law.

There also arose those who denied that Muhammad ever taught that he was the final prophet, and they duplicated his call to a new revelation from Allah. Thus, in the mid-eighth century Hashim ibn Hakim declared himself to be a prophet and a god. The view that the Qur'an is eternal was resisted strongly by the Mutazalite movement of the early decades of the ninth century. Sufi Muslims have been the frequent targets of the wrath of orthodoxy. Al-Hallaj, a Sufi master, was tortured and beheaded in 922.

Internal tensions between Muslims pale, of course, in contrast to the animosities fueled in the early years of Muslim-Christian conflict. Toledo was recaptured by Christians in 1085, good news for Catholic and Orthodox leaders, who were stunned by the Seljuk defeat of the Byzantines at Manikert in 1071. Pope Urban II (r. 1088–1099) called for a crusade against the Turks in 1095, and Jerusalem was in Christian hands by the end of the century.

Muslim misfortunes were reversed under Saladin (Salah-ad-Din Yusuf ibn-Ayyub, 1138–1193) who served as a minister to the Islamic Fatimid rulers in Egypt. Saladin then took control of Egypt in 1171 and went on to retake Jerusalem from the Christians in 1187, just five years before his death in 1193. In the next century the anti-Islamic focus of the Christian crusades gave way to hostilities between Catholic and Orthodox Christians. Their doctrinal split of 1054 was sealed in blood when Catholic armies on the Fourth Crusade sacked Orthodox Constantinople in 1204, in a three-day spree of murder, rape, and theft.

The thirteenth century witnessed an increase in Muslim expansion, with the conversion of Mongol tribes to Islam, and the rise of the Ottoman Empire in 1281. Muhammad ibn Tughlug (r. 1321–1351) pushed into northern India. The fourteenth century witnessed radical shifts in power between competing Islamic dynasties and armies (Ottoman, Mongol, Hafsid, Mamluk, Ilkhanid, Timurid). Despite the shifting political and military scene, Muslims were free to travel through the whole Islamic world. Ibn Battutah (1304–1368), one famous explorer, traveled for almost thirty years in the middle decades of the fourteenth century.

The Ottoman empire expanded into the fifteenth century, and despite local upsets at the hands of other Muslim forces, Mehmed II conquered Constantinople in 1453. About the same time, Egyptian scholar Muhammad Ibn Sabiq al-Din al-Suyuti (1445–1505) was winning many North Africans to Islam through his writings. In the early sixteenth century, Ottoman Turks ruled Egypt, Syria, and the holy cities of Mecca and Medina.

Other Muslim groups were taking control in India. The Mughal leader Babur (Zahir-ud-Din Muhammad, 1483–1530) was victorious at a battle in Panipat in 1526. The first Muslim state had been formed in Southeast Asia two years earlier. Suleiman I (1494–1566), the great Ottoman leader, ruled as far north as Vienna, as far west as Morocco, east to Iraq, and south to Yemen. Akbar (1542–1605) controlled a large part of northern India from 1556 through 1605. Songhai was invaded by Sa'id Muslims in 1591.

Java came under Islamic influence in the early 1600s. Shah Jahan (d. 1666) started construction of the Taj Mahal in Agra in 1632, and Morocco came under ALAWI control in 1668. However, Islamic expansionism received a severe blow with the draining of Ottoman powers in wars with Poland from 1682 through 1699. Further, in a dramatic turn in Muslim history, the Ottomans failed to take Vienna in 1683. The Muslim threat to Christian Europe declined. Within a century Islamic leaders were preoccupied with their declining power, particularly in the light of the superior military might demonstrated by a revived Europe, and the emergence of secular ideologies that threatened the soul of Islam.

However, it is inconceivable that Islam could have been destroyed either by bullets or by competing beliefs. By the time Napoleon conquered Egypt in 1798, Islam had survived for almost twelve hundred years. The famous French leader captured Muslim lands, but was unable to win their hearts or minds, regardless of Muslim respect for his military prowess.

Islamic orthodoxy has continued to deal harshly with innovative movements in the modern era. DRUZE Muslims, based largely in Lebanon, originated in Egypt in the eleventh century, but have experienced persecution from other Muslims through the twentieth century. Likewise, the AHMADIYYA MOVEMENT IN ISLAM has faced constant harassment for their distinctive views. Orthodox Muslims have defined them as heretical for their belief that their founder, Mirza Ghulam Ahmad Qadiyani (1835–1908), is the promised messiah of Islam. The NATION OF ISLAM has faced a cold reception in America for its assertion of unorthodox beliefs, and the BAHÁ'Í FAITH, a new religion born in Iran, has seen many of its members martyred since its inception in the last century.

However, these sects of Islam have not been the main threat. Rather, modern Islam has been impacted most by the powerful new ideologies that have swept the West since the Enlightenment. Skepticism and rationalism have eroded confidence in traditional Islam, though they have had far more impact on classical Christianity. Most significant, the drawing power of secularism, capitalism in colonial garb and later in its globalist flavor, and the seductive allure of democracy have created a trinity of forces that have been the object of Islamic response for the last two hundred years. Twentieth-century Muslim thinkers began to articulate a reconstructed Islam that attempted to respond to the new global ideologies.

Long before colonialism reached its apex of power over Muslim countries in the nineteenth century, key Muslim thinkers were developing a revivalist impulse that called Muslims to forge their identity in radical commitment to the basics of Islam. The success of these Islamic movements in the twentieth century is based on the work of purists in the previous two centuries who were alarmed by the decline of Muslim power and stability, a reality that signaled to them that the ideals of the Prophet had been betrayed by his professed followers and leaders.

The revivalist impulse in Saudi Arabia goes back to the writings of Muhammad al-Wahhab (1703–1792). He was the ideological founder of the WAHHABI movement, which eventually gained control in the heartland of Islam. He also influenced Islamic reformers in the next century, most notably Jamaluddin al-Afghani (1838–1897) and his student Muhammad 'Abduh (1849–1905).

In the twentieth century anticolonial, pro-Arabic, and pro-Islamic movements dominated the Muslim story. There was not simply a resistance to the West of the kind expressed in Ali Shariati's influential work Westoxication (1962), but also a strong revolt against Arab governments viewed as un-Islamic and corrupt. Iran became the scene of Shi'ite radicalism that became visible to all in the revolution that toppled the shah in 1979, leading to the present theocratic state.

The Muslim Brotherhood, founded by the youthful Hasan al-Banna (1906–1949), was formed in 1928. Iraq gained independence in 1932. Sayyid Abul A'la Mawdudi (1903–1979) championed Muslim ideals in both India and Pakistan through his Jamaat-e-Islam movement. Hassan al-Banna was assassinated in 1949 for his push for radical reform in Egypt. Sayyid Qutb (1906–1966), unimpressed by his student days in America, took up al-Banna's cause and became the new voice against secular trends in Egypt and throughout the Muslim world. He was executed by the Egyptian government in 1966.

Afghanistan gained freedom from Soviet oppression in 1989, after a decade of war. Islamic radicalism gained a foothold in Indonesia (the most populous Muslim country) late in the twentieth century, and similar forces arose in Nigeria, Sudan, Algeria, and Pakistan. Less volatile expressions of Islamic ascendancy are seen with the formation of the League of Arab States in 1945 and the Muslim World League in 1962. Even the Million Man March (October 6, 1995), promoted by Nation of Islam leader Louis Farrakhan, was seen by many as an expression of Islam's growing potency.

The Palestinian question has fueled the growth of Islamic militancy as much as any factor. Tensions in Palestine between Muslims and Jews date back to the first wave of Jewish immigrants in the late 1800s. The British government's 1917 Balfour Declaration heightened Arab unrest, as did the United Nations' support for a Jewish state thirty years later, both providing the context for the declaration of the State of Israel in May 1948.

Five wars between Arabs and Jews since Israel's formation have further heightened modern Muslim-Jewish hostilities. These tensions increased with the rise of the first intifadah (uprising) in 1987, and, in 2000, a second intifadah followed the breakdown of talks at Camp David between Yasser Arafat and Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Barak. Islamic militant groups like Hamas and Hizbullah have called for an armed jihad against Israel.

American exposure to radical Islamism came with the arrest of Americans in Tehran in 1979, the bombing of the World Trade Center in 1993, the explosions at American embassies in Africa, the attack on the USS Cole in Yemen, and then the horrors of September 11. These events are an indication of the depth of Islamic mistrust and hatred of the West, but they also have illustrated the deep ideological divisions among Muslims over what constitutes ideal Islam and its proper defense.

The revivalist trends of the last two centuries, expressed in moderate and extreme Islamist movements, have created a dilemma for the Islamic world. On the one hand, the success of Islamism has led to a new pride about the faith proclaimed by Muhammad. They have created a new platform for protest of what they see as postcolonial economic imperialism directed toward the Muslim world by the Western powers. Nevertheless, the purist impulse has created renewed conflict among Muslims, expressed in the policies within many Muslim countries against Islamist groups, and their support for the American effort against the TALIBAN, the former ruling power in Afghanistan. Even more important, the Islamist influence in the Islamic world has created fresh disputes about the role of women, the resistance to Western understandings of human rights, and the place of Islamic law.

As the new century begins, the Islamic world, the land in which Islam is the majority faith, stretches from Indonesia, across southern Asia to the Middle East, and across northern Africa to Morocco and Senegal. Through the immigration of millions of Muslims around the world in the twentieth century, the faith has accomplished one of its founder's ideals, of making Islam a global faith, though in most countries it has attracted only a small minority of the population.

James A. Beverley

Sources:

- Bard, Mitchell, ed. Myths and Facts: A Guide to the Arab-Israeli Conflict. Chevy Chase, MD: AICE, 2001.
- Berger, Peter L. Holy War, Inc. Glencoe, IL: Free Press, 2001.
- Cook, Michael. Muhammad. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1983.
- Cragg, Kenneth. The Call of the Minaret. Maryknoll, NY: Orbis, 1985.
- Esposito, John L. Islam and Politics. Syracuse, NY: Syracuse University Press, 1998.
- . Islam: The Straight Path. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1998.
- Fregosi, Paul. Jihad in the West. Buffalo, NY: Prometheus, 1998.
- Friedman, Thomas. From Beirut to Jerusalem. New York: Farrar Straus and Giroux, 1989.
- Ghourani, Albert. A History of the Arab Peoples. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1991.
- Godlas, Alan. "Islamic Studies, Islam, Arabic, and Religion." Academic Web site posted at: <http://www.arches.uga.edu/~godlas>.
- Huntington, Samuel. The Clash of Civilizations. New York: Simon and Schuster, 1996.
- Kramer, Martin. Ivory Towers in the Sand. Washington, DC: Washington Institute for Near East Policy, 2001.
- Lewis, Bernard. Islam and the West. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1993.
- Makiya, Kanan. Cruelty and Silence. New York: W. W. Norton, 1993.
- Miller, Judith. God Has Ninety-Nine Names. New York: Simon and Schuster, 1996.
- Morris, Benny. Righteous Victims. New York: Vintage, 2001.
- Muhaddith. "Al-Muhaddith: Islamic Software, Islamic Books, Holy Quran, Audio and Islamic Prayer Times: Downloads with Online Search." Download site posted at: <http://www.muhammadith.org>.
- Nasr, Seyyed, ed. Islamic Spirituality: Manifestations. London: SCM, 1991.
- Peters, Francis E. Muhammad and the Origins of Islam. Albany: State University of New York Press, 1994.
- Rahman, Fazlur. Islam. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1979.
- Rashid, Ahmed. Taliban. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 2001.
- Rippin, Andrew. Muslims. London: Routledge, 2000.
- Schulze, Reinhard. A Modern History of the Islamic World. New York: New York University Press, 2000.
- Watt, W. Montgomery. The Majesty That Was Islam. New York: Praeger Publishers, 1974.
- . Muhammad: Prophet and Statesman. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1961.

Islamism

692

Islamism (also known as Islamic revivalism or, popularly in the West, as Islamic fundamentalism) is the name given to a set of popular new religious movements that have appeared in the Muslim world through the twentieth century, though these newer movements have their roots in older groups that in the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries criticized the faltering Ottoman Empire and the intrusion of Western powers in the Middle East. The 1922 fall of the Ottoman caliphate, whose empire had once stretched from North Africa to Persia and from Yemen to the gates of Vienna, and the rise of national states in its place became the seminal event in the emergence of this movement, which has as a keynote the call to return to an Orthodox Islamic state in which Islamic law gives shape to the community's life. The Islamic tradition is strongly opposed to the modern Enlightenment ideal of separation of religion and government that now prevails in most of the non-Muslim world.

Among the first movements that took advantage of the weakening of the Ottoman Empire was the WAHHABI movement, named for Mohammad ibn Abd-al-Wahhab (c. 1703–1791) who emerged in Arabia as a critic of the Ottoman Empire, the lax practice of Islam among the Sunnis (the largest group), and the tolerance of what he considered the heretical practices of the various Sufi brotherhoods. He adopted a literalistic approach to the interpretation of the Qu'ran, the Muslim holy book, and the Hadith, the sayings of and traditions concerning the Prophet Muhammad. He gained an initial following around Mecca, but found long-lasting support from the Saud family. Around 1763, the Saudi sheikh began a conquest of Arabia. The Ottoman sultan tried to halt the erosion of his territory, but only in 1818 was he able to drive the Saudis into the desert. They were gradually pushed back until 1889, when they fled into exile in Kuwait. The almost dead Wahhabi movement was reborn when the head of the Saud family recaptured the family's traditional capital, Riyadh, in 1902 and over the next generation took control of what in 1932 became Saudi Arabia.

After World War II, the wealth of the Saudis allowed them to become missionaries for Islam and for the strict interpretations of Islamic law demanded by the Wahhabi perspective. Their striving in the cause of Islam (jihad) was manifest in the creation of the Committee for Encouraging Virtue and Preventing Vice to enforce public conformity to Islamic law in Saudi Arabia, the founding of the MUSLIM WORLD LEAGUE, support for the building of mosques in the West, and the sending out of a significant number of Wahhabi teachers to Muslim countries to win Muslims to their way.

Another significant movement that presaged twentieth-century Islamism was the Pan-Islamic Unity movement launched by Persian teacher Sayyid Jamal al-Din al-Afghani (1838–1897). While Wahhab concentrated his criticisms on the laxity of Sunni Muslims and the heretical practices of Sufi and Shi'a Muslims in Arabia, al-Afghani was widely traveled in the West and turned his critical pen against the Western nations, their immoral and degenerate culture, and their imperialist designs on the Middle East. He also picked up the Wahhabi critique of lax Muslims and called for the removal of some Muslim leaders of whom he disapproved.

Al-Afghani wrote at a time when Great Britain was making its presence felt in the Middle East, especially in Yemen, Egypt, and the Sudan. At the same time, the French were asserting themselves as the new colonial power over Islamic territories in northwest Africa, and they cooperated on the building of the Suez Canal in the 1860s. Throughout this period, the Ottomans were being slowly pushed out of the Balkans, a process that culminated in World War I and the choice of the sultan to side with the Austro-Hungarians. Following the war, a variety of national states arose in the former Ottoman lands, and in 1922 the sultan was deposed to make way for the modern state of Turkey. The final end of the Ottoman era, together with the disappearance of the caliphate, which had been in place in some form since the death of the Prophet Muhammad in 632 C.E., set the stage for a new breed of revitalization movements.

Al-Imam Hassan al-Banna (1906–1949) grew up in an Egypt dominated by Great Britain. He became the disciple of al-Afghani through Muhammad Rashid Rida (1865–1935), who continued al-Afghani's message in a periodical, al-Manar, that called Muslims to seek inspiration from the example of virtuous early Muslims. Rida was still active when, just six years after the fall of the caliphate, al-Banna founded Al-Ikhwan Al-Moslemoon, the MUSLIM BROTHERHOOD, which began as a movement calling Egyptian youth to put away non-Muslim aspects of their life (including folk magic) and live their life according to the Qu'ran and Hadith. As the movement spread, its program expanded and came to include an array of social programs, including the Muslim Mothers' Institute for the education of women.

In the mid-1930s, however, al-Banna and the Brotherhood members were especially affected by the volatile developments in Palestine that followed the pullout of British forces. And when the state of Israel was proclaimed in 1948, members of the Brotherhood joined the forces fighting the new government. Within Egypt, they had also become more radicalized, and several assassinations of government officials were attributed to them. Publicly, al-Banna emphasized the need to Islamize the government. He was himself assassinated in March 1949.

The movement continued in Egypt until suppressed by Gamal Nasser in 1954, by which time Sayyid Qutb (1906–1966) had become its new theoretician. Nasser did not totally destroy the Brotherhood, which continues to the present, but he did succeed in marginalizing it for many years, during which time its impulse passed to other groups. Among those newer movements was the Jamaat-e-Islam. Founded by Indian Muslim Sayyid Abul A'la Mawdudi (1903–1979), the Jamaat emerged in the context of the Indian independence movement and the separation of Pakistan as an independent state. As a young intellectual, Mawdudi began to ruminate on the conflict between Islam and Western culture. He also criticized Indian nationalism, the effect of which he concluded would be the destruction of Muslim identity. As he watched Muslim leaders toy with various strands of political and cultural ideologies, he saw a need to reconstruct Islamic thought. That need led to the founding of Jamaat-e-Islam in 1941. He moved to Pakistan, where he worked for the formation of an Islamic state, and was often the object of negative government action for his criticisms of their un-Islamic nature.

During his long career, he authored more than a hundred books and pamphlets, the most important of which were translated into various Middle Eastern and European languages. Beginning in 1956 he traveled widely, which served to further his influence. Although many were quite critical of his ideas, he found pockets of support throughout the Muslim world. His influence was expanded through the effort of the Egyptian Muslim Brotherhood leader Sayyid Qutb. Qutb was changed through his reading of Mawdudi in 1951 on the heels of his sojourn in America. He had seen the problem of American culture and was inspired by Mawdudi's idea of Islam as a complete way of life. The ideas of al-Banna and Mawdudi came together for him in a revised program to turn Egypt into an Islamic state. He suggested that a revolutionary vanguard should take over the government and then slowly reimpose Islam on Egyptian society. His mature thought appeared in his 1965 book, Milestones (Ma'alim fi al-tariq), the ideas of which led directly to his execution the next year. His writings, however, survived, and they now stand beside Mawdudi's as the major literary expression of the first generation of Islamism. They have provided the platform on which the later, more violent groups have built, their ideas being cited to support programs that have included assassinations, guerilla warfare, and widespread terrorist activity, and in the case of both the Islamic Nationalist Front (Sudan) and the TALIBAN, successful revolutions.

The opposition to the influx of Western political influence and culture, as well as to the leadership of secularized Muslims ruling countries apart from Islamic law, was strongest in Sunni countries, and prior to 1979 had its only major success in Saudi Arabia. However, Islamic revivalism also developed a presence in Shiite countries. In Persia, it appeared in the person of a young student, Navvab Safavi (1923–1956). He headed a secretive group known as the Devotees of Islam. The small group developed a program opposed to foreign influence in Persia (Iran) and is credited with the assassinations of government officials (including a prime minister and several intellectuals). In the mid-1950s the Devotees were suppressed and Safavi executed (1956). The thrust of the group, however, was not lost. It survived in the thoughts of the Ayatollah Khomeini (1902–1989), who as a relatively unknown cleric protested Safavi's being put to death. It then came to the fore in the Iranian Revolution, as a result of which the secularized government of the shah was replaced by a new government that reunited clerical and political power in Iran, and inspired a variety of Safavi groups in other countries with a significant Shiite presence.

In the 1980s and 1990s, the Islamist movement emerged in every Muslim country with more or less approval from the government's leaders. Among the more famous groups are Hizbullah (the Party of God, also known as Islamic Jihad, Lebanon); Hamas (the Islamic Resistance Movement, Lebanon), an outgrowth of the Palestinian branch of the Muslim Brotherhood; the Islamic Salvation Front (Algeria); the National Islamic Front (Sudan); and al-Jama'a al Islamiya (Egypt). The Russian incursion into Afghanistan occasioned the rise of a new group inspired by the Wahhabis, the Taliban, which emerged as the power in the land after the Russians were driven out. In 1995, Egyptian Sheikh Omar Abdel Rahman and nine other Islamists from various countries were convicted on charges related to the bombing of the World Trade Center in 1993. Out of the battle to overthrow the Russians, the Iraqi invasion of Kuwait, and the success of the coup in Sudan in 1989, Saudi Arabian Osama bin Laden (b. 1957) developed one of the most radical of Islamist groups, AL QAEDA, accused by Western political leaders of masterminding the bombing of the World Trade Center in New York City and the Pentagon in suburban Washington, D.C., on September 11, 2001. Bin Laden apparently was introduced to the spectrum of Islamist thought by Muhammad Qutb, the brother of Sayyid Qutb, and Abdullah Azzam (1941–1989), a Jordanian who worked with Hamas prior to taking a post at King Abdul Aziz University in Jeddah, Saudi Arabia. While sharing a common heritage in the earlier movements, each organization has been particularly involved in local issues and at times (especially after the events of September 11, 2001) often eager to identify with or distance itself from particular actions believed to have been taken by another group.

During the last quarter of the twentieth century, the question of Palestinian rights, the leadership of Afghanistan, the Gulf War, and the interaction of the Middle East and Western countries over oil have been but a few of the issues focusing the attention of the different Islamist groups. In this context the distinctions between a new religious movement, a political activist group, and even a terrorist group are blurred.

Note: As this encyclopedia goes to press, the United States has begun military operations in Afghanistan aimed at destroying Al Qaeda and the Taliban (deemed an accessory to Al Qaeda's terrorist action for allowing Al Qaeda to operate from Taliban-controlled territory). These actions have placed the future of both groups in doubt.

Sources:

Note: Following the events of September 11, 2001, many of the Web sites representing the opinions of different Islamist groups have disappeared from the Internet, and an element of instability is evident among those that remain. The official Taliban site is among those that disappeared.

Bergen, Peter L. Holy War, Inc.: Inside the Secret World of Osama bin Laden. New York: Free Press, 2001.

Esposito, John, ed. Voice of the Resurgent Islam. New York: Oxford University Press, 1983.

Faridi, Fazlur Rahman. Fundamentalism vis-a-vis Islamic Movement. Delhi: Markazi Makatba Islami, 1994.

Gwynne, Rosalind. "Al-Qa'ida and al-Qur'an: The 'Tafsir' of Usamah bin Ladin." Posted at http://web.utk.edu/~warda/bin_ladin_and_quran.htm. Accessed November 1, 2001.

Jansen, Johannes J. The Dual Nature of Islamic Fundamentalism. Ithaca, NY: Cornell University Press, 1996.

———. The Neglected Duty: The Creed of Sadat's Assassins and Islamic Resurgence in the Middle East. New York: Macmillan Company, 1986.

Juergenmeyer, Mark. Terror in the Mind of God: The Global Rise of Religious Violence. Berkeley: University of California Press, 2001.

Kramer, Martin. "Fundamentalist Islam at Large: The Drive for Power." Middle East Quarterly (June 1996). Posted at <http://www.meforum.org/meq/june96/kramer.shtml>. Accessed November 1, 2001.

Mawdudi, Sayyid Abul al-Mawdudi, A Short History of the Revivalist Movement in Islam. Delhi: Markazi Makatba Islami, 1972.

Moussalli, Ahmad S. Radical Islamic Fundamentalism: The Ideological and Political Discourse of Sayyid Qutb. Syracuse, NY: University of Syracuse Press, 1994.

Qutb, Sayyid. Milestones. Beirut, Lebanon: Holy Koran Publishing House, 1978.

Rashid, Ahmed. Taliban: Militant Islam, Oil and Fundamentalism in Central Asia. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 2001.

Sivan, Emmanuel. Radical Islam: Medieval Theology and Modern Politics. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1985.

Isle of Man

The Isle of Man, located in the Irish Sea northwest of the city of Liverpool, was inhabited during the first millennium B.C.E. by Celts. Irish Catholic monks arrived on the island around 400 of the Common Era and began the process of converting the population, a process that appears to have been completed over the next two centuries. The island was invaded by Vikings in the ninth century and annexed to Norway. The Vikings introduced a system of government, the Tynwald, which remains the governing system to the present. The island remained a Norwegian possession until

Status of religions in the Isle of Man, 2000-2050

Followers	2000			2025	2050
	total	%	rate
Christians	70,400	88.9	1.25	86,400	86,400
Anglicans	33,600	42.4	0.87	40,000	42,000
Protestants	11,200	14.2	0.13	13,000	13,500
Roman Catholics	6,800	8.6	1.01	8,000	8,500
Nonreligious	7,300	9.3	2.21	12,000	14,000
Atheists	1,400	1.8	5.66	2,500	3,500
Jews	60	0.1	1.32	80	100
Total population	79,200	100.0	1.40	101,000	104,000

sold to Scotland in 1266. It came into British hands a century later.

The island existed as a semi-autonomous possession for the next five hundred years, but in the eighteenth century became a haven for smuggling to the point that the British moved in and turned the Isle into a dependency. It is still a self-governing dependency of the United Kingdom.

The Isle of Man remained Roman Catholic until the Reformation of the sixteenth century, when its churches were incorporated into the CHURCH OF ENGLAND. The Diocese of Sodo and Man retains the religious allegiance of the largest percentage of the island's residents. It also has a special relationship with the state and retains its own canon law, which differs somewhat from the rest of the church.

The ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH has revived on the Isle of Man, as it has in the rest of the United Kingdom after several centuries of repression following the Reformation. It is currently the second largest church on the island, the congregations being included within the Diocese of Liverpool.

John Wesley, the founder of Methodism, first visited the Isle of Man in 1777, and the METHODIST CHURCH of Great Britain remains the third largest faith on the island. It now competes, however, with a spectrum of more than twenty Protestant and Free Church denominations. With the exception of the UNITED REFORMED CHURCH and the BAPTIST UNION OF GREAT BRITAIN, which work began in the nineteenth century, the remaining churches have relatively small memberships within the population of only 80,000.

Sources:

Ashley, A. The Church in the Isle of Man. London: St. Anthony's Press, 1958.

Barrett, David. The Encyclopedia of World Christianity. 2d edition. New York: Oxford University Press, 2001.

Ismaili Islam

Following the death of Ja'far al-Sadiq (d. 765 C.E.), around whom much of the Shiite Muslim community had gathered, a crisis of leadership emerged. Shi'a thought had invested authority in the physical family of the Prophet Muhammad (c. 570–632) and in the descendants of his son-in-law, Ali ibn Abi Talib (d. 661). During the eighth century, that lineage had passed to the eldest sons in the family of Ali's son al-Husyan. However, the eldest son of al-Sadiq, designated the sixth imam, Ismail al-Mubarakhad (d. 760), died prior to his father. The main body of Shiites turned their attention to the younger brother, Musa al-Kazim (d. 796/7), and continued their leadership through his descendents.

One group of Shiites clung to Ismail as the seventh imam (ruling authority) of their community (hence their popular designation as "Seveners"), and chose his son Muhammad al-Matymum (d. 813) to lead them. Through Muhammad, a new line of caliphs developed. The movement spread through the next century and became particularly strong in North Africa. In 945, the Ismailis established control in Tunisia, from which they spread westward to the Atlantic. In 969, the Ismailis unseated the ruler of Egypt, and in 973 established their imam as the new caliph with his throne in the new city of Cairo. The Fatimid Empire (named after Fatimah, the daughter of Muhammad and wife of Ali) soon moved into the older territories controlled by the Sunni caliph now headquartered in Baghdad. Syria briefly fell under its control.

The Fatimid dynasty lasted for two centuries. Egypt prospered, and a relatively tolerant attitude to other religions was evident. Among the Fatimids' cultural accomplishments was the founding of Al-Azhar University. The beginning of the end of the Fatimid dynasty came with the split of the Fatimid community into two factions in 1094. The ruler, Abu Tamim Ma'add al-Mustansir Bi'llah (d. 1094), had intended that his son Abu Mansur Nizar (1045–1095) should become his successor. However, forces within the community who favored his younger brother Abu'l-Qasim Ahmad (1074–1101) declared him the new caliph. In the civil war that resulted, Nizar was defeated and subsequently executed; however, his line of succession was recognized by the important Ismaili community in Persia and Iraq. Ismailis in Syria, Yemen, and India recognized the lineage through Abu'l-Qasim Ahmad, known as al-Mustali. They were later known as Mustali Ismailis.

The remaining Mustali Ismaili rulers of the Fatimid regime were beset with problems, including the Christian Crusades. Originally, the Fatimids had aligned with the Crusaders against their mutual enemy, the Abbasid caliph. However, in the twelfth century, the Crusaders turned on the Fatimids and were able to inflict several defeats that left them in a greatly weakened condition. They were thus unable to withstand the onslaught of the Abbasid leader, Saladin the Magnificent (1138–1193), who took Cairo in 1171. They were also afflicted with internal dissension, which included several important splits over succession to the imamate.

One important faction of the Mustali Ismailis supported the cause of al-Tayyib, the infant son reportedly born to the assassinated Caliph al-Amir in 1130. An elder member of the family assumed the role of regent; the infant al-Tayyib was never seen, and his fate remains unknown. In the years after the fall of the Fatimid dynasty, most of the Ismaili factions were suppressed. However, the Ismaili leader in Yemen, Queen al-Sayyida, came to believe in the imamate of al-Tayyib. Because of her efforts, the followers of al-Tayyib alone survived among the several Mustali factions. Because her powers extended to Gujarat, this group also survived in India, where the Mustali Tayyib Ismailis became known as BOHRAS.

Meanwhile, the Ismailis who had favored Nizar came to believe that he was the reincarnation of Ismail returned to Earth to rule. They also saw Nizar as the initiator of a new lineage of imams. Withdrawing from Egypt, his descendents moved to the new center of their support in Persia. A new headquarters arose at Alamut, a mountain outpost in northern Persia (Iran).

The Alamut era began one of the more infamous eras in Islamic history, as Nizari Ismaili leaders perpetuated their dream of continuing the Fatimid dynasty and ultimately replacing the Sunnite caliph in Baghdad. Alamut became a center of guerilla warfare carried out through a network of Ismaili communities, now largely working underground, throughout the Abbasid-controlled lands. To undergird their new life, the Ismaili leadership proposed a doctrine of repudiation, the right to break the laws of Islam as a preparation for the arrival of al-Mahdi (the retuning seventh Imam), who would upon his appearance restore them. The Nizari offered followers wine and hashish and called for jihad (holy war) against the Sunni majority. From their use of hashish they became known as the Assassins—a word that later became attached to their practice of sending agents skilled in the arts of poisoning, killing, and disguise to murder targeted leaders. They were accredited with the murder of several caliphs.

The Assassins existed for the next two centuries as a cancer in the empire, operating from Alamut and other mountain fortresses in Syria and Palestine. The beginning of the end of the Assassins came with the fall of Alamut to the Mongols in 1256, though some of the Syrian fortresses held out until the sixteenth century, by which time the Ottoman Empire had arisen. Though no longer a military force, the Nizari Ismailis did not disappear. The lineage of imams continued, and in the 1830s the imam was given the title Aga Khan. The Alamut era also gave birth to several additional new variations on Shiite perspectives, most importantly ALEVISM. The Alevis continue as a minority religious community in Turkey, Lebanon, and Syria. There are a number of separate Ismaili groups holding dissenting opinions on issues concerning the predicted al-Mahdi, though each is quite small, with membership numbering in the hundreds.

Very early in their history, the Ismailis began to engage in some mystical and even occult speculations. From their beginning with the seventh Shi'a imam, numerology began to play a role in their thought. Other events prompted the development of various secret rituals, some of which took on special importance when combined with speculation over the end of the age and the reappearance of al-Mahdi. These speculations, although done in the context of Orthodox Islam, on occasion challenged the tradition, especially when the Ismailis critiqued Muslim law.

Today, the great majority of Ismailis are Nizari associated with the Aga Khan, now operating through the HIS HIGHNESS PRINCE AGA KHAN SHIA IMAMI ISMAILI COUNCIL, which in turn works through a variety of national and local branches around the world. The majority reside in India, though during the twentieth century they have become dispersed worldwide. During the late Alamut era, a number of missionaries were sent to India from Persia, and a thriving Ismaili community developed in Gujarat and the Sind (now part of Pakistan). When in 1840, the then Aga Khan was forced out of Persia, he settled among the larger concentration of his followers in India, where they are locally referred to as Khojas, a term of respect meaning “honorable person.”

Those Ismailis who trace their lineage back to al-Tayyib and al-Mustali also survived primarily in western India, in the area around Mumbai (Bombay). Here they have split into several groups and are now dispersed around the world. The largest group is organized as the SHIAH FATIMI ISMAILI TAYYABI DAWOODI BOHRA.

Sources:

Corbin, Henry. Cyclical Time and Ismaili Gnosis. London: Kegan Paul International, 1983.
 Daftary, Farhad. A Short History of the Ismailis. Princeton, NJ: Marcus Wiener Publishers, 1998.
 Frischauer, Willi. The Aga Khans. New York: Hawthorn Publishers, 1971.
 Jackson, Stanley. The Aga Khan. London: Odhams Press, 1952.
 Lewis, Bernard. The Assassins: A Radical Sect of Islam. New York: Basic Books, 1968.
 Nanjio, A. The Nizari Isma'ili Tradition in the Indo-Pakistani Subcontinent. Delmar, NY: 1978.

Status of religions in Israel, 2000-2050

Followers	2000			2025	2050
	total	%	rate
Jews	3,951,000	77.1	3.12	5,110,000	5,450,000
Muslims	613,000	12.0	2.81	800,000	880,000
Christians	297,000	5.8	3.33	480,000	630,000
Roman Catholics	140,000	2.7	3.22	200,000	250,000
Independents	85,000	1.7	3.54	140,000	200,000
Orthodox	46,900	0.9	3.51	95,000	128,000
Nonreligious	209,000	4.1	3.74	450,000	700,000
Atheists	36,400	0.7	3.43	60,000	80,000
Baha'is	13,700	0.3	3.75	25,000	30,000
other religionists	1,700	0.0	2.62	2,500	4,000
Total population	5,122,000	100.0	3.12	6,927,000	7,774,000

Bible (the Christian Old Testament). That history includes a variety of Pagan faiths (whose presence dates to at least 7,000 B.C.E.) and preeminently JUDAISM. Much of this ancient history lies beyond the reach of this encyclopedia, which picks up the story with the entrance of Alexander the Great (356–323 B.C.E.).

Israel was incorporated into Alexander’s kingdom, and during the succeeding Ptolemaic Empire, Greek culture was imposed on the region. The predominantly Jewish residents revolted in 165 B.C.E. under Judas Maccabaeus, and the land remained independent until overrun by Rome in 53 B.C.E. A revolt in 66 C.E. led to the destruction of Jerusalem (including the Jewish temple in 70 C.E.), and a later revolt in 131 led to Jews being forbidden to enter Jerusalem and the land being renamed Syria Palestina. The Roman occupation and suppression of independence movements led to widespread Jewish migration around the Mediterranean Basin and then throughout Europe.

Israel

The modern state of Israel is located on land with a rich religious history, much of which is recorded in the Hebrew

Israel remained under Roman control, part of the Eastern Roman Empire, known after the fall of the empire in the West as the Byzantine Empire. The land was overrun by Muslim Arabs in the 630s and became a center of Islamic culture. It also became the focus of Christian Crusades during the Middle Ages, resulting in the periodic occupation of Jerusalem and portions of Palestine by European Christian forces. However, the rise of the Ottoman Empire reestablished Islamic hegemony until the empire's collapse in 1918, at the end of World War I.

Great Britain took control of Palestine in 1918. A year earlier, in the famous Balfour Declaration, the British government had promised the world's Jewish community a homeland in Palestine; however, little progress was made on that promise through the next decades. In the meantime, Jews flocked to the cause of Zionism, the crusade to establish a modern counterpart of the ancient Jewish state, and Zionist organizations assisted Jewish migration to Palestine. Then, following the Jewish Holocaust of World War II, many survivors found their way to Palestine, and in 1948 they declared the formation of Israel. Those countries that had been victorious in the war gave more or less tacit approval to the new country. The creation of Israel caused the displacement of many Palestinians (mostly Muslims) and has led to more than a half century of conflict between Israel and her neighbors (all predominantly Muslim), a conflict that shows little sign of any final resolution.

Israel's original borders were enlarged in the war that followed immediately upon its formation and the Six-Day War (1967). Land taken from Egypt in 1967 was returned as part of the Camp David Accords (1977). The Accords vividly manifested the complicated support system that maintains Israel, which has continued to receive significant financial and military resources from the United States. That support is, in turn, maintained by a coalition of Jewish and conservative Protestant Christian organizations. In the meantime, the liberal Protestant community has tended to support the cause of the Palestinians and their demands for some justice in the light of their claims to Palestine as their homeland.

As the new century begins, Israel is the home to one of the most diverse religious communities in the world. The ancient site of the emergence of Judaism, Israel has had a continuous Jewish presence throughout history, though the size of that community has varied considerably from century to century. As Jews dispersed around the world, numerous variations of Jewish religious life developed, and many who were ethnically Jews secularized and developed a nonreligious ideology.

In 1950, the Israeli government passed what was referred to as the "Law of Return." It gave every Jew in the world the right to migrate to Israel and settle there. As a result, as the new century begins, approximately 75 percent of the population are Jews. By 1995, 53 percent of the Jewish population had been born in Israel, 42 percent were first generation immigrants from Europe or the Americas, and 5 percent came from Africa and Asia. The government includes a Ministry of Religion assigned to deal with the needs and problems of the Jewish community. It is active through a number of local councils and committees that operate in towns across the country. Religious matters are also referred to the Chief Rabbinate of Israel, consisting of two chief rabbis, one Ashkenazi (of European heritage) and one Sephardic (of Spanish/Portuguese heritage).

The Jewish community is divided both ethnically and theologically. The primary division is between those Jews who had a background on the Iberian Peninsula (where Jewish life flourished in the Middle Ages, prior to the expulsion of the Jews at the end of the fifteenth century), and those from Northern and Eastern Europe (including Germany, Poland, and Russia). However, Jews from India (BENE ISRAEL), Ethiopia (BETA ISRAEL), and Yemen have significantly extended the definition of who are Jews for purposes of the Law of Return. The refinement of that definition has been assisted by the denial to African American converts to Judaism and Jewish converts to Christianity from North America and Europe the rights and privileges under the Law of Return.

During the nineteenth and twentieth centuries, Jews in Europe and North America divided first into ORTHODOX and REFORM factions, each with their own rabbinical and congregational organizations, and then developed a spectrum of communities divided by differences over theology and adherence to traditional Jewish religious practices related to dress codes, the consumption of kosher food, the role of women, and activity on the Sabbath. Large communities that adhered to a CONSERVATIVE JUDAISM (between the Orthodox and Reform perspective) and a RECONSTRUCTIONIST JUDAISM (that developed from the Conservative perspective) also emerged. On the far ends of the spectrum are ultra-Orthodox groups and several secularized groups represented by the INTERNATIONAL FEDERATION OF SECULAR HUMANISTIC JEWS.

The mystical and esoteric tendency within the Jewish community came together in the modern world in HASIDISM, which spread especially through Eastern Europe in the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries. Though severely weakened by the Holocaust, Hasidism has survived in a spectrum of older groups (the largest being the LUBAVITCH movement) and several newer Neo-Hasidic groups such as the KABBALAH LEARNING CENTRE, founded in Palestine in 1922.

Christianity was born in Israel, developing from the ministry of a Jewish teacher, Jesus bar Joseph, a Nazirite executed by Roman authorities around 30 C.E. The early Christian community was centered on Jerusalem, and it was at the famous Council of Jerusalem (Acts 15) that the decision to redirect Christianity toward the non-Jewish world was made. Following the acceptance of Christianity by the Roman Empire, and especially with the rise of Byzantium (Constantinople) as the new capital of the empire, Palestine was dominated by Christianity. This hegemony ended with the rise of Islam as the great power in the eastern Mediterranean in the seventh century. Although Islam came to dominate the religious community, Christianity remained alive as, like Judaism, a tolerated religion of the Book, and a Christian presence continued through the centuries. Christianity briefly returned to power during the Crusades, but has remained a minority since the rise of the Ottoman Empire in the sixteenth century.

Today, the entire spectrum of Christianity has appeared in Israel, with many Christian groups supporting at least a token presence in what is considered the Christian Holy Land. Traditionally, the land has been the territory of the GREEK ORTHODOX PATRIARCHATE OF JERUSALEM, which has an honored place as the oldest Christian community in the area. In 451, at the Council of Chalcedon, Jerusalem was formally recognized as one of the four major Orthodox patriarchates. The ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH entered Palestine at the time of the Crusades and is now represented by bishops over both Latin Rite and Eastern Rite dioceses. Roman Catholicism has replaced EASTERN ORTHODOXY as the largest Christian community in Israel. The CHURCH OF ENGLAND launched a mission in the Eastern Mediterranean in the nineteenth century, which has resulted in the present EPISCOPAL CHURCH IN JERUSALEM.

Protestantism began to develop a life in Palestine in 1839 with the entrance of representatives of the CHURCH OF SCOTLAND. Lutherans and Anglicans began a cooperative work in the 1840s, and the Free Church of Scotland came in 1885. The older Scottish work continues today as the St. Andrew's Scots Memorial Church in Jerusalem. Through the twentieth century, a number of American and British groups began work, especially after the foundation of the state of Israel. Many conservative Evangelical and Pentecostal Christians have seen the emergence of Israel as a prophetic event indicating the beginning of the end time events described in the Book of Revelation in the Christian Bible. The spread of different prophecies regarding the nature of those events have led different groups to launch missionary activities directed toward the Jews both in Israel and elsewhere, and/or to develop a presence in Jerusalem to await the end time, which will include the Second Coming of Jesus.

Although the great majority of Christians in Israel are Palestinians or expatriates, among them is a late-twentieth-century movement, Messianic Judaism, built around Jewish converts to Christianity who wish to retain their Jewish culture and who emphasize the Jewish element in Christianity (which adopted the Jewish scriptures as part of its Bible). Messianic Jews meet in synagogues (rather than churches) and have been especially condemned by the rest of the Jewish community as dishonest and subversive. Messianic Jews have been denied citizenship in Israel under the Law of Return.

Islam emerged suddenly in the seventh century and spread quickly from its point of origin in Arabia. An Arab army conquered Palestine in the 630s, and Muslims were the dominant religious force in the area until 1948. Most Muslims are Sunnis of the HANAFITE school, though some SHAFIITES and HANBALITES are also present. Since the rise of the state of Israel, a variety of groups who follow a conservative form of Islam (WAHHABI) and/or identify with the political struggle of Palestinians have emerged.

The larger Muslim community in Israel is directed by a number of religious councils. Disputes are sent to one of four religious courts, which are assisted by a Court of Appeals in Jerusalem. Islam is recognized by the state, and most imams are paid out of the state treasury. This status continues a practice still in effect under Islamic rule, in which a spectrum of Jewish and Christian communities were recognized by the state, assigned responsibility for marriage and burial, and supported financially by the state. One implication of this system is that marriages by unrecognized groups are not recognized by the state.

Although Jews and Muslims lived together for many centuries in relative peace, since the formation of the state of Israel, tension has existed between the Jewish authorities and especially those Muslims in Israel (some 12 percent of the population) who have been displaced from their traditional home by the developing state.

Besides the main bodies of Judaism, Islam, and Christianity, there is a spectrum of distinctive groups that have a lengthy history in the region and a relation with one or more of the larger groups. Included are the DRUZE (which emerged out of Islam in the eleventh century); the BAHÁ'Í FAITH (which emerged out of Shi'a Islam in Iran but now has its international headquarters in Haifa, Israel); the KARAITES (a Babylonian Jewish group); and the Samaritans (a Jewish group that resulted from the intermarriage of Jews and Assyrians in the eighth century B.C.E.) The latter, now a small group of only a few hundred, have become internationally known because of the story of the Good Samaritan included in the Christian New Testament (Luke 10: 30–37).

A variety of new religions have arisen in Israel. Among the first of the new youth-oriented religions to manifest were the INTERNATIONAL SOCIETY FOR KRISHNA CONSCIOUSNESS and the Transcendental Meditation movement. In the 1980s, an anticult movement developed and targeted any groups that it saw as tending to alienate young adults from Orthodox Judaism. It has been especially concerned with Messianic Judaism and other Christian groups that have a history of targeting Jews for conversion. Given the symbolic power of Jerusalem and other holy sites in Israel, a great deal of concern arose at the end of 1999 over possible violent reactions from both Jewish and Christian movements to the end of the century, though no such violence manifested.

Israel, while favoring Orthodox Judaism, and offering special recognition and support to a small number of the larger religious communities, also proclaims religious freedom. That policy has allowed the pluralism so evident in the urban centers. Most Christian groups, especially the Protestant groups, are not recognized, and the registration of marriages performed by Protestant ministers remains a problem. Many Protestant groups are members of the United Christian Council in Israel and are working for some level of recognition for their members. The council is affiliated with the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES. Most of the older Catholic and Orthodox groups are members of the Middle East Council of Churches, which is also affiliated with the World Council.

Government policy has, in the main, been directed toward the larger communities, and to that end a Department of Muslim Affairs and a Department of Christian Affairs are included within the Ministry of Religions. Much of the energy of the ministry is spent, not so much in supporting Muslim and Christian religious activity, as in isolating non-Jewish religious groups from young Israelis who might be tempted to reject Judaism. A variety of organizations are dedicated to interfaith dialogue, both in an effort to improve relationships between the different religious and to apply religious insights to Israel's ongoing problems.

Sources:

- Aviad, J. Return to Judaism: Religious Renewal in Israel. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1983.
- Colbi, S. P. A History of Christian Presence in the Holy Land. Lanham, MD: University Press of America, 1988.
- Idinopoulos, T. A. Jerusalem Blessed, Jerusalem Cursed: Jews, Christians, and Muslims in the Holy City from David's Time to Our Own. Chicago: Ivan R. Dee, 1991.
- Israeli, R. Muslim Fundamentalism in Israel. London: Brassey's, 1993.
- Wigoder, G. New Encyclopedia of Zionism and Israel. London: Associated University Presses, 1994.

Italian Assemblies of God [Assemblee di Dio in Italia]

The Italian Assemblies of God (ADI) adopted its name (Assemblee di Dio in Italia, in Italian) in 1947, when the majority of Italian Pentecostal Churches (most of them established after World War I by immigrants returning from the United States) entered into a treaty with the ASSEMBLIES OF GOD (based in the United States). ADI, however, is an independent institution, with its own Italian peculiarities; it did not originate from missionaries sent by the Assemblies of God missions, but from separate Italian American Pentecostal congregations established in America at the beginning of the twentieth century, which developed their own independent missions in Italy. Thus, the Italian Assemblies of God cannot be regarded as simply a branch of the U.S. Assemblies of God.

Italian Pentecostals suffered severe persecution under the Fascist regime in the late 1930s and early 1940s. In December 1945, Swiss pastor Hermann Parli (1916–1998) was dispatched to Italy by the Assemblies of God in Great Britain to check how much had survived of Italian Pentecostalism. Through him, contacts with the Assemblies of God in the United States were also established. ADI was formally established on May 22, 1948, with Umberto Gorietti (1904–1982) as the first president and Roberto Bracco (1915–1983) as first secretary. By 1955, member churches had already exceeded 300, with more than 20,000 members (although a part of Italian Pentecostalism resisted institutionalization and, to this date, remains independent of the ADI).

In 1951, the U.S. Assemblies of God sent pastor Antonio Piraino (1915–1992) to Italy in order to help the ADI to expand. ADI also maintained relationships with the Christian Church in North America, an independent Italian American Pentecostal body connected with the origins of Italian Pentecostalism, which in turn, and again in 1951, sent to Italy pastor Antonio di Biase (1897–1974). With the help of these American churches, ADI was able to establish its own academic institution in 1954, the Istituto Biblico Italiano, under the leadership of Vincenzo Burchieri (1893–1962), sustained by an Italian Christian Educational Foundation. In 1956, ADI launched a Christian radio channel and opened the Orfanotrofo Betania, an orphanage founded by Eliana Rustici (1912–1966); it was the first of several charitable institutions. On December 5, 1959, ADI was officially recognized by the Italian government, and in 1960 financial help from America was discontinued. In 1976, ADI entered into a “spiritual affiliation” agreement with both the Christian Church in North America and its European counterpart, the Italian Christian Churches in North Europe, in order to emphasize that its relationship with the Assemblies of God was not an exclusive one. In 1983, the Missione Evangelica Zigana (Gypsy Evangelical Mission), with some 700 Italian Gypsy members, merged within the ADI.

In 1986, ADI president Francesco Toppi entered into a concordat with the Italian government, thus enabling inter alia ADI to receive its share of the national religious tax. Member churches currently number more than 1,000, with some 140,000 members. ADI publishes three official periodicals and supports several local radio stations. ADI emphasizes the need for a solid, conservative biblical formation for its pastors, and criticizes the Charismatic churches of second-generation Italian Pentecostalism for putting experience over theological formation and doctrine. In that same light, ADI pastors do not participate in the ecumenical enterprises some of those churches have promoted with non-Pentecostal Protestants and with the Roman Catholic Charismatic Renewal movement.

Address:

Assemblee di Dio in Italia
Via dei Bruzzi 11
00185 Rome
Italy
<http://www.adi-it.org>

Massimo Introvigne and PierLuigi Zoccatelli

Sources:

- Stretti, Eugenio. Il movimento pentecostale. Le Assemblee di Dio in Italia. Turin: Claudiana, 1998.
- Toppi F. E mi sarete testimoni. Il Movimento Pentecostale e le Assemblee di Dio in Italia. Rome: ADI Media, 1999.
- Womack, David A., and Francesco Toppi. Le radici del Movimento pentecostale in Italia. Rome: ADI Media, 1989.

Italo-Albanian Catholic Church

The Italo-Albanian Catholic Church is a small body in full communion with the ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH that exists among people of Greek heritage in southern Italy and Sicily. Christianity in this area developed using the Greek language and following the customs of the Eastern Church rather than the Latin Church, even though it was included in the area under the developing authority of the bishop of Rome. Through the centuries the process of latinization began, but before it was completed, in the eighth century, the region was shifted from the jurisdiction of Rome to that of Greek Byzantium. Subsequently, a revival of Greek Christianity ensued. In the eleventh century, the region was conquered by the Normans. Though returned to the Roman jurisdiction, the Byzantine church was strongly entrenched, and it was only slowly relatinized.

The progress that seemed to be leading to the eventual disappearance of the Byzantine rite in southern Italy was reversed in the 1400s when a number of Albanians moved into the area. Those from southern Albania followed the Byzantine rite. Their persistence was rewarded in 1595 when a bishop was appointed for them. Although it remained relatively small and even continued to decline, the Vatican looked with favor on the community and began a slow process of recognition of the group; eventually, in the nineteenth century, it was given full recognition within the church. In 1732 a seminary was founded in Calabria, and a second opened two years later in Palermo.

Today there are two dioceses serving the church, the Diocese of Lungro, erected in 1919, and the Diocese of Piana degli Albanesi, created in 1937. A third bishop resides at the monastery of Santa Maria de Grottaferrata and serves as its abbot. The monastery was founded in the eleventh century and is the oldest structure representative of the continuing Greek tradition in Italy.

The Italo-Albanian Catholic Church may be contacted through the bishop of Lungro, Vescovado, Corso Skanderberg 54, 87010 Lungro, Italy, or the bishop of Piana degli Albanesi, Piazza S. Nicola 1, 90037 Piana degli Albanesi (Palermo), Italy. The Italian Catholic Bishop's Conference maintains pages on the two Italo-Albanian dioceses (in Italian) and a page on the monastery (in English) at <http://www2.chiesacattolica.it/ceidocs/>. There were some 62,000 members in the 1990s.

Source:

- Roberson, Ronald G. The Eastern Christian Churches—A Brief Survey. 5th ed. Rome: Edizioni Orientalia Christiana, Pontificio Istituto Orientale, 1995.

Italy

Italy, as a political entity, only came into existence in 1861, when the “artichoke policy” pursued by the Kingdom of Sardinia, which had successively conquered all the Italian staterelli (small states), led ultimately to the establishment of the Kingdom of Italy, with Turin as its first capital. The capital was moved to Florence in 1866, and in 1870 to Rome, after Italian troops had entered the holy city (which had previously been the capital of an independent state ruled by the pope). Within the territory of the Kingdom of Italy, Roman Catholics constituted a large majority (although hypotheses about the percentage of religious practice vary), with Jews forming the largest minority and Protestants confined to the Waldensian valleys in Piedmont.

The ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH had been largely hostile to the unification of Italy, achieved by the Kingdom of Sardinia ruled by an anticlerical elite, and became even more hostile after the seizure of Rome in 1870. Popes not only routinely excommunicated kings of Italy, but also prevented Italian Catholics, under threat of excommunication, from participating in political life either as candidates or voters, under the non expedit (Latin; it is not appropriate) policy. As a consequence, Italy became a strange democracy in which the papal veto, together with limitations connected with wealth and the exclusion of women, encouraged fewer than 3 percent of Italian adults to vote in most elections. Only in the period immediately preceding World War I were some limited exceptions to the non expedit policy allowed.

In the meantime, Protestants (both Italian Waldensians and all sorts of missionaries from the United States and United Kingdom) saw themselves as obvious supporters of the kingdom's ruling elite, and tried to capitalize on Catholic hostility to the unification in order to establish themselves as the natural allies of the newly established government. Quarrels between the various Protestant denominations prevented the establishment of a national Protestant church, however, and political sympathies did not easily translate into religious conversions, although various Protestant groups (WALDENSIAN CHURCH, EVANGELICAL BAPTIST UNION OF ITALY, EVANGELICAL METHODIST CHURCH OF ITALY, CHRISTIAN BROTHERS, and different independents, followed later by the CHURCHES OF CHRIST and the SALVATION ARMY) were established in all Italian regions, including in the south, where the only Protestant presence had been virtually wiped out in the sixteenth and the seventeenth centuries.

In 1922, Benito Mussolini (1883–1945) seized power, having staged a successful coup (the so-called March to Rome), thereby leaving him free to establish his Fascist regime. Although Mussolini was originally an anticlerical freethinker, he later declared himself a Roman Catholic and tried to ingratiate himself with the Roman Catholic Church. Within the framework of this policy, he entered, on February 11, 1929, into a concordat with the Holy See. The Italian state officially recognized the tiny independent “State of the Vatican” ruled by the pope, and granted a number of privileges to the Catholic Church, including state salaries for parish priests and the teaching of the Catholic religion, controlled by local bishops, in public schools. After 1929, the initial Fascist tolerance of religious minorities turned into discrimination and persecution, particularly of those groups recently established by immigrants who had converted in the United States and returned to Italy (Pentecostals, Seventh-day Adventists, JEHOVAH’S WITNESSES).

After World War II, Italy became a democracy and a republic, with a new constitution theoretically guaranteeing full religious liberty to all. Fascist laws that discriminated against most minorities, however, took time to dismantle. Restrictions governing Pentecostals, for instance, were abrogated only in 1955. The Constitutional Court played a pivotal role, however, and by the 1960s most restrictions had been abolished. This allowed several dozen denominations to establish themselves in Italy, some of them continuing a presence started in the early twentieth century. Only two groups, however, were really successful: Jehovah’s Witnesses, which firmly established themselves as the second largest religion among Italian citizens, and the Pentecostal movement, a good half of which had been unified between 1947 and 1948 into the ITALIAN ASSEMBLIES OF GOD. Today among the current 363,000 Italian Protestants, only 60,000 belong to “historical” churches (such as Lutheran, Reformed, Waldensian, Methodist, Baptist), while the majority attends Pentecostal and other “non-historical” Evangelical churches.

The 1980s saw dramatic changes in the Italian religious scene, with Prime Minister Bettino Craxi (1934–2000) in 1984 renegotiating the concordat with the Roman Catholic Church. It was formally declared that Roman Catholicism was no longer Italy’s official religion (a largely symbolic move, since for all practical purposes this was already the Status of religions in Italy, 2000-2050

Followers	2000			2025	2050
	total	%	rate
Christians	47,010,000	82.1	-0.09	40,959,000	31,823,000
Roman Catholics	55,680,000	97.2	0.04	49,500,000	39,500,000
Protestants	446,000	0.8	0.36	450,000	480,000
Marginal Christians	420,000	0.7	1.14	600,000	800,000
Nonreligious	7,535,000	13.2	0.67	7,300,000	6,300,000
Atheists	1,965,000	3.4	0.77	1,960,000	1,950,000
Muslims	674,000	1.2	1.17	900,000	950,000
Chinese folk-religionists	43,800	0.1	0.67	70,000	80,000
Jews	33,600	0.1	-1.96	30,000	27,000
Neoreligionists	12,000	0.0	0.46	16,000	20,000
Baha'is	5,700	0.0	1.29	8,000	10,000
Buddhists	4,300	0.0	0.52	6,000	7,800
Hindus	2,400	0.0	1.96	5,000	8,000
Ethnoreligionists	2,000	0.0	1.08	4,000	7,200
other religionists	9,500	0.0	0.53	12,000	14,000
Total population	57,298,000	100.0	0.05	51,270,000	41,197,000

case, thanks to a number of Constitutional Court decisions), and the church financing system was restructured. The salary paid by the state to parish priests was thus replaced by a national cultural and religious tax. Taxpayers were invited to specify, by indicating it on their tax return forms, their option for a participating church or state charity. (Later, national corruption scandals resulted in the state charity being selected by a very small number of taxpayers, thus in practice largely making the tax a purely religious one.)

The uniqueness of the Italian system (compared, for example, with Germany) is that there is no way for taxpayers to escape the payment of the religious tax (0.8 percent of their total taxes). Should a taxpayer fail to mark any of the options given, then 0.8 percent of his or her total taxes is divided among the participating churches in proportion to the national percentage attributed to each church, based on those who actually marked a particular option. Let's say, for instance, that the Lutheran Church has been selected in a given year by 2 percent of those who have marked one of the options; this means that the Lutheran Church will also receive a corresponding 2 percent of the total amount of the religious tax paid by those taxpayers who have not marked any option.

The new system allowed the implementation of the constitutional provision calling for concordats (known as Intese, with the name Concordato being exclusively reserved for the treaty with the Holy See) to be signed between the government and religious bodies other than the Roman Catholic Church. As a result, new concordats have been entered into with the Waldensian and Methodist Churches (1984), the SEVENTH-DAY ADVENTIST CHURCH (1988), the Italian Assemblies of God (1988), the Union of Italian Jewish Communities (1989), the Italian Lutheran Church (1995), and the Italian Baptist Union (1995). Adventists and Assemblies of God Pentecostals, however, have elected to receive only the money of those taxpayers who, on their tax forms, opt explicitly for them, thus waiving their rightful participation in the division of the taxes paid by those who fail to mark a specific option. Baptists have so far elected not to receive any part of their share of the religious tax.

In 1999, the then prime minister Massimo D'Alema signed concordats with the Italian Buddhist Union and the Jehovah's Witnesses. In order to become effective, however, such concordats have to be ratified by parliament, and this has not yet occurred at the date of this writing. In the meantime, in 1998, the government opened negotiations with the Greek Orthodox Church, the CHURCH OF JESUS CHRIST OF LATTER-DAY SAINTS, and the Alliance of Evangelical Christian Churches in Italy (which includes a number of Evangelical Pentecostal and non-Pentecostal churches), and in 2001 with SOKA GAKKAI INTERNATIONAL (the largest Italian Buddhist body that is not a member of the Italian Buddhist Union) and the Italian Hindu Union (which includes a number of "traditionalist" Hindu temples and organizations).

The Italian system has proved remarkably effective in assuring religious harmony and in preventing national religious controversies in Italy. Tax exemption and freedom to operate are largely granted to all sorts of religious bodies, unlike France and Germany; for example, the founding fathers of the Italian Republic explicitly repudiated any attempt to limit religious liberty in the name of "public order" (as Fascism had) or allegiance to the constitution, thereby granting full freedom of operation and proselytization to groups whose values are different from those shared by the Italian majority. More than a hundred religious groups also enjoy official government recognition and are granted additional advantages (while tax exemption and freedom of proselytization do not require statutory recognition).

The eight churches that have, so far, entered into concordats with the Italian government constitute an elite group of religious bodies whose national relevance is thus explicitly recognized. No church or religion is "entitled," by right, to a concordat; entering into it is a purely political decision, fully discretionary, and requiring the approval of both government and parliament. Groups without a concordat, however, are deprived neither of basic liberties and tax exemption, nor of "recognition"; they are simply not (or not yet) officially recognized as "partners" of the government, and are not financed by taxpayers' money. Under the post-1984 system, the Roman Catholic Church receives more money than ever before, and most participating minorities also receive enough funds to not only take care of their activities in Italy, but also finance some of their activities abroad.

The 1980s also saw a change in Italy's religious map following a massive influx of foreign immigrants, mostly from Africa and Asia, and later from Eastern Europe, both for economic reasons, and because of new legal developments making it easier both to leave post-Communist European countries and to enter Italy. As a result, what had been quite small minorities grew into substantial religious bodies. The Sunni Muslims (fewer than 1,000 in the 1960s), for instance, had reached 580,000 by the year 2000, while the number of Eastern Orthodox Christians rose from 15,000 to 150,000, as a result of the increased number of Eastern European immigrants (particularly Romanian) entering Italy after 1989. Buddhism also grew, although there are more Italian (74,000) than immigrant (25,000) Buddhists, due primarily to the quite remarkable development of Soka Gakkai (which numbers at present some 21,000 members). Some groups of Indian origin, particularly those connected with the SATHYA SAI BABA MOVEMENT and the OSHO COMMUNE INTERNATIONAL founded by Osho Rajneesh (1931–1990), have also been quite successful in Italy. Although statistics about the CHURCH OF SCIENTOLOGY are notoriously intractable and controversial, it is quite likely that more people attend Scientology courses in Italy than anywhere else in Europe. There are also some 13,500 members of esoteric and occult groups, with Damanhur (in Piedmont) being probably the largest residential esoteric community in the world, comprising some 500 “citizens” living communally in its main center.

Among Italian citizens, active Roman Catholics represent roughly one third of the population, with some 20,000 “fringe Catholics,” members of movements not recognized by the bishops as part of the Catholic fold (half of them members of LA MISSIONE–LUIGIA PAPARELLI). Non-Catholics represent 1.92 percent of Italian passport holders residing in Italy, as follows:

Fringe Catholics	20,000
Eastern Orthodox Christians	20,000
Protestants	363,000
Jews	35,000
Jehovah’s Witnesses (and splinter groups)	400,000
Other Christian Groups	24,000
Muslims	10,000
Baha’is and Other Middle Eastern Groups	3,000
Hindus and Neo-Hindus	15,000
Buddhists	74,000
Osho-related Groups	4,000
Sikhs, Radhasoamis, and Derivations	1,500
Other Far Eastern Groups	800
Non-Buddhist Japanese New Religions	2,500
Ancient Wisdom and Esoteric Groups	13,500
Human Potential Movements	100,000
New Age Movements	20,000
Others	4,000
Total	1,110,300

On the other hand, in addition to some 400,000 Catholic immigrants, there are also currently more than 900,000 non-Catholic immigrants on Italian soil, namely:

Muslims	580,000
Eastern Orthodox Christians	140,000
Protestants	50,000
Buddhists	25,000
Hindus	10,000
Sikhs, Radhasoamis	6,000
Other Far Eastern Religions and Groups	10,000
Jews	4,000
Jehovah’s Witnesses	2,000
Others	10,000

As a consequence, non-Catholic minorities constitute 3.5 percent of the entire population present on the Italian territory. Catholic church attendance in Italy is among the highest in Europe. After a decline in the 1960s and 1970s, the trend was reversed, and Sunday attendance started growing again from the late 1980s on, reaching 35 percent by the year 2000. In this sense, Italy seems to represent a solid confirmation of rational choice theories. Legal limitation of pluralism from the 1950s to the 1980s corresponded to a decline in general church attendance and to a greater increase in membership figures for groups in fringe niches (particularly Jehovah’s Witnesses). The legal and practical establishment of an effective religious pluralism in the 1980s, on the other hand, led to a renewed interest in religion and church attendance in general, while groups such as the Jehovah’s Witnesses experienced a slower growth rate.

As everywhere else in Europe, the tragic events of 2001 have worsened the already prevailing tensions between sections of the Italian population who are suspicious of Islam in general and the Muslim minority, as well as making the prospects of a concordat with one or more of the largest Italian Islamic organizations even more difficult. On the other hand, both the Italian legal system (plus reminiscences of the Fascist persecution of minorities, which created in 1930 under the name of plagio a criminal offense very similar to what would later be called brainwashing; in 1981, the existence of such provision in Italian law was declared contrary to the democratic constitution by the Constitutional Court) and the visible presence in the media of a number of scholars of new religious movements who are critical of the anticult movement (most of them associated with CESNUR, the Center for Studies of New Religions, established in Turin in 1988) have so far prevented in Italy any significant anticult scare of the kind prevalent in other European countries, such as neighboring France. Although both secular and Catholic opposition to such groups as the Jehovah’s Witnesses and the Church of Scientology does exist in Italy, its institutional influence has so far been comparatively limited.

Massimo Introvigne

Sources:

Introvigne, Massimo, PierLuigi Zoccatelli, Nelly Ippolito Macrina, and Verónica Roldán, Enciclopedia delle Religioni in Italia.

Torino: Elledici, 2001.

Center for Studies on New Religions, Torino, Italy. Posted at <http://www.cesnur.org>. Accessed September 25, 2001.

Ivory Coast [Côte d’Ivoire]

The land now known as Côte d’Ivoire (Ivory Coast) was originally settled by a variety of African peoples, the major groups being the Kru, Akan, Volta, Mande, and Malinke. Those people along the coast had by the fifteenth century made contact with Europeans, and two states that had formed in the southernmost part of the land, along the coast (Aigini), and somewhat inland (Atokpora), developed trading relationships with the Europeans. The European name of the area came from the trade in elephant tusks.

In the eighteenth century, the region was invaded by a group of Ashanti people from Ghana, the supporters of Queen Awa Poku (a loser in Ashanti political struggles), who established themselves in the central part of the region. Over the next century, the Ashanti grew powerful and expanded to the point that they began to put pressure on Aigini and Atokpora, who requested the French to come into the region as their protector. In return, the French assumed exclusive rights to the coastal trading centers in 1843.

Several decades later the French moved inland in an attempt to tie together their West African territories. Plans were thwarted for a generation by a strong nation that had been established in the region where Guinea and Côte d'Ivoire come together. Only after a war that lasted a quarter of a century was the region pacified and (in 1895) French West Africa established, made up of Senegal, Guinea, Mali, and Côte d'Ivoire. Other lands were added later.

French West Africa was dismantled in the late 1950s, and by the 1960s its various components had emerged as independent nations. Felix Houphouët-Boigny (1905–1993), a physician and head of one of the independence-oriented political parties, was named the new president of Côte d'Ivoire and was regularly reelected until his death in 1993. He was succeeded by Henri Konan Bedie, who remains in office.

The various peoples of the country, who are further divided into more than eighty subgroups, each possess a different traditional religion, which plays a role in defining them as a people and providing a degree of communal cohesion. Typical of the traditional religions is that of the Dan people, who call the Creator God Zra. Zra is the Creator, from whom all spiritual entities come. The other spirit beings are good, with one exception, Kogbin-dy. Kogbin-dy encourages the practice of malevolent magic, or witchcraft. Zra, assisted by Zole-dy, fights against witchcraft. Various other spirit entities also contribute to the elimination of malevolent magic from among the people.

Status of religions in the Ivory Coast, 2000–2050

Followers	2000			2025	2050
	total	%	rate
Ethnoreligionists	5,555,000	37.6	2.13	7,300,000	7,700,000
Christians	4,702,000	31.8	2.58	8,076,000	11,378,000
Roman Catholics	2,183,000	14.8	2.57	3,750,000	5,460,000
Independents	1,373,000	9.3	2.82	2,500,000	3,600,000
Protestants	760,000	5.1	2.74	1,400,000	2,000,000
Muslims	4,445,000	30.1	2.63	7,773,000	11,000,000
Nonreligious	50,800	0.3	3.79	120,000	250,000
Baha'is	22,300	0.2	3.37	50,000	90,000
Hindus	8,300	0.1	2.29	18,000	40,000
other religionists	3,500	0.0	1.53	8,000	12,000
Total population	14,786,000	100.0	2.43	23,345,000	30,470,000

Côte d'Ivoire is one of the African lands in which traditional religions have retained the strongest presence. Figures vary, but suggest that from one-third to one-half of the population continue to practice one of the African religions, especially in the lands in the north farthest from the coast. Traditional religions came under heavy onslaught through the twentieth century from both Islam and Christianity.

Christianity was introduced by French missionaries in 1637, but conditions hostile to Europeans served as barriers to permanent work. Thus it was not until after France established its protectorate among the peoples of the south that a permanent mission of the ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH was created. In 1895 a prefecture was created, and the African Mission of Lyon accepted responsibility for a systematic program of evangelism. Work progressed quickly, and in 1911 a prefecture was created in Korhogo in the north. From this point, the work proceeded along a common pattern, with the first indigenous priest ordained in 1934 and the first archbishop from the country consecrated in 1960. The church's strength lies in the several urban areas; it is especially strong in the capital, Abidjan.

Protestantism was introduced after World War I. British Methodists entered in 1924, and their work grew into the PROTESTANT METHODIST CHURCH IN CÔTE D'IVOIRE. It was followed by the French Baptists (Bible Mission) and Americans with the CHRISTIAN AND MISSIONARY ALLIANCE. The World Evangelism Crusade (WEC) from Great Britain came in 1934. These groups worked out agreements that cut down on competition, and to this day each resulting church is strongest in one part of the country and has a membership mostly among certain peoples. The Église Protestante du Centre, the church that has emerged from the work of the WEC, for example, draws most of its membership from the Dan, Bete, Wobe, and Ngege people

Beginning in the 1930s and continuing to the present, new groups have entered, including the SEVENTH-DAY ADVENTIST CHURCH, the Free Will Baptists, CBAMERICA, and the ASSEMBLIES OF GOD. The JEHOVAH'S WITNESSES began work in 1924. Nigerian traders who were Christians established an outpost of the NIGERIAN BAPTIST CONVENTION in Abidjan in 1930.

The more conservative of the Protestant and Free Church denominations have formed the Évangélique de la Côte d'Ivoire, which is associated with the Association of Evangelicals of Africa and the WORLD EVANGELICAL ALLIANCE. The Protestant Methodist Church is the only Côte d'Ivoire church that is a member of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES.

Côte d'Ivoire has been one area strongly influenced by the rise of African Initiated Churches. One church in particular, the HARRIST CHURCH, founded by William Wade Harris in the years immediately preceding World War I, grew dramatically in the 1920s and 1930s and became the largest church in the country apart from the Roman Catholic Church. A second church, DEIMA CHURCH (Ashes of Purification Church), was formed in 1922 by former Roman Catholics under the leadership of a woman named Lalou, who has assumed the title of pope. The Methodists experienced a schism in 1932 when the prophet Boto Adai (d. 1963) began to work among them. His preaching led to the creation of the Église Adaïste. Additional groups have come into the country from Ghana and Nigeria.

Beginning with the establishment of French West Africa, people from Mali and Burkina Faso began to move into Côte d'Ivoire and to bring Islam, primarily of the MALIKITE school. In the twentieth century it established bases among the Malinke, Bambara, Senufo, and Minianka peoples, and it has been aggressively evangelistic. It appears that by the late twentieth century Islam had moved ahead of Christianity (both Catholic and Protestant), and Muslims now constitute approximately 25 percent of the population (approximately twice the percentage of Christians).

The city of Bondoukou, which has thirty-two mosques, is the informal center of Islam in the country. Organizational unity is provided by the Islamic High Council (Conseil Supérieur Islamique), which makes policy decisions for the Muslim community. There is also a small presence of the AHMADIYYA MOVEMENT and the BAHÁ'Í FAITH. The ANCIENT AND MYSTICAL ORDER ROSAE CRUCIS has established a small but dedicated following.

Sources:

Bissett, V. Les sectes et l'esprit sectaire. Abidjan, Ivory Coast:

Coopération et documentation missionnaires, 1992.

Haliburton, G. M. The Prophet Harris: A Study of an African Prophet and His Mass-Movement in the Ivory Coast and the Gold Coast, 1913–1915. London: Longmans, 1971.

La vie religieuse en Afrique: recherche en Côte d'Ivoire. Abidjan, Ivory Coast: INADES, 1983.

Schreiber, D. "The Urban Muslims of Ivory Coast." Urban Mission 3, 3 (Jan. 1986): 39–43.

Izumo Ōyashirokyō

Izumo Ōyashirokyō, one of the oldest of Japanese new religions, was founded by Senge Takatomi (1845–1917). In 1873 Senge, a Shinto priest of Izumo Taisha (the Grand Shrine of Izumo), gathered like-minded shrine adherents into a voluntary religious association, meeting at the shrine but organizationally distinct from it. This association was finally authorized by the government in 1882. The main deity of this sect is Ōkuninushi no Kami, the mystical ruler of the nether world. Prayer to unite with Kami though reciting Shingo (words of Kami) and Okunigaeri (a religious pilgrimage to Izumo Taisha) are of importance in its practices. Its main scriptures are Kyōshi Taiyō, Daidō Yōgi, Daidō Mondō, Izumo Mondō, and Sōsaisiki.

The current leader of Izumo Ōyashirokyō is Senge Michihiko. As the new century began it reported 1,236,771 members.

Address:

Izumo Ōyashirokyō

Taish-machi

Hikawa-gun, Shimane prefecture

699-07

Japan

Keishin Inaba

Source:

Hori, Ichiro, et al., eds. Japanese Religion: A Survey by the Agency for Cultural Affairs. Tokyo: Kodansha International, 1972.

JAINISM

Jainism is generally seen as a reaction to the leadership of the Hindu community by the elite Brahman caste in the sixth century B.C.E. The name, Jain, derives from jina (victory), a reference to their founder Mahavira who was called the Victor. Jains are disciples of the Victor.

Many Jains reject the contemporary scholarship on their religion's origins and point instead to a lineage of twenty-four saints, the Tirthanikaras, which include one female, Mallinatha. The twenty-second in the lineage, Nemi, is reputed to have lived for a thousand years, just one of the attributions ascribed to the saints that have caused many to see them as mythological rather than historical beings. History begins with Parsva (b. c. 872 B.C.E.), the son of the ruler of Benares, India. As a young man he became a notable soldier and the husband of a princess. However, during his thirtieth year he renounced his royal life and became an ascetic. He wandered India and as disciples came to him he laid out a life based on four vows—do not take life, do not lie, do not steal, and do not own property. He died in Bengal, and the place of his death, Mount Sammeda, remains a site of pilgrimage and reverence to the Jain community.

Parsva was succeeded by Vardhamana (b. c. 599–c. 527 B.C.E.), later known as Mahavira, a member of the warrior caste. During most his life as a Jain, he lived without clothes, seen as a visible sign of his renunciation of worldly possessions. Spending some twelve years as an ascetic, he is said to have become the Victor over his worldly passions. The state of realization he attained is known as keval-jnana, considered to be perfect perception, knowledge, power, and bliss. He spent the next thirty years traveling on bare feet around India preaching to the people the eternal truth he had realized. He attracted people from all walks of life, both rich and poor, from royalty to untouchables. During his time, the largely monastic community assembled by Parsva was increased by the development of a lay community. Mahavira organized his followers into a four-fold order of monks (sadhu), nuns (sadhvi), laymen (shravak), and laywomen (shravika).

He also added a fifth vow—poverty—to the original four vows for the monks and nuns. These would form the basis of the main values of Jain life today: nonviolence (ahimsa), or the refusal to cause harm to any living things; truthfulness (satya), or the speaking only of harmless truth; non-stealing (asteya), not to take anything not properly given; chastity (brahmacharya), or refusal to indulge in sensual pleasures; non-possession (aparigraha), or detachment from people, places, and material things. Lay people were to value the vows but lead a somewhat less austere existence.

Jain teachings remained as an oral teachings for several centuries following Mahavira's death. They were finally given written form around 300 B.C.E. and these texts exist today as the Jain sacred writings.

The Jain community experienced growth for its first decade. Around 300 B.C.E., it split into two basic communities—the Svetambaras (who wore white cloths) and the Digambaras (air-clothed or unclothed)—and over the centuries each divided into a number of sub-sects. The community reached its peak in the twelfth century when the ruler of Gujarat was converted to Jainism by Hemecandra (1088–1172) and turned Gujarat into a Jain state. In the next century, however, the Muslim conquest of India began and further growth was largely blunted. Periodically, both Hindus and Muslims turned on the Jains.

The entrance to the Adishwarji Jain Temple in Mumbai, India (Helene Rogers/TRIP)

Jain Beliefs. The Jain teachings picture a three-story universe, the middle level being the realm of human existence. The goal of human life is to allow the soul to reach nirvana or the state of moska (liberation) pictured spatially as the top of the universe, where it can remain in a state of eternal bliss and peace. Commonly at the end of life one goes to the lower realm, a dark place where they are punished for various misdeeds. There is also a heavenly realm of the gods and saints, but it is not one's goal.

The earthly realm is the realm of human action. The human soul is seen as consisting of a set of jivas, or immaterial monads. These monads are intermixed with karma (consequences of one actions), which are pictured as particles. Karmic matter (ajiva) gives color to the monads. Colors (leysas) range from the worst black to blue, gray, red, yellow, rose, and white. Each color is associated with characteristics. A black color to one's jivas is indicative of cruelty, while a person of a dispassionate and impartial nature is seen as having yellow as their predominant color. All actions produce karma, even good ones, thus the ideal is non-action and detachment.

The Jain understanding of the goal of life has ensured that ethics is of primary importance in the individual's life. The person ready to become a full member of the community must first profess faith in the teachings of the Jain saints and then renounce all attachments to other religions. That having been done, they are ready to take the twelve vows. They vow (1) not intentionally to take life, especially of a jiva (ahimsa); (2) not to lie or exaggerate (satya); (3) not to steal (achaurya); (4) refrain from marital unfaithfulness and unchaste thoughts (bhramacharya); (5) limit accumulation of possessions and give away extras (aparigraha); (6) consciously limit oneself so as to decrease the possibility of committing transgressions (dik); (7) limit the number of both consumable and non-consumable items in one's possession (bhoga-upbhoga); (8) avoid unnecessary evil (anartha-danda); (9) observe periods of meditation (samayik); (10) observe periods of self-imposed limitations (desavakasika); (11) to live for a period as an ascetic or monk (pausadha); and support the monastic community (atithi samvibhaga).

The Jain vows carry some general implications for living one's life. Jains are vegetarians and do not even consume eggs. They refrain from any occupations that involve the destruction of living creatures even farming, which may harm living creatures in the process of plowing and planting, is avoided. Business and scholarship are more acceptable. The monastic life is most preferred.

Monks, recognized by their shaved heads, are organized into communities each headed by an acarya, or superior, who possesses the authority for structuring the community and overseeing instruction. Monks and nuns tend to itinerate around the countryside. However, during the rainy season they will congregate for periods of concentrated study, practicing austerities, and meditation. Part of the rationale for staying inside at this time is protection of the many life forms brought out by the wet weather.

Following the Jain path ideally leads to heightened levels of self-realization. The five steps along the path to liberation are recognized as right perceptions (mati); clear scriptural knowledge (sruta); supernatural knowledge (avadhi); clear knowledge of the thought of others (manahpariyaya); and omniscience (kevala). Those who attain kevala are also identified as perfected ones (siddhas). Jains accept the idea of reincarnation and believe that the upward path may take many lifetimes. In the end, the fully realized soul will fly to the top of the universe and there reside in a karma-free condition.

To assist the process of life, the Jain life, and attaining heightened levels of realization, the Jain community has built numerous temples, which are identified with the Jain symbol, a swastika above which are three dots and a half moon. The swastika is an ancient symbol in Asia and has no relation to its modern adoption in the 1930s by the German Nazis. Temples may be the abode of statues of the saints, and veneration of the saints easily transforms into worship. In Digambara temples, the figures are depicted as nudes, standing with their eyes cast downward. In the Svetambara temples, the figures tend to be seated with their legs crossed. Both types of temples follow a cycle of ceremonies and rites.

Divisions within the Jain Community. The major division in the Jain community between the clothed and unclothed monks may go back even to the time of Mahavira and his living for so many years in a naked state. However, the formalization of the division became intertwined with a second problem—the writing down of the Jain scriptures. As generations came and went, Jain leaders pondered the problem created by having to memorize and pass on the scriptures and came to realize that material was continually being lost. Thus, around 300 B.C.E., they began the process of writing down and compiling what was remembered.

The decision to write down the scriptures was, in part, occasioned by events growing out of a great famine that spread through northern India. During this time, an important chief leader Bhadrabahu led a segment of the community to the south. While there, in the hills of Shravana Belgola, Bhadrabahu committed ritual suicide by starvation, a practice that was quite acceptable among the Jains for one already approaching the end of their life. After the famine ended, the group returned to the north only to discover that the monks had abandoned their life without clothes. They also realized that they had lost a segment of the Jain scripture, which Bhadrabahu had failed to teach to his successor.

Over the next centuries the division of the community around those monks who wore clothes and those who did not formally resulted in the separation of the Digambaras from the Svetambaras.

The Digambaras teach that nudity was integral to the teachings of Mahavira, and that it is completely in line with the observation argument that a monk should be devoid of any possessions (such as clothes) and devoid of the desire to protect his body from the elements. They depict Mahavira in complete nudity, without any ornamentation, with downcast eyes. They also teach that Mahavira never married and was celibate throughout his earthly existence.

Regarding the scriptures, the Digambaras teach that the words of Mahavira, reputedly contained in the eleven angas of the Jain canon, were lost forever during the famine as Bhadrabahu did not pass them on. Hence they refuse to accept the eleven angas of the Jain canon as owned by the Svetambaras and now form part of the 41 Sutras.

Finally, the digambaras hold that women cannot join the order of those in the renounced life as they were not qualified for the austere life the Order demanded from each of the adherents. Today the Digambaras are found mostly in the southern part of India, especially in Mysore state, where the group led by Bhadrabahu had journeyed some two thousand years ago. The modern Indian state has moved to limit the public nudity of the Digambara monks.

In contrast, the Svetambaras teach that some of the Tirthankaras (those of the lineage of saints) did not live life in the nude. Most importantly, Parsva, the saint immediately prior to Mahavira, wore white robes. They note that prior to his becoming an ascetic, Mahavira had lived a householder's life, that he had married and fathered a daughter, and that he did not become an ascetic until his parents had died and he had fulfilled his necessary family duties. They also make note of an incident in his life. He began his renounced life as a clothed monk until one day the white robe he wore was caught in a thorny bush, and as he moved on the robe was pulled off. Never holding on to worldly things, Mahavira simply left it and continued on his way naked. Thus, they argue, Mahavira's nudity was not consciously adopted but was an accident of the moment.

Regarding the scriptures, the Svetambara believe that the words of Mahavira were not lost during the great famine and accept the authority of accept the eleven angas of the Jain canon. They also believe that women can attain sainthood, calling to their cause the case of the nineteenth Tirthankara Malli, who was a female. Today the Svetambaras are located primarily in Gujarat and Rajasthan.

In modern times, both the Digambaras and the Svetambaras have divided into a number of sub-sects that go under such names as Sthanakavasi, Terapanthi, Beespanthi, Japneeya, and Murtipujak. Typically, a distinguishable sub-group within the Jain community consists of a group of monks, the temples and monasteries they operate, and the laypeople who support them.

The STHANAKAVASI JAIN TRADITION, for example, can be traced to the Gujarati Jain reformer Lumpaka (c. 1415–1489), who protested the lax practice of the Murtipujak Svetambara monks. Lumpaka worked as a scribe copying manuscripts for Jain monks. In his work he discovered that Jain scriptures do not mention any practice of giving money (for temple construction, for example) as a means to merit, the performance of worship before images, or rituals involving acts of violence such as the breaking of flowers. He rejected image-worship as well as the authority of several texts within the canonical texts that contain references to such worship. He began to live as an ascetic, following the oldest textual prescriptions. Lumpaka gained a following in Gujarat, which was continued by his first disciple, Bhana, who seems to have initiated some forty-five followers during the 1470s.

Early in the sixteenth century, the Sthanakavasi split into several groups, which by mid-century had become some thirteen independent branches, which further divided into additional distinct sub-groups, however, by the twentieth century, only four branches remained in existence.

The TERAPANTH SVETAMBARA JAIN TRADITION was founded by Acarya Bhiksu (1726–1803), who had become attached to an acarya of the sub-sects of the Sthanakavasi tradition in the 1750s. Then, in 1760, complaining of the laxity of the Sthanakavasis, he founded his own order at Kelva near Rajsamand. In its early years, the new order attracted only thirteen male members (including Bhiksu), and his critics labeled his group the path of the thirteen, or terah panth. Bhiksu turned the label to his favor by slightly changing it to tera panth, or your path.

Underlying the original break was a disagreement over the understanding of the Jain teaching on karma. Jains believe that the soul must renounce all violence (and ultimately all action) to achieve liberation from karma. The Sthanakavasis also emphasize the role of compassion as a religious virtue and suggest that, for example, charitable actions have a positive karmic result. In contrast, Bhiksu assumed a more narrow interpretation based upon the understanding that bad karma and good karma equally obstructed the process of liberation and hence both must be avoided. Thus, he reasoned, acts of compassion were sinful.

Contemporary Jain Communities. Today, in India, the followers of Jainism engage primarily in business and trade. The committed are known for their fasting, non-violence, vegetarianism, philanthropy, and simple lifestyle. They do not make the sharp break with the Hindu community (as for example the Buddhists and Sikhs do), and in turn the Hindu majority do see them as a sister community.

Through the twentieth century, Jain communities have been established around the world. Among the earliest appearances of Jains outside of India, one occurred in 1893 when Virchand Gandhi made a presentation at the Parliament of the World Religions in Chicago. His travel to Chicago was opposed by many of his colleagues who believed that travel by any means other than on foot was immoral. He would be followed by a few others, such as Champat Rai Jain who traveled to England in the 1930s, but no communities emerged until after World War II. Migration to England began in the 1950s, and by the 1990s there were some 30,000 in the United Kingdom, most from Gujarat and they have been organized into the Federation of Jain Organisations (11 Lindsay Dr., Kenton, Middlesex HA3 0TA, UK).

Significant migration to North America began in the 1970s and centers have been opened in most states in the eastern half of the nation as well as Texas and California. These now cooperate (along with Canada centers) in the Federation of Jain Associations in North America (11403 Tortuga St., Cypress, CA 90630). Several Jain teachers have also come to the United States and founded organizations that reach out to the larger non-Indian population: the International Nahavir Jain Mission and the Jain Meditation International Center.

Jain centers and temples may also now be found in Australia, Singapore, Hong Kong, and Japan.

Sources:

- Babb, Lawrence A. Absent Lord: Ascetics and Kings in a Jain Ritual Culture. Berkeley, CA: University of California Press, 1996.
- Banks, M. Organizing Jainism in India and England. Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1992.
- Cort, John E. Jains in the World: Religious Values and Ideology in India. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2000.
- . Open Boundaries: Jain Communities and Cultures in Indian History. Albany: State University of New York Press, 1998.
- Dundas, Paul. The Jains. New York: Routledge, 1992.
- Jain, Muni. Jaina Sects and Schools. Delhi: Concept Publishing, 1975.
- Jain, Prem Suman. Essentials of Jainism. Boston: Jain Center of Greater Boston, 1984.
- Jaini, Padmanabh S. The Jaina Path of Purification. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1979.
- “Jainism: Jain Principles, Tradition and Practices.” Expansive site on Jainism posted at <http://www.cs.colostate.edu/~malaiya/jainhlinks.html>.
- Roy, A. K. History of the Jainas. Columbia, MO: South Asia Books, 1984.
- Sangave, Vilas. Jaina Religion and Community. Long Beach, CA: Long Beach Publications, 1996.
- Satyaprakash. Jainism: A Select Bibliography. (Subject Bibliography Series, Vol. 6) Gurgaon, Haryana: Indian Documentation Service, 1984.
- Shah, Natubhai. Jainism: The World of Conquerors. Portland: Sussex Academic Press, 1998.
- Tobias, Michael. Life Force: The World of Jainism. Berkeley, CA: Asian Humanities Press, 1991.
- Williams, Raymond. Religions of Immigrants from India and Pakistan: New Threads in the American Tapestry. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1988.

Jamaat-e-Islam

The Jamaat-e-Islam, a major organizational component of the international movement variously called ISLAMISM or, in the West, Islamic fundamentalism, was founded in 1941 by Sayyid Abul A'la Mawdudi (1903–1979). He was raised in a family that had for many years supplied leadership to the CHISTINIYYA SUFI ORDER in India. In his teen years he became a newspaper editor and began to participate in various Islamic movements that had emerged in the context of the British rule of India. Among these was the Khilafat Movement (1918–1924), whose aim was to save the then dying Ottoman Empire after the disasters of World War I. At the same time, it also promoted Muslim political interests in India.

Toward the end of the 1920s he wrote his first book, a study of war and peace in Islamic law. During the 1930s he began to concentrate on the issue of Islam's conflict with the West and the modern age. He offered a perspective based directly upon his study of the Qu'ran, the Muslim holy book, and the Hadith, the sayings of and traditions concerning the Prophet Muhammad. The more he looked at Western culture, the more he criticized fellow Muslims who were becoming westernized. Then toward the end of the decade he moved to the Punjab to establish a research center, Darul-Islam, to train scholars and to launch a reconstruction of Islamic thought.

The plan to reconstruct the Muslim perspective led to his founding of the Jamaat-e-Islam, a religious organization that could also operate as a political organization in the context of the changes about to overtake India. He moved to Pakistan in 1947 to work for the development of an Islamic state (in which Islamic law would be the law of the land). When his goals were not realized, he became an ongoing critic of the government, and was often arrested and imprisoned for expressing his antigovernment ideas. A prolific writer, he authored more than one hundred books and pamphlets during the next quarter of a century. With the partition of India into India and Pakistan in 1947, the Jamaat split into an Indian and a Pakistani section. Other related groups (but organizationally independent) were later founded in Kashmir, Bangladesh, Sri Lanka, and Afghanistan.

Around 1940, Mawdudi completed a brief work, A Short History of the Revivalist Movement in Islam, which, in perspective, can be seen as an early manifesto of Islamism. He presents Islam, the teachings delivered by the prophets from Adam to Muhammad, as focused upon the establishment of the kingdom of God on earth and the enforcement of the system of life Allah gave to humanity. The prophets sought to revolutionize the intellectual and mental outlook of the population, to regiment those peoples who had accepted Islam in the Islamic pattern, and to organize the various segments of social life on an Islamic basis.

The time of the establishment of the Muslim community by Muhammad (c. 570–632) was followed by the period of the “rightly guided caliphs.” However, “ignorance” crept into the rule of successive caliphs (as early as the 650s under the third caliph, Uthman) and hence in every age there has been a need for successive mujaddids, revivers of Islam, people who accomplish an extraordinary work in rejuvenating true Islam. A mujaddid must accomplish several tasks: diagnose his contemporary situation; define the place to strike the blow to break the power of un-Islam and allow Islam to again take hold; encounter the political forces attempting to suppress Islam; and take authority from un-Islam and in a practical manner reestablish government on the pattern of those initial “rightly guided caliphs.” This program is not just for one country; it aims for the establishment of Islam as the predominant force for all humankind. Ultimately, the instrument for carrying out this program would be the person known in Islamic theology as al-Mahdi, the coming one, whom Mawdudi saw as a modern revolutionary who would draw people to him by the quality of his life and his leadership ability. He will overcome ignorance and establish the Islamic state, not by any supernatural acts, but by statesmanship, political sagacity, and strategic skill.

The Jamaat developed an organization and program to embody the vision outlined by Mawdudi. It has been headed by an amir, the first being Mawdudi (1941–1972), and the Majlis-e Shura, a consultation council, a representative body drawn from the various segments of the membership. The amir is the supreme authority. Mawdudi was succeeded by Main Tufail Muhammad (1972–1989) and the present amir, Qazi Hussain Ahmad. The shura has control over all doctrinal issues and may by two-thirds vote veto the ruling of an amir. One of the senior members of the shura occupies the seat of the amir if it becomes vacant.

The Jamaat has a four-point program for the transformation of Islamic society. It begins in an appeal to reason, showing listeners how Islam can be effectively applied to the contemporary situation. The appeal to virtue reaches out to those people already predisposed to the erecting of a just and upright society. The educational efforts give birth to a program of social reform. To this end, the Jamaat has created a variety of agencies, including educational institutions, programs for moral uplift, and charities to help the weaker members of society.

The fourth aspect of the program looks for the actual change of leadership in society, beginning with intellectual, social, and cultural leaders and culminating in political leaders. Looking for long-term transformation, the Jamaat trains the more capable among its members in its conservative view of Islam so that they can then assume the leadership roles in society. In this manner, the Jamaat attempts to affect all dimensions of human life.

The work of the Jamaat-e-Islam has been significantly extended by the formation of a set of autonomous but ideologically aligned institutions. One group of organizations deals with publication of Islamic material. Among several such organizations is Islamic Publications Ltd. Lahore. The Jamaat also seeks to found organizations dedicated to bringing Islam into various specialized groups (including different occupations). Among the first Jamaat-affiliated groups was the Islami Jamiat-e Talaba, the student organization, founded in 1947.

The Jamaat has come to include a broad range of conservative Muslims in Pakistan. Following the bombing of the World Trade Center in New York City and the Pentagon in suburban Washington, D.C., on September 11, 2001, members of the Jamaat have been generally supportive of the Taliban and Al Qaeda. Following the threat of the United States launching military operations in Afghanistan, the current leader of Jamaat-e-Islam, Qazi Hussain Ahmad, was quoted as saying, "Any attack on Afghanistan is an attack on Pakistan, and we will resist it."

Internationally, the Jamaat has been active in supporting like-minded groups around the world, from Kashmir and Afghanistan to Bosnia and the Philippines. These groups include those that bear its name in different countries and other groups of the Islamist movement such as Hamas (Palestine), Ma'Shoomi (Indonesia), the Islamic Party of Malaysia, and al To'iah-al Islamia (Kuwait). Specific outreach efforts of the Jamaat include the UK Islamic Mission, the Islamic Foundation in Europe, and the Muslim Student's Association of the U.S. and Canada (MSA). In 1983 MSA created the Islamic Society of North America as an umbrella structure to coordinate the many Islamic organizations that had been founded by MSA in North America. The latter has become well known for its nurturing of a variety of associations of Islamic scholars and professionals. The Jamaat has associated groups in France, Spain, and Japan, and throughout Latin America.

The Jamaat-e-Islam is to be distinguished from another Pakistani group, the Jamiat-ul-Ulema-e-Pakistan, a more extreme group that is known for signing the fatwa (literally, declaration on a legal matter) against the United States issued by Osama bin Laden in 1998.

Address:

Jamaat-e-Islam
c/o The General Secretary, Mansura Multan Rd.
Lahore 54570
Pakistan
<http://www.jamaat.org/world>

Sources:

- Esposito, John, ed. Voice of the Resurgent Islam. New York: Oxford University Press, 1983.
- Jansen, Johannes J. The Dual Nature of Islamic Fundamentalism. Ithaca, NY: Cornell University Press, 1996.
- Kramer, Martin. "Fundamentalist Islam at Large: The Drive for Power." Middle East Quarterly (June 1996). Posted at <http://www.meforum.org/meq/june96/kramer.shtml>. Accessed November 1, 2001.
- Mawdudi, Sayyid Abul al-Mawdudi, A Short History of the Revivalist Movement in Islam. Delhi: Markazi Maktaba Islami, 1972.

Jamaica

When Christopher Columbus first traveled along the Jamaican coast in the 1490s, he found the land inhabited by the Arawaks, who had taken over the island from its earlier inhabitants, the Guanahatabeys. Diego Colon (Columbus's son) conquered Jamaica for Spain, an event that proved disastrous for the Arawaks, who over the next two centuries were largely eliminated. Spain began the development of a plantation culture, but by the 1590s were under constant threat from the British. The British took control in 1655, and in subsequent years the island became the headquarters of British privateers (licensed pirates).

During the eighteenth century, the British fought the Maroons, those Africans who escaped slavery and formed free Black communities in the central highlands. Some 200,000 Africans came to live on the island, most working in the sugar mills. Slavery was ended in 1838, but the end of slavery was followed by widespread poverty and sporadic periods of unrest.

Jamaica was given internal autonomy in 1959 and full independence in 1962. The great majority of the residents are of African descent.

Status of religions in Jamaica, 2000-2050

Followers	2000			2025	2050
	total	%	rate
Christians	2,171,000	84.1	0.76	2,630,000	2,978,000
Protestants	643,000	24.9	0.80	750,000	880,000
Independents	232,000	9.0	0.76	270,000	320,000
Roman Catholics	110,000	4.3	-0.36	115,000	120,000
Spiritists	260,000	10.1	1.22	360,000	450,000
Nonreligious	99,800	3.9	2.27	180,000	270,000
Hindus	30,700	1.2	1.27	44,000	60,000
Baha'is	7,500	0.3	1.54	12,000	18,000
Chinese folk-religionists	7,100	0.3	1.33	9,000	12,000
Muslims	3,200	0.1	0.51	3,500	4,500
Atheists	780	0.0	1.77	1,300	2,000
Jews	510	0.0	-1.59	400	400
Buddhists	320	0.0	0.52	300	300
other religionists	2,600	0.1	2.35	4,500	6,000
Total population	2,583,000	100.0	0.87	3,245,000	3,801,000

Christianity was brought to Jamaica by the Spanish at the beginning of the sixteenth century, and almost all of the residents were members of the ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH at the time of the British takeover. Prohibited for many years, the church was reestablished in 1837 when a contingent of Jesuits arrived just prior to slavery being discontinued. There is now an archbishop in Kingston and a bishop in Montego Bay.

The CHURCH OF ENGLAND was brought to the island by the British forces in the seventeenth century, though a bishop was not appointed for the land until 1824. Today, Anglican work has been incorporated in the CHURCH IN THE PROVINCE OF THE WEST INDIES. Interestingly enough, the next group to begin work on Jamaica were the FRIENDS (Quakers), though their work remained small until the Iowa Yearly Meeting (U.S.A.) began a mission in 1881. The Jamaica yearly meeting was organized in 1941.

Jamaica benefited from the beginning of the world Protestant missionary movement, whose initial phase (carried out by the Moravians and Methodists) was directed toward the Caribbean region. Moravians arrived in Jamaica in 1754 and the Methodists in 1789. Moravian work began at the request of two British members who owned land in Jamaica. The first missionary was to instruct the Africans residing on the two plantations. The work soon spread to neighboring plantations, and from there the MORAVIAN CHURCH IN JAMAICA emerged. Methodist bishop Thomas Coke (1747–1814) visited Kingston early in 1789, and before the year was out William Hammett arrived from the United States to launch the Methodist mission (which remained under the authority of the British Conference). That church is now a part of the larger METHODIST CHURCH IN THE CARIBBEAN AND THE AMERICAS. Both churches benefited from their opposition to slavery.

In the meantime, in 1782, George Lisle (c. 1750–1828), a former slave in the American colonies, left the territory of the emerging United States with the British who had been driven out by the Revolution. He had been a Baptist preacher, and in Jamaica he founded the Baptist church, which has become the source of two of the largest religious bodies in the country—the more staid Jamaica Baptist Union and the charismatic Revival Zion, which came to the fore in 1860 as the center of a nationwide revival movement.

Toward the end of the nineteenth century, the SEVENTH-DAY ADVENTIST CHURCH began work, which has enjoyed great success in the twentieth century. Presbyterians, Congregationalists, and the Christian Church (Disciples of Christ) merged in 1956 to form the UNITED CHURCH IN JAMAICA AND THE CAYMAN ISLANDS.

Jamaica was close enough to the United States that a spectrum of Protestant churches began work and now contribute to the pluralistic atmosphere that pervades the land. There are a number of Pentecostal churches that compete for members, though no one has emerged as a significantly larger group. There are several churches founded in Jamaica, though fewer than in other countries, perhaps because indigenous leadership developed in the older churches through the nineteenth century.

Many of the older churches relate to each other through the Jamaica Council of Churches (which also includes the Roman Catholics). It is affiliated with the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES. Many of the newer, more conservative churches are affiliated to the Jamaica Association of Evangelicals, which is associated with the WORLD EVANGELICAL ALLIANCE.

Jamaica is home to a variety of groups that are part of its unique history. Early in the twentieth century, Marcus Garvey (1887–1940) organized a movement, the Universal Negro Improvement Association, to end discrimination against African people throughout the Western world. His effort led to a new emphasis on Jamaicans' African heritage, and an interest developed in Ethiopia (the term often referring to the nation of Abyssinia and at times to Africa in general). One result of the Garvey movement was the founding of several groups with claims to an Ethiopian heritage, including the ETHIOPIAN ORTHODOX TEWAHEDO CHURCH (with headquarters in Addis Ababa) and the ETHIOPIAN ZION COPTIC CHURCH, with more dubious connection to Africa.

The most famous Ethiopian movement was RASTAFARIANISM. In 1927, Garvey predicted the crowning of a black king in Africa whose emergence would be a sign of the coming redemption of Africans in the Western world from their situation. Eight years later, the coronation of Haile Selassie appeared to many to be confirmation of the prophecy. In addition, several ministers in Jamaica saw the new emperor as the fulfillment of several biblical prophecies. The members of the movement soon ran into trouble with officials when Leonard Howell was arrested for circulating pictures of Haile Selassie and telling people that they were passports back to Africa.

Through the next decades, the Rastafarians became known for their dreadlocks (hair styled to resemble a lion's mane), their use of marijuana (or ganja, as they called it), and their liberation-oriented music (reggae), which has transcended their movement to become popular internationally. Some of the early Rastafarians had been members of the Bedwardian Movement, started by the prophet Alexander Bedward in August Town. Bedward offered miraculous cures to people, whom he dipped in the nearby Hope River. In the early 1900s, he found a huge islandwide following and was later immortalized in the folksong "Slide Mongoose."

Jamaica has become home to a variety of West African religions that have survived with a Roman Catholic overlay and are today known as SANTERÍA or the Obeah movement, distinguished by the experience of possession by the deities, shared by both leaders and lay members. Equally interesting are the SPIRITUAL BAPTISTS, a group that mixes African and Protestant Christian elements. Those religions that have incorporated African elements appear to have a bright future in Jamaica.

There is a small community of Jews (Sephardic), one mosque serving some East Indian and Syrian residents, and a growing number of spiritual assemblies of the BAHÁ'Í FAITH. Many of the east Indians are Hindus, who gather at the Prema Satsangh in Kingston. Other Hindu groups include the ANANDA MARGA YOGA SOCIETY, the BRAHMA KUMARIS, and the INTERNATIONAL SOCIETY FOR KRISHNA CONSCIOUSNESS. Among the new religions, the CHURCH OF SCIENTOLOGY and the UNIFICATION MOVEMENT have centers.

Sources:

Gordon, S. C. God Almighty Make Me Free: Christianity in Preemancipation Jamaica. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1996.

McGasvran, D. A. Church Growth in Jamaica. Lucknow, India: Lucknow Publishing House, 1961.

Moorish, I. Obeah, Christ, and Rastaman: Jamaica and Its Religion. Cambridge, UK: J. Clark, 1982.

Simpson, G. E. Black Religions in the New World. New York: Columbia University Press, 1978.

Stewart, R. J. Religion and Society in Post-Emancipation Jamaica. Knoxville: University of Tennessee Press, 1992.

Jamaica Baptist Union

At the end of the American Revolution, in 1782, George Lisle (c. 1750–1828), an ex-slave who had formed the first African American Baptist congregation in the American colonies, left Savannah, Georgia. Traveling with the retreating British troops he arrived in Kingston, Jamaica. His letter of recommendation secured him a job in Spanish Town, and in his spare time he began preaching. Within a year he had formed the first Baptist congregation in Jamaica. Over the next twenty years, in spite of the difficulties imposed by the slavery system, he had led in the founding of churches across the island. Early in the new century, several of the preachers he had recruited began to correspond with the Baptist Missionary Society (BMS) in England.

In 1814, John Rowe arrived from England to establish formal contact between the British and their Jamaican counterpart. The BMS began to send missionaries, whose work further spread the movement. A major obstacle developed in 1831 when a slave insurrection was identified with the Baptist church members, most of whom were slaves. The plantation owners reacted by burning many Baptist (and Methodist) chapels. The insurrection became a factor in ending slavery throughout the British Empire, and former missionaries from Jamaica became effective advocates of abolition in their homeland. The resulting abolition of slavery in 1833 and full emancipation for African residents in Jamaica allowed the Baptists a new beginning. Missionaries William Knibb, Thomas Burchell, and James Philippon led in the founding of communities of freedmen, in which former slaves were given plots of land to farm. Also, by owning land they became able to vote.

In 1842, Jamaican Baptists, then organized into an Eastern and a Western Union, declared their independence from the BMS. They founded the Jamaica Baptist Missionary Society, and the following year, the society sent its first missionaries to Africa. It later supplied missionaries for various locations around the Caribbean. In 1843, the Jamaican Baptists also established Calabar Theological College, the fountainhead of an education system that eventually crisscrossed the island. Finally, in 1849, the Eastern and Western Unions united to form the Jamaica Baptist Union.

Through the nineteenth century, missionaries from England continued to assist the Jamaican Baptists. In 1892, the salaries for these missionaries were finally withdrawn by the BMS. The loss of funds from England began an era of painful transition that resulted in a net membership loss over the first half of the twentieth century, not an unimportant part due to the migration of large numbers of Jamaicans to Central America. Some turnaround occurred after World War II.

Japan

The Jamaica Baptist Union is an ecumenically oriented body. It joined the BAPTIST WORLD ALLIANCE at the time of its founding, and is today a member of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES. In 1910, it formed an Evangelical Council with the Methodists, Presbyterians, and Anglicans. In 1966, Calabar College merged into the newly formed cooperative United Theological College of the West Indies, whose campus is adjacent to the University of the West Indies in Kingston.

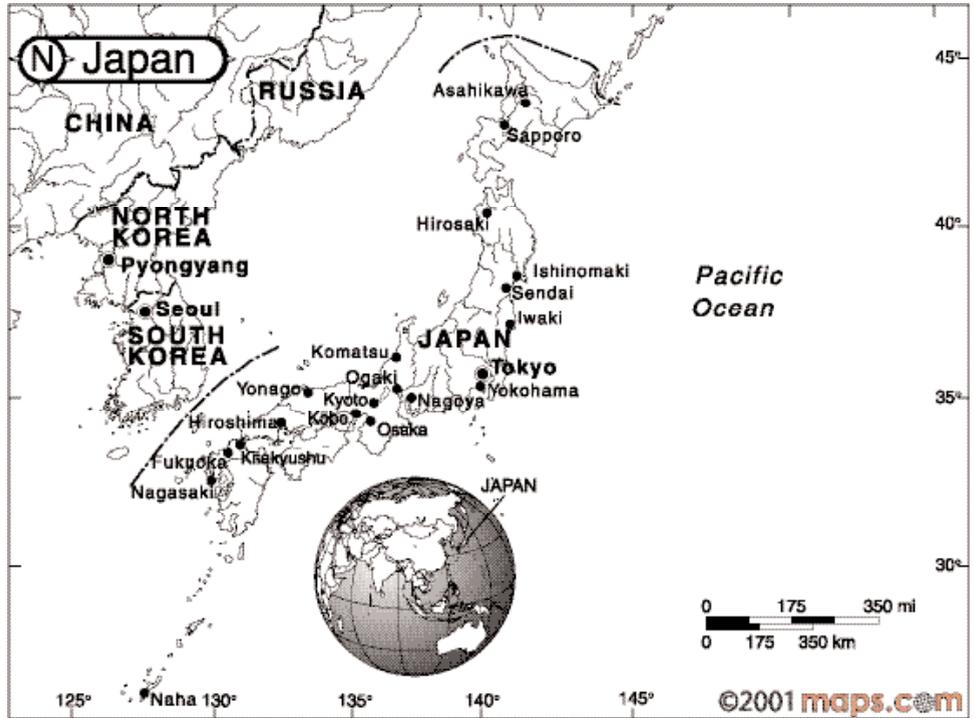

The union is organized congregationally. Many churches, unable to support a full-time pastor, are organized into circuits that share ministerial leadership. A president and other executive officers are elected at the annual meetings of the union.

Address:

Jamaica Baptist Union
6 Hope Road
Kingston 10
Jamaica

Sources:

Russell, Horace O. The Baptist Witness. El Paso, TX: Carib Baptist Publications, 1983.
———. Foundations and Anticipations: The Jamaica Baptist Story, 1783–1892. Columbus, GA: Brentwood Christian Press, 1993.
Sibley, Inez Knibb. The Baptists of Jamaica. Kingston: Jamaica Baptist Union, 1965.

Status of religions in Japan, 2000-2050

Followers	2000			2025	2050
	total	%	rate
Buddhists	69,931,000	55.2	0.19	61,994,000	48,162,000
Neoreligionists	32,828,000	25.9	0.38	32,500,000	29,000,000
Nonreligious	12,906,000	10.2	0.40	14,000,000	13,500,000
Christians	4,560,000	3.6	0.41	5,000,000	5,500,000
Independents	1,600,000	1.3	0.58	1,800,000	2,000,000
Marginal Christians	720,000	0.6	0.57	850,000	1,000,000
Protestants	571,000	0.5	0.56	600,000	650,000
Atheists	3,642,000	2.9	0.69	5,500,000	7,000,000
Shintoists	2,669,000	2.1	-1.16	2,000,000	1,500,000
Muslims	178,000	0.1	1.10	220,000	260,000
Chinese folk-religionists	149,000	0.1	0.65	75,000	100,000
Confucianists	139,000	0.1	0.64	160,000	180,000
Hindus	24,200	0.0	1.44	40,000	60,000
Baha'is	15,600	0.0	0.79	25,000	38,000
Ethnoreligionists	9,900	0.0	0.94	15,000	20,000
Jews	1,600	0.0	-3.50	1,500	1,500
Total population	126,714,000	100.0	0.25	121,150,000	104,921,000

Japan

Japan has a complex religious history and structure comprising a number of organized religions, including Shinto, a tradition that developed in Japan with a specific focus on the Japanese situation, and Buddhism, which came to Japan from continental Asia in the sixth century C.E. It also has a continuing folk religious tradition centered on customs, beliefs, and practices that extend back thousands of years. The modern age has seen the emergence of a large number of new religious movements in response to the issues of modernization and cultural change, movements that speak to the needs of individuals in the modern day. Besides these religious influences, mention also should be made of Confucianism and Daoism, two Chinese traditions that entered Japan along with Buddhism and that, while not operating as separate traditions in Japan, have deeply influenced Japanese Buddhism and made their impression on the religious culture of Japan, and Christianity, which has been active in Japan since the mid-nineteenth century.

Although this complex array of traditions has produced immense variety in Japanese religious life, it has also produced many areas of unity and areas of interaction between the various traditions in the ordinary lives of people. This is especially evident in the two main historical traditions of Shinto and Buddhism, which have complemented each other ritually in the individual life cycle, Shinto being the most common operative religious system for commemorating births and for providing spiritual protection in the formative years of life, and Buddhism the commonly used religious framework for dealing with death, funerals, and the afterlife. Thus people may have affiliations to more than one tradition without feeling any sense of contradiction, while there is much shared ground within the traditions and the ways they function and serve people.

The indigenous prehistoric religion of Japan was based around the veneration of kami, a term that means god or deity, and may be either singular or plural. There were infinite numbers of kami, ranging from nature deities to the spirits of clan ancestors. The relationship between humans and kami was a reciprocal one, with humans venerating, praying to, and making offerings to the kami, whose role was to reciprocate by providing benefits, such as good harvests, and by overseeing the fortunes of the living. This indigenous tradition coalesced into a folk tradition centered around calendrical rituals, and eventually also into Shinto. The word Shinto means the way of the gods and indicates a tradition centered on myths which tell of the land and people of Japan being given life by the kami, who are considered as the protectors of Japan and as the ancestors of the Japanese imperial family. Such myths have, over the centuries, bound Shinto, the emperor, and the nation together and given Shinto a particularly nationalist orientation.

Buddhism entered Japan in the sixth century of the Common Era, along with various influences it had absorbed in China, including Daoist divination practices and Confucian ethical concepts affirming the importance of venerating one's elders and parents and placing great emphasis on caring for the spirits of the dead, who were worshipped as ancestors. Buddhism also brought with it a variety of practices and rituals that have influenced Japanese religion ever since, ranging from the study of scriptures to meditation, pilgrimage, and mortuary rituals. Buddhism received support from the imperial court and became a central element within the Japanese political system through much of Japanese history until the nineteenth century.

Japanese Buddhism is striking for the variety of sectarian developments and innovative leaders it has produced. In the early ninth century the monks Saichō (767–822) and Kūkai (774–835), respectively, established the TENDAI and SHINGON Buddhist sects, the former combining esoteric and exoteric elements and based on the teachings of the Lotus Sutra, and the latter centered on esotericism. Both introduced a reverence for mountains along with ascetic elements into their Buddhism. In the Kamakura period, between the late twelfth and the fourteenth centuries, a number of new Buddhist leaders emerged to establish new forms of Buddhism, including the RINZAI and SOTO ZEN traditions based on meditation practices and founded in Japan by Eisai (1141–1215) and Dōgen (1200–1253), respectively; the Pure Land sect founded by Hōnen (1133–1212) and the True PURE LAND sect founded by Shinran (1173–1262), both sects based in faith in the Buddha Amida; and the Nichiren sect established by the charismatic prophet Nichiren (1222–1282), who espoused a nationalistic form of Buddhism based on the Lotus Sutra.

Kiyomizu Temple in Kyoto, the main temple of the Kitahasso sect of Buddhism (Corel)

In the sixteenth century Japan also encountered Christianity through the activities of Catholic missionaries who were briefly successful in attracting converts there. However, in the early seventeenth century Japan's political rulers, fearing that Christianity would become a Trojan Horse leading to the subversion of their power and the development of colonialism, banned the religion completely. Between the seventeenth and nineteenth centuries the country was virtually closed to the outside world, while all Japanese people were forced to take an oath of allegiance to Buddhism and to conduct the funerals and memorial services of their ancestors at their local Buddhist temples. These rules transformed Buddhism into a de facto pillar of the state, gave it a monopoly on the performance of death rituals, and helped build a close bond between the Buddhist temple and the household and family structures, through which the ancestors were memorialized, a bond that has endured to this day.

In the mid-nineteenth century, Japan, forced to open up to the outside world, engaged in a process of modernization. The Meiji Restoration of 1868, which paved the way for the development of the modern Japanese state, led to sweeping changes in the socioreligious structure. Buddhism lost its privileged position, although its central role in dealing with death and the ancestors enabled it to retain substantial support from the populace, while Shinto was elevated to the status of a national religion. In the latter nineteenth and first half of the twentieth century, Shinto became part of the Japanese nationalist project, which led to the repression of dissident groups inside Japan (including religious movements) and to Japan's aggressive expansion beyond its own territory, and eventually to its engagement in World War II. After Japan's defeat and occupation by Allied forces, the links between the state and religion were broken, and a new constitution was enacted in 1946, which, for the first time in Japanese religious history, guaranteed religious freedom and allowed religions to operate free from state interference, but also without state support.

This change especially benefited the new religions, movements that began to emerge in Japan from the first half of the nineteenth century onwards, when rapid social and economic change and modernization led to much unease throughout society. A number of such movements arose, including KUROZUMIKYO, founded by the divinely inspired Shinto priest Kurozumi Munetada (1780–1850) in 1814; TENRIKYO, founded by the female Nakayama Miki (1798–1887) in 1837; and ŌMOTO, founded by Deguchi Nao (1836–1918) in 1892. They were usually led by charismatic individuals claiming that they had received new truths for a new age from newly revealed deities, and often promising to bring about spiritual transformation in, and the eradication of injustice from, society. Often, too, these movements offered their followers readily accessible spiritual techniques of problem solving and healing, and thus managed to build large followings, especially in Japan's rapidly developing cities. The continuing emergence and development of new religions was a dominant feature of twentieth-century Japanese religion, with a variety of Buddhist-oriented movements such as SOKA GAKKAI INTERNATIONAL, REIYUKAI, and RISSHO KOSEI KAI developing in the 1920s and 1930s.

In post-war Japan, the continuing development of, and high levels of membership in, new religions has been one of the most prominent features of religious life. Many of the movements established in the prewar period developed mass followings, most notably Sōka Gakkai, which built a membership running into several millions while also establishing a national newspaper, a university, and a political party, the Kōmeitō, which is now independent of its religious parent but retains close links with it. The latter part of the twentieth century saw the rise of a new wave of new religions (called by many scholars new new religions), including Agonshū, a movement based on esoteric Buddhism and founded by Kiriya Seiyū (b. 1921), and Kōfuku no Kagaku, founded in 1986 by Ōkawa Ryūhō (b. 1956), who claims to be the incarnation of the Eternal Buddha who has come to transform the world spiritually. These movements have clear millennial orientations, attracting a following especially among young, well-educated urban Japanese who are deeply worried about the challenges to their cultural identity through the growth of Western influences in Japan and who are deeply concerned about threats posed to the planet by environmental problems and the threat of nuclear war.

In contemporary Japan the majority of Japanese describe themselves as being associated with both Shinto and Buddhism. Their primary association with Shinto is through festivals and community, life-cycle and calendar rituals, including the New Year's festival, in which over 80 million Japanese visit shrines at the start of the year to pay their respects to the kami and pray for good luck in the coming year. With Buddhism the primary link is through funerals, and household-based memorial rites for the ancestors. Yet at the same time, because these activities are predominantly social in orientation, many people who participate in them also describe themselves as not religious and have little other association with these traditions. Thus, although close to 90 percent of the population, according to surveys, participate in various cyclical rites at Buddhist temples connected with the ancestors, the numbers who are devotional adherents of the Buddhist sects is considerably lower. At the same time, however, many Shinto shrines and Buddhist temples have extensive clienteles who visit them regularly to pray for good luck, while pilgrimages, especially to Buddhist temples such as the eighty-eight pilgrimage temples on the island of Shikoku, are a popular form of devotionism that attracts large numbers of practitioners each year.

Although the traditional religions have struggled to retain a following in the modern era, the new religions—as the rapid growth of AGONSHU and KOFUKU NO KAGAKU, both of which have several hundred thousand followers, illustrates—have continued to attract support. In all it is estimated that perhaps 20 percent of the population (i.e., around 20 million people) may belong to a new religion. A further emerging religious development has been the rise of New Age religious orientations, which are increasingly attractive to growing numbers of people. Bookshops in cities such as Tokyo and Osaka often have “spiritual corners” full of self-help manuals, books about spirituality, meditation, channeling and the like, and books of this sort sell in large quantities. There is also a growing interest in a variety of spiritual techniques and practices, ranging from divination and numerology to yoga and meditation. Although it is unclear how many people actively follow such practices, it is evident that this is a growing trend, and that many people now eschew formal religious affiliations, constructing for themselves a self-help religious path through which to live their lives in the frenetic urban environment of modern Japan.

In addition, a small number (generally considered to be under 3 percent of the population) of Japanese have turned to Christianity in one form or another since it was allowed back when Japan opened to outside influences in the mid-nineteenth century. Christians of all denominations have since been active in establishing churches and educational institutions throughout the country, and many Japanese have expressed some degree of affinity with Christian ideas. However, Christianity has never managed to translate this affinity into a sizable following, largely, it would appear, because its teachings fail to fit with the Japanese emphases on venerating the ancestors and on engaging in religious traditions that affirm a sense of identity, social integration, and belonging. Prominent in the Christian establishment are the ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH, the HOLY CATHOLIC CHURCH IN JAPAN (Anglican), the HOLY ORTHODOX CHURCH IN JAPAN, the JAPAN BAPTIST CHURCH, and the UNITED CHURCH OF CHRIST OF JAPAN. The latter was formed as World War II began, when the government forced all of the Protestant missionary churches to unite into one body.

One of the new new religions, Aum Shinrikyō, has created a new challenge to religion in Japan. In 1995 devotees of Asahara Shōkō (b. 1955), founder and leader of AUM SHINRIKYO (now known as Aleph), carried out a nerve gas attack on the Tokyo subway. Although Aum acted alone, and was radically different, in its world-negating pessimism and its communal structure, from other religions in Japan, the “Aum affair” has had major repercussions for all religions movements in Japan. It has led to the laws governing the administration and regulation of religious organizations being strengthened, while there have been numerous calls from politicians of all persuasions for greater state control of religious movements. Beyond precipitating such legal changes, the Aum affair has given added influence to a variety of critics, ranging from those on the political left, who regard religion as an outmoded and corrupting influence on society, and who have used Aum as a way of attacking religious movements in general, to mainstream supporters of the traditional religions, who have used Aum as a way of claiming that all new religions are potentially dangerous. In particular, the affair has damaged the general image of religion, and has contributed to a widespread antipathy to, and reluctance to engage in, organized religion—a tendency that has, if anything, added to the above-mentioned turn toward a more informal, self-directed approach to religious behavior.

Given that the religious traditions that have flourished in Japan have been especially concerned with the particular nature of the Japanese situation, it is unsurprising that they have had comparatively little impact beyond Japanese shores. When Japanese religions have spread abroad, it has mainly been along ethnic lines, among the Japanese immigrant communities that settled in Latin America, Hawaii, and North America from the late nineteenth century on. These communities carried their local religious customs with them, so that, for example, Buddhism continued to be the main vehicle for dealing with death. Thus in Hawaii Buddhist temples and festivals such as o-Bon (the summer festival commemorating the spirits of the dead) continue to attract the support of many in the Japanese-American community. Shinto has endured less well, probably because of its close associations with the land of Japan, and although its shrines may be found in areas where Japanese immigrants have settled (e.g., Hawaii), they are less well supported than the Buddhist temples. Many Japanese new religions have gained a footing among overseas Japanese communities: Several of the older new religions, for example, have developed extensive support networks overseas, including Sōka Gakkai (which is the largest Japanese religious movement both in and outside Japan) and Tenrikyō, which have put down roots in the Japanese communities of South America and elsewhere.

Outside the Japanese overseas communities, Japanese religions have met with limited success. Zen Buddhism has achieved some recognition in the West, initially through the writings of D. T. Suzuki (1870–1966) and later because of the activities of Zen priests such as Suzuki Shunryū (1904–1971) and Deshimaru Taisen (1914–1982), who established Zen meditation centers in Europe and North America. Nowadays Zen is one of the most highly visible forms of Buddhism operative in the West, attracting numerous practitioners and giving rise also to many centers now run or established by Westerners, some of whom have become Zen monks and nuns. Other Japanese Buddhist sects such as Shingon and Pure Land have been less well known or successful beyond Japan, although they, too, have established temples and developed small followings in Europe and the United States.

Some Japanese new religions have expanded beyond Japan and the Japanese immigrant community. The most successful has been Sōka Gakkai, whose combination of Buddhist principles with affirmative teachings that emphasize personal success and development has attracted many, especially upwardly mobile, followers in the United States and Europe. Probably the next most successful has been Mahikari, whose emphasis on spiritual healing has helped it develop a small but active following in Europe, Australia, the Caribbean, and parts of Africa. Few other movements have developed more than a small number of non-Japanese followers. Overall Japanese new religions have not traveled particularly well overseas, probably because their teachings and practices are so closely associated with the Japanese situation and Japanese religious worldview that their messages do not always appear capable of the universalism that is necessary for expansion beyond the confines of their own cultural milieu.

Japan Baptist Convention

Ian Reader

Sources:

- Earhart, H. Byron. Japanese Religion: Unity and Diversity. Belmont, CA: Wadsworth, 1982.
- Hardacre, Helen. Kurozumikyō and the New Religions of Japan. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1986.
- Kitagawa, Joseph M. Religion in Japanese History. New York: Columbia University Press, 1966.
- Manabu, Haga and Robert J. Kisala, eds. "The New Age in Japan." Japanese Journal of Religious Studies 22, 3–4 (1995).
- Mullins, Mark R., and Richard Fox Young, eds. "Japanese Religions Abroad." Japanese Journal of Religious Studies 18, 2–3 (1991).
- Nelson, John. The Guise of Shinto in Contemporary Japan. Honolulu: University of Hawaii Press, 1999.
- Reader, Ian. Religion in Contemporary Japan. Basingstoke, UK, and Honolulu: Macmillan and University of Hawaii Press, 1991.

Japan Baptist Convention

The Japan Baptist Convention (Nippon Baputesuto) can be traced to the opening of Japan to the West by United States admiral Matthew Perry in 1853. Among the men aboard Perry's flagship was a marine, Jonathan Goble, who also happened to be a Baptist. He was eager to gather information on the possibility of a Christian missionary enterprise in the land. To that end, he made the acquaintance of a Japanese castaway, who returned to the United States with Goble. After the United States–Japan treaty of 1859, Goble obtained the support of the American Baptist Free Mission Society (a slavery abolitionist group), and in 1860 he and his wife, Eliza Goble, settled in Japan.

In 1872, with the American Civil War past and the country beginning to recover, the American Baptist Missionary Union (ABMU) assumed the responsibility for the American Baptist Free Mission Society. The Gobles were joined by Nathan Brown and Lottie Brown, his wife. The four organized the First Baptist Church of Yokohama in 1873. Brown soon took the lead in the mission and translated the Bible into Japanese. The mission was slow in forming schools and opening a theological seminary, but in 1898 received a ship from a donor in Scotland and used it to travel around the Japanese islands. Then in 1908, William Axling and Lucinda Axling established an institutional (multi-service) church in Tokyo. Before Axling left for the United States almost fifty years later, the government of Japan made him an honorary citizen.

Missionaries from the SOUTHERN BAPTIST CONVENTION, under a comity agreement with the ABMU, began work in southwestern Japan in 1889. The work was centered on Kyushu, the southernmost of Japan's major islands. Schools were opened (two of which developed into colleges), and in 1918 the West Japan Baptist Convention was organized. That same year the American Baptists organized the East Japan Baptist Convention. With World War II on the horizon, these two groups merged.

In 1941, the government forced the formation of the UNITED CHURCH OF CHRIST IN JAPAN and forced all of the Protestant bodies to join it. Following the outbreak of war with the United States following Pearl Harbor, all the remaining missionaries were interned and repatriated. After the war, William Axling was the leading voice in advocating that the Baptists remain with the United Church. Some did. However, some American Baptist congregations left in 1952 and in 1958 formed the Japan Baptist Union.

In 1947, 16 churches related to the Southern Baptist Convention withdrew from the United Church and founded the Japan Baptist Convention. It launched an aggressive evangelism program. In the next generation more than 225 new congregations were founded. It established Jordan Press and a hospital in Kyoto. It now has more than 30,000 members, approximately two-thirds of all the Baptists in Japan.

The Japan Baptist Convention is a member of the National Christian Council of Japan and the BAPTIST WORLD ALLIANCE. The convention also has a working relationship with the Okinawa Baptist Convention, a cooperative venture of the American Baptists and Southern Baptists.

Address:

Japan Baptist Convention
4762–11 Takanoo-cho
Tsu-shi, Mie-ken 514–22
Japan

Sources:

- Garrott, W. Maxfield. Japan Advances. Nashville, TN: Convention Press, 1956.
- Parker, F. Calvin. The Southern Baptist Mission in Japan, 1889–1989. Lanham, MD: University Press of America, 1991.

Japan Buddhist Federation

The Japan Buddhist Federation (Zen Nihon Bukkyokai) is an umbrella organization of over one hundred groups that encompasses all of the traditional Japanese Buddhist schools. Its member groups account for more than 90 percent of all temples and are located throughout Japan's provinces. It is the only such federation of Japanese Buddhist organizations.

The organization has its origins in the Bukkyo Konwakai (Buddhist Discussion Group) formed in 1900 to oppose state control of religion. It went through incarnations as the Dai Nippon Bukkyokai (Greater Japan Buddhist Association) and the Nihon Bukkyo Rengokai (Japanese Buddhist Union) before assuming its present name and becoming incorporated as a religious juridical body in 1957.

The JBF is engaged in a wide range of activities involving the entirety of the Japanese Buddhist world. Its primary activities strive to advance communication, the exchange of information, and the promotion of friendship among its member organizations. It also provides legal advice for its members. In addition, the JBF is a member of the Nihon Shukyo Renmei (Confederation of Japanese Religions), which includes representatives from Shinto, Christian, and new religious organizations. As a representative of the Buddhist world, it serves as a vehicle for communication with other religions, as well as for negotiation with political and bureaucratic authorities. It also functions as the Japanese branch of the World Fellowship of Buddhists (WFB), serving to promote exchange between Buddhists throughout the world.

At present, the JBF is engaged in educational activities intended to increase awareness concerning the protection of human rights within Japan, especially in regard to the elimination of discrimination toward Japan's buraku class (underclass). It has also undertaken a research project to investigate the relationship between discrimination and the Buddhist scriptures.

The organization actively opposes recent amendments to the law governing religious bodies allowing for greater taxation and increased state monitoring of the finances of religious institutions. It also seeks to provide information about controversial issues, such as euthanasia in cases of brain death and the debate over organ transplants, both by organizing seminars and through its journal Zenbutsu, published in Japanese. The journal, with a circulation of 9,000, has been published since 1953, three times a year.

The offices of the Japan Buddhist Federation are located on the grounds of the Jōdo (Pure Land) temple in Tokyo. The federation is composed of a number of administrative organs, including a Board of Directors, a Board of Directors for Everyday Affairs, a Board of Trustees, an Office of General Affairs and specialized committees for the examination of particular topics.

Address:

Japan Buddhist Federation
 Zojo-ji
 4-7-4 Shiba koen
 Minato-ku, Tokyo 105-0011
 Japan
<http://www.jtvan.co.jp/~jbf>

Source:

Zenbutsu. Tokyo: Japan Buddhist Federation, published 3 times annually, 1953–present.

Javanism

Javanism (kejawen) is a term for diverse spiritual practices of Javanese speakers who place their syncretic ancestral culture above specific religious affiliations. It is almost synonymous with kebatinan, which refers to Javanese mystical movements. Most Javanists stress that their practices are rooted in perennial indigenous traditions of wisdom, arguing that these predate even Indian influences.

There are several dozen major movements with Java-wide and, in a few cases, genuinely Indonesian membership. These include organizations such as PANGESTU, SUBUD, SAPTA DARMA, SUMARAH, Ilmu Sejati, and Hardopusoro. It has been estimated that 3 to 5 percent of the Javanese population are actively engaged in kebatinan practices, but perhaps a quarter of Javanese speakers (of whom there are over 60 million) empathize with the spiritual style of these movements.

Kebatinan groups existed within the colonial framework but were usually secretive. Arguably they began to adopt modern form in reaction to the crystallization of modernist Islamic organizations. Among those the Mohammadiyah (founded in 1911) was especially antimystical in its early years. Most movements only came into public view during the revolution of the late 1940s, while Indonesia was attaining independence. Then, paralleling the organizing process in the 1950s through all sectors of Indonesian society, major movements became formally organized. During the early 1950s a number of movements argued that they deserved recognition as separate religions, suggesting that in the context of national independence it would be an anomaly if only imported religions received government approval. Some movements maintained that argument into the 1970s; most accepted they were unlikely to get formal recognition.

Within Indonesia these movements are now termed kepercayaan, simply meaning beliefs. Other designations have included kejiwaan or kerohanian, the first from a Sanskrit root, the second from Arabic, and both meaning spiritual, and kawruh kasunyataan, roughly, “knowledge of Truth.” Whatever the preference (which varies among movements), there is always a disavowal of the association with klenik, black magic and occultism, as that is the charge most often leveled against them by Muslim critics.

In opting for the designation kepercayaan, Javanist movements were self-consciously staking a claim to legitimacy within the provisions of the 1945 constitution. That constitution was readopted by Sukarno (1901–1970; president of Indonesia 1949–1967) in 1959 and has remained sacred under Suharto (b. 1921) and even his recent successors. Inclusion of the term kepercayaan in the constitution was credited to Wongsonegoro, who became the patron of umbrella movements on behalf of mysticism during the 1950s. The first of these, the BKKI (Badan Kongres Kebatinnan Indonesia, or Congress of Indonesian Mystical Movements), was founded in 1955 by him. In Yogyakarta in December 1970 a successor organization was named the SKK (Sekretariat Kerjasama Kepercayaan) and subsequently renamed HPK (Himpunan Penghayat Kepercayaan).

Paul Stange

Sources:

Beatty, Andrew. Varieties of Javanese Religion: An Anthropological Account. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1999.
 Geertz, Clifford. The Religion of Java. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1976.
 Kartodirdjo, Sartono. Protest Movements in Rural Java. Singapore: ISEAS/Oxford University Press, 1973.
 Mulder, Niels. Mysticism in Java: Ideology in Indonesia. Amsterdam and Singapore: Pepin Press, 1998.

Jehovah's Witnesses

The name Jehovah's Witnesses refers to an organization within the group of Christian sects and denominations sometimes referred to as the Adventist Family. The American Charles Taze Russell (1852–1916) is generally regarded as the founder of the movement and is the originator of the group's basic system of beliefs. In 1879, Russell began publishing Zion's Watch Tower and Herald of Christ's Presence, in which he argued that the millennium was imminent and that Christ's invisible presence on Earth had begun in 1874. Russell began attracting followers, known as Bible Students, and in 1884 the Zion's Watch Tower Tract Society was incorporated.

Russell's successor, Joseph Franklin Rutherford (1852–1942), can be credited with the development of the present-day hierarchical, or "theocratic," organizational structure as well as with the coining of the name Jehovah's Witnesses. A period of concerted efforts at growth and global expansion began under third president Nathan Knorr (1915–1975) and has continued under the succeeding two presidents. In October 2000, the Witnesses announced a plan for reorganization in which theological and administrative responsibilities would be divided for the first time.

Based on Russell's interpretation of the chronology of events described in the Bible and especially those predicted in the Book of Revelation, the general outline of which can be found in Russell's The Plan of the Ages, Witnesses believe the world is now in its last days. Witnesses hold that Christ began his invisible presence on Earth in 1914 and that Armageddon, the final battle between the forces of good and evil, will occur in the very near future. Several different dates have been put forward for the end of the present era, the most recent being 1975. As a result of their interpretation of Revelation 7: 4–9, Witnesses believe that 144,000 chosen people will rule the world from Heaven with Jesus after Armageddon. Others, members of the "Great Crowd," will be resurrected during the millennium and given the opportunity to earn eternal life on Earth through obedience to God.

Jehovah's Witnesses believe that they embody the true church, the "faithful and discrete slave" responsible for acting according to the Divine plan. Although they consider themselves Christian, they reject a number of ideas put forward by most Christian groups. Witnesses reject the doctrine of the Trinity and emphasize the oneness of God, to whom they refer as Jehovah. They regard Jesus as a perfect, but fully human, being who sacrificed his life as a ransom for sinful humanity. Witnesses reject the notion of Hell as contrary to God's loving nature, and they reject the notion of the immortality of the soul.

Witnesses regard Christmas, Easter, birthdays, and other holidays as pagan in origin and do not celebrate them. Their only sacred observance is the commemoration of Christ's death during Passover. Weekly observances emphasize public talks, training for witnessing work, and study of the Watch Tower and other Witness publications, rather than the kinds of prayer or ritual usually associated with Christian worship. Because the last days are at hand, the most important work for Jehovah's Witnesses is door-to-door "preaching," or "publishing," in order to separate the saved from the damned.

The practice of "publishing" has brought Jehovah's witnesses some notoriety in a variety of nations. Also controversial is their refusal to accept blood transfusions as a result of their interpretation of the biblical injunction against eating blood. But perhaps the source of the most tension between Witnesses and "the world" has been their refusal to serve in the military, to participate in patriotic exercises, and to join political parties. These positions have led political officials in many states to brand Witnesses as unpatriotic or enemies of the state and to subject them to persecution.

As of 1999, almost 66 million (5,912,492) Witnesses were active in 234 countries. A total of 14,088,751 were in attendance at the memorial of Christ's death in 1999, and 323,439 were baptized. Growth in recent years has been steady, especially in less industrialized societies. As a result of global expansion, less than 20 percent of all Witnesses live in the United States, the group's country of origin, while over 25 percent live in Latin America. The world headquarters is located in New York.

Address:

Jehovah's Witnesses
 25 Columbia Heights
 Brooklyn, NY 11201
<http://www.watchtower.org>

Arthur L. Greil

Sources:

Jehovah's Witnesses in the Divine Purpose. Brooklyn, NY: Watchtower and Bible Tract Society of New York, 1959.

Penton, M. James. Apocalypse Delayed: The True Story of Jehovah's Witnesses. 2d ed. Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 1997.

Jesuits

The Jesuits, officially the Society of Jesus, is one of the more important religious orders that contributed to the worldwide spread of the Roman Catholic Church in the modern world. The order was founded by St. Ignatius of Loyola (1491–1556) on August 15, 1534. At the founding, Loyola and six others took a vow of poverty and chastity and dedication to apostolic labor as enjoined by the pope. The order was approved by the pope in 1540. As the order evolved, it was divided into geographical provinces. Leadership is placed in a general congregation, a body that includes the superior general, the vicar general, all assistants and provincials, and two electors from each congregation. The meetings of the congregations are infrequent, usually called following the death of the superior general in order to elect his successor. The superior general serves for life and is the real leader of the Society, apart from the adopting of broad policies and legislation by the congregation.

The order expanded rapidly and had gained almost a thousand members by the time Loyola died. Its first major task was stemming the tide of Protestant advance. It is credited with turning back Protestant successes in France, Belgium, and parts of Central and Eastern Europe. Jesuits operated under cover in some Protestant countries where their detection meant arrest, torture, and possible execution. Higher education became the order's primary tool, and the order opened a number of colleges, forty-six before Loyola died, and almost a hundred more in the next generation. It also developed the modern seminary for the training of clergy, the most outstanding of which was the Roman College, now known as the Gregorian University, in Rome. These seminaries became important centers of learning that assumed the burden of countering the Protestant and other heresies.

Second only to education has been the Society's work in missions. The first missionary, commissioned within months of the Society's founding, was St. Francis Xavier, who traveled to the Orient as a representative of the Jesuits. The Society grew as the exploration and colonization of the Western Hemisphere was beginning. Though several other orders, especially the Franciscans and Dominicans, were already on the scene in the French, Spanish, and Portuguese colonies, in the 1700s the Jesuits surpassed them in number of personnel. They were especially effective in the settlement of South America. The Society also opened work in Portuguese colonies on the coast of Africa, but Jesuits were frustrated in their efforts to slow the work of the slave merchants. Efforts in Asia centered on India, China, Japan, and the Philippines.

Saint Ignatius Loyola, the founder of the Jesuits (Helene Rogers/TRIP)

In 1773 the Society fell victim to its own success. Its educational attainments had placed members at the center of a number of controversies and led to the creation of numerous enemies. Others resented the work of missions that blocked the exploitation of people and land in the colonies. By the mid-eighteenth century, proposals to suppress the Society began to be debated in Rome. Beginning in 1759, the Jesuits were expelled from various South American countries, beginning with the confiscation of the order's properties in Portugal and its possessions. France acted against the order in 1764, and Spain followed three years later. Under pressure, Pope Clement XIV dissolved the Society. Many became secular priests, and a few rose to power, among them John Carroll (1735–1815), the first archbishop in the United States.

Action on the suppression order was not carried out in many places, and a remnant of the order continued, possibly the most important group being the one in Russian-controlled Poland. Other pockets continued with tacit papal approval until 1814 when the suppression order was repealed. The restored order began with approximately 600 members. It grew steadily, and by the middle of the twentieth century had 35,000 members. The order returned to its emphasis on higher education and scholarship, and the Society founded a number of outstanding colleges and universities. It also produced many Catholic scholars of note. At the same time the missionary emphasis also reemerged, and thousands of members were sent to work in Africa and Asia. The expansion of the restored Society has not gone unchallenged; it has continually faced opposition from secular governments (especially France and Spain) and been totally suppressed by Communist rulers.

The Jesuits found an especially welcoming environment in the United States, though the order was on occasion targeted by popular waves of anti-Catholicism. It has built a system of top-rated colleges and universities, among the most famous being Boston College, Fordham, Georgetown, and Marquette Universities, and the several Loyola Universities (Detroit, Chicago, New Orleans, Los Angeles).

The Society of Jesus has more than 20,000 members who reside in 112 countries. Over the years, more than twenty-five Jesuits have been canonized. Jesuits in the United States maintain an Internet Jesuit information site at the address given below.

The religious life, regulations, and directions for ministry are laid out in a set of writings known collectively as the Institutes. It includes a variety of papal documents, the Society's constitution, and the Spiritual Exercises, a book by Loyola outlining a special program of self-reflection and spiritual practice that each Jesuit utilizes as part of his own program of spiritual progress.

Address:

Society of Jesus
C.P. 6139
00195 Roma
Italy
<http://www.jesuit.org>

Sources:

- Barthel, Manfred. Jesuits: History and Legend of the Society of Jesus. New York: Morrow, 1984.
- Hollis, Christopher. The Jesuits: A History. New York: MacMillan, 1968.
- Meadows, Denis. A Popular History of the Jesuits. New York: MacMillan, 1958.
- Mitchell, David. The Jesuits: A History. New York: Franklin Watts, 1981.

JeungSanDo

JeungSanDo (also spelled Jeung Sanh Doh) is a new Korean religious movement, a Dao or Way, that grew out of the life and work of Kang Il-sun Sah-ok (1871–1909), better known as SangJeNim. He is believed by his followers to be the incarnation of the Lord God who ruled with the Triune God. The Lord God came from heaven to fulfill a set of prophecies, including the Buddhist prophecy of the coming Maitreya and the Second Coming of Jesus expected by Christians. In JeungSanDo teachings, Shang-ti (Confucianism), the Jade Emperor (Daoism), Maitreya (Buddhism), and God (Western traditions) are the same. SangJeNim was the embodiment of this entity.

Kang grew up in poverty. In 1877 he reportedly experienced sudden enlightenment and in 1894 made the decision to save and enlighten the world. In 1901 he is believed to have defeated all evils and opened the Great Gate of Spirituality and to have begun the work of Reconstructing Heaven and Earth. He also began to gather disciples, the first of which was Kim Hyong-yol, designated the keeper of the Way of JeungSanDo. Kang predicted that within a relatively short time a good world would arise.

In 1907 he named Ko Pam-lye (1880–1935) as Sabu, the Head of all Women. He had already proclaimed that men and women were equal, and following his death in 1909, Lady Ko, better known as Tae-mo-nim (Holy Mother), became the leader of the movement. She assumed the task of propagating the new T'aedulju mantra, the chanting of which is believed to provide a lifeline to the enlightening and healing energy of T'aedul Heaven, the womb of the universe. Accompanying the mantra is a set of sixteen tai chi movements corresponding to the sound symbols of the mantra, believed capable of activating the healing energy (chi) from the universe and pushing out the toxic energy from the body. Each movement is seen as related directly to the function of one or more internal organs. The movements are slow, controlled, and synchronized with the breath.

In the post-Korean War period, JeungSanDo experienced new life and began to spread throughout South Korea and then internationally. The publication of an English edition of the account of the founder's supernatural work, JeungSanDo DoJeon, in 1995 facilitated its movement into English-speaking lands.

As the new century begins, JeungSanDo has centers in Japan, the Philippines, New Zealand, the United States, Canada, and the United Kingdom.

Address:

JeungSanDo
425-26 Sun-hwa-dohng
Joong-gu Taejon 301-051
Republic of Korea
<http://www.jsd.or.kr/a/mainmenu.htm> (in Korean)
<http://www.autumncalling.com> (in English)

Source:

JeungSanDo DoJeon. Seoul, Korea: Daewon Publishing Company, 1995.

Jōdo-Shinshū [True Pure Land School]

Jōdo-shinshū, the largest Japanese Buddhist denominational family, traces its origin to Shinran (1173–1262), a disciple of Hōnen, the founder of JODO-SHU. Shinran was an adherent of the powerful “movement of the exclusive and single-minded nembutsu,” which was deemed heretical by the established Buddhist orders. When the movement was prohibited in 1207, Hōnen and some of his followers, including Shinran, were excommunicated and exiled. Shinran’s exile to Echigo, where he started to propagate his own interpretation of Hōnen’s Pure Land teachings, is traditionally regarded as the starting point of the Jōdo-shinshū. Shinran regarded himself as neither priest nor lay, and he married and had children, thus paving the way for the eventual abolition of celibacy in Japanese Buddhism as well as for hereditary priesthood. After his death, his youngest daughter Kakushin functioned as the first caretaker of her father’s mausoleum at Ōtani, east of Kyōto. She was supported by followers of Shinran, and out of this group of caretakers evolved what is now known as the Jōdo-shinshū. In 1321 Shinran’s grandson Kakunyo turned the mausoleum into a temple and called it Hongan-ji.

The group of Shinran’s descendants did not gain any notable influence until Rennyo (1415–1499), the so-called Eighth Chief Priest of Hongan-ji. The expansion of the sect, being involved in a number of peasants’ uprisings known as ikkō-ikki, aroused suspicion among the established orders. The army of Tendai monks attacked Hongan-ji several times, and the temple was moved to other places more than once. Still, the influence of the Jōdo-shinshū in the provinces grew, and its temples took the shape of fortresses, while its chief priests became as powerful as secular lords. In the late sixteenth century the sect’s headquarter was destroyed by the troops of Oda Nobunaga, who regarded the powerful Buddhist temples as major obstacles to the unification of Japan. By the beginning of the seventeenth century the Hongan-ji was divided into the Eastern Hongan-ji and the Western Hongan-ji, both located in Kyoto. The former is the headquarters of the Ōtani branch, the latter that of the Hongan-ji branch of Jōdo-shinshū. Besides these two, there exist today eight more branches of comparatively minor significance. The ten denominations count approximately 15 million adherents, more than 20,000 temples, and 30,000 priests (over 90 percent male) in Japan. The lay-oriented Jōdo-shinshū has abolished all monastic elements, and training of priests has been reduced to the extreme. The major branches of Jōdo-shinshū run universities and other educational institutions, and actively promote scholarly and social activities.

Doctrinally, the Jōdo-shinshū differs considerably from the Jōdo-shū, which derives its teachings from Shinran’s master. Among the so-called Three Pure Land Sūtras, the Muryōjūkyō (Sūtra on the [Buddha of] Immeasurable Life) holds the central position. Shinran stressed faith in the “Other Power of Amida Buddha’s Vow” rather than the practice of calling upon this Buddha’s name (nembutsu). According to his interpretation, the nembutsu is merely a thankful reaction to the experience of absolute faith in the fact of being saved by Amida, a faith that, again, is conferred on men by the Buddha.

Shinran emphasized the utter dependence of sinful beings on Amida’s grace, which is particularly directed toward those who are unable to achieve even ordinary secular virtue.

Jōdo-shinshū has been remarkably active and successful in overseas missions, even among non-Japanese, especially in Canada, the United States, Brazil, and Western Europe. In recent years, however, membership in the United States has been shrinking significantly.

The Nishi-Hongan-ji (Honganji-ha) headquarters is located at 600–8501 Kyōto-shi, Shimogyō-ku, Horikawa-dōri, Hanaya-machi sagari. This is the group known in the United States as the Buddhist Churches of America. Its Internet site is at <http://www2.hongwanji.or.jp/english>. Both groups are members of the JAPAN BUDDHIST FEDERATION, through which they relate to the WORLD FELLOWSHIP OF BUDDHISTS.

Address:

600–8308 Kyōto-shi
Shimogyō-ku
Karasuma-dōri Shichijō-agaru
Tokiwa-chō
Japan
<http://www.tomo-net.or.jp>

Christoph Kleine

Sources:

- Buddhist Handbook for Shin-shu Followers*. Tokyo: Hokuseido Press, 1969
- Shinran. The Collected Works of Shinran. 2 vols. Kyoto: Jodo Shinshu Hongwanji-ha (Honganji International Center), 1997.
- Dobbins, James C. Jōdo Shinshū: Shin Buddhism in Medieval Japan. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1989.
- Shin Buddhist Handbook*. Honolulu: Honpa Hongwanji Mission of Hawaii, 1972.
- Suzuki, D. T. Shin Buddhism. New York: Harper and Row, 1970.

Jōdo-Shū [Pure Land School]

Jōdo-shū constitutes one of the major Japanese Buddhist groups. Tradition claims that the Jōdo-shū was founded in 1175 by the Tendai monk Hōnen (1133–1212) when he decided to leave the Enryaku-ji monastery on Mt. Hiei in order to propagate his Pure Land teaching among the populace. Hōnen maintained that the then already popular practice of invoking Amida Buddha’s name (a practice called in Japanese nembutsu) with the intention of being born in his Pure Land of Bliss was the only appropriate practice in the “latter days of the dharma.” Hōnen chose the so-called Three Pure Land Sūtras as the scriptural basis of the Jodo-shu and claimed to follow the interpretation of these scriptures by the Chinese monk Shandao. According to him Shandao, Amida Buddha himself, in his vow to save all sentient beings, had selected the act of calling upon his name as the practice that would inevitably lead to birth in his paradise, and thus liberate from the circle of birth and death. Hōnen distinguished between the Gateway of the Holy Path, under which he subsumed all the teachings and practices of Mahāyāna as well as Hinayāna Buddhism, and the Gateway of the Pure Land. Hōnen's major ideas are developed in his Collection of Passages on the Selection of the Nembutsu in [Amida's] Original Vow (Senchaku-hongan-nembutsu-shū), written, according to tradition, upon the request of regent Fujiwara Kanezane in 1198. The Jōdo-Shū places itself in the tradition of the Chinese monks Tanluan, Daochuo, Shandao, Huaigan, and Shaokang, but lacks any lineage of personal transmission up to Hōnen.

Under the ideological guidance of Hōnen the movement of the "single-minded and exclusive nembutsu" grew rapidly. Many clerics and laymen appreciated Hōnen's simple but persuasive message. However, the established Buddhist orders and schools harshly criticized the movement for being intolerant, exclusionist, one-sided, and heretical. After a number of scandals had raised fears that Hōnen's followers might bring about social disturbance, the secular authorities yielded to the demands of the Buddhist establishment and prohibited the movement's activities in 1207. As a consequence, Hōnen and a couple of his close disciples were excommunicated and exiled. The popularity of his doctrine, however, remained unbroken. After Hōnen's death in 1212 the movement split into several branches, among which the so-called Chinzei branch eventually became dominant. Until the early seventeenth century, however, the Jōdo-shū failed to gain official recognition as an independent denomination. After World War II several factions seceded, but in 1962 they merged again, and the Chion-in in Kyoto was accepted as the Jōdo-Shū's headquarters.

Presently, the Jōdo-Shū has approximately 6 million adherents, 7,000 temples, and 8,000 clerics (over 90 percent male) in Japan. A monastic way of life is mainly upheld by nuns, whereas the temples are run by married male priests; a priest will, as a rule, bequeath his temple to his eldest son. Jōdo-shū runs universities, colleges, schools, and kindergartens, and promotes various scholarly and social activities. It is a member of the JAPAN BUDDHIST FEDERATION, through which it relates to the WORLD FELLOWSHIP OF BUDDHISTS. Major strongholds of the Jōdo-shū outside Japan are regions with a large Japanese population such as the United States (2 temples), Hawaii (15 temples), and Brazil (2 temples). Hitherto, the denomination has developed no notable missionary activities among non-Japanese.

Address:

Jōdo-Shū
605-0062 Kyōto-shi
Higashiyama-ku, Hayashi Shita-machi 400-8
Japan
<http://www.jodo.or.jp/jodo-e/index-n.html>

Christoph Kleine

Sources:

- Coates, Harper H., and Ishizuka Ryūgaku. Hōnen the Buddhist Saint: His Life and Teaching. Kyoto: The Society for the Publication of Sacred Books of the World, 1925.
- Kleine, Christoph. Hōnens Buddhismus des Reinen Landes: Reform, Reformation oder Häresie. Frankfurt/Main: Peter Lang, 1996.
- Matsunami, Kodo. Introducing Buddhism. Honolulu: Hawaii Jodo Mission, 1965.
- Senchakushū English Translation Project, ed. Hōnen's Senchakushū: Passages on the Selection of the Nembutsu in the Original Vow (Senchaku Hongan Nembutsu Shū). Honolulu/Tokyo: The Kuroda Institute, 1998. Classics in East Asian Buddhism.

Johnston Island

Johnston Island, a coral atoll in the central Pacific Ocean, was uninhabited when it was discovered in 1807 by the British sea captain for whom the island is named. The nearby Sand, East, and North islets are now combined in a United States dependency. Since 1934 the islands have been under the administration of the United States Navy, and civilian visitors are not allowed.

Approximately a thousand people reside on Johnston Island, all citizens of the United States and members of the Armed Forces. There are no permanent religious buildings or congregations on the islands, and all services are organized by Navy chaplains, primarily for those members of the ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH or of Protestant profession (interdenominational services without any attempt to deal with particular Protestant denominations).

Sources:

- Barrett, David. The Encyclopedia of World Christianity. 2d edition. New York: Oxford University Press, 2001.
- Bissio, Roberto Remo, et al. Third World Guide 93/94. Montevideo, Uruguay: Instituto del Tercer Mundo, 1992.

Jordan

The modern country of Jordan is noted as a major site of civilization going back to the Paleolithic Age. Archaeological evidence indicates that the area has been occupied since ancient times. In the biblical era, it was occupied by the nations of Gilead, Moab, and Edom. In 331 B.C.E., Alexander the Great (356–323 B.C.E.) conquered the area today known as the Near East, including this area, bringing Hellenic culture along with his conquering army.

Between 400 B.C.E. and 106 B.C.E., the Nabataean civilization flourished in what is now southern Jordan. Its ancient capital, Petra, now a popular tourist attraction, was in its time one of the desert outposts of the Roman Empire. During the rule of the Roman Empire between 63 B.C.E.

and 324 C.E., the Decapolis, a league of ten cities (of which Jeresh, Philadelphia [now Amman], Umm, Qais, and Pella were in Jordan) was formed to facilitate commercial enterprise. Later during the Byzantine period (324–632), Jordan provided commercial wares and foodstuffs to travelers on caravan routes linking the Mediterranean to China.

Of interest to Jews and Christians are the numerous holy sites located in Jordan, sites recorded in both Hebrew Scripture and New Testament writings. John the Baptist is supposed to have lived in the area around Bethany beyond the Jordan River, the river where John baptized Jesus. There are reports that Jesus also traveled to Bethany seeking a safe haven from hostile groups. It is thought that the cities of Sodom and Gomorrah, whose destruction is described in Genesis, were near the Dead Sea. Another location near Mukawer is supposed to be the site where John the Baptist was imprisoned by Herod Antipas, who later beheaded John to please his wife, Salome. Mount Nebo, 1,000 meters above the Dead Sea, is noted as the area where Moses first saw the Holy Land and where he subsequently died and was buried.

The Arab-Islamic era begins in 630, and during that era the region was ruled by the Umayyad and Abbasid dynasties, of Damascus and Baghdad, respectively. In the seventh century, this region was the site of the battle of Yarmuk, in which the Arabs fought Heraclius (c. 575–641), the Byzantine emperor, and won access to the Fertile Crescent, now in Iraq. During the Crusades, the western region of the territory served as the operational base for the military. In 1099, the Crusaders occupied Jerusalem. By 1187 Saladin (Salah ad Din; 1137–1193) had fought, conquered, and driven back the Crusaders at Kerek, resulting in their withdrawal from the Near East.

A 300-year rule by the Mamelukes, a military and political force made up of former slaves from Egypt, followed, and then Jordan fell to the Ottoman Empire, which made the territory a district administered from Damascus until World War I. The clandestine Sykes-Picot Treaty between France and England in 1916 gave the French control over Lebanon and Syria, while England gained a mandate over Iraq and Palestine (Palestine then included modern Jordan).

Status of religions in Jordan, 2000-2050

Followers	2000		2025	2050
	total	% rate
Muslims	6,238,000	93.5 3.69	11,039,000	14,814,000
Christians	274,000	4.1 4.21	640,000	1,038,000
Orthodox	131,000	2.0 4.70	340,000	550,000
Independents	77,000	1.2 4.84	200,000	360,000
Roman Catholics	48,000	0.7 3.25	75,000	95,000
Nonreligious	118,000	1.8 5.40	300,000	550,000
Atheists	21,700	0.3 4.49	44,000	65,000
Baha'is	17,200	0.3 4.58	40,000	80,000
Total population	6,669,000	100.0 3.74	12,063,000	16,547,000

From 1920 until May 1946, the conflict and warfare over boundary lines and rulership continued. In 1920, Prince Abdullah (1882–1951) seized power and organized the nomadic Jordanian Bedouins, who were loyal to him. Fearing a hostile outbreak, the English offered Abdullah the Emirate of Transjordan (under their protection), while his opponent, Faisal, received control of the later creation of Iraq.

After taking part in the Arab-Israeli war of 1948–1949, Transjordan took the name of Jordan and annexed Arab Palestine, including the West Bank of the Jordan River, along with Palestinian refugees who had left Israel, and Jerusalem. Palestinians make up two-thirds of the population of Jordan. King Hussein, who assumed the throne in 1953, supported the Palestine Liberation Organization (PLO). An incident known as Black September occurred in September of 1970 when a number of Palestinians were killed by the army of Jordan for political reasons. Despite internal problems caused by a refugee situation, it is the money that Palestinian migrant workers send home to Jordan that underwrites the economy. In July 1989, Hussein relinquished his claim to the West Bank, which had been lost to Israel in the 1967 war. Problems with the cabinet led to some political reforms, and voting was allowed in 1989. In 1991, the king and a number of political parties signed a new constitution, which included political rights for women and removed the restrictions that had disallowed a free press.

Folk culture has left an indelible imprint on Jordan from the pre-Islamic era. Of the folk beliefs, belief in the evil eye is the most common (as it is in a number of Mediterranean countries). Other practices, although done in the name of Islam, are antithetical to Islamic orthodoxy. For example, amulets made of paper containing verses from the Qu'ran are worn, prepared by heterodox shaykhs for spiritual empowerment and protection, and people frequent "saints" who are believed to have holiness (baraka). Visits to shrines are typical for people who wish to have children, a practice frowned upon by orthodox Islam. Jordanian Muslims generally have a strong work ethic, and pious expressions such as inshallah (God willing) and bismallah (in the name of God) accompany most important everyday activities.

In 1948, the population of the East Bank was about 340,000. The 1950 annexation of the West Bank swelled the population to about 900,000. After the 1957–1958 civil uprising an additional 250,000–300,000 West Bank Palestinians entered Jordan as refugees. Most refugees live in camps of hasty construction with poor sanitation facilities around Amman and the northern areas. Palestinians of the East Bank are caught in the throes of a national identity crisis.

During the 1950s pan-Arabism emerged, and Jordan's leaders strongly recommended Jordanian sovereignty over the contested areas. The loss of the West Bank in 1967 and subsequent Israeli occupation furthered a nationalist climate that promoted the PLO, which offered an alternative identity for the displaced Palestinians. Today the Palestine Authority led by Yasser Arafat (b. 1929) attempts to provide a sort of government protection agency for the Palestinians who through warfare and border disputes are dispersed in several countries that are not their original homeland. King Hussein of Jordan (1935–1999) attempted to modernize Jordan. His oldest son Abdullah (b. 1962) has assumed the throne and seems to be reigning much as did his father before him. Noteworthy is that Abdullah's wife is a Palestinian. The government has moved from an absolute monarchy in 1946 to a constitutional monarchy in 1991. There is a senate with 40 members and a house of representatives with 60 members.

More than 90 percent of the Jordanians are Muslims, with approximately 8 percent Arab Christians. The majority of Christians are Orthodox, the area being traditionally assigned to the GREEK ORTHODOX PATRIARCHATE OF JERUSALEM. Those affiliated with that patriarchate make it currently the largest Christian body in the country, with more than 80,000 members.

There are a small group of Greek Catholics (30,000), attached to the Patriarch of Jerusalem of the MELKITE CATHOLIC CHURCH, and a Latin Rite ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH community of about 12,000. There are a few congregations of those Orthodox churches headquartered in neighboring countries including the SYRIAC ORTHODOX PATRIARCHATE OF ANTIOCH, the COPTIC ORTHODOX CHURCH, and the ARMENIAN APOSTOLIC CHURCH.

The CHURCH OF ENGLAND has had mission stations in Jordan for over a century. The Church Missionary Society, along with the Jerusalem and the East Mission, had to cut back services after the war of 1948, but work continues as part of the EPISCOPAL CHURCH IN JERUSALEM AND THE MIDDLE EAST. The Old Hospital at Nablus is now maintained by the Arab Episcopal Community. There is a Bishop's School for Boys in Amman and St. George's School in Jerusalem.

The CHRISTIAN AND MISSIONARY ALLIANCE has been working there for over fifty years and wishes to turn its property over to the Evangelical Church of the Christian Alliance, who have no missionaries but several pastored congregations. The SOUTHERN BAPTIST CONVENTION began work in 1952, but political instability caused their work to languish. They have a bookstore and five churches affiliated with the Jordanian Baptist Convention, now possibly the largest protestant Free Church group, with more than 1,500 members. (The larger Evangelical Lutheran Church in Jordan had its work on the West Bank, and so is now in Israeli territory.) The very conservative Independent Board for Presbyterian Foreign Missions has worked in occupied Jordan south of Jerusalem. The Baraka Bible College opened in 1970, offering a B.Th. degree. World Presbyterian Missions has worked in Aqaba and Ma'an, in the extreme southern portion of Jordan. American FRIENDS have had two excellent schools at Ramallah on the West Bank (now Israeli territory).

Church World Service and Lutheran Relief, as well as the Mennonite Central Committee, have been engaged in relief work in Jordan for a number of years. These groups provide resources to Palestinian refugees and have distributed food, clothes, and medicines in Jordan proper and in the West Bank. The Conservative Baptist Foreign Mission Association arrived in Jordan in 1956 and, except for a brief period during the 1967 war, has had a small presence in Amman, with three churches totaling about 170 people. Also present in the country are the SEVENTH-DAY ADVENTIST CHURCH, the United Pentecostal Church, and the CHURCH OF THE NAZARENE.

Islam continues to be by far the largest religious group, with 93.5 percent of the population. Most are Sunnis who follow the SHAFIITE school of jurisprudence. There is a small group of Chechens of Caucasian extraction who are Shi'as, and some 3,000 ALEVIS. Nomadic Bedouins follow their ancient customs first before the teachings from Islam.

There are some adherents of the BAHÁ'Í FAITH near Adasiya in the Jordan Valley, and members of the DRUZE tradition are generally found near the Syrian border. Among the more interesting groups in the country is the Essene Church in the Hashemite Kingdom of Jordan, a Gnostic group.

The government has accorded official government recognition to the Greek Orthodox, Roman Catholic, Greek Catholic (Melkite), Armenian Orthodox, Maronite Catholic, Assyrian, Anglican, Lutheran, Seventh-day Adventist, UNITED PENTECOSTAL, and Presbyterian Churches. Several other churches are registered with the Ministry of Justice as societies rather than churches. The government does not recognize JEHOVAH'S WITNESSES, the UNITED PENTECOSTAL CHURCH, the CHURCHES OF CHRIST, or the CHURCH OF JESUS CHRIST OF LATTER-DAY SAINTS, though all are holding religious services without interference. Although they can practice their faith rather freely, Christians are discouraged from encouraging conversion to the Christian faith, since conversion attempts are considered legally incompatible with Islam and hence officially prohibited.

Members of the Bahá'í Faith face official discrimination. They are considered as Muslims by the authorities, and their personal and family matters are referred to the Muslim law courts for adjudication. The government also refuses to register property belonging to the Baha'i community. In spite of these regulations, however, Jordan offers its minority religions more freedom than many of its neighboring countries.

Gail M. Harley

Sources:

Salibi, Kamal S. A Modern History of Jordan. London: I. B. Tauris, 1993.

"U.S. Department of State Annual Report on International Religious Freedom for 1999: Jordan." Posted at http://www.state.gov/www/global/human_rights/irf/irf_rpt/1999/irf_jordan99.html. Accessed September 15, 2001.

JUDAISM

Judaism, the religious tradition of the Jewish people, now consists of a set of different religious communities tied together by a book (the Torah), a land (Israel), and acknowledgment of God, who called them as a people into a covenant relationship. Present-day Israel believes itself to be the physical descendant of the people of Israel who are described in the Torah—those who accepted the covenant with God and the obligations it imposed upon them. However, at various times and places there have been openings for different people—individuals and groups—to become part of the Jewish heritage as well.

Although the Jewish heritage reaches back to the beginnings of history in the Middle East, around 2000 B.C.E., a crucial divide in Jewish history occurred in the sixth century B.C.E. In 586, the Babylonian king Nebuchadnezzar (c. 630–562 B.C.E.) overran Jerusalem and exiled the Jewish aristocracy, the learned, and the wealthy to the heart of his kingdom. In 539, Babylon fell to the Persian king Cyrus (c. 585–529 B.C.E.), who soon afterwards allowed those Jews who so desired to return to Jerusalem. During the reign of Darius the Great (r. 522–486 B.C.E.), permission was granted to rebuild the temple, a task that was completed in 515.

The reorganization of the community under the priest Ezra in the fifth century included a reorientation of the community around the Torah. With the Persians' blessing, the Jewish leader Nehemiah reorganized the political life and established the priesthood as an integral part of a theocratic system. The traditional legal codes were assembled to create a single legal system. The Torah, the first five books of the Hebrew Bible (Genesis, Exodus, Leviticus, Numbers, Deuteronomy) became the constitution of the community. Those who traced their lineage to Aaron, the brother of Moses who had assisted him in the exodus of the Jewish people from Egypt almost a millennium earlier, were set apart as the priestly class. The Jewish calendar was revised into something closely resembling its modern form, with the New year (Rosh Hashanah) beginning in the early fall and including a cycle of holy days that included the Day of Atonement (Yom Kippur), the feast of Tabernacles (Sukkoth), Passover (Pesach), and Pentecost (Shavuot).

Ancient Origins. The Judaism that emerged from the Babylonian captivity celebrated its heritage as recounted in the Torah. The story recounted the creation of humanity, its dispersal into various peoples, and then the calling of a clan or tribe under the patriarch Abram, possibly as early as 2000 B.C.E. The Torah (Gen. 12–17) relates the story of Abram's covenant with God (YHWH), who promised to make of his descendants a company of nations. He gave to Abram, renamed Abraham, the land of Canaan, and the people acknowledged YHWH as their God. One sign of the covenant was the circumcision of all of the males among Abraham's people.

Abraham's grandson Jacob had twelve sons. At a time of famine in Canaan, the family relocated to Egypt, where one of Jacob's sons, Joseph, who had been sold into slavery by his jealous brothers, had risen to a position of prominence in the government. Thus the children of Abraham came to live in Egypt. At some point the descendants of Abraham were absorbed into the Egyptian system. At some point (and we have little independent verification of the story), the Egyptian elite were threatened by the expanding population of the Hebrews. When the problem reached crisis proportions, the pharaoh ordered the death of all Hebrew male infants. Only one survived, Moses, who reportedly was found by the pharaoh's daughter and raised as an Egyptian in the palace court.

Jews gather to pray at the Wailing Wall in Jerusalem, Israel. (H. Isachar/TRIP)

As an adult, Moses was forced to flee after killing an Egyptian who was beating a Hebrew. Finding his way to a remote location in the Sinai desert, he had an encounter with God. As he knelt before a burning bush that would not be consumed, God told him to return to Egypt and free his people. God identified Himself as “I am who I am, I am the one who sent you” (Exod. 3:14). God also called Aaron to assist Moses.

After the encounter with God, Moses returned to Egypt to negotiate the release of the Hebrews from their position of servitude and the right to leave Egypt for good. According to the story recounted in Exodus, a series of plagues afflicted Egypt and convinced Pharaoh to let the people go. Changing his mind at the last minute, Pharaoh attempted to prevent their departure, but the Red Sea parted to allow them to cross out of Egypt into the Sinai, and upon the water’s return, Pharaoh and his army were destroyed. In recent times the story has become the focus of a debate between those who believe that it is a historical account of what occurred and seek scientific evidence for the possibility of such events as the plagues and the parting Red Sea, and skeptics who believe such events to be impossible and the story a myth.

Having successfully escaped, the Hebrews returned to the place where Moses had encountered God in the burning bush. Here Moses received a new revelation, a new covenant between God and the people—they agreed to worship God, Yahweh (YHWH), and God gave them the law by which they were to live. The people accepted the covenant but then soon afterwards turned their back on it by violating one of its essential laws, prohibiting graven images. It would a generation before the people moved from the Sinai into their promised land, Canaan.

Joshua succeeded Moses as head of the community and led the Hebrew conquest of Canaan in the twelfth century B.C.E. With that conquest the Jewish nation came into existence. The story of the next centuries is told in terms of the struggle to remain loyal to the One God, in contrast to the polytheistic cultures around them, the struggle to fend off conquest by various neighbors, and the development of leadership. Israel was divided into the twelve tribes that had developed from each of Jacob's sons. Land was assigned to each tribe, and leadership was placed in the hands of a set of seers/judges. These men, who had what today would be termed psychic abilities, dealt with a range of problems and provided some overall guidance to the confederation of tribes.

During this time, worship was centered at a place called Shiloh (now called Seilun), north of present-day Nablus in Jordan. Here was kept the symbol of the Hebrew relationship with God, the Ark of the Covenant. The site was overrun in 1050 B.C.E. by the Philistines, who captured the Ark. The Philistine victory led directly to the Hebrews' decision to create a stronger central government. Thus around 1000 B.C.E. the kingdom of Israel was created, with Saul as its first king (r. c. 1020–1000). The erratic Saul was succeeded by David (r. c. 1000–962), who defeated the Philistines. After capturing the hill city of Jerusalem, he established the capital there. David's son and successor, Solomon, built a new temple in Jerusalem, and the now retrieved Ark was restored to its central place in the people's worship. Under David and Solomon, Jerusalem became the center of the worship of Yahweh, the One God.

Solomon's successor, Rehoboam (r. c. 934–917), could not hold the kingdom together, and in 931 B.C.E. it split into two parts, Israel in the north and Judah in the south. Both kingdoms prospered for the next two centuries, but in 721 Israel was overrun by Assyria, a kingdom centered on the Mesopotamian city of Ninevah. When Assyria was eclipsed by the Babylonians, whose center was south of Ninevah, Babylon overran Judah.

During the time of the two kingdoms, differing accounts of the story of the Hebrew people were written down. These stories would later be collected into what became the Torah, the two sources distinguished by their different names for God—one preferring the name Elohim in the account of events prior to the revelation to Moses at Sinai. The time from the emergence of David and Solomon through the two kingdoms would be the era in which independent religious voices, the prophets, would arise to challenge the rulers and the priests at any point where corruption arose or the worship of Yahweh was compromised. Among the prophets, the two men known as Isaiah, one operating in the eighth century (see Isaiah 1–39) and the other in the sixth century (chapters 40–66), stand out for their emphasis upon monotheism and worship of Yahweh as the God of history. Prophets would continue to arise into the post-exilic era.

The Greek and Roman Eras. In 332 B.C.E., Alexander the Great (356–323 B.C.E.) captured Jerusalem. Following Alexander's death, Israel became part of the Seleucid kingdom, initially headed by one of Alexander's generals based in Syria. In their attempt to Hellenize the lands under their control, the Seleucids clashed with conservatives in Jerusalem, who resisted any compromise. The issue came to a head during the reign of the Seleucid King Antiochus IV (r. 175–163). In his attempt to suppress Jewish dissent, Antiochus IV desecrated the temple and forbade the observance of the Sabbath (the weekly day of rest commanded in the Mosaic covenant), the study of the Torah, and the practice of circumcision. His actions led to a revolt and the establishment of an independent Jewish state in 142 B.C.E. under Judas Maccabaeus (d. 160 B.C.E.). The state would remain independent until the Roman conquest in 63 B.C.E.

During the centuries of an independent Israel, a variety of groups emerged within the Jewish community. Prominent among them were the Sadducees and the Pharisees. The former argued against the authority of much of the oral tradition in interpreting the Torah, opting to keep control of interpretation in the hands of the priesthood. The Pharisees argued for a broader interpretation of the Torah, using the oral tradition and placing the authority in the hands of a learned elite. The Pharisaic party would come to predominate, giving rise to the rabbinical leadership that provides the major leadership for the Jewish community today.

The independence of Israel came to an end around 63 B.C.E. with the arrival of the Romans. It appears that the turmoil of Roman occupation and the establishment of a local puppet government created an environment in which a wide spectrum of Jewish groups emerged. Among these was the Qumran community, which was forgotten until a library of their material was uncovered in the 1940s on the edge of the Dead Sea, where they had retreated to create their communal society. The Qumran community lived a separated life marked by discipline and hope for the arrival of a messianic figure. Scholars have argued for a half century over the possible influence of the Qumran community on the founding of another group, the Jesus movement that would eventually grow into Christianity.

Both the Qumran community and the Jesus movement were symbolic of unrest in the land, caused not only by Roman rule but by offensive Roman policies that were contrary to Jewish law and practice. A revolt against Rome broke out in 66 C.E., and an army was dispatched to quell it. Jerusalem fell in 70 C.E. and the temple was razed. Resistance would continue for a few more years, most notably at the mountain fortress Masada, where defenders finally committed suicide prior to its fall.

Even prior to the Roman era, many Jews had begun to move around the Mediterranean Basin. Hundreds of thousands resided in Alexandria during the first century B.C.E. Christianity spread through the Roman Empire in the first century C.E. on the heels of Jewish communities that had previously been established. However, the destruction of the temple became a decisive event. Not only did it encourage further immigration, but it undercut the authority of the priesthood.

In direct response to the loss of the temple, Johann ben Zakkai, a Pharisee, created a new school of Torah interpretation. The learned Pharisees, or rabbis (teachers), were now trained to interpret the Torah. Collectively, they identified the canon of scripture, the books now assembled as the Hebrew Bible. They also refocused worship on the synagogue, the local centers where ritual could be carried out and the Torah expounded in place of the lost temple. Synagogues had already been created, but their role now became central to the survival of Jewish faith. A Prayer Book was composed to direct synagogue worship, which centered on the acknowledgment of God's covenant and hope for the coming of Israel's messiah and the establishment of his kingdom.

Equally important, the rabbis carried on discussions concerning the oral law, the comments on the Torah that applied its teachings to daily living. Rabbis began to write down these commentaries, and at the beginning of the third century, an initial authoritative edition appeared as the Mishnah (teachings). The Mishnah contained the opinions of more than one hundred Jewish scholars on the regulations that should guide Jewish existence.

By the middle of the second century, the old Jewish community at Babylon that had survived from the sixth century B.C.E. experienced a revival as Jews began to migrate there from Palestine. As the Palestinian community declined, the Babylonian community emerged as a rival center of authority. Here in the fourth and fifth centuries, a commentary on the Mishnah called the Gemara (the Babylonian Talmud) was committed to writing. This more comprehensive commentary recorded comments from more than two thousand teachers and covered numerous topics not mentioned in the Mishnah. (The attempt to establish the authority of the Talmud would lead to the emergence of one group who rejected the idea of the oral law and many of the rules and rituals derived from it.

Through the centuries the KARAITES have survived as a minority tradition in the Jewish world.)

The conclusions of the rabbis from their study of Torah, Mishnah, and Gemara were summarized in the law, called the Halacha (literally, “the way a faithful Jew walks”). To be a faithful Jew was to acknowledge God’s covenant with the community and to order one’s life in conformity to God’s law, which covered every imaginable aspect of life. In fulfilling the law, an individual sanctified life from moment to moment. Concern with proper behavior took center stage, although theological speculation still had its place.

While the Mishnah and Gemara were being assembled, the rabbis also revised the Jewish calendar. Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur were tied together, and the ten days between them were conceived as days of self-examination and repentance. The Seder, a ritual and meal celebrating God’s protection of Hebrew infants from the plague that took the life of Egypt’s firstborn, was developed for the celebration of Passover. Pentecost (Shavuot) was also reconceptualized as an anniversary of the covenant at Sinai. The reformed Jewish calendar reconciled the lunar year, according to which many Jewish holy days are reckoned, with the solar year.

With the Prayer Book, the Mishnah, the Gemara, the calendar, and a synagogue for every Jewish community, Judaism appeared ready to survive until the return of Israel to Palestine and the establishment of the promised kingdom. Indeed, from a present perspective, the first generations of rabbis built the platform upon which Jewish history would henceforth develop.

Judaism in the Diaspora. Through the dispersion of the Jewish community (even prior to the Roman Era), Jewish ideas found their way to many unexpected places. They flowed westward around the Mediterranean Basin, and a flourishing community emerged on the Iberian Peninsula. They flowed southward to Yemen and Ethiopia and even to far-off Zimbabwe, where they would become the basis of very different Jewish communities (BETA ISRAEL and the LEMBA). They flowed eastward to Mesopotamia, Afghanistan, and even India, where a distinctive Jewish community, the BENE ISRAEL, would become integrated into the society.

The dispersion of the Jewish community would at times be encouraged by economics, but too frequently it was caused by persecution or the threat thereof. The Jews encountered difficulties from the Romans, who did not understand their monotheism. Then, they found themselves under attack from the Christians, those followers of Jesus who had to some extent left their Jewish heritage and become a religion of Gentiles (non-Jews). Then in the seventh and eighth centuries, Islam emerged as a new force in Spain, across North Africa, through the Middle East to Mesopotamia, Persia, and Central Asia. By the eighth century, the majority of Jews resided in the lands of the Muslim Caliphate. They established a place for themselves as a protected community in Muslim lands, and in many places Jewish culture and intellectual life flourished.

Spain became a unique center of Jewish life in the eighth through the eleventh centuries. That life came to an end in the thirteenth century, when the Almorad dynasty from Morocco extended its control into Spain and the Islamic rulers took actions against the Jews, including the closing of the synagogues. During the next centuries the region would be dominated by the interests of competing Muslim factions and the reassertion of Christian hegemony. The reestablishment of Christian rule in Spain and Portugal would be disastrous for the Jews, who were banished from their homes in 1492 and 1493, respectively.

Before the expulsion in Spain, however, two events of note occurred. Spain was the birthplace of Moses ben Maimon (1135–1204), better known as Moses Maimonides, who left his homeland for Egypt. He became the author of a large codified version of Jewish law. He also authored a summary of Jewish belief, which he saw revolving around thirteen principles, including the oneness of God and the central revelation of the Torah. Today this work remains a valued statement of orthodox Judaism.

With his love of Greek philosophy, especially Aristotle, Maimonides stood in contrast to another Spanish teacher, Moses de Leon (1250–1305), who lived and worked in Granada. De Leon lifted Jewish mysticism to a new level with his compilation, the Zohar—a mystical commentary on the Torah. Kaballa, the Jewish mystical tradition, pictures the cosmos as the emanation of God through ten realms called sephirot. The last of these emanations, malkuth, is roughly equivalent to the mundane world. For the Kabbalist, the Torah, properly interpreted, is a doorway into the invisible mystical realm. De Leon's work would find a capable interpreter in the post-expulsion era in Isaac Luria (1534–1572), whose work would lead to a separate branch of traditional Judaism defined by its mystical dimension, HASSIDISM.

Jews also spread north from Palestine into Europe, and communities were established in England, France, Italy, Germany, and eastern Europe. Although these communities sometimes were able to attain a stable life as minority groups in Christian lands, their history was punctuated by times of discrimination, persecution, massacres, and expulsions. A general denigration of the Jews was justified by Christians who saw them as responsible for the death of Jesus, or who believed that Jews kidnapped Christian babies for secret rituals, and in this atmosphere of mistrust and misunderstanding, Jews faced the continual threat of sudden outbreaks of violence.

Jews were expelled from England in 1290 and from France early in the next century. The expulsion from Spain in 1492 led to further expulsions from Sicily (1492–1493), Lithuania (1495), Brandenburg, Germany (1510), Tunisia (1535), and Naples (1641). At around this same time urban governments established the first of the ghettos, closed communities that segregated the Jews from the larger society, the first one being created in Venice in 1516. As a result of their expulsion and persecution, many Jews moved to Poland, which became the center of European Jewish life. A vital community also developed in Holland, the most religiously tolerant land in western Europe. Though segregated from the larger community, the Jewish communities developed a rich culture.

The expulsion of the Jews from Spain led many, like Maimonides, to retreat to the lands of the Ottoman Empire, which at the time stretched from the Balkans across the Middle East and into North Africa as far as Algeria. Many Jews also moved into the newly discovered Americas. They first became visible at Recife, Brazil, during the brief occupation by the Dutch (1630–1654). After the loss of Recife, the Jews were dispersed throughout the Americas to such places as the Dutch settlement on the island of Curaçao and the North American colonies of New Amsterdam (soon to become New York) and Rhode Island.

There were only six synagogues in the United States at the time of its founding, but through the nineteenth century the Jewish community was increased manyfold by immigration, first of tens of thousands of German Jews and then by hundreds of thousands of eastern European Jews. These Jews from northern and eastern Europe, known collectively as Ashkenazim, completely overwhelmed the original community of American Sephardic Jews, who traced their heritage through Spain and Portugal.

Development of the Modern Jewish Community. Through the eighteenth century, Jewish religion was largely rooted in the tradition that had developed from the Palestinian and Babylonian formats created in the early centuries of the first millennium C.E. However, during the nineteenth century, the Jewish situation began to change. A significant factor in that change was the liberal policy toward the Jewish community initiated in Europe during the Napoleonic era. At the same time, Jewish life was beginning to expand beyond the ghetto culture and Jews were looking for ways to assimilate into the larger Gentile society. One response to the assimilationist impulse was the creation of REFORM JUDAISM, a new way of being Jewish that emphasized what were seen as the eternal truths of the faith, as opposed to the passing cultural artifacts. Arguing that God's revelation was progressive, German Rabbi Abraham Geiger (1810–1874) began to introduce changes into his synagogue in Berlin. Many items of traditional behavior were discarded, including a variety of dietary restrictions, and a message of what was termed “ethical monotheism” was emphasized. The movement caught on quickly in the United States, where Rabbi Isaac Wise (1819–1900) championed the cause.

Geiger found strong opposition among the traditionalists in the Jewish world. Rabbi Samsom Raphael Hirsch (1808–1888) of Frankfurt am Main led the forces that would affirm traditional, or as it would come to be called, ORTHODOX JUDAISM, in Germany. Isaac Leeser (1806–1868) championed the Orthodox cause in North America.

Between Orthodoxy and Reform, a third alternative was proposed by Zacharias Frankel (1801–1875). He recognized both the need to respond to the new consciousness of history and the Reform idea of Judaism as constantly changing with the times. However, he rejected the radical stripping of “outdated” ritual from the synagogue. He appreciated ritual as an expression of deeply felt realities. He therefore proposed a third way that has subsequently come to be known as CONSERVATIVE JUDAISM, or in contemporary Israel, the Masorti movement.

In the meantime, Hassidism had been born in Poland, the product of both the kabbalistic writing of de Leon and Luria and the experiences of men like Israel ben Eliezer (1700–1760), known as the Baal Shem Tov, the Master of the Good Name (of God). An unlearned man, the Baal Shem Tov became known as a healer, and as a teacher he called into being a community whose centers were built around men known for one or more charismatic traits, often as wonder-workers. Although perfectly Orthodox in belief and practice, the Hassidim and their courts were often seen as competitors to rabbinical Judaism and the synagogue. Many branches of Hassidism developed as different leaders established their work in the different cities and countries of eastern Europe.

Zion, Holocaust, Israel. The various branches of Judaism entered the twentieth century in a somewhat hopeful mood. In western Europe and North America Jews were experiencing new levels of freedom, with every reason to expect further improvement. No one could have foretold what was to occur.

In spite of a positive experience in some places, some Jewish communities, such as those in Russia, saw little relief from the pogroms that had come upon them in czarist Russia. Even in the more liberal West, incidents such as the infamous Dreyfus affair in France turned many into cynics. The negative experience of many nineteenth-century Jews provided the environment in which Zionism developed. In 1896, Austrian Theodore Herzl (1860–1904) published his call for a Jewish nation, and the next year he founded the World Zionist Congress to work for such a state.

The rise of Zionism also called attention to the secularization of the Jewish community, in which as many as one-half were no longer practicing any religion, be it Reform, Orthodox, Conservative, or Hassidic. Distinctions were being made among ethnic Jews who might or might not practice a form of Jewish religion and might or might not adhere to various cultural practices.

The idea of creating a Jewish state in Palestine, at the time still part of the Ottoman Empire, divided Jewish leaders. However, early supporters began to purchase land and to move to Palestine. Hope was created by the 1917 declaration of Lord Arthur James Balfour (1848–1930), the British foreign secretary, in favor of a Jewish state in Palestine. Between 1900 and 1930, a quarter of a million Jews had migrated there, and the rate of migration increased during the next decade in response to persecution by the Nazis.

The history of the Middle East would likely have been very different had it not been for the Nazi Holocaust. Six million Jews lost their lives simply because they were Jews. Even before the full extent of the tragedy was known, much sympathy flowed to the survivors, and the Soviet Union favored the creation of a Jewish state over the continued presence of Great Britain in Palestine. Following a 1947 United Nations vote to partition Palestine, events moved rapidly, and in May 1948 the British pulled out and the Jewish leaders in Palestine proclaimed the formation of the new State of ISRAEL.

Crucial to the development of Israel since its establishment has been the Law of Return. Originally passed in 1950, the law grants every Jew residing anywhere in the world the right to migrate to Israel and the possibility of becoming a citizen. As a result of this law, millions of Jews from communities around the world have moved to Israel, depopulating many Jewish communities, including some quite ancient ones. Though a small minority of Orthodox Jews (NETUREI KARTA, SATMAR HASSIDISM) continue to lobby against Israel for theological reasons, support for the state of Israel has the overwhelming support of the international Jewish community.

Internationally, religious Judaism is structured around the synagogue, each usually led by a rabbi. In turn, the synagogues are organized into national associations of synagogues and rabbis. Each of the major Jewish groups, Reform, Orthodox, Conservative, and the most recently formed Reconstructionist community, has national organizations in each country where they have multiple synagogues. Orthodoxy is divided by cultural traditions; German, eastern European, and Sephardic Jews retain a level of separation (see WORLD SEPHARDIC FEDERATION), and new forms of Orthodoxy have arisen around twentieth-century issues (see YOUNG ISRAEL and GUSH EMUMIN). The national associations also participate in umbrella organizations serving the whole Jewish community, such as the World Jewish Congress, and some have formed international cooperative fellowships that serve their own constituency worldwide, such as the World Union for Progressive Judaism.

Today, the largest Jewish community in the world is in the United States. Of the 5.6 million U.S. Jews, slightly more than half are formally affiliated to a synagogue. Some 3.9 million Jews reside in Israel, where they make up more than three-fourths of the population. Less than 1 million Jews remain in Russia, more than 1 million having left during the 1990s. Large communities also continue in France (600,000), Argentina (490,000), Canada (400,000), and the United Kingdom (300,000).

Sources:

- Bridger, David, ed. The New Jewish Encyclopedia. New York: Behrman House, 1976.
- De Lange, Nicolas. Atlas of the Jewish World. New York: Facts on File, 1984.
- Eckstein, Yechiel. What You Should Know about Jews and Judaism. Waco, TX: Word Books, 1984.
- Flannery, Edward H. The Anguish of the Jews: Twenty-Three Centuries of Antisemitism. Ramsey, NJ: Paulist Press, 1885.
- Johnson, Paul. A History of the Jews. New York: HarperCollins, 1988.
- Mendes-Flohr, Paul, and Judah Reinharz. The Jew in the Modern World: A Documentary History. New York: Oxford University Press, 1995.
- Mintz, Jerome R. Hasidic People: A Place in the New World. Cambridge: Harvard University Press, 1992.
- Neusner, Jacob. Signposts on the Way of Torah. Belmont, CA: Wadsworth Publishing, 1998.
- Rosenberg, Roy A. The Concise Guide to Judaism: History, Practice, Faith. Denver, CO: Mentor Books, 1991.
- Rudavsky, D. Modern Jewish Religious Movements: A History of Emancipation and Adjustment. 3d ed. New York: Behrman, 1979.

- Sachar, H. M. The Course of Modern Jewish History. New York: Dell, 1977.
- Seltzer, Robert M. Judaism: A People and Its History (Religion, History, and Culture). New York: Macmillan, 1989.
- Shanks, Hershel. Ancient Israel: From Abraham to the Roman Destruction of the Temple. Englewood Cliffs, NJ: Prentice-Hall, 1999.
- Sholem, Gershom. Major Trends in Jewish Mysticism. New York: Schocken Books, 1954.
- Silver, David J., and Bernard Martin. History of Judaism from Abraham to Maimonides. New York: Basic Books, 1974.
- Uterman, A. Jews: Their Religious Beliefs and Practices. London: Routledge, 1981.
- Wigoder, Geoffrey, ed. The New Standard Jewish Encyclopedia. New York: Facts on File, 1992.

Kabbalah Learning Centre

The Kabbalah Learning Centre is a relatively new effort to make the mystical wisdom of the Jewish kabbalah, long the exclusive possession of an elite group of advanced students of a small number of rabbis, available to the Jewish community as a whole and even beyond, to seekers who are not Jewish. Rabbi Yehuda Ashlag (1886–1955) began this process by translating the Zohar, the basic text presenting the kabbalistic wisdom, from Aramaic into modern Hebrew. He organized the text and wrote an introduction, later translated into English and published as the Ten Illuminations. In 1922 he founded the Kabbalah Learning Centre (also known as the Research Centre of Kabbalah) in Palestine. The center became the vehicle for Ashlag's continued work of translating and publishing the Zohar, which was completed in the 1950s.

Ashlag was succeeded by Rabbi Judah Brandwein (d. 1969), among whose major accomplishments was the republishing of the works of sixteenth-century kabbalist, Rabbi Isaac ben Solomon Luria (1534–1572), thus making available these previously difficult-to-find works. Brandwein also added a set of notes and cross-references to the texts. He was in turn succeeded by Rabbi Philip S. Berg (formerly Philip S. Gruberger), the present leader of the center. Berg had grown up in the United States and met Brandwein in 1962. Berg has been a prolific author and has also worked on the production of an English translation of the complete Zohar.

Berg sees his task as presenting the kabbalah to the whole world. He greatly expanded the operation of the center, opening teaching sites across Israel and in many European and North American cities. His basic text, Kabbalah for the Layman, was translated into Spanish, French, German, Persian, and Russian. He has also written books on reincarnation and astrology, which have appealed to people previously attracted to the NEW AGE MOVEMENT. One of the center's task is to bring Jews back to Judaism from popular esoteric teachings.

International teachings sites can be found in Brazil, Argentina, Chile, Colombia, Venezuela, Mexico, France, and the United Kingdom. In addition, instruction may be received by satellite in sites in Australia, Guatemala, Ecuador, Holland, Iran, Japan, Morocco, and Sweden.

Israeli critics of Berg and the center have decried his attempts to teach the kabbalah to a popular audience, pointing out that instruction was previously limited to males who were at least forty years of age. More importantly, they have questioned his credentials; the yeshiva that Rabbi Brandwein headed denies any relationship with Berg. Berg has countered by publishing several volumes of his correspondence with Brandwein as evidence of their close relationship.

Address:

Kabbalah Learning Centre
c/o The Kabbalah Centre
1054 S. Roberson Blvd.
Los Angeles, CA 90035
<http://www.kabbalah.com/>

Sources:

- Ashlag, Yehuda. Kabbalah: A Gift of the Bible. Jerusalem, Israel: Research Centre of the Kabbalah, 1994.
- Berg, Philip S. Kabbalah for the Layman. 3 vols. New York: Research Center of Kabbalah Press, 1988, 1991, 1993.
- . Miracles Mysteries, and Prayer. 2 vols. New York: Research Center of Kabbalah Press, 1993.
- Levine, Art. "The Accidental Kabbalist." Posted at <http://www.xso.com/cover/coverstory012401.html>. Accessed October 25, 2001.

Kagyupa Tibetan Buddhism

The Kagyu tradition (literally "transmitted command"), one of the four major schools of TIBETAN BUDDHISM, is the result of a fusion of late Mahayana and Tantric teachings, both introduced by a lineage of Indian and Tibetan masters: Tilopa (988–1069), Naropa (1016–1100), Marpa (1012–1096), Milarepa (1040–1123), and Gampopa (1079–1153). The Kagyupa trace their origin to the Buddha Varjadhara. Traditionally, Marpa is considered to be the founder of the Kagyupa. Historically, however, the credit goes to the disciples of Gampopa. They established a number of subschools, including KARMA-KAGYUPA, TIBETAN BUDDHISM, as well as the Padmodrupa (named for its founder, 1110–1170), which developed into a tree of lineages of which Drigung, Taklung, and Druk have persisted through the centuries along with the Karma. Although only minor differences in practice and ritual are discernible among these branches, each one underwent its own specific historical and geographical developments.

Originally, religious leadership was transmitted from uncle to nephew, but later branches adopted the reincarnation system of tulku (an incantation of a saintly person or deity). Neither strict celibacy nor exclusive membership to the institution was demanded by the early orders. Rather than a unified religious branch, the Kagyu order can be seen as a complex combination of organized monasticism and master-to-disciple tantric transmission.

Despite its emphasis upon oral transmission, the Kagyu tradition constitutes a matrix of teachings embodied in three basic texts. The first of these is the Mahamudra (Great Seal), a body of doctrine emphasizing meditation (in Skt., Sadhana) and the consciousness of Emptiness (Skt., Shunyata). Secondly, the Six Yogas of Naropa exposes the “extraordinary practices” (in Tibetan, Nâro Chödrug): “heat yoga” (Tib., Tumo), “illusory body” (Tib., Gyulü), “dream” yoga (Tib., Milam), “Clear Light” perception (Tib., Ösel), “consciousness transmission” (Tib., Phowa), and the yoga of the “intermediate states” between death and rebirth (Tib., Bardo). Thirdly, in his Precious Ornament of the Liberation, Gampopa offers a synthesis of the Kagyu and Kadam teachings in which he reaffirms the universal nature of Buddha. The realization of Buddhahood is possible by means of specific techniques: training of the mind (Tib., Lodjong), “mindful awareness” (Tib., Chiné) and “penetrative seeing” (Tib., Lakhtong), in addition to the “spirit of Enlightenment” (Skt., Bodhicitta), the achievement of the “perfections” (Skt., Paramita), and merit-making performance (Skt., Puja), which are basic Mahayana practices. Of primary importance to the Kagyupa are faith and devotion to a qualified master (Skt., guru; Tib., blama) considered as a “spiritual friend.” Thus, Kagyu practice consists, on the one hand, of ascetic experiences of yoga and meditation as well as subtle tantric techniques (i.e., the visualization of deities) and, on the other hand, of ritual and collective performances (chants, pilgrimages) and expressions of devotion to the master and the lineage.

Many of the Kagyu dignitaries, especially those of the Karma school, played an important role in the political and religious history of Tibet. Exercising local power in their areas of settlement, the Kagyupa never fully achieved headship of the Tibetan nation. Their influence, however, extended to the borderlands of Tibet: the Drigung in Nepal and Ladakh (northern India), the Drukpa in Ladakh and in Buthan, and the Karma in Sikkim (India). Since the early 1970s, the Kagyupa have found new host countries in the West (Europe and North America).

Lionel Obadia

Sources:

- Snellgrove, David. Indo-Tibetan Buddhism: Indian Buddhists and Their Tibetan Successors. London: Serindia, 1987.
- Snellgrove, David, and Hugh Richardson. A Cultural History of Tibet. London: Weidenfeld and Nicolson, 1968.
- Stein, Rolf. Tibetan Civilization. Stanford: Stanford University Press, 1972.

Tucci, Giuseppe. The Religions of Tibet. Berkeley and Los Angeles: University of California Press, 1980.

Kanaky

Kanaky, officially the Territoire d’Outre-Mer de la Nouvelle-Calédonie, is a French overseas department consisting of the large island of New Caledonia and several sets of smaller islands in the South Pacific west of Australia. European discovery and naming was made by Captain James Cook (1728–1779) in 1774. The islands had been home to Melonesians, primarily of the Kanaka group, for over three thousand years. The French occupied New Caledonia in 1853 and developed a harsh, repressive culture. French settlement was spurred by the discovery of nickel and chromium deposits.

The indigenous religions of the New Caledonians were largely destroyed and replaced by Roman Catholicism, but they have survived in some of the remote mountainous areas. Indigenous religious practice was given some new life by the introduction of the so-called cargo cults after World War II, primarily from the New Hebrides.

The first Christian missionary, a Methodist from Tonga, arrived in New Caledonia in 1834. He was joined in 1843 by two Samoans, who arrived as representatives of the LONDON MISSIONARY SOCIETY (LMS), a Congregationalist-based organization. European LMS missionaries came in the 1850s. Their combined efforts led to the formation of the EVANGELICAL CHURCH IN NEW CALEDONIA AND THE LOYALTY ISLANDS, the largest Protestant body in Kanaky. It now commands the allegiance of around 15 percent of the population of 165,000 people. It experienced a schism in 1960, leading to the formation of the Free church.

The first priests of the ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH arrived in 1843, and following the French occupation the church enjoyed official support. In its second generation, it moved to develop indigenous leadership, and the first priests from New Caledonian members were ordained in 1884. The capital, Nouméa, became the center of French Catholic life throughout the south Pacific, and in 1966 it became the home of the archbishop of Nouméa, whose territory also includes the Wallis and Futuna Islands. Through the twentieth century, the population of Kanaky has become quite diverse, with measurable numbers of Anglos of British heritage, Eastern Europeans, Chinese, and representatives of many people from various other South Pacific islands. The present spectrum of religions now present in the islands can be traced to the mid-1880s, with the arrival of missionaries from the REORGANIZED CHURCH OF JESUS CHRIST OF LATTER-DAY SAINTS (now the Community of Christ). Its sister, the CHURCH OF JESUS CHRIST OF LATTER-DAY SAINTS, began work in the 1950s after some members from Tahiti moved to New Caledonia to work in the nickel mines. The work is part of the Fiji Suiva Mission.

Through the 1900s, other Christian groups established work on the islands, including the SEVENTH-DAY ADVENTIST CHURCH (1925), the JEHOVAH'S WITNESSES (1950), the ASSEMBLIES OF GOD (1969), and Baptists International Missions, an American-based fundamentalist Baptist organization (1995). The BAHÁ'Í FAITH began work in 1952. Buddhism is practiced by a segment of the Vietnamese community, though the majority are Roman Catholics. There is a small community of Muslims, most Sunnis of the SHAFIITE SCHOOL OF ISLAM from Indonesia. There is also a long-standing community of Rosicrucians affiliated with the ANCIENT AND MYSTICAL ORDER ROSAE CRUCIS.

Sources:

- Forman, Charles H. The Island Churches of the South Pacific: Emergence in the Twentieth Century. Maryknoll, NY: Orbis, 1982.
- Kohler, J. M. Christianity in New Caledonia and the Loyalty Islands: Sociological Profile. Nouméa, New Caledonia: Office de la Recherche Scientifique et Technique Outre-Mer, 1981.
- Sectes et dénominations en Nouvelle-Calédonie*. Nouméa, New Caledonia: Église évangélique en Nouvelle Calédonie et aux Iles Loyauté, Commission d'éducation chrétienne, 1973.

Karaites

Karaites are Jews who do not accept the authority of the Talmud—the commentary on Jewish law (the Torah)—as the authoritative interpretation of Jewish practice. The Karaites consider themselves the original Jews who follow only the Torah, from which later rabbinical Judaism has separated. A separate Karaite community could be distinguished as early as the eighth century C.E. in Babylonia (Iraq), where Anan ben David is said to have revitalized a lineage that had passed through a variety of earlier groups, including the community at Qumran known from the Dead Sea Scrolls. Many modern historians have questioned the association of Anan with Karaism and suggest that the first Karaites were a medieval group that appropriated the account of Anan to give themselves a longer history.

In any case, late in the ninth century the Karaite movement spread through the Jewish community then residing in the larger Islamic Empire and eventually became established in Palestine. After its Palestinian centers were destroyed by the First Christian Crusade in 1099, the leadership of the Karaite community relocated to Byzantium. After the fall of Constantinople to the Ottomans, Karaites migrated northward toward Poland and Lithuania and eastward to the Crimea. Much of the Eastern European Karaite community was destroyed during World War II.

The strongest Karaite community to survive into the mid-twentieth century was in Egypt, but in the late 1950s most relocated to Israel. As the twentieth-first century begins, there are some thirty thousand Karaites in Israel, with smaller communities in Egypt, France, and the San Francisco Bay Area of California. Major Israeli centers are found in Ramla and Ashdod. The American community is focused on the Karaite synagogue in Daly City, California.

Karaites reject the idea that rabbis are the main authority for interpreting the Torah. Instead, they believe that individuals are responsible for studying the Bible and for reaching the best interpretation for their situation, since in the end, it is the individual who will face judgment. This individual approach regularly introduces various interpretations into the community and ensures a level of diversity. Karaites do accept the authority of the Tenach (or Tanakh)—the Hebrew Bible (called the Old Testament by Christians)—but they reject other writings such as the Apocrypha, the Pseudepigrapha, the Christian New Testament, and the Muslim Qur'an. They believe in the future arrival of a Davidic Messiah (Isaiah 11:1), a human king filled with God's prophetic spirit. The Messiah will not be a divine or semidivine creature.

Over the centuries, Karaites have developed several practices that differ from those of the larger Jewish community, and their variant interpretations of Jewish law make intermarriage between Karaites and other Jews difficult. Karaites also calculate their calendar from actual observation of the new moon, and thus it varies slightly from that now common in Judaism. Karaites prohibit sexual relations on the Sabbath, whereas Orthodox Jews have seen the Sabbath as a particularly good time for sexual activity. Karaite synagogues do not have chairs, and the liturgy is very different from that in other Jewish traditions. They do not recognize the post-biblical holiday, Hanukkah.

The Karaite Jewish community is most easily contacted through their American adherents.

Address:

Karaite Jews of America
Congregation B'nai Israel
1575 Annie St.
Daly City, CA 94915
<http://www.karaites.org>

Sources:

- Birnbbaum, Philip, ed. Karaite Studies. New York: Sepher-Hermon Press, 1971.
- Karaite links page (University of Arizona). Web site of the U.S. Karaite community. Posted at <http://www.u.arizona.edu/~onur/karait.htm>. Accessed December 12, 2001.
- Nemoy, L. Leon. Karaite Anthology. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1952.
- Schur, Nathan. History of the Karaites. Frankfurt am Main and New York: Peter Lang, 1992.

Karma-Kagyupa Tibetan Buddhism

742

The Karma-Kagyupa branch is one of the many subschools of KAGYUPA TIBETAN BUDDHISM. It was founded by Düsüm Khyenpa (1110–1193), a disciple of Gampopa (1079–1153), who established several temples during his lifetime, as well as the headquarters of the Karma-Kagyupa in the monastery of Tsurphu (1185). Because of their Kagyu heritage, the Karma-Kagyupa emphasize yoga and tantric practices. The Karma-Kagyupa path to enlightenment follows a succession of steps leading to mental quietness (Sanskrit, shamata). Preliminary practices of purification (Tibetan, ngöndro) such as prostration, mandala offerings, recitation of the mantra of Vajrasattva, and guru yoga precede higher meditations and the visualization of deities (such as Tchenrezig, Tara, and Mahakala), considered to be mediums through which wisdom is expressed.

From the twelfth century onward, the Karma-Kagyupa order flourished in the central and eastern provinces of Tibet and later acquired political support within the imperial courts of Mongolia and China. By the thirteenth century the Karma-Kagyupa were competing with the SAKYAPA for Mongol patronage, and during the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries they faced sporadic and localized conflicts against the GELUKPA. In the seventeenth century, the Dalai Lamas' dominance weakened the political power of the Karma-Kagyupa in Tibet.

The Karma-Kagyupa order claims to have pioneered the Tibetan system of voluntary reincarnation (tulku) of religious authority. Under this system, Karma-Kagyupa leadership was passed on for eight centuries in an unbroken succession of reincarnated masters, or karmapa (literally “black hat”). A second tulku lineage was added to the first: Khaydrup Drakpa Senge (1283–1349) became the first sharmapa (“red hat”), the second highest Karma-Kagyupa spiritual leader. As a consequence, the doctrinal and hierarchical structure of the Karma-Kagyupa branch became inextricably linked to these two figures.

In 1950 Tibet was annexed by China. The sixteenth karmapa, Rangjung Rigpe Dorje (1924–1981), escaped from Tibet just before the open repression by China started in 1959. He established new headquarters in Rumtek, near Gangtok, Sikkim (now an Indian state), in 1966. In an effort to preserve the Karma-Kagyupa tradition, he participated actively in the Western dissemination of Buddhism during the late 1960s and the 1970s.

The very first Tibetan temple in the West, Samyé Ling, was founded in Scotland in 1967 by two Karma-Kagyupa lamas, Chögyam Trungpa Rinpoche (1939–1987) and Chujé Akong Rinpoche. In 1973, Trungpa established the Vajradhatu Organization (now known as SHAMBHALA INTERNATIONAL), thus initiating the creation of Western Kagyu orders. The Karma-Kagyupa quickly developed into one of the largest Tibetan branches to spread and settle outside Asia. As of the late 1990s, hundreds of temples and thousands of followers were estimated to be scattered throughout the world, principally in the West. Following new routes, the old Tibetan tradition has now established new roots outside the Land of Snow.

The late karmapa died in 1981, and the recent and controversial recognition of two candidates for the succession—Trinley Thaye Dorje (b. 1983) and Ugyen Trinley Dorje (b. 1985)—is a major source of division among the Karma-Kagyupa. Ugyen Trinley Dorje and his followers have their headquarters in Rumtek, Sikkim, India. They are represented in the Americas by the Karma Triyana Dharmachakra. The majority of the Western Karma-oriented groups, and especially the DIAMOND WAY BUDDHISM organization led by the Danish-born master Ole Nydahl, support Thaye Dorje. Nydahl has founded more than 270 affiliated groups in North and South America, Western Europe, and most significantly, in many countries of the former Soviet Union. Thaye Dorje and his followers have their headquarters in New Delhi.

Addresses:

Karma Triyana Dharmachakra (supporters of Ugyen Trinley Dorje)
352 Meads Mountain Rd.
Woodstock, NY 12498
<http://www.karmakagyu.org>

Trinley Thaye Dorje Headquarters
B 19–20 Institutional Area
Mehrauli, New Delhi
110016
India
<http://www.diamondway.org> (the Diamond Way)

Lionel Obadia

Sources:

- Batchelor, Stephen. The Awakening of the West: The Encounter of Buddhism and Western Culture. London and San Francisco: Thorsons, 1994.
- Obadia, Lionel. Bouddhisme et Occident. La diffusion du bouddhisme tibétain en France. Paris: L'Harmattan, 1999.
- Stein, Rolf. Tibetan Civilization. Stanford: Stanford University Press, 1972.
- Thinley, Karma. The History of the Sixteen Karmapas of Tibet. Boulder, CO: Prajna Press, 1980.

Karo Batak Protestant Church (GBKP)

The Karo people, one division of the larger Batak cultural group, reside in northern Sumatra. They were the last of the Batak people toward whom the Dutch Reformed missionaries directed their attention; however, in 1890 a missionary from the independent Nederlandsch Zendelinggenootschap started evangelizing in the area. He ran into immediate opposition, as the Karonese interpreted his presence as part of an effort by the Dutch to steal their lands. There were only five thousand converts in the first half century.

During the 1930s, an effort was made to build indigenous leadership within the relatively small Karonese Christian group, and in 1941 the first Karonese pastors were ordained and the Karo Batak Protestant Church was created and granted autonomy. Almost immediately the church confronted challenges, with the beginning of the war with Japan and then the formation of Indonesia as a new nation. However, the many years of work began to reap rewards in the 1950s, when mass movements led many into the church, even as Islam also began to grow in the same region. During the last half of the twentieth century more than 220,000 people had joined the church. This growth is partly accounted for by a reformulation of church life, as the leadership had ridden itself of attitudes hostile to Indonesian culture inherited from the Dutch missionaries.

At the end of the twentieth century the Karo Batak Protestant Church reported 225,500 members. The church has a presbyterian polity, and its synod is the highest legislative body. At its inception the church adopted traditional Reformed statements of faith, but in 1979 it also adopted a new confession (revised in 1984), which its members had written. In 1987 it began to ordain women to the ministry, though female elders had been present from the beginning of the century.

During the early part of the twentieth century the church began to develop a school system and opened its first medical facilities. These have now been extended, and an orphanage, a home for seniors, and a credit bank have been added. The church is a member of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES and the WORLD ALLIANCE OF REFORMED CHURCHES.

Address:

Karo Batak Protestant Church
Jalan Kapten Pala Bangun no. 66
Kabanjahe 22115
Sumatra Utara
Indonesia

Source:

Bauswein, Jean-Jacques, and Lukas Vischer, eds. The Reformed Family Worldwide: A Survey of Reformed Churches, Theological Schools, and International Organizations. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans, 1999.

Kashmir Saivism

The tantric Saivism or Shaivism of Kashmir is based on a canon of scriptures, called Agamas or Tantras, which are held to be revealed by the highest deity, Siva (or Shiva), and in which Siva himself teaches the foundations of the Saiva religion. These scriptures were produced several centuries before the culmination of exegetical activity between the ninth and eleventh centuries, when dualistic and monistic schools competed for their correct interpretation. Kashmir Saivism found its original in one of these monistic schools.

The Kashmirian dualist school, called Saiva Siddhanta, considered Siva, the soul, and the world as ontologically separate and ultimately real entities. According to the dualists, the soul is bound to transmigration by a beginningless defilement. The soul is therefore born into this world in order to experience its karma, remove the defilement, and thus gain liberation. In order to reach this freedom from transmigration the soul has to be initiated into the Saiva religion: the rite of initiation and the subsequent practice removes the defilement, so that the soul can be released at death.

Apart from the Siddhanta and its ritual, which centered on the worship of Sadasiva (a form of Siva usually pictured with five heads and ten arms), there existed more heterodox cults of female deities, as for instance the Trika ("trinity"), in which three goddesses (Para, Parapara, and Aparā) are worshipped, or the Krama ("sequence"), in which cycles of different manifestations of Kali are revered. Adherents of these cults upheld as valid the same canon of scriptures revealed by Siva as did the Siddhanta, but based their views and practices on a different segment of the text. According to the cults' philosophical system, which is named after its main text, Recognition (Pratyabhijna), there is only one reality, namely consciousness of Siva, from which souls and the world appear spontaneously. According to this monistic tradition, defilement is merely the soul's ignorance of its true identity as Siva. Once this identity is recognized, liberation occurs, even in this life.

Both the dualists and the monists had an impact in the rest of the Indian subcontinent. The southern Saiva-Siddhanta was heavily influenced and even dependent on the philosophical system their Kashmirian predecessors had developed, and the monist philosophy was integrated into other tantric systems, most notably the Sridaya. In Kashmir the monist system survived in a gnostic form, which was termed Kashmir Saivism when its works were first published at the beginning of the twentieth century.

Isolated in the Kashmir Valley, the followers of Kashmir Saivism have remained relatively few in number, a situation maintained by Muslim dominance in the region. In recent years, many Saivites have fled the war-torn valley of Kashmir and relocated to Jammu, New Delhi, and other sites throughout northern India. The Saivite philosophy attracted the attention of modern Indian charismatic gurus like Bhagwan Shree Rajneesh, or Osho (1931–1990), who founded the OSHO COMMUNE INTERNATIONAL, and Swami Muktananda (SYDA). The last traditional Kashmirian guru who claimed to transmit the Kashmir Saivist system, Swami Lakshman Joo, has been the starting point of an American-based group, the Kashmir Saivism Fellowship, which may be contacted through its Web site.

Address:

Kashmir Saivism Fellowship
<http://www.kashmirshaivism.org/>

Jürgen Hanneder

Sources:

Hughes, John. Self Realization in Kashmir Shaivism: The Oral Teachings of Swami Lakshmanjoo. Albany: State University of New York Press, 1994.

Lakshman Joo Raina, Swami. Kashmir Saivism: The Secret Supreme. Albany: State University of New York Press, 1985

Sanderson, Alexis. "The Doctrine of the Malinivijayottaratantra." In Ritual and Speculation in Early Tantrism: Studies in Honour of André Padoux, edited by Teun Goudriaan, 281–312. Albany: State University of New York Press, 1992.

———. "Saivism and the Tantric Traditions." In The World's Religions: The Religions of Asia. edited by Friedhelm Hardy, 128–172. London: Routledge, 1990.

Kazakhstan

The area that now constitutes the modern nation of Kazakhstan was inhabited by various peoples as early as 2000 B.C.E. At a later date, it was overrun by Attila’s Huns and then by the Turks. In the eighth century C.E., a Turkish kingdom emerged that would create a high culture, especially in western sites along the shores of the Caspian Sea. At this time Islam was introduced. Over the following centuries, a sense of identity would slowly grow among the Kazakh peoples, tied together by their Turkish dialect and Hanafite Sunni Islam, though after the fall of the Turkish kingdom there was no uniting political entity.

Russians began to expand southward into Kazakhstan in the eighteenth century, and in the first half of the nineteenth century all of the country was annexed to Russia. The new authorities completely reorganized the ruling administration and moved to pacify still independent-minded local rulers. Russia exploited the region’s mineral wealth while using the area as a place to banish political dissidents.

Kazakhs rebelled in 1916 in reaction to an order from the czar for universal military mobilization. The rebellion was crushed and the nation was incorporated into the Soviet Union. Kazakhstan was one of the first of the Soviet Re-

Status of religions in Kazakhstan, 2000-2050

Followers	2000			2025	2050
	total	%	rate
Muslims	6,921,000	42.7	1.57	8,850,000	10,391,000
Nonreligious	4,759,000	29.3	-1.27	4,595,000	4,290,000
Christians	2,710,000	16.7	-2.10	2,750,000	2,800,000
Orthodox	1,402,000	8.6	-4.23	1,200,000	1,000,000
Independents	650,000	4.0	3.08	820,000	1,000,000
Roman Catholics	510,000	3.1	2.46	600,000	700,000
Atheists	1,771,000	10.9	-1.21	1,400,000	1,050,000
Ethnoreligionists	27,800	0.2	0.30	50,000	50,000
Buddhists	17,000	0.1	0.01	32,000	55,000
Jews	13,900	0.1	-0.26	16,000	19,000
Zoroastrians	3,200	0.0	1.49	5,000	10,000
Total population	16,223,000	100.0	-0.31	17,698,000	18,665,000

publics to push for independence during the Gorbachev era at the end of the 1980s, and it became an independent country in 1991.

By the 1990s, there were about as many Russians as Kazakhs in the country, but the Russian population dropped significantly during the 1990s. Russians were approximately 35 percent of the population as the twenty-first century began. Russian Cossacks have emerged as a conservative minority, demanding that Russia take back the section of Kazakhstan that they largely control. Russia has demanded that the new Kazakh rulers treat the Russian minority fairly.

Islam came to the area in 649 with the Arab Caliph ‘Uthman ibn ‘Affan (644–656). In the thirteenth century, the Mongols captured Kazakhstan, but they too converted to Islam, and in 1360 the Mongol Khan Tamburlaine (1336–1405) established the famed city of Samarkand as his capital. His army stretched the Mongol Empire to Poland and overran the Russian cities of Moscow and Kiev. Following the Russian invasion and takeover in the nineteenth century, Muslim Kazakhs were marginalized. In this context, the Sufi Brotherhoods emerged as the focus of a variety of independence movements. They were especially opposed to the secularization of the public schools by the Soviets. In the 1930s, Stalin instituted a harsh policy of repression that included the closing of the remaining Muslim schools, suppressing the Sufi organizations, and the further reduction of functioning mosques.

In 1943 the Russians created the Muslim Spiritual Board of Central Asia with headquarters at Tashkent, Uzbekistan. All imams had to register with the board, which controlled two seminaries for the training of religious leaders. Even as the board took more control, Kazakhstan took significant steps toward secularization, generally attributed to the both the negative pressure of the long Soviet rule and the improved educational level of the general public. Today, most Muslims are content with the present government, although some younger, more conservative believers are pushing for the creation of an Islamic state.

Although most Kazakhs identify themselves as Muslims, because of their isolation from the main centers of the Muslim world a form of popular folk Islam has established itself among the majority of religious practitioners. Their practice includes a number of activities generally denounced by more learned Muslims, including the visiting of the graves of Muslim “saints,” to curry favor, the use of Quranic verses on amulets, and ancestor veneration.

Christianity was established in Kazakhstan and a variety of sectarian religious expressions were introduced in the wake of Russian occupation and the encouragement of immigration to the region. The RUSSIAN ORTHODOX CHURCH is now second in size only to Sunni Islam as a religious community. There are three dioceses, whose bishops reside at Almaty, Cimkent, and Uralsk.

The first Baptist church in Kazakhstan was established in 1908 after Gavriel I. Mazaev, the brother of the president of the Russian Baptist Union, moved to Petropavlovsk near the Russian border. Other churches were formed as settlers from different parts of the Soviet Union arrived over the next decades. Russian Baptist ranks were swelled by the arrival of displaced Germans during World War II. Unable to form separate congregations, the German-speaking believers attended the Russian Baptist churches that accommodated them with German services. They were able to grow slowly in the decades following the war and expanded greatly in the 1990s. By 1995 more than 170 congregations had come together in the Union of Evangelical Christians-Baptists, the largest of the several Protestant/Free Church organizations in the country.

A number of competing groups ultimately derive from the Baptist union. One group of Baptists who are not part of the union and who have refused to register with the government have been the subject of government actions aimed at forcing them either to register or to dissolve.

An elderly priest at the Eleninsky Convent in Konstantinovo, Kazakhstan (T. Burandinov/TRIP)

Among the several groups to find their way into Kazakhstan in the twentieth century is the SEVENTH-DAY ADVENTIST CHURCH. The work grew slowly during the Soviet era, but the Kazakhstan Conference was organized in 1879 and by the mid-1990s there were thirty-six congregations. Pentecostalism also has a small presence in the country. A fair number of immigrants moved into Kazakhstan during the twentieth century, including a number of Koreans. The Korean community supports both Baptist churches and Buddhist centers.

Source:

Muslims of the Soviet East (English ed.). Tashkent, Uzbekistan: Muslim Religious Board of Central Asia and Kazakhstan, 1968–?. Various issues.

Kenya

Kenya is one of the oldest inhabited areas in the world; the Rift Valley that runs north and south in northwestern Kenya is where some of the oldest humanoid remains known were found. In relatively modern times, Kenya was home to the Bantu people, divided culturally into a number of groups, and also to other peoples, especially in the north and east near the country's borders with Sudan, Ethiopia, and Somalia.

Beginning in the seventh century, various groups from the Arabian Peninsula began settlements along the eastern coast of Africa. In 975 C.E., Ali bin Sultan al-Hassan, a prince from Shiraz (Iran), was driven from his country and relocated to the coast of Kenya, where he built several cities including Manisa (now Mombasa). The Arabs mixed with the Bantus and built a trading culture that eventually extended as far south as Mozambique. These cities flourished through the sixteenth century, when the Portuguese arrived. The Portuguese were set on monopolizing trade with India and set about occupying and destroying the cities. The Portuguese were forced out in 1698, and the coastal culture did not recover.

In the nineteenth century, the Masai, a group of Nilotic people, established their authority through much of the interior. Their hegemony was short lived, however, as their power was built upon their herd of domesticated cows, which was largely wiped out in a massive epidemic. At the end of the nineteenth century, a series of agreements among the European powers gave England hegemony in Kenya and neighboring Uganda. The British government moved to construct a railroad from Mombasa to Nairobi to Kampala, the capital of Uganda. As the railroad was constructed, Europeans moved in and settled on the land. These lands were primarily taken, without compensation, from the Kikuyu people.

In 1944 a movement was created to defend Kikuyu interests. Two important organizations were the Kenya Africa Union, headed by Jomo Kenyatta (c. 1891–1978), and the secret group called Mau Mau, which operated as a terrorist organization attacking settlers' property and persons. Through the 1950s, a variety of repressive measures were instituted, but finally in 1960 Kenyatta's organization was recognized as the Kenya African National Union. Kenya became an independent country in the British Commonwealth in 1963, and Kenyatta was elected president the following year. Following Kenyatta's death in 1978, Daniel

Status of religions in Kenya, 2000-2050

Followers	2000			2025	2050
	total	%	rate
Christians	23,860,000	79.3	2.62	34,222,000	43,872,000
Roman Catholics	7,000,000	23.3	2.92	10,700,000	13,500,000
Independents	6,607,000	22.0	2.87	10,000,000	13,000,000
Protestants	6,375,000	21.2	3.37	10,250,000	13,525,000
Ethnoreligionists	3,462,000	11.5	1.48	3,500,000	1,650,000
Muslims	2,187,000	7.3	2.67	3,100,000	3,850,000
Baha'is	308,000	1.0	2.54	550,000	900,000
Hindus	146,000	0.5	1.98	200,000	400,000
Jains	55,300	0.2	1.43	70,000	150,000
Nonreligious	32,000	0.1	4.30	60,000	140,000
Sikhs	27,500	0.1	1.50	49,000	65,000
Jews	1,800	0.0	1.11	2,500	3,500
Zoroastrians	730	0.0	1.95	1,500	2,500
Buddhists	270	0.0	3.08	600	1,000
Total population	30,080,000	100.0	2.48	41,756,000	51,034,000

arap Moi (b. 1924) succeeded him as president, and continues in that office to the present. The single party system that has supported Moi has been continually cited for human rights violations.

Traditional religions remain strong in Kenya, although the number of practitioners has dropped steadily through the last half of the twentieth century. In the 1940s the percentage had dropped to around 60 percent, and by the 1970s an estimated 30 percent of the population was following traditional faiths. That percentage had further decreased to approximately 10 percent by the end of the century.

The first attack upon traditional religions came from Islam, which was brought by Arab settlers in the tenth century. Islam remained concentrated along the coast and the region adjacent to the border with Somalia. Sunni Islam of the SHAFIITE SCHOOL OF ISLAM is strongest among the Somali people (who are almost all Muslim) and has a large following among the Digo, Boran, Pokomo, and Duruma people. In the years following independence, Islam suffered a loss in Kenya as Somali people moved to Somalia and as Muslims along the coast reverted to their traditional religion. However, Islam has since grown because of the migration of a number of Indians and Pakistanis. The largest group of immigrants follow the Shafiite school, but significant numbers follow the HANAFITE SCHOOL OF ISLAM and there are also many SHI'A ISLAM adherents. Minority Shi'a groups include the followers of ISMAILI ISLAM (Nizaris, BOHRAS) and the Ithna-Asharis. There is also a community of several thousand members of the AHMADIYYA MOVEMENT IN ISLAM. In the years since World War II, the BAHÁ'Í FAITH has had rapid growth both among the Bantu groups and among the Asian Indians.

Islamic mosques in Nairobi (Corel)

Christianity was introduced into Kenya by the Portuguese, and evangelistic activity coincided with the destruction of the coastal culture. Although a mission was established and a number of converts were received into the ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH, the work was lost when the Portuguese were driven away. Christianity did not return until 1844, with the arrival of Johann Ludwig Krapf (1810–1881), a CHURCH OF ENGLAND missionary representing the CHURCH MIS-SIONARY SOCIETY. Krapf's work was confined to the coast until the arrival of John Rehmman two years later. Backed by the British government for many years, the Anglican community would become the largest in Kenya and finally emerge as the CHURCH IN THE PROVINCE OF KENYA.

British Methodists, representatives of the United Methodist Free Churches (now a constituent part of the METHODIST CHURCH in the United Kingdom) came to Mombasa in 1862. They expanded their work along the Tana River and then into the area northeast of Mount Kenya. It is now known as the Methodist Church in Kenya. It would be the end of the century before other churches would discover Kenya; representatives of the CHURCH OF SCOTLAND came in 1891, and of the Africa Inland Mission four years later. The African Inland Mission had spectacular success. Its founder, Peter Cameron Scott, led the first missionary team, which proved a disaster, but a second effort soon after the turn of the century opened work successively among the Nzawi, Masai, and Tugen peoples. The mission became independent as the AFRICAN INLAND CHURCH in 1943, by which time it had eclipsed all other churches with the exception of the Catholic and Anglican churches. Numerous additional missions were started after the opening of Western Kenya by the railroad in 1902.

The Roman Catholic Church began work in Kenya anew in 1889, with the arrival of the WHITE FATHERS. The church supported a broad program in Kenya, and the White Fathers were soon joined by priests from a variety of orders. As response was significant, more priests arrived and the Roman Catholic Church soon became the largest church in the land. By the early 1960s it claimed 20 percent of the population. The first Kenyan was ordained in 1927, and Kenya was established as a separate province in 1953. Nairobi was erected as an archepiscopal see and three additional dioceses were named. The first Kenyan bishop was consecrated in 1957. Since then, the church has continued to expand.

Two factors have dramatically changed the Christian community in Kenya. The move to create what are termed AFRICAN INITIATED CHURCHES is generally seen as beginning in Kenya with the establishment of the NOMIYA LUO CHURCH by former Anglicans in 1914. It was followed by such groups as the African Church of the Holy Spirit (1927), the Kenya Foundation of the Prophets Church (1927), the National Independent Church of Africa (1929), and the Gospel Furthering Bible Church (1936). In 1962 the Roman Catholic Church experienced a significant schism when members left to found the LEGION OF MARY the largest single Roman Catholic schism in Africa. More than two hundred independent denominations had been formed by the 1970s, and the number has continued to grow to the present.

The second factor to shape Kenyan Christianity has been Pentecostalism, which was brought to Kenya in 1910 by representatives of the PENTECOSTAL ASSEMBLIES OF CANADA. Other North American and European Pentecostal churches began work over the twentieth century. The original work, now known as the Pentecostal Assemblies of God, and an African Initiated Church, the AFRICAN INDEPENDENT PENTECOSTAL CHURCH OF AFRICA, are among the largest churches in the country. The African Independent Pentecostal Church was at one time the largest Protestant Free Church in the country, though it has now been eclipsed by the African Inland Church. Additional churches that grew out of the work of the CHURCH OF GOD (ANDERSON, INDIANA), THE SALVATION ARMY, and the SEVENTH-DAY ADVENTIST CHURCH are now home to large memberships, and the largest Friends church outside of North America is the EAST AFRICA YEARLY MEETING OF FRIENDS (affiliated with the FRIENDS UNITED MEETING).

Kenya has been a center of ecumenism in Africa. The All Africa Council of Churches is headquartered there. The National Council of Churches of Kenya, which unites those churches affiliated with the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES, traces its beginning to the Alliance of Protestant Missions founded in 1918. More conservative Evangelical churches are brought together in the Evangelical Fellowship of Kenya, which in turn is affiliated with the Association of Evangelicals of Africa and the WORLD EVANGELICAL FELLOWSHIP. Several ecumenical structures serve the African Initiated Churches, including the East African Christian Alliance and the United Orthodox Independent Churches of East Africa.

With such a diverse Christian community, one would think that there would also be diversity among the other major religious communities, and such is indeed the case. For example, as early as 1886 the first Nams came to Kenya, along with Hindus and Sikhs who arrived to work on the railroad project. Although the great majority of Indians and Pakistanis returned to India after the completion of the railroad, enough stayed to create a significant community as the century progressed, and they numbered one hundred thousand by 1970. Members of both the TERAPANATH SVE-TAMBARA JAIN TRADITION and Terapanth Digambara tradition are present, though the former are in the majority. A variety of Hindu groups are present, many having brought their religion from different parts of India. These older groups cooperate with the Hindu Council of Kenya. Among the newer movements, the ARYA SAMAJ have a strong following, and the INTERNATIONAL SOCIETY FOR KRISHNA CONSCIOUSNESS has gathered members among the indigenous population. The Sikhs have established their main center in Nairobi, but members now live in other parts of the country as well. All three groups have declined since World War II as members have either returned to India or converted to the Bahá'í Faith.

Among newer Indian groups, SAHAJA YOGA and the OSHO COMMUNE INTERNATIONAL have small followings. The THEOSOPHICAL SOCIETY brought the Western Esoteric tradition from its international headquarters in India, and there is also a very small group of Zoroastrians (Parsis).

Buddhism was unknown in Kenya until 1993, when a Tibetan lama came to Nairobi to form a Buddhist society. He left after giving a basic course on meditation, but the next year, Maung Soe Myint, a native Kenyan, traveled to Myanmar to study Vipassana meditation. He returned with books, tapes, and videos and shared them with the members of the Buddhist Society in Nairobi. As a result, Chanmye Sayadaw was invited to visit Kenya and other African countries, and he came in 1995. As a result of that visit, the first vihara (monastery) in Africa was constructed by the Myanmar community in South Africa. Also in the 1990s, a center of KARMA-KAGYUPA (TIBETAN BUDDHISM) has been opened, and a small Buddhist community has begun to take its place in Kenyan society.

In 1903 the British government offered the Zionist Organization land in what is now Kenya upon which to create a semiautonomous Jewish settlement. Although the organization officially turned down the offer, some individual Jews responded to it and settled in Kenya. Today the community consists of approximately 165 families who meet together for worship at the Nairobi Hebrew Congregation.

Sources:

- Barrett, David B., et al., eds. Kenya Churches Handbook: The Development of Kenyan Christianity. Kisumu, Kenya: Evangel Press, 1973.
- “Bibliography of Christianity and Religion in Kenya.” In Kenya Churches Handbook. Kisumu, Kenya: Evangel Press, 1973, pp. 315–332.
- Fedders, A. Peoples and Cultures of Kenya. Nairobi, Kenya: Transafrica, 1979.
- “The First Myanmar Bikkhu Missionary to Step on African Soil.” Posted at <http://web.ukonline.co.uk/buddhism/kolay/01b.htm>. Accessed December 1, 2001.
- Githieya, F. K. The Freedom of the Spirit: African Indigenous Churches in Kenya. Atlanta: Scholars Press, 1997.
- Nthamburi, Z. J., ed. From Mission to Church: A Handbook of Christianity in East Africa. Nairobi, Kenya: Uzima Press, 1991.

Kimbanguist Church (Congo)/ Église de Jésus Christ sur la terre par le prophète Simon Kimbangu

The largest church instituted in Africa, with an estimated 7 million members in 1999, is most commonly known as the Kimbanguist Church. Simon Kimbangu (c. 1887–1951) was born in the village of Nkamba in western Congo. On April 6, 1921, the founding date of the church, he was reported to have performed miraculous healings, the first of many reported miracles. His fame spread, and thousands flocked to Nkamba (later called Nkamba-Jerusalem) to be healed and to experience this revival for themselves. Kimbangu preached against fetishes and proclaimed trust in God, moral chastity and monogamy, love for one’s enemies, and obedience to government authority.

In spite of his peaceful message, the local Belgian colonial administrator Morel was ordered to arrest Kimbangu, and Nkamba was plundered by soldiers. Many of Kimbangu’s supporters (including Baptist deacons) were imprisoned, but the prophet himself managed to escape. Less than two months after the beginning of the revival, Kimbangu was forced underground. The movement continued to grow, and in August 1921 a state of emergency in the region was declared and military occupation commenced.

Stories abounded about Kimbangu’s miraculous escapes from arrest until he, following Christ’s example, gave himself up voluntarily to the police in September. On October 3, 1921, after a trial before a three-man military tribunal without the opportunity to defend himself, Kimbangu was found guilty of sedition and hostility toward whites and was sentenced to 120 lashes and the death penalty. The sentence was commuted to life imprisonment after pleas for mercy made by the Baptist Missionary Society to the Belgian king. Kimbangu was imprisoned in solitary confinement in Elisabethville (now Lubumbashi), two thousand kilometers from his home. He was never released, his family was never allowed to visit him (nor was any Protestant minister). He died in prison thirty years later, on October 12, 1951.

Kimbangu’s followers, forced underground, continued to increase. Kimbangu was now a national hero, and his wife, Muile Marie, became the leader of the underground Kimbanguist movement until her death in 1959. The colonial authorities, supported by European missions, persecuted Kimbanguists everywhere. They were imprisoned, exiled, and restricted—about 150,000 Kimbanguists were deported during the period 1921–1957. Deportations actually helped the movement spread across the entire Congo and become a multiethnic national movement.

In 1955 the Kimbanguists held a demonstration in Leopoldville against their persecution, and the following year they appealed to the United Nations. They did not organize themselves into a denomination until 1956, and the Kimbanguist Church (Eglise de Jésus Christ sur la terre par le prophète Simon Kimbangu, or EJCSK) was only formally constituted in 1961. In December 1959, six months before the country’s independence, the EJCSK was given official recognition. The youngest son of Kimbangu, Joseph Diangienda (1918–1993), became head of the church as legal representative, and his brother Salomon Dialungana Kiangani (b. 1917) became keeper of the holy city, Nkamba-Jerusalem. After independence in 1960, the church grew rapidly, but it failed in its attempt to unite all the disparate Kimbanguists into a single national church. In 1960 Simon Kimbangu’s remains were reinterred at Nkamba-Jerusalem and a mausoleum was built in his honor, now a place of pilgrimage. The pool at Nkamba where Kimbangu used to send the sick to bathe, called Bethesda, is regarded as holy water and used in rituals all over central Africa; Kimbanguists sprinkle and drink it for healing, purification, and protection.

A multitude of 350,000 Kimbanguists held their first Communion service at Nkamba on April 6, 1971, fifty years after Kimbangu began his public ministry and, it was said, in obedience to his postresurrection command. Two months before this occasion, Diangienda “sealed” thousands of members in the Lower Congo with a “special blessing,” the sign of the cross. The Eucharist is now celebrated three times a year by the EJCSK, at Christmas and on April 6 and October 12 (the significant dates of Kimbangu’s life).

Several secessions from the EJCSK occurred during the 1960s, but President Mobutu Sese Seko’s severe repression and tougher laws regarding the registration of churches discouraged these. By 1968 there were 93,600 children in EJCSK schools, and church-sponsored clinics, agricultural settlements, brickyards, and many other successful enterprises were established.

In 1969 the EJCSK was admitted to the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES, and soon afterwards it was declared by President Mobutu to be one of three recognized churches in the Congo, the largest after the ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH.

Diangienda died in 1993 and was succeeded as the head of the church by his elder brother Dialungana, in a period of transition.

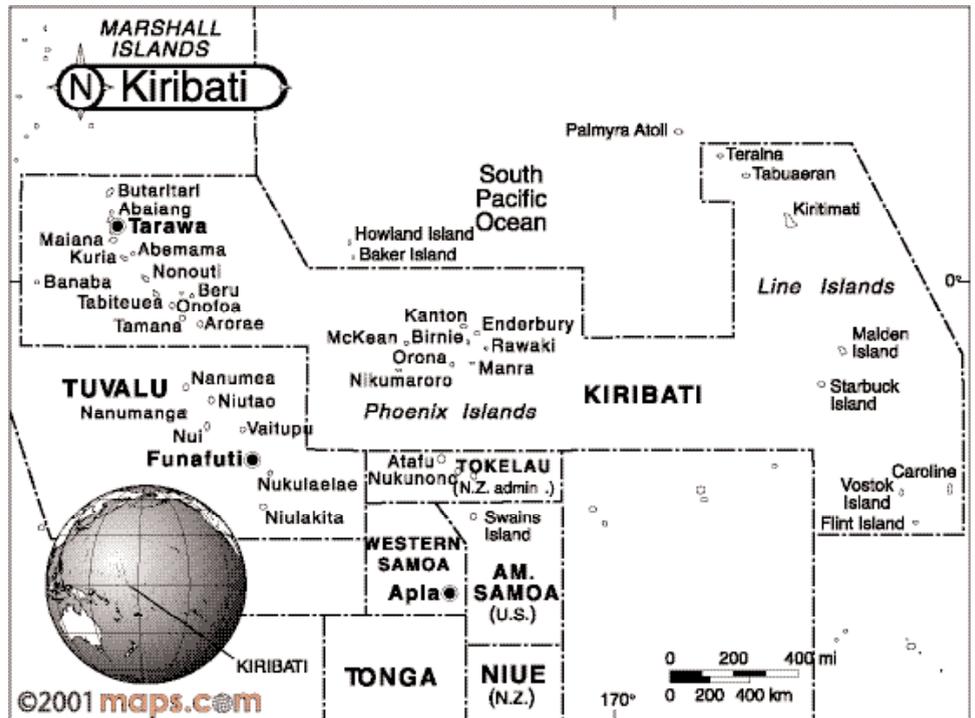

Address:

Kimbanguist Church
 P.O. Box 9801
 Kinshasa 1
 Democratic Republic of Congo

Allan H. Anderson

Sources:

- Hastings, Adrian. The Church in Africa, 1450–1930. Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1994.
- MacGaffey, Wyatt. Modern Kongo Prophets: Religion in a Plural Society. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1983.
- Martin, Marie-Louise. Kimbangu: An African Prophet and His Church. Oxford: Basil Blackwell, 1975.

Kiribati

Kiribati is one of the new nations carved out of the scattered islands of the South Pacific. In the ancient past these islands were inhabited by Micronesian people, who had their initial contact with Europeans in 1764, when the British arrived. For the next two centuries the islands would be known as the Gilbert Islands. The islands were largely ignored for a century, but in 1856 they were settled by Hiram Bingham, Jr. (1831–1908) from the AMERICAN BOARD OF COMMISSIONERS FOR FOREIGN MISSIONS, which represented Congregationalists and Presbyterians. By the end of the decade a flourishing trade in copra and palm oil had developed. The work of the American Board expanded through the rest of the century. In 1892 the islands had been named as a British protectorate and in 1916 they became a crown colony. Following this last action, the American Board relinquished its backing of the missionary effort in favor of their British counterpart, the LONDON MISSIONARY SOCIETY. In 1916 the Gilbert Islands and the Ellice Islands to the south were grouped together as the Colony of the Gilbert and Ellice Islands. In 1975 the Ellice Islands were separated from the Gilbert Islands, and they are now known as the nation of Tuvalu.

In the meantime, Roman Catholicism was brought to the island by several Gilbertese who had converted while work-

Status of religions in Kiribati, 2000–2050

Followers	2000			2025	2050
	total	%	rate
Christians	78,700	94.4	1.39	110,000	141,000
Roman Catholics	44,100	52.9	1.83	65,000	85,000
Protestants	37,000	44.4	1.00	50,000	60,000
Marginal Christians	1,700	2.0	3.54	4,000	6,500
Baha'is	4,300	5.2	2.13	8,000	12,000
Nonreligious	370	0.4	3.91	850	1,500
Buddhists	10	0.0	0.96	40	80
Total population	83,400	100.0	1.43	119,000	155,000

ing in Tahiti. They began to share their faith with their neighbors on the island of Nonouti and had raised up a community of some five hundred believers by 1888, when the first priests arrived. The work grew through the twentieth century, and in 1966 a diocese was established at Bairiki on the main island of Tarawa. It now includes both Kiribati and Tuvalu. The Christians of Kiribati are almost evenly divided between Roman Catholics and Protestants.

The nineteenth-century Protestant work on the Gilbert and Ellice Islands led to the formation of a Protestant church serving the entire colony. Anticipating the separation of the two sets of islands, and reflecting the different ethnic backgrounds predominating in each, the church was divided into two independent churches (the Kiribati Protestant Church and the CHURCH OF TUVALU). The KIRIBATI PROTESTANT CHURCH is the largest Protestant group in the country. It has, however been joined by a number of other churches, including the SEVENTH-DAY ADVENTIST CHURCH (1947), the CHURCH OF GOD (CLEVELAND, TENNESSEE) (1955), the Elim Fellowship (1991), and the Anglican Church (part of the ANGLICAN CHURCH IN AOTEAROA, NEW ZEALAND, AND POLYNESIA). The BAHÁ'Í FAITH has also enjoyed some success in Kiribati since it emerged in 1955; assemblies may be found throughout the islands.

Sources:

Forman, Charles H. The Island Churches of the South Pacific: Emergence in the Twentieth Century. Maryknoll, NY: Orbis, 1982.

Healey, N. A Brief Introduction to the Kiribati Protestant Church. Bairiki Tarawa, Kiribati: Kiribati Protestant Church, 1983.

Toakai, T. "A Study of the Two Denominations in Tabiteuea, Kiribati: Kiribati Protestant Church and the Roman Catholic Church." B.D. thesis, Pacific Theological College, Suva, Fiji, 1980.

Kiribati Protestant Church

Protestant Christian faith was introduced to the Gilbert Islands in 1852, when Hiram Bingham II (1831–1908), the son of one of the pioneer Congregationalist missionaries in Hawaii, settled on the island of Abaiang. Bingham had previously worked on Hawaii and was dispatched by the Hawaiian Missionary Society, an organization that had developed out of the Hawaiian Mission, originally established by the AMERICAN BOARD OF COMMISSIONERS FOR FOREIGN MISSIONS. He was assisted by Hawaiians who had come to Christianity through the Congregational church. Their work spread through the northern Gilbert Islands.

In 1870 the British-based LONDON MISSIONARY SOCIETY (LMS), which also had a Reformed/Congregationalist background, began work in the southern Gilbert Islands in 1870, assisted by workers from its Samoan mission. Following World War I, the Hawaiians withdrew and turned their work over to the LMS and its successor bodies. The church became independent in 1969 as the Kiribati Protestant Church and the British Congregationalists withdrew their support. In 1970 the Gilbert Islands became independent as the new nation of Kiribati.

The Kiribati Protestant Church has a Reformed theological perspective and a Congregational polity. It is the largest Protestant religious organization in the country, with approximately twenty-eight thousand members out of a total population of eighty-one thousand. It sponsors the Tangintebu Theological College, founded in 1900, located on Tarawa.

The church is a member of the Kiribati National Council of Churches and the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES and it participates in the Pacific Conference of Churches. In the 1990s, after recognizing a need for assistance, the Christian Congregational Church in Canada launched efforts to support the church with literature and study materials and input on church renewal.

Address:

Kiribati Protestant Church
P.O. Box 80
Antebuka, Tawara
Kiribati

Sources:

Forman, Charles H. The Island Churches of the South Pacific: Emergence in the Twentieth Century. Maryknoll, NY: Orbis, 1982.

Healey, N. A Brief Introduction to the Kiribati Protestant Church. Bairiki Tarawa, Kiribati: Kiribati Protestant Church, 1983.

Toakai, T. "A Study of the Two Denominations in Tabiteuea, Kiribati: Kiribati Protestant Church and the Roman Catholic Church." B.D. thesis, Pacific Theological College (Suva, Fiji), 1980.

Kōdō Kyōdan

Kōdō Kyōdan is a Japanese new religion founded by Okano Shōdō (1900–1978), a Tendai Buddhist monk, along with his wife, Kimiko. They joined REIYUKAI in 1934, and then in 1936 they established a branch organization in Yokohama named Kōdōkai, which became independent of Reiyūkai in 1939 under its present name.

The main scripture of Kōdō Kyōdan is the Lotus Sutra, known as Jukueki Shōbō among its members. Kōdō Kyōdan focuses on revealing the Lotus Sutra's original message in order to unite the study of the doctrine with its practice. Kōdō means the path of filial piety, which is very important in the teachings of Kōdō Kyōdan. Adherents conduct meetings for spiritual training, hold daily discussion meetings, and worship ancestors in the belief that honoring the ancestors brings protection and happiness to the family. Kōdō Kyōdan celebrates Hana Matsuri in April to commemorate the birth of Shakamuni Buddha and observes the Obon festival for the ancestors in the summer.

In 1975, three years before his death, Okano Shōdō was succeeded by his son, Okano Shōkan. As the twenty-first century began, Kōdō Kyōdan reported 327,701 members. It is a member of the JAPAN BUDDHIST FEDERATION.

Address:

Kōdō Kyōdan
38 Torigoe, Knagawa-ku
Yokohama-shi, Kanagawa Prefecture 221-0044
Japan

Sources:

Hori, Ichiro, et al., eds. Japanese Religion: A Survey by the Agency for Cultural Affairs. Tokyo: Kodansha International, 1972.

Shōdō, Okano. An Introduction to Kōdō Kyōdan Buddhism (in Japanese). Yokohama: Kōdō Kyōdan, 1967.

Keishin Inaba

Kōfuku no Kagaku [Institute for Research in Human Happiness]

752

Kōfuku no Kagaku (the Science of Human Happiness), a Japanese “new, new religion” (shin shin shukyo) was started in Tokyo in 1986 by Ōkawa Ryuho (b. 1956), a former employee of Tomen, a Japanese trading house. During his days as a law student at Tokyo Imperial University, Ōkawa began to become aware gradually, through the consciousness of Shakyamuni the Buddha, that he was the incarnation of the supreme grand spirit known as El Cantare. Although the movement’s teachings have come to take on a more Buddhist tone, Okawa continues to be addressed by this title in ceremonies.

The movement experienced phenomenal growth during the first ten years of its existence, owing in large measure to the careful organization and planning of its strategy of expansion. As students concerned with the science of human happiness, members spent the first three years studying the teachings of Master Ōkawa, as the founder is known, and only later was stress placed on expansion. In 1990, called Sunrise 90, the declared aim of the movement was to raise the Sun of Truth, that is, to spread the name of the movement throughout Japan. An estimated seventy-seven thousand new recruits joined the movement in that year alone. 1991 saw the introduction of the “miracle three-year project,” the aim of which was to make Kōfuku no Kagaku the largest and most influential religion in Japan and to bring about a revolution there. In 1994 a full-scale program of missionary work was launched with the aim of establishing the movement in countries outside Japan. That year the movement’s first overseas offices were opened in London and New York.

Although this missionary program has had some success in Brazil, where there were some three thousand practitioners in 2001, results elsewhere have been disappointing. As is the case in other new, new religions, Kōfuku no Kagaku has made and makes use of all of the most advanced forms of mass communication to spread its teachings. It has produced several feature films, the first of which, The Terrifying Revelations of Nostradamus, was released in 1994, with Ōkawa himself as the executive director. The movement’s publications, moreover, run into the hundreds. Hermes: The Winds of Love was released in 1997.

Controversy came with growth in Japan. Forthright and decisive, Ōkawa is said to have written hundreds of books, the best known of which is The Laws of the Sun (1990), which provides an elaborate account of the movement’s cosmology and has assumed the status of a sacred text. The key idea of this book in relation to Ōkawa’s own role is that he is the one who reveals to the contemporary world the “rising of the Sun of God’s Truth,” which provides human beings with essential light and energy and which is often prevented from reaching them by “dark clouds.” Other writings often used in seminars and cited by practitioners are The Laws of Gold (1991) and The Laws of Eternity (1991).

Until recently, Ōkawa spoke and wrote a great deal about the imminent advent of the Apocalypse and the subsequent coming of Utopia—that is, a world in which everyone can declare without any reservations that they are happy. Being happy means living with a mind and heart full of love and compassion. Thus, utopia begins in the mind and heart of each individual, whose calling is then to transmit compassion to others.

The teachings of Kōfuku no Kagaku speak of four Principles of Happiness: love, knowledge, development, and self-reflection. The practice of these principles is said to enable an individual to acquire the “right mind,” indispensable to happiness. The most important principle is love, and the essence of real love is giving, and the practice of this kind of love is the beginning of happiness.

Over time, the movement has taken on a more Buddhist character, and the leadership itself is often at pains to stress its Buddhist credentials. The focus has shifted from broad cosmological concerns to the central concerns of Buddhism, such as the three treasures, the Buddha, the Dharma, and the Sangha.

The movement has built a number of meditation centers, including the Shōshin-Kan (House of the Right Mind) and the Mirai-Kan (House of the Future), both at Utsunomiya, some one hundred kilometers northeast of Tokyo in Tochigi Prefecture. Both of these centers are regarded as the Shōshin-Kan, or main temple.

Terms of membership have changed several times since the movement began in 1986, and each time they have become less demanding. Moreover, for some time now the term kaiin (member) has not been used to describe the ordinary practitioner, who is known instead as a believer (shinja). Although there are various types of believers, the term is generally applied to all those who attend seminars and read the founder’s writings, the most important of which is The Laws of the Sun (1990).

Address:

Kōfuku no Kagaku
1–2–38 Higashi Gotanda
Shinagawa-ku, Tokyo 141–0022
Japan
<http://www.irhpress.co.jp/> (multilingual)
<http://people.we.mediaone.net/mshughes/> (Web site of the Los Angeles center)

Peter B. Clarke

Sources:

- Masaki Fukui. “Kofuku no Kagaku. The Institute for Research in Human Happiness (IRH).” In A Bibliography of Japanese New Religions, edited by Peter B. Clarke, 149–167. Eastbourne, England: Japan Library, 1999.
- Okawa, Ryuho. The Laws of the Sun. The Revelations of Buddha that Enlightens the New Age. Tokyo: IRH Press, 1990.

- . The Laws of Gold. Tokyo: IHR Press, 1991.
- . The Laws of Eternity. Tokyo: IHR Press, 1991.
- Trevor, Astley. “The Transformation of a Recent Japanese New Religion. Ōkawa Ryūhū and Kōfuku no Kagaku.” Japanese Journal of Religious Studies 22, 3–4 (1995): 343–380.

Kokuchū-Kai

Kokuchū-kai, literally translated as “National Pillar Association,” was founded in Japan by Tanaka Chigaku (1861–1939) in 1914. Kokuchū-kai and the ideas of Tanaka Chigaku represent the nationalistic form of Nichiren Buddhism, and Tanaka and his followers tried to make the teachings of Nichiren, the founder of the NICHIRENSHU of Buddhism in Japan, into the pillar of Japanese nationalism.

Tanaka Chigaku was born in 1861 at Nihonbashi in Tokyo. Tanaka was influenced by his father, who was a devoted follower of Nichiren Buddhism but critical of established Buddhist sects. After the death of his parents, Tanaka became a novice at a Nichiren Buddhist temple called Myokakuji in Tokyo. But he soon became disillusioned with the practices of traditional Buddhist temples and in 1879 renounced his priestly vows. In 1880 Tanaka started his own lay Buddhist movement, Renge-kai (Lotus Society) in Yokohama, for propagating “true” Nichiren Buddhism. In 1884 Tanaka shifted to Tokyo and renamed his organization Rissho Ankoku-kai. In 1914 he reorganized the movement, and at Miho village in Shizuoka Prefecture, where he had previously built the Saisho-kaku as an auxiliary center, he established the Kokuchū-kai—its name derived from Nichiren’s words “I am the pillar of the state.” Kokuchū-kai was an amalgamation of all his followers as well as his activities, and it continues today as the principal organization devoted to Tanaka Chigaku and his work.

It was out of his conviction that the traditional Buddhist sects needed to be reformed that Tanaka launched his lay Buddhist movement with a call to “revive the way of the founder” (Nichiren). The importance that Tanaka attached to the lay practice of Buddhism is evident in his institution of a wedding ceremony according to Buddhist rites. However, Tanaka’s call for reformation was not restricted to Buddhism; through shakubuku (forced proselytization), it aimed at the reformation of the Japanese state as well as of the whole world. One of Tanaka’s major works, published in 1901, was Shumon no Ishin (Reformation of the Sect). In this monograph, he advocated the unification of Japanese Buddhism and its transformation into a great Nichiren organization that would serve as a kind of state religion.

The objective behind the founding of Kokuchū-kai as well as its predecessor organizations was to advocate Nichirenshugi, or Nichirenism. The term Nichirenshugi, coined by Tanaka himself in 1901, was meant to express the fusion of Nichiren’s teachings with the doctrine of Nihon Kokutai. Tanaka’s nationalistic philosophy was an interpretation of Nichiren Buddhism in the light of state-Shinto ideology and the emperor system. The publications of Kokuchū-kai, such as Myoshu, Nichirenshugi, Kokuchū Shimbun, and Tengyo Minpo, reveal Tanaka’s conception of Buddhism as being useful in the protection of the state.

In 1928 this organization built a stupa (dome-shaped shrine) memorial park in Tokyo called Myoshudaireibyō. Here the ashes of all the deceased are placed under one stupa, thus symbolically expressing the equality of humankind. After Tanaka’s death in November 1939, his eldest son Tanaka Houkoku took over the leadership of Kokuchū-kai, and in 1949, his son Tanaka Koho became the kaicho (president/chairman) of the organization. In 1996, Tanaka Kikyū took over as the kaicho of Kokuchū-kai. In the years since the end of World War II, Kokuchū-kai has mainly been involved in publications, symposiums, and the like. In the year 2000, it had a membership of about twenty thousand people in eighty-four branches, including an overseas branch in Brazil.

Even in the postwar period, Kokuchū-kai has maintained a nationalistic emphasis in its activities. Kokuchū-kai is at present campaigning to rename April 28, which is now observed as “Greenery Day” in Japan, as “Showa Day” because it is the birthday of Showa Emperor, Hirohito. The significance of this movement lies not so much in its size or activities but in its influence on important personalities of modern Japan. Japanese poet Miyazawa Kenji and army officer Ishiwara Kanji, who planned to spread the Imperial Way throughout the world, were members of Kokuchū-kai. Ultrationalists such as Inoue Nissho, Meiji period intellectuals such as Takayama Chogyū, and a major scholar of Japanese religion, Anezaki Masaharu (1873–1949), were also greatly influenced by Tanaka’s teachings of Nichirenshugi.

Ranjana Mukhopadhyaya

Sources:

- Kokuchūkai Hyakunen-shi*. Editorial supervision by Tanaka Koho. Tokyo: Kokuchūkai, 1984.
- Lee, Edwin B. “Nichiren and Nationalism: The Religious Patriotism of Tanaka Chigaku.” Monumenta Nipponica 30 (Spring 1975): 19–35.
- Otani Eiichi. Kindai Nihon no Nichirenshugi undo. Kyoto: Hozokan, 2001.
- Tanaka Koho. Tanaka Chigaku. Tokyo: Shinsekaisha, 1977.

Konkōkyō [Golden Light Teachings]

Konkōkyō [Golden Light Teachings], was founded in 1859 by Kawate Bunjiro (1814–1883), a peasant farmer from Okayama prefecture who had received numerous divine messages from the malevolent golden kami Konjin, whom he had at one time offended. Kawate believed not only that from 1859 he had become possessed by Konjin, whom he referred to as the Golden Principle Parent, or Kami, of the Universe (Tenchi Kane no Kami) and the Great Kami of Golden Light (Konko Daijin), but that he himself had actually become this same deity who had previously commanded him to leave farming and dedicate his life to the practice and teaching of toritsugi meditation.

Under the Meiji rulers who assumed power in 1868, Konkokyo aligned itself with state-sponsored Shinto, a decision it later came to reverse.

Konkōkyō's principal sacred text is Tenchi Kakitsuke (Divine Reminder). Its primary focus of worship is Tenchi Kane No Kami, and its main teaching concerns the reciprocal relationship between this Principle Parent or God and humanity, which gives fulfillment to both. Suffering results from the fact that human beings ignore this fundamental principle. The Principal Parent is the original source of all living beings and things, and so every individual life is linked to this source. The purpose of toritsugi meditation is to connect individuals with the Principal Parent and with all the kami. Konkōkyō mediators have the power to convey messages from the kami to individuals. The converse is also the case. This is not strictly a Shinto practice, nor is the belief in Tenchi Kane No Kami a Shinto belief.

The movement celebrates several major and minor festivals throughout the year including the New Year, Spring and Autumn Festivals, the Church Foundation Festival, and the Founder's Birthday Festival.

Konkōkyō's headquarters remain in Okayama where it was founded, although it also has an international center in Tokyo. As in other Japanese religions, among them TENRIKYO, the spiritual leader or kyoshu is chosen from the founder's descendants. Administratively, Konkōkyō is divided into districts under kyokan, or district heads, who are chosen from the leaders of the churches in the districts. The membership in Japan is around four hundred thousand. By comparison, the membership overseas is small, totaling only around two thousand for Canada, South Korea, the United States, Brazil, and Paraguay together.

Addresses:

Konkōkyō Main Headquarters
Otani 320, Konko-cho, Asakuchi-gun
Okayama-ken 719-0111
Japan

Konkōkyō International Center
(for non-Japanese-speaking inquirers)
2-17-11 Hongo, Bunkyo-ku
Tokyo 113-0033
Japan
<http://www.konkokyo.or.jp/> (multilingual)

Sources:

- Hardacre, Helen. "Creating State Shinto: The Great Promulgation Campaign and the New Religions." Japanese Journal of Religious Studies 12, 4 (1986): 29-64.
- McFarland, H. Neil. The Rush Hour of the Gods: A Study of New Religious Movements in Japan. New York: Macmillan, 1967.
- Shimazono, Susumu. "The Living Kami Idea in the New Religions of Japan." Japanese Journal of Religious Studies 6, 3 (1979): 389-412.

Korea, Democratic People's Republic of (North Korea)

The Democratic People's Republic of Korea (North Korea) shares a history with the Republic of Korea (South Korea) through World War II and the end of the Japanese invasion and occupation of the Korean Peninsula. At the war's end, Soviet troops moved into the northern half of the country and stopped at the 38th parallel, where they awaited the arrival of the U.S. forces moving in from the south. The United Nations called for an election and the establishment of an independent government, but the two superpowers could not agree on procedures. The south went ahead with elections, Syngman Rhee (1875-1965) assumed the presidency. In the north, the Provisional People's Committee proclaimed the Democratic People's Republic of Korea, and Kim Il Sung (1912-1994) emerged as prime minister. The Soviet Union withdrew its forces in December 1948.

The two Koreas were unable to resolve their different visions for the future of the country, and war broke out in 1950. An armistice was arranged in 1953. No permanent peace treaty has been signed, and the border between the two countries is still regarded as something of a battle line.

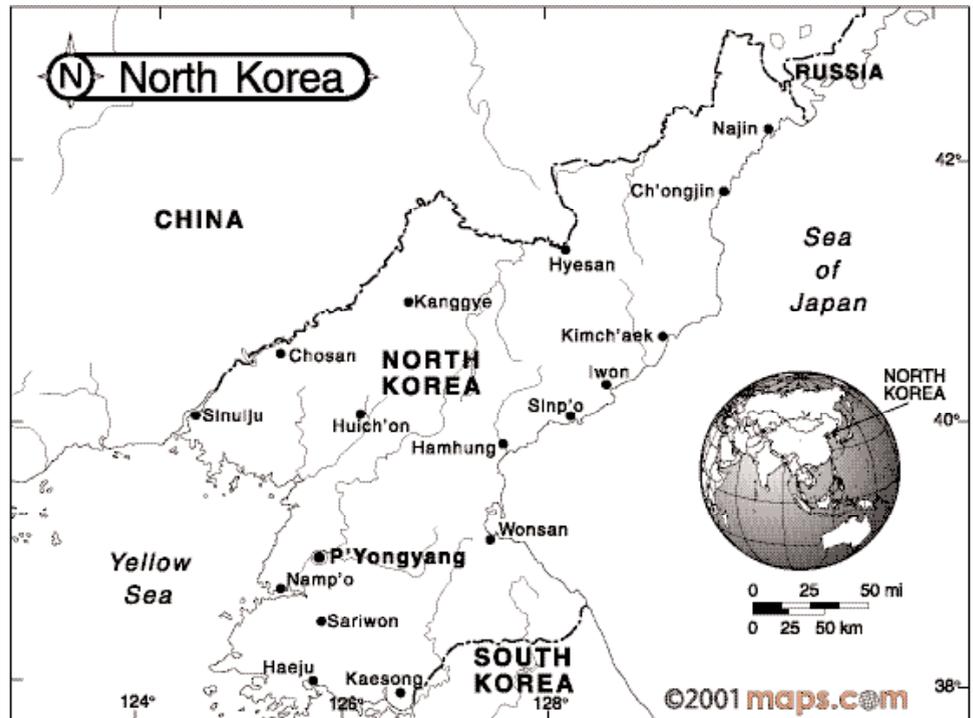

Kim Il Sung and the Korean Workers' Party led the country in the decades after the war. In the 1990s, he began preparing the way for his son Kim Jong Il (b. 1942) to succeed him. In 1992, Kim Il Sung was named the Grandfather of the Nation and his son, the Father of the Nation. Kim Jong Il was also named the president of the People's Assembly (the legislature) and secretary general of the Korean Workers' Party. He succeeded his father in 1994.

From its inception, the government of North Korea has been officially Marxist and atheist. However, by the end of World War II a wide variety of Protestant groups had opened missions throughout the north part of Korea, including the Presbyterians, the Anglicans, the Methodists, the BAPTISTS, and the SEVENTH-DAY ADVENTIST CHURCH. Even the SWEDENBORGIAN MOVEMENT had given birth to some forty congregations. The ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH had a diocese at P'yongyang.

In 1946 the government initiated the suppression of religious organizations and arrested many religious leaders. Then the government organized the Ki Dok Kyo Kyo Do Yen Mange, or Christian League, to facilitate church support for the new government. In 1950 the Methodists and Presbyterians were forced to combine their seminaries. Through the 1950s, as it became obvious that the Christian League was being eschewed by the great majority of believers, a full-scale repression of Christianity began. At the height of the Korean War, the United States occupied much of North Korea. When U.S. forces withdrew, some two million people fled south. Priests and other church workers either fled the country, moved to the south, or were arrested.

Harsh repression has continued and information about religious practice in North Korea remains difficult to obtain. The Constitution of North Korea provides both for freedom of religious belief and the right to use buildings for religious purposes. However, genuine religious freedom does not exist. In practice the government discourages all organized religious activity except that which serves the interests of the state. The constitution also stipulates that "no one can use religion as a means to drag in foreign powers" or to disrupt the social order. Thus, religious belief is considered an affront to government authority, and religion is often seen as subversive in its attempts to build extragovernment relations with foreign organizations. The government uses the cause of protecting the "social order" as a rationale for sporadic suppressive activity.

Nonetheless, there are continuing reports that Christian churches, Buddhist temples, and a few centers of CHONDogyo have survived. Since 1988 the government has allowed and informally sponsored several religious organizations in P'yongyang. Leaders of these organizations, including two Protestant churches and a Catholic church, have some limited contact with non-Korean religious officials and organizations, especially those engaged in supplying relief aid within the country. Protestants are represented through the Korean Christian Federation, which in 1983 published an edition of the Bible and a new hymnbook. Representatives of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES made their first visit to North Korea in 1985, and representatives for the Ko-

Status of religions in North Korea, 2000-2050

Followers	2000			2025	2050
	total	%	rate
Nonreligious	13,361,000	55.6	1.67	16,446,000	15,931,000
Atheists	3,745,000	15.6	1.71	4,600,000	4,700,000
Neoreligionists	3,095,000	12.9	1.38	3,500,000	3,600,000
Ethnoreligionists	2,952,000	12.3	1.59	3,000,000	3,000,000
Christians	503,000	2.1	1.93	1,425,000	3,040,000
Independents	432,000	1.8	1.99	900,000	2,000,000
Roman Catholics	55,000	0.2	1.80	300,000	600,000
Protestants	10,000	0.0	0.00	200,000	400,000
Buddhists	365,000	1.5	1.31	380,000	425,000
Chinese folk-religionists	15,000	0.1	0.68	32,000	64,000
Muslims	2,400	0.0	0.89	5,000	10,000
Total population	24,039,000	100.0	1.62	29,388,000	30,770,000

rean Christian Federation visited Switzerland for a meeting in 1986. Since that time contact has continued to occur periodically. In 1997 four members of the federation participated in a gathering of the WORLD ALLIANCE OF REFORMED CHURCHES. This was the first time Korean representatives had attended the meeting, even though the majority of Korean Christians are of Presbyterian heritage.

The Korean Christian Federation reports that there were some ten thousand Protestant Christians in North Korea as of the mid-1990s. (There were an estimated 120,000 in 1950.) There are only twenty-five active ministers. Reportedly, there is a Protestant seminary that is allowed to accept six to nine new students every three years. At the same time, continual reports of the arrest and execution of practicing Christians filter out of the country to the rest of the world.

Chondogyo (the Religion of the Heavenly Way) emerged in Korea in the nineteenth century as a popular new religion. At latest report, the government-sponsored Chondogyo Young Friends Party exists as a sanctioned vehicle for this religion, which is still popular among the people.

Address:

Korean Christian Federation
c/o Central Committee of the KCF
Konguk-Dong, Man Gyung Dae District
P'yongyang
Democratic People's Republic of Korea

Sources:

- Clark, A. D. A History of the Church in Korea. Seoul: Christian Literature Society of Korea, 1971.
- Grayson, James H. Korea: A Religious History. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1989.
- Kim, Duk-Whang. A History of Religions in Korea. Seoul: Daeji Moonhwa-sa, 1988.
- "U.S. Department of State Annual Report on International Religious Freedom for 1999: Democratic People's Republic of Korea." Released by the Bureau for Democracy, Human Rights, and Labor, Washington, DC. Posted at http://www.state.gov/www/global/human_rights/irf/irf_northkor99./html. Accessed September 9, 1999.

Korea, Republic of (South Korea)

The Korean Peninsula has been inhabited since Paleolithic times. As China emerged, it viewed the Koreans as a constant nuisance and in the second century B.C.E. attempted to establish hegemony over the peninsula. The Chinese threat appears to have been a catalyst for the formation of the three Korean kingdoms—Koguryo, Shilla, and Paekche—that for many centuries controlled the Korean Peninsula. The warrior-like Koguryo people, with their capital at P'yongyang, reigned in the north from the first century B.C. through the sixth century B.C.E. Then in the seventh century, Korea was united by the Shilla Kingdom, which pushed a remnant of the Koguryo people further north into Manchuria, where they established the kingdom of Parhae. The period of the unified Shilla Kingdom (668–935) was one of great prosperity that helped define Korea as a nation.

In the tenth century, Shilla authority disintegrated and eventually gave way to a rebellion from the north. In 935 the Shilla Kingdom was replaced by the Koryo Kingdom, which would last into the medieval era. It finally fell into a decadent state in the fourteenth century, thus preparing the way for the 1388 takeover by General Yi Song-gye (1335–1408). Yi invaded the capital and began a thorough reform of the nobility, the army, and the system of land distribution. In 1392 he declared himself king and began the new Choson Kingdom. Underlying Yi's reforms was a shift of royal favor from Buddhism to Confucianism. Yi also built the new capital known today as Seoul.

In 1573 Japan was unified under a strong monarch, Toyotomi Hideyoshi (1537–1598). He invaded Korea in 1592 and quickly overran Seoul and headed north. Even as his army occupied the peninsula, China counterattacked and Korea's outstanding navy cut the Japanese supply lines. The Japanese were finally forced to retreat in 1593, but the conflict left Korea a devastated land. Korea remained independent, but its glory had passed. In the nineteenth century, Korea also faced the invasion of the West. In the middle of the century isolationist policies came to dominance, only to be reversed as Japan again became a threat. Korea was constantly having to balance the alternating claims of Japan and China, and as the century ended, a new threat appeared in the form of Russia.

The Russian threat became the excuse for Japan to invade and form a protectorate over Korea. That protectorate, which would last through World War II, would be remembered for its brutality. The atrocities committed continue to sour Japanese-Korean relations. After World War II, Korea was affected by secret agreements between the big powers, by which the United States and Russia occupied the former Japanese territory. Their inability to reach an agreement on what they termed "the Korean problem" led to the Korean War and the division of the land into the two nations, the Republic of Korea in the south and the Democratic People's Republic of Korea in the north.

(For the continuing history of North Korea, see previous encyclopedia entry.) In 1947 the United Nations called for a nationwide election and the establishment of an independent government. The election was held in the south in 1948, and a new government was installed. The South Korean government had the support of the United States. The USSR withdrew its troops from the north, but the United States remained in the south. The United States had the support of the United Nations, whereas the USSR was temporarily boycotting the Security Council. Thus when the North Koreans attacked in 1950, the United States came to the aid of South Korea. The bitter war was fought to a draw in 1953. A cease fire was arranged, but no permanent peace treaty was ever signed.

In the years since the war, South Korea has gone through a series of governments, including the dictatorship of Park Chung Hee (1917–1979), which began in 1961. Under Park, South Korea emerged as an Asian economic giant. He was assassinated in 1979. The country continues to struggle with creating a democratic government and solving the problem of unifying the Korean Peninsula.

While South Korea has moved toward democracy, it has allowed a great deal of religious freedom, and the variant religious strains that have been introduced over the years have been allowed to persist and grow. Ancient Korean religion was a mystical faith built around a belief that material objects and the forces of nature possess spiritual entities. Included in this vast spirit world are the souls of ancestors. Intercourse with the spirits is carried out by the mudang, or shaman. Shamans remain popular religious figures who specialize in communication with the spirit world through ceremonies known as kuts, a colorful ritual performance that may take several days to complete. During this ceremony the shaman will become possessed of a spirit. Many who seek the services of the shamans otherwise identify themselves as Buddhists or Christians.

Buddhism entered Korea in the fourth century B.C.E. from China, initially taking hold in the Koguryo Kingdom during the reign of Sosurim (371–381). At about the same time, in the 380s, an Indian missionary priest named Marananda introduced Buddhism in the Paekche Kingdom. The new faith enjoyed royal patronage and quickly gained a foothold. However, it was not until the sixth century that it was able to gain a following in the Shilla Kingdom, after the royal family accepted it in 527. By the tenth century and the emergence of the Koryo Kingdom, thousands of Buddhist temples dotted the Korean landscape.

The decline of the Koryo Kingdom was intimately connected with corruption among the leadership of Korean Buddhism. When General Yi took over in 1388, he banished Buddhism from his capital and disestablished it across the land. Without the government's support, the Buddhists suffered doubly from the Japanese invasion in 1592, as many temples were lost and never rebuilt. Buddhism experienced a revival in the twentieth century and became somewhat identified with the struggle for independence from the Japanese, who were attempting to impose Shintoism. After the end of Japanese rule and the Korean War, a significant revival occurred with the Chogye order, whose headquarters were established in Seoul during the Japanese occupation. Embracing emphases of both ZEN and PURE LAND BUDDHISM, this inclusivist order now includes the majority of Korean Buddhists. However, other schools such as the relatively new WON BUDDHISM also have a measurable following. This developing community emphasizes the rejection of marriage by monks, a practice introduced by the Japanese.

Status of religions in South Korea, 2000-2050

Followers	2000			2025	2050
	total	%	rate
Christians	19,097,000	40.8	1.12	22,700,000	23,200,000
Protestants	8,870,000	18.9	1.10	11,200,000	12,000,000
Independents	7,700,000	16.4	1.03	9,500,000	10,000,000
Roman Catholics	3,700,000	7.9	1.23	4,800,000	5,300,000
Ethnoreligionists	7,325,000	15.6	0.46	8,160,000	7,729,000
Buddhists	7,174,000	15.3	0.69	7,308,000	6,090,000
Neoreligionists	7,121,000	15.2	0.99	8,070,000	7,901,000
Confucianists	5,219,000	11.1	0.66	5,050,000	4,900,000
Nonreligious	699,000	1.5	2.02	950,000	1,100,000
Muslims	68,700	0.2	1.36	90,000	100,000
Atheists	46,800	0.1	3.89	75,000	100,000
Baha'is	32,100	0.1	2.95	40,000	50,000
Chinese folk-religionists	32,100	0.1	1.37	50,000	55,000
Shintoists	28,100	0.1	1.18	40,000	50,000
Total population	46,844,000	100.0	0.89	52,533,000	51,275,000

When Buddhism was disestablished by General Yi, it was replaced with the teachings of Confucius (551–479 B.C.E.). Confucius had developed a philosophical-moral system that focused upon building ideal relationships in the family, the community, and the nation. Not really a religion, Confucianism nonetheless took on a ritual and religious cast. Even as Buddhism rose to power, Confucian thought provided the philosophical context for Korean society. Confucianism permeated the government and educational system and inspired General Yi's reforms. It also emphasized respect for one's ancestors and demanded that individuals refrain from any activity that might reflect badly upon their ancestry.

Centers of Confucian learning, such as the Confucian University in Seoul, maintain the teachings of the honored teacher and perform ceremonies that honor Korea's

Kyongju, Pulguk Temple, built during the Silla Dynasty (Korean Buddhism) (Corel)

Confucian scholars. Associated with the university are numerous sowon, or study halls, that perpetuate Confucian ideals.

Christianity entered the county in the person of a Father Gregorio de Cespedes, a Jesuit priest who accompanied the Japanese invasion force in 1592. As the chaplain to a Japanese general who had become a Christian, Cespedes made no impact on the Korean people. Two hundred years later, another Jesuit, Peter Grammont, began secretly working in Korea and converting the first Christians. Though initially outlawed, the Christian community has had a continuous presence since that time.

It would not be until 1836 that a permanent resident missionary, Pierre Maubant, began to gather the scattered Christian flock. Though Christianity was still outlawed and was subject to waves of official persecution, it spread through the country. In 1866 nine priests were arrested and beheaded. That same year, a Welsh Protestant missionary was killed along with twenty-four others aboard an American ship that ran aground near P'yongyang.

The ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH grew very slowly through the nineteenth and early twentieth century, when it was largely overwhelmed by the Protestant movement. The first Catholic diocese was established in Taegu in 1911. There are now two archdioceses, in Taegu and Seoul, and a number of dioceses. The church entered a growth phase after the Korean War and baptized more than half a million adults through the 1960s.

It would not be until the Amity Treaty between the United States and Korea was signed in 1882 that Christianity's outlaw status was lifted and Protestant missionaries were freely admitted to the country. The first to arrive was Horace N. Allen (1858–1922) of the Presbyterian Church in the U.S.A. (now a constituent part of the PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH [U.S.A.]). A physician, Allen saved the life of the nephew of the Korean queen, an act that radically improved the image of Christianity throughout the upper echelons of Korean society. He was followed in 1884 by the first ordained minister to come to Korea, Horace G. Underwood (1859–1916). Canadian and Australian Presbyterians also established missions, and in 1893 they came together to form the Council for Mission of the Presbyterian Churches, which evolved into the Presbyterian Church of Korea in 1907. Presbyterians were to enjoy great success in Korea, and today the majority of Protestant Christians belong to one of the many Presbyterian denominations that have been formed, though the majority are in one of the two larger groups, the PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH OF KOREA (TONGHAP) or the PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH OF KOREA (HAPDONG).

Robert F. Maclay (1824–1907), the Methodist superintendent in Japan, also visited Korea in 1884, during which time he received permission to open schools and hospitals. The first Methodist missionaries, representing the Methodist Episcopal Church, arrived in 1885. Dr. William B. Scranton (1856–1922) opened a medical center, and two other members of the party, Ella J. D. Appenzeller, the wife of Henry G. Appenzeller (1858–1902), and Mary F. Scranton, opened the first school for girls. Missionaries from the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, arrived in the 1890s. In 1930, anticipating the 1939 union of the two Methodist churches (both now constituent parts of the UNITED METHODIST CHURCH), the Korean missions merged to form the KOREAN METHODIST CHURCH.

The Anglicans were first represented in Korea by Bishop C. John Corfe of the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel, who settled in Seoul in 1890. The Anglican work had a growth phase through the 1930s and claimed some ten thousand members when World War II began. It lost half its members in the division of the country, but it recovered and has continued to grow into the twenty-first century. The church became independent in 1993 as the ANGLICAN CHURCH OF KOREA.

BAPTISTS entered the country after the prominent Clarendon Baptist Church in Boston, Massachusetts, formed the Ella

Ringing the pyongjong (metal bells) during a ceremony in Korea (TRIP)

Thing Memorial Mission, which sponsored work in Korea beginning in 1895. That work was turned over to a Canadian, Malcolm C. Fenwick (1863–1935), who in 1905 organized the Baptists into the Church of Christ in Korea. This work grew and expanded into China, Manchuria, and Siberia. After World War II, the group made contact with the SOUTHERN BAPTIST CONVENTION. It subsequently emerged as the Korean Baptist Convention and has enjoyed spectacular growth.

Pentecostalism appears to have entered the country in 1944 in the form of the TRUE JESUS CHURCH, a Oneness Pentecostal group founded in China. A host of American Pentecostal groups arrived in the 1960s, including the CHURCH OF GOD (CLEVELAND, TENNESSEE), the INTERNATIONAL CHURCH OF THE FOURSQUARE GOSPEL, and the UNITED PENTECOSTAL CHURCH INTERNATIONAL. Pentecostalism took root quickly in Korea, and indigenous leadership appeared within a few years. The YOIDO FULL GOSPEL CHURCH on Yoido Island in Seoul, founded in 1958 by Paul/David Yonghi Cho (b. 1936), has become a denomination in itself. It is the largest Pentecostal congregation in the world, and its sanctuary was the site of the Pentecostal World Fellowship in 1973.

Since the end of the Korean War, numerous American denominations and Evangelical missionary organizations have opened work in Korea, while tens of thousands of Koreans have come to the United States and created a host of new ethnic denominations. The more liberal Protestant churches are members of the National Council of Churches in Korea (founded in 1919 as the Federal Council of Churches and Missions), affiliated with the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES. Evangelical groups are united in the National Association of Evangelicals, affiliated with the WORLD EVANGELICAL ALLIANCE. Several churches are aligned with the fundamentalist INTERNATIONAL COUNCIL OF CHRISTIAN CHURCHES, including the Korean Presbyterian Church (HoHun).

Korea is also home to a wide variety of new religious movements. In the middle of the nineteenth century, amid a variety of new religious movements that began to emerge, one stood out. Tanghak, or so-called Eastern learning, arose in opposition to Christianity, or Western learning. Founder Ch'oe Che-u (1824–1864) saw his movement as a synthesis of Buddhism, Confucianism, and Daoism. However, his philosophy also became the basis of a political challenge to the central government. In 1864 the government forces defeated the main Tonghak army and executed Ch'oe Che-u, but his movement did not die. Instead, it reemerged as a purely religious movement called CHONDOGYO, which claimed several million followers at the time of the division of the country. It remains a potent force in Korean religion.

In more recent years, the U.S. style religious freedom in South Korea has allowed the emergence of hundreds of new religions, which draw variously on the different older religious traditions that have been available in Korea through the centuries and also from neighboring China. Thus one finds new religions that draw concepts from shamanism, Christianity, Buddhism, and Confucianism. Prominent among the new religions is the UNIFICATION MOVEMENT (Holy Spirit Association for the Unification of World Christianity), which has been exported from Korea to over 150 other countries. In the West it became the focus of the anticult movement of the 1970s. Other notable groups that are now having an impact beyond the land of their birth include JEUNGSANDO and the DAHNHAK movement founded by Seung-Heun Lee. The latter group draws heavily on Chinese qigong exercises.

Sources:

- Clark, A. D. A History of the Church in Korea. Seoul: Christian Literature Society of Korea, 1971.
- Clark, D. N. Christianity in Modern Korea. Lanham, MD: University Press of America, 1986.
- Focus on Korea*. 3 vols. Seoul: Seoul International Publishing House, 1988.
- Grayson, James H. Korea: A Religious History. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1989.

Kim, Duk-Whang. A History of Religions in Korea. Seoul: Daeji Moonhwa-sa, 1988.

Palmer, S. J., ed. The New Religions of Korea. Vol. 43. Seoul: Transactions of the Korea Branch of the Royal Asiatic Society, 1967.

Korean American Presbyterian Church

The Korean American Presbyterian Church is the largest of the several Presbyterian denominations to arise in the Korean American community. Since the end of the Korean War, thousands of Koreans have migrated to the United States, many of whom are members of the spectrum of Presbyterian bodies that exist in their homeland. They began to form congregations and presbyteries, often continuing ties to one of the denominations in Korea. In 1978 five presbyteries (California, the Midwest, New York, Pennsylvania, and Canada) of the more conservative churches united to form the Korean American Presbyterian Church. The meeting was held on the campus of Westminster Theological Seminary in Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, the school sponsored by the ORTHODOX PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH.

The Korean American Presbyterian Church continues the tradition of the more conservative PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH OF KOREA (HAPDONG), though the American church is administratively autonomous. After its establishment it moved immediately to found a seminary and to contact the many as yet unaffiliated Korean congregations known to exist in the United States and Latin America. The church adopted the Westminster Confession and catechism as its standards of faith.

By the mid-1990s the church reported thirty-three thousand members in nineteen presbyteries—including the Presbytery of Central South America, which united churches in Argentina, Brazil, Paraguay, and Chile. Member churches were also found in Canada and in several European countries. The church is a member of the National Association of Presbyterian and Reformed Churches, which includes the Presbyterian Church in America, the Orthodox Presbyterian Church, and several other conservative churches of the Reformed tradition.

The Korean American Presbyterian Church should not be confused with the Korean Presbyterian Church in America, created by congregations and ministers formerly affiliated with the PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH OF KOREA (TONGHAP). Founded in 1976, the Korean Presbyterian Church in America is almost as big as its more conservative sister church, and it is a member of the WORLD ALLIANCE OF REFORMED CHURCHES, cooperates with the PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH (USA) on various programs, and is active in liberal Protestant ecumenism.

Addresses:

Korean American Presbyterian Church
1901 W. 166th St.

Gardena, CA 90247
<http://www.kapc.org/>

Korean Presbyterian Church in America
P.O. Box 457
280 Fairfield Pl.
Morganville, NJ 07751

Source:

Bauswein, Jean-Jacques, and Lukas Vischer, eds. The Reformed Family Worldwide: A Survey of Reformed Churches, Theological Schools, and International Organizations. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans, 1999.

Korean Christian Church in Japan

One source of Christianity in Japan has been Korea, where a vital Presbyterian mission operated through the last half of the nineteenth century. In 1909 the Presbyterian Church of Korea sent a minister, Han Sok-Po, to Tokyo to work primarily among Korean students at the university. This work continued during the years of Japanese occupation of Korea, beginning in 1910. The continued growth of the church in Korea allowed it to send additional evangelists. Over the next two decades congregations sprang up across the country, where many Korean expatriates resided.

The Japanese Presbyterian mission was forced into the UNITED CHURCH OF CHRIST IN JAPAN during World War II, but it separated from that organization soon after the war ended and continued as the Korean Christian Church in Japan. Organized according to a presbyterian church order, the church's congregations are divided into five regions, headed by a general assembly. The church accepts the Westminster Confession as its doctrinal standard.

In the later 1990s the Korean Christian Church in Japan reported sixty-five hundred members in sixty congregations. It is a member of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES and the WORLD ALLIANCE OF REFORMED CHURCHES.

Address:

Korean Christian Church in Japan
Japan Christian Center, Room 55
2-2-18 Nishi Waseda
Shinjuku-ku, Tokyo 191
Japan

Source:

Bauswein, Jean-Jacques, and Lukas Vischer, eds. The Reformed Family Worldwide: A Survey of Reformed Churches, Theological Schools, and International Organizations. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans, 1999.

Korean Methodist Church

In 1884, Robert F. Maclay (1824–1907), the superintendent of the mission of the Methodist Episcopal Church (MEC, now a constituent part of the UNITED METHODIST CHURCH) in Japan, traveled to Korea and while there received permission to open schools and hospitals in the country. The following year the first missionaries arrived in the persons of the Rev. Harry G. Appenzeller (1858–1902) and his wife, Ella J. D. Appenzeller, and Dr. William B. Scranton (1856–1922) and his wife Mary F. Scranton and his mother. Their efforts launched modern, Western-style education on the Korean Peninsula. They were joined a decade later by C. F. Reid and Josephine P. Campbell, both representatives of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South (MECS, now a constituent part of the United Methodist Church). During the first decade of the new century, their work bore massive fruit, with a membership jumping from around two thousand to over thirteen thousand people. The MEC mission organized an annual conference (the basic organizational unit in METHODISM) in 1908, and the MECS mission did so in 1918.

Through the first decades of the twentieth century, the MEC and MECS pursued talks aimed at a merger, but Korean Methodists grew impatient. In 1928 and 1930 respectively, the conferences petitioned their respective general conferences for independence so that they could form one independent church in Korea. That permission was granted, and by the end of 1930 a new constitution had been written and the new Korean Methodist Church was organized. The new church also wrote a new creed for use in its teaching work that was translated and widely circulated through the U.S. churches, which finally merged in 1939. Though the Korean church was independent, it maintained close fraternal ties with its sister church in the United States.

The church was totally disrupted by World War II. The Japanese occupying forces isolated missionaries and made contact with overseas offices impossible. The Russians sealed the border between the northern and southern parts of the country, and Methodism lost half of its churches and many of its members. It had just reorganized when the Korean War began in 1950. However, in the decades immediately after the war and with the establishment of the cease-fire that kept Korea divided for the rest of the twentieth century, the Korean Methodist Church enjoyed a growth period. Its membership doubled during the 1950s and again in the 1960s. The growth continued through the rest of the century, and by the 1990s the church reported more than 1.3 million members. The church has also become a missionary body, sending evangelists to more than fifty-four countries, many working in close cooperation with the United Methodist Church and other Methodist bodies. It is a member of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES and the WORLD METHODIST COUNCIL.

Address:

Korean Methodist Church
K.P.O. Box 285
Seoul 110–602
South Korea

Sources:

Park, I. G. The History of Protestant Missions in Korea, 1832–1910. Seoul: Yonsei University Press, 1970.
Stokes, Charles D. “History of the Methodist Missions in Korea, 1885–1930.” Ph.D. dissertation, Yale University, 1947.

Krishnamurti Foundations

Jiddu Krishnamurti (1895–1986) was a philosopher and spiritual adept whose teaching addresses the large questions of human existence. His talks and publications, spanning over six decades, influenced many world leaders in politics, science, religion, and philosophy and continue to inspire many who seek a fresh understanding of the human condition. Born in 1895 in Madanapalle, near Madras in colonial India, Krishnamurti (literally “the image of Krishna”) grew up in an orthodox Brahmin family steeped in tradition, ritual, and a sacred view of the world. After the death of his mother when he was only ten years old, he moved with his father and siblings to the headquarters complex of the THEOSOPHICAL SOCIETY (ADYAR).

The Theosophical Society, founded in 1875 in New York City, began as an organization dedicated to a synthesis of science, religion, and philosophy with the credo “There is no religion higher than truth.” Part of Theosophical teaching is the exploration of clairvoyant powers for discovering the hidden mysteries of nature and the esoteric powers of humanity. The Theosophists drew freely from their understanding of the WESTERN ESOTERIC TRADITION and of Eastern thought, particularly Buddhist and Hindu cosmologies, to form a worldview that included a complex cosmology, an esoteric psychology, and an evolutionary scheme that encompasses eons. The synthesis of East and West, religion and science, and esoteric and exoteric understanding made Theosophy compelling to cosmopolitan, liberal people, regardless of nationality, who had been disappointed by the beliefs and practice of both religion and science and sought to unite the diverse peoples of the world in a peaceful brotherhood. It was to this milieu that the young Krishnamurti was exposed.

Drawing upon many religious traditions and prophecies, some leaders in the Theosophical Society at the time of Krishnamurti’s youth were actively looking for a messiah, a World Teacher, who would destroy evil and restore righteousness. In his early teen years, Krishnamurti was appropriated by the Theosophists as the young World Teacher and appointed head of the Order of the Star in the East, an organization devoted to realizing the World Teacher’s mission. For a number of years Krishnamurti traveled and addressed audiences in this role, maturing in his understanding of the order, the Theosophical Society, and his role in each.

Over the months of 1922–1923, Krishnamurti experienced a profound transformation. Begun as meditation, Krishnamurti's transformation, called "the process," contained moments of great beauty and clarity offset by periods of physical pain, even agony. He fell unconscious, conversed with nonphysical entities, and spoke from several personas. Krishnamurti's report of his transformation of consciousness is consistent with other reports of mystical nondualism—his personality dissolved into communion with all that lay beyond him. In his words, "I was in everything, or rather everything was in me, inanimate and animate, the mountain, the work and all breathing things." Themes of his later teaching are found in his description of his transformation: "I have seen the Light. I have touched compassion which heals all sorrow and suffering; it is not for myself, but for the world . . . I have drunk at the fountain of joy and eternal Beauty. I am God-intoxicated."

After the process was complete, Krishnamurti experienced a growing dissatisfaction with the authority structure of the Theosophical Society and its emphasis on occultism. At the death of his brother, which the occultism of the Theosophical Society did not foresee, his dissatisfaction became overwhelming and he defined his stance relative to Theosophy as one of revolt. In his talks, dialogues, and writings, he began to emphasize the benefit of doubt and questioning, a direction antithetical to the Theosophical structure of that day. In revolt against all forms of spiritual authority, he disbanded the Order of the Star in the East in 1929, declaring, "Truth is a pathless land."

From then until his death in 1986, Krishnamurti ceaselessly taught his insights to a worldwide audience. He became a champion of freedom and inquiry and a relentless advocate of the discovery of Truth without the aid of any organization, religion, or belief system. His teaching emphasized the necessity of developing awareness of one's conditioning and one's bondage to thought, fear, and time. His goal was to make humanity "unconditionally free," and to this end he invited those who listened to observe their inner selves, including their motives and functions of thought.

With each audience, Krishnamurti inquired into the basic nature of humanity and found that real self-transformation involves an instantaneous awareness of the psyche and its workings. Accompanied by simplicity and humility, this awareness is believed to open one to the reality of oneself. Transformation is seen as "freedom from the known," escape from the conditioning, beliefs, and emotions inculcated since infancy. The "known," he said, includes time, sorrow, and bondage. To be free, one must die to the known in order to meet Truth, which is limitless, unconditioned, and unapproachable by any path whatsoever.

To Krishnamurti, living in thought ties one to the past. Freedom requires movement beyond the past—beyond myth, tradition, and the products of thought. Knowledge, time, and thought are not a means to change but rather the psychological sources of sorrow, pain, and anxiety because they are the mechanisms for bringing the past into the present. The unknown, the Truth, cannot be grasped by thought but must be apprehended in the immediate present. This apprehension or seeing is the force of change. No one can see for another, so external authority is of no use. Knowledge and time must be left behind, as must psychological dependence upon anyone. In Krishnamurti's words, "Be a light unto yourselves."

During his lifetime Krishnamurti created schools for children and young adults in India, the United States, England, and Switzerland. These alternative schools continue today in their mission to provide a new definition and practice of education, free from the conditioning and authority structures prevalent in modern educational institutions.

In his later years, Krishnamurti joined with the physicist David Bohm in an exploration of the human condition through a series of dialogues. Both men recognized the limitations of traditional didactic teaching and sought a way by which individuals and small groups could discover truth and insight. The dialogue process, practiced today in all Krishnamurti Foundations, encourages individual inquiry without didactic formalism or authority structures. Krishnamurti and Bohm predicted that the actual structure of the human brain could be changed by the increased awareness and open inquiry of dialogue.

Krishnamurti cooperated with the establishment of foundations in those countries where his teachings received the most response and to which he regularly returned in his annual rounds of lecturing and teaching. The foundations also facilitated his travel, arranged for his public appearances, and published transcripts of his talks and dialogues. A large corpus of Krishnamurti's original writings and talks, as well as his dialogues with Bohm, is now available in book and video form by the Krishnamurti Foundations in England (founded 1968) in the United States (founded 1969), and in India (founded 1971). These foundations and the Krishnamurti committees in other countries sponsor regular dialogue groups for serious inquiry and hold gatherings for study of the teachings. Consistent with the tenets of Krishnamurti's thought, the foundations have remained relatively noninstitutionalized. The Krishnamurti Foundation America maintains a Web site, which includes a directory of Krishnamurti organizations and schools now found in some forty countries around the world.

Addresses:

Krishnamurti Foundation America
P.O. Box 1560
Ojai, CA 93024-1560
<http://www.kfa.org>

Krishnamurti Foundation Trust
Brockwood Park
Bramdean, Hampshire
SO24 0LQ

United Kingdom
<http://www.kfoundation.org>

Constance A. Jones

Sources:

- Holroyd, Stuart. The Quest of the Quiet Mind: The Philosophy of Krishnamurti. Wellingborough, Northamptonshire, England: Aquarian Press, 1980.
- Jayakar, Pupul. Krishnamurti: A Biography. New York: Penguin, 1986.
- Krishnamurti, Jiddu. Commentaries on Living, from the Notebooks of J. Krishnamurti. Edited by D. Rajagopal. 3 vols. Wheaton, IL: Theosophical Publishing House, 1960.
- . The Second Penguin Krishnamurti Reader. Edited by M. Lutyens. New York: Penguin, 1970.
- . Talks and Dialogues of J. Krishnamurti. New York: Avon, 1968.
- Krishnamurti, Jiddu, and David Bohm. The Ending of Time. San Francisco: Harper, 1985.
- Lutyens, Mary. Krishnamurti. 3 vols. New York: Farrar Straus Giroux, 1973–1985.

Kurozumikyō

One of the oldest of the Japanese new religions, Kurozumikyō was founded in 1814 by a Shinto priest, Kurozumi Munetada (1780–1850). Both his parents died as the result of an epidemic in 1812, and then he became critically ill and spent three years in bed. While praying to Amaterasu Ōmikami (the sun goddess), he awoke to his own healing and to the realization that the divine and human are essentially one and that consequently there is neither birth nor death in this unity. This revelation, known as Tenmei Jikiju (direct reception of the will of heaven) occurred on November 11, 1814, and is commemorated as the beginning of Kurozumikyō.

After his revelation, Kurozumi began to preach this faith and is said to have healed people, attracting a considerable number of followers including a number of samurai and intellectuals. After his death in 1850, followers gathered together and formed religious associations in various provinces, and in 1876 they received official recognition as an independent Shinto sect from the government.

The followers of Kurozumikyō hold that the spirit that pervades the universe is that of Amaterasu Ōmikami and that people should seek, through communication with this spirit, to realize in experience the unity of the divine and human. Kurozumikyō reveres not only Amaterasu Ōmikami and the traditional kami pantheon but also the deified founder. Its primary unique practice is what is referred to as a “sun-swallowing rite,” in which believers worship the Sun while inhaling the fresh air, thus appearing to swallow the Sun (a representation of the Spirit of God) and experiencing a oneness with Amaterasu Ōmikami. Kurozumikyō uses the founder’s writings, Kurozumikyō Kyōshō, as its sacred scripture. Its leadership is held by direct descendants of Kurozumi’s family; the current head is the sixth-generation successor, Kurozumi Muneharu.

Kurozumikyō’s headquarters complex includes a shrine to the founder and a large preaching hall. Leaders are trained at the Omoto Gakuin (Omoto Institute). Kurozumikyō also sponsors an orphanage at Akasaka, Okayama Prefecture. As the twenty-first century began, it reported 280,620 members.

Address:

Kurozumikyō
 2770 Ogami
 Okayama-shi, Okayama Prefecture 701–1292
 Japan

Keishin Inaba

Sources:

- Hardacre, Helen. Kurozumikyō and the New Religions of Japan. Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1986.
- Thomsen, Harry. The New Religions of Japan. Rutland, VT, and Tokyo: Charles E. Tuttle Company, 1963.

Kuwait

Kuwait is a small country at the western end of the Persian Gulf. The West attained a heightened level of public awareness about Kuwait at the beginning of the 1990s, when it became the focus of a war between the United States and Iraq. The land now designated as Kuwait has been populated since ancient times, though its history is often forgotten amid the famous ancient centers of the neighboring countries such as Baghdad (Iraq), Persepolis (Iran), and Mecca (Saudi Arabia). However, its strategic location made Kuwait an important early port for trade between India and the Middle East.

In the seventh century C.E. the area was changed by the emergence of the Arab Muslims, and Kuwait was incorporated into an empire that centered on Baghdad. The glory of the empire was finally destroyed in the thirteenth century by

Status of religions in Kuwait, 2000–2050

Followers	2000			2025	2050
	total	%	rate
Muslims	1,638,000	83.1	-1.58	2,407,000	2,774,000
Christians	250,000	12.7	4.42	410,000	527,000
Roman Catholics	175,000	8.9	5.77	275,000	350,000
Independents	64,000	3.3	2.29	120,000	160,000
Orthodox	7,000	0.4	-0.69	9,000	10,000
Hindus	54,600	2.8	3.42	100,000	140,000
Nonreligious	21,900	1.1	3.84	40,000	60,000
Baha'is	5,200	0.3	0.34	12,000	20,000
Sikhs	3,000	0.2	3.99	5,000	6,000
Total population	1,972,000	100.0	-0.83	2,974,000	3,527,000

the Mongol conquests. Kuwait would again find some stability in the sixteenth century as part of the Ottoman Empire, though the desert that surrounds the populated areas along the coast gave the area some degree of isolation.

In the eighteenth century, the people of the region chose to designate a representative to handle their relationship with the Ottoman Empire. In 1756, Abdul Rahim al-Sabah, the leader of the Anaiza people, was chosen. Al-Sabah is the fountain-head of the present ruling family of Kuwait. To keep from being absorbed into what was emerging as Saudi Arabia as the Ottoman Empire weakened, the Kuwaitis sought British help. Beginning in 1779, a set of treaties was signed, and as a result Kuwait obtained British protection and finally became a British protectorate following World War I. The protectorate denied Iraq's claim to Kuwait, a claim going back to earlier centuries when the area was subject to Baghdad. The country was given independence in 1961, although Iraq refused to acknowledge Kuwait's new status. The head of the al-Sabah family declared himself emir, and his descendants continue to rule.

Women at afternoon Qur'anic classes in Kuwait City, Kuwait (Helene Rogers/TRIP)

Islam is the official religion of Kuwait and virtually all residents are practicing Muslims. The only non-Muslims are expatriates who have moved into the country for economic reasons (oil or trade). Most Kuwaitis are Sunnis of the MALIKITE SCHOOL OF ISLAM and are thus differentiated from the Saudis, who are primarily Sunnis of WAHABI ISLAM, and the Iraqis, who are primarily SHI'A ISLAM followers. There are both Wahhabis and Shi'as who reside in Kuwait.

Christianity is present in Kuwait primarily to serve the expatriate community. The ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH has a relatively strong presence, operating several schools and a hospital. The individual parishes represent different Eastern Rites and the Latin Rite, all united into a single vicariate. Non-Chalcedonian Eastern Orthodox traditions are represented by parishes of the ARMENIAN APOSTOLIC CHURCH, the COPTIC ORTHODOX CHURCH, the Ancient Church of the East (Iraq), and the MAR THOMA SYRIAN CHURCH OF MALABAR. There is also a community of Greek Orthodox believers.

Samuel Zwemer (1867–1952), who had introduced the REFORMED CHURCH IN AMERICA into Bahrain, moved to Kuwait in 1903. The National Evangelical Church of Kuwait was organized that same year, though it did not have a building for worship until 1926. The Anglican Church in Kuwait was established during the height of the protectorate. The CHRISTIAN BROTHERS and the assemblies associated with Bhakt Singh, an Indian leader with PLYMOUTH BROTHERS roots, also have a small presence. Christians have a formal agreement not to attempt the conversion of Muslims. Also among the expatriates are some Hindus from southern India and some members of the BAHÁ'Í FAITH.

Sources:

- Ali, M. H. "Kuwait, Religion, and Politics." Ph.D. dissertation, Michigan State University, 1986.
 Sanmiguel, V. Christians in Kuwait. Beirut: Beirut Printing Press, 1970.

The Kwan Um School of Zen

The Kwan Um School of Zen, officially founded in 1983, is an international association of Zen centers established by Seung Sahn (called Dae Soen Sa Nim or "Great Honored Zen Teacher" by his disciples), who is regarded as the seventy-eighth patriarch in his lineage in the CHOGYE ORDER of Korean Buddhism, and the first to live and teach in the West.

Born in 1927 in Seun Choen, North Korea, Seung Sahn became a Buddhist monk in 1948. He studied with Zen Master Ko Bong, and on January 25, 1949, he received Dharma transmission from his teacher. Seung Sahn arrived in the United States in May 1972, eventually establishing a small Zen center in an apartment in Providence, Rhode Island. The Providence Zen Center remains the head temple of Seung Sahn's international organization.

As his English improved, Seung Sahn's teaching expanded, and he began giving precepts to his students as well. His first American disciple, Jacob Perl, was a former student of Shunryu Suzuki Roshi (1905–1971) at the San Francisco Zen Center, and of Tarthang Tulku (b. 1935) at the Tibetan Nyingma Meditation Center in Berkeley, California. Now known as Zen Master Wu Bong, in 1978, Perl helped establish the first Zen center in Poland. Another of his early disciples was Barbara Rhodes, a registered nurse who received inka, or teaching authority, in 1977 and Dharma transmission in 1992. She currently serves as vice school zen master, after having helped found the Providence Zen Center, where she lived for seventeen years. As of this writing, Seung Sahn has given Dharma transmission to nine other individuals, including the deceased monk Su Bong, who had been designated as Seung Sahn's successor. He has also authorized nearly twenty individuals as senior students or Dharma masters (Ji Do Poep Sa Nims).

Seung Sahn's style of teaching is an eclectic combination of sitting meditation, Dharma lectures, koan study, prostrations, and chanting. He is sometimes said to teach the "Don't Know" style of Zen, tracing back to a tale about the Zen patriarch Bodhidharma. He is a prolific author, having written Dropping Ashes on the Buddha, The Compass of Zen, Ten Gates, Only Don't Know, and The Whole World Is a Single Flower—365 Kong-ans for Everyday Life.

The Kwan Um School of Zen is headquartered in Cumberland, Rhode Island. It has more than sixty affiliated centers in the United States, Canada, South Africa, Hong Kong, Israel, Korea, Malaysia, Singapore, Australia, and throughout Europe. These centers generally have regular schedules for sitting meditation and Dharma talks, as well as longer, intensive retreats called kyol che (coming together) that generally run for one or two months. The school also publishes a journal known as Primary Point, begun in 1984. In addition, their own Primary Point Press offers a series of videos and books by and about Seung Sahn, as well as his teaching.

Like many of the Western Buddhist groups today, Kwan Um School of Zen has an extremely well developed Web site, which includes an online catalogue from which a variety of Dharma-related objects can be purchased. The site also offers an extensive archive of Kwan Um materials, and it provides links to the Internet sites of more than fifty other Kwan Um School affiliates and to a variety of other useful Buddhist Web sites, both scholarly and popular in nature.

Address:

Kwan Um School of Zen
 Providence Zen Center
 99 Pound Rd.
 Cumberland, RI 02864
<http://www.kwanumzen.com>

Charles S. Prebish

Sources:

Prebish, Charles S. Luminous Passage: The Practice and Study of Buddhism in America. Berkeley and Los Angeles: University of California Press, 1999.

Seager, Richard. Buddhism in America. Columbia University Press, 1999, pp. 171–173.

Seong, Mu. “Korean Buddhism in America: A New Style of Zen.”

In The Faces of Buddhism in America, edited by Charles S. Prebish and Kenneth K. Tanaka, 121–125. Berkeley and Los Angeles: University of California Press, 1998.

Kyrgyzstan

Kyrgyzstan is a small Central Asian republic on China’s western border, north of Tajikistan. It is intimately connected with Uzbekistan to its west, as Uzbek and Kyrgyz people share a similar religious and linguistic background. The antecedents of the Kyrgyz people moved into the region from the area north of the Caspian Sea. There they mixed with the local Turkish and Mongol peoples, creating the present-day Kyrgyz people. In the eighteenth century, Kyrgyzstan was brought under Chinese hegemony as a protectorate. In the nineteenth century, Russia moved into the region as part of its general expansion southward, and through the 1860s a Russian administration was in place in northern Kyrgyzstan. Russian immigrants flowed into the area, and in the 1870s the southern part of the country was annexed by Russia.

Russian authority was replaced by Soviet rule in 1917. As the USSR developed, the region was transformed into the Federated Republic of Kyrgyzstan in 1936. An independence movement developed in the 1980s that led to the establishment of an independent Kyrgyzstan in 1991.

The area carved out as the Kyrgyz homeland was among the last to be reached by Islam (ninth to twelfth centuries),

Status of religions in Kyrgyzstan, 2000-2050

Followers	2000			2025	2050
	total	%	rate
Muslims	2,856,000	60.8	1.90	4,688,000	6,176,000
Nonreligious	1,015,000	21.6	-0.46	800,000	600,000
Christians	488,000	10.4	-0.35	450,000	450,000
Orthodox	363,000	7.7	-0.71	320,000	320,000
Independents	70,500	1.5	1.73	70,000	75,000
Protestants	30,000	0.6	-0.95	30,000	30,000
Atheists	295,000	6.3	-3.47	100,000	75,000
Buddhists	20,400	0.4	2.46	32,000	45,000
Ethnoreligionists	18,400	0.4	0.25	16,000	14,600
Jews	5,700	0.1	0.72	8,000	10,000
Zoroastrians	940	0.0	1.01	2,000	4,000
Total population	4,699,000	100.0	0.67	6,096,000	7,375,000

and only in the nineteenth century did Islam (of the Sunni HANAFITE SCHOOL OF ISLAM) become the dominant religion of the country. Thus the establishment of Islam was quite young when Russian forces invaded the country, bringing with them the RUSSIAN ORTHODOX CHURCH. Christianity did not spread among the Muslim population. Like Christians, Muslims faced persecution under Soviet rule, but they clung tenaciously to their faith through the worst years of Soviet repression. In the years since independence was declared, a secular government has been established, and Islam has to some extent been revived. Subsequently, Islam has attained state recognition and its holy days are public holidays.

By the late 1990s it became clear that some Islamic conservatives, associated with WAHHABI ISLAM, were becoming active in the country, having found a base within the Uzbek minority. In 1998 a special department of the government was created to control Wahhabi activities.

Christianity entered the country with the Russians and through the nineteenth century was largely confined to the Russian communities. It has shrunk considerably since the 1990s, as Russians have returned to their homeland, many not wishing their children to attend schools dominated by the Kyrgyz language. Like Sunni Islam, however, the Russian Orthodox Church has gained state recognition, meaning that Orthodox Christian holy days are also state holidays. Today, the Russian Orthodox Church has one diocese that includes Uzbekistan, Turkmenistan, Tajikistan, and Kyrgyzstan.

As was the case in other Central Asian countries, the BAPTISTS were the first Protestant/Free Church group to appear in Kyrgyzstan. In 1912, Rodion G. Bershadskii, his wife, and a family named Marafin moved from the Orenburg region of Russia to Bishkek. The congregation they formed became the first of several Baptist churches, and the movement primarily spread among German- and Russian-speaking residents. Since independence the church has been able to operate more openly, but it has also lost many members who have moved back to Russia or the West. During the last quarter of the twentieth century, a German-based missionary agency, Licht im Osten, began working very quietly in Kyrgyzstan and neighboring countries. It has been able to operate more openly since independence, and in 1993 it opened a Bible school in Bishkek. In the 1990s, the Baptists, whose churches constitute the UNION OF EVANGELICAL CHRISTIANS-BAPTISTS OF RUSSIA, began a significant post-Soviet outreach to Kyrgyz people.

Through the twentieth century and into the twenty-first, the SEVENTH-DAY ADVENTIST CHURCH has had a small mission in the country, organizing the Kyrgyzstan Conference in 1978. By the mid-1990s, the conference included ten churches. There are also a few Pentecostal believers.

Sources:

Country Profile: Kyrgyzstan. London: International Institute for the Study of Islam and Christianity, 1994.

Rashid, Ahmad. The Resurgence of Central Asia: Islam or Nationalism? New York: St. Martin's Press, 1994.

The Lakota

The Lakota people fled their homeland in the eastern woodlands of the present-day United States in the winter of 1776 under attack by the Ojibwa, who called them “Sioux,” a derogatory name that suggested they were less than human. Learning to integrate horses into their new nomadic lifestyle, the Lakota soon became masters of the Midwestern plains and followed the plentiful buffalo herds for sustenance.

In a treaty at Fort Laramie in 1851, the U.S. government granted the Lakota 60 million acres of land in the Dakotas, but the westward expansion of European Americans, with its concomitant provocation and warfare, the discovery of gold, and the land grabbing of the settlers soon whittled away this territory. Even the most sacred Black Hills were soon confiscated. Despite one decisive victory against General George Armstrong Custer (1839–1876), the Lakota could not stand against the brutal force of the U.S. Cavalry, whose most notorious act was the massacre of over three hundred Lakota people at Wounded Knee Creek in 1890.

Despite this tragic history and the loss of some knowledge of their sacred rites, the Lakota remarkably have continued most of their religious traditions. When they could no longer openly rebel against the prohibition of their religious practices, they hid boys who showed signs of being wicasa wakan (holy men or medicine men) in remote areas of the reservation.

The center of Lakota religion is the sacred pipe, which is an essential part of every ceremony. According to the most fundamental of the Lakota sacred stories, the pipe was given to them generations earlier by White Buffalo Woman. A sacred being, White Buffalo approached two young hunters in the form of an extraordinarily beautiful woman. When the older hunter reached out to possess her, he immediately dissolved into a pile of bones. Selfishness, manifested here as lust and greed, killed him. The younger hunter listened carefully as the sacred woman told him to return to his encampment, where his people were starving, and to tell them to prepare to receive her. The next day she presented the gift of the sacred pipe and instructed the people in its use.

Their peace pipe centers the Lakota people in the sacred. Lame Deer, an important twentieth-century wicasa wakan, summarized the unifying symbols in the sacred pipe: “This pipe is us. The stem is our backbone, the bowl our head. The stone is our blood, red as our skin. The opening in the bowl is our mouth and the smoke rising from it our breath, the visible breath of our people” (Lame Deer 1972, 264). Through its ritual use, the Lakota create unity among themselves and put themselves in harmony with all living beings.

Although the pipe is smoked in many ritual situations, it is the predominant feature of the Inipi, a sweat bath, and the sweat bath is the first stage of almost every ritual undertaking. The sweat house is a small circular enclosure that represents the entire universe—every living creature is said to be somehow represented within. As the Lakota strip off their clothing and enter the Inipi, they strip away all bad thoughts and animosities. Before sitting down in the Inipi around a fire that is heating large rocks, they make a complete circle in a clockwise direction inside the structure—aligning themselves with the movement of the sun. The circle, like the sacred pipe, is a primary symbol for the Lakota people, representing not only the ideal of communal harmony but also the cycles of life.

The wicasa wakan then offers the pipe in the six cardinal directions (east, north, west, south, and toward both the sky and earth), which symbolically centers the people present in the circle. The fire is put out, water is poured on the heated rocks, the flap of the sweat house is closed, and worldly thoughts are driven out of the minds of the participants, who now enter into spiritual harmony.

The Lakota culture is extremely rich in ritual. There are solitary rituals of initiation, where young men seek their spiritual identities by digging a vision pit on top of a hill, frequently somewhere in their sacred Black Hills. Yuwipi ceremonies allow the Lakota to get in touch with both the spirits of the earth and ancestral spirits, often for purposes of healing.

Sun dances are communal celebrations, lasting several days, that emphasize personal sacrifice for the communal good. The central moment occurs when a few dedicated men are pierced and have rawhide pulled through muscles in their backs or chests; they then hang from a pole in the center of the ritual grounds until the rawhide tears their skin apart. More important than these actions, however, is the visionary and ecstatic experiences that occur during this time. And most important is the communal solidarity that occurs during this rite.

Although the ritual positions of men have often been highlighted in Lakota religion, there are corresponding places for women in most rituals. Grandmothers cut their skin in solidarity with their grandsons who are undergoing a vision quest, young girls are the first to touch the tree that will become the center of the sun dance, and mothers frequently purify their homes by burning sage.

According to the 1990 census the Lakotas (with the various subgroupings) number 107,321 people, approximately

The sweat house, such as this one used by the Lakota, was a popular tool in the spiritual life of Native people in the western United States (James Mooney. The Ghost Dance Religion. In the Fourteenth Annual Report of the Bureau of Ethnography. Washington, DC: GPO, 1896) one-third of whom live on reservations and trust lands in South Dakota. Although some Lakota combine their native heritage with Christianity, mostly Roman Catholicism, almost all of those who live on the reservation or on trust lands also participate in Lakota ritual activities, at least occasionally. Although not unanimously supported by the Lakota, the American Indian Movement, cofounded in the early 1970s by Russell Means, an Oglala Lakota, did much to renew interest in all Native American spiritual traditions and to help expand awareness of these traditions beyond the boundaries of the reservations.

Thomas V. Peterson

Sources:

- Brown, Joseph Epes. The Sacred Pipe: Black Elk's Account of the Seven Rites of the Oglala Sioux. Norman: University of Oklahoma Press, 1953.
- Lame Deer, John (Fire), and Richard Erdoes. Lame Deer: Seeker of Visions. New York: Washington Square Press, 1994. Reprint, 1972.

- Powers, William K. Yuwipi: Vision and Experience in Oglala Ritual. Lincoln: University of Nebraska Press, 1982.
- "Tribute to the Oglala Lakota Sioux: Their History, Culture, and Leaders." Posted at <http://www.geocities.com/Athens/Acropolis/3976/Hawk.html>.

Lao Buddhist Sangha

From the time of its establishment during the reign of King Fa Ngum (1316–1373), founder of the Lao kingdom of Lan Xang in the mid-fourteenth century, the Lao Buddhist Sangha (community of monks) has enjoyed both political patronage and social prestige. Its role in propagating social morality and respect for the throne ensured its importance for Lao kings, who generously endowed the Sangha in return.

The legitimation that the Sangha gave to monarchy was strongest when the institution was unified. This was not always the case. Factions at court or opponents in succession struggles often had their monastic backers. Periodic “purification” of the Sangha was often thus an excuse to reimpose unity.

Little is known about sectarian division within the Sangha in the kingdom of Lan Xang. We do know from the reports of the first Europeans to visit Viangchan (Vientiane) in the seventeenth century that much of the wealth of the kingdom was lavished on the monasteries of the capital. When Lan Xang split into rival kingdoms in 1707, the Sangha too was divided.

By the nineteenth century, when the Lao kingdoms had been reduced to tributary dependencies of Siam, the Lao Sangha reached its lowest point. Recovery was slow under French rule. The reform Thammanyut-nikay School founded by King Rama IV Mongkut of Siam (1804–1868) was especially strong in southern Laos, beside the dominant Maha-nikay. The sectarian antagonism that resulted divided the Sangha.

The establishment of Buddhism as the state religion by the independent Kingdom of Laos in 1953 greatly strengthened the status of the Sangha. At the same time, however, political and ideological conflict associated with the First and Second Indochina Wars led to increasing politicization, as both the royal Lao government and Communist Pathet Lao attempted to use the Sangha for their own political purposes.

Fearing Communist infiltration of the Sangha, the government attempted to bring it under closer administrative control. Monastic organization was made to parallel that of the civil administration. Officials at each level of the Sangha were appointed by officials at the next highest level—from province, to district, to village. At the apex stood the Sangharaja, elected by senior abbots from a short list acceptable to the Ministry of Religious Affairs.

In response, the Pathet Lao championed religious freedom while encouraging young monks to demonstrate against the government. With such political activism among its membership, the Sangha lost some respect and was weakened internally. When the Pathet Lao seized power in 1975, the Sangha lost what little remaining independence of action it had retained. Hundreds of monks joined the approximately three hundred thousand ethnic Lao and tribal minorities who fled abroad (10 percent of the total population). Some established monasteries in their new countries of residence, notably in the United States, France, Australia, and Canada.

The Pathet Lao abolished the sectarian divide and formed instead the Lao United Buddhists Association (LUBA), a member organization of the party-dominated Lao Front for National Construction. The position of Sangharaja was replaced by the president of the LUBA, who had to be acceptable to the leadership of the Lao People’s Revolutionary Party.

The number of monks initially fell sharply, but numbers increased as Buddhism again became politically acceptable in the mid-1980s. In the form of the LUBA, the Sangha continues to perform its traditional role of providing education and giving medical advice. Thus, even the party has been brought to acknowledge its continuing role in the life of the nation.

Address:

Lao United Buddhists Association
Vat That Luang
Viang Chan (Vientiane)
Laos

Martin Stuart-Fox

Sources:

Evans, Grant. The Politics of Ritual and Remembrance: Laos since 1975. Chiang Mai, Thailand: Silkworm Press, 1998.
Stuart-Fox, Martin, “Laos: From Buddhist Kingdom to Marxist State.” In Buddhism and Politics in Twentieth-Century Asia, edited by Ian Harris, pp. 153–172. London: Pinter, 1999.

Laos

Laos is one of only five countries, along with Sri Lanka, Burma, Thailand, and Cambodia, where the dominant religion is Theravada Buddhism. Tradition has it that the Theravada form of Buddhism was introduced into Laos from Cambodia when the Lao kingdom of Lan Xang was founded in the mid-fourteenth century. In fact, Buddha images and inscriptions excavated near the Lao capital of Viang Chan (Vientiane) indicate that Mon monks propagated the religion there four centuries earlier.

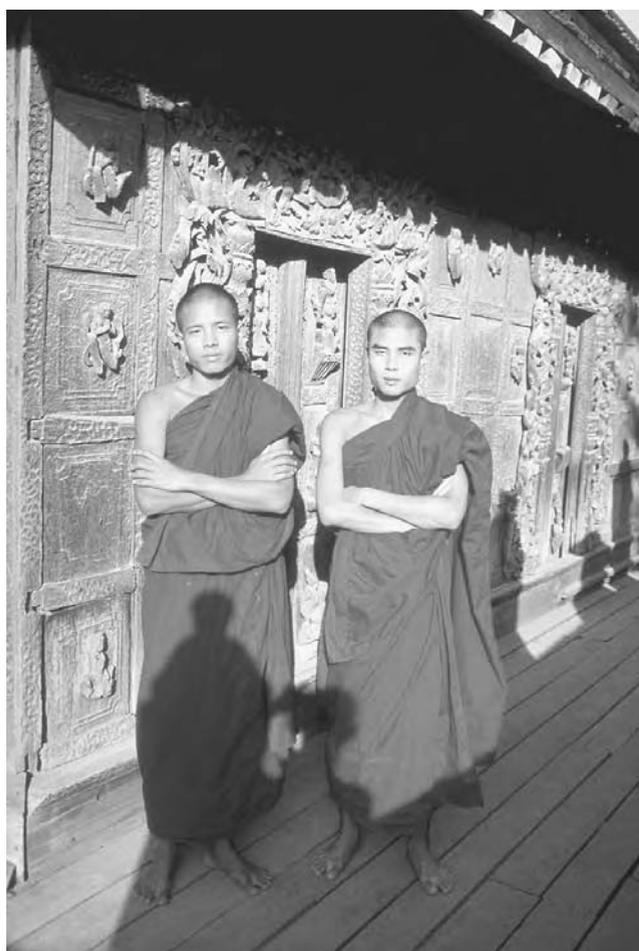

Prior to their conversion to Buddhism, the Lao, like some of the upland Tai tribes in Laos today, worshipped a hierarchy of spirits, ranging from heavenly thaen to earthly phi. Some phi were territorial, protecting villages, districts, or principalities (meuang); others were malignant, causing sickness when they gained entry to a human body.

Status of religions in Laos, 2000-2050

Followers	2000			2025	2050
	total	%	rate
Buddhists	2,650,000	48.8	2.68	4,511,000	6,021,000
Ethnoreligionists	2,266,000	41.7	2.80	4,081,000	5,700,000
Nonreligious	235,000	4.3	2.99	500,000	800,000
Christians	113,000	2.1	2.10	236,000	353,000
Independents	45,600	0.8	3.29	110,000	170,000
Protestants	34,400	0.6	3.24	80,000	120,000
Roman Catholics	32,000	0.6	-0.31	45,000	60,000
Chinese folk-religionists	82,500	1.5	2.90	170,000	250,000
Atheists	61,900	1.1	2.79	122,000	175,000
Muslims	19,600	0.4	0.83	32,000	40,000
Neoreligionists	9,200	0.2	1.45	12,000	17,500
Hindus	6,800	0.1	3.10	12,000	16,500
Baha'is	1,200	0.0	3.16	3,000	6,000
Taoists	1,200	0.0	2.01	2,400	5,000
Total population	5,433,000	100.0	2.73	9,653,000	13,344,000

The ethnic, or lowland, Lao began moving into the middle Mekong basin as early as the ninth century. The Austroasiatic-speaking peoples who were there before them, now known collectively as Lao Thoeng (Lao of mid-altitude), worshipped their own array of spirits through a variety of rituals, including animal sacrifice. The most important collective ceremonies required ritual killing of a buffalo. Some Lao Thoeng tribes converted to Buddhism, but most have retained their traditional forms of animism.

Buddhism played a political role, as well as a social and spiritual role, in classical Lao society, for it legitimized the sociopolitical order. Conversely, the government favored Buddhism; the king ruled by right of superior merit (kamma), which that he then demonstrated by his beneficence toward the community of monks, the LAO BUDDHIST SANGHA. By the early seventeenth century, when the first Europeans reached the kingdom of Lan Xang, Viang Chan was a regional center for Buddhist scholarship. After 1707, when Lan Xang was divided, decline set in, and Lao Buddhism reached its nadir after the Thai sack of Viang Chan in 1828.

Two Laotian Buddhist monks (Corel)

About that time, new tribal minorities began entering northern Laos from China. Known collectively as the Lao Sung (Lao of high altitudes), these included the Hmong and the Mien. All of these peoples worshipped a variety of celestial and terrestrial spirits. The Hmong practiced a form of shamanism, and the Mien religion had been influenced by Daoism.

Christianity was first taught in Laos by a Jesuit priest who arrived in Viang Chan in 1642. It was not until Laos became a French colony in 1893, however, that Catholicism gained a foothold in the country. Few Lao were converted, but Buddhism showed signs of recovery after a Buddhist institute was established in the early 1930s. When Laos gained independence in 1953, Buddhism again assumed its role as the state religion.

Seizure of power by the Communist Pathet Lao in 1975 had an immediate impact on Buddhism. For two decades during the Second Indochina War, both sides had used religion for their own propaganda purposes. The Lao People's Revolutionary Party quickly reduced the Lao Buddhist Sangha to a pliant tool for the construction of socialism.

The That Luang Festival in Vientiane, Laos (T. Lester/TRIP)

Attendance at Buddhist ceremonies continued, however, and more relaxed policies after the mid-1980s led to a moderate resurgence of Buddhism. Even politburo members began attending important ceremonies.

Freedom of religion is guaranteed under the Lao Constitution. According to the 1995 census, there remain some sixty thousand Christians (about two thirds are Catholic and one third are Protestant), along with just over eleven hundred Muslims. This compares with 3 million Buddhists and 1.5 million followers of various tribal religions. The Buddhist community relates to the government through the Ministry of Religious Affairs, which in turn serves as a regional center for the WORLD FELLOWSHIP OF BUDDHISTS.

Martin Stuart-Fox

Sources:

Bunnag, J. "The Way of the Monk and the Way of the World: Buddhism in Thailand, Laos, and Cambodia." In The World of Buddhism: Buddhist Monks and Nuns in Society and Culture, edited by H. Bechert and R. Gombrich. London: Thames & Hudson, 1984.

Life After Liberation: The Church in the Lao People's Democratic Republic. Nakhon Sawan, Thailand: Lao Christian Service, 1987.

Smith, B. L. Religion and the Legitimization of Power in Thailand, Laos, and Burma. Chambersburg, PA: Anima, 1978.

Stuart-Fox, Martin. Historical Dictionary of Laos. 2d ed. Metuchen, NJ: Scarecrow Press, 2000.

———. The Lao Kingdom of Lan Xang: Rise and Decline. Bangkok: White Lotus Press, 1998.

Laos Evangelical Church

In the 1870s, Daniel McGilvray (1828–1911), an American Presbyterian minister, settled in Chiang Mai, Thailand, from where he made regular trips into northern Laos during the years 1872–1898. As a result the first Protestant groups in Laos came into existence. A second effort to build a Christian presence was begun in the southern part of Laos in 1902 by Gabriel Contesse and Maurice Willy, two Swiss missionaries, who with their wives opened the first missionary station at Sing-Khone. As other missionaries moved into the territory, a few other Protestant churches were founded among a population that was dominantly Buddhist. By 1936, the Swiss missions had led to the formation of some twelve Christian communities. During this time, the first three Gospels were translated and published in Laotian (1908). A complete Bible appeared in 1932. In 1928, the CHRISTIAN AND MISSIONARY ALLIANCE added its strength to the small Christian work.

Two Christian communities, one in the north and one in the south, persisted in spite of the generally hostile environment, the ravages of World War II, and the rise of a secular Marxist government. In 1975, that government moved to curtail all religious activity, both Buddhist and Christian. This negative environment encouraged the two Christian groups to come together in 1982 and form the Laos Evangelical Church, which has subsequently received official recognition as a religious body. In the 1990s, the church reported forty thousand members in 150 congregations.

The church is organized with a presbyterian church order, though it conceives of itself as interdenominational. It has accepted the Apostles Creed as its doctrinal standard. Since 1965, a number of Laotians have moved to the United States. The Presbyterian Church (U.S.A.) has moved to provide an organization for Laotian Christians through its Lao Presbyterian Council.

Address:

Laos Evangelical Church
 B.P. 4200
 Vientiane
 Laos P.D.R.

Source:

Bauswein, Jean-Jacques, and Lukas Vischer, eds. The Reformed Family Worldwide: A Survey of Reformed Churches, Theological Schools, and International Organizations. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans, 1999.

Status of religions in Latvia, 2000-2050

Followers	2000		2025	2050
	total	% rate
Christians	1,578,000	67.0 -0.70	1,509,000	1,352,000
Protestants	560,000	23.8 -0.18	500,000	440,000
Orthodox	555,000	23.6 -0.53	480,000	420,000
Roman Catholics	490,000	20.8 -0.20	450,000	400,000
Nonreligious	614,000	26.0 -2.15	343,000	200,000
Atheists	142,000	6.0 -3.25	60,000	50,000
Jews	13,400	0.6 -4.37	10,000	8,000
Muslims	8,900	0.4 0.06	13,000	17,000
Ethnoreligionists	340	0.0 0.39	500	600
Buddhists	120	0.0 1.67	200	300
Total population	2,357,000	100.0 -1.29	1,936,000	1,628,000

Although the Latvian government has not officially enumerated which religions it recognizes as “traditional,” the Law on Religious Organizations prescribes that religion may be taught in public schools on a voluntary basis by representatives of the Evangelical Lutheran, Roman Catholic, Orthodox, Old Believer, Baptist, and Jewish religions only. Nontraditional denominations may provide religious education in private schools only.

The first information about Christianity in Latvia dates back to the tenth and eleventh centuries, when Greek, Danish, and Slavonic missionaries tried to bring the Christian faith to the Baltic lands. In 1071, the first Christian church was built. German missionaries started their work in the twelfth century, and in around 1164 the monk Meinhard arrived in the land of the Livs. In 1186, Archbishop Hartwig of Bremen appointed Meinhard the first bishop of Livonia.

Nevertheless, progress in his mission was slow, and in 1198, two years after the death of Meinhard, Pope Celestine

Latvia

Religious life in contemporary Latvia is characterized by the coexistence of several equally strong Christian confessions. The Latvian Evangelical Lutheran Church, the Roman Catholic Church in Latvia, the Orthodox Church in Latvia, the Union of Latvian Old Believer Congregations, the Union of Baptist Congregations, and the Latvian Conference of Seventh-day Adventists have all endured for several centuries.

Visitors light candles at a Russian Orthodox church in Riga, Latvia. (J. Greenberg/TRIP)

III (c. 1106–1198) pronounced the First Crusade to Livonia. In 1199, Pope Innocent III (1161–1216) pronounced the Second Crusade to Livonia. Bishop Albert of Livonia and the Order of the Sword Brethren conquered the land and baptized the people by the middle of the thirteenth century.

The Roman Catholic Church prevailed from the thirteenth until the sixteenth century, when evangelical LUTHERANISM entered the region. The beginning of the Reformation in Livonia dates to 1517, when the first advocate of Reformation ideas in Livonia, Andrea Knopke, arrived in Riga and started to preach in the Church of Saint Peter. In 1554, the Landtag of Valmiera (Wolmar) proclaimed the principle of freedom of faith in all Livonia, and in 1555 the representative of the Master of the Livonian order signed the Treaty of Augsburg. Since then, the Lutheran Church has been the most influential Christian church in Latvia.

Over the next several centuries, the Evangelical Lutheran Church melded with the German rule of Latvia. A popular church, however, was born after the proclamation of the independent Republic of Latvia in 1918. In September 1919, the Provisional Regulations for the Evangelical Lutheran Consistories were issued. At the Church Council of 1922 in Riga, Karlis Irbe was elected the first bishop of the LATVIAN EVANGELICAL LUTHERAN CHURCH. According to the census of 1935, there were 1,075,641 Evangelical Lutherans in Latvia, out of a total population of 1,950,502.

The Soviet occupation of 1940, the German occupation during World War II, and the ensuing years of the Soviet regime dramatically changed the religious situation in the Latvian Evangelical Lutheran Church. As a result of decades of religious suppression, at the beginning of 2000, only some four hundred thousand Latvian Evangelical Lutheran believers remained.

The ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH began its recovery from the Reformation in the city of Latgale and in several congregations in Kurzeme during the period of the Counter-Reformation, late in the sixteenth century. Poland established its authority in Latgale in 1580, and the Roman Catholic Church dominated there from that time on. In 1918, the Diocese of Riga was renewed. In August 1920, the first Latvian bishop, Antonijs Springovičs, was ordained, and two years later, a concordat with the Holy See was signed. The separate province of the Roman Catholic Church consisted of two archdioceses, the Riga Archdiocese (from 1923) and the Liepāja Archdiocese (from 1937). According to the census of 1935, there were 476,963 Roman Catholics in Latvia. As of the beginning of 2000, the Roman Catholic Church in Latvia included the Riga Archdiocese and three dioceses—Liepāja, Rēzekne-Aglona, and Jelgava. There were about five hundred thousand Roman Catholic believers.

The first information about the existence of Orthodox congregations in Latvia dates back to the eleventh century. Until the Great Northern War (1700–1721), the Orthodox Church was rather repressed, but it grew measurably while the country was under the rule of the Russian Empire. In 1850, the Riga Diocese was established. In 1845, reacting to the difficult economic situation and responding to the appeal of Riga's Orthodox bishop Filaret, the authorities began to force mass conversions of Latvian peasants from the Lutheran Church to the Orthodox Church. The effort culminated in 1846–1847, when the Lutheran Church lost around 113,000 participants. In 1935, there were 174,389 Orthodox believers, and there are around 190,500 Orthodox believers today.

The first groups of OLD BELIEVERS appeared in Latvia in the second part of the seventeenth century. In 1659–1660, Old Believers emerged in Kurzeme (the Duchy of Kurland) and in Latgale near Daugavpils. The first Old Believers's church in Riga was built in 1760. Over the next decades, Daugavpils, Rēzekne, Jekabpils, and Riga became the most significant centers for Old Believers, the majority of whom belong to the Pomorian, or the priestless, faction. There are around seventy thousand Old Believers in Latvia today, the largest community of Old Believers in the world.

The Baptist movement appeared in Latvia at the end of the nineteenth century. In 1860–1861, the first congregations were established in Kurzeme, and in 1879 Latvian Baptists formed the Union of Baptist Churches. As of the beginning of 2000, there were about six thousand Baptists in Latvia.

In 1896, the first congregation of the SEVENTH-DAY ADVENTIST CHURCH was created in Riga. There are around four thousand Seventh-day Adventists in Latvia now. The Latvian Conference, first organized in 1920, is part of the Baltic Union Conference.

Like the above-mentioned Christian confessions, the Jewish community has also been accepted as a traditional denomination in Latvia. This once large community was virtually destroyed in the Holocaust during the 1941–1944 German occupation of Latvia and now totals only six thousand persons.

In 1990–2000, many new religions have appeared in Latvia. There are now over two thousand JEHOVAH'S WITNESSES and about two hundred active members of the CHURCH OF JESUS CHRIST OF LATTER-DAY SAINTS. Charismatic Christian congregations such as Jauna Paudze (the New Generation) and Priekā Vests (Message of Joy) claim over twenty thousand members, although precise figures are not available. Pentecostals number about six thousand, and the NEW APOSTOLIC CHURCH of North Rhine-

Westphalia has about one thousand members. The INTERNATIONAL SOCIETY FOR KRISHNA CONSCIOUSNESS has about five hundred active members.

Solveiga Krūmina-Konkova and Nikandrs Gills

Sources:

Chernejs, Aleksandrs. Latvijas Pareizticīga Baznīca (Orthodox Church of Latvia). London: Community of St. John, 1996.

Gills, Nikandrs. Reliģija. Vesture. Dzīve. Reliģiska dzīve Latvijā (Religion. History. Life. Religious life in Latvia). Riga: Institute of Philosophy and Sociology, Latvian Academy of Sciences, 1993.

Krūmina-Konkova, Solveiga, and Nikandrs Gills. "Die Lebendigkeit von Religion und Kirche im gegenwärtigen Lettland." In Religiöser Wandel in den postkommunistischen Ländern Ost- und Mitteleuropas, edited by Detlef Pollack, Irena Borowik, and Wolfgang Jagodzinski, 429–477. Würzburg: Ergon Verlag, 1998.

Trups, Henrihs. Katolu Baznīcas vesture (History of Roman Catholic Church). Riga: Avots, 1992.

Latvia, Paganism in Ancient Latvian religious beliefs and practices were a regional expression of the ancient Baltic religion practiced throughout the Baltic-speaking world by people speaking Old Prussian, Latvian, and Lithuanian. The highest figure in the ancient Latvian religious system was Dievs, the creator of order in the world and the judge and guardian of moral law who actively took part in the everyday lives of farmers. Dievs also was the personification of the sky, similar to the Indian Dyaus and the Greek Zeus. Perkons the Thunderer, Saule the Sun, and Mēness the Moon also occupied important places in the pantheon of Latvian gods. In Latvian religion the earth was personified and called the Earth Mother. Latvians also worshipped the forest divinity, Meža mate, as well as the goddess of human destiny, Laima. The most important source for the study of Latvian paganism is folklore, including dainas (short quatrains) of which there are around two million, and numerous folktales.

Latvian folk religion was largely pushed aside by Christianity, but in the 1920s Ernests Brastins initiated a Latvian national revival movement. He systematized the Latvian way of looking at the world, called Dievturība. Using the old Baltic form of the Latvian word tureti, Brastins coined the term Dievturis to name a person who keeps Dievs according to the ancient Latvian tradition. The Dievturi participate in three types of sacred events: rites of passage, seasonal feasts, and regular "praise meetings," or glorification.

The Dievturi have been joined by another form of Paganism, the folklore movement, which started in the 1970s. The ancient worldview and the feelings maintained in Latvian folklore found new expressions here. Adherents of this movement devote most of their attention to singing. Because the several elderly members of the movement are the direct heirs of the oral folk traditions, a larger body of singers rightly call themselves the true exponents of ancient folk wisdom.

Solveiga Krumina-Konkova and Nikandrs Gills

Sources:

Biezais, Haralds. Die Göttesgestalt der lettischen der Volksreligion. Uppsala, Sweden: Acta Universitatis Upsaliensis, 1961.
 ———. Die Hautgöttinnen der alten Letten. Uppsala, Sweden: Acta Universitatis Upsaliensis, 1955.
 ———. Die himmlische Götterfamilie der alten Letten. Uppsala, Sweden: Acta Universitatis Upsaliensis, 1972.
 Janis, Tupesu. “The Ancient Latvian Religion: Dieturiba.” Lituanus 33, 3 (1987).

Latvian Evangelical Lutheran Church

In the beginning of the sixteenth century the cities of Livonia—Riga, Dorpat, and Revel—were among the first cities in the world to adhere to the teachings of the Protestant Reformation. The first Riga leader of the Reformation, accepting it in 1521, was Andreas Knöpken (1468–1539) from Treptova; he was joined the next year by Sylvester Tegetmeyer from Vittenberg.

Participation in the Reformation by Latvians, as opposed to German-speaking residents of Latvia, occurred primarily in Riga, where almost one-third of the inhabitants were non-Germans. The Reformation became the catalyst for the development of a Latvian written language and book printing. The Bible was translated into Latvian by Pastor Ernest Glück, and his edition was published between 1685 and 1694.

In 1628 King Gustavus II Adolfus (1594–1632) of Sweden captured Riga and moved on in 1629 to take control of the southern part of modern Estonia and the Latvian Vidzeme. In Vidzeme the rules of the Church of Sweden (Lutheran) came into force in 1686. The territory of Livonia Latgallia was under the administration of Poland/Lithuania from 1561 to 1772 and given the name Inflantia. During this period Roman Catholicism prevailed in Inflantia.

Russia incorporated Vidzeme in 1721, Inflantia in 1772, and the Duchy of Courland and Zemgallia in 1795. In the middle of the nineteenth century, conversions from Lutheranism to Orthodoxy on a mass scale were forced upon the people of Vidzeme. There were 113,000 converts (12 percent of all Lutherans) in 1852 alone. A fresh wave of religious experience was brought to the country by the Herhuterian Brothers, who established the Latvian Church of Brothers, also known as the Moravian Church. The church organized and adopted its rule of order in 1727.

During the period before World War I, the Lutheran Church was divided into the provincial Consistories of Vidzeme, Courland, and Riga (until 1890) with a general consistory in Saint Petersburg (1832). The German Lutheran nobility of the Baltic provinces obtained special privileges from the Russian czars. In 1914 approximately two-thirds of the 120 Latvian congregations were under noble patronage. After the foundation of the Latvian state in 1918, the patronage was abolished in 1920 and the nobility’s rights were transferred to the elected representatives of congregations. In February 1922, a newly formed synod elected Karlis Irbe as the first bishop of the independent Latvian Evangelical Lutheran Church (LELC). He was succeeded by Teodors Grinbergs in 1932.

According to census data, the Lutheran Church embraced 55.15 percent of the Latvian population in 1935. However, at the end of World War II, 131 Lutheran pastors (55 percent) left Latvia to continue their religious missions elsewhere, because the church in Latvia was being subjected to efforts by the Soviet regime to make it a loyal servant. In the late 1980s and early 1990s the church was one of the first institutions to enjoy spiritual and political freedom. In 1993 a new archbishop, Janis Vanags, was selected. Under his leadership, the LELC has again become an influential ecclesiastical body in the country. In 1988 LELC had reported 206 congregations. By 1996 that number had increased to 294, with 324,280 members. In 1999 the church experienced a schism when some four hundred members who adhered to a conservative interpretation of the Augsburg Confession established the Confessional Lutheran Church.

Solveiga Krumina-Konkova and Nikandrs Gills

Sources:

Adamovics, Ludvigs. Dzimtenes baznīcas vesture. Riga, Latvia: N.p., 1927.
 Gills, Nikandrs, and Solveiga Krumina-Konkova. The Latvian Evangelical Lutheran Church at the Threshold of Year 2000. Religion, State & Society Series, vol. 27, no. 2. Oxford: Keston Institute, 1999.
 Kiploks, Edgars. Evangeliski-luteriskas baznīcas sakumi un nostiprināšanas Latvija: Ticības spēka. Lincoln, NB: LELBA, 1983.
 Talonen, Jouko. Church under the Pressure of Stalinism. Rovaniemi, Finland: Historical Society of Northern Finland, 1997.

Lebanon

Lebanon’s ancient and sometimes tumultuous history goes back to the beginnings of civilization. Phoenicians were among the earliest inhabitants of the land, migrating from the Arabian Peninsula about 3500 B.C.E. Major Phoenician hubs were Baalbek (named for the Canaanite storm god, Baal, who competed for devotees with the Israelite god, Yahweh), Beirut, Byblos, Tyre, and Sidon. The Phoenicians were noted for shipbuilding, and their alphabet also spread throughout the area.

Modern Lebanon was formerly a region that, like Israel, Jordan, and contemporary Syria, was once encompassed by Greater Syria. Pompey the Great (106–48 B.C.E.) assumed governorship of the region in 64 B.C.E. and annexed it to the Syrian Province, making it part of the Roman Empire. Aramaic replaced the Phoenician language, and Christianity became the primary religion by the fourth century C.E.

Christianity spread in the region from Antioch, and the metropolitan of Antioch became one of the most revered leaders in the Eastern church, along with the metropolitans of Jerusalem, Alexandria, and Constantinople. The Council of Chalcedon (451) established Antioch's patriarchal status while delineating the bounds of its territory, sandwiched in between Constantinople and Jerusalem. The council also issued a statement about the nature of Christ as fully God and fully man, which was considered the orthodox position on the subject by most Christians. However, in the territory of the Antiochian Church there were dissenters, called Monophysites, who rejected the Chalcedonian position and formed the SYRIAC ORTHODOX PATRIARCHATE OF ANTIOCH AND ALL THE EAST. The GREEK ORTHODOX PATRIARCHATE OF ANTIOCH AND ALL THE EAST remains the oldest of the Christian bodies in the region but has lost its position of hegemony in the Christian community, as it has been the major source from which each new movement in the region has gathered its members.

Islam took root in Lebanon in the seventh century. The two most important Islamic groups are the Sunnis and the Shi'ites. The Sunni claim they are the only true followers of the faith, believing among other things that the leader of Islam should always be elected, rather than conferred by heredity. Until 1959, they refused to accept the Shi'a as Muslims because they followed a hereditary caliphate. In the eighth century a minority group of Shi'ites, the Ismailis, created another division in the Islamic community. The split occurred over who should succeed Ja'far al-Sadiq (d. 165 C.E.) as the next imam, the leader of the Shi'a community. The new imam had to be an heir of Muhammad through his son-in-law. However, the next imam Ismail al-Mubarakhad (d. 760) had already passed away. The Ismailis chose to continue the lineage of imams through Ismail and

Status of religions in Lebanon, 2000-2050

Followers	2000			2025	2050
	total	%	rate
Christians	1,738,000	53.0	2.41	2,246,000	2,560,000
Roman Catholics	1,395,000	42.5	2.40	1,825,000	2,100,000
Orthodox	535,000	16.3	2.70	720,000	850,000
Independents	118,000	3.6	3.09	240,000	350,000
Muslims	1,391,000	42.4	2.61	1,881,000	2,177,000
Nonreligious	120,000	3.7	3.50	200,000	300,000
Atheists	27,300	0.8	2.67	65,000	120,000
Baha'is	3,300	0.1	2.73	6,000	10,000
Jews	1,900	0.1	1.26	2,000	2,000
Total population	3,282,000	100.0	2.53	4,400,000	5,169,000

selected one of his sons to lead them. In contrast, the majority of Shi'ites selected Musa al-Kazem, the younger brother of Ismail, as the legitimate heir. The Shi'ites continued the lineage until the twelfth imam, a child, Muhammad al-Mahdi, disappeared mysteriously in 874.

Many Ismailis (called Fatimids after Ali's wife and Muhammad's daughter, Fatima) settled in southern Lebanon around the Arameans. Their views influenced the Persians and Arabs of the desert, and their presence laid the groundwork for the rise of popular Islam in Lebanon. Shi'a and Ismaili leaders, who taught that Ali and his descendants were incarnations of God, contrasted sharply with the Sunni perspective and its practice of consensus, by which religious leaders are appointed, not necessarily through blood kinship with the Prophet Muhammad.

Into this situation another movement arose in the eleventh century. A prophet named Muhammad ibn Isma'il ad-Darazi (d. c. 1019) taught a new doctrine called Durzi or DRUZE. He believed the Fatimid leader al-Hakim

A Maronite monk at the St. Antoine Mar Kozhaya Monastery in Lebanon (Helene Rogers/TRIP)

(996–1021), who suddenly disappeared in 1021, to be divine and he awaited his return. Druzism emerged as an esoteric religion of secrecy. Those chosen to have access to the holy scripture abstain from wine, tobacco, and abusive language and observe monogamous marriages. The religion spread northward and converted several significant nomadic Arab tribes and some of the Sabaeans who practiced a Gnostic form of Christianity. Today, the Druzes number about five hundred thousand. Their religious practice is simple, based on six commandments: sincerity, devotion to one another, decrying paganism, never interacting with the devil, and belief in the unity of al-Hakim.

The ALAWIS, also called the Nusayris, have a small presence in Lebanon. It is highly probable they took their name from Muhammad ibn Nusayr (d. 868), a noted figure in Basra who in 859 declared himself the tenth imam. A pagan and Christian substratum underlies this eclectic form of Islam. The Alawis have some religious characteristics that are similar to the Ismailis. Their festivals include Christmas and Epiphany, as well as the Muslim feasts of Adha and Ashura and the Persian Nawruz.

In 1516 Ottoman Turks took military control of the entire Mediterranean coast, including the area now called Lebanon. For the next three hundred years local leaders operated in relative autonomy and developed religious and economic ties with Europe. In 1831 Muhammad 'Ali Pasha of Egypt (1769–1849) extended his domain northward, encroaching on the debilitated Turkish Ottoman Empire. The Turks, ruling from afar, were prompted to first set up a Christian-based government and then allowed France to step in to protect the Maronite Christians.

When the Ottoman Empire crumbled after World War I, the French declared Lebanon and Syria protectorates, dividing them into two provinces for administrative reasons. Today, the two countries remain separate. However, it was not until 1991 that Syria signed a formal agreement recognizing Lebanon as an independent country, and to this day Syria keeps twenty thousand military troops garrisoned there because of the threat of invasion by Israel.

Lebanon became independent in 1943, by which time the groundwork for an unusual system of government had been laid. Lebanon practices a confessional form of government in which representation is based on religious affiliation. According to the National Pact, an unwritten agreement that reflects the country's confessionalism, the president must be a Maronite Christian, the prime minister a Sunni Muslim, the speaker of the Parliament a Shi'ite Muslim, and the armed forces chief of staff a Druze. The census report from 1932 was used to establish the apportionment of government offices. At the time of Lebanon's independence, there were more Christians than Muslims. Today, 70 percent of Lebanese are Muslim and 30 percent are Christian, and all citizens carry a national identity card encoded with their religion. The government recognizes five Muslim sects (Shi'a, Sunni, Druze, Ismailite, and Alawite), eleven Christian traditions (four Orthodox, six Catholic, and one Protestant), as well as Judaism. Religious affiliation defines how Lebanese citizens follow laws for marriage, divorce, adoption, and inheritance. This system has made it difficult to establish a nationalist or secular unification. Today, Lebanon is a republic with a president, a cabinet, and a unicameral national assembly.

Lebanon struggled through civil wars during the late 1970s and 1980s. Although it was once considered (along with Iran) to be among the most modern and Western-oriented countries in the region, this turmoil eroded Lebanon's stability. Problems began when a new census was not conducted even though the Muslim segment of the population had grown considerably. Then in the 1970s, a charismatic leader from Iran, Imam Musa Sadr (1928–c. 1978), revitalized and mobilized the Lebanese Shi'ite community. He founded the Movement of the Disinherited in 1974, leading to the formation of AMAL (Afwaj al-Muqawamah al-Lubnaniyyah), a sociopolitical network, and a militia force to protect Shi'ites.

Over the next decade, five events transformed Lebanon: the Lebanese Civil War of 1975, the disappearance of Musa Sadr in 1978 while visiting Muammar Qaddafi in Libya, the Iranian Revolution of 1978–1979, and the two Israeli invasions in 1978 and 1982. Some Shi'ites nurtured the idea that Musa Sadr was the "Imam of the Disinherited" and the occultation of the Hidden Twelfth Imam. The Israeli invasions impelled the Shi'ite community to protect itself.

In the 1980s Iran supported AMAL and two other groups, Hizbullah and the Islamic Jihad, all centered on Baalbek, a Shi'ite community in the Bezaa Valley. AMAL was rejected by some who saw it as too secular. Hizbullah, the Party of God, looked for an Islamic republic and felt empowered by the Qur'an (58:19–20) to fight against the party of Satan. Hizbullah argued that Western countries wished to banish the Qur'an, an idea that mobilized frightened Shi'ite clerics. Hizbullah emerged as an umbrella organization for a number of groups.

Although Lebanon remained neutral in the 1973 Arab-Israeli War, it did grant asylum to three hundred thousand Palestinians, mostly in the southern area. The refugee camps were makeshift and frequently the site of military action by both Israel and Lebanon. In June 1982, Israeli troops overran Lebanon and took over the Center for Palestinian Studies, administered by the Palestinian Liberation Organization (PLO). The PLO then agreed to leave Beirut under international supervision. On August 23, 1982, a wobbly Lebanese Congress selected Bashir Gemayel (1947–1982) to succeed President Elias Sarkis (1924–1982); however, the Maronite leader was assassinated in a dynamite attack before taking office. In 1988, pro-Israeli Maronite general Michel Aoun assumed the presidency, with Selim al-Hoss, a Muslim, as prime minister. On November 5, 1989, Rene Moawad (1925–1989), a Maronite Christian sympathetic to Muslim issues, was elected president, but like Gemayel he was assassinated before taking office. Aoun, lacking international support, entered self-exile in France.

In December 1990, the National Pact was nullified, and various government and military positions were parceled out to the various groups (Sunni, Shi'a, Druze, AMAL, and so on) in accordance with a six-to-five ratio of Christians to Muslims. In April 1992, a new twenty-four-member cabinet was formed, one-half of whom were Christian and the other half Muslim. Today, the population is about 75 percent Muslim, with the Sunni closely challenged by the Shi'ites, who are growing in numbers.

The Christian community is historically centered in the Greek Orthodox Patriarchate under the leadership of the patriarch of Antioch and the East, who is selected from the graduates of Maronite College in Rome. The patriarchate is based in Damascus, Syria, with Lebanese dioceses in Aleppo, al-Hadath, Beirut, Marj Uyun, Tripoli, Tyre and Sidon, and Zahlah. As the new century began, there were three hundred thousand Greek Orthodox in Lebanon (approximately 10 percent of the population).

As Muslims conquered the region in the seventh century, the Maronites, an indigenous Christian sect of uncertain origin, sought refuge in the Lebanese mountains. The words maron and marun in Syriac mean "small lord." Several theories trace them to John Maron, a fourth- or fifth-century monk, or to Maron of Antioch in the seventh century. In the seventh century, the Maronites separated themselves from the patriarchate and elected their own bishop while remaining Orthodox in faith and practice. Although the Maronites had originally established ties with the ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH in 1182, they dissolved the relationship in the sixteenth century. When they reestablished contact, it was with the understanding that they would retain the Aramaic, Arabic, and Karshuni (Old Syriac) script for their liturgy. During the Ottoman era (1516–1914), they remained isolated until 1857, when they revolted against the landed gentry, particularly the Druze, insisting on safe passage, political representation, and land ownership.

Today, the MARONITE CATHOLIC CHURCH is the largest Christian group in Lebanon. Historically, Maronites have been country dwellers much like the Druze, but they are now scattered throughout the country, with the highest population in the Mount Lebanon area. The Maronites have traditionally dominated the upper socioeconomic class. Prior to the civil war, they held 20 percent of the major political posts in Lebanon.

The Greek or MELKITE CATHOLIC CHURCH forms the second largest Eastern rite community in Lebanon. The Melkites split from the Greek Orthodox Patriarchate in the early eighteenth century and aligned with the Vatican, though they continued to use the Byzantine Greek rite and the Arabic language. The highest official of the church is the patriarch of Antioch, who lives near Beirut. He is elected by bishops in a synod and approved by the pope, who gives him a pallium. Greek Catholics permit icons in their churches but not statues. Most Greek Catholics in Lebanon live in Beirut and the central and eastern parts of the country. Their educational level is higher than that of most of the population, and they are proud of their Arab heritage. They make up approximately 3 percent of the population and as of 1986 numbered about seventy-two thousand people.

The SYRIAN CATHOLIC CHURCH developed throughout the seventeenth century in response to successful missionary activity by the Roman Catholic Church among Syrian Orthodox faithful in Syria. Today it is based in Lebanon, and the patriarch resides in Beirut. There were times of conflict within the church over its closeness with the Syrian Orthodox Church of Antioch. The Syrian Orthodox did not accept the orthodox teachings concerning the nature of Christ. Instead, they were Monophysites (sometimes called Jacobites after their early leader, Jacobus Baradaeus [490–578]), who believed Jesus had only a divine nature. The Syrian Catholics, on the other hand, accepted the humanity of Jesus as described in the Catholic creeds.

The Syrian Catholic Church can be said to have begun in 1662, when those Syrians who accepted the Syrian-Antiochene Creed and were oriented to the papacy elected Andrew Akhidjan head of the Syrian Orthodox Church. After his death, the Orthodox and Catholic factions drew farther apart. During the eighteenth century, Syrian Catholics went underground because the Ottoman Empire favored the Orthodox. Then in 1782, the Syrian Orthodox patriarch declared his allegiance to Rome and fled to Lebanon. The Our Lady of Sharfeh Monastery was founded, and a new line of Syrian Catholic patriarchs was established. In 1885 the Ottoman Empire granted recognition to the Syrian Catholics, and in 1850 the church headquarters were moved to Mardin in southeast Turkey. The church expanded rapidly throughout the region, but due to the massacre of Syrians in World War I, many members fled to Lebanon. The current patriarch, Ignasius Musa I Daud, is spiritual leader to one hundred thousand Syrian Catholics, mostly living in Lebanon, Syria, and Egypt. Worship is conducted in Syrian although most members speak Arabic. The Syrian Orthodox Church has dwindled today to less than 15,000 members.

The EPISCOPAL CHURCH IN JERUSALEM AND THE MIDDLE EAST oversees a small number of Protestants in Lebanon. Their origins can be traced to the late eighteenth century, when Anglican missionaries traveled the Middle East and North Africa. Permanent work began with Joseph Wolff of the London Churches Ministry. In 1820, he began evangelizing among the Jewish people in the region, and an Anglican bishop was placed in Jerusalem in 1840, from which time an Anglican presence throughout the Middle East has developed. In 1957, the Diocese of Jerusalem was elevated to an archdiocese, and a separate diocese was created for Lebanon, Syria, and Jordan. That diocese merged into the Diocese of Jerusalem when the present Episcopal Church was formed in 1976.

The NATIONAL EVANGELICAL SYNOD OF SYRIA is a Protestant organization now based in Anntelias, Lebanon, with about four thousand members worldwide. Its history dates back to 1870, when the American Congregationalists turned over their missions to the American Presbyterians. Today it is autonomous. The REFORMED CHURCH IN AMERICA has been working in former Ottoman territory since the 1840s; however, it does not have a large presence, choosing instead to work with other allied groups.

The first Protestant congregation to be recognized by the Ottoman authorities was founded by missionaries sent out by the AMERICAN BOARD OF COMMISSIONERS FOR FOREIGN MISSIONS, which had been established in 1823 in Beirut. In 1886 Dr. Daniel Bliss, a Congregational missionary, founded the Syrian Protestant College, which in 1920 became the American University of Beirut. The university's charter reflects its ecumenical ideology, and its educational standards are benchmarks for other universities in the Middle East. (The United States, Great Britain, France, Denmark, and several other countries have dispatched missionaries to Lebanon. After World War I and the demise of the Ottoman Empire two churches were created: from several small congregations that unified the National Evangelical Synod of Syria and the National Evangelical Union of Lebanon.)

The SOUTHERN BAPTIST CONVENTION began work in Lebanon in 1921 but did not send missionaries as permanent residents until 1948. The Lebanese Baptist Convention has approximately 450 members. The Near East School of Theology, an ecumenical institution near the American University in Beirut, is supported by the UNITED CHURCH OF CHRIST and the PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH (U.S.A.).

The Near East Council is an ecumenical group of churches that dates from 1928. It has two regional councils, the Egypt Intermission Council and United Christian Council of Southeast Asia (Lebanon, Jordan, and Syria). Since 1948 this group has been engaged in helping the Palestinian refugees while serving parishioners throughout the Mediterranean area. Their finances generally come through the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES and Church World Service.

Armenians have had a presence in Lebanon for centuries. The main group is a part of the ARMENIAN APOS-TOLIC CHURCH, attached to the Catholics of the House of Cilicia, established in 1441. Their number in Lebanon was significantly swelled by refugees from the massacres of Armenians that occurred in Turkey in 1915–1920 (after which many Armenians fled the region altogether), and now Lebanese Armenians number some 175,000. Beginning with the Crusades, Catholic missionaries began to proselytize Armenians, and a few congregations emerged from this work. In 1742 Abraham Ardzivian (1679–1749), an Armenian bishop, converted to Roman Catholicism and organized the ARMENIAN CATHOLIC CHURCH. Pope Benedict XIV (1675–1758) named Ardzivian the Armenian patriarch. He renamed himself Abraham Pierre I, and Pierre has become a traditional name for the Armenian patriarchs to choose. Under Ottoman rule, Armenian Catholics were subject to persecution because the Ottoman Caliphate wished to relate only to the Armenian Apostolic Church, whose patriarch was headquartered under its control in Constantinople. In 1829, the Armenian Catholic Church was finally recognized officially, and its patriarch moved to Constantinople. In 1928, the patriarch relocated to Beirut, Lebanon, where the church is still based. Today, the Armenian Catholic Church remains in full communion with the Roman Catholic Church.

The Jewish community in Lebanon dates to ancient times, much of its history being recorded in the Jewish Bible, known to Christians as the Old Testament. In the mid-1950s, some seven thousand Jews resided in Beirut, but the majority left during the fighting of 1967. During the 1975–1976 civil war, which was conducted around the remaining Jewish neighborhoods, about eighteen hundred people left. Today fewer than one hundred Jews remain in Lebanon.

Among the Arab population in Lebanon, about 12–15 percent are Palestinians who abide in makeshift refugee camps. Their plight is uncertain because they are stateless.

Gail M. Harley

Sources:

- Chamie, J. "Religious Groups in Lebanon: A Descriptive Investigation." International Journal of Middle East Studies 11 (1980): 175–187.
- Deeb, M. "Shi'a Movements in Lebanon: Their Formation, Ideology, Social Basis, and Links with Iran and Syria." Third World Quarterly 10, 2 (1988): 683–698.
- Esposito, John L. The Straight Path. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1998.
- Farah, Caesar E. Islam: Beliefs and Observances. 4th ed. Hauppauge, NY: Barrons, 1987.
- Khairallah, I. A. The Legal Status of Non-Moslem Communities in the Near East, and Especially Syria and Lebanon. Beirut: American University of Beirut, 1965.
- Roberson, Ronald G. The Eastern Christian Churches—A Brief Survey. 5th ed. Rome: Edizioni Orientalia Christiana, Pontificio Istituto Orientale, 1995.

Lectorium Rosicrucianum

In the 1920s Jan Leene (1896–1968) and his brother Zwier Wilhelm Leene (1892–1938) became the most important Dutch leaders of the California-based Rosicrucian Fellowship of Max Heindel (Carl Louis von Grasshoff, 1865–1919). On August 24, 1924, the Leenes had a spiritual experience that today is regarded as foundational for the Lectorium Rosicrucianum. The Leenes, however, who were joined in 1930 by Henny Stok-Huyser (1902–1990), declared their independence from the Rosicrucian Fellowship in 1935, when they established the Roze kruisers Genootschap. After the premature death of Zwier Wilhelm in 1938, Jan Leene (using the pen name Jan van Rijckenborgh) and Mrs. Stok-Huyser (who signed herself as Catharose de Petri) began to put in writing their version of Christian Gnosticism, derived from Hermeticism, the seventeenth-century Rosicrucian movement, and the mystical Christianity of Jacob Böhme (1575–1624). Jan van Rijckenborgh translated Böhme's Aurora into Dutch, and in 1941 he was instrumental in founding a Jacob Böhme Society.

When the Nazis entered Holland, the movement was banned, its possessions confiscated, and its temples razed. Several members, including Jews, died in the concentration camps. In 1945, after the difficulties of the war period, the movement adopted the name Lectorium Rosicrucianum. Interested in Catharism, the two founders met Antonin Gadal (1871–1962) in France in 1948, Gadal being one of the key figures of the Cathar revival in the twentieth century. At the same time, the Lectorium Rosicrucianum began to spread, first to Germany, where the Rosicrucian myth was as important as the Cathar tragedy was in southern France, and then to a number of other countries. The most notable success came, however, after the death of Van Rijckenborgh (1968) and Catharose de Petri (1990), who were replaced by an International Spiritual Directorate.

There are currently approximately fifteen thousand adherents to the Lectorium Rosicrucianum, who are divided into fourteen thousand "pupils" and about one thousand "members," who await admission as pupils. After a waiting period of one or two years, the new pupils engage in a way of life in which a "balance of the consciousness" is regarded as essential. From this engagement stems a quest for mental, emotional, and physical purification, supported by vegetarianism and abstinence from alcohol, tobacco, and drugs. There is also a clear disapproval of other "unhealthy influences," in particular those allegedly transmitted by television, as well as the more subtle influences coming from the world of the dead (the "reflective sphere").

In order to understand the Lectorium, it is crucial to look at it in the light of Gnosticism and the Cathar tradition. The Lectorium proposes a classical Gnostic dualism between the divine, or static, world and the natural, or dialectic, world, which the true God did not create. As French historian Antoine Faivre has pointed out, it is difficult to reconcile this dualism with the Rosicrucian tradition, since the latter, at least in its seventeenth-century origins, is not dualistic.

The dialectic world includes both the living and those among the dead who, in a state of dissolution, await a new incarnation. Van Rijckenborgh's idea of subsequent incarnations can only be understood within the framework of his notion that each person is a microcosm. Popular theories of reincarnation, whereby it is the personal ego that reincarnates, are refuted by this view. The only function of the ego is in fact to sacrifice itself in favor of the "resurrection of the original soul," the divine spark at the heart of the human microcosm. The so-called living, having forgotten their divine origin, are imprisoned in this dualist and absurd world, although they also possess a "spirit spark atom," which manifests itself in many as remembrance (or pre-remembrance) and nostalgia. The path to transfiguration, as envisaged by the Lectorium, is a seven-stage process that aims to awaken that divine spark, called "the rose of the heart," and to lead humans back to their original condition, the divine world of the Light.

One finds here the classical picture common to all forms of Gnosticism. This version of Gnosticism, however, organizes itself according to a language and according to models often derived directly from the Cathar tradition. Over and above the debate on the role of Gadal and his neo-Catharism, the dualism of the Lectorium and that of the Cathars are remarkably similar. Both are not only evident in their cosmology but they also inspire human behavior. Human actions can further the progress toward transfiguration or, conversely, can further imprison humans in the dialectic field.

The Lectorium provides an esoteric interpretation of both soul and body, as well as presenting a vision of the future. Here, one finds texts on the coming of a false Christ and an Armageddon that could be regarded as either millennialist or apocalyptic. These labels are misleading, however, since apocalyptic language is used purely within a Gnostic context and is largely symbolic.

Address:

Lectorium Rosicrucianum
 Bakenessergracht 11–15
 2011JS Haarlem
 The Netherlands
<http://www.lectoriumrosicrucianum.org>

Massimo Introvigne and PierLuigi Zoccatelli

Sources:

Faivre, Antoine. "Les courants ésotériques et le rapport. Les exemples de la Nouvelle Acropole et de la Rose-Croix d'Or (Lectorium Rosicrucianum). In Pour en finir avec les sectes. Le débat sur le rapport de la commission parlementaire, edited by Massimo Introvigne and J. Gordon Melton, 233–254. 3rd ed. Paris: Dervy, 1996.

Van Rijckenborgh, Jan. The Coming New Man. Haarlem, the Netherlands: Rozekruis-Pers, 1957.

———. Elementary Philosophy of the Modern Rosecross. Haarlem, the Netherlands: Rozekruis-Pers, 1961.

The Way of the Rosecross in Our Times. Haarlem, the Netherlands: Rozekruis-Pers, 1978.

Legion of Mary [Maria Legio] (Kenya)

The largest secession from the ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH anywhere in Africa is the Legion of Mary, or Maria Legio, with estimates of membership in the 1990s ranging between 250,000 and 2 million. This movement was founded by Catholic Luos in western Kenya in 1963, the year of Kenya's independence, and its name has been changed many times. The first leaders were laypeople, Simeon Mtakatifu Ondeto (1920–1991) and Gaudensia Aoko. A young woman whose two children had both died on the same day, Aoko began to denounce witchcraft and sorcery. Ondeto established a church headquarters on the holy mountain of Got Kwer, to be called the New Jerusalem and the Holy City, and Aoko began to perform mass baptisms. Within a year, the church had one hundred thousand members. It retained much Catholic liturgy, including the Latin language, a celibate leadership, an order of nuns, and titles like pope and cardinal.

The Legion of Mary also had many characteristics much like other spiritual churches, including healing rituals; deliverance from witchcraft, prophecies, and spirit possession; prohibitions on dancing and consuming pork, tobacco, and alcohol; and the practice of polygyny.

Aoko left the Legion of Mary in 1965 to found her own movement after Ondeto began restricting the role of women in general and her own role as charismatic founder of the movement in particular. Although she later returned, she was soon again head of her own Legion of Mary movement. Another woman, called Mama Maria, is believed to be the black incarnation of the Virgin Mary. Adherents to the Legion of Mary, called Legios, hold that Mama Maria had returned to heaven in 1966 and is the spiritual mother of Ondeto.

The church initially spread only among Luos but has become increasingly multiethnic, reaching many parts of Kenya, Tanzania, and other East African countries. In Tanzania, a schism from this church six months after its founding there resulted in the African Catholic Church. Ondeto, who died in 1991 and was buried at Got Kwer, became known as Baba Messiah and is regarded by some Legios as Christ reincarnated in Africa, the living God. Pope Timothy Blasio Ahitler (1941–1998) became leader until his death in 1998, when a new pope, Lawrence Pius Jairo Chiage, was appointed.

Allan H. Anderson

Sources:

- Anderson, Allan H. African Reformation: African Initiated Christianity in the Twentieth Century. Lawrenceville, NJ: Africa World Press, 2001.
- Hastings, Adrian. The Church in Africa, 1450–1930. Oxford: Clarendon, 1994.
- Schwartz, Nancy. "Christianity and the Construction of Global History: The Example of Legio Maria." In Christianity as a Global Culture, edited by Karla Poewe. Columbia: University of South Carolina Press, 1994.

Lemba

The Lemba are an African people residing primarily in South Africa and Zimbabwe who claim that they are descendants of Jews who have retained their faith even though cut off geographically for many centuries from the center of Judaism. According to traditions alive among the Lemba, they came from Sena, which many believe to have been a town north of Jericho in Israel. Others claim that the Lemba descend from attendants of the biblical King Solomon, who is said to have traveled to Zimbabwe (the Ophir of 1 Kings 9:28) in search of gold. The Lemba allege that when Solomon returned to Israel (the Hebrew Bible does not record any trip of Solomon to southern Africa), some of his men remained behind, intermarried with the Zimbabweans, taught the Africans to worship only one god, Mwali, and spread Jewish traditions through southern Africa.

The Lemba have been associated with the Venda culture that reached its peak in the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries, the time of Great Zimbabwe, the magnificent medieval stone city. The Lemba were of lighter skin than the Venda and served as physicians, artisans, and iron workers. They were also somewhat feared as sorcerers. They served with the Venda in wars against the British at the beginning of the twentieth century.

A variety of traditional Lemban practices point to Jewish roots (though some claim that they were picked up from Muslim sources). The Lemba circumcise male children. They bury their dead in accordance with Jewish traditions. They hold the first day of the new moon sacred and shave their heads to commemorate it. They do not eat pork. They practice animal sacrifice, but only circumcised males may sacrifice animals for food. Women engage in purification ceremonies after menstruating or giving birth. Non-Lemba women are allowed to marry into the group, but Lemba men may be expelled if they marry outsiders.

It should be noted that the Lemba identify themselves as Jews culturally, but not necessarily religiously. They follow a set of traditional cultural practices that signify to them their Hebrew ancestry. While some have converted to the Jewish faith in recent years, many are Muslims or Christians. It is their unique ritual practices that separate them from their neighbors as a chosen people.

In a series of studies, the first published in 1996, the Lemba claims have been supported by research on their chromosomes, which were discovered to have a remarkable likeness to those of other Semitic people. More importantly, the researchers found that many Lemba men carry in their male chromosome a set of DNA sequences that is distinctive of the cohanim, the Jewish priests believed to be the descendants of Aaron.

There are some fifty to seventy thousand members of the Lemba community. Their uniting symbol is a flag with a Star of David and the Elephant of Judah.

Address:

The Lemba Community
c/o Lawrence R. Matandu
Makereni School
P.O. Box 249
Mberwengwa
Zimbabwe

Sources:

- "The Jews of Africa." Posted at <http://www.mindspring.com/~jaypsand/lemba.htm>.
- Parfitt, Tudor. Journey to the Vanished City. New York: St. Martin's Press, 1993.
- . The Thirteenth Gate: Travels among the Lost Tribes of Israel. London: Weidenfeld & Nicolson, 1987.
- Thomas, M. G., T. Parfitt, D. A. Weiss, K. Skorecki, M. le Roux, N. Bradman, and D. B. Goldstein. "Y Chromosomes Traveling South: The Cohen Modal Haplotype and the Origins of the Lemba—The 'Black Jews of Southern Africa.'" American Journal of Human Genetics 66 (2000): 674–686.

Lesotho

The nation of Lesotho, a small country completely surrounded by the Republic of South Africa, has its origins in the expansionist policy of Shaka (c. 1787–1828), a Zulu leader who in 1818 began the process of uniting the Zulu and other Batu people of southern Africa. Although he conquered the land making up present-day Natal and Transvaal (South Africa), some groups united against him. The most effective counterforce was brought together by Moshoeshe I, the head of the Bakwene group among the Sotho people. Moshoeshe united several Sotho and Zulu groups against Shaka. They established themselves along the Drakensberg Mountains and were able to defend themselves in the intermittent wars through the 1820s. Then, in 1839, they had to stave off expansion by the Boer settlers in South Africa. This generation of warfare gave the very different groups a sense of nationhood.

Following the discovery of diamonds in South Africa, British missionaries convinced Moshoeshe I that the safest course was to allow the British to establish a protectorate

A Sangoma healer in Lesotho (J. Denham/TRIP)

LATTER-DAY SAINTS have also established churches in Lesotho. The BAHÁ'Í FAITH began a period of rapid growth following the formation of its first spiritual assembly in 1964. Islam has made little progress among the general population, but some Asian businesspeople and their families established a mosque in Butha-Buthe in 1972.

Sources:

- The Catholic Church of Lesotho at the Hour of Independence.* Maseru, Lesotho: Lesotho Catholic Information Bureau, 1966.
- Machobane, L. B. B. Basotho Religion and Western Thought. Edinburgh: Centre of African Studies/Edinburgh University, 1995.
- Mohapeloa, J. M. From Mission to Church: Fifty Years of the Work of the Paris Evangelical Missionary Society and the Lesotho Evangelical Church, 1933–1983. Morija, Lesotho: Morija Sesuto Book Depot, 1985.

Lesotho Evangelical Church

The Lesotho Evangelical Church originated in one of the initial thrusts into the heart of Africa by the PARIS MISSION

(of the REFORMED CHURCH OF FRANCE). In 1833 three missionaries—Thomas Arbousset, Eugène Casalis, and Constant Gosselin—received approval to work in the region from King Moshoeshoe I (1786–1870), who at the time was attempting to gather the people of the region into a kingdom. At first the missionaries' work proceeded smoothly. The initial station was erected at Morija and others were opened thereafter. However, South Africa had its eyes on the region, and to protect his land from the superior South African forces, Moshoeshoe aligned with Britain. The mission suffered in the warfare that followed and was eventually closed.

In 1868 Lesotho (then called Basutoland) became a British protectorate. The mission reopened and soon entered a growth phase. In 1887, a theological school was established. The first synod (seboka), including both the missionaries and the active graduates of the seminary, appeared in 1898. Natural development through the first half of the twentieth century led to the establishment of the independent Lesotho Evangelical Church (Kereke ea Evangeli Lesotho) in 1964. Basutoland became the independent nation of Lesotho in 1966.

In 1970 the prime minister of Lesotho, Leabua Jonathan, suspended the country's constitution. He attempted to rule as a dictator, pushing aside King Moshoeshoe II. The church identified with the opposition. The church newspaper had published detailed stories of life under the new government; its editor was assassinated. The church's vice president was forced to leave the country. Jonathan was overthrown in 1986, but his successor did little better; an unstable period ensued until free elections were held in 1993 and a new king was enthroned.

In the late 1990s the Lesotho Evangelical Church reported 211,000 members in fifty-six congregations. The highest legislative body is the General Synod. The church is a member of the WORLD ALLIANCE OF REFORMED CHURCHES and the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES.

Address:

Lesotho Evangelical Church
P.O. Box 260
Old Busstop, Casalis House
Maseru 100
Lesotho

Source:

Bauswein, Jean-Jacques, and Lukas Vischer, eds. The Reformed Family Worldwide: A Survey of Reformed Churches, Theological Schools, and International Organizations. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans, 1999.

Leuenberg Church Fellowship

The Leuenberg Church Fellowship is an alliance of more than one hundred Protestant Christian denominations that have agreed that they have a shared understanding on a number of key points of Christian belief. Based upon that understanding, they can share “complete pulpit and table fellowship,” meaning that ministers of any group in the fellowship may be allowed to preach in the congregations of the other member churches and that all members recognize and may receive the sacraments of the other member churches. The agreement grew out of conversations initiated by the Lutheran and Reformed churches after World War II. It later came to include the Waldensian Church (Italy) and the Church of the Czech Brethren (Czechoslovakia).

The Leuenberg Church Fellowship was formed in 1973, when a lengthy text detailing the points upon which agreement had been reached was published. The agreement affirms the Christian faith centered in the affirmation of the Triune God and salvation in Jesus Christ. The heart of the agreement, however, concerned the sacraments, the differing understandings of which had been a major obstacle dividing Lutheran and Reformed churches. In three crucial paragraphs, the agreement affirmed the following:

Baptism: Baptism is administered in the Name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit with water. In Baptism Jesus Christ irrevocably receives man, fallen prey to sin and death, into his fellowship of salvation so that he may become a new creature. In the power of his Holy Spirit he calls him into his community and to a new life of faith, to daily repentance and discipleship.

The Lord’s Supper: In the Lord’s Supper the risen Jesus Christ imparts himself in his body and blood, given up for all, through his word of promise with bread and wine. He thereby grants us forgiveness of sins and sets us free for a new life of faith. He enables us to experience anew that we are members of his body. He strengthens us for service to all men. When we celebrate the Lord’s Supper we proclaim the death of Christ through which God has reconciled the world with himself. We proclaim the presence of the risen Lord in our midst. Rejoicing that the Lord has come to us we await his future coming in glory.

This agreement sidestepped sixteenth-century disagreements over the nature of the sacraments and in other places discounted a variety of pronouncements issued by the Reformation churches on other Protestant churches. Following the promulgation of the agreement, churches across Europe signed it and joined the fellowship. The membership has extended beyond the Lutheran and Reformed traditions and earlier union churches, formed by the merger of Lutheran and Reformed churches, to include a number of Methodist churches in Europe. Several Lutheran churches in Argentina have also signed the agreement. Most of the member churches are also members of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES.

Although the Leuenberg Agreement has been implemented primarily in Europe, it has had an effect on church relations globally. For example, it was instrumental in bringing the Reformed and Presbyterian churches in Ethiopia into the ETHIOPIAN EVANGELICAL CHURCH MEKANE YESUS, which had been formed by the previous merger of Lutheran missions in that country. Notable nonparticipants in the fellowship are the Baptist churches and the member churches of the worldwide ANGLICAN COMMUNION.

In 2001 the Leuenberg Church Fellowship reported 103 member churches and three cooperating and participating churches—the main Lutheran churches in Sweden, Finland, and Iceland. With the exception of the Argentine churches and the UNITED METHODIST CHURCH, all of the churches are headquartered in Europe.

Address:

The Leuenberg Church Fellowship
 Jebensstraße 3
 10623 Berlin
 Germany
<http://www.leuenberg.net/>

Liberal Catholic Church

The Liberal Catholic Church was established in Great Britain in 1916 as a result of the reorganization of the British Old Catholic movement, introduced into the country by Bishop Arnold Harris Mathew (1852–1919). Bishop Mathew, consecrated to the episcopate of the Old Catholic Church of Utrecht in 1908, presided over an English mission that was independent of the See of Utrecht from 1910 to 1915. In these same years, many English members of the Theosophical Society joined the Old Catholic mission. Following a disagreement with Mathew on the doctrinal themes of the Theosophical movement, the great majority of the mission’s members decided to rebuild it on more liberal lines. They sought a greater attention to the forms of mysticism that in those decades were influencing Anglicanism and the modernist Christian circles.

The resulting church, formerly known as Old Catholic Church in Great Britain, took the name of Liberal Catholic Church in 1918. The church achieved worldwide growth through the missionary activity of its first presiding bishop, James Ingall Wedgwood (1883–1951), and in many countries it developed through a sort of symbiosis, sometimes highly conflictual, with the Theosophical Society.

A primary spokesman and doctrinal reference for the church is Charles Webster Leadbeater (1854–1934). Already a prolific writer of Theosophical books, Leadbeater was consecrated as a bishop in the Liberal Catholic Church by Wedgwood. He applied his method of extrasensorial perception to the study of Christian sacraments, and his findings were gathered in 1920 in a volume entitled The Science of the Sacraments. The liturgy of the Liberal Catholic Church was compiled by Bishops Wedgwood and Leadbeater and, with some minor changes, is still in use today. This liturgy follows the tradition of Old Catholicism, which preceded the modern liturgical movement in creating a vernacular liturgy on Tridentine lines.

Today the Liberal Catholic Church is present in about fifty countries and organized into ecclesiastical provinces, each directed by a regional bishop and endowed with significant autonomy. The main administrative body is the General Episcopal Synod, headed by a presiding bishop. One of the American churches maintains a site for the international church with links to various dioceses around the world. The total world membership is estimated at around thirty thousand.

The unique qualities of the Liberal Catholic Church make it difficult to place in the larger landscape of religious communions. Drawing as it does on both Anglican/Catholic Christianity and Theosophy, it has enjoyed a response from people worldwide while at the same time being somewhat marginalized from mainstream religious movements. Adapting the liturgical heritage of the Old Catholic world, the church offers a wide liberality of thought, in which Theosophical interpretations of Christian doctrines coexist with a search for common Christian roots, studies on psychological and inner effects of the sacraments, and so on. These very different heritages generate a certain level of inner tension within Liberal Catholicism that attracts many spiritual searchers who are confused by the constraints of ancient theologies and mystical doctrines. Some observers foresee that this church, unlike many other small churches from the independent Catholic and Orthodox traditions, will perpetuate its well-defined raison d'être and be able to keep a cadre of faithful who are limited in number but clearly defined among spiritual searchers.

Address:

Liberal Catholic Church
c/o Most Rev. Johannes C. van Alphen, Presiding Bishop
P.O. Box 95247
Waterloof, 0145
South Africa
<http://kingsgarden.org/English/Organizations/LCC.GB/LCC.html>

Andrea Cassinascio

Sources:

- Cooper, Irving S. Ceremonies of the Liberal Catholic Church. London: St. Alban Press, 1964.
- Norton, Rovnbert. The Willow in the Tempest: A Brief History of the Liberal Catholic Church in the United States of 1917–1942. Ojai, CA: St. Alban Press, 1990.
- Platt, Warren Christopher. "The Liberal Catholic Church: An Analysis of a Hybrid Sect." Ph.D. dissertation, Colombia University, 1982.

Tillett, Gregory J. The Elder Brother. London: Routledge and Kegan Paul, 1982.

Liberia

The contemporary state of Liberia was originally settled by two major groups of African people, the Kru-speaking groups in the west and the Mende-speaking people (of which the Mandingo are the best known) in the east. There are over thirty distinct ethnic groups in the country. The coastal region was visited by the Portuguese beginning in the fifteenth century and became one area from which slaves were collected.

At the end of the eighteenth century, Liberia was part of Sierra Leone, the area set aside by the British for the relocation of people liberated by their antislavery activity. However, in 1821 the American Colonization Society, an organization devoted to relocating African Americans to Africa, purchased what became Liberia and founded the port city of Monrovia. Some twenty thousand African Americans, descendants from various peoples of western Africa, moved to Liberia. They had by this time been largely Americanized and were not well received by the native inhabitants. Several American scholars coauthored a new constitution for what in 1847 became the independent country of Liberia. The descendants of the repatriated African Americans formed a ruling elite in the country, a development that has affected its politics to the present.

Although the tropical climate kept many people away from Liberia, the land was rich in resources—from rubber trees to oil and diamonds. The United States intervened on several occasions to protect American economic investments in the country. In 1979 an economic crisis led to a political coup that saw the assassination of President William Tolbert Jr. (1913–1980) the following year. The new president, Samuel Doe (1950–1990), was able to hold office only by suppressing the opposition, a policy that culminated in civil war in 1990. U.S. troops moved into Liberia but were unable to stop the assassination of Doe. Following his death, a new coalition government that included former rebel leaders was instituted, but fighting

Status of religions in Liberia, 2000–2050

Followers	2000			2025	2050
	total	%	rate
Ethnoreligionists	1,354,000	42.9	1.72	2,500,000	3,200,000
Christians	1,239,000	39.3	2.43	2,848,000	4,750,000
Independents	538,000	17.1	3.55	1,200,000	1,850,000
Protestants	430,000	13.6	3.00	920,000	1,400,000
Roman Catholics	150,000	4.8	4.35	350,000	700,000
Muslims	504,000	16.0	1.84	1,100,000	1,700,000
Nonreligious	48,000	1.5	3.21	140,000	300,000
Baha'is	9,000	0.3	2.49	30,000	60,000
Total population	3,154,000	100.0	2.03	6,618,000	10,010,000

continued for another six years. A six-person ruling council assumed authority while elections were planned. Those elections, held in July 1997, led to the overwhelming victory of the National Patriotic Party and its leader, Charles Taylor (b. 1948). However, a small contingent did not accept the elections and has continued to oppose Taylor's government from their center in the northern part of the country near the border with Guinea.

Liberia was included in the territory assigned to the Roman Catholic diocese of Cape Verde as early as 1533, but Catholic priests did not settle in the region. Thus, Christianity's real entrance began with the arrival of the African Americans, many of whom were Christians. Lott Carey and Colin Teague (c. 1780–1839), remembered as the first African American Christian missionaries, were commissioned by the Richmond (Virginia) African Missionary Convention. In 1822 in Monrovia, they founded the Providence Baptist Church, the first Baptist congregation on the African continent, which was housed in the first church building erected in Liberia. Their work was supplemented by that of White missionaries sent by the American Baptists, but eventually the work was assumed by the Lott Carey Baptist Foreign Missionary Convention and the NATIONAL BAPTIST CONVENTION, U.S.A.

The Methodist Episcopal Church (now an integral part of the UNITED METHODIST CHURCH) sent their first missionary, Melville Cox (1799–1833), to Liberia in 1833. His death only three months after landing portended the problems that most future missionaries would have with the climate there. The mission almost died in the late nineteenth century but was revived with the support of several prominent bishops. Until the 1920s, attention was focused on the city of Monrovia and the former Americans there, but in 1925 a major work opened at Ganta in the north, and in 1948 another was initiated at Gbarnga. The Liberian work remains organized as a conference within the United Methodist Church (UMC). The UMC work has been supplemented by the work of the AFRICAN METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH and the AFRICAN METHODIST EPISCOPAL ZION CHURCH, which entered Liberia in 1873 and 1876, respectively.

The Presbyterian Church in the U.S.A., now an integral part of the PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH (U.S.A.), also began work in Liberia in 1833. Like the Baptists, the Presbyterians began their work among the African Americans, a number of whom were appointed as its missionaries. The last of the missionaries were commissioned in 1887, and the Presbytery of Liberia became an independent body in 1928. This was among the first Liberian churches to ordain women. It is now related to the CUMBERLAND PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH.

Two years after the Methodists and Presbyterians arrived, John Payne, an American missionary with the EPISCOPAL CHURCH, began to work in Liberia. In 1851, he was named the first missionary bishop of Liberia. Payne quickly escaped the confines of Monrovia and opened work among the Grebo people at Cape Palmas in 1836. Also notable in the Episcopal Church's history was the career of Samuel Ferguson (1847–1916), the first black person appointed to the episcopacy. During his long tenure as bishop (1884–1916), Ferguson developed an extensive educational system, capped with Cuttington College and Divinity School. The Episcopal Church in Liberia remains a diocese in the Episcopal Church (U.S.A.).

The United Lutheran Church, now an integral part of the EVANGELICAL LUTHERAN CHURCH IN AMERICA, began work in 1860 some miles inland from Monrovia along the Saint Paul River. It remained a small effort until the end of the century, when David A. Day (1851–1897) and his wife, Emily Day, arrived to assume control. They directed an expansive program that led to the establishment of stations across the country. The LUTHERAN CHURCH IN LIBERIA was organized in 1948, and in 1967 it was given full control over the extensive medical and education work. It has retained a close relationship with U.S. Lutherans.

Several other Christian groups entered Liberia in the twentieth century and have since become as strong as the older churches. These include the SEVENTH-DAY ADVENTIST CHURCH, the Fire-Baptized Holiness Church of God (an African American Holiness church), the ASSEMBLIES OF GOD, and the PENTECOSTAL ASSEMBLIES OF THE WORLD. The CHURCH OF THE LORD (ALADURA) is the largest of several AFRICAN INITIATED CHURCHES.

The ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH attempted to establish work in Monrovia in the nineteenth century but was blocked by the predominantly Protestant religious establishment. However, in 1906, missionaries of the Society of Africa Missions—a French Catholic organization founded in 1856 in Lyons by Bishop Melchior de Marion Brésillac (1813–1858)—began work among the Kru-speaking peoples; later they expanded to other areas. At the end of the twentieth century the Catholic Church was the second largest church in the country, second only to the LIBERIA BAPTIST AND EDUCATIONAL CONVENTION.

Ecumenical relationships have been strong in Liberia, with the larger Protestant churches sharing support of a variety of educational and charitable institutions. The Liberian Council of Churches is associated with the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES and includes WCC members such as the United Methodist Church, the Episcopal Church, the Lutheran Church in Liberia, and the Presbytery of Liberia. More conservative churches have formed the Association of Evangelicals of Liberia, which is affiliated with the WORLD EVANGELICAL ALLIANCE.

In spite of the strong Christian missionary activity, less than half of the Liberian people have become Christian. The largest segment, some 40 percent, retain their traditional religions, especially in those parts of the country farthest from the coast. Traditional religions have as major themes the veneration of ancestors, the working of magic, and the prominence of religious functionaries, popularly known as medicine men, who establish their authority by the demonstration of a spectrum of mystical competences—healing, divining, prognosticating, and so on. Several of the ethnic groups host a spectrum of secret societies to which outsiders may not become privy.

Much animosity has been directed toward the traditional religions because of charges that some of their followers practice ritual killing. Ritual killings, in which various body parts are removed from victims and subsequently used in rituals, appear to occur sporadically, though the lack of reliable information is a problem in assessment (the same situation encountered in other countries). Reports of ritual killing in Liberia may be related to incidents during the civil war of the 1990s, in which faction leaders sometimes ate the body parts of their rivals. One leader had himself filmed consuming such body parts. In recent years, common criminals have been charged with killing and selling body parts.

Islam, primarily of the Sunni MALIKITE SCHOOL OF ISLAM, has come into the country from the north. The Mandingo have been especially instrumental in the spread of Islam, and the Vai, among other groups, have largely converted to Islam. Muslims now constitute the third largest religious community in the country, making up approximately 16 percent of the population. The national center for Sunni Islam is the National Muslim Council, headquartered in Monrovia. There is also a measurable following of the AHMADIYYA MOVEMENT IN ISLAM, and both the TI-JANIYYA and QADIRIYYA SUFI ORDER are strong.

The National Muslim Council participates along with the Liberian Council of Churches in the Interfaith Mediation Council, an effort to counter political forces that attempted to place the two communities in opposition. In 1997 the All Africa Council of Churches awarded its first Desmond Tutu Peace Prize to the Interfaith Mediation Council for its efforts to bring peace and reconciliation to the country.

The civil war and continuing unrest in Liberia have not made it an attractive home to new religions, and few have attempted to colonize it.

Sources:

- Cason, J. W. "The Growth of Christianity in the Liberian Environment." Ph.D. dissertation, Colombia University, 1962.
- Gifford, P. Christianity and Politics in Doe's Liberia. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1993.
- Kane, J. Herbert. A Global View of Christian Missions. Grand Rapids, MI: Baker Book House, 1971.
- U.S. Department of State Annual Report on International Religious Freedom for 1999: Liberia. Posted at http://www.state.gov/www/global/human_rights/irf/irf_rpt/1999/irf_liberia99.html. Accessed October 1, 2001.

Liberia Baptist and Educational Convention

Baptist work in Liberia has a distinctive history because of its unique place in the emergence of African American Christianity. In 1819, Lott Carey (c. 1780–1828) of Richmond, Virginia, was able to purchase his freedom from slavery. By all accounts an unusual man, Carey had been converted to Christianity in 1813 and in 1815 had convinced the Triennial Convention of American Baptists (now a constituent part of the American Baptist Churches in the U.S.A.) to approve the formation of the African Baptist Missionary Society. The convention's Foreign Mission Board appointed Carey and Collin Teague (c. 1780–1839) to work in Liberia. They would be joined by their wives, Teague's son, and another couple, and these seven were to form a seed colony in Liberia. Before they left the States, they constituted themselves a church, later to become the Province Baptist Church in Monrovia, Liberia.

The seven sailed in 1821. During the remaining years of his life, Carey served as pastor of the church, as physician for Monrovia, and as a government official; in 1826 he was named lieutenant governor of Liberia. After his death, additional missionaries were sent by the American Baptists. Meanwhile, in 1845, Southern Baptists left the Triennial Convention and formed the Southern Baptist Convention. In 1846 the new convention sent John Day (1797–1859), also an African American, to Liberia.

The American Baptists withdrew their support from the Liberian work in 1856, and Southern Baptist support was interrupted by the Civil War. The Southern Baptists redirected their small missionary budget for Africa to Nigeria in 1875. During this period, lacking support from the United States, the church in Liberia formed the Liberia Baptist Missionary and Educational Convention. The first president of the convention, Joseph James Cheeseman, later became the president of the country.

In 1882, the Baptist Foreign Mission Convention, one of the emerging structures among the African American Baptist community in the United States, provided support for one Liberian missionary. The next year it commissioned six missionaries, who founded a mission among the Vai people. This became the beginning of the Liberian mission of the National Baptist Convention in the U.S.A., formed by the merger of several African American Baptist organizations in 1895. Two years later, some African American Baptists, who withdrew their support from the Foreign Mission Board of the National Baptists, formed the Lott Carey Foreign Mission Convention. The Lott Carey Convention provided support for J. O. Hayes, formerly a National Baptist missionary, to continue his work in Liberia.

In Liberia, the work of the several U.S.-based Baptist organizations (including the Southern Baptists, who reentered the country in 1960) was absorbed by the Liberia Baptist Missionary Educational Convention, which continues as the dominant Baptist body in the country. In the 1990s it reported fifty-nine thousand members in 250 congregations. Among leaders of note in the late twentieth century was William R. Tolbert Jr. (1913–1980), who successively became the vice president of Liberia (1951), president of the Liberia Baptist Convention (1958), president of the BAPTIST WORLD ALLIANCE (1965), and president of Liberia (1971). Tolbert was assassinated in the military coup of 1980, which happened to occur just as the Baptists were preparing to celebrate the centennial of the convention. Tolbert was still president of the convention at the time of his death.

The Liberia Baptist Missionary and Educational Convention is a member of the Baptist World Alliance.

Address:

Liberia Baptist Missionary and Educational Convention
P.O. Box 10
0390 Monrovia
Liberia

Sources:

Weeks, Nan F., and Blanche Sydnor. Liberia for Christ. Richmond, VA: Missionary Society of Virginia, 1959.
Williams, Walter F. Black Americans and the Evangelization of Africa. Madison: University of Wisconsin Press, 1982.

Libya

Libya, a large country on the northern edge of the Sahara Desert, was settled by Berber Arabs in ancient times and participated in the history of its more famous neighbor, Egypt. It found itself a target of the rising power of the Carthaginian Empire (third century B.C.E.) and later was incorporated into the Roman Empire. Many religious groups, including Christianity, found a home in Libyan cities during the first centuries of the Christian era. During the fourth century, Libyan Christians were divided by the Donatist heresy, and as a result Christianity failed to become the majority religion in the centuries prior to the arrival of the Muslims. Thus Islam began its period of dominance in the seventh century C.E. The Ottoman Empire annexed Libya in 1551.

The modern history of Libya begins with the weakening of the Ottoman Empire. As early as 1837, Muhammad as-Sanusi (c. 1787–1859) founded a new clandestine Muslim group, the Sanussi, to oppose continued Ottoman rule. The Sanussi still exist as a dissenting Islamic body.

In 1911, Italy seized the Libyan coast concurrently with its declaration of war on Turkey. Following the distraction of World War I, the Italians would spend fifteen years trying to consolidate their hegemony in the area. They were not able to annex the land until 1931. During World War II, Libya would be a major battlefield, where generals Rommel and Montgomery would gain immortality. Several years of French and British occupation following the war led to the creation of the modern state of Libya by the United Nations in 1949.

Status of religions in Libya, 2000–2050

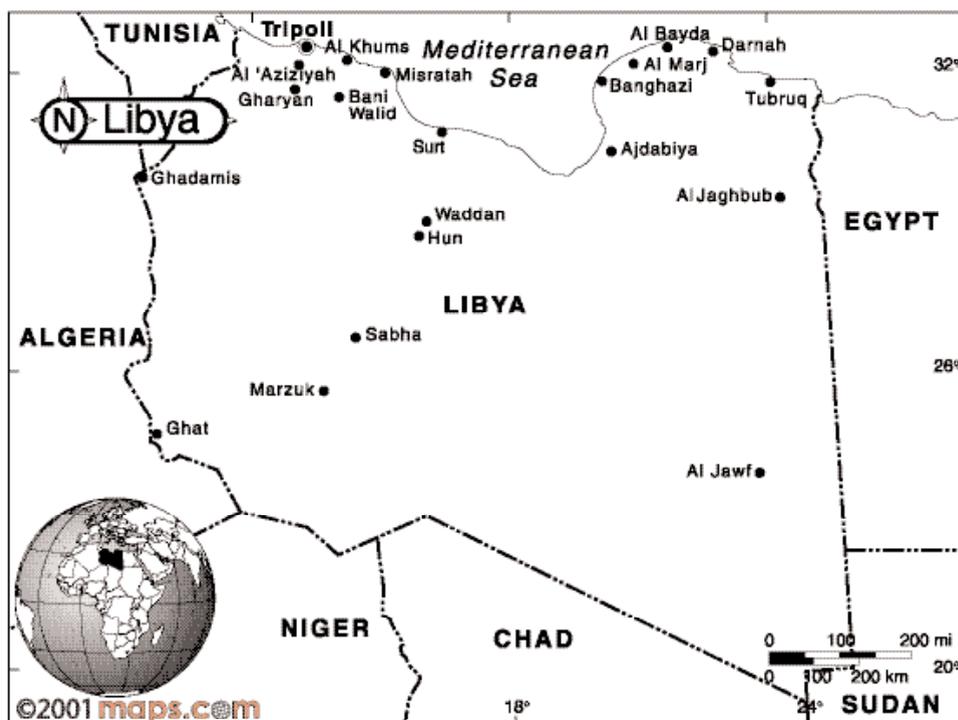

Followers	2000			2025	2050
	total	%	rate
Muslims	5,385,000	96.1	2.43	8,235,000	10,354,000
Christians	175,000	3.1	1.79	292,000	395,000
Orthodox	107,000	1.9	1.16	180,000	240,000
Roman Catholics	45,000	0.8	3.15	70,000	90,000
Independents	14,000	0.3	4.18	30,000	50,000
Buddhists	18,900	0.3	2.23	55,000	138,000
Nonreligious	15,500	0.3	3.51	40,000	70,000
Hindus	5,000	0.1	2.87	13,000	22,000
Sikhs	2,000	0.0	1.73	5,000	10,000
Chinese folk-religionists	1,600	0.0	1.11	4,000	10,000
Baha'is	560	0.0	3.42	1,000	1,400
Ethnoreligionists	430	0.0	2.35	1,200	2,900
Jews	110	0.0	1.14	250	400
Atheists	80	0.0	0.49	400	1,600
Total population	5,605,000	100.0	2.41	8,647,000	11,005,000

In 1969 a group of army officers under the leadership of twenty-seven-year-old Muammar Qaddafi effected a coup and took control of the government. Two years later, as head of the Revolutionary Command Council (RCC), Qaddafi was named head of state, commander in chief of the armed forces, and chairman of the RCC. On March 2, 1977, the government changed the name of the country from the Libyan Arab Republic to the Socialist People's Libyan Arab Jamahiriya. (Jamahiriya has been defined as Islamic socialism.) Qaddafi remains in control of the country.

Today, Libya is overwhelmingly Muslim, but several schools of Islam vie for control. The population is largely divided between adherents of the HANAFITE and the SHAFIITE SCHOOL OF ISLAM, though the MALIKITE school dominates in Cyrenaica. The Sanussi continue as an important minority voice, a role won not only by their opposition to the Ottomans but their more recent struggle against Italian colonialism. The most prominent centers of the Islamic community are the Department of Arabic Language and Islamic Studies at the University of Libya in Benghazi and the Jamiat al-Dawah al-Islamiah, an international Muslim missionary organization headquartered at Tripoli. There are a few members of the Kharijite school in Zuwara and the Jabal Nefusa sect in Tripoli.

The first phase of Christian presence in Libya ended gradually under centuries of Islamic dominance. The ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH was reintroduced in the fifteenth century but its influence remained minuscule until the twentieth century and the years of Italian rule. After World War II the number of Catholics in Libya dropped from over one hundred thousand to approximately forty thousand, but Catholicism remained a considerable force as the Italian presence remained strong in the country. At the end of the 1960s the church consisted of three vicariates and a prefecture. After the coup of the 1970s, however, the Italians were expelled from the country, and by 1972 only two Roman Catholic parishes remained and the majority of Libyan Christians were Eastern-rite Catholics.

Protestants began missionary activity in Libya in the 1880s, led by the North Africa Mission, soon followed by the Church Missions to Jews, an Anglican missionary organization. Then in 1936 all non-Catholic missionaries were expelled and were only allowed to return in 1946. All missionaries were again expelled in 1970. All British and American military personnel were expelled in 1974, further reducing the number of Protestants, almost all of whom were expatriates. The remaining Protestant groups are small and most serve small expatriate enclaves.

The Orthodox community began to grow after World War II with the movement of various Arab groups to Libya, especially Egyptians, among whom were many Coptic Christians. As many as forty-five thousand Copts may have relocated to Libya before all Egyptians were expelled from the country in 1974. Only a minuscule community remains today.

Through much of the twentieth century there was a large Jewish community in Libya, some thirty-seven thousand strong. However, in 1951 almost all of them migrated to the new state of Israel. It is estimated that less than fifty remain in Libya today. There is likewise a tiny number of Chinese Buddhists and members of the BAHAI FAITH in Libya.

Sources:

- Horrie, Chris, and Peter Chippendale. What Is Islam?: A Comprehensive Introduction. London: Virgin, 1997.
- Mason, J. P. Island of the Blest: Islam in a Libyan Oasis Community. Athens, OH: Center for International Studies, Ohio University, 1977.
- Mayer, Ann Elizabeth. "Islamic Law and Islamic Revival in Libya." In Islam in the Contemporary World, edited by Cyriac K. Pullapilly. Notre Dame, IN: Cross Roads Books, 1980.

Liechtenstein

Liechtenstein is a small country of only sixty-one square miles located on the Rhine River between Switzerland and Austria. It shares much of the history of its two neighbors. Liechtenstein became independent in 1719 but was closely linked to the Austrian Empire for the next two centuries. Since the end of World War II, it has been more closely linked to Switzerland.

Christianity came into the area quite early, during the years of the Roman exploration and occupation of the Rhine Valley. As did Austria, Liechtenstein remained loyal to the Roman Church through the Reformation era. Today the Catholic Church remains the dominant religious force in the land, and the several congregations are organized into a deanery attached to the Diocese of Chur (Switzerland).

Protestants came into the area in the 1880s. Most were skilled workers who migrated with their families from Germany and other countries. In 1881 they organized the Evangelical Church. In 1954 the Evangelical Church entered into a Patronatsvertrag (patronage agreement) with the Protestant Church of the Canton of Saint Gall in Switzerland, which among other benefits provided access to a pool of pastors. That same year, the Lutheran members of the church left and founded a separate Lutheran organization. Soon afterward they affiliated with the Swiss Lutherans in what is now known as the Association of Evangelical Lutheran Churches in Switzerland and the Principality of Liechtenstein.

The SEVENTH-DAY ADVENTIST CHURCH has a small work in Liechtenstein that is an integral part of the Swiss Union Conference. There is also a small Baha'i spiritual assembly and a recently opened Zen Buddhist center, part of the INTERNATIONAL ZEN ASSOCIATION, headquartered in Paris.

Source:

Wille, H. Staat und Kirche im Fürstentum Liechtenstein. Freiburg, Switzerland: University of Freiburg, 1972.

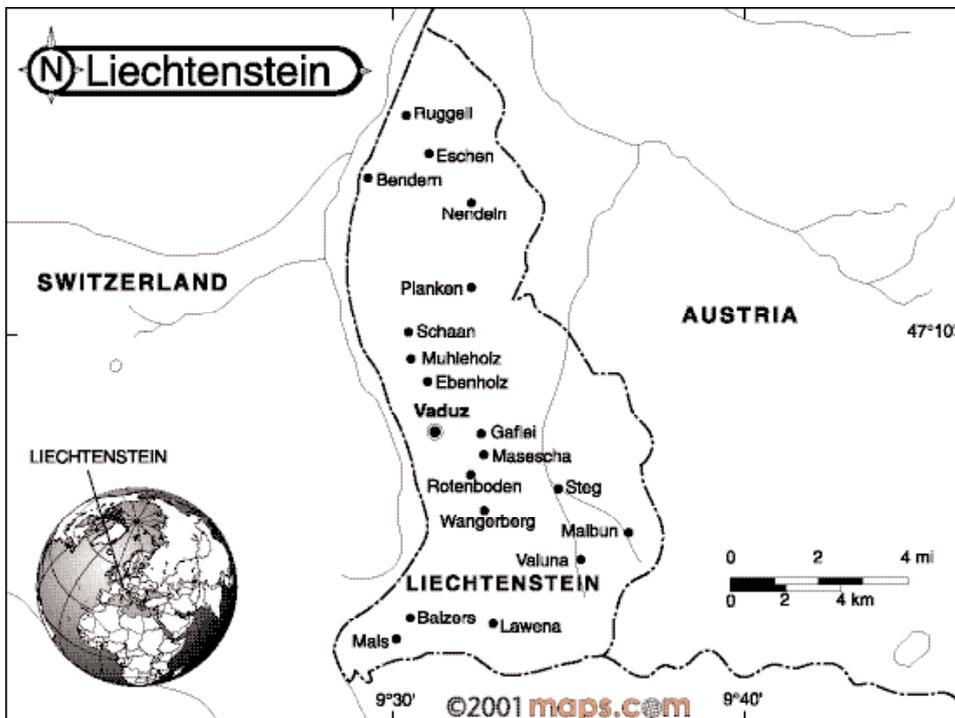

Followers	2000			2025	2050
	total	%	rate
Christians	30,500	93.0	1.19	37,000	36,000
Roman Catholics	24,400	74.2	1.03	28,500	27,500
Protestants	2,500	7.7	1.65	3,800	4,500
Marginal Christians	110	0.3	4.62	360	700
Nonreligious	1,300	3.9	3.98	2,400	3,000
Muslims	880	2.7	3.89	1,500	2,000
Baha'is	110	0.3	4.33	300	500
Jews	40	0.1	0.73	60	60
Total population	32,800	100.0	1.36	41,300	41,600

Light of the World Church [Iglesia la Luz del Mundo]

The Light of the World Church, founded in Monterrey, Nuevo León, Mexico, in 1926 by Eusebio Joaquín González (later known as the apostle Aarón), has blended Mexican mysticism with Pentecostal fervor to create a unique Christian movement that has spread throughout Mexico and to more than twenty countries in the Americas (including the United States and Canada), plus Spain and Australia. The Light of the World Church has grown from eighty members in 1929, to seventy-five thousand in 1972, to 1.5 million in 1986, and to more than 4 million members in twenty-two countries in 1990, according to church sources. The official name of this organization is the Church of God, Column and Pillar of Truth, Jesus the Light of the World (La Iglesia de Dios, Columna y Apoyo de la Verdad, Jesus La Luz del Mundo), but its followers are popularly known in Mexico as Aaronistas (followers of Aarón).

The Light of the World Church has a strong Mexican nationalist orientation and an authoritarian form of church government; it strongly adheres to Old Testament teachings; it is legalistic and upholds high moral standards; and its members are known for their industriousness and honesty. Although there is a strong emphasis on Bible reading and memorization, the prophetic messages spoken by the apostles Aarón and Samuel are considered as “the fountain of truth.” In addition to traditional Protestant hymns and gospel songs (many from the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries), some of the songs used refer to the “Anointed One,” the “Sent One,” or the “Prince,” in honor and praise of Aarón as the church’s first apostle. The traditional worship style is simple: people kneel to pray, women wear head coverings and long white dresses, no musical instruments are used, the choir sings a capella in four-part harmony, and the sexes are separated by a center aisle.

In a unique feature of this movement, all ordained pastors are required to travel to the Mother Church in Colonia Hermosa Provincia (symbolic of Holy Jerusalem) in Guadalajara on August 14 for an annual celebration of the Lord’s Supper, which is held on Aarón’s birthday. This event is also an occasion for faithful church members, the new spiritual People of Israel, to make a pilgrimage to Guadalajara from within Mexico or from other countries and to present the apostle with special gifts. The church rejects Roman Catholicism as an apostate church, and Guadalajara has become a new Rome for this movement. Those who are excommunicated from the Light of the World Church are irrevocably lost for all eternity.

Except for its allegiance to the apostle Aarón, the Light of the World Church has many doctrinal similarities to the Oneness Pentecostal movement in Mexico (see the APOSTOLIC CHURCH OF FAITH IN JESUS CHRIST). Historically, González, an uneducated man of humble origins, was converted in 1926 by an Apostolic fruit vender and became a disciple of two itinerant lay preachers, known as Saul and Silas, who arose within the early Pentecostal movement in northern Mexico in the 1920s. Eusebio was baptized by Saul on April 6, 1926, in San Pedro de las Colonias (near Monterrey), and he and his wife, Elisa, accompanied the two bearded and barefoot “prophets” for a few months on a preaching journey on foot. At some point, Saul spoke the following words of prophecy: “You will no longer be called Eusebio, rather your new name will be Aarón and you will become known in all the world.” Later, Aarón testified that at that very moment, God called him to establish the Light of the World Church as the restoration of the primitive Church of Jesus Christ, and in December 1926 the city of Guadalajara was selected its spiritual headquarters.

Between 1926 and 1952, this new religious group grew from a few dedicated followers to an established movement of about twenty-five thousand members. From 1926 to 1934, Aarón and his early disciples traveled on foot to many towns and villages, preaching to the marginalized peasants and forming “house churches” among their followers, who became known as Aaronistas. The first temple of the Light of the World Church was founded in 1934 in the lower-class neighborhood of San Juan de Dios in Guadalajara. By 1938 Aarón had established most of the rules and regulations that would govern the new movement, including the obligatory 5:00 A.M. daily prayer service, and he became known to his followers as “the new Messiah.” In 1942 the Light of the World Church suffered its first major division, when a power struggle among the leaders in which Aarón was accused of misusing church finances resulted in the formation of a rival movement, known as the Good Shepherd Church (Iglesia El Buen Pastor), which is similar in doctrine and practice.

In 1952 Aarón purchased fourteen hectares on the outskirts of Guadalajara, where he and his followers constructed the Colonia Hermosa Provincia as a segregated community to protect church members from worldly temptations and to strengthen the development of a community of faith. During the next few decades, a large central church was built, seating about three thousand people, and a walled, self-contained community was developed with its own commercial, medical, educational, and social services, which were built by the voluntary labor and tithes of the faithful.

After the death of Aarón in 1964, his youngest son, Samuel Joaquín Flores, was chosen as the new apostle of the movement; he began a new era of openness to the larger world by tearing down the stone wall around the Colonia Hermosa Provincia, encouraging the growth and development of similar colonies of believers within Mexico and in other countries, and constructing a new, large central church at a cost of over $5 million—not counting the cost of volunteer labor provided by church members. In 1992, an estimated 150,000 church members gathered for the annual celebration of the Lord’s Supper at the Glorieta Central de la Iglesia La Luz del Mundo.

Despite strong opposition from the ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH and from Protestant denominations, this independent quasi-Pentecostal movement has achieved significant numerical, social, and political strength in Mexico, especially in the state of Jalisco, and through expansion to other countries it has made its presence and message known throughout the Americas.

The church is currently headed by Apostle Samuel Joaquín Flores.

Address:

The Light of the World Church
 Glorieta Central de la Iglesia La Luz del Mundo Colonia Hermosa Provincia
 Guadalajara, Jalisco
 Mexico
<http://www.iglesialaluzdelmundo.com>
<http://www.luzdelmundo.net>

Sources:

Berg, Clayton, and Paul Pretiz. Spontaneous Combustion: Grass-Roots Christianity, Latin American Style. Pasadena, CA: William Carey Library, 1996.

de Echegaray, Bisques, ed. La Luz del Mundo: Un análisis multidisciplinario de la controversia religiosa que ha impactado a nuestro país.

Mexico: Revista Academica para estudio de las Religiones, 1997.

de la Torre, Renée. "Pinceladas de una ilustración etnográfica: La Luz del Mundo en Guadaluajara." In Identidades religiosas y sociales en México, edited by Gilberto Giménez. Mexico City: Instituto de Investigaciones Sociales de la Universidad Nacional Autónoma de México, 1996.

Gaxiola, Manuel J. La serpiente y la paloma: Historia, teología y análisis de la Iglesia Apostólica de la Fe en Cristo Jesús (1914-1994). 2d ed. Nacaulpan, Mexico: Libros Pyros, 1994.

Lithuania

Modern-day Lithuanians are descendants of a few Baltic tribes, and the premodern indigenous religion of Lithuania was a multifaceted phenomenon belonging to the more generic Baltic family of religions. However, a few major features are discernible. The sources of ancient Baltic culture are estimated to go back to around 2500 B.C.E., when autochthonous local cultures were merging with that of the newcomer Indo-Europeans. The pre-Christian religion in the current territory of Lithuania has undergone quite a few changes since those times, but it has kept the basic structure of Indo-European pre-Christian religions.

The cosmology and anthropology of the premodern pagan religion of Lithuania describes the beginning of the world, in which two gods, Dievas and Velnias, create the world together. While creating the world they compete with each other, the world emerging in that constant competition. According to Lithuanian etiological tales, the first human being was created by accident, by a particle of spit from the mouth of Dievas, who only later saw the result of his spit and marveled at what had happened. This pessimistic anthropology permeates the worldview of ancient Lithuanian religion, where human beings are not seen as a result of purposeful divine activity. The vision of the after-

Status of religions in Lithuania, 2000-2050

Followers	2000			2025	2050
	total	%	rate
Christians	3,214,000	87.6	0.11	3,158,000	2,787,000
Roman Catholics	3,105,000	84.6	0.02	3,000,000	2,650,000
Orthodox	114,000	3.1	0.18	120,000	130,000
Protestants	44,000	1.2	0.16	80,000	100,000
Nonreligious	401,000	10.9	-1.92	211,000	150,000
Atheists	40,000	1.1	-3.13	15,000	12,500
Muslims	8,100	0.2	0.76	10,000	12,000
Jews	6,700	0.2	-0.51	5,000	5,000
Ethnoreligionists	140	0.0	1.26	400	500
Total population	3,670,000	100.0	-0.18	3,399,000	2,967,000

life is more optimistic, though the records about it are very diverse. People who have died would be met by gods and would get the treatment they have earned in this life, either going to dausos (the place of eternal bliss) or the place of darkness, governed by Velnias.

The deities of the ancient Lithuanian (and Baltic) pantheon had correspondents in the pantheons of other regions. The highest god of the Baltic pantheon was Dievas, who in the later period of the Lithuanian religion became a distant, inactive deity, portrayed in tales as active only in the creation of the world and shortly thereafter. The most important member of the pantheon was Perkunas, god of storm and thunder, perhaps a son of Dievas. The Balts also had a chthonic god, opposite in nature to the heavenly gods, named Velnias, a god of dungeons, magic, and riches. The people also venerated a female deity called Zvoruna or Medeina. Besides the deities common to all the Balts there were different spirits or gods peculiar to the various tribes. Wizards or witches, warlocks, and medicine women had considerable influence on the common religious lives of the people.

The ancient shrines in Lithuania, called alkos, were constructed of stones on hills or by rivers. Groves were also designated as sacred places, used to make sacrifices to gods and to foretell the future. A few shrine remains, known from historic times, are being uncovered by archaeologists. It is in no way certain that the pre-Christian Lithuanian religion was centralized, but there was an important shrine to Perkunas in Vilnius.

Up until the thirteenth century, the spread of Christianity in Lithuania was prevented by its weak ties with Christian countries, the absence of a strong national state, and confrontation with the Crusaders. In about 1240, Mindaugas (d. 1263) became the ruler of Lithuania, thus uniting the unruly duchies, and in 1251 he was baptized for political reasons (thus gaining the king's title from the pope), though the people and most dukes kept the old faith. Over time, Catholic missionaries, primarily DOMINICANS and FRANCISCANS, visited Lithuania, where some settled. Apart from a few violent incidents, the Christians and pagans lived quite peacefully together.

The official Christianization of Lithuania began under the grand duke of Lithuania Jogaila in 1387, who ruled as King of Poland Władysław II. This movement lasted for about a century. The destruction of the official cult of the pagan religion also began at that time, though the manifestations of pre-Christian religion survived even into the sixteenth century, when active missionary activity by the JESUITS began. Most of the nobility of Lithuania were baptized in 1387, with the baptism of the people following, while the more independent part of Lithuania, Samogitia, was formally Christianized only about sixty years later.

The Protestant Reformation was brought to Lithuania in the 1520s by the Lithuanian nobles who studied at the Universities of Wittenberg and Leipzig, both strong Protestant centers of learning. The Reformation quickly spread through all the strata of society, facing strong resistance from only a small number of clergy who remained loyal to the ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH. The weakened state of the Catholic Church in Lithuania contributed to this rapid spread of the Reformation there, to the extent that by the mid-sixteenth century, Lithuania was predominantly Protestant, with both Lutheran and Reformed influences present. The adherence of the influential Radvila family to Protestantism also contributed significantly to the spread of the Reformation.

However, in 1564 the ruler of Lithuania and Poland, Sigismund II Augustus (1520–1572), began implementing the decisions of the Council of Trent, which had been called by the Roman Catholic Church in 1545 to both reform the church and stop the further spread of Protestantism. Jesuit academic and missionary activities played a significant part in the Counter-Reformation that followed the council. In

A woman kneeling and praying in a church in Vilnius, Lithuania. (T. Noorits/TRIP)

1570 the Jesuits established a college in Vilnius, which was later to become a university. With Catholicism regaining ground, the influence of the Protestants gradually faded, remaining strong only in the western and northern parts of Lithuania.

A separate issue was the presence of EASTERN ORTHODOXY in Lithuania and the Slavic lands within the Grand Duchy of Lithuania from the thirteenth to the sixteenth centuries. To keep political and social peace after the Christianization of Lithuania, grand duke of Lithuania Vytautas (1350–1430) strove unsuccessfully to establish a separate administrative unit of the Orthodox Church in Lithuania. Later there were also efforts to unite the Catholic and Orthodox churches within the Grand Duchy of Lithuania and the Kingdom of Poland. These efforts were partially successful and culminated in 1596 with the creation of the union, which was not, however, joined by all Orthodox.

The Catholic-Orthodox problem was never resolved, and it reemerged in a different form in the eighteenth century.

Following the third division of the Polish-Lithuanian state in 1795, by which time the Russian Empire had annexed most of Lithuania, the Russians established a policy of assimilating Lithuania culturally, which also meant making it Orthodox. Both Catholic and Protestant churches suffered as a result, and in the end the effort proved unsuccessful. Lithuania retained its sense of nationhood, and both Catholic and Protestant churches played a significant role in preserving Lithuania's national character.

When an independent Lithuania reemerged in 1918, the country recognized equal rights of all confessions, though the 1926 concordat with the Catholic Church established the privileged position of Catholicism, which remained the majority faith. About 5 percent of the population was Reformed or Lutheran, but they had little influence on Lithuanian politics as a whole. Additional traditions from Protestants and FREE CHURCHES were also spreading in Lithuania through the twentieth century. The Baptists had been in Lithuania from the middle of the nineteenth century, and the Methodists, Seventh-day Adventists, Pentecostals, and the NEW APOSTOLIC CHURCH had established communities at the start of the twentieth century. The American Bible Student movement (later known as JEHOVAH'S WITNESSES) appeared in the 1930s. Western Esotericism took deep roots in the country after one of Lithuania's famous writers, "Vydūnas" (Vilius Storosta), became an adept of Theosophy.

The Soviet occupation brought the repression of religion, with severe persecution of religious minorities. Some communities were gradually eliminated, including those of the Seventh-day Adventists, Methodists, and Jehovah's Witnesses. The Baptists and Pentecostals were joined together, in part as an attempt to eliminate their uniqueness and so undermine their existence. Independent, unregistered religious groups were under strict police control, receiving more tolerant treatment only toward the end of the 1970s.

The traditional religious communities faced both persecution and severe limitations on their previously flowering social activities. The Catholic and Reformed churches developed ties to the national resistance movement. Many of the social and religious leaders were exiled and forced to confess atheism. Communist Party membership was required for those taking higher positions in society. Atheist propaganda was widespread.

The restoration of Lithuanian independence in 1990 brought a revival of traditional religions as well as an influx of different religious movements from outside the country. The revival of religion peaked in 1992–1993, supplying social scientists with further evidence of a continuing secularization of society, a trend common to much of western Europe.

The largest religious or ethno-religious communities in Lithuania currently are the Roman Catholic Church (70 percent of the population), the RUSSIAN ORTHODOX CHURCH (MOSCOW PATRIARCHATE) (5.2 percent), Old Believers (1.43 percent), the Lutheran Church (around 0.86 percent), and the Reformed Church (0.32 percent). The New Apostolic Church, the Tatar Muslims, Full Gospel/Charismatic churches, Jehovah's Witnesses, Pentecostals, Baptists, and Seventh-day Adventists each have memberships of one thousand to five thousand while there are smaller communities of the CHURCH OF JESUS CHRIST OF LATTER-DAY SAINTS, the INTERNATIONAL SOCIETY FOR KRISHNA CONSCIOUSNESS, the UNITED METHODIST CHURCH, and the Buddhists.

The old Jewish community in Lithuania was hard-hit by the Holocaust in the 1940s, and it survives today with fewer than five thousand members. The Jewish community in Vilnius operates the Lithuanian Jewish State Museum. There is also a small group of KARAITES, a Near Eastern group who hold to a form of Judaism and who do not acknowledge the authority of the Talmud. The Sunni Muslim community has had a presence in Lithuania since the fifteenth century, and a variety of Muslims of Tatar, Uzbek, and Azerbaijani background migrated there in the twentieth century. The Tatar community currently numbers about five thousand. (Both the Karaites and Tatars were initially brought to Lithuania by Grand Duke Vytautas.)

There is no state religion in Lithuania, and freedom of religion is established in the country's legal system. There are two levels of legal status for religious communities. Nine traditional religions are state-recognized as a part of Lithuanian cultural, social, and spiritual heritage: Roman Catholic, Greek Catholic, Evangelical Lutheran, Evangelical Reformed, Russian Orthodox, Old Believer, Jewish, Sunni Islam, and Karaite. All other religious communities are eligible for state recognition after twenty-five years of legal registration in Lithuania. State recognition gives religious communities some tax privileges, permission to teach religion in public schools, and time on national television. They also enjoy greater social acceptance, as the nontraditional religions are often stigmatized as sects. The most influential religious body in Lithuanian society is the Roman Catholic Church, while other larger communities are based on either a particular ethnic minority group (e.g., Russian Orthodoxy being concentrated among ethnic Russians) or a particular region (e.g., Lutheranism being concentrated in the southwest part of the country).

Milda Alisauskienė and Donatas Glodenis

Sources:

- Beresnevičius, Gintaras. Religijų istorijos metmenys. Vilnius: Aidai, 1997.
- Glodenis, Donatas, and Holger Lahayne, eds. Religijos Lietuvoje. Šiauliai: Nova Vita, 1999.
- Musteikis, A. The Reformation in Lithuania: Religious Fluctuation in the Sixteenth Century. Boulder, CO: East European Monographs, 1988.
- Peškaitis, Arūnas, and Donatas Glodenis. Šiuolaikinės religingumas. Vilnius: Vaga, 2000.

Rimaitis, J. Religion in Lithuania. Vilnius: Gintaras, 1971.
 Suziedelis, S. The Sword and the Cross: A History of the Church in Lithuania. Huntington, IN: Our Sunday Visitor, 1988.
 Vardys, V. S., ed. Krikščionybė Lietuvoje. Chicago, 1997.

Living Church of God

In the years following the death of founder Herbert W. Armstrong (b. 1892) in 1986, the WORLDWIDE CHURCH OF GOD (WCOG) dropped his distinctive teachings one by one under its new pastor, General Joseph W. Tkach (1827–1995), and moved closer to standard conservative Protestant teachings. Many WCOG ministers found this difficult to accept. One of these was Roderick C. Meredith, who had been one of Armstrong's earliest students and had been with the WCOG since 1949. In 1992, after confrontations with the new leadership of the WCOG, Meredith left to found his own sabbatarian millenarian church, the Global Church of God, holding firmly to the teachings of the WCOG during Armstrong's lifetime. Because of Meredith's previously high position in WCOG as senior evangelist, many other members left to follow him. The Global Church of God grew to a peak membership of around seven thousand.

Armstrong had taught "top-down" church governance, with a single leader having sole authority over the church, and Meredith followed this model. In 1998 the board of the Global Church sought to temper Meredith's authority over his church; after a number of heated meetings and the quite public exchange of accusatory letters, Meredith left his own church and founded the Living Church of God, taking 70–80 percent of his ministers and members with him. The Living Church of God is more or less the old Global Church of God under a different name.

The remnant of the Global Church, reduced to fewer than one thousand members, tried to continue, but they faced a dramatic drop in income from members' tithes. This difficulty was only compounded when founding members, now with the Living Church, demanded the repayment of loans they had made for the start-up funding of the Global Church, which voluntarily entered into the legal equivalent of bankruptcy. Its members reformed as the Church of God, a Christian Fellowship (CGCF). In 2001 most of CGCF merged with the largest WCOG offshoot, UNITED CHURCH OF GOD; a minority reformed as Church of the Eternal God, still known in the U.K. by its original name of Global Church of God. Shortly after Meredith left the Global Church of God, another minister, David C. Pack, left to found the Restored Church of God, perhaps the most hard-line of all the offshoots from the "Worldwide family." Pack has published a book-length list of 280 teachings that he claims the "new" Worldwide Church has changed from Armstrong's original teachings, and a further list of 174 teachings in which he believes all the other offshoots, between them, deviate from Armstrong's truth. The Restored Church of God has several hundred members.

The Living Church of God claims to hold to all the traditional teachings of Herbert W. Armstrong and the WCOG at the time of his death. Like most of the offshoots, it emphasizes in its literature and broadcasts the need to watch world news to "prove" that these are the End Times. The second or third largest offshoot from the WCOG, the Living Church of God continues to sponsor a radio show called Tomorrow's World, the same name made famous by the WCOG, and it publishes a periodical with the same name. There are an estimated five thousand to six thousand members.

Addresses:

Living Church of God
 P.O. Box 503077
 San Diego, CA 92150–3077
<http://www.tomorrowworld.org>

Church of God, a Christian Fellowship
 P.O. Box 161698
 Fort Worth, TX 76161–1698
<http://www.cgcf.org>

Restored Church of God
 P.O. Box 23295
 Wadsworth, OH 44282
<http://www.restorecog.org>
<http://www.truegospelrcg.org>

David V. Barrett

Sources:

Barrett, David V. The New Believers. London: Cassell, 2001.
The Journal: News of the Churches of God. Big Sandy, TX: JMC Associates.
 Pack, David C. There Came a Falling Away. Wadsworth, OH: Restored Church of God, 2000.
 Tkach, Joseph. Transformed by Truth. Sisters, OR: Multnomah Books, 1997.

The Local Church

The Local Church is the name assumed in the West by a movement variously known as the Little Flock, Assembly Hall Churches, or more derogatorily, the Shouters. The Local Church grew out of the life and thoughts of Nee To-sheng, better known in the West as Watchman Nee (1903–1972). Nee was born in Shantou, China, and trained in classical Chinese studies. He was converted to Christianity in 1920 under the ministry of Dora Yu, a Methodist missionary who ran a Bible school in Shanghai. He was also deeply influenced by the writings of the British-based Keswick Revival and the PLYMOUTH BRETHERN (EXCLUSIVE). He found himself drawn to the Plymouth Brethren and was associated with them into the 1930s.

Nee began his own ministry with a magazine, Revival, in 1923 and finished his first major book, The Spiritual Man, in 1928. By this time he had also come to the conclusion that the unity of the church would be best expressed by the establishment of only one church in each city; that is, that denominational competition was unbiblical and the only reason for different churches was geographical—hence the name Local Church. The first Local Church was founded in Shanghai in 1927. Nee also agreed with the ideal previously articulated by several nineteenth-century missionaries as “three-self.” In order to make the Protestant Christian movement in China independent of foreign churches, missions were urged to work toward three types of independence: self-governance, self-support, and self-propagation. Incarnating such an ideal was, of course, integral to the several indigenous Chinese Christian movements, including the Local Church. From the Brethren, Nee absorbed a dispensational approach to the Bible, seeing human history as unfolding in a series of God’s dispensations, during each of which God changed his way of relating to humanity.

The movement’s growth was somewhat disrupted by World War II and the Japanese invasion. In 1942 Nee took a job at the pharmaceutical company owned by his brother in order to raise money to support continued evangelical efforts, which had by this time become international. Some saw his taking a secular job as contradictory to his ministry, and the church’s elders forbade him from preaching in Shanghai. The issue was not resolved until 1947, when Nee gave the church all of his business assets and withdrew from further secular work. He also encouraged other church members to hand over their business assets to the church, and the profits from these businesses began to be used to expand the evangelical work.

In the 1930s, Witness Lee (1905–1997) joined the Local Church movement and through the decade became a close associate of Nee. In 1948, Nee sent Lee to Taiwan where the defeated Nationalist forces were to gather as the Communists took control of the mainland. The church came under attack from the Communist regime in the early 1950s. In 1952 Nee was arrested, and in 1956 he was tried and convicted of corrupt business practices and violations of public morals. He spent the rest of his life in jail. The government recognized only one Protestant church body, the Chinese Protestant Three-Self Patriotic Movement, with which all Protestant Christians were required to affiliate. Thus the Local Church was banned in China, and Nee’s movement became divided, with some congregations being absorbed into the Chinese Protestant Three-Self Patriotic Movement and others continuing as independent congregations outside legal structures.

However, the movement continued to grow outside of China. From Witness Lee’s work in Taiwan, the Local Church began to spread throughout Southeast Asia, beginning with the ethnic Chinese communities in the larger cities. In 1962 Lee moved to the United States, learned English, and began to spread the movement among English-speaking residents of California, a first step in making the Local Church a truly international movement.

Lee gained an initial following among Evangelical Christians attracted to his emphasis on the spiritual life and the immediate relationship between God and humanity. He continued the theology earlier articulated by Nee, which viewed humans as tripartite beings (body, soul, and spirit) and recognized an intimate relationship between God’s Spirit and the human spirit. However, in the 1970s, as Lee expanded upon this mystical theology, trouble developed when some former followers began to suggest that Lee’s approach, and some new language he introduced to focus the teachings, represented a loss of distinction between God and humanity and a distortion of traditional Christian teachings on the Trinity.

The seriousness of the theological charges were undergirded by the perception that Lee had gained most of his membership at the expense of other churches. In the early 1980s, the controversy erupted after spokespersons for several Christian anticult ministries, led by the Spiritual Counterfeits Project, accused the Local Church of being a cult. Included in their list of objections were several unique practices of the church, such as “Calling upon the name of the Lord,” and the invocation of God by the loud repetition of phrases such as “O Lord Jesus.” (This is the practice that had given Nee’s followers the appellation “Shouters” in China.) In response, Lee had his theology and the church’s practices examined by several trained theologians, who could find nothing heretical, and he attempted to reconcile his differences with his Evangelical antagonists. However, the problems had grown with the expansion of anticult ministries, and he was unable to resolve them. So in 1985 he sued the Spiritual Counterfeits Project in court and won a large multimillion-dollar judgment for libel and slander. Other groups and individuals subsequently withdrew their attacks.

Following the court case, Lee began a new effort to encourage the further spread of the Local Church, which had stagnated in the 1980s. He moved to Taiwan for a period and led in the reorganization of the Local Church around a new emphasis on evangelism. He continued to lead the movement until his death in 1997.

The Local Churches are organized as autonomous congregations, each led by elders selected from among its own membership. The congregations are tied together by their mutual acceptance of the fundamental doctrines and approach initially articulated by Nee and continued by Lee. Upon his arrival in California, Lee assumed the role of apostle and teacher. He organized Living Stream Ministry as an instrument to provide leadership for all of the local congregations. He published a magazine, a number of books, and pamphlets. He also held regular training sessions to educate leaders on both the practical leadership of the churches and the theological development of church life. Most church elders were part-time, unsalaried workers, but as the movement grew, some elders were designated as full-time coworkers. Although there are no ordained ministers, the coworkers have assumed many roles typically held by ordained clergy.

Living Stream Ministry continues to serve as the uniting force of the Local Church congregations. During the years of Lee's ministry, the Local Church became a worldwide movement, and it has associated congregations on every continent. Each congregation takes the name of the city in which its members reside. An unknown number of people, reportedly as high as eight hundred thousand, continue the ministry of Watchman Nee in mainland China, where a number of leaders have been arrested for preaching outside the established churches. In a 1983 court case, the movement was declared to be counterrevolutionary in but one of a variety of actions to suppress the group, and various international human rights groups have come to its defense. The Local Church in Hong Kong has a large following, necessitating multiple meeting halls, and some sixty thousand members are found across Taiwan. Strong congregations are located throughout Southeast Asia, where the movement has moved beyond its base within the Chinese communities, and also across North America. Many Local Churches have their own Web sites. Worldwide membership is in excess of one million.

The belief statement of the Local churches identifies it with conservative Protestant Free Church beliefs. It strongly affirms the Trinity and the divinity of Christ, substitutionary atonement, and the verbal inspiration of the Bible. Sectarian divisions and denominationalism is eschewed, and the oneness of Christian believers is affirmed. The Local Church places itself in a history of "recovery" of biblical Christianity, which it deems was lost through the centuries after the Apostolic era. The recovery began with Martin Luther and the Protestant Reformation and continued through other movements, including the Methodists and the Plymouth Brethren. A new phase began with Watchman Nee and his emphasis on the Local Church.

Lee kept up a prodigious schedule of teaching and speaking through the thirty-five years after his move to the United States. His lectures and sermons were transcribed and published and constitute a large collection of Christian literature. He wrote a multivolume commentary on the Bible and a translation of the Bible, published as the Recovery Version. Recordings of Lee's Bible studies are featured on the Local Church's radio program, Life Study of the Bible.

Address:

Living Stream Ministry
2431 W. La Palma Ave.
Anaheim, CA 92801
<http://www.lsm.org/> (in English, Chinese, Spanish, and Korean) <http://www.livingstream.com/>

Sources:

- The Beliefs and Practices of the Local Church*. Anaheim, CA: Living Stream Ministry, 1978.
- Kinnear, Angus I. Against the Tide. Fort Washington, PA: Christian Literature Crusade, 1973.
- Lee, Witness. God's New Testament Economy. Anaheim, CA: Living Stream Ministry, 1986.
- . Life Study of the New Testament. 17 vols. Anaheim, CA: Living Stream Ministry, 1984.
- . Life Study of the Old Testament. 15 vols. Anaheim, CA: Living Stream Ministry, 1997.
- . Watchman Nee: A Seer of the Divine Revelation in the Present Age. Anaheim, CA: Living Stream Ministry, 1997.
- Nee, Watchman. The Collected Works. 62 vols. Anaheim, CA: Living Stream Ministry, 1994.
- . The Normal Christian Church Life. Washington, DC: International Students Press, 1969.

London Missionary Society

The London Missionary Society (LMS), now a constituent part of the Council for World Mission, is one of several organizations that facilitated the massive expansion of Christianity around the world in the nineteenth and twentieth centuries. It emerged in 1795 in England out of the growing consciousness there of people in the world outside Europe, itself a sign of developing British colonial interests worldwide. Particular inspiration came from the widely published letters sent back to England by William Carey (1761–1834), who had launched a mission in India in 1793.

Thus, in December 1794, a group of ministers and laypeople from the Church of England, the Presbyterian Church, and from the Independents or the Congregational Church (the largest number) met to consider the idea of forming a pan-denominational missionary society. In the end, the Congregationalists became the primary supporters of the new London Missionary Society, constituted in 1795. Both the Church of England and the Presbyterian Church soon had their own competing missionary structures.

The primary field chosen for work was the South Pacific, then a territory devoid of Protestant church work. The LMS purchased a ship, the Duff, and in September 1796 it sent thirteen men, five women, and two children. This first cadre was dispersed between Tahiti and Tonga, with one person staying in the Marquesas. Beginning with this initial band, the society would dispatch additional missionaries to the Cook Islands and then to most of the larger South Pacific island groups. These first missionaries set a pattern for later missionaries—working with the indigenous population to train a set of local teachers and leaders and translating and publishing the Bible in the local language.

Early in the nineteenth century, the society turned its attention to Africa. Two of the most famous people in Christian missionary history, John MacKenzie (1835–1899) and David Livingstone (1813–1873), were LMS missionaries who launched their work in 1840 in South Africa. MacKenzie became a politician and urged British expansion into the lands north of Boer-controlled territory and Livingstone explored that territory. The society also pioneered work in China and Mongolia. During its peak years, through the nineteenth century, the society supported some 250 missionaries at any given moment.

As a variety of denominational and pan-denominational Protestant missionary societies began working alongside each other, the LMS entered negotiations to cut down on duplication of efforts and direct competition. In this manner, different societies accepted responsibility for different countries or sections of countries. Such agreements worked through much of the nineteenth century, until the very success of many missionary efforts brought different groups into competition. The origin of the modern ecumenical movement lies, to a great extent, with these attempts to solve the problems of competition and to reduce the introduction of sectarian differences into the mission field from the Americas and Europe.

World War II proved pivotal to the LMS. Following the war, the former colonies of Great Britain became independent, and many territories—like China, the single largest LMS missionary field—were closed to foreign missionaries. Already a number of the missions had matured into independent churches, and beginning in 1947, with the Church of South India, the congregational work in a variety of countries merged with other Protestant missions/churches to form united Protestant churches. Thus in 1966 the LMS and a sister organization, the Commonwealth Missionary Society, merged to form the Congregational Council for World Mission. Then in 1977, a further reorganization and merger included the Presbyterian Board of Missions, founded in 1847, leading to the creation of the Council for World Mission (CMW). The CMW envisions itself as a cooperative, multicultural missionary effort combining the resources of thirty-one denominations based on continents around the world that now share a partnership relationship. Missionaries are drawn from all of the cooperating churches and may be sent to any country as needed.

Address:

Council for World Mission
Ipalo House
32–34 Great Peter St.
London SW1P 2DB
United Kingdom
<http://www.cwmission.org.uk>

Sources:

- Hiney, Thomas. On the Missionary Trail: A Journey through Polynesia, Asia, and Africa with the London Missionary Society. New York: Atlantic Monthly Press, 2000.
- Kane, J. Herbert. A Global View of Christian Missions. Grand Rapids, MI: Baker Book House, 1971.

Lubavitch Hassidism

In the late twentieth century, the Lubavitch have emerged as the largest of the Hassidic bodies that survived the Holocaust of World War II, during which many Hassidic bodies ceased to exist and others survived as mere remnants of their earlier lives. The Lubavitch community began under Rabbi Schneur Zalman (1745–1813). He had studied with Rabbi Dov Baer, a prominent Hassidic scholar, and Dov Bear's death in 1772 became the catalyst for the founding of the Lubavitch dynasty. Zalman was sent to Lithuania to spread the Hassidic message, and the Lubavitcher community dates its origins from the start of Zalman's teaching in Lithuania.

The son of Rabbi Zalman, also known as Rabbi Dov Baer (1773–1827), or the Mittler Rebbe, succeeded his father and developed the Chabad, as the Lubavitch approach to Hassidism became known. In the late 1820s, he relocated to Lubavitch, Belarus, from which the community's designation is derived. From Dov Baer, the lineage passed to Rabbi Menachem Mendel Schneerson (1789–1866), the son of Rabbi Zalman's daughter. The lineage eventually passed to Schneerson's grandson, Joseph Isaac Schneerson (1880–1950), who brought the movement to the United States. In the 1920s, Rabbi Schneerson founded the Agudas Chassidas Chabad of the United States of America and Canada, first visiting America in 1929. He had resided in Warsaw since the end of World War I, but he was persuaded to leave as the Nazi threat loomed. He took up residence in the United States in 1941.

The Lubavitch teach out of the kabbalah, the ancient Jewish mystical system. The kabbalah pictures the world as having emanated from God through several realms of spiritual activity. These spheres (sephirot) are pictured on a diagram called the Tree of Life. The name of the Lubavitch teachings, Chabad, is derived from three of the sephirot—Chochmah, Binah, and Daath—wisdom, intelligence, and knowledge. In the Chabad attempt to come into a relationship with the Divine, an insistence on study and the intellectual appropriation of truth stands beside a need for faith and belief. As do other Hassidic groups, the Lubavitch use a rite derived from the writings of Rabbi Yitchak Luria (1534–1572), a mystic and kabbalist in Palestine. The prayers of the ritual contain special intentions relating to the mystical union of God and humanity. The Lubavitch also have a commitment to the larger Jewish community and have tried to dispel the low opinion that many Hassidim have had of unbelieving and nonpracticing Jews in general.

Lubavitchers are known for their music and dancing. Dancing is seen as a basic expression of the inward joy of the divine life. Men generally dance separately from women, mixed dancing being prohibited. Dancing forms an essential part of Hassidic gatherings, especially the festivals and anniversary occasions.

After World War II, Rebbe Schneerson initiated a program of expanding the community's school and centers. When his successor, Rabbi Menachem Mendel Schneerson (1902–1994), took over the relatively small movement, he began to build the movement, based on its traditional openness to the whole of the Jewish community. Over the next decades it grew impressively as Jews across the spectrum, from Orthodox to Reform Jews and even unbelievers, discovered the movement and affiliated with it. Its work was furthered through the community's publishing arm, Merkos Publication Society; its educational arm, Merkos L'Inyone Chinuch; and its relief organization, Ezrat Pleitim. By the time of Rebbe Menachem Mendel Schneerson's death, the movement had more than two hundred thousand followers, and centers had been opened in the midst of Orthodox Jewish communities worldwide. Its growth is partially attributed to its acceptance of modern technology, which other Hassidim have tended to reject.

Toward the end of his life, Rebbe Schneerson, who had led the movement for four decades, suggested that the time of the expected Messiah was at hand. He cited as evidence, among other incidents, the fall of Communism and the U.S. victory in the Gulf War. Some of his followers came to believe that he was the Messiah, and his death in 1994 placed the issue of the future clearly before the community. Following his passing, many refused to speak of him in the past tense, while some insisted that he would somehow cheat death. They refused to discuss a successor, and none has been named as of 2002. Banners and postcards were printed with an oft-repeated slogan, "Long live our master, teacher, and rebbe, King Messiah, forever and ever."

In the meantime, all of the rebbe's spoken words, including his Sabbath sermons (sometimes four hours in length), were recorded and transcribed. These remain as a body of teachings from which the community can continue to draw inspiration. In 1995, as a first step in sharing his wisdom, a commercial publisher was allowed to publish Toward a Meaningful Life: The Wisdom of the Rebbe, Menachem Mendel Schneerson. The headquarters of the Lubavitcher movement is located in Brooklyn, New York, and there are many Chabad Web sites. As the twenty-first century begins, there are more than two thousand Chabad centers serving more than two hundred thousand members.

Address:

Lubavitch Movement Headquarters
770 Eastern Pkwy.
Brooklyn, NY 11213
<http://www.chabadcenters.com/>
<http://www.chabad.org/>

Sources:

Challenge. London: Lubavitch Foundation of Great Britain, 1970.
Dalfin, Chaim. The Seven Chabad-Lubavitch Rebbes. New York: Jason Aronson, 1998.

Mintz, Jerome R. Hasidic People: A Place in the New World.

Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1992.

Schneerson, Menachem Mendel. I Await His Coming Every Day: Based on Talks of the Lubavitch Rebbe. Brooklyn, NY: Kehot Publication Society, 1998.

———. Toward a Meaningful Life: The Wisdom of the Rebbe, Menachem Mendel Schneerson. Adapted by Simon Jacobson. William Morrow, 1995.

Warsaw, Mal. Orthodox Jewish Life in America. New York: Schocken Books, 1976.

Lusitanian Church (Lusitanian Catholic Apostolic Evangelical Church)

The Lusitanian Church is a small Portuguese church founded at the end of the nineteenth century under the auspices of members of the American-based EPISCOPAL CHURCH and the CHURCH OF ENGLAND. The Lusitanian Church, named after Lusitania, the ancient denomination for the territory that is now Portugal, has been a formal member of the ANGLICAN COMMUNION since 1980.

After four centuries of almost complete religious monopolization by the Roman Catholic Church, Reformist movements saw the relative religious freedom that followed the establishment of constitutional monarchy in 1834 as an opportunity to assert themselves on Portuguese soil. A short time later the First Vatican Council (1870–1871), which introduced the dogmas of the pope's universal jurisdiction and infallibility, caused much uproar among the Reformist churches and also among urban Catholics seduced by liberalism. In this context, some Spanish priests established in Lisbon several places of worship where they celebrated religious services using Portuguese translations of the English Prayer Book and the American Book of Common Prayer. Inspired by this work, some Roman Catholic Portuguese priests and laypeople began to form independent congregations in various places. On March 8, 1880, these priests and the lay representatives of their congregations met at a synod presided over by the bishop H. C. Riley, the bishop of Mexico for the Episcopal Church, celebrating the formalization of the Lusitanian Church.

Members of the Lusitanian Church refer to this occasion not as the foundation but as the restoration of their church. They state that the Lusitanian Church is the resumption of the original Christian church that existed in the Iberian Peninsula and was allegedly initiated by early missionaries of the third century or, as some claim, by Saint Paul himself. At the time of the Visigothic invasion in the fifth century C.E., the church was already well established, with its own councils and a liturgy distinct from the Roman liturgy. Only at the Christian reconquest, beginning in the ninth century, did the Roman Church manage to impose a strict papal jurisdiction.

From this “restoration” in 1880 until 1964, the Council of Bishops included only Irish bishops; the first Portuguese bishop, António Fiandor, was only consecrated in 1958. The bishops who consecrated him were not Portuguese because, according to the Lusitanian Church, a legitimate consecration requires a historical Episcopal succession. Throughout the 1960s, Concordats of Full Communion were established with the Episcopal Church in the United States, the CHURCH OF IRELAND, the Church of England, and the Old Catholic bishops of the Union of Utrecht. In 1980, two years after a formal application to the archbishop of Canterbury, the Lusitanian Church was welcomed into the Anglican Communion, of which it is still an extraprovincial diocese.

The Lusitanian Church functions as a single diocese divided into two archdeaconries, the South (centered at Lisbon) and the North (centered at Oporto). Most of the sixteen congregations cluster around these two major cities. The general governing bodies are the bishop, who devotes himself almost entirely to the spiritual leadership of the church; the synod, consisting of every priest of the church and a lay representative from each parish; and a standing committee, which deals with administrative affairs.

Currently, the Lusitanian Church has about five thousand baptized members and fifteen hundred communicants, with eight active priests and six active deacons in sixteen places of worship. In 1997, three women were ordained as deacons. It was the first time in over eight centuries of Christianity in Portugal that women became part of the clergy of a church with the apostolic ministry.

The Lusitanian Church’s doctrine follows the main parameters confessed by the Anglican Community and expressed in the Lambeth Quadrilateral. Furthermore, the church claims a place in the historical and doctrinal continuity of Christianity in Lusitania, beginning with the first centuries of the Christian era, and it declines to accept the later additions and changes introduced by the Roman Catholic Church. Its liturgy reflects this alleged heritage. The Portuguese Book of Common Prayer is said to be in accordance with the “Primitive Apostolic Church,” and its compilation was largely based on the ancient Missal de Braga.

One of the Lusitanian Church’s most visible activities is its ecumenical promotion of interfaith dialogue and its foundation, along with the Methodists and the Presbyterians, of the Portuguese Council of Christian Churches. Since its “restoration” in 1880, the church has been promoting a ministry of service to the underprivileged that now includes three institutions with social responsibility: comprehensive day care and kindergarten, assistance to old people, and promotion of social and cultural activities among the blind. Initially, this effort was more focused on the struggle against illiteracy, which, by the end of the nineteenth century, was about 80 percent in Portugal. Together with every place of worship that was opened, a primary school was also started. Presently, two of those schools are still functioning.

The Lusitanian Church is affiliated with the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES, the Conference of European Churches, and the Conference of Protestant Churches of the European Latin Countries.

Address:

The Lusitanian Church
Rua 1 de Maino, 54–2
Apartado 392
4430 Vila Nova de Gaia
Portugal

Tiago Santos, Pedro Soares, and Miguel H. Farias

Sources:

- Lusitanian Church.* Vila Nova de Gaia, 1985.
Moreira, Eduardo Henriques. Esboço da história da Igreja Lusitana. Sínodo da Igreja Lusitana Católica Apostólica Evangélica, 1949.
Relatório de 1914 da Igreja Lusitana Católica Apostólica Evangélica. Porto, 1915.
Soares, D. Fernando da Luz. Igreja Lusitana: Caminho para Cristo. Vila Nova de Gaia: Comissão permanente do Sínodo da Igreja Lusitana Católica Apostólica Evangélica, 1983.
———. “The Lusitanian Catholic Apostolic Evangelical Church: A Century of Portuguese Anglican Witness.” Churches of the Anglican Communion in Continental Europe Web site, 1998. Posted at <http://ecusa.anglican.org/europe/coacce/lcaec.html>. Accessed November 27, 2001.

Lutheran Church—Canada

The Lutheran Church emerged from the reforms initiated by the sixteenth-century German reformer Martin Luther (1483–1546). Luther’s emphases of justification by grace through faith alone and the authority of the Bible over tradition and any ecclesiastical authority was embodied in the several Lutheran Confessions (especially the Augsburg Confession) promulgated in the sixteenth century, which now form the standard of Lutheran belief.

Lutheranism was brought to Canada by German immigrants in the eighteenth century. The first Lutheran congregation in Canada was established in Halifax, Nova Scotia, in 1752. Most Lutheran churches in Canada, formed primarily in rural Nova Scotia, Ontario, and the Prairie Provinces (Manitoba, Saskatchewan, and Alberta), were organized and affiliated with U.S. Lutheran denominations. Through the twentieth century, concentrations of Lutherans developed in Kitchener-Waterloo, Winnipeg, and Edmonton.

The Lutheran Church—Canada (LCC) is one of the two main Lutheran bodies in Canada, the other being the EVANGELICAL LUTHERAN CHURCH IN CANADA. The LCC has its roots in the LUTHERAN CHURCH—MISSOURI SYNOD (LCMS), which entered eastern Canada in 1854 and western Canada in 1879. By the middle of the twentieth century, attempts were being made to create a self-governing church in Canada. The Lutheran Church–Canada was established in 1959 as a federation of districts within the LCMS, and in 1988 the LCMS created an autonomous church in Canada comprised of three districts. The denomination continues to keep close ties with the LCMS. Its head office is located in Winnipeg, its two seminaries are in St. Catherines, Ontario, and Edmonton, Alberta, and it supports a denominational periodical, the Canadian Lutheran. The LCC operates an extensive parochial school system across Canada and one university—Concord University College at Edmonton. There are approximately 325 LCC congregations across Canada, with close to eighty thousand members.

The LCC has two sacraments, Holy Communion and (infant) baptism. It does not ordain women, and it practices closed communion. It believes the Bible to be the “written Word of God and the only rule and norm of faith and of practice,” and it affirms without reservation the Book of Concord. LCC has observer status with the Evangelical Fellowship of Canada and participates with the INTERNATIONAL LUTHERAN COUNCIL. Through the Canadian Lutheran World Relief organization, the LCC seeks to be involved in social and justice issues around the world.

Address:

Lutheran Church–Canada
3074 Portage Ave.
Winnipeg, Manitoba R3K 0Y2
Canada
<http://www.lutheranchurch.ca> (in English and French)

Gordon L. Heath

Sources:

- Cronmiller, Carl R. A History of the Lutheran Church in Canada. Toronto: Evangelical Lutheran Synod of Canada, 1961.
- Pfrimmer, David. “A Lutheran Witness in Canadian Society.” In Church and Canadian Culture, edited by Robert E. VanderVennen. Lanham, MD: University Press of America, 1991.
- Schwermann, Albert H. The Beginnings of the Lutheran Church–Canada. Privately published, 1969.

Lutheran Church in Hungary

The Protestant Reformation began to spread from Germany through the Christian community in Hungary as early as 1518. Well established in the 1520s, over the next generation almost 150 Hungarian students would take their theological studies in Wittenberg with Martin Luther (1483–1546). Magyar translations of the New Testament and Luther’s Small Catechism appeared in 1541 and 1550, respectively.

The spread of Lutheranism in Hungary occurred just as Turkish armies were launching an invasion. The decisive Battle of Mohács in 1526 was followed by 125 years of Turkish occupation, from 1541 to 1686. After 1550, Lutherans also had to compete with the Reformed Church that took root in Hungary.

In the seventeenth century, a Christian-led government returned as Austria slowly pushed the Turkish forces south and Hungary became part of the Austro-Hungarian Empire. Protestants, both Lutheran and Reformed, suffered during this time as Roman Catholics reclaimed numerous parishes and banished Protestant pastors. Pressure was not relieved until Emperor Joseph II (1741–1790) issued an Edict of Toleration in 1781. Lutherans remained a tolerated minority through World War I, but their status was strongly affected by the division of Hungary and the transfer of Transylvania to Romania. In the years after the war, Hungarian Lutherans strongly supported the formation of the World Lutheran Conference and the development of international ties, especially with the United Lutheran Church in the United States.

Following World War II, Hungarian Lutherans gained recognition under the new Marxist government but shared the suffering of all religious groups in the face of an aggressively atheist system. The school system was secularized in 1948, but religious freedom was granted within some imposed limits. Celebration of significant events, such as the 500th anniversary of Luther’s birth in 1983, was permitted. A new translation of the Bible into modern Hungarian appeared in 1976. A theology emerged that emphasized the witness to Christian faith through action in situations where religious discourse was not tolerated. Since the fall of Marxism, the church has been granted full freedom and has a new positive relationship to the government. Some of its schools have been returned.

The Lutheran Church in Hungary adheres to the Augsburg Confession. Over the centuries it has developed a rich liturgical tradition. The church’s parishes are divided into two districts or dioceses, both headed by a bishop. The senior bishop is recognized as the presiding bishop. An assembly, presided over by a layperson (the general inspector) and the presiding bishop, is the highest legislative body for the church. Higher education is fostered through the Lutheran Theological Academy in Budapest. There are a number of church-related charitable institutions, including homes for the elderly and for handicapped children.

The Lutheran Church in Hungary publishes two periodicals, Diakonia and Evangelikus Elet. The ecumenically minded church is also a member of the Ecumenical Council of Churches in Hungary, the LUTHERAN WORLD FEDERATION, and the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES.

Address:

Lutheran Church in Hungary
Puskin utca 12
P.O. Box 500
1447 Budapest
Hungary
<http://www.lutheran.hu/>

Source:

Bachmann, E. Theodore, and Mercia Brenne Bachmann. Lutheran Churches in the World: A Handbook. Minneapolis, MN: Augsburg Press, 1989.

Lutheran Church in Liberia

American Lutheran missionaries, including Morris Officer (1823–1874), began work in Liberia in 1860. However, they had difficulty with the hot and humid weather, and only with the arrival of David A. Day (1851–1897) in 1874 was some continuous leadership for the mission established. Day, a pastor and physician, was able to stay in Liberia for a quarter of a century. He established a station inland from Monrovia on the Saint Paul River and opened a school. As did many pioneer missionaries, he spent considerable time mastering the ways of the people among whom he worked. He offered health services and set up preaching points at settlements across the countryside. In the second generation of the mission, in 1908, a second mission station was opened, this time even further upriver. As other personnel arrived, additional stations were added. Work concentrated among the Kpelle and Loma peoples, though work has begun among the Gbandi and Pallipo peoples.

During the twentieth century, an indigenous leadership was developed, and the most promising ministerial candidates were sent to the United States for seminary training. The Lutheran Church in Liberia was organized in 1948, though it remained subordinate to its American sponsors. In the meantime, American Lutheranism, at one time split into more than one hundred separate denominations, was in the midst of consolidating into several large bodies. The Liberian work eventually passed to the Lutheran Church in America (now a constituent part of the EVANGELICAL LUTHERAN CHURCH IN AMERICA). In 1967, the Lutheran Church in America granted the Lutheran Church in Liberia full autonomy. It joined the LUTHERAN WORLD FEDERATION the next year and subsequently became a member of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES.

The church adopted a polity combining congregational and presbyterial elements. Work is concentrated along the Saint Paul River from Monrovia to the Guinea border. The Bible has been translated and published in both the Kpelle and Loma languages. The church sponsors a number of elementary and secondary schools that use curriculum material developed in cooperation with the Methodists in Liberia and Sierra Leone. Ministers are trained at the Gbarnga School of Theology, an interdenominational effort sponsored by the Methodist, Anglican, and Lutheran churches. The church admitted women to the ordained ministry in 1982.

In the 1990s the church reported 25,650 members in 150 churches. It sponsors a weekly television show, Concern. It also has developed an active Christian-Muslim dialogue program.

Address:

Lutheran Church in Liberia
P.O. Box 10–1046
1000 Monrovia 10
Liberia

Source:

Bachmann, E. Theodore, and Mercia Brenne Bachmann. Lutheran Churches in the World: A Handbook. Minneapolis, MN: Augsburg Press, 1989.

Lutheran Church–Missouri Synod

The Lutheran Church–Missouri Synod is a strict confessional Lutheran church whose origins lie in the developing history of Protestantism in Saxony. Germany, the home of the Protestant Reformation, was and is predominantly Lutheran, but over the centuries the other major form of Reformation thought, Calvinism, also found adherents; many of Germany’s Calvinists (members of the Reformed Church) resided in Saxony.

It was the general agreement in the German states at the time that the ruler determined the faith that the people in his land would follow. In the early nineteenth century, the ruler of Saxony forced the merger of the Reformed Church in Saxony with the Lutheran Church. However, rather than force Calvinists to accept LUTHERANISM, he ordered the creation of a new Evangelical church that would accommodate both Lutheran and Reformed theology and worship.

Although many found this a happy solution, some Lutherans did not, and they formed a movement adhering to a conservative Lutheranism that placed great emphasis upon the Augsburg Confession of Faith and the Small Catechism written by Luther for the instruction of new church members. In 1839 a group of Lutherans who rejected the Saxon Evangelical Church arrived in the United States under the direction of their bishop, Martin Stephan (1777–1846), and settled in Perry County, Missouri.

Soon after their arrival, it was discovered that Bishop Stephan had misappropriated some church funds for personal use, and he was banished. He was replaced by Carl Ferdinand Wilhelm Walther (1811–1887). Walther faulted erroneous theology for Stephan’s downfall. He championed orthodox theology in the face of Stephan’s errors, especially as they related to the authority of the ministry. Walther advocated congregational rights and responsibility in defending truth. He became the pastor in Saint Louis and founded a small school that grew into Concordia Theological Seminary. In 1844 he founded a magazine, der Lutheraner, to spread his approach to faith. In 1847 he led in the founding of the Missouri Synod, composed of the twenty-two ministers and sixteen congregations then operating among the settlers.

The synod found favor among German-speaking Lutherans across the midwestern part of the United States. It found favor among those who preferred an emphasis upon the Lutheran confession rather than the pietism that predominated in some of the larger Lutheran groups in the eastern United States. The leadership of the Missouri Synod saw an unacceptable doctrinal looseness in these other synods (which would eventually unite into the EVANGELICAL LUTHERAN CHURCH IN AMERICA). Through the twentieth century, the two approaches would diverge over various issues such as the ordination of women, which the Missouri Synod rejects.

In 1999 the Lutheran Church–Missouri Synod reported 2,582,000 members in 6,220 congregations. It has a congregational polity. Its synod meets every three years and oversees an extensive educational program that includes primary and secondary schools, ten colleges and universities, and two seminaries. Through the twentieth century the church developed a vast missionary program. Many of its world missions have grown into mature autonomous churches with whom the Missouri Synod retains a partnership relationship. The synod took the lead in forming the International Lutheran Conference, which includes many of these partner churches along with other conservative Lutheran churches that agree with the Missouri confessional approach. The church believes that church unity must be based on doctrinal unity and has stayed out of most contemporary ecumenical groups, including the LUTHERAN WORLD FEDERATION. Meanwhile it has taken the lead in founding the INTERNATIONAL LUTHERAN COUNCIL, a cooperative fellowship of conservative Lutheran bodies.

Address:

Lutheran Church–Missouri Synod
1333 S. Kirkwood Rd.
St. Louis, MO 63122
<http://www.lcms.org/index.html>

Sources:

- Graebner, A. Half a Century of True Lutheranism. Chattanooga, TN: J. A. Fredrich, n.d.
- The Lutheran Annual*. St. Louis, MO: Concordia Publishing Company, issued annually.
- Meyer, Carl S. A Brief Historical Sketch of the Lutheran Church–Missouri Synod. St. Louis, MO: Concordia Publishing House, 1938.

Lutheran World Federation

Established in 1947 by representatives of Lutheran churches in twenty-three countries, the Lutheran World Federation (LWF) in 2002 numbered 133 member churches, including three designated as “associate members,” in seventy-three countries. It represents approximately 60 million of the estimated 64 million baptized Lutherans in the world; some congregations, though not all, that are associated with the U.S.–based LUTHERAN CHURCH–MISSOURI SYNOD and the INTERNATIONAL LUTHERAN COUNCIL remain outside the LWF.

Antecedent organizations include the General Council of the Evangelical Lutheran Church in North America (1867), the General Evangelical Lutheran Conference in Germany (1868), and the Lutheran World Convention (1923). The formation of the LWF after World War II served both to extend these efforts and to respond to postwar needs for reconciliation, relief, and service.

Initially regarding itself as a “free association of Lutheran churches,” the LWF was organized to foster united witness in the world, common theological research, the ecumenical involvement of Lutheran churches, and a common response to issues of human need and social justice. In 1990 it adopted a new constitution based on a different self-understanding, one with strong ecclesial overtones: “The Lutheran World Federation is a communion of churches that confess the Triune God, agree in the proclamation of the word of God and are united in pulpit and altar fellowship.” This self-understanding is thus built around a theology of communion (in Greek, koinonia), with increased concern for confessional unity, joint mission and service, theological reflection, and strong ecumenical involvement.

The ecumenical orientation of the LWF is manifest in its close cooperation with the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES (WCC), with which most LWF member churches are affiliated. The LWF has also sponsored international, bilateral dialogues with official representatives of the Roman Catholic, Orthodox, Anglican, Reformed, Methodist, Baptist, and Adventist traditions. In Augsburg, Germany, on October 31, 1999—the anniversary of the day Martin Luther nailed his famous Ninety-five Theses to the chapel door at Wittenberg—representatives of the LWF and the ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH signed a Joint Declaration on the Doctrine of Justification, an agreement that affirms that the mutual condemnations that Lutheran and Catholic leaders declared in the sixteenth century concerning the article of justification by grace through faith are no longer applicable or church-dividing. This declaration is widely regarded as an ecumenical breakthrough, and conversations with representatives of other Protestant traditions are being pursued by the LWF and the Vatican in the hope that its scope will be widened.

LWF assemblies have been held in Lund, Sweden (1947), Hanover, Germany (1952), Minneapolis, U.S.A. (1957), Helsinki, Finland (1963), Evian-les-Bains, France (1970), Dar es Salaam, Tanzania (1977), Budapest, Hungary (1984), Curitiba, Brazil (1990), and Hong Kong, People’s Republic of China (1997). In 2003, the tenth assembly is to be held in Winnipeg, Canada.

The present organizational structure of the LWF was adopted in 1990. The assembly, which normally meets every six years, is the highest legislative authority; a council serves as the governing body and is comprised of forty-eight ected members, of whom 50 percent are from the so-called northern churches and 50 percent “from churches in the rest of the world (the ‘two-thirds world’).” Headquarters for the LWF secretariat are in the Ecumenical Centre in Geneva, and its structure includes three departments in addition to a general secretariat: theology and studies, mission and development, and world service. Nearly one hundred staff members serve at the LWF headquarters, and approximately four thousand persons are employed in LWF world service projects throughout the world. Regional coordinators of LWF now work on four continents: Africa, Asia, Europe, and North America. [Entry reprinted from the Dictionary of the Ecumenical Movement, rev. ed., 2000, with the permission of WCC Publications, Geneva, and the William B. Eerdmans Publishing Co., Grand Rapids, MI.]

Address:

Lutheran World Federation
 P.O. Box 2100
 150, route de Ferney
 1211 Geneva 2
 Switzerland
<http://www.lutheranworld.org>

Norman A. Hjelm

Sources:

- Brand, E. L. Toward a Lutheran Communion: Pulpit and Altar Fellowship. LWF Report 26. Geneva: Lutheran World Federation, 1988.
- Nelson, E. C. The Rise of World Lutheranism: An American Perspective. Philadelphia: Fortress Press, 1982.
- Schjørring, J. H. N. A. Hjelm, and P. Kumari. From Federation to Communion: The History of the Lutheran World Federation. Minneapolis: Fortress Press, 1997.
- Vajta, V. From Generation to Generation: The Lutheran World Federation 1947–1982. LWF Report 16. Geneva: Lutheran World Federation, 1983.

Lutheranism

The various Lutheran churches of the world have grown out of the Reformist activities launched by a German monk, Martin Luther (1483–1546), in the sixteenth century. In 1517 Luther challenged what he saw as a distortion of Christian practice, the selling of indulgences, which were believed by Roman Catholics at the time to lessen the time one would spend in purgatory dealing with the consequences of sin prior to going to heaven. A university professor, Luther posted a series of theses that outlined his position and called for a debate. During the ensuing debate, Luther took a further step and asserted that biblical authority transcends that of the church and pope. This assertion led to a papal bull denouncing Luther, which Luther answered in three essays.

A statue of a German historian stands in front of a Lutheran church in Sibiu, Romania (M. Baciu/TRIP)

As Luther's position developed, he attacked the Roman Catholic doctrine of transubstantiation, limited the sacraments to two (baptism and the Lord's Supper) rather than seven, and elevated the role of the individual in the notion of the priesthood of all believers. He also elaborated on his basic principle of scriptural authority and salvation by grace through faith alone. He presented these views to the Diet of Worms in 1521 and was condemned. That condemnation set Luther and other reformers against church authorities and led to a permanent break. Those who stood with Luther became known as the Lutheran or Evangelical churches. (In the French-speaking world, a parallel development led to the Reformed churches, which focused upon the thoughts of John Calvin of Geneva [1509–1564].)

The Lutheran Reformation became dominant in northern Germany and in areas north and east of Germany, including Scandinavia and Lithuania, though the southern German principalities tended to remain Catholic. During the nineteenth century, Lutheran missionaries who were connected with a spectrum of missionary societies carried Lutheran belief and practice worldwide, and through the twentieth century numerous autonomous Lutheran churches resulted from that activity. Meanwhile, the home base of Lutheranism was devastated by World War II. Out of that war Lutherans worldwide came together in the LUTHERAN WORLD FEDERATION, initially intended to rebuild those countries ravaged by the war but later participating in a variety of cooperative activities around the globe.

Today Lutherans are characterized by their double emphasis upon Word and Sacrament, that is, biblical authority and preaching coupled with liturgy and the sacrament of the Lord's Supper. Their major doctrinal statement is the Augsburg Confession (1530), though Lutherans have been divided upon the strictness of its interpretation, especially as it stands in relation to Reformed Church confessions and participation in the contemporary ecumenical movement. The Lutheran World Federation has its headquarters in the same building that houses the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES.

Sources:

- Bachman, E. Theodore, and Mercia Brenne Bachman. Lutheran Churches in the World: A Handbook. Minneapolis, MN: Augsburg Press, 1989.
- Bodensieck, Julius, ed. The Encyclopedia of the Lutheran Church. 3 vols. Minneapolis, MN: Augsburg Publishing House, 1965.

- Luther, Martin. Works. Edited by Jaroslav Pelikan and Helmut T. Lehman. 55 vols. St. Louis, MO: Concordia Publishing House; Philadelphia: Fortress Press, 1958–1967.
- Mildenberger, Friedrich. Theology of the Lutheran Confessions. Philadelphia: Fortress Press, 1986.

Luxembourg

The modern state of Luxembourg was originally settled at the end of the last Ice Age. Much later, Romans found the region settled by Celts and Germanic peoples. An early Roman center was created at Trier, just east of Luxembourg. In the third century C.E., a new border that split the Low Countries (present-day Belgium, the Netherlands, and Luxembourg) divided the region between the German-speaking areas and the Romance language-speaking areas controlled by Rome.

The leadership of Luxembourg opposed Spanish rule of the region and sided with rebels who defeated the Spanish in 1576. It later came under the authority of Philip II of France. In 1713, it was incorporated into the Austrian Hapsburg Empire, where it remained until overrun by Napoleon. In 1795 it was again annexed to France.

In 1815 the Congress of Vienna gave Luxembourg to William of Orange, king of the Netherlands, and it was designated a grand duchy. In 1831 Belgium separated from Holland and Luxembourg became separated geographically from the Netherlands. Its territory was divided, the greater portion being assigned to Belgium, the other part being administered independently by the Dutch royal house.

In 1866 the Treaty of London guaranteed Luxembourg's neutrality under the House of Nassau. The duke of Nassau remains the monarch of Luxembourg in what is now a constitutional monarchy. The House of Nassau has ruled the country continuously except for short periods of German occupation during World Wars I and II.

Christianity came to Luxembourg in 698 when Willibrord (c. 658–739), a missionary from England, established a monastery at Echternach. Catholicism grew, becoming the dominant faith of the region, and the ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH has remained largely unchallenged

Status of religions in Luxembourg, 2000–2050

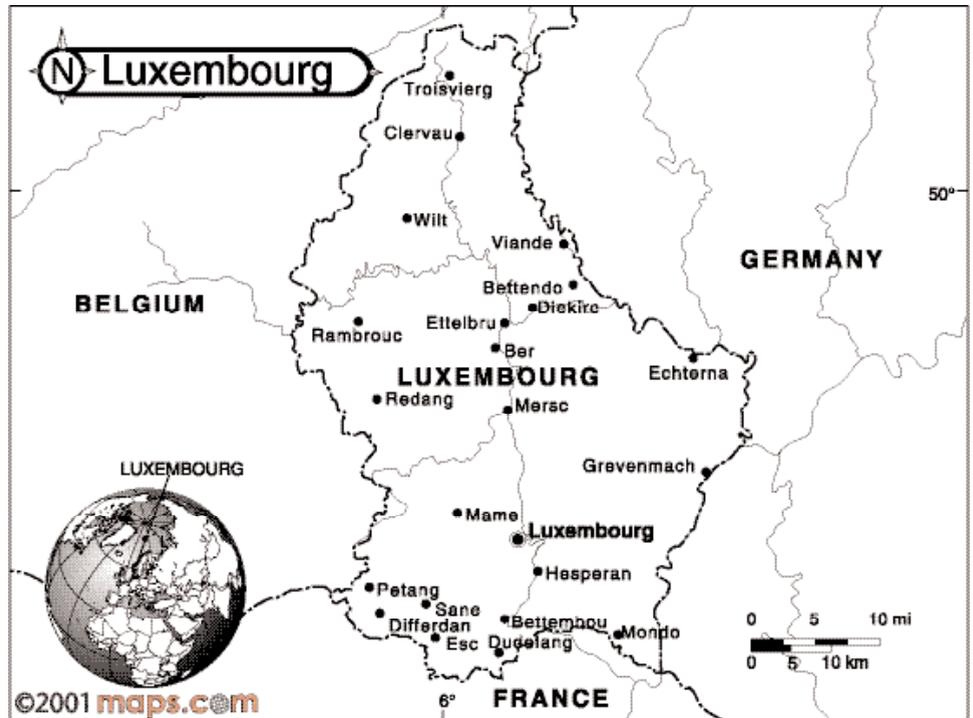

Followers	2000			2025	2050
	total	%	rate
Christians	404,000	93.9	1.20	430,000	384,000
Roman Catholics	407,000	94.5	1.23	430,000	380,000
Protestants	7,500	1.7	0.41	8,500	9,000
Marginal Christians	3,000	0.7	3.15	6,000	8,000
Nonreligious	16,100	3.7	2.08	20,000	30,000
Muslims	4,300	1.0	1.08	6,000	8,000
Atheists	3,500	0.8	0.94	4,000	5,000
Baha'is	1,500	0.4	1.75	2,000	2,800
Jews	700	0.2	-0.03	600	500
Total population	431,000	100.0	1.24	463,000	430,000

through the centuries. Catholicism is still the faith of some 90 percent of the population and stands behind the Christian Socialist Party, several labor unions, and the largest circulating newspaper, the Luxemburger Wort. A bishop of Luxembourg was named in 1870, and the office was elevated to archepiscopal status in 1988. The archbishop of Luxembourg resides in Esch-sur-Alzette.

Religious affairs in Luxembourg are handled by the Ministry of Religions. A form of separation of church and state exists, but the Roman Catholic Church is supported by state funds and a course in Catholicism is integrated into the public school curriculum.

The small Protestant community, consisting primarily of expatriates drawn to Luxembourg in the twentieth century, has come to play a role in the modern European business community. The Protestant Church of the grand duchy dates to 1813 and the occupation of the area by German soldiers. A Mennonite church was founded in 1830. There are also churches serving small Dutch-, Greek-, and Russian-speaking communities.

In the late twentieth century, Luxembourg began to attract a spectrum of new religions, most notably SUKYO MAHIKARI, which has its European headquarters at the Grand Château at Ansembourg. The NEW APOSTOLIC CHURCH has come from neighboring Germany, and as in other European countries, the JEHOVAH'S WITNESSES are active in Luxembourg.

Sources:

- Donckel, F. Die Kirche in Luxemborg von den Anfängen bis zur Gegenwart. Luxembourg: Sankt-Paulus Druckerei, 1950.
- Lallemand, A. Les Sectes en Belgique et au Luxemborg. Brussels: Editions EPO, 1994.

Macao

See China: Macao

Macedonia

The contemporary nation of Macedonia emerged out of the Federated Republics of Yugoslavia in 1991. The history of the region, however, goes back centuries. In the eighth century B.C.E., a people calling themselves Macedonians emerged in the Aliakmon River valley and migrated east into present-day Macedonia. The Macedonians became prominent in the fourth century B.C.E. under their king, Philip II (382–336 B.C.E.) and his more famous son, Alexander the Great (356–323 B.C.E.). During Alexander's reign the Macedonian Empire stretched eastward into India and south into Egypt and North Africa. The empire fell apart in the third century B.C.E. and was finally incorporated into the Roman Empire at the beginning of the second century.

After the fall of the Roman Empire, Macedonia was successively overrun by its neighbors, being at different times a part of the Bulgarian and Byzantine Empires, and it was eventually incorporated into Serbia. In the fifteenth century, it was incorporated into the Turkish Ottoman Empire. Toward the end of the nineteenth century, enthusiasm for independence rose even as the Ottoman Empire was weakening. Macedonia was coveted by Greeks, Bulgarians, and Serbians, but it remained under Ottoman control until that empire disintegrated in 1908. In 1913, after two wars, Macedonia was divided between Greece and Serbia. Then, following World War I, the northern part of Macedonia was incorporated into Yugoslavia, continuing as a part of the new Yugoslavia after World War II. That part of Macedonia constitutes the present nation, which declared its independence in 1991.

Christianity was introduced into Europe in the southern Macedonian city of Thessalonika; indeed, the dream in which the apostle Paul received the call to come to Macedonia has become a part of Christian lore (Acts 16:9). Chris-

Status of religions in Macedonia, 2000-2050

Followers	2000			2025	2050
	total	%	rate
Christians	1,288,000	63.7	-0.17	1,400,000	1,414,000
Orthodox	1,200,000	59.3	-0.33	1,272,000	1,256,000
Roman Catholics	70,600	3.5	2.16	100,000	120,000
Independents	8,200	0.4	3.51	12,000	15,000
Muslims	573,000	28.3	2.98	672,000	702,000
Nonreligious	133,000	6.6	-0.38	160,000	165,000
Atheists	28,300	1.4	-1.22	25,000	20,000
Jews	960	0.1	0.01	1,300	1,400
Total population	2,024,000	100.0	0.58	2,258,000	2,302,000

tianity penetrated northward, and the great majority of Macedonians had become Christian by the fourth century. Through the next centuries, the Macedonian Church tended to favor the leadership of Constantinople, and in 1054, when the Roman Catholic and Eastern Orthodox churches divided, the region remained Eastern Orthodox in faith and practice.

An independent Macedonian state arose under the leadership of Czar Samuel (980–1014). During this time the independent Archdiocese of Ohrid emerged. When Samuel's kingdom fell, Ohrid was placed under the authority of Constantinople. In 1219 the Serbian Orthodox Church was formed, and it declared its independence from Constantinople in 1346. The church in Macedonia then came under the hegemony of the Serbian Church. That policy continued through the years of Turkish rule, though for a period (1463–1557) the Turks favored the Ohrid Archepiscopacy and suppressed the Serbian Patriarchate.

The Serbian Patriarchate was reestablished in 1557, but it was again suppressed in 1766 when the ECUMENICAL PATRIARCHATE asserted its power in the region. The Serbian Orthodox Church was granted autonomy in 1832, and a united Serbian Orthodox church was recreated in 1919; the Orthodox Christians in Macedonia were included in that church. The patriarchate was reestablished in 1920. In 1947 the new Yugoslavian government forced the creation of a separate Orthodox church to serve the Macedonian Republic within the Federated Republics of Yugoslavia. In 1959 the government tried to force the Serbian Patriarchate to recognize the new Macedonian Orthodox Church and its leader, Bishop Dositej (r. 1958–1981), though for the time being the church was allowed to remain under the authority of the patriarch in Belgrade.

Then in 1967 Dositej declared his complete separation from the Serbian Patriarchate. The autonomous independent church was not recognized by either the Serbian Patriarchate or the Ecumenical Patriarchate until Macedonia became an independent country in the early 1990s. It has now received recognition as a sister body from the other Orthodox bodies as well. The church began to found congregations in North America and Australia in the 1960s, and today its only bishop serving outside of Macedonia resides in Australia. The church is currently led by His Beatitude, archbishop of Ohrid and Macedonia (<http://www.m-p-c.org>).

Protestantism entered Macedonia in the nineteenth century. In 1873 the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions extended its work in Bulgaria into Macedonia. It founded some ten congregations and a school, but following the establishment of Yugoslavia after World War I, the board had trouble responding to the new government. Meanwhile, in 1898 Robert Moller, a Methodist minister from Vienna, came to Yugoslavia. Starting in Croatia, this work slowly spread through the early twentieth century. In 1922, the American Board's work in Macedonia was turned over to the Methodists. About that time, a Yugoslavian Mission Conference was formed by the Methodist Episcopal Church (now a constituent part of the UNITED METHODIST CHURCH). This church suffered greatly during the German occupation, and following the war many members in Croatia and Serbia left the region. The church has had an important role in the 1990s and the current president of Macedonia (2001) is a United Methodist layman.

The Baptists extended their work in Yugoslavia into Macedonia in 1928, when one of the Methodist congregations changed its affiliation. At the time the, Baptists had legal status in the country, and the Methodists did not. A second Baptist church was opened in Skopje that same year. In 1991 the three active Baptist congregations in Macedonia formed the Baptist Union of Macedonia.

In the early 1990s, two Evangelical sending agencies, Partners International and SEND International, launched work in Macedonia. Another agency, Pioneers, based in Florida, has begun work among Macedonian Muslims.

During the years of Turkish rule, many Muslims moved into central Macedonia. Some Christians, not wishing to bear the burdens placed upon them by the Turkish authorities, converted to Islam. The community of Valaades, or Greek-speaking Muslims, survived in some parts of the country until around 1912, when most resettled in Turkey. Today, the Muslim population in the country is composed primarily of the Gypsy, or Romany, people.

There is a small Jewish community at Skopje, and in the 1990s centers of two Hindu groups, SAHAJA YOGA and the INTERNATIONAL SOCIETY FOR KRISHNA CONSCIOUSNESS, were opened. There is also a center of the UNIFICATION MOVEMENT and a small group associated with the Ordo Templi Orientis.

Sources:

Illevski, D. The Macedonian Orthodox Church: The Road to Independence. Translated by J. L. Leech. Skopje, Macedonia: Macedonian Review Editions, 1973.

Norris, H. T. Islam in the Balkans: Religion and Society between Europe and the Arab World. Columbia: University of South Carolina Press, 1993.

Madagascar

The island nation of Madagascar appears to have been originally populated by people from Malaysia and Polynesia around the beginning of the Common Era. Some eighteen indigenous groups of Malay-Polynesian descent now inhabit the island. The descendants of Bantu Africans, first introduced as slaves, have intermarried and integrated into the general population. The primary groups include the Merina (forming approximately one-fourth of the population), the Betsileo, the Sakalave, the Antankarana, the Bet-simisaraka, and the Antasaka.

Modern Madagascan history begins in the thirteenth century, when traders from the Comoros Islands established ports on Madagascar's northern shores. At the beginning of the sixteenth century, the Portuguese arrived. In their quest for valuables, they destroyed the trading settlements, but when they found no gold or other cash items, they left.

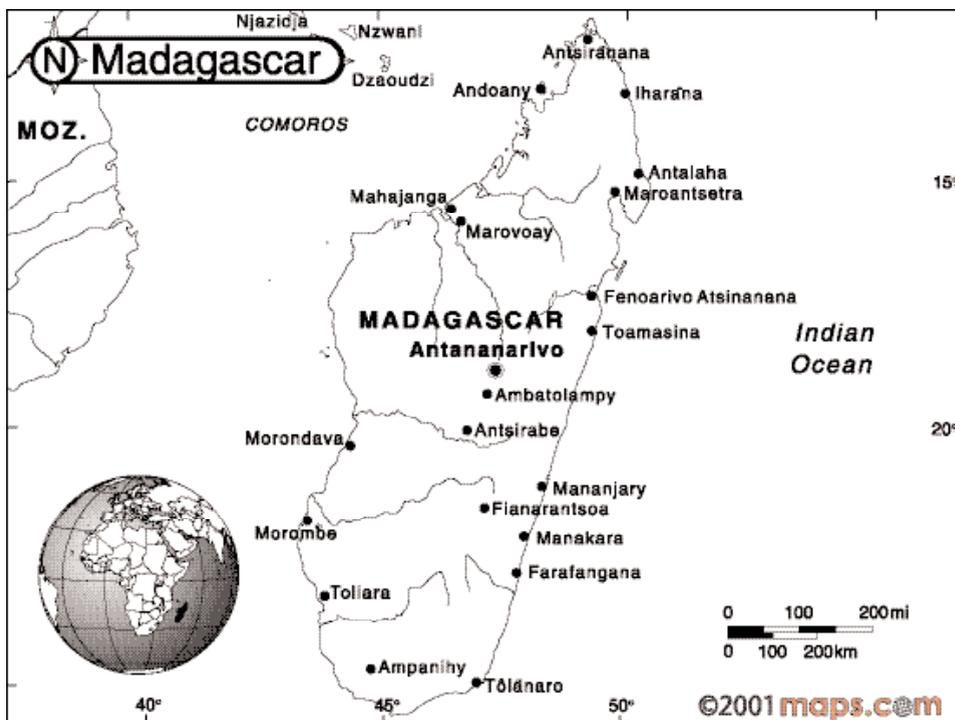

The arrival of the Europeans became a catalyst for the formation of the first Madagascan kingdoms, one in the east and one in the west. The unification of the island occurred during the reign of King Radama I (1810–1828). Problems with succession following Radama's death facilitated the return of the Europeans, who took over increasing portions of the land through the nineteenth century. Eventually Madagascar became a French colony.

In 1947 the struggle for Madagascan independence led to a revolt that was put down harshly, and autonomy was not accomplished until 1960. Fifteen years of political turmoil stood between independence and the establishment of a democratic republic in 1975. The presence of widespread poverty continues to threaten political stability, which in turn slows the processes of economic reform and revival.

Each of the various peoples of Madagascar had their own traditional religions, all of which were related by a common Malay-Polynesian origin. A creator deity (Zahahary) is acknowledged, but primary emphasis is placed upon ensuring survival after death and maintaining a relationship with those who have passed into the next life, that is, one's ancestors. A major ceremony is built around corpses that are moved about, ritually fed, and invited to dance. Traditional Madagascan belief also includes reliance on magic, with accompanying rejection of Witchcraft (malevolent magic) and reliance on the protective effects of amulets. Approximately half of the population remains loyal to traditional religious beliefs.

Christianity was introduced to the island by the Portuguese, but systematic missionary efforts were not launched until the seventeenth century. Only with the unification of the land under Radama I and his introduction of European culture did the ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH establish permanent structures. The LONDON MISSIONARY SOCIETY (LMS) opened work in 1818, and its missionaries developed a written form of the Malagasy language and translated the Bible. In 1836 Radama's successor, Queen Ranaivalona I (r. 1828–1861), turned against Christianity, expelled all Europeans, and killed many Christians. However, when the missionaries returned in 1861, they found a growing Christian community. Queen Ranaivalona II accompanied her coronation in 1869 with her conversion to Christianity, which thrived through the rest of the century. JESUITS worked beside Congregationalists, Friends, and after 1897, Reformed church missionaries from the PARIS MISSION. By 1900 there were over one million Christians.

The Protestant mission was concentrated in the northern part of the island and included numerous elementary schools. The primary churches represented were the Church of England (whose work was later incorporated

Status of religions in Madagascar, 2000-2050

Followers	2000		2025	2050
	total	% rate
Christians	7,890,000	49.5 3.25	15,000,000	23,500,000
Protestants	4,090,000	25.7 3.77	8,000,000	12,000,000
Roman Catholics	3,662,000	23.0 3.21	6,800,000	10,500,000
Independents	510,000	3.2 4.77	1,150,000	2,000,000
Ethnoreligionists	7,648,000	48.0 3.17	12,824,000	14,928,000
Muslims	310,000	2.0 2.61	900,000	1,500,000
Nonreligious	50,800	0.3 4.73	150,000	300,000
Baha'is	15,300	0.1 2.44	36,000	75,000
Hindus	9,200	0.1 2.82	20,000	62,500
Chinese folk-religionists	8,000	0.1 2.06	17,000	40,000
Atheists	5,600	0.0 2.04	8,000	11,000
Buddhists	4,000	0.0 2.88	9,000	21,000
Jews	240	0.0 1.80	400	600
Total population	15,942,000	100.0 3.20	28,964,000	40,438,000

into the CHURCH OF THE PROVINCE OF THE INDIAN OCEAN), the MALAGASY LUTHERAN CHURCH, and the Church of Christ in Madagascar (the LMS Mission). These were joined by the Friends Church and the Evangelical Church in Madagascar (the product of the Paris Mission). In 1968 the LMS Mission, the Evangelical Church, and the Friends Church united to form the CHURCH OF JESUS CHRIST IN MADAGASCAR.

In 1913 the LMS and the Lutherans formed the Missionary Conference, which in 1958 was superseded by the Federation of Protestant Churches in Madagascar. The federation, which includes the Church of Jesus Christ of Madagascar and the Malagasy Lutheran Church, is related to the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES.

Through the twentieth century, additional groups representative of the Protestant and Free Church perspectives arrived to build up the Christian community, including the Swedish Assemblies of God, the NEW APOSTOLIC CHURCH, and the EVANGELICAL FREE CHURCH OF AMERICA. They were joined by a number of AFRICAN INITIATED CHURCHES, several of which originated from schisms in the LMS Mission. The missionaries of the SEVENTH-DAY ADVENTIST CHURCH arrived in 1926, and the JEHOVAH'S WITNESSES in 1933.

Islam has emerged in Madagascar as a significant minority community, most of whose adherents live on the north-west corner of the island. The Comoros islanders had become predominantly Muslim in the fourteenth century and became the source of Islam's entrance into Madagascar. The Sunni Shafite school is strongest among the Sakalave people. More recently, some Comoros citizens have moved to Madagascar. The Muslim community has been further enlarged by some fifteen thousand Indo-Pakistani Muslims, among whom are Ismailis and Bohoras, and several thousand Zaydis from Yemen.

The approximately ten thousand Indo-Pakistani people that came to Madagascar were primarily Hindu. There are also a small number of Chinese Buddhists and members of the BAHÁ'Í FAITH. In 1975 Guru Maharaj Ji, head of the DIVINE LIGHT MISSION (now known as ELAN VITAL), a teacher in the Radha Soami/Sant Mat tradition, began to gather followers, but his movement was outlawed before the year was out. A minuscule Jewish community, with around two hundred members, has emerged in the twentieth century.

Sources:

- Ferrand, G. Les Musulmans à Madagascar et aux lies Comores. 3 vols. Algiers Université Faculté des lettres Publications, ser. 1, t. 9. Paris: E. Leroux, 1891–1892.
- Jacobsen, L. D. "Church Growth on the Island of Madagascar." Ph.D. dissertation, Fuller Theological Seminary, 1967.
- Madagascar et le christianisme. Histoire oecumenique*. Paris: Agence de Cooperation Culturelle et Technique, 1993.
- Rund, J. Taboo: A Study of Malagasy Customs and Beliefs. Norway: Oslo University Press, 1960.

Maha Bodhi Society

Established in 1891 in Colombo, Sri Lanka (then Ceylon), the Maha Bodhi Society (MBS) constituted a striking part of the revival of Theravada Buddhism in South Asia around the turn of the century. The society was founded by the Ceylonese activist Anagarika Dharmapala (1864–1933) with the purpose of regaining control of the Maha Bodhi Temple and resuscitating Buddhism in India. This ancient temple marks the site at Bodh Gaya, in northeast India, where the Buddha is reputed to have gained enlightenment. It had been adopted centuries later by Hindus for their devotional practices.

The British poet and journalist Sir Edwin Arnold (1832–1904) had visited Bodh Gaya in 1885 and lamented publicly that Buddhists had forgotten this "most interesting centre of [Buddhist] faith." Arnold achieved an agreement with the temple's Hindu manager to enable a Buddhist role in the temple's administration. This arrangement was vigorously taken up by Dharmapala, who had visited Bodh Gaya in 1891. In a move that was uncharacteristic to Buddhism but in agreement with Arnold, Dharmapala declared Bodh Gaya and the temple as the central Buddhist pilgrimage site, encouraging Buddhists the world over to fight for its "rescue." In 1892 the MBS headquarters was moved to Calcutta, and the society's journal, the Maha Bodhi, became established.

To further his cause, Dharmapala untiringly toured the United States, Europe, and East Asia in the next four decades, starting with a well-received speech at the World's Parliament of Religions in Chicago in 1893. Overseas branches of the MBS were formed in the United States (1897), Germany (1911), and Great Britain (1926). While in Europe, he initiated into Buddhism C. T. Strauss, the first Westerner to make a formal conversion to the faith. Undoubtedly, Dharmapala can be called one of the first Buddhist “global players,” and the MBS was the first international Buddhist organization.

The root of a bodhi tree, with a venerating Buddhist woman, Kaudy, Sri Lanka (Martin Baumann)

Despite Dharmapala’s activism, Bodh Gaya and the temple remained under sole Hindu supervision during the first half of the twentieth century. In 1949 the Bodh Gaya Temple Act reserved four of the nine votes in the temple’s administrative board for Buddhists, thereby still securing the Hindu majority. The MBS continued to work for the cause by sending Theravada Buddhist missionary monks from Ceylon/Sri Lanka to Bodh Gaya and other Indian places, by publishing the Maha Bodhi, and by maintaining hostels for Buddhist pilgrims.

In the late 1990s, the organization had eight centers in North India and five affiliated centers in South India, as well as centers in Sri Lanka, Japan, Korea, Hong Kong, the United States, and the United Kingdom. The society’s self-assured claim to represent all Buddhists in its demand for “rescuing” Bodh Gaya certainly cannot be upheld in view of the multiplication of Buddhist schools and traditions at Bodh Gaya. These various groups have established monasteries and temples there, particularly since the 1980s. Although the Buddhist presence at the site, with some thirty different organizations as of 1998, has relativized the one-time dominant role of the MBS considerably, Arnold and Dharmapala’s orientalist view of Bodh Gaya as the central place of Buddhism has come true a century after their work began.

Address:

Maha Bodhi Society
c/o Sri Dharmarajika Vihara
4-A Bankim Chatterjee St.
Calcutta 700073
India

Martin Baumann

Sources:

- Ahir, Diwan Chand. Buddha Gaya through the Ages. Delhi: Sri Satguru Publications, 1994.
- Guruge, Ananda, ed. Return to Righteousness: A Collection of Speeches, Essays and Letters of the Anagarika Dharmapala. Colombo, Sri Lanka: Government Press, 1965.
- Sangharakshita, Maha Sthavira. Flame in the Darkness: The Life and Sayings of Anagarika Dharmapala. Terawada, Pune, Maharashtra, India: Tritarna Grantha Mala, 1980.

Mahayana Buddhism

Buddhism goes back to the historical Buddha (c. 563–c. 483 B.C.E.), called the Buddha Shakyamuni. Historically the development of Buddhism is usually divided into four periods: (1) early Buddhism, from the lifetime of the Buddha until the reign of Asoka (d. 238 or 232 B.C.E.) and the split of the Buddhist order into different branches (nikaya), (2) the schools of so-called Hinayana (nikaya), (3) Mahayana Buddhism and its systems, and (4) Vajrayana (or Buddhist Tantrism). Mahayana Buddhism (in Sanskrit, Mahayana means, literally, the “Great Vehicle”) is now the predominant form of Buddhism in central and East Asia and has also been making its way under its different forms (Tibetan Buddhism, Zen Buddhism, Pure Land Buddhism) into Western countries and cultures.

The early Mahayana sources mainly consist of religious, nonhistorical literature, and consequently our understanding of the formation of early Mahayana, especially the time and the movement’s religious and social background in India, is not clear at all. The common assumption has been that the first step toward (proto-)Mahayana was the schismatic split of the early Buddhist community (sangha) into two branches, the Sthaviras (Sanskrit, the “Elder”) and the Mahasanghikas (in Sanskrit, the “Ones Belonging to the Big[er] Community”). However, scholars now tend to fix the origin of Mahayana to a later period, probably around the beginning of the Common Era.

Early Mahayana was characterized by a set of concepts that were not necessarily absent in the teaching of Hinayana schools but that gained more prominence in Mahayana circles. Among these was the idea that the ideal soteriological “type” was no longer exclusively the ascetic, self-sufficient arhat, that is, the Hinayana saint who had finally reached enlightenment (Sanskrit, bodhi) and redemption (nirvana). In contrast, the Mahayana ideal was the socially behaving bodhisattva, a “being (bearing) enlightenment,” who was supposed to undertake any effort, physically and spiritually, to save all living beings before realizing his/her own redemption. Mahayana consequently and early on acknowledged the existence of a plurality of these saviors, including Buddhas, who acted also from beyond this world. This latter notion led to the idea of “paradises” (Pure Lands), where believers wanted to be reborn in order to gain enlightenment and final redemption from the circle of rebirth in the presence and by the teaching of a fully enlightened Buddha.

In religious practice, the concepts of Mahayana paved the way for the more soteriological activities of the laypeople: through good deeds one could accumulate merit (Sanskrit, punya), which could even be transferred (punyaparinama) to other living beings. Even a normal human being bore the germ of enlightenment, and it was one of the goals of the Mahayana religious practice—in an ethical or ritual way or through meditative practice—to unfold this hidden, true nature.

The main philosophical schools of early Mahayana in India were the Madhyamaka ([Teaching of the] Middle [Way]) of Nagarjuna, and the Yogacara (Practice of the Yoga) / Vijnanavada (Teaching of [Mere] Consciousness). With the divergence of different schools in Mahayana, it became necessary, especially in East Asia, to systematize and hierarchize the teachings. Chinese schools like Tiantai,

Mai Chaza Church

Huayan, and Mizong (esoteric Mahayana, in Japan mainly known as Shingon [True Word]) tried to cope with this task. Besides these, there were schools that emphasized meditative (such as the Chinese Chan Buddhism and the Japanese ZEN BUDDHISM) or devotional practice (like the Chinese Jingtu school and the Japanese Jōdo-Shū, or PURE LAND BUDDHISM [CHINA]) over systematics.

Max Deeg

Sources:

- Harvey, Peter. An Introduction to Buddhism: Teachings, History and Practices. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1990.
- Williams, Paul. Mahayana Buddhism: The Doctrinal Foundations. New York: Routledge, 1989.

Mai Chaza Church/City of Jehovah

One of the more controversial of the African Initiated Churches in Zimbabwe is the City of Jehovah (Guta raJehova) movement, also called the Mai Chaza Church, founded in 1955 by Mai (Mother) Chaza (d. 1960). She was a Methodist who became ill and was divorced from her husband in 1953–1954. After this experience, she claimed to have been resurrected from the dead and stated that in revelations on a holy mountain (called Sinai) she had been called to live a celibate and ascetic life and to preach healing, especially to barren women. Her fame as a healer spread, with people coming to her for healing from all over Zimbabwe and other countries in southern Africa. She preferred to refer to herself as the Mutumwa (Messenger) of God, although followers gave her messianic titles like Muponisi (Savior), and Gwayana (Lamb), and saw her as an African reappearance of Christ.

Chaza faced opposition to her activities and eventually found refuge in the Seke Township, near Harare. Here she established the first of seven healing centers created in various parts of Zimbabwe, called Cities of Jehovah, which members enter and may settle in after an elaborate confession procedure. Members of this church, both men and women, wear khaki tunics and shorts with red belts—a radical break with custom for African women, who may also wear white dresses—and they carry sheathed knives as the soldiers of Jehovah.

A book of revelation called the Guta raJehova Bible, in which Mai Chaza's words and deeds are recorded, has virtually replaced the New Testament in the City of Jehovah. Chaza is sometimes depicted as a member of the Trinity. The church opposes traditional healing practices and ancestor rites, monogamy is demanded, African music and dancing are used in liturgy, and infant baptism is practiced. The Eucharist is not celebrated.

When Mai Chaza died in 1960, a secession took place. The minority faction settled in the Mutare area under a Nyamandura. The majority group believed that Chaza's spirit had entered a Malawian man named Mapaulos, who became known as Vamatenga (someone from heaven). Like Mai Chaza, Vamatenga was believed to be an incarnation of God, but he did not have the same influence as Mai Chaza. The movement was estimated to have some sixty thousand members by 2000.

Allan H. Anderson

Sources:

- Martin, Marie-Louise. "The Mai Chaza Church in Rhodesia." In African Initiatives in Religion, edited by David B. Barrett, 109–121. Nairobi: East African Publishing House, 1971.
- Scarnecchia, Timothy. "Mai Chaza's Guta re Jehova (City of God): Gender, Healing and Urban Identity in an African Independent Church." Journal of Southern African Studies 23, 1 (1997): 87–105.

Malagasy Lutheran Church

The Malagasy Lutheran Church (Eglise luthérienne malgache) originated as part of the second phase of Protestant Christian development in Madagascar. Protestant Christianity on the island was pioneered by the LONDON MISSIONARY SOCIETY (a Congregationalist organization) and had enjoyed the favor of King Radama I (r. 1810–1828). But following his death in 1835, his successor, Queen Ranavalona I (r. 1828–1861) banished the missionaries and moved to reestablish traditional Malagasy religion. Only after her death in 1861 were the missionaries allowed to return. By this time, however, a translation of the Bible in Malagasy had been made and supporting literature had been printed.

In 1866 representatives of the Norwegian Missionary Society, the missionary arm of the CHURCH OF NORWAY, began work in the southern part of Madagascar. The work found immediate success and soon spread to a variety of locations, where schools were opened. A seminary for training workers was located in Fianrantsoa. The work was enlarged in 1888 and 1889 by Norwegian Americans sent by the several Norwegian Lutheran churches then operating in the United States (now an integral part of the EVANGELICAL LUTHERAN CHURCH IN AMERICA). Through the first half of the twentieth century, these three missions developed separately but cooperated with the seminary and coordinated their evangelistic efforts so as not to duplicate work.

After World War II, the movement for national independence gained significant strength, and the Lutherans responded to the coming changes in 1950 by formally merging their missions into the Malagasy Lutheran Church. Missionaries remained in charge until 1961, when, one year after national independence, the first Malagasy president of the church, Rakoto Andrianarijaona, assumed office.

The church retained an intimate relationship with the supporting missionary agencies and churches in Norway and the United States, which were represented at every level of church organization. A revision of the constitution in 1975 reoriented the relationship between the several churches: The formerly subordinate relationship of the Malagasy Church was replaced with a partnership. The missionaries were now integrated into the church structure, and the sending churches reduced their representation in the church's ruling structure. In addition, the Malagasy Church was now represented in the administration of the sending churches. The Malagasy Church still receives financial support from the Church of Norway and the Evangelical Lutheran Church in America, and in 1978 the Evangelical Lutheran Church in Denmark joined the partnership.

The Malagasy Lutheran Church is headed by a triennial national synod that elects a president and executive committee to oversee administration. It sponsors the Lutheran Printing Press, through which it publishes Bibles, hymnals, and other church literature. It supports a chain of elementary and secondary schools, including one especially equipped to serve the blind and one for those with speaking and hearing disabilities. Since World War II, an extensive medical program has been developed through several hospitals and a set of clinics. The medical units supplement a unique healing program that had been launched in 1894 around Rainisoalambo, a native catechist who was believed to have a gift of healing. Much of the church's growth came from the revival associated with this healing ministry and the diaconal caring program that grew out of it.

In 1975 the church moved its headquarters from southern Madagascar to the capital, a signal of the northward thrust of the church into those areas where Christianity is the weakest. The church is a member of the LUTHERAN WORLD FEDERATION and the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES.

Address:

Malagasy Lutheran Church
54 avenue de l'Indépendance
B.P. 1741
Antananarivo 1101
Madagascar

Source:

Bachmann, E. Theodore, and Mercia Brenne Bachmann. Lutheran Churches in the World: A Handbook. Minneapolis, MN: Augsburg Press, 1989.

Malankara Orthodox Syrian Church

The Malankara Orthodox Syrian Church traces its history to the legendary travels of the apostle Thomas to India in the years following the death and resurrection of Jesus. According to tradition, Thomas landed at Cranganore, Kerala, in 52 C.E. He is believed to have evangelized the land over the next two decades but was finally martyred at what is known as Saint Thomas Mount.

Through the centuries, the church came into contact with the APOSTOLIC CATHOLIC ASSYRIAN CHURCH OF THE EAST, based in Iraq. Information on the existence of the Malankara Church had been lost during the years after the rise of Islam and its control of the land between Kerala and the main concentration of Christians in Europe. Although the Malankara Church was in full communion with the Assyrian Church, communication was not regular. Then in the fifteenth century, when Portuguese Roman Catholics arrived, the church quickly established cordial relations with the visitors.

As the Portuguese established themselves in Kerala, representatives of the Roman Catholic Church began to criticize the theology of the Malankara Church. It had a theology that represented a position in the larger church that was condemned in the fifth century by the Council of Ephesus. The Assyrian Church, and hence the Malankara Church, was a Monophysite church that taught that Christ had only one nature, the divine nature. The Council of Ephesus promulgated teachings that Christ had both a human and a divine nature.

The Roman Catholic Church placed considerable pressure on the Malankara Church through the last half of the sixteenth century, and in 1599, at a synod held at Daimper, the Malankara Church adopted a series of practices deemed necessary for its alignment with the Church in Rome. Changes included the adoption of Roman vestments, the abandonment of a married priesthood, and the acceptance of Portuguese bishops. Over the next fifty years, there was significant opposition to the changes, and in 1653, the great majority of the church withdrew from communion with Rome. At a synod also held at Daimper, church leaders both formally and symbolically renounced their ties to Rome and the changes that had been wrought in 1599. Those who remained loyal to Rome constituted the SYRO-MALABAR CATHOLIC CHURCH.

The Malankara Church revived the pre-Roman liturgy and practices and selected a new patriarch, Mar Thoma I, who was consecrated in 1665 by Mar Gregorius of the Syrian Orthodox Church of Antioch. The two churches enjoyed a cordial relationship for the next several centuries. However, late in the nineteenth century the relationship between the two churches began to sour. In 1886 Patriarch Peter II of the Syrian Church called a synod at Mulanthuruthy, India, and laid claim to all the property of the Malankara Church in India. The dispute lasted for more than half a century, during which time the Syrian Church established itself in India. Finally in 1958, the Supreme Court of India refused to sustain the claims of the Syrian Church and awarded all the disputed property to the Malankara Church.

During the lengthy battle with the Syrian Church, the Malankara faced other problems as well. First, the CHURCH

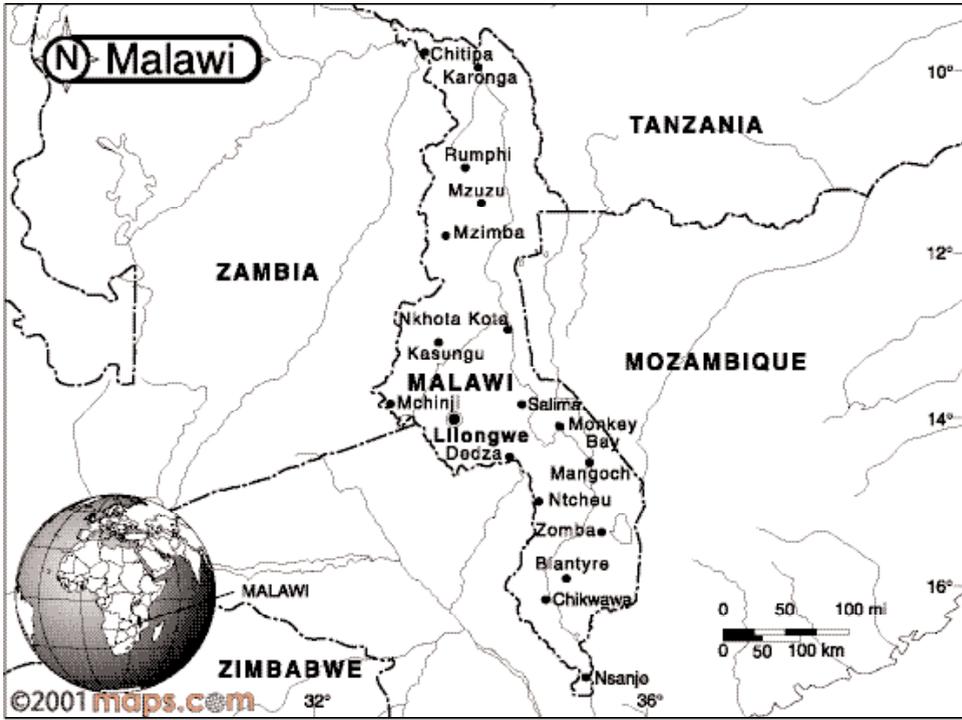

OF ENGLAND, which had also encountered the Malankara Church following the establishment of British authority in India, began to suggest changes to the church that would bring it more into line with Anglicanism and the orthodox theological tradition that dominated Europe. Through the nineteenth century, the drive to reform the church along Anglican lines gained considerable support. The Reformist wing of the church eventually left and reorganized as the Mar Thoma Syrian Church of Malabar. On the other hand, in the 1920s several bishops left to found the Syro-Malankara Catholic Church, which has been in full communion with Rome ever since.

The modern Malankara Orthodox Syrian Church is led by the Catholicate of the East, an office established by the church in 1912. In the midst of its dispute with the Syrian patriarch, Abdul Masaih, the Indian church leader announced that the Catholicate of Edessa (in Syria), a see that had not existed for centuries, was to be reestablished in India. The new catholicate became the first of the new line of Malankara church leaders.

In the years since World War II, the church has attempted to participate in the new global Christian community. The church is a charter member of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES. It has approximately 1.1 million members, divided into some fifteen dioceses. It sponsors a set of schools, including the Orthodox Theological Seminary, and several medical facilities.

Sources:

Hoke, Donald, ed. The Church in Asia. Chicago: Moody Press, 1975.
 Moffatt, Samuel Hugh. A History of Christianity in Asia. Vol. 1, Beginnings to 1500. San Francisco: HarperSanFrancisco, 1992.

Status of religions in Malawi, 2000-2050

Followers	2000			2025	2050
	total	%	rate
Christians	8,388,000	76.8	1.82	15,771,000	24,000,000
Roman Catholics	2,698,000	24.7	1.88	5,100,000	8,000,000
Protestants	2,140,000	19.6	1.47	3,912,000	5,636,000
Independents	1,830,000	16.8	2.01	3,700,000	6,000,000
Muslims	1,611,000	14.8	1.46	2,900,000	4,000,000
Ethnoreligionists	850,000	7.8	-0.31	1,100,000	750,000
Nonreligious	27,500	0.3	3.25	70,000	80,000
Baha'is	24,500	0.2	3.13	70,000	135,000
Hindus	23,400	0.2	1.57	45,000	80,000
Sikhs	490	0.0	1.72	1,000	2,300
Jews	200	0.0	1.48	300	500
other religionists	380	0.0	2.37	800	1,600
Total population	10,925,000	100.0	1.59	19,958,000	29,008,000

desirous of extending its mining operations, had claimed the area to the west and south of Lake Malawi. The land had been settled by a variety of Bantu people, especially the Chewas and the Yao. Then the expansion of the Zulus far to the south brought about the decline of the Zimbabwean kingdom and also pushed the Ngoli-Ndwande people into the region.

Western attention to the region began with the explorations of British missionary David Livingstone (1813–1873) and the subsequent assertion of British interest in building a land route linking South Africa to Egypt. In 1891 the British Protectorate of Nyassaland was created. That protectorate gave way to the independent state of Malawi in 1964. Hastings Kamuzu Banda (1906–1997), elected president in the first free elections, soon seized power and continued to rule the country with increasingly dictatorial powers until he was defeated in 1994 in the country's first

Malawi

The land making up the nation of Malawi rose from obscurity in the tenth century as part of the extended territory of the monomotapa (ruler) of Zimbabwe. Zimbabwe, multiparty elections. The Banda years had been marked by suppression of dissident intellectuals, political enemies, and minority religions.

The traditional religions of Malawi have been able to stave off significant missionary efforts from both Christians and Muslims. Approximately 25 percent of the population continue to follow their ancestral faith. Among the more important surviving faiths is that built around the deity Chisumphi, which survives among the Chewa people. The Chewas had held sway over much of Malawi during a period when the Zimbabwean kingdom had been in decline. Worship of Chisumphi was centered on a drum located at the main center of the faith at Kaphirntiwa. He was believed to possess women who functioned as mediums, known as Makewanan.

As Christianity moved into the area, it encountered another belief system among the southern Chewa, built around the deity M'Bona, a god who was once human. Under the impact of the cultural clash, Chewa leaders began to speak of M'Bona as a black Christ and adopted various practices from the Christian church.

David Livingstone issued the call for Christians to evangelize Malawi. The first work, established by the Universities' Mission to Central Africa, an Anglican society, established a station north of Lake Malawi (then known as Lake Nyassa), but it had to be discontinued after suffering a series of misfortunes. The Free Church of Scotland, a Presbyterian body, opened more enduring work in 1875, and the Church of Scotland, also Presbyterian, sent missionaries in 1876. In 1926, these two churches joined with the mission founded in 1888 by the Reformed Church of South Africa to form the Church of Central Africa Presbyterian, the largest Protestant church in the country. President Banda was a member of this church and moved against other groups, most especially the JEHOVAH'S WITNESSES, who were banned in 1969.

Roman Catholics had first visited Malawi in 1561 but did not establish permanent missionary stations until the end of the 1880s. The WHITE FATHERS pioneered this effort. The first Malawian priest was ordained in 1937, and the first bishop was consecrated in 1956. The church experienced rapid growth after World War II and soon surpassed the Presbyterians in membership.

Over one hundred different Christian denominations now operate in Malawi. Included are older missionary churches such as the Anglican Church (1879), the SEVENTH DAY BAPTIST GENERAL CONFERENCE (1899), and the CHURCHES OF CHRIST (NON-INSTRUMENTAL) (1906). The AFRICAN METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH expanded its work to Malawi in 1924. The Anglican Church has two dioceses in Malawi, now incorporated into the CHURCH OF THE PROVINCE OF CENTRAL AFRICA, whose archbishop resides in Botswana.

These denominations have been joined by the newer Holiness and Pentecostal denominations, such as the INTERNA-TIONAL PENTECOSTAL HOLINESS CHURCH (1923), the ASSEMBLIES OF GOD (1930), the CHURCH OF THE NAZARENE (1957), and the CHURCH OF GOD (CLEVELAND, TENNESSEE; 1970). The WISCONSIN EVANGELICAL LUTHERAN SYNOD is affiliated with the Lutheran Church of Central Africa, established in 1962. More recently the Evangelical Lutheran Church of Malawi (ELCM) was started by a Lutheran layman, Gilbert Msuku, upon his return to Malawi after seventeen years of residence in Tanzania. He gathered an initial congregation in Lilongwe, the capital of Malawi, where its headquarters remains. The ELCM is affiliated with the Federation of Lutheran Churches in Southern Africa and the LUTHERAN WORLD FEDERATION.

Like its neighbors, Malawi is also home to a spectrum of AFRICAN INITIATED CHURCHES, among the most expansive being the African Industrial Mission, founded in 1898, and the AFRICAN APOSTOLIC CHURCH OF JOHANE MARANGE, an independent church that began in Zimbabwe. Besides the African Industrial Mission, unique Malawian churches include the Achewa Church (1920), which has Baptist roots, and the Last Church of God and His Christ (1924), founded by former members of the Presbyterian Church.

Malawi has offered strong support to both the SEVENTH-DAY ADVENTIST CHURCH and the JEHOVAH'S WITNESSES, the latter having made a comeback after its period of suffering in the 1970s. The GREEK ORTHODOX PATRIARCHATE OF ALEXANDRIA AND ALL AFRICA has a small work associated with its diocese in Zimbabwe. A more substantive Orthodox presence is provided by the Coptic Orthodox Church, which named a bishop for the country in 1920.

The Christian Council of Malawi, an affiliate of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES, dates to 1939. It grew out of the older Consultative Board of Federative Malawi Missions of Nyassaland. There are also two organizations serving primarily African Initiated Churches: the Followers of Christ Association of Malawi and the Reformed Independent Churches Association of Malawi.

Islam has made its most significant impact in Malawi among the Yao people of eastern Malawi, the great majority of whom are now Muslims of the Sunni SHAFIITE SCHOOL OF ISLAM. The Malawian Muslim community has expanded in recent decades, receiving financial support from several Arab countries. The first spiritual assembly of the BAHÁ'Í FAITH in the country was founded in 1964. It experienced early growth in the expatriate Indian community, which includes Hindus, Muslims, and Sikhs. Hindus have organized the Shree Hindu Seva Mandal (a temple) in Blantyre. The Sikh community is centered in Limbe.

Sources:

Bone, D. S. Religion in Malawi: Current Research. Zomba, Malawi: Department of Religious Studies, Chancellor College, University of Malawi, 1983.

Chakanza, J. C. An Annotated List of Independent Churches in Malawi, 1900–1981. Zomba, Malawi: Department of Religious Studies, Chancellor College, University of Malawi, 1983.

Sindima, H. J. A General Survey of the History of the Independent Church in Malawi, 1900–1976. Nairobi: AACC, 1977.

Wishlade, R. L. Sectarianism in Southern Nyasaland. London: Oxford University Press, 1964.

Malaysia

The modern nation of Malaysia was created in 1963 when the former British colonies of Malaya, Singapore, Sarawak, and Sabah merged to form the Federation of Malaysia (Singapore went its separate way two years later). The country consists of approximately 50 percent ethnic Malays, 30 percent Chinese, and about 15 percent Indians. The Malays settled the land in prehistoric times, and the historical period began with the migration of the Chinese into the region in the second millennium B.C.E. Indians arrived in the first century C.E., when an Indian state emerged on the Mekong River in what is now Vietnam. Chinese Buddhist states emerged along the eastern shore of the Malay Peninsula. In the fifteenth century, the port of Malacca was founded on the western shore of the peninsula. This port became the doorway for Islam's entrance into the area, and a century of trade with Muslims coincided with the rise of Islam to dominance among the Malay segment of the population and the replacement of the Buddhist states with Islamic ones.

In 1511, the Portuguese seized Malacca. A century later, the Dutch moved in and replaced the Portuguese. The British then moved into the area by settling along the northern shore of the island of Borneo. The conflict between the Dutch and British, which reached a new peak following the founding of Singapore in 1819, led to an 1824 treaty that made Malaya a British colony. From their base at Malacca and Penang, the British encouraged the various sultans who continued to rule over most of the peninsula to form a federation, while the territories on Borneo (Brunei, Sabah, and Sarawak) were turned into protectorates. The British also encouraged the immigration into Malaya first of Chinese and then, in the early twentieth century, of Tamils from India. By controlling the economy and em-

Status of religions in Malaysia, 2000–2050

Followers	2000			2025	2050
	total	%	rate
Muslims	10,599,000	47.7	2.22	14,770,000	17,460,000
Chinese folk-religionists	5,364,000	24.1	2.18	6,850,000	7,500,000
Christians	1,847,000	8.3	2.52	3,050,000	4,100,000
Roman Catholics	722,000	3.3	2.39	1,190,000	1,550,000
Protestants	660,000	3.0	2.41	1,100,000	1,500,000
Anglicans	205,000	0.9	2.84	280,000	360,000
Hindus	1,630,000	7.3	2.17	2,350,000	2,800,000
Buddhists	1,479,000	6.7	2.46	2,200,000	2,900,000
Ethnoreligionists	758,000	3.4	1.24	800,000	820,000
Neoreligionists	317,000	1.4	2.83	500,000	755,000
Nonreligious	105,000	0.5	3.44	200,000	300,000
Baha'is	97,100	0.4	2.21	170,000	250,000
Atheists	40,800	0.2	3.83	60,000	72,000
Sikhs	36,800	0.2	2.07	60,000	80,000
other religionists	4,300	0.0	3.58	8,000	12,000
Total population	22,244,000	100.0	2.23	30,968,000	36,989,000

ployment, the British nurtured a segregated system—the Malays dominating agriculture; the Chinese, mining; and the Indians, rubber production.

The area was occupied by the Japanese during World War II. When the British again assumed hegemony, they began to propose changes in governance, which raised tensions between the several ethnic groups, on several occasions leading to the outbreak of hostilities. Finally, in 1957 a platform for independence was worked out, building on the federation of sultans previously established. Malaysia was established as a federation of eleven states. Every five years, one of the sultans from the nine Islamic sultanates is designated as the monarch, sharing power in a constitutional system with a parliament and popularly elected prime minister. The Chinese and Indians were granted citizenship, but the Malays, as indigenous people, were accorded several special privileges, and Malay was designated the official language.

A mosque with a gold dome in Kuala Kangsar, Malaysia (R. Nichols/TRIP)

Today, religion in Malaysia is largely divided along ethnic lines. Malaysia is dominated by Sunni Muslims of the SHAFIITE SCHOOL OF ISLAM. Islam was introduced in the thirteenth century by traders from India (primarily from Bengal and Gujarat) and the Middle East. It replaced the indigenous religions of the Malay peoples as well as the Hinduism and Buddhism of the elites. Aristocrats in the coastal districts were the first to accept the new faith, and the population followed in gradual stages. Diplomatic marriages between the royal classes of different kingdoms further spread the faith. For example, marriages arranged by the sultan in Malacca led to the establishment of Islam on Borneo.

Islam remained dominant during the colonial era, and its continued leadership role is symbolized by the National Mosque in Kuala Lumpur, completed in 1965. Islam was named the state religion in Malaysia in 1957. Each of the nine sultans is head of the faith in their own sultanate. The sultan serving as king is also head of Islam in the two states without a sultan, Malacca and Penang. There is no designated head of the faith in Sarawak or Sabah. Among the king's stated duties is defending the faith, and he also has a set of administrative tasks such as setting the dates for Muslim festivals.

Founded in 1968, the Council for Islamic Affairs, which operates out of the prime minister's office, coordinates the activities of the state councils that advise the sultans and state governments on religious matters. The state and national legislatures have the power to make laws relative to Islam and other religions.

Although Shafite Islam predominates, there are measurable communities of SHI'Ā ISLAM and SUFISM. The Sufi brotherhoods were prominent among the Muslims who introduced Islam to the region, especially Borneo. There is a small community belonging to the AHMADIYYA MOVEMENT IN ISLAM, and the BAHĀ'Ī FAITH is growing primarily from Muslim converts.

Buddhism emerged among the Malaysians of Chinese heritage and still retains the allegiance of the great majority of them. Most follow Chinese Mahayana (PURE LAND BUDDHISM) traditions, often mixed with DAOISM. TIAN DAO (also known as Yiguandao) is a popular new Daoist movement that includes elements of Buddhism. There are also some Tibetan tantric influences, and a few Theravada Buddhists. The urban Buddhist community in particular now manifests the same pluralism as found in other Southeast Asian cities. Thus one would find, for example, centers for groups such as the FALUN GONG and the TRUE BUDDHA SCHOOL. At the other end of the spectrum, Buddhism fades into Chinese folk religion.

Leading Buddhist organizations include the Malaysian Buddhist Association (MAHAYANA BUDDHISM), the BUD-DHIST MISSIONARY SOCIETY MALAYSIA, FOGUANGSHAN Buddhism, THE BUDDHIST COMPASSION RELIEF TZU CHI ASSOCIATION, the YOUNG BUDDHIST ASSOCIATION OF MALAYSIA, and the Sasana Abhiwurdi Wardhana Society, a Theravada group formed in 1894 for Sri Lankans.

Hinduism, introduced around the beginning of the Common Era, controlled much of Malaysia through its Hindu rulers prior to the coming of Islam. Today it is the dominant religion of the Indian Malaysians, the majority adhering to TAMIL SAIVISM. Several of the new Hindu movements have entered Malaysia in the twentieth century, including the DIVINE LIFE SOCIETY and the INTERNATIONAL SOCIETY FOR KRISHNA CONSCIOUSNESS. A number of Sikhs from India and Pakistan have also made Malaysia their home.

Coming relatively late to Malaysia was Christianity, introduced by the Portuguese when they captured Malacca. The Dutch pushed the ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH aside and introduced Protestantism (the Reformed Church) in the seventeenth century. However, it was not until the nineteenth century, during the British era, that the modern Protestant missionary movement targeted the region. Malaysia and Singapore shared a history until 1965, since which they have largely gone their separate ways.

The first Roman Catholic priest settled in Malacca in 1611. In the 1540s, the town was home to one of the more famous JESUITS, Francis Xavier (1506–1552), who introduced Roman Catholicism to much of Asia. The Diocese of Malaysia was established in 1557, abandoned in 1641, and reestablished in 1888 (with the bishop residing in Singapore). The Archdioceses of Malaysia and Singapore were separated in 1972. Catholics have their major constituency among the Chinese, Indian, and small Eurasian communities. The church has experienced major problems in Sabah as a result of the expulsion of many priests and religious followers in the early 1970s at the same time that a noticeable increase in Islamic proselytization within the Christian community was evident.

After the British expelled the Dutch from the Reformed Church, the next Protestant missionaries in Malaysia were from the LONDON MISSIONARY SOCIETY, a Congregationalist organization. The missionary William Milne (1785–1822) had stopped at Malacca on his way to China, and he stayed to train Chinese Malaysians as missionaries both in Malaya and China. When China was finally opened to Christian missionaries in 1842, the work transferred there.

The SOCIETY FOR THE PROPAGATION OF THE GOSPEL IN FOREIGN PARTS, associated with the CHURCH OF ENGLAND, began work in Malaysia six years after the London Missionary Society, in 1848. It was soon joined by the CHURCH MISSIONARY SOCIETY. The Methodist Episcopal Church (now an integral part of the UNITED METHODIST CHURCH) began work in Malaysia from its base in Singapore. The effort, originally administered from India, was organized into the Malaysian Mission Conference in 1894 and the Annual Conference in 1902. Meanwhile, in the 1860s, the CHRISTIAN BRETHERN launched their missionary efforts.

Through the twentieth century, numerous other Christian groups have also initiated work in Malaysia—the Lutherans (PROTESTANT CHURCH IN SABAH), SEVENTH-DAY ADVENTIST CHURCH, and the ASSEMBLIES OF GOD receiving the best response. Outstanding among missionary efforts, however, is the work of the Borneo Evangelical Mission, which was created in 1928 by a group of conservative Protestants in Melbourne, Australia. Their effort has produced what is now the third largest church in the country, the Evangelical Church of Borneo. It is just behind the Roman Catholic Church and the METHODIST CHURCH OF MALAYSIA, and just ahead of the Anglicans, whose three dioceses are now part of the CHURCH OF THE PROVINCE OF SOUTHEAST ASIA (created in 1996).

The Christian community has been increased by the addition of several non-Western groups, most importantly the Local Church and the True Jesus Church, both developed early in the twentieth century in China. The Tamil-speaking Ceylon Pentecostal Church came to Malaysia from Sri Lanka, and the MAR THOMA SYRIAN CHURCH OF MALABAR arrived with members migrating from India. However, even with the development of a variety of different Christian groups, the Christian community remains relatively small compared to the other major traditions. It has had the most success in Sabah and Sarawak as compared to western Malaysia.

Protestant Christians associate with each other across denominational lines through the Council of Churches of Malaysia (founded in 1948 as the Council of Churches of Malaysia and Singapore). It is an affiliate of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES. Conservative Protestants are associated in the National Evangelical Christian Fellowship Malaysia, which is related to the WORLD EVANGELICAL ALLIANCE.

Sources:

- Basri, Ghazalki. Christian Mission and Islamic Dewah in Malaysia. Kuala Lumpur: Nurin Enterprise, 1990.
- Hurt, R., L. K. King, and J. Roxborough, eds. Christianity in Malaysia: A Denominational History. Salangor Darul Ebran, Malaysia: Palanduk Publications, 1992.
- McDougall, C. Buddhism in Malaya. Singapore: Donald Moore, 1956.
- Putra, T. A. R., et al. Contemporary Issues on Malaysian Religions. Petaling Jaya, Malaysia: Pelanduk Publications, 1984.

Malaysia, Islam in

During its initial growth in the seventh century, Islam identified itself with an emerging Arab culture and was carried from its base on the Arabian Peninsula eastward to the Indus River. In the following centuries, the Indian subcontinent would become a battleground in which Hindus and Muslims would be locked in fierce competition for the souls of the ruling elite and the people, with quite varying results in different areas. Beginning in the twelfth century, Islam spread to Malaysia and the neighboring Indonesian archipelago. It was brought by merchants from India and the Muslim lands to the west, where it found a following through persuasion rather than the sword.

The port of Melaka (or Melacca), located on the Malaysian side of the narrow strait that separates Malaysia from Sumatra, was founded in the fifteenth century. Its rulers were the first in the region to convert to Islam and establish it among the people of their land. The prosperity of Melaka, developed from its trade with the Islamic world, tipped the scale among other leaders in the region, and within a short time Islam had become a majority faith and numerous, relatively small sultanates had come into existence. Islam continued to expand even after the Portuguese came to the region in the sixteenth century.

The Portuguese captured Melaka in 1511. In the mid-1600s, the Dutch entered the region and made an alliance with the sultan of Johor. The Dutch enjoyed a monopoly on trade in the region until the British moved into Malaysia in the late eighteenth century. After a half century of conflict, in 1824 the Dutch and the English reached an agreement, with the Dutch receiving control of the Indonesian islands and the British receiving control of Malaysia. Until the 1870s, the British did little to interfere with the running of the various states on the Malaysian Peninsula, but in 1874 they imposed the Pangkor Treaty, by which a British advisor was attached to each sultanate. This advisor was to counsel on all matters except Malay religion. The treaty had the unintended consequence of causing the sultans to bring the leadership of the Islamic community into their palaces, launching a tradition whereby the government supplied the top leadership of the religious organizations. As British missionaries moved into the region, Malaysian leaders manifested a noticeable hostility to all things Western, including Christianity.

Growing as it did in a non-Arab context, the form of Islam that became entrenched in Malaysia, Sunni Islam of the SHAFIITE SCHOOL OF ISLAM, wedded itself to a number of Malaysian cultural practices quite foreign to Middle Eastern Islam. At the beginning of the twentieth century, many Malaysian students studied in the Middle East, which they saw as the center of their faith, and absorbed influences from different reformist tendencies. They returned to their homeland to found a movement calling for reform. Shaikh Tahir Jahal al-Din (1869–1957) emerged as the leader of the reformist movement in Malaysia and Indonesia. He called for the establishment of modern Islamic schools and the abandonment of various common practices, which he saw as unlawful innovations.

The reform movement, with a background in the HANAFITE SCHOOL OF ISLAM and even WAHHABI ISLAM perspectives, did not win the day. However, it did activate the older Shafite leaders, and in its criticism of the British it is credited with originating the drive for independence that would emerge more visibly after World War II. In the 1950s the Pan-Malayan Islamic Party began to advocate for the establishment of an independent Islamic state.

Following independence in 1957, Islam was named the official religion of Malaysia, and the several sultans in the nine states were named the guardians of the faith in their territories. The country's sovereign is chosen from among the nine sultans. An office of Islamic Development was established in the prime minister's office, and in the 1970s the Islamic Center was opened to give increased attention to the development of the Muslim community. In 1970 the Faculty of Islamic Studies was created at the National University of Malaysia.

The final establishment of modern Malaysia in 1963, complete with the former states of Sabah and Sarawak on the island of Borneo, released the energy of the younger generation. Many affiliated with a new reformist dawah (propagation) movement, saw Islam as a holistic life. Its members demanded a broader application of Islamic law in the land.

The dawah movement has had a visible effect on the government, which established a variety of institutions such as the International Institute of Islamic Thought and Civilization (1987) and changed a number of practices within the government itself so as to embody Islamic values and practices. There is a significant non-Islamic presence in Malaysia; however, it is almost totally limited to Chinese and other non-Malay peoples. Islam is the majority religion on the Malay Peninsula, but it is the minority religion in Sabah and Sarawak. Proselytization of Muslims is prohibited and conversion of Muslims to other religions is strongly discouraged and carries a variety of penalties.

Address:

Department of Islamic Development Malaysia
Menara Pusat Islam
50519 Jalan Perdana
Kuala Lumpur
Malaysia
http://www.islam.gov.my/english/

Sources:

Bakar, M. A. "Islamic Revivalism and the Political Process in Malaysia." Asian Survey 21, 10 (1981): 1040-1059.

Nagata, J. "The New Fundamentalism: Islam in Contemporary Malaysia." Asian Thought and Society: An International Review 5, 14 (1980): 128-141.

The Maldives

The Maldives is an archipelago in the Indian Ocean southwest of Sri Lanka consisting of some two thousand small coral islands, fewer than 20 percent of which are inhabited. On July 3, 1153, the residents of the islands, formerly Buddhists, formally converted to Sunni Islam, and the ruler assumed the title of sultan. Abul Barakaath Yoosuf Al-Barbary, a Muslim from North Africa, led the conversion process, and Sri Tribuvana Aditiya, the king, assumed the name Sultan Mohamed bin Abdullah and instructed his subjects to adopt Islam. He encouraged the shift of allegiance by destroying the island's Buddhist temples and shrines. It is of interest that many of the mosques are ori-

Status of religions in Maldives, 2000-2050

Followers	2000			2025	2050
	total	%	rate
Muslims	284,000	99.1	2.84	496,000	672,000
Buddhists	1,800	0.7	5.33	3,600	5,500
Christians	370	0.1	0.82	800	1,200
Protestants	260	0.1	3.67	500	700
Roman Catholics	80	0.0	-1.17	100	150
Independents	20	0.0	0.00	100	200
Hindus	230	0.1	2.10	500	1,000
Nonreligious	100	0.0	5.03	200	400
Baha'is	60	0.0	1.84	100	150
Total population	286,000	100.0	2.87	501,000	680,000

ented to the rising sun rather than to Mecca, a seeming remnant of the pre-Buddhist culture of the islands. The Buddhists subsequently built their temples on the same sights, and mosques eventually replaced the Buddhist temples. Due to the scarcity of building materials, no attempt to reorient the buildings occurred.

The Muslim community is centered on the Islamic Center and Grand Friday Mosque that dominates the skyline of Male, the capital city. Among the more than twenty other mosques in the city is Hukuru Miski, some four hundred years old and famed for the stone carvings it houses. Adjacent to this is the Tomb of Abul Barakaath, the island's Muslim pioneer.

In 1887 the sultan agreed that his land would become a British protectorate. Eventually a naval base was set up on one of the islands to protect the vital sea lanes in the region. The Maldives became independent in 1965. Three years later the sultan was forced out of office and a republic replaced his traditional rule. In 1982 the Maldives joined the British Commonwealth.

Islam is established as the state religion, and proselytizing by other religious groups (including other schools of Islam) is not allowed. There are a small number of members of the ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH and the BAHÁ'Í FAITH, consisting primarily of expatriates.

Sources:

- Maloney, C. People of the Maldivé Islands. Bombay: Orient Longman, 1980.
- Metz, Helen Chapin. Indian Ocean: Five Island Countries. Washington, DC: U.S. Government Printing Service, 1995.
- Yijima, H., ed. The Islamic History of the Maldivé Islands. 2 vols. Tokyo: Institute for the Study of Languages and Cultures of Asia and Africa, 1982, 1984.

Mali

Mali is a landlocked, primarily agricultural country in West Africa, south of the Sahara Desert, and home to the fabled city of Timbuktu. Settled in prehistoric times, the country is now home to a number of native peoples, the largest group being the Bambara. During the first millennium C.E.

Status of religions in Mali, 2000-2050

Followers	2000			2025	2050
	total	%	rate
Muslims	9,195,000	81.9	2.53	18,060,000	27,908,000
Ethnoreligionists	1,801,000	16.0	1.84	2,724,000	2,600,000
Christians	225,000	2.0	2.95	475,000	785,000
Roman Catholics	126,000	1.1	2.65	230,000	340,000
Protestants	82,000	0.7	3.35	200,000	350,000
Independents	16,300	0.2	3.46	42,000	90,000
Nonreligious	11,200	0.1	2.42	30,000	50,000
Baha'is	1,000	0.0	1.36	2,500	5,000
other religionists	690	0.0	1.36	3,000	5,000
Total population	11,234,000	100.0	2.42	21,295,000	31,353,000

a trans-Saharan trade route that linked West Africa with the Nile River valley passed through Mali, and during the fourteenth century the Mali Empire reached its peak of prosperity. It reached west to the Atlantic (into present-day Senegal and Guinea), north into Algeria, and eastward into what is now Nigeria and Benin. Timbuktu dominated the western end of the trans-African trade. As Mali rose to power, it developed ties to the Muslim world in the Middle East, and Islam and Islamic learning became the dominant cultural forces in the land. The university at Timbuktu rivaled those of western Europe in the Middle Ages and was an important force in spreading Islam throughout West Africa.

The decline of Mali began at the end of the fifteenth century. Important in this decline was the diversion of trade from the east to the Atlantic coast and the newly arrived Portuguese traders. As neighboring states grew strong, they took more and more land from Mali, a process that continued until the intervention of the French in the middle of the nineteenth century. In 1896, after rather brutal attempts to pacify the land, the French annexed Mali and in 1904 made it a part of French Sudan.

Muslim mosque in Djenne, one of the oldest cities in Africa (Corel)

Independence came in steps, with Mali becoming autonomous in 1958, part of the Sudanese Republic (with Senegal) in 1959, and fully independent in 1960. The new government, which appeared to have made a good start, was swept away by a coup in 1968 and Mali has since been plagued by political instability and poverty. The present parliamentary system is based upon that of France.

Although Islam has overwhelmed the religions of most of the native peoples in Mali, traditional faiths have remained strong among the Kagoro, Bobo, and Minianka peoples, and the beliefs and practices of the DOGON RELIGION have become well known, as they have entered into the Western New Age beliefs. Dogon beliefs include an origin myth that ties them to the star system Sirius, a tradition that appears to contain information about the nature of the system that was unknown to secular astronomy until recent decades.

Islam entered Mali as early as the tenth century, and Malian Muslims are primarily of the Sunni MALIKITE SCHOOL OF ISLAM. Islam is said to have been established during a drought in the middle of the eleventh century, when the ruler, Allakoi Keita, became a Muslim. Soon afterward the rain began to fall, and in gratitude to God, Keita decided to make pilgrimage to Mecca. Upon his return to his realm, he was named sultan. The TIJANIYYA SUFI ORDER moved into Mali, where they suffered a major schism, leading to the formation of the Hamaliyya Brotherhood, based in Nioro. By the end of the twentieth century, between 70 and 80 percent of the people were Muslim.

Christianity first reached Mali in 1895 with the arrival of the WHITE FATHERS, a Roman Catholic missionary order, soon followed by sisters of the affiliate order. They made slow progress, but in 1921 a vicariate was erected. The first African priest was ordained in 1936, followed by a slow process of building indigenous leadership. The first Malian bishop was consecrated in 1962, two years after Mali became an independent nation. The church has had its greatest success among the Bobo and Dogon peoples.

Protestantism entered the country in 1919 through representatives of the Gospel Missionary Union (GMU), an independent Evangelical sending agency founded in the United States in 1892. The CHRISTIAN AND MISSIONARY ALLIANCE arrived in 1923. The alliance has had the most success, and its efforts have led to the formation of the Église Chrétienne Évangélique du Mali (Evangelical Christian Church of Mali), now the largest of the Protestant bodies. The GMU mission has matured to become the Evangelical Protestant Church of Mali. A spectrum of churches, from the ASSEMBLIES OF GOD to the SEVENTH-DAY ADVENTIST CHURCH, has appeared, and the SEVENTH DAY BAPTIST GENERAL CONFERENCE has a small community.

Given the poverty of the land and the relative difficulty of travel, Mali has not attracted the spectrum of religions found in other countries. There is a small community of the BAHÁ'Í FAITH and, as is typical of former French colonies, members of the ANCIENT AND MYSTICAL ORDER ROSAE CRUCIS.

Sources:

Cardaire, M. L'Islam et le terrior africain. Bamako-Koulouba, Mali: IFAN, 1954.

Harmon, S. A. "The Expansion of Islam among the Bambara under French Rule, 1890–1940." Ph.D. dissertation, University of California at Los Angeles, 1988.

Status of Christianity Profile: Mali. Nairobi, Kenya: Daystar University College, 1988.

Malikite School of Islam

The Malikite School of Islam is one of the four madhhabs (schools) of jurisprudence deemed orthodox within the world of Sunni Islam. The school traces its origin to Medina (in present-day Saudi Arabia) and Malik ibn Anas al-Asbahi (713–795), a Yemenite who was born and raised in Medina. His major written work, Al-muwatta, was a collection of the Hadith (the sayings and action of the prophet Muhammad and his companions), which he arranged according to the legal subject to which they spoke. He also made frequent use of the phrase "and this is the rule with us," implying his continuing influence of the ulama (the totality of religious scholars) as it existed in Medina. Malik is remembered for opposing the Muslim rulers of his time (of the Umayyad Caliphate) who were asserting the right to make laws without reference to the Qur'an.

Among Malik's students were Muhammad ibn al-Hasan al-Shaybani (749–c. 804), later a distinguished scholar of the HANAFITE SCHOOL OF ISLAM and Muahmmad ibn Idris al-Shafii (767–820), the founder of the SHAFIITE SCHOOL OF ISLAM. His thought was carried forward by Yahda al Laythi (d.848), who preserved Al-muwatta for later generations, and Asad ibn al-Furat (d. 828), who compiled what is today the major text identified with the Malikite school, Al-mudawwanah. The school held early sway in that part of Arabia near the Red Sea, including Mecca. It also was picked up by pilgrims from North Africa and Spain who came to Arabia on the hajj (pilgrimage) to Mecca. North Africa had become separated from the early Arab Muslim Empire and was never integrated into the later Ottoman Empire, except for Egypt. Thus the Malikite school came to dominate across the Mediterranean coast from Libya to Morocco and to be the primary form of Islam that moved across the Sahara and began to penetrate sub-Saharan Africa including Mali, Senegal, Niger, and Nigeria. (The Shafiite school predominates in the Muslim community along the eastern coast of Africa).

As with the other Sunni legal schools, the Malikites emphasized the primary directives of submission to Allah (God) and the resulting obedience to the Shariah (Islamic law) to be the motivating foundation of their work. They also recognized the Qur'an and Sunnah, the collection of Hadith (the sayings and action of the prophet Muhammad and his companions), as basic texts for the development of a legal system. Malik paid special attention to the consensus of his teachers in Medina and their traditions have had a special authority as the modern consensus of Malikite scholarship has developed. Malik gave some room to the fourth authority for legal rulings in Islam, analogical reasoning (qiyas), but he gave a much more limited role compared to the Hanifites, primarily on issues not previously treated by the Medina scholars.

Much of the development of the Malikite school depended upon the ongoing process of assembling the Hadith and decisions about which were authentic and which were of dubious origin. Malik and especially his students were also influenced by the Traditionalist movement that developed in the eighth century, which insisted that the authority of tradition should rest upon authentic reports of sayings or actions of the Prophet Muhammad. The Traditionalist movement set issues around which the Malikite school developed while spurring scholarship on the Hadith.

Sources:

Coulson, Noel J. Conflicts and Tensions in Islamic Jurisprudence. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1969.

———. A History of Islamic Law. Edinburgh: Edinburgh University Press, 1994.

Hallaq, Wael B. A History of Islamic Legal Theories: An Introduction to Sunni Usul al-Fiqh. New York: Cambridge University Press, 1997.

Horrie, Chris, and Peter Chippindale. What Is Islam? London: Virgin Publishing, 1998.

Mansour, Mansour Hasan. The Maliki School of Law: Spread and Domination in North and West Africa, 8th–14th Centuries. San Francisco: Austin and Winfield, 1994.

Schacht, Joseph. An Introduction to Islamic Law. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1964.

Watt, Montgomery. The Majesty That Was Islam. New York: Praeger Publishers, 1974.

Malta

The Republic of Malta consists of five islands lying south of Sicily in the Mediterranean Sea. Two are uninhabited; of the three inhabited islands, Kemmuna is but three square kilometers (1.1 square miles) in area, and Gozo is sixty-seven square miles. The largest island, Malta, has been the constant target of various groups hoping to control the Mediterranean Basin politically, militarily, or economically. The present makeup of the Maltese people, with Phoenician, Italian, Arab, and English backgrounds, reflects the islands' varied past.

Though skipped by the basically land-based Arabs as they initially moved across North Africa, Malta came under their control in the ninth century. They held it for two centuries, until it was overrun by the Normans in 1090. The Spanish Kingdom of Aragon reached out for control in the fourteenth century. In the sixteenth century, the island was turned over to the Knights of Saint John of the Hospital (now the Knights of Malta), who guarded the island for the next three hundred years. In 1798 the French replaced the Knights of Malta but held it for only a short time, until the British were granted hegemony by the important decisions of the Congress of Vienna in 1815. For the next century, Malta was a key part of British dominance of the seaways.

In 1921 the British gave the Maltese a degree of autonomy. Revoked at the beginning of World War II, autonomy was restored in 1947. Independence was finally granted in 1964. Britain retained some responsibility for Malta for a decade, but in 1974, the Republic of Malta was proclaimed. The country has a parliamentary system of government.

With the coming of the Normans, the ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH became the dominant religion of Malta and has remained so to the present. Malta is justly proud of its Christian past, being mentioned in the New Testament as the place the apostle Paul resided for three months following his shipwreck as he journeyed to Rome. That event is celebrated on the island each February 10. In 451, a bishop from Malta attended the ecumenical council that gathered at Chalcedon.

The Catholic Church is the state religion of Malta, and Catholicism has broad popular support. At the time of independence the church also owned the majority of the island's real estate, a fact that has since then brought it into conflict with the government. In 1983 the government expropriated all the church's properties and secularized all

Status of religions in Malta, 2000-2050

Followers	2000			2025	2050
	total	%	rate
