The FRENCH TRANSLATION concerning the ensuing DISCOURSES.

MACHIAVEL has been so generally decried, on account of the little regard he is supposed to have shewn to Religion and Morality in his writings, that a good man perhaps might think himself in some danger of being corrupted if he should venture to read them. I confess I was long of that opinion myself, and therefore cannot well tell how to blame others for it. But after I had carefully perused them, and found sufficient reason to alter my sentiments in that matter; I thought many others might probably do the same, and that it would not be an unacceptable performance to several persons of worth and candour, who do not understand Italian, if I should furnish them with the means of reading Machiavel's works, by translating them into the vulgar tongue; that so they might have an opportunity not only of undeceiving, but even of profiting themselves by the many admirable maxims and instructions they will find in them. For indeed it is impossible that any one, who maturely considers them, should not be convinced of their excellence and utility, both in the management of State affairs, and in the common transactions of life; in one or other of which every man has some concern, and consequently will find his account in perusing these writings. I might add, for my own justification, that having duly examined the reasons, which have given rise to so unfavourable an opinion as hath been generally conceived of Machiavel, I find it has rather been owing to prejudice than any rational foundation: since he seems to have taken no greater liberties than several other Historians whose writings have never been objected to; and, whilst he is painting mankind in their true colours (which is a matter of great consequence to know) neither recommends their vices, or enormities, or wicked maxims, as rules of conduct and practice for the imitation of others, in opposition to Virtue and Morality. On the contrary, it is very observable in the course of this work, which chiefly treats of the foundation and government of States, that the first Principles he lays down for those purposes, are the fear of God, a love of unity and order, honest industry, a strict regard to justice, good military discipline, temperance, and other rules for the prevention or suppression of idleness and luxury.

If this be the case then, Machiavel's writings must be sadly tortured in order to extract that poison, which is supposed to lurk in them. Let any one read them however without prepossession, and interpret them fairly as he ought to do, by referring the several traits to their proper Characters, and applying the different Maxims to the Hypotheses he lays down, and I am persuaded he will soon divest himself of the prejudice he had conceived against him. But if, instead of that, he detaches some parts, and applies them to others, where they neither are nor can be applicable, if he puts a bad construction upon expressions which will naturally admit of a good one, if he makes it his business to carp only at the wicked examples that are quoted, the Author certainly is not in that case worthy of censure, but he that abuses him in such a manner: at this rate it might be reckoned dangerous to read any Historian: because there are none, in whose writings we may not find maxims both avowed and practised, that are at least as exceptionable as those imputed to our Author. A man must exclude himself from the world, if he would avoid meeting with bad examples, even amongst people in high places, and who pique themselves upon their devotion. Have we not seen authors, and those of great fame too, who have made no scruple of celebrating actions as holy, which another man of common sense only would have detested as the most perfidious and inhuman? Have we not known Princes, otherwise great and illustrious, who have declared in their edicts, that they were resolved to violate the privileges and immunities they had confirmed to their Subjects by the most solemn oaths and promises *? Nay, they have been so far from being ashamed of such an infamous manner of proceeding, that they have thought themselves worthy of all praise, and reckoned it amongst the most meritorious actions of their life. This astonishing depravation of the human heart is not^h indeed altogether a new thing, though it is in a manner peculiar to the latter ages of Christianity, to give flaming and magnificent titles to a Prince who would have been abhorred in the primitive times. What must any one think, if we were here to recite the reasons assigned for Canonizing Lewis IX. a Prince naturally inclined to be good, it must be confessed, but corrupted by the monks to such a degree, as to persecute the poor Albigenes in the most bloody and unmerciful manner? What shall we say of the splendid title of Holy Office, that is given to a Tribunal, the maxims and practice of which are sufficient to inspire any one with horror that only hears them related? It is certain that the very worst things we meet with in Machiavel are far from being at such variance with humanity and morality, as these holy matters, which so many weak people reverence, with a prejudice ten thousand times more dangerous than what can arise from the tenets of the Florentine Politician.

But somebody perhaps may say, whence then proceeds this general prepossession against an author, who, I maintain, has not transgressed the bounds of decency and moderation; whilst many others that have exceeded them are looked upon with a favourable eye; and even young people are allowed to read Tacitus, who in point of morality very often stands in need of correction: whereas the Holy Inquisition excommunicates all those that read Machiavel? To which I answer, that in this case his Accusers are his Judges: for he has touched upon the vices of Monks and other Priests in such a manner, that it is no wonder if they do not love him. Every one knows that these persons have the artifice to cover their own private interests under the veil of Religion, and fight their enemies with consecrated arms. Machiavel therefore with them is a Heretic, an abandoned, profligate, dangerous fellow, for daring to present the world with such a picture of the Holy Roman Church; which being founded only upon the prejudices of the multitude, will not suffer its Mysteries to be developed with impunity: it is making a cruel war upon it, thus to expose its secrets, and strip off the disguise of its Priests. But if one was to strike out all the passages in the writings of this great Politician which bear hard upon them; those very people, who are now his bitterest enemies, would then be the loudest in his praise. As the common Reader however is likely to be the most disinterested Judge, we shall leave the matter to his decision, without saying any thing further to bias his opinion in this cause. For the rest, Machiavel indeed sometimes lets himself loose upon the Ultramontanes. At the head of this work he treats the French and Germans as perfidious, rapacious Barbarians, &c. as if the Italians surpassed all other people in point of probity, generosity, and humanity. But he may appear in some measure pardonable even in this respect, when we consider the cruel treatment his country met with from those nations. Few people love their Conquerors; and for that reason, we may suppose, he speaks so harshly of Charles VIII. whom other Historians mention with great honour, considering him as a young Prince. But to speak truth, it seems as if the Italians, and particularly the Florentines, have no more reason than the Ultramontane Princes to boast of Sincerity, disinterestedness, or politeness in any of the quarrels they were ever engaged in with the latter. This, however, ought not to disgust any one, or deter him from reading so useful a work.

viii A D V E R T I S E M E N T, &c.

Every Author has his faults ; and Machiavel is not entirely exempt from them. The same may be said of what he relates concerning the ancient Gauls and their neighbours : since neither Cæsar nor Tacitus represent those Ultramontanes in so unfavourable a light as our Author has done.

COSIMO RUCELLAI.

IF the present I here send you, my dear friends, is not answerable to the obligations you have laid upon me, it is the best, however, I am able to offer you in my circumstances, as it contains all the political knowledge I have collected from much reading, and long experience in the affairs of the world. Your usual Candour, therefore, I am persuaded, will not suffer you to expect more than I am able to give; though, perhaps, you will find just cause to be disgusted at the poverty of my style, as well as at some errors of judgment, which I may

I may probably be guilty of in the course of my reasonings. Should that be the case, I cannot tell whether you will not be as blameable for urging me to undertake a task, which I should otherwise never have attempted, as I shall be for not executing it in a better manner. Accept it, however, I beseech you, like friends, who always consider the good intention of the giver, rather than the value of the gift; and believe me, when I assure you, it gives me a particular satisfaction to reflect, that how much soever I may have erred in other points, I have acted with judgment in inscribing these Discourses to you: for, as I am more obliged to you than any other persons in the world, it shews some gratitude for the favours I have received at your hands.

It is true, I deviate in this from the custom of most authors, who generally dedicate their works to some Prince, and, either out of ambition or avarice, basely extol him to the skies for the practice of every virtue, when perhaps his vices deserve the utmost detestation. But as I was determined to avoid all suspicion of flattery, I have made choice of persons to patronize my works, who, though not Princes in reality, yet highly deserve to be so, for their numberless good qualities; not of such as have it actually in their power to heap riches and honours upon me, but of those that I know would not fail to do it, if they were as able as they were willing. For to judge rightly of things, we certainly ought to shew a greater degree of esteem and regard for those that have it in their will, than for others that only have it in their power to be liberal; and to respect such as are worthy of a sovereignty, more than those that possess one without worth. Thus, Historians who praise Hiero the Syracusan, though but a private man, seem to make little account of Perfes the Macedonian, notwithstanding he was a Prince; because Hiero wanted nothing but a crown to make him a King, and Perfes had no other qualification to entitle him to that dignity. Vouchsafe, then,

then, my dear Friends, to accept this work (such as it is), since I undertook it at your own request; and if this part shall have the good fortune to meet with your approbation, I will proceed in it, according to my promise. Farewell.

AUTHOR'S INTRODUCTION.

WHEN I consider what veneration is shewn to Antiquity, how often it happens (to omit other instances) that an immense price is given by the curious for a fragment of an old statue, either to adorn their cabinets, or to serve as a model for statuaries to copy after in works of that kind; and what pains those artists take to come up to their pattern: on the other hand, when I observe that the great and illustrious examples of several ancient Kingdoms and Republics which are recorded in History, that the noble deeds of former Kings, Generals, Citizens, Legislators, and others, who have consecrated their labours to the service and glory of their country, are now rather admired than imitated, and indeed, so far from being followed by any one, that almost every body is indifferent about them to such a degree, that there seem to be hardly any traces left amongst us of the virtue of the Ancients, I cannot help being both surpris'd and concern'd at it; and so much the more, when I have taken notice, that in civil differences, as well as in the various maladies that are incident to mankind,

we always have recourse to such decisions and prescriptions as have been handed down to us from our Ancestors. For, in fact, the Civil Law is nothing more than a collection of determinations and decrees, that have been made by ancient Lawyers, which being now digested into due order and method, serve as precedents to direct our magistrates at this day in the distribution of justice. And what is the knowledge of Medicine, but the result of former experience delivered down from the Professors of it in old times; and by which our Physicians at present regulate their practice? But in forming a Republic, in supporting a State, in governing a Kingdom, in disciplining an Army, in conducting a War, in extending an Empire, there is now neither Prince, nor Republic, nor General, nor eminent Citizen, that seems to pay the least regard to the examples of Antiquity upon such occasions.—I cannot persuade myself, however, that this proceeds so much from the effeminacy which the modern way of education has introduced into the world, or yet from the disorder which an idle and luxurious manner of living has occasioned in many states and provinces in Christendom in particular, as from a want of being sufficiently conversant in History, or at least from an inattention to the precepts and example amples it lays before us : to which it is owing, that few people understand them, fewer still find any true relish or pleasure in reading them, and of those very few, perhaps here and there one, may be delighted for a while, with the recital of the many strange accidents and occurrences he meets with, but without any further thought or design of improving himself by them ; from an imagination that the great examples he there sees, are not only difficult, but impossible to be equalled : as if the stars had changed their course, and not only the Elements, but even mankind themselves, had lost their pristine vigour, and degenerated from what they were in former times.

Being desirous, therefore, to undeceive those that may possibly have fallen into this error, I thought the best method I could take for that purpose, would be to write such a comment upon those books of Livy's Roman History, which have been spared us by the malevolence of time, as might best conduce to make them clearly understood, and most profitable to the reader, by exhibiting to view the course of ancient and modern times and circumstances ; that so they may reap that advantage from these Discourses, which ought to be the true and only end of reading History. And though indeed this is an arduous under-

undertaking, yet with the assistance of those that encouraged me to embark in it, I am not altogether without hope that I shall be able to acquit myself in such a manner, as may, in some measure, answer the end proposed.

DISCOURSES

*Concerning the Origin of Cities in general, and that of

WHOEVER examines the Origin of the City of Rome, in what manner, and by what laws it was governed, will find no great reason to wonder that it preserved its virtue for so many ages, and that it afterwards acquired so vast a dominion. As I intend therefore to say something of its Origin in the first place, I must premise that all Cities are founded either by natives of the Country where they are situated, or by foreigners. The first happens when the inhabitants, being dispersed or separated into little communities, cannot live in security: as no one of them of itself would be able to make a sufficient defence, if it should be assaulted by an enemy; nor would it have time in case of a sudden attack to unite with others for that purpose. But supposing that could be effected, they must still be obliged to abandon don many of their habitations and possessions to the mercy of the Enemy: to avoid such dangers, they commonly agree at last either of their own accord, or by the advice of some person of the greatest authority amongst them, to unite and live together in some one place chosen by general consent, where they may mutually furnish each other with the necessaries and conveniences of life, and make better provision for their common safety. In this manner, Athens and Venice, amongst many others, were founded at first; the former under the authority of Theseus, and by people who before had been scattered and dispersed at a distance from each other; the latter by such as had fled into certain little Isles at the extremity of the Adriatic, (to avoid the miseries which were daily occasioned in Italy, by the continual irruption of Barbarians after the declension of the Roman empire) where they lived together under no particular governor, though they agreed to observe certain laws which seemed absolutely necessary for their future support and establishment. And in this they succeeded so well from the long repose they enjoyed in that situation, (being separated from the continent, and not liable to be annoyed by an Enemy who had no ships to invade them) that from this small beginning they at last arrived at that prodigious degree of power and grandeur in which we see the Venetians at present*.

In the second case, that is, when a City is founded by foreigners, it is done either by such as are entirely free, or dependent on others; as by Colonies, for instance, which are sent out by some Prince or Commonwealth, either to disburden their own territories when they are too full of inhabitants, or to keep possession at little or no expence of some Country they have newly conquered, (many of which the Romans planted in every part of their Empire) or perhaps by some Prince, not with any design to reside

* This was written when that Commonwealth was in the Zenith of its glory, and before it was humbled by the famous League of Cambray. It is now in very different circumstances. See the History of Florence, Book I.

there himself, but for his glory and reputation, as Alexandria was built by Alexander the Great. But these Cities, not being free in their Original, seldom attain to that degree of eminence as to become Capitals of Kingdoms or Empires. Of this kind was Florence, which (whether built by the Soldiers of Sylla, or perhaps by the inhabitants of the mountains about Fiesole*, who, being encouraged by the long peace which the world enjoyed under the reign of Augustus, left their fastnesses, and came to live upon the banks of the Arno) was certainly founded under the Roman Empire, and therefore could never raise itself from such a beginning to any greater height, than its Sovereign was pleased to allow of.

The founders of Cities may be said to be free, when a people either quit their native country voluntarily, or are forced out of it by pestilence, famine, or war, to seek new habitations under the conduct of some Prince or other leaders of their own. And these must either inhabit such Cities as they find ready built in the country they get possession of, as Moses did; or they must build new ones like Æneas. In the latter case, the Conductor of the undertaking has the greater opportunity of displaying his abilities; on which the future good or bad fortune of the City chiefly depends: and those abilities are distinguishable principally in two points: first in the choice of a convenient situation, and next in making good laws. Now since some men betake themselves to labour through mere necessity, and others only by choice, and it always happens that there is more virtue in those countries where labour cannot possibly be dispensed with, than in others where there is more room for choice, it seems worthy of consideration whether it is not the best way to build in a barren country; that so, when men are obliged to work hard and cannot afford to be idle, they may live more united; for the poverty of a country is seldom the occasion of dissensions: in proof of which, we might alledge if necessary the concord of the Ragusans, as well as of the inhabitants of some other cities that have been built in such situations. And without doubt such a choice would be both a very prudent and advantageous one, if men could be content with their own, and not covet the possessions of others. But since the depravity of human nature is such, that it is impossible for any one to live in security, unless he fortifies himself with power, it is better to build in a fertile country, where plenty of all things will make the inhabitants increase, and enable them not only to defend themselves against any attack, but to humble those that should dare to oppose their rising fortune. As for the idleness which such abundance may occasion, it may be prevented by proper laws, according to the example of several wise Legislators, who, having lived in such pleasant and fruitful countries as naturally incline men to be lazy and unfit for honest industry, have always obviated the inconveniencies which otherwise must have happened, by laying those citizens who were designed for Soldiers, under a necessity of using hard labour and exercise, which rendered them better Soldiers than those who had been bred up in rough and barren countries. Of this, the Kingdom of Egypt may serve for an example; which, though one of the most delightful countries in the World, availed itself however of wise laws and restrictions in such a manner, that it produced many brave and excellent men, whose actions, if the memory of them had not been almost extinguished by time, would have been more extolled than those of Alexander the Great, and several others which are still held in so much admiration*. For whoever considers the Government of the Soldans, the discipline of the Mamalucs and the rest of their Soldiery, before they were conquered by Selim the Grand Turk,

* *Vixere fortes ante Agamemnona

will find many admirable regulations with regard to their forces; from whence it may easily be perceived how apprehensive they were of their being enervated by that idleness to which the benignity of the climate must naturally have inclined them, if it had not been guarded against by the strictest injunctions of due exercise and labour.

I say therefore, it is the most prudent way to make choice of a fertile situation, provided proper care be taken to obviate the evils by salutary laws, which otherwise luxury and abundance may probably occasion. When Alexander the Great intended to found a City to perpetuate his name, Dinocrates an Architect advised him to build it upon Mount Athos, which would not only be very strong, but might be reduced into the shape of a man; a circumstance that could not fail of being much admired, and must contribute greatly to his glory. But the King asking how the inhabitants were to be furnished with provisions, he confessed he had not thought of that*, at which Alexander could not help laughing very heartily, and leaving the mountain as it was, he built Alexandria, where he knew people would be glad to live on account of the richness of the Soil, as well as the advantages they might reap from the vicinity of the Sea and the river Nile.

If then we consider the Origin of Rome, and admit it to have been founded by Æneas, it must be numbered amongst those cities that have been built by foreigners; but if the foundation of it is to be ascribed to Romulus, it may be looked upon as built by the natives of the country in which it stands. In either case we shall find that it was free in the beginning and independent on any one. It will likewise appear (as we shall shew hereafter) that the inhabitants were laid under such severe restrictions in several respects, by the laws which were made by Romulus, Numa, and others, that neither the fertility of the country, the conveniency of the Sea, the frequent and signal victories they gained, nor the greatness of their Empire, were able to corrupt them for many ages: on the contrary, they maintained their virtue with such inflexible rigour, as there are few or no examples of in any other Common-wealth. And since the great exploits performed under that Government both at home and abroad, which are recorded by Livy, were conducted either by public or private Councils, I shall begin my Discourses with what seems most worthy of observation in their civil and domestic affairs, and the consequences attendant thereon, with which, the first book, or rather the first part of this work will conclude.

C H A P. II.

Concerning the different sorts of Government, and especially that of Rome.

OMITTING all mention at present of such Cities as were dependent in their first foundation, I shall speak of those only that were originally free, and conducted themselves as they thought fit, either in a Republican or a Monarchical form of Government, and these, as their plan and origin were different, had likewise different laws and constitutions. Some of them had laws delivered to them by one person at the first, or at least very soon after their foundation; as the Spartans received theirs immediately from Lycurgus: others had their laws given them at different times, according to the several accidents and exigencies that happened; which was the case of Rome. That State, therefore, may justly be deemed fortunate, which falls into the hands of a wise man, who makes such laws at first, as want no amendment or new-modelling afterwards, but are sufficient of themselves to secure and protect those that live under them; as it happened to the Spartans, whose laws were so excellent that they were inviolably observed observed for above eight hundred years, without occasioning any murmurs or commotions of consequence. On the other hand, that State, must be in some measure unhappy, which, for want of prudence and foresight in the Legislators at first, is reduced to the necessity of reforming and altering its laws upon sudden emergencies: still more unhappy when its laws are of such a nature, that instead of conducing to promote the true ends of government, they have a quite different tendency; for in that case, there is hardly any possibility of reforming it. As to others which are established upon good principles at first, and capable of improvement, if they are not altogether perfect, they may become more and more so in time by divers accidents and occurrences, though perhaps not without some dangerous shocks and concussions; for men are naturally averse to any innovation or change in their customs and laws, except they are convinced there is an absolute necessity for it: and as this necessity must be occasioned by some impending danger, the State may be subverted, before the remedy can have its effect. Of this we have sufficient proofs in what has happened to the Republic of Florence, at various times, and upon different occasions: particularly upon the commotions that happened at Arozzo and Prato; the former of which produced a new reformation in the State, and the latter great confusion.

But as I propose to treat more particularly of the laws and constitution of the Roman Republic, and shew what accidents contributed to bring it to perfection, I must observe in the first place, that according to some authors, there are but three sorts of government, viz. Monarchy or Principality, Aristocracy, and Democracy; and that those who intend to erect a new State, must have recourse to some one of these which he likes best. Others (and with more judgment, as many think) say there are Six sorts; three of which are very bad, and the other three good in themselves, but liable to be so corrupted that they may become the worst. The three good sorts have been just now mentioned; the other three proceed from these, and every one of them bears such a resemblance to that on which it respectively depends, that the transition from one to the other is short and easy: for Monarchy often degenerates into Tyranny, Aristocracy into Oligarchy, and Democracy into licentious Anarchy and confusion. So that whoever sets up any one of the former three kinds of Government, may assure himself it will not be of any long duration; for no precaution will be sufficient to prevent its falling into the other that is analogous to it, on account of the affinity which there seems to be in this case betwixt virtue and vice, perfection and imperfection.

This variety of Governments amongst mankind, appears to have been the effect of chance: for in the beginning of the World, the inhabitants being few, they some time lived separate from each other like beasts; but afterwards as they multiplied, they began to unite for their mutual defence, and put themselves under the protection of such as were most eminent amongst them for courage and strength, whom they engaged to obey and to acknowledge as their chiefs*. Hence arose the distinction betwixt honest and dishonest, just and unjust: for when any one injured his benefactor, his ingratitude excited a sort of fellow-feeling and indignation in others, as well as kindness and respect for those that behaved differently: and as they considered that they might some time or other perhaps be treated in the same manner themselves, if proper measures were not taken to prevent it, they thought fit to make laws for the reward of good men,

* Cum proreperunt primis animalia terris,
Mutum & turpe pecus, glandem atque cubilia propter,
Pugnabant armis, quæ post fabricaverat usus;
Donec verba, quibus voces sensusque notarent,

Ne quis fur esset, neu latro, neu quis adulter.

Hor. Satir. lib I. iii.

and the punishment of offenders. This first gave rise to justice in the world *; and from this consideration it came to pass in process of time, that in the election of a new Chief, they had not so much regard to courage and bodily strength as to wisdom and integrity. But afterwards, as this kind of government became gradually hereditary instead of elective, the heirs of these Chieftains soon began to degenerate from the virtue of their Ancestors, and to behave themselves as if they thought the main duty of a Prince consisted in surpassing all other men in luxury, extravagance, effeminacy, and every sort of voluptuousness; by which in a while, they first grew odious to their Subjects, and then so jealous for themselves, that they were forced to distress and cut off others for their own security, and at last to become downright Tyrants. This first occasioned combinations and conspiracies for the destruction of Princes; not amongst the weak and pusillanimous part of their subjects, but amongst such as being more eminent for their generosity, magnanimity, riches, and birth, could not endure any longer to submit to these pitiful and oppressive Governors.

The multitude therefore, swayed by the authority of the Nobles, rose in arms against their Prince, and being freed from his yoke, transferred their allegiance to their deliverers, who being thoroughly disgusted at Monarchy, changed the form of Government, and and took it into their own hands. After which they conducted both themselves and the State, according to the plan they had formed, preferring the common good to any particular advantage, and behaving in private as well as public affairs with assiduity and moderation, whilst the remembrances of their past sufferings continued fresh upon their minds. But this authority afterwards devolving upon their Sons, who had not seen these changes, nor experienced the miseries of tyranny, they began to grow so dissatisfied with that sort of civil equality, that they cast off all restraint, and giving themselves up to rapine, ambition, and lust, soon changed the government again from Aristocracy into an Oligarchy. Their administration however becoming as insupportable in a while as the tyranny of the other had formerly been, the people naturally began to look out for some deliverer; and having fixed upon a leader, they put themselves under his banners, and abolished Oligarchy. But when they had done this, and came to reflect upon the oppressions they sustained under a Tyrant, they resolved never to be governed again by any one man; and therefore agreed to set up a popular Government, which was constituted in such a manner, that the chief authority was not vested either in a Prince or in a Junto of the Nobility. ¶ Now as all new establishments are held in some degree of reverence and veneration at first, this form subsisted for some time; though no longer than those people lived who had been the founders of it: for after their death, their descendants degenerated into licentiousness, and such a contempt of all authority and distinction, that every man living after his own caprice, there was nothing to be seen but confusion and violence; so that either by the advice of some good and respectable man, or compelled by the absolute necessity of providing a remedy for these disorders and enormities, they at last determine once more to submit to the dominion of one: from which state they fell again in time through the same gradations, and from the abovementioned causes, into misrule and licentiousness. ¶ Such is the rotation to which all States are subject; nevertheless they cannot often revert to the same kind of Government, because it is not possible that they should so long exist as to undergo many of these mutations; for it frequently happens that when a State is labouring under such convulsions, and is destitute both of strength and counsel, it falls a prey to some other neighbouring community or nation that is better governed; otherwise it might pass through the several abovementioned revolutions again and again to infinity.

* —Utilitas justi prope mater & æqui. Hor. Satir. lib. I. iii.

(All these sorts of government then, in my opinion, are infirm and insecure; the three former from the usual shortness of their duration, and the three latter from the malignity of their own principles. The wisest Legislators therefore being aware of these defects, never established any one of them in particular, but contrived another that partakes of them all, consisting of a Prince, Lords, and Commons, which they looked upon as more firm and stable, because every one of these members would be a check upon the other: and of those Legislators, Lycurgus certainly merits the highest praise, who constituted an establishment of this kind at Sparta, which lasted above eight hundred years, to his own great honour as well as the tranquility of the Citizens. R Very different was the fate of the Government established by Solon at Athens, which, being a simple Democracy only, was of so short a continuance, that it gave way to the tyranny of Pisistratus before the death of the Legislator: and though indeed the heirs of that Tyrant were expelled about forty years after, and the Athenians not only recovered their liberty, but re-established Solon's laws and plan of government, yet they did not maintain it above a hundred years, notwithstanding they made several new regulations to restrain the insolence of the Nobles, and the licentiousness of the Commons; the necessity of which Solon had not foreseen: so that for want of tempering his Democracy with a share of Aristocracy and princely power, it was of short duration in comparison of the constitution of Sparta.

But to return to Rome. Though that City had not a Lycurgus to model its constitution at first, in such a manner as might preserve its liberty for a long course of time; yet so many were the accidents which happened in the contests betwixt the Patricians and the Plebeians, that chance effected what the Law-giver had not provided for. So that if it was not perfect at the beginning, it became so after a while; for though the first laws were deficient, yet they were neither incapable of amendment, nor repugnant to its future perfection: since not only Romulus but all the rest of the Kings that succeeded him made several good alterations in them, and such as were well calculated for the support of liberty. But as it was their intention to found a Monarchy and not a Republic, when that City had shaken off the yoke of a Tyrant, there seemed to be many provisions still wanting for the further maintenance of its freedom. And notwithstanding tyranny was at last eradicated by the ways and means abovementioned, yet those who had chiefly contributed to it, created two Consuls to supply the place of Royalty; by which it came to pass that the name alone, and not the authority of Princes, was extinguished. So that the Supreme power being lodged only in the Consuls and Senate, the Government consisted of no more than two of the three Estates which we have spoken of before, that is, of Royalty and Aristocracy. It remained therefore still necessary to admit the people into some share of the Government; and the Patricians growing so insolent in time (as I shall shew hereafter) that the Plebeians could no longer endure it, the latter took arms, and obliged them to relinquish part of their authority, lest they should lose the whole; on the other hand, the Consuls and Senators still retained so much power in the Common-wealth, as enabled them to support their rank with dignity and honour. This struggle gave birth to certain Officers called Tribunes of the People; after the creation of whom that State became more firm and compact, every one of the three degrees abovementioned having its proper share in the Government; and so propitious was fortune to it, that although it was changed from a Monarchy into an Aristocracy, and afterwards into a Democracy, by the steps and for the reasons already assigned, yet the Royal power was never entirely abolished and given to the Patricians, nor that of the Patricians wholly to the Plebeians; on the contrary, the authority of the three Estates being duly proportioned and mixed together, gave it the highest degree of perfection that any Common-wealth is capable of attaining to; and this was owing in a great measure, if not altogether, to the dissensions that happened betwixt the Patricians and the Plebeians, as shall be shewn more at large in the following Chapters.

C H A P. III.

To what accidents it was owing that the Tribunes of the People were created at Rome; and how they contributed to make that Common-wealth more perfect.

THOSE that have written upon Civil Government, lay it down as a first Principle, and all Historians demonstrate the same, that whoever would found a state, and make proper laws for the government of it, must presuppose that all men are bad by nature*, and that they will not fail to shew that natural depravity of heart, whenever they have a fair opportunity, and though it may possibly lie concealed for a while, on account of some secret reason which does not then appear to men of small experience; yet Time, (which is therefore justly called the Father of truth) commonly brings it to light in the end. After the expulsion of the Tarquins at Rome, there seemed to be a perfect harmony betwixt the Patricians and Plebeians; the former having laid aside their usual arrogance, and assumed an appearance of familiarity and affability even towards the lowest of the people. The reasons of this were not discovered whilst the Tarquins lived; for the Patricians being still afraid of them, were likewise apprehensive that if they should oppress the people, they might be tempted to call in that family again; and this was the true cause of their seeming moderation. But as soon as the Tarquins were dead, and the Patricians delivered from those apprehensions, they began to vent that malice upon the Plebeians which they had so long concealed, and to treat them in the most insolent and injurious manner, which may serve as a sufficient proof of what I have just said, that men are never good but through necessity; on the contrary, when good and evil are left to their choice, and they can practise the latter with impunity, they will not fail to throw every thing into disorder and confusion. Hence arises the common observation, that hunger and poverty may make people industrious, but laws only can make them good: for if men were so of themselves, there would be no occasion for laws, but as the case is far otherwise, they are absolutely necessary.

* This seems a harsh supposition. But does not every Christian almost daily justify the truth of it, by confessing it before God and the World; and are we not expressly told the same in several passages of the Holy Scriptures, and in all Systems of human Philosophy.

After the Tarquins were dead, who had been such a check upon the Nobility, some other expedient seemed wanting that might have the same effect; so that after much confusion and disorder, and many dangerous contests betwixt the Patricians and Plebeians, certain Officers, called Tribunes, were created for the security of the latter: who, being vested with such privileges and authority as enabled them to become Arbiters betwixt those two Estates, effectually curbed the intolence of the former.

C H A P. IV.

The dissensions betwixt the Patricians and Plebeians made the Roman Common-wealth more powerful and free.

I Must here say something of the contests that happened at Rome betwixt the death of the Tarquins and the creation of the Tribunes, and afterwards endeavour to refute the opinion of those who assert, that the Roman Republic was so subject to tumult, sedition, sedition, and confusion, that if its good fortune and military virtue had not over balanced these defects, it would have been much inferior to any other. It must be owned indeed, that both fortune and valour did not a little contribute to the aggrandizement of that Empire: but it seems to me as if these people did not consider, that where there are good Soldiers there must be good order and discipline, which is likewise generally attended with good fortune.

But to descend to some other particulars relating to that City. I say those that cavil at the dissensions betwixt the Patricians and Plebeians, cavil at the very causes which in my opinion contributed most to its liberty; for whilst they object to them as the sources of tumult and confusion, they do not consider the good effects they produced; seeming either to forget, or never to have known, that in all Commonwealths, the views and disposition of the Nobility and Commonalty must of necessity be very widely if not totally different: and that all the laws which are made in favour of liberty, have been owing to the differences betwixt them, as might easily be demonstrated from what happened at Rome; for from the time of the Tarquins to that of the Gracchi, which was a period of above three hundred years, the contests that arose were very seldom attended with the banishment, and still seldomer with the execution of any of the Citizens.

There is no reason then to look upon those humours as noxious, nor that Republic as disunited, in which during so long a space, and so many struggles, not above eight or ten people were sent into Exile, very few put to death, and not many punished with pecuniary fines on account of those commotions; nor can it with any justice be called a disordered or ill governed State, where there were so many examples of every kind of virtue; since good examples proceeded from good education, and good education from good laws, and those laws from those dissensions which many so inconsiderately condemn. For whoever will look into the consequences of them, will find that they seldom occasioned banishment or any other violence that was detrimental to the public good; but laws, on the contrary, that were highly conducive to the preservation of their common liberties. If any one however should object, that it must be a strange and horrible sight to see not only the Commonalty in an uproar against the Nobility, and the Nobility against the Commonalty, and both of them running through the streets in a tumultuous manner; but tradesmen shutting up their shops, and all sorts of people flying by droves out of the City; a Spectacle, as they imagine, that must frighten any person that beheld, and even those that read of it: I answer, that every State ought to have proper means in its hands to gratify the demands of the people, especially those States that are obliged to have recourse to the Commonalty for their assistance upon any exigency: and as the Roman Republic was such, whenever the people wanted to have a new law made, they either raised a tumult or refused to enlist themselves as Soldiers in time of war, till they had obtained some sort of Satisfaction. And it seldom happens that the demands of a free people are either unreasonable or prejudicial to liberty, as they commonly proceed either from actual oppression, or the dread of it; but if that apprehension should prove groundless, it is no difficult matter to pacify them by a public conference, where they are always ready to listen to any man of worth and authority that shall think fit to harangue them: for though the people may sometimes be in an error, as Tully says, they are open to better information, and soon convinced, when a person of whose veracity and integrity they have a good opinion, undertakes to shew them their mistake.

We should not therefore be too forward in censuring the constitution of the Roman Republic; especially when we consider that the vast things which it accomplished must be owing to proportionable causes; and that if the dissensions that happened in it occasioned sioned the creation of Tribunes, they were rather of advantage than otherwise : for they not only procur'd the people a share in the administration of Government, but were the Guardians and Conservators of the public liberty, as I shall shew in the next Chapter *.

C H A P.

* “ Montesquieu hath often given it as his opinion, says the Author of the Estimate of the Manners and Principles of the Times, Vol. II. Sect. xii. That Factions are not only natural but necessary to “ free Governments.” This opinion, however, is in some sense erroneous, because too general. The Author borrowed it with many other important observations in his book from Machiavel’s Discourses upon Livy. But in justice to the Florentine, we must observe that he limits the observation to the times in which public Spirit was predominant : whereas the other extends it to later periods, when selfish Ambition had quenched the love of one’s country ; and hence arose his error. As these two Authors, in the writer’s opinion, possess the highest station in the political scale, it may be worth while to give a comparative sketch of their different characters. Machiavel, born and bred in tumultuous and profligate times, and occupied in the affairs of a distempered Republic, caught his first principles from what he saw. Montesquieu, more happy in his birth and fortune, enjoying an early leisure in a quiet and well regulated Monarchy, drew his first principles of Politics from what he read. Yet neither was the former given up to mere personal observation, nor the latter to mere study : in the progress of life, Machiavel applied himself to books, and Montesquieu to men ; yet, as was natural, their first habits prevailed, and gave to each his distinct and peculiar character. Hence, though both saw the internal and secret pangs of Government, (which, in my opinion, no writer but these two did ever fully comprehend or penetrate) yet they saw them by different lights, and through different mediums. Machiavel’s leading guide was Fact ; Montesquieu’s was Philosophy. In consequence of this, Simplicity forms the Character of one, Refinement that of the other. The Speculative Frenchman forms a fine system ; to the completion of which, he sometimes tortures both Argument and Fact ; the plain and downright Florentine builds on Facts, independent on all Systems. The polite and disinterested Sage is warm in the praise of Honesty : the active and penetrating Secretary, above praise or censure, gives a bold and striking picture of the ways of men. Hence, whilst the first gains every heart by the force of moral Sympathy, the latter hath been unjustly detested, as the Enemy of Virtue and Mankind. Machiavel is negligent, yet pure and strong, scorning the minuter graces of composition ; Montesquieu is elegant, yet nervous ; and to the acuteness of the Philosopher, often adds the fire of the Poet. Both were the friends of freedom and mankind ; both superior to the Genius of their time and country ; both truly great : the Florentine severe and great ; the Frenchman great and amiable.

Before we can determine therefore, whether the Factions that divide a free country be salutary or dangerous, it is necessary to know what is their foundation and object. If they arise from freedom of opinion and aim at the public welfare, they are salutary : but if their source be self-interest of what kind soever, then they are dangerous and de-

C H A P. V.

Whether it is safer to trust the guardianship of Liberty in the hands of the Nobility or the Commonalty: and whether those that only desire to maintain what they have, or those that want to usurp more, are the most likely to excite commotions in a State.

THE wisest Legislators have always made it their principal care to provide a barrier for the liberty of the States they have founded; and according as that has been well or ill secured, the freedom of those States has been of longer or shorter duration; and, as there must of necessity, be both Grandees and Commoners in every Republic, it has been a matter of doubt, in which of those two orders, it would be most proper to vest that charge. The Spartans formerly, and the Venetians lately, committed it to the Nobility; but the Romans thought fit to lodge it in the hands of the Commonalty. Let us examine then, which of these Republics made the wiser choice.

fructive. I cannot give a better comment on this truth, than in the words of Lord Bolingbroke: "As long, says he, as the Spirit of Liberty prevailed, a Roman sacrificed his own, and therefore no doubt, every other personal interest, to the interest of the Common-wealth: when the latter (that is, the Spirit of Faction) succeeded, the interest of the Common-wealth was considered no otherwise, than in subordination to that particular interest which each person had espoused. The principal men, instead of making their grandeur and glory consist, as they formerly had done, in that which the grandeur and liberty of the Common wealth reflected on them, considered themselves now as Individuals, not as Citizens; and each would shine with his own light. To this purpose alone they employed the Commands they had of armies, the Government of Provinces, and the influence they acquired over the Tribes (or different Classes of people) at Rome, and over the Allies and Subjects of the Republic. Upon principles of the same kind, inferior people attached themselves to them; and that zeal and industry, nay that courage and magnanimity, which had been formerly exerted in the service of the Common-wealth, were exerted by the Spirit of Faction, for Marius or Sylla, for Cæsar or Pompey."

Now,

Now, if we weigh their respective motives for acting in this manner, we shall find that very powerful reasons may be assigned on each side of the question; but, if we consider the duration of those States, we must declare in favour of the former; as the liberties of Sparta and Venice were of longer continuance, than those of Rome. To come to their several motives then; and, in the first place, to what may be urged in behalf of the Romans.—It may be said, that the guardianship of Liberty ought always to be lodged in the hands of such as are least desirous to encroach upon the rights of others; and that if we reflect upon the different views and passions of Nobles and Commoners, we shall always find a lust of power and dominion in the former; whilst the latter seldom aspire to any thing further than to defend themselves from oppression; and consequently, as they have no ambition to rule, they must be truer friends to liberty than the Nobles; so that, when the people are entrusted with the conservation of liberty, it is reasonable to suppose, they will be most zealous in its support; and that, as they do not desire to violate it themselves, they will take care to prevent others from so doing. On the other hand, the Advocates for the Spartan and Venetian establishments may alledge, that two very good ends are answered, by committing the care of the public liberty to the Nobility: for, in the first place, it satiates the ambition of those, who by that means, will have the chief authority in the Common-wealth, and leaves them no pretence to be discontented: and, in the next, by taking that power from the restless multitude, it deprives them of the opportunity of raising tumults and seditious commotions in the State, which often drive the Nobility to despair, and always are attended with the most pernicious consequences. In confirmation of this, they produce the Republic of Rome itself for an example; where the Tribunes of the people having got the power into their hands, were not content with one Plebeian Consul, but insisted that both of them should be chosen out of that order; after which, they likewise seized upon the Censorship, the Prætorship, and all the other great offices in the Common-wealth. But not satisfied with this, they proceeded with the same degree of licentiousness, to encourage certain bold and popular men, to thwart and insult the nobility; which in time gave rise to the domination of Marius, and at last proved the ruin of that Common-wealth.

It must be confessed, therefore, that after maturely considering both sides of the question, it still seems a doubtful point, in what hands one ought to trust the guardianship of Liberty; since it is no easy matter to determine, whether those that only desire to support themselves in the possession of what they already have, or those that want to usurp more, are the most dangerous sort of people in a Republic. But to come to some conclusion upon the whole; if the State in question be designed to extend its dominion, and become a large Empire, as Rome did; the conduct of the Romans must be closely copied in every thing; but, if it is such a one as desires nothing more than to maintain its own, it will be sufficient to imitate the example of the Spartans and Venetians; in such a manner, and for such reasons, as shall be given in the next Chapter.

Let us now discuss the other part of the question, viz. whether those that are afraid of losing what they have, or those that grasp at more, are the most dangerous sort of people in a Common-wealth. Marcus Menenius being made Dictator, and Marcus Fulvius, General of the Horse (both Plebeians), to quell a conspiracy which had been formed at Capua, were likewise vested with a power of inquiring into the conduct of such citizens at home, as had been guilty of bribery, or any sort of undue means, to obtain the Consulship and other honours in the Government. But the Nobles apprehending this enquiry was chiefly levelled at them, gave out, that it was not the Nobility that had been guilty of such practices, but the Commonalty, who having neither virtue nor birth to entitle them to honours, were obliged to have recourse to those mean artifices, of which they accused the Dictator in particular, with such virulence, that after he had made a speech in public, in which he complained of the aspersions that had been thrown upon him by the Nobles, he laid down the Dictatorship, and submitted to be tried by the people, who acquitted him. But in the course of this trial, it was warmly debated, which of the two were the most dangerous persons, those that contented themselves with defending what they had, or those that wanted to usurp more: as too obstinate a manner of proceeding in either, might excite great disturbances and commotions *. Such evils, however, are most frequently

* “ I look upon it as a peculiar happiness, says an excellent Modern

 “ that I am actuated by prejudice, I am sure it is an honest prejudice;
 “ it is a prejudice that arises from the love of my Country, and there-“ appears to me the most reasonable, which is most conformable to the “ quality that we find in human nature, provided it be consistent with “ public peace and tranquillity. This is what may properly be called “ Liberty, which exempts one man from subjection to another, so far “ as the order and oeconomy of government will permit. Liberty “ should reach every Individual of a People, as they all share one com“ mon nature: if it only spreads among particular branches, there “ had better be none at all; since such a Liberty only aggravates the “ misfortune of those that are deprived of it, by setting before them

 “ a disagreeable subject of comparison. This Liberty is best preserv“ ed, where the Legislative Power is lodged in several Persons, espe“ cially if those Persons are of different ranks and interests; for where “ they are of the same rank, and consequently have an interest to ma“ nage peculiar to that rank, it differs but little from a despotic Go“ vernment in a single Person. But the greatest security a People can “ have for their Liberty, is when the Legislative Power is in the hands

“ more confusion. I could never read a passage in Polybius, and another in Cicero, to this purpose, without a secret pleasure in applying it to the English Constitution, which it suits much better than the Roman. Both these great authors give the pre-eminence to a mixed Government, consisting of three branches, the Regal, the Noble, and the Popular. They had doubtless in their thoughts the Constitution of the Roman Commonwealth, in which, the Consul represented the King, the Senate the Nobles, and the Tribunes the People. This division of the three Powers in the Roman Constitution was by no means so distinct and natural, as it is in the English form of Government. Amongst several objections that might be made to it, I think the chief are those that affect the Consular Power, which had only the ornaments, without the force of the Regal authority. The Number had not a casting voice in it; for which reason, if one did not chance to be employed abroad, whilst the other sat at home, public business was sometimes at a stand, whilst the Consuls pulled two different ways in it. Besides, I do not find that the Consuls ever had a negative voice in passing a Law, or Decree of the Senate; so that indeed they were rather the chief body of the Nobility, or first Ministers of the State, than a distinct branch of the Sovereignty; in which none can be looked upon as a part, who are not a part of the Legislature. Had the Consuls been invested with the Regal authority to as great a degree as our Monarchs, there would never have been any occasion for a Dictatorship, which had in it the Power of all the three Orders, and ended in the subversion of the whole Constitution.

“ Such a History as that of Suetonius, which gives us a Succession of absolute Princes, is an unanswerable argument against despotic power. Where the Prince is a man of wisdom and virtue, it is indeed happy for his people, that he is absolute; but since, in the common run of mankind, for one that is wise and good, you find ten of a contrary character, it is very dangerous for a nation to stand to its chance, or to have its public happiness or misery depend upon the virtues and vices of a single person. Look into the history I have mentioned, or into any series of absolute Princes, how many tyrants you must read through, before you come to an Emperor that is supportable! But this is not all; an honest private man, often grows cruel and abandoned, when converted into an absolute Prince. Give a man power of doing what he pleases with impunity, you extinguish his fear, and consequently overturn in him one of the great pillars of Morality. This too we find confirmed by matter of fact; how many hopeful heirs apparent to great Empires have become such monsters of lust and cruelty, as are a reproach to human nature, when in possession of them?

“ Some tell us, we ought to make our Governments on earth like that in Heaven, which, say they they, is altogether Monarchical and unlimited. Was man like his Creator, in goodness and justice, who would not follow the great model? But where goodness and justice are not essential to the Ruler, who would wish to put himself into his hands, to be disposed of according to his particular will and pleasure?”

gaining more does in others; because, men are apt to think they cannot securely enjoy what they possess already, without adding still more to it. Besides, the more power they have, the more able they will be to raise tumults, and to bring about any change or alteration they desire. And, it may be added, that their insolent and extravagant manner of living, inspires those that are excluded from the administration, with a sort of envy, and a desire of having their share in it, either to plunder their adversaries, or to get those honours and emoluments into their own hands, which they see others make so bad a use of.

C H A P. VI.

Whether such a form of Government could have been established at Rome, as could have prevented animosities betwixt the Senate and the People.

WE have already shewn what effects the contests betwixt the Senate and the People produced at Rome. Now as these struggles continued till the time of the Gracchi, and then proved the bane of public liberty, it may be asked perhaps, whether that State might not have attained to such a height of grandeur and authority as it did, under another form of Government, which could have either prevented or extinguished those intestine discords? To solve this question, we must examine the constitution of such Republics as continued free for a long course of years without any tumults and dissensions, to see what kind of Government they lived under; and then consider whether the same could have been introduced at Rome; and since I have already mentioned those of Sparta and Venice, let the former serve for an example in ancient, and the latter in modern times. Sparta was governed by a King, and a small Senate: Venice does not give any different titles to those that govern; for all such as are qualified to be admitted into the administration, are called by one common appellation, Gentlemen or Nobles, which indeed was rather owing to chance, than the prudence of their Law-givers. For, as a great number of people were forced to retire into those Isles, where Venice now stands, (for the reasons abovementioned) and the multitude at last increased to such a degree, that it became necessary to make some laws, in order to live peaceably and securely together, they established a form of government; and assembling frequently in council to make further provision for their common safety, when they thought they were numerous enough to subsist of themselves, they ordained that nobody that should come thereafter to live amongst them, should have any share in the government. But their numbers still increasing, and many others coming afterwards to settle there, who therefore could not be admitted into the administration, they called those that were already possessed of it, Gentlemen or Nobles, for their greater honour, and the rest, only Citizens.

This form then, might both be established at first, and afterwards supported without tumults or contests; for, when it was introduced, all the inhabitants being admitted to a share in the Government without distinction, no body had any reason to complain; and those that came to live there afterwards, finding the administration already fixed and settled, had neither cause nor means to disturb it; for they could not pretend they were deprived of any privilege, nor had they power or weight sufficient to raise dissensions, because the government kept a strict hand over them, and did not employ them in any charge that might give them so much authority. Besides, after all, the number of new comers was not so great, as to exceed that of the first Settlers, or Noble Venetians; so that the latter had not only an opportunity of establishing their government firmly at the beginning, but the power likewise of keeping it united afterwards.

Sparta, as I said before, being governed by a King, and a little Senate, was also enabled to support itself a considerable time; for all foreigners being excluded, the number of inhabitants in that State was but small, and these living with great reputation, under the laws given by Lycurgus (the strict observation of which prevented all causes of tumult and dissension) continued a long while united; for though, by his laws, there was a distinction of rank and condition established, yet the revenues of the lands were almost equally divided amongst them: so that one being very little, or perhaps, not at all richer than another, the people were the less dissatisfied by being kept at some distance by a few Nobles who were in the administration; and not being oppressed by them, never thought of aspiring to any higher degree of power. This was in some measure owing to the condition and circumstances of their Kings, who, being elective, and surrounded by the Nobility, had no better expedient to support their dignity, than by protecting the people from violence and injustice: by which, the latter being freed from all fear of oppression, did not desire any share in the Government; and therefore, when there was no reason for envy or strife with the Nobility, there could be nothing to disturb their union. But the two principal causes of this long union, were the following: In the first place, the number of inhabitants in Sparta was so small, that they might easily be governed by a few: and, in the next, as they admitted no foreigners into their Common-wealth, they were neither liable to be soon corrupted, nor to multiply in such a manner as to become formidable to the few that governed them.

These things being considered, it plainly appears, that if the Roman Law-givers had intended to constitute a Republic, that should continue in peace and unity, like those abovementioned, they must have taken one of these two courses; that is, they must either have acted like the Venetians, in not employing the common people in their wars; or, like the Spartans, in admitting no foreigners into their State. But as they did both, it threw such a degree of strength into the hands of the Plebeians, that they had it in their power to raise tumults and seditions whenever they pleased. On the other hand, if this Republic had been less divided, it would not have been so strong, nor could it ever have arrived at such a pitch of grandeur as it did. So that if any method had been found to prevent the dissensions that happened in it, it must likewise have extinguished the causes of its aggrandizement; for whoever will examine the course of human affairs, will soon see, that it is almost impossible to remedy one inconvenience without falling into another.

If then you suffer a people to encrease, and train them up to arms, in order to extend your Empire, you will not be able to govern them as you could wish; and, if you keep them low and disarmed, in order to render them more tractable, they will either make no conquests at all, or not be able to maintain them if they do, or become so dastardly and effeminate, that you must of necessity fall a prey to the first Invader. In all such undertakings, therefore, we ought to take that course, which after mature deliberation, seems to be subject to the fewest and least inconveniencies, and to look upon it as the best; for none are wholly exempt from difficulties and accidents. Rome, indeed, after the example of Sparta, might have chosen a prince to rule over it for his life, and have formed a little Senate; but it could not likewise have extended its Empire, without augmenting the number of its citizens; and, in that case, such a King and such a Senate would have contributed but little to its domestic peace and union. Whosoever then intends to found a new Commonwealth, should first consider, whether he would have it extend its dominion, or be content with a narrow territory of its own: because, in the first case, he ought to imitate the Romans, and make the best provision he can against divisions, if it is not in his power intirely to prevent them; for, without a great number of men, and those too well disciplined, no Republic can ever make any conquests, or, if it could, it would not be able to keep possession of them. In the second case, case, he should follow the example of the Spartans and Venetians; but he must use all possible means to prevent new acquisitions, because conquests are generally destructive to such feeble Common-wealths; and, indeed they proved so, both to Sparta and Venice: the former of which, having reduced almost all Greece, discovered its weakness upon a very slight occasion. For Thebes rebelling at the instigation of Pelopidas, several other cities likewise revolted, and at last quite overturned the Lacedæmonian Government. The Venetians also, after they had made themselves masters of the greater part of Italy, rather by artifice and dint of money, than arms, presuming too much upon their strength, lost almost all in one battle that they had ever acquired before*.

For my own part, I am of opinion, that if any one would found a Common-wealth, which should subsist for a long time, it would be the best way to form its interior constitution after the model of Sparta; and to build the capital in a strong and inaccessible situation, like that of Venice: that so it might not be in the power of an enemy to crush it on a sudden. Besides which, care should be taken on the other hand, to hinder it from growing so great and powerful, as to become formidable to its neighbours; for the common motives that induce people to make war upon a State, are either the desire of conquering it, or the fear of being conquered by it themselves. But both those causes are extinguished by the precautions just now recommended: because, if its natural situation makes it difficult to be assaulted (as I presuppose) and it is pretty well provided for its defence, it will seldom or never happen, that any one will have the hardiness to attempt it: and if it is content with its own territory, and every one sees it has no ambitious views, others will have no occasion to make war upon it for their own preservation, especially if its laws and constitution are such as will not allow it to enlarge its dominion*. And, I verily believe, if things could be balanced in this manner, it would be far the best model of government for any State that desired to live in quiet and tranquillity. But, as the affairs of this world are perpetually fluctuating, and nothing continues long in the same condition, all States must of course grow either better or worse in time†; necessity often forcing men to do such things, as their reason disapproves: so, when a State is founded that might

* “ This reasoning (says the above cited Author of the Estimate of the manners and principles of the times, Vol. II. Sect. ii.) is applied by Machiavel to Sparta and Venice: I need not point out to the Reader, how much more applicable it is to Britain: in some respects, perhaps, there is no time nor country delivered down to us in Story, in which a wise man would so much have wished to have lived, as in our own. If it be asked in what respects? Let us do justice to our age and country in every regard. A political Constitution, superior to all that History hath recorded, or present times can boast: a Religious Establishment which breathes universal Charity and Toleration: a Separation from the Continent that naturally secures us from the calamities of Invasion and the temptation of Conquest: a Climate fertile in the substantial comforts of life: a Spirit of liberty yet unconquered: a general Humanity and Sincerity beyond any nation upon Earth: an administration of justice that hath silenced envy. These are Blessings which every Englishman feels, and ought to acknowledge. Search through all the most admired periods of the most admired Countries, the most flourishing æras of Greece, Italy, or France; and tell me, if, in any of these, such an Union can be found? A volume might be written in proof and display of this superiority.”

† To this purpose, Montaigne says very justly, Vol. III. Chap. ii. “ Though the features of the pictures I draw alter and vary, there is still a likeness. The universe is but one perpetual motion, in which all things are incessantly wheeled about; the Rocks of Caucasus, the Pyramids of Egypt, the Earth itself is so, both by a general motion, and a particular one of its own. Constancy itself is no other than a more languid motion. I cannot be sure of my object: 'tis always disturbed and staggering by a natural giddiness. I take it at the point it is in at the instant when I consider it. I do not paint its being, I paint its passage; not a passage from one century to another, or from one seven years to another seven; but from day to day, from minute to minute. I must accommodate my History to the time; I may soon change not only my fortune; but my intentional so. It is a true colour of various and changeable accidents and of imaginations, that are wavering, and sometimes contrary. Whether it be that I am not then the man I was, or that I lay hold on the subjects with other circumstances and considerations; so it is, that perhaps I may plainly contradict myself; but, as Demades said, I do not contradict the truth. Could my Soul once take sure footing, I would then speak definitively and peremptorily: but, as it is, it is always learning and making trial.”

continue firm and indissoluble for a long course of years, provided it did not attempt to extend its dominion, and it afterwards becomes absolutely necessary to do so, its first principles and foundations being destroyed, it must soon fall to ruin. On the other hand, if fortune should be so propitious to it, that it should have no occasion to engage in any war, the inhabitants would then degenerate into idleness, and from idleness into effeminacy and faction; which two evils together, or indeed either of them alone, would be sufficient to cause its destruction. However, since it is hardly possible, I think, to balance things so exactly, or to observe so just a medium as I have been speaking of above, it is the best way to have a particular regard in the constitution of a Republic to what seems most honourable; and to make such provisions, that if it should ever become necessary to enlarge its empire, it may be able to keep possession of what it shall acquire. Upon the whole, therefore, I should chuse to form a Common-wealth upon the Roman model, rather than upon that of the other States abovementioned (since it is impossible to observe a due medium betwixt them) and to bear with the dissensions that must arise betwixt the Senate and Plebeians, as an inconvenience altogether necessary in a people that would emulate the grandeur of the Romans; for, besides the reasons already assigned to shew the advantage of having Tribunes for the conservation of the public liberties, it is easy to see the benefit that must accrue to a Common-wealth from the power those officers had, amongst other privileges, of freely impeaching such as were thought culpable; of which I shall speak more particularly in the next Chapter.

C H A P. VII.

How necessary it is for the preservation of Liberty in a Common-wealth, that any Criminal may be freely accused, with impunity to the Accuser.

NOTHING can be of greater importance to the safety of the State, than a power lodged in the hands of those that are appointed Guardians of its liberties, to accuse such persons as violate the laws of their Country, either before the people, or the Magistrates, or some Council that takes cognizance of such offences; for it produces two very salutary effects. In the first place, the Citizens, being awed by these accusations, seldom dare attempt any thing against the State: and if they do, they are presently brought to punishment, without any respect of persons *. In the next, a passage is opened for the evacuation of such humours as are common in all great cities: for when these humours cannot discharge themselves through a proper channel, they are apt to take some other course, that may be fatal to the Common-wealth †. It is of the utmost consequence, therefore,

† Machiavel might here have added another salutary effect from the abovementioned great authority, viz. the particular care of one's own conduct. "Omnes qui alterum, nullis impulsu inimicitii, nullâ privatim læsi injuriâ, nullo præmio adducti in judicium Reipublicæ causâ vocant, providere debent, non solum quid oneris in præsentia tollant, sed etiam quantum in omnem vitæ negotii suscipere conentur. Legem enim sibi ipsi dicunt innocentia, continentia, virtutumque omnium, qui ab altero rationem vitæ reposcunt: atque eo magis, si id, ut ante dixi, faciunt nullâ re commoti alia, nisi utilitate communi. Nam qui sibi hoc sumpsit ut corrigat mores aliorum, ac peccata reprehendat, quis huic agnoscat, si quâ in re ipse therefore, to the welfare and repose of every Republic, that a legal provision be made, to give vent to these fermentations: of which many proofs may be adduced, particularly the case of Coriolanus, as it is related by Livy. The Roman Nobility being exasperated at the Plebeians, who they thought had gained too much authority by the creation of Tribunes to support their claims upon all occasions; and the city labouring under such a scarcity of provisions, at the same time, that the Senate was forced to send to Sicily for corn; Coriolanus, who was a bitter enemy to the popular faction, suggested to the Nobility, that they had then a fair opportunity of humbling the Plebeians, and depriving them of the authority they had usurped, to the great prejudice of the Nobles, by refusing to let them have any share of the corn that was to be imported. But this advice coming to the ears of the people, they were so enraged at Coriolanus, that they raised a tumult, and, falling upon him, as he came out of the Senate-house, would certainly have torn him to pieces, if the Tribunes had not interposed their authority, and cited him to answer the charge that was brought against him. From hence we may observe the utility or rather absolute necessity of making proper laws in a Common-wealth, to dissipate the choler and resentment, arising from the hatred of the multitude to a single person; which, if not diverted by some such method, would take a different turn, and prove much more prejudicial to the State. And though, indeed, it may sometimes happen, that a citizen is unjustly punished by the Magistrates, yet the Common-wealth will be but little, or not at all hurt by it; because it is done neither by private violence, nor foreign assistance, which are the bane of liberty; but under the sanction of laws, and by public authority, which, having their due bounds prescribed them, cannot injure the Community.

To prove what I have asserted by examples, this of Coriolanus may serve for one of ancient date; and let any one consider, what confusion it must have occasioned in the Roman government, if he had been killed in a tumultuary manner: for that would have been an act of private revenge; and violence of that kind always makes individuals afraid of each other; fear puts them upon providing for their defence, and in order to defend themselves they must form parties; and parties at last turn to factions, which generally end in the ruin of a State; but, by the interposition of public authority, all these evils were prevented. As to modern instances of the bad consequences of not providing the people with some legal means of venting their rage against any of their fellow-citizens, we have seen several in our own times, and one in particular at Florence, in the case of Francisco Valori, who being a leading man, was suspected by many who knew his pride and ambition, of a design to seize upon the Government himself: and, as they had no other way to prevent it, but by setting up another faction against him; Valori, who had nothing to fear on his side, but some popular commotion, began to fortify himself with partizans and followers, to defend him in case of need. On the other hand, those that opposed him being utterly unprovided with any lawful method of dealing with him, resolved to have recourse to arms; so that, though he might have easily been cut off in the ordinary way of justice, without hurting any one else, if their laws had been properly calculated for it, many other eminent citizens suffered as well as himself. I might likewise alledge what happened in the same City, with regard to Pietro Soderini; which was entirely owing to the want of due means, to call a powerful and ambitious citizen to account: because eight Signiors only (and there were no more in that Republic) were not sufficient for that purpose, which required a greater number of judges; as a few are liable either to be corrupted, or over-awed by a man in power. But had such necessary provisions been made, the citizens might either have accused him with security, if he deserved it, and satiated their fury, without calling in a Spanish army to their assistance; or, if he did not deserve it, they would not have dared to proceed against him in that manner, lest he also should have accused them in their turn: and thus that contest might have been ended, which caused so much tumult and disorder.

We may conclude then, that when foreign aid is called into a Republic by any party, it is owing to a bad constitution, and that they have no legal way to purge off those ill humours that are so natural to mankind; for which, the only remedy is to appoint a great number of judges out of the most reputable citizens to receive all accusations in a legal manner. This method was so well established and observed at Rome, that in all the dissensions which happened betwixt the Patricians and Plebeians, neither the Senate, nor the People, nor any particular citizen ever thought of availing themselves of foreign assistance: for as they had a remedy at home, they had no occasion to seek for one abroad. And though the examples already cited may suffice to evince the truth and necessity of what I have laid down, I will yet produce another out of Livy, who tells us, that one Lucumo having debauched the Sister of Aruns at Clusium (one of the principal cities of Etruria at that time), Aruns not being able to revenge himself on so powerful a delinquent, had recourse to the Gauls for assistance (who were then in possession of that part of Italy now called Lombardy), and encouraged them to lay siege to Clusium, by representing the advantage they might reap to themselves from such an expedition, at the same time that they procured him redress for the injury he had sustained. Now if Aruns could have had justice done him at home, he would not have applied to foreigners for it.

But if legal accusations are serviceable to a Republic, calumnies are no less dangerous and pernicious; as we shall endeavour to shew in the following Chapter.

C H A P. VIII.

That Calumnies are as pernicious, as legal Accusations are serviceable to a Common wealth.

THOUGH Furius Camillus was so highly revered for his valour in delivering his Country from the yoke of the Gauls, that no Roman Citizen of what rank soever, thought it any diminution either to his dignity or reputation to give him the precedence: yet Manlius Capitolinus (so called, because he saved the Capitol) who thought he had done as much for his Country as Camillus, and was in no wise inferior to him in military abilities, could not bear to see such extraordinary honours conferred upon him. Full of envy, therefore, and perceiving he could make no impression upon the Senate, he applied to the people; amongst whom he scattered various aspersions and insinuations to the prejudice of Camillus; particularly, that the ransom money which was collected for the Gauls, but had not been appropriated to that use, was was distributed amongst some few Citizens; and that, if it could be recovered out of their hands, it would be of great advantage to the people, who might apply it either to lessen the public taxes, or discharge their private debts. These suggestions had such an effect upon the people, that they began to form cabals, and at last to raise tumults in the City; which giving great offence to the Senators, who thought they might prove of dangerous consequence, they appointed a Dictator to enquire into the matter, and to call Manlius to account for his behaviour. This Magistrate accordingly cited Manlius to appear immediately, and answer to the charge exhibited against him in a public assembly; whither the Dictator coming in the midst of the Nobility, and Manlius surrounded by the Plebeians, the latter was desired to declare in whose hands the money was, which he had spoken of; because the Senators were as desirous to be informed of that as the people. But Manlius, instead of answering particularly to the question, endeavoured to evade it, by saying, he had no occasion to inform them of what they already knew so well themselves; upon which, the Dictator sent him directly to prison.

From hence we may observe how detestable such calumnies ought to be, not only in all free States, but in every civil Society; and how necessary it is to punish those that are guilty of them, without partiality or respect of persons. And certainly no method so effectual can be taken to prevent or suppress them, as to encourage legal accusations as much as possible; since they are no less detrimental than such accusations are serviceable to a Common-wealth. For there is this difference betwixt them, that a Calumniator calls in no testimony or evidence to prove the truth of what he says; so that it is in any man's power to abuse another; but an Accuser must produce witnesses and substantial proofs to support his charge*.

Accu-

Accusations are lodged before Magistrates, or Councils, or Assemblies of the people: but Calumnies are whispered about in holes and corners; and it always happens that Calumnies prevail most in those States, where there are the fewest accusations, and the government is least disposed to encourage them.

A founder of a Republic therefore ought to make such laws and provisions, that any one citizen may securely accuse another, and to see that they are duly and strictly observed: after which, he should punish Calumniators with the utmost rigour; who indeed would have no reason to complain of it, when they had an opportunity of openly and safely accusing those whom they had basely slandered in private. Where this is not duly attended to, great disorders must always ensue; for Calumnies instead of making men better, only serve to irritate and provoke them; and when they are thus exasperated, they naturally endeavour to revenge themselves, as they will rather be apt to hate, than stand in any fear of those that have aspersed them. Excellent provisions were made at Rome for this purpose, as we have said before; and very poor ones, or in fact none at all, at Florence: accordingly the former Republic reaped great advantage from them, and the latter suffered much by that neglect. For whoever reads the History of our Commonwealth will see how many aspersions have been cast at all times, upon those that were employed in the management of its most important affairs; one being charged with embezzling the public money, another with being bribed by the enemy to lose a battle, or raise a siege; and a third with being too ambitious;

“ confirmat. Maledictio autem nihil habet, propositi, præter contumeliam.” Cic. pro M. Cælio orat. XIII. in init. “ Quid est enim minus, non dico Oratoris, sed hominis, quam id objicere adversario, quod ille si verbo negarit, longius progredi non possit qui objecerit?” Philip. II. Add to these the words of Lactantius. “ Turpe est hominem ingeniosum dicere id, quod si neges, probare non possit.” Instit. Divin. lib. II. cap. xxviii. which occasioned endless animosities, divisions, factions, and finally the ruin of that State. But if proper care had been taken at Florence to encourage legal accusations against such Citizens as were supposed to be guilty of any crime, and to punish Calumniators, all these evils might have been prevented; for those Citizens, whether acquitted or condemned, would not have had it in their power to hurt the State, and fewer people would have been exposed to Accusations than Calumnies: because, as I just now said, it is a much easier thing to calumniate, than to maintain a just accusation. It has likewise sometimes happened, that an aspiring Citizen has availed himself of calumnies, to gratify his ambitious views: for if he is opposed by any other person of weight and power in the State, he immediately asperges him, and puts himself at the head of the Plebeians, whom he confirms in the bad opinion of his adversary, which he had instilled into them before; and thus secures their suffrages and interest to promote his own designs; of this several instances might be produced, but I shall content myself with one only.

When the Florentine army laid siege to Lucca, under the command of their Commissary Giovanni Guicciardini; whether it was owing to ill fortune or bad conduct, he could not make himself Master of that City. However it might be, he was charged with being corrupted by the Lucchese; which calumny being industriously propagated by his enemies, enraged him to such a degree, that it almost drove him to madness: and though he offered to put himself into the hands of a Magistrate till he should be brought to a trial, yet he never could entirely wipe off the imputation, because there were no laws in that Commonwealth to which he might have recourse for his justification. Hence arose a mortal enmity betwixt Guicciardini's friends (who consisted of the greater part of the Nobility), and those that wanted to see a change of Government *; which animosities, and others of the like nature daily increasing, at last ended in the total destruction of the Republican Government there.

Manlius Capitolinus then being a Calumniator and not a fair Accuser, the Romans have shewn us by their example, how such people ought to be punished: for they should be obliged to bring a formal accusation, instead of spreading private calumnies; and rewarded (at least not punished), in case they make good their charge; if not, to be dealt with as Manlius was *.

* Tenes or Tennes, who gave name to the Isle of Tenedos, made a Law there, that a man should always stand behind the Judge with an axe in his hand, ready to cut off the head of any person immediately, who should be convicted of a falsity. Ex Heraclide de politis. Others say he ordered an Executioner to stand with an axe lifted up behind the Accusers, to put those to death directly that should be found guilty of false accusations. Suidas in voce Τενεδιος αυθιστος. This puts one in mind of a Maxim which a French Civilian of the Sixteenth Century has commented upon. It imports, that a man who takes upon him to attack the Religion which has been established for several ages, ought not to be heard but upon this condition, that he shall be capitally punished, if he does not convince the people, that his own particular opinion is truer than that of the Public. “ Qui antiqua, legitima, atque ordinaria sacra, audet in controversiam adducere, eum non audiendum esse, nisi periculo sui capitis, si non persuadeat veriozem esse suam sententiam.” Petrus Ætodus decretorum. lib. I. p. xviii. Paris 1573. 8vo. He quotes upon this occasion a remarkable example from Josephus Book XII. Chap. vi. of his Jewish Antiquities. “ The Jews and Samaritans having had a contest in the City of Alexandria, upon the question, whether the Temple of Jerusalem was preferable to that of Gerazim, the cause was brought before the Council of Ptolemy Philometer King of Egypt: and before it was argued, it was determined, that the Advocates of that party, which should lose the point, should be condemned to die. The Advocate of the Jews spoke first, and so clearly proved the justice of his cause, that a decree was made agreeable to his desire; so that Sabbeus and Theodosius, the two Advocates of the Samaritans, were put to death.”—One might here observe that Josephus has not mentioned whether the Samaritan Advocates spoke at all or not. This might lead one to think, that Sentence was given without their being heard. It is not probable, however, that Ptolemy would be guilty of such a piece of injustice. Josephus therefore has violated the laws of History—The abovementioned Civilian, presently after, cites the Law of Zaleucus, by which, all those that proposed any innovations, were obliged to do it with a rope about their neck; that so, if they did not prevail for the abrogation of the old customs, they might be hanged upon the spot; and concludes with a wish that there was the same law in France. He thinks that this would have prevented those factions and confusions, which the desire of novelty had occasioned

C H A P. IX.

That only one person should be concerned, either in founding a new State, or making a thorough reform in an old one.

IT may be thought perhaps that I have entered too far into the Roman History, before I make any mention either of the very Founders themselves of that Republic, or the laws they made relating to Religion and Military discipline. Not to keep those in suspense any longer, who may desire some information in these matters, I say, that many may possibly think it a bad precedent in Romulus, the founder of a State, to kill his own brother first, and afterwards to connive at the death of Titus Tatius the Sabine, whom he had associated with himself in the government *; as any of his own Subjects, if prompted by ambition occasioned in that Kingdom. “Quibus omnino rationibus atque conditionibus, si nos præsertim in hoc tempore uteremur, quo is demum nihil scire, & illiberalis esse dicitur, cui non placent absurdissima quæque, modo recentissima; non ita planè res incertæ essent ac turbulentæ, neque tam multi multarum partium, factionum, opinionum, auctores evaderent: cum suo saltem periculo eo discerent amare, colere, pacem patriamque, leges ac Magistratus, quæ odio sane prossequuntur.” It is evident he would have had the dispute betwixt the Popish Clergy and the Protestants, determined like that of Alexandria. But was there a Tribunal in France like that of the King of Egypt? The latter consisted of persons who were neither Jews nor Samaritans; and the contending parties might therefore expect an impartial judgment. Luther and Calvin and their followers could not promise themselves the same thing; since the same persons who would have been their Judges, were likewise parties. So that neither the Laws of Zalencus, nor that of the King of Tenedos, nor lastly the practice of the Romans either can or ought to be extended to matters of religion.—Manlius was thrown headlong from the Capitol.

* After the death of Remus, a war having been commenced betwixt the Sabines and Romans, upon the rape of the Sabine virgins, Tatius, the general of the former, made himself master of the Capitol, and otherwise so harrassed the Romans, that Romulus was obliged to come upon terms with them, and not only to incorporate them into his new State, but to admit Tatius to an equal share in the Sovereignty. Five years afterwards, however, as they were offering sacrifice together at Lavinium, an insurrection was raised, as some say by the contrivance of Romulus, in which Tatius lost his life.—Upon ambition and desire of Command, might plead the example of their Prince, in dispatching such as endeavoured to oppose or impede their designs. And indeed their opinion would seem just and reasonable, if the motives were not to be considered which induced Romulus to act as he did. For it must be laid down as a general rule, that it very seldom or never happens that any Government is either well founded at first, or thoroughly reformed afterwards, except the plan be laid and conducted by one man only, who has the sole power of giving all orders, and making all laws that are necessary for its establishment. A prudent and virtuous Founder of a State therefore, whose chief aim it is to promote the welfare of many, rather than to gratify his own ambition; to make provision for the good of his country, in preference to that of his Heirs or Successors, ought to endeavour by all means to get the supreme authority wholly into his own hands: nor will a reasonable man ever condemn him for taking any measures, even the most extraordinary, if they are necessary for that purpose: the means indeed may seem culpable, but the end will justify them, if it be a good one, as that of Romulus was, and will always be admitted as a sufficient excuse; for he is only blameable who uses violence to throw things into confusion and distraction, and not he who does it to establish peace and good order*. But a Legislator ought likewise to be so provident and disinterested as not to leave the authority he has assumed as an inheritance to another: for men being naturally more prone to evil than good, his Successor perhaps may be tempted by ambition to abuse that power which he himself made a wise and virtuous use of. Besides, it is further to be considered, that although it is the most proper that one man alone should form the first model, yet any Government that he shall establish will be but of short duration if it devolves upon a single person: but if it is transferred to many it will be much better, because many will be interested in the maintenance of it. For as it is not convenient that the multitude should be concerned in laying the foundations of a government; since the diversity of their opinions would not suffer them to agree in what may be most for its good: so when things are once settled upon some good and advantageous bottom, they will hardly ever all agree to abandon it.

That Romulus therefore was excusable for putting to death both his brother and the other associate in his government; and that what he did was not out of motives of ambition, but for the public good, plainly appears from his establishing a Senate soon after they were dead, according to the resolutions of which he acted in all things, reserving only to himself the privilege of calling the Senators together, and of commanding their Armies in time of war. A proof of this we have from what happened afterwards, when the Romans recovered their liberties by the expulsion of the Tarquins : at which time they made no change in their first constitution ; except that instead of one King for life, they annually created two Consuls : which shews that the first institutions of that State were rather calculated for a free Republican Government, than the support of absolute and tyrannical power. To confirm what I have laid down, I might quote many more examples, as those of Moses, Lycurgus, Solon, and other Founders of Kingdoms and Republics, who, by assuming the sole power were enabled to make excellent laws for the government of their respective States ; but it is here unnecessary, as they are already so well known : I shall therefore add only one more, which, though not so brilliant and illustrious perhaps as the rest, is yet worthy of being considered by those that would form a good establishment. Agis, King of Sparta, being desirous to reduce his Subjects to the observation of the laws that had formerly been given them by Lycurgus, for want of which he perceived they had lost much of their ancient virtue, and consequently their power and command, was killed, before he could accomplish his design, by the Ephori*, who suspected that he wanted to introduce tyranny and make himself absolute Lord over them. But Cleomenes, his Successor, being determined to pursue the same design by some papers that Agis left behind him, from which he perceived that his intention was only to reform the State ; and finding he could not do his country that Service, any way but by taking the Government wholly into his own hands, (as the malevolence and opposition of a few, often prevent one man from doing a public good) he took a proper opportunity, and caused not only the Ephori, but all others that were capable of obstructing his measures, to be put to death, and afterwards restored the laws of Lycurgus to their former vigour and authority. A resolution that would have retrieved the glory of Sparta, and given as much reputation to Cleomenes as Lycurgus himself had acquired, if the overgrown power of the Macedonians, and the feeble condition into which the other Republics of Greece were then fallen, had not prevented it. For being suddenly invaded by the Macedonians, before it had gained strength enough to defend itself; and having no allies that were capable of giving it any assistance, it was forced to submit, and that great and laudable design proved abortive in the end. These things being duly considered, I conclude, that in order to found a State, one person alone should have all the power vested in him; and that Romulus was excusable, at least, in putting Remus and Tatius to death.

* Human Policy seems to be at great variance with sound reason and true religion in this point: for the best Casuists say, "Bonitas intentionis non sufficit ad bonitatem actus, i. e. A good end does not justify bad means to compass it;" but the Jesuits say otherwise. The Maxim, however, "Let us do evil, that good may come," is utterly disclaimed by one of much higher authority than either of them — A sharper, perhaps, may avail himself of tricks and finesses for a while, but a fair and good player will have the advantage at the long run. Let any one consider the conduct of Henry III. of France, as it is related by Davila, and he will soon be convinced how fatal such measures prove in the end; and that "Honesty, according to the old proverb, is the best Policy."

C H A P. X.

If those that found States deserve praise; others that introduce Tyranny ought to be held in detestation.

OF all men that are praise-worthy, those are most so that have made Religion and Divine worship their chief care; and, in the next place, those that have founded Kingdoms or Republics. After whom we may reckon great Commanders, who have either enlarged their own dominion or that of their Country. To these we may add Learned men of all kinds, that have excelled in their several professions. And lastly, all eminent Artificers and Mechanics, of whom the number is infinite, deserve some share of commendation. On the contrary, those wretches are worthy of nothing but infamy and detestation, who extirpate Religion, subvert Kingdoms and Common-wealths, make war upon Virtue, Merit, Letters, Arts, Sciences, ences, and every thing else that is useful or honourable to mankind; in which rank are the prophane, the tyrannical, the ignorant, the idle, the dissolute, and debauched. Now certainly there can be no man living, whether wise or simple, good or bad, but must praise the one, and condemn the other, if at liberty to speak his mind. Nevertheless, the generality of mankind, deluded by a false appearance of what seems good and great, suffer themselves either wilfully or ignorantly to follow the example of those that deserve the highest degree of reproach instead of admiration, who when they might have founded a Kingdom or a Common-wealth to their immortal honour, become tyrants; not considering what glory, what reputation, what security, tranquillity, and peace of mind they forfeit by such a manner of proceeding; and, to what infamy, abhorrence, remorse, disquietude, and to how many dangers and alarms they expose themselves. Every man that reads and considers the History of former times, whether he be a subject of a Common-wealth, or one that has advanced himself to Sovereignty, would certainly chuse, if a Republican, to have been Scipio rather than Julius Cæsar; if a Prince, rather to have been Agesilaus, Timoleon, or Dion, than Nabis, Phalaris, or Dionysius; for he cannot help seeing how highly the former were admired and revered, and how much the latter were condemned and abominated by all good men. He will likewise see, that Timoleon and the others had as much authority in their respective States, as either Phalaris or Dionysius had in theirs, and lived with infinitely more comfort and security. We ought not to be dazzled with Cæsar's false glory, when we behold him so much extolled by some writers; for those writers were either so corrupted by his good fortune, or overawed by the long continuance of his power, that they durst not speak truth. But, if those Historians had been under no restraint, without doubt they would have spoken as freely of him, at least, as others have done of Catiline; for Cæsar was certainly the more

wicked of the two, if one man that actually commits a crime, is worse than another, who only intended it. Such a Reader may also observe, what Eulogies they bestow upon Brutus; for, as they durst not speak impartially of Cæsar, on account of his power, they were forced to content themselves with magnifying his adversary. Let it be considered likewise, by all such as have changed Republics into absolute governments, in what security those Emperors lived, who after Rome became an Empire, strictly observed the laws of their country, and reigned like good Princes; in comparison of those that behaved in a different manner: and they will find that Titus, Nerva, Trajan, Adrián, Antoninus, and Marcus Aurelius, had no occasion either for Prætorian bands or legions to guard them; because their own goodness, and the affections both of the Senate and people were a sufficient defence to those Princes. On the contrary, it may be remarked, that the most powerful armies, both in the eastern and western parts of the Empire, were not able to secure Caligula, Nero, Vitellius, and several other bad Emperors, against such enemies as their wicked and tyrannical government had created them. Now, if the reigns of these different Emperors be well considered, they may serve as excellent lessons to any other Prince, who is desirous not only to avoid infamy, but to immortalize his name, to live in security, and free from dangers and alarms: for of twenty-six Emperors, who reigned betwixt the time of Julius Cæsar and Mazimin, sixteen were murdered, and ten only died a natural death. But if some of those that happened to be murdered were good Princes (as Galba and Pertinax were) their death was owing to the corruption which their Predecessors had introduced amongst the Soldiery: and, if any one of those that died a natural death was a bad Prince (as Severus was) it may be attributed to such a degree of good fortune and valour, as are seldom incident to the same person. One may further learn from the history of the Roman Emperors, upon what foundation a Monarchy narchy ought to be built, in order to make it stable and permanent; for all the Emperors that succeeded to the Imperial dignity by inheritance, proved very bad, excepting Titus; and those, on the contrary, who enjoyed it by adoption, were all good Princes, as might be instanced in the examples of Nerva, and the four succeeding Emperors in particular; but when the Empire became hereditary, it began to decline very fast.

Let a Prince then compare the times that happened betwixt the reigns of Nerva and Marcus Aurelius, with those that went before and those that came after, and then declare in which he would chuse either to have been born or reigned. For when good Princes were upon the throne, he will see them reigning in security in the midst of their Subjects, peace and justice firmly established, the Senate in full authority, the Magistrates honoured and respected, the citizens enjoying their properties without fear or suspicion, Nobility and virtue exalted; and the world in repose and tranquility; all rancour, licentiousness, corruption and ambition seemed to be extinguished in those golden times; every man was at liberty both to chuse and maintain his own opinion*. In short, he will see the world exulting in all manner of felicity; the Princes full of glory, and revered by their people; and the people happy and safe, under the protection and paternal affection of their Princes.

In the next place, let him examine the reigns of the other Emperors, and he will find them full of commotion, discord, sedition, inhuman murders, assassinations of Princes both in peace and war, foreign and domestic broils, Italy distracted with daily alarms, its cities plundered and destroyed, the metropolis itself burnt, the Capitol demolished by its own Citizens, the temples pulled down, Religion corrupted, the cities full of adulteries, the Sea covered with Exiles, and the Shores stained with blood; he will see endless enormities and cruelties in Rome, and not only riches and nobility, but even virtue itself looked upon as a capital offence. He will see infamous Accusers and Calumniators rewarded, Servants bribed to betray their Masters, Children to rebel against their Parents, and those that had no Enemies, oppressed and undone by their friends *.—Upon such an examination it will appear, what mighty obligations Rome, Italy, and the whole world lay under to Julius Cæsar; and certainly, if a Prince, who reads these things, has any principles of humanity in him, he will not only be deterred from following the example of these wicked Emperors, but inflamed with a desire of imitating the good. For one that aspires to fame and reputation in the world would wish to succeed to a corrupted state, not utterly to spoil and subvert it, as Cæsar did; but to new-model and reform it, like Romulus: and heaven cannot give, nor man desire a more favourable opportunity of acquiring true glory. If it should happen, however, that he cannot effect that reform, without entirely giving up his power and authority, he would be in some measure inexcusable without doubt, in case he did not do that; but, if he could accomplish the one without losing the other, he would be unpardonable

if he neglected it. Let those consider, therefore; who are blessed with such an opportunity, that they have the choice of two courses, one of which will make them happy and secure whilst they live, and crown their memory with glory; the other will lead them into continual troubles and dangers in this life; and make them for ever infamous after their death*.

C H A P. XI.

Concerning the Religion of the Romans.

Notwithstanding Romulus was the original Founder of Rome, and that it owed its birth and the first rudiments of its constitution to him; yet Heaven foreseeing that his laws and institutions alone were not sufficient either to form or support so great an empire as that of Rome was ordained to be, inspired the Senators of that City to make choice of Numa Pompilius to succeed Romulus in the government of it; that so, what was left defective by the former, might be completed by the latter. Numa, therefore, finding the people fierce and warlike, and being desirous to civilize and make them obedient to laws by peaceable measures, had recourse to Reli-

* Excellent was the advice which Antoninus Plus gave his son Commodus. Two days before he died, he assured his friends, that he did not desire to live, because the ill conduct of his son had made life uneasy to him. However, he recommended him to the Soldiery; and we have an excellent discourse of his in Herodian, in which he desired his friends to assist him with their advice, and directed him in what manner he ought to govern. He further charged his friends to make him sensible, "That all the riches and honours in the Universe were not sufficient to satisfy the luxury and ambition of a Tyrant, nor the strongest guards and armies able to defend him from the hatred and insults of his Subjects. That no tyrannical Prince ever enjoyed a long and peaceable reign; but such only as gained the hearts of their people by clemency. That not those who served out of constraint, but such as obeyed voluntarily, would continue faithful in all trials, and free from either flattery or treachery. And lastly, that it was exceeding difficult, and yet highly necessary, for those Princes to set bounds to their passions, who had none to their power." Herodian, lib. I. cap. viii.

gion, as a thing absolutely necessary to maintain civil polity: and in this he succeeded so well, that for many ages no state ever shewed a greater degree of reverence for the Gods; which very much facilitated the execution of such undertakings as the Senators and chief Magistrates had resolved upon. For whoever will be at the pains of examining the many great actions that were performed, either by the people in general, or by particular persons, will find they were always more afraid of violating an oath, than of disobeying the laws; as they dreaded the power of the Gods much more than the authority of men. Of this we have a manifest proof in the examples of Scipio and Manlius Torquatus; for, after the great overthrow, which Hannibal had given the Romans at Cannæ, the people were in such a panic, that numbers of them assembling together determined to quit Italy, and transport themselves into Sicily: of which Scipio being informed, immediately went to them, and drawing his sword, obliged them all to take a solemn oath never to abandon their country. Lucius Manlius, the father of Titus Manlius, afterwards surnamed Torquatus, had an accusation lodged against him by Marcus Pomponius, Tribune of the People; but before the day appointed for hearing his cause, Titus went to the Tribune, and threatened to kill him directly, if he would not take an oath to withdraw the accusation: which he accordingly did, and strictly observed it. Here we see Citizens, whom neither the love of their country, nor regard of the laws could have prevented from leaving Italy, still kept firm to it by the fear of violating an oath, though they had been compelled to take it: and a Tribune laying aside the enmity he had with the father, forgetting the outrage received from his son, and disdaining the reflections that must be cast upon his own honour, only to avoid breaking his oath: all which was entirely owing to the Principles of Religion inculcated by Numa in that City.

It likewise appears, in the course of the Roman History, of what admirable service Religion was in governing armies, re-uniting the people, supporting virtue, and discouraging vice. So that if it should be disputed, whether Rome was more obliged to Romulus or Numa, I should think Numa was the greater Benefactor to it; for where a due regard is had to Religion, it will be an easy matter to introduce military virtue and good discipline; but without that, it will be found very difficult to introduce it, and much more so to bring it to any degree of perfection. It is further observable, that, in forming a Senate, and establishing certain other institutions both civil and military, Romulus did not avail himself of Divine authority; but Numa, finding it absolutely necessary, pretended to have private conferences with the Nymph Egeria, who dictated to him what he was to prescribe to the people: This he did, because he wanted to introduce some new laws and customs, and was afraid his own authority alone would not be sufficient for that purpose. And indeed, no man could ever succeed in getting new and extraordinary laws admitted amongst a people without the sanction of Religion; for though a sagacious and provident Legislator may foresee their salutary effects, yet, if they do not appear obvious to the vulgar, he will not otherwise be able to convince them, either of the utility or necessity of them: upon which account, wise Law-givers always have recourse to Religion, in order to remove that difficulty. Lycurgus, Solon, and many others, acted in this manner, and for these reasons: and thus the Roman people revering the piety and wisdom of Numa, submitted in all things to his institutions*. It is true,

* "Religion," says Bishop Fleetwood, in his Charge delivered to the Clergy of the Diocese of Ely, at Cambridge, Aug. 7, 1716, "is so useful and so necessary to the well-being of the world, and so perfective of human nature, that it commands the esteem of all men, and obtains it of all that are reasonable. There never was a country in any manner civilized without Religion; nor have any of our Travellers in their discoveries, either of the old or new the devotion of those times was such, and the ignorance of the people he had to deal with so great, that they contributed very much to facilitate his designs, and gave him an opportunity of making any new impression upon them he pleased: and, without doubt, any person that should undertake to found a State at present, would find a parcel of mountaineers, and illiterate uncivilized men, more tractable and obedient than others, who had been used to live in communities, and had their morals and principles corrupted: as a rough unhewn block of marble may more easily be wrought into a good Statue, than one that has been already spoiled by some bungling workman.

All these things being considered, I conclude, that the introduction of Religion at Rome by Numa, was one of the causes that chiefly contributed to its grandeur and felicity: for Religion produced good order, and good order is generally attended with good fortune and success in any undertaking. And, as a strict observation of Divine worship and religious duties, always tends to the aggrandizement of a State; so a neglect and contempt of them may be reckoned amongst the first causes of its ruin. For, where there is no fear of God, it must either fall to destruction, or be supported by the reverence shewn to a good Prince; which indeed may sustain it for a while, and supply the want of Religion in his Subjects. But as human life is short, the Government must of course sink into decay, when the virtue that upheld and informed it is extinct. Hence it comes to pass, that States which depend upon the spirit of one man alone, are generally short-lived: for when he dies, his virtues dies with him, and seldom revives in his successor, as Dante has justly observed.

“ world, found and populous town or City without a Temple or “ place of public worship.”—In short, human Society could not subsist without it, as might easily be shewn, if it was necessary at this time of day. See also a Book written not long ago by Wortley Mountague, Esq. upon this Subject.

It is not sufficient, therefore, for the firm establishment either of a Kingdom or Republic, that it is wisely governed by a prince whilst he lives: it is further necessary, that he should lay the foundations in such a manner, that it may be able to support itself after he is dead. And though ignorant and unpolished people are more susceptible of new doctrines and laws, than those that think themselves already sufficiently polite and civilized, yet it is not an impossible thing to make an impression upon the latter. The Florentines do not look upon themselves as either rude or ignorant people; and yet they were prevailed upon by Girolamo Savonarola to believe, that he conversed with God *. For my own part, I will not pretend to determine, whether that was true or not; because so great a man ought not to be spoken of, but with the utmost reverence: this, however, I will take upon me to say, that many thousands believed it, who never saw him perform any thing miraculous, that might be a good foundation for such an opinion: his life, doctrine, and manner of conversation, being sufficient, as they thought, to convince them. Let no one despair then, of being able to do what has been done by others: for mankind (as I have observed before, in my introduction to these discourses) are born, live and die, in the same manner as formerly.

C H A P. XII.

Of what importance it is for the preservation of a State, to pay a due veneration to Religion; and how much the neglect of it, occasioned by the Church of Rome, has contributed to the ruin of Italy.

THE rulers of all States, whether Kingdoms or Common-wealths, who would preserve their governments firm and entire, ought above all things to take care that Religion is held in the highest veneration, and its ceremonies at all times uncorrupted and inviolable; for there is no surer prognostic of impending ruin in any State, than to see Divine worship neglected or despised. This may easily be demonstrated, by examining the foundation upon which the Religion of any Country is built; for the Religion of all nations is founded upon some principles. That of the Gentiles was founded chiefly upon the answers of Oracles, Divination, and Auguries; all the rest of their Rites, Ceremonies, and Sacrifices, depending wholly upon these: for they thought the same Being that could foretell things to come, could also confer them if good, or avert them if evil; for which reason they erected Temples, offered up Sacrifices and Prayers, and instituted other ceremonies for the worship of that Supreme power: and thus the Oracle at Delphos, the Temple of Jupiter Ammon, and other celebrated shrines, kept the world in admiration and devotion. But when the Priests of these Temples began to give answers accordingly as they were influenced by great men, the fallacy was detected, and the people growing incredulous, became at last rebellious, and disposed to throw off all civil government and restraint.

country : for whilst they are kept sacred and inviolate, it will be an easy matter to maintain devotion, and consequently good order and union, amongst their subjects. For which purpose, they must carefully attend to all circumstances and events (how false or frivolous soever they may appear to themselves) that seem in any wise conducive to this end ; and the wiser and better acquainted they are with the natural course of things, the more they will avail themselves of such assistances *. This method being taken by prudent Governors, produced the opinion of miracles ; many of which have been pretended to be wrought even in nations under the influence of false religion : for such Governors always endeavour to confirm the people in the belief of them, to what causes soever they may have been owing ; and the authority of the Prince never fails to strengthen the faith of the people. Many of these Miracles might be instanced from the Roman History, but we shall produce only one. When the Romans sacked the City of Veii, a party of Soldiers went into a Temple there, dedicated to Juno, and addressing themselves to an image of that Goddess, asked her if she would go to Rome; to which some of them said, she gave her assent by a nod, and others affirmed, that she actually spoke, and said she would. Now these men being more religious than Soldiers commonly are (as Livy infers from the silence, respect, and veneration, with which they entered the Temple) easily persuaded themselves they had an answer given them, which very likely they fully expected before they asked the question. However that might be, this opinion was industriously propagated, and encouraged by Camillus, and other leading men in the Commonwealth, who endeavoured by all means to foment the credulity of the people.

If Christian Princes then had taken care to maintain their Religion in the purity it was delivered by its Author; it is certain Christendom would have been much more happy and united than it is at present: but it is the surest sign of its declension, to see that those who live nearest to the Church of Rome, which is the Head of our Religion, have the least devotion: for, whoever will examine its first principles, and compare them with the practice of these times, will find it no difficult matter to persuade himself, that either some dreadful scourge, or perhaps utter destruction is hanging over our heads*. But since there are some who maintain, that the welfare of Italy depends upon the Church of Rome, I shall endeavour to evince the contrary by some arguments, which, in my opinion, are unanswerable. In the first place, then, the corrupt example of the Romish Court has extinguished all sense of Religion and Piety in that province; and consequently been the cause of numberless evils : for as all things go well where Religion is duly supported, so where that is neglected and trampled upon, every thing runs into confusion and disorder. We Italians, therefore, are certainly under great obligations to this Church and its Priests, for abolishing all Religion and polluting our morals ; but under greater still upon another account, which has been our utter ruin ; and that is, for fomenting endless discords and divisions amongst us. For certainly no nation can ever expect to be happy, that is not united in obedience to some one Prince or Common-wealth, as France and Spain are at this time : and it is wholly owing to the Church of Rome, that Italy, at present, is neither entirely under a Republican, nor a Monarchical government. For though the Popes fixed their residence there, and obtained a temporal as well as spiritual jurisdiction, yet they never were able to possess themselves of all Italy : and, on the other hand, they were never reduced to so low an ebb, but upon any apprehension of losing their temporal dominion, they could call in some foreign potentate to defend them against other States that were grown too strong for them ; of which there occur many examples in the history of former times ; particularly, when by the assistance of Charlemagne they drove out the Lombards, who had made themselves masters of almost all Italy ; and in our own times, when they curbed the power of the Venetians by the help of France, and then drove out the French by the aid of the Swiss. As the church then never was able to get Italy wholly into its own hands, it would not suffer any body else to do so ; and this is the reason why it never could be united under one head, but still continues divided into several Principalities and Republics ; which has brought it into such a State of disunion and weakness, that it now lies at the mercy of the first Invader, and for this we may thank the Church alone. To prove the truth of which assertions, if it was possible to transplant the Court of Rome and all its authority in Italy, into the territories of the Swifs, who at present are the only people that have preserved both their religious and military institutions in their original vigour, it would soon be seen that the wickedness and depravity of that court would occasion more disorder and confusion in Switzerland, than any other misfortune that ever did, or ever could happen to it*.

* Voltaire, in his general History of Europe, part IV. chap. vii. draws a striking picture of that Court, and of those times. “ The Comedies of Ariosto and Machiavel, says he, though not very delicate in regard to modesty and Religion, were frequently acted at this Court in the presence of the Pope (Leo X.) and Cardinals, by young persons of the highest rank in Rome. The merit alone of those pieces, great indeed for that age, made an impression upon the Spectators. Whatever might be offensive to Religion passed unobserved at a Court entirely intent upon intrigues and pleasures, and which had no notion that Religion could be injured by these liberties. And indeed, as they attacked neither the Doctrine, nor Jurisdiction of the Church, the Court of Rome took no more exceptions against them, than the Greeks and ancient Romans did against the wit and raillery of Aristophanes and Plautus. Even affairs of the highest importance, never broke in upon the Pope’s pleasures; he created thirty new Cardinals, mostly Italians, whose tempers were every way conformable to that of their Sovereign. If they had not the same taste and knowledge as the Pontif, at least they imitated him in his pleasures. Almost all the other Prelates followed their Example. Spain was at that time the only Country remarkable for the exemplary lives of the Clergy. This strictness of Morals had been introduced by Cardinal Ximenes; a man of a four disposition, who had no relish but for arbitrary power, and who strutted in a Cordelier’s habit when he was Regent of Spain, and said he knew how to bind the Grandees to their duty with his cord, and would crush their pride under his Sandals. In every other country the Prelates lived like voluptuous Princes, some of them being possessed of eight or nine Bishopricks. The whole torrent, both of Protestant and Popish writers, make loud complaints of the loose morals of those times. They tell us that the Bishops, the inferior Clergy, and the Monks, led most indolent and scandalous lives; that nothing was more common than for Priests to bring up their children publicly, after the example of Pope Alexander VI. We have still the will of Croui, Bishop of Cambray in those days, in which he leaves several legacies to his children, and reserves a Sum for the bastards, which he still hopes God will be so gracious to give him, in case he recovers from his illness. These are the very words of the Will — But what gave the greatest Scandal of all was, the public Sale of Indulgencies, Absolutions, and Dispensations of all prices; that Apostolic revenue, unlimited and uncertain before the time of Pope John XXII. was by him digested as a Code of the Canon Law. A Deacon, or Subdeacon, guilty of murder, was absolved with permission to hold three Benefices, for about twenty Crowns. A Bishop, or an Abbot might assassinate for three hundred

How the Romans availed themselves of Religion in reforming the State, in prosecuting their wars, and in composing tumults.

IT may not appear foreign to our purpose, to shew by some examples in what manner the Romans availed themselves of Religion in reforming their State, and in the prosecution of other enterprizes; and though many more might be produced out of Livy, yet I shall content myself with the following.

The people having created Tribunes with consular power, and all of them, except one, being chosen from amongst the Plebeians; it happened that there was a great pestilence and famine the same year at Rome: of which the Nobility making a handle at the next creation of Tribunes, pretended that the Gods were offended at the people, for debasing the Majesty “ Livres; all manner of uncleanness, even the most shocking to nature, had its settled price. Bestiality was rated at two hundred and fifty Livres. Dispensations were granted, not only for past sins, but for such as any one had a mind to commit. In the Archives of Joinville an Indulgence was found, granted to the Cardinal of Lorraine and twelve of his retinue, whereby the remission of three Sins, which ever they chose to name, should be anticipated to each of them. Le Laboureur relates of the Duchess of Burgundy and Auvergne, Sister to Charles VIII. that she had the privilege of obtaining absolution from all her sins as long as she should live, for herself and ten of her attendants, upon forty-seven festivals, without reckoning Sundays. This created no surprize in those times. Public offices of Indulgences were opened in all parts, and they were farmed out like Custom-house Duties. Most of those public offices were kept in alehouses, by which means the Preacher, the Farmer, and the Distributor were all gainers. The Pope gave part of the money to his Sister, and no body as yet complained. The Preachers declared openly from the Pulpit, that if a man was even to ravish the Virgin Mary, he would be forgiven upon purchasing an Indulgence, and the people listened to them with devotion. But this farm in Germany happening to be given to the Dominicans, the Augustines, who had been long in Possession of it, grew jealous; and this little clashing of interests betwixt those two Orders of Friars in a corner of Saxony, was the Source of the Reformation.” See Paolo Sarpi’s History of the Council of Trent, toward the beginning.

of the Empire; and that there was no other way to appease them, but by reducing the election of Tribunes to its ancient footing; at which the people were so terrified that they chose all their Tribunes the next year out of the Nobility. We may see likewise how the Roman Generals had recourse to Religion, to encourage their troops at the siege of Veii, for the Alban Lake having overflowed its banks, to the great surprize of every body, and the Soldiers being tired out with the hardships of a ten years siege, and impatient to be at home again, the Commanders pretended to consult the Oracle of Apollo, from which they assured them they received for answer, that they should take Veii the same year that the Alban Lake overflowed its banks. Animated with this hope, the Soldiers patiently submitted to all the fatigues of war, till Camillus took the City; which he did that very year *. Thus Religion was of great Service in reducing that place, and restoring the Tribuneship to the Nobility; neither of which perhaps could otherwise

* Livy relates a noble circumstance concerning the behaviour of Camillus upon this occasion.—It appears from a thousand passages in the Ancients, that the Heathens imagined there were some Deities who envied the prosperity of mankind, and never failed, sooner or later, to visit those that were remarkably happy, with some heavy misfortune. Camillus therefore could not see the triumphs of Rome, over the ruins of Veii, without apprehending some such vicissitude; upon which account, he prayed that if the prosperity of Rome was to be balanced by some evil, he alone, and not his Country, might suffer it. Dictator Camillus, says Livy, lib. V. cap. xxi. captâ Veiorum “urbe, præcones edicere jubet, ut ab inermi turbâ abstineatur: is finis sanguinis fuit. Dedi inde inermes cæpti, & ad prædam miles discurret; quæ cum ante oculos ejus aliquanto spe atque opinione major, majorisque pretii rerum ferretur, dicitur manus ad cælum tollens precatus esse Dictator, ut si cui hominum Deorumve nimia sua fortuna populique Romani videretur, eam invidiam lenire suo privato incommodo, quam minimo publico populique Romani liceret.” Could any thing be more Heroic than this in a Heathen? What greatness of mind! does it not in some measure resemble St. Paul’s “wishing himself accursed for the Israelites his brethren and “kinsmen?” Plutarch observes that when Camillus beheld the devastation of so flourishing a City, he could not refrain from tears before he made his prayer to the Gods. “Αλθης δε της πολεις κατα κρατος, και των Ρωμαιων αγωντων και φεροντων απειρον τινα πλετον, εφορων ο Καμιλλος απο της ακρας τα πραττομενα, πρωτον μεν εως εδακρυσεν, ειτα μακαρισθεις υπο των παροντων, ανεχε τας χειρας τοις θεοις, και προσευχομενος ειπε,” &c. Plutarch in Vita Camilli. See Valerius Maximus, lib. I. cap. v.

have been effected without much difficulty.—Let me quote another example to the same purpose. There had been great Tumults in Rome, occasioned by Terentillus, a Tribune of the people, who wanted to have a Law passed, (the tenor of which shall be taken notice of in its proper place) that would have borne hard upon the Nobility. To prevent this, the Nobility availed themselves of Religion two ways. In the first place, they caused the Sibylline books to be consulted, and this answer to be returned from them, “ that “ the City would be in great danger of losing its liberties “ that very year, if civil discords were not prevented :” which artifice, (though it was discovered by the Tribunes) had such an effect upon the people, that they grew cool in the matter, and refused to support them any longer. The other expedient was this. One Appius Herdonius, having put himself at the head of a multitude of Slaves and Exiles, which amounted to no less than four thousand, seized upon the Capitol in the night, to the great consternation of the whole City; it being feared that if the Æqui and the Volsci, perpetual enemies of the Roman name, should make any attempt upon the City at that time, they would certainly take it; and the Tribunes still obstinately persisting in having the Terentilian law passed, and pretending that the report of the Capitol being seized upon, was only a false alarm, Publius Rubetius, a man of gravity and authority, came out of the Senate-house, and partly by fair words, partly by threats, sometimes representing to them what danger the City was in, sometimes how unseasonable their demand was at that time, made such an impression upon the minds of the Plebeians, that having all taken an oath of fidelity and obedience to the Consul, they presently ran to arms, and recovered the Capitol. But the Consul Publius Valerius, being killed in the attack, Titus Quintius was immediately made Consul in his room; who not giving the people time to take breath, lest they should revive their clamours for the Terentilian law, ordered them to march with him directly against the Volsci; insisting that by the oath they had taken to obey the Consul, they were obliged to follow him; and though this was opposed by the Tribunes, who alledged, that the oath they had taken extended no further than to the late Consul: yet such was the veneration for Religion in those times, as Livy informs us, that the people chose rather to follow the Consul, than listen to the suggestions of the Tribunes, and adds the following reflection to their great honour. “ Nondum hæc, quæ nunc tenet sæculum, negligentia Deorum venerat, nec interpretando sibi quisque jusjurandum & leges aptas faciebat.” i. e. “ That contempt of the Gods which has overspread this age, was not then known, nor did private men dare to interpret oaths as they pleased, or accommodate the laws to their own private interest and advantage.” The Tribunes therefore apprehending they should otherwise lose all their power, promised to obey the Consul, and not to insist upon the Terentillan law for the space of twelve months; provided the Consuls did not lead out the people to war during the same term. And thus Religion enabled the Senate to surmount this difficulty; which they could not have done without that assistance.

C H A P. XIV.

The Romans interpreted their Auspices according to the necessity of the times, and wisely pretended to conform to the Institutions of their Religion, even when they were obliged to act counter to them: but if any one openly and rashly despised them, he was always punished for it.

AUGURIES, as I have said before, were a considerable part of the Gentile Religion, and contributed not a little to the grandeur and felicity of the Roman Common-wealth. Upon which account, the Romans held them in greater veneration than any other ordinance or Religious institution, and always had had recourse to them in the election of Consuls, in engaging in any enterprize, in conducting their armies, in chusing the time and place of battle, and in short, in all undertakings of importance, whether civil or military : nor did they ever go upon any expedition, till they had possessed their Soldiers with a persuasion that the Gods had promised them success. Now amongst other orders of their Soothsayers, there were certain officers called Pullarii *, who always attended their armies, and were to give their presages when they were preparing to engage the enemy. If the poultry would eat, they looked upon it as a good omen, but if they would not, they carefully avoided an engagement. Nevertheless, when their own reason shewed them the absolute necessity of acting, they proceeded accordingly, though the Auspices proved ever so unfavourable; but in this they conducted themselves so adroitly, and with such caution, that they seemed not to have acted either in defiance or contempt of their Religion; as the Consul Papirius did before an engagement with the Samnites, which was of such fatal consequence to them that they never afterwards were able to make head against the Romans. For Papirius lying encamped with his army near that of the Samnites, in such a situation and circumstances, that he thought a victory certain if they came to action, was very desirous to engage; and therefore ordered the Pullarii “to take an omen;” but the poultry refusing to peck, and the chief of the Pullarii seeing the eagerness of the army to fight, as well as the assurance that both the Soldiers and the General had of a victory, and being loath to disappoint them of so fair an opportunity of success, reported to the Consul, that he had taken an omen, and that it was a very propitious one. Upon which, Papirius immediately drew up his forces in order of battle; but some of the other Pullarii happening to blab it out

* They took Omens from the feeding of the Sacred Poultry, as they called the chickens that were under their care and inspection for that purpose, amongst the Soldiers that the poultry would not eat, they acquainted Spurius Papirius, the Consul's Nephew, with it, who immediately carried the report to his Uncle. But the Consul calmly replied, "do you take care of your own post, as to the army and myself, the Auspices are sufficiently favourable to us, and if the Chief of the Pullarii has told me a falsehood, the consequences will fall upon himself." That the event therefore might correspond with the omen, he ordered his Officers to place the Pullarii in the front of the Battle, and marched directly against the enemy. But as they were advancing, one of the Roman Soldiers, throwing a dart at random, happened to kill the Chief of the Pullarii; which being reported to the Consul, "Then, said he, I am sure all things will go well, the Gods are appeased, and the death of the Pullarius has expiated his lie;" and thus by dexterously accommodating his resolution to the Auspices, he engaged the enemy, and beat them; his Soldiers being persuaded he had not in anywise acted contrary to the rites of their Religion. —Appius Pulcher, on the contrary, happening to command in Sicily, during the time of the first Punic war, and being desirous to engage the Carthaginian army, ordered the Pullarii to take an omen; and they informing him that the poultry would not eat, he said, "let us see then whether they will drink," and immediately threw them into the Sea. But coming to an engagement with the enemy, he lost the day; for which he was sent for to Rome and disgraced*, whilst

* Valerius Maximus relates this of Publius Claudius, l. I. c. iv. It is also told of Diagoras, or as some say of Protagoras, who was punished by the Athenians for ridiculing their established Religion: for he not only divulged the Eleusinian mysteries and laughed at them, but cut a Statue of Hercules to pieces, for fire wood to boil his turnips; as we are told by the Scholiast on Aristophanes in Nub. Act III. Scene i. and by Athenagoras in Legat. Father Garaffe likewise speaks of it in his Doctrine curieuse, liv. II. sect. v. "Diagoras, says he, going one day into an Inn, in which he found there was nothing to be had for dinner but a few turnips, laid hold of an old Statue of Hercules, who was the tutelar Deity of the house, and accosted him in this manner, Veni Hercules, tertium Decimum subi certamen, Papirius, on the other hand, was honoured and rewarded; not because one had gained a victory and the other been defeated; but because one had prudently evaded the Auspices, and the other had rashly and openly defied them. For this sort of Divination was calculated only to inspire the Soldiery with that courage and assurance of success in time of action, which so much contributes to victory; and it was practised not only by the Romans, but by other people, of which I shall give an example in the next Chapter.

C H A P. XV.

That the Samnites had recourse to Religion, as the only Remedy when their affairs were become desperate.

THE Samnites having been often defeated by the Romans, and reduced to the last extremity by the death of a great number of their Soldiers and Officers, who were killed in a battle that happened in Tuscany; their allies also, the Tuscans, Gauls, and Umbrians, being so weak that they were incapable of giving them any further assistance, Livy tells us, “nec suis nec externis viribus jam stare poterant, tamen bello non abstinebant, adeo ne infeliciter quidem defensæ libertatis tædebat, & vinci quàm non tentare victoriam malebant.” i. e. “They could neither support themselves by their own strength nor that of others, yet they continued the war; and though they had been so unsuccessful in the defence of their liberties, they still persisted in it, and chose rather to be conquered, than not en-

“& excoque lentem.” “Come Master Hercules, here’s a thirteenth labour for you, you must boil me these turnips.” Another time, going into a Court-yard where the Priests were taking an Augury from the feeding of birds, and seeing the whole College was greatly terrified because the chickens did not eat, he took them, in a seeming passion, and dipping them three or four times over head in a tub of water, you shall drink, however, said he, if you won’t eat.”

“deavour to conquer.” They resolved, therefore, to exert their utmost endeavours in the last push they were able to make; but, as they well knew a victory was not to be hoped for, when the soldiers were diffident and dispirited, and that nothing could so effectually inspire them with courage as Religious considerations, they determined, by the advice of Ovius Paccius, one of their Priests, to revive an ancient ceremony that had long been neglected; which they did in this manner. Having erected an Altar, they offered up a solemn sacrifice, and made the principal officers of their army swear, never to run away in time of battle: after which they called the common soldiers one by one, into an area near the Altar, surrounded by Centurions with drawn swords in their hands; where they first obliged them to take an oath, not to divulge any thing they should either see or hear there. When this was done, having repeated several forms of execration, and fearful curses upon those that should violate their oath, they made them promise and swear again, that they would always be ready to march whithersoever they were commanded by their Generals; that they would never turn their back in battle; that they would kill any of their fellow-soldiers, if they saw them do so; and then to pray, that if they did not religiously observe all this, destruction might fall upon themselves, their families, and posterity; but some of them making a scruple of taking these oaths, were instantly run through the body by the Centurions; which had such an effect upon the rest, who were terrified at the ferocity of the spectacle, that they all complied. To add still more to the solemnity and magnificence of this ceremony, one half of the army, which consisted of forty thousand men, were cloathed in white, with crests and plumes of feathers upon their helmets; after which, they encamped near Aquilonia. But Papirius being ordered to march against them, told his soldiers at the conclusion of an harangue which he made to animate them, “Cristas non vulnere facere, & picta atque

“aurata scuta transire Romanum pilum.” i. e. “That crests and plumes could do them no harm, nor were gilt and painted shields proof against a Roman javelin:” and to prevent his men from being dispirited by the effects which perhaps they might think the oaths beforementioned, would have upon the enemy, he said, those oaths were more likely to daunt than animate them; because, they must of necessity be afraid, not only of the Gods, but of their enemy; nay, of their own fellow-soldiers too, at the same time. However, when the two armies came to engage, the Samnites were routed: for the valour of the Romans, and the dejection of an enemy, who had been so often defeated by them, got the better of all that resolution which Religion and their oaths had inspired them with. Nevertheless, we may see from hence, the opinion they had of these things, by having recourse to them as the last and only expedient that could give them any hopes of restoring their former courage; which fully shews how much confidence Religion is capable of creating in the minds of men when prudently applied. And though, perhaps, this discourse might more properly have been inserted amongst those, that relate to transactions which happened out of the City; yet, as it has some sort of connection with one of the most important institutions in the Roman Common wealth, I thought it better to introduce it in this place; lest by leaving the Subject unfinished, I should be forced to return to it hereafter.

C H A P. XVI.

If a people accustomed to live under the dominion of a Prince, should by any accident become entirely free, they will find it a very difficult matter to maintain their liberty.

HOW hard it is for a people that have been used to live in subjection to a Prince, to preserve their liberty, if by any means they become free, as the

the Romans did after the expulsion of the Tarquins, may be shewn from numberless examples that occur in ancient history. Indeed it cannot well be otherwise: for the multitude differs but little from a wild beast, which, (how fierce and savage soever it may be by nature) if it gets loose after it has been long confined and kept in subjection, yet, not knowing how to support itself, or whither to fly for shelter, may easily be taken and chained up again, by any one that pleases. So it is with a people, that has been used to be governed by others: for not knowing how to act either offensively or defensively for their own preservation, and having no connexions with any other State, they soon submit to the yoke again, which often proves more heavy and intolerable, than that which they had shaken off before*. These difficulties they are sure to encounter, even when the people are not totally depraved; but where the whole mass is corrupted, they cannot maintain their freedom for any time, no not a moment, as I shall shew presently. Let it be remembered then, that I here speak of a people, amongst whom corruption has not yet arrived at the last pitch, but where there are more sparks of virtue than vice still subsisting. To the difficulties already mentioned, we may add one more; and that is, whenever a State becomes free, it is always sure to have many enemies, that will endeavour to subvert it, and

* Strabo says, lib. XII. "That the Royal Family being extinct in Cappadocia, the people refused the permission which the Romans would have given them to be free, and sent Ambassadors to Rome, to declare, that liberty was insupportable to them, and to ask a King. The Romans were surprized at it, and gave them leave to confer the Kingdom on whom they pleased. Accordingly, they chose Ariobarzanes, whose posterity failing in the third generation, Archelaus, though not at all related to that family, was made their King by Mark Anthony!" Might we not justly say of them, "O homines ad Servitutem natos:" "O wretches born to slavery." After all, it is plain, Monarchy was fitter for them than a Common-wealth: a certain turn of mind is necessary not to abuse liberty, and all people have not that turn. Justin says, "the Roman Senate chose Ariobarzanes;" which is the more probable: for what likelihood is there that they should leave the Election of a King to the discretion of the Cappadocians at such a conjuncture?

but few, or no friends to support it. By enemies, I mean those minions that find their advantage in living under a tyrannical government, and grow rich by the bounty and favour of their Prince; who, being deprived of these emoluments, cannot afterwards live contented, but endeavour to introduce tyranny again, that they may be restored to their former authority. The reason why such a State will have few or no friends, is, because free governments usually confer honours and employments upon none but such as have merited them by particular services, and then too with a frugal hand: so that when a man enjoys no more than what he thinks he has deserved, he does not look upon himself to be under any obligation to those that gave it. Besides, the value of those benefits which result from living under a free State, is seldom either acknowledged or known by any, till after they are lost; I mean the quiet enjoyment of their properties without fear or suspicion, as well as the protection of their own persons and children, and the honour of their wives: for no body will own that he is obliged to another man only for doing him no wrong.

To remedy such disorders and inconveniencies, therefore, as must naturally be occasioned by these difficulties, in a State that is newly become free, the wisest, the safest, the most efficacious and necessary expedient is, to kill the sons of Brutus; who, as history informs us, entered into a conspiracy with several other young Romans against their country, for no other reason, but because they did not enjoy so much authority under a Consular government, as they had done before, under a Regal one, and thought, whilst the generality were become free, they alone were become slaves*. For, whoever undertakes to govern a people, either under a Monarchical or Republican form of government, will find that he builds upon a sandy foundation, if he does not secure those that are averse to his new establishment. Indeed I must own,

* They were ordered by their own father to be put to death, who assisted at the execution.

I think those princes unhappy, who are obliged to have recourse to violence, in order to maintain their authority, when the multitude are their enemies; for those that are hated by a few only, may easily find means to rid themselves of them, without much scandal or offence; but when the whole body of the people is provoked, they never can be safe: and the more rigorous they are, the weaker will their government become: so that the best way is, to make the people their friends.

Now though this may seem inconsistent with what I have just before laid down (as I was then speaking of a Common-wealth, but now of a Prince) I shall discuss the matter as briefly as I can in this place, that I may have no occasion to revert to it hereafter.

If then a Prince would recover the affections of a people (I speak of such Princes as have lost them by becoming Tyrants) he must in the first place consider what they most naturally and ardently desire; and he will find they chiefly wish for two things; one of which is, revenge upon those that have been the occasion of their slavery; and the other, an opportunity of recovering their liberties; in the former of which, a Prince has it in his power to give them full satisfaction; but, in the latter, only in some measure. As to the first case, the following example is exactly to the purpose.

Clearchus, the Tyrant of Heraclea, having been banished from thence, it happened that the Nobility, finding themselves too weak to cope with the Plebeians in some dissensions which arose betwixt them, entered into a confederacy with the Tyrant, and brought him into the government again, to the great mortification of the people, who thereby entirely lost their liberties. But Clearchus soon perceiving himself wholly in the hands of the Nobility, who grew so insolent and ambitious, that he could neither satiate nor restrain them; and that he was at the same time exposed, on the other hand, to the resentment of the people, who were enraged to the last degree, at the loss of their liberties, resolved to rid himself of the former, and to make the latter his friends. Taking a convenient opportunity, therefore, he had all the Nobility cut to pieces, to the great satisfaction of the people; and, in this manner, he gratified their revenge, one of the two appetites abovementioned, which are so natural to them.—But, as to the other, that is, the desire of having their liberty restored, in which a Prince cannot wholly comply with them; he ought to examine upon what motives they so passionately wish to be free; and he will find that some few of them do it out of ambition and a thirst of power; but that the generality aspire to it, for no other reason, than that they may live in security, and without fear of oppression. For in all Governments, howsoever they may be constituted, there are seldom more than forty or fifty persons that have any share in the administration; who being but few in comparison with the rest, may easily be guarded against, either by cutting them off, or by conferring such honours and offices upon them, according to every man's rank and importance; that they may all be satisfied. As to the others, who desire nothing more than to live in security, they are soon contented, if such laws and provisions are made as are sufficient to protect them, as well as to support the power of the Prince. When this is once done, and the people observe that their Prince does not attempt to violate those laws upon any occasion whatsoever, they will be easy, and think themselves safe. A proof of this we may deduce from the Kingdom of France, which entirely owes its tranquility to the obligation its Kings lie under to observe an infinity of laws, which effectually provide for the welfare of their subjects. By the fundamental constitutions of that Realm, the King may dispose of his armies and finances as he pleases; but in all other things he is circumscribed by the laws.

Such Princes, therefore, or such Republics as did not take proper care to secure themselves at first, must must either seize the first opportunity of doing it afterwards, as the Romans did, or they will certainly repent of it, when it is too late. For that people not being yet thoroughly corrupted when they recovered their liberty, after the expulsion of the Tarquins, and the execution of the sons of Brutus, were enabled to maintain it, by such expedients as we have already mentioned; but if they had been totally debauched, they could not have found any means sufficient to preserve it; and this we shall demonstrate in the ensuing Chapter.

C H A P. XVII.

If a corrupt People should happened to recover their Liberty, it is almost impossible they should preserve it.

IF the regal Government had continued any longer at Rome, I am apt to believe, that City would soon have become very weak and contemptible: for, considering what a pitch of corruption those Kings were arrived at, had it been propagated through two or three other succeeding reigns, and the people been corrupted too, it would have been utterly impossible to find any means of rescuing it from destruction. But as the body of the people still continued sound, after kingly authority was abolished, it did not prove a matter of any great difficulty to restore liberty and good order. We must lay it down then as a certain truth, that a corrupted State, which has been accustomed to the dominion of a Prince, can never become free, though that Prince and his whole race should be extinguished. For some new Lord will always start up, out of the ruins of his Predecessor; nor will that State ever be settled till a good one succeeds, whose virtue may possibly restore liberty; but even this will continue no longer than the life of such a person: as it happened to Syracuse, at two different times, that is, under the reigns of Dion and Timoleon, whose virtue re-established liberty in that City whilst they lived, though it relapsed into slavery after they were dead. But the most remarkable example is that of the Romans themselves, who, after the expulsion of the Tarquins, presently recovered their liberty, and maintained it; but after the death of Julius Cæsar, Caligula, Nero, and all that family, the same people were never able to make the least struggle for the recovery of their liberties: and this contrariety of events in that State proceeded only from hence, that in the time of the Tarquins the people were not yet debauched; whereas in the reigns of the abovementioned Emperors, they had sunk into the lowest degree of corruption. For, at the former period, it was sufficient to make them take an oath, that they would never suffer any one person to rule over them again, in order to inspire them with an aversion to the name of King, and to keep them firm in their resolution to defend their liberties; but at the latter, neither the authority nor rigour of Brutus, though supported by all the Legions in the East, were capable of making them use any endeavours to maintain that freedom, which, after the example of the first Brutus, he had attempted to restore. This was owing to the corruption that had been introduced amongst the people by the Marian faction, of which Julius Cæsar being afterwards the Head, took such means to dazzle the eyes of the multitude, that they were not aware of the yoke which they themselves were rivetting upon their own necks.

Now, though perhaps what I have already said, may seem sufficient to prove the truth of my assertion; yet, for a further corroboration of it, I shall take leave to instance another example or two of more modern date, and such as may be more familiar, since they relate to transactions that happened amongst people well known in our own times. I say then, that no accident or revolution whatsoever, could have restored the liberties either of the Milanese or Neapolitans, because their manners are totally corrupted:

and this plainly appeared upon the death of Philip Visconti, when the City of Milan made several efforts to recover its freedom, but could never effect it. Happy therefore was it for Rome, that its Kings discovered their corruption so soon; as it caused their expulsion before the venom had time to spread itself amongst the people, and seize upon the vitals of the State: so that the tumults and insurrections which it occasioned there, was so far from being of any prejudice, that they were of the highest service to the people; because the intentions of those that excited them were just and upright. From whence we may draw this conclusion, that where the people are not corrupted, tumults and commotions cannot injure any State; but where they are debauched, the best laws and institutions will signify nothing, except they are enforced by some person of authority, with such a degree of rigour, as will compel the multitude to obey, and become good by necessity. Now, whether this has ever been the case, I confess, I know not: nor am I able to judge, with any certainty, whether it ever can be: for, as I said before, when a City is falling to ruin, through the corruption of the people, if it should ever recover itself for a while, it must be owing to the virtue of some one man, and not to the multitude, who have neither disposition or desire to see good order restored, nor power to maintain it afterwards. And even in that case, it will sink again into its former confusion, as soon as such a person is dead: as it happened to the Thebans, who were enabled, by the virtue of Epaminondas, to keep up the form of a republic whilst he lived; but after his death it was quickly dissolved: the reason of which, is, that the life of one man is not sufficient to accustom a State to live quietly under wholesome laws and institutions, which has been long used to riot in misrule and licentiousness. And if one good man should either live to extreme old age, or be succeeded by another equally virtuous, and neither of them can work a thorough reformation in the people, every thing thing will go to wreck and ruin again when they die; unless, as I before observed, it is prevented by much bloodshed and running great risques: for this corruption and inaptitude to live in freedom arises from an inequality in the State; and, in order to abolish that, it is absolutely necessary to use very extraordinary means indeed, which few people neither know, or would care to put in practice if they did, as shall be shewn more particular in another place*.

C H A P. XVIII.

How Liberty may be supported in a corrupt State, where it has been once established; and in what manner it may be introduced, if it was not established there before.

IT may appear neither unnecessary nor inconsistent with the foregoing discourse, to consider whether Liberty can be maintained in a corrupted State, where it has been once established; and whether it is possible to introduce it, if it was not established there before. I say then that it will be very difficult to do either: and though it is almost impossible to prescribe any certain rules to be observed for the accomplishment of such a plan, (because it will be necessary to proceed according to the degree of corruption in that State) yet, in order to form some judgment of the matter, I shall here enter into a discussion of it.

We must therefore suppose such a State to be corrupted to the last degree, in which case the difficulty will be exceeding great; nay, indeed, it is almost impossible that any laws or regulations whatsoever should be efficacious enough to reform a State, where the depravation is universal: for as good Manners cannot subsist without good Laws, so those Laws cannot be put in execution without good Manners †. Be-

* See the 26th and 35th Chapters of this book.

† "Political writers," says the Author of the Estimate of the Manners and Principles of the Times, vol. II. sect. xi. "have generally attributed the fall of States to some defective, false, or improper sides, sides, the Laws that were made when a State was in its infancy, and whilst the morals of the people were yet untainted, will no longer serve the purpose of government, after men are become wicked and corrupt: for though the laws of a State may be altered upon various accidents and emergencies, yet the fundamental constitutions are seldom or never changed; upon which account, new Laws are not sufficient, because the ancient institutions, which remain in force, often make them liable to be perverted.

For a further explanation of this matter, it is necessary to observe, that in Rome certain fundamen-

“ Principle woven into the original Constitution of their Laws.”—— Now this, in that extent in which it is generally affirmed and understood, seems an entire mistake. For Salutary Principles and Manners will of themselves secure the duration of a State, with very ill modelled Laws: whereas the best Laws can never secure the duration of a State, where its Manners and Principles are corrupted. Of these truths, History affords instances abundant. The general defect therefore of political Institutions hath been, their not effectually providing for the continuance and stability of Principles and Manners; of Religion, Public Spirit, Honour, Temperance, Fortitude. This truth will perhaps be readily allowed, as it regards nations that are deeply sunk in effeminacy, and ready to be swallowed up by some warlike neighbour. But it is no less certain, as it regards the internal balance of power in any nation whatsoever; although volumes have been written on that subject, without so much as taking this truth into the account. To offer one instance out of innumerable that might be brought from every period of History.—It is the sole force of Manners and a Principle, that prevents France from falling into the deepest and most abandoned Despotism. This Principle and its correspondent Manners give the French many of the Blessings of Liberty; whilst their mere political Constitution favours as much of Despotism as that of many of their neighbours, who feel all the rigours of oppression.

Hence then appears the important use of investigating the real and particular State of the Manners and Principles of a Common-wealth; since, though it is a circumstance totally overlooked by many superficial Pretenders to political Science, and loosely and blindly declaimed upon by others, yet it is the only method by which we can rationally determine the strength or weakness, the danger or security of a State.—And here the penetrating Machiavel seems to have erred in his determination upon this point. He says, “ As good Manners cannot submit without good Laws, so those Laws cannot be put in execution without good Manners.” The latter part of the Sentence is a great truth; the former part is a vulgar error. So long as the causes of corrupt Manners are absent, good Manners preserve themselves without Laws, or with bad Laws. Good Laws are only then necessary, as the means of prevention, when corrupt Manners or Customs take place.

tal institutions of government were first established, and afterwards Laws were enacted by which the Magistrates kept the Citizens in their duty. By these institutions, the Government was divided betwixt the People and the Senate, the Tribunes and the Consuls; and forms established for the solicitation of public offices, the creation of Magistrates, and enacting Laws: all which institutions were little or not at all changed in the various revolutions which afterwards happened in that State. The Laws, however, which were calculated to restrain the licentiousness of the people, as those against adultery and ambition, the sumptuary Laws, and several others, were either made or altered at different times, as the Citizens grew worse and worse. But the ancient institutions, which still subsisted, at last becoming ineffectual when the people grew corrupt, the new Laws were neither proper nor sufficient to keep men in due bounds; yet they would have been highly so, if the old institutions had been altered and accommodated to them when they were introduced. And that this was the fact, plainly appears from the forms they observed in creating Magistrates and enacting Laws: for, in the former case, the Romans never conferred either the Consulship, or other great offices in the Commonwealth, upon any one that had not solicited them. Now this institution, without doubt, was good in the beginning of that Republic, because it was supposed that no Citizen would venture to solicit those honours, except he was conscious to himself that he had merited them: and that as a repulse would be attended with ignominy, every man, in order to make himself worthy of them, would endeavour to behave well. But in course of time, when the Citizens were become exceedingly corrupt, this custom, instead of answering the first design of it, was of very great prejudice: for then those that had the most power, and not those that were the most virtuous, began to solicit the highest honours in the state; whilst those that were poor, though they they were good men, durst not offer themselves as Candidates, for fear of meeting with a disgraceful rebuff*. This inconvenience did not come upon the Romans all at once, but step by step, and, like most other evils, gradually: for, after they had conquered Asia and Africa, and reduced by much the greater part of Greece to subjection, they began to grow too secure and negligent of their liberties, as they thought they had nothing to apprehend from any other quarter. To this fatal security on the one hand, and the weakness of their enemies on the other, it was owing, that in disposing of the Consulship, and other honours, they no longer had so much regard to merit and capacity, as to private favour, and advancing such men to these dignities, as were better versed in the arts of treating, and of canvassing votes at an election, than in those of conquering an enemy. From this, they afterwards proceeded to prefer those that were the richest and most powerful: so that through the defect of the original Institution, all good and virtuous men were totally excluded from any share in the Administration.

In the other case, that is, in making Laws, a Tribune, or any other Citizen, was at liberty to propose a new one to the people; that so every one might speak either for or against it, before it was passed, if

* Upon this passage, the late quoted Author says, vol. II. sect. xiii. "Mark the uniform effects of the same Principles and Causes, working at the distance of two thousand years. As the times were tumultuous till the Union of the Houses of York and Lancaster, it was common before that period for Sheriffs to omit or excuse the not making returns for several of the Boroughs within their Counties. Sometimes giving for the reason of their omission, that these Boroughs were not able to send any Burgesses, because of their Poverty, which was never then complained of, or objected to by the Boroughs themselves; though several acts of Parliament had been made to compel the Sheriffs to make returns for all the Boroughs: nay, several of the Boroughs, after they had once or twice sent up their Representatives, found the burden too great, and procured perpetual exemptions, which remain to this day."—How differently do we value this Right at present, when no price is thought too great for the purchase of a Borough; and no Family, how ancient or honourable soever, is of any consequence, but in proportion to these modern possessions?

he pleased : and this likewise was a good Institution whilst the people continued uncorrupt. For then it was certainly of Advantage to the State, that any one who thought himself capable of doing the public a service, should have leave to offer his proposals : and that every other person should be indulged with the privilege of declaring his opinion of them ; to the end, that when both sides of the question had been thoroughly examined and discussed, the people might chuse that which seemed upon the whole to be most reasonable and convenient. But after the Citizens had lost their virtue, this Institution also was attended with very bad consequences, because none but great and powerful men were then allowed to propose any law to the people ; of which they made so ill an use, that they seldom proposed any thing, but what contributed more to establish and augment their own power and personal interest, than to benefit the public : and, what was still worse, the people were become so abject and corrupt, that no-body durst oppose these innovators : so that being either deceived by their artifices, or over-awed by their power, they were forced to consent to their own ruin.

In order therefore to have preserved the liberties of Rome, even after it became so corrupt, it was necessary, as they made new laws, to have altered the fundamental Institutions also : for good men and bad are to be governed in a very different manner, and where the matter is not the same, the forms ought to be varied. But since these Institutions must be altered, either all at once, as soon as their inconvenience is generally acknowledged ; or by little and little, before it is obvious to every one ; I say that it is hardly possible to do either ; for to alter them by degrees, the wisdom of some provident and sagacious Citizen is requisite, who can foresee the danger at a distance, and warn the people of it before it happens. Perhaps, however, such a man may never be born in a particular State ; and if there should, he may not be able to convince others of the expediency of what he himself perceives perceives necessary : for when men have been long accustomed to any way of life, it is no easy matter to introduce a change amongst them ; especially if they do not immediately see the evil that is apprehended with their own eyes, but are to be wrought upon by arguments and probable conjectures.—As for altering these Institutions all at once, when every body perceives they are no longer of any service, but far otherwise ; I say that it is much more easy to find out the inconvenience than to remedy it : because this cannot be done by ordinary means, when those very means themselves have lost their efficacy, and would even contribute to a contrary end. Recourse therefore must necessarily be had to extraordinary means, such as force and arms : for a man cannot new model a State as he pleases, except he first seizes upon the government, and takes it wholly into his own hands. Now as he must be supposed to be a good man who is desirous to reform a State ; and another a bad man, who makes use of violence to get the government of it entirely into his hands ; it very seldom happens that an honest man will avail himself of forcible and injurious methods to become absolute, be his intentions ever so upright ; or that a wicked man, when he has made himself so, will ever do any good, or employ that authority well, which he has done so much evil to acquire.

From what has been said, it will appear how difficult, or rather how impossible it is, either to maintain liberty, or to re-establish it, if lost, in any State, when the people are become corrupt : but if any means could be found out to effect either, I should think it must be by reducing it nearer the standard of a monarchical than of a popular Government ; that so the insolence of such as could not be kept within proper bounds by laws, might be effectually curbed by the power of a Magistrate, whose authority should in some measure resemble that of a King : and to attempt a reformation any other way, would be an undertaking that must prove either vain and fruitless, or attended attended with great violence and cruelty. For if Cleomenes succeeded, as I have said before, by causing all the Ephori to be killed, in order to take the Government wholly upon himself; if Romulus put his Brother Remus, and Ticus Tatius the Sabine to death for the same purpose, and afterwards made a good use of their power; it must be observed, that the Subjects of neither State were corrupted to such a degree as those of whom we have been speaking in this Chapter: and therefore they were both enabled to effect what they undertook, and to put a good face upon it also when they had done.

C H A P. XIX.

When a good foundation is once laid, if a weak Prince should succeed an able one, he may support himself in the Government: but if one weak Prince should succeed another, it is impossible to maintain any State.

IF we consider the abilities and conduct of Romulus, Numa, and Tullus Hostilius, the three first Kings of Rome, we shall find it was extremely fortunate for that City that its first King was courageous and warlike, the second pacific and devout, and the third of the same stamp with Romulus, more inclined to war than peace. For if a Prince was necessary, after the first Institution of Government there, who should civilize and form the people to the duties of Society, it was no less necessary that he should be succeeded by another, who should be animated with the same valour and martial spirit that Romulus was; otherwise the Citizens would have become effeminate, and the City fallen a prey to its neighbours.

From hence we may observe, that if a Prince who is not altogether so valiant and enterprizing as another whom he happens to succeed, the State may still be supported by the merits of his Predecessor, and he may enjoy the fruit of his labours: but if it comes to pass that either he himself lives a long time, or is not succeeded by another of the same turn with the first, the State must of course be ruined. On the contrary, if a martial and courageous Prince succeeds one similar to himself, very great things are commonly effected, and such as immortalize their names. David without doubt distinguished himself no less by feats of arms, than by his piety and wisdom: and the consequence was, that after he had subdued all his enemies, he left his Kingdom in peace to his Son Solomon, who was enabled to support it at all times by the arts of peace only, and reigned happily all his life; which was wholly owing to the virtues of his Father. But it happened otherwise to Rehoboam, who inheriting neither the valour of his Grandfather, nor the wisdom of his Father, was hardly able to keep possession of a Sixth part of his Kingdom. Bajazet II. Sultan of the Turks, though naturally more inclined to peace than war, still maintained the acquisitions that had been made by his father Mahomet; who, like David, having conquered all the neighbouring States, left a large Empire to his Son, and so well established by his valour, that it might easily be preserved firm and entire during his life, by pacific measures alone. Nevertheless, if Bajazet's Son Selim, the present Grand Seignor, had not been more like his Grandfather than his Father, that Empire must have been ruined; but as it happens, he seems more likely to excel his Grandfather than to fall short of him.

From these examples we may see that a weak and pusillanimous Prince may support himself, provided he succeeds a warlike and enterprising one: but if one weak Prince immediately succeeds another, it is impossible any Government should subsist; except, like France, it be supported by virtue of its ancient laws and fundamental constitutions. By weak Princes, I mean those that are not given to arms; and shall conclude this discourse with observing that the tranquillity of Numa's reign, which lasted many years, was owing to the warlike Spirit of Romulus; which being revived in Tullus Hostilius, the third King, procured him the same degree of reputation. Tullus was succeeded by Ancus Martius, a Prince of such a disposition that he knew how to support the State either by the arts of peace or war *. In the beginning of his reign he was inclined to pacific measures; but when he perceived that his neighbours judged from thence, that he was effeminate, and made little account of him, he thought it necessary for the preservation of his Kingdom, to convince them of the contrary, by following the steps of Romulus rather than of Numa. Let it be observed therefore by all Princes, that those, who imitate Numa, may chance either to keep or lose their dominions, according to the difference of the times and circumstances of things: but such as follow the example of Romulus, and arm themselves like him, with prudence and valour, will be able to main-

* It must be owned that Machiavel has given us a curious Analysis, or Investigation of the first Principles of the Roman Government, according to the account he receives of their polity from the Historian he comments upon. But if the History of the Seven Kings of Rome rests upon no better a foundation than that of the Seven Champions of Christendom, as some authors of great reputation have not scrupled to assert, then all that has been said by so many writers concerning the remarkable good fortune of Rome, in having so many succeeding Princes of such particular dispositions as were exactly suited to the times, and absolutely necessary for the establishment of an infant State, must stand for nothing: Livy's History itself must then be looked upon in no other light than that of a Romance, or "a well invented flam," and consequently the magnificent Superstructure which the Florentine has erected upon it, of course fall to the ground. What pity it is that such great and generous actions, and such noble speeches as we meet with in almost every page of that Historian; clothed with so many brilliant circumstances, and related in so lively a manner, that one would be apt to imagine he had either seen or heard them done and spoken himself, or at least had them from somebody else that did, should, after all, prove not to have one word of truth in them, but to be cooked up only for persons that probably never existed! What a shame that such "Fathers of History," as they are sometimes called, should more justly deserve the name of "the Fathers of lies!" But such is the frivolity (if I may be indulged that word) of all History, especially of those that are most solemn, and appear most specious and plausible. A mortifying consideration indeed! who can forbear shaking his head, and crying out with the Poet,

O Curas hominum, & quantum in rebus inane!

Or rather with the Italians,

tain their State in all times and circumstances; except they are overpowered by some extraordinary and irresistible force. It may then be looked upon as certain, that if the third King of Rome had not been a warlike Prince, and one that knew how to retrieve the declining reputation of that State by dint of arms, it never could (or with very great difficulty at least) have acquired such a degree of strength and firmness, nor have effected the prodigious things it afterwards did. It must be owned however; that whilst it continued under a Monarchical Government, it was liable to the double danger of being ruined either by the weakness of one Prince, or the ferocity and tyranny of another:

C H A P. XX.

That if one martial Prince succeeds another, they may do very great things: and that as well governed Republics must of necessity have virtuous men to conduct them, their conquests and acquisitions will be proportionable to their virtue:

AFTER the Romans had abolished Monarchy; they were no longer exposed to the dangers abovementioned, which they had been subject to before, under every King, whether he was pacific and gentle, or fierce and warlike. For the Sovereign power was vested in Consuls, who arrived at that dignity, neither by right of succession or inheritance, nor by fraud or violence of any kind; but by the free suffrages of their fellow-citizens, and therefore were always persons of distinguished merit and valour. So that the State, availing itself of a long succession of virtuous men, arrived at its highest pitch of grandeur in the same number of years that it had been governed by kings. And no wonder, when we see that even two great Princes (one succeeding the other) are sufficient to conquer the world; as Philip of Macedon, and his Son Alexander did. If this was possible in a Monarchy, surely it is much more so in a Republic, which has it in its power to elect not only two, but an infinite number of such men in a continual and uninterrupted succession to one another: so that a succession of this kind may easily be established and kept up in a well governed Commonwealth*.

C H A P. XXI.

Those Princes and Republics are highly to be blamed that have not troops of their own †.

IF any Princes or Republics in these times have not forces of their own, sufficient either to defend themselves, or attack their enemies, they ought to take the shame to themselves: since it is plain, from the example of Tullus Hostilius, that such a defect is not owing to any want of men that are fit to bear arms, but to their own fault in neglecting to inure their subjects to the exercise of them. For, when Tullus succeeded to the Kingdom, the Romans having been forty years in peace, he could not find a man in his dominions who had ever been a Soldier. Nevertheless, as he determined to engage in a war, he wisely resolved not to employ either the Samnites, or Tuscans, or any other Mercenaries, but to avail himself of his own Subjects: and such were his military abilities, that he soon made them excellent soldiers. And, it is most certain, that if there are not soldiers, wherever there are men enow, it is entirely to be imputed either to the negligence or incapacity

* A Commonwealth may certainly boast one advantage, which hereditary Kingdoms have not. In Commonwealths, the Sovereign is neither too young nor too old, and has neither the infirmities of childhood, nor those of old age. But Kingdoms have not that happiness: they experience at one time the disorders of a minority, at another, the wild heat of youthful blood, and at another, the tardiness and weight of declining years.

of the Government, and not to any defect in nature, or peculiarity in the Country where they live; of which we have a very recent proof: for every body knows, that when the King of England invaded France a little while ago, he had not a man in his army who was not his own Subject; yet though that nation had not been at war for the space of thirty years before, nor was there either an officer or private man in those troops, who had ever seen the face of an enemy; yet they were not afraid to make a descent upon a Kingdom, where there were so many experienced Generals and such numbers of well disciplined forces, who had served for many years together in the Italian wars. This was wholly owing to the wisdom of the Prince, and the good order and military exercise kept up in that Kingdom: where they never cease to discipline their troops and make them ready for war, even in time of the most profound peace*. After Pelopidas and Epaminondas had rescued their countrymen, the Thebans, from the subjection they were under to the Spartans, and saw they were become abject and spiritless by a long course of servitude; yet, such were the abilities and courage of

* Upon this passage, the Author of the "Estimate, &c." says as follows, vol. II. sect. vii. "If the Principles maintained in this work be true, the defect of valour in a national Militia, will not lie amongst the private Men, but the Officers. And indeed, who can seriously believe that those Gentlemen that find the attendance upon a Quarter Sessions for the service of their Country, too severe a burden of duty upon their enervated bodies and minds, will vigorously undertake and go through the dangers and fatigues of warlike Service? It must therefore be expected, as a certain event, that a Militia will, on its first institution, and for a long time be useless. But this is not said with a view to discourage the Establishment, but only to prevent groundless expectations, which being disappointed in the first raising of the Militia, might lead the nation into a belief, that the institution could never be useful. This, therefore, is no reason why a Militia should not be set on foot, but rather a good reason for its speedy establishment: because the continued exercise of a Militia, if undertaken with that vigour and serious intention which it deserves, is perhaps the most promising means of rekindling by slow degrees the military Spirit amongst us. As a rational encouragement to the hopes of the nation, let us cast our eyes back upon former times, and hear the judgment of a great foreigner." He then quotes this passage from Machiavel.—The King of England above-mentioned was Henry VII.

those two chiefs, that they soon re-established military discipline amongst that people, and revived their ancient valour to such a degree, that they not only marched boldly into the field against the Spartan army, but utterly defeated it. Upon which, the historian that relates this, remarks, that it was plainly seen from the conduct of these two Generals, that Soldiers were not born at Sparta alone, but were soon to be raised in every country where there were men, provided any one could be found that would be at the pains of disciplining and training them up to arms. The justness of which remark is fully confirmed by the example of Tullus Hostilius, who presently made excellent Soldiers of a raw multitude; as is well observed and expressed by Virgil in the following lines.

Agmina, &c. Æn. VI. 813^a

Him Tullus next in dignity succeeds,
An active Prince, and prone to martial deeds.
He shall his troops for glorious fields prepare,
Disus'd to toils and triumphs of the war.

C H A P. XXII.

What is to be observed from the Combat betwixt the three Horatii of Rome, and the three Curiatii of Alba.

BY the articles of a convention betwixt Tullus Hostilius King of Rome, and Metius Dictator of Alba, who had been at war together, it was agreed, that three of each side should decide the quarrel in a Combat; and that if the three Romans got the better of the three Albans, the latter State should become subject to the former, and contrarywise. For which purpose, three brothers of the Horatian family being appointed appointed by the Romans, and three brothers of the Curiatian by the Albans, as their Champions, to end the dispute; it happened that all three on the Alban side were killed, and only one on the Roman was left alive. But the surviving Horatian returning in triumph to Rome, with the spoils of his Antagonists upon his back, amongst which was a cloke that had been curiously wrought by his own Sister, who was espoused to one of the Curiatii; and chancing to meet that Sister in his way back to the City, she could not help bursting into tears at the death of her lover, which provoked him to such a degree, that he immediately killed her. For this fact, however, he was brought to a trial; but acquitted after long debate: and at last, more through the intercession of his father, than any consideration of his own merit*.

From hence, there are three things to be observed. In the first place, that no State ought to stake its all upon a part of its forces only: in the next, that in a well ordered government a man's merits and crimes ought not to be balanced against each other: and lastly, that it is imprudent to enter into any engagements, where the performance of them is, or ought to be doubted of. For liberty is a thing of such importance to every State, that no one can reasonably imagine, that either of the two abovementioned would long have continued quiet, after they had been reduced into subjection, by the ill success only of three of their own subjects.

This plainly appears from the subsequent conduct of Metius, who, though he acknowledged himself subdued after the Horatii had got the better of the Curatii, and promised obedience to Tullus as his Sovereign; yet, in the first expedition which the Romans afterwards undertook against the Veientes, he shewed, that he regretted the loss he had sustained by the rash covenant he had lately made, and would have deceived Tullus, if he could. But as I have elsewhere discussed this point more at large *, I shall only speak of the two first in the two following Chapters.

C H A P. XXIII.

That a State ought not to venture its all upon a part of its forces only: upon which account, it is often of great prejudice to defend passes.

HE surely can never be thought a wise man who risks his whole fortune, without exerting his utmost efforts at the same time. And yet, this has been done at various times and in different manners. As first, by acting like Tullus Hostilius and Metius, when they committed the whole fortune and happiness of themselves, their Country, and of so many brave men as each of them had in their respective armies, to the valour and fortune of three of their subjects alone, who were but a very trifling part of their strength: not considering that by such a manner of proceeding, all the pains which their Ancestors had taken, in founding and forming those States, to establish liberty upon the firmest bottom, and to enable their Successors to defend it, were rendered vain and ineffectual, by putting it in the power of so few to lose it: which was certainly an act of extreme rashness and imprudence.

Those likewise are guilty of the same error, who, upon the approach of an Enemy, risque all upon the defence of certain passes and strong holds: for this is almost always a very dangerous plan, except it can be conveniently done with all their forces; in which case, without doubt, such a step ought to be taken: but if those places are either so barren or so strait that they can neither support nor contain all their forces, it may prove of fatal consequence. What induces me to think so is, the example of such as having been invaded by a powerful enemy, who, though their country was surrounded with mountains, never offered to make any stand against them in the passes upon those mountains, but always either advanced to meet them, or waited for them in some such plain and open part of the country nearer home, as they thought would best suit their purpose. The reasons of which have been already assigned: for, as they could not post any considerable number of men to guard those passes, because there would neither be provisions sufficient to support them long there, nor room enough to hold many soldiers, it would not be possible to resist a numerous army that came to attack them: but the enemy may march in as large a body as they please, because it is not their intention to stay in that place, but to pass it as soon as they can, and be gone; whereas, a great number of the other side cannot wait long for them, in those barren and strait places; which yet, perhaps, they would find necessary from the uncertainty of the Enemy's arrival. So that when that pass is abandoned, which you had hoped to maintain, and upon which you and your Soldiers chiefly depended, both your own Subjects, and the rest of your army will be so dispirited, that you will be ruined without striking a stroke, by having staked your all upon part of your strength only.

Every one knows what difficulties Hannibal encountered, when he passed the Alps, which divide France from Lombardy, and afterwards those mountains that separate Lombardy and Tuscany: and yet the Romans waited for him first upon the Tesino, and afterwards upon the plains of Arezzo, chusing rather to venture an engagement with him in the field, where their army might have some chance to defeat the Enemy, than to lead it into places where it was sure to perish through want and other inconveniencies. And if we read History with care and attention, we shall find that very few good Generals ever thought of defending such passes; not only for the reasons already given, but because it is impossible to secure them all;

both the mountains and plains having their by-roads, as well as those that are common and usually frequented: and though strangers, perhaps, may not know them, yet the people of the country are well acquainted with them, and always ready enough to shew to those who desire to elude all opposition; of which we had a remarkable example, no longer ago than the year 1515. When Francis I. King of France, had formed a design to invade Italy, in order to recover the State of Milan: the chief objection that was urged by such as opposed it, was, that the Swiss would obstruct his passage over the mountains. But experience afterwards shewed the futility of that objection: for the King turning out of the common road, in which the Swiss had strongly fortified two or three passes, and taking a by-way that they knew nothing of, arrived in Italy close upon their backs, before they heard any thing of his passage: at which they were so dismayed, that they quitted those posts and retired into Milan; and the Lombards, finding themselves deceived in their opinion that the French would be stopped in the mountains, presently submitted to them.

C H A P. XXIV.

That well governed Republics appoint proper rewards and punishments, according to the merits or demerits of their Citizens, and never balance one against the other.

VERY great, to be sure, was the merits of the surviving brother of the Horatii; as he alone had conquered the Curiatii, and saved his Country: great likewise was the crime he committed afterwards in killing his Sister; at which the Romans were so offended, that they brought him to a trial for it, notwithstanding his services were of such importance, and the sense of them so fresh upon their minds. Now, this perhaps, may seem to those that consider the matter

ter but superficially, a piece of the highest ingratitude in that people: but whoever weighs it more maturely, and duly reflects how necessary a thing justice is in every Republic, and how impartially it ought to be administered, will rather be apt to blame them for acquitting, than for having brought him to a trial. For no well governed Commonwealth ever cancels the demerit of its Citizens, on account of their merit; but having appropriated rewards to the one, and penalties to the other; and having recompensed a man for doing well; if he afterwards does ill, it punishes him according to the nature of his crime, without any regard to his former good actions. Where these ordinances are strictly observed, a State may preserve its liberties a long time; but where they are neglected, it will soon fall to ruin: for, if a man who has done his Country some signal service, should expect not only to be honoured and rewarded for it, but to be indulged with impunity, and a privilege to commit any crime afterwards, his insolence would soon grow insupportable and inconsistent with all civil government.

It is highly necessary, therefore, for the discouragement of bad men, to reward those that are good, as the Romans always did: and, though a State should be poor, and cannot afford to give any considerable reward to the highest degree of merit, yet it should always shew itself grateful, and give as much as it is able: for any little present or favour that is conferred as a reward for virtuous actions (though of the most important service) will always be considered by the receiver as great and honourable. The stories of Horatius Cocles and Mucius Scævola, are generally known; the former of whom alone, bravely maintained the bridge over the Tiber, against the enemy, who wanted to pass it, till the bridge was cut down behind him, and their passage obstructed: and the latter went to the camp of Porsenna, King of the Tuscans, with a design to assassinate him; but mistaking his man, he thrust his own hand into a fire, and and held it there till it was entirely burnt away, to shew the courage and resolution of the Romans: for which extraordinary services, each of them was rewarded with two acres of land *. The example of Manlius Capitolinus is no less remarkable, who, having driven away the Gauls from the Capitol, which they had besieged, was recompensed for it by his fellow-citizens with a present of a small quantity of corn; which, according to the necessity of the times, was looked upon as an honourable and adequate reward. But the same Manlius, either out of envy or ambition, afterwards endeavouring to excite sedition and tumults in the City, and to make himself too popular, was thrown headlong from the Capitol, which he had relieved with so much glory and reputation, without the least regard to the merit of his former actions.

C H A P. XXV.

Whoever would reform the Government in a free State, ought to retain the shadow at least of its ancient Customs and Institutions.

IN order to reform a Government in such a manner as to make it not only firm and permanent, but agreeable to the people, the Reformer ought to keep up the shadow and form at least of its ancient customs and institutions, that so the multitude may be as little aware as possible of the innovations, though the new ordinances should be wholly different from the old ones: for the generality of mankind not penetrating very far into things, are often amused with the shadow as much as the substance, and sometimes indeed exterior appearances make a deeper impression upon them than realities. The Romans, therefore, being sensible of this in the infancy of their Commonwealth, and having created two Consuls instead of one King, thought proper to allow them but twelve Lictors, that so they might not exceed the number of those that were wont to attend upon their Kings. Besides, as there used to be an anniversary Sacrifice at Rome, which could not be celebrated by any person but the King himself, the Romans, fearing the people would otherwise wish for Kings again, created an Officer, whom they called, Rex Sacrificulus, or a sort of Master of the Ceremonies (but in subordination to their Pontifex Maximus, or High Priest) who was to preside at that solemnity; by which expedient, the people were well satisfied with the manner of the Sacrifice, and did not at all repine at the expulsion of Kings, because their ancient forms and customs seemed still to be kept up.

This method, therefore, ought to be observed by every one that would cancel old Institutions, and establish a new and free government; for mankind being naturally averse to any alterations in their laws and customs, care should be taken that such an innovation should retain as much as possible the resemblance at least of their ancient constitution: and if the Magistrates should differ from the former, either in power or number, or the duration of their authority, the same Names and Titles however should be continued. This course, I say again, must be followed by those that would introduce a new and satisfactory kind of government into any State, whether a Monarchy or a Republic*; but for those that want to found an absolute Government, or Tyranny, (as it is called by political writers) they must make a thorough alteration in every thing; as we shall shew in the next Chapter.

C H A P. XXVI.

That a new Prince must change every thing in a State which he has seized upon by force.

WHOEVER makes himself Master of a State, and designs to form a government that shall neither be a free Kingdom nor yet a Republic, but altogether absolute, will find it his surest way to alter every thing in it from top to bottom, in order to support himself; especially if he perceives his foundations are weak and unstable, as probably he may do, being a new Prince. That is, he must create new Magistrates in every City, give them new titles, make choice of new persons, confer new authority, advance the poor, impoverish the rich, “fill the hungry with good things, and send the rich empty away,” as David did when he became a King. Besides this, he must build new Cities, demolish the old ones, and transport the inhabitants of the country from one place to another: in short he must turn every thing in it upside down in such a manner, that no-body shall enjoy either honours, or riches, or authority, or privilege of any kind, but what is immediately derived from him. Philip of Macedon, the Father of Alexander the Great, may serve him for a pattern: of whom the Historians say, that he removed the people he conquered from one Province to another, as Shepherds remove their flocks; and yet, by proceeding in this manner, from a petty Prince he became Master of all Greece. But nothing surely can be more barbarous than such a conduct, nothing more directly opposite to the ends of all civil government, or unworthy not only of a Christian, but of any one who has the least spark of humanity left in his heart. Every one therefore ought to abhor it, and chuse rather to live like a private man, than to make himself an absolute Prince, or rather a Tyrant, by the destruction of so many thousand innocent people. Nevertheless, he that determines to transgress the bounds of virtue and moderation, must of necessity be obliged to take this course, in order to secure himself: but the generality of mankind being neither perfectly good nor wholly evil, are apt to halt betwixt both, and take a middle way; which is productive of the most fatal consequences, and will never enable them to execute any thing great, as shall be shewn in the following Chapter.

C H A P. XXVII.

That very few men can resolve to be either perfectly good, or totally bad.

POPE Julius II. marching with an army in the year 1505, to drive the Bentivogli out of Bologna, of which that family had been Sovereigns a hundred years; determined at the same time to wrest Perugia also out of the hands of Giovanni Paolo Baglioni, who had usurped that State; and in short to dispossess all those that had seized upon any territories belonging to the Church. When he arrived therefore at Perugia with this design, which was well known to every one, he did not wait till his army came up to support him, but immediately entered the City attended only by his train and a very slender guard, though Baglioni was there in person with a good body of troops which he had got together for his defence. In this manner, proceeding with the same boldness and impetuosity that he did in all other things, he put himself entirely into the hands of his enemy; whom yet he brought out of the City with him, and left another Governor of his own appointment there to account for the revenues of that State to the Church. Upon which, all wise and considerate men could not help being surprized at the temerity of the Pope, and the pusillanimity of Baglioni: wondering how it should come to pass, that the latter did not take the opportunity of securing his enemy, as he might have done with great reputation to himself, when he had him fairly in his power, and of filling his coffers not only with the spoils of his Holiness, but of his train too, in which were all the Cardinals with their equipages, and an immense booty of treasure and jewels. For it seemed hardly credible that he should be restrained by religious motives; because they thought a man who had been so wicked as to commit incest with his own Sister, and to murder several of his cousins and nephews to make his way to the Sovereignty, would have easily digested any other scruple of conscience. They concluded therefore, that as few men can resolve to be absolutely good, so it sometimes happens that others cannot prevail upon themselves to become thoroughly abandoned, even though they might acquire thereby a considerable degree of fame; for when a base action seems to carry a certain air of magnanimity or generosity, they know not how to attempt it *. Thus Baglioni, who had made little account of

* Mr. Bayle says that the Phænomena in the History of man puzzle Philosophers, as much as the Phænomena in Natural History, and that few act according to their own principles. The Mahometans, according to their principles, are obliged to make use of force to destroy all other Systems of Religion: and yet they have tolerated them for several ages. "When you meet with infidels, says Mahomet in the ninth Chapter of the Alcoran, kill them, cut off their heads, or make them prisoners, and bind them till they have paid their ransom: be not afraid to persecute them till they have laid down their arms, and submitted to you." For all this, it is certain that the Saracens soon left off those violent methods, and that the Greek Churches have maintained themselves under the yoke of Mahomet to this day. They have their Patriarchs, their Metropolitans, their Synods, their Discipline, and their Monks.—On the other hand, Christians were commanded only to preach and instruct: notwithstanding which, many Christian nations have extirpated those who were not of their persuasion with fire and sword, time out of mind, and done nothing but persecute, though the Gospel absolutely forbids it. One may be certain that if the Christians of the West had borne sway in Asia, in the room

Incest and Parricide, knew not how, (or to speak more properly) had not the Spirit to attempt a thing (even when he had so justifiable and fair an occasion) for which every body would have admired his courage, and extolled him to the skies: as he would have been the first that had shewn the Cardinals how little respect those deserved who lived and domineered like them, by an action of such Eclat as would effectually have extinguished all infamy, and secured him against any future danger.

C H A P. XXVIII.

Whence it came to pass that the Romans were not so ungrateful as the Athenians to their Citizens.

Whoever reads the histories of Republics will find in them all some degree of ingratitude to their Citizens; but less of it at Rome than at Athens, or perhaps in any other Commonwealth. The reason of this I take to be, that the Romans had not so much cause to be jealous of their Citizens as the Athenians. For at Rome no man ever invaded the liberty of others, from the expulsion of their Kings to the times of Marius and Sylla: so that there was no great occasion for jealousy or any apprehension of that kind; and consequently all punishment was unnecessary. But the case was far otherwise at Athens: for that State being deprived of its liberty by Pisistratus, when it was in its most flourishing condition, under a pretence of advancing it to a still higher pitch; as soon as the Citizens recovered it, and began to reflect upon the bitterness of their sufferings, whilst they were subject to a tyrannical go-of the Saracens and Turks, the least traces of the Greek Church would not have been left at this day; and that they would not have tolerated Mahometanism, as the Infidels have tolerated Christianity there. The Reader, if he pleases, may see much more to this purpose in the Note AA, under the word Mahomet I. in Bayle's Dictionary. But the comparison is truly shocking.

vernment, they gave a full loose to their revenge, and punished not only the real crimes of their Citizens, but even the least shadow or appearance of them; for which many excellent men were put to death, and many banished; and from hence arose the custom of Ostracism*, and many other sorts of rigorous punishments, which were inflicted from time to time upon the most considerable of their Subjects. Very just therefore is the observation of some writers upon government, that those who have recovered their liberties, are always more rigid than others who have only preserved them †.

* See the Notes upon the fourth Book of the History of Florence.

† There are two Letters preserved in Laertius, which shew the sense the Athenians had of their Sufferings under Pisistratus; the first runs thus. “ Epimenides to Solon.—Be of good comfort, my friend; for “ if Pisistratus was Ruler of Athenians inured to servitude and void “ of discipline, his Government perhaps might be perpetual. Those “ however that are now in subjection to him, are not men of base “ minds, but such as being mindful of Solon’s instructions are ashamed “ of their bondage, and will not bear his tyranny long. But “ though Pisistratus should make himself Master of the State, I hope, “ it will not descend to his children: for it is hard for free persons, “ brought up under excellent Laws, to suffer bondage. As for you, “ do not wander about, but hasten to me in Crete; where no Tyrant “ will be troublesome to you. If in travelling up and down, you “ should chance to meet with any of his friends, I fear, they will do “ you a mischief.”—This seems to be in answer to the following Epistle to Epimenides.—“ Solon to Epimenides.—Neither are my Laws “ likely to be of any service to the Athenians, nor have you advanced the City by Lustration. For Divine Rites and Law-givers “ alone cannot benefit States; it is of great consequence of what “ mind those are who lead the common people. Divine Rites and “ Laws are profitable, if well directed: if ill, they are of no service. “ Neither are those Laws which I gave in any better condition; those “ persons who had the care of the Commonwealth not preventing “ Pisistratus from making himself a Tyrant, and thereby mortally “ wounding it, which they would not believe when I foretold it. The “ Athenians chose rather to give credit to his flatteries, than to me “ who told them the truth. They said I was mad. Laying down “ my arms therefore before the Citadel, I declared that I was wiser “ than those who could not see that Pisistratus was aiming at Tyranny; and more resolute than such as durst not assert the liberty “ of their Country. At last I left my Country with this farewell. “ O my Country! behold Solon ready to assist thee in word or deed. “ But I am thought mad, it seems. I am forced therefore to abandon “ thee, though I love all my Countrymen, but Pisistratus. Let them “ be his friends, if they like it.” “ For you know, my Friend, by “ what artifice he obtained the Government. He began with flattering the common people: and then wounding himself, he came to

These things then being duly considered, there will appear no great reason either to condemn the conduct of the Athenians in this point, or to applaud that of the Romans; since the former were necessitated to act as they did, by various exigencies and accidents which happened in their State. For whoever examines the matter to the bottom, may be convinced, that if the Romans had once been deprived of their liberties as the Athenians were, they would neither have been less jealous of them afterwards, nor more merciful in punishing their Citizens than the others: of which we may be assured from what happened after the expulsion of the Kings to Collatinus and P. Valerius; the former of whom (though he had been very active in asserting the liberties of his Country) was sent into exile upon no other account, but because he bore the name of Tarquin: and the latter very narrowly escaped the same punishment, only for having built a house upon Mount Cælius; from whence it was apprehended that he had some design upon the liberties of the Public. One may naturally conclude therefore, that if the Romans were so suspicious and severe in these two examples, they would have been as ungrateful to their Citizens as ever the Athenians were, had they been injured by them in like manner before their Empire was firmly established. But that we may have no occasion to return to this Subject hereafter, it shall be more thoroughly discussed in the next Chapter.

“ Elicæa, pretending he had received those wounds from his Enemies, and desired a guard of four hundred young men armed with halberds; which they, paying no regard to my remonstrances, simply granted him. After this he dissolved the popular Government. I endeavoured to have rescued the poor people from mercenary servitude; but they are now all slaves to Pisistratus.” Laert. in vitâ Solonis.

C H A P. XXIX.

Whether a Prince or a Commonwealth be generally the more ungrateful.

INgratitude usually proceeds either from avarice or suspicion: for when a Prince or a Republic sends a General upon some important Expedition, and he executes it with great honour to himself, and reputation to those that employed him, they certainly ought to reward him for it: but if, instead of doing that, they either cashier or disgrace him to save the expence of a reward, their ingratitude is inexcusable, and will leave a stain behind it that can never be wiped out. Too many Princes however are guilty of this vice; for as Tacitus says, “Proclivius est injuriæ quam beneficium vicem exolvere; quia gratia oneri, ultio in quæstu habetur.” “Men are naturally more apt to return an injury, than to requite a service; because revenge is sweet, and sometimes attended with advantage; but it is thought troublesome and expensive to discharge obligations *.” But when

* Dion Cassius, in giving a detail of Caligula’s crimes, takes notice of his ingratitude to Macro and his wife Ennia, whom he had reduced to the hard necessity of dispatching themselves; though one of them had been his Mistress, and it was owing to the other that he mounted the throne without any Collegue. He did not content himself with this, however, but basely traduced Macro’s character after he was dead, and even reproached his memory with crimes, the disgrace of which reflected chiefly upon himself; for he declared that Macro had been his Pimp. As Macro, whilst he was Minister to Tiberius, had more than once saved Caligula’s life, he took upon him to give him his advice with much freedom, correcting the faults of an Emperor whom he had created, and instructing him in the Duties that would tend to his glory and reputation. But Caligula despised his precepts, and boasted that he had no occasion for such a Tutor. In this manner Macro drew his hatred upon him to such a degree, that he resolved to get rid of him, and sought only for a plausible pretence, which at last he thought he had hit upon; accusing him of saying every where, “Caligula is the work of my hands; he is my creature as much as if I had begot him. It was owing to my intreaties that the intended orders of Tiberius to put him to death were three different times prevented. It was owing to me that he succeeded alone such a General is not rewarded ; or (to speak more properly) when he is disgraced, not out of motives of avarice, but suspicion, then his Master, whether a

“ to the Government after the death of that Prince.” Macro lived but a little while after this, and his whole family was extirpated at the same time.—There were three things then that concurred to Macro’s ruin, any one of which was sufficient to have effected it. He had saved Caligula’s life, and procured him the Empire of the world ; he boasted of this, and took the liberty of reprehending his conduct. There are very few men in great power, that can love those to whom they are too much obliged. “ Beneficia eo usque læta sunt (says Tacitus, Annal. lib. IV. cap. xviii.) dum videntur exsolvi posse: ubi “ multum antevenère, pro gratiâ odium redditur.” A saying which was applied to the cold reception Monsieur du Pleffis Mornai met with from Henry IV. of France. See his Life, p 257. One seldom sees that those who have raised a private person to a throne long enjoy his good graces : they become hateful to him, either because one has an aversion to men who think they have a right to demand every thing ; or because they boast too much of their good offices, and complain that they are not sufficiently rewarded for them. But such in general is the nature of mankind. Caligula therefore, one of the basest and most vicious of all Princes, could not long bear with a Benefactor, who set forth the important services he had done him in the strongest light, and took the freedom of giving him advice as a Tutor. In the same manner Abdalla, surnamed Motaseb Billah, who drove the Aglabites out of Africa, and placed one of the family of Ali, named Obeidallah, upon the throne, was served by that Prince ; for he soon after put him to death : and this act of royal ingratitude has sometimes been practised in other Countries that boast of greater humanity than Africa. Thus Lord Stanley was requited by our Henry VII. The Duke of Buckingham by Richard III. The Earl of Warwick by Edward IV. and the Piercys by Henry IV. But it is sometimes dearly paid for. “ The Services which Kings cannot repay,” says Father Orleans in his Revolutions of England, tom. II. p. 296, and the following ; under the year 1464 “ commonly make them ungrateful. A man who “ has done a great deal for them, seems to have a right to ask a great “ deal : and whoever has a right to claim all, is troublesome, even “ when he demands nothing. Edward IV. was indebted to the Earl “ of Warwick for his Crown : this was a service beyond all requital ; “ and being attended also with many other great exploits, had gained “ the Earl infinite reputation amongst the people. The King in short “ grew jealous of him, and suspecting his Subjects would compare “ him with the Earl, in the same manner that Saul was compared with “ David, began to be afraid, lest they should say in England, as formerly in Israel, “ Saul has slain his thousands, and David his ten “ thousands.” This was the first cause of discontent, the Earl was not rewarded as he thought he deserved, and he perceived the King looked upon him with a jealous eye ; for it is impossible that a Prince who envies the glory of one of his Subjects, should not disoblige him several ways. The second cause of disgust was, the Earl’s being sent Ambassador to negotiate his Master’s marriage with Bonne of Savoy, Sister to the Queen of France. This marriage was agreed upon, and nothing more waited for but the return of an Ambassador, whom the Prince or a Republic, is in some measure excusable. Many instances, and reasons also might be deduced from History to evince the truth and necessity of this. For a General, who by his valour has extended his Master's dominions, exterminated his enemies, enriched his Soldiers, and acquired great glory himself, must necessarily conciliate the affections both of the army and his other fellow subjects in such a manner, that his Services will be apt to excite jealousy in the Prince that employed him : and since mankind are naturally ambitious as well as jealous, and apt to aspire to still greater power, it is almost impossible, when such a General is become elated with his successes, and his Prince has begun to grow suspicious of him upon that account, that the jealousy of the latter should not be still more enflamed either by some insolent speech or action in the former. The Prince therefore seems to

King of France had sent to have the treaty signed by Edward, when it came to be known that the King of England had married a Knight's widow. " All that nation," says the above cited Author, " beheld " this match with the utmost indignation : but nobody was so much " chagrined at it as the Earl of Warwick, who made no doubt but " the King did it to expose and make him ridiculous to all Europe, by " sending him to demand a great Princess, and afterwards marrying " a private Gentlewoman only. . . . But King Edward's behaviour " to him, after his return to London, exasperated him to the last degree. He was in hopes, however, that his Majesty would endeavour " to mitigate his vexation by good words, or some lame excuse at least : " but he was so far from making any Apology, that he treated him " with such a degree of haughtiness, that a man less stomachful than " the Earl could hardly have helped resenting it : and to complete his " mortification, he heard that the King had attempted to debauch " his Niece, or, as others say, his Sister ; and would have taken a " Mistress out of his family, whilst he thought fit to take a wife out " of another." The Earl therefore, with a heart full of revenge, determined to restore Henry VI. to the throne, and succeeded in his design. Thus he sported with the Crown ; he deprived Henry VI. of it to give it to Edward ; and then took it again from him to return it to Henry. He had credit enough to have raised himself to the throne, but he thought it more glorious to make Kings than to reign himself : for such was the turn of his ambition, that it inclined him not to reign, but to govern those that reigned.—This sort of behaviour has been so common both in Princes and Subjects, that most Historians, as well as other Writers, take notice of it : from whom numberless examples might be quoted, if necessary. But Machiavel himself cites several in this Chapter. See also chap. III. of the Prince at the end : and the Note upon Francisco Spinola, Hist. Flor. book V. not far from the beginning.

be under a necessity of securing himself against his General, either by putting him to death, or by taking away his command, or by lessening the reputation and influence he has acquired in the army and amongst his other countrymen, by industriously insinuating that his success was not owing to his valour or good conduct, but to accident, or the pusillanimity of the enemy, or the superior abilities of his other officers.

When Vespasian was saluted Emperor by the forces which he commanded in Judea, Antonius Primus being at the head of an army in Illyria, declared for him there also, and marching into Italy against Vitellius who then was the reigning Emperor, he defeated him twice, and got possession of Rome: so that Mucian, who had been sent by Vespasian for the same purpose, found every thing settled, and all difficulties already surmounted by the expedition and valour of Antonius. But observe how Antonius was rewarded for his pains: in the first place, Mucian deprived him of all command in the army, and reduced him by degrees to live in a very private condition, without the least power or authority of any kind at Rome: upon which, he went to make his complaints to Vespasian, who was at that time in Asia, from whom he met with so cold a reception, that he soon after died in obscurity and despair.—Many other examples might be cited from History. Every one must remember, (as it happened in our own times) that Consalvo of Cordova, the King of Arragon's General in the Kingdom of Naples, entirely drove the French out of that Country, and reduced it into subjection to his Master Ferdinand, with great glory to himself at the same time: in recompence for which, Ferdinand upon his arrival at Naples, first turned him out of the government of the strong places which he held for him there, and then deprived him of his command in the army; after which, he took him back with him into Spain, where he ended his days in disgrace.

These jealousies therefore are so naturally incident to Princes, that they cannot be prevented; nor it is possible for them to be grateful to those that have done them the most important Services. And if this be the case with Princes, it ought not to seem strange that it is the same with Commonwealths: for all free governments having two principal ends, one of which is to enlarge their dominions, and the other to preserve their liberties, they will necessarily fall into excess by too rigid an observation of the Maxims they have established for the accomplishment of either of those ends. The errors and inconveniencies that attend making new acquisitions shall be spoken of elsewhere: but amongst others that result from being too jealous of their liberties, we may chiefly reckon the disgusting such Citizens as ought to be rewarded, and the suspecting those in whom they ought to put the most confidence. Now tho' these things occasion great evils in a Commonwealth that is become corrupt, and often produce Tyranny at last, as it happened to Rome in the time of Julius Cæsar, who took that by force, which the ingratitude of his fellow-citizens had refused to give him; yet they are of a great advantage in a State that is not yet corrupted, as they conduce to the preservation of its liberties, by keeping ambitious and enterprizing men in awe through the fear of punishment.

To the reasons already assigned therefore, it was owing that no people ever shewed themselves less ungrateful to their Citizens than the Romans did: nay it may truly be said, that they never behaved with ingratitude to any one but Scipio. For as to Coriolanus and Camillus *, they were banished for the in-

* Coriolanus was banished for proposing to humble the Plebeians by famine. See chap. vii. and Camillus for behaving himself with too much pride, in the Triumph which was granted him after he had taken Veii; and for dividing the Spoil amongst the Soldiery only, without giving the people any share of it. His triumphal Car was drawn by four white horses. Upon which Plutarch observes, that no General ever triumphed in that manner either before or after him, and that the people thought such a Chariot was too magnificent and glorious for any one but a God. “ Τα τε αλλα σοδαρος εθριαμβευσε και τετριπτον υποζευζαμενος λευκοπαλων επεση, και διεξηλασε της Ρωμης, εδενος τυτο ποιησαντος πρετερον ηδ' υπερων: ιερον γαρ ηγενται το τοιστον οχημα τω Βασιλει και πατρι των Θεων επι φημισιμενον.” In vitâ Camilli. He triumphed four times, was five times Dictator, and honoured with the title of the "Second Founder of Rome:" in a word, he acquired all the honour a man can gain in his own Country. During his Censorship, he found means to make all the single men in Rome marry the widows of those that had been killed in war; and had the glory of putting an end to the war with the Veientes, the ancient Rivals of Rome, See chap. xiii. But as he prevented many of the Roman Citizens from going to settle at Veii afterwards, they were so provoked at it, that they took an opportunity of revenging themselves upon him. He had made a vow to give the tenth part of the spoils of that City to Apollo, but forgot to do it: upon which, the Senate being informed by the Auruspices, that the Gods were offended, ordered every Soldier to restore the tenth of his spoil. This exasperated the people still more against him. Soon after, a war broke out with the Falisci, in the course of which, he generously sent back the children to their parents, whom a School-master in one of the towns he besieged, had perfidiously delivered up to him; which had such an effect upon them, that they voluntarily submitted to the Romans. See chap. xx. book III. of these Discourses. But this depriving the people of the booty they expected there, gave them a fresh handle to exclaim against him: so that losing all patience, Lucius Apuleius, one of the Tribunes, prosecuted him to make him give an account of the Spoil taken at Veii; in consequence of which, he was condemned to pay a heavy fine, and afterwards voluntarily banished himself to Veii. During this banishment, he performed the most noble action of his life; for instead of rejoicing at the sacking of Rome by the Gauls, (See chap. viii. of this book) and of joining them to be revenged on his Country, he exerted all his wisdom and courage to drive the Enemy away, and yet observed the Laws of Rome with the utmost strictness, in refusing to accept the command which several private people offered him. See Valerius Maximus, lib. IV. cap. i. He waited for the orders of the people, who were represented by the few inhabitants of Rome that still held out in the Capitol. But before this he had raised troops at Ardea, where he then was, and gained some advantages over the Enemy. The Romans therefore that were besieged in the Capitol appointed him Dictator; in which post he acted with so much bravery and conduct, that he drove the Gauls entirely out of the Roman territories. This important service however, with several other victories which he afterwards got, could not secure him against the rage and envy of the Tribunes, for even whilst he was Dictator, they sent a common Officer to summon him, who had the audaciousness to lay hands upon him. He appeared before the people attended by the whole Senate; and, as the affair was determined to the satisfaction of the people, was conducted back again to his house with the highest acclamations. What Lucan says of this great man, when in banishment, is highly in his honour, viz. "that wherever Camillus dwelt, there was Rome;" the Poet's own words express it much stronger, exile, because he still persisted obstinate in his prejudice against the people; yet the other was not only recalled, but honoured like a Prince as long as he lived. But the ingratitude that was shewn to Scipio was owing to such a degree of jealousy as they had never entertained of any citizen before: and this arose from a consideration of the powerfulness of the enemy he had conquered; the reputation he had acquired by bringing a long and dangerous war to so speedy and successful a conclusion, after he was appointed Commander in chief of their armies; the favour which his youth, his prudence, and other admirable accomplishments had gained him in the eyes of the people; all which made him so popular that the Magistrates began to dread his authority, a circumstance that was as galling to the graver sort, as it was new and unusual to the whole City*. Indeed it appeared so extraordinary to Cato the Elder, a man of severe and inflexible virtue, that he made a formal complaint of it, and said, that a State could not be called free where the Magistrates stood in awe of any particular Citizen : so that if the people of Rome inclined to Cato's opinion in this case, they may in some measure be justified in a thing that so nearly concerned their liberties, as I said before of Princes and Commonwealths that are forced to be ungrateful through motives of Suspicion. To conclude this discourse, I say, that ingratitude being occasioned either by avarice or jealousy, Commonwealths are hardly ever influenced by the former, and much seldomer than Princes by the latter, as they have less occasion ; which shall be shewn in its proper place.

* Livy in the 26th book of his History, cap. xix. gives us a fine account of the means by which Scipio made himself so popular. “Fuit enim Scipio, non veris tantum virtutibus mirabilis, sed arte quoque quâdam ab juventâ in ostentationem earum compositus: plerâque apud multitudinem, aut per nocturnas visa species, aut velut divinitus, mente monita, agens: sive et ipse capti quâdam superstitione animi, sive ut imperia conciliaque velut sorte oraculi missa, sine cunctatione assequeretur. Ad hoc jam inde ab initio præparans animos, ex quo togam virilem sumpsit, nullo die prius ullam publicam privatamve rem egit, quam in Capitolium iret, ingressusque ædem consideret: & plerumque tempus solus in secreto ibi tereret. Hic mos, qui per omnem vitam servabatur, seu consulto, seu temere vulgatæ opinioni fidem apud quosdam fecit, stirpis eum divinæ virum esse; retulitque famam, in Alexandro magno prius vulgatam, & vanitate & fabulâ parem, anguis immanis concubitu conceptum, & in cubiculo matris ejus peræpe visam prodigii ejus Speciem, interventuque hominum evolutam repente, atque ex oculis elapsam. His miraculis nunquam ab ipso elusa fides est, quin potius aucta arte quâdam, nec abauendi tale quicquam, nec palam asfirmandi. Multa alia ejusdem generis, alia vera, alia assinulata, admirationes humanæ in eo juvene excesserant modum: quibus freta tunc civitas, ætati haudquaquam maturæ tantam molem rerum, tantumque imperium permisit.” It might be observed here by the bye, that there are considerable families in Europe, which pretend to be descended from the intercourse of a woman with some spirit. Marshal de Bassompierre relates it of the founder of his family. See his Memoirs.

C H A P. XXX.

What means a Prince or a Commonwealth ought to take in order to avoid the imputation of Ingratitude; and how a General or other Citizen must act to secure himself against the Effects of it.

A Prince who would avoid the necessity either of living in continual jealousy, or of being ungrateful, ought to go in person with his forces upon every expedition, as the first Roman Emperors used to do, as the Grand Turk does at present, and as all brave Princes always have done*. For if they succeed,

* " If any one should offer to maintain," says a French Author " that it is better for a Prince to carry on wars by others than in his own person, Fortune will furnish him with examples enow of those whose Lieutenants have brought great enterprizes to a happy issue, and of those also whose presence hath done more hurt than good. But no virtuous and valiant Prince can bear to be tutored with such scandalous lessons, under the colour of saving his head, like the Statue of a Saint, for the happiness of his Kingdom, they degrade him from and make him incapable of his Office, which is military throughout. I know one who had much rather be beaten, than sleep whilst another fights for him ; and who never heard of any brave thing done, even by his own Officers, in his absence, without envy. Selim the first said, with very good reason, in my opinion, " that victories obtained without the Sovereign's presence were never complete." Much more readily would he have said, that a Sovereign ought to blush for shame, who pretended to any share in one, when he had contributed nothing to it but his voice and thought ; nor even so the honour and advantage of the conquest redound solely to themselves: but if they stay at home, another reaps the glory and they begin to apprehend they shall not be able to maintain their acquisitions, except they either eclipse or totally extinguish that fame of their Generals, which they could not acquire themselves; and this forces them into injustice and ingratitude, though without doubt much more to their own prejudice than advantage*. However in this case, if they are either so imprudent, or so indolent, or pusillanimous, as to stay ingloriously at home, and be content with sending out a Substitute, they themselves must needs know what they have to do afterwards, as well as I can tell them. But I will venture to say, that if the General finds he cannot otherwise escape the effects of jealousy and ingratitude, he must

“ much as those, considering that in such works as that, the direction “ and command that deserve honour are only such as are given upon
 “ the place, and in the heat of action. The Princes of the Ottoman “ family (the chief in the world for military fortune) have always “ warmly embraced this opinion. Bajazet the second, and his Son, “ who swerved from it, spending their time in Sciences and other em“ ployments within doors, gave great blows to their Empire: and A“ murath the third, following their example, did the same. Edward
 “ the third of England said of our Charles the fifth, “ There never “ was any King who so seldom put on his armour, that had cut him “ out so much work.” Indeed he might well think it strange, as it “ was the effect of chance more than of reason. Is it not absurd to “ reckon the Kings of Castile and Portugal amongst warlike and mag“ nanimous Conquerors, because at the distance of twelve hundred “ leagues from the place where they resided in idleness and ease, they “ made themselves masters of both the Indies, by the conduct of their “ Agents; which too, they never had the courage so much as to visit “ themselves.” Mr. Bayle says, in his Historical Discourse upon the Life of Gustavus Adolphus, “ That though the conquests of a warlike “ Prince are frequently of no service to his Subjects, and perhaps it “ might be full as well for them, if their Monarch was contented “ with the dominions left him by his Predecessors; yet they are struck “ with I know not what admiration, blended with love for one whose “ name is renowned throughout the whole world. The Te Deum, “ when sung frequently, and bonfires made for the taking of Cities,
 “ or for Battles won, incline them to furnish subsidies for the conti“ nuation of a war with greater cheerfulness.” Of the truth of this, the year 1761 may afford a memorable example in our own country, when the Supplies granted by Parliament amounted to almost nineteen Millions.

* Cecil, Prime Minister to Queen Elizabeth, used to say, “ That “ nothing could be for the advantage of a Prince, which any way

have recourse to one or other of these two expedients; that is, he must either voluntarily quit the command of the army as soon as the expedition is over, and not only resign it into his Master's hands, before it is demanded of him, but take great care not to discover any signs of insolence or ambition: that so when there is no manner of reason given for suspicion, he may be duly rewarded, at least not disgraced, for his Services. But if he cannot submit to this, he must take a very different course, and boldly resolve to set up for himself; for which purpose, he must endeavour by all means to make it generally believed, that the merit of the late acquisition is wholly due to him, and that his Master had not the least share in it; he must spare no pains to ingratiate himself with the Soldiery, and his other fellow Subjects; to contract Alliances with his neighbours, to seize upon fortresses, to corrupt the principal Officers in the army, to secure those, some other way, whom he cannot corrupt; and by these means effectually to guard himself from the ingratitude of his Master. Besides these, there is no other remedy that I know. But since very few men can prevail upon themselves to be either perfectly good or thoroughly wicked, as I said before, and it almost always happens that a General is loath to quit his command after a successful campaign, they seldom either know how to keep their ambition within due bounds, or to have recourse to extremities, even when they seem to have something great and honourable in them: so that while they stand in suspense and halting betwixt two resolutions they are commonly ruined.

A Republic indeed that would avoid the scandal of ingratitude, has it not in its power to avail itself of the same remedy that a Prince may do; for not being able to conduct its armies in person, that command must necessarily be delegated to some of its Citizens. The best way, therefore, in my opinion, for a commonwealth to avoid ingratitude as much as possible, would be to follow the example of the Romans, who perhaps had less of it than any other people.

ple. This was owing to the constitution of their Government; for as all sorts of people, both noble and ignoble, were employed in their wars without distinction, so many brave and virtuous men, and such a number of illustrious Generals arose in every age, that the State had no occasion to be afraid of any one of them, when there were others enow of equal abilities to check and oppose him. Hence it came to pass that every man discharged his duty with the utmost integrity, carefully avoiding any step that might favour of Ambition, and give the people the least offence or reason to punish them as designing and aspiring men; nay, when any one was created Dictator, he piqued himself upon laying down his authority again, as soon as ever the necessity of affairs could possibly admit of it. Such a manner of proceeding, preventing all suspicion, likewise prevented ingratitude; so that a Republic, that would avoid the imputation of being ungrateful, should conduct itself like that of Rome; and the person who would guard against the effects of it, ought to imitate the behaviour of the Roman Citizens*.

* The Romans made a great difference betwixt those Generals, who only gained victories, and others that put an end to a war. Those that entered the City in triumph with the effigies of several Provinces or Cities which they had conquered, were much more honoured than those, who could only boast they had killed a great many men. They seldom continued their Generals above two or three years in Commission; but almost every year sent a new Consul to relieve the Consul of the foregoing year: so that the General did all that lay in his power to put an end to the war, lest his successor should have the honour of finishing what he had begun; they all aimed at the glory debellandi. But when a General is certain that he shall command the army till the end of the war, he is not always disposed to hasten it; he puts off the peace as long as he can, and regulates his conduct according to the old maxim, "Make a golden bridge for a vanquished enemy:" it is his private interest to give them an opportunity of retrieving their affairs, and continuing the war a great while longer. This is the reason why battles are seldom decisive. The General of the victorious army being afraid of a peace, will not reduce the enemy to a necessity of suing for it: according to the practice of the Italian Condottieri or hired Commanders, so often mentioned in the History of Florence. A Prince, on the contrary, who commands his own forces in person, makes the best advantage of his victories, in order to bring the war to a conclusion the sooner; as peace in general must be more for his interest, and that of his Subjects: but a general, who protracts a war, only serves himself, and does little or no good to others, except such as deal in crape and black cloth.

C H A P. XXXI.

That the Romans never punished their Generals with any extraordinary degree of Severity, when they had been faulty; not even when the Commonwealth had suffered, either through their ignorance or misbehaviour.

THE Roman Republic was not only less ungrateful than any other, as I have said before, but also more gentle and merciful in punishing its Generals when they had offended: for if their offence proceeded from wilfulness or malice, even in that case, their chastisements were mild and moderate; but if from ignorance or error, instead of punishing, they often rewarded them. This, however, was very well judged: for they thought it of such importance, that those, who commanded their armies, should have their minds free and disengaged from all other concerns, in forming their designs and taking their resolutions, that they never clogged an enterprize, which was difficult and dangerous of itself, with additional apprehensions and incumbrances, lest they should be discouraged from acting with sufficient spirit and vigour. When they sent an army against an enemy, they imagined the Commander in chief had weight enough already upon his mind, considering the cares, perplexities, and embarrassments, that always attend such expeditions, which must be necessarily very great. Now, if besides these discouragements, weighty as they are, their Generals had been disheartened by the examples of several, who had either been crucified, or put to some other cruel death, after they had lost a battle, it would have been impossible, that such Commanders, amidst so many cares and apprehensions, should ever exert themselves properly, or attempt any thing great and noble. So that the ignominy of having failed in any enterprize being a sufficient punishment in their opinion, they did not care to add to it, lest it should appear appear too heavy, and deter them from engaging in it at all.

Let us shew in the first place, how an offence was punished, that proceeded not from error or ignorance, but from wilful and deliberate perverseness. The two Consuls, Sergius and Virginus, had laid siege to Veii: the former was posted, with part of the Roman army, on that side of the town, where they expected to be annoyed by the Tuscans; and the latter, with the rest on the other side. Sergius, accordingly being attacked by the Falisci, and other people of Tuscany, chose rather to be defeated, than to ask for any assistance from his Colleague; whilst Virginus, on the other hand, expecting his stomach would come down at last, waited so long before he sent him any succour, that those forces were utterly routed, to the great disgrace of his Country *. A bad example indeed, and not only worthy of all reprehension, but sufficient to give us a very unfavourable impression of the Roman Government, if both those Commanders had not been punished. Nevertheless, though any other people would have put them to death, the Romans contented themselves with inflicting only a pecuniary fine upon them: not because their offence did not deserve a severer punishment, but because the Romans were unwilling, even in this case, to deviate from their antient customs, for the reasons which have been already assigned. As to excusing errors or faults that proceeded from want of judgment, we have a remarkable instance, in the case of Terentius Varro, by whose temerity the Romans were so totally routed at the battle of Cannæ, that their liberties were in the utmost danger. However, as this was owing to rashness and imprudence alone, they were so far from punishing him, that they shewed him great honour: for at his return to the City, the whole Senate went out to meet him in their formalities; and, not having it in their power to congratulate him upon a victory,

* Upon this occasion, it is not possible to forget the conduct of the Admirals Matthews and Lestock in the Mediterranean, at the beginning of the late French war.

they thanked him for his return to Rome, and that he had not abandoned them out of despair, “quod de salute Reipublicæ non desperasset.” When Papius Cursor, the Dictator, would have had Fabius put to death, because he had engaged the Samnites contrary to orders, the chief reason which the Father of Fabius urged against the Sentence, was, that the Roman people had never proceeded with so much rigour even against any of their Commanders who had lost a battle, as Papius then would have them do, against one that had gained a victory.

C H A P. XXXII.

That a Prince or Commonwealth ought not to defer their beneficence till it is extorted from them by necessity.

ALTHOUGH the Romans found their account in being liberal to the people in time of danger, and when Porfenna invaded them in favour of the Tarquins, The Senate (apprehending the commonalty would rather chuse to have Kingly Government restored, than undergo the burden of a war) thought proper to remit all their taxes, in order to keep them firm and steady to the new establishment; and declared at the same time that “the poorer sort of people contributed sufficiently to the good of the public, by getting children and bringing them up;” (all which was done to make them more cheerfully submit to the hardships of a Siege) yet, I would not advise any other Republic or Prince to trust so far in this example, as to neglect or defer proper means to ingratiate themselves with the people, till they actually fall into distress and adversity. If they do, they must not expect to succeed as the Romans did: for then the multitude will not think themselves so much obliged to them as to the enemy for this sudden gust of beneficence, and will be apt to conclude, that as soon as the danger is over, they will take that away again, which they had been forced to give them.

But if the Romans succeeded in acting thus, it was because their Government, being a new one, was hardly settled at that time, and the people had already seen several laws made in their favour, particularly that which allowed of appeals to them in judiciary matters: so that they were easily persuaded, that the last indulgence, which was shewn them, proceeded rather from the affection of the Senaté, than the fear of the enemy; besides, the remembrance of the injuries and oppressions, they had suffered under a regal government, was still fresh upon their minds. But as cases of this nature seldom occur, it will likewise very rarely happen, that the same remedies will have the same effect: upon which account, every Commonwealth and Prince ought well to consider before any exigency compels them to it, what persons they may best avail themselves of in times of distress; and afterwards treat them in such a manner, as they must otherwise be obliged to do, in case of necessity. Whoever does not pursue this method, whether he be a Governor of a Commonwealth or a Prince, but especially if the latter, and thinks it time enough to court the people, when the storm is ready to break upon him, will find himself deceived, and that such a conduct instead of doing him any service, will only serve to accelerate his ruin *.

* This was the case of our King James II. who did himself more harm by soothing and caressing his Subjects, and annulling every thing he had done before to their prejudice, when the Prince of Orange was upon the point of invading his dominions and he stood in need of their assistance, than if he had continued firm to his former measures; for by so doing, he might at least have spared himself the mortification of making so publick and authentic a confession of what was laid to his charge. Besides, this piece of meanness only served to encourage his Enemies the more in the prosecution of their enterprize.

“ A certain Persian King (says the Editor of Gulistan, or Rosarium Politicum) having grievously oppressed his people, many wealthy and trading men amongst them withdrew themselves and their effects into foreign Countries, as the only method to secure their liberties and properties; soon after this, a war breaking out, the Prince finds his Kingdom deserted by its inhabitants, his Revenues sunk to nothing, his Exchequer empty, and no way left to raise the supplies necessary to oppose the Enemy, but a military force, which encreases the mischief. For says he, in Persian verse,

C H A P. XXXIII.

That when an evil or inconvenience is arrived at such a height, either at home or abroad, as to become dangerous, it is better for a State to temporize and give way to it, than to endeavour to remove it by violence.

WHEN the Romans had so well established themselves, that their power, reputation, and dominion encreased every day, their neighbours, who

The Prince who desires to have necessary supplies in time of war, Should govern his people mildly and gently in time of peace. For even Slaves, though bound with golden chains, will abhor a tyrant: If you would have Men serve you freely, treat them like free men.

It happened about this time, that a piece of History out of the Treasury of Princes, a celebrated Persian book, was read to the same King, viz, how Suhac, one of the most powerful Princes in the East, was deposed from his Kingdom; and Feridun, a private man, advanced in his room. Upon which, the King asked one of his Courtiers (and as it happened an honest one too) who stood near him, "How this Feridun, who had neither arms, nor treasure, nor followers, could possibly obtain the Kingdom? Just as your Majesty hath heard from the History, answered the Courtier; the people esteeming him for his liberality and justice, flocked to him from all parts, and exalted him to the throne with unanimity and resolution. Seeing therefore, continued he, that the affection of the people is the best security of the Prince, how could your Majesty, by listening to evil Counsellors, take so much pains to render your Subjects disaffected, except you was grown weary of your Kingdom? For since Kings are known to reign by the favour of the people, they ought to value their favour as much as their Crown." The King then asking by what means he might gain the love of his subjects; "Ah, Sir (replied the other) every King that would depend upon their free Assistance in time of need, should govern them with justice, benevolence, and clemency, before he has occasion for their help: so that they may think themselves secure at all times of being protected in their liberties and properties under his Government: for an oppressive Prince can no more be said to be a King, than a Wolf that attends a flock of sheep can be termed a Shepherd; and that King who injures his Subjects under the colour of Law, destroys the Fundamentals of his own Government." The King enraged at his honest freedom, ordered the Courtier to be thrown into prison: but in a short time after the whole Kingdom rebelling, those that had fled their country returned, and added a weight to the defection; and the agents of his oppression, and even the King's own creatures, joining in the revolt concurred to ruin him. For, says the same author, had paid no attention to them before, began to be aware what a thorn this new Republic was like to prove in their sides, when it was too late to correct their error; but resolving to apply some new remedy to an evil which they should have taken care to prevent, no less than forty little States entered into a confederacy against them. The Romans, therefore, amongst other expedients, which they generally had recourse to in times of imminent danger, thought fit to create a Dictator; that is, they committed the whole power of the State to one person alone, who was to form such resolutions as he judged most proper for the public safety, without consulting any one, or being subject to the least controul in the execution of them. This expedient was of signal advantage, and not only enabled them to extricate themselves out of very great difficulties and dangers at that time, but afterwards proved of admirable service in all the various accidents and disasters that befel that Commonwealth, before it arrived at its highest pitch of grandeur.

From hence, I shall endeavour to shew in the first place, that when any evil or inconvenience threatens a State, either at home or from abroad (whether owing to interior or exterior causes) and is got to such a head, that every one begins to be alarmed at it, without doubt, it is much better to temporize and give way to it, than to offer to eradicate it: for it generally happens, that those who endeavour to extinguish it, still add to its strength and malignity, and immediately pull down that ruin upon their own heads, which they only apprehended before. Now these cala-

Therefore, let Princes make friends of their Subjects in peaceful times; That so they may secure them against their enemies in time of war: For even the meanest wretch will fight boldly for a just and good King."

The same author, in many other parts of his work endeavours to excite noble ideas of generosity in his readers. See the pages 233, 435 to 445, and 586, 587. He much applauds the following inscription upon the monument of Bihram Cour, a King of Persia, "A liberal hand is better than a strong arm;" importing that the authority of Princes is better supported by bounty and munificence, than by a violent exertion of power, and force of arms.

mities are more frequently occasioned in a Republic, by interior than exterior causes; as when any Citizen assumes a greater degree of power and authority than he ought to do, as it often happens; or when some law, on which the very life and soul of its liberty depended, is either abrogated or neglected, and the evil has been suffered to grow so predominant, that it is become more dangerous to attempt a remedy, than to let it take its course: for it is difficult to discover those inconveniencies in their original, because mankind are naturally apt to favour the beginning of things, especially of such as seem to have some sort of greatness or merit in them, and are patronized by young men. So that if any young man of a noble family, and extraordinary virtue, happens to spring up in a Commonwealth, the eyes of the whole City are soon turned upon him, every one vying with another in shewing him such extravagant honours, that if he has any spark of ambition or vain glory in him, his natural endowments, added to the favour of the people, may soon strengthen his hands so effectually, that when his fellow-citizens are sensible of their error, they will hardly find any remedy, but such as will tend only to augment and establish his power the sooner. Many examples might be adduced to support this; but I shall content myself with one which happened in our own City.

Cosimo d' Medici, from whom the house of Medici in Florence originally derive their grandeur, arrived at such a degree of power, by the reputation of his wisdom and the favour of a blind multitude, that the Republic began to be afraid of him; and the Magistrates thought it would be very dangerous to meddle with him, and still more so to let him alone. But Niccolò da Uzzano, who was reckoned a man of consummate experience in State-affairs at that time, perceiving the error his fellow-citizens had been guilty of, and the dangerous consequences that must of necessity happen, from suffering Cosimo to grow so popular, prevented them from incurring further difficulties whilst he lived, and never would permit them to use any means to depress him, because he knew such an attempt would end in the ruin of the State, as indeed it did after Uzzano's death. For those that survived him, not following his advice, began to enter into combinations against Cosimo, and at last prevailed so far, that they drove him out of Florence, to the great vexation of his party; who likewise prevailing in their turn, soon after recalled him, and made him head of the Commonwealth; to which dignity he never could have attained, if it had not been for so violent an opposition from his enemies*. The same happened at Rome in the case of Julius Cæsar, whose great virtues and excellent qualifications recommended him in such a manner to the favour of Pompey, and his other fellow-citizens, that by degrees he became so powerful and formidable, that they no longer loved, but feared him, as Cicero tells us, who says, "It was too late when Pompey began to be afraid of Cæsar." These apprehensions put them upon seeking means to rid themselves of him; but the remedy proved worse than the disease, and only hastened the ruin of that Commonwealth.

I say then, that since it is difficult to discover these evils in their beginning (because men are liable to be seduced by favour and flattering appearances at first); it is wiser to temporize and submit when they are clearly discerned, than to oppose them by force: for in the former case, perhaps they may entirely pass away of themselves, or at least be averted for some time †,

* See the History of Florence, Book IV. towards the end.

† "Experience has taught me (says Montaigne, Part III. Chap. xiii. of his Essays) that Evils have their proper limits and duration, and that we often ruin ourselves by impatience. Whoever endeavours to cut them short by force in the middle of their course, does but lengthen and multiply them, and enflames instead of appeasing them. I am of Crantor's opinion, that we ought neither obstinately and wilfully to oppose evils, nor truckle to them for want of courage; but that we are naturally to give way to them according to their circumstances and our own: I find they stay less with me who let them alone, and have lost those which are reputed the most obstinate and tenacious. To kick against Necessity, is like the folly of Ctesiphon, who undertook to kick with his mule."

and in the latter, men ought to be very cautious and circumspect, lest whilst they are endeavouring to eradicate an inveterate evil by violent measures, they should still add to its virulence, and either crush themselves by attempting to pull down another, or drown the plant by over-watering it. They should well consider the nature of the malady, and if they find themselves able to work a cure, let them set about it immediately without any ceremony; if not, they had better give the matter up and sit still, lest it should happen to them as it did to the little Princes above-mentioned, that confederated against Rome, who would have acted more prudently in endeavouring to make that Commonwealth their friend, and to have kept upon fair terms with it, after it had so well established itself, than in provoking it by hostilities to think of new institutions, and making fresh provisions both of offence and defence. For this confederacy not only served to keep the Romans united, and consequently to strengthen them still more, but put them upon creating other officers, and trying new expedients, by which they soon extended their power to a very great degree. Accordingly, amongst other Institutions, was that of a Dictator, to which it was owing, that they not only then, but afterwards surmounted many imminent difficulties and dangers, and prevented numberless evils which otherwise must have befallen that Commonwealth.

C H A P. XXXIV.

That the Authority of a Dictator was always of service to the Roman Commonwealth, instead of any prejudice: and that the power which is usurped by any Citizen, not that which is conferred by the free suffrages of the people, is pernicious to liberty.

THE institution of the Dictatorial authority at Rome has been condemned by some writers, as a thing that chiefly contributed to the establishment of Tyranny. They alledge that Julius Cæsar, the first Tyrant that ever was in that Republic, set himself up under the title of Dictator, and that without it he never could have put any tolerable face upon his usurpation.

Those however, who assert this, seem not to have examined the matter to the bottom, and therefore their opinion ought to have but little weight. For neither the name nor the power of Dictator was the cause of Rome being enslaved, but the authority which was assumed by those that afterwards made the office perpetual: so that if there had been no such Title, Cæsar would certainly have taken some other, that would have served his purpose as well; because where a man has the power in his own hands, he may assume any Title he pleases; but it is not the Title that gives him the power. We see accordingly, that whilst the Dictatorship was disposed of by the suffrages of the people, agreeable to its first institution, and not seized upon by private violence, it was always of great service to the State; for, those magistrates who force themselves into office, and that authority which is illegally obtained, are prejudicial to a Commonwealth, not those that are called to it in the lawful and ordinary course of Government: and we may observe, that no Dictator, who had been duly appointed, ever did the Roman Republic any prejudice during so long a period; but, on the contrary, much service. The reasons of this are very evident. For many circumstances, which would not be suffered in an uncorrupted Republic, must concur to enable a man to assume an extraordinary degree of authority, and oppress his Fellow-Citizens. In the first place, he must be exceeding rich, and have a great number of partizans and adherents; which no well governed Commonwealth will permit: and even if they did, such men are always so dreaded in a free State, that he would not have the suffrages of the independent citizens. Besides this, the Dictator was not appointed for life, but for a time only, and with a limited authority, extending tending no further than the present danger or exigency which he was created to remove: and though, indeed, he was commissioned during that term to make such provisions as he thought proper for the occasion, without consulting any one else, and to sentence offenders in a summary manner; yet he had no power to do any thing to the prejudice of the State: he could neither deprive the Senate nor the people of their share in the administration; he could neither abrogate old laws nor make new ones. So that if we jointly consider the short duration of the Dictator's power, the limited authority he was vested with, and that the Roman people were not then corrupted, it was impossible he could transgress the bounds of a good Citizen, or injure the State: on the other hand, it plainly appears from experience; that such an officer was always of the highest service to it.

It must be allowed then, that amongst many other admirable institutions in the Roman Commonwealth, this deserves particular regard, and may be reckoned as one of the principal causes, that contributed to exalt it to such an amazing height of grandeur: for without it, that State could never have extricated itself out of many sudden emergencies and difficulties, in which their ordinary forms of proceeding, being slow and tedious, would have had but little efficacy; because, where no particular Council or Magistrate has power to do every thing, but stands in need of the assistance and assent of others in many points, and when it happens that the necessity is so pressing, that it requires an immediate remedy, time and opportunity slip away, and are often lost, whilst they are deliberating upon the matter in council; and when they come to any resolution, it is generally so late that the remedy to be applied proves very dangerous.

All Republics, therefore, should have some institution of this kind to fly to, in cases of extreme necessity: and indeed the State of Venice (which at this day is the best regulated Commonwealth in the world) has reserved the prerogative of vesting a power in some few of its Citizens, in times of imminent danger; by virtue of which, they may act according to their own discretion, without the advice or concurrence of any other Council: for, if there is not some provision of this kind made in a Commonwealth, it must of course either be ruined, by sticking to its old forms, or break them to save itself. It is much to be wished, that such emergencies might never happen in a State, as make it indispensibly necessary to have recourse to extraordinary means for its preservation: for though such means may be of admirable service for the present, yet the example may afterwards prove of very pernicious consequence; because, when men have once been taught to break old laws and customs to serve a good purpose, they may, perhaps, another time, plead that precedent for breaking them again to answer a bad one. No Commonwealth however can be perfect, which has not provided by its laws against particular exigencies, prepared remedies for every accident, and taken care to secure itself in all events by special Institutions; which cannot be done more effectually than by creating a Dictator, or some such Magistrate or Magistrates upon extraordinary occasions; for without that, it must inevitably be overwhelmed by any considerable shock*.

We may conclude this Chapter with observing, how providently and cautiously the Romans proceeded in the election of this officer; for, as the creation of a Dictator must of course diminish the Consular power, and seem to reflect some sort of disgrace upon those, who from commanding were reduced to obey, this wise people, apprehending that such a step might excite resentment and dissensions amongst the Citizens, prudently left the choice of a Dictator to the Consuls, well judging that, whenever there should be absolute occasion for such an officer, though his authority was equal to that of a King, they would be so far from complaining, that they would cheerfully submit to him, as he was appointed by themselves: and in fact, we see that men seem to feel much less pain from wounds which they give themselves, than from those they receive from others. Besides, in succeeding times, instead of creating a Dictator, they vested that authority in the Consuls themselves by this form of words, "Videat Consul ne quid detrimenti capiat Respublica, i. e. Let the Consul take care that the Commonwealth receives no damage." Upon the whole, I say, that the neighbouring States, by endeavouring to crush the Romans when they did, instead of succeeding in their design, only obliged them to make such provisions and institutions as not only served to defend themselves more effectually, but enabled them to act offensively against their enemies, with more vigour, wisdom, and authority.

* The States General accordingly invested the Prince of Orange with a sort of Dictatorial power in the year 1688, when it was resolved to invade England; secrecy and expedition being absolutely necessary to secure success in that Enterprize.

C H A P. XXXV.

How it came to pass that the Creation of the Decemvirate was prejudicial to the liberties of Rome, though it was done by free and public suffrage.

THE choice which the Romans made of ten Citizens to new model their laws, who yet soon after encroached upon their liberties, and became Tyrants, may seem, perhaps, to overthrow my former assertion, "That authority legally conferred by the suffrages of the people is not dangerous to the State, but that which is usurped and assumed by violence." We must consider, therefore, the bounds and limitations of that authority, and the term for which it was granted: for an absolute authority, when granted for a long time (that is, for a year or more) will always be very dangerous, and produce either good or bad effects, according to the disposition of those to whom it is given. If then we compare pare the power of the Decemviri with that of the Dictators, the former will appear to have been much more extensive than the latter: for by the creation of a Dictator, neither the majesty of the Senate or the Consuls was abolished, nor were the Tribunes deprived of their authority. The Dictator could not do that, and if he had the power to remove any one out of the Consulship, or Senate, or Tribuneship, yet he could not annul the order nor make new laws: so that the Senate, Consuls, and Tribunes, still subsisting, were a check upon him, and prevented him from doing the State any harm. But the case was quite otherwise in the creation of the Decemviri; for the Senate, Consuls, and Tribunes, were totally laid aside, and not only the power of making laws, but of doing every thing else, in short, that of the whole people, was entirely transferred to these ten Citizens, who, finding themselves thus free from all check or controul, and no right of appeal reserved to any one from them to the people, became insolent and intolerable the very next year after their creation; of which we have a remarkable instance in the ambitious proceedings of Appius.

It must be observed then, that when I say an authority, legally conferred by the free suffrages of the people, never hurts any Commonwealth, I presuppose that the people do not confer it without proper restrictions, or for any longer than a limited time: for when they are either so rash or so blind as to give an absolute and unlimited power to one or more Magistrates, as the Romans did to the Decemviri, they will always suffer for it in the same manner. This will plainly appear, if we examine to what causes it was owing that the Dictators were always good Citizens, and the Decemviri became Tyrants; and consider likewise in what manner those States acted that were esteemed wise and provident, and maintained good order and liberty, though they conferred the supreme authority upon one or more for a long term, as the Spartans did to their Kings, and the Venetians still do do to their Doges; for then we shall find that such restraints and limitations were annexed to their power, as effectually prevented them from abusing it, if they were so disposed. Nor is it of any importance in this case whether the people are become corrupt or not (for absolute authority will very soon corrupt a people and create itself friends and partizans) nor whether the person that is possessed of it be rich or poor, of high or low extraction; because such a degree of power will soon supply the want of riches, and birth, and every thing else; as we shall shew more particularly, when we come to speak of the creation of the Decemviri.

C H A P. XXXVI.

That Citizens who have filled the highest posts in the State, ought not to be above serving in those of a lower degree.

IN the Consulship of Marcus Fabius and Cneius Manlius, the Romans obtained a glorious victory over the Veientes and Etrusci; in which Quintus Fabius (brother to Marcus) was slain, who had been Consul himself three years before. From hence we may observe, how well the customs and practice of that Republic were calculated for the aggrandizement of their Empire, and what an error other States are guilty of that deviate from their example. For though the Romans were as ambitious of glory and command as any other people; yet they thought it no disparagement to obey those whom they had commanded before, nor to serve as inferior officers in an army of which they had once been Generals. But so different is the custom and spirit of our times, that even at Venice, a Citizen, who has once filled a great employment, will never afterwards accept of a less, and he is thought excusable for it by the government: which indeed may be looked upon as honourable and magnanimous in a private man, but is certainly of great disadvantage to the Public; because a Government may reasonably conceive greater hopes, and put more confidence in one that condescends to accept of a lower post after he has filled a high one, than in one who is preferred from an inferior rank to a greater command; and people cannot well be supposed to rely much upon a raw young man, except he has persons of sufficient wisdom and authority about him to check his youth and correct his inexperience. If, therefore, the same custom had prevailed at Rome as at Venice, and in some other Republics of these times, that a person who had once been Consul, would never serve again in any inferior command, many disasters would have happened which must have endangered its liberty, as well from the errors of new and unexperienced Generals as from their ambition, which they might have freely indulged, when they had no body near them of whom they stood in any sort of awe, to be a check upon their conduct; and thus a full loose being given to their appetites, the government must have suffered no small injury from it.

C H A P. XXXVII.

What tumults and disorders were occasioned at Rome by the Agrarian Law; and how disgustful it is to make a new Law that looks backwards too far, in opposition to old Customs.

IT has been observed by ancient writers, that different causes often produce the same effect, and that mankind are naturally as apt to be satiated with prosperity, as impatient of adversity; and when they are no longer obliged to quarrel by necessity, they will quarrel from motives of ambition, which is so riveted in the human heart, that they are never contented, even when they arrive at the highest pitch of grandeur.

deur *. The reason of this I take to be, that men are born with such appetites as are never to be fully gratified in this State: so that their desires being greater than the power to fulfil them, a sort of discontent, dissatisfaction and longing for more, is incident to all ranks and conditions. Hence arise the vicissitudes of their fortune: for as they are not only afraid of losing what they have got, but continually grasping at more, they fall first into private quarrels and animosities, and from such dissensions to open wars, which commonly end in the ruin of one State and the exaltation of another.

This I thought fit to premise, in some measure to account for the conduct of the Plebeians, at Rome; who, not being content with having secured themselves against the insolence of the Nobility, by the creation of Tribunes, which (indeed they were compelled to do by absolute necessity) began to quarrel with them afresh when they had gained this point, out of ambitious motives, and wanted to share with them in their honours and estates also; two things that are the most eagerly coveted by mankind. This gave birth to all the contests that happened about the Agrarian Law, which at last proved the destruction of that Commonwealth. Now since all well governed Commonwealths ought to take care that the Public be rich, and the citizens poor, it seems, as if that of Rome was guilty of an error with regard to this law, either in not making it one of their fundamental constitutions at first, that so there might have been no occasion to dispute the matter repeatedly, as they were obliged to do afterwards; or in deferring it so long that retrospection became disgustful and dangerous; or if such a provision was made, by suffering it to lose its force thro' neglect and disuse. For (however the matter might be) it is certain, that whenever the Agrarian Law was brought into question at Rome, every thing in that City was thrown into confusion.

* "He that thinks to satiate his desires by possessing the things he wishes for," says an Eastern Sage, "is like a man that endeavours to extinguish fire by heaping straw upon it."

The heads of this Law were, first, that no Citizen should be allowed to possess above so many acres of land; secondly, that all the lands that were taken from an enemy should be equally divided amongst the people; both which articles gave great offence to the Nobility: for by the former, all those that possessed more land than that Law allowed of (who were Nobles for the most part) were to be stripped of the overplus; and in consequence they were deprived of all means of further enriching themselves. The Patricians, therefore, being most interested in the matter, and the Plebeians thinking they were defending the cause of the Public at the same time that they were asserting their own rights, such an uproar was raised whenever it was brought upon the carpet, that the whole City was in a manner turned topsy-turvy, as I said before *. Sometimes the Nobility openly opposed it, sometimes they endeavoured to ward it off, either by engaging the people in a war, or setting up one Tribune to oppose another; sometimes again, by giving up a part of their lands, and at others, by

* Appius Claudius, the grandfather of him that was afterwards the Chief of the Decemviri, in order to prevent the complaints of the Plebeians, proposed that ten Commissioners should be chosen by the Senate, to make a strict enquiry concerning those lands which originally belonged to the Public; that part of them should be sold for the use of the Commonwealth; that another part should be distributed amongst the poorest Citizens, who had no land of their own; that marks should be set up to distinguish the limits of every one's possessions; the want of which had occasioned the grievance of which the people then complained. What remained of the Public lands, he proposed to let out for five years at a reasonable rent; which rent was to be laid out in corn for those Plebeians that served in the army, and for their pay. This, he imagined, would hinder the people from thinking any more of having the lands divided afresh amongst them; and that they would rather choose to have corn, money, and a settled allowance during the whole campaign, than a piece of ground which they would be obliged to cultivate themselves. He added, that he knew no better method to reform abuses, than to put things upon the same footing again that they were at first. His advice was followed, though most of the Senators, who had lands that originally belonged to the Commonwealth, could not bear the very name of a retrospection: however, to amuse the people, they made a Decree according to the proposals of Appius: but it was not put in execution till five and thirty years after, when his grandson was made the first of the Decemviri. sending sending a colony to take possession of the estates that were to be divided; as they did to Antium, upon a dispute that was occasioned by this law about the division of that territory: but the people in general were so averſe to going thither, that very few could be found who would ſet down their names for that purpoſe: upon which Livy obſerves, that they were better contented, even with aſpiring to a fortune at Rome, than the certain poſſeſſion of one at Antium. The conteſts occaſioned by this Law continued till the Romans had extended their conqueſts to the uttermoſt bounds of Italy, and even beyond them; after which they ſeemed to be at an end: for the territories which had been taken from their enemies, being a great diſtance from Rome, and in countries whither the people could not conveniently go to cultivate them, they became leſs deſirous of what did not lie immediately under their own eyes: beſides, the Romans after a while grew more gentle and merciful to their enemies, and if they deprived any ſtate of its lands, they diſtributed the inhabitants amongſt the Colonies which they ſent thither.

For theſe reaſons the Agrarian Law was dropt till the time of the Gracchi, who revived it, to the utter deſtruction of the Roman liberties: for the Nobility were grown then much ſtronger, and oppoſed the Plebeians with ſuch inveteracy, that they at laſt came to an open rupture, which occaſioned much bloodſhed and infinite confuſion amongſt them: ſo that the Magiſtrates finding their authority inſufficient to remedy theſe evils, and neither faction expecting to find any redreſs from them, they both had recourſe to other expedients; and each ſide began to look out for ſome Chief to head and defend them. The Plebeians therefore fixed upon Marius, and threw all their weight into his ſcale in ſuch a manner, that he was four times choſen Conſul, with a very ſhort interval betwixt each Conſulſhip; during which time, he ſo firmly eſtabliſhed his power, that he made himſelf thrice Conſul afterwards. The Nobility therefore, having no other remedy left, were forced to throw themselves into the arms of Sylla; and having made him the head of their faction, a civil war immediately ensued: in which, after terrible slaughter on both sides, and many changes of fortune, that of the Nobility at last prevailed. These animosities being afterwards revived in the time of Cæsar and Pompey, Cæsar put himself at the head of the Marian, and Pompey espoused the Syllan faction: but Cæsar getting the better of all opposition, was the first that made himself absolute in Rome; after which, the State never recovered its Liberty.

Such was the beginning and such the consequences of the Agrarian Law, which may seem perhaps to invalidate what I have asserted elsewhere, viz. “That the dissensions which happened at Rome betwixt the Patricians and Plebeians contributed to preserve its liberties, by occasioning many good laws for that purpose.” However I am still of the same opinion: for such is the ambition of the Nobility in every republic, that if they are not effectually restrained by proper laws, the State must soon be ruined. So that if it was above three hundred years before the dissensions about the Agrarian Law, occasioned the subversion of the Roman Commonwealth, that event, in all probability, would have happened much sooner, if the ambition of the Nobility had not been frequently curbed by the terror of that Law, and several other struggles, which were made by the Plebeians for the support of their liberties.

From hence we may likewise observe, how much greater value Men set upon riches than honours: for whenever there was any dispute about the latter, the Nobility often gave up a share of them to the people without much reluctance or opposition: but when their estates were at Stake, they defended them with such obstinacy that the people were obliged to have recourse to extraordinary means in order to gratify themselves, as I have just now shewn; to which they were instigated by the Gracchi, whose good inten-intentions were more to be commended than their prudence. For to think of eradicating an evil that is grown inveterate in a Commonwealth, by making a Law that looks back too far; is a great piece of indiscretion, and only serves to bring it to a crisis the sooner, as I have demonstrated before at large: whereas by temporizing, it may be palliated a longer time, if not totally discussed, before it comes to a head, and causes a general dissolution.

C H A P. XXXVIII.

That weak Republics are always irresolute, and take wrong measures: and if they come to any resolution, it is rather the effect of necessity than choice.

THE Volsci and Æqui being informed that Rome was visited with a dreadful pestilence, thought the time was arrived when they should be able to conquer that State; and having assembled a powerful army, they invaded the territories of the Latins and Hernici, spoiling and laying waste their country in such a manner, that they were forced to apply to the Romans for assistance; who being prevented sending any by the pestilence, returned for answer, that they must arm themselves, and make the best defence they could; since it was not in their power to succour them. From this instance we may observe the prudence and generosity of that Senate, which maintained its dignity in all vicissitudes of fortune, and constantly prescribed the conduct that was to be observed by those that were dependent upon it; being never ashamed to take a resolution that was contrary to their usual manner of proceeding or former maxims, when necessity required it. This I say, because the same Senate had forbid those people to take up arms upon any occasion whatsoever; and any other Senate less prudent than this, perhaps would have thought it derogatory to their honour, if it had suffered them to arm and defend themselves at that time. But that body rightly judged that in such cases, to choose the less of two evils was the best resolution that could be taken: and though it mortified them, without doubt, not only to find they were not able to protect their subjects, but that they must be obliged to suffer them to defend themselves, for many reasons, (some of which have been already assigned, and others are obvious to every one); yet seeing it was absolutely necessary, as the enemy had already invaded them, they took the most honourable course, and with great majesty sent them word they had their leave to defend themselves if they pleased; which indeed they must have been forced to do without it; but this was to save appearances, and to prevent them from doing so upon other occasions without their permission, when there was no necessity for it.

Now though it is easy to say any other Republic must have done the same; yet I affirm, that weak and ill advised Commonwealths neither can, nor know how to act in that manner, nor to save their honour in such exigencies of the State. Duke Valentine having made himself master of Faenza, and compelled Bologna to submit to his own terms, sent an officer to demand a passage for some of his troops through Tuscany, that were upon their march back again to Rome: upon which, a Council being called at Florence to deliberate in what manner they should act upon this occasion, it was unanimously resolved not to comply with the Duke's demand. This was not behaving like the Romans: for the Duke having a very powerful army, and the Florentines being in no condition to oppose him, it would have been more for their honour to grant him a free passage, than to suffer him to force one: that so, what they could not possibly prevent, might seem to be the effect of courtesy, which would have been a means of preserving their reputation, at least in some degree. But the worst property in weak Commonwealths, is that they are irresolute; and if ever they take any laudable resolution, it is rather through necessity, than the effect of wisdom or good counsel: of which I shall produce two instances that happened in Florence in our own times.

In the year 1500, Lewis XII. King of France, having repossessed himself of the Duchy of Milan, was inclinable to have restored Pisa to the Florentines, in consideration of fifty thousand Ducats, which they promised to pay him upon the restitution of it. In consequence of this, the King sent an army towards Pisa, commanded by Monsieur Beaumont, who, though a Frenchman, was much esteemed and confided in by the Florentines. Beaumont accordingly arriving with his troops before Pisa, and intending to batter the town, began to make the necessary dispositions for a Siege: but whilst he was thus preparing for it, the Pisans sent Deputies to him, with an offer of surrendering the town to the French, provided the King would give them his word, that he would not deliver it up to the Florentines before the expiration of the four next months: to which the Florentines seeming very averse, the Siege was carried on, and at last raised with great disgrace to those that had begun it. The reason why the Florentines rejected this proposal, was because they were doubtful of the King's honour: for so weak were their counsels, that they threw themselves into his arms, though they durst not trust him; not considering how much better it would be for them, that the King should have possession of the town, (that so he might either deliver it up to them, or give them an opportunity of discovering his designs if he refused it) than to pay him for promises only, before he could possibly be in a condition to put it into their hands. Certainly then it would have been much more for their interest to have suffered Monsieur Beaumont to get possession of the town upon any terms whatsoever, as may appear from another event, which happened about two years after. Upon the revolt of Arezzo, the same King sent Monsieur Imbalt with a body of French forces to the succour of the Florentines, rentines, who soon after his arrival near that town, finding the inhabitants (like the Pisans) inclinable to submit to him upon certain conditions, began to enter into a treaty with them for that purpose. But the Florentines, not liking the conditions, would not consent to it: upon which, Imbalt, rightly judging that they did not understand their own interest, came to a private agreement with the inhabitants, without communicating it to the Florentine Commissaries; in consequence of which, he entered the town with all his forces, and having upbraided the Florentines with their little experience in the affairs of the world, he represented to them, that if they really desired to have Arezzo restored to them, now was their time to apply to the King, who having got possession of it, had it then in his power to oblige them, which he could not have done before. The Florentines indeed were highly exasperated at Imbalt for proceeding in this manner, and spoke very hardly of him; nor could they be pacified till they were at last convinced that if Beaumont had done as he did, they might have recovered Pisa as well as Arezzo. I say therefore, that weak and irresolute Commonwealths never act as they ought to do, except they are absolutely compelled to it: for their weakness will not suffer them to come to any resolution in a matter that is doubtful; so that they always continue in suspence till their doubts are removed either by downright necessity or violence*.

cident to all States and people: so that by diligently examining the course of former ages, it is an easy matter for men to foresee what will probably happen again in any Commonwealth, and not only to provide such remedies against future evils as their predecessors did, but (if there be no precedents) to strike out new ones, according to the nature and similarity of the case. But since researches of this kind are too often neglected, and history is either not much read, or little understood, especially by those that govern States, it comes to pass that the same evils and inconveniences happen in all times.

The Republic of Florence having lost Pisa and several other territories about the year 1394, was forced to make war upon those that had seized them. But as they were very powerful enemies, the war was attended with a heavy expence, and but little advantage, which occasioned grievous taxes, and consequently much clamour and discontent amongst the people: and because the war was conducted by a Magistracy consisting of ten Citizens, who were called, I dieci della guerra, Decemvirate of war, the Commonalty began to be out of all patience with them, accusing them with being the authors of the war, and all the burdens consequent upon it; and seemed to be persuaded that if their authority was abolished, those troubles would soon be at an end. So that when the time came that those Magistrates were to go out of office, instead of chusing a new Council of ten, they threw all their power into the hands of the Signiory. But this step, instead of putting an end to the war, as the common people had persuaded themselves, threw things into still greater disorder, and proved the occasion of much heavier misfortunes: for when that Magistracy was abolished, which had conducted their affairs with some degree of prudence, they likewise lost Arezzo and many other places; so that the people beginning to repent of their folly, and perceiving that their weakness proceeded from the disease, and not from the remedy that had been made use of to cure it, thought proper to re-establish the Council of ten.

The same thing happened at Rome with regard to the Consuls: for the Plebeians there seeing they were entangled in one war after another, in such a manner, that they enjoyed neither comfort nor rest, instead of imputing it to the ambition of their neighbours, who were perpetually seeking their destruction, thought it entirely owing to the malice of the Nobility; and that as they could not wreak their revenge upon them whilst they continued at home, and under the protection of their Tribunes, they led them abroad under the Consuls, in order to harrass and distress them when there was no body at hand to defend them: upon which account, they resolved either to abolish the name and authority of Consuls entirely, or at least to lay them under such restrictions, that they would not have it in their power to oppress them either at home or abroad. The first that endeavoured to get a Law passed for this purpose was Terentillus, one of the Tribunes, who moved that a Committee of five persons might be appointed to enquire into the abuses of the Consular power, and to restrain it: at which the Nobility were not a little alarmed, as they thought the Majesty of the State would be degraded, and they should have no share left in the administration of the Republic. Such however was the obstinacy of the Tribunes in this point, that the name of Consuls was wholly extinguished; and after trying several other expedients, they chose rather than Consuls to have Tribunes created with Consular power: so that they seemed to be more averse to the name than the authority of Consuls. Upon this footing things continued a long time; till at last, the people being aware of their error, restored the Consuls, as the Florentines did their Council of ten.

C H A P. XL.

Concerning the creation of the Decemviri at Rome; what is most worthy of notice in it; and whether such an Institution may be of greater prejudice or advantage to a Commonwealth.

BEFORE I say any thing of the troubles and commotions that happened at Rome in consequence of creating the Decemviri there, it may not be amiss perhaps to give some account of the Institution itself, and then to point out such things as seem most worthy of notice in it; which are many indeed, and deserve to be well considered both by those that would maintain the liberties of a Commonwealth, and those that have any design to enslave it. For, upon a thorough examination, we shall find many errors committed by the Patricians, many by the Plebeians to the prejudice of their liberty, and still more by Appius, the Head of the Decemviri, to the destruction of that Tyranny which he intended to have established in Rome.

After many contests and disputes therefore, betwixt the Nobility and the People, concerning the introduction of several new laws for the further security of their common liberties, it was agreed by both sides to send Spurius Postumius and five other Citizens to Athens for a copy of those laws which Solon had formerly given to that State; that so they might form a new body out of them for the government of their own. After the return of these Deputies, it was thought proper to appoint a Committee to examine and digest these Laws, and to establish such as might seem most salutary and convenient: in consequence of which, ten Citizens were fixed upon for that purpose, who were to continue in office for a whole year; amongst whom was Appius Claudius, a man of great parts and sagacity, but of a restless and turbulent disposition.

disposition. And that they might be at liberty to act without the least restraint or controul, in adapting these Laws to their own constitution, all other Magistrates were suspended from their respective offices, particularly the Consuls and Tribunes, and no appeal to the people allowed of: so that this Magistracy was vested with absolute power. But Appius by the favour of the people engrossed the authority of all the ten: for he had made himself so popular by his affable and obliging behaviour, that people were astonished to see such a total change in his nature and disposition; and that one, who but a little before had been the most inveterate and implacable persecutor of the Plebeians, should now all on a sudden become their avowed Protector and favourite.

During the first year, every thing was conducted with great modesty and decency, the Decemvir of the day having no more than twelve Licitors to attend him in the discharge of his office; and though the authority of this Magistracy was absolute, nevertheless, one of the Citizens having committed a murder, they cited him to appear before the people, and left them to take cognizance of the matter. The new Laws were written upon ten tables, and exposed in public before they were ratified; that so every one might have the liberty of reading and canvassing them, to see if there was any defect which might be supplied before their confirmation. But before the power of the Decemviri expired, Appius caused it to be whispered about, that a complete body of laws could not be well compiled without the addition of two more tables to the other ten; upon which insinuations, the people readily consented, that the Decemvirate should be continued for another year; not only to prevent the revival of Consular power; but because they were in hopes they should be able to support themselves without the assistance of Tribunes; since the cognizance of capital causes seemed now to be wholly referred to them, as we have said before.

A time being appointed accordingly for the election of a new Decemvirate, the chief of the Nobility exerted all their interest to be chosen; and none with more eagerness than Appius, who solicited the votes of the people with so much earnestness, and yet with such a shew of humility and complaisance, that his associates began to suspect him of some bad design, “credebant enim, says Livy, haud gratuitam in tantâ superbiâ comitatem fore;” for they could not imagine that a person of his pride would stoop so low without some private view; and therefore not daring to oppose him openly, they resolved to circumvent him by artifice; and with this view, though he was the youngest of all the Candidates, they gave him the power of proposing all the ten to the choice of the people; not imagining that he would name himself for one, because it would be not only a scandalous but an unprecedented step. “Ille vero impedimentum pro occasione arripuit;” but he made an advantage of what they designed as an impediment, and named himself first of all, to the great surprize and disgust of all the rest of the Nobility: after which, he named nine other such persons as he thought were fittest for his purpose.

But this election was hardly over, before both the Nobility and people began to be sensible of their error: for Appius soon “finem fecit ferendæ alienæ personæ,” threw off the masque, and not only began to shew his own innate pride, but in a short time made his Collegues as bad as himself; increasing the number of Lictors from twelve to an hundred and twenty, in order to over-awe the whole City. All parties at first were equally terrified; but after a while the Decemviri began to wheedle the Senate, and oppress the people: and if any person was injured by the one, he was still worse treated upon appealing to the other. So that the Plebeians being at last convinced of their folly, began to turn their eyes upon the Nobility, “Et inde libertatis captare auram, unde de servitatem timendo, in eum statum Rempubli- “cam adduxerant,” and to look up to those very persons for the preservation of their liberties, whose power they had opposed with such a degree of virulence, out of a dread of being enslaved by them, as had reduced the Commonwealth to that condition. But the Nobility, instead of sympathizing with the people in their misery, could not help rejoicing at it, “ut ipsi tædio præsentium Consules desiderarent,” in hopes that the grievousness of their sufferings would make them wish to see Consular power restored. At last however when the second year of the Decemvirate expired, the two additional Tables were finished, but not yet exposed to public view: from whence the Decemviri took a handle to continue themselves still longer in office. For which purpose they had recourse to violence, and appointed guards from among the young Nobility to secure them in their usurpation, to whom they gave the goods and estates of such persons as they thought fit either to put to death or impose fines upon; “quibus donis,” says the Historian, juventus corrumpebatur, & malebat licentiam suam, quam omnium libertatem,” by which bribes the youth were debauched, and chose rather to live in licentiousness themselves, than to see the liberties of their country restored.

Whilst things were in this situation, the Sabines and Volsci invaded the Romans, which threw the Decemviri into no small consternation, when they considered how loose they sat in their Seats, and upon how weak a foundation their power was built: for they were not able to carry on a war without the assistance of the Senate; and if the Senate should be suffered to assemble, they knew there would presently be an end of their usurpation. Nevertheless, as the necessity was urgent, they resolved to run that risque; and having called the Senators together, many of them spoke with great acrimony against the arrogance and Tyranny of the Decemviri, particularly Valerius and Horatius; and their authority would certainly have been abolished at that time, if the Senators had thought fit: but they were so jealous of the Plebeians, that they would not exert their whole strength upon that occasion, lest if the Decemviri were obliged to resign their power, the people should set up Tribunes again. The matter therefore was compromised for the present, and a war being resolved upon, they sent two armies against the enemy, commanded by some of the Decemviri, whilst Appius staid at home to take care of the City. But he happening to fall in love during that interval with a young woman, whose name was Virginia, and attempting to carry her off by force, her father killed her with his own hands to save her honour and that of his family. This immediately occasioned such an uproar in Rome, and such tumults in both armies, that the Soldiers leaving the camp, and the people the City, retired to Mons Sacer, where they staid till the Decemviri abdicated the Magistracy: after which, new Consuls and Tribunes were created, and Rome once more recovered its liberty.

From this short narrative, we may observe in the first place, that the institution of this Tyranny at Rome was owing to the same causes which often occasion it in other States; that is, the extravagant desire of liberty in the people, and the immoderate ambition to command in the Nobility: for when they cannot both agree about any law that is to be made in favour of liberty, and either side throws all its weight into the scale of some one person, whom they have made choice of for their champion and protector, from that moment, Tyranny may be said to commence. The Decemviri were created at Rome, and vested with so great a degree of authority by the consent both of the Nobility and Plebeians, but with different views; one side hoping to abolish the Consular Power, and the other, that of the Tribunes: accordingly after their creation, the Plebeians looking upon Appius as their firm friend, began to court and caress him exceedingly, and to strengthen his hands in such a manner, that he might be able to de-

press the Nobility. But when things once come to such a pass that the people are weak enough to exalt some one man only, to humble those whom they hate, if he is a person of any subtilty and address, he will soon make himself absolute Lord over them all if he pleases: for he may extinguish the Nobility by the help of the Plebeians, whom he will take care to favour and cherish till he has thoroughly effected that; after which, the people having no body to protect them upon occasion, will begin to perceive when it is too late, that they have lost their liberty and lie wholly at his mercy. This course has always been taken by such as have become Tyrants over free States; and if Appius had followed it, his Tyranny would have taken deeper root and continued longer: But he acted quite the contrary, and imprudently incurred the hatred of those persons that had advanced him to power, and were able to have supported him in it; whilst he ingratiated himself with those that were neither pleased at his exaltation, nor strong enough to defend him afterwards; thus abandoning his friends to court others who never could be so. For though the Nobility are naturally desirous to rule and domineer themselves, yet such of them as have no share in a tyrannical government will always hate the Tyrant; nor can he for his part ever gain them all: for so great, generally speaking, are their avarice and ambition, that it is not possible any Tyrant should have either riches or honours in his disposal sufficient to satiate them. Thus Appius in leaving the Plebeians, and joining the Nobility, was guilty of an egregious error, for the reasons just now assigned; and because it is necessary that a man who would keep possession by violence of what he has got, should be stronger than those that endeavour to wrest it out of his hands; therefore those Tyrants who make the people their friends, and are hated by the Nobility only, will be more secure; because they have a stronger foundation to depend upon than others, who make the people their enemy, and the Nobility

Nobility their friends. For by these means, they may always support themselves without foreign assistance, as Nabis the Tyrant of Sparta did; who having secured the affections of the people, did not give himself much trouble about the Nobility; and yet he defended himself against all Greece, and the whole power of the Romans, which he never could have done without the favour of the people. But, on the other hand, when a Tyrant depends on the Nobility alone, as the number of his friends is small at home, he cannot support himself without foreign aid; for he will want guards for the security of his person, Soldiers, to serve as Militia, instead of his own people; for the defence of the country, and powerful allies to succour him in distress: all which if he can procure, he may possibly maintain his power without the affections of the people. But Appius despising the people, whom he might have made his friends, and having no other resource, was soon deposed.

The Senate and people of Rome likewise committed a gross error in the creation of the Decemviri: for though we have asserted before, in the discourse concerning Dictators, that those Magistrates only endanger the public liberty who force themselves into office, and not those who are legally appointed by the free suffrages of the people; yet the people that chuse them, ought at the same time to take great care to lay them under proper checks and restraints to prevent their abusing their power: but the Romans, instead of taking such measures to oblige the Decemviri to keep within due bounds, entirely freed them from all controul, by making their power absolute, and abolishing all other Magistracies, that might in any wise have served to balance it, and this merely out of the excessive desire (as we have said before) which the Senate had to suppress the Tribunes, and the People the Consuls. These passions so blinded their understandings, that both sides equally contributed to the disorders that ensued: for men, as King Ferdinand of Arragon used to say, often resemble certain little birds of prey, which pursue others with such eagerness, that they are not aware of a greater bird that is hovering over their heads, and ready to fouse down upon them and tear them to pieces. But enough has been said to shew the error which the Romans were guilty of in creating the Decemviri to preserve their liberty; and that of Appius in the means he took to establish Tyranny.
King

C H A P. XLI.

That it is impolitic in any man who was humble and merciful before, to become arrogant and cruel on a sudden, and without observing any gradation.

AMONGST the other false steps which Appius took to support his Tyranny, the changing his disposition and manner of conduct so suddenly was of no small prejudice to him. It must be owned indeed; that his artifice in cajoling the people by pretending to be their Champion; the address he made use of in getting the Decemvirate prolonged; his resolution in proposing himself again, contrary to the expectation of the Nobility; and his naming such Collegues as he could make tools of, were masterly and well timed strokes of policy. But when he had done all this (as we have shewn before) he certainly judged very wrong in changing his deportment so instantaneously, in persecuting and oppressing the people after he had been their avowed protector, in becoming so fierce and arrogant, after such an appearance of humility and affability; and that too without any excuse to justify himself, and in so sudden a manner, that every body presently discovered the deceitfulness and villainy of his heart. For a man that has worn the mask of honesty and goodness for a while, and finds it necessary at last to throw it off, and alter his conduct for the accomplishment of some great purpose, should do it by insensible degrees, and avail himself of proper opportunities and conjunctures; not per saltum, by a sudden leap and all at once: that so the difference of his behaviour may not deprive him of his old friends, before * he has had time to gain new ones to support his authority: otherwise his designs will immediately be seen through, and finding himself destitute of all sorts of assistance, he must inevitably be ruined.

C H A P. XLII.

How prone Mankind are to corruption.

IT may further be observed, from what happened under the Decemvirate, how liable men are to be debauched, let their first principles and education be ever so good. If the example of the young Nobility, whom Appius took for his guards, and corrupted to such a degree, that they became friends to Tyranny and supporters of his usurpation, merely for the sake of lucre, and indulging themselves in their licentious desires, was not sufficient, we might add that of Quintus Fabius, one of the Decemviri of the second creation, who though a virtuous and good man before, was so blinded by ambition, and seduced by the cunning of Appius, that he seemed totally to have changed his natural disposition, and became as bad as the other †. A due consideration therefore of human frailty should teach all Legislators, either in Kingdoms or Commonwealths, to make the most effectual provisions they can to bridle the appetites and passions of mankind, and to deprive them of all hopes of impunity when they violate the laws of their country.

* Cromwell excelled most other Tyrants in this sort of Policy.

C H A P. XLIII.

That those who fight out of a principle of honour make the best and most faithful Soldiers.

FROM what has been related above concerning the Decemviri, it may likewise be remarked how great a difference there is betwixt Soldiers that are well affected to their Commanders, and fight for their own glory, and those that are led into the field against their inclination, and fight only to gratify the ambition of others. For though the Roman armies were almost always victorious when commanded by Consuls, yet under the conduct of the Decemviri, they were never successful. From hence also we may discern one of the reasons at least, why forces are so little to be depended upon who have no other motive to fight than their pay, which is by no means sufficient to secure their fidelity, or to make them so much your friends as to lay down their lives for you. For Soldiers whose hearts are not warmly affected in the cause and interests of those for whom they fight, will make but a very feeble resistance if vigorously attacked: and since this sort of affection and emulation is not to be found, or indeed expected in Mercenaries, those that govern Kingdoms and Commonwealths ought above all things to fortify themselves with the love and esteem of their own Soldiers, as in fact all those have ever done who have performed the greatest exploits. The Roman armies had not lost their ancient valour under the reign of the Decemviri; but as they were but coldly affected towards them, they did not exert themselves with their usual Spirit, nor succeed in the manner they had been wont to do. But when the Decemvirate was abolished, and they had recovered their liberties, they fought courageously again like free men in the defence of their country; and consequently their enterprizes were crowned with glory and success as before *.

That a multitude without a Head can do but little; and that they should not threaten to make an ill use of power, before they have obtained it.

UPON the violence that had been offered to Virginia †, the Plebeians of Rome having taken arms and retired to Mons Sacer, where they were joined by the army, the Senate sent to demand the reason of that Secession, and by what authority the Soldiers had abandoned the camp: and so great was

* “ With regard to Fleets and Armies,” says the Author of the Estimate of the Manners and Principles of the times, vol. II. sect. vi. “ another Truth offers itself to observation. Here the love of Glory is necessary in the Leaders, as a motive to great and daring Enterprizes. But amongst the inferior ranks, the fear of shame will generally be of sufficient influence to compel them to their Duty. The reason is evident: for, with regard to the Leaders, as it is impossible to point out to them the particular track of their Duty in every instance; so their conduct must be left in general to the determinations of their own mind. Great actions will naturally be attended with glory: but the mere omission of great actions, where peremptory orders are not given, is not necessarily attended with shame. It is the love of Glory only therefore, that can urge a Leader to great and dangerous attempts. But with regard to the inferior ranks, there the particular track of Duty is pointed out, which is only this, “ obey the commands of your Leader.” Under this circumstance no evasion can take place: every man must obey, or Infamy overtakes him; and thus the fear of shame becomes sufficient. This distinction will clearly account for that strange difference of conduct in our British troops during the last, as well as the present war. It has been remarked, that at sometimes they have fought like Lions, and at others have been as timorous as Hares. Their bravery in particular instances, has been brought as a proof against the existence of the Ruling Principle of Effeminacy which runs through this work. But whoever views this matter, according to the distinctions here pointed out, will at once see the veil drawn off from this mysterious appearance of things. Where did our troops distinguish their Valour? was it not at Dettingen? at La Feldt? and above all, on the dreadful field of Fontenoy, where honest Fame forsook the Standard of the Victor, and wept over the Banners of the retreating English? And who were their Leaders upon these important days? They were such as were inspired and actuated by the generous love of glory.”

† Appius had made a forcible attempt to ravish her.

The reverence in which the multitude still held the authority of the Senate, that as they had no Head over them, no particular person would presume to return an answer: for though, as Livy says, there was matter enough for an answer, yet no body cared to deliver it. From whence we may observe how weak a thing a multitude is without a Head.

But Virginius (the father of Virginia) being aware of this defect, had the address to get twenty military Tribunes created with power to treat and confer with the Senate: after which they desired that Valerius and Horatius might be sent to them, to whom they would communicate what they had to say. These two Senators, however, refused to go upon any such errand, except the Decemviri would first abdicate their authority: which being at last complied with, they went to the people, who demanded that their Tribunes should be restored, that appeals to them from the Sentence of any magistrate should be allowed of, and that the late Decemviri should be delivered up to them, whom they would burn alive. The two first requests were approved by Valerius and Horatius; but they could not help condemning the last as Savage and inhuman, telling them, “crudelitas odio, in crudelitate ruitis;” whilst you “abhor cruelty in others, you would be guilty of the highest degree of barbarity yourselves;” and advising them to drop all further mention of the Decemviri at that time, that so they might attend more effectually to the recovery of their own liberty and authority; after which, they might find sufficient means to take proper satisfaction. Hence we may learn, how weak and imprudent it is to ask for a thing, and to declare at the same time, that we design to make a bad use of it as soon as obtained: certainly in such a case a man should conceal his bad intentions, at least till he has succeeded in his solicitations, which he ought by all means to make his first and principal endeavour. If a person had a design upon the life of another, would it not be sufficient to say to him, “ pray lend me your Sword,” without telling him you intended to kill him with it ; since when you have got the Sword in your hand, you may do what you please with it ?

C H A P. XLV.

That it is a bad precedent to break a new Law; especially in the Legislator himself: and that it is very dangerous for those that govern States to multiply injuries and repeat them every day.

W H E N the public tranquility was restored at Rome, and the ancient form of Government re-established, Appius was cited by Virginius to answer for his misdemeanours before the people ; and making his appearance in the midst of a great number of the Nobility, he was immediately ordered to Prison. Upon this, he protested against it, and appealed to the people : but Virginius insisted that he who had abolished all appeals, was not worthy of being indulged in one himself, or of being allowed to implore the protection of a people whom he had so grievously injured. But Appius replied, that they who had been so zealous to re establish that privilege, should not be the first to break it. After all, however, he was committed to prison, and killed himself before his trial came on.

Now though without doubt Appius deserved the severest punishment, yet it was a thing of very dangerous consequence for the Roman people to violate their own laws, and especially one that was so lately made : for I think there cannot be a more dangerous precedent in a commonwealth than to establish laws, and not observe them ; especially if they are first dispensed with by the Legislators themselves. A reform in the State having taken place at Florence in the beginning of the year 1495, by the assistance and advice of Friar Girolamo Savonarola (whose writings give sufficient proof of his learning, abilities, and Spirit), a new law was made for the further security of the Citizens, by virtue of which they were allowed to appeal to the people from any Sentence passed in matters of State, either by the Council of eight, or the Signiory. But notwithstanding this law, which he had solicited with such earnestness, and obtained with so much difficulty, five Citizens who had been condemned to death by the Signiory, and designed to appeal to the people were denied that privilege: a circumstance that hurt the Friar's reputation more than any thing else that could possibly have befallen him; for if this law was of such importance as he pretended, it ought to have been strictly observed; if not, why was it pressed with such importunity? This was the more taken notice of because he never made the least mention of the violation of the law in any of his Sermons or harangues, though he afterwards delivered many to the people, nor either condemned or excused those that had broke it, for since it served his own purposes, he knew not how to condemn it, and as to an excuse, there was no possibility of making any; which sort of behaviour fully discovering the partiality and ambition of his heart, entirely ruined his reputation, and loaded him with infamy and reproach*.

It likewise creates great disgust in a State when the Citizens are terrified every day with fresh prosecutions; as it happened at Rome after the expiration of the Decemvirate, for not only all the Decemviri, but so many other Citizens were accused and condemned at different times, that the Nobility were in the utmost consternation, and began to apprehend there would be no end of these severities, till their whole order was extinguished; and this manner of proceeding would certainly have excited great troubles and inconveniencies, if they had not been foreseen and prevented by Marcus Duellius one of the Tribunes, who published an edict, prohibiting every one either to cite or accuse any Roman Citizen during the space of a year; by which act of moderation, the Nobility were delivered from all further disquietude and apprehension. From hence it appears, how dangerous it is either for a Prince or a Commonwealth to keep their subjects in continual fear and alarm by daily executions. Indeed nothing can be more prejudicial to their interest*: for when men begin to dread these evils, they will naturally endeavour to secure themselves at all events, and become bolder and more determined to attempt a change of government. Upon such occasions therefore, it is the best way either to punish no body at all, or to finish the executions at once, and afterwards to give the people no occasion to fear any thing further; that so they may live securely and quietly †.

C H A P. XLVI.

That men usually rise from one degree of ambition to another; endeavouring in the first place to secure themselves from oppression, and afterwards to oppress others.

AFTER the people of Rome had not only recovered their liberty and former power, but were become stronger and still more secure under the protection of many new laws, it might have been expected they would at last have enjoyed some repose; yet it happened quite contrary, and every day produced new tumults and dissensions. The reason of which, according to Livy, was that the Nobility and Plebeians being at perpetual variance, when one side was humbled, the other grew insolent; when the populace were content the young Nobility

* Witness the case of our King James II. who terrified and disgusted his Subjects to the last degree, by the unreasonable number of Executions which he ordered in the west of England at different times upon the Duke of Monmouth's affair.

† As the Emperor Augustus did, who after a most cruel proscription and a multitude of Executions, presently became so remarkably indulgent and merciful to his Subjects, that he afterwards reigned in peace and security all his life, and has been more extolled than almost any other Emperor.

began to abuse them; nor was it in the power of the Tribunes to provide any effectual remedy for this, as they were liable to be insulted themselves. The Nobility, on the other hand, though they could not help being sensible, that the younger part of their order were too arbitrary and licentious, yet if the bounds of decency and good order were to be transgressed either by one side or the other, chose rather that their own should be the trespasser than that of the Plebeians. So that the immoderate desire of preserving their respective privileges, was the cause that when either faction prevailed, they oppressed the other; for it generally happens, that whilst men are guarding against violence themselves, they begin to encroach upon others, and when they pull a dagger out of their own breast, endeavour to plunge it into their neighbour's; as if they must of necessity either injure or be injured.

From hence we may observe (amongst other things) in what manner Republics are at last dissolved, how natural a transition there is from one degree of ambition to another, and that what Sallust says in the person of Julius Cæsar is very just, “quod omnia mala exempla, bonis initiis orta sunt; that all disorders and abuses arise from good beginnings.” Ambitious Citizens in all Commonwealths, make it their principal business, as I said before, not only to defend themselves against private violence, but the authority of the Magistrates; for which purpose, they endeavour to cultivate friendships and dependencies by ways seemingly honest and honourable; as by lending money to those that are poor, or protecting the weak and helpless, against the oppressor and extortioner; all which carrying a fair and good appearance, the people are easily deluded and take no care to prevent the consequences till it is too late, and not only private Citizens but even the Magistrates themselves begin to stand in awe of them*. After they have arrived at this height without any opposition, it becomes very dangerous to meddle with them, for reasons which I have given before, in discoursing on the folly and imprudence of endeavouring to eradicate an evil that is grown to too great a head in a Commonwealth; so that when things are once come to this pass, you must either endeavour to pull them down again, which cannot be done without the utmost hazard of utter ruin to the State; or you must patiently submit to lose your liberties, except their death, or some other accident should chance to deliver you. For when they perceive both the people and Magistrates are afraid of them and their friends, they will soon begin to domineer and play the tyrant. A Commonwealth therefore ought above all things, to take timely care to prevent its Citizens from doing evil under the appearance of good; and that they may not become so popular as to prejudice the State instead of advancing its welfare; but of this we shall treat more at large in another place*.

C H A P. XLVII.

Though the people are sometimes mistaken in general points, yet they seldom or never err in particulars.

THE people of Rome, as I said before, growing weary of their Consuls, and desirous to have them chosen out of the Plebeians for the future, or at least some bounds prescribed to their power; the Nobility, in order to prevent their Authority from being debased either way, took a middle course, and consented that four Tribunes with Consular power should be elected indifferently out of the Patricians and Plebeians. The people were pretty well satisfied, imagining that in consequence of this, the Consulship would at last be utterly abolished, and they should have an equal share in the administration. But it was very remarkable that at the creation of these Tribunes when they had it in their power and every body expected they would have chosen them out of the Plebeians, they were all elected out of the Nobility. Upon which Livy says, “ quorum committiorum eventus docuit, “ alios animos in contentione libertatis & honoris, alios “ secundum deposita certamina in incorrupto iudicio “ esse; the event of this election shewed that the peo- “ ple were of one mind in their contests for liberty “ and honours, and of another when those contests “ were over, and their judgment grown cool again.”

Considering with myself therefore what might be the reason of this, I think it is because men are more apt to be mistaken in generals than particulars. The Plebeians at Rome thought themselves more worthy of the Consulship than the Nobility, as they were so much the more numerous body, and not only bore the chief burden and hardships in all wars, but were the greatest support of public liberty, and contributed most to the aggrandizement of their country; upon which, their pretensions seeming to them in no wise unreasonable, they resolved to assume that honour at all events. But when they came to make choice of proper persons from among themselves to fill the Consulship, they began to find their weakness, and soon perceived, that no particular man amongst them was equal to what they thought they had deserved altogether. Ashamed of their incapacity therefore, they gave their votes for such as they knew were really more worthy; upon which occasion, Livy cries out in some sort of admiration, “ hanc modestiam, æquitatemque “ & altitudinem animi ubi nunc in uno inveneris, quæ “ tunc populi universi fuit? Where shall we see now “ a days that degree of modesty, equity, and magnani- “ mity even in any one man, which was then so con- “ spicuous in a whole people?” As a further confirmation of this matter, I shall produce a remarkable proof from what happened in Capua, after Hannibal had defeated the Romans at the battle of Cannæ. Upon that overthrow, all Italy, and the Capuans in particular, began to rebel against their Governors, out of an ancient emulation which subsisted betwixt the Senate and the People there. But Pacuvius Calavius being then first Magistrate in that City, and seeing the ferment it was in, hit upon the following expedient to reconcile the People and Senate. In the first place, he called the Senate together, and having represented to them how implacably they were hated by the people, the danger they were in of being murdered by them, and the City delivered up to Hannibal, now the affairs of the Romans were in so desperate a condition, told them at last that if they would leave things to him, he would reconcile all differences betwixt them; but that it was absolutely necessary for their preservation, that they should be all locked up together in the Senate house, and delivered up into the hands of the People; after which, he would answer for their safety. The Senators submitting to this, he told the people in a conference that the time was come at last when they might sufficiently humble the Nobility if they pleased, and take a full revenge upon them for the many injuries they had received at their hands; for he had them all shut up together in his custody: but as he imagined they would not think of leaving the City wholly unprovided with Magistrates and Senators, he was of opinion they should create new ones first to supply the vacancies, in case they had a mind to dispatch the old ones: for which purpose, he had brought a purse thither with the names of all the Senators in it, out of which he desired they would draw them one by one, and he would take care that every man of them should be put to death immediately, as soon as they had appointed another in his room. The drawing accordingly begun, and upon the first name that came out, a great outcry was set up of Tyrant, Oppressor, &c. and Pacuvius asking whom they would have to succeed him, a general silence ensued; after which, one of the Plebeians was proposed: no sooner was he mentioned however, but some burst out a laughing, others began to hiss, and others to abuse him, some in one manner and some in another: so that in short, as they proceeded to name the others, there was not so much as one that was thought worthy of that dignity. Pacuvius therefore, taking the advantage of this disposition in the people, told them that since they did not think it convenient the City should be without a Senate, and could not agree in the choice of new Senators, they had better be reconciled to the old ones, who would be so humbled by the apprehensions they had been in, that they might expect to find that moderation as well as ability in them, which it seemed they could not hope for in others. A reconciliation accordingly ensued betwixt them; and the mistake they had lain under was soon discovered, when they came to the discussion of particulars.

The people are likewise often deceived in judging of the circumstances and situation of things; and are not capable of being disabused, till they come to view them more nearly. After the year 1414, most of the the principal Citizens of Florence being driven out of that City, and no regular Government left, but rather a licentious sort of misrule, under which, things fell into greater confusion every day; several of the popular party, who saw the Republic could not subsist, and not being able to penetrate into the true cause, imputed it to the ambition of certain leading men amongst them, who (as they gave out) fomented these disorders, in order to deprive them of their liberties, and mold the State into such a form, as they best liked themselves: these aspersions were industriously propagated in every part of the City, by persons who daily abused the principal Citizens, both in public and private companies, threatening, that if ever they should get into the Signiory, they would not fail to bring their misdeeds to light, and punish them severely. But afterwards, when some of those very men came into authority, as they had wished, and from that degree of eminence were enabled to see further and clearer into things, they soon began to perceive the causes of these disorders, the dangers that hung over their heads, and the the difficulty of providing any effectual remedy : and finding they were owing rather to the malignity of the times, than to any particular men, they presently changed both their opinion and conduct ; as a more intimate knowledge of particulars had opened their eyes, and convinced them of the prejudices they had conceived, and the errors they had lain under, whilst they judged of things by general appearances. So that those who had heard them talk in another strain, whilst they were private men, and saw them act in a manner so different from their former professions when they had got into power, could not be persuaded that this was the effect of more experience, or deeper insight into the State of affairs, but that they were either corrupted by others, or intoxicated with their own power : and the same thing happening several times afterwards gave rise to the proverb, “ Costoro hanno un’ animo in piazza, & uno in palazzo ; these men are of one opinion in the house, and another out of doors.”

From what has been said therefore, it appears, that it is an easy matter to undeceive the people, by setting particulars before their eyes, when they have been misled by judging of things in general, as Pacuvius did at Capua, and the Patricians at Rome ; and, I think, we may conclude upon the whole, that no prudent man ought to despise the judgment of the people in particular matters, such especially as the distribution of offices and honours, in which they are so seldom wrong, that if a smaller number were to have the disposal of them, they would err much oftener*. It may not then

* Very different is old Montaigne’s opinion upon this point. “ A dozen men, says he, must be culled out of a whole nation, to judge an acre of land ; and the judgment of our inclinations and actions, the hardest and most important thing that is, we must refer to, vox populi, the mother of ignorance, injustice, and inconstancy. Is it reasonable that the life of a wise man should depend upon the judgment of fools ? “ An quidquam Stultius,” says Tully in the fifth book of his Tusculan Disputations, “ quam quos singulos contempnas, eos aliquid putare esse univeros ? Can any thing be more foolish than to think, that those you despise when single, can be of any value in the bulk ?” He that makes it his business to please them, will never succeed ; it is a mark that never to be reached or hit. “ Nihil tam inestimabile est quam opinio multitudinis. “ judgment of the multitude.” Demetrius pleasantly said of the voice of the people, “ That he made no more account of that which came out of their mouth, than of what fumed from their lower parts.” Cicero goes further in his second book de finibus. “ Ego hoc judico, says he, si quando non turpe sit, tamen non esse non turpe, quum id a multitudine laudatur. I am of opinion that though a thing be not foul in itself, yet it cannot but become so when it is commended by the multitude.” No art, no dexterity, could conduct our steps in following so wandering and so irregular a guide. In the confusion and noise of vulgar opinion no good path can be chosen: let us not then propose to ourselves so variable a Conductor; let us constantly follow our own right reason; let the approbation of the public follow us, if it will; and as it wholly depends upon fortune, we have no cause to expect it sooner any other way than that,

If popular opinion, nevertheless, be of that use to the Public, as to keep men in their duty; if some are thereby excited to virtue; if Princes are moved by hearing the world bless the memory of Trajan, and abominate that of Nero; if it moves them to see the name of that great beast, once so terrible and dreaded, now so freely cursed and reviled by every school-boy, let it, in the name of Heaven, increase and be cherished as much as possible amongst us. For even Plato himself, bending his whole endeavour to make his Citizens virtuous, advises them not to despise the good esteem of the People, and says, “ That it happens by a certain Divine inspiration, that even the wicked themselves, as well by word as opinion, can often distinguish the good from the evil.” This Person and his Tutor are marvellous bold Artificers, to add Divine operations and Revelations wherever human force is wanting: and perhaps it was for this reason, that Timon railing at him, calls him “ the great Forger of Miracles,” as Cicero says in his first book de naturâ deorum, cap. xx. “ Ut Tragicæ Poetæ confugiunt ad Deum aliquem, cum aliter explicare argumenti exitum non possunt. As Tragic poets have recourse to some Deity, when they cannot otherwise tell how to wind up the plot.” Book II. Essay 16.

C H A P. XLVIII.

To prevent a mean or wicked man from being advanced to the Magistracy, care should be taken to set a Candidate of the noblest family, and most eminent merit, in competition with one of the basest and vilest of the People.

WHEN the Patricians began to be apprehensive that Tribunes, vested with Consular power, would be chosen out of the Plebeians, they always had recourse to one or other of these two expedients; they either set up some of the worthiest and most respectable of their own order, or corrupted some of the most sordid and basest of the Plebeians to stand Candidates, and boldly to solicit that honour which was only due to the most deserving. The latter method made the people ashamed of bestowing it upon such unworthy men; and the former, of taking it from those that were the most deserving. This may serve as a corroboration of what I said in the preceding Chapter, that though the people are frequently deceived in judging of generals, they very seldom err in particulars.

C H A P. XLIX.

If such Cities as Rome, which were originally free, found it exceeding difficult to make laws sufficiently effectual to secure their liberties; it is almost impossible for those that have always been in a state of servility and dependence ever to become free.

HOW difficult a matter it is to establish such laws in a Commonwealth, as may at all times effectually preserve its liberties, is sufficiently evident from the history of the Roman Republic. For though many good provisions were at first made by Romulus, and and afterwards by Numa, then by Tullus Hostilius, Servius, and lastly by the Decemviri who were created for that purpose; yet in process of time fresh exigencies and accidents often made new laws necessary; as it happened when they created the Censorship, which was one of those Institutions that chiefly contributed to preserve the liberties of Rome so long; for as the Censors were appointed to inspect the manners and conduct of the Citizens, and to correct their enormities and extravagancies, it was in a great measure owing to them that they continued uncorrupt for such a number of years. They were guilty of a great error however, in the creation of these officers, since they were to continue five years in power: but this was afterwards wisely corrected by Mamercus the Dictator, and the term of their authority reduced to eighteen months: at which the Censors were exasperated to such a degree, and watched his conduct so narrowly, that they found means at last to expel him the Senate, to the great regret both of the Patricians and the Plebeians. That Livy does not inform us whether Mamercus found any redress upon this occasion, must either be a neglect in the Historian, or a defect in the laws: for surely that Commonwealth cannot be wisely constituted, where a Citizen is liable to be persecuted without resource or means of defence, only for promulging a law for the maintenance of public liberty.

But to our purpose: I say that from the creation of these new Magistrates, we may observe how difficult it is, even in States that were originally free, like Rome, and subject to no other power, to make sufficient provisions for the support of liberty: and, how almost impossible for other States, which were founded, and always have lived in subjection, ever to make such laws as may effectually secure them in the enjoyment of liberty and tranquillity. We might instance in the case of Florence, which being subject to the Roman Empire in its origin, and always accustomed to live under the government of others, continued a long time in that State of servility, without so much as ever aspiring to liberty: at last, however, some little attempt was made, and the Citizens began to form new laws for themselves: but as they were mixed and entangled with the old ones, which were bad, they had little or no efficacy: and thus they continued two hundred years, as appears from authentic history, without any regular form of Government that deserved the name of a Republic. The same difficulties and inconveniencies that occurred in that State, have ever been incident to all others, which had the like origin: and though ample authority has often been trusted in the hands of a few Citizens, to new model it by the free suffrages of the people, yet they never consulted the good of the public in those reformations, so much as their own private advantage: whence it came to pass, that things grew worse and worse, instead of better, and their confusion daily increased.

But to be still more particular: Amongst other things which ought to be considered by a Legislator, he should take great care in whose hands he lodges the cognizance of capital causes, and the execution of penal laws*. This was well attended to at Rome,

* Lord Bacon, in a piece entitled, "A Proposition to his Majesty for the complement and amendment of our Laws," says, "It is certain that our Laws, as they now stand are subject to great uncertainty and variety of opinions, delays, and evasions: from whence it follows: 1. That the multiplicity and length of suits are great; 2. That the contentious person is armed, and the honest subject wearied and oppressed; 3. That the judge is more absolute, who has a greater liberty in doubtful cases; 4. That the Chancery Courts are more filled, the remedy of the Law being often obscure and doubtful; 5. That the ignorant Lawyer shrouds his ignorance of Law in this, that there are so many and so frequent doubts; 6. That mens assurances of their lands and estates by Patents, Deeds, and Wills, are often subject to question and precarious; and many inconveniencies of that nature." He then observes, "That if it had not been for Sir Edward Coke's Reports, the law by that time would have been almost like a Ship without Ballast; since the Cases of modern experience are fled from those that have been adjudged and ruled in former times." "But the necessity of this work," continues he, "is yet greater in the Statute Law. For first, there is a number of ensnaring penal laws, which lie upon the subject, and if they should be awaked, and put in execution in bad times, would grind them to powder. There is a learned Civillian who expounds an appeal to the people being allowed in most cases : and in any matter where the necessity was pressing, and it might be dangerous to delay the execution of justice by an appeal, they created a Dictator, who saw it immediately performed ; they never had recourse to this remedy however, except upon very urgent occasions. But Florence, and other Cities of the same servile cast, had a foreign officer sent to reside amongst them by their Prince, who vested this authority in him : which custom they kept up after they became free, and continued the same power in a foreigner, whom they called their Captain ; a dangerous practice indeed ! considering how easily such a person might be corrupted by the more powerful Citizens *. But other revolutions happening in that State, this custom was afterwards changed, and eight of their own Citizens were appointed to execute the Office of Captain, which was still worse and worse ; because, as I have said elsewhere, where there are but few Magistrates, they are always liable to be made tools of by those, that have the chief power in their hands. Against this inconvenience, they have made admirable provision at Venice, where there is a Council of Ten appointed, with power to punish any Citizen without appeal : and lest their authority should

“ that passage in the Scripture, “ Pluet laqueos super eos ; It shall rain snares upon them,” of a multitude of penal Laws, which are “ worse than showers of hail and tempest upon Cattle, because they “ fall upon men. There are some penal laws fit to be retained, but “ their penalty is too great ; and it is ever a rule, that any over-great “ penalty (besides the acerbity of it) deadens the execution of the “ Law. There is a further inconvenience of penal Laws, obsolete “ and out of use ; for that it brings a gangrene, neglect, and habit “ of disobedience upon other wholesome Laws, that are fit to be continued in practice and execution : so that our Laws endure the torment of Mezentius, the living die in the arms of the dead. Lastly, there is such an accumulation of Statutes concerning one matter, and they are so cross and intricate, that the certainty of the “ Law is lost in the heap.” If there was reason for such a representation at that time ; surely there is much more at present. But we may thank Heaven, that “ the cognizance of capital causes, and the “ execution of penal Laws are lodged in such hands as they are ;” otherwise what would become of us ?

not be sufficient to controul persons of more than ordinary power or quality, there are two Councils of Forty *, and the Pregadi † besides, (which is the highest Court in that City) and all of them commissioned to take cognizance of capital offences, and to punish them: so that, if there is any body to accuse, there are always judges enough, and of sufficient authority to curb offenders of the highest rank. If Rome then, which was originally free, and governed by so many wise Citizens of its own, found daily occasion to make new laws for the maintenance of its liberties, according to the variety of unexpected contingencies; it is no wonder that other Cities, which stood upon so much weaker foundations, should meet with such difficulties and obstacles in their way, that they could never surmount them, and become perfectly free.

C H A P. L.

That no one Magistrate or Council should have it in their power to stop the course of public affairs in a Commonwealth.

TITUS Quintius Cincinnatus, and Caius Julius Mento, being Collegues in the Consulship at Rome, but disagreeing and thwarting each other in their measures, all public business was at a stand: upon which, the Senate advised them to create a Dictator to expedite those affairs, which their quarrels would not suffer them to dispatches. But the Consuls, though they differed in every thing else, unanimously agreed to oppose the creation of a Dictator: so that the Senators, having no other remedy, were obliged to have recourse to the Tribunes, who, with the assistance of the Senate, at last compelled them to submit. From hence, in the first place, we may observe, of how great utility the Institution of Tribunes was to that Republic, not only in curbing the ambition and insolence of the Patricians to the Plebeians, but in moderating those differences and emulations that happened amongst themselves: and in the next, that special care should be taken in a Commonwealth, not to put it in the power of a few persons to clog or impede the common course of affairs, particularly of things, the dispatch whereof, is absolutely necessary for the support and welfare of the State. For example, if you lodge the power of distributing honours and emoluments in the hands of such a Council, or appoint such an officer to execute any other of your commands, you ought either to make some provision beforehand, that will force them to discharge those functions, or in case they will not, to reserve a power of appointing others that may and will: otherwise that Institution will be both defective and dangerous; as it would have proved at Rome, in the instance just now quoted, if they had not had the authority of the Tribunes to quell the obstinacy and perverseness of the Consuls.

* Le Quarantie are two Tribunals, each of which consists of forty judges, and has its particular jurisdiction, one taking cognizance of criminal, the other of civil causes.

† This Council is composed of two hundred Senators, and is called the Pregadi, or Court of Requests, because at its first institution it was prayed to charge itself with the care of the Commonwealth.

In the Republic of Venice, where the majority of the great Council have the disposal of all honours and employments, it once happened, either through disgust, or some other motive, that they would not appoint any new Magistrates to succeed the old ones in their several departments either at home or abroad, when their authority expired; which presently occasioned great confusion and disorder: for the towns that depended upon them, and indeed their own City itself, being left destitute of lawful judges, could obtain no redress in any injury, till either the majority of that council were appeased, or some other expedient found out. And certainly this would have been attended with fatal consequences, if they had not been prevented by some of the most prudent Citizens, who took a favourable opportunity to get a law passed, that no office or employment whatsoever, either within the City or without it, should ever be vacated till new officers were chosen to supersede the old ones: and thus this defect was remedied, and the great Council deprived of a power to interrupt the course of justice and other public affairs, which otherwise must have ended in the total dissolution of that State.

C H A P. LI.

That a Prince or Republic should seem to do that out of favour and liberality, which they are forced to do by necessity.

WISE men make the best of all circumstances, and though they find themselves under an absolute necessity of acting in a particular manner, yet they always contrive to do it with so good a grace, that it seems rather the effect of favour and liberality than necessity. Of this address the Roman Senate availed itself, when it resolved to pay the Soldiery out of the public treasury, who before were obliged to maintain themselves in time of war at their own expence. But the Senate perceiving that no war could be long supported upon this footing, and consequently that they should neither be able to carry on any siege of importance, nor transport their armies into distant countries, both which they thought must some time become necessary, resolved to pay them out of the public stock: yet it was done in such a manner, that they made a merit of what was entirely owing to necessity: by which they firmly secured the affections of the people, who were overjoyed at a favour so extraordinary, that they never had conceived any hopes of obtaining, nor even so much as thought of soliciting it. And though the Tribunes took great pains to persuade them, that it was so far from being an Act of Grace as they imagined, that it would rather be a very heavy burden than otherwise, as grievous taxes must be laid upon them to defray that expence, and consequently that if the Senate was bountiful, it was out of other men's purses; yet all their remonstrances were to no purpose, for the people still looked upon it as a great obligation, which they thought considerably enhanced by the manner of raising the taxes; much the heavier part of them and those which were first collected being levied upon the nobility.

C H A P. LII.

The best, the safest, and least offensive way to repress the insolence of a private person, who grows too powerful in a Commonwealth, is to be beforehand with him in the means he takes to advance himself.

WE have seen in the last Chapter how wonderfully the Senate ingratiated themselves with the Plebeians, by their seeming bounty, in allowing them pay in their wars, and by their lenity in collecting the taxes: and if they had persisted in that course, they would not only have prevented all subsequent dissensions in Rome, but wholly deprived the Tribunes of their credit with the people, and consequently of all authority in the City. For indeed there is no better method, nor easier, nor less apt to excite disturbances in a Commonwealth, especially a corrupt one, when an ambitious and overgrown Citizen is to be opposed, than to anticipate him in the ways and means by which he proposes to accomplish his designs. It is certain, if this method had been followed by Cosimo de' Medici's enemies, it would have been better for them than driving him out of Florence: for had they imitated his example in caressing and cajoling the people, they might have disarmed him of those weapons which he most effectually availed himself of, without violence or disgust. Pietro Soderini acquired all the power he had in Florence rence merely by favouring the people, which gave him the general reputation of their Protector and the Champion of the public liberty: and without doubt those Citizens, who began to grow jealous of his authority, would have acted much more wisely, more honourably, and securely in forestalling him in the ways he took to aggrandize himself, than in opposing him with such vehemence as to endanger their country at the same time: for, if they had deprived him of those arms, in which his strength chiefly consisted (as they easily might have done) they would have had it in their power to over-rule and defeat his measures in all Councils and public deliberations, without any violence or the least apprehension of the people. But should any one object, that if the Citizens, who opposed Pietro, were guilty of an error, in not being beforehand with him in the methods by which he gained such a reputation amongst the people; I answer, that Pietro likewise was wanting to himself in not guarding against the means which they took to make themselves formidable to him. In this however, he was in some measure excusable, because, in the first place, it would have been exceeding difficult and dangerous; and the next, he did not think it consistent with his honour: for the method they took to depose him, was to set up the Medici against him, by whose co-operation they succeeded in their designs, and at last effected his ruin. Pietro therefore, could not in honour desert the people, whose liberties he had undertaken to defend, and go over to the Medici: nor, if he had so designed, could he have done it so secretly and suddenly, but the people would have been aware of it, which must have been of fatal consequence to him; for then they would have persecuted him as much as ever they had caressed him before: so that it would have increased the strength of his enemies, and given them a fairer opportunity of ruining him.

It is necessary therefore, in all undertakings, to consider every thing maturely beforehand, and not to take a resolution in which the danger is sure to over-balance the advantage proposed, how feasible soever it may appear in some lights: otherwise, a man may expect to meet with the same fortune that Cicero did, who, instead of ruining Marc Anthony, as he designed, still added to his reputation and greatness. For when Anthony had assembled a powerful army, consisting chiefly of the soldiers who had followed the fortune of Julius Cæsar, and was declared an enemy to his Country by the Senate, Cicero, in order to alienate the affections of his Soldiers from him, advised the Senate to put Octavius at the head of their army, and send him with the Consuls against Anthony; alledging, that the very name of Octavius Cæsar (as he was Nephew to Julius) would bring over all his unclé's friends to him, by which Anthony must be so weakened, that it would be an easy matter to suppress him. But it happened quite contrary; for Octavius being corrupted by Anthony, deserted the interests of Cicero and the Senate, and joined the enemy; by which alliance, both they and their whole party were utterly ruined. And this indeed might have easily been foreseen: so that they should by no means have listened to Cicero's advice, but have been jealous of the very name of a person, who had enslaved his Country, and made himself absolute lord over it: and not to have so fondly hoped that any of his family or followers would ever do any thing in favour of liberty.

C H A P. LIII.

That the People, deluded by a false appearance of advantage, often seek their own destruction: and that they are easily moved by magnificent hopes and promises.

AFTER the Romans had taken the City of Veii, the people became possessed with a conceit, that it would be much for the advantage of the State, if

if one half of them should go to live there; for as the country was rich and well cultivated, it would support them very well, and the City being so near Rome, it could not occasion any confusion or alteration in the government of the Commonwealth. But the Senate and wisest of the other Citizens thought this would be of so pernicious consequence, that they freely and publicly declared they would sooner die, than ever consent to it: so that when the thing came to be debated, the people were exasperated at the Senate to such a degree, that they would certainly have taken up arms, and great tumults and bloodshed must have ensued, if some of the oldest and most respectable Citizens had not interposed their authority and checked the fury of the multitude.

From hence we may observe, in the first place, that the populace are often so far deceived with a false appearance of good, as to solicit their own ruin and bring infinite dangers and difficulties upon the Commonwealth, if they are not undeceived by some person whom they reverence and confide in, and convinced by him that they are in the wrong. But when it happens that they have been formerly deceived either by persons, or in the appearance of things, and cannot repose that confidence in any one, then ruin must of necessity ensue. So true is what Dante tells us in his Canto upon Monarchy.

Strange caprice! oft the senseless multitude
Chuse death instead of life, and ill for good.

To this diffidence in the people it is sometimes owing that a Commonwealth cannot come to any good resolution, as we have observed before with regard to the Venetians, who, being attacked by many enemies at once, could not resolve to make their peace with any one of them, by restoring what they usurped;

which was the cause * of the war wherein so many powers combined against them, that they were brought almost to the brink of ruin.

If we consider therefore, to what things it is easy, and to what it is difficult to persuade the multitude, we shall find, that if the measures proposed to them appear at first sight to be either magnanimous, or like to be attended with great profit, they come into them with much eagerness, though ever so destructive at the bottom: on the other hand, if they seem pusillanimous, or such as may endanger their interest, it will be very difficult, if not impossible to make them go down, notwithstanding others may be convinced, that they will really prove salutary and advantageous in the end. The truth of this may be confirmed by numberless examples out of the Roman, and other Histories, both ancient and modern. From hence arose the bad opinion, which the people of Rome conceived of Fabius Maximus, who never could persuade them that it was the safest way to act upon the defensive against Hannibal, and to waste his forces by slow measures, without hazarding an engagement with him: for they thought it looked like cowardice, and not being able to discern the expediency of proceeding in that manner, his arguments had not the least effect upon them. Nay, so obstinately do people sometimes persist in errors of this kind, that though they gave the officer who was next in command under Fabius, authority to fight the enemy, in spite of his General, and their army would certainly have been routed, if it had not been prevented by the prudence of Fabius; yet they were so far from being convinced of their error, that they afterwards made Varro Consul upon no other account, but because he had boasted in every public place of the City, that if they would vest him with proper authority, he would soon give a good account of Hannibal and his army. What was the consequence? He fought him indeed, but suffered so total a defeat at Cannæ, that Rome was never before in such danger of utter ruin. Let me cite another instance out of the same History. Hannibal having been in Italy eight or ten years, had filled that Province with the slaughter of the Romans, when Marcus Centenius Penula (a man of very mean extraction, but of some rank in the army) presented himself one day to the Senate, and told them, that if they would give him a Commission to raise an army of volunteers, he would engage to deliver Hannibal either dead or alive into their hands very soon. Now, though the Senators looked upon this only as a piece of fool-hardiness, yet, considering, that if his request should be refused, and the people come to know of it, perhaps it might occasion ill-blood and sedition in the City, and they might be obliged to comply with his request though against their inclinations; chusing therefore rather to hazard the loss of those that were simple enough to follow him, than to run the risque of exciting fresh discords at home; as they well knew how much such a resolution would be applauded by the people, and how impossible to convince them of its absurdity. In consequence of this Commission, he marched with a disorderly and undisciplined body of men against Hannibal, whom he engaged, but failed of his promise; for he, and all the rest of them were cut to pieces. If we look into the Grecian History, we shall there find, that Nicias, one of the wisest of the Athenians, could never make that people sensible of the pernicious consequences that must proceed from their invading Sicily: so that in contempt of his opinion, and that of other prudent men, they persisted in an expedition which proved the ruin of their State. When Scipio was made Consul, he desired to have Africa for his province, and said he would undertake to demolish Carthage; but as the Senate, by the advice of Fabius Maximus, refused him that favour, he threatened to propose it to the people, well knowing how fond they were of such enterprizes. We might likewise produce several examples in our own City, as when Hercules Bentivoglio, and Antonio Giacomini, generals of the Florentine forces, had routed Bartolomeo de' Alviano, at St. Vincenzo, and went to lay siege to Pifa. This undertaking was resolved on by the people, who were in a manner fascinated by the positive assurance of success they had from Bentivoglio, though most of the wisest Citizens opposed it: but the tide ran so strong against them, and the people were so dazzled with those promises, that it was all to no purpose.

• The famous league of Cambray.

I say then, that there is no surer way to ruin a Commonwealth, in which the people have any considerable share of authority, than to propose gallant, but dangerous enterprizes to them; for where they have the greatest weight, such undertakings will always be embraced as seem to carry an air of magnanimity with them; nor will any other person who dissents from them, how wise soever he may be, have it in his power to provide a remedy.

But let it be remembered, at the same time, that if these things most commonly end in the destruction of the State, the particular promoters and conductors of them very seldom escape ruin: for, as the people make not the least doubt of success, so they never impute any miscarriage to ill fortune, or want of power in the Commander, but to treachery or ignorance; for which, he is almost certainly either put to death, banished, or imprisoned: as it happened to many of the Carthaginian and Athenian Generals. Nor are their former successes and services in the least considered upon these occasions: their present misfortune cancels the memory of all past merits; as it fell out in the case of the abovementioned Antonio Giacomini, who, not taking Pifa as he had promised*, and the people expected, fell into such disgrace with them, that, notwithstanding the many great services he had formerly done the Republic, he was suffered to live more through the lenity and gratitude of those that were in authority, than from any conviction of his innocence, or desire in the people to save him.

C H A P. LIV.

How greatly the presence of a grave man in authority contributes to appease an enraged multitude.

THE second thing observable from the passage related in the beginning of the last Chapter, is, that nothing conduces more to bridle the rage of an angry multitude, than the presence of some grave man in authority: for as Virgil says,

Tum pietate gravem ac meritis si forte virum quem
 Conspexêre, silent, arrectisque auribus adstant.

Æn. I. 154.

If then some grave and pious man appear,
 They hush their noise, and lend a list'ning ear.

DRYDEN.

Those therefore that command armies or govern cities, should always upon any mutiny or sedition, take care to present themselves (whether to their Soldiers or Citizens) in the most respectable and awful manner, clothed in all their ensigns of office and authority, to inspire the greater veneration and reverence. Not many years ago Florence was divided into two factions, called the Frateschi and Arrabiati, who at last fell together by the ears: but the former being worsted, and the mob on the other side going to plunder the house of Paolantonio Soderini, (one of the heads of the Frateschi, and a Citizen of great reputation in the Republic at that time) his brother Francisco, then Bishop of Volterra, and now a Cardinal, happening to be there and hearing the uproar, immediately put on his richest robes and Episcopal Rochet, and went out to meet the armed multitude, whom he soon appeased by gentle language and the dignity of his person: a circumstance that was much talked of, and applauded at that time. I conclude then, that there is no way so proper or necessary to compose a popular commotion, as the interposition of some person of a grave and respectable presence.—To return therefore to the subject of the last chapter, we may see from the instance there cited, how obstinately the Roman people were bent upon removing to Veii, because they had taken it into their heads that it would be greatly for their advantage, without ever considering the disadvantages that lay concealed under so specious an appearance: and that from the tumults which arose upon that occasion great mischiefs must have ensued, if the Senate had not wisely applied the authority and good offices of some grave and respectable persons to prevent them.

C H A P. LV.

How easy a matter it is to govern a State where the People are not corrupted; how hard to erect a Principality where there is an equality amongst them; and that where there is no equality, a Commonwealth cannot be established.

THOUGH we have elsewhere already discoursed at large concerning what is to be hoped or feared from corrupted States, it may not appear altogether superfluous however, to consider a resolution of the Roman Senate upon a vow made by Camillus to dedicate a tenth part of the spoils taken from the Veientes to Apollo. But this booty having fallen into the hands of the Commonalty and there being no other way of getting an exact account of it, the Senate published an edict, requiring every one to bring a tenth part of his plunder to the public Treasury. Now though this edict was soon after revoked, and another method found of shewing their gratitude to Apollo, without without disgusting the people*, yet it shews the confidence which the Senate had in their honour, and that they made no doubt of their punctually fulfilling the purport of the edict as they were commanded: on the other hand, we see that the people did not take any indirect means to evade the force of it by delivering false accounts, but openly and honestly opposed it as an illegal exaction. This and many other examples which I have produced before upon other occasions, may serve to demonstrate the probity and devotion of that people, and what confidence was reposed in them upon that account. Indeed no good at all is to be expected where these principles are not to be found, as we have sufficient experience at present in those States that are most corrupted; but above all in Italy, and even in France and Spain too, which are not without their share of corruption: and if there are not altogether so many disorders in the two last mentioned, as daily happen in Italy, it is not so much owing to the virtue of the people, who are much degenerated, as to the form of their government, which being Monarchical, keeps them united in the power of their Princes and the vigour of their laws, which are not yet totally corrupted. In Germany indeed there still remain strong traces of ancient goodness and virtue: to which it is owing that many Republics there retain their liberty, and keep up their laws and discipline in such force, that no enemy, either foreign or domestic, dares to attack them †: and that this is really matter of fact, I shall prove from an example not altogether unlike that just now mentioned relating to the Senate and people

* As it was resolved to send a golden vessel to Delphos, and there was no gold to be had in the City, the Roman Ladies did a very generous thing upon this occasion, which delivered the people out of their perplexity: for they met together, and agreed to consecrate all their Jewels to this purpose. In acknowledgment of which sacrifice, the Senate granted them the honour of funeral Orations, which the men only had been favoured with till that time.

† The great and rapid conquests which Charles V. made in this Country but a few years after, shew, either that our Author's Maxim does not always hold good; or that the Germans were become very corrupt, all on a sudden as it were.

of Rome. When these Republics have occasion for money upon the public account, the Councils or Magistrates in whom the supreme authority is lodged, lay a tax of one, and sometimes perhaps of two per cent. according as the exigency requires, upon every man's property: after which, at the time and place appointed, the people having first taken an oath that they pay their respective proportions to the full of their property, throw their money into a chest provided for that purpose by the Collectors of the taxes, who never count it, or require any other proof or voucher, but their own consciences. From hence it appears, how much virtue and regard to Religion are left among this people: for we may be assured that every man pays his due; because if they did not, the whole would not amount to the sum it used to do at the same rate; in which case the fraud would have been long ago detected and another method taken. And this degree of honour and integrity is so much the more to be admired, as it is now so rare, and to speak truth, hardly any where else to be found; which I think is chiefly owing to two causes. In the first place, they never have had much commerce with their neighbours, being seldom visited by them, and seldomer going abroad themselves; but living contented with the food and clothing which are the product of their own country, and thereby preventing all opportunities of evil conversation that might corrupt their manners: thus they have kept themselves untainted by the example of the French, the Spaniards, and Italians, three nations that are wicked enough to debauch the whole world. In the next place those Commonwealths that have kept themselves free and uncorrupt, will not suffer any of their Subjects to live like gentlemen; on the contrary they always maintain as much equality amongst them as they can: and in Germany they hold such persons in so great abhorrence, that if by chance any of them fall under their lash, they certainly put them to death as the authors of all corruption and disorder. By Gentlemen, I mean such as live in idleness and luxury upon the income of their estates, without any profession or employment; a sort of Subjects that are very pernicious in every Republic and Province: though indeed those are still more so that are called Lords, and have Castles and Jurisdictions and Vassals of their own. With these two sorts of men the Kingdom of Naples, the territories of Rome, Romagna, and Lombardy abound: from whence it comes to pass that there is no such thing as a free State in all those Provinces, because the Nobility are mortal enemies to that kind of Government, and indeed to all civil liberty; and therefore to attempt the establishment of a free Republic in such countries would be a fruitless labour. But if any one had it in his power to new model the Government of those Countries, he must of necessity reduce them into Monarchies; for where the whole mass is so corrupted that laws are not a sufficient remedy, recourse must be had to forcible measures and regal authority, to controul the ambition and correct the licentiousness of the Nobility, with a high hand and arbitrary power. The necessity of proceeding in this manner is obvious from the example of Tuscany, where three Commonwealths, Florence, Siena, and Lucca, have subsisted a long time, though that Country is not a large one: and notwithstanding the rest of the Cities in that Province are dependent upon them, yet from their spirit and manner of government, it plainly appears that they are in some measure free, and would be so entirely if they could: the Reason of which is, that there are but very few Gentlemen there, and no Lords, with such jurisdiction as I have beforementioned: but such an equality amongst the inhabitants, that an able man who was well acquainted with the political government of ancient Republics, might easily establish a free Commonwealth there: yet so great has been their misfortune hitherto, that they never have had any person that either could, or knew how to go about so laudable an undertaking.

From what has been said we may draw this conclusion, that whosoever shall endeavour to found a Commonwealth where there are many Nobles and Gentlemen, will never effect his purpose, except he can first root them all out : on the other hand, whoever would establish a Kingdom or Principality where there is nearly an equality amongst the people, will not be able to succeed in that attempt, unless he ennobles several of the most ambitious and turbulent disposition amongst them; and that too not only in title but in fact, by giving them Castles and other possessions, by heaping favours and riches upon them, by exalting them to honour and preferments, and by granting them power and jurisdiction* ; that so while they maintain the authority of the Prince, and he supports them in their ambition, the rest of the people must be obliged to wear a yoke, which nothing but downright force and necessity could ever make them submit to : and thus when the power of the Prince over-balance the strength of the people, things may be kept in good order, and every man within his proper bounds. But since no body but a man of great authority, and rare abilities, can constitute a Monarchy in a Country that is naturally disposed to a Republican form of Government, or erect a Republic in one that is calculated for a monarchy, many have attempted both, but few have succeeded in either ; the greatness of the undertaking dismay some, and the difficulty embarrassing others in such a manner, that most of them have failed in their first endeavours. The example of Venice may seem perhaps to refute my position, that a Commonwealth cannot be formed where Gentlemen abound ; because none but such as are Noble Venetians (or Gentlemen, which is the same) can be admitted into any office, or share in the administration of that State. But this instance does not in the least invalidate my assertion: for the Venetian Nobles are rather so in name than in fact; as they have no great possessions in land or estates, their riches chiefly consisting in moveable goods and merchandize. Besides, none of them have any Signiories or jurisdiction over others: so that a Gentleman amongst them is nothing more than a title of honour and pre-eminence, not founded upon any of those circumstances which make them so considerable in other places. And though in other Commonwealths the Citizens are distinguished into several orders, yet at Venice they are divided into two only, the Nobility and the Commonalty; the former either actually enjoying or being qualified to enjoy all employments and posts of honour, whilst the latter are totally excluded from them*; which occasions no disturbance in the State for reasons that have been elsewhere already assigned. Let him therefore who would establish a government, form a Republic, if there either is, or he can make, an equality amongst the inhabitants of the Country: on the contrary, if there is a great and manifest inequality, let him erect a Monarchy; otherwise his Government will not be duly poised, and consequently of short duration.

* This is practised by the Kings of Spain in their Sicilian and Neapolitan dominions, where there are few Villages that are not erected into Principalities, Duchies, or Marquisates ; those nations being wonderfully fond of great titles. This policy serves two ends in countries that are subject to revolutions. In the first place, it ruins the Nobility by making them spend their fortunes to support such titles in a sumptuous manner : and in the next, it secures the people who are thereby made slaves and enemies to the Nobility. So that they can never join to deliver their country from Tyranny ; for if one side should endeavour to introduce a new Government, the other would be sure to oppose it.

* There are several Employments in that Republic at present, however, peculiarly appropriated to the Cittadini or common Citizens, and to which the Nobles are never admitted; as the Chancellorship, the Offices of Secretary of State and Embassies, the function of Residents, &c. But properly speaking, these Nobles and Citizens are all Merchants, some of whom have a share in the administration, and others none at all: the first abusing the power which they have over their dependents, from whom they exact great submission, and are stiled their Excellencies, as if they were Princes.

C H A P. LVI.

Before any great misfortune befalls a State, it is generally either prognosticated by some Portent, or foretold by some Person or other.

WE see from many instances, both in ancient and modern History, that before any great misfortune happens to a State, it is commonly foretold either by soothsayers, or revelation, or signs in the heavens, or some other prodigy. How this comes to pass I know not: but not to go far for a proof, every one knows that friar Girolamo Savonarola foretold the return of King Charles VIII. of France into Italy before it happened*; and that, besides this prediction, it was reported all over Tuscany, that armed men were seen fighting in the air over the town of Arezzo, and the clashing of their arms heard by the people there†. It is likewise generally known, that

* See what is said of this Prophet in chap. vi. of the Prince; chap. xi. and xlv. book I. of the Political Discourses. Savonarola foretold the return of that Prince into Italy indeed, but it did not happen; as Mr. Bayle has proved at large in his Notes upon the word Savonarola, in his Dictionary: where likewise the Reader will find sufficient argument to convince him, that notwithstanding the extraordinary austerity of his life, the fervour and eloquence of his Sermons, and his pretension to Divine Revelations, he was certainly an impostor, a false Prophet, and influenced by worldly considerations, to act the part he did. The whole, though very curious, is much too long to be inserted here. See likewise General Dictionary, vol. ix. p. 83, & seq.

† It grieves one to find such stories as these, scattered in great abundance, not only through the works of Pagan Authors, but even through those of the greatest and best of the Jewish and Christian Historians.—To give but two or three instances. The writer of the History of the Maccabees, book II. chap. v. says, “About the same time Antiochus prepared for his second voyage into Egypt. And then it happened, that through all the City, for the space of almost forty days, there were seen Horsemen running in the air in cloth of gold, and armed with lances, like a band of Soldiers: and troops of horsemen in array, encountering and running against one another, with shaking of shields, and multitudes of pikes, and drawing of swords, and casting of darts, and glittering of golden ornaments, and harness of all sorts. Wherefore, every man prayed that Apparition might turn to good.” Thus likewise, d’Avila tells us, in the tenth Book of his History of the Civil Wars of France, “That there was a Prophecy

current, not only in the camp, but through the whole Kingdom, that Henry III. should be killed by a Friar." See vol. II. p. 52. of the last Translation. And in the eleventh book he says, " That before the battle of Yvry, a heavy storm of rain falling from the Heavens, with dreadful thunder and lightning, threw the whole army into a terrible panic: not only because retreats have an ill aspect to those that are not acquainted with the secret motives of their Commanders, but on account of the fame that was spread abroad of the prodigious strength of the enemy's forces, and because both fortune and the weather seemed to conspire against their own army, which was almost half drowned, and marched as if it was flying under favour of the night, though close drawn up, and in good order. The terror of the rower men was increased by a frightful Phenomenon, which, as the rain ceased, appeared in the middle of the sky: for there were seen two large armies of a blood-red colour, which visibly rushed together in the air, amidst horrible claps of thunder, and soon after disappeared, leaving the event uncertain, and were covered again with exceeding thick and dark clouds. This spectacle, though diversely interpreted by many, seemed most probably, as they thought, to portend the ruin and destruction of their army, which being inferior in strength, and entirely destitute of any other assistance than their own forces, retired, as if it was already conquered, whilst the Enemy kept advancing; and the rather, because these were the very places where the king's predecessors and his faction of the Hugonots lost the first battle against the Duke of Guise, in the late Civil wars, and in which, the prince of Condé was both wounded and taken prisoner amidst a terrible slaughter of his men." p. 116, 117.

The story of the Apparition of St. James of Compostella mounted upon a white Horse, and fighting like a Dragon for the Spaniards, against the Moors, might likewise here be recited out of the Spanish Historians, and a thousand more out of our own, if such trash was worth transcribing — Montaigne, however, seems to approve of these things; for speaking of Tacitus, book III. chap. viii. he says, " A man may think him bold in his stories, as where he says, that a soldier carrying a burden of wood had his hands so frozen to it, that they were severed from his arms. Annal. XIII. cap. xxxv. I always submit to so great authorities in such things. In what he says also of Vespasian, Hist. lib. IV. cap. lxxxii. that by the favour of the God Serapis, he cured a blind woman by anointing her eyes with his spittle, and I know not what other miracles, he follows the example and duty of all good Historians, who keep Registers of such events as are of importance. Amongst public accidents are also common rumours and opinions; for it is their part to relate the things commonly believed, not to regulate them: that is the province of Divines and Philosophers, who are the guides of men's consciences. Quintus Curtius therefore, wisely says, lib. IX. cap. i. " Equidem plura transcribo quam credo: nam nec affirmare sustineo de quibus dubito, nec subducere quæ accepi, i. e. Indeed I relate more things than I believe, for as I will not take upon me to affirm things whereof I doubt, so I cannot smother what I have heard." We might likewise quote the authority of Livy in this respect, lib. I. in the preface, and lib. VIII. cap. vi. " Hæc neque affirmare neque refellere operæ pretium est famæ rerum rence, were beat down by lightning *; that before the disgrace and banishment of Pietro Soderini (who had been appointed Gonfalonier for life by the Florentines) the Palace was demolished in the same manner. Many other examples of this kind might be produced; but for the sake of brevity, I shall mention only one more, and that out of Livy, who tells us, that one Marcus Cædicius, a Plebeian, reported to the Senate, that as he was passing along the Via Nova at midnight, he heard a voice, much louder than that of any man, which commanded him to go and tell the Magistrates, that the Gauls were upon their march to Rome †. The cause of these things, I think, is not unworthy of discussion by such as are better versed in the knowledge of natural and supernatural matters than I pretend to be. Perhaps, (as some Philosophers are of opinion) the air may be full of intelligent Beings, which foreseeing future events and compassionating mankind, give them timely warning by these notices, to provide against the calamities that are to befall them ‡. However that may be, no-

standum est, i. e. It is not worth while either to affirm, or to refute these matters; we must stand to report." And as Tacitus wrote in a century, when the belief of Prodigies began to decline, he says, he should not omit giving a place to things, however, received by so many worthy men, and with so great reverence to Antiquity. This was well said: let them deliver History to us, more as they receive, than as they believe it.—If such Historians are to be commended, certainly our good Sir Richard Baker, and some others, of more recent dates, deserve the highest applause.

† See lib. V. cap. xxxii.

‡ The Philosophers here meant, are probably the Cabbalists, or Rosicrucians, who suppose there are elementary Beings called Sylphs, Gnomes, Salamanders, &c. and that this Science introduces people into the sanctuary of nature. They pretend that the Hebrews knew these aerial substances; that they borrowed their Cabbalistic knowledge from the Egyptians; and that they have not yet forgot the art of conversing with the inhabitants of the air. The Abbé de Villars pleasantly exposes the ridiculous secrets of these Rosicrucians in his Compte de Gabalis. It is certain, however, that the notion of good and bad Angels, Genii, Dæmons, Intelligences, Spirits, or by what other name any one has a mind to call them, was spread all over the East long before the promulgation of Christianity, both the Jews and Heathens believing that, not only every nation, but every particular person, had one of each sort of these Beings, that was continually endeavouring to do him either good or harm, according to the degree of thing is more certain than that such prefages have been observed. and that some great and heavy misfortune has always attended them.

their respective powers; as might be shewn at large from a thousand passages both in sacred and profane history. Every one remembers the Dæmons of Socrates, Plotinus, Brutus, &c. Indeed all the Christian Churches countenance it: in the Liturgy of our own we pray, "That God, who has ordained and constituted the services of Angels and men in a wonderful order, would mercifully grant, that as his holy Angels always do him service in Heaven; so, by his appointment, they may succour and defend us on earth, &c." The Calvinists admit of it; and the Romish Church makes it a practical Doctrine. "No system is better adapted, says a great Modern, to bring the Doctrine of the Platonists (duly rectified) into repute, than the Doctrine of occasional causes. I know not what may happen, but it is my opinion, that mankind will be forced, one time or other, to abandon mechanical Principles, unless they associate to them the wills of intelligent Beings or Spirits: and to say the truth, no Hypothesis is better fitted to account for events, than that which admits of such an association; I mean such events especially as go by the name of casualty, fortune, good luck, ill luck, dreams, &c. the causes of which are certainly regulated and determined by general laws, that are unknown to us; but which are probably only occasional causes, like those that make our souls act upon our bodies." Some have taught that the whole world is filled and animated by Genii; others have compared the nature of these Intelligences with triangles. For, according to them, the Divine nature is like that of an equilateral triangle; that of Dæmons to a triangle, two sides of which are equal, and the other unequal; whilst that of man is like one, all sides of which are uneven. —But as the field is large, those that are desirous of making further discursions into it are referred to the learned Dr. Dodwell's Dissertation on the Genius or Fortune of the Emperors. "Milton, (says Mr. Addison) has finely described this mixed communion of men and Spirits in the earthly Paradise; and had doubtless his eye upon a verse in old Hesiod, which is almost word for word the same with his third line, in the following passage."

——— Nor think though men were none,
That Heav'n wou'd want Spectators, God want praise:
Millions of spiritual creatures walk the Earth
Unseen, both when we wake and when we sleep.
All these with ceaseless praise his works behold
Both day and night. How often from the steep
Of echoing hill or thicket, have we heard Celestial voices to the midnight air,
Sole, or responsive to each other's note,
Singing their great Creator? Oft in bands
Whilst they keep watch, or nightly rounding walls,
With heav'nly touch of instrumental sounds
In full harmonic number join'd, their Songs

C H A P. LVII.

The Multitude united is strong and formidable; but separated, it is weak and contemptible.

MANY of the Romans, after their country had been plundered and laid waste by the Gauls, left Rome, and went to live at Veii, contrary to the express injunctions of the Senate. Upon which, another Edict was published, to remedy this disorder, commanding every one, upon very severe penalties to return to his former habitation before a certain time: and though every body made a joke of this Edict at first; yet, when the day appointed drew near, they all thought fit to obey it; for as Livy says, “ Ex fecrocibus universis, singuli, metu suo, obedientes fuere: though they were so stubborn and contumacious all together; yet singly, every man began to be afraid of himself, and that made them all at last become tractable and obedient”. And certainly nothing can give us a more just idea of the populace in such cases than this instance: for they are always refractory and bold at first, and speak freely against the decrees of their Sovereign; but when they see the rod shaken over their backs, they begin to distrust each other, and every one takes care of himself.

From hence it appears, how little account is to be made of what the multitude says, either for or against the government of their Prince; provided he is in a condition to keep them in a good humour, when they are so, and to prevent them from doing him any hurt when they are in a bad one. By a bad humour, I mean such as proceeds from any common occurrence, and must except that regret which is owing either to the loss of their liberties, or of some Prince that was much beloved by them, and is still living; for, upon such occasions, their resentment is always very sharp, and cannot be kept under without rigorous measures. But as to disgusts which arise from other causes, they are easily dissipated; especially when they have no body to head them: for as there is nothing so terrible as their fury in one case, so nothing is more weak and contemptible in the other; because, though they may have arms in their hands, they are presently reduced, if one can stand their first shock: since when their ardour begins to cool, they must naturally be sensible they are doing wrong; and therefore, every man beginning to be afraid for himself, will endeavour to provide for his own safety, either by flight, or making his peace some other way. When the populace therefore are once in motion, it is their best way, in order to secure themselves, to chuse some leader, who may not only regulate their proceedings, but keep them firm together, and take proper measures for their security; as the Roman people did when they left the city upon the death of Virginia, and appointed twenty Tribunes to protect them: otherwise it will always happen, as Livy observes, that when they are united, they will be strong and resolute; but when divided, and every man thinks only for himself, they will become feeble and abject.

C H A P. LVIII.

That the multitude are wiser and more constant in general than a Prince.

LIVY, and all other Historians agree, that nothing is more changeable than the multitude: they often condemn a man to death, and afterwards bitterly lament the loss of him; as it happened in the case of Manlius Capitolinus, whom the Roman people first sentenced to die, and then bewailed his death: "populum brevi," says Livy, "Posteaquam ab eo periculum nullum erat, desiderium ejus tenuit; after the people were out of all danger from him, they

“ they heartily wished him alive again*.” And in another place, where he is speaking of what happened at Syracuse, after the death of Hieronymus, nephew to Hiero, he says, “ Hæc natura multitudinis est, aut humiliter servit, aut superbè dominatur; “ such is the nature of the multitude, they either serve vileyly obey, or insolently domineer.”

I know not therefore, whether in endeavouring to defend a notion that is exploded by all other authors, I may not have taken a task in hand, which I shall either be obliged to abandon with disgrace, or find very difficult to acquit myself of with reputation; but however that may be, I think, and always shall think, there can be no harm in maintaining an opinion by arguments and reasoning alone, where no violence is offered to enforce it. I say then, in regard to the fault with which writers in general reproach the multitude, that particular men, and Princes especially, are as liable, or more so perhaps, to be accused of it: for every one that does not regulate his conduct by laws, will behave himself as ill as a multitude that has broke loose from all restraint. This may plainly appear, if we consider how few good and wise Princes there are, or ever have been in the world; I mean such Princes as have had it in their power to violate the laws, and break down the barriers that were opposed to their licentiousness or ambition †. Amongst such indeed, we may number the Kings of Egypt, who reigned in the most early times, when that country was governed

* Thus likewise the same Historian says, in the case of Appius Claudius (not the Decemvir) lib. II. cap. lxii. “ Haud ita multum interim temporis fuit: ante tamen quam predicta dies veniret, morbo moritur: cujus laudationem cum Tribuni plebis impedire conarentur, plebs fraudari solenni honore supremum diem tanti viri noluit: & laudationem tam æquis auribus mortui audivit, quam viva ccusationem audierat, & exequias frequens celebravit.”

† Dioclesian used to say, “ That nothing was more difficult than than to govern well;” and he perfectly knew the reasons of that difficulty. They are recited by Vopiscus, an author who remarks, that in the great number of Roman Emperors, there were reckoned but very few good Princes, and commends the expression of a Jester, who used to say, “ That all the good Princes might be painted in a ring.” Vopisc. cap. xlv.

by laws; to whom we might add those of Sparta, and in our own age those of France also, which Kingdom is ruled with more lenity and veneration for the laws, than any other that we know of at present *. But Princes that live in such governments as these and are restrained by laws, are not to be compared with a dissolute and unbridled rabble, or ranked amongst those whose natural disposition we are to examine in common with that of other men, to see whether it resembles the disposition of the united body of the people; because, in that case, we ought likewise, on the other hand, to compare them with those common people who are under the same restrictions as themselves, and then we shall find full as much goodness in one as the other, and that the populace are neither apt to be too insolent when in power, nor too abject in subjection; but like the Roman people, who whilst the Republic continued incorrupt, shewed no signs either of one or the other, but kept up their proper dignity with honour, and lived like free men, in due obedience to the laws and authority of their Magistrates. If it became necessary indeed, at any time, to make a stand against some designing and over-powerful Citizen, they did it effectually; as in the case of Manlius Capitolinus, the Decemviri, and several others, who were taking measures to oppress and enslave them. On the contrary, when the interest of the public required it, they were no less obedient to their Consuls and Dictators, than they had been stubborn and inflexible in maintaining their rights and liberties at other times. Nor was their regret for the death of Manlius at all to be wondered at, since it was the memory of his virtues that occasioned it, which were such as made every one lament the loss of him, and might have made a Prince behave as they did, in the same circumstances; for nobody can deny that it is natural for all men to praise and admire virtue, even in their enemies; and it is my opinion, that if Manlius could have been raised from the dead, in the midst of their lamentations for him, the people would have passed the very same sentence upon him again. In like manner we read of several Princes, and such as have been accounted wise ones too, that have put people to death whom they heartily wished alive again; as Alexander did in the case of Clitus and others of his friends, and Herod with regard to Mariamne. But what Livy says concerning the nature of the multitude, is not meant of such a one as is restrained by a regard to Laws, like the Roman people; but of a seditious unbridled rabble, like that of Syracuse, which have broke their reins, and behave like madmen; committing a thousand irregularities and extravagancies, like Alexander and Herod in the instances just now cited.

The multitude therefore is no more to be accused of fury and inconstancy than a Prince: for they are both subject to caprice and enormities when they are above the Laws, and can transgress with impunity: of which several examples might be produced (besides those already quoted) from amongst the Roman Emperors and other Princes and Tyrants, who were guilty of as much levity and inconsistency in their conduct as ever any multitude was. I must beg leave then to differ from the common opinion, that the people when masters are more light, changeable, and ungrateful than particular Princes: indeed if any one says they are both so, he will be pretty near the mark; but if he declares in favour of the latter, he is very much mistaken. For the people that have the authority wholly in their own hands, and conduct themselves according to the Laws, will act with as much, or perhaps more steadiness, prudence, and gratitude than any Prince, be he accounted ever so wise: on the contrary, a Prince that has got above the power of the Laws, will be more fickle, imprudent, and ungrateful than any multitude whatsoever; which does not proceed so much from any diversity in their natures, (for they are pretty much the same; or if there be any superiority in this case, it is on the side of the people) as from the difference of the veneration which they respectively have for the laws of their country. If we examine the conduct of the Roman people, we shall find that for the space of four hundred years they hated the very name of King, as much as they were fond of glory, and studious for the good of the Commonwealth, which plainly appears from numberless instances. But if any one should object that they were shamefully ungrateful to Scipio, a former discourse, wherein I have proved at large that the people are not so ungrateful as Princes, may serve for a sufficient answer *. As to prudence, stability, and judgment, I maintain that they far exceed Princes in those qualifications: and there is much reason in that saying, “Vox populi vox Dei: the voice of the people is the voice of God:” for it is certain that the united body of the people seldom err in their prognostications; so that it seems as if they foresaw the good or evil that was to befall them by some secret instinct or inspiration. In judging of doubtful matters they are very rarely mistaken: when two Orators for instance, equally eminent in their profession, have harangued them upon different sides of a question, they hardly ever fail to incline to what is most rational; which shews that they are capable both of discovering truth and embracing it: and if they sometimes err in their judgment concerning such actions as appear either magnanimous, or highly for their advantage, (which we have allowed before) † are not Princes oftener misled by a variety of passions, to which they are much more subject, and greater slaves than the people? In the election of Magistrates they make a more judicious choice than Princes; for it is a very difficult matter to persuade them to advance a man of corrupt morals or infamous character; which yet is an easy and common thing with Princes. If they take a disgust to any thing they retain it for ages; but Princes soon change their opinions: of both which things, I will give an instance in the Roman people, who during the course of so many hundred years, and in the choice of so many Consuls and Tribunes, did not make above four elections of which they had any cause to repent; and held the name of King in such detestation, as I have observed before, that no Citizen, how much soever they were obliged to him, ever affected that name or power, who did not feel the weight of their resentment. It is evident likewise that those States where the people have had the chief authority, have always extended their dominion further, and in a shorter time, than ever they were able to do under the government of any Prince; as the Romans did after the expulsion of Kings, and the Athenians when they had shook off the yoke of Pisistratus: for which no other reason can be assigned, than that a popular Government is better than a Regal one. Nor can the passages quoted out of Livy at the beginning of this chapter, or elsewhere, in any wise serve to invalidate this assertion: for when all the good and ill qualities are duly stated betwixt a Prince and a popular Government, it will plainly appear that the balance will be greatly in favour of the latter, especially in point of probity and true glory *. But if a Prince seems to

* “ I know some men of parts, says Mr. Bayle, who are surpris'd, that in Kingdoms where the Prince's authority is unlimited, the instructors of youth are allowed to read the books of the ancient Greeks and Romans to them, in which we find so many examples of the love of liberty, and so many antimonarchical Maxims.” But this is not more surpris'ing than to see Republican States permit their Law-Professors to explain the Code and Digest, in which there are so many principles which suppose the Supreme and inviolable authority of the Emperor. Here we see two things which seem equally surpris'ing, but in reality ought not to surpris'e any body: for omitting several reasons which might be urged, may we not say, that the same books which contain the poison with regard either to Monarchs or Republics, contain likewise the Antidote? If we see on one hand the great Maxims of liberty, and the noble examples of courage, with which it has been maintained or recovered; we see on the other, factions, seditions, and tumultuous humours, which disturb'd, and at last ruin'd that infinite number of little States, which shew'd themselves such zealous enemies to tyranny in ancient Greece. Does not this picture seem to be a lesson very capable of disabusing those that are terrified have the advantage in enacting good laws, and establishing new Statutes and institutions for the benefit

at Monarchy? Mr. Hobbes thought so; for he published a Translation of Thucydides with this view. Turn the tables, and you will find that this picture will be very proper to give an instruction different from the former, and to strengthen the horror against Monarchy: for whence came it (some one may say) that the Greeks and Romans chose rather to be exposed to these confusions than to live under a Monarchy? Did not this arise from the hard condition to which Tyrants had reduced them? And must not an evil be very grievous, insufferable, and deplorable, when people chuse to deliver themselves from it at so dear a rate? It is certain that the description which History has left us of the conduct of several Monarchs gives us horror, and makes our hair stand of an end. It is to no purpose to object, that, generally speaking, more disorders have been occasioned by the conspiracies which have put an end to Tyranny, than there would have been by suffering it; or to urge what happened upon the death of Hiero the Syracusan. The people of Syracuse, who had enjoyed great happiness under the long reign of that Prince, immediately lost their patience under his Successor, who governed in a tyrannical manner, and not only killed him in the very beginning of the second year of his reign, but soon after put two of Hiero's daughters, and three of his grand-daughters, to death also. Of these five Princesses, there were three against whom no complaint had been made, and who had fled as it were to the foot of the altar. Was not this removing one Tyranny to establish a greater, "ut tyrannos ulciscendo, quæ odissent scelera ipsi imitarentur," as Heraclea, one of Hiero's daughters, represented to her murderers? Was Livy in the wrong to remark upon this occasion, "that the people are incapable of keeping within due bounds, and that they are humble even to baseness when they obey, but insolent to the last degree when they command?" The massacre of these five Princesses was not the rash action of some private persons only: it was commanded by the Senate and people of Syracuse, and this too whilst the memory of Hiero was still fresh amongst them, a Prince whom they had loved so tenderly and justly. But the injustice of their barbarous decree was so manifest, that they immediately perceived it and revoked it; which signified nothing, for it was already executed. The factions however were not extinguished by the entire extirpation of that family; they increased daily, and in a short time overturned the liberty of the country; for they exposed Syracuse to the Romans, who besieged and conquered it. Silius Italicus finely describes the confusion into which that City fell after the Tyrant Hieronymus and his relations were killed.

of civil society; the other without doubt have so much the superiority in maintaining and improving what is already established, that they deserve more glory than the founder.

To cut this matter short, I say that if some Principalities have subsisted for a long course of years, there are instances of Republics of no less antiquity, and that both have owed the length of their duration to the observation of their laws: for a Prince that follows no other rule but the dictates of his own will, if he has it in his power so to do, is unwise and counteracts himself; and a people that proceed in the same manner deserve no better title*. Since the comparison therefore is betwixt a Prince that is restrained by laws, and a people in the same circumstances, I am convinced there will be no more virtue found in the latter than in the former: but if we are to compare them as equally free from all ties and restrictions of that kind, and perfectly at their own liberty, we shall still find fewer and less pernicious errors in the people than in the Prince, and those too much easier to be remedied. For a licentious and tumultuous

A man may represent this as long as he pleases, he will not convince those that are prejudiced against Monarchy: they will answer him, that from the very consideration, that the disorders of it cannot be remedied but by such shocking miseries, he ought to conclude that it is a very great evil.

* The following reflection made by Oernhielm, in his Life of Pontus de la Gardie, a Swedish General, is a very good one, viz. that a Prince who hearkens only to his passions without regarding what is due to God, his subjects, and the laws of his country, deprives himself of the most necessary supports of his power; for he cannot expect to find that fidelity in his subjects, which is sufficient to oppose an enemy that shall attack him. This he exemplifies in the case of Eric, King of Sweden, "Prævenit adventum ducum fama collecti in regem exercitus: ad quam exitus, implorat open civium, quorum plerique per-tæsi acerbi regiminis, surdas obvertunt aures precanti, hilares advenisse tempus quo jugi indies ingravescentis leventur onere, antequam succumbant penitus interituri. Itaque subnixus ope paucorum in quorum animis nondum obsoleverat majestas sui principis, congressusque cum pluribus ac fortioribus, non poterat non redigi ad angustias. Atque tum præferoci regi adparuit, & favore civium & successu fulciendæ potentia destituti potentes rerum, cum exutâ reverentiâ numinis & legum, exemplâ potestate usurpant nil præter trucem quidvis in sub-jectos agendi licentiam. Id Erico regi accidit, quem folio sublimem vidit, sol oriens, eundem occidens vidit provolutum ad aliena genua "

people are soon appeas'd and reduced to right reason by the interposition of some grave and respectable person * : but who can plead against a Tyrannical Prince, or what redress is there but the sword ? From hence we may easily come to a determination betwixt them, and conclude that evils and disorders which require the sharpest remedies, are certainly more dangerous than those that may be cured by gentle means. Besides, when the people are in a ferment, and have thrown off all restraint, there is not so much to be immediately apprehended from any present mischief they are likely to commit, as from what may afterwards ensue ; for such a State of confusion may chance to end in tyranny : but with regard to a Prince the case is quite different ; because the present evils are most grievous, and it is hoped that his enormities will at last make him so odious, that the people will shake off his yoke and resume their liberties. We see the difference then ; in one case the calamity is actually present, and in the other there is only a probability at most of its happening : the severity of the people extends only to such as they think are conspiring against the public good ; whilst that of a Prince is chiefly exerted upon those that he imagines may injure his particular interests. But the tide of prejudice I know runs high against the people : because every body is at liberty to speak ill with impunity of them, even when they have the government in their hands ; but against a Prince no man dares to open his mouth without much caution and reserve. Now since the subject seems naturally to lead me to it, it may not be amiss perhaps to say something in the next chapter concerning leagues and confederacies made with Princes or Commonwealths ; and to consider which of them are most to be depended upon.

* See Chap. liv. of this Book,

C H A P. LIX.

Whether an Alliance made with a Prince or a Commonwealth is most to be confided in.

SINCE it daily happens that Treaties and Alliances are made either betwixt two Princes, or two Commonwealths, or betwixt a Commonwealth and a Prince, it seems necessary to examine whether the fidelity of a Prince or a Commonwealth be the more stable, and to consider which of them is most to be relied on; and upon enquiry it appears that in most cases they are much alike, though they differ in some. I am persuaded however, that when either a Prince or a Commonwealth is forced to enter into a treaty by downright necessity, neither of them will observe the conditions of it; especially if their State should be endangered by it; for in such a case, both one and the other would presently break it, how kindly soever they may have been used. Demetrius, surnamed Poliorcetes, had shewn the Athenians many great favours: but happening to be defeated by his enemies, and flying to Athens for refuge, as a people that were his allies, and under considerable obligations to him, he was refused shelter there; a circumstance that mortified him much more than the loss of his army *. After Pompey was routed by Cæsar at Pharsalia, he fled into Egypt to Ptolemy, in hopes of finding pro-

* Though he had shewn them many great favours, yet he had been guilty of such oppression that they could never forget it. Among other instances which might be quoted, he exacted two hundred and fifty talents of them at one time, which he said was for pin-money for his concubine Lamia, a saying that galled them more than the loss of their money: after which he upbraided them with their meanness, and told them there was not so much as one man amongst them that had the least spark of courage: like the taunt of Tiberius to the Roman Senate mentioned by Tacitus, Annal. lib. III. cap. lxxv. "Memoriæ proditur Tiberium quoties curiâ egrederetur Græcis verbis in hunc modum eloqui solitum, O homines ad Servitutem paratos! Scilicet etiam illum, qui libertatem publicam nollet, tam projectæ Servitientium patientiæ tædebat."

fection there, as he had formerly restored that Prince to his Kingdom: but Ptolemy, instead of protecting him, basely caused him to be murdered. In both these cases the ingratitude was owing to the same cause; yet the humanity of a Commonwealth we see was greater than that of a Prince *. But whensoever either one or the other is afraid of suffering any great damage, they will both act in the same manner.

It must be observed likewise, that if any Prince or Commonwealth should so punctually adhere to their engagements as to run the risque of being ruined by it, their motives for so doing may proceed from the same causes: for as to a Prince, it may probably happen that he is confederated with some other great Potentate, who though he cannot protect him at that time, may (as the other is persuaded) be able to restore him to his dominions afterwards, if he should chance to lose them; or if he has always firmly supported his interests, he may either think an accommodation with the enemy impossible, or that he cannot depend upon his word: which was the case of all the Neapolitan Princes who took part with the French when they invaded the Kingdom of Naples. And as to Republics, it was exactly the same with Saguntum, which was ruined by continuing firm to its alliance with the Romans; and with Florence in the year 1512, when it sided with the French.

All things being duly considered however, I am of opinion, that where the danger is imminent, it is bet-

* A certain modern says, "that Kings do not look upon any one as naturally either their friend or their enemy; but that their private interest is the only consideration by which they judge with whom they are to enter into an alliance. None but the ignorant would rely on the friendship of Sovereigns, even towards one another. To see the presents which they exchange, and the intercourse of respectful letters betwixt them in time of peace, would make one believe they are the most sincere friends, and will love each other as long they live; but it is very often true that they are at the same time negotiating a treaty in order to a rupture, and intend to serve one another no longer, than till they have an opportunity of commencing hostilities with advantage."

ter to trust to a Republic than a Prince: for though they should both be disposed to act in the same manner, yet the former being slow in its motions, will be longer than a Prince before it comes to any resolution, and consequently before it determines to violate its engagements. Treaties are generally broken for the sake of some advantage: and in this respect, Republics always behave with much more honour than Princes; for we might produce many examples, where a very small matter of gain has tempted a Prince to forfeit his honour, when a prospect of the greatest advantage could not corrupt a Commonwealth. Themistocles, in an harangue to the Athenians, said he had something to propose, which would be of infinite advantage to their country; but that he durst not make it public to every one, because that would prevent its being put into execution. Upon this, the Athenians deputed Aristides to hear his proposals, and to take such resolutions upon them as he should think most proper. Themistocles therefore represented to him in private, that the whole Navy of Greece lay in a place (though indeed under the protection of their good faith) where they might easily either take or destroy every Ship, which would make them absolute masters of all the other States in Greece. But when Aristides came to make his report to the people, he told them that Themistocles had imparted something to him which indeed would be of exceeding great advantage, but highly dishonourable to the Commonwealth; upon which account it was unanimously rejected, without any further enquiry into the nature of it. Now Philip of Macedon and many other Princes, who were governed by self-interest in every thing, would not have been so scrupulous and delicate upon such an occasion; especially Philip, who gained more by violating his faith than any other method whatsoever. As to breaking a treaty, by not punctually observing every article of it, it is so common a thing, that I shall say nothing of it here: I speak only of outrageous and extravagant infractions; of which,

I am

I am of opinion, a Republic will always be more tender than a Prince, and consequently is more to be confided in.

C H A P. LX.

That the Consulship and all other Dignities in Rome were conferred without respect of age.

IT appears from the History of the Roman Commonwealth, that after the Plebeians obtained the Honour of the Consulship, they admitted any Citizen to it without the least respect either of age or extraction: indeed the Romans at no time ever regarded age, but constantly preferred men of merit and virtue whether they were old or young; as is manifest from the instance of Valerius Corvinus, who was made Consul when he was but twenty-three years of age; which gave him occasion to say (a little ostentatiously indeed) in one of his harangues to his Soldiers, that the Consulship was “præmium virtutis, non sanguinis; the “reward of virtue, not a privilege of high birth.” Now whether they acted wisely in this, or not, would bear some debate. As to Nobility of blood, they were under a necessity indeed of dispensing with that; and the same necessity that operated at Rome, must likewise have its weight in any other State that aspires to the grandeur which Rome attained to, as we have elsewhere observed: for men will not expose themselves to all manner of hardships and perils without some hope of reward: nor can they be deprived of the hope of ever obtaining that reward, without manifest danger. It soon became expedient therefore to inspire the Plebeians with the hope of being admitted to the Consulship; with which they were amused a considerable time without obtaining that honour: but afterwards being resolved to live upon expectation no longer, it was found necessary to admit them to it. A State however that has no occasion to employ the Plebeians in any great and glorious undertaking, may treat them in another manner if it pleases, as I said before; but if it affects to emulate the Romans, it must make no distinction amongst its subjects. So much for this part of the question.

As to the matter of age, it seems clear that it is absolutely necessary to make no difference in this point: for in advancing a young man to some dignity which requires the prudence of maturer age, we may be assured (if the power of electing is in the people) they will never prefer any one that has not highly merited it by his virtue and extraordinary services: and if a young man has distinguished himself in that manner, it would not only be very ungrateful, but of bad consequence, if a Commonwealth, instead of availing itself of such abilities, should wait till he was grown old, and had lost that vigour of body, that courage and activity which might have been of eminent service to his country*: accordingly we see the Romans ad-

* Our laws, says Montaigne, book I. chap. lviii. absurdly determine that a man is not capable of managing his estate till he is twenty-five years of age. Augustus cut off five years from the ancient Roman Standard, and declared that a man was old enough at thirty to be a Judge. Servius Tullius excused Gentlemen of above forty-seven years of age from the fatigues of war; Augustus dismissed them at forty-five; though methinks it seems a little unreasonable that men should be sent home to their fire-sides, till they are fifty-five or sixty. I am of opinion that our vocation and employment should be extended as far as possible for the public good; but I think it a fault on the other hand that we are not employed soon enough. This Emperor was Arbiter of the whole World at nineteen, and yet would have a man to be thirty before he could bear the lowest office. For my part, I believe our understandings are as ripe at twenty as they ever will be, or are capable of being. A mind that did not give evident proof of its force by that time, never gave proof of it afterwards. Natural parts and Genius exert themselves at that term or never. They say in Dauphiny

A pena que picquo giamai. i. e.

“If the thorn does not prick then, it will scarce ever prick.”

Of all the great actions I ever heard or read of, I have observed both in former ages and in our own, that more have been performed by men before the age of thirty than after; and often too in the lives of the very same persons. May I not safely instance in those of Hannibal

vanced Valerius Corvinus, Scipio, Pompey, and many others of that age; and to so good purpose, and Scipio? The better half of their lives they lived upon the glory they had acquired in their youth: they were great men after, it is true, in comparison of others; but by no means in comparison of themselves. As to my own part, I do certainly believe, that since that age, both my understanding and my constitution have rather decayed than improved, and retired rather than advanced. It is possible that with those who make the best use of their time, knowledge and experience may increase with their years; but the vivacity, quickness, steadiness, and other parts of much greater importance, and more essentially our own, languish and decay

Lucret. lib. III. 452.

Sometimes the body first submits to age, sometimes the mind, and I have seen enow whose brains have failed them and grown weak, before their stomach and their legs: and as it is a disease of no great pain to the Patient, and of obscure Symptoms, the danger is so much the greater. For this reason it is that I complain of our Laws; not that they keep us too long to our work, but that they employ us too late. For considering the frailty and shortness of life, and to how many common and natural shocks it is exposed, methinks we should not spend so great a part of it in squabbles about maturity, in idleness and education."—Philip de Comines says, "it is observable that all men whoever became illustrious, or performed great actions, began very young; and that this is owing either to education or the grace of God." Lib. I. chap. x. And Sir William Temple seems to be of the same opinion, though indeed he allows a longer space for it. "When I was younger than I am, says he, and thereby a worse Judge of age, I have often said that what great thing soever a man proposed to do in his life, he should think of atchieving it by that time he is fifty years old. Now I am approaching that age I am still more of that opinion than I was before, and that no man rides to the end of that Stage without feeling his journey in all parts, whatever distinctions are made betwixt the mind and the body, or betwixt judgment and memory. And though I have known some few, who perhaps might be of use in council upon great occasions till after threescore and ten, and have heard that the two late Ministers in Spain, the Counts of Castiglio and Pignoranda, were so till fourscore; yet I will not answer that the conduct of public affairs under their Ministry has not sometimes tasted of the lees of old age. I observe in this Assembly at Nimeguen from so many several parts of Christendom, that of one and twenty Ambassadors, there are but three above fifty years old; which seems an argument of my opinion being in a manner general. Nor can I think the period ill calculated, at least for a General of Armies, or Minister of State in times or scenes of great action, when the care of a State or an Army ought to be as constant as the Chymist's fire to make any great production; for if it goes out, but for an hour, perhaps the whole operation fails. Now I doubt whether any man after fifty be capable of such constant application of thought,

any more than of long and violent labour and exercise, which that certainly is, and of the finest parts. Besides, no man that sensibly feels the decays of age and his life wearing off, can figure to himself those imaginary charms in riches and praise, that men are apt to do in the warmth of their blood; and those are the usual incentives towards the attempt of great dangers, and support of great trouble and pains. To confirm this by examples, I have heard that Cardinal Mazarine, about five and fifty, found it was time to give over; that the present Grand Vizier, who passes for one of the greatest men of that Empire, or of this age, began his Ministry about eight and twenty; and the greatest which I have observed, was that of Mr. de Witt, who began at three and thirty and lasted to forty-eight, and could not, I believe, have gone on many years longer at that height; even if he had not come to that fatal end." MEN generally praise former ages, and find fault with the present, though sometimes without reason: nay, so partial are they to Antiquity, that they not only admire things long since past, the knowledge of which, has been handed down to them by History, but fondly prefer the times they remember themselves in their youth, to those they live in when they are grown old*. Now when they happen to be mistaken in this point (as they often are) I think the deception may be accounted for several ways.

In the first place, the truth of things so very remote cannot be certainly and precisely known, since many events which might entail infamy upon those times are almost buried in silence, whilst others, that may contribute to immortalize their glory, are set in the fairest and fullest light. For so obsequious are

* See the Note upon Zanobi del Pino, Hist. Flor. book IV. See also the fourth of Sir Thomas Pope Blount's Essays, "concerning the Antients, the respect that is due to them; and that we should not too much enslave ourselves to their opinions:" and his fifth Essay, the subject of which is, "whether the men of this present age are any way inferior to those of former ages, either in respect of virtue, learning, or long life."

most writers to the fortune of a Conqueror, that in order to render his victories more glorious, they not only exaggerate his own exploits, but magnify even the conduct and bravery of his enemies in such a manner, that whoever shall chance to read the history either of the Conqueror or the Conquered, in succeeding times, cannot help being filled with wonder at such men and such times, and therefore must naturally be led to praise and admire them. Besides, as either envy or fear are the common motives of hatred amongst mankind, those two powerful causes being extinguished by time, cannot affect ancient transactions, which no longer excite either jealousy or apprehension in any one.—On the contrary, in affairs that we see and transact ourtelves, of which we have so intimate and perfect a knowledge, that no circumstance can be concealed from us, and wherein we find many things that either hurt or disgust, as well as some that please us, we are forced to give the preference to Antiquity, even when, in reality, it deserves not the same degree of glory and praise. I would not here be understood to speak of arts and sciences, the progress or standard of which is so well known, that it is not in the power of time either to add to, or detract any thing from their due credit: I speak only of things that relate to the lives and actions of men, the evidence of whose merit is not so clear.

I say then, that nothing is more common than this custom of praising the past, and finding fault with the present times. It cannot be said, however, that those who do so are always in the wrong; nay, they must of necessity sometimes have reason on their side: for, since the affairs of this world are perpetually ebbing and flowing, every thing must have its vicissitude of better and worse. A City, or State, for instance, which has been reformed and new modelled upon good Principles, by some wise and able Legislator, will continue to flourish and increase for a considerable siderable time under these salutary institutions. Those then, that happen to be born there during that period, and yet cannot help giving the preference to former times, are certainly guilty of an error: and that error is owing to the causes I have just now assigned. But others who live afterwards in the same City or State, when it is upon the decline, and things grow worse and worse every day, cannot justly be accused of an error in passing such a judgment.

When I consider the course of these things with myself, I am apt to think the world has always been pretty much the same, and that there hath at all times been nearly the same portion of good and evil in it; but that this good and evil have sometimes changed their stations, and passed from one City or Province to another; as we may see from the history of those ancient Kingdoms and Empires, the dominion of which has been transferred from one to another according to the variation of their manners and customs, whilst the face of the world in general has still continued the same. Thus virtue, which once seemed to have fixed itself in Assyria, afterwards removed its seat into Media, from thence into Persia, and at last came and settled amongst the Romans: and if there has been no other Empire since the Roman of so long duration, or where the virtue of the whole world seems to have been collected into one mass, it has nevertheless been distributed and parcelled out amongst several nations, as France, Turkey, Egypt, some time ago, and Germany at present; but first and above all amongst the Saracens, who performed such wonderful exploits, and conquered so many States, that they utterly destroyed the Empire of the Romans in the East. In all these nations then, after the ruin of the Roman Empire, there was, and still is in some of them, that portion of virtue which I have been speaking of, and in such a degree as justly merits praise and admiration. So that the man who happens to be born there, and takes upon him to prefer past times to the present, is surely mistaken in his computation: but another that lives in Italy, and is not a Tramontane in his heart, or in Greece, and is not a Turk, has sufficient reason to bewail his lot in falling into such times, and to extol those of his Ancestors, in which, indeed, he will find many things truly enviable; whilst in the present he meets with nothing but extreme misery, infamy, and contempt; no regard to religion, laws, good order or discipline; but every thing corrupted and polluted to the last degree of abomination: and so much the sharper will be his regret and the higher his detestation, when he sees those that sit “pro tribunali, in the judgment Seats,” who demand nothing less than adoration, and who are cloathed with power and authority to correct vice in others, the most profligate and abandoned members of the state*.

But to return to my discourse; I say that though human judgment is frail, and may err in determining whether the past or present times are the better, especially in things of which it cannot have so perfect a knowledge on account of their great antiquity, as of others that have fallen under their immediate notice; yet that will not excuse men who deceive themselves, and indiscriminately prefer the times and transactions that happened when they were young, to those which they experience when they are grown old, since they have seen both one and the other with their own eyes: nor would they be of that opinion, if the judgment, appetites, and passions of men, continued the same all their life long. But as these vary, though the times may not, it is impossible they should see the same things in the same light in their old age that they did in their youth, when their views and inclinations are in a manner totally changed. For since our judgment and prudence usually increase as our bodily vigour declines, those things which seemed tolerable, or perhaps good, when we were young, must necessarily appear evil, and probably insupportable, when we are grown old: so that instead of carping at the times, we ought to lay the fault upon our own judgment. Besides, our desires being insatiable (as nature suffers us to wish for every thing, tho' fortune allows us to obtain but few things) the mind of man is continually dissatisfied, and apt to grow weary of what it possesses: from whence it comes to pass that we despise the present times, whilst we commend the past, and wish for the future, though we have no reasonable motive for so doing. I know not therefore, whether I may not deserve to be numbered amongst those who deceive themselves in this manner, for having been too liberal in my panegyrics in these Discourses, upon the antient times and exploits of the Romans, whilst I have spoke so harshly of our own *: and indeed if the virtue of the one as well as the wickedness of the other, had not been as clear as the sun, I should have been more sparing both of my praise and censure, that so I might not seem to have fallen into that error myself which I so freely condemn in others. But the case being so plain that nobody can deny it, I shall make so scruple of declaring my opinion without any reserve concerning both the past and present times, in order to excite such young men as may chance to read my works, to imitate the virtues of the one, and avoid the vices of the other, whenever their fortune shall call them out into action: for certainly it is the duty of a good man to point out what is great, virtuous, and praise-worthy to others, though perhaps either the adversity of his fortune, or the malignity of the times, will not suffer him to execute it himself: that so when many are instructed in what they ought to do, some of them per-

CHAP. I.

Whether the grandeur of the Roman Empire may be ascribed to the Virtue, or good Fortune of that people.

PLUTARCH, a very grave author, and many others, are of opinion, that the Romans were more indebted to their good Fortune than their Virtue for the extensiveness of their Empire: and amongst other reasons which he assigns to confirm the truth of this, he says they plainly acknowledge it themselves, in having erected more Temples to Fortune than to any other of their Deities. Livy himself seems to incline to this way of thinking: since he very seldom introduces any Roman speaking of virtue, but he makes him say something of Fortune also. But I confess I am not of that opinion myself; nor do I think it can be properly supported: because if no other Commonwealth ever made so great a progress as the Roman, it is well known that no other Commonwealth was so well constituted for that purpose: for as the valour and excellent discipline of their Soldiery were the chief causes of their acquiring so extensive a dominion; so their wise conduct and the institutions established by their first Lawgivers, were means of preserving what they got, as we shall shew more at large in the following Discourses. It is objected indeed by such as take the other side of the question, that it must necessarily be owing to the influence of Fortune, rather than the effect of Wisdom or Virtue, that the Romans never had two wars of any great importance upon their hands at the same time. For they had no quarrel with the Latins, till they had so thoroughly subdued the Samnites, that they were obliged to enter into a war for the defence and protection of that people: nor were they engaged with the Tuscans till they had conquered the Latins, and reduced the Samnites to the last extremity, by the frequent victories they had gained over them: whereas if any two of these States had confederated against them at first, whilst those States were yet firm and unbroken, without doubt the Romans must have been in great danger of being utterly ruined in the very infancy of their State.

To what cause soever it might be owing, it is certain, that the Romans were never involved in two wars of any consequence at once: on the contrary it appears, that when a fresh war broke out, they always put an end to any they happened to be engaged in at that time, and never began one till they had concluded another. This may be particularly observed throughout the whole series of their disputes with other nations; for not to mention those they were concerned in before Rome was taken by the Gauls, we do not find they had any other enemies to deal with but the Æqui and Volsci, whilst those two nations were in a condition to cope with them. When they were vanquished, a war was commenced with the Samnites; and though it is true the Latins revolted from the Romans before that war was entirely concluded, yet before any hostilities were committed, the Samnites had entered into a confederacy with the Romans, and assisted them with their forces to chastise tise the insolence of the Latins. - After they were reduced, the war with the Samnites was revived, in which they were defeated in many battles. That being concluded, a quarrel ensued with the Tuscans; at the end of which, the Samnites were encouraged to try their fortune once more with the Romans, by the arrival of Pyrrhus with an army in Italy; but he being driven back again into Greece, the first Punic war begun, which was hardly ended when the Gauls on both sides of the Alps combined against the Romans, and coming to an engagement with them were routed with very great slaughter betwixt Popolonia and Pisa, in the place where the Tower of St. Vincenzo now stands. When this was over, they had no war of any great importance during the next twenty years; as they had no enemies to give them any trouble except the Ligures *, and some few of the Gauls that were left in Lombardy: so that they were in a great measure at peace till the second Punic war, in which Italy was engaged for the space of sixteen years. This being concluded with great glory, the Macedonian war broke out; at the end of which, another happened with Antiochus in Asia; who being subdued, there was no Prince nor Republic left in the whole world that was able either separately, or in conjunction with others, to make head against the Romans. But whoever considers their conduct and manner of proceeding in their wars, even before this last decisive stroke, will find great virtue and consummate prudence mixed with their good fortune; so that the cause of their success is easily discovered. For it is most certain that when any State has acquired so high a degree of reputation, that all its neighbours stand in awe of it, no one will venture to attack it singly, except compelled by downright necessity: from whence it must come to pass, that it will always have it in its choice to be at war with which soever it pleases, and to keep fair with the rest by proper means, who being partly afraid of its power, and partly lulled into security by the methods it may take to amuse them, will easily be prevailed upon to sit quiet and contented. As to others that are more powerful, but at such a distance that they have little or no commerce with it, they will not give themselves much trouble about people that are so remote, and in whose concerns they seem to be in no wise interested: in which error they generally continue till the next house to them is in flames, and then they have no resource left to trust to but their own forces, which will not be sufficient to oppose an enemy who by that time is become irresistible.

I might here observe how the Samnites stood by like unconcerned Spectators, whilst the Romans subdued the Æqui and Volsci: but for the sake of brevity I shall confine myself to the example of the Carthaginians alone, who were in very great power when the Romans were engaged in the war with the Samnites and Tuscans, as they were then in possession of all Africa, Sicily, Sardinia, and part of Spain. But trusting in their own strength, and secure, as they imagined, by their great distance from the Romans, they never thought either of attacking them at that time, or of sending any succours to the Samnites or Tuscans: on the contrary (as it usually happens to growing States) they rather seemed to favour their enterprizes by courting their friendship and entering into an alliance with them; not perceiving their error till the Romans had conquered all the people betwixt Rome and Carthage, and were grown strong enough to dispute the possession of Sicily and Spain too with the Carthaginians themselves. What happened to the Carthaginians, happened likewise to the Gauls, to Philip of Macedon, and to Antiochus, every one of them being fully persuaded, that as the Romans were so embroiled in wars with other nations, they would certainly be subdued by those nations at last, or if they were not, that they should have time enough to make sufficient provision for their safety; by war at least, if not by other means. I am of opinion therefore, fore, that any other Prince or people endued with the same degree of Virtue or Courage, and observing the same wise measures, would likewise have the same good fortune that the Romans had.

I should here have taken notice of the methods which that Commonwealth used, in order to get footing in those nations which they invaded, if I had not already discussed that point at large in a Treatise called the Prince; yet I cannot help briefly observing, that they always took care to gain over some powerful friend in those States to their interest, whose assistance they made use of not only to open a passage into them at first, but to keep possession of them after they were conquered. Thus they availed themselves of the Capuans in the territories of the Samnites, of the people of Camerino in Tuscany, of the Mamertines in Sicily, of the Saguntines in Spain, of Massinissa in Africa, of the Etolians in Greece, of Eumenes and other Princes in Asia, and of the Massilians and Edui in Gaul: and so dexterous were they both in forming and conducting such alliances, that they never were at a loss for friends of that kind, who greatly contributed to facilitate all their enterprizes, and enabled them both to conquer other nations and afterwards to retain the dominion over them. Those then that carefully follow the same Maxims, will always have much less occasion for the assistance of Fortune than others that do not: and that there may be no further room left to doubt that their own Wisdom and Virtue conduced much more than Fortune to the aggrandizement of that Empire, we shall shew in the next Chapter, what sort of people they were whom the Romans subdued, and how obstinately they defended their libertjes.

C H A P. II.

With what Nations the Romans were engaged in their wars; and how obstinately those Nations defended their liberties against them.

THE excessive love of liberty, and the obstinacy with which both the neighbouring nations, and some of those that lay at a great distance from the Romans, defended it, made it so difficult to conquer them, that it never could have been effected, without an uncommon degree of virtue and courage. This is evident from the many and great dangers to which they exposed themselves, sometimes to preserve, and sometimes to recover it; as well as from the severe revenge they took, when an opportunity offered, upon those that had usurped it. It likewise sufficiently appears from History what grievous evils and miseries were the consequence of servitude in many Nations and States. And though there is but one nation at present that can boast of having free Cities in it*, yet, in ancient times, there was no instance of any which had not several. We see for example, how many free people there were then in one angle of Italy alone, as the Tuscans, the Romans, and the Samnites; not to mention many others in all the different parts of it: but there is nothing at all said of any Kings, except those that reigned at Rome, and Porsena, King of Tuscany; concerning the extinction of whose family, though History is altogether silent, it is certain, however, that when the Romans laid siege to Veii, Tuscany was not only entirely free itself, but abhorred the name of King to such a degree, that the people of Veii having elected one for their defence, and demanding the assistance of the Tuscans against the Romans, the former, after much deliberation, absolutely refused to send them away, whilst they continued under Kingly Government, and said, they should not concern themselves in supporting a Country that had already forfeited its liberties.

Now it is easy to discern from what cause this fondness for liberty in mankind is derived : for experience shews us, that no state ever extended its dominion, or increased its revenues any longer than it continued free. On the contrary, if it seems wonderful to some, how the Athenians arrived at such a height of grandeur, in the space of an hundred years only, after they had shaken off the yoke of Pisistratus ; and much more amazing, perhaps, that the Roman Empire should increase in so prodigious a manner after the expulsion of Kings, yet it may readily be accounted for ; since it is not a regard for the good of one particular man, but for that of the public, which makes a State great and powerful ; and it is past doubt, that the good of the public is not so much considered in any other form of Government, as in a Commonwealth ; for there every measure is pursued, that may conduce to the benefit of the whole, how prejudicial soever it may prove to the interest of any private person ; and there is always such a majority of those that are advantaged by this manner of proceeding, as will be sufficiently able to carry their point, in spite of any opposition from others that must suffer by it. But the case is quite different in States that are under the Government of a Prince ; for there it generally happens, that what makes for the advantage of the Sovereign, tends to the prejudice of the Public, and vice versa * : so that whenever free States degenerate into

* “ How this will hold, says E. Dacres, with the general, and almost received tenet, I cannot see ; being, that the Prince and People are said to make only one politique body, and the welfare of the part cannot be separated from the whole.” Famous is that Fable of Æsop, concerning the Belly, and the rest of the members, which Menenius Agrippa made use of to reconcile the Commons of Rome, who upon a quarrel with the Senate retired into the holy mount. Whereby it came to appear, that the Belly afforded its service too, and as well gave as received nourishment, distributing by the veins, throughout

Tyranny, the least evil they must expect is to make no further progress in riches, power, or dominion: and it is pretty well if that be the worst, since they commonly, nay almost always indeed, from that time begin to decline and fall to decay. For, if the Tyrant should chance to be a spirited enterprizing man, and extend his Empire by war, the Public would not be at all advantaged by that, nor any body benefitted but himself; because he dares not advance any of his subjects, how worthy and virtuous soever they may be, lest he should make them so powerful that he might afterwards grow jealous of them: nor will he venture to make those States which he conquers, either tributary and dependant upon that which he has usurped, because he will not think it for his interest to let his subjects grow strong and united, but to keep every Town and Province divided, and wholly dependent upon himself: so that he alone, and not his country, is the better for those acquisitions; for a further confirmation of which (if there can still remain any sort of doubt) let any one read Xenophon's Treatise upon Tyranny, wherein he will find sufficient matter for his conviction.

These things being considered, it is no wonder that people in ancient times abhorred Tyranny, and were so passionately fond of Liberty, that they adored the very name of it; a remarkable instance of which, the whole body out of the meat which it had digested, the blood well concocted, whereby each part was nourished. Who is it that feels not, when any part fails, that the whole is in disorder? And who sees not likewise, when any part of the body draws into it more than its proportionable nouriture, that the whole pines thereupon? As from the swelling of the spleen, the health of the whole body is disturbed, and therefore, by some Politiques, not unfitly compared to a Prince's Exchequer, which, when it excessively abounds, beggars the whole country. "It is a folly to think, (says a Spanish Author) that the poverty of the Commonalty will not redound to the breaking of private patrimonies, nor can great revenues continue where the Commonwealth is raked to the very bones." All these things serve to argue the mutual sympathy, as between the head and the members, so between the Prince and his subjects; and to divide the interest of the Prince from that of the people cannot agree with good policy; for, as in the natural body it breeds diseases, so in the politique it produces disorders and destruction.

we have in the case of Hieronymus, Nephew to Hiero the Syracusan; for, upon the news of his death, the army, which at that time lay encamped not far from the City, at first took up arms against the Conspirators, who had assassinated the Tyrant; but, when they were informed that the people in the City declared for Liberty, they were so charmed with that name, that they soon laid them down again, and began to take measures for the re-establishment of the Commonwealth. Nor can it seem strange, that the people should shew but little mercy to those that have deprived them of their freedom, since there have been so many examples of their rage upon such occasions. I shall, however, content myself with one, which happened at Corcyra, a City in Greece, during the course of the Peloponesian war: for Greece being divided into two factions, one of which adhered to the Athenians, and the other to the Spartans; many towns had partizans of each side within the same walls. But the Nobility having got the upper hand at Corcyra, and depriving the people of their liberties, the latter, by the assistance of the Athenians, were enabled to take up arms, and rising upon the Nobility soon overpowered them: after which, they shut them all up in one prison, from whence they took them out by eight or ten at a time, under a pretence of banishing them into different parts, but afterwards put them to the most cruel kinds of death. Of which, the rest, being at last informed, resolved to behave themselves like men in that extremity, and exert their utmost efforts to avoid so ignominious a fate. For this purpose, having armed themselves as well as their circumstances would admit of, they resolutely defended the entrance of the prison, and would let nobody come in, till the people ran tumultuously together, and got to the top of the building, which they uncovered, and throwing down the roof and walls of it upon their heads, soon buried them in their ruins. Many other instances of the like terrible nature happened in that country; from whence the truth of the old observation is sufficiently evinced, that people generally run greater lengths in revenging the loss of their liberty, than in defending it.

Considering therefore sometimes with myself, what should be the reason, that people are not so zealous in asserting their liberties at present, as they were in former times, I think it is owing to the same cause, that makes them not so bold and courageous as they used to be; namely, the difference betwixt their Education and ours, occasioned by the difference betwixt the Christian and Pagan Religion. For our religion having shewn us the true way to real happiness, inspires us with a contempt of worldly glory: which being the chief end of the Pagans, and the object wherein they placed their Summum bonum, made them more fierce and daring in their actions. This may appear from many of their Institutions; particularly their Sacrifices, which were very magnificent indeed, when compared with the simplicity of ours, in which the ceremonies are rather delicate than pompous or striking, and not attended with any circumstances of ferocity or Eclat. In those of the Pagans, besides the splendour of the solemnity, the very action of the Sacrifice was full of blood and cruelty, as great numbers of victims were butchered upon those occasions: which inured men to horrid spectacles, and made them sanguinary and cruel. Besides which, they deified none but men full of worldly glory, such as great Commanders and illustrious Governors of States. But our Religion, instead of Heroes, canonizes those only that are meek and lowly, and given to the contemplation of heavenly things, rather than to an active and busy life; and that happiness which the Pagans sought from courage, bodily strength, and other qualifications that conduced to make them hardy and fierce, we look for in humility, self-denial, and a contempt of the world; so that if our religion ever requires us to shew any degree of fortitude, it is to be manifested in our sufferings, rather than in any thing else. This institution therefore seems to have enervated mankind,

and given up some as a prey, tied and bound into the hands of others that are more wicked, who may dispose of them as they please; since, in order to obtain Paradise, they perceive the generality of them more ready to suffer injuries than to revenge them. Now that the world is thus crippled and hamstrung, and heaven itself appears to be in a manner disarmed, is owing to the pitiful and erroneous explication, which some have taken upon them to give of our religion, as if it enjoined solitude and indolence, and forbid an active and serviceable life: for if they had considered that it allows us to defend and exalt our Country, it certainly allows us also to love and honour it, and to qualify ourselves for its defence*. This sort

* Upon this Paragraph, the abovementioned E. Dacres says as follows, "Here Machiavel falsely imputes the cause of mens cowardliness to the Christian Religion. I neede not alleadge any battells foughten by Christians, to prove him a Lyar: histories frequently asfoarde us examples, as well ancient as modern, where they have been as resolutely foughten by the Christians, as ever were any by the Pagans: nay, our own memories may well supply us with some if we want. If we marke from whence Machiavel takes his argument, it is from that the Pagans slew a multitude of sacrifices, the sight of which being terrible, made men of the same disposition. By the same reason it must follow, that our Butchers and Surgeons are more valiant than other men, as who customarily have their hands imbrued in bloud. I may well allow them to be more cruel; and therefore our laws exclude them from being upon a jury of Life and Death; but of being more valiant, I never heard they had the reputation." Let us hear also what a great Prelate of our Church says upon this passage, which is much more to the purpose. "It is objected (says he) that the Christian Religion is apt to dispirit men, and to break the courage and vigour of their minds by the precepts of patience, humility, meekness, forgiving injuries, and the like. This objection hath made a great noise in the world, and hath been urged by men of great reputation and insight into the tempers of men and the affairs of the world. It is said to be particularly insisted upon by Machiavel, and very likely it may; though I think that elsewhere he is pleased to speak in terms of great respect, not only of Religion in general, but likewise of the Christian Religion. . . . But howsoever this objection may be, I dare appeal both to reason and experience for the confutation of it. 1. To reason, and that as to these two things. 1. That the Christian Religion is apt to plant in the minds of men principles of the greatest resolution and truest courage. It teacheth men upon the best and most rational grounds to despise dangers, yea and death itself, the greatest and most formidable evil in this world; and this principle is likely to inspire men with the greatest courage: for what need he fear any thing in this world, who fears not death, after which, there is nothing in this world to be feared? And this the Christian Religion does, by fort of Education then, and these false Interpretations, have been one great cause, that there are not now so giving men the assurance of another life, and a happiness infinitely greater than any that is to be enjoyed in this world. And, in order to the securing of this happiness, it teacheth men to be holy, just, and to exercise a good conscience, both towards God and man; which is the only way to free a man from all inward tormenting fears of what may happen to him after death. "This makes the righteous man, says Solomon, as bold as a Lion." Nothing renders a man more undaunted, as to death and the consequences of it, than the peace of his own mind; that is, not to be conscious to himself of having wilfully displeas'd him, who alone can make us happy or miserable in the other world. So that a good man being secure of the favour of God, may, upon that account, reasonably hope for greater happiness after death, than other men: whereas a bad man, if he be sober, and hath his senses awaked to a serious consideration of things, cannot but be afraid to die, and to be extremely anxious and solicitous about what will become of him in another world: for surely it would make the stoutest man breathing afraid to venture upon death, when he sees hell beyond it. Possibly there may be some monsters of men, who have so far suppress'd the sense of Religion and stupified their own consciences, as in a good measure to have conquered the fears of death and the consequences of it: but this happens to very few, and at sometimes only. So that if vice and wickedness do generally break the firmness of mens spirits, it follows, that nothing but Religion can generally give men courage against death. And this the Christian Religion does in a most eminent manner, to those that live according to it; our blessed Saviour having delivered us from the fear of death, by conquering death for us, and giving us assurance of the glorious rewards of another life. 2. Meekness, patience, humility, modesty, and such virtues of Christianity, do not in reason tend to dispirit men, and break their courage, but only to regulate it, and take away the fierceness and brutishness of it. This we see in experience, that men of the truest courage have many times the least of pride and insolence, of passion and fierceness. Those who are better bred, are commonly of more gentle and civil dispositions: but therefore they do not want true courage, though they have not the roughness and foolhardiness of men of ruder breeding. So that in a true Christian, courage and greatness of mind are very consistent with meekness, patience, and humility. Not that all good men are very couragious: there is much of this in the natural temper of men, which Religion does not quite alter. But that which I am concerned to maintain is, that Christianity is no hindrance to any man's courage, and that, ceteris paribus, supposing men of equal tempers, no man hath so much reason to be valiant, as he that hath a good conscience; I do not mean a blustering, and boisterous, and rash courage, but a sober, calm, and fixed valour. 2. I appeal to experience for the truth of this. Did ever greater courage and contempt of death appear in all ages, sexes, and conditions of men than in the primitive Martyrs? Were any of the heathen Soldiers comparable to the Christian Legion for resolution and courage, even the Heathen's themselves being judges? The Religion of Mahomet seems to be contrived to inspire men with fierceness and desperateness of resolution; and yet I do not find, but that generally where there hath been any equality in numbers, the Christians have

many Republics in the world as there were formerly; and consequently that the love of Liberty is not so strong and operative in mankind, as it used to be in ancient times: but yet I am inclined to believe, that

been superior to them in valour, and given greater instances of resolution and courage than the Turks have done. So that I wonder upon what grounds this objection hath been taken up against Christianity, when there is nothing either in the nature of this Religion, or from the experience of the world, to give any tolerable countenance to it. And surely the best way to know what effect any Religion is likely to have upon the minds of men, is to consider what effects it hath had in the constant experience of mankind." See Archbishop Tillotson's Sermon upon Matth. xi. 6. entitled the prejudices against Christianity considered, vol. II. p. 411, 412. fol. Edit. of his works, printed at London, 1735. See also vol. II. p. 61, & seq. of Mr. Bayle's Theological Works epitomized, by R. Boulton, where it is shewn how much true greatness of mind is promoted by Christianity.

Upon the whole, Machiavel seems not so much to be blamed for what he has said in this Chapter as many people have thought: for it is plain from what he says elsewhere in many places, that he does not here speak of pure and undefiled Christianity as it was delivered to us by its Divine Author; but degenerated, as it was in his time, into the most abominable degree of corruption and adulteration. The Romish Religion in that age was no more like true Christianity, than a common Strumpet can be said to be like a chaste Matron: and as it is generally observed, that the best things when corrupted are apt to become the worst, so it fared with the doctrine of Jesus Christ; which from being the purest and most noble of all others that ever existed, was then polluted to such a degree by the heads of it and other wicked men, that instead of answering the divine ends which it was designed to promote, it was perverted to the saddest purposes by vile interpretations of its generous and heavenly precepts, and the pitiful education of youth which a parcel of lazy, ignorant, and unchristian Monks had introduced in consequence of such interpretations. When men speak of vinegar, they do not mean wine in its pure and uncorrupted state: and when Machiavel speaks of the effects of the Romish Religion, it is evident from many other passages in his writings, that he does not design to reflect upon true and genuine Christianity. On the contrary, he speaks of it with the highest respect, and always recommends the practice of it. For instance, he says, chap. xii. book I. of these Discourses, "that if Christian Princes had taken care to preserve their Religion in the purity it was delivered to them by its Author, it is certain Christendom would have been much more happy and united than it is at present: but it is the surest sign of its declension, to see that those who live nearest the Church of Rome, which is the head of our Religion, have the least devotion: for whoever will examine its first principles, and compare them with the practice of these times, will find it no difficult matter to persuade himself that either some dreadful scourge, or perhaps utter destruction is hanging over our heads." See the rest of that chapter: see also chap. xi. and xiii. of the same book. Many other strokes there are of this kind in different parts of Machiavel's works; but let these suffice, to prevent further prolixity.

the overgrown power of the Roman Empire contributed still more to this; for it was so great that it conquered and extinguished all other Republics and free States.

However that may be, it is certain, that when the Roman Empire was broke up and dissolved, very few of those States ever joined together again, and recovered their freedom: though when it first began to increase and extend itself, the Romans in every corner of the world found numbers of Commonwealths not only ready armed and confederated against them, but exceeding obstinate in the defence of their liberties: which shews, that without a very uncommon degree of courage and virtue, they could not have subdued those people. Of this I shall give but one instance in the case of the Samnites; but it is a remarkable one. They were so strong and resolute (according to Livy) that though they had been defeated in numberless battles, their towns plundered, and their territories laid waste; yet they made head against the Romans till the Consulate of Papirius Cursor, Son to the first Papirius; a period of forty-six years. But now that Country, which was formerly so populous and full of towns, and where the inhabitants were so brave and well disciplined, that nothing but the Roman valour could have subdued them, is in a manner desolate and uninhabited. This may be easily accounted for, when we consider that it was then free, and at present is in a state of servitude: for all States that have the full enjoyment of Liberty make a surprising progress, and are enabled to do very great things, as I said before: because the inhabitants must naturally increase very fast, where matrimony becomes desirable, by the consideration that they shall not only be able to support themselves and their families, but that their children will inherit what they get without any fear of having it taken from them by force; and further, that those children, instead of being born slaves, may become great men and governors of the State, if they behave themselves virtuously. Wealth of all kinds, whether such as results from Agriculture or Manufactures, increases likewise very fast in a Republic: for every one cheerfully endeavours to enrich himself by some means or other, when he is assured he shall be suffered to enjoy the fruit of his labours in peace: so that men vie with each other in providing for the public, as well as their own particular interest, to the great advancement and emolument of both.

Very different is the condition of those that do not live under a free Government; and the less liberty they have, the fewer of those advantages will they experience which we have been speaking of. But of all yokes, that of living in subjection to a Commonwealth is the heaviest and most miserable; for, in the first place, it generally endures the longest, and there is the less hope of ever being able to shake it off; and, in the next, it is the policy of all Republics to weaken and exhaust other States that are dependent upon them, in order to strengthen and invigorate their own: which is a maxim not practised by Princes, except they be Barbarians, depopulators of Provinces, and scourgers of mankind, like the eastern Tyrants, who endeavour to extinguish all civil order and Liberty. But a Prince of any benevolence or humanity, for the most part, loves and cherishes the people that are fallen under his dominion, in common with the rest of his Subjects, and leaves them in quiet possession of their former customs and privileges: so that if they cannot thrive and flourish like those that are perfectly free, yet they do not absolutely sink into ruin, like others that are in downright slavery; I mean such sort of slavery as those fall into, who become subject to a foreigner; for, concerning the servitude which is the consequence of being oppressed by one of their own Citizens, I have already spoken elsewhere*.

* See book I chap. xvi. xvii. xviii. of these Discourses. The Prince, cap. viii. & alibi passim.

Whoever then maturely considers the whole of what I have said above, will not be surpris'd either at the power and strength of the Samnites whilst they continued free, or at their weakness and abject condition after they had lost their liberty. Livy takes notice of this in many passages of his History; particularly, in his account of the war with Hannibal: where he tells us, that the Samnites being grievously harrassed by a Roman Legion which then lay at Nola, sent to supplicate the assistance of that Commander: and that their Deputies represented to him amongst other things, “ That though they had held the Romans at bay for the space of an hundred years, with their own forces only, and commanded by their own Generals, and had often made head against two Consular armies, under two Consuls at the same time; yet they were then reduced to so low an ebb of fortune and spirits, that they could hardly defend themselves against one Legion only that was quartered at Nola.”

C H A P. III.

That Rome made itself strong and powerful by destroying the States round about it, and incorporating strangers with its own Citizens.

“CRESCIT interea Roma, Albæ ruinis. In the mean time Rome established itself upon the ruins of Alba,” says Livy very justly. For those that would aggrandize and extend a State, should endeavour by all means to make it exceeding populous, since it will be impossible ever to accomplish that purpose, without a vast number of men. Now this may be done two ways; either by soft and gentle methods, or by force and violence. In the former case, you are to encourage Foreigners to settle with you, and to make their residence secure and comfortable, that they may stay there with satisfaction: in the latter, you must ruin the neighbouring States, and compel their inhainhabitants to come and live with you : both which rules were so well observed by the Romans, that in the time of their Sixth King, they mustered eighty thousand men in their City, that were fit to carry arms *, imitating in this respect the practice of a skilful planter, who, in order to strengthen a tree, and enable it to thrive and bear plenty of good fruit, prunes off its first shoots, that the sap, which otherwise would dilate itself in the branches, being confined wholly to the trunk, may exert itself in time with more vigour, and make the tree more flourishing and fruitful. That this policy is not only expedient, but absolutely necessary to establish and enlarge Dominion, plainly appears from the neglect of Athens and Sparta in this respect ; which two Republics, though very warlike indeed, and happy in their Laws, could never arrive at that height of grandeur which Rome attained to ; notwithstanding Rome seems to have been a more tumultuous state, and not so well governed as they were. For which there can be no other reasons than what have been just now assigned. For Rome strengthened itself to such a degree by pursuing these maxims, that it was able to send out armies consisting of two hundred and eighty thousand effective men at one time : whereas, neither of the other could ever raise above twenty thousand. This was not the effect of an advantageous situation (because that of Rome was neither better nor more benign, than those of Athens and Sparta) but to the difference of their conduct : for Lycurgus, the Founder of the Spartan Commonwealth, apprehending that the admission and conversation of the new inhabitants would naturally tend to the corruption and dissolution of his Laws, took all possible care to prevent his Citizens from having any manner of commerce with strangers: for which purpose he not only would not suffer intermarriages with Foreigners, or that they should be admitted to the freedom of the City, or have any such connexions or correspondence with them as usually drew men together, and unite them; but likewise caused the current money of that Commonwealth to be made of Leather, that nobody might be tempted to come thither to traffic or introduce any new kind of manufacture: so that it was not possible that City should ever be very full of inhabitants.

* We must reckon the forces of their neighbours, the Campanians, in this number, because they were always accounted Roman citizens : accordingly, our author says in another place, that when the Decemviri had disgusted their fellow-citizens, they had nothing to hope from the Campanians, as they were reckoned the same with the Roman people.

Now, as natural and politic bodies may often be very fitly compared together, and it is impossible that a feeble trunk should sustain vast and ponderous branches: so it is equally impossible that a weak Commonwealth should ever subdue another Commonwealth or Kingdom, that is much stronger or fuller of armed men than itself: or if it should by chance happen to subdue them, it must necessarily very soon resemble a tree, the branches of which are too large and heavy for its trunk to support, and consequently will be torn from it by the least blast of wind. This was actually the case of Sparta; though it had the good fortune to conquer all Greece: for, upon the rebellion of the Thebans, all the rest of the States revolted also, and left that Republic like a tree, stripped of its branches: a misfortune that never could happen to Rome, as its trunk was strong enough to sustain any weight. The strict practice therefore of the aforesaid rules, and some others that we shall mention hereafter, made the Romans so strong and powerful: so that Livy's observation, "Crescit interea Roma Albæ" "ruinis," contains a great deal in a few words.

C H A P. IV.

Concerning the three ways which Republics have taken to extend their Dominion.

WHOEVER is conversant in ancient History must have observed, that Republics have taken three methods to extend themselves. One of which was formerly pursued by the Tuscans, who entered into a confederacy with several Republics upon an equal footing; that is, it was agreed, that none of them should pretend to assume any degree of pre-eminence or authority over the rest, and that they should likewise admit such states as they conquered into the confederacy; as the Swifs do at present, and the Achaians and Etolians did of old in Greece: and since the Romans had many wars with the Tuscans, I shall be the more particular in what I have to say, concerning the conduct of that people, in order to explain the nature and tendency of this first method as clearly as I can.

Before the foundation of the Roman Empire in Italy, the Tuscans were very powerful both by sea and land; and though we have now no particular History left of their transactions and exploits, yet there are some few traces and monuments of their grandeur still remaining, and we know for certain, that they sent a Colony to settle upon the coast of the higher sea, the inhabitants whereof built the town of Adria, afterwards so famous, that it gave name to that Sea, which is called the Adriatic to this day. We likewise know, that their dominion extended from the Tiber to the foot of the Alps (a tract of territory which includes the greater part of Italy), though indeed they lost that Country, which is now called Lombardy; two hundred years before the Romans had acquired any considerable degree of power: for it had been seized upon by the Gauls, who being either compelled by necessity, or allured by the deliciousness of the fruits, but particularly of the wines which abounded there, invaded that part of Italy, under the conduct of Bellovesus, and having vanquished and extirpated the natives, established themselves in those parts, where they built many towns, and not only called the Province Cisalpine Gaul, from their own name, but kept possession of it till they were conquered by the Romans. The Tuscans therefore proceeded in the method above mentioned, and enlarged their Dominion by acting jointly, and upon an equal footing with their Confederates, who were the people of twelve States, namely, of Clusium, Veii, Fesulæ, Arretinum, Volaterræ, and seven others, each of them having the same share in the Government of the whole. They never were able, however, to extend their conquests beyond the boundaries of Italy, nor ever could subdue several parts of that country, for reasons which we shall mention hereafter.

The second method that has been taken by Republics to enlarge their Dominion, was likewise to enter into a League with others; but in such a manner, that one Republic alone took upon itself to be the Principal of the Confederacy as well as the capital City, and to carry on all enterprizes in its own name: and this is what the Romans did. The third method was to make downright slaves and not allies of such States as were conquered, as the Spartans and Athenians did. But of all these three ways, the last is certainly the worst; as plainly appears from the fate of those two Republics, which were ruined by conquering more than they were able to maintain possession of: for it is so very difficult to keep conquered States in subjection by violence, especially such have been used to Liberty before, that it is almost impossible to support any sort of command over them, without an exceeding strong force: to raise which, it is absolutely necessary to confederate with others, and to make use of all means to fill your state with inhabitants; but, as the two Republics just now mentioned neglected both both these expedients, they never could make any lasting acquisitions. The Roman Commonwealth, on the contrary, taking the second method, but not entirely neglecting the others, raised their Empire to a surprising pitch of glory and grandeur: and as that Republic was the only one that ever did so, so it was the only one that ever arrived at that degree of power. For though it associated equally in many things with several other States in Italy, it still maintained the superiority, and reserved to itself the title and honour of commanding in chief: by which means it came to pass, that those Associates became entirely subject to it before they were well aware, at the expence of their own blood and treasure. For when they began to carry their arms out of Italy, and reduced Kingdoms into Provinces dependent upon themselves, the inhabitants of those Provinces having been used to live under Kingly Government, did not much trouble themselves about such a change: and since they had Roman Governors, and were conquered by armies under Roman colours, and knew nothing of their Allies, they would acknowledge no other Sovereign but the Republic of Rome: so that its Italian Confederates finding themselves surrounded on a sudden, as it were by people who were all subject to the Romans, and therefore unable to contend with so powerful a head, at last perceived their error, when it was too late to remedy it: so great was the authority it had obtained amongst foreign nations, and so formidable of itself from the vast number of its inhabitants and military strength. It is true indeed, those allies endeavoured to revenge themselves by afterwards rebelling against the Romans; but, being subdued, they made their condition worse, for, instead of being treated any longer as Allies, they were reduced to the level of Subjects.

This manner of proceeding was peculiar to the Romans, as I have said before: but it ought to be pursued by every other Republic that would extend its Empire; since experience has sufficiently proved it is the best. The next to this, is the method formerly taken by the Tuscans, Achaians, and Etolians, and by the Swifs at present : for tho' very great things cannot be done by it, yet it is attended with two conveniencies ; the one, that it generally prevents wars, and the other, that if any acquisition is made, it will be easy to maintain it. The reason that such a Confederacy cannot effect any very great things, is that it consists of members which are in a manner disjoined and placed at a distance from each other, so that their consultations and resolutions must be slow and tedious : besides they are not so eager to make conquests where the prize is to be divided amongst many, as a single Republic that is to enjoy the whole itself. It has likewise been observed, that Confederacies have their certain bounds, which are never exceeded ; that is, when the Confederates amount to twelve or fourteen, they admit no more : for being then powerful enough, as they conceive, to defend themselves against every one else, they never think of making any further acquisitions ; because, in the first place, they are under no necessity of so doing ; and, in the next, they will reap little or no advantage from it, as we have just observed : and further, they would be reduced to the dilemma, either of admitting the conquered States into the Confederacy, which would create confusion from their number ; or to reduce them to Subjects, which, being attended with great difficulty and small profit, makes them indifferent about the matter, or rather averse to it. When the Associates therefore, are once become so numerous, and have fortified themselves in such a manner on every side, as to live in perfect security from all danger, they chiefly attend to two things : the first, is to take other people under their protection, for which they are paid certain sums of money, and divide it amongst themselves, without any further trouble ; and the next, to hire out their forces to such States as have occasion for them, as the Swifs do at present, and the above-mentioned people did in former times, according to Livy ; who says, that a conference betwixt Philip of Macedon

don and Titus Quintus Flaminius, Philip upbraided an Etolian Commander, who was likewise present, with the avarice and double-dealing of his countrymen, as people that were not ashamed to confederate with one State, and to send assistance to another that was at war with it; so that it was not unusual to see their colours displayed in both armies at the same time.

We see then that this manner of confederating has always produced the same effects, and been attended with similar consequences. It appears likewise, that such Republics as reduced their conquests to a state of subjection, were always debilitated by it themselves to such a degree, that they very seldom could make any further progress in extending their Dominion; and that if they afterwards met with any little success of that kind, it was so far from being a lasting advantage to them, that it commonly occasioned their ruin in a very short time. If this manner of proceeding, therefore, is pernicious to Commonwealths that are powerful and warlike, it must be speedy and utter destruction to those that are not so; of which, we have lately seen many examples in Italy.

From all these considerations, the Roman method seems much the best, and it is wonderful that it was never adopted by any people before them, nor has been imitated since. As for the other way of confederating, there is now no instance of it except amongst the Swiss, and in the Circle of Swabia. We might add, by way of conclusion to this Chapter, that many other excellent rules and institutions which the Romans observed in conducting their affairs, both at home and abroad, are only not imitated in these days, but in a manner despised; some of them being looked upon as fictions and idle Stories, others as impossible, and others again, as either not suitable to the present times and circumstances of the world, or as trifling and of no importance: and to this it is owing, that our poor Country of late has been a prey to every Invader. But, if it seems a matter of too much difficulty to tread in the steps of the Romans, surely the present race of Tuscans are as capable as any other people whatsoever of imitating their forefathers: for though their Ancestors indeed never equalled the Romans in extending their Dominion far abroad, for the reasons which we have given above, yet they acquired as much authority in Italy, as could possibly be expected from their conduct and manner of proceeding; enjoying themselves in profound peace and security for a long course of time, and in the highest reputation for their wisdom, Religion, and power: which power was at first shaken by the Gauls, and afterwards so totally destroyed by the Romans, that though it was very great about two thousand years ago, there are but few or no traces of it left at present: which naturally leads me to consider whence it comes to pass, that the memory of such things is so soon buried in oblivion.

C H A P. V.

That Deluges, Pestilences, the change of Religion and Languages, and other accidents, in a manner extinguish the memory of many things.

IT might be objected, I think, to those who say the world has existed from Eternity, that if it was so, we might reasonably expect to have some records of things that happened much above five thousand years ago; if we did not know that the remembrance of them must inevitably have perished from causes, part of which are owing to the nature of mankind, and part to the influence of Heaven. The oblivion occasioned by mankind proceeds from the variation of Religion and language; for, upon the introduction of a new Religion, the first care of those that endeavour to establish it, is to abolish the old one, in order to give the greater reputation to their own: and when it happens that the propagators of the new one speak a different language from those that were of the persuasion that prevailed before, they so much the sooner extinguish the

the memory of it. This may appear from considering the course taken by the Christians with regard to Paganism : for they totally abolished all the institutions, ceremonies, and monuments of the Pagan Theology. It is true, they could not so utterly extinguish the memory of several actions performed by some great and illustrious men of that religion, being forced to retain the use of the Latin Tongue, though much against their will ; because they were under a necessity of publishing the principles and Doctrine of their own in that language. But if they could have wrote in another, we may be assured from the rest of their proceedings, they would not have left the least traces of any History relating to them : for whoever reads the life and actions of St. Gregory, and other heads of the Christian Religion, will see what a cruel persecution they carried on against all Monuments of Antiquity, burning the works of Poets and Historians, defacing images and statues, and demolishing every thing that might in any wise contribute to keep the memory of Paganism alive : so that if they had likewise introduced a new language at the same time, all footsteps of that people and their worship would have been entirely obliterated *. It is very probable therefore, that those

* Montaigne says, book II. chap. xix. of his Essays, " That when the Christian Religion began to gain authority with the Laws, zeal armed many against all sorts of Pagan books, by which the learned suffered an exceeding great loss ; which I conceive did more prejudice to Letters, than all the flames kindled by the Barbarians. Of this, Cornelius Tacitus is a very good witness ; for though the Emperor Tacitus, his Kinsman, had by express order furnished all the Libraries in the world with his book, nevertheless, one entire copy could not escape the curious search of those who were desirous to abolish it, only on account of five or six idle passages in it, which seemed to oppugn our Belief."

Petrus Alcyonius in Medicè Legato priore bestows a noble eulogy upon St. Gregory, here mentioned by Machiavel, but it ends thus. " Utinam incorruptam Græcæ linguæ integritatem servasset in tantarum Silvâ & tam magnâ librorum vi ; certe sanctissimum illum Pontificem omni laudi cumulatam judicarem. . . . ex illius maxime scriptis barbariem irrepsisse in Theologiam Latinam arbitror. Pagans had treated others who went before them, in the same manner that they themselves were served in their turn by the Christians: and as there have been two or three revolutions of this kind, during the course of five or six thousand years, it cannot seem strange that the memory of things, which happened before that time, should have now become utterly extinct, or so fabulous that nobody regards it; as in fact it has fared with the History of Diodorus Siculus, which though it pretends to give an account of forty or fifty thousand years, is looked upon (and justly I think) as nothing more than a heap of trumpery and lies.

As for other causes immediately owing to the influence of Heaven, which occasion this oblivion of things,

He says further, in the person of Cardinal de' Medici, "Audiebam etiam puer ex Demetrio Chalcondyla, Græcarum rerum peritissimo, sacerdotes Græcos tantâ floruisse auctoritate apud Cæsares Byzantios, ut integrâ illorum gratiâ complura de veteribus Græcis poemata combufferint, in primisque ea ubi amores, turpes lusus, & nequitia amantium continebantur; ita Menandri, Diphili, Apollodori, Philemonis, Alexis fabellas, & Sappûs, Erinna, Anacreontis, Mimnermi, Bionis, Alcmanis, Alcæi carmina interciderunt. Tum pro his substituta Naziazeni nostri poemata, quæ etsi excitant animos nostrorum hominum ad flagrantiorum religionis cultum, non tamen verborum Atticorum proprietatem & Græcæ linguæ elegantiam edocent. Turpiter quidem sacerdotes isti in ceteros Græcos malevoli fuerunt; sed integritatis, probitatis & religionis maximum dedere testimonium." But Alcyonius is not a credible witness, with regard to the incident here related; nor is the testimony of Demetrius Chalcondylas much better.

E. Dacres has the following Note upon this passage. "This is all calumny: for we find not that any have preserved the records of learning more than the Christians, however much intermixed with Paganism. I take it, that those memorials were lost in the vast deluges of the Vandals, Goths, and Hunns, who themselves being barbarous and ignorant, envied others learning, and therefore destroyed all the registers of Antiquity they could find; which our author injuriously imputes to the Christians; being that they, time out of minde, have caused those books to be taught the youth in their schooles: and we find that the most esteemed Fathers of the Church were adorned with that learning, which they are taxed to have persecuted; which serves also for the better understanding and illustrating of Theology, and affords good arguments many times to our Divines, for the conviction of the Gentiles, out of their own writers. Nor do I find there was any other restraint in those studies, than that men were advised to apply themselves soberly thereunto, as not being studies to dwell in, but tending rather to the service of Theology."

we may reckon those that extinguish mankind, and sweep away most of the inhabitants in some particular part of the world; such as Pestilence, Famine, and inundations; the last of which seems to be the most fatal, not only because the calamity is usually more general, but because those that escape its rage are for the most part mountaineers and ignorant men, who having no knowledge of ancient times themselves, cannot therefore be supposed to transmit any memorials of them to their descendants: and though some one should chance to survive, who may possibly be versed in Antiquity; yet, it is very probable that he will suppress many things, and garble others in such a manner, as will tend chiefly to render himself and his own family famous among posterity; leaving just as much upon record, as he thinks will serve that purpose, and no more. That such inundations, pestilence, and famine have actually happened, there is no room to doubt; since it plainly appears, not only from the testimony of many Histories, but from this very consequence of them, the oblivion into which so many states and nations are fallen; the absolute necessity of such events renders them also sufficiently evident; for, as nature acts in the bodies of individuals, and causes a purgation, that tends to preserve them, when there is too much superfluous matter collected; so likewise it happens in the united body of mankind; when either the several Provinces of the world are so full of inhabitants that they can neither support themselves where they are, nor find room in any other place; or when the wickedness of mankind is arrived at the highest pitch it can attain to; then it becomes absolutely necessary that the earth should be purged by one of these three ways, that so mankind being reduced in their numbers, and humbled under a sense of their mortality may become more righteous and live with greater convenience. These things being considered then, it is no wonder that Tuscany, which, as we said before, was so powerful in former times, so renowned for its virtue, manners, and religion, and had had a language and laws of its own, being overwhelmed by the excessive power of the Romans, should now retain no other mark of its ancient grandeur, than the name alone.

C H A P. VI.

Concerning the conduct observed by the Romans in their Wars.

HAVING already shewn what means the Romans took to extend their Dominion, I shall now say something concerning the rules they followed in the prosecution of their wars; and in this as well as all the rest of their actions, we shall see how wisely they deviated in many respects from the common practice of all other nations, in order to pave their way to universal Empire. The end and design of all those that make war either out of choice, or, to speak more properly, out of motives of ambition, is to get what they can and keep what they have got, in such a manner as neither to endanger nor impoverish their own dominions; for which purpose, it is necessary in both cases, to pursue all methods that can be taken, not only to save expences, but to enrich and benefit themselves. Whoever then would accomplish these ends must imitate the conduct of the Romans, with whom it was a general maxim to make their wars short and sharp, as the French say: for by taking the field early and with powerful armies, they very soon brought those wars to a conclusion, in which they were engaged with the Latins, Samnites, and Tuscans: and if we consider all the rest that happened from the foundation of Rome to the Siege of Veii, it will be found that some of them were ended in six days, some in ten, and others in twenty at most. For no sooner was war declared, but they led out their forces to seek the enemy and bring them to an engagement: after which, if they

they gained the victory, as they generally did, they forced them to cede that part of their territory which lay upon their confines, to prevent the rest being laid waste; and this was either appropriated to their own particular use, or given to a Colony, which was settled there for the security of their frontiers, to the great advantage of the Colonists, as well as of the Commonwealth, which was thereby enabled to keep a good garrison in those parts without any expence to itself. Nor could any method be taken more safe and beneficial than this; for whilst the other State continued quiet, that garrison was a sufficient security from any sudden invasion; but if it offered to make any attempt upon their Colony, the Romans were presently in the field again with a powerful army, and having crushed the enemy, made them submit to still heavier terms; thus by degrees continually increasing their power and reputation abroad, and their strength at home.

This method they strictly observed till after they had made themselves Masters of Veii; after which they changed it in some measure, and gave pay to their Soldiers, as they began to be engaged in wars that lasted longer, which was unnecessary before, because their campaigns had always been of short continuance. Nevertheless, though they paid their forces from that time in order to support a war the longer, and to carry their arms into more remote parts, where they were obliged to keep the field a considerable time, yet they never lost sight of their old maxim, but constantly put an end to a war as soon as ever the circumstances of the time and place would admit of it, and always sent Colonies into the countries which they had conquered: for, besides the utility that naturally resulted from the observation of this rule, they were likewise prompted to it by ambition; because the two Consuls continuing in office but one year, and neither of them commanding the army any longer than Six months, they both were desirous to put an end to a war as soon as possible, in order to obtain the honour of a triumph : and as for Colonies, they were too sensible of the advantages they had reaped from such establishments ever to forego them. Indeed they made some alteration in their method of distributing the spoil taken from an Enemy, in which they were not so liberal as they had been before ; since in the first place it did not seem necessary after they had given their Soldiers certain pay, and in the next, the spoil increasing considerably, they thought proper to consign a good part of it to the use of the Commonwealth ; that so they might not be obliged to lay any fresh taxes upon their own Subjects for the prosecution of any future enterprize : by which means they soon enriched the Public to a prodigious degree.

By a strict adherence to these two methods, viz. of distributing their Spoils, and of sending out Colonies, the Romans grew rich by their wars, whereas other Princes and Republics, less wise, are impoverished by them ; nay the matter was carried so far at last, that no Consul was allowed a triumph except he came home loaded with gold, silver, and other spoils for the use of the public Treasury : and thus bringing their wars to a speedy conclusion, either by forcing the enemy to an engagement as soon as possible, or by harrassing their country with continual incursions and devastations till they were obliged to sue for peace upon any terms, this people became richer and more powerful every day.

C H A P. VII.

What proportion of land the Romans gave to every inhabitant of their Colonies.

IT is not an easy matter to know with any certainty how much land the Romans gave each Colonist ; but it seems reasonable to suppose that it was more or less according to the barrenness or fertility of the place.

We may conclude however, that they were always very sparing in this point, that so their Colonies might support a great number of men, and consequently be well secured; and in the next place, as they themselves lived very frugally at home, we can hardly imagine they would suffer their Subjects to wanton in riot and luxury abroad. Livy informs us that after they had taken Veii, they sent a Colony thither, and gave each inhabitant a little more than three acres and a half of land*. They might consider likewise that their wants would be better supplied by the improvement and cultivation of their land, than by the quantity of it. But we may suppose they had also Common fields to feed their Cattle, and woods to supply them with firing and other necessaries, without which no Colony could support itself.

C H A P. VIII.

What are the reasons that induce a people to abandon their own Country and force themselves into that of others.

NOW we have spoken of the manner in which the Romans conducted their wars, and made some mention of the invasion of Tuscany by the Gauls, it may not perhaps appear foreign to our purpose, if we observe that there are two sorts of war: one occasioned by the ambition of Princes or Republics that invade others to enlarge their own Empire, like Alexander the Great and the Romans. These wars, though very ruinous indeed, do not utterly extirpate the natives of conquered Provinces, since the Conqueror is generally content with reducing them to obedience, often leaving them in possession of their own laws, and almost always of their estates and properties. The other sort of war is when a whole people, man, woman, and child, are compelled to quit their own country either by Famine or Sword, and go in search of new habitations in another; not with a design merely to reduce it to Subjection, like the others just now mentioned, but firmly to establish themselves there, either by the entire destruction or extermination of the former inhabitants. Now this is always attended with much blood-shed, cruelty, and devastation, as may appear from what Sallust tells us in the end of his History of the Jugurthine war, when it was reported that the Gauls were upon their march to invade Italy. “Cum cæteris gentibus a populo Romano de imperio tantum fuisse dimicatum, cum Gallis de Singulorum hominum Salute. The Romans contended with other nations for glory and dominion only; but with the Gauls they fought to preserve their own lives and their Country.” For when a Prince or Republic subdues another country, they think it sufficient to rid themselves of those alone who bore rule over it before; but in irruptions of a whole people at once, the invaders find it necessary to extirpate the whole nation which they conquer, in order to support themselves upon the product of their lands.

Three wars of this dreadful kind the Romans sustained; the first, when Rome was taken by the Gauls who had driven the Tuscans out of Lombardy and settled there themselves: and this invasion Livy accounts for two ways; in the first place, from the deliciousness of the Italian fruits and wines which tempted the Gauls, who had none such at home, to come thither for them, as has been said before: and in the next, their own country being grown so full of inhabitants that it could no longer support them all, the leading men of that nation perceived it absolutely necessary that some part of them should leave it and endeavour to establish themselves elsewhere: which being accordingly resolved upon, the people upon whom the lot fell to quit their native country chusing Bellovesus and Sigovesus, two of their Princes, to conduct them, the former penetrated into Italy, and making himself master of Lombardy, soon after fell upon the Romans: the latter forced his way into Spain. The second war of this sort that the Romans had upon their hands, happened to be with the same nation at the end of the first Punic war; and in this they killed above two hundred thousand of them in a battle betwixt Pisa and Piombino; and the last was when the Cimbri and Germans poured themselves into Italy; who, after they had often routed the Roman armies, were totally conquered and driven back again by Marius*. Now if the Romans not only supported themselves, but came off with great glory and reputation at last in all these three terrible wars, it is an indisputable proof of their extraordinary valour and constancy in those times: for afterwards, when they began degenerate, and had in some measure lost their ancient virtue and courage, their dominions were overrun by the very same people, that is, by the Goths, Vandals, and others, who wrested the Empire of the West entirely out of their hands.

These Emigrations are the effect of Necessity (as I said before) and this Necessity is occasioned by famine, or war, and distress at home, which obliges the people to seek new habitations; and when the number of those that are thus forced abroad is great, their irruptions into other parts are exceeding fierce and bloody: for they always kill the natives, seize upon their lands, turn every thing upside down, and give the Country a new name; as Moses did, and the nations that over-ran the Roman Empire. Thus the names by which the several Provinces of Italy and other nations are now called, were given them by their several Conquerors: for Lombardy was formerly called Gallia Cisalpina, and France Gallia Transalpina; which last now takes its name from the Franks who dispossessed the Romans of it. So likewise Sclavonia was anciently called Illyria, Hungary Pannonia, England Britain; thus Moses changed the name of that part of Syria, which he took possession of, into Judea; and in this manner many other countries, which it would be tedious to enumerate, have had new names given them very different from their old ones. And since I have observed above, that people are sometimes driven out of their own country by war, and forced to seek new habitations, I shall give one example of it in the case of the Maurusians, formerly a people of Syria, who, upon the approach of the Israelites under the conduct of Joshua, not being able to oppose him, thought it better to save their lives by leaving their country, than to lose both by waiting for his arrival: for which purpose, they marched away with their wives and children into Africa, where they settled themselves after they had driven the inhabitants out of that part of the country, though they could not defend their own. Procopius, in his History of the war which Belisarius conducted against the Vandals who had got possession of Africa, says that he himself had read inscriptions upon certain pillars in those parts, that were formerly occupied by the Maurusians, to this effect, "These pillars were erected by us when we fled from the face of Joshua the Robber, the Son of Nun *:" from whence the reason of their abandoning Syria plainly appears. Such multitudes therefore becoming desperate, and urged forwards by extreme necessity are very formidable: and so great indeed is their fury, that it is not to be sustained except by the most warlike and courageous nations.

* It is said that a town has been lately discovered in the fastnesses of the Alps, which has been inhabited by the descendents of this people ever since that time, who have still preserved their ancient language and manners.

But when those that are obliged to leave their country are few in number they are not so much to be dreaded, as the people of whom we have been speaking; because when they find they cannot succeed by downright force and violence, they are under a necessity of having recourse to artifice and gentle means, in order to gain a settlement somewhere or other, and afterwards to support themselves by alliances and confederacies, like Æneas, Dido, the Massilians, and many others, who found means to maintain their ground in those parts where they had got footing with the consent and good will of the neighbouring States. The most numerous emigrations have been chiefly out of Scythia *, a cold and barren climate, where the inhabitants were generally so numerous, and the Country so sterile, that it was not able to sustain them: so that multitudes of them having many reasons to leave it, and none that could induce them to stay there, were in a manner compelled to seek more plentiful and comfortable habitations: and if there have been none of these inundations from those parts during the course of these last five hundred years and upwards, I think it may be accounted for several ways †. In the first place, from the prodigious swarms of people, that issued out from thence in the declension of the Roman Empire, which must have drained and exhausted them to the last degree; as there were above thirty emigrations at that time. In the next, Germany and Hungary, which likewise sent out legions of these adventurers, are now cultivated and improved in such a manner, that all the inhabitants live in plenty and satisfaction, and consequently are under no temptation or necessity of removing into any other country: and in the last place, these two nations and the Poles, who also border upon the Scythians, being very warlike and inured to arms, make so strong a bulwark against them, that there is no likelihood of their ever being able either to conquer, or even to force a passage through them; and indeed they have actually repelled many formidable invasions of these Barbarians: it is not without reason

† Since Machiavel's time, the Tartars have made terrible irruptions into China, and entirely subdued that Empire.

therefore, if they sometimes boast that it is owing to their valour, that Italy has been so long secured from such irruptions, and that the Church of Rome is obliged to them for its very existence*.

* For a further account of these emigrations, see Hist. Flor. book I. at the beginning. Davilla's History of the Civil wars of France, at the beginning. Examen du Prince, chap. xxi. Sir William Temple, in the first Chapter of his observations upon the united provinces of the Netherlands, assigns another reason why they have long ceased. "I have sometimes thought (says he) how it should have come to pass that the infinite swarm of that vast northern hive, which so often shook the world like a great tempest, and overflow'd it like a torrent; changing names, and customs, and government, and language, and the very face of nature, wherever they seated themselves; which upon record of Story, under the name of Gauls, pierced into Greece and Italy, sacking Rome, and besieging the Capitol in Camillus's time; under that of the Cimbbers, marched through France to the very confines of Italy, defended by Marius; under that of Huns or Lombards, Visigoths, Goths, and Vandals, conquered the whole force of the Roman Empire, sacked Rome thrice in a small compass of years, seated three Kingdoms in Spain and Africa, as well as Lombardy; and under that of Danes and Normans possessed themselves of England, a great part of France, and even of Naples and Sicily: how (I say) these nations which seemed to spawn in every age, and at some intervals of time discharged their own native countries of so vast numbers, and with such terror to the world, should about seven or eight hundred years ago leave off the use of these furious expeditions, as if on a sudden they should have grown barren, or tame, or better contented with their own ill climates. But I suppose we owe this benefit wholly to the growth and progress of Christianity in the North; by which, early and undistinguished copulation, or multitude of wives, were restrained or abrogated. By the same means learning and civility got footing amongst them in some degree, and enclosed certain circuits of those vast regions, by the distinctions and bounds of Kingdoms, Principalities, or Commonalties. Men began to leave their wilder lives, spent without other cares or pleasures than of food or of lust, and betook themselves to the ease and entertainment of societies; with order and labour, riches began and trade followed, and these made way for luxury, and that for many diseases or ill habits of body unknown to former and simpler ages, which began to shorten and weaken both life and procreation. Besides, the divisions and circles of dominion occasioned wars betwixt the several nations though of the same faith: and those of the Poles, Hungarians, and Muscovites, with the Turks and Tartars made greater slaughters: and by these accidents, I suppose, the numbers of those fertile broods have been lessened, and their limits in a measure confined; and we have had thereby for so long together in these parts of the world the honour and liberty of drawing our own blood upon the quarrels of humour or avarice, ambition, or pride, without the assistance or need of any barbarian nations to destroy us."

C H A P. IX.

What often gives rise to a war betwixt different Powers.

THE war betwixt the Romans and Samnites, after they had long been friends and confederates, was owing to a circumstance which often proves the cause of war between two powerful States: and this circumstance is occasioned either by accident or design. The abovementioned quarrel was the effect of accident; for when the Samnites first made war upon the Sidicines, and afterwards upon the Campanians, they had no design to break with the Romans. But the Campanians being distressed, and having no other resource, threw themselves into the arms of the Romans, and submitted to their government, contrary to the expectation both of the Romans and Samnites: after which, the Romans were forced to defend them as their own Subjects, and to engage in a war which they could not decline with honour. For though they did not think themselves obliged to support them before, when they were only in common amity with them, against the Samnites, who were their allies, yet they thought it would be shameful not to protect them after they were become their Subjects; rightly judging that if they did not, it would discourage others who possibly might afterwards be inclinable to do the same, and acknowledge their dominion; which would be acting contrary to the great end they always had in view of extending their glory and Empire. An accident of the same nature occasioned the first Punic war; that is, the protection which the Romans gave to the people of Messina in Sicily: but the second was owing to another cause. For Hannibal the Carthaginian General fell upon the Saguntines in Spain, a people in alliance with the Romans; not so much out of any particular enmity he had to that State, as to force the Romans to engage in its defence; that so he might have a fair pretence to quarrel with them and invade Italy. This method of exciting a war is very common with such Princes and States as are desirous to keep up some appearance, at least, of honour and good faith; for when they want to make war upon another Prince with whom they have been long in friendship and alliance, they generally find some excuse to fall upon one State or other that is dependent upon him, and not directly upon him himself; well knowing that by so doing, he will either be provoked to resent it, and then a war ensues according to their wish; or if he is not, he must shew either great weakness or baseness in not defending those that are under his protection: in either of which cases he must lose his reputation, and facilitate the designs of his adversary.

We may observe therefore from what has been said above, concerning the Campanians and Carthaginians, how wars are excited in such cases sometimes by accident, sometimes by design: and further, what remedy a State may have recourse to that is not able to defend itself, and yet resolved not to submit to the enemy that invades it; which is to throw itself voluntarily into the arms of another that is powerful enough to afford it protection, as the Romans did to the Campanians, and Robert King of Naples to the Florentines; for though that Prince would not undertake to defend them against the incursions of Castruccio Castracani, whilst they were only upon the footing of common friendship with him, yet he took them under his protection when they submitted to him as their Sovereign*.

* This seems likely enough to be the case of the Dutch some time or other. Sir William Temple somewhere says, that when they were reduced almost to the brink of ruin by the French in the last century, they actually began to talk of putting themselves, as a circle, under the protection of the Empire.

C H A P. X.

That Money is not the Sinews of War, as it is commonly thought to be.

SINCE it is a much easier matter to begin than to conclude a war, a Prince who has any design of that kind in hand, ought not only maturely to consider his own strength, and to regulate his conduct according to it; but also to take great care that he does not impose upon himself in making that estimate, as he certainly will do if he altogether depends either upon his coffers (be they ever so full) or the situation of his dominions, or the affection of his Subjects; all which will signify nothing, if he has not a good and faithful army of his own. These things indeed may increase his strength, but none of them alone can make him strong: for without a powerful body of troops, what can money do, of what account is an advantageous situation, or the affection of Subjects, who will quickly desert him when they find he is not able to protect them? Every Mountain, every Lake or Sea, is passable, and every Fortrefs (however impregnable soever it may be thought) is accessible where there are not proper forces to defend it: and as for plenty of money and treasure, instead of securing a State, it often exposes it to great danger, and sometimes proves the cause of its ruin, by tempting others to invade it: so that nothing can be more false and absurd than the common saying, that money is the sinews of war. Quintus Curtius has however advanced this opinion, in the account which he gives of the war betwixt Antipater the Macedonian, and the King of Sparta; where he tells us that the latter was in so great want of money that he was forced to come to an engagement with the enemy upon such unequal terms, that he was utterly routed: whereas, if he could have avoided fighting but a few days, he would have received news of Alexander's death, and might have gained a victory without striking a stroke: but as he had no money, and was afraid his troops would desert for want of pay, he was under a necessity of trying the fortune of a battle; from whence the above-mentioned Author infers, that money is the sinews of war. This Maxim, though founded neither upon truth nor reason, is nevertheless in such general vogue at present, that several Princes (not very wise ones indeed) regulate their proceedings according to it; not considering that if money alone could support and defend them against all enemies and dangers, Darius would not formerly have been conquered by Alexander, nor the Greeks by the Romans, nor Duke Charles * by the Swiss a little while ago; nor would the Pope and the Florentines have met with any difficulty in reducing Francisco Maria, Nephew to Julius II. in the war of Urbino, which happened but the other day. Yet all the above mentioned Princes and States were fairly beaten by others who thought good troops and not money were the Sinews of war. Cræsus King of Lydia having entertained Solon, the Athenian Lawgiver, with many other splendid and magnificent gifts, at last took him to see his Treasury, which was full of silver and gold; and asking him, "if he did not think him exceeding powerful," Solon answered, "he did not look upon him to be at all the more powerful upon that account, because war was made with iron, and not with silver and gold; and if he should be invaded by any one that had more of the former, he would soon be stripped of the latter." Every body likewise knows that when a vast inundation of the Gauls poured themselves into Greece and other parts of Asia, after the death of Alexander the Great, and sent Ambassadors to conclude a treaty of agreement with the King of Macedon, that Prince was so imprudent to shew them the immense treasures he was possessed of, in order to display his great power, and to discourage them from attacking him : upon which, the Gauls were so impatient to enrich themselves with those spoils, that they declined any treaty with him, and immediately fell upon his dominions with such fury, that what he had principally confided in for his security and defence, proved the chief cause of his ruin. We might also mention the more recent example of the Venetians, who having accumulated a vast quantity of money, found so little benefit from it when they had most occasion for assistance, that being attacked not long ago by the Emperor and Lewis XII. of France, they presently lost all their dominions upon the Terra firma.

I say then, that good Soldiers; and not money (according to the vulgar opinion) are the Sinews of war : for money alone is not sufficient to provide a good army ; but a good army will always provide itself with money. If the Romans had been simple enough to depend upon money only in their wars, the treasure of the whole world would not have sufficed to carry them through their vast enterprizes abroad, and the difficulties they met with at home : but as they availed themselves chiefly of iron, they were so far from wanting gold, that people who stood in awe of their arms, brought it in abundance to their own doors : and if the above mentioned King of Sparta was necessitated by scarcity of money to risque a Battle, it was no more than what has happened to several other Commanders from different causes. For it has often chanced that an army has been so straitened for provisions, that it must either perish by hunger or come to an engagement : in which case the latter resolution has constantly been taken, as the most honourable, and in which a general may possibly be in some measure befriended by Fortune. Again, it frequently happens that when a Commander has intelligence that the enemy is going to be reinforced, he must either engage them immediately, or wait till their succours arrive, and then be obliged fight them at a very great disadvantage. Or lastly, it might fare with him as it did did with Afrubal, when he was surpris'd by Claudius Nero in the Country of the Piceni: in which circumstances, he must either retreat and be ruin'd without any possibility of retrieve, or hazard a Battle as Afrubal did at all events, though with little probability of success.

There are several causes we see which may force a General to fight contrary to his desire and intention; and if want of money sometimes happens to be one, it is not reasonable upon that account merely, to lay that money alone is the sinews of war, when so many other circumstances and wants may reduce him to the same necessity. I must therefore repeat what I said above, that money is not the sinews of war, but good forces: it is a necessary article to be sure, but yet an army will easily find means to surmount the want of it; for it is as impossible that good Soldiers should want money, as that money only should either make or procure good Soldiers. The truth of this is evident from a thousand passages in History, notwithstanding some one may object perhaps, that Pericles encouraged the Athenians to engage in a war against the united forces of all Peloponesus, by telling them they were so rich and powerful, they could not fail of success. The Athenians accordingly listened to his advice: but though their arms prospered for a while, they came off with the worst at last, and found to their cost that all their money and power were not a match for the valour and discipline of the Spartan Veterans. A remarkable passage in Livy might serve as a further proof of my position, if any was yet wanting: for proposing it as a question whether Alexander the Great would have been able to conquer the Romans if he had turned his arms upon Italy, he says, there are three things absolutely necessary to carry on a war with vigour, good Soldiers, good Commanders, and good fortune; and then having considered which side was the more powerful in those three points, he concludes his comparison without saying so much as one word concerning money. It is probable that the Campanians of whom we spake in the last chapter, computed their strength by their riches, and not by the goodness of their troops, when at the solicitation of the Sidicines, they took up arms in their favour against the Samnites: for after they had so done they were twice routed, and at last forced to submit and become tributary to the Romans, in order to save themselves from utter ruin and slavery.

C H A P. XI.

That it is imprudent to enter into an Alliance with a Prince, whose Reputation is greater than his Strength.

LIVY has well expressed the error of the Sidicines in trusting to the assistance of the Campanians, and that of the Campanians in thinking themselves able to defend them, “Campani magis nomen in auxilium Sidicinatorum, says he, quam vires ad præsidium attulerunt. The Campanians brought more reputation than strength to the relief of the Sidicines.” From whence we may observe that Alliances contracted with Princes who are either at too great a distance, or too weak, or embarrassed in their own affairs, are rather honourable than safe to those that confide in them. Of this we have an example in the case of the Florentines, when they were invaded in the year 1479 by the Pope and the King of Naples: for though they were at that time in alliance with the King of France, it was rather a credit than any material service to them: and the very same that happened to the Florentines and Campanians, would happen to any other Italian State that should trust to the Emperor for succour upon any emergency. The Campanians therefore were guilty of a great error, in thinking their strength more considerable than it really was: but such is the folly of mankind, that they often undertake to protect others, when they are not able to defend themselves: as the Tarentines likewise did, who, when the Roman Roman army had taken the field against the Samnites, sent Ambassadors to acquaint the Roman General it was their pleasure there should a peace betwixt the two States, and that they would turn their arms against which side soever should refuse their mediation. But that General laughing at the impertinence of the Embassy, commanded a charge to be sounded immediately in the presence of the Ambassadors, and led on his troops to engage the enemy, shewing them by deeds and not by words, what sort of answer he thought they deserved. Having now pointed out some errors which States fall into in defending others, I shall say something in the next chapter, concerning the measures they ought to pursue for their own defence.

C H A P. XII.

Whether, upon the expectation of a war, it is better to invade the Enemy, or to sustain an Invasion.

I HAVE heard it debated sometimes amongst able and experienced Commanders, whether (when one Prince has declared war against another, and they are both nearly equal in strength) it is better for him that has received such a declaration, to wait till he is attacked, or to be beforehand with the enemy and carry the war into his country. And indeed there is much to be said in support of both opinions. Those that are for carrying the war into the Enemy's country, quote the advice which Cræsus gave Cyrus, when he arrived upon the confines of the Messagetæ with a design to make war upon them; and Thomyris their Queen sent to let him know, "that if he pleased he might enter her dominions, and she would be ready with her forces to receive him there; or if he did not like that, she would advance to attack him where he then was." Upon which, a Council being called; Cræsus, in opposition to all the rest of the Counsellors, lors, advised him to march directly against her; for if he should defeat her at a distance from home, he must not in that case hope to make himself Master of her kingdom, because she would have time to recruit her broken forces and make fresh head against him there: but if he beat her in her own territories, they must certainly fall into his hands; since he might pursue his victory in such a manner as to prevent her from ever repairing the loss. The Advocates on this side likewise alledge the counsel that Hannibal gave Antiochus, when that Prince had resolved to engage in a war with the Romans, assuring him, that if they ever could be beaten it must be in Italy; because there an Invader might avail himself of their own arms, their own money, and their own allies; but if he entered the lists with them any where else, and suffered them to continue unmolested in Italy, he would leave them a source of supplies that would never fail them upon any occasion whatsoever; and concluded with telling him, that he might sooner dispossess them of Rome itself, than of any other City, and of Italy more easily than any other Province in their Empire*. The conduct of Agathocles the Sicilian, is also instanced upon this occasion, who being at war with the Carthaginians, and not able to cope with them at home, transported an army into Africa, where he succeeded so well, that he forced them to sue for peace: and lastly, that of Scipio, who, to save Italy, attacked the same people in their own country.

Those that take the other side of the question, maintain, on the contrary, that it is the best way to draw the enemy to a distance from his own dominions: in support of which, they adduce the example of the Athenians, who were always victorious when the seat of war lay in their own country, but soon lost their liberties after they removed it into Sicily. They likewise avail themselves of the story of Antæus the Egyptian, who being invaded by Hercules, King of Libya, was invincible whilst he opposed him at home; but being drawn abroad by the artifice of his enemy, he lost both his Kingdom and his life together. From hence arose the Fable of Antæus, who being born of the earth, received fresh vigour from his mother every time he was thrown down in the conflict he had with Hercules; but the latter being aware of that at last, lifted him up from the ground, and squeezed him to death betwixt his arms. As to modern instances, say they, every one knows, that Ferdinand, King of Naples, who was esteemed a very wise Prince, being informed about two years before he died, that Charles the VIIIth of France designed to invade his dominions, made all necessary dispositions to receive him there: but falling sick, he advised his son Alphonso upon his death-bed, to wait the arrival of the French in his own Kingdom, and not be tempted to let his forces go out of it upon any account whatsoever. The Son, however, paying no regard to this advice, sent an army into Romagna, which being ruined there without striking a stroke, his Kingdom fell a Sacrifice to the French.

But there are other arguments besides these, which might be urged on each side. For, it may be said in favour of the Invader, that he shews more resolution than he that stays till he is attacked at home; which certainly must inspire his forces with great confidence: that he deprives the enemy of many succours and advantages, which he might otherwise make use of to his prejudice; for when his country is laid waste, and his subjects so plundered and harrassed, that he cannot tell how to exact any fresh supplies, all resources are cut off, the Magazines are exhausted, and the fountain being dried up (as Hannibal said) the streams must of course soon fail, so that he will not be able to support the war for want of provisions: and lastly, that the Invaders being in an enemy's country, and under a necessity of fighting for their daily sustenance, that necessity, (if there were no other motives) will make them not only resolute and courageous, but desperate, as we have said elsewhere. On the other hand it may be said, that he who is invaded has these advantages: in the first place, he has it in his power to distress the enemy greatly in point of provisions, and many other things without which an army cannot subsist: in the next, he may often frustrate his designs by being so much better acquainted with the nature of the country: he may likewise bring more forces into the field, as he will be able to collect all that he has into one body there if he pleases, though he could not transport them all into another country; and that if he should chance to lose a battle, he may soon repair the loss and face his enemy again, as many of his troops will find means to escape to places of safety not far off, and other recruits may presently be drawn together from the neighbouring towns: so that in this case you venture but part of your fortune, upon the whole of your force: whereas in the other, you hazard your whole fortune upon part of your strength only. Some have suffered an enemy not only to advance two or three days march into their country, but to take several towns, that so when their army was weakened by leaving garrisons in them all, they might be engaged with more probability of success.

But to speak my own opinion of the matter, I think this distinction ought to be made. Your people are either warlike and well disciplin'd, as the Romans were formerly and the Swiss are at present; or they are otherwise, like the Carthaginians of old, and the French and Italians in these times. In the latter case endeavour by all means to keep an enemy at a distance: because your strength consisting chiefly in your revenues, and not in the confidence you have in your Subjects, whenever your revenues are interrupted or cut off, you are certainly undone: and nothing contributes more speedily and effectually to this, than a war in your own country. In proof of this, we might produce the example of the Carthaginians, who were strong enough to cope with the Romans whilst their revenues continued entire and undisturbed ; but when they were attacked at home, they could not make head even against Agathocles. The Florentines, likewise, though they could not secure themselves against Castruccio Castracani, Lord of Lucca, when he carried the war into their country, by any other means than becoming subject to Robert, King of Naples ; yet had courage enough after Castruccio was dead, to attack the Duke of Milan in his own dominions, with a design to have deprived him of them ; so courageous were they when they made war abroad, and so pusillanimous when it was brought to their own doors. But if your country is in a good posture of defence, and your people warlike and well armed, like the Romans in former times, and the Swiss at this day, the nearer an enemy approaches, the harder he must find it to subdue you : for in such a case, you will be able to raise more forces to defend yourself, than you possibly could have done to invade others. The advice therefore which Hannibal gave Antiochus upon the like occasion is not much to be regarded, as it proceeded from resentment and self-interest : for if the Romans had received three such defeats in Gaul, and in so short a time as they did from Hannibal in Italy, without doubt they would have been utterly ruined ; since they could neither have availed themselves of the remainder of their forces, nor had an opportunity of repairing their losses, nor of exerting their utmost strength and resources, as they did at home. For we do not find that they ever sent out an army that consisted of above fifty thousand men to conquer any State abroad ; but when they were invaded by the Gauls after the conclusion of the first Punic war, the forces they raised amounted to eighteen hundred thousand : nor could they have beaten the same people afterwards whilst they remained in Lombardy, as they did when they had advanced into Tuscany : because they would not have been able to oppose them with the same force or the same advantages at such a distance.

distance *. The Cimbri gave the Romans such an overthrow in Germany, that they never could make head against them in that country afterwards : but when they penetrated into Italy, where the Romans were enabled to employ their whole force against them, they were soon vanquished and driven back again. The Swiss may easily be conquered abroad, because they cannot send an army of above thirty or forty thousand men at most into a foreign country ; but it is no easy matter to get the better of them at home, where they can assemble at least an hundred thousand effective men. I say again therefore, that a Prince whose country is in a good posture of defence, and his subjects well armed and inured to war, should always receive a powerful and dangerous enemy at home ; and never stir out of his own dominions to meet him. But if his country is open, and his subjects unacquainted with arms, let him endeavour by all means to keep his enemy as far off as he possibly can. And thus by acting according to these circumstances, he will be best able to defend himself in either case.

That men more frequently advance themselves by guile and artifice than by force.

IT very seldom or never happens that men of low condition advance themselves to any considerable height of grandeur, without having recourse both to fraud and violence ; unless they succeed to it by donation, or right of inheritance. Nor do I know of any instance in which violence alone has been sufficient for that purpose ; though many might be enumerated wherein it has been effected solely by fraud and deceit, as will plainly appear to any one that reads the lives of Philip of Macedon, Agathocles the Sicilian, and others like them, who raised themselves from a private, or rather base and abject condition, to rule over great Kingdoms and Empires. Xenophon in the life of Cyrus shews the necessity of artifice; for the first expedition which that Prince is there supposed to make against the King of Armenia is full of wiles, and the success of it entirely owing to fraud and cunning without any mixture of force. From whence one may reasonably conclude that he thinks it necessary for a Prince who would effect great things, that he should learn to deceive. Besides which, he represents him as deceiving Cyaxares, King of Media, his Uncle by the mother's side, in many instances; and insinuates that without so doing, he never could have attained to that height of greatness which he afterwards did *. In short, I am firmly persuaded that

* Upon this passage Daeres says, "because this whole chapter tends to shew how necessary guile is for a Prince's advantage, and it is again recommended by precept in Machiavel's treatise of a Prince, I cannot but take notice that here he is blameable. "Dolus, an virtus, quis in hoste requirat?" is not meant "de dolo malo," supposed by Machiavel in his Prince, chap. xix. where he persuades a Prince to use the Lyon's force and the Foxe's craft. To be able in all military stratagems and sleights to circumvent an enemy is one of the most requisite and notable parts in a commander; provided there be no breach of faith nor oath violated: for as Tully says, "est jus jurandum affirmatio religiosa: quod autem affirmare, quasi Deo teste, promiseris, id tenendum est." It is much unworthy of a Prince (says a worthy late author) to falsify his word either to an enemy or subject; and the more villanie is it to use covert fraud than open violence, because the enemy lyes more open by giving credit to his faith; "& fraus distringit, non dissolvit, perjurium." And with how much more solemnity Princes oaths are ordinarily taken, methinks so much the more sincerity ought they to carry with them, having drawn together many eyes and ears as witnesses of their truth or falshood. I shall conclude then with Tacitus in the fourth of his Annals. "Cæteris mortalibus in eo stant consilia, quod sibi conducere putant; principum diversa fors est, quibus præcipua rerum ad famam dirigenda." Let us hear honest Montaigne upon this matter. "As to this virtue of hypocrisy and dissimulation, which is now so much in request, (says he, book II, chap. xvii. of his Essays, I mortally hate it; and of all vices find none that shews so much baseness and meanness of Spirit. 'Tis a cowardly and servile humour for a man to hide and disguise himself under a vizard, and not dare to shew himself what he is. By this our followers are trained up to treachery; for being brought up to speak what is not true, they make no conscience of a lye. A generous heart ought not to give the lye to its own thoughts, but will make itself seen within, where all is good, or at least humane. Aristotle reputes it

no man of mean condition ever arrived at any remarkable degree of power and dominion merely by open and downright force; but that many have by fraud

the office of Magnanimity, openly and professedly to love and hate, to judge and speak with all freedom; and not to value the approbation or dislike of others at the expence of truth. Apollonius said it was for slaves to lie, and freemen to speak truth. It is the chief and fundamental part of virtue; we must love it for its own sake: he that speaks the truth because he is otherwise obliged so to do, and because he serves, and that is not afraid to lie, when it signifies nothing to any body, is not sufficiently true. My Soul naturally abominates lying, and hates the very thought of it: I have an inward bashfulness and smart remorse if ever a lie escapes me, as sometimes it does, when I am surprized and hurried by occasions that allow me no premeditation. A man must not always tell all, for that would be folly; but what a man says should be what he thinks, otherwise it is knavery. I do not know what advantage men pretend to by eternally counterfeiting and dissembling, except it is never to be believed, even when they speak truth. This may pass once or twice perhaps upon men; but to profess concealing their thoughts, and to boast, as some of our Princes have done, "that they would burn their shirts if they thought they knew their true intentions, (which was a saying of Metellus of Macedon) and that he who knows not how to dissemble, knows not how to rule;" is giving warning to all who have any thing to do with them, that whatever they say is nothing but lies and deceit. "Quo quis veritior & callidior est (says Tully) hoc invidiosior & suspectior, detractâ opinione probitatis." It would be great simplicity in any one to confide either in the countenance or word of a man, that has put on a resolution to be always another thing without than he is within, as Tiberius did: and I cannot conceive what interest such can have in their conversation with men, seeing they produce nothing that is admitted for truth; whoever is disloyal to truth, is the same to falsehood also.—Those of our times, who have considered, in the establishment of the Duty of a Prince, the welfare of his affairs only, and have preferred that to the care of his faith and conscience, might say something to a Prince, whose affairs Fortune had put into such a posture that he might for ever establish them by only once breaking his word. But it will not go so: they often come again to the same market, they make more than one peace, and enter into more than one treaty in their lives. Gain tempts them to the first breach of faith, and almost always presents itself, as in favour of all other evil actions: Sacrileges, murders, rebellions, and treasons, are undertaken for some kind of advantage; but the first gain has such consequences as throw this Prince out of all correspondence and negociation by this example of his perfidy. Soliman of the Ottoman race (a race not very careful in keeping their promises and articles) when his army made a descent on Otranto in my infancy, being informed that Mercurino de Gratinare and the inhabitants of Castro were detained prisoners, after having surrendered the place, contrary to the articles of capitulation with his forces, sent an order to have them set at liberty, saying, "that as he had other great enterprizes in hand in those parts, this breach of faith, though it carried a shew of present utility, would afterwards bring him into disrepute, and occasion a diffidence in his word that might be of infinite prejudice to his affairs."

alone; as Giovanni Galeazzo in particular, who by that means only deprived his Uncle Bernabo of the State of Milan*. Now if Princes are obliged to act in this manner in order to found or increase their Empire, Republics are under an equal necessity of doing the same, till they are become powerful enough to trust to their strength: and as Rome took all other means (either by good fortune or design) that were necessary to establish its future grandeur; so it did not fail to avail itself of this also; nor was it possible to have proceeded more craftily than it did in taking the method we have mentioned before, namely, of cajoling the Latins and other neighbouring States into such a confederacy as insensibly made them its Subjects instead of Allies. For in the first place, it made use of their arms to conquer the other neighbouring powers, and had the chief share of honour by assuming the name of Principal in that confederacy: and having thus subdued some of them, it afterwards employed its own strength, and the authority which it had thereby acquired to reduce all the others: for the Latins were not aware, that in fact they themselves were no better than Slaves, till they had seen the Samnites twice defeated and forced to accept of terms from the Romans. These Victories which gained the Romans great reputation amongst the States that were further off and rather admired their valour than felt the weight of it, likewise excited the envy and jealousy of those that were nearer home and more immediately sensible of the effects of their arms, particularly the Latins: and so great was this apprehension, that not only the Latins themselves, but the Colonies which the Romans had sent into Latium, and the Campanians, who not long before had taken shelter under the protection of Rome, conspired against them. In consequence of which, the Latins provoked them to a war, (in the manner which I have said before is often practised upon those occasions) not by falling directly upon the

Romans themselves, but by supporting the Sidicines against the Samnites, who had made war upon them, by permission from the Romans. Nor was there any other reason for this conspiracy, but because the confederates began to be aware how much they had been imposed upon under the specious name of Allies: accordingly Livy makes Annius Setinus, a Latin Prætor, say in a speech which he made in their Council: “Nān si etiam nunc sub umbrâ æqui fœderis, servitutem pati possumus, quid obest quin proditis Sidicinis, non Romanorum Solum, sed Samnitium dictis pareamus? For if we can even now endure servitude, under the pretence of an equal confederacy; might we not as well give up the Sidicines, and submit not only to the Romans, but to the Samnites also?”

We see then, that even the Romans, in the infancy of their State, availed themselves of that artifice and deceit to extend their dominion, which every one must of necessity have recourse to, that is ambitious of raising himself from a low estate to any considerable height of grandeur: and the more cunningly it is disguised and concealed, the less dishonourable it will seem, as appears from the example of that people.

C H A P. XIV.

That people are often mistaken, who think to work upon the proud and arrogant by moderation and courtesy.

IT frequently happens that mildness and condescension, instead of being of advantage, are of great disservice to people; especially when those that have conceived any prejudice against them, either out of envy or any other motive, are of a haughty and insolent disposition: of which we have a remarkable proof in what Livy tells us concerning the occasion of the war betwixt the Romans and the Latins. For the Samnites complaining to the Romans that the Latins had invaded them, the Romans, being unwilling to exasperate the latter still more, did not offer to put a stop to their hostilities : which behaviour however was so far from soothing the jealousy of the Latins, that it only served to encourage them, and made them declare their enmity the sooner, as appears from the same speech of the above-mentioned Anniius Setinus, in which he further tells the Council : “ Tentastis patientiam negando militem. Quis dubitat exarsisse eos? Pertulerunt tamen hunc dolorem. Exercitus nos parere adversus Samnites foederatos suos audierunt, nec moverunt se ab urbe. Unde hæc illis modestia, nisi a conscientia virium & nostrarum & suarum? You have already seen how much they will bear, by refusing to supply them with your contingent of forces. There is no doubt but they were sufficiently nettled at it; yet they swallowed the affront. They knew of our preparations against their allies the Samnites : yet they never stirred a foot to support them. Whence proceeds this wonderful moderation think you, but from a consciousness of their own weakness and our strength?” It appears plainly then, from this example, how much this moderation in the Romans increased the arrogance of the Latins.

A Prince therefore ought never to descend from his dignity, nor voluntarily give up any point, (if he has a mind to support his reputation) except when he either knows or thinks he is able to maintain it. For when a prince cannot give up a thing with a good grace and in an honourable manner, it is almost always better to suffer it to be extorted by force, than tamely submit to the loss, without any struggle to preserve it; because if he parts with it in that pusillanimous manner, he does it to prevent a war; in which the odds are great that his expectation is disappointed, for those to whom he has so meanly submitted, perceiving his weakness and apprehensions, will be so far from being satisfied with his concession, that they will constantly be making fresh demands, and grow bolder and more unreasonable every time, as they see he is the less to be feared : besides which, he will find his his friends cooler and more backward in assisting him, as they must naturally be induced to think he is either very weak or very dastardly. But if, on the contrary, he immediately begins to raise forces, and take all other necessary measures to face the enemy, as soon as he discovers his designs, they will not be so forward to attack him, even though they find him inferior to them: and those friends will not only honour him for it, but come in with alacrity to his assistance, when they see him so resolute in his defence, who would not have made the least effort to succour him if he had been wanting to himself. This is to be understood however, when he has but one enemy to deal with: but if he should chance to have several upon his hands at the same time, it will always be the best way to give up something to one of them; by which he may probably either make him his friend, even after war is commenced, or at least detach him from the rest that are confederated against him.

C H A P. XV.

That weak States are generally doubtful in their resolutions; and that slow determinations are always pernicious.

FROM these causes and beginnings of the war betwixt the Latins and the Romans, we may observe, that in all consultations it is the best way to come to some speedy resolution in the matter deliberated upon, and to avoid suspense and delay as much as possible. According to which maxim the Latins proceeded in the Council they held when they designed to revolt from the Romans. For the latter suspecting their fidelity, and being desirous, not only to satisfy themselves, but to regain that people without coming to an open rupture, gave them to understand that they wished they would send eight Deputies to Rome, as they wanted to consult with them upon certain affairs of importance. In consequence of this message, the Latins being conscious to themselves, that they had done several things that must have disgusted the Romans, presently called a Council to consider who should be sent to Rome, and what they should say upon that occasion, when they came thither. Whilst the matter therefore was in debate, the aforementioned Prætor Annius Setinus told the Council, “ Ad summam rerum nostrarum pertinere arbitrator, ut cogitetis magis, quid agendum nobis, quam quid loquendum sit: facile enim erit explicatis conciliis, accommodare rebus verba: That he thought it highly concerned their welfare, to consider what was to be done, rather than what was to be said: for when once they were come to any resolution, it would be an easy matter to accommodate their words to their actions:” a piece of advice that certainly has much truth and reason in it, and ought to be well remembered by all Princes and Commonwealths. For whilst people are doubtful and uncertain what to do, they must likewise be at a loss what to say for their conduct in such cases: but when they have determined how to act, there is no difficulty in the matter. This I thought fit to inculcate the more earnestly, because I myself have often known an irresolute manner of proceeding, not only very prejudicial to the public affairs, but also very scandalous and disgraceful to our own Commonwealth in particular: and indeed there will always be great doubts and uncertainty whenever things of a nice and delicate nature, and in which the utmost resolution is required, come to be discussed by a Council composed of weak and pusillanimous members.

Delays and tardy deliberations are likewise no less prejudicial; especially when a friend or Ally is to be succoured: for they hurt one’s self, and do no body else any good. Such deliberations proceed from the want either of courage or strength, or the malevolence of some of the Counsellors, who, in order to gratify their own private passions, chuse rather to ruin the State, than not accomplish some favourite point:

for which purpose, they not only oppose and thwart the necessary measures that are proposed, but use all other means to embarrass and defeat them: whereas good Citizens never endeavour to traverse such deliberations, especially in affairs where dispatch is requisite, even though the cry of the populace should be against them. After the death of Hieronymus, the Tyrant of Syracuse, a sharp war being carried on betwixt the Romans and Carthaginians, the Syracusans were divided amongst themselves, whether they should take part with the former or the latter: and these divisions grew to such a height, that all public business was at a stand, and nothing could be determined upon; till Apollonides, one of the principal Citizens, represented to them in a grave and weighty speech, that though neither those that were inclined to adhere to the Romans, nor those that thought it better to side with the Carthaginians, were to be blamed; yet, their slow and irresolute manner of proceeding was very imprudent, and would certainly be the ruin of their State: but that if they would come to a resolution, which side soever they took, some good or other might be expected from it. Indeed Livy could not have given us a more remarkable document of the evils that attend such a tardy and undetermined manner of deliberating; which he likewise confirms by the example of the Latins, whose assistance being demanded by the Lavinians against the Romans, was so long deferred by their tedious deliberations, whether they should grant them any or not, that at last when they had resolved upon it, and their succours were just got out of the gates of the City, they received news that their Confederates were routed: which gave Milonius their Prætor occasion to say, “It is well if the Romans do not make us pay dear for this short march.” For if they could speedily have resolved either to assist the Lavinians, or not to assist them; in the latter case, they would not have drawn upon themselves the resentment of the Romans; and in the former, their Allies might probably have been victorious : but, as they could not determine to do either, they were sure to smart for it, which side soever got the better, as indeed they did.

If the Florentines had duly considered this matter, they would not have suffered so much as they did when Charles XII. of France marched into Italy, against Lewis Sforza, Duke of Milan : for, when he had partly resolved upon that Expedition, he would have entered into a Treaty with the Florentine Ambassadors, who were then at his Court : the terms of which were, that provided their Republic would stand neuter in that quarrel, he would take them into his protection, and support them against all enemies. For the ratification of this Treaty a month was allowed : but being imprudently deferred, by the management of some who favoured the Duke's interest, till the King had succeeded in his designs, and the Florentines then offering to ratify it, his majesty paid no regard to them, as he saw it proceeded from fear, and not from any good will or friendship to him. This delay cost the Florentines a very large sum of money, and brought them almost to the brink of ruin ; as the same manner of proceeding did afterwards upon another occasion. Moreover this behaviour was the more weak and dangerous, as it was of no service to the Duke, who, if he had got the better of the French, would have handled them in a still rougher manner than the King did. Now, though I have said something in a former discourse, concerning the evils that are incident to Commonwealths from such slow and irresolute deliberations ; yet as fresh matter occurred, I thought it might not be amiss to make this addition to it ; especially as it is a Subject that ought to be well considered by such Republics as that of Florence *.

* Compare these two last Chapters with Chap. xxxviii. Book I.

C H A P. XVI.

How much our Military Discipline in these times differs from that of the Ancients.

THE most important battle the Romans ever fought with any other nation, was that in which they defeated the Latins, in the Consulship of Manlius Torquatus and Decius: for as it is certain, that the Latins lost their liberty by that overthrow; so the Romans must inevitably have become subject to them, if they had not gained the victory. Livy himself was of this opinion: for he tells us, that the two armies were equal in discipline, valour, resolution, and numbers; and that the only difference betwixt them was, that the Romans had the more determined and courageous Generals. In this battle, there were two circumstances very remarkable; of which there was no example before, and but very few since: for one of the Consuls sacrificed himself, in order to keep his Soldiers firm in their obedience and discipline; and the other put his own Son to death for disobeying his orders*. The equality which Livy says was betwixt these two armies, was occasioned by the Soldiers in both having long served together under the same colours, speaking the same tongue, observing the same discipline, and fighting with the same arms: for, in their order of battle they both followed one method, and there was no difference in the titles of their respective officers, or the names by which the several divisions of their armies were called. Since both sides therefore were thus equal in courage and strength, there was a necessity for the exertion of some great and extraordinary quality on one side, in order to inspire the Soldiers with such a degree of firmness and obstinacy, as might give it a superiority over the other; to which kind of obstinacy, a victory is generally owing: for whilst that lasts they will never turn their backs. And as it was so necessary to encourage and keep up this resolution in the breasts of the Romans, to a pitch beyond that of the Latins, it happened partly through chance, and partly through the bravery and rigour of the Consuls, that Torquatus put his son to death, and Decius sacrificed himself.

To give us a clearer notion of the equality betwixt these two armies, Livy describes the order which the Romans observed in drawing up their forces, and in time of battle: but as he has done it at large, I shall only select what seems most remarkable; and which, if it had been imitated by the Generals of these times, would have prevented much confusion and many disorders in their armies and engagements. According to him, there were three grand Divisions or Lines in their Armies; the first consisted of Hastati or Pikemen; the second, of the Principes; and the third, of the Triarii; each of which had its cavalry. When they set their Battle in array, they placed the Hastati in the first line, the Principes in the second, behind the Hastati, and the Triarii in the third. On the right and left of each of these lines, was posted a body of Horse; which from their form and station were called Alæ, because they resembled Wings. The Hastati, or first line, were drawn up very close together, the better to sustain the first shock of the enemy. The second line, consisting of the Principes, who were not to engage so immediately, but rather to support the front line if it was broken or gave way, was not drawn up so close, but had a small interval betwixt every man, that so it might receive the Hastati into those spaces without being put into disorder, if they should chance to be so hard pressed by the enemy as to be obliged to fall back. The Triarii, or third line, were drawn up with still larger intervals, in order to receive the two other lines upon occasion. Being formed in this manner, the Hastati began the attack, and if they were repulsed, they retired into the void void spaces left for them by the Principes, and jointly renewed the battle; but if the second line thus filled up, likewise happened to be thrown into confusion, the men fell back into the intervals amongst the Triarii, and they all advanced together once more to the fight. But as this was their last effort (because there was no other support or reserve left) if they chanced to be worsted again, the battle was lost. And, as matters were thought to be in a desperate situation, whenever the Triarii came to be engaged, the Proverb “res reducta est ad Triarios,” took its rise from hence, i. e. “the last stake is upon the board, or, we are reduced to the utmost extremity*.”

Now, as the Generals of our times have utterly laid aside all other parts of ancient military discipline, this method of drawing up armies is at present likewise altogether neglected, and become obsolete; though indeed it is an excellent one, and worthy of the strictest attention: for a body of forces that is formed in this manner, may sustain three vigorous attacks, and must be beaten three different times before the day is lost: whereas, another that can stand but one shock (which is the case of all Christian armies at this day) is liable to be soon routed; since every little disorder, or any common degree of impetuosity in the first onset, is sufficient to gain a victory over it. The reason that our armies cannot rally and return to the charge so often as the Roman troops used to do, is because the method of receiving one line into another is now entirely lost; for, according to the present method of ranging an army in order of battle, the Generals form their lines close upon the back of each other, and extend them to so great a length, that they cannot possibly be of any considerable depth, which must make them very weak: or, if they draw them up deeper, after the manner of the Romans, in order to strengthen them, yet, if the first line is broken, it cannot be received into the second, and consequently when it falls back upon it, must occasion great confusion and disorder; in which case, the first line can neither retreat, nor the second advance, if it should be necessary: so that the first recoiling upon the second, and both upon the third, they become so embarrassed and entangled one amongst another, that the whole army must presently be ruined. At the battle of Ravenna, where Monsieur de Foix, the French General, was killed, and which was very well fought (considering the discipline of the times) the French and Spanish armies were drawn up in the manner just now described; that is, they both had their lines extended to a great length, and close together: so that they could not be very deep, nor make any more than one front to the enemy. And this they always do in large plains, like those about Ravenna: for, as they are sensible of the disorder they must fall into, if they should be obliged to retreat, by one line falling back upon another, they endeavour to avoid that danger as much as possible, by making a large front: but when the country is full of enclosures, and there is not room enough for that; if they should happen to fall into confusion, they know of no remedy for it. In the same manner, they march through an enemy's country, whether it be to plunder, or forage, or upon any other occasion. Thus, at the battle of St. Regolo, betwixt the Florentines and the Pisans, in the war which was occasioned by the defection of the latter from the former, upon the arrival of Charles VIII. in Italy, the defeat of the Florentines was entirely owing to their own Cavalry, which, being posted in the front, was first charged by the enemy, and happening to be broke, fell back upon the Infantry, and threw them into such disorder, that they all ran away together: and I have often heard Criaco del Borgo, an old Officer in the Florentine Infantry, say, that he had never seen them defeated, but when they had been first disordered by their own Horse. The Swifs, who excel all other nations at present in the art of war, always take particular care, when they

serve in the French armies, to be posted in the flanks, that their Cavalry, if it should chance to be hard pressed, may not recoil upon them.

Now though these things seem not only very easy to be understood, but also to be put in practice; yet there is not so much as one General in our times, that has hitherto endeavoured either to revive the ancient discipline, or correct the modern: and, notwithstanding they have sometimes drawn up their armies in three lines, the first of which, they call the Van-guard; the second, the Main-battle; and the third, the Rear-guard; yet it has been for no other purpose, but for the greater conveniency of encamping: but when they come to action, they almost always employ them all three together in one attack, as I said before. And since many, to excuse their ignorance, pretend that there are several articles in the ancient military discipline, which the use of artillery will not allow them to practise in these times, I shall discuss that point in the next chapter, and shew what weight there is in such allegations.

C H A P. XVII.

What account is to be made of Artillery at present: and whether the opinion which the Generality have conceived of it is justly founded.

WHEN I consider how many pitched battles the Romans fought, I cannot help reflecting at the same time upon a general received opinion, which is, that if there had been artillery in those times, the Romans could not have over-run Provinces, made so many people tributary, nor have performed several other great exploits so easily as they did; that since it came into use, men have not shewn themselves so bold and intrepid as they did formerly; and lastly, that armies are now much more backward in coming to a close engagement, and cannot possibly observe the ancient cient discipline : so that it seems as if the whole business of war would in time be dispatched by artillery only. As I apprehend therefore, that it may not be foreign to our purpose, to examine whether these opinions are founded upon reason, or not ; whether the use of artillery has added to, or diminished the strength of armies ; and whether it has given Generals more or less opportunities of distinguishing their courage ; I shall begin with the first article, viz. that the Roman arms could not have made so great a progress, if the use of artillery had then been known.

In answer to this, I say, that war is either offensive or defensive : so that we must examine in the first place, in which of these two kinds of war artillery is the most effectual : and though there is much to be urged on both sides ; yet, I am of opinion, that it does much more mischief to those that act upon the defensive, than the offensive. For the former are generally besieged, either in some town or fortified camp : if it be in a town, it must either be in a small one (like most fortresses) or a large one. In the former case, the besieged are undone : for such is the force of artillery, that it will beat down the thickest wall in a few days : so that, if those within have neither any place of security to retire to, nor room to throw up ditches or ramparts to defend themselves, the enemy of course must enter the breach. Nor will their artillery save them : for it is now received as a general maxim, that when a breach is furiously stormed by a great number of men at once, it cannot be long defended by artillery. The assaults of the Ultramon-tanes, in particular, are so fierce, that it is not possible to sustain them : whereas those of the Italians, who lead up their men by few at a time, and in detached parties, are easily repelled : but this may more properly be called Skirmishing, than any thing else, and those that approach a breach in so cool a manner, where there is any artillery planted, are all sure to be knocked on the head ; because, in this case, it must do great execution : whilst others who rush impetu-ously ously into the breach in great numbers at the same time, and push each other forwards, are sure to succeed in spite of the artillery, except there are any ditches, or other works within to impede them: for though some of them must be killed, there will be enough left to carry the place. The truth of this has been sufficiently experienced at the siege of many towns, which the Ultramontanes have taken in Italy, particularly at that of Brescia: for that town having revolted from the French to the Venetians, and the Citadel only holding out for them, the Venetians, in order to secure themselves from any sallies that might be made from thence, fortified the street that leads from the Citadel down into the town, planting as many cannon as they possibly could, both in the front and flanks, and every other part of it where there was any room; but Monsieur de Foix made so little account of them, when he arrived there with a body of horse to relieve the Citadel, that he ordered his men to dismount, and pushing through this street, presently made himself master of the whole town, without sustaining any considerable loss. So that those who are to defend a small town after a breach is made, and have neither any place of security to retire into, nor ditches or ramparts to obstruct the enemy, but are reduced to depend upon their artillery alone, must soon be obliged to surrender.

If the town to be defended is a large one, and the besieged have all the conveniencies just now mentioned to trust to, artillery will still be of much more service to the besiegers than to them. For, in the first place, if you expect to do any material execution, your Guns must be planted upon some eminence that is elevated above the level of the town; otherwise, any little breast-work which the enemy may throw up will be sufficient to cover them from your fire: so that being forced to mount your cannon, perhaps upon platforms, at the top of the walls, or some other such elevated place, you must labour under two difficulties; in the first place, you cannot make use of ſuch heavy pieces as the enemy may, becauſe the ſpace there will be too ſtrait to manage them, as they ought to be managed: and in the next, if that was poſſible to be done, yet you could not make parapets there ſtrong enough to ſecure them; both which the beſiegers may eaſily do, as they are upon a plain field, and have both room and materials ſufficient for both thoſe purpoſes. It is hardly poſſible therefore, for the beſieged to keep their cannon upon ſuch an elevation, if the enemy has many and heavy pieces; and, if they plant them on a flat; they will be of little or no ſervice, as I ſhewed before: ſo that after all, the place muſt be maintained as in former times, chiefly by dint of ſmall arms and the courage of the Soldier. Now, though ſmall arms are of ſome ſervice to the beſieged, yet, not of ſo much as to balance the miſchief done by the enemy's artillery, which batter down their walls into the ditches in ſuch a manner, that when the aſſault is given, the beſieged ſuffer more now-a-days, than they did formerly; for their walls being levelled, and their ditches filled up, they are no longer any ſecurity to them, as they were before the uſe of cannon was known: and therefore; as I ſaid above, artillery is of much greater ſervice to thoſe that beſiege towns, than to thoſe that are beſieged.

As to the third caſe, that is, when you are not in any town, but in an encampment which you have ſtrongly fortified, in order to avoid fighting an enemy, except you can do it with great advantage: I affirm, that even in that ſituation, you have no better means to ſecure you from being forced to an engagement, than the ancients had; and that ſometimes you will find yourſelf in worſe circumſtances than they ever did; which is owing to the uſe of artillery. For, if a numerous army ſhould attack you with any advantage of ground (which probably ſome neighbouring eminence may give them) or come upon you before you have finiſhed your entrenchments, and ſufficiently covered yourſelf, they will preſently diſlodge you, and oblige you to fight them whether you would or not : as it happened to the Spaniards at the battle of Ravenna, who having fortified themselves upon the banks of the Ronco, in some works which they had not raised high enough, and being fired upon by the French from a hill above them, were forced to march out of their entrenchments and come to action. But supposing (as it must often happen) that the place which you have made choice of for your encampment should command the whole country round about it, and that you have fortified yourself in such a manner that the enemy, upon reconnoitring your camp, does not think proper to attack it ; they will then have recourse to such methods of annoyance as were practised of old, when an army was so posted, that it could not otherwise be forced to decamp : that is, they will scour the adjacent country, take and plunder your towns, and cut off your convoys, till at last you will be under a necessity of coming to a battle, in which (as I shall shew presently) the use of artillery is of no great importance. So that considering what has been said, and that the wars which the Romans had carried on were almost always of the offensive kind ; it will appear that they would have had still greater advantages, and their conquests been more rapid and considerable, if the use of artillery had been common in that age.

With regard to the second allegation, that men have not the same opportunity of distinguishing their courage, that they had before great guns were invented ; I answer, that it is very true, they have not, and that the danger is much greater, where they make their assault in small parties, when they have walls to scale, or some other attack of that kind to carry on, and instead of rushing on all together with fury and resolution, advance, as it were, one by one, in a cold and fearful manner. It is likewise true, that the Generals and other Officers of armies are more exposed to danger at present, than they were in former times, as they may be killed by a Cannon ball at a great distance, and would not be ever the safer if they were in the very rear, and surrounded by the bravest of their men. No remarkable losses however, or very few of either kind have been sustained of late, even in sieges: for it has not been much in fashion to attempt a Scá-lade upon well fortified towns, nor to make feeble assaults, but to proceed by way of blockade, as formerly: and, in those few towns that have been taken by storm, the danger was not greater than in former times; for in those days, the besieged in all towns had their machines and engines of war, which (though perhaps they might not occasion so much terror) did no less execution. As to the danger which Generals and other Officers are exposed to, it may be answered, that fewer Commanders were killed during the twenty-four years which the last wars in Italy continued, than in any ten years war, in the time of the Romans: for except Count Lodovico della Mirandola, (who was killed at Ferrara when the Venetians invaded that State not long ago) and the Duke of Nemours (who was killed at Cirignuola) there was not one General Officer slain by a cannon ball: for Monsieur de Foix died by the sword, at the battle of Ravenna. So that if particular men do not shew so much valour at present as in former times, it is not owing to the use of artillery, but to bad discipline and the weakness of our armies; for when there is no courage in an united corps, it cannot be expected in individuals.

As to the third allegation, that armies cannot easily now be brought to a close engagement, and that the decision of battles will probably in time be left to the artillery; I answer, that this is altogether false, and will always be adjudged so by those who shall think fit to revive the ancient military discipline and manner of fighting: for he that would make a good army, should accustom his soldiers either in real or sham fights, to advance so near the enemy, that they may not only make use of their short weapons, but close in and grapple with them: and in such cases to depend much more upon his Infantry than his Cavalry, for reasons that shall be given in the next Chapter.

Whoever

Whoever pursues this method, will have but little to fear from artillery; for, by thus closing with the enemy, the Infantry will find it much easier to avoid the fire of their artillery, than to sustain the weight of Elephants, Chariots armed with Scythes, and other such inventions, now laid aside, which the Roman Infantry had to encounter, and yet always found some means to elude their force: and certainly they would more readily have found means to escape the fire of great Guns, because the danger from them is sooner over, than it was from Elephants and armed chariots, the mischief occasioned by the latter, continuing as long as the battle lasted, but the execution done by the former being chiefly over before the action begins; which danger, nevertheless the Infantry may in a good measure escape, either by taking the advantage of some sort of cover from the nature of the country, or by falling flat upon their bellies during the fire. This precaution however, as experience hath fully shewn, is not altogether necessary, especially against very heavy cannon: for it is almost impossible not to point them either too high or too low; in one of which cases, the balls will fly over you, and in the other, they will not reach you: and after the battle is once begun, it is evident that neither heavy pieces nor light ones can do you any damage: for, if they are placed in the front of the enemy's army, they must of course fall into your hands; if in the rear, it must hurt themselves more than you; and if upon either of their flanks, it can gall you but little before you come at it by moving either to the right or left. This is clear from the example of the Swiss at Novara, in the year 1513, who boldly marched up to the French camp, which was very strongly fortified, not only with artillery, but deep entrenchments, and took it sword in hand, notwithstanding these impediments, though they had no Cavalry, nor so much as one piece of cannon.

Another reason that may be given for the inefficacy of artillery is, that it must be secured either by a wall, or a rampart, or a ditch, or something of that kind, if you expect any service from it; otherwise it will either fall into the enemy's hands, or be of no use: as it happens in field battles, where it is guarded only by men. In the flanks they cannot be employed to any great purpose, except the same method is followed that the ancients observed in managing their engines of war, which were placed out of the ranks, that they might not occasion any disorder amongst their own forces; and whenever those that defended them were attacked and hard pressed, either by Cavalry or otherwise, they drew them off and retired with them into the main body of the army. He that does not manage artillery in this manner, does not understand the nature of it, and puts his confidence in what will most probably deceive him. The Turk indeed obtained two or three victories over the Sophy of Persia and the Sultan of Egypt, by the assistance of artillery: but that was owing to the confusion into which their Cavalry were thrown by the thunder of such unusual explosions, rather than to any great execution it did. To conclude therefore, I say, that artillery may be of use in an army, where the Soldiers are brave and disciplined in the ancient manner: but if they are not, it will be of little or no service against a resolute and courageous enemy*.

C H A P. XVIII.

Whether in conformity to the authority of the Romans, and the example of ancient military discipline, one ought to make more account of Infantry than Cavalry.

IT may be clearly demonstrated by many proofs and examples, that the Romans gave the preference to their Infantry, and depended much more upon them than their Cavalry, in all enterprizes and expeditions. In the battle betwixt them and the Latins, near the Lake of Regillum, their troops beginning to give way, the Roman General ordered his Cavalry to dismount, and renew the fight on foot; after which, they recovered their ground, and got the day: from whence it appears, that they put more confidence in their men when they were on foot, than on horseback. The same expedient was made use of upon many other occasions, when they were reduced to extremities; and they always found their account in it. It is to no purpose in this case to object the opinion of Hannibal at the battle of Cannæ; who finding the Consuls had ordered their Cavalry to dismount, said in a taunting manner, “Quam mallem victos mihi traderent equites, i. e. They might as well have delivered them up to me tied and bound:” for though, without doubt, he was a General of consummate experience, yet the opinion of any one man ought not to be set in competition with the united judgment and practice of so many able Commanders, as were bred under the Roman Republic, especially when very strong arguments, exclusive of such an authority, may be adduced to support one, and refute the other. Men on foot may easily march through places where horse cannot come: they keep their ranks better, and are soon rallied if they happen to be thrown into disorder: whereas it is a very difficult matter to make horses keep their ranks, and almost impossible to rally them, when they are once broken. Besides, some horses, like some men, being dull and heavy, and others fiery and high spirited; it may happen that a coward may be mounted upon an unruly horse, and a brave fellow upon a jade: in either of which cases, confusion must naturally ensue. A body of Infantry well disciplined and drawn up, will soon break a Squadron of Cavalry: but the same number of Cavalry will find it a hard matter to break a body of Infantry: the truth of which assertion is confirmed, not only by many facts and examples, both of ancient and modern date, but by the authority of all those that have written upon military affairs, and the practice of States, whence we learn, that all wars at first were carried on by horsemen, because the art of drawing up foot was not known; but after that was found out, it was soon seen how much the latter were to be preferred to the former. Cavalry however, are very necessary in an army, to scour the roads, to reconnoitre the country, to make incursions, to plunder or forage, to face the enemy's horse, and to pursue them when they fly: but the main strength and vigour of an army certainly consists in its Infantry, and therefore they are most to be depended on. Amongst the many fatal errors by which the Italian Princes have made their country a slave to foreigners, none have contributed more to it, than their neglecting to train up good bands of Infantry, and applying all their care and attention to their Cavalry: and this has been wholly owing to the knavery of the Commanders and the stupidity of the Princes. For during these last twenty five years the Italian Soldiery have been entirely in the hands of Commanders, who not having a foot of land in the world, are no better than Adventurers or Soldiers of fortune; and consequently make it a trade to hire themselves and the Soldiers that follow their banners, to such as have not sense enough to keep any forces of their own. But as they thought there would be no occasion for a large body of foot, which could neither be often employed, nor long maintained in pay, and that a small one would not answer their end, they resolved to make use of horse only; imagining that two or three hundred Cuirassiers would give them sufficient reputation, and not be too many to be paid by those that hired them. To keep up their credit therefore, and to make themselves necessary, it has been their constant endeavour to disparage the use of Infantry, and to recommend that of Cavalry: in which they have succeeded so well, that in the largest armies there is but a very small proportion of foot. To this error, and some others (but to this chiefly) it is owing, that the Italian Soldiery

Soldiery are now become so weak and contemptible, that their country has not only been over-run, but grievously plundered and laid waste by every Ultramontane in his turn.

But to shew more fully the error of preferring the use of Cavalry to that of Infantry, I shall produce another example from the practice of the Romans, which happened at the siege of Sora: for a party of horse sallying out of the town to attack their camp, a Roman Colonel advanced to repulse them at the head of another party; but the Commanders on both sides being killed at the first onset, and the fight still continuing after they were slain, the Romans dismounted in order to attack the enemy with more advantage, which forced them to do the same, to defend themselves more effectually, though they were at last driven back again into the town. Nothing, I think, can be a stronger proof than this, that Infantry was in greater esteem amongst them than Cavalry: for though indeed, their Generals had sometimes caused their horsemen to dismount upon other occasions, yet that was to support their Infantry, when it was hard pressed or overpowered: but, in this case they did not dismount to succour their own Infantry, for they had none there, nor to engage another body of the enemy's foot: but fighting on horseback against another party of horse, they thought if they could not deal with them that way, they should easily be able to manage them the other. I conclude therefore, that it is hardly possible to break a well-disciplined body of foot, except they are opposed by another that is better. Crassus and Mark Anthony, two Roman Generals, over-run the Kingdom of Parthia for many days together, with a small number of horse, but a good army of foot; though the Parthians had a vast army of horse to oppose them: Crassus, indeed, and part of his forces were slain; but Anthony came off with great honour. Nevertheless, it was clearly seen in that distressful expedition, that Infantry are much more serviceable than Cavalry: for though they were in a plain open country, where there were very few mountains, and still fewer rivers, to supply them with necessary cover and other conveniencies, at a great distance from the sea-coast, and without any hopes of relief; yet Anthony conducted himself and his forces so well (to the great admiration of the Parthians themselves) that their army of horse, though so numerous, never durst attack him: as to Crassus, whoever reads the history of that war, will find that he was rather trepanned by the falsehood than overcome by the valour of the enemy, who would not venture to attack him in all his distresses, till they had first reduced him and his army to extreme want and misery by hovering about him at a distance, and cutting off instead of furnishing those supplies which they had promised him.

But why should we go so far back for proofs of the superiority of Infantry, when we may have so many nearer home, and of more recent date? Nine thousand Swifs (as I said in the last Chapter) attacked an army of ten thousand horse, and as many foot, encamped at Novara, and beat them without the assistance either of Cavalry or Artillery: for the horse could not come at them to do them any harm; and as to the foot they made light of them, because they were mostly Gascons and very ill disciplined. Since which, twenty-six thousand Swifs had the courage to march into the Milanese after Francis I. the French King, whose army consisted of twenty thousand horse and forty thousand foot, with an hundred pieces of cannon: and if they did not beat the French, as they had done at Novara, yet they fought them bravely for two whole days together; and at last, after they were defeated, brought off above one half of their army safe. Marcus Attilius Regulus formerly opposed his Infantry, not only to the enemy's horse, but to their Elephants: and though indeed the success did not answer his expectation, yet it is a proof how much confidence he put in them, and that he thought them equal to any undertaking: I say again therefore, fore, that a well disciplined body of Infantry cannot be broken, but by another that is better: and that to attempt it is only so much labour lost. In the time of Philip Visconti Duke of Milan, about sixteen thousand Swiss marched into Lombardy; against whom the Duke sent his General Carmignuola with a thousand horse and some Infantry. That Commander being unacquainted with their manner of fighting, took it for granted that his horse would break them at the first attack: but finding they stood firm and impenetrable in their ranks, and having lost a great many of his men, he was forced to retreat. However, as he was an able officer, and fertile in expedients to remedy any sudden misfortune, after he had received a fresh supply of forces, he went in pursuit of the enemy again; and coming up with them, he caused his Gens d'armes to dismount, and placing them in the front of his Infantry, he fell upon the Swiss and presently defeated them: for his Cuirassiers being then on foot, and armed at all points, easily broke into their ranks and made such a slaughter of them, without receiving any damage themselves, that none of them escaped, except such as Carmignuola, out of his humanity, thought fit to spare. Many, I am certain, are fully persuaded that foot are more useful than horse: yet such is the infatuation of the present times, that neither the authority of ancient or modern examples, nor the conviction of their error, is sufficient to make our Princes correct their mistakes, and prevail upon them to acknowledge that in order to restore the credit of their Soldiery, it is necessary to revive the ancient discipline, to keep troops of their own, to encourage them, to put life and vigour into them, and to make them respectable; that so they in their turn may likewise reflect honour and reputation upon their Masters. But since they deviate from these Rules, and the others above mentioned; what little acquisitions they happen to make, contribute rather to the prejudice and diminution, than

C H A P. XIX.

That acquisitions made by Republics which are ill governed, and contrary to the Model of the Romans, contribute to their ruin, instead of their exaltation.

TO these ill grounded opinions, confirmed by the absurd practice of this corrupted age, it is owing that Princes never think of reforming their errors and reviving the ancient military discipline. Who could ever have persuaded an Italian thirty years ago, that nine or ten thousand well disciplined foot durst attack ten thousand horse and as many foot in an open plain, and were able to beat them, as they actually did at Novara; an instance which I have quoted more than once before? For though History abounds with such examples, yet they either meet with no credit at all; or if any one seems to believe them, they never fail to object, that the armour now made use of is so much better than that of the ancients, that one Squadron of our Gens d'arms would make an impression not only upon a body of foot, but even upon a rock. With such simple excuses they deceive themselves and impose upon their own judgment; though they must know that Lucullus with a small army of Infantry, routed one of an hundred and fifty thousand horse under the command of Tigranes, in which there was a great number of Cuirassiers armed exactly in the same manner that ours are at present. The weakness of these opinions therefore, we have seen fully proved at the expence of other nations also, as appears from this example in particular: and since what is related in History concerning the excellency of Infantry holds good, we ought to give no less credit to what is recorded to the advantage of several other ancient Institutions that have been recommended: in which case, both Princes and Republics would find themselves exposed to fewer dangers, better able to sustain any enemy, and not have the mortification of seeing their forces so frequently obliged to fly as they now do. And those who are at the head of a Commonwealth, would find it much more easy to accomplish their purposes, whether they design to extend their dominion, or only to maintain what they already possess, if they were convinced, that to fill their country full of inhabitants, to make allies and confederates rather than absolute slaves of the people they conquer, to establish Colonies for the security of what they have acquired, to convert the spoils of an enemy into funds for the use the State, to annoy them with incursions and field battles, and not embarrass themselves with Sieges, to make the Public rich, and private men poor, and to employ all their care and attention to keep up good military discipline in full force, are the best ways to aggrandize a Republic and enlarge its Empire. But if these methods are not adopted, let them remember however, that any other will prove their ruin: for which reason, they ought to curb their ambition, and (instead of endeavouring to extend their dominion) to turn their thoughts only upon regulating their laws and interior polity in such a manner as may best enable them to defend themselves and what they have already got, like several free States in Germany, which, by so doing, have lived happily and undisturbed for a long course of years.

Nevertheless (as I have said elsewhere, in discoursing upon the different conduct that is to be observed in order to enlarge dominion, from that which is necessary only to secure what has been acquired before) it is impossible that any Republic should continue long quiet and enjoy its liberty and dominions, how small soever, in tranquillity: for though it should not molest others, it will nevertheless be molested by them:

and by being thus provoked, it will not only become desirous, but lie under a necessity of revenging itself and reducing its neighbours: but if it should be so fortunate as not to have any foreign enemies, it will be sure to fall into factions and divisions at home, as it always happens in such Governments. That the free States in Germany have continued so long in peace and liberty, is owing to some peculiar circumstances in that country which are not to be found in any other, and without which they could not subsist. That part of Germany which I now speak of was formerly subject to the Romans, like France and Spain: but when the Roman State was upon the decline, and the title of Empire transferred to Germany, some of the most powerful Cities in that Province taking advantage either of the pusillanimity or distress of the Emperors, shook off their yoke, and others became in a manner absolutely free, on condition of paying only a small annual tribute: so that all the States which were immediately subject to the Emperors and no other Prince, by degrees recovered their liberty. It happened about the same time that several Corporations dependent upon the Duke of Austria, as Fribourg*, the Swifs, and some others, revolted from him, and having re-established their freedom, became so strong and powerful in a short time, that they not only defended themselves effectually against his utmost endeavours to reduce them to obedience, but grew formidable to all their neighbours; and these are now called the Swifs Cantons. Germany then is divided betwixt the Emperor, the Swifs, the Princes or Electors, and certain little Republics called the Free States †: and the reason that

† The Imperial Cities, or Hans-towns. The former are Sovereign States, and send their Deputies or Representatives to the General Diets or Parliaments of the Empire. The latter are also Sovereign States, not differing from the Imperial Cities at present, but were about two hundred years ago allied or confederated for their mutual defence and the protection of their trade, and at first consisted only of the great

so few wars, and those of short continuance, happen betwixt States so differently constituted, is the respect that they all pay to the Emperor, who, though his power is not very great, has so much reputation and authority amongst them, that whenever any quarrel arises betwixt them, he interposes as a Mediator, and soon puts an end to it. The sharpest and longest wars in that Country have been betwixt the Swiss and the Dukes of Austria: and though the Title of Emperor has been in the House of Austria for many years, they never could get the better of the Swiss, nor could any quarrel be ever decided betwixt them but by the sword: for the other States of Germany did not furnish the Emperors with any assistance in those wars, because the Free Cities rather favoured the Swiss as being friends to liberty like themselves; and as to the Princes, some of them were so poor that they could not, and others so jealous of the Imperial power that they would not contribute to make it still greater.

These Communities therefore, live quietly and unmolested in possession of their own little territories, without encroaching upon those of others, being all kept in peace by the authority of the Emperor: and what makes them united at home is the apprehension they are under from so near an enemy, who would not fail to take the opportunity of any divisions that might happen amongst them, to reduce them into subjection to him, and deprive them of their liberties. But if Germany was not thus balanced, some of these States would be endeavouring to enlarge their dominions, and consequently there must soon be an end of their tranquillity: and as no other Country is circumstanced in the same manner, no other Republics can enjoy the same freedom; and therefore those that find it necessary to extend their territory at the expence of their neighbours, must either have recourse to Sea-port towns on the German Ocean or the Baltic Sea, and near the mouths of their great rivers: but afterwards they took many inland Cities into their alliance, monopolized most of the trade in Europe, and were a formidable maritime Power.

Leagues and Confederacies, or proceed as the Romans did of old : whoever takes any other course, instead of aggrandizing his Country, will certainly ruin it. For new conquests are dangerous and prejudicial a thousand ways ; as a State may easily enlarge its dominions without increasing its strength ; in which case ruin must inevitably ensue : and this happens when the expence of an Enterprize exceeds the profit that results from it, even though it is successful. Thus the Venetians were much weaker when they became possessed of Lombardy, and the Florentines after they had conquered all Tuscany, than when the former were content with the dominion of the Adriatic, and the latter with a territory that did not exceed six miles in extent* ; and this was owing to their ambition of making acquisitions, and not knowing how to maintain them : for which they were the more inexcusable as they had the example of the Romans immediately before their eyes, and might have imitated them in the method which that people observed upon such occasions, if they had not wisdom enough to strike it out themselves as the Romans did. Besides, such acquisitions sometimes do great mischief even to well governed Commonwealths ; for instance, when the State conquered is voluptuous and effeminate, and the conquerors catch the infection by their communication with its inhabitants ; as it happened to the Romans first, and afterwards to Hannibal, when they had made themselves Masters of Capua : for if that City had lain so near that the Soldiers could not have been soon reclaimed, or if the Roman State had been in any degree corrupted, without doubt that conquest would have proved the destruction of their Republic, as we may venture to affirm from what Livy says, “ Jam tunc minime salubris militari disciplinæ Capua, instrumentum omnium voluptatum, delinitos militum animos avertit a memoriâ patriæ : Capua, at that time the nursery of all soft pleasures, so relaxed the military discipline, and debauched the minds of the Soldiers, that they totally forgot their love and duty to their own Country." And indeed such Cities or Provinces sufficiently revenge themselves upon those that conquer them, without blows or effusion of blood: for as the corruption spreads, and at last becomes general, it enervates them to such a degree that they must in the end become a prey to any one that attacks them; as Juvenal well remarks in one of his Satires, when he is speaking of the change of manners in Rome, the luxury and many other vices which their conquests had introduced there in the room of that temperance, frugality, and other excellent virtues; for which they had been so remarkable before.

SAT. VI: 291, 292.

If then such an acquisition had almost effected the ruin of the Romans, notwithstanding their great wisdom and virtue; what must become of those States that are weak and corrupt; and besides their other errors and ill conduct, (which I have mentioned above) employ either mercenary or auxiliary troops, the folly and danger of which I shall make the Subject of the next Chapter.

C H A P. XX.

How dangerous it is for any Prince or Republic to employ either Auxiliary or Mercenary forces.

IF I had not discussed this point at large in another part of my works, I should have dwelt longer upon it in this place than I design to do at present *. But as I have met with a most remarkable instance in Livy how dangerous it is to employ Auxiliaries, I cannot pass it over without some notice. By Auxiliaries, I mean such troops as one State sends to the succour of another, under Officers of its own, and in its own pay.

That Historian informs us, that after the Romans had defeated the Samnites in two battles at different places, with the forces which they sent to the relief of the Capuans, and thereby put an end to the war betwixt those two people, they left two Legions in the territory of Capua to secure it from any further danger or apprehension of the enemy, after the rest of their forces had returned to Rome. But those Legions sinking into indolence and fascinated by effeminate delights, began not only to lay aside all remembrance of their own Country and the reverence they owed to the Senate, but to think of setting up for themselves, and seizing upon the Country which they had defended, and which they thought the inhabitants no longer worthy to enjoy, since they were not able to protect it. This conspiracy however being timely discovered by the Roman Government, was soon suppressed, as we shall relate more fully when we come to discourse of Conspiracies.

I say again therefore, that of all troops Auxiliaries are the most dangerous; because neither the Soldiers nor the Officers receiving any pay from you, but from the Prince or State by whom they are sent, like the Legions that were left at Capua, they have little or no regard either to your interest or authority: and as soon as the war is over, if it ends successfully, they often plunder those that employ them, with as little ceremony as they did those whom they were sent to fight against: which is owing sometimes to their own avarice or ambition, and sometimes to that of their Masters. The Romans had no design to violate the league they were in with the Capuans: but their Soldiers imagining it would be a very easy matter to seize upon that State themselves, actually determined upon it. I could cite many other instances of this kind, but let

one more suffice, namely that of the Regini *, who were not only plundered and dispossessed of their territories, but massacred by a Legion which the Romans had sent to defend them. A Prince then had better have recourse to any other expedient than Auxiliaries, especially when he is to depend chiefly upon them for his security : for any terms that he can obtain from an enemy, how hard soever, will be less prejudicial to him than such succours. Indeed if we either read the History of former times, or consider the present with due attention, we shall find a thousand instances wherein they have proved fatal, for one in which they ever did any service to those that employed them. An ambitious Prince or Commonwealth therefore cannot be furnished with a fairer opportunity of making themselves masters of another State, than by being solicited to send such troops to its assistance : for he that is so indiscreet as to call in Auxiliaries not only for his own defence, but to conquer others, endeavours to make acquisitions which he cannot keep any longer than they please to let him ; because they can easily take them away from him again whenever they have a mind. But so blind is the ambition of some men, that if they can but gratify their present appetites, they never think of the inconveniencies that must probably soon ensue : whereas if they would reflect upon the instances which we have quoted from ancient History to confirm this point as well as some others insisted upon in these Discourses, they would be convinced that the more generosity Princes or Republics shew to their neighbours, and the less inclination to injure or distress them, the more ready they will be to throw themselves into their arms, as we shall prove in the next Chapter, from the example of the Capuans.

* The inhabitants of Rhegium, now called Reggio, a town in Calabria, almost opposite to Messina. There is another town of the same name in Lombardy belonging to the Duke of Modena.

C H A P. XXI.

The first Prætor the Romans ever sent abroad, was to Capua, four hundred years after they first began to make war.

WE have already shewn at large how different the methods which the Romans took to enlarge their Empire, were from those that are now pursued for the same purpose; and how they suffered those States which they did not utterly destroy, to enjoy their former liberty, and to live under their own laws; even such as were not joined with them as Confederates, but had submitted to be their Subjects; and that without any other mark of their dominion over them than some few conditions, upon the observation of which, they were protected in their ancient rights and privileges. This method they followed till they carried their arms into foreign countries, and began to reduce the States and Kingdoms which they conquered into Provinces subject to their Empire; as may plainly appear from the example of the first Prætor they ever sent to any place (which was to Capua) not out of any ambitious design, but because it was sollicitated by the Capuans, who had fallen out amongst themselves, and were desirous to have some Roman Citizen of authority to compose their quarrels and reduce them to good order. This example was soon followed by the inhabitants of Antium, who being in the like circumstances, voluntarily submitted to receive a Roman Magistrate for the same purposes: upon which new method of acquiring dominion Livy says, “Quod jam non solum arma, sed jura Romana pollebant: that the Romans now began to extend their Empire not only by the valour of their arms, but by the reputation of their Laws.” We see therefore how much this manner of proceeding contributed to aggrandize their State: for Republics, in particular, that have been used to live in freedom, and under the government of their own Countrymen, submit with more satisfaction to Masters that are at a distance (though upon terms that may be somewhat hard) than to others that are nearer at hand, and would, they think, be continually upbraiding them with their dependence. There is likewise another advantage resulting from this; for as the Sovereign does not employ Officers of this own immediate appointment in the administration of justice, whatever sentence may be given either in civil or capital causes, cannot excite any odium against the Supreme power; which therefore exempts it from those calumnies and reproaches that must often arise from such decisions, whether they be just or unjust. The truth of this may plainly appear not only from several passages in ancient History, but from an occurrence which lately happened in Italy. Every one knows that as often as the French made themselves masters of Genoa (which has been several times), the King of France always used to send somebody thither to govern it in his name: but at present he suffers it (rather out of necessity than choice) to be governed by a Genoese, elected by his Fellow-citizens: and without doubt, whoever considers which of these two ways best secures their obedience to the King, and is most agreeable to the inhabitants, must needs determine in favour of the latter. Besides, the less inclined you seem to distress men, the less apprehension they will have of your depriving them of their liberties; and the more humane and gentle you shew yourself the more cheerfully they will throw themselves into your arms. To this lenity and moderation it was owing that the Capuans desired the Romans to send them a Prætor: but if the latter had shewn the least inclination to intermeddle in their affairs, or officiously endeavoured to obtrude such a Magistrate upon them, they would presently have taken alarm and driven him back again.

But what occasion have we to go so far as Rome or Capua for examples of this kind; when we have enow in Tuscany? It is well known that Pistoia long ago voluntarily put itself under the protection of the Florentines ; and at the same time what a bitter enmity subsisted betwixt the Florentines and the Pisans, the Lucchese, and the Siense ; which diversity of disposition did not proceed from the little value the Pistoians set upon their liberty in comparison of the others, but from the different behaviour of the Florentines, who treated the former like brothers, and the latter like enemies : upon which account, the Pistoians willingly submitted to their dominion ; whilst the others have always taken every possible method to defend themselves against them : but if the Florentines, instead of exasperating their neighbours by harsh usage, had behaved in a gentle and friendly manner, they would certainly have been Masters of all Tuscany at this time. It is not my intention however to infer from what has been here said, that one ought never to proceed with rigour and force of arms upon such occasions : but that they should be reserved for the last expedient, when all other means have failed.

C H A P. XXII.

That men often err in the judgment they form concerning things of great importance.

HOW apt mankind are to err in their judgment, is well known to those that have been much conversant in Councils ; which if not conducted by wise and able men, are often deceived and imposed upon : and as such men have always many enemies in corrupt Commonwealths (especially in time of peace), who oppose them either out of envy or ambition, that advice is most commonly followed, which is either falsely thought good, by an error of judgment common enough to a majority, or given by self-interested men, who have more regard to popularity, than the good of the Public. But when the pernicious effects of these counsels come to be discovered in difficult and trouble-troublesome times, danger and distress make it necessary to comply with such measures as were recommended, but rejected and discountenanced in the calm and sunshine of prosperity; as I shall shew more at large in another place. Several events likewise happen, in judging of which, men of small experience in publick affairs may easily be deceived; as they are frequently attended with such circumstances and probability of success, as may induce them to persuade themselves, that the things which they fondly hope for, will actually come to pass. This is fully verified by the advice which Numicius, the Prætor, gave the Latins, after they had been defeated by the Romans; and by what was generally believed not many years ago, when Francis I. King of France invaded Milan, and the Swiss defended it against him.

After the death of Lewis XII. Francis of Angoulême succeeded to the Crown, and being desirous to recover possession of Milan (which the Swiss had made themselves masters of a few years before, by the assistance of Pope Julius II.) endeavoured to make some friends in Italy, to facilitate the accomplishment of his designs: for which purpose, besides the Venetians (whom King Lewis had secured before) he endeavoured to gain over Leo X. and the Florentines to his interests; imagining he should then meet with little or no impediment in that enterprize; especially as the Spanish forces were at that time employed in Lombardy, and those of the Emperor at Verona. The Pope, however was not to be prevailed upon to comply with his solicitations; being persuaded by his Council (as it is said) that if he stood neuter, he might greatly serve himself by it: that it was not for the interest of the Church, to throw any more weight into the scale, either of the French or the Swiss: that in order to restore the liberty of Italy, it was necessary to rid himself of them both; that since he was not able to cope with either of them, much less with both, as things then stood, he ought to sit still till one of them had utterly ruined the other, and then to call in the assistance of his allies, and fall upon the Conqueror : that he could not have a fairer opportunity than the present, since both their armies were in the field, and his Holiness's forces were in such order and readiness, that he might immediately send them to the confines of Lombardy to watch their motions, under a pretence of guarding his own territories, but in reality to wait there till they had come to a battle, which (considering the bravery of the troops on both sides) it was reasonable to suppose would be a very bloody one, and must leave even the Victor in such a weak condition, that his Holiness might soon crush him, and with great reputation to himself, become not only master of Lombardy, but Arbiter of all Italy. But the event shewed the futility of this counsel : for the Swiss being defeated after a long and obstinate engagement, the forces of the Pope and the King of Spain, were so far from daring to attack the French, that they had determined to fly ; but even that would not have saved them, if either the humanity, or coldness of the French King had not inclined him to rest contented with that victory, and to come to an accommodation with the Pope. This advice, therefore, though plausible enough at first sight, will appear simple and absurd upon a nearer examination : for, it seldom happens, that he who gains a victory loses many men ; those that he does lose being killed in battle, not in flight : and in the heat of the fight, when armies are close engaged, many cannot fall, because such conflicts are generally soon over ; and, if they ever chance to last so long, that great numbers are slain, even on the side of those that get the day, yet such is the advantage that results from the reputation of a victory, and the terror which it inspires, that it more than balances the loss they sustain by the death of their Soldiers.

Whoever then shall think fit to attack such an army, upon a supposition that is must be much weakened, will find himself egregiously mistaken, unless his strength be such, that he was able to have engaged it, even before it had sustained any loss at all : for, in that case, indeed, he may have a chance to gain a victory, as well as to be defeated, if he be a man of conduct and abilities, and is befriended by fortune. But an army that has been already flushed with victory, will still have the advantage; as may appear from the example of the Latins, when they had been beaten by the Romans: for Numicius their Prætor, soon after the battle was over, run all up and down the country, exhorting them to fall upon the Romans again, now they were so much reduced by the late engagement, and had gained nothing but the name of a victory, having in all other respects suffered as much as themselves; and assuring his countrymen, that any new attack, how feeble soever, would certainly ruin them. In consequence of which, they raised another army, and attacked the Romans a second time: but they soon paid dear for their credulity; for they were utterly routed with great loss, and treated in such a manner as all those deserve that listen to such foolish advice.
that

C H A P. XXIII.

That the Romans always avoided taking a middle course, when they had occasion to pass Judgment upon any of their Subjects.

“JAM Latio is status erat rerum, (says Livy) ut neque pacem neque bellum pati possent. The Latins were now reduced to such a condition that they could neither make war, nor accept of peace.” A condition indeed, of all others, the most miserable; but such a one as every Prince or Commonwealth must of necessity labour under, that can neither submit to unreasonable terms of accommodation on one hand, nor carry on a war on the other, without either delivering themselves up as a prey to auxiliaries, or being utterly ruined by the enemy. To this wretched alternative, they are reduced by evil counsels, and by coming to a determination before they have duly considered considered their own strength, as we have said before: which consideration, if properly attended to, would prevent them from falling into such distress as the Latins did, who made peace with the Romans, when they ought to have carried on the war, and declared war against them, when they should have continued in peace; so that the friendship and enmity of the Romans were equally prejudicial to them. The Latins then being reduced to the last extremity by Manlius Torquatus, were afterwards totally subdued by Camillus, who obliged them to surrender at discretion to the Romans, and not only put garrisons into all their towns, but took hostages from them: after which he returned to Rome, and reported to the Senate, that all Latium was in subjection to them: and as the judgment of the Senate upon this occasion, was very remarkable, and worthy of being imitated by other Princes in the like circumstances, I shall here quote the words which Livy puts into the mouth of Camillus, when he made his report: from whence we may further observe, what methods the Romans pursued in extending their dominion, and that in their determinations they always avoided a middle way, and had recourse to extremes: for the nature of government makes it necessary to keep Subjects upon such a footing, and under such restrictions, that they may either have no desire, or at least no power to injure or insult it. And this may be effected either by absolutely depriving them of all means to hurt you, or by treating them with such lenity and tenderness, that they cannot wish to change their condition. There is no middle course that can be followed with security: and therefore, Camillus having proposed the choice of these two expedients to the consideration of the Senate, that wise body acted according to them both, as the circumstances of the different towns in Latium required. His advice was as follows. “Dii immortales ita vos potentes hujus consilii fecerunt, ut sit Latium, an non sit, in vestra manu posuerint. Itaque pacem vobis, quod ad Latinos attinet, parare in perpetuum, perpetuum, vel sæviendo, vel ignoscendo potestis. Vultis crudeliter consulere in deditos victosque? Licet delere omne Latium. Vultis exemplo majorum augere rem Romanam, victos in civitatem accipiendo? Materia crescendi per summam gloriam suppeditat. Certe id firmissimum imperium est, quo obedientes guadent. Illorum igitur animos, dum expectatione stupent, seu pænâ, seu beneficio præoccupari oportet: i. e. The Gods have now put it in your power to determine whether the Latins shall be any longer a people or not. It is in your own option effectually to secure yourselves from any further apprehensions of that enemy, either by pardoning or punishing them. If you have a mind to proceed with rigour against a people that are vanquished, and have submitted to you, they lie at your mercy, and you may totally extinguish the very name of them if you please; but, if you rather chuse to enlarge your Empire by shewing clemency, and making the conquered your Subjects and friends, as your Ancestors used to do, you have a noble opportunity of imitating their example with great glory and advantage to yourselves: for that Dominion is built upon the surest foundation, under which the Subjects live securely and contented. It is absolutely necessary therefore, to take either one course or the other; and immediately too, whilst their minds are yet fluctuating betwixt hope and fear, and the uncertainty of their doom prevents them from taking any desperate resolution." The Senate, after some deliberation, determined to follow this advice, and having made a particular enquiry into the behaviour of every town in Latium, they spared some, and punished others: the inhabitants of those that were spared, were made free Citizens of Rome, and had several other privileges, favours, and immunities granted them, which effectually secured their fidelity and affection; but as to the others, some of them were totally demolished, some had Colonies sent to settle amongst them, and others brought prisoners to Rome; so that they were dispersed in such a manner, that they were for ever incapacitated to give the Romans any more trouble or disturbance.

This was the method which the Romans always took upon such occasions; and certainly it is worthy of being imitated by all other states. The Florentines should have acted thus in the year 1502, when Arezzo and all the Vale of Chiana rebelled against them; for if they had, they might not only have firmly established their dominion over them, but likewise have made Florence a great and flourishing State, and taken such lands from the rebels as that City stood in need of, for the subsistence of its own inhabitants. But they simply took the middle way betwixt the extremes of rigour and clemency, which is always dangerous in such cases: for, though they banished some of the inhabitants, and put others to death, and degraded every man that was in office or authority, yet they left the City entire and untouched: and when they were advised to demolish it, those who pretended to be the wisest amongst them, made answer, that it would be a disgrace to their own Republic, and look as if they were so weak that they could not keep it: which is one of those arguments that seem to have some reason in them, but in reality have none at all. For by the same rule, a Prince must not hang any villain, though ever so notorious, because it would be a shame to have it thought he had not power enough to bridle one rascal, without putting him to death. But those that are of this opinion ought to consider, that when either particular men, or a whole City offend a State, that State is under an absolute necessity of destroying them for its own preservation, and to deter others from following their example: and as to any reflections which such a manner of proceeding may happen to occasion, it is sufficient to say, that it will be more for the reputation of a State to punish delinquents, than to spare them at its own peril: and that a Government which does not do that so effectually, that they can never hurt it afterwards, will always be thought weak and pitiful.

How properly the Romans acted upon such occasions, may likewise appear from the example of the Privernates: from which we may observe, in the first place, that people who are conquered, should either be treated with great lenity and indulgence, or totally cut off, as I said before; and in the next, what a powerful impression generosity, frankness, and speaking truth, make upon the minds of wise and good men. The Roman Senate, as Livy informs us, was assembled to consider in what manner they should treat the Privernates, who had rebelled against them, but were then reduced to obedience by force of arms: but the people of Privernum having sent several of their Citizens to make their submission, and implore pardon, one of them being introduced to the Senate, was asked, “Quam pœnam meritos Privernates censeret? what sort of punishment he thought his Fellow-citizens deserved?” made answer, “Eam quam merentur qui se libertate dignos censent: such as those deserve who think themselves worthy of liberty.” Being asked again, “Quid si pœnam remittimus vobis, qualem nos pacem vobiscum habituros speremus? Suppose we should pardon you this time, how will you behave yourselves for the future?” he replied, “Si bonam dederitis, & fidelem & perpetuam; si malam haud diurnam: well and dutifully, if you grant us good terms: if not, we shall soon do the same again.” Upon which, the wiser part of the Senate declared, “Se audivisse vocem et liberi et viri, nec credi posse illum populum, aut hominem, denique in eâ conditione cujus eum pœniteat diutius quam necesse sit mansurum. Ibi pacem esse fidam, ubi voluntarij pacati sint, neque eo loco ubi servitutem esse velint, fidam sperandam esse: That he had spoken like a brave and free man; that it was not to be expected that any particular person, much less a whole people, would submit to lead a life that was grievous to them, any longer than they were compelled to it by invincible necessity; that no terms could be long or faithfully observed, which were not voluntarily and cheerfully agreed to and accepted; nor was it to be imagined that any people would continue steady in their allegiance and affection, if they were reduced to slavery." Upon which it was resolved, that the Privernates should be incorporated into the Roman State, and honoured with all the privileges that were enjoyed by their own Citizens and Subjects, "Eos demum qui nihil præterquam de libertate cogitant, dignos esse qui Romani fiant; since those whose chief care was to preserve their liberties, were worthy of being Romans." Such was the effect of these frank and bold answers, upon great and generous men, who would have despised any other sort of reply as mean and insincere: and those will generally find themselves deceived, who judge otherwise of mankind, especially of such people as have either been actually used to live in liberty, or at least have thought themselves free: in consequence of which error, they must naturally take such measures as will prejudice themselves, and be grievous to others, which commonly ends in rebellion, and the ruin of a State.

It appears then from the method which the Romans took with the Latins and inhabitants of Privernum, that when the fate of a conquered people, which have been powerful and accustomed to liberty, is to be decided, it is the best way either to exterminate them entirely, or to treat them in such a manner, as to make them your firm and faithful friends; otherwise you are doing nothing: but, above all things a middle course is to be avoided, because it is the most dangerous; as the Samnites experienced to their cost, when, after they had hemmed in the Romans at the Furcæ Caudinæ, they would not listen to the counsel of an old officer, who advised them either to dismiss them with honour, or to knock them all on the head: but as they took a middle way, and not only disarm- ed, but made them pass under the yoke, they sent them away so full of shame and resentment, that they soon after had sufficient cause to repent they had not taken the old man's advice, instead of acting in

C H A P. XXIV.

That Fortresses generally do a State more harm than good.

IT may seem strange; perhaps, to the wise men of our times, that the Romans never thought of building Fortresses to keep the Latins in obedience; especially, as it is a maxim with our Florentine Politicians, that Pisa and other such States must be kept in subjection by that means: and indeed, if the Romans had been like them, it is probable they would have built Fortresses; but, as they were of a very different cast, and not only much braver, but wiser, and more powerful, they thought fit to let it alone. For whilst they enjoyed their liberties, and adhered to their excellent maxims and institutions, they never erected any strong places to maintain possession of such Cities or Provinces as they had reduced; though they sometimes left those standing which they found there. When we compare this method of proceeding with the practice of these times, it seems worthy of examination, whether such places are of more service or disservice to those that build them.

It must be considered then, that the end proposed by such people as build Fortresses, is either to defend themselves against their own Subjects, or their enemies; but in the former case they are prejudicial, and in the latter unnecessary. For, if a Prince is afraid of his Subjects rebelling against him, it must be because he is hated by them; which hatred proceeds from ill treatment; and that ill-treatment, either from a persuasion that he may govern them arbitrarily, or from some other indiscretion. Now, one of the reasons that induce him to think and act in this manner, is, that they are bridled with Fortresses: so that the harsh usage, which is the cause of their disaffection, is chiefly owing to the confidence he puts in those strong holds, which therefore he will find much more prejudicial than serviceable to him. For, in the first place, they tempt him, as I just now said, to treat his Subjects with much more rigour than he would otherwise dare to do; and in the next, there is not so much security in them as he vainly persuades himself: for all the violent and forcible measures he can make use of to over-awe his people, will signify nothing, except he either has a good standing army always at hand (as the Romans used to have) or thinks fit to cut off some, separate others, and disperse the remainder in such a manner, that they can never assemble again to do him any mischief: for though he should strip them of their properties, “Spoliatis arma supersunt; they will still find arms:” and if he disarms them once, “furor arma ministrat; revenge will soon furnish them with other weapons:” if he puts the Chiefs to death, others will soon spring up in their room, like Hydra’s heads: if he builds Fortresses, they may serve his turn, perhaps, in time of peace, and prompt him to oppress his Subjects with less reserve: but should a war break out, they will do him no service; for when they are assaulted by his own people, and a foreign enemy at the same time, it is impossible they should hold out against them both. If then they were so insignificant in former times, surely they must be much more so since the invention of Artillery, against the fury of which no Fortress can long defend itself, where the besieged have neither room to cast up new works within, when the old ones are battered down, nor any other place to retire into, as we have shewn elsewhere*.

But to enter into a further discussion of this matter. Let us suppose that a Prince wishes to govern his own people with a high hand, or that either a Prince or a Republic intend keeping a State which they had taken from an enemy, in strict subjection, by building Fortresses in it. As to a Prince, who is desirous of keeping his Subjects in awe, I say, that instead of answering that end, they will be of great prejudice to him, for the reasons above mentioned; because they will embolden him to oppress them, and that oppression will prove his ruin, as it will exasperate them to such a degree, that the Fortresses which are the principal cause of it, cannot possibly protect him against their rage. A good and wise Prince therefore, who would not lay either himself or his posterity under any temptation to abuse their Subjects, and become Tyrants, will never build Fortresses amongst them, but depend altogether upon their fidelity and affection, which are a much better security. Count Francisco Sforza, though accounted a wise man, built a Citadel at Milan, after he became Duke of that place; but in that he did not shew much wisdom, as the consequence fully proved; for it afterwards was of great prejudice to his Successors, who thinking themselves secure there, and at liberty to commit any sort of violence upon their subjects with impunity, gave themselves up to all manner of oppression and licentiousness, till they became so odious to every one, that they were presently driven out of their dominions by the first enemy that invaded them. So that the Citadel did them but little good in time of war; and in time of peace it did them much harm; because, if it had never been built, and they had been weak enough to have treated their Subjects with more asperity than they should have done, they would soon have been made sensible of their error, and might have desisted from it in time: in which case, they would have been able to make a more vigorous resistance against the French, whilst their Subjects were yet well affected to them, though they had had no Citadel to trust to, than they did after they had forfeited the affection of the people, notwithstanding they were possessed of that Fortress. In short, nothing is more precarious than the assistance that is expected from such places; as they may be lost, either by the venality of the Governor, or taken by storm, or forced to surrender by famine.

But if a Prince is in hopes of recovering a City or State that has been lost, whilst some Citadel or Fortrefs only still holds out for him, he will find himself deceived, except he has a good army, and is able to engage those that have taken it from him: in which case, he may make himself master of it again, even if he has no Fortrefs there; and much sooner too than if he had; as the inhabitants will be more inclined to favour him, than if he had abused and oppressed them without mercy, out of a vain confidence in that security. Experience, indeed, has clearly evinced that the Castle at Milan never was of the least service, either to the Sforzas or the French, in time of distress: but on the contrary, that it proved the ruin of them both; as it made them neglect the more safe and honourable means of defending themselves. Guidobaldo, Duke of Urbino, the most renowned Soldier of his time, was driven out of his territories by Cæsar Borgia; but happening to recover them soon after, he ordered all the Fortresses in that State to be demolished, because he thought them rather prejudicial to him than otherwise: for, as he was beloved by his Subjects, he did not care to disgust them; and from his enemies, he found by experience, they could not secure him without a good army in the field. Pope Julius II. having taken Bologna from the Bentivogli, built a Citadel there, and put a Governor into it, who oppressed the people to such a degree, that they soon rebelled, and forced him out of it: so that it was so far from doing him any good, that it was the occasion of his losing that place, which he might easily have kept, if there had been no Citadel there, and he had treated the people in a different manner. Niccoló da Castello, father of the Vitelli, who had been deprived of his dominions for a while, presently caused two Fortresses to be pulled down, which Pope Sixtus IV. had built there, after he got possession of his Country again; as he put more confidence in the love of his people, than in Castles and strong holds. But we have a more recent and remarkable example of the insignificance, or rather the mischief of building Fortresses, and the necessity of demolishing them, which happened at Genoa, in the year 1507: for when that City rebelled against Lewis XII. King of France, who was then possessed of it, he came thither in person with a powerful army, to reduce it to obedience; which he did, and afterwards built the strongest Citadel that is known at present: for, being situated upon the point of a rock close to the sea, it commanded not only the harbour, but the whole City, and was looked upon as impregnable. But afterwards, in the year 1512, when the French were driven out of Italy, and the Citadel of Genoa alone held out for them, the Genoese, without troubling themselves about the Citadel, revolted again, and chose Octavian Fregosa for their Governor, who laid close siege to it on every side, and cut off all manner of provisions and other necessaries in such a manner, that at the end of sixteen months, it was forced to surrender to him: after which (as it is generally said) he was advised by many to keep it for his own security upon any emergency; but he very wisely pulled it down, and chose rather to rely upon his own goodness, and the affection of his Fellow-citizens; in consequence of which resolution, he has supported himself in the Government of Genoa ever since: and, though a thousand men were sufficient before to have turned it upside down, he has, since that time, bravely defended itself, against an enemy that made an attempt upon it, with an army of ten thousand. Hence we see, that Octavian fared not the worse for demolishing the Castle, nor the King of France the better for building it; for when he marched into Italy with a good army, he soon recovered Genoa, though he had not the Citadel then to trust to; but when he was not able to bring an army into the field, he could not keep the town, though he was possessed of the Citadel: so that as the King had been at a vast expence in building it, the loss of it was a great disgrace to him; whereas Fregofa, on the contrary, not only gained much reputation by taking, but great advantage by demolishing it.

It is now time to say something (as we proposed) concerning Republics that build Fortresses not in their own Country, but in places which they have conquered: the inutility of which (if the example of the French and Genoese just now mentioned be not thought sufficient) may be fully shewn from that of the Florentines with regard to Pifa; where they had built Fortresses to keep the Citizens in Subjection, not considering that the Pisans had always been their declared enemies, that they had been used to live in freedom, that they looked upon rebellion as the only means they had left of recovering their liberties; and consequently if the Florentines had a mind to prevent it, they ought either to have made them their friends and Fellow-citizens, or utterly to have extirpated them. For it was plainly seen how little these strong places answered their expectations, upon the arrival of Charles VIII. in Italy, to whom they were presently surrendered, either through the corruption or pusillanimity of the Governors; so that if they had never been built at all, the Florentines could not have trusted to them only for the preservation of Pifa; nor could the King of France have otherwise deprived them of it: for the methods they had taken to keep possession of it before, would most probably have been sufficient to secure it at that time; at least they could not have been attended with worse consequences.

I conclude then, that it is dangerous to build Fortresses in order to keep one's own Country in subjection; and that they are of no service in maintaining possession of others that are conquered; as may plainly appear from the practice and example of the Romans, who instead of erecting Fortresses in their new acquisitions, generally demolished such as they found there. If it be objected that Tarentum in ancient times, and Brescia not long ago, were recovered by means of Fortresses, after the people had rebelled against their Gover-

Governors and seized upon those places: I answer, that Fabius Maximus was soon after sent to the relief of the Citadel at Tarentum (which still adhered to the Romans) with an army sufficient to have reduced the town, even if there had been no Citadel there: and if there had not, he certainly would have found other means of doing it. It appears then how little service was expected from the Citadel, by their sending so great a man as Fabius with a Consular army to recover Tarentum: and that he would have taken it without any such assistance, is manifest from the example of Capua, which that army retook also, though there was no Citadel there to befriend them. With regard to Brescia, it very seldom happens (though it did indeed in that rebellion) that a Fortrefs, which continues firm to you after the town has rebelled, has a good army near at hand to succour it, as the French then had; for Monsieur de Foix the King's General, who then lay with his forces at Bologna, being informed that Brescia was lost, immediately marched thither, and arriving there in three days, recovered it by the help of the Castle. It was not wholly owing to the Citadel therefore that Brescia was re-taken, but to the vicinity and expedition of Monsieur de Foix and his army: so that the authority of this example is not sufficient to balance that of the others which have been before adduced: for we have seen numbers of Fortresses taken and retaken in the wars that have lately happened, not only in Lombardy and Romagna, but in the Kingdom of Naples, and every other part of Italy, in the same manner that other towns and States have been.

But as to building strong places to defend yourself against foreign enemies, they are also unnecessary if you have a good army; and if you have not, they are of no service at all: for a good army will be a sufficient security without any Fortrefs; but a Fortrefs without such an army, will signify nothing*. The truth of this may be confirmed by the practice and conduct of those people that have been most remarkable for their wisdom and policy, particularly of the Romans and Spartans; the former of whom never built any Fortresses; and the latter trusting to their own valour alone, carried the matter so high, that they would not even suffer their Capital to be walled about, much less did they think of erecting strong holds any where else. Accordingly a Spartan being asked one day by an Athenian, "whether he did not think the walls of Athens very fine and strong." "I should much approve of them, said he, if the City was inhabited by women only." A State however that has a good army, may reap some little advantage from a Fort or two near the Sea, if any part of its dominions lie upon the coast, as they may keep off an enemy perhaps till its own forces can be got together: though they are not altogether necessary even in that case. But when it has not a good army, Fortresses upon the Sea coast or Frontiers are either prejudicial, or at least unserviceable: prejudicial, because they are easily taken, and once lost may be turned against you; or if they be so strong that the enemy cannot make themselves Masters of them, they may leave them behind; and then what service can they do? For when a good army, that is not vigorously opposed by another as good or better than itself, happens to enter into an enemy's country, it pays no regard to the Towns and Fortresses which it leaves upon its back, as we see from many instances in ancient History, and from the example of Francisco Maria not long ago, who left ten Cities behind him that belonged to the enemy, and boldly marched on to besiege Urbino, without giving himself the least trouble about them.

A Prince therefore who has a good army will have no occasion for Fortresses; and he that has not, ought strong towns were taken in a very short time, which had formerly been so redoubtable when supported by good armies under the command of Prince Maurice, not to build any : let it be his chief care to fortify the place of his residence as strongly as he can, to put a good garrison into it, to keep his subjects in good humour and well affected to him ; that so they may defend him against any attack, till he can either obtain honourable terms from the enemy, or receive relief from others : all other means being too expensive in time of peace, and ineffectual in war. So that considering what has been said, it will appear that the Romans, who acted wisely in all other respects, shewed no less wisdom in their proceedings with the Latins, when they despised Fortresses, and had recourse to more prudent and generous methods of securing themselves.

C H A P. XXV.

That it is imprudent to attack a people who are divided amongst themselves, in expectation of conquering them merely upon that account.

THE animosities betwixt the Patricians and Plebeians began at last to run so high at Rome, that the Veientes and Hetrusci thought they had a fair opportunity of utterly extinguishing that Republic. Having raised an army therefore, and made an incursion into the Roman territories; the Senate sent out another to oppose them under the command of Cneius Manlius and Marcus Fabius, who encamping very near the enemy, were so insulted with all manner of taunts and abusive language, that the Roman Soldiers forgetting all private quarrels and hatred amongst themselves, heartily united together, and coming to an engagement with the enemy entirely defeated them. From hence we may observe how apt we are to err in the judgment we form of things (as hath been said before ) and how often we are disappointed in obtaining our ends, by the very means whereby we proposed to accomplish them. The Veientes fully expected to have conquered the Romans when they found them so disunited: in consequence of which opinion, they ventured upon a war with them, which united one side and ruined the other: for as peace and idleness are, generally speaking, the causes of faction and discord in Commonwealths; so war and apprehension of danger most commonly unite them again: and therefore if the Veientes had rightly considered the matter, the more they saw the Romans embittered against each other, the more cautious they should have been of engaging in a war with them, and taken very different methods to effect their ruin. They might have pretended a friendship to them, and offered their mediation to compose all differences betwixt the contending factions before they came to an open rupture: but when they had seen them once heartily engaged together they should have given some assistance to the weaker side, in order to keep the flame alive till it consumed them both: but that assistance should not have been too considerable, lest it might have occasioned a suspicion that they had a design to crush one side as well as the other, and reduce them equally into subjection to themselves. for when such a part is well conducted, it almost always answers the purposes of those that act it. To this conduct it was owing that Pistola fell into the hands of the Florentines, as we have shewn elsewhere: for the Citizens there being divided into two parties, the Florentines threw weight sometimes into one Scale, and sometimes into the other, (but in such a manner as to keep them in a sort of equipoise) till both grew so weary of that factious sort of life, that they mutually agreed to throw themselves into the arms of the Flo-

* Has not this been sometimes the case of Kingdoms as well as Republics? and have not the Britons (under good Princes) constantly united against any Invader, how much soever they were divided before, either by the vile suggestions of self-interested men to poison their honest minds, or imaginary conceits of real danger?

rentines. They likewise made themselves Masters of Siena by the same arts, which would never otherwise have become subject to them ; I mean by fomenting the factions which raged there, and privately sending both parties feeble succours, as they were wanted : for if they had done it to any great degree, or in an open manner, it would have excited a jealousy of their designs and united both sides against them. I might likewise here add the example of Philip Visconti, Duke of Milan, who engaged in several wars with the Florentines, in hopes of subduing them on account of the intestine divisions that reigned in their City : but finding himself disappointed in that expectation, he said, “ the follies of the Florentines had cost him above two millions of gold to no purpose.” The Veientes therefore and the Hetrusci (as I said before) were guilty of a great and fatal error in their calculation ; as those will always be who build upon the same bottom, and pursue the same methods to reduce any State into subjection to them.

C H A P. XXVI.

That contemptuous and reproachful language, instead of doing a man any good, only serves to provoke others and make himself more hated.

IT is a great sign of wisdom in a man to refrain from threats and injurious language ; because instead of doing an enemy harm, one of them puts him more upon his guard, and the other still adds to his rage, and makes him more active in seeking revenge. Of this we have just given an example in the behaviour of the Veientes, who besides the enmity, which is usually incident to people that are at war, could not forbear treating the Romans with particular marks of contempt and reproach ; a thing which ought not to be suffered by any prudent commander : because there is nothing that exasperates an enemy so much, much, or excites him more furiously to revenge; nothing that does him so little real damage, or yourself so little good, as the mischief generally falls upon your own head.

To confirm this, I shall bring a remarkable proof from an event that happened in Asia. Gabades the Persian, having laid siege to Amida for a considerable time, and growing weary of it, as he made little or no progress, resolved to raise it: but whilst he was decamping, the Garrison exulting at his disgrace got up to the top of the walls, and insulted him and his Soldiers in the most provoking terms, calling them cowards, poltroons, and all manner of opprobrious names: at which Gabades was so nettled that he changed his resolution, and began the siege afresh with so much vigour and resentment that he took the town in a few days after, and delivered it up to the mercy of his Soldiers. The same thing happened to the Veientes, who, as I said before, not being content with making war upon the Romans in the common way, could not forbear going up to their very entrenchments to affront and abuse them, the consequence of which was, that the Soldiers who were but little inclined to fight before, grew so outrageous that they compelled their Generals to give them battle, in which the Veientes were totally routed, and suffered the punishment they had so justly deserved.

All wise Generals and Governors of States should studiously endeavour therefore to prevent the people under their command from reviling and reproaching each other, or even an enemy: for with regard to the latter, such consequences must naturally ensue as have been just now related; and still worse in respect to themselves, if not anticipated by such precautions as have always been used by prudent men. The legions which were left by the Romans for the security of Capua, having formed a design to make themselves Masters of that State (as I shall shew more at large in another place) grew seditious and mutinied: but being reduced to reason by Valerius Corvinus, amongst other methods which he took to quiet them, he strictly enjoined every one, upon the severest penalties, never to upbraid any of those Soldiers with their past behaviour. Tiberius Gracchus having a body of Slaves in his army (whom the Romans were obliged to employ in their wars with Hannibal for want of other men) forbade all the rest of his Soldiers, on pain of death, to reproach any of them on account of their former servitude: so dangerous did the Romans think it to suffer any reflections on the infirmities or misfortune of others; as they well knew nothing could be more provoking than such taunts, whether spoken in earnest or in jest, especially if they should have any foundation in truth. Tacitus therefore says very justly, "facetiae asperæ, quando nimium ex vero traxere, acrem sui memoriam relinquunt: When Jokes border too near upon Truth, they leave stings behind them*.

* "At Sieges and elsewhere (says Montaigne, book I. chap. xlvi. of his Essays) where occasion draws us near to the enemy, we willingly suffer our men to brave, insult, and affront them with all sorts of injurious language; and not without some colour of reason: for it is of no little consequence to take from them all hopes of mercy and composition, by representing to them, that there is no favour to be expected from an enemy they have so incensed, nor any other remedy left but a victory. And yet Vitellius (or rather the Lieutenants who commanded in his absence) found themselves deceived in this point: for in an engagement with Otho's army, whose Soldiers were unaccustomed to war, and effeminated with the delights of the City, he so nettled them at last with injurious language and reproaching them with cowardice and the regret they felt at leaving their mistresses and soft entertainments behind them at Rome, that he inspired them with a resentment which no exhortations could produce, and drew those upon his back himself, whom their own Commanders could not push upon him before. And indeed, when reproaches touch the quick, it may well be expected that he who went but coolly to work in behalf of his Prince, will proceed with another temper when the quarrel is his own."

C H A P. XXVII.

That wise Princes and well-governed Republics ought to be contented with victory: since others that grasp at more, are often losers by it.

OPPROBRIOUS and reproachful language to an enemy, is commonly owing to the insolence of those who have either gained a victory or make themselves sure of one; which hopes, though often vain and ill grounded, occasion errors both in their words and actions: for when once they get possession of the understanding, they transport men beyond the bounds of reason, and frequently make them lose the opportunity of obtaining a certain good, by flattering themselves with the expectation of something better which is precarious and uncertain. Now since this is a matter that is worthy of serious consideration, as men are sometimes misled by such fallacious hopes, to the great prejudice of their affairs, it may not be amiss, I think, to illustrate what I have here advanced, by some instances both from ancient and modern History, which seem more proper for that purpose, than reasoning and argumentation. After Hannibal had defeated the Romans at the battle of Cannæ, he sent Messengers to Carthage with the news of his victory, and to desire supplies: upon which, the Senate deliberating what was to be done, Hanno, an old and experienced man, advised them to make a prudent use of their victory, and come to an accommodation with the Romans, as they might do, now they had beat them, upon more honourable and advantageous terms than they could expect if they should chance to be beaten themselves: and considering they had shewn the Romans they were able to cope with them, they should not be tempted, he said, to run the risque of losing what they had got, by the hopes of gaining something more. This advice, however, was not listened tened to, though the expedience of it was afterwards acknowledged when it was too late.

Alexander the Great, having conquered all the East, except the Republic of Tyre, (a powerful and opulent City in those times, and situated, like Venice, upon the Sea) the Tyrians considering his power, sent Ambassadors to inform him, they were ready to submit to him and become his good and faithful subjects, provided they might be excused from admitting either him or any of his forces into their City. But Alexander disdainng to be shut out of that City, when all the rest in those parts had thrown open their gates to receive him, would not hearken to any such conditions, and having dismissed the Ambassadors, immediately laid siege to the town; which being surrounded with water, and very well furnished with all sorts of provisions and ammunition that were necessary for its defence, made so vigorous a resistance, that at the end of four months, he found that enterprize would cost him more time, and add less to his glory than any other of his conquests had done: so that he resolved to grant the conditions upon which they themselves had offered to submit to him. But the Tyrians, elated with success, were then grown so insolent, that they not only rejected all terms, but hanged the person whom he had sent to offer them; at which he was so incensed that he prosecuted the Siege with such vigour and application, that he took the place soon after; and having entirely demolished it, put most of the inhabitants to the Sword, and made Slaves of the rest.

In the year 1512, a Spanish army marched into Tuscany, to re establish the Medici at Florence, and to lay the people under contribution. This was undertaken at the instigation of some Citizens of Florence, who had promised, that as soon as the Spaniards arrived in their territories, they would take up arms in their favour: but when they had reached the plains near that city, and not only perceived that nobody appeared to join them, but also that they were in great want of provisions, they endeavoured to accommodate matters with the Florentines in an amicable way: upon which the latter behaved in so insolent a manner, that the Spaniards seized Prato and all its dependencies.

A Prince therefore who is attacked by an enemy that is much more powerful than himself, cannot be guilty of a greater error, than refusing terms of accommodation, especially if they are offered him: for they can never be so hard, but he will find some advantage in them, or perhaps escape utter destruction. The Tyrians then ought to have accepted the conditions which Alexander at first refused to grant them, but afterwards would have complied with; since it would have been sufficient honour for them to have obliged so great a Conqueror by dint of arms to acquiesce in their demands. The Florentines likewise should have been content, and looked upon it as a sort of victory, that the Spaniards would have taken up with moderate terms; as they knew the design of that expedition was utterly to change the constitution of Florence, to break its connections with France, and to lay it under contribution. If the Spaniards had succeeded in the two last points, and the Florentines been secure of the first (that is of preserving their State) the latter might in some measure have gloried in that, at least been satisfied, and not given themselves much trouble about the other two, so long as their Government continued entire and unchanged: nay if they had been almost sure of obtaining a complete victory, they should not have wholly abandoned themselves to the mercy of Fortune, by venturing their last stake; which is a thing that no wise man will ever do, except he is compelled to do it by downright necessity.

After Hannibal had carried on a war for sixteen years in Italy with great reputation, he was recalled by the Carthaginians to defend their own country, where he found the armies under Syphax and Asdrubal entirely defeated, the Kingdom of Numidia lost, the Carthaginians cooped up within their own walls, and destitute of all hope but what they placed in him. Perceiving therefore that his country was reduced to its last stake, he was determined not to hazard that till he had tried all other means: upon which account, he was not ashamed to sue for peace, as he knew that was the only remedy left. But that being refused, he resolved to fight the Romans, (though with very little prospect of success) that so, if he could not gain a victory, he might at least have the satisfaction of ending his days with honour. Now if so able a Commander as Hannibal, at the head of an army yet entire, endeavoured by all means to obtain peace, before he would run the risque of a battle, because he saw his Country would be utterly ruined if he lost it; ought not his conduct to be a pattern to others of less experience and abilities? But men who can neither keep their hopes within the bounds of reason, nor make a due estimate of their own strength, must of necessity be led into errors that will prove fatal in the end.

C H A P. XXVIII.

That Princes and Republics ought to punish such as have injured either a whole people, or any particular person.

WE have a remarkable example how far men may be transported by their resentment, in what happened to the Romans when they sent the three Fabii Ambassadors to the Gauls, who had marched into Tuscany and laid siege to Clusium. For the Clusians having solicited the aid of the Romans, the latter dispatched these Ambassadors to require the Gauls, in the name of the Roman Republic, to withdraw their forces out of Tuscany: but the Fabii having delivered their Embassy more like Soldiers than Orators, and seeing the Gauls and Tuscans just going to engage, put themselves at the head of the latter, and fought against the enemy, who was so provoked at this behaviour, that they turned their enmity from the Tuscans upon the Romans. But what still added to their resentment, was, that after they had complained of this usage to the Roman Senate, and demanded that the Fabii should be delivered up to them; they were so far from either complying with their request or punishing them in any other manner, that at the next election of Magistrates, they made them Tribunes with Consular power. The Gauls therefore seeing them honoured and advanced, instead of being punished, took it as a wilful affront, and were so enraged, that they immediately marched to Rome, and not only took, but sacked the whole City, except the Capitol: all which the Romans brought upon themselves, by rewarding their Ambassadors, when they ought to have discountenanced them for violating the law of nations.

It behoves all Princes and Republics therefore to be very cautious how they offend either a whole people, or any private person in the like manner: for in case a man is grievously injured, either by a whole Community, or by any individual, and meets with no redress when he complains of it; if he lives in a Commonwealth he will certainly endeavour to revenge himself, though it should ruin the State: or if he lives under a Prince, and has the least spark of generosity in him, he will never rest till he thinks he has righted himself, though he be sure to suffer the severest punishment for it. A remarkable proof of this we have in the case of Philip of Macedon, (father of Alexander the Great) in whose Court there was a handsome young Nobleman, named Pausanias, who was ardently importuned by Attalus, (one of Philip's chief favourites) to submit to his lust: but the youth constantly refusing it, he determined to force him, since other means were in vain. For this purpose, having made a great entertainment, to which Pausanias and many others of the Nobility were invited, he took an opportunity when they had all drank pretty pretty freely, of having him carried by violence into another apartment, where he not only gratified his own brutal desires, but suffered several others to do the same: at which he was so outrageously provoked, that he complained of it frequently to Philip in the most bitter terms; who, though he always promised to bring the other to justice for the enormity he had been guilty of, was so far from performing it, that he made him Governor of a Province. Pausanias therefore seeing him exalted in this manner, instead of being punished, grew cooler with regard to Atalus who had injured him, and turned all his rage upon Philip who had refused him justice: in revenge for which, he took an opportunity of stabbing him one morning, upon a rejoicing day, as he was going to the Temple, attended by his Son and Son-in-law, to celebrate the marriage of his daughter with Alexander of Epirus. An example which much resembles that just now quoted from the Roman History, and deserves to be carefully attended to by all Princes, who ought never so far to despise any man as to think a repetition of injuries will not oblige him some time or other to revenge himself, though it cost him ever so dear.

C H A P. XXIX.

That Fortune throws a mist before people's eyes, when She would not have them obstruct her designs.

WHOEVER attentively considers the course of human affairs, may see, that many accidents and misfortunes happen to mankind, against which Heaven will not suffer us to make any sort of provision: and as there were many instances of this amongst the Romans, who were so much distinguished for their piety, valour, discipline, and good conduct; it is no wonder if such things happen more frequently amongst people that are much less eminent for their virtues. Now since it may be necessary here to shew what influence Heaven has over the affairs of this world, I shall take some notice of a remarkable passage in Livy, where he says, that Heaven, in order to make the Romans sensible of its power for some great purpose, first made the Fabii fall into that error when they went Ambassadors to the Gauls, which excited the latter to make war upon Rome, and afterwards would not suffer the Romans to perform any thing worthy of their former valour, to extricate themselves out of that war; but had incited them to banish Camillus to Ardea; who was the only man that could effectually have opposed such an enemy. that when the Gauls were upon their march towards Rome, they did not create a Dictator to make head against them, as they had often done before, when they were invaded by the Volsci and others: that they were so careless in the choice of their men, and so tardy in raising and furnishing them with arms, that they hardly had time to face the enemy with what force they could muster, upon the banks of the Allia, about ten miles from Rome; where the Tribunes encamped without their usual precaution of making choice of an advantageous situation, or surrounding it with entrenchments or palisades, or having recourse to any other means proper upon such an occasion, either human or Divine: that when they drew up in order of battle, their lines were thin and weak, and neither the Officers nor private men behaved themselves like Romans: so that the battle was neither obstinate nor bloody; for being routed at the first onset, the greater part of their army fled to Veii, and the rest to Rome, where they retired into the Capitol, even before they had seen their wives and children; upon which, some of the Senators (without making any provision for the defence of the City, or so much as shutting the Gates) ran away, and others took shelter in the Capitol. However they shewed some signs of good order and discipline in preparing for the defence of that place: for they turned out all the useleſs people, got together what provisions they could to ſupport the Siege, and ſent moſt of the old men, women, and children into the neighbouring towns, leaving the reſt to the mercy of the enemy : ſo that if any one ſhould conſider the great exploits which the Romans had performed before, and compare them with their behaviour upon this occaſion, he could hardly believe that they were the ſame people. Livy therefore having given an account of this event, ſays, “adeo obcæcat animos fortuna, cum vim ſuam ingruentem refringi non vult : to ſuch a degree does fortune blind the underſtandings of men, when ſhe has not a mind to be diſturbed in her career.” Which is a very juſt reflection.

The Proſperity or Adverſity therefore, which ſo remarkably diſtinguiſh the lives of particular men, is not to be wholly imputed either to their own merit or demerit ; ſince we often ſee ſome hurried on to deſtruction, and others pushed up to the higheſt pitch of worldly greatneſs by the impuſe of their deſtiny ; Heaven diſpoſing things in ſuch a manner as to favour one man with opportunities of exerting his abilities, whiſt it denies them to another. Thus when it is pleaſed to exalt a man to great proſperity, it makes choice of ſuch a one as knows how to avail himſelf of thoſe occaſions and opportunities : on the contrary, when ſome remarkable ruin is to be effected, ſuch men are pitched upon as muſt naturally contribute to further and promote it ; and if any one dares to oppoſe it, he is either taken off by death, or otherwiſe incapacitated to do it with any ſucceſs. It plainly appears from the paſſage in Livy juſt mentioned, that Fortune, in order to aggrandize the Roman Republic, thought proper to humble it in the firſt place, but not to reduce it to utter ruin, as we ſhall ſhew more particularly in the beginning of the next book : for which purpoſe ſhe ſuffered the Romans to baniſh Camillus, but not to put him to death ; and the City to be taken, but not the Capitol ; preventing them from uſing any proper meatures to defend the one, but leaving them sense enough to secure the other : and that Rome might be taken, she caused the greater part of the army that was routed upon the banks of the Allia, to fly to Veii, by which the City was left destitute of sufficient defence. This however paved a way for the recovery of it ; for as many of the forces had retired to Veii near Ardea where Camillus then was, (a General of great abilities, whose reputation had never been stained with the ignominy of a defeat) he put himself at the head of them, and drove the enemy from Rome. I might bring several other instances of more modern date to confirm the truth of what I have laid down : but as this is sufficient, they are altogether unnecessary, and therefore I shall postpone them. To conclude, it appears from all History, that men may second their fortune, but cannot resist it ; and follow the order of her designs, but not defeat them. However, they ought never to abandon themselves to despair, because they cannot fathom her designs : for as her ways are dark and intricate, there is always room left for hope ; and whilst there is hope, they should not be wanting to themselves in any change or vicissitude of their affairs.

C H A P. XXX.

Princes and Republics that are truly magnanimous and powerful, never make Leagues and Alliances by dint of money ; their friendship and protection being courted by others on account of their valour, reputation, and Power.

THOUGH the Romans had some expectation of Relief from Camillus, and their forces at Veii, when they were besieged in the Capitol by the Gauls ; yet, being distressed by famine, they were at last obliged to capitulate, and agreed to pay a certain sum of money for their ransom. But whilst they were weighing weighing the money that was to be paid upon that occasion, Camillus fell upon the enemy with the forces under his command, and drove them away from Rome. Such was the will of Fortune, says Livy, “ Ut Romani auro redempti non viverent; that the Romans might not owe their redemption to money.” And it is very remarkable, that in the whole progress of their affairs, as well as upon this occasion, they never made themselves masters of any State, nor procured a peace by dint of money, but solely by their own valour and conduct: which is a circumstance that I believe no other Republic in the world could ever boast of.

Amongst other marks which serve to discover the strength or weakness of a State, it must be observed upon what terms it is with its neighbours; for if they put themselves under its protection, and pay handsomely for it, it is a sign that it is strong and powerful: but, if they draw sums of money from it (though they may possibly be inferior States) it is a certain sign of its weakness. Whoever reads the Roman History, will find that the Massilians, the Edui, the Rhodians, as well as Hiero of Syracuse, Eumenes, and Massinissa, who all lived near the confines of the Roman Empire, were tributaries to that Republic, and furnished it with money in its occasions, merely for the sake of protection. But it is otherwise in weak States, as we may see particularly in the practice of Florence, which formerly, when it was in its most flourishing condition, paid stipends to most of the little Governments in Romagna, besides the Perugians, Castellans, and many other neighbouring States: which would not have been the case of the Florentines, had they been powerful and well armed: for then all their neighbours would have paid them tribute for their protection, and have purchased their friendship instead of selling their own. But the Florentines, are not the only people that have been forced to do this; for the Venetians, and even the King of France (though so great a monarch) are tributaries to the Swifs, and the King of England : all which proceeds from having difarmed and weakened their own people, in order to opprefs them at their pleasure, and to avoid an imaginary, rather than a real danger ; instead of making fuch provifions for their fecurity, as would effectually have made both themfelves and their Subjects powerful and happy for ever. This shameful manner of proceeding may indeed procure a little temporary refofe ; but in the end, muft be attended with troubles, loffes, and inevitable ruin. It would be tedious to recount how often the Florentines, Venetians, and French, have bought off their wars, and fubmitted to fuch ignominious terms as the Romans could never be induced to think of but once : nor would it be lefs difagreeable to relate how many towns the Florentines and Venetians have purchafed with money ; which have proved the occafion of great difafters, and fully proved that they were not able to protect with the Sword thofe poffeffions they purchafed with their money.

The Romans, on the contrary, difdained thefe mean arts of acquiring dominion, and owed the maintenance of their conquelts folely to their arms : from which manner of proceeding they never deviated whilft they continued free ; but when they fell under the yoke of Emperors, and thofe Emperors grew bad, and preferred eafe and indolence to glory and military toil, that brave people began likewise to degenerate, and ufed to ward off the attacks of the Parthians, Germans, and other nations by pecuniary means, which foon proved the deftruction of their Empire. This evil was occafioned by difarming the people, and the neglect of military difcipline, which is always attended with a ftill greater misfortune, namely, that the nearer an enemy approaches, the more he difcovers your weaknefs ; for, whoever is guilty of thefe errors, muft be obliged to opprefs his Subjects, by extorting money from them, to hire other people to keep an enemy at a diftance ; that is,

he must give stipends and pensions to all the neighbouring States: Hence it comes to pass, that the utmost a State is able to do in such circumstances, is to make some feeble resistance upon the confines; but when an enemy has once passed them, all is over and it is ruined without remedy. Such Governors therefore seem not to be aware, that this method of proceeding is contrary not only to all good policy, but the common practice of mankind: for when a man is going to battle, he takes more care to guard the heart and vital parts, than his hands and feet; because, a wound in the latter may probably not be mortal, but in the others it is certain death: now these Governors fortify the extremities of their States; and neglect the heart. How fatal such a conduct has often been to the Florentines, every one knows: for, whenever an enemy has passed their confines, and advanced towards the Capital; he has met with no further resistance. The same happened to the Venetians not many years ago; and if their City had not been surrounded with water, it must infallibly have been destroyed. With regard to France, this has not often been the case there, because it is so powerful a Kingdom, and has but few enemies that are superior to it: nevertheless, when the English invaded it, in the year 1513, the French were in great consternation; and the King, as well as every body else was of opinion, that the loss of one battle, would be the loss of France. Very different was the case of the Romans. The nearer an enemy approached their City, the stronger he found them: for after they had been three times routed, and lost so many brave officers and Soldiers in their wars with Hannibal in Italy, they were still able not only to stand their ground against the enemy, but to subdue him at last: all which was owing to their having fortified the heart of their country so well, that there was no occasion to be in much pain about the extremities: for the vitals of their State were their own Citizens, the Latins, the neighbouring people that were confederated with them, and their Colonies, from which they had such continual supplies as enabled them to conquer the whole world, and to keep it in obedience. The truth of this may appear from what Hanno said to the Ambassadors that were sent to Carthage with news of the victory at Cannæ: who, having given an account of Hannibal's great exploits in Italy, were asked by Hanno, "Whether any of the Roman Cities, or Confederates, or Colonies, had either sued to him for peace, or revoked from the Romans:" but being answered in the negative, he replied, "the war then is just as fresh as it was at first."

It is plain therefore, from what I have said in this Chapter, and in many other places, that the Republics of these times act in a very different manner from what the Romans did: in consequence of which, we daily see such surprizing acquisitions made by some nations, and no less wonderful losses sustained by others: for where men have but little valour and conduct, fortune will have an opportunity of exerting her influence so much the more: and as she is changeable, Republics and other States also must and always will fluctuate, till some great Spirit shall arise to restore the ancient discipline, restrain her caprice, and prevent her from giving such hourly proofs of her wantonness and power.

C H A P. XXXI.

That it is dangerous to put confidence in Exiles.

IT may not be amiss, perhaps; to say something here, concerning the danger of trusting to those that have been banished their own country; since it is a matter of great importance to the governors of States, who often have to do with such people. Of this, Livy introduces the following remarkable example in his History, though something foreign to the purpose he is treating of. When Alexander the Great Great marched with his forces into Asia, Alexander of Epirus, his near relation, invaded Italy at the instigation of some Lucanian Exiles, who persuaded him that he might make himself master of all that Province by their assistance. But when he arrived there in consequence of the strongest assurances, they perfidiously murdered him, upon a promise of being restored to their country on that condition.

We may observe therefore, how little confidence is to be reposed in the fidelity and promises of Exiles; as to their fidelity, you may assure yourself that whenever they have an opportunity of returning to their own country without your assistance, they will certainly abandon you, and make their peace at home; notwithstanding the most sacred engagements to the contrary: and with regard to the promises of success which they feed you with, these people naturally growing weary of exile, and impatient to return to their families, are prompted not only to believe many stories that are false, but to invent others to impose upon you: so that if you build upon such a foundation, you either throw away a great deal of money to no purpose, or utterly ruin yourself. To the example above quoted, let me add that of Themistocles the Athenian, who having rebelled against his country, fled into Asia to Darius, whom he flattered with such magnificent hopes, that he prevailed upon him to invade Greece; but, afterwards finding he was not able to perform the promises he had made that Prince, he poisoned himself, either out of Shame, or fear of punishment. Now, if a man possessed of such eminent virtue and abilities as Themistocles confessedly was, could be guilty of such an error, and promise much more than he could fulfil; we may well expect that those of much inferior merit and power will naturally be hurried away by their prejudices and passions, to deceive others as well as themselves*.

* The conduct of Zopyrus, a Nobleman of Persia, might here likewise be instanced, (if further examples were wanting) who, according to Justin, after his Sovereign Darius had long besieged Babylon to no

Princes therefore ought to be very cautious how they engage in any undertaking; on the encouragement of an Exile; because such enterprizes are generally attended either with very great loss or disgrace. And as it also seldom happens, that towns are taken by treachery or private intelligence; I shall shew in the next Chapter by what means the Romans used to reduce them.

C H A P. XXXII.

Concerning the several methods by which the Romans made themselves masters of Towns.

THE Romans being a martial people, considered war in every point of view, and always proceeded in such a manner, with regard to their expences and all other particulars in their military operations, as might tend most effectually to command success. In consequence of this, they seldom laid siege to a place, if it was possible to avoid it, because they thought it not only a very expensive way of proceeding, but attended with so many other inconveniencies, as would much over-balance the advantage that might result from the reduction of a town in that manner: upon which account, as they judged it better and more profitable to have recourse to other means, there are but very few instances of regular sieges in the whole course of their wars. The methods therefore, by which they made themselves masters of fortified places, were either by storm, or by stratagem. When they took a town by storm, they did not batter the purpose, cut off his own nose and ears, and fled to the Babylonians, pretending it was done by the order of Darius: upon which the Babylonians, moved with compassion and detestation at the barbarity of the fact, not only gave credit to his report, but made him their General. Not long after, however, he took an opportunity of betraying the confidence they had simply reposed in him, and delivered up the City to the Enemy. The same Historian tells us, that Darius was so astonished at his loyalty, that he said, "he had rather see Zopyrus whole again than take twenty such Cities as Babylon."

walls, but surrounded them with their whole army (which they called Aggredi urbem coronâ) and carried on the attack in all parts at the same time: so that they often succeeded in the first assault; as Scipio did at new Carthage in Spain. But if they failed in that attempt, they either began to batter the walls with rams, and other such warlike engines, or to undermine them and force a passage into the town that way (as they did into Veii), or built wooden towers that they might fight upon a level with those on the walls; or threw up Cavaliers* against them, to command the town. When the besieged were surrounded and assaulted on all sides from without, they certainly were in the greatest danger, and had the fewest resources to depend upon: for as it was necessary to defend every part at the same time, they seldom could have men enough for that purpose; much less others to relieve them: but if they had, those men could not all be equally stout and resolute; so that if an impression was made in any part, the whole was lost; and therefore such places, as I said before, were often taken at the first assault. But if that miscarried, they seldom or never renewed it, or kept their army any longer in a posture that must necessarily expose it to great danger; for as it was extended over so large a compass of ground, the ranks must of course be very thin, and not able to oppose the enemy, if they should chance to make a sally: besides, the Soldiers would be apt to grow weary of such a station, and consequently mutinous; for which reason, this method was never attempted but once, and then with the utmost surprize and vigour. When a breach was made in the walls, the besieged endeavoured to repair it with entrenchments and ramparts thrown up within, as they do at present: and from the effect of mining they used to defend themselves by countermines, in which they either opposed the enemy sword in hand, or threw casks full of feathers and such like combustibles set on fire, into their works; the smoke and stink of which, would not suffer them to continue long there. As to wooden towers, they endeavoured to destroy them by fire; and when the besiegers began to throw up Cavaliers against the outside of the wall, those in the town made holes in the bottom, through which they drew the earth they were made of into the inside; so that they could never be raised to a sufficient height to do them any harm, as the foundations were constantly giving way.

* The Original, says "argini di terra appoggiati alle mura di fuori," i. e. banks of earth against the outside of the walls, now called Cavaliers, which are mounts of earth, with a platform on the top, and a parapet to cover the cannon planted upon it, cut with embrasures to fire through.

But since these methods of attacking a place cannot be long continued, the besiegers must resolve upon one of these two things; i. e. either to raise their camp and prosecute the war in some other manner (as Scipio did, who having made a sudden but fruitless assault upon Utica in Africa, immediately marched away from thence, in order to force the Carthaginian army to an engagement), or to form a regular siege as the Romans did at Veii, Capua, Carthage, Jerusalem, and some other Cities which they took in that manner.

As to taking a place by means of a private correspondence with some of the Citizens (as the Romans took Palæopolis), that method of proceeding, though often tried by the Romans and other people, was seldom attended with success; because in such an undertaking many impediments must intervene, and the least is sufficient to defeat it. For in the first place, conspiracies are generally discovered before they are ripe for execution, either through the perfidy of some accomplice, or the difficulties that occur in conducting them; because you must have a correspondence with the enemy who are restrained from having any intercourse with you, except upon some very particular occasion. But let us suppose the design should not be discovered, till it is upon the point of being executed; many disappointments and obstructions may still happen: some of the conspirators, perhaps, may assemble too soon, and others too late; in either of which cases, they are undone: some dark-rumour, some unexpected alarm (like that of the geese which saved the Capitol at Rome), nay the least mistake or most trifling change either in the plan, or manner of executing it, is more than enough to overfet the whole. To these contingencies we might add the darkness of the night (a time when such things are generally brought to a crisis), the terror with which it inspires guilty minds, the blunders men are liable to fall into, who are not intimately acquainted with the nature and situation of the particular places that are to be the scenes of action (as many of the conspirators cannot be), and the dismay that naturally presents itself to people concerned in such perilous enterprizes; all which circumstances greatly contribute to confound, embarrass, and discourage them to such a degree, that the most insignificant accident or shadow of danger throws them into disorder and suspicions that commonly end in their destruction*. No man was ever bolder or more fortunate in these clandestine and nocturnal practices than Aratus the Sicyonian; though he was no less cautious and circumspect in the field, and in open day light: which would tempt one to think that this was rather owing to some peculiar and innate disposition in him, than to any good opinion that sound reason and judgment can form of such enterprizes. This manner of proceeding therefore, when often tried, may sometimes prove successful; but I will venture to affirm in general, that it can seldom be conducted to the point of execution, and still more rarely answer the intended purpose.

The last method by which the Romans got possession of towns, was by treaty; that is, when the inhabitants, either voluntarily submitted to them, or were reduced to accept of terms: the first was generally owing to some urgent necessity or danger which hung over their heads, and obliged them to seek protection from others (as the Capuans did) or to a desire of living under a happier Government, which they perceived others enjoy who had thrown themselves into their arms, particularly the Rhodians, and Massilians, and some other Cities that have been mentioned before. But when people are compelled to accept of terms, it commonly proceeds either from the usual consequences of a long siege, or being harrassed with continual incursions and devastations, and otherwise distressed; to avoid which, they think it more eligible to submit to the enemy. This method was more generally practised by the Romans than any other, during the course of four hundred and fifty years, in which they never ceased to harrass their neighbours in every manner that was possible to devise, till they were forced to submit to some conditions or other, and acknowledge their superiority: a method which they chiefly depended upon, after they had tried all others, and rejected them, either as dangerous or unserviceable; considering that sieges were tedious and expensive, assaults doubtful and perilous, the success of private correspondencies uncertain, and that a victory in the field often determined the fate of a whole Kingdom in one day, when the reduction of a City that was obstinately defended, sometimes could not be effected in several years.

C H A P. XXXIII.

That the Romans upon any Expedition gave the Commanders of their Armies free and discretionary Commissions.

WHOEVER would improve himself by reading Livy's History, should attentively consider the whole scope and tendency, as well as the particular conduct observed by the Romans in all their actions and designs. It may not be amiss then, to say something of the authority with which they vested their Consuls,

Consuls, Dictators, and other Commanders of their forces, when they sent them upon any expedition; which indeed was so great, that the Senate reserved no other power to itself than that of confirming a peace, or declaring war; leaving all other operations entirely to the conduct and discretion of the General, who was at liberty either to fight the enemy, or to decline it; to lay siege to a town, or to let it alone, just as the thought fit. This is obvious from many examples, particularly from what happened in an expedition against the Tuscans, when Fabius the Consul had defeated them near Sutrium. For after the battle was over, that General having determined to march through the Ciminian forest into Tuscany, was so far from consulting the Senate about it, that he did not give them the least notice of his design; though the war was to be transported into another country, and likely to be attended with much danger and hazard. This is evident from the steps taken by the Roman Senate upon that occasion: for having received an account of the victory he had gained, and apprehending he might be inclined to pursue his advantage, and push through that forest into the enemy's territories, they sent an express to dissuade him from it: but their advice arrived too late; for before he received it he had routed the Tuscans a second time, and over-run all their country: so that, instead of preventing that expedition, the messengers returned with the news of a victory.

Now if this manner of proceeding be duly considered, it will be found very wise and expedient: for if the Senate was to have been consulted upon every particular occasion, it would have damped the vigour and activity of the Generals, and made them less vigilant in their enterprizes; since they must have thought the honour of a victory would not have redounded so much to them as to the Senate, under whose immediate instructions they had acted. Besides, the Senate in that case must sometimes have given very improper orders: for though the Senators were all men of great experience in military affairs, yet as they were not upon the spot themselves, they could not know many particular circumstances that it was necessary to be acquainted with, in order to gain or improve an advantage; and consequently must be guilty of numberless errors; for which reason they left their Generals to act according to their own discretion, that so they might be the more effectually incited to exert their utmost abilities, when they knew no body else was to share with them in the glory. This I thought fit to observe, because I see how differently the Commonwealths in these times (especially the Venetians and Florentines) act upon such occasions: for if a battery (for instance) is to be raised against a town that is besieged, the Senate must be consulted about it in the first place, and give their orders how it is to be managed. A manner of proceeding, indeed, that is of a piece with the rest of their conduct; which all together has reduced them to the pitiful condition they are now in.

UPON THE FIRST DECAD OF

CHAP. I.

That no State or Religious Establishment can subsist long, except it is frequently reduced to its first Principles.

EVERY thing in this World is subject to dissolution. Those bodies that finish the course appointed them by Heaven, are such as observe so regular an order, that they either undergo no change at all, or if they do, it is such only as tends rather to their preservation than their destruction. With regard to mixed bodies, as Republics and Religious Orders, I say, that such changes as reduce them to their first principles are salutary: and therefore those are the best constituted and continue the longest, which either have establishments and institutions of their own, by the application of which they may be reduced to that condition; or easily fall, by accident as it were, into some course that tends to such a renovation: for it is a most evident truth, that no Body can long subsist without it. The fundamentals of all Religions,

Republics, and Kingdoms, must have had something good and wholesome in them at first, to which they owed their origin and progress: but as that virtue is liable to be corrupted in time, the body must of necessity languish and die, except something happens to restore its efficacy. Thus, Physicians (speaking of the human body) say, “quotidie aggregatur aliquid, quod quandoque indiget curatione; it daily contracts some impurity which must be purged off in time.”

This renovation then is affected in Republics, either by some external accident, or internal policy. In the first case, we have seen how it was owing to Fortune that Rome was taken by the Gauls; that so it might be restored to its ancient vigour by resuming new life and virtue, and by the revival of Religion and Justice, which had begun to decay. This plainly appears from Livy, who tells us that when the Romans led out their army against the Gauls, and created Tribunes with Consular power, they observed no religious rite or ceremony upon that occasion, as they used to do before; and that instead of punishing the Fabii, who had violated the law of nations by fighting against the Gauls, they loaded them with honours and rewards: from whence we may reasonably suppose, that the Institutions upon which Romulus and other wise Princes had founded that State were falling into a degree of contempt and neglect that was inconsistent with the preservation of its liberties *. Such an accident therefore as befel them from the Gauls was highly requisite at that juncture to revive their ancient discipline and institutions; and to shew the people how necessary it was, not only to maintain Religion and Justice in full force, but to reverence virtuous and worthy Citizens, and to shew a greater regard to their merit than to any private consideration whatsoever. All which actually came to pass: for as soon as they had recovered the City, they immediately applied themselves to revive all the ancient rites and institutions of their Religion, chastised the Fabii for their delinquency, and laying aside all envy and contentions amongst themselves, not only vied with each other in shewing all manner of respect to the virtue and goodness of Camillus, but committed the management of the whole State to him alone.

It is necessary then, as I say before, that all States should often be reformed, either by such external accidents or by some interior power: the latter of which must arise either from laws that may frequently call the individuals to account; or from the authority of some great and good man amongst them, whose example and virtuous actions may have the same effect. The laws that were made to reduce the Roman Republic to its first principles, were such as created Tribunes and Censors; and some others that were enacted to curb insolence and ambition: but such institutions must be kept in full force and vigour by some virtuous and spirited man, who will maintain them against powerful transgressors, and see them duly put in execution. The most striking examples of this sort before the taking of Rome by the Gauls, were the execution of the Sons of Brutus, the punishment of the Decemviri, and the death of Spurius Melius: and afterwards, that of Manlius Capitolinus, the Son of Manlius Torquatus, the prosecution carried on by Papirius Cursor against Fabius his General of the Horse, and the accusation of the Scipos; which being extraordinary acts of severity were much noticed when they happened, and served to remind other Citizens of their duty: but as they grew more rare, the people began to degenerate again into corruption and licentiousness in such a manner, that examples of this kind could not be made without much danger and tumult. It is necessary therefore that such events should happen once in ten years, at least, to awaken the remembrance of former punishments, and to strike a terror into the people: otherwise they will soon begin to forget and despise the laws, and delinquents multiply so fast, that it will be very difficult if impossible to bring them to justice, without exposing a State to great perils and troubles. For this reason, those that governed Florence from the year 1433 to the year 1494, reformed the State every five years; without which it could not have existed: and in these reformations they were particularly careful to revive that dread of punishment, which they had at first excited in the breasts of the Citizens, when they took the Government into their hands, by doing strict justice, and calling all offenders to a severe account: but as the Remembrance of these punishments began to wear away, the people also began to grow bold and insolent again, and not only said, but did what they pleased; against which no remedy was found so efficacious as reducing the State to its first principles.

Such a reduction is likewise owing sometimes to the virtue of one man alone, without the co-operation of any law to enforce it: for so great is the authority of such an example, that all good men are ready to follow it, and those that are bad are ashamed to do otherwise. The most remarkable examples of this kind in Rome were those of Horatius Cocles, Scævola, Fabritius, the two Decii, Regulus Attilius, and some others, whose rare and uncommon virtue produced the same effects that any law or institution could have done. If then either some such executions as we have mentioned, or some such particular example of virtue had happened every ten years in Rome, that State would never have become corrupt; but as they both became less frequent, corruption began to grow more general, after the time of Marcus Regulus, there were very few or no such examples: for though indeed those of the two Catos, might be instanced, yet it was at such a distance of time from the abovementioned, and there was so long an interval betwixt one and the other of them, that they stood single in their virtue and could do no manner of good; especially the younger, who finding the Republic almost totally corrupted, found also all his endeavours to reform it ineffectual. So much for Republican Governments.

With regard to Religious Establishments, it will plainly appear how necessary reformations are in these also from the example of our own, which would have been utterly ruined if it had not been reduced to its first principles by St. Francis and St. Dominic, who by their voluntary poverty and imitation of Christ, revived true Religion in the minds of men, when it was almost effaced, and would soon have been wholly obliterated by the wickedness of Prelates and Popes: for as they lived in extreme poverty, and were very diligent in hearing Confessions and preaching, they gained such an influence over the people by renewing these institutions, that they began to be convinced it was their duty not to speak evil of their Superiors, how bad soever; but to obey them, and to leave the chastisement of their crimes to God: whereas the others must of necessity lead very wicked lives, since they feared not that vengeance which they seldom or never heard of and did not believe. This reformation then has been, and still is the preservation of our Religion*.

Monarchies have likewise occasion sometimes for such renovations and a reduction to their first principles, in order to re-establish the authority of their fundamental laws: and we see what good effects they have had in the Kingdom of France, which lives in stricter obedience to such institutions than any other that we know of. The Parliaments indeed, and especially that of Paris, are the maintainers and conservators of those laws and institutions, which are always revived and put in execution, when it is necessary to proceed against any Prince in that Kingdom, or to oppose the King's Edicts: and they have hitherto preserved their liberties by putting the laws duly in execution against great offenders †. Whereas if such

* See the Estimate of the Manners and Principles of the Times, vol. ii. sect. 4. where this position is more fully illustrated.

† The State of France is much altered in this respect since Machiavel's time: the Parliaments now having very little authority in comparison of what they had formerly.

delinquents were suffered to escape with impunity, they would soon encrease so fast, that it would be impossible to reform the State without great danger and disturbance, and perhaps the utter dissolution of it.

I conclude then that nothing is more necessary either in a Republic, or a Religious Establishment, or a Monarchy, than a frequent reformation of the abuses that have crept into them, by reducing them to their first principles, in order to restore their original vigour and reputation : and this ought to be done by good laws, or the virtue of particular men (which will have the same effect) rather than by exterior force. For though this proves the best remedy sometimes (as the Romans experienced when their City was taken by the Gauls) yet it is so dangerous that it is by no means to be desired. But to shew how much the actions of particular men contributed to the grandeur and establishment of the Roman Republic, and what other good effects they wrought, I shall confine myself chiefly to that subject in this my third and last book of Discourses upon the first Decad of Livy's History : and though some of the Kings indeed performed great and remarkable exploits, yet as History has related them at large, I shall omit all mention of them here, except in such things as they did for their own private emolument, and begin with Brutus, the Father of the Roman liberties.

C H A P. II.

That it is the part of a wise man to seem a fool upon occasion.

NO man ever acted more wisely, or deserved greater praise than Junius Brutus when he pretended to be a fool : and though Livy assigns but one reason for his so doing, namely, that he might live quietly and preserve his estate ; yet when we thoroughly roughly consider his manner of proceeding, it seems probable that he put on that disguise that he might be taken less notice of, and deliver his Country from the yoke of Kings, whenever a convenient opportunity of expelling them should present itself. That this was his intention may appear in the first place, from the interpretation he put upon the Oracle of Apollo, when he fell down, as it were by accident, and kissed the ground, out of a persuasion that the Gods approved of his designs * : and in the next, from his pulling the dagger out of Lucretia's body after she had killed herself, and obliging her father, husband, and many others of her relations and friends who were assembled upon that occasion, to take an oath that they would no longer suffer any King to reign in Rome.

This example may serve to warn those that are discontented under the government of a Prince, to consider their own strength; and if they find they are able to cope with him, it is the safest and most honourable way to declare themselves his enemies, and to make open war upon him : but if they are too weak for that, they must court his favour, and endeavour by all means to ingratiate themselves with him, especially by an obsequious attention to his will, and seeming to be delighted at every thing that pleases him : by which conduct they may not only live secure from all danger, but partake in the good fortune of their Prince, and procure an opportunity of accomplishing their private designs. Some indeed are of opinion that such men ought neither to live so near a Prince, as to be buried in his ruin, if he should fall ; nor so far off as not to be able to advantage themselves by it. And this certainly would be the best course if it could be followed, but as I think that is hardly possible *, it seems necessary to have recourse to one or other of the two just mentioned, and either to alienate one's self totally from him, or endeavour to secure his favour : for whoever does otherwise, especially if he be a man of any eminence, must live in continual danger. It is not sufficient to say, "I expect nothing, I want neither honour nor preferment, I only desire to live quietly and unmolested without meddling in any thing : " for such declarations meet with little credit, and men of distinguished qualities, though void of ambition, cannot live in obscurity and repose, be they ever so desirous of it ; because no body believes them to be in earnest : so that although they should really chuse retirement themselves, other people will not let them continue in it. It is necessary therefore sometimes to act the fool, as Brutus did † : and that is sufficiently done by flat-

* And yet Lepidus did so, as Tacitus tells us, Annal. IV. c. xx. "Hunc ego Lepidum, (says he) temporibus illis, gravem & sapientem virum fuisse comperio. Nam pleraque ab sævis adulationibus aliorum in melius flexit : neque tamen temperamenti egebat, cum æquabili auctoritate & gratiâ apud Tiberium vigerit. Unde dubitare cogor, fato & forte nascendi, ut cætera, ita principum inclinatio in hos, offensio in illos ; an sit aliquid in nostris consiliis, liceatque inter abruptam contumaciam, & deforme obsequium, pergere iter ambitione ac periculis vacuum."— tering, and fawning, and doing, and saying every thing that can gratify a Prince, how disagreeable soever it may be to a man's own private judgment and inclination. But since we have given due honour to the wisdom of Brutus, in making use of such means to recover the Liberty of his Country; let us now say something of the severe measures he took to preserve it.

C H A P. III.

That in order to preserve Liberty when newly recovered, it is necessary to put such men as the Sons of Brutus to death.

THE rigour with which Brutus proceeded in maintaining the Liberties of Rome after he had recovered them, was absolutely requisite; though it was a very rare, if not an unparelled action for a Father to sit in judgment upon his own Sons, and not only condemn them to death, but be present at their execution*. Those however that are conversant in ancient History, well know that in any change of Government, either from Liberty to Slavery, or from Slavery to Liberty, it is necessary that some of those that are enemies to the ruling establishment should be punished in an exemplary manner: for whoever converts a free State into a Tyranny, and does not cut off such men as Brutus; or a tyrannical Government into a Free State, and does not rid himself of such men as his Sons, will not be able to support himself long. But since this matter has already been largely discussed in another place, I refer to what is there said upon it*, and shall add only one example which happened lately, and in our own Country.

Pietro Soderini having restored the liberties of Florence, was of opinion, that by patience and clemency he should be able to mollify the minds of some, who, like the Sons of Brutus, were impatient under the new Government †. But in this he found himself mistaken, and was so much the more to be blamed, as he was a very wise man, and not only saw the necessity of proceeding with rigour, but that the behaviour and ambition of those that opposed him, would furnish him with a sufficient handle to cut them off; and yet he could never prevail upon himself to do it: for besides the hope which he entertained of extinguishing their malevolence by his lenity, moderation, and generosity, he thought (as he often declared to his acquaintance) that in order to depress his adversaries effectually, he should be obliged to assume an extraordinary degree of authority, which would be a breach not only of the laws, but of that civil equality which he himself had so strenuously endeavoured to re-establish; and that though he should not make an ill use of it, it would yet alarm the people in such a manner, that after he was dead they would never make another Gonfalonier for life; which he thought was absolutely necessary. Now though these considerations were wise and good in themselves, yet it is not proper at any time to let an evil grow too predominant, in hopes of doing good in the end, especially when it will probably frustrate your intention. He ought rather to have persuaded himself, that if he lived and maintained his ground, he should be able to convince the world, that what he had done was for the sake of the Public, and not out of private ambition or self-interest; and to have made such provisions, that no succeeding Gonfalonier should have it in his power to do evil by the same measures which he had taken to do good. But he was mistaken in his account, and forgot that such enmities are neither to be extinguished by time, nor appeased by generosity: an error that was attended with the loss of his authority, reputation, and the liberties of his Country; all which might have been prevented, if he had followed the example of Brutus. Now if it is no easy matter to preserve a free Government, it is no less difficult to maintain one that is absolute, as I shall shew in the next Chapter.

C H A P. IV.

That a Prince can never be safe in a State, whilst those are alive whom he has deprived of it.

THE death of Tarquinius Priscus by the Sons of Ancus, and that of Servius Tullus by Tarquinius Superbus, may serve to shew how dangerous a thing it is to deprive a Prince of his State, and suffer him to live, though you heap ever so many favours upon him. Tarquinius Priscus thinking his right to the Kingdom indisputable, as it was given him by the people, and confirmed by the Senate, simply imagin'd that the Sons of Ancus could not be dissatisfied with him, since he had been chosen by the general voice of the Romans to reign over them: and Servius Tullus found himself deceived, after he had endeavoured to sooth the resentment of Tarquin's Sons by all manner of favours. From the first example therefore, a Prince may learn that he can never be safe upon his throne, whilst those are alive whom he has dispossessed of it, and from the second, that a former injury is never to be called by any subsequent obligations; especially if the obligation is not equivalent to the injury.

Without

Without doubt it was very weak in Servius Tullus; to imagine that the Sons of Tarquin would be contented with being his Sons-in-law, when they ought to have been his Sovereigns: for so general is the thirst of dominion in mankind, that it is not only common to those that have a right to rule, but to those that have none; as we may see in the instance of Tullia, daughter to Servius and wife to Tarquinius Superbus; who was so enflamed with this passion, that not contented with being a King's daughter, she longed to be a Queen, and laying aside all filial tenderness and affection, incited her husband to murder her father, and usurp his Kingdom. But if Tarquinius Priscus and Servilius Tullus had taken care to secure themselves against those whom they had supplanted, neither of them would have lost either his life or his Kingdom. Tarquinius Superbus indeed was afterwards expelled, because he could not keep within the bounds observed by his predecessors, as shall be shewn in the next Chapter.

C H A P. V.

How a King may lose his Kingdom though it be hereditary.

Servius Tullus dying without heirs, Tarquinius Superbus, who had slain him, took possession of his Kingdom, without encountering any of those difficulties or dangers which his predecessors had to struggle with: and though the manner by which he obtained it was base and scandalous, yet if he had kept himself within the same bounds that the former Kings had done, and not provoked the people and the Senate, his deperiment would have been borne with, and he might have supported himself in the government. The reason of his expulsion then, was not that his Son Sextus had ravished Lucretia, but because he had violated the laws of the Kingdom, and governed like a Tyrant; having wholly deprived the Senate of their authority, which he took upon himself, and caused all public business, which used to be transacted openly and in their presence, to be carried on privately in his Palace, to the great disgust and dissatisfaction of his subjects: so that he soon deprived the Romans of the liberty they had enjoyed under their former Kings. Nor was he content with making the Senate his enemies, but likewise excited the hatred of the common people, by confining them too severely to hard labour contrary to what they had been accustomed to in the days of his predecessors. The Romans therefore, thus groaning under his pride and cruelty, were sufficiently disposed to rebel as soon as they had a convenient opportunity; and though the rape of Lucretia had never happened, any other fresh instance of oppression would have produced the same effect. But if Tarquin had acted like the other Kings, and shewn due reverence to the laws of his country, Brutus and Collatinus would have applied directly to him, and not to the people, for justice upon his Son. From hence Princes may learn this lesson, that whenever they begin to transgress the laws, and despise the customs which their subjects have been long used to, that moment they likewise begin to lose their power and authority: and if ever they should become so wise when reduced to a private station, as to perceive how easy a matter it is for a prudent and good Prince to maintain himself in his State, such a discovery must still add to the bitterness of their loss, and be a more exquisite punishment than could otherwise be inflicted upon them; for it most certainly is a matter of much less difficulty to gain the affections of good men, than of bad, and safer to observe laws than to trample upon them.

Whoever then would learn to do this, needs not be at any great pains about it, as he has nothing else to do but to look into the lives of good Princes, such as Timoleon the Corinthian, Aratus the Sicyonian, and some others; where he will find that both the Governors and the governed lived in such mutual fatisfaction and security, that he cannot help being desirous to imitate their conduct, especially when he sees how little difficulty there is in it: for when people live under a good Prince, they neither wish for nor would suffer any change of government; as may appear from the example of the Corinthians and Sicyonians with regard to the two great men above-mentioned, whom they obliged to reign over them as long as they lived, though they often attempted to lay down their authority, and retire to a private condition. Now since in this and the two preceding Chapters we have taken some notice of the disaffection and hatred which bad Princes excite in their Subjects, of the conspiracy in which the Sons of Brutus engaged against their country, and of the murder of Tarquinius Priscus and Servius Tullus, it may not be amiss to discourse more largely of Conspiracies in the next Chapter, as it is a Subject that deserves to be well considered both by Princes and private men.

C H A P. VI.

Of Conspiracies.

SINCE Conspiracies are of such dangerous consequence both to Princes and private persons, I thought it necessary to say something of their nature and tendency in this place, especially as many more Princes have lost both their dominions and their lives by them, than by open war; for few people are able to make war; but it is in every one's power to form a conspiracy. On the other hand, a private man cannot engage in any enterprize that is subject to more difficulties and dangers; which is the reason that very few conspiracies have succeeded. That Princes therefore may learn how to guard against these dangers, and private persons be cautious of embarking in them, I shall enlarge upon this Subject, and and omit no circumstance that may seem necessary for the instruction either of the one or the other.

The maxim which Tacitus puts into the mouth of a Roman Senator is indeed a golden one, viz. "That he admired the times that were past, but conformed to the present; and though he could not help wishing for good Princes, he would bear with those that were bad *:" and they that do otherwise often ruin both themselves and their country. If we consider then in the first place, against whom men generally form Conspiracies, we shall find that it is either against their Prince or their country: and to these two sorts I shall confine myself at present, because I have said enough elsewhere concerning those that relate to delivering up a town to an enemy, and others of that kind †. Let us begin then with those that are formed against a Prince, and enquire into their causes which are many and various: but there is one more frequent and of greater importance than any of the rest, and that is the general disaffection of the people. For when a Prince has excited such hatred against him, it is no wonder that some of them, who have been the most grievously injured and oppressed, should meditate revenge: and to this they will be the more effectually animated by the universal discontent which they observe amongst their Fellow-subjects ‡.

A Prince therefore ought above all things to take care not to incur the general hatred of his people, (and how he is to do that I have shewn in another place) § for then he will have the less to apprehend from being guilty of any particular act of oppression or violence: in the first place, because few men carry their resentment so high, as to run any great risque to revenge themselves; and in the next, if they were so disposed, and had an opportunity of doing it, they would be restrained by the general affection which they saw the rest of the people bore to their Prince. As to the violence which Princes commit upon their Subjects, it affects either their property, their life, or their honour: in matters of blood it is much more dangerous to threaten, than to put to death; for in one case, a Prince exposes himself to a thousand perils; but in the other, he runs little or no risque at all; for when a man is once dead, he can no longer think, of revenge, and those that are alive will soon forget him: whereas a man that is threatened, and finds that he must either kill or be killed, is the most dangerous enemy a Prince can have, as I shall shew more particularly hereafter. Next to a man's life, his honour and estate lie nearest his heart, and nothing affects him so much as an attack on either of them: upon which account, it behoves Princes to be very careful not to aggrieve their Subjects in these points: for it is neither possible to strip any one so bare that he cannot find a knife to revenge himself; nor to dishonour and debase him to such a degree, as totally to extinguish every spark of courage and resentment in his breast. In regard to honour, no outrage or affront touches a man so sensibly as those that are offered to his wife, daughter, or other female relation; and next to this we may reckon the contempt of his own person: the latter of which provoked Pausanias to assassinate Philip of Macedon, and the former has frequently proved fatal to several Princes; even in our own times Julio Belanti conspired against Pandolpho, Lord of Siena, who, though he had given him his daughter to wife, afterwards took her away from him, as we shall relate in another place. The chief reason that induced the Pazzi to conspire against the Medici at Florence, was the loss of Giovanni Borromei's inheritance, which he was deprived of by the award of the Medici *. There is also another motive, and a very powerful one too, which often engages men to conspire against their Prince, and that is the desire of delivering their country. This it was that spirited up Brutus and Cassius to plunge their daggers into the heart of Julius Cæsar, and occasioned the conspiracies against Phalaris, Dionysius, and many others who had enslaved their country: and indeed it is not possible for Tyrants to screen themselves from such dangers, any other way than by abdication. But as they very rarely can be prevailed upon to consent to this, they generally come to miserable ends: hence the Poet truly says,

Descendunt Reges, & siccâ morte Tyranni.

Juv. Sat. x. v. 112.

To Pluto's dreary realms most Tyrants go,
Besmear'd with blood, and full of wounds and woe.

The dangers which occur in Conspiracies are so many and various (as I said before) that there is great hazard not only in conducting and executing them, but even after the execution; because many persons must be privy to them: for where one man only is concerned, it cannot so properly be called a conspiracy, as a design to kill his Prince: in which case he is free from the first danger that attends all Conspiracies; that is, he cannot be betrayed before the time of execution, because he has not trusted any one with the secret. Such a resolution as this may be formed by any person whatsoever, high or low, rich or poor, an intimate or a stranger; for every man has an opportunity one time or other, of coming near his Prince; and he that can do that may easily take his revenge, if he has been injured. Pausanias (of whom we have had occasion to speak before) killed Philip of Macedon as he was going to the Temple in the midst of his guards, with his Son on his right hand, and his Son-in-law on the left. But as he was a Nobleman, and familiar with his Prince, we shall quote two other examples of meaner quality: the first is a poor miserable Spaniard, who stabbed Ferdinand

King of Spain in the throat; and though the wound was not mortal, yet it shewed that he had both resolution and opportunity sufficient to have killed him. The next is a Turkish Dervis, who drew a dagger upon Bajazet, father of the present Sultan, with which he struck at him, but missed his blow. From these instances, and many others of the same kind, which it would be tedious to enumerate, we may conclude that there are many persons who wish to take the same revenge upon Princes that have injured them, (as there is no danger in wishing) though few have courage to attempt it: for since scarce any one that ventures to strike such a blow, escapes being cut to pieces upon the spot, it deters people from embarking in an undertaking wherein they are almost sure to perish. So much for the resolution and attempts of a single person: let us now proceed to Conspiracies, in which more are concerned.

We find in History that Conspiracies are always formed and conducted either by great men, or such as are intimate with their Prince: no other men can think of conspiring, except they be fools; because private persons, and such as have not the opportunity of frequent access to him, must want all those means and conveniencies that are necessary for the execution of such designs. In the first place, they cannot meet with associates that will be faithful to them, as they have nothing to give them, nor is it in their power to buoy them up with such hopes and promises as generally make men willing to expose themselves to great dangers, when it is well known they are not able to fulfil them: so that when the secret is communicated to three or four persons, some one of them betrays the rest, and they are all ruined. But, supposing they should not be betrayed; yet they must have so many obstacles and impediments to encounter when they come to the point of execution (not having free access to their Prince) that it is not possible they should succeed: for, if great men, and such as meet with a ready admission into his presence, find many such difficulties (as we shall mention hereafter) it may reasonably be expected, that those of meaner condition must find infinitely more and greater. Such men therefore, when they are not absolutely reduced to despair by the certainty of losing either their lives or their estates, may be outrageously provoked at their Prince, but considering they are too weak to revenge themselves, they generally vent their rage in libels and curses, and leave it to men who have greater abilities and fairer opportunities to avenge their cause: for if any one is hardy enough to attempt it himself, without waiting for such assistance, it may truly be said of him, that his courage is greater than his prudence.

All Conspiracies therefore have been formed by great men and favourites of Princes; of whom, as many have been encouraged to it by being too much caressed, as have been provoked to it by suffering the severest injuries, which we might shew at large from the ingratitude of Perennius to Commodus, Plautianus to Severus, and Sejanus to Tiberius, who had all been advanced to such honours, authority, and riches, by their respective masters, that they wanted nothing but the title of Emperor: and as they aspired to that also, they engaged in conspiracies against their Princes, and all met with the fate they justly deserved. That indeed, which was formed not long ago by Giacopo Appiano against Pietro Gambacorti, Lord of Pisa, was more successful; for, though Appiano had been brought up, caressed, and preferred to great eminence by him, he deposed his benefactor, and seized upon the Government. Another attempt of this kind happened in our own times, when Coppola conspired against Ferdinand, King of Arragon, who had heaped so many favours upon him, and exalted him to such a degree of power, that he seemed to be King himself in every thing but the name, but not content with that, he lost his life by grasping at the crown. Now if success may reasonably be expected in any plot that is carried on by great men against Princes, that surely is most likely to succeed, which is conducted by those whose authority is almost equal to that of the Prince himself, and who have all the opportunities and conveniencies they can wish for: but that eagerness to become Sovereigns which induces them to form such projects, blinds them when they come to put them in execution: for, if they could conduct them with prudence and coolness, it would be impossible they should miscarry.

A Prince therefore, who would preserve himself from such dangers, should be more upon his guard against those whom he has honoured with the greatest favours and authority, than those whom he has most cruelly oppressed; the former have many opportunities of hurting him, but the latter can have few or none; and their motives are equal, since the desire of reigning is at least as strong as that of revenge. He ought never to give such a degree of power to any favourite, as to put him on a level with himself, but to leave an interval, as it were, and something more to be wished for; lest, if he should not be content with what he had, he should aspire immediately to the crown; this caution being neglected, he must be greatly befriended by fortune, if he does not meet with the same fate which the Princes did whom we have just now mentioned. But to resume the order of our discourse.—As those that engage in Conspiracies must be great men, and have free access to their Prince, I shall say something of the execution of such undertakings, and the causes or circumstances that contribute either to their success or miscarriage. And since they are always attended with great danger, both before, and after, as well as at the time of executing, (as I have already said) very few of them succeed; it being almost impossible that something should not happen, in one or other of these three periods, that must render them abortive.—To begin with the first and most important. The Conspirators must be very fortunate as well as artful, artful, if their design is not discovered whilst it is carrying on : as it easily may be, either by the information of some, or the suspicion and conjectures of others. Now such discoveries are owing either to the want of fidelity or caution in the accomplices ; the former of which may easily be accounted for, as such designs are never communicated but to those you either have so much confidence in, that you think they will cheerfully run the risque of their lives on your account, or are disaffected to their Prince : and though such a degree of fidelity may be found perhaps in one or two persons, yet when the secret comes to be imparted to numbers, it is impossible they should all prove true to you ; for great indeed must be their affection, if the prospect of danger, and the fear of death are not more powerful. Besides men are often deceived in the friendship which they think others have for them ; for they cannot be sure of it, except they have sufficiently tried them before ; and experiments of this kind would certainly be very hazardous : and though you may have had some proofs of their fidelity in other things of trust and importance, you are not upon that account to depend upon their fidelity in these matters, because they are attended with infinitely more danger and terror. But if you build your hopes upon their disaffection to their Prince ; in this likewise you are liable to be fatally mistaken : for as soon as you have opened your designs to such people, you give them an opportunity of obtaining his favour ; and then surely their discontent must either be very great, or your influence over them exceeding powerful, if they continue any longer steady to you. Hence it is, that so many conspiracies have been discovered and nipped in the very bud ; and that, when any one has been kept private a considerable time, it has been looked upon as next to a miracle ; especially where many were concerned in it ; as there were in that of Piso against Nero, and lately in that of the Pazzi against Lorenzo and Guiliano de' Medici at Florence ; to which, above fifty persons were privy, and yet it was not discovered till it came to be put in execution.

It likewise happens, that conspiracies are sometimes discovered from want of proper caution and discretion in the Conspirators; that is, when any of them either chances to talk of their designs with so little reserve, that they are overheard by a servant or some other person; as it happened to the sons of Brutus, whose negotiations with Tarquin's Ambassadors were brought to light in that manner; or when they lightly disclose them to some careless person whom they love; as Dymnus did, who having joined in a conspiracy with Philotas against Alexander the Great, inadvertently blabbed it out to Nicomachus, a boy he was fond of, who presently carried it to Cebalinus his brother, and Cebalinus to the King.

As to discoveries that arise from suspicions and conjectures, we have an instance in the Pisonian conspiracy against Nero: for Scevinus, one of the Conspirators, having made his will the day before Nero was to have been dispatched, ordered Melichius his freedman to whet an old rusty dagger, made all his slaves free, distributed sums of money amongst them, and caused several bandages and pledgets for wounds to be got in readiness: from all which preparations, Melichius suspecting that something extraordinary was in hand, went and informed Nero of it, who caused Scevinus to be immediately apprehended, and then secured Natales, another of the Conspirators, with whom he had been seen talking in private for a long time the day before: and as they did not agree, when examined, in the account which they gave of that conversation, they were forced at last to discover the whole, by which all those that had any share in it were utterly ruined. It is impossible therefore to prevent discoveries being occasioned, either by want of fidelity, prudence, or caution, whenever the accomplices exceed the number of three or four: and if more than one of these should be taken up on suspicion, suspicion, and examined, the whole must come out, since they cannot possibly agree in the same story: one man indeed, if he is a person of great resolution, may perhaps conceal his associates; but if they have not as much courage as himself, they will be apt to betray themselves by flying: for if there should be a deficiency of steadiness and resolution either in him that is taken up, or in them that are at liberty, the conspiracy must infallibly be discovered. There is indeed a very rare and uncommon example of fidelity in those that conspired against Hieronymus, King of Syracuse: for though, according to Livy, one of them, named Theodorus, was apprehended, and put to the torture, he resolutely concealed the names of his accomplices, and accused some of the King's friends; whilst the other Conspirators had such confidence in the courage and constancy of Theodorus, that not so much as one of them either fled out of the City, or betrayed the least sign of fear.—Such are the difficulties that occur in forming a conspiracy and conducting it to execution; but as there are dangers, there are also some ways of guarding against them.

The first, the safest, and perhaps, the only one, is not to give your accomplices time to discover you; for which purpose, they should not be made privy to your design till it is upon the very point of execution. Those that observe this rule will at least escape the dangers that may happen whilst the plot is carrying on, and very often all others, for we may venture to affirm, that all the conspiracies that have been thus conducted, have succeeded; and that it is in any wise man's power to act in the same manner. Let two or three examples suffice. Nelematus not being able to bear with the tyranny of Aristotimus, King of Epirus, assembled several relations and friends in his own house, and exhorting them to deliver their country, some of them desired time to consider of it, and make necessary preparations for such an undertaking: upon which, he ordered his servants to lock the doors, and protested that if they would not take an oath to proceed directly to execution, he would deliver them all up prisoners to Aristotimus: being terrified with these menaces, they all took the oath, and following him, immediately fell upon the Tyrant, and happily recovered their liberties by the conduct of Nelematus. The next is of one of the Magi, who had got possession of the Kingdom of Persia by artifice; but the cheat being discovered by Ortanus, a Nobleman of that Kingdom, he privately conferred with six other great men, and conjured them to assist him to kill the Usurper, and set their country free: some of them however seeming rather scrupulous about the matter, and desiring further time to consider of it, Darius (one of the six whom he had called together) got up and said, "Either resolve to do it instantly, or I will inform against you all;" which had such an effect upon them, that without any further delay or hesitation, they unanimously determined to concur with him, and succeeded in the enterprize. The method which the Etolians took to rid themselves of Nabis, the Tyrant of Sparta, was not unlike the two examples just quoted: for they sent Alexamenes, one of their Citizens, with thirty horse and two hundred foot, as auxiliaries; but communicated the secret to Alexamenes alone, whose commands they ordered all the rest to obey on penalty of perpetual exile. Alexamenes accordingly marched to Sparta; and not communicating his commission to any one till he had an opportunity of executing it, soon found means to dispatch the Tyrant. In this manner all the persons abovementioned escaped the dangers that usually occur, in bringing conspiracies to maturity; and others may likewise succeed by the same precaution, which is in every one's power, as I shall shew from the example of Piso, whom I have mentioned before. Piso was a man of great distinction, and in such confidence with Nero, that the latter went frequently to sup with him in his gardens; he therefore, might easily introduce some of his friends whilst Nero was there, there, and such only as he knew to be men of resolution, and fit for an undertaking of that kind: after which, he might have communicated to them his design of assassinating the Emperor immediately, and prevailed upon them to assist in the affair, when they had not time to demur, and the opportunity was so fair, that it was impossible it should miscarry. And if we consider other conspiracies, we shall find that there have not been many which might not have been successfully conducted in some such a manner; but as few men are sufficiently conversant either in History, or the affairs of the world, they often are guilty of great errors; especially in undertakings of so extraordinary a nature as those we are speaking of.

A plot then should never be communicated till it becomes absolutely necessary, and is ripe for execution; and in that case, it should be communicated to one man only, who has either sufficiently convinced you of his fidelity by many repeated trials, or has had as much provocation to conspire as yourself; for it is an easier matter to find one man that will be faithful to you than a number, and consequently there must be less danger of being discovered. Besides, if he should betray you, you will even in that case have a better chance to save yourself, than when more are concerned: for I have heard wise men say, that you may trust one person with any secret, provided you give nothing under your hand, which may afterwards be produced in evidence against you, which ought most carefully to be avoided; because in that case the positive denial of one man, will have as much weight as the affirmation of another: but if your own hand-writing appears against you, you are undone, as there can be no stronger testimony of your guilt. Plautianus having formed a design to kill the Emperor Severus and his Son Antoninus, communicated the affair to Saturninus, one of the Tribunes; who, instead of concurring with him, resolved to discover it to the Emperor: but as he was afraid that when he came to make good his charge, Plautianus would

would meet with more credit than himself, he desired to have the particulars of the matter in writing to consider of; that so there might be no doubt concerning the truth of his information. Plautianus therefore, blinded by ambition, rashly gave him the particulars he demanded in his own hand writing, which afterwards served to convict him*: whereas, without that proof and some other circumstances to confirm it, he would have baffled the Tribune, as he boldly and positively asserted his innocence: from whence it appears that there is some security against the accusation of one person only, when a man cannot be convicted by his own writing, or some other strong and circumstantial proofs, which he ought to guard against with particular care. In the Pisonian conspiracy a woman was concerned whose name was Epicharis, and who had been one of Nero's mistresses. This woman finding it necessary to draw a certain Captain of Nero's guards into the plot; acquainted him with the affair, but concealed the names of the conspirators: so that although the Captain betrayed her, and informed Nero of the design, she denied it with such firmness that the Emperor was confounded, and she escaped with impunity. Whoever then imparts a secret of this kind to one man only, and that too by word of mouth, has but two things to fear: the first is, that he may voluntarily inform against him; and the next, that he may do it when apprehended upon some suspicion or discovery of his own actions, and be forced to accuse him by torture: in both which cases he may in some measure defend himself; for in one, he may insist that it is owing to private malice in the informer; and in the other, he may alledge that the accusation is false and extorted by the extremity of pain. It is best however either not to trust any one at all with such a design, till it is ready for execution, and to imitate the example of those whom we have mentioned above; or, if it should become necessary to communicate your intentions sooner, not to admit of more than one accomplice; for if there be some danger even in this, there is certainly much more in having many. Such is the conduct generally observed by those who find that if they do not kill their Prince he will certainly kill them; in which case, the necessity is so urgent that they have nothing to do but to provide immediately for their own safety: and these sudden resolutions are commonly successful, as may appear from the two following examples.

The persons in whom the Emperor Commodus put most confidence were Letus and Electus, two Captains of the Prætorian bands, and Marcia, his favourite Mistress. But as they sometimes took the liberty to represent to him how much he debased both himself and his authority by his scandalous course of life, he resolved to put them to death; in consequence of which, he wrote down their names, and those of some others whom he designed to have dispatched the ensuing night, upon a piece of paper, which he laid under his pillow; but going out of his apartment to bathe, a boy whom he was fond of happening to be left behind, who finding the paper, carried it into another room, where he was met by Marcia, who took it out of his hand and read it. Upon which, she immediately sent for Letus and Electus, and acquainting them with the danger they were in, they murdered the emperor that very evening. The next instance relates to Antoninus Caracalla; who being in Mesopotamia with his army, had appointed Marcrinus his Lieutenant, a man more conversant in civil intrigues than military affairs. And as the Emperor, like all bad Princes, was conscious of his own demerits, and suspected that some conspiracy was forming against him, he wrote to his friend Maternianus at Rome, desiring him to consult the Astrologers upon this subject, and to let him know their answer. In answer to which, Maternianus sent him word that he had obeyed his orders, and that the Astrologers said Macrinus aspired to the Empire : but as the letter fell into the hands of Macrinus instead of the Emperor, and the Lieutenant perceiving he must either kill his Master, before he could receive any other letters from Rome, or be killed himself, ordered Martialis, a Centurion who was firmly attached to his interests, (and whose brother Caracalla had put to death but a few days before) to dispatch him ; which he accordingly did without any difficulty or opposition. We see then, that when the necessity is so pressing that it allows no time for deliberation, it has the same effect with the method taken by Nelematus to dispatch the Tyrant of Epirus : we likewise see the truth of what I laid down in the beginning of this discourse, viz. that threats are more prejudicial to Princes, and occasion more dangerous conspiracies, than the actual commission of violence : upon which account, a Prince ought studiously to avoid making use of them ; and either to care for those whom he suspects, and make them his friends by kind and beneficent measures ; or to secure himself against them some other way ; but never to reduce them to such a desperate situation, that they must either kill him or be killed themselves.

As to the dangers which attend the execution of a plot, they arise either from some sudden change in the plan and order of it, or from want of courage in those that are to strike the finishing stroke, or from some blunder, or lastly, from doing things by halves, and leaving some of those alive, who were marked out for slaughter. With regard to the first, there is nothing that occasions so much confusion and perplexity in any business as an unforeseen change in the first established plan ; and if these sudden alterations are prejudicial in all cases, they must be particularly so in military operations, and in such enterprizes as we are now speaking of : for in affairs of this nature, nothing is more necessary than that every man should know the part he is to act, that he may thoroughly prepare himself for it : because when men have once

duly considered these matters with themselves and dwelt upon them some time, and determined to proceed, they must of necessity be embarrassed to such a degree by any variation of orders at the moment of execution; that every thing will be turned upside down, and all their designs entirely defeated. It is therefore much better to proceed according to the plan first established, though it may be attended with some inconveniencies, than to run into more and greater embarrassments by reversing it, which must be the case when the necessity is urgent, and the time for action near at hand; but when there is sufficient opportunity to alter your measures, and lay a new scheme, you may change them as you think proper. The Conspiracy in which the Pazzi engaged against Lorenzo and Giuliano de' Medici at Florence, is fresh in every one's memory. According to the first design they were to be invited to dine with the Cardinal of St. George, and there to be assassinated. In this plot, every man had his particular part assigned him; some were appointed to kill them, some to seize upon the Palace, and others to scour the streets, and excite the people to take up arms for the recovery of their liberties. But whilst the Pazzi, the Medici, and the Cardinal were attending a solemn service in the Cathedral, the Conspirators received intelligence that Giuliano could not dine with the Cardinal at the time appointed: upon which, they assembled together and resolved to murder them in the Church. But this entirely disconcerted their plan; for Giovanni Battista da Montefecco, who was to have been one of the persons that were to stab the Medici, peremptorily refused to do it in the Church: so that they were forced to employ others, who not having time to compose themselves sufficiently for such an action, were guilty of so many blunders, that they all perished in the attempt.

Want of courage at the time of executing proceeds either from reverence to the person that is to be dispatched, or baseness and pusillanimity in the Conspirators:

rators: for the presence and Majesty of some Princes inspire the beholders with a sort of reverential awe and veneration, which either damp the resolution or mollify the resentment of their enemies. When Marius was taken by the Minturnians, a Slave was sent to put him to death in prison: but when the wretch came to execute his commission, he was so struck with the presence of so great a man, and the remembrance of his actions, that his heart failed him, and he had not the courage to kill him. Now if the presence of a man in prison, in distress and misery, had such an effect; that of a Prince attended by his Courtiers and all the pomp of Royalty, must certainly strike an awe into the boldest and soften the hardest heart. A conspiracy being formed against Sitalcis King of Thrace, a day was fixed for putting it in execution: but when the accomplices met at the place where he then resided, not one of them offering to move, they all returned without making any attempt, blaming each other, without being able to assign any reason for not having executed their design. The same thing happened to them several times afterwards: so that the Conspiracy being discovered, they were all put to death, after they had had so many opportunities of killing their Prince. Alphonso Duke of Ferrara had two brothers who conspired against him, and were joined by one Giannes, a Priest and singing man in the Duke's Chapel: and though this man had often at their request brought the Duke into their Company, and given them an opportunity of assassinating him, yet neither of them having the heart to attempt it, they were discovered, and punished as they justly deserved. Now this irresolution in conspirators arises either from the reverence with which the presence of a Prince inspires them, or from his courtesy and affability which takes off the edge of their revenge. But the blunders and miscarriages which often happen in the execution of conspiracies are owing either to rashness or terror, both which blind the understanding and occasion such a hurry and trepidation of Spirit, that they make men

both say and do things which they ought not. Livy, speaking of Alexamenes the Etolian, who delivered his country from the Tyranny of Nabis the Spartan, says, that when he had opened his design to his Soldiers, and was just going to put it in execution, “collegit & ipse animum, confusum tantæ cogitatione rei; he collected his Spirits together, which had been in some measure disconcerted, by reflecting upon the execution of so great a design:” and indeed it is almost impossible that any one, though ever so resolute and accustomed to bloodshed, should be altogether calm and unmoved upon such occasions. It is necessary therefore in undertakings of this kind to make use of men that have been sufficiently hardened and tried, and to trust no others, how courageous soever they may be accounted: for no man can answer even for his own resolution, if he has not thoroughly proved it before; for the confusion he must naturally be in at such a time may either make him drop the dagger out of his hand, or say something which may have the same effect. Lucilla, Sister to Commodus, having spirited up Quintianus to kill her brother, he waited for him as he came to the Amphitheatre, and stepping up towards him with a drawn dagger in his hand, told him “the Senate had sent him that:” upon which, he was immediately seized before he could get near enough to stab him. Antonio da Volterra being fixed upon to kill Lorenzo de’ Medici, cried out, as he advanced towards him, (Hah Traitor!) which proved the preservation of Lorenzo, and the ruin of the conspiracy.

If then the event of conspiracies is very precarious when they are directed against one man only, it must of necessity be much more so when they are directed against two; indeed in such a case it would be folly to entertain the least expectation of success: for to execute such an enterprize in two different places at the same time is next to impossible: and if it is attempted at different times, one will defeat the other; so that conspiring against one Prince is a doubtful, dangerous, and imprudent undertaking ; but to conspire against two at the same time, must either be downright folly or madness ; and was it not out of the great opinion I have of the Author, I could not believe what Herodian says of Plautianus, when he tells us that he ordered one single Centurion, whose name was Saturninus, to assassinate both Severus and Antoninus, though they lived in different places : for it seems so strange and so inconsistent with reason and common sense, that nothing but the authority of so noble an Historian could ever persuade me to give any credit to it. In a conspiracy that was formed by some young Athenians against the two Tyrants Diocles and Hippias, the former was killed, but the latter escaped and revenged his death. Chiones and Leonides, two of Plato's disciples, conspired against Clearchus and Satirus, Tyrants of Heraclea, and dispatched Clearchus, but Satirus saved himself, and punished the Conspirators ; and the Pazzi, whom we have so often mentioned, killed Giuliano de' Medici only. A man therefore ought carefully to avoid engaging in a conspiracy against more than one person at the same time ; otherwise he will neither do himself, nor his friends, nor his country, any service, but probably much prejudice, as those that escape will afterwards become more tyrannical and insupportable, which was the consequence of the abovementioned conspiracies at Florence, Athens, and Heraclea. The success indeed of that conspiracy in which Pelopidas engaged to set the Thebans free, was wonderful, because he had all manner of difficulties and dangers to encounter ; and yet he surmounted them all : for instead of two Tyrants, he had ten to deal with ; he was so far from being a favourite, or having free access to them, that he was in banishment : nevertheless he found means not only to get admission into Thebes, but to kill the Tyrants, and restore the liberties of his country : but this could not have been effected without the assistance and co-operation of Charon, one of the Tyrant's Counsellors, who let him into the City, and furnished furnished him with an opportunity of executing his designs. It would be very dangerous however for any man to build upon the success of this conspiracy; which indeed was almost miraculous, and is mentioned by all writers that speak of it, as not only a rare, but almost unexampled event.

Conspiracies are likewise sometimes defeated when they are just upon the point of execution, by some groundless suspicion, or unexpected accident. The very morning that Brutus and the other Conspirators were to assassinate Julius Cæsar, it happened that the latter had a long conversation with Popilius Lenas, one of their accomplices; which being observed by the rest, they suspected he had discovered their design to Cæsar: upon which, they determined not to wait till Cæsar came into the Senate, but to kill him immediately: and they would actually have done it, if they had not discovered that they had no reason for such a suspicion, by observing that there was no alteration in his countenance after the conversation was ended. Such suspicions then ought to be well weighed and considered; especially as they are very common: for when a man who knows himself guilty sees people talking together, he naturally imagines they are talking of him; and sometimes a word or two overheard by chance (though spoken with a very different intention) throws him into an alarm, as he thinks they allude to his affair: the usual consequence of which is, that he either discovers it by running away, or defeats it by too precipitate an execution; especially if he has many accomplices.

As to accidents, they are so various, and often so sudden and unexpected, that no certain rule can be laid down how to prevent them. Let it suffice then to give an instance of one only, and to warn men to guard against them as well as they can. Julio Belanti of Siena (whom we have mentioned before) was so provoked at Pandolpho, who had first given him his daughter in marriage, and then taken her away from him, that he resolved to murder him: and as Pandolpho went every day by his door to see one of his relations that was sick, the other, having got a parcel of armed men at his own house for that purpose, placed one of them to watch at a window and give him notice when Pandolpho came by. But it happened when Pandolpho drew near the house, and the man had given Julio notice of it, that he met an acquaintance who stopped him; and his attendants going forwards, and hearing a great bustle and noise of arms in the house, discovered the design; so that Pandolpho escaped, and Julio and his accomplices were forced to fly their country: all which was owing to the accidental meeting of Pandolpho and his friend. But as accidents are sudden and unexpected, as well as various, no particular remedy can be prescribed: all that a man can do, is to consider what is most likely to happen, and to make the best provision against it that lies in his power.

It now remains to say something of what is to be apprehended after a Conspiracy has actually been carried into execution: and in that case there is little or nothing to be feared, except some are left alive that may revenge the death of the Prince who has been killed; as his brothers, sons, or others who have a right to succeed him in the Government. Now this is generally owing either to want of proper care in the Conspirators, or to some of the reasons which we have already given: as it happened in the Case of Giovanni Lampognano and his accomplices; who having killed the Duke of Milan, left his Son and two brothers alive, who afterwards revenged his death*: and indeed there is something to be said in favour of Conspirators in such cases; as it is not always in their power to prevent it; but when it proceeds from their own imprudence or want of due care, they have no excuse. Some of the inhabitants of Forli having murdered their Prince Count Girolamo, seized his Countess Catharina and two of his children; but not thinking themselves secure, except they could get possession of the Castle, which the Governor refused to deliver up, the Countess told them, that if they would let her go to him, she would make him surrender immediately; and that she would leave her children with them as hostages for the performance of her promise: upon which, they suffered her to go. But as soon as she was in the Castle, she got upon the walls, and not only reproached them most bitterly with the murder of her husband, but threatened to take the severest revenge that lay in her power: and to convince them that she was not to be restrained from it by any affection to her children, she so far forgot the modesty of her Sex, that she pulled up her cloaths, and told them she was still young enough to have more: so that the Conspirators perceiving their error when it was too late, and not knowing what other course to take, were forced to leave their country and spend the rest of their lives in exile*. But of all the dangers that may happen after the execution of a plot, that which is most to be dreaded and most difficult to avoid, is, when the Prince that is killed was much beloved by his Subjects; for then it is impossible for the Conspirators to save themselves: as may appear from the death of Julius Cæsar, which was soon revenged by the Roman people, because they adored his memory; for the Conspirators being driven out of the City and scattered about the world, some of them perished in one manner, and some in another.

Conspiracies against a Republican Government are not attended with so much danger to the accomplices as those against Princes: for in conducting them the risque is not so great, and in executing them it is but equal, and after that there is none at all. In conducting them the danger is not so great, because any subject may aspire to the Government, and lay his schemes without communicating them to any one:

after which, if they are not frustrated by some new law, he must necessarily succeed; and if they are, he has nothing to do but to wait for another opportunity and to take different measures. This however is to be understood only of a Republic that is become in some degree corrupt: for in one that is not so, there can be no hopes of success in such designs, as there is nothing either to occasion or encourage them; and therefore no individual will harbour any thoughts of that kind. But in those that are corrupt, there are many ways and means by which a Subject may aspire to Sovereignty without exposing himself to any great danger: for in the first place, all Republics are not only more tardy and phlegmatic in their operations than Princes, but likewise more free from suspicion, and consequently not so much upon their guard; and in the next, they shew more tenderness and respect to their great men, which makes them bolder and more enterprising. Every body that has read the History of Catiline's conspiracy written by Sallust, must remember that Catiline not only continued in Rome after the conspiracy was discovered, but came into the Senate, and insulted both the Senators and the Consul: and that after he had left the City and was at the head of an army, Lentulus and the rest of the Conspirators would not have been taken up, if the strongest proofs of their guilt had not appeared from Letters in their own hand-writing: such was the lenity with which that Commonwealth treated its Subjects. Hanno, a Citizen of very great power and authority in Carthage, designing to make himself Sovereign of it, invited the whole Senate to a great entertainment which he had made to celebrate the marriage of his daughter, with an intention to poison them and to seize upon the government; and though his design was discovered, the Senate did not think fit to inflict any punishment upon him; but contented themselves with making a Law to restrain the expences of such feasts for the future: which shews what regard they had for Citizens of his distinction. It is true

the execution of a Conspiracy against the liberty of one's country, is attended with many great difficulties and dangers: because it seldom happens that a person who conspires against such numbers of people, has strength enough to insure success; for it is not every one that has an army at command, as Julius Cæsar, Agathocles, Cleomenes, and some others had; by the assistance of which, they presently enslaved their country, without either difficulty or danger. But others who have no army to support them, and yet aspire to Sovereignty, must either have recourse to artifice, or call in foreign assistance: of the former case we have an instance in the conduct of Pisistratus the Athenian, who having made himself very popular by the victory which he had gained over the Megarians, appeared in public one day all over blood, and pretended that he had been wounded and otherwise abused by some of the Nobility, out of the envy they bore him; upon which account, he desired a guard might be allowed him for the security of his person: which being granted, he availed himself of it in such a manner, that he soon became absolute. Pandolpho Petrucci, at his return to Siena with some others who had been banished from thence, was made Captain of the palace-guards, a post which was thought to be of so little consequence that several had refused it: nevertheless, he acquired such a degree of authority and reputation in a short time, by the command which he had over those guards, that at last he seized upon the Government. Many others likewise, by such arts, have succeeded in the same manner, without exposing themselves to much danger. But those who have endeavoured to overturn the constitution of the country, either by dint of their own strength, or calling in foreign assistance, have succeeded accordingly as they were befriended by fortune. Catiline perished in the attempt: Hanno, having failed in his design to poison the Senate, armed several thousands of his partizans, but they were all killed together with their Chief. Some of the principal Citizens of Thebes who had conspired against their Country, called in a Spartan army to their aid, and made themselves Tyrants over it : so that if we examine the event of all the Conspiracies which men have engaged in against their Country, we shall find that few or none have been crushed whilst they were forming ; but that the success or miscarriage of them all has wholly depended upon the execution ; which being once over, the Conspirators are subject to no other dangers than those that are naturally incident to a tyrannical government : against which, there are no other means to secure one's self but those which have been already mentioned.

This is all that I have to say of Conspiracies : and if I have spoken of those only that are executed by the sword, without taking any notice of such as are attempted by poison, it is because they are both conducted in the same manner, and have the same event. It is true indeed, that poisoning is attended with more danger, and is more uncertain than the other ; because very few people have an opportunity of doing it, and therefore they must employ others that have, which makes it very hazardous. Besides, the dose may not prove mortal, as it happened in the attempt upon Commodus, who throwing the poison up which the Conspirators had given him, they were forced to strangle him. There is nothing therefore which Princes ought to dread so much as Conspiracies ; since they generally lose either their life or their reputation by them : for if a Conspiracy succeeds, they are killed ; but if they discover it, and put the Conspirators to death, it is often looked upon as a trick of state, and a contrivance in the Prince to gratify either his avarice or his cruelty with the blood or estates of his Subjects. I cannot conclude this discourse, however, without advising all Princes and Republics, upon the discovery of a Conspiracy carefully to examine into the nature of it, and to compare the strength of the Conspirators with their own, before they proceed to punish them ; and if they find them them many and powerful, not to take any notice of the matter, till they are sufficiently able to crush them : otherwise, they must inevitably be ruined themselves. They should therefore have recourse to dissimulation upon such occasions ; lest the Conspirators, when they find themselves discovered, should grow desperate and proceed directly to execution. The Romans having left two legions at Capua to defend it against the Samnites, the Commanders of those forces formed a design to make themselves masters of that place *, which being discovered by the Romans, they ordered Rutilius, one of the Consuls, to take proper care to prevent it. The Consul therefore, in order to lull them into security, gave out that the Senate intended to keep them there a considerable time : which report being credited, they thought they had no occasion to be over hasty in the execution of their design, but might wait till they had a proper opportunity ; so that they continued quiet till they perceived the Consul was going to separate them : upon which, they began to suspect his intention, and finding they had no more time to lose, they immediately seized upon the Government. An example very suitable to our purpose : for, on one hand, we see hereby how tardy men are in such affairs whilst they think themselves secure, and have time enough to put them in execution : and on the other, how active and vigorous when the necessity is urgent. Nor can either a Prince or a Republic that is desirous to conceal their knowledge of a Conspiracy, act more prudently, than in artfully giving the Conspirators reason to expect they shall have a fair opportunity of executing their designs at some certain time afterwards ; that so, whilst they are waiting for it, he may have leisure to provide for his safety ; and those that have acted otherwise, have only hastened their own ruin, like the Duke of Athens and Gulielmo de' Pazzi. For the Duke having seized upon the Government of Florence, and being informed that a Conspiracy was hatching against him, immediately caused one of the Conspirators to be apprehended, without making any enquiry into the nature of it : upon which, the rest presently took arms, and drove him out of the City *. Much like this was the conduct off Gulielmo de' Pazzi, who being Commissary for the Florentines in the Vale of Chiana, about the year 1501, and hearing that some persons of Arezzo were conspiring in favour of the Vitelli, to take that town from the Florentines, he went thither himself in all haste, and instead of considering the strength of the Conspirators, and comparing it with his own, or taking other proper measures to suppress them, he followed the advice of his son, who was Bishop of that place, and ordered one of them to be taken up ; which so alarmed the others, that they instantly rose upon him, and not only made him prisoner, but intirely shook off the yoke of the Florentines. But when Conspiracies are weak and in their infancy, they may, and ought to be suppressed as soon as possible : for it would be simple in that case to follow the examples either of the Duke of Athens, or Dion of Syracuse, though indeed they acted very different parts upon such an occasion : for the former caused one of the Citizens of Florence to be put to death, who had acquainted him with a Conspiracy that was carrying on against him ; to shew that he had more confidence in the affection of the Florentines than to believe any such thing : and the latter, in order to discover some persons whom he suspected of conspiring against him, gave Calippus, one of his confidants, a commission to join him, under a pretence of secret disaffection and disgust. But both these artifices proved of fatal consequence to those that made use of them : for the one not only deterred people from discovering any Conspiracy, but encouraged them to conspire, and the other made Dion the occasion of a conspiracy against himself, which ended in his ruin; for Calippus perceiving he might act with security under that commission, availed himself of it in such a manner, that he killed his master, and made himself King of Syracuse.

C H A P. VII.

How it comes to pass that in changes of States from liberty to servitude, and from servitude to liberty, some are effected without violence or bloodshed; and others are attended with both.

IT may seem strange, perhaps, to many, that in the revolutions of States a free Government should be sometimes changed into a Tyranny, and Tyranny into a free Government, without any violence or bloodshed; and at others, with great slaughter and confusion: of which we have many instances in History. Thus when the Roman constitution was altered from a Regal to a Consular Government, no person was banished or otherwise oppressed except the Tarquins. This however may easily be accounted for, if we consider, that when a State has been acquired by violence, many must have been injured, and of consequence will endeavour to revenge themselves upon the authors of their sufferings, whenever any such change happens; from whence much bloodshed and tumult must naturally ensue. But when a Government has been established by the general consent of the people, and they afterwards think proper to dissolve it, they have no occasion to disturb or use violence to any one but those whom they have placed at the head of it. Accordingly when the Tarquins were expelled Rome, and the Medici deprived of their authority at Florence in the year 1414, no other person whatsoever was injured by it. Such changes therefore are not attended with much danger: but those that are effected by people who have been injured and deprived of either their power or their properties by the usurpa-usurpation of their late Governors, and must consequently be full of revenge, are always very terrible. History abounds with examples of this sort; to which I shall therefore refer the reader.

C H A P. VIII.

That whoever would change the form of a Government, should duly consider the manners and disposition of the people.

I Have already shewn elsewhere, that a bad Citizen cannot do much harm in a State that is not corrupted *; a position, which (besides the arguments there made use of to prove it) is fully confirmed by the examples of Spurius Cassius and Manlius Capitolinus: the former of whom being an ambitious man, and endeavouring to make himself popular at Rome, by favouring the Plebeians in the sale of some lands which the Romans had taken from the Hernici, the Senate began to penetrate into his designs, and alarmed the people to such a degree, that after he had harangued them one day, and made them an offer of the money, for which the corn was sold that had lately been imported from Sicily, they positively refused to accept of it, because they looked upon it as the price of their liberties: whereas, if the people had been corrupt, they would not have refused the bribe, but have sold their country, and made themselves slaves. But the example of Manlius Capitolinus is still more remarkable: from which we may see how soon the remembrance of all his excellent qualities, and the many great services he had done his country, was extinguished by his inordinate desire of power, and the envy he bore to Camillus, who stood higher in the favour of the people: for being blinded by his ambition, and not content with a private station, he endeavoured to form a party; and to raise tumults in Rome, in opposition to the Senate, and the authority of the laws; without considering the disposition of his Fellow-citizens, and how unfit they were to receive such impressions at that time. We may likewise see from hence, what a degree of perfection there was in the constitution of that Senate, and how much virtue and integrity in the individuals: for when he was accused, not so much as one of the Nobility offered to defend him, though they had always most strenuously supported each other before, nor did any, even of his own relations, appear in his behalf: and notwithstanding, it had always been customary for a man's friends and kinsmen to appear in mourning at those times, and to shew all other signs of grief and dejection, in order to excite compassion, there was not the least shew of any such thing. Nay, the Tribunes of the people, who constantly used to favour the cause of those whom they thought friends to the public, especially if they were persecuted by the Nobility, joined heartily with the latter in this case against one whom they looked upon as a common enemy to them both: and though the people were at all times ready enough to support their own rights, and to thwart the Nobility, and had also a great regard for Manlius; yet when the Tribunes cited him to appear before them, and referred his cause to their judgment, they condemned him to die, without the least consideration of his former merits. This example is a most evident proof of the rigid and uncorrupted virtue which at that time was to be found in all the different ranks of people in the Roman Commonwealth: for though Manlius was a man of very eminent worth, and had done both his country and many private persons great and singular services, yet not so much as one of his Fellow-citizens appeared in his favour when he was arraigned as a Criminal: for, as the love of their country was more powerful than any other consideration, and they were more affected by the present danger, ger, than the memory of his past actions, they chose rather to secure their liberties by putting him to death, than to expose them to any hazard by saving his life: “hunc exitum habuit vir, nisi in liberâ civitate natus esset, memorabilis: (says Livy,) such was the fate of a man, who would have made himself illustrious, if he had not been born in a free State.”

We may therefore observe, in the first place, that whoever affects power and authority, must take a very different course to obtain it in a corrupt State, from that which is to be followed in one that is not so: and in the next, that men ought to consider the temper of the times, and conform to them in all their undertakings, but especially in great designs: for those that oppose the current of the times, either through indiscretion, or natural inclination, are generally unfortunate, and meet with very different success in their enterprizes, from what others experience who accommodate themselves to it. If Manlius had been born in the days of Marius and Sylla, when the Romans had been long corrupt, and were become capable of receiving any impression that ambition should think fit to stamp upon them, he would certainly have succeeded in the same manner that they did, and some others, who afterwards aspired to absolute dominion: and on the contrary, if Marius and Sylla had lived in the times of Manlius, they would as certainly have been crushed in their very first attempts to overturn the liberties of their country. For one man indeed may lay the foundation of corruption, and in some measure debauch the principles and manners of his Fellow-citizens; but he seldom lives long enough to corrupt them all to such a degree as to reap the fruit of his labours. And indeed, if he should happen to live long enough for that purpose, it would be in a manner impossible for him to succeed in his designs: for such is the natural impatience of mankind, especially in projects which they are passionately bent upon, that they either cannot long forbear attempting to put them in execution, or take wrong measures to obtain their end : so that either through want of patience, or judgment, they commonly proceed to execution at an improper time, and consequently must be ruined.

A man therefore cannot well overturn the constitution of his country and make himself Lord over it, except he finds the people thoroughly infected by a corruption that has been introduced by degrees, and established by length of time in such a manner, that every thing is fallen into a state of confusion and disorder ; which must of necessity happen, if the virtue of the people is not frequently revived, either by the example of great and good men, or a reformation of abuses by new and wholesome laws, which may reduce the State to its first principles, as I have shewn in another place *. Manlius then would have been a great and illustrious man, if he had been born in a corrupt State : for whoever is desirous either to restore liberty, or to set up an absolute Government, ought maturely to weigh the disposition and principles of the people he has to deal with ; from whence he may be able to form a probable conjecture of the success he is likely to meet with in such an undertaking : because it is no less difficult and dangerous a matter to attempt the restitution of liberty, when the people are disposed to be slaves, than to endeavour to enslave them, when they are disposed to be free : and since I have said above, that men ought always to consider the quality of the times, and to act according to them in all their designs, I shall enlarge a little more upon that subject in the next Chapter.

* See chap. i. of this book.

C H A P. IX.

That in order to secure success in great designs, a man must accommodate himself to the times.

I HAVE often had reason to think that the good or bad success of most men's undertakings has depended chiefly upon their conforming or not conforming themselves to the nature of the times they lived in. Some men are hot and impetuous, others cold and phlegmatic in the prosecution of their designs, which is the cause that they often miscarry, especially when they have no regard to moderation, either in one case or the other, but leave the middle way, and fall into extremes. That man however is most likely to succeed, whose temper is suited to the times, and who acts according to such a disposition *. Every one knows with what caution and circumspection Fabius Maximus proceeded, when he commanded the Roman armies, and how different his coldness and delays were from the ancient ardour and intrepidity of that people: and yet his undertakings were crowned with success, because such a conduct was suitable to the times. For Hannibal being a young spirited General, and elated with the reputation of two great victories, which had drained the Roman Commonwealth of its best soldiers, and thrown it into the utmost consternation, it was very fortunate for them that they had, on the contrary, an old and cautious commander, whose wariness and delays kept the enemy at bay, and abated the ardour of their courage: nor could Fabius have lived in any times, that would have been better adapted to his own genius and disposition; so that every thing concurred to make him fortunate. And that this cold and tardy manner of acting was really the effect of his natural disposition, and not a matter of choice and prudent deliberation, plainly appears from his opposing Scipio with all his might, when that General was intent upon transporting an army into Africa, in order to put a speedy end to the war with the Carthaginians; so that if his advice had not been over-ruled, Hannibal might have continued in Italy, as Fabius was still for adhering to his old maxims, and the dictates of his own disposition, and desirous rather to remove present difficulties and dangers than to run into new ones; not perceiving that when the times and circumstances of things were changed, it was necessary likewise to vary the manner of carrying on the war. If then, Fabius had been King of Rome at that time, it is very probable he would have been unsuccessful in the further prosecution of the war; because he neither could nor would have accommodated his measures to the exigency of the times: but happening to be born in a Commonwealth, where there were many great Commanders, and of different dispositions and abilities; as he was thought to be the most proper man to protract and sustain the war at one time; so when the circumstances of it were changed, Scipio was pitched upon as the likeliest to bring it to a speedy and happy conclusion.

Hence it comes to pass, that Republican Governments have more resources in times of distress, and flourish longer than Monarchies: because they can better accommodate themselves to the necessities of different times, from the variety of Genius's which they produce, than a Prince can possibly do. For a Prince having been long accustomed to act according to one particular manner, cannot tell how to alter it when the times change, and it becomes absolutely necessary to vary his measures. Pietro Soderini, of whom we have spoken before, was remarkable for his lenity and moderation in all things; and both he and his country prospered exceedingly, whilst such a conduct was suitable to the times; but when it afterwards became necessary to proceed with rigour and asperity, and he could not prevail upon himself to do that, both he and his country were ruined by his patience and clemency. Pope Julius II. acted with violence and impetuosity in every thing: and as the times required such a conduct, he succeeded in all his undertakings: but if they had altered, and another sort of conduct had become necessary, he must inevitably have been ruined, because he could not have conformed himself to them. Now the reason why men cannot do this, is first, because they cannot run counter to their own natural inclinations and desires: and in the next, because when a man has practised one method of acting a long while, and always succeeded in it, he cannot be persuaded to try any other: from whence it comes to pass, that we often see such a variety of fortune in one person: for, if the wind changes, and he does not suit his sails to it, how can he expect a good voyage *? It is the same with regard to Republics, which are often ruined by not altering their measures according to the times, as I have shewn at large elsewhere; but in this they are very slow, because it is a difficult matter to change their former laws and institutions, which cannot be effected except by some great event that shakes the whole constitution, no individual being able to bring about such a revolution. Now since we have had occasion to make mention of Fabius Maximus, who kept Hannibal so long at bay, I shall enquire in the next Chapter, whether or not it is possible for one General to prevent another from bringing him to an engagement, if he be determined to do it at any rate.

* “An cum videam navem secundis ventis cursum tenentem suum (says Tully, Orat. pro. Plancio. cap. xxxix.) si non ea eum petat portum, quem ego aliquando probavi, sed alium non minus tutum atque tranquillum, cum tempestate pugnem periculose potius, quam illi salute præsertim propositâ, obtemperem & paream? neque enim inconstantis puto sententiam, tanquam aliquod navigium atque cursum, ex reipublicæ tempestate moderari.” See also Epist. ix. lib. ii. ad familiares.

C H A P. X.

That a General cannot avoid a battle, when the Enemy is resolved to fight him upon any terms.

“CAIUS SULPITIUS Dictator, adversus Gallos bellum trahebat, nolens se fortunæ committere adversus hostem, quem tempus, deteriorẽ indies, & locus alienus facerent. Caius Sulpitius, the Dictator, in the war with the Gauls, resolved not to run any risque in engaging the enemy, when he saw that time alone, and the inconveniencies they suffered in a strange country, was daily diminishing their numbers,” says Livy. As the greater part of mankind are apt to be misled by a particular error, they cannot be too often admonished, to be upon their guard against it. Upon which account, although I have already observed more than once, how much the practice of the moderns differs from that of the ancients, especially in things of the greatest importance, yet I do not think it altogether superfluous, to add something more to what I have said before upon that topic; particularly, as our military discipline at present is so different from those maxims and institutions which were in the greatest esteem with the ancients, that few or no traces of them are left. The reason of this, I take to be, that both Princes and Republics have now left the care of these things to other people, in order to avoid danger: and if at any time a Prince happens to command his forces, no great matter is to be expected from it; because he takes that command more out of pomp and ostentation, than upon any other account. Such Princes, however, are not liable to commit so many errors as Republics; because they keep the command in their own hands, and sometimes are personally in the field with their armies: whereas Republics, and especially the Italian States, not being acquainted with the nature

ture of military operations, are obliged to trust solely to the conduct of others; though, at the same time, in order to keep up their authority, they pretend to advise and direct; by which manner of proceeding they must of course be led into more and greater errors than if they were present with their forces themselves; some of which errors I have pointed out before, but shall here take notice of one that is of very great importance.

When any of these pitiful Princes or Commonwealths send out an army, the best instructions they think they can give their general, are not to hazard an engagement upon any account, if it be possible to avoid it: in which they think themselves as wise as Fabius, who saved the Roman State by such precaution; not knowing that a commission of that kind can seldom be attended with any good consequence, and often must be of great prejudice to themselves. For they may take this for granted, that a General who is in the field cannot avoid a battle, if the enemy is determined to force him to it at all events: so that such a Commission is no better than giving him orders to fight the enemy when they please, but not when he sees a proper opportunity himself. There are two ways, I know, of endeavouring to avoid an engagement in such a case; and those are, either by keeping at the distance of fifty or sixty miles from the enemy, and sending out scouts to give you timely notice if they should offer to advance; that so you may retreat as fast as you can *: or else, by shutting

* “Several very warlike nations in their wars, says Montaigne, book I. chap. xii. of his Essays, have found their chief advantage in a retreat, and done the enemy more mischief by turning their backs to them than their faces: of which method the Turks retain something to this day. Socrates (in Plato) rallies Laches, who had defined fortitude to be nothing more or less than standing firm in the ranks to face the enemy: “What, (says he,) would it be cowardice to beat the enemy, by giving ground?” At the same time he quotes that passage in Homer to him, where he commends Æneas for his skill in retreating. And as Laches, upon further consideration, owns this was the practice of the Scythians, and in general of all Cavalry, he urges another proof from the conduct of the Lacedæmonian Infantry, (the most obstinate yourself up in some strong town. But in either case, you must sustain much damage; for in one, you must leave your whole country to the mercy of the enemy: and certainly a Prince of any courage or generosity, would sooner chuse to venture a battle, than expose his Subjects in so cruel and shameful a manner. And in the other, your ruin is inevitable: for if you retire with your forces into a town, you will be blocked up there by the enemy, and reduced either to surrender, or to perish by famine: so that, whichever of these ways you take to decline an engagement, you will find it a very bad one. It is right, indeed, to keep yourself close intrenched in a strong situation, as Fabius Maximus did, when you have so good an army, that the enemy dares not venture to attack you there; but Fabius could not so properly be said to avoid an engagement, as to defer it till he could fight the enemy with advantage. For if Hannibal had advanced to attack him, the other, instead of retreating, would have fought him there: but Hannibal was too wise to risque an engagement in such circumstances. So that Hannibal declined a battle as well as Fabius: but if either of them had been determined to fight at any rate, the other could not possibly have avoided it, except either by one or other of the methods just now mentioned, or by absolutely running away.

The truth of what I have said, is obvious from a thousand examples; particularly from that of Philip of all others in maintaining their ground) who at the battle of Platea, not being able to break into the Persian Phalanx, thought fit to fall back; that so the enemy supposing them to be flying, might break and disunite that firm body, when they were pursuing; by which means the Lacedæmonians obtained a Victory. As for the Scythians, it is said of them, that when Darius set out upon his Expedition to subdue them, he sent to reproach their King with cowardice, for always retiring before him: to which the King made answer, "that he did not do so out of fear of him, or any other man living; but that it was the custom in his country, where there were neither tilled fields, nor town, nor house to defend, or for the enemy to make any advantage of. But that if he had so voracious an appetite, he might come and view their ancient place of Sepulture, and there he should have his belly full." See Herodotus, lib. IV.

of Macedon, the father of Perseus, in the war wherein he was engaged with the Romans. For, when they invaded his dominions, he resolved not to come to any engagement with them, if he could help it: upon which account, he encamped with his army upon the top of a hill, where he fortified himself in such a manner, that he thought the enemy would not venture to attack him. But he was mistaken; for they not only attacked him, but drove him out of his entrenchments, and forced him to save himself by flight, which he could not have done, if the country had not been so rough, that the Romans could not pursue him. Being convinced therefore, by this trial, that he could no longer trust to the advantage of any situation in the field, and unwilling to shut himself up in a town, he resolved to take the other method, and to keep at a considerable distance from them; for which purpose, when the Romans entered one Province, he always retreated into another. But finding his affairs grow worse and worse every day, and that there was no prospect of putting an end to the war by such a manner of proceeding, and that his Subjects were harrassed and distressed to the last degree, sometimes by one army, and sometimes by the other, he took a resolution to try the fortune of a battle.

It is prudent then to decline an engagement, when you are in the same circumstances that Fabius and Sulpitius were: that is, either when you have so good an army that an enemy dares not venture to attack you in your entrenchments; or when he has not got much footing in your country, and finds great inconveniencies and difficulties in supporting his troops, in these circumstances the observation of Livy is very just, who says, “Nolens sese fortunæ committere adversus hostem, quem tempus, deteriorem indies, & locus alienus, faceret. Not to risque an engagement when time and their situation will daily weaken the enemy.” But in any other case, there is no such thing as avoiding an engagement without great dishonour honour and prejudice to yourself. For to fly as Philip did, is as bad as being routed; and much more disgraceful; because, in that case, you give no proof of your courage: and though he indeed saved himself by flight, another person may not have the same good fortune, who is not equally favoured in his retreat by the nature of the country. Every one must allow, that Hannibal was a very able and experienced General: and therefore, if he had found it would have been for his advantage to spin out the war with Scipio in Africa, he certainly would have done it; and perhaps (as he was a great Commander, and had a very good army) in the same method that Fabius had observed in Italy; but since he did not, we may take it for granted he had very good reasons for acting otherwise. For a General who is at the head of an army, and finds he cannot keep it long together, either for want of pay or other supplies, must be mad if he does not hazard a battle, before his troops begin to disband and dwindle away of themselves: because, if he does not, he is sure to be ruined; but if he does, he has some chance to beat the enemy. Besides, if the chance be ever so small, a General ought always to have a particular regard to his reputation: and surely it is much less disgraceful to be overcome in battle, after a brave resistance, than to be ruined by doing nothing: upon which account, we may conclude, that Hannibal was by necessity forced to act as he did. On the other hand, if he had been inclined to prolong the war by avoiding an engagement, and Scipio durst not have ventured to attack him in his strong places, the latter would not have suffered any inconvenience from it: for he had defeated Syphax before, and had got such footing in Africa, that he could have supported himself there with as little difficulty as in Italy. But this was not the case with Hannibal, when he had Fabius upon his hands; nor with the Gauls when they were engaged with Sulpitius. Much less can those avoid an engagement who attempt an invasion: for as soon as ever they set their foot in an enemy's country, they must come to an action, if the enemy opposes them upon the confines; but if they are suffered to lay siege to any place, they will find the necessity of so doing still greater: as it happened to Charles Duke of Bourbon not long ago; who was attacked and routed by the Swifs, whilst he lay before Morat, a town in Switzerland: and to the French army which had invested Novara, and was likewise defeated by the same people.

Though a person who has many enemies to deal with at the same time, may be inferior to them all together; yet if he can sustain their first shock, he commonly gets the better of them.

GREAT was the power of the Tribunes at Rome; and indeed it was necessary it should be so, as I have said more than once before; since the ambition of the Nobility could not have been sufficiently controuled without it, and consequently must have corrupted that Commonwealth much sooner than it did. But as nothing is perfect, and every advantage is attended with some inconvenience which at last occasions disorders that require new laws and provisions to remedy them: so the Tribunes in time grew so insolent, and their authority so great, that not only the Nobility but the whole Commonwealth were alarmed at it; and it certainly would either have totally swallowed up, or greatly endangered the liberties of that State, if Appius Claudius had not hit upon an expedient to prevent it. For as there was always one or other of the Tribunes, who either had a real regard for the good of his country, or was liable to be corrupted, or prevailed upon by threats, some means were found to work upon him in such a manner as to make him oppose the rest, whenever they endeavoured to act contrary to the inclination of the Senate. Fro this manner of proceeding, which served in some measure to moderate the overgrown power of the Tribunes, and was for a long time of great service to the Roman Republic, we may observe, that though several other States should join against one which is not by any means so strong as themselves whilst they are united; yet more is to be expected from that one State, than from all the others, however powerful. For to omit numberless instances which prove that one commander has the advantage over a number, a State thus circumstanced will always find ways and means to disunite such a confederacy, and greatly reduce its strength.

To confirm this, we have no occasion to look back into ancient History for examples; since our own times will furnish us with sufficient. In the year 1484, all Italy confederated against the Venetians; and though they were stripped of all their territories, and could not send an army into the field, yet they found means to corrupt Lewis Sforza, Duke of Milan, and detached him from the League in such a manner, that they not only recovered what they had lost, but had a good part of the Duchy of Ferrara ceded to them: so that notwithstanding they had lost all they had in the war, they were great gainers by the peace. Not many years ago all Christendom seemed to have combined against France: but before the end of the war the Spaniards deserted the Confederacy, which forced the rest of the Allies to come to an accommodation. From hence we may see that when several Princes or States unite together against one Prince or Republic, if that Prince or Republic be strong enough to sustain the first shock and protract the war, he will certainly prevail against them at last. But if he is not able to do that, the danger is great indeed, as the Venetians found to their cost in the year 1508: for if they could have held the French at bay till they had gained over some of the Confederates, they might have warded off the blow: but not having strength enough to do that, they were reduced to the brink of ruin. The Pope, it is evident from what happened afterwards, might easily have been taken off; for both he and the Spaniards were reconciled and became their friends, as soon as they had recovered what they had lost before; and both of them would willingly have joined with the Venetians to defend Lombardy against the French, in order to prevent the latter from becoming too powerful in Italy. The Venetians then ought to have given up some part of their acquisitions, to preserve the rest: which indeed would have been acting a very wise part, if it had been done before the war begun, that it might not appear to be extorted by necessity: for after the war was once commenced, it must have looked mean and pitiful, and perhaps would have done them little or no service. But before that war broke out, there were few people at Venice that foresaw the danger which hung over their heads, still fewer that knew how to provide against it, and no body at all that was able to point out any remedy when it fell upon them. To recapitulate the contents of this Chapter, I say, that as the Roman Senate found means to preserve the liberties of their country against the ambitious attempts of the Tribunes, chiefly from the number of those Magistrates; so any Prince or State that is attacked by a Confederacy, may likewise be enabled to support themselves against it, if they have but the address to disunite the Confederates.

C H A P. XII.

MANY glorious actions have been the effect of necessity, as I have shewn in another place*; insomuch that some Philosophers have affirmed, that neither the tongue nor the hand (those two noble organs which were given to mankind to distinguish and exalt them above all other creatures) could ever have done such astonishing things, if necessity had not impelled them to it. Some of the most renowned Commanders in former times, well knowing the weight of necessity, and with what a degree of obstinacy and resolution it inspires an army, always endeavoured to lay their Soldiers under a necessity of fighting: whilst, on the contrary, they never reduced an enemy to such circumstances; but rather opened a way for their escape, when they became desperate; though they used all means to deprive their own troops of the like opportunities. Whoever then would animate either a garrison in a town that is besieged to make a brave defence, or an army in the field to behave themselves like men, must above all things endeavour to convince them of the necessity of so doing: and on the other hand, a wise Commander, before he sits down before a town, will be able to form a pretty good judgment whether he shall meet with much difficulty or not in reducing the place, by considering the degree of necessity under which the besieged lie of making an obstinate defence: for if that is great, their resolution will be proportionable to it; if otherwise, there will be so much the less difficulty in the matter. Hence it comes to pass, that towns which have revolted are much harder to be reduced than they were to be taken at first: for as they had not been guilty of any offence before, they had no punishment to fear, and consequently made no great difficulty of surrendering to a superior force: but when they have rebelled, and know they deserve to be chastized, they will endeavour to defend themselves to the last man. Such a degree of obstinacy is likewise owing to the natural hatred which sometimes subsists betwixt neighbouring States: and this proceeds from ambition on one side, and jealousy on the other; especially betwixt Princes and Commonwealths; of which we have many examples in Tus-

any, where these mutual suspicions put both parties upon their guard, and make them obstinate in defending themselves. So that, if we compare the towns which lie near Florence, with those that are near Venice, we shall have no occasion to wonder (as many do) that the Florentines have spent more and gained less in their wars than the Venetians; since the latter did not meet with so vigorous an opposition from the places they attacked, as the former did: because those that lay near Venice having been used to live under Princes and accustomed to servitude, were so far from being averse to any change of Masters, that it was a thing they often wished for: so that though the States which lay near the Venetians were stronger and more powerful, than those that bordered upon the Florentines, yet they were reduced with more ease than the latter, because they had not been accustomed to liberty, and therefore did not make so obstinate a defence.

When a General therefore lays siege to any place, he ought to make use of all his address to convince the besieged they are not under any necessity of defending themselves to the last extremity: for which purpose, he should promise them pardon if they have offended; that so they may not be reduced to despair by the apprehension of punishment: or if they are afraid of losing their liberties, he should assure them he has no design of infringing them, or of doing them the least injury of any kind whatsoever; and that he has no further intention than to restrain the ambition of some few particular men amongst them. Such a method of proceeding often facilitates the reduction of a town: and though these pretences are easily seen through by men of sagacity and penetration, yet they generally impose upon the vulgar; who being desirous of present ease and quiet, are not aware of the hook that is concealed under such promises, and consequently are often gulled either out of their lives or liberties that way: as it happened to the Florentines not long ago, and to Crassus and his army army of old. For though that General was convinced himself there was no confidence to be put in the Parthians, and that they made him fair promises, only to sooth his Soldiers in such a manner that they might not think themselves in desperate circumstances, and under a necessity of being strictly upon their guard; yet his men were so blinded with the offers of peace, that not being able to make them see the danger they were in, both he and his army were cut off.—The Samnites, at the instigation of some few of their countrymen, who had more ambition than the rest, made an incursion into the territories of a State in alliance with the Romans, and plundered all the country in contempt of the treaties that subsisted betwixt them: but repenting of what they had done, they afterwards sent Ambassadors not only to ask pardon of the Romans, but to assure them they would likewise make ample restitution, and deliver up the Authors of those hostilities into their hands. This submission however, being rejected at Rome, and the Ambassadors returning without any hopes of pardon, Claudius Pontius their General, in order to animate his men to behave valiantly, represented to them in an harangue, that since the Romans would accept of no satisfaction, but were determined to make war upon them, though they had offered to accommodate matters in an amicable manner, they were under an absolute necessity of taking up arms for their own defence; “Justum est bellum (said he) quibus necessarium; & pia arma quibus nulla nisi in armis spes est: a war is always just when necessary; and it is a man’s duty to take up arms when there is no other way left to preserve himself;” upon which necessity alone he founded his hopes of victory. But that we may have no occasion to say any thing more upon this subject, I shall here add some other examples from the Roman History which seem worthy of notice. In a war with the Veientes, Caius Manilius being at the head of the Roman army, which lay encamped not far from the enemy; the latter found means to force some part of his entrenchments: upon which, Manilius hasted with a body of troops to succour his camp, and shut up all the avenues to it in so effectual a manner that he thought it impossible for the enemy to make their escape. But the Veientes seeing they were thus enclosed on every side, exerted themselves with such fury that they killed Manilius, and would have destroyed his whole army, if one of the Tribunes had not wisely opened them a way for their retreat. Hence we see that whilst the Veientes were under a necessity of fighting, they fought desperately: but as soon as they had an opportunity of retreating, they chose rather to do that than fight any longer. The Volsci and Æqui having invaded the Roman territories, two Consuls were sent at the head of two different armies to oppose them; and surprising the enemy in their camp, they enclosed them in such a manner, that Vettius Mettius their General, finding they must either fight their way through, or all be cut to pieces, bravely called out to his Soldiers, “Ite mecum, non murus, non vallum; armati armatis obstant; virtute pares, quæ ultimum ac maximum telum est, necessitate superiores estis: follow me, there is neither wall, nor rampart in the way; you have arms in your hands, as well as they; your courage is equal; and in point of necessity, which is the sharpest and best weapon, you are superior:” in which passage, it is remarkable that Livy calls Necessity “the sharpest and best weapon.”—Camillus, the wisest General Rome ever had, having entered Veii by Storm, commanded his Soldiers with a loud voice to spare every man that laid down his arms: and this he did to facilitate the total reduction of that town, which otherwise, perhaps, might have been a matter of great difficulty, if he had laid the garrison under a necessity of defending themselves to the last extremity. But as they were encouraged by these orders to lay down their arms, the town was taken without much bloodshed; and many other

Generals

Generals have since made use of the same expedient *.

C H A P. XIII.

WHEN Coriolanus was banished, he retired to the Volsci; and having raised an army amongst them, marched back to Rome at the head of it, in order to revenge himself upon his Fellow-citizens: but being prevailed upon by the tears and entreaties of his Mother, rather than any consideration of the Roman arms, he desisted from the enterprize. From this event, say Livy, it plainly appeared that the Romans were more indebted to the excellency of their Generals than the valour of their Soldiers, for the aggrandizement of their Commonwealth: for though they had always beat the Volsci before; yet they were not able to cope with them, after they had got Coriolanus at the head of their forces.

Now though Livy seems to be of this opinion, yet we see from many other passages in his History, that the bravery of the Soldiers alone often did very great things, and that they sometimes stood more firm, and fought with greater resolution after their General was killed than they had done before: as it happened in the army which the Romans had in Spain under the command of the two Scipio's, in which, the Soldiers behaved so well after the death of those Generals, that they not only defended themselves, but subdued the enemy, and maintained possession of the whole Province for the Romans. So that upon enquiry, we shall find some instances in which the valour of the Soldiers alone gained a victory; and others, wherein the conduct of the Commander only had the same effect: from whence we may conclude, that if either one or the other of them is able to effect great things singly, nothing can stand before them when united.

But if it should be asked, whether a good army with a bad General, or a good General with a bad army is most to be dreaded; it may be answered, that in Cæsar's opinion, no great account is to be made either of one or the other. For when he marched into Spain against Afranius and Petreius, who were at the head of a good army, he seemed to despise the enemy, "quia ibat ad exercitum sine duce, because he was going to fight an army without a General," hinting at the weakness of those two Commanders. On the contrary, when he led his forces into Thessaly against Pompey, he said, "Vado ad duces sine exercitu, I am now going to fight a General without an army." It may likewise be demanded, whether it is easier for a good General to make a good army; or for a good army to make a good General? But this question I think is presently answered: for certainly many able Soldiers in an army may sooner discipline and instruct one man how to do his duty, than one man can form, discipline, and model a whole army. When Lucullus was sent against Mithridates, he was totally unacquainted with military affairs: but as he had a very good army and many excellent officers under him, they soon made him an able General. The Romans not having free men enow to recruit their armies, were forced to arm a number of Slaves, and gave the command of them to Sempronius Gracchus, who disciplined them in such a manner, that in a very short time they became good Soldiers. Pelopidas and Epaminondas (as I have shewn elsewhere) having delivered their countrymen the Thebans from the yoke of Sparta, soon made such Soldiers of the very peasants, that they not only supported a war against the Spartans, but totally subdued them at last *: from which we see there are examples on both sides, and that it is either in the power of a good army to make a good General, or of a good General to make a good army. The best army in the world however will be apt to grow insolent and mutinous, if it has not an able General to curb and restrain the licentiousness of the Soldiers; as the Macedonian troops did after the death of Alexander the Great, and the Roman Veterans in the time of their civil wars. So that I think a good General who has time to arm and discipline a body of new raised men in a proper manner, is much more to be depended upon than an insolent army, even of Veterans, which has made a sudden and tumultuary choice of some officer to command it. Those Generals therefore are certainly worthy of the highest praise and admiration who have not only gained victories but have been previously obliged to form and discipline their troops before they led them on to battle. For this is a task that is doubly arduous, and requires such rare abilities that if it had fallen to the lot of many who have made a great figure in the world, perhaps they would not have been so much admired and extolled.

OF what importance a sudden rumour, or unusual phænomenon, or chance word may be in time of battle (amongst many other instances) we have a remarkable one in an engagement betwixt the Romans and the Volsci, where Quintius the Roman General observing one wing of his army was beginning to give way, called out aloud to the Soldiers “to stand their ground, for the other wing had beat the enemy;” an artifice which so animated his own men, and struck such a terror into the other army, that he got the day by it. Now if such things have a great effect in a well disciplined army, certainly they must have a much greater in one that is ill disciplined and apt to be thrown into disorder by every little accident: for a proof of which, let me relate an event that happened in our own times. Not many years ago the City of Perugia was divided into two factions, the Oddi and the Baglioni; the latter of whom prevailing, the former were banished. But having raised some forces and conducted them with great privacy to a place near Perugia, they were let into the town one night by some of their friends, and got as far as the main square without being discovered. But as the Streets in that City were barricadoed with strong chains, the Oddi had a man at the head of their forces with an iron maul to break the links of the chains, and make way for the horse: by which means they had penetrated as far as the great square, and had only one chain to break which secured the passage into it. But a sudden alarm being raised when they came thither, the man who was to break that chain was so pressed upon by the Soldiers behind him, that not having room to manage the maul, he called out to them, “Keep back, keep back;” which cry passing from one to another, those in the rear began to run away, and were soon followed by all the rest in such confusion that the design was totally defeated. From hence we may observe that good order and discipline are necessary in an army, not only to prevent confusion in time of battle, but to secure it from being thrown into disorder and consternation by accidents: for undisciplined forces, besides their other imperfections, are particularly apt to be terrified by any sudden rumour or unusual noise. A good General therefore ought to appoint officers on purpose to carry his orders to every part of his army, and to lay a strict injunction upon his Soldiers to shew no manner of regard, nor so much as to listen to any order or report but what they have from those Officers; who must be charged to deliver his commands word for word as they receive them from his own mouth: the want of which precaution has often occasioned very great confusion in an army.

As to strange and sudden appearances, a General ought to introduce some such thing in the heat of the battle, if possible, to encourage his own men, and dismay the enemy: for nothing contributes more to the gaining of a victory. An instance of which we have in the conduct of Sulpitius the Roman Dictator, who, when he was preparing to engage the Gauls, caused all the sutlers and servants that followed his camp to be armed and mounted upon the mules and other beasts that used to carry the baggage, with colours and other marks of distinction to make them look like a large body of horse; and having posted them behind a hill, he ordered them to make their appearance upon a proper signal when the battle began to grow hot: which being executed accordingly, struck such a terror into the Gauls that they lost the day*. A wise General therefore is to study these two points with attention: in the first place to intimidate the enemy by some such stratagem as this; and in the next, to make due provision to discover and defeat any thing of the same kind that may be practised against him; as an Indian King served Semiramis, who perceiving he had a great many Elephants in his army, caused a number of Camels to be loaded with the Skins of buffaloes and other beasts, and to be covered in such a manner as to look like Elephants, which She ordered to advance against the Enemy to fright them, if it was possible: but the King discovered the trick, and not only prevented the designed effect, but turned it to her own prejudice. Mamercus being appointed Dictator in a war wherein the Romans were engaged with the Fidenates, they ordered a number of men to sally out of the town with fire at the end of their lances whilst they were fighting near the walls, in hopes that the novelty of the sight would have made the Romans break their ranks.

With regard to such stratagems, we may observe, that when they have something solid and efficacious to support them, they may be made use of with advantage; because the futility of the whole is not so soon discovered: but that when they are formidable rather in appearance than reality, it is better either to let them alone, or to play them off at such a distance that their weak side may not so easily be found out; as Sulpitius did with his Mulateers. For if they are weak and ineffectual at the bottom, that will presently be perceived if you come near the enemy, and may do you more harm than good; as the sham Elephants did to Semiramis, and the blazing lances the Fidenates; which last indeed caused some little disorder in the Roman army at first; but the Dictator coming up and reproaching his troops with pusillanimity, asked them if they were not ashamed to be smoaked away like flies, encouraging them at the same time to return to the charge like men, and “burn the enemy with their own fires, since they could not make them their friends by generous treatment; Suis flammis delete Fidenas, quas vestris beneficiis placare non potuistis:” upon which they rallied, and utterly defeated the enemy.

do more harm than good.*

AFTER the Fidenates had rebelled against the Romans, and destroyed a Colony which they had sent to settle amongst them, the Romans created four Tribunes with Consular power to chastise them for their insolence. One of these Tribunes was to stay at home to take care of the City; the other three were sent against the Fidenates and Veientes: but not agreeing amongst themselves, they neither gained much honour in that expedition, nor did the Republic suffer any material loss by it; as the misconduct of the Generals was in some measure balanced by the valour of their Soldiers. The Romans therefore, in order to remedy the disorders which had been occasioned by a diversity of Commanders, immediately created a Dictator: that so when the power was in the hands of one man he might act with more vigour and steadiness.

Hence we may observe how inconvenient, and indeed how prejudicial it is to have several Commanders in chief, either in an army or a town that is besieged: and Livy very justly says, “Tres Tribuni, potestate consulari, documento fuere, quam plurimum imperium bello inutile esset: tendendo ad sua quisque consilia, cum alii aliud videretur, aperuerunt ad occasionem locum hosti: The conduct of these three Tribunes with Consular power plainly shewed how imprudent a thing it is to give the command of an army to several persons; since one of them took one course and another another, according to the diversity of their opinions; by which they gave the enemy an advantage over them.” Now though this instance may seem sufficient to prove the truth of what I have laid down, I will add two more, one of ancient, the other of modern date, for a further confirmation of it. In the year 1500, Lewis XII. King of France, having retaken Milan, sent his forces to reduce Pisa and to restore it to the Florentines; in which enterprize they were commanded by two Florentine Commissaries, Giovanni Battista Ridolfi, and Luca degli Albizi. But as the former was a man of great reputation and much older than the other, Luca left the management of every thing entirely to him: and though he did not openly and directly oppose him in any of his measures, yet he plainly shewed his disapprobation of them, sometimes by a sullen silence, and sometimes by carping and laughing at them behind his back; so that he was so far from assisting his Colleague either in Council or any other way, that he did not give himself the least trouble or concern about the matter. But Ridolfi being soon after obliged to return to Florence upon some occasion or other, and the sole command devolving upon Albizi, he exerted himself with great spirit, prudence and activity, and shewed that he was Master of many extraordinary qualifications, which he had suffered to lie dormant whilst the command was divided betwixt him and Ridolfi. The other instance is out of Livy, who speaking of the Expedition in which Quintius and Agrippa commanded the Roman army against the Æqui, says that Agrippa desired that Quintius might have the sole management of that war committed to him, because, "Saluberrimum ad administrationem magnarum rerum est, summam imperii apud unum esse; in the administration of great affairs, it is of the utmost importance to lodge the supreme power in one person only." But Princes and Republics act in a very different manner at present; and send several Generals or Commissaries to command one army; which often creates infinite confusion, and has been the ruin of many French and Italian armies in our times. We may venture to conclude then, that it is much better to commit the execution of an enterprize to one man of common abilities, than to two of the most able men you can find, with equal authority*.

That men of eminent virtue and merit are employed in time of danger and distress: but in peaceable and prosperous times, men of the greatest riches and alliances are preferred.

IT always was, and always will be the fate of able and virtuous men, to be neglected and laid aside in peaceable times, especially in a Commonwealth: for the reputation which they have acquired excites such a degree of envy that, during the tranquility of the State, many Citizens will aspire to be their equals if not superiours in power. Thucydides tells us accordingly, that the Athenians having got the better in the Peloponesian war, not only humbled the pride of Sparta, but kept all Greece in awe, and became so powerful, that they formed a design of making themselves masters of Sicily. When the matter came to be deliberated upon, Alcibiades and some other Citizens promoted it with all their might; not so much out of any regard to the public good, as to gratify their own private interest and ambition, hoping they should be employed as Chiefs in that expedition. But Nicias, a man of the greatest reputation in Athens, opposed it with no less vehemence:
and the principal argument he made use of in one of his harangues to convince the people that he had the good of the public alone at heart, and no private view or interest of his own to serve, was, that by dissuading them from such an enterprize, he rather prejudiced himself than otherwise; because he very well knew, that whilst they continued in peace, many of his Fellow-citizens would be put over his head; but that if

war should break out, he should then probably have the supreme command. It is a common foible in all Republics to neglect men of the greatest abilities and qualifications in times of peace and security; but it is very imprudent, because it is sure to raise their indignation, when they not only see themselves overlooked and despised, but base and unworthy men preferred; which has been the ruin of many Republics; for great men, who are treated in this manner, and know that it is owing to the tranquillity of the times, will naturally endeavour to embroil their country in wars, which must of course be of great prejudice to it, and perhaps may end in its destruction.

Considering therefore sometimes, how this evil might be prevented in a Commonwealth; I think there are but two ways of doing it: one of which is, by keeping the Citizens poor, or at least from growing too rich; that so they may not have it in their power to advance themselves by corruption instead of abilities and integrity: the other is, to be always so prepared for war, that you may enter into one when you please; for upon such occasions great and eminent men must of necessity be employed. This was the policy of the Romans in the first and best ages of their Commonwealth; for as they constantly had armies in the field, they never wanted opportunities of employing their best Citizens; so that they could not well deprive them of the reward due to their merit, by giving it to others that were unworthy of it: and if ever they either happened to mistake their man, or had a mind to try his abilities, and any misfortune or disorder ensued, they soon corrected their error. But other Republics which have no such provisions, and never make war but when they are forced to it by necessity, cannot prevent these inconveniencies; and therefore must be subject to great dangers and troubles, especially when the person who is neglected happens to be of a revengeful disposition, and has great interest and many partizans in the Commonwealth. Nevertheless, though the Romans kept clear of this evil for a considerable time, yet after they had vanquished Antiochus and the Carthaginians, and had no other war of any great importance upon their hands, they seemed to dispose of their honours and the command of their armies not according to merit, but the degree of favour and popularity which any one had acquired amongst his Fellow-citizens. Paulus Æmilius was refused the Consulship several times, and could never obtain that honour till the commencement of the Macedonian war; for then the Citizens apprehending it would be attended with much danger, unanimously made choice of him to conduct it. The Republic of Florence being engaged in many wars after the year 1494, and all the Florentine Generals having behaved ill, Antonio Giacomini was fixed upon at last to command their troops, and shewed himself so able a Soldier, that whilst there was any appearance of danger left, the rest of the Citizens seemed to have laid aside all envy and ambition; for he had not so much as one competitor in the election of a Commissary: but afterwards when the danger was blown over, and a new war broke out, the management of which was more likely to be attended with honour and success than any sort of difficulty or hazard, there were so many Candidates for the Office of Commissary, that notwithstanding three were to be appointed to go upon an expedition against Pisa, he had not interest enough to be chosen one of that number. And though there can be no certain estimate made of the loss our Republic sustained by neglecting Giacomini, yet we may pretty well guess at it: for as the Pisans were very ill provided for their defence, if he had conducted the Siege, he would soon have reduced them to such extremities, that they must have surrendered at discretion: but the Siege being carried on by Commanders of little experience in military affairs, the Pisans held out so long that the Florentines were forced to buy the place at last, when they might otherwise have had it for nothing. Giacomini then must certainly be highly disgusted at such treatment : and indeed a man in such a case must be possessed of a great degree of patience and goodness, not to take revenge, if it lies in his power, either upon the whole Commonwealth or some particular person : against which, every Republic should take special care to guard itself, as I shall shew in the next Chapter.

C H A P. XVII.

That a man who has been injured or disgusted, should not be trusted afterwards in any Office of authority or importance.

A Commonwealth ought to take particular care never to prefer a man to any place of trust or authority, whom they have first injured to any considerable degree. Claudius Nero was sent into Spain with an army against Asdrubal; and though he had possessed himself of all the passes in that part of the country where the enemy lay, and shut them up in such a manner, that they were reduced to a necessity either of fighting him with disadvantage, or of perishing with hunger; yet Asdrubal had the address to amuse him with overtures of peace, till he had an opportunity of making a safe retreat, and escaping entirely out of his hands. When this came to be known at Rome, he was exceedingly blamed for his conduct, both by the Senate and people, and so censured by the whole City, that he was not a little mortified at it. But being afterwards created Consul, and sent out against Hannibal, he divided his army, and marched with one part of it to join another body of troops which was under the command of his Colleague, in order to fight Asdrubal before he could be reinforced by Hannibal : which was reckoned so dangerous a step, that the Republic was in great pain and anxiety till they received intelligence that he had defeated Asdrubal. Being asked, after the affair was over, what could induce him to take so desperate a resolution, in which he risked the liberties of his country as it were upon one throw, and that too without any apparent necessity; he said he did it because he knew that if he succeeded, he should recover the reputation he had lost in Spain; but if he miscarried, he should sufficiently revenge himself upon the State and those Citizens who had abused him in so ungrateful and rude a manner. Now if the resentment that is always excited by such usage could produce these effects in the breast of a Roman, and at a time when that Republic was yet incorrupt, it may well be expected to operate more powerfully in persons who live in a Commonwealth that is less virtuous, and have not so much regard to the good of the public as the gratification of their own passions. And as it is impossible to prescribe any certain remedy for such evils, it is consequently impossible that any Commonwealth should be perpetual; since they are all liable to a thousand unexpected accidents which may occasion its ruin.

C H A P. XVIII.

That nothing shews the abilities of a General so much, as to penetrate into the designs of the Enemy.

EPAMINONDAS the Theban used to say that nothing was more necessary or of greater service to a general than to penetrate into the designs of the enemy; and since it is generally a difficult matter, he certainly is worthy of much praise who succeeds in it. For if the very actions of an enemy, and those too which fall under our immediate notice and observation are often mysterious and hard to be accounted for, certainly it must be much more difficult to discover their secret designs and intentions. It has frequently happened, when an engagement has lasted till night, that the conquering army has thought itself defeated, and that which has had the worst of it, has looked

looked upon itself as victorious ; an error that sometimes proves fatal to those that fall into it ; as it did to Brutus and Cassius, who were ruined by a mistake of this kind. For the wing which Brutus commanded having routed the forces he was engaged with, Cassius, on the contrary, thought it had been defeated, and killed himself in despair. At the battle of St. Cecilia in Lombardy which happened not long ago betwixt the French and the Swifs, night coming on, a body of Swifs, which remained entire and unbroken, thought they had got the day, not knowing that the rest of their army was routed and dispersed : so that instead of retreating in the dark, as they might have done, they continued upon the field of battle till the next morning ; at which time they were charged again and cut to pieces. The Pope's army and that of the King of Spain had like to have been ruined also by this mistake : for upon a false report that the Swifs had gained a victory, they passed the Po, and advanced so far that they very narrowly escaped falling into the hands of the French before they were undeceived. An error of the same kind happened in the camps of the Romans and the Æqui : for Sempronius the Roman Consul being sent with an army against the Enemy, and forcing them to an engagement which continued till night with various success on each side ; when it began to grow dark, and both armies had sustained considerable loss in the battle, neither of them returned to their camp, but drew off to the neighbouring hills, where they thought they should be more secure. The Roman army was divided into two parts ; one of which had followed the Consul ; the other Tempanius, a Centurion, to whose valour and conduct it was owing that the Romans had not been entirely routed that day. But in the morning, the Consul hearing no more of the enemy, retreated towards Rome ; as the Æqui likewise did towards their own country : for each side thinking they had lost the day, marched away, and left their camps to the mercy of the enemy. It happened however, ever, that Tempanius, who was likewise going to retreat with the rest of the Roman army, had intelligence from some of the Æqui who were wounded and afterwards taken prisoners, that their Generals had quitted the field and left the camp which they had possessed; upon which, he in the first place returned to the Roman camp, and having secured that, immediately plundered the enemy's, and returned victorious to Rome: an advantage which was gained merely by his having received information of the enemy's mistake, before they knew any thing of that into which the Romans had fallen themselves.

Hence we see it sometimes happens that two opposite armies may be in the same error, and pressed by the same necessity; and that that will come off with the advantage at last, which is first acquainted with the distress of the other. To confirm this, I shall add another example which happened not long ago in our own country. In the year 1498, when the Florentines had entered the territories of Pisa with a powerful army, and laid close siege to that City, the Venetians having taken it under their protection, and seeing no other method to save it, resolved to make a diversion by invading some other part of the Florentine dominions: for which purpose, they sent a large body of forces into the vale of Lamona, and not only seized upon Marradi, but laid siege to the Fortrefs of Castiglione, which stands upon a hill above it. The Florentines being alarmed at this, determined to succour the fortrefs; but in such a manner as not to weaken their army before Pisa: and therefore having made new levies both of horse and foot, they sent them towards that place under the command of Jacopo d'Appiano, Lord of Piombino, and Count Rinuccio da Marciano. But upon the arrival of these forces near Castiglione, the Venetians raised the siege, and retreated into the town: so that the two armies lying close together for several days, both suffered greatly for want of provisions and other necessaries; and as neither of them durst come to an engagement, nor was aware of the other's distress, it happened that they both resolved to quit their situation the same morning; the Venetians designing to retreat towards Berzighella and Faenza, and the Florentines towards Casaglia and Mugello. When the morning came, and each side had begun to send away their baggage, a poor old woman who lived in Marradi, happening to come into the Florentine camp to see some relations she had there, informed them that the Venetians were marching off: upon which, the Florentine Generals taking courage, immediately pursued them with all their forces, and wrote word to Florence that they had not only obliged the enemy to quit Marradi, but had actually beat them, and put an end to the war. This victory then (if it may be so called) was wholly owing to chance; for if the Venetians had happened to have known that the Florentines were in motion, before the latter were aware of their decamping, the consequence would certainly have been the same with regard to them, and the Florentines must have come off with disadvantage.

C H A P. XIX.

Whether rigour, or clemency and gentle means, have a greater effect upon the multitude.

AT a time when the Roman Republic was miserably divided by intestine discords betwixt the Patricians and the Plebeians, yet, as they were likewise engaged in wars abroad, they sent out two armies under the command of Quintius and Appius Claudius. Appius behaving with great rigour and austerity in his command, was so ill obeyed by his Soldiers that he was forced to quit his Province with as much disgrace, as if he had been driven out of it by the enemy: whilst Quintius on the contrary, being of a benign and affable disposition, was so well served by

by his troops, that he succeeded in all his enterprizes. Hence it appears, that the command over a multitude is much better supported by gentle and benevolent measures, than by rigorous and severe punishments. But many are of a different opinion, especially Tacitus, who says, “in multitudine regendâ plus pœna quam obsequium valet: it is an easier matter to rule a multitude with a high hand, than by gentleness and clemency.”

In order to reconcile these two opinions, we must observe, that the people to be governed are either in some measure your equals and Fellow-citizens, or such as are absolutely subject to you. In the first case, you cannot securely treat them with that severity which Tacitus seems to recommend; and therefore, as the Roman people had an equal share with the Patricians in the administration of the Government, they were not to be treated in an insolent and cruel manner, by persons who had but a temporary command over them. Accordingly, we see that those Roman Generals who caressed their Soldiers, and were beloved by them, always performed greater exploits than those who used them harshly, and made themselves hated and feared; except they happened to be men of very extraordinary character, like Manlius Torquatus. But whoever has the command over people that are his own subjects (for of such Tacitus speaks) must of necessity have recourse to rigour and severity, instead of mildness and humanity, in order to prevent them from rebelling and trampling upon him. This however, ought to be practised with due moderation, and in such a manner as not to excite public hatred, which is always of great prejudice to Rulers. Now the way to avoid it, is not to make too free with the properties of your Subjects: for as to their blood, few Rulers are desirous of shedding it, except it is either to possess themselves of some estate, or upon some extraordinary emergency, which they are necessarily obliged to comply with. In the former case, indeed, when they are governed by avarice, rice, as they must naturally be tempted to take away the lives of their Subjects, so they never want opportunities of gratifying such an appetite, as I have shewn at large elsewhere *.

The conduct of Quintius, therefore, is more to be commended than that of Appius; and the opinion of Tacitus is just enough in other circumstances, and under proper restrictions.

C H A P. XX.

That one instance of humanity and generosity had a greater effect upon the Falisci, than all the weight of the Roman arms.

WHEN the Falisci were besieged by Camillus, a School-master, to whose care most of the Nobility in that City had committed their Sons, thinking to ingratiate himself with Camillus and the Romans, took all his Pupils out of the City with him, under pretence of exercise and recreation, and insensibly led them to the enemy's camp, where he delivered them up to Camillus, telling him that he had it then in his power to make the town surrender upon what terms he pleased. But Camillus abhorring the baseness of the deed, not only refused to receive them, but ordered him to be stripped naked, and to have his hands tied behind him; and having given every one of the boys a rod, made them whip him all the way back again into the town. An action so generous and humane, that the Falisci were struck with admiration; and instead of making any further defence, immediately surrendered.

Hence we may learn, that tenderness and humanity have sometimes a much greater effect upon the minds of men, than any sort of violence which can possibly be used: and that Cities, and even whole

* See the Prince, chap. xvii. xix. and Pol. Disc. book III. chap. vi.

Provinces have often been subdued by one act of Compassion, Continnence, or Generosity, when no human force could have conquered them : of which we have many other examples in History. The Romans were never able to drive Pyrrhus out of Italy by dint of arms : and yet Fabricius obliged him to quit it, by giving him notice that one of his domestics had offered to poison him. Again, Scipio Africanus did not gain so much reputation in Spain by taking new Carthage, as he did by a noble example of his continence, when he immediately restored a young and beautiful Lady (whom he had taken prisoner) to her husband ; the fame of which action gained him the esteem of all that nation, and made the people his friends, instead of enemies *.

We see then how greatly such virtues are admired by all men, and how much they are celebrated and recommended by historians as well as philosophers. Xenophon, in particular, takes great pains to shew what honour, and how many victories Cyrus acquired by his humanity, affability, freedom from pride, cruelty, luxury, and all other vices that stain the life of man. Nevertheless, as Hannibal acquired great reputation and many remarkable victories by very different methods, it may not be amiss, perhaps, to enquire in the next Chapter to what causes that was owing.

C H A P. XXI.

How it came to pass that Hannibal acquired as much glory in Italy, as Scipio did in Spain, but by quite different methods.

IT may appear strange that some Commanders have performed very great things, and gained much glory and renown by quite different methods from those prescribed in the last Chapter. From whence many may be apt to conclude, that such virtues do not contribute to make a Commander fortunate and renowned, any more than the qualities that are totally opposite to them; since the same degree of fame and reputation is to be acquired one way as well as the other. If Scipio made himself master of all Spain by his humanity and clemency; Hannibal, on the contrary, pretty nearly effected the same thing in Italy, by very different means; that is, by every species of violence, cruelty, rapine, and perfidy; for almost all the Cities and States in that Province surrendered to him. Considering therefore with myself, how this is to be accounted for, I think several reasons may be assigned for it.

In the first place, all men are so fond of novelty, that people who live happy and free, as well as those that are quite otherwise, often wish for a change of Government; it being the nature of mankind (as I have said elsewhere) to be satiated with prosperity, as well as tired with adversity. To this disposition it is owing, that upon any rebellion or invasion, the Chiefs of it, whether foreigners or natives, never want friends and followers to abet and assist them; and the greater the number of them is, the greater will be their progress. There are likewise two other powerful motives of human actions, viz. Love and fear, which operate very strongly upon such occasions: so that if a General can make himself either much beloved or much feared, he will be followed and obeyed by many, and commonly by more in the latter case than in the former. Whichsoever of these two courses therefore, such a Commander shall think fit to pursue, the effect will be the same, if he is a man of great abilities and reputation, like Hannibal or Scipio, and knows how to remedy the inconveniencies that may proceed from his endeavouring to make himself either too much beloved, or too much feared. For each of these extremes has its inconveniencies, and such too as may prove fatal to him: because, by taking too much pains to gain the affections of the people, he may stoop so low as to make himself cheap and contemptible; and by too much severity he will become odious: to steer a middle course is very difficult, if not impossible. It requires great abilities therefore, to remedy the inconveniencies that may arise from excesses of either kind, as Hannibal and Scipio did; for, though they both owed their success and reputation to pursuing the different methods above-mentioned, yet it must be confessed, that they both likewise suffered some inconveniencies from them. With regard to Scipio, part of his army and some of his friends revolted from him in Spain; which was entirely owing to want of proper severity, and the little awe in which they stood of his person: for the generality of mankind are naturally so restless, that when they see any little opportunity of gratifying their ambition, they presently forget the allegiance they owe their Governors, and the favours they have received from them: so that, in order to remedy this inconvenience, Scipio was in some measure obliged to proceed with a degree of severity which he had not practised before. As to Hannibal, we do not certainly know of any particular instance in which his cruelty and perfidy was of prejudice to him: but we may suppose, that the reason why the Neapolitans and some other people continued so firmly attached to the Romans, was because they were afraid of him. This we know, however, that his savage and barbarous manner of proceeding made the Romans more inveterate against him than any other enemy they ever had. For though Pyrrhus was at their very doors, and harrassing all Italy with a powerful army, yet they had the generosity to acquaint him with the design which one of his domestics had formed to poison him; but they never ceased to persecute Hannibal, even after he was ruined, till they procured his death. This was the consequence of his extreme cruelty and perfidy: but such were his abilities, and the reputation which he had acquired, and so great was his authority, that it is mentioned by all Historians as a re-

420 POLITICAL DISCOURSES UPON Book III, markable circumstance, that though his army was composed of many different nations, there never was any mutiny or dissention in it.

I conclude, therefore, that it is not very material, which of the two abovementioned courses a Commander takes, provided he is a man of sufficient abilities to correct the inconveniencies that may flow from any undue exertion of them. And as Hannibal and Scipio both gained great reputation, the one by laudable, the other by detestable means, it may not seem altogether foreign to our subject, if we say something in the next Chapter of two Roman Citizens, who acquired the same degree of glory, but by very different, though laudable means.

C H A P. XXII.

That Manlius Torquatus by his severity, and Valerius Corvinus by his gentleness, acquired the same degree of reputation.

TH E R E were in Rome at the same time two great Commanders, Manlius Torquatus and Valerius Corvinus, who were equally renowned for their prowess and conduct against an enemy, and equal in their honours and the number of their triumphs, but very different in their manner of treating their Soldiers. Manlius proceeded with the utmost severity, and never spared them upon any occasion, either in point of duty or punishment: whilst Vale-rius, on the contrary, always behaved towards them with the greatest tenderness, affability, and familiarity. Manlius, in order to keep up military discipline in full force, and make himself punctually obeyed, put his own son to death, though victorious, for engaging the enemy without his orders: Valerius never punished any one in that manner. Nevertheless, the methods they took, though directly contrary to each other, had the same effect; for they both triumphed

over the enemies of Rome, both contributed to aggrandize their country, and both acquired very great reputation. None of their Soldiers ever declined fighting, or mutinied, or disobeyed their commands in any respect whatsoever; though those of Manlius were sometimes so harsh and rigorous, that afterwards, when any severe orders were issued out, they were called, “Manliana imperia, Manlian orders.” It may not be amiss therefore to enquire, in the first place, to what causes it was owing that Manlius was obliged to act with such a degree of severity: in the next, what it was that enabled Valerius to proceed with so much lenity: thirdly, how it came to pass, that these two methods, so different from one another, produced the same effect; and in the last place, which of them is most worthy of imitation.

Whoever considers the character of Manlius, from the account which Livy gives of his conduct, will find that he was a very brave man, a true friend to his country, dutiful and affectionate to his parents, and strictly obedient in all things to the commands of his superiors. All this appears from variety of instances, particularly from his fighting and killing a gigantic Gaul, who had challenged any man in the Roman army to a single combat; from defending his father at the peril of his own life, against one of the Tribunes who had accused him; and from what he said to the Consul before he went out to fight the Gaul; “injussu tuo adversus hostem nunquam pugnabo, non si certam victoriam videam: Without your permission I will never fight any enemy, though I was sure of a victory.” When a man of this stamp comes to command an army, it may naturally be expected, that he will endeavour to make others like himself; that his courage will prompt him to give bold orders; and that his regard to discipline will make him take care that they are punctually executed. For it may be looked upon as a never-failing maxim, that in great and arduous undertakings all orders must be obeyed, seem they ever so harsh and rigorous (as they must of course be sometimes upon such occasions) otherwise the enterprize will certainly miscarry. Hence we may observe, that in order to be well obeyed, it is necessary in the first place to know how to command: for which purpose, a man ought to compare his own condition and abilities with those of others that are to serve under him: and if he finds himself in a capacity to rule them, he may then enforce his commands with rigour; if not, he must let it alone. A certain wise man therefore used to say, that in order to govern a Republic with authority, there must be a due proportion established betwixt those that rule and those that are to be ruled; in which case the power of the Governors will be durable and secure: but where the governed are stronger than their Governors, the power of the latter will be of short continuance.

But to resume my subject. I say, that harsh and spirited commands proceed from a rigorous and bold disposition; and that whoever gives such orders, must be very strict in seeing them punctually executed, otherwise they will not be regarded. A person however, who is not of this cast, should not give such orders, but content himself with others of a milder nature: for, if ordinary commands only are disobeyed, he may act with clemency and gentleness, as the punishment usual upon those occasions will be sufficient, which, being imputed to the common established laws, brings no particular odium upon himself. We may conclude then, that Manlius was obliged to act as he did by the extraordinary commands he gave, which were owing to the natural turn and bias of his own mind, and such indeed, as are often of great advantage to a Commonwealth, because they serve to reduce it to its first principles and original virtue. For, if a Commonwealth could be so fortunate as to have a number of great and virtuous men succeeding each other at reasonable intervals, to reform their Fellow-citizens by their example, to restore the vigour of the laws, and to correct every thing that tended to corruption, ruption, that State would be immortal, as I have said before *. Such a one was Manlius, who by the rigour of his commands kept up the ancient military discipline amongst the Romans, prompted thereto, in the first place, by his own natural disposition, and in the next, by the desire he had that the commands which he dictated should be punctually obeyed.

Valerius, on the other hand, had an opportunity of indulging the clemency and gentleness of his nature, merely by retaining the orders and rules that had usually been observed in the Roman armies; which being good and wholesome in themselves, gained him sufficient reputation, and were neither hard to be observed, nor laid him under a necessity of punishing delinquents with extreme severity, because there were but few such in his army, and those meeting only with ordinary punishment, imputed it to the common course of the laws, and not to any rigour or severity in their General. So that he was at liberty to treat his Soldiers with all manner of tenderness and humanity that could gain their affections and support his authority: and thus it came to pass, that these two Commanders were equally well obeyed, and each of them attained the same end, though by very different means. Those however, that are desirous to imitate either of them, should take care of falling into extremes that may occasion hatred on one side, or contempt on the other; (as I said before with regard to Hannibal and Scipio) which is very difficult either to be avoided or remedied, except a Commander is possessed of extraordinary abilities.

It now remains to consider, which of these two methods is most praise-worthy; and this seems to be a disputable point; because some writers recommend one, and some the other. Those however who treat of the education of Princes, seem rather to prefer the conduct of Valerius to that of Manlius: and Xenophon in particular, extolling the virtues of Cyrus, says almost the same things of him that Livy does of Valerius, when he was appointed Consul in an expedition against the Samnites. For that General having harangued his Soldiers with his usual affability, as they were going to engage the enemy, the Historian gives us the following character of him. “ Non alias militi familiarior dux fuit, inter infimos militum omnia haud gravatè mûnia obeundo. In ludo præterea militari, cum velocitatis viriumque inter se æquales certamina ineunt, comiter facilis vincere ac vinci, vultu eodem; nec quemquam aspernari parem qui se offerret; factis benignus pro re; dictis, haud minus libertatis alienæ, quam suæ dignitatis memor; & (quo nihil popularius est) quibus artibus petierat magistratum, iisdem gerebat. No Commander was ever more familiar with his Soldiers. For he never refused to share any toil or duty with the meanest of them. He would often mingle with them in their military exercises and recreations, and used to run and wrestle amongst them; putting himself upon a level with any man that had a mind to contend with him, and never changing his countenance, or seeming to be in the least altered in any respect, whether he got the better or not. In his behaviour he was courteous and bountiful, as occasion required; in his conversation he knew how to support his own dignity, without restraining the freedom of others; and (which made him still more dear to them) he exercised his authority with the same goodness and moderation by which he had obtained it.”

Livy speaks much in favour of Manlius also; acknowledging that the Severity he exercised upon his own Son, had such an effect upon his whole army, and made the Soldiers so obedient to his commands, that the victory which he gained over the Latins was entirely owing to it: and having given a circumstantial account of the battle, the difficulties which the Romans laboured under, and the dangers they were exposed to that day, he says it was the conduct of Manlius alone that gained the victory. Nay he goes still further, further, and after comparing the strength of the two armies, makes no scruple to affirm that whichsoever of them had been commanded by Manlius, would certainly have got the day.

Considering therefore what is said on both sides of the question, it seems hard to decide it. However, not to leave the matter wholly undetermined, I say, that it is safer and better for a person who lives under a Republican Government to act like Manlius; because such a manner of proceeding is for the advantage of the public, and cannot seem calculated to serve any private interest or ambition; since by treating every one with rigour and austerity, and regarding the good of the commonwealth alone, a man cannot hope to gain friends and partizans sufficient to carry on any particular design to the prejudice of his country. But the contrary may be said of such a conduct as that of Valerius under the like circumstances: for though indeed, with respect to the public service, the advantage would be the same, yet so popular and affable a behaviour to the Soldiery, is apt to excite jealousies, and the people will naturally grow suspicious (especially if a General is continued long in command) that such a degree of favour may be employed to deprive them of their liberties: and that such an event did not actually happen in the Roman Republic under the administration of Publicola, was because the people were not then become corrupt, and he did not continue long enough in power to debauch them.

But if we are to consider these two different methods of proceeding as relative to a Prince, (which Xenophon does) we certainly must prefer the conduct of Valerius to that of Manlius: because a Prince must above all things secure the obedience and affection of his Soldiers and Subjects by gentle and benevolent measures. They will obey him if he appears virtuous, and observes the laws; they will love him, if he is affable, humane, merciful, and endowed with such other good qualities as Livy ascribes to Valerius, and Xenophon to Cyrus; and to see a Prince beloved by his people, with an army at his devotion, suits well with the nature of a Monarchy. But the same cannot be affirmed with regard to a person who is only a Subject in a Republic, and upon a civil equality with the rest of his Fellow-Citizens. We read in the Annals of Venice, that the Venetian Gallies returning from some Expedition, and lying at anchor near the shore, there happened a difference betwixt the Sailors and the Townsmen, which occasioned a fray that was very bloody, and which was carried on with such obstinacy on both sides, that neither the power of their officers, nor reverence to any particular Citizen, nor the authority of the Magistrates, was sufficient to compose it: but a certain Noble Venetian, who had been their Commander the year before, coming amongst them, they laid down their arms and dispersed out of respect to him: a circumstance which occasioned such jealousy in the Senate, that they soon after had him dispatched.

I conclude then, that a Prince will find it for his advantage to imitate Valerius; but that it would be dangerous for a Subject of a Republic, both with regard to his country and himself: for in the first place, it would be paving the way to Tyranny; and in the next, the Government would grow so jealous of his proceedings, that they would not fail to take some course to rid themselves of him. On the other hand, I affirm that the conduct observed by Manlius would be prejudicial to a Prince; but advantageous to the Subject of a Commonwealth, and most of all to his country; for it seldom can do him any hurt, except the hatred which is occasioned by his severity should be increased by a jealousy of his great reputation and abilities, as it happened to Camillus*.

* Compare this Chapter with the latter end of the 23^d, and all the 24th Chapter of Montaigne's Essays, book ii. entitled, "Observations on Julius Cæsar's method of making War."

C H A P. XXIII.

Upon what account Camillus was banished from Rome.

WE have said, in the last Chapter, that the Subject of a Commonwealth, who imitates the conduct of Valerius, may injure both himself and his country: and that acting like Manlius may be of great service to his country, though sometimes prejudicial to himself; which is evident from the example of Camillus, whose manner of proceeding was more like that of Manlius than Valerius. Livy therefore, speaking of him, says, “Ejus virtutem milites oderant & mirabantur: the Soldiers both hated and admired him for his virtues.” They admired him on account of his vigilance, prudence, magnanimity, and the good discipline he caused to be observed in his army; they hated him because he was more severe in punishing, than liberal in rewarding, to which the Historian adds the following reasons for their hatred. In the first place, he ordered the money which was taken from the Veientes to be applied to public uses, instead of dividing it amongst the Soldiers with the rest of the spoil: in the next, he caused his triumphal chariot to be drawn by four white horses, which they said was out of arrogance, and an ambition to emulate the glory of the Sun: in the last, he made a vow to dedicate the tenth part of the booty taken from the Veientes to Apollo; for the performance of which, he was obliged to take it away from the Soldiers, into whose hands it had fallen*.

Hence we may learn, that nothing makes a Ruler more odious to the people, than to deprive them of their possessions, an injury of so great importance, that it is never forgotten; for, upon every little distress it returns fresh upon their memories: and as men are daily subject to distresses, they will daily remember it. That another thing which gives great disgust, especially to a free people, is a proud and arrogant behaviour: and though perhaps they may not in any wise be materially hurt by it; yet it never fails to excite their indignation: upon which account, those in office and authority ought always to avoid it as a most dangerous shoal; because it is weak and rash to the last degree to do a thing which must of necessity create hatred, and can be attended with no manner of advantage.

C H A P. XXIV.

That the prolongation of Commissions was the ruin of the Roman liberties.

IF we consider the proceedings of the Romans with attention, we shall find that the dissolution of their Republic was owing partly to the dissentions that were occasioned by the Agrarian Law, and partly to the prolongation of Commissions: for if the mischiefs which arose from these causes had been foreseen, and prevented in time, it is certain that Commonwealth would have supported itself much longer, and perhaps have enjoyed more tranquillity. For though we do not know that the prolongation of Commissions ever occasioned any tumult or disturbance at Rome; nevertheless it is evident that the extraordinary degree of authority which some particular Citizens acquired by that means, was of great prejudice to the State: whereas if all the Citizens who had an offer of being continued in their offices and commands had been possessed of as much wisdom and virtue as Lucius Quintius was, these inconveniencies and misfortunes would not have ensued. His integrity and disinterestedness were very singular; for upon an accommodation betwixt the Plebeians and Patricians, the former having continued the same Tribunes in office for a year longer, as the most likely men to curb the ambition ambition of the Nobility, the latter likewise, in imitation of the Plebeians, resolved to prolong the Consulship of Lucius Quintius for the same term. But he peremptorily refused to accept of it; alledging that bad precedents ought to be discountenanced, and not supported by such as were worse; and therefore desired them to chuse new Consuls. Now if all the rest of the Roman Citizens had been as wise and virtuous as Quintius, that custom of prolonging offices and commissions could not have been introduced into their Commonwealth, which at last was the principal cause of its ruin.

The first whose command was extended beyond its usual term, was Publius Philo, who having laid siege to Palæpolis at a time when his Consulship was upon the point of expiring, was continued in office by the Senate with the title of Proconsul; because they thought him sure of succeeding in that enterprize, and therefore were unwilling to snatch the glory of it out of his hands, by sending another person to supersede him; which, though done with a good intent, and for the service of the Public, was the first step that occasioned the loss of the Roman liberties. For the further abroad they carried their arms, the more necessary such prolongations appeared, and the more common they became: hence it arose, in the first place, that but a few of their Citizens could be employed in the command of armies, and consequently few were capable of acquiring any considerable degree of experience or reputation; and in the next, that when a Commander in chief was continued for a long time in that post, he had an opportunity of corrupting his army to such a degree that the Soldiers entirely threw off their obedience to the Senate, and acknowledged no other authority but his. To this it was owing that Sylla and Marius found means to debauch their armies and make them fight against their country; and that Julius Cæsar was enabled to make himself absolute in Rome. So that if the Romans had not prolonged their Commissions beyond the usual date, date, perhaps they might not have been so rapid in their conquests, nor so soon have arrived at the Empire of the World; but then, on the other hand, they would have preserved their liberty much longer.

C H A P. XXV.

Concerning the Poverty of Cincinnatus and several other Roman Citizens.

I Have shewn, in another place, that the best way to preserve the liberties of a Commonwealth is to keep the Subjects poor, at least to prevent their growing too rich *. Now, though it is not sufficiently clear that there was any provision made for this purpose in Rome, (as the Agrarian Law was constantly opposed) yet we see that during the course of four hundred years, after its foundation, that State continued in extreme poverty: the reason of which I take to be, that poverty was no bar to offices or honours of any kind, and that virtue and merit were preferred to all other qualifications, wherever they were found. A remarkable proof of which we have in the following example. When Minucius the Consul and his army were in a manner surrounded by the Æqui, and the whole City of Rome was in such consternation that they were forced to create a Dictator, (their last resource in extremities) they made choice of L. Quintius Cincinnatus, who was at plough in his own little estate at the very time when he was sent for to be invested with that authority: a circumstance much admired by Livy, who says upon this occasion, “Operæ pretium est audire qui omnia præ divitiis humana spernunt, neque honori magno locum, neque virtuti putant esse, nisi effuse affluent opes. It is pleasant after this, to hear some people talk of riches, as if nothing in this world was to be weighed in the scale against them; and that neither virtue nor merit of any kind were of the least account, in comparison of wealth." Cincinnatus (as I said) was at plough in his own little estate, which did not exceed four acres of land, when the Deputies found him, who had been sent by the Senate to acquaint him with the imminent danger the Republic was in, and the choice they had made of him for their Dictator. Upon which, he changed his clothes and immediately repaired to Rome; where he got together some forces, and marching directly against the enemy to rescue Minucius from the danger he was in, he soon brought them to a battle, in which they were totally defeated and plundered. But when he divided the Spoil he would not suffer the army which he had delivered out of the hands of the Æqui to have any share of the booty; telling them they were not worthy to partake of the Spoils of an enemy, by whom they were so near being plundered themselves. As to Minucius, he deprived him of his authority, and reduced him to the degree of a Lieutenant, ordering him to serve in that capacity, till he had learnt better how to command. In this Expedition he made L. Tarquinius his General of horse, though he had not so much as a horse himself, being so poor that he was forced to fight on foot.

Hence we may see that poverty was no bar to honour or preferment amongst the Romans in those days; and that a wise and good man thought four acres of land sufficient for his sustenance. The same contempt of riches is observable in the time of Marcus Regulus; who being at the head of an army in Africa, where he had beat the Carthaginians, sent to desire leave of the Senate to return to Rome, that he might put his farm in order, which he heard was neglected by his Servants. From which example we may observe, in the first place, how contentedly he lived in poverty; and that he gave up all the fruit of his labours for the good of the Public, looking upon the glory he had acquired as a sufficient reward: for if he had thought of enriching himself by the war he would not have troubled his head about a few acres of land at home. In the next we may admire the generosity, and magnanimity of the ancient Romans; for when they were advanced to the command of an army, they thought themselves superior to any Potentate upon earth: and yet when their Commissions expired, and they returned to their former condition, they were so modest, frugal, humble, laborious, obedient to the Magistrates, and respectful to their Superiors, that one could hardly have thought they had been the same men *. This neglect of riches continued till the days of Paulus Emilius, which were the last happy times of the Roman Republic: for though he enriched his country with the Spoils of the enemy, he continued so poor himself, that when he had a mind to reward his Son-in-law who had behaved with great bravery in the wars, he made him a present of a Silver cup, which was the first piece of plate he was ever possessed of. Indeed I might quote numberless examples to shew how much more mankind are obliged to poverty than riches; and that the former has been the honour and preservation of some States and Religious Establishments; whilst several others have been ruined by the latter †. But this has been already done by so many other writers, that it is here altogether unnecessary.

* “The Elder Cato returning Consul from Spain, sold his War-horse to save the money it would have cost him to bring him back by Sea into Italy, (says Montaigne from Plutarch) and being Governor of Sardinia, made all his visits on foot, without any other attendants than one officer of the Republic, who carried his robe and a cense for Sacrifices; and for the most part carried his Mail himself. He boasted that he had never worn a Gown that cost above ten Crowns, nor ever sent above ten-pence to market for one day’s provisions. Scipio Æmilianus, after two Consulships, and two triumphs, went on an Embassy with no more than Seven Servants in his train: Plato had but three, Homer but one, and Zeno, founder of the Stoic Sect, none at all. Tiberius Gracchus was allowed but five-pence halfpenny a day, when employed as a Commissioner for public affairs, though he was at that time the first man in Rome.” Montaigne’s Essays, book I. chap. lii.

† “I shall fill the remaining part of this paper (says Mr. Addison, Spec. vol. 6, No. 464) with a very pretty Allegory, which is wrought into a play by Aristophanes the Greek Comedian. It seems originally designed as a Satire upon the Rich, though in some parts of it, it is a

That the ruin of some States has been owing to Women.

IT happened in the City of Ardea that a young woman who was possessed of great riches, had two Suitors, one a Patrician, the other a Plebeian : but kind of comparison betwixt wealth and poverty.—Chremylus, who was an old and a good man, but exceeding poor, being desirous to leave some riches to his Son, consults the Oracle of Apollo upon the Subject. The Oracle bids him follow the first man he should see upon going out of the temple. The person he chanced to see was to appearance an old, sordid, blind man ; but upon following him from place to place, he at last found by his own confession that he was Plutus the god of Riches, and that he was just come out of the house of a Miser. Plutus further told him, that when he was a boy, he used to declare that when he came to age he would distribute wealth to none but virtuous and just men : upon which, Jupiter considering the pernicious consequences of such a resolution, took his sight away from him, and left him to strolc about the world in the blind condition Chremylus beheld him. With much ado Chremylus prevailed upon him to go to his house, where he met an old woman with a tattered raiment, who had been his guest many years, and whose name was Poverty. The old woman refusing to turn out so easily as he would have her, he threatened to banish her not only from his own house, but out of all Greece, if she made any more words about the matter. Poverty upon this occasion pleads her cause very notably, and represents to her old Landlord that if she should be driven out of the country, all the trades, arts, and sciences would be driven out with her ; and that if every one was rich, they could not be supplied with those pomps, ornaments, and conveniencies of life which made riches desirable. She likewise represented to him the several advantages she bestowed upon her votaries, in regard to their shape, their health and activity, by preserving them from gout, dropsies, unweildiness and intemperance. But whatever she had to say for herself, she was forced to troop off.—Chremylus immediately considered how he might restore Plutus to his sight : and in order to it, conveyed him to the temple of Æsculapius, who was famous for cures and miracles of this nature. By this means the Deity recovered his eyes, and began to make a right use of them by enriching every one that was distinguished for piety towards the Gods, and justice towards men ; and at the same time by taking away his gifts from the impious and undeserving. This produces several merry incidents ; till at last Mercury descends with great complaints from the Gods, that since the good men were grown rich they had received no Sacrifices ; which is confirmed by a Priest of Jupiter, who enters with a remonstrance, that since this late innovation he was reduced to a starving condition, and could not live upon his office. Chremylus, who in the beginning of the Play was religious in his poverty, concludes it with a proposal which was relished by all the good men who were now grown rich as her father being dead, her guardians would have married her to the Plebeian, contrary to the desire and advice of her Mother, who would have given her to the Patrician. This occasioned such a tumult in the City, that all the people took up arms; the Patricians in favour of one Competitor, and the Plebeians to support the other. But the Plebeians being driven out of the City, applied to the Volsci for assistance; and the Patricians to the Romans. The Volsci happening to arrive first, joined the Plebeians and laid siege to the place: but the Romans coming suddenly upon them soon after, shut them up in such a manner betwixt their camp and the walls of the town, that they were compelled by famine to surrender at discretion: upon which, the Romans immediately entered the town, and having put the authors of the sedition to death, restored its former tranquillity.

In this affair there are several things worthy of observation. In the first place we see, that women sometimes occasion much mischief and discord in a State, to the great prejudice of those that govern it: for a further proof of which, it may be remembered (as we have shewn before) that the rape of Lucretia cost the Tarquins their kingdom, and the attempt upon Virginia was the cause of the Decemviri being deprived of their authority. Aristotle in his Politics, speaking of Tyrants, says that the rage and indignation which men conceive against them for debauching their wives, or daughters, or other relations, is frequently the occasion of their ruin, as I have observed before, in my discourse upon Conspiracies. All Princes therefore and Governors of Republics should carefully attend to this matter, and consider the disorders which may arise from such causes, that so they may either prevent them, or provide such remedies well as himself, that they should carry Plutus in solemn procession to the temple, and instal him there in the place of Jupiter.—This allegory instructed the Athenians in two points: first, as it vindicated the conduct of Providence in its ordinary distributions of wealth: and in the next place, as it shewed the great tendency of riches to corrupt the morals of those that possessed them.”

in time as may not tend to the prejudice and disgrace of their State: for we see how the Republic of Ardea, by suffering the discords amongst its Citizens to rise to such a height, became so divided that it was necessary to call in foreign aid to re-unite it; which is generally a prelude to Slavery.—The next thing to be observed upon this occasion, is the method that ought to be taken to re-unite a divided State, of which I shall treat at large in the next Chapter.

C H A P. XXVII.

What methods are to be taken in order to re-unite a divided State: and that they judge wrong who think the best way to keep a City in Subjection, is to keep it divided.

FROM the method which the Romans took to reconcile the two factions at Ardea, we may see which is the best way of composing civil dissensions in a divided City; and that is by cutting off the ring-leaders. For there are but three ways to re-unite such a State; which are, either by putting the Heads of the factions to death, or by banishing them, or by obliging them to be friends under certain penalties. Of these three ways, the last is the most dangerous and uncertain; because it is impossible that any forced reconciliation should continue long, where much blood has been shed, or other outrages committed; especially when the parties live together within the same walls, and cannot help seeing and perhaps conversing with each other every day; which must of necessity occasion fresh quarrels and animosities: of which we have a recent example in the City of Pistoia. That City, about fifteen years ago, was divided into the two factions of the Panciatici and Cancellieri, and still continues so; but at that time there were great dissensions among them, though now they are tolerably quiet. After many bickerings and disputes they at last proceeded to bloodshed, burning and plundering each other's houses, and committing all manner of open hostilities. Upon which, the Florentines, who had often interposed, and endeavoured to compose their differences by the last of the methods above mentioned, finding they only enflamed their resentment, and made things worse instead of better by these means, grew so tired that they had recourse to the second method, banishing some of the Chiefs of both factions, and imprisoning others; by which they soon quieted the rest, and have kept them in pretty good order ever since.

The first method however, is certainly the best and most effectual: but as a good degree of Spirit and resolution is necessary, weak States are afraid to have recourse to it; and it is pretty well if they venture upon the second. This is one of the errors, which (as I said before) the Princes of our times are apt to fall into, when they come to deliberate upon any matter of great importance; for instead of following the example of others upon the like occasions, they think it in some cases inhuman, and in others impossible to be imitated: which is owing to their pitiful education and their ignorance in the affairs of the world. Thus instead of adopting the wise Maxims of the Ancients, they fall in with certain modern opinions, equally ridiculous and absurd: one of which I shall here take notice of, as it was established by some wise politicians of our own City, who laid it down for a rule, “Che bisognava tener Pistoia con le parti, & Pisa con le fortezze: that Pistoia was to be kept under by fomenting discord amongst the Citizens there; but Pisa by a Citadel;” not knowing how insignificant and ineffectual both one and the other of these expedients was for such purposes. As to Citadels I shall say nothing of them in this place, because I have spoken of them at large elsewhere*, and therefore shall only take notice of the futility of this Maxim, “that in order to keep the towns that are under your dominion in subjection, you must keep them divided."

* See the Prince, Chap. xx. and chap. xxiv. book II, of these Discourses.

Chap. XXVII. THE FIRST DECAD OF LIVY. 437

In the first place, it is impossible that any Prince or Governor of a Republic should keep fair with two factions at the same time in a town that is subject to their dominion: for as it is the nature of mankind to take either one side or the other in all divisions, induced by different motives which influence their inclinations; so one of the factions being disaffected to their Prince, he must of necessity lose the town whenever he engages in a war: for how can he expect to keep possession of a place, when he has enemies both within and without. But if it belongs to a Republic, there is no surer method to corrupt its own Citizens, and to sow discord amongst them, than to encourage factions: because each side will naturally endeavour by some undue means or other to gain the favour of their Governors, and secure their protection; which must be attended with two very great inconveniencies: one of which is, that you never can make either of them your stedfast friends: for their Governors being so often changed, and sometimes a person of one way of thinking, and sometimes another of a quite different turn, being appointed to rule over them, it is impossible they should ever be steadily and properly governed. The other inconveniency is, that by encouraging factions in other places, you must necessarily divide your own State: of which we have an instance in Bicondo's History of Florence; who speaking of the proceedings of that Republic with the Pistoians, says, "Mentre che i Fiorentini disegnavano reunir Pistoia, divisono se Medesimi: whilst the Florentines endeavoured to re-unite the Pistoians, they fell into divisions amongst themselves." From whence we may observe the evils that arise from such divisions in a town that is dependent upon a Republic.

In the year 1501, after Arezzo had revolted from the Republic of Florence, and the vales of Tevere and Chiana were over-run by Duke Valentine and the Vitelli, the King of France sent an army, under the command of Monsieur de Lant, to recover those territories for the Florentines. But that General, finding numbers of people wherever he came, who declared themselves of Marzocco's party, was much offended at their divisions, and told them, "that if any of his Master's subjects in France should declare themselves of the King's party, they would be severely punished for it; as such a declaration must imply that there was another party against the King; whereas his Majesty would have it known that all his Subjects were well affected to him, and united amongst themselves."—Those Maxims therefore which are now in such vogue, though contrary to all manner of reason and good policy, proceed from the weakness of our Princes and other Rulers of States; who finding themselves unable to support their authority by laudable and spirited measures, are obliged to have recourse to such mean artifices: which perhaps may serve their purposes for a while, in quiet and peaceable times; but will be found altogether ineffectual in times of adversity and distress.

C H A P. XXVIII.

That the Governors of a Republic should keep a strict eye upon the conduct of their Subjects; because under the disguise of beneficence and humanity they often aim at Tyranny.

THE City of Rome being distressed by famine, and the public Magazines not affording provisions enough to supply the wants of the people, Spurius Melius, (a very rich man for those times) distributed a great quantity of corn amongst them at his own expence: by which he became so popular, that the Senate apprehending their liberties might be endangered by it, if he was not suppressed before he grew too powerful, immediately created a Dictator, who who caused him to be put to death. Hence we may remark that many actions which appear good and laudable at first sight, may yet prove prejudicial and destructive to a Republic in the end, if timely care is not taken to prevent it.

But to discuss this matter more particularly : I say that a Republic can neither be well governed, nor indeed subsist at any rate without men of reputation : and on the other hand, that too great a degree of reputation in a private man, is sometimes the cause of its ruin. To guard against which, no particular Citizen should be suffered to gain any sort of reputation but what may be of service and advantage, instead of prejudice, to the Commonwealth and its liberties. Now the methods by which such reputation is to be acquired, are either public or private : that is, in the first case, when a man distinguishes himself either by his abilities in Council, or in the field, or by doing some other great and material service to the Commonwealth : and these ways of gaining reputation, instead of being precluded, should be open to all Citizens, who must also be encouraged by such rewards for their good counsels and actions, as may content themselves, and make them honoured by others : for reputation acquired in this manner can never be attended with any prejudice to the public. But in the second case, when it is done by private methods, it is very dangerous and destructive : by private methods, I mean such as obliging particular persons by lending them money, by giving their daughters marriage portions, by protecting them against the authority of the Magistrates, and other such favours as create dependants and partizans, and embolden them to violate the laws and corrupt the Citizens. Upon which account, a well governed Republic, as I said before, ought to encourage all Citizens that endeavour to gain favour and reputation by public methods, and such as tend to the glory and advantage of their country : but to discourage those that attempt it by private means, and for other purposes. The Romans accordingly granted triumphs and many other honours and rewards to Citizens who had signalized themselves in the service of the public: but always brought those to a trial, before the people, who endeavoured to advance themselves by private methods and undue practices: and if the people happened to be so blinded by plausible appearances, that they would not suffer them to be punished, a Dictator was immediately created, who being vested with a sort of absolute authority, had it in his power to restrain such irregularities by punishing the delinquents in a proper manner; as it happened in the case of Spurius Melius: for if but one offender of that kind is suffered to escape with impunity, it is sufficient to ruin a Commonwealth; as it would be exceeding difficult to maintain any good order or equality in it after such an example.

C H A P. XXIX.

That the faults of the people are generally owing to the Prince.

PRINCES ought not in reason to complain of any violence which their Subjects commit, because it is entirely owing either to their own remissness, or to their being guilty of the same themselves: and if the people of some States at present are infamous for thieving, robbing, plundering, and other such enormities, it proceeds wholly from the oppression and rapaciousness of their Governors. Romagna, before Alexander VI. extirminated the petty Lords who ruled over it, and was full of rascals who lived upon murder and rapine; which was not owing to the natural depravity of the people (as some think) but to the wickedness of those little Tyrants, who being poor, and yet ambitious to live in splendour and magnificence, were obliged to have recourse to oppression oppression and extortion of every kind*. Amongst other vile and nefarious methods which they practised

* “The Italians (says the Author of the Estimate of the Manners and Principles of the Times, vol. ii. sect. 5.) are an effeminate people, yet in the general opinion, void of humanity: they are given to cruelty, treachery, and assassination. The question is then, from what causes this singular appearance may arise?—It is commonly affirmed and supposed to be natural to the country. But they who talk thus, I think, mean no more (so far as they mean any thing) than this, that there is some cause unknown, which produces this crime in Italy, rather than elsewhere. Machiavel, who knew mankind, ascribes this degeneracy in the people, to the wickedness and ill example of their rulers.” Here the author quotes the passage above marked from Machiavel, and then proceeds in this manner. “This, in some measure, accounts for the inhumanity of the people: but we are still at a loss as much as ever, how such an extirminating principle came first amongst the Great. What follows then, seems the natural solution of the question. When Italy became divided into a number of petty States, the contentious and factions in those States were endless. The parties were often too small to levy armies. Hence conspiracies, insurrections, assassinations by sword or poison, were the common, because the readiest, way of prosecuting the political designs either of the oppressors or the oppressed. See Machiavel’s historical tracts passim. By this means the dreadful practice of assassination, by being applied politically, lost a great part of its horror in the minds of the parties who practised it: thus it naturally crept into private use, and has been of course transmitted from one generation to another.—Hence appears the great importance of curbing the violence and horrors of public contention, by what are called the Laws of War and of Nations: since the opposite conduct is not only attended with immediate cruelties, but, what is worse, is in danger of striking its colours into private life, and giving even to succeeding times the complexion of inhumanity.—We must not leave this subject, without adding a remark upon Machiavel himself, who undoubtedly wrote under the influence of this habit of thinking, so peculiar to Italy. For we see in the passage now cited that although he speaks with resentment against the private murders so common in his days, yet he mentions those political assassinations with a kind of approbation, for which Alexander VI. and his Son Valentine were so justly infamous through all Europe. He expressly treats of this method of acquiring Government; and with all the sang froid of a man talking on a just and legitimate subject. See his Prince, chap. viii. Hence conclusions have been drawn much in his disfavour, as a man abandoned to all wickedness; whilst others have adopted the contrary opinion, and affirmed, that he pointed out these ways of iniquitous policy and assassination, that he might teach mankind more effectually to prevent them. Now in truth these two opinions are equally groundless: for on one hand, his writings abound with incontestible proofs that he was a well-wisher to his country and mankind: and on the other, it must be allowed, that he hath rather shewn the methods of treacherous policy, than the ways of preventing them. The truth is, those iniquitous practices which shock our humanity were familiarized to his imagination by the common usage of his country: hence he treated them as he did other political maxims of a better stamp, and only talked the

to fill their coffers, they made laws to prohibit such and such particular things: after which, they soon broke them themselves, and encouraged others to do so by their own example: but they never punished any one till the number of delinquents became very considerable; and when they did, it was not out of any respect to justice, but to enrich themselves with fines and confiscations. Hence it came to pass, that their Subjects being impoverished, but not in any wise amended in their manners, endeavoured to make up their losses by plundering others who were still weaker than themselves, so that we may impute all the evils and enormities abovementioned to the scandalous and wicked example of those Lords; and of how much weight the example of a Prince is, we may further learn from the following instance in Livy. The Ambassadors whom the Romans sent with the spoils of Veii to the Temple of Apollo at Delphos, being taken by some Corsairs, were carried into Lipari, a port in Sicily. But Timasitheus, Prince of that place, being informed of the nature of the prize, whither the Ambassadors were going, and by whom they were sent, behaved like a Roman upon that occasion, and representing to the people, in the strongest terms, how impious and sacrilegious a thing it would be to seize upon an offering that was made to the Gods, the Ambassadors were immediately dismissed with all their effects by the general consent of the people. Upon which occasion, the Historian says, "Timasitheus language of his time and nation. Nay it appears from a particular passage in his works, that he vindicated this practice of assassination, as being in some cases a principle of the truest humanity. "Cæsar Borgia (says he, in his Prince, chap. xvii.) was accounted cruel; but his cruelty not only thoroughly reformed and united Romagna, but settled it in peace and kept it firm in allegiance to him. Which being duly considered, he will appear much more merciful than the Florentines, who to avoid the reproach of cruelty, suffered Pistoia to be destroyed." These, no doubt are horrid maxims, and could never have risen in the mind of such a man as Machiavel, but from the cause assigned above: and they are the more to be lamented, as they have thrown a cloud over the fame of one, who, in my opinion, is the greatest political reasoner upon facts that hath appeared in any age or country."

multitudinem religione implevit, quæ semper regenti est similis. Timasitheus instilled a spirit of piety and devotion into the people, who are always governed by the example of their Prince". Much like which is the saying of Lorenzo de' Medici,

E quel che fa il signor fanno poi molti,
Che nel Signor son tutti gli occhi volti.

Princes attract the eyes of all, and good
Or bad, are copied by the multitude.

C H A P. XXX.

That a Citizen who would do any good in a Republic by dint of his own authority, must in the first place extinguish all envy: also what provisions are to be made for the defence of a Town upon the approach of an enemy.

THE Roman Senate having intelligence that preparations were making throughout all Tuscany to invade their dominions; and that the Latins and Hernici (who had long been in amity with their Republic) had entered into a league against them with the Volsci, (the perpetual enemies of the Roman name) began to apprehend that such a war must be attended with very great danger. But as Camillus was one of the Tribunes, and vested with Consular power, they thought they should have no occasion to create a Dictator, if his Collegues would entrust him with the chief command: which being proposed to them was cheerfully complied with; "nec quicquam (says Livy) de majestate suâ detractum credebant, quod majestati ejus concessissent: for they looked upon it as no disparagement to themselves, to give the first place to him."

Camillus therefore, being assured of their obedience, immediately raised three armies; one of which he conducted himself against the Tuscans; the second was encamped near Rome, under the command of Quintius Servilius, to watch the motions of the Latins and Hernici; and the third was left at home with Lucius Quintius to defend the City, and to guard the Senate-house and the Gates, if occasion required. Besides this, he ordered Horatius, one of his Collegues, to fill the Magazines with corn, arms, and other stores that are necessary in time of war; appointing Cornelius, another of the Tribunes, to preside in the Senate and Councils, and to expedite the public business: thus the Tribunes in those times, we see, were ready either to command or obey, as was most requisite for the good of the Commonwealth.

Hence we may observe what great things a good and wise man may do, and of how much service he may be to his country, when he has extinguished envy by his own merit and virtue: for that often prevents worthy and able men exerting themselves by keeping them down, and not suffering them to be advanced to such a degree of power and authority as is necessary to accomplish any great purpose. Now envy is extinguished two ways; first, by some sudden calamity, or arduous undertaking: for upon such occasions, men being sensible of the danger they are in, lay aside their ambition, and readily consent to obey those by whose abilities alone they can hope to be delivered. Thus it happened to Camillus, who having been three times Dictator, and given the most convincing proofs of his virtue as well as his abilities, by constantly attending to the public good, without any regard to his own private advantage, had so far extinguished all envy in the breasts of his Fellow-citizens, that they feared nothing from his power, nor thought it any diminution of their own honour to serve under a man of his established reputation and integrity. The other way by which envy is extinguished, is when your rivals in power and reputation are removed, either by violence or the course of nature: for such men will never be at rest, whilst they see you in greater esteem esteem and authority than themselves; especially if they are members of a corrupt state: for then it is impossible they should ever be moved by any danger or emergency, because their education has not furnished them with any principles of virtue; so that out of the perversity of their nature, they will rather see their country ruined, than relinquish their views. Nothing but death therefore is capable of extinguishing this sort of envy: and if fortune is so propitious to a virtuous man that his competitors go off by natural death, he may then establish his reputation without scandal, and exercise his power without opposition or offence. But if that does not happen, he must endeavour to rid himself of them by any means whatsoever; for this must be done before any thing else can be effected. Thus whoever reads the Bible with attention, will see that Moses, in order to establish his Laws, was obliged to put many people to death, who opposed him out of envy*. Girolamo Savonarola,

* Upon this passage, E. Dacres says as follows. "I doubt the understanding which Machiavel advises others of, he wants himself: not knowing the meaning of, or not believing the holy writt: whereby he puts men past suspicion of his Atheisme. For what he alleedges of Moses, he must needs take originally from Moses his bookes, being we have not any author of that antiquity as could write any thing of his owne knowledge touching those times. But those Machiavel seems not to beleve further than served his own humour, reading the scriptures only to a politique end, not so much for the strengthening his beleefe, as the bettering his discourse. Yet though Machiavel did not, I hope others will beleve, that Moses delivered to the Israelites the true oracles of God, and that it was not Moses that punished the delinquents among them, but God sending his immediate judgments; as in the rebellion of Corah and his complices, Numbers xvi. Moses did but cite them as to appearance; but God immediately sent his vengeance, for the Earth under them opened, v. 31. And when that wretched fellow gathered stickes on the Sabboth, Numbers xv. Moses awaited till God passed the sentence upon him for his death and the manner thereof, v. 35. Therefore Machiavel may justly be taxed for traducing Moses here of more than he hath warrant for, making no other esteeme of Moses his bringing the Israelites out of Egypt, and his leadinge them through the wildderneffe, than of Romulus gathering together a scattered multitude and laying the foundation of that Commonwealth; which action, his courage and ambition of rule and glory thrust him upon: not seeming to take notice that Moses was immediately called by God and sent to shew his wonders and judgments against the Egyptians, and to conduct the Israelites into Canaan, (according to God's promises formerly made to their forefathers)

and Pietro Soderini, Gonfalonier of Florence, likewise saw the necessity of acting in this manner: but the former being only a Friar could not do it, because he had not sufficient authority; and such of his followers as had, did not rightly comprehend his meaning; though that was not his fault, for his Sermons were full of exclamations and invectives against the “wise men of this world;” a name which he gave to those that envied him and opposed his measures *. As to Soderini, he flattered himself that time, moderation, the auspiciousness of his fortune, and his great beneficence, would at last extinguish the envy that some had conceived against him: for he was young, and so well supported by his friends (the number of whom was daily increased by his munificence and liberality), that he hoped he should have been able to surmount all opposition, without having recourse to violence, or exerting his power in such a manner as might occasion scandal and disturbance: not considering that time and opportunities are not to be lost, that beneficence is ineffectual, that fortune is inconstant, and that envy is not to be appeased by any sort of favours or good offices whatsoever. So that both these persons were ruined at last; one of them because he had not authority enough to rid himself of those who envied him; and the other by not doing it when he had it in his power †.

Another thing to be observed in the conduct of Camillus, is the provision he made both at home and abroad for the preservation of Rome: and indeed, such Historians as Livy are much to be commended, for giving a particular and circumstantial account of these occurrences, that so those who come after them may know how to act upon similar occasions. We ought therefore to remark upon this, that it is very imprudent and dangerous to leave the defence of a City to a parcel of tumultuous people, without order wherein he behaved not himself either ambitiously or insolently; nor was any thing done by his own prowess or policy, but merely by the ordinance of God.”

or command : of which it is plain, that Camillus was sufficiently aware, by leaving a regular army for the security of Rome; which many perhaps may think was altogether unnecessary, because the Romans were a brave people, and inured to war, and therefore it might have been sufficient to put arms into their hands when occasion required. But Camillus judged otherwise, and so would any prudent man in the like circumstances : for the multitude ought not to be trusted with arms, except under certain restrictions and proper command. In imitation of this example then, a person who undertakes the defence of a City, should above all things take care not to arm a giddy and tumultuous multitude, but rather select such as he dares trust with arms, and is satisfied will obey him in whatever he commands; and order those who are not made choice of for that purpose, to stay at home and guard their own houses. Whoever pursues this method in a town that is besieged, will find it an easy matter to defend it well; otherwise, it will be difficult, if not impossible*.

AMONGST all the noble actions and sayings which Livy ascribes to Camillus, nothing shews the magnanimity of that great man more plainly than the following : “Nec mihi Dictatura animos fecit (said he in one of his speeches) nec exilium ademit : I am not elated with the Dictatorship, nor was I dejected in banishment.” By which we see that great men are always the same in every reverse of fortune : for though she may change her countenance, and sometimes exalt, and sometimes depress them, yet they never vary, but constantly retain the same firmness of mind, and are so uniform in their conduct, that fortune seems to have no power over them : whereas mean and pusillanimous men, buoyed up with prosperity, and intoxicated with good fortune, impute all their success to virtues of which they were never possessed ; and thus become odious and insupportable to those who have any thing to do with them. This often exposes them to sudden revolutions of fortune, and then they presently fall into the other extreme, and become as abject as they were arrogant before. Hence it comes to pass, that when Princes of this stamp fall into adversity, they generally fly ; instead of exerting themselves manfully to oppose it ; for as they abused their prosperity, they are incapable of supporting themselves in adversity. These virtues and these defects are common, not only to particular men, but to whole Republics : of which, I shall give two examples ; one from the conduct of the Romans, the other from that of the Venetians.

The Romans were never dismayed in adversity, nor elated with prosperity : for a proof of which, we may alledge their behaviour after their defeat at Cannæ, and their victory over Antiochus. For after that defeat, though Annibal had routed them twice before, and reduced them to the last extremity, they were so far from being daunted, that instead of suing for peace, they bravely resolved to continue the war ; and, contrary to their usual practice, refusing to redeem the prisoners who had been taken by the enemy, they armed their old men and slaves, and sent a fresh army into the field : an account of which being sent to Carthage, Hanno told the Senate there, “ He feared they were but little better for their victory at Cannæ :” from whence we see that the Romans were never dejected in the lowest ebb of their fortune. On the other hand, they never grew arrogant in prosperity, as we may observe from the behaviour of Scipio to Antiochus : for when that Prince sent Ambassadors with overtures of peace to Scipio, the latter told them he would not grant him any terms except he would retire into Syria, and submit entirely to the discretion of the Roman Republic. But Antiochus rejecting these conditions, came to an engagement with the Roman army, and was utterly defeated: after which, he sent other Ambassadors with orders to accept any terms from the Conqueror; who contented himself however with the same which he offered him before the battle, telling the Ambassadors, “Quod Romani, si vincuntur, non minuuntur animis, nec si vincunt insolescere solent; that as the Romans were never dejected when they lost a battle, so they knew how to behave with moderation when they were victorious.”

Very different was the behaviour of the Venetians in their prosperity, which they attributed solely to their own bravery and good conduct, though without the least reason: for they became so insolent, that they called the King of France a Son of St. Mark, treated the Pope and all the rest of the Italian Princes with the utmost disdain; and, not content with their territories in Italy, vainly imagined they should soon extend their dominion as far as ever the ancient Romans had done. But fortune beginning to frown upon them, and their forces being worsted at the battle of Vaila, by the French, they lost all their acquisitions at once; for some of the States that were subject to them revolted, and the rest they meanly ceded to the Pope and the King of Spain: after which, they were so dispirited that they sent Ambassadors to the Emperor, with an offer of becoming tributary to him; and wrote letters to the Pope, in the most abject and submissive terms, to move his compassion. To this extremity of dejection they were reduced in four days, and when they had not lost one half of their army: for after the above mentioned battle, one of their Commissaries retreated safe to Verona with above twenty-five thousand horse and foot. So that if they had acted with any sort of spirit, they might soon have brought another army into the field: and if they could not have beat the enemy, they might perhaps have obtained an honourable peace; at least the loss of their dominions would not have been attended with so much disgrace. But their dejection was owing to the defect of their military institutions and the consciousness of their inexperience in warlike affairs; which disheartened them to such a degree, that they were incapable of exerting themselves as they ought. But this will always be the fate of such people: for insolence in prosperity, and dejection in adversity, are owing to mean and pitiful institutions. If men are improperly educated and disciplined, they will never be good for any thing: if otherwise, they will know how to behave with equanimity in all conditions, and to make so true an estimate of the things of this world, as neither to become insolent when fortune smiles, nor abject when she frowns upon them. So that what I said before of individuals will hold good with regard to whole communities; which will always act with spirit or pusillanimity, according as their discipline and institutions are good and wholesome, or mean and defective

Now though I have said elsewhere that good military discipline is the foundation stone of all States, and that without it there can neither be good laws nor good order of any kind*, it may not be amiss to repeat it here; because we see the necessity of keeping up a good army in almost every page of Livy's History, and that no army can ever be good except it is well disciplined and exercised, which cannot be done if it is not composed of your own subjects. For as no State, either is, or can be, continually at war, it is necessary that its forces should be duly exercised and disciplined in time of peace: but that is impossible if your army consists of foreign troops, on account of the immense expence you must be at in maintaining such an army both in peace and war. Ca-

millus, as I said above, marched out with an army against the Tuscans: but when they came within sight of the enemy, and found the Tuscan army was much superior to their own, they were not a little dismayed: but Camillus being aware of it, calmly walked through the ranks, and without any further directions or altering the disposition of his army, only said to his Soldiers, “Quod quisque didicit, aut consuevit, faciat; practise what you have learnt, and I desire no more.” From whence we may conclude that he well knew they had been sufficiently disciplined and exercised before, both in peace and war, to make them good soldiers; and that he fully confided in them. For it is certain that no material service can be expected from an undisciplined army; that no General can trust to it; and that if Hannibal himself should rise from the dead, and be put at the head of such a body of forces, they would presently be cut to pieces by a well disciplined army, though much inferior in number; because when an army is engaged, the General himself cannot be in all places at the same time; and therefore it is necessary that his subordinate officers should strictly obey the commands he had given them before the battle begun; that they should enter into the spirit of their orders, and know how to execute them in a proper manner: otherwise he must inevitably be defeated.

If then any state will follow the example of the ancient Romans, in exercising and disciplining its forces in times of peace as well as war, and accustom its subjects not only to exert their virtues both in public and private, but to arm themselves against the vicissitudes of fortune; it will always be able to maintain its dignity both in prosperity and adversity: but if it neglects this, and leaves itself entirely to the caprice of fortune, without any dependence upon its own merit and endeavours, as the Venetians did, it must be shaken by every blast of wind, and totally ruined at last.

THE Circei and Velitræ, two Roman Colonies, revolted from that Republic in hopes of being protected by the Latins: but the Latins themselves being soon after subdued, and unable to give them any assistance, some of the revolters advised their Fellow-citizens to return to their obedience. This advice however was warmly opposed by the authors of that rebellion; who being afraid they should be more severely punished than any of the rest, endeavoured by all means to prevent an accommodation, and for that purpose persuaded their countrymen to continue in arms and commence hostilities against the Romans. And indeed it must be confessed, that when any one has a mind to prevent either a Prince or a Republic, from coming to terms of agreement, there is no surer method to obtain that end than to prevail upon them to injure or affront the other party in so atrocious a manner, that the dread of the punishment they have justly deserved may deter them from making any overtures of peace*.

At the end of the first war in which the Carthaginians were engaged with the Romans, the Soldiers who had been employed by the former in Sicily and Sardinia, were sent back into Africa, where they mutinied for want of pay; and taking up arms under Matho and Spendius, whom they had made choice of for their leaders, they plundered several towns that belonged to the State. Upon which, the Carthaginians being desirous to try all other means before they proceeded to force, sent Asdrubal, one of their principal Citizens, to treat with them, in hopes he would have been able to reduce them to obedience by the influence which they supposed he must have over them, as he had been their Commander some time before. But when he arrived amongst them, Matho and Spendius being determined to deprive their Soldiers of all hopes of ever coming to any terms with the Carthaginians, persuaded them that it was the best way to kill Asdrubal and all the rest of the Carthaginians whom they had taken prisoners. This advice was accordingly followed: for they not only put them to the most cruel kinds of death they could devise, but afterwards published a proclamation in which they threatened to serve all other Carthaginian prisoners in the same manner that should fall into their hands: by which they prevented all proposals of peace, and made their Soldiers more obstinate in their rebellion.

* See the Speech of a Plebeian, Hist. Flor. book iii. about the middle of it,

C H A P. XXXIII.

That it is of great service in battle, to inspire Soldiers with confidence both in themselves and their General.

IT is a matter of the utmost importance to inspire Soldiers with such a degree of confidence before a battle, as makes them think themselves sure of Victory; for which purpose, it is necessary they should be well armed, well disciplined, and well acquainted with each other; which yet cannot be effected, except they are your own Subjects, and countrymen, and have lived long together. It is also requisite that they should have so good an opinion of their General, as to put great confidence in him; which they will always do, if they see that he is vigilant, active, brave, and keeps up his command with dignity; which he may easily do, if he punishes offenders in a proper manner, and does not harrass his men with hard duty when it is unnecessary: besides which, he should be punctual in fulfilling his promises, ready at all times to encourage them, by representing how easy it is to surmount many things which seem difficult only at a distance, and by either concealing or extenuating all dangers: for this is a certain way to secure their confidence, and contributes much to victory *. The Romans used to inspire their troops with this confidence by Religious means, and always had recourse to Auguries and Auspices when they created Consuls, raised armies, or were going to engage an enemy: in short, without some ceremony of this kind, their wisest and best Generals never went upon any enterprize or undertook any thing of moment; imagining that it would contribute greatly to their success to have it thought the Gods were on their side: and if any of their Consuls or Generals presumed to engage an enemy in contempt of the Auspices, they always punished them for it, as they did Claudius Pulcher. Appius Claudius, accordingly, complaining to the people of the insolence of the Tribunes, by whose means the Auspices and other Religious rites had been corrupted, says as follows; “Eludant nunc licet Religionem: quid enim interest si pulli non pascentur, si ex caveâ tardius exierint, si occinuerit avis? Parva sunt hæc; sed parva ista non contemnendo majores nostri maximam hanc Rempublicam fecerunt. They may laugh at Religion if they please, and say what signifies it whether the poultry eat their meat or not, whether they come quickly or slowly out of their pens, and whether such or such a bird sings? These matters may seem trifling indeed; but trifling as they are, our Ancestors exalted this Republic to the glory we now see it in by a Religious observation of them.” For such things serve to keep Soldiers in good spirits and united, which conduces not a little to the success of any undertaking: but they must be seconded by valour and good conduct, otherwise they will not be sufficient of themselves alone, as may appear from the following instance. The Prænestines having taken the field against the Romans, encamped upon the banks of the Allia, in the very place where the Romans had once been defeated by the Gauls: which they did to inspire their own army with courage, and to strike a damp into that of the enemy, when they remembered how unfortunate they had been in that place before*. Now though there was some policy in this step, yet the event shewed that true valour is not to be moved by such trifling circumstances; for the Roman Dictator having reconnoitred the enemy, said to his General of horse, “Vides tu fortunâ illos fretos, ad Alliam confedisse; at tu, fretus armis animisque, invade mediam aciem: you see that the enemy have sat down here, trusting to the fortune of the place; but trust you to your own arms and courage, and fall on.” True valour therefore, good discipline, and a confidence arising from many victories, cannot be disconcerted by trivial accidents and little disorders. The two Manlii being at the head of an army which the Romans sent out against the Volsci, and having detached part of their forces to forage, it happened that both those who went upon that errand, and those that remained in their camp, were attacked by the enemy at the same time; out of which danger however, the Soldiers extricated themselves by their own courage, rather than by any good conduct in the Consuls, as Livy tells us, “militum etiam sine rectore stabilis virtus tutata est.”

I should not conclude this Chapter without taking some notice of an expedient made use of by Fabius to encourage his Soldiers: for being sent with an army against the Tuscans, and knowing how necessary it was to inspire them with confidence of success, especially as they were in a strange country, and had a new enemy to deal with, he told them in an harangue when they were going to engage, that they had many reasons to hope for victory, but he could give them another, why they might depend upon it with certainty, if it was not of such a nature, that it would be dangerous to disclose it. An admirable piece of Generalship, and well worthy of imitation.

C H A P. XXXIV.

What sort of reputation, or character, or opinion it is, that first inclines the people to favour some particular Citizen: and whether a People, or a Prince dispenses of their honours and employments with greater judgment and prudence.

WE have shewn before that Titus Manlius, (afterwards called Torquatus) defended his father in an accusation that was brought against him by Marcus Pomponius, one of the Tribunes of the people. And though the method he took to do it was something extraordinary, and favoured of violence, yet the remarkable affection which he shewed to his father was so pleasing to the people, that instead of calling him to any account for what he had done, they shewed their approbation of it by chusing him second Tribune of the Legions, at the next election of those officers*. It may not be amiss therefore, to consider the motives upon which the people commonly act in the disposal of their honours: from whence we shall see, that they proceed with more prudence and judgment than Princes usually do in such distributions, as I have asserted elsewhere †.

I say then, that the people are determined in their choice upon these occasions, either by the public character and reputation of a man, when his conduct and actions are not otherwise known to them; or by some particular prepossession or opinion of their own; both which motives are sometimes owing to a man's extraction, (for when his ancestors have been good and worthy men, it is generally thought he will be so too, except he behaves himself in such a manner as to convince them of the contrary) and sometimes to his own conversation and way of life: that is, when he associates himself with virtuous and honourable men, and such as are in high esteem for their prudence: for since there is no surer way of judging of a man than by the company he keeps, a person who associates with good men will justly be thought so himself; because when people are intimate, and much conversant together, there must of necessity be a similitude in their manners. But there is another way of gaining credit amongst the people; which is by great and honourable actions, either of a public or private nature. This is the best and most stable foundation that any man can build his reputation upon: for that which depends upon the merit of our Ancestors soon fades and perishes, except it is revived and renewed by a man's own virtues. The prepossession which arises from your ordinary manner of life and associating with good men, is a better foundation than this; though not so good a one as the other; for as it arises from opinion and expectation only, it is likewise apt to wear off, if not supported and confirmed, in some reasonable time, by great and laudable actions: but the reputation which depends upon a man's own merit, takes so deep a root, and stands so firm, that he must behave very ill indeed to forfeit it afterwards.

Those that live in a Commonwealth ought therefore to pursue this course, and endeavour by all means to begin their career with some great and extraordinary action, which may serve as a foundation to build their future reputation upon; as the young Romans did, who always set out either with promoting some law for the good of the public, or impeaching some great and powerful Citizen, who had transgressed the laws, or doing some other remarkable thing that made him the subject of popular applause. This manner of proceeding is no less necessary to maintain and increase a good reputation, than to acquire it at first: for which purpose it should often be repeated; as it was by Titus Manlius through the whole whole course of his life. For after he had defended his father in so strenuous and extraordinary a manner, and thereby laid the foundation of his reputation, he some years after fought the Champion of the Gauls, as we have said before, and having killed him in a single combat, took a gold collar from his neck and put it upon his own; by which he gained the name of Torquatus. These things he did when he was young: and afterwards, when he grew up to years of maturity, he put his own Son to death for having engaged the enemy without orders; though he had gained a victory. Such examples of personal courage, and strict regard to discipline and justice, gave him much more reputation, both in his own times, and the ages that have since passed, than all the battles he had won, and the triumphs he had obtained, though he had been as successful in that respect as any other of his countrymen: and not without reason; for in one case he had many equals, but in the other, very few, or none at all. Scipio the elder did not gain so much glory by his triumphs, as by saving his father's life in battle, when he was but a youth; and by drawing his sword, and forcing several young Romans to take an oath that they would never desert their country, which they had designed to do after the battle of Cannæ*: for these two actions were the foundation of his fame, and served as steps to the triumphs which were afterwards decreed him by the Senate for his victories in Africa and Spain: and this reputation (great as it was before) he prodigiously increased, by sending back a beautiful young Lady, whom he had taken prisoner in Spain, safe and inviolate to her friends. Now if such a conduct must be observed by those that would advance themselves to honour and preferment in a Commonwealth, it is equally necessary that Princes should do the same, in order to acquire and preserve the esteem of their Subjects: for nothing recommends a Prince so much to his People, as either saying or doing something extraordinary in his youth : especially if it seems to proceed from a regard to their welfare, and has such an appearance of magnanimity, justice, or liberality, as makes it much talked of †.

But to resume our subject. I say that when the people begin to have a good opinion of any particular person, and are moved to confer their honours and employments upon him, by one or other of the above-mentioned reasons, their judgment is not ill founded : but certainly they judge best, when they do it after he has given some proofs of his merit ; because, in that case, they seldom or never can be deceived. I speak only of that good opinion which they conceive of a man at first, before he has either sufficiently distinguished himself, and established his reputation by repeated instances of his worth, or cancelled the merit of his good actions by others of a different nature : in both which cases they are not so apt to err as a Prince. For since it is possible that the people may be deceived by report, or opinion, or even by the actions of a man, and think better of him than he deserves, (which is an error that a Prince cannot well fall into, because he has counsellors to advise and inform him better) wise Legislators have always taken care to obviate this inconvenience, by providing, that when any great office should become vacant, and the people should be so far mistaken in their judgment as to make choice of an improper or unworthy person to fill it, any Citizen should not only be at liberty to publish his incapacity or demerit, but have the thanks of his Fellow citizens for so doing ; that the people, better informed, might correct their error. For a proof of this, we may appeal to an harangue which Fabius Maximus made to the people, in the time of the second Punic war, when they were inclined to have created T. Ottacilius, one of their Consuls : but Fabius thinking him by no means equal to such a charge at that juncture, openly declared against him, and represented his insufficiency in such a light that he was set aside, and another person elected of more worth and greater abilities. The people therefore, in the election of Magistrates, found their opinion of men upon such circumstances as are least apt to deceive one: and when they have Counsellors to advise them, they are guilty of fewer errors than Princes: so that a Citizen who would gain their favour and good opinion, must first distinguish himself by some great and remarkable action, as Titus Manlius did*.

That it is dangerous to be the chief promoter and adviser of an Enterprize: and that the more important the Enterprize is, the greater is the danger.

IT would be too tedious a task to shew at large how dangerous it is for one man to take upon himself to preside and direct in any new and extraor-

* “ The most painful and difficult employment in the world, (says Montaigne, book III. chap. vii.) in my opinion, is worthily to discharge the office of a King. I excuse more of their failings than men commonly do, in consideration of the vast weight of their function, which really astonishes me. It is difficult for such boundless power to observe any decorum. Yet so it is, that even to those who are not of the most happy disposition, it is a singular incitement to virtue, to be stationed in such a place, that whatever good you do is recorded and placed to account, and the least Benefaction extends to numbers of people; and where your talent, like that of Preachers, chiefly addresses itself to the people, who are not very nice judges, easily deceived, and easily satisfied. There are few things in which we can give a sincere judgment; because there are few wherein we have not in some sort a particular interest. Superiority and inferiority, command and subjection, are naturally liable to envy and cavil, and must necessarily be continually encroaching upon one another. I believe neither one nor the other, touching its respective rights: let reason therefore, which is inflexible and dispassionate, when it can be found, determine the case. It is scarcely a month ago since I turned over two Scotch Authors who contended with each other upon this point. He who takes the part of the People, makes the condition of a King worse than that of a Carter; and the writer for the Monarch, lifts him up some degrees above Almighty God in Sovereignty and Power.” See also book I. chap. xxix. xlv, and lviii, of these Discourses, dinary enterprize, wherein the concurrent advice and assistance of many are required, how difficult it is to conduct such an undertaking, and how much more so, to bring it to a happy conclusion. I shall therefore reserve what I have to say upon one part of this matter for a more convenient place; and speak only at present of the dangers to which a man is exposed who presumes to give a Prince such advice in any great and important enterprize, that the success of it, whether good or bad, must be imputed wholly to himself. For as mankind commonly judge of things by the event, if an enterprize miscarries, all the blame is laid upon him that advised it; and if it succeeds he may gain some little applause; but the reward in that case is not adequate to the danger he would have been in if it had failed. Selim, the present Grand Signior, having made preparations to invade Syria and Egypt (as it is reported by some who lately come out of Turkey) was advised by one of his Bashaws who lived upon the confines of Persia, to turn his arms upon the Sophi. He therefore marched with a very powerful army against the Persians; but arriving in a flat open country where there were vast desarts and no water to be had, and meeting with many other difficulties and dangers which in former times had often proved fatal to the Roman armies in those parts, his forces were so diminished by hunger, thirst, and sickness, that, though he succeeded in that expedition, he lost the greater part of his army: upon which, he was so enraged at the person who advised him to undertake it, that he put him to death. Many others have been treated in the same manner by Republics upon like occasions, as we might shew at large from the history of former times. It happened that one of the Roman Consuls being chosen out of the Plebeians, by the instigation of some particular Citizens, was defeated the first time he led an army into the field: for which the encouragers of that election would have been called to an account, if the whole body of Plebeians had not thought themselves obliged to protect them for the honour they had done them. Hence we see that the Counsellors of Princes and Republics lie under this dilemma; that if they do not give such advice as they think best for their Masters, without any other consideration, they fail in their duty; and if they do, they often hazard their own lives and fortunes: because (as I said before) most men are apt to judge of the goodness or badness of their counsel from the event.

Considering therefore with myself how these dangers are to be avoided, I think the best way is to proceed with calmness and moderation, and not to avow or patronize any undertaking with vehemence and earnestness, as a project of your own; but to give your opinion in a modest manner, and support it without passion: that so, if a Prince or a Republic should think fit to follow it, they may seem to do it voluntarily, and not to be forced into it by clamour and importunity. If you act in this manner, it would be unreasonable either in the Prince or the people to blame your advice, as it is not forced upon them without the concurrence and approbation of the other Counsellors: and therefore you have nothing to fear when your counsel is not opposed by the rest; but when it is followed with reluctance, you are in danger, because if it should not succeed, they will all combine to ruin you. Now though there is not so much honour to be gained this way, as when the authority of one man prevails over that of many, and his advice is crowned with success; yet it is attended with two advantages: for in the first place, you run no risque; and in the second, when you propose any thing with modesty, and it is carried against you by the obstinacy and perverseness of the rest; if any miscarriage should ensue in the execution, it will be still more for your reputation. Not that a good man should ever wish to build his reputation upon any misfortune that may befall his Prince or his country; but when such a thing has actually happened, it is more satisfaction to have given such counsel as would have prevented it, and to hear it applauded, than to be in danger of being punished for it.

This is the best course, I think, that can be taken by Counsellors in such cases : to be silent and give no opinion would be not only betraying their country, but exposing themselves to danger ; for in a little time they would become suspected, and might be served as the Macedonian was by Perseus, who being defeated by Paulus Æmilius, and escaping into a place of safety with a few friends, was told by one of them (as they were talking over their misfortunes) of some errors he had been guilty of that were the cause of his ruin ; at which, he turned to him, and asking if he was not ashamed to tell him of them, like a Traitor, when there was no remedy left, he immediately killed him with his own hands : so that he was justly punished for being silent when he should have spoken, and speaking when he ought to have held his tongue. The preceding directions therefore deserve our attention.

Why the French always have been, and still are, accounted more than men at the first charge ; and afterwards less than women.

THE ardour of the Gaul who challenged any man in the Roman army to a single combat, and was killed by Titus Manlius upon the banks of the Anio, puts me in mind of what Livy says of the Gauls in several parts of his History, viz. that at the beginning of a battle they are more than men, but afterwards less than women *. Many writers considering to what causes this may be attributed, ascribe it to the natural emperament and constitution of the people : and indeed I think there seems to be some appearance of truth and reason in this opinion; but I am persuaded at the same time, that this innate ardour which makes them so fierce at the first onset might be so corrected and regulated by art as to be kept up till the end of a battle.

For a proof of my assertion let it be considered that there are three sorts of armies; one, in which there is both courage and good order; the former of which is in a great measure owing to the latter †. Of this sort were the Roman armies, which were always remarkable for the regularity and good order that were established in them by strict discipline and constant exercise: nothing was done without the express command of their General; the Soldiers neither eat nor slept, nor bought, nor sold, nor did any thing either of a civil or military nature without his permission. The example therefore of those armies which subdued the whole world ought certainly to be followed by all others: for such as do not think it worth their imitation, cannot properly be called armies; and if they ever happen to do any thing extraordinary, it is rather to be imputed to a degree of fury and blind impetuosity, than to true valour. But well disciplined troops know how to moderate and restrain those sallies, and avail themselves of their courage at proper times and places, in such a manner that they are never dismayed at any difficulty or danger: for good order and discipline constantly revive their spirits, and inspire them with such confidence of victory that they think nothing can stand before them whilst they keep firm and compact in their ranks. Very different is the case in the second sort of armies, which, like the French, have ardour enough, but no good discipline; and therefore they always give way very soon; for if they do not immediately make an impression upon the enemy, the fury of their first efforts being spent, and having no discipline to animate and support them, they grow dispirited and run away.

Whereas the Romans, on the contrary, relying on their discipline and good order, were not to be daunted by any sort of difficulty or danger, nor ever despaired of victory; but behaved with as much valour and firmness at the end of a battle as in the beginning, or rather more if possible, as their courage always increased according to the resistance they met with. But there is a third sort of armies which (like those of the Italians at present) have neither any courage, nor discipline: and these in truth are good for nothing at all, nor ever can gain a victory, except they chance to fall upon an army that is routed by some other accident. What sort of order may be expected in such armies we may see from the speech of Papirius Cursor in Livy, when he would have punished Fabius his Master of horse for disobedience of orders. “Nemo hominum neque Deorum verecundiam habeat; non edicta Imperatorum, non auspicia observentur: sine comœatu, vagi milites in pacato, in hostico, errent; immemores sacramenti, se ubi velint exauctorent; infrequentia deserant signa; neque convenient ad edictum; nec discernant interdium, nocte; æquo, iniquo loco; jussu, injussu Imperatoris, pugnent; & non signa, non ordines servant; latrocinii modo, cæca & fortuita, pro solenni & sacratâ militia fit. Henceforth no body will shew the least reverence to any Institutions either human or divine; they will laugh at the commands of their Generals, and despise the sacred Auspices; the loose disorderly Soldiers will wander about without any passport, and plunder their own country as well as that of the enemy; they will think no more of their oath, but discharge themselves when they please; they will desert their colours, and return to them no more upon any proclamation whatsoever; they will have no regard either to the advantage of time or place, when they are to engage an enemy; they will obey no signals or orders, but fight when they have a mind, whether their Commanders will or not, and become more like a parcel of banditti, a tumultuous and disorderly rabble, than a regular gular and well disciplined army." Hence we may judge whether our armies at present "are more like a parcel of banditti, a tumultuous and disorderly rabble, or regular and well disciplined troops," how different they are from such as may properly be called good soldiers, how far from being either brave and orderly at the same time, like the old Romans, or even from being brave alone, like the French.

C H A P. XXXVII.

Whether Skirmishes before a battle are necessary; and how the nature and disposition of a new enemy is to be discovered without them.

NOT to mention the difficulties that occur in conducting all human affairs to any degree of perfection, there is no good without some evil so intimately united and interwoven with it, that it seems impossible to separate them, or to obtain the one without partaking of the other. It is a hard matter therefore to arrive at perfection, except a man is favoured by fortune in such an extraordinary manner as enables him to surmount these usual and natural impediments. These reflections I cannot help making whenever I read the account given by Livy of the single combat betwixt Titus Manlius and the Champion of the Gauls: upon which that Historian says, "Tanti ea dimicatio ad universi belli eventum momenti fuit, ut Gallorum exercitus, relictis trepidè castris, in Tiburtem agrum, mox in Campaniam transferit. The event of this combat was of such consequence, that it in a great measure determined the success of the war: for the Gauls immediately decamped in the utmost consternation, and retreated first into the territories of the Tiburtines, and from thence into Campania." For we must consider on one hand, that no General ought to do any thing, which, though seemingly of small importance, may have

have an ill effect upon his army; and that to stake his whole fortune upon part of his forces only where he cannot exert all his strength, is very rash and imprudent, as I have shewn before at large in my observations on defending defiles *. On the other hand it is to be considered, that when a General has a new Enemy to deal with of any reputation, he is obliged to make some trial of them by light skirmishes and fighting in small parties before he comes to a general engagement; that so his Soldiers beginning to be acquainted with their discipline and manner of fighting, may not be dismayed at the report they have heard of their prowess; which indeed is a precaution of great importance, and so necessary, that without it he runs no small risque of being defeated. Thus when Valerius Corvinus was sent by the Romans with an army against the Samnites, (an enemy with whom they had never been engaged before) Livy tells us that he frequently sent out small parties to skirmish and reconnoitre the enemy, “ne eos novum bellum, ne novus hostis terreret; that so his Soldiers might not be daunted at a new enemy, or a new way of fighting.” It must be confessed however, that this method of sending out small parties to skirmish with the enemy is subject to great dangers: for if they should be defeated, it would have a very different effect from what was designed, and dismay your troops instead of animating them: so that this is one of those things in which good and evil are so closely united, that you may easily mistake the one for the other.

I say then, that a General should endeavour by all means to prevent any thing that may strike a terror into his army, to which all troops are naturally subject when they are beat; and therefore he ought not to suffer them to skirmish with the enemy, except they can do it with great advantage, and are sure of success; neither should he attempt to maintain passes, where he cannot employ his whole strength; nor be too obstinate in defending any town, unless he knows he must inevitably be ruined by the loss of it: and when that is the case, he is to draw all the rest of his forces out of other places into the field; that so they may be able to act in concert with the garrison, and exert their whole strength to prevent its being taken. For when an enemy gets possession of such places only as you abandon, and you have still an army entire in the field, it is no discredit to you, nor discouragement to your Soldiers: but when you lose a place which you had undertaken to maintain, and every body expected you would do it effectually, it hurts your reputation and dismays your troops in such a manner, that you will probably be ruined, as the Gauls were, by risking the event of the whole war upon a trifling occasion. Philip of Macedon (the father of Perseus) a Prince well experienced in war, and of great reputation in his time, being invaded by the Romans, abandoned and laid waste a considerable part of his country which he thought he should not be able to defend; wisely judging it would be less disgrace to leave it to the enemy as not worth keeping, than to undertake its defence and fail in his endeavours. The Romans being reduced to great distress after the battle of Cannæ, and not by any means in a condition to protect some of their Subjects and allies who desired their assistance, gave them leave to defend themselves as well as they could. Now certainly such resolutions as these are much more honourable than pretending to defend others when it is not in your power: for in one case, you lose your friends only; but in the other, you ruin both them and yourself.

But to return to the matter of skirmishing; I say, that if a General is obliged by a new enemy, and a manner of fighting of which his troops have had no experience, to try something of that kind for the purposes abovementioned, he ought either to do it with such advantage that he may be sure of success; or to follow the example of Marius, (which is the better way of the two) when he marched against the Cimbri,

bri, a brave and warlike people, who had invaded Italy, and were plundering all the country : for seeing his troops were seized with a sort of panic at the approach of such a swarm of people, who, though naturally fierce, were not a little elated with a victory which they had already gained over the Romans, he thought it necessary, before he came to an engagement with them, to take some method that might animate his Soldiers, and dispossess them of the terror they had conceived of those barbarians : for which purpose, like a wise General, he often encamped in places where they might observe the march of the enemy at a distance and in security : that so his Soldiers, keeping themselves close within their entrenchments, and being used to see them every day, when they perceived they had only to deal with a disorderly multitude, encumbered with baggage, some of them armed with such weapons as could not much annoy them, and others without any arms at all, they might recover their Spirits, and instead of declining an engagement, be desirous to fight them. A manner of proceeding worthy of so great a General, and of being followed by others who would avoid the dangers above-mentioned, and not be reduced to the same necessity that the Gauls found themselves in, “ Qui ob rem parvi ponderis, (says the Historian,) in Tiburtem agrum, & in Campaniam transferint : who being terrified at an accident of little moment, retreated first into the territories of Tibur, and then into Campania.”

C H A P. XXXVIII.

VALERIUS CORVINUS (as I said in the last Chapter) was sent with an army against the Samnites, a new enemy at that time to the Roman Republic.

public. To encourage his men therefore, and to make them acquainted with the enemy they had to do with, he sometimes sent small parties out to skirmish, and sometimes used to harangue them all together: in which harangues, especially in one that he made just before they were coming to a general engagement, he represented to them with great energy, how little account they ought to make of such an enemy, when they considered their own valour and his conduct. From one part of this Speech we may learn, in what manner a Commander ought to be qualified, in order to gain the confidence of his Soldiers: “Tum etiam intueri (says he) cujus ductu auspicioque incunda pugna sit: utrum qui audiendus, duntaxat magnificus adhortator sit, verbis tantum ferox, operum militarium expertus; an qui & ipse tela tractare, procedere ante signa, versari mediâ in mole pugnae sciat. Facta mea, non dicta, vos milites sequi volo, nec disciplinam modo, sed exemplum etiam a me petere, qui hâc dextrâ mihi tres consulatus, summamque laudem peperit: Consider the man under whose conduct and auspices you are going to engage; whether he who now speaks to you is only a magnificent boaster, valiant in words, but ignorant in the duty of a Soldier; or whether he is not a person who knows how to handle his own weapons, and is used to put himself at the head of his men, and charge the thickest of the enemy. Observe my actions, and not my words only, Fellow-soldiers; follow my example, as well as my orders, and confide in me, who have obtained three Consulships, and immortal honour with this arm.” Whoever duly considers this speech, will see what course a man ought to take in order to make himself reputed a great general: and he that does otherwise, will find in time, that his command (in what manner soever he obtained it, whether by favour or good fortune) will rather disgrace than honour him: for it is not the title alone that gives dignity to the man, but the man that dignifies the title.

It must be observed likewise from what we have said

said above, that if great Commanders have been obliged to make use of extraordinary means to animate a veteran army, when they were to engage a new enemy, all possible care and art must be used for that purpose, in an unexperienced body of troops, which have never looked an enemy in the face before: for, if a new enemy, and an unusual manner of fighting, are apt to strike a terror even into veterans, it may well be expected that any enemy whatsoever will make a greater impression upon a raw new raised army. Good Commanders, however, have always taken care to guard against these inconveniencies, and found means to surmount such difficulties, as we may see from the examples of Gracchus the Roman, and Epaminondas the Theban, who beat veteran and well disciplined armies with new raised troops; but they had not only exercised them continually for some months before, but accustomed them to sham fights, to strict obedience, and to keep firm in their ranks; after which, they had so much confidence in them, that they boldly advanced against the enemy. Any one therefore, who is a good Soldier himself, and has men enow, may soon make a good army: so that a Prince who has great numbers of Subjects and wants Soldiers, ought not to impute it to the incapacity of his people, but to his own indolence and bad conduct*.

C H A P. XXXIX.

That a General ought to be well acquainted with the Country which is the Seat of war.

AMONGST other qualifications that are necessary to make a good Commander, we may reckon the knowledge of countries and their situations; with-

* See chap. xxxiii. of this book. Book I. chap. xxi. See also the Art of War, book i. & alibi passim.

out which it is impossible to execute any considerable enterprize. Now, as all sorts of knowledge are perfected by practice and experience, this requires much of both, and is gained chiefly by hunting and other such field exercises : for which purpose, we are told by ancient Historians, that the Heroes who governed the world in former times, were all brought up, and educated as it were in woods and forests. For hunting teaches you many other things that are of great use in war, as well as this sort of knowledge in particular ; and Xenophon tell us, in the life of Cyrus, that when that Prince was marching to invade the King of Armenia's dominions, he talked of that Expedition to his Officers, as if it was nothing more than one of those chaces, in which they had often accompanied him : the men whom he sent to lie in ambush amongst the mountains, he said, were like those who set snares and nets in places where wild beasts used to pass ; and those who scoured the plains, he compared to such as were employed to rouse the beasts and chase them into the toils. This I mention to shew, that according to Xenophon's opinion, there is a great resemblance betwixt hunting and war : upon which account, such exercises are not only honourable but necessary to be used by great men ; because nothing can give them so perfect a knowledge of a country, or imprint it more deeply and particularly in their memory : and when a man has made himself thoroughly acquainted with one country, he will be able to form a pretty good judgment of another, though he has never seen it before ; because there is some sort of similitude and conformity betwixt all countries. But, if a man has not made himself well acquainted with the nature of one, it will be a long while (if ever) before he can be able to judge rightly of any other. Whereas, a person that is well versed and practised in one, will guess pretty nearly at first sight, how far such a plain extends, in what manner such a mountain rises, how far such a valley ranges, and other things of that kind, the knowledge of which he has gained by former

mer experience *. An example of this sort we have in the conduct of Publius Decius, (a Tribune in the army with which Aulus Cornelius the Consul was sent against the Samnites) who perceiving the danger into which the Consul had led the whole army, by marching through a valley where they might easily be hemmed in by the enemy, called out to him, “Vides tu, Aule Corneli, cacumen illud supra hostem? Arx illa est spei salutisque nostræ, si eam (quoniam cæci reliquere Samnites) impigre capimus: Do you see yonder eminence, which commands the enemy’s camp? we have no resource left but to make ourselves masters of that post as fast as we can, since the Samnites have blindly neglected it:” a little before which, Livy says, “Publius Decius Tribunus militum, conspicit unum editum in saltu collem, imminentem hostium castris, aditu arduum impedito agmini, expeditis haud difficilem: Publius Decius the Tribune observed a hill in a wood, which hung over the enemy’s camp, and seemed difficult of ascent to heavy-arm’d troops, but accessible enough to those that were light-armed.” Upon which, being sent by the Consul, with three thousand picked men, to take possession of it immediately, he saved the whole Roman army; and designing to march off himself with his own men in the night, the Historian tell us, that he first ordered some of his officers to attend him in the dusk of the evening, whilst he reconnoitred the enemy, to see how their guards were posted, and which way he might best make his retreat: and all this he did in the habit of a private Soldier, that so, if he should be seen by the enemy, they might not suspect he was a Commander.

Whoever then considers this passage, will see how necessary it is for a Commander to be well acquainted with the nature of the countries where he is to act: for if Decius had not been so, he could not have known of what importance it was to get possession of that hill, nor been able to judge at that distance whether it was easy or difficult of ascent : nor could he afterwards, when he had taken possession of it, and intended to retreat when the night came on in order to join the Consul, have formed any probable conjecture so far off (and when he was in a manner surrounded by the enemy) where they would post their guards, and which way he might best retreat. It is certain therefore that Decius had a perfect knowledge of the country, and saw the necessity of securing that hill ; by which, he not only saved the Consul's army, but found means to retreat in safety with his own men, though he was entangled in that manner with the enemy.

C H A P. XL.

That it is not accounted dishonourable, but quite otherwise, to deceive an Enemy in time of war.

THOUGH artifice and deceit are detestable in all other transactions, yet in matters of war they are not only justifiable, but praiseworthy ; and those Generals are as much extolled who overcome an enemy by stratagem, as those that subdue them by main force *. This plainly appears from the judgment which Historians pass upon Hannibal, and some other great men, who were most remarkable for this manner of proceeding : of which there are so many examples, that it is needless to cite any here, as they must be well known to every one ; I shall therefore only add at present, that when I say artifice and deceit are praiseworthy, I do not mean that sort which consists in breaking your word, betraying your trust, or violating a treaty : for though indeed Kingdoms and States are sometimes acquired this way, as I have shewn elsewhere *, yet it is certain, you can never acquire true glory by it. I speak only of that kind which is practised upon an enemy, who is so far from reposing any confidence in you, that he sets you at defiance : so that it relates only to military operations. Such were the artifices made use of by Hannibal, at the lake of Thrasymene, when he pretended to fly before the Roman Consul ; but in reality did it only to secure some passes, in order to block up him and his army the more effectually : and when he tied fire-brands and torches to the horns of his cattle in the night, to disengage himself from Fabius Maximus. Of the same nature likewise was the Stratagem used by Pontius, General of the Samnites, when he hemmed in the Roman army at the Furcæ Caudinæ : for having concealed his forces in the mountains, he sent some of his men cloathed like peasants, with droves of cattle into the plains ; who being taken by the Romans and asked where the Samnite army was, all agreed in one story (as they had been instructed by Pontius) and said it was gone to lay siege to Nocera : which being credited by the Consuls, they marched away with their forces to the relief of Nocera ; but they had no sooner entered the Furcæ Caudinæ, but they were surrounded and shut up there by the enemy. A victory indeed, which though gained by stratagem, would have been very glorious to Pontius, if he had taken his father's advice, who persuaded him either to dismiss the Romans freely and generously, or to put them all to the sword ; but by no means to take the middle way, “ Quæ neque amicos parat, neque inimicos tollit : which neither makes men your friends, nor disables your enemies ;” and has always been prejudicial in affairs of importance, as I have already shewn in another place †.

That all means are to be used, whether honourable or dishonourable, to save one's Country.

THE Roman army and their Consuls being surrounded by the Samnites (as I said in the last Chapter) were informed by the enemy that the only terms they must expect, were to be disarmed, to pass under the yoke *, and to be sent back to Rome : conditions so ignominious that the Consuls and the whole army were astonished at them. But Lentulus their Lieutenant General told them, “ that in his opinion, they ought to submit to any conditions to save their country ; that as the safety of Rome entirely depended on the preservation of that army, they should upon no account suffer it to be destroyed ; that all means whatsoever, whether honourable or dishonourable, were allowable for the support of their country ; and that if they could save their army, they perhaps might some time or other wipe off that disgrace ; if not, though they perished with ever so much honour, their country and its liberties must inevitably be lost.” His advice therefore was followed ; and indeed it is worthy of being recommended to all Counsellors of State, and such as have any share in the management of public affairs : for when the safety of our country is at stake, all regard to what is just or unjust, merciful or unmerciful, honourable or dishonourable, is entirely to be laid aside, and every method to be taken that may in any wise conduce to the preservation of our liberty †. The French are so zealous in this res-

* This Jugum or Yoke was a Pike or Halberd laid over the tops of two others fixed in the ground, in the form of a gallows or cricket wicket, under which the Romans used to make their enemies pass when they had overcome them ; and were sometimes so served themselves after the loss of a battle, as in this case.

pect, both in their words and actions, when either the glory of their Monarch or the interest of their country is concerned, that they cannot bear to hear any one say, the King acted shamefully upon such or such an occasion ; for they think their Prince incapable either of doing or saying any thing that is shameful or dishonourable either in prosperity or adversity, and that in whatever he does, he always behaves in a manner becoming his Majesty.

That promises extorted by force are not binding.

WHEN the Consuls abovementioned arrived at Rome with their troops disarmed and loaded with ignominy on account of the dishonourable terms they had submitted to, the first who declared against observing the agreement made at the Furcæ Caudinæ was Spurius Posthumius himself, one of the Consuls ; who said in full Senate, that only he and those who had consented to that agreement were bound by it, and therefore the obligation did not include the whole people of Rome ; upon which account, if they had a mind to refuse their consent, they ought to send him back again to the Samnites with all those that had promised to observe it. This opinion he maintained with so much obstinacy, that the Senate at last ac-book III. chap. i.) and do not retract it. To what a pitch did he carry his regard to private obligation, who for the inestimable benefit of restoring his Country, made a conscience of putting a Tyrant and his accomplices to death without the forms of justice ! After the example of so great a man, let us not make any sort of doubt that there is something unlawful even against an enemy ; that the common cause ought not to require all things of a man, against private interest, for the service of his King, his country, or the Laws. “ Non enim Patria præstat omnibus officiis : ” the obligation to one’s country does not supersede every other obligation, says Tully. . . . The utility of an action is but a sorry plea for the beauty and honour of it ; and it is wrong to infer, that because such a thing is useful, it is therefore incumbent on every one to perform it ; and not only a Duty, but for his honour.”

quiesced in it and sent them all back again as prisoners to the Samnites, protesting against the peace which had lately been concluded with them: but fortune was so favourable to him that he was soon dismissed by the enemy and returned to Rome, where he lived in greater reputation, though he had been vanquished, than Pontius did at Samnium, who had beat him.

Hence we may observe two things: in the first place, that honour is to be acquired even by contrary and opposite means; for as it is the usual consequence of victory; so after a defeat, if a man can either shew that it was not owing to any misconduct in him, or do something that is great and gallant to throw into the balance against it, he will be no less admired and applauded than if he had gained a victory. In the next, that it is not dishonourable to break a promise that is extorted by force and necessity: for such promises, if they affect the welfare of the state, will always be broken when the cause ceases that occasioned them; and that too without any reflexion upon the honour of those that break them. Of this we might produce a thousand instances from History, if daily experience did not make it unnecessary. Princes make no scruple of violating the engagements they have been forced into as soon as ever they have an opportunity: nay, it is no uncommon thing for them to break others into which they have voluntarily entered, when the motives cease that induced them to lay themselves under such obligations. But whether that is justifiable in them, or whether such engagements are binding or not, I have no occasion to determine at present, as the Reader may find this point already discussed in my Treatise entitled the Prince*.

* See the Prince, chap. xviii. The above quoted French Author says in the same Chapter, "the profit by the increase of the public revenue, which served the Roman Senate for a pretence to the base conclusion I am going to relate, is not sufficient to warrant such injustice. Certain citizens, by the order and consent of the Senate had redeemed themselves and their liberty, by money, out of the hands of L. Sylla. But the affair coming upon the carpet again, the Senate

That the same disposition is observable at all times in the natives of the same country.

WISE men say (and very justly I think) that in order to form a probable conjecture of what is yet to come, we ought to consider what is already passed; for there is nothing in this world at present, nor ever will be hereafter, but what has and will have a near resemblance to what has happened in former times: because mankind having the same passions in all ages, will, for the most part, act in the same manner upon similar occasions. It is true they are sometimes more virtuous in one Province than in another, and vice versâ, according to their education, condemned them to be taxable as they were before, and ordered that the money they had disbursed for their redemption should never be repaid them. Civil wars often produce such vile examples, that we punish private men for having taken our word when we were in power; and one and the same Magistrate makes another man pay the penalty of his change, though he is in no fault. The Schoolmaster lashes his Scholar for his docility, and the Guide beats the blind man whom he leads by the hand. A shocking picture of justice! There are some rules in Philosophy that are both false and pusillanimous. The example that is proposed to us for preferring private benefit to the obligation due to faith once given, has not weight enough from the circumstances mixed with it. Robbers have surprized you, and after having made you swear to pay them a sum of money, give you your liberty. It is wrong to say that an honest man may be quit of his oath without payment, after he is out of their clutches. The case is quite otherwise. When fear has once prevailed upon me to intend, I am obliged to keep the same purpose, when I am no longer in fear: and though fear should only force my tongue, and not my will, yet I am bound to stand to my word. For my own part, when my tongue has sometimes rashly outrun my thought, I have afterwards however made a conscience of disowning it: otherwise we shall by degrees abolish all the right which another claims to the performance of our promises. "Quasi vero forti viro vis adhiberi possit, says Tully. Offic. Lib. III. cap. xxx. as if violence could possibly operate upon a brave man." The only condition wherein private interest can excuse us for the non-performance of a promise, is when we have promised a thing that is wicked and unjust in itself: for the claim of virtue ought to supersede any obligation of our own." The best Divines and Casuists are of the same opinion. See this matter fully discussed by the learned Bishop Sander-son, in his Prælectiones de juramenti obligatione. Prælect. IV.

from which all men take their subsequent turn and manner of living. We may likewise judge with more ease and certainty of future events by what is past, in a people amongst whom the same appetites and inclinations have been predominant for a long course of time : as some nations have been remarkable for many ages either for their rapacity, or perfidy, or some other particular virtue or vice. Thus whoever reads the annals of Florence and compares the transactions of former times with those of the present, will find that the French and Germans have always distinguished themselves by their avarice, pride, cruelty, and falsehood in all their dealings with us, to the great prejudice of our state. Every one knows what sums of money we paid at different times to Charles VIII. of France, upon a promise of restoring the Citadel of Pisa to us, and yet he never performed that promise. But to omit other modern instances of this kind as invidious, what passed betwixt our Republic and the Visconti, Dukes of Milan, in former times, is no less notorious : for the Florentines being at war with them and destitute of all other assistance, solicited the Emperor of Germany to make an incursion into Lombardy in their favour ; which he readily promised to do with a powerful army, and to defend them against the Visconti, provided they would furnish him with an hundred thousand Ducats to raise such an army, and as much more when he arrived in Italy. This being agreed to, and all the money paid, he advanced as far as Verona : but pretending upon his arrival there that the Florentines had not fulfilled some other articles of the treaty betwixt them, he marched back again with all his forces without doing any thing in their favour. So that if the Florentines had not been either compelled by downright necessity, or blinded by ambition and resentment, or if they had but read and considered the manner in which these Barbarians have treated them in all ages, they would not have been deceived by them at that time, nor any other, as they often have been; for then they would have found that their disposition was always the same, and that they had constantly treated every body with whom they had any dealings in that manner. A remarkable example of this we have in their behaviour to the Tuscans of old; who having been often defeated by the Romans, and reduced to such distress that they found themselves unable to make head against them any longer, agree to pay a large sum of money to the Gauls, who lived on the said of the Alps next to Italy, upon condition they would join forces with them against the Romans. But when the Gauls had received the money, they refused to fulfil the conditions upon which it was given them; alledging that they had taken it, not to make war upon the Romans, but to keep them from commencing hostilities against the Tuscans. In this manner the poor Tuscans were at the same time cheated out of their money, and disappointed of the assistance they expected, through the avarice and perfidy of the Gauls: so that we see from these examples, that the Gauls and Germans have at all times behaved in the same manner: from whence other Princes may easily judge what degree of confidence they may put in them for the future*.

* The famous friar Roger Bacon, in the sixth part of his Opus Majus, speaking in praise of experimental Philosophy, tells us that it investigates the secrets of nature by its own power, and without any regard to the other Sciences. And this, he says, consists in two things; viz. in the knowledge of things to come, as well as of those that are past and present; and in the wonderful works by which it surpasses judiciary Astrology in the method of forming a judgment of things future. Under this, he says, that some Authors have asserted the possibility of changing the genius and disposition of a nation by altering the constitution of the air. Upon which occasion, he tells us, that when Alexander the Great enquired of Aristotle whether he should extirminate the barbarian nations he had conquered, on account of their brutal ferocity, or suffer them to live; that Philosopher answered him, in his book of Secrets, that if he could alter the air of the country, he should suffer them to live; if not, he should destroy them. For he thought that the air might be changed to advantage; so that the constitution of their bodies would be altered, and by that means their minds might produce good actions from the freedom of their wills; and this is one of his Secrets. He observes afterwards that some writers have affirmed, that an army has been struck with such a terror as to fly immediately; and tells us that Aristotle directed Alexander to carry a particular stone about him, by which means his enemies would always fly before him: These and a great many other things, says he, are asserted by some Philosophers to be true; though they do not pretend that any violence is offered to the freedom of the will: for Aristotle, who proposes this, tell us, in his Ethics, that the will cannot be forced, but that the body may be changed by the virtues of things, and the mind excited and induced to chuse that voluntarily to which it is not inclined; as by means of Medicinal potions many persons have been changed, not only with regard to their bodies, but likewise their passions and inclinations.

That things are sometimes affected by bold and sudden resolutions, which could not have been done by ordinary means.

THE Samnites being invaded by the Romans, and not able to keep the field against them, left garrisons in their towns, and marched with all the rest of their forces into Tuscany, (which was then in truce with the Roman Republic) in hopes that the sight of their army might induce them to renew the war against their common enemy, though they had refused to do it before when they were solicited by Ambassadors whom the Samnites had sent to them for that purpose. Amongst other reasons therefore which the Samnites gave for taking up arms, they told the Tuscans, “quod pax servientibus gravior, quam liberis bellum esset; that peace was more insupportable to Slaves, than war to men that were free :” so that partly by persuasions and partly by the presence of their army, they at last

As to Aristotle's panic Stone, no serious man can give credit to the effects he ascribes to it. But methinks much may be said in favour of his other notion of altering the constitution, and consequently the disposition of men, by altering the air of the Country they live in by natural means; such as cutting down huge forests, draining fens, ploughing great quantities of land, &c. For the nations whom Alexander conquered are now very different in point of ferocity from what they were in former times, and so are the Gauls and Germans, mentioned by Machiavel, in other respects. But this perhaps may be owing to other means, and it may be said they are more humanized by commerce and the influence of Christianity than any change in their air.

Romans.

Hence we may observe, that when one Prince wants to make another comply with some request or demand, he ought not to give him time to deliberate upon it, (if he has it in his power to prevent it) but to act in such a manner as may oblige him to come to a speedy determination; that is, by convincing him of the mischief he must of necessity bring upon himself either by refusing or delaying to grant the request. In this manner Pope Julius II. proceeded with the French; and Monsieur de Foix, the French King's general, with the Marquis of Mantua, not long ago: for his Holiness designing to drive the Bentivogli out of Bologna, perceived he should have occasion for some French forces, and that it was necessary the Venetians should stand neuter: but as he had sounded them both for these purposes, and received such ambiguous answers that he could not thoroughly depend upon them, he resolved to make them comply with his demands, by acting in such a manner as should not give them time to do otherwise. For which purpose, having got what forces he could together at Rome, he marched away to Bologna; from whence he sent in a peremptory manner to let the Venetians know they must stand neuter; and to the French, that they must immediately furnish him with succours: so that being afraid of incurring the Pope's displeasure, if they either refused or delayed to comply with him, and finding themselves under a necessity of returning a direct answer, they both submitted to his terms. Monsieur de Foix likewise being at Bologna another time with an army, and hearing that Brescia had revolted, was determined to reduce it to obedience if possible. But there were only two routes by which he could march thither: one, through the territories that were subject to the French, (but that was a very bad one, and a long way about) the other, through the Marquis of Mantua's dominions, where he might be opposed by that Prince in several narrow passes and defiles betwixt the Lakes and Morasses with which that country abounds, and which were very well fortified and defended. Resolving however to take the nearest road in spite of all difficulties, he immediately marched that way; and without giving the Marquis time to consider whether he would grant or refuse him a passage, he sent to him for the keys of those several passes, as soon as ever he arrived in his territories. So that the Marquis being surpris'd by the suddenness of the demand, and having no time to deliberate upon it, was forced to deliver them up to him: which he would not have done if de Foix had proceeded in a cooler and more phlegmatic manner; because he was at that time in league with the Pope and the Venetians, and had a Son in the Pope's hands at the Court of Rome: which he might have pleaded as very good reasons for acting otherwise, if the occasion had not been so unexpected.

Whether it is a better way in battle to receive the enemy's first shock, and not to exert your strength till they have in some measure spent their fury; or to attack them vigorously at first.

THE Consuls Decius and Fabius being sent out by the Romans with two armies against the Tuscans and Samnites, and coming to an engagement with the enemy, their methods of fighting were so different, that it may not be amiss to consider which of them is most worthy of imitation. Decius for his part fell furiously upon one of the enemy's wings, and with all his force at once: but Fabius endeavour'd only to sustain the first attack of the wing he was engaged with; judging it better to act coolly and firmly in the beginning, and reserve the vigour of his men till the enemy had spent their first ardour and began to grow faint and feeble. From the event of the battle it appeared that Fabius acted with more judgment than Decius: for the latter having exhausted his strength in the first onset, and seeing his men almost surrounded by the enemy, determined to sacrifice himself at the head of his troops (as his father had done before him) in hopes of gaining some glory at least by an honourable death, when he found he could not obtain a victory. But Fabius being informed of this, and no less ambitious to distinguish himself by living and acting like a man, than his Colleague had shewn himself by dying in that manner, advanced with the forces which he had reserved for that purpose, and gained a complete victory. From whence it is plain, that it is safer and more prudent to follow the example of Fabius, than of Decius upon the like occasions.

C H A P. XLVI.

How it comes to pass that the same families in a Commonwealth often retain the same manners and customs a long time.

WE see that not only one City has customs and institutions very different from those of another, and produces men either of a more rigid or more gentle disposition; but that there is such a difference likewise betwixt several particular families in the same City. The truth of this is evident from the history of all States, particularly from that of the Roman public; in which we see the Manlii were always rigid and inflexible; the Publicolæ gentle and humane; the Appii ambitious and oppressors of the common people; and that many other families had some peculiar quality which distinguished them from all the rest. Now this distinction cannot proceed from blood alone, (which must of course be often altered by variety of marriages) but from the different manner in which different families are educated: for what a man has been taught in his infancy, and accustomed to hear either praised or condemned in his youth, makes such an impression upon him, that he generally forms the subsequent part of his life according to those instructions: otherwise it would have been impossible that the Appii should all have had the same turn, and been constantly actuated by the same passions and desires, as Livy remarks upon several of them: particularly upon one, who having been appointed Censor refused to lay down his authority at the end of eighteen months, (as the Laws required, and his Colleague had actually done) alledging that he might continue in office five years if he pleased, according to the first Law that was made concerning Censors, which was not then repealed: and though there were many debates and much contention about it, there was no remedy; nor could he be prevailed upon to resign, notwithstanding both the Senate and the people tried all means to force him. Again, whoever reads his speech against P. Sempronius, one of the Tribunes of the People, will see how full it is of the insolence and arrogance peculiar to his family: whilst all the rest of his Fellow-citizens were vying with each other in instances of modesty and strict obedience to the Laws and Religion of their country.

C H A P. XLVII.

WHEN Manlius commanded the Roman army which was sent against the Samnites, he happened to receive a wound in an engagement which disabled him from acting as General any longer. Upon which, the Senate apprehending their army might suffer for want of a Commander, thought it necessary to create Papirius Cursor Dictator, to supply the place of Manlius. But as the Dictator was to be nominated by by Fabius, who was then with an army in Tuscany, and the Senate was afraid he would not appoint Censor, because there was an enmity betwixt them, they sent two of their body to wait upon Fabius, and desire he would lay aside all private resentment and confirm their choice for the sake of the public: which he did out of regard to his country, though it was plain from many circumstances that it was much against his inclinations. An example which ought to be followed by all who would be esteemed good Citizens.

C H A P. XLVIII.

FULVIUS being left with the command of the Roman army in Tuscany, during the absence of the Consul, who was gone to assist in the celebration of some ceremonies at Rome, the Tuscans endeavoured to draw him into an ambush they had laid for him near his own camp: for which purpose, they sent out some of their Soldiers, disguised like Herdsmen with droves of cattle, who passed not only in sight of the Roman camp, but almost close by the entrenchments. But the General suspecting they would not have had the boldness to have taken so unusual a step, if it had not been to draw him into some snare, acted with such circumspection that he discovered their design and defeated it.

Hence we may observe, that a General ought to take great care to avoid being deceived by what may look like a palpable error in an enemy, and to suspect there is some artifice at the bottom; for it is not reasonable to imagine, that people can be so rash and imprudent. But the hopes of victory often dazzle men in such a manner, that they cannot discern the danger that is concealed under these appearances, and therefore run blindly upon their destruction.

finding all the Gates not only open, but unguarded, continued under arms all that day and the night following before they would enter the City, apprehending some snare was laid for them; as they could not prevail upon themselves to believe the Romans would ever have abandoned their last resource in so foolish and cowardly a manner. In the year 1508, when the Florentines laid siege to Pifa, Alphonso del Mutolo, an inhabitant of that City being prisoner in their camp, promised, if they would set him at liberty, that he would deliver up one of the gates of the town into their hands: upon which they released him, but afterwards, when he came to the camp (as he often did) to treat more particularly about the matter with certain deputies appointed for that purpose, he did not do it privately, but in an open manner, and always attended by several other Citizens, whom he desired to withdraw when he entered into any conversation with the deputies. From which behaviour, they might very well have doubted of his sincerity; because, if he had really designed to fulfil his engagement, he would have acted with more privacy. But the Florentines were so eager to get possession of the City that they rashly confided in his promise, and advancing at a certain hour to take possession of one of the gates according to his appointment, they met with such a reception that they lost many of their officers and a great number of private men, to their great mortification and disgrace (*).

C H A P. XLIX.

That a Republic ought frequently to make new Laws and Provisions for the preservation of its Liberties: and how Q. Fabius obtained the name of Maximus.

I Have said before that new disorders of one kind or other must necessarily happen very often in a great Commonwealth, which require new remedies; and that the more dangerous they are, the greater need they have of a skilful Physician. Now though we read of many strange and unexpected accidents and disorders, in the Histories of all States, we shall find still more and stranger in that of the Roman Republic, than perhaps in any other. For the confirmation of which, we may quote the conspiracy wherein all the married women of Rome had engaged to murder their husbands; some of whom they actually poisoned, and had prepared materials to dispatch the rest. Another instance of the same kind, was the conspiracy formed by the Bacchanals, and discovered in the time of the Macedonian war: for so many thousands both of men and women were concerned in it, that it must probably have overturned the State, if it had not been discovered in time, and most of the offenders put to death, according to the custom of the Romans, who made no scruple of punishing a multitude at once upon such occasions. And if other proofs were wanting to shew the power, the authority, and magnanimity of that Republic, it might fully appear from their punishing such numbers of delinquents at one time. Thus they sometimes condemned a whole Legion, sometimes all the inhabitants of a City to death; and sometimes not only banished eight or ten thousand people at a time, but imposed such conditions upon them as are difficult to be borne by a single man, much more by so many. In this manner they treated the remainder of the army that escaped with their lives from the battle of Cannæ: for they banished them all to Sicily, where they were forbidden either to live in any town, or to eat their meat any otherwise than standing. But the most remarkable of all their executions was the decimation of their forces; that is, when they put every tenth man to death by lot quite through an army: and certainly no way can be devised that could be more just, or strike a greater terror into a multitude; because when the delinquency is general, and no certain author or ringleader can be pitched upon, is impossible to punish them all; and to punish one part only and spare the other, would be hard upon those that suffered, and encourage those that did not to offend another time.

The women therefore, who designed to have poisoned their husbands, and the Bacchanals were punished as they deserved: and though such maladies have very bad effects in a Commonwealth, yet they are not mortal; because they are generally discovered before it is too late to remedy them. But that is not the case with regard to those that affect the State: for they are seldom discovered in time, except by very able Physicians, and even then, if not treated with great prudence and care, commonly end in the ruin of the Government: of which we have a remarkable instance in Livy. The Romans having been very liberal in granting the freedom of their City to strangers, they grew so numerous at last, and had such a weight in the public Councils, that the Government began to vary from its usual course; new men being employed, and different measures pursued from what had been customary before. But Quintus Fabius being aware of this when he was Censor, and foreseeing the mischievous effects that must ensue from it, took care to prevent them in time, by reducing all the new Citizens into four tribes; that so when their influence was contracted in such a manner, they might not have it in their power to overturn the ancient constitution of the Republic. A piece of service so grateful to his Countrymen, that they conferred upon him the surname of Maximus.
